representation applies not to the "soul" or "spirit," so that a state of unconsciousness until the resurrection would be implied. It is precluded by the parallelism of the position of the resurrection. It is a point of comparability that is as one who sleeps is not alive to his surroundings, so the dead are no longer en rapport with this earthly life. Whatever may have been the original implications of the word, it plainly had become long before the NT period a figurative mode of speech, just as ἀπεθάνειν, "to wake," was felt to be a figurative designation of the act of the resurrection. Because the dead are asleep to our earthly life, which is mediated through the body, it does not follow that they are asleep to the other reality, that of the other world, that their spirits are unconscious.

Against the unconsciousness of the dead of Lk 16 23; 23:43; Jn 11 25-26; Acts 7 59; 1 Cor 15 53; Phil 1 23; Rev 6 9-11; 7 9. Some have held that this verse is for Paul "in theism employed in order to avoid the terms "death" and "to die," which the apostle restricted to Christ. 1 Thess 4 16 shows that this is unfounded.

(2) The NT speaks of the departed after an another resurrection. It is not to be supposed that they were still possessed of bodily organs (Lk 16 23; 22:44; Rev 6 11; 7 9). That no inference can be drawn from this in favor of the hypothesis of an intermediate body appears from the fact that God and angels are spoken of in the same manner, and also from passages which more precisely refer to the dead as "souls," "spirits" (Lk 23 46; Acts 7 59; He 12 23; 1 Pet 3 19; Rev 6 9; 20 4). The NT never indicates the living to see and converse with the dead. Its representation of the dead as "sleeping" with reference to the earthly life distinctly implies that such converse would be abnormal and in so far disconfortaneous it, without explicit exegesis, and also from the impossibility. Not even the possibility of the dead for their part taking knowledge of our earthly life is affirmed anywhere. He 12 1 does not necessarily represent the OT saints as "witnesses" of our race as in the sense of spectators in the literal sense, but perhaps in the figurative sense, that we ought to feel, having in memory their example, as if the ages of the past and their historic figures were looking down upon us (Lk 16 29; Acts 8 9; 13 6 ff; 19 13). The NT, however, intimated that there is any possibility of a fundamental change in moral or spiritual character in the intermediate state. The doctrine of a so-called "second probation" finds in it no real support. The only passages that can with some semblance of warrant be adduced in this connection are 1 Pet 3 19-21 and 4 6. For the exegesis of the former passage, which is difficult and much disputed, cf. Spirits in Prison. Here it may simply be noted that the context is not favorable to the view that an extension of the opportunity of conversion beyond death is implied; the purport of the whole passage points in the opposite direction, the salvation of the exceedingly small number of eight of the generation of Noah being emphasized (3 20). Besides this it would be difficult to decide whether the spiritual opportunity should have been granted to this peculiar group of the dead, since the contemporaries of Noah figure in Scripture as examples of extreme wickedness. Even if the idea of a gospel-preaching with soteriological purpose were actually found here, it would not furnish an adequate basis for it. It is difficult to see in the vague "second probation" for all the dead in general or for those who have not heard the gospel in this life. This latter view the passage is esp. ill fitted to support, because the generation of Noah had had the gospel preached to them before death. There is no intimation that the transaction spoken of was repeated or continued indefinitely. As to the second passage (1 Pet 4 6), this must be taken by itself and in connection with its own context. The assumption that the sentence "the gospel was preached even as it is determined by the earlier passage in 3 19-21, has exercised an unfortunate influence upon the exegesis. Possibly the two passages had no connection in the mind of the author. For explaining the rest of place, Gehenna, which is never named in the preceding verse is fully sufficient. It is there stated that Christ is "ready to judge the living and the dead." "The living and the dead" are those who will be alive and dead at the resurrection. To judge both theabsence of the Dative in that phrase is stated that Christ is the judge of both. But that the gospel was preached to the latter in the state of death is in no way indicated. On the contrary the telic clause, "that they might be judged according to men in the flesh," shows the sphere of the climax. (5) The judgment determined by the earlier passage in 3 19-21, has exercised an unfortunate influence upon the exegesis. Possibly the two passages had no connection in the mind of the author. For explaining the rest place, Gehenna, which is never named in the preceding verse is fully sufficient. It is there stated that Christ is "ready to judge the living and the dead." "The living and the dead" are those who will be alive and dead at the resurrection. To judge both theabsence of the Dative in that phrase is stated that Christ is the judge of both. But that the gospel was preached to the latter in the state of death is in no way indicated. On the contrary the telic clause, "that they might be judged according to men in the flesh," shows the sphere of the climax. (6) The NT, while representing the state of the dead before the parousia as definitely fixed, nevertheless does not identify it, either in degree of blessedness or punishment, with the final state which follows upon the resurrection. And with the NT no warrant for affirming that the state of death is regarded as for believers a positively painful condition, as has been mistakenly inferred from 1 Cor 11 30; 1 Thess 4 13, nevertheless Paul shrinks from it as from a relatively undesirable condition, which it involves "nakedness" for the soul, which condition, however, does not exclude a relatively high degree of blessedness in fellowship with Christ (2 Cor 5 2-6; Phil 1 23). In the same manner as the biblical teaching of discovery, judgment, and the possibility of the dead to live again is limited to the state between the intermediate state and the age to come is plainly taught. For on the one hand the eternal punishment is related to persons in the body (Mt 10 28), and on the other hand it is assigned to a distinct place, Gehenna, which is never named in the intermediate state. This term occurs in Mt 5 22-29:30; 10 28=Lk 12 5; 18 9; 23 33; Mk 9 43.45.47; Jas 3 6. Its opposite is the eschatological kingdom of God (Mk 9 47). The two terms differ from each other in that it is associated with the torment of evil spirits (Lk 8 31; Rom 10 7; Rev 9 1.2; 11 7; 20 1), and in regard to it no such clear distinction between a preliminary and final punishment seems to be drawn (cf also the vb. ταρατασιν, "to bind in Tartaros;" of evil spirits in 2 Pet 2 4). Where the sphere of the intermediate state is locally conceived, this is done by means of the term ἡδής, which is the equivalent of the CT Sho'el. The passages where this term occurs under Mt 16 18; Lk 16 23; Acts 2 27.31; 1 Cor 15 55 (vulg. read "death"); Rev 1 18; 6 8; 20 13.14). These passages should not be interpreted on the basis of the Gr classical usage, but in the light of the CT doctrine about She'el. Some of them plainly employ the word in the non-local sense of the state of death (Mt 16:18; possibly Acts 2:27,31; 1 Cor 15:55 [personified]; Rev 1:18; 6:8 [personified]; 20:13. The apocalyptic or apocalyptic where the conception is local is Lk 16:23, and this occurs in a parable, where aside from the central point in comparison, no purpose to impart topographical knowledge concerning the world beyond death can be assumed. It is probably the latter that was popularly current. But, even if the doctrine of Hades as a place distinct from Gehenna should be found here, the terms in which it is spoken of, as a place of torment for Dives, prove that the conception is not that of a general abode of neutral character, where without blessedness or pain the dead as a joint-company await the last judgment, which would first assign them to their separate eternal habitations. The parable plainly teaches, whether Hades be local and distinct from Gehenna or not, that the differentiation between blessedness and punishment in its absolute character (ver 26) is begun in it and does not first originate at the judgment (see further, HADES).

ESCHEW, es-chëw (ἐκθέσαι, ἐκθέσαν, ἐκθέσθην): Only 4 x in AV (Job 1:18; 2:3; 1 Pet 3:11), in all of which ARV renders by the appropriate form of "turn away from."

ESDRAELON, es-drâl'ón, PLAIN OF (ὄψης, γιάρ'ελ; in Apoc the name varies: Ἡσδραλ, Ἡσδρολ, Ἡσδραλόν, Ἡσδραλῶν), Eserlan, Eserlon, Eserel, etc.

1. The Ἡσδραλ, Ἡσδρολ, Ἡσδραλόν, στρατικόν, Name, Ἡσδραλῆ, Εσραῆ: The Gr name of the great plain in Central Pal (3 Jth 9:7; 13:3, etc.). It is known in Scripture by the Heb name "valley of Jehoshaphat" (Jehosh. 17:16; Jgs 6:35, etc.) It is called "broad" in Jgs 6:35, 15, which properly denotes "a depression" or "deepening," and is used more commonly of the vale running eastward between Gilboa and Little Hermon. "Bōd" is the term usually employed (2 Ch 35:22, etc.), which accurately describes it, or a clear, deep hollow, a level space surrounded by hills. The modern name is Merj ibn 'Amr, "meadow of the son of Amr." It lies between Gilboa and Little Hermon on the E. E, and Mt. Carmel on the W. It is inclosed by irregular lines drawn from the latter along the base of the foothills of Nazareth to Tabor; from Tabor, skirts Little Hermon and Gilboa to Jenin, and from Jenin along the N. edge of the Samaritan uplands to Carmel. These sides of the triangle are, respectively, the northern, central, and southern edges, and the N. of Jenin a bay of the plain sweeps eastward, hugging the foot of Mt. Gilboa. An offshoot passes down to the Jordan valley between Gilboa and Little Hermon; and another cuts off the latter hill from Tabor. The average elevation of the plain is 200 ft. above the level of the Mediterranean. The Vale of Jerseel between Zer'in and Beisôn, a distance of about 12 miles, descends nearly 600 ft., and then sinks suddenly to the level of the Jordan valley. The chief springs supplying water for the plain are those at Jenin and at Megiddo. The former are the most copious, and are used to create a "paradise" on the edge of the plain. Those at Megiddo drive mills and serve for irrigation, besides forming extensive marshes. The springs near Zer'in, three in number, 'Ain Jalâd, possibly identical with the well of Harod, being the most copious, send their waters down to the vale to the Jordan. The streams from the surrounding heights are gathered in the bed of the Kihan, a great trench which zigzags through the plain, carrying the water through the gorge at Carmel to the sea. For the most of its course this sluggish stream is too low to be available for irrigation. The deep, rich soil, however, retains the moisture from the winter rains. After the first year, the surface only, where uncovered by crops, being baked to brick in the sun. When winter sets in it quickly absorbs the rain, great breadth being turned to soft mud. This probably happened in the battle with Sisera and the northern cavalry, foundering in the morass, would be an easy prey to the active, lightly armed foot-soldiers. The fertility of the plain is extraordinary: hardly anywhere can the toil of the husbandman find a greater reward. The present writer has traced his way through crops of grain there, when, from his seat on the saddle he could no more than see over the tops of the stalks. Trees do not flourish in the plain itself, but on its borders, e.g. at Jenin, the palm, the olive and other fruit trees prosper. The oak covers the slopes of the hills N. of Carmel.

"Gideon's Fountain" in the Plain of Esdraelon.

This wide mountain among the mountains played a great part in the history of the land. This was due to the important avenues of communication between N. and S. that lay across its ample breadth. The narrow pass between the promontory of Carmel and the sea was not suitable for the transport of great armies: the safer roads over the plain were usually followed. So it happened that here opposing hosts often met in deadly strife. Hardly an equal area of earth can so often have been fought for in the course of a month. No doubt many conflicts were waged here in far-off times of which no record remains. The first battle fought in the plain known to history was that in which Sisera's host was overthrown (Jgs 6 20). The division of the East was surmised and routed by Gideon's 300 chosen men in the stretches N. of Zer'in (Jgs 7). Near the same place the great battle with the Philis was fought in which Saul and his sons, worsted in the plain, retired to perish on the heights of Gilboa (1 Sam 31). In the bed of the Kishon at the foot of Carmel Eljah slaughtered the servants of Baal (1 K 18 40). Dark memories of the destruction of Ahah's house by the furious driving Jehu linger round Jearel. Ahabiah, fleeing from the avenger across the plain, was overtaken and cut down at Megiddo (2 Kr 9). In the vale by Megiddo Josiah sought to stay the northward march of Pharaoh-nechoh, and himself fell wounded to death (2 K 23 30; 2 Ch 35 20 f). The army of Hophra represented by Nechoh and the southern reaches of the plain (Jth 7 18 19). Much of the fighting during the wars of the Jews transpired within the circle of these hills. It is not unnatural that the inspiring scene should place the scene of war in "the gate of the house of God" in the Babylonian oaths. Crimson in the history of his people—the place called in the Heb tongue "Har-Magedon" (Rev 16 14 16).

Esrdelon lay within the lot of Issachar (Josch 19 17). The Canaanite inhabitants were formidable with their chariots of iron (17 16 18). The tribe does not appear to have prosecuted the conquest with vigor. Issachar seems to have resumed the tent life (Dt 33 18), and ignobly to have secured enjoyment of the good things in the land by stooping to "taskwork" (Gen 49 14 f).

Through many centuries the plain was subject to raids by the Arabs from the E. of the Jordan. The approach was open and easy, and the Arab raids attracted these great flock masters. The Romans introduced some order and security; but with the passing of the eastern empire the old conditions resumed sway, and until comparatively recent times the long form of an Arab invasion was by no means infrequent.

The railway connecting Haifa with Damascus and Mecca crosses the plain, and enters the Jordan valley near Betania.

LITERATURE

In some of the Gr. uncials (B, etc.) of the LXX the book is called Εσδρας Α, Esdras A (or Εσδρας, Esdras; in the Leningr.); so in the Syr. and Ger. It is absent from Cod Sin (N) and in A its name is Ο Τετελων Των Των Των; i.e. Ezra, who is emphatically the priest. It is also called 1 Esd in the old Lat and Syr VSS, as well as in the Eng., Welsh and other modern trs. In the Eng. and other Protestant Bibles which generally print the Apoc apart, this book stands first in the Apoc under the influence partly of its name, and in part on account of its content it seems a suitable link between the canonical and the apocryphal writings. The Eng. 2 Esd is the apocalyptic Esd and stands immediately after the Eng. and Gr 1 Esd. The Vulg. following Jerome's version, gave the names 1, 2 and 3 Esd to our Ezr, Neh, and 1 Esd, respectively, and in editions of the Vulg down to that of Pope Sixtus (d. 1590) these three books appear in that order. The title given to 3 Esd, however, that current in the Roman church, and it has the sanction of the 6th article of the Anglican Creed and of Miles Coverdale who in his tr follows the Vulg in naming the canonical Ezr, Neh and the apocryphal 1 Esd, 2 and 3 Esd, respectively. Other reformers adhered to these titles.

In Fritzsche's commentary on the Apoc 3 Esd is preferred and he treats this book first. In Kautzsch's Ger. ed of the Apoc and in most recent Ger. works the Lat designation 3 is retained. The Eng. edition given to 3 Esd (Speaker's Comm.) follows the custom of the Bible and speaks of 1 Esd, placing the book first in the collection, and this is the prevailing custom among Eng. Protestant theologians. The name 2 Esd has also been given to the text, the canonical Ezr and Neh being then counted as one—1 Esd. See Origen quoted by HE, V, 25; Zuns, Der Gottesdienst, Vorträge Berlin, 1852, 15.

With the exception of 3 1—5 the incident of the royal banquet and the contest for a prize of the three young men—the present books

2. Contents agree in everything essential, down to the minutest details, with the canonical Ezr and part of 2 Ch and Neh. Before discussing the relation of these books to Ezra (Ezr) and Neh (Neh) let us note that the designation 3 (as noted above) will be advantageous to give an outline of the book now especially under consideration, with reference to the passages in the corresponding parts of the Canon. It will be seen that practically the whole is based on material connected with Neh and for explanations of the parts common to this book and to Neh reference may be made to the Century Bible Commentary on Ezr, Neh, and Est.

1. Ch 1 = 2 Ch 35 1—36 21 may be analyzed thus:
1. 1-20 = 2 Ch 35 1—10: Josiah's great Passover. 1. 21 f has no exact parallel.
2. 23—31 = 2 Ch 35 20—27: The death of Josiah. This took place on the battlefield of Megiddo according to 2 K 23 29, but 1 Esd 1 31 and 2 Ch 36 21 ascribes it to 2 K 25 27.
3. 1 32-38 = 2 Ch 36 1—21, closing years of the monarchy followed by the exile in Babylon.
2. 2 1—18 = Ezr 1 1—11: The return from Babylon through the edict of Cyrus.
3. 2 19—2 4 = 2 7—24: Certain Pers. officials in Samaria induced King Artaxeres I (d. 424 BC) to stop the work of rebuilding the temple, which is not resumed until the second year of the reign of Darius Hystaspis (519 BC).
4. 3 1—3 = Ezr 1: no source in any part of the OT.

King Darius (Hystaspis?) makes a great feast, after which he returns to his bedchamber but finds sleeping very difficult. Three young men belonging to his bodyguard resolve each to make a sentence to be written down and placed under the king's pillow, so that upon rising from his bed he might hear the three sayings read to him. The question which each one seeks to answer is, What in this world is strongest? The first says it is "wine," the second, that it is "the king." The reply of the third is "woman, though strongest of all by nature: for this reason the Lat. saying Magna est veritas et prevalebit (Magna est veritas et prevalebit) is declared the best, and as a reward the king offers him whatever he might wish. This young man happened to be Zerubbabel (Zorobabel), and the request that he makes is that King Darius might perform the vow which he made on coming to the throne to rebuild Jerusalem and its temple and to restore the sacred vessels removed to Babylon. This request is at once granted, and there follows an account of the homecoming of Zerubbabel and his restitution, and the protection accorded him by the Pers. government similar to what we read of in ch 1 as taking place in the reign of Cyrus. But many things in this narrative are striking and indeed odd. Zerubbabel is called a young man. Among those mentioned in § 5 Zerubbabel is not named, though his son Joakim is. In the very next verse (§ 6) this Joakim is identified with the young man (Zerubbabel) who won the king's prize for writing the wisest sentence, though the sense is not quite clear; perhaps Zerubbabel made a mistake in his predictions that he himself would rise in ch 1 and that the corresponding part of Ezr. We must regard 3–1–5 as a Jewish jugglade which at an early time was written in the margin as supplying illustrative matter and then got incorporated into the text. Nevertheless from a literary point of view this part of the book is the gem of the whole.

5. § 7–73 = Ezr 2–4 1–5: The names of those who returned with number of animals (horses, etc) (§ 7–48); altar of burnt offering erected (ver 48); sacrifices offered on it (ver 50). Foundation of the temple laid (vs 56 ff). The Jews refuse the offer of a governor to help in the rebuilding of the temple, with the result that this party had to wait longer (vs 66–73). Between §§ 6–24 finds its true in 1 Ezr 2 16–30 (see above). 1 Ezr 2 30 and 5 73 are evidently duplicates.

must assume that it existed some time before the beginning of our era. Ewald, on account of some resemblances to the earliest of the Sibylline Books, dates 1 Esd about 190 BC. But admitting dependence in this matter, which is doubtful—it is impossible to say which is dependent and which is independent in such cases.

LITERATURE.—The most important books have been named at the end of the general art. on APOCRYPHA (v.). Recent contributions by Howard and Torrey have been mentioned in the course of the foregoing articles.

ESDRAS, THE SECOND (FOURTH) BOOK OF, or The Apocalyptic Esdras:

1. Name
2. Contents
3. Language
4. Date
5. Origin of the Book
6. Dates of Editions

This book was not received by the Council of Trent as canonical, nor has it ever been acknowledged as such by the Anglican church.

The book is not found in the Latin and no complete copy of the Gr text is known, though at one time it did exist. The oldest extant name is "The Prophet Ezra" (Esdras ὁ προφήτης, Esdras ho profetès; see Clem. Alex., Strom., ii.16): It has been often called the Later Ezra, because it exists completely in that language; cf. the name Gr Esd for 1 Esd.

3 Esd is the designation in old editions of the Vulg., 1 Esd being Ezr and Neh, 2 Esd denoting what in Eng. is called 1 Esd. Eds. in editions of the Vulg. later than the Council of Trent, and also in Watson’s Polyglot, Ezr is called 1 Esd, Neh 2 Esd, 1 Esd = 3 Esd, the present book (the Lat Esd) being known as 4 Esd. In authorized copies of the Vulg., i.e. in those commonly used, this book is lacking. On account of its contents, Westcott, following the example of Anastasius Sinaita (bishop of Antioch from 559 AD), called the book the “Apocalypse of Esdras.” But as Tischendorf in 1866 edited a later and inferior work with the title, the present writer suggests the name "The Apocalyptic Esdras." Of all the Jewish apocalypses this is the sublimest and most pleasing; see APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, II, 1, 5.

The original work consists of chs 3–14, chs 1f and 15f being added later. The entire book of 16 chapters exists in the Lat version.

2. Contents, only the VSS containing chs 3–14 only. The real 2d (apocalyptic) Esd, consisting of chs 3–14, is made up of 7 visions given to Ezr in exile 30 years after the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians. The drift of these visions is, How can a just and loving God allow His own people to suffer so much? The problem thus raised is fully and beautifully dealt with. For lack of space the present writer must refer to a fuller analysis of the art. APOCALYPTIC LITERATURE, I, 5, and the lit. there cited. For chs 1ff and 15f see under ESDRAS 5 and 6.

Though no complete text even of chs 3–14 has survived, a careful reconstruction of the contents shows that it has been made from a Gr original. (1) Some fragments of the Gr can be traced, as § 35 (Gen. vv. 26, 31), § 36 (Gen. v. 29), § 37 in the Apoc. Con. (2) The order of the twelve prophets in 1 30 foll. follows that in the Lat. (3) The Lat version bears throughout clear traces of the Gr. Thus the gen. is used with the comparative (§ 3: the gen. (strong) absolute in 10, 9, the double negative and the use of δς (Gr δς) and ες (Gr ες) with the gen. in various parts. But there are cogent reasons for concluding that the Gr version implied in the Lat itself implies a Heb original, and the proof is similar to that of a Gr version as the basis of the Lat. In the text there are idioms which are Heb, not even in their frequency Hellenistic Gr. The participle used to strengthen the finite verb in the regular Heb manner is found in the Lat text.

6. Date

This conclusion rests mainly on the most likely interpretation of the vision of the Eagle (Eagle, the Lion in 11, 6) and the fact that Clement of Alexandria (d. 217 AD) quotes the Gr of 5 35.

ESDRAS (or 4 Ezr) 5 AND 6: These names have been applied respectively to the first two and the last two chs of Ezr, as 1–3, 4, and 5–6. In matter these chapters, which are of Christian origin, agree in the main with the genuine parts of 2 (4) Ezr. See foregoing article.

ESEBION, es'e-b'on (Jth 5 15) = HESHBON (RV), the chief city of the Ammonites.

ESEBRIAS, es'e-bri-as, es'e-bri-as: See ESSEBIAS; SHEEREBIAS.
ESKE (’eskēt (פקיד, ‘eskē; LXX ‘Adskia, Adikia): The name given by Isaac to a well dug by his servants, for the use of which the herders of Gerar strove with them—"contention" (Gen 26 20). It lay in the neighborhood of Rehoboth and Gerar: but the site is not identified.

ESEREBIAS, es-er-bi-as (’Erebias, Eserebias): One of the chiefs of the priestes (1 Esd 8 54).

ESHEAN, esh-e-an (יהשע, ‘eshān; ’Essa, Essa; AV Eschan): A town of Judah in the uplands of Hebron (Josh 15 52). No satisfactory identification has yet been suggested. Some think the name may be a corruption of Beersheba (Esp 8 v.).

ESHMAN, esh-ban (יהשנ, ‘esbān; perhaps "thoughtful," "intelligent"); ’Assān, Asbin): Name of a chief of the Horites (Gen 36 26; 1 Ch 1 41).

ESHCOL, esh-kol (יהשכ, ‘eskkōl; Ἐβραϊκός Βόργας, Phdraez bōrōus, "a cluster of grapes"): The spies came to Hebron "and they came into the valley of Eshcol, and cut down from thence a branch with one cluster of grapes" (Nu 13 23,24; 32 9; Dt 1 24). It was a valley near Hebron rich in vineyards. Fruitful vineyards are still the most characteristic feature of the environs of Hebron, esp. on the N. No particular valley can be identified, though popular tradition favors the wide and fertile valley, near the traditional site of "Abraham's oak," a little to the W. of the carriage road just before it enters the outskirts of Hebron. ESHEAN, esh-b-an, eššē-an. See Eshman.

ESHEK, eš-āk (יהשכ, ’eskēb; "oppressor"): A descendant of Jonathan, son of Saul, first king of Israel (1 Ch 8 89).

ESHKALONITE, eš-kā-lōn-īt. See Askelonite.

ESHTAOL, eš-tā-ōl (יהשתאול, ‘eshtāōl; ‘Aṣṭa-all, Aslāl): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named next to Zorah (Josh 15 33; 19 41). Between these two cities lay Mahaneh-dan (the camp of Dan) where the Spirit of the Lord began to move Samson (Jgs 13 25), and where he was buried (16 31). A contingent from Eshkalon formed part of the 600 Danites who captured Laish (13 21,1). It is probably represented by the modern Ashkel, about a mile and a half E. of Zorah.

ESHTAOLITES, eš-tā-ō-līts (יהשתאולים, Ἐσθαολῖτες, ‘eshtā-ōlis): Inhabitants of Eshkol, named among the descendants of Shobal, the son of Caleb (1 Ch 2 53).

ESHTEMOA, eš-tē-mōa, eš-tē-mō-a (יהשתמוא, ‘eshtramō): A Levitical city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 21 14; 1 Ch 6 57); Eshtemoh (יהשתמוא, ‘eshtramō, Josh 15 50). In 1 Ch 4 17,19, Eshtemoa is said to be a Manachite and "son" of Ishbah. David after routing the Amalekites sent a present to his friends in (among other places) Eshtemoa (1 S 30 28). It is now es-Semtū’a, a considerable village of evident antiquity some 8 miles S. of Hebron.

ESHTEMOH, eš-tē-mō. See Eshtemoa.

ESHTON, eš-tōn (יהשתון, ‘eshtōn; "luxurious"): A name found in the genealogical table of Judah (1 Ch 4 12).

ESLI, eš-li (Essali, Eslē, Eslē, Euli; probably for Heb ישתן, ‘ayṣâlāh): An ancestor of Jesus in St. Luke's genealogy, the 10th before Joseph, the husband of Mary (Lk 3 25).

ESORIA, eš-o-rā. See Esera.

ESPOUSAL, es-pou-zal, ESPOUSE, es-pouz: In AV these words, following Eng. usage of an earlier day, are used to signify either marriage or betrothal, while the ARV discriminates, and uses them only for marriage. For example, in 2 S 14, "I espoused to me" (Heb בֹּכָל) becomes "I betrothed me." So also, in Mt 1 18; Lk 1 27; 2 5 which refer to the relation between Joseph and Mary before the birth of Jesus, "espoused" (μνηστευον, mnistētēō) becomes "betrothed." On the other hand, "espoused" is retained in Cant 8 11 ("the day of his espousals"—that is, day of marriage); in Jer 2 2 ("the love of thine espousals"—that is, the love of married state); and in 2 Cor 11 2 ("I espoused ἡμοῦσαμένοι, hēmosa'me'noi you to one husband"). E. J. Forrester ESPY, es-pī: "Espy" in modern Eng. means "to catch sight of," rather than "to explore secretly." RV therefore retains it in Gen 42 27, "He espied his money" (Heb רֵדָה, rdāh, "see"), while in Josh 14 7 "espys out the land" (AV) becomes "spy out the land." RV substitutes "watch" for "espy" in Jer 48 19, and "searched out" for "espied" in Ezk 26 6, with a gain in accuracy of rendering (cf the context).

ESRIL, eš-rīl, ez-rīl: RV Ezril (which see).

ESROM, er-rom, ez-rom (Ἑσροῦμ, Esrom): AV, the Gr form of Hezron (thus RV) (Mt 1 3; Lk 3 33).

Literature
When Jos describes the sects of the Jews, he devotes most of his time and attention to the third of these sects, the Essenes, although there are frecent references in the NT to the other two sects, the Sadducees and Pharisees, no reference has been found to the Essenes. Not-withstanding this silence of the Gospels, the prominence of this third sect is undeniable. Even in Egypt they are known. Philo, the Jewish Historician, gives an account of these Essenes in terms that, while in the main resembling those used in Jos, yet differ enough to prove him an independent witness. Another contemporary, Pliny the Youth, mentions them in his works. Approximately close in time we have a long account of the habits and tenets of these sectaries in Hippo-lythus' Refutation of All Heresies. A century and a half later still Epiphanius describes these unvaried traditions. From the fact that he refers to the Essenes can be found in the Gospels or the Acts, at all events under that name, there can be no doubt of their existence. Would one understand the Pal in which Our Lord's ministry was carried on, he must be in the place occupying the Essenes.
I. The Name.—This assumes several forms in different authors—indeed sometimes two forms appear in the same author. Jos uses most fre-cently the form which stands in the head of this article, the name of individuals as "Essenes" (BJ, II, vii, 3; viii, 4). This latter form is that preferred by Philo, a form that is adopted by Hegesippus as quoted by Eusebius, IV, 22. Pliny in his Natural History, v. 15, writes, "Hippasians.
Hippolytus also has "Essenius." Epiphanius has mixed his information so that this sect appears with him under several names as "Ossaei" and "Jassaei." It is clear that the name is not primarily Gr—it has passed into Gr from another language at all and has any easy derivation in Gr. Notwithstanding, there have been attempts to explain the term, but this is an almost hopeless etymology. The etymology must be sought in Aramaic, Aram.
 USAGE Forms
Gr of the Scriptures and in Jos, we can deduce that the first letter of the feminine must have been one of the gutturals שספ. That the second letter was a sis-ilar character, and the last was probably נ, for the in other times of the name, the desire to render the word suitable for Gr usage. We may say that to us the two most likely derivations are נכנ, "Quaker" or כננ, "healer." Our preference is for the latter, as one of the characteristics of the Essenes dwelt upon by Jos is the fact that they were healers by mean of herbs and in potions (BJ, II, viii, 6). This view is held by the great mass of investigators. Bdeer, Beilenson, Bremer, Hengstenberg, Herzel, Démé, etc. The name "Therapeuta" given by Philo to the kindred sect in Egypt supports this etymology, as it shows the same Aramaic element. Lightfoot's objection that it is improbable that the ordinary name of the sect should have been derived from a pursuit which was merely secondary and incidental" does not follow analogy. The term "Methodist" was derived from a purely temporary characteristic of the sect that gathered round Wesley. The extreme probability, from this, is that the name is not found in the NT, that it was the nature of a nickname, like "Quaker" applied to the Society of Friends. The multitude that follows this makes evidence of the influence that a reputation for healing gave to one.
II. The Authorities for the Tenets of the Es-sees.—Philo and Jos, as contemporaries and Jews, are necessarily our principal sources of information.
Next is Philo, though a contemporary of the sect, yet as a Roman, his identity receiving his host hand. There is next in point of date Hippolythus in his work Refutation of All Heresies, written more than a century after the life of the Jewish sect and of the existence of the Essenes. One point in his favor as an authority is his habit of quoting from sources as he be reckoned good even now. He seems to have founded to some extent on Jos, but he appears to have made use of some other source or sources as well. The second is Origen, who was the first to receive the sect recognized as authorities is Epiphanius. Writing in the 4th cent., and naturally of a somewhat confused intellect, any statements supported by other authority is to be received with caution.

In estimating the evidence that Philo gives concerning the Essenes, we must remember that he was living in Alexandria, not shut up in a Ghetto, but mingling to some extent with the scholars and philosophers of that city. The Jewish community there appears to have been more completely Hellenized than any other assembly of Jews. The object of his numerous works seems to have been the twofold one of commending Jewish religious thought to the Gr philosophic society in which he mingled, and of commending Gr philosophy to his Jewish kinsmen.
The geographical distance from both hands degree neglected from the frequent communications between it and Egypt. The work in which Philo devotes most attention to the Essenes is his early work, Quod Omnis Probus Liber, "that every good man is free." In this treatise is in the whole written for the audience—the "Lawgiver of the Jews" is introduced casually first, and then more emphatically, till he is named. The Essenes are brought forward as the very flower and perfection of Messianism.

(1) Description of Essenes from Quod Omnis Probus Liber.—"There is a portion of that large named Essenes—over four thousand in my opinion. They are from above all sectaries of the Therapeutae. They do not sacrifice animals but study to preserve the sanctity of life. They live in villages, avoiding all cities on account of the wickedness of those that inhabit them to some extent.
men cultivate the soil, others live by peaceful arts and benefit themselves and all their neighbors.
They do not lay up treasures of gold or silver for themselves.
Lacking wealth and fraudulently the good riches.
With them are not makers of arms or military engines and no one is occupied with anything connected with war. They all avoid commerce and navigation, think that these employments make for covetousness, which they possess not. The men of all the are to be expected to aid another as real (as a kinsman)
They devote their attention to the moral part of the sect, hoping thereby to make the lives of the people, and murder in the land of their laws of their country which it would have been impossible for them to obey, as they say, of their Divine inspiration. They abstain from all works that the day, which they look on as sacred. On it they assemble all the sacred buildings which they have in the or according to age, they hear the Scriptures read (Gr audio) and make up their minds for the which they have thus taught to choose what is right and to avoid what is They use a threefold criterion—love of God, love of virtue, love of man. They carefully avoid oaths and falsehood they regard God as the author of all good. They all dwell in companies, so that no one has a dwelling absolutely his own. They have everything in common, their expenses, their garments, their food. When they work or waged they do not retain the savings for themselves, but they bring it into the common stock. The sick are not neglected when they are unable to call upon the store. They respect their parents. If they were theirs must ever be enslaved. As a proof of of this no one of them have any one in his able to bring any accusation against the Holy Ones."

The above is a very much condensed summary of the passage on the Essenes in Philo, QOPL. No one can fail to be struck with the resemblance all this has in it with what Philo said concerning Seraun on the Mount and the practice of the early church. Although celibacy is not mentioned it is implied in the picture here presented of the Essenes.
There is another account in a passage quoted from Philo by Eusebius, Preparatio Evangelica, VIII, 11:

(2) Philo's Account.—"Our lawyer trained [Heipes]
"anointed" ten thousands of his followers and formed
The Essenes, The

They dwell in a community called Essenes from their holiness. They dwell as numerous communities in many cities in Judea. It was observed that this contradiction the statement above that there were only 4,000 Essenes and that they avoided cities. This sect was on this matter even non-professors among the Essenes as such persons are unstable. No one among them has property of his own. They regard all possessed goods as a common property. They all dwell in the same place, forming themselves into clubs and societies. They do everything for the benefit of the whole society, but different members take up different employments, laboring ceaselessly despite cold or heat. Before morning they finish their work and do not cut it until sunset. Some are tillers of the soil, some shepherds, some leaven-makers. These Jews, when they have received their wages give them up to the general manager who purchases what is necessary. Those who live together at any table after they eat. Their dress is also common. In winter they have thick cloaks. In summer they work in their members. Each takes what he wants. When anyone fails sick he is cured from their common resources. Old men, even if they happen to be childish, are as if they had a numerous offspring of affectionate children. They repudiate marriage because they look on woman as a source of jealousy and hypocrisy, thus likely to dissolve their brotherhood. A man bound to a woman is hampered by his affection, is no longer a free man but a slave." (1 Cor 7:1. St. Paul mentions the same difficulties in regard to this doctrine.

(3) Philo on the "Therapeutae."—In his Treatise De Vita Contemplativa Philo, commencing with a reference to the Essenes, passes on to describe a similar class of coenobites who have their settlements near the Moerotic Lake. These he calls Therapeutae, or in the fem., Therapeutrides, a title which he interprets: "As these have so many points of resemblance, there are also not a few features of difference. We shall give as full an extract as in the previous instances.

It is related that they have separate houses and only come together for meals and chapel services. They have parallel societies for men and for women. As in the case of the Essenes there is a reading of ancient sacred books and an exposition of the passage read. The name Therapeutae, with the explanation of the name given by Philo, affords a link. They are monastic and parallel societies for men and women. As in the case of the Essenes, the etymology of the name which we have seen reason to prefer is the true one. There seems also to be some connection between these Jewish monks and the Christian monks of some three centuries later. It ought to be remarked that many suspicions have been thrown on the authenticity of De Vita Contemplativa. Although critical names of authority may be named on that side, yet it may be doubted whether the reasons are sufficient. Lucius, who is the main opponent, does so merely to invalidate Philo. The statement that Philo was the author of De Vita Contemplativa is composed by a Christian to give an authority to the instruction of the Essene monks, against a practice of having a Jewish would be far from commending it to Christians. But more, the resemblance to the Christian church is nowhere, in others, the importance of the difference is equally prominent. While the common phrases suggest the Agapæan; the early church has a monastic peculiar. The fact that a female community existed alongside, mingled with and in union with the few similar communities is, however, another sort of Essenes who do not avoid marriage.

Like Philo, Jos wrote for a non-Jewish audience. In Rome the philosophic ideas held in the Hellenic world were prevalent, so he, as much

2. Josephus as Philo, had a temptation to be silent on any subject which might shock the sensibilities or provoke the ridicule of his masters. In attributing megalomaniac ideas and tenets of the Essenes, for whom he professed so high an admiration, he would need to be specially careful to avoid causes of offense, as in such a case he would be liable to be involved in their condemnation. In describing them he gives an account of the Essenes which we would consider the descriptions at length first, and then the incidental notices of individual Essenes.

The description which comes earliest in history—not, however, the earliest written—is in Antiquities of the Jews, written in connection with the history and survey under Titus (Cyrenius) and the resistance to it by Judas of Gamala.

He there (Ant, XVIII, i, 5) begins by referring to their theological position, that they believed in the most absolute preordination. They teach the immortality of souls and a state of rewards and punishments. Although they dedicated gifts to the temple they offered no sacrifice, they were presumably without the use of their own. A singular statement is made that they have certain things not given in their land (apokademos, etc.). They occupy themselves with husbandry. "They excel in justice all other men. They have a multitude of disciples and yet wives nor keep slaves. He says, as does Philo, that they doubled number over the benefits of the whole society. As many as they have received their wages give them up to the general manager who purchases what is necessary. Those who live together at any table after they eat. Their dress is also common. In winter they have thick cloaks. In summer they work in their members. Each takes what he wants. When anyone fails sick he is cured from their common resources. Old men, even if they happen to be childish, are as if they had a numerous offspring of affectionate children. They repudiate marriage because they look on woman as a source of jealousy and hypocrisy, thus likely to dissolve their brotherhood. A man bound to a woman is hampered by his affection, is no longer a free man but a slave." (1 Cor 7:1. St. Paul mentions the same difficulties in regard to this doctrine.

A much fuller account is found in the earlier written treatise on the Wars of the Jews, ii, v, 3. In this work he emphasizes the ascetic side of Esseneism.

"The Essenes," he says, "reject pleasures as vice. They despise marriage though they do not absolutely repudiate it, but are suspicious of women. They despise riches and have all things in common. They think oil a desolation. They wear white garments. They elect overseers (prophetes) to manage their common affairs. As much as the Christian bishops did those of the churches under them. They have no one city but many of them dwell in every city." It may be observed that this statement is a contradiction of Philo's statement and that of Jos himself and may be that they were in some way of using the word 'city' as they use the word 'house'; or by the phrase "as many as they have received their wages give them up to the general manager who purchases what is necessary. Those who live together at any table after they eat. Their dress is also common. In winter they have thick cloaks. In summer they work in their members. Each takes what he wants. the days of Herod (XV, x, 4,5) Josephus relates that while Herod demanded oaths of submission from others he excused the Essenes, from the favor he had to them on account of one Memahem, a member of their day before. This Essene seems to have been about the court and to have nothing of the coenobitic agriculturist about him. The Essene fame for prediction and the interpretation of dreams is related in regard to Archelaus, the son of Herod (BJ, II, vii, 3). Archelaus had a dream, and applied to an Essene, Simon or Simeon, who foretold the end of his reign. In singular contrast to what had been said by Philo of the objection the Essenes had in regard to everything connected with war, one of the leading generals of the Jews by Titus (BJ, III, ii, 1). There is also mention of a gate of the Essenes in Jerusalem, which seems to imply that a number of them permanently resided there.

Pline speaks of the Essenes in his Natural History (v.17) in some such purposes more. They died 22 on the west side of the Dead Sea—"a wonderful race without women, without money, associates of the palms." They are recruited by those weary of life, broken in form and the race hundred thousands of ages (seculum) in which no one is born; so fruitful to them is repentance of life in others. He refers to the fertility of Engedi and adds, "now burned up." There is an enigmatic passage quoted by Eusebius from Porphyrius in which the Essenes (Essenes), the Galileans, Hemerobaptists, 4. Hege- Masbaothans, Samaritans and Phari- sippus are declared to hold different sons of Israel "against the tribe of Judah and of Christ" (katê the phalês Ioudaia kat Christiô). Porphyry's note regarding the Es- 5. Porphyry sene is simply taken from Jos.

In the great work of the mysterious bishop, Hippolytus, discovered some sixty years ago, there is a description of the Essenes. Although the work is a Refutation of All Heresies, implying that the opinions maintained were erroneous and required to be rejected, the aim of the author is to exhibit the erroneousness of the Essene tenets or habits. In regard to the gnostic heresies Hippolytus endeavored to reach original sources; presumably he did so in the present case. Although there is no doubt of his indebtedness to John yet for certain features where he differs from Jos, or supplements him, we may assume that he has behind his statements some authority which he regarded as valid. In some cases there may be a suspicion that in his eagerness to show that certain heresies were derived from the Essene, or that heathen philosophical system he has modified the heresy to suit the derivation he has supposed. This, however, does not apply to the Essenes.

In the ninth book of his Refutation of All Heresies, Hippolytus takes up Jewish sects (haresioi) which, following Jos, he reckons as three. The first he discusses is the Essenes. They are very devotional and temperate and eschew matrimony. They despise wealth, and from sharing with the destitute they do not turn away (cf Mt 5 42; the vb. used is the same). Anyone joining the sect must sail all that he has (cf Mt 19 21; the same words are used in Acts 3 32-37). Overseers (epimeletai) are chosen by show of hands (cheiratonin) (Acts 14 23). They do not stay in one city but they change. They dress always in white, but do not own two cloaks or two pairs of shoes, much as Our Lord's instructions to His apostles when He sent them out two and two (Mt 10 10). Their daily course of conduct is described very much in the same terms as those used by Jos. Before dawn they begin to be offered the bread. They return from their work before midday, at the fifth hour, and bathe themselves in cold water and clothe themselves in garments of white linen. After that they repair into the common apartments. They eat with themselves in silence; the cook places food before each individual. The priest prays and pronounces a blessing on the food. At the end of the meal the priest again prays, and those who have part taken in singing a hymn of thanksgiving. They lay aside their white linen garments, and resume their ordinary clothing and betake themselves again to their occupations. Supper at sunset is conducted in a similar manner. All obey the president (proes- tis) in whatever he enjoins. No one amongst them is in the habit of swearing. They are careful to read the law and the prophets. Other works of faithful men they also study. All that join the sect are put on probation. The entrant receives a white robe and a linen girdle, and is supplied with an axe for the time of theDead Sea to 23). He is indebted for their number and fame to the works of more than one of the sect. He also, however, as in Jos, wrote the Essenes, or, as indeed it did Bishop Lightfoot, to think that they denied it altogether. The treatment Paul received at Athens when he preached the resurrection showed how uncongenial this doctrine was to the Greek Philo and others. Or audiences—for the Romans, so far as culture went, were Greeks—and had to consider their taste. Another point held in abeyance by both those writers was the Messianic hopes that we know from the NT were so precious. "all saying "seek me, and I will look for the Messiah," but held that He was to be merely man born in the ordinary way. The reason of Philo's silence and that of Jos is easily understood. They had commanded the Essenes so highly; if they mentioned that they had reasonable hopes of a Messiah who should rule the world, their own personal loyalty would become doubtful. For our part we should regard all the positive elements in Hippolytus' description as worthy of acceptance.

The last authority to whom we would refer is Epiphanius. In his anxiety to make up the number of heresies, the Essenes figure repeatedly under different names. He declares the Essenes hated by many and the Samaritans closely associated with the Sebboth and Gottheni. Among the Jews he has three sects whom he calls Hemerobaptistae, Nazaraei and Oesseni. Besides he has a sect called Sampseans, evidently also Essenes, which he mixes up with the followers of Elkaia. He does not seem to have any clear idea about their tenets or habits. The Samaritan sect, differing from the three Jewish sects, but Hippolytus does not make it clear in what they differ. The Sebuan seem to have reversed the order of the Jewish feasts, but whether the Essenes and Gortini did so likewise is not clear. That the Essenes whom we are considering are Samaritans appears to be as certain as anything about this enigmatic sect can be. The obscure sentence quoted by Eusebius from Hegesippus might be interpreted as supporting this statement of Hippolytus, but it is too enigmatic to be pressed. As to the three Jewish sects the first named—Hemerobaptistae—suite the daily washings of the Essenes, but he asserts that they agree with the Sadducees in denying the resurrection. The Nazaraeons or Nazarens are not to be confounded with a Christian sect of nearly the present day, as they are so distinguished in the district E. of Jordan. They held with the Jews in all their customs, believing in the patriarchs, but did not receive the Pent, though they acknowledged Moses. The Oesseni are the least to the Essenes, as they were said to dwell near the Dead Sea, only it is on the side opposite to Engedi. Hippolytus leaves them to denounce Elkaia and his brother Jexais, of which latter nothing further is known.

III. Deductions and Combinations.—From the characteristics so many, so confusing, indeed, in some respects so contradictory, it is difficult to get a consistent picture. They are said to be only four thousand, yet they are many ten thousands. They reside generally in seclusion, by themselves, and dwell in villages and avoid towns, yet they dwell many in every city and in populous communities. They avoid all connections with war, yet one of their number is one of the trusted generals of the Jews in their rebellion against the Romans. They keep away from the Temple, yet one of them, Judas, is teaching in the Temple when he sees Antigonus, whose death he had foretold. The only way in which any consistency can be brought into their respective character, is by the character of the place. They seem to have the silence, by which they show what Hippolytus and Hippolytus say about the subsections into which the Essenes were distinguished.

A parallel the present writer has elsewhere employed the Methodism. The most prominent body of Methodists are Armenians, there are the Calvinistic Methodists. While Wesleyan Methodists do not all agree in their churches, the Primitive Methodists do. This is so far confirmed by the fact that while the abjuring of marriage is a marked feature in the representation of Philo, yet the latter says that one class of the Essenes not only do not themselves oppose matrimony but regard those that do oppose it as enemies of the human race. The residents in Engedi formed but a small portion of the Essenes. It is probable that of the statement, found alike in Philo and Jos, that they were 4,000, applies. All the features of the picture of the daily common meal rise in our view, joint devotions, may be true in their fulness only of the community by the Dead Sea. What Philo says (quoted by Eusebius, Prep. Ev. VIII 17), that among the Essenes "there are no youths or persons just entering on manhood, only men already declining towards old age." would indicate that the settlement at Engedi was an asylum for those who, having borne the burden and heat of the day, now retired to enjoy repose.

They had communities apparently all over Pal, if not also beyond its bounds, over each of which there was a president appointed (Hep., I. Govern., IX, 15). This would mean that in towns of any size they would have a where to have had houses of call, though it may have been that every member of the Essene community kept open house for all members of their sect who might be traveling. The traveler, when he came to a city, would inquire for any that were Essenes, as the apostles were commanded by their Lord, in similar circumstances, to inquire ("search out") who in a city were "worthy." The common meals might to some extent be observed in these different scattered communities, probably at intervals, as daily as possible, and these the secret sacred books, read and studied with so great regularity at Engedi, would also be read. In this synagoge not only would the canonical books be preserved but also those other books which gave them the name of the angels, as now in the synagoge of Pal the library preserved in the synagoge may be used by those connected with it throughout the week. The head of the community at Engedi might have some suzerainty over all the different communities, but in regard to this we have no information. One external feature which would at once make the Essenes known to each other was the fact that they always dressed in white linen. They had priests probably in every one of their communities. The Jewish exorcists in Ephesus, in whom Bishop Lightfoot (Col., 98) recognized Essenes, were the sons of one Seeva, a high priest (archiereis, Acts 19 14). The high-priesthood was evidently not connected with the temple at Ierus., for no such name appears in the list of high priests. It seems most probably was an Essene high-priesthood.

IV. History and Origin.—There is much in Esseni that is difficult to understand. We have been contradictory features assigned to the Essenes by different authorities; but even in the weather of those features concerning the Essenes, which is least dubity the new difficulty emerges as to how it appeared as a characteristic of a Jewish sect. This is the case in regard to abstinence from marriage. Easterners always have an earnest desire to have sons to keep their memory green, for on a death many of them had and still have ceremonies which only the son of the dead can perform. Yet despite this they avoided marriage. The Jews with their Messianic hopes desired children, as no one knew what his son might prove the child of promise, the Christ of God.

The earliest note of the existence of the Essenes, as of the Pharisees and Sadducees, is under the pontificate of Jonathan, the successor of Judas Maccabaeus (Ant, XIII, v, 9). Jos says at this time there were three sects of the Jews," and proceeds to name them. If this, however, were precisely true, it is singular that there is no mention of any of these sects in either of the books of the Maccabees. The only Hasmonean mentioned by Jos. The meaning of the word is "saints," and in this sense it appears frequently in the Ps. A parallel in modern history to their warlike activity and their claim to saintliness may be found in the Cameronsians of "society folk" in Scotland toward the end of the 17th cent. They were Peden's "praying folk," yet they fought and won battles. When William of Orange came they formed the Cameronian regiment which helped to quell the clans and checked their advance after Killecrankie. Some have identified these Hasideans with the Pharisees (as W. Robertson Smith, art. "Assideans," E2, and others). Hiëtzeg would regard their successors as the Essenes. The great resemblance there was between the Pharisees and the Essenes renders it not improbable that originally they were really one sect and split off. If Jos. is to be trusted this division must have occurred, if not before the Maccabean struggle, at least early during its continuance. The Assideans deserted Maccabaeus, so that it would seem at least possible that by that time the separation had become complete, so that the Hasideans are now to be regarded as Essenes. It would seem as if they deserted the Maccabees when they—the Maccabees—made alliances with heathen powers like Rome. Then they objected to the high-priestly family being passed over for the Hasmonaeans, hence their foolish surrender to Barchides because Aleimus (called by Jos. Jacimus = Matt. 22:21) was with him, a descendant of the race of the high priests. All this is utterly unlike the quiet contemplative lives of the coenobites in Engedi. It would seem that the thousand who died in the wilderness themselves, their wives, their children, and their cattle (Jos. 11:29-33), were no more like the inhabitants of Engedi. Hence leaving the Hasideans it must be said that the representation of the connection of the Hasideas with Judas Maccabaeus put in the mouth of Aleimus by the writer of 2 Macc. (14:6) is not trustworthy. After this desertion of the Maccabees the more religious of them retired to Engedi, while the rest of the party were scattered over the country in the various cities and villages.

As above mentioned the earliest mention of Essenes is by Jos. (Ant. XIII, v. 9) while Jonathan was high priest. The next is the 2. Position story of Judas the Essene seated in the Temple surrounded by his scholars in Josephus "who attended him (parémenon) in order to learn the art of fortelling," thinking that the appearance of Antigonus in the Temple courts proved his prophecy false that he was that day to die in Strato's tower (Caesarea). Judas is explicit that he was in these courts. The other record of his presence in the Temple courts. This would imply that he had no horror of the Temple nor was debarred from its courts. He had no repugnance for residence in cities. Menahem, the next figure that presents itself, shows a man who is mingling in court circles. He feels on Herod. The son of the favorite counsellor of the high priest, a playful domestic chasteisment and prophesies his future greatness. Herod, as we are told, always favored the Essenes in consequence. Later Archelaus consults Simon or Simeon, an Essene, as to the interpretation of a dream. He was at all events consulted by Jos. The sect of the Essenes is admitted. Those in Engedi were aside from the course of the war, though if Pliny's representation is to be taken as accurate the vines and palm trees of Engedi had been burned and the settlement had been rendered desolate. They may have betaken themselves to Pella like the Christians, so as not to be involved in the destruction of the city and the Temple. The communities of the sect in Asia Minor disappear also. To all appearance they are absorbed in the church.

Owing to the fact that so many of the doctrines and practices attributed to the Essenes have no resemblance to anything else in Judaism the question of origin has a special meaning in regard to them. All Easterners the Jews have a desire for progeny—indeed the man who has no child occupies a secondary place in social esteem—yet the Essenes, or at all events some of them, shunned marriage. The polytheistic system of animal sacrifices that claimed to originate with Moses whom they venerated, they abjured bloody sacrifices. Although the seed of Aaron were anointed priests, they set up priests of their own. Their habit of morning and evening prayer, timed by the rising and setting of the sun, suggested sun-worship. The external resemblance of these tenets of the Essenes to those of the Pythagoreans impressed Jos. and he was emphasized by him all the more readily, since thus he brought himself and his nation into line with Jos. thought. This suggestion of Jos. has led some, e.g. Zeller, to the deduction that they were Jewish neo-Pythagoreans. The features of resemblance are formidable when drawn out in catalogue. He mentions (Phil. 11:23-25) that like the Pythagoreans the Essenes regarded asceticism a means of holiness. Both abstained from animal food and bloody sacrifices, admired celibacy and, dressing in white linen garments, had frequent evening washings. Both eschewed Germanic or corporate body into which admission was had by act of initiation and after probation. Community of goods was the custom in both. Both believed in transmigration of souls. The value of this for modernized list is lessened by the fact that there is something of uncertainty on both sides as to the precise views and customs. Philo and Jos unquestionably Hellenized the views of the Essenes when they presented them before readers educated in Greek culture; further the views of Pythagoreans have come down to us in a confused shape. As to the assertion that the Pythagoreans dressed in white linen, Diogenes Laertius says that linen was not yet invented. Zeller has no sufficient evidence that the Essenes avoided the flesh of animals as food, and Diogenes Laertius expressly says that Pythagoras ate fish, though rarely (VIII, 18). While there seems no doubt as to the Pythagoreans and transmigration of souls, it seems certain that this was not a doctrine of the Essenes. Neither Philo nor Jos attribute this view to them. This is the more striking that, immediately after dealing with the Essenes, Jos proceeds to take up the doctrines of the Pharisees to whom he does attribute that view. Moreover

4. Essenes and Pythagoreans

the distinctive views of the Pythagoreans as to numbers and music have no sign of being held by the Essenes. On the other hand the fact that Pythagoras had a wife and children may raise a doubt of their alleged preference for celibacy. Another chronological difficulty has to be met. The Pythagoreans as a society were put down in the 6th century before Christ. They may be regarded as having disappeared, till in the 2nd cent. AD they reappear as prominent neo-Pythagoreans. It is true that Cicero and Seneca mention Pythagoreans, but only as individuals who would claim to be the followers of Pythagoras, and not as members of a sect: they were not sectarians in the Alexandrians.

Chronology is equally against the view favored by Hilgenfeld that the influence of Buddhism may be traced in Essenes. As late as the end of the 2nd cent. AD, Clement of Alexandria, although acquainted with the tenets and of divisions of his followers. The Alexandria which Hilgenfeld identified with Alexandria of Egypt, in which there was a Buddhist settlement, was really to be found in Bactria, where a Buddhist settlement was likely.

There is more to be alleged in favor of Parsee influence being traceable. Neither geography nor chronology protests against this influence. The Jews were for centuries proceeding out of the Persians, who were followers of Zoroaster. They seem on the whole to have been favored by the Pers rulers, a state of matters that would make the Jews all the more ready to view with sympathy the opinions and religion of these matters. Moreover the Pers worship had spread away to the west, far beyond Syria. At the same time it is easy to exaggerate the points of resemblance. The dualism alleged to be a leading feature in Essenes is more a matter of deduction than of distinct statement. Indeed the proofs alleged by Zeller are almost ludicrous in their insufficiency, since Philo says that the Essenes shun marriage because women are selfish (Phil. 7), and Jos. that they do so because women are addicted to excess (Jos. 11, 5); that therefore they regard the female generally as under the dominion of the evil principle, the fact being that this is really a part of the Hellenizing which the Essene views underwent at the hands of Philo and the Alexandrians professed sun-worshipers, and Philo's views are a deduction not even plausible. When carefully looked at the evidence points the other way, their first prayer is offered not at sunrise but before it (Bj. 11, 5); in other words, they work while it is day. Their evening orisons are offered after the sun has set. At the same time their elaborate angelology seems to be due to the influence of the Zend-Avesta, but in this the Essenes merely shared with the rest of the Jews. We know that the Jews brought the names of the angels with them from Babylon.

The most singular feature in Essenes is really a feature of Judaism emphasized out of proportion. It was unlike the Jews to shun marriage, and polygyny, yet in seasons when special holiness was required intercourse between Jewish the sexes was forbidden (Ex 19 15; 21 5). The whole act of sexual intercourse was regarded as uncleann (Lev 15 18). In the Pauline epistles it is equivalent to fornication (Rom 1 24; 6 19, etc.). So also in 2 Pet 2 10. Such a view naturally led to the idea which soon became regnant in Christianity that the state of virginity was one of special sanctity (Rom 14 4). The expression of the unmarried state may be exaggerated. If Philo's representation (quoted in Euseb., Prep.

Evon., VIII, 11) be correct, men were not admitted until maturity was attained and passed, when, therefore, such desires had begun to die down. Their avoidance of marriage is a matter of less importance. Their extreme reverence for the Sabbath is of a piece with their celibacy. Their avoidance of the Temple sacrifices, so far as they did so, may well be due to something of more than contempt for the religion of the Sadducean high-priests party. Moreover the long residence of Israel in Babylon, when the Temple worship had to be in abeyance, and the consequent prevalence of synagog worship, tended to lessen the importance of the sacrifices of the Temple. Thus it would seem that the Essenes were really a Jewish sect that had retained more of the Zoroastrian elements than had the rest of the Jews.

5. Buddhism and Essenes

Thus it would seem that the Essenes were really a Jewish sect that had retained more of the Zoroastrian elements than had the rest of the Jews.

V. Relation to the Apocalyptic Books.—Among the features of Essenes which seem to have impressed Jos. most was the fact that they had sacred books of their sect which they preserved, as also the names of the angels, thus bringing the Essene special books into connection with angelology. These books their proselytes were bound by oath to preserve (Bj. II, 5). Consequently they are of the Therapeutae, Philo says, "They have also writings of ancient men" (De Vita Contemp., III). On the other hand we have a mass of writings the same in character, dependent on one another, all apparently proceeding out of Israel, that have been called Essene. They are found in the three sects of the Jews from which alone they could have proceeded the Sadducees are excluded because, while the apocalyptic books are full of angels, they believe neither in angel nor spirit (Acts 7 8). While the apocalyptic books, on the other hand, as the fact that practically there is no reference to any of these books in the Talm, which proceeded from the Pharisaic school, renders them unlikely to have been the authors. The Essenes seem to us to have been the school from which these apocalyptic works proceeded. The sect, at the fall of the Jewish state, disappeared in Christianity, and in the Christian church these books are preserved. The section of the Essenes who were in circumstances specially liable to see visions and to have distorted views of morality, so that the composition of pseudonymous writings, literary forgeries, is an undoubted fact. Moreover the study of the apocalyptic books there is the undue prominence given to sexual sin—a prominence that seems to be symptomatic of the unhealthy mental state engendered by celibacy. These writings are the product of a school that professed to have secret sacred books. In 2 (4) Esd. 14 45. 46 we have an account of how, while 24 of the sacred books were published to the multitude, 70 were retained for the "worthy," that is, for some inner circle, some brotherhood like the Essenes. In the Apocryphal books, Jewish writers commanded to place the revelations given them "in certain vessels and anoint them with oil of cedar." Such an order would be held as explaining at once the disappearance of the book for the years succeeding Moses and the opportune reappearance. On the one hand we have a sect that professes to have secret sacred books, and on the other we have sacred books that have been composed by a school that must have had many features which we recognize as Essene. Further the Essene Tanak is used in the Christian church, and in the Christian church and not among the Jews are these books preserved.

The main objection to this ascription is the prominence of the Messianic hope in the apocalyptic books, and that they gave it in detail. Yet Philo says that the Essenes had this hope. But from neither of these writers could be discovered that any of the Jews cherished this hope. Yet from the NT we know that this hope was a prominent feature in national aspirations. In Philo, associating the Essenes with the Greeks, we, too, might be sensitive to the ridicule to which such views would expose him, and how it would undo much of his laborious efforts to connect Judaism to the Greeks as a higher philosophy. Jos had not only that motive, but the more serious one of personal safety. To have enlarged on Messianic hopes and declared these hopes to have been cherished by these Essenes whom he had praised so highly, would have been liable to bring about an explanation of disloyalty to Rome.

The silence of these two writers proves nothing because it proves too much; and further we have easy explanation of this silence. The assumption of Dr. Charles that the Essenic ideal was ethical and individualistic is pure assumption. There is another objection that while the doctrine of resurrection is recognized in these books we know nothing of the Essenes holding it. That the Greeks and their scholars in philosophy, the Boeotians, looked at the idea of resurrection from the dead as a subject for ridicule would be reason sufficient for Philo and Jos to suppress such a feature in their description of the Essenes. From them it could not be learned that the Essenes ever had such beliefs. It is also objected that while the Essenes held the pre-existence of souls, there is no trace of this belief in the apocalyptic books. Jos, however, does not really assert that they believed in the prior existence of the individual soul, but rather in soul-stuff from which individual souls were separated. Thus, both positively and negatively we think there is a strong case for the Essenes being regarded as the authors of the apocalyptic books. Further objections are brought forward by Dr. Charles, and are applicable to the Asm M specially. One is the interest manifested in the Temple by the writer while, so says Dr. Charles, "the Essene was excluded from its courts," and refers to Jos, Ant., XVIII, 1, 5. He must have forgotten, while penning this sentence, Ant., XII, xi, 2, in which Judas, the Essene, is represented as teaching in the Temple. His objection that Jos credits the Essenes with a belief in a paradise beyond the ocean the like the Gr. Islands of the Blest, appears to us to be not much stronger than the fig. language. Moreover, in En the description of Paradise (chs 24-26) would almost seem to be the original from which Jos (BJ, II, vii, 11) drew his picture. He seems to regard our ignorance of how far this tradition had lived among the Essenes as evidence that they were forgotten, of the generations of men in considering the enemies of Israel "the wicked," as evidence that they disagreed with them on that point.

VI. The Essenes and Christianity.—That there were many points of resemblance between the Essenes and the church in its earliest form cannot be denied. The Essenes, we are told, maintained a community of goods and required anyone who joined their society to sell all he had and present it to the community (Hippolytus, Adv. Heret., ix; Jos, BJ, II, viii, 3), just as so many of the primitive Christians did in Jerus (Acts 4:32). Another peculiarity of the Essenes—noted by Jos (BJ, II, viii, 4)—that they moved about from city to city, and wherever they went found accommodation with members of their order, although perfect strangers, may be compared with Our Lord's instructions to the apostles to do the same (Mt 10:11): "Into whatsoever city or village ye shall enter, search out who in it is worthy." When one thinks of those who worthy persons could be, and what was the evidence by which their worthi-ness was expected to be established, one is almost obliged to suppose that it was a specially easily recognized class that was so designated. The Essenes, considering the Essenes in question was the moral quality, there are so many ideas of moral worth that when the apostles inquired, on entering a city, who was worthy, before they could act on the answer they would need to discover what was the criterion of worthiness in the mind of him from whom they had inquired. If, however, this term was the private designation of the members of a sect, one by which they, in speaking of each other, indicated that they were co-members, as the "Quakers" speak of each other as "Friends," the inquiry to whom who were worthy would be simple enough. If the Essenes were the "worthy," then identification would be complete, but we cannot assume that. The majority of the points in which the Essenes resembled the primitive Christians are noted above in connection with each feature as it appears in the passage or passages of the authorities that record it, and to these we refer our readers.

At the same time, although there are thus many points of likeness, it is not to be denied that there are also many features in Essenism which are at variance with the practice of Christianity. These differences may be divided into two groups: (1) the practice of the early church and the teaching of Our Lord and his apostles. The most prominent of these is the difference in attitude toward marriage and the female sex. Our Lord sanctified marriage by His presence at the marriage at Cana of Galilee, although He himself never married. He used the festivity of marriage again and again as illustrations. He drew upon marriage to Him and had none of the contempt of the sex which Jos and Philo attribute to the Essenes. The apostles assume the marriage relationship as one into which Christians may be expected in due course to enter, and give exhortations suited to husbands and wives (1 Pet 3 1-7; Eph 5 22-33; Col 3 18-19). The apostle Paul uses the relation of husband and wife as the symbol of the relation of Christ to His church (Eph 5 22). The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews declares, "Marriage is honourable in all" (He 13 4 AV).

Another point in which the Essenes differed from the practice of Our Lord was the practice of baptism, not even moving a vessel from one place to another on the seventh day. Our Lord's declaration, "The sabbath was made for man, and not man for the sabbath" (Mt 27), cuts at the roots of the whole attitude toward the sabbath of the Essenes. Further, Our Lord makes no distinction between the Pharisees as He does regarding the sabbath by fencing it by their traditions. The Essenes shrank from contact with oil, which Our Lord certainly did not. On the contrary He rebuked the Pharisees for their neglect (Lk 7 46). The Pharisees, twice anointed by women, and in both cases commended the deed. The purely external and material bulked largely in the opinions of the Essenes. Our Lord emphasized the internal and spiritual. Many have held and do hold that Our Lord was an Essene. If at the beginning of His career He belonged to this sect He must have broken with it long before the end of His ministry.

Why Our Lord never meets the Essenes.—There are some phenomena which, irrespective of these resemblances and differences, have a bearing on the relation between Essenism and Christianity. The first is the fact that Our Lord, who met so many different classes of the inhabitants of Pal—Pharisees and Sadducees, publicans, Samaritans, Greeks—never is recorded to have had much contact with an Essene. The common answer, which satisfied even Bishop Lightfoot, is that they were so few and lived so retired that it was no marvel that He never encountered any of them. They had little or no set on the original life. The mistaken answer is due to forgetting that though he did say the Essenes were 4,000 they also declare that they were "many in every city," that there were "ten thousands of them." Our Lord must have met them; but if the name "Essene" was a designation given from without like "Quakers," then they may appear in the Gospels under another name. There is a class of persons three times referred to—those "that waited for the consolation of Israel" (Lk 2:25 AV), "looking for the redemption" (2:38), "waited for the kingdom of God" (Mt 24:15, 43; Lk 21:28 AV). There are thus Simon and Anna at the beginning of His earthly life, and Joseph of Arimathea at the end, connected with this sect. If, then, this sect were the Essenes under another name, the difficulty would be removed. If, further, in any sense Our Lord belonged, or had belonged, to the Essenes, then as He would be perpetually meeting and associating with them, these meetings would not be chronicled. A man cannot meet himself. If they are the authors of the apocryphal books, as we contend, then the title "waiters for the kingdom of God" would be most suitable, full as these books are of Messianic hopes. If this opinion is correct Our Lord's assumption of the title "Son of Man" is significantly connected with the prominence given to that title in the Enoch books.

Another significant phenomenon is the disappearance of Essenism in Christianity. Bishop Lightfoot, in his dissertation on the Colossians (Comm. Col., 21-111), proves that it was Essenism. These Essenes must have been baptised into Christ, or they could not have got entry into the Christian communities and thus become Christians from heathenism. But that is not the only heresy that is connected with the Essenes. The Ebionites seem to have been Essenes who had passed over into Christianity. In the Apos. Const. the Ebionites and Essenes are brought into very close connection. Epiphanius, in his confused way, mixes up the various names under which the Essenes appear in his works with a certain Elkaioi, a connection also to be found in Hippolytus, an earlier and better authority. The Ebionites were also Christians. His leading follower, Alcibiades, appeared in Rome and was resisted by Hippolytus. The Clementine Homilies, a religious novel of which St. Peter is the hero, has many Essenian features. It is assumed to be Ebionite, but that only means the evidence that the Essenes had become Christians all the more convincing. The Ebionites were Christians, if defective in their views, and the presence of Essenian features in a work proceeding from them emphasizes the identity. See Ebionism.

There is another phenomenon, more extensive and important than those we have considered above—the presence of Monachism in the church. Notwithstanding that our Lord prayed us not to be "taken out of the world," but that they be kept "from the evil" (Jn 17:15), implying that they were not to retire into solitude, and that the apostle Paul regards it as demonstrating the futility of our possible interpretation of an extreme view, that it would imply that the disciples "must needs go out of the world" (1 Cor 5:10); yet the monks did retire from the world and regarded themselves as all the holier for so doing, and were regarded so by others. The apostle Paul denounces the "Romans" as "the doctrine of demons," yet very soon asceticism set in and virginity was regarded as far holier than the married state. Retirement from the world and asceticism were the two cardinal characteristics of Monachism. Despite these, the Christ antithesis to the Stoics and Epicureans, within little more than a century after Our Lord's ascension Monachism began to appear, and prevailed more and more and continues to this day. These characteristics, retirement from the world and asceticism, esp. for monks, went hand in hand with the ascetic school of Alexandria praises the contemplative life, so admired by their contemporaries, the neo-Platonists, and that philosophy which had been looked at askance by the church was, so to say, taken up by them. This is the Christian counterpart of the prominence given to that title in the Enoch books.

We feel the importance of this advice, and the general perusal has shown us that most of these secondary writers have considered the Essenes exclusively the Ebionites, and an attempt to form an opinion at Engeld to the neglect of the wider society. After the student has formed opinions from a careful study of the sources he may benefit by these comments.

ESTATE, ee-tät': While AV uses both "estate" and "state" with the meaning of 'condition,' ARV distinguishes, using "state" for the idea of condition, and "estate" for position; and replaces "estate" of AV by more definite expressions in many cases. Cf Col 4:7 AV, "All my state shall Tychicus declare unto you," but ver 8, AV "might know your state," RV "our state" were a cause, and Col 1:29 AV and RV "the low estate" (of the Lord's hand-maiden); Mk 6:21, AV "chief estates," RV "chief men"; Dn 11:7.20:21,38, AV "his estate," RV "his place," both with m 'his office'.

ESTEEM, ee-stim (בָּשָׁם, haššahb; ἡγομαν, hēgōman): "To esteem" means sometimes simply "to think" or "reckon"; in other connections it means "to regard as honorable or valuable."

We have examples of both senses in the Bible. The word oftenest in OT is haššahb, meaning perhaps originally, "to bind," hence "combine," "think," "reckon" (Job 41:21 AV; Isa 29:16:17; 63:4; Lam 4:2). In Isa 63:3 we have the word in the higher sense, "We esteemed him not." This sense is expressed also by `drakah, “to set in array,” “in order” (Job 36 19, AV “Will he esteem thy riches?” ERV “Will thy riches suffice?” m “Will thy cry avail?” which ARV adopts as the text); also by ἐστήσαι, “to hide,” “to conceal” (Job 23 12, AV “to hide the words of his mouth,” RV “treasured up”); kalāl, “to be light,” is translated “lightly esteemed” (I Sa 18 23, “I am a poor man, and lightly esteemed”), also kālāl, same meaning (1 S 2 30, “They that despise me shall be lightly esteemed”). In the NT, ἐξέτασις, “to look out,” is used in the sense of “counting honorable,” etc (Phil 2 3, RV “counting”; 1 Thess 5 13; perhaps He 11 26, but RV has simply “accounting”); krīnō, “to judge,” is used in the sense of “to reckon (Rom 14 14, RV “accounteth”); ἠρετίζομαι, “high,” “exalted,” is rendered “highly esteemed” in Lc 16 15 AV, but in RV “exalted”; exouthĕnō, “to think nothing of,” is translated “least esteemed” (1 Cor 6 4 AV, RV “of no account”).

The following changes in RV are of interest: for “He that is despised and hath a servant, is better than he that honoreth himself and lacketh bread” (Froy 12 9), “Better is he that is lightly esteemed,” for “Better is he than both they, which hath not yet been” (Eccl 4 3), “Better than them both did I esteem him,” m “Better than they both is he”; for “Surely your turning of things upside down shall be esteemed as the potter’s clay” (Isa 29 16), “Ye turn things upside down” (m “On your perversion”); “Shall the potter be esteemed [ERV “counted”] as clay,” etc—in this connection a forcible assertion of the necessary possession of knowledge by the Creator of man.

ESTHER, esēr (אסתר), esēr, akin to the Zend ēśāra, the Sanskrit stri, the Gr ἀστήρ, asēr, “a star,” ἀστὴρ, Ἀστήρ, Esther): Esther was a Jewish orphan, who became the queen of Xerxes, in some respects the greatest of the Pers kings. She was brought up at Susa by her cousin Mordecai, who seems to have held a position among the lower officials of the royal palace. Vashti, Xerxes’ former queen, was divorced, and the most beautiful virgins from all the provinces of the empire were brought to the palace of Susa by the king that might select her successor. The choice fell upon the Jewish maiden. Soon after her accession a great crisis occurred in the history of the Jews. The entire people was threatened with destruction. The name of Esther is forever bound up with the record of their deliverance. By a course of action which gives her a distinguished place among the women of the Bible, the great enemy of the Jews was destroyed, and her people were delivered. Nothing more is known of her than is recorded in the book which Jewish gratitude has made to bear her name.

The change in the queen's name from Hadassah (הָדָסָה), “a myrtle,” to Esther, “a star,” may possibly indicate the style of beauty for which the Pers queen was famous.

Change of Name

The narrative displays her as a woman of clear judgment, of magnificent self-control, and capable of the noblest self-sacrifice. See Esther, Book of.

This book completes the historical books of the OT. The conjunction "and," with which it begins, is significant. It shows that the book was designed for a place in a series, the "linking it on to a book immediately preceding, and that the present arrangement of the Heb Bible differs widely from what must have been the original order. At the present time the ancient order of the Persian Esther follows that of the Heb Bible of the 8d or the 4th cent. BC, and this is the order of the Vulg., of the Eng. Bible, and of other VSS. The initial " of, absent from Gen, Dt, 1 Ch and Neh. The historical books are consequently arranged, by the insertion and the omission of " into these four divisions: Gen to Nu; Dt to 2 K; 1 Ch to Ezr; Neh and Est.

Of the canonicity of the book there is no question. That there was a distinct guardianship of the Canon by the Jewish priesthood has figured in the recent discussions of the book than it should.

1. The Canonicity of Esther

Jos shows that there was a Temple copy which was carried among the Temple spoils in the triumph of Vespasian. The peculiarities of the Heb text also prove that it is not only a recognizable, but also a distinguished, place. The statement of Julianus in the 6th cent. AD that the canonicity of Est was doubted by some in his time has no bearing on the question. The high estimation of the book current among the ancient Jews is evident from its titles. It is usually headed “Megalith Esther” (the volume of Est), and sometimes “Megillah” (the volume). Masoretes says that the wise men among the Jews that the book was dictated by the Holy Spirit, and adds: “All the books of the Prophets, and all the Hagiographies shall cease in the days of the Messiah, except the volume of Est; and, lo, that shall be as stable as the Pent., and as the constitutions of the oral law which shall never cease.”

By whom was the book written? This is a point in regard to which no help is afforded us either by the contents of this book or by any reliable tradition. Mordkes, who claims that the wise men among the Jews that the book was dictated by the Holy Spirit, and adds: “All the books of the Prophets, and all the Hagiographies shall cease in the days of the Messiah, except the volume of Est; and, lo, that shall be as stable as the Pent., and as the constitutions of the oral law which shall never cease.”

Light is thrown upon the date of the book by the closing references to Haster (10 2): “And all the acts of his power and of his might, the forerunner of the Persian empire was Alexander in 332 BC; for the royal records of the Median and Pers kings are presently in existence and accessible, which they would not have been had the empire been overthrown. The book must have been written, therefore, some time within this interval of 128 years. There is another fact which narrows that interval. The initial " of shows that Est was written after Neh, that is, after 430 BC. The interval is consequently reduced to 98 years; and, seeing that the Pers dominion was plainly in its pristine vigor when Est was written, we cannot be far wrong if we regard its date as about 400 BC.
The book is characterized by supreme dramatic power. The scene is “Shushan the palace,” that portion of the ancient Elamitid capital 4. Its which formed the fortified residence Contents of the Pers kings. The book opens and closes with a description of a high festival. All the notabilities of the kingdom are present, together with their retainers, both small and great. To grace the occasion, Vashti is summoned to appear before the king’s guests; and, to the dismay of the great assembly, the queen refuses to obey. A council is immediately summoned. Vashti is de-graded; and a decree is issued that every man bear rule in his own house (ch 1). To find a successor to Vashti, the fairest damsels in the empire are brought to Shushan; and Hadassah, the cousin and adopted daughter of Mordecai, is of the number. The chapter (2) closes with a notice of two incidents: (1) the coronation of Hadassah (now and henceforth named “Esther”) as queen; (2) Mordecai’s discovery of a palace plot to assassinate the king. Ch 3 introduces another leading personage, Haman, the son of Hammedatha, whose seat the king had set “above all the princes that were with him.” All the king’s servants who are at the king’s gates prostrate themselves before the powerful favorite. Mordecai, who, though he is not a God-fearing Jew, refrains. Though expostulated with, he will not conform. The matter is brought to Haman’s notice for whose offended dignity Mordecai is too small a sacrifice. The whole Jewish people are to be exterminated. Lots are cast to find a lucky day for their extermination. The king’s consent is obtained, and the royal decree is sent into all the provinces fixing the slaughter for the 13th day of the 12th month.

The execution of the decree is followed by universal mourning among the Jews (ch 4). News of Mordecai’s mourning is brought to Esther, who, through the messengers she sends to him, is informed of her own and her people’s danger. She is urged to save herself and them. She eventually decides to seek the king’s presence at the risk of her life. She presents herself (ch 5) before the king and is graciously received. Here we breathe the atmosphere of the place and time. Everything depends upon the decision of the king. Esther does not attempt too much at first: she invites the king and Haman to a banquet. Here the king asks Esther what her petition is, assuring her that it shall be granted. In reply she requests his and Haman’s promotion to a high rank and in the following day, Haman goes forth in high elation. On his way home he passes Mordecai, who “stood not up nor moved for him.” Haman passes on filled with rage, and unbossoms himself to his wife and all his friends. They advise that a stake, fifty cubits high, be prepared for Mordecai’s impalement; that on the morrow he obtain the royal permission for Mordecai’s execution; and that he then proceed with a merry heart to banquet with the queen. The stake is made ready.

But (ch 6) that night Xerxes cannot sleep. The chronicles of the kingdom are read before him. The reader has come to Mordecai’s discovery of the plot, when the king asks what reward was given him. He is informed that the service had received no acknowledgment. It is now early morning, and Haman is waiting in the court for an audience to request Mordecai’s life. He is summoned to the king’s presence and asked what should be done to the man whom the king desires to honor. Mordecai, thinking only of him, he suggests that royal honors be paid him. He is appalled by the command to do so to Mordecai. Hurrying home from his lowly attendance upon the hated Jew, he has hardly time to tell the mournful story to his wife and friends when he is summoned to Esther’s banquet. There, at the king’s renewed request to be told her desire, she begs life for herself and for her people (ch 7). The king asks in astonishment, who he is, and where he is, who dared to injure her and them. The reply is that Haman is the enemy. Xerxes, filled with indignation, rises from his ban-quet and passes into the palace garden. He returns and discovers that Haman, in the madness of his fear, has thrown himself on the queen’s couch, beg- ging for his life. That act seals his doom. He is led away to be impaled upon the very stake he had pre pared for the Jew. The seal of the kingdom is transferred to Mordecai (ch 8). Measures are immediately taken to avert the consequence of Haman’s plot (chs 9-10). The result is deliver ance and honor for the Jews. These resolve that the festival of Purim should be instituted and be ever after observed by Jews and proselytes. The decision was confirmed by letters from Esther and Mordecai.

The Seph, as we now have it, makes large additions to the original text. Jerome, keeping to the Heb text in his own tr. has added these at the end. The amount to note with the Heb is not 100,000, but a God-fearing Jew. Hence, there is nothing to reward per- sonal services. Their age has been assigned to 100 years. But the name of Xerxes, who is not mentioned in the text, does indicate they afford of the antiquity of the book. There had been long-existing differences to perplex the Heb mind with the absence of the name of God and the neglect of all references to divine worship. Full amendments are made in the additions.

The opponents of the Book of Est may undoubt edly boast that Martin Luther headed the attack. In his Table-Talk he declared that he would so hostile “to the Book of Est that I would it did not exist; for it Ju dizes too much, and has a great deal of anachronisms for Eschatological difficulties.” His remark in his reply to Erasmus shows that this was his deliberate judgment. Referring to Est, he says that, though the Jews have it in their Canon, “it is more worthy than all” the apocryphal books “of being excluded from the Canon.” That repudiation was founded, however, on no historical or critical grounds. It rested solely upon an entire mistaken judgment as to the tone and the intention of the book. It is true that Xerxes, who had been carried farther by Ewald, who says: “We fall here as if from heaven to earth; and, looking among the new forms surrounding us, we seem to behold the Jews, or indeed the small men of the present day in general, acting just as they do.” Nothing of all this, however, touches the historicity of Est.

The modern attack has quite another objective. Semler, who is its real fons et origo, believed Est to be a work of pure imagination, and as establishing little more than the pride and arrogance of the Jews. DeWette says: “It violates all historical probability, and contains striking difficulties and many errors with regard to Pers manners, as well as just references to them.” Dr. Driver mentions the judgment. “The writer,” he says, “shows himself well informed on Pers manners and institutions; he does not commit anachronisms such as occur in Tob or Jdb; and the character of Xerxes as drawn by him is in agreement with history.” The controversy shows, however, no sign of approaching settlement. Th. Nödeke (EB) is more violent than De Wette. “The story,” he writes, “is in fact a tissue of improbabilities and impossibilities.” We shall long be believing that the books were urged by him and others and then at the recent confirmations of the historicity of Est.

(1) “There is something fantastic, but not alto gether unskilful,” says Nödeke, “in the touch whereby Mordecai and Haman are made to inherit an ancient feud, the former being a member of the family of King Saul, the latter a descendant of Agag, king of Amalek.” It is surely unworthy of a scholar to make of the book responsible for a Jewish

7. Some Objections (I).

The preceding no mention in it of either King Saul or Agag, king of Amalek, and not the most distant allusion to any inherited feud. “Kish, a Benjamite” is certainly mentioned (2:5) as the great-grandfather of Mordecai; but if this was also the father of Saul, then the first of the Israelitish kings was a sharer in the experiences of the Bab captivity, a conception which is certainly fantastic enough. One might ask also how an Amalekite came to be described as an Agagite, and how a Jewish king who was cut in pieces, became the founder of a tribe.

But any semblance of a foundation which that rabbinic conceit ever had was swept away years ago by Oppert’s discovery of “Agag” in one of Sargon’s inscriptions as the name of a district in the Pers empire. “Haman the son of Hammedatha the Agagite” means simply that Haman or his father had come from the district of Agag. (2) The statement that 2:5.6 represents Mordecai as having been carried captive with Jews, and that as being therefore of an impossible age, is unworthy of notice. The relative “who” (2:6) refers to Kish, his great-grandfather. (3) “Between the 7th and the 12th years of his reign, Xerxes’ queen was Amestris, and cruel Haman (Hirosh vii.114; ix.112), who cannot be identified with Esther, and who leaves no place for Esther beside her” (Driver). Scaliger long ago identified Esther with Amestris, an identification which Pridoux rejected on account of the cruelty which Herodotus has attributed to that queen. Dr. Driver has failed to take full account of one thing—the striking fact that critics have leveled this charge of cruelty against the Persian queen, and how it is quite possible that Esther, moving in a world of merciless intrigue, may have had to take measures which would form a foundation for the tales recorded by the Gr historian. (4) The aim of the book is said to be the glorification of the Jews. But, on the contrary, a record of their being saved from a skillfully planned extermination. (5) The description of the Jews (3:8) as “dispersed among the peoples in all the provinces” of the kingdom is said to be inapplicable to the Pers period. That argument is based on an ignorance of the ancient world in which investigation is daily correcting. We now know that before the time of Est Jews were settled both in Eastern and in Southern Egypt, that is, in the extreme west of the Pers empire. In the troubles at the end of the 7th and of the 6th cent. BC, multitudes must have been dispersed, and when, at the latter period, the ties of the fatherland were dissolved, Jewish migrations must have vastly increased. (6) The Heb of the book is said to belong to a much later period than that of Xerxes. But it is admitted that it is earlier than the Heb of Ch; and recent discoveries have shown decisively that the book belongs to the Pers period. (7) The suggestion is made (Driver) “that the danger which threatened the Jews was a local one,” and consequently, that the book, though possessed of a historical basis, is a romance. But against that are the facts that the observance of the feast has from the first been universal, and that it has not been observed in the form or manner other than in one place than in the others. (8) There is no reference to it, it is urged, by Ch, Ezr or Ben Sira (Ecclesi). But Ch ends with the proclamation of Cyrus, granting permission to the Jews to return and to rebuild the Temple. There is little to be wondered at that it contains no reference to events which happened 60 years afterward. In Ezr, which certainly covers the period of Esther, reference to the events with which she was connected is excluded by the plan of the work. It gives the history of the return, the first part under Zerubbabel in 536 BC, then by no mention of the events in Ezr in (5.6). But the events in Est (which were embraced within a period of a few months) fell in the interval and were connected with neither the first return nor the second. Here again the objector is singularly oblivious of the aim of the book to which he refers. There is quite as little force in the citation of Ecclus. In dealing with this time Ben Sira’s eye is upon Jesus. He magnifies Zerubbabel, “Jesus the son of Josedek,” and Nehemiah (48:11–13). Even Ezra, to whom Jesus and the Jewish state owed so much, finds no mention. Why, then, should Esther and Mordecai be named who seem to have had no part whatever in rebuilding the sacred city? (9) The book is said to display ignorance of the Pers empire in the statement that it was divided into 127 provinces, whereas Herodotus tells us that it was partitioned into 20 satrapies. But there was no such finality in the number, even of these great divisions of the empire. Darius in his plan of the Persian empire (Dehistan inscribed with the name of Darius and his kingdom as 23, in a third enumeration as 29. Herodotus himself, quoting from a document of the time of Xerxes, shows that there were then about 60 nations under the dominion of Persia. The objector has also failed to notice that the wridndah (“province”) mentioned in Est (1:1) is not a satrapy but a subdivision of it. Judaea is called a wridndah in Ezra 2:1, and that was only a small portion of the 5th satrapy, that, namely, of Syria. But the time is past for objections of this character. Recent discoveries have proved the marvelous accuracy of the book. “We find in the Book of Esther,” says Lenormant (Ancient Hist of the East, I:113), “a most animating picture of the court of the Pers kings, which enables us, better than anything contained in the historical writers, to penetrate the internal life and the details of the organization of the central government established by Darius.”

These discoveries have removed the discussion to quite another ground. There is no lack of internal evidence of its authenticity. Since Grotfein in 1802 read the

8. Conf. name of Xerxes in a Pers inscription of and found it to be, letter for letter, the Book the Ahasuerus of Est, research has been continued in the aim of the character of the book. It has proved, to begin with, that the late date suggested for the book cannot be maintained. The language belongs to the time of the Pers dominion. It is marked by the presence of old Pers words, the knowledge of which had passed away by the 2d cent. BC, and has been recovered only through the decipherment of the Persian monuments. The Sept translators were unacquainted with them, and consequently made blunders which have been repeated in our own AV and in other tr. We read (Est 1:56 AV) that “in the court of the garden of the king’s palace,” “were white, green, and blue hangings, fastened with cords of fine linen and purple, etc. As seen in the ruins of Persepolis, a marked feature in the Pers palace of the period was a large space occupied by pillars which were covered with awnings. It may be noted in passing that these were situated, as the book says, in the court of the palace garden. But our knowledge is limited in this matter. We now read: “where was an awning of fine white cotton and violet, fastened with cords of fine white linen and purple.” White and blue (or violet) were the royal Pers colors. In accord with this we are told that Mordecai (10) “went forth from the presence of the king in royal apparel of blue and white." The highly organized postal system, the king's scribes, the keeping of the chronicles of the kingdom, the rigid and elaborate court customs, are all characteristic of the Persia of the period. We are told of the ease obtained by Haman that "in the presence of King Ahasuerus, and it was sealed with the king's ring" (or signet). It was not signed but sealed. That was the Persa custom. The seal of Darius, Xerxes' father, has been found, and is now in the British Museum. It bears the figure of the king shooting arrows at a lion, and is accompanied by an inscription in Pers, Susan and Assy: "I, Darius, Great King." The identification of Ahasuerus, made by Grotefend and which subsequent discoveries amply confirmed, placed the book in an entirely new light. As soon as that identification was assured, previous objections were changed into confirmations. In the alleged extravagances of the monarch, scholars saw then the Xerxes of history. The gathering of the nobles of the empire in "the third year of his reign" (1:3) was plainly the historical assembly in which the Grecian campaign was discussed; and "the seventh year," in which Esther was made queen, was that of his return from Greece. The book implies that Susa was the first residence of the kings, and that was so. The proper form of the name as shown by the inscriptions was "Shushan"; "Shushan the Palace" indicates that there were two Susas, which was the fact, and birth ('palace') is a Pers word meaning fortress. The surprisingly rigid etiquette of the palace, to which we have referred, and the danger of entering unbidden the presence of the king have been urged as proof that the book is a romance. The contrary, however, is the truth. The palace was one of the Persian cities-Leomnorum, "was quite inaccessible to the multitude. A most rigid etiquette guarded all access to the king, and made it very difficult to approach him. He who entered the presence of the king, without having previously obtained permission, was punished with death" (Ancient Hist of the East, II, 113-14; cf. Herodotus i. 99). But a further, and peculiarly conclusive, testimony to the historical character of the book is afforded by the recovery of a building by the name of the palace, in which the latter part of the book was written. An inscription of Artaxerxes Mnenon found at Susa tells us that it was destroyed by fire in the days of Artaxerxes Longim anus, the son and successor of Xerxes. Within some 30 years, therefore, from the time of Esther, the palace was destroyed. Nevertheless, the references in the book are in perfect accord with the plan of the great structure as laid bare by the recent Fr. excavations. We read (ch 4) that Mordecai, clad in sackcloth, walked in "the broad palace of the city, which was before the king's gate." The ruins show that the House of the Women was on the E. side of the palace next to the city, and that a gate led from it into "the street of the city." In 6:1, we read that Esther 'stood in the inner court of the king's house, over against the king's house." "The king," we also read, "sat upon his royal throne in the royal house, over against the entrance of the house," and that from the throne he "saw Esther the queen standing in the court." Every detail is exact. A corridor led from the House of the Women to the inner court; and at the side of the court opposite to the corridor was the hall, or throne-room of the palace. Exactly in the center of the farther wall the throne was placed, and from that lofty spot, with his eye fixed on an intervening space, he saw the queen waiting for an audience. Other details, such as that of the king's passing from the queen's banquetting-house into the garden, show a similarly exact acquaintance with the palace as it then was. That is a confirmation of the force of which it is hard to overestimate. It shows that the writer was well informed and that his work is characterized by minute exactitude.

The utter absence of the Divine name in Est has formed a difficulty even where it has not been urged as an objection. But that is plainly part of some post-Christian, highly rigid ecclesiastical error, maintained throughout in regard to prayer, praise and every approach toward God. That silence was an offence to the early Jews; for, in the Sept additions to the book, there is a profuse acknowledgment of God both in prayer and in praise. But it must have struck the Jews of the time and the official custodians of the canonical books quite as painfully; and we can only explain the admission of Est by the latter on the ground that there was overwhelming evidence of its Divine origin and authority. Can this rigid suppression be explained? In the original arrangement of the OT canonical books (the present Heb arrangement is post-Christian), Est is joined to Neh. In 1835 I made a suggestion which I still think worthy of consideration: More than 60 years had passed since Cyrus had given the Jews permission to return. The vast majority of the people remained, nevertheless, where they were. Some, like Nehemiah, were restrained by official and other reasons from returning. But they realized that the people were required to give the necessary sacrifices of property and of rest. With such as these last the history of God's work in the earth can never be associated. In His providence He will watch over and deliver them: but their names and His will not be bound together in the record of the labor and the waiting for the earth's salvation.

LITERATURE

Introductory.—The Book of Est in the oldest MSS of the LXX (B.A.N, etc) contains 107 verses more than in the Heb Bible. These additions are scattered throughout the book where they were originally inserted in order to supply religious elements apparently missing in the Heb text. In Jerome's version and in the Vulg, which is based on it, the longest and most important of these additions are taken out of their context and put together at the end of the canonical book, but making them to a large extent knowledge of the Persians.

In Eng., Welsh and other Protestant VSS of the Scriptures the whole of the additions appear in the Apoc.

In the Ev the full title is "The Rest of the Chapters of the Book of Esther, which are found neither in the Hebrew, nor in the Chaldee."
the king and wins his favor. Follows C, preceding immediately Est 5.

xerxes, called Est 6 12.

But besides the lengthy interpolations noticed above there are also in the LXX small additions omitted from the Lzt and therefore from the Eng, Welsh, etc., Apoc. These short additions are nearly all explanatory glosses.

In the Century Bible (Ezr, Neh, Est) the exact places where the insertions occur in the LXX are indicated and not mingled with the relevant passages of the canonical text. With the help thus given any Eng. reader is able to read the additions in their original setting. Unless they are read in this way they are pointless and even in most cases senseless.

All scholars agree that "The Rest of Esther" was written originally in Gr. Both external and internal evidence bears this out. But the Gr text has come down to us with two recensions which differ considerably.

Practically all modern scholars agree in holding that "The Rest of Esther" is some decades later than the canonical book. In his comm.

5. Date on Est (Century Bible) the present writer has given reasons for dating the canonical Est about 130 BC. One could not go far astray in fixing the date of the original Gr of the Ad Est at about 100 BC. It is evident that we owe these interpolations to a Jewish zealot who wished to give the Book of Est a religious character. In his later years John Hyrcanus (135–105 BC) identified himself with the Sadducean or rationalistic party, thus breaking with the Pharisee or orthodox party to which the Macceabaeans had hitherto belonged. Pertinent to these additions to the zeal aroused among orthodox Jews by the rationalizing temper prevailing in court circles. R. H. Charles (Enc Brt, XI, 1976) favors a date during the early (7) Maccabean period; but this would give the Ad Est an earlier date than can be ascribed to the canonical Est.

mi ś'ān (they, ērakh, :hidden, ērēkh): These words, meaning "to set in order," "valuation," are used in connection with the priestly services in Lev 5 15. 18; 6 6; 27 14, and frequently; Nu 18 16.

ESYELUS, ēs-ē-yē-lus (Ησυλος, Εσιλος, Εσιλος, Εσιλως; AV Syelus): One of the governors of the Temple in the time of Josiah (1 Esd 1 8); called "Jehiel" in Ch 23 35.

ETAM, ē'tām (etAddress, 8; A, ērān, Apān, B, ērān, ētān): (1) Mentioned in LXX along with Tekoa, Bethlehem and Phagar (Josh 15 59). In Ch 2 11 6 it occurs, between Bethlehem and Tekoa, as one of the cities built "for defence in Judah" by Rehoboam. Jos writes that "there was a certain place, about 30 furlongs distant from Jerus where (the king) is very pleasant it is in fine gardens and abounding in rivulets of water; whither he [Solomon] used to go out in the morning" (1 Kings, viii, 7). Mention of "Ain 'Etam, which is described as the most elevated place in Pal described in the Talm (Bahr "Chinm", 44), and in the Jer. Talm (Yoma 3 fol 41) it is mentioned that a conduit ran from 'Etam to the Temple.

The evidence all points to 'Ain 'Etam, the lowest of the springs supplying the aqueduct running to Solomon's pool. The garden of Semeencia very likely has been in the fertile valley below 'Ursal. The site of the ancient town Etam is rather to be looked for on an isolated hill, with ancient remains, a little to the E. of 'Ain 'Etam. 1 Ch 4 3 may also have reference to this Etam.

(2) A town assigned to Simeon (1 Ch 4 32). Mentioned with Enc-rimmon (q.v.), identified by Conder with Khurbet 'Aiyin in the hills N.W. of Beersheba.

(3) The rock of Etam, where Samson took up his dwelling after smiting the Philis "hip and thigh with a great slaughter" (Jgs 15 8, 11); in Judah but apparently in the low hill country (ib). The rocky hill on which lies the village of Beit 'Etam, near modern Su'reh (Zorah), was in the days of Samson, "where he had his cave", but unless (3) is really identical with (1), it is quite possible, the cavern known as 'Arak Isma'īn, described by Hanauer (PEFS, 1886, 25), suits the requirements of the story better. The cavern, high up on the northern cliffs of the Wadi Isma'īn, is a noticeable object from the railway as the train enters the gorge.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

ETERNAL, ē-tē-r'ā-nal (Ἠτέρνος, 'olām; ētān, ētānos, from Ḥd, ētā̂n); The word "eternal" is of very varying import, both in the Scriptures and out of them. In the OT, the Heb word 'olām is used for "eternity," sometimes in the sense of unlimited duration, sometimes in the sense of a cycle or an age, and sometimes, in later Heb, in the signification of world. The Heb 'olām has, for its proper NT equivalent, ētān, as signifying either time of particular duration, or the unending duration of time in general. Only, the Heb term primarily signified unlimited time, and only in a secondary sense represented a definite or specific period. Both the Heb and the Gr terms signify the word itself, as it moves in time.

In the NT, ētān and ētānos are often used with the meaning "eternal," in the predominant sense of futurity. The word ētān primarily signifies time, in the sense of age or ētānos generation; it also comes to denote all that exists under time-conditions; and, finally, superimposed upon the temporal is an ethical use, relative to the world's course. Thus ētān may be said to mean the humble spirit of the world or cosmos—the total of things. By Plato, in his Timaeus, ētān was used of the eternal Being, whose counterpart, in the sense-world, is Time. To Aristotle, in speaking of the world, ētān is the ultimate principle which, in itself, sums up all existence. In the NT, ētān is found combined with prepositions in nearly three score and ten instances, where the idea of unlimited duration appears to be meant. This is the usual method of expressing eternity in the LXX.

The ētānos of 2 Cor 4 18 must be eternal, in a temporal use or reference, else the antithesis would be gone.

In Rom 1 20 the word ētānos is used of Divine action and rendered in AV "eternal" (RV 'everlastings), the only other place in the NT where the word occurs being Jude 8); but the rendering is "eternal," which accords with classical usage. But the presence of the idea of eternal in these passages does not impair the fact that aiōnios and aiōnios are, in their natural and obvious connotation, the usual NT words for expressing the idea of eternal, and this holds strikingly true of the LXX usage also. For, from the idea of aeonian life, there is no reason to suppose the notion of duration excluded. The word aiōnios is sometimes used in the futurist signification, but often, also, in the NT, it is considered rather with the quantity, than with the duration or duration, of life. By the continual attachment of aiōnios to life, in this conception of the spiritual or Divine life in man, the aeonian conception was saved from becoming sterile.

In the use of aiōn and aiōnios there is evidenced a certain enlarging or advancing import till they come so to express the high and complex fact of the Divine life in man.

5. Defect of no more described by the notion of This View—a present than by a past or a future.

Such a Now or present presupposes a not-now, and raises anew the old time-troubles, in relation to eternity. Time, in Spinoza’s view, has the form of God’s life, His eternity meaning freedom from time. Hence it was extremely troublesome to the theology of the Middle Ages to have a God who was not in time at all, supposed to create the world at a point in the mode of eternity.

Spinoza, in later times, made the eternity of God consist in His infinite—which, to Spinoza, meant His necessary—existence. For contingent or durational existence would not, in Spinoza’s view, be eternal, though it lasted always. The illusion of time, or timelessness of time, in respect of man’s spiritual life, is not always very firmly grasped. This wavering or uncertain hold of the illusiveness of time, or of higher reality as timeless, is still very prevalent; so blade as Browning projects the shadow of time into eternity, with rarely a definite conception of the higher life as an eternal and timeless essence; and although Kant, Hegel and Schopenhauer may have held to such a timeless view, it has by no means become a generally adopted doctrine so far, either of theologians or of philosophers. If time be so taken as unreal, then eternity must not be thought of as future, as is done by Dr. Ellis McGregor Talbot and some other metaphysicians; and some nothing could, in that case, be properly future, and eternity could not be said to begin, as is often done in everyday life.

The importance of the eternity conception is seen in the fact that neo-Kantian and neo-Hegelian thinkers alike have shown a general tendency to regard time-conceptions as unif, in metaphysics, for the ultimate explanation of the universe.

Eternity, one may surely hold, must be an eternal concept, of which the whole of what happens is inadequate in time, with all of past, present or future, that lies within the temporal succession. But we are by no means entitled to say, as does Royce, that such wholeless or totality of the eternal constitutes the eternal, for the eternal belongs to quite another order, that, namely, of timeless reality. Eternity is not to be defined in terms of time at all. For God is to us the supra-temporal ens perfectissimum, but One whose timeless self-sufficiency and impassable aloofness are not such as to keep Him from being strength and helper of our temporal striving. Our metaphysical convictions must not here be of barren and unfruitful sort for ethical results and purposes.

Eternity is, in our view, the form of an eternal existence, to which, in the unity of a single insight, the infinite series of varying aspects or processes are, together-wise, as a cotton tunic, present. But this, Present we have already shown, does not imply in One Act that the eternal order is nowise different from the Divine Consciousness; essentially, from the temporal; time is not to be treated as a segment of eternity, nor eternity regarded as continuous with it. The atoms, which cannot pass over into the temporal; for, an eternal Being, who should think all things as present, and yet view the time-series as a succession, must be a rather self-contradictory conception. For the Absolute Consciousness, time does not exist; the future cannot, for it, be thought of as beginning to be, nor the past as having ceased to be.

After all that has been said, however, eternity and time are not to be thought of as without connection. For the temporal presupposes the eternal, which is, in fact, its Connection positive ground and its perpetual possibility. These things are so, if only for the reason that the Divine mode of existence does not contradict or exclude the human mode of existence. The connection of the latter—the of the temporal—has its guaranty in the eternal. The unconditioned eternally intelligence is, in ony with itself the limitations and conditions of the temporal. For time is purely relative, which eternity is not. No distinctions of before and after are admissible in the eternity conception, hence we have no right to speak of time as portion of eternity. Thus, while we maintain the essential difference between eternity and time, we at the same time affirm what may perhaps be called the affinity between them. The metaphysics of eternity and its time-relations continue to be matter of proverbial difficulty, and both orders—the eternal and the temporal—had better be treated as concrete, and not left merely to abstract reflection. Our idea of the eternal will best be developed, in this concrete fashion, by the growth of our God-idea, as we more completely apprehend God, as actualized for us in His incarnate Son.

Thus, then, it is eternity, not as immeasurable time, but rather as a mode of being of the immaterial, who is by its progressive realising Himself in time, which we have here set forth. This is not to say that the religious consciousness has not its own need of the conception of God as being “from everlasting to everlasting,” as in Ps 90:2, and of His kingdom as “an everlasting kingdom” (Dan 9:24). Nor is it to make us suppose that the absolute and self-existent God, who so transcends all time-dependence, is thereby removed far from us, while, on the contrary, His very greatness makes Him the more able to draw near unto us, in all the plenitude of His being. Hence it is truly spoken in Isa 57 15, “Thus saith the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy: I dwell in the high and holy place, with him also that is of a contrite and humble spirit, to revive the spirit of the humble, and to revive the heart of the contrite.” Hence also the profound truthfulness of sayings like that in Acte 27 28, “He is not far from each one of us; for in him we live, and move, and have our being.” After all that has been said, our best knowledge of eternity, as it exists in God, is not developed in any metaphysical fashion, but after the positive and timeless mode of the spiritual life—the modes of trust and love.

ETHAN, e’tham (אֶתָן, ’ethān; ʼOḇōth, Obōhm, Ex 13 20; Bōhāv, Bōouthun, Nu 33 6 7; in 33 8 the LXX has a different reading, “in their wilderness,” showing another pointing for the word). The name appears nowhere in the carnal capacity, “border of the Sea” (Gesenius, Lex., s.v.) which would agree with the Heb (Nu 33 8) where the “wilderness of Ethan” is noticed instead of that of Shur (Ex 15 22). E. of the Red Sea (see Sura). At Ethan (Nu 13 20) the Hebrews camped in the “edge,” or “the end,” of the desert W. of the sea that they were to cross (see Exodus). This camp was probably near the N. end of the Bitter Lakes, a marsh from Suezco. Brugsch (Hist. Egypt, II, 329) would compare Ethan with the Egyp Khetam (“fort”), but the Hebrew word has no guttural. The word Khetem is not the name of a place (see Pictet, Vocab., h̄edrigrph., 453), and more than one such “fort” seems to be noticed (see Pternom). In the reign of Seti II a score of men was sent to the pursuit of two servants, apparently from Zoon, to the fortress of I-ē-w southward, reaching Khetem on the 3d day; but if this was the “Khetem of Ramesses II,” or even that of “Mephekaḥ,” it would not apparently suit the position of the other Mizdol.

ETHAN, e’tham (אֶתָן, ’ethān), “firm,” “enduring;” Tod̄ā, Gethān: (1) A wise man with whom Solomon is compared (1 K 4 31). Called there “Ethan the Ezrahite,” to whom the title of Ps 89 ascribes the authorship of that poem.

(2) A “son of Kish,” or “Kishiah,” of the Merari branch of the Levites, and, along with He- man and Asaph, placed by David over the service of song (1 Ch 6 44; 16 17, 19). See Jeduthun.

(3) An ancestor of Asaph of the Gershonite branch of the Levites (1 Ch 6 42).

ETHANIM, e’thā-nim (אֶתָנִים, ’ethānim): The seventh month of the Jewish year (1 K 8 2). The word is of Phoen origin and signifies “perennial,” referring to long dreams. It corresponds to September-October. See Calendar: Time.

ETHANUS, e-thā’ius, AV Ecanus (Apoc): One of the scribes who wrote for forty days at the dictation of Ezra (2 Esd 14 24).

ETHBAAL, eth-bā’al, eth-bā- al (אֵתבָ’אל, ’eth-ba’al; “with Baal”): “King of the Sidonians,” and father of Jezebel, whom Ahab king of Israel took to wife (1 K 16 31).

ETHER, e’thêr (Gr. ἕθη, ‘other’; Heb. עחי, Athêr): A town in Judah (Josh 15 42), near Libnah, assigned to Simeon (19 7). Kh. el ’Atir (identical in spelling with Ether) is possibly the site. It is near BeIl John and is described as ‘an ancient site; cisterns, foundations, quarried rock and terraces’ (PEF, III, 261, 279).

Absolute Inwardness and Universality

In this article, which proposes to be of a general and introductory character, we shall first deal with the nature and function of ethics generally, showing its difference from and relation to other cognate branches of inquiry. Secondly, we shall sketch briefly the history of ethics in so far as the various stages of its development bear upon the way for Christian ethics, indicating also the subsequent course of ethical speculation. Thirdly, we shall give some account of Biblical ethics; treating first of the main moral ideas contained in the OT, and enumerating, secondly, the general principles and leading characteristics which underlie the ethical teaching of the NT.

I. Nature and Function of Ethics.

Ethics is that branch of philosophy which is concerned with human character and conduct. It deals with matters not so much as a subject of knowledge, as a source of action. It has to do with life or personality in its inward dispositions, outward manifestations and social relations. It was Aristotle who first gave to this study its name and systematic form. According to the Gr signification of the term, it is the science of customs (ἡθοδ, ἠθική, from ἠθος, "custom," "habit," "disposition"). But inasmuch as the words "custom" and "habit" seem to refer only to outward manner-of-lifes, usages, the mere etymology would limit the nature of the inquiry. The same limitation exists in the Lat designation, "moral," since moræ concerns primarily manners.

Men live before they reflect, and act before they examine the grounds of action. So long as there is a congruity between the habits of an individual or a people and the practical requirements of life, ethical questions do not occur. It is only when difficulties arise and new problems appear as to right and duty in which the existing customs of life offer no solution, that doubt awakes, and with doubt reflection upon the actual morality which governs life. It is when men begin to call in question their past usages and institutions and to readjust their attitude to old traditions and new interests that ethics appears. Ethics is not morality but reflection upon morality. When, therefore, Aristotle, following Socrates and Plato, employed the term, he had in view not merely a description of the outward life of man, but rather the sources of action and the objects as ends which ought to guide him in the proper conduct of life. According to the best usage the names Moral Philosophy and Ethics are equivalent and mean generally the rational explanation of our nature, actions and relations as moral and responsible beings. Ethics therefore may be defined as the systematic study of human character, and its function is to show how human life must be fashioned to realize its end or purpose.

But accepting this general definition, how, it may be asked, can we speak of a science of conduct at all? Has not science to do with necessary truths, to trace effects from as a causes, to formulate general laws according to which these causes act, and from these consequences? But is not character just that concerning which no definite conclusions can be predicted? Is not conduct, dependent as it is on the human will, just that which cannot be explained as the resultant of calculable forces? If the will is free then you cannot decide beforehand what line it will take, or predict what shape character must assume. The whole conception of a science of ethics, it is contended, must fail to the ground if we admit an invariable and calculable element in conduct. But this objection is based partly upon a misconception of the function of science and partly upon a too narrow classification of the sciences. Science has not only to do with cause and effect and the laws according to which phenomena actually occur. Science seeks to deal systematically with all truths that are presented to us; and there is a large class of truths not belonging indeed to the realm of natural and physical events which, however, may be studied and correlated. Ethics is not indeed concerned with the morally good or bad, as something done here and now following from certain causes in the past and succeeded by certain results in the future. It is concerned with judgments upon conduct—the judgment that such conduct is right or wrong as measured by a certain standard or end. Hence a distinction has been made between the physical sciences and what are called normative sciences.

The natural or physical sciences are concerned simply with phenomena of Nature or mind, actual and potential, and how they are to be synthesized and classified. The normative sciences, on the other hand, have to do with mere facts in time or space, but with judgments about these facts, with certain standards or ends (norms, from norma, "a rule") in accordance with which the facts are to be valued. Man cannot be explained by natural law. He is not simply a part of the world, a link in the chain of causality. When we reflect upon his life and his relation to the world we find that he is conscious of himself as an end and that he is capable of forming purposes, of proposing new ends and of directing his thoughts and actions with a view to the attainment of these ends, and many of his thoughts and actions are determined thereby. Such an end or purpose thus forms a norm for the regulation of life; and the laws which must be observed for the attainment of such an end form the subjects of a normal or normative science. Ethics therefore has to do with the determination of right or wrong, and is concerned primarily with the laws which regulate our judgments and guide our actions.

Man is of course a unity, but it is possible to view his self-consciousness in three different aspects, and to regard himself as constituted of an intellectual, sentient and to Cognate volitional element. Roughly corresponding sciences pertain to these three aspects, one in reality but separable in thought, there arise three distinct though interdependent mental sciences: metaphysics, which has to do with man's relation to the universe of which he forms a part; psychology, which deals with the nature, constitution and evolution of his faculties and feelings as a psychical thing; and ethics, which treats of him as a volitional being, possessing will or determining activity.

(1) Ethics and metaphysics.—Ethics, though distinct from, is closely connected with metaphysics on the one hand and psychology on the other. As we take metaphysics in its widest sense as including natural theology and as positing some ultimate end to the realization of which the whole process of the world is somehow a means, we may easily see how it is a necessary presupposition or basis of ethical inquiry. The world as made and governed by and for an intelligent purpose, and man as a part of it, having his place and function in a great teleological cosmos, are postulates of the moral life and must be accepted as a basis of all ethical study. The distinction between ethics and metaphysics did not arise at once. In early Greek philosophy they were closely united. Even now the two subjects cannot be completely dissociated. Ethics invariably runs back into metaphysics, or at least into theology, and in every philosophical system in which the universe is regarded as having an ultimate end or good, the good of human beings is conceived as identical with or included in the universal good (see Fries, Gesamtes der christlichen Ethik; also Sidgwick, History of Ethics).

(2) Ethics and psychology.—On the other hand ethics is closely associated with, though distinguishable from, psychology. Questions of conduct inevitably lead to inquiries as to certain states of the agent's mind, for we cannot pronounce an action morally good or bad, as something done here and now following from certain causes in the past and succeeded by certain results in the future. It is concerned with judgments upon conduct—the judgment that such conduct is right or wrong as measured by a certain standard or end. Hence a distinction has been made between the physical sciences and what are called normative sciences.

The very existence of a science of ethics depends upon the answers which psychology gives to such questions. If, for example, we decide that there is no such faculty in man as conscience and that the moral sense is but a natural manifestation which has gradually evolved with the physical and social evolution of man (Darwin, Spencer); or if we deny the self-determining power of human beings and assume that they are controlled in the last resort by a series of natural laws, then indeed we may continue to speak of a science of the moral life as some naturalistic writers do, but such science has nothing to do with the study of ethics as we understand it. Whatever be our explanation of conscience and freedom, no theory as to these powers must depersonalize man, and we may be justly suspicious of any system of psychology which understands the self or the agent as a mere force or as an element of a whole in which the self is or becomes dissolved. The action of the individual is not to be explained by his being a part of a system or an element of a whole, but it is to be explained by his being a subject of actions, and as a subject of actions he is a personal being. Hence the word "ought" is the most distinctive term of ethics. The "ought" of an action of a subject of actions is what the subject of actions is to do or what he is to be, and the "ought" of an action of man, and of the other rational agents, is to be regarded as the highest good of man, the τέλος ἀγαθόν, to agathon, of the Greeks, the summum bonum of Lat philosophy.

In ethics generally is based upon the postulates of philosophy and psychology, and at each stage of human consciousness grounds its principles of life upon the view of the world of Christian ethics. Ethics is a Christian ethics presupposes the Christian view of life as revealed by Christ, Philosophy and its definition must be in harmony with the Christian ideal. Christian ethics is the science of morals conditioned by Christianity, and the problems which it discusses are the nature, laws and duties of the moral life as dominated by the Supreme Good which Christians believe to have been revealed in and through the life and teaching of Jesus Christ. Christian ethics is not merely a branch of general ethics. So far from being opposed to or a mere elaboration of general ethics. So far from being opposed to or an elaboration of general ethics, it is the inevitable outcome of the evolution of thought. For if the revelation of God through Christ is true, then it is a factor, and the greatest in life and destiny, which must condition man's entire outlook and give a new value to his aims and duties.

(1) Not an opposition.—In Christianity we are confronted with the motive power of a great Personality entering into the current of human history, and by His grace, that place can be indicated only by starting from the ethical ideal embodied in Christ, and working out from that point a code of morality for the practical guidance of the Christian life. But while this truth gives to Christian ethics its distinctive character and preeminent worth, it neither throws discredit upon philosophical ethics nor separates the two sciences by any hard-and-fast lines. They have much in common. A large domain of conduct is covered by both. The so-called pagan virtues have their worth for Christian character and are in the line of Christian virtues. Man even in his natural state is constituted for the moral life and is not without some knowledge of right and wrong (Rom 1:20). The moral attainments of the ancient pagans may simply be a matter of degree, and may differ in content, but it is of the same kind under every system. Purity is purity, and benevolence benevolence, and both are excellences, whether manifested in a heathen or a Christian. While therefore Christian ethics takes its point of departure from the revelation of God and the manifestation of man's possibilities in Christ, it accepts and uses the results of moral philosophy in so far as they throw light upon the fundamental facts of human nature. As a system of morals Christianity claims to be exclusive.

It takes cognizance of all the data of consciousness, and assumes all ascertained truth as its own. It completes what is lacking in other systems in so far as their conclusions are based on an incomplete survey of facts. Christian morals, in short, deal with personality in its highest ranges of moral power and spiritual consciousness, and seek to interpret life by its greatest possibilities and loftiest attainments as they have been revealed in Christ.

(2) Philosophical postulates.—If, then, what has been said be true, two distinctive features of Christian morals may be noted, of which philosophical ethics takes little or no account:

(a) Christian ethics assumes a latent spirituality in man awaiting the Spirit of God to call it forth. "He is the image of the invisible God," says Newman Smyth, "has its existence in an ethical sphere and for moral ends of being." There is a natural capacity for ethical life to which man's whole constitution points. Matter itself may be said to exist ultimately for spirit, and the spirit of man for the Holy Spirit (cf. Roth, Theologische Ethik, 1, 459). No theory of man's physical beginning can interfere with the assumption that man stands upon a moral plane and is capable of a life which shapes itself to spiritual ends. Whatever be man's history, his physical condition, he has from the beginning been made in God's image, and he bears the Divine impress in all the lineaments of his body and soul. His degradation cannot wholly obliterate his nobility, and his actual corruption bears witness to his possible holiness.

Christian moralists is therefore nothing else than the morality prepared from all eternity, and is but the highest realization of that which heathen virtue was striving after. This is the Pauline view of human nature. Jesus Christ, according to the apostle, is the very form and essence of the whole creation. Everywhere there is a capacity for Christ. Man is not simply what he now is, but all that he is yet to be (1 Cor 15:47-49).

(b) Connected with this peculiarity is another which further differentiates Christian ethics from philosophical—the problem of the re-creation of character. Speculative systems do not advance beyond the formation of moral requirements; they prescribe what ought ideally to be done or avoided. Christianity, on the other hand, is concerned with the question, By what power can I achieve the right and the good? (cf Ottley, Christian Ideas and Ideals, 22). It regards human nature as in need of renewal and recovery. It points to a process by which nature can be restored and transformed. It claims to be the power of God unto salvation to everyone that believeth (Rom 1:16).

Christian ethics thus makes the twofold assumption, and in this its contrast to philosophical ethics is disclosed, that the ideal of humanity has been revealed in Jesus Christ and that in Him also there is supplied a power by which man may become his true self, all that his natural life gives promise of and potentioly is.

(3) Method.—Passing from a consideration of the data of Christian ethics to its method, we find that here again there is much that is common to philosophy and Christian morals. The method in both is the rational one. The Christian ideal, though given in only "two tablets of stone," is as far from being evolved and applied by the very same faculties as man employs in regard to speculative problems. All science must be furnished with facts, and its task is to give a consistent explanation of them. While the speculative thinker in the evolution of the human world at large, the Christian discourses his in Scripture, and more particularly in the teachings of Christ. But it is sufficient to point out that while the NT is largely occupied with ethical problems, it is not an attempt at a scientific formulation of them. The materials of systematic treatment are there, but the task of coordinating and classifying principles is the work of the expositor. The data are supplied but these data require to be interpreted, unified and applied so as to form a system of ethics. Consequently in dealing with his facts, the same method must be employed by the Christian expositor as by the student of science. That is the method of rational inquiry and the procedure transposed to mental activity upon all mental problems by the essential nature of the mind itself. The author to which Christian ethics appeals is not an external oracle which imposes its dictates in a mechanical way. It is an authority embodied in the Bible and appealing to the reasoning faculties of man. Christian ethics is not a cut-and-dried, ready-made code. It has to be thought out by man and brought to bear, through the instrumentality of his thinking powers, upon the relationships of life. According to the Protestant view, at least, ethics is no stereotyped compendium of rules which the Bible or the church supplies to save a man from the trouble of thinking. It is a complete misapprehension of the nature of Scripture and of the purpose of Christ's example and teaching to assume that they afford a mechanical standard which must be copied or obeyed in a slavish way. Christ appeals to the rational nature of man, and His words are life and spirit only as they are apprehended in an intelligent way and become by inner conviction and personal appropriation the principles of thought and action.

Within the domain of theology the two main constituents of Christian Ethics are authenticated by the Bible and by dogmatic teaching and ethics are descriptive of the human and moral. Though it is convenient to treat these separately, they really form a whole, and are but two sides of one subject. It is difficult to define their limits, and to say where dogmatics ends and ethics begins.
The distinction has sometimes been expressed by saying that dogmatism is a theoretic, while ethics is a practical science. It is true that ethics stands nearer to everyday life and deals with methods of practical conduct, while dogmatics is concerned with beliefs and the powers of the soul. But on the other hand ethics discusses thoughts as well as actions, and is interested in inner judgments not less than outward achievements. There is a practical side to all doctrine; and there is a theoretic side of all morals. In proportion as dogmatic theology becomes divorced from practical interest there is a danger that it may become mere pedantry. Even the most theoretic of sciences, metaphysics, while, as Novalis said, it bakes no bread, has its justification in its bearing upon life. On the other hand, ethics would lose all scientific value and would sink into a mere enumeration of duties if it had no dogmatic basis and did not draw its motives from beliefs. The common statement that dogmatics shows what we should believe and ethics what we should do is only approximately true and is inadequate. For moral laws and precepts are also objects of faith, and what we should believe involves a moral requirement and has a moral character. (c) Kindness may not be a mere expedient. Schleiermacher has been frequently charged with ignoring the differences between the two disciplines, but with scant justice; for while he regards the two studies as but different branches of Christian doctrine and while emphasizing the common character of both by no means neglects their differences (cf Schleiermacher, Christliche Lehre, 1–24). Recent Christian moralists (Dorner, Martensen, Wuttke, Haering, Lemme) tend to accentuate the distinction and claim for them a separate discussion. The ultimate connection cannot indeed be overlooked without loss to both. It leads only to confusion to talk of a creedless morality, and the attempt to deal with moral questions without reference to their dogmatic implication will not only rob Christian ethics of its distinctive character and justification, but will reduce the exposition to a mere system of emotionalism. Dogmatics and ethics may be regarded as interdependent and mutually serviceable. On the one hand, ethics aves dogmatics from an unsubstantial speculation, and, by affording the test of life and workableness, keeps it upon the solid foundation of fact. On the other hand, dogmatics supplies ethics with its formative principles and normal and preserving motives, and prevents the moral life from degenerating into the vagaries of fanaticism or the apathy of fatalism.

(2) The distinction.—While both sciences form the complementary sides of theology, and stand in the relation of mutual service, ethics presupposes dogmatics and is based upon its postulates. Dogmatics presents the essence, contents and object of the religious consciousness; ethics presents this consciousness as a rule determining the human will (Wuttke). In the one, the Christian life is regarded from the standpoint of dependence on God; in the other, from the standpoint of human freedom. Dogmatics deals with faith in relation to God, the conviction of the presence of Divine grace; ethics considers it rather in its relation to man as a human activity, and as the organ of conduct (cf Lemme, Christliche Ethik, 1, 15). Doctrine shows us how our adoption into the kingdom of God is the work of Divine love; ethics shows us how this knowledge of the Divine love for us determines our love to God and our neighbor and must be worked out through all the relationships of life (cf Haering).

(3) Theological postulates.—From this point of view we may see how dogmatics supplies to ethics certain postulates which may briefly be enumerated.

(a) Ethics assumes the Christian idea of God. God is not merely a force or even a creator as He is presented in philosophy. Divine power must be qualified by what we term the moral attributes of God. We do not deny His omnipotence, but we look beyond it to the love that tops all other attributes, viz., the Christ-event of power. As we recognize a gradation in God's moral qualities: (a) benevolence or kindness; (b) more deeply ethical and in seeming contrast to His benevolence, Divine justice—not merely blind benevolence but a kindness which is wise and discriminating (cf Butler); (c) highest in the scale of Divine attributes, uniting in one comprehensive quality kindness and justice, stands Divine love or grace. The God whom dogmatics postulates to ethics is God in Christ.

(b) Ethics again presupposes the Christian doctrine of sin. It is not the province of ethics to discuss the origin of evil or propound a theory of sin. But it must see to it that the view it takes is consistent with the truths of revelation and in harmony with the facts of life. A false and inherited conception of sin is as detrimental for ethics as it is for dogmatics, and upon our doctrine of evil depends very largely our view of life as to its difficulties and purposes, its trials and triumphs. Three views of sin have been held. According to the ancient Greeks sin is simply a defect or shortcoming, a missing of the mark (ἁμαρτία, ἁμαρτάνω, the active principle, or ἁμαρτία, ἁμάρτωμα, the result); according to others, it is a disease, a thing latent in the constitution (cf. Christian Orthodoxy). The third view is that a sin is inherent in the flesh and resulting from heredity and environment (see Evolution).

While there is truth in both these views, by themselves, each separately, or both in combination, is defective. They do not sufficiently take account of the personal self-determinative element in all sin. It is a misfortune, a fate from which the notion of guilt is absent. The Christian view implies these conceptions, but it adds its own distinctive note which gives to them their value. Sin is not merely a negative thing, it is something positive, an inward dominating force. It is not merely an imperfection, or want; it is an excess, a trespass. It is not simply inherent malady; it is a self-chosen perversion. It is not inherent in the flesh or animal impulses and physical passions; it belongs rather to the mind and will. Its essence lies in selfishness. It is the deliberate choice of the will in preference to God. It is the personal and wilful rebellion against the holiness of God, as the deliberate choice of self and the wilful perversion of all the powers of man into instruments of unrighteousness.

(c) A third postulate arises as a consequence from the Christian view of God and the Christian view of sin, viz., the responsibility of man. Christian ethics treats every man as accountable for his thoughts and actions, and therefore capable of choosing the good as revealed in Christ. While not denying the sovereignty of God or minimizing the mystery of evil, it recognizes the universality of sin, Christianly firmly maintains the doctrine of human freedom and accountability. An ethic would be impossible if, on the one side, grace were absolutely irresistible, and if, on the other, sin were necessitated, if at any single point wrongdoing were inevitable. Whatever be our doctrine on these subjects, ethics demands that freedom of the will be safeguarded.

At this point an interesting question emerges as to the possibility, apart from a knowledge of Christ, of choosing the good. Difficult, as this question is, it was and still is among the difficult questions of many of the early Fathers in the negative, the modern, and probably the more just, view is that we cannot hold mankind responsible unless we accord to all men the larger freedom. If non-Christians are fated to do evil, then no guilt can be imputed. History shows that a love for goodness has sometimes existed, and that many isolated acts of purity and kindness have been done, among people who have known nothing of the historical Christ. The NT recognizes degrees of depravity in nations and individuals and a measure of noble aspiration and earnest effort in ordinary human nature. St. Paul plainly assumes some knowledge and performance on the part of the heathen, and though he denounces their immorality in unspiritual terms he does not affirm that pagan society was so utterly corrupt that it had lost all knowledge of moral good.

II. Historical Sketch of Ethics.—A comprehensive treatment of our subject would naturally include a look back to times before the present. For ethics as a branch of philosophical inquiry partakes of the historical development of all thought, and the problems which it presents to our day can be rightly appreciated only in the light of certain categories and concepts—such as end, good, virtue, duty, pleasure, egoism and altruism—which have been evolved through the successive stages of the movement of ethical thoughts. All we can attempt here, however, is the baldest outline of the different epochs of ethical inquiry and indicating the preparatory stages which lead up to and find their solution in the ethics of Christianity.

1. Greek Philosophy.—All the great religions of the world—India, Persia and Egypt—have had their moral precepts or adages. Before the golden age of Gr philosophy there were no ethics in the strict sense. The moral consciousness of the Greeks takes its rise with the Sophists, and particularly with Socrates, who were the first to protest against the long-established customs and traditions of their land. The so-called "wise men" were in part moralists, but their sayings are but hints and suggestions. The first to press through to a philosophy proper occupied itself primarily with purely metaphysical or ontological questions as to the nature of being, the form and origin and primal elements of the world. It was only when Gr religion and poetry had lost their hold upon the cultured and the beliefs of the past had come to be doubted, that questions as to the meaning of life and conduct arose.

2. Socrates.—Already the Sophists had drawn attention to the vagueness and inconsistency of common opinion, and had begun to teach the art of conduct, but it was Socrates who, as it was said, first brought philosophy down from heaven to the sphere of the earth and directed men's minds from merely natural things to human life. He was indeed the first moral philosopher, inasmuch as, while the Sophists talked about justice and law and temperance, they could not tell, when pressed, what these things were. The first task of Socrates, therefore, was to expose human ignorance. All our confusion and disputes about good and evil, says Socrates, was from want of clear knowledge. He aimed, therefore, at producing knowledge, not merely for its own sake, but because he believed it to be the ground of all right conduct. Nobody does wrong willingly. Let a man know what is good, that is, what is truly beneficial, and he will do it. Hence the famous Socratic dictum, "Virtue is knowledge and vice is ignorance." With all his intellectualism Socrates was really a hedonist, believing that pleasure was the ultimate end of life. For it must be understood that Socrates had a conception of knowledge of virtue as distinct from interest. Everyone naturally seeks the good because the good is really identified with his happiness. The wise man is necessarily the happy man, and hence "to know one's self" is to know the secret of well-being.

3. Plato.—While Socrates was the first to direct attention to the nature of virtue, his one-sided and fragmentary conception of it received a more systematic treatment from Plato, who attempted to define the nature and end of man by his place in the cosmos. Plato thus brought ethics into intimate connection with metaphysics. He conceived an ideal world in which everything earthly and human had its prototype. The human soul is derived from the world-soul and, like it, is a mixture of two elements. On the one side, in virtue of reason, it participates in the world of ideas, or the life of God; and on the other, by virtue of its animal impulses, it partakes of the world of decay, the corporeal world. These two dissimilar parts are connected by an intermediate index, the logos, the Logos, or the thumós, embracing love, the love of honor and the affections of the heart—a term which may be translated by the will. The constitution of the inner man is manifested in his outward organization. The head is the seat of reason, the breast of the heart and the affections, and the lower part of the body of the organs of animal desire. If we ask, Who is the just man? Plato answers, The man in whom the three elements just mentioned harmonize. We thus arrive at what Plato calls "cardinal virtues" which have persisted through all ages and have given direction to all ethical discussion—wisdom, courage, temperance which, in combination, give us justice. It will thus be observed that virtue is no longer simply identified with knowledge; but another form of bad conduct besides ignorance is assumed, viz. the internal disorder and conflict of the soul, in which the lower impulses war with the higher. This, it will be seen, is a distinct advance on the one-sided position of Socrates. Plato, in his attempt to reconcile the two movements in the conflict of life, Plato does not succeed in overcoming the duality. The inner impulses are ever dragging man down, and man's true well-being lies in the attainment of a unity of the conflicting elements. Plato's are gleams of a higher solution in Plato, as a rule he falls back upon the idea that virtue is to be attained only by the suppression of the animal passions and the purifying of the lower life. Plato affords us also the primal elements of social ethics. Morality as conceived by him is not something belonging merely to the individual, but has its full realization in the state. Man is indeed but a type of the larger cosmos, and it is not as an individual but as a citizen that he is capable of realizing his true life.

4. Aristotle.—The ethics of Aristotle, while it completes, does not essentially differ from that of Plato. He is the first to treat of the subject formally as a science, which assumes in his hands a division of politics. For, as he says, man is really "a social animal"; and, even more decisively than Plato, he treats of man as a part of society. Aristotle begins his great work on ethics with the discussion of the chief of the cardinal virtues, and disputes about good and evil, says Socrates, was from want of clear knowledge. He aimed, therefore, at producing knowledge, not merely for its own sake, but because he believed it to be the ground of all right conduct. Nobody does wrong willingly. Let a man know what is good, that is, what is truly beneficial, and he will do it. Hence the famous Socratic dictum, "Virtue is knowledge and vice is ignorance." With all his intellectualism Socrates was really a hedonist, believing that pleasure was the ultimate end of life. For it must be understood that Socrates had a conception of knowledge of virtue as distinct from interest. Everyone naturally seeks the good because the good is really identified with his happiness. The wise man is necessarily the happy man, and hence "to know one's self" is to know the secret of well-being. Happiness does not consist, however, in sensual pleasure, or even in the pursuit of honor, but in a life of well-ordered contemplation, "an activity of the soul in accordance with reason" (Nic. Eth., I, ch v). But to reach the goal of right thinking and right doing, both favorable surrounding and proper instruction are required. Virtue is not virtue until it is a habit, and the only way to become virtuous is to practise virtue. It will therefore influence Aristotle's emphasis of Socrates and Plato upon knowledge by the insistence upon habit. Activity must be combined with reason. The past and the present, environment and knowledge, must both be acknowledged as elements in the making of life. The virtues are thus habits, but habits of deliberate choice.
Virtue is therefore an activity which at every point seeks to strike the mean between two opposite excesses. Plato's list of virtues had the merit of simplicity, but Aristotle's, though fuller, lacks system and is composed increasingly of right actions which are determined in reference to two extremes. One defect which strikes a modern is that among the virtues benevolence is not recognized except ob-scurely as a form of liberality; and in general the gentler self-sacrificing virtues so prominent in Christianity have no place. The virtues are chiefly aristocratic and are impossible for a slave. Again while Aristotle did well, in opposition to previous philosophers, to recognize the function of habit, it must be pointed out that habit of itself cannot make a man virtuous. Mere habit may be a hindrance and not a help to higher attainment. You cannot reduce morality to a succession of customary acts.
But since one of Aristotle's chief results of virtue is that he regards the passions as wholly irrational and immoral. He does not see that passion in this sense can have no mean. If you may have too much of a good thing, you cannot have even a little of a bad thing. In the defects and impulses are never purely irrational. Reason enters into all his appetites and gives to the body and all the physical powers an ethical value and a moral use.
We do not become virtuous by curbing the passions but by transforming them into the vehicle of good.
Aristotle, not less than Plato, is affected by the Gr duality which makes an antithesis between reason and impulse, and imparts to the former an external supremacy.

(5) Stoics and Epicureans.—The two conflicting elements of reason and impulse which neither Plato nor Aristotle succeeded in harmonizing ultimately gave rise to two opposite interpretations of the moral life. The Stoics selected the rational nature as the goal of life, as opposed to the Epicureans, but their these gave it to a supremacy so rigid as to threaten the extinction of the affections. The Epicureans, on the other hand, set up the doctrine that happiness is the chief good, so accentuated the emotional side of nature as to open the door for all manner of sensual enjoyment. Both agree in determining the happy-ness of the individual as the final goal of moral conduct. It is not necessary to dwell upon the particular tenets of Epicurus and his followers. For though both Epicureanism and Stoicism, as representing the chief tendencies of ethical inquiry, have exercised incredible influence upon speculation and practical moral of later ages, it is the doctrines of Stoicism which have more specially come into contact with Christianity.

(6) Stoicism.—Without dwelling upon the stoic conception of the world, according to which the universe was a whole, interpenetrated and controlled by an inherent spirit, and the consequent view of life as proceeding from God and being in all its parts equally Divine, we may note that the Stoics, like Plato and Aristotle, regarded the realization of man's natural purpose as the true well-being or highest good. This idea they formulated into a This was the Stoic who strives to live in agreement with his rational nature in all the circumstances of life. The law of Nature is to avoid what is hurtful and strive for what is appropriate; and pleasure arises as an accompaniment when a being obtains that which is fitting. Pleasure and pain are, however, to be regarded as merely the opposite sides of the same thing to be met by the wise man with indifference. He alone is free, the master of himself and the world, who acknowledges the absolute supremacy of reason and makes himself independent of earthly desires.
This life of freedom is open to all, for all men are equal, members of one great body. The slave may be as free as the consul and each can make the world his servant by living in harmony with it.

There is a certain sublimity in the ethics of Stoicism. It was a philosophy which appealed to noble minds and "it inspired nearly all the great characters of the early Roman empire and nerve[d] every attempt to maintain the dignity and freedom of the human soul" (Lecky, History of European Morals, 1, ch. ii). We cannot, however, be blind to its defects.
With all their talk of Divine immanence and providence, it was nothing but an impersonal destiny which the Stoics recognized as governing the universe. "Harmony with Nature" was simply a means of freedom; the Stoics' doctrine of the gratification of reason, even to the extent of suppressing all emotion. It has no real sense of sin.
Sin is un-reason, and salvation lies in the external control of the passions, in indifference and apathy with regard to them. The desire for freedom of the Stoics is that they emphasized inner moral integrity as the one condition of all right action and true happiness, and in an age of degeneracy insisted on the necessity of virtue. In its preference for the joys of the mind and its severity of the darkness of sense; in its emphasis upon duty and its advocacy of a common humanity, together with its belief in the direct relation of each human soul to God, Stoicism, as revealed in the writings of a Seneque, a Marcus Aurelius and an Epictetus, not only showed how high paganism at its best could reach, but proved in a measure a preparation for Christianity with whose practical tenets, in spite of its imperfections, it had much in common.

(7) Stoicism and St. Paul.—That there are remakable affinities between Stoicism and Pauline ethics has frequently been pointed out. The similarity both in language and sentiment can scarcely be accounted for by mere coincidence. There were elements in Stoicism, as well as in Epicureanism, not have dreamt of assimilating, and features with which he could have no sympathy. The pantheistic view of God and the material conception of the world, the self-conscious pride, the absence of all sense of sin and need of pardon, the temper of apathy and the unnatural suppression of feelings—these were features which could not but rouse in the apostle's mind strong antagonism. But on the other hand there were certain well-known characteristics of a philosophy which we may believe Paul found ready to his hand, ideas which he did not hesitate to incorporate in his teaching and employ in the service of the gospel.
Without enlarging upon this line of thought (of Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul), of these we may mention the immanence of God as the pervading cause of all life and activity; the idea of wisdom or knowledge as the ideal of man; the conception of freedom as the prerogative of the individual; and the notion of brotherhood as the goal of humanity.

It will be possible only to sketch in a few rapid strokes the subsequent development of ethical thought. After the varied life of the early centuries had passed, the Christian Church was to be found in the Gospels and Epistles, like Christianity, under the blight of Gnosticism (Alexandrian phi-philosophy; cf. Hatch, Hibbert Lectures) and latterly, of Scholasticism. Christian truth stiffened into a cumbrous catalogue of ecclesiastical observances. In the early Fathers (Barnabas, Clement, Origen, Gregory of Nyssa), and of the Church, were hardly distinguished. Cyprian discussed moral questions from the standpoint of church discipline.

The first real attempt at a Christian ethic was made by Ambrose, whose treatise on the Duties is an imitation of Cicero's work of the same title. Even Augustine, notwithstanding his profound insight into the nature of sin, treats of moral questions incidentally. Perhaps the only writers among the schoolmen, excepting Alcuin (Virtutes et Vices), who afford anything like elaborate moral treatises, are Abelard (Ethica, or Scito et Ipsum), Peter Lombard (Sentences), and, above all, Thomas Aquinas (Summa, II).

Emancipation from a legal dogmatism first came with the Reformation which was in essence a moral revival. The relation of God and man came to be re-stated under the inspiration of Biblical truth, and the value and rights of man as man, so long obscured, were disclosed. The conscience was liberated and Luther became the champion of individual liberty.

Descartes and Spinoza.—The philosophical writers who most fully express in the domain of pure thought the protestant spirit are Descartes and Spinoza, with whom speculation with regard to man's distinctive nature and obligations took a new departure. Without following the fortunes of philosophy on the continent of Europe, which took a pantheistic form in Germany and a materialistic tone in France (though Rousseau directed the thought of Europe to the constitution of man), we may remark that in England thought assumed a practical complexion, and on the basis of the inquiries of Locke, Berkeley and Hume into the nature and limits of the human understanding, the questions as to the source of moral obligation and the faculty of moral judgment came to the front.

British moralists may be classified mainly according to their views on this subject. Beginning with Hobbes, all moralists who most fully express the idea of the individual, or even the morally self-conscious, as the centre of the universe, are willing to go to the extreme lengths of the naturalist's dogmatism.

4. English man was naturally selfish and that all his actions were self-regarding, Hud- worth, More, Wallant, Shaftesbury, Hutton, Adam Smith and others discussed the problem of calculating the balance of individual and social virtues, agreeing generally that the right balance between the two is due to a moral sense which, like taste or perception of beauty, guides us in things moral. All these intuitional writers fall back upon a natural selfish instinct. Selfishness, disguise as it may be, or, as it came to be called, utility, is really the spring and standard of action. Butler in his contention for the supremacy and uniqueness of conscience took an independent but scarcely more logical attitude. Both he and all the later British moralists, Paley, Bentham, Mill, suffer from a narrow, artificial psychology which conceives of the various faculties as separate and independent elements lying in man.

Utilitarianism is a scheme of consequences which lonely the moral quality of conduct in the effects and feelings created in the subject. With

5. Utilitarianism—all their differences of detail the representatives of the theory are at one in regarding all and every happiness. Bentham and Mill made the attempt to deduce benevolence from the egoistic starting-point. "No reason can be given," says Mill (Utilitarianism, ch iv), "why the general happiness is desirable except that each person . . . . , desiring his own happiness . . . . and the general happiness therefore is a good to the aggregate of all persons." Late utilitarians, disdained with this non-sequitur and renouncing the dogma of personal pleasure, maintain that we ought to derive universal happiness by ethical reasoning. This is a method of all, the difficulty of which, we should be the first to recognize, is this, and why should I listen to her voice? The *intuition of theorists has more recently allied itself with the hypothesis of organic evolution. The natural feelings of self-love and benevolence have given the products of development. The natural virtues find expression in human social good, though existing in a rudimentary animal form, have been evolved through environment, heredity and social institutions to which man through his long history has been subject." But this theory only carries the problem farther back, for, as Green well says (Proleg. to Ethics), "that countless generations should have passed during which a transmitted organism was progressively modified by reaction on its surroundings till an eternal consciousness could realize itself . . . . might add to the wonder, but it could not alter the result.

The great rivial of the pleasure-philosophy is that which has been called "duty for duty's sake." This position was first taken by Kant whose principle of the "Categorical Imperative" utterly broke down the theory of "pleasure for pleasure's sake." For Kant, conscience is simple intuition of moral reason; and its laws by them are reduced to unity. Reason, though limited in its knowledge of objects to phenomena of the senses, in the region of practice transcends the phenomenal and attains the real. The autonomy of the will carries us beyond the phenomenal into the supersensible world. Here the "Categorical Imperative" or moral law utters its "thou shalt" and prescribes a principle of conduct irrespective of desire or ulterior end. In accordance with the nature of the Categorical Imperative, the formula of all morality is, "Act from a maxim at all times fit for law universal!" (Kritik der praktischen Vernunft and Grundlage zur Metaphysik der Sitten).

This principle is, however, defective. For while it determines the duties of a moral being, it does not give us the rule of duty, it tells us nothing of the objective side, the content of duty. We may learn from Kant the grandeur of duty in the abstract and the need of obedience to it, but we do not learn what duty is. Kant's law remains external, faceless, without relation to the matter of practical life.

To overcome this abstraction, give content to the law of reason and find its realization in the institutions and relationships of life and society.

8. German society, has been the aim of the later Idealists, idealistic philosophy which starts from Kant.

(1) Hegel.—Following Fichte, for whom morality is action according to the ideas of reason—self-consciousness finding itself in and through a world of deeds—Hegel starts with the Idea as the source of all reality, and develops the conception of Conscious Personality which, by overcoming the antithesis of impulse and thought, gradually attains to the full unity and realization of self in the consciousness of the world and of God. The law of Right or of all ethical idea is, "Be a person and respect others as persons" (Hegel, Philosophie des Rechts, sec. 31). These views have been worked out in recent years by Green and F. A. Pinkney and by the works of specula- tive ethics by Green, Bradley, Caird, MacTaggart, Harris, Royce, Dewey, Watson.

Man as a self is rooted in an infinite self or personality. Our individual self-consciousness is derived from and maintained by an infinite eternal and universal self-consciousness. Knowledge is, therefore, but the gradual discovery of mind in things, the progressive realization of the world as the self-manifestation of an infinite Personality with whom the content in thought man is one. Hence morality is the gradual unfolding of an eternal purpose whose whole is the perfection of man.

2. Watchwords: Pleasure and Duty.—We have thus seen that in the history of ethics two great rival watchwords have been sounded—pleasure and duty, or, to put it another way, egoism and altruism. Both have their justification, yet each taken separately is abstract and one-sided. The problem of ethics is how to harmonize without suppressing these two extremes, how to unite ethical duty and individual right in a higher unity. We have seen that philosophical ethics has sought a synthesis of these conflicting moments in the higher and more adequate conception of human personality—a personality whose ideals and activities are identified with the eternal and universal personality of God. Christianity also recognizes the truth contained in the several types of ethical philosophy which we have passed under review, but it adds something which is distinctively its own, and thereby gives a new meaning to happiness and to duty, to self and to others.

Christian synthesis: Christianity also emphasizes the realization of personality with all that it implies as true good in man; but we are also told to strive towards making “the perfect as God is perfect.” He shows us that we only find ourselves as we find ourselves in others; only by dying do we live; and only through profound self-surrender and sacrifice do we become ourselves and achieve the highest good.

III. Principles and Characteristics of Biblical Ethics.—The sketch of the history of ethics just offered, brief as it necessarily is, may serve to indicate the ideas which have shaped modern thought and have been the interpretation of the Christian view of life which claims to be the fulfilment of all human attempts to explain the highest good. We now enter upon the third division of our subject which embraces a discussion generally of Bib. ethics, dealing first with the ethics of the OT and next with the leading ideas of the NT.

The gospel of Christ stands in the closest relation with Heb. religion, and revelation in the NT fulfils and completes the promise given in the OT. We have seen that the thinkers of Greece and Rome have contributed much to Christendom, and have helped to interpret Bible teaching with regard to truth and duty; but there is no such inward relation between them as that which connects Christian ethics with OT morality. Christ himself, and still more the apostle Paul, assumed as a substratum of his teaching the revelation which had been granted to the Jews. The moral and religious doctrines which were comprehended under the designation of “the Law” formed for them, as Paul said (Gal 3 24-25), a ἡγάλησις, paidagōgos, or servant whose function it was to lead them to the school of Christ. In estimating the special character of OT ethics, we are not concerned with questions as to authenticity and dates of the various books, nor with the manifold problems raised by modern Bib. criticism. While not forgetting the very long period which these books cover, involving changes of belief and life and embracing successive stages of political society, it is possible to regard the OT simply as a body of writings which represent the successive ethical ideas of the Hebrews as a people.

1. Ethics of OT. We have seen that the thinkers of the OT of Greece and Rome have contributed much to Christendom, and have helped to interpret Bible teaching with regard to truth and duty; but there is no such inward relation between them as that which connects Christian ethics with OT morality. Christ himself, and still more the apostle Paul, assumed as a substratum of his teaching the revelation which had been granted to the Jews. The moral and religious doctrines which were comprehended under the designation of “the Law” formed for them, as Paul said (Gal 3 24-25), a ἡγάλησις, paidagōgos, or servant whose function it was to lead them to the school of Christ. In estimating the special character of OT ethics, we are not concerned with questions as to authenticity and dates of the various books, nor with the manifold problems raised by modern Bib. criticism. While not forgetting the very long period which these books cover, involving changes of belief and life and embracing successive stages of political society, it is possible to regard the OT simply as a body of writings which represent the successive ethical ideas of the Hebrews as a people.

(a) The Decalogue: First among the various stages of OT ethic must be mentioned the Mosaic legislation centering in the Decalogue (Ex 20; Dt 5). Whether the Ten Commandments issue from the time of Moses, or are a later summary of duty, they hold that all natural, religious, and moral teaching of the OT. All, including even the 4th, are purely moral enactments. But they are largely negative, only the 5th rising to positive duty. They are also chiefly external, regulative of outward conduct, forbidding acts but not taking note of intent and desire. The 6th and 7th commandments protect the rights of persons, while the 8th guards outward property. Though these laws may arise from the primitive ethic, they grew into a higher moral consciousness of mankind and as such are applicable to all times and all men, it is clear that they were at first conceived by the Israelites to be restricted in their scope and practice to their own tribes.

(b) Civil laws: A further factor in the ethical education of Israel arose from the civil laws of the land. The Book of the Covenant (Ex 20—23), as revealing a certain advance in political legislation and jurisprudence, also introduces a new element of responsibility and of duty to God, which had not been present in the earlier stages. The Israelites were under the law of retaliation—"an eye for an eye and a tooth for a tooth"—discloses a barbaric conception of right. But along with the more primitive enactments of revenge and stern justice there are not wanting provisions of a more noble nature, such as the law of release, the protection of the fugitive, the arrangements for the gleaner and the institution of the Year of Jubilee.

(c) Ceremonial laws: Closely connected with the civil laws may be considered the ceremonial laws, the behavioral, religious, and social codes which as an element in the moral life of Israel. If the civil laws had reference to the relation of man to his fellows, the ceremonial laws referred rather to the relation of man to God. The prevailing idea was to give the individual a sense of power, might, and holiness. The so-called Priestly Code, consisting of a number of ceremonial enactments, gradually took its place alongside of the Mosaic law, and was established to guard the being of God and the persons of the worshippers from profanation. These had to do (a) with sacrifices and offerings and forms of ritual which, while they typified and prefigured the ideas of spiritual sacrifice, often degenerated into superstitious practices (cf Am 5 22-26; Hos 6 6; Isa 1 11-13); (b) with commandments and prohibitions with regard to personal deportment—"meats and drinks and divers washings." Some of these had a sanitary significance; others guarded the habits of daily life from heathen defilement.

(d) Prophecy: The dominant factor of OT ethics lay in the influence of the prophets. They and not the priests were the great moralists of Israel. They are the champions of righteousness and integrity in political life, not less that of private life in the individual. They are the witnesses for God and the ruthless denouncers of all idolatry and defection from Him. They comment upon the social vices to which a more developed people is liable. They preach a social gospel and condemn wrongs done by man to man. Government and people are summoned to instant amendment and before the nation is held up a lofty ideal. The prophets are not only the preachers, but also the philosophers of the people, and they direct men's minds to the spiritual and ideal side of things, inveighing against worldliness and materialism. Under their reflection, theories as to the origin and nature of evil begin to emerge, and the solemnity and worth of life are emphasized. While on the one hand they still uphold that God works through evil, and by its effects evolves man's highest good. These conceptions reach their climax in the Second Isa, and particularly in ch 53. God is constantly represented as longing to pardon and reinstate man in the intimacy of mere ceremoni- nal as well as the failure of all material means of intercourse with Jeh are repeatedly dwelt upon as preparing the way for the doctrine of salvation. In the Book of Pss—the devotional manual of the people representing that moral life through which the nation at various stages of its development—the same exalted character of God as a God of righteousness and holiness, hating evil and jealous for devo- tion, the same profound scorn of sin and the same high sense of the need of man are present.

(c) Books of Wisdom: Without dwelling at length on the ethical ideas of the other writings of the OT—the Books of Wisd, Prov, Job, Ecclest—may remark that the teaching is addressed more to individuals than prophecy is; while not being particularly lofty it is healthy and practical, shrewd, homely common sense. While the motives appealed to are not always the highest and have regard frequently to earthly prosperity and worldly policy, it must not be overlooked that moral life through the laws of God. The fool is the self-willed man, whose life, lacking principle, fails of success. The nature of wisdom lies not in intellectual kno- ledge so much as in the control of passion and the prudent regulation of desire. The idea of human wisdom is connected in these books with the sublime conception of Divine wisdom which colors both them and the Pss. In some of the finest passages, Wisdom is personified as the counselor of God in the creation of the world (Prov 8; Wisd 10; Job 28), or the guide which guards the destinies of man (Wisd 10 15 ff).

If the sapiential books are utilitarian in tone the Book of Ecclest is pessimistic. The writer is impressed with the futility of life. Neither pursuit of knowl- edge nor indulgence in pleasure affords satisfaction. All is vanity. Yet there is an element of submission in this book which only escapes despair by a grief- and stolid inculcation of obedience to Divine com- mand.

(j) Apocryphal books: In an art. on the Ethics of the Bible some allusion ought to be made to the spirit of the apocryphal books, reflecting as they do the ideas of a considerable period of Jewish history immediately before and contemporary with the advent of Christ. While in general there is a dis- distinct recognition of true moral life and a high regard for the moral law, there is no system of ethics nor even a prevailing ethical principle in these books. The collection presents the ideas of no one man or party, or even of one period or locality. The moral ideas of each book require to be considered separately (see special ars.), and they ought to be studied in connection with the philosophy of Philo and generally with the development of Alexandrian thought, the more so as many of the books were derived from it. The Wisdom of Solomon is supposed by Pfleiderer and others to have affected the Hellenic complexion of Paul's thought and also to have colored the stoic philosophy. The apocryphal books as a whole do not give prominence to the idea of an ancient covenant and are not dominated by the notion of a redemptive climax to which the other OT books bear witness. As a consequence their moral teaching lacks the spirituality of the OT; and there is an insistence upon outward works rather than inward disposition as essential to righteousness. While wisdom and justice are commended, there is a certain self-sat- isfaction in the favor of God, and a pride in the part of the few select spirits which attain to virtue, a corresponding disparagement of and even contempt for the folly of the many. In Sir esp. this tone of self-righteous complacency is observable. There is a manifest lack of humility and sense of sin, while the attainment of happiness is represented as the direct result of personal virtue (Sir 14 14 ff.)

The Book of Wisd shows traces of neo-Platonic influences and recognizes the four Platonic virtues (18 7), and that men admitting the women (9 12 ff) attributes the causes of evil to other sources than the will, maintaining the Gr dualism of body and soul and the inherent evil of the physical nature of man. The Book of Jh presents in narrative form a highly questionable morality. On the whole it must be recognized that the moral teaching of the Apoc is much below the best teaching of the OT. While Sir gives expression to a true piety, it manifests its want of depth in its treatment of sin and moral practice is also frequently called with the fear of God, and the right choice of wisdom is represented as the dictate of piety not less than of prudence.

It is to the sapiential books (canonical and apocryphal) that we must look for the high and lofty ethical figures of the OT—the wise man and the fool. The wise man is he who orders his life in accordance with the laws of God. The fool is the self-willed man, whose life, lacking principle, fails of success. The nature of wisdom lies not in intellectual knowledge so much as in the control of passion and the prudent regulation of desire. The idea of human wisdom is connected in these books with the sublime conception of Divine wisdom which colors both them and the Pss. In some of the finest passages, Wisdom is personified as the counselor of God in the creation of the world (Prov 8; Wisd 10; Job 28), or the guide which guards the destinies of man (Wisd 10 15 ff).

If the sapiential books are utilitarian in tone the Book of Ecclest is pessimistic. The writer is impressed with the futility of life. Neither pursuit of knowledge nor indulgence in pleasure affords satisfaction. All is vanity. Yet there is an element of submission in this book which only escapes despair by a grief- and stolid inculcation of obedience to Divine command.

(j) Apocryphal books: In an art. on the Ethics of the Bible some allusion ought to be made to the vind Fatherhood finds frequent expression. Even though the bald code is several at least the ceremonial law stern, a gentler spirit shines through many of its provisions, and protection is afforded to the wage-earner, the poor and the dependent, while the regulations regarding slaves and foreigners and even lower animals are merciful (Dt 24 14-16; Jer 22 13-17; Mal 3 5; Dt 25 4).

Material motives: Again we have already remarked that the motives to which the OT appeals are often mercenary and material. Material prosperity plays an important part as an inducement to moral conduct, and the good which the pious patriarch contemplates is earthly plenty, something which will enrich himself and his family. At the same time we must not forget that the revelation of God's purpose is progressive, and His dealing with mankind. There is naturally therefore a certain accommodation of the Divine law to the various stages of moral apprehension of the Jewish people, and on the human side a growing sense of the meaning of life as well as an advancing appreciation of the nature of righteousness. Gradually the nation is being carried forward by the promise of material benefits to the spiritual blessings which they enshrine. If even in the messages of the prophets there is not a marked change from the interest in material penalties, we must remember the character of the people they were dealing with—a people wayward and stubborn, whose imaginations could scarcely rise above the material and the temporal. We must judge prophecy by its time, and we shall see that these penalties and rewards which undoubtedly occupy a prominent place in OT ethics were but goads to spur the apathetic. They were not ends in themselves, nor mere arbitrary promises or threats, but instruments sub servient to higher ideals.

(b) As to extent: With regard to the extent or application of the Heb ideal it must be acknowledged that here also OT ethics is imperfect as compared with the universality of Christianity. God is represented as the God of Israel and not as the God of all men. It is true that a prominent commandment given to Israel is that which Our Lord invoked: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Lev 19 18). The extent of the obligation, however, has not to be reckoned immediately preceding: "Thou shalt not take vengeance, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people." It has been pointed out that the term "neighbor" is of wider signification than the English word. The neighbor is the fundamental idea of friend, and is applied to any person. The wider rendering is enforced by the fact that in vs 33.34 the word "stranger" or "foreigner" is substituted for neighbor. The stranger is thus regarded as the special client of God and is commanded to look to Him for protection. However this may be, in practice at least the Jews were not faithful to the humanitarianism of their law, and generally, in keeping with other races of antiquity, showed a tendency to restrict Divine favor within the limits of their own land and to maintain an attitude throughout their history of aloofness and repellent isolation toward foreigners. At the same time the obligation of hospitality was regarded as sacred and was practised in early Heb life (Gen 18 1-0). Nor must we forget that whatever may have been the Jewish custom the promise enshrined in their revelation implies the unity of mankind (Gen 12 3), while several of the prophecies and Psalms look forward to the restoration of Divine favor within the limits of their own land and to maintaining an attitude throughout their history of aloofness and repellent isolation toward foreigners. (3) Inwardness of motive.—Again the distinctive note of Christ's ethic is the inwardness of the moral law as distinguished from the externality of the ceremonial law. Almost in identical terms Paul insists upon the need of inward and not outward conformity of the inner man of the heart. Once more both lay emphasis upon the fulfillment of our duties to our fellow-men, and both are at one in declaring that man owes to others an even greater debt than duty. Christ's principle is, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself"; Paul's injunction is "Owe no man anything but to love one another." Christ transforms morality from a routine into a life; and with Paul also goodness ceases to be a thing of outward rule and becomes a principle of life in the soul. For both all virtues are but the various expressions of a single vital principle. "Love is the fulfilling of the law." The dynamic of devotion according to Christ is, "God's love toward us"; according to Paul, "The love of Christ constraineth us."
Ideal of life: And if we turn from the motive and spring of service to the purpose of life, again we find substantial agreement: "Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect" is the standard of Christ; to attain to the perfect life—"the prize of the high calling of God in Christ"—is the aim of Paul.

(4) Ultimate end.—Nor do they differ in their conception of the ultimate good of the world. Christ's ethical ideal, which He worked for as the realization of the object of His mission, was a redeemed humanity, a reestablishment of human society, which He designated "the kingdom of God." Paul with his splendid conception of humanity sees that the human problem was solved in the Risen Life of his Lord. It is by growing up in all things unto Him who is the Head that the whole body will be perfected in the perfection of its members. And this is what Paul means when he sums up the goal and ideal of all human faith and endeavor—"till we all attain . . . unto a full grown man, unto . . . the fulness of Christ" (Eph 4:13). Paul everywhere acknowledges himself to be a pupil of the Master and a teacher of His ways (1 Cor 4:17). With this subject it cannot be doubted that in their hidden depths and in their practical life the precepts of the apostle are in essential agreement with those of the Sermon on the Mount, and have a common purpose—the presenting of every man perfect before God (cf. Alexander, Ethics of St. Paul).

The ethical ideal of the NT is thus indicated. The chief business of ethics is to answer the question, What is man's supreme good? For the Christian, in short, is the ideal of life? A careful ideal study of the NT discloses three main statements implied in what Christ designates "the kingdom of God": man's highest good consists generally in doing God's will and more particularly in the attainment of likeness to Christ and in the realization of human brotherhood—a relation to God, to Christ and to man. The first is the pure white light of the ideal; the second is the ideal realized in the one perfect life which is viewed as standard or norm; the third is the progressive realization of the ideal in the life of humanity which is the sphere of the new life.

1. Holiness as the fulfillment of the Divine will is, as we have seen, Christ's own ideal—"Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect"; and it is Paul's; and also we wish, even your perfection (2 Cor 13:11). The ideas of righteousness and holiness as the attributes of God are the features of the kingdom of God or of heaven, the realization of which Jesus continually set forth as the highest aim of man; and running through all the epistles of Paul the constant refrain is that ye might walk worthy of God who hath called you unto His kingdom and glory. To walk worthy of God, to fulfill His will in all sincerity and purity, is for the Christian as for the Jew the end of all morality. Life has a supreme worth and sacredness because God is its end. To be a man is to fulfill in his own person God's idea of humanity. Before every man, just because he is man with the touch of the Divine hand upon him and his Maker's end to serve you, lies this ultimate goal of existence—the realization of the perfect life according to the idea of God.

(2) Chistlikeess.—If Godlikeness or holiness is the end, Christlikeness is the norm or standard in which it is presented in the Gospel. In Christianity God is revealed to us through Jesus Christ, and the abstract impersonal ideas of holiness and righteousness are transmuted into the features of a living personality whose spirit is to be reproduced in the lives of men. In two different ways Christ is presented in the NT as ideal. He is at once the Pattern and the Principle or Power of the new life.

(a) He is the Pattern of goodness which is to be reproduced in human lives. It would lead us to trench on the succeeding art. if we were to attempt here a portrayal of the character of Jesus as it is revealed in the Gospels. We only note that it is characteristic of the NT writers that they do not content themselves with imaginative descriptions of goodness, but present a living ideal in the historical person of Jesus Christ.

(b) He is also Principle of the new life—not example only, but power—the inspiration and cause of life to all who believe (John 19:30). Paul says not, "Be like Christ," but "Have the mind in you which was also in Christ." The literal imitation of an example has but a limited reign. To be a Christian is not the mechanical work of a copyist. Kant goes the length of saying that "imitation finds no place in all morality" (Metaphysics of Ethics, sec. ii). Certainly the imitation of Christ as a test of conduct covers a quite inadequate conception of the intimate and vital relation Christ bears to his followers, as the apostle (Romans 8:29) and Schultz (Grunderia d. evangelischen Ethik, 5), "but to let His life take form in us, to receive His spirit and make it effective, which is the moral task of the Christian." It is as its motive and creative power that Paul proclaims Him: "Let Him dwell in you." We could not even imitate Christ if He were not already within us. He is our example only because He is something more, the principle of the new life, the higher and diviner self of every man. He is our life in us, because He created us.

(3) Brotherhood and unity of man.—The emphasis hitherto has been laid on the perfection of the individual. But both Christ and His apostles imply that the individual is not to be perfected alone. No man finds himself till he finds his duties. The single soul is completed only in the brotherhood of the race. The social element is implied in Christ's idea of the Kingdom, and many of the apostolic precepts refer not to individuals but to humanity as an organic whole. The church is Christ's body of which individuals are the members, necessary to one another and deriving their life from the head. The gospel is social as well as individual, and the goal is the kingdom of God, the brotherhood of man. Paul proclaims the unity and peace before God of Greek and Roman, bond and free.

In the dynamic power of the new life we reach the central and distinguishing feature of Christian ethics. Imposing as was the ethic of Greece, it simply hangs in the air. Plato's ideal state remains a theory. Only Aristotle's "virtuous man" exists only in the mind of his creator. Nor was the Stoic more successful in working his philosophy a thing of actuality. Beautiful as these old-time ideals were, they lacked impelling force, the power to change dreams into realities. The problems which baffled or philosophy it is the glory of Christianity to have solved. Christian ethics is not a theory. The good has been manifested in a life. The Word was made flesh. It was a new creative force—a spirit given and received, to be worked out and realized in the actual life of common men.

(1) The dynamic on its Divine side.—The problem with Paul was How can one believe that good which has been embodied in the life and example of Jesus Christ? Without entering into the details of this question it may be said at once that the originality of the gospel lies in this, that it not only reveals the good but discretion is given which makes the good possible in the hitherto unattempted derivation of the new life from a new birth under the influence of the Spirit of God. Following his Master, when Paul speaks of the new ethical state of the Christian, he means the inward new creation of the Holy Spirit. It is an act of Divine creative power.

Without following out the Pauline argument we may say he connects the working of the Holy Spirit with two facts in the life of Christ, for him the most important in history—the death and resurrection of Our Lord. Here we are in the region of dogmatics, and it does not concern us to present a theory of the atonement. All we have to do with it is to see the building up of this new life. The sin, which must be overcome and removed, both in the form of guilt and power, before reconciliation with God can be effected. The deed which alone meets the case is the sacrifice of Christ.

In virtue of what Christ has achieved by His death a fundamentally new relationship exists. God and man are now in full moral accord and vital union.

But not less important as a factor in creating the new life is the resurrection. It is the seal and crown of the event. Character is the certainty that He had risen that gave to Christ's death its sacrificial value. "If Christ be not risen yet are ye in your sins." The new creature is the work of Christ. But His creative power is not an external influence. It is an inner spirit of life. All that makes life life—indeed—an exalted, harmonious and completed existence—is derived from the Holy Spirit through the working of the crucified risen Christ.

(2) The dynamic on its human side. Possession of the Holy Spirit by the individual is the only possible condition of the reception of the new life. It makes for the evangelical act of faith in the risen Lord. The formula is given; it has to be appropriated. The spirit of Christ is not offered to free a man from the duties and endeavors of the moral life. Man is not simply the passive recipient of the Divine energy. He has to make it his own and work it out by an act of free resolution. When we inquire what constitutes the subjective or human element, we find in the NT two actions which belong to the soul entering upon the new world in Christ—repentance and faith. These are complementary and constitute what is commonly called conversion. Repentance in the NT is a turning away in sorrow and contrition from a life of sin and a breaking with evil under the influence of Christ. If repentance looks back and forsees, faith looks forward and accepts. In repentance it is the outgoing of the whole man toward His Lord, the human power or energy by which the individual receives and makes his own the life in Christ. It is not merely the acceptance of Christ as the object of trust, it is a new appropriation of living power. It is the power of a new obedience. As the principle of moral appropriation it has its root in personal trust and its fruit in Christian service. Faith, in short, is the characteristic attitude and action of the whole Christian personality in its relation to the spiritual good offered to it in Christ.

It but remains to indicate how this new power manifests itself in character and in practical conduct of life. Character is expressed in virtue, and duty is conditioned by station and relationships.

5. Virtues, Duties and relationships.

Spheres of the New Life—The systematic enumeration of the virtues is one of the chief tasks of ethics. Neither in ancient nor in modern times has complete success attended attempts at classification. Plato's list is too meager. Aristotle's system is and is unarranged by omission. Nowhere in Scripture is there offered a complete description of the virtues. But the Bible does bring out the vital points and the apostolic precepts together we have a rich and suggestive cluster (Mt 5, 6; Gal 5 22, 23; Col 3 12, 13; Phil 4 8; 1 Pet 2 18, 19; 4 7, 8; 2 Pet 1 5–8; 1 Jn 3, 8). We may make a threecold classification:

(a) The heroic virtues, sometimes called the cardinal, handiand or integral virtues. Faith, hope, charity, fortitude, temperance, justice. While these were accepted and dwelt upon, Christianity profoundly modified their character so that they became largely new creations. The old moral currency was still kept in circulation, but it was gradually minted anew (Strong).

(b) The amiable virtues, which are not merely added on to the pagan, but being incorporated with them, give an entirely new meaning to those already in use. Virtue and utility lay stress on the intellectual or heroic features of character, Christianity brings to the foreground the gentler virtues. Two reasons may have induced the Christian writers to dwell more on the self-effacing side of character: partly as a protest against the spirit of militarism and the worship of material power prevalent in the ancient world; and chiefly because the gentler self-sacrificing virtues more truly expressed the spirit of Christ. The one element in character which makes it beautiful and effective is the flow from the risen Christ and the element of sacrifice. Love evinces itself in humility which lays low all vaunting ambition and proud self-sufficiency. Closely allied to humility are meekness and its sister, long-suffering—the attitude of the Christian in the presence of trial and wrong. With these again are connected contentment and patience and forbearance, gentle and kindly consideration for others. Lastly there is the virtue of forgiveness. For it is not enough to be humble and meek; we also have a duty toward our fellows. We must be ready to forget and forgive (Rom 12 20). "Be ye kind one to another, tenderhearted, forgiving each other, even as God also in Christ forgave you" (Eph 4 32).

(c) The theological virtues or Christian graces—faith, hope, charity. Some have been content to see in these three graces the summary of Christian excellence. They are fundamental in Christ's teaching and the apostolic combination of them may have had its basis in some lost word of the Master (Har- nack). Those graces cannot be separated. They are all of a piece. He who has faith has also love, and he who has faith and love cannot be devoid of hope. Love is the first and last word of apostolic Christianity. No term is more expressive of the spirit of Christ. Love was practically unknown in the ancient world. Pre-Christian philosophy exalted the intellect but left the heart cold. Love in the highest sense—selfless love—was the gospel, and it was reserved for the followers of Jesus to teach men the meaning of charity and to find in it the law of freedom. It is indispensable to true Christian character. Without it no profession of faith or practice of good deeds has any value (1 Cor 13). It is the fruitful source of all else that is beautiful in conduct. Faith itself works through love and finds in its activity its outlet and exercise. If character is formed by faith it lives in love. And the same may be said of hope. It is a particular form of faith which looks forward to a life that is to be perfectly developed and completed in the future. Hope is faith turned to the future—a vision inspired and sustained by love.

The duties of the Christian life it is enough to say that they find their activity in the threefold relationship of the Christian to self, to his fellow-men and to God. This distinction is not of course quite logical. The one involves the other. Self-love implies love of others, and all duty may be regarded as duty to God. The church and society are so inextricably bound together in the kingdom of love that neither can reach its goal without the other.
Duties toward self are, however, plainly recognized in the NT. Our Lord’s commandment, “Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself,” makes a rightly conceived self-love the measure of love to one’s neighbor. But the duties of self-regard are only lightly touched upon, and with the truth that the soul has an inalienable worth is insisted upon, to be constantly occupied with the thought of oneself is a symptom of morbid egotism and not a sign of healthy personality. But the chief reason why the NT does not enlarge upon the duty of self-culture is that according to the spirit of the gospel the true realization of self is identical with self-sacrifice. Only as a man loses his life does he find it. Not by anxiously standing guard over one’s soul but by dedicate it freely to the good of others does one realize one’s true self.

At the same time several self-respecting duties are recognized, of which mention may be made: (i) stability of purpose or singleness of aim; (ii) independence of other’s opinion; (iii) supremacy of conscience and a proper self-estimate. In this connection may be noticed also the Christian’s proper regard for the body which, as the temple of God, is not to be despised but presented as a living sacrifice; his attitude to worldly goods; his right to recreation; and his contentment with his station—all of which duties are to be interpreted by the apostolic principle, “Use the world as not abusing it.” The Christian ideal is not asceticism or denial for its own sake. Each must make the best of himself and the most of life’s trust. All the faculties, possessions, pursuits and joys of life are to be used as vehicles of spiritual service, instruments which make a man a fit subject of the kingdom of God in which he shall live.

Duties in relation to others, or brotherly love, are defined as to their extent and limit by the Christian’s relation to Christ. Their chief manifestations are: (i) justice, involving (a) respect for others, negatively refraining from injury and positively yielding deference and honor, (b) truthfulness, in word and deed, “speaking the truth in love,” (c) just judgment, avoiding censuriosity and intolerance; (ii) kindness or goodness, expressing (a) sympathy, (b) service and (γ) practical beneficence which provide for one’s need, giving one’s comfort and, by example and direct instruction, edification; (iii) patience, comprising (a) forbearance, (b) peaceableness.

Duties in relation to God: Here morality runs up to religion and duty passes into love. Love rests on knowledge of God as revealed in Christ, and expresses itself in devotion. Love to God is expressed generally in (i) thankfulness, (ii) humility, (iii) trustfulness; and particularly in worship (sacraments and prayers), and in witness-bearing—adorning the doctrine by beauty of life.

Spheres and relationships.—Of the various spheres and relationships in which the Christian finds opportunity for the exercise and cultivation of his spiritual life we can only name, without enlarging upon them, the family, the state and the church. Each of these spheres demands its own special duties and involves its own peculiar discipline. While parents owe to their children care and godly nurture, children owe their parents obedience. The attitude of the individual to the state and to the state to the individual are influences which may be legitimately drawn from NT teaching. It is the function of the state not merely to administer justice but to create and enforce those agencies and trusts for the amelioration of the lot and the development of the well of its citizens, securing for each full liberty to make the best of his life. On the other hand it is the duty of the individual to realize his civic obligations as a member of the social organism. The state makes its will dominant through the voice of the people, and as the individuals are so the commonwealth will be.

Abolitionists, invariance and universality.—In closing we may say that the three dominant notes of the Christian life are love, faith and hope. Each of these, taken in their full extent, in the NT sense, is an inalienable necessity of human life. Love is the counterpart of duty, faith the corresponding power, and hope the adequate incentive of character and conduct. Hence, the NT teaching stands for the abolition of all forms of injustice in the state, for the invariance and universality of Christian ethics and, in the last analysis, for the perfection of the human af

6. Conclusion—its invariance and its universality.

The gospel claims to be supreme in life and morals. For the Christian no incident of experience is secular and no duty insignificant, because this belongs to God and all life is dominated by the Spirit of Christ. The uniqueness and originality of the ethics of Christianity are to be sought, however, not so much in the range of its practical application as in the unfolding of an ideal which is at once the power and pattern of the new life. That life, Christian, wherein the perfect life is disclosed and through whom the power for its realization is communicated. Life is a force, and character is a growth which takes its rise and expands from a hidden seed. Hence, in Christian ethics all apathy, passivity and inaction, which occupy an important place in the moral systems of Buddhism, Stoicism, and even mediæval Catholicism, play no part. On the contrary all is life, energy and action toward the end of work, contained the germs of the subsequent renewal of Europe and still contain the potence of social and political transformation.

LITERATURE

I. In the Synoptic Gospels.—If, following the custom prevalent at present, we adopt, as the general name for the teaching of Jesus in the Synoptists, the Kingdom of God, then the divisions of His ethical teaching will be the Blessings of the Kingdom, the Character of the Subjects, and the Commandments of the King.

1. Nature of the kingdom.—"The Kingdom of God" was not a phrase invented by Jesus. It was used before Him by the Baptist. Its true meaning and application to various minds, the conviction lingered that, if God Himself were king, all would be well; and, when at length the Hebrew state was destroyed and the people were carried into captivity, the prophets still believed that for their country there was a future, and a hope, if only Jehoshaphat would take to himself His great power and reign.

In the period between the OT and the NT such sentiments so greatly prevailed that Schürer has compiled, from the apocryphal literature, a kind of Messianic creed, embracing no fewer than eleven articles, which he supposes to have prevailed before the Advent. It may be doubtful how far such beliefs had taken possession of the general mind. Many of the Sadducees were too satisfied with things as they were to care about the future; and others doubted. But the Pharisees undoubtedly gave a large place in their minds to Messianic expecta-as in "they that mourn"; but the other is so large a positive magnitude that the two together represent a handsome plus, which thoroughly justifies the predicate "blessed." It is remarkable that the first and the eighth of the reasons introduced by "for" are the contraries of ridicule and the kingdom of heaven," justifying the statement that this is Christ's own name for the blessedness brought by Him to the world; and the sentences between these, introduced in the same way, may be looked upon as eppexegetic of this great phrase. They embrace such great conceptions as comfort, mercy, the inheritance of the earth, the vision of God and sonship, which are all certainly blessings of the kingdom; and the list does not finish without mentioning a great reward in heaven—an immortal hope, which is the greatest blessing of all.

(3) Righteousness—is its contrast.—If the preacher of the Sermon on the Mount was to expound at length any one of these bright conceptions, it might have been expected to be the kingdom of God itself; and this we should have desired. But the one to which this honor fell has still to be mentioned. It is "righteousness." In one of the Beatitudes the speaker had promised that to be filled with this should be part of the blessedness which He was expounding; when He had introduced the Beatitudes, He turned back to this conception and devoted the rest of His discourse to its interpretation. Nowhere else, in the reports of His preaching which have come down to us, is there to be found an exposition so sustained and thorough. There is no better way of describing a new thing, with which those who listen are unfamiliar, than to contrast it with something with which they are perfectly acquainted; and this was the method adopted by Jesus. He contrasted the righteousness with which the subjects of the kingdom were to be blessed with the figure of the righteous man familiar to them, first, in the discourses of the scribes, to which they were wont to listen in the synagogue, and secondly, in the example of the Pharisees, to whom they were wont to look up as the patterns of righteousness. It is well known what ample opportunities He found, by means of this felicitous dispostion, for probing to the very depths of morality, as well as for enlightening with ridicule those who were conscious of the honor in which they stood with the masses. The whole of this scheme is, however, exhausted long before the Sermon comes to a close; and the question is, whether, in the latter half of the Sermon, He still keeps up the position of righteousness by contrasting it with the ordinary course of the world. I am inclined to think that this is the case, and that the key to the latter half of the discourse is the contrast between righteousness and worldliness. The doctrine, at all events, which issues from the whole discussion is that the righteousness promised is distinguished by three characteristics—inwardness, as distinguished from the externality of those who believed morality to extend to outward words and deeds alone; and not to the secret thoughts of the heart; secrecy, as distinguished from the ostentation of those who blew a trumpet before them when they were doing their alms; and naturalness, like that of the flower or the fruit, which grows spontaneously from a healthy root, without forcing. See Sermon on the Mount.

(4) Apocalyptic theories.—This substitution of righteousness for the kingdom in the greatest public discourse which has come down to us is a significant indication of the direction in which the mind of Jesus was; and He had finished with the kingdom of heaven; as He had finished with the kingdom of God; and He was not speaking from the notions and hopes of contemporary Judaism. It is evident that He was filling the idea of the kingdom more and more with religious and moral contents, and emptying it of political and material elements.

There are scholars, indeed, at the present day, who maintain that His conception of the kingdom was futuristic, and that He was waiting all the time for an apocalyptic manifestation, which never came. He was, they think, expecting the heavens to open and the kingdom to descend ready made to the earth, like the New Jerusalem in the Apocalypse. But this is to assume toward Jesus exactly the attitude taken up toward Him in His own day by Pharisees and high priests, and it degrades Him to the level of an apocalyptic dreamer. It ignores many sayings of His, of which the parallel discourse of the Sower and the Weeds may be taken as an example, which prove that He anticipated for Christianity a long development such as it has actually passed through; and it fails to do justice to many passages in His teaching where He speaks of the kingdom as already come; for the latter the most remarkable is where He says, "The kingdom of God is within you"—a statement preceeded by a distinct rejection of the notion of an apocalyptic manifestation; for the word "observation," which He employs in describing the way in which the kingdom is not to come, is an astronomical term, describing precisely such a phenomenon as He is supposed by such scholars as John Weiss and Schweitzer to have been expecting. The more it became evident that, with the coming of the kingdom, the homage of the nation, the more did He devote Himself to the education of the Twelve, that they might form the nucleus of His kingdom upon earth; and it was certainly not with apocalyptic visions that He fed them.

(1) Conditions of entrance.—The righteousness described so comprehensively in the Sermon on the Mount is not infrequently spoken of as the condition of entrance into the kingdom of God; but this is altogether to misunderstand the mind of Jesus. The righteousness described by Him is the gift of God to those who are already inside the kingdom; for it is the supreme blessing for the sake of which the kingdom is to be sought; and the condition imposed on those who are outside is not the possession of righteousness, but rather a bottomless sense of the want of it. The recoverable through the power of redemption which is bestowed on those who are their own lack of righteousness, the more ready are they for entrance into the kingdom. They must "hunger and thirst after righteousness." It has been remarked already that the description, in the Beatitudes, of the character of the kingdom is sometimes of a negative character; and indeed, this is the account in the teaching of Jesus generally of those whom He attracts to Himself. They are drawn by a sense of boundless need in themselves and by the comprehension of an equivalent fulness in Him; He calls those "that labor and are heavy laden," that He may give them rest.

(2) Christ's attitude to sin.—The first word of the prophetic message in the OT was always the denunciation of sin; and only after this had done its work did the vision of a good time coming rise on the horizon. The same was repeated in the message of John the Baptist; and it did not fail to reappear in the teaching of Jesus, though His mode of treating the subject was entirely His own. He did not, like the prophet, take up much time with convicting gross and open sinners. Perhaps He thought that this had been sufficiently done by His predecessors; or, perhaps He restrained because He understood the art of getting sinners to convict themselves. Yet in the parallel discourse of the Sower and the Weeds He showed how profoundly He understood the nature and the course of the commonest sins. If, however, He thus spared transgressors who had no covering for their wickedness, He made up for this leniency by the vigor and even violence with which He attacked those who hid their sins under a cloak of hypocrisy. Never was there a prophetic indignation like that with which He assailed such sinners in Mt 23; and He shaped the same charges into an unforgettable picture in the parable of the Pharisee and the Publican. He heard the Sadducees in the same unserved manner as He thus designated their antagonists; but in more parables than one it is possible that He had them in view. The Unjust Judge was probably a Sadducee; and so was the Rich Man at whose gate the beggar Lazarus was wont to sit. The sin of the Sadducees, at all events, did not escape His prophetic animad-version. In Lk esp. He alludes with great frequency to worldliness and the love of money as canker-worms of the kingdom, the Mas-dot, and its destiny destroyed. Thus did He exercise the prophetic office of denouncing all the sins of His time; and He showed what, in this re-respect, He thought of mankind in general when He began to “learn” if “men are more re-ing out (Lk 11 13), and when He gave the dreadful description of the heart of man which begins, “Out of the heart come forth evil thoughts” (Mt 15 19).
(3) Attainment of righteousness.—To all serious students of the Sermon on the Mount it is well known that the popular notion of it, as containing a simple religion and an easy-going morality, is utterly mistaken; on the contrary, the righteousness sketched by the Preacher is far loftier than that ever conceived by any other have allowed.
It is here that the ethics of Jesus differ from those of the philosophers. He takes the task much more seriously; and, as the ascent from the one extreme to the other is much longer, so the man of reaching the goal are much more difficult. Philosophers, assuming that man is equal to his own destiny, lay the demands of the moral law before him at once, taking it for granted that he is able to fulfil them; but the path adopted by Jesus is more rem-press; and it was a direct consequence of keeping company with Him and coming under the influence of His example. It is highly characteristic that, in the only place where He directly calls upon others who are known to have sinned but do not so much as repent before the Lord, He calls them “comrades” — “Learn of me; for I am meek and lowly in heart.” The same quality was often emphasized by Him, when He was describing the character which He wished to see exhibited by others. For example, He alluded to the Publican in Nature and the Supernatural, the most stupendous personal claims, but also attributed His followers a position of personal distinction among men, and called upon them to perform servces far beyond any that other have allowed.

(a) Repentance: The first step of this is repentance.
This was a watchword of all the prophets; after sin had been denounced, penitence was called for; and no repentance of the sort was wanted until that which had been experienced. In the message of John the Baptist it held the same place; and, in one of the Gospels, it is expressly stated that Jesus began His ministry by repeating this watchword of His predecessor. Not a few of the most touching scenes of His earthly ministry exhibit penitents at His feet, the most moving of them all being that of the woman who was “a sinner”; and, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, we have a full-length picture of the process of repentance.

(b) Faith: The second step is faith—a word of constant recurrence in the teaching of Jesus. In many cases it is connected with His healing ministry;
but this was a parable of a more interior ministry for the soul. In many cases it formed a school of preparation for the other, as in the case of the man born of four, who was brought to Christ for the healing of his body, but was presented, in addition, with the task of the forgiving relationship. In be-inning His Jesus expressly claimed the power of forgiving sins; and, in His great saying at the institution of the Lord’s Supper, He showed the connection which this was to have with His own death.

(c) Imitation of Christ—Service: Instead of speaking of faith and of believing, Jesus frequently spoke of “coming” to Himself; and then followed the inphilanthropist, as a winner of souls, as a preacher, as a teacher, as a controversialist, and so on. This is the modern imitation of Christ—that of the details of His earthly existence—the Imitation of a Kempis was an imitation of the cosmical history of the Son of God. It is more on His Divine mission, from heaven to the cross and back to the throne of the universe. See the writer's Imago Christi.

The great commandments.—In accordance with Scriptural usage, Jesus called by the name of "commandments" those actions which we commonly call "duties"; and He has made this part of our subject easy by reducing the commandments to two: "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the great and first commandment. And a second like unto it is this, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (Mt 22:37–39). He did not invent either of these commandments; for both occur in the OT (Dt 6:5; Lev 19:18). There, however, they lie far apart and are buried out of sight. The second of them was still more deeply buried under a misinterpretation of the scribes, to which reference is made in the Sermon on the Mount. Jesus rescued them from oblivion and showed the vital and indissoluble connection between the sentiments which they enforce—love of God and love of man—which had been long and violently separated; and He lifted them up into the firmament of ethics, to shine forever as the sun and moon of duty.

(a) Love to God: It has been denied by some writers on Christian ethics that there can be any such thing as duties to God, and by writers on philosophical ethics love to God is not generally regarded as a duty. But Jesus showed that this is a misconception. The duty of man is concerned with all the objects, and esp. all the beings, he is related to; and to Jesus the outflow of man's heart toward Him who is the author of his being and the source of all his blessings seemed the most natural of actions. "I love Jehovah," was a sentiment to which mankind had risen even in the OT (Ps 116:1), where it corresponds with not a few expressions of the Divine love equally fervent; and it is not a figure of speech at all when Jesus demands love for His Father from heart and soul, strength and mind.

Love to God involves, however, love to what may be called the Things of God, toward which Jesus always manifested tenderness and honor. Those who are not religiously minded have, indeed, taken it for granted that Jesus was indifferent, if not hostile, to the objects and actions by which the Almighty is honored; and it is often said that the only service of God which mattered in His eyes was the service of man. But, although, like the prophets before Him, Jesus exposed with withering rebuke the hypocrisy of those who put ritual in the place of righteousness, it requires no more than a glance at His sayings, and the other records of His life, to perceive that His mind was occupied no less with duties to God than with duties to men; indeed, the former bulk more largely in His teaching. The only arrangement of religion with which He seems out of sympathy is the Sabbath; but this was due to a peculiarity of the times; and it is quite conceivable that in other circumstances He might have been a strenuous supporter of Sabbath observance. If there had been in His day a Sadducean attempt to rob the people of the day of rest, He would have opposed it as strenuously as He did the Pharisees' attempt to make it a burden and a weariness to the common man. By declaring the Sabbath to have been made for man (Mk 2:27) He recognized that it was instituted at the beginning and intended for the entire course of man's existence upon earth. With the other things of God, such as His House, His Word, and His Worship, He manifested sympathy equally by word and deed; He frequented both the Temple and the synagogue; so imbued was His mind with the lit. of the OT that He Himself by the spirit of the Holy Ghost, and grant to the interpreters and the readers of the OT, and his own history, that if the former were ignored, or the latter misused, and, therefore, lay deep in His system of thought to call upon everyone to contribute his part to the service of the body politic; but no less did He recognize the right of those who have done their part of the general task to share in the fruits

Priceless, however, are the commandments of Jesus in regard to the things of man, as well as in regard to the things of God, the first of which is that we have to seek His ethical originality, but in the new motive brought into play by Him for doing the Divine will, when once it has been ascertained. As He made it easy to love God by revealing God's love, so did He make it easy to love man by revealing the greatness of man, as an immortal creature, who has come from God and is going to God. Whatever is done to man, good or evil, Jesus esteems as done to Himself; for the great saying to this effect, in the account of the Last Judgment in Mt 25, though applicable in the first place to Christians, may be extended to men in general. The corollary of the Fatherhood of God is the brotherhood of men; and the second great commandment stands under the protection of the first.

II. In the Fourth Gospel.—In the Fourth Gospel Eternal Life takes the same place as the kingdom of God in the other three. The author 1. Eternal Life—

1. Eternal Life is, indeed, unaware that Jesus employed the latter phrase for the 1. Eternal Life—

1. Eternal Life is, indeed, unaware that Jesus employed the latter phrase for the blessing which is brought by Him to the world; and it has already been remarked that the Synoptists occasionally employ "life" as an equivalent for the phrase they usually make use of. Jesus, at all events, not for his own benefit, that that phrase may have lain in some personal idiosyncrasy, or it may have been due to the gentle environment in which he wrote. But the phrase is one suggestive and instructive in itself in the highest degree. It had already existed in the language of religion before the time of Christ; indeed, it is an ever-present part of Holy Writ the idea is common that separation from God is death, but that union with Him is life.

In the teaching of Jesus, as this is found in Jn, the world lies in death, because it has become separated from God, and the children of men are in danger of perishing eternally. 2. Its Source

2. Its Source in lastingly as the punishment of their God for sin; but "God so loved the world, that he gave his only begotten Son, that whosoever believeth on him should not perish, but have eternal life" (3 16).

This life is, first, in God, who abides in everlasting blessedness; but it is not, even in Him, at rest, nor in any one of the persons in the Trinity. 3. Through It Is, therefore, that the Son Son—

3. Through it is, therefore, that the Son Son—

3. Through it is, therefore, that the Son Son—

3. Through in his Son in himself, even so gave he to the Son to also have life in himself" (5 20); not, however, for Himself alone, but for the purpose of being communicated to those destitute of it. For this reason He was made flesh and dwelt among us; and He communicated it through His words, which were "words of eternal life." The words of Jesus, as this brings out clearly, are in the language of religion, and they are the "truth"—two favorite expressions of this Gospel—or He of whom they speak is Himself the light and the truth; He said Himself, "I am the way, and the truth, and the life." He is in His word in such a way that, when it is received in the right spirit, He enters the soul personally—"ye me in, and I in you" (14 20). As food is taken into the body, to sustain life, so does He become the life of the soul; He is the "bread of life" and the "water of life" (6 35). As bread is given, or the bread has to be broken, before it is eaten, and water to be poured out, when it is drunk, so does the virtue which is in the Son of God only become available through His death—"I am the living bread which came down out of heaven; if any man eat of this bread he shall live for ever: yes and the bread which I will give is my flesh, for the life of the world" (6 51).

The world lying dead in sin, a new birth is required for those who are to enter into life; and this is necessary even for so fine a character as Nicodemus (3 3.5.7). Without this New Birth New Birth of God, it is impossible to be subject to Divine revelations; and even the children of privilege, who had enjoyed the OT revelation, were indifferent to eternal life, when it came near to them in the person of Christ. Hence there was required a special drawing on the part of God to awaken the sleeping soul—"No man can come to me, except the Father that sent me draw him" (6 44); and, where this influence was not responded to, there might be the most violent and persistent opposition to Christ on the part of those who believed themselves to be the favorites of heaven. The new birth is accompanied with spiritual vision—"seeing the kingdom of God" (3 3)—and, throughout the Fourth Gospel, remarkable stress is laid on the virtue of such seeing or knowing. It leads so directly to faith that to "know" and to "believe" are virtually the same act (10 38). Faith is the reception into the soul of the life eternal, or of Him who has been discerned by the spiritual vision and who is to Himself the light of the life, the drinking of the bread of life, the water of life, and it makes and keeps alive.

Since faith is thus the means whereby the eternal life becomes a personal possession, it is the one condition of the "eternal life" of which the commandments of Jesus are the means. 5. Nature of the commandments—"This is the work of Faith

5. Nature of the commandments—"This is the work of Faith God, that ye believe on him whom he hath sent" (6 29). It is the unique commandment, comprehending all the commandments, and it "worketh by love" (15 13). It is the fulfillment of them all. What these are, however, less brought out in detail in this Gospel than in the others, for it is a peculiarity of the mind of Jesus, as recorded by John, to deal with central principles and to assume that the consequences will follow as a matter of course. Of the organization, for example, of the community which was to perpetuate His influence, after He had left the world, He says much less in this Gospel than even in the Synoptists; yet He characterizes the very essence of the new body in such words as this, "I in them, and thou in me, that they may be perfected into one; that the world may know that thou didst send me, and lovest me, even as thou lovestest me" (17 20). In the last half of this discourse there is, as it were, to be exerted on the outside world by the display of the Christian character, with the result of producing belief; but this aim was to be sought more directly through testimony (15 27) and the "word" of the disciples (17 20). Thus would even the distant, "which are not of this fold," be brought in, so that there might be "one flock" and "one shepherd" (10 16). Inside the fold it is the greatest privilege and honor, as well as responsibility, to feed the "sheep" and to feed the "lamb" (21 15.16.17). Character and conduct are, even for the disciples of Christ, "commandments," as, indeed, Jesus does not disdain to speak of the various parts of His own vocation by the same name of Union with Christ of moral effort and the temptation to failure (15 10). Therefore, they are also proper subjects for prayer. He prayed for the disciples, both that they might be kept from the evil in the world and that they might be sanctified through the truth (17 15.17), and doubtless He expected them to ask the same things for themselves, as theirs was to be a life of prayer (16 24). But, in the last resort, they are the fruits of union with Himself, which is only a gift of the future, to be given at the death of the body, and is enjoyed even now by those who abide in the vine.

Cataract. For over five cents, Egypt rule was maintained, until about 1000 BC a war for independence began which was so successful that the victorious Ethiopian kings finally carried their armies against Thebes and Memphis and for a century (763-669) ruled all Egypt from Napata—which in religious architecture became the Southern Thebes—and for another century (and even at times during the Ptolemaic era) controlled upper Egypt. While the leaders of this revolution were doubtless descendants of exiled priests from Thebes, yet the mixture of Ethiopian blood is plainly discernible and is perhaps also shown in their "Puritan morals" (Petrie, III, 276) and spirit of clemency, so different from the legitimate Pharaohs. Shabaka = So (715-707) and Taharka = Tirhakah (693-667), both centuries thereafter Islam demanded a tribute of 360 slaves annually, and other treasure, though innumerable campaigns were necessary to collect it. The Nubian kings refused all overtures to become Moslems, and Christian churches multiplied along the banks of the Nile. In the 8th cent. Egypt was invaded by 100,000 Nubians to repay an insult given to the Coptic patriarch and to the sacred pictures in the Egypt Christian churches. In the 13th cent., David, king of Nubia, not only withheld tribute but invaded Egypt. He was terribly punished, however, by the Arabs, who sacked churches and tortured Christians clear to the Fourth Cataract. This was the beginning of the end. By the close of the 15th cent. almost every Christian altar was desolate and every church destroyed.

mentioned in the Bible, were the last great kings of E. When Tanutamen, son of Shabaka and nephew of Taharka (667-664), was forced by Ashurbanipal to give up his claim to Egypt and retire to the S., the influence of E. ceased. Cambyses (525-321) made E. tributary clear to the Third Cataract (cf. Ezek 30:4), while King Ergamenes, near the close of the 3d cent. BC, broke forever the power of the Egyptian priesthood. Though the Romans held a nominal protectorate over E., it was of so little importance as to be scarcely ever mentioned. After being expelled from Egypt the Ethiopians still continued to honor the gods of Thebes, but, as foreign influence ceased, the representations of this worship became more and more African and barbaric. Even after Christianity had triumphed everywhere else, the Nubians, as late as the 6th cent. AD, were still coming to Philae to give honor to the statue of Isis (Erman). In the 6th cent. AD a native king, Silko, established a Christian kingdom in the Northern Sudán with Dongola as its capital. This raised somewhat the culture of the land. In the next century the Arabs made Nubia tributary, though it took an immense army to do it. For six Winckler long ago proved that the Assyrians designated a district in Northern Arabia by the same name which they ordinarily applied to E. Skinner (Genesis, 1910, 208) references thinks the Hebrews also made this distinction and were therefore entirely right when they spoke of Nimrod as "son of Cush," since the earliest Bah dynasty had as a matter of fact a Sem origin. There may be other references to an Arabian district, but undoubtedly the African Kush must be the one generally designated. This is referred to once in the NT and over 40 times in the OT. Many secular monuments speak of the high honor paid to women in E., and Candace (Acts 8:27) seems certainly to have been an official or dynastic name for a number of Ethiopian queens. One of the pyramids of Meres was Candace's—her picture can still be seen at Kaga—and to her belonged the wonderful treasure of jewelry found in 1834 by Ferlini and now in the Berlin museum. Petronius (24 BC) raided E. for Rome and stormed the capital, but Candace sent ambassadors to Rome and obtained peace. The "eunuch" who may have been the treasurer of this very queen was probably “no black proselyte but a Jew who had placed the business ability of his race at the service of the Nubian woman” (W. Max Müller). In the OT E is spoken of with great respect, and several Bible characters are named Cushi (2 S 13 21 AV; Jer 36 14; Zeph 1 1); even the Ethiopian (Acts 8 27) was an Ethiopian (Ps 112 1), and Ebed-melek the Ethiopian is helper to Jeremiah (Jer 38 7). It is a land situated along the frontiers of the civilized world (280-309 AD), and with Jews in its fifth century (Zeph 3 10-13). It is a land rich (Job 28 10); Isa 43 3); is engaged in trade with Arabia (45 14), and its citizens are proud of their nationality (Ps 87 4). Again and again the relation of Cush with Sheba is mentioned (Gen 10 7-28; Isa 43 5, etc), which latter statement is strangely corroborated by the recently discovered Sabaean inscriptions throughout Abyssinia. Its typical inhabitants have a color as unchangeable as the leopard’s spots (Jer 13 28), are careless (Ezk 30 9), but very warlike (Ezk 30 5; Jer 46 9), giving “imitate” strength to Nineveh ( Nah 3 9), but who can be resisted by Israel because of Jeh’s favor (2 Chr 16 8; Isa 20 5; 36 6). Jeh is interested in the history of E. as well as Egypt (Isa 20 3), loves the land of Cush (Isa 11 16), and in the end, and the time is coming when E. shall yet stretch out her hands to Jeh (Ps 85 31). Cush and Mizraim are correctly mentioned as a political unit (Isa 20 4 f), and several kings of E. are mentioned by name—(2 Chr 14 13; Jer 25 20; 2 K 17 41; and Tirhaka 2 K 21 19; Isa 37 9). The statements concerning these kings have been pronounced incorrect because it seemed that Zerah could not possibly be an equivalent for Usarkon or So for Shabaka—the known kings of Egypt at those periods—and also because the reigns of Shabaka and Tirhakah did not begin until after the dates at which in the Heb records they were called “kings of E.”

Recent, information, however, makes it clear that both Shabaka and Tirhakah exercised royal authority in the Delta before they were given it farther south, and that the Heb transcription of names was very easy and natural. (See W. M. Flinders Petrie, Hist of Egypt, III. 280-300; Egypt and Israel 1911. 76).

Sem influence entered Abyssinia at least as early as the 7th or 6th cent. BC (see above), and the kings of Axum claimed descent from Menelek, son of Solomon, but the first certain confirmation of the kingdom of Axum comes from the middle of the 1st cent. AD, at which time Axum was a rich capital, and its ancient sacredness was so great that from that period clear down to the 19th cent. the kings of Abyssinia would travel there to be crowned. There is no reason to doubt that Frumentius (cir 330 AD) was the first to introduce Christianity. Merope of Tyre, according to the oft-told story, when returning from India with his two nephews, was captured and killed off the Ethiopian coast, but the two boys were carried to the Abyssinian king; and although one perished the other, Frumentius, succeeded in converting the king and his people to Christianity, and so later was himself consecrated by St. Athanasius of Alexandria as the first Metropolitan of E., taking as his title Abu Salama (“Father of Peace”). From that time until now, with but one single interruption, the Abuna (“Father”) has always been appointed by the Patriarch of Alexandria and since the 13th cent., has been by legal necessity not a native Abyssinian, but a Copt.

After the Council of Chalcedon (450 AD) condemned all as heretics who did not accept the “double nature” of Christ, because of Egypt and Abyssinian churches separted themselves from Rome, believing so thoroughly in the Deity of Christ as to refuse to accept His humanity as essential “nature.” In the 6th cent. a great company of monks entered Abyssinia, since which time the monastic tendency has been strongly marked. Caleb, king of Axum, attacked the Monocrites across the Red Sea—either for their persecution of Christians or for their interference with his wealth. In the 9th century Axum controlled a large district of Arabia. At this time Abyssinian influence was great. Aksum was also felt, and the Christian cathedral at Axum was a magnificent work of architectural art. The early churches were protected from the heavy surrounding Muslim kings.

In the 11th cent., the invasion of Africa by Islam in the 7th cent. required 300 years of battle for the preservation of Abyssinian liberties. The Christian kings of the African states succeeded in preserving both—but its civilization was lost, and for long a land completely hidden from the eyes of its fellow-Christians in Europe. Occasionally during these centuries a rumor would reach Europe of a “Prester John,” somewhere in the Far East who was king of a Christian people, yet it was a thrilling surprise to Christendom when Ebed-melek of Cavillon in the 11th cent. discovered this lost Christian kingdom of Abyssinia completely surrounded by infidel pagans and Mohammedans. In the 13th cent., the Negus of Abyssinia sent an envoy to the king of Portugal asking his help against the Moslems, the appeal was met with favor. In 1520 the Portuguese fleet arrived in the Red Sea and its chaplain, Father Francisco Alvares, went 20 years later to the Christian world by his curious narratives. Not long afterward, when the Arabs actually invaded the country, another Portuguese fleet of military purpose was sent with them, commanded by Christopher de Gama. These 450 musketeers and 300 sailors helped to consolidate the Christian aid to the endangered state. Father Lobo tells the story. The Abyssinian king must have been grateful for such help, but presently the Portuguese sought to convert the Abyssinian clergy to convert him and his people to the Roman Catholic faith because the king and his people were Mohammedans, the most zealous missionaries, was compelled to leave the country and the Jesuits who remained were mistreated. The later efforts to win the Abyssinian Christians to renounce the Monophysite heresy and accept the doctrine and control of Rome were somewhat more successful. In the 17th cent., a mission to Abyssinia was made, and in 1855, the Portuguese were again the interest of Christendom. The tr of the Bible, which was made by his Abyssinian helpers, was published by the British and Foreign Bible Society, and in 1859 the Church Missionary Society sent out Gebat and Peketh as the first Protestant missionaries to Abyssinia, who were followed shortly after by some Roman Catholic missionaries also. Although the native priests the Protestants were expelled in 1838 and the expulsion of the Roman missionaries followed in 1854. In 1899, a Copt who had been a youth by a Protestant school, became Abuna, and Protestant missionaries were again admitted, but succeeded in doing little permanent work owing to the political disturbances while King Kasa (Theodore)—the Napoleon of Africa—was attempting to consolidate native resources and build up an African empire. At this period the influence of Great Britain began to be felt in Abyssinia.

After the suicide of Theodore (1863) Abyssinia was divided against his order, and the interest of Christianity was again the interest of Christendom. The Mohammedan World of Today, by Zdenék Červenka, in The Missionary World, 1910-11.

In creed, ritual, and practice, the Abyssinian church agrees generally with the Coptic. There are seven sacraments and prayers for the dead. 5. Beliefs and Practices. As for "double nature," and to the saints; facts and pilgrimages, and also the use of the cross, are honored and venerated by immersion and infants by affusion. A blue cord is placed about the neck at baptism.
An extract from one of the Gospels, a silver ring, an ear pick and a small cross, often very artistic, are also worn about the neck. No charms or beads or crucifixes ('graven images') are worn. The Jews in the Chicago region are mostly of the Sephardic type, and on an average every other day during the year is a religious holiday. The people are ignorant and superstitious, yet impress observers with their grave kindliness and seem at times eager to learn. The clergy can marry before but not after ordination. Priests must be able to read and recite the Nicene Creed (the 'Apostles' Creed' is not known), but do not understand the Ge'ez language in which the liturgies are written. They conduct many and long services and attend to the ceremonial purifications. Deacons must also be able to read; they prepare the bread for the Holy Sacrament and in general help the priests. The monastic clergy have chief care of the education of the young — though this consists mainly in Scripture reading — and their head, the Etichaq, ranks next to the Abuna.

The ancient churches were often basilican, but modern native churches are quadrangular or circular. The Holy of Holies always stands in the center, and is supposed to contain an ark. Tradition declares that the ark in the cathedral at Axum is the original ark from Solomon's temple. An outer court surrounds the body of the church, which is freely used by laymen and as a place of entertainment for travelers. Most of the pictures are contemporary. These are both Egyptian and European influence, and are probably not merely decorations but have a relation, as in Egypt thought, to spiritual advancement in this life or the next (cf. Budge, Intro to Lives of Mabdi S'gyn and Sebta Kretos, 1898). The sermons consist of chants and psalms, reading Scriptures and reciting liturgies.

The Abyssinian canon (Sem'amnay Ahadu) consists of 46 OT and 35 NT books. Besides the usually accepted books, they count Shepherd of Hermas, Synods (Canons), Epistles, Psalms, Lutes of Clement, Macc, Tob, Jth, Wisd., Eclesus, Bar, 4 Ezr, Asc Issa, Book of Adam, Joseph ben Gvron, En and Jub. The Ethiopic texts of the other two latter give these books in the most ancient form, and their discovery has led to much valuable discussion. The use of the Ge'ez language in which these are written dates back to a time shortly before the introduction of Christianity in the 5th or 6th cent. All the text is almost exclusively tr from Gr writers or adaptations of such writings. Quotations abound from the Psalms, Gregory, Ignatius, Athanasius, Epiphanius, Cyril, Doseurus, etc. The second literary period begins 1268, when the old 'Solomonic' Dynasty regained its place and continues to the present; it consists mainly of tr from the Arabic. In both periods the topics are few: liturgies, hymns, sermons, the heroic deeds of the saints and their orthodoxy. The clergy now use the Old Gospels, as David has his four stones, to kill every heretical Goeliah (cf. Goodspeed and Crum, Patrologia Orientalis, IV, 1908). A large place is given to miracles and magic prayers and secret names (of Budge, Miracles of the Virgins Mary, 1900, and 'Magic Book of Disciples,' JAOS, 1904). The legends or histories are occasionally well written, as the famous 'Magda Queen of Sheba' (ET by Mrs. J. Van Vorst, 1907), but usually are inferior in style as in thought (cf. Littmann, 'The Ethiopic Alexianum,' 1909). The two names of 'popular literature' and many Abyssinian 'proverbs' are extant (JAOS, XXIII, 51-53; XXXV, 1-48; Jour. asiatique, IV, 487-95).

The modern Nubian does not write, and his ancient predecessors wrote but little. Even in the days of the Pharaohs the hieroglyphics in most Nubian temples were written so poorly as to be almost unintelligible, and in later Christian monuments put up by native rulers the usual inlaying of the Divine tablets accompanying the objects was left blank. Some centuries before our era the necessary monumental inscriptions began to be composed in the Nubian language, though still written in hieroglyphics. Shortly after the beginning of the Christian era a native cursive writing begins to be used on the monuments, closely resembling the Egyptian abjad, from which undoubtedly its alphabet was derived (F. L. Griffith in Aretë). Finally, after Nubia became Christian (6th cent.), another native system appears written in Gr and Coptic letters. Lepsius found two such inscriptions on the Blue Nile and numbers have since been discovered, but until 1906 these were as unreadable as the other two forms of Nubian writing. In that year Dr. Karl Schmidt found in Cairo two precious fragments of parchments which had been owned by some Nubian Christians of probably the 8th or 9th cent. One of these contained a selection of passages from the NT — as was ascertained by comparing it with the Gr and Coptic Scripture. Each passage to which it refers, besides touching several proper names were soon deciphered. New inscriptions are now being brought to light every few months, and undoubtedly the tr of this important tongue, which contains the "history of an African Negroes and the Gnostics, and also the religious history of the long-lost Christian church of the Södän, will soon be accomplished. The other fragment found by Schmidt was a curious Hymn of the Cross, well representing the ancient Egyptian hieroglyphic writing:

'The cross is the hope of Christians; The cross is the resurrection of the dead; The cross is the physician of the sick; The cross is the liberator of the slave,' etc.

—James H. Breasted in BW, December, 1908; Nation, June 2, 1916.

Scientific observation of Nubia began with Burchardt (1813), Caulliau, and Waddington (1821), and esp. with Lepsius (1844), but excavation by the Royal Academy of Berlin, University of Pennsylvania, University of Liverpool, and Oxford University.

ETHIOPIAN EUNUCH, e-thi'-o-p-an u'nuh (אֵוֹנָךְ, e'venokh): A man who occupied a leading position in the ancient-Absynian church. The queen of the Ethiopians, and who was converted and baptized by Philip the deacon (Acts 8:21-27). Being a eunuch, he was not in the full Jewish communion (cf. Dt. 23:1), but had gone up to Jerusalem to worship, probably as a proselyte. During his return journey he spent the time in studying Isaiah, the text which he used being that of the LXX

THE KUSHITE C. Good, represents Perhaps shed place of the language. The flattered in themselves present to King time. It was called Greek, and Egyptian, was Buthais: by some modern authorities, e.g. G. A. Smith, it has been located at or near Gaza. The verse containing the confession of the eunuch, "I believe that Jesus Christ is the Son of God," is emended either wholly or in part by some texts, but Hilgenfeld, Knowing, etc., regard it as quite keeping with the context. Tischendorf, WH, RV text, etc., uphold the omission. The verse occurs in the body of AV, but is given only as a footnote in RV and ARV. The diligence with which the eunuch pursued his reading, the earnestness with which he inquired of Philip, and the promptness with which he asked for baptism—all testify to the lofty nature of his character.

ETHIOPIAN LANGUAGE, e-thi-op'ik lan'gwaj: The language commonly called Ethiopic is the language in which the inscriptions of the kings of the Egyptian Empire, Kushite (Axumite) empire and most of the lit. of Christian Abyssinia are written. It is called leátna Ge'ez, "the tongue of Ge'eza," by the Abyssinians themselves, most probably because it was originally the dialect of the Ge'ez tribe, who in the dynasty must have dwelt in or near Aksum (Axum).

The names Ethiopia and Ethiopians have been used in many different meanings by various peoples. To the Greeks, Ethiopia was a country of Egypt, and to this sense the word is generally used in the histories of Egypt. The Ethiopian kings came from that country which is now called Abyssinia, or African Ethiopia, in the Holy Bible, especially in the Psalms. In Holy Bible times the term received a wider meaning, and Ethiopia was the name of all the land between the Red Sea and the Nile, south of Egypt proper. Sometimes "Indian" and "Ethiopian" were synonymous, or Ethiopic was given, even considered to stretch as far as to the Atlantic Ocean in the W. But of these countries the Greeks and Romans had very little exact geographical knowledge. See ETHIOPIA.

The fact that Ethiopia at some time meant the country between the Red Sea and the Nile prompted the pagan kings of Aksum in northern Abyssinia to adopt this name for their own country and to give it a narrower sense than the one we now give it. At that time the Semitic inscription of King As'kus (As'kas, the word Atshor), a rendering of the Sem Haba-shat ("Abyssinia," but here more specially referring to Northern Abyssinia). Under this same king, about 350 AD. Abyssinia became Christian; and after the Bible had been translated into the Ge'ez language, the Abyssinians found that Ethiopia was mentioned there several times. Their national pride was flattered by the thought that their country should be referred to in the Holy Scriptures, and for this reason they were all the more ready to apply the name in question to their own country. Up to the present day they call it Ethiopia (Itáposi), and themselves Ethiopians; their legends speak even of an ancestor Itápos.

We may then, if we choose to do so, speak of a Nubian and an Abyssinian Ethiopic, but the term "Ethiopic language" has come into general usage as an equivalent of leátna Ge'ez, and should therefore be applied only to the ancient literary language of Abyssinia.

This language is closely allied to the languages of Southern Arabia: it represents the southwestern branch of the southern division of the Sem languages. The most important branch of this division is, of course, the Arab. language, and with this Ethiopic has a great deal in common. On the other hand there are many words and forms in Ethiopic which are not found in Arab, but in Heb or even in Bab and Assy. It has been held that the home of the Semites was in Africa; and if that were the case, the people who spoke the Ethiopic language may never have migrated very recently. But the majority of scholars who have expressed their opinion upon the subject believe that Asia was the home of the Semites; this is the opinion of the writer of this art. also. Then the Sem inhabitants of Abyssinia spoke the language of the Red Sea. Their migration must have begun many centuries BC. It has hardly ever stopped, since Arabs in smaller, and sometimes in larger, numbers have been drifting into Abyssinia at all periods.

The Sem conquerors of Abyssinia found peoples of two different races in the country where they settled: (1) African aborigines and (2) Kushites, a branch of the Hamitic family. Their languages were different from each other and, of course, different from that of the Semites also; several of them are spoken up to the present day. When the Semites first came and formed their literary language, they did not allow the languages of the country to influence their own speech very much; but gradually this influence has been felt, and it is very evident in the modern Sem languages of Abyssinia. An outline of the history of the Ethiopian language is as follows: Its oldest monument known so far is the Sem part of the bilingual inscription of King Ez'âná, which dates from the first half of the 4th cent. AD. Before that time Ethiopic must have been spoken, without doubt, but it was not written: Gr and Sabaeen were written instead. At the time of King Ez'âná the knowledge of the Sabaeen language seems to have been very little; but the Sabaeen inscription just mentioned is in the Ethiopian language, but carved once in Sabaeen script and a second time in the native Ethiopic script which had been derived from the Sabean. In the first of these two "editions" two or three Sabean words are used instead of their Ethiopic equivalents. A few other ancient inscriptions found in the Aksumitic empire may also be dated from the same period.

Possibly in the same 4th cent. the Gr of the Bible into Ethiopic was begun; and there seems to be the beginning of a real Ethiopic lit. Perhaps the Ps and the Gospels were translated first, being most needed in the service of the Christian church. The different books of the Scriptures were translated by different men, some of whom rendered literally, and some with regard to the sense, some having a good, some only a poor, knowledge of the language from which, and the language into which, they translated. Both Testaments were translated from the Gr by men whose mother-tongue was probably Aramaic. This is proved by the presence of Gr and Aram. words and by the forms in which the Heb names appear in Ethiopic transliteration. The oldest influences which the Ethiopic language experienced were therefore: (1) Sabaeen; a number of technical terms may have been adopted by the ancient Aksmites from the Sabaeen at the time when this was their literary language; (2) African, i.e. Kushite and native African; the Sem conquerors found a great many new animals and trees or plants, which they did not know in their new country, and in many cases they adopted their African names; (3) Aramaic, i.e. Jewish and Christian; these are mostly words referring to religious or theological matters; (4) Gr; some of the Gr words found in Ethiopic refer to religious matters in the same way as the Aram., others denote objects or ideas which the ancient Abyssinians received from the civilized world, others again are mere transliterations of Gr words in the Bible and other religious books, which the translators did not understand.

The time of the Aksumite empire was the time when the Ethiopic language flourished. This empire, which was at its height in the 7th or 8th cent. AD; and we know very little indeed of the history of Abyssinia from about 700 until about 1300 AD. In 1270 the so-called Solomonic Dynasty came to the throne again; the seat of the empire, however, was no longer Aksum but Gondar, N. of Lake Tsalá. Meanwhile the literary language had become a dead language; new dialects had sprung up and taken its place in everyday conversation. But Ge’ez continued to be the sacred language; it was the language of the Bible and of the church, and when completed in the 14th and 15th centuries, a revival of Abyssinian lit. came about, the literary language was Ge’ez. But it was influenced by the new dialects, esp. by the Amharic, the language of Amhara, where Gondar was situated and where most of the books were written or transcribed. This influence affected in particular the spelling of Ge’ez in those books which dealt with religious matters and which therefore had to be written in pure Ge’ez. In historical books a great many words were taken from the Amharic, and this language, called lemm tärsk, “the tongue of the chronicles,” has often the appearance of a mixed language.

In the 16th and 17th centuries, European missionaries came to Abyssinia and tried to convert the monophysite Abyssinian Christians to Romanism. In order to come into close contact with the common people they used Amharic as a literary language, so that everybody, not only the learned, might understand the writings, and their example was followed by the defenders of the native church; and since that time Amharic has become a recognized literary language in Abyssinia, although Ge’ez is still considered the real language of the church.

Amharic was derived from a sister language of the Ethiopic; the direct descendant of the Ethiopic language is modern Tigré; a language derived from a dialect very closely related to Ge’ez is modern Tigré.

ETHIOPIAN VERSIONS, eth'ní-kér'vən várs'ha:n(s): Christianity was introduced into Abyssinia by Syrian missionaries, who probably spoke Gr. about the time of Constantine the Great. The Bible was transcribed into Ethiopic or, to use the native name, Lesamo Ge’ez, the OT being from the LXX, between the 4th and 5th centuries, by various hands, though the work was popularly ascribed to Frumentios, the first bishop. The fact of the Scriptures having been transcribed into Ethiopic was known to Chrysostom (Hom. II, in Ioannem), by whom the words were revised some time about the 14th century, and corrected by means of the MT. The Ethiopic Scriptures contain the books found in the Alexandrine recension with the exception of the Books of Macc.; but their importance lies in their pseudopigraphic writings, the Aev Isá, the Book of En and the Book of Jub. The 1st ed. of the NT appeared at Rome in 1548–49 (reprinted in Walton), but a critical edition has yet to be made; one issued by the British and Foreign Bible Society in 1830 contains many errors. The Ethiopic Apocrypha have been edited by Dillmann (the Octotheuch and 1–4 Kings and Apoc), Bachmann (d. 1894) (Isa, Lam, Ob and Mal), and Ludolph (Ps.). The Psalter has been often printed from 1513 on. The Book of En was first transcribed by Richard Laureys and published at Oxford in 1582, but the standard editions are those of Dillmann (Leipzig, 1853) and R. H. Charles (Oxford, 1893). The importance of this work lies in the fact that the influence of Gr. on the NT has been greater than that of all the other apocryphal and pseudopigraphic books (cf. Charles, Charmed 41). Not only the phraseology and ideas, but the doctrines of the NT are greatly influenced by it. Of the canonical books and Apoc the MSS are too poor and too late to be of any value for the criticism of the Gr. text.

ETH-KAZIN, eth-ká'sín (םֶתֶה קַזִּין; ititah kázín; AV Itthah Kazin): A town on the eastern border of Zebulon, mentioned between Gath-hepher and Rimmon (Josh 19:13). The site is not identified. “Itthah” of AV is due to misunderstanding of the Tifin.

ETHNAN, eth'ían (אֶתְנָן, “gift” or “hire”; אֶתְרַבִּי Ethrabi): A Judahite (1 Ch 4:7).

EUBULUS, eu'bú-lús (Εὐβοῦλος, Euboulos, lit. “of good counsel”), 2 Tim 4:21: One of the members of the church in Rome at the time of Paul’s second imprisonment in that city.

The apostle mentions how, at his first answer to the charges brought against him at the emperor’s tribunal, the Rom. Christians as a whole proved disloyal to him—no one took my part, but all forsake me” (ver. 16). In these circumstances when the descent of Paul by the Christians in Rome was so disheartening, it is pleasing to find that there were some among them who were true, and Eubulus was one of these. Paul therefore in writing the last of his epistles sends to Timothy a greeting from Eubulus.

Nothing more is known in regard to Eubulus. As his name is Gr, he was probably a Gentile by birth.

EUMENES II, eu'më-nes (Εὐμηνής, Euménēs, “well-disposed”): King of Pergamum, son and successor of Attalus I (197 BC). He is mentioned in the Apoc (1 Mace 8:8) in connection with the league which Judas Maccabaeus made with the Romans. As their ally in the war against Antiochus the Great and in recognition of his signal service at the decisive battle of Magnesia (190 BC), E. was rewarded with such extensive tracts of country as raised him at once from comparative insignificance to be the sovereign of a great state. The statement in the Apoc describing his extension of territory differs from those of Livy, Polibius and Appian, and cannot be correct. The Romans are said to have taken “India, and Media and Lydia” from Antiochus and to have given them to E. Antiochus never had any possessions in India nor had any earlier connection of Syria. Of the countries E. was obliged to give up only the countries on the side of Taurus toward Rome. No suggestion for the reading “India” in the narrative has met with acceptance (it may possibly have been a copyist’s error for “Jonia”; see Livy xxxvii.44). E. cultivated the Roman alliance carefully but became suspected in connection with the affairs of Perseus, the last king of Macedonia.
He never came to an open rupture with the Romans, and died in 159 BC, after a reign of 39 years.

EUNATAN, ú-ná'tán. See Eunatian.

EUNICE, ú-ní'se, ú'nís (Evéen, Euníkē), is the correct reading, and not Événèsh, Eunêthkē, which is read by the TR of Stephen, three

1. Eunice's syllables: Évén-kē, lit. "conquering Home Timothy. Her name is Gr and this might lead to the inference that she was a Gentile by birth, but such a conclusion would be wrong, for we read in Acts 16:1 that she was a Jewess. Her husband however was a heathen Gr. She was in all probability a daughter of Lois, the grandmother of Timothy, for both of those Christian women are spoken of, in one breath, by Paul, and this in high terms of commendation.

Timothy had not been circumcised in childhood, probably because of his father's being a Gentile; but Paul, the mother and the grand-mother of Timothy, for both of those Christian women are spoken of, in one breath, by Paul, and this in high terms of commendation.

2. How She Did all that lay in their power to train Timothy in the fear of God and in the knowledge of the Scriptures of the OT. "From a child" Eunice had taught her boy to "know the holy scriptures" (2 Tim 3:15 AV). It is right therefore to connect this home training of Timothy in the fear of God, with his and his mother's conversion to the gospel. His name Timothy—chosen evidently not by the father, but by Eunice—signifies "one who fears God." The "wisdom" of the Hebrews consisted not in worldly prudence or in speculative philosophy, but in the fear of the Lord, as is shown in such passages as Ps 111:10, and in Job 28, and in Prov throughout. His name, well fitted in the home training, shows how he was prepared to give a welcome both to Paul and to the gospel proclaimed by him, when the apostle in his first great missionary journey came to Lystra, one of the cities of Lycaonia or Southern (?) Galatia, where Eunice and her family lived. This is implied in the account of Paul's second missionary journey (Acts 16:1), where we read that he came to Lystra, and found there a certain disciple named Timotheus, the son of a certain woman who was a believer, when...

3. Her Conversion to Christ Timothy. This event means that Eunice, Lois and Timothy had been converted on Paul's former visit to Lystra. This conclusion is confirmed in 2 Tim 3:11, where Paul recalls to Timothy the fact that he had fully known the persecutions and afflictions which came to him at Lystra. The apostle repeats it, that Timothy knew what persecutions he then endured. Now this persecution occurred on Paul's first visit to that city. Eunice was therefore one of those who on that occasion became "disciples." And her faith in Christ, and her son's faith too, were genuine, and stood the test of the "much tribulation" of which Paul warned them (Acts 14:22 AV); and on Paul's next visit to Lystra, Eunice had the great joy and satisfaction of seeing how the apostle made choice of her son to be his companion in his missionary work. Eunice is not afterward mentioned in the NT; though it is a possible thing that there may be reference to her in what is said about widows and the children of widows in 1 Tim 5:4.

EUNUCH, ú'nuk (C. évyn, évýn, évyn) espó'don, spódon, sóvý'nos, sóvý'nos; próukos, próukos): Primarily and lit. a eunuch is an emasculated man (Dt 23:1). The Heb word ýárš means, however, to have acquired a figurative meaning, which is reflected in EV where "officer" and "chamberlain" are found as renderings (cf Gen 37:36; 39:1, where ý. is applied to married men; Est 4:4). The barbarous practice of self-emasculature and the mutilation of others in this way was prevalent throughout the Orient. The religious disabilities which men thus deformed labored under the Mosaic law had the effect of making the practice abominable to the Jews as a people (Dt 23:1; Lev 22:23-25). The law excluded eunuchs from public worship, partly because self-mutilation was often partly because a maimed creature of any sort was deemed unfit for the service of Jeh (Lev 21:16 f; 22:24). That ban, however, was later removed (Isa 56:4.5). On the other hand, the kings of Israel and Judah followed their royal predecessors in employing eunuchs (1) as guardians of the harem (2 K 9:32; Jer 41:16), and (2) in military and other official posts (1 S 8:15 m; 1 K 28:9 m; 2 K 8:6 m; 23:11 Avm; 24:12,13 m; 25:19 m; 28:8,9 m; 1 Chr 28:1 f; 2 Chr 18:8 m).

How Origen misunderstood and abused the teaching of this passage is well known (Eusube, H.E. VI,1,8), and his own pathetic comment on the passage shows that later he regretted having taken it thus lit. and acted on it. His is not the only example of such a perverted interpretation (cf Talm, Shabbath 152a, and of Midr on Ecel 10:7). The "a man of Nicanor and a eunuch" of Christ's words to John (John 18:9) is evidently not to be taken literally, but only to indicate that he was a member of the imperial court, known to those whom He addressed, as was the metaphorical use of the word in application to the third class well understood by them (cf Lightfoot, Horae Heb et Talm; Schöttgen, Horae Heb, in loc.).

It is significant that Jesus expresses no condemnation of this horrible practice. It was in keeping with His far-reaching plan of instilling principles rather than dealing in denunciations (Jn 3:17; 8:11). It was by His positive teaching concerning purity that we are shown the lines along which we must move to reach the goal. There is a more excellent way of achieving mastery of the sexual passion. It is possible for men to attain as complete control of this strong instinct as if they were physically sexless, and the resultant victory is of infinitely more value than the negative freedom produced by self-emasculation. These "make themselves eunuchs" with a high and holy purpose, "for the kingdom of heaven's sake"; and the interests created by that purpose are so absorbing that neither time nor opportunity is afforded to the "fleshy lusts, which war against the soul" (1 Pet 2:11). They voluntarily forego marriage even, undertake virtual "eunuchism" because they are completely immersed in and engrossed by "the kingdom of heaven" (cf Jn 17:4; 1 Cor 7:25,38f; 9:5 and see Bengel, Gnomon Novi Test in loc. and Clem. Alex, Strom., iii.17 ff). See MARRIAGE.

EUODIA, 6-5'dia (Εὐώδια, Euodia, lit. "prosperous journey." The TR of Stephen reads Euωδια, Euodia, which means "fragrant.
1. Women Phil 4:2. AV has transformed Euo-dia into Euodias, which is a man's name.
2. The Difference Which arose: That, instead of the branch being healed.
3. Paul Entreats Them: They are called the "true yokefellow" or "worthy fellow-worker"
4. The True Yoke. It is a name used in the gospels to indicate a partner in work.
5. The Plea. It is said to exist when there is a difference of opinion.

EUODIAS, sko'tor (Εὐωδίας, Euodias, "true of noble father"): The name given to Antiochus V who had succeeded his father Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), 184 BC, while still a child under the guardianship of Lyais, his tutor. The name is repeated in the absence of Philip, a friend and foster-brother of the child's father, whom on his deathbed he had appointed guardian for his son, Lyais continued his duty as guardian, set the king upon the throne and named him Antiochus. He was, however, overpowered.

EUPHURATES, o-pl'ra'tes (Ἠὐφοράτης, Euphorates, "the good and abounding river"): The longest (1,780 miles) and most important stream of Western Asia, generally spoken of in the OT as "the river" (Ex 23:31; Dt 11:24). Its description naturally falls into three divisions:
upper, middle and lower. The upper division traverses the mountainous plateau of Armenia, and is formed by the junction of 2 branches, the Frat and the Murad. The Frat rises 25 miles N.E. of Erzerum, and only 60 miles from the Black Sea. The Murad, which, though the shorter, is the larger of the two, rises in the vicinity of Mt. Ararat. After running respectively 400 and 270 miles in a westerly direction, they unite near Keban, whence, in a tortuous channel of alluvial soil, they form, and in a southwestly direction, the current descends in a succession of rapid cataracts to the Syrian plain, along some distance above the ancient city of Carchemish, where it is only about 200 miles from the N.E. corner of the Mediterranean. In its course through the Armenian plateau, the stream has gathered the sediment which gives fertility to the soil in the lower part of the valley. It is the melting snows from this region which produce the annual floods from April to June.

The middle division, extending for about 700 miles to the bitumen wells of Hit, runs S.E. "through a valley of a few miles in width, which has eroded in the rocky surface, and which, being more or less covered with alluvial soil, is generally cultivated by artificial irrigation...

Beyond the rocky banks on both sides is the open desert, covered in spring with a luxuriant verdure, and dotted here and there with the black tent of the Bedouin" (Sir Henry Rawlinson). Throughout this portion the river formed the ancient boundary between the Assyrians and Hitites whose capital was at Carchemish, where there are the remains of an old bridge. The ruins of another ancient bridge occur 2000 miles lower down at Taphaeus, where the Greeks forced it under Cyrus the younger.

Throughout the middle section the stream is too rapid to permit of successful navigation except by small boats going downstream, and has few and insignificant tributaries. It here has, however, its greatest width (400 yds.) and depth. Lower down the water is drawn off by irrigating canals and into basins.

The fertile plain of Babylonia begins at Hit, about 100 miles above Babylon; 50 miles below Hit the Tigris and Euphrates approach to within 25 miles of each other, and together have in a late geological period deposited the plain of Shinar or of Chaldea, more definitely referred to as Babylonia. This plain is about 250 miles long, and in its broadest place 100 miles wide. From Hit an artificial canal conducts water along the western edge of the alluvial plain to the Pers Gulf, a distance of about 500 miles. But the main irrigating canals put off from the E. side of the Euphrates, and can be traced all over the plain past the ruins of Accad, Babylon, Nippur, Bīșmāya, Tellōh, Ereh, Ur and numerous other ancient cities.

Originally the Euphrates and Tigris entered into the Pers Gulf by separate channels. At that time the Gulf extended up as far as Ur, the home of Abraham, and it was a seaport. The sediment from these rivers has filled up the head of the Pers Gulf for nearly 80 miles since entering it, and the plain has become so marshy that the Euphrates, which at Babylon is running at a higher level than the Tigris, a large canal left the Euphrates just above Babylon and ran due E. to the Tigris, irrigating all the intervening region and sending a branch down as far as Nippur. Lower down a canal crosses the plain in an opposite direction. This ancient system of irrigation can be traced along the lines of the principal canals "by the winding curves of layers of alluvium in the bed," while the lateral channels "are hedged in by high banks of mud, heaped up during centuries of dredging. Not a hundredth part of the old irrigation system is now in working order. A few of the mouths of the smaller canals are kept open so as to receive a limited supply of water at the rise of the rivers, which then conducts itself over the lower lying lands in the interior, almost without labor on the part of the cultivators, giving birth in such localities to the most abundant crops; but by far the larger portion of the region between the rivers is arid, and, being wilderness, was at first the best part with broken pottery, the evidence of former human habitation, and bearing nothing but the camel thorn, the wild cacao, the colchocyn-apple, wormwood and the other weeds of the desert" (Rawlinson). According to Sir W. Wilcock, the eminent Eng. engineer, the whole region is capable of being restored to its original productiveness by simply reproducing the ancient system of irrigation. There are, however, in the lower part of the region, large areas overgrown with reeds, which have continued since the time of Alexander who came near losing his army in passing through them. These areas are probably too much depressed to be capable of drainage. Below the junction of the Euphrates and the Tigris, the stream is called Shat el Arab, and is deep enough to float vessels.

EUPOLEMUS, Εὐπόλεμος, (Eύπωλεμος, Eu pólemos): Son of John, the son of Acco—Hakkok (Acts, Acts; Neh 3 4 21, etc); was one of the two deputies sent by Judas Maccabaeus (1 Mac 8 17; 2 Mac 4 11) to Rome cir 161 BC to ask the help of the Romans against Demetrius. A critical estimate of the narrative (1 Mac 8 and Jos, Ant. xii. 10), and the first mention of the Jews as enemies of the Jewish nation and the Romans will be found in Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, III., 350 ff, where it is admitted that "inaccuracies of detail only confirm the general faithfulness of the impression." Keil (Comm., 14) further remarks on this point: "that the author of 1 Mac wrote from twenty to twenty-five years after the destruction of Corinth (146 BC) by the Romans; and that the Jews of Pal were not accurately informed concerning the wars of the Romans with the Greeks." E. has been identified with the historian of the same name quoted by Eusebius (Proc. Ec., IX, 17 ff); but there is no evidence that the historian was of Jewish origin. J. Hutchison

EURAQUILUS, ὥ-ῥακ’-i-l6 (RV ἐφραίκιαν, eurakión; AV ἐφραικίων, eurakidiaen; AV Euroclydon, ὥ-ροκ’-l5-don): The east or northeast wind which drove Paul’s ship to shipwreck at Melita (Acts 27 14). The term seems to have been the sailor’s term for that particular wind, and Paul uses the word which was used by them on that occasion. The difference in the text is explained by the fact that the term was not in general use and was therefore subject to being changed. The precise name is doubtful, but the Euroclydon is most easily explained as a compound of Gr eüros, “east wind,” and Lat aquilo, “northeast wind,” hence euraquilo, “east northeast wind.” This agrees with the experience of navigators in those waters. For a summary of the various meanings of αὐρακία see Unger, M. W. 140. Full discussion of the circumstances are given in the Lives of Paul by various writers.

ETYCHUS, Εἰθίκος (Eūthikus, Eúthis, “fortunate”): The story of Etychus occurs in the “we” section of Acts, and is therefore related by an eyewitness of the incidents (Acts 20 7–12). On the first day of the week the Christians of Troas had met for an evening service in an upper chamber, and were joined by Paul and his companions. Etychus was to leave in the morning, Paul “prolonged his speech until midnight.” A youth named Etychus, who was sitting at the open window, became borne down with the wind, owing to the lateness of the hour, and ultimately fell through the opening to the third story. He “was taken up dead.” This direct statement is evaded by De Wette and Olahausen, who translate “for dead.” Meyer says this expresses the judgment of those who took him up. However, Luke, the physician, is giving his verdict, and he plainly believes that a miracle was wrought by Paul in restoring a corpse to life. The intention of Luke in relating this incident is to relate a miracle. Paul went down and embraced the youth while comforting the lamenting crowd, “Make ye no ado; for his life is in him.” The interrupted meeting was resumed, the bread was broken, and the conversation continued till break of day. “And they brought the lad alive, and were not a little comforted.” S. EVANGELIST, εὐ-μαν-jel-ist: This is a form of the word ordinarily τρὶς “gospel” (εὐαγγελία, evaggélia), except that here it designates one who announces that Jesus Christ is the “gospeller” (προφέλετης, προφέλετης), “a bringer of good tidings”), lit. God Himself is an evangelist, for He “preached the gospel beforehand unto Abraham” (Gal 3 8); Jesus Christ was an evangelist, for He also “preached the gospel” (Lk 20 1); Paul was an evangelist as well as an apostle (Rom 1:15); Philip the deacon was an evangelist (Acts 21:8); and Timothy, the pastor (2 Tim 4:5); and indeed all the early disciples who, on being driven out of Jerusalem, "went everywhere preaching the word" (Acts 8:4 AV).

But addition of the angelic order of the ministry, distinguished from every other, is singled out by the Head of the church for this work in a distinctive sense. All may possess the gift of an evangelist in a measure, and be obligated to execute a private relation of duty, but some are specially endowed with it. "He gave some to be apostles; and some, prophets; and some, evangelists; and some, pastors and teachers."

It will be seen that as an order in the ministry, the evangelist precedes that of the pastor and teacher, a fact which harmonizes with the character of the work each is still recognized as doing. The evangelist has no fixed place of residence, but moves about in different localities, preaching the gospel to those ignorant of it before. As these are converted and united to Jesus Christ by faith, the work of the pastor and teacher begins, to instruct them further in the things of Christ and build them up in the faith.

At a later time, the name of "evangelist" was given to the writers of the four Gospels because they tell the story of the gospel and because the effect of their promulgation at the beginning was very much like the work of the preaching evangelist. In character, the Gospels bear something of the same relation to the Gospels as evangelists bear to pastors and teachers.

JAMES M. GRAY

EVE, EV, IN THE OT (אֵו, אֱוָּ, "He"; אֵא, אֵא, "her") was a name given, as the Scripture writer says, Gen 4:4, "from her unique function as "the mother of all living":"

1. The Name: This name is a generic designation, not properly a name but a generic designation, referring to the relation to man; herein lies the peculiarity of the "name" given to her, different from any other human name; but it has its raison d'être, for the relation of each human being to his mate, and the beasts, and represented as intimate and sacred beyond that between child and parent (318-24). The second, Eve, or "life," given after the transgression and its pro- ceeded results, refers to her function and destiny in the spiritual history or evolution of which she is the beginning (316.20). While the names are represented as bestowed by the man, the remarks in 24 and 20 may be read as the interpretative addition of the writer, suited to the exposition which it is the object of his story to make.

As mentioned in the art. Adam, the distinction of man and woman, which the human species has in common with the animals, is given in the general (or P) account of creation (1:27); and then, in the more particu- larized (or J) account of the creation of man, the human being is described at a point before the distinction of sex existed. This sexual distinction between the different origin, but it has also a different object, which does not conflict with but rather supplements the other. It aims to give the spiritual meanings that inhereth in man's being; and in this the relation of sex plays an elementar part. As spiritually related to the man nature, the woman nature is described as derivative, the helper rather than the initiator, yet equal, and supplying perfectly the man's social and affectional needs. It is the writer's conception of the essential meaning of mating and marriage. To bring out its spiritual values more clearly he takes the pair before they are aware of their species distinction, and calls the family, while they are "naked" yet "not ashamed" (2:25), and portrays them purely as companions, individual in traits and tendencies, yet answering to each other. She is the helpmeet for him ("שא הינקֶה", "a helper answering to him").

True to her nature as the being relatively acted upon rather than acting, she is quicker than the man to respond to the suggestion initiated by the serpent and to follow it out to its desirable results. There is the eagerness of desire in her act of taking Condition the fruit quite different from the quasi-matter-of-course attitude of the man.

To her the venture presents itself wholly from the alluring side, while to him it is more like taking a desperate risk, as he detaches himself even from the will of God in order to cleave to her. All this is delicately true to the distinctive feminine and masculine natures. A part of her penalty is henceforth to be the subjection of one to the other (3:16); but for her the values of life were to be mediated through him. At the same time it is accorded to her seed to perpetuate the mortal antipathy to the serpent, and finally to bruise the serpent's head (ver 15). After these eliminations of Gen. Eve is not once mentioned, nor even specifically alluded to, in the canonical books of the OT. It was not in the natural scope of OT history and doctrine, which were concerned with Abraham's descendants, to go back to so remote origins as are narrated in the story of the first pair. The name Eve occurs once in the Apoc, in the prayer of Tobit (Tob 6:6): "Thou madest Adam, and gavest him Eve his wife for a helper and a stay; of them came the seed of men"; the text then going on to quote Gen 2:18. In 1 Esd 4:20.21 there is a free quotation, or rather paraphrase, of Gen 2:24. But not even in the somber complaints of 2 Esd concerning the woes that Adam's transgression brought upon the race (see under Adam in OT, III, 2) is there any hint of Eve's part in the matter.

JOHN FRANKLIN GENUNG

EVE IN THE NT (אָו, אָו, WH, Εῶς, Ηῆθα): "Eve" occurs twice in the NT and these readings are in the Pauline writings. In 1 Tim 2:12-14 woman's place in teaching is the subject of discussion, and the writer declares that she is a learner and not a teacher, that she is to be in quietness and not to have dominion over a man. Paul elsewhere expressed this same idea (see 1 Cor 14:34.35). Having stated his position in regard to woman's place, he used the Gen account of the relation of the first woman to man to substantiate his teaching. Paul used this account to illustrate woman's inferiority to man, and he undoubtedly accepted it at its face value without any question as to its historicity. He argued that woman is inferior in position, for "Adam was first formed, then Eve." She is inferior in character, for "Adam was not beguiled, but the woman being beguiled hath fallen into transgression." See Child-Bearing. In 2 Cor 11:3, Paul is urging loyalty to Christ, and he uses the temptation of Eve to illustrate the ease with which one can lose his salvation. Eve seems to have had no thought but that the account of the serpent's beguiling Eve should be taken literally.

EVE, GOSPEL OF: A gnostic doctrinal treatise mentioned by Epiphanius (Hœr., xxxv.2ff) in which Jesus is represented as saying in a loud voice,
The word which strictly answers to "everlasting" in the NT is αἰώνιος (Rom 1:20; Jude ver 6), rendered by AV in the former passages "eternal," but correctly by RV in both passages, "everlasting." The sense of the word 'everlasting,' in application to future punishment, is considered in art. PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING.

The term "everlasting" or "eternal," applied to God, describes Him as filling, or enduring through, all the "ages" of time. It is only thus that we can symbolically represent eternity. In reality, however, the eternity of God is not simply His filling of ever-flowing "ages," but rather that aspect of His being in which He is above time; for which time (the succession-form of existence) does not exist; to which the terms past, present and future do not apply. Yet, while God is not in time (rather holds time in Himself), time-sequence, as the form of existence of the world, is a reality for God. See ETERNALITY.

EVIL-FAVOREDNESS, ε-ντ'λ'νά: The word is the tr of the Heb 277 277, ὀδύρρα τα, lit. "evil thing," and refers to the ritual unfitness for sacrifice of any animal which, though included in the class of clean meats, yet possesses a blemish (see the word), or otherwise lacks beauty of symmetry, or is lean-fleshed (Dt 17 1 AV; cf. "ill blemish," Dt 16 21). We find these conditions combined in Gen 41 3 19 20 21 27, where the seven "ill-favored and lean-fleshed" kine of Pharaoh's dream are mentioned.

EVIL-MERODACH, ε-ντ-μο-θ'να: All the has been found to have been slain by his brother, Nergal-shar-ukin, who then reigned in his stead. Evil-merodach is said in 2 K 25 27 30 and in the passages in Jer 52 31—34 to have taken Jehoiachin, king of Judah, from his prison in Babylon, where he seems to have been confined for 37 years, to have clothed him with new garments, to have given him a seat on a special throne, and to have furnished him to eat at the king's table all the days of his life. It is an undisguised coincidence, that may be worthy of mention, that the first dated tablet from this reign was written on the 29th of Elul, and Jer 52 31 says that Jehoiachin was freed from prison on the 25th of the same month.

EVIL ONE (δ ποιμνός, ho ponérōs): Nearly all peoples who have expressed their religious thought and feeling in speech in a spirit that pervades over the destinies of men for their good. They believe that there is also a spirit, a person, whose work is to lead men into temptation: a spirit of light and a spirit of darkness. Feelings and preferences may have much to do with the character of the person. In Mt 5 37 39 45; 6 13, AV gives "evil," RV "the evil one," m "evil," the personal form referring to the enemy of the race known by various terms: Satan, "the adversary" or "the accuser," occurs 50; Beelzebul is found 7; devil, 35; it means "accuser," "counsellor." See SATAN.

EVIL-SPEAKING, ε-ντ-λ'ε-κ'πε-κ'-ε: Occurs twice in RV: (1) 1 Pet 2 1 it is the tr of καταλάθω, katalethēō, "backbiting," in 2 Cor 12 20; of katalethos, "backbiter" (Rom 1 30); the vb. katalethō is rendered to "speak against" (1 Pet 2 12; Jas 4 11; 1 Pet 3 16); (2) of ἄγαθος, blasphēma, "what is hurtful to the good name of anyone," "detraction," "slander" (Eph 4 31 RV, "railing"; cf. 1 Tim 4 4; Jude ver 9; Col 3 8); the vb. blasphēmēnai is rendered to "speak evil of" (Rom 14 16; 1 Cor 10 30; Tit 5 2, etc.); to "speak evil" occurs in Mk 9 39 as the tr of ἄγαθος, "lightly" (RV "quickly") "speak evil of me; and Acts 19 13 AV, "evil of thy way." In Ps 140 11, we have "evil-speaker" as the tr of 'tah lāshān, "a man of tongue," so RV. The wrong thing condemned as evil-speaking seems to be essentially detraction, what is hurtful to the reputation, and it is often too lightly regarded even among Christians. See Blasphemy; Railing; Slander.

EVIL THING (το ταύτης, tō kokōn, pl. in Lk 16 25): An evil thing or evil things may be the thoughts of evil men, their plans or their deeds; or the things men suffer for their own wrongs; or the evils consequent upon the errors of others. In the dark picture of fallen men in Rom 1 20, "inventors of evil things" appear. "The evil man out of his evil treasure bringeth forth evil (πονηρά) things" (Mt 12 35). Men should not lust after evil (κακῶν) things (1 Cor 10 6). This fixing the mind upon, with desire and the eye to acquire, "The mouth of the wicked poureth out evil (pā)' things" (Prov 16 28). The rich man had good things in his life, but did not use them to the glory of God or the good of men. The poor man had evil things: slacks, not of his choosing. The scene changes after death (Lk 16 25).

EVOLUTION, ε-ντ-λ'ε-κ'πε-κ'-ε: Evolution is a scientific and philosophical theory designed to explain from the origin and course of events the world of nature. 1. The Idea in the universe. By origin, however, of Evolution is not understood the production or emergence of the substance and of the cause or causes of things, but that of the forms in which they appear to the observer. Sometimes the term is vaguely used to cover absolute origin in the sense just excluded. A moment's reflection will make it clear that such a view can never secure a place in the realm of pure science. The problem of ultimate origin is that of the science to resolve. If it is solved at all, it must be by purely philosophical as distinguished from scientific or scientific-philosophical methods. Evolution, therefore, must be viewed in science purely as a process of orderly change in the form of things. As such it assumes the existence of substance or substances and of a force or forces working its successive transformations.1

As an orderly change of the form of things, evolution may be viewed as operative in the field of inorganic matter, or in that of life. In the first, it is known and called cosmic evolution; in the second, organic evolution. Of cosmic evolution again there appears two aspects: according to the conception of Bergson, the lower units of matter (atoms and molecules), or is studied in the region of the great. In the first sphere, it is made to account for the emergence in Nature of the qualities and powers of different kinds of matter called elements. In the second, it explains the grouping together, the movements and transformations of the solar and of stellar systems. Similarly, of organic evolution there appear to be two varieties. The first occurs in the world of life including the vegetable and animal kingdoms. Evolution here accounts for the various forms of living beings building their bodies and passing from one stage to another in their existence as individuals, and for the course of the history of all life as it differentiates into species and genera. The second variety of evolution operates in the higher realm of intelligence, morality, social activity and religion.

The idea of a law of orderly change governing all things is not a new one. Historians of science find it in some form or other embodied in the philosophies of Heraclitus, Democritus, Lucretius and Aristotle. There are those who find it also in the system of Goutama (Buddhists).

1 This position is apparently contradicted in the title of Henri Bergson's L'évolution creative; but re-interpretation of Bergson's system shows that the contradiction is only apparent. Bergson's evolution is neither substance nor essential cause or eternal kingdom. Evolution is given in his vital impetus (l'élan vital); the former in his concept of duration.

2. Recent Origin of Notion and Theory. In these widely habit of fact inductively brought together, or a thorough enough digestion and assimilation of the material to give the view as presented by them a firm standing. Hegel's idealistic theory of Development is kindred to the evolution theory in its essence; but it too antedates the working out of the system upon the basis of the scientific induction of the phenomena of Nature.

Until the time of Herbert Spencer, the scientific use of the word evolution was limited to the narrow department of embryology. By him, the term was made synonymous with all orderly change in Nature. The notion that such change is the result of chance, however, was not a part of Spencer's teaching. On the contrary, he published has that chance; but the expression of laws undiscovered by the human mind. Yet these laws are just as definite and rigid as those already discovered and formulated.

Since the appearance of the induction method in scientific research, the whole science of biology in particular, the idea of evolution has been elaborated into a great systematic generalization, and proposed as the philosophy of all perceptible phenomena. Beginning as a working hypothesis in a special narrow department, that of biology, it has been extended into all the sciences until all come under its dominance, and it is viewed no longer as a mere working hypothesis, but as a demonstrated philosophy with the force and certainty of fact.

It was natural that such an important proposition as the explanation of the present form of the whole universe by the theory of evolution and Bib- liographic much controversy. On one side extravagant claims were bound to be put forth in its behalf, combined with a misconception of its field. On the other a side the following topics: (1) The belief in a personal God, such as the Christian Scriptures present as an object of revelation; (2) The origin of the different species of living beings as portrayed in the Book of Gen; (3) The particular origin of the human species (the descent [ ascent] of man); (4) The origin of morality and religion, and (5) The essential doctrines of the Christian faith, such as supernatural revelation, the idea of sin, the person of Christ, regeneration and immortality. Beyond the facts as they are known, it will be neither possible nor profitable to enter within the brief compass of the present article.

The relation of creation to evolution has been already suggested in the introductory explanation of the nature of evolution, in the act of bringing into existence material or substance which did not previously exist, evolution does not touch the problem. It has nothing to say of a First Cause. The idea of a first cause may be regarded as material for metaphysics or the ground of religious belief. It may be speculated about, or it may be assumed by faith. This hypothesis, with matter or substance already in existence. A fairly representative statement of this aspect of it is illustrated by Huxley's dictum, "The whole world living and not living is the result of the mutual attraction according to definite laws of the powers possessed by the molecules of which the primitive nobility of the universe was composed" (Life of Darwin, II, 210). This statement leaves two things unaccounted for, namely, molecules and the evolution of the powers possessed by these molecules. How did primitive nobility come to exist? How did it come to be composed of molecules possessed of certain powers, and how did there come to be definite laws governing the gaining of energy? The agnostic answers, "We do not know, we shall not know" (ignoramus, ignorabimus, DuBois-Reymond).

The pantheist says, "They are the substance and attributes of the ultimate Being." "An uncased God who is greater than they, and possesses all the potentialities exhibited in them, together with much more (therefore at least a personal being), has brought them into existence by the power of His will" (Eucken, u. a.).

Thus the believer in evolution may be an agnostic, a pantheist or a theist, according to his attitude toward, and answer to, the question of beginnings. He is an evolutionist because he believes in evolution as the method of the transformation of molecules under the control of the powers possessed by them. Conversely the theist (and implication the Christian) may be an evolutionist. As an evolutionist he may be thoroughgoing. He may accept the following topics: (1) The belief in a personal God, such as the Christian Scriptures present as an object of revelation; (2) The origin of the different species of living beings as portrayed in the Book of Gen; (3) The particular origin of the human species (the descent [ ascent] of man); (4) The origin of morality and religion, and (5) The essential doctrines of the Christian faith, such as supernatural revelation, the idea of sin, the person of Christ, regeneration and immortality. Beyond the facts as they are known, it will be neither possible nor profitable to enter within the brief compass of the present article.

5. Evolution and the Origin of Species. Evolution is strongest in the realm of life. It is here that it first achieved its most signal conquests; and it is here that it was first antagonized most forcibly by the champions of religious faith. Here it proved irresistibly fascinating because it broke down the barriers supposed to exist between different species (whether minor or major) of life. It showed the unity and solidarity of the primary questions concerning with all its infinite variety. It reduced the life-process to one general law and movement. It traced back all present different forms, whether recognized as individuals, varieties, species, genera, families or kingdoms, to a single primary germ (cf. embryo), and the adjective "organo" has been prefixed to it, because the characteristic result is secured through organization. One of its most enthusiastic supporters defines it as "progressive change according to certain laws and by means of resident forces" (LeConte).

This conception of evolution is manifold. It cannot be given here at any length. Its main lines, however, may be indicated as follows: (1) The existence of gradations of structure in living forms beginning with the simplest (the amoebe usually furnishes the best illustration) and reaching to some of the most complex organisms (the human being). (2) The succession of living forms in time. This means that, according to the evidence furnished by geology, the simpler organisms appeared earlier on the face of the earth than the more complex, and that the progress of forms has been in general from the simpler to the more complex. (3) The parallelism between the order thus discovered in the history of life upon earth and the order observed in the transformations of the embryo of the highest living forms from their first individual appearance to their full development. (4) The existence of rudimentary members and organs in the higher forms.

The most striking of these proofs of evolution are the two which are based chiefly upon embryology and the ontogenetic. The first is based on the fact that in the strata of the earth the simpler forms have been deposited in the lower, the more complex in the upper. This fact points to the growth in the history of the earth of the simpler forms of life in the order of the earlier simpler ones. The second consists in the observation that each individual of complexly constructed species of organisms begins its life in the embrionic stage as the simplest of all living forms, a single cell (constituted in some cases out of parts of two preceding cells). From this beginning it advances to its later stages of growth as an embryo, assuming successively the typical forms of higher organisms, and that during this developmental the same species as read in the palaeontological records. This consideration shows that whatever the truth may be as to the species (for instance, man), each individual of the species (each man) has been evolved in his prenatal life, if not exactly from definitely known and identifiable species (anthropoid individuals perfectly formed), at least from fossil organisms apparently of the same type as those of anthropoids.

But assuming organic evolution to be true upon these grounds, and upon others of the same character, equally convincing to the scientific man, it must not be left out of account that it is to be distinguished quite sharply from cosmic evolution. These two different conceptions of organic reality are based on their basis, but become very different in their application according to the nature of the field in which they operate. Cosmic evolution works altogether through reactions. These are invariable in their cause and effect. Given material elements in certain conditions, they always issue in the same results. Their operations are grouped together under the sciences of chemistry and physics. Organic evolution works through processes to which the term "vital" is applied. Whether these are identical with the chemical-physical processes in the ultimate analysis is an open question among scientists. In the field of purely descriptive science, however, which limits itself to the observation of facts, it can scarcely emerge as a question, since the true nature of vitality is beyond the reach of observation. And upon the whole, the theory that there is an inner difference between vitality and physico-chemical attractions and affinities is supported by certain obvious considerations. But even if vitality should prove to be nothing more than a series of reactions of a chemical and physical nature, the type of evolution to which it yields is differentiated by broad characteristics that distinguish it from merely molecular attractions and affinities.

(1) The processes are not correlated with the chemical-physical ones. Heat, light, electricity, magnetism, gravitation, chemical affinity, are inter-changeable and interchanged among themselves. But none of these can be converted into life as far as we now know. (2) All life is from pre-existing life (some view evolution as a "vital power"). Biogenesis still holds the field as far as experimental science has anything to say about it, and abiogenesis is at the most an attractive hypothesis. (3) The vital processes overcome and reverse the chemical and physical ones. When a living organism is constituted, and as long as it subsists in life, it breaks down and reconstitutes forms of matter into new forms. Carbon, nitrogen, hydrogen, oxygen, in combination with other elements, are separated from one another and reunited in new combinations in the tissues of the plant and the animal. On the other hand, the moment the vital process ceases, the chemical and physical resume their course. The organism in which the vital process has been annihilated is immediately put under the operation of chemical affinities, and reduced into its first elements. So long as the vital process is on, there seems to be a ruling or directive principle modifying and counteracting the normal and natural course of the so-called chemical and physical forces. (4) The vital process is characterized by a more or less continuous and cyclic, and by a spontaneous generation that never show themselves apart from it. These are irritability, assimilation of non-living matter in the process of growth, differentiation or the power in each kind of living organism to develop in its growth regular, thus recurring changes, or reproduction. The result of the vital process is the tendency in the organic product of it to maintain itself as a unity, and become more and more diversified in the course of its life.

These features of the two different evolution make it necessary to account not only for the origin of the matter and the energy which are assumed in the cosmic form of evolution, but also for the origin and nature of the unknown something (or combination of things) which is called life in the organism, whether this be a unitary and distinct force or a group of forces. (It is interesting to notice the return to the notion of life as primal energy in the philosophy of Bergson ["vital"]; of Creative Evolution. The same view is advocated by Sir Oliver Lodge, Life and Matter.)

Furthermore, care must be taken not to confuse any special variety of evolutionary theory in the organism with general theory itself. Evolutionists hold and propose different hypotheses as to the application of the principle. The Lamarckian, the Darwinian, the Weismannian, the De Vriesian views of evolution are quite different from, and at certain points contradictory of, one another. They assume the law to be real and aim to explain subordinate features or specific applications of it as seen in certain given series of facts. They differ from one another in insisting on details which may be real or univocal without affecting the truth of the main law. Lamarckian evolution, for instance (revived recently under the name neo-Lamarckian), makes much of the alleged transmissibility through heredity of acquired traits. Darwinian evolution is based largely on the principle of accidental variations worked over by natural selection and the slow insensible accumulation of traits fitting individuals to survive in the struggle for life. Weismannian evolution posits an astonishingly complex germinal starting-point. De Vriesian evolution is built on the sudden appearance of mutations ("sports") which are perpetuated, leading to new species. It is unscientific to array any of these against the other in the effort to undermine the generic theory of evolution, or to take their differences as indicating the collapse of one by the others. But it is the result of creation by fiat. The differences between them are insignificant as compared with the gulf which separates them all from the conception of a separate creative beginning for each species at the first appearance of life upon earth. (On some differences between the Bib. account of Descent and later theories of the same general type, see Rudolph Otto, in Naturalism and Religion [ET].)

With these limitations, the law of organic evolution may be taken into the Bib. account of creation as given in Gen, chs 1 and 2. The question raised at once is one of the relation of the doctrine to the Bib. account. If the evolutionary conception is true, it naturally follows that the Bib. account cannot be accepted in its literal interpretation. For the law of descent, whether applied to the different species and general types as coming into existence gradually out of preexisting ones, whereas the other (lit. interpreted) represents them as created by a Divine fiat. This difference it is true may be artificially exaggerated. Nowhere does the Bib. account explicitly ascribe the creation of each species to the fiat of God. The word “created” (bərəd), as used in Gen, does not necessarily exclude preexisting matter and form. On the other hand, expressions such as “Let the earth bring forth living . . .” (11 AV) indicate a certain mediation of secondary powers in the elements (“resident forces”) through which organisms came into being. “After their kind” suggests the principle of heredity. “Abundantly” amplifies the law of regular and ample reproduction leading to the “struggle for life,” “natural selection” and “survival of the fittest.” But all efforts to harmonize Gen with science upon this basis lead at the best to the negative conclusion that these two accounts are not different in their purpose and scope as not to involve radical contradiction. A positive agreement between them cannot be claimed.

The difficulty vanishes in its entirety when it is borne in mind that the two accounts are controlled by different interests, treated primarily of different matters and, where they appear to cover the same ground, do so each in an incidental way. This means that their statements outside of the sphere of their primary interests are popularly conceived and expressed, and cannot be set over against each other as rivals in scientific presentation. Upon this basis the Gen account is the vehicle of religious instruction (not, however, an allegory); its cosmogonic accounts are not intended to be scientifically correct. But to the extent that science is concerned, they may be traditional conceptions, handed down in the form of folklore, and purged of the grotesque, purely mythological element so apt to luxuriate in folklore. Between such accounts and the dicta of pure science, it would be absurd either to assume or to seek for harmony or discord. They are parallel pictures; in one the foreground is occupied by the actual unfolding of the facts, the religious element is concealed deep by the figures in the foreground. In the other the background of haze and cloud is the domain of fact, the foreground of definite figures consists of the religious ideas and teachings. The evolutionary notion of the origin of life from chaos is not to be assumed as in contradiction either to the letter or the spirit of the teaching of Gen.

A still more important problem arises when the evolutionary theory touches the origin of man. Here, too, not simply different, but the Bib. account of the creation of Descent (Ascent) Adam and Eve, and their primitive life in the Garden of Eden as recorded in Gen 2 is affected, but all that is said of man as a child of God, clothed with peculiar dignity and authority.

(1) The difference between the Bib. and evolutionary records of the creation of man may easily be resolved if the Bib. account (Gen 2) is not viewed as a literal statement of actual occurrences, but as the vehicle of certain determinative thoughts designed to affiliate man in his proper relation to God. This means that when the Bib. account is that man as a distinctive and different being in the world came into existence as the result of a special act of will on the part of God, that he was created as the golden summit of the whole upward movement of life. He is not only a creature of Nature, but the offspring of the Divine will, with power to know his Maker, to hold fellowship with Him and to carry in him the rational and moral image of the Creator of all. Against this view of the origin of man, evolutionary doctrine maintains that.

It is concerned with the process through which the emergence of such a being as man was accomplished, and the time and circumstances in which it took place. These points it finds as it finds similar points affecting other living beings.

It would be easy of course to take materialistic forms of the evolutionary theory, such as that advocated by Haeckel, Guyeau, Ray Lankester, and establish an irreconcilable discord between them and the Bib. account; but such varieties of the theory are distinguished, not by the occurrence of the idea of evolution in them, but rather by the materialistic metaphysical theories with which they are associated. When, for instance, Haeckel defines the notion of evolution by excluding it from its intelligence or purpose, and by obliterating differences between the lower animal creation and man, he does so not as an evolutionist in the sense, but as a materialistic metaphysician (Monist type) in metaphysics. The moment the evolutionist determines to limit himself to the scientific method and the interpreter of the Bib. account to the religious mode of his task, he has assumed discord in Gen 2 and the evolutionary theory totally vanishes.

(2) The more important point of contact between the theory of evolution and the Bib. conception of man, however, is that of the notion of the dignity and worth of man. The very existence of a Bible is based on the idea that man is of some consequence to the Creator. And through the Bible this idea not only appears early (Gen 1:26), “Let us make man in our image, after our likeness,” followed by the statement, “And God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them,” but is interwoven with every fundamental teaching.

It is contended that a representation like this is not compatible with the evolutionary conception of the origin of man from simian ancestors. The contention would be that the evolutionary theory actually obliterated the line of distinction between man and the lower creation; and in any form of it in which such line is ignored, and man is regarded as being of the same order (neither more nor less) as those from which he sprang, it is not capable of being harmonized with the Bib. doctrine. But as a matter of fact, the whole drift and tendency of evolutionary thought ought to be and is the very opposite of belittling man. For according to it, man is the culmination and summit of a process whose very length and complexity simply demonstrate his worth and dignity as its final product. Accordingly, some of the most radical evolutionists, such as Pankhurst (Through Nature to God) have extended and strengthened the argument for the immortality of man by an appeal to his evolutionary origin.

Kindred to the problem of the origin of man, and, in some aspects to it, a part of that problem, is the further problem of the relation of Religion to evolution. First of all, according to the biblical conception of man, the emergence of the more complex from simple and eternal antecedents must be supposed to have evolved from non-religious or pre-religious elements. But the very statement of the case in this form necessitates the clear conception of the idea of religion. If religion is the sense in the human soul of an infinite and eternal being, or beings, issuing in influences upon life, then it is coeval with man and inseparable from the human soul. There never was a time when man was not on some level or another, in some sense, aware of this sense in the mind of a prehuman ancestor of man would change the brute into the man.

We may speak of the states of the prehuman brute’s mind as “materials for the making of religion,” but not as religion. Their transformation into religion is therefore just as unique as the creation of the man himself. Whatever the mental condition of the brute before the emergence of his material substratum and the dependence of itself upon that reality, it was not a religious being. Whatever the form of this sense, and whatever its first consent and results, after the emergence of man it became religion. What caused it to appear at that particular moment and stage in the course of the onward movement? This is a question of causes, and its answer eludes the sense of origin and nature in material and philosophical, and if understood by pure philosophy, leads to the same diversity of hypotheses as has been found to control the solution of the problem of beginnings in general (Agnosticism, Pantheism, Theism).

For the rest, that the general features hold true in the field of religion is obvious at a glance. Religious thought, religious practices, religious institutions, have undergone the same type of changes as are observed in the material universe and in the realm of life.

What is true of religion as an inner sense of a reality or realities transcending the outward world is equally, and even more clearly, true of the moral nature of man. In one aspect of it is the outward counterpart of the conscience from non-ethical instincts is either to extend the meaning and character of the ethical into a region where they can have no possible significance, or to deny that something different has come into being when the sense of obligation, of duty, of virtue, and the idea of the supreme good have appeared.

In other particulars, the development of the moral nature of man, both in the individual and in the community, manifestly follows the process discerned in the material universe at large, and in the realm of organised life in particular. As an observed fact of moral, physical, and intellectual growth of material ideas and the mutual play of the inner controlling principle of the sense of oughtness (“the voice of God”) and of social conditions and necessities, arising from the nature of man as a social being, are so manifest that these would seem to be beyond control and influence, or that they could be determined by the method of entrance into the world, but not a denial of uniqueness of character, of nature, even of essence in the Nicene sense. It behaved Him, in bringing many sons to perfection, “to make the captain of their salvation perfect through faith” (He 2:10). The question of the Virgin Birth of Jesus is definitely excluded from the discussion because it is one of historical evidence chiefly, and, in whatever way the evidence may solve it, the theory of evolution will have no difficulty in set over against the solution. See Virgin Birth.

From the evolutionist’s point of view, the incarnation is the climax and culmination of the controlling process of the universe (see Incarnation). Evolution demands such a consummation as the appearance of a new type of person, and particularly the type which appeared in Jesus Christ. This is not saying that other men can be or have been of the same nature and essence as the incarnate Saviour. It is saying simply that through the incarnation God brings into perfection the ideal embodied and unfolded in previous generations partially, and held in view as the goal through the whole process of previous struggle and attainment. In other words, the New Adam in Jesus Christ is the historical point of view. The course of the upward ascent of man as the Adam of Gen emerged in the upward ascent from the lower creation. Theology from the point of view of revelation must necessarily explain this as the voluntary entrance of the Son of God into humanity for purposes of redemption. In doing so it does not contradict the evolutionary view, but simply presents another aspect of the subject.

Assuming, as is done throughout, that the evolution theory concerns not causes and principles, but the order which once existed to have the idea of the world is not complete with the creation of man in the image of God. That image must be brought into perfection through the incoming of eternal life. But eternal life is the life of God lived in the species of human and space. It could only come in a personal form through fellowship with God. The bringing of it must therefore be the necessary goal to which all the age-long ascent pointed.

The Incarnation fulfills the conditions of the evolutionary process in that it inserts into the world by a variation the new type governed by the principle of self-sacrifice for others. This is a new principle with Christ, although it is constituted out of pre-existing motives and antecedents, such as the "struggle for others" (of Drummond, The Ascent of Man), and "altruism" (in its noble instances in human history). It is a new principle, first, because in its pre-Christian and extra-Christian antecedents it is not real self-sacrifice, not being consciously considered as such and without the overlapping of the motive given in eternal life, and secondly, because it reverses the main stream of antecedent motive. It enthrones love by revealing God's supreme character and motive to be love. Thus viewed the Incarnation is the real embodiment of the cosmic movement of the Superman. Nietzsche's Superman would be exactly the contrary of this, i.e. the reversion of man to the beast, the denial of the supremacy of love, and the assertion of the supremacy of force.

(3) Another difficulty met by the harmonist of the Christian system with the evolutionary theory is that of the problem of sin. The method of the origin of sin in the human race, as well as its nature, are given in the Bib. account in apparently plain words. The first man was sinless. He became sinful by an act of his own.

As compared with this, according to one common conception of the law of evolution, all the bad tendencies and propensities in man are the survival of his animal ancestry. Cruelty, lust, deceitfulness and the like are but the "tiger and ape" still lingering in his spiritual constitutions and consuming the earth, just as the coccinellae and the cockroaches remain in the physical, mere rudiments of former use. It is supposed to be "cruelty"; but it has a purpose and is not to interfere with the welfare of the species later developed. Here, as in every previous stage of our survey, the difficulty arises from the failure to distinguish between that which appears in man as man, and the propensities in animals and rudiments of the species which are not the same. They differ in their place and function in the respective lives of these animals. As a matter of fact, the tendencies to cruelty, greed, lust and cunning in the brute are not sinful. They are the wholesome and natural impulses through which the individual and the race are preserved from extinction. They are sinful in man because of the dawn in the soul of a knowledge that his Maker is showing him a better way to the preservation of the individual and the race in the human form. Until the dawn of the new the better way has arisen, there can be no sin. But when it has come, the first act performed in violation of that sense must be regarded as sinful. As the apostle Paul puts it, "I had not known sin, except through the law." "It was alive apart from law. When the commandment came, sin revived [was made to live] and I died" (Rom 7 7,9).

Instead of militating against the idea of a primitive fall, the discovery of the law of evolution confirms it, as the moral sense in man arose, in the very earliest stage of his existence as man, by an act of his own will, he set aside the new and better principle of conduct presented to him in his inner consciousness (disobeyed the voice of God), and fell back to the prehuman non-moral rule of his life. If this is not the doctrine of the Fall expressed in the terms of present-day science, it would be hard to conceive how that doctrine could be formulated in modern words. (F. J. Hall, Evolution and the Fall: of FALL, THE.)

According to this theory, it was possible for man as he first began his career upon the earth to have worked out a possible fellowship with God. Development might have been sinless. But it was not likely. And it was not desirable that it should be (see ADAM IN OT AND APOC). For moral character apart from struggle and victory is weak and unstable, and only negative, as the elimination of sin was to be accomplished by a process which according to the evolutionary philosophy everywhere and always produces higher and stronger types. It is only as progress is achieved by regeneration following degeneration that the best results are secured. Thus "where sin abounded, it was in order that grace might superabound" (Rom 5 20). Yet neither is sin the less sinful nor grace the less supernatural. It would be reading an unwarrantable doctrine of perfection to say that upon the whole an unfallen race would have been superior to a fallen and redeemed race. The world as it is is not a mistake but the wisest thought of God.

The mystery of evil in the world is thus left neither more nor less difficult to understand under the evolutionary conception than under any other. The difficulty of an unbroken continuity between the lower and the higher forms of life, culminating in the free will of man, with the necessary possibility of conflict in the stream of cosmic evolution of the Superman, Nietzsche's Superman would be exactly the contrary of this, i.e., the reversion of man to the beast, the denial of the supremacy of love, and the assertion of the supremacy of force; and so forth.

(4) In the light of what has already been made clear, it will be easy to dismiss the correlative doctrine of salvation from sin as false to the idea of evolution. The Christian doctrine of salvation falls into two general parts: the objective mediatorial work of the Redeemer, commonly called the Atonement, and the subjective transforming work of the Holy Spirit, begun in regeneration and continued in sanctification.

The idea of the Atonement lies somewhat remote from the region where the law of evolution is most clearly seen to operate. At first sight it may be thought that the law of evolution makes it difficult, if not impossible, to conceive of either the Atonement as such, or of the doctrine of its necessity as an evolution. It does so by fixing attention on the following particulars: (a) That with the emergence of man as a personality, the relation of the creature to the Creator comes to be personal. If that personal relation is disturbed, it can be restored to its normal state in accordance with the laws observed in the relations of persons to one another. The Atonement is such a restoration of personal relations between God and man. (b) In achieving the goal of perfect fellowship with Himself on the part of creatures bearing His own image, the Creator must in a sense sacrifice Himself. This Divine self-sacrifice is symbolized and represented in the Cross. Yet the meaning of the Cross is not exhausted in mere external sacrifice as the moral sense in man arose, in the very earliest stage of his existence as man, by an act of his own will, he set aside the new and better principle of conduct presented to him in his inner consciousness (disobeyed the voice of God), and fell back to the prehuman non-moral rule of his life. If this is not the doctrine of the Fall expressed in the terms of present-day science, it would be hard to conceive how that doctrine much nearer the center of the thought of evolution. It has always been conceived and expressed in biologic philosophy. The condition of sin postulated by this doctrine is one of death. Into this condition of sin it is inserted, an act which is called the New Birth. Whatever life may be in its essence, it overcomes, reverses and directs the lower forces to other results than they are observed to achieve apart from its presence. In analogy to this course of life in the process of regeneration, a new direction is given to the energies of the new-born soul. But the analogy goes farther. Regeneration is from above as life is always from above. It is God's Spirit through the word and work of Christ that begins in man. It may confidently leave the facts and states of its full maturity revealed in the image

If the above considerations are valid, the evolution ary and the Christian views of the world cannot be logically placed against each other but must be mutually explained and constra-ted by the fact that they both represent the working of the world in the lower world of processes of transformation to be schematized under the scientific generalization of evolution.

EWE, a (n 'thel), rathel, yl, is, ial, ish, she, "a female sheep": Râhâl (cf. pr. n Rachel, and Arab. rahâl, "to migrate") is the ordinary Heb word for ewe, but is trd"sheep", though with common indication of sex in context, in Isa 53 7 and Cant 6 7 (RV "ewe";): Alolh, part. of "ial, "to suckle" (cf. Arab. gohîl) is found in Ps 75 11 and Isa 40 11 (AV "are with young"; RV "have their young"). In 1 S 6 7 10 occurs parôt tholh, "milch kine, Shh, in Lev 22 28 while trd"ewe", might from the context be "ewe" or "she-goft" and indeed seems to be used here as a term applying equally to either, being used elsewhere for one of a flock of sheep or goats. See SHEEP.

EXACT, eg-zakt' (Av. 37: 17: 11: 88: 23: 12: 3: 5: 2: 7: 10: 5). To blame is the tr of hupasô, "to elevate" (not used with reference to God) (Mt 11 23; 23 12; Acts 2 33; 2 Cor 11 7; 1 Pet 5 6); also (twice) of epâthô, "to lift up, upon or against" (2 Cor 10 5; 11 20), once of huperaîthô, "to lift up above" (2 Thess 2 4); in 2 Cor 12 7 bis, this word is trd"exalted above measure," RV "exalted overmuch"; huperaîthô, "to lift up above" (Phil 2 9), is trd"highly exalted"; hupasô, "elevation," is trd"exalted" (Jas 1 9, RV "high estate").

For "it increasingly" (Job 10 18), RV gives "and if my head exact itself," instead of "God exaltech by His power" (36 22), "God doeth lothly in his power;" for "though thou exactest thyself as the eagle" (Ob ver 4), "mount on high," for "highly esteemed" (Lk 16 16), "exalted;" for "exaltech myself" (2 Cor 10 5), "is exalted;" for "He shall lift you up" (Jas 4 10), "He shall exalt you.

Self-exaltation is strongly condemned, esp. by Christ; humbleness is the way to true exaltation (Mt 23 12; Lk 14 11; 16 14; Jas 4 6; 1 Pet 5 6). The same theme is that of Christ Himself (Phil 2 5—11).

EXAMPLE, ἐπιζητοῦν (ἐτοιμάζω, ἐπιστάμενος, “a pattern, model or imitation” (hupodeigma, 1 Jn 2:6); ἄνωπρομός, ἅπανγραμμός, “a writing-copy,” “example”): A typical, representative, or illustrative case; a pattern or model for imitation (hupodeigma, Jn 13:15; He 5:5 AV; Jas 6:10; hupogrammos, 1 Pet 2:21; ὄραω, ὄραον, 1 Tim 4:12 AV) or warning (ἐρείπω, ἐρειπίζω, “a sample,” “an exhibition,” Jude ver 7; 2 Pet 2:3; ἰδίος, ἰδιότης, “to be great” [in Hiph.]; ἀρχαιολογία, “greatness” [as an advb. with adjis. and rarely as an adv.]; and “exceedingly” often occur as representing various expressions for the superlative in Heb and Gr.

EXCEED, ek-séd, EXCEEDING, EXCEED-ingly: The vb. is found in other than its present sense in Job 36:9 AV, “They have exceeded” (RV “have behaved themselves proudly”); 1 S 20:41, “They, . . . wept . . . until David exceeded” (AV and RV). Instead of “excellency” RV has “pride” (Isa 13:18; Ezk 24:21), “majesty” (Job 37:4 and ARV 13:11; 31:28), ARV has “preeminence” (Ps 49:3.4), “glory” (Ps 47:4), “dignity” (Ps 62:4) for “the fat of lambs” (Ps 37:20), RV “has the excellency of the pastures,” with “the fat of lambs”; ARV retains the AV “rendering with ERV in m.; instead of ‘Do not let the Gentile or heathen put them away’ (Job 4:21), RV “has ‘Is not their tent-cord plucked up within them?’” “Is not their excellency which is in them removed?”

EXCOMMUNICATION, ek-s’ko-mü-né-k’shən. Exclusion from church fellowship as a means of personal discipline, or church purification, or both. Its germes have been found in (1) the Mosaic "ban (Ex 22:27; Lev 26:29) for 'curse' (Gen 3:17; Num 15:31) and (2) a blind devotion entirely to God's use or to destruction (Lev 27:29); (2) the "cutting off," usually by death, stoning of certain offenders, breakers of the Sabbath (Ex 31:14) and others (Lev 17:4; Ex 30:22-28); (3) the exclusion of the lepers from the camp (Lev 13:46; Nu 12:14). At the restoration (10:78) the penalty of disobedience to Ezra's reforming movements was that "all his substance should be forfeited [hērem], and himself separated from the assembly of God and captivity." Nehemiah's deal was more lenient and was helped to fix the principle. The NT finds a well-developed synagogal system of excommunication, in two, possibly three, varieties or stages. Νέω, nēdū, for the first offence, forbade the bath, the razor, the convivial table, and restricted social intercourse and the frequenting of the temple. It lasted thirty, sixty, or ninety days. If the offender still remained obstinate, the "curse," hērem, was formally pronounced upon him by a council of ten, and he was shut out from the outward, religious and social life of the community, completely severed from the congregation. Νέω ημαθῶ, nēmaθā, supposed by some to be a third and final stage, is probably a general term applied to both nēdū and hērem. We meet the system in Jn 9:22: "If any man should confess him to be Christ, he should be put out of the way. "

It is doubtful whether an express prescriptive of excommunication is found in Our Lord's words (Mt 18:15-19). The offence and the penalty also seem purely personal: "And if he refuse to hear the church also, let him be unto thee as the Gentile and the publican," out of the pale of association and converse. Yet the next verse might imply that the church also is to act: "Verily I say unto you . . . things soever ye shall bind on earth shall be bound in heaven," etc. But this latter, like Mt 16:19, seems to refer to the general enunciations of principles and policies rather than to specific ecclesiastical enactments. On the whole, Jesus seems here to be laying down the principle of dignified personal avoidance of the obstinate offender, rather than prescribing ecclesiastical action. Still, personal avoidance may logically correspond in proper cases to excommunication by the church. 2 Thess 3:14: "Note that man, that ye have no company with him; Tit 3:10: "A factious man . . . avoid (AVm); 2 Jn ver 10: "Receive him not into your house," etc., all indicate discreet and faithful avoidance but not necessarily excommunication, though that might come to be the logical result. Paul's "anathemas" are not to be understood as excommunications, since the first is for an offence no ecclesiastical tribunal could well investigate: 1 Cor 16:22, "If any man loveth not the Lord, let him be ananetha;" the second touches Paul's deep relationship to his Lord: Rom 9:3, "I myself . . . ananetha from Christ;" while the third would subject the apostle or an angel to ecclesiastical censure: 1 Cor 5:9, 10, "Though we, or an angel . . . let him be ananetha."

Clear, specific instances of excommunication or directions regarding it, however, are found in the Pauline and some of the earlier writings. In the case of the inconstant man (1 Cor 5:1-12), at the instance of the apostle ("I verily, being absent in body but present in spirit"); the church, in a formal meeting ("In the name of our Lord Jesus, ye being gathered together"). 1 Cor 5:1-12, "take out the apostle's desire and will ("and my spirit"), and using the power and authority conferred by Christ ("and with the power of our Lord Jesus"); formally cut off the offender from its fellowship, consigning (relinquishing?) him to the power of the prince of darkness ("to deliver such a one unto Satan"). Further, such action is enjoined in other cases: "Put away the wicked man from among yourselves."

2 Cor 2:5-11 probably refers to the same case, terminated by the repentance and confession of the offender. "Delivering over to Satan" must also include some physical ill, perhaps culminating in death; as with Simon Magus (Acts 8:20), Elymas (Acts 13:11, Ananias (Acts 5:5). 1 Tim 1:20: "Hymenaeus and Alexander . . . that they might be taught not to blaspheme;" is a similar case of excommunication accompanied by judicial and disciplinary physical ill. In 3 Jn vs 9, 10 we have a case of excommunication by a faction in control: "Diotrephes . . . neither doth he himself, and they that be with him, cast out of the church."

Excommunication in the NT church was not a fully developed system. The NT does not clearly define its causes, methods, scope or duration. It seems to have been incurred by judicial teaching (1 Tim 1:20) or by factiousness (Tit 3:10 [?]); but the most of the clear undisputed cases in the NT are for immoral or un-Christian conduct (1 Cor 5:1, 11.13; perhaps also 1 Tim 1:20). It separated from church fellowship but not necessarily from the love and care of the church (2 Thess 3:15 [?]). It excluded from church privileges, and often, perhaps usually, perhaps always, from social intercourse (1 Cor 5:11). When pronounced by the apostle it might be accompanied by ministerial and punitive or disciplinary physical consequences (1 Cor 5:5; 1 Tim 1:20). It was the act of the local church, either with (1 Cor 5:4) or without (1 Cor 5:13; 3 Jn ver 10) the concurrence of an apostle. It might possibly be pronounced by an apostle alone (1 Cor 5:4); it perhaps not without the concurrence and as the mouthpiece of the church. Its purpose was the amendment of the offender: "That the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus." 1 Cor 5:5; and the preservation or purification of the church: the exclusion of the offender, that ye may be a new lump, even as ye are unleavened." 1 Cor 5:7. It might, as appears, be terminated by repentance and restoration (2 Cor 2:5-11). It was not a complex and rigid ecclesiastical engine, held in terrorem over the soul, but the last resort of faithful love, over which hope and prayer still hovered.

EXHORTATION: ek-sór-á-tion (paraklesis, paraklēsis). The Gr word tr4 exhortation! (paraklesis) signifies, originally, "a calling near or for" (as an advocate or helper who should appeal on one's behalf), and carries the twofold sense of "exhortation" and "consolation" (which implies the fact of the OT it is used in the sense of "consolation;" but in 2 Macc 7:24 it is tr4 "exhort," RV "appeal," TR "ary"; 2 Macc 9:26). The vb. parakaló is also tr4 "exhortation" (1 Macc 13:3 AV) and "exhort" (2 Macc 9:26).

In the NT paraklesis is tr4 "exhortation;" (Acts 13:15; Rom 12:8, RV "exhorting;" 1 Cor 14:3, ERV "com-

In Lk 3:18, parakaleo, "to call near or for;" is used as exhortation; "...and many other things in his exhortation," RV "with many exhortations;" and in Acts 20:2, parakaleo ligo polito is rendered (AV and RV), "had given them much exhortation.

I. The Route.

On the 14th Abib (early in April) the Hebrews were gathered at Rameses (Ex 12:37; Nu 33:5) where apparently the hostile host was moving north toward some other objective. The Pharaoh was also living (Ex 12:31). Starting from On 12:31: From Ps 78:12:43 it appears that the water-gate named Beth-Far is near the road to Succoth. If this is the case, the route from the Red Sea to Succoth seems well fixed for a people driving flocks and herds.

Nahal Quntur, also called Wady Dumat al Jandal, is a natural pass between the desert and the plain, and it was the road that was used by the Israelites when they came from the Red Sea to Succoth.

The route from Succoth to Dophnai (some 50 miles) is less likely to have been described as "near." Although an Arab will march 30 miles in a day on foot, yet when moving camp with camels, who travel only about 2 miles an hour, with women and children and herds, he only covers about 12 or 15 miles a day. We cannot suppose the Hebrews to have covered more than this distance without water on any single march.

We are not told how many days were occupied on the way from Rameses to Succoth (q.v.), though the general impression is that the stages men-tioned (Nu 33) represent a day's journey each. Measuring back from the first camp after crossing the Red Sea, we find that Succoth probably lay in the lower part of Wady to Succoth "Turnuidit, where there was plenty of water and herbs; the direct route from Zaanem leads to Phakousa (Tell Pakoa) by a march of 15 miles through well-watered lands. A second march, across the desert to Heropolis and down the valley to Succoth, would be of the same length.

The Hebrews departed "in haste, and no doubt made as long a march as they could. If the whole of the people were not in Rameses, but scattered over Goshen, it is possible that some came down the valley from near Babastis, and that the whole force concentrated at Succoth.

The next camp (Ex 13:20; Nu 33:6) led Israel to Etham, on the "edge of the wilderness" which lies W. of the Bitter Lakes, not far from the Nile water then to Etham entered them, and no doubt made there the two days' journey, from which it is supposed that the total time of their movement, or the distance covered by the march of 20 to 25 miles, the beasts being watered from the lakes if they were then filled with fresh water, as they would be when having an outlet to a tideless sea.

The sea which Israel crossed is not named in the actual account of the journey, but in the Song of Moses (Ex 16:4) it is called the "Red Sea" in the RV, following the LXX, of the sea the Heb name being Yam Sôph, or "weedy sea," a term which applied not only to the Gulf of Suez (Nu 33:5; Nu 31:17), the Gulf of "Akabah (Dt 2:8; 1 K 9:26). We are also told that the route chosen was the "way of the wilderness by the Red Sea" (Ex 13:18). It is generally supposed that the head of the Gulf of Suez was full of water at the time of the Exodus, and thus present; and, as the Bitter Lakes were then probably filled by the Nile waters flowing down Wady Turnuidit, they would no doubt have carried the Nile mud into this gulf, which mud had gradually filled up this Nile branch before 600 BC. The probable point of passage was the narrow channel (about 2 miles across) by which the lakes discharged into the sea, and was thus about 10 miles N. of Suez. We are told that the water was driven back by "a strong east wind (contrary) wind" in the night (Ex 14:21), and the sea (or "lake," as the word psam often means in the OT; see Gesenius, Lexicon, s.v.) was thus "divided," a shoh being formed and the waters being heaped up (Ex 15:8), so that when the wind ceased they rushed back; whereas, during the passage, they were a "wall" or "defence" (14:22) against any flank attacks by the Egyptians (cf 1 S 26:16, where David's men are said to have been a "wall" when defending Nabal's shepherds). The effect of the wind on any shallow waters can be seen at the mouth of the Kishon, where a shoal exists which is dry with a west wind, but under water and impassable when the wind blows down the river. In 1882, Sir Alexander Tulloch saw the waters of Lake Menzaleh driven back more than a mile by the east wind. Thus, however opportune the occurrence, drying up of the sea, as described in the Bible, was a perfectly natural phenomenon. The Hebrews crossed in the morning, and a march of 15 miles would bring them to the springs from which Suez is supplied, called 'Ain Nābī and 'Ayūn Māsā (the gushings of Moses'), from which they wandered in the desert of Shur would begin (see WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL).

This view of the Exodus route is practically the same as advocated by Dr. Robinson, by Dr. E. Naville, by Sir S. Warren, by Sir W.

5. Other Dawsons, and by others who have visited Views of the region in question. The view the route advocated by Brugsch, according to which the sea crossed was a lagoon near Pelusium, has found no supporters, because it directly conflicts with the statement that Israel did not follow the shallow road to Philistia, but went by the wilderness of the Red Sea. Another theory (see SINAI), according to which the "Red Sea" always means the Gulf of Akabah, is equally discredited by most writers of the present generation, because the distance from Egypt to Elath on this gulf is 200 miles, and the Israelites could not have traversed that distance in four marches, especially as the route has hardly any water along it in springtime. The detailed account of the route offers no difficulties that would discredit the historical character of the narrative.

II. The Date.—The actual statements of the Books of E, giving | reigns from the time of Solomon down to the fixed date of the fall of Samaria in 722 BC, place the 1. OT Chronology foundation of the Temple within a few years of 1000 BC. It is true that this interval is reduced, by about 30 years, by scholars who accept the very doubtful identification of Abahub of Sir-lai with Abahb of Israel; but this theory conflicts with the fact that Jehu was contemporaneous with Shalmaneser II of Assyria; and, since we have no historical account of the chronology of Hezekiah's reign, other than that of the OT, for this period, and no monumental notice of Israel in Egypt, or of the Exodus, we must either accept OT chronology or regard the dates in question as being unknown.

We have several statements which show that the Hebrew writers believed the conquest of Pal by Joshua to have occurred early in the 15th cent. BC, and this date fully agrees with the most recent results of Palestinian medical study of the history of the XVIIIth (or Theban) Dynasty in Egypt, as about to be shown, and with the fact that Israel is noticed as being already in Pal in the 5th year of Menepthah, the successor of Ramesses II. In 1 K 6:1 we read that the Temple was founded "in the 48th year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt," this referring to the Conquest and not to the Exodus, as appears from other notices. The LXX.expects 1440 years, but the details show that the Hebrew text is preferable. In Jgs 11:26 the first victory of Jephthah is said to have occurred 300 years after Joshua's conquest. The details given for this interval, in other passages of the same book, amount to 326 years; but the periods of "rest" may be given in round numbers, and this accounts for this minor discrepancy. Samuel ruled apparently for 20 years (1 S 7:2), and Saul (the length of whose reign is not stated in our present text of this same book) very probably ruled for 20 years also, as (Am 6:14, xiv, 9) states. The interval between Jephthah's victory and the foundation of the Temple—a total of 475 years, or rather more, from Joshua's conquest.

The popular belief that many of the judges were contemporaries does not agree with these facts, and is indeed in conflict with ten definite statements in Jgs. In Acts 13:19.20 we read that after the Conquest there were judges about the space of 450 years, and this rough estimate (including the rule of Samuel) agrees with the statement, and "the rest" of Moses' period, of the various passages in the OT. According to the Pent and later accounts (Am 5:25; Acts 7:30), Israel abode in the desert 40 years. We therefore find that Joshua's conquest is placed about 1480 BC, and the Exodus about 1520 BC. According to the revised chronology of the XVIIIth Dynasty of Egypt (see HRRTZ), which rests on the notices of contemporary Kassite kings in Babylon, it thus appears that the Pharaoh of the oppression was Thothmes III—a great enemy of the Anaites—and the Pharaoh of the Exodus would be Amenophis II or Thothmes IV. If Moses was 80 at the time of the Exodus, he must have been born when Thothmes III was an infant, and when his famous sister Hatshepsut (according to the more probable rendering of her name by Sir R. B. Kell of the title Ma-ka-Ra. She therefore might be the "daughter of Pharaoh" (Ex 2:5) who adopted Moses—no king being mentioned in this passage, but apparently "over" 15 years old. Moses was "grown"; for her regency lasted more than 20 years, till Thothmes III came of age.

As regards this date, it should be remarked that the theory of Lepsius, which has been adopted by many Egyptologists, is that the Hebrew and by many writers who accept his authority, is not accepted Views by every scholar. E. de Bunsen supposed that the Exodus occurred early in the times of the XVIIIth Dynasty; Sir Peter le Page Renouf said that "no materials have yet been discovered for fixing historical dates in periods of Egyptian history as far back as the Heb Exodus"—which was true when he wrote. Professor J. Liebelin supposes the Exodus to have occurred late in the time of Amenophis III—also of the XVIIth Dynasty (see Proc. Bib. Arch. Soc., 1890, 157-60; 1892, 60-62; 1898, 277; 1899, 53; 1907, 214). Dr. Hommel has also recently declared in favor of the view that the Exodos took place under the XVIIIth Dynasty (Z. T. Bez. T. February 1903). It is asserted that the Exodus occurred in 1314 BC, being the 16th year of Menepthah; but this is generally regarded as at least half a century too early for the year in question, and Israel was not in Egypt even ten years earlier.

The approximate dates given by Brugsch for the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties are very close to those which can be deduced from notices of contemporary kings of Babylon (Hist. Egypt, I, 314). The later calculations dates which Mahler based on certain astronomical calculations of the Fr. astronomer Biot (Académie des inscriptions, March 30, 1881, 507, 602-4) are not accepted by other Egyptologists. Brugsch says that only "scientific criticism has not yet spoken its last word" (Hist. Egypt, I, 36). Renouf (Proc. Bib. Arch. Soc., December, 1892, 62) more definitely states that "unfortunately there is nothing on Egypt documents which have as yet come down to us which can, by astronomical calculations, be made to result in a date." This judgment appears to be justified by recent discoveries, since Mahler's dates are about a century too late, as shown by the known history of the Kassites of Babylon. These calculations were based on recorded observations of the rising of Sirius just before the sun, in certain years of certain Egypt kings. But Sirius is not in the plane of the earth's orbit, and its rising is not constant in retardation. The "heliacal" rising is now about 2' 30" later each year, but about the date in question the retardation was about 12 min., so that a cycle of 1,461 years cannot be used by simple addition. Biidot also assumed that the Egyptian observations were as accurate as those made by a modern astronomer with a telescope, whereas when using the naked eye, the Egyptian observer may well have been a day wrong, which would make a difference of 120 years in the date, or even more. The Bab chronology thus gives a far safer basis than do these doubtful observations. On the basis of Brigit's calculations the Exodus has been placed in 1214 BC, or even (by Dr. Flinders Petrie) in 1192 BC (Proc. Bibl. Arch. Soc., December, 1896, 248). He thus cuts off more than three centuries in the period of the Judges, many of whom he regards as contemporaries. Lepsius in like manner, in order to establish his date, accepted the chronology of the Talm, which is notoriously 160 years too late for the known date of the fall of Samaria, and he endeavored (while rejecting its study and the chronology of the OT) to base himself on the number of generations before the Exodus, whereas it is well known that the Heb genealogies often give only the better-known names and skip several links.

III. The Theory of Lepsius. — The reasons which influenced Lepsius require, however, to be stated, and the objections to a date for the Heb Conquest about 1480 BC (for a little later) to be considered, since the theory that the 15th Dynasty was the Pharaoh of the oppression, and Minepeth the Pharaoh of the Exodus is often said to be a secure result of monumental studies, whereas it is really not so, because the only monuments to be reconcilable with the Heb text, and the shorter with the Gr text, of Gen, without disturbing the approximate date for the Exodus which has been advocated above.

There is in fact no discrepancy between the actual results of modern research and the chronology of the OT. If the Exodus occurred under the Amorites against Egypt began, in the time of the Egyptian Yankhamo, and general choise resulted in Southern Pal. The Egypt garrison at Jerus (Amarna Tablets, Berlin, No. 102) was withdrawn in his time—about 1480 BC—and it is then (nos. 102-3-4-6, 199) that a fierce people coming from Seir, and called the 'Abari or Habari, are noticed by the Amorite king of Jerus as "destroying all the rulers of the country. They are not named in any of the other Amarna letters (the term gum-gaz, or "man of war, though once applying probably to them, being used of other warriors as well); and the name is geographical for they are called (no. 199) "people of the land of the 'Abari." The first sign has the guttural sounds 'A and B, and has not the sound A, which has been wrongly attributed to it, making the word to mean Kabiri, or "great ones." Nor can it be rendered "allies," for it is the name of a people, and quite another word is used for "allies" in this corresman and the God of the Amorites, and the God of Israel: this God is also called 'Abari and Habari by the Egyptians, and the Heb text seems to refer to this name when it speaks of the Abari as allies of Israel in the Conquest of Canaan. The Abari were thus a people who were friendly to Israel, and who were not hostile to Egypt.

The second argument is based on the account by Manetho of the expulsion of lepreus and unclean tribes from Egypt. Manetho was an Egyptian priest who wrote about 268 BC, and who evidently hated the Jews. His account only reaches us second statements hand through Jos (Cap. I, 14, 15, 29-31), this Heb author rejecting it as fabulous. Manetho apparently said that, after the Hyksos kings had ruled for 511 years, and had fortified Avaris (see ZOAN), they agreed with King Thummosis to leave Egypt, and went through the desert to Jerus, being afraid of the Assyrians (who had no power in Pal at this time). He continued to relate that, after Aramesse Miamon (Rameses II) had ruled 66 years, he was succeeded by an Ameno-phis whom Jos calls a "faithful priest"—and this is why since the name does not occur in the XIXth Dynasty. Apparently Minepeth was meant—

Nor is this the only evidence which destroys his theory; for Dr. Finlender Petrie (Contemp. 1896) has published an equally important text of the 5th year of Minepeth of Minepeth, from Thebes. A slab of black syenite, bearing this text, was re-used from a temple of Amenophis III. In it the Egyptians write of his conquest of the invaders who—whence elsewhere stated—attacked the Delta, and penetrated to Belbelis and Heliopolis. He says that "Sutekh [the Hittite god] has turned his back on their chief," the Hittites are quieted, Pha-tah's, and the popular views as to the date of the Exodus which he maintained.

though perhaps confused with Amonophis II—and he is said by Manetho to have sent the lepros people to quarries E. of the Nile, but to have allowed them later to live in Avaris where the shepherds had been. They were induced by Osarsip, a priest of Heliopolis, to remove the Egyptians, and this Osarsip Manetho identified with Moses. They then induced the shepherds who had been expelled by Thum-mosis to return from Jerus to Avaris, and Amonophis fled to Memphis and Ethiopia. His son Rhampses (apparently Rameses I is meant) was sent late to expel the shepherd and polluted people, whom he met at Pelusium and pursued into Syria. This story Jos discards, remarking: "I think therefore that I have made it sufficiently evident that Manetho, while he followed his ancients records, did not much mistake the truth of the history, but that, when he had recourse to fabulous stories without any certain author, he either forged them himself without any probability, or else gave credit to some men who spoke so out of their ill will to us"—a criticism sounder than that of Lepus, who prefers the libelous account of a prejudiced Egypt priest of the 3d cent. BC, identifying Moses with a renegade priest of Heliopolis named Osarsip, to the ancient Hebrew records in the Bible. A thread of truth underlay Manetho's stories, but it has nothing to do with the Exodus, and the details to be found on Egypt monuments do not agree with Manetho's tale. The

3. Relation of Man-

etho's Stories to the Exodus

Hyksos rulers were not expelled by Aryan invaders, as Avaris was taken about 1700 BC, and the Egyptians were not expelled from the Arabian chain. Manetha, ninth, about 1265 BC, was attacked by Aryan tribes from the N. who had nothing to do with Hyksos kings, being Lycians, Sardians and Cilicians. He repelled them, but they again attacked Rameses III (about 1200 BC), and were again driven to the N. No mention of Israel occurs in connection with any of these events.

The story of the leprous Jews was, however, repeated by other Gr writers. Herodotus (see Cap.

1, 32) says that Rameses, the son of Amonophis, defeated and expelled a people led by them against him, at Peleusim, by Tissithen and Pesipth, who he identified with Moses and Joseph. Lycurgus, who has the account of Denver, b. 34) speaks the tale, about 8 BC, saying that lepers were driven out of Egypt, and were led by Moses who founded Jerus, and "established by law all their wicked customs and practices," and again (Fr. of Bk. 40) that strangers in Egypt caused a plague by their impurity, and being driven out were led by Moses. Tacitus, about 100 AD (Hist, v.ii), believed the Jews to have fled from Crete to Libya and, being expelled from Egypt, to have been the "Captains of Jerusalem and Judah." Again he says (v. iii) that under Bocchoris (735 BC) there was sickness in Egypt, and that the infected being driven out were led by Moses, and reached the site of their temple on the 7th day.

No true critic of the present time is likely to prefer these distorted accounts of the Exodus, or any of the Gr and Rom cunnihmes leveled

5. Condition against the hated Jews, to the simple narration of the Exodus in the Bible.

The condition of the 9th year of Manetha were very different from those at the time of Moses. The invaders of Egypt reached Belbeis and Heliopolis (see Brugsch, Hist Egypt, II, 117), and Manetha states, in his text on the wall of the temple of Amon at Thebes, that he had to defend Heliopolis and Memphis against his foes from the E. The region was then "not cultivated but was left as pasture for cattle, on account of the foreigners. It lay waste from the time of our forefathers. The kings of upper Egypt resisted their foes, and the kings of lower Egypt were besieged in their cities by warriors, and had no mercenaries to oppose them. But Israel, as Manetha himself has told us now, was in Pal, not in Egypt, in this year of his reign; and far from desiring to expel Asiatic Egyptians, he was encouraged in his immigration into the region of Goemen (see Ptolema) laid away by the Aryan raid.

Objections to the view that the Exodus occurred

two centuries and a half before the reign of Manepth's first of these objections is due to the Statements believe that Ptolom was Herodept and and was a city founded by Rameses II; but this (see Ptolema) is too hazardous a conclusion to suffice for the entire neglect of OT chronology which it involves, since the site of this city is still very doubtful.

(2) Rameses II not named in Judges.—A second objection is made, that the OT shows complete ignorance of Egypt history if it makes Rameses II contemporary with Jgs because he is not named in that book. But OT references to foreign history are always very slight, while on the other hand it is quite probable that there are allusions, in this book, to the events which took place in the reigns of Rameses II and of Manetha. The Hebrews were then confined to the mountains (Jgs 1 19) and the Egyptians to the plains. No Pharaoh is mentioned by name in the OT till the time of Rhob am. In his 9th year Rameses II took various towns in Galilee including Salan be (Ex 23:31), Namir (N. of Tabor), Met- Anath, Anem and Dapur (Daberath at the foot of Tabor). The revolt of Barak probably occurred about the 25th year of Rameses II, and began at Tabor. In the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5 2), the first words (bi-ph'le'ru)^ are quoted by the LXX (Alex MS) "when the rulers ruled," may be more definitely translated "when the Pharaohs were powerful," esp. as Sisera—who commanded the Can. forces—bears a name probably Egypt (es-ra, or "servant of Ra"), and may have been a Pharaoh of the court of Jabin. So again when, about 1265 BC, Manetha says that "Israel is ruined, it has no seed," the date suggests the time of Gideon when wild tribes swarmed over the plains, "and destroyed the increase of the earth, till they came unto Gaza, and left no sustenance in Israel." (Jgs 6 4). The Midianites and Amalekites may have then joined the tribes from Asia Minor who, in the 5th year of Manetha, ruined the Hittites and invaded the Delta.

3. Some Hebrews were never in Egypt.—But another explanation of the presence of Israel in this year on the line of Manetha's pursuit of these tribes after their defeat has been suggested, namely, that some of the Hebrews never went to Egypt at all. This of course contradicts the account in the Pent (Ex 1 1-5; 12 41) where we read that all乐 Jacob's family (70 men) went down to Gothen, and that "all the hosts of the Lord" left Egypt at the Exodu; but it is supposed to be a passage (1 Ch 7 21) where we read of one of the sons of Ephraim "whom the men of Gath born in the land, swel, because they came down to take away their cattle." Ephraim however was born in Egypt (Gen 41 8), and his sons and "children of the third generation" (50 23) remained there. The meaning no doubt is that men of Gath raided Goshen; and there were probably many such raids by the inhabitants of Philistia during the times of the Hyksos kings, similar to those which occurred in the time of Minephthah and of Ramesses III. The objections made to the 17th year of Exodus cannot be repeated in the reign of Amenophis III, or in that of his predecessor Thothmes IV, thus appear to have little force; and the condition of Egypt before the 5th year of Minephthah was unlike that which would have existed at the time of the Exodus. The theory of Lepsius was a purely literary conjecture, and not based on any monumental records. It has been falsified by the evidence of monuments found during the last 20 years, and these are fully in accord with the history and chronology of the OT.

IV. The Numbers.—The historic difficulty with respect to the Exodus does not lie in the account of plagues natural to Egypt even now, 1. Colenso's nor in the crossing of the Red Sea, but of Crisis Critical in a single statement as to the numbers Large of Israel (Ex 12 37) the 8rv version as脚—strong men— with that the 7-20) reads 600,000 footmen;—strong men—with many children, and also many wanderers.

The women are not mentioned, and it has been supposed that this represents a host of 2,000,000 emigrants at least. The object was urged by Voltaire, and the consequences were elaborately calculated by Colenso. Even if 600,000 means the total population, "the heroes," or "strong men on foot" would be urged, having as numerous as the largest enemy army (120,000 men) employed in the conquest of Syria. With an army of more than half a million Moses would have held control over Egypt and Pal alike; and the emigrants, even in close column, could have stretched for 20 miles; the births would occur every ten minutes; and the assembly before Sinai would have been impossible.

It is also difficult to suppose, on ordinary calculations of the increase of population, that in 430 years (Ex 12 40), or in 215 years as 2. Increase given in the LXX, a tribe of 70 males of Popu-lation (Gen 46 26; Ex 1 5; 6 7-14) could have increased to 600,000, or even more. But on the other hand we are specially told (Ex 1 7—20) that the children of Israel "increased abundantly," and the comments of Dr. Orr (Problem of the OT, 1906, 363-5) on this question should be studied. A young and vigorous nation might multiply much faster than is usual in the East. Dr. Frieder Petrie has suggested that for "thousand" we should read "families"; but, though the word ("teleph") sometimes has that meaning (Jgs 6 15; 1 S 10 19; 23 25), it is in the sing., and not in the pl., in the passage in question (Ex 12 37).

It should not be forgotten that variations in numbers are very commonly found in various texts, VSS, and in passages of the OT. Thus for 3. Number in Palestine (1 S 13 5) the 8rv version reads 3,000, for the 30,000 chariots mentioned in the Heb and Gr; and the LXX (1 K 5 11) gives 20,000 for the 20 measures of oil noticed in the Heb text. The probable reason for these discrepancies may be found in the fact that the original documents may have used numeral signs—as did the Egyptians, Assyrians, Hititites and Phcenicians—instead of writing the words in full as they are given in the 8rv version. Some numeral signs—esp. of cuneiform—were apt to be misread, and the sign for "unity" could easily be confused with those denoting "sixty" (the Bab unit) and "an hundred"—if, in the latter case, a short stroke was added. In the opinion of the present writer the difficulty is due to a corruption of the original statement, which occurred during the course of some fifteen centuries, or more, of continued recopying; but the reader will no doubt form his own conclusions as to this question.

The general questions of the credibility of that history of the Exodus which is given us in the Pentateuch and of the approximate date of the event, have been treated above in the light of the most recent monumental information. No reference has yet been found in Egypt records to the presence of Israel in the Delta, though the Hebrews are noticed as present in Pal before the 5th year of Minephthah. The Pharaohs as a rule—like other kings—only recorded their victories, and no doubt reckoned Israel only as a tribe of those "hostile Sheasu" ("nomads") whom the Theban kings of the XVIIth Dynasty drove back into Asia. It would be natural that a disaster at the Red Sea should not be noticed in their proud records still extant on the temple walls in Egypt. See also WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

LITERATURE
[Note.—For the signs J (Jahwist), E (Elohist), P or PC (Priest Codex), R (Redactor) of art. GENESIS.]

1. Name of the chief contents of the first half, dealing with the departure of the children of Israel from Egypt. The Jews named the book after the first words: בֵּית אֵשֶׁד, בֵּית אֵשֶׁד ("and these are the names"), or sometimes after the first word בֵּית ("names"), a designation already known to Origen in the form οἶδαν, οἶδαν, Ouedsemblth.

In seven parts, after the Introduction (1 1–7), which furnishes the connection of the contents with Gen, the book treats of (1) the sufferings of Israel in Egypt, for which mere in General human help is insufficient (1 8–7 7), while Divine help through human mediatorialism is promised; (2) the power of Jeh, which, after a preparatory miracle, is glorified through the ten plagues inflicted on Pharaoh and which thus forces the exodus (7 8–13 16); (3) the love of Jeh for Israel, which exhibits itself in a most brilliant manner, in the guidance of the Israelites to Mt. Sinai, even when the people murmured (13 17–18 27); (4) making the Covenant at Mt. Sinai together with the revelation of the Ten Words (20 1 ff) and of the legal ordinances (21 1 ff); (5) the direction of the Israelites (21 1–24 18); (6) the direction of the Israelites (21 1–24 18); (5) the direction of the Israelites in the wilderness, in which Jeh is to dwell in the midst of His people (24 18–31 18); (6) the renewal of the Covenant on the basis of new demands after Israel's great apostasy in the worship of the Golden Calf, which seemed for the time being to make doubtful the realization of the promises mentioned in (5) above.
(32:1–35:3); (7) the building and erection of the Tabernacle of Revelation (or Tent of Meeting) and its dedication by the entrance of Jeh (36:4–40:38). As clearly as these seven parts are separated from one another, so clearly again are they most closely connected and constitute a certain progressive whole.

In the case of the last four, the separation is almost self-evident. The first three as separate parts are justified by the ten plagues standing between them, which naturally belong together and cause a division between that which precedes and that which follows. Thus in the first part we already find predicted the hardening of the heart of Pharaoh, the miracles of Jeh and the demonstrations of His power down to the slaying of the firstborn, found in the 2d part (cf. 2:25–7:7).

In part 3, the intimation of Pharaoh and the demonstration of the power of Jeh are further unfolded in the narrative of the catastrophe in the Red Sea (4:17). Further the directions given with reference to the Tabernacle (chs. 25–31 taken from P) presuppose the Decalogue (from E); cf. e.g. 25:16–21; 31:18; as again the 6th section (chs. 32ff) presupposes the 5th part, which had promised the continuous presence of God (of 32:14; 33:3.5ff JE). The first plagues and also the forty days in 34:25 J with those in 24:18 P as in 34:1.28 J and vs. 11–27 J refer back to the 4th part, viz. 20:1ff E; 21:1ff E; 24:7 JE (Decalogue; Books of the Covenant; Making the Covenant). In this way the last section presupposes the third, since the cloud in 40:34 P is referred to as something well known (cf. 13:21 J; 14:19 E and J, 24:7).

The entire contents of the Book of Ex are summarized in an excellent way in the word of God addressed to Moses at the close of the Decalogue (34:27). This recapitulates the making of the covenant: "Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be mine own possession from among all peoples: for all the earth is mine: and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and a holy nation" (Ex 19:4–6). Here reference is made to the powerful deeds of God done to the Egyptians, and the deeds of lovefulness done to Israel in the history of how He led them to Sinai, to the selection of Israel, and to the conditions attached to the making of the covenant, to God's love, which descendcded to meet the people, and to His holiness, which demands the obedience of His commandments; but there is also pointed out here the punishment for their transgression. The whole book is built on one word in the preface to the ten commandments: I am Jeh thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage" (20:2 E; cf. 29:45 P).

The events which are described in the Book of Ex show a certain contrast to those in Gen. In the first eleven chapters of this latter book we have the history of mankind; then the history of the other families, those of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob. In Ex we have following this the beginning of the history of the chosen people. Then there is also a period of time intervening between the two books. If Israel was 430 years in Egypt (cf. 12:40 P; also Gen 15:13 J; see III, 4 below), and if the oppression began during the long reign of the predeceessors of the Pharaoh, during whose reign the Israelites left the country (2:23–8), then, too, several centuries must have elapsed between the real beginning of the book (1:8ff), and the conclusion of Gen. Notwithstanding these differences, there yet exists the closest connection between the two books.

Ex 1:1–7 connects the history of the people as found in Ex with the family history of Gen, by narrating how the seventy descendants of Jacob that had migrated to Egypt (cf. Ex 1:5; Gen 46:27) had come to be the people of Israel, and that God, who offers Himself as a liberator to Moses and the people, is also the God of those fathers, of whom Gen spoke (cf. Ex 3:6 P, vs. 13:15 E, 15:1 R; 4:5 J; 6:3 P). Indeed, His covenant with the fathers and His promises to them are the reasons why He at all cares for Israel (2:24 P; 6:8 P; 33:1 JE), and when Moses intercedes for the sinning people, these effective motive over against God is found in the promises made to the patriarchs (32:13 JE).

As is the case with Gen, Ex stands in the closest connection also with the succeeding books of the Pentateuch. Israel is certainly in Ex 26:33 found to Lev 24, but is to come into the promised land (3:17 JE; 6:8 P; 23:20 ff JE; 32:34 J; 33 Iff JE; vs. 12ff J; 34:9ff J and D; cf. also the many ordinances of the Books of the Covenant, 21:1ff E; 34:11ff D and J). In the course of the departure from Sinai, continue the history in Ex. But the legislation in Lev also is a necessary continuation and supplement of the Book of Ex. The 12th book of the Pentateuch is divided into three parts, which, according to their connection, are the Book of Leviticus (1–27), the Book of Numbers (28–36), and the Book of Deuteronomy (37–34). The history of the Israelitish people, which commences with the entrance into Canaan, is continued in the Books of the Deuteronomy, which begin with Nu 11:1ff P and JE with the story of the departure from Sinai, and the history of the Promised Land (34:1ff).

Israel does not come into the Promised Land with his own sword, as the command of God promised (Gen 15:13; 17:1); a strange, but perhaps necessary thing, for Israel has no enemies that he can fight, but must conquer, in the Promised Land. The history of the promulgation of the Decalogue is continued in Ex 34:27, which becomes the basis of the covenant made to Moses on Mount Sinai. The Sinai covenant is completed in Nu 10:10ff P and JE; the latter part of Ex 34:27 is repeated in Nu 10:10ff P and JE. The directions given in regard to the consecration of the priests (Ex 29) are carried out in Lev 8ff. The conditions to which the proclamation of the Ark of the Covenant is to be submitted is the offering of sacrifices, a law of sacrifices such as we find in Lev 1–7. The directions given in regard to the consecration of the priests (Ex 29) are carried out in Lev 8ff. The conditions to which the Ark of the Covenant is to be submitted are the offering of sacrifices, a law of sacrifices such as we find in Lev 1–7.

The more complete enlargement in reference to the shebura mentioned in 26:33 found in Lev 24, 6–9; and even the repetitions in references to the candlesticks (Ex 25:31ff; Lev 24:1–4; Nu 8:1–4), as also the tâmah (‘continuous’) sacrifices (cf. Nu 28:3–8 with Ex 29:8–42), point to a certain connection between Ex and Lev. The history of the Ark is described also in the Books of the Kings. How close the connection between Dt and Ex is, both in regard to the historical narrativie and also to their legal portions (cf. the Decalogue and the Books of the Covenant), can only be mentioned at this place.

2. Religion of the Israelites in Ex and Deut. When we remember the importance which the exodus out of Egypt and the making of the covenant had for the people of Israel, and that these events signaled the birth of the chosen people and the establishment of theocracy, then we shall understand why the echo of the events recorded in Ex is found throughout later lit., viz. in the historical books, in the prophets, in the psalms, and in the LXX, as greatest events in the history of the people, and at the same time as the promising type of future and greater deliverances. But as in the beginning of the family history the importance of this family for the whole earth is clearly announced (Gen 12:1–3), the same is the case here too at the beginning of the history of the nation, perhaps already in the expression "kingdom of priests" (Ex 19:6), since the idea of a priesthood includes that of the transmission of salvation to others; and certainly in the conception 'first-born son of Jeh' (4:22), since this presupposes other nations as children born later.

The passages quoted above are already links connecting this book with Christianity, in the idea of a general priesthood, of salvation and of some God. We have already mentioned the possibility of mentioning a few specially significant features from among the mass of such relationships to Chris-tiety. How great a significance the Decalogue, in which the law is so intimately connected with what is commonly termed Jewish national, as e.g. in the 5. Connect- in the interpretation of Christ in Mt with Christianity. But in Mt 6:17ff Jesus has vindi- Christianity. For, since, had been published, but to be assigned to the individual, while Paul, on the other hand, esp. in Rom, Gal and Col, emphasizes the role of the Holy Spirit in the life of the believer. But a everlast- Christ, and as such is placed in the way of mankind. tion of the Mosaic period to that of the patriarchs and of the works of the law to faith, while in 2 Cor 3:16ff Jesus is exalted over the old dispensation. (cf Ex 34)—an idea which in reference to the individual is more clearly stated in the Ep. of the New Covenant, which is here on this subject also the arts. Leviticus and the Day of Atonement. Then too, the Passover lamb was a type of Jesus Christ (cf. e.g. 1 Cor 5:7; Jn 19:36; 1 Pet 1:9). In Ex 12 the Passover rite and the establishment of the New Covenant. In the permanent dwelling of God in the midst of His people in the pillar of fire and in the Tabernacle there is typified His dwelling among mankind in Christ Jesus (Jn 1:14) and also the indwelling of the Holy Ghost in the Christian congregation (1 Pet 2:5; Eph 4:12) and in the individual Christian (1 Cor 3:16; 6:19; 2 Cor 3:17; 12:23ff). The OT is specially rich in thoughts suggested by the exodus out of Egypt, which is, together with other events recorded in the Old Testament, the theme of the books of the former prophetic writings. In Ex especially the names of the three angels who stand, in the Hebrew text, at the door of the tabernacle (Ex 40:26ff). While the idea is found in Gen 9:4 that the manna was originally in the Ark of the Covenant, it is perhaps not altogether excluded by Ex 16:33; and the number 430 years, found in Gal 3:17, probably agrees with Ex 12:40ff, as far as the whole of the patriarchal period should be regarded as a unit (cf. on the reading of the LXX in Ex 12:40.41, III, 4 below).

II. Structure of the Book according to the Scriptures and according to Modern Analyses.—In the following section (a) serves for the understanding of the Bib. text; (b) is devoted to the discussion and criticism of the separation into sources.

1. In we are dealing with a rounded-off General structure. Since, indeed, a number of passages have been already agreed upon by the general account of the contents given in 1, 2 above, that in the Book of Ex the conviction must have been awakened already by the general account of the contents given in 1, 2 above, in the Book of Ex the conviction must have been awakened already by the general account of the contents given in 1, 2 above, that in the Book of Ex the conviction must have been awakened already by the general account of the contents given in 1, 2 above, that in the Book of Ex the conviction must have been awakened already by the general account of the contents given in 1, 2 above, that in the Book of Ex the conviction must have been awakened already by the general account of the contents given in 1, 2 above. Here already we must note that within the narrative of the miracles and the plagues at first there is mention made only of the hardening by Pharaoh himself (7:13ff); ver 14ff; ver 22ff; 8:11ff; 8:15ff; ver 28ff; 9:7ff, i.e. seven times) before a single word is said that God begins the hardening; and this latter kind of hardening thereupon alone concludes the whole tragedy (14.45ff; 17.9ff). Ten months cover the time from the arrival at Sinai (19.2ff) to the setting up of the sacred dwelling-place of God (40.1ff). Since, further, exactly three months of this time are employed in 19.10ff; 24.3ff; 16ff (ten days); 24.15ff (40 days); 34.29 (40 days), there remain for the building of the tabernacle exactly seven months. (b) What has been said does anything but speak in favor of the customary division of Ex into different sources. It is generally accepted that the three sources found in Gen are also to be found in this book; in addition to which a fourth source is advanced in Ex 13:3ff, of a Deuteronomic character. It is true and is acknowledged that the advocates of this hypothesis have more difficulties to overcome in Ex than in Gen, in which latter book too, however, there are insufficient grounds for accepting this view, as is shown in the art. Genesis. Beginning with Ex 6 the chief marks of such a separation of sources falls away as far as P and J are concerned, namely, the different uses of the names of God, Elohim and Yahweh. For, only by considering the typology of the documentary theory, P also makes use of the name Jeh from this chapter on; E, too, does the same from Ex 13:3ff on, only that, for a reason not understood, occasionally the word Elohim is still used by E (cf. 17:17ff). In the number of passages using the name Elohim are unhesitatingly ascribed by the critics to J, this difference in the use of the name of God utterly fail to establish a difference of sources. To this is to be added, that J and E are at this place closely interwoven; that, while the attempt is constantly being made to separate these two sources, no generally accepted results have been reached and many openly acknowledge the impossibility of such a separation, or admit that it can be effected only to a very limited extent. Peculiarities which are regarded as characteristic of the different sources, such as the sin of Aaron in J, the staff of Moses in E, Sinai in J and P, Horeb in E, the dwelling of the Israelites in Goshen in J, but according to E their living in the midst of the Egyptians, and others, come to nought in view of the uniform text in the passages considered. This has been proved most clearly, e.g. by Kerenyi in his Altes Testamentliche Studien, I, 23ff. Our book, however, is not concerned with many of these passages. Narratives of a similar character, like the two stories in which Moses is described as striking the rock to produce water (Ex 17:1ff; Nu 20:1ff), are not duplicates, but are different events. Of the different localities in Ex 17:7 and Nu 20, 1 also, as also the improbability that 1ff JE (Taborah); vs 4ff JE (Graves of Luss); 14ff P and JE (Spies). Most of these cases are accordingly reported in the Book of Ex, but in such manner that in this particular a clearly marked progress can be noticed, as J is regarded in a certain sense above here on He does so with constantly increasing severity, while down to Ex 32 grace alone prevails, and in this particular, previous to Ex 32, there is found nothing but a warn-

Israel would without cause in the first passage have put into permanent form the story of its shame, and then in the latter there would have been an uncertainty as to the importance of this locality for the career of Moses; and finally, we must notice the difficulty created by the traditional story which, "waters of Meribah of Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin," in Nu 27 12–14; Dt 32 51 (cf Ex 47 19; 48 28). Then, too, these occurrences, if we accept the division into J and E at this place, are not traceable to a single event, since both sources would share in both narratives. The same condition of affairs is found in Ex 16 in so far as JE comes into consideration, and in Ex 18 in comparison with Nu 11. In the case of Nu 11 there is express reference made to a former narrative by the word "again," and in the second case all the details in their differences point to different occurrences. Concerning other so-called duplicates in Ex, see later in this article.

But the acceptance of P in contradiction to the text of JE does also not lead to tangible results, notwithstanding that there exists a general agreement with regard to the portions credited to P. Not taking into consideration certain that are peculiar, the following sections are attributed to P: 7 13–16; 6 2–9; 10 16–28 (6 28–30 R); 7 19.20.21.22; 8 1–3.11–15; 9 8–12; 12 1–20.28.37a.40–50; 13 1–2.20; 14 1–4. 8–10.15–18.21a.22–23.29; 16 1–3.9–14.15–18.21– 26.31–32.34a.35; 17 1e; 19 1a.2b; 24 15–31.17; 34 29–40 38. It is claimed that in the Book of Genesis these sources constitute the backbone of the whole book; but this is not claimed for Ex. The sections ascribed to P constitute in this place, too, anything but an unbroken story. In both language and substance they are, to a certain extent, closely connected with the parts ascribed to JE, and in part they are indispensable for the connection whence they have been taken (cf for details below). It is absolutely impossible to separate on purely philological grounds in the purely narrative portions in Ex the portions belonging to P. That genealogies like 6 14 ff, or chronological notices like 12 40.41.51; 16 1; 19 1, or directions for the cultus like 12; 26 ff have their own peculiar forms, is justified by self-evident reasons; but this does not result from the oneness of the authors. It is the result of the peculiar matter found in each case. We must yet note that the passages attributed to P would in part contain views which could not be harmonized with the theological ideas ascribed to JE, which are to include an extreme transcendental conception of God; thus in 16 10 the majesty of Jehovah suddenly appears to the congregation, and in 40 34 ff this majesty takes possession of the newly erected dwelling. In 8 19 mention is made of the finger of God, and in 7 1 Moses is to be as God to Pharaoh. In Ex 12 the existence of the Egyptian gods is presupposed and the heathen sorcerers are able to act in competition with Moses and Aaron for a while; 7 11.12.22; 8 3 P also describes the passage over the Red Sea, which account of the handling of the blood in 12 7 cannot be regarded in any other light than as a sacrifice in the house, and in Nu 9 7.13, this act is expressly called a korban Jahuwe ('sacrifice of Jehovah'). Cf also the commands in Ex 15 10.14.18. But more than anything else, what has been said under (a) above goes to show that all those sources have been united in a way that characterizes the work of a systematic writer, and declares against any view that would maintain that these sources have been mechanically placed side by side and inserted into each other.

What has here been outlined for the whole book in general must now be applied to the different parts in particular.

(a) 1 8–7 7: (a) Everything that is narrated in this section, which in so worthy a manner introduces the whole book, is written from a standpoint of the Egypt oppression, from which human help could give no deliverance, but from which the mighty power of God has offered this deliverance. It is a situation which demands faith (4 31). This section naturally falls into ten pericopes, of which in each instance two are still more closely connected.

Nos. 3–4 (1 6.11–12—22), namely, the birth and youth of Moses stand in contrast. The child seems to be doomed, but God provides for its deliverance. Moses, when grown to manhood, tries to render vigorous assistance to his people through his own strength, but he is compelled to flee into a far-off country. Nos. 5–6 (2 23–4 17; 4 18–31) report the fact that also in the reign of a new Pharaoh the oppression does not cease, and that this causes God to interfere, which in 2 23–25 is expressed in a metaphor: the increasing signs, 2 26–28; and again leads to the revelation in the burning bush (3 1ff). And at the same time the narrative shows how little self-confidence Moses still had (three signs, a heavy tongue, direct refusal). The sixth pericope and the beginning of the last four, describes, from an external viewpoint, the return of Moses to Midian, and his journey from there to Egypt. Here, too, mention is made of the troubles caused by Pharaoh, which God must remove through His power. This deliverance is not at all described by Israel, since not even any son in a family had up to this time been circumcised. On the other hand, everything here is what can be expected. Those who sought the life of Moses had died; the meeting with Aaron at the Mount of the Lord; in Egypt the faith of the people. In an effective way the conclusion (4 31) returns to the point where the two companion narratives (2 24 f) begin. After this point, constituting the center and the chief point in the introductory section, now begins Nos. 5–7, namely, everything seems to have become doubtful. Pharaoh refuses to receive Moses and Aaron; the oppression increases; dissatisfaction in Israel appears; Moses despairs; even the new revelations of God, with their emphasis on fidelity, which is to unfold Jehovah's name in full, are not able to overcome the lack of courage on the part of the people and of Moses. Nos. 9–10, introduced by 6 13 (6 14–27 and 6 28–7 7), show that after Moses and Aaron have already been mentioned together in 4 14.27 ff; 5 1 ff, and after it has become clear how little they are able of themselves to accomplish anything, they are now here, as it were, for the first time, before the curtain is raised, introduced as those who in the following dramas are to be the mediators of God's will (cf the concluding verses of both pericopes, 6 27; 7 7), and they receive directions for their common mission, just at that moment when, humanly speaking, everything is as unfavorable as possible.

(b) The unity of thought here demonstrated is in this case too the protecting wall against the flood-tide of the documentary theory. For this theory involves many difficulties. In 4 14 there was already some oppression by P, but the motive for this can be found only in the preceding verse, whereas in the same verse; 2 24 speaks of "new covenant with God with Isaac, concerning which promise is to be fulfilled nothing in the Book of Genesis, as in the latter book a reference to this matter is found only in 26 2–3 R; 26 24 J. In 2 2 ff Moses and Aaron are mentioned; but as the text of Exodus, our P was not at all derived from this source, nor to these men are. According to 7 1 ff Aaron is to be the speaker for Moses before Pharaoh. But according to P neither...
Moses nor Aaron speaks a single word. The omissions that are found by critics in documents J and E—which, if the Two Views were correct, are two sets of documentation claimed for the separation that are very unsettled—we here pass over without comment.

On the critical theory, the narratives of P, in the Book of Ex, as also in Gen, would have discarded many of the statements from a religious or characteristic point of view. The source of 86 tells the story of the plague of locusts (cf. 23: 6; 2: 27; 7: 1ff.), and in both form and contents would be assigned to the rest of this section 1 9:10 ff.; for the final JE, 1 20: 7; 11 P; and to a great extent expressions similar to these are here found and in part refer to these. The material must be said concerning JE in its relation to 9: 23 ff.; 6 6ff. (si'bbah) P in its relation to 1 11 JE; 1 15 ff. (cf. 12 20). JE; 1 9: 9 f. for 'dry land', makes use of the term ha-yabbashah, which in Gen 1 9 f. and Ex 14 16 is ascribed to P, and a form of this term is used for this purpose by J in Gen 1 22. In reference to 7 1P of 4 14 E (?). In reference to the hardening of Pharaoh, which is found in all the sources (7 10 ff.); then the use of the references to the miracles, and their purpose of making Yahweh known to the Egyptians (7 3–5 P) see the following paragraphs. The four generations mentioned in 14 1 f. find their origin Gen 15 16 J (cf. 46 5 f.); and the sons of Aaron mentioned in 21 ff. Nadab and Abihu, are mentioned also in the text of 24 9. P, ascribed to JE, although except in Lev 10 P, their names are not found elsewhere in the Pent. In reference to the repetitions, it must be said that 1 13 P is either the continuation (in so far as the Israelites instead of being compulsory laborers became slaves), or is a concluding summary, such as is found frequently. The new repetition, as found in the midst of ch 3 JE, finds its psychological and historical motive in the account of the failure described in 5 ff. JE, and in the discouragement of Moses and Aaron arising therefore. In the same way the renewed mention by Moses of his different service (cf. 12 2 ff.; cf. with the use of 'J E (?)) is a very characteristic of human ways, and this again necce- sitates the twofold consideration of this matter by God (cf. E (?); concerning the names of God, see GENESIS: GOD, NAMES OF).

One difficulty, which is also not made clear by the proposed division of sources, is found in the name of the father-in-law of Moses; since according to 2 18 J, this name is performed to J, it is Jehet (4 18 E in the form 'Jethe'); in Nu 10 29 JE is called Jethro the father-in-law (AK). Raphel for all of these passages are ascribed to J or E. It is probable that the name Jethro is a title ('Excellency') and as for the rest, in Nu 10 29 Jethro probably does not mean father-in-law but brother-in-law (cf. Is 1 16; 4 11); or in 2 18 we find father and in 2 21 daughter in the place of grandfather and granddaughter: otherwise we should be compelled to accept different traditions, by which view, however, the Mosaic authorship of Ex would be made impossible (cf. IV, below).

(2) 7 8–13 16: (a) This section is separated as a matter of course from the rest by the typical number of ten plagues. It is introduced by the transformation of the rod into a serpent in the presence of Aaron (3 7). The presence of these ten plagues on the ground of the accidental combination of sources, is from the very outset a precarious undertaking. To this must be added the following reasons that indicate a literary editor: the annihilated plagues are introduced by the same formula (7 12 JE; 8 1 J; ver 12 P; ver 16 J; ver 20 JE; 9 1 E; ver 8 P; ver 13 JE; 10 1.2 JE; ver 21 E; 11 1 E), and in connection with each plague the hardening of the heart of Pharaoh is mentioned (cf. 10a above); of 7 22 P; 8 11 J; ver 15 P; ver 28 JE; 9 7 E; ver 12 P; ver 34 JE; ver 35 JE; 10 1 R; ver 20 JE; ver 27 E; 11 10 R; 13 15 D. As is the case in the first section, we find here too in each instance two plagues mentioned, viz. the 1st plague, already externally united by the double address of Jeh (cf. 14 14 JE; ver 19 P and 27 6 J; 8 1 P), but also by the methods of punishment that are related to each other (water changed to blood and frogs); and the 2nd plague (plague of the Nile and the beyond the river). In 3 4f5 we have to deal with insects (stinging flies and dung flies); in 5 6 with a kind of pest (pest among cattle, and toads); 7 8 are again formally joined by the repetition of the command of Jex to Moses in 9 12 29 JE and 10 1.2 JE, as also by the fulness of the account the two show and their similarity, in both also use being made of the staff (9 23f J; 10 13JJE), in the repetition of the emphasis put on the remarkable character of the plague (9 18.24; 10 6 14 JE). By both plagues vegetation is destroyed; and in the plague of locusts, speech is also to the hole to the 10 5. 12 15). In the case of 9 4–10, the darkness constitutes a connecting link (cf. 10 21 E; 11 4 J; 12 12 P; 12 30.31 JE). By the side of the occasional rhythm formed of two members there is also one formed of three members (after the manner of a measure in a measure of two beats). In the case of the first group of three plagues, two are announced beforehand (thus 1 JEP 1 2 J; 4 JEP 3 J; 7 JE 8–9 E; 10 Ed over against 5 3 6 P and 9 E); the first of each group of three plagues, as 4 7, is to be announced by Moses on the following morning to Pharaoh (7 15; 8 20; 9 13 JE). Also in regard to the impression caused by the plagues a distinct progress can be noticed, in this too, that the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth plague, as above, the Egyptian sorcerers are active only down to the second plague, while in the third or fourth in 12 37a we would have F, as when the parts belonging to F have been eliminated, the other sources too would contain this omission in 12 31 f.; mostly JE; ver 37b E; 13 3 f. D. In the same way the announcement of a large number of miracles (7 3 P; 11 9 R) is too comprehensive, if these verses refer only to the narratives found in P. In addition, there is a remarkable similarity found in all of the narratives of P with those parts which are ascribed to JE; cf. the first miracle in 7 8 ff with 4 2 f J; ver 17 E. In P, too, as is the case with JE, it is stated that the purpose of the miracle is, that Pharaoh, or the Egyptians, or Israel, are to recognize that Jeh is God and the Lord of the Hebrews, and that this effect (7 5 P; ver 17 JE; 8 10 R; ver 22; 9 14; 29.30 JE; 10 2 R; 11 7 J; cf. from the next section, 14 4 P; ver 18 P, which at the same time is also the fundamental thought that forms the connecting link of the whole section). The position of 11 1–3 E between 10 28.29 E and 11 8 J constitutes a difficulty, because in the last-mentioned passages Moses is represented as standing continuously before Pharaoh. The announcement made by Jeh to Moses, that one more plague is to come, and that the Israelites should borrow articles of value from the Egyptians, must in reality have been made before, but for good reasons it is mentioned for the first time at this place, in order to explain the absence of Moses from this scene. He must appear again before Pharaoh (10 29). But the fact that according to 12 31 JE Pharaoh does in reality once more cause Moses and Aaron to be called, can readily be explained on the ground of the events that follow. In conclusion:

The structure of chs 12 f. contains nothing that could not have been written by one and the same author. Only Moses naturally did not at once communicate (12 21 f.) to the leading men of Israel the command given in 12 15 f. concerning the unleavened bread, which command had been given for later generations; and not until 13 3 f. is this command mentioned in connection with the order given to the people in the meantime concerning the firstborn (13 1 f.). The further fact, that the story of the exodus reaches a preliminary conclusion in 12 42 before the details of the Passover (vs 3 ff) have been given, is in itself justifiable. As far as contents are concerned, everything in chs 12 f., namely, the leading events of the exodus, is to be found in the firstborn, and orders pertaining thereto, that the month of the exodus is to be regarded as the first month, etc., are closely connected with the Passover and the 10th plague. Because the latter had to be demonstrated before the other plagues, we find already in 11 9.10, after the announcement of this plague and its results, a comprehensive notice concerning all the miracles through which Jeh demonstrated how He, amid great manifestations of power (7 4 P) and with a mighty hand (6 1 JHS), led His people forth.

(3) 13 17–18 27: (a) This section finds its connecting thought in the emphasis placed on the love of Jeh, on His readiness to help, and His long-suffering in the leading of His at times murmuring people on the road to and as far as Sinai. This section covers two months. What is narrated, beginning with ch 16 1, transpires even within a single two weeks (cf ch 19 1). No. 1 (13 17–25), describes the journey to Etham (out of love God does not lead the people the direct way, since He fears that they will become unfaithful in the event of a battle; Joseph's bones are taken along, since God now really is taking care of His people [cf Gen 60 24.26]; Jeh's friendly presence is not within the pill. ver 2 (14 1–31) contains the passage through the Red Sea (Jeh the helper; cf vs 10.15; 13.14.30.21.24.26 f.31, notwithstanding the murmuring of Israel, vs 11 f.). No. 3 (15 1 f.) contains the thanksgiving hymn of Moses for Jeh's help, with which a portion of which fact is stated in 15.5 f.11.16.fo. No. 4 (15 20 f.) contains Miriam's responsorium. No. 5 (15 22–27) treatis of Marah and Elim (Jeh provest Himself to be Israel's helper and physician [vs 25 f] notwithstanding the murmuring of Israel [ver 24]). No. 6 introduces the last five paragraphs, with a description of the time (16 1–36), and describes the miraculous feeding with manna and quails. (The murmuring is particularly emphasized in vs 2.7–9.12. Israel also gathers more than they have been directed to do [vs 15 f]; incapable of something which the Israelites could not have been able to do [vs 19 f]; collects some on the Sabbath [ver 27]; Jeh, who in vs 6–12 alone is mentioned in rapid succession no fewer than ten times, at first does not even utter a word of reproach, and when the Sabbath has been violated He does nothing more than reprove.) No. 7 (17 1–7) reports the help of Jeh (ver 4) at the Waters of Contention (Strife). He even appears on the rock (ver 6), notwithstanding the murmuring (vs 2–4.7). No. 8 (17 8–16) describes the victory over Amalekites, which furnished the occasion for the erection of the memorial altar, called 'Jeh-my-Banner.' Possibly in this connection Joshua ("Jeh helps") was changed from Hosea (Nu 13 16). Cf. Hengstenberg, Authentif des Pentateuches, 38. 39. 40. 41 ff. Passover is a constantly changing variety of expressions that emphasis is laid on the impression which the deeds of God in connection with Israel make on Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, while he was visiting the latter (vs 14–28). Effectively is also the mention made of the symbolic names of the sons of Moses (Gershom, "I have been a sojourner in a foreign land"; and Eliezer, "The God of my father was my help, and delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh" [vs 3 f]). Further, the name Mount of God (ver 5; cf ver 12) probably is a reminder of the fulfilment of 3 12. No. 10 (18 13–17) shows how God helps Moses (of ver 19) through the advise of Jethro to appoint judges. In this part, too, 13 17–18 27, we have ten sections, which can easily be arranged in groups of two and thus.

Nos. 1 + 2 are connected by their analogous beginnings (13 17,18 RES; 14 1.2 P) and by the cloud of fire (13 21 f JH; 14 10.24); nos. 3 + 4 by the response and unleavened bread, vs 5–6, the feeling of hunger and thirst are connected in thought, by their reference to the ordinances of Jeh (16 25 D; 16 4 JE7; ver 28 R); nos. 7 + 8 by the use made of Moses' staff (16 9.13 JEH; 16 10) as the ketheth's person, and the close connection of their contents in point of time (18 13). Further, the Bib. text of this place is clearly presupposed in the list of stations, expressly stated to have been prepared at the command of Moses (Nu 33). This list, as is acknowledged on all sides, has the characteristics of P; and it takes into consideration not only the portions ascribed to this source, but also the text of JE. Cf 33 9 (Marah and Elim) with Ex 15 22–27, and Nu 33 14 (lack of water in Rephidim) with Ex 17 1 f.

(b) Over against the analysis into different sources the following data in detail can also be advanced. In P the last demonstration of the power of Jeh over Pharaoh would be indeed endangered in 14 4.15 f.52 a, but afterward would not be related. In ch 16 1 we cannot find in P, unless we bring in also 15 27 from JE, how Israel came to be in Elim. On the other hand, in 16 4 f. (JE?) the promise of bread from heaven is groundless without the preceding verses, shown in the passage from the pillar (14 1–31) containing the passage through the Red Sea (Jeh the helper; cf vs 10.15; 13.14.30.21.24.26 f.31, notwithstanding the murmuring of Israel, vs 11 f.).
How entirely data taken from the language utterly fall here in establishing the separation of sources we see from the fact that in Ex. the distribution of the descents of Israel is divided between P and E, whereas in E and J each becomes a matter of doubt, and also in Ex. 16 a harmony of view has not been gained as to whether only P, or in addition also J, E, or JE, have contributed to the text. The hymn found in Ex. 15:1 f., which certainly is an old composition, presupposes passages which are assigned to different sources, and in this way speaks for the unity of the text. Cf. 15 2 with 14 30 J; ver. 13 JE (?); 15 3 with 14 14 JE (?); ver. 25 J; ver. 46 with 14 9 P; ver. 49 with 14 11 JE (?); ver. 52 J; ver. 53 JE; ver. 54 P; ver. 55 J.

On the other hand, 14 19a and b cannot be utilized in favor of a division of sources E and J; but rather the analogous structure of this passage presupposes the same author, and there is only indicated what elsewhere is always a presupposition, namely, that God Himself has taken His abode somewhere in the cloud of fire (13 21.22 JE; 14 24 J; cf. 40 34ff P). Just as little are the two commands found in 14 16 to be divided between P and J, one statement of E (or of J does, and the other what J does, since both rather belong together (cf. 9 22 f. with 33; 10 13). At first glance 16 6 does not appear to be in its proper place, as Moses and Aaron in vs. 6.7 have already told Israel what only in vs. 8 can be found. But the direction of Jeh and hisinion to Moses is consistent. But these very verses are in harmony with the character of the whole section (cf. under a above), since it is here stated that under all circumstances Israel is to be convinced of this truth, that His presence is to be CONVINCED. Jeh is heard their murmuring. In addition, the appearance of Jeh in vs. 10 is clearly announced by ver. 7. Accordingly, vs. 9 ff. serve only to confirm and strengthen what is found in vs. 6 ff. The fact that not until in 18 2 JE Jethro brings the wife and the sons of Moses, while the latter himself according to 4 20 J had taken them along when he joined Israel, finds a satisfactory explanation in 18 26. He sent them back doubtless because of the conduct of Zipporah on the occasion of the circumcision of her son (4 25 J). The fact that Jethro comes to Moses at the Mount of God (18 5 JE) while the latter does not arrive at Mt. Sinai until 19 1 f., is no contradiction; for by the Mount of God is meant the place of God's being, in which place, which has already reached according to 17 6 JE, but not Mt. Sinai is a single mountain. The special legal ordinances and decisions mentioned in 18 20 J before the giving of the law (19 ff.) in the perfect harmony with 15 25 D; 16 4 JE (?); ver. 28 R.

(4) 19 1 24 18a: (a) This fourth section contains the conclusion of the covenant at Mt. Sinai (cf. 19 5 f. at beginning; 24 7.8 JE toward the end). The contents cover a period of ten days (cf. 19 10.11.16; 24 3.4 JE; ver. 16 P). The text of this section can again be divided into ten pericopes. After the introduction (19 1 8), which contains a cardinal feature (cf. Ex. 19 1 2 above), nos. 1 and 2 (19 9 19.20 25) report the preparation for the conclusion of the Covenant. No. 2 in ver. 23 refers expressly to no. 1, but is distinguished from no. 1 through the new addition in ver 20 after ver. 18, as also through the express amplified application of the ordinances referring to purifications and the restriction of the prohibition to the priests (cf. vs. 22 21.24 with vs. 10.12). Nos. 3 4 (20 1 17; 18 26) contain the Decalogue and the directions for the cultus, together with a description of the importance of the revelation of the law. Nos. 5 6 (21 1 23 13 expressly circumscribed by a sub-section, 23 14 19) contain legal ordinances and further directions for the cultus. Nos. 3 6 accord-at the conclusion of which he receives the two tables of the law (31. 18), God converses with him seven times (25 1; 30 11.17; 22; 34; 31. 12). No. 1 (25 1–30 10) contains directions in reference to the building of the Tabernacle, and laws for the priests serving in it. Nos. 2–6 bring a number of different communications. No. 2 (30 11–16), individual tax; no. 3 (30 17–21), copper-washing vessels; no. 4 (30 22–33), oil for anointing; no. 5 (30 34–38), incease; no. 6 (31 1–11), the calling of Bezalel and Aholiah to be the master builders; additionally and in conclusion, no. 7 (31 12–17) contains the last portions of the speech, which is probably not accidental that the Sabbath idea is touched on at 7 t, namely, in addition to the present passage, also in (a) 16. 5 JE (?); vs 23–28 P+R; (b) 20. 8–11 E; (c) 25 10–12 E; (d) 24 16 E; (e) 34 21 J; (f) 35 1–3 P; and that as is the case in this present passage, other passages too, such as 34 16 P; 35 1–3 P, conclude with a main section, and 22 10–22 a subordinate section, with this reference.

The first more complete pericope itself (25 1–30 10) is considered to date from the Exile, we cannot at this place enter into details in reference to the typical numbers found so often in the measurements of the Tabernacle, but can refer only to the cubical form of the Holy of Holies on the basis of 10 cubits, viz. (1) contributions of the people; (2) the holy ark (25 10–22); (3) table of shewbread (25 23–30); (4) golden candlesticks (25 31–40); (5) tabernacle (26 1–37) in which, at the same time, the articles mentioned from 2 to 4 are placed (vs 35 E); (6) altar for burnt-sacrifices (27 1–8); (7) court of the holy ark (27 9–19) in which this altar stood (cf 40 29–33); (8) oil for the lights (27 20–21); (9) sacred garments for the priests (28 1–43); (10) consecration of priests (29 1–37); (11) the burnt sacrifices (29 38–46); (12) incense or cense (30 1–10), included in 8 to 12 are combined into a contrast to the five in 1 to 7 by their express reference to the priests (cf in addition to 9 +10 also 27 21; 29 44; 30 7 1.10). With the incense altar, which was of great importance, and of equal importance with the great altar on the Day of Atonement (30 10), this section closes (cf. 5).

Thus we shall under all circumstances be better to search for an explanation for putting oil in the place of the candlesticks and of the incense altar, at first sessions, than in the case of every difficulty to appeal to a redactor’s working without system or order. However, the entire portion 24 18–31 18 finds its explanation in the promise of 25 8 that Jeh will dwell in the midst of Israel (cf 29 45 f.). He is enthroned on the ark, in which the accusing law as the expression of the Divine will is deposited (for this reason called הָּלָּדְתָּד; 25 16.21; 26 33.34), but above the atonement lid, the kapparah, at which on the Day of Atonement, the atonement ceremony is carried out (cf 25 17–22; Lev 16; see DAY OF ATONEMENT).

(5) This whole section, with the exception of 31. 18 E (?) is ascribed to P, although at this place, though without good reasons, different strata are distinguished. In regard to the conclusion claimed to exist in the different persons to be anointed (high priest, or all the priests; cf 29 7 over against 30 41; see Levurriz). Also the duplicates of the lāṭāḥ sacrifice and of the candlesticks (cf. 1. 3, above) are not at all the decisive fact for the differences of places within the parts treating of the priests, providing it can be shown that each passage stands where it belongs. With regard to the Levurriz. In addition of passages like Mk 10 35–16 25; 10 22–4; 13. 8 14 18–15 5; 5 18–20 E, but as assigning certain passages to P in general is concerned, it is self-evident that ordinances referring to the cultus make use of what pertains to the cultus, without this fact justifying any conclusion as to a particular author or group of authors. On the other hand, it could not at all be understood how P could so often call the Decalogue הָּלָּדְתָּד, without having contained this all-important law itself (cf 25 16.21 f.; 36 33 f.; 34 29; 38 21, etc.). On the other hand, as is well known, the fourth commandment (Ex 20 11) goes back to Gen 2 3, that is, to P; also 23 15 to 12 20.

(6) 32 1–35 3: (a) God’s promise to dwell in the midst of Israel, the turning-point in the fifth section, seems to have become a matter of doubt, through the apostasy of Israel, but is nevertheless realized in consequence of the intercession of Moses and of the grace of God, which, next to His primitive holiness, is emphasized very strongly. This entire sixth section is to be understood from this standpoint. As was the case in the Sinner’s Song, because the Levites the curse which had for this reason impended over them since Gen 49 5–7 and causes this to be changed into a blessing: three thousand killed. No. 3 (32 30–33) reports that Jeh at the petition of Moses, demands from the Sinner’s Song later on will punish the people for their sins. No. 4 (33 1–6) reports that Jeh Himself no longer accompanies His people, which, on the one hand, is an act of grace, since the presence of God would even harm the people, and, on the other, is an act of judgment, and is felt as such by Israel. No. 5 (33 7–11) declares that God meets Moses only outside of the camp in a tent, but communes with him face to face. No. 6 introduces the last six pericopes in a natural way, since six and five, the last five articles, included in 8 to 12 are combined into a contrast to the five in 1 to 7 by their express reference to the priests (cf in addition to 9 +10 also 27 21; 29 44; 30 7 1.10). With the incense altar, which was of great importance, and of equal importance with the great altar on the Day of Atonement (30 10), this section closes (cf. 5).

Thus we shall under all circumstances be better to search for an explanation for putting oil in the place of the candlesticks and of the incense altar, at first sessions, than in the case of every difficulty to appeal to a redactor’s working without system or order. However, the entire portion 24 18–31 18 finds its explanation in the promise of 25 8 that Jeh will dwell in the midst of Israel (cf 29 45 f.). He is enthroned on the ark, in which the accusing law as the expression of the Divine will is deposited (for this reason called הָּלָּדְתָּד; 25 16.21; 26 33.34), but above the atonement lid, the kapparah, at which on the Day of Atonement, the atonement ceremony is carried out (cf 25 17–22; Lev 16; see DAY OF ATONEMENT).
to this, 32 34 refers back to Nu 14, and 32 35 is a proleptic judgment based on this experience.

(b) It is incomprehensible how critics have found in the renewal of the covenant caused by the apostasy of Israel an indication of this final, viz. in the Books of the Covenant and in the Decalogue, which are distributed between E and J (Ex 20:1 ff; 31:17; 34:34—35). But in 34:11—26 there is no sign of the number ten being used in connection with the ordinances referring to the religion and the cultus. Jeh for his part attempts to fill this place with the original Decalogue, which effort is constantly being repudiated. It is evident, even in the use of the number ten. In ver 58, according to ver 1 and tradition (of Dt 10:2:4: also Ex 24:12; 31:18), Jeh is the subject. The 38 4 and 5, 6, 7 are not duplicates. In ver 4 the people are described as having laid aside their ornaments a single time as a sign of repentance; according to vs 5, 6, the people permanently dispense with these, a state of mind which makes it possible for God again to show His mercy. It is an arbitrary assumption that these ornaments were used, except in front of Ex 25:7 ff, so that in front of 33 7 it is accounted to 35 P taken from JE would have been omitted. In 35 7 according to the text the author has in mind a tent already in existence, which up to this time had been standing within the camp and now had to be taken without, because Jeh for the present can no longer dwell in the midst of the people (32 31). Moses, through his intercession again makes this possible (33 15—17; 34 9). 10. The period of time thus taken the preparation of the provisional tent (chs 35 7) which, as is done by the LXX, is probably to be preferred to Moses’ own tent. In P, to which reference above is made, such a provisional arrangement is presupposed in ver 35, since already at this place, and on the basis of the tabled in chs 35—41, mention is made of the fact that Moses entered for the purpose of receiving the revelation of God. This according to presuppositions that reflected in 32 7 is evident without the facts mentioned and for other reasons, too, an omission must be accepted before 34 29 ff; for ver 29 speaks of the tables of the law, concerning the origin of which P has reported nothing; and in ver 32 concerning the building Moses resides on Mt. Sinai and had imparted to the people, which, however, do not refer to the directions that were given in 35 ff, since these, according to 35 4, are yet to be expressly communicated to the people.

(7) 35 4—40 38: (a) The construction of the Tabernacle. This section is divided into four pericopes, each with four subdivisions, (cf Structure of Leviticus 16 in Day of Atonement). The same principle of division is found also in the history of Abraham and in Dw 12—26. No. I (35 4—36 7) describes the preparation for the construction: (1) 35 4—5, preparation, (2) 35 20—29, contributions; (3) 35 30—36 1, characterization of the builders; (4) 36 2—7, delivering the contributions to the builders. Nos. II and III (36 8—38 31; 39 1—31) report the construction of the Tabernacle. Noticeable for the decoration of the priestly garments (of 39 32 1): no. II: (1) 36 8—38, dwelling-place; (2) 37 1—8, unsettles; (3) 38 10—20, court; (4) 38 24—31, cost of 1—3; no. III (1) 39 2—7, shoulder garment; (2) vs 8—21, pocket; (3) vs 22—26, outer garment; (4) vs 27—31, summary account concerning coats, miter, bonnets, breeches, girdle, diadem. No. IV (39 32—40 38) reports the completion: (1) 39 32—43, consecration of these objects; (2) 40 1—15, command to erect; (3) vs 16—33, this consists in the entrance of the glory of Jeh. In this way the dwelling of Jeh, which had been promised in 25 8 P, and in chs 33 34—JE had been uncertain, has become a reality. The whole section is closely connected with chs 25—31, yet is independent in character. The full details found in both groups are completely justified by the importance of the object. It is self-evident that at this place, too, the language of the cultus is demanded by the object itself.

(b) The attempts to distribute this section among different authors fail to obtain a true view of the unity of the structure, which is independent also over against chs 25—31. Since the numbers given in 38 26 agree entirely with the numbers gathered later in Nu 2 32, it is evident that for the latter the lists for the contributions were used, which in itself is very probable because it was practical. In this case this section is ascribed to P it is inexplicable how the writer can in 40 34 ff speak of the pillar of fire as of something well known, since this has not yet been mentioned in the parts ascribed to P, but has been in 13 21 Je; 14 10 Je.

III. Historical Character. The fact that extra-Israelitish and esp. Egyptian sources that can lay claim to historical value have reported nothing authentic concerning the exodus of Israel need not surprise us when as reported by Manetho and other historians, is an Egypt version of the exodus of Israel, cannot be investigated at this place, but is to the highest degree improbable. If Israel was oppressed by the Egyptians for a long period, then surely the latter would not have invented the tale of a supremacy on the part of Israel; and, on the other hand, it would be incomprehensible that the Israelites should have changed an era of prosperity in their history into a period of slavery. Over again the permanence of the exodus out of Egypt not only is re-echoed through the entire lit. of Israel (cf I, 4, above), but the very existence of the people of God forces us imperatively to accept some satisfactory ground for its origin, such as is found in the story of the exodus and only here. In addition, the Book of Ex shows a good acquaintance with the localities and the conditions of Egypt, as also of the desert. It is indeed true that we are still in doubt on a number of local details. But other Bible books have in such a surprising manner been confirmed by discoveries and geographical researches, that we can have the greatest confidence in regard to the other difficulties: cf e.g. Naville’s The Storehouse of Palms (Ex 1 11). In general, the opening chapters of Ex, esp. the narratives of the different plagues, contain so much Egypt coloring, that this could scarcely have resulted from a mere theoretical study of Egypt, esp. since in the narrative everything makes for an exegetical purpose; (cf. our experience. The fact that Israel from its very origin received ordinances in regard to religion, morality, law and cultus, is explained from the very conditions surrounding this origin and is indispensable to the development of the nation. None of the later books or times claim to offer anything essentially new in this respect; even the prophets appear only as reformers; they know of the election of Israel, and, on the other hand, everywhere presuppose as something self-evident the knowledge of a righteous, well-pleasing connection with God and chide the violation of this relation as apostasy. Ethical monotheism as the normal religion of Israel is reflected in the same way in all the sources of Israel’s history, as has been proven in my work (‘‘Die Entwicklung der alttestamentlichen Gottesidee in vorexistlicher Zeit,’’ in the May, 1903, issue of Beiträge zur Förderung christlicher Theologie). And the idea that an oriental people, esp. if they came out of Egypt, should have had no religious cultus, is in itself unthinkable. If all of these norms, also the direction for the cultus in the Books of Covenant, of the PC, or of D, at least in the kernel, do not go back to the Mosaic times, then we have indeed with an insoluble problem (my work, Are the Critics Right?)

The Book of Ex is as a matter of fact from its first to its last page filled with miraculous stories; but in this characteristic these contents agree perfectly with the whole history of redemption. In this immediate and harmonious activity of God, for the purpose of establishing a chosen people, all these miracles find their purpose and explanation, and this again is only in harmony with other periods of sacred history.

2. The Miraculous Character The reason is self-explanatory when these miracles are found grouped at the turning-points in this history, as is the case also in the critical age of Elijah and Elisha, and in the experiences and achievements of "Jonah," so significant for the universality of the Bib. religion. Above all this is true in the ministry of Jesus Christ; and also against his return to heaven. In the same way, too, we find this at the beginning of Israel as a nation [see my article in Murray's Dictionary]. Cf in this respect the rapid numerical growth of the nation, the miracles, the plagues, in the presence of Pharaoh, the passage through the Red Sea, the miraculous preservation of the people in the desert, the many appearances of God to Moses, to the people, to the elders, the protection afforded by the cloud, the providential direction of the people of Israel and their leaders, and of individual persons (Moses and Pharaoh). The fact that the author himself knows that Israel without the special care and protection of God could not have survived in the desert is in complete harmony with his knowledge of the geographical situation already mentioned.

If any part of the laws in Ex is to be accepted as Mosaic, it is the Deedlogue. It is true that the ten commandments are found in two re-constructed passages (Ex 20.1 ff; Deut 5.20), whereby an original form naturally found in Ex 20.1 ff have been altered in CH, more than 500 years old although moving in a lower sphere. As Israel had lived in Goshen, and according to Gen 26.12 Isaac had even been engaged in agriculture, and Israel could not remain in the desert but was to settle down in permanent abodes again, the fact of the existence of this law of Israel, which in a religious and ethical sense rises infinitely above the CH, is in itself easily understandable and again since the sacred ark of the covenant plays an important role also in the other sources of the Pent (Nu 10.33 ff; 14.44 JE; Dt 10.1-8; 31.9-25) and in the history of Israel (cf Josh 3; 6-6.8; 8.35; Jgs 20.27; 1 S 6.2 ff; 2 S 16.24; 1 K 8.15; 1 Ch 16.1-9), then a suitable text, such as is announced in Ex 25.1 ff, and was erected according to Ex 35.1 ff, was an actual necessity.

As the Paschal sacrifice, according to Ex 12.3 ff; vs 43 ff P; vs 21 ff JE (?) was to be killed in the houses, and this on the 14th of Nisan in the evening (12-6), and as P directs that a festival assembly shall be held on the next day at the sanctuary (cf Lev 23.6 ff; Nu 28.17 ff), these conditions which can be understood only in case Israel is regarded as being in the wilderness. For this reason Dt 16.5 ff changes this direction, so that from now the Passover is no longer to be celebrated in the houses but at the central sanctuary. In the same way the direction Ex 32.29, which ordered that the firstborn of all males should be given to Jehovah already on the 8th day, is replaced by the wanderings in the desert, and is for this reason changed by Dt 14.23 ff; 16.19 ff to meet the conditions of the people definitely settled after this wandering. Cf my work, Are the Critics Right? 1895. Stuttgart.

As is well known, the average critic handles the Bib. chronology in a very arbitrary manner and is not afraid of changing the chronology of events by hundreds of years. If we leave out of consideration the some details and difficulties, we still have a reliable starting-point in the statements found in 1 K 6.1 and Ex 12.40 ff. According to the first passage, the time that elapsed between the exodus of the Israelites and the building of the temple in the 4th year of Solomon was 480 years; and according to the second passage, the time of the stay in Egypt was 430 years. A material change in the first-mentioned figures is not permitted by the facts in Ex 12.40 ff, and the different data there mentioned are contemporaneous; and to reduce the 430 years of the stay in Egypt, as might be done after the LXX, which includes also the stay of the patriarchs in Canaan in this period, or to reduce the whole period from the entrance into Egypt to the building of the temple, is contrary to the synchronism of Hammurabi and Abraham (Gen 14). The first-mentioned could not have lived later than 2100 BC. The 430 years in Ex 12.40.41 P are also, independently of this passage, expressly supported by the earlier prediction of an oppression of Israel for 400 years from the time of Abraham (Gen 15.13 J); and the 480 years of 1 K 6.1 are confirmed by Jgs 11.26, according to which, at the time of the oppression and liberation of Jephthah as judge, already 30 years must have elapsed since the east Jordan country had been occupied by the Israelites. According to this the exodus must have taken place not long after 1500 BC. And in any case the exodus would be the condition of affairs in Pal as we know them from the Am Tab dating about 1450-1400 BC, according to which the Canaanish cities had been attacked by the Chabiri in the most threatening way, (cf 14.43-6). The Book of Josh. As is well known linguistically, too, the identification of the Chabiri with the Hebrews is unobjectionable. Finally, on the well-known Menephtah stela of the 13th cent. BC, Israel is mentioned in connection with Canaan, Ashkelon, Gezer, Y-nu= (Jehosh, Josh 16.6.7.), and accordingly is already regarded as settled in Canaan. A date supported in such different ways makes it impossible for me to find in Ramesses II the Pharaoh of the oppression and liberation of Israel, as this is the conclusion of the exodus (both between 1300 and 1200 BC). A conclusive proof that the name and the original building of the city Ramesses (Ex 11.11 JE; 13.27 P; Nu 33.5) necessarily leads back to Ramesses II can, at least at the present time, not yet be given (cf on this point also, Kohler, Lehrbuch der biblischen Geschichte des Alten Testamentes, I, 238 ff).

All these attacks on the historical character of this book which originate only in the denial of the possibility of miracles, the Christian theologian can and must ignore. Such attacks do not stand on the ground of history but of dogma. Let us accordingly examine other objections. Thus, it is claimed that the number of men, which in Ex 12.37 is said to have been 600,000, is too high, because not only the desert but Goshen also would not have been able to support two million people, and Israel had been too short a time in Egypt: to grow into so populous a nation. Yet Israel, beginning with the time of the oppression, which, according to 22.23; 18 continued many years and hence began before the highest number in population had been reached, had claims for support from the Egypt corn granaries; and the 400 years in 12.41 are certainly not as has been shown under (4) above. To this must be added that in Ex 7.9 f, 12.20 f the rapid numerical growth of Israel is represented as the result of a Divine blessing. Then, too, in the company of Jacob and his descendants, doubtless servants, male and female, came down to Egypt (cf. the 318 servants of Abraham alone in Gen 14). The figures in Ex 13 37 P are further confirmed by Nu 11 21 (according to critics from JE) and by the results of the two surveys, Nu 14 29 (cf. Ex 36 36 [603, 550]) and Nu 26 51 (601, 730). The attacks made also on the existence of the Tabernacle must be rejected as groundless. According to the Wellhausen school the Tabernacle is only a copy of the temple of Solomon, dating back to the third or fourth thousand B.C.; and the fact that there is only one central seat of the cultus is regarded as a demand first made by the Deuteronomic legislation in the 7th cent. Against such a claim commentators not only the impossibility of placing Dt at this time (cf. my work Are the Critics Right? 1–55), but also the legislation of the Book of the Covenant, which, in 23 17, 19; 34 23, 24, 26 presupposes a sanctuary, and which even in the passages incorrectly analyzed by Wellhausen and its Critics (cf. Am 7 16 ff., 19; 11 1 ff., 6, 12 ff.; 13 7; 20 29; 33 20; 14 32; 28 16); also the different parts of the history of esp. the central sanctuary in Shiloh, 1 S 1–4; 1 S 21 19, which is placed on the same level with Zion in Jer 7 12 ff.; 26 6; Ps 78 60–72. To the many who believe such statements as 2 S 7 6; Josh 15 1; 1 K 3 4; 8 4; 1 Ch 16 39, 40; 2 Ch 1 3. All these facts are not overthrown by certain exceptions to the rule (cf. Levitticus).

That the whole view leads to conclusions that in themselves they could not possibly be accepted. What a foolish fancy that would have been, which would have pictured the Tabernacle in the most insignificant details as to materials, amounts, numbers, colors, objects, which in Nu 4 has determined with exact precision, a whole new catalogue. In addition, there was no connection whatever with the tendency ascribed to it by the critics, but rather, in part, would contradict it. Of my work, Are the Critics Right? 72 ff., 87 ff.

That particularly in the post-exilic period it would have been impossible to center the Day of Atonement on the covering of the ark of the covenant, since the restoration of this ark was not expected according to Jer 3 16, has already been shown (cf. Gen 24). If God had really determined to give to His people a pledge of the constant presence of His grace, then there can be absolutely no reason for doubting the erection of the Tabernacle, since the necessary artistic ability and the possession of the materials needed for the structure are sufficiently given in the text (cf. also Ex 25 9, 40; 26 30; 27 8–31 2 ff.; 35 20 ff.—12 35; 3 21, 22; 11 2 ff.; Gen 16 14; Ex 33 4 ff.).

The examination of the separate passages in Ex, such as those of Isaiah (2 S 11, 2; 11 2 ff.; see above) to Dt, or the ordinances concerning the Passover and the firstborn (12 1 f.), and other laws in the different codices, goes beyond the purpose of this article (cf. however under 3 above, at the close).

IV. Authorship.—As the Book of Ex is only a part of a large work (cf. 1, 3 above), the question as to authorship cannot be definitely decided at this place, but we must in substance restrict ourselves to those data which we find in the book itself. In several parts it is expressly claimed that Moses wrote them.

Moses He sang the hymn found in Ex 15, after the passage of the Red Sea, and breathes the enthusiasm of what the author has himself experienced. Vs 13–4 do not speak against the unity of the hymn, but rather for it, since the perfects here found as prothetic perfects only give expression to the certainty which attaches to the possession of the land of promise. In the course of history the nations often acted quite differently from what is here stated and often antagonized Israel (cf. Nu 14 39–45; 20 13 ff.; 21 4–21, 35–36; 22 6; 23 15 17). In Ex 15 13–17 not only Zion is meant, but all Canaan; of Lev 25 23; Nu 35 34; Jer 2 7; for har, “mountain,” of Dt 1 7 ("hill-country"); 3 25; Ps 78 54. According to Ex 17 14 Moses writes in a book the promise of God; of Ex 34 27: Moses wrote in a book the words of the Lord. And as 17 14 says, he must write merely 'to write a sheet,’ as Nu 5 23, it yet appears in the light of the connection of a comparison with related passages, such as Josh 24 26; 1 S 10 25, much more natural to think of a book in the connection, in the sense that Moses had been recorded or could at any time be recorded.

The Ten Words (Ex 20 1 ff.) were written down by God Himself and then handed over to Moses; of Ex 24 12; 31 18; 34 26 (cf. Deut 10 2). The laws and judicial ordinances beginning with Ex 21, according to 24 4, were also written down by Moses himself, and the same is true of the ordinances in 34 11 ff., according to 34 27.

The proof that formerly had to be furnished, to the effect that the knowledge of the art of writing in the days of Moses was not an anachronism, need not trouble us now, since both in Egypt and Babylon much older written documents have been discovered. But, even so, the separate parts of the text, which, in the catalogue of stations, there is a portion ascribed to Moses that bears the express characteristics of the PC; and, finally, Dt, with its hortatory, pastoral style, claims him as its author. Already in Ex 17 14 there were reasons to believe that Moses had written not only this statement which is there expressly attributed to him. Thus it becomes a possibility, that in general only in the case of particularly important passages the fact that Moses pronounced was to be little prominent, if it can be shown as probable that he in reality wrote more, as we find in cases in the writings of the prophets (cf. Isa 8 1; 30 8; Jer 30 2; Ezek 3 11; Hab 2 2). In addition, we notice in this connection that in the catalogue of stations mentioned above and ascribed to Moses (Nu 33), the close relation of which to the portions attributed to P is certain, not only this part, but also the other words from JE in the present Bible text from Ex 12–19 (see above) are regarded as self-evident as Moses (as is the case also later with the corresponding historical part), and this is an important witness in favor of the Moses authorship of the historical parts. But Ex 26 31, 35 40 also claim, at least so far as contents are concerned, to be the product of the Moses period. The entire portable sanctuary is built with a view to the wanderings in the desert. Aaron and his sons are as yet the only representatives of the priesthood (27 21; 28 4.12.41-43; 29 4 ff, etc.). In view of the relationship which Nu 33 shows with P, it is clear, if we accept the genuineness of this part of it, that its highest degree probable, that this style was current in Moses time, and that he had the mastery of it, even if other hands, too, have contributed to the final literary forms of these laws. In favor of the Mosaic authorship of the whole Book of Ex we find a weighty reason in the unity and the literary construction of the work as shown above. This indeed does not preclude the use and adaptation of other sources of historical or legal statements, either from the author's own hands or from others, if such a view should perhaps be suggested or made imperative by the presence of many hard constructions, unconnected transitions, unexpected repetitions, etc. But even on the presupposition of the Mosaic authorship, a difference in style in the different kinds of matters discussed is not impossible, just as little as this is the case with peculiarities of language, since these could arise particularly in the course of vivid narration of the story (cf. the analogoulas in Paul's writings). But still more a reason for accepting the Mosaic authorship of Ex is found in the fact that the conception of reproduction of all the events recorded, which presupposes a congenial prophetic personality; and finally, too, the natural and strong probability that Moses did not leave his people without such a Magna Charta for the future. The Mosaic authorship becomes almost a certainty, in case the Book of Dt is genuine, even if only in its essential parts. For Dt at every step presupposes not only P (cf Are the Critics Right? 171 ff), but also the history and theBook of the Covenant (Ex 21 ff; 34 11 ff) as recorded in Ex.

Against the Mosaic authorship of Ex the use of the third person should no longer be urged, since Caesar and Xenophon also wrote their works in the third person, and the use of this provision is eminently adapted to the purpose and significance of Ex for all future times. In Isa 20 1 ff; Ezek 24, we have analogies of this in prophetic lit. In our case the line of thought can be extended to a later date, without thereby overthrowing the Mosaic authorship of the whole (cf also under 11). In this case we are probably dealing with supplementary material. Ex 16 35 declares that Israel received manna down to the time when the people came to the borders of Canaan. Whether it was given to them after this time, too, cannot be decided on the basis of this passage (cf however Josh 5 12). If the entire Book of Ex was composed by Moses, then Ex 16 35 would be a proof that at least the final editing of the book had been undertaken only a short time before his death. This is suggested also by ver 346, since at the time when the manna was first given the ark of the covenant did not yet exist; and the statement in 32 33 takes into consideration the later development as found in Nu 13 f. In the same way Ex 16 35 could be a later explanation, but is not necessarily so, if the 'omer was not a fixed measure, of which nothing further is known, and which probably was not to be used in every Israelite household, but a customary measure, the average content of which is given in ver 36. If we take Ex alone there is nothing that compels us to go later than the Mosaic period (concerning the father-in-law of Moses, see under II, 2, 1 [1.8—7 7] at the close). The question as to whether there are contradictions or differences between the different legal ordinances in Ex and in later books cannot be investigated at this place, nor the question whether the connection of Ex with other books in any way modifies the conclusion reached under 11.

EXORCISM. ek-sor-sizm. EXORCIST, ek-sor-sist. (Espeutés, Exorcistai, from ἐξορίζω, to adjure) [Mt 26 63]: One who expels demons by the use of magical formulae.

1. Definition.

In the strict etymological sense there is no exorcism in the Bible. The term "exorcista" is used once (Acts 19 13) in a way to discredit the professional exorcists familiarly known both among Jews and Gentiles. The method of Jesus in dealing with demoniacs was not that of the exorcists. It is said of him (Ex 1 18), according to the NT "cast out the spirits with a word," it is abundantly clear that the word in question was not ritualistic but authoritative.

In Lk 4 35 we have a typical sentence uttered by Our Lord in the performance of his curative: "Hold thy peace, and come out of him." In Mk 9 20 we have Christ's own emphasis upon the ethical element in dealing with these mysterious maladies: "This kind can come out by nothing, save by prayer." In Mt 12 29, if it is Moses who is meant, this is the method and power used in his cures: "But if I by the Spirit of God cast out demons, then is the kingdom of God come upon you."

In Lk 9 1 the terms "authority" and "power" are used in a way aimed to show the belief of the evangelists that to cure demon-possessing an actual power from God, together with the right to use it, was necessary. This group of passages gives the NT philosophy of this dread mystery and its cure. The demons are personal evil powers afflicting human life in their opposition to God. It is beyond man unaided to obtain deliverance from them. It is the function of Christ as the redeemer of mankind to deliver men from this as well as other ills due to sin. To this end the cures are known as those performed by Christ Himself were accomplished by His disciples in His name (Mk 16 17). The power attributed to His name" supplies us with the opportunity for a most enlightening comparison and application.

Exorcism among ancient and primitive peoples rests largely upon faith in the power of magical formulas, ordinarily compounded of the names of deities and pronounced in the names of deities and pronounced in the names of deities and pronounced in the names of deities and pronounced in the names of deities and pronounced in the names of deities and pronounced in the names of deities and pronounced in the names of deities and pronounced in the names of deities and pronounced in the names of deities. The words themselves are supposed to have power over the demons, and the mere recital of the correct list of names is supposed to be efficacious.

Writings.
Attention should be called again to the incantation texts of the Babylonians and Assyrians (see, for translations and full exposition of texts, Rogers, Religions of Babylonia and Assyria, 146 ff.). In this directness and cruelty of superstition, which the ancients have carried men to extremes in. In the case of Jos we are amazed to see how even in the case of an educated man the most abject superstition controls his views of such subjects. In Ant., VIII, v, in speaking of the wisdom of Solomon, he says that "God enabled him to learn that skill which expels demons, which is a science useful and sanitary to him." He also describes, in the same connection, a cure which he alleges to have seen, "in the presence of Vespasian and his sons," performed in accordance with method of superstition ascribed to Solomon.
A ring to which was attached a kind of root mentioned by Solomon was placed at the nostrils of the demonic and the demon was drawn out through the nostril. The proof that exorcism had actually taken place is given in the overturning of a basin placed nearby.

The absurdities of this narrative are more than equalled by the story of exorcism told in the Book of Tob (see Lane, Apocrypha, II, 53–59) where the liver and heart of a fish, miraculously caught, are burned upon the ashes of incense, and the resulting smoke drives away a demon. This whole story is well worthy of careful reading for the light it throws upon the unreasoned working of the imagination upon such matters.

In the rabbinical writers the very limit of discased morbidity is reached in long and repulsive details, which they give of methods used in exorcism (see Whitehouse, HDB, s.v. "Demon", I, 592b; cf. 593b; Ederseim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, II, 775–76).

In most striking contrast with this stand the Bibl narratives. The very point of connection which we have noted is also the point of contact.

4. Contrasts. First the mighty and efficacious of NT and word with which Jesus rebuked and Popular
demonized, was no exorcistic control. The formula spoken by rote, but His own methods living word of holy power. "In the name of Jesus" did not mean that the sacred name formally uttered possessed magical power to effectuate a cure. The ancient Sem formula, "in the name of," given a deep echo in the OT, had a deeper meaning in the NT. The proper and helpful use of it meant a reliance upon the presence and living power of Christ from whom alone power to do any mighty work comes (Jn 15:5).

The fundamental difference between the ideas and methods of Jesus and His disciples and current conceptions and usages becomes the more striking when we remember that the lower range of ideas and practices actually prevailed among the people with whom the Lord and His followers were associated.
The famous passage (Mt 12 24 and ) in which the Pharisees attribute to demoniacal influence the cures wrought by Jesus upon the demonized, usually studied with reference to Our Lord's word about the unforgivable sin, is also remarkable for the idea concerning demons which it expresses. The idea which evidently underlies the accusation against Jesus was that the natural way to obtain control over demons is by obtaining, through magic, power over the ruler of demons. In reply to this Jesus maintains that since the demons are evil they can be controlled only by opposition to them in the power of God.

It is most suggestive that we have in Acts 19 13 ff a clear exposition, in connection with exorcism, of just the point here insisted upon. According to this narrative a group of wandering professional Jewish exorcists, witnessing the cures accomplished by Paul, attempted to do the same by the ritualistic use of the name of Jesus. They failed ignominiously because, according to the narrative, they lacked faith in the living Christ by whose power such miracles of healing were wrought, although they were letter-perfect in the use of the formula. This narrative shows clearly what the NT understanding of the expression "in my name" implied in the way of faith and obedience.

Here as elsewhere the chastened mental restraint under which the NT was composed, the high spiritual and ethical results of the intimacy of the disciplines with Jesus, are clearly manifest.

Our Lord and His disciples dealt with the demo-nics as they dealt with all other sufferers from the malign, enaving and wasting power of sin, with the tenderness of an illimitable sympathy, and the firmness and effectiveness of those to whom were granted in abundant measure the presence and power of God.

meaning "to look for, toward what will probably happen, whether sure or uncertain" (Acts 13:17; 1 Cor. 15:19), which are not as intense as ἐξαντλεῖν (Heb 10:13), meaning "to look for after that which the realization of which one is assured ("as the husbandman waits for the processes of Nature [Jas 5:7], and the patriarchs for the Divine promise," (Westcott), or "a sure and steady hope as the demonstration (Rom 8:19; Phil 1:20, "earnest expectation"), which describes the stretching forth of the head of a man to an object that is anticipated (see Elliott on Phil 1:20). In the OT "expectation" always means that which is expected, as in Jos 10:28, "The expectation of the wicked shall perish."

W. L. WALKER

EXPERIENCE, eks-pē'ri-ens: This word is employed 34 times. In Gen 30 27 AV, Laban says to Jacob,
"I have learned by experience [RV "divination"] that Jehovah blessed me for thy sake." Here it translates the Heb בֵּית, năḥash, "to observe diligently," as when one examines the entrails of a bird or animal for the purpose of divination.

In Eccl 1 16, the writer says, "I have gotten great wisdom...; my heart hath had great experience of wisdom and knowledge." In reference to Jesus’ statement that He had seen everything, (Mark 6:52; 2 Cor 10:1; 11:8), the av is translated, "my heart hath seen abundantly," and the idea seems to be that of a wide outlook combined with actual trial of the things discovered or known.

In Rom 4 4 AV, the Gr word διδόμενον, dolimēn (ARV more correctly "approved") means the proof or testing of a thing. We rejoice in tribulation because it works out or produces patience, while the latter develops an experience of God, i.e. it brings out as a proved fact His power and love toward us in our preservation in and deliverance from trial.

Thus it is seen the Bible use of the word is not dependent from the ordinary, which means "the sum of practical wisdom taught by the events and observations of life," or, to go a little farther, the personal and practical acquaintance with what is so taught. He 6 13 gives a good practical example. AV says, "Every one that useth milk is unskilful [dæ'fs] in the word of righteousness: for he is a babe," while RV renders "unskilful" by "without experience of." The thought is that he who fails to search out the deep things of the word of God is so lacking in the exercise of his spiritual senses as to be unable really to know truth from error.

EXPERIMENT, eks-per-i-ment: (σωκύη, dokimé, "approvvedness," "tried character"); "the experiment of this ministration" (2 Cor 9 13 AV, RV "the proving of you by his ministration"), i.e. the sincerity of their Christian profession was evidenced by their liberal contribution.

EXPIATION, eks-pi-a-shun: This word represents no Heb Or word not rendered also by "atonement." Mt 26 28, Lk 22 20 AV and RV refer to as a good tr (Gr χαράστηρ, charakrè, lit. "engraving" and hence "impression"); RV "the very image."

EXQUISITE, eks'kwē-sit: (ἀκροβής, akróbēs): The Gr word means "accurate," "searched out," equivalent to exquisitus from which "exquisite" is derived. It also means in argument "close," "subtle." In Ecclus 18 29, we have, "They poured forth exquisite treasures," RV "apt proverbs," Lk 19 25, AV and RV "there is an exquisite subtilty, and the same is unjust."

EXTINCT, eks-intekt: In Job 17 1, "My days are extinct" (מְתִה, mēth in Niphal) and in Isa 43 17, "They are extinct" (םֹתָה, māthāk), the word "extinct" should be recognized as a form of the participle, equivalent to "extinguished," so that in both passages an action, not merely a state, is indicated.

EXTORTION, eks-tör-shun: This particular word occurs twice in AV: Ezek 22 12 (דָבֵאשׁ, dabēsh), and Mt 23 23 (ἀπρόκλητος, harparaíth), and indicates that one who is an extoritioner is guilty of unthinking away from another by strife, greed and oppression that which does not lawfully belong to him. The element of covetousness and usury is involved in the meaning of this word; for it is greedily gotten gain. The publicans were considered as being specially guilty of this sin; this is clear from the Pharisee's deprecatory remark: "I am not . . . an extoritioner . . . as this publican" (Lk 18 11). Paul classes extortion (πλημνικτις, lit. "over-reaching") among a category of the grossest crimes known to humanity (1 Cor 5 10.11); indeed, so grievous is it that it closes the door of heaven in the face of the one guilty of it (6 10).

EXTRAVAGANCE, eks-trä-vag-ans: (EKSTRAVAGANZ), ekst-er-vag-ans: (EKSTRAVAGANZ), "extravagant.JAMES M. GRAY EXTEMPORARY, eks-tem-por-a-ray: (ektēmoporalis, ektemoporalis), RV "of extreme age.

EXTEMITY: ὕπατος, pašh; LXX παράτησις, parátēsis, occurs only in Job 35 15 AV, RV "arrogance," and ἀσέβης, akimē, in 2 Mac 1 7.

EYE, 1 (עין, 'ayin; ἀόρατος, opthalmós): (1) The physical organ of sight, "the lamp of the body" (Mt 6 22), one of the chief channels of information for man. A cruel custom therefore sanctioned among the Canaanites to extinguish the eye of an enemy or a rival, because thus his power was most effectually snuffed out (Jgs 16 21; 2 K 25 7; Jer 39 7). Such blinding or putting out of the "right eye" was also considered a deep humiliation (Ps 57 6), robbed the victor of his beauty, and made him unfit to take his part in war (1 S 11 2; Zec 11 17.

The eye, to be useful, was to be "single," i.e. not giving a double or uncertain vision (Mt 6 22—Lk 6 34). Eyes may grow dim with sorrow and fear (Job 17 7), they may "waste away with griefs" (Ps 6 7; 31 9; 88 9). They may "pour down" (Lam 3 49), "run down with water" (Lam 1 6; cf. Prov 16 18). Eyes may "link" (Link) (Isa 30 18; Prov 16 13; 10 10; cf. also Prov 15 30; 30 17), and the harlot takes the lasting "with her eyelids" (Prov 6 25). To "lift up the eyes" (Gen 13 10 et passim) means to look up or around for information and often for help; to "turn away the eye" or "hide the eyes" indicates carelessness and lack of sympathy (Prov 28 27); to "cast about the eyes," so that they "are in the ends of the earth" (Prov 24 24) is synonymous with the silly curiosity of a fool, and with the lack of attention given to things of the where but at his work. In the execution of justice the "eye shall not pity," i.e. not be deflected from the dictates of the law by favorable or unfavorable impressions (Dt 19 13 et passim), nor spare (Ezk 25 11 et passim), taking the less favorable "life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot" (Ex 21 24; Dt 19 21).

(2) Figureative: The eye of the heart or mind, the organ of spiritual perception, which may be enlightened or opened (Ps 119 18). This is done by the law of God (19 8) or by the spirit of God (Eph 1 18), or it may be "darkened" and "held" (Lk 24 16; of Mt 13 13; 2 Cor 4 4).

(3) The eye as an index of the mind and disposition of man. The Bible speaks of a "bright" or "bountiful" eye, i.e. the kindly disposition (Prov 22 9); of "proud," "haughty," "lofty eyes" (Ps 18 27; 131 1; Prov 16 17); of the "lowly eyes" of the humble (Job 22 29 m; cf. also Lk 18 13); of adulterous "eyes which play the harlot" (Ezk 9 9, in the sense of idling them; 2 Pet 2 14). Rage or anger is shown by the "sharpening" of the eyes (Job 16 9).

(4) The eyes of God, as well as the "seven eyes" of the Lamb (Rev 5 6) and the 'many eyes of the glorious' (Zech 4 10). As "eyes" of this sin; thus also Ezek 1 18; 10 12 are figurative expressions for the omniscience of God (cf He 4 13; Ps 139 16) and of His watchfulness and loving care (Jer 32 19). As the human eye may, with the slightest glance or motion, give an indication, a command, so God is able to "guide" or "counsel" His obedient child "with his eye" (Ps 32 8).

(5) Three Heb expressions are tr by "apple of the eye": (a) תֶּשֶׁב, šešôn, lit. "the little man," which probably means the "pupil of the eye," it being the part of the eye in which the close onlooker may see his image reflected en miniatur e. Several oriental languages have very similar expressions (Dt 32 10; Ps 17 8; Prov 7 2). (b) תָּשָׁב, bâshôn, lit. "the gate of the eye" (Zec 2 8). (c) תָּשֶׁב, bath-ayin, "eebon; grandson of the father of the eye." (Ps 17 8; Lam 2 18). All these three phrases seem to indicate the pupil rather than the "apple of the eye," and designate the most sensitive part of the eye, which we protect with the greatest care. Thus the Scriptures declare, for our great comfort, that God will protect and care for those that are His own.

"To eye" (תֶּשֶׁב, šešôn, "to watch closely," "to look maliciously at"); "to seal eyes David from that day and forward." (1 S 18 9). See EnvY; Evil Eyes.

EYELID, Tid: Eyes and eyelids in Heb are sometimes used synonomously, as in the parallelism of Prov 4 25 (cf 6 4; 30 18):

"Let thy eye look straight on And let thine eyelids look straight before thee." (Cf Job 41 18; Ps 11 4; Jer 9 18.) The alluring power of the wanton woman is conceived of as centered in her eyes (Prov 6 25; Isa 3 16): "Neither let her take thee with her eyelids." Painting the eyelids was resorted to intensify the beauty, antimony (q.v.) being used for darkening the lashes (2 K 3 30; Jer 4 30; Ezek 16 11; 32 29).

EYESALVE, ισαύ (κολλαφίου, kollaphrion; collyrium; Rev 3 18): A Phrygian powder mentioned by Galen, for which the medical school of Laodicea seems to have been famous. It was a white spot of crystalline matter (the Lestra to the Seven Churches of Asia), but the figurative reference is to the restoring of spiritual vision.

EYES, BLINDING, blind'ing, of THE. See Eye; Punishments.

EYES, COVERING, kuv'er-ing, of THE: In Gen 20 16, means 'helplessness of the past, a willingness to overlook the wrong to which Sarah had been exposed.'

EYES, DISEASES, di'zás, of THE: Blindness, defects of sight and diseases of the eye are frequently mentioned in the Scriptures, but usually in general terms. It is probable that in the period covered by the Bible, ophthalmia was as common in Pal and Egypt as it is now. See Blindness. The commonest of the diseases at present is the purulent conjunctivitis which is a highly infectious malady affecting people of all ages, but esp. children, and whose germs are carried from eye to eye by the flies, which are allowed to walk freely over the diseased eyes. This is one of the most disgusting sights in a Palestine village, but I have been told by mothers that their children are lucky if they happen to drive off the flies. In this manner the disease is propagated. The number of persons in any Palestine village whose eyes are more or less blemished by disease is on this account phenomenally large.

Blindness incapacitated a man from serving in the priesthood (Lev 21 16; 18); in a blemish of the eye was regarded as a disqualification (Lev 21 20).

The cases in the NT of persons blind from their birth (as Jn 9 1) were probably the results of this ophthalmia, but may have been due to congenital malformation. The interesting psychological record of the difficulty of interpreting the new visual sensations by the blind man healed by Our Lord ( Mk 8 22) indicates that it was probably not a case of congenital blindness, as the evangelist uses the word ὀπάσατηθέν ("restored"), but he had been so long blind that he could not imagine or visualize the sense-impressions. This condition has been often discussed as a psycho-physical problem since the days of Molyneux and Locke (Essay on the Human Understanding, 11, 9, 8).

The blind in St. Paul's day was probably a temporary paralysis of the retina from the shock of a dazzling light accentuated by the intense emotion which accompanied his vision on the road to Damascus. The "scars" mentioned in Acts 9 18 were not natural, but his sight was restored as if (hōsē) scales had fallen from his eyes. How far this left his eyes weak we do not know, but from his inability to recognize the high priest (Acts 23 3) and from his employing an amanuensis for transcribing his epistles (Rom 16 22), as well as from his writing in characters of large size (pēlikos; Gal 6 11), it is probable that his vision was defective, and this it has been conjectured was the "thorn in the flesh" of 2 Cor 12 7.

Senile blindness, the result either of cataract or retinal degeneration, is mentioned in the cases of Isaac (Gen 27 1), Jacob (Gen 48 10) and Eli (1 S 4 15). The frequency of such senile dimness of sight made the case of Moses the more remarkable that at the age of 120 his eye was not dim (Dt 34 7).

Tobit's blindness, caused by the irritation of the sparrow's dung (Tob 2 10), was a traumatic conjunctivitis which left an opacity. It is not said that the whiteness was itself sufficiently large to destroy vision. There was with it probably a considerable amount of conjunctival thickening, and it is possible that the remedy might have removed this. It certainly could not remove a cicatrization of the eye of Moses. The construction of a recent commentator that the gall, by color- ing the spot, made the eye look as if sight was restored when it really was not, seems ludicrously inept. In any case the historical accuracy of the narrative is so problematical that explanation is unnecessary. See Blindness.

EYESERVICE, ισαύρις (ἐφθαλμοδουσία, ophthalmodoulēs): A term coined by Paul to express the conduct of slaves, who work only when they are watched, and whose motive, therefore, is not fidelity to duty, but either to avoid punishment or to gain reward from their masters (Eph 6 6; Col 3 22). 2. The Prophet and His Book.—The name 'Yezekeiel', signifies "God strengthens."

took its "Ezechiel" and Luther "Hesekiel". Ezekiel is 1.

In 3 the prophet is said to be the son of a certain Zebai, and that he was a priest. This combination of the priestly and prophetic offices is not accidental at a time when the priests began to come more and more into the foreground. Thus, too, Jeremiah (1 1) and Zechariah (11 1; cf Ex 5 1; 6 14; Neh 12 4 16, and my art. "Zechariah" in Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary were priests and prophets; and in Zec 7 3 a question in reference to fasting is put to both priests and prophets at the same time. and still more than in the case of Zechariah and Jeremiah, the priestly descent makes itself felt in the case of Ezekiel. We here already draw attention to his Levitical tendencies, which appear particularly prominent in chs 40–46 (see under 1 below), and to the highly priestly character of his picture of the Messiah (21 25 f; 45 22; see II, 3 below).

We find Ezekiel in Tel-abb (3 15) at the river Chebar (1 3; 3 15) on a Euphrates canal near Nippur, where the American expedition found the archives of a great business house, "Murushu and Sama". The prophet had been taken into exile in 597 BC. This event so deeply affected the fate of the people and his personal relations that Ezekiel dates his prophecies from this event. They begin with the 5th year of this date, in which year through the appearance of the Divine glory (cf II, 1 below) he had been consecrated to the prophetical office (1 2) and continued to the 27th year (29 17), i.e. from 593 to 571 BC. The book gives us an idea of the external conditions of this exile. The expressions "prison," "bound," which are applied to the exiles, easily create a false impression, or at any rate a one-sided idea. These terms surely to a great extent are used figuratively. Because the Jews had lost their country, their capital city, their temple, their service and with their independence was gone, they felt their condition was under all circumstances lamentable, and could be compared with the fate of prisoners and those in fetters.

The external conditions in themselves, however, seem rather to have been generally tolerable. The people live in their own houses (Jer 29 5). Ezekiel himself is probably the owner of a house (Ezk 3 24; 8 1). They have also retained their organization, for their elders visit the prophet repeatedly (8 1; 14 1; 20 1). This makes it clear why later comparatively few use of the permission to return to their country. The inscriptions found in the business house at Nippur contain also a goodly number of Jewish names, which shows how the Jews are becoming united and taking part in the business life of the country.

Ezekiel was living in most happy wedlock. Now God reveals to him on a certain night that his wife, "the desire of his eye," is to die through a sudden sickness. On the evening of the following day she is already dead. But he is not permitted to weep or lament over her, for he is to serve as a sign that Jesus is to be destroyed without wailing or lamentation (24 15 f). Thus in his case as in that of Nabopassar, with Hosea, the personal fate of the prophet is most impressively interwoven with his official activity.

The question at what age Ezekiel had left Jerusalem has been answered in different ways. From his intimate acquaintance with the priestly institutions and with the temple service, as this appears particularly in chs 40 to 48, the conclusion is drawn that he himself must have officiated in the temple. Yet, the knowledge on his part can be amply explained if he only in a general way had been personally acquainted with the temple, with the law and the study of the Torah. We accept that he was already taken into exile at the age of 25 years, and in his 30th year was called to his prophetic office; and in doing so we come close to the statement of Jos, according to which Ezekiel had come to Babylon in his youth. At any rate the remarkable statement in the beginning of his book, "in the 30th year," by the side of which we find the customary dating, "in the 5th year" (1 2), can still find its best explanation when referred to the age of the prophet. We must also remember that the 30th year had a special significance for the tribe of Levi (Nu 4 3 23 30 39), and that later on, and surely not accidentally, both Jesus and John the Baptist began their public career at the age of 30 (Lk 3 23).

It is indeed true that the attempt has been made to interpret this statement of Ezekiel on the basis of an era of Nabopolassar, but there is practically nothing further known of this era; and in addition there would be a disagreement here, since Nabopolassar ruled from 625 on, and his 30th year would not harmonize with the year 593 as determined by Ezek 1 2. Just as little can be said for explaining these 30 years so many years after the discovery of the book in the cuneiform law in 1893, in the cuneiform law in 1893 (2 K 23 1). For this case too there is not the slightest hint that this event had been made the beginning of a new era, and, in addition, the statement in Ezek 1 1, without further reference to this event, would be unthinkable.
As in the case of the majority of the prophets, legenda have also grown up around the name of Ezekiel. He is reported to have been the teacher of Pythagoras, or a servant of Jeremiah, or a martyr, and is said to have been buried in the tomb of Shem and Arphaxad. He indeed did stand in close relationship to Jeremiah (see 2, 3 below). Since the publication of K. Roetermann's essay in the Studies und Kritiken, 1877, it has been customary, on the basis of 3 14f. 26f.; 4 4f.; 24 27, to regard Ezekiel as subject to catalepsy (cf. the belief often entertained that Paul was an epileptic). Even if his condition be speechless and motionless, he has some similarity with certain forms of catalepsy or kindred diseases, i.e. a temporary suspension of the power of locomotion or of speech; yet in the case of Ezekiel we never find that he is describing a disease, but his condition occurs only at the express command of God (3 24f.; 24 25f.); and this on account of the stubbornness of the house of Israel (3 26). This latter expression which occurs with such frequency (cf. 2 5f., 3 9-27, etc.) induces us to form the impression which the prophet met at the hand of his contemporaries.

He lives in the midst of bribes and thorns and dwells among scorpions (2 6). Israel has a mind harder than a rock, firmer than a mountain. "In the midst of plaster what is this parasite?" is cast up to him by his contemporaries, and he complains to God on this account (20 49); and God in turn sums up the impression which Ezekiel has made on them in the words (33 22): Thou art unto them as a very lovely song of one that hath a pleasant voice, and can play well on an instrument; for they hear thy words, but they do them not." They consequently estimate him according to his aesthetic side (cf. 1, 4 below), and that is all.

1) Its genuineness.—When compared with almost every other prophetical book, we are particularly favorably situated in dealing with the genuineness of the Book of Ezekiel. The name "prophecy" is my word; Die mesianische Erwartung der vorreisalichen Propheten, zugleich ein Protest gegen moderne Textersplitterung", as this is practically not at all called into question, and efforts to prove a complicated composition of the book have failed.

Both the efforts of Zunz, made long ago (cf. Zeit-schrift der deutsch-morgenlandischen Gesellschaft, 1873, and Die gotischen Vorträge der Juden), and of Seimecke (Geschichte des Volkes Israel, 11, 15) have been made in vain or even against the time of the composition of the book; as also the later attempt of Kroetzmann, in his Komm. on Ezek, to show that there are two recensions of the book, have found no favor. The claim that chs. 40-48 were written by a pupil of Ezekiel was made as a timid suggestion by Voiz, but, judging from the tendency of criticism, the origin of these chapters will probably yet become the subject of serious debate. But in general the conviction obtains that the book is characterized by such unity that we can only accept or reject it as a whole, but that for its rejection there is not the least substantial ground. This leads us to the contents.

2) Its structure.—The parts of the book are in general very transparent. First of all the book is divided into halves by the announcement of the fall of Jerusalem in ch 3; of which parts the first predominantly deals with punishments and threats; the other with comfort and encouragement. Possibility of parts of Ezekiel's prophecy that were not written in mind when he says (Am. X) that Ezekiel had written two books. That the introduction of prophecies of redemption after those of threats in other prophetical books also is often a matter of importance, and that the right appreciation of this fact is a significant factor in the struggle against the attacks made on the genuineness of the book, has been demonstrated by me in my book, Die mesiasische Erwartung der vorreisalichen Propheten (cf. 39-40 for the case of Amos; 62 ff., 136 f., for the case of Hosea; 197 ff. for Isa 7-12; 238 ff. for Micah; see also my article in Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary).

Down to the time when Jesus fell, Ezekiel was compelled to antagonize the hopes, which were supported by false prophets, that God would not suffer this calamity. Over against this, Ezekiel persistently and emphatically points to this fact, that the apostasy had been too great for God not to bring about this catastrophe. There is scarcely a violation of a single command—religious, moral or cultural—which the prophet is not compelled to charge against the people in the three sections, 3 16 f.; 8 1 f., until in 24 1 ff., on the 10th day of the 10th month of the 9th year (589 BC) the destruction of Jerusalem was symbolized by the vision of the boiling pot with the piece of meat in it, and the unparalleled destruction of the city was prefigured by the unmanned and sudden death of his wife (see 1, above). After the five sections of this subdivision I, referring to Israel—each one of which subdivisions is introduced and followed by a description of the others and chronologically arranged (1 f.), with the consecration of the prophet immediately following it; 3 16f.; 8 1 f.; 20 1 f.; 24 1 f.—there follow as a second subdivision the seven oracles against the three Kings and the nations (25 1 ff., 28ff.); the Edomites (25 12 ff.); the Philistines (25 15 ff.); Tyre (26 1 ff.); Sidon (28 20 ff.); Egypt (29 1 ff.), evidently arranged from a geographical point of view.

The most extensive are those against Tyre and the group of oracles against Egypt, both provided with separate dates (of 26 1-29 1; 30 20; 31 1; 32 1.17). The supplement in reference to Tyre (29 17 ff.) is the latest dated oracle of Ezekiel (from the year 573 BC), and is found here, at a suitable place, because it is connected with a threat against Egypt (chs. 40-48 date from the year 573 according to ch. 40 1). The number seven evidently does not occur accidentally, since in other threats of this kind a typical number appears to be preferred. This is the case chosen: Isa. 13-22, i.e. ten; Jer. 45-51, also ten; which fact again under the circumstances is an important argument in repelling attacks on the genuineness of the book.

Probably the prophet did not follow in the spirit of the first subdivision, and the seven of the second, supplement each other, making a total of twelve (cf. the analogous structure of Ex. 26 1-30 10 under Exodus, and probably the chiasic structure of Ezek 34-40, with 7+7 pieces; see below). The oracles against the foreign countries are not only in point of time to be placed between ch 24 and 33 21, but also, as concerns contents, help splendidly to solve the difficulty suggested by ch. 24, and in this way satisfactorily fill the gap thus made. The arrival of the nations of the fall of Jerusalem, in 586 BC (ch. 33 21 ff.) which had already been foretold in ch. 24, introduced by the mighty watchman's cry to repentance (33 1 f.), followed by a reproof of the superficial reception of the prophetic word (see 1 above), concludes the first chief part of the book.

The second part also naturally falls into two subdivisions, of which the first contains the development of the nearer and more remote future, as to its inner character, that of the true shepherd of Israel (ch. 34); (1) the future fate of Edom (ch. 35); (2) Israel's deliverance from the disgrace of the shameful treatment by the heathen, which falls back upon the latter again (36 15-17); (4) the desecration of the name of Jeh by Israel and the sanctification by Jeh (36 15-38); (5) the revival of the Israelitish nation (37 1-14); (6) the reunion of the separated kingdoms, Judah and Israel (37 15-28); (7) the overthrow of the terrible gentile power of the north (chs 38 1 f.), which follows five pericopes: (1) directions with reference to the temple (cf the subscription 43 12) (40 5-43 12); (2) the altar (43 13-46 24); (3) the wonderful fountain of the temple, on the banks of which the trees bear fruit every month (47 1-12); (4) the boundaries of the land and its division among the twelve tribes of Israel (47 13-48 29); (5) the size of the holy city and the names of its twelve gates (48 30-55).

In (3) to (5) the prominence of the number twelve is clear. Perhaps we can also divide (1) and (2) each into twelve pieces: (1) would be 40 5 ff. 17 ff. 28 ff. 29 ff. 48 ff. 44 1 f. 15 ff. 42 1 f. 15 ff. 43 1 f.; for (2) it would be 43 13 ff. 18 ff. 44 1 ff. 45 13 ff. 15 ff. (3) would make the same as 19 ff. 19 ff.

At any rate the entire second chief part, chs 34-48, contains predictions of deliverance. The people down to 586 were confident, so that Ezekiel was compelled to rebuke them. After the taking of Jerusalem a change took place in both respects. Now the people are despairing, and this is just the right time for the prophet to preach deliverance. The most important separate prophecies will be mentioned and examined in another connection (II. below).

The transplantation of the whole book suggests the idea that the author did not extend the composition over a long period, but wrote it, so to say, at one stretch, which of course does not make it impossible that the separate prophecies were put into written form immediately after their reception, but rather presupposes this. When the prophet wrote they were only woven together into a single uniform book (cf also Exodus, IV, 1, 2).

(3) His relation to Jeremiah.—As Elijah and Isaiah and Hosea, (chs 44 5 f. and 53 f.); or Haggai and Zechariah, so too Jeremiah and Ezekiel constitute a prophetic couple (cf above); cf e.g. in later time the sending out of the disciples of Jesus, two by two (Lk 10 1), the relation of Peter and John in Acts 3 ff.; of the author of Acts and Melanchthon, Calvin and Zwingli. Both prophets prophesy about the same time; both are of priestly descent (cf above), both witness the overthrow of the Jewish nation, and with their prophecies accompany the fall of the Greek state down to the catastrophe by the cataclysm of the coming judgment with a boiling pot (Ezk 24 1 ff); Jer 1 13 ff.); and finally, in their representation of the Messiah as the priestking (see above; vis. in Ezek 21 23 ff.; 46 22; of Jer 30 21; 33 17 ff.; see 11, 3, and my work Messiahische Erwartung, 320 ff., 354 f.). Neither is to be considered independently of the other, since the prophetic writings, apparently, received canonical authority soon after and perhaps immediately after they were written (cf the expression of the former author in the subscription 43 12). But the constantly increasing number of citations from earlier prophets in the later prophets, and the understanding of the "exact succession of the prophets" down to Artaxerxes in Jos, Cap. I, 8), it is possible that Ezekiel, with his own consecution, with which the book begins, is to be understood as desiring to connect with the somewhat older Jeremiah (cf a similar relation of Jonah to Obadiah; see my arts. "Canon of the OT" and "Jonah" in Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary).

(4) Fate of the book and its place in the Canon.—With Jeremiah and Ezekiel, many Heb MSS, esp. those of the Ger. and Fr. Jews, begin the series of "later prophets," and thus these books are found before Isa; while the Massorah and the MSS of the Spanish Jews, according to the age and the size of the books, have the order, Isa, Jer, Ezk. The text of the book is, in part, quite corrupt, and in this way the interpretation of the book, not easy in itself, is made still more difficult.

Ezekiel, writes that the beginning and the end of the book contained many dark passages; that these parts, like the beginning of Gen, were not permitted to be read by the Jews before these had reached their 30th year. Perhaps in the days of Hillel and Shammajar, Ezekiel belonged to those books which some wanted "to hide," the others being Prov, Eccl, Est and Cant. In these discussions the question at issue was not the reception of the whole book, but the Canon, which was either presupposed, nor again any effort to exclude them from the Canon again, which thought could not be reconciled with the high estimate in which it is known that Est was held, but it was the exclusion of these books from public reading in the Divine service, which project failed. The reasons for this proposal are not to be sought in any doubt as to their authenticity, but in reference to their contents (cf my art. "Canon of the OT," in Murray's Illustrated Bible Dictionary). Possibly, too, one reason was to be found in the desire to avoid the profanation of the most sacred vision in the beginning of the book, as Zunz suggests. There is no doubt, however, that the difference of this book from the Torah was such as to make it difficult for Luther or Melanchthon to read it in public. It was hoped that these contradictions would be solved by Ezekiel when he should return. But finally, rabbinical research, after having used up three hundred cans of oil, succeeded in finding the solution. These contradictions, as a matter of fact, have not yet been removed, and have in modern times contributed to the production of a very radical theory in criticism, as will be shown immediately under II. 2.

II. Significance of Ezekiel in Israel's Religious History.—Under the first head we will consider the formal characteristics and significance of the book; and the examination of its contents will form the subject under the next four divisions.

1. The Formal Characteristic of the book of Ezekiel is that just as the other prophets did, he too is largely marked by what he pronounces in the revelations of God he had received.

Ezekiel However, he had access only to a portion of the people. It was indeed for him even more important than it had been for the earlier prophets to provide for the wider circulation and permanent influence of his message by putting it into written form. We will, at this point, examine his book first of all from its formal and its aesthetic side. To do this it is very difficult, in a short sketch, to give even a general impression of the poetical richness and poetry of the visions at his command for the expression of his thoughts.

(1) Visions.—Thus, a number of visions at once attract our attention. In the beginning of his work there appears to him the Divine throne-chariot, which proceeds from the north as a storm, as a great cloud and a fire rolled together. This chariot is borne by the four living creatures in the form of men, with the countenances of a man, of a lion, of an ox and of an eagle, representing the whole living creation. It will be remembered that these figures have passed over into the Rev of St. John (4 7), and later were regarded as the symbols of the four evangelists. In chs 10 ff this throne-chariot in the vision leaves the portal of the temple going toward the east, returning again in the prediction of deliverance in ch 43. Moreover, the entire last nine chapters are to be interpreted as a vision (cf 40 2). We must not forget, finally, the revivalization of the Israelitish nation in ch 37, represented in the picture of a field full of dead bones, which are again united, covered with skin, and receive new life through the ruḥ (word of two meanings, "wind" and "spirit").

As a rule the visions of Ezekiel, like those of Zechariah and Daniel (are "symbolical," in Meyer's Illustrated Bible Dictionary), are not regarded as actual experiences, but only as literary forms. When it is given as a reason for this that the number of visions are too great and too complicated, and therefore too difficult of presentation, to be real experiences, we must declare this to be an altogether too unsafe, subjective and irrelevant rule to apply in the matter. However correct the facts mentioned are in themselves they do not compel us to draw this conclusion. Not only is it uncertain how many visions may be experiences (cf e.g. the five visions in Am 7 ff, which are generally regarded as actual experiences), but it is also absolutely impossible to prove such an a priori claim with reference to the impossibility and the unreality of processes which are not accessible to us by our own experience. As these visions, one and all, are, from the religious and ethical sides, up to the standards of OT prophecy, and as, further, they are entirely detached and abstract, there is nothing to show that they are only literal forms, we must hold to the conviction that the visions are actual experiences.

(2) Symbolical acts.—Then we find in Ezek, also, a large number of symbolical acts. According to Divine command Ezekiel sketched the city of Jerusalem and its siege on a tile (4 1 ff); or he lies bound on his left side, as an atonement, 390 days, and 40 days on his right side, according to the number of years of the guilt of Jerusalem and Judah (4 4 ff). During the 390 days the condition of the people in exile is symbolized by a small quantity of food daily of the weight of only 20 shekels, and unclean, being baked on human or cattle dung, and a small quantity of water, which serves as food and drink of the prophet (4 9 ff).

By means of his beard and the hair of his head, which he shaves off and in part burns, in part strikes with the sword, and in part scatters to the wind, and only the very smallest portion of which he ties together in the hem of his garment, he pictures how the people shall be decimated so that only a small remnant shall remain (5 1 ff). In ch 12, he prepares articles necessary for marching and departs in the middle of the land through Israel just as a captive and its king will not see the country into which he goes (cf the blindness of Zedekiah, 2 K 25 7). In 37 15 ff, he unites two different sticks into one, with inscriptions referring to the two kingdoms, and these picture the future union of Israel and Judah. It is perhaps an open question whether or not some of these symbolical visions are difficult to carry out in actuality, are not perhaps to be interpreted as visions; thus, e.g. the distributing of the wine of wrath to all the nations, in Jer 26 15, can in all probability not be understood in any other way. It appears to us that here, too, the acceptance of a mere literary form is both unnecessary and unsatisfactory, and considering the religious-ethical character of Ezek, not permissible.

(3) Allegories.—In regard to the numerous allegories, attention need be drawn only to the picture of the two unfaithful sisters, Oholah and Oholibah (i.e. Samaria and Jerusalem), whose relation to Jeh as well as their infidelity is portrayed in a manner that is actually "too intellectual," cf ch 22 ff; of ch 16.

In ch 17, Zedekiah is represented under the image of a grapevine, which the great eagle (i.e. the king of Babylon) has appointed, which, however, turns to another great eagle (king of Egypt), and because of its superlatively great size until God, eventually, causes a new tree to grow out of a tender branch.

(4) Lamentations.—Of the lamentations, we mention the following: according to ch 25, a lioness with young ones under her lap (cf Aeschylus' Seven against Thebes), and in the other is caught in a trap and led away by noise-rings. The ones meant are Jehoahaz and certainly Jehoahazin. The lion mother, who before was like a grapevine, is banished (Zedekiah). Another lamentation and prophecy, directed to a proud ship (of 27 1 ff); also over the king of Tyre, who is hurled down from the mountain of the gods (38 11-19); and over Pharaoh of Egypt, who is pictured as a crocodile in the sea (32 1 ff).

That his contemporaries knew how to appreciate the prophet at least from the aesthetic side, we saw above (I, 1). What impression does Ezekiel make upon us today, from this point of view? He is declared to be "too intellectual for a poet," "imaginative," "vivacity in him finds a substitute in strengthening and repetition;" "he has no poetical talent;" "he is the most monotonous prose writer among the prophets. These and similar opinions are heard. In matters of fact there is more to be seen than is food for reflection in the story handed down that Frederick von Schiller was accustomed to read Ezek, chiefly on account of his magnificent descriptions, and that he himself wanted to learn Heb in order to be able to enjoy the book in the original. And Herder, with his undeniable and undisputed fine appreciation of the poetry of many nations, calls Ezekiel "the Aeschylus and the Shakespeare of the Hebrews" (cf Lange's Comm. on Ezek, 518).

1. Ezekiel the seer.—The distinction between priests and Levites was introduced by Ezekiel.—(a) The Bib. facts on the subject: In the vision of the reconstruction and the Levitical tabernacle in the temple (ch 40 ff) in the second periope, which treats of the cultus (43 13-46 24; of I, 2, 2), it is declared, that Ezekiel, at the command of Jeh, reproaches the Israelites that they engage in their own room strangling the unclean, and uncircumcised in flesh, to take charge of the service of Jeh in the sanctuary, instead of doing this service themselves, and thus desecrate the temple (44 3-8). From now on the Levites, who hitherto were participating in the service of the priests on the high places and had become for Israel an occasion of guilt, are to attend to this work. They are degraded from the priesthood as a punishment of their guilt, and are to render the above-mentioned service in the temple (vs 9 ff), while only those Levitical priests, the sons of Zadok, who had been rendering their services in the sanctuary in the preexilic period, while Israel was going astray, are to be permitted to take part in the service of the high places (vs 10 f).

(b) The modern interpretation of this passage (Ezk 44 4 ff) is regarded as one of the most important proofs for the Wellhausen hypothesis. Down to the 7th cent. BC it is claimed that there are no signs that distinction was made between the persons who had charge of the cultus in Israel, and this is held to be proved by the history of the preceding period and by the Book of Dt, placed by the critics in this time. It is said that Ezekiel is the first to change this, and in this passage introduces the distinction between priests and the lower order of Levites, which difference is then presupposed by the PC. According to this view, the high priest of the PC, too, would not yet be known to Ezekiel, and would not yet exist in his time. More fully expressed, the development would have to be thought as follows: the Book of Dt, which abolished the service on the high places, and had introduced the concentration of the cultus, had in a humana way provided for the deposed Levites, who had been in these places, and, in 18 6 ff, had expressly permitted them to perform their work in Jerusalem, as did all of their brethren of their tribe, and to enjoy the same income as these. While all the other Deuteronomic commands had in principle been recognized, this ordinance alone had met with opposition: for in 2 K 23 9 we are expressly told that the priests of the high places were not permitted to go up to Jerusalem.

Ezekiel now, according to Wellhausen's statement, "hangs on the logic of the facts a moral mantle," by representing the deposition of the priests of the high places as a punishment for the fact that they were priests of the high places, although they had held this position in the past by virtue of legal right.

It is indeed true, it is said, that these priests did not submit to such a representation of the case and such treatment. The violent contents which are said to have arisen in consequence are thought to have their outcome expressed in Nu 16 f (the rebellion of the Levite Korah and his tribe). The PC, however, continued to adhere to the distinction once it had been introduced, and had become a fact already at the return in 538 BC (cf Ezr 2 36 ff), even if it was found impossible to limit the priesthood, to those who had been deposed, but to make an honorable office out of the degraded position of the Levites as given by Ezekiel. The fact that, according to Ezr 2 36 39, in the year 538 BC, already 4,289 priests, but according to ver 40, only 74 Levites, returned, is also regarded as proving how dissatisfied the degraded priests of the high places had been with the new position, created by Ezekiel, to which they had been assigned. With the introduction of the PCodex in 444 BC, which made a distinction between high priest, priests and Levites (cf Ezr 2 36), this development reached an end for the time being. While Dt speaks of the "Levitical priests," which expression is regarded as confirming the original identity of the priests and the Levites, it is claimed that since the days of Ezekiel priests and Levites constitute two sharply distinguished classes.

(c) Examination of this view: Both the exegesis of Ezk 44 4 ff and the whole superstructure are in every direction indefensible and cannot be maintained (also my own work, Are the Critics Right? 20 ff, 124 ff, 196 ff).

(c) Proof that the hypothesis cannot be maintained for the preexilic period. The claim that down to the 7th cent. BC there did not exist in Israel any distinction among the persons engaged in the public cultus is in itself an absurdity, but has in addition against it the express testimony of history. In preexilic times the high priest is expressly mentioned in 2 K 12 9 ff; 25 4 8; 23 4. Accordingly he cannot have been a product of the post-exilic period (vs 16 f), and is distinguished from Ahimelech (1 S 21), Abiathar (1 K 2 26 f), Zadok (1 K 2 25), is vastly above that of an ordinary priest. The fact that the expression "high priest" does not happen to occur here is all the less to be pressed, as the term is found even in the PC only in Lev 21 10; Nu 35 25 28. From Dt 10 6; Josh 24 38; Jgs 20 28, we learn that the office of high priest was transmitted from Aaron to his son, Eleazar, and then to his son, Phinehas (cf also Nu 25 11). Before the time of Eli, according to 1 Ch 24 3, it had passed over to the line of the other surviving son of Aaron, that of Ithamar, but, according to 1 K 2 26 1 35, at the deposition of Abiathar and the appointment of Zadok, it returned again to the line of Eleazar (cf 1 S 2 27 28 35 f with 1 Ch 24 3). Distinctions within the tribe are also expressly supposed by Jer 20 1; 29 25 29; 52 24; 2 K 25 18. In the same way Levites are expressly mentioned in history (cf Jgs 17 f; 19 21; 1 S 6 15; Josh 18 7 16 24; 21 19 29), and there is no such division of the priestly tribe into three parts possibly suggested the three parts of the temple of Solomon (the holy of holies, the holy place, the forecourt). According to all this, it is not possible that this distinction is not found in Jer 25 28, which book was not written until the 7th cent. BC and throughout took into consideration the actual condition of affairs at that time, as is generally claimed. But this difference is found in Dt, the false dating of which we can here ignore, and is probably suggested by it. If this were not the case, then the addition of the words "the whole tribe of Levi" to the words "Levitical priests" in 18 1 would be tautology. But as it is, both expressions already refer to what follows: viz. vs 8 5 to the priests and vs 6 ff to the rest of the Levites. In the same way, the Levites are in 12 11 14 the objects of charity, while 18 3 ff prescribes a fixed and not insignificant income for the priests. Then, finally, such general statements as 10 19 and 10 25, if not only demand such specific directions as are found only in P, but in 10 9; 18 2 there is a direct reference to Nu 18 20 24 (from P). On the other hand, Dt, in harmony with its general tendency of impressing the point considered to make the Levite, the habitation the chief demands of the law, does not find it necessary, in every instance, to mention the distinctions that existed in the tribe of Levi.

In Nu 18 7 we have in P even an argument to Dt 10 8; 33 8; since here, too, no distinction is made between priests and high priests separately, but the whole priestly service is mentioned in a summary manner (cf further Lev 6 22 in comparison with ver 25; Nu 36 in comparison with Josh 21). That Dt cannot say "Aaron and his sons," as P does, is certainly self-evident, because Aaron was no longer living at the time when the addresses of Dt were delivered. And how the expression "Levitical priests," which Dt uses for the expression found in P, and which was entirely suitable, because under all circumstances the priests were of the tribe of Levi, is to be understood as excluding the subordinate members of the cultus-officers belonging to the same tribe, is altogether incomprehensible (cf the emphasis placed on the Levitical order itself, as found in Nu 17; Josh 21 4 10 ff). So are other passages which originated at a time after the introduction by Ezekiel, or, according to the critics, are claimed to have been introduced then (cf Mal 2 1 4 8; 3 3; Jer 32 8; Isa 66 21; 2 Ch 5 5; 23 18; 29 4 ff; 30 27), and even in

Ezek (44 15). The claims that Dt is more humane in its treatment of the priests who had engaged in the worship in high places (cf. e.g., 2 K 22 f.) cannot at all be reconciled with Dt 13, which directs that death by stoning is the punishment for such indiscretion. If, notwithstanding this, it is still claimed that Dt 18 6 f. allows the priests of the high places to serve in Jerus, then it is incomprehensible how in 2 K 23 9 these men did not appeal directly to Dt in vindication of their rights over against all hindrances, since Dt was regarded as the absolute norm in carrying out the cultus tradition.

(2) Examination of the hypothesis on the basis of Ezk: No less unfavorable to the view of the critics must the judgment be when we examine it in the light of the individual cases. The prophet presupposes a double service in the sanctuary, a lower service which, in the future, the degraded priests of the high places are to perform and which, in the past, had been performed in an unlawful manner by strangers for a higher service, which had been performed by the Zadokites, the priests at the central sanctuary, in the proper way at the time when the other priests had gone astray, which service was for this reason to be interrupted to them alone in the future (cf. also, 44 45:46; 43 19). Since in vs 6 ff. the sharpest rebukes are cast up to Israel (according to the reading of the LXX, which here uses the second person, even the chiasm has been changed), because the priests had permitted the lower service to be performed by unceremonised aliens, it is absolutely impossible that Ezekiel should have been the first to introduce the distinction between higher and lower service, but he presupposes this distinction as something well known and, also, that the lower service has been regulated by Divine ordinances. As we have ordinances clearly given only in Nu 18 2 ff. (from P) it is in itself natural and almost necessary that Ezk has recourse to these vs. Ezr, although these very ordinances direct that the Levites are to have charge of this lower service. This is confirmed by Ezk 48 12 f., where the designation "Levites" in contradistinction from the priests is a fixed and recognised term for the lower cultus officials. For Ezk and at all said that he would from now on call these temple-servants simply by the name "Levites," but, rather, he simply presupposes the terminology of P as known and makes use of it also, even selecting this expression to designate a condition of punishment, since the term "Levites" is recognized on all hands to be an honorable title in the sacred Scriptures. And when he, in addition, designates the Zadokites as "Levitical priests" (44 15), this only shows anew that Ezk in his designation of the lower temple-servants only made use of the terminology introduced by P.

But, on the representation of the critics, the whole situation ascribed to Ezekiel cannot be upheld. It is maintained that a prophet filled with the highest religious and ethical thoughts has been guilty of an action that, from an ethical point of view, is to be most sharply condemned. The prophet is made to write reproaches against the people of Israel for something they could not help (vs 6 ff.), and he is made to degrade and punish the priests of the high places, who also had acted in good faith and were doing what they had a right to do (vs 9 f.; "of the moral mantle" which, according to Wellhausen, "he threw over the logic of facts"). Ezekiel is accordingly regarded here as a bad man; but at the same time he would also be a stupid man. How could he expect to succeed in such an uncouth and transparent trick? It success had attended the effort to exclude from the service in Jerus the priests of the high places according to 2 K 23 9, and notwithstanding Dt 18 6 ff., which according to what has been said under (a) is most improbable, then this would through the action of Ezekiel again have been made a matter of uncertainty. Or, was it expected that they would suffer the punishment inflicted and punished without protesting if they had done wrong? Finally, too, the prophet would have belonged to that class whose good fortune is greater than their common sense. This leads us to the following:

(2) Examination of the development after the time of Ezekiel: Ezekiel's success is altogether incomprehensible, if now the distinction between priests and Levites has, at once, been introduced and at the return from captivity, in the year 588 Ezr 2 30 ff. In their view, then, that we at once meet with a host of difficulties. Why do only 74 Levites return according to Ezr 2 40 if their degradation from the ranks of the priesthood through Ezekiel had not preceded? asks the Wellhausen school. Is this not a sign that we are to understand the priests of the high places and, indeed, that we would have therefore, if they had been so disgraced, is our question. But, how is it at all possible that so many priests could return (4,289 among 42,360 exiles, or more than one-tenth of the whole number; of Ezr 2 36-38 with ver 64, if the men are included in the 42,360, if, since the times of Ezekiel, there were none other than Zadokite priests? In examining the writers claimed as the authors of P, all those notices or records which are found in the time of Ezekiel himself. That Nu 18 f. indicates and reflects the opposition of the degraded is nothing but an unproved assertion; but if they had revolted, which was probable enough, then there would have been worse and more foolish means to change the degraded status of the Levites according to Ezk into the honorable position assigned them in P. This would only have made the matter worse. The Levites would again have been able to claim their rights, and they would have acquired the strongest weapons for their opposition. The fact that Ezk's restoration of the priesthood to the Zadokites would have been ignored by P, as also the descent of Aaron through Eleazar and Ithamar (Ezk 2 8), remains incomprehensible (cf. the purposeless and constructive imagination in the description of the details of the Ark of the Covenant, which stands in no connection with the tendency of P; see Exxous III, 5). Nor can it be understood why the creators of the P-C would have assigned other duties to the Levites than Ezekiel had done; the slaying of the burnt offerings and the sacrifices (44 11) and the cooking of the latter (46 24) is lacking in P, in which document the transportation of the imaginary tabernacle would have exhausted the duties of the priests (Nu 4), while in other respects, their services would be described only in such general notices as in Nu 8 23 f.; 18 2 ff. (cf. for this reason the extremely valuable in Ch, which through Ezk 44 11; 46 24 only becomes all the more trustworthy, which would be to the enlargement of the duties of the Levites already by David in 1 Ch 23 25 ff.). In short, the critical view offers one monstrosity after another, and each greater than the predecessor. We will only mention further that, if the critics are right in this matter, then of the directions found in Ezk 40-48 nothing else has ever been carried out in reality, even when these chapters are correctly understood (see 2 [d] below), and at first nothing was intended to be carried out, so that it would be all the more surprising if this aspect of the program of Ezekiel had already been worked out and had been carried out with an inexplicable haste, and that too at a time when the whole cultus was not at all observed (573, according to 40.1).

(d) The solution of the problem: The text as it reads in Ezek 44 ff actually does speak of a degradation. If the matter involved only a mere putting back into the status quo ante, of the Levites, who on the high places, contrary to the law, had usurped the prerogatives of the higher priestly offices, as this could readily be understood, then the expression in vs 12, "They shall bear their iniquity," would lose much of its significance. On the other hand, the whole matter finds its explanation if, in the first place, the lower order of Levites did not put a high estimate on their office, so that they transferred their service to aliens (vs 6 ff), and if, in the second place, by those Levites who departed from Jeh, when Israel was going astray, not all the Levites are to be understood, but only a certain group of priests, who by these means feeled for themselves and their contemporaries enough clearly designated: namely, the descendants of Aaron through Ithamar and Eleazar in so far as they were not Zadokites, that is, had not officiated at the central sanctuary. The non-Zadokite priests had permitted themselves to be imitated in the idolatry in the services of the high places, and for this reason were for the future to be degraded to the already existing lower order of the Levites.

The fact that in the ranks of lower participants in the cultus, already in the days of David, according to Ch, a still further division had taken place (1 Ch 23-26), so that by the side of the Levites in the most narrow sense of the word, also the singers and the gate watchmen were Levites of a lower rank (Neh 13 44-47; 13 10), is again in itself entirely credible, and, in addition, is made very probable by Ex 2 40 ff. This too at once increases the small number of Levites who returned from the exile from 74 (Lev 10 18) to 34 (Ezek 44 6). Although the number yet remains a small one, but from Ezek 44 6 we learn further that the Levites also before the days of Ezekiel had not appreciated their office, for then they would not have given it over to aliens. In the present it only does not appear sufficient and intelligible, but the weapon which was to serve for the defence of the Wellhausen school has in every respect been turned against these critics. The historical order can only be: first, the PC, and after that Ezek; never vice versa.

(2) Ezek 40-48: Priority claimed for Ezekiel over against the Priest Codex (cf Are the Critics Right? 114 ff)._ (a) Sketch of the modern view: The entire vision of what the external condition of affairs would be in the future in chs 40-48, and not only what is particularly stated in 44 4 ff, is made part of Israel's religious development in accordance with the scheme of the Wellhausen school. For this hypothesis, this section is one of the chief arguments, besides the opposition which it claims exists on the part of the prophets against the sacrifices, in addition to the proof taken from the history of the people and from the comparison of the different collections of laws with each other. In Ezek 40-48 many things are different from what they are in the EZK, but the EZK much is lacking that is found in EZK. How now would a prophet dare to change the legislation in P? Hence P is regarded as later than EZK: This is, briefly, the logic of the Wellhausen school.

(b) The one-sidedness of this view and its dangerous consequences: If we first state the facts in the case and complete the observations of the modern school, the picture will at once assume quite a different form and the conclusions drawn will in their consequences prove very embarrassing. It is a fact that in EZK the high priest so prominent in P is lacking. No matter carried out with an inexplicable haste, and that too at a time when the whole cultus was not at all observed (573, according to 40.1).

(d) The solution of the problem: The text as it reads in Ezek 44 ff actually does speak of a degradation. (2) Ezek 40-48: Priority claimed for Ezekiel over against the Priest Codex (cf Are the Critics Right? 114 ff)._ (a) Sketch of the modern view: The entire vision of what the external condition of affairs would be in the future in chs 40-48, and not only what is particularly stated in 44 4 ff, is made part of Israel's religious development in accordance with the scheme of the Wellhausen school. Hence P is regarded as later than EZK: This is, briefly, the logic of the Wellhausen school.

that the problem would be inverted to explain how the author of P could have ventured to deviate so far from the will of God as this had been revealed to Ezekiel.

(6) Impossibility that Ezek preceded P: While the commission of the temple in 40 5 ff and of the future dwelling-places of the people (47 13 ff) is comparatively complete, it is the very legislation of the ritual in 43 13–46 24, in which it is maintained that the authors of P followed the precedent of the prophet, that is in itself incompatible. In Ezek, that it could not possibly have been a first sketch, but must presuppose P, if it is not to be regarded as suspended in the air. Ezek presupposes not only burnt offerings, peace offerings and food offerings, but also sin offerings (40 39; 42 13; 43 19.21 22.25; 44 27.29; 46 20). Ezekiel is indeed the first and the only prophet who mentioned sin offerings, just as the guilt offerings are found outside of Ezek only in Isa 53 10. But this reference is of such a kind that he presupposes the part of his readers an acquaintance with these two kinds of sacrifices; hence it is, in itself, a natural conclusion, that the sacrificial legislation of P, that is, chiefly Lev 1 to 4, is older, and as the guilt offerings and the sin offerings are in Lev 1–4, the latter only appear to be emphasized anew, this conclusion becomes a necessity.

If this is not the case then Ezek is without any foundation. In the same way we have reasoned with reference to what is clean and unclean are presupposed as known in 44 23.25 f (cf 28 26). How long the uncleanness described in ver 26 continued can be seen only from Nu 19 11 ff. Since in Ezek 22 there is presupposed a definitely fixed Torah or Law, which is possible to violate, then it is only natural to conclude that such commands existed before the days of Ezekiel, esp. such as are found in Lev 11–15. In the same way the general character of the ordinances (44 30c), contrasted with the tithes due to the cultus officials, demand such further developments as are found especially in Nu 18 in P. The high priests, too, although Ezekiel makes no mention of them, belong to the period earlier than the time mentioned. In this way we have demonstrated (1), and if there had been no high priest before the days of Ezekiel, it would have been a perfect mystery, in addition, how he would be found after 520 BC (Hag 1 1; Zec 3 8; 6 10 ff), without a word having been mentioned as to such an institution. In addition, if the office had been created just at this time, this would make it very uncomfortable for the contents of the Wellhausen school, since the other ordinances of P were introduced only in 444 BC, and should here be regarded as innovating.

That Ezekiel presupposed the ordinances of P in reference to the cultus officials has been demonstrated under (1). Accordingly, there yet remains to be discussed the question of a relationship that exists between Ezek and the so-called Law of Holiness (H) in Lev 17–26 (cf Leviticus), which is so great, that for a time Ezekiel was regarded as the author or the editor of this law, a view which, however, has been dropped, because a number of the peculiarities of Ezek do not admit of its acceptance. The more advanced critics then went farther, and claimed that H is later than Ezek, which is the only possible and defensible position. For practical reasons we leave the examination, in addition to Ezek 40–48, also the older parts of the book. Especially do we take into consideration, in addition to ch 44, also chs 18, 20 and 22; but in the end the contents of H are suggested by the entire Book of Ezek. Esp. Leviticus has been fully used by Ezek, for the details, Driver’s Intro to the OT; or, Hoffmann, Die wichtigsten Instanzen gegen die Graf-Wellhausenesehe Hypothesen. That Ezek could not be the earlier of the two can be concluded as far as P in general is concerned, and for H in particular, esp. from this, that Ezek is just as closely connected with Dt and Jer, as with P; while, on the other hand, the book in question here is connected only with Ezek, while the expressions which Ezek has in common with Dt and those Ezek has in common with Jer are not found in P (cf the exceedingly interesting and instructive proof in Hoffmann, op. cit.). Equally striking is the proof of omission in Ezek, as is the case in Ezek, and particularly the Ezekiel, 1154 ff, who shows that the contents of the Torah (Law) presupposed and recognized by Jer and Ezek as dating from the Mosaic period, take into consideration not only the Books of the Covenant (Ex 24 ff; 40 ff), but Jer 13 P, Jer 19, and H in particular. Further, if we place P in a later period, it would be incomprehensible that this body of laws, in which the systematic feature is so important, can differ from the still more systematic ordinance of Ezek, and thus presupposes a systematization. Thus the sacrifices on the Pessover and the Feast of Tabernacles are in number of the same kind in Ezek 45 21 ff; but not so in P in Nu 28 16 ff; 29 12. In the same way in the food offerings there would be oil only in Lev 1, so the amount of oil to be given are concerned, there is everywhere the proper proportion in 45 18–36 15, while in Nu 28 this is regulated according to a different principle. Then Ezek are found in the tabernacle (42 15–20; 45 2), of the inner and outer courts (40 23.27.47; cf also 40 19; 48 16 f), square figures in places where they are not found in the tabernacle according to P. To this must be added that no other ordinances of Ezek would be carried out in actual practice. Even the ordinances in 44 4 ff, according to the views of the critics, would be changed in P, in so far as the establishment and work of the lower cultus officials and the enlargement of the priests would be connected among the other ordinances of Ezek (cf 11). The Day of Atonement, whose roots are said to be found in 45 18 ff, would be materially changed in number, length and ritual (cf Day of Atonement, I, 1 and III, 1). When the Israelites returned, the priests, they did not think at all of building the temple or the tabernacle in accordance with Ezekiel’s scheme, or dividing the land according to the directions of his book (both of these subjects have great prominence in Ezek 40–48; cf 40 11–15; 40 18), in order to establish the tabernacle itself. Ezekiel’s hypothesis is then in conflict with all ritual legislation, whether real or constructed by Wellhausen himself.

(6) The correct interpretation of Ezek 40–48: These chapters dare not be made a part of the development of the law in the OT. Ezekiel’s was not a program that was under all circumstances to be carried out or even could be carried out, for it presupposes conditions that were beyond the control of Israel. For in 40 2 f, a new geographical or geological situation is presupposed, which the country up to this time did not possess (of the “very high mountain,” 40 2), and the same is true in 47 1 ff in reference to the miraculous temple foundation with its equally miraculous powers, and in 47 13 ff in the division of the land. Only after these changes had been effected in the character of the localities by Jeh, and Jeh should again have entered the holy city according to Ezek 40–48, would it be possible to carry out also the other injunctions. It is impossible, either, to interpret these chapters as an allegory. This interpretaion is out of the question on account of the large number of directions and measurements. It is, however, possible to find in the details, which portrays to the eye the continuation of the kingdom of God, and represents symbolically the presence of Jeh, which sanctifies all around about it and creates for itself a suitable outward form. This is particularly apparent in the new name which is assigned to Jerusalem, namely, “Jeh at that place,” or the conclusion of this section and at the same time of the book. This lends us a brief account of the views presented:

(3) Ezekiel’s Leviticism. — In (1) and (2) above, it has been shown that Ezek was not the starting-point of Leviticism in Israel; it rather represents the extreme development of this tendency. It was in harmony with the elementary stage of the OT to give the thoughts and demands of God, not in a purely abstract form, but to clothe them in objective and external material, in order to prepare and educate Israel to understand Christianity. (The negative side of Leviticism, which is not to be overlooked by the side of the positive, is discussed in the art. Leviticus.) It is a matter of utmost importance for the correct understanding of the OT, that we recognize that the prophets too throughout think Levitically in their discourses, too, sacred trees, sacrifices, times, persons, tithes, play a most important role, notwithstanding all the spiritualization of religion on their part; and where it is thought possible, to avoid the opposition to the part of the prophets to the Levitical system, namely, in the matter of sacrifices, a close consideration, but esp., too, the analogy of the other external institutions, shows that we have in these cases only a relative antithesis (cf Are the Creeds Right? 90 ff.; Messianische Erwartung der vorzeitlichen Propheten, 383 ff). Thus e.g. Jeremiah who, in 6 20; 7 21 ff., engages as sharply as possible in polemics against the sacrificial system, and in 31 8 ff., in the passage treating of the new covenant, spiritualized religion as much as possible, assigned to sacrifices a place in his predictions of the future (cf 17 19 ff.; 31 14; 33 18), just as the abiding-place and the revelation of God for this prophet too, are always found connected with the Holy Land, Jerusalem or Zion (cf 3 17; 12 15; 30 18; 31 6.11.12; 32 26 ff.; 33 9). That in this ultimate development of the kingdom of God has not yet been reached, but that the entire OT contains only a preliminary stage, cannot be too sharply emphasized. In so far as Ezekiel, in his book Leviticism showed in its most developed state, more than others, shares in the limitations of the OT. But just as little can it be denied that the Levitical system was really one stage, and that, too, an important and indispensable stage in the development of the kingdom of God; that in this system, the question at issue is not only that of a change of a religion into a stereotyped formalism or externalism, which is the case if this system loses its contents, but the fact that it contained a valuable kernel which ripened in this shell, but would not have ripened if this shell had been prematurely discarded. The external conditions, their harmonious arrangement, the ceremonial ordinances, keeping clean from external pollution, are indeed only forms, but in them were embodied certain essential elements of the race's expression; through these Israel learned to understand these contents. The kernel could not be given without the shell nor the contents without the form, until in Christianity the time came when the form was to be broken and the shell discarded. This significance of the Levitical system becomes more evident in Ezek than is the case, e.g. in P, where indeed a few passages like Ex 26 8; 39 45 ff; 40 34 ff.; Lev 16; 19 18; 26 31 ff. 41 clearly show in what sense the entire Levitical system is to be understood; but above all the fact that there are so few of these passages makes it easy to overlook them; while in Ezek, in addition to the purely Levitical utterances, and in part more closely connected with these, the entire work is saturated with the emphasis put on the highest religious and ethical thoughts, so that both must be in the closest harmony with each other (cf on this subject also Ezekiel’s conception of God under 5 below). That Ezek and the Law of Holiness stand in such close relations to each other is not from my mouth, since it is explained in the context, and Ezek 17 ff ever existed as a separate legal code. We must in this connection not forget the close connection of the prophets with the rest of P mentioned under (2) above (cf Leviticus). We close this part of the discussion with the statement that Ezekiel constructed his system on the basis of the Levitical ordinance, but as priest-prophet (cf under 1, 1) utilized this material independently and freely.

Thus 40-48 treat of the future, and furnish us the transition to another matter, in which Ezek by modern theology has been forced into a wrong light, namely, in regard to the Messiah and the Messianic idea. After the critics had, as a matter of fact, eliminated from the prophetic writings nearly all of the passages speaking of the Messiah on the ground that they were not genuine (e.g. Am 9 8 ff; Hos 1 10.11; 5 16; Mic 2 12 ff; Is 4 2-6; 7 14; 9 1-7, 11 1-10, etc.), Marti and others have now reconstructed this task. While the former declared as not genuine all the Messianic predictions down to Deutero-Isaiah, the latter, has in his work, Die vorzeitliche Jhwe-Prophetie und der Messias, halted at Ezek, but for this work has put the entire material into a uniform fundamental conception with pronounced characteristics. He declares that prophecy and the Messianic idea are two mutually exclusive phenomena, by regarding the Messiah as a purely political and national fact, but the prophetic expectation of the future as something purely religious. Ezekiel regards as the first prophet with whose views on other matters the Messianic idea indeed did not harmonize, but who, nevertheless, yielded to the tendencies of his day and whose book contains the genuine thought, views of the Messiah as part of the kingdom of God. We see in Ezekiel what has been the development of the national Messianic expectation that in the prophets who had created the national expectation of a Messiah and literally fed this, and accordingly received into his book the Messianic passages in his Prophetic writings (cf 22-24: development of God’s name through the Messianic hope; 24.25. But this too is, in all all, simply a monstrous assumption. It is exegetically incorrect to regard the Messiah merely as a political, national and particularistic person, whenever the religious and ethical and universalistic characteristics of the Messiah are portrayed by prophecy; and it is also incorrect to regard prophecy as abstractly religious, when the national and external side of the kingdom of God is ignored. It is impossible to eliminate the different Messianic passages preceding the time of Ezekiel, as these are proved to be genuine by their contents and form, their close connection with the context, the structure of the prophetic writings, and by the mutual relation of these passages to each other. But we must here refer to our book, Die messianische Erwartung der vorzeitlichen Propheten. We draw attention to this only because since the publication of Gressmann’s book, Der Ursprung der israelitisch-judentum Eschatologie, the critics have begun to allow a little less importance to the genuine character of the Messianic passages in the older prophetic writings. We have pointed to the fact, that the positive contents of Vols, which ascribe to Ezekiel the introduction of the Messianic idea out of the popular faith, are exceedingly inconsiderate. The different passages mentioned above, which in Ezek speak of the Messiah, can scarcely be said to add any new features to the picture of the Messiah as it is found in earlier lit. (of one exception to this we will speak later). If the Messiah was not yet portrayed in the earlier prophetic lit. Ezekiel had this occasion to introduce this new feature, if this feature did not harmonize with his other views, as Volz claims. And, if this is only a mistake, it is yet a fact that in Ezek the Messianic idea is not relatively a prominent feature; he as it were, openly recalls the pictures known from the predictions of the earlier prophets; he accepts these pictures as revealed truth, because they, in his conviction, evidently originated in the development of prophecy. Cf for the idea that the Messiah is to come forth from small origins and from a lowly station Ezek 17 22-24; Isa 10 33; 34 1; 11 1; Mic 5 1 ff. Ezek 21 32 only hints at the general expectation of a Messiah; Ezek 34 23 f; 37 22. 24; 25 connect esp. with the promises given to David in 2 S 7. Then the reunion of the two kingdoms into one scepter is found also in Am 9 11; Hos 2 2; 3 5; Isa 8 23-9 1 f; 11 13 f; Mic 5 2; Jer 3 18; 23 5 f; 1 K 11 30; the blessing of Nature, Isa 11 6-8; Am 9 13 f; Hos 2 20 f; 14 6 ff. At the same time, the Messianic personages of Ezekiel exhibit too few peculiar features and are too little prominent in the body of his prophecies to justify the belief that he was the first prophet to have introduced this so important Messianic figure. On the other hand, let us remember too that Ezekiel opposed the national feelings as sharply as possible by representing the entire past history of Israel as an unbroken chain of heathenish abominations (chns 1-24, 33, esp. 18 and 23), and remember it was just he who like Jeremiah saw his most bitter opponents in the false prophets (13 1 f; 14 9; 22 28), and that in the most pronounced antithesis to these he proclaimed before the fall of Jerus that this fall would and must come. And now it is claimed that he borrowed his Messianic idea from these very people, although this Messianic conception is everywhere represented as being a Divine revelation and not a natural product of the popular consciousness. A greater blunder in theological thought could scarcely be imagined. In order to see in this the further development of the Messianic idea, namely, that in His work, in addition to His characteristics as a king, the Messiah has also those of a high priest, as this is shown at the same period by Jeremiah (see above 2, 12, 3 f), and possibly 6 ff. The mychepheth, which the Messiah bears according to Ezek 21 26, is in other connections always the mitre of the high priest (cf Ex 28 4; 39 29; 39 28-31; see above 11, 2, 14a and 1b). At the Passover feast, at least, the prince conducts a purification through a bullcork for a sin offering, which, through the fact that this is done for himself and for the entire people of the land, reminds us of the ceremony of the high priest on the day of atonement (Ezk 45 22; Lev 16 17 24 38; cf Day of Atonement, I, 1, and Messianische Erwartung der vorexilischen Propheten, 356 ff). Over against the current view, we finally emphasize the fact that Ezekiel’s expectations of a Messianic feature are not confined to Israel, but like those of Isaiah (2 2 ff; 11 10; Mic 5 3-6) and of other prophets are universal in their scope (cf Ezek 17 23; 16 53 61; 54 26). Ezekiel is also, finally, regarded as the creator of apocalyptic lit., which in prophetic garment can be traced to adduce people and picture the details of the last times. In this connection the critics have in mind esp. Ezek 38, 39, that magnificent picture of the final onslaught of the nations under Gog and Magog, which will end with the certain victory of the Divine cause and the terrible overthrow of the enemies of Jeh. On the mountains of Israel the hosts will fall (39 4); seven years it will be possible to kindle fires with the weapons of the enemies (39 9); it takes seven months to bury the dead (39 12); a great feast is prepared for the birds (39 17 ff). In reply to this there are two things to be said. First of all Ezekiel is not the creator of these thoughts. There is a whole list of passages in the Prophets that show before his time how picture how matters will be after and beyond the Messianic age (cf Mic 2 12ff; 4 11; 5 4ff; 720; Joel 3 21ff; Isa 11 4; 28 6; Hos 2 2). These are, however, all regarded by the critics as not genuine, or as the product of a later period, but they forget in this to observe that Ezekiel in these passages refers to older prophets (38 17; 39 8), and thus they saw off the branch upon which he sits. In regard, however, to painting the fullest details of the picture, Ezekiel is equalled by none of his predecessors. In this matter, too, he represents the highest point of development, in which he is followed by Zec 12; 13 7 ff; 14 1 ff, and Dnl, and with direct dependence on Ezek 38 by the Apocalypse of St. John (cf Rev 20 7 ff cf 11 17 2ff). In this picture of Ezekiel, which is different from the later Jewish apocalyptic lit. The latter borrowed the prophetic form but possesses neither the Divine contents nor the Divine inspiration of the prophet. For this reason the apocalyptic lit. appears typically or under a pseudonym. Ezekiel, however, openly places his name over his prophecies. In Ezek the eschatology is a part of his prophetic mission, and as he in his thoughts throughout remains within the bounds of the religious and ethical ideals of prophecy, that feature, too, of his work is to be regarded as a Divine revelation in a form in harmony with the OT stage of the development of the kingdom of God. We are here indeed considering a matter in connection with which it is esp. difficult to determine how much in reality belongs to the eternally valid contents, and how much to the temporary forms. Here too, as is the case in the exegesis of chs 40-45, Christian theology will vacillate between the extremes of literalism and spiritualism and thus will by no means be correcting the other, and in this way constantly approaching the correct middle course, until at some time in the future we will reach the full truth in the matter. A prophet who, from the aesthetic side, enjoyed the highest appreciation of a Schiller and a Herder (see 1 above), who has brought the 5. Ezekiel’s Leviticism of the OT to the highest Conception stage of development (of 2 above), who of God in his portrait of the Messiah has introduced the high-priestly characteristics (of 3 above), who in eschatology developed new features and laid the foundation for the development that followed in later times (of 4 above), can scarcely with any right or reason be termed a “secondary character among the prophets.” This fact becomes all the more sure when we now finally examine the conception of God as taught in Ezek. In grandeur and variety of thought, in this respect only, Isaiah and Moses can be compared with Ezekiel. Already in the visions, we are struck by the singularity of God as there pictured, esp. in the opening vision, where He appears as the absolute ruler of all creation, over which He sits enthroned (cf 11 1, 4 above). He speaks of the son of man, “Baal of Jehovah,” over against whom the prophet is at all times only “the son of man.” More than fifty times it is said that the purpose of the prophecy was that the heathen nations, as well as the Israelites, shall by His judgments and His promises recognize that He is Jehovah.
On this side Ezekiel stands in an esp. close relation to the description of the exodus from Egypt (cf Ex 7 5.17; 8 10.22; 9 14.20.30; 10 2; 11 7; 14 4.18, and see Exorns, II, 2, on 7 8—13 16). Above everything Jeh’s honor must be defended (35 20.32). Here again there is a place where the evolvement hypothesis of the development of the idea of God is thoroughly put to shame. For in the preprophetic times it is claimed that God is, in the OT, merely placed by the side of other gods and was regarded only as the God of Israel, with whom He was in an essentially connected, because His existence had depended on the existence of the nation. As a proof, reference is made to the defence of His honor; and now we find the same thought in Ezekiel, in whose case it is impossible that any doubt as to his absolute monotheism can any longer arise (cf my Entwickelung der Gottesidee in norexilischer Zeit, 138 ff, 153 ff). The sublimity of this conception of God also appears in its universality. He is declared to be punishing the nations (cf chs 25 ff 35 f); He uses them for His purposes (cf chs 38 f, 17, 19, 24, 33); He intends to give them salvation (chs 17, 23; 16 53.61; 34 26; cf 3 above).

Most of all, Ezekiel’s conception of God, according to the preceding sketch, reminds us of that of Caius. But he could not have cohered with the God we find also a second feature. On the one side we find the holy God; on the other, the sinful man. The entire development of the people is from the beginning a wrong one. Ezekiel’s thoughts are to be regarded as those for days of repentance when he, on the one hand, emphasizes the great guilt of the people as such (cf chs 16 and 23), and by the side of this maintains the principle that each one must be punished on account of his own sins (16 2), so that the individual cannot be absolved himself, and the individual cannot be freed through the guilt of the people as a totality.

But now comes the highest conception. The exalted and holy God comes to be a God of love. What is it but love, that He does not reject His people forever, but promises them a future (cf chs 34—48, in which also the divided kingdoms are to be reunited, 37 15 ff)? As EX finds its culmination point in the indwelling of God among His people, which He promised in Ex 25 ff (29 43 ff), so too in Ezekiel the city, the temple, and the temple people become a matter of doubt again in chs 32 ff through the apostasy of the people, and nevertheless is finally realized in chs 36 ff (40 34 ff) thus too in Ex 10, Jeh leaves the city, but in 43 1 if Jeh again returns to the city, for the name of the city is “Je-hovah-shalom” (48 35). But as every single member participates in the sin and the punishment of the people, so too he takes part in the deliverance. Ezekiel is indeed, as little as is Jeremiah, the creator of individualism, which he has often been declared to be. Against this claim, e.g. the character of the patriarchs can be appealed to. But a deeper conception of individualism has actually been brought about by Jeremiah and Ezekiel. The national organization as such has in the present dissolved. Accordingly, these prophets have now to deal more with the individual (cf 1, 2, 3, above). Ezekiel is actually the pastor of those in exile. He has been appointed the watchman of the house of Israel (8 16 ff and 33 1 f). He can bear the responsibility for the individual soul (cf also ch 18). The wicked man who dies without having been warned is demanded from his hand by God. Jeh does not wish the death of the sinner, but that he should repent and live.

Such a clear mirror is given, that before it conscientious Christian preachers must all feel ashamed. Jeh is the gracious God, who does not treat men simply according to the principle of retaliation, else what would become of man? God rather desires to bestow all things out of free grace; he that repents shall live. This is the highest ideal of the prophet, and with it we close.

The Feast of Weeks, the Pentecost of the Israelites, Ezekiel does not mention (cf II, 2, 26, above). This festival has come to be one of higher importance than of old, for the Holy Spirit was poured out, and this Spirit knows the heart. Besides other passages as Jer 32 15; 44 1—6 Pf 51 12 ff; Joel 2 25 ff; Jer 31 31 ff, it is Ezek which contains the clearest predictions of Pentecost. It is the Spirit who in ch 37 awakens to new life the dead bones of Israel.

And in 36 25—28 we read: “And I will sprinkle clean water upon you, and ye shall be clean: from all your filthiness, and from all your idols, will I cleanse you. A new heart also will I give you, and a new spirit will I put within you; and I will take away the stony heart out of your flesh, and I will give you a heart of flesh. And I will put my Spirit within you, and cause you to walk in my statutes, and ye shall keep mine ordinances, and do them. And ye shall dwell in the land that I gave to your fathers; and ye shall be my people, and I will be your God.”

EZEL, εζελ (276), hā-ādēel; LXX παρά το ἤγαβος ἵσκο, πάρα τὸ ἐγαβὰ ἵσκον: As it stands, the narrative in 1 S 20 19 records the treyst of Jonathan with David at the stone Ezel (or name of the place only here. There is general agreement that the text is corrupt, but there is no agreement as to how it should be restored. The LXX reads “this mound” (RvM), or ‘yonder cairn”; and in ver 41 instead of “David leaves a place towards the South” it reads “from beside the mound” or “cairn.” Dr. Cheyne suggests “yonder juniper tree” (EB a.v.).

EZEM, εζεμ (277), ’e’em, “bone”; Boorad, Boaol, Board, Boier, Bosaol: A city in the extreme S. of Judah, assigned to Simon. Some identify it with Azmon (Josh 15 29; 19 3; 1 Ch 4 26).

EZER, εζέρ (278), ‘ezer, “help”:
(1) A Horite chief (Gen 36 21; 1 Ch 1 38).
(2) A Judahite (1 Ch 4 4).
(3) An Ephraimite, slain by men of Gath (1 Ch 7 21).

EZIAS, ʾez-IALIZ (q.v.).

Ezion-Geber, ʾez-ON-GEBER (ʾez-ON-GEBER; ʾez’on gebber; Faráváh ḁpáš; Gásíón Gibber): Always mentioned along with Elath (ʾEZ zgbrg). Nu 33:35 fixes the location of Israel's farthest border at 'the way of the Arabah,' having come from the N.W., they seem to have turned to the N.E. from the neighborhood of ʿAgabah, passing up by Wády el-ʿIms toward the eastern desert (Dt 2:8). Elath and Ezion-gaber were evidently on the route which the Arabah leaves, "the way of the Arabah," in coming from the W. Esn and Elath 3). Israel and Arabah are both mentioned in connection with the maritime enterprises of Solomon and Jehoshaphat (1 K 9:26, etc.). They therefore both lay on the shore of the sea. No trace of Ezion-gaber is to be found on the present coast line. It is noticeable, however, that in ancient times the sea covered a considerable stretch of the mud flats at the S. end of Wády el-ʿArabah, and the site of Ezion-gaber may be sought near the spring ʿAin el-Qadýán, about 15 miles N. of the present head of the Gulf of ʿAgába. EZERR, ʾez-nit (ʾez-nit or ʾez-nit, ṑʾçon or ṑʾçon). See Adin.

EZORA, ʾez-ORÁ (ʾEZORÁ, Ezórád, AV Ozora): He and his six sons "gave their hands to put away their strange wives" (1 Esd 9:20.34 = "Machnadebai" of Ezr 10:40).

Ezra, ez’RA (Aram. or Chalde. ʾEZRÁ, ʾerá; "help"); a hypocoristic, or shortened form of Azariah, "Jeh has helped." The Heb spell the name ʾEZRÁ, ʾeráh, as in 1 Ch 4:17, or uses the Aram. spelling of the name, as in Ezr 7:1. The Gr form is Esdras:

1. A priest who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Neh 12:1). In Neh 10:2, Azariah, the full form of the name, is found.
2. A descendant of Bithiah and father of Jethro and other sons (1 Ch 4:17).
3. The distinguished priest who is the hero of the Book of Ezr and co-worker with Nehemiah.

The genealogy of Ezra is given in Ezr 7:1-6, where it appears that he was the son of Seraiah, the son of Azariah, the son of Bithiah, the son of Zerubbabel, the son of Shealtiel, the son of ʿEthi, the son of Phinéhas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron, the high priest. Since Seraiah, according to the Book of K, was killed by Nebuchadrezzar at Riblah (2 K 25:15-21), and since he was the father of Jehozadak, the high priest who was carried into captivity by Nebuchadrezzar (1 Ch 6:14.15 [Heb 6:40], etc) in 588 BC, and since the return under Ezra took place in 538 BC, the word "son" must be used in Ezr 7:2 in the sense of descendant. Since, moreover, Joshua, or Josha, the high priest, who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel, was the son of Jehozadak and the grandson of Seraiah, Ezra was probably the great-grandson of the great-grandson of Seraiah. Insuchm as Jehozadak is never mentioned as one of his forefathers, Ezra was probably not descended from Jehozadak, but from a younger brother. He would thus not be a high priest, though he was of high-priestly descent as far as Seraiah. For the sake of shortening the list of names, Josha, Josha, or Joshua, is repeated in Ezr 7:2-5 between Azariah and Meraioth, and one between Shallum and Ahitub from the corresponding list found in 1 Ch 6:4-14 (Heb 6:30-40).

Being a priest by birth, it is to be supposed that Ezra would have performed the ordinary functions of a member of his order, if he had been born and had lived in Pal. Jos, indeed, says that he was high priest of his brethren in Babylon, a statement that in view of the revelation of the Elephanine papyri may not be without a foundation in fact. According to the Scriptures and Jewish tradition, Ezra was an unusually eminent scribe, and esp. a scribe of the law of Moses. He is called "a ready scribe in the law of Moses," a "scribe of the words of the commandments of Jehovah, and of his statutes toward Israel," "the scribe of the law of Moses and of God." As a matters of time, Jeremiah (cf Jer 8:8), "scribe" had already attained the meaning of one learned in the Scriptures, one who had made the written law a subject of investigation. Ezra is the first who is called by the title of "the scribe," the title by which Artaxerxes designates him in his letter of instructions in Ezr 7:6.11.

In the 7th year of Artaxerxes I (459-458 BC) Ezra requested permission of the king to go up to Jerusalem; for "Ezra had set his heart to obey these laws, the law of Jehovah, and to do it, and Commission to teach in Israel statutes and ordinances." Artaxerxes granted his request, and gave him a letter permitting as many of the people of Israel and of the priests and Levites as so desired to accompany him to Jerusalem and commanding him to inquire concerning Judah and Jerusalem, and to carry a gift of money from the king and his counsellors, and all the money to be found in the province of Babylon, and the free will offerings of the people and priests and Levites, to buy offerings to offer upon the altar of the house of God which was in Jerusalem. He was commissioned also to carry vessels for the service of the house of God, and to do at the expense of the royal treasury whatever was needful for the house of God. The king decreed, moreover, that the treasurers of the king should assist Ezra with a tribute of wheat, wine, oil and salt, and that they should impose no tribute, custom or toll upon any of the people in the service of the house of God. Moreover, Ezra was authorized to appoint judges to judge the people according to the law of God and the law of the king, and to inflict punishments upon all who would not obey these laws.

Ascribing this marvelous letter of the king to the loving-kindness of his God, and strengthened by this evidence of God's power, Ezra proceeded to gather together out of Israel the chief men and teachers and Levites, and all the people, and with them sent him to Jerusalem. He gathered these men in camp at Casiphia, on the river Ahava. Here he proclaimed a time of fasting and prayer, that God might prosper their journey (Ezr 8:15-23). Then, having delivered the treasures into the hands of the priests and the assembled company departed for Jerusalem, where, by the help of God they arrived in safety, delivered over the money and gifts by number and weight, offered burnt offerings and sin offerings, delivered the king's commissions and furthered the people and the house of God.

Shortly after Ezra's arrival at Jerusalem, the princes accused the people, the priests, and the Levites of having intermarried with the peoples of the land, even asserting that the princes and rulers had been leaders in the trespass. Upon hearing this, Ezra was confounded, rent his garments, plucked off his hair, fell upon his knees and prayed a prayer of confession, weeping and casting himself down before the house of God. While he prayed the people assembled and wept, acknowledged the sin, and promised to do according to the law. The whole people were then assembled in counsel, and in spite of some opposition the strange wives were put away.

In Neh 8, Ezra appears again upon the scene at the Feast of Tabernacles as the chief scribe of the law of Moses, the leader of the priests and Levites who read and explained the law to the people. On his advice the people ceased from their mourning and celebrated the festival according to the law of Moses with joy and thanksgiving and giving of gifts, dwelling also in booths in commemoration of the manner of their fathers' sojourning while in the wilderness.

The traditions with regard to Ezra found in Jos and in the Talm are so discrepant that it is impossible to place reliance upon any of their statements which are not imputed to the Book of Neh.

EZRA-NEHEMIAH:

1. Name
2. Object
3. Plan
4. Unity
5. Sources

The books of Ezr and Neh, by whomsoever written, are properly so named according to analogy from the principal persons mentioned in them. In the Heb Bibles, the former is headed simply, Ezra, and the latter, Nehemiah. The former was written in Jos, in Jos, and in the Canon of Melito, 171 AD, as one, and are so treated also in the subscription of the MT, which reads: "The totality of the verses of Ezr and Neh is 688, and its sign is 'Remember, Heb.' Ezr, thy servant, and its two parts are [at the sentence] 'unto the ascent of the corner' [Neh 3 31] and its chapters (s'hadarav) are ten, and its sign is 'Upon a high mountain get thee up, O thou that announcest good tidings to Zion.'" In the LXX, Ezr-Neh is called Esdras B, while an apocryphal Book of Ezr is called Esdras A (see below). In the catalogues of the OT writings handed down to us by the Fathers (Orig, Cyril, Melito, Jerome and the Council of Laodicea) our Ezr is divided into 1 Ezr; Neh, 2 Ezr; Esdras, an apocryphal or Ezr, 3 Ezr; and an apocryphal book, falsely called a book of Ezr, is denominated 4 Ezr.

The object of the books is to show that God fulfilled His promise, or prophecy, to restore His exiled people to their inheritance, through the instrumentality on the one hand of the great heathen monarchs, Cyrus, Darius and Artaxerxes, and on the other hand by stirring up the spirit of such great men among the chosen people as Joshua and Zerubbabel, Haggai and Zechariah, and Ezra and Nehemiah, through whom the altar, the temple, the houses and walls of Jerusalem, and finally the worship and ceremony of the Jewish people were reestablished, the people being divided into classes, foreign adoptions, customs and idolatry, and their religious observances purified and fixed for all time.

The object of the work justifies the selection and arrangement of the material and the plan pursued by the composer, or composers; all matter being stringently excluded which does not bear directly upon the purpose in view. However much we may wish that other historical records had been included, it is not proper to criticize the work on account of these omissions, nor is it fair to argue that the writer was ignorant of what he has not seen fit to record.

The unity of the combined work is shown by the fact that they have the same common object, the same plan, and a similarity of language and style; that they treat, for the most part, of the same period of time; and that Ezra is one of the most prominent persons in both.

It is not fair to deny the essential unity on the ground that the list of priests and others found in Ezra 2 is repeated in Neh 7; for there is no doubt that Ezra was the compiler of parts at least of the book called after him, and that Nehemiah also was the original writer of parts of the book that bears his name. Whoever was the final editor of the whole work, he has simply retained the two almost identical lists in their appropriate places in the documents which lay before him.

The Books of Ezr and Neh are a compilation of genealogical lists, letters and edicts, memoirs and chronicles. We cannot be certain to whom was the composer of either or both books. Many think that Ezra compiled both the books out of pre-existing materials, adding parts of his own composition. Others, suppose that Ezra wrote the book named after him, while Nehemiah composed the Book of Neh. Others again, are of the opinion that neither Ezra nor Nehemiah, but some other unknown editor, most probably the compiler of the Books of Ch, put together the Books of Ezr and Neh, using largely the memoirs of the two composed the Books of Chronicles.

The diversified character of the style, language and other literary peculiarities in the books is accounted for by the large number and the variety of sources. From the style and contents of the first chapter it has been argued with great plausibility that it was written by Daniel; for similar reasons it has been argued that the portion of Ezr from 3 2 to 4 22 inclusive was written by Haggaiah the prophet. All admit that the parts of Ezr and Neh in which the 1st pers. is employed were written by Ezra and Nehemiah respectively. As to who it was who added the other connecting portions there is and must always be great doubt arising from the fact that the author is not mentioned. The style points to the same hand as that which composed the Books of Chronicles.

Those who believe that Ezra compiled the Book of Ch will believe that he most probably composed also the Books of Ezr and Neh. The principal objection to his authorship arises from the inexplicable change from the 2nd pers. occurring in both Ezr and Neh. Insaneness much as the 3d pers. is the proper form to use in the best style of Bib. historical composition; insaneness as Herodotus, Thucydides and Xenophon often employ it in their histories; insaneness as some of our own poets mingle the 1st and 3d pers. in the same document; and finally, insaneness as the prophets and psalmists of Israel likewise interchange the persons in what is for us often an unaccountable manner: this characteristic of the style of Ezr-Neh seems an insufficient reason upon which to base the denial of the claim that Ezra may have been the author.

The facts that there is unevenness in the treatment of the history, and that there are long periods on which the narrator is silent, do not militate against the authorship of Ezra nor do they imply a date long after his age; for the author is perfectly consistent in his purpose to stick to the object and plan which he had in view for himself, that is, to give an account of the reestablishment of the Israelish people and of their Divine given institutions.

That he has omitted other matters does not imply that he was ignorant of them.

The language of the books is Heb, except Ezr 7 4-8 18 and 7 12-26, which is written in Aram. The Heb closely resembles that of Duk, Hag and Ch, and much more so than that of Esch, which was written probably about 180 BC. The Aram. (formerly called Chaldee) is very much like that of the Egyp papyri which are dated in the 5th cent. BC. It closely resembles also the Aram. in Dn1.

Neither language nor style can be assigned as a ground for asserting a date later than the 5th cent. BC as the time of the composition of the book. A much stronger reason-

8. Historically against placing the final redaction of the books at so early a time is the mention of a Jaddua among the high priests in Neh 12.11.22, it being assumed that this is the same Jaddua whose Jos (Jehohanan, Ant. XI, viii. 4) is having filled the high-priestly office in the time of Alexander the Great. In view of the fact that Jos is the only source of information as to the period between 400 and 300 BC, it seems unfair to accept what he says as evidence for the existence of this Jaddua, while rejecting substantially all the rest of the same chapter in Jos which tells about Sanballat, Manasseh and Alexander's meeting with Jaddua. Inasmuch as the Schau papyri, written in the 17th year of Darius I, 434-433 BC, mention the sons of Sanballat the governor of Samaria, the Sanballat who was their father must have lived around 450 BC. The same papyrius mentions Je-hohanan (Jehohanan of Neh 12.22) as the high priest of Samaria who, according to Jos, was the Persan governor of Jerusalem in 410-408 BC. Since, according to Neh 13.6, Nehemiah was governor in 434-433 BC, the 324 year of Artaxeres, Bagaoas would be perhaps his immediate successor. If we are to put any confidence in Jos, then there must have been at least two Sanballats, and probably two Jadduas, and at two different times a son of a high priest must have married a daughter of a Sanballat. While this is not impossible, it is less likely than Jos (Neh 13.6) to the presence writing a book that seeks to represent the history of the Jews beyond any possibility of disentanglement, and we might be justified in throwing over entirely his account of a Sanballat, a Manassee, and a Jaddua as living in the year 330 BC when of that time conquered Syria. As far, of course, as the Jaddua of Neh 12.11.22 is concerned, he may well have been a high priest as early as 406 BC, and have continued to serve till 330 BC. On the other hand, another year of Darius Nothus, the high priest of Bahal, may, for all we know to the contrary, have been high priest in 330 BC. In view of the numerous Oniases, Simons, and Johns who served in that position between 600 and 150 BC, and in view, further, of our inability to place the book of Darius Nothus to the historof this period, it will be a bold man who will dare to deny, on the ground of the Jaddua of Jos, that Ezra-Neh might have been written as early as 400 BC.

The objection against the books having been composed in the Pers period, based upon the use of the titles of the kings of Persia, is fully answered by the fact that the same titles as those used in these books are found to have been used by the Pers kings themselves. In his book (The Presbyterian Reformed Review for 1905-6.) The “Darius the Persian” of Neh 12.22 is shown by the Schau papyri to have been Darius Nothus, as Keil long ago suggested. The author may have called him “the Persian” to distinguish him from Darius the Mede. At any rate, it is best for us to remember that our inability to explain why the author called him by this title does not prove that he did not do so. Of all the Dartuses known to history, any one might have been called “the Persian,” except Darius the Mede, because all but he were Persians. The assertion that a king of Persia could only have been called a Persian “after the Pers period was past” involves, on the one hand, the assumption of such thorough knowledge of the possibilities of the usus legis of that time, and, on the other hand, such real ignorance of the usage of all times in such matters, as well as of the usage of the Pers and Bab monuments of the Pers era, as almost to cause one to believe that it can scarcely have been seriously made. (See the writer’s art-cited above.) Jos, it is true, apparently confuses in his account Darius II and Darius III.

The phrase “the days of Nehemiah” (ver 26) certainly implied that the final redactor “looked back upon them as past.” But there is no intimation as to how long they were past. According to Neh 6.14, Nehemiah returned to Babylonia in the 32d year of Artaxeres, that is, in 445 BC. As Bagaoas was already governor of Jerus, and Johanan high priest in 406 BC, a writer living about 400 BC can very well have referred to what happened “in the days of the Persan” and in the governor, and of Ezra the priest and the scribe” as having occurred “in the days of Zerubbabel, and in the days of Nehemiah” (12.47). From all we know it appears that these were the only Jews who ever governed the Persian BC, member of the sons of Sanballat the governor of Samaria, the Sanballat who was their father must have lived around 450 BC. The same papyrius mentions Je-hohanan (Jehohanan of Neh 12.22) as the high priest of Samaria who, according to Jos, was the Persan governor of Jerusalem in 410-408 BC. the Aram. part of Ezr, the spelling or writing of the words resembling in many of the smallest particulars that of the Aram. papyri of Elephantine, which date from the 5th cent. BC.

EZRAHITE, ez-rā-hī’t (עֶזֶרָיִית, *ezērā‘îth; *Aṣēḇāv, *Aṣēḇōn): Found in 1 K 4 31; Psa 88, 89, titles; from which it appears that the word is a patronymic for Ethan and Heman. It may be derived from Zerah, instead of Ezrach, seeing that there were an Ethan and a Heman who were descendants of Zerah, head of a Judahite family (1 Ch 2 6). There were also an Ethan and a Heman who were Levites (1 Ch 16 17).

EZRI, ez’rī (עֶזֶרִי, *ezērī; *erā‘îth; *Eṣārāl, Ezrāl, or *Eṣārāh, Ezrāh): "Ezri, the son of Cheleb," appointed by David to be superintendent of agriculture (1 Ch 27 26).

EZRL, ez’rēl (Eṣārāl, Ezrāl, AV Ezrail): One who had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9 34); called Azarel in Ezr 10 41.

FABLE, fā’b’l (μῦθος, muthos): (1) Primitive conception of the objects around him as possessing his own characteristics. Consequently in his stories, beasts, trees, rocks, etc., think, talk and act exactly as if they were human beings. Of course, but little advance in knowledge was needed to put an end to this mode of thought, but the former vision was developed by it persistently and is found in the folk-tales of all nations. More particularly, the archaic form of story was used for the purpose of moral instruction, and when so used was termed the fable. Modern definitions distinguish it from the parable (a) by its use of characters of lower intelligence than man (although reasoning and speaking like men), and (b) by its lesson for this life only. But, while these distinctions serve some practical purpose in distinguishing (say) the fables of Aesop from the parables of Christ, they are of little value to the student of folk-lore. For fable, parable, allegory, etc., are all evolutions from a common stock, and they tend to blend with each other. See ALLEGORY; PARABLE.

(2) The Sem mind is peculiarly prone to allegorical expression, and a modern Arabian storyteller will invent a fable or a parable as readily as he will talk. And we may be entirely certain that the very scanty appearance of fables in the OT is due only to the character of its moral and not at all to the absence of fables from the mouths of the Jew of old. Only two examples have reached us. In Jgs 9 7-15 Jotham mocks the choice of Abimelech as king with the fable of the tree that could find no tree to which it could accept the trouble of the kingship except the worthless bramble. And in 2 K 14 9 Jehoash ridicules the pretensions of Amaziah with the story of the thistle that wished to make a royal alliance with the cedar. Yet that the distinction between fable and allegory, etc., is artificial is seen in Isa 5 12, where the vineyard is assumed to possess a deliberate will to be perverse.

(3) In the NT, "fable" is found in 1 Tim 1 4; 4 7; 2 Tim 4 4; Tit 1 14; 2 Pet 1 16, as the tr of muthos ("myth"). The sense here differs entirely from that discussed above, and "fable" means a (religious) story that has no connection with reality—contrasted with the knowledge of an eyewitness in 2 Pet 1 16. The exact nature of these "fables" is of course something out of our knowledge, but the mention in connection with them of "endless genealogies" in 1 Tim 1 4 points with high probability to some form of gnostic speculation that interposed a chain of aon (grotes) between God and the world. In one of the gnostic systems that we know, these chains are described with a proximity so intolerable (The Pistis Sophia is the best example) as to justify well the phrase "old wives' fables" in 1 Tim 4 7. But that these passages have gnostic reference need not be taken against the Pauline authorship of the Pastoral, as a fairly well developed "Gnosticism" is recognizable in a passage as early as Col 2, and as the description of the fables as Jewish in Tit 1 14 (cf. 3 9) is against 2d-cent. references. Bible "see for details the commentary on the Pastoral. Equally important is the fact that the NT is worth noting that in 2 Tim 4 4 the adoption of these fables is said to be the result of dabbling in the dubious. This manner of losing one's hold on reality is, unfortunately, something not confined to the apostolic age.

FACET, fā’sēt: In Heb the tr of three expressions: (1) פִּיתָח, pīṭah; (2) פִּיתַח, pīṭāh; lit. "eye," and (3) פִּיתָא, pīṭā; lit. "noose," "nostril," already noted s.v. COUNTENANCE, which see. The first and second of these words are used synonymously, even in metaphorical expressions, as, e.g., in the phrase "the face of the earth," where pīṭāh is used (Dt 6 15 and passion) and Ṿaṭān (Nu 22 5 et passim). The third expression preserves more clearly its original meaning. It is generally used in the phrases "to bow one's self to the earth," "to fall on one's face," where the nose actually touched the ground. Often "my face," the principal face expression for the personal pronoun "I," "me," "you," "they." In "thy face" means "in thy presence," and is often so tr. A very large number of idiomatic Heb expressions have been introduced into our language, which are now in a more or less unfamiliar circumlocation for the personal pronoun "I," "me," "you," "they." We notice the most important of these phrases:

"To seek the face" is to seek an audience with a prince or with God, to seek favor (Ps 24 6; 27 8; Ps 105 4; Prov 7 15; Hos 5 15; of Prov 29 26, where RV translates "Many seek the ruler's face," lit. many seek the face [Heb pē‘aḏ of a ruler]. If God "hides his face" He withdraws His presence, His favor (Dt 32 20; Job 34 29; Ps 13 1; 30 7; 143 7; Isa 54 8; Jer 33 8; Ezek 39 23; Mic 3 4). Such withdrawal of the presence of God is to be understood as a consequence of man's personal disobedience, not as a wrathful denial of God's favor (Isa 59 2). God is asked to "hide his face," i.e. to disregard and overlook (Ps 51 9; cf. 10 11). This is also the idea of the prayer: "Cast me not away from thy presence" (lit. "face," Ps 51 11), and of the promise: "The upright shall dwell in thy presence" (lit. "face," Ps 140 13). If used of men, "to hide the face" expresses humility and reverence before an exalted presence (Ps 3 6; Isa 6 2); similarly Elijah "wrapped his face in his mantle" when God passed by (1 K 19 13). The "covering of the face" is a sign of mourning (2 S 19 4= Ezek 12 6; 12); a "face covered with fatness" is synonymous with prosperity and arrogance (Job
In the context of the Hebrew text, the phrase "to regard people" (Lev 19:15) and "to recognize the face" (19:16) are used to convey the idea of not missing the opportunity to warn or avert evil. This is similar to the Greek concept of μαννίαν, "a deed," which likely refers to the deed by which one's evil is averted. This is equivalent to the Hebrew הָתַּּכְחַדְר, "to countenance" (see RV).

The word "showbread" meant "bread of the face," "of the presence," Heb. הָתַּכְחַדְר, גֵּרֶז אֲדֹנִי, אֲדֹנִי יִתְנַסְתָּן. This shows how the Greeks also joined with them in the hatred of the wickedness.

Fain, θυμόι, θυμός, θυμή, **

This and its variants come from a root which primarily means "to cover or conceal," therefore "to be dark or obscure," and so, "to be faint or depressed." Israel's helplessness was brought about by Amalek (Dt 25.18) and the plight of Gideon. The Hebrew vocabulary for the depressing physical conditions and mental emotions which are rendered in AV by the Eng. words "faint," "fainting," and other compounds of that stem, is as will be seen above, wide and varied in derivation. The 11 Heb. and 3 Gr words and their derivatives are used in 62 passages in AV to express these conditions.
as describing the withering of the trees for grief at the death of the Assyrians (Ezk 31 15).

"Atahp" is the weariness of the wanderers in the desert (Ps 107 5), the faintness from hunger (Lam 2 19), or the despondency of Jonah dispelled by his remembrance of God's mercies (Jon 2 7).

Daniel, from a root which signifies the sickness produced by exhaustion from loss of blood, is used in Isa 1 5 for the faintness of heart, the result of remorse for sin, and in Jer 8 18 for the prophet's sorrow for the sins of Israel. A cognate form expresses the meaning of both judgments of God which were incurred as punishments for the national backsliding (Lam 1 13:22; 5 17).

Mages, lit. "dissolving or melting," is applied to the contagious fear which the example of a cowardly soldier produces among his comrades (Dt 20 8, 8, RV "melt"). In the remarkable passage in Isa 10 18, in which God pronounces the doom of Assyria when his purposes of chastisement on Israel have been fulfilled, the collapse of Assyria is said to be "as when a standard-bearer fainteth;" for the RVm substitutes "as when a sick maneth away," which is probably the correct rendering. The word mages may mean either a sick man, or else something glittering and seen from afar, such as a standard, but the former sense is more intelligible and suggestive in context. The closely used verbal form cognate to mages is used on account of its assonance.

Taphat, (γαύθα), which is usually translated "grieved" or "tormented" on "fainting," is rendered as "fainted" in Jer 45 3. This passage, "I fainted in my sighing," AV, is in Heb the same as that which reads, "I am weary with my groaning in Ps 6 6, and is similarly rendered in RV.

Kahah, like phages, primarily signifies "to melt" or "to become soft," and is used in prophetic exhortations in which the people are encouraged not to be panic-stricken in the presence of enemies (Dt 20 3, and also Jer 51 46; Isa 7 4). Another related word, mordah, in the sense of despair and utter loss of courage, is used in expressing the consequences of God's wrath against Israel (Lev 26 36). In its literal sense it signifies "blindness," as of the words of a hypocritical enemy (Ps 55 21).

Taphar is the prostration of utter fatigue whereby one is unable to raise himself or to proceed on a journey, as were some of David's little band (1 S 30 10-21). A cognate word describes the prostration of amazement and incredulity with which Jacob heard of Joseph's condition in Egypt (Gen 45 28).

Kahah, the pining of earnest, longing desire, is sometimes rendered "fainteth" in Ps 84 2; 119 81; elsewhere it is rendered by words expressing wasting or languishing. The panic in Canaan due to famine is expressed (Gen 47 15) by the word kahah, which implies a state of frenzy.

The only records of actual fainting are (1) Daniel, in Dan 8 27, where the word used is the Niphal of the vb. ἡγάθα, lit. "became," meaning that he became weak; (2) sowing is mentioned in Ad Est 16 15-17.

In the NT "faint" is used in the sense of physical exhaustion (Mt 9 36 AV; 15 32; Mk 8 3), where it is part of the vb. ἐκκαθά, "to relax." Otherwise it is used fig. of discouragement of spirit. The same vb. is used in Gal 6 9; He 12 35; but in Lk 18 1; 2 Cor 4 1-18; Eph 3 13 it is part of the vb. ἐκκαθά (according to some authorities ἐγκαθά), pronounced enekathed, meaning "to be faint-hearted" or "to be culprits negligence." In Rev 2 3 it is σιναόμη, ἐκκαθά, lit. "to be astounded.

FAIR, fār: The word tr is in AV from 9 Heb and 4 Gr expressions has nowhere in the Bible the modern sense of "blond," "fair-skinned." The tr of Is 54 11, "fair colors," refers to the cosmetic use of ἔπαθ, stibium, antimony powder, with which black margins were painted around the eyelids, so as to make the eyes appear large and dark. The stones of rebuilt Jerusalem beautifully laid in their black mortar, are compared with such eyes. We can distinguish the following varieties of meaning: (1) Beautiful, attractive, ἰδρύ, ἐπαθ, ἐπαθ, ἐπαθ, ἐπαθ; Atram. ἑπαθ, shappry; LXX θάλαμον, καλός, in the NT καλός, astelos. This latter word is in both places where it is found used of Moses (Acts 7 20; He 11 23, RV "goodly"), and means lit. town bred (as opposed to boorish), polite, polished in manners, urbane, then nice, pretty. (2) Pure, free of defilement, RV "clean," ἡπαθ, τάφωρ (Zec 3 5).

"Fair speech," plausible, persuasive (ἐπαθικ, λείκα, Prov 7 21; εὐηαντ, εὐαλον, Sir 6 5; of ἐπαθ, euologia, Rom 16 18). (4) Making a fine display of (ἐπαθομοιοσ, εὐποροσοπ, Gal 6 12, to make a "fair show") (5) Good of its kind (ἀθάλο, "golden," "clear," Job 37 22, RV "golden splendor"); ἐπαθ, euula (Mt 16 2).

FAIRHAVEN, fār hā-v'ne (Kāol Λαμένας, Kalot Laimenas): A roadstead on the S. coast of Crete, about 5 miles E. of Cape Matala, the most southerly point of the island. The harbor is formed by a bay, open to the E., and sheltered on the W. by two small islands. Here Paul waited for a considerable time (Acts 27 9); but while it afforded good anchorage and a shelter from N. and N.W. winds, "the haven was not commodious to winter in" (vs 8-12). See CRETE.

FAIRS, fārz: Found only 5 times in AV (Ezk 27 12. 14.16.19.27), apparently incorrect tr of ᾱπαθ, "i̓iz̄haçon, against modern Hebrews (though Gesenius gives "fair" as one of its meanings). The LXX tr the Heb of the above five passages by two different words, ἐφανή, ἐφανή, "market-place" (vs 12.14.16.19), and ἐφανή, "hire," "pay" (vs 27.33). AV follows the Wyclif version in ver 12 and the Geneva version throughout, although it properly tr "wares" in ver 33. RV gives "wares" (q.v.) throughout.

FAITH, fāth:
1. Etymology
2. Meaning: a Divergency
3. Faith in the Sense of Creed
4. A Leading Passage Explained
5. Remarks
6. Conclusion

In the OT (AV) the word occurs only twice: Dt 32 20 (ὁμιλομεθα, ὑμιλομεθα); Hab 2 4 (ὁμιλομεθα, ὑμιλομεθα). In the latter RV places in the alternative rendering, "faithfulness." In the NT it is of very frequent occurrence, always representing πίστις, pi-stis, with one exception in AV (not RV), He 10 23, where it represents ἠπιστία, ἐπιστία, "hope.

The history of the E. Hebrew word is rather interesting than important; use and contexts, alike for it and its Heb and Gr parallels, are the surest guides to meaning. But we may note the etymology that it occurs in the form "feathh," in the Old Or. Darius (10th cent.); that it is akin to fides and this again to the Sanskrit root bhāth, "to unite, "to bind." It is worth while to recall this primeval suggestion of the spiritual work of faith, as that which on man's side unites him to God for salvation.

Studying the word "faith" in the light of use and contexts, we find a bifurcation of significance in the Bible. We may distinguish the two senses as the passive and the active; on the one side, "fidelity," "trustworthiness"; and "faith," "trust," on the other.

THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPEDIA
In Gal 6:2, e.g. context it makes clear that "fidelity," in its use, is a quality congruous with the associated graces. (RV accordingly renders pistis there by "faithfulness.")

2. Meaning: pistis renders pistis there by "faithfulness." Again, Rom 3:3 AV, "the faith of God," but in the nature of confidence or reliance, pistis means "faith." In the overwhelming majority of cases, "faith," as rendering pistis, means "reliance," "trust." To illustrate would be to quote many scores of passages. It may be enough here to call attention to the recorded use of the word by Our Lord. Of about twenty passages in the Gospels where pistis occurs as coming from His lips, only one (Mt 23:23) presents it in the apparent sense of "fidelity." All the others conspicuously demand the sense of "reliance," "trust." The same is true of the apostolic writings. In them, with rarest exceptions, the words "reliance," "trust," precisely fit the context as alternatives to "faith."

Another line of meaning is traceable in a very few passages, where pistis, "faith," appears in the sense of "creed," the truth, or body of truth.

3. Faith in which is trusted, or which justifies the Sense of Creed trust. The most important of such passages is the parable of Jas 2:14-26, where an apparent contradiction to some great Pauline dicta perplexes many readers. The riddle is solved by observing that the writer uses "faith" in the sense of creed, orthodox "belief." This is clear from ver 19, where the "faith" in question is illustrated: "Thou believest that God is one." This is the credal confession of the orthodox Jew (the sh'ma; see Dt 6:4), taken as a passport to salvation. Briefly, James presents the futility of creed without life, Paul the necessity of reliance in order to receive "life and peace."

It is important to notice that He 11:1 is no exception to the rule that "faith" normally means "reliance," "trust." There "Faith" is a substance (or possibly, in the Englishing light passage of recent inquiries into the type Explained of Gr used by NT writers, "the guaranty") of things hoped for, the evidence (or "convincing proof") of things not seen. This is somewhat interpreted as, if "faith," in the writer's view, were, so to speak, a faculty of second sight, a mysterious intuition into the spiritual world. But the chapter amply shows that the faith illustrated, e.g. by Abraham, Moses, Rahab, was simply reliance upon the God of the covenant.

Such reliance enabled the believer to treat the future as present and the invisible as seen. In short, the phrase here, "faith is the evidence," etc., is parallel in form to our familiar saying, "Knowledge is power."

A few detached remarks may be added: (a) the history of the use of the Gr pistis is instructive. In the LXX it normally, if not always, the passive sense, "fidelity," "good faith," while in classical Gr it never bears the active sense, "trust." In the koine of the type of Gr universally common at the Christian era, it seems to have adopted the active meaning as the ruling one only just in time, so to speak, to provide it for the utterance of Him whose supreme message was "reliance," and who passed that message on to His apostles. Through their lips and pens "faith," in that sense, became the supreme watchword of Christianity. See Justification; Union with Christ.

In no chapter without trespassing on the ground of other arts, we call the reader's attention, for his Scripturial studies, to the central place of faith in Christianity, and its Conculsion: importance and significance. As being, in its true idea, a reliance as simple as possible upon the word, power, love, of Another, it is precisely that which, on man's side, adjusts him to the living and merciful presence and action of a trusted God. In its nature, not by any mere arbitrary arrangement, it is his one possible receptive attitude, that in which he brings nothing, so that he may receive all. Thus "Faith" means His fidelity to promise. But in the overwhelming majority of cases, "faith," as rendering pistis, means "reliance," "trust." To illustrate would be to quote many scores of passages. It may be enough here to call attention to the recorded use of the word by Our Lord. In no chapter without trespassing on the ground of other arts, we call the reader's attention, for his Scripturial studies, to the central place of faith in Christianity, and its Conculsion: importance and significance. As being, in its true idea, a reliance as simple as possible upon the word, power, love, of Another, it is precisely secure or firm." In the Kal it denotes the firmness of that which supports something, being used in the participle of a nurse who carries a child (Nu 11:12; 2 S 4:4; Isa 49:23). In the Niphal it denotes the faithfulness which is the goodness, for example, a child which is carried (Isa 60:4); from the root הָעֵד (haved) it means well-born, house (1 S 2:35; 26:28); a wall which firmly holds a nail (Isa 22:23:25); a kingdom firmly established (2 S 7:16); persons secure in political station (Isa 7:9); a heart which is faithful (Neh 9:3). Hence in the Niphal it is repeated (Dt 7:9; Isa 49:7; and possibly Hos 11:12 [Heb 12:1]). A similar use is made of the nouns 'emeth and 'emnāh. Apart from the instances where 'emeth denotes the truthfulness of the response of words and ideas with reality, and the instances where it denotes the agreement of acts and words with the inner disposition, that is, sincerity, it is also used to denote the idea of faithfulness as above defined. As regards the noun 'emnāh, apart from a few passages where it is doubtful whether it means truth or faithfulness, it usually denotes the latter idea. Both these nouns, then, are used to signify the idea of faithfulness, that is, constancy or firmness, even in the fulfilment of all obligations. In this sense these words are not only applied to men, but also to God to express the idea that He is always faithful to His covenant promises. It is this attribute of God which the Psalmist declares (Ps 40:10 [Heb 11]), and the greatness of which he affirms by saying that God's faithfulness reacheth to the clouds (36:5 [Heb 6]). It is this which he makes the object of praise (89:1.2 [Heb 2:23]; 92:2 [Heb 8]); and which he says should be praised and revered by all men (Ps 40:6 [Heb 6:9]). And even this faithfulness is itself characterized by constancy, if we may so speak, for the Psalmist says that it endures to all generations (100:5). Being thus a characteristic of God, it also characterizes His salvation, and becomes the basis of confidence thus addressed to the prayer (143:1). It thus becomes the security of the religious man (91:4) and the source of God's help to His people (31:5 [Heb 6]). Accordingly in the teaching of prophecy, the salvation of the covenant people rests upon no claim or merit of their own, but solely upon Jeh's mercy, grace and faithfulness. When Israel incurred God's judgments, it might have appeared as if His promise was to fail, but, so far from this being true, as Jehovah He is faithful to His word of promise. Thus it is written (Isa 50:8). In this assurance His counsels are characterized by faithfulness and truth (26:1); and this is not because of Israel's faithfulness, but it is for His own sake that Jeh bloteth out their transgressions (43:22-25; Mic 7:18-20). It is, moreover, this same characteristic of Jeh which is asserted in many cases where the Heb words 'emeth and 'emnāh are used by the word "truth" in AV. In Ex 34:6 it is God's faithfulness (E'meth) which is referred to, since it evidently signifies His constancy. In Job 22:27 the idea is given of a true witness; and in Dt 32:4 it is again God's faithfulness (E'mnāh) which is mentioned, since it is contrasted with the faithlessness of Israel. The same is true of 'emeth in Mic 7:20; Ps 31:5 [Heb 6]); 91:4; 146:6. This is also true of the numerous instances where God's mercy and truth ('emeth) are combined, His mercy being the source of His gracious promises, and His truth the faithfulness with which He certainly fulfill them (Ps 25:10; 57:3 [Heb 4]; 61:7 [Heb 8]; 88:10 [Heb 11]; 86:15). And since the covenant-keeping of God's faithfulness comes also to be a characteristic of the New Covenant which is everlasting (Ps 89:28 [Heb 29]); of also for a similar thought, Isa 54:8 f; Jer 31:35 f; Hos 2:19 f; Ezek 16:60 f.

It is in this connection, moreover, that God's faithfulness is closely related to His righteousness in the OT. In the second half of the prophecy of Isaiah and in many of the psalms, righteousness is ascribed to God because He comes to help and save His people. Thus righteousness as a quality parallel with grace, mercy and faithfulness is ascribed to God (Isa 41:10; 42:6; 45:13.19.21; 63:1). It appears in these places to widen out from its exclusively judicial or forensic association and to become a quality of God as Saviour of His people. Accordingly this attribute of God is applied to the Ps as the basis of hope for salvation and deliverance (Ps 31:1 [Heb 2]; 35:24; 71:2; 143:11). Hence this attribute is associated with God's mercy and grace (Ps 1.2 [Heb 10]; 18:9 [Heb 15]); also with His faithfulness (Zech 8:20; Ps 36:6 [Heb 7]; 40:10 [Heb 11]; 88:11.12 [Heb 12.13]; 89:14 [Heb 15]; 96:13; 119:137.142; 143:1). Accordingly the OT conception of the righteousness of God has been practically identified with His covenant faithfulness, by such writers as Kautsch, Richm and Smend, Ritschl's definition of it being very much the same. Moreover, Ritschl, following Diestel, denied that the idea of distributive or retributive justice is ascribed to God in the OT. In regard to this latter point it should be remarked in passing that this denial that the judicial or forensic idea of righteousness is ascribed to God in the OT breaks down, not only in view of the fact that the OT does ascribe this attribute to God in many ways, but also in view of the fact that in a number of passages the idea of retribution is specifically referred to the righteousness of God (see Righteousness; cf against Diestel and Ritschl). Dalmann, Die richterliche Gerechtigkeit im Alten Testament.

That which concerns us, however, in regard to this close relation between righteousness and faithfulness is to observe that this should not be pressed so far as to the extent of confusion of righteousness with covenant faithfulness in the Ps and the second half of Isa. The idea seems to be that Israel has sinned and has no claim upon Jeh, finding her only hope of deliverance in His mercy and faithfulness. But this very fact that Jeh is merciful and faithful becomes, as it were, Israel's claim, or rather the ground of Israel's hope of deliverance from her enemies. Hence in the recognition of this claim of His people, God is said to be righteous in manifesting His mercy and faithfulness, so that His righteousness, no less than His mercy and faithfulness, becomes the ground of His people's hope. Righteousness is thus closely related in these cases to faithfulness, but it is not identified with it, nor has it in all cases lost entirely its forensic tone. This seems to be, in general, the meaning of righteousness in the Ps and the second half of Isa, with which may also be compared Mic 6:9; Zec 8:8.

The emphasis which this attribute of God has in the OT is determined by the fact that throughout the whole of the OT the covenant relation of Jeh to His people is founded solely in God's grace, and not on any merit of theirs. If this covenant relation had been based on any claim of Israel, faithfulness on God's part might have been taken for granted. But since Jeh’s covenant relation with Israel and His promises of salvation spring solely from, and depend wholly upon, the grace of God, which gave firm assurance that the past experience of God’s grace would continue in the future was this Immutable faithfulness of Jeh. By it the experience of the fathers was given a religious value for Israel from generation to generation. And even as the faithfulness of God bridged over the past and the present, so also it constituted the connecting link between the present and the future, becoming thus the firm basis of Israel’s hope; of Ps 89 which sets forth the faithfulness of God in its greatness, its firmness as the basis of the covenant and the ground it affords of hope for future help from Jeh, and for hope that His covenant shall endure forever. When God’s people departed from Him all the more emphasis was put upon His faithfulness, so that the only hope of His wayward people lay not only in His grace and mercy but also in His faithfulness, which stands in marked contrast with the faithlessness and inconstancy of His people. This is probably the meaning of the difficult verses Hos 11 12 (Heb 12 1).

In the NT teaching concerning the faithfulness of God the same idea of faithfulness to His gracious promises is everywhere emphasized and held up.

2. Faithful- as the object of a confident trust in the faithfulness of God. This idea is usually expressed in the NT by the adj. pistos, and once by the noun pistis, which more frequently has the active sense of “faithfulness.”

An attempt has been made by Wendt (SK, 1883, 511 f; Teaching of Jesus, ET, I, 239 f) to interpret the words alithéia and alethés in many instances, especially in the Johannine writings, as denoting faithfulness. In the LXX rendering elæos kai alethēa for the Heb phrase “merry and truth,” in which truth is equivalent to faithfulness. But the most that could be inferred from the fact that the LXX uses the word alithēia to translate the Heb word 'emeth, and in about one-half the cases where 'emânâd occurs, would be that those Gr words might have been prepared for such a use in the NT. But while it is true that there is one usage of these words in John’s writings, this apparent based on the OT use of 'emeth and 'emânâd, the Gr words do not have this meaning when employed to denote a characteristic of God. Neither is the adj. alethinos so used.

In the Epistles of Paul the word alithēia occurs quite frequently to denote the truth revealed by God to man through reason and conscience, and to denote the doctrinal content of the gospel. In two passages, however, the words alithēia and alethés seem to signify the faithfulness of God (Rom 3 4 7; 15 8). In the former passage Paul is contrasting the faithfulness of God with the faithlessness of men, the word alethés, ver 4, and alethēia, ver 7, apparently denoting the same Divine characteristic as the word pistos, ver 4. In the latter passage (Rom 15 8), the vindication of God’s covenant faithfulness, through the realization of His promises to the fathers, is declared to have been the purpose of the ministry of Jesus Christ to the Jews.

This faithfulness of God to His covenant promises is frequently emphasized by Paul, the words he employs being the noun pistis (once) and the adj. pistos. The noun pistis is used once by Paul in this sense (Rom 3 8 f). In this place Paul is arguing that the faithfulness of God’s covenant promises is the basis of God’s faithfulness. Both Jew and Gentile, the apostle had said, are on the same footing as regards justification. Nevertheless the Jews had one great advantage in that they were the people to whom the revelation of God’s gracious promises had been committed. These promises will certainly be fulfilled, notwithstanding the fact that some of the Jews were unfaithful, because the fulfillment of these promises depends not on human conduct but on the faithfulness of God, which cannot be made void by human faithlessness and unbelief. And to the supposition that man’s faithfulness could make of none effect God’s faithfulness, Paul replies ‘let God be faithful [alethēia] and every man a liar’ (ver 4), by which Paul means to say that in the fulfillment of God’s promises, in spite of the fact that men are faithless, the faithfulness of God will be abundantly vindicated, even though thereby every man should be proven untrue and faithless. And not only so, but human faithlessness will give an opportunity for a manifestation of the faithfulness (alethēia) of God, abounding to His glory (ver 7). God’s faithfulness here is His unchangeable constancy and fidelity to His covenant promises; and it is this fidelity to His promises, or the fact that God’s gracious gifts and election are without any change of heart or mind on His part, which gave Paul the assurance that all Israel should finally be saved (Rom 11 25-29). Moreover this covenant faithfulness of God is grounded in His very nature, so that Paul’s hope of eternal life rests on the fact that God who cannot lie. He, the LXX rendering that expresses the meaning of the same word as the Heb chōth, and with the certainty that God will abide faithfully notwithstanding human faithlessness rests on the fact that God cannot deny Himself (2 Tim 2 13).

It is because God is faithful that His promises in Christ are very God’s amen (2 Cor 1 19 20). This attribute of God, moreover, is the basis of Paul’s confident assurance that God will preserve the Christian in temptation (1 Cor 10 13); and establish him and preserve him from evil (2 Thess 3 3). And since God is faithful and steadfast, trustworthy, this characteristic attaches to the “faithful sayings” in the Pastoral Epistles which sum up the gospel, making them worthy of trust and acceptance (1 Tim 1 15; 4 9; Tit 3 8).

This faithfulness of God in the sense of fidelity to His promises is set forth as the object of sure trust and hope by the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews. It was the basis of Sarah’s faith that she would bear a child when she was past age (He 11 11); and it is the faithfulness of God to His promise in Christ that we can draw nigh to Him with full assurance of faith, holding fast without wavering the profession of hope (He 10 23).

John also ascribes this attribute to God. Since one of the most precious of God’s promises through Christ is the pardon of sin through the “blood of Jesus Christ,” John says that God’s faithfulness, as well as His righteousness, is manifested in the forgiveness of sin (1 Jn 1 9).

The faithfulness of God is viewed from a slightly different point by Peter when he tells his readers that those who suffer as Christians and in accordance with God’s will will share in the same good in well-doing unto a faithful Creator’ (1 Pet 4 19).

The quality of faithfulness, which in the Scripture is more frequently ascribed to God in His relation to man as gracious Saviour, and as the ground of the faith of His gracious promises, is here applied by Peter to God in His relation to man as his Creator, and is made the ground of comfort under persecution and suffering. The omission of the art. before the words “faithful Creator” makes emphasize that this is a characteristic of God as Creator, and the omission here, which seems to throw great emphasis on this attribute of God as the basis of comfort under suffering. It is as if Peter would say to suffering Christians, “You suffer not by chance but in accordance with God’s will; He, the almighty Creator, made you, and since your suffering is in accordance with His will, you ought to trust yourselves to Him who as your Creator is faithful.\footnote{The Five “Sayings.”—Paul’s faithful sayings are thus five in number, and “were no doubt rehearsed constantly in the assemblies, till they became well-known watchwords in the various churches scattered over the Mediterranean-washed provinces of the Rom empire. (Dioclet., N. T. 107.}

It is, of course, Christians who are to derive this comfort, but the faithfulness of God is extended here to cover all His relations to His people, and to pledge all His attributes in their behalf.

This attribute is also ascribed to Christ in the N. T. Where Jesus is called a faithful high priest, the idea expressed is His fidelity to His obligations to God and His saving work (He 7:21; 13:20). But when in the Book of Revelation Jesus Christ is called the “faithful witness” or absolutely the “Faithful and True,” it is clear that the quality of faithfulness, in the most absolute sense in which it is characteristic of God in contrast with human changeableness, is ascribed to Christ (Rev 1:5; 3:14; 19:11). This is esp. clear in the last-named passage. The heavens themselves open to disclose the glorified Christ, and He appears not only as a victorious warrior whose name is faithful and true, but also as the one in whom these attributes have their highest realization, and of whom they are so characteristic as to become the name of the exalted Lord. This clearly implies the Deity of Jesus.

In summing up the Scripture teaching concerning God’s faithfulness, three things are noteworthy. In the first place, this characteristic of God is usually connected with His gracious promises of salvation, and is one of those attributes which make God the firm and unchangeable object of religious trust. As in the case with all the Scripture teaching concerning God, it is the religious value of His faithfulness which is made prominent. In the second place, the so-called moral attributes, of which this is one, are essential in God the object of religion, along with the so-called communicable attributes such as Omnipotence, Omnipresence and Unchangeableness. Take away either class of attributes from God, and He ceases to be God, the object of religious veneration and trust. And in the third place, while these moral attributes, to which faithfulness belongs, have been called “communicable,” to distinguish them from the “incommunicable” attributes which distinguish God from all that is finite, it is altogether false, according to the Scripture, God is faithful in such an absolute sense as to contrast Him with men who are faithful only in a relative sense, and who appear as changeable and faithless in comparison with the faithfulness of “the Righteousness; Truth; Unchangeableness.”

FAITHLESS, faithless: The tr of ἄδικος, ἁπάτος, “without faith,” having the sense of “disbelieving,” “Jews upbraids the people, ‘O faithless and perverse generation’” (Mt 17:17; Mk 9:19; Lk 9:41); He says to Thomas, “Be not faithless, but believing” (Jn 20:27); RV adds, “if we are faithless,” instead of “believe not” (2 Tim 2:13); of 1 Cor 7:12-15; 10:27; 14:22-24, etc; Tit 1:15. In Lk 12:46 ἁπάτος has the sense of “unfaithful,” so RV; perhaps also Rev 21:8, “unbelieving.”

FALCON, fůk’n, fōk’n, fāk’un: The Hebrews did not know the word. Their bird corresponding to our falcon, in all probability, was one of the smaller kestrels covered by the word הָעֲבֵד, which seemed to cover all lesser birds of prey, and which include in the hawk family. That some of our many divisions of species were known to them is indicated by the phrase “after its kind.” The word occurs in RV in Job 28:7, to tr ὑππαγόν, ὑπάγον, ὑπάγον (cf Lev 11:14; 12:16; 13:1); “that path no bird of prey knoweth. Neither hath the falcon’s eye seen it.” This substitutes “falcon” for “vulture” in AV. The change weakens the force of the lines. All ornithologists know that eagles, vultures and the large hawks have such range of vision that they at once descend from heights at which we cannot see them to take prey on earth or food placed to tempt them. The falcons and sparrow hawks are small members of the family, some of which feed on little birds, some on insects. They are not celebrated for greater range of vision than other birds of the same location and feeding habits. The strength of these lines lay in the fact that if the path to the mine were so well concealed that the piercing eye of the vulture failed to find it, then it was perfectly hidden indeed.

Fall, fůl (vb.): The idea of falling is most frequently expressed in Heb by הֹרַשׁ, nāroph, but also by many other words; in Gr by πενήνθη, πτεσάντη, and its compounds. The uses of the word in Scripture are very varied. There is the literal falling by descent; the falling of the countenance in sorrow, shame, anger, etc (Gen 4:5,6); the falling in battle (14:10; Nu 14:3, etc); the falling into trouble, etc (Ps 24:1, etc); destruction in supplication and reverence (Gen 17:3; Nu 14:5, etc); falling of the Spirit of Jeh (Ezk 11:15; cf 3:24; 8:1); of apostasy (2 Thes 2:3; He 6:6; Jude ver 24), etc. RF frequently changes "fall" of AV into other words or phrases, e.g., "falling to pieces" (Lev 22:37; Ps 64:8); 2 Pet 1, 10, etc, "faide" (Isa 33:4), etc; in Acts 27, RF reads "be cast ashore on rocky ground" for "have fallen upon rocks" (ver 29), "perish" for "fall" (ver 34), "lightening upon" for "falling into" (ver 41).

Fall, fůl, THE:
1. Meaning of Gen 3
2. Gen 3 in the Old and New Testaments
3. The Fall and the Theory of Evolution
4. The Character of the Fall

The question concerning the origin, the age and the written record of the history of the Fall in Gen 3 need not be discussed here. For in the first place, science can never reach to the oldest origins and the ultimate destinies of humanity, and historical and critical inquiry will never be able to prove either the veracity or the unveracity of this history. And in the second place, exactly as it now lies before us, this history has already formed for centuries a portion of holy Scripture, an indispensable element in the organism of the revelation of salvation, and as such it must be regarded by the Heb congregation (Jewish people), by Christ, by the apostles, and by the whole Christian church.

That Gen 3 gives us an account of the fall of man, of the loss of his primitive innocence and of the misery, particularly death, to which man, etc, that Gen 3 relates the awakening of man to self-consciousness and personality (see Adam in NT and APO), and therefore does not tell us of a fall, but a marked progression, is controverted by the name which the forbidden tree bears, as indicating to man not merely a tree of knowledge in the ordinary way, but quite specially a tree of knowledge of good and evil.

Gen 3 is not in the least meant to relate to us how man obtained the idea of his nakedness and sexual passions, and from a state of childlike innocence changed in this respect to manlike maturity (Exod. 24:1); but Behkeken von het Paradijsk Luyken, 1695, 485–511). For according to Gen, man was created full-grown, received a wife immediately as helpmeet, and at the same time saw himself allotted the task of multiplying and replenishing the earth. Moreover, the idea that sexual desire is something sinful and deserves punishment was entirely foreign to ancient Israel.

Finally, the interpretation of Wellhausen (Geschichte Israels, 1875, 344) cannot be accepted, that man in Gen 3 should obtain "die intellektuelle Welterkenntnis, die metaphysische Erkennnis der Dinge in ihrem Zusammenhang, ihrem Werke oder Unwerth, ihrem Nutzen oder Schaden" ("the intellectual knowledge of the world, the metaphysical knowledge of things in their connection, their worth or unworth, their utility or hurtfulness"). For in the first place, according to Gen, this was man's peculiar province from the beginning; he received indeed the vocation to subdue the earth, to keep and till the ground, to give the animals their names. And in the second place, the acquiring of this knowledge among the Israelites, who esteemed practical wisdom so highly, is difficult to represent as a fall, or as a punishment deserved for disobedience.

There is no other explanation possible of Gen 3 than that it is the narration of a fall, which consists in the transgression of an explicit command of God, thus bearing a moral significance, and therefore followed by repentance, shame, fear and punishment. The context of the chapter places this interpretation beyond all doubt, for the transgression is represented as a creature made after God's image and receiving paradise as a dwelling-place, and after the fall he is sent into a remote place, is condemned to a life of labor and sorrow, and increases more and more in sin until the judgment falls upon him.

It is indeed remarkable how very seldom the OT refers to this history of the Fall. This is not a sufficient reason for pronouncing it of later origin, for the same peculiarity is found itself at a very early period. According to all criticism, it was recorded in literature. Prophets, Psalms, Proverbs never quote it; at the most, allusions may be found to it in Hos 6:7 and Ezek 7:29; and even Jesus and His apostles in the NT very seldom appeal to Gen 3 (Jn 8:44; Rom 5:12; 1 Cor 15:22; 2 Cor 11:3; 1 Tim 2:14). But it may be considered that the Prophets, Psalms and Proverbs only mentioned special facts of the past by way of exception, that the apostles even hardly ever quote the words and deeds of Jesus, and that all lived at a time when revelation itself was still proceeding and did not lie before them as a complete whole. With us it is very different, for there are a different congregation (Jewish people), by Christ, by the apostles, and by the whole Christian church.

That Gen 3 gives us an account of the fall of man, of the loss of his primitive innocence and of the misery, particularly death, to which man, etc, that Gen 3 relates the awakening of man to self-consciousness and personality (see Adam in NT and APO), and therefore does not tell us of a fall, but a marked progression, is controverted by the name which the forbidden tree bears, as indicating to man not merely a tree of knowledge in the ordinary way, but quite specially a tree of knowledge of good and evil.

Gen 3 is not in the least meant to relate to us how man obtained the idea of his nakedness and sexual passions, and from a state of childlike innocence changed in this respect to manlike maturity (Exod. 24:1); but Behkeken von het Paradijsk Luyken, 1695, 485–511). For according to Gen, man was created full-grown, received a wife immediately as helpmeet, and at the same time saw himself allotted the task of multiplying and replenishing the earth. Moreover, the idea that sexual desire is something
In the new heaven and new earth all suffering ceases with sin (Rev 21 4). Therefore redemption is possible only in the way of forgiveness (Ps 32 1; Isa 43 25, etc), and circumcision of the heart (Dt 10 16) and circumcision of the flesh (Rom 2 26) and fruit of righteousness, life, joy, peace, salvation. When Paul in Rom 5 12; 1 Cor 15 22 indicates Adam as the origin of sin and death, and Christ as the source of righteousness and life, he develops no ideas which are contrary to the organism of revelation or which might be neglected without loss; he merely combines in and formulates the data which are explicitly or silently contained in it.

Tradition does little toward the confirmation and elucidation of the Bib. narrative of the Fall. The study of mythology is still too little advanced to determine the ideal or the historical value which may be contained in the legend of a Golden Age, in many people's obsessional honoring of the serpent, in the equally widespread belief in a tree of life. The Bab representation also (a seal on which a man and woman, seated, are figured as plucking fruit from a tree, while a serpent curls up behind the woman as if whispering in her ear) is more than S. Smith and Frank Deichstech compare with the Paradise narrative, shows no similarity on nearer view (A. Jeremias, Das AT im Lichte des alten Orient?, Leipzig, 1906, 203). Indirectly, however, a very powerful witness for the fall of man is furnished by the whole empirical condition of the world and humanity. For a world, such as we know it, full of unrighteousness and sorrow, cannot be explained without the acceptance of such a fact. He who holds fast to the witness of Scripture and conscience to sin as sin (as ἁμαρτία, ἁμαρτία) cannot deduce it from creation, but must accept the conclusion that it began with a transgression of God's command and thus with a deed of the will. Pythagoras, Plato, Kant, Schelling, Baader have all understood and acknowledged this with more or less clearness. He who denies the Fall must explain sin as a necessity which has its origin in the Creation, in the nature of things, and therefore in God Himself; he justifies man, but accuses God, misrepresents the character of sin and makes it everlasting and indefeasible. For if there has not been a fall into sin, there is no redemption of sin possible; sin then loses its merely ethical significance, becomes a trait of the nature of mankind.

This comes out, in later years, in the many endeavors to unite the Fall with the doctrine of evolution (cf Tennant, The Origin and Propagation of Sin?, 1905; A. S. Peake, Christianty: Its Nature and Its Truth, 1908; W. E. Orchard, Modern Theories of Sin, 1909; Francis J. Hall, Evolution and the Fall, 1910). All these endeavors lead on setting on one side the objective standard of sin, which is the law of God, and determining the nature and importance of sin subjectively by the feeling of guilt, which in its turn again depends on the knowledge of and the love for the moral ideal, and itself forms an important factor in moral progress. It is true that the strength of all these endeavors is drawn from the theory of the descent of man from the animal, but as to this theory, it is worthy of notice: (1) that it is up to the present day a hypothesis, and is proved by no single observation, whether direct or indirect; (2) that the fossils of prehistoric men, found in Germany, Belgium, France and elsewhere have demonstrated that the human race has lived, in no sense their dissimilarity with mankind of today (W. Branca, Der Stand unserer Kenntnisse vom fossilen Menschen, Leipzig, 1910); (3) that the uncivilized and prehistoric man may be as little identified with the first man as the unjustly so-called nature-people and children under age; (4) that the oldest history of the human race, which has become known through the discoveries at Babylon in the last century, was not that of a stage of barbarism, but of high and refined civilization. D. Gath Wolfenbüttel, "What was the Primitive Condition of Man?" Princeton Theol. Rev. Review, October, 1906; J. Orr, God's Image in Man, 1906); (5) that the acceptance of the theory of descent as a universal and unlimited rule leads to the denial of the unity of the human race, in a physical and also in an intellectual, moral and religious sense. For it may be possible, even in the school of Darwin, to maintain the unity of the human race so long a time as tradition exercises its influence on the habit of mind; but theory itself undermines its foundation and marks it as an arbitrary opinion. From the standpoint of evolution, there is no longer any reason to hold to the "of one blood" of Acts 17 26 AV, but there has never even been a first man; the transition from animal to man was so slow and successive that the essential distinction fails to be seen. And with the effacing of this boundary, the unity of the moral ideal, of religion, of the laws of thought and of truth, falls also; the theory of evolution expels the absolute and Freethought and Pragmatism to psychology, relativism, pragmatism and even to pluralism, which is literally polytheism in a religious sense. The unity of the human race, on the other hand, as it is taught in holy Scripture, is not an indifferent and secondary truth, but an important and fundamental feature, because the human race is an intellectual, moral and religious one; it is a "postulate" of the whole history of civilization, and expressly or silently accepted by nearly all historians. And conscience bears witness to it, in so far as all men alike show the work of the moral law written in their hearts, and their thoughts accuse or excuse one another (Rom 2 15); it shows back to the Fall as an "Ursatze der Geschichte."

What the condition and history of the human race could hardly lead us to imagine, holy Scripture relates to us as a tragic fact in its first pages. The first man was created by God after His own image, not there of the Fall fore in brutish unconsciousness or brute strength and spiritual maturity, with understanding and reason, with knowledge and speech, with knowledge esp. of God and His law. Then was given to him moreover a command not to eat of the tree of knowledge of good and evil. This command was not contained in the moral law as such; it was not a natural but a positive commandment; it rested entirely and only on God's will and must be obeyed exclusively for this reason. It placed before man the choice, whether he would be faithful and obedient to God's word and would leave to Him alone the decision as to what is good or evil, or whether he would reserve to himself the right arbitrarily to decide what is good or evil. Thus the question was: Shall humanity or autonomy be the way of happiness? On this account also the tree was called the tree of knowledge of good and evil. It did not bear this name in the sense that man might obtain from it the empirical knowledge of good and evil, for by his transgression he in truth lost the empirical knowledge of good. But the tree was so named, because man, by eating of it and so transgressing God's commandment, arrogated to himself "die Fähigkeit zur selbstständigen Wahl der Mittel, durch die man sein Bück schaffen und seine eigenen und unabhängigen, selbstbestimmten oder selbständig und unabhängig den Mitteln, durch welche er seine selbstdirektigen Anliegen führen kann" (Koberle, Sünde und Gnade im relig. Leben des Volkes Israel bis auf Christentum, 1905, 64). Theonomy, as obedience to God from free love, includes as such the idea and the possibility of autonomy, therefore that of antimony also.
But it is the free act and therefore the guilt of man that has changed the possibility into reality. For the mind, there remains here an insoluble problem, as much in the question, why God allowed that Fall, as in the other, how man, created in the likeness of God, could and did fall. There is a great deal of truth in the often-expressed thought, that we can give no account of the origin of sin, because it is not logical, and does not result as a conclusion drawn from two premises. But facts are brutal. What seems logically impossible often exists in reality. The laws of moral life are different from those of thought and from those also of mechanical nature. The narrative in Gen 3, in any case, is psychologically faithful in the highest degree. For the same way as it appears there in the first man, it repeatedly takes place among ourselves (Jas 1 14.15). Furthermore we ought to allow God to justify Himself. The course of revelation discovers to faith how, through all the ages, He holds sin in its entire development in His own almighty hands, and works through grace for a conclusion in which, in the dispensation of the fulness of times, He will gather together in one all things in Christ (Eph 1 10). FALLOW, fal'6 (בָּדָם, dāmām): Dāmām is tr4 only once in the sense of “fallow” (Ex 23 11). The law required that the Israelites allow their ground to lie fallow one year in seven. AV is (Dt 15 2) “nir,” and is tr4 “fallow” in its more obsolete sense of “tilled ground” in AV (Jer 4 3; Hos 10 12).

FAME, fâm (עָזָה, shēm, פַּשֵּׁם, šēma; ἀκόα, akō, ἀκούει, akouē): “Fame” has the twofold meaning, (1) of report or rumor, (2) of renown or reputation (in OT it is not always easy to distinguish these two senses). “Fame,” šēma1, “fame,” “rumor,” “report” (Nu 14 15; Job 28 22, RV “rumor”) probably means “report”; but in 1 K 10 1; 2 Ch 9 1; Isa 66 19, it is most probably “renown,” or “reputation.” Famil. 2 (1 K 1 5; 2 Ch 8 9) may have either meaning; šēma2 (Josh 6 27; 9 9; Est 4 4) seems to mean “fame” in the sense of reputation; but in Jer 6 24 (as ARV) “report” “is known,” “name,” has the sense of reputation (1 K 3 31; 1 Ch 14 17; 22 5; Neh 3 19, RV “name”); kol, “voice,” is report (Gen 45 16, RV “report”). In the NT akō, “hearing,” is “report,” so RV (Mt 4 24; 14 1; Mk 1 28); phōmein, “word,” “rumor,” is report, fame in this sense (Mt 5 26; Lk 4 14); takhos, “a sound,” “noise” (Lk 4 37, RV “rumor”), and logos, “word” (Lk 5 15, RV “report”) have the same meaning; diáphēmëō, “to say throughout,” “to report publicly” (Mt 9 31, “they . . . spread abroad his fame”), seems to imply fame in the sense of reputation.

In 1 Macc 3 26, we have “fame” in the sense of reputation, “His fame (jônoma, RV “name”) came near even to the king”; so 3 41, “heard the fame of them.”

ERV has “fame” for “report” (shēma), Jer 50 43.

FAMILIAR, fa-mil’ya-r: Is found as an adj. qualifying “friend” and “spirit.”

(1) Used, in a number of OT passages, of spirits which were supposed to come at the call of one who had power over them. בָּדָם, ‘bōh, lit. something “hollow”; of דָּמָם, ‘bōh, “bottle” (Job 32 19 AV); because the voice of the spirit might have been supposed to come from the one possessed, as from a bottle, or because of the hollow sound which characterized the utterance, as out of the ground (Isa 29 4); or, as some have conjectured, akin to דָּמָם, ‘bōh, “return” (rephqāwi, nekārāmnōt). Probably called “familiar” because it was servant (familiaus) belonging to the family (familia), who might be summoned to do the commands of the one possessing it. The practice of consulting familiar spirits was forbidden by the Mosaic law (Lev 19 31; 20 6.27; Dt 18 11). King Saul put this away early in his reign, but consulted the witch of Endor, who “had a familiar spirit” (1 S 28 3.7. 8.9; 1 Ch 10 13). King Manasseh fell into the same sin (2 K 21 6; 2 Ch 33 6); but Josiah put those who dealt with familiar spirits out of the land (2 K 23 24).

It seems probable, however, that the practice prevailed more or less among the people till the exile (Isa 8 19; 19 3). See “Divination by the ‘Obh” in Espos T., IX, 157; Astrology, 1: COMMUNICATION WITH DEMONS.

(2) “Familiars,” “familiar friend,” fr ἐφορή, ἕθα, “to know,” hence “acquaintance,” one intimately attached (Job 19 14); but more frequently of ἔναντι ἄλομον, “man of my or thy peace,” that is, one to whom the salvation of peace is given (Ps 41 9; Jer 20 10; 35 22; also in Ob ver 7, rendered “the men that were at peace with thee”).

LITERATURE

The Bible is the world’s great teacher of monogamy—the union for life of one man and one woman in marriage as the basis of the family.

1. The Foundation of the writing of the books of the Bible, or of parts of them, the testimony of the whole is incontrovertibly to the point that marriage springs from the choice of one man and one woman of each other for a permanent family relation. Over and through the whole of the Bible this ideal is dominant. There may be instances shown there and there of violation of this rule. But such cases are to be regarded as contrary to the underlying principle of marriage—known even at the time of their occurrence to be antagonistic to the principle.

There may be times when moral principle is violated in high places and perhaps over wide reaches in society. The Bible shows that there were such times in the history of man. But it is undeniable that its tone toward such lapses of men and of society is not one of censure but of regret and disapproval. The disasters consequent are faithfully set forth. The feeling that finds expression in its whole history is that in such cases there had been violation of the ideal of right in the sex relation. A peculiar form of monogamy is laid down—monogamy for the parents. And the marriage bond is to be entered into by mutual agreement, with the parents.

2. Monogamy the Ideal Relation

The marriage relation of the sexes to each other the great charter of monogamy was laid down so clearly that Jesus was content to quote it, and the moral and ethical sense He emphasized in the marriage relation. "And the man said [when the woman was brought to him], This is now bone of my bones, and flesh of my flesh: she shall be called Woman, because she was taken out of Man. Therefore shall a man leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh" (Gen 2:23,24).

It is well to pause and look at the grammatical number of the nouns: "a man," "his wife." The words of the charter hold the sexes to monogamy. The subsequent words make marriage life-lasting. "They twain shall be one flesh." A dualism becomes an individualism. So said Christ: "Wherefore they are no more twain but one flesh!" (Mt 19:6 AV).

Nothing but death separates a man from his own soul. Expiation in this life of monogamy can find place in the language of this charter.

There is much in the setting of this charter in the account given in Gen that is suggestive of the fine sentiments which we associate always with love and marriage. That this account should have held the place in history that it has had adds testimony to the fine perception of sentiment and the strong grasp on principle out of which it came.

Eve, "the mother of all living," comes out as distinctly as Adam on the canvas in the portraiture of the first pair. She is the feminine representative—"ishah"—of the race, of the Sezze, as Adam is the masculine—"ish" (Gen 2:23).

The personality of Eve is as complete as that of Adam. She is a rational and accountable creature, as Adam is. In primitive intellectual and moral transactions she has share on equality with Adam and is equal in her rights. Different physical consequences fall on her for "transgression," because she is "woman," "the mother of all living" (Gen 3:16). But Adam does not escape retribution for sin, and it may be questioned whether its burden did not fall harder on him (Gen 3:18,19), for motherhood has its joy as well as its pain, in the companionship of new-born child-life; but the wrestler for subsistence from a reluctant earth must bear his hardship alone. It cannot but be that much of the primitive conjugal love survived the fall.

According to the record, monogamy seems long to have survived the departure from Eden. It is not till many generations after that we hear of a POLYGAMY event that we find a case of polygamy—of Lamech (Gen 4:19–24).

Lamech is said to have had "two wives." The special mention of "two" seems to show that man had not yet wandered far away from monogamy. The indications seem to be that as the race multiplied and went forth over the face of the earth they forgot the original kinship and exhibited all manner of barbarities in social relations. Lamech was a polygamist, but he was also a quarrelsome homicide: "I have slain a man for wounding me, and a young man for bruising me" (Gen 4:24).

Lamech's disregard of the law disclosed in the case of Lamech become common, it will certainly not be a long while before the only apt description of the condition of society must be that upon which we come in Gen 6:5: "And Jehovah saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually." Out of such condition will come war and slavery, and polygamy—and come they did. It is a straight road from Gen 6:5 to "The Koran, or the sword," and the polygamy of Mohammed.

The commandments (Ex 20:12; Dt 5:10) are a succinct summary of the supreme moral relations and duties of man. The first four pertain to the moral conditions of the race, the six following concern human relations. Of these six, three have considerations of the family involved in them. Commandments do not come to people ignorant of the subjects to which they relate. A commandment to cover an unknown moral relation is an absurdity. The text of the Fifth Commandment is, "Honor thy father and thy mother." This refers to the relation of children to parents. Such commands as these scarcely have arisen when polygamy was a common practice, certainly never from promiscuity. The equality of father and mother is stamped on its face. That idea never could have had strength in a society in a state of polygamy, to entitle the command in which it appeared to rank with the important subjects covered by the other commands. Before the gaze of the children to whom this commandment came, the family stood in a marginal be his place and nature, and was a head of the family as well as the father. There is no question about the position of the mother in this commandment. She stands out as clear as Sinai itself. There is no cloud on her majesty. Such honor as goes to the father goes to the mother; she is no chattel, no property, no inferior being, but the mother; no subordinate to the father, but his equal in rank and entitled to equal reverence with him.

The commandment would not and could not have so pictured the mother had she been one of the inmates of a harem.

The Seventh Commandment (Ex 20:14; Dt 5:18) gives the family. It secures the home. It says that whatever children are born to be; whatever the relations of the home—shall be family-born.

The terms adultery and fornication have now become synonymous. Under the influence of polygamous prac-

The Fifth Commandment and the Family (7th Commandment)

The family is the primal education of man—the ground and the holiest. Over this institution this commandment stands sentry. It prevents men from breaking up in complete individual isolation, from reverting to solitary savagery. Think to what a child is born outside of the family relation! A remnant of all children living so born, and you have the picture of a low plane of animalism from which all trace of the moral response of fatherhood is not wholly erased, and where even motherhood will be reduced to simple care during the short period of helpless infancy, to such care as belongs to the pet, such acts as a new heaven and a new earth in the sex relations of the race of man.
The Tenth Commandment seems almost out of place on the list of the commandments. All the other commandments are specific acts. This tenth commandment seems to be a forbidding of the Saviour's method—going to the thoughts and intents of the heart. It is an attempt at regulation in man. It goes beyond outward acts and deals with the spirit. Its purpose seems not regulation of man in society but in himself. So far as it has outward relation it seems to apply primarily to the rights of property. We have at common law the doctrine of "rights of husband and rights of things," i.e., to property. But the list of things enumerated in the commandment comprises the things most common to family life: house, servants, animals. One is forbidden not only to take but even to desire such things. They are necessary to family life. In this list of things belonging to a neighbor that a man is forbidden to desire occurs the term "wife." To first thought it may seem strange that she should be listed with property in house and chattels. But it may not be so singular. One of woman's greatest blessings to man is helpfulness. Eve, the mother of all living, came as a helpmeet for Adam. Sarah is mistress of domestic operations. A wife quick of thought, accurate in judgment, and wise in handling the key to her man's material prosperity. As such help a man's desire might stray to his neighbor's wife as well as to his cattle. Even on this lower plane she is still a constituent element of the family. Here the thought of sexual jealousy discerns. Covetousness unlimited in the accumulation of property is what comes under ban. To treat of that matter would lead too far afield. See Covetousness.

It is well to remember in taking leave of the commandments that those pertaining to human relations hold the family plainly in view. This is as it should be. The race is divided equally between male and female, and their relations to each other, we might expect, would call for half of the directions devoted to the whole.

The laws against adultery and incest (Lev 20 and the like) may seem barbarously severe. Be it so; that fact would show they were 8. Primitive Monogamic and the Ideal Carried along by a people tremendously Monogamic, the laws are about the integrity of the family. Beneath pioneer severity is usually a solemn principle. That the children of Israel had a tough grasp on the primitive monogamic ideal is not only apparent in all their history, but it comes out clear in what they held as history before their own began. Mr. Gladstone said the tenth chapter of Genesis is the best document of ancient ethnography known to man. But it is made up on family lines. It is a record of the settlement of heads of families as they went forth on the face of the earth. The common statement for the sons of Noah as they filed out over the lands of which they took possession is, "these are the sons of . . . after their families, after their tongues, in the regions of their nations." Mr. Gladstone called attention to the fact that modern philology verifies this classification of the nations which rests on outgrowth from families.

Turning now to a very distant point in history—the return of the Jews from captivity in Babylon— we find in Ezr and Neh the most

9. Reforms critical regard for genealogy. The of Ezra and effort to establish "pure blood" was Nehemiah fairly a fanaticism and might even be charged with injustice. Yet this effort was ratified by peoples—suffered in degraded name though many of them must have been. This could never have been done had not the monogamic family idea rested in their hearts as just and right.

Nehemiah (13:26) unsparingly condemned the mighty Solomon for his polygamy, and Israel approved the decision.

When we come to the times of the NT, contemporaneous polygamy in Jewish society was dead. Wherever NT influences have gone, 10. The NT contemporaneous polygamy has ceased (Acts and Paul's letters) with the spirit of Christian sentiment.

There has been in the United States by Mormonism a belated attempt to revive that crime against the family. But it has had its bad day, and, if it lives at all, it is under the ban of social sentiment and is a crime by law. Consecutive polygamy still exists in nations that are called Christian. The "right of the law" and the title of Christian sentiment is setting strongly against it, and it takes no special clearness of vision to see that it must go to extinction along with polygamy contemporaneous.

Jesus reaffirmed the original charter of the monogamic family (Mt 19:1–12; Mk 10:1–22). It is to be noticed that He affirmed the indissolubility of the family not only against the parties therein but against the power of society. See Divorce.

At first sight it seems a little strange that Jesus said so little about the family. But as we reflect on the nature of His mission we shall catch the explanation of His silence. He said, "Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets: I came not to destroy, but to fulfil" (Mt 5:17), that is, to fill out, to expand and to give new life to the ancient law. He said, "For the Son of man is come to save that which was lost" (18:11 AV), and, "I came not to call the righteous, but sinners" (9:13), that is, to rectify what was wrong. To what was right He gave the right way—let it go on in its own course. When the law was right, He said, not one jot or title of it should fail (19:8). It is not possible for the family, He held the old charter written in the heart of man, before it was burned in brick or committed to manuscript, was right. It was comprehensive, would and ought to stand. So He stood by that, and that satisfied His purpose. Christ did not try to regulate the family so much as to regulate the persons who entered into family life. This may explain why we have no utterance from Him in regard to the conduct and duties of children toward parents. Still, the ancient saying, "Love thy father and thy mother," He came not to destroy but to fulfill that. That still indicates the right relation of children to parents. If a child had asked about his relation to his parents, Christ would doubtless have referred him to the law, as He did to others inquirers about duties to the commandments that cover so large a part of the ethical realm.

Paul, who particularizes so much in explanation of duties in all relations, scarcely goes beyond the old commandment, "Honor thy father and thy mother," when he says, "Children obey your parents in all things, for this is well-pleasing in the Lord." It has always been well-pleasing in the Lord. To be sure there was new inspiration to obedience from the new revelation of duty which came to them in Christ, but the duty was enforced by the Fifth Commandment, and that was copied from the deeper revelation in the heart of man.

In modern society the two great foes of the family are Divorce and Migration. Families no longer live a continuous life together. We have less family life than the pastoral nomad...

13. Modern Family Dangers
They had to keep together for several reasons in order to protect their lives and their flocks and herds. So also the tribe and the nation. Family influence can be detected throughout them. Modern industries are very degrading, and the family, we should easily think that families would be under their controlling influence. But they are not; the industries are localized, the workers are becoming rovers. When trouble comes in an industry, a workman's first resort is to try somewhere else. Cheapness of transportation gives him the opportunity he desires. So with a pitchet be good hunting, much as a barbarian roams the forest for game, and when his family or large breeds behind, he may be separated from his family for months or years, possibly abandon it forever. A very common cause of divorce is about the family by the male head.

In fact, those engaged in a great deal of legitimate industry are engaged out for a better place quite as much as to develop the capacities of human life in their own locations. The signs over places of business are few that carry the same name in town or city for generations. Movements is perhaps more the order of the day than movement. The families are few that can be found in the same place, even if a quarter of a century. The wealthy cannot stay in the same house six months at a time. They have a house in the city for the winter and one in the country for the summer, and then forsake both and fly over the sea, perhaps to remain for years—traveling. How can family ties drive the armies of life?

Society supersedes the family. Even education is subject to this maligmn influence. At their most impressive age, when they need family influence most around them, children are sent away to prepare for or to enter upon higher courses of education. This fits them for something else for life in the family from which they should acquire a taste for winning by their own efforts. They may not be able to check this drift, but we ought to see its tendency to degrade the estimate of the value of the family.

FAMILY RELATIONSHIPS. See Relationships, Family.

The common OT word for "famine" is rā'ēbh; rā'ēbōn also occurs (Gen 45 19.33; Ps 37 19), and kāphōn (Job 8 22; 30 3), all meaning "hungers" and "abominations"; in the NT the word is aμωμοίον, meaning primarily "failure," "want of food.

In early times, especially in lands dependent on their own productions, famines were not infrequent. They were generally caused by local causes such as pestilence, hail, and drought, and by the ravages of insects (Ex 10 15; Joel 1 4) and by enemies (Dt 25 51); in a city a famine might be caused by a siege (2 K 6 25); pestilence often followed in its wake, and the suffering was great.

Famines are recorded in the time of Abraham (Gen 12 10), of Isaac (26 1), of Jacob, when Joseph was in Egypt—seven years of famine during the time of a famine in Egypt after seven years.

2. Famines famine in Egypt after seven years

Mentioned of plenty (41 54), which also affected Canaan (42 1), and, indeed, "was over all the face of the earth" (41 50); in the time of the Judges (Ruth 1 1), of David, for three years (2 S 21 1), of Ahbab and Eliah (1 K 17 1; 18 2; 2 Chr 23 24 25); of Elisha (2 K 4 48), of Elisea, 2 K 4 34; of Samaria (6 25), the seven years foretold by Elisha (8 1), in the reign of Zedekiah in Jerus when besieged by Nebuchadnezzar (2 K 25 6; Jer 22 6; cf 14 1), its great severity is referred to (Lam 5 14 Bar 2 25); a "dearth" is also mentioned after the return from Captivity (Neh 8 5); when the city was besieged by Antiochus Eupator (1 Mac 6 54), after the death of Judas (9 24), when Jerus was besieged by Simon (13 49), in the time of Claudius (Acts 11 21), for his signs there were frequent famines, one in which there were 40 AD severely affected Pal; Jos, Ant, XX, v.; Christ predicted "famines . . . in divers places" as characterizing the end of the age (Mt 24 7; Mk 13 8; Lk 21 11); in the siege of Jerus by Titus a terrible famine raged, the consequences of which to the people have never been surpassed.

Famines are frequently said to be sent as punishment sometimes threatened as such (Lev 26 19; Deut 28 31; 2 H 4 18; Ps 105 16).

3. Divine Isa 14 30; 61 19; Jer 14 12; 15 18

Relations 21, etc; Ezek 5 16, etc; Am 8 11; 2 Esd 15 4 19; 16 19; Tob 4 13; Ecclus 39 28; 40 9.

The righteous or godly should be preserved by God in time of famine (Job 5 20, "in famine he will redeem thee from death"); Ps 33 19, "to keep them alive in famine"); 37 19, "In the days of famine they shall be satisfied"); this was a special mark of the Divine favor and power.

A famine is used by Amos to indicate the absence of Divine communications as a punishment that should come on the people, a "famine" of Ubes (v 11; of 1 S 5 3; 28 6; 2 Ch 15 5; Ezk 7 16; Mic 3 6); by Zephaniah of the destruction of heathen deity (2 11).

RV has "dearth" for "famine" (Job 5 22); "famine" for "dearth" (Gen 41 54b; 2 Ch 26 5; Acts 7 11; 11 28); for "hunger" (Jer 38 9; Ezek 17 12; Tob 16 11; "famines" for "famines and pestilences" (Mt 24 7), "famines and troubles" (Mk 13 8), revised texts.

FAMISH, fam'ish (םַשָּׁנָה, rā'ēbh, רעב, rā'ah), "To famish" as a trans vb. is the tr rā'ēbh, "to hunger," (Gen 41 55): "All the land of Egypt was famished"; of rā'ēbh, "hunger" ( Isa 5 13), "Their honorable men are famished," m "Heb their glory are men of famine"; of rā'ah, "to make lean," famished ( Zeph 2 11), "He shall make famished the gods of the earth"; it is intr as the tr of rā'ēbh (Prov 10 3), "Jeh will not suffer the soul of the righteous to famish.

FAN, FANNER, fan'er: The word "fan" occurs 3 only in ARV (Jer 15 7; Mt 3 12; Lk 3 17). In Isa 30 24 mscher is trt "fork," which is a much better tr if the instrument referred to was shaped like the winnowing fork used by the Syrian farmer today and still so called. In Isa 41 16; Jer 4 11, 15 7, the vb. zārēh is rendered "winnow" in ARV. In Jer 61 2, RV substitutes "strangers" for "fanners.

FANCY, fam'ā or (םַשָּׁנָה, rā'ēbh, רעב, rā'ah), "to cause to appear," "show"): In Ecclus 34 3, "And the heart famished, as a woman's in travail" (cf Wisd 6 16; He 12 21).

FAR, fär, FARTHER, fär'thär: "Far" (adj.), distant, remote; (adv.) widely removed, is most frequently in the OT the tr of יִרְאֹב, rā'ēb, and in the NT of ἅπαξ λεγόμενον, see For- mato, is rendered "far from me." "far from thee," etc (Gen 18 25; 1 S 2 20; 20 9; 22 15; 2 S 20 20 23 17; Job 34 10). Besides its literal sense, distance in a spiritual sense is expressed by "far," as "Salvation is far from the wicked" (Ps 119 159; Prov 15 20), "far from righteousness" (Isa 46 12), "not far from the kingdom of God" (Mk 12 34), etc. For "far" RV has "aloof" in Job 30 10; in several places the word in AV is omitted (Isa 9 17; Ps 27 9; Isa 19 6; 26 15; Mk 13 44), "a far country" as changed to "another" (Mt 21 15; Mk 13 34), etc. For "God forbid" RV has "far be it," "far be it from me" (Gal 6 14; in ARV, Gen 44 7 17; 1 S 12 23; Job 27 5, etc).

The comparative "farther" occurs only once in the OT (Ecc 8 17), and three in the NT (Mt 26 34; Mk 1 19; 110), and in each case is replaced in RV by another word or phrase. RV, on the other hand, has "its farthest height" for "the height of his border” (Isa 37 24), and “his farthest lodging-place” for “the lodgings of his borders” (2 K 19 23).

FAR HOUSE: The marginal expression in RV of Beth-merhak (בֵּית חוֹר־מְרָחָק, “house of distance”), which is given in the text of 2 S 15 17 instead of “a place that was far off.” See Beth-merhak.

FARE, făr: Occurs twice in the OT as the tr of two Heb words, תֶּהֶר, šālôm, “peace,” “prosperity,” “completeness” (1 S 17 18), found in the section on David’s family history omitted by the LXX translators, and מְשָׁכָר, “hike,” “reward,” LXX ωάριον, παντωμία, “passage-money,” “fare” (Jon 1 3). In Heb both words are substantives; in Eng, the former is a vb. meaning “to go,” or “get on as to circumstances” (Century Dict.), the latter, a subst. meaning the price which Jonah paid for a sea-voyage to Tarshish.

In Apoc the Eng. vb. “fare” helps in the tr of three Gr words, καθάρσις, καθάρος, “fare evil” (RV “fear ill”): Sir 3 26; διασώς, εὐτασία, “fare worse” (RV “suffer loss”), 32 24; βάστυνα, ῥαθύνων, “be strong,” “prosper,” in 2 pers. (sing.) imperat. (ἐπεωρῆσθαι, ἑταίροι) or pl. (ἐπεωροῦσθαι, ἑταίροι), as a farewell salutation, or at the close of a letter, or to denote the welfare (usually physical or social) of a friend (2 Mac 9 20, 11 21, etc.). Cf Acts 15 29; 23 30 m.

In the NT the Eng. vb. “fare,” in addition to its occurrence in the word “farewell” (which see), occurs only once (Lk 16 10), where it is said that the rich man “fared sumptuously every day” (RV m. “living and splendor every day”).

The Gr is ἐδοκίμασε, εὐρυνόμασε, “be merry,” and occurs 14 t. in the NT, 10 in a good sense (Lk 15 23, 24, 25), all referring to the merry-making going over the return of the lost son; Acts 2 26, tr. of Heb נָדָב, śāmāh, “be glad”: Rom 15 10, tr. of Heb נֵיחַ, ῥαָנָד, “to sing”; 2 Cor 2 2; Gal 4 27, tr. of Heb נֵיחַ, ῥαָנָד, “to sing”; Rev 12 12; 18 20; 4 in a bad, or less favorable, sense (Lk 12 19; 16 19; Acts 7 41; Rev 11 10). The Gr word is variously tr. in the NT. “be merry,” “make merry,” “be glad,” “rejoice.” “fear,” and only once “fare” (Lk 16 19). In the last passage it means the general physical and material welfare of the rich man’s family (Lk 15 16). The Gr term rendered “merry” by the Bishops’ and Rheims Bible, RV 1881, and not simply partaking of rich food so much as the sense of comfort and security, is included in the sense of the equivalent Heb term. (Gen 43 32).

The Farewell, or the Last Supper: This section of John’s Gospel is the last recorded conversation between the Master and His disciples. It is different from any other of Jesus’ discourses in structure, thought, form, and emphasis. The occasion was the evening before His crucifixion. The farewells and greetings were, like the Last Supper itself, the most solemn and intimate witness to the protracted practice of the Master, a feature of Christ’s life, and the spirit in which He would leave the world. There is a foretaste of this in the words spoken after the Last Supper. The Farewell discourse is divided into four parts relating to the nature, necessity, and permanence of the Christian faith (John 14:1–17; 15:1–17; 16:1–15; 17:6–26). The discourses of the Farewell are not intended to speak directly to any special occasion, but reflect the entire movement of the Lord’s teaching and application of the Gospel. In the Farewell discourse, John 14, Jesus teaches His disciples to know the Father and to believe in His presence (John 14:1–14). In John 15, He teaches them to abide in His love (John 15:1–17). In John 16, He teaches them to love one another (John 16:1–15). In John 17, He teaches them to love the Father and to pray (John 17:6–26). The Farewell discourse is a farewell, not in the sense of leaving the world, but in the sense of leaving the disciples to the care and guidance of the Holy Spirit. The Farewell discourse is a farewell, not in the sense of leaving the world, but in the sense of leaving the disciples to the care and guidance of the Holy Spirit. The Farewell discourse is a farewell, not in the sense of leaving the world, but in the sense of leaving the disciples to the care and guidance of the Holy Spirit.

Fasting, fast, Fasting, fasting (Gr. \textit{pantos}, \textit{taman}; \textit{pantos}, \textit{unacct self-salve}; \textit{selnos, self-salve, pantos, nedsedos}; \textit{it is necessary to get rid of some modern notions associated with fasting before we can form a correct idea of its origin and significance in the ancient world. For instance, in the case of many ailments the dieting of the patient is an essential part of the remedy. But we may readily assume that originally fasting was not based on the salutary influence which it exercised on the health of the subject. Considerations of therapeutics played no part in the institution. The theory that fasting, like many other ancient customs, had a religious origin, is in fact with scholars, but we must not assume a religious origin for all practices which in process of time came to be associated with religion. Many customs, purely secular in their origin, have gradually obtained a religious significance, just as purely religious ceremonies have been dissociated from religion. It is also possible and, in the light of some usages, probably true, that the various practices observed in the association of fasting, as of some other customs, with religion. Scholars have been too ready to assume that the original significance of fasting was the same in all countries and among all nations. Robertson Smith in his \textit{Religion of the Semites} advanced and defended the theory that fasting was merely a mode of preparation for the tribal meal in which sacrifice originated, and came to be considered at a later stage as part of the sacrificial act. The hypothesis apparently accounts for the otherwise strange fact that both fasting and feasting are religious acts, but it does not give a satisfactory explanation of the constant association of fasting with the \textquote{wearing of sackcloth, the putting of ashes on the head, and other similar customs. It is obvious that very different motives operated in the institution of fasting and of feasting as religious observances. It is a matter of common observation and experience that great distress causes loss of appetite and therefore occasions abstinence from food. Hannah, who was greatly distressed on account of her childlessness, \textquote{wept, and did not eat} (1 Sam 1 7). Violence takes the same effect (20 34). According to 1 K 21 4, Ahab, \textquote{heavy and displeased} on account of Naboth's refusal to part with his estate, sulked and \textquote{would eat no bread}. Fasting, originally the natural expression of grief, became the customary mode of proving the deep inner emotion of sorrow. David demonstrated his grief at Abner's death (2 S 3 35) by fasting, just as the Psalmist indicated his sympathy with his adversaries' sorry plight in the same way (Ps 35 13). In such passages as Ezr 10 6; Est 4 3, it is not clear whether fasting is used in its religious significance or simply as a natural expression of sorrow (cf also Lk 5 33 and see below). This view explains the association of fasting with mourning customs of antiquity (cf 1 S 31 13; 2 S 1 12). As fasting was a perfectly natural and human expression and evidence of the subject's grief, it readily claimed a place among those religious customs whose main object was the pacification of the anger of God, or the expression of repentance and remorse. The act of fasting would manifest the distressful state of the suppliant would appeal to the Deity and move Him to pity. The interesting incident recorded in 2 S 12 16-23 suggests the twofold significance of fasting as a religious act or a mode of appealing to the Deity and as a funeral custom. David defends his fasting before and not after the child's death on the ground that while the child was alive David's prayer might be answered. His fasting was intended to make his petition to God (2 S 12 24). The King James Version (Est 21; Est 4 16). Occasionally fasting was proclaimed on a national scale, e.g. in case of war (Jgs 20 26; 2 Ch 20 3) or of pestilence (Joel 1 3 f). Fasting having thus become a recognized mode of seeking Divine favor, it is not unlikely that it should be associated with confession of sin, as indisputable evidence of penitence or sorrow for sin.

Fasting might be partial, i.e. abstinence from certain kinds of food, or total, i.e. abstinence from all food as well as from washing, anointing, sleeping. It might be of shorter or longer duration, e.g. for one day, from sunrise to sunset (Jgs 20 26; 1 S 14 24; 2 S 1 12; 3 35). In 1 S 31 13 allusion is made to a seven days' fast, while Daniel abstained from \textquote{pleasant bread, flesh, wine and anointing for three weeks} (Dnl 10 3). Moses (Ex 34 28) and Elijah (1 K 19 8) fasted for 40 days. It is probable that these last three references presuppose a totally different conception of the significance of fasting. It is obvious that dreams made a deep impression on primitive man. They were communicative of the departed members of the family. At a later stage they were looked upon as revelations from God. During sleep there is total abstinence from food. It was easy to draw the inference that fasting might fit the person to receive these communications from the world of spirits (Dnl 10 2). The close connection between fasting and insight—intellectual and spiritual—between simple living and high thinking is universally recognized. See further under \textit{Abstinence; Feasts and Fasts.}

\textbf{Fat (Gr. \textit{leb\textparagraph{obh, \textit{leb\textparagraph{obh, fat})}: The layer of subcutaneous fat and the compact subcut surrounding the viscera and imbedded in the entails which, like the blood, was forbidden as food in the Mosaic code (Lev 3 17). It was to be sacrificed to God by being burnt upon the altar (3 16; 7 30). This had to be done on the very day on which a beast had been slaughered, in order to remove the cause of the Israelite to use it otherwise (Ex 23 18). The law was probably a sanitary restriction, for, at an early date, leprosy, scrofula and disfiguring cutaneous diseases were thought to be caused by the use of fat as food. It was, moreover, an important logical provision; for, besides the self-denial, and the maxim that the richest and best meat of the edible animal belonged to Jehovah. See also Fatting; Fowl, Fatted.}
The expression “fat” is often used in figurative senses, e.g., abundant, exuberant, lusty, fertile, robust, outwardly successful (Dt 32 15; Ps 92 14 AV; 119 70; Prov 11 25; 13 4, etc.).

FATHER, fat'hær (AS Fader; Ger. Vater; Heb בָּן, 'ābh; etymology uncertain, found in many cognate languages; Gr μακάς, patér, from root pd, "nourisher," "protector")

Immediate male ancestor. The father in the Heb family, as in the Rom, had supreme rights over his children, could dispose of his daughter in marriage (Gen 29), arrange his children's marriages (Gen 24, 25), and his children's children.

1. Immediate Male

son's marriage (Gen 24), sell his child to a stranger (Neh 6 5), have power of life and death, as in the case of Isaac (Gen 22), Jephthah's daughter (Jgs 11 34, 38), the sacrificing of his children to Moloch (Lev 18 21; 20 3, etc.). Respect, reverence and affection for fathers (and equally for mothers) is most tenderly, explicitly and sternly prescribed from the earliest times (Ex 20 12; Lev 19 3; Dt 5 16; Mic 7 6; Ezk 22 7, etc.), a symbolic and beautiful picture of the duty and character of the ideal human father may be built up from the OT, with added and enlarged touches from the NT. He loves (Gen 37 4); commands (Gen 50 16; Prov 6 20); instructs (1 3, etc.); guides, encourages, warns (Ps 11 4; 1 Thes 4 11; 2 Cor 12 1); trains (Hos 11 5); rebukes (Gen 34 10); restrains (Eli, by contrast, 1 S 3 13); punishes (Dt 21 18); chastens (Prov 3 12; Dt 8 5); nourishes (Isa 1 2); delights in his son (Prov 3 12), and in his son's wisdom (30 1); is deeply grieved by his folly (17 25); he is considerate of his children's needs and requests (Mt 7 10); considerate of their burdens, or sins (Matt 3 17, "As a man spareth his own son"); tenderly familiar (Lk 11 7, "with me in bed"); considerately self-restrained (Eph 6 4, "Provoke not your children to wrath"); having in view the highest ends (ib, "Nurture them in the chastening and admonition of the Lord"); pitiful (Ps 103 13, "as a father pitieth his children"); the last of the list (Gen 23 9); largest of all (Lk 17 10): "Between a thing to the psalmist incredible"

(a) Ancestor, immediate or remote: Gen 28 13, "Abraham is the father of Isaac" (grammatically R 28 12); "Jesephat. . . Dauid his father";

2. Ancestors, Immediate or Remote

Jer 35 6, "Jonadab, the son of Rechab, our father"; Dn 5 11, "Nebuchadnezzar thy father" (personal or official ancestor); Gen 15 13, "Go to thy fathers in peace" (and so [in the pl.] in over 500 passages). The expressions "slept with his fathers," "go down to his fathers," "buried with his fathers," "gathered to his fathers," are self-explanatory euphemisms.

Figurative and derived uses: (a) A spiritual ancestor, one who has infused his own spirit into others, whether good, as Abraham, the father of the Heb Hidul (Rom 4 11); or bad, as Sin. (b) Indicating closest resemblance, kinship, affinity: Job 17 14, "If I have said to corruption, Thou art my father;" (c) A source: Eph 1 17, "Father of glory;" Job 28 28, "Hath the rain a father?" (d) Creator: Jas 1 17, "the Father of lights." (e) The inventor or originator of an art or mode of life: Gen 4 20, "father of such as dwell in tents" (a hint here of hereditary occupations? Probably not). (f) One who exercises fatherly characteristics: Ps 68 5, "a father of the fatherless.

(g) One who occupies a position of counsel, care, or control (frequently applied by sultans to their prime ministers): Gen 46 8, "a father to Pharaoh;" Jgs 17 10, 11, "O God, sake of a priest." (h) A revered or honored superior: 2 K 6 13, "My father; if the prophet had bid thee;" but esp. applied to prophets: 2 K 2 12, "My father, my father!" also to elderly and venerable men: 1 Jn 2 18, "I write unto your father;" hence with, of, and to other affectations: Acts 2 16, "a priest after the line of Aaron;" Phil 2 25, "a bishop after the order of Melchizedek;" early Christians: 2 Pet 3 4, "from the day that the fathers fell asleep." (i) An ecclesiastical title, condemned (in principle) by Our Lord: Mt 23 8, "Call no man your father on the earth;" but applied, under the power of the Church, to members of the Sanhedrin (probably by Stephen: Acts 7 2; and by Paul: 22 1, but the latter, perhaps also the former, may simply refer to the elder among his hearers). Christ's condemnation is clearly of the brash-seeking or obsequious spirit, rather than of a particular custom.

"Father," used by Mary of Joseph, in relation to Jesus, equals "putative father," a necessary reserve at a time when the virgin birth could not yet be procured (Lk 2 49). But note Jesus' answer: "my Father's house."

PHILIP WENDELL CRANNELL

FATHER, GOD THE: In the Christian religion God is conceived of as "Father," "Our Father," and "Father in heaven" (Mt 6 9.14.26, etc.), "the God and Father of the Lord Jesus" (2 Cor 11 31, etc.). The tenderness of relation and wealth of love and grace embraced in this profound designation are peculiar to Christ's gospel. Pagan religions also spoke of God as "Father" (Zeus Pater), and in the general sense of Creator God has a universal fatherly relation to the world (Acts 17 24-25). In the OT God was revealed as Father to the chosen nation (Ex 4 22), and to the nation of the Jews, as father of the king (2 S 7 14), while fatherly love is declared to be the image of His pity for those who fear Him (Ps 103 13). In the gospel of Jesus alone is this fatherhood revealed to be of the very essence of the Divine Fatherhood; it is personal and individual. Here, however, there is need for great discrimination. To reach the heart of the truth of the Divine Fatherhood it is necessary to begin, not with man, but with the Godhead itself, in whose eternal depths is found the spring of that Fatherly love that reveals itself in time. It is first of all in relation to the eternal Son—before all time—that the meaning of Fatherhood in God is made clear (Jn 1 18). In "God the Father" we have a name pointing to that relation which the first Person in the adorable Trinity sustains to "Son" and "Holy Spirit."—also Divine (Mt 28 19). From this eternal fountain-head flow the relations of God as Father (1) to the world by creation; (2) to believers by grace. Man as created was designed by affinity of nature for sonship to God. The realization of this—his true creature-destiny—was frustrated by sin, and can now only be restored by redemption. Hence the place of sonship in the gospel, as an unseparable privilege (1 Jn 3 1), obtained by grace, through regeneration and spiritual adoption (Rom 8 15-17). In this relation of nearness and privilege to the Father in the kingdom of His Son (Col 1 13), believers are "sons of God" in a sense true of no others. It is a relation, not of nature, but of grace. Fatherhood is now the determinative fact in God’s relation to them (Eph 3:14 ff.). It is an error, nevertheless, to speak of fatherhood as if the whole character of God was therein sufficiently expressed. God is Father, but equally fundamental is his relation to his world as its Moral Ruler and Judge. It is only by the holy God that human and spiritual charity may be foreseen. For the fuller discussion of these points see GOD; CHILDREN OF GOD; TRINTY.

FATHER-IN-LAW, fa’thér-in-lō. See RELATIONSHIPS, FAMILY.

FATHERLESS, fa’thér-less (πατερέσκοι, ὑδηθόν; ὀπαθοῦσα, ὀρθομοῦσα): The fatherless are frequently mentioned in the OT, generally in association with the widow and the stranger, as typical instances of the unprotected and neglected, who are specially subject to oppression, and also to God’s special protection. Great philanthropic regard is bestowed on this class throughout. In early legislation there is a special clause to guard them against affliction (Ex 22:22–24). They have a still more prominent place in the Deuteronomic legislation, which gives instructions that a charitable fund be formed out of the tithe, once every three years, for the relief of the destitute (Dt 14:28; 26:12–14), and that gleanings be left in the cornfield, the olive garden, and the vineyard for the benefit of this class (Dt 24:19–22; cf Lev 19:9 f.; 23:22, where, however, the “fatherless” are not specially mentioned). The Deuteronomist declares that God is on their side (10:18), and strongly condemns those who would oppress them (24:17; 27:19). The prophets and psalmists are equally emphatic in pleading for mercy and justice to the fatherless, and in declaring that God is their special guardian (Isa 1:17; Jer 7:6 f.; 22:3; Hos 14:3; Zec 7:10; Ps 10:14; 66:5; 83:3; 146:9; cf Prov 23:10). Oppressing the fatherless is frequently mentioned as a typical act of cruelty and injustice (cf Job 6:27; 22:9; 24:3, 9; 29:12 f.; 31:16.17.21; Ps 94:6; Isa 1:23; 10:2; Jer 5:28; Ezek 22:7; Mal 3:5). Here we have instances of the prophetic passion for righteousness and compassion for the helpless, inspired by a profound sense of the value of human life. Passages in the Apoc reflect the same spirit (2 Esd 3:1–20; Eccles 4:10).

In the OT the word “fatherless” occurs but once, where James declares, in the spirit of the OT prophets, that true religious ritual consists in visitation of the fatherless and widows in and moral purity (1Sa 1:27). Here the word for “fatherless is ὀπαθοῦσα (‘bereft,’ ‘orphanned’), which is the LXX tr of the OT ὑδηθόν. In the NT the Gr word is found besides only in Jn 14:18, where it means desistute of a teacher or guide (cf Lam 5:3).

FATHER’S HOUSE, FATHERS’ HOUSE (πατριαί, beth ‘āb, ἱδριαί ὀνόμα, beth ‘ābhotā): Father’s house in the OT (1) a dwelling, the family home (Gen 12:1; 31:14.30; 38:11; 1 S 18:2); (2) a family (Gen 41:51; 46:31; Ex 12:38, “fathers’ houses”); (3) the group of household, of several of which the “family” or “clan” was constituted, aggregations of which formed the “tribe,” generally “fathers’ houses” (Nu 1:18.20; 2:17 e 26:1); (2) a group of those who had the same father (Gen 37:10.13); (3) a house of refuge (Nu 11:33); (4) the “family” (clan), mizpāhāb, “fathers’ houses” (Ex 6:14 f.; Nu 3:20 f); (5) the tribe, “fathers’ houses,” “houses” (Nu 7:2; 17:1–3, etc.)

In the NT the “father’s house” (οἶκος τοῦ πατρός, oikos ton patrōs) occurs in the sense of dwelling, house (Lk 16:27; cf 16:4). Our Lord also uses the phrase (1) of the earthly temple-dwelling of God at Jerus (Jn 2:16, “Make not my Father’s house a house of merchandise”; cf Ps 11:4; Isa 52:13); (2) as the abode of God for his young children (Jn 14:2, “In my Father’s house are many mansions,” RVm “abiding places,” oikia, “house,” “dwelling,” also household, family; cf Ps 33:13; Isa 63:15; Mt 6:9). The phrase occurs also (Acts 7:20 of Moses, “nourished . . . in his father’s house” (oikos).

RV has “father’s house” for “principal household” (1 Ch 24:6), “heads of the fathers’ houses” for “chief fathers” (Nu 1:39), for “cf Ps 136:28; 36:8; 36:18; 1 Chr 27:26) “the house of the father” of “the one prince of a father’s house,” for “each of” (Josh 23:14), “the heads of the fathers’ houses” for “the chief of the fathers’ houses” of “the house of the chief” for “the principal fathers” (1 Ch 24:31).

FAVOR, făr'ér (תָּחָנו, ὑπαίθριον, rās̱ān, with other Heb words; σέβαις, chēria)

Means generally good will, acceptance, and the benefits flowing from these; in older usage it meant also the countenance, hence appearance. Alternating in EV with "grace," it is used chiefly of man, but sometimes also of God (Gen 18 3; 30 27; 39 21; Ex 3 21; 2 S 15 25, "in the eyes of Jeh, etc"). It is used perhaps in the sense of "countenance" in Prov 31 30, "Favor is deceitful, and beauty is vain" (AV), where for "favor" RV has "grace"); the reference is to external appearance. "Favored" is used in the sense of "appearance" in the phrase "well-favored" (Gen 29 10; Prov 1 7, 11; 4 18; 11 9; 13 14; 31 29; 32 4); conversely, "ill-favored" (Gen 41 34). For "favor" RV has "have pity on" (Ps 109 12), "good will" (Prov 14 9), "peace" (Can 8 10); RV "grace" (Ruth 2 13), ARV "kindness." (Est 2 17; Del 2 7). In ARV "favor" is changed into "the year of Jeh's favor"; "Do I now persuade men" (Gal 1 10) into, "Am I now seeking the favor of men," and there are other RV changes.

FEAR, fēr (שָנָה, yir'ah, פָּרָה, yārē, פָּרָשָׁו, p̣ēḇ̣ēā, ὑπάθριον, phobō); "Fear" is the tr of many words in the OT; the chief are: yir'ah, "fear;" Terms, "terror;" "reverence;" "awe," most often "the fear of God," "of Jeh" (Gen 20 11; 2 Ch 19 9, etc); also of "fear" generally (Job 22 4; Isa 7 25, Ezek 30 13, etc); yārē, "to be afraid," to fear," to reverence" (Gen 15 17; Lev 19 34; Dt 6 2, etc); p̣ahāḏ, "fear," "terror," "dread" (Gen 41 42 55; Dt 11 25; 1 S 11 7 AV; Job 4 14; Isa 2 10 AV, etc).

"Fears" (timid) is the tr of yārē (Dt 20 17; Job 7 6; Ps 40 6; Ex 15 8; Ps 138 7, RV "dread"); Ps 130 4); in Is 33 4, it is the tr of ἀκραίαν, "hasty;" "terrible;" "lurid;" or unto a fearful heart, in "Heh; hasty;" perhaps, ready to flee (for fear).

"Fearfully" (Ps 139 14; yārē, I am fearfully [and wonderfully] made; so RV; and "is not in the text, so that 'fearfully' may be equivalent to 'extremely.'" as an awesome degree; of Ps 66 5, "by terrible things in righteousness": 66 3, "How terrible are thy works (yārē "fearful"); the LXX. Pesh. Vulg have "thou art fearfully wonderful.

"Fearfulness" occurs in Ps 55 5 (yir'āh; Isa 21 4 (paradait, "frightening, trembling blinging"). Fearfulness has surprised the hypocrites, the RV "trembling hath seized the godless ones.

In the NT the chief words are phobōs, "fear," "terror," "affright" (Mt 14 26; 38 4 8; Lk 21 26; 1 Jn 4 18, etc); and phobó, "fear" (both used of ordinary fear) (Mt 1 20; 10 26; 28 5; 2 Cor 12 20, etc); of the fear of God, the noun (Rom 3 18; 2 Cor 7 1), the vb. (Lk 18 4; 23 40, etc); deisid, "timidity, "fear," occurs in 2 Tim 1 7, it is "timidity"; or unfettled (Mt 8 26, 38; 9 26); is a spirit of fearfulness; ἐκπομπή, "frightened out of one's senses"; greatly terrified (He 12 21; of Dt 9 19; Wisd 17 9 AV); ὑπὸ τὴν εὐαλοντά ἡ τρεῖ (He 5 7) (of Christ) who was heard in that he feared, he was "frightened out of all other fears"; and ὑπὸ τῇ ὑπὲρ, the earlier stages so all the Gr commentators; eulalētēs, properly, "caution," "circumcision," is used in the NT for godly fear (He 12 28, RV "reverence and awe," m as AV); of eulalētēs (Lk 2 25; Acts 2 5; 8 2); eulalētēmis, "to act with caution" (Acts 23 10). Deiōs, "fearful," "timid," occurs in Mt 8 28; Mk 1 30; 6 7; 10 31; 13 31; 14 28; 26 28, 31; Lk 12 32); in Mt 20 28; Lk 12 5, "fear" is used in the sense of "stand in awe of," so perhaps Lk 23:40; to “fear God” is sometimes used in the NT as equivalent to religion (Lk 18:4; Acts 10:235; 13:16, 26, used of proselytes); in He 10:27, it is said that if Christ be wilfully rejected, nothing remains but “is fearful looking for [RV expectation]’of judgment,’ and ver 31. ‘It is a fearful thing when he stumbleth of living God,’ in which places ‘fearful’ means ‘terrible,’ something well to be feared. RV gives frequently a more literal rendering of the words tr’d ‘fear.’

The Hebrews had an abundance of holidays, some based, according to their tradition, on agriculture and the natural changes of times and the seasons, some on historical events connected with the national or religious life of Israel, and still others simply national, annual, or religious phase will vary with different writers, different context, or different times. Any classification of these feasts and fasts on the basis of original significance must therefore be imperfect.

We should rather classify them as preexilic and post-exilic, because the period of the Bab captivity marks a complete change, not only in the kinds of festivals instituted from time to time, but also in the manner of celebrating the old.

I. Preexilic List.

The preexilic list includes the three pilgrimage festivals, the Passover week, Pentecost, and the Feast of Tabernacles, together with the Eighth Day of Assembly at the conclusion of the last of these feasts, and New Year and Atonement Days, the weekly Sabbath and the New Moon.

The preexilic festivals were “holy convocations” (Lev 23; Nu 28). Special sacrifices were offered on them in addition to the daily offerings.

1. Observances.

These sacrifices, however, varied according to the character of the man to all classes.

On Nu 28. 28. On all of them trumpets (hagghah) were blown while the burnt offerings and the peace-offerings were being sacrificed (Nu 10:10). They were all likened to the weekly Sabbath as days of rest, on which there must be complete suspension of all ordinary work (Lev 16:20; 23:7.8.21.24.25.28.35.36).

The three pilgrimage festivals were known by that name because on them the Israelites gathered at Jerusalem to give thanks for their doubly joyful character. They were of agricultural significance as well as military and the Festivals memorial of national events. Thus the Passover is connected with the barley harvest; at the same time it is the ’man hârûth, recalling the Exodus from Egypt (Ex 13:6; Lev 23:5-8; Nu 28:18-25).

Pentecost was an agricultural phase as hag ha-bikkârîm, the celebration of the wheat harvest; it has a religious phase as ’man makan Thôrahâh in the Jewish liturgy, based on the rabbinical calculation which makes it the day of the giving of the Law, and this religious side has so completely overshadowed the agricultural that among modern Jews the Pentecost has become “confirmation day” (Ex 34:26; Lev 23:10-14; Nu 28:26-31).

The Feast of Tabernacles is at once the harvest festival, hag ha-atzîm, and the anniversary of the beginning of the wanderings in the wilderness (Ex 23:16; Lev 23:33 ff; Dt 16:13-15). The Eighth Day of Assembly immediately following the last day of Tabernacles (Lev 23:36; Nu 29:35 ff; Jn 7:34) and closing the long cycle of Tishri festivals seems to have been merely a final day of rejoicing before the pilgrims returned to their homes.

New Year (Lev 23:23-25; Nu 29:1-6) and the Day of Atonement (Lev 16:1 f; 23:26-32; Nu 29:7-10) marked the turning of the year; primarily, perhaps, in the natural phenomena of the New Year, but also in the inner life of the nation and the individual. Hence the religious significance of these days as days of judgment, penitence and forgiveness soon overshadowed any other significance they may have had. The temple ritual for these days, which is minutely described in the OT and in the Talmud, was the most elaborate and impressive of the year. At the same time Atonement Day was socially an important day of rejoicing.

In addition to these annual festivals the preexilic Hebrews celebrated the Sabbath (Nu 28:9-10; Lev 23:1-3) and the New Moon (Nu 10:10; 28:11-15). By analogy to the weekly Sabbath, every seventh year was a Sabbath Year (Ex 23:11; Lev 25:1-7; Dt 15:1). In every cycle of seven years a Day of Atonement was closed with a Jubilee Year (Lev 25:8-18) somewhat after the analogy of the seven weeks counted before Pentecost.

For further details of all of these preexilic festivals see the separate articles.

II. The Post-exilic List.

In post-exilic times important historical events were made the basis for the institution of new fasts and feasts. When the first temple was destroyed and the people were carried into captivity, “the sacrifice of the body and one’s own fat and blood” were substituted for that of animals (see Talm, Brâdhôth 17a). With such a view of their importance, fasts of all sorts were as a matter of course rapidly multiplied. (Note that the Day of Atonement was the only preexilic fast.)

Of these post-exilic fasts and feasts, the Feast of Dedication (1 Macc 4:52-59; Jn 10:22; Mish, Ta’anith 2:10; Mô’deth Kânîm 3:9; Jos, Ant. XII, vii; Cap, II, xxxix) and the Feast of Purim (Est 3:7; 9:24 ff; 2 Macc 15:36); and the fasts of the seventh (Zec 7:5; 8:19; Jer 41:1 ff; 2 K 25:26; Stâther ’Olam Rabbî 26; Mô’dithâh Ta’anith c. 12), the tenth months (Zech 8:19; 2 K 26), and the Fast of Esther (Est 4:16 f; 9:31) have been preserved by Jewish tradition to this day. (The Feast of Dedication, the Feast of Purim and the Feast of Esther are described in separate articles.

The feasts of the fourth, fifth, seventh and tenth months are based on historical incidents connected with one or more national calamities.

Significance: In post-Biblical times, rabbis have by close figuring been able to connect the dates of the feasts as well as the feasts other important national events than those for which the days were primarily instituted. Not less than four incidents are connected with the fasts of the fourth month (17th of Tammuz): (a) on this day the Israelites made the golden calf; (b) Moses broke the tables of law; (c) the daily sacrifices ceased for want of cattle when the city was closely besieged prior to the destruction of Jerusalem; and (d) on this day Jesus was stoned by Nebuchadnezzar. The fast of the fifth month (9th day of 'Aḥb) receives its significance from the fact that the First Temple was destroyed upon this day by Nebuchadnezzar, and the Second Temple on the same day of the year by Titus. In addition it is said that on this day Jeho deposed those that left Egypt should not enter the land of promise; the day is also the anniversary of the capture of the city of Beter by the Emperor Hadrian. The fast of the seventh month (the 9th day of Tishri is commemorated the miracle of Gedel hah at Miṣpah. That of the tenth month (10th day of Tebethh) commemorates the beginning of the siege of Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar.

Other feasts and feasts no doubt were instituted on similar occasions and received a local or temporary observance, for example, the Feast of Acras (1 Mac 13.50–52; cf 1.33), to celebrate the recapture of Acras ("the citadel") on the 23rd of 'Yār 141 BC, and the Feast of Nicoros, in celebration of the victory over Nicoros on the 13th day of 'Adhār 100 BC (1 Mac 7.40). Several other festivals are mentioned in the Talm and other post-Biblical writings which may have been of even greater antiquity. The Feast of Woodcarring (Midsummer Day: Neh 10.34; Jos. BJ, II, vii.6; M’gulah Tā’antik e.v., p.32; Mith. Tā’antik 45a), for example, is referred to as the greatest day of rejoicing of the Hebrews, ranking with Atonement Day. It was a picnic day to which a religious touch was given by making it the woodgathers' festival for the Temple. It was also mentioned in the Talm (2 Ma 39 ha-Shanah 11). The pious, according both to the Jewish tradition and the NT, observed many private or semi-public fasts, such as the Mondays, Thursdays and following Monday after Nisàn and Tishri (the festival months: Lk 18.12; Mt 9.14; 6.16; Mk 2.18; Lk 5.33; Acts 10.30; M’gulah 31a; Tā’antik 12a; Babba Kama 8.2). The day before Passover was a fast day for the firstborn (Sēphrim 21.3).

In post-Biblical times the Jews outside of Pal doubled each of the following days: the opening and closing day of Passover and Tabernacles and Pentecost, because of the gāphēk, or doubt as to the proper day to be observed, growing out of the delays in the transmission of the official decree of the gān-hēbrān in each season. Differences in hours of sunset and sunrise between Pal and other countries may have had something to do at least with the perpetuation of the custom. New Year's Day seems to have been doubled from time immemorial, as indicated by the contemptuous expression "lousy, lamenish." Many new modes of observance appear in post-exilic times in connection with the old established festivals, esp. in the high festival season of Tishri. Thus the Šĕmhāṁ beth ha-ahō-ehōh, "water drawing festival," was celebrated during the week of Tabernacles with popular games and dances in which even the elders took part, and the streets were so brilliantly illuminated with torches that scarcely an eye was closed in Jerus during that week (Talm, Ḥullin).

The last day of Tabernacles was known in Talmudic times as yôm kibbut tā’arḥoḥāh, from the custom of beating willow branches, a custom clearly antedating the various symbolic explanations offered for it. Its festivities were connected with the dismantling of the booth. In later times the day was known as hāshāv ’rabbāḥ, from the liturgical passages beginning with the word hāshāvā, recited throughout the feast and "gathered" on that day. The day after Tabernacles has been made Šimm antim Torah, the Feast of the Law, from the custom of reading the fifty-two weekly portions read in the synagogues.

In general it may be said that although the actual observance has changed from time to time to meet new conditions, the synagogal calendar of today is based on the same festival and observance in NT times.

FEASTS, SEASONS FOR, regulated by the sun and moon. See Astronom, 1, 5.

FEATHERS, feh’érz (Pez, nögdah; Lat. pennea): "Gavest thou the goodly wings unto the peacocks? or wings [RV 'pinions'] and feathers [AV 'plume'] unto the ostrich?" (Job 39.13 AV). The ostrich shall fly; she shall not be thrown with his feathers, and under his wings shall thou trust; his truth shall be thy shield and buckler" (Ps 91.4 AV). In RV this is again changed to pinions. In Dan 4.33 the word 'feathers' is left. The wonderful plumage of birds was noted and prized in those days, just as now. Old ostriches were too thick and rank of flesh for food. They were pursued for their feathers, which were used for the head dressing and shield ornaments of desert princes. No one doubts that the ships of Solomon introduced peacocks because of their wonderful feathers. Those of the eagle were held in superstitious reverence as late as the days of Pliny, who was ten years old at the time of the crucifixion of Christ. Pliny wrote that the eagle was so powerful that if its feathers be laid in a box with those of other birds, the eagle feathers would "devoir and consume all the rest."

FEEBLE KNEES, feb’l, Greek, kak'kos. The expression is found in three places (one being a free quotation of another): Job 4.4, "Thou hast made firm the feeble (Pez, kārō, 'bending,"'bowing') knees," and He 12.12, "Wherefore let us put off the hands that hang down, and the knees (AV 'feeble') knees." The Gr word used here (παταλωβα, parale-luméno, "paralyzed," "motionless") implies the loss of function, interrupted articulation, the cutting off of vital strength; e.g Gr xallos, elatos, "lame," and see Delitzsch in his Comm. on He, loc. cit.

Such an affection of the knees may be due to different causes. It is, e.g., a very frequent symptom of the disease known in the Orient as beriberi, when the muscles of the lower leg shrink to such a degree as to render voluntary locomotion impossible. It always disables its victim, and is therefore often expressive of general debility, e.g. in Ps 109.24, where such weakness is described as the outcome of protracted fasting. In Ezk 7.17 and 21.7, "All knees shall be weak as water," the expression indicates a forty-fourth refection of the muscles. Psa effect ed the same condition in Belshazzar's case, when he saw the writing on the wall (Dan 5 6), "The joints of his loins were loosed, and his knees smote one against another" (cf Nah 2 10).

FEELING, feeling: The following varieties of meaning are to be noted: (1) "To handle," "grope after" (παθανεῖν, μάθασιν (Gen 27 12; Ex 10 21; 7:2, μήσθαι, Gen 27 21; Jgs 16 26; γινόμαι, διαλείπειν, Acts 17 27). (2) "To know," "understand," "experience" (γινώσκω, βιώσαι, Prov 23 35; γίνομαι, διαλείπειν, Acts 17 27). (3) "To have a fellow feeling," "to place one's self into the position of another," esp. while suffering, "to have compassion" (συμπαθεῖν, συμφατίζον, He 4 15; of 10 34; which is to be carefully distinguished from the similar vb. συμπαθέω, συμφατίζω, which means "to share in the same suffering with another," Rom 8 17; 1 Cor 12 26). See Delitzsch, Comm. on He 4 15. (4) "To feel harm," "pain," "grief," "to be sensitive" (σαρκαίω, παιδαίζω, with the roots path- and pen-, Acts 26 5; or with the negation: "to have ceased to feel," "to be apathetic," "past feeling," "callous," "σαρκαίωσαι, ἀπαθοῖσθαι, perf. part. of ἀφαίρω, ἀπαθοῦν (Eph 4 19) which describes the condition of the sinner, who by hardening his heart against moral influence, has left without a chance of his high vocation, without an idea of the awfulness of sin, without reverence to God, without an appreciation of the salvation offered by Him, and without fear of His judgment. (5) FLEET, WASHING OF. See Foot; Washing of Feet.

FEIGN, fain (Νόμιζέω, μαθάται, μάθαται, μαθάται, λαμάτος, λαματον, occurs (1) in the sense of "to devise," "invent" as the tr of μαθάται, "to form," "to fashion" (Neh 6 8, "Thou feignest them out of thine own heart," of 1 K 13 33, EV "devised of his own heart"); of πλάστος (Acts 28 13, "with feigned words make merchandise of you"); (2) in the sense of "pretense," μαθάται, "to be foreign," "strange" (1 K 14 5, "Feign herself to be another woman," ver 6; of Gen 42 7; Prov 28 24; "to feign madness" (2 Pt 2 3, "with feigned words make merchandise of you"); (3) in the sense of "to feign madness" (David, 1 S 21 13; of Jer 25 16; 50 38); "hypokrismos, to give judgment, or act, under a mask" (Lk 29 38, "who feigned themselves to be righteous"); (4) in the sense of "fraud," "artifice," "deceit," "traitor" (ὁ μάθαται, τριστίρας, "prayer, that goeth not out of feigned lips" (Ps 17 11, sheker, falseness," "a lie," "Judah hath not returned unto me with her whole heart, but feignedly" (Jer 3 10; of 2 Esd 8 29); kăkăsi, "to lie," "to feign, or flatter" (2 S 22 45; Ps 18 44; 66 3; 81 15), where the text of AV and RV, "shall submit themselves," is rendered m, AV and RV, "yield feigned obedience, Heb lie." RV has "feigned" for "mako" (2 S 13 5), and "feigned" for "made" (ver 6). W. L. Walker.

FELIX, Felix, ANTONIUS, an-toh-ni-uss (Phi-lēx, Phelix, from Lat felix, "happy"): A Roman procurator of Judea, appointed in succession to Cumanus by the emperor Claudius, his first which led to the introduction of Felix into the narrative of Acts was the riot at Jerusalem (Acts 21 27). There Paul, being attacked at the instigation of the Asiatic Jews for alleged false teaching and profanation of the temple, was rescued with difficulty by Lysias the chief captain. But Lysias, finding that Paul was a Roman citizen, and that therefore the secret plots against the life of his captive might entail serious consequences upon himself, and finding also that Paul was charged on religious rather than political grounds, sent him to Felix at Caesarea for trial (Acts 21 31—23 34). On his arrival, Paul was presented to Felix and was then detained for five days in the judgment hall of Herod, till his accusers should also reach Caesarea (Acts 23 35). The trial was held before hearing the evidence of Tertullus (see TERTULLUS) and the speech of Paul in his own defence, Felix deferred judgment (Acts 24 1—22). The excuse he gave for delay was the non-appearance of Lyais, but his real reason was in order to oblige the people for the release of Paul. He therefore treated his prisoner at first with leniency, and pretended along with Drusilla to take interest in his teaching. But these attempts to induce Paul to act from failed, and Paul sought favor of neither Felix nor Drusilla, and made the frequent interviews which he had with them an opportunity for preaching to them concerning righteousness and and the final judgment. The case dragged on for two years till Felix, upon his retirement, "desiring to gain favor with the Jews . . . left Paul in bonds" (Acts 24 27). According to the Bezan text, the continued imprisonment of was due to the desire of Felix to purchase his favor; Paul, who was the infamous favorite of Claudius, and who, according to Tacitus (Annals xii.14), fell into disgrace in 55 AD. Tacitus implies that Felix was joint procurator of Judea, along with Cumanus, before being appointed to the sole command, but Josephus is silent as to this. Both Tacitus and refer to his succeeding Cumanus, Jos stating that it was at the instigation of Jonathan the high priest. There is some doubt about the chronology of Felix's tenure of office. Harnack and Blass, following Eusebius and Jerome, place his accession in 51 AD, and the imprisonment of Paul in 54—56 AD; but most modern commentators indicate to the dates 52 AD and 56—58 AD. These latter interpret the last phrase of as "Felix had caused no ordinary a judge unto this nation" (Acts 24 10), as referring to some judicial office, not necessarily that of procurator (see Tacit.), previously held by Felix in the time of Cumanus, in which he so staunchly opposed the persecution of Felix with Judea supplied a reason for the advocacy by Jonathan of Felix's claims to the procuratorship on the deposition of Cumanus. The testimony of Paul to as to the evil character of Felix is fully corroborated by the writings of Jos (Ant. II, xiii). Although he suppressed the robbers and murderers who infested Judaea, and among them the "Egyptian" to whom Lysias refers (Acts 21 88), yet "he himself was more hurtful than them all." When occasion offered, he did not hesitate to employ the sicarii (see ASSASSINS) for his own ends. Trai-
FELLOWS, fel'öz (1 K 7:33). See Wheel.

FELLOW, fel'ō (חָבֵ֣ר, hāḇēr; φίλος, φίλος; ἀδελφός, ἀδελφός): Meant originally a "partner," from fr., "property," and λόγος, "to lay," then "a companion," "an equal," "a person or individual," "a worthless person.

(1) As "companion" it is the tr. of חָבֵר, "associate," "companion," "friend," also hāḇēr, Job 41:6 (Heb 40:30), where we have the original sense of partnership, tr="hands" RV, AV companions"; Ps 45:7, "God hath anointed thee . . . above thy fellows"; of הָבֹּרה (Ecc 4:10; Dn 7:20); of φίλος, "friend," "brother" (Ecc 2:15; Jgs 7:13:14:22); ἀδελφός (or ἀδελφά), "a female friend" (Jgs 11:37; "I and my fellows," RV companions); here AV applies "fellow to a female"; of Bar 6:43, "She reproacheth her fellow, hāḇēr ha-ḥămōn") in Jgs 11:29; "companion of the tr. of "δίσθαν", "fellowship," "μαθητής" Zeo 13:7, "the man that is my fellow," lit. "the man of my fellowship"; hetaires, "companion" (Mt 11:16); μέτοχος, "partner," (cf Lk 5:1; He 1:9, quoted from Ps 45:7; 70:6); (2) As an individual or person "fellow" is the tr. of φίλος, "a man," "an individual:" "make this fellow return" (1 S 29:4 AV, RV "the man"); in the same ver "fellow" is supplied instead of "he." "Fellow" in 1611 meant simply "a man," and it is difficult to say in what passages the ideas of "worthless," etc., are meant to be implied; probably, however, in Jgs 18:25, where the Heb is simply "אנה," "man," and the text is almost the only deviation from the rendering "man," "men," "fast angry, m. RV "bitter of soul" fellows fall upon you;" also Acts 17:5, ἀδελφός, "a man," "certain kind fellows of the baser sort," RV "vile fellows;" cf 2 S 6:20, "vain [φίλος] fellows (supplied); 1 Mac 10:61, "consider fellows" (fellow); Ecclus 8:15, "a bold fellow" (ταλαμάρας), RV "a rash man;" in several places of the OT "fellow" represents zeb, "this," and in these instances there seems to be something of worthless or contempt implied (1 S 31:15 25; 21:1 K 22 27; 2 K 9 11, and, as before, 1 S 29:4 RV); in the NT also "fellow" often represents hētapos, "this," and in most of these cases AV seems to intend something depreciatory to be understood; RV gives simply "man" (Mt 23:26 18:29; 23:29; Acts 13:13); so Ecclus 13:23, "If the poor man speaks, they say, What fellow is this?" RV "who is this?" 1 Mac 4:5, "These fellows flee from us," RV "these men." RV has "fellows" for "persons" (Jgs 9:4), for "men" (11:2); "base fellows" for "men the children of Belial" (Dt 13:13), m., "sons of worthlessness;" ARV "worthless fellow" for "son of Belial" (1 S 25:17:25), "base fellows" for "sons of Belial" (Jgs 19:25; 20:13, etc; RV has also "companion" for "fellow") (Jgs 11:37, as above; Eze 17:19; Dn 2:13), "each man his fellow for another" (2 K 3:23); "fellow by" for "neighbor in" (1 K 20:35).

Fellow-citizen, Fellow-disciple, Fellow-heirs, Yokefellow, etc. In composition, "fellow" always means partner or companion. W. L. Walker FELLOWSHIP, fel'ō-ship. See Communion.

FEMALE, fe'mal: Two Hebrew words are thus tr:

(1) פָּרָה, nēḇērāh, which is merely a physiological description of the sexual characterio (from פָּרָה, nēḇērāh, "perforate") and which corresponds to עַרְבָּה, "males" (see s.v.).

(2) פָּרָה, nēḇērāh, with the irregular pl. פָּרֵאשׁ, nēḇērāšš (only Gen 7:2, in all other places "wife," "woman"), the fem. form of פָּרָה, "she," "man."

The Gr word is ἰδώσ, ἰθήσ, lit., the "nursing one," "the one giving suck" (from ἰδώσ, ἱθάσ, "to suckle)."

Israelite law seems frequently guilty of unjust partiality in favor of the male sex, but we have to consider that most of these legal and religious disabilities of women can be explained from the social conditions prevailing at the time of legislation. They are therefore found also in contemporaneous gentile religions. Though traces of this prejudice against the weaker sex are found in the NT, the religious discrimination between the sexes has practically ceased, as is evident from Gal 3:28: "There can be no male and female; for ye all are one man in Christ Jesus"; cf also 1 Pet 3:7.

FENCE, fēn's, (צַבָּא, 'āḇār, צַבָּא, mēḇābār): Commonly used in AV in the description of fortified places, as "the walls of," etc.; the tr. "to fortify" (as forms) (Dt 3:5; 9:1, 28, etc): mēḇābār, "fenced city," is a fortified place (Nu 33:17:36; Josh 10:20; 19:35, etc; māḏōr, "fenced cities," means "bulwark," "citadel," (2 Ch 8:5); sēdāh, "fortification," (2 Ch 15:23; 14:2, 14:6; 21:3); for "fenced" ARV substitutes "fortified" in all these instances; in Dn 11:15, mēḇābār is a "well-fortified city," in "the fortified cities," ERV "well-fenced," "fence" is also the tr. of ḡāḏēr, "a wall," or "fence" (Job 19:8 ARV, "walled up" [gāḏār]; Ps 62:3); "צָבָא, to loosen" (the ground) as with a mattock (Isa 5:2, where AV has "fenced" it [the vineyard], ARV "digged it," ERV "made a trench about it," in "dug it"); συκῆ, "to interweave" or "interlace" (Job 10:11, RV "clothed"); "māḏōr, to become full" (2 S 23:7, RV "armed," m. Heb filled)."

ERV has "fence" for "wall" (Nu 22:24; Isa 5:5; Hos 2:26; ERV "voting" wall, "for," hedge (Ecc 10:9; Ezk 13:2; 2 K 15:20; Lk 10:39); "fenced," RV "well-fenced," for "citadel" (Nu 13:28; Dt 1:28; ARV "fortified"); cf for "forest" (Job 24:31); Neh 9:25, 19:20, the "city of Mībzar-zor, that is, the fortress of Tyre," ERV "fenced," for "hedge" (Lam 3:7; ARV "walled") for "incidence of," for "incidence of," for ARV "fortified" (Isa 36:1; 37:26, etc); "fences" for "hedges" (Ps 80:12; Ps 80:12, "wall"); in Jer 49:3, ERV and ARV have "fences." See also HEDGER.

FENCED CITIES. See FORTIFICATION.

FERRET, fer'et (כַּפָּד, 'āḏākāh, RV GECKO): Occurs only in Lev 11:30 AV, in the list of animals which are unclean "among the creeping things that creep upon the earth." RV has "gecko" with the marginal note, "Words of uncertain meaning, but probably denoting four kinds of lizards." The list of animals in Lev 11:29-30 includes (1) הֶקֶט, RV "weasel," (2) "skhkbār, RV "mouse," (3) "cābb, RV "toastoe," RV "great lizard," (4) "āḏākāh, RV "ferret," RV "gecko," (5) קִנְיַת, RV "chameleon," RV "land crocodile" (6) "rāḇmā, RV "lizard," (7) "hōmed, AV "snail," RV "sand lizard," (8) "żāḇōm, RV "mole," RV "chameleon." It will be noted that while RV makes the first two mammals and the remaining six reptiles, AV makes not only (1) and (2) but also (4) and (5) (6) and (7) a malark. So far as this general classification is concerned AV follows the LXX, except in the case of it must be borne in mind that all these words except (2) occur only in this passage, while (2) and (8) occur each in only a few passages where the context throws but uncertain light upon the meaning. Under these circumstances we ought to be content with the rendering of the LXX, unless from philology or tradition we can show good reason for differing. For ἐνδυναμός, LXX has ἀνυμελός, μυκέτις, which occurs in Herodotus and Aristotle and may be a shrew mouse or a field mouse. Just as the next word, κοῤῥός, is found in other passages (see CHAMELEON) with the meaning of "strength," so ἐνδυναμός occurs in several places (of "securing" or "signing" (Ps 12 5; 79 11; 102 20; Mal 2 13). It seems to be from the root, ἀνακρ., "to choke," "to be in anguish" (of ἀνάκρ., "a collar"; θανακ(.kρ., "to choke"; Arab. ἁνγκ, "neck"; Arab. ἄνακρ, "to strange;" Gr ἁνκρ. Lat angustus; Ger. enge, Nacker; Eng. "anxious," "neck"). Some creature seems to be meant which utters a low cry or squeak, and neither "ferret" (AV) nor "gecko" (RV) seems to have a better claim than the older LXX rendering of ἀνυμελός—"shrew mouse" or "field mouse."

FERVENT, für'vent (πυγα, δαλός; κτινρητιν, translated, Θεον, δοξον. §6) "Fervent" (from Lat. fervère, "to boil") does not occur in AV of the OT, but RV gives it as the tr. of δαλός, "to burn" (Prov 26 25), instead of "heating, fervency"; it is used of the heart in the NT (Rom 12 11, "in fervent spirit, Acts 18 25, "soul fervent" (2 Cor 7 7, RV "seal"), in Jas 5 16 AV has: "The effectual fervent prayer of a righteous man availeth much," where the Gr. is: πρός συναγείται δίδασκαλον ενεργομένος, which RV renders, "The supplication of a righteous man availeth much in its working."

"Fervently" is the tr. of ἐνεργομένης, "to strive or struggle." (agonise), Col 4 12 AV, RV "Ephaphras...striving for you in your prayers;" of ἐνεργομένης, lit. in the NT, as in, for example, 1 Pet 2 26, RV "Love one another from the heart fervently;" of 1 Pet 4 8, "fervent in your love among yourselves;" of Christian love also of ἀγαπάω, "to love," this being the same word in the Gr. but Jesus Christ's love was "stretched out" to the uttermost.

RV has "fervently" for "earnestly" (Jas 5 17, with prayer). W. L. WALKER

FESTIVAL, fe's-ti-val. See FASTS AND FESTS.

FESTUS, fes' tus, Porcius, por'shi-us (Πορκίος Φύλας, Porcius Phatus): The Roman governor or procurator who succeeded Felix in the province of Judea (Acts 24 27), and was thus brought into prominence in the dispute between Paul and the Sanhedrin which continued after the retirement of Felix (chs 25, 26). Upon the arrival of Festus in Jerusalem, the official capital of his province, the Jews besought him to send Paul from Caesarea to Jerusalem to appear before them, intending to kill him on the way in order to escape by bribing him (25 3). Festus at first refused their request, and upon his return to Caesarea proceeded himself to examine Paul (ver 6). But on finding that the evidence was conflicting, and reflecting that, as the accused was apparently charged on religious rather than political grounds, and because the Sanhedrin was a more suitable court for his case than a Roman tribunal, he asked Paul if he were agreeable to make the journey to Jerusalem (vs 7–9). But Paul, who knew well the nefarious use that the Jews would make of every discreditable accusation which was cast upon him, was willing to grant them, made his appeal unto Caesar (vs 10–11). To this request of a Roman citizen acceded on a capital charge (cf ver 16), Festus had perforce to give his consent (ver 12). But the manner of his consent would prevent him from exposing himself to the distrust shown by Paul. By the words "unto Caesar shalt thou go," Festus implied that the case must now be proceeded with to the end: otherwise, had it been left in his own hands, it might have been quashed at an earlier stage (cf also 26 22). Meantime King Agrippa and Bernice had arrived in Caesarea, and to these Festus gave a brief explanation of the circumstances (26 13–21). The previous inquiries of Festus with Paul and his accusers had "nothing but to concern me as to the exact nature of the charge. Paul was therefore summoned before the regal court, in order both that Agrippa might hear him, and that the governor might obtain more definite information for insertion in the report he was required to send along with the prisoner to Rome (vs 22–27). The audience which followed was brought to an abrupt conclusion by the interruption of Paul's speech (26 1–23) by Festus: "Paul, thou art mad; thy much learning is turning thee mad" (ver 24). Yet the meeting was sufficient to convince both Agrippa and Festus that "this man doth nothing worthy of death or of bonds" (ver 31). While Festus displayed a certain contempt for what he regarded as the empty emotions of a harangue which had been bestowed on Festus, in that he freed the country from many robbers (Socius: Jos, Ant, XX, vii–x; BJ, ii, xiv, 1), but his procuratorship was too short to undo the harm wrought by his predecessor. The exact date of his accession to the office is uncertain, and has been variously placed at 55–61 AD (cf Knowling in Ezpos Gr Test., ii, 488–59; see also FELIX). C. M. KERR FETCH, fech (πέρτα, δαλός): Has generally the meaning of "to bring;" it is commonly the tr. of Heb דָּלַּה, "to take" or "lay hold of," Heph. "to be brought, seized or snatched away" (Gen 18 4, etc; 27 9, etc; 42 16; 1 S 4 3; 1 K 17 10, etc); twice of νὰ ἄνευν, Christian love (Rom 5 7, RV "no hindrance"); of ἐκπεφυγα, "to come in" (2 Ch 1 17; Neh 8 15), of ἀλαν, "to cause to come up" (1 S 5 21; 7 1); of ἀνάδον, "to cause to come out" (Nu 20 10, ARV "bring forth"; Jer 25 28), and of a number of other words.

In the NT it is the tr. of εὐδοκῶ, "to lead out" (Acts 18 37, "Let them come themselves and fetch us out," RV "bring"); "to fetch a companion" is the tr. of βοηθάω (Nu 34 5; Jos 15 3, RV "turn," "turned about;" 2 S 5 23, RV "make a circuit"); of περιέρχομαι (aor. 2, περιέβαλλον), "to go about," "to wander up and down" (of a ship driven about; Acts 25 13, RV "made a circuit," m "some ancient authorities read cast loose"); of περιέρχομαι (aor. 2, περιέβαλλον), "to go about," "to wander up and down" (of a ship driven about; Acts 25 13, RV "made a circuit," m "some ancient authorities read cast loose").

RV has "fetch" for "bring" (1 K 3 24), for "call for" (Acts 10 5; 11 13); "fetched" for "called for" (Est 5 10), for "took out" (Jer 37 17); "fetched" for "took" (2 Ch 8 15).

FETTER, felt' er: Found only in the pl. in both OT and NT; fetters of iron (Ps 105 18; 149 8); so probably Mk 5 4; Lk 8 29) or brass (Jgs 16 21; 2 K 25 7) were frequently used for securing prisoners. See Chain.

Figurative: of trouble (Job 36 8).

FEVER, fē'ver (πυγα, καθαθαθ, πυγα, καθαθαθ, dalleketh; μυρηκός, pureōs, derived from a root signififlying "to burn"): A peri-teric term, applied to all diseases characterized by high temperature of body. Several forms of febrile disease are among the commonest of all maladies in Pal today, as they were also in the period covered by the Bible history. Of these the most prevalent is afebrile or intermittent malarial fever, which is common in all parts but esp. in low-lying districts or places where there are pools or marshes in which mosquitoes breed, these insects being the commonest carriers of the malaria bacillus. These fevers are generally more severe in late summer and autumn, when the mosquitoes are most numerous, and they then cause many deaths among the people owing to the sudden drop of temperature at sunset. During the day one uses as light clothing as possible, but immediately after sunset the air becomes chilly and damp, and the physiological resistance to the influence of the parasite is remarkably diminished. On this account travelers in Pal at this season should be particular to avoid exposure to these evening damps, and to use mosquito curtains invariably at night. In most tropical countries now houses are rendered incognito-proof by electric wire netting, and thereby the risk of infection is much diminished. In Pal the marshes of the shore about Banias and the Water of Merom, the Shephelah, and the Jordan valley are the most fever-stricken regions of the country. The name chillath is the burning age in Lev 26:16 AV (RV "fevers"), and is coupled with delileath, 4th inflammation in Dt 28:22. LXX renders the former word purëtos, and the latter rhigos in this passage, a coagulation which is interesting as being the same as Lk 8:40, where the fuller rhigopurëtos in his description of a fever identical with that common in Pal. In Lev the word in LXX is tkeros which lit. means jaundice, a disease otherwise not mentioned in the Bible. In Pal as in other malarious countries the conditions of jaundice or yellowing of the skin frequently accompanied repeated and protracted attacks of fever which cause organic disease of the liver. On this account Hippocrates describes all fevers as due to a perverted secretion of bile. These fevers begin with severe shivering fits, hence the name rhigos which is used by Hippocrates. This is followed by a period of burning dry heat, ending in a period of profuse perspiration. Such attacks may take place daily, forming as it were a regular cycle by separating the end of one fit from the onset of the next. The commonest type however is that called tertian, in which a whole day separates one fit from the next. In some of the severe fevers which are described in the Jordan valley the temperature never falls to the normal, and while there is a short remission between the attacks with a body heat a little above the normal, there is no intermission. Rarer febrile conditions which have been met with in Pal, such as the Malta fever, present the same characteristics and may continue for months. Cases also of genuine blackwater fever have been recorded by several authorities. It is probable that in former days these fevers were even worse than they are now, as ancient medicine knew of no certain remedy for them. At present they generally yield at once to treatment by quinine, and in my own experience I believe that the administration of this remedy in large and repeated doses is the most effectual treatment. Other febrile diseases are rife in certain districts in Pal, and probably existed in Bible times. Typhoid is common in some crowded towns and villages, and considering how little protected the wells are from contamination, the wonder is that it is not more prevalent. When there is a high temperature typhus then, as now, was present as an occasional epidemic in the more crowded cities, but even the physicians of Greece and Rome did not differentiate these diseases. All these fevers seem also to have existed in Egypt to much the same extent as in Pal. The Papyrus Ebers speaks of "a fever of the gods" (46) and another called "a burning of the heart" (102). Its causation is attributed to the influence of the "god of fever," and the evil sequels of the disease as it affects the heart, stomach, eyes and other organs are described in terms which remind us of the minute passages in Lev 26 and Dt 28. The conditions there mentioned, such as consuming the eyes and causing sorrow of heart or pining away of the soul, graphically describe the mortal frequent sequels of affecting those in the Shephelah villages who have suffered from frequent returns of fever, and who in consequence have developed serious local affectations of the liver, spleen and other organs. Before the introduction of quinine, cases of this kind must have been much more commonly met with than they are now. It is probable that this state is that called shabepheth, or consumption, in these passages. Another form of fever, korhur, the "extreme burning" of AV or "feyry heat" of RV, is coupled with the other forms of fever in Dt 28:22. This is called in LXX erethismos or irritation, and may have been a feverish condition with a reddened skin, possibly erysipelas or else one of the eruptive fevers. At one time breaks of scabies, measles, and erysipelas are of fairly frequent occurrence and are often very severe. In the NT fever is mentioned eight times. The disease which affected Simon's wife's mother is called a "great fever" (Lk 8:41), and that which nearly proved fatal to the nobleman's son in the same district was also a fever (Jn 4:52). Cases of the kind are common all round the Sea of Galilee at the present day. ALEX. MACALISTER

FIG, FIG-TREE, fig'tērē (Τῆτρις, τέναθ, pl. τῆτριστα, τέναστα, specially "figs"; דֶּתַר, pāggim, "green figs" only in Cant 2:13; στάρχ, 1, Fig-Trees (in figs) 2, Hur-fig or figs, σάκκος, τό 'fig': in the OT. The earliest OT reference to the fig is to the leaves, which Adam and Eve converted into aprons (Gen 3:7). The promised land was described (Dt 8:8) as "a land of wheat and barley, and vines and fig-trees and pomegranates," etc. The spies who visited it brought, besides the cluster of grapes, pomegranates and figs (Nu 13:23). The Israelites complained that the wilderness was "no place of seed, or of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates" (Nu 20:5). When Egypt was plagues, the fig-trees were smitten (Ps 105:33); a similar punishment was threatened to unfaithful Israel (Jer 5:17; Hos 2:12; Am 4:9). It is only necessary to ride a few miles among the mountain villages of Pal, with their extensive fig gardens, to realize what a long-lasting injury would be the destruction of these slow-growing trees. Years of patient labor—such as that briefly hinted at in Lk 13:7—must pass before a newly planted group of fig-trees can bear profitably. Plenty of fruitful vines and fig-trees, specially in the Jordanvalley, thus came to be emblematical of long-endurcd peace and prosperity. In the days of Solomon 'Judah and Israel dwell safely, every man under his vine and under his fig-tree.' (1 K 4:25). Cf also 2 K 18:31; Is 16:8; Mt 21:19; Mk 11:13; Lk 20:16; Zec 3:10; 1 Mac 14:12. Only a triumphal palm and a fig-tree could rejoice in Him "though the fig-tree shall not flourish" (Hab 3:17).
The Ficus carica, which produces the common fig, is a tree belonging to the N.O. Urticaceae, the nettle family, which includes also the banyan, the India rubber fig-tree, the sycamore fig and other useful plants. Fig-trees are cultivated all over the Holy Land, esp. in the mountain regions. Wild fig-trees—usually rather shrubs than trees—occur also everywhere; they are usually barren and are described by the felahin as "male" trees; it is generally supposed that their presence is beneficial to the cultivated variety. The immature fruits harbor small insects which convey pollen to the female flowers and by their irritating presence stimulate the growth of the fruit. Artificial fertilization has been understood since ancient times, and there may be a reference to it in Am 7 14.

Fig-trees are usually of medium height, 10 or 15 ft. for full-grown trees, yet individual specimens sometimes attain as much as 25 ft. The summer foliage is thick and surpasses other trees of its size in its cool and dense shade. In the summer owners of such trees may be seen everywhere sitting in their shadow (Jn 1 48). Such references as Mic 4 4; Zec 3 10, etc. probably are to this custom rather than to the not uncommon one of having a fig-tree overhanging a dwelling.

The fruit of the fig-tree is peculiar. The floral axis, instead of expanding outward, as with most flowers, closes, as the flower develops, upon the small internal flowers, leaving finally but a small opening at the apex; the axis itself becomes succulent and fruit-like. The male flowers lie around the opening, the female flowers deeper in; fertilization is brought about by the presence of small hymenopterous insects.

There are many varieties of figs in Pal differing in sweetness, in color and consistence; some are good and some are bad (cf. Jer 24 1 8; 29 17). In Pal and other warm climates the fig yields two crops annually—an earlier one, ripe about June, growing from the "old wood," i.e. from the midsummer sprouts of the previous year, and a second, more important one, ripe about August, which grows upon the "new wood," i.e. upon the spring shoots.

By December, fig-trees in the mountainous regions of Pal have shed all their leaves, and they remain bare until about the end of March, when they commence putting forth their tender leaf buds (Mt 24 32; Mk 13 28.32; Lk 21 29-33), and at the same time, in the leaf axils, appear the tiny figs. They belong to the early signs of spring:

"The voice of the turtle-dove is heard in our land; The fig-tree ripeneth her green figs" (pagan) 12 13.

These tiny figs develop along with the leaves up to a certain point—to about the size of a small cherry—and then the great majority of them fall to the ground, carried down with every gust of wind. These are the ripe figs" (el'asher), they are more appropriately in AV, as "untimely figs"—of Rev 6 13. Cf also Isa 34 4 AV—in RV "leaf" has been supplied instead of "fig." These immature figs are known to the felahin as taksh, by whom they are eaten as they fall; they may even sometimes be seen exposed, but in the case of many trees the whole of this first crop may thus abort, so that by May no figs at all are to be found on the tree, but with the best varieties of fig-trees a certain proportion of the early crop of figs remains on the tree, and this fruit reaches ripeness about June. Such fruit is known in Arab. as dafar, or "early figs," and in Heb as bikkurith, "the first-ripe" (Isa 28 4; Jer 24 2; Hos 10 9). These are now, as of old, esteemed for their delicate flavor (Mic 7 1, etc.).

The miracle of Our Lord (Mt 21 18-20; Mk 11 12-13.20.21) which occurred in the Passover season, about April, will be understood (as far as the natural phenomena are concerned) by the account given above of the fruition of the fig-tree, as repeatedly observed by the present writer in the neighborhood of Jerus. When the young leaves are newly appearing, in April, every fig-tree which is going to bear fruit at all will have some taksh ("immature figs") upon it, even though "the time of figs" (Mk 11 13 AV), i.e. of ordinary edible figs—either early or late crop—"was not yet." This taksh is not only eaten bare, but it is sure evidence, even when it falls, that the tree bearing it is not barren. This acted parable must be compared with Lk 13 6.9; now the time of judgment was surely coming, the fate of the fruitless Jewish nation was forcibly foretold.

While fresh figs have always been an important article of diet in their season (Neh 13 15), the dried form is even more used. They are today dried in the sun and threaded on strings (like long necklaces) for convenience of carriage. A "cake of figs" (tbb'elalh, lit. "pressed together") is mentioned (1 S 30 12); Abigail gave 200 such cakes of figs to David (2 S 18); the people of N. Isracl sent, with other things, "cakes of figs" as a present to the newly crowned David (1 Ch 12 40). Such masses of figs are much used today—they can be cut into slices with a knife like cheese. Such a mass was used externally for Hiceziah's "boil" (Isa 38 21; 2 K 20 7); it was a remedy familiar to early medical writers.

FIGURE, fig'or, fig'yur (.']op. ^trap, gemel, g'mel; t'ros, t'poos); The tr. of gemel or g'mel, "a likeness or image": perhaps a transposition of cedem, the usual word for likeness; it is elsewhere trd "idol" and "image" (D't 4 16, "the similitude of any figure," i.e. "in the form of any figure"); of tabbnith, "form or likeness" (Isa 44 13, "shapeth it [the idol] . . . after the figure of a man"); of Dt 4 16; of mitka'ath, "carving," "carved work" (1 K 6 29): "And he carved all the walls of the house round about with carved figures of cherubim and palm-trees and open flowers, within and without, only here and in ver 32, 7 31 where the word is trd “carving” and “graving”; in the NT “figure” is the tr of tupos, primarily “a mark,” “mark,” “print,” “impressed figure,” “impression made by blows,” “hence, “image,” “statue,” tropically “form,” “manner”; a person bearing the form or figure of another, having a certain resemblance, preceding another to come, model, exemplar (Acts 7 49), “the figures [images] which ye have made to worship them”; Rom 5 14, “who is the figure [RV “a figure”] of him that was to come,” that is, the first Adam was a type of the second Adam, Christ; of antitupon, which that corresponds to a type or model (He 9 24 AV, “Christ is not first entered into the holy places made with hands, which are the figures of the true; but into heaven itself”), the meaning is simply the correspondence, or likeness (of the tabernacle to heaven), therefore RV renders “like in pattern to the true” (1 Pet 3 21, “the like figure whereunto [even] baptism doth also now save us,” i.e. baptism is the type of the ark “wherein . . . eight souls were saved [or brought safely] through water,” RV “which also after a true likeness [in “the type!”] doth bear man’s blood, ready [the life of] the Person,” being alongside, “a comparison,” “similitude,” hence, image, figure, type (He 9 9, which was a figure for the time then present), ARV “which is a figure for the time present,” BVR “parable and [now] present,” NIV “parable and present”), In the high priest into the Holy of Holies was a type of Christ’s entrance into heaven; 11 19, “from whence [from the dead] also he received him in a figure,” i.e. Abraham received Isaac back from the dead as it were, in the likeness of a resurrection, he not being actually dead, ARV “from whence he did also in a figure receive him back,” BVR “in a parable,” metaeschemato, “to change the form or appearance, “to transfer figuratively” (1 Cor 4 6, “these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and Apollos;” the Geneva version reads “I have figuratively described in my own person”). Paul is “substituting himself and Apollos for the teachers most in repute at Corinth that he might thus avoid personal criticism.”

FILTH, filth, FILTHINESS, fil-thi-ness, FII-ThY, fil-thi (pôsh, gôsh, pôsh; šôm, šôm; ḫuūdî, ḫuūpîš): The word once tr “filth” in the OT is gôsh “excrement” or “dung,” elsewhere tr “dung” (Isa 4 4, used figuratively of evil doings, sin, “the filth of the daughters of Zion”; of Prov 30 12); in the NT we have perkótharmin, “cleansings,” “weepings,” “offscourings” (1 Cor 4 13, “We are made as the filth of the world,” RV “or refuse”); ḫuūpîš, “filth,” “dirt,” LXX for gôsh in Isa 4 4 (1 Pet 3 21, “the filth of the flesh”)

“Filthiness” is the tr of šôm, “uncleanness” (viral, Lev 5 3; Hab 2 12, 13), used figuratively of moral impurity, tr “filthiness” (Ezer 6 21; Lam 1 9; Ezek 22 15; 24 11.13 bis; 36 25; rôdsh, “impurity” (2 Ch 29 6); figuratively (Ezer 9 11); RV has “uncleanness,” but “filthiness” for uncleanness at close of verse. In the high priest into the Holy of Holies was a type of Christ’s entrance into heaven; 11 19, “from whence [from the dead] also he received him in a figure,” i.e. Abraham received Isaac back from the dead as it were, in the likeness of a resurrection, he not being actually dead, ARV “from whence he did also in a figure receive him back,” BVR “in a parable,” metaeschemato, “to change the form or appearance, “to transfer figuratively” (1 Cor 4 6, “these things, brethren, I have in a figure transferred to myself and Apollos;” the Geneva version reads “I have figuratively described in my own person”). Paul is “substituting himself and Apollos for the teachers most in repute at Corinth that he might thus avoid personal criticism.”

FILE, fil: Found only in 1 S 13 21, but the text here is obscure. The Heb (pâšâr pîm) signifies “bluntness of edge,” and is so rendered in RVm. See Tools.

(1) ḥâshûkh, from a root not used, meaning probably “to sew,” therefore a string or a measuring rod or cord, and so a line, tape, thread, fillet. Jer 52 21 and tr “line” (AV “fillet”), measuring 12 cubits long, encircling brass pillars standing 18 cubits high, part of the temple treasure plundered by the Chaldeans; and many other things “that were in the house of Josho, did the Chaldeans break in pieces.” Tr “thread,” used by Rahab, in Josh 2 18, and “cord,” “three fold,” “is not quickly broken” in Eccl 4 12.
(2) ḥâshûkh, from a root meaning “to join” and therefore something joined or attached, and so a rail or rod between pillars, i.e. a fillet. The hangings of the court of the tabernacle were supported by brass pillars set in brass sockets, “The hooks of the pillars and their fillets shall be of silver” (Ex 27 10.11). The embroidered screen for the door of the Tent of the Assembly, “figured, gored, embroidered” (Nu 33 32, “the best of any kind”; of Gen 46 18; Dt 32 32, etc (Ps 81 16, “the finest of the wheat,” RVm Heb “fat of wheat”); (4) sôrîth, “fine combed” (Isa 19 9, “fine flax,” RV “combed flax”). In other places it expresses a quality of the substantive: kehe’m, “fine gold” (Job 31 24; Dtn 10

FINE, fn (adj., from Lat. finis, “to finish”): Indicates superior quality. Only in a few instances does “fine” represent a separate word: (1) fôbh, “good,” (2) qualité gold (2 Ch 3 3 G.S.; “fine gold,” of Gen 2 12 “good”; (3) fine gold (Lam 4 1, AV “most fine gold,” RV “most pure gold,” lit. “good fine gold”), copper (Ezer 8 27, RV “fine bright brass”); fôbh, Aram. (Dtn 32 12, “fine gold”), (2) pâs, “refined” (Cant 1 11, “the new wine fine gold”), (3) good (Cant 9 11, “the best of any kind”; of Gen 46 18; Dt 32 32, etc (Ps 81 16, “the finest of the wheat,” RVm Heb “fat of wheat”)); (4) sôrîth, “fine combed” (Isa 19 9, “fine flax,” RV “combed flax”). In other places it expresses a quality of the substantive: khehem, “fine gold” (Job 31 24; Dtn 10

5, RV “pure gold”); pāz, used as a noun for refined gold (Job 28:17; Ps 19:10; Prov 8:19; Isa 13:12; Lam 2:19; Heb 11:12, “pure gold” (Prov 3:14; cf Ps 68:13, “yellow gold”); sôleth, “fine meal,” rendered “fine flour,” rolled or crushed small (Lev 2:1. 4:5, etc.); semidalis, “the finest wheat flour” (Rev 18:15); semelah sôleth, “fine meal” (Gen 16:18; “sîdhôn linear garment,” (LXX sindôn, Prov 31:24 AV; Is 3:25 AV; shéshû, “fine linen” (Gen 41:42; Ex 25:4, etc.) in Prov 31:22 AV has “sîlk,” shéshû (Exk 16:13, “fine flour”; ’etên, “what is twisted or spun, “yarn” (Prov 7:16 AV, “fine linen of Egypt,” RV “yarn of Egypt”); bâq; “fine linen” (Is 23:3; Ps 109:14; “cotton or linen” “fine linen” (1 Ch 4:21; Ex 27:16, etc. 2 Chr 2:52, AV “white,” RV “fine”); bâssos, “byssus,” “linen from bāq (LXX for which, 2 Chr 2:14 and 3:14), deemed very fine and precious, worn only by the rich (Lev 16:19; Rev 3:12; bâssinos, “byssine,” made of fine linen, LXX for bāq (1 Chr 15:27). Rev 18:16, “clothed in fine linen,” RV “arrayed” (19:8,4); sindôn, “fine linen” (Mk 16:46, “He bought fine linen,” RV “a linen cloth”; cf Mk 14:36, Mk 23:53); was used for wrapping the body at night, also for wrapping round dead bodies; sindôn is LXX for sâdhtîn (Jgs 14:12.13; Prov 31:24); châlcolhônon (Rev 1:15; 2:18, AV “fine brass”).

The meaning of this word has been much discussed: châlkoûs is “brass” or “gold” in Gr (with many compounds), and lâbâse is the LXX for ἀλατόμος, “frankincense,” which word was probably derived from the root ἀλατέω, “to burn;” this would give glowing brass, “as if burned in a furnace”; in Dt 10:6 it is ἀλάτιος καθάλα, AV “polished brass,” RV “burnished brass” (kallês, “to glow” Plumptre deemed it a hybrid word composed of the Gr ἀλατός, “brass,” and the Heb kâthôn, “white,” a technical word, such as might be familiar to the Egyptians; RV “burnished brass” (Weymouth, “silver-bronze when it is white-hot in a furnace,” the whiteness being expressed by the second half of the Gr word. See Thayer’s Lexicon).

In Apoc we have “fine linen,” bâssinos (1 Eed 3:6, “fine bread”; the adj. kathâros, separate (Jth 10:15, RvM “pure bread”); “fine flour” (Eccles 36:2; 38:11); semidalis (Bêl ver 3; 2 Mace 1:8, AV “meal offering”). W. L. Walker FINER, fin‘ér, FINING, fin‘ing (Prov 26:4 AV). See Refiner.

FINES. fine. See PUNISHMENTS.

FINGER, fin‘gér (Heb and Aram. פָּנִי, ‘êfâd; סְנַדְלוֹס, ἀκτιόνα, ἄκτιονα). The fingers are to the Oriental essential in conversation; their language is frequently very eloquent and expressive. They often show what the mouth does not dare to utter, esp. grave insult and scorn. The scandalous person is thus described in Prov 6:13 as “teaching” or “making signs with his fingers.” Such insuliting gestures (compare e.g., the gesture of Shimei in throwing dust or stones at David, 2 Sam 16) are even now not infrequent in Pal. The same habit is alluded to in Isa 59:9 by the expression, “putting forth of fingers.”

The fingers were decorated with rings of precious metal, which, with other jewelry worn ostentatiously on the body, often formed the only possession of the wearer, and were therefore carefully guarded. In the same way the law of Jeh was to be kept: “Bind them [my commandments] upon thy fingers; write them upon the tablets of thy heart.” (Prov 7:3).

Fir: 1. OT References (Isa 55:13; Hos 14:10), used with the cedar (2 K 20:23; Ps 104:17; Isa 14:8; Zec 11:2); its boughs were wide and great (Eek 31:8); it was evergreen (Hos 14:8); it could supply boards and timber for doors (1 K 6:15.54); but was not suitable for roofing, and planks for shipbuilding (Eek 27:5). In 2 S 6:5 we read: “David and all the house of Israel played before Jeh with all manner of instruments made of fir-wood," etc. It is practically certain that the reading in the passage in 1 Ch 13:8 is more correct: "David and all Israel played before God with all their might, and with much singing, etc."

There is therefore no necessity to suppose that b'rōsh was a wood used for musical instruments.

The identity of b'rōsh is uncertain. It was a name applied either to several of the Conifers in common or to one or more outstanding species. If the first interpretation is the case, it can only seek for the most suited to OT requirements.

2. The Identity of "B'rōsh"

The Aleppo pine, Pinus Halepensis, is a tree of uncommon beauty in the Lebanon, and its wood is not of special excellence and durability. A better tree (or couple of trees) is the shērēb of the Syrians; this name includes two distinct varieties in the suborder Cypresseae, the fine tall juniper, Juniperus excelsa, and the cypress, Cypresus sempervirens. They both still occur in considerable numbers in the Lebanon and And-Lebanon; they are magnificent trees and produce excellent wood—resinous, fragrant, durable. If these trees were not classed locally, as now, under one name, then the cypress list of the two more probably the b'rōsh. The coffins of Egypt mummies were made of cypress; a compact variety of this cypress is cultivated all over the Turkish empire by the Moslems as an ornament in cemeteries. From early times the cypress has been connected with mourning.

In the Apoc there are two definite references to the cypress (ὑπάρχων, καρπών). In Sir 24:13, wisdom says:

"I was exalted like a cedar in Libanus.
And as a cypress tree on the mountains of Hormon."

And in Sir 50:10 the high priest Simon is said to be

"as an olive tree budding forth fruits,
And as a cypress growing high among the clouds."

These passages, esp. the former, certainly favor the idea that b'rōsh was the cypress; the name may, however, have included allied trees.

FIRE, fiR (קָרָך, קַרָב; φω, πῦρ): These are the common words for fire, occurring very frequently. "Ur, light" (Isa 24:15 AV; of RV: 31:9, and see Fizes), nār (Arum) (Dn 3:22 f) are found a few times, also eshākāh (Jer 6:29), and b'ērāh (Ex 22:6), once each. Acts 28:23 has purd, "pyre," and Mk 14:54; Lk 22:50, phōs, "light," RV "in the light of the fire." "To set on fire," wḏrāh (2 S 14:31), lḥāḥ (Dt 32:22, etc.), ḫqōṣō (Jos 3:6). Fire was regarded by primitive peoples as supernatural in origin and specially Divine. Molech, the fire-god, and other deities were worshipped by certain Canaanites, and other tribes with human sacrifices (Dt 12:31; 2 K 17:31; Ps 106:37), and, although this was specially forbidden to the Israelites (Lev 18:21; Dt 12:31; 18:10), they too often lapsed into the practice (2 K 15:3; 21:6; Jer 7:31; Ezk 20:26-31). See MOLECH; IDOLATRY.

Fire in the OT is specially associated with the Divine presence, e.g. in the making of the Covenant with Abraham (Gen 15:17), in the Literal bush (Ex 3:2), in the pillar of fire (13:21), on Sina (19:18), in the flame on the altar (Jgs 13:20). Jeh was "the God that answered by fire" (1 K 18:24-38). In the Law, therefore, sacrifices and offerings (including incense) were to be made by fire (Ex 12:8-9:10; Lev 1). Fire from Jeh signified the acceptance of certain special and separate sacrifices (Jgs 6:21; 1 K 18:38; 1 Ch 21:26). In Lev 9:24 the sacrificial fire "came forth from before Jeh." The altar-fire was to be kept continually burning (Lev 6:12-13; 8:10), and by other than the sacred altar-fire was punished by "fire from before Jeh." (10:12). Fire came from heaven also at the consecration of Solomon's Temple (2 Ch 7:1).

According to 2 Mac 1:10-22, at the time of the Captivity priests set fire in a well, and Noahemiah found it again, in a miraculous way, for the Second Temple. Later, Macabaeus is said to have preserved by "stirring stones and taking fire out of them." (10:3).

Fire was a frequent instrument of the Divine primitive wrath (Gen 19:24; Ex 9:23 [lightning]; Nu 11:1; 16:35; etc.; Ps 104:4, RV "Who maketh... his flame of fire his ministers"). Fire shall yet dissolve the world (2 Pet 3:12). It was frequently used by the Israelites as a means of destruction of idolatrous objects and the cities of their enemies (Dt 4:39; 13:3; 13:16; Josh 6:24; etc., frequently); sometimes also in purification (Lev 20:14; 21:9; Josh 7:25; 2 Macc 7:5).

The domestic use of fire was, as among other peoples, for heating, cooking, lighting, etc., but according to the Law no fire could be kindled on the Sabbath day (Ex 34:4, it was employed also for melting (32:24), and refining (Nu 31:23; Mal 3:2, etc.). For the sacrificial fire wood was used as fuel (Gen 23:6; Lev 6:12); for ordinary purposes, also charcoal (Prov 25:22; Isa 6:6, RV "for hot stone"); Hal 3:5, RV "flour boils m. or burning coals"; Jn 21:19, "a fire of coals." RV "Gr. a fire of charcoal!" Rom 12:20; branches (Nu 15:22; 1 K 17:12); thorns (Ps 58:9; 118:12; Ecel 7:6; Isa 33:12); grass and other herbage (Mt 5:21; Lk 12:28).

Fire was an emblem (1) of Jeh in His glory (Dul 7:9); (2) in His holiness (Isa 4:4); (3) in His jealousy for His sole worship (Dt 4:24).

2. Figurative Use (Isa 4:4); (4) of His exaltation of His people (2 K 6:17; Zec 2:5); (5) of His righteous judgment and purification (Zec 13:9; Mal 3:3; 1 Cor 3:13); (6) of His wrath against sin and punishment of the wicked (Dt 9:5; Ps 138:8; 89:46; Isa 6:6; 30:33; "a Topheth is prepared of old"); Mt 3:10-12; 5:22, RV "the hell of fire," m. "Gr. Gehenna of fire"; see Isa 30:33; Jer 7:31; Mt 13:40-43; 28:41; "eternal fire." Mk 9:45-46; see Isa 66:24; Rev 4:5; 7:14; Rev 20:10; Jude verse 7; (7) of the word of God in its power (Jer 5:14; 23:29); (8) of Divine truth (Ps 39:3; Jer 20:9; Lk 12:49); (9) of that which guides men (Isa 10:11-10); (10) of the Holy Spirit (Acts 2:4); (11) of the sacred Christ (Rom 1:4); (12) of kindness in its melting power (Rom 12:20; 1 Cor 13:4) of trial and suffering (Ps 66:12; Isa 43:2; 1 Pet 1:7; 4:12); (14) of evil (Prov 6:27; 16:27; Isa 9:18; 65:5); lust or desire (Hos 7:6; Sir 23:16; 1 Cor 7:9); (16) of the tongue in its evil aspects (15:3:5); (16) of heaven in its purity and glory (Rev 15:2; see also 21:22).

FIREBRAND. fir'brand (קָו כָּסָר, qāš, used for a burning stick taken out of the fire): In Jgs 16:45 describing the "brands" (m. "torches") which Samson tied to the foxes' tail, the word is ḫqāšāh ("lamp"); see Jgs 6:10.20 RV, "torches". Other words are zōkēš, "sparkles," "flames" (fiery darts; Prov 26:18), and ḫkōṯ (Isa 60:11); ḫāš is used figuratively of angry men (Isa 4:8), and of those mercilessly rescued from destruction (Am 4:11; Ps 109:6); zōkēš, RV "torches". See BRAND.

FIRE, fir'pan (יוָרֶן), mahăth, “firepan,” “censer,” “snuff dish,” from ‛āḏāh, “to snatch up”: A vessel for carrying coals. Brazen firepans were part of the furnishings of the altar of burnt offerings (Ex 27:3; 38:3, and in Nu 4:14, where AV wrongly reads “censers,” the context indicating a vessel belonging to the brazen altar).

The same word is tr2 “snuff dishes” in Ex 25:38; 37:23; Nu 4:9, where it refers to golden firepans which belonged to the golden candlestick or lamp stand, and were used to receive the burnt offerings of the wicked at K 7:50 and 2 Ch 4:22, although AV reads “censers,” the context points to the firepans belonging to the candlestick; as also in 2 K 25:15 and Jer 52:19, tr4 “firepans” in AV and RV. A similar firepan designated by the same Heb word but tr4 “censer” was used to carry the burning coals upon which the incense was thrown and burned (Lev 10:1; 16:12; Nu 16:6.17 ff.). See CENSER.

The firepan or censer of the Hebrews was doubtless similar to the censer of the Egyptians, pictures of which have been found. It consisted of a pan or pot for the coals, which was held by a straight or slightly curved long handle. The style of censer used in recent centuries, swung by three chains, came into use about the 12th cent. A.D.

FIRES, fīr'ēs. In Isa 24:15 AV translates בַּדָּשׁ, ’urîm (“lights,” esp. Urmi in the phrase “Urim and Thummim”) “fires.” RV,understanding the word to mean the region of light, translates “east,” which satisfies the context far better, and is adopted by many modern scholars. In Ezek 29:10 RV has “fires;” in ver 9 “make fires” is a tr of a vb. of different root; in ver 10 “fires” translates the common sing. noun for fire.

FIRKIN, für'kin (μερίδια, μετρητά): The liquid measure used in Jn 2:6 to indicate the capacity of the water-pots mentioned in the narrative of the miracle of turning the water into wine. It is regarded as equivalent to the Heb bath, and thus contained about nine gallons. See Weights and Measures.

FIRMAMENT, fīr'ma-ment. See Astronomy, III, 3.

FIRST, fīr'st (יוֹרָם, ’eḇāḏāh, יְוֵיתֶן), rī'šôn; πρῶτος, πρῶτον, τὸ πρῶτον, τῷ πρῶτον, πρῶτα, πρῶτος, πρῶτα): Of these words, which are those most frequently used for “first,” rī’shon is from rōsh, “the head,” and is used for the highest, chief, etc; also of time, the beginning, e.g. Gen 8:13, “in the first month;” in Isa 44:6; 48:12, it is used of Jeh as Eternal and Solely Supreme—the First and the Last (cf 41:4). Special usages are in connection with “firstborn,” “first-fruit,” etc; πρῶτος is used of that which is first in order; but also of that which is first or chief in importance, etc (Mt 6:33; Jas 3:17). In 1 Tim 3:16 Paul says Jesus came “to save sinners; of whom I am chief,” lit. “first;” the same word is used by Jesus of the “first” of the commandments (Mk 12:29); where we read in 1 Cor 15:5, “I delivered unto you first of all,” it is en πρῶτος (“in the foremost place”); “The first and the last” is applied to Christ as Eternal and Supreme (Rev 1:17; 2:22; 3:22); πρῶτος is “the first day” (Mt 26:17; Mk 16:9); in Mt 28:1; Mk 16:2; Lk 24:1; Jn 20:19; Acts 20:7, it is “first one” (NIV). W. WALKER

FIRST-BEGOTTEN, fīr'st-bē-gōt'n (μαρτυρότοκος, πρῶτόλοκος): This Gr word is tr2 in two passages in AV by “first-begotten” (He 1:6; Rev 1:5), but in all other places in AV, and always in RV, by “firstborn.” It is used in its natural literal sense of Jesus Christ as Mary’s first-born (Lk 2:7; Mt 1:25 AV); it also bears the literal sense of the first-born of men and animals (He 11:28). It is not used in the NT or LXX of an only child, which is expressed by πρόνομος (see p. 1102).

Metaphorically, it is used of Jesus Christ to express at once His relation to man and the universe and His difference from them, as both He and they are related to God. The laws and customs of all nations show that to be “firstborn” means, not only priority in time, but a certain superiority in privilege and authority. Israel is Jehovah’s first-born among the nations (Ex 4:22; cf Jer 31:9). The Messianic King is God’s first-born (LXX prótòlókos), “the highest of the kings of the earth” (Ps 89:27). Philo applies the word to the Logos as the archetypal and governing idea of creation. Similarly Christ, as “the first-born of all creation” (Col 1:15), is not only prior to it in time, but above it in power and authority. “All things have been created through him and unto him” (ver 16). He is “sovereign Lord over all creation by virtue of his pre-eminence” (Lightfoot). It denotes His status and character and not His origin; the context does not admit the idea that He was a part of the creation. In His incarnation He is brought into the world as “firstborn,” and God summons all His angels to worship Him (He 1:6). In His resurrection He is “firstborn from the dead” (Col 1:18) or of the dead (Rev 1:5). In the original Greek, literally as “first-born,” finally He is “firstborn among many brethren” (Rom 8:29) in the consummation of God’s purpose of grace, when all the elect are gathered home. Not only is He their Lord, but also their pattern, God’s ideal Son, and men are “made perfect through him” (He 5:9), finally He is “firstborn among many brethren” (He 12:23). See also BEGOTTEN, and Lightfoot on Col 1:15.

FIRSTBORN, fīr'st-bōrn, FIRSTLING, fīr'st-līng (יוֹרָם, בֵּיתָר, πρῶτοτοκοῦς, πρῶτόλοκοι): The Heb word denotes the first-born of human beings as well as of animals (Ex 11), while a word from the same root denotes first-fruits (Ex 23:16). All the data point to the conclusion that among the ancestors of the Hebrews the sacrifice of the first-born was an archetypal, fixed, as just as the firstlings of the flocks and the first-fruits of the produce of the earth were devoted to the deity. The narrative of the Moabite war records the sacrifice of the heir to the throne by Methus, to Chemosh, the national god (2 K 3:27). The barbarous custom must have become extinct at an early period in the religion of Israel (Gen 22:12). It was probably due to the influence of surrounding nations that the cruel practice was revived toward the close of the monarchical period (2 K 21:17; 21:17; 21:16; Jer 7:31; Ezek 16:20; 23:37; Mic 6:7). Jeremiah denies that the offering of human beings could have been an instruction from Yahweh (7:31; 19:5). The prophetic conception of God had rendered such a doctrine inconceivable. Clear evidence of the spiritualization and humanization of religion among the Israelites is furnished in the replacement, at an early stage, of the actual sacrifice of the first-born by their dedication to the service of Yahweh. At a later stage the Levites were substituted for the first-born. Just as the firstlings of uncaged animals were redeemed with money (Ex 13:13; 34:20), for the dedication of the first-born was substituted the consecration of the Levites to the service of the sanctuary (Nu 3:11–13.45). On the 90th day after birth the first-born was brought to the priest by the father, who paid five shekels for the child's redemption from service in the temple (cf. Lk 2:27; Mish Bikkurîm viii.8). For that reason, it was adopted in place of the redeemed firstborn (Nu 3:45). According to Ex 22:29-31 the firstborn were to be given to Yahweh. (The firstborn of clean animals, if free from spot or blemish, were to be sacrificed after eight days, Nu 18:16 ff.) This allusion to the sacrifice of the firstborn as part of the religion of Yahweh has been variously explained. Some scholars suspect the text, but in all probability the verse means no more than similar references to the fact that the firstborn belonged to Yahweh (Ex 13:2; 34:19). The treatment of the firstborn, which was the recompense of the firstborn, has been omitted. The firstborn possessed definite privileges which were denied to other members of the family. The Law forbade the disinheritance of the firstborn (Dt 21:15-17). Such legislation, in polygamous times, was necessary to prevent a favorite wife from exercising undue influence over her husband in distributing his property, as in the case of Jacob (Gen 25:23). The oldest son's share was twice as large as that of any other son. When Eliáh prayed for a double portion of Elijâh's spirit, he simply wished to be considered the firstborn, i.e., the successor, of the dying prophet. Israel was Yahweh's firstborn (Ex 4:22; cf. Jer 31:9 [Ephraim]). Israel, as compared with other nations, enjoyed special privileges. She occupied a unique position in virtue of the special relationship between Yahweh and the nation. In three passages (Rom 8:29; Col 1:15; He 1:6), Jesus Christ is the firstborn—among many brethren (Rom 8:29; Col 1:16). The application of the term to Jesus Christ may be traced back to Ps 89:27 where the Davidic ruler, or perhaps the nation, is alluded to as the firstborn of Yahweh. See CHILD; CIRCUMCISION; FIRSTBORN; PLACES OF EGYPT.

NOTE.—The custom of redeeming the firstborn son is preserved among the Jews to this day. After thirty days the father invokes the "Kohen," i.e., a supposed descendant of Aaron, to the house. The child is brought and shown to the "Kohen." and the father declares the son to be an Israelite. If he is a "Kohen," redemption is not necessary. The "Kohen" asks the father whether he prefers, his child, the five shekels of the father answers that he prefers his son, and pays to the "Kohen" a sum equivalent to five shekels. After receiving the money, the "Kohen" puts his hands on the child's head and pronounces the Aronite blessing (Nu 6:22-27).

FIRST-FRUTIS, first-fruits (יוֹסֵדָּה, re'shîth, re'shîth, בֹּקֶקֶרְוָּם, bîkkûrîm; ἀπαρχή̑, aparchê). LXX translates re’shîth by aparchê, but for bîkkûrîm it uses the word πρῶτοικονília; of Philo 22:33): In acknowledgment of the fact that the land and all its products were the gift of Jeh to Israel, and in thankfulness for His bounty, all the first-fruits were offered to Him. These were offered in their natural state (e.g., barley, olive, dates, grapes), or after preparation (e.g., musk, oil, flour, dough), after which the Israelite was at liberty to use the rest (Ex 23:19; Nu 16:20; 18:12; Dt 26:2; Neh 10:35-37). No absolute distinction can be made between re’shîth and bîkkûrîm, but re’shîth seems generally to mean what is prepared by human labor, and bîkkûrîm the direct product of Nature. The phrase "the first of the first-fruits" (Ex 23:19; 34:26; Exk 44:30), Heb re'shîth bîkkûrîm, Gr aparchē̑ tîn πρῶτοικονília, is not quite clear, and the meaning in the last-named is uncertain. The re’shîth offerings were individual, except that a re’shîth of dough was to be offered as a heave offering (Nu 15:17-21). The priest waved a re’shîth of corn before the Lord on the morrow after the Sabbath in the week of 'unleavened bread, and brought the entire offering of the firstfruits all for the priest (Nu 18:12). Bîkkûrîm refers specially to things sown (Ex 23:16; Lev 2:14). At the Feast of Weeks, seven weeks after the offering of the sheaf, bîkkûrîm of corn in the ear, parched with fire and bruised, were brought to the Lord as a memorial offering (Le 23:10; Ac 7:42). The bîkkûrîm also fell to the priest, except a portion which was burned as a memorial (Lev 2:1-10). The beautiful ceremonial of the offering of the re’shîth in the House of God is described in Dt 35:1-11, and is enlarged upon in the Talm (Bîkkûrîm 3:2). According to the Talm (Trûmûth 4:3) a sixtieth part of the first-fruits in a prepared form was the minimum that could be offered; the more generous brought a fortieth part, and even a thirtieth. The fruits of newly planted trees were not to be gathered during the first three years; the fruits of the fourth year were consecrated to Jeh, and from the fifth year the fruits belonged to the owner of the trees (Lev 19:23-25). According to Mish, 'Orâîh 1:19, even the shells of nuts and pomegranates could not be used during the first three years as coloring matter or for the lighting of fires. It is held by some scholars that the institution of the tithe (the Trûs) is a later development from the first-fruits offerings.

Figurative: In the OT, in Jer 2:3, Israel is called "the re’shîth of his increase." In the NT aparchê is applied fig. to the first convert or converts in a particular place (Rom 16:5; 1 Cor 16:15); to the first-fruits of repenting sinners (1 Cor 15:20); to the 144,000 in heaven (Rev 14:4); to Christ, as the first who rose from the dead (1 Cor 15:20.23); also to the blessings which we receive now through the Spirit, the earnest of greater blessings to come (Rom 8:23).

FISH (יָצָאֵר, ye-tsâ'âr, בָּנָה, banâ'; ὄψαρον, ópsaron; יָבְשָׁא, yâḇshâ; ποικίλις, ποικίλος, ποικίλησις, ποικίλως, op- siron); Fishes abound in the inland waters of Pal as well as the Mediterranean. They are often mentioned or indirectly referred to both in the OT and in the NT, but it is remarkable that no particular kind is distinguished by name. In Lev 11:9-12 and Dt 14:9-11, "whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters" is declared clean, while all that "have not fins and scales" are forbidden. This excluded not only reptiles and amphibia, but also many kinds of fish, siluroïds and eels, sharks, rays and lampreys. For our knowledge of the inland fishes of Pal we are mainly indebted to Tristram, NHBS and Fauna and Flora of Pal; Lortet, Poissons et reptiles du Lac de Thibrâde; and Russegger, Reisen in Europä. Asien, Afrika, 1835-1841. The most remarkable feature of the fish fauna of the Jordan valley is its relationship to that of the Nile and of E. Central Africa. Two Nile fishes, Chromis nilotica Hasselquist, and Clarus macracanthus Guntli., are found in the Jordan valley, and a number of other species found only in the Jordan valley belong to genera (Chromis and Hemichromis) which are otherwise exclusively African. This seems to indicate that at some time, probably in the early Tertiary, there was some connection between the Palestinian and African river systems. No fish can live in the Dead Sea, and many perish through being carried down by the swift currents of the Jordan and other streams. There are, however, several kinds of fish which live in salt springs on the borders of the Dead Sea, springs which are as salt as the Dead Sea but which, according to Lortet, lack the magnesium chloride which is a constituent of the Dead Sea water and is fatal to the fish. Capra hamadryas Bov., Oryx, and Val, one of the most noxious fishes of Syria and Pal, has been taken by the writer in large numbers in the Arnon and other streams flowing into the Dead Sea. This is surprising in view of the fact that the Dead Sea seems to form an effective barrier between the fishes of the different streams flowing into it. The indiscriminate mention of fishes without reference to the different kinds is well illustrated by the numerous passages in which "the fishes of the sea, the birds of the heavens, and the beasts of the field," or some equivalent expression, is used to denote all living creatures, e.g. Gen 1 26; 9 2; Nu 11 23; Dt 4 18; 1 K 4 33; Job 12 8; Ps 8 8; Ezek 38 20; Hos 4 3; Zeph 1 3; 1 Cor 16 39.

An unusually large shark might fulfil the conditions of Jonah's fish (dagh, daghah; but Mt 12 40, ὕποθαλόντας, "whale" or "sea monster"). The whale that is found in the Mediterranean (Balena australis) has a narrow throat and could not swallow a man. No natural explanation is possible of Jonah's remaining alive and conscious for three days in the creature's belly. Those who consider the book historical must regard the whole event as miraculous. For those who consider it to be a story with a purpose, no explanation is required.

Carp Found in the Sea of Galilee (PEG Drawing).

The present inhabitants of Moab and Edom make no use of the fish that swarm in the Arnon, the Isser and other streams, but fishing is an important industry in Galilee and Western Pal. Now, as formerly, spear hooks and nets are employed. The fish-spear (Job 41 7) is little used. Most of the OT references to nets have to do with the taking of birds and beasts and not of fishes, and, while In fish 1 18 ἄραμ is rendered "net" and μίκρον "drag," it is not clear that these and the other words rendered "net" refer to particular kinds of nets. In the NT, however, σαφές, σαφές (Mt 13 47), is clearly the dragnet, and ἄμφιπλετόν, ἄμφιπλετόν (Mt 15 18), is clearly the casting net. The word oftenest used is κεριόν, ὄλυνον. Though this word is from ὄλυς, "to throw," or "to cast," the context in several places (e.g. Lk 5 4; Jn 21 11) suggests that a dragnet is meant.

The dragnet may be several hundred feet long. The upper edge is buoyed and the lower edge is weighted. It is set down from a boat in a line parallel to the shore and is then pulled in by ropes attached to the two ends, several men and boys usually pulling at each end. The} use of the casting net requires much skill. It forms a circle of from 10 to 20 feet in diameter with numerous small leaden weights at its circumference. It is lowered by the center and carefully gathered over the right arm. When well thrown it goes to some distance, at the same time spreading out into a wide circle. A cord is attached to the center, but this is not always the case. When lifted above the center, the fish is dragged over the bottom, and sometimes a large number of fish may be inclosed. The novice has only to try, to realize the difficulty of the practiced fisher man.

Figurative: The fact that so many of Our Lord's disciples were fishermen lends a profound interest to their profession. Christ tells Simon and Andrew (Mt 4 19; Mk 1 17) that He will make them fishers of men. The Kingdom of Heaven (Mt 13 47) is likened unto a net that was cast into the sea, and gathered of every kind; which, when it was filled, they drew up on the beach; and they sat down and gathered the good into vessels, but the bad they cast away. Tristram (NHB) says that he has seen the fishermen go through their net and throw out into the sea those that were too small for the market or were considered unclean. In Jn 16, we read: "Behold, I will send for many fishes, saith Jeh, and they shall fish them up; and afterward I will send for many hunters, and they shall hunt them round about every mountain, and they shall hunt every hill, and out of the clefts of the rocks." In the vision of Ezekiel (Ezk 47 9 f.), the multitude of fish and the nets spread from En-gedi to En-gazaim are marks of the marvelous change wrought in the Dead Sea by the stream issuing from the temple. The same sign, i.e. of the spreading of nets (Ezk 26 5 14), marks the desolation of Tyre. It is a piece of broiled fish that the risen Lord eats with the Eleven in Jerusalem (Lk 24 42), and by the Sea of Galilee (Jn 21 13) He gives the disciples bread and fish.

ALFRED ELY DAY

FISHER, fish' er, FISHERMAN, fish' er-man (-Feb., dayah-gaf, Z-sag), dawght; aleex, hakei; WH halde). Although but few references to fishermen are made in the Bible, these men and their calling are brought into prominence by Jesus' call to certain Galilean fishermen to become His disciples (Mt 4 18 19; Mk 1 16 17). Fishermen, then as now, formed a distinct class. The strenuousness of the work (Lk 5 8) made this in the words of the apostle, "a hard life." They were crude in manner, rough in speech and in their treatment of others (Lk 9 49 54; Jn 18 19). James and John before they became tempered by Jesus' influence were nicknamed the "sons of thunder" (Mt 16 17). The fishermen were subject to all kinds of weather made them hardy and fearless. They were accustomed to bear with patience many trying circumstances. They often toiled for hours without success, and yet were always ready to try once more (Lk 5 5; Jn 21 5). Such men, when impelled by the same spirit as filled their Master, became indeed "fishers of men" (Mt 4 19; Mk 1 17).

One of the striking instances of the fulfilment of prophecy is the use by the Syrian fishermen, who go to-day of the site of ancient Tyre as a place for the spreading of their nets (Ezk 26 5 14).

Figurative: Fish were largely used as food (Hab 1 10), hence the lamentation of the fishermen, who provided for all, typified general desolation (Jas 19 8). On the other hand, abundance of fish and many fishermen indicated general abundance (Ezk 47 10). Our modern expression, "treated like a dog," had its counterpart in the language of the OT writers, when they portrayed the punished people of Judah as being treated like fish. Jesus upbraided the fishermen to fish them up and put sticks or hooks through their cheeks as a fisherman strings his fish (Jas 16 13; Job 41 2). Such treatment of the people of Judah is depicted in some of the Assyrian monuments.

FISHER'S COAT, kôt: This expression is found in Jn 21:7 where RV and ARV have "coat." John here, after representing Peter as "naked" (γυμνός, gumnos), pictures him as girding on his "coat" (ἐπενδέες, ependēs), lit. "upper garment" and not at all specifically a "fisher's coat." See Dress; Upper Garment, etc.

FISH GATE. See Jerusalem.

FISHHOOK, fish'hook (הַשָּׁפָן, shaphan, הַֽחֲקָקָה, hakkāh): The word "fishhooks" occurs but twice in ARV (Job 41:1; Am 4:2). In other passages the word "hook" or "angle" is applied to this instrument for fishing (Isa 19:8; Job 41:2). The ancient Egyptian noblemen used to amuse themselves by fishing from their private fishpools with hook and line. The Egyptian monuments show that the hook was quite commonly used for catching fish. The hook is still used in Bible lands, although not as commonly as nets. It is called a śinārūt, probably from the same root as śinnāh, the pl. of which is τρία hooks in Am 4:2. In Mt 17:27, ἑγκιστρων, ἑγκιστρων (lit. "fishhook"), is rendered "hook."

FISHING, fish'ing (חקא, hakkā): Several methods of securing fish are resorted to at the present day along the seashores of Pal. Two of these, dynamiting and poisoning with the juice of cyclamen bulbs or other poisonous plants, can be passed over as having no bearing on ancient methods.

(1) With hooks: Some fishing is done with hooks and lines, either on poles when fishing from shore, or on trawls in deep-sea fishing. The fishhooks now used are of European origin, but bronze fish-cast from the shore into the shallow water in such a manner that the ledged edge forms the base of a cone, the apex being formed by the fisherman holding the center of the net in his hand. The cone thus formed indoes such fish as cannot escape the quick throw of the fisherman. (b) A long net or seine of one or two fathoms depth, led on one edge and provided with floats on the other, is payed out from boats in such a way as to surround a school of fish. Long ropes fastened to the two ends are carried ashore many yards apart, and from five to ten men on each rope gradually draw in the net. The fish are then landed from the shallow water with small nets or by hand. This method is commonly practiced on the shores of the Sea of Galilee.

In deeper waters a net similar to that described above, but four or five fathoms deep, is cast from boats and the ends slowly brought together so as to form a circle. Men then dive down and bring one portion of the weighted edge over under the rest, so as to form a bottom. The compass of the net is then narrowed, and the fish are emptied from the net into the boat. Sometimes the net with the fish inclosed is tossed into shallow water before drawing it in, and the fish are probably the only ones the disciples used (Mt 4:18; Mk 1:16; Lk 5:1-10; Jn 21:3-11). Portions of nets with leads and floats, of early Egypt origin, may be seen in the British Museum. See Net.

The fishermen today usually work with their garments tied about their waists. Frequently they wear only a loose outer garment which is wet much of the time. This garment can be quickly removed by pulling it over the head, when occasion requires the fisherman to jump into the sea. If methods have not changed, Peter had probably just climbed back into the boat after adjusting the net for drawing when he learned that it was Jesus who stood on the shore. He was literally naked and pulled on his coat before he went ashore (Jn 21:7).

FISHPOOLS, fish'pools: This is a mistranslation. The Heb בִּרְכָּה, birkhāh (Cant 7:4) simply means "pool" (RV); "fish" is quite unwarrantingly introduced in AV. In Isa 19:10, again, instead of "all that make sluices and ponds for fish" (AV), we should certainly read, with RV, "All that work for hire shall be grieved in soul".

FIT, FITLY, fit'hi: The word "fit" (adj. and vb.) occurs a few times, representing nearly as many Heb and Gr words. RV frequently alters, as in Lev 26:1 ("timely, "opportune," "ready")", where for "fit" it reads, "in readiness," in "appointed." In 1 Ch 7:11 RV has "that were able"; in Is 44:13, "shapeth;" in Prov 24:27, "ready," etc. "Fitly" in Prov 25:11 is in RVm "in due season;" in Cant 8:12, "fitly set" is in RVm "sitting by full streams." In the NT "fit" is the tr. of εὐθάνατος, "well placed" (Lk 9:62; 14:35), of καλέκ-κον, "suitable" (Acts 23:22), and of καταρτιζó, "to make quite ready" (Rom 9:22, "vessels of wrath fitted unto destruction").

FITCHES, fisch'iz (the Eng. word "fitch" is the same as "vetch":)

(1) צַבְצִית, ḫesāḥ (Isa 28:25; RVm has "black cummin" [Nigella sativa]). This is the "matric flower," an annual herb (N.O. Ranunculaceae), the black seeds of which are sprinkled over some kinds of bread in Pal. They were used as a condiment by the ancient Greeks and Romans. These seeds have a warm aromatic flavor and are carminative in their properties, assisting digestion. They, like all such plants which readily yield their seed, are still beaten out with rods. The contrast between the stouter staff for the "fitches" and the lighter rod for the cummin is all the more noticeable when the great similarity of the two seeds is noticed.

(2) בּוֹקַע, bōqāʿ (Ezk 4:9) RV "spelt" (which see). E. W. G. MASTERMAN FIVE, fiv (פֶּטַשׁ, hāmēsh; פֵּטִים, pētekhe,). See NUMBER.

FLAG: Two Heb words:

(1) בּוֹקַע, bōqāʿ (Ex 2:3, "flags"); Isa 19:6, "flags;" Jon 2:5, "weeds." This is apparently a general name which includes both the fresh-water weeds growing along a river bank and "seaweeds." The Red Sea was known as Yam sāpīgh.

(2) מִדְחָא, midhāa (Gen 41:2.18, AV "meadow," RV "reed-grass"); Job 8:11, "Can the rush grow up without mire? Can the flag [in "reed-grass"] grow without water?" Some such general term as "sedges" or "fens" would better meet the requirements.

FLAGON, flag'on: The tr. of בּוֹקַע, bōqāʿ, "ashishāh, in AV in 2 S 6:19; 1 Ch 16:3; Cant 2:5; Hos 1:15; Isa 13:21. In all these cases no judgment can be made as to which of the disciples used the flagons. See Net.

FLAKE, flāk (פָּרסִק, mappol, a word of uncertain meaning): It is used in the sense of "refuse [husks] of the wheat" in Am 8:6. With regard to the body we find it used in Job 41:23 in the description of leviathan (the crocodile): "The flakes of his flesh are joined together; they are firm upon him; they cannot be moved." Baethgen in Kautzsch's tr of the OT translates "Rampen," i.e., the collars or lateral folds of flesh and armed skin. A better tr would perhaps be: "the horny epidermic scales" of the body differentiated from some other epidermic scutes of the back (Heb "channels of shields," "courses of scales"), which are mentioned in ver 15 m.

FLAME, flām (פָּרָשִׁים, lahabb, and other forms from same root; φλάσσω, plokhō): In Jgs 13:20 bis; Job 41:21; Isa 29:6; Joel 2:5, the word is lahabb. Various other words are trd "flame;" mas'ēth, "a lifting or raising up" (Jgs 20:38-40 AV), RV "cloud," (of smoke); kādāl, "completeness" (Jgs 20:10; Job 40:16 AVm, "a holocaust, or offering wholly consumed by fire;" in Lev 6:15); shākhebbeth (Job 15:30; Cant 8:6; ARV "a very flame of Jeh;" in "or, a most vehement flame;" Ezek 20:47, RV "the flaming flame"); shādēbōb (Job 19:5; RVm); shābəb, Aram. (Dan 3:22; 7:9). In Ps 104:4 ARV has "maketh,... flames of fire his ministers;" RV "flame" for "snare" (Prov 29:8).

Figuratively: "Flame" is used to denote excitement (Prov 29:6 AV, "shame, astonishment," "faces of flame"; Isa 13:8); in Rev 1:14, the glorified Christ is described as having eyes "as a flame of fire," signifying their searching purity (of 2:18; 19:12). Flame is also a symbol of God's wrath (Ps 83:14; Isa 5:24; 10:17). See also FIRE.

FLAT NOSE (פֶּטֶר, hārūm; LXX κολόβορον, koloborēn): Used only in Lev 21:18 as the name of FLAX, flax (פֶּשֶׁת, peseth, also פָּשְׁתָּה, peshthah; Λιον, linen [Mt. 12:20]): The above Heb words are applied (1) to the plant: "The flax was in bloom" (AV "bullied"; Ex 9:31); (2) the "stalks of flax," lit. "flax of the tree," put on the roof to dry (Josh 2:6); (3) to the fine fibers used for lighting: AV "tow," "flax." RV. "A dimly burning wick will he not quench" (Isa 42:3); "They are quenched as a wick" (Isa 43:17). The thought is perhaps of a scarcely lighted wick just kindled with difficulty from a spark. (4) In Isa 19:9 mention is made of "combed flax," i.e. flax hacked ready for spinning (cf Hos 2:5,9; Prov 31:13). The reference in Jgs 15:14 is to flax twisted into cords. (5) In Jgs 16:9; Isa 1:31, mention is made of נְשֵׂבָת, "tow," lit. something "shaken off"—as the root imples—from flax. (6) The pl. form pishtim is used in many passages for linen or linen garments, e.g. Lev 13:47.48.52.59; Dt 22:11; Jer 13:1 ("linnen girdle"); Ezek 44:17 f. Linen was in the earliest historic times a favorite material for clothes. The Jewish priestly garments were of pure linen. Egyptian mummies were swathed in linen. Several other Heb words were used for linen garments. See LINEN.

FLAX is the product of Linum usitatissimum, a herbaceous plant which has been cultivated from the dawn of history. It is perennial and grows to a height of 2 to 3 ft.; it has blue flowers and very fibrous stalks. The tough fibers of the latter, after the decay and removal of the softer woody and gummy material, make up the crude "flax." Linseed, linseed oil and oleace are useful products of the same plant.

FLAYING, flaying. See PUNISHMENTS.

FLEE, flee, see FLY.

FLEET, fleet. See GIDEON; SHEEP; WOOL.

FLESH (םִבָּד, bā'id, בַּד, bād; אִישָּׁר, 'ishār): Used in all senses of the word, the latter, however, most frequently in the sense of kin, family, 1. Ethnocentric relationship (cf יִשְׂרָאֵל, 'ishārāh, "kineology woman," Lev 18:17); Lev 18:6; 25:49; Prov 11:17; Jer 51:35, and probably Ps 73:26. In all other places 'ishār means "flesh"—both in the proper and figurative sense as food (Ps 78:20,27; Mic 3:2,5,7; יִשְׁפָּר, yishpar, "to hew, cut off;" i.e. "a measure of food," "butcher's meat" (1 Sam 25:11)). The word יִשְׂבָּד, "eshpar, found only in two passages (2 Sam 19:1=1 Ch 16:3), is of very uncertain meaning. The Eng. VSS translate it with "a good piece [portion] of flesh," the Vulg with "a piece of roast meat," others with "a portion of flesh" and "a measure of wine." It probably means simply "a measured portion." יִשָּׁב, yishḇ; לֹא בָד, laḇām, lit. "eaten," then food of (Gen 4:16,7; lehem, "bread"), has been rarely specialized as flesh or meat (cf. Arab. lahm, "meat," "flesh," "so in Zeph 1:17, where it stands in parallelism with "blood"). The Gr terms are σάρξ, sārēs, and σπάρα, sparā, the latter always meaning "butcher's meat" (Rom 14:21; 1 Cor 8:13).

We can distinguish the following varieties of meaning in Bib. language:

In a physical sense, the chief substance of the animal body, whether used for food and sacrifice, or not; also the flesh of man (Gen 2:23, Ex 13:10; Isa. 14:10; 1 Cor 15:39; Rev 19:18). The whole body. This meaning is the extension of the preceding (pars pro toto). This is indicated by the LXX, where bāid is often translated by the pl. άσπερ, hēt σάρκες (Gen 40:19; Nu 12 12; Job 33 25), and occasionally by σώμα, somá, i.e. "body" (Lev 15 2; 1 K 21 27). This meaning is also very clear in passages 3. The Body like the following: Ex 4 7; Lev 17 14; Nu 8 7; 2 K 4 34; Prov 5 11, where básár and schêr are combined; and Prov 14 30; Ecol 12 12. Flesh, as the common term for living things, animals and men, esp. the latter (Gen 6 13 17 19; Nu 16 22; Jer 12 12; Mk 13 20); Term "flesh" (Eph 2 28; Ps 68 34). Term "All flesh" (Isa 40 6; Jer 25 31; Ezek 20 48; Joel 2 28; Lk 3 6). Fles as opposed to the spirit, both of which were comprised in the preceding meaning (Gen 6 3; Ps 15 9; Lk 24 36, where "flesh and bones" are combined; Jn 6 63).

5. As opposed to the Spirit, God is manifested in the flesh"; 1 Tim 3 16, "He who was manifested in the flesh"; 1 Jn 4 2, and all passages where the incarnation of Christ is spoken of. The word in this sense approaches the meaning of "earthly life," as in Phil 1 22 24, "to live in the flesh," "to abide in the flesh"; of Philerm ver 16 and perhaps 2 Cor 5 16. Under this meaning we may enumerate expressions such as "arm of flesh" (2 Ch 28 8; Jer 3 5); "eyes of flesh" (Job 10 4), etc. Frequently the distinction is made to emphasize the weakness or inferiority of the flesh, as opposed to the superiority of the spirit (Isa 31 3; Mt 26 41; Mk 14 38; Rom 6 19). In connection with man's mention is the expression: "flesh and blood," a phrase borrowed from rabbinical writings and phraseology (see also Sir 14 18, "the generation of flesh and blood"); and 17 31, "man whose desire is flesh and blood" (AV). The expression does not convey, as some have supposed, the idea of inherent sinfulness of the flesh (a doctrine borrowed by gnostic teachers from oriental sources), but merely the idea of ignorance and frailty in comparison with the possibilities of spiritual life. The capabilities of our earthly constitution do not suffice to reveal unto us heaven's truths; these must always come to us from above. So St. Peter's first recognition of the Divine sonship of Jesus did not proceed from a logical conviction based upon outward facts acting upon our minds, but was built upon a revelation from God vouchsafed to his inner consciousness. Christ says therefore to him: "Blessed art thou, Simon Bar-Jonah: for flesh and blood hath not revealed it unto thee, but my Father which is in heaven." (Mt 16 17). Similarly the kingdom of God, being a realm of perfect spiritual submission to God, cannot be inherited by flesh and blood (1 Cor 15 50), nor was the richly endowed mind a competent tribunal to which St. Paul could refer his heaven-wrought conviction of his great salvation and the high calling to be a witness and apostle of Christ, so he did well that he "confessed not with flesh and blood" (Gal 1 16).

That "flesh and blood" does not imply a sense of inherent sinfulness is moreover shown in all passages where Christ is declared a partaker of such nature (Eph 6 12; He 2 14, where, however, we find in the original text the inverted phrase "blood and flesh"). Flesh in the sense of carnal nature (καρπος, sdrkhos, "earthly", AV uses sardoi in Rom 7 14).

6. Applied to the Carnal Nature, is to be in subjection to it. If man refuses to be under this higher law, and as a free agent permits the carnal nature to gain ascendancy over the spirit, the "flesh" becomes a revolting force (Gen 3 12; Jn 1 13; Rom 7 14; 1 Cor 3 1 3; Col 2 18; 1 Jn 2 16). Thus the fleshly or carnal mind, i.e. a mind in subjection to carnal nature, is opposed to the Divine spirit, who alone is a sufficient corrective, Christ having secured for us the power of overcoming (Rom 8 3), if we manifest a deep desire and an earnest endeavor to overcome (Gal 5 17 18).

Flesh in the sense of relationship, tribal connection, kith and kin. For examples, see what has been said above on Heb shêr." The Following are a few of those passages which in which básár is used: Gen 2 24; Relationship 27; Job 2 2; of the NT passages: Mt 19 5 8; Rom 1 3; 9 35 6. The expressions "bone" and "flesh" are found in combination (Gen 2 23; 28 17; Jgs 9 2; 2 S 5 1; 19 12 13; Eph 5 31, the latter in some MSS only). Some other subordinations of meanings might be added, for example where "flesh" takes almost the place of "person," as in Col 2 1, "as many as have not seen my face in the meaning flesh," i.e. have not known me personally, or ver 5, "ab sent in the flesh, yet am I with you in the spirit," H. L. E. KEBLING

FLESH AND BLOOD. See Flesh, 5.

FLESH-HOOK, flesh'hook (יַסְרָא לֵי, ma'alah, and pl. יַסְרָא לֵי, ma'alahhóth): One of the implements used around the sacrificial altar. According to the direction given to Moses (Ex 27 3; 31 6), it was to be made of brass, but later David felt impelled by "the Spirit" or "his spirit" that for use in the magnificent Temple of Solomon it should be made of gold (1 Ch 28 17). But Huram made it, with other altar articles, of "bright brass" (2 Ch 4 16). In Samuel's time, it was made with three hook-shaped tines, and was used in taking out the priest's share of the meat offering (1 S 2 13 14). With the other altar utensils (78), it was in the special charge of the Kohathites (Nu 4 14). The hooks mentioned in Ex 40 33 were altogether different and for another purpose. See Hook.

Leonard W. DOOLAN

FLESH-POT, flesh'pot (יוֹסֵד, vô'sed, "pot of flesh"): One of the six kinds of cooking utensils spoken of as pots or pans or caldrons or basins. Probably usually made of bronze or earthenware. The only mention of flesh-pots, specifically so named, is in Ex 16 3. See Foon.

FLIES, fliz. See FLY.

FLINT, flint (יַסְרָא לֵי, hålāmásáḥ [Dt 8 15; 32 13; Job 28 9; Ps 114 8], "בושי [Ex 4 25; Ezek 3 9], "כֹּר [Isa 5 28], "כֹּר [Job 22 24; Ps 89 49], הָגִים, הָגְיִים [Josh 5 21], סְפֹּלָנָה [Num 10 73]): The word hålāmásáḥ signifies a hard stone, though not certainly flint, and is used as a figure for hardness in Isa 50 7, "Therefore have I set my face like a flint." A similar use of כֹּר is found in Ezek 3 9, "As an adamant harder than flint have I made thy forehead," and Isa 5 28, "Their horses' hoofs shall be accounted as flint": and of סְפֹּלָנָה in Jer 5 3, "They have made their faces harder as a rock.

The same three words are used of the rock from which Moses drew water in the wilderness: hålāmásáḥ ([Dt 8 15; Ps 114 8]; "כֹּר (Ex 17 6; Dt 8 15; Ps 78 20; Isa 48 21); סְפֹּלָנָה (Num 10 73). "Côr and סְפֹּלָנָה are used oftenther than hålāmásáḥ for great rocks and cliffs, but כֹּר is used also for flint knives: see Ex 4 25. " כֹּר was used by the Zadokite for "sharp stone," and cut off the foreskin of her son," and in Josh 5 2: "Je said unto Joshua, Make thee knives of flint [AV "sharp knives"], and circumcise again the children of Israel the second time." Surgical implements of flint were used by the ancient Egyptians, and numerous flint chippings with occasional flint implements are found associated with the remains of early man in Syria and Pal. Flint and the allied mineral, chert, are found in great abundance in the limestone rocks of Syria, Pal and Egypt. See Rock.

FLOAT. See Cattle.

FLOOD, fluid: In AV not less than 13 words are rendered “flood,” though in RV we find in some passages “river,” “stream,” “tempest,” etc. The word is used for the deluge of Noah, πλωτός, mabhâl (Gen 6 17 ff); στασιλαθος, kataklestomos (Mt 24 38:39; Lk 17 27): the waters of the Red Sea, Γ�η, nāzâl (Ex 15 8): the Euphrates, γῆ, nāhār, “Your fathers dwelt of old time on the other side of the flood” (RV “beyond the River” Jos 24 2): the Nile, θησ. yôr, “the flood (RV ‘River’) of Egypt” (Am 8 9): the Jordan, πῆλος, nēhâr, “They went through the flood (RV ‘river’) on foot” (Ps 66 6): torrent, ρηχ, “as a flood (RV ‘tempest’) of mighty waters” (Isa 28 2): ποταμος, potamós, “The rain descended and the floods came” (Mt 7 25): πλημμένα, plēmména, “When a flood arose, the stream brake against that house” (Lk 6 45).

Figurative: γῆ, nābâl, “The floods of ungodly men (RV ‘ungodliness’) RVm ‘Behel Behal’ made me afraid” (2 S 22 5; Ps 18 4): also Yemen, yôr (Am 8 8 [AV]; Γη, shibbâloth (Ps 69 2); ρῆξ, shelteph (Dnl 11 22 [AV]); ρηχ, shelteph (Ps 32 6 [AV]); ποταμοφόρος, potamophoros (Rev 12 15 [AV]). See DELUGE OF NOAH.

FLOWER, flōr. See House; THRESHING-FLOOR.

FLOATE (FLOAT). See Raft; Ships and Boats.

FLOUR, flōr. See Bread; Food.

FLOURISH, flôr. See Bird; Food.

FLOWERS, flôr. (BLOOM, BLOSSOM, etc.):

(1) "Gâhôl, gîhôl, lit. “a small cup,” hence calyx or corolla of a flower (Ex 9 31, “The flax was in bloom”).

(2) "nēk, nëx (Gen 40 10, nîcâh, "a flower" or “blossom”; Job 15 33; Isa 18 5). These words are used of the early berries of the vine or olive.

(3) "qâmîn, "a flower"; pl. only, qîgîm, qîgîm (Cant 12 12, “The flowers appear on the earth”).

(4) "pērâh, pērâh, root to “burst forth” expresses an early stage of flowering; “blossom” (Isa 5 24; 18 5); “flower” (Nah 1 4, “The Flower of Lebanon linguæcho”). Used of artificial flowers in candlesticks (Ex 25 31 ff).

(5) "qîth, qîth, "flower" (Isa 40 6); pl. yître, yitre, "flowers" as architectural ornaments (1 K 6 18); "qîth, qîgîh, "the fading flower of his glorious beauty" (Isa 28 1:4; also Nu 17 8; Job 14 2, etc).

FLUTE, flût. See Music.

FLUX, flûks. See BLOODY FLUX; DYSENTERY.

FLY, fly, FLYS, flies (Bâhôd, "ârôhôb [Ex 8 21 ff]; Ps 78 45; 100 6; (1) LXX κυνόμαυα, kalauómâia; (2) LXX ἄλαμπα, alamâ, “bezzubh,” “bezzubh” (Ecol 10 1; Isa 7 18; Dnl 4 4; nûbâh, “to sprout” (Zec 9 17, AV “cheerful”).

In an interesting passage (Ecol 12 5 AV), the Hiphil fut. of nâdôc, meaning properly “to pierce or strike,” hence, to slight or reject, is tr. “flourish,” it is said of the old man “The almond tree shall flourish,” RV “blossom” (so Ewald, Delitzsch, etc); nâdôc has nowhere else this meaning: it is frequently rendered “contemn,” “despise,” etc. Other renderings are, “shall cause loathing” (Gesenius; Knobel, etc), “shall be despised,” “i.e. the enemy head.” The almond tree shall shake off its flowers, the silvery hairs falling like the fading white flowers of the almond tree; by others it is taken to indicate “sleeplessness,” the name of the almond tree (shâkhêth) meaning the watcher or early riser (cf Jer 11 11, “a rod of an almond-tree,” lit. “a wakeful or (early) tree”), the almond being the first of the trees to wake from the sleep of winter. See ALMOND.

“Flourish” appears once only in the NT, in AV, as tr of anathôllo, “to put forth anew,” or “to make put forth anew” (Phil 4 10): “Your care for me hath flourished again,” RV “Ye have revived your thought for me.”

domestica). Some species of blue-bottle fly (Calliphora) might also suit.

The other word, "zabhâbîh", occurs in Eccl 10:1. "Dead flies cause the oil of the perfumer to send forth an evil odor; so doth a little folly outweigh wisdom and honor." and Isa 7:15. "And it shall come to pass that day, that ten shall be slain for one in all the land of Judah which dieth. And I will cause to cease from the city which is called Peace, and shall make to cease in the city which is called Wealth." The house fly would perfectly fit the reference in each, but that Isaiah would seem to suggest rather one of the horse flies (Tabanidae) or gad flies (Oestridae). Whatever fly may be meant, it is used as a symbol for the military power of Egypt, as the bee for that of Assyria.

Owing to deficiencies in public and private hygiene, and also for other reasons, house flies and others are unusually abundant in Pal and Egypt and are agents in the transmission of cholera, typhoid fever, ophthalmia and anthrax. Glossina morsitans, the tsetse fly, which is fatal to many domestic animals, and Glossina palpalis, which transmits the sleeping sickness, are abundant in tropical Africa, but do not reach Egypt proper. See PLAGUES.

ALFRED ELY DAY

FLY (vb.; ἄφην, áphthô, πτεροφάνη, πτερόφανος, or contracted, πτέρων): Used in preference to "flee" or "fled". "To fly" is used: (1) Literally, of birds, ἄφην (Gen 1:20; Ps 56:6); ἀπλήθ (Dt 24:49), of sparks (Job 5:7); of the arrow (Ps 91:5); of the serpent (Isa 6:6); of an angel (Dn 12:1, ἀφθηκ, "to be caused to fly"); of swift action or movement (Ps 18:10; Jer 48:40); of people (Isa 11:14); of a fleet (Isa 60:6; 1 Sm 15:18, 19; 14:32, ἀσάθ, "to do, etc." (2)). Figuratively, of a dream (Job 20:8); of man's transitory life (Ps 80:10); of riches (Prov 25:5); of national glory (Hos 9:11).

For "fly" Rev has "soar" (Job 39:26), "fly down" (Isa 11:14); for "flying" (Isa 31:5) ARV has "hovering."

FOAL, fôl. See Colt.

FOAM, fôm (Gen 38, keèph [Hos 10:7]; ἀφρός, áphro, aphro) [Lk 9:39], ἀφφήλτω, ἀφφίλτω [Mk 18:20], ἐπισφίλτω, ἐπισφύλτω [Jude vers 13]): Keèph from ἀφάγο, "to break to pieces," or "to break forth into great anger," is used often in the sense of "wrath" or "anger" (e.g. Nu 1:58; Ps 38:1, etc.), and in this passage has been rendered "twists" or "chirps," "As for Samaria, her king is cut off, as foam [καταρρίπτομαι τοῦν], the sea, upon the water." (Hos 10:7). The other references are from the NT. In Jude, evil-doers or false teachers are compared to the "wild waves of the sea, foaming out their own shame." In Mk and Lk the references are to the boy with a dumb spirit who foamed at the mouth.

FODDER, fod'r. See PROVENDER.

FOLD, fold, FOLDING, folding (vb.; παλότρωμοι, ἄφλακθοι, ἄφλακτος; διάρροι, διαρρόος): The vb. occurs only 3 t in AV, and in each instance represents a different word; we have ἄφλακθοι to claspy" (Eccl 4:5), "The fool foldeth his hands together" (cf Prov 6:10); ἄφλακθοι, "interweave" (Nah 1:9), "folden together as thorns," ERV "like tangled thorns," ARV "entangled like thorns"; see ENTANGLING; helian to roll or fold for (Hos 10:2) quoted from Prov 26:23, XX:), RV "As a mantle shalt thou roll them up."

Folding occurs as tr of γλίττω, "turning" or "rolling" (1 K 6 34 bis, folding leaves of door). See also House. W. L. WALKER

FOLK, fôk: The tr of ἄθλος, 'am, ἄθλος, "a people or nation" (Gen 33:15, "some of the folk that are with me"); Prov 30:26, "The conies are but a feeble folk"); of ἀνάστησις, l'om, with the same meaning (Jer 51:58, "the folk in the fire"); RV "the nations for the fire"); "sick folk" is the tr of ἁπαρροστος, ἀρρόστος, not strong (Mk 6:5); of τῶν ἁπαρροστῶν, part. of ἀπαρροστεῖν, "to be without strength," "weak," "sick" (Jn 5:3, RV "them that were sick"); "sick folks," pl. of ἁπαρροστην, "without strength," RV "sick folk" (Acts 5:16).

W. L. WALKER

FOLLOW, fol'ô (Gen, 'abhar, ἄθλος, ἄθλος, ἄθλος, ἄθλος, ἄθλος; ἀκολουθεῖν, ἀκολουθεῖν, δικτόν, δικάκτον): Frequently the tr of 'abhar, "after," e.g. Nu 14:24, "hath followed me fully," lit. "fulfilled after me" (Nu 32:11, 12; Dt 1:36; Am 7:15); ἄθλαβον is "to pursue, and is often so tr; it is tr in "follow" (Ps 23:6; Isa 6:11, etc.); "follow after" (Gen 44:44; Ex 14:4); reghelm, "foot," is several times tr "follow" (lit. "at the foot of"); Ex 11:8; Jgs 8:5, etc.); ἄθλαβον, "to go after, (Dt 4:3; 1 K 1:3 K); ἄθλαβον, "to go after" (Gen 24:5; Jgs 2:19; etc.), ἄθελον, "to cause to cleave to" is "follow hard after" (1 S 14:23; Ps 63:8, etc.).

In the NT, in addition to ἀκολουθεῖν (Mt 4:20, 22:25, etc.) various words and phrases are rendered "follow," e.g. Dc 5:14, "Come after me" (Mt 4:19, "Follow me," RV "Come ye after me"); δικτόν, "to pursue" (Lk 17:23; 1 Thess 5:15, RV "follow after," etc.); miândomai, "to imitate" (He 13:7, "whose faith follow, RV "imitate their faith"); 2 Thess 3:7; 3 Jn 11); compounds of ἀκολουθεῖν with ἐξ, παρά, sun, etc. (2 Pet 1:16; Mk 16:20; Acts 16:17; Mk 5:37, etc.).

ERV "Follow after faithfulness" makes an important change in Ps 37:3, where AV has "and verily thou shalt be fed," but ARV has "feed securely or verily thou shalt be fed." For "attained" (1 Tim 4:6) RV gives "followed until now."

FOOD, food: 1. VEGETABLE FOODS 2. Cereals 3. Leguminous Plants II. ANIMAL FOOD

LITERATURE

In a previous art. (see BREAD) it has been shown that in the Bible "bread" usually stands for food in general and how this came to be so. In a complementary article on MEALS the methods of preparing and serving food will be dealt with. This article is devoted specifically to the foodstuffs of the Hebrews in the Bible. Here are dealt with more esp. the objects of food in use among the Hebrews in Bible times. These are divisible into two main classes.

1. Vegetable Foods—Orients in general are vegetarians, rather than flesh eaters, and there is some reason to believe that primitive man was a vegetarian (see Gen 2:8; Habits 3:2). It would seem, indeed, from a comparison of Gen 1:29 with 9 3 tf that Divine permission to eat the flesh of animals was first given to Noah after the Deluge, and then only on condition of drawing off the blood in a prescribed way (cf. the kosher [kasher] meat of the Jews of today).

2. Cereals and ERV "corn." The two most important of these in the nearer East are wheat (beitah) and barley (se'orim). The most primitive way of using the wheat as food was to pluck the fresh ears (Lev 23:14; 2 K 4:42), remove the husks by rubbing in the hands (Dt 23:25; Mt 12:1), and eat the grains raw. A common practice in all lands and periods, observed by the fellahen of Syria today, has been to parch or roast the ears and eat the parched corn (ERV "grain") so often mentioned in the OT, which with bread and vinegar (sour wine) constituted the meal of the reapers to which Boaz invited Ruth (Ruth 2:14).

Later it became customary to grind the wheat into flour (kemah), and, by bolting it with a fine sieve, to obtain the "fine flour" (geith) of our EV, which, of course, was then made into "bread" (which see) by the Hebrews (maggah) or with (lehem jamel, Lev 7:13).

Meal, both of wheat and of barley, was prepared in very early times by means of the primitive rubbing-stones, which excavations at Lachish, Gezer and elsewhere show survived into the introduction of the hand-mill (see MnL.; cf. PEPS, 1902, 326). Barley (se'orim) has always furnished the principal food of the poorer classes, and, like wheat, has been made into bread (Jgs 7:13; Jn 6:19). Less frequently mentioned (Ex 19:7) is mustard (Ayisah; see PRA), which was best used. (For details of baking, bread-making, etc., see BREAD, 111, 1, 2, 3.)

Vegetable foods of the pulse family (leguminosae) are represented in the OT chiefly by lentils and beans. But when they bear an honor term (e.g., the "barley" de

3. Legumi—notes edible "herbs" in general (RVm, nous Plants of Isa 61:11, "things that are sown").

The lentils (adaxathim) were and are considered very loothsome and nutritious. It was of "red lentils" that Jacob bewailed his fated potage (Gen 25:29,34), a stew, probably, in which the lentils were flavored with onions and other ingredients, as we find it done in Syria today. Lentils, beans, celery, etc., were sometimes ground and mixed with flour into "pisgah" (Leguminosa; see PRA). They were used at Gaza roasted also, and eaten with oil and salt, like parched corn.

The children of Israel, when in the wilderness, are said to have looked back wistfully on the "cucumbers . . . melons . . . leeks . . . onions, and the garlic" of Egypt (Nu 11:5). All these things we find later were grown in Pal. In addition, at least four varieties of the bean, the chickpea, various species of chickory and endive, the bitter herbs of our overtaxed ruts (Lev 11:35), mustard (Mt 13:31), and many other things available for food, are mentioned in the Mish, our richest source of information on this subject. Cucumbers (kshehuv'im) were then, as now, much used. The oriental variety is much less fibrous and more succulent and digestible than ours, and supplies the thirsty traveler often with a fine substitute for water where water is scarce or bad. The poor in such cities as Cairo, Beirut and Damascus live largely on bread and cucumber for their meals. Their ears are eaten raw, with or without salt, between meals, but also often stuffed and cooked and eaten at meal time. Onions (faltim), garlic (shummat) and leeks (hatir) are still much used in Pal as in Egypt. They are used with bread, though also used for flavoring in cooking, and, like cucumbers, were salted and eaten as a relish with meat (ZDPV, IX, 14).

Men in utter extremity sometimes "plucked saltwort" (malath) and ate the leaves, either raw or boiled, and made "the roots of the broom" their food (Job 30:4).

In Lev 15:9 it is implied that, when Israel came into the land to possess it, they should "plant all manner of trees for food." They

4. Food of doubtless found such trees in the goodly Trees land in abundance, but in the natural the way nature things needed to plant more. Many olive trees remain fruitful to extreme old age, as for example those shown the tourist in the garden of Gethsemane, but many more require replanting. Then the olive after planting requires ten or fifteen years to fruit, and trees of a quicker growth, like the fig, are then usually planted. These are best suited for the Mediterranean climate, and depended on for fruit in the meantime. It is significant that Jotham in his parable makes the olive the first choice of the trees to be their king (Jgs 9:9), and the olive tree to respond, "Should I leave my fatness, which God and man honor in me, and go to wave to and fro over the trees?" (ERVm).

The berries of the olive (zayith) were doubtless eaten, then as now, though nowhere in Scripture it is expressly so stated. The chief use was probably as oil, as ever, in furnishing "oil" (q.v.), but they are eaten in the fresh state, as also after being soaked in brine, by rich and poor alike, and are shipped in great quantities. Olive trees are still more or less abundant in Palestine, and the sons of Hebron, on the borders of the rich plains of Esdraelon, Phoenicia, Sharon and Philistia, in the vale of Shechem, the plain of Moreh, and in the trans-Jordanic regions of Gilead and Bashan. They are esteemed as good and best part of the towns, and the culture of them is being revived around Jerus, in the Jordan valley and elsewhere throughout the land. They are beautiful to behold in all stages of their growth, but esp. in spring when they bear an abundance of blossoms, which in the breeze fall in showers like snowflakes, a fact that gives point to Job's words, "He shall cast off his flower as the olive-tree" (16:33). The mode of gathering the fruit is still about what is described in ancient times (cf Ex 27:20).

Next in rank to the olive, according to Jotham's order, though first as an article of food, is the fig (in the OT Fadenah, in the NT sakik), whose "sweetness" is praised in the parable (Jgs 9:11). It is in the principal trees of the desert (De 16:6), and found in all parts, in many spontaneously, and is the emblem of peace and prosperity (Dt 8:8; Jgs 10:1; K 4:25; Mic 4:4; Zec 3:10; 1 Mac 14:12). The best fig and olive orchards are carefully preserved, first in the spring when the buds are swelling, sometimes again when the second crop is sprouting, and again after the first rains in the autumn. The "first-ripe fig" (bikkarah, Isa 26:4; Jer 24:2), i.e. the early fig which grows on last year's wood, is eaten raw as a great delicacy, and is often eaten while it is young and green. The late fig (b'orim) is the kind dried in the sun and put up in quantities for use out of season. Among the Greeks and the Romans, as well as among the Hebrews, dried figs were most extensively used. When pressed in a mold they formed the "cakes of figs" (dbalakah) mentioned in the OT (1 S 25:18; 1 Ch 12:40), doubtless about as are found today in Syria and Smyrna, put up for home use and for shipment. It was much a fig-cake that was presented as a poultice to Hezekiah's boil (Isa 38:21; of 2 K 20:7). As the fruit-buds of the fig appear before the leaves, a tree full of leaves and without fruit would be counted barren' (Mt 21:19). Is. 6:10; of Isa. 26:4; Jer 24:2; Hos 9:10; Nah 3:12; Mt 5:18; 19:4; Lk 18:17).

Grapes (ranbhim), often called "fruit of the vines" (Mt 26:29), have always been a much-prized article of food in the Orient. They are closely associated in the Bible with the fig (cf. "every man under his vine and under his fig-tree," 1 K 4:25). Like the olive, the fig, and the date-palm, grapes are indigenous to Syria, the soil and climate being most favorable to their growth and perfection. Southern Pal esp. yields a rich abundance of choice grapes, somewhat as in patriarchal times (Gen 49:11-12). J. T. Haddad, a native Syrian, for many years in the employment of the Turkish government, tells of a variety in the famous valley of Esdoh near Hebron, he says, which yields twenty-eight pounds (cf. Nu 13:23). Of the grapevine there is nothing wasted; the young leaves are used as a green vegetable, and the old are fed to sheep and goats. The branches cut off in pruning, as well as the dead trunk, are used to make charcoal, or for firewood. The failure of such a fruit was naturally regarded as a judgment from Jehovah (Ps 105:33; Jer 5:17; Hos 2:12; Joel 1:7). Grapes, like figs, were both enjoyed in their natural state, and by exposure to the sun dried into raisins (כֵּדים, the "dried grapes") of Nu 6:3. In this form they were esp. well suited to the use of travelers and soldiers (1 Sam 8:18; 1 Ch 12:40). The meaning of the word rendered "raisin-cake," ARV "a cake of raisins," is uncertain. In the Bible the grape product of the land went to the making of wine (q.v.). Some doubt if the Hebrew knew grape-syrup, but the fact that the Aram. dib, corresponding to Heb דבּחא, is used to denote both the natural and artificial honey (grape-syrup), may indicate that they knew the latter (cf. Gen 43:11; Ezk 27:17; and see Honey).

Less prominent was the fruit of the mulberry fig-tree (or sycomore) (שְׁכֵמָדָה, of the date-palm (תּוּמָד), the dates of which, according to the Mishnah, were both eaten as they came from the tree, and dried in clusters and pressed into cakes for transport; the pomegranate (לַעֲפָה), the "apple of" (see Apple), or quince, according to others; the husks (לֶקְקָמ), i.e. the pods of the carob tree (לַעֲפָר), are treated elsewhere. Certain nuts were favorite articles of food—pistachio nuts (בֶּטֶן), almonds (שְׁכֵמָדָה) and walnuts (עָפָד), and certain spices and vegetables were much in use (קָמִים, lentils, dill (אֲבֵית), mint (שְׁפֹרֵב) and mustard (שְׁפָרֵב), which see. Salt (מלָח), of course, played an important part, then as now, in the cooking and in the life of the Orientals. To "eat the salt" of a person was synonymous with eating his bread (Ex 4:14), and a "covenant of salt" was held inviolate (Nu 18:19; 2 Ch 13:5).

II. Animal Food.—Anciently, even more than now in the East, flesh food was much more used than among western peoples. In the first place, in Israel and among other Sem peoples, it was confined by law to the use of such animals and birds as were regarded as "clean" (see Clean; Uncleanliness), or speaking according to the categories of Lev 11:23; Dt 14:4-20, domestic animals and game (see Driver on Dt 14:4-20). Then the poverty of the paesantry from time immemorial had tended to limit the use of meat to special occasions, such as family festivals (חגּים), the entertainment of an honored guest (Gen 18:7; 2 S 12:4), and the sacrificial and libatical sacrifices.

The goat (עָטָא, etc., the "kid of the goats") (Lev 4:23; 28 AV), was more prized for food by the ancient Hebrews than by modern Orientals, by whom goats are kept chiefly for their milk mostly for the making of cheese (cf. Prov 30:33). For this reason they are still among the most valued possessions of rich and poor (cf. Gen 30:33; 32:14 with 1 S 26:2). A kid, as less valuable than a lamb, was naturally the reader victim when meat was required (cf. Ex 16:22; 1 K 4:25). The sheep of Pal, as of Egypt, are mainly of the fat-tailed species (Ovis aries), the tail of which was forbidden as ordinary food and had to be offered with certain other portions of the fat (Ex 29:22; Lev 3:3). To kill a lamb in honor of a guest is one of the highest acts of Bedouin hospitality. As a rule only the lambs are killed for meat, and they only in honor of some guest or festive occasion (cf. 1 S 25:18; 1 K 1:19). Likewise the "calves of the herd" specified as food for the "poor" though the flesh of the neat cattle, male and female, was eaten. The "fatted calf" of Lk 15:23 will be recalled, as also the "fattings" and the "stalled" (stall-fed) ox of the OT (Prov 16:17). A sharp contrast suggestive of the growth of luxury in Israel is seen by the comparison of 2 S 17:28 f. with 1 K 4:22 f. The food furnished David and his hardy followers at Mahanaim was "wheat, and barley, and meal, and parched grain, and beans, and lentils, and parched pulse, and honey, and butter, and sheep, and cheese of the herd," while the daily provision for Solomon's table was "thirty measures of fine flour, and threescore measures of meal, ten fat oxen, and twenty oxen out of the pastures, and a hundred gazelles, and a thousand young deer, and a great deal of honey, and oil in abundance, and dainties in great variety" (1 K 4:24).

Milk of large and small animals was a staple article of food (Dt 32:14; Prov 27:27). It was usually kept in skins, as among the Arabs today (Jgs 4:19). We find a generic term often used (בְּסֹר) which covers also cream, clabber and cheese (Prov 30:33). The proper designation of cheese is ג'בּחא (Job 10:10), but חִלָּב also is used both for ordinary milk and for a cheese made directly from sweet milk (cf. 1 S 17:18, הַרְבִּית הָסַּלְבְּא, and our "cottage cheese"). See Milk.

Honey (דבּחא, נָפֶחַח זַא-קִצֹּפְתִּים), so often mentioned with milk, is ordinary bees' honey (see Honey). The expression "honey" in the combination דבּחא והַצָלָב, for which Pal was praised, most likely means דבּחא תַּמְדִים, i.e. "date-juice." It was much prized and relished (Ps 19:10; Prov 16:24), and seems to have been a favorite food for children (Isa 7:13). Of game seven species are mentioned (Dt 14:5). The gazelle and the hart were the typical animals of the chase, much prized for their flesh (Dt 15:12), and doubtless supplied the venison of Esau's "savory meat" (Gen 27:28; 27:14).

Of fish as food little is said in the OT (see Nu 11:5; Jer 16:11; Ezek 47:10; Joel 9:12). No particular species is named, although thirty-six species are said to be found in the waters of the Jordan valley alone. But we may be sure that the fish which the Hebrews enjoyed in Egypt, "for nought" (Nu 11:5) had their successors in Canaan (Kenedy). Trade in cured fish was carried on by Tyrian merchants with Jews in Nebuchad's day (Neh 13:16), and there must have been a fish market at or near the fish gate (cf. 3). The Sea of Galilee in later times was the center of a great fish industry, as is made clear by the Gospels and by Jos. In the market of Tiberias today fresh fish are sold in great quantities, and a thriving trade in salt fish is carried on. The "small fishes of the sea," whose two great miracles of feeding were doubtless of this kind, as at all times they have been a favorite form of provision for a journey in hot countries.

As to the exact price of food in ancient times little is known. In 1 S 20:2 K 2:7, "all that one בָּשָׂר of fine flour, and two of barley, sold for a shekel" (cf. Mt 10:29). For birds allowed as food see Dt 14:11 and arts. on Clean; Uncleanliness.
Pigeons and turtle doves find a place in the ritual of various sacrifices, and so are to be reckoned as “clean” for ordinary uses as well. The species of domestic fowl found there today seem to have been introduced during the Pers period (cf 2 Esd 1:30; Mt 23:37; 26:44, etc.). It is thought that the fowl almost a definition of nabhal in Is 55:12: “For the fowl will speak folly, and his heart will work iniquity, to practise profaneness, and to utter error against Jehovah, to make empty the soul of the hungry, and to cause the drink of the thirsty to fail.” Abigail described her husband, Nabhol, as “a son of Belial” (RV “worthless fellow”), “for as his name is, so is he” (1 S 25:25), and what we read of him bears out this character. Other occurrences of the words support the above meaning; they are generally associated with some form of wickedness, frequently with base and unnatural lewdness (Gen 34:7; Lk 22:21; Josh 7:15; Jgs 19:23:24; 20:6:10; 2 S 13:12). When in Ps 14:1; 53:1 it is said, “The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God,” it is followed by the statement, “They are corrupt, they have done abominable works,” showing that more than “folly” is implied. In Isa 32:6, nabhal is translated “vile person” and nabhal “villain,” RV “fool” and “fool,” Jer 29:23; habal, implying loud boasting in AV “fool.” Habal, rather, “arrogant,” which RV adopts (Ps 5:5; 73:3; 75:4, m “fools”); sakhal, “a fool,” also occurs (Gen 31:28; 1 S 13:13, etc) for which word see (4) below, also yi’al “to be empty,” “to be or become foolish” (Nu 12:11; Is 19:20; Jer 5:4; 50:36)

In the Hebrew or Wisdom literature, which, within the Bible, is contained in Job, Prov (esp.), Eccl, Cant, some Ps and certain portions of the prophetic writings, “fool” and “folly” were distinctive words. Their significance is best seen in contrast with “Wisdom.” This was the outcome of careful observation and long pondering on actual life in the light of religion and the Divine revelation. Wisdom had its seat in God and was imparted to those who feared Him (“the fear of Jehovah is the beginning [chief part] of knowledge” Prov 1:7). Such wisdom was the essence of life, and to be without it was to walk in the ways of death and destruction. The fool was he who was thoughtless, careless, conceited, self-sufficient, indifferent to God and His Will, or who might even oppose and scoff at religion and wise instruction. See Wisdom. Various words are used to denote “the fool” and “foolish”:

(1) nabhal (Job 2:10; 30:8; Ps 53:1; Prov 17:7-21); nabhål (Job 42:8; Is 9:17) (see above).

(2) wull, one of the commonest, the idea conveyed by which is that of one who is haughty, impatient, self-sufficient (Prov 12:15; 15:6; 16:22), despising advice and instruction (1:7; 14:9; 24:7) ready to speak and act without thinking (10:14; 12:16; 20:3); quick to get angry, quarrel and cause strife (11:29; 14:17; “wusselith”; 29:9); unrestrained in his anger (6:8; 21:4; Prov 12:17; “wusselith”; 13:14); silly, stupid even with brute stupidity (Prov 7:22; 26:11; 27:22; of Is 19:11; Jer 4:22) he is associated with “transgression” (Ps 107:17; Prov 13:15; 17:18,19), with “sin” (24:9), with the “soffer” (ib); “wusselith,” “foolishness” occurs (Ps 38:5; 69:3; Prov 13:16; “foolie,” 14:8,23,24, etc).

(3) kṣēl is the word most frequent in Prov. It is probably from a root meaning “thickness,” “sluggishness,” suggesting a slow, self-confident person, but it is used with a wide range. Self-confidence (Prov 14:18) but it means rashness (Eccl 2:14); hate of instruction (Prov 1:21; 18:2); thoughtlessness (10:23; 17:24); self-exposure (14:33; 15:2; 18:7; 29; 11:9; Eccl 5:1; 10:12); anger and contention (Prov 18:6; 19:1; Ecc}

FOOL, FOOL, FOOLY (םַקָּל; nabhal, נָבָּל, ἐβαλ, תַּקָּל, כַּקָּל, kṣēl, sakhal, and forms; אָפָל, παθρόν, אֲפַרְפָּרִיָּה, בַּפַּרְפָּרִיָּה, בָּפָרָפָרִיָּה, נָבָּלָה, nabhal)
9; rage (Prov 14 16; 17 12); indolence and improvidence (Eccl 4 5; Prov 21 20); slyly merriment (Eccl 4; 7). "Bruteishness" (Prov 25 11; cf Ps 49 10; 92 6); it is associated with slandering (Prov 10 18), with evil (13 19).

(4) ἱππάδ, ἵππαδ, ἱππαθά, also occur. These are probably from a root meaning "to be stopped up" (Cheyne), and are generally taken as denoting thickheadedness, but they are used in a stronger sense than mere foolishness (cf 1 S 26 21; 2 S 24 10, etc). These words do not occur in Prov, but in Eccl 2 12; 7 26; ἱππαθά is associated with "madness" (Wickedness is folly, and ... foolishness, madness.

(5) πτέρν, "simple," is only once tr "foolish" (Prov 9 6 AV).

(6) βαρ, "brutish," is tr 4 "foolish" (Ps 73 22 AV, RV "brutish").

(7) ἱππάδ, "insipid," "untempered," is tr 4 "foolish" (Lam 2 14); ἱππάδ, "insipidity" (Job 1 22; foolishly" ERY, "with foolishness"); 24 12; "foolish"; Jer 23 13, "foolly," AV "unsavoury, or, an absurd thing"

(8) ἱππάδ (Job 4 18): "Behold, he putteth no trust in his servants; and his angels charge with folly" [Delitzsch, "imperfection, others, "error", AV "nor in his angels in whom he put light"]

II. In the Apocrypha.—In the continuation of the Wisdom literature in Wisd and Ecclus, "fool" frequently occurs with a signification similar to that in Prov; in Wisd we have aphron (12 24; 15 5, etc), in Ecclus mēros (18 18; 19 11; 20 13; 21 18; 16 etc).

III. In the New Testament.—In the NT we have various words tr "fool," "foolish," "foolly," etc, in the ordinary acceptance of these terms; aphron, "mindless," "witless" (Lk 11 40; 12 20; 1 Cor 15 38); aphron, "want of mind or wisdom" (2 Cor 11 1; Mk 7 22); anōia, "want of understanding" (2 Tim 3 9); mōrōn, "to make dull," "foolish" (Rom 1 22; 1 Cor 2 20); mēros, "dull," "stupid" (Mt 7 26; 23 17; 25 2; 1 Cor 1 28; mēra, "foolishness" (1 Cor 1 18, etc), mērologia, "foolish talk" (Eph 5 4).

In Mt 5 22 Our Lord says: "Whosoever shall say [to his brother], Thou fool [mōre], shall be in danger of the hell of fire [the Gehenna of fire]." Two explanations of this word are possible: (1) it is not used for "out of the mouth of the earth" as was applied by Jesus Himself to the Pharisees (Mt 23 17 19), but represents the Heb mōrāh, "rebel," applied in Nu 20 10 by Moses to the people, ye rebels (for which he was believed to be excluded from the promised land; cf ver 12; hence we have in RVm or mōreh, a Heb expression of condemnation"

(2) that, as Our Lord spoke in the Aram. It is the Gr τρ of a word representing the Heb nābāh, "vile, or worthless fellow," atheist, etc (Ps 14 1; 53 1).

W. L. WALKER

FOOLERY, fō'öl-er-i: The pl. "fooleries" occurs Ecclus 22 13 AV: "Talk not much with a fool, ... thou shalt never be defiled with his fooleries." The Gr word is ἄφρονια, entinagmos, or "a striking off from entinagmos, "to strike into, "cast at," etc (1 Macc 2 30; 2 Macc 4 41; 11 11). RV renders "Thou shalt not be defileed in his onslaught, "m defiled: in his onslaught turn." The meaning is most probably "with what he throws out, "i.e. his foolish or vile speeches, as if it were slaver.

FOOT, fōt (ἡπέτα, ἴππετα, ἵππετα, ἵππατος; only twice in LXX passages: 2 S 22 37 = Ps 18 36, where it probably means ankle]; πτέρν, πτέρνοι). The dusty roads of Pal and other eastern lands make a much greater care of the foot necessary than we are accustomed to bestow upon them. The absence of socks or stockings, the use of sandals and low shoes rather than boots and sandals, to an even greater degree, the frequent habit of walking barefoot make it necessary to wash the feet repeatedly every day. This is always done when entering the house, esp. the better upper rooms which are usually carpeted. It is a common dictate of good manners to perform this duty to a visitor, either personally or through a servant; at least water for washing has to be present (Gen 18 4; Lk 7 44). This has therefore become almost synonymous with the bestowal of hospitality (1 Tim 5 10). At an early date this service was considered one of the lowest tasks of servants (1 S 26 41), probably because the youngest and least trained servants were charged with the task, or because of the idea of defilement connected with the foot. It was, for the time, if rendered voluntarily, a service which betokened complete devotion. Jesus taught the greatest lesson of humility by performing this humble service to His disciples (Jn 13 4 15). The undoing of the defilement of souls and leather thongs of the sandals (Mt 1 7; Lk 3 16; Jn 1 27) seems to refer to the same menial duty.

Often the feet and shoes were dusted on the highway, as is being done in the Orient to this day, but if it were done in an ostentatious manner in the presence of a person or a companion a defilement to a stranger, it was understood in the same sense in which the cutting in two of the tablecloth was considered in the days of knighthood: a sign of utmost rejection and separation (Mt 10 14; Acts 13 51).

The roads of the desert were not only dusty but rough, and the wanderer was almost sure to ruin his ill-made shoes and wound his weary feet. A special providence of God protected the children of Israel from this common experience during the long journey through the wilderness. "Thy raiment waxed not old upon thee, neither did thy foot swell, these forty years" (Dt 8 4; 29 5).

In the house shoes and sandals were never worn; even the most delicate would put on shoes only when going out (Dt 28 56). The shoes were left outside of the house or in a vestibule. This was esp. done in the house of God and at the time of prayer, for whenever or wherever that might be, the law was not relaxed. Why was it thus: "for thou art placed in the place wherein thou standest is holy ground" (Ex 3 5; Josh 5 15; Acts 7 33). This custom still prevails among the Moslems of our day. Probably it was the idea of defilement through contact with the common ground which gave rise to its moral application by the Preacher, "Keep thy foot when thou goest to the house of God" (Eccl 5 1 [Heb 4 17]).

Nakedness of the feet in public, esp. among the wealthier classes, who used to wear shoes or sandals, was a token of mourning (Ezk 24 17 and probably also Jer 2 25 and Isa 20 2-4). A peculiar ceremony is referred to in Dt 25 9 10, whereby a brother-in-law, who refused to perform his duty under the Levirate law, was publicly put to shame. And his name shall be called in Israel, The house of him that hath his shoe loosed." See also Ruth 4 7 8.

Numerous are the phrases in which the word "foot" or "footh" is used in Bib. language. "To cover the foot" (1 S 24 3) is synonymous with obeying a call of Nature. "To speak with the feet" is expressive of the eloquence of abusive and obscene gesticulation among oriental people, where hands, eyes and feet are the main means for the expression of meaning. "To sit at the feet," means to occupy the place of a learner (Dt 33 3;

Lk 10:39; Acts 22:3). Vanquished enemies had to submit to being trodden upon by the conqueror (a ceremony often represented on Egyptian monuments; Josh 10:24; Ps 8:6; 110:1; cf Isa 49:23). St. James warns against an undue humiliation of those who join us in the service of God, even though they be poor or mean-looking, by bidding them to take a lowly place at the feet of the richer members of the congregation (Jas 2:3). We read of dying Jacob that “he gathered up his feet into the bed,” for he had evidently used his bed as a couch, on which he had been seated while delivering his charge to his sons (Gen 48:2 “Foot” or “feet” is sometimes used euphemistically for the genitals (Dt 28:57; Ezek 16:25). In Dt 11:10 an interesting reference is made to some Egyptian mode of irrigating the fields, “the watering with the foot,” which mode would be unnecessary in the promised land of Canaan which “drinketh water of the rain of heaven.” It is, however, uncertain whether this refers to the water-wheels worked by a treadmill arrangement or whether reference is made to the many tributary channels, which, according to representations on the Egyptian monuments, intersected the gardens and fields and which could be stopped or opened by placing or removing a piece of sod at the mouth of the channel. This was usually done with the foot. Frequently we find references to the foot in expressions connected with journeyings and pilgrimages, which formed so large a part in the experiences of Israel, e.g. Ps 91:12, “lest thou dash thy foot against a stone”; 94:15, “My foot slippeth”; 121:3 “He will not suffer thy foot to be moved,” and many more. Often the reference is to the “walk,” i.e. the moral conduct of life (73:2; Job 23:11; 31:5).

Figurative: In the metaphorical language of Isa 62:7 “the feet” are synonymous with “the coming.”

FOOTSTOOL, föót’stóôl (אַבֵּשֶׁת, kebhes; τῶν ὀστούν, hapōdōtan, “coddon on”: The 15 Scripture references to this term may be classified as literal or figurative. Of the former are the two passages: 2 Ch 9:18 and Jas 2:3. In these the footstool was a sort of step or support for the feet placed before the throne or any pretentious seat. Of figurative uses, there are the following groups:

(1) Of the earth: Isa 66:1; Mt 5:35; Acts 7:49. (2) Of the ark: 1 Ch 28:2. (3) Of the Temple: Ps 99:5; 133:7; Lam 2:1; cf Isa 60:13. (4) Of heathen enemies subdued by the Messianic King: Ps 110:1; Mt 22:44 AV; Mk 12:36; Lk 20:43; Acts 3:35; He 1:13; 10:13. Thus the uses of this term are mainly metaphorical and symbolic of subjection, either to God as universal Lord or to God’s Son as the representative right. Cf 1 Cor 15:25-27, in which all things, including death, are represented as subject to Christ and placed beneath His feet.

FOOT, föót (בֵּשׁ, בֵּשׁי; לָכֵנָה, ὁ βούς; מִזְטָה, mezōtah; νόστος, nóstos; πόδων, pódōn), from אַבֵּשֶׁת [conji.], רַכָּה, ἀεικάβ, ηβότι [conji.]; ἄντι, ἀντί, ἀντίς, από, ἐξ, ἐκ, δία, διὰ [acc.]; εἰπέ, ἐπί [dat. and acc.], μετά, περί [gen.], πρῶτος, πρῶτος [gen. and acc.], τρώγει, ἀπέρει [gen. and prep.]): ERV and ARV give in many cases more literal or more accurate renderings than those in AV.

In the NT the most important terms, from a doctrinal point of view are antì, “face to face,” “over against,” “instead,” “on behalf of,” peri, “around,” “about,” “concerning,” huper, “over,” “on behalf of.” The first has been claimed as stating the substitutionary nature of Christ’s sacrifice as contrasted with huper and peri, more frequently used of it. But, although antì in the NT often means “instead of,” answering to, “it does not necessarily imply substitution. On the other hand, huper is sometimes used in that sense (see Trench, Synonyms). “Here as always the root idea of the prep., the root idea of the case, and the context must all be considered” (Robertson, Grammar, 124). Antì is found in this connection only in Mt 20:28, and Mk 10:45. In Mt 26:28; Mk 14:24, we have peri, also in He 10:6.8.15.16; 1 Pet 3:18; 1 Jn 2:2; 4:10. Lk 19:19.20 has huper, which is the word commonly used by Paul, as in Rom 6:4; 2 Cor 11:3; 12:14 here; also by John in his Gospel, 6:51; 10:11, etc., and 1 Jn 3:16; also He 2:2; 10:12; 1 Pet 2:21; 3:18; 4:1; and in Rom 8:3 it is peri.

FORAY, fö-rã (2 S 3:22). See WAR.

FORBEAR, for-ber (יִבְרָא, ibra; αὐξομαι, anakomai): In the OT ibráh, “to leave off,” is the word most frequently transliterated “forbear” (Ex 23:5, etc); dámám, “to be silent,” hásakk, “to keep back,” máštakk, “to draw in or stretch out,” occurs once each, RV renders Esd 24:17 (dámám, “Silent, but not aloud,” m “Heb be silent”; Prov 24:11 (hásakk, “See that thou hold back,” or “thou hold forfend to deliver,” AV “if thou forbear to deliver,” Neh 9:30 (mástakk, “bear” instead of “forbear,” occurs once, lit. “breathing, the nose,” hence, from breath, “anger” (erekh, “long,” understood), and kal “to hold,” are transliterated “forbearing” (Prov 25:15; Jer 20:9, respectively).

In the NT we have anakomai, “to hold self back or up,” “with long suffering, forbearing one another” (Eph 4:2; Col 3:13); antémeni, “to send back,” AV and RV “forbear threatening” (Eph 6:9); phaphosma, “to spare,” “but I forbear (2 Cor 12:6); mérçanthe, “not to work, or to forbear working,” (1 Cor 9:6) ápô, “to cover,” “to cover over,” “when I could no longer forbear” (1 Thess 3:15).

FORBEARANCE, for-bér’ans (αὐξομένη, anakoméne): “Forbearance” (snophé, “a holding back”) is ascribed to God (Rom 2:4, “service, readiness and forbearance and longsuffering”); 2:5 RV, the “passing over of the sins done aforetime, in the forbearance of God,” AV “remission” (m “passing over” of sins, that is, past, through the forbearance of God”), by Christ; in Phil 2:5, to every man by RV “forbearance,” m “gentleness”; it is a Christian grace in likeness to God. “Forbearing” (AVm) is substituted by RV for “patient” (anerkatēkos, “holding up under evil”) in 2 Tim 2:24. W. L. WALKER FORBID, for-bid' (םָבַה, kôlê'; kûlôw, kôlôh): Occurs very rarely in the OT except as the rendering of חֲזָל (see below); it is once the title of קָלָא, "to restrain" (Nu 11 28, "Joshua . . . said, My lord Moses, forbid them"); twice of כָּוָד, "to command" (Dt 2 37, "whereas ever Jeh our God forbade us"); 4 23, "Jeh thy God hath forbidden thee," lit. "commanded"); once of לִב, "not," RV "commanded not to be done" (Lev 6 17). In the phrases, "Jeh forbid" (1 S 24 6; 26 11; 1 K 21 3), "God forbid" (Gen 44 7; Josh 22 29; 24 16; 1 S 12 23; Job 27 5, etc.), "God forbid" it me (1 Ch 17 30), the word is חֲזָל demarcating the ban and abstinence (rendered, Gen 18 25 AV, "that be far from thee"); ERV leaves the expressions unchanged; ARV substitutes "far be it from me," "thee," etc., except in 1 S 14 45; 20 2, where it is, "Far from it."

In the NT קָלָא, "to cut short," "restrain," is the word commonly trd "forbid" (Mt 19 14, "forbid them not," etc); in Lk 6 29, RV has "withhold not"; diakôlêma, with a similar meaning, occurs in Mt 3 14, "John forbade him," RV "would have had none of him," uneut. Acts 28 16, is trd "none forbidding him." The phrase "God forbid" (בְּ אוּנָו, "let it not be," Lk 20 16; Rom 3 4, etc) is retained by RV, with m "Be it not so," except in Gal 6 14, where the text has "Forbid not and mè rësîlòlo in one of the renderings of חֲזָל in LXX. "God forbid" also appears in Apg (1 Mac 2 21, RV "Heaven forbid," m "Gr may he be propitious," 9 10, RV "Let it not be.") W. L. WALKER

FORCES, for-sís (חֵיָד, ha'yd): (1) The word is used as a military term, equivalent to army, in 2 K 25 23 26 (where AV reads "armies"); 2 Ch 17 2 2; Jer 40 7, etc. See Army.
(2) In 1 S 20 5 (11), it is rendered in RV by "wealth," and in Ob ver 11, by "substance."
Two other Heb words are also trd "forces" in AV, מַדָּאָפַת (Job 36 19), and מַדָּא (Dn 11 35), the latter being rendered in RV "fortresses."

FORD, ford (שַׁעֲלָה, ma'abhar [Gen 32 22; "pass" (of Michmash), 1 S 13 23; "stroke" (RV's "passing"), Isa 30 32]; מִשְׁעֵל, ma'abath [Josh 2 7; Jgs 3 28; 12 5 6; Isa 16 2; "pass" (of Michmash), 1 S 14 4; "passage", RV's "fords"), Jer 4 14, 28;坛, "foróbash (2 S 15 28; 17 16; "ferry-boat" (RV's "convoy")), 2 S 8 18; from מִשְׁעֵל, "abhar, "to pass over"; of Arab, مُسَعَّل, "abar, "to pass over," and נִשְׁעֵל, ma'bar, "a ford"): In the journeys of the children of Israel, in addition to the miraculous passages of the Red Sea and the Jordan, they had other streams to pass over, e.g., the Zered (Hâsr) and the Arnon (Maêu) (Nu 31 12 13; Dt 2 24). The Jabok (Zarja) is frequently referred to, particularly in connection with Jacob (Gen 32 22). The most frequent references are to the Jordan which, in time of flood, was impassable (Josh 3 15). The lower Jordan is about 100 ft. wide, and from 5 to 12 ft. deep, so that in the absence of bridges, the places where it was possible to ford were of great importance. The passage of the Jordan is referred to in connection with Jacob (Gen 32 10), Gideon (Jgs 6 1), the children of Ammon (Jgs 10 9), and his men (2 2 29). David (2 S 10 17; 17; 22), Absalom (2 S 17 24), and others. Jesus undoubtedly crossed the Jordan, and John is thought to have baptized at the ford of the Jordan near Jericho. The fords of the Jordan are specifically mentioned in Jos 2 11, referred to in connection with the pursuit of the spies who were hidden in Rahab's house, and in 2 S 15 28; 17 16 in connection with the flight of David. In the last two passages we have "əbhərəm (the same word which, in the account of David's return (2 S 19 15), is rendered "ferry-boat" (RV's "convoy"). See JORDAN. ALFRED ELY DAY

FORECAST, for-kašt (vb.) (םָבָש, ḥashak): To forecast is both to plan or scheme beforehand and to consider or see beforehand. It is in the first sense that it is used in Dn 11 24 25 (AV) as the tr of ḥashak, "to think," "meditate," "devise," "plot," "He shall forecast his devices (AV's "Heb think his thoughts") against the kingdom; They shall forecast devices against him," RV "devise his devices"; of Nah 1 9, "What do ye devise against Jeh?" In the second sense, the word occurs in Wis 17 11 RV, "Wickedness . . . always forecasteth the worst lot" (proselēphēn), m "Most authorities read hath added" (proselēphēn) . W. L. WALKER

FOREFATHER, for-fâ'-ðer: (1) נָשַׁנֶנ, 'əbhî re'shon, "first father," "chief father" hence "early ancestor;" "turned back to the iniquities of their forefathers" (Jer 11 10).
(2) πρεσβύτερος, presbýteros, "born before," "ancient," "forefather;" "whom I saw from my forefathers" (2 Tim 1 3). It is trd "parents" (including grandparents) in 1 Tim 5 4: "and to require their parents."

FOREFRONT, for-fron't (נָשֶׁנָם, pānām): For "forefront," "front is now generally used, since "back-front" has gone out of use. "Forefront" is the tr of pānām, "face" (2 K 16 14; Ezk 40 19 bis; 47 1); of māl pānām, "over against the face" (Ezk 20 8; Lev 9 9; "And he put the mitre upon his head; and son upon the mitre upon upon his forehead, did he put the golden plate"; for "upon his forehead" RV has "in front"; 2 S 15 15, "in the forefront of the hottest battle"); of ōrā, "head" (2 Ch 20 27); of shēn, "tooth" (1 S 14 5, "The forefront [AV 'Heb tooth'] of the one was situated northward over against Michmas," RV "The one cove rose up on the north in front of Michmas") in 1 Mac 5 47 it is the tr of prósōpon, "face": "They decked the forefront of the temple with crowned gold." RV has "forefront" for "face" (Ezk 40 15), "in the forefront of" for "over against" (Josh 22 11). W. L. WALKER

FOREHEAD, for-eid (נָשְׁנָה, mécah; méron, mé-tôpôn): (1) In a literal sense the word is used frequently in the Scriptures. Aaron and after him every high priest was to wear on the forehead the golden frontlet having the engraved motto, "Holy to Jehovah" (Ex 28 36 38). The condition of the forehead was an important criterion in the diagnosis of leprosy by the priest (Lev 13 42 43; 2 Ch 26 20). It was in the forehead that brave young David smote Goliath with the stone from his sling (1 S 17 49). The faulty tr of AV in Exk 16 12 has been corrected in RV, reference being had in the passage to a nose-ring, not to an ornament of the forehead. While the cutting or tattooing of the body was strictly forbidden by the Israelite on account of the heathen associations of the custom (Lev 19 28), we find frequent mention made of markings on the forehead, which were esp. used to designate slaves (see Philo, De Monarchia; I) or devotees of a godhead (Lucian, De Syria Daeo, 58). In 3 Mac 29 we read that Ptolomy IV Philopator branded some Jews with the sign of an ivy leaf, marking them as devotees of Bacchus-Dionysos. Possibly we may compare herewith the tr of Isa 44 5 (RVM): "And another shall write on his hand, "Unto Jeh." (or Jeh's slave). Very clear is the passage Ezek 9:4.6 (and perhaps Job 31:35), where the word used for "mark" is "tāne", the name of the last letter of the Heb alphabet which in its earliest form has the shape of an upright + (Baal Lebanon Inser, 14th cent. BC) or of a lying (St. Andrew's) cross X (Moabite Inser, 9th cent. BC), the simplest sign in the old Israelite alphabet, and at the same time the character which in the Gr alphabet represents the Χ, the initial of Christ. In the NT we find a clear echo of the above-mentioned OT passage, the marking of the forehead in the righteous (Rev 7:3; 9:4; 14:1; 22:4). The godless followers of the beast are marked on the (right) hand and on the forehead (13:16; 14:9; 20:4), and the apocalyptic woman dressed in scarlet and purple has her name written on her forehead (17:5).

(2) In a metaphorical sense the expression, "a harlot's forehead," is used (Jer 3:3) to describe the shameless apostasy and faithlessness of Israel. Ezek speaks of the stiff-necked obstinacy and the persistent unwillingness of Israel to hear the message of Jeh: "All the house of Israel are of a hard forehead and of a stiff heart." (3:7), and God makes his prophet's "forehead hard . . . . as an adamant harder than flint" while he gains the loyalty of the people to God and a complete disregard of opposition is meant (vs 8.9). Compare the phrase: "to harden the face," s.v. Face. H. L. L. Eubel

FOREIGN DIVINITIES, for'in di-vīn'-tīz (Acts 17:18 m). See God(s), Strange.

FOREIGNER, for'ın-ér: The tr of נָטֶה, nāṭēh, "unknown," "foreign," frequently rendered "stranger" (Dt 15:3; Ob ver 11); of וּפָנִי, tāshāḥh, "a settler," "an alien resident" (Ex 12:45; RV "sojourner"); of Lev 25:47; Ps 39:12); of πρόμοιος, "dwelling near," "sojourner" (Eph 2:19; RV "sojourners").

RV has "foreigner" for "stranger" (Dt 17:15; 23:20; 29:22; Ruth 2:10; 2 S 16:19), for "alien" (Dt 14:21); "the hand of a foreigner" for "a stranger's hand" (Lev 22:25). See Alien; Stranger and Sojourner.

FOREKNOW, for-nō', FOREKNOWLEDGE, for-nōl'-ē: 1. Meaning of the Term 2. Foreknowledge as Prescience 3. Foreknowledge Based on Foreordination 4. Foreknowledge as Equivalent to Foreordination Literature

The word "foreknowledge" has two meanings. It is a term used in theology to denote the prescience or foresight of God, that is, His knowledge of the entire course of events of the Term which are future from the human point of view; and it is also used in AV and RV to translate the Gr words προγνωσις and προγνωθήσις in the NT, in which instances the word "foreknowledge" approaches closely the idea of foreordination.

In the sense of prescience foreknowledge is an aspect of God's omniscience (see Omniscience).

1. Meaning of the Term

2. Foreknowledge as Prescience of expression as regards the way in which God obtains knowledge (Gen 3:8), and sometimes even represents Him as if He did not know certain things (Gen 11:5; 18:21); nevertheless the constant representation of the Scripture is that God knows everything. This perfect knowledge of God, moreover, is not merely a knowledge which is practically unlimited for all religious purposes, but is omniscience in the strictest sense of the term. In the historical books of the OT the omniscience of God is a constant underlying presupposition when it is said that God watches men's actions, knows their acts and words, and discloses to them the future; while in the Prophets and Wisdom literature, this Divine attribute becomes an object of reflection, and finds doctrinal expression. It cannot, however, be said that this attribute of God appears only late in the history of special revelation; it is a characteristic of the idea of God from the very first, and it is only its didactic expression which comes out with special clearness in the later books. God's knowledge, therefore, is represented as perfect. Since He is free from all limits of space, His omniscience is frequently connected with His omnipresence. This is the thought which underlies the anthropomorphize expressions where God is represented as seeing, beholding and having eyes. God's eyes go to and fro throughout the whole earth (2 Ch 16:9), and are in every place beholding the evil and the good (Prov 16:3). Even Sheol is naked and open to God's sight (Prov 15:11; Job 26:6). The night and darkness are light to Him, and darkness and light for God are both alike (Ps 139:12). All animals and fowls, and the beasts of the field (50:11), and as their Creator God knows all the hosts of the heavenly bodies (Ps 147:4; Isa 40:26). He knows also the heart of man and its thoughts (1 S 16:7; Ps 139:13, 14). Evil and sin are also known to God (Ps 89:10; Ps 90:9; Ps 115:2; 18:16). In a word, God knows with absolute accuracy all about man (Job 11:11; 34:21; Ps 33:15; Prov 6:21; Hos 5:3; Jer 12:20; 12:3; 17:9; 18:20). This perfect knowledge finds its classic expression in Ps 139:1-5; Prov 5:21.

God is also, according to the OT, free from all limitations of time, so that His consciousness is not in the midst of the stream of the succeeding moments of time, as is the case with the human consciousness. "God is not only without beginning of days, but with Him a thousand years are as one day." Hence God knows in one eternal intuition that which for the human consciousness is past, present and future. In a strict sense, therefore, there can be no foreknowledge which is independent of God, and the distinction in God's knowledge made by theologians, as knowledge of reminiscence, vision and prescience, is after all an anthropomorphism. Nevertheless this is the only way in which we can conceive of the Divine omniscience in its relation to time, and consequently the Scripture represents the matter as if God's knowledge of future events were a foreknowledge or prescience, and God is represented as knowing the past, present and future.

It is God's knowledge of events from the human point of view which are future that constitutes His foreknowledge in the sense of prescience. God is represented as having a knowledge of the entire course of events before they take place. Such a knowledge belongs to the Scriptural idea of God from the very outset of special revelation. He knows beforehand what Abraham will do, and what will happen to him; He knows beforehand that Pharaoh's heart will be hardened, and that Moses will deliver Israel (Ps 105:15 f.; Ex 3:19; 7:4; 11:1 f.). The entire history of the patriarchal period of revelation exhibits plainly the foreknowledge of God in this sense. In prophecy this aspect of the Divine knowledge is made the subject of explicit assertion, and its religious significance is brought out. Nothing future is hidden from Jeh (Isa 41 22 f; 42 9; 43 9-13; 44 6-8; 46 10; 51 20), and this is the teaching of the apostles (Acts 1 25; 14 18; 1 Cor 2 7; 3 20; 1 Thess 2 4; Rev 23). In a word, according to the author of the Epistle to the He, everything is open to God, so that He is literally omniscient (He 4 13). And as in the OT, so also in the NT, foreknowledge in the sense of pre-science is ascribed to God. Jesus asserts a foreknowledge by God of that which is hidden from the Son (Mk 13 32), and James asserts that all God's works are foreknown by Him (Acts 15 18). Moreover over the many references in the NT to the fulfillment of prophecy all imply that the NT writers ascribed foreknowledge, in this sense of foresight, to God.

Denials of the Divine foreknowledge, in this sense of foresight, have been put by exegetical considerations, but by the supposed conflict of this truth with human freedom. It was supposed that in order to be free, an event must be uncertain and contingent as regards the fact of its futurition, and this is not the case. Hence, that is from the Divine as well as the human point of view. Hence the Socinians and some Armenians denied the foreknowledge of God. It was supposed either that God voluntarily determines not to foresee the free volitions of man, or else that God's omnipotence is simply the knowledge of all that is knowable, it does not embrace the free acts of man which are by their nature uncertain and unknowable. And upon this view of freedom, this denial of God's foreknowledge was logically necessary. If the certainty of events with respect to the fact of their futurition is inconsistent with freedom, then human freedom does conflict with God's foreknowledge, since God cannot know future events as certain. Future events unless foretold are not knowable. Since, therefore, the Divine foreknowledge is quite as inconsistent with this view of freedom as is the Divine foreordination, the view of those who regard God as a mere onlooker on the course of future events which are supposed to be entirely independent of his purpose and control, does not help matters in the least. If God foreknows future events as certain, then they must be certain, and if so, then the certainty of their actually occurring must depend either upon God's decrees or a providential control, or else upon a fate independent of God. It was to escape these supposed difficulties that the doctrine known as scientia media was propounded. It was supposed that God has a knowledge of events as conditionally future, that is, events neither merely possible nor certainly future, but suspended upon conditions underdetermined by God. But this hypothesis is of no help and is not true. Besides being contrary to the Scripture in its idea that many events lie outside the decree of God, and that God must wait upon the free acts of man, this knowledge encompasses really no such class of events as this theory asserts. If God foreknows that the conditions on which they are suspended will be fulfilled, then these events belong to the class of events which are certainly future; whereas if God does not know whether the conditions will be fulfilled by man, then His foreknowledge is denied, and these events in question belong to the class of those merely possible. Nor do the Scripture passages to which this appeal is made Augustine, who embraces the entire course of man's life (Ps 31 15 [Heb 16]; 39 5 [Heb 6]; 139 4-6.16; Job 14 5). These passages from Isa show that it is from the occurrence of events in accordance with Jeh's prediction that the Prophet will prove his foreknowledge; and that in contrast with the worshippers of idols which are taken by surprise, Israel is warned of the future by the omniscient Jeh.

In the NT likewise, God's omniscience is explicitly affirmed. Jesus taught that God knows the hidden secrets of the heart (Lk 16 17), and this is the teaching of the apostles (Acts 1 25; 14 18; 1 Cor 2 7; 3 20; 1 Thess 2 4; Rev 23). In a word, according to the author of the Epistle to the He, everything is open to God, so that He is literally omniscient (He 4 13). And as in the OT, so also in the NT, foreknowledge in the sense of pre-science is ascribed to God. Jesus asserts a foreknowledge by God of that which is hidden from the Son (Mk 13 32), and James asserts that all God's works are foreknown by Him (Acts 15 18). Moreover over the many references in the NT to the fulfillment of prophecy all imply that the NT writers ascribed foreknowledge, in this sense of foresight, to God.

3. Foreknowledge: A mere onlooker seeing the future course Based on of events, but having no part in events. Foreordination: That God has such a plan is the teaching event of the entire Scripture. It is implied in the OT conception of God as an Omnipotent Person governing all things in accordance with His will. This idea is involved in the names of God in the patriarchal revelation, El, Elohim, El Shaddai, and in the prophetic name Jeh of Hosts. This latter teaching not only God's infinite power and glory, but also makes Him known as interposing in accordance with His sovereign will and purpose in the affairs of the world, and is having absolute control over the entire world at His disposal for the execution of His eternal purpose. Hence this idea of God comes to mean the omnipotent Ruler of the universe (Ps 24 10; Isa 6 3; 51 5; 64 5; Jer 10 16; Am 9 5; of Oehler, Theocoria, i, 676). Not only in this conception of God as omnipotent and sovereign Ruler is the thought of His eternal plan evolved; it is explicitly asserted throughout the whole OT. The purpose of God as determining human history in the Book of Gen lies clearly upon the surface of the narrative, as, for example, in the history of Abraham and of Joseph. And where there is no abstract statement of this truth, it is evident that the writer regards every event as but the unfolding of the purpose of God. In the Psalms, Prophets, and Wisdom literature, this truth finds explicit and reiterated assertion. Jehovah has an eternal purpose (Ps 33 11), and this purpose will certainly come to pass (Isa 14 27; 43 18). This purpose includes all events and matters are as if they were occurring at His disposal, as well as in its all-embracing character, and the certainty of its fulfilment (Prov 16 4-33; 10 11; 19 21; 20 24; Job 23 23). The providential control wherewith Jehovah executes this plan includes the heart of man (Prov 21 1).

The NT likewise regards all history as but the unfolding of God's eternal purpose (Acts 4 28), which includes man's salvation (Rom 1 1-3; 8 28-30; 1 9), the provision of Christ as Saviour (1 Pet 1 20), and the good works of the Christian (Eph 2 10). See Predestination.

Now while the writers of the OT and the NT do not write in an abstract or philosophical manner nor enter into metaphysical explanations of the relationship between God's foreknowledge and foreordination, it is perfectly evident that they had a clear concept of both of these ideas. Although anthropomorphisms are used in regard to the manner in which God foreknows, as if He obtained His knowledge of the future as a mere onlooker gazing down the course of events in time, the clear idea of the omnipotence of the foreknowledge Ruler of the universe should govern the world and form His plan as an independent purpose. But a mere foreknowledge is not sufficient; events outside His purpose and control is not only contrary to the entire Scriptural idea of God's sovereignty and omnipotence, and Scriptural idea of God's foreknowledge which is always conceived as dependent upon His purposes and control. According to this Scriptural idea, God foreknows because He has foreordained all things, and because in

His providence He will certainly bring all to pass. His foreknowledge is not a dependent one which must wait upon events, but is simply the knowledge which God has of the very events which He purposes to bring about. Peter evidences this position when he calls it a "productive foreknowledge" (Handbuch d. attest. Theol., 351). This is not exactly correct. The OT does not conceive God's foreknowledge as a prophecy in the sense of Divine foresight leading up to actual events. Hence it is man who appoints 1 Pet 1 19-20 himself to bring about an event by his own acts, and only God knows how and when it will come to pass. But when Dillmann says that in the OT there is no hint of an "idol foreknowledge" on God's part, he is giving expression to the truth that in the OT God's foreknowledge is based upon His foreordination and predestination of all things. Divine foreknowledge, therefore, depends upon the Divine purpose which has determined the world plan (Am 3 7), and all its details (Job 28 27). Before man is born God knows him and chooses him for his work (Job 1 5; Job 33 14-15), so that a thorough knowledge of man in the 139 is made to rest upon the fact that God has determined his lot beforehand (Ps 139 16). The same thing is true of the NT teaching on this subject. The Divine foreknowledge is simply God's knowledge of His own eternal purpose. This is esp. clear in those cases where God's eternal purpose of redemption through the death of Christ is referred to. Foreordi

While, therefore, the foreknowledge of God in the sense of prescience is asserted in the OT, it is not in the meaning of the term when used 4. Fore-knowledge. These words as Equivalents of the word "foreordination" (1 Pet 1 20 nation AV), mean much more than mere intellectual foresight or prescience. Both the vb. and the noun approach the idea of foreordination and are closely connected with that idea in the passages where these words occur. Thus in Peter's speeches in Acts the predestination which finds expression in 4 25 is practically identified with the term in 2 23. Everything which happens, or rather is foreordained for his own "the determinate counsel and foreknowledge of God," so that nothing happened except that which God had foreordained. In this verse the term foreknowledge is an expansion of the idea of God's "counsel" or plan, regarding it as an intelligent prearrangement, the idea of foreknowledge being assimilated to that of foreordination. The same idea is found in 1 Pet 1 20. Here the apostle speaks of Christ as a lamb "foreordained" by God before the foundation of the world, and it is evident that the word is used for "foreordained" in AV. It is evidently God's foreordination of Jesus as Saviour which Peter has in mind. Also in 1 Pet 1 2 those to whom the letter is written are spoken of as "elect according to the foreknowledge [prognòsis] of God," where the election is based upon the "foreknowledge." By the prognòsis or foreknowledge, however, far more is meant than prescience. It has the idea of a purpose which determines the course of the Divine procedure. If it meant simply prevision of faith or love or any quality in the objects of the election, Peter would not only flatly contradict Paul (Rom 9 11; Eph 1 3 4; 2 Tim 1 9) but also, he is writing of a revelation of something which we found it to have in Peter. Hence those whom God predestinated, "counselled," and "foreordained" are those whom He has looked upon with His sovereign love. To assign any other meaning to "foreknowledge" here would be out of accord with the usage of the word elsewhere in the NT where it is put in connection with predestination, as in 1 Pet 1 2. Meyer (e.g. Weiss) 1 Pet 119 says that Peter uses it. In 11 2, speaking of the Jews, Paul says that "God did not cast off his people which he foreknew." It is quite impossible to regard this as meaning that God had a foresight or mere prescience of some quality in the objects of his choice of them, not only because it is the teaching of the entire Scripture that God's choice of Israel was sovereign and gracious, and not only because of the actual history of Israel, but also because of the context. Paul says that it would be absurd to suppose that God had foreknowledge of them, because He had not cast them off. His foreknowledge of them being adduced as a ground for His not casting them off. Hence the argument would have no force if anything in Israel, foreseen by God, were supposed to ground an assurance that He had not cast them off, because the context is full of the hardness of heart and unbelief of Israel. The foreknowledge here has evidently the same sense as in the former passage.

Rom. The word prophèsis is, however, discriminated from "predestination. It is that loving regard in God from which the Divine election springs, which election or Peter evidence in 1 Pet 1 20. Hence it is man who appoints himself to bring about an event by his own acts, and only God knows how and when it will come to pass. But when Dillmann says that in the OT there is no hint of an "idol foreknowledge" on God's part, he is giving expression to the truth that in the OT God's foreknowledge is based upon His foreordination and predestination of all things. The foreknowledge here has evidently the same sense as in the former passage.

In view of the fact that there was a classical use of the simple vb. γνωσθηκεν in the sense of "resolve," and more espec. the next step in the development of the word is the use of the vb. γνωσθηκεν in the NT to denote an affectionate or loving regard or approbation in accordance with a common use of the Heb γνωσθη (MT 7 23; Gr γνωσθη 3; Gk γνωσθη 2 19), there is nothing arbitrary in giving it this sense when compounded with the preposition δια in the context, as many demands it as it does in the above passage of Johnstone, Comm. on Pet in loc. per contra Meyer on passages in Acts and Foreknowledge, therefore, is more than mere prescience. It is primarily identical with the Divine decrees and foreordains in things and places where the term occurs it denotes the sovereign loving regard out of which springs God's predestination or election of men to salvation. Cremer, Die christliche Lehre von den Eigenschaften Gottes, Beiträge zur Förderung christl. Theol., I, 93–101; Stewart, art. "Foreknowledge," HDD II, 51–53. Cremer mentions several Biblical instances where the word is found in works on systematic theology, such as Böhl, Dogmatik, 54–59; Bavinck, Gereformeerde Dogmatik, 1, 182–95. For a history of the discussion of the problem of foreknowledge and freedom see J. Müller, Die christl. Lehre von der Stunde, III, 2. 2. See also literature under OMINISCENCE.

FOREORDAIN, for-or-dain', FORORDINATION, for-or-di-na'shun: The word "foreordain" is formally in RV to represent the Gr ἐπικαιροῦσθαι, προορίζοντας, in the passages where this vb. occurs (Acts 4:28; Rom 8:29.30; 1 Cor 2:7; Eph 1:5.11). In the passages in Rom and Eph it takes the place of the AV word "predestinate," a return to the usage of the LXX. "Predestinate" has simply the sense of determining beforehand. It is thus kindred in meaning with a number of other NT words expressing the idea of Divine purpose, as "foreknow" (in pregnant sense, Acts 2:23; Rom 8:29, etc); "determine" (Acts 17:26); "appoint" (1 Pet 2:8). Foreordination, in the widest sense, is coextensive with the sphere of God's universal providence, being but another name for that Divine plan, purpose or counsel which embraces all things, great and small (Mc 13:32; Mk 14:26), that happens in Nature, or fall out in human life. Man's free actions are not regarded in Scripture as excluded from it (Acts 2:28). Foreordination, at the same time, is not to be conceived of in any way overruling, or doing violence to, human free agency. Nature and human Nature are not necessarily, but it is God who appoints the time, place and circumstances of the free act, permits its happening, and overrules it and its issues for the furthering of His own wise and holy ends. See PROVIDENCE. Foreordination in the sphere of grace has respect to the choice, calling and blessing of those who, through faith, are made partakers of eternal life (Rom 8:29.30; Eph 1:5.11). In this, its soteriological aspect, the subject is considered in special articles. See CHOOSE; ELECTION; PREDESTINATION. JAMES OER.

FOREPART, for-purt: The tr of בַּר, pānîn, "face" (Ex 28:27; 39:20; 1 K 6:20, RV "within"); Ezek 42:7, RV "before," and of פָּה, prōrâ, the forward part of a ship, the prow (Acts 27:41, "the foremost part of a ship"). ARV has "its forepart into" for "with his face towards" (Joel 2:20 m "with its forepart"); in the forepart thereof for "before it" (Ex 28:25; 39:18).

FORERUNNER, for-run'ár (πρόδρομος, pró'dromos): This word occurs but once in the Bible: "Whither as a forerunner Jesus entered for us" (He 6:20). The word signifies one who comes in advance to a place where the rest are to follow, or one who is sent to try the way and make the necessary preparations. In this sense Christ is our forerunner for He has gone into heaven to prepare a place for His people into which He will eventually lead them. The idea of a forerunner is peculiar to the Christian dispensation. The OT Levitical economy knew nothing of such. The high priest was a representative, not a forerunner: where he led, viz. into the Holy of Holies, the people could not follow. He was not the pioneer of the people; Christ is. Christ goes before. He was a material forerunner, but He is the first-leader (of He 12:2, "the author . . . of faith"). He goeth before His people to prepare the way for them, to open the gates of heaven by His atoning blood and priestly intercession. The believer is led into full fellowship with God through Jesus Christ. See also THE BAPTIST; RUNNER. WILLIAM EVANS.

FORESKIN, for'skin (בּוֹקֶר, bo'ker; ἀσκοφυρία, akrophutria, often euphemistically trd "uncircumcision"): (1) In the literal sense the word is frequently mentioned owing to the rite of circumcision in vogue in Israel since the days of Abraham (Gen 17:9–14) and among several other peoples of antiquity and modern times. The act of circumcision is represented in the temple of Khonsu, a medical deity, at Karnak. Among the Jews of antiquity circumcision may have been performed by means of a flint or stone knife (Ex 4:25; Josh 5:2.3) on the eighth day after birth (Gen 17:12; 21:4; Lev 26:13; Lk 2:21; Phil 3:5), even if this day was the Sabbath (Jn 7:23).

Very early we find the practice one of which the descendants of Abraham became proud (Gen 34:14), so that we see the uncircumcised despised and scorned (1 S 17:26), and in the time of oppression under King Amaziah Ephah many Israelites suffered martyrdom rather than give up the distinctive sign of their people (1 Mac 1:48.60.61; 2 Mac 6:10). Among the Arabs and all Mohammedans the custom of circumcision prevails from pre-Islamic times. Circumcision is mentioned in the Koran, and the appellation "uncircumcised" (غفل, ghafal) is considered the greatest possible insult.

A peculiar martial custom is mentioned in 1 S 18:25, 27 (cf 2 S 3:14), where Saul is represented as asking "a hundred foreskins of the Philistines" as a dowry from David for the hand of Michal. This does not seem to have been an exceptional booty in war, esp. if it meant that no very careful operation was expected to be performed, but the act became practically equivalent to extermination. We find in Egypt history at the time of Ramses III, that an invasion into Egypt had been made by several Libyan tribes (see Dümichen, Histor. Inschr., I, plates 1–17, and II, plates 47 ff.). The Egypt army sent against the invaders defeated them and returned with a large number of human heads, which were considered as hieroglyphics of the Sem word, בּוֹקֶר, bo'ker, the word being used euphemistically as is proven by the accompanying determinative sign of a phalus. See CHABAS, Études sur la lingui.story historique d'après les sources égyptiennes, etc, 234; Bondi, Hebr.-Phoen. Lehnworte im Epyptischen, Leipzig, 1886, 72–74.

(2) Metaphorically the word is used in a variety of ways: (a) In the sense of "unlawful," forbidden as food, forbidden. The fruit of many trees was not to be eaten (Lev 19:23–25). (b) In the sense of "obstinance," opposition to God's law." The rise of circumcision meant submission under the law. While an outward form could not be confused with an inward attitude toward God, the use of the word “circumcision” was soon extended to that of purity and obedience of the heart (Dt 10:16; 30:6; and Col 2:11, where this circumcision is called a “circumcision not made with hands, ... the circumcision of Christ.” The unceasingness of outward circumcision, which does not include obedience and purity, is shown by St. Paul (Rom 2:25; 1 Cor 7:18; cf. Acts 7:51). (c) In the sense of “Gentiles,” “non-Israelites” (Gal 2:7; Eph 2:11; Col 3:11). See Circumcision; Consecration.

FOREST, for'est,

1) ʃərəsh (of proper name Hārōsheth), 2 Ch 27:4; In 1 S 23:15; tr. “wood;” in 1 S 17:9, “wood;” in Ezek 31:3, “forest-like shade.” Applied to any thick growth of vegetation but not necessarily so extensive as (3).

3) שִׁכָּה, yvar, from root meaning “rudded;” of Arab. wā’ar, “a rugged, stony region.” It is sometimes rendered “forest” and sometimes (but less often in RV) “wood.” It is used of certain definite geographical regions, e.g. “the region of Ara’īm” (Isa 21:13, m “thickets); “the forest of Carmel” (2 K 23:25, AV, RV “of his fruitful field); “the forest of Here’th” (1 S 22:5); “the forest of Lebanon” (1 K 7:7; 10:17-21; 2 Ch 9:19-20); “the forest of Ephraim,” “of the region.”

The word yar appears also in well-known K’rith’jairim, “the city of forests,” and Mt. Jeairim (Josh 15:10). Among numerous other references the following may be noted: Dt 19:5; Josh 17:15-18; 1 Ch 26:33; 2 K 2:24; Ps 80:13; 83:14; 86:13; 133:6; Ecol 2:6; Cant 2:3; 1 S 7:2; 14:25-26; Jer 4:29; 46:23; Ezek 34:29; Mic 3:12; 7:14.

4) שַּכָּה, s’kakh, from root meaning “to interweave.” A “thicket” (Gen 22:13; Jer 4:7); “thicket of trees” (Ps 74:5); “thickets of the forest” (Isa 9:18; 10:34).

5) שִׁכְּמָה, ’škim, “thicket” (Jer 4:29).

From many references it is evident that Pal had in OT times much more extensive forests and woodlands than today. For a discussion of the subject see Botany.

FOREST OF EPHRAIM. See Ephraim.

FORETELL, for'-tel’, FORETOLD, for'-told. The AV occurrences of these words in the NT represent as many Gr terms, and are in each case rendered differently in RV: (1) Mt 15:23 (προφέρω, proφérō), RV “told beforehand;” (2) Acts 3:24 (προκατάγω, prokataγó), RV simply “told;” (3) 2 Cor 13:2 (προφέρω, proφérō), RV “said beforehand,” m “plainly;” of 1 Thess 4:4. The foretelling of future events is claimed in the OT as a prerogative of Jeh. (Isa 41:22-23; 42:9, etc; of Dt 18:22). See Prophecy.

FORFEIT, for’fit (שְׁכָר, ḥaram): “Forfeit!” (from forisficere, “to act beyond”) implies loss through transgression of non-observance of some law or rule. The word occurs only once as the tr of ḥaram, “to shut in,” frequently to devote or consecrate a person or thing to God beyond redemption (cf Lev 27:28-29; Mic 4:13; Ezra 10:8, “that whosoever came not within three days in all his substance should be forfeited, and himself separated from the assembly of the captivity,” AVm, ARVm and RV “devoted”; cf 1 Esd 9:4, “Their cattle should be seized to the use of the temple” [anierdó, “to consecrate,” “devote”]; 6:32, “all his goods seized as the king” [δα κατάκρατον autoi tìn einai (eis) basileíou].

RV has “forfeited” (καθάρθης, “consecrated,” “devoted”) for “defiled” (Dt 22:9), m “Heb consecrated,” “forfeit his life” for “lose his soul” (Ps 49:8), Mk 6:8), “lose or forfeit his own self” for “lose himself or be cast away” (Lk 9:25, ἀπολλύσις ἡλίκιος στίγματος; σέμιδωλος is the LXX for ἀμανή, “to be mutilated,” or “fined,” Ex 21:22; Dt 22:19; Prov 17:26 m; 19:20; 21:22; 5:3); Weymouth renders Lk 9:25, “to have lost or forfeit his own life!” (or “had to pay his own self—his own existence—as a fine”); in the other instances of σέμιδωλος (1 Cor 3:15; Phil 3:8), AV and RV render “suffer loss,” “suffered” . . . “loss;” 2 Cor 7:9 AV, “receive damage.”

FORGE, for’j, FORGER, for’jer (שָׁכָה, ḥaphal): “Forgers of lies” occurs in Job’s reply to his comforters (13:4; of 14:17); the word is the tr of ḥaphal, “to patch,” “lay on,” “besmear,” hence to impute, overcharge, etc; in Ps 119:68, “forged” occurs with a similar meaning: “The proud have forged a lie against me” (cf Sir 51:2). “Forger,” in the sense of “one who forges, makes, anything,” is the RV rendering of ἀτάσθα, “to smite,” or “hammer,” in Gen 4:22 AV. “Tubal-cain, an instructor of every artificer of brass and iron,” RV “the forger of every cutting instrument of brass and iron” m “an instructor of every artificer of copper and iron.”

W. L. Walker

FORGET, for’get’, FORGETFUL, for’get’ful (שָׁכָה, ḥāshḥah; ἐπαλθήμωνας, epalthēmōnās): “Forget” is to fail to hold in mind, and the forgetfulness may be either innocent or blameworthy. In the OT the word is most frequently used as tr of ḥāshḥah in a blameworthy sense: to forget the covenant, the law, Jeh their God (Dt 4:9,23,31; 8:12, Jgs 3:7; 1 S 12:9; Ps 44:20, etc). In an innocent or neutral, sometimes good, sense it is used in Gen 27:45; Dt 24:19; Job 9:27; 11:16; 24:20; Ps 102:4, etc. It also is used of God forgetting or not seeming to care (Ps 9:12; 10:11,12; 13:1; 42:9; 77:9; Ps 39:15, etc), sometimes meant riders to take (Ps 45:10; 74:19, etc). In the NT epalthēmōnās is used of simple forgetting (Mt 16:5; Mk 8:14, etc; in Lk 12:6 the sense of care is implied), Phil 3:13, “forgetting the things which are behind,” has the force of leaving behind. “Forgetful” in Jas 1:25 is epalthēmōn, RV “a hearer that forgetteth,” “Forgetfulness,” Ps 58:12, “the land of forgetfulness,” is a synonym for Sheol, where all forget and are forgotten. RV has “forget not” for “be ignorant of” (2 Pet 3:8; similarly ver 5).

10. Christ's Power to Forgive Sins
11. The Need of Humility for Atonement
12. The NT Doctrine of Atonement

Of the seven words, three Heb and four Gr, which are used to express the idea of forgiveness, the last two occur in this sense only:

1. ἐλθείν (Lk 6:37) is used because the analogy of the analog of sin to debt, and denotes the release from it. It has the meaning “forgiveness” in 2 Mac 12:45 also, in which passage the word for sin is expressed. In Rom 3:25 Paul uses παρεσία instead of the usual αφίση. The former means "putting aside," "disregarding," "pretermission"; the latter, "putting away" completely and unrepressedly (Trench, Synonyms of the N.T., § xxiii.). It does not mean forgiveness in the popular sense, and in AV is incorrectly tr "remission." Nor does it mean that God had temporally suspended punishment which at some later date He might inflict (Sunday on Rom 3:25). It was apparent that God had treated sins as though He had forsworn them, though in fact such an attitude on the part of God was without such a foundation as was later supplied by an adequate atonement, and so the apostle avoids saying that God forgave them. This passing over of sins had the tendency of destroying man's conception of God's righteousness, and in order to avert this Christ was set forth as a propitiation and God's disregard of sin (παρεσία) became a real forgiveness (αφίση); cf Acts 14:16; 17:30. Charisathai is not found outside of the writings of Luke and Paul, and in the sense "to forgive sins" is peculiarly Pauline (2 Cor 2:7; 12:13; Eph 4:32; Col 2:13; 3:13). It expresses, as no other of these words does, his conception of the graciousness of God's pardon. All ψευδάρχεια and γίναι δικαιούς and ἐξήλθαν (Nu 30:5.8.12; 1 K 8 30:34.36.39. 50, etc) are used only of Divine forgiveness, while nāsād is used in the sense (Ex 32:32; Nu 14:19; Josh 24:19; Ps 28:18; 33:1.5; 99:8; Isa 2:9), and also of human forgiveness (Gen 57:17; Ex 10:17; 1 S 26:28). Remission (Mt 26:28; Mk 1:4; Lk 1:77; 24:47; Acts 2:38; 10:43; He 9:22; 10:18) and blotting out (Ps 51:1.9; Isa 43:25; Jer 16:13; Acts 3:19) are synonyms of forgiveness, and to understand it fully such words as save, justify, reconcile and atonement should also be considered.

Forgiveness was not a pagan virtue. The large-hearted man might disregard offences in cases where he considered them beneath his notice, but to forgive was weak-spirited and Jewish (F. W. Robertson on 1 Cor 4:12).

Ideas

Even in the OT, man's forgiveness of his fellow-man is infrequently mentioned. In every case the one asking forgiveness is in a subjection, is in subserviency, is petitioning for that to which he has no just right (Gen 50:17; Ex 10:17; 1 S 15:25; 26:28). The Impercary Psalms attest the fact that forgiveness of enemies was not esteemed as a virtue by Israel. They could appeal to the law which enjoined upon them to seek neither the peace nor the prosperity of their avowed enemies (Dt 23:6; cf Ear 9:12). Jesus gave the popular summing-up of the law and not its exact words when he said, "Ye have heard that it was said, thou shalt hate thine enemy" (Mt 5:43), and this certainly does represent their attitude and their understanding of the teaching of the Scriptures.

Christ taught that forgiveness is a duty. No limit can be set to the extent of forgiveness (Lk 17:4) and it must be granted without reserve. Jesus will not admit that there to Him an unforgiving spirit is one of the most heinous sins (Bruce, Parabolic Teaching, 376 ff). This is the offence which God will not forgive (Mt 18:34.35). It is the very essence of the unpardonable sin (Mk 3:22–30). It was the one blemish of the elder son which stained an otherwise ideal life (Lk 15:28–30). This natural, pagan spirit of implacability Jesus sought to displace by a generous forgiving spirit. It is so far the essence of His teaching that in popular language

"a Christian spirit" is not inappropriately understood to be synonymous with a forgiving disposition. His answer to Peter that one should forgive not merely seven times in a day, but seventy times seven (Mt 18:21.22), not only shows that He thought of no limit to one's forgiveness, but that the principle could not be applied to a personal relationship.

Jesus recognized that there are conditions to be fulfilled before forgiveness can be granted. Forgiveness is part of a mutual relationship; the other party is the repentance of the one who has sinned. God's forgiveness without repentance, nor is it required of man. The effect of forgiveness is to restore to its former state the relationship which was broken by sin. Such a restoration requires the cooperation of both parties. There must be both a granting and an acceptance of the forgiveness. Sincere, deep-felt sorrow for the wrong which works repentance (2 Cor 7:10) is the condition of mind which insures the acceptance of the forgiveness. Hence Jesus commanded the offender when the offender turns again, saying, "I repent." (Lk 17:3.4).

It was this state of mind which led the father joyfully to welcome the Prodigal before he even gave utterance to his newly formed purpose (Lk 15:21).

It is not only necessary, but also essential, that the offender should repent upon the part of the offender releases the offended from all obligation to extend forgiveness. Without the repentance of the one who has wronged him he can not forgive. (Mt 18:35.21.22; Acts 8:22).

5. The Offended Party

Jews requires, as is implied by, "if ye forgive not every one his brother from your hearts." (Mt 18:35). It is also implied by the past tense in the Lord's Prayer: "...and forgive us our trespasses" (Lk 11:4.5, 14.15). It is this forgiveness granted without conditions God's forgiveness of our sins (Mk 11:25; Mt 6:14.15). In such a case the unforgiving spirit is essentially unrepentance (Mt 18:23–35). "Of all acts, is not, for a man, repentance the most Divine?"

The offended is to go even farther and is to seek to bring the wrongdoer to repentance. This is the purpose of the rebuking commanded in Lk 17:3. More explicitly Jesus says, "If thy brother sin against thee, go, show him his fault between thee and him alone, and if he hear thee, thou hast gained thy brother. But if he will not hear, take with one or two more, and let him be reproved by them. And if he refuse to hear them, tell it unto the Church; but if he refuse to hear the Church, let him be to thee as an heathen and a publican." (Mt 18:15–17). The Church is to pursue to the point of making every reasonable effort to win the wrongdoer, and only when he has exhausted every effort may he abandon it. The object is the gaining of his brother. Only when this is evidently unattainable is all effort to cease.

The power of binding and loosing, which means for-binding and allowing, was granted to Peter (18:19) and to the Christian community (18:18; Jn 20:23). It clearly implies the possession of the power to forgive sins. In the case of Peter's power it was exercised when he used the keys of the kingdom of heaven (Mt 16:19).

This consisted in the proclamation of the gospel and esp. of the conditions upon which men might enter into relationship with God (Acts 2:38; 8:37–39; 10:43). It was not limited to Peter only, but was shared by the other apostles (Mk 16:19; 18:16). Christ left no fixed rules the observance of which would determine whether one is or is not in the kingdom of God. He gave to His disciples principles, and in the application of these principles to the problems of life there had to be the exercise of discriminating judgment. The exercise of this judgment is described to the Christian community in 2 Cor 10. It is limited by the principles which are the basis of the kingdom, but within these principles the voice of the community is supreme. The forgiveness here implied is not the pronouncing of absolution for the sins of individuals, but the forgiveness and conduct and worship which will be acceptable. In doing this its decisions will be ratified in heaven (Westcott on Jn 20:23).

That there is a close analogy between human and Divine forgiveness is clearly implied (Mt 5:22-24; 5:12; Mk 11:25; Lk 6:37; Col 1:14; 3:13). God's forgiveness is conditional on man's forgiveness of the wrongs done him, not because God forgives grudgingly but because forgiveness alone indicates that disposition of mind which will humbly accept the Divine pardon. Repentance
6. Divine is a necessary ingredient of the fully Human developed forgiveness. There is no forgiveness without a difference between the human and the Divine pardon, though the latter is necessarily more complete. It results in the complete removal of all estrangement and alienation between God and man. It restores completely the relationship which existed prior to the sin. The total removal of the sin as a result of the Divine forgiveness is variously expressed in the Scriptures: "Thou hast cast all my sins behind thy back" (Isa 38 17); "Thou wilt cast all their sins into the depths of the sea" (Mic 7 19); "I will forgive their iniquity, and their sin will I remember no more" (Jer 31 34); "I, even I, am he that blotteth out thy transgressions" (Isa 43 25); "As far as the east is from the west, so far hath he removed our transgressions from us" (Ps 103 12). Ideally this same result is attained in human forgiveness, but actually the memory of the sin remains with both parties as a barrier between them, and even when there is a complete restoration of unity the former state of alienation cannot be entirely removed in memory. When God forgives, however, He restores man to the condition of former favor. Release from punishment is involved, though Divine forgiveness is more than this. In most cases the consequences, which in some instances are spoken of as punishment, are not removed, but they lose all penal character and become disciplinary. Nor does the forgiveness remove from human mind the consciousness of sin and the guilt which involved, but it is a Divine permission to put away the thought of the alienation. Mistrust is changed into trust, and this produces peace of mind (Ps 32 5–7; Rom 5 1); consciousness of the Divine love and mercy (Ps 103 2 f); removes fear of punishment (2 S 12 13); and awakens love to God.

Paul rarely uses the term "forgiveness," but in its place prefers justification. They are to his understanding practically synonymous (Stevens, Theology of the NT, 418).

7. Forgive—preferred the latter, however, because justification cause it was better fitted to express the idea of secure, present and permanent acceptance in the sight of God. It connoted both a complete and a permanent state of grace. It was the one word for forgiveness in the NT, the one word used. It is, of course, incomprehensive, but in the Bib. sense it means no less than this. It removes all of the guilt and cause of alienation from the past; it assures a state of grace for the present; and promises Divine mercy and aid for the future. Its fulness cannot adequately be conveyed by any one term or formula.

Forgive, like human forgiveness, is always contingent upon the fulfillment of conditions. It must be preceded by repentance and a firmly fixed intention not to repeat the offence. In addition to this, one was required to conform to certain legal or formal acts before the assurance of pardon was given. These were expressive of the sinner's state of mind. They consisted of certain acts that Christian tradition regarded as acts of baptism, during the ministry of John the Baptist (Mat 3 4; Lk 3 5) and under Christ (Acts 2 38; 22 16). These acts are never regarded as in any sense a quid pro quo in return for which the benefit of forgiveness is granted. It is an act of pure grace on God's part, and these acts are required as expressions of the man's attitude toward God. The state of mind required in order to obtain the gift of forgiveness, which is the Proverbs (Lk 15 17–19), and that of the sinner who went to his house justified rather than the Pharisee (Lk 15 14), because he realized that forgiveness was to him an act of pure favor.

There was real and actual forgiveness of sins in the OT times as well as since Christ. Certain passages have been construed to teach that the Law provided only for a passing over or rolling back of sins, and that there was not then an actual for-demonstrated it by showing Himself to be the possessor of the Divine gift of healing. The impostor might claim some such intangible power as the authority to forgive sins, but he would never assert the possession of such easily disproved power as the ability to heal the sick. But Jesus claimed both, and he alone claimed to be the possessor of the former on the demonstration that He possessed the latter. God would not support an impostor, hence his aid in healing the paralytic proved that Jesus could forgive sins. The multitude accepted this logic and "glorified God, who had given such authority unto men" (Mt 9 2-3; cf Mk 2 5-12; Lk 5 18-26).

On the other hand, when possession of this power was under discussion (Lk 7 36-50), He offered no other part of the forgiven woman's deep gratitude and love. One expression that He uses, however, has raised some discussion as to the relative order in time of her love and forgiveness (ver 37). Did she, was she forgiven, or vice versa? Manifestly the forgiveness precedes the love, in spite of the fact that ver 37 seems to assert the opposite, for this is the bearing of the parable of the Two Debtors (vs 41-43), and the latter part of ver 7 would make this clear. It is clear that she had previously repented and had been accepted, and the announcement of Jesus was an outpouring of her gratitude. The phrase of ver 47, "for she loved much," is the proof of the greatness of her sin rather than a reason why she was forgiven. In both cases, where Jesus forgave sins, He did so because the state of mind of the person forgiven showed worthiness of the blessing. To think of this as an easier forgiveness than any other occasion when Christ's prayer on the cross (Lk 23 34) would not avail to secure the pardon of His murderers without their repentance.

Though forgiveness is on God's part an act of pure grace prompted by His love and mercy, and though He forgives freely all those who comply with the condition of repentance and abandonment of sin, Atonement yet this does not dispense with the necessity of an atonement. The parable of the Prodigal Son was spoken to teach the freedom of God's forgiveness and acceptance of returning sinners, and the duty of men to assume the same attitude toward them. It teaches, but it fails to set forth entirely God's attitude toward sin. With reference to the sinner God is love and mercy, but with reference to sin He is righteous, and this element of God's nature is no less essential to His attitude toward sin, and must not be dispensed with at any cost. The phrase of ver 28, "for she loved much," is the proof of the greatness of her sin rather than a reason why she was forgiven. In both cases, where Jesus forgave sins, He did so because the state of mind of the person forgiven showed worthiness of the blessing. To think of this as an easier forgiveness than any other occasion when Christ's prayer on the cross (Lk 23 34) would not avail to secure the pardon of His murderers without their repentance.

11. The NT further shows that God's forgiveness is an ordinance in the teachings of the NT (Rom 5 10; 2 Cor 5 18-21; Col 1 21). It is very clearly implied.

12. The NT in such terms as reconciliation and Doctrine of propitiation, and is no less present in Atonement, pardon, remission and forgiveness. The doctrine of the atonement is not developed by Jesus, but it is strongly hinted at and is unmistakably implied in the language of Mt 20 28; 26 28; Mk 10 45; Lk 21 46-47. Join the Baptist's baptism, "Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world!" (Jn 1 29), also implies it. In the writings of the apostles it is repeatedly and clearly affirmed that our forgiveness and reconciliation to God is based upon the death of Christ. "In none other is there salvation" (Acts 4 12), through Him the Father has reconciled all (Col 2 13). God sends Him forth to be a propitiation (ver 25); through Him "we have now received the reconciliation" (5 11); "God was in Christ reconciling the world unto Himself" (2 Cor 5 19); "Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf" (ver 21); "I have been delivered out of the curse of the law, having become a curse for us" (Gal 3 13). Such citations might be greatly multiplied. That which was so perfectly accomplished by the offering of Christ was in an analogous though imperfect way accomplished by the sacrifices required by the Law. It had "a shadow of the good things to come" (He 10 1).

The unvarying effect of sin is to produce an estrangement from the one punished for it; and God, the nature of God is such and the relationship between Him and man is of such a character that sin brings about an alienation between them. It is this presupposition of an estrangement between them which renders the atonement necessary before forgiveness can be granted. The atonement must be removed, and the alienation be transformed into a reconciliation. In what way then does the alienation consist?

The sin of man produces a changed attitude toward each other on the part of both God and man. God holds no personal pique against man because of his sin. The NT language is very carefully chosen to avoid any statement which would seem to convey such a conception. Yet God's holy righteousness demands that man be punished for his sin. His wrath must rest upon the disobedient (Jn 3 36; Rom 1 18). It is not merely impersonal. It is not enough to say He hates the sin. Man's unrighteousness has not merely alienated him from God; it has alienated God from him also. The word "enemies" (ethchlor) of Rom 6 10 is passive, and means the object of God's enmity (Sunday, ad loc.). It was because of this fact that God set forth Christ to be a propitiation to show His righteousness because of God's passing over of sins done aforetime (2 3 5-26). God's passing over, without inflicting punishment, the sins of pre-Christian times had placed in jeopardy His righteousness; had exposed Him to the implication that He could tolerate sin. God could not thus accommodate such a sin with such an imputation, and so instead of visiting punishment upon all who sinned—which would have been one way of showing His righteousness—He set forth Christ to death ("in his blood"), and in this way placed Himself beyond the imputation of unrighteousness while it enabled Him to show mercy to sinners. The effect of sin upon man was to estrange him from God, to lead him farther and farther away from His Maker. Each successive sin produced a barrier between man and God. Now the atonement was designed to remove the cause of this estrangement and restore the former relationship between God and man. This too, it has been observed, is the purpose of forgiveness, so that the atonement finds its true meaning in forgiveness. It should be noted that the reconciliation originates with God and not with man (Rom 3 25; 2 Cor 5 19). God woe man before the latter seeks God. The effect of the atonement on man is to reconcile him, attract him, to God. It shows him God's love for man, and the forgiveness, in that it removes sin completely, takes away the estranging factor between them and so wins man back to God.

"We love, because he first loved us." At the same time the atonement is such a definite expression of both the love and the righteousness of God that, while on the one hand it exhibits his yearning for man, on the other it shows that He is not tolerant toward sin. In the atonement of Christ, therefore, is the meeting-place and the reconciliation of God's holy horror of sin and the free bestowal of forgiveness upon penitent believers.

FORK, fork (צָרָה בּוֹשֵׁה, צָרָה בּוֹשֶׁה): This compound word, meaning strictly "three points" or "three prongs" is found in (1 S 13 21) and doubtless there refers to the agricultural tool now known as the pitchfork. It might, however, also be a weapon.

FORM, form (יוֹצֵא, יָגוֹר, יָנוֹה, otor; morphē, morphē):
(1) To form is "to fashion," "create," "produce." In the OT it is for the most part the tr. of יָגוֹר, "to form," "to fashion" (Gen 2 7, etc.; "Jeh God formed man of the dust of the ground," etc.); also of הַלְּ-defense, "to be twisted," "to turn round," "to bring forth [in pain]" (cf Isa 13 8; Mic 4 10; Dt 32 18 AV; "God that formed thee"); Job 26 13 AV; Ps 90 2; "or ever thou hadst formed the earth," etc; Prov 26 10 AV). In the NT we have ἀποφήγη, "to form" (Gal 4 19, "until Christ be formed in you"); πλάσσω, "to form," "to mold" (Rom 9 20; him that formed it); 1 Tim 2 13, "Adam was first formed," 2 Mace 7 23, "the Creator who formed the generation of men"; RV "fashioned." ver 29, "that formed the members [διαρρηκτάναι], RV 'brought into order'."

FORMER, fôr-mēr: The word in the sense of "maker," "framer," occurs only in Jer 51 10, "He is the former [from ār, "to form"] of all things. The adj., in the sense of preceding in the order of time, is commonly in Heb the tr of כַּדָּר מָן, "first," "foremost" (Gen 40 13; Nu 21 26; Dt 24 4, etc); in Gr of próteros (Eph 4 22; He 10 32; 1 Pet 1 14); and in two cases (Acts 1 1; Rev 21 4) of pródos, where RV has (in Acts in m) the "first.

As denoting place in position the word occurs in the OT in Zec 8 18, "the former sea" as tr. of כֵּדֶמֶת, "in front," where RV has "eastern," i.e. the Dead Sea, in contrast with the Mediterranean, or western sea (cf Ezk 47 18; Joel 2 20). For "former inquires" (Ps 79 6) RV has simply "the inquires"; other changes may be seen in Nu 6 12; Isa 66 7; Ezek 36 11; Mic 4 8; Hag 2 3.

FORTH, forth: "Forth," advb. (from "for"), signifies movement (1) forward, (2) out of, (3) beyond a certain boundary. In a few instances in the OT it is the tr. of the prep. 'al, properly "above," "upon" (2 K 11 13; 2 Ch 23 14; Am 7 17 AV), and of 'al, "without" (Gen 39 13; Jgs 19 25). "Forth" is often used as an explanatory word, as "break [forth]," "bring [forth]," "call [forth]," etc.

In the Gospel of John it is the tr of εἰς, "without," as "Lezarus, come forth" (11 43; so 16 16; 19 4 AV, etc; also Acts 5 34; 9 40). "Stand forth" in Mk 3 3 is the tr. of εἰς τὸ μέσον, "in Arise into the midst." RV has a great many changes, frequently substituting "out," "away," "abroad," etc; "forth from" for "out of" (Job 41 21; Isa 46 23); "spread forth" for "stretched out" (Ps 44 20; 86 4; 136 6), etc. In Col 1 6, for "bringeth forth fruit" RV reads "bearing fruit."

in the Eng. version "bulwark" (Isa 26 1) or "rampart" (Nah 3 8, where the waters of the Nile served the same purpose). Professor MacaUster estimates ancient Hittite site we gather that the cities about

"were already surrounded by masoned walls, supported by numerous external towers, and entered through gateways barred by a pair of double doors and guarded by wing towers on either hand" (Land of the Hittites, 367). For illustrations, see Crr.

Bogaz-kale: the Hittite Fortress Called Yonise Kaleh.

Every one of these ancient cities had an inner fortress which would be an internal means of protection, the main gate to the extremity. At Tell Zakariyah the acropolis wall has been traced, and its shape has been found to be conditioned by the contours of the hill on which it stood. In an old Hittite document a fortress has been found rectangular in shape and supported by an outer and lower wall at a distance of 12 to 30 yds. (Land of the Hittites, 162) to the west that had been constructed on or bluff originally occupied the fortress or acropolis of the city when it spread out over a larger area, and this seems to have been the case for some time at least with the Jebusite fort taken by David and made the capital of the kingdom. At Sinjerl, while there was a wall surrounding the whole township, there was an outer as well as an inner defensive wall. Upon this citadel were found palaces from which the Assyrian king, Tiglath-pileser I, copied the plan of a Hittite palace, called in Assyrian Hitat.

The excavations enable us to see the progress of the art of fortification from very primitive beginnings.

7. Masonry work were the materials of the earliest walls. They are usually found of unworked field stones. The facings of stone and the joints in walls were often packed with pebbles or with limestone chippings, the stones themselves being more or less roughly trimmed and dressed to shape by a hammer. Corner-stones are found in the towers showing marks of the chisel, but it is not till well on in the Heb period that stones are found with bosses and marginal drafting. At Zakariya the walls of the acropolis were of rubble kid in mud, mixed with straw without lime, and they contained some well-worked stones, irregularly intermingled with field stones of various sizes. At a later time mortar was used to cover the walls and give greater strength and support. But the clay used for the purpose was apt to crack unless it was given consistency by treading with the feet and mixing with the water. Thus we read of a wall daubed with untempered mortar (Ezek 13:10-16; 32:28; cf Nah 3:14). In the masonry of the Can. period there is no appearance of the use of mortar. In the Hittite fortress (see [6] above) the masonry of the inner wall is rough, dry stone walling, while the outer is built of stones roughly pentagonal in shape, irregular in size, fitted to one another and laid without mortar, somewhat like the Cyclopean walls of the earliest periods of Gr history. See Gezer.

The gates of the fenced cities of Canaan may not have had the social importance which the city gate came to possess in later times, but they were essential elements of the defensive works of a city. They were as few as possible, so as to give only the necessary ingress and egress. The gate of Jericho was shut and secured at nightfall (Josh 2:5). The gate of Gaza had two leaves which were not hinged to the two gate-posts, but turned on pins moving in sockets in the sill and lintel, the bar striking between the two posts and let into them to secure the gate (Jgs 16:3, with Moore's notes). The hundred gates of Babylon, according to Herodotos, were all of brass (i.179); and Jeho promises to Cyrus to break in pieces the doors of brass and to cut in sunder the barn of iron (Isa 45:2). That the bars were sometimes of wood is clear from what is said of the barns of Nineveh (Nah 3:13). To protect the gate it was supplied with towers. Uzziah built towers in Jerus at the corner gate and at the valley gate, and fortified the wall (2 Ch 26:9). In the inner wall of Gezer, to which reference has been made, a gate of very remarkable structure has been found. The wall is of stone, but the gateway consists of a passage between two solid towers of brick. The passage is 9 ft. wide and 42 ft. long, roughly paved with stones. Stone slabs on each side of the passageway bear traces of fire, and the absence of any wooden barrier may be due to a conflagration at the capture of the city, to prevent the damaging and raising of the total height of about 16 ft. In later times watchmen were set on the tower over the gate to deserv the approach of friend or foe or messenger (2 S 18:24 ff.), and the tower had chambers in it which might be occupied by the watchman or by a guard. For the more general purposes see Gate.

One of the essential requisites of the primitive Can. fortress was a supply of water. At Gezer a copious spring without need was available. Tell el-Hesy commands the only springs in that region (A Mound of Many Cities, 16). It is a strong point in favor of the modern theory of the ridge of Ophel being the site of Zion or David's town that the Virgin's Fountain, the only perennial spring in the whole circuit of Jerus, was close to it, and would have been an inducement to the Jebusites to build their fortress there. In the sites that have been excavated, cisterns, sometimes vaulted over and with steps down into them, have been constantly found. Traces have also been observed of concealed passages or tunnels by which access has been obtained to the nearest spring. Some such explanation is found in the towers showing marks of the chisel, but it is not till well on in the Heb period that stones are found with bosses and marginal drafting. At Zakariya the walls of the acropolis were of rubble kid in mud, mixed with straw without lime, and they contained some well-worked stones, irregularly intermingled with field stones of various sizes. point to the account of the resettlement of the city in the days of Abah, when Had the Bethelite rebuilt Jericho, laying the foundation thereof with the loss of Abiram, his firstborn, and setting up the gates thereof with the loss of his youngest son Segub (1 K 16:34). See Corner Stone; Canaan.

In the Book of Jgs we read of the strong tower, or citadel, of Tbehez, into which the inhabitants had crowded to which Abimelech was setting fire when a woman upon the wall hurled a millstone upon him and broke his skull (Jgs 9:51 f). It does not appear that at this period the Israelites were in possession of the strongholds of the land, for when the Philis overran the country, they had no fortresses to flee to, but "did hide themselves in caves, and in thickets, and in rocks, and in covert, and in pits" (1 Sm 13:5).

When David captured the Jebusite fortress (2 S 5:6 ff) and transferred his capital from Hebron to Jerus, a new era of independence and Although Solomon was a man of peace, he included among the great buildings which he executed fortresses and works of defence. He built the wall of Jerus round about, to the height of Millo (called Akra ["citadel"] in the LXX), and closed the breaches of the city of David, so that there might be no vulnerable point found in the defences of the city (1 K 9:15). This fortification is represented in LXX, which has here an addition to the MT, as securing the complete subjection of the original inhabitants who remained. Solomon also built Hazor to watch Damascus, Megiddo to guard the plain of Jezreel, and Gezer overlooking the maritime plain, his work being one of refortification rather than of building from the foundation. He fortified also Beth-horon, Upper and Nether, to block the way against Phili invasion. The store cities, and cities to accommodate his chariots and horses, were also part of his military system (1 K 9:18 ff).

The disruption of the kingdom, and the jealousy and hostility that followed between Judah and Israel, necessitated fresh undertakings of fortification, on the part of both kingdoms. Rehoboam dwelt in Jerus, and built cities for defence in Judah. He fortified the strongholds and provisioned them and stored arms and men in case of siege (2 Ch 11:5 ff).

One of Jeroboam's first acts on ascending the throne was to build the two fortresses, Shechem to guard Mt. Ephraim, and Penuel to protect Gilead (1 K 12:25 ff). Baasha later pushed his frontier still farther, capturing the citadel of Jerus, fortifying Ramah to oversee Asa in his very capital. The long war which lasted through the reigns of Jeroboam, Nadab, Baasha and Elah, kings of Israel, was largely a war of sieges, one of them, that of Gibbethon, having apparently lasted 27 years (1 K 15:27, compared with 1 K 15:15 ff).

With Omri there arose in Israel a powerful ruler whose name is mentioned with respect in the Assyrian monuments, which designate the Kingdom of Israel Mat Bū Khamrī, "the land of the house of Omri." He was the builder of Samaria which remained the capital of the Northern Kingdom till its fall in 722 BC. In excavations but recently carried out by the archaeological expedition of Harvard University, the walls of Omri's palace and fortress were laid bare, giving an impression of the great strength of the place.

While Solomon built the wall of Jerus, we read that Uzziah built towers at the corner gate, and at the valley gate, and at the turning of the wall, and fortified them (2 Ch 26:9). Jotham his son, continued his father's labors in the further fortification of the city (2 C 37:4). Hezekiah had good reason to add still further to the strength of the city, seeing that he had to bear the brunt of Sennacherib's expedition to the west. Sennacherib boasts that of Hezekiah's fortified towns, he captured 46, with innumerable fortresses besides (Schrader, COT, I,

3. In the Maccabean struggle, the Akra (1 Mace Period of 1-33; 3:45, etc), the citadel, was long the Return held by a Syrian garrison, and was in the end delivered up to the high priest by Demetrius (10:32). Notable also still later was the castle of Antonia (Acts 22:24) on the site of the earlier castle of Nehemiah's day (Neh 2:8; 7:2).

III. In the Psalms and the Prophets.—Under the image of a fortress, or mountain fastness, inaccessible to any common foot, where there is perfect safety from enemies and Psalms persecutors, the Psalmist delights to express his confidence in God, in virtue of His righteous judgments, is a high tower to the downtrodden, a place of refuge and security (misgābb) to those who are in trouble (Ps 9:9). When he exults in the strength of God who has given him deliverance, he multiplies words to utter his confidence: "I love Thee, O Jehovah, my strength. Jehovah is my rock, and my fortress [םֵמְצָדָה], ... my God, ... my high tower [מִשָּׁגָד]," (Ps 18:12). Thirteen times in the Psalms we find this word: 9:9; 18:2; 46:7; 69:9; 16:17 (where AV translates "defences") and RV "high tower").

The original source of Hos 9:8, 11, 14 (where AV translates "fortresses") is employed (Ps 31:2; lit. "house of fortresses"); 91:2; 144:2). If we were at liberty to accept such psalms as Ps 18 and 69 as Davidev, the appropriateness of them to the circumstances of the Shepherd King when persecuted by Saul, taking refuge in the caves of Adullam and enduring the perils and anxieties of an outlaw's life, would at once be apparent.

Although Jeremiah has been called the weeping prophet, yet for the fearless fulfilment of his commission to a gain-saying people, God made him "a fortified city [לָשָׁבֶּה], Prophets and an iron pillar, and a brazen wall" (Jer 1:18; of 6:27; 15:20). Hoses in the Northern Kingdom predicted the destruction of its "fortresses" (םֵמְצָדָּה) by the invading Assyrians (10:14; cf. 8:14). The prophets in proclaiming God's message to their day addressed themselves not only to Israel and Judah, but also to those great world-nations with which the Hebrew people had relations. In the oracles of the prophets to the nations—to Egypt, Babylon, Assyria, Syria, Edom, and others—we obtain glimpses of great and fortified cities like No-amon (Thebes), Babylon, Nineveh, Damascus, whose national defences and added fortifications did not save them from capture and destruction. And the teaching of the prophets for the comfort of Israel and Judah is that Jehovah was a better defence to them than the great rivers of Assyria and Babylon were to those beyond the Euphrates. When Nineveh was at the height of her pride, fierceness and worldly glory, Nahum asks her: "Art thou better than No-amon [Thebes of Egypt], that was situate among the rivers, that had the waters round about her; whose rampart [בִּלְתָּב] was the sea [the Nile], and her wall [בָּמָה] was the sea?" (Nah 3:8). Of Nineveh itself we know that it was protected, not only by walls and fortresses of great strength, but also by canals and streams drawn round the city. Yet Nahum dedicates his sublime apostrophe: "All thy fortresses shall be like fig-trees with the first-ripe figs: if they be shaken, they fall into the mouth of the eater!" (ver 12). Babylon had walls whose strength and height, as described by Herodotus and other historians, were fabulous. Its great monarch Nebuchadrezzar was in his day the greatest ruler of the East, and Sir Henry Layard has told that scarcely a brick unearthed in the mounds of the great Babylon plain was without his name. Yet when the day of reeking came, the wall, said to be mountain-high, and 80 ft. thick, with its meat so broad that an arrow could not be shot over it, and all its elaborate works of defence, were as if they had not been — they surrendered to Cyrus without a blow being struck. It is in the visions of the prophets, in the universal peace which is to accompany the restoration of Israel, that we hear of "them that are at rest, that dwell securely; all of them dwelling without walls, and having neither bar nor gates" (Ezk 38:11). "In that day shall this song be sung in the land of Judah: We have a strong city; salvation will he appoint for walls and bulwarks" (הֵל) (Isa 26:1). "Violence shall no more be heard in thy land, desolation nor destruction within thy borders; but thou shalt call thyself, thy walls Salvation, and thy gates Praise" (60:18). Building of fenced cities, with riding upon horses and military preparation, was a note of the false prophet, who urged alliances with foreign powers such as Assyria and Egypt, and relied too much upon the material resources of the nation. The true prophet realized that the strength of the nation lay in God and urged the people to put their trust in him (Hos 8:14). "Jerusalem," says Zechariah in the days of the Return, "shall be inhabited as villages without walls, by reason of the multitude of men and cattle therein." Per I, saith Jehovah, will be unto her a wall of fire round about, and I will be the glory in the midst of her" (2:5; of 8:4). I.

IV. In the New Testament.—In a well-known passage (2 Cor 10:3-5), St. Paul, as he often does, draws upon his knowledge of Roman methods of warfare, and introduces for the enforcement of great spiritual lessons the pulling down of "strongholds" as the ultimate object of every campaign. The word employed (ὀκταροῦματα) is the Gr equivalent of the Heb word commonly rendered "fortress" (םֵמְצָדָּה). "The 'strongholds' are the rock forts, such as those which once bristled along the coast of his native Cilicia and of which he must often have heard when his father told him how they were 'pulled down' by the Romans in their wars against the pirates. Those 'high things that exalt themselves'—those high eminences of the pride of Nature—occupied in force by hostile troops—had been a familiar experience. In many wars throughout Asia Minor, while one of the grandest of all was the Acropolis that towered over Corinth" (Dean Howson, The Metaphors of St. Paul, 34).

From the stairs of the Castle of Antonia, St. Paul, by leave of Claudius Lysias, the commandant of the garrison at Jerus, in whose charge he was, addressed the excited crowd and told the story of his conversion.

2. In the Acts of the Apostles Antonia was the quarters, then, as it was from the top of the ancient Roman garrison, which occupied the Jewish capital (Acts 21:37; Jn 18:28); and the same site is to this day covered with a Turkish barracks.

Although it is not mentioned by name, the gloomy fortress of Machærus on the E. of the Dead Sea is believed to have been the scene of the imprisonment and murder of John the Baptist. The description of it given by Jos (BJ, VII, vi. 1) shows it to have been a place of imposing strength. "It was a tower, that this fortress should be demolished lest it might draw away many into rebellion because of its strength: for the nature of the place was very capable of affording sure hope of safety to those who held it, and delay to their enemies. For what was defended by a fort was itself a rocky htil, rising to a very great height, which circumstance alone made it very difficult for any enemy to approach it. It was also defended by Nature that it could not easily be approached; for it is impossible to reach the summit of this hill, so deep that the eye cannot reach their bottoms, nor are they easy to cross over, and it is quite impossible to fill them up with earth.

Macquaire, like the Herodium, Jotapata, Masada, figured largely in the tragic scenes of the Jewish War so graphically described by Flavius Josephus and Macalister.

FORTUNATUS, for-ti-natus (φορτουνήθες, Phortounades, Phortounates): A Rom. proper name turned into Gr; same as Lat adj. fortunatus, meaning "blessed," or "fortunate." Found only once in the Bible (1 Cor 16 17). Fortunatus, with Stephanas and Achaicus, was an amabassador of the Corinthian church, whose presence at Ephesus refreshed the spirit of the apostle Paul.

FORTUNE, for'tün (Gad): A god of Good Luck, possibly the Hyades. See ASTROLOGY, 10.

FORTY, for'ti (חַטָּן, ḥattân; ἑδαίης, ἑδαίη, ἑδαίος; σπουδάος, spoudatos): As an advb. "forty" has the meaning of "onward" in space or time, or in the movement of affairs. As an adj. it has the sense of "readiness," "williness," etc. The advb. only is found in the OT. It is the tr of hâlîk, "distance," "onward," in space (Nu 32 19; 1 S 10 3); in time (Ex 39 22); from that day and forward; 43 27); once of yîdâl, "to cause to go up," "advance" (Job 30 13, "They set forward [advance or help or my calamity]"; twice of lphâmîn, "to the front" (Jer 7 24; Ezek 20 22); they went every one straight forward, lit. "on the face of the earth"); once of l'phâmîn (Job 23 8, "Behold, I go forward, but he is not there"); once with nîkhâh, "to smile" (2 K 3 24); frequently in Nu, and once in Ex, of nîtâp, "to lift up," "remove," "journey" (Ex 14 15, "Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward"); Nu 1 51, "who the tabernacle setted forward; 2 24 AV, They shall go forward, etc); it is also the tr of nîqâp (Piel), "to be over," "to take the lead," or "to superintend" (1 Ch 23 4, "to set forward [or carry that way forward]; once of yîdâl, "to cause to go up," "advance") (Job 30 13, "They set forward [or carry that way forward]; once of yîdâl, "to cause to go up," "advance" (Job 30 13, "They set forward [or carry that way forward]; once of yîdâl, "to cause to go up," "advance")

For the word "foundation" in Hebrew, the words of 1 Cor 16 17 in the King James Version are not used: the transliteration of the Hebrew is not found in any other passages of the Bible. The Hebrew word for "foundation" is not used in the Septuagint or the New Testament. The word is used in the Old Testament to refer to the establishment of a nation or a city. In the New Testament, the word is used to refer to the establishment of a church or a charitable organization.

FOUNDER, foun'der (from ἡγαρῆφ, ἡγαρῆφ): A worker in molten metal (Acts 17 4, etc.). The word in AV in Heb 10 14; 17 17 is rendered in RV "goldsmith," and in 20 4 for AV "posts," "foundations." See RHEINER; GOLDSMITH.

FOUNTAIN, foun'tin, foun'tain: In a country where no rain falls for half of the year, springs assume an importance unknown in more favored lands. In both eastern and western Pal and even in Lebanon there are many villages which depend entirely upon reservoirs or cisterns of rain water. Others are situated along the courses of the few perennial streams. But wherever a spring exists it is very apt to be the nucleus of a village. It may furnish sufficient water to be used in irrigation, in which case the garden surrounding the fountain will become an oasis in the midst of the parched land. Or there may be a tiny stream which barely suffices for drinking water, about which the village women and girls sit and talk waiting their turn to fill their jars, sometimes until far in the night. The water of the village fountain is often conveyed by a covered condit for some distance from the source to a convenient spot in the village where an arch is built up, under which the water gushes out. See Cistern; Spring; Well; En-, and place-names compounded with En.

Figurative: (1) of God (Ps 36 9; Jer 2 13; 17 13); (2) of Divine pardon and purification, with an obvious Messianic reference (Zec 13 1); (3) of wisdom and godliness (Prov 13 14; 14 27); (4) of wives (Prov 6 18); (5) of children (Dt 33 28; Ps 127 3); (6) of power (Ps 33 14; 107 6; 114 8; Hos 13 15); (7) of the heart (Ecc 12 6; see Cistern); (8) of life everlasting (Rev 7 17; 21 6).

FOUR, for (222,) [arba; τέσσαρες, tēssares]: “Four” (cardinal number) was a sacred and complete number with the Hebrews, as well as with several other peoples. It occurs very frequently in the OT and the NT.

(1) It indicates completeness. We have the four rivers of Paradise (Gen 2 10); the four winds of heaven (Ezk 37 9; Dnl 7 2; 8 8; 11 4; Zec 6 5, RVm “spirits”; 2 Esd 13 5); “the four winds” (Mt 24 31; Mk 13 27); “the four corners of the earth” (Lk 1 12; Acts 7 1; 20 8; AV “quarters”); “the four corners of the house” (Job 1 19); Jephthah’s daughter was bewailed four days a year (Jgs 11 40); “four cities” are several times mentioned in Josh in the allotment of inheritances (19 7; 21 18, etc); Nehemiah’s enemies sent him “four times” (Neh 6 4); “four kinds” (RVm “family”s) of destroyers were threatened, Jer 16 3; Jeh’s “four sere judgment” (Ezk 14 21); “four generations” were seen by Job (42 16).

(2) “Four” is frequent in prophetic visions:

Daniel saw “four . . . beasts” arise, representing four kings (7 3 17); “four notable horns” (8 8 22; cf 2 Esd 11 39); “four gates” (2 Esd 3 19; four wings, 15 2 AV); “four horns” were seen by Zechariah, as the powers that had scattered Israel, and “four smiths” (RV) as powers that would cast the four horns down (1 18 21); “four chariots and . . . horses” represented the “four spirits,” AV and RVm (better than “winds”), that “went forth from standing before the Lord of all the earth” (6 1 5); in the visions of Ezek, “of four living creatures,” each with four faces, four wings, etc., were the bearers of the throne of God (1 5 1 23); so, in the visions of John there were “four living creatures” (5 1 6 1 20) of the altar of incense (20 2; 27 25); of the breastplate of the high priest (28 16; 39 9); of the panels of the graving upon the mouth of the brazen or molten sea in Solomon’s temple (1 K 7 31); of the inner court of Ezekiel’s temple (Ezk 40 47); of the “holy oblation” of the city of Ezekiel’s vision (48 20, r̃ighthouse”, “fourth”); of the new Jerus of John’s vision (Rev 21 16, tetragonos), and conveys the idea of perfect symmetry. In AVm of 1 K 6 31 we have “five-equal-footed” square stalls formerly used for equal-aided, as it still is in “three-square flée.”

FOURTH, for‘tēn. See Number.

FOURTH PART. See Four.

FOWΛ, noun (ἡμίτως, Ἰππος; πετείνων, peteinōn): The word is now generally restricted to the larger, esp. the edible birds, but formerly it denoted all flying creatures. In Lev 11 20 AV we have even, “all fowls that creep, going up on all four,” ver 21 “every flying creeping thing that goeth upon all four.”

The word most frequently used “fowl” is Ἰππος from Ἰππος, “to cover, a crest, a quill; it is used collectively for birds and fowl in general (Gen 1 20);” (2 19 20, etc); ἐκγή (from ἐκ, “to rush”) means a ravenous beast, or bird of prey, used collectively of ravenous birds (Gen 15 11 AV; Isa 18 6 AV "fowls"); Job 28 7; "a path which no fowl knoweth" (Gen 14 RV "no bird of prey");

1. OT

Terms and References in Isa 46 11 it is used as a symbol of a conqueror (cf Jer 12 9, "bird," "birds of prey"); Ezek 39 4, "ravenous birds"); ἐσείρης, Aram. ēsērēsh (from šāpar, "to twitter or chirp"), "a chirper" denotes a small bird or sparrow (Dt 4 17 AV; Neh 5 18; Dn 4 14); to give the caecases of men to the fowls (birds) of the air was an image of destruction (Dt 28 26 AV; 1 S 17 44.46; Ps 79 2; Jer 7 33, etc); barburin, rendered (Is 4 23) "fatted fowl" (among the provisions for Solomon's table for one day), is probably a mimetic word, like Gr bárbaros, Lat murmur, Eng. babble, perhaps denoting gape from their cackle (Genius, from bārār, "to cleanse," referring to their white plumage; but other derivations and renderings are given. They might have been ducks or swans. They could have been guineas or pigeons. The young of the ostrich was delicious food, and no doubt when Solomon's ships brought peafowl they also brought word that they were a delicacy for a king's table. The domestic fowl was not common so early in Pal, but it may have been brought by Solomon with other imports from the East; in NT times chickens were common; ba'al kānāh, "owner of a wing," is used for a bird of any kind by Prov 26 2. In vain is the net spread in the sight of any bird. AVm "Heb, in the eyes of everything that hath a wing."

In the Levitical law fowls (birds) were distinguished as clean and unclean (Lev 11 13 f); Dt 14 19 fowls (Mt 10 29); they were allowed to be eaten because they fed on carrion: "fowl is petērion, "winged fowl." "The fowls of the air" (RV "the birds of the heaven") are pointed out by Our Lord as examples of the care and providential care of God (Mt 6 26; Illustrative Lk 12 24); in another connection the Uses of sparrows (struthion) sold cheap, probably for food, are so employed (Mt 10 29, "Are not two sparrows sold for a penny?"

2. in the NT the common word for "fowl" is petērion, "winged fowl." "The fowls of the air" (RV "the birds of the heaven") are pointed out by Our Lord as examples of the care and providential care of God (Mt 6 26; Illustrative Lk 12 24); in another connection the Uses of sparrows (struthion) sold cheap, probably for food, are so employed (Mt 10 29, "Are not two sparrows sold for a penny?"

3. NT Ref. to Our Lord as examples of the care and providential care of God (Mt 6 26; Illustrative Lk 12 24); in another connection the Uses of sparrows (struthion) sold cheap, probably for food, are so employed (Mt 10 29, "Are not two sparrows sold for a penny?"

FOWL, FATTED. See preceding article.

Fowler, fōl'ér (Greek wōlē; yōkēsh): A professional birdcatcher. In the days previous to firearms, birds were captured with nets spread on the ground, in traps and snares. There was a method of taking birds from next, raising them by the hand, and when they had become very tame, they were confined in hidden cages so that their voices would call others of their kind to the spot and they could be killed by arrows of concealed bowmen or the use of the throw-stick (Eccles 11 30). This was a stick 11 ft. in length and 6 to 8 in. diameter, hurled with a rotary motion at the legs of the birds and was very effective when thrown into flocks of ground birds, such as partridge or quail, esp. if the birds were running up hill. There was also a practice of sewing a captured bird's eyelids together and confining it so that its cries would call large numbers of birds through curiosity and they could then be taken in the several ways mentioned. The fowlers supplied the demand for doves and other birds used for caged pets, and furnished the market with wild pigeons and doves for sacrifice and such small birds as were used for food. Ps 91 3:

"For he will deliver thee from the snare of the fowler, And from the deadly pestilence."

This is David's promise that the Almighty will deliver us from the evil plans laid to ruin us, as a bird sometimes in its struggles slips the hair and escapes from the "snare" (q.v.) set for it. Ps 121 7:

"Our soul is escaped as a bird out of the snare of the fowlers: The snare is broken, and we are escaped."

Here is the fulfillment of the former promise in a cry of rejoicing. Sometimes the snare held fast, sometimes it broke; then the joy in the heart of a bird man was like the wild exultation in the escape of the escaping bird. Prov 6 5:

"Deliver thyself as a roe from the hands of the hunter, And as a bird from the hand of the fowler."

With methods so primitive as these for taking birds, it must have occurred frequently that a stunned, wounded or entrapped bird slipped even from the hand that held it and made good its escape. Jer 5 26: "For among my people are found wicked men: they watch, as fowlers lie in wait; they set a trap, they catch men." Here is the plain comparison strongly drawn between wicked men entrapping their fellow's fowlers taking unsuspecting birds.

The last reference is in Hos 9 8: "Ephraim was a watchman with my God: as for the prophet, a fowler's snare is in all his ways, and enmity in the house of his God." Wherever he goes, the prophet is in danger of being trapped. Gene Stratton-Porter

FOX (בֵּית, shēbāl; of Arab. بَلْدَة, thalab [Jgs 15 4; Neh 4 3; Psa 65 10; Cant 2 15; Lam 6 18; Ezk 14 4]; לְשָׁם, lēšām, alt. Ezra 3 80; Lk 9 58; 12 20): The foxes of different parts of Europe and Western Asia differ more or less from each other, and some authors have given the local types distinct specific names. Tristram, for instance, distinguishes the Egyptian fox, Vulpes nilotica, of Southern Pal, and the tawny fox, Vulpes flavescens, of the N. and E. It is possible that the range of the desert fox, Vulpes leucopus, of Southwestern Asia may also reach Syria. We have, however, the authority of the Royal Natural History for considering all these as merely local races of one species, the common fox, Vulpes alopex or Canis vulpes. The natives of Syria and Pal do not always distinguish the fox and jackal although the two animals are markedly different. The jackal and wolf also are frequently confounded. See DRAGON; JACKAL.

In Ps 63 9 f we have, "Those that seek my soul, to destroy it, ... shall be given over to the power of the sword: they shall be a portion for foxes" (sthr'd'ms). It has been thought that the jackal is meant here (RVM), and that may well be, though it is also true that the fox does not refuse carrion. In RVM, "jackal" is suggested in two other passages, though why is not clear, since the rendering "fox" seems quite appropriate in both. They are Neh 4 3, "... if a fox go up, he shall break down their stone wall," and Lam 5 17 f, "... our eyes are dim; for the mountain of Zion which is desolate; the foxes walk upon it." RVM also has "jackals" in Jgs 16 4 f, where Samson "caught three hundred foxes ... and put a firebrand in the midst between every two tails ... and let them go into the standing grain of the Philis, and burnt up both the shocks and the standing grain, and also the vineyards." Jackals are probably more numerous than foxes, but the substitution does not appreciably diminish the difficulties in the way of any natural explanation of the story. In Cant 2 15 we have a reference to the fondness of the fox for grapes. In Mt 8 30 and Lk 9 38 Jesus says in warning to a would-be follower, "The foxes have holes, and the birds of the heaven have nests; but the Son of man hath not where to lay his head." Foxes differ from most of the Canidae in burrowing holes for their lairs, unless indeed they take possession of the burrow of another animal, such as the badger. In Lk 13 32 Jesus compares Herod to a fox.

FRAGMENT, fra'gment (φλάσμα, kldasma): "Fragment," a piece broken off, occurs only in the pl., in the accounts of the miracles of the Loaves in the Gospels and references thereto. It is the tr of kldasma (from klá, "to break"), "a piece broken off" (Mt 14 20 AV); "broken meat" (15 37).

FRANKINCENSE, frank'in-sense (βασαλίς, Bbshá-neh, from root meaning "whiteness," referring to the milky color of the fresh juice: Ex 30 24; Lev 2 1 f. 15; 5 11; 6 15; 24 7; Nu 5 15; 1 Ch 9 29; Neh 13 5 9; Cant 3 6; 4 6 14; Isa 43 23; 60 6; 66 3; Jer 6 20; 17 26; 41 5; trd in the last six references "incense" in AV, but correctly in RV; Middot, Libanius). The Eng. word is derived from old Fr. frame nce, i.e. "pure incense"). Among the frankincense of the pharmacopoea is a gum derived from the common fir, but the frankincense of the Jews, as well as of the Greeks and Romans, is a substance now called Olibanum (from the Arab. el lubán), a product of certain trees of the genus Boswellia (N.O. Amyridaceae), growing on the limestone rocks of south Arabia and Somaliland (Isa 60 6; Jer 6 20). The most important species are B. Carteri and B. Freerana. Some of the trees grow to a considerable height and send down their roots to extraordinary depths. The gum is obtained by incising the bark, and is collected in yellowish, semitransparent tears, readily pulverized; it has a nauseous taste. It is used for making incense for burning in churches and in Indian temples, as it was among the Jews (Ex 30:24). See INCENSE. It is often associated with myrrh (Cant 3:6; 4:6) and with it was made an offering to the infant Saviour (Mt 2:11). A specially "pure" kind, βήβονά'h zakkáh, was presented with the shewbread (Lev 24:7).

FRANKLY, frank'i (κρατήριον, charismatí): "Frankly" in the sense of "freely," "readily," "graciously," occurs only in the tr of charismatí, properly "to gratify," "to do that which is grateful or pleasing," "to forgive" (Lk 7:42, "He frankly forgave them both," RV has simply "forgave"; the same word is tr in ver 43, AV and RV, "forgave," in ver 21 AV it is "gave," RV "bestowed," granted to see). It occurs in the NT only in Lk and Paul.

FRAY, frá (יוֹרֵד, ḥarádh, "to make afraid," "cause to tremble:" AV of Dt 28:26; Jer 7:33; Zec 1:21; RV "frighten," "terrify"). See WAR.

FRECKLED, frek'ld, SPOT (נְפָרִי, bòhëh); LXX δακρύς, ἀφίθιος, called in RV "aetter," and described as a "shining spot (bòhëh b'hóhëh)"). These white eruptions did not render the person so marked ceremonially unclean (Lev 13:39). This form of skin disease is described by Hippocrates as usually of no great importance and indicative of a state of health concerning which it is probable it formed some form of local psoriasis. There is a cognate modern Arabic word applied to a facial eczematous eruption. For other references to skin diseases, see LEPROSY.

FREE, FREEDOM. See Choice; Will.

FREEDMAN, fréd'man, FREEMAN, fré'man: The term occurs in 1 Cor 7:22; Col 3:11, and Rev 5:15, and represents two slightly different words. In 1 Cor 7:22 the word is διακατέχειν, apeléthethos, "a free man," one who was born a slave and has received freedom. In this case it refers to spiritual freedom. He that was in bondage to sin has been presented with spiritual freedom by the Lord. In Rev 5:15 the word is simply διακατέχειν, eleuthéretos, "a free man" as opposed to a slave.

FREELY, fre'li (יוֹרֶד, ḥarádh; עָפֵר, ṣôphéh, אֲפָרָה; שָׁפָר, dòrèph, ṣôphéh, parrhésios, parrhésios, parrhésios fúndos): "Freely" occurs in three senses: (1) Gratix, for nothing (Nu 11:5, ḥánäm, "for nought," "the fish which we did eat in Egypt freely," RV "for nought"); Mt 19:8, dòrèph, "Freely ye have received, freely give," RV omits "have"; Rom 3:24, "being justified freely by his grace"; 2 Cor 11:7, "I have preached to you the gospel freely," RV "for nought"; Rev 21:6; 22:17, "Take the water of life freely"; charismatí (Rom 8:22) is tr "freely give," RV "charishtóita (1 Cor 2:12), "the things that are freely given," RV has "were" for "are." (2) Willingly, spontaneously: ṣôphéh, ṣôphéh, "willing offering" (Ps 4:6, "I will freely sacrifice unto thee," RV "with a freewill-offering"); Hos 14:4, "I will love them freely;"); ṣôphéh, "to give willingly" (Ex 2:28, RV "willingly offered"); of 1:6; ṣôphéh Aram. (7:15; of vs 13:16). (3) Without hindrance or restraint, ṣâbhah, "to eat" is rendered in Gen 2:16, "Thou mayest freely eat of every tree of the garden"); 1 Sam 14:30, "if... the people had eaten freely;" parrhésios, "to speak freely, openly, boldly" (Acts 26:26, "Unto whom also I speak freely"); metà parrhésios, "with full speech" (2:29, "I may say unto you freely").

RV has "have drunk freely" for "will drunk" (Jn 2:10). The word is methhôsó, Pass. "to become drunk." Comparison with Lk 12:45; Eph 5:18; 1 Thess 5:7; Rev 17:2, where the same word is tr AV "made drunk," RV "made drunken" (Mt 24:49; Lk 2:15; 1 Cor 11:21, 22; Rev 16:13, "drunken"), will show that the meaning is "drunk," which was the rendering of Tyndale and Cranmer; Vulg has cum inebriati fuerint; Plummer renders "have become drunk, are drunk."
painful" (Lev 13:51-52; 14:44, "a fretting leprosy"); in verse 55 we have "it is fret inwardly" ("fret," past part.), as the tr of ṭkheleth from pāḥath, "to dig" (a pit), the word meaning "a depression," "a hollow or sunken spot in a garment affected by a kind of leprosy." RV 'it is fretful' for "angry." (Prov 21:19), in " vexation."

FRIED, frtd. See BREAD, III, 3, (2); FOOD, II; LOCUSTS.

FRIEND, friend, FRIENDSHIP, friend'ship: In the OT two words, various trs 'friend' or 'companion': ḫēheth, rēh, indicating a mere associate, passing friend, neighbor, or companion; ḫēn, ḥabib, indicating affection natural or unnatural. In the NT also two words: ērōs, ἀγαπή, "a comrade," or "fellow," and φίλος, φίλος, suggesting a more affectionate relation.

Literature abounds in concrete examples of friendship of either kind noted above, and of profoundly philosophic as well as sentimental and poetic exposition of the idea of friendship. Notable among these are the OT examples. Abraham, because of the intimacy of his relations, was called the "friend of God" (2 Ch 20:7; Isa 41:8; Jas 2:23). "Jeh speake unto Moses face to face, as a man . . . unto his friend" (Ex 33:11). The romantic aspect of the friendship of Ruth and Naomi is interesting (Ruth 1:16-18). The devotion of Hushai, who is repeatedly referred to as David's friend (2 S 15:37; 16:10), is a notable illustration of the affection of a subordinate for his superior. The mutual friendship of David and Jonathan (1 S 18:1), from which the author is made to say, "The soul of Jonathan was knit with the soul of David, and Jonathan loved him as his own soul," is another example. Again in his pathetic lament for Jonathan (2 S 1:20), David says in highly emotional tones that his love "was wonderful, passing the love of women." Elijah and Elisha form a unique illustration of semi-professional affection (2 K 2).

In the NT, Jesus and His disciples illustrate the growth of friendship from that of teacher and disciple, lord and servant, to that of friend and friend (Jn 13:13-15). Paul and Timothy are likewise conspicuous (2 Tim 1:2).

In general lit. we have the classic incident, recorded by Plutarch, of Damon and Pythias during the rule of Dionysius. Pythias, condemned to death, was about to be executed but desired to see his family. Damon offered himself as a ransom in case he should not return in time for the hour of execution. Returning in time, both were released by the great Dionysius, who asked to be taken into the secret of such friendship. The writings on friendship are many. Plato and Cicero have immortalized themselves by their comments. Cicero held dearly the friendship of Scipio, declaring that of all that Nature or Fortune ever gave him there was nothing which could compare with the friendship of Scipio. Bacon, Emerson, Black, Gladden, King, Hills, and many others in later days have written extensively concerning friendship. The best illustration of the double use of the word (see above) is that in Prov 15:24, "He that maketh many friends doeth it to his own destruction; but there is a friend that sticketh closer than a brother." Again, "Iron sharpeneth iron; so a man sharpeneth the countenance of his friend." The honesty and frankness of genuine friends are set forth in the maxim, "Faithful are the wounds of a friend!" "WALTER G. CLIPPINGER

FRIENDS, CHIEF FRIENDS (ὁ φίλος τῶν φίλων, ὁ τὰ πρῶτα ἔχων): Expressions used in 1 and 2 Mac to designate the favored courtiers of the Antiochi. Mattathias is promised enrolment among the king's Friends, to tempt him to apostatize (1 Mac 2:18); Alexander Balas writes Jonathan among his Chief Friends (10:65). Cf also 1 Mac 3:36; 6:10:14; 10:9; 11:4, 26; 2 Mac 8:9.

FRINGES, frin'jas (ῥαφή, ῥαφίς, "tassel, lock" [Nu 15:38-39, ῥαφία, ῥαφίτων, "twisted threads," "tissues" [Dt 22:12]): Tassels worn by the Israelites on the four corners of their garments as reminders of "all the commandments of Jehovah," in accordance with the law set out in Nu 15:37-41 and Dt 22:12. These tassels originally contained a thread of ṭkheleth, "violet." Jewish tradition, however, has failed to retain the ṭkheleth, because of doubt as to the exact meaning of the term, and instead dark blue lines were dyed on the borders of the tallit or garment in which the fringes were placed. According to tradition any garment having four corners required the mnemonic fringes, the importance of which was weighed against "all the commandments of the Lord." In NT times such garments were still worn (cf Mt 9:20; 14:36; 23:5). The later Jews, after adopting the garments of the Diaspora, in order to observe the ἐγγυματοσύνη commandment began to use two extra four-cornered fringed garments: the large ἐγγυματοσύνη while at prayer, and the small ἐγγυματοσύνη, or ὀρέσση καυφήδα, as an undergarment during the day. Their tradition preserves the exact manner in which each tassel shall be made, and gives a symbolic meaning to the numbers of windings and knots, somewhat after the manner of the string-writing of several early civilizations (of the Peruvian quipus). Thus in the ἐγγυματοσύνη a long cord is wrapped around seven shorter cords first seven times, then eight, then eleven, and finally thirteen, each series being separated from the others by two knots. The numbers seven and eight constituting fifteen, together suggest πΥ, and the number eleven, πΥ, together they make up the holy name Yahweh. The number thirteen stands for τῦρα, of which as numerals equal thirteen. The sentence Yahweh 'elohiym means Yahweh is one.'

Many other suggestions, more or less fanciful, have been worked out, all tending to associate the fringes with the Law in the mind of the weaver. See Dress.

FROCK, frok (ころ, simlāh; ṣamānu, hāmānūn): The hempen frock, mentioned in Ecclesiastes 40 as a mark of the lowly, was a simple garment consisting of a square piece of cloth wrapped around the body. It is the same as the garment (simlāh) which we find the poor man using as his only bed covering by night (Ex 22:26); the traveler, as the receptacle for his belongings (cf Ex 12:34); and the common people of both sexes as their general outer garments, though there was some difference in appearance between the simlāh of the man and that of the woman (Dt 22:5). See Dress.

FRONTIER, frot’ter, frunt’ter (getContextualised, kōphā;): The word occurs once in Ezk 25 9. RVm has “in every quarter.”

FROST, frost (getContextualised, kēphār, “hoar-frost,” Ex 16 14; Job 38 29; <contextualised, bānānām, perh., “the aphid,” Ps 78 47; <contextualised, kerēv, “cold,” Gen 31 40; Job 37 10 AV; Jer 36 30): A temperature of freezing or lower is called frost. Dew forms when the temperature is decreased; and if below freezing, the dew takes the form of a white film or covering over rocks and leaves. This white covering is called hoar-frost. Like dew it is the result of condensation of the moisture of the object on which they radiate their heat quickly. In order that condensation may take place the atmosphere must be sufficiently saturated. It may be expected on clear, still nights when the radiation is sufficient to reduce the temperature below the freezing-point.

In Syria and Palestine frost is a very rare occurrence at sea-level; but on the hills and plains it is usual in winter, beginning in November, and on the highest elevations throughout the year. Late spring frosts in March or early April do great damage to fruit. In clear weather there is often a great variation in the temperature of the day, especially in the open plains, and this may injure the inlands, from which the heat takes the form of a white film or covering over rocks and leaves. FUGITIVE, fu'ji-tiv (עַקִּי) — The term was used in the Talmud as the name of the tribe east of the Jordan, but in the Authorized Version is used for various senses, e.g., fugitive, a fugitive, as a fugitive. (Job 36:16, R.V., rendered "fugitive," the margin "fugitive") FULFIL, fū'f'il (מָלֵל, מָלָל; ἀπλεόω, πλέων, πλέλω, πλελοῦ, πλέον, with other words) — "Fullfil" is used (1) in a sense more or less obsolete, "to fill up," complete (Gen 29:21, 28; Ex 23:26; Job 36:17, RV "full;" m "filled;" Mt 3:15, "to fill all righteousness;"); Phil 2:2, "Fulfil ye my joy," ARV "make full;" cf 2 Cor 10:6; (2) in the sense of "to accomplish," "to carry into effect," as to fulfil the word of Jeh (1 K 2:27; 8:15,24; 2 Ch 36:21, etc.; in the NT frequently used in the fulfilment of prophetic Scripture (Mt 1:22; 2:15, etc.). Love is declared to be "the fulfillment" (πληροφορία, "fulness") of the law (Rom 10:13). For "fulfil" RV has "do" (Rev 17:17); for "fulfilled" has "performed" (2 S 14:22), "accomplished" (Exz 1:1; Mt 5:18; 24:34; Lk 21:32; Jn 19:28), with numerous other changes.

FULLER, fu'ler (צֵפֵר, kābhaš; lit. "to trample," γναπέθες, gnaphes): The fuller was usually the dyer, since, before the woven cloth could be properly dyed, it must be freed from the oily and gummy substances naturally found on the raw fiber. Many different substances were anciently used for cleansing. Among them were white clay, putrid urine, and the ashes of certain desert plants (Arab. kali, Bib. "soap," Mal 3:2). Any fuller's shop was usually outside the city (2 K 18:17; Isa 7:3; 36:2), first, that he might have sufficient room to spread his cloth for drying and sunning, and second, because of the offensive odors sometimes produced by his process. The Syrian indigo dyer still uses a cleaning process closely allied to that pictured on the Egyptian monuments. The unbleached cotton is soaked in water and then sprinkled with the powdered ashes of the ismnān, locally called kalī, and then beaten in heaps on a flat stone either with another stone or with a large wooden paddle. The cloth is washed free from the alkali by small boys treading on it in a running stream or in many changes of clean water (cf En-rogel, lit. "foot fountain," but tr also "fuller's fountain" because of the fullers' method of washing their cloth.) Mark describes Jesus' garments at the time of His transfiguration as being whiter than any fuller on earth could whiten them (Mk 9:3).

FULLER'S FIELD, fu'ler's field, THE (חֵרֵשׁ כֹּבֵב, s'dhīk kābhīb): In all references occurs "the conduit of the upper pool, in the highway of the fullers' field;" this must have been a well-known landmark at Jerus in the time of the monarchy.

Here stood Rabshakeh in his interview with Elia- kim and others on the wall (2 K 18:17; Isa 36:2); clearly the highway was within the city. South of the walls. Here Isaiah met Ahas and Shear-jashub his son by command of Jeh (Isa 7:3). An old view placed these places somewhere near the present Jaffa Gate, as here runs an aqueduct from the Birket Hammon el Batarah inside the walls; the former was considered the "Upper Pool" and is traditionally called the "Upper Pool" of Gihon. But these pools and this aqueduct are certainly of later date (see JERUSALEM). Another view puts this highway to the N. side of the city, where there are extensive remains of a "conduit" running in from the N. In favor of this is the fact that the N. was the usual side for attack and the probable position for Rabshakeh to gather his army; it also suits the conditions of Isa 7:3. Further, Joe (BJ, v. iv, 2) in his description of the walls places a "Monument of the Fuller" at the N.E. corner, and the name "fuller" survived in connection with the N. wall to the 7th cent., as the pilgrim Areuil mentions a gate W. of the Damascus gate called porta Villas Fullomia. The most probable view, however, is that this conduit was one connected with Gihon, the present "Virgin's Fountain" (see Gihon). This was well known as the "upper spring" (2 Ch 25:13, 30), and the name, if that know, was at the source, would probably be called the "Upper Pool." In this neighborhood—or lower down the valley near En-rogel, which is supposed by some to mean the "spring of the fuller"—is the natural place to expect the aqueduct running along the Kidron valley between the Virgin's Fountain and the junction with the Tyropoos was the probable scene of the interview with Rabshakeh; the conversation may quite probably have occurred across the valley, the general idea of some part of the cliffs now covered by the village of Siloam.

FULNESS, fu'ness: The tr of πληροφορία, πληρόμα — which is generally, but not invariably, rendered "fulness" in the NT. Etymologically, πληρόμα— which itself is derived from the vb. πλέω, "I fill," signifies "that which is or has been filled;" it also means "that which fills or with which a thing is filled;" then it signifies "fulness" or "filling." In the Gospels it occurs as follows: Mt 9:16 and Mk 2:21: in both of these passages it means the "fulness," that by which a gap or defect is filled up, when an old garment is torn his cloth for drying and sunning, and second, because of the offensive odors sometimes produced by his process. The Syrian indigo dyer still uses a cleaning process closely allied to that pictured on the Egyptian monuments. The unbleached cotton is soaked in water and then sprinkled with the powdered ashes of the ismnān, locally called kalī, and then beaten in heaps on a flat stone either with another stone or with a large wooden paddle. 2. Its Use

Of these 12, no fewer than 8 are in Eph in the use of these 12, no fewer than 8 are in Eph and Col. The references are these: Pauline Rom 11:12, "If he . . . their loss [is] the Epistle riches of the Gentiles; how much more their fulness?" The 'fulness' of Israel here refers to their being, as a nation, received by God to a participation in all the benefits of Christ's salvation. Ver 25, "A hardening . . . hath fallen Israel, until the fulness of the Gentiles be come in." 13:10, "Love . . . is the fulfilment [the fulfilling] of the law." That is, love is not a partial fulfilment, by obedience to this or that commandment, but a complete filling up of what the law enjoins. 15:29, "I shall come in the fulness of the blessing of Christ." 1 Cor 10:26, "The earth is the Lord's, and the fulness thereof." Gal 4:4, "when the fulness of time was come." The fulness of the time is that portion of time by which the longer antecedent period is completed. Eph 1:10, "unto a dispensation of the fulness of the times." Ver 23, "the church, which is his body, the fulness of him that filleth all in all. The church is the fulness of Christ: the body of believers is filled with the presence, power, agency and riches of Christ. 3:19, "that ye may be filled unto all the fulness of God"—that ye may be wholly filled with God and with His presence and power and grace. 4:13, "unto the measure of the fulness of Christ." Col 1:19, "In him should all the fulness dwell." 2:9, "In him dwelleth all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (cf Lk 2:40:32; 4:1).

Fulness in Eph and Col is used to present some of the most prominent thoughts in these epistles, sometimes referring to Christ, sometimes to the church and the individual believer. Eph and Col (Col 2:4-10 A.V.) cannot separate "the fulness of Christ" in this passage (ver 13) from the statement in 1:23, that the Christ is being fulfilled, and finds His fulness in the church. When all the saints have come to the unity which is their destiny, or in other words, to the full-grown man, the Christ will have been fulfilled. Thus they will have together reached "the full measure of the maturity of the fulness of the Christ" (J. Armitage Robinson, Comm. on Eph, 183). The church and individual believers have, by faith, the full possession of all that Christ has to impart—the grace and comfort and strength of Christ received by them now. Cf Jn 1:16; 'In him ye are complete, are made full' (Col 2:10); that is, the fulness of moral, intellectual and spiritual perfection is communicated by Christ to all who are united to Him. "When as the result of the Holy Spirit's inward strengthening, Christ dwells within the heart, and His knowledge-surpassing love is known, the only limit to spiritual excellence is to be filled unto all the fulness of God!" (HDB, 735).

In the passages from Col, "the fulness" in Christ is contrasted with the mediating aeons or angel-powers or spiritual manifestations by the False God and the world. The false teachers at Colossae seem to have used "fulness" as a technical or semi-technical term, for the purpose of their philosophical or theosophical teaching, employing it to signify the entire series of angels or aeons, which filled the space or interval between a holy God and a world of matter, which was conceived of as essentially and necessarily evil. Teaching of this sort was entirely derogatory to the person and work of Christ. In opposition, therefore, to the Colossian false teaching in regard to "the fulness," Paul shows what the facts really are, that in Christ dwells all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. The fulness of the Godhead is the totality of the Divine powers and attributes, all the wealth of the being and of the nature of God—eternal, infinite, unchangeable in existence, in knowledge, in wisdom, in power, in holiness, in goodness, in truth, in love. The fulness of the nature of God—life, light, love; and this has its permanent, its settled abode in Christ. All that is His own by right is His by His Father's good pleasure also. It was the Father's good pleasure that in Christ should all the fulness dwell.

Any limitation, therefore, of the meaning of "fulness," which would make the indwelling of the fulness of the Godhead in Christ a matter either of the future, or of the past only, is inconsistent with what is said of "the fulness" in Eph, in Col 1:19; 2:9. The reference in both passages is to the timeless and eternal communication of the fulness of the Godhead from the Father to the Son.

It was in a sense developed along the lines of the Colossian teaching regarding "the fulness," that the Gnostics afterward used the term. See Gnosti-

FURNACE, für'nis. See Burial.

FURNACE, fürnás. The word is used in the OT EV to translate several Heb words:

Kibšan, in Gen 19:28, where the smoke of the destruction of the cities of the plain (Gen 19:24; 20:10 A.V.) ascended as "the smoke of a furnace" (Lk 9:8, where Jeh commands to take "handfuls of ashes of the f. and . . . sprinkle it toward heaven," etc.

Kār, in Dt 4:20, where Jeh is represented, when speaking of taking the children of Israel out of Egypt, as taking them "out of the iron furnace." 2 Māli, in Ps 12:6, where "the words of Jehovah" are said to be "pure," "as silver tried in a furnace." of Prov 17:3, "if for gold.

Attān, in Dn 3:6, where mention is made of "a burning fiery f. into which Daniel and his companions were cast. There is good reason to believe that these words all stand for either a brick-kiln or a smelting furnace.

In the NT a notable figurative use is made of the word in the phrase "the f. of fire," ἡ ἄψυχος τοῦ πάση, ἥ λέοντινον λοι πάριν. It is found in the parable of the Tares (Mt 13:22) as part of the remarkable imagery of that parable; while in the companion parable of the Drag-Net (ver 50) it stands as a symbol of the final destiny of the impotent, a synonym of "hell." of Jer 29:22; Dan 2:49, Rev 10:14—15, esp. and "eternal fire" (Mt 25:41), "unquenchable fire" (3:12), "the Gehenna of fire" (5:22: B 19:9 Mf 9:43 m, etc). A fact which modern travelers speak of, that furnaces for punishment have been found in Persia as elsewhere in the East, stands some light upon this use of the expression "the f. of fire."

FURNACES, TOWER OF (Neh 3:11). See Jerusalem.

FURNISH, für'nish (Ntrv, ἀπο-μακρύνω, ἀπο-κομίζω, ἀπο-θηματίζω): To "furnish" is to supply with what is useful or necessary, to fit out, provide, equip. It is the tr of several Heb or Gr words of αἰμαδ, "to fill in up," or "to make complete" (Lev 8:11 AV; nēō, to lift up," or "sādāk, Hiphil, prob. "to lay on the neck," or "to encircle" (with a bracelet) (Dt 15:14), of a slave set at liberty; or sārakh, "to arrange in order," or "to lay out a table" (Ps 78:19 AV; Prov 9:2); or sāāh "to make a vessel for containing things" (Jer 46:19, "Furnish thyself to go into captivity." RVm "Heb, make thee vessels of captivity"); ἀποκαθαρίζομαι, "to be filled" (Mt 22:10 AV); στριμώμενον, "to stew," "to spread" (Mk 14:15, Lk 22:13); or sāātā, "to complete fully," "to equip" (2 Th 3:17).

In Eccles 29:26 we have "furnish a table" (koσ-tôme: 44:6, "furnished with ability" (chérēbēb); 1 Macc 14:34 AV, "He furnished them with all things" (thēmēi).

W. L. WALKER
FURTURE, för'ni-tür (נֵחַ, kār, כַּלּ, kēlām; εὔκολον, skekōn): In Gen 31 34 kār is tr4 "furniture" in AV, but "saddle" in ARV. The latter is decidedly preferable. It was the "camel-basket," or the basket-saddle of the camel, which was a sort of palanquin bound upon the saddle. Upon this saddle-basket Rachel sat with the teraphim hidden beneath, and her wily father did not suspect the presence of his gods in such a place. In other places the word kēlām is used, and is generally rendered "vessels," though sometimes "furniture." It may have many other renderings also (see BDB). Ex 31 7; 39 33 mention the furniture of the Tent, which is specified in other places. Moses is instructed (26 9) to make a sanctuary or tabernacle and the furniture thereof according to the pattern shown in the Mount. The furniture of the Court consisted of the brazen altar and laver (40 29.30); that of the Holy Place, of the table of showbread, the golden lampstand and altar of incense (39 36; 40 22-26; He 9 2); that of the Holy of Holies, of the ark and mercy-seat overshadowed by the cherubim. The tribe of Levi was set apart by Jehovah to "keep all the furniture of the tent of meeting" (Nu 3 8). When David organized the tabernacle-worship in Jerusalem and assigned the Levites their separate duties, certain members were "appointed over the furniture, and over all the vessels of the sanctuary" (1 Ch 9 29). In Nah 2 9 the sing. form of the word kēlām is used, and is rendered "furniture." The prophet refers to the abundant, costly, luxurious furniture and raiment, largely the results of their conquests and plunder in many countries.

In Acts 27 19 the word skekōn is tr4 in AV and RV "tackling," with "furniture" in RVm.

By way of information regarding the general furniture of the house little is said directly in the Scriptures. The chamber built for Elias upon the wall contained a bed, a table, a seat, and lampstand. This was doubtless the furnishing of most bedrooms when it could be afforded. The prophet Amos had a supreme contempt for the luxurious furniture of the grandees of Samaria (3 12; 6 4). For full particulars see HOUSE; TABERNACLE; TEMPLE.

FURROW, für'o (ינַעַר, ἤλοχος, "tiden"): The word is tr4 "furrows" in Job 39 10; 31 38; Ps 65 10; Hos 10 4; 12 11 (Ps 65 10 AV, "ridges"). In these passages the fields are pictured as they were in the springtime or late autumn. When the showers had softened the earth, the seed was sown and the soil turned over with the plow and left in furrows, not harrowed and pulverized as in our modern farming. The Syrian farmer today follows the custom of the old Semitic predecessors.

Another word, הַרְגָּדָה (חרָגָדָה, "furrows") in AV, is probably more properly rendered in ARV "transgressions" (Ps 10 10). See AGRICULTURE; PLOW.

FURTHER, för'ühr, FURTHERANCE, för'thär-ans (ἔγχειρία, ἐπεράγετο, "further"): Further, advb. and adj., is comparative of "forth," meaning "to a greater distance," "something more," "moreover," etc; the vb. "to further," means "to help forward," "advance," "assist." The vb. occurs (Ezr 3 8) as the tr of nāṣā', "to lift up." "They furthered the people and the house of God" (of 1 K 9 11; Ezr 4 3); of πυλ' "to send forth," "carry out" (Ps 140 8, "Further not his evil device").

Furthest is the tr of prokephū, "a going forward," "advance" (Phil 1 12, "the furtherance of the gospel," RV "progress," ver. 25, "for your furtherance and joy," RV "progress").

Furred is the tr of elā', "then," "so then" (He 12 9); of τοῦ πέμπτου, "for the rest," or "as to the rest" (1 Thess 4 1, RV "finally then").

RV omits "further" (Acts 12 3); has "further" for "more than right" (Job 34 23); for "farther than" (Mk 19 20), different text: "What further need have we of witnesses?" for "What need we any further witnesses?" (14 63); "your fellowship in furtherance of the gospel" (Phil 1 5; 2 22); "to the furthermost bound" for "all perfection" (Job 28 3).

FURY, für'i (Ἀδραπές, ἀλαζόρ, "not to forget," "significant of revenge"); Occurs only in 2 Macc 7 9 AV, "Thou like a fury" [RV "Thou, miscreant"] takest us out of this present life." See also WRATH; FIERCENESS; ANGER.

FUTURE, för'tūr, fūchur. See ESCHATOLOGY.

GAAL, gā'al (גַּאל, "collector"): A man of whose antecedents nothing is known, except that his father's name was Ebed. He undertook to foment and lead a rebellion on the part of the inhabitants of Shechem against Abimelech, son of Gideon, and his rebellion failed (Jgs 9 26-45). See also ABIMELECH.

GAASH, gā'ash (גַּאשָׁה, ga'ash): First mentioned in connection with the burial place of Joshua "in the border of his inheritance in Timnath-serah, which is in the hill-country of Ephraim, on the north [side] of the mountain of Gaash" (Josh 24 30; cf. Jgs 2 9); see TIMNATH-HERES. The "brooks," or rather the wadis or "watercourses" of Gaash are mentioned as the native place of Hiddai (2 S 23 30), or Hurai (1 Ch 11 32), one of David's heroes. No likely identification has been suggested. See EPHRAIM; MOUNT.

GABA, gā'ba (גַּבָּא, gāba'ah [in pause]). See GABA.

GABAIL, gab'bāl (גַּבְּאָל, Gaboah, Gaboah; Vulg "Gabeus"): (1) An ancestor of Tobit (Tob 1 1).

(2) A poor Jew of Raphia, a city of Aquilia, to whom Tobit lent ten talents of silver (1 14). The money was restored to Tobit in the time of his distress through his son Tobias, whom the angel Raphael led to Gabai at Rages (1 14; 4 1.20; 5 6; 6 9; 10 2).

GABATHA, gab'a-tha (גַּבָּתָה, Gabatha): A cunning of Mardocheus (Ad Est 12 1).

GABBAI, gab'bā (גַּבָּי, gabbay, "collector"): One of the chiefs of the Benjamites in Jerusalem after the return from the Babylonish captivity (Neh 11 8).

GABBATHA, gab'a-tha: Given (Jn 19 13) as the name of a special pavement (τὰ βάπτιστήριον, τὸ τίθέμενων εἰς τὸ βάπτιστήριον), and is probably a transcription of the Aram. נֹבֶצָה, gab‘batha, meaning "height" or "ridge." Tradition which now locates the Prac-torium at the Antonia and associates the triple Rom-arch near there with the "Ecce Homo" scene, natu-really identifies the massive Rom-pavement, with blocks 4 ft. x 3 ft. and 2 ft. thick, near the "Ecce Homo Arch," as the Gabbatha. This paved area is in places roughened for a roadway, and in other places is marked with incised designs for Rom games of chance. The site is a lofty one, the ground falling away rapidly to the E. and W., and it must have been close to, or perhaps included in, the Antonia. But apart from the fact that it is quite improbable that the Praetorium was here (see Par-consumption), it is almost certain that the building was a mosaic pavement (of Est 1 6), such as was very common in those days, and the site is irretrievably lost.

GABBE, gabhē (ταβή, Gabū; AV Gabbed [1 Eed
5 20]): Called Gaba in Ezr 2 26.

GABRIAS, gābri-as (ταβριας, Gabria): Brother of Gabael (q.v.). In Tob 4 20 he is described as his father. The readings are uncertain.

GABRIEL, gābri-el (גָּבַרְיָא, gabriel, "Man of God"); γαβριήλ, Gabriel): The name of the angel commissioned to explain to Daniel the vision of the ram and the goat, and to give the prophecy of the 70 weeks (Dan 8 16; 9 21). In the NT the name is the angel of the announcement to Zacharias of the birth of John the Baptist, and to Mary of the birth of Jesus (Lk 1 19-26). Though commonly spoken as if an archangel, he is not so called in Scripture.
He appears in the Book of En (chs 9, 20, 40) as one of 4 (or 6) chief angels. He is "set over all powers", exists, with the others, the cry of departed souls for vengeance, is "set over the serpents, and over Paradise, and over the children of Eden." He is pre-ominant in the Jewish Tgs, etc., see Angel.

GAD (גָּד, gād, "fortune"); גָּד, Gad): The seventh son of Jacob, whose mother was Zilpah Gen 30 11), and whose birth was

1. The welcomed by Leah with the cry, "Fort-Name!" Some have sought to connect the name with that of the heathen deity Gad, of which traces are found in Baal-gad, Migdul-gad, etc. In the blessing of Jacob (49 10)
there are traces of the name, as in "man's troop," or "raiding band." "Gad, a troop shall press upon him; but he shall press upon their heel" (Heb gād, gōdish, yəgdhannăh, wā yəgdhūd gōdish). Here there is doubtless a reference to the high spirit and valor that characterized the descendants of Gad. The enemy who attacked them exposed himself to grave peril. In the blessing of Moses again (De 33 20 ff) it is said that Gad "dwelleth as a lioness, and reareth the arm, yea, the crown of the head." Leonine qualities are ascribed to the Gad-ites, mighty men of valor, who joined David (1 Ch 12 8, 14). Their "faces were like the faces of lions, and they were as swift as the raven upon the mountain." Among their captains "he that was least was equal to a hundred, and the greatest to a thousand in battle.

Of the patriarch Gad almost nothing is recorded.
Seven sons went down with him into Egypt, when Jacob accepted Joseph's invitation (Gen 45 16). At the beginning of the

2. The
Torah march Gad numbered 45,650
"from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war" (Nu 1 24).
In the plains of Moab the number had fallen to 40-500 (26 18). The place of Gad was with the standard of the Reubenites, on the S. side of the tabernacle (2 14). The prince of the tribe was Eliasaph, son of Deuel (1 14), or Reuel (2 14). Among the spies Gad was represented by Geuel son of Machi (13 15). See Numbers.

From time to time the dwellers E. of the Jorthan had followed the pastoral life. When Moses had completed the conquest of these lands, the spacious uplands, with their wide pastures, attracted the great flock-masters of Reuben and Gad. In re-response to their appeal Moses assigned them their tribal portions here: only on condition, however, that their men of war should go over with their brethren, and take their share alike in the hardship and in the destruction of the Canaanite Pal (ch 32). When the victorious campaigns of Joshua were completed, the warriors of Reuben and Gad returned to their possessions in the E. They halted, however, in the Jordan valley to build the mighty altar of Ed. They feared lest the glance of the Jordan should in time become all too effective a barrier between them and their brethren on the W. This altar should be for all time a "witness" to their unity in race and faith (Josh 22). The building of the altar was at first misunderstood by the tribal western tribes, but the explanation given entirely satisfied them.

It is impossible to indicate with any certainty the boundaries of the territory of Gad. Reuben by the E of Gad dwelt in Ararat, the S., and Gad Josh 13 26 makes Wady Heebân the southern boundary of Gad. Meshua, however (MS), says that the men of Gad dwelt in Aroth from old time. This is far S. of Wady Heebân. The writer of Nu 32 may have believed Gad to have the northern frontier of Gad; but Josh 13 27 extends it to the Sea of Chinnereth, making the Jordan the western boundary. It included Rabbath-ammon in the E.
We have not now the information necessary to explain this apparent confusion. There can be no doubt that, as a consequence of strife with neighboring peoples, the boundaries were often changed (1 Ch 5 18 f). For the Bib. writers the center of interest was in Western Pal, and the details given regarding the eastern tribes are very meagre. We may take it, however, that, roughly, the land of Gilead fell to the tribe of Gad. In Jgs 5 17 Gilead appears where we should naturally expect Gad, for which it seems to stand. The city of refuge, Mo-moth in Gilead, was in the territory of Gad (Josh 20 8). For description of the country see Gilead.
Reuben and Gad were absent from the muster against Siaca (Jgs 5 15 ff); but they united with their brethren in taking vengeance to 5. History
Benjamin, Jabesh-gilead, from which no contingent was sent, being destroyed (20 f). Jephthah is probably to be reckoned to this tribe, his house, Miapah (Jgs 11 34), being apparently within its territory (Josh 13 26). Gad furnished a refuge for some of the Hebrews during the Philistine oppression (1 S 13 7). To David, while he avoided Saul at Ziklag, certain Gadites attached themselves (1 Ch 12 8 ff). A company of them also joined in making him king at Hebron (see Ch 26). In Gad the adherents of the house of Saul gathered round Ish-bosheth (2 S 2 8 ff). Hither David came in his flight from Absalom (17 24).
Gad fell to Jeroboam at the disruption of the kingdom, and Penuel, apparently, remained in its boundaries. Jeroboam estab. at first (1 K 12 25). It appears from the Moabite Stone that part of the territory afterward passed into the hands of Moab. Under Omri this was recovered; but Moab again asserted its supremacy. Elijah probably belonged to this Gad formed the main theater of the long struggle between Israel and the Syrians. At Ramghileh Ahab received his death wound (ch 22). Under Jeroboam II, this country was once more an integral part of the land of Israel. In 734 BC, however, Tiglath-pileser III conquered and destroyed all Eastern Gal, carrying its inhabitants captive (2 K 15 29; 1 Ch 5 26). This seems to have furnished occasion for the children of Ammon to occupy the country (Jer 49 1). In Ezekiel's ideal picture (40 27, 28), a restored Gad is found as a land tribe. Obediah seems to have forgotten the tribe, and their territory is assigned to Benjamin (ver 19). Gad, however, has his place among the tribes of Israel in Rev 7.

GAD (גַּד, gadh, "fortunate"): David's seer (הֵזֶה, l Ch 21 9; 29 29; 2 Ch 29 25), or prophet (נַבָּה, cf 1 S 2 22; 2 S 24 11). He appears (1) to advise David while he is outlaw fleeing before Saul to return to the land of Judah (1 S 22 5); (2) to rebuke David and give him his choice of punishments when, in spite of the advice of Joab and the traditional objections (of Ex 30 11 ff), he had children with Bath-sheba (2 S 11 24; 1 Ch 21 9 ff); (3) to instruct David to erect an altar on the threshing-floor of Araunah when the plague that had descended on Israel ceased (2 S 24 18; 1 Ch 21 15); and (4) to assist in the arrangement of Levitical music with cymbals, psaltery and harps (cf 2 Ch 29 25). Of his writings none are known, though he is said to have written a history of a part of David's reign (1 Ch 29 29).

GAD (גַּד, gadh, "fortune"): A god of Good Luck, possibly the Hyades. The writer in Isa 65 11 m pronounces a curse against such as are lured away to idolatry. The warning here, according to Cheyne, is specifically against the Samaritans, whom with their religion the Jews held in especial abhorrence. The charge would, however, apply just as well to superstitious and semi-pagan Jews. "But ye that forsake Jeh, that forget my holy mountain, that prepare a table for Fortune, and that fill up mingled wine unto Destiny; I will destine you to the sword, and ye shall all bow down to be slaughtered." There is a play upon words here: "Fill up mingled wine unto Destiny" (נַבָּה, m'nī) and "I will destine (נַבָּה, m'nāth, i.e. portion out) you for the sword" (vs 11,12). Gad and Meni mentioned here are two Syrian deities (Cheyne, Book of the Prophet Isaiah, 185). Schürer (Gesch. d. jüd. Volken, II, 24 n., and bibliography) disputes the reference of the Gr Τόξον (Τίχε) cult to the Sem Gad, tracing it rather to the Syrian 'Astarte' worship. The custom was quite common amongst heathen peoples of spreading before the gods tables laden with food (cf Herod. i. 183, 183; Smith, Rel. of Semites, Lect X).

Nothing is known of a Bab deity named Gad, but there are Aramaean and Arab. equivalents. The origin may have been a personification of fortune and destiny, i.e. equivalent to the Fates. The Nabataean inscriptions give, in pl. form, the name of Meni. Achimenean coins (Pers) are thought by some to bear the name of Meni. How widely spread these Syrian cults became, may be seen in a number of ways: on a altar from the Lower Jordan in Southern France bearing an inscription:

"Belus Fortunae rector, Metisque Magister."

Belus, signifying the Syrian Bel of Apamaea (Driver). Canaanitish place-names also attest the prevalence of the cult, as Basal-gad, at the foot of Hermon (Jos 11 17; 12 7; 13 5); Migdal-gad, possibly Migdel near Askalon (Jos 16 37); Gaddi and Gaddiel (Nu 13 10 f). In Talmudic lit. the name of Gad is frequently invoked (cf McCauley, Journ. d. Etr., IV, 244). Indeed the words of Leah in Gen 30 11 may refer not to good fortune or luck but to the deity who was esp. regarded as the patron god of Good Fortune (cf Kent, Student's OT, i, 111). Similar beliefs were held among the Greeks and Romans, e.g.and (Sen. 94, 61), "... Fortuna, quis est crudorius in nos de te Deus?

Cic. N.D. iii.24, 61,

"Quo in genere vel maxime est Fortuna numeranda."

The question has also an astronomical interest. Arab. tradition styled the planet Jupiter the greater fortune, and Venus the lesser fortune. Jewish tradition identified Gad with the planet Jupiter, and it has been conjectured that Meni is to be identified with the planet Venus. See, however, Astrology, 10.

GADARAH, gad-a-ra, Gadarah (Tādāqā, Gadarah): This city is not named in Scripture, but the territory belonging to it is spoken of as χάρα τῶν Ταμάνων, "country of the Gadarenes" (Mt 8 28). In the Gadarenes passages (Mk 5 1; Lk 8 26, 37) we read: χάρα τῶν Γαδαράνων, χώρα τῶν Γερασήνων, "country of the Gerasenes." There is no good reason, however, to question the accuracy of the text in either case. The city of Gadara is represented today by the ruins of Ḫmmēn—and the hot springs in the Yarmuk valley—about 6 miles S.E. of the Sea of Galilee. It may be taken as certain that the suggestion of Gadara, as the chief city in these regions, extended over the country E. of the sea, including the lands of the subordinate town, Gerasa (q.v.). The figure of a ship frequently appears on its coins: conclusive proof that its territory reached the sea. The place might therefore be called with propriety, either "land of the Gerasenes," with reference to the local center, or "land of the Gadarenes," with reference to the superior city.

Note. - The T.r. reading τῶν Ποσειδονίων, "of the Gerasenes," must be rejected (WH, II, App., 11).

The name Gadara appears to be Sem. It is still heard in Ḫmmēn, which attaches to the ancient rock tombs, with sarcothaphi, to the E. of the present ruins. They are closed by carved stone doors, and are used as storehouses for grain, and also as dwellings by the inhabitants. The place is not mentioned till later times. It was taken by Antiochus the Great when in 219 B.C. the first invaded Pal (Polyb. v, 71). Alexander Jannaeus invested the place, and reduced it after a ten months' siege (Ant, XIII, iii, 3; BJ, I, iv, 2). Pompey is said to have restored it, 63 B.C. (Ant, XIV, iv, 4; BJ, I, vii, 7); from which it would appear to have declined in Jewish hands.

He gave it a free constitution. From this date the era of the city was reckoned. It was the seat of one of the councils instituted by the Hasidim for the government of the Jews (Ant. XIV, iv, 4; BJ, I, vii, 5). It was given by Augustus to Herod the Great in 30 BC (Ant. XV, vii, 3; BJ, I, xx, 3). The emperor would not listen to the accusations of the inhabitants against Herod for oppressive conduct (Ant. XV, x, 2). After Herod’s death it was joined to the province of Syria, 4 BC (Ant. XVII, xi, 4; BJ, II, vi, 3). At the beginning of the Jewish revolt the country around Gadara was laid waste (BJ, II, xviii, 1). The Gadarenes captured some of the boldest of the Jews, of whom several were put to death, and others imprisoned (ib, 5). A party in the city surrendered it to Vespasian, who placed a garrison there (BJ, IV, vii, 3). It continued to be a great and important city, and was long the seat of a bishop (Reland, Pot. 760). With the conquest of the Moesians it passed under eclipse, and is now an utter ruin.

Umm Keis answers the description given of Gadara by ancient writers. It was a strong fortress (Ant. XIII, ii, 3), near the Hieromax.

3. Identify — i.e. Yarmuk (Pliny N.H. xvi)—E. of cation and Tiberias and Scythopolis, on the top Description of a hill, 3 Rom miles from hot springs and baths called Amathia, on the bank of the Hieromax (Onom, s.v.). The narrow ridge on which the ruins lie runs out toward the Jordan from the uplands of Gilead, with the deep gorge of Wady Yarmuk—Hieromax—the N., and Wady el Arab on the S. The hot springs, as noted above, are in the bottom of the valley near Gadara. The ridge sinks gradually to the E., and falls steeply on the other three sides, so that the position was one of great strength. The ancient walls may be traced in almost their entire circuit of 2 miles. One of the great Roman roads ran eastward to Der’ah; and an aqueduct has been traced to the pool of el Khob, about 20 miles to the N. of Der’ah. The ruins include those of two theaters, a basilica, a temple, and many important buildings, telling of a once great and splendid city. A paved street, with double colonnade, ran from E. to W. The route worn in the pavement by the chariot wheels are still to be seen.

That there was a second Gadara seems certain, and it may be intended in some of the passages referred to above. It is probably the Gadara of the modern Jedîr, not far from es-Sali (Buhl, G.A.P., 255; Guthrie). Jos gives Pella as the northern boundary of Perea (BJ, III, ii, 3). This would exclude Gadara on the Hieromax. The southern city, therefore, should be understood as “the capital of Perea” in BJ, IV, vii, 3.

Gadara was a member of the Decapolis (q.v.).

GAIUS, gā'ıwss (Tāwos, Gatos; WH, Galos):

(1) The Gaius to whom 3 Jn is addressed. He is spoken of as the "beloved" (3 Jn vs. 1.2.5.11), "walking in the truth" (vs. 3.4), and doing "a faithful work" (vs. 12), toward them that are brethren and strangers withal (vs. 6). He has been identified by some with the Gaius mentioned in the Apos Conat (VII, 46), as having been appointed bishop of Pergamum by JoJoh.

(2) Gaius of Macedonia, a "companion in travel" of St. Paul (Acts 19 29). He was one of those who were seized by Demetrius and the other silversmiths in the riot at Ephesus, during St. Paul's third missionary journey.

(3) Gaius of Derbe, who was among those who accompanied St. Paul from Greece "as far as Asia," during his third missionary journey (Acts 20 4). In the corresponding list given in the "Contendings of St. Paul" (of Budge, Contendings of the Twentieth Ages, II, 502), the name of this Gaius is given as "Galilus."

(4) Gaius, the host of St. Paul when he wrote the Ep. to the Rom., and who joined in sending his salutations (Rom 16 23). As St. Paul wrote this epistle from Corinth, it is probable that this Gaius is identical with (6). (5) Gaius, whom St. Paul baptized at Corinth (1 Cor 1 14).

IV. Questions of "Galatians"
   1. Introductory—"Galatia" was a name used in two different senses during the 1st cent. after Christ: (1) geographically, to designate a country in the north part of Asia Minor, touching Paphlagonia and Bithynia near the central plateau of Asia Minor, Phrygia W. and S., Cappadocia and Pontus S.E. and E., about the headwaters of the Sangarius and the middle course of the Haly; (2) politically, to designate a large province of the Roman empire, including not merely the country Galatia, but also Paphlagonia and parts of Pontus, Phrygia, Pisidia, Lycaonia and Isauria. The name occurs in 1 Cor 16 1; Gal 1 2; 1 Pet 1 1, and perhaps 1 Tim 4 10. Some writers assume that Galatia is also mentioned in Acts 16 6; 18 23; but the Gr there has the phrase "Galatian region" or "territory," though the Ev has "Galatia"; and it must not be assumed without proof that "Galatian region" corresponds with "Galatia." If e.g. a modern narrative mentioned that a traveler crossed British territory, we know that this means something quite different from crossing Britain. "Galatian region" has a different connotation from "Galatia."" And even if we should find that geographical name was equivalent, the writer had some reason for using that special form.

The questions that have to be answered are: (a) In which of the two senses is "Galatia" used by Paul and Peter? (b) What did Luke mean by Galatian region or territory? These questions have not merely geographical, but also other and more closely, and exercise determining influence, on many points in the biography, chronology, missionary work and methods of Paul.

2. Questions to Be Answered

II. Origin of the Name "Galatia."—The name was introduced into Asia after 275-277 BC, when a large body of migrating Gauls (Galatai in Gr) crossed over from Europe at the invitation of Nikomedes, king of Bithynia, after razing a great part of Western Asia Minor they were gradually confined to a district, and boundaries were fixed for them after 232 BC. Thus originated the independent state of Galatia, inhabited by three Gaulish tribes, Tolistobogii, Tectosages and Troad, with their capital, Pergamon. Antkyra and Tavia (Tavion in Strabo), who had brought their wives and families with them, and therefore continued to be a distinct Gaulish race and stock (which would have been impossible if they had become as simple warriors who took wives from the conquered inhabitants). The Gaulish language was apparently imposed on all the old inhabitants, who remained in the country as an inferior caste. The Galatian name was adopted the alongside of their own; the latter they retained at least as late as the 2d cent. after Christ, but it was politically important for them to maintain and exercise the powers of the old priesthood, as at Pisidian, where the Galatian shared the office with the old priestly families.

The Galatian state of the Three Tribes lasted till 25 BC, governed first by a council and by trearchs, or chiefs of the twelve divisions (to each tribe) of the people, then after 63 BC, by three kings. Of these, Deiotaros succeeded in establishing himself as sole king, by murdering the two other tribal kings; and after his death in 40 BC his power passed to Cassior and then to Amyntas, 36-25 BC. Amyntas bequeathed his kingdom to Rome; and it was made a Rom province (Dion Cass. 48, 33,5; Strabo, 567, omits Castor). Amyntas had ruled also parts of Phrygia, Pisidia, Lycoania and Isauria. The new province included these parts, and to it were added Paphlagonia 6 BC, part of Pontus 2 BC (calledPontus Galaticus in distinction from Eastern Pontus, which was governed by King Polemon and styled Polemoniacus), and in 64 also Pontus Leonianus. Part of Lycoania was non-Rom and was governed by King Antiochus; from 41 to 72 AD Laranda belonged to this district, which was distinguished as Antiochiana regio from the Rom regio Lycoania called Galatica.

This large province was divided into regions for administrative purposes; and the regions coincided roughly with the old national divisions Pisidia, Phrygia (including Roman Antioch, Icamium, Apollonia), Lycoania (including Derbe, Lystra and a district organized on the village-system, etc). See Calder in Journal of Rom Studies, 1912. This province was called by the Romans Galatia, as being the kingdom of Amyntas (just like the province Asia, which also consisted of a number of different countries as diverse and alien as those of province Galatia, and was so called because the Romans popularly and loosely spoke of the kings of that congeries of countries as kings of Asia). The extent of both names Asia and Galatia, in Roman language, varied with the varying bounds of each province. The name "Galatia" is used to indicate the province, as it was at the moment, by Ptolemy, Pliny v.16c, Tacitus Hist. ii.9; Ann. xii.
35; later chroniclers, Syncellus, Eutropius, and Hist. Aug. Maz. et Ball. 7 (who derived it from earlier authorities, and used it in the old sense, not the sense customary in their own time); and in inscriptions CIL, III, 254, 272 (Epiph. Ep. v. 51); VII, 11025, 11026 (Mommsen rightly not Schmidt), 18270, etc. It will be observed that these are almost all Rom sources, and (as we shall see) express a purely Rom view. If Paul used the name "Galatia" to indicate the province, this would show that he consistently and naturally took the Rom names in their Rom connotation, and grouped his churches according to Rom provincial divisions; but that is characteristic of the apostle, who looked forward from Asia to Rome (Acts 19 21), aimed at imperial conquest and marched across the Empire from province to province (Macedonia, Achaia, Asia are always provinces to Paul). On the other hand, in the East and the Graeco-Asiatic world, the tendency was to speak of the province either as the Galatian Eparchia (as St Epicon in 54 AD, CIG, 3991), or by enumeration of its regiones (or a selection of the regiones). The latter method is followed in a number of inscriptions found in the province (CIL, 111, passim). Now let us apply these contemporary facts to the interpretation of this narrative.

III. The Narrative of Luke.—The evangelization of the province began in Acts 13 14. The stages are: (1) the audience in the Synagogue at 42 f.; (2) the almost simultaneous evangelization of the region, i.e. a large district which was affected from the capital (as the whole of Asia was affected from Ephesus 19 10); (4) Iconium another city of this region: in 13 51 its boundary is marked by a new province Lycaonia, with two cities and surrounding district (14 6); (6) return journey to organize the churches in (a) Lystra, (b) Iconium and Antioch (the secondary reading of WH, τον Λυστραν καὶ Ἰκώνιον καὶ Ἀντιοχείαν, is right, distinguishing the two regions) (b) Antioch (Acts 13 1; 21 1) that of Iconium and Antioch; (7) progress across the region Pisidia, where no churches were founded (Pisidian Antioch is not in this region, which lies between Antioch and Pamphylia). In 16 6 Paul revisited the two regions: (1) Derbe and Lystra, i.e. regio Lycaonia Galatia, (2) the Phrygian and Galatian region, i.e. the region which was racially Phrygian and politically Galatian. Paul traversed both the Provinces, making no new churches but only strengthening the existing churches and disciples. In 18 28 he again revisited the two regions, and they are briefly enumerated: (1) the Galatian region (so called briefly by a traveller, who had just traversed Antiochians and distinguished Galatia from it); (2) Phrygia. On this occasion he specially appealed, not to churches as in 16 6, but to disciples; it was a final visit and intended to reach personally every individual, before Paul went away to Rome and the West. On this occasion the contribution to the poor of Jesus was instituted, and the proceeds later were carried by Timothy and Gaius of Derbe (Acts 20 4; 4 24 17, 1 Cor 16 1); this was a device to bind the new churches to the original center of the faith.

These four churches are mentioned by Luke always as belonging to two regions, Phrygia and Lycaonia; and each region is in one case described as Galatian, i.e. part of the province Galatia. Luke did not use by Luke he kept the custom of the Greeks and Asiatic peoples, and styled the province by enumerating its regiones, using the expression Galatian (as in Pontus Galatianus and at Iconium, CIG, 3991) to indicate the supreme unity of the province. By using this adjective about both regions he marked his point of view that all four churches are included in the provincial unity.

From Paul’s references we gather that he regarded the churches of the whole Galatia as one group, converted together (4 13), exposed to the same influences and changing together (6 8; 3 1; 4 9), naturally visited at one time by a traveler (1 8; 4 14). He never thinks of churches of Phrygia or of Lycaonia; only of provinces (as of provinces Asia, Macedonia, Achaia). Paul did not include in one class all the churches of one journey: he went direct from Macedonia to Athens and Corinth, but chases the churches of Macedonia separate from those of Achaia. Tars and Laodicea and Colossae he classed with Asia (as Luke did Troas, Acts 20 4), Philippi with Macedonia, Corinth with Achaia. These classifications are true only of the Rom usage, not of early Gr usage. The custom of classifying according to provinces, universal in the newly formed church of the Christian age, was derived from the usage of the apostles (as Theodore Mosquemstia express in his Comm. on First Timothy [Swete, II, 121]); Harnack accepts this part of the statement of New Testament history (Zeitschrift, 1, 1878). His churches then belonged to the four provinces, Asia, Galatia, Achaia, Macedonia. There were no other Pauline churches; all united in the gift of money which was carried to Jerus (Acts 20 4; 24 17).

IV. St. Paul’s Use of "Galatians."—The people of the province of Galatia, consisting of many diverse races, when summed up together, were called Galatian, by Tacitus Ann. xv 6; Syncellus, when he says ἡ γαλατίαν ἄλλην (Aug. Galat. phoroŭs êthêto), follows an older historian describing the imposing of taxes on the province; and an inscription of Apollonia Phrygane calls the people of the city Galates (Lchema-Waddington, 1192). If Paul spoke to Philemon or Corinthus or Antioch singly, he addressed them as Phrygians, identical, Galatians, or Ionians, according as he was using only the provincial unity, Galatia.

All attempts to find in Paul’s letter to the Galatians any allusions that specially suit the character of the Gauls or Galatae have failed. The Gauls were an aristocracy in a land which they had never conquered. The Gauls were proud, but only to themselves; the Galectae long after the time of Paul, even though they also acknowledged the power of the old goddess of the country. They spoke their own Celtic tongue. They were proud, even haughty, and independent. They kept their native law under the Empire. The "Galatians" to whom Paul wrote had changed very quickly to a new form of religion, not from fickleness, but from a certain proneness to a more oriental form of religion which exacted of them more sacrifice of a ritual type. The message was to be called to freedom; they were submissive rather than arrogant. They spoke Greek. They were accustomed to the Graeco-Asiatic law: the law of adoption and inheritance which Paul mentions in his letter is not Rom, but Graeco-Asiatic, and the same provincial department was similar, with some differences; on this see the writer’s Historical Commentary on Gal.

Literature

When and to whom, precisely, this letter was written, it is difficult to say; its authorship and purpose are unmistakable. One might conceivably address it by the apostle Paul, in its main tenor, to almost any church of his gentle mission attracted to Judaism, at any point within the years cir. 45-60 AD. Some plausibly argue that it was the earliest, others place it among the later, of the Pauline Epistles. This consideration dictates the order of our inquiry, which proceeds from the plainer to the more involved and disputable parts of the subject.

I. The Authorship.—The Tübingen criticism of the last century recognized the four major epistles of Paul as fully authentic, and made of "Paulinists" who carried his master's principles far beyond his own intentions. On this theory, Gal, with his advanced polemic against the law, approaching the position of Marcion (140 AD), was a work of the early 2nd cent. The Epistle to the Galatians in England (Antiqua Mater, 1887), and Steck in Germany (Galaterbrief, 1888), are the only considerable scholars outside of Holland who have adopted this hypothesis; it is rejected by critics so radical as Schoelcher and Zahn (see the last of the latter on the "Galatians" in EB). Knowing has searchingly examined the position of the Dutch school in his Witness of the Epistles (1892)—it is altogether too arbitrary and uncontrolled by historical fact to be entertained; see Jülicher's and Zahn's Introduction to NT (vol. 2) on the same effect. Attempts to dismiss this writing, and to appropriate it for other hands and later times than those of the apostle Paul, are idle in view of its vital coherence and the passionate force with which the author's personality has stamped itself upon his work; the Paulinum poetice speaks on every line. The two contentions on which the letter turns—concerning Paul's apostleship, and the circumcision of gentle Christians—belonged to the apostle's lifetime: in the fifth and sixth decades these were burning questions; by the 2nd cent. the Church had left them far behind.

Early Christianity gives clear and ample testimony to this document. Marcion placed it at the head of his Apostolikon (140 AD); Justin Martyr, Athenagoras, Melito, quoted it (iv 7) a generation earlier, and seems to have been used by contemporary gnostic teachers. It stands in line with the other epistles of Paul in the oldest Lat., Syr. and Septuag., and in the Muratorian (Rom) Canon of the 2nd cent. It comes full into view as an integral part of the new Scripture in Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria and Tertullian at the close of this period. No breath of suspicion as to the authorship, integrity or apostolic authority of the Ep. to the Gal has reached us from ancient times.

II. Matter of the Epistle.

A double note of war sounds in the address and greeting (1:1-4), Paul's thanksgiving for the conversion of the Ephesians (vs 6-10): The Galatians are listening to preachers of "another gospel" (vs 6,7) and traducers of the apostle (vs 8,10), whom he declares "anathema." Paul has therefore two objects in writing to vindicate himself, and to clear and reinforce his doctrine. The first he pursues from the second from 3:1 to 5:12. Appropriate moral exhortations follow in 5:13-6:10. The opening paragraph (6:17) probably precisely the purport of the letter. Perjury is the argumentative vehicle of Paul's interchange with the freedom natural in a letter to old friends.

Paul's independent apostleship.—Paul asserts himself for his gospel's sake, by showing that his commission was God-given and complete (vs 11,12). Paul's personal four decisive moments in his course he dwells for this purpose—as regards the second manifestly (ver 20), as to others probably, in correction of statements: (1) Before Paul's apostleship he was a thorough-going Judaist and, per sector (ver 13,14). Paul was supernaturally converted to Christ (ver 15), and received a new endowment for the Gentile Church (ver 16-17). But to consult no one (ver 16,17).

(2) Three years later he "made acquaintance with Cephas" in Jerusalem, and saw James besides, but no other of the apostles (vs 18,19). For long he was known only by reports of the church of Judea that he consulted no one (vs 16,17).

(3) At the end of "fourteen years" he "went up to Jerusalem" with Barnabas, to confer with "gentile believers, which was endangered by "false brethren" (2:1-5). Instead of supporting the demand for the circumcision of the Greek Titus (ver 3), the "pillars" there recognized the sufficiency and completeness of Paul's gospel of the uncircumcision, and the validity of his apostleship (vs 6-8). They gave "right hands of fellowship" to himself and Barnabas on this understanding (vs 9,10).

(4) At Antioch, however, Paul and Cephas differed (ver 11). Cephas was induced to withdraw from the common church-table, and carried "the rest of the Jews," including Barnabas, with him (vs 12,13). "The truth of the gospel," with Cephas's own sincerity, was compromised by this "separation," which in effect "compelled the Gentiles to Judaism" (ver 13,14). Paul therefore reproved Cephas publicly in the speech reproduced by ver 14-21, the words of which clear Paul's apostolic position and the ruinous consequences (vs 18,21) of restituting the Judaizing law.

(1) Thesis.—The doctrinal polemic was rehearsed in the autobiography (2:9-11). In 2:16 is laid down the thesis of the epistle; the entire polemic is justified by the works of law but through him Jesus Christ. This proposition is (a) demonstrated from experience in history in 3:1-4:7; then (b) enforced by argument (4:8-11).

3. Doctrinal Polemic.

(a) Thesis (1:1-4; 11-18; 5:1-12).

(b) Main argument.—(1) From his own experience (2:10-21) Paul passes to that of the readers, who are also exhorted not to forget "Christ cruc... fied" (3:11). Had their life in "the Spirit" come through "work of the flesh" or the "hearing of the flesh"? Will the flesh consummate what the Spirit began (vs 2-5)? (a) He is told, in the word of God, that he is the child of God's people; but, the "men of faith" are Abraham's "true heirs" (vs 6-9). "The law" curses every transgressor: Scripture on "the goodness of God" is through the "righteousness of faith" (vs 7-14). (a2) The "testament" God gave to "Abraham and his seed" (a single "seed," observe) is unchangeable. The Mosaic law ordained 430 years ago, could not nullify this instrument (vs 15-17 AV). Nullified it would have been if any sort of "moral performance" to be vindicated instead of Divine "grace" (vs 18). (a4) Why then the law? Sin required it, pending the accomplishment of the promise. Its promulgation through intermediaries marks its inferiority (vs 19,20). With no power to投产, it "teaches by the "works" of the flesh" (vs 21-25). (a5) But now in "Christ, and Jew and Greek alike, ye are all sons of God through faith"—being such, "you are Abraham's seed" and "heirs in Christ Jesus." Hence the "iron gate" (a3) of "the prosopographe" training us for "Christ" (vs 21-25). (b) The argument is pressed home by appeal, illustration, and warning. (3) Appeal and warning.—(31) After knowing God, would the Galatians return to the bondage in which they were free? If the first two "seed-sets" of Nature: (vs 8-9), their adoption of Jewish "seasons" points to this backsliding (vs 10,11). (b2) Paul's anxiety proclaims the urgency of the proclamation (vs 12-20), in which he recalls his fervent reception by his readers, deplores their present alienation from his epistle, and charges (vs 13) that Abraham had two sons—"after the flesh" and "through promise" (vs 21-23); those who want to be under law are choosing the part of Ishmael: "Hagar, who stands for the 'present Jerusalem' in her bondage; 'the Jerusalem above is free—she is our mother!' (vs 24-25,31). The fate of Hagar and Ishmael pictures the issue of legal subjection (vs 29,30): 'Stand fast therefore (5:1). The crucial moment comes at vs 5, the Galatians are half-persuaded (vs 7,8); they will fatally commit themselves, if they consent to be circumcised. This will sever them from Christ, and bind them to complete observance of Moses' law; or grace—both require they must stand by 3-5). Mosaic circumcision, uncircumcision—"these count for nothing in Christ Jesus" (vs 6). Paul's purpose is to "IDs all be 'so well'! "judgment" will fall on their 'disturbers' (vs 7-10,12). Persecution marks himself against the "circumcising" (version 11) (11). The ethical application is contained in the phrase of Rom 2, 2, "the law of the spirit of life in Christ Jesus." (a) (1) guards Christian liberty from license; it fulfills the whole law in a single word (5:15,16). (b) The "Spirit," who bears in those His rules life, His "perfection." (2) Crucified with Christ and 'living in the Spirit,' the Christian man keeps God's law without guilt (5:16-26). (b3) In absence of legal fall, 'men of the Spirit' will know how to "restore" the "lapsed," fulfilling Christ's "law" and "mindful of the law" (5:16). (a4) Teachers, be "peculiar claim on the taught," to ignored this it is to 'mock God. Men will "reward evil" or 'get back what is in each they sow to the flesh' or 'to the Spirit.' Be patient till the harvest! (vs 6-10). (b) The "reasoning" (version 11) exposes the sinister motive of the "circumcisionists," who are ashamed of the "uncircumcision" (vs 12,15). Such men are none of "the Israel of God" (vs 16). The "brand of Jesus" is necessary "to God's body; at the "peril of being set forth" will men trouble him! (vs 17). The benediction follows (ver 18)."

B) Salient Points

1. The Saire of God—"faith in the Good News its all-sufficient means of salvation for all" (cf 2:20; 3:25-26); the Galatians' full boasting is from the legalist's seed (3:1-6,11-14; 1:14). Thus He conveys to the nations "the promise of the Spirit through Abraham" (Gal 3:16). (a2) The "testament" God gave to "Abraham and his seed" (a single "seed," observe) is unchangeable. The Mosaic law ordained 430 years ago, could not nullify this instrument (vs 15-17 AV). Nullified it would have been if any sort of "moral performance" to be vindicated instead of Divine "grace" (vs 18). (a4) Why then the law? Sin required it, pending the accomplishment of the promise. Its promulgation through intermediaries marks its inferiority (vs 19,20). With no power to投产, it "teaches by the "works" of the flesh" (vs 21-25). (a5) But now in "Christ, and Jew and Greek alike, ye are all sons of God through faith"—being such, "you are Abraham's seed" and "heirs in Christ Jesus." Hence the "iron gate" (a3) of "the prosopographe" training us for "Christ" (vs 21-25). (b) The argument is pressed home by appeal, illustration, and warning. (3) Appeal and warning.—(31) After knowing God, would the Galatians return to the bondage in which they were free? If the first two "seed-sets" of Nature: (vs 8-9), their adoption of Jewish "seasons" points to this backsliding (vs 10,11). (b2) Paul's anxiety proclaims the urgency of the proclamation (vs 12-20), in which he recalls his fervent reception by his readers, deplores their present alienation from his epistle, and charges (vs 13) that Abraham had two sons—"after the flesh" and "through promise" (vs 21-23); those who want to be under law are choosing the part of Ishmael: "Hagar, who stands for the 'present Jerusalem' in her bondage; 'the Jerusalem above is free—she is our mother!' (vs 24-25,31). The fate of Hagar and Ishmael pictures the issue of legal subjection (vs 29,30): 'Stand fast therefore (5:1). The crucial moment comes at vs 5, the Galatians are half-persuaded (vs 7,8); they will fatally commit themselves, if they consent to be circumcised. This will sever them from Christ, and bind them to complete observance of Moses' law; or grace—both require they must stand by 3-5). Mosaic circumcision, uncircumcision—"these count for nothing in Christ Jesus" (vs 6). Paul's purpose is to "IDs all be 'so well'! "judgment" will fall on their 'disturbers' (vs 7-10,12). The benediction follows (ver 18)."

"The Spirit of son, now manifested in the Gentiles, is the infallible sign that the promise made to mankind in Abraham has been fulfilled. The whole position of the legalists is undermined by the use the apostle makes of the Abrahamic covenant. The religious and the personal questions of the epistle are bound up together; this 5 2 clearly indicates. The latter naturally emerges first (1.11.13). Paul's authority must be overthrown, if his disciples are to be believed. The line of defence indicates the nature of the attack. Paul was said to be a second-hand, second-rate apologist, whose knowledge of Christ and title to preach Him came from Cephas and the mother church. In proof of this, an account was given of his career, which he corrects in 1 13-2. 21. Cephas was held up (of 1 Cor 1 12) as the chief of the church of Jerusalem; his name was repeatedly acknowledged; and "the pillars" at Jerusalem were quoted as maintainers of Mosaic rule and authorities for the additions to be made to Paul's imperfect gospel. Paul himself, it was insinuated, "preaches circumcision" where it suits him; he is a plausible time-server (1 10; 5 11; cf. Acts 16 5; 1 Cor 9 19–21). The point of the apostle’s object in self-defence is not to sketch his own life, nor in particular to recount his visits to Jerusalem, or to prove his independent apostleship and his consistent maintenance of gentile rights. He states, therefore, what really happened on the critical occasions of his contact with Peter and the Jerusalem church. To begin with, he received his gospel and apostolic office from Jesus Christ directly, and apart from Peter (1 13–20); he was subsequently recognized by "the pillars" as apostle, on equality with Peter (2 8–9); he had finally vindicated his doctrine when it was assailed, in spite of Peter (2 11–12). The adjustment of Paul’s recollections with Luke’s narrative is a matter of dispute, in regard both to the conference of 2 1–10 and the encounter of 2 11–21; to these points we shall return, iv 3 (4), (5).

This is a letter of exultation. Passion and argument are blended in it. Hot indignation and righteous scorn (1 7–9; 4 17; 5 10). I. Character and appearance of the Church (4 11–20), deep sincerity and manly integrity united with the loftiest consciousness of spiritual authority (1 10–12; 2 1–6; 14; 5 2; 17), above all a consuming devotion to the cause of its Redeemer, find in these few pages with an incomparable wealth and glow of Christian emotion. The power of mind the epistle exhibits matches its largeness of heart. Rom indeed carries out the appeal and argument with greater breadth and theoretic completeness; but Gal excels in pungency, incisiveness, and debating force. The style is that of Paul at the summit of his powers. Its spiritual elevation, its vigor and resources, its subtlety and irony, poignancy and pathos, the vie vivida that animates the whole, have made this letter a classic of religious controversy. The blemishes of Paul’s composition, which contribute to his mastery of effect, are conspicuous here—his abrupt turns and apostrophes, and sometimes difficult ellipses (2 4–10.20; 4 16–20; 5 13), awkward parentheses and entangled periods (2 1–10.18; 3 16.20; 4 25), and outburst of exasperating vehemence (1 8.9; 6 12). The anti-legalist polemic gives way to the arguments of the love-gift; the apostle meets his adversaries on their own ground. In 3 16.19–20; 4 21–31, we have examples of the rabbinical exegesis Paul had learned from his Jewish masters. These texts should be read in part as argumenta ad hominem; however peculiar in form such Pauline passages may be, they always contain sound reasoning.

II. Relations to Other Epistles.—(1) The connection of Gal with Rom is patent; it is not sufficiently understood how pervasive that connection is and into what manifold detail it extends. The similarity of doctrine and doctrinal vocabulary manifest in Gal 2 13–6 18 and Rom 1 16–8 39 is accounted for by the Judaistic controversy on which Paul was engaged for so long, and by the fact that this discussion touched the heart of his gospel and raised questions in regard to which his mind was made up from the beginning (1 16.10), on which he would therefore always express himself in much the same way. Broadly speaking, the difference is that Rom is didactic and abstract, where Gal is personal and polemical; that the former presents a measured and rounded development of conceptions projected mainly on the ground of controversy; the emphasis lies in Rom on justification by faith; in Gal on the freedom of the Christian man. The contrast of tone is symptomatic of a calmer mood in the writer—the bell which follows the storm; it suits the different address of the two epistles.

Besides the correspondence of purport, there is a verbal resemblance between pervading the tone of Gal, and traceable in its manners and incidental expressions. Outside of quotations, we find more than 40 Gr locations, some of them rare in the language, common to both, and which were, or might have been, the basis of the polemics. Paul’s epistles—including the words rendered “bear” in pp. 17, 18 and 1 Cor 1 15 and 2 Cor 10 or “gratulation,” (makarismos), “divisions” (Rom 16 17; Gal 5 20); “fall” or “fall from” (exskipeto); “labour on” or “toil” (of person or mental effort, in this sense); “set free” or “deliver” (eleutheroth); “shut up” or “conclude,” and “slip out” or “escape” (ekpipto); “travail” (together), and such phrases as “die to” (with active), “hearing of faith,” “If possible,” “put on” (the Lord Jesus Christ, “those who do such things saith the Scripture?” “where then?” “rhetorical,” “why any longer?” The list would be greatly extended by adding expressions distinctive of this pair of letters that occur sporadically elsewhere in Paul. The kinship of Gal-Rom in wording and style is in the vein of exposition resembling existing between Col-Eph or 1–2 Thess; it is twice as strong proportionately as that of 1–2 Cor. Not only the same current of thought, but with Gal, a stream of language was running through Paul’s mind in writing these two bounded affections.

The association of Gal with the two Corinthian letters, though less intimate than that of Gal-Rom, is unmistakable.

We count 23 distinct locations shared by 2 Cor alone (in its 13 chs) with Gal, and 20 such shared with 1 Cor (16 chs)—a larger proportion for the former. Among the Gal-I Cor peculiarities are the sayings, “a little leaven,” etc., “circumcision is nothing;” “I am nothing;” “God,” “profit nothing” and “to be something;” “scandal of the cross,” the spiritual,” (of persons), “they that are Christ’s,” “Christ,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren,” “false brethren," etc. The conception of the "covenants," the "testaments" is conspicuous in both epistles (Gal 3 17–21; 4 21–31; 2 Cor 3 5–8), and does not recur in Paul; in each case the ideas of "law" (or "letter") and bondage, death, are associated with the one, dialekis ("spirit," "freedom," "lif." with the other. Gal 13 ("Christ, has the Lord Jesus Christ..."") is presented as a "made for us")—is matched by 2 Cor 5 21 ("made sin for us"); In Gal 2 19 and 6 14 we find Paul crucified to the world" in the same "Christ" and with "Christ" and alone living in him. In 2 Cor 5 14.15 this experience becomes a "universal law for Christians" and where in Gal 5 17 the "apostle appears as "from henceforth..." bearing in his body the brand of Jesus," 2 Cor 4 1, ("life", is "always bearing about in", "his body the dying of Jesus.")

These identical or closely congruous trains of thought and turns of phrase, varied and dominant as they are, speak for some near connection between the two writings. Its basis of views in 5 10.20 Gal curiously, and somewhat intricately, links itself at once with 2 Cor and Rom (see 2 Cor 12 20; Rom 13 13; 16 17). Gal is allied by argument and doctrine with Rom, and by temper and sentiment with 2 Cor. The storm of feeling agitating our epistle blows from the same source, reaches the same height, and engages the same emotions with those which animate 2 Cor 10–13.

If we add to the 43 locations confined in the Pauline Epp. to Gal-Rom the 25 such of Gal-2 Cor, the 20 of Gal-Rom-2 Cor, the 14 of Gal-2 Cor-Rom, the 13 of Gal-2 Cor-Rom-2 Cor, the 15 of Gal-Rom-2 Cor-Rom, the 10 of Gal-Rom-2 Cor-Rom-2 Cor, the 9 of Gal-Rom-2 Cor-Rom-2 Cor-2 Cor, through all four, we get a total of 133 words or phrases (apart from OT quotations and technical terms specific to Gal-Rom and Rom or more of the Cor-Rom group—an average, that is, of close upon 3 for each chapter of those other epistles.

With the other groups of Pauline letters Gal is associated by ties less numerous and strong, yet marked enough to suggest, in conjunction with the general style, a common authorship.

4. With Other Groups of Epistles

The proportion of locations peculiar to Gal and the 3d group (Col—Philem—Eph) is 1 to each of their 15 chapters. The noticeable exceptions are in Gal-Col: “elements of the world,” and the maxim, “There is no Jew nor Greek, etc.,” associated with the “putting on of Christ,” (“the new man”); “fulness of the time” (or “seasons”) and “mystery of God” (of God). This latter was the Christ who loved me (the church) and gave up himself for me (hers),” in Gal-Eph; he that supplieth your supplying of epistle and sermon—“Spirit” in Gal-Phil; “redeem” (exagoradeo) and “inheritance” are peculiar to Gal Eph together, the association of the believer’s “inheritance” with the “Spirit” in Gal-Eph is a significant point of doctrinal identity.

The Thess and Tim-Tit (1st and 4th) groups are cutters in relation to Gal, judged by vocabulary. There is little to associate our epistle with either of these combinations, apart from pervasive Cor-Rom phrases and the Pauline complex. There are 6 such expressions reported as a working and fighting theology, 7 for the 15 of 1 and 2 Tim and Tit—just over one to two chapters for each group. While the verbal coincidences in these two cases are, proportionately, but one-half so many as those connecting Gal with the 3d group of epistles and one-fifth or one-sixth of those linking it to the 2d group, they are also less characteristic; the most striking is the contrast of “well-doing” (kaleopode) with “fainting” or “weakness” (pneuma) in Gal 6:9 and 2 Thess 3:13.

No other writing of Paul reflects the whole man so fully as this—his spiritual, emotional, intellectual, practical, and even physical, idiosyncratic. 5. General craziness. We see less of the apostle’s comparison tenderness, but more of his strength than in Phil; less of his inner, mystic, experiences, more of the critical task of his career; less of his “fears,” more of his “fightings,” than in 2 Cor. While the 2d letter to Timothy lifts the curtain from the closing stage of the apostle’s ministry, Gal throws a powerful light upon its beginning. The Pauline theology operates upon his heart in this document. The apostle’s message of deliverance from sin through faith in the crucified Redeemer, and of the new life in the Spirit growing from this root, lives and speaks; we see it in Gal as a working and fighting theology, while in Rom it peacefully expands into an ordered system. The immediately saving truth of Christianity, the gospel of the Gospel, finds its most trenchant utterance in this epistle; here we learn “the word of the cross” as from the living Saviour, and defended it at the crisis of his work.

IV. The Destination and Date.—The question of the people to whom, is bound up with that of the time at which, the Epistle to the Galatians was written. It was necessary to determine the other. The expression “the first time” (6 πρώτον of ἑν 13 dependent presumes Paul to have been twice with the readers previously—for the first occasion, see Acts 13:15; for the second, 19: 9; 5 3. The explanation of Round (Date of Ep. to Gal, 1906), that the apostle intended to distinguish his first arrival at the several (S.) Galatian cities from his return in the course of the same journey (Acts 14:21-25), cannot be accepted: Derbe, the limit of the expedition, received Paul and Barnabas but once on that round, and in retracing their steps the missionaries were completing an interrupted work, whereas Gal 4:13 implies a second, distinct visitation of the churches concerned as a whole; in Acts 16:36 Paul looks back to the journey of Acts 15:19—14:26 as one event.

Now the apostle revisited the S. Galatian churches in starting on the 2d missionary tour (Acts 16:1-6). Consequently, if his “Galatians” were Christians of Pisidian Antioch, Iconium, Lystra, and Derbe. (the S. Galatian hypothesis, the letter was written in the further course of the 2d tour—from Macedonia or Corinth about the time of 1 and 2 Thess (so Zahn, Intro to the NT, I, ET), or from Antioch in the interval between the 2d and 3d journeys (so Ramsay); J. N. D. over on this latter journey (Acts 18:23) Paul (ex hujus) traversed the [S.] Galatian country the third time. On the other hand, if they were people of Galatia proper, i.e. of N. (Old) Galatia, the epistle cannot be earlier than the occasion of Acts 18:23, when Paul was first in that time, “the Galatian country,” which, on this supposition, he had evangelized in traveling from S. Galatia to Troas during the previous tour (Acts 16:6-8). On the N. Galatian hypothesis, the letter was dispatched from Ephesus during Paul’s long residence there (Acts 19); so most interpreters, ancient and modern, in which case it heads the 2d group of the epistles; or later, from Macedonia or Corinth, and shortly before the writing of the Epistle to the Rom (thus Lightfoot, Salmon, A. L. Williams and others).

For contra, the earlier date, if proved independently, carries with it the S. Galatian, the later date the N. Galatian theory. The subscription of the TR “written from Rome,” rests on inferior MS authority and late Patristic tradition. Clemen, with no suggestion as to place of origin, assigns to the writing a date subsequent to the termination of the 3d missionary tour (55 or 57 AD), inasmuch as the epistle reflects the controversy about the Law, which in Rom is comparatively mild, at an acute, and, therefore (he supposed), an advanced stage. Lightfoot (ch. i of Intro to Comm.) placed Gal in the 2d group of the epistles between 2 Cor and Rom, upon considerations drawn from

2. Internal “the style and character” of the epistle.

Evidence His argument might be strengthened by a detailed linguistic analysis (see III, 1-3, above). The more minutely one compares Gal with Rom and 1 and 2 Cor, the more these three are seen to form a continuous web, the product of the same experience in the writer’s mind and the same situation in the church. This presumption, based on internal evidence, must be tested by examination of the topographical and chronological data.

(1) Galatia and the Galatians.—The double sense of these terms obtaining in current use has been shown in the art. on GALATIA; Steinmann,

A. L. Williams’ Intro to Gal in Camb. Gr Text. (1910). Both authors of the present volume use the expressions commonly thought of provincial Galatia, which then embraced in addition to Galatia proper a large tract of Southern Phrygia and Lycaonia, reaching from Pisidian Antioch in the west to Derbe in the east; but writers of Asia Minor, leaning to the older local and national usage, according to which “Galatia” signified the north-central highlands of the peninsula, on both sides of the river Halys, in which the invading Galatians had settled long before this time. (On their history and previous art.) It is asserted that Paul strictly followed the official, as against the popular, usus loquendi in these matters—a questionable dictum (see A. L. Williams, op. cit., xix, xx, or Steinmann’s Leserkreis, 78-104), in view of Gal 1:21-22 (note the Gr double article), to go no farther. There was nothing in Paul’s Rom citizenship to make him a precise in a point like this. Ramsay has proved that all four cities of Acts 13:14—14:25 were by this time included in provincial Galatia. The inhabitants might therefore, officially, be styled “Galatians” (Galatae); it does not follow that this

1 Schürer seems to be right, however, in maintaining that “Galatia” was only the abbreviated designation for the province, named a parte patriae, and that in more formal description it was styled “Galatia, Phrygia, Lycaonia,” etc.
was a fit or likely compulsion for Paul to use. Jülicher says this would have been a piece of "bad taste," although Acts 16:6 and 18:23. Luke is not that inarticulate. The principal districts (Phrygian, Pisidian, Lycanian) to Galatia was recent—Derbe had been annexed so late as the year 41—artificial. Supposing that their Rom "colonial" rank made the designation "Galatians" agree with the citizens of Athens or Lysistrata, there was little in it to appeal to Ionians or Cretans (of Schmiedel, in EBF, col. 1604).

(2) Prima facie, sense of Acts 16:6. The "Galatian country" (Galatikē chōra) is mentioned by Luke, with case, in Acts 16:10; Acts 16:6 and 18:23. Luke says any rate was not tied to imperial usage; he distinguishes "Phrygia" from "Asia" in Acts 2:9-10, although Phrygia was administratively divided and bordered by Asia and Galatia. When therefore "Asia" is opposed in 16:6 to "the Phrygian and Galatian country" (or "Phrygia and Galatian country," Zahn), we presume that the three terms of locality bear alike a non-official sense, so that the "Galatian country" is part of it lying to the N. K., as "Asia" means the narrow coast west of "Phrygia." On this presumption, we understand that Paul and Silas, after completing their visitation of the cities of the former tour (Acts 16:4-5; cf 15:26, in Galatians 3:14-18,5); since they were forbidden to proceed westward and "speak the word of God" to their faces from the region—i.e., Phrygian, then Galatian—that stretched northward into new territory, through which they traveled toward Mysia, that is, the frontier ver 6 file the space between the S. Galatia covered by 4 and 5, and the Phrygian border; we find the travelers in ver 7. Upon this, the ordinary construction of Luke's somewhat involved sentence, N. Galatia was entered by his 3d tour; he had traversed, mostly completely, the "Galatian region" at the commencement of the tour, when he found "disciples" there (Acts 13:23) whom he had gathered on the previous visit.

The grammar of Acts 16:6. In the interpretation of the grammatical passages propounded by Ramsay, vs. 16a, detached from 16b, is read as the completion of vs. 1-4, and as an explanation of the geographical region—i.e., the "Phrygian... region. They were forbidden by the Holy Ghost... in Asia, and came over against Mysia, etc.; and "the Phrygian region" measures the southwestern division of Provincia Galatia, a district once Phrygian (ethnically), and Phrygian (politically). The combination of two local acts, under a common art., to denote the same country in different respects, if exceptional in Gr idiom (15:41 and 27:5 Illustrate the usual force of this collocation), is clearly possible—the one strictly geographical, the other territorial and ethnological—"Trachea and Trachonitis country" in Lk 3:1, unfortunately, is also ambiguous. But the other difficulty of grammar involved in the new rendering of Acts 16:6 is insuperable: the secession of the particle, "having been forbidden" (katabolētai), from the participle, "went through" (diasphrægmēthē), then wrenches the sentence to dislocation; the soror partake in such connection "must contain, if not some action of the subject, something of their "they went," or that something synchronized with it, in no case a thing subsequent to it. If all the rules of grammar and all sound understanding of language (and Scripture) be applied (Schmiedel, ib. col. 1892; endorsed in Moulton's Prosopon, to Grammar of NT Gr., 371-74, and Expos, IV, 304-11, and Lk Exeg. 339-42). Acts 10:29 ("I came... when I was sent for..."") affords a grammatical parallel ("They went through..."") since they were hindered).

Zahn's position is peculiar (Intro to NT, 164-202).

Rejecting Ramsay's explanation of Acts 16:6, and of 18:23 (where R. sees Paul a third time crossing S. Galatia), and maintaining that Luke credits the apostle with successful work in N. Galatia, he holds, notwithstanding, the S. Galatian view of the epistle. This involves the paradox that the author of the epistle to the Galatians is in ignorance of those of N. Galatia to whom the title properly belongs. Interpretation in Lc is too facile by supposing that Paul had set foot in Old Galatia. In the 1st ed. of the Erstdruck Zahn had supposed N. and S. Galatia to be in the address. His supposition is contrary to the fact that the readers form a homogeneous body, the fruit of a single mission (4:13), and are affected by the appeal in the S. of Galatia: (6:7-9).

Associating the letter in 2d ed with S. Galatians alone, Zahn, while Paul labored in N. Galatia and found "disciples" there on his return, these were too few and scattered to form "churches" an estimate in agreement with Luke's phraseology with "all the disciples" (18:23), and raising a distinction between "disciplines" foreign to the epistolary's usage (see Acts 6:2; 9:19; 14:20). We must choose between N. and S. Galatia; and if churches among the people of this name with Luke's phraseology (18:7-9)."all the disciples" (18:23), with no modern idea of "churches"; and then the option is between the two "the burners claim this title by right of use and wont—and the epistle in the Epistle to the Judeans was a reversal of "Gala tian and Phrygian" in Acts 15:23, as compared with 16:6, implies that the apostle on the 3d tour struck "the Galatian country" first, traveling this time directly N. from Syrian Antioch, then turned westward toward Phrygia when he had reached Old Galatia; whereas his previous route had brought him through ancient S. Galatia, until he turned northward at a point not far distant from Pisidian Antioch, to reach N. Galatia through Phrygia from the southwest. See the Map of Asia Minor.

(4) Notes of time in the epistle. The "3 years" of 1:18 and the "14 years" of 2:1 are both seemingly counted from Paul's conversion. The synchronism of the conversion with the murder of Stephen and the first action of the high priest an- otherwise is the Nazerene (Acts 9:2, etc.), and of Saul's visit to Jerusalem in the 3d year thereafter with Aretas' rule in Damascus (2 Cor 11:32-33), forbid our placing these two events further back than 38 and 38—at furthest, and 37 AD (see Turner on "Chronology of the NT" in HDB, as against the earlier dating). (b) This calculation brings us to 48-49 as the year of the conference of Gal 2 1-10—a date precluding the association of that meeting with the errant Jews related in Acts 11:30 and 12:25, while it suits the identification of the other former with the council of Acts 15. Other indications converge on this as the critical epoch of Paul's apostleship. The expedition to Cyprus and S. Galatia (Acts 13:4) had been revealed in Gal 1:16; to the Phrygian border, we find the travelers in ver 7. Upon this, the ordinary construction of Luke's somewhat involved sentence, N. Galatia was entered by his 3d tour; he had traversed, mostly completely, the "Galatian region" at the commencement of the tour, when he found "disciples" there (Acts 13:23) whom he had gathered on the previous visit.

Involves the following: (a) The apostle's tour turned westward into Asia, where "Phrygian and Galatian country." Therefore "Asia" is opposed in 16:6 to "the Phrygian and Galatian country" (or "Phrygia and Galatian country," Zahn), we understand the three terms of locality bear alike a non-official sense, so that the "Galatian country" is part of it lying to the N. K., as "Asia" means the narrow coast west of "Phrygia." On this presumption, we understand that Paul and Silas, after completing their visitation of the cities of the former tour (Acts 16:4-5; cf 15:26, in Galatians 3:14-18,5); since they were forbidden to proceed westward and "speak the word of God" to their faces from the region—i.e., Phrygian, then Galatian—that stretched northward into new territory, through which they traveled toward Mysia, that is, the frontier ver 6 file the space between the S. Galatia covered by 4 and 5, and the Phrygian border; we find the travelers in ver 7. Upon this, the ordinary construction of Luke's somewhat involved sentence, N. Galatia was entered by his 3d tour; he had traversed, mostly completely, the "Galatian region" at the commencement of the tour, when he found "disciples" there (Acts 13:23) whom he had gathered on the previous visit.
Paul's and Barnabas' sojourn there on their return from Jerusalem (Acts 15:35,36), or the occasion of Paul's later visit, occupying "some time," between the 2d and 3d tours (18:22,23), when for aught we know Barnabas and Peter may both have been in the Syrian capital.

The former dating assumes that Peter yielded to the Jubilo's appeal, 2d tour (end of the company that "Barnabas too was carried away" while still in collegialship with Paul) and returned to Antioch on occasion of gentile conversion, which he had championed, was in the flush of victory. It assumes that the legalists had no sooner been defeated than they organized a new attack on Peter and presented themselves as "from James" when James only the other day had baulked him (Acts 15:24). All this is very unlikely. We must allow the legalists time to recover from their discomfiture and to lay new plans (see 11:2,12,21,24). Moreover, Luke's detailed narrative in Acts 15:30-36, which makes much of the visit of Judas and Silas, gives no hint of any coming of Peter to Antioch at that time, and leaves little room for this: he gives an impression of settled peace and satisfaction following on the Jerusalem council, with which the strife of Gal 2:11 ff. would ill accord. Through the course of the 2d missionary tour, so far as the Thessalonian epistles indicate, Paul's mind remained undisturbed by legalistic troubles. "The apostle had quitted Jerusalem, was单品地 with the Galilæans and received to his 2d missionary journey full of satisfaction at the victory he had gained and firm from the future; the decisive moment, the crisis necessarily falls between the Thessalonian and Galatian epistles. The situation has changed so that he can return to him on his return" to Antioch (A. Sabatier, The Apostle Paul, ET., 10, 11, also 124-36).

(5) Paul's renewed struggle with legalism.—The new situation arose through the vacillation of Peter; and the "certain from James" who made mischief at Antioch, were the forerunners of "trouble-makers" who agitated the churches far and wide, appearing simultaneously in Corinth and N. Galatia. The attempt to set up a separate church-table for the circumcised at Antioch as the first movement in a crafty and persistent campaign against gentle liberties engineered from Jerusalem. The Ep. to the Rom signaled Paul's conclusive victory in this struggle, which covered the period of the 3d missionary tour. On his revisitation of the Galatians (1:9; 5:3 || Acts 18:23), fresh from the contention with Cephas and aware of the wide conspiracy on foot, Paul gave warning of the coming of "another gospel"; he had arrived, fulfilling his worst fears. Upon this view of the course of events (as under God) we have:

(6) Epheusas or Corinth.—Chiefly because of the words, "you are removing so quickly." In 1 Cor., the epistle is by many referred to the earlier part of the above period, the time of Paul's protracted sojourn in Ephesus (Acts 19:8.10: 54-56 AD); "so quickly," however, implies not "as if you were leaving me" but "so suddenly" and "with such persistent persuasion" (5:7,8). From Ephesus, had the apostle been there when the trouble arose, he might as easily have visited Galatia as he did Corinth under like circumstances (so much is implied in 2 Cor. 13:1): he is longing to go to Galatia, but cannot (Gal. 4:19,20). A more distant situation, such as Macedonia or Corinth (Acts 20:1-3), where Paul found himself in the last months of this tour (55-57 AD), and where, in Pliny's times, the "circuit" stands heathen cities surrounded by a body of sympathetic "brethren" (1:1) whose support gave weight to his remonstrance with the Galatians, the epistle better on every account.

(7) Paul's first coming to Galatia.—In 4:13-15 the apostle recalls, in words charged with emotion, his introduction to the readers. His "preaching the good news" to them was due to "weakness of the flesh"—to some sickness, it seems, which arrested his steps and led him to minister in a locality that otherwise he would have avoided (see above). On this account he did Myia a little later (Acts 16:8). So we understand the obscure language of ver. 13. The S. Galatian theorists, in default of any reference to illness as affecting the apostle's movements in Acts 13,14,15, but (15:31) "are still" of Paul fell a victim to malaria on the Pamphylion coast, and that he and Barnabas made for Pisidian Antioch by way of seeking the cooler uplands. The former explanation lies nearer to the apostle's language: he says "I preached to you," not "I came to you, because of illness." The journey of a hundred miles from Perga to Antioch was one of the least likely to be undertaken by a fever-stricken patient (see the description in Conybeare and Howson's Life of St. Paul, p. 264). Barnabas' predecessor at the Galatian capital.

Besides, if this motive had brought Paul to Antioch, quite different reasons are stated by Luke for his proceeding to the other S. Galatian towns (see 15:30-31, 16:19,20). Reading Gal. 4:13-15, one imagines the apostle exultingly and with further goal (perhaps the important cities of Bithynia, Acts 16:7), when he is prostrated by a malady the physical effects of which were such as to excite extreme aversion. As strength returns, he begins to offer his gospel in the neighborhood "where the unwilling halt has been made. There was much to prejudice the hearers against a preacher addressing them under these conditions; but the Galatians welcomed him as a heaven-sent messenger. Their faith was prompt and eager, their gratitude boundless.

The definition of Barnabas and Paul by the Lycans (14:11-18) is the one incident of Luke's narrative of which the apostle's description reminds us. To this the latter is thought to be alluding when he writes, "You received me as an angel of God, as Christ Jesus!" But could it be possible of his reception—hateful at the time—in the character of a heathen god, and of a reception that ended in his stoning? The "welcome of the messenger increased," which in his message (Gal. 4:14) is: 2 Cor. 6:1; 1 Thess. 1; 6 Mo. 10.40,41, where the same Gr. vb. is used in the New Testament.

Paul's mishandling at Lystra (Acts 14:19,20) has suggested a correspondence in the opposite sense between the epistle and the story of the 8th missionary tour. Lystra stone led their print on Paul's body; in these disgraceful scenes something might be seen of the "scar which he points in Gal 6:17, were it not for the note of time, from henceforth," which distinguishes these stigmata as a mark received in a season of trial rather more than ever with his Master. The true is "so Gal 6:17 is 2 Cor. 4:10 (see the context in 4:7—8 4, also 1:8), which we quoted above (II, 2). When he wrote 2 Cor. the apostle was emerging from an experience of crucial anguish, which gave him an aspect (imagining the dying Saviour whom he preached) to this new consecration the appeal of our epistle seems to refer.

(8) Barnabas and the Galatians.—The references to Barnabas in 2:19,13, at first sight suggest the S. Galatian letter of the 2nd tour. Paul and Barnabas were companions on the first only of the three tours, and Barnabas is named thrice here and but twice in the rest of the epistles. Yet these very references awaken misgiving. Barnabas was Paul's full partner in the S. Galatian mission; Galatians senior in service, and had introduced Saul to the apostles at Jerusalem; he was the leader at the outset of this journey (Acts 9:27; 11:22-26; 13:1-3; 15:25)—Barnabas was taken for 'Zephyrus' by the heathen of Lystra, while the Salute of the Ephesus Paul (Acts 14:12). The churches of S. Galatia had two founders, and owed allegiance to Barnabas along with Paul. Yet Paul deals with the readers as though he alone were their father in Christ. Referring to Barnabas conspicuous ously in the letter and as differing from himself on a point affecting the question at issue (2:13), Paul was the more bound to give his old comrade his due and to justify his assumption of sole authority, if he were in truth addressing communities which owed their Christianity to the two men in conjunction. On the S. Galatian hypothesis, the apostle appears ungenerously to have elbowed his colleague out of the partnership. The apostle Paul, it is to be noted, was particularly sensitive on matters of this kind (1 Cor 4:15; 2 Cor 10:13–16). The name of Barnabas became confused with the church name (see 1 Cor 9:6; Col 4:10); there is no more difficulty in supposing the N. Galatians to be familiar with it than with the names of James and John (2:9). Possibly Paul, as his responsibilities extended, he left the care of S. Galatia to Barnabas, who could readily superintend this district from Antioch in Syria; Paul refers to him in 1 Cor 9:6, long after the separation of Acts 18:39, as a fellow-worker. This would account for his making direct to S. Galatia on his tour; see IV, 3 (3).

9. The two Antiochs.—In 2:11 Paul refers to “Antioch,” the famous city on the Orontes. To S. Galatians “Antioch” meant, as in 2 Tim 3:11, the Ptolemaic city of that name. Had Paul been addressing the Hellenistic church in Antioch, he could not without similar inadvertence have failed to make the distinction. The gauchoeris would have been marked as if, in writing to a circle of West-of-England towns including Bradford-on-Avon, one should peremptorily speak of “London.”

The arguments drawn from local difference in legal usage—in the matters of adoption, testament, status in favor of the S. Galatian destinatian (see Schmiedel’s examination of Ramsay’s views in EG, coll. 1608–9), and from the temperament of Paul’s “Galatians” in favor of N. Galatia (Lightfoot), are too precariously to build upon.

10. The letter of the problem.—On a broad view of the scope of Paul’s missionary work and of the relation of his letters to Acts, there is much to commend the S. Galatian theory. It simplifies the situation by identifying this cardinal writing of Paul as the letter of the churches of carding epistles in Luke’s narrative. The S. Galatian cities lay along the main route of the apostle’s travels, and in the mid-stream of the church’s life. The epistle, when associated with the Christian communities of this region, gains in historical setting and a firm point of attachment in NT history. The fountain of N. Galatian Christianity is indicated by Luke, if at all, in the most cursory fashion, and it held an obscure place in the early church. How, it is asked, could Paul intimate friend have been (on the N. Galatian theory) so uninterested in churches by which Paul himself set such store? And how can Paul have ignored, apart from the allusion of 2 Tim 3:11, the S. Galatians who formed the first-fruits of his wider labors and supplied a vital link in his chain of churches? In the way, we must point out: (1) that for anything we know Paul wrote many letters to S. Galatia; we possess but a selection from his correspondence; the choice of the canonical epistles was not governed by the importance of the parties addressed in them—Christian and Phil, Eph, Col; nor were Paul’s concern for his churches, and the emprassent with which he wrote, determined by their magnitude and position, but by their needs and their hold on his affections (see Gal 1:6, etc.; 4:17). The S. Galatians were the central line of Paul’s journeys and of the advance of gentile Christianity; this is probably the reason why Luke, who was compelled to a strict economy of space, just this field, though he shows himself aware of its existence. The apostle’s confession that he preached to the readers, in the first instance, not from choice but necessity (4:13), accords with the neglect of N. Galatia in Acts; the evangelizing of the N. Galatians was an aside in Paul’s work—an incident beyond the scope of his plans, from which at this period he was compelled again and again to turn way of Chaulius (Acts 16:6–10).

All after, though less important during the 1st cent. than S. Galatia, N. Galatia was not an unimportant or inaccessible region. It was traversed by the ancient “Royal Road,” of which the apostle probably followed as far as Phrygia in the journey of Acts 18:22,23. Planted by Paul in Old Galatia, the gospel would spread to Bithynia and Pontus farther north, as it certainly had done by the time Peter wrote to the churches of Galatia and Judean (4:18). It is observable that “Galatia” stands between “Pontus and Cappadocia” in Peter’s enumeration of the provinces—an order indicating that Christians of North Galatia were particularly in the writer’s mind. Had Paul never set foot in N. Galatia and he by worked along the Royal Road and put his message in the way of reaching the northern provinces of Asia Minor, the claim of Rom 15:19 is difficult to sustain, that “from Jerusalem, and in a circle round of Christ.” On the whole, we find the external evidence in accord with the testimony given by the internal character and affinities of the epistle: we judge that this epistle was written cir the autumn or winter of 56–57 AD, from an old “comrade” toward the end of Paul’s third missionary tour; that it was addressed to a circle of churches situated in Galatia proper or N. Galatia, probably in the western part of this country, since Galatia (Acts 16:6); and that its place lies between the two Corinthian and the Rom letters among the epistles of the second group.

literature.—The S. Galatian destination was proposed by the Danish Mynster (1841, to d. Brief aus d. Gal., 1825; M. however included N. GALABANUM, gal'b-a-nüm (ךֵלַבֹּנֹם, hebelanah; χαλάβα, chalabá): A gum-resin which occurs in small, round, semi-translucent masses or in brownish-yellow masses; has a pleasant aromatic odor and a bitter taste; and is today, at any rate, imported from Persia. It is derived from certain umbelliferous plants, Furla galbaniflua and F. rubricaulis. It is mentioned in Ex 30:34 as an ingredient of the holy incense, and also in Sir 24:15: "a pleasant odour . . . as galbanum."

history showed, the population of Galilee was composed of strangely mingled elements—Aramaean, Ituraean, Phœnician and Gr. In the circumstances these were expected to prove much stickled for high orthodoxy as the Jews. Their mixed origin explains the differences in speech which distinguished them from their brethren in the S., who regarded Galilee and the Galileans with a certain pride contempt (Jos. 1. 46; 7. 22). But a fine type of manhood was developed among the peasant farmers of the two Galilees which, according to Jos. (BJ, III, iii, 2), were "always able to make a strong resistance on all occasions of war; for the Galileans are more like farmers from Lebannon or hath the country ever been destitute of men of courage." Jos. himself a Galilean, knew his countrymen well, and on them he mainly relied in the war with Rome. In Galilee also the Messianic hope was cherished with the deepest intensity. When the Messiah appeared, with His own Galilean upbringing, it was from the north-countrymen that He received the warmest welcome, and among them His appeal elicited the most gratifying response.

In 47 BC. Herod the Great, then a youth of 25, was made military commander of Galilee, and won great applause by the fashion in which he suppressed a band of robbers who had long vexed the country (int. XIV, in. W.). In 37 BC. on the throne, 47 BC. a period of peace and prosperity for Galilee began, which lasted till the banishment of his son Antipas in 40 AD. The tetrarchy of Galilee was given to the latter at his father's death, 4 BC. Hence from that time on the whole life of Jesus, with the exception of His infancy. After the banishment of Antipas, Galilee was added to the dominions of Agrippa I., who ruled it till his death in 44 AD. Then followed a period of Roman administration, after which it was given to Agrippa II., who sided with the Romans in the subsequent wars, and held his position till 100 AD. The patriotic people, however, by no means submitted to his guidance. In their heroic struggle for independence, the command of the two Galilees, with Gamala, was intrusted to Jos, who has left a vivid narrative, well illustrating the splendid courage of his freedom-loving countrymen. But against such an adversary as Rome even their wild bravery could not prevail; and when they rose again at the end of the Vespasian, 67 AD. There is no certain knowledge of the part played by Galilee in the rebellion under Hadrian, 132-35 AD.

At the beginning of the Roman period Sepphoris (Saphirhis), about 3 miles N. of Nazareth, took the leading place. Herod Antipas, however, built a new city on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee, which, in honor of the reigning emperor, he called Tiberias. Here he reared his "golden house," and made the city the capital of his tetrarchy. See TIBERIAS.

After the fall of Jerus, Galilee, which had formerly been held in contempt, became the home of Jewish learning, and its chief seat was found in Tiberias where the Mish was committed to writing, and the Jerus Talm was composed. Thus a city into which at first no pious Jew would enter, in a province which had long been despised by the leaders of the nation, became the main center of their national and religious life.

Among the more notable cities in Galilee were Kedesh Nahalal, the city of refuge, the ruins of which lie on the heights W. of el-Huleh; 7. Cities of Chorazin, Bethsaida and Capernaum, Galilee N. of the Sea of Galilee; Nazareth, the city of the Saviour's youth and young manhood; Antipatris, the ancient Bethsaida, long before the Romans, which stood at Tell Jefât, N. of the plain of Asochis (BJ, III, vii, viii); Cana of Galilee; and Nain, on the northern slope of the mountain now called Little Hermon.

In physical features Galilee is the most richly diversified and picturesque district in Western Pal; while in beauty and fertility it is

8. General strongly contrasted with the barren

Description uplands of Judah. Cut off from Mt. Lebanon in the N. by the tremendous gorge of the Litany, it forms a broad and high plateau, sinking gradually southward until it approaches Safed, when again it rises, culminating in Jebel Jerumâk, the highest summit on the W. of the Jordan. From Safed there is a rapid descent by a stony slope and rocky path to the Sea of Galilee. The mountains of which Jebel Jerumâk is the N.E. out runner stretch westward across the country, and drop upon the plain of er-Râmâk to the S. Irregular hills and valleys, with breadths of shady woodlands, lie between this plain and that of Asochis (el-Batayf). The latter is split from the E. by the range of Jebel Torân. S. of Asochis rise lower hills, in a cup-like hollow among which lies the town of Nazareth. S. of the town of Nazareth they sink steeply into the plain of Esdraelon. The isolated form of Tabor stands out on the E., while Carmel bounds the view on the W. The high plateau in the N. terminates abruptly at the lip of the upper Jordan valley. As the Jordan runs close to the base of this range there is a deep and wild valley, with its fine rolling downs, is included in Galilee. The plain of Gennesaret runs along the northwestern shore of the Sea of Galilee. From the uplands to the W., stretching from Karûn Hattin (the traditional site of Bethsaida), and along the neighborhood of Tabor, the land lets itself down in a series of broad and fertile terraces, falling at last almost precipitously on the western shore of the Sea of Galilee. The descent toward the Mediterranean is much more gradual; and the soil gathered in the longer valleys is deep and rich.

The district may be described as comparatively well watered. The Jordan with its mighty springs is, of course, too low for purposes of irrigation. But there are many perennial streams fed by fountains among the hills. The springs at Jenin are the main sources of the river Kishon, but for the greater part of its course through the plain the bed of that river is far below the surface of the adjoining land. The deep canyons that divide the victorious roads and also a perpetual source of moisture and refreshment.

Galilee was famous in ancient times for its rich and fruitful soil, "full of the plantations of trees of all sorts, insomuch that it invites the

9. Products most slothful to pains in its cultivation by its fruitfulness; accordingly it is all cultivated by its inhabitants, and no part of it lies idle" (BJ, III, iii, 2). See also GenNabaret, Land of. The grapes grown in Naphatih were in high repute, as were the pomegranates of Shikmona—the Sykamions of Jos—which stood on the shore near Mt. Carmel. The silver sheen of the olive meets the eye in almost every valley; and the olive oil produced in Galilee has always been esteemed of the highest excellence. Its wheat fields also yielded an abundant supply, the wheat of Chorazin being proverbial. The great plain of Esdraelon must also have furnished rich provision. It cannot be doubted that Galilee was largely drawn upon for the gifts which Solomon bestowed upon the king of Tyre (2 Ch 2. 10). For a much later day the inhabitants of Tyre and Sidon depended upon the produce of Galilee (Acts 12 20).

Galilee was in easy touch with the outside world by means of the roads that traversed her valleys; crossed her range of mountains; and ran north and southward. Thus she was connected with the harbors on the Phœnician seaboard, with Egypt on the quent, and sometimes terribly destructive, earthquakes, sufficiently attest the volcanic character of the region. The soil on the level parts around the sea is very fertile, Lake Gennesaret, Lake Galilee, or. Naturally the temperature in the valley is higher than that of the uplands; and here wheat and barley are harvested about a month earlier. Frost is not quite unknown; but no one now alive remembers it to have done more than lay the most delicate fringe of ice around some of the stones on the shore. The fig and the vine are still cultivated with success. Where vegetable gardens are planted they yield plentifully. A few palms are still to be seen. The indigo plant is also grown in the plain of Gennesaret. In their season the wild flowers lavish a wealth of lovely colors upon the surrounding slopes; while bright-blossoming oleanders fringe the shore.

Coming westward from the point where the Jordan enters the lake, the mountains approach within a short distance of the sea. On the shore, fully 2 miles from the Jordan, are the ruins of Tell Hûmân, seen near Capernaum. About 2 miles farther W. are the hot springs of el-Tubgha. Here a shallow vale breaks northward, bounded on the W. by Tell 'Aretmeh. This tell is crowned by an ancient Canaanite settlement. It throws out a rocky promontory into the sea, and beyond this are the ruins of Khân Minyeh, with 'Ain el-Tsuneh close under. Few Important Rom remains have recently been discovered here. From this point the plain of Gennesaret (el-Ghuweir) sweeps round to el-Mujdib, a distance of about 4 miles. W. of this village opens the tremendous gorge, Wâdî el-Hamrûm, with numerous robber-hovels nestled in its precipitous sides, and the ruins of Arbela on its southern lip. From the northern parts of the lake the Horns of Hâfîn, the traditional Mount of Beatitudes, may be seen through the rocky jaws of the gorge. S. of el-Mujdib the mountains advance to the shore, and the path is cut in the face of the slope, bringing us to the hot spring, 'Ain el-Fültyeh, where is a little valley, with gardens and orange grove. The road then crosses a second promontory, and proceeds along the base of the mountain to Tiberias. Here the mountains recede from the shore leaving a crescent-shaped plain, largely covered with the ruins of the ancient city. The modern town stands at the northern corner of the plain; while at the southern end are the famous hot baths of the ancient Hammath. A narrow ribbon of plain between the mountain and the shore runs to the S. end of the lake. There the Jordan, issuing from the sea, almost surrounds the mound on which are the ruins of Kerak, the Tarichæa of Jos. Crossing the floor of the valley, past Semakh, which is now a station on the Haifa-Damascus railway, we find a similar strip of plain along the eastern shore. Nearby opposite Tiberias is the stronghold of Kâlib el-Haul, possibly the ancient Hippos, with the village of Fîg, the ancient Aphek, on the height to the E. To the N. of this the waters of the sea almost touch the foot of the steep slope. A herd of swine running headlong down the mountain would here inevitably perish in the lake (Mt 8:22, etc.). Next we reach the mouth of Wâdî Semakh, in which lie the ruins of Kureh, probably representing the ancient Gerasa. Northward the plain widens into the marshy breadth of el-Beltâhah, and once more we reach the Jordan, flowing smoothly through the flat lands to the sea.

The position of the lake makes it liable to sudden storms, the cool air from the uplands rushing down the gorges with great violence and setting up the eastern tumultuous billows. Such storms are fairly frequent, and as they are attended with danger to small craft, the boatmen are constantly on the alert.

Save in very settled conditions they will not venture far from the shore. Occasionally, however, tempests break over the lake, in which a boat could hardly live. Only twice in over 5 years the present writer witnessed such a hurricane. Once it burst from the S. In a few moments the air was thick with mist, through which one could hear the roar of the tortured waters. In about ten minutes the wind fell as suddenly as it had risen. The air cleared, and the wide welter of foam-created waves attested the fury of the blast. On the second occasion the wind blew from the E., and the phenomena described above were practically repeated.

4. Fish Zebedee was able to hire men to assist him (Mk 1:20). In recent years there has been a considerable revival of this industry. See Galm. Four of the apostles, and these the chief, had been brought up as fishermen on the Sea of Galilee—Peter and Andrew, James and John.

The towns around the lake named in Scripture are treated in separate articles. Some of these it is impossible to identify. Many are the ruins of great and splendid cities on slope and height of which almost nothing is known today. But from their mute testimony we gather that the lake in the valley which is now so quiet was once the center of a busy and prosperous population. We may assume that the cities named in the Gospels were mainly Jewish. Jesus would naturally avoid those in which Gr influences were strong. In most cases they have gone, leaving not even their names with any certainty behind; but His memory abides forever. The lake and mountains are, in main outline, such as His eye beheld. This is it that lends its highest charm to "the eye of Galilee." The advent of the railway has stirred afresh the pulses of life in the valley. A steamer plies on the sea between the station at Semakh and Tiberias. Superior buildings are rising outside the ancient walls. Gardens and orchards are being planted. Modern methods of agriculture are being employed in the Jewish colonies, which are rapidly increasing in number. Slowly, perhaps, but surely, the old order is giving place to the new. If freedom and security be enjoyed in reasonable measure, the region will again display its long-hidden treasures of fertility and beauty.

GALL, gôl: (1) נַגְלָ, rosh, or פַּלְגָל, rôsh (Dt 32:32 only, "grapes of gall"): Some very bitter plant, the bitterness as in (2) being associated with the idea of poison. Dt 29:18 m "rosh, a poisonous herb": Lam 3:5,19; Jer 8:14; 24:15; 25:13, "water of gall," m "poisonous"; Hos 10:4, "terrible gall," Am 6:12, "Ye have turned justice into gall"; Job 20:16, the "poison of asps": here rôsh clearly refers to a different substance from the other references, the translations in common being bitterness and poisonous properties. Henlock (Consanguinum, colocynth, Citrus colocynthis) and the poppy (Papaver somniferum) have all been suggested as the original rōsh, the last having most support, but in most references the word may represent any bitter poisonous substance. Rōṣh is associated with ʾarānah, "wormwood" (Dt 29:18; Lam 3:10; Am 6:12).

(2) וַעֲרֹן, χολῆ (Job 16:13), and וַעֲרֹן, χολῆ (30:14-21), both derived from a root meaning "to be bitter," are applied to the human gall or "bile," but like ʿarānah, rōṣh is also used with the venom of serpents (20:14). The poison of these animals was supposed to reside in their bile.

(3) χολῆ, χολῆ (Mt 27:34), "They gave him wine to drink mingled with gall," is a clear reference to the LXX version of Ps 69:21: "They gave me also gall [χολῆ, Heb rōṣh] for my food; and in my thirst they gave me vinegar to drink." In Mk 15:33, it says, "wine mingled with myrrh." It is well known that the Romans gave wine to criminals before their execution to alleviate their sufferings; here the χολῆ or bitter substance used was myrrh (Pliny Ep. xx.18; Sen. Ep. 83).

GALLANT, gal'ant: The tr of יָבָשׁ, נָכָד, "bright," "splendid," "magnificent" (Isa 35:21, "Neither shall gallant [ṣaddēr] ship pass thereby"); the word is tr4 "magnificent" in Ex 15:10; 1 S 4:5; Isa 10:34; Zec 11:2 AV. In Isa 35:21, above, it is applied to Heb. "glory," "adornment" (Job, in . . . majestic); of Ps 16:3, "the excellent." As a noun it is used in m of Nah 2:5 as alternative for "worthies," RV "noble"; in Zec 11:2, for "the mighty," RV "goodly ones," m "glorious," it is tr4 "noble" in Jgs 15:13; 2 Ch 23:20, etc. See also SHIPS AND BOATS.

GALLERY, gal'er-i: (1) עֵדְרָה, ʿeddērē, K'thbbh; מַעֲרֹן, ʿattēk, used only in Ezek 41:16; 42:3; etymology and meaning uncertain; among the more probable suggestions are "pillar," "column," "walk with pillars," "colonnades," "passageway," "porches," "galleries" and "terraces" (cornell suggests the substitution of ʾērōth, "walls," "pillars." Rothstein would omit it as a dittography or other corruption): A long narrow balcony formed either by pillars or by the receding upper stories of a building. Both kinds are described in Ezekiel's vision of the Temple restored. They surround the three stories of side chambers around the Temple proper, and also the "building before the separate place which was at the back thereof," and the three-story structure containing rows of chambers in the outer court opposite the side-chambers of the Temple. Those around the Temple proper were apparently supported by pillars, and hence they did not take away from the width of the 2d- and 3d-story rooms (cf 41:7). On the other hand, the galleries of the outer buildings which were not supported by pillars and therefore not on top of each other, but in terraces, did take away from the upper stories more than from the lowest and middlemost: the upper chambers were shortened or "straitened more than the lowest and the middlemost from the ground."

The lower porches of the outer court were cut off from the view of those of the inner court by a low wall, but in the 3d story, gallery looked out to gallery across the twenty cubits which belonged to the pavement and the pavement which belonged to the outer court." Those "galleries," or ʿattēkān, are one of the few features that distinguish the temple of Ezekiel's vision from Solomon's temple. The idea and perhaps the word seem to have been borrowed from the more elaborate architecture of the country of the Exile, where pressed the Jews of Ezekiel's time very strongly.

The building Ezekiel would place in the outer court with its terraces is a perfect Nab ziggarat or ziggurat temple (cf Enc Brit, 11th ed., II, 574–5, ed.).

(2) ʿāqāḥ, ραθῆ (Job 17:5; יָרַת, ʿāqāḥ, K'thbbh, ραθῆ, K'thbbh, probably "rafter," Cant 11:7; both words and also the similar word ʿrāḥām, Gen 30:38; Ex 2:16), ʿtr4 "throgs," are probably connected with the Aram. ʿrāḥām, "to flow, to run."

Although AV uses "board," Cant 7:27 reads: ʿtr4 "boards," the other context in place clearly points to another meaning. In the former of these passages, "the king is held captive in the tresses thereof," there follows a description of the head. In the latter passage the word in question is in parallelism with ʾērōth, "the beams of our house," and "raising AV, or possibly "boards," is suggested.

NATHAN ISAACS

GALLEY, gal′i: See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, (2).

GALLIM, gal′im (גַּלִּים, gallim, "heaps"): Probably two distinct places:

(1) A town mentioned among the 11 additional cities of Judea which are in the LXX assigned to Josh 15:59, and have altogether disappeared from the Heb text. It occurs between Karem (ʿAin Karem) and Baither (Bethl.). It is probably the large and flourishing village of Beth Gala, near Bethlehem.

(2) Gallim is mentioned in Isa 10:30; not far from Laishah and Anthoth and certainly N. of Jerusalem. It was the home of Palti the son of Laish (1 S 30:44), and it is by many authorities identified with the Gilgal on the N. and Zr of Judah (Josh 15:7), the Quttāb of the passage (18:17), and the Beth-gilgal of Neh 12:29.

GALLIO, gal′i-o (Ταῦταλος, Gallion): The Roman deputy or proconsul of Achaia, who was defending Paul from his Jewish accusers on the apostle's first visit to Corinth, during his second missionary journey (Acts 18:12-17). The trial was not of long duration. Although Gallio extended his protection to the Jews and, according to the state, he contemptuously rejected the claim of the Jews that their law was binding upon all. In the eyes of the proconsul, the only law universally applicable was that of the Roman code and social morality: under neither was the prisoner chargeable; therefore, without even waiting to hear Paul's speech in his own defence, he summarily ordered his lictors to clear the court. Even the subsequent treatment meted out to Sosthenes, the chief ruler of the synagogue, was to him a matter of indifference. The beasting of Sosthenes is ascribed by different readings to "Jews" and to "Greeks," but the incident is referred to by the writer of Acts to show that the sympathies of the populace lay with Paul, and that Gallio made no attempt to suppress them. Gallio has often been instanced as typical of one who is careless or indifferent to religion, yet in the account given of him in Acts, he merely displayed an attitude characteristic of the manner in which Roman governors conducted their religious disputes of the time (cf also Lyseas; Felix; Festus). Trained by his administrative duties to practical thinking and precision of language, he refused to adjudicate the squabbles of what he regarded as an obscure religious sect whose law was to him a suble quibbling with "words and names."

According to extra-canonical references, the original name of Galio was Marcus Annaeus Novatus.
but this was changed on his being adopted by the rhetorician, Lucius Junius Gallio. He was born at Corinth, and was a member of the Tiberian school. He was the brother of the philosopher Seneca, by whom, as also by Statius, reference is made to the affable nature of his character. As Achaia was reconstituted a proconsular province by Claudius in 44 AD, the accession of Gallio to office must have been subsequent to that date, and has been variously placed at 51–53 AD (cf also Knowling in Expos Gr Text., II, 389–92). GALLOWS, gal'ös. See Hanging; Punishments.

GAMÆL, gam’él (Γαμαῖλ, Gamalēl): Chief of the family of Ishamar who went up from Babylon with Ezra (1 Esd 8 29); called Daniel in Ezr 8 2.

GAMALIEL, ga-māl’i-el ( CreateMap, gamalēl, “ward or recompense of God”; Καμαλίλης, Gamalēlēs): (1) The son of Pedahzur, and “prince of the children of Manasseh,” chosen to aid in taking the census in the Wilderness (Nu 1 10; 2 20; 7 54–59; 10 23). (2) A Pharisee who at the meeting of the “councill” succeeded in persuading its members to adopt a moderate course when they were incensed at the doctrine of Peter and the rest of the apostles and sought to slay them (Acts 5 33–40). That he was well qualified for this task is attested by the fact that he was himself a member of the Sanhedrin, a teacher of the law, and held in high honor among all the people. In his speech he pointed out to his fellow-councillors the dire consequences that might ensue upon any precipitous action on their part. While quoting instances, familiar to his hearers, of past insurrections or seditions that had failed, he reminded them at the same time that if this last under Peter “is of God, ye will not be able to overthrow them; lest haply ye be found even to be fighting against God.” As a result of his arguments, the apostles, after being beaten and admonished to speak no longer in the name of Jesus, were released. In the speech which he was permitted by Lysias to deliver from the stairs of the palace after the riot in Jerusalem, Paul referred to Gamaliel as the teacher of his youth, who instructed him rigidly in the Mosaic law (Acts 22 3).

The toleration and liberality displayed by Gamaliel upon the occasion of his speech before the San-hedrin were all the more remarkable because of their rarity among the Pharisees of the period. Although the strict observance by the Christians of temple-worship, and their belief in immortality, a point in dispute between Pharisees and Sadducees, may have had influence over him (Knowling), no evidence is to be attached to the view that he definitely favored the apostles or to the tradition that he afterward became a Christian. The high place accorded him in Jewish tradition, and the fact that the title of Rabban, higher even than Rabbi or Master, was first bestowed upon him, testify that he remained a Pharisee to the end. His speech is rather indicative of one who knew the deeper truth in the OT of the universal fatherhood of God, and who recognized that the presence of His power was the deciding factor in all human enterprise. His social enactments were permeated by the same broad-minded spirit. Thus his legislation on behalf of the poor was formulated so as to include Gentiles as well as Jews. The authenticity of his speech has, however, been denied by Wendt and others, chiefly on account of the alleged anachronism in regard to Theudas (see THEudas); but the internal evidence is against this view (cf Knowling in Expos Gr Text., II, 161). It has also been objected by Baur and the Tubingen school that the liberal, peace-loving Gamaliel could not have been the teacher of the Anabaptist Saturius of Tiberias. Whatsoever the case may be, firstly, that the charges against Stephen of destroying the temple and subverting the laws of Moses were not brought against Peter and the other apostles, and, secondly, that the doctrines of any one teacher, however moderate he himself may be, are liable to be carried to extremes by an over-zealous pupil.

LITERATURE

About the amusements of the ancient Israelites we know but little, partly on account of the nature of our literary sources, which are almost exclusively religious, partly because the antiquities thus far discovered yield very little information on this topic as compared with those of some of other people, and partly because of the relatively serious character of the people. Games evidently took a less prominent place in Heb life than in that of the Greeks, the Romans and the Egyptians. Still the need for recreation was felt and to a certain extent supplied in ways according with the national temperament. Mere athletics (apart from Gr and Rom influence) were but little cultivated. Simple and natural amusements and exercises, and trials of wit and wisdom, were more to the Heb taste. What is known or probably conjectured may be summed up under the following heads: Games of Children; Sports; Games of Chance and Skill; Story-telling; Dancing; Proverbs; Riddles. The amusements of Greece and Rome, which were so much influenced later Jewish society and esp. those which are directly or indirectly referred to in the NT, will be the theme of the latter part of the article.

1. ISRAELITISH GAMES.—There are two general references to the amusements of children: Zec 7 5: “And the streets of the city shall be full of boys and girls playing in the streets thereof”; and Gen 21 9 m, where we Games read of Ishmael “playing” (μναγῶ). The rendering of our Bibles, “mocking,” is open to question. Of specific games and pets there is hardly a mention in the OT. Playing with ball is alluded to in Isa 22 18: “He will . . .

toss thee like a ball into a large country,” but children need not be thought of as the only players. If the balls used in Pal were like those used by the Egyptians, they were sometimes made of leather or skin stuffed with bran or husks of corn, or of string and rushes covered with leather (cf Wilkinson, Popular Account, I, 198–201; British Museum Guide to the Egypt Collections, 78). The question of Jeh to Job (41 5): “Wilt thou play with him [the crocodile] as with a bird? or wilt thou bind him for thy maidens?” suggests that tame birds were petted by Heb children, esp. by girls. The NT has one reference to the children’s play, viz. the half-parable about the children in the market-place who would neither dance to the flute as if at a marriage feast nor wall as if at a funeral (Mt 11 16 f; Lk 7 32).
Running was no doubt often practised, esp. in the time of the early monarchy, Saul and Jonathan (2 S 1 23, Asaheh (2 18), Ahimaaz 2. Sports (18 23.27) and some of the Gidites (1 S 13.25), the king’s service (1 3.2 5) were renowned for their speed, which can only have been the result of training and exercise. The same can be said of the feats of those who ran before a king or a prince (1 S 8 11; 2 S 15 1; 1 K 5 1; 18 46). The Psalmist must have watched great runners before he pictured the sun as rejoicing like a strong man to run his course (Ps 19 5b; cf also Eccl 9 11; Jer 8 6; 23 10). For running in the Gr games, see the latter part of this article.

Archery practice is implied in the story of Jonathan’s touching interview with David (1 S 20 20.35-38) and in Job’s complaint: “He hath also set me up for his mark. His archers compass me round about” (Job 16 12). Only by long practice could the 700 left-handed Benjamite slingers, every one of whom could sling stones (2 S 5 20), and his hair-breeding and not miss (Jgs 20 16), and the young David (1 S 17 49), have attained to the precision of aim for which they are famous.

In Zec 12 3, “I will make Jerus a burdeensome stone,” lit. “a stone of burden,” Jerome found an allusion to a custom which prevailed widely in Pal in his day, and has been noticed by a recent traveler, of stone-lifting, i.e. of testing the strength of young men by means of heavy round stones. Some, he says, could raise one of these stones of 50 or more lbs. which, to the knees, others to the waist, others to the shoulders and the head, and a few could lift it above the head. This interpretation is not quite certain (Wright, Comm., 364), but the form of sport described was probably in vogue in Pal in Bibl. times.

High leaping or jumping was probably also practised (Ps 18 29). The “play” referred to in 2 S 2 14 ff of 12 Benjamites and 12 servants of David was not a sport but a combat like that of the Hellenic hoplitai.

Dice were known to the ancient Egyptians, and Assyrian dice have been found, made of bronze with points of gold, but there is no trace of them in the OT. Recent research at Tepe Hissar has brought to light many bones which seem to have been used in somewhat the same way as in a game played by the modern Arabs, who call it ba‘ab, the very word they apply to dice. These bones were “the oldest and most primitive form of dice” (König after Sellin, RE, XVIII, 634). The use of dice among the later Jews is attested by the condemnation of dice-players in the Mish (Sanh., ii. 3). The Syrian soldiers who cast lots for the lot of Jesus at the cross (Mt 27 55; Mk 15 24; Lk 23 44; Jn 19 24) may have used dice, but that can neither be proved nor disproved.

It has been suggested that the mackery of Jesus before the Sanhedrin described in Mt 26 67 ff; Mk 14 65; Lk 22 63 ff may have been connected with a Gr game in which one of the players held the eyes of another while a third gave him a box on the ear. The last was then announced as the touch. This game is substantially the same as the similar game is represented in an Egyp tomb picture (Wilkinson, Popular Account, 1. 190). This reference, however, though not quite inadmissible, is scarcely probable. Games with boards and men bearing some resemblance to our modern games were in great favor in Egyp (1b, 190-95), but cannot be proved for the Jews even in NT times.

Listening to stories or recitations has long been a favorite amusement of Orientals (cf Lane, Modern Egyp, ii. 350-51: “The Thousand and One Nights”), but there seems to be no reference to it in the Bible. There can be no reasonable doubt, however, that the Hebrews, like their neighbors, had story-tellers or reciters, and heard them with delight. Egyptian Egyp, known from the two volumes edited by Professor Petrie in 1895; and there are several non-canonical Jewish tales with a combination of romance and moral teaching: the Books of Tob and Jdt and perhaps the Story of Ahikar, the last of which, with the help of the Aram, may perhaps be traced back (in some form) to about 400 BC (Schurer, JJS, iii, 259). There are also several such tales in the Hagadic portions of the Talm and the Midr.

Dancing, that is, the expression of joy by rhythmical movements of the limbs to musical accompaniment, is scarcely ever mentioned in the Bible. But there seems to be no reference to it in the Bible.

4. Story-Telling

Bible as a social amusement, except in a general way (Jgs 16 25.27?); Job 21 11; Ps 30 11; Eccl 3 4; Jer 31 4.13; Lam 5 15; Mt 11 17; Lk 16 25). There is one exception, the Egyptian Dance—from Tomb at Thebes.

The distinctly religious dance is more frequently mentioned. The clear instances of it in the Bible are the dance of the women of Israel at the Red Sea, headed by Miriam with her tambourine (Ex 15 20); the dance of the Israeldites round the golden calf (32 19); the dance of the maidens of Shiloh at an annual feast (Jgs 21 19 ff); the leaping or limping of the prophets of Baal round their altar on Carmel (1 K 18 26), and the dancing of David in front of the ark (2 S 6 14.16) Ch 15 29). There are general references in Ps 149 3: “Let them praise his name in the dance”; 150 4: “Praise him with timbrel and dance”; and perhaps in 68 25. The allusions in Cant 6 13, “the dance of Mahanaim,” and in the proper name Abel-melahol, “the meadow of the dance” (1 K 19 16, etc), are too uncertain to be utilized. The ritual dance was probably with text and music and dance. East. David’s performance has Egyp parallels. Seti I, the father of Ramses II, and other Pharaohs are said to have danced before a deity (Budge, The Book of the Dead, I, xxxv, and Asiatic monuments, esp. that of the custom elsewhere. About the methods of dancing practiced by the ancient Hebrews but little is known. Probably the dancers in some cases joined hands and formed a ring, or part of a ring, as in some heathen representations. The description of Daniel (9:4) that that which was before Jeh with all his might: . . . leaping and dancing before Jeh (2 S 6 14—16) suggests three features of that particular display and the mode of dancing which it represented: violent execration, leaping (m'phaz’ahz’ah), and whirling (wrkhrkkhwrk). Perhaps the whirling dance of Islam is a modern parallel to the last. Women seem generally to have danced by themselves, one often leading the rest, both in dancing and antiphonal song; so Miriam and the women of Israel, deepthah’s daughter and her comrades, those of Song of Solomon and David, and, in the Apoc., Judith, Judith and her sisters after the death of Holofernes (Jth 15 12 f.). Once the separation of the sexes is perhaps distinctly referred to (Jer 31 13). In public religious dances they may have occasionally united, as was the case sometimes in the heathen world, but there is no clear evidence to that effect (cf., however, 2 S 6 20 and Ps 68 25). Of the social dancing of couples in the modern fashion there is no trace. There seems to be some proof that the religious dancing was among the Jews until the time of Christ and later.

If the Mish can be trusted (Sukkâh, v. 4), there was a torch-light dance in the temple in the Illuminated court, in the night of the 10th day of Nisan (in which men of advanced years and high standing took part. The Gemara to the Talm(Talm) adds that a famous dancer on these occasions was Rabbi Simon or Simon, the son of Gamaliel, who lived in the apostolic age (Jos. B. i. IV, ii, 9). According to another proverb, (Tal. d. 4 s.) the daughters of Jews used to dance dressed in white in the vineyards on Tishri the 10th and Ab the 15th. Religious functions in modern East is celebrated not only by the dances of the deravvah mentioned above, but also by occasional dances led by the sheikh in honor of a saint (Curtis, Prat. Semitic Religion To-day, 169). Among the later Jews dancing was not unusual at wedding feasts. The custom is said to have been danced before the bride (K'thâbhâh 172). Dancing and singing, with lighted torches, are said to be wedding customs of the modern Arabs.

Proverbs (תפּוּרָה, māshâl; παραβία, parâbîma): Proverbs and proverbial expressions seem to have been, in some extent, a mean of amusement while in the desert. Oriental who delighted in the short, pointed statement of a moral or religious truth, or a prudential maxim, whether of literary or popular origin. Most of these sayings in the Bible belong to the fourth books and also to the fifth (see Proverbs; Ecclesiastes; Ecclesiasticus). The others which are shorter and simpler, together with a number of picturesque proverbial phrases, must have recurred continually in daily speech and have added greatly to its variety.

The OT supplies the following 10 examples of the popular proverb: (1) “Like Nimrod a mighty hunter before Jeh" (Gen 10 9). (2) “As the man is, so is his strength” (Jgs 8 21), only two words in the Heb. (3) “Is Saul also among the prophets?” (1 S 10 11 f.; 19). “Yet the wicked (even he that is called!”” forth wickedness” (1 S 24 13). (5) “There are the blind and the lame; he cannot come into the house” (2 Ch 1 11); and (6) “If he on his armors boast himself as he that putteth it off” (1 K 20 11); (7) “And all that a man’s hand will be given for his life” (Job 2 4). (8) “The days are prolonged, and every vision falteth (Ezk 12 22), a scoffing jest rather than a saying of comfort; (9) “I shall be equal to the daughter” (Ezk 16 44), two words in the Heb.; (10) “I will give you my sour grapes; as the children’s teeth are on edge” (Jer 31 29; Ezek 18 2). In the NT we find 10 others: (1) “Physician heal thyself” (Lk 4 23, cf. also v. 35). (2) “The law of Moses, as it is written in the prophet, that Christ should suffer” (Lk 18 31). (3) “What with measure your hand. it shall be measured unto you” (Mt 7 2; Mk 4 24; Lk 6 38), almost identical with Jer. 6:39. (4) “One soweth, and another reapeth” (Jn 4 37). (5) “A prophet is not without honor, but in his own country” (Mt 13 57; Lk 4 24; Jn 4 44). (6) “If in this present world we have hope, we are indeed out of the habit of the heart” (Jn 4 35), possibly a kind of proverb; (7) “Wheresoe’ver the carcasse is, there will the eagles (in v. 55) be gathered together (Lk 17 17; 21 4); perhaps a proverb of which there is a trace also in the references to the vultures in the Lxx (Mt 6 26; Acts 8 32; 16 10). (8) “It is hard for thee to kick against the goad” (Acts 26 14), a Gr proverb; (9) “For proof of Widdow’s note” (Mt 19 24; cf. Acts 20 11). (10) “Ye strain out the gnat, and swallow the camel” (Mt 23 24).

There are also many proverbial phrases which added gilded and conversation. Exceeding smallness was likened to the eye of a needle (Mt 19 24; Mk 10 25; Lk 18 25), or to a grain of mustard (Mt 13 31; Mk 4 31; Mt 17 20; Lk 17 6). Considerations both found also in the Tal’m, the Kor’an, and modern Arab. sayings. Relative greatness was likened to a camel (Mt 19 24, etc.), in the Tal’m to a camel or an elephant. Great number was illustrated by reference to “the sand which is upon the sea-shore” (Gen 22 17 and many other passages); “the dust of the earth” (13 16, etc.; also an Arabian figure); “the stars of the earth” (Jn 5 25; Mt 13 27; Lk 15 7, 9; 16: 9 2 f.), an early Bab. figure; a swarm of locusts (Nah 3 5 and 6 other passages), a multitude used also by Sennacherib (D6s, N. a. Yl. 97), and the caravan of heaven (Gen 15 5 and other passages). When a complete sequence was promised or denied, it was said that not a hair of the head was or should be injured or perished (1 S 14 45; 2 S 14 11; 1 K 5 92; Dn 3 27; 2 M 21 12, 13, 18). The “mountains” which were referred to as the removal of mountains (Mt 17 20; Mt 21 18; Mk 11 13; Lk 21 18), as also the mountains of earth” (Ps 104 31). Many old proverbs have been cut of. Dukos in his Rubrnhine Blumenlese gives 666 proverbs and proverbial expressions from the Tal’m and its related lit. and, as yet, as the Arabic proverb has an unexhausted lore is still in great favor in the Bib. Orient. See also Proverbs.

7. Riddles (תרדלים, ḫâddâh; ἄρωυς, árōma): Riddle-making and riddle-guessing were in favor in the ancient East, both in educated circles.

There is a table in the British Museum K 4347: Guide to Assyr. and Bab Antiquities, 53) from the library of Asshur-bani-pal at Nineveh. The use of riddles not only by the Assyrians of the 7th cent. BC, but also in a far earlier age, for it contains a Sumer as well as a Sem text. So it is not surprising that we find a remarkable example of an early Babylonian riddle. Somewhat famous riddle: “Out of the eater came forth food, and out of the strong came forth sweetness” (Jgs 14 14). The riddle is couched in poetic form, as is also the solution: “What is sweeter than honey? and what is stronger than a lion?” (ver 18), and the comment: “If ye had not plowed with my mule, ye should not have found out my riddle” (ib). The stipulation of a prize or penalty according to the success or failure of the persons challenged to solve the riddle was a custom met with also among the ancient Greeks and in later and among the Persian:

2 Ch 9 1 the word used of Samson’s riddle (ḵâddâh) is employed of the “hard questions” put to Solomon by the queen of Sheba. The LXX seems to have understood the word as “riddle” here also, for it renders the Hebrew as enigmata. Jews not only adopted this interpretation, but actually gave riddles said to have been proposed. Of these riddles which, of course, have no direct historic value, but are interesting specimens of Rabbin. in an intellectual atmosphere, but they have only been put forth without movement while living, it moves when its head is cut off;” the answer to which is: “a tree” (Jew Enc. art. “Riddle”; see also for these riddles in the Epistles. Hellenic athletics found their way into Jewish society through the influence of the Greek kingdom ruled over by the Seleucids. Early in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes (cir 176 BC) a gymnasiwm, "place of exercise," was built in Jerusalem.

Theater at Gerasa.
Games Gap

The former passage ERV: “Every man that striveth in the games [agonizoménoi] is temperate in all things,” also alludes to the rigid self-control enforced by long training which the athlete must practise. The training itself is glanced at in the exhortation: “Exercise thyself [gumnaze] unto godliness” (1 Tim 4 7), and in the remark which follows: “Bodily exercise [gumnasia] is profitable for a little.” It is remarkable that the word gymnasium, or “place of training,” which occurs in the Apoc (2 Mac 4 9, 12) is not met with in the NT. The necess\(\text{ity for the observance of rules and regulations is referred to in the words: “And if also a man contend in the games, he is not crowned, except he have contended lawfully” (2 Tim 2 5). In all these passages the games will have been more or less in the apostle’s thought (for other possible NT references of He 5 14; 10 32; 12 1; 2 Pet 2 14).

In addition to these general references there are many allusions to details, again found mainly in the Pauline Epistles. These may meet

3. Specific conveniently be grouped in alphabetical order.

(b) Beast-fight.—The combats of wild animals with one another and with men, which were so popular at Rome toward the close of the Republic and under the Empire, were not unknown in Pal. Condemed criminals were thrown to wild beasts by Herod the Great in his amphitheater at Jerus, to afford delight to spectators,” a proceeding which Joe (Ant. XV, viii, 1) characterizes as impious. After the fall of Jerus in 70 AD many Jewish captives were slain in fighting with wild beasts (BJ, VII, ii). This horrible form of sport must have been in the apostle’s mind when he wrote: “I fought with beasts [theriomachia] at Ephesus” (1 Cor 15 32). The reference is best understood as figurative, as in Ignatius on Rom 5 1, where the same word (theriomachia) is used, and the soldiers are compared to leopards.

(b) Boxing.—This form of sport is directly referred to in 1 Cor 9 26: “So box 1 [RVm, Gr pukteiō], as not beating the air.” The allusion is probably continued in ver 27a: “but I buffet [RVh bruise, Gr kaphaste] my body.”

(c) The course.—Foot-races and other contests took place in an inclosure 606 ft. 9 in. in length, called a stadium. This is once referred to in a passage in the context of that just mentioned, which almost seems based on observation: “They that run in a race-course [RVm, Gr staidion] run all” (ver 24).

(d) Discus throwing.—The throwing of the discus, a round plate of stone or metal 10 or 12 in. in diameter, which was a prominent feature of Gr athletics and is the subject of a famous statue, a copy of which is in the British Museum, is not mentioned in the NT, but is alluded to in 2 Mace 4 14 as one of the amusements indulged in by Hellenizing priests in the reign of Antiochus Epiphanes.

(e) The foot-race.—The words for “run” and “race” (Gr treichō and drómoi) sometimes clearly, and in other cases probably, allude to foot-races at the games. For obvious references of 1 Cor 9 24; He 12 1; 2 Tim 4 7; for possible references see Acts 13 25; 20 24; Rom 9 16; Gal 2 2; 5 7; Phil 2 16; 2 Thess 3 1. The second of these Discus Thrower.

Passages (He 12 1) allude to the necessity for the greatest possible reduction of weight, and for steady concentration of effort. All the passages would remind the first readers of the single-course and double-course foot-races of the games.

(f) The goal.—The goal of the foot-race, a square pillar at the end of the stadium opposite the entrance, which the athlete as far as possible kept in view and the sight of which encouraged him to redouble his exertions, is alluded to once: “I press on toward the goal” (Phil 3 14, Gr skopóš).

(g) The herald.—The name and country of each competitor were announced by a herald and also the name, country and father of a victor. The may be an allusion to this custom in 1 Cor 9 27: “after that I have been a herald [RVm, Gr kērisato] to others;” of also 1 Tim 2 7; 2 Tim 1 11, where the Gr for “preacher” is khras, “herald.”

(h) The prize.—Successful athletes were rewarded at the great games by a wreath consisting in the apostolic age of wild olive (Olympian), parsley
(Nemean), laurel (Pythian), or pine (Isthmian). This is referred to in a general way in Phil 3 14, and in 1 Cor 9 24: "One receiveth the prize" (Gr in both cases bradion), of also Col 3 15: "Let the presentation of a play of Euripides, and the Jewish colony to which he belonged produced a dramatic poet named Ezekiel, who wrote inter alia a play on the Exodus and the fragment of which has been preserved (Schürer, GJV4, II, 60; III, 500 ff.). An inscription found not long ago at Miletus shows that part of the theater of that city was reserved for Jews (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 445 f.). The renderers of the Pauline Epistles, Jews as well as Gentiles, would be generally more or less familiar with the theater and the drama. It has been suggested that there is a glimpse of a degraded form of the drama, the mime or mimic play, which was exceedingly popular in the 1st cent. and afterward, in the mockery of Jesus by the soldiers (Mt 27 27—30 || Mk 15 10—19). The "king" seems to have been a favorite character with the comic mime. The mockery of the Jewish king, Agrippa I, by the populace of Alexandria, a few years later, which furnishes a very striking parallel to the incident recorded in the Gospels (Schürer, GJV4, I, 497), is directly connected by Philo with the mimics. The subject is very ably discussed by a German scholar, Hermann Reich, in a learned monograph, Der König mit der Dorfkrone (1905). Certain things are obvious, if course, unattainable, but it seems at least fairly probable that the rude Syrian soldiers, who were no doubt in the habit of attending the theater, may have been echoing some mimic play in their mock hommage to "the king of the Jews."

GAMMADIM, gam'ma-dim (גָּמאָdatasetn, gammadhtm): The word occurs only in Ezek 27 11, in AV in form "Gammadim," in ERV "Gammadim." In ARV, as also in ERV, it is rendered "valorous men." Some think a proper name is required, but identification is not possible, and the meaning remains doubtful.

GAMUL, ga'mul (גָּמֻל, gamul), "weaned": The head of the 22d of the 24 courses of priests inaugurated by David (1 Ch 24 17).

GANGRENE, gan'grën (גָּגִּרְנָה, gāgīnāh, pronounced gāgīnā), AV canker: The name was used by the old Gr physicians for an eating ulcer which corrodes the soft parts and, according to Galen, often ends in mortification. St. Paul compares the corrupting influence of profane babbling or levity, in connection with subjects which ought to be treated with reverence, to this disease (2 Tim 2 17). The old Eng. word "canker" is used by 16th- and 17th-cent. authors as the name of a caterpillar which eats into a bud. In this sense it occurs 18 t in Shakespeare (e.g. Midsummer Night's Dream, II, ii, 3). The canker-worm mentioned 6 t by Joel and Nahum is probably the young stage of Accratio peregrinum, a species of locust. Cankered in Jas 5 3 AV means "rustled" (Gr kattātai), and is so rendered in RV. In Sus ver 52 Coverdale uses the phrase, "O thou old cankered carle," in Daniel's address to the elder, where RV has "waxed old in wickedness." The word is still used in the Scottish dialect and applied to persons who are cross-grained and disagreeable.

GAR, gâr: AV for Gas (q.v.).

GARDEN, gâr'd'n (גַּן, gal, גִּנְנָה, ginâh; κέρας, kêros): The Arab. jannah (dim. jannainaht), like the Heb. gannâh, lit. "a covered or hidden place," denotes in the mind of the dweller in the East something more than the ordinary garden. Gardens in Bib. times, such as are frequently referred to in Sem lit., were usually walled inclosures, as the name indicates (Lam 2 6 ARVm), in which there were paths winding in and out among shade and fruit trees, canals of running water, fountains, sweet-smelling herbs, aromatic blossoms and convenient arbors in which to sit and enjoy the effect. These gardens are mentioned in Gen 2 and 3; 13 10; Cant 4 12-16; Ecl 2 5; Ezk 28 13; 31 8; 36 35; Joel 2 3. Ancient Bab, Assyri and Egypt records show the fondness of the rulers of these countries for gardens laid out on a grand scale and planted with the rarest trees and plants. The drawings made by the ancients of their gardens leave no doubt about their general features and their correspondence with Bib. gardens. The Pers. word pardeš (παρδέσσον, pardeisos) appears in the later Heb writings to denote more extensive gardens or parks. It is the "orchards" in Ecl 2 5 AV; Cant 4 13. See Paradise.

Such gardens are still common throughout the Levant. They are usually situated on the outskirts of a city (cf Jn 18 12; 19 18), except in the case of the more pretentious estates of rich pashas or of the government seats (cf 2 K 21 18; Est 1 5; 7 7 8; Neh 3 15; 2 K 25 4; Jer 39 4; 52 7). They are inclosed with walls of mud blocks, as in Damascus, or stone walls capped with thorns, or with hedges of thorny bushes (cf Lam 2 6 ARVm), or prickly pear. In nearly treeless countries, where there is no rain during 4 or 5 months, at least, of the year, the gardens are often the only spots where trees and other vegetation can flourish, and here the existence of vegetation depends upon the water supply, brought in canals from streams, or raised from wells by more or less crude lifting machines (cf Nu 24 7). Such references as Gen 2 10; Nu 24 6; Dt 11 10; Isa 1 30; 58 11; Cant 4 15 indicate that in ancient times they were as dependent upon irrigation in Bib. lands as at present. The planning of their gardens so as to utilize the water supplies has beers. No doubt the remembrances of his visit to Damascus were fresh in his mind when he wrote. El-Jannah is used by the Moslems to signify the "paradise of the faithful."

Gardens were used as places of sacrifice, esp. in heathen worship (Isa 1:29; 65:3; 66:17). They sometimes contained burial places (2 K 21:18-26; Jn 19:41).

Figurative: The destruction of gardens typified desolation (Am 4:9); on the other hand, fruitful gardens figured prosperity (Na 3:6; Job 8:16; Isa 51:5; 58:17; 61:11; Jer 29:5:28; 31:12; Am 9:14).

GARDEN, THE KING'S: Mention is made of "the king's garden" in 2 K 25:4; Jer 39:4; 62:7 (fundamentally the same passage), in connection with the flight of Zedekiah from Jerusalem; and again in Neh 3:15. The last passage shows that the "garden" was at the pool of Siloah (RV 'Shelah'), at the mouth of Tyropoeon, near the "fountain gate." This would seem to be "the gate between the two walls which was by the king's garden" of the passages in 2 K and Jer (cf 2 Ch 32:5). On the topography, see Jerusalem; also Robinson, Pal, II, 142. Arnold (in Herzog) thinks the garden is probably identical with "the garden of Uzza" of 2 K 21:18-26.

GARDENER, ġār'd-nēr (κηπωρός, κέπουρος): "Gardener" occurs once in the EV (Jn 20:15), the tr of κῆπος and οτρός, "garden" or "keeper." It is likely that the man referred to was the watchman or keeper (Arab. nāfār; Heb nō iq̇r), corresponding to those mentioned in 2 K 27:19; 18:8; Job 27:18, etc., and not one who did the manual labor. It is first recorded in Pal today to set a watchman over a garden during its productive season. See Watchman.

GARDEN-HOUSE (גָּרְדֶּנֶה, bāh ha-gādn): A place mentioned in describing the flight of Ahaziah, king of Judah, from Jehu (2 K 9:27). Probably we ought not to translate the Heb, but take it as a proper name, Beth-Haggan (q.v.). If he fled southward, the town might possibly be Jenin, En-gannim, which see.

Gareb, ga'reb (גָּרֶב, gāreb): One of David's "mighty men of the armies" (2 S 23:38; 1 Ch 11:40), an "Ishrite," i.e. a member of one of the families of Kirath-jearim (1 Ch 2:53). Some, however, read ha-yattirī for ha-yāhīrī, thus making him a native of Jattir. See Ira.

Gareb, ga'reb, THE HILL OF (גָּרֶב, gāreb): A hill in the neighborhood of Jerus, which was one of the landmarks to which the prophet Jeremiah (31:39) foresaw that the city should extend. The site is unknown. Cheyne (EB) would connect this with the "mountain that lieth before the valley of Hinnom westward" (Josh 15:8), but this is too far S.; it is inconceivable that the prophet could have imagined the city extending so far in this direction; most probably the hill was to the N.—the one natural direction for the city's extension—and is now incorporated in the modern suburb. E. W. G. Masterman Garzin, garā'zin. See Gerizim.

Garland, gar'land (גָּרְדֶּנֶּא, šādēma, "wreath"): Mentioned only in Acts 14:13, where it is said that the priest of Jupiter brought oxen and garlands unto the gates with which to offer sacrifices unto Barnabas and Paul. The rendering "oxen and garlands," instead of "oxen garlanded," seems to imply that the garlands were for the priests and altar and worshippers themselves, as well as for the victims sacrificed. Only occasionally did the Hebrews use such ornaments for themselves, and that almost altogether in their later history. See Crown.

Garlic, gār'lik (גָּרְלִיק, šāhm, used only in pl. גָּרְלֵי, šāhim; cf Arab. ǧār, ǧārām): One of the delights of Egypt for which the Israelites in the Wilderness longed (Nu 11:5); we know from other sources that, though originally a product of Central Asia, garlic was known to the ancient Egyptians. It is the bulb of Allium sativum, N.O. Liliaceae, and is cultivated all over the Orient. It is eaten cooked in stews; its disagreeable penetrating odor is in evidence in the houses and on the breath of most Orientals. A bulb of garlic, hung over a bed or over the door of a house, is a powerful charm against the evil eye and other malign influences.

Garment, gār'ment. See Dress.

Garmite, gār'mit (גָּרְמִית, garmites): A gentile name applied to Keilah in 1 Ch 4:19. The reason for this is not known.

Garnier, gār'ner (גָּרְנֶר, 4arners, derived from גאר, "to gather," occurs in Ps 144:13; 26:11. In Joel 1:17. In the NT apothēkē is twice trd "garner" (Mt 3:12; Lk 3:17). The same is trd "barn" in Mt 6:26; 13:30; Lk 12:18-24.

Garnish, gārn'sh (גָּרְנִישׁ, sippādāh, garish): The word is used twice in the OT. In 2 Ch 3:6, sippādāh means "to overlay," or "to plate." Thus he "garished" the house or "overlaid" it, "studded" it, with precious stones, and thus adorned and beautified it. In Job 26:13, sippāridāh is a fem. noun meaning, "fairness," "beauty," "brilliance." "By his Spirit the heavens are garnished," i.e. the clouds are driven off by the wind or breath of Jeh and the sky made bright and clear.

In the NT (Mt 12:44; 23:29) the word kosmēō means "set in order," "make ready," "adorn," etc. In Mt 26:7 it is trd "trimmed," and in Rev 21:19 "adorned." J. J. Reeve Garrison, gār'is-n. See War.

Gas, gas (Gās, Gās): Named among the "sons of the servants of Solomon" (1 Esd 5:34); not mentioned in the lists of Ezr and Neh.

Gashmu, gas'hmūt, gas'mōt (גָּשִׁמִּי, gashmōt): A form of the name Gashmē (q.v.), found in Neh 6:6 (cf ver 1), "And Gashmu said it." But to BDB the same termination -u is found in Nabataean proper names.

Gatam, gā'tam (גָּתַמ, ga'tam): An Edomite chief, grandson of Esau (Gen 36:11-16; 1 Ch 3:36).

Gate, gāt (Heb normally [over 300 t] Tradable; occasionally רְצָה, delete, prop. "gateway" [but of Dt 3:5]; elsewhere the gateway is נַחֲלָה, pethah [as esp. Gen 19:6]; Aram. רֲכָת, 'ra; Gr ῥταῖον, pōlēn, πόλις, pōlē; ERV and AV add πόλις, pōlē, "threshold," in 1 Ch 9:19-22; and AV adds πόλις, "double-door," in Isa 45:1; פֶּסַח, πύλη, "door," Acts 3:2):

(1) The usual gateway was provided with double doors, swung on projections that fitted into sockets

in the silt and lintel. Ordinarily the material was wood (Neh 2 3 17), but greater strength and protection against fire was given by plating with metal (Ps 107 16; Isa 45 2). Jos (BJ, V, v, 8) speaks of the little metal doors of the Beautiful Gate (Acts 3 2) as a very exceptional thing. Some doors were solid slabs of stone, from which the imagery of single jewels (Isa 54 12; Rev 21 21) was derived. When closed, the doors were secured with a bar (usually of wood), Nah 3 15, but sometimes of metal, 1 K 4 13; Ps 107 16; Isa 45 2), which fitted into clamps on the doors and sockets in the post, uniting the whole firmly (Jgs 16 3). Sometimes, perhaps, a portcullis was used, but Ps 24 7 refers to the enlargement or enrichment of the gates.

As the gate was sep. subject to attack (Ezk 21 15, 22), and as to "possess the gate" was to possess the city (Gen 22 17; 24 60), it was protected by a tower (2 S 15 24 33; 2 Ch 14 7; 26 9), often, doubtless, overhanging and with flanking projections. Sometimes an inner gate was added (2 S 18 24). Unfortunately, Pal gives us little monumental detail.

GATE, EAST: The expressions are found in Ezk: "Even the gate that looketh toward the east" (43 1); "The gate whose prospect is toward the east" (ver 4); but the idea of a gate on the eastern side as the principal entrance to the court of the sanctuary goes back to the days of the tabernacle (Ex 27 18 16). In addition to its use as admitting to the sanctuary inclosure, it may be presumed, in analogy with the general mode of the administration of justice, to have been the place where in earlier times cases were tried which were referred to the jurisdiction of the sanctuary (cf Ex 18 19 22; Dt 17 8; 19 16.18; Nu 27 23, etc.)

In Ex 27 13 16 the "gate" by which the congregation entered the tabernacle is carefully described. An embroidered screen of the 1. The three sacred colors (blue, purple and Tabernacle scarlet), 20 cubits in width, hung from 4 pillars (really 5 pillars, 6 cubits apart, on the reckoning see Tabernacle), in the center of the E. side of the tabernacle court. This is further alluded to in Nu 4 26, "the screen for the door of the gate of the court."
"gath of Nicanor" of the Mish (Mid., i.4), and "Corinthian Gate" of Jos (BJ, v, v.3), but authorities are divided as to whether this gate was situated at the entrance to the women's court on the E., or was the gate reached by 15 steps, dividing that court from the court of the men. The balance of recent opinion inclines strongly to the former view (cf. Kennedy, "Problems of Herod's Temple, 182). Others take the opposite view (Waterhouse, in Sacred Sites of the Gospels, 110), or leave the question open (thus G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II, 212). See Temple, Heron's. The gate itself was of unusual size and splendor. It received the name "Nicanor" from its being the working, or having been constructed at the expense, of an Alexandrian Jew of this name. Lately an ossuary was discovered on Mt. Olivet bearing the Gr inscription: "The bones of Nicanor the Alexandrian, who made the doors." Its other name, Corinthian, refers to the costly material of which it was constructed—Corinthian bronze. Jos gives many interesting particulars about this gate, which, he tells us, greatly excelled in workmanship and value all the others (BJ, v, v.3). These were plated with gold, or silver, and thickly set with gems. It was larger than the other gates; it was 50 cubits in height (the others 40); its weight was so great that it took 20 men to move it (BJ VI, vi.3). Its massiveness and magnificence, therefore, well earned for it the name "Beautiful."

GATE, VALLEY: In Neh 2 13 AV, "gates of the valley." See Jerusalem.

GATH, gath (גת, gath; LXX Γαθ, Ἄθ, "winepress"): One of the five chief cities of the Phils (Josh 13 3; 1 S 6 17). It was a walled town (2 Ch 26 6) and was not taken by Joshua, and, although many conflicts took place between these large cities and its people, it does not seem to have been captured until the time of David (1 Ch 18 1). It was rendered famous as the abode of the giant Goliath whom David slew (1 S 17 4), and other giants of the same race (2 S 21 18-22). It seems to have been destroyed after being taken by David, for we find Rehoboam restoring it (2 Ch 11 8), and Abijah his son (1 K 15 18). It was, however, by the Philistians. When we read that Uzziah took it and razed its walls (26 6), but it must have been restored again, for we find Hazael of Damascus capturing it (2 K 12 17). It seems to have been destroyed before the time of Amos (Am 6 2), and is not further mentioned in the OT or Mace, except in Mic 1 10, where it is referred to in the proverb, "Tell it not in Gath" (cf. 2 S 1 20). Since its destruction occurred, probably, in the middle of the 8th cent. BC, it is easy to understand why the site has been lost so that it can be fixed only conjecturally. Several sites have been suggested by different explorers and writers, such as: Tell es Sāh, Beil Jibrin, Khurbet Jedadiyeh, Khurbet Abu Geith, Jennatu and Yebna (see PEPS, 1871, 91; 1875, 42, 144, 194; 1880, 170-71, 211-23; 1886, 200-202). Tradition in the early centuries AD fixed it at 5 Rom miles N. of Eleutheropolis (Beil Jibrin, toward Lydda, which would indicate Tell es Sāh as the site, but the Crusaders thought it was at Jannma (Yebna), which richly erected the candle of Bethlehem, but the consensus of opinion in modern times fixes upon Tell es Sāh as the site, as is to be gathered from the references cited in PEPS above. The Bib. notices of G. would indicate a place in the Phili plain or the Shephelah, which was fortified, presumably in a strong position on the border of the Phili country toward the territory of Judah or Dan. Tell es Sāh fits into these conditions fairly well, but without other proof this is not decisive. It is described in SWP, II, 240 as a position of strength on a narrow ridge, with precipitous cliffs on the N. and W., connected with the hills by a narrow neck, so that it is thrust out like a bastion, a position easily fortified. In 1144 Fulke of Anjou writes that there was a castle called Blanchegarde (Alba Specula). The writer on "Gath and Its Worthiness" in PEPS, 1886, 200-204, connects the name Sāh with that of the giant Saph (2 S 21 18), regarding him as a native of Gath, but the most direct evidence from early tradition connecting Tell es Sāh with Gath is found in a MS said to be in the library of the Patriarchate of Jerusalem, which informs us that Catheroearum was situated on a mountain called Telesaphien or Teleaphy, which is clearly Tell es Sāh. Catheroearum must be the Lat for "camp of Gath" (PEPS, 1906, 303). H. Porren GATHER, gath'ar (גַּת, ἰδαφ, ἐπισυνάγω, Καταρχαὶ; κολάσια, κολάζω, κολασώ): "Gather," trans. "to bring together," "collect," etc; and intran. "to come together," "seem," etc. It occurs frequently and represents many Heb and Gr words. It is the tr of ἰδαφ, "to bring together," in Jos 6 9, AVM "gathering host"; Ps 27 10, AVM "The Lord will gather me"; of Nu 12 14-15; Isa 12 12 AVM. The phrases "gathering these unto the man," etc., occurs frequently and is used to the Divine "gathering" or restoration of Israel (Dt 30 3; Neh 1 9; Ps 106 47; Isa 43 5, etc; Ezek 20 34, etc; Hos 8 10; Mic 2 12; Zeph 3 19,20; Mic 10 8,10); figuratively, Isa 40 11, "He shall gather the lambs with [RV "in"] his arm" (cf Ps 27 10 AVM); sometimes it denotes bringing together for punishment or destruction (Mic 4 12), "He hath gathered them as the sheaves to the threshing-floor.

In the NT we have συνάγω, "to lay together," "to collect," (Mt 22 29:30:40; 41:43; may be "or bring together"); "to gather," "to collect" (25 26, "seek returns"); Jn 4 36, "fruit unto life eternal"); επισυνάγω, "to lead or bring together" (Mt 23 37, "even as a hen gathereth her chickens"); anephalaiomai, to sum up under one head; recapitulate (Eph 1 10). It is used in a general sense of "to gather together in one all things in Christ," RV "to sum up all things in Christ"; of 2 14; in Rom 13 9 the pass. is το εἰς briefy comprehended," RV "summed up.

"To gather," in the sense of "to infer," occurs in Acts 16 10 as the tr of συμβαίνειν, "to bring together" (here, in mind), "assuredly gathering," RV "concluding" (of 9 22, "proving").

Gatherer occurs in Am 7 14 as the tr of בָּלַע, from balas, "to cultivate figs or sycamores, a gatherer of sycamore fruits"; RV "a dresser of a sycamore-tree" ("a nipper of sycamore figs, i.e. helping to cultivate a sort of figs or mulberries produced by the real sycamore tree" [used only by the poorest], which requires nipping in the cultivation, perhaps an occupation of shepherds; Vulg. "vintager").

Gathering is the tr of επισυνάγω, "leading together unto" (2 Thess 2 1), "our gathering together unto him"; in 1 Cor 16 2 we have "gathering" (λόγια from λογία) in the sense of a collection of many, RV "collection," an AV in ver 1.

"Gather," etc. occurs frequently in Apoc., e.g. "will gather us all the nations" (Tit 3 10); "gather them together" (1 Macc 9 7; 10 8); "Gather together, our dispersion," etc. (seeActs 13 26:28; 14 23:27; "gathered to his fathers")

Among the changes in RV we have “hold firm” for “gather them together” for “Gath being one way or other” (Ezk 21:16 m. “Make thyself one”); for “gathering blackness” (Nah 2:10) to waxed pale; for “gathering together” (Job 11:10) “call unto judgment,” m “Heb call an assembly;” for “even as a himbeth gather her brood” (Lk 11:4) “gathers her own brood”; for “as the partridge sitteth on eggs and hatcheth them not,” ARV “that sitteth on eggs which hatcheth not its own young which he hath not brought forth,” text of ERV and AVM (Jer 17:11).

GATH-HEPHER, gath-hepher (גָּתְ-הַפֶּר, gath ha-hepher, “winepress of the pit”): A town on the boundary of Zebulun (Josh 19:13); AV in error, “Gittath-hepher,” the birthplace of the prophet Jonah (2 K 14:25). Jerome (Comm. on Jon) speaks of Gath as an inconceivable village, about 2 miles from Sepphoris on the Tiberias road, where the tomb of Jonah was shown. Benjamin of Tudela says that Jonah the son of Amittai the prophet was buried “in the mountain” near Sepphoris (Bohn, Early Travels in Pal., 88). These indications agree with the local tradition which identifies Gath-hepher with el-Meshed, a village with ancient ruins on a height N. of the road as one goes to Tiberias, about 2 miles from Nazareth, and half a mile from Kefr Kannah.

GATH-RIMMON, gath-rimmon (גָּתָּר-i'mmon, “winepress of Rimmon”):

(1) A city in the territory of Dan named with Bene-berak and Me-jarkon, in the plain not far from Joppa (Josh 19:45), assigned to the Kohathite Levites (21:24), reckoned to Ephraim in 1 Ch 6:89. It is mentioned it 2 Macc 16:18; is a minor town near the Jezreel Valley, on the way to Dipsysus. This, however, is too far to the S. More probably it is identical with the “Gath” which Omom places between Antipatris and Jamnia. It is not identified.

(2) A town in the territory of Manasseh, W. of Jordan, given to the Levites (Josh 21:25). There is nothing to indicate the position of the place, and there is much confusion in the writing of the name: LXX A, “Batthas”; B, “Jebatha.” In 1 Ch 6:70 it is replaced by “Bileam,” i.e. Bileam (q.v.).

GAULONITIS, gôl-on'î-tis. See Golan.

GAULS, gôl (Gālōn, Gaalat): Galatia in Asia Minor is literally the Gallia of the East; its inhabitants are called Galli by Rom writers, just as the inhabitants of ancient France are called Galatai by Gr writers. In some MSS of 2 Tim 4:10, 11, Gallian is read for 1s Galatian. The emigration of the Gauls from Europe and their settlement in the central region of the peninsula of Asia Minor are somewhat obscure subjects, but the ancient authorities leave no doubt of the main facts. In 1 Mac 6:21 it is difficult to say whether Judas Maccabeus is referring to the Gauls of Europe or the Gauls of Asia Minor. Both became finally subject to the Romans, and about the same time. It was in 191 BC that Gallia Cisalpina was reduced to the form of a Roman province, and in 189 BC occurred the defeat of Antiochus, king of Asia. Methathas (Jer 89:6) “scattereth gathering to the Gauls in the N. of Italy, from the circumstance that they are mentioned as being under tribute to the Romans, and also from their mention in connection with Spain. Not much, however, can be argued from this, as the names of the Gauls are used as synonyms of the Galatians, and the defeat of Antiochus is mentioned practically in the same connection.

In 2 Macc 8:20 the reference is without doubt to the Asiatic Gauls or Galatians, as they are more commonly called. In the Macedonian period they were restless and fond of war, and often hired themselves out as auxiliaries to the Asiatic kings.

Gaza, gâ'za (ג'זָּה, ’azzaḥ, “strong”); LXX Γάζα, Gáza; Arab. Gâza, Ghazza): One of the five chief towns of Philistia and probably the oldest, situated near the coast in lat. 31° 30′ and about 40 miles S. of Jaffa. It is on a hill rising 60 to 200 ft. above the plain, with sand dunes between it and the sea, which is about 21 miles distant. The plain around is fertile and wells abound, and, being on the border of the desert between Syria and Egypt and lying in the track of caravans and armies passing from one to the other, it was anciently a place of importance. The earliest notices of it are found in the records of Egypt. Thothmes III refers to it in the account of his expedition to Syria in 1485 BC, and it occurs again in the records of the expedition of Seti I in 1313 BC (Breasted, History of Egypt, 286, 409). It occurs also in the early catalogue of cities and tribes inhabiting Canaan in the earliest times (Gen 10:19). Josua reached it in his conquests but did not take it (Jos 10:41; 11:22). Judah captured it (Jgs 1:8) but did not hold it long, for we find it in the hands of the Philistines in the days of Samson, whose exploits have rendered it noteworthy (16:1-3.21.30). The hill to which he carried off the gate of the city was probably the one now called el-Muntar (“watch-tower”), which lies S.E. of the city and may be referred to in 2 K18:8, “from the tower of the watchmen to the fortified city.” G., with the other chief towns, sent a trespass offering to Jeh when the ark was returned (1 S 6:17). Hezekiah defeated and pursued the Philistines to G., but does not seem to have captured it. It was taken by Sargon in 720 BC, in his war with Egypt, since Khunun, the king of G., joined the Egyptians and was captured at the battle of Raphia (Rawlinson, Ancient Monarchies, II, 142). It was probably destroyed (see Am 1:7). It was certainly dismantled by Alexander the Great in 332, when it dared to resist him. It was then exceedingly strong, verifying its name, and was most bravely defended, so that it took Alexander two months to reduce it. He put to death all the men and sold the women and children as slaves (Grote, History of Greece, XI, 467 ff). It was restored, however, and we learn that Jonathan forced it to submit to him (Jos, Ant, XIII, v. 5; 1 Macc 11:62), and Alexander Januaceus took it and massacred the inhabitants who escaped the horrors of the sack. (Ant XIII, xiii, 3). Pompey restored the freedom of G. (ib, XIV, iv, 4), and Gabinius rebuilt it in 57 BC (ib, XIV, v. 3). G. is mentioned only once in the NT (Acts 8:26), in the account of Philip and the Ethiopian. In the 2d and 3d cents. A.D. it became a center of Gr commerce and culture, and pagan influence was strong, while the church founded there was struggling for existence. Many martyrs there testified to the faith, until finally, under Theodosius, Christianity gained the supremacy (HGH, 12th ed., 188). It fell into the hands of the Arabs in 634 AD, and became and has remained a Moslem city since the days of Saladin, who recovered it from the Crusaders in 1187, after the battle of Hattin. It is now a city of some 20,000 inhabitants, among whom are a few hundred Christians. See also AAZAH.

GAZARA, ga-zä'ra (Ταφία, Gazara, Ταφέα, Gazérä): A fortress of great strength in Judaea, which figured often in the Maccabean wars. To this place Judas pursued Gorgias (1 Mac. 4:15). It was fortified by the Gr general Bacchides (9:52; Ant. XIII, i, 3). It was captured by Simon Maccabaeus, who turned out the inhabitants and purified the city. He built here a palace for himself, and appointed his son John commander of his army (1 Mac 13:43 fl). A different account of this occurrence is given in 2 Mac. 10:32 ff, where the capture is attributed to Judas. The narrative here, however, is inspired by antagonism to Simon because he had assumed the high-priesthood.

The fortress is identical with Tell Jeser, the ancient Gezer (q.v.). It is interesting to note that recent excavations have uncovered the ruins of Simon's palace (PEFS, 1908, 265). W. Ewing GAZATHTITES, gē-zath'tis (גַּצות), uzāthāmim: The inhabitants of Gaza (q.v.) (Josh 13:3 AV), rendered "Gazites" (Jgs 16:2). GAZELLE, ga-zel' (גּזֵל, gēhā, and fem. גּזֶלֻת, gēluṯ; cf Taphē, Tabithā [Acts 9:36], and Arab. غزال, gazāl; cf Gazāl, Taphē). The word "gazelle" does not occur in AV, where ġēhā and ġēluṯ, in the 16 passages where they occur, are uniformly tr "roe" or "roe-buck." In RV the treatment is not uniform. We find "gazelle" without comment in Deut 12:15; 22:14; 16:22; 1 K 4:23. We find "roe," with marginal note "or gazelle," in Prov 6:5; Cant 2:7,9;17; 4:5; 8:14; 26:5; 35:17; 54:18; Jer 12:15; 49:21.

The gazelle is sometimes called gazāl or even wul', which is the proper name of the Pers wild goat.

The gazelle is an antelope belonging to the bovine family of the even-toed ruminants. There are more than twenty species of gazelle, all belonging to Asia and Africa. The species found in Syria and Pal is the Dorcas gazelle (Gazella dorcas). It is 2 ft high at the shoulders. Both sexes have unbranched, lyrate, ringed horns, which may be a foot long. The general coloration is tawny, but it is creamy white below and on the rump, and has a narrow white line from above the eye to the nostril. Several varieties have been distinguished, but they will not bear elevation to the rank of species, except perhaps G. meridii, a form of which a few specimens have been obtained from the Judaean hills, having distinctly different horns from those of the common gazelle. The gazelle is found singly or in small groups on the interior plains and the uplands, but not in the high mountains. It is a marvel of lightness and grace, and a herd, when alarmed, makes off with great rapidity over the roughest country (2 S 2:18; 1 Ch 12:8; Prov 6:5; Cant 8:14). The beauty of the eyes is proverbial. The skin is used for floor coverings, pouches or shoes, and the flesh is eaten, though not highly esteemed. See DEER; GOAT; ZOOLOGY.

GAZER, gā'zēr (גֶזֶר), gazër [in pause]. See Gezer.

GAZARA, ga-zä'ra (Ταφήα, Gazera; Ταφέα, Gazérä): (1) A fortress of Judaea (1 Mac 4:15; 7:45); in RV always Gazara (q.v.). (2) Head of a family of temple-servants who returned with Zerubbabel (1 Esd 31:3)—"Gazzam" in Eer 2:48 and Neh 7:61.

GAZEZ, gā'zez (גָּזֶז, gāzēz, "shearer"): (1) A son of Ephah, Caleb's concubine (1 Ch 2:46). (2) A second Gazze is mentioned in the same ver as a son of Haran, another son of Ephah.

GAZING-STOCK, gā'zing-stok: This obs. word occurs twice (1) in Nah 3:6, as the tr. of ךָאֶשׁ (kā'esh), "a sight" or "spectacle" (from ra'āsh, "to look," "see," also "to look down upon," "despise"); "I will . . . make thee vile, and will set thee as a gazzing-stock," as one set up to be gazed at, mocked and despised—a form of punishment in olden times; or "mocking-stock" (2 Mac 7:27). The use of this word is still in use. The Heb word occurs only here and in Gen 16:13; 1 S 16:12; Job 7:8; 33:21, in which place it does not have the same bad meaning; for a similar threatening of Isa 14:16; Jer 51:37. (2) In He 10:32, it is the tr. of theātrizō, "to bring upon the theater," "to be made a spectacle of," "made a gazzing stock both by reproaches and afflictions"; of 1 Cor 4:9, theātron ginomai, where St. Paul says the apostles were "made a spectacle unto the world." AV "Gr theātron." The reference in both instances is to the custom of exhibiting criminals, and esp. gladiators, men doomed to death, in the theaters. "In the morning men are exposed to lions and bears; at mid-day to their spectators, those that kill are exposed to one another; the victor is detained for another slaughter; the conclusion of the fight is death" (Seneca, Ep. vii, quoted by Dr. A. Clarke on 1 Cor 4:9). We are apt to forget what the first preachers and professors of Christianity had to endure.

GAZITES, gā'zīts: Inhabitants of Gaza, who were Philisc when the Israelites came into contact with them (Josh 13:3; Jgs 16:2), but there was an older stratum of population which occupied the place before the invasion of the Philis, probably of Amorite stock.

GAZZAM, gaz'am (גָּצָה), gazam, "devouring": Head of a family of Nethinim who returned from exile (Ezr 2 48; Neh 7 51; 1 Esd 6 31, "Gazaer").

Geba, ge'ba (גֶּבָּה), geboa, "hill":
(1) A town on the N.E. boundary of the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18 241), given to the Levites (Josh 21 17; 1 Ch 6 60). It stood on the northern frontier of the kingdom of Judah. Geba and Beersheba marking respectively the northern and southern limits (2 K 23 8). In 2 S 5 25 "Geba" should be altered to "Gibeon," which stands in the corresponding passage, 1 Ch 14 16. In Jgs 20 10.33; 1 S 13 3.16, the Heb reads "Geba," the tr "Gibeah" being due to confusion of the two names. From 1 S 14 5 we gather that Geba stood to the S. of the great gorge, Wady Suweinit, commanding the pass at Michmash. This was the scene of Jonathan's daring enterprise against the Philis, when, accompanied by his armor-bearer, he accomplished an apparently impossible feat, climbing the rocky steep of the gorge to the N. and putting the enemy to flight. There can be no doubt that the modern village of Jeba' occupies the ancient site. It stands to the S. of Wady Suweinit, looking toward Michmash—modern Muskomba—with Seneh, the crest on the southern lip of the gorges, in front of it. The distance from Jerusalem is about 6 miles. It was fortified by Asa with materials that his enemy Baasha had used to fortify Ramah against him (1 K 15 22). It is named by Isaiah in his description of the terrifying march of the Assyrians upon Jerusalem from the N. (10 28 ff.). It appears among the cities which were reoccupied by Israel after the Exile (Ezr 2 26, etc; Neh 11 31).

(2) (Pa'al, Gaibal): Between a fortress so named and Scythopolis (Beitin), Holon, one pitched his camp (Jth 3 10). On the high road that runs through Jenin, and down the Vale of Jezreel to Beisan, about 2 miles to the S. of Sanur, stands the village of Jебa', with which this fortress may be identified. W. Ewing

(1) An ancient Phoen city, situated on a bluff of the Lebanon, overlooking the Mediterranean. It was one of the principal seaports of Phoenicia, and had a small but good harbor for small ships. It lies in lat. 34°N, nearly, and about 4 miles N. of the river Adonis (Nahr Ibrāhīm). It was regarded as a holy city by the ancients. Philo mentions the tradition that it was founded by Kronos, and was sacred to the worship of Belsis and, later, of Adonis, whose rites were celebrated yearly at the river of the same name and at its source in the mountains, at Aphes (see TAMUR). G. was the center of quite an extensive district, extending from the Elucerus on the N. to the Tanysras on the S., a distance of 60 or 70 miles along the coast. It is mentioned by Josh (13 5) as the land of the Gebalites (q.v.), (AV "Giblites"). The Gebalites are also mentioned in 1 K 5 18 (Hch 32) as aiding in the construction of Solomon's temple. The "el- ders" and the "wise men of" G. are among the workmen employed on Tyrian ships (Ezk 27 9 ARVm). The mention of G. found in the Am Tab, which were composed in the first half of the 14th cent. BC. It had become, in connection with all Phoenicia, a dependency of Egypt in the days of Thothmes III and was under Egypt governors, but, in the reign of Amenhotep IV (Ikhнатon), the Hittites and Amorites from the N. and Khabiri from the S. attacked the territory of G., and its governor wrote letters to Amenhotep, calling for help. There are over 60 of these, describing the desperate condition of the city and of its governor, Ribaddi, who was expelled and took refuge in Beirdi, but afterward regained his capital (G.) to be besieged and lose all his dependencies, and finally to fall into the hands of the enemy. G. afterward became independent, as is shown by the records of Rameses IX (1442-1423 BC) and of Rameses XII, for its king paid the emi saries of the former 7 years in captivity, and treated a trusted agent of the latter with scant civility. Its king at this time was Zakkar-Baal, and kings of G. are mentioned in the Assyry records, one paying tribute to Ashur-nazir-pal (c 897 BC) and another to Sennacherib (705-680). The latter king was Uru-melek, and kings of G. are mentioned in connection with other Phoen cities under Pers rule. The city submitted to Alexander the Great without opposition, and furnished a fleet to aid him in the siege of Tyre (332). Strabo refers to it as a town of note in the days of Pompey (xvi.2.17), and it is frequently mentioned in Phoen (CIS,1) and Assyry inscriptions in the forms Gubal and Gubi (COT, I, 174).

(2) (geber, Gebala, Gebelitis, Gebalitis): A district S.E. of the Dead Sea, which is referred to in Ps 83 (Heb 82) in connection with Malcham, Uru-melek and others, as making a covenant together against Israel (of 1 Mac 5). Robinson (BR, II, 154) found the name Je'dah still applied to this region, and Joe (AvD, II, 1, 2) speaks of a Gebalitis as forming part of Idumaa. It is a hilly region, as the modern name signifies, and includes the towns of Shibuk and Tafsch. H. Porter

GEBALITES, ge-bal-it-s (גְּבָלִיתִים), go-gibhālim): Inhabitants of Gebal (q.v.). According to the present text of Josh 13 5, "the land of the Gebalites" was given to Israel as part of its future territory. But it was never occupied by the Israelites. LXX, however, has a very different reading, indicating an early corruption of the text. Perhaps with many modern scholars it is better to read "to the borders of the Gebalities." In 1 K 5 18 AV translates this word "stone-squarers," AVm gives "Giblites," and RV "Gebalites," as words who, with the Gebrites and of Hiram, fashioned the stones for the temple. Here also the text is doubtful, and some by a slight change would read: "and made a border for them" (i.e. for the stones). In Ezk 27 9 the men of Gebal are described as the "callers" of the ships of Tyre and Sidon.

(1) According to 1 K 4 13 AV the father of one of the 12 officers who provided food for Solomon and his household (but here RV "Ben-geber"). His district lay to the N.E. of Jordan.

(2) Another, and the last in the list of Solomon's commissariat officers (1 K 4 19). His district was also E. of the Jordan, but probably to the S. of that named in connection with the official of 19 (RV "Ben-geber"). According to the rendering of EV, he is said to have been "the only officer that was in the land." Unless the text, which presents some difficulties, is corrupt, as some suppose, it probably means that the man was assigned to one official because less able than the others to furnish the required supplies.

GEBIM, ge'him (גֶּבִים, gibhim, "trenches"): A place named only in Isa 10 31. Some would place it at Jebaa, identifying it with the Geba of Euebius, 5 Rom miles from Gophna (modern Jifneh), on the way to Shechem. Its place, however, in the order of names, after Asaph, seems to point to some position S. of that village, to the N.E. of Jerus.

GECKO, gek' (RV for "g'dhalyah, only in Lev 11:30; LXX ἀγαλα, magal, "shrew mouse" or "field mouse"; AV ferret): Probably a shrew or a field mouse. See FERRET; LIZARD; SPIDER.

GEDALLAH, ged-a-la'h (גדרל), g'dhalyah, except in 1 Ch 25:3.9 and Jer 38:1, where it is גדרל, g'dhalyahu, "Tahliu is great");

1. His Appointment who had been left in the land to be as Governmental messengers and husbandsmen (2 K 25:25-25; Jer 39:14; 40:5-16; 41:1-18).

2. His Conductor had been appointed governor in Judah, came with Ishmael, Jananu, and other officers at their head, to Wise Rule Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 K 25:23-24; Jer 40:7-10). The governor assured them that they need not have fear of vengeance from their conquerors, and promised them on oath protection and security, if they would remain and cultivate the land and become the peaceful subjects of the king of Babylon. This assurance led to a general gathering around Gedaliah of refugees from all the neighboring countries (Jer 40:11-12). For two months (some think longer) Gedaliah's beneficent and wise rule did much to consolidate affairs in Judah and to inspire the feeble remnant of his countrymen with hope and heart and hope.

But evil spirits were at work against him. Baalish, king of Ammon, had determined upon his life (Jer 40:13-16). The peaceful and popular rule which was being established the way of the accomplishment of Assassination any plan of conquest he entertained. Baalis found a ready instrument for his murderous design in Ishmael who, as one of royal birth and in the council of the king (41:1), his doublet jealously of the man who had been chosen governor in preference to himself. Gedaliah was informed by Johanan and the other captains of the plot to assassinate him, and Johanan at a private interview expressed to him a strong desire to go himself and slay Ishmael secretly, declaring that the safety of the Jews depended upon the life of the governor. But Gedalia refused to allow Johanan to anticipate his enemy, believing, in the generosity of his heart, that Ishmael was an act of treachery (41:1). He soon found, however, that his confidence had been badly misplaced. Ishmael, with ten of his companions, came on a visit to him to Mizpah, and after they had been hospitably entertained they fell upon their good host and murdered him, with all the Jews and the Chaldaean soldiers whom he had with him for order and protection (2 K 26:25; Jer 41:1-3). They then cast the bodies of their victims into the cistern which Asa had made (ver 9). Ishmael was pursued and overtaken by Johanan, but he succeeded in effecting his escape to the Ammonites (vs 11-15). Then Johanan and the other captains, afraid lest the Chaldaeans should avenge upon them the murder of the governor (vs 18-18), and against the earnest entreaties of Jeremiah (ch 43), fled to Egypt, taking the prophet and the Jewish remnant with them (43 5-7). In memory of the date of Gedaliah's assassination the Jews kept a fast (which is still retained in the Jewish calendar) on the 3d day of the 7th month, Tishri (Zec 7:5; 10:1).

The narratives reveal Gedaliah in a very attractive light, as one who possessed the confidence alike of his own people and their conquerors;

4. His Character whose kindly nature and generous disposition would not allow him to think evil of a brother; a man altogether worthy of the esteem in which he was held by succeeding generations of his fellow-countrymen.

(G'rhalyah): Son of Jeduthun, and instrumental leader of the 2d of the 24 choirs in the Levitical orchestra (1 Ch 25:3.9).

A priest of the "sons of Joshu," in the time of Ezra, who had married a foreign woman (Ezr 10:18). (4) (g'dhalyah): Son of Pashhur (who beat Jeremiah and put him in the stocks, Jer 20:1-6), and one of the chiefs of Jerus who, with the sanction of the king, Zedekiah, took Jeremiah and let him down with cords into a cistern where he sank in the mud (38:1-6).

(5) Grandfather of Zaphaniah the prophet, and grandson of Hezekiah, probably the king (Zeph 1:1).

GEDDUR, ged'ur (גדר), Geddor: Head of a family of temple-servants (1 Esd 5:30), corresponding to Gahar of Ezr 2:47 and Neh 7:49.

GEDEON, ged'e-on (He 11:32 AV). See Gideon.

Gedera, ged'ra (גדרה, ged'ra): A royal city of the Canaanites taken by Joshua along with Lachish, Ekron, Gezer, Debir and Hormah (Josh 12:13). It may be the town called 'Bedetha' in the list of N.E. of Judah, and the birthplace of Baal-hanath, who had charge of David's olives and sycomores (27:28), unidentified.

GEDERATH, ge-de'ra (גדרת, ged'ra): Inhabitant of Gedera, which see (1 Ch 27:28).

GEDEROTH, ge'der-roth (גדרות, ged'roth): A town in the Shephelah of Judah, named with Socoh, Azekah, Shaaraim and Adithaim (Josh 15:36). In 1 Ch 4:20 RV reads, "the inhabitants of Netaim and Gedera", for AV, "those that dwell among plants and hedges." It is probably represented by Khurbet Jadreth, about 3 miles S.W. of Gezer. "Gederathite", applied to Joab (12:4), probably meant an inhabitant of this place.

GEDERITE, ge-de'ri-te (גדרית, ged'ri-te): Inhabitant of Gedera, which see (1 Ch 27:28).
Gederothaim, ged-er-oth’-a-im (גדרותAIM, gederōthayim, “place of inclosures”): Stands as the 15th in a list which professes to give only the names of 14 cities in the Judæan Shephelah (Josh 15:36). AV’s suggests that we might read “or” for “and” after Gederah, but this is impossible. LXX reads, “and its cattle shelters.” Probably, however, the name has arisen by dittography from the preceding Gederah (q.v.).

Gedor, gĕ’dor (גדר, gadar; B, Tib’ĕp, Gedōr, A, Tib’ĕp, Gedor): (1) A town in the mountains of Judah, named with Halul and Beth-zur (Josh 15:58). It seems to be referred to by Eusebius as Gadeira (Onom, s.v.), which he identifies with Gadorah (Jerome calls it Gadora), a village in the borders of Jerus, near the terebinth. It is probably represented today by Krähelet Jadur, about 7 miles N. of Hebron (PFH, III, 313, Sh XXI). (2) Among the Benjamites who joined David at Ziklag were the sons of Jerahmeh of Gedor (1 Chr 12:7). No trace of this name is found in the territory of Benjamin. It may be identical with (1). (3) The Simeonites are said to have gone to the entering in of Gedor in search of pasture for their flocks. They snorted and expelled the Meumim, “and dwelt in their stead” (1 Chr 4:39 fn). Here LXX reads Gerar, and this is probably correct. (4) A family in Judah (1 Chr 4:4). (5) An ancestor of Saul (1 Chr 8:31).

GE-HARASHIM, gē-hār’-āshīm (גֵּהֶרֶשֶים, gē’ harāšīm): In 1 Chr 4:14, AV renders “valley of Harashaim.” In Neh 11:35, EV renders “valley of craftsmen”; here it is named with Lod and Ono. Something of the name perhaps survives in Kâhrēt Hirsa, E. of Lydda.

GEhazi, gĕ-hā’-zi (גֶּחֶזַי, gêhāzêt, except in 2 K 4:31; 6:25; 8:4,5, where it is גֶּזַּי, gēzāy, perhaps “valley of vision”): The confidential servant of Elisha. Various words are used to denote his relation to his master. He is generally called Elisha’s “boy” (מַע, ma’ar), servant or personal attendant; he calls himself (6:25) his master’s servant or slave (מְנִיצָה, mēnīzāh), and if the reference be to him in 43 RVn, he receives the designation “minister” (רַב, rab, of chief of Elisha’s household).

Mention is made of him on three different occasions. He is first brought under notice in the story of the wealthy Shunammite (2 K 4:8–37) who provided in her house special accommodation for Elisha, service which suited his simple tastes, and of which he availed himself as often as he passed that way. By command of his master, Gehazi called the Shunammite, that she might be reminded by the display of her liberality in food and clothing to repent of her iniquity. When on the death of her child the Shunammite sought out the man of God at Carmel, and in the intensity of her grief laid hold of the prophet’s feet, “Gehazi came near to thrust her away” (ver 27)—perhaps so much from want of sympathy with the woman as from a desire to protect his master from what he considered a rude importunity. Then Elisha, who had discovered of himself (ver 27), from what the woman had said (ver 28), the cause of her sorrow, directed Gehazi, as a preliminary measure, to go at once to Shunem and lay his staff upon the face of the dead child. Gehazi did so, but the child was “not awaked.”

In this narrative Gehazi appears in a favorable light, as a willing, efficient servant, jealous of his master’s honor; a man of quick observation, whose advice was worth asking in practical affairs. Gehazi, however, reveals himself in a different character in connection with the healing of Naaman (2 K 5:20–27). As soon as the Syri an general had taken his departure

2. His Grievous with his retinue from the house of Sin Elisha, the covetous spirit of Gehazi, which had been awakened by the sight of the costly presents the prophet had refused, was no longer able to restrain itself. Running after Naaman, Gehazi begged in the prophet’s name a talent of silver ($400 = $2,000) and two changes of raiment. It is contrasted with Elisha’s charity (2 K 5:11), and running after Naaman, Gehazi was not satisfied with the present himself, but urged Gehazi to take two talents and sent two servants with him to carry the money and the garb. When they came to the hill in the neighborhood of the prophet’s house, Gehazi dismissed the men and concealed the money. Thereafter, with a bold front, as if he had been attending to his ordinary duties, he appeared before his master who at once inquired, “Whence, Gehazi?” (Heb). On receiving the ready answer that he had not been anywhere, Elisha, who felt sure that the suspicion he entertained regarding his beloved servant, his very “heart” (ver 26), was well grounded, sternly rebuked him for the dishonor he had brought upon God’s cause, and called down upon him and his family forever the lasthome curse of the Lord, whose treasures he had obtained by his shameful lie. “And he went out from his presence a leper as white as snow.”

By this narrative confidence in Gehazi is somewhat unexpectedly and rudely shaken. The active, zealous servant stands confessed a liar and a thief. Gehazi’s sin branch out in different directions. By his falsehood he deceived Naaman and misrepresented Elisha; he not only told a lie, but told a lie about another man, and that man his master and disreputed Elisha. Gehazi’s soul and his spirit in the Lord’s sanctuary. To the chieftains of his order, Gehazi’s sin is but one more chapter in the history of His grace, a striking proof of the wondrous, “the love of money (which is a root of all kinds of evil” (1 Tim 6:10).

Once more Gehazi is mentioned (2 K 8:1–6) as having been summoned, leper though he was, by King Jehoram to give him an account of all the great things Elisha had done. Probable And when he came to the story of the Repentance restoration of the Shunammite’s child to life, the woman herself appeared before the king along with her husband. She was reinstated in her house and land of which she had been dispossessed during her seven years’ absence from her native country in a time of famine. Gehazi testified to the identity of both mother and son, with the result the king once more ordered the restoration not only of all her former possessions, but also of all the profits her land had yielded during her sojourn in Philistia.

The appearance and conduct of Gehazi on this occasion gives some ground for the hope that he had repented of his sin and could with the help of the woman as a desire to stuff the truth; and the pleasure he seemed to take in reiterating the wonderful deeds of a master who, though kind and indulgent to a stranger, was hard upon him, may even warrant the belief that in his earlier days there was some good thing in him toward his master’s God. If also, as has been indicated above, the word used in 4 43 (məšārēth) applies to him—the same as is applied to Elisha (1 K 19 21)—we may be the more readily inclined to see in the history of Gehazi how one besetting sin made of him a place of falling from taking his natural place in the succession of God’s prophets. Let us, however, hope, that though Gehazi became a “lost leader,” “just for a handful of silver,” he was yet saved by a true repentance from becoming a lost soul.

GEHENNA, gē-hēn’a (גֶּהֶנֶּנָ֑א, gē-heänna [see Grimm-Thayer, s.v.]). Gehenna is a transliteration from the Aram. form of the Heb gē-hinnōm, “valley of Hinnom.” This latter form, however, is rare in the OT, the prevailing name being “the valley of the son of Hinnom.” LXX usually translates, where it transliterates the form is different from Gehenna and varies. In the NT the correct form is Γηννα with the accent on the penult, not Γηννα. There is no reason to assume that Hinnom is other than a plain patronymic, although it has been proposed to find in it the corruption of the name of an idol (EB, II, 2071). In the NT (ARVm) Gehenna occurs in Mt 5 22;29.30; 10 10; 18 9; 23 15;33; Mk 9 44;45.47; Lk 12 5; Jas 3 6. In all of these it designates the place of eternal punishment of the wicked, generally in connection with the final judgment. It is associated with fire as the source of torment. Both body and soul are cast into it. This is not to be explained on the principle that the NT speaks metaphorically of the state after death in terms of the body; it presupposes the resurrection. In AV and RV Gehenna is rendered by “hell” (see Eschatology of the NT). That “the valley of Hinnom” became the technical designation for the place of final punishment is due to two causes. In the first place the valley had been the seat of the idolatrous worship of Moledeth, to whom children were immolated by fire (2 Ch 28 3; 33 6). Secondly, on account of these practices the place was defiled by King Josiah (2 K 23 10), and became in consequence associated in prophecy with the judgment to be visited upon the people (Jer 7 32). The fact, also, that the city’s offal was collected there may have helped to render the name apparently extreme and derogatory. To graphically the identification of the valley of Hinnom is still uncertain. It has been in turn identified with the depression on the western and southern side of Jerus., with the middle valley, and with the valley to the E. Cf EB, II, 2071; DCG, I, 586; RP, VI.

GERRHARDUS VOS

GELLOTH, gē-lōth (גֶּלֹ֥ת, gē-lōṯō): This word is used for “districts” or “circuits,” perhaps indicating the different parts subject to the several lords of the Philis (Josh 13 2, AV “borders,” RV “regions”); for the quarter of the Jordan valley where the eastern tribes built the altar of Ed (23 10 f.; AV “border of,” RV “region about,” Jordan); and apparently for the whole of Philistia (Jeo 13 5 AV “coast of Pa‘al,” RV “regions of Philistia”). But in Josh 18 17, it is clearly used as a place-name. Gelloth lay on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin which passed En-shemesh (probably ‘Ain el-Hadid, about 2 miles E. of Jerus.), “and went out to Gelloth, which is over against the ascent of Adummim.” From this point it “went down” toward the plain. The place cannot therefore be identified with Gilgal in the Jordan valley. Some point on the road leading from Jericho to Pal‘al el-Dumm, about 6 miles from Jerus., was probably intended, but no identification is possible.

GEM, gem (Prov 26 8, ERV “a bag of gems”). See Stones, Precious.

GEMALLI, gē-mali’ (גֵּמָלִי, gēmālī, “camel owner”). Father of the spy Ammiel from the tribe of Dan (Nu 1 32), who was one of those sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan.

GEMARA, ge-mā’rā. See Talmud.

GEMARIAN, gem-a-rī’a (גֶּמָרִיא, gēmarı‘ā, ge-maräh, “Jeh hath accomplished”):
1. (Son of Shaphan the scribe, one of the princes, from whose chamber Baruch read Jeremiah’s prophecies to the people. He, with others, sought to stay Jehoiakim from burning the roll (Jer 36 10. 11.12.25).
2. (Son of Hilkiah, one of Zedekiah’s ambassadors to Babylon, by whom Jeremiah sent his letter to the captives (Jer 29 3).

GEMATRIA, gē-mā’tri-a. See Numbers; Games.

GENDER, jen’dér (גֶּדֶר, yādāh, הָֽדָּר, ‘āḥār; yevdē, gēndō; “Gender” is an abbreviation for “gendered”). In Job 38 29 yādāh (common for “to bear,” “to bring forth”) is translated (after Wieliff, RV “The hoary frost of heaven, who hath gendered it?” in “given it birth.” In 21 10 we have ‘āḥār (either the Piłām of ‘āḥār, “to pass over,” etc., or as separate word meaning “to bear,” “to be fruitful”), tr’gəneth, “their bull gendereth, and faileth not,” in Lev 19 19, rāḇhā’, “to lie down with,” is used of cattle gendering. In Gal 4 24 AV we have “Mount Sinai, which gendereth (gwādāh, “to bring forth” to bondage, RV “bearing children unto bondage” (like Hagar, Abraham’s bondwoman), and in 2 Tim 2 23, which “gender strides,” i.e. beget them. LITERATURE

The OT tr* (once, Neh 7 5) the noun סֵרֶא (sērē, sērē ha-yahān, “book of the genealogy”; also tr* a denomination vb. in Hithpael, סֹרֶא (sōrē, “sprout,” “growth” (of family “tree”); סֵרֶא (sērē, hityābēs, “genealogy”); the idea is conveyed in other phrases, as פַּלּוּ וַתַּלְיָה (pālū wa’talīyāh, “book of the generations,” or simply יָדוֹ (yādō, ’āḏāh, “generations.” In the NT it transliterates γενεαλογία, genealogia, “account of descent,” 1 Tim 1 4; Tit 3 9. In Mt 1 1, βίβλος γενεαλογίας, “book of the generation” of Jesus Christ, is rendered in ARVm “the genealogy of Jesus Christ”; a family register, or register of families, as 1 Ch 4 33, etc., the tracing backward or forward of the line of ancestry of individual, family, tribe, or nation; pedigree. In Tim and Tit it refers probably to the gnostic (or similar) lists of successive emanations from Deity in the development of created existence.

According to the OT, the genealogical interest dates back to the beginnings of sacred history. It appears in the early genealogical tables 2. Biblical of Gen 5, 10, 46, etc; in Ex 6 14–27.

References where the sons of Reuben, Simeon and Levi, etc., are given; in Nu 1 26–51, where the poll of fighting men is made on genealogical principles; in Nu 2 2, where the positions on the march and in camp are determined by tribes and families; in David’s division of priests and Levites into courses and companies (1 Ch 6:9); is referred to in the account of Jeroboam's reign (2 Ch 12:15m, "the words of Iddo, after the manner of genealogies"); is made prominent in Hezekiah's reforms when he reckoned the whole nation by genealogies (2 Ch 31:18; 2 Esdr 2:14); is seen in Josiah's reign when the Reubenites and Gadites are reckoned genealogically (1 Ch 5:17). Zerubbabel took a census, and settled the returning exiles according to their genealogies (1 Ch 3:19-24; 1 Ch 9:17-22; Neh 11:1-22). With the rigid exclusion of all foreign intermixtures by the leaders of the Restoration (Ezr 10; Neh 10:30; 13:23-31), the genealogical interest naturally deepened until it reached its climax, perhaps in the time of Christ and up to the destruction of Jerusalem. Josephus, in the opening of his Life, states that his own pedigree was registered in the public records. Many families in Christ's time clearly possessed such lists (Lk 1:5, etc). The affirmed, reiterated and unquestioned Davidic descent of Christ in the NT, with His explicit genealogies (Mt 1:1-17; Lk 3:23-38); Paul's statement of his own descent; Barnabas' Levitical descent, are cases in point. Davididæae, descendants of David, are found as late as the Rom period, but tradition preserves Macalister's view that he destroyed the genealogical lists at Jerusalem to strengthen his own seat, but more probably they persisted until the destruction of Jerusalem.

Genealogical accuracy, always of interest both to primitive and more highly civilized peoples, was made esp. important by the facts that:

3. Importance of the land was promised to the descendents of Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, that Genealogies the priesthood was exclusively hereditarian; and that the royal succession of Judah lay in the Davidic house, that the division and occupation of the land was according to tribes, families and fathers' houses; and for the Davididæae, at least, that the Messiah was to be of the house of David. The exile and return, which fixed indelibly in the Jewish mind the ideas of monotheism, and of the selection and sacred mission of Israel, also fixed and deepened the genealogical idea, prominently so in the various assignments by fanatical interest at the time of the return. This, those who could not prove their genealogies.

4. Direct historical value of the Scripture genealogies is variously estimated. The critically received chronological data in the late (priestly) strata of the early Historical books, and dates Ch-Ezr-Neh (our Value fullest sources) about 300 BC, holding it to be a priestly reconstruction of the national history wrought with great freedom by the "Chronicler." Upon this hypothesis the chief value of the genealogies is as a mirror of the mind and ideas of their authors or recorders, a treasury of reflections on the geographical, ethnological and genealogical status as believed in at their time, and a study of the effect of naive and exaggerative patriotism dealing with their personal history, their conquest, life, or else, as the extreme instance, a highly interesting example of bold and inventive juggling with facts by men with a theory, in this particular case a priestly one, as with the "Chronicler." To the more conservative among who accept the MT as its face value, the genealogies are a rich mine of histoirical, personal and ethnographic, as well as religious, information, whose working, however, is much hindered by the inevitable corruption of the text, and by our lack of correlative explanatory information. Much interesting illustrative matter may be looked for from such archaeological explorations as those at Gezer and elsewhere under the Pal Exploration Society, the names on the pottery throwing light on the name-lists in Ch, and the similar discoveries on the supposed site of Ahab's palace in Samaria, which also illustrate the conflict between Baal and Jehovah worship by the proportion of the names compounded by Baal or "Jeh" (PEF, 1905, 243, 328; Harvard Theological Review, 1911). In spite of all such illustrative data, however, the genealogies must necessarily continue to present many insoluble problems. A great deal is desideratum in a careful and systematic study of the whole question by some modern conservative scholar endowed with the patience and insight of the late Lord A. C. Hervey, and equipped with the fruits of the latest discoveries. While much curious and suggestive information may be derived from an intensive study of the names and relationships in the genealogies (although here the student needs to watch his theories), their greatest present value lies in the picture they present of the large-hearted cosmopolitanism, or international brotherliness, in the older ones, notably Gen 10, recognizing so clearly that God hath made of one all nations to dwell on the earth; and, as they progress, in the successive selection and narrowing as their lines converge upon the ways of those who could not prove their genealogies.

5. Principles of interpretation connectional suggestion as to their real form. Divergences in different versions, or in different stages, of the same genealogy are therefore to be looked for, with many tangibles to hard to unravel, and it is precisely at this point that analytic and constructive criticism needs to proceed most modestly and restrain any possible tendency unduly to theorize.

(1) Lists of names necessarily suffer more in transmission than other narratives, notably in Egypt, Gr, and Arab., but also including Romans, Kelts, Saxons, the earliest history naturally being drawn upon genealogical as well as on annalistic lines. A modern tendency to overestimate the likeness and underestimate the unlikeness of the Scripture to its undoubtedly cognate literatures finds in the voluminous artificial genealogical material, which grew up in Arabia after the time of the caliph Omar, an almost exact analogue to the genealogical interest at the time of the return. This, however, is on the assumption of the late date of most of the genealogical material in the older NT books, and rests in turn on the assumption that the progress of religious thought and life in Israel was essentially the same as in all other countries; an evolutionary development, practically, if not theoretically, purely naturalistic in its genesis and progress.

The direct historical value of the Scripture genealogies is variously estimated. The critically received chronological data in the late (priestly) strata of the early Historical books, and dates Ch-Ezr-Neh (our Value fullest sources) about 300 BC, holding it to be a priestly reconstruction of the national history wrought with great freedom by the "Chronicler." Upon this hypothesis the chief...
probable, and is entitled to a certain presumption of correctness. Furthermore, it is extremely difficult to establish a stopping-point for the application of the eponymous theory; under its spell the sons of Jacob disappear, and Jacob, Isaac and even Abraham become questionable. (4) The present quite popular similar assumption that personal details in the genealogy stand for details of tribal history, as, for instance, the taking of a concubine means rather an alliance with, or absorption of, an inferior tribe or clan, is fascinating and far-reaching generalization, but it sticks closely upon the facts. The theory would make of the Scripture an allegorical enigma in which historical personages and events, personified peoples or countries, and imaginary ancestors are mingled in inextricable confusion. (5) Scriptural genealogies are often given a regular number of generations by omitting various intermediate steps. The genealogies of Jesus, for instance, cover 42 generations, in 3 subdivisions of 14 each. Other instances are found in the OT, where the regularity or symmetry is clearly intentional. Indeed Jacob’s 70 descendants, and the 70 nations of Gen 10. This has in modern eyes an artificial look, but by no means necessarily involves violence done to the facts under the genealogists’ purview, and is readily and credibly founded on their conceptions and purposes. The theory that in some cases the requisite number has been built up by the insertion of imaginary names (vide Curtis, ICC, “Chronicles,” 135) has another aspect, and does not seem necessary to account for the facts, or to have sufficient facts to sustain it. See 21 5, (6) below. It involves a view of the mental and moral equipment and point of view of the Chronicler in particular, which would not seem to leave him many shreds of the information of or “real” genealogy, and which sounder criticism will surely very materially modify. (6) Much perplexity and confusion is avoided by remembering that other modes of entrance into the family, clan, tribe or nation obtained than by that by birth: capture, adoption, the substitution of one clan for another just become extinct, marriage. Hence “son of,” “father of,” “begat,” have broader technical meanings, indicating adoptive or official connection or descent, as well as actual conception, bezoar, or removal, including “grandson,” “great-grandson,” etc. Instance Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, of the tribe of Judah, styled (1 Ch 2 18) a descendant of Hezron and son of Hur, but also, in token of his original descent, called (1 Ch 4 14) the son of Perez, and Caleb also mentioned “grandson,” “great-grandson,” etc. Similarly, where in an earlier genealogy a clan or individual is assigned to a certain tribe, and in a later to another, it has been “grafted in.” But while these methods of accretion clearly obtained, the nations freely absorbing neighboring or surrounding peoples, families, or persons, families likewise absorbing individuals, as in American Indian, and many other tribes; yet, as in them, the descent and connection by birth constituted the main line, and in that given credit has the preponderant unless clear facts to the contrary exist. (7) The repetition of the same name in the same genealogy, as in that of the high priests (1 Ch 6 1-15), raises “suspicion” in some minds, but necessarily. It is very natural, and not uncommon, to find grandparents and grandsons, e.g. among the Hebrews, receiving the same name (Lk 1 59). This would be esp. to be expected in a hereditary caste or office like the priesthood. (8) The existence of the same name in different genealogies is not uncommon, and need not cause confusion. (9) The omission of one or many links in the succession, often clearly caused by the desire for symmetry, is frequent where the cause is unknown, the writers being careful only to indicate the connection more or less generally, without feeling bound to follow every step. Tribes were divided into families, and families into fathers’ houses, and families and fathers’ house regularly constituting links in a formal genealogy, while between them and the person to be identified any or all links may be omitted. In similar fashion, there is an absence of any care to keep the successive generations absolutely distinct in a formal fashion, son and grandson being designated as alike “son” of the same ancestor. Gen 46 21, for instance, contains grandchildren as well as sons of Benjamin, Bela, Beecher, Ashbel, Gera, Naamah, Epher, etc. This would make the son as well as the father became founder of a house. Some confusion is occasionally caused by the lack of rigid attention to precise terminology, a characteristic of the Heb mind. Strictly the tribe, בָּנָי, בָּנָיִם, בָּנָיָּהוּ or בָּנִי (in contrast, בָּנוּי, בָּנוּיִים, בָּנוּיָּהוּ or בָּנוּי), "family," and then the “house” or “fathers’ house,” בָּנוֹי, בָּנוֹיִים, בָּנוֹיָּהוּ or בָּנוּי, but sometimes a "fathers’ house" is a tribe (Nu 17 6), or a clan (1 Ch 24 6). In this connection it is to be remembered again that sequence of generations often has to do with families rather than tribes, and that accessions to the succession to the inheritance or headship, rather than the actual relationship of father and son. (10) Genealogies are of two forms, the descending, as Gen 10: "The sons of Japheth: Gomer, etc; The sons of Gomer: Ashkenaz," etc; and the ascending, Exr 7 1 ff: "Ezer, the son of Serah, the son of Azariah, the son of Hilkiah," etc. The descending are the usual. (11) Feminine names are occasionally found, where there is anything remarkable about them, as Rebekah (Gen 11 29), Rebekah (22 23), etc; or where any right or property is transmitted through them, as the daughters of Zelophehad, who claimed and were accorded “a possession among the brethren of [their] father” (Nu 27 3 27 11-11), etc. In such cases as Azubah and Ephrath, successive wives of Caleb (1 Ch 2 18-20), many modern critics find tribal history enshrined in this case, “Caleb’s” or “dog’ tribe having removed from Azubah, “deserted” to Ephrathah, Bethleem, in Num 13 17, etc. This, however, cannot and cannot be, carried out consistently. (12) The state of the text is such, esp. in Ch, that it is not easy, or rather not possible, to construct a complete genealogical table after the modern form. Names are inserted and words have been removed, and names have been changed, so that the connection is often difficult and sometimes impossible to trace. The different genealogies also represent different stages in the history and, at many places, cannot with any knowledge now at our command be completely adjusted to each other, just as geographical notices at different periods must necessarily be inconsistent. (13) In the present state of our knowledge, and of the text, and also considering the large and vague chronological methods of the Hebrews, the genealogies can only give us comparatively little chronological assistance. The uncertainty as to the actual length of a generation, and the custom of frequently omitting links in the descent, increases the difficulty; so that unless they possess special marks of correctness, or have outstanding historical relationships which determine or corroborate them, or several parallel genealogies confirm each other, they must be used with great caution. Their interest is historical, biographical, ascensional or hereditary, rather than chronological.

The principal genealogical material of the OT is found in Gen 5, 10, 11, 12, 22, 25, 29, 30, 35, 36, 46; Ex 6; Nu 1, 2, 7, 10, 13, 26, 34; scattered notices in Josh, Ruth, 1 ch; 5 5, 6, 23; 1 K 4;
The Generations of the Sons of Noah, "The Table of Nations" (assigned to P, vs. 1-7; J, vs. 8-19; P, ver. 20; J, ver. 21; P, ver. 22; J, vs. 23-30; Gen. 10:25-31). Found in abridged form in 1 Ch 1 5-24.

   1. Gomer = Askenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah (1 Ch 1 6, Dip.
   2. Tubal = the Philistines.
   2. Javan = Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, Dodanim (Rodanim, 1 Ch 1 7, is probably correct, a "j, d, having been substituted by a copyist for "h")

2. Ham, Cush, Mizraim, Put, Canaan.
   4. Raamah (s. Cush) = Sheba, Dedan.
   5. Elam = Asshur, Arphachathai, Aram.
   1. Aram = Uz, Hul, Guthe, Mash (Ch Meshech).

Nearly all these names are of peoples, cities or districts. That Noah, Shem, Ham, Japheth, Nahor, Terah, Abraham, Nahum, and probably Reu, represent actual persons the general tenor of the narrative and the general outlines of the genealogies can be identified even if it is clear that although many critics consider these as also purely eponymous, the others can mostly be more or less clearly identified ethnographically or geographically. This table represents the nations known to the writer, and in general, although not in all particulars, expresses the ethnographical relationships as far as they are now known to modern research. It follows a partly ethnological, partly geographical scheme, the descendants of Japheth in general representing the Aryan stock settled in Asia Minor, Media, Armenia, Greece, and the islands of the Mediterranean: those of Ham representing the Hamitic races in Ethiopia, Egypt, in Southwestern Arabia, and probably in the wider parts of Africa. The names of the later Babylonians and Assyrians were clearly Sem in language, but represent a racial characterevolution, which writers hold that in making "Nimrod" the son of "Cush," the writer was confused "Cush" is not a son of Ham, with another "Cush," the Cassel, living near Elam, since the later Babylonians and Assyrians were clearly Sem in languages and manners, and the Sumerian as the Semitic form of the Sumerian names is accordant with early traditions of a Hamitic origin for the Sumerian country (Oannes the fishgod coming out of the Red Sea, etc), and perhaps with the fact that the earliest language of Babylon was non-Semitic. The sons of Canaan represent the nations and peoples found by the Hebrews in the Near East, the Phoenicians and the Canaanites. Heth is the great Hittite nation, by language and racial type strikingly non-Semitic. Among the sons of Shem, Eber is by many considered a pious name or imaginary, but the hypothesis is not necessary. Most Assyrologists deny the connection of Eshnunna with Shem, the later Elamites being non-Semitic, etc. The writers, however, show that the earlier inhabitants up to 2300 B.C. were Sem. Let the reader consider the last set, where Asshur is called "the brother of Enlil," whose mythical origin resembles the Sem. Asia Minor presents a mixture of races as manifold as does Fa. The sons of Joktan are tribes in Western and Southern Arabia. Judah is given as often as both of a son of Cush, Hamite, and of Joktan, Semitic, perhaps because the district was occupied by a mixed race. It would seem, however, that "begat" or "son of" often represents geographical as well as ethnological divisions. And where the classification of the writer does not accord with the present deliverances of archaeology, it must be remembered that the in- dolence of the writer has not enabled us to compare the in- stances conclusions drawn from ethnology, philology and archaeology, considering the present incomplete state of these sciences: the kohlenreich's families of races, dynasties and tongues through long periods, and our scanty information from the Xth to the XXth. The few many sources of error that dogmatism is procacious. But an interest conse- quently to a much larger amount of international knowledge than was, until recently, with Xth century, the Second World War, the Bab Noah. An original primitive tradition, from which both lists are derived, the Heb being the nearer, is not Impossible. Both the "Cainite" list in Gen 4 and this "Sehetite" list end with three brothers.

6. The Generations of Adam, genealogies bring the record down from Creation to the Death of Noah. The only NT material. The OT and NT genealogies bring the record down from Creation to the Death of Christ. After tracing the descent from Adam to Jacob, incidentally (Gen 10) giving the pedigree of the various nations within their purview, the Heb genealogists give the pedigree of the twelve tribes. As was to be expected, those tribes, which in the developing history assumed greater prominence, received the chief attention. Dan is carried down but 1 generation, and credited with but 1 descendant; Zebulun 1 generation, 3 sons; Naphtali 1 generation, 4 sons; Issachar 4 generations, 15 descendants; Manasseh 4 generations, 39 descendants; Asher 7 generations, 40 descendants; Reuben 8 (7) generations, 22 descendants; Gad 10 generations, 25 descendants; Ephraim 14 (7) generations, 25 descendants. Levi, perhaps first as the priestly tribe, Judah next as the royal, Benjamin as most closely associated with the others, and all three as the survivors of the exile (although representatives of other tribes shared in the return) are treated with the greatest impressiveness.

Ch furnishes us the largest amount of genealogical information, where coincident with the older genealogies, clearly deriving its data from them. Their extra-canonical sources are a matter of considerable difference among critics, many holding that the books cited by the Chronicler as his sources ("The Book of the Kings of Israel and Judah," "The Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel," "The History of Samuel the Seer," "The History of Nathan the Prophet," etc. to the number of perhaps 10) are canonical books, with the addition of a "Midrashic History of Israel," from which he quotes the most freely. But the citations are made with such fulness, vividness, and particularity of reference, that it is hard to believe that he did not have before him extensive extra-canonical documents. This is the impression he clearly seeks to convey. Torrey (AJSL, XXV, 185) considers that he cites this array of authority purely out of his body, for impressiveness' sake, a theory which Torrey, and Schoyen, regard historically without value whatever. It is extremely likely that he had before him also oral and written sources that he has not cited, records, private or public lists, pedigrees, etc, freely using them for his later lists and descents. For the possible sources and pedigrees, the writer seeks to convey that he has also furnished us much material. In this art no attempt is made at an exhaustive treatment, the aim being rather by a number of characteristic examples to give an idea of the quality, methods and problems of the Bible genealogies.

In the early genealogies the particular strata to which each has been assigned by reconstructive critics is here indicated by J, P, etc. The signs "w" or "v" following individual names indicate sonship.

Seven generations to Jabal, Tubal, and Tubal-cain,

(2) Gen 4 25-36. The Sethites (as- signed to J).

6. The Generations of Adam, genealogies bring the record down from Noah, and gives the chronology to the Flood. The numbers in the Heb MT. the theory that the Bible was written by recording certain events that 1,656 years, Sam 1,307 years, and LXX 2,242 years. Some scholars hold this list to be framed upon that of the ten answered to in Genesis 1-4, but the authoral world beyond the Noah, the conventional tradition, from which both lists are derived, the Heb being the nearer, assumption of the Mosaic authorship, that broad, statesmanlike mind, learned in all the knowledge of the Egyptians and, clearly, profoundly influenced by Bab law and lit., may be credited with considerable breadth of vision and breadth of purpose. Aside from the question of inspiration, this Table of Nations, the breadth of scope, for inclusiveness (though not touching peoples and tongues, the limits of the writer), the genius broad-mindedness, is one of the most remarkable documents in any literature.

From Shem to Abraham. The list is also chronologically continuous, if indistinct. Shem, eldest of the three sons of Noah, 1650 years, from Noah to Abraham, Sam Heb, 940, and LXX 1 070. LXX Inserta Cainan, 180 years, otherwise agreeing with Sam. Abraham. Abraham may be rendered “the territory of Chedesh,” i.e. of the Chedahlin, Chaldaea. Abraham, his descendant, coming from Ur-Chasdim.

Uz, Buz, Kemuel, etc. These descendants of Abraham’s brother Haran represent Aramean tribes chiefly E. or N. of Canaan. Aram may be the ancestor of the Syrians of Damascus. Uz and Buz probably belong to Aramean tradition; they are familiar with the northern tribes Dedan and Teman. Chesed in this list probably refers to the Medes of Khuzistan, but for related tribe of Northern Syria. In Gen 10 23 (assigned to P) Uz is the son of Aram, and in 10 22 Aram is a son of Shem. Shur and Dedan, therefore, is this either a contradiction, or the later statements represent other tribes. In Gen 25 15 is the Qumran subversion, probably other individuals or tribes are indicated. Ch does not have this list, it being a side stream.

(7) Gen 16 15; 21 1–3; 25 (also 1 Ch 28 23–5). The Sons of Abraham by Sarah, Haggar, Keturah (16 15 assigned to P; 21 1–3 to J, F, P; Gen 25 3–11 P; 17 15–17 P; 18 13; 19 20; 21 26a J; 26b P; 27 34 J).

The descendants of Abraham through Haggar and Ishmael represent the Israelite tribes of Arabia living N. or W. of the Arabian Deserts, this tribe, Nebaioth, was evidently Arab. Twelve princes are named, possibly all sons of Ishmael, perhaps some of them grandchildren. The number has seemed “suspicous” as balancing too exactly the twelve tribes of Israel. But twelve is an approved number, determining not necessarily the sons born, but the “sons” mentioned. The Arameans were often frequently given the name Ishmaelites, perhaps the great-grandchildren of Ishmael. In this list, those mentioned are: Medan, Midian, Kedesh, S Thái, Sabeal, Admah, Elzaphan, Taphan, Azanah, Assur, Agrah, Sibnah, Letheth, Hode-sah. The sons of Ishmael, the well-known Syrian god of “fortune”; but there is no necessary connection here. Isher, from itshar, “husband.” Ishmael is related to the name of Ishmael, the Ishmaelites living in the Arabian Deserts, perhaps even the Ishmaelites of Arabia, the Ishmaelites of Egypt, the Ishmaelites of Mesopotamia. The name of Ishmael is reminiscent of the name of Ishmael, the Ishmaelites living in the Arabian Deserts, perhaps even the Ishmaelites of Arabia, the Ishmaelites of Egypt, the Ishmaelites of Mesopotamia.

The account of the parentage, birth and naming of the founders of the twelve tribes; by Leah: Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun (d. Dinah); by Rachel: Dan, Naphtali, Gad, Asher, Joseph, Benjamin. Much modern criticism agrees that these names are purely those of tribes, some of them perhaps derived from persons or places impossible now to trace, but mostly eponymous. Accordingly, these eponymous tribal origin, after the Aramean tribes, the Jacob tribes, the Canaanite tribes, in Canaan, quarters with Edom, migrate to Harran. The J? names: Ashter, Ashtareth, “the goddess of heaven.” The name of Leah, Zilpah, Bilhah, is “conceivables" because inferior members of the federation, or else have a left-handed connection with it.

The formation of the new tribe Benjamin broke up the old tribe Rachel, which (who) accordingly “died.” Although such a connection of events, the new tribe, which is necessarily “an enigma which it is very hard to solve” (Bennett, Gen, 175). More fruitful of inspiration, and strange accidents, as students. For critical purposes it presents a rich field for exploration, analysis and conjecture, but its edifying value is chiefly found in reading the narratives as personal: a serious and reverent religious romance founded on facts or legends, whose real value as a religious allegory it throws it on national character and ethical principles, expressed in a naive, vivid, lifelike story, full of suggestion and teaching. She interpreted with the Qumran separatists the details on the Scripture representation of these details and incidents as personal.

The explanations of the names illustrate the Heb fondness for anagrams, paronomasia, coming from a time when letters had a personal significance, and were written as such. It can find more than one. The tribe is not prominent after Dehuran, perhaps from the name of the father (or) from the tribe, to which the tribe is assigned to Sbâlak, “the swine.” As it is not known after the Conquest, Levi: “adhesion, association; thought by many to mean a member of the family, from Leah, the tribe par excellence; the name is elogial in form. Levi connect it with nphlèth, “wrestle.” A similar allusion is found in Nu 18 24, to the “joining of the tribe,” which is especially associated with the yb, sbâlak, “praise.” Now is not commended, I praise Jeh. Jacob makes the same suggestion in Gen 49 8; so other possibilities are suggested. The origin of the name can be made. The etymology and origin of Bilhah are unknown. Dan is associated with pad, “judge,” “God hath judged;” no other etymology can be found. Naphtali is derived from nphlèth, “wrestle.” I have wrestled, the only discoverable etymology. Zilpâh, sbâlak, perhaps is “dropping,” “drop.” Gad, sâd, “fortunate,” according to Lev. Gad was the well-known Syrian god of “fortune”; but there is no necessary connection here. Asher, from itshar, “husband.” For Ashur, Assy, yod, Issachar, from itshar, “hired.” A man of hire, possibly the same as the Judges, which because Leah had “hired” Jacob with her son’s man-drakes, a similar allusion in Gen 49, “a servant under the whip.” There is nothing more to this. A man of hire, probably the name of a tribe, of some tribe, unknown. Zebulun, from zbdhâl, “habitation, dweller.” This is a name probably connected with the yb, sbâlak, “praise.” Now will my husband dwell with me. Danah, like Dan, is from dsn, “judge.” Supposed by some to be an old tribe of Israel, in some way associated with Dan, possibly a twin division. Rachel is “ewe,” hence identified with a “ewe” tribe. Joseph has a twofold suggestion: the first (assigned to J) is from dsn, “judge,” “God hath taken away”; the second (assigned to J) is from yphâsh, “reproach;” the second (assigned to J) is from ypâsh, “add;” “Jeh will add me another son.” None of these three cases of double explanation would so far exhaust Heb maternal imagination as to require the hypostases of this document, even the last, a “son” is used in the first suggestion and a “son” in the second. Benjamin is called by Rachel Benoni, the “son of my sorrow,” which is supposed to be the same as the names related to Onan, a clan of Judah, or the Tribes of New, Ono, and possibly joined to the yb, sbâlak, “son of the right hand.” I.e. of happiness, is understood as “son of the south,” because originally the southern part of the Joseph tribes. The attempts to trace these names to tribal origins, local allusions, cognate languages, customs and traditions, are engaged much in earnest and ingenuity, with results exceedingly diverse.

I. The descent of the Edomite tribes and clans from Esau through his three wives, the Hittite or Canaanite Adah, the Ishmaelite Basemathe, and the Horite Oholibamah (vs 1–9).
The wives' names here differ from the other statements: In 26:34 and 25:9, the names of Judah, d. of Beeri, the Hittite; 2. Batsheba, d. of Elon, the Hittite.

3. Mahalah, d. of Ishmael, sister of Nahath.

In Gen 36:1: Ohohiabannah, d. of Anah, d. of Zibeon, the Hivite. 2. Adah, d. of the Hittite.

Bathsheba, d. of Ishmael, sister of Nahash.

It is not necessary to resort to the hypothesis of different traditions. Bathsheba and Adah are clearly identical. Esau perhaps having changed the name; as are Mahalah and her husband. Anah, a transparent error, being probably responsible for the change. As to Juditah and Ohohiabannah, Anah is probably a man, identical with Beeri (v. 24). Both of them and "Hittite" and "Hic- tite" are apparently errors for "Horite." The difference being in only one consonant, it may or may not be used as the larger term embracing "Horite." "Edom" (v. 18, 19) is a personal name; in vs 9, 43 (Heb ARVvms) it is national, indicating that to the writer Esau was a person, not an eponym. Nowhere are personal characteristics more vivid and unmistakably portrayed than in the accounts of Jacob and Esau. In these Esauite names are but two compounds of "El" (Eli), none of "Jah" (yah). II. The aboriginal leaders or clans in Edom, partly subsumed by, partly allied with, the Esauites (vs 20-27).

These are descendants of "Seir the Horite" in seven branches, and in sub-clans. "Seir" looks like an eponym or a personification of the country, as no personal details have been preserved. Among these family parallels, no "El" (El) or "Jah" (yah) compounds, although they are clearly copied from those of the tribes of Judah and Reuben to which the names in Judah are found, esp. the Horonite. Many animal names, "Aah," "bird of prey," "Aran," "wild goat," etc.

III. Eight Edomite "kings" before the Hebrew monarchy (vs 31-39).

One of compound, "Melhitabel," one is a Hebrew. It is not certain that the "casus" (i.e. the case) is not hereditary, and that the "capital" shifted: the office was elective, or filled by agreement. The king, whose choice it might win.

IV. A list of Esauite clan chiefs, 'dukes' (EV), 'chiefs' (ARV), "Chief" (v. 19).

Apparently arranged territorially rather than tribally. The names seem used here as either clans or places and should perhaps be read: "the chief of Teman," etc.

The original ancestor may have given his name to the clan, or district, or obtained it from the district or town.

In general this genealogy of Esau shows the same symmetry and balance which rouses suspicion in some minds: excluding Anak, the son of the concubine, the tribes number not the fictitious character of the list. The design, separated from the other Edomites early and are found historians, since his migration from the border of Egypt to North Central Arabia.

(10) Gen 46:8-27 (in different form, Nu 26:1-51, and much expanded in parts of 1 Ch 2:2-3; cf Ex 6:14-16). Jacob's posterity at the descent into Egypt (considered a late addition to P).

A characteristic genealogy. It includes the ideal number of 70 persons, obtained by adding to the 66 mentioned in Gen 46:26, Jacob, Joseph, Ephraim and Manasseh, the two latter born in Egypt. LXX, followed by Stephen (Acts 7:14), reckons 75, adding to Gen 46:26 the names of three grandsons and two great-grandsons of Joseph, obtained from Nu 26:29-35. Some may have been omitted to secure the ideal number so fascinating to the Heb. mind. It is to be noted that Leah's male descendants are double those of Zilpah, and Rachel's double those of Bilhah, showing the ideal merit not the fictitious character of the list. The design, also, seems to be to include these descendants of Jacob from whom permanent divisions sprang, even though, like Manasseh and Ephraim and probably Hermon and Hamul, born after the migration, but before Jacob's death, belonging therefore to the generation of his sons and of his sons; for two sons: see above, the LXX has here it. A copist, no doubt, omitted the "sin, sin.

Dinah (26) is thought by some to be a later insertion, on account of the awkward Heb. "with Dinah." Dinah and Sarah. He is married, and not a doubt instances of other distinguishing facts, now unknown, are the only women mentioned: married women would not be. On the other theory of the "one clan" the "one clan" must have disappeared in Egypt, not being found in Nu. Ziphion (3A). Zepho in Nu, perhaps giving its name to the Gadite city of Zephon (Josh 13:27).

Arod (3A). In Nu 26:17 Arad. Omitted in Nu: perhaps died childless, or his descendants did not constitute a tribal family. Benjamin (3B). Omitted in Nu: perhaps died childless, or his descendants did not constitute a tribal family. benjamin (18). In 1 Ch 4:18, a clan of Judah; 8:17, of Benjamin. Not the same name as Eber, 11:18 (5:18; 22:14; 19:21).

The Sons of Benjamin. The three lists, Gen, Nu, Ch, represent manifold divergences, illustrating the corruption of perhaps all three texts. This list offers a logical method of counting all descendants as sons, though of different generations. The LXX refers to "sons." Nu 26:35-40 gives five sons, Naaman and Arod being sons of Benjamin. The LXX of our passage only gives three sons, Bela, Becher, Ashbel. 1 Ch 7:6 gives three sons. Bela, Becher, Jediael (Ashbel), and Shuppim and Huppim. Becher is omitted in § 1, probably through a抄ist's error, who took בֵּית תַּעַל, becher ut-'ashbel, for "Becher and Ashbel." beḥeṭaš beḥeṭaš, "his first-born, Ashbel." Jediael, both by older and newer scholars, is usually, but not with absolute certainty, identified with Ashbel. He may be a later addition. Another explanation is that 7 6 is part of a Zehulunite genealogy which has been transposed into a Judahite list, Jediael being a remaining Zehulunite "pebble." Naaman (4B) perhaps appears, by a transcriber's error in § 2, as Naḥah. בַּעֲשׂי for בַּעֲשׂי. If Naḥah is not Naaman, and not (Keil) Shephupham, or a chief who succeeded him, he may have been one who was born after the death of his predecessor and needed to make his name appear in the seventy-three. Gera (4B) in similar fashion may appear in § 2 as Rapha. If not, Rapha also may be one born after the migration, and did not find a family.

Eli (4B) is Abiram (Nu 26 38); Abarah (1 Chr 1 8). Eli probably arises from some copyist omitting the "ram." Rosh (4B) is not in Nu or Ch. He founded no family. Muppim (4B) troubled the scribes greatly. In Nu 26 39 he is Shephupham, though as compounded in his family name it is Shephunam. In 1 Chr 7 12 he is Shupham. It is clear whether he is a descendant of Benjamin. He is apparently called, with Huppim, in the genealogies of the gentiles, it is probably to correct the form. The corrupt statement of the Chronicler's text exp., is apparent, and also the fact that "son" may refer to any male descendant.

Huppim (4B) in Nu 26 39 is Hupham; in 1 Chr 7 5 Heb. Arbd (4B) in 1 Chr 7 3 is a son of Bela, Addar, the copyist having transposed יד, יד ג, and יד ח; or mistaken one for the other. In LXX at Gen 46 21 Arbd is son of Gera, son of Bela.

Hushim (5A), the same in 1 Chr 7 12, is Shunam (Nu 26 39). He is a place of consolutions. Another Hushim is a Benjaminite, son of Abner, but Abner may possibly be a corruption of the maternal "one." He being the Chronicler's frequent habit to add numerals. But see under Ber 21 6-9.

Jabez (5A) is Jabez in 1 Chr 7 13.

Guni (5B) in 1 Chr 7 15 is also a Gadite name.

Shelum (5B), in 1 Chr 7 13, Shallum, the common form.

Reuben and Simeon are as in Gen. Levi follows:

2. Kohath — Amram m. Jochebed — Aaron, Moses; Aaron m. Elisheba, d. of Amminadab, sister of Nahshon — Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, Ithamar; Eleazar m. d. of Putiel — Phinehas.
4. Hebron.
6.! Merari — Mahli, Mushi.

The interest of the list is partly chronological, but chiefly to illustrate the genealogical place of Aaron and Moses. It probably exhibits the genealogical practice of omitting links, Amram the father of Moses apparently being telescoped from Amram the son of Kohath. By Moses' time the Amramites numbered some 5,000 males (Nu 3 27), or in the third generation of the descent of Jah in compounded before the Exodus. Putiel (2A) has been considered a partly Egy name, Puti or Poti, "devoted to" or "affiliated to," but probably Heb., "afflicted by God." Hebron is often identified with the city. It is also found in 1 Chr 2 42-43, as Judahite.

(12) Nu 1 5-54; 2 3-29, 7 12 ff.; 10 4 ff. The heads of houses representing and leading the tribes (assigned to P).

For § 1 5-54, see in Ruth 4 10-22; 1 Chr 2 10-12; Mt 1 4; Lk 3 32 (genealogies of Christ).
a clan. Caleb seems to be originally of the pre-Israelite stock in Canaan, absorbed into the tribe of Judah. Perhaps Jephunneh the Kenizite married a woman of Caleb's household (Josh 15:59), the birth of whom to their firstborn was given the name of Caleb, he becoming head of the house and prince of Judah. Another Jephunneh, an Ezronite (1 Ch 2:29).

IV. Issachar: Igal, s. of Joseph.
Other Igs: 2 S 23 36 (one of David's heroes); 1 Ch 3 22. Note the name of another tribe given to a man of Issachar—Joseph (Nu 13 7).

V. Ephraim: Hoshea, s. of Nun.
Hoshea, Joshua's early name. Others: 1 Ch 27 20; Neh 3 29; Hoshea 2 K 15 30; Neh 10 23; Heb name of prophet Hosea.

VI. Benjamin: Palti, s. of Raphu. See 16 IV.

VII. Zebulun: Gaddiel, s. of Sodi.
VIII. Joseph-Manasseh: Gaddi, s. of Susi.
A Gaddi is in 1 Mac 2 2.1.

IX. Dan: Ammiel, s. of Gemallia.
Another Ammiel (2 S 9 4).

X. Asher: Sethur, s. of Michael.
Nine other Michaels, Gadde, Levite, Issacharite, Benjaminite, Manassite, Judahite.

XI. Naphthali: Nahbi, s. of Vophsi.

XII. Gad: Guel, s. of Machi.
Four names in 'id. Nine ending with i; unusual number. The antiquity of the list cannot be readily questioned.

(15) Nu 26 5-62 (P). The heads of houses at the second census.
Related to Nu 1 and 2, and closely follows Gen 46. The divergences in individual names have been noted under (10). This list adds to

I. Rueben:
1. Eliab, s. of Pallu (also Nu 16 1.12).
2. Dathan, Abiram, Nemuel, ss. of Eliab.

II. Manasseh:
1. Machir; also Gen 50 23.
2. Gilead, s. of Machir.
3. Jezer (abbreviation for Abijzer), Helok (not in Ch), Asriel, Shechem, Shemida, ss. of Gilead.
4. Zelophehad, s. of Hepher.
5. Mahleb, Noah, Hoglah, Miluch, Tirzah, d. of Zelophehad.

III. Ephraim:
1. Shuthelah; also 1 Ch 7 21.
2. Becher.
3. Tahan, Tahath, 1 Ch 7 20.
4. Ela (Eed) 1 Ch 7 21). The names of Manasseh's grandsons and great-grandsons are puzzling. Gilead is the district except in Jgs 11 12, where it is the father of Jephunneh. Shechem sounds like the Ephraimites town. Heber reminds of Gath-Heber. In Josh 17 1.2 the six sons of Gilead are described as sons of Manasseh: loosely, it is probable; they are to be understood as descendants. Perhaps the references may be summarized: The family of Machir, the son of Manasseh, conquered Gilead, and took the name therewith, either as a family or in the person of a son. Of Gilead, six sons founded clans named from or giving names to certain towns or districts.

The daughters of Zelophehad are noted for the interesting case at law they presented, claiming and receiving the inheritance of their father, which by Gray, TCC, 'Nu,' is considered not historical but a fictitious instance, for the purpose of raising the question, these daughters being clans, and not persons.

Among the sons of Ephraim, Becher has perhaps been misplaced from ver 38, and possibly displaces Berech 1 Ch 7 26. Three between Becher and Tahath. It is not found here in the LXX. It is possible that an alliance between the Becherites and the Ephraimites caused one portion of the former to be incorpored with Ephraim and another with Benjamin; or that at different times the clan was allied with the two different tribes. An error in transcription, more probable. Another Shuthelah is found later in the line (1 Ch 7 21).

Renben, Gad, half-Manasseh, omitted because their allotments had already been assigned E. of Jordan; Lev, because receiving none. Changing to the order in (10).

I. Renben: None.
II. Simeon: Shemuel, s. of Ammihud.
Shemuel is Hec of Samuel. Another s. is of Issachar, 1 Ch 7 2. Samuel the prophet, a Levite.

III. Judah: Caleb, s. of Jephunneh.

IV. Issachar: Paltiel, s. of Azzan.

Another Paltiel, otherwise Palti, David's wife Michal's temporary husband (2 S 3 15). Another Benjaminite (1 Ch 2 9).

V. Zebulun: Elisaphan, s. of Parnach.

Another E., Kohathite Levite (Ex 6 18 22).

VI. Gad: None.

VII. Asher: Abihud, s. of Shelomi.

Another Abihud, Benjaminite (1 Ch 8 7).

VIII. Joseph-Ephram: Kemuel, s. of Shiltan.

Another Kemuel, s. of Nahor, an Aramean clan (Gen 22 1); Levite of David's time (1 Ch 27 17).

IX. Joseph-Manasseh: Hanniel, s. of Ephod.
Hanniel, also an Asherite (1 Ch 7 59).

X. Benjamin: Elidad, s. of Chiam.

XI. Dan: Bulki, s. of Jogli.

Bulki, abbreviation of Bukkanah; another, in high-priestly line of Phinehas (1 Ch 6 5 51). The sons.

XII. Naphthali: Pedahel, s. of Ammihud.

A Simeonite Ammihud above.
Seven 'El' names, only one 'Jah.'

Controversy over the genealogy. Nu 26 1-25: Some links have been omitted between the generations. Whitaker identifies Obed as the son of Jesse. Elhanan.

(18) 2 S 3 2-5; 5 14-15. David's children (also in 1 Ch 3 1-9; 4 4-7).

I. Born in Hebron: Amnon, Chileab, Absalom, Adonijah, Shappaith, Ithream.

Four names in 'id. All prefixed. Two in 'Jah.' Chileab is David's 1 Ch 3 1; uncertain which is right, but probably Daniel is a corruption. Ch adds Nosah to the Jerus. sons, probably developed in transcription. Nosah 6-6 has two Paltielites: 14 6 has Paltiel in place of the first; more probable. This gives David 6 sons in Hebron, and, if both Nosah and Paltiel be correct, 12 in Jer. Eliada is Beelada in 17 4, perhaps the original form, a relic of the time before the Hebrews turned against the use of Baal, 'lord,' as applied to Jah; in which case Beelada, 'Lord knows,' was changed to Eliada, 'God knows.' 36 reads Elisharma for Elishama. Japhia is also the name of a king of Lachish in Joshua's time (Josh 10 3-7).

(19) 2 S 23 (also 1 Ch 11 11-41). David's knights.

1. Joshobas-Bashhebeth, the tahmeshonith.

In Ch it is Jashobeam, and should read Ishbaal, the writer's religious horror of Baal leading him to substitute the consonants of yshbaal, 'shame,' as in Mephibosheth, Ishobadeth, LXX has teresba (B), teresbath, 'rebekah (A), in Ch. and 'isoro (B), 'isosba (A) here. In Ch he is a Tahmesonite, probably correct. 'Adino the Hephite' is probably a corruption for 'He wielded his spear' (Ch).

2. Eleazar, s. of Dodai, the Ahohite.

Dodo in Ch; 8 other Eleazarites in the OT. Another Dodai is father of Elhanan.

3. Shammah, s. of Agee, a Hararite.

Omitted by Ch. Three other Shammahs, one of them a knight of David: 'Harai' was to be 'mountaineer,' or 'inhabitant of the village Harar.'
4. Abishai, s. of Zeruiah, brother of Joab.
Abishai (1 Ch 18 12m). Zeruiah perhaps David's half-sister (2 S 17 25). Father never mentioned.
5. Benaiah, s. of Jehoiada of Kabzeel.
11 other O'T Benaiahs, one of them a knight. This B. succeeded Joab as commander-in-chief. 4 other Jehoiadas, one B.'s grandson, high in David's counsel, unless a scribe has inverted the order in 1 Ch 27 34, which should then read B., s. of Jehoiada.
6. Asaiah, brother of Joab.
Three other Asahels.
7. Elhanan, s. of Dodo of Bethlehem.
Another E., slayer of the brother of Goliath (2 S 21 19; 1 Ch 20 5). Perhaps the same.
8. Shamhah the Harodite.
Ch. Shammath. From Harod, near Gideon's well (Jgs 7 1).
9. Elikia the Harodite.
10. Helcias the Paltite.
Paltite perhaps local or family name from Pelet, or Pelet.
11. Ira, s. of Ikkesh the Tekoite.
Two others, one a knight. Tekoah, Judahite town, home of Amos, etc.
12. Abiezer the Anathothite.
One other, a Manasseite (Josh 17 2). Anathoth an hour N.E. of Jerusalem, Jeremiah's town.
13. Mebunnai the Hushathite.
Should read, with Ch, Sibbecai.
14. Zalmah the Ahobite.
Z. also name of mountain (Jgs 9 48). Descendant of Ahoah, Benjaminite of Bala's line. See 1 Ch 8 14.
15. Maharai the Netophathite.
From Netophah, town.
16. Helob, s. of Baanah.
1 Ch 11 30. Helob. Three other Baanahs.
17. Ittai, s. of Ribai of Gibeon of the children of Benjamin.
1 Ch 11 31. Ittai. An Ittai of Gath also followed David.
18. Benaiah a Pirathonite.
Pirathon, Amalekite town in Ephraimite territory.
Ch. Hurai ("for i"). Ga'as, a wady in Ephraim.
20. Abi-albon the Arbahite.
Ch, Abiel, perhaps corrupted from Abi-Baal; from Beth-sarabah, Judah or Benjamin.
21. Azmaveth the Barhumite.
Three others, and Judahite town, of the same name. Baharumite. Ch. B., a Benjaminite town.
22. Ellahab the Shaalbonite.
S., a Danite town.
23. The sons of Jaysen (better, Hashem).
Ch, "the sons of Hashem the Gilonite." "Sons of" looks like a scribal error, or interpolation, perhaps a repetition of "but" in "Shaalboni" above.
24. Jonathan, s. of Shammah the Hararite.
Ch adds, "the son of Shagee the Hararite." Shagee should perhaps be Aoge (2 S 23 11); but LXX indicates Shammah here; both S and Ch should read "J., s. of Shammah the Ararat." No identifier.
25. Ahiam, s. of Sharar the Ararite.
Ch, Sacer the Hararite. S is supported by LXX.
26. Eliphelet, s. of Ahasbai, the son of the Maacathite.
Ch has "Eliphal, s. of Ur," and adds "Heper the Mesheberathite. Both texts are corrupt. Ch should perhaps read, "Heperhet the son of ..., the Maacathite, Eliam," etc.
27. Eliahm, s. of Ahithophel the Gilonite.
E., possibly father of Bathsheba. Ahithophel, David's counselor. Gilonite, native of Gilo.
27a. Ahijah the Pelonite (in Ch but not S).
Seven other Ahijahs. Pelonite uncertain, probably a corruption; perhaps inserted by a scribe who could not decipher his "copy," and means "such and such a one." as in 1 S 21 2.
28. Hezro (Hesra) the Carmelite.
Scribe confused "a" and "i." Carmel, near Hebron.
29. Paarai the Arbrite.
Ch, "Naarai, s. of Ebzal." Uncertain. Arab., a town of Judah.
30. Igal, s. of Nathan of Zobah.
Ch, Joel, brother of Nathan. Igal less common than Joel, hence more likely to be corrupted: 2 other Igals; 13 other Joel's; 6 other Nathans.
30a. Mibhar, s. of Hagri (Ch, not S). Text uncertain as between this and 31.
31. Bani the Gadite (omitted Ch.).
Possibly the Gerarite.
32. Zelek the Ammonite.
Ammon E. of Jordan and upper Jabbok.
33. Naharai the Beerithite, armor-bearer to Joab, s. of Zeruiah.
20 and Benjaminite.
34. Ira the Ithrite.
Ithrites, a family of Kirath-jearim, Judah.
35. Gareb the Ithrite.
Gareb also a hill W. of Jerus.
36. Uriah the Hitrite.
Bathsheba's husband; 3 others. From some Hitite town surrounded by Israel at the Conquest.
37. Zabad, s. of Ahlai (perhaps dropped out of S), Ch.
Ch adds 13 others. The filling of vacancies makes the number 37 instead of 30. Two names, perhaps, in bo'el, 5 in yod, 25 in 'i'. As far as guessable, 5 from Judah, 3 from Benjamin, 2 from Ephraim, 1 from Dan, 1 from Issachar, 1 Ammonite, 1 Hitrite, 2 or 4 Hararites, 2 Harodites, 2 Ithrites.
(20) 1 K 4 1-19. Solomon's "princes" and commissaries.
11 princes, 12 officers. No mention of their tribal connections; assigned only partly by tribal bounds. 7 yah names, 1 'el. 5 of the officers are prefixed ben as if their own names had dropped out.
(21) 1 Ch 1 9. Genealogies, with geographical and historical notices.
By far the largest body of genealogical material, illustrating most fully the problems and difficulties. The estimate of its value depends on the estimate of the Chronicler's date, purpose, equipment, ethical and mental qualities. He uses freely all previous OT matter, and must have had in hand family or tribal songs, traditions; genealogical registers, as mentioned in Ezr 2 61-69; Neh 7 61-65; local traditions; official genealogies, such as "the genealogies reckoned in the days of Jotham king of Judah, and ..., Jeroboam king of Israel." (1 Ch 5 17): prophetic, historical and other matter now lost, "the words of Shemuel, ... after the manner of the genealogies" (2 Ch 13 15), and elsewhere. The results of David's census seem to have been in his hands (1 Ch 27 24). Curtis (ICC, "Chronicles," 528) suggests that his purpose was partly to provide genealogies for contemporary families, implying an accommodating insertion of names after the manner of genealogies today. Two main purposes, however, seem clear: the first historical, to give the historical and personal basis and setting to elucidate the Chronicler's main thesis, that national prosperity depended upon, and national character was measured by, fidelity to the law of God, esp. as it centered upon the worship and service of Jeh's house. To do this it was necessary to trace the descent of the prominent characters, families, tribes. Hence the space given to Judah, Levi, Benjamin, the main line of fidelity, the survival of the fittest. The other purpose was to conserve purity of blood in the restored nation, to include all who were entitled to and excluded all who were not. Details of his method will be pointed out in the following analysis. As in this whole article, space forbids exhaustive treatment of the endless textual, critical, historical questions arising. A few instructive cases only are given.

I. Primeval Genealogies (1 Ch 1 1-54).

To show Israel's place among the nations; follows Gen closely, omitting only the Caínites, boldly, skilfully compressed, as if the omitted facts were well known.

(1) The ten antediluvian Patriarchs, and Noah's three sons (vs 1-4).

Follows Gen 4 5, giving only the names.

(2) Japheth's descendants (vs 5-7) (Gen 10 2-4 unchanged).

(3) The Hamites (vs 8-16) (Gen 10 6 8-13-18 unchanged).

(4) The southern tribes (Gen 10 17-29) (Gen 10 22-29; only arable changes).

(5) Abram's descent (vs 24-27) (Gen 11 10-26 abridged, giving only the Patriarchs).

(6) The sons of Abraham, Keturah, Isaac (vs 28-35).

(7) Sons of Esau (vs 35-52) (Gen 36 4-10).

(8) Kings and sheikhs of Edom (vs 43.54) (Gen 36 31-43). Scribal changes.

II. Descendants of Jacob (1 Ch 2-9).

The tribes arranged chiefly geographically. Judah, as the royal line, is given 100 verses, Levi, as the priestly, 81 verses, Benjamin 50, the other ten 56, Dan and Zebulun neglected. His purpose practically confines him to the first three; and these were also the best preserved.

(1) Sons of Israel.

Follows substantially the order in Gen 35. Dan is placed before Rachel's sons. 17 different orders of the tribes in Bible lists.

(2) Genealogies of Judah (2 3-4 23).

(a) Descendants of Jesse's sons from Judah (2 3-17).

Largely gleaned from the historical books. The sons of Zerah (vs 6-8) are not found elsewhere. Chedorlaomer is Caleb. Only 7 sons of Jesse are mentioned, Abishai, Joab, Asahel are always designated by their mother's name, Zeruiah.

(b) Genealogy of Bezael (vs 18-20).

Artificer of the tabernacle, hence greatly interested in the Chronicler.

(c) Other descendants of Hezron (vs 21-24).

(d) The Jerahmeelites (vs 25-41).

Conceivably a very old list of this important clan can not found elsewhere. Sheshan (ver 35), who married his daughter to Jarcha, an Egypt servant, illustrates the introduction of a foreigner into the nation's tribe.

(e) The Calebites (vs 41-55).

Not elsewhere. The names are largely geographical. A subdivision of the Hezronites. Not Caleb the son of Jephunneh.

(f) David's descendants (3 1-24).

Gives first the sons and their birthplaces, then the kindred of Jedediah, then David's, from Jeconiah to Zerubbabel, then the grandsons of Zerubbabel and the descendants of Shecaniah. Two other lists of David's sons (3 5-8; 14 4-17). Elisabeth and Zerubbabel here are thought to have developed in transcription, with some other changes. Johanan's name (vs 8) is simply a variant of Joseph. Zerubbabel is thought to have never reigned. Zedekiah is called son (instead of brother) of Jehoiachin, perhaps a scribal error. "Zerubbabel's" name is extremely prominent in later, apocalyptic literature with such regard for his material that he preserved it all (with certain comprehensible exceptions), even though extremely fragmentary here and there. His materials are of many degrees of age. It is thought by some that the account is indicated by the last stage in the descent, the genealogy of Sheshan, e.g. ending with Hezekiah's time; hence, also Asaph's (1 Ch 6 33) in David's. Name-study and historico-literary criticism seeks still other marks of relative age. The text has suffered much, as lists of the kind are prone to scribal errors. Details of his method will be pointed out in the following analysis. As in this whole article, space forbids exhaustive treatment of the endless textual, critical, historical questions arising. A few instructive cases only are given.

(g) Fragmentary genealogies of families of Judah (4 1-23).

Contains (1) "sons" of Judah, four or five successive generations; (2) sons of Shobal and Hur; (3) sons of Caleb; (4) sons of Caleb, s. of Jephunneh; (5) sons of Jehoadeel; (6) sons of Ezra (of course, not the priest-scribe of the return); (7) do "son of Sib'bah the daughter of Pharaoh whom Mered took"; (8) sons of Shimeon; (9) sons of Ishi; (10) sons of Shilah. It is hard to trace the law of association here; which fact has its bearing on the discussion under (d) above. Chelub may be another Caleb, vs 9-10. Know an interesting name-study here. Jabez by prayer transforms into prosperity the omen of his sorrowful name; because I bare him with sorrow, characteristically, etc. vs 21-25 speak of warriors and wokers and potters. Similar, even identical, names have been found on tablets in SOUTHERN EGYPT.

(3) Genealogy of Simeon (4 24-43).

(a) Simeon's sons. Genealogy of Shimei, After Gen 46 11; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 12-14.

(b) Dwelling-places of Simeon. After Josh 19 2-8.

(c) Princes and conquests (vs 34-43).

Source unknown, but considered old. Gray, however, thinks the names of late formation. Meshobah, Jam-lech, Jehiah, Amaziah, Joel, Jehu, Jordan, Serahah, Asiel, Elionoam, Jakobiah, Jehoshaphat, Assali, Adiel, Jesmiah, Benahah, Ziza, Shiphali, Allion, Jediah, Shimri, Shemaiah, Jehith, Pelatiah, Nobiah, Shelumiel, etc., many undoubtedly old ones; 11 in gen, 5 in ch. Elionoam sounds post-celtic. The section mentions several exploits of Simeon.

(4) East-Jordanic tribes (5 1-24).

As in Simeon above, the usual order, deviated from in instances, is (1) Introductory: Sons and immediate descendents; (2) Territory; (3) Princes or Chiefs; (4) Incidents.

(a) Reuben (vs 1-10).

Partly follows Gen, Nu; but only as to first generation. Very fragmentary and connections obscure.

(b) Gad (vs 11-17).

First generation omitted. Chronicler draws from genealogies "in the days of" Jotham and Jeroboam.

(c) Half-Manasseh (vs 23-24).

The international standard bible encyclopaedia
The whole tribe is treated of (7 14 ff.). Here only the seats and heads of houses.

(5) Levi (6 1-81).

Illustrates more fully the Chronicler's attitude and methods.

(a) High priests from Levi to Jehozadak (the exile) (vs 1-15).

(b) Levi's sons: Gershon, Kohath, and Merari (Gen 46 11-16).

(c) Kohath's sons: Amram, Izhar, Hebron, Uzzie (Ex 6 18).

(d) Amram's 'sons': Aaron, Moses, Miriam (Ex 6 20.23 [except Miriam]; Nu 26 59).

(e) High priests from Eleazar. Also (partly) Ezra (7 1-5):

1. Eleazar 12. Azariah
4. Bukki 15. Amariah
5. Uzzi 16. Ahitub
7. Meraioth 18. Shallum
11. Ahimaaz 22. Jehozadak

Noteworthy omissions: Eli's house, Eli, Phinehas. Ahitub, Ahimelech, Abiathar, because set aside for Zadok's in Solomon's time; Bukki to Zadok being their contemporaries; but the list also omits Amariah in the reign of Jehoshaphat (perhaps): Jehoada, Josiah's 'power behind the throne,' Uriah, Ahaz' day, Azariah in Hezekiah's. It has been thought that this was done in the interests of a chronological scheme of the Chronicler, making 23 generations of 40 years from the Exodus to the Captivity, or 920 years. The Hcb generations, however, was as likely to be 30 as 40 years, and as a matter of fact was nearer 20. The apparent number of generations from Aaron to the Captivity, adding the data from the historical books, is 29, making a generation about 24 years. The reasons for the omission here, as for many others, are apparant: outside of Ch and Ezr we know nothing of Abitub, Bukki, Uzzi, Zerahiah, Meraioth, the first Amariah, Johanan, Amariah, Ahitub, Zadok, Shallum, Azariah 3. The list touches historical notices in Aaron, Eleazar, Phinehas, Zadok, Abiathar, contemporary of Solomon, perhaps Amariah, contemporary of Jehoshaphat, Azariah, contemporary of Uzziah, Hilkiah, contemporary of Josiah, Serahiah slain by the Chaldeans, and Jehozadak. The recurrence of similar names in close succession is characteristically Hcb (not compare names of popes and kings). It is seen in the list beginning with Jehozadak: Jesha, Joakim, Eliezer, Josia, Jonathan, Jedidah, Onias, Simon, Simon, Manasseh, Onias, Simon, Onias, Joshua. Also about Christ's time: Eleazar, Jesus, Anas, James, Jesus, Simon, Josiah, Jonathan, Theophilus, Simon, although these latter do not succeed in a genealogical line.

(b) The three Levitical clans (vs 16-19).

After Ex 6 17-19; Nu 3 17-20.

(c) Linear descendants of Gershon: seven; vs 20.21; thirteen; vs 39-45. See also 1 Ch 23 7.

The two lists (vs 20.21 and vs 39-43) are clearly the same:

Gershon Gershon
Lehi Jahath
Lizman Zimmah
Joah Zimmah
Iddo Adiah
Zerah Zerah
Ezrach Ezrach
Jehthaerai Hitni
Jeatharai Malchiah
Zerahiah Haseelah
Mehanah Michael Menah Zerahiah
Berechiah Berechiah
Asaph

Jahath, Zimmah, Zerah are in both. By slight changes Joah, יְזֹרָה, is Ethann, יָזֹרָה; Iddo, יִדְדָו, is Zerahiah, יִדְדֶה יִרְזַה, Adahat; Jeatharai, יֶתָאוֹר יֵשֹּרְו, is Ethann, יַדְדִי יָזֹרָה. The names have been changed to suit the historical data. To make them correct, a word has been transposed. In 1 Ch 23 7 Libnah is Ladan.

(d) Pedigrees of Samuel (vs 27,28; 33-35). See also 1 S 1 1; 8 2.

We have three pedigrees of Samuel, all differing in transcription:

(1) 1 Ch 6 25-26.21
(2) 1 Ch 6 38-39
(3) 1 S 1 1; 2 2

Samuel Samuel
Samuel
Joel (Vashni) and Joel Joel Abijah Heman

The text is obscure. LXX reads (ver 26), "Elkanah his (Ahnomoth's) son, Zophai his son. (1) for Amminadab, as has Heb in Ex 6 18.21. Uriel for Zephaniah is inexplicable. Uziah and Azariah are exchangeable. The other variations are transcriptional. Joel has dropped out of the first list, and the following words: 'Joel, Samuel, Amram, Ethan, Zimmah, Jehoshaphat, Jedediah, Ethan, Solomon, Heman; but the second' vs 29-30, have been read 'Vashni.' vs 31 1 calls Zuph an Ephraimite. The Chronicler's claiming him and Samuel seems to indicate another instance of Levitical bias and acquisitiveness. The genealogy is also "clerically artificial," being treated as a genealogy, and as a matter of fact was nearer 20.

(f) Pedigree of Asaiah the Merari (1 Ch 6 29.30).

Merari: Manli: Libni; Shimai: Uzah: Shimea: Haggai: Asiah. Hard to adjust or place. Libni and Shimai are elsewhere Gershonites, but the same name is frequently found in different tribes or clans. Information below Mathi is entirely wanting.

(f) Descent of David's three singers, Heman, Asaph, Ethan (vs 35-47).

(a) Heman has been given under (d); 20 links.

Hardly anywhere is the Chronicler's good faith more questioned than in these lists. First, he has gathered genealogies from the Prophets, as Ezekiel, who, in his own time, transposed out with his favorite names, or those of his own invention, or from current genealogies to make them correspond as much as possible with David's. Here he can more conveniently work with David, he adds Malchiah, Maaseiah, Michael, Shimea, Berechiah. He helps out Ethan with Bani, Amzi, Hilkiah, and Amaziah. Merari's Abi, Kish, Asaph may have occurred in Hammah's mind the Levitical descent. In the organized times of David an Ephraimite woman may well have been ignored of, or indifferent to, the Levitical regulation. She, or the author of 1 S 1 1, must also have forgotten that every male that opeth the wom from any tribe is equally God's property. A mother's vow to devote her first-born son to Jehovah, beyond recall or redemption, and to seal his consecration by the significant symbol of the unshorn head, is not hard to imagine in either a Levite or an Ephraimite, and equally "unnecessary" in either case. Heman, ending the pedigree (3), was David's contemporary.

(g) Genealogy
Genealogy

based, it may be said: (1) The Chronicler's failure to give his three families nearly the same number of links is no peculiarity, but he took an old line as it came to him, and it is natural. (2) The fact that these added names occur many more times in Ezr. Neh than in Levitical. Perhaps some simply that Levitical names occur frequently in a writer and among people whose interests are Levitical. No one would look among the Goshenites for either classical or aristocratic names. (3) In no tribe would such names be more likely to recur, naturally or purposely, than in the Levitical.

(4) The Chronicler has inserted among his new names 6 in yah and only 1 in "ah, and that far down the list (9 of the "added" names Malchiah occurs in Jer 21:1; Masseiah, in 29:21-25; 35:4). In every case priestly or Levitical. Michael occurs in Nu 13:13. Berechiah is the name of the prophet Zechariah's father. Hilkiah is the name of Joshua's high priest. Amaziah refers to a tribal leader. Malluch is mentioned in 1 Sam 23:36 (though this is thought to be copied from Ch.), Shimea is conceivably early. Of the 13 "added names" 8 are found elsewhere. Of the others, Amzi, Abdi, Kishi (Kish, Kushai) have an early look. Malchiah might be late. If Hashabiah is late the head has scrambled it well through the history. I several generations before David, 4 in David's time, 1 in Josiah's, 1 in Ezra's, 3 in Nehemiah's, in every case a Levite. (5) While these "added" names occur more times in Ezr, Neh, than elsewhere, and the 13 occur many names else, it is also true that more than 500 other names also occur only in these three books, and that the total names in these, to say nothing of the "P" portions elsewhere, outnumber the names in the other books about three to one. Other things being equal, these mentions of any common name ought to be found in these books to one in the others. Of all names applied to more than four persons the usual proportion in these books by count is four, to one elsewhere.

(g) Pedigree of Ahimaaz (vs 50-53).

Parallel with 6:4-8.

(h) Dwelling-places of Levi.

(6) The six remaining tribes.

(i) Asschar (7:1-5).

Ver 1 derived from Gen 46:13; Nu 26:23-24. The rest peculiar to Ch. Closes with a word of lighting men, instead of the usual statement of dwelling-places.

(b) Benjamin (7:6-13).

A very difficult section. It is considered a Zebulunite genealogy which has been Benjaminized, because (1) there is a Benjaminite list elsewhere; (2) Benjamin is out of place here, while in 13 out of 17 tribal lists Zebulun comes at this point, and in this list has no other place; (3) the numbers of Benjamin's sons differ from other Benjaminite genealogies; (4) the names of Heinz's and Belon's have been different here: (5) many names in this list are not Benjaminite; (6) Tarsish, in this list, is a sea-coast name appropriate to Zebulon, but not Benjamin. But (1) it is called Benjaminite; (2) doubles are not unknown in Ch; (3) Dan is also neglected; (4) many Benjaminite names are found; (5) both the Zebulunite and Benjaminite material elsewhere is too scanty for safe conclusions.

(c) Dan, ver 12, from Gen 46:23.

Aker ("another") is a copyist's error or substitute for Dan.

(d) Naphtali, ver 13, from Gen 46:24 (transcriptional changes).

The text of vs 14-15 very corrupt. No other notice is found of these sons in vs 16-17: Peroesh, Sheresh, Ulam, Rakem, Bodan.

(f) Ephraim to Joshua (vs 20-29).

Contains an interesting personal note in the mourning of Ephraim over his sons Ezar and Elead, and the subsequent birth of Beriah. Interpreted to mean that the clans Ezar and Elead met with disaster, on which the clan Beriah became prominent.

(g) The seats of Joseph's sons (vs 28-29).

Hard to say why this has been placed here.

(h) Asher (vs 30-40).

The earliest names derived from Gen 46:17. Gray considers the others ancient.

(i) Benjamin (8:1-40).

(a) Sons of Benjamin. After Gen 46:20 without variation in Sots (6:5b).

(b) Descendants of Ebed (vs 6-25). Text very corrupt, obscure.

(j) The house of Saul (vs 29-38); repeated (9:34-44).

In this passage two exceptions to the usual treatment of Baal compounds, Isaiab and Meribbaal here are Ishshoboth and Mephibosheth in S.

With variations in Neh 11:1-13. This passage has been thought an interpolation, but it is the Chronicler's custom to give dwelling-places. Perhaps this and Neh are two independent abridgments of the same document. This probably describes post-exilic conditions. Vs 1 and 2 here, and Neh 3-6, are excised.

Four classes of returning exiles:

(a) The children of Judah, Benjamin, Ephrain, Manassesh.

Constituting "the laity." "Israel."

(b) The priests.

Agreeing with Neh, but abridged.

(c) The Levites. Paralleling Neh, but not exactly.

(d) Nathinim or porters. Fuller than Neh, and different.

(22) David's knights (1 Ch 11:10-47).

Discussed under (19). Adds to the list, Adina, s. of Shilza, Reubenite; Hanan, s. of Maarah, Joshaphat the Mezid of, Uzziel, the Asherath. Salmon and Jeled the sons of Hotam the Acorite, Jediel the son of Sinuri, and Josh his brother or parent, Eliel the Mahavite, and Jeribal and Jashaviah, the sons of Elasam, and Ithmah the Molad, Eliel, and Obad, and Jaasiel the Mezobale.

(23) David's recruits at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:19).

Found only here. Contains 23 names from Benjamin (some may be Judahite); 11 from Gad; 8 from Manassesh: nothing to show that the names are not old.

(24) David's musicians and porters at the bringing of the ark (1 Ch 15:16-24).

Also 16:5.67-43. Each division of the Levites represented by a chief musician.

(25) David's organization of the kingdom (1 Ch 23-27).

I. The Levites (ch 23).

(1) The family of Gershon (vs 7-11); 9 houses.

(2) The family of Kohath (vs 12-20); 11 houses.

(3) The family of Merari (vs 21-23); 4 houses.

II. The priests (ch 24).

24 divisions; 16 divided among descendants of Eleazar, headed by Zadok, and 8 among those of Ithamar, headed by Ahimelech (perhaps an error for Abiathar); but perhaps Ahimelech's. Abiathar, s. of Ahimelech, was acting for his father.

(1) Eleazar's courses: Jehoiarib, Harm, Malchiah, Hakkoz, Joshua, Eliashib, Huphal, Bilgah, Hezer, Aphses, Pethahiah, Jehezekel, Jachin, Gamul, Delaiah, Maaziah.

(2) Ithamar: Jedaiash, Secrim, Mijamin, Abijah, Shecaniah, Jachin, Joshebeab, Immer.

Jos gives the same names of courses (Ant. VII, xiv, 7; Vite, 1). 80-81 Ch. Er have mentioned in Apoc, Palm, and the NT. Jehoiarib, Jedaiash, Harm, Malchiah, Mijamin, Abijah, Shecaniah, Bilgah, Maaziah, are found in one or both of Nohehaim's lists.

(3) Supplementary list of Levites (1 Ch 24:20-31).

Repeats the Levitical families in 1 Ch 23:6-23, omitting the Gershonites, adding to the Kohathites and Merarites.

III. The singers (1 Ch 25).

(1) The numbers, classified under the three great groups, descendants of Asaph, Jeduthun (Ethan), Heman.
A curious problem is suggested by the fact that the names in ver 4, beginning with Hanania, with a very slight changes, read: "Hanan ("Have mercy")—jah ("O Jehovah"); Hanan ("Have mercy"); Eliashah ("Thou art my God"); Giddalti ("I have magnified") and (and) Romamti ("exalted") (th) Ezer ("help"); Joshobackah ("in the tent of hardness"); Mallathi ("I speak of it"); Rother ("Gave still"); Mahazioth ("Visions"). How, or why, this came among these names, cannot be said.

(2) The 24 courses of 12 singers each, of which courses nos. 1, 5, 6, 7 fell to Asaph; nos. 2, 4, 5, 10, 12, 14 fell to Jeduthun; nos. 6, 9, 11, 13, 15—24 fell to Heman.

IV. Gatekeepers and other officers (1 Ch 26).
(1) Genealogies and stations of the gatekeepers (vs 1—19).
(2) Those in charge of the temple treasury (vs 20—28).
(3) Those in charge of the "outward business."

Subordinate magistrates, tax-collectors, etc.

V. The army, and David's officers (1 Ch 27).
(1) The army (vs 1—15).
12 officers, each commanding 24,000 men, and in charge for one month, chosen from David's knights.
(2) The tribal princes (vs 16—24).
After the fashion of Nu 1 2—15. Gad and Asher are omitted. The 12 are made up by including the Levites and the Aaronites.
(3) The king's twelve stewards (vs 25—31).
(4) The king's court officers (vs 32—34).

Counselor and scribe: Jonathan, the king's uncle, otherwise unknown; tutor: Jehiel; counselor: Ahithophel; "the king's friend" (closest confidant?): Bushai. Possibly two priests are next included: Jehovah the son of Beniamin, and Abishalom, high priest of the Ikamar branch. But perhaps it should read, "Beniamin, the son of Jehovah." If two priests are intended, it seems strange that Zadok is not one. The list ends with the commander-in-chief, Joab.

This elaborate organization in every part and branch of the kingdom is looked upon as the Chronicler's glowing Utopian dream of what must have been, underranging the organizing power of the great soldier and statesman.

(26) Ezr 2 1—63. The exiles who returned with Zerubbabel.

(1) The leaders (ver 2).
(2) Numbers, according to families (vs 3—19).
18 of Ezra's numbers differ from Nehemiah's.
(3) Numbers according to localities (vs 20—35).
10 towns probably Judahite, 7 Benjamite.
(4) The priests (vs 39.42).
Only 4 families, representing 3 Davidic courses.
(5) The Levites (vs 43.44).
Among the singers, only Asaphites.
(6) The porters (ver 45).
3 old names, 3 new ones.
(7) The "Nethinim" (temple-servants) (vs 46—56).
(8) The children of Solomon's servants (slaves) (vs 57—60).
(9) Those who could not prove their descent.
(a) General population.
Three families, children of Delaiah, Tobiah, Nehoda.
(b) Priestly families.
Hobaiah, Hakkoz, Barzillai. Hakkoz, the seventh of the Davidic courses, possibly succeeded later in establishing their right (Neh 3 31).
(27) Ezr 6 1—5. Ezra's genealogy.

An ascending genealogy: Ezra, s. of Seraiah, s. of Azariah, s. of Hilkiah, s. of Shallum, s. of Zadok, s. of Abihail, s. of Amariah, s. of Azariah, s. of Meremoth, s. of Zerahiah, s. of Uzzi, s. of Bukki, s. of Abishua, s. of Phinehas, s. of Eleazar, s. of Aaron; 16 links. Follows 1 Ch 6 7—10 down to Zadok, then omits 7 to Shallum, besides the 7 omitted in Ch.

(28) Ezr 8 1—20. Numbers and leaders of those who returned with Zerubbabel.
Numbers much smaller than in Zerubbabel's list (Ezr 2 1—14). Perhaps 5 new families, Socoban, Shoboth, Joha; 7 more leaders. A much smaller proportion of Levites; among them a "man of discretion," perhaps a name, "Jehoiarib, one of the sons of Malchijah, therefore a Merarite, with other Merarites, 39 in all.

(29) Ezr 10 18—44. Jews who had married foreign women.
(1) The priests (vs 18—22).
17 in all; members of the high priest's family, and of the Davidic courses of Immer and Harim, besides the family of Pashur.
(2) The Levites (ver 23); 6 in all.
(3) Singers and porters (ver 24); 4 in all.
(4) "Israel," "the laity" (vs 25—43).
16 families represented: 86 persons. Out of a total of 163 names, 39 yodh compounds, 19 'of compounds, 8 prefixed.
(20) Neh 3 1—12. The leaders in the repair of the wall.
38 leaders: in 30 instances the father's name also given. As far as mentioned, all from Judah and Jerus.
(31) Neh 7 7—63. Those who returned with Zerubbabel.
Folows Ezr 2 1—63, with transcriptional variations in names and numbers.
(32) Neh 8 4—7. Levites and others who assisted Ezra in proclaiming the law.
(33) Neh 10 1—27. The sealers of the Covenant.
22 priests, 17 Levites, 20 heads of families already mentioned, 24 individuals.
Parallels in 1 Ch 9 9—22. Some omissions and variations; 5 priestly courses given, Joiarib, course no. 1; Je-daiash, no. 2; Jachin, no. 23; Malchijah, no. 5; Immer, no. 6. 24 "Jah," "El" names out of 82.
(35) Neh 12 1—8. Priests and Levites who went up with Zerubbabel.
Compare with priests' lists in Neh 10 2—8 (33), and with priests under Joiakim (Neh 12 19—21 [30]). They are names of families. See Neh 12 12.
(36) Neh 12 10.11. High priests from Jehosh to Jaddua.
(1) Joshua, 538 to 520 BC.
(2) Joiakim.
(3) Eluzriah, 446 till after 433.
(4) Joiada, about 420.
(5) Jonathan, Johanan, 405 to 362.
(6) Jaddua, to 323.

This list bears upon the date of Ezra-Neh. Jaddua was high priest when Alexander visited Jerus, 335 BC. If the Darius of ver 22 is Darius Noththus (425 to 405 BC), and Jaddua, a young boy, is mentioned as the heir to the high-priesthood, this passage was written before 406. If Jaddua's actual high-priesthood is meant, and Darius Codomanus (336 to 350 BC) is the Darius here, the date may be about 330. The enumeration of families here is assigned to the time of Joiakim, before 406, and the latest results; the events to the time of the high priest before Jaddua (Neh 12 23; 13 28), hence before 362. The hypothesis of an addition by some scribe after 350 is possible, but not necessary.
(38) Neh 12 22—26. Levites and porters under high priest Johanan.

I. Introduction.—The genealogy of Jesus as contained in the First and Third Gospels presents three special problems which lie somewhat apart from general discussions of NT genealogies:

1. The Problems of criticism: (1) the construction and involved purpose of each list taken separately; (2) the relation of the two lists, in their coincidences and variations, to each other; (3) the relation of these lists to the statement concerning the virgin birth of Our Lord with which they are directly connected. These questions necessarily involve the conclusion to be arrived at concerning the trustworthiness of the list of names as forming an actual historical connection between Jesus and His ancestors according to the flesh.

Before these problems are dealt with, it would be well to consider the kind and degree of importance to be attached to the question at issue.

2. The As we see it, the only vital point at issue is the historical identity and good importance of the evangelists.

of the Issue (1) That Jesus had a line of ancestors by His human birth may be taken for granted. The tradition, universal from the earliest times among believers and granted by the bitter opponents, that He was connected by the line of David, may also readily be accepted. The line exact through which that connection is traced is, on general principles, of secondary importance. The fact is that, while natural sonship by David on the part of the Messiah was of vital importance to many Jewish inquirers, it failed of any very enthusiastic endorsement on the part of Jesus Himself (see the truly remarkable interview record in Mt 12:35-37). The expressions of Paul in this connection will be referred to later; at this point it is sufficient to say that physical kinship to David cannot be insisted upon as the only justification for his words.

(2) If, then, the purpose of the evangelists in having recourse to these lists is worth while, the question of their correctness need not even be raised. Unless some vital issue is involved, the supposition of a special inspiration to go behind lists currently accepted is gratuitous. No such issue seems to be presented here. The Davideic kinship of Jesus is essential to His messiahship, is independent of the lists which are used to justify it. This is preliminary to the actual discussion and need not prevent us from giving all due credit to lists which could not have been carelessly compiled or lightly used.

II. The Genealogies Separately.—(1) The construction and incorporation of Joseph's genealogical tree is, in the light of all the facts, peculiar, the primary consideration.

1. Peculiarities of Mt's (2) The artificial division into three groups of fourteen generations each.

The apparent defect in this arrangement as it actually stands (the third group lacks one member) is probably traceable to a defect of the LXX version of 1 Ch 1:53-54, which is reproduced in the Gr gospel (see Zahn, Intro to the NT, ET, 564, n. 4). This arrangement into groups is the more striking because it makes 14 generations from the captivity to Joseph where LXX makes 20 or 21, and because the first group of 14 is formed by the omission of three names. It is perfectly clear, therefore, that this artificial grouping is essential to the purpose of the evangelist.

(3) The insertion of the names of brothers, thus following the artificial historical lists and bastardizing the genealogy by including collateral lines.

(4) The inclusion of the names of women—a practice not only foreign but abhorrent to ordinary usage. This peculiarity is the more marked when we notice that these names introduce what would be considered serious blots in the family history of the Davideic house (see vs 5-7).

(5) The principle upon which the division into periods is constructed: (a) from Abraham to David; (b) from David to the Captivity; (c) from the Captivity to Jesus. Attention has repeatedly been called to the fact that this gives a definite historical movement to the genealogy. It involves the origin, the rise to power, the decay and downfall of the house of David (see Allen, ICC, "Matthew," 2; of Zahn, NT, ET, I, 555).

Of the many theories which have been constructed to explain the foregoing six peculiarities of the genealogy of Mt, altogether the most satisfactory is that of Professor Zahn. The contention is that the list was Foregoing to be not to prove the natural connection of Jesus with the house of David—a fact which no one doubted—but to defend the one vital point where attack had been made namely, the legitimacy of Jesus' connection with David. No one seems to have questioned that Jesus was born of Mary and was closely connected with the royal house. The question was whether He was of legitimate birth. It was charged—and the slander which was very early in origin and circumstantial in character obtained an extraordinary hold upon the hostile Jewish mind—that Jesus was the illegitimate offspring of Mary. The Gospel of Mt meets the challenge by a broad view of the movement of the history from Abraham to the Messiah in the form of a genealogy of Joseph, who in the light of all the facts concerning the origin of Jesus marries Mary and gives her the protection. of his stainless name and royal lineage. The extraordinary boldness and brilliancy of this apologetic method ought not to be overlooked. The formal charge that Jesus is son of Mary, not of Joseph (this admission and judgment involved is refuted by bringing Joseph forward as a witness for Mary. Nothing could have been more natural for a man fearless in the confidence of truth; nothing could have been more impossible for one insecure in his hold upon the facts. So far as the genealogy is concerned, just the moment we realize that the purpose is not to prove the natural sonship of Jesus to David, but to epitomize the history, all hestancy and apprehension concerning the historicity of the successive names disappear. The continuity of blood relationship through these successive generations becomes of no essential importance. Zahn’s explanation (the argument in full should be read by every student), simple in itself, explains all the facts, as a key fits a complicated lock. It explains the choice of genealogy as a method of epitomizing history and that genealogy Joseph’s, the artificial grouping at the expense of changing the traditional lists, the inclusion of the names of brothers and of women.

1. The use of Joseph’s genealogical tree on the part of one who is so deeply interested in Mary.

2. The reversal of order in going about.

3. Peculiar—back from Joseph to his ancestors.

4. The exception—of Lk’s.

5. Godet emphasizes the fact that, in the Genealogy of the case, a genealogy follows the order of succession, each new individual being added to the role of his family. Luke’s method indicates that his genealogy has been constructed for a special purpose.

(1) The genealogy of the line back of the history of the covenant, which begins with Abraham, to Adam, who represents the race in general. This fact, together with another, that the line of Joseph is traced to David through Nathan who was not David’s heir, proves that Luke was not concerned with establishing the Davidic standing of Jesus.

(2) The placing of the genealogy, not at the beginning of the Gospel, but at the beginning of the ministry, between the baptism and the temptation.

(3) The omission of the article before the name of Joseph.

(4) In his comment upon the fourth peculiarity enumerated above, namely, the placing of the genealogy at the beginning of the ministry, Godet says (Genealogy of the 126) has this to say: “In crossing the threshold of this new era, the sacred historian casts a general glance over the period which thus reaches its close, and sums it up in this document, which might be called the mortuary register of the earlier humanity.” In other words, in connecting the genealogy directly with the ministry, Luke exhibits the fact that his interest in it is historical rather than antiquarian or, so to say, genealogical. As Matthew summarizes the history of the covenant people from the days of Abraham by means of the genealogical register, modified so as to make it graphic by its uniformity, so Luke has written the story of the humanity Jesus, as the Second Adam, came to save, by the register of names summarizing its entire course in the world. It has recently been commented upon that genealogical lists such as those of Gen and the NT are not infrequently used to convey ideas not strictly germane to the matter of descent or the cognate notion. The choice of Genealogies summarizing their entire course in the world, as to the longevity of the patriarchs are of historical interest only—they are not and could never have been of value for chronological purposes (see Warfield, “Antiquity and Unity of Human Race,” Princeton Review, February, 1911).

(2) In commenting upon the order which Luke adopts, Godet (who has thrown more light upon this portion of the Gospel than anyone else) says: “The new form of ascending genealogy can only be that of a private instruction involved in the use of the public document with a view to the particular individual whose name serves as the starting-point of the whole list” (127).

(3) From the fact that the name of Joseph is introduced without an article, Godet draws three conclusions: (a) that this name belongs rather to the sentence introduced by Lk; (b) that the genealogical document which he consulted began with the name of Heli; (c) and consequently, that this piece was not originally the genealogy of Jesus or of Joseph, but of Heli (ib. 128).

(4) (a) The importance of these considerations is twofold. In the first place it indicates that Luke is bringing together two separate documents, one of which contained a statement of the foster-fatherhood of Joseph, while the other contained the genealogy of Heli, between whom and Joseph there existed a relationship which made Luke desirous of connecting them. (b) In addition, the absence of the article serves to draw attention to something exceptional in the relationship of Joseph to the other end of this ancestral line which is brought into connection with his name. To this point we shall recur later. We have an explanation for all the suggested problems except one, and that one, in a sense, the most difficult of all, namely, the choice of Joseph’s genealogy.

III. The Genealogies Compared. In order, however, to discuss this question intelligently, we must turn our attention upon the same.

1. Divergent inquiry—through the relationship between the two lists.

(1) The most notable fact here is of course the wideness of the divergence together with the contrariety and unintelligible fact of minute correspondence. Between Abraham and David the two lists agree. Between David and Joseph there is evident correspondence in two (see Mt 1 12; Lk 3 27), and possible correspondence in four names (that of Lk [Mt 3:12] and Ahud [Mt 3:13] Lk 3 30] are the same). This initial and greatest difficulty is of material assistance to us because it makes one conclusion certain beyond peradventure. The two lists are not divergent attempts to perform the same task. To what remain we may turn to a consideration of this difficulty. It is impossible that among a people given to genealogies two lists purporting to give the ancestry of a man in the same line could diverge so widely. There is, therefore, a difference between these lists which includes the purpose for which they were compiled and the meaning which they were intended to convey.

(2) Two of the most striking points in the lists as they stand may be brought into connection and made to explain each other. The two lists coincide in the names of Zerubbabel and Shealtiel—they differ as to the name of Joseph’s father, who is Jacob according to Mt and Heli according to Lk. As to the second of these two important items this must be clear. Either these two lists are in violent contradiction, or else Joseph was in some sense son of both Jacob and Heli. Now, in connection with this seeming impossibility, turn to the other item. The names of Shealtiel and Zerubbabel belong to the captivity. They are being common to both lists is easily explained by the fact that during that troubled period a number of collateral family branches might be narrowed down to one or two common representatives (see Zahn, op. cit. 535).

In the NT genealogies Zerubbabel is the son of Shealtiel—according to 1 Ch 3 19 he is the nephew of Shealtiel and the son of Pedahiah. He is, therefore, at one and the same time heir and, legally, son of two men and would appear as such on two collateral lists.

STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA Geneal. of Christ

Shealtiel himself appears in Mt 1:12 as the son of Jeroham (v. 37) as the son of Ner. In 1 Chr 3:17 he appears as son of Jechoniah. The same of Ner is peculiar to Lk, so that we cannot check his use of it and discover the actual parentage of Shealtiel. His appearance in two lists with a double reference of parentage seems, at first sight, to be misleading.

Besides this, a reasonable explanation at once appears. In Mk 1:6 it is asserted that Jesus should have "not to sit upon the throne of David." and of his son (Jehoachin, Jechoniah, Coniah) it is said (Jer 22:30), "With his head I anointed and brought him to the throne." 2:4, "I have rebuked him and not yielded him to the Son of Man." 11:30, etc. has been rightly pointed out (see HDB, II, 557) that this means simply legal possession. not actual chilnessness. It suggests, however, that it might be thought necessary to provide in the genealogy an heir not of their blood for the two disgraced and proscribed members of the royal house. In view of these facts the contradictory references as to Joseph's parentage present no difficulty.

Joseph may easily have been and undoubtedly was, legally, son and heir of both Jacob and Hel. Godet's objection to this is based on the supposition that Heli and Jacob were brothers, which leaves the divergence beyond these two names unexplained. It is evident, however, that the kinship between Jacob and Heli might have been much more distant than this supposition can imply.

(3) When we come to explain how it happened that Joseph was connected with both these lines and that Mt chose one list and Lk the other we are necessarily shut up to conjecture. There is one supposition, however, which is worthy of very careful consideration because it solves so many and such difficult problems. The authorities have been divided as to whether Lk's genealogy is Joseph's, as appears, or Mary's. Godet makes a strong showing for the latter, and after this has been shown and if contra, some of his representations remain unshaken (cf Godet and Plummer sub loc.). Most of the difficulties are removed at once stroke, and the known facts harmonized, by the simple supposition that Lk has given us the meeting-point of the lineage both of Joseph and Mary who are akin. This explains the apparent choice of Joseph's list; the peculiar position of his name in that list; the reversal of the order; the coincidences and discrepancies are either to Mt's; the early tradition of Mary's Davidic origin; the strange reference in the Talm (Haggadah 77 4) to Mary as the daughter of Heli; the visit of Mary with Joseph to Bethlehem at the time of the registration; the traditional discrepancy between Joseph of Mary, and at the same time (apparently) Joseph disappears from the scene before Jesus reaches maturity. Against this nothing of real weight can be urged (the kinship with Elisabeth is not such: see Edereshe, LTJM, I, 149) except that it is too simple and too felicitous. Its simplicity and felicitous adjustment to the whole complex situation is precisely its recommendation. And there we may let the matter rest.

IV. The Genealogies and the Virgin Birth. — We have now to discuss the interpretation of the genealogies of the virgin-birth statement which forms the vital center of the infancy narratives and to the general question of the Davidic origin of Jesus. See Virgin Birth.

The first part of this question may be most directly approached by a brief consideration of the text of Mt 1 16. The text upon

1. Text, of which RV is based reads: "And Jacob Mt 1:16 begat Joseph the husband of Mary, of whom was born Jesus, who is called Christ." But in the other readings, one contained in the so-called Ferrar group of MSS, and the other in the Sinaitic which, differing among themselves, unite in ascribing the parentage of Jesus to Joseph. This has been seized upon by negative critics (see for list and discussion Machen, Princeton Review, January, 1906, 61; of Bacon, HDB, art. 'Genealogy of Jesus,' in Jour. Theol., January, 1911, who long ago gave in his advocacy to the supposed that the evangelists could easily reconcile the supernatural birth with the actual paternity of Joseph) to support the idea of a primitive Christian tradition that Joseph was the father of Jesus. Of this contention Zahn leaves nothing, and concludes his argument with this statement: "The hope of finding indications in old MSS and VSS that the authors of lost Gospels for brief reasons, which were in Christianity in our Mt and Lk regarded Joseph as the physical father of Jesus, should at least be dismissed. An author who knew how to make even the dry material of a genealogy to its least detail contribute to the purpose of his thought concerning the slandered miracle of the Messiah's birth, cannot at the same time have taken over statements from a genealogy of Joseph or Jesus used by him which directly contradicted his conception of this fact. Any text of Mt which contained such statements would be condemned in advance as one altered against the author's interest!" (op. cit., 567). It is interesting to note that Allen (ICC, "Matthew," 8), starting from the extreme position that the Sinaitic form of the statement, or the extant texts, reached the original, reaches the same conclusion as Zahn, that Matthew's Gospel from the beginning taught the virgin birth.

(1) It is clear, therefore, from the general trend as well as from specific statements of both Gospels, that the genealogies and the birth:

2. General narratives were not floating traditions.

Conclusions which accidentally touched and coalesced in mid-stream, but that they were intended to weld inseparably the two beliefs that Jesus was miraculously conceived and that He was the heir of David. This could be done only on the basis of Joseph's genealogy, for whatever the lineage of Mary, Joseph was the head of the family, and the Davidic connection of Jesus could only be established by acknowledgment of Him as legal son by Joseph. Upon this basis rests the common belief of the apostolic age (see Zahn, ib, 567, note references), and in accordance with it all statements (such as those of Paul, Rom 1 3; 2 Tim 2 8) must be interpreted.

(2) For it must be remembered that, back of the problem of reconciling the virgin birth and the Davidic origin of Jesus, lay the far deeper problem—to harmonize the incarnation and the Davidic origin. This problem had been presented in shadow and intimacy by Jesus Himself in the question: "David himself calleth him Lord; and whence is he his Son?" It is further to be noticed that in the announcement (Lk 1 32) the promised One is called at once Son of God and Son of David, and that He is the Son of God by virtue of His conception by the Spirit—leaving it evident that He is Son of David by virtue of His birth of Mary. With this should be compared the statement of Paul (Rom 1 3): He who was God's Son was "born of the seed of David according to the flesh, and declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the Spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead."

This is at least the most suggestive of Lk's (Birth of Christ, 119, with note, p. 121), for it indicates that as Paul and Luke were in very close sympathy as to the person of Our Lord, so they are in equally close sympathy as to the mystery of His origin. The understanding of the early church as to the Davidic origin of Jesus is closely paralleled by its equally firm conviction as to His supernatural derivation. The meeting-point of these two beliefs and the resolution of the matters of their relationship is in the genealogies in which two widely diverging lines of human ancestry, representing the whole process of history, converge at the point where the new creation from heaven is introduced.

LITERATURE.—The lit. on this subject is very copious.

the reader to more extensive investigations. The whole situation is well summarised by Flummer (ICC, "Luke,

GENERAL, Jen'ér-al, GENERALLY, Jen'ér-al-i (גֵּרֵנֵי, לְקָדוֹשׁ, נְגוּיִים, פָּנָּגְיוּרִים):

(1) General is the tr of seor, "master," "head," "chief," used once in AV in the sense of commander-in-chief, "the general of the king's army" (1 Ch 27 34), usually in this connection tr'j "captain," RV "the captain of the king's host." (2) As an adj. "general assembly" is the tr of pndgirius (whence we have panegyric), "an assembly or convocation of the whole people to celebrate any public festival or solemnity, as the public games or sacrifices, hence a high festival, public convocation, joyful assembly" (Robinson); the word occurs in the NT only in reference to the "general assembly and church of the firstborn"; pndgirius is LXX for οἰκοδομή (Ezk 46 11; Hos 2 11), "solemn assembly," and for ἀγάλμα (Am 5 21), with the same meaning. The Gs words ἀγάλμα and to an innumerable company of angels, to the general assembly and church of the firstborn" (AV) have been variously arranged and tr'; Robinson gives "and to countless throngs [even] the joyful assembly of angels, i.e. as hymning the praises of God around His throne"; cf Rev 5 11; Ps 148 2; Dnl 7 10). From both Heb and Gr analogies, this is probably correct; similarly, Alford, Delitzsch and others have "festival assembly"; Weymouth tr'j "to countless hosts of angels, to the great festal gathering and church of the first-born." (3) Generally, adv., occurs in Jer 48 38 AV as tr. of kdlkh (Pual of kdlkh), "the whole of it," "That there shall be lamentation generally [universally] upon all the housetops of Moab, RV every where," in 2 S 21 11, ❧יָסָפ 'יָסָפ 'יָסָפ 'יָסָפ 'יָסָפ 'יָסָפ 'יָסָפ' to be gathered," is tr'j "to be generally gathered," RV "gathered together." In Apoc we have "general" in the sense of "common," "universal" (Ad Est 16 10 m, koinon; 2 Macc 3 18, pandelmon); "in general" (2 Esd 8 16, "in all things in general," Ecc 11, "in general," koinos, RV "in common").

GENERATION, Jen-ér-a'shun (Lat generatio, from genero, "beget"): (1) The tr (a) of γενή, dγε, "circle," "generation," hence "age," "period," "cycle," "many generations" (Dt 32 7); (b) the people of any particular period or those born about the same time: "Righteous before me in this generation" (Gen 7 1); "four generations" (Job 42 16); (c) the people of a particular class or group: "of the Abba's, reference to hereditary quality; the wicked (Dt 32 5; Prov 30 11); the righteous (Ps 14 5; 112 2). (2) γενεalogía, υπογεγενεalogía, "births," hence (a) an account of a man and his descendants: "The book of the generations of Adam" (Gen 5 1); (b) successive families: The families of the sons of Noah, after their genealogy (Gen 10 32); (c) genealogical divisions: "The children of Reuben... their generations, by their families" (Nu 1 20); (d) fig. of the origin and early history of created things: "The generations of the heavens and of the earth" (Gen 2 4). (3) γενεο, geneo, "a begetting," "birth," "nativity," therefore (a) the successive members of a genealogy: "All the generations from Abraham unto David" (Mt 1 17); (b) a race, or class, distinguished by common characteristics, always (in the NT) had: "Faithless and perverse generation" (Mt 17 17); (c) the people of a period: "This generation shall not pass away" (Lk 21 32); (d) an age (the average lifetime, 33 years): "For [Gr 'from the'] ages and [from the] generations" (Col 1 26). The term is also by a figurative transfer of thought applied to duration in eternity: "Unto all generations for ever and ever" (Eph 3 21) (Gr "all the generations of the age of the ages"). (4) γενέσις, genesis, "source," "origin": The book of the generation of Jesus Christ (Mt 1 1; ARV "The genealogy of Jesus Christ"). (5) γενέσιον, geneon, "offspring," "progeny": figurative: "0 generation of vipers" (Lk 3 7 AV). (6) γενεα, genos, "stock," "race," in this case spiritual: "Be ye a chosen generation" (1 Pet 2 9; ARV "an elect race").

In the name the LXV it is called Περίτους, Genesis, because it recounts the beginnings of the world and of mankind. This name has passed over into the Vulv (Liber Genesis). As a matter of fact the name is based only on the beginning of the book.
case, 5 of the 10 pericopes are more closely combined, since I-V (t"odtb第）of Shem inclusive) stand in a more distant, and VI-X (treating of the t"odtb第）of Terah, or in a closer connection with the story of the kingdom of God: and in so far, too, as the first series of 6:9-11 may be regarded as background material for the division of the territory of Canaan, the second series more individuals and persons. Possibly in this case, we can further unite 2 t"odtb第; at any rate, it is very questionable whether any division of the parts: 14a-14b (Noah and his sons), VII-VIII (Ismael and Isaac), IX-X (Esau and Jacob) can be thus grouped.

(2) Further indication of unity. —In addition to the above-mentioned schematic disposition in the entire Bib. text of the Book of Gen, by preserving of any division into literary sources, it is to be noticed further, that in exactly the same way the history of those generations that were rejected from any connection with the kingdom of God is narrated before the history of those that remained in the kingdom of God and continued its development. Cain's history (4 17 ff) in J stands before the history of Seth (4 25 f J; 5 3 ff P); Japheth's and Ham's genealogy (10 1 f P; 10 8 ff P-J) before that of Shem (10 21 f J-P), although Ham was the youngest of the three sons of Noah (9 24); the further history of Lot (19 29 ff P-J) and of Ishmael's genealogy (25 12 ff P-J) before that of Isaac (25 19 f P-J+E); Esau's descendants (36 1 ff R-P) before the t"odtb第 (3 23 ff R-P).

In favor of the unity of the Bib. text we can also mention the fact that the Book of Gen as a whole, irrespective of all sources, and in view of the history that begins with Ex 1 f, has a unique character, so that e.g. the intricate connection with God, of the kind which is reported in the beginning of this Book of Gen (cf. e.g. 3 8; 7 16; 11 5 J; 17 12; 35 9.13 P; 18 1 f; 32 31 J), afterward ceases; and that in Ex, on the other hand, many more miracles are reported than in the Priest-period. Genesis contains rather the history of mankind and of families, while Ex contains that of the nation (see I above); that it is only in Ex that the law is given, while in the history of the period of the patriarchs we find only promises of the Divine grace; that all the different sources ignore the time that elapses between the close of Gen and the beginning of Ex; and further, that nowhere else is found anything like the number of references to the names of persons in J as a whole, contained in Gen (cf. e.g. 2 23; 3 20; 4 1.25, etc. in J; 17 5.15.17-20, etc. in P; 21 9.17-31, etc. in E; 21 6; 37 36, etc. in J+J-E; 28 19, etc. in R; 49 8.16.19, etc. in the blessing of Jacob); that the changing of the names of Abraham and Sarah is still preserved in J and 17 f; while Gen 24 contains the names of Reuben, Judah, and Joseph, etc. In addition a peculiar style, as also distinct theological views, is claimed for each of these sources. Thus there is found in P a great deal of statistical and systematic material, as in 6 1 ff; 13 10 ff; 25 12 ff; 36 6 ff (the genealogies of Adam, Shem, Ishmael, Esau); P is said to show a certain preference for fixed schemes and for repetitions in his narratives. He rejects all sacrifices earlier than the Mosaic period, because according to this source, God did not reveal himself as Jeh before Ex 6 f. Again, it is claimed that E describes God as speaking to men from heaven, or through a dream, and through an angel, while according to J Jeh is said to have conversed with mankind personally. The second Elohist, in the peculiarities of language used by the different sources, it is impossible in this place to enumerate the different expressions, and we must refer for this subject to the different Introductions to the OT, and to the commentaries and other literature.

A few examples are to be found under (c) below, in connection with the discussion of the critical hypothesis. Finally, as another reason for the division of Gen into different sources, it is claimed that the different parts of the sources, when taken together, can be united into a smooth and connected story.
The documents, it is said, have in many cases been taken over word for word and have been united and interwoven in an entirely external manner, so that it is still possible to separate them and often to do this even down to parts of a sentence or to the very words.

(c) Examination of the documentary theory: (a) Style and peculiarities of language: It is self-evident that certain expressions will be repeated in historical, in legal, and in other sections similar in content, but this is not enough to prove that there have been different sources. Whenever J brings genealogies or accounts that are not less systematic than those of P (cf 4 17 ff; 10 8 ff; 22 20–24); or accounts and repetitions occur in the story of the Deluge (7 2 ff; 7 I; or 7 4; 8 5; 10 12), this is not enough to make the division into sources plausible. In reference to the linguistic peculiarities, it must be noted that the data cited to prove this point seldom agree. Thus, e.g. the vb. b'ra'a, "create," in Gen 1 1 is used to prove that this was written by P, but the word is found also in 6 7 in J. The same is the case with the word r'khush, "possession," which in 12 5; 13 6; 36 7 is regarded as characteristic of P, but in 14 16.21; 20 3 formed an expression in an OT whose composition and in 4 14 in J. In 12 5; 13 12a; 16 3; 17 8 it is said that 'er'khana'n, "land of Canaan," is a proof that this was written by P; but in chs 42, 44 ff; 47, 50 we find this expression in J and E, in Nu 33 30 ff; J (R); cf also Nu 33 40 (PR) where Nu 21 1–3 (JE) is quoted, etc. r'khush, "milk," is also called as a characteristic word of J in contrast to E (cf 16 ff); but in 16 3; 29 24.29 we find this word not only in P but in 20 14; 30 4.7.18; in E Mtn, "kind," is counted in the numbers of P (cf e.g. 11 ff); but in Dt 14 13.14.18 we find it in D; rather remarkably, too, in the latest find on the Deluge made by Hilprecht and by him ascribed to 2100 BC. Cf on this subject my book, Wider den Bann der Quellenerschließung, and Orr, POT. ch vi, sec. vi, and ch xx, sec. i; perhaps, too, the Concordance of Mandelkern under the different words. Even in the cases when the characteristic peculiarities claimed for the sources are correct, if the problem before us consisted only of words and expressions in the different sources, then by an analogous process, we could dissect and sever almost any modern work of literature. Particularly as far as the pieces are concerned, which are assigned to P, it is true, but far more that if the whole of the P-style and language are concerned, different throughout. Gen 1 is entirely unique in the entire OT. Ch 23 has been copied directly from life, which is pictured with exceptional fidelity, and for this reason cannot be claimed for any special source. The fact that the story of the introduction of circumcision in ch 17 in many particulars shows similarities to the terminology of the law is entirely natural. The same is true when the chronological accounts refer to a date to another and have a common form. Thus a certain character of a function, e.g. the case also in the chronological parts of any modern history of Israel. On the other hand, the method of P in its narratives, both in matter and in form, becomes similar to that of J and E, just as soon as we have to deal with larger sections; cf 28 1 ff; 35 9 ff; 47 5 ff, and all the more in Ex and Nu.

Against the claim that P had an independent existence, we must mention the fact of the unevenness, which is not only not denied but is marked in the accounts in chs 1, 17 and 23, of the genealogies and the story of the Deluge, would, according to the critics, have reported only a few disputed notices about the patriarchs; cf for this in the story of Abraham, 11 27.31 ff; 12 41 ff; 13 6.11.12a; 16 3a.13.15 ff; 19 29; 21 15.23–5; 25 7–11a; and in its later parts P would become still more incomprehensible on the assumption of the critics (see III below). No author could have written thus; at any rate he would not have been used by anybody, nor would there have been such care evinced in preserving his writings.

(b) The alleged connection of matter: The claim that different sources, as they have been separated by critics, constitute a compact and connected whole is absolutely the work of imagination, and is in conflict with the facts in almost every instance. The hypothesis cannot be applied, even in the case of the characteristic examples cited to prove the correctness of the documentary theory, as the story of the Deluge (see III, 4, in each case under [2]).

(v) The biblico-theological data: The different Bib. and theological data, which is said to be characteristic in proof of the separation into sources, are also misleading. Thus God in J communes with mankind only in the beginning (Gen 2; 7 16 ff; 11 5; 18 f), but not afterward. In the beginning He does this also, according to P, whose reception of Genesis generally is entirely transciental (cf 17 1.22; 35 9.13). The mediatorship of the Angel of Jah is found not only in E, (21 17, 'Elbim), but also in J (16 7.9–11). In 22 11 in E, the angel of Jah (not of the 'Elbim) calls from heaven; theophanies in the night or during sleep are found also in J (cf 16 12 ff; 26 24; 28 13–16; 32 27). In the case of P, the cultus-theory, according to which it is claimed that this source does not mention any sacrifices before Ex 6 1 ff, is untenable. If it is a fact that the theology, as far as P is concerned, it would, on the other hand, be all the more remarkable that in the story of the Deluge the distinction between the clean and the unclean (7 2 ff) is found in J, as also the savour of the sacrifice, with which it is connected. The offering of sacrifices is often in P (of Gen 8 21 with Nu 15 3.7.10.13 f; 24; 18 17), that the sacrifices are mentioned in 8 20 ff, and the number 7 in connection with the animals and days in 7 4; 8 8.10.12 (cf in P, e.g. Lev 8 33; 13 5 f; 21.26.31.33.50.54; 14 8.13.8; 14 7.51; 16 14 f; Nu 28 11; 29 8, etc), further, that the emphasis is laid on the 40 days in 7 4.12.17; 8 6 (cf in P, Ex 24 1–8; Lev 12 2–4; Nu 13 25; 14 34), all of which are ascribed, not as we should expect, to the Levitical P, but to the prophetic J. The document P, which is not too large a number of critics, was written during the Exile (see e.g. Leviticus, III, 1, or Ezekiel II, 2) in a most surprising manner, instead of giving prominence to the person of the high priest, would then have declared that kings were to be the greater blessings to come to the seed of Abraham (17 6.16); and while, on the critical assumption, we should have the right to expect the author to favor particularistic tendencies, he, by bringing in the history of all mankind in the first place, and the history of the full genealogies and sacrifices to strangers (17 12.23), would have displayed a phenomenal universality. The strongest counter-argument against all such minor and incorrect data of a Bib. and a theological character will always be found in the uniform religious and ethical spirit and world of thought that pervaded all these sources, as also in the unity in the accounts of the different patriarchs, who are pictured in such a masterly, psychological and consistent manner, and who could never be the result of an accidental working of the mind that summarizes different and independent sources (see III below).

(5) Duplicates: In regard to what is to be thought of the different duplicates and contradictions, see below under III, 2, in each case under (2).

(6) The manner in which the sources are worked together: But it is also impossible that these sources could have been worked together in the manner in which the critics claim that this was done. The more arbitrarily and carelessly the redactors are thought to have gone to work in many places in removing contradictions, the more incomprehensible becomes it that they at other places report faithfully such contradictions and permit these to stand side by side, or, rather, have placed them thus. And even if they are thought not to have smoothed over the difficulties anywhere, and out of reverence for their sources, not to have omitted or changed any of these reports, we certainly would have a right to think, that even if they would have perchance placed side by side narratives which express the story as there entertained to be, e.g. in the story of the Deluge in P and J, they certainly would not have woven these together. If, notwithstanding, they still did this without harmonizing them, why are we asked to believe that at other places they omitted matters of the greatest importance (see III, 2, 3)? Further, J and E would have worked their materials together so closely at different places that a separation between the two would be an impossibility, something that has not been acknowledged as a fact by the OT scholars yet, notwithstanding, the contradictions, e.g. in the history of Joseph, have been allowed to stand side by side in consecutive verses, or have even intentionally been placed thus (cf. e.g. Gen 37 25 ff.). Then, too, it is in the nature of things unthinkable that three originally independent sources for the history of Israel should have been separated, free currents down to the period after Moses, and that they could yet be dovetailed, often sentence by sentence, in the manner the redactor acknowledged as a fact. The entire hypothesis suffers shipwreck through those passages which combine the peculiarities of the different sources, as e.g. in Gen 20 18, which on the one hand constitutes the necessary conclusion to the previous statement in Gen 17, and on the other hand contains the name Jehovah; or in 22 14 ff., which contains the real purpose of the story of the sacrificing of Isaac from E, but throughout also shows the characteristic marks of J; or in Gen 39 1, where the so-called private person into whose house Joseph has been brought, according to J, is more exactly described as the chief of the body-guard, as this is done by E, in Gen 40 2.4. And when the critics in this passage appeal to the help of the redactor, this is evidently in order to shelve the example of a contradiction of the question. In ch 34, and esp. in ch 14, we have a considerable number of larger sections that contain the characteristics of two or even all three sources, and which accordingly furnish ample evidence for protesting against the whole theory.

(7) Criticism carried to extremes: All the difficulties that have been mentioned grow into enormous proportions when we take into consideration the following facts: To operate with the three sources such as we have them is an easy process; but if we accept the principles that underlie this separation into sources, it is an impossibility to limit ourselves to these three sources, as a goodly number of OT scholars would like to do, as Strack, Kittel, Oetli, Dillmann, Driver. The stories of the danger that attended the wives of the Patriarchs, as these are found in Gen 12 9 ff and in 26 1 ff, are ascribed to J, and the story as found in Gen 20 1 ff. E. But evidently two sources are not enough in these cases showing that similar stories are regarded as a proof that there have been different authors. Accordingly, we must claim three authors, unless it should turn out that these three stories have an altogether different signification, in which case they refer to three actual occurrences and may have been reported by one and the same author. The same use is made of the laughter in connection with the name Isaac in Gen 17 17; 18 12; 21 6, viz. to substantiate the claim for three sources, P and J and E. But since 21 9 E; 26 8 J also contain references to this, and as in 21 6JE, in addition to the passage cited above, there is also a second reference of this kind, then, in consistency, the critics would be compelled to accept six sources instead of three (Sievers accepts at least 5, Gunkel 4); or all of these references point to one and the same author who took pleasure in repeating such references. As a consequence, in some critical circles scholars have reached the conclusion that there are also such further sources as J and J, as also P and P which are not more distinguished from the others. Gunkel believes that the narratives in Gen were originally independent and separate stories, which can to a great extent be distinguished in the final form. But if J and E and P from this standpoint are no longer authors but are themselves, in fact, reduced to the rank of collectors and editors, then it is absurd to speak any more of distinct linguistic peculiarities, or of certain theological ideas, or of intentional uses made of certain names of God in J and E and P, not to say anything of the connection between these sources, except perhaps in rare cases. Here the foundations of the documentary theory have been undermined by the critics; and even Gunkel and other Reimarus or Gunkel or the other radical scholars intending to do such a thing. The manner in which these sources are said to have been worked together naturally becomes meaningless in view of such hypotheses. The schism between the sources, if consistently applied, will end in splitting the Bible text into atoms; and this result, toward which the development of OT criticism is inevitably leading, will some day cause a sane reaction; for through these methods scholars have deprived themselves of the possibility of explaining the blessed influence which these Scriptures, so accidentally compiled according to their view, have achieved through thousands of years. The success of the Bible as a religious book, as a religion-concealing a religious point of view, becomes for the critic a riddle that defies all solutions, even if all dogmatical considerations are ignored.

(2) Rejection of documentary theory in view of the names for God.—(a) An error of the hypothesis in principle: The names of God, Jehovah and Elohim, constituted for Astruc the starting-point for the division of Gen into different sources (see 1 above). Two chief sources, based on the two names for God, could perhaps inspire a theory and should be regarded as acceptable. If we add that in Ex 6 1 ff, in P, we are told that God had not revealed Himself before the days of Moses by the name of Jehovah, but only as "God Almighty," it seems to be the correct thing to separate the text, which reports concerning the times before Moses and which in parts contains the name Jehovah, into two sources, one with Jehovah and the other with Elohim. But just as the traditional view also made of the two names of God proves that there were three and not two sources, as is done from Gen 20 on, the conclusive ground for the division falls away. The second Elohist (E), whom Igen was the first to propose (see above), in which it is claimed that E was written. In the case of P the rule, according to which the name Elohim is said to have been used for the pre-Mosaic period, and the reason for the omission of Jehovah would have been an entirely different one. Then, too, it would not be entirely impossible that he might have avoided the use of the name Elohim. The word Elohim is connected with a root that signifies "to fear," and characterizes God from the side of His power, as this, e.g., seen at once in Gen 1. Jehovah is splendidly interpreted in Ex 3 14 f., and the word is connected with the archaic form hādōh for hādāh, "to be," and the word characterizes God as the being who at all times continues to be the God of the Covenant, and who, according to Gen 1 1-2 3, even from Gen 12 on He, for the time being, enters into a special relation to Abraham, his family and his people, and by the use of the combined names Jehovah-Elohim is declared to be the God who created the world, as e.g., this is also done in the section Ex 7 8-13 16, where, in the 10 plagues, Jehovah's omnipotent power is revealed (cf Exodus, II, 2, 2); and in 9 30 it is charged against Pharaoh and his courtiers that they have not yet fear Jehovah-Elohim, i.e., the God of the Covenant, who at the same time is the God of the universe (cf also I K 8 21-37-39; Jon 4 6).

(b) The false basis for the hypothesis: But the basis of the whole hypothesis itself, viz. Ex 6 1 ff, is falsely regarded as much. If Jehovah had really been unknown before the days of Moses, as Ex 6 1 ff P is claimed to prove, how could J then, in so important and decisive a point in the history of the religious development of Israel, have told such an entirely different story? Or if, on the other hand, Jehovah was already known before the time of Moses, as we must conclude according to J, how was it possible for P all at once to invent a new view? This is all the more incredible since it is this author and none other who already makes use of the word Jehovah in the composition of the name of the mother of Moses, namely Jochebed (cf Ex 6 20 and Nu 26 59). In addition, we do not find at all in Ex 6 1 ff that God had before this revealed Himself as Elohim, but as 'El Shadday, so that this would be known not as an 'El Shadday but an 'Adhônây source for P on the basis of this passage (cf 17 1; 28 3; 35 11; 48 3 P—43 14 E! of also 49 25 in the blessing of Jacob). Finally, it is not at all possible to separate Ex 6 1 ff P from that which immediately precedes, which is taken from JE and employs the name Jehovah; for according to the text of P we do not know who Moses and who Aaron really were, and yet these two are in Ex 6 1 ff regarded as well-known persons. The new revelation of God in Ex 6 1 ff (P) by the side of 3 1 ff (JE and E) is also entirely defensible and rests on a good foundation; for Moses after the failure of Ex 5 needed such a renewed encouragement (see Exodus II, 2, 1). If this is the case, then the revelation of Jehovah in Ex 6 1 ff cannot mean that that name had before this not been known at all, but means that it had only been relatively unknown, i.e. that in the fullest and most perfect sense God became known only as Jehovah, while before this He had revealed His character only from certain sides, but esp. as to His Almighty Power.

(c) Improbability that the difference in the use of the names for God is without significance: In view of the importance which among oriental nations is assigned to names, it is absolutely unthink-and from this passage down to 37 2 the name is not found. It is accordingly clear that in the history of the patriarchs there is a gradual decrease in the number of times in which the name Jehovah obtained use. In the case of the monarchs, however, we note this is most noticeable and clearest in the history of Joseph, manifestly in order to make all the more prominent the fact that the revelation of God, beginning with Ex 3 1 ff, is that of Jehovah. These facts make the division of this text into three sources J, E, and P impossible.

(8) Selection of the names of God with reference to the approach of man to God and of his departure from God: The fact, further, that the approach of an individual to God or his departure from God could find its expression in the different uses made of the names of God is seen in the following. In connection with Ishmael and Lot the name Jehovah can be used only so long as these men stood in connection with the kingdom of the god through the relation to Abraham (cf 16 7.9.10,11,13 and 13 10; 19 13 f.16), but only the name Elohim can be used as soon as they sever this connection (cf 21 12.17. 19.20 and 19 29). On the other hand, Elohim is used in the beginning of the history of the Gentile Abraham (cf 11 17–25; 21 15); while afterward, when he has come into closer relations to the patriarchs, the name Jehovah is substituted (26 28. 29). A similar progression is found in separate narratives of the patriarchs themselves, since in 22 1 ff and ch 28 the knowledge of Elohim is exchanged for that of Jehovah (of 22 13.9 with 22 11.14.15.16, and 22 12 with 28 13.16).

(γ) Selection of the names for God for other reasons: Elohim can, further, in many cases be explained on the basis of an implied or expressed contrast, generally over against men (cf 22 8.12), and in the second of these two passages the fear of God is placed in contrast to godlessness); 30 2; 31 50; 32 21; cf with vs 4 and 8; 32 29; 35 5; or on the basis of an accommodation to the standpoint of the person addressed, as in 3 1–5 (serpent); 20 3. 3. 11.13.17; 33 6; 39 9 (Gentiles); or on the basis of grammar, as in 23 6; 33 3; 28 17.22; because the composition with the proper name Jehovah could be employed indefinitely (a prince of God, a camp of God, a Bethel or house of prayer); or finally in consequence of the connection with earlier passages (cf 6 1 ff with ch 1; 21 2.4; 28 3 ff; 36 9 with ch 17). A comparison of these passages shows that, on the whole, different reasons may have induced the author to select the name Elohim, e.g. 23 6; 28 12; 32 12.

(3) Systematic use of the names of God, particularly in the history of Abraham: That the names for God are systematically used is finally attested by the fact that in the history of Abraham, after the extensive use of the name Jehovah in its beginning (see above under [α]), this name is afterward found combined with a large number of other and different names; so that in each case it is Jehovah of whom all further accounts speak, and yet the name of Jehovah is explained, supplemented and made clear for the consciousness of believers by the new appellations, while the full revelation of His being indeed begins only in Ex 3 and 6 1 ff, at which place the different rays of His character that appeared in earlier times are combined in one brilliant light. The facts in the case are the following. In the story of Abraham, with which an epoch of fundamental importance in the history of revelation begins, we find Jehovah in 12 1 f. With the exception of ch 23, where a characteristic appellation of God is not found, and 25 1–11, where we can claim a declension in the conception of the Divinity (concerning 25 6; 26 21; see above [γ]+[α]), the name of Jehovah is retained in all of these stories, as these have been marked out (III, 2, 6); but beginning with ch 14 they do not at all use any longer only one name for God. We here cite only those passages where, in each case, for the first time a new name is found other than Jehovah (Ex 3 14, Jehovah; 14 19, Creator of heaven and of earth; 15 2, Adhônay; 16 7, the Angel of Jehovah; 16 18, the God that seeth; 17 1, El Shadday; 17 3, Elohim; 17 18, ha-Elothim; chs 18 ff, special relation to the three men (cf 18 2 and 19 1); 18 25, the Judge of the whole earth; 20 13, Elohim; 21 17, the Angel of God; 24 3, the God of heaven and the God of the earth; 24 12, the God of Abraham.

(e) Lack and weakness in the materials needed to prove the case: If we add, finally, that to prove the hypothesis we are limited to the meager materials found in Gen 1 1—Ex 6 1 ff; that in this comparatively small number of chapters, Gen 40 to Ex 2 cannot be utilized in this discussion (see above under [d] [e]); that all those passages, in which J and E are inseparably united must be ignored in this discussion; that all other passages in which J and E are often and rapidly interchanged from the very outset are suspiciously akin to begging the question; that Gen 20 18, which with its "Jehovah" is ascribed to H, is absolutely necessary for the proof of the preceding Elohim story; that in 21 33 with its "Jehovah" in J, on the other hand, the opening Elohim story from E, which is necessary for an explanation of the dwelling of Abraham in the south country, analogizes; that the name of Jehovah (23 4) is found in E; that 2 4 3 4 from J has besides Jehovah the name Elohim, and in 3 15–5 only Elohim (see above); that in 17 1; 21 1 P Jehovah is found; that 5 29, which is ascribed to J, is surrounded by portions of P, and contains the name Jehovah, and could be a borst, but in connection with ch 5 P, in reality in its proper place, as is the intervening remark (ver 24 P); that, on the other hand, in 4 25; 6 24; 7 9; 9 27; 39 9 Elohim is found—in view of all these facts it is impossible to see how a greater confusion than this could result from the hypothesis of a division of the sources on the basis of the use made of the names of God. And then, too, it is from the very outset an impossibility, that the Book of Genesis, as alone such an arbitrary selection of the names for God should have been made and nowhere else.

(f) Self-disintegration of the critical position: The modern critics, leaving out of consideration entirely their further dissection of the text, themselves destroy the foundation upon which this hypothesis was originally constructed, when Sievers demands for Gen 1 (from P) an original Jehovah-Elohim in the place of the Elohim now found there; and when others in Gen 18 f claim an original Elohim; and when in 17 1—21 1 the name Jehovah is said to have been intentionally selected by P.

(g) Different uses in the LXX: Naturally it is not possible to discuss all the pertinent passages at this place. Even if, in many cases, it is doubtful what the reasons were for the selection of the names for God, and even if these reasons cannot be determined with our present help, we must probably, nevertheless, not forget that the LXX in its tr of Gen in 49 passages, according to Bardenhewer's reckoning, and still more according to Wiener's, depart from the use of the names of God from the Heb original. Accordingly, then, a division of Gen into different sources on the basis of the different names for God cannot be carried out, and the argument from this use, instead of proving the documentary theory, has been utilized against it.

III. The Structure of the Individual Pericopes.—In this division of the article, there is always to be found (under 1) a consideration of the unity of the Bib. text and (under 2) the rejection of the customary division into different sources.

The conviction of the unity of the text of Gen and of the impossibility of dividing it according to different sources is strongly confirmed and strengthened by the embarrassment of the efforts to do so. Here, too, we find the division on the basis of the typical numbers 4, 7, 10, 12. It is true that in certain cases we should be able to make such a division; but that would be at the initiative of the author to divide according to those numbers practically compels acceptance on our part, so that it would be almost impossible to ignore this matter without detriment, esp. since we were compelled to accept the same scheme of arrangement with the account in Ex (Exo 6: 9-25; Lev 26: 34-46; Deut 28: 39-58).

1. Structure of the Proemium (Gen 1: 1–2: 3)

The proemium is a general introduction to the whole biblical account of mankind. It is divided into four sections (vs 1:2; creation of chaos), we have the creation of the seven days with the Sabbath between (1: 1-26; 2: 1-3; 4: 1-24; 5: 1-26; 6: 9-29), the days of light; 2nd day, the air and water by the separation of the waters above and the waters below; 5th day, the dry land and the vegetation; 6th day, the land animals (in connection with this comes the account that there are two works on each day). We find Ex also divided according to the number seven (see Exo 6: 2; 11: 1; cf also Exo 12: 27; 23: 31–32, 37), and in Hebrew, as we have also the sevenfold reference to the Sabbath idea in Ex, and we see the sevenfold enumeration, (1) at the close of different sections, just as we find this here in Gen; and in Lev of chs 23, 25, 27; see Leviticus II, 2; 2: the VIII, IX, and appendix, 1: 1–24 P; 6: 9–29 (Gen 2: 36-31: 7). The ten תּוּרְדֹּחִים are found in Gen 2 4–50 26.

1. The תּוּרְדֹּחִים of the heavens and the earth (2 4–4: 26).

(2) The Biblical text.—(a) 2 4–25, Paradise and the first human beings; (b) 3 1–24, the Fall; (c) 4 1–16, Cain and Abel; (d) 4 17–26.

2. Structure the Canities, in seven members (see of the Ten under above) and Seth. The number תּוּרְדֹּחִים 4 appears also in 5 1–6 8 (see under 4), at the close of different sections.

11 27–35 11 (under 6). Evidently (a) + (b) + (c) + (d) are still more closely connected.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (11–2 4a P and 2 45–4 26).—Ch 2 does not contain a new account of creation, but the same order in the process of creative activity. This section speaks of animals and plants, not for their own benefit, but for the benefit of the man. The creation of the woman is only a further development of ch. 1. While formerly the critics divided this section into 2 4–26 J, they now cut it up into J and J (see under 11, 2; 24, 1-2), because, they say, the tree of life is mentioned only in 19 and 23, while in 1 7 and 3 3 the divine command is restricted to the use of knowledge of good and evil. But it is impossible to see why there should be a contradiction here, and just as little can we see why the two trees standing in the midst of the garden should have such a significant difference (cf 2 9; 3 3). It is further asserted that a division of J is demanded by the fact that the one part of J knows of the Fall (6 11–19), while the other does not, and this is of such a break in the development of mankind (4 17 ff). But the enterprise by the Cainites would certainly have passed over also to the Sethites (see also 6 2); and through Noah and his sons have been continued after the Deluge. Then, too, the fact that Cain built a city (4 17), and the fact that he became a fugitive and a wanderer (4 14), are not mutually exclusive: just as the beginnings made with agriculture (4 12) are perfectly consistent with the second fact.

2. The תּוּרְדֹּחִים of Adam (5 1–6 8).

(1) The Biblical text.—(a) 5 1–24, seven generations from Adam to Lamech (see under 1), and Judges 4: 24, four generations from Lamech to the oldest of men, Methuselah, down to the sons of Noah; (c) 6 1–4, intermingling of the sons of God and the sons of men; (d) 6 5–8, corruption of all mankind. Evidently at this place (a) + (b) and (c) + (d) correspond with each other.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (ch 5 P with the exception of 5: 32).—Ch 5 presupposes ch 1 P; as, on the other hand, the fact that the generations, that according to ch 5 P, had been the means by which the Lord had kept his covenant of sin, concerning which only J had reported in ch. 3. In this case of P, however, in 1 31 it is said that everything was very good.

3. The תּוּרְדֹּחִים of Noah (6 9–9 29).

(1) The Biblical text.—Seven sections (see 1 above) viz: (a) 6 9–22, the building of the ark; (b) 7 1–9, entering the ark; (c) 7 10–24, the increase of the Deluge; (d) 7 25–28, the flood; (e) 8 1–19, leaving the ark; (f) 8 22–9 17, declaration of a covenant relation between God and Noah; (g) 9 18–29, transfer of the Divine blessing upon Shem.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (7 1–5 7–10, 12 16, 17 22; 8 5, 6, 13 20, 22; 9 27 2, the rest from P).—In all the sources are found the ideas that the Deluge was the punishment of God for sin; further, the deliverance of the righteous Noah and his wife and three sons Shem, Ham and Japheth and their Posterity; the description of the announcement of the covenant relations between God and mankind after the Deluge; the designation of the Deluge with the names world-mercy and salvation; the announcement of the ark, which without a doubt stands in some connection with the Deluge, and the announcement of the ark, which in the Bible are only in P, as also the story of the sending out of the birds when the Flood was decreasing, and of the approval of the ark, which had been delivered, which in the Bible are said to be found only in P; and these facts are a very powerful argument against the division into sources. Further, in the case the critics were right, there would have contained nothing of the Biblical deluge of Noah in P, although he was a plious man; and in the case of J we should not find how the judgment was made on the ark, as in which Noah was directed to go (7 1 f); nor how he can already in 8 20 build an altar, as he has not yet gone out of the ark; and further, how the flood-water was dispersed, that He would not again curse the earth but would bless it, can be a comfort to him, since only P has reported concerning the blessing (9 1 f). Even if the distinction is not always clearly made between clean and unclean animals, and different numbers are found in the case of each (6 19 f; 7 14–16 P, over against 7 2 f J), yet this is to be regarded merely as a lack of exactness or, perhaps better, as a summary method of procedure. The difficulties are not even any made easier through the separation into sources, since in 7 5 f J both numbers and the distinction between the two kinds of animals are not found anywhere else, so that we find the name Elohim used. The next contradiction is that in the only one, namely that the Deluge according to J lasted only 40 days, and is arranged in weeks (7 11), while the length of the Deluge in P is made in 7 11 days, so that it is really a self-contradictory agony of the critics. The report of the Bible on the subject is perfectly clear. The rain proceeded from the skies, and the waters of the deep were kept back (7 11), and in this fact there lies the reason for believing that Noah did not remain more (7 24 P and 7 17, J). The 40 days in 6 5 J cannot at all be identified with those mentioned in 7 17; for if this were the case the raven would have been sent out at a time when the waters had reached their highest stage, and even according to J the Deluge covered the entire world. In general see above, II, 2, 1 (c) (v).

4. The תּוּרְדֹּחִים of the sons of Noah (10 1–11 9).

(1) The Biblical text.—(a) 10 2–5, the Japhethites; (b) 10 6–20, the Hamites; (c) 10 21–32, the Semites; (d) 11 1–9, the Bab confusion of tongues. Evidently (a) to (c) is to be regarded as a contrast to (d) of 11 1–9 J in addition to 10 32 P.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources (10 1–7, 20 17–20 31, the rest belonging to J).—The distribution of ch 10 between P and J is actually made in 10 1, and this case J does not speak of Japheth at all, and the genealogy of the Hamites would connect directly with P, a phenomenon which must have been the case in 24 17 ff. The Jewish Midr. in addition, and possibly correctly, counts 70 peoples (cf 46 27; Ex 1 5; Nu 11 36, 35; Lk 10 1).

5. The תּוּרְדֹּחִים of Shem (11 10–26): 10 generations (see under II, 1).

6. The תּוּרְדֹּחִים of Terah (11 27–11 11):
(1) The Biblical text.—After the introduction (11 27–32), the theme of the history of Abraham is given in 12 1–4a (ver 1, the promise of the holy land; ver 2, promise of many descendants; ver 3, announcement of the double influence of Abraham on the two sons of Isaac, the son of promise of Abraham’s faith in his trust upon the Divine promise). In contrast to the first three thoughts which characterize God’s relation to Abraham, the fourth is placed, which emphasizes Abraham’s relation to God (see under [d]). But both thoughts give complete expression to the intimate communion between God and Abraham. On the basis of these representations, which run through the entire story and thus contribute materially to its unification, this section can also be divided, as one of these after the other comes into the foreground. These four parts (12 4b—14 24; 15 1–18 15; 16 18–21 34; 22 1–25 11) can each be divided again into four subdivisions, a scheme of division that is found also in Ex 36 4–40 38; Lev 11–16; 16 (cf Exodus, II, 2, 7; Leviticus, II, 2, 3 and IV; Day of Atonement, I, 2, 1), and is suggested by Dt 12–26 (cf also my book, Wider den Bann der Quellenscheidung, the results of the investigation of which work are there reproduced with the help of the details of the argument): (a) 12 4b—14 24, in which the reference to the promised land is placed in the foreground; see 12 1, and the passages and statements in parentheses in the following: (a) 12 4b–8, Abraham’s journey to Canaan (vs 5, P, 7.8.3); (b) 12 9–13, descent to Egypt from Canaan, and return (12 9.10; 13 1–4f); (c) 13 5–18, separation from Lot (vs 6 P, 7.9 J, 12a P, 14.17.18 J); (d) 13 18, expedition against Chedorlaimer, etc (Abraham is blessed by the posterity of the country, and receives as homage from the products of the country bread and wine [vs 18 f], while he in return gives tithe [ver 20]). The division of this section (12 4b—14 24) is to be based on the similarity of the closing verses (12 8; 13 4; 13 18). (b) 15 1–18 15, unfolding of the promise of descendants for Abraham by this announcement that he is to have a son of his own; cf 12 2 and what is placed in parentheses in the following: (a) ch 15, birth of Ishmael (vs 14, 17 B, 17 E, 18 J, 18 R, 18 H, 18 P, 18 J; 13.14.16.18 J). The promise is not fulfilled through Eliezer, but only through an actual son (vs 3.4); (b) 16 1–16, Hagar gives birth to Ishmael as the son of Abraham. Hagar’s son, namely Ishmael, is not the genuine heir, notwithstanding the connection of 16 10 and 12 2 (cf 18 19–20 P); (c) ch 17 P, promise of the birth of Isaac given to Abraham (vs 2–17.21.19); (d) 18 1–15, Sarah also hears that Isaac is promised (vs 10.12–15). (c) 18 16–21 34, the double influence of Abraham on the world; cf 12 3 and what is in parentheses in the following: (a) 18 16–19 38, the pericope dealing with Sodom; (b) 18 16–33, Abraham’s petition for the deliverance of Sodom; (c) 18 11–15, the sin of the Sodomites, while Lot shows some of the ruder characteristics of Abraham; (d) 19 12–28, story of the destruction, in connection with which Lot receives the benefit of his relation to Abraham (vs 16.19.22 J); (e) Lot ceases to be a part of this history after this destruction; (f) 20 1–18, Abraham with Abimelech (vs 6, 8 E, 18 R, punishment; vs 7.17, intercession); (g) 21 1–21, Ishmael ceases to be a part of this history (vs 13.18; 20 E); (h) 21 22–34, Abraham’s agreement with Abimelech (the latter seeks Abraham’s friendship and security, vs 22.20); (i) 22 1–25 11 f, Abraham’s faith at its culminating point; cf 12 4a and what is in parentheses in the following: (a) 22 1–19, the sacrifice of Isaac (vs 2.12 E, 16.18 R); (b) 23, purchase of the place to bury the dead, which act was the result of his faith in the promised land; (γ) ch 24 is introduced by 22 20–24, which has no independent character. With the twelve descendants of Nahor the twelve sons of Jacob, the twelve of Isshmael (25 12 f; 17 20), and on the other side 12 Ex 21 18–30 10, with the Exod. II, 2, 17–7 7–17 Leviticus, II, 2, 1, and, under Ezekiel, I, 2, 2. Ch 24 itself contains the story of how a wife was secured for Isaac from among his relatives (the faith in the success of this plan is transmitted from Abraham to his servant); (e) 25 1–11, the sons of the concubine of Abraham (J+H) cease to be a part of this history; (f) transfer of the entire inheritance to the son of promise (J); burial in the ground bought for this purpose (J); (f) all of these concluding acts stand in close connection with Abraham’s faith. In reference to the force of the names of God in connecting Gen 11 27–25 11, see above under II, 2, 2 (d). (2) Rejection of the division into sources (11 27 31 f; 12 4b 6, 13 6a 11.12a; 16 1.3.15 f; 17 19–29; 21 18 26–9, 23 7 11a P) from an unknown source; 16 6; 18 4 6; 20 18; 20 19 10; 21 6 6.E; 18 4 6; all of the above is not accepted. Through the passages ascribed to P breaks are caused in the text of J (cf 15 12 f; 18 11, 24 [G uneven]. The latter conclusion is lacking in 18 1 (the reference of the pronoun); in 24 67 (Sarah’s death); in 25 1f (no mention of Abraham’s burial). On the other hand, the text of P in the text of J in 11 31 f; 12 4b; 16 15; 19 29. In the case of E we presuppose only the text of J, and, finally, the text of P, leaving out of consideration the larger sections (chs 17 and 23), is entirely too meager to constitute an independent document. We will here discuss also the so-called duplicates (see under II, 2, 1, a–c, 5). The different stories concerning the danger in which the wives of Abraham and Isaac were involved in 12 9 f f; 20 1 f E; 26 1 f J directly presuppose each other. Thus in 20 13 E Abraham regards it as a fact that such situations are often to be met with, and consequently the possibility of an occurrence of such an event could not have appeared so remarkable to an Oriental as it does to a modern critic; ch 26 1 suggests the story in 12 9 f f. The words used here also promise that the three stories in question did not originate independently of each other (cf 26 7; 20 5; 12 19–36 7; 20 11; 12 12–26 10; 20 9; 12 18–20 3; 20 1; 12 10 (gurt); as understood). The two biblical pericopes (ch 16 J+P–24 J) differ from each other throughout, and, accordingly, are surely not duplicates. The two stories of the conclusion of a covenant in chs 15 J and 17 P are both justified, esp. since in 17 7 the author speaks of an "establishment" of the covenant that was established in 15. Ch 17 P+18 1 f J are certainly intended to be pendants, so that it is impossible to ascribe them to different authors; cf the analogous beginning of the theophanies of Jehovah in 17 1 and 18 1 (even the pronoun referring to Abraham in 18 1 J, unless taken in connection with ch 17 P, is without any context), also the singing of Abraham and of Sarah (17 17; 18 12; see under II, 2, 1 [c] [5]), the promissiveness given to their age (17 17; 18 11 f and the designation of the time in 17 11; 18 10.14. Nor can we quote in favor of a division into sources the passage 21 14 f E, on the ground that Ishmael is described here as being on the shoulder of his mother and then thrown by her under a shrub, while according to the Bib. text he must have been 15 years of age. 16.18 E, 18 R, is the original does not say that he was carried on her shoulders; and in Mt 2:11 it is even said of adults that they were thrown down. On the other hand, also according to E, Ismael could not have been so small a child, for in 18 18 he is led by the hand, and according to ver 18 he ready mocks Isaac, evidently because the latter was the heir of the promise. Sarah’s age, too, according to ch 20 E, does not speak in favor of a division into sources. That she was still a beautiful woman is not claimed here.
Evidently Abimelech was anxious only for a closer connection with the powerful Abraham (cf 21 23). Then, too, all the sources ascribe an advanced age to Sarah (cf 21 6 J-E; 18 12ff; 17 17 P).

7. The tōdēḏoth of Ishmael (25 12–18): 12 princes descended from Ishmael (see under [d] [y]).

8. The tōdēḏoth of Isaac (25 19–35 29): The correct conception of the fundamental thought can be gained at once in the beginning of this section (25 22 f): Jeh's oracle to Rebekah, that the older of the twins, with whom she was pregnant, should serve the younger; also in Rom 9 10 ff with reference to Mal 1 2 f; and finally, the constant reference made to Esau in addition to Jacob until the former ceases to be a factor in this history in ch 36. Accordingly in the end everything is made dependent on the one hand on Jacob's election, notwithstanding his wrongdoings, on the other hand, on Esau's rejection notwithstanding his being the first-born, or in other words, upon the perfectly free grace of God; and all the different sources alike share in this fundamental thought. But in dividing between the different parts of this section, we must particularly draw attention to this, that in all of these parts both thoughts in some way or other find their expression.

(1) The Biblical text.—Containing 10 parts (see under II, 1), namely (a) 25 19–26, the birth of Esau and Jacob with the blessing of Isaac; (b) 25 27–34, Esau's marriage and loss of his birthright; (c) 25 1–5, Isaac receives the blessing of Abraham, which afterward is transmitted to Jacob, while Esau, through his marriage with heathen women, prepares the way for his rejection (vs 27); (d) 27 1–40, Jacob steals the blessing of the first-born; (e) 27 41–45, Jacob's flight out of fear of Esau's vengeance; (f) 27 46–28 9, Jacob is sent abroad out of fear of his brother's bad example; (g) 28 10–32 39, Jacob in a strange land and his fear of Esau, which is overcome in his contest of prayer in Peniel on his return; (h) 28 10–22, the ladder reaching to heaven in which he went abroad; (i) 29 1–30 43, twenty years with Laban (see 31 8); (j) 31 1–54, Jacob's departure from Mesopotamia; (k) 32 1–33, his return home; (l) ch 33, reconciliation with Esau, who returns to Seir (ver 16; cf 32 4), while Jacob becomes the owner of property in the Holy Land (vs 19 f); (m) 34 1–35 22, Jacob remains in this land, notwithstanding the slaughters made by his sons Simon and Levi (cf 31 29–30 5); the new appearance of God in Jacob, with a repetition of the story of the changing of Jacob's name, with which the story of Jacob's youth is closed, and which presupposes the episode at Bethel (cf 16 49–60 with 35 10 ff), and which is not in contradiction with the first change in the name of Jacob in ch 32 (of the twofold naming of Peter in Jn 1 43 and Mt 16 18). Esau is yet mentioned in ch 35 17, where there is a reference made to Jacob's flight before him; (j) 35 20–29, Jacob's sons as the bearers of the promise; while Esau is mentioned only as participating in Isaac's burial, but inwardly he has no longer any part in the history of the kingdom of God, as is seen from ch 36, and in 32 4; 33 16 is already hinted at. In this section, too, evidently there are groups, each of two parts belonging together, namely (a)+(b) describing the earliest youth; (c)+(d) in which Isaac plays a prominent part; (e)+(f) both of which do not exclude but supplement each other in assigning the motives for Jacob's flight; (g)+(h) Jacob's flight and reconciliation; (i)+(j) Jacob both according to family and dwelling-place as the recognized heir of the promise.

(2) Rejection of the division into sources.—As 25 29 ff (21 1–5 J-E; 21 16 P; 21 18; 25 6–9; 18 12ff; 25 6–30 43 are ascribed to F, it is clear that these are in part ridiculously small extracts, that we should look to him for a single source. The whole sojourn in Mesopotamia is ignored in P, according to the critics, except the brief notices of 24 28; 29 16. For these reasons the rest of the text cannot in many cases be dispensed with; e.g., we do not know in 25 26 who was born; nor in 26 34 who Esau was; nor in 29 24 who Laban was; nor in 29 24,29 what connection and for what purposes Laban and Rachel are mentioned. P makes no mention of any promise given to Isaac, which is, however, presupposed in 33 12 and later in Ex 20–23. It is connected with J (of 12 1–3, the blessing of Abraham, and ch 24). It is further impossible to assign to chs 25–27 the whole of the genealogy of the sons of Jacob which is given in ch 29 in the story of the birth of Jacob's children, which are said to be divided between the sources J and E.

9. The tōdēḏoth of Esau (36 1–37 1): In 7 divisions (see under 1), namely (a) 36 1–5 R, Esau's family; the different names for Esau's wives, as compared with 26 34ff; 28 7–9 P, are doubtless based on the fact that oriental women are apt to change their names when they marry, and the fact that these names are without further remark mentioned by the side of the others is rather an argument against the division into sources than for it; (b) 36 6–8, Esau's change of abode to Seir, which, according to P, 28 10, was a move made before Jacob's return. Only in case that Esau (35 29) would have afterward remained for a longer period in Canaan, could we think of a new separation in this connection. It is more probable that at this place all those data, which were of importance in connection with this separation are once more given without any reference to their difference in point of time; (c) 36 9–14, Esau as the founder of the Edomites (in ver 9 the word tōdēḏoth is repeated twice, while it only occurs once in Edom); (d) 36 15–18, the leading line of the sons of Esau; (e) 36 20–30, genealogy of the original inhabitants of the country, mentioned because of their close connection with Esau (cf ver 25 with ver 2); (f) 36 31–39, the elective kingdoms of Edom; (g) 36 40–43, the Edomites' chief line of descent, arranged according to localities. We have here accordingly geographic, genealogical, and not historical or genealogical, as in 36 15 ff. 20 ff (30); of also vs 40.43, for which reason we find also names of women.

10. The tōdēḏoth of Jacob (37 2–50 26):—

(1) The Biblical text.—The key to the history of Joseph is found in its conclusion, viz. in 50 14–21, in the confession of Joseph, in the light of his past, namely, that God has ended all things well; and in 50 22 ff, in his confidence in the fulfillment of the Divine promise in the lives of those God has chosen; of also Ps 105 16 ff. According to the two viewpoints in 50 14–26, and without any reference to the sources, this whole pericope (37 2–50 15) is divided into two halves, each of five subdivisions, or a total of ten (see under II, 1). In the exact demonstration of this, not only the contents themselves, but also regard for the different names for God will often render good service, which names, with good effect, are found at the close and in harmony with the fundamental thought of the entire section, viz. (a) 37 2–39 6, Joseph enters Potiphar's house (4 pieces, see under 6, 1, namely [a] 37 2–11, the hatred of the brethren, [b] 37 12–36, selling Joseph, [c] 38 1 ff, the Jehovah-displeasing conduct in the house of Judah, cf 37 7–10, [d] 39 1–6, Jehe's pleasure with Joseph, in comparison of [e]); (b) 39 6–23, Joseph is cast into prison, but Jehe was with him (vs 21–23); (c) 40 1–41 52, the exaltation of Joseph, which at the end esp. is shown by the naming of Ephraim and Manasseh as caused by God, but which for the present passes by the history of his family by pieces, viz. [a] 41, 1, interpretation of the dreams of the royal officials, [b] 41 1–36, interpretation of the two dreams of Pharaoh, [c] 41 37–49, the exaltation of Joseph, [d] 41 46–52, Joseph's activity for the good of the country; (d) 41 55–
47 7, Joseph comes to a blest end in the fulfillment of the promise of God to Jacob in Boezebbal, to be with him in Egypt in 46 2 fl with 46 6–9 (in four pieces, viz. [a] 41 53–57, the general famine, [b] 42 1–38, the first journey of the brothers of Joseph, who had been sold by Jacob, to Egypt; [c] 42 14–34, the reception by Joseph, [d] 43 1–17, final trial of the brethren, [iv] 44 18–34, the intercession of Judah; [v] 45 1–46 7, Joseph makes himself known and persuades Jacob to come to Egypt); (e) 46 8– 47 26, Joseph continues to be a blessing to his family and to Egypt (in 4 subdivisions, of which the 4th is placed in contrast to the 3rd exactly as this is done in 10 1–11 9 and 11 27–26 11, viz. [a] 46 8–27, list of the descendants of Jacob; [b] 28–34, journey with Joseph, 47 1–12, Jacob in the presence of Pharaoh, [c] 47 13–26, the Egyptians who have sold themselves and their possessions to Pharaoh land Joseph as the preserver of their lives). From this point on the attention is now drawn to the future: (f) 47 27–31, Jacob causes Joseph to take an oath that he will have him buried in Canaan (cf ver 30 J with ch 23 P); in (e) 1–7 there is also a designation for God, (g) ch 48, Jacob adopts and blesses Ephraim and Manasseh and also the emphasis is focused on the providential guidance of God in vs 8 f.11.15 f, esp. vs 16 and 20 f); (b) 49 1–27, Jacob blesses his 12 sons and proffesses their future fate (here, 49 18 appears the name of Jehovah, which had disappeared since the end of Jacob's career, under II, 4 2 (a) 48 11 and other designations for God, vs 24 f); (b) 49 28–33, Jacob's death after he had again expressed the wish, in the presence of all his sons, that he should be buried in Canaan; (j) 50 1–13, the body of Jacob is taken to Canaan. In these 10 pericopes again we can easily find groups of two each, viz. (a)+(b), Joseph's humiliation (sold, prison); (c)+(d), Joseph becomes a blessing to Egypt and to his family; (g)+(h), blessing of the grandchildren and the sons of Jacob; (b)+(j), Jacob's death and burial; here too the name of God is lacking as in (e) and (f).

(3) Rejection of the division into sources.—Here, too, the separation of P from the rest of the text as a distinct source is untenable, since in the section from ch 37 2– 44 24, after 37 2, only the following fragments are attributed to this source, viz. 41 46a, 46 f (according to some also to ver 27). In the same way P abruptly sets in at 47 5–27b, 49 286. Further, 48 3 f knows nothing of Ephraim or Manasseh, of whom P reports nothing, so that 50 13 f are the only verses that can naturally connect with the preceding statements of P. In 47 5 f P reports entirely in the manner of ordinary narrative and there is no sign of any systematic arrangement. But the separation between J and E cannot be carried out either, in the first place, when these two sources are actually separated by the critics, innumerable omissions in the story arise, which we cannot at all explain. The contradictions which are claimed to exist here are the products of the critics' imagination. It is claimed that according to E it is Judah who plays a prominent role, while according to E it is Reuben; but in 37 21 Reuben is mentioned by J, and the role played by Judah in 37 22, 23 is not paralleled by E at all. Why cannot both of these brethren have played a prominent role, and why does E have the same name with Simon, 42 1, and Benjamin, 42 13.30.32 ff.36.38, 43 3 ff, 44 14)? Just as little are the Midianites in 37 28.38 E and 37 27–28.39 1 misunderstood as merely exclusive or contradictory, since the Midianites in the Gideon story, too, in J 12, are described as being the same people (Gen 21 24 a), both in ch 37 and in Gen 21 31 f, while in 21 8 he was the captain of the bodyguard (40 31)]. But in this instance the documentary theory can operate only when it calls in the assistance of R in ch 39 1. The fact that in ch 39 1 the name of the nationality is placed first in that of the land is based on the ground of the contrast to the Ishmaelites who sold Joseph. Finally, the fact that in R the combination of the different sources in such a way that Benjamin in 43 8,9; 44 30.31.33 J is described as a boy, but in 46 2,5 he is an adult, P, this is placed entirely at the disposal of the author. But evidently the author of ch 46 has in view the tradition 70 (cf ver 27; see Ex 1 5; Nu 11 16.39; 1K 10 1; Ex 27, 1312; Jgs 12 9) and for this reason, e.g. in ver 17, he mentions only one granddaughter of Joseph, and for this reason one of the descendants of Jacob, even those who were born later in Egypt, but who already, as it were, had come to Egypt in the lines of their fathers, are left out of the story of the author. It certainly would be remarkable if no more grandchildren of Joseph were known since Nu 26 does not mention a single son of any of the sons of Jacob later than those reported in Gen 46. In 46 27 Joseph's sons, too, who were born in Egypt, are included in the list, entirely in harmony with Dt 10 22. For such an arrangement and adjustment of a genealogy of the 3 x14 generations in Mt 1, from this point of view no conclusions, as far as the documentary theory is concerned, can be drawn from the ten sons of Benjamin.

IV. The Historical Character.—(1) Unfounded attacks upon the historical character.—(a) Proofs from general dogmatic principles: In order to dispose the historical character of the patriarchs, the critics are accustomed to operate largely with general dogmatic principles, but as this, that no nation knows who its original founder was. In answer to this it can be said that the history of Israel's is and was from the beginning to the end unique, and cannot be judged by the average principles of International Ethnology. But it is then claimed that Abraham's entire life appears to be only one continuous trial of faith, which was centered on the one promise of the true heir, but that this is in reality a psychological impossibility. Over against this claim we can in reply cite the contrary facts from the history of several thousands of years; and that, too, in the experience of those very men who were most prominent in religious development, such as Paul and Luther.

(b) Argument based on the time that elapsed between these events and their records: Secondly, critics emphasize the long period of time that elapsed between these events themselves and their first records, esp. if these records can be accredited to so late a period as the 9th or the 8th historical period (Isa 29 22; 41 8; 51 1 ff; Mic 7 20; Jer 33 26; Ezek 33 24; and possibly Mal 2 15); then Isaac (Am 7 9.16; Jer 33 26); also Jacob (Hos 12 3 f; Am 8 9; Jer 33 20); also Joseph (Gen 5 16.15); and these events evidently thought that these events and persons were regarded as historical by the people in general. In the NT we can cite, for Abraham, Mt 3 9; Gal 3 21 f; Rom 4 9 f; 9 7 f; He 7 1 f; 11 8 f; Jas 2 21 f, and esp. the words of Jesus in Mt 22 22 f; 3 53 f; finally in Mt 22 31 f, the whole argument for the resurrection of the dead is without a foundation if the patriarchs are not historical personalities. Over against this, there was no period in the history of Israel in which it can be shown that these stories of Gen were regarded only as myths. If these events were written down after the patriarchs' experiences were so unique that these experiences were not forgotten for a long time. Then, too, we can also refer to the strength of the memory of those nations that were not accustomed to have written records of their ancestors.

(c) Proofs from the Bible itself: Finally, the attempt has been made to discover in the Bible itself a pre-Mosaic stage in its ideas in man concerning God, which is claimed to contradict the higher development of the divine ideas, for the purpose of the critics appeal to Ex 23:35; 20:7; Josh 24:14 ff. But at these places it is evident that the idolatry of the people is pictured as apostasy. And when in Ex 6:2 ff. the name of Jeh is as a matter of fact represented as something new, it is nevertheless a fact that in these very passages the revelation given is connected with the history of the patriarchs. The same is true of Ex 3:1 ff. The whole hypothesis that the religion before the days of Moses was polytheistic has not been derived from the Bible, but is interpreted into it, and ends in doing violence to the facts there recorded (cf my book, Die Entwicklung der alttestamentlichen Gottsidee in vorzöllischer Zeit).

6. 7 ff. With the religion of Arabia: The critics further compare the pre-Mosaic religion of Israel with the low grade of religion in Arabia in the 5th cent. after Christ; but in order to do this, they must isolate Israel entirely, since all the surrounding nations of the time of the Amarnian tablets attained to an altogether different and higher stage of religious development and civilization.

(2) Unsatisfactory attempts at explaining the patriarchal age.—(a) The explanation based on the "Incarnation ... and character of the patriarchs in Gen, the critics are forced to contrive some scheme in explanation of the existence of these stories, but in doing this they make some bad breaks. Thus, e.g., they say that the Israelites when they entered Canaan found there the high places of the heathen peoples; and since if they wanted to make use of these in the service of Jeh it must be first declare them legitimate places of worship, this was done by inventing the history of the Amarth and 'invented' the story of the patriarchs' marriage with their wives, said to have already conserved all these places to the Je worship. But how is it possible on this supposition to explain the story of Joseph, which transpired in Egypt? Then, too, the reasons for the origin of the patriarchs' character are contrived: they would be enshrined in a remarkable mystery and would be of very inferior character. Again, it is nowhere declared in the passages of Gen that here come into consideration that they are reporting the beginnings of a permanent cultus when they give an account of how God appeared to the patriarchs or when they erected altars in His honor. And, finally, while it is indeed true that the cultus localities of the patriarchs are in part identical with these of later times (cf Bethel, Beersheba)—and this is from the outset probable, because certain places, such as hills, trees, water, etc., as it were, of themselves were suitable for purposes of the cultus—yet such an identification of earlier and later localities does not cover all cases. And can we imagine that a prophetic method of writing history would have had any occasion in this manner to declare the worship of calves in Bethel a legitimate service?

(b) Explanation based on dating back later events to earlier times: But we are further told that the pre-prophetic condition of affairs in Israel was in general dated back into the primitive period, and this was done in such a way that the character of Abraham was regarded as reproducing ideal Israel, and the character of Jacob the empirical Israel in the past; something that certainly is the outset an odd and incomprehensible thing for modern learning! If this explanation is correct, what shall we then do with Isaac and Joseph? Why is the whole story of the condition of civilization pictured in Gen so entirely different from that of later times? And is Abraham really a perfect ideal? Is he not rather, notwithstanding his mighty faith, a human being of flesh and blood, who can even doubt (15:2; 17:17); who can make use of sinful means to realize the promise (ch 16, Hagar); who tells a falsehood, although for the benefit of a patriarch, viz., to protect his wife (12:9 ff.), and for this reason must accept the rebuke of the heathen Abimelech (20:9 ff.)? In addition, Abraham is married to his half-sister (20:12), which, according to Dt 27:22; Lev 18:9; 11; 20:17, is forbidden with the penalty of death for the transgressor. In the same way Jacob, according to Gen 29, has two sisters as wives, which is also declared by Lev 18:18 to be a crime.

(c) The patriarchs as eponymous heroes: In the third place, it is said that the people have to the sons of the patriarchs made for themselves eponymous heroes. Why did they make so many at one time? In addition, Abraham cannot possibly be regarded as such a hero as Jacob or Israel is, and in exceptional cases Joseph. When Isaac and Joseph, as the sons of the patriarchs, had already, as the heads of the families and the people, become the leaders of the people and the leaders of the faith (cf Deut 33:1). It is not correct to place genealogies like those in Gen 10:1ff. 25:1ff.13ff on a level with the stories concerning the patriarchs. In the latter case we are dealing with individuals of pronounced character, who have completely represented great fundamental principles and laws in the kingdom of God—Abraham, the principle of the grace of God, to which faith on the part of man is the counterpart; Jacob, the principle of Divine election; Joseph, the principle of Divine courtship; while Isaac, it is true, when he becomes prominent in the history, evisces no independent character, but merely follows in the footsteps of Abraham (as 26:1ff.5ff.15:18:24ff), but is in this very imitative life pictured in an excellent way.

(d) Different explanations combined: If we combine two or more of these different and unsatisfactory attempts at an explanation of the history of the patriarchs, we must become all the more distrustful, because the.readString() of this combination is such an inharmonious scheme.

(3) Positive reasons for the historical character of Genesis.—The individuality of the patriarchs as well as their significance in the entire development of the history of Israel, as this is combined in different missions individually; further, the truthfulness of their method of living, which had not yet reached the stage of permanent settlement; and, finally, the fact that the prophets, the NT and above all Jesus Himself regard their historical character as something self-evident (see [15] above), make the conviction a certainty, that we must insist upon their being historical personages; esp., too, because the attacks on this view (see [1] above), as also the efforts to explain these narratives on other grounds (see [2] above), must be pronounced to be failures. To this we must add the following: If Moses were the founder of the religion of Israel, it would scarcely have been possible that a theory would have been invented and have found acceptance that robs Moses of this honor by the invention of the story of the patriarchs. Rather the opposite would be the case. Besides, this older revelation of God is absolutely necessary in order to make Moses' work and success intelligible. For he himself expressly declares that his work is based on the promises of God given to the fathers. Through this connection with the older revelation it was possible for Moses to win the attention and the con-
Individuality of patriarchs: In so far as the history of the patriarchs contains miracles, they are in perfect harmony with the entire character of sacred history (cf Exodus, III, 2); and so far as the number of miracles is concerned, there are in fact fewer reported in the days of the patriarchs than in the times of Moses. On the view that the history of the patriarchs, which is earlier than the period of Moses, was not invented but historical, no opposite conclusion of affairs could be expected. Leaving out of consideration the unsatisfactory instances cited under V, 2, below, there is to be found also in the Book of Gen absolutely no reference to indicate events of a later period, which, more than is done elsewhere, that the chief interest for the

2. Primitiveness of the religious element.—In the primitive history as recorded in the opening chapters of Gen there is a simplicity, a terseness, a fewness, and a terseness, a fewness, and terseness, which makes us feel as if it is really impossible to regard these accounts as works of imagination. These accounts must be the outcome, on the part of the author, of a personal knowledge of these things and conditions, as they absolutely correct, even to the details of the coloring.

(1) Prominence of the religious element.—In the primitive history as recorded in the opening chapters of Gen there is a simplicity, a terseness, a fewness, and a terseness, which makes us feel as if it is really impossible to regard these accounts as works of imagination. These accounts must be the outcome, on the part of the author, of a personal knowledge of these things and conditions, as they absolutely correct, even to the details of the coloring.

(2) Carefulness and accuracy of research.—On the other hand, it is right over against the so-called “results” of these different sciences to be very critical and skeptical, since in very many cases science retracts today what with a flourish of trumpets it declared yesterday to be a “sure” result of investigations: e.g. as far as the chronology is concerned, the natural and the historical sciences often base their conclusions on purely conjectural figures, or on those which are constructed entirely upon conclusions of analogy, and are far from conclusive, the perishable nature of the earth or of mankind, has not at all times developed at the same pace, i.e. has moved upward and downward, as e.g. a child in its earlier years will always learn more rapidly than at any later period of its life.

(3) Frequent confirmations of the Bible by science. —But finally the Holy Scriptures, the statements of which at this period are often regarded slantly by the theologians, are regarded much more highly by this is done, by such scientists as Reinker and K. von Baer, who declare that Moses, because of his story of the creation, was a man of unsurpassed and unsurpassable scientific thought; or when many geological facts point to such an event as the Deluge in the history of the earth. The history of languages, as a whole and in its details, also furnishes many proofs for the correctness of Gen 10, and that chapter has further been confirmed in a most surprising manner by many other discoveries (of the existence of Babylonia at a period earlier than Nineveh, and the conquest of Assur by Babylon). Then facts like the following can be explained only on the presupposition that the reports in Gen are correct, as when a Dutchman in the 17th cent. built an ark after the measurements given in Gen and found the vessel in every particular adapted to its purposes; and when today we again hear specialists who declare that the modern ocean sailing vessel is being more and more constructed according to the relative proportions of the ark.

(4) The superiority of the Bible over heathen mythologies.—Finally, the similarity of the Bib. and the Bab accounts of the creation and the Deluge, as these have been discovered by learned research (and we confine ourselves to these two most important reports)—although this similarity has been misinterpreted and declared to be hostile to the historical reliability and the originality of Gen 1 and 6—does not prove what critics claim that it does. Even if we acknowledge that the contents of these stories were extant in Babylon long before the days of Moses, and that these facts have been drawn from this source by Israel, there yet can be no question that the value of these accounts, the fact that they are not concerned, as also in reference to the political conditions of the times, the general historical situation and the chronology. In the same way the religious conditions of Egypt, as described in Gen 12, and in the entire history of Joseph, cannot be faithfully pictured as it is absolutely impossible to regard these accounts as the work of imagination. These accounts must be the outcome, on the part of the author, of a personal knowledge of these things and conditions, as they absolutely correct, even to the details of the coloring.
story. That in earlier times a purer conception of God prevailed, seems to be confirmed also by the experiences of the missionaries. Evolutionism, i.e. the development of a higher conception of God out of a lower, is nothing but an unproved theory, which at every step is contrary to actual facts. Cf also my book, Die Entwicklung der Gottheitse in vorreligioser Zeit, 120 ff., and Schmidt, Die babylonische Religion: Gedanken über ihre Entwicldung, a dissertation in which the fact that religion naturally degenerates is proved also as far as the Greeks, the Egyptians, the East Indians and the Chinese are concerned.

V. Origin and Authorship of Genesis.—That the Book of Gen stands in some kind of literary connection with the succeeding books of the Pent is generally acknowledged.

1. Connection with the Mosaic Composition. But if this is the case, then the question of the origin and the time of the composition of this whole body of books can be decided only if we take them all into consideration. In this article we have only to consider those facts which are found in Gen for the solution of this problem. It is self-evident that the conclusion we have reached with reference to the later unity of the book is of great importance for this question (see under II and III above). The original of the book, as demonstrated under IV above, also speaks emphatically for this claim that the literary composition of the book must have taken place when the memory of these events was still trustworthy, and the impression and expectation of them still fresh and had not yet faded. Such individualistic and vivid pictures of historical personages as are reported by Gen, such a faithful adherence to the accounts of the civilization in the different countries and districts and the differences in the foreign customs, conditions and historical events, could scarcely have been possible, if the Mosaic age with its powerful new impressions, the period of the Judges, with its characteristic apathy, or even the division of Israel into two kingdoms, with its dire effects on the external union of the people, had all passed by before these accounts were actually written down. On the other hand, the highly developed prophetical conception of these events, and the different accounts of the same events, which had already been current in different countries, could be traced back only to an earlier period, to such an extent that the author must have been a religious and ethical personality of the first rank. And as, finally, it is scarcely credible that Moses would have failed to provide for a systematic report of the great past of the people, for if as long as only oral family histories were involved, there was no need felt, and as the subsequent books of the Pent, which are acknowledged in a literary way to be connected with Gen, in many of their parts expressly declare that Moses was their author (cf Exodus, IV), the Mosaic authorship of this book is as good as proved. This is not to deny that older sources and documents were used in the composition of the book, such as perhaps the genealogical tables or the events recorded in Gen 11, possibly, too, some referring to the history of the times before the Deluge and before Abraham. This is probable; but as all the parts of the book have been worked together into a literary unity (see under II and III above), and as such sources are not expressly mentioned, it is a hopeless task to try to describe these different sources in detail or even to separate them as independent documents, after the manner refuted under II and III above, as a theory and in its particulars. And for the age of Gen, we can refer to the fact here that the received names of all used for both genders, masculine and feminine, which is true also of the word na\'ar ("youth"), a peculiarity which is shared also by the other books of the Pent almost throughout.

(1) Possibility of later additions.—In itself it would be possible that from time to time some explanatory and interpreting additions could have been made to the original text, in case we find indications of a later period in some statements of the book. But that in this case such additions could not have been made by any unauthorized persons, but only officially, should, in the case of a book like Gen, be regarded as self-evident. But in our times this fact must be emphasized all the more, since in our days the most radical ideas obtain in reference to the way in which sacred books were used in former times. And then it must be said that we cannot prove as an absolute certainty that there is a single passage in Gen that originated in the post-Mosaic period.

(2) Rejection of the "prophecy-after-the-event" idea.—It is self-evident also that the fulfilment of a prophecy is not an evidence of a "prophecy after the event" (sequentium post eventum), altogether independently of the fact that in this case Gen 12–13, which is still in process of fulfilment, could not have been written down even today (cf on this matter, perhaps, Noah's prophecy [Gen 9]; or the prediction of the career of Israel [Gen 23–27]; or, we may mention, the case of Jer [Gen 49]). The last-mentioned case cannot in any way be interpreted as the product of a later time; of the curse of Levi in vs 5–8 as compared with the honor bestowed on this tribe already in the Mosaic period (cf Gen 19–29; 33–8–11), and in the time of the Judges (Jgs 17–7–13; 15 27). Zebed, too, according to 49 13 is regarded as being settled on the coast, which is not in agreement with historical reality (cf Josh 19–10–27).

In the same way, the accounts of the countries which declared that his tribe should be distributed among Israel, was not fulfilled in the time when the people entered Canaan (cf Josh 19 1 and 2 Ch 34 6). In 49 10 "Shiloh" cannot refer to the coming of the tabernacle to Shiloh (cf Josh 18 1); for Shiloh is, on the other hand, to be interpreted personally and Messianically. As long as Shiloh was of any importance (cf 1 S 1 ff), Judah was not in the possession of the scepter; but when this scepter did come into the hands of the author, all such expressions were since ceased to be of any significance (cf my book, Die mesianische Erwartung der vorreligiosen Propheten, 300 f).

(3) Special passages alleged to indicate a later date (Gen 12 6; 13 7; 22 2; 30 12; 23 2; 14 14).—In Gen 12 6; 13 7, it is claimed that it is presupposed that at the time of the author there were no longer any Canaanites in the country, so that these verses belong to a much later period than that of Moses. But on this supposition these verses would be altogether superfluous and therefore unintelligible additions. For that in the time of Abraham the Canaanites had not yet been expelled by Israel, was a self-evident matter for every Israelite. As a matter of fact the statements in both verses can easily be interpreted. Abraham leaves his native country to go into a strange land. When he comes to Canaan, he finds it inhabited by the Canaanites (cf 10 6; 15 9; 25 13). This could have made his faith to fail him. God, accordingly, repeats His promise at this very moment and declares so with greater exactness (cf ver 7 with ver 1), and Abraham shows that God can trust his faith (vs 7). The question whether the Canaanites no longer existed at the time of the event, is nothing at all to do with the meaning of these verses. The same is true of 13 7, on account of the presence of the Canaanites and of the Perizzites, which latter tribe had probably come in the meanwhile and is not yet mentioned in Gen 10, but is mentioned in

That in Gen 22 2 the land of Moriah is mentioned is certain, but the critics to be a proof that this passage was written after the times of David and even of Solomon, because according to 2 Ch 3 1 the temple stood on Mt. Moriah; but as in this latter passage one particular mountain is called Moriah, but in Abraham's time a whole country was so called, it is scarcely possible that Gen 22 2 could have been written so late a period.

Usually, too, the list of 5 Edomite kings, who ruled before there was a king of Israel, according to 36 31, is not the proof that this passage was written after only the establishment of the kingdom in Israel, although the time down to the age of Saul would be entirely too long for only eight kings, as already in the Mosaic period there were kings in Edom (Nu 20 14). Then, too, we find in the days of Solomon a hereditary kingdom in Edom (1 K 11 14), while in Gen 36 31 ff we have to deal with an elective kingdom. Also it would be impossible to understand why this list of kings is carried down only so far and no farther, namely down to the time when there were kings in Israel. This statement can properly be interpreted only in the light of 17 6 16, where the promise is given to Abraham that kings should be found among his descendants (cf also 22 18); and in 19 35 where Abraham is explicitly brought into connection with kings in a number of ways (with the four kings of the East, whom he conquers; with the five kings of the Jordan valley, whom he assists; with the kings of Sodom, whom he destroys (vs 21 ff)). Accordingly, the statement in 36 31 is not merely a dry historical notice, but is a reference to the blessing of God, which is realized in Israel at a much later time than in the kindred tribe of Esau, and which puts the faith of Israel to a new test. As the death of the last Edomite king is not mentioned (cf 36 30 in contrast to the preceding passages and to 1 Ch 1 50 f), but as detailed family data are given, we are doubtless dealing here with living contemporaries of Moses, in whose time already the Edomites possessed a kingdom (Nu 20 14; cf 1 K 22 47), nor Edson-Geber (1 K 9 26; 2 Ch 8 17 f), among the places given in Gen 36 40 ff. In Moses' time, however, the last-mentioned place was only prairie (Nu 33 35 f).

Just as little is it an argument against the Mosaic times that Hebron is mentioned in Gen 13 18; 23 2, which city, according to Josh 14 15; 16 13, is called Kiriath-seba, a name which Gen also is acquainted with (cf 23 2), and which in its signification of "city of Arba" points to an originally proper name. Hebron is the older name, which was resumed at a later period, after it had in the meanwhile been supplanted by the Canaanitic name, just as the name of Salem, which occurs already in the Am Tab, for a period of time gave way to the name of Jebus, but was afterward resumed. That Hebron was an older name than it ever existed at a period earlier than the Arba mentioned in Josh 14 15; 15 13, and from whom its later name was derived, can be concluded from Nu 13 22.

Further, the mention of Dan in 14 14 does not necessarily favor the view that this chapter did not originate after Josh 19 47. Jgs 18 29, where Leshem or Laish is changed into Dan (2 S 24 6; cf vs 2 and 15), does make the existence of another Dan probable. Since in Gen 14 23 3 17 so many ancient names are mentioned, and the author is mostly informed to the conditions of the political complexion of the old nations of that time (vs 5-7), it would be incomprehensible if he should not have made use of the ancient names Laish and Leshem. However, if this Dan was really meant, we should at most have to deal with a revision, such as that pointed out above. Some other less important arguments against the origin of Gen from the Mosaic times we can here ignore. The most important argument for the Mosaic origin of this book is certainly to those mentioned under 1, will now be discussed.

VI. Significance.—In the history of the creation the most important feature for us is the fact that the world was created out of nothing (cf 1 1 and the word 'hoch'), and that the order of the creation, from the greater to the lesser, is in exactly the same order as is mentioned in the book.

In the history of the fall the most important argument for the Mosaic origin of this book antedates the absoluteness of God and His whole perfect control of the entire material world; further, the creation of man, as the crown of all creation, for which all things previously created were made, is here interpreted in the light of the promise of redemption even after the Fall (Gen 3 1-3; cf Col 3 9; Eph 4 24), as also the possibility of the incarnation of Jesus Christ, who also is the image of God (Col 1 15; 2 Cor 4 4). Thus, too, another all-important factor for understanding the purpose of the whole race, for thereby is made possible and can be understood the fact that all men have become subject to sin and all can be the recipients of grace (Rom 5 12 ff; 1 Cor 15 22 f). Also the idea of redemption is brought out strongly in the Book of Gen. Cf, in connection with the Fall, the pains that shall attend the birth of a child, the cursing of the land (3 15 ff), which finds its first victim in Abel, and the monotonous and emphatic repetition of the formula, "and he died," in Gen 5, characterizing the dismal fate of mankind, and which finds its expression in the rapid decrease of the length of life in the genealogies and in the ages of the patriarchs (Gen 5 3 5; 11 5 9; 25 10; 29 20; Ps 90 10) and in the irresistible and increasing power of death. By the side of this, sin once assumes its most horrible form (Gen 3, doubt, pride, fear, boldness of Eve and Adam), and is propagated and increased; and the murder and the despair of Cain (Gen 4 1 ff), which is still surmounted by the defiant blasphemy of Lamech (4 23 f); and in the same way, death, which is coming more and more rapidly (see above), is a proof for this, that sin is being more and more intimately interwoven with the human race. Cf, further, the corruption of the whole earth, which brings with it as a consequence the judgment of the Deluge (5 2 ff), after the period of grace extending over 120 years had fruitlessly passed by; the lack of all reverence on the part of Ham (9 25); the arrogance who in in connection with the building of the tower of Babel (11 1 f), the Sodomit sin in 16 16-19; 15 the daughters of Lot (19 30 ff). Still worse is it, that the elect also are not without blame. Cf, Abraham (see IV, 1, 2); then concerning Noah (9 21 ff). Lot's fearful drunkenness (19 32 f); Isaac's and Rebekah's preference for Esau or Jacob (25 28); Jacob's deceptions of various kinds, his preference for Joseph (37 3); the horrible deeds of Simon and Levi (34 25 ff; 49 5); Reuben's incest (35 22; 49 3 f); the cruelty of the brethren of Joseph toward him and his father (oh 37); finally, Joseph's pride and his reporting his brethren (37 25 f). In short, wherever we look, we see in Gen already a proof for the truth of Rom 5:21, "All have sinned, and fall short of the glory of God."

By the side of this need of salvation there is to be found also the longing for salvation; cf. the name of Noah (6:29), and the word of blessing from the lips of Jacob (49:18); and further, the fact that Abraham Redemption reaches out after the promised heir in Gen 15-18, and his desire for the possession of the land (15:14; 23: 25 20 ff; 33 19 f); and esp. from 47: 27 on. And in harmony with these needs the Book of Lamentations panes, now find above all the saving and the promising grace of God. He does not cause the bodily death to follow immediately upon the Fall in Gen 3 (although the beginning of the spiritual death sets in at once with the separation of man from God); He provides for mankind by Himself making garments for them out of skins (3:21); even the expulsion from Paradise is not merely a punishment; God fears that man might die forever if he should eat from the tree (3:22 f). He sets aside between the human race and the seed of the serpent, so that at least the possibility of a moral contest yet exists; He strengthens the good in Cain (4:7); He removes the pious Enoch (6:24); He saves Noah and his family in a covenant with God (8:19 ff); He gives His promise to Abraham (12:1-3) and makes a covenant with him (chs 15, 17); He delivers Lot (19:13 ff); He is willing even to preserve Sodom at Abraham's prayer, if there are as many as 10 just men in the city (18:26); He bestows a blessing on Ishmael also (16:10 ff; 17:20; 21:13 ff), and permits Isaac to bless Esau (27:39 ff); but above all He is with Isaac, Jacob and Joseph. It is indeed true that the thought runs through Gen that not all men are capable of receiving His grace, and that not all are drawn to the Father. Cain's sacrifice is not acceptable before God, as was Abel's; the Canaanites with their advance in civilization (4:17 ff), to whom Lamech also is singled out, are different from Sodom (4:20-21 ff), who continues the line of the elect. Finally, the godly, too, permit themselves to be deceived (6:1 ff), and Noah stands alone in his piety. After that Ham is cursed in his youngest son, Canaan (9:25; cf. 10:10), but Shem's blessing is to such a degree that blessings are added to him, etc.; furthermore, the elimination from sacred history of Lot (19:29 ff); of Ishmael (25:12 ff); and of Esau (36:1 ff); of Sodom and Gomorrah (ch 19); then the choosing of Jacob (35:19-37:1), the preference of Ephraim over Manasseh (48:17 ff); the transmission of the Messianic promises to Judah (49:10; of my book, Messianische Erwartung, 360 ff), so that at the close of Gen we find already the hope a personal Messiah, expressed, in whom also the word (3:15) that was originally spoken to all mankind is to be entirely fulfilled, and in whom also the blessing given to Abraham shall find its significance and realization for the benefit of all mankind (22:18) and see above 22 and 36 further, in the history of Abraham this fact also becomes clear, that in the end this was all grace on the part of God, and faith on the part of man; and because both grace and faith are in Gen placed and emphasized at the beginning of the history of mankind, and before the giving of the law (Ex 19 ff), then this grace and faith cannot be abrogated through the latter or made ineffective. Not by works but by faith is man saved (cf Gal 3:2; Rom 4: Ho 11:8 ff; Jas 2:21 ff). But the guidance of individual history is not altogether lost, for the way in which He took with His elect, become clear and intelligible ultimately in the history of Joseph; and all and everything must in the end serve the good of those who are His.

GENNAEUS, ge-nä'-us, GENNUS, ge-nä'-us (Tevvalos, Gennados): Father of Apollonius, one of the Syrian generals who troubled the Jews while Cyrus was rebuilding the temple. (Ezr 5:1, 2; cf. Macc 12:2). The description is added to distinguish the Apollonius here mentioned from several others of the same name. See APOLLONIUS. There is no need with Luther to take the name simply as an adj. "des edlen Apollonius." The name occurs elsewhere as a proper name.

GENNESARET, LAND OF, ge-nä'-sə-ret (מְנָעֵש הָגוֹרִים, ge-nä'-sə-ret [טָפָרָה, hêh gönewærè]: The first syllable of the name Genesaret is evidently the Heb gen, "garden," which the second may have implied a fertile area.

1. The Name

The name is a geographic name. Possibly, however, the name may represent the Heb ganzê maarâm, "principally gardens." It is applied to a district on the N.W. shore of the Sea of Galilee (Mt 14:34; Mk 6:53, now known as el-Gheweir, "little Ghôr.") It curves round from el-Mejdel in the S, to 'Ain et-Tineh, or Khân Miynkh, in the N., a distance of over 3 miles, with an average breadth from the sea to the foot of the mountains of about a mile. The soil is the best in the area of amazing fertility. In the S it is watered by the stream from Wâdy el-Hâmâm, the 2. Water that opens to the W. of el-Mejdel.

The middle portion is supplied from 'Ain el-Madjnouna. The 1913-1917 excavations. The western edge of the plain, round which a wall has been built, is raised to the level of the water; and from the perennial stream, Wâdy er-Ruhabi, which drives a mill before starting on its work of irrigation. Farther N, Wâdy el-A'âmâm brings down much water in the rainy season. The water from 'Ain et-Tâhgha was brought round the promontory at 'Ain et-Tineh by a conduit cut in the rock. It was used to drive certain mills, and also to refresh the neighboring vineyards and olive groves. The fountain called "Capharnaum" by Jos (Rf, III, 3, 8). This writer extols the productiveness of the plain. He says the "soil is so fruitful that all sorts of trees can grow upon it." The walnut, the palm, the olive, and the fig, which usually require some demand for water, flourish here.

3. Fertility

diverse conditions flourish together here. "One may call this place the ambition of nature; ... it is a happy contentment of the seasons, as if each of them claimed this country; for it not only nourishes different sorts of fruits in all its fullness, but also preserves them a great while." He says that it supplies grapes and figs through ten months of the year, and other fruits as they ripen together throughout the year (ib). The fruits of Genesaret had... such high repute among the rabbis that they were not allowed in the time of the feasts, lest any might be tempted to come merely for their entertainment (Neubauer, Géog. du Talm., 45 f.).

Centuries of neglect made a sad change in the plain. It was largely overgrown with thorn-bushes, and it yielded one of the finest crops of thistles in the country. Cultivation was confined to the S.W. part; and the rest furnished grazing ground for a tribe of nomads. Recently the German Catholics made extensive purchases, including the village of el-Mejdel. Considerable portions have also passed into the hands of Jews. The land is almost entirely cleared, and it rewards the toil of the husbandman with all its ancient generosity.

GENTILES, jen'ti-lès (יוֹן, goy, pl. דִּיהָנָה, ḳoyim; ἔθνος, ἐθνὸς, “people,” “nation”): Goy (or Goi) is rendered “Gentiles” in AV in some 30 passages, but stranger enjoyed the same status, and often still, “nation,” which latter is the usual rendering in RV, but it is commonly used for a non-Israelite people, and thus corresponds to the meaning of “Gentiles.” It occurs, however, in passages referring to the Israelites, as in Gen (50 29; 35 20); Deut (33 29; Josh 3 17; 4 1; 10 13; 2 Sam 23; 1 Sa 4 1; Zeph 2 9), but the word ἕθνος (ἡνίοχος) is the term commonly used for the people of God. In the NT ἔθνος is the word corresponding to goy in the OT and is rendered “Gentiles” by both VSS, while Ἰουδαίοι (יְדַעָא) is the word which corresponds to ἔθνων. AV also renders Ἰουδαίοι, Ἰουδαίας, “Gentiles” in six passages (Jam 7 15; Rom 2 9, 10; 9 1; 1 Cor 10 32; 12 13), but RV renders “Greeks.”

The Gentiles were far less sharply differentiated from the Israelites in OT than in NT times. Under OT regulations they were simply non-Israelites, not from the stock of Abraham, but they were neither hated or despised for that reason, and were to be treated almost on a plane of equality, except certain tribes in Canaan with regard to whom there were special regulations of non-intercourse. The Gentiles had the right of asylum in the cities of refuge, the same as the Israelites (Nu 35 15). They might even possess Israelitish slaves (Lev 25 47), and a gentle servant must not be defrauded of his wage (Dt 24 15). They could inherit in Israel even as late as the time of the Exile (Ezck 22 23). They were allowed to offer sacrifices in the temple at Jerusalem, as is distinctly affirmed by Jos (BJ II, xvii, 2–4; Ant, XI, vili, 5, XIII, viii, 2; XII, 1; XV, v, 3; Cap, II, 5), and it is implied in the legal text (Lev 22 25). Prayers and sacrifices were to be offered for gentile rulers (Jer 29 7; Bar 1 10, 11; Eze 6 10; 1 Mac 7 33; Jos, BJ II, 1, xi, 4). Gifts might be received from them (2 Mac 6 19; Jos, Ant, XIII, iii, 47; Cap, II, 5).

But as we approach the Christian era the attitude of the Jews toward the Gentiles changes, until we find, in NT times, the most extreme aversion, scorn and hatred. They were regarded as unclean, with whom it was unlawful to have any friendly intercourse. They were the enemies of God and His people, to whom the knowledge of God was denied unless they became proselytes, and even then they could not, as in ancient times, be admitted to full fellowship. Jews were forbidden to counsel them, and if they asked about Divine things they were driven out. Children born of mixed marriages were bastards. That is what caused the Jews to be so hated by Greeks and Romans, as we have abundant evidence in the writings of Cicero, Seneca and Tacitus. Something of this is reflected in the XVI (Jn 19 19; Acts 10 28; 11 3).

If we inquire what the reason of this change was we shall find it in the conditions of the exiled Jews, who suffered the bitterest treatment at the hands of their gentile overlords, and were humiliated and establishment in Judea, were in constant conflict with neighboring tribes and esp. with the Greco-Roman and Seleucid empires.

GENTILES, COURT OF THE. See Temple.

GENTILES, ISLES OF THE. See ISLES OF THE GENTILES.

GENTILENESS, jen'ti-leness (יוֹיתְנָה, ḳoyitānāh; ἱπποκείμενον, chrestólopon), —“gentleness,” “Thy gentleness hath made me great,” RVm “or condescension”; also Ps 18 35, where the word is ἁμαρτία, “humility,” “gentleness,” or “condescension.” In the NT ἁμαρτία (“fairness,” “moderation,” “in Acts 24 4 trt “clemency”) is in 2 Cor 10 1 trt “gentleness,” “the meekness and gentleness of Christ” (2 Mac 2 22 “favour,” “RV “forgiveness”); ἐρμοσίσθαι, “kindness,” “usefulness,” is in 1 Thess 4 10 “kindness.” is the word 10 “kind” (to the unthankful and evil, Lk 6 35), and ἐρμοσίσθαι seems to carry it in a similar idea of active kindness.

Gentile occurs in the OT only in RV of Jer 11 19, “I was like a gentle lamb” (קֵּבֶשׁ). In the NT it is the τὸ ἀγαθόν, “mild,” “gentle” (1 Thess 2 7; 2 Tim 2 24), and of εὐπρεπίς, “fitting,” “proper,” etc (1 Tim 3 3 RV; Tit 3 2; Jas 3 17; 1 Pet 2 19), also, with art., Phil 4 5 (AV “moderation,” RV “forgiveness”). In 2 Mac 16 12 Omias is said (AV) to be “gentle (προδόσος) in condition,” RV “in manner.”

GENUBATH, gē-nū'beth (גֶּנְבָּת, ḥnūḇāth), “theft”:” Son of Hadad, the fugitive Edomite prince, born and brought up at the court of Egypt; whither Hadad had fled when David conquered Edom (1 K 11 20). His mother was a sister of Tahpenes, queen of the Pharaoh who ruled Egypt at that time, and who belonged to the notoriously weak and unsuccessful 21st dynasty.

GEOLOGY, jē-o-lō'ji. OF PALESTINE: The geography of Pal cannot be discussed intelligently without taking into consideration the surrounding regions. The accompanying map shows, with considerable freedom, the chief features of the topographical strata of Syria, Pal and Sinai, with parts of Asia Minor, Arabia and Egypt. (Data for this map were obtained from the “Geological Map of Egypt” (1:1,000,000) and from the “Carte géol.-paleontologique de l’Europe” (1:1,500,000). It will be noted that Crystalline, or Archæan, rocks (A) occupy extensive areas in Asia Minor, and that they are found in the S. in Sinai, Western Arabia, and Eastern and Southern Egypt. Relatively small areas of Paleozoic rocks (P) adjoin the Crystalline rocks in Sinai and Arabia and E. of Caesarea in Asia Minor. A notable area of Paleozoic occurs S.E. of the Dead Sea. This is also adjacent to Crystalline rocks, which could not be indicated on the map on account of their slight superficial extent. Bordering either the Crystalline or the Paleozoic rocks in Egypt, Sinai and Arabia are large areas of Nubian Sandstone (N). The Nubian Sandstone in turn is generally bounded by Upper Cretaceous limestone (C), and the last by Tertiary formations, the Oligocene (O). The Oligocene (O) and Recent deposits (R) and also the Eruptive rocks (E) sustain no constant relations to any particular ones of the other formations. The Quaternary follows the great rivers and the seacoast. The Eruptive rocks are abundant there, and in the N. that the Cretaceous are most widely spread in Pal and Southern Syria, and the Tertiary in Northern Syria and Egypt. We may believe that the Crystalline areas of the N. and S. have been land since the end of the Archaean age, and that what are now Syria, Pal and most of Egypt remained sea for a long time afterward. The Paleozoic areas were lifted above the sea and added to the northern and southern land areas during or at the end of the Palaeo-

era. The regions in which we find Nubian Sandstone or Upper Cretaceous limestone became land by the end of the Mesozoic era. Finally the Tertiary areas were lifted out of the sea. During the Quaternary period the Nile and the Euphrates have added large areas to the land surface. The Crystalline rocks consist mainly of granite and crystalline schists, frequently interrupted with dykes of porphyry, diorite and other equivalents. It will be seen by the map that the Crystalline rocks are nowhere adjacent to the Mediterranean, but that they touch the Nile at Agusdn, where the river in pouring over these rocks makes the First Cataract, or rather did before the construction of the great dam. Granite quarried at Agusdn could be loaded on boats and conveyed to any city on the shores of the Mediterranean, and it is the granite of Agusdn of which are composed not only many of the monuments of Egypt, but also the pillars which adorned many temples in Syria and Pal. The Paleozoic rocks of Sinai and Arabia are of Carboniferous age, but do not include any beds of coal. Several formations which are well developed in the British Islands, are not found in Pal, but a small Triassic area is found near the Gulf of Alexandria, where Jurassic and Jurassic strata are found in the region of Hermon and in Lebanon and Anti-Lebanon. The small scale of the accompanying map makes it impossible to represent accurately the extent of these rocks.

This name was given by Russegger, who in the middle of the 19th cent. followed and studied this formation from the Súdán to Syria. 4. Nubian Wherever the Nubian Sandstone is found in contact with the Upper Cretaceous limestone it underlies the latter conformably. In Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon and Hermon (but not farther S.) it is conformably underlain by Jurassic limestone. It follows, therefore, that its upper strata (the only ones found in the N.) must be of Lower or Middle Cretaceous. However, the Jurassic limestone is entirely absent. In Western Sinai the Nubian Sandstone rests conformably on Carboniferous limestone, and by the Dead Sea on Cambrian limestone, while at Petra and at many other places it rests upon red sandstone. While the consideration of the age of the Nubian Sandstone presents no difficulty in Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon and Hermon, it is a very different matter in Western Sinai, and by the Dead Sea. Sandstone is generally supposed to be formed more rapidly than most other rocks. It is, therefore, rather staggering to try to conceive of even the 2,000 ft. of sandstone at the S.E. end of the Dead Sea as having been in process of formation from the Cambrian to the Cretaceous. The Nubian Sandstone is commonly brown or reddish, but in places shows great variety of color. The temples and tombs of Petra were all carved in this rock. It is in places very friable, and in others compact and hard. The sands of the Arabian deserts have been in the main derived from it, being carried by the prevailing west winds. Where it is covered by a sheet of eruptive rock (barak), it is protected from erosion, with the result that the sand and thin layer of detritus has been transformed into a sandy desert (Hogarth, Penetration of Arabia). It frequently includes strata of clay and shale and thin seams of coal or lignite, and must have been deposited in seas which were at the time relatively shallow. In the south, this rock is generally limestone and is a source of lime. The Limestone soils formed from it are fertile, and the mountain sides have been terraced by the patient labor of centuries.

A notable Tertiary fossil is the Nummulite, which occurs in abundance along the coast, and is noted for its use in the making of Gizeh and in other places. Relatively small masses of Tertiary strata (not shown on the map) are found on the coast at the mouths of the principal streams of Lebanon, showing that while the mass of Lebanon had risen from the sea by the beginning of the Tertiary, the elevation was not complete. The principal river courses had, however, already been formed, and the streams were already carrying into the sea the scourings of the rocks of early Lebanon, which were being laid down to form these Tertiary strata. These consist mainly of the superficial deposits of the Nile, the Euphrates and other large streams. At various points along the coast of Syria and Pal are extensive sand dunes. Frequently under the loose sand, or exposed, is found a sandstone which instead of being entirely siliceous, like most sandstones, is partly calcareous, containing from 15 to 25 per cent of calcium-carbonate. This is probably underlain by the influence of the atmosphere, and not formed under the sea, like most stratified rocks. It is easily worked and is much used for building.

It may be gathered from the foregoing statements that the rocks of Pal are mainly Cretaceous. The Jurassic limestone, which in Lebanon 8. Palestine and Anti-Lebanon underlies the Nubian Sandstone, is absent in Pal, but, at least in Eastern Pal, as in Lebanon, we find the Upper Cretaceous limestone to be underlaid by the Nubian Sandstone. A striking feature of the geology of Pal is the Jordan valley fault. At some time, probably at the beginning of the Tertiary period, when Lebanon, Anti-Lebanon, and the Judean hills were being lifted out of the sea, the earth’s crust was rent at least several hundred miles along a line nearly N. and S., or more exactly from a little W. of S. to a little E. of N. This line runs through the Gulf of ‘Akaba, the Wadi ‘Araba, the Dead Sea, the Sea of Tiberias, the ‘Hâlekh, and the valley between Hermon and Anti-Lebanon on the one hand and Lebanon on the other. The resulting disturbance of the strata is most evident in the region of the Dead Sea. There is no evidence that the two walls of the fissure separated from one another, but the E. wall slipped up and the W. wall down for perhaps 2,000 ft, so that on the E. shore of the Dead Sea and in the valleys entering the Jordan, Dead Sea, there is no evidence of the Nubian Sandstone exposed, underlying the Upper Cretaceous limestone, while on the W. side, even down to the level of the Dead Sea, 1,290 ft below the Mediterranean, the Nubian Sandstone is nowhere visible, although it may be presumed to exist there also below the upper limestone. (See the accompanying ideal section, after Lartet, through Judaea, the Dead Sea and Moab.) The great fault and the subsidiary faults which accompany it occasioned the outcrops of igneous rock, which are abundant along the line of the fault. The numerous hot springs (e.g. Tiberias, Wâdi-Yarmûk, Wâdi-Zarqa-Mâ’in [Callirrhoe], Wâdi-ul-Hass) may be due to subterranean streams of water coming in contact with the deeply buried and still heated masses of igneous rock.

ALFRED ÉLY DAY

GEON, gé.ôn. See GIEON (ApoC).

GEPHRYUN, ge-frûn (Géphrou, Gephurouín). In 2 Mace 12 13, referring to the capture by Judas of a stronghold E. of Jordan, RV reads, “And he also fell upon a certain city Gephryun, ... it was named Caesip.” There appears to be some confusion in the text. There is no evidence to indicate the relation between the two names. AV renders, “He went also about to make a bridge.” The name of the city in Jos (And. XII, viii, 5) is EPHRON (q.v.).

GERA, gê-ra (Nâ’s) gê-râ’, “grain”): A family name of the tribe of Benjamin, hence not necessarily a separate individual in (3) and (4) below:

(1) A son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21).
(2) According to 1 Ch 8 3.5.7, son of Bela and grandson of Benjamin. The name is repeated (ver 5) in the list of Bela’s sons.
(3) Father, or ancestor, of the judge Elud (Jgs 13 15).
(4) Father, or ancestor, of Shime, the Benjaminite, who cursed David when he fled from Absalom (2 S 16 5; 19 16.18; 1 K 2 8).

GERAH, gê-ra’ (774; gérâ‘, “grain” or “kernel”): A weight, the 20th part of a shekel (Ex 30 13; Lev 27 25; Nu 3 47; 18 16; Ezk 45 12). See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

GERAR, gê-râ‘r (774) gê-râ‘, “circle,” “region”): A town in the Philistine S. of Gaza (Gen 10 19), where both Abraham and Isaac sojourned for a time, and where they came into contact with Abimelech, king of G. (Gen 20 and 26, passion). The place has not been fully identified, but the site is probably in one of the Wady Sherî‘a, at a place called Um Jârrâr, near the coast S.W. of Gaza and 9 miles from it (SWP, III, 389-90). The site answers fairly well to the statements of Eusebius and Jerome, Onom, that it was a city of Eleuthera (Rom 9 15), and it is actually 30 Eng. miles, but distances were not very accurately determined in early times. G. was known in the first 5 cents. AD, when it was the seat of a bishopric, and its bishop, Marcian, attended the Council of Chalcodôn 411 AD. It was also the seat of a monastery.

The statements in Gen indicate that G. belonged to the Philis, and we are led to infer that Abimelech was king of that people, but it is quite certain that they did not possess it, and that G. was the result of Abraham, in fact only a short time before the Exodus. It is probable, however, that the writer of Gen would refer to the country as it was known in his day. The town certainly existed in the Philis period, for it is mentioned in the Ps. as the town of G. Jerâr in Arab. means “jars,” and it is doubtful whether it represents the Heb Grâ‘. Jerâr means usually “steep declivity,” or “precipice,” and at the place mentioned many fragments of pottery were found, but this does not necessarily indicate the site of an ancient town. The site of G. is discussed in Thomson’s LB, I, 196–99 (ed. 1882); Robinson’s BR, II, 43–44; PEFS, 1871, 84; 1875, 102–64; 1858, 38.

GERASA, ger-ä’-sa, GERASENES, ger-ä-së-nës (Ta’pra, Gerasa; Ta’pra-nên, Gerasâënën): (1) The town itself is not named in 1. Country Scripture, and is referred to only in the Decapolis, where it is called Gerasenes (Mk 5 1; Lk 8 26.37; see WH, App., 11). This describes the district in which Christ met and healed the demoniac from the tombs, where also took place the destruction of the swine. It was on the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, and must have been a locality where the steep edges of the Bashan plateau drop close upon the brink of the lake. This condition is fulfilled only by the district immediately S. of Wady Semakh, N. of Kal al-dab-Hun, where the slopes descend swiftly into the sea, and animals, once started on the downward run, could not avoid plunging into the depths. Many ancient tombs are to be seen in the face of the hills. Gerasa itself is probably represented by the ruins of Kurseh on the S. side of Wady Semakh, just where it opens on the seashore. The ruins of the town are not considerable; but there are remains of a strong wall which must have surrounded the place. Traces of ancient buildings in the vicinity show that there must have been a fairly numerous population in the district.

(2) The great and splendid city in the Decapolis is first mentioned as taken after a siege by Alexander Jannaeus, 85 BC (BJ, I, iv, 8). Jos names it as marking the eastern limit of Peraea (BJ, II, iii, 3). He calls the inhabitants Syrians, when, at the beginning of the Jewish revolt, the district round Gerasa was laid waste. The Syrians made reprisals, and took many prisoners. With these, 2. History however, the Gerasenes dealt mercifully, letting such as wished go free, and escorting them to the border (BJ, II, xvi, 1, 5).

Lucius Annius, at the instance of Vespasian, sacked and burned the city, with much slaughter (BJ, IV, ix, 1). From this disaster it appears soon to have recovered, and a period of its greatest prosperity lay, probably, in the 2d and 3d cents. of our era. It became the seat of a bishopric, and one of its bishops attended the Council of Chalcedon. Reland (Pat., II, 800) notes certain extant coins of Gerasa, from which it is clear that in the 2d cent. it was a center of the worship of Artemis. It was besieged by Baldwin II, in 1121 AD. Mention is made of the strength of the site and the mighty masonry of its walls. William of Tyre calls the city Jarrahs, and places it 18 miles E. of Jordan (Hist., xii, 16). The distance is about 19 miles from the river. It was conquered by the Moslems in the time of Omar (Guy le Strange, Pat. under the Moslems, 462). The sultan of Damascus is said to have fortified it; but there is nothing to show that the Moslems occupied it for any length of time.

Modern Jerash lies on both banks of Wady Jarash, about 6 miles from its confluence with Wady ez-Zerka (the Jabbok). It is about 30 miles from Amman (Philadelphia), and 23 from Pella (Philadelphia). The ruins are wide and impressive, and are better preserved than any others on the E. of Jordan. They include several splendid temples, theaters, basilicas, palace and baths, with hippodrome and naumachia. The triumphal arch to the S. of the city is almost entire. Two paved streets with double tiers of columns cut through the city at right angles, and four massive pedestals still marking the point of intersection. An excellent account of the ruins is given in Thomson’s J.B., III, 558 ff.

There is nothing above ground of older date than the 2d and 3d cents. of our era; but there is no reason to doubt that the Gr. city of Gerasa stood on the same site. The presence of a copious spring of sweet water makes it probable that the site has been occupied from olden time; but no trace remains of any ancient city. Some would identify the place with Raboth-aimid, which see.

The site is now occupied by a colony of Circassians, and there is reason to fear that, unless something is done to preserve them, many valuable remains of antiquity will perish.

GERGESINES, gör'ge-sênz, gör'ge-sênz': A false reading of "Gadarines" retained in AV of Mt 8 28. See GADARA.

GERIZIM, ger'iz-im, gê-ri'zîm, MOUNT ( viêm, har grizim): Named in the directions for the reading of the law (Dt 11, 29), and 1. Scriptural in the account of that great ceremony References (Dt 27 12; Josh 8 33 f). Mt. Ebal and Gerizim stood over against each other, and on their sides the peoples were placed, half upon one and half upon the other, while in the vale which separates the mountains stood the ark, with the Levites. Those who stood on Gerizim responded to the blessings, those on Mt. Ebal to the cursings, as these were spoken “with a loud voice” by the Levites. From a spur of Mt. Gerizim Joshua spoke his tasting paradigm to the men of Shechem (Jgs 9 7). The name appears no more in canonical Scripture. In consequence of the dispute which arose over the marriage of Manasseh, who belonged to the high-priestly family, with a daughter of Sannballat the Horonite (Neh 13 28), a temple was built on Gerizim as a rival to that in Jerus (c 432 BC). This was the beginning of the schism which lasts to the present day (Ant, XI, viii, 2, 4). See SAMARITANS. The temple was destroyed by John Hyrcanus c 110 BC (Ant, XIII, ix, 1; BJ, I, ii, 6).

Mt. Gerizim, the modern Jebel el-Tûr, stands on the S., Mt. Ebal on the N., of the narrow pass which cuts through the mountain range.

2. Descrip- opening a way from the sea to the Jor- dan. In the thread of this pass to the W., on the S. of the vale, and close to the foot of Gerizim, lies the town of Nablîtis, the ancient Shechem. Here copious fountains rise, filling the valley with beauty and fruitfulness. The sides of the mountain are steep and rocky on E. and N.; on the W. the ascent is more gradual, and here, by means of a system of terraces carried almost to the summit, it is cultivated with great care and success. Its height is 2,849 ft. above the level of the sea, 228 ft. lower than its northern companion.

Abraham came through the pass and camped near Gerizim at the oak of Moreh (Gen 12 6). According to Sam tradition it was on this mountain that he prepared to sacrifice Isaac, and at Salem, not far from Gerizim.

3. Samar- trad- distant, he met Melchisedek (Gen 14 17 ff). The scene of Jacob’s dream is placed at Khirbet Louzeh on the summit (Gen 28 11 f). In a little hollow W. of the ridge, the Samaritans annually celebrate the Passover in accordance with the directions of the Pent. This is done in the open air, their temple having long since disappeared.

The most important remains on the mountain today are the temple built, in 533 AD, to protect the church which had been erected in 475 AD. Near the center of the plateau is a bare piece of rock, on which, tradition says, the altar stood in the Sam temple. A cup-like hollow in it may have been used for libations. In the western wall of el-Kal’ah, Justinian’s castle, there are 12 stones under which, it is said, are the stones which Israel took from the bed of the Jordan (Josh 4 20).

Mount Gerizim with Shechem.

Gerizim was certainly “this mountain” pointed to by the woman of Samaria in her conversation with Jesus (Jn 4 20 f); the cliffs of the mountain almost overhanging the Well of Jacob.

For the reason why Gerizim was chosen for the blessing and Ebal for the cursing we are left to conjecture. The directions were fixed by one looking to the E., not, as with us, looking to the N. For one standing in the valley, therefore, Gerizim was on the right hand, "the side of good fortune" (Driver, Deuteronomy on 11:28).

Onom places Ebal and Gerizim much nearer the Jordan. His alignment was doubtless to meet the difficulty raised by the long distance from Ai to Shechem. But their nearness to the "oaks of Moreh" (Dt 11:30) points to this locality, and this is confirmed by Jos, who speaks of Shechem, the metropolis of the Samaritans, "a city situated at Mt. Gerizim" (Ant, XI, viii, 6).

Andronicus, appointed governor of Gerizim by Antiochus Epiphanes, is mentioned in 2 Macc 5:23 (AV "Garizim").

GERON, γέρων (Tepov, Gerōn): Not much seems to be gained by translating with RVm "Geron, an Athenian," for "an old man of Athens" in 2 Macc 6:1.

GERENIANS, ge-re'n-i-ans (του των Γερηνίων, hēs o των Gereniōn): The name indicates the southern limit of the territory assigned by Antiochus Epiphanes to the governor of Judaea, Maccabaeus when he "left Hegenodeum governor from Ptolemais even unto the Gereniants." (2 Macc 13:24, AV "Gerrenians"). It is not easy to say exactly who the G. were. They were wrongly associated by Grotius with the town Geruah, and are with more probability connected with the ancient city of Gerar, S.E. of Gaza. One MS reads Gerarenōn, which could easily be corrupted into Gerrenōn, and would place the government of Hegenodeum between Ptolemais and Gerara.

GERSHOM, gër'shōm (ברֲעָם, gershōm, from gārash, "to cast out"; explained, however, in Ex 2:22 and 15:2 as from gār, "for he said, I have been a sojourner in a foreign land"): (1) Firstborn son of Moses and Zipporah. The only details of his life contained in the Pent are the account of his circumcision (Ex 4:25), and his remaining under the care of Jethro, while Moses was in Egypt leading the Exodus. His descendants were among the tribes of Levi (1 Ch 23:14). Of them apparently was the Jonathan who officiated as priest of the idolatrous sanctuary at Dan, and whose descendants held the office until the captivity. The MT inserts a spurious 2, in the margin, as a name of the sons of Gershon (גֵּרֶשׁ), making it to be read גְּרֶשׁוֹן, Manasseh, for the purpose, according to tradition, of disguising the name out of respect for the revered Lawgiver. Another descendant described as a "son" was Shebuel, a ruler over the tribes of David.

(2) A son of Levi, so called in 1 Ch 6:16, 20.43.62.71 (Heb 1:2.5.28.47.60); 15:7; elsewhere Gershon (q.v.).

(3) A descendant of Phinehas, the head of a father's house, who journeyed with Eleazar from Babylon to Jerus in the reign of Artaxerxes (Ezr 8:2).

GERSHOM, gër'shôn, GERSHONITES, gër-shôn-ites (תִּשְׁעַם, gershōn, written also gēršōn): Firstborn of the 3 sons of Levi (Ex 6:16; Nu 3:17; 1 Ch 6:1-18; 23:6). He had two sons, Libni and Shimei (Ex 6:17; Nu 3:18; 1 Ch 6:17,20), and consequently two groups of descendants, enumerated in the census taken in the Wilderness of Sinai (Nu 3:21 ff) and that in the Plans of Moab (Nu 36:57). In the distribution of functions among the Levites, the Gershonites were charged with the carrying of the curtains, coverings, screens, hangings, cords and instruments of the tabernacle and the tent of meeting on the journeys in the wilderness, under the supervision of Ithamar the son of Aaron. Their function was thus more exalted than that of the Merarites, who carried the boards, and less so than that of the Kohathites, who carried the most holy utensils and symbols. The Gershonites were given two wagons with four oxen—half as many as the Merarites, according to their service (Nu 7:7). Thirteen cities were assigned to the Gershonites in Northern Phil by Eleazar and Joshua (Josh 21:6, 27-33; 1 Ch 6:62-71; 76).

Among the Gershonites who achieved distinction in later Bib. times was the father of Asaph, the singer from the time of David to the days of the Second Temple (1 Ch 6:31-47; 25:1-7; 15:7-17; 18:5-7; 2 Ch 5:15; Ezr 2:41; 3:10; Neh 11:17; 12:35; 1 Ch 9:15). Other Gershonites named are the heads of the fathers' houses in the days of David in connection with the dividing of the Levites into courses (1 Ch 23:7-11); the superintendents of the treasuries of the house of the Lord of the same time (1 Ch 26:21-22; 29:8); and, finally, Gershonites are mentioned among those who cleansed the house of the Lord in the days of Hezekiah (2 Ch 29:12.13).

GERSON, גֵּרְשון (Tepow, Gersôn; 1 Esd 8:29): Called Gershom in Ezr 8:2.

GERUTH CHIMHAM, gër'ōoth kim'ham (גֵּרֶ Utf 6:27, gāruth kim'ham): If the reading gāruth is correct, a "lodging-place" or "khan" on the high road from Ptolemais to Gerizim may be meant (Jer 41:17). It may have been built by Chimham son of Barzillai, or it may have been named from him as owner of the land on which it stood. But probably with Jos we should read gāruth, "hurdles" or "sheep pens" (Ant, X, ix, 5).

GERZITES, gär'zits (1 S 27:8 AVim). See Gerazites.

GESHAN, gē'shan (גֵּשָּן, gēshān, "firm," "strong"): A descendant of Judah through Caleb (1 Ch 2:47). AV has "Gesham," but not in the original 1611 edition.

GESHEM, gē'shem (גרֵשֶם, gēshēm, gēshām; Gēsam, Gēsam, "rain storm"): An Arabian, probably chief of an Arabian tribe that had either settled in Southern Pal during the exile in Babylon, or had been settled in or near Samaria by Sargon (2 Kgs 18:19; 2:5). He was a confederate of Sanballat and Tobiah, and strenuously opposed the building of the wall under Nehemiah. He with the others mocked at the first efforts to build the wall, and afterward repeatedly sought to entice Nehemiah to the plains of Ono. The name also occurs in the form Gashmā, perhaps an Assyr form of the same name Geshem.

J. J. REEVE

GESHUR, gē'shūr (גֶּשַׁע, gē'shūr, "bridge"): An Aramaean kingdom (2 S 15:8) of no great size which lay probably to the S. of Maacah, and formed with it the western boundary of the land of Bashan (Dt 3:14; Josh 12:5; 13:11). The territory of these two probably corresponded roughly with modern Jaulan. It may not have reached quite to the Jordan on the W.; in which case the Geushurites lit. dwelt "in the midst" of Israel (Josh 13:13), since they were not expatriated by the half-tribe of Manassah, in whose territory they retained their independence. David married Maacah, daughter of Talmai, king of Geshur, who became the mother of Absalom and Tamar (2 S 3). To Talmai Absalom fled for safety after the murder of Amnon (2 S 13:17), and thence Joab brought him back to Jerus (2 S 23). The Geushurites and Aram are said to have taken the cities of Jair—i.e. Havvoth-jair—which lay in the land of Gilead (1 Ch 2 23). It is possible that "Geshurites" should be read, with Vulg, Syr, etc., instead of "Ashurites" in 2 S 2 9. The only difficulty about this name was that it did not appear in an independent kingdom, and there is nothing to show how it was brought under the sway of the son of Saul. In the catalogue of land still to be possessed in Josb 13 2, AV reads "Geshuri," RV 'the Geshurites,' referring evidently to a district bordering on the Philist. Both AV and RV render the same word by "Geshurites" in 1 S 27 8, where apparently the same territory is indicated as invaded by David. In neither passage is the text above suspicion; in 1 S 27 8 LXX B omits the name. No satisfactory explanation has been suggested.

GESHURITES, gesh-u'rits, gē-shōō'rits (גְּשֻׁרִים, .Std. גֵּשַׁרִים). See preceding article.

GESTURE, je'stər, je'stər: The Oriental is rich in gestures by which feelings are expressed and force added to words. Of this we have abundant illustration in the Bible. Almost every available part of the body was employed in gesture. In salutations the whole body was bowed, sometimes to the ground (Gen 18 2; 19 1; 33 7; 42 6; 33 3, 7 t), falling on the face to the ground and bowing to the ground, 3 t (1 S 30 41; cf Gen 23 7; 2 S 9 8; 16 21; 1 K 2 14). It was common also to embrace and kiss (Ex 18 7, etc), weeping for joy. Esau "fell on [Jacob's] neck, and kissed him: and they wept" (Gen 33 4); cf Joseph and his brethren (45 14-15); David and Jonathan (1 S 20 41), and the father of the prodigal (Lk 15 20). We have the kiss also in the story of Judas with his Master (Mt 26 49). Bowing the knee was also in Egypt an act of homage to a superior (Gen 41 48); bowing the knee and bowing down were common in prayer and worship (1 K 19 18; 2 Ch 6 15; Exr 9 5; Isa 45 23); in prayer the head and whole body were also bowed (Gen 24 26; 2 K 5 18; 2 Ch 29 28 f). The rabbins decreed that in prayer "in bowing down, the back must be bent so low that every vertebra becomes conspicuous," and endless questions arose as to what it was lawful to do during prayer (Edersheim). We read also of prayer offered standing (1 S 1 26; 1 K 8 22; Mt 6 5; Mk 11 23), lifting up the hands to the sky (1 K 8 22; 2 Ch 7 12; Ezr 9 5; Neh 8 6; 1 Tim 2 8); "lifting up the hands" was synonymous with prayer (Ps 77 2; 141 2; Lam 2 19; 1 Tim 2 8); falling on the knees in pleading (1 K 1 13). Reverence for the aged was expressed by bowing up in their presence (Lev 19 32; "Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head"; cf Lam 5 12). The hand was also laid on the mouth in token of respect (Job 29 9); in token of blessing the right hand was placed on the head (Gen 48 14; cf 49 26; Prov 10 6). The hands were laid on the head of the animal to be sacrificed; on the sacrifice, and sin offering as denoting the transference of sin; on the burnt offering, perhaps as representing the offerer (Lev 1 4; 16 14). The hands were lifted up in blessing (Lev 22 22) in solemn swearing (Gen 14 22; Ex 6 8 r; Dt 32 40), in defiance and threatening (2 S 20 21); extended in pleading (Isa 65 2). Giving the hand or joining hands as a pledge of friendship and fidelity (2 K 10 15; Prov 11 21) was the sign of the widespread custom of "kissing hands", signifying the clenching of a bargain or agreement (Prov 6 1 RV); as a solemn pledge the hand was placed under the hand of the person to whom it was given (Gen 24 2; 47 29); plucking the hand out of the bosom was "shaking hands" (Ps 74 21); shaking hands, of rejoicing (2 K 11 12; Ps 47 1; 98 8; Isa 55 12), also of ridicule, contempt and rejoicing over one (Job 27 23; Lam 2 15; Nah 3 19). We read of "beekoning with the hand" (Lk 5 7; Jn 13 24), preliminary to speaking (Acts 12 17; 15 16; 19 33; 21 40; 26 1, he 'stretched forth his hand'); drooping of the hands indicated failure, weakness or distress (He 12 12; cf Isa 35 3; Ecles 25 23); washing the hands (publicly) was a declaration of innocence, "of freedom from complicity" (Dt 21 6-7; Mt 27 24).

Mohammedans Praying in the Mosque at Damascus.

The hand lifted up was a sign of arrogance or pride (Ps 83 3); of exaltation, or recovery from trouble, etc (Jgs 8 28; Ps 27 6; 110 7; Zee 1 21); to cover the head was a symbol of grief or mourning (2 S 16 30; Est 6 12; Jer 14 3), also putting the hand on the head (2 S 13 19; Jer 2 37), or ashes, dust upon the head (Jeh 7 6; 1 S 4 12; 2 S 13 19; Est 4 1); wagging (or shaking) the head expressed contempt or malicious enjoyment (Job 16 4; Ps 64 8; Jer 18 16; Lam 2 15; with "hissing," cf Mt 27 39; Mk 15 29; cf Ps 22 7; 44 14; 109 25; Jer 48 27).

Uncovering the feet was a sign of grief (2 S 15 30; Isa 20 24); lifting up the head against one was a symbol of opposition (Ps 41 9; Jn 13 18); shaking the dust from the feet, of freeing from responsibility and of complete rejection (Mt 10 44; Acts 13 51); and at Corinth Paul "shook out his garments," Acts 18 6; strong joyous feeling (as elsewhere) expression in dancing (Jgs 11 34; 21 21; 1 S 18 6; Jer 31 43), before Jeh (Ex 15 20; 2 S 6 16).

Shooting out the lip was an expression of contempt (Ps 32 7); to incline the ear signified attention (Ps 46 10); rending the garments expressed the sense of horror (as in the presence of disaster, blasphemy, etc) (Nu 14 6; Jesh 7 6; 1 S 4 12; 2 S 1 2; 13 19; 15 32; Mt 26 65; Acts 14 14); the smile indicated favor and gave confidence (Job 29 24); lifting up the eyelids was a sign of pride (Prov 30 13); Isaiah speaks also of the "outstretched necks and wanton eyes" of the haughty daughters of Zion, "walking and running as they go, and making a tinkling with their feet" (Isa 3 16). The perverse man "winketh with his eyes . . . speaketh with his feet . . . maketh signs with his fingers” (Prov 6 13).

It is interesting to note the gestures ascribed in the Gospels to Jesus. The expression of His eyes is often referred to; we read how He “thrust up his eyes on his disciples” before pronouncing the Beatitudes, indicating a loving regard for them (Lk 6 20); how He “looked upon” the young ruler and “loved him,” and, with another expressive “look” (round about in the crowd), “Heard words”—shall they that have richly enter into the kingdom of God? (Mk 10 21 23); how He “looked up to heaven” before He blessed and brake the loaves (Mt 14 19; Mk 6 41; Lk 9 16); also before healing (Mk 7 34); how He “looked round” on His adversaries in the synagogue (Lk 6 10), “with anger, being grieved at the hardening of their heart” (Mk 3 5); how He “turned and looked upon Peter” so that he remembered his boasting and fall, and went out and wept bitterly (Lk 22 61); we read also how He took a little child into His arms and held him up as an example to His disciples (Mk 9 36), and how He “took [little children] in his arms, and blessed them, laying his hands upon them” (Mk 10 16); how He “stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground,” when a woman accused of adultery was brought to Him, then “lifted himself up” and spake, again “stooped down, and with his finger wrote on the ground,” till the woman’s accusers had departed one by one, condemned and ashamed, when He again “lifted himself up” and sent the woman away (Jn 8 6 6); how on His way to the tomb of Lazarus, He was agitated, AV and RV “was troubled,” m “troubled himself,” Meyer has “shuddered.” Some tr “shook himself” (Jn 11 33). See further, Attitudes.

GETHER, gethér (גֵּתֵר, gethēr): In Gen 10 23 named as one of the 4 sons of Aram. In 1 Ch 1 17 mentioned simply among the sons of Shem.

GETHSEMANE, geth-sem'ā-nē (Γηθσαμάνεω, Gēthsemænæ, Gethsemane) for other spellings and accents see Thayer, s.v.; probably from the Aram. גֶּטֶּשֶׁמָן, get śemān, “oil press”: Mentioned (Mt 26 36; Mk 14 32) as a place (חַדרון, ḥādrōn), m “enclosed piece of ground,” to which Jesus and the disciples retired after the last supper; in Jn 18 1 it is described as a “garden” (κήπος, kēpos), while Lk (24 40) simply says “place” (ῥόος, ῥόος). From Jn 18 1 it is evident that it was across the Kidron, and from Lk 22 39, that it was on the Mount of Olives. Very possibly (Lk 21 37; 22 39) it was a spot where Jesus habitually lodged when visiting Jerusalem. The owner—whom conjecture suggests as Mary the mother of Mark—must have given Jesus and His disciples special right of entry to the spot.

Tradition, dating from the 4th cent., has fixed on a place some 50 yds. E. of the bridge across the Kidron as the site. In this walled-in enclosure once of greater extent, now primly laid out with garden beds, by the owners—the Franciscans—eight old olive trees supposed to date from the time of Our Lord. They are certainly old, they appeared venerable to the traveler Maundrell more than two centuries ago, but that they go back to the time claimed is impossible, for Jos states (BJ VI, 1, 5) that Titus cut down all the trees in the neighborhood of Jerusalem at the time of the siege. Some 100 yds. farther N. is the “Grotto of the Agony," a cave or cistern supposed to be the spot "about a stone's cast" to which Our Lord retired (Lk 22 41). The Greeks have a rural garden in the neighborhood, and a little higher up the hill is a large Russian church. The traditional site may be somewhere near the correct one, though one would think too near the public road for retirement, but the corners of the hill slopes must have so much changed their forms in the troublous times of the first and second centuries, and the loose stone walls of such enclosures are of so temporary a character, that it is impossible that the site is exact. Sentiment, repelled by the artificiality of the modern garden, tempers the visitor to look for a more suitable and less artificial spot farther up the valley. There is today a secluded olive grove with a ruined modern olive press amid the trees a half-mile or so farther up the Kidron valley, which must far more resemble the original Gethsemane than the orthodox site.

GEUEL, gō'ēl, gō-ô'ēl (גֹּאֵל, gō’ēl, "majesty of God"): The spy from the tribe of Gad (Nu 13:15), sent by Moses to spy out the land of Canaan.

GEZER, gē'zêr (גֶּזֶר, gezer): A city of great military importance in ancient times, the site of which has recently been thoroughly explored. The excavations at this spot are the most thorough and extensive of any in Pal, and have not only done much to confirm the history of the place, as known from Bib. and other sources, but have also thrown a flood of light upon the general history, civilization and religion of Pal in pre-Israelite and Israelitish times.

The long-lost site of Gezer was discovered by M. Clermont-Ganneau in 1873, and his suggestion that the modern name for the place, Tell Gezel, apparently once the governor of the city; in one of them occurred the expression "the boundary of Gezer." The natural features and the position of Tell Gezer abundantly explain the extreme importance of Gezer in ancient times. The burial remains crown a narrow hill, running from N.W. to S.E., about 1,700 ft. long by 300 to 500 ft. broad. The approach is steep on every side, and in early times, before the accumulation around the sides of the rubbish of some millenniums, must have been much more so. The hill stands, like an outpost, projecting into the great plain, and is connected with the low hills behind it, part of the Shepherlah, with but a narrow neck. At the foot of the hill runs a great high road from Egypt to Syria; to the N. lies the Vale of Ajalon, across which runs the modern carriage road to Jerus, and up which ran the great high road, by the Beth-horon, to the plateau N. of Jerus; to the S. lies the Vale of Sorek, where stood Beth-sahmeesh, and along which went a great highway from the country of the Philis to the hill country of Judah. Today the Jerus-Jaffa railway, after sweeping some miles away in the plain round the whole western and southern sides of the site, passes along this open vale to plunge into the narrow defile—the Wady Isma'in, which it follows to Jerus. From the summit of the Tell, a vast expanse of country is visible between the long blue line of the Mediterranean to the W., and the abrupt and lofty mountains of Judah to the E. That it has been all through history the scene of military contest is fully understood when its strategic position is appreciated; no military leader even today, if holding the highlands of Pal against invasion, could afford to neglect such an outpost.

Although the excavation of the site shows that it was occupied by a high civilization and a considerable population at an extremely early period, the first historical mention is of Gezer in the list of the Palestinian cities captured by Tahmuthus III (XVIIIth Dynasty, about 1500 B.C.). From this time it was probably under Egypt governors (the Egypt remains at all periods are considerable), but from the Am. Tab, a century or so later, we learn that Egypt influence was then on the wane. Three of these military tablets are dated from and are written in the name of the governor Wapahi; he was then hard pressed by the Khabiri, and he appealed for help in vain to Egypt. In other letters belonging to this series, there are references to this city. In one a certain freebooter named Lapaya makes excuses that he had broken into the city. He "has been slandered. Is it an offense that he has entered Gazi and levied the people?" (no. CCXL, Petrie's tr.)

In the well-known "Song of Triumph" of Meren-pah, who is considered by many to be the Pharaoh of the Exodus, occurs the expression "Gezer is taken." (In connection with this it is interesting to notice that an ivory pectoral with the cartouche of Meren-pah was unearthed at Gezer.)

In the time of Joshua's invasion a certain "king of Gezer" named Horam (Hô'ram, hû'rôn, but in LXX Ἀδαν, Aidon, or Ἄδαι, El'dâm) came to the assistance of Lachish against the Israelites, but was slain (Josh 10:33). Gezer was taken, but the Canaanites were not driven out, but remained in servitude (Josh 16:10; Jgs 1:29). The city became one of the towns on the southern border of Ephraim (Josh 16:3), but was assigned to the Kohath clan of the Levites (21:21). In 2 S 5:25 (AV "Gazer") we read that David chased the Philis after their defeat in the valley of Rephaim "from Geba until thou come to Gezer," showing that this was on the frontier of the Phili territory; and in 1 Ch 20:4 it states, "There arose war at Gezer with the Philis; then Sibbecai the Hushathite slew Sippai, of the sons of the giant, and they were subdued." One of corresponding account in 2 S 21:18 the scene of this event is said to be Gob, which is probably a copyist's error—גֹּב for גָּזָר. According to Jos (Ant, VIII, vi, 1), at the commencement of Solomon's reign, Gezer was in the line of conquest by the Philis, which may explain 1 K 9:16, where it is stated that a certain Pharaoh, whose daughter Solomon married, captured and burnt Gezer and gave the site to his daughter. Solomon rebuilt it (ver 17). There are no further references to Gezer during the later Jewish monarchy, but there are several during the Maccabean period. Judas pursued Gorgias to "Gazara and into the plains of Idumaea and Azotis and Jamnia" (1 Macc 4:15); Baccchides, after his defeat by Jonathan, "fortified also the city of Beth-sura, and Gazara, and the town of the Philis, and put garrisons on them and provision of victuals" (1 Macc 9:52 AV); a little later Simon "camped against Gazara and besieged it round about; he made also an engine of war, and set it by the city and besieged a certain tower, and took it" (1 Macc 13:43 AV), after which he purified it (vs 47.48). From Jos (Ant, XIII, viii, 2) we gather that Antiochus had taken Gezer from the Jews.

The governor, Alkius, who made the bilingual inscriptions, may have come in about this time or a little later; the rock inscriptions, of which half a dozen are now known, give no information regarding their date.

In the period of the Crusades this site, under the name "Mount Gisart," was a crisscrossing fort and gave its name to a family. Here King Baldwin IV gained a victory over Saladin in 1177, and in 1191 the latter monarch camped here while conducting some fruitless negotiations with King Richard Coeur de Lion (1160-1189). The crossing here between the governor of Jerus and certain turbulent Bedouins. The history of Gezer, as known, is thus one of battles and sieges extending over at least 3,000 years; from the archaeological remains we may infer that its history was similar for at least 1,000 years earlier.

In 1904 the Pal Exploration Fund of England obtained a "permit" for the excavation of Tell Gezer. The whole site was the private property of certain Europeans, whose agent, living much of the time on the Tell excavations itself, was himself deeply interested in the excavations, so that unusually favorable conditions obtained for the work. Mr. (now Professor) R. A. Stewart Macalister, M.A., was sent out, and for 3 years (1904-7) he instituted an examination of the hidden remains in the mound, after a manner, till then, unexamined in Pal exploration. His ambition was to turn over every cubic foot of soil down to the original rock, so that nothing of importance might be overlooked. As at the expiration of the original "permit" much remained unexplored, application was made to the authorities for a second one, and, at the end of 1907, Mr. Macalister embarked on a further 2 years of digging. Altogether he worked for the greater part of 5 years, except for necessary interruptions of the work due to unfavorable weather. Some two-thirds of the total accumulated débris on the mound was excavated, and besides this, many hundreds of tombs, domestic and cassetarian remains in the neighborhood were thoroughly explored. It was found that the original bare rock surface of the hill was crowned with buried remains, in some parts 20 and 30 ft. deep, made up of the débris of all the cities which had occupied it, and the Gezer of the earliest era, and the greatest fort, being built on a neighboring site. The earliest inhabitants were Troglydites living in the many caves which riddled the hill surface; they were apparently a non-Semitic race, and there was some evidence that they were buried by cremation, an occurrence which, or a similar one, soon after—the earliest Semites—inclosed the hilltop with high earth rampart faced with rough stones—the earliest "walls" going back at least before 3000 BC. At an early period—probably about 3000 BC—a race with a relatively high civilization fortified the whole hilltop with a powerful and remarkably well-built wall, 14 ft. thick, with narrow towers of short projection at intervals of 90 ft. At a point on the S. side of this was unearthed a very remarkable house, brick gatehouse, 3 by 9 m. (all the other walls and buildings are of stone), with towers on each side still standing to the height of 16 ft., but evidently once much higher. This gate showed a strong Egyptian influence at work long before the first historic reference (XVIIIth Dynasty), for both sides were paved by slabs of stone, to which it belonged had been ruined at an early date, the former indeed, after its destruction, was overlaid by the buildings of a city, which from its dateable objects—scarabs, etc.—must have belonged to the time of Amenoph I, i.e. about 1900 BC.

The later wall, built, we may conclude, soon after the ruin of the former, and therefore about 1500 BC, was also a powerful construction and must have existed considerably over a thousand years, down, indeed, till 100 BC at least, when Gezer disappears from history as a fortified site. These walls enclosed a larger area than either of the previous ones; they show signs of destruction and repairs, and Mr. Macalister is of the opinion that some of the extensive repairs in one place a gap of 100 ft. and the 28 inserted towers are the work of Solomon (1 K 9 17). This wall must have existed in use through all we know of Gezer from Bible sources. When, from the ruined remains, we reconstruct in imagination these mighty ramparts, we need not wonder that the Hebrews, fresh from long wanderings in the wilderness, found it easy task to capture cities so fortified as this (Nu 13 28; Dt 1 28).

The foundations of a powerful building, which were found inserted in a gap in the southern wall, turned out conclusively to be the palace of Simon Macabaeus—who captured the city (1 Macc 13 43)—a graffito being found upon one of its stones running thus:

Πάμφρας Συμώνου κατεστάθη (?) π(ρ)(κκ) αβαλαον Pamphra(s) Simous kapersast(e) 1 yr(κκ) basilikon which seems to mean, "Pamphras, may he bring down [fire] on the palace of Simon."

Within the city walls the foundations of some seven or eight cities of various successive periods were found, —in one case upon a gap of 150 ft. The city's best days appear to have been shortly before the time of Joshua; the next, perhaps, at the time of the Judges. With the period to which we should probably assign the arrival of the Hebrews, there is a great increase in the population, the hitherto inviolate environs of the "temple" being encroached upon by private dwellings: an interesting commentary on Josh 16 10.

The great "High Place" which was uncovered is one of unique interest, and its discovery has thrown a flood of light upon the religion of the early Canaanites, that religion—"the worship of Baal and Asherah"—which was the great rival of the purer religion of Israel. This Ba'al temple, or bāmāh, consisted of a row of 8 maggebbḥōḥ or rude stone pillars ranging in height from 5 ft. 5 in. to 10 ft. 9 in. (see High Place; Pillar), together with a curious trough which may have been a socket for the 'Ashērāh (see Asheran[1]), or some kind of altar. The area around these pillars had a kind of rough floor of consolidated earth under which were found a number of large jars containing infant bones, considered to be the remains of infant sacrifice. In close proximity to this "temple" was a double cave, the construction of which strongly suggested that it had been arranged for the giving of oracles. This high place had been used for very many centuries; the maggebbḥōḥ were not all of one period but had gradually been increased from one to seven, and an eighth of a more definitely sculptured form—as a simulacrum priapī—had been added some time.
later. In the accumulated rubbish around these pillars were found enormous numbers of small stone phallic images, together with pottery plaques of Ashtaroth, made with rude exaggeration of the sexual organs (see Baal; Ashteroth).

Another monument of great interest—and high antiquity—was the great rock-cut tunnel. It is about 23 ft. high, and 13 ft. wide, and descends by 80 steps, 94 ft. through the solid rock, to a cave in which there is a spring. It is very similar to the great tunnel known as “Warren’s tunnel and shaft” which was clearly constructed by the early Jebusites to reach from within the city’s walls to the fountain of Gihon (see Siloam; Zion). This Gezer tunnel must date at least to 2000 BC; it is evident from the nature of the accumulated débris which blocked its mouth that it was actually abandoned about 1400 BC. Its antiquity is confirmed by the fact that it was evidently excavated with flint knives.

At a much later period in history, in that of the Maccabees, the water supply of the city, in time of siege, at any rate, was largely dependent on an enormous open cistern which Mr. Macalister cleared of earth and found capable of containing 2,000,000 gallons of water. Among the smaller “finds” which throw light upon the Bible history may be mentioned two much broken, cuneiform tablets, both referring to land contracts, which, from the names of the eponyms, can be dated to 651 and 649 BC respectively. They are therefore placed to the time of the last, and one of the greatest, of the Assyrian monarchs, Ashurbanipal, the “noble Osmani” of Ezr 4 10, and they show that he was not only a great conqueror, but that in Palestine he had an organized government and that legal civil business was transacted in the language of Assyria.

The illumination of OT history which the excavations of Gezer have afforded can here be only hinted at, but references to it will occur in many of the articles in other parts of this Encyclopaedia.

LITERATURE.—In Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer Professor R. A. S. Macalister has described in a popular form with illustrations some of his most remarkable discoveries; while in the Memoirs of the Excavations at Gezer (1912), published by the Palestine Exploration Fund, Professor Macalister deals with the subject exhaustively.

GHOST, ghost (גֵּשׁ, nephesh; מַעֵפָה, psuchâ): “Ghost,” the middle-Eng. word for “breath,” “spirit,” “soul,” appears in AV as the tr of nephesh (“breath,” “the life of the soul,” animal soul or spirit, the vital principle, hence “life”), in two places of the OT, viz. Job 12 20, “the giving up of the ghost” (so RV), and Jer 16 9, “She hath given up the ghost” (RSV, “to go out,” “to expire” (Gibeah), is also several times so tr (Gen 26 8; 39 29; 49 33; Job 3 11; 10 18; 13 19; 14 10; Lam 1 19). In Apc (Tob 14 11) psuchô is tr in the same way as nephesh in the OT, and in 2 Mace 3 31, en, nephesh, is rendered “give up the ghost,” RV “quite at the last gasp.”

In the NT “to give up the ghost” is the tr of ἐκπνέω, “to breathe out” (Mark 16 39; Luke 23 46; so RV); of ἐγκρατεῖν, “to breathe out,” “expire” (Acts 5 10; 12 23); in Mt 27 50, ἀποπνέοντος τῶν θανάτων, and in John 19 30, παρεσκόντος τῶν θανάτων, are rendered respectively, “yielded” and “gave up the ghost,” RV “yielded up his spirit,” “gave up his spirit.”

“The Holy Ghost” is also frequent in AV; in RV it is invariably changed to “Holy Spirit,” in ERV sometimes only, chiefly in the Gospels. See Holy Spirit; Spirit. W. L. WALKER

GHOST, HOLY. See Holy Spirit.

GIBAH, gib’a (גִּבָּה, gibbâh): An unidentified place on the route followed by Abner in his flight, pursued by Joab (2 Sam 2 24). LXX renders Γαῖα, corresponding to the Heb gib, “valley.” The form gibâh may be due to corruption of the text.

GIANTS, jî’ânts: The word appears in AV as the tr of the Heb words רפאים, nēphlīm (Gen 6 4; Numbers 13 33); רפאים, rōphā’îm (Deut 1 21; 3 11; Jos 12 4; etc); רפאים, rōphâh (1 Chron 20 4; 6; 8); רפאים, rōphâh (2 Kings 2 16–18; 22); in one instance of רפאים, gibbôr, lit. “mighty one” (Job 16 14).

In the first two cases RV changes “giants” into the Heb words “Nephilim,” nēphlīm, and “Rephaim,” rōphā’îm, respectively (see these words). The “Nephilim” of Gen 6 4 are not to be confused with the “mighty men” subsequently described as the offspring of the unlawful marriages of “the sons of God” and “the daughters of men.” It is held that they overspread the earth prior to these unhallowed unions. That the word, whatever its etymology, bears the sense of men of immense stature is evident from the later passages, Numbers 13 33. The same is true of the “Rephaim,” as shown by the instance of Og (Deut 3 11; Jos 12 4). There is no doubt about the meaning of the word in the case of the giants mentioned in 2 Kings 2 21 and 1 Chronicles 20. See also ANTEDILUVIANS.

GIBBAR, gib’ër (גִּבָּר, gibbâr, “hero”): In Ezr 2 20 the “children of Gibbar” are mentioned among those who returned with Zerubbabel. The passage (Neh 7 25) has “children of Gibcon.”

GIBBEOTHON, gib’ê-thon (גִּיבֶּהֶון, gibbêthôn): A city in the territory of Dan in the plain named with Eltekeh and Baalaath (Josh 19 44), and assigned to the Kohathite Levites (21 23). Later we find it in the hands of the Philistines; and it was while besieging the city that Nadab was slain by Baasha (1 Kings 15 27). After 25 years Omri, the general of Baasha, was here made king of the army when news reached them of Zimri’s regicide (1 Kings 16 15 ff). It may possibly be identified with Kibbiah, which lies about 16 miles S.E. of Jaffa; but no certain identification is possible. W. EWING

GIBEA, gib’ê-a (גִּיבֶּא, gibbê‘a, “hill”): A grandson of Caleb (1 Chronicles 2 49). His father was Sheba, whose mother was Maacah, Caleb’s concubine (ver 48).
GIBEAH, gib’-bə (גיבּיה, gibh’ath, “hill”): The Heb word denotes generally an eminence or hill, in distinction from har, which is used for mountain, or mountain range. It occurs, however, in two instances, as a place-name. Under GEBHA (q.v.) we have seen that Geba, Gibeah, and Gibeon are liable to be confused. This arises from their resemblance in form and meaning.

(1) An unidentified city in the territory of Judah (Josh 15:57). It is named in the group containing Carmel, Ziph and Kain; it is therefore probably to be sought to the E. of Hebron, and may be one of the two villages mentioned by Onom (a.v. “Gib-bathān”), Gabaa and Gabatha, in the E. of the Deroma. It is probably identical with Gibeon mentioned in 2 Ch 13:2.

(2) A city described as belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18:28; Jgs 19:14), Gibeon of Benjamin (1 S 13:215; 14:16), Gibeon of the children of Benjamin (2 S 23:29), Gibeon of Saul (1 S 11:4; Isa 10:29), and possibly, after Gibeon of God (1 S 10:5 m), see Gibeath, 4. The narrative in which it first appears is one of extraordinary and tragic interest, casting priceless light on the conditions prevailing in those days when “there was no king in Israel” (Jgs 19: ff). A Levite sojourning on the farther side of Mt. Ephraim was penniless and in need of hospitality. He was received by his conscience, who returned to her father’s house in Beth-lehem-judah. Thither he went to persuade her to return. Hospitably entertained by her father, he tarried till the morning of the fifth day. The evening was nigh when they came over against Jebus—Jerusalem—but, rejecting his servant’s suggestion that they should lodge in this “city of a stranger”—i.e. the Jebusite—the Levite pressed on, and when they were near to Gibeah the sun set. They entered the city and sat down in the street. The laws of hospitality today do not compel the entertainment of strangers who arrive after sunset. But it may have been through disregard of all law that they were left unaccompanied. An old man from Mt. Ephraim took pity on them, invited them to his house, and made himself responsible for their necessities. Then follows the horrible story of outrage upon the Levite’s concubine; the way in which he made known his wrongs to Israel; and the terrible revenge exacted by the Israelites, who would not give up to justice the miscreants of Gibeah.

Gibeon was the home of Saul, the first king of Israel, and thither he returned after his election at Mizpah (1 S 10:26). From Gibeon he summoned Israel to assemble for the relief of Jabesh-gilead, which was threatened by Nahash the Ammonite (1 S 11:4 ff). In the wars of Saul with the Philis, Gibeon seems to have played a conspicuous part (1 S 13:15). Here were exposed the bodies of the seven sons of Saul, slain by David’s orders, to appease the Gibeonites, furnishing the occasion for Rizpah’s pathetic vigil (2 S 21:1 ff). Gibeath is mentioned in the description of the Assyrian advance on jerus (Isa 10:29).

The site now generally accepted as that of Gibeath is on Tell el-Ful, an artificial mound about 4 miles N. of Jerus, a short distance E. of the high road to Shechem. A little way N. of Telleil-el-Ful, the high road bifurcates, one branch turning eastward to Jericho, the other going down to Gibeath (which should be read instead of “Gibeath” in Jgs 20:31); the other continuing northward to Bethel. Not far from the parting of the ways, on the road to Jeru lies er-Râm, corresponding to Ramah (Jgs 19:13). At Gibeath he pitched his tent, where he remained during the night on his advance against the city from the N. Telleil-el-Ful quite satisfactorily suits all the data here indicated.

The words in Jgs 30:33 rendered by AV “the meadows of Gibeath,” RV “Maraeh-gibeath,”—simply transliterating—and RVm “the meadow of Gibeath” (or Gibeon), by a slight emendation of the text, read “from the west of Gibeath,” which is certainly correct.

GIBEATH, gib’-bath (גבעת, gibb’ath): This is the status constructus of the foregoing (Gibeath). It is found in several compound place-names.

(1) Gibeath-har-araloth (גבעת-הר-ארלאות, gibb’ath ha’-a’raloth). EV correctly, “hill of the foreskins”; but the margins suggest the proper name. Here the Israelites were circumcised after the passage of the Jordan (Josh 5:3). The place was therefore between that river and Jericho.

(2) Gibeath Phinehas (גבעת פינחס, gibb’ath pîn’has), the burial place of Eleazar the son of Aaron in Mt. Ephraim (Josh 24:33 AV “a hill that pertained to Phinehas,” RV “the hill of Phinehas,” RVm “Gibeath of Phinehas”). Consider whether it identify it with ‘Awertah in the plain of Makkhe, not far from Nabla, where “the Samaritans show the tombs of Phinehas and Eleazar, Abishua and Ithamar” (Tend. Seth, 41 f). The tomb of Eleazar is 18 ft. long, plastered all over and heavily shaded by a splendid terebinth.” Guérin places it at Jibna, 3 miles N. of Koryat el-Anab (Judde, III, 37 f; Samaric, 106 ff). There is no certainty.

(3) Gibeath hammorch (גבעת-המרך, gibb’ath ha-mar’îk), a hill on the N. side of the valley from the camp of Gideon, beside which lay the Midianites (Josh 7:1, EV “the hill of Moreh”; the Hebrew is lit. “hill of the teacher”). It is probably identical with Jetel Dukuy, which rises on the N. of the Vale of Jezered. Mid. Judges, 2068 (or 2078), mistakenly calls the mountain Nabth Dukait. This is, of course, the name of the “prophet” whose shrines crown the hill. See Moreh.

(4) Gibeath ha-Elholm (גבעת-האולום, gibb’ath ha-el-hol’m), the place where Saul, after leaving Samuel, met the company of prophets, and prophesied with them (1 S 10:5.10). It is defined as the place “where is the garrison [or pillar] of the Philis.” This may be intended to distinguish it from Gibeath (2), with which it is often identified. In this case it may be the location of Jabesh-gilead, about 10 miles N. of Jerus. See also Tabor.

(5) Gibeath ha-Hachilah (1 S 23:19; 26:1) is identical with Hachilah (q.v.).

(6) Gibeath Ammah (2 S 2:24 is identical with Ammah (q.v.).

(7) Gibeath Garab (Jer 31:39) is identical with Garab (q.v.). W. EWING

GIBEATHITE, gib’-bath-it. See SHEMAAH.

GIBEON, gib’-on (גבעון, gibb’on): One of the royal cities of the Hivites (Josh 9:7). It was a greater city than Ai; and its inhabitants were reputed mighty men (10:2). It fell within the territory allotted to Benjamin (18:25), and was one of the cities given to the Levites (21:17).

By a stratagem the Gibeonites secured for themselves and their allies in Chephirah, Beeroth and Kirjath-jezreel immunity from attack.

1. The Gibeonites of Jericho and Ai, a company disguised as ambassadors from a far country, their garments and shoes worn, and their provisions scanty, as if they had just come from a distant journey, went to Joshua at Gilgal, and persuaded him and the princes of Israel to make a covenant with them. Three days later the deception was discovered and the wrath of the congregation of Israel arose. In virtue of the covenant their lives were secured; but for their duplicity Joshua cursed them, and condemned them to be bondmen, "hewers of wood and drawers of water for the house of God" ( Josh. 23:23), "for the congregation and for the altar of the Lord" (ver 27 AV). This points to their employment in the sanctuary; and possibly may shed some light on the massacre of the Gibeonites by Saul (2 S. 21:1 f). The rest of the Canaanites resisted the defection of the Hivites which so greatly weakened the forces for defence, and, headed by Adoni-zedek of Jerusalem, they assembled to wreak vengeance on Gibeon. The threatened city appealed to Joshua, who made a swift night march, fell suddenly upon the confederates, routed them, and "chased them by the way of the ascent of Beth-horon, and smote them to Azekah, and unto Makkedah" (Josh. 10:11 f).

A three years' famine in the days of David was attributed to God's anger at the unexpiated crime of Saul in slaying the Gibeonites. He did this "in his zeal for . . . Israel and Judah," who may have fretted at the inconvenience of having the Gibeonites among them. The latter believed that Saul's desire was to utterly destroy them. When David tried to arrange matters with them they stood upon their ancient rights, claiming life for life. They would take no blood money: they demanded blood from the family of the slayer of their people. This demand David could not resist, and handed over to them seven sons of Saul (2 S. 21:1 f).

The army of Ishobethheth under Abner, and that of David under Joab, met at the pool of Gibeon. An attempt to settle the quarrel, by attaching twelve men of each side, failed, as each man slew his fellow, and the 24 perished side by side. A "sore battle" ensued in which Abner was beaten; he was pursued by the fleet-footed Asahel, brother of Joab, whom he slew. See HELKATH-HAZZERIM.

Possibly we should read "Gibeah" instead of "Geba" in 2 S. 5:25, as in the || passage, 1 Ch. 14:16 (HDB, s.v.) From Baal-perazim David was to make a circuit and fall upon the Philistines who were encamped in the plain of Rephaim W. of Jerusalem. Perhaps, however, we should read "Gibeah" in both places. Cheyne (EBB, s.v.) thinks the hill town of Baal-perazim may be intended.

When, after the death of Absalom and the suppression of his faction, Bichri accompanied David, there was danger lest Bichri might have opportunity to strengthen his position; so David dispatched Abishai and the troops that were with him to attack Bichri at once. Joab went with this expedition. Obviously he could never be content with a second place. The force of Amasa was met at "the great stone of Gibeon near thence." There Joab treacherously slew that unsuspecting general, and, himself assuming command, stampeded the rebellion with his accustomed thoroughness (2 S. 20:4 ff). The "great stone" appears to have been well known, and may have possessed some religious character.

Gideon was the son of an ancient sanctuary, called in 1 K. 3:4 "the great high place." Here, according to 2 Ch. 1:3, was the tabernacle made in the wilderness—but see the Sanctuary. 1 K. 3:4. It was the scene of Gideon's great sacrifice after which he slept in the sanctuary and dreamed his famous dream (1 K. 3:4 ff; 9:2; 2 Ch. 1:3.13, etc.).

By the "great waters that are in Gibeon" Johann overtook Ismael the son of Nathaniel, and freed the captives he had found among the children of Chis, and among those who returned with Zerubbabel.
prised while at work by a visit from the Lord in the form of an angel. However this scene (6:11 ff) and its miraculous incidents may be interpreted, there can be no question of the divinity of Gideon's call or that the voice which spoke to him was that of God himself. Neither the result arising over the death of his brothers at Tabor (8:18) nor the patriotic impulses dwelling within him can account for his assumption of leadership. Nor did he become leader at the demand of the people. He evidently had scarcely thought of himself as his country's deliverer. The call not only came to him as a surprise, but found him distrustful both of himself (6:15) and of his people (ver.13). It found him too without inclination for the task, and only his conviction that the command of God persuaded him to assume leadership. This gives the note of accuracy to the essential facts of the story. Gideon's demand for a sign (ver.17) being answered, the food offered the messenger having been consumed by fire at the touch of his staff, Gideon acknowledged the Divine commission of his visitor, and at the place of visitation built an altar to Jehovah (vs.19 ff).

The call and first commission of Gideon are closely joined. He is at once commanded to destroy the altar of Baal at Ophrah and build an altar to Jehovah at the gate of the city (6:24). This was completed by his father at the gate of Ephraim (6:27). The morning revealed his work and visited upon him the wrath of the people of Ophrah. They demand of Joash that he put his son to death. The answer of Joash is an ironical but valid defence of Gideon. Why should the people plead for Baal? A god should be able to plead his own cause (vs.28 ff). This defence gained for Gideon the name Jerubbabal, i.e. yareb bô ha-ba'al, "Let Baal plead," 6:32 AV.

The time intervening between this home scene and the actual commission against the Midianites cannot definitely be named. It is probable that it took months for Gideon even to rally the people of his own clan. The fact is that all the subsequent events of the story are shown to be a double narrative in which there are apparent but not vital differences. Without ignoring this fact it is still possible to get a connected account of what actually transpired.

When the allied invaders were in camp on the plain of Jezreel, we find Gideon, having recruited the Abiezrites and sent messengers to 5. Gideon's the various tribes of Israel (6:34 f.), Army pitching his camp near the Midianites. The location of the various camps of Gideon is difficult, as is the method of the recruiting of the tribes. For instance, 6:35 seems to be in direct contradiction to 7:23, and both are considered of doubtful origin. There was evidently, however, a preliminary encampment at the place of rallying. While waiting here, Gideon further tested his commission by the dry and wet fleece (6:37 ff) and, convinced of God's purpose to save Israel by his leadership, he moves his camp to the S.E. edge of the plain of Jezreel nearby the spring of Harod. From this point of vantage he could look down on the tents of Midian. The account of the reduction of his large army from 32,000 to 300 (7:2 ff) is generally accepted as belonging to a later tradition. Neither of the tests, however, is unnatural, and the first was not unusual. According to the account, Gideon at the Lord's command first excused all the fearful. This left him with 10,000 men. This number was reduced to 300 by a test of their method of drinking. This test can easily be seen to evidence the eagerness and courage of men for battle (3:11 ff).

Having thus reduced the army and having the assurance that the Lord would deliver to him and his little band the forces of Midian, Gideon, with a servant, went by night to the edge of the camp of his enemy, and there heard the telling and interpretation of a dream which greatly encouraged him and led him to strike an immediate blow (7:9 ff). Again we find a conflict of statement between 7:20 and 7:22, but the conflict is as to detail only. Dividing his men into three equal bands, Gideon arranges that with trumpets, and lights concealed in pitchers, and with the cry, "The sword of Jehovah and of Gideon!, they shall descend and charge the Midianites simultaneously from three sides. This stratagem for concealing his numbers and for terrifying the enemy succeeds, and the Midianites and their allies flee in disorder toward the Jordan (7:18 ff). The rout and the victory were followed by the declaration of the fact that in the darkness the enemy turned their swords against one another. Admitting that we have two narratives (cf. 7:24; 8:3 with 4 f. ff) and that there is some difference between them in the details of the attack and the progress of the conflict, there is no need for confusion in the main line of events. One part of the fleeing enemy evidently crossed the Jordan at Succoth, being led by Zebah and Zalmunna. The superior force followed them toward Beth-barah, where the enemy first attacked, asking them to intercept the Midianites, should they attempt to escape by the fords in their territory. This they did, defeating the 7. Death of enemy at Beth-barah and slaying the Zeb and Zalmunna, prince of Zeb and Zeb ("the Raven" and "the Wolf"). As proof of their victory and valor they brought the heads of these princes to Gideon. The Midianites, having discounted their bravery by not calling them earlier into the fight. But Gideon was a master of diplomacy, as well as of strategy, and won the friendship of Eshron by magnifying their accomplishment in comparison to his own. He now proposes to 8. The Zebah and Zalmunna, present after having been Zebah and Zalmunna, the desert hordes broken in Canaan and a forty years' peace came to Israel. But the two kings of Midian must now meet their fate as defeated warriors. They had lost their forces and their homes. However, the brothers of Gideon perished. So Gideon commands his young son Jether to slay them as though they were not worthy of death at a warrior's hand (8:20). The youth fearing the task, Gideon himself put them to death (8:21).
The people clamored to make Gideon king. He refused, being moved possibly by a desire to maintain the theocracy. To this end he
9. Gideon's asks only the jewelry taken as spoil Ephed in the battles (2 24 ff), and with it makes an ephod, probably an image of Jeh, and places it in a house of the Lord at Ophrah.
By this act it was later thought that Gideon contributed to a future idolatry of Israel. The narrative properly closes with 8 28. The remaining verses containing the account of Gideon's family and death (8 30 ff) and Death the record of events immediately subsequent to Gideon's death (8 33 ff) come from other sources than the original narrators.

GIDEONI, gid-é-on' (גִּידֶון, gid'ön): The father of Abidan who was prince of Benjamin, mentioned only in connection with the son (Nu 1 11; 2 22; 7 60,65; 10 24).

GIDOM, gid'om (גִּדֵום, gid'ôm): The limit eastward, from Gibeah toward the wilderness, of the pursuit of Benjamin by Israel (Jgs 20 45). No name suggesting this has yet been recovered. It is not mentioned elsewhere.

GIER-EAGLE, jé'-er-é' (Gier-Eagle, נֶבֶל הֶרֶגֶל, nebel heregel, נֶבֶל הַרְגֶל, nebel hargel): The name applied to one of the commonest of the vultures, and not an eagle at all. The word is derived from a Heb root, meaning "to love," and was applied to the birds because mated pairs seldom separated. These were smaller birds and inferior to the largest members of the family. They nested on a solid base, lived in pairs, and not only flocked over carrion as larger species permitted, but also ate the vilest offal of all sorts, for which reason they were protected by a death penalty by one of the Pharaohs.

GIFT, gift (תּוֹם, mattanâh, תּוֹם, mattanâh, מִנְהָד, minâhâd; סִפְיָו, srîyô, ṣîryâ, ṣîrê; נָחָד, nakhâd; חוּר, hôr, hûr, hôr, ḫôr, ḫûr, charisma): In Gen 25 6; Ex 28 38; Nu 18 6.7,22; Eak 20 26, etc, mattânâh, "a gift," is so rendered; minâhâd, an offering or present, used esp. of the "meat offerings," is trd "gift" (2 S 8 26 AV; 2 Ch 26 8), in which passages "tribute" is meant; RV "offering," as RV 32, 22; Ps 40 12. A few other words occur singly, e.g. ṣôkhar, "a reward" (Ps 72 10); masârêh, "lifting up" (Est 2 18); nåhâyân is trd "gifts" (Nu 8 19; RVm "Heb nôathânim, given"); nôdâhân, nåihân, "impart gifts" (Eak 16 33); mînânâh, "a thing lifted up" (2 S 15 42); shôbâz âh means "a bribe" (Rom 3 8); Dt 16 19; 2 Ch 17 9; Prov 6 35; 17 8; 23 1, 22 12); in each instance ARV has "bribe" except Prov 6 35, gifts; trâmâh, "a present" (Prov 29 4), may also mean a bribe. AV "he that receiveth gifts," RV "he that expecteth gifts," m "imposthume, Job a man of offerings."

In the NT dôrôm, "a present," "gift" (from didômi, "to give"); is trd "gift" (Mt 2 11; 5 23.24 bce, Mt 7 11 AV; He 6 1; Rev 11 10, etc, referring chiefly to gifts or offerings to God); dôrema, "a free gift" (Jn 4 10; Acts 2 38; Rom 5 15.17; 2 Cor 9 15; He 6 4, etc, referring to the gifts of God); dôrôm, a "free gift" (Rom 5 16; Jas 1 17, ERV "boon"); dôrôm, "a gift" (Jas 1 17, RVm "give"); is trd "free gift", RVm "giving"; charisma, "grace," "favor," a benefit or good conferred, is also used of Divine gifts and favors, esp. of the supernatural gifts imparted by the Holy Spirit (charismata) enumerated in Acts 2 4, etc. The word was in use in Jewish thought before the Christian era, and was known in the Hellenistic East in the LXX (Ecclus 10 25; 31 11), and in the Christian era in the N.T. (Ac 13 36; 1 Cor 1 7). In the NT "gift" is substituted in the text of Gen 33 11 for blessing, m "Heb blessing; "boasteth himself of his gifts falsely" (Prov 25 14) for "boasteth himself of a false gift," m "Heb in a gift of falsehood; "a parting gift" for presents" (Mic 1 14); "Given to God" for "a gift" (Jas 1 11).

GIHON, gi'hôn (גִּיהוֹן, gi'ôn; ꦎgnore, Gîôn): One of the four rivers of Eden (Gen 2 13). It is said to compass the whole land of Cush (Ethiopia), probably a province E. of the Tigris. The Gihon is thought by Sayce to be the Kerkha, coming down from Luristan through the province known in the cuneiform texts as Kases, probably the Cush of the Bible. See Eden. Used fig. of wisdom in Sir 24 27, "as Gihon [AV Geon] in the days of vintage."

GIHON (גִּיהוֹן, gi'ôn, גִּיהֹן, gi'ôn [in 1 K], from root הָגִּי, "to burst forth"): (1) See preceding article. (2) The Nile in Jer 2 18 LXX (Γῆν, Gîôn); in Heb גִּיהוֹן, shîlîr (see Shihor).

(3) A spring in Jerus, evidently sacred, and, for that reason, selected as the scene of Solomon's coronation (1 K 1 38). It is without doubt the spring known to the Moslems as 'Ain Umm ed deraj ("the spring of the steps") and to the Christians as 'Ain Sûlit Miriam ("the spring of the lady Mary"), or commonly as the Virgin's Fountain. It is the one true spring of Jerus, the original source of attraction to the site of the early settlers; it is situated in the Kidron valley on the E. side of “Ophel,” and due S. of the temple area. See Jerusalem. The site in the present day is brackish and impregnated with sewage. The spring is intermittent in character, “bursting up” at intervals: this feature may account for the name Gihon and for its sacred characters. In NT times it was, as it is today, credited with healing virtues. See Bernese. Its position is clearly defined in the OT. Manasseh “built an outer wall to the city of David, on the W. side of Gihon, in the valley” (= Nahal, i.e. the Kidron; 2 Ch 33 14). From Gihon Hezekiah made his aqueduct (2 Ch 32 30), now the Siloam tunnel. See Siloam.

The Virgin’s Fount.

The spring is approached by a steep descent down 30 steps, the water rising deep underground; the condition is due to the vast accumulation of rubbish—the result of the many destructions of the city—which now fills the valley bed. Originally the water ran down the open valley. The water rises from a long deep crack in the rock, partly under the lowest of the steps and to a lesser extent in the mouth of a small cave, 11½ ft. long by 5 ft. wide, into which all the water pours. The village women of Siloam obtain the water at the mouth of the cave, but when the supply is scanty they actually go under the lowest steps—where there is a kind of chamber—and fill their vessels there. At the farther end of this cave is the opening leading into the aqueduct down which the water flows to emerge after many windings at the pool of Siloam. The first part of this aqueduct is older than the time of Hezekiah and led originally to the perpendicular shaft, connected with “Warren’s tunnel” described elsewhere (see Siloam; Zion).

The prominent position of importance which Gihon held in the eyes of the earlier inhabitants of Jerusalem is shown by the extraordinary number of passages, rock cuttings, walls and aqueducts which exist all about the spring. Wakes have been made at different periods to bank up the waters and direct them into the channels provided for them. Of aqueducts, besides the “Siloam aqueduct,” two others have been formed. One running from the source at a considerable lower level than that of Hezekiah was followed by the present writer (see PEFS, 1902, 35–38) for 176 ft. It was very winding, following apparently the W. side of the Kidron valley. It was a well-cemented channel, about 1½ ft. wide and on an average of 4½ ft. high, roofed in with well-cut stones. There are no certain indications of age, but in the writer’s opinion it is a much later construction than Hezekiah’s aqueduct, though the rock-cut part near the source may be older. It was discovered by the Siloam jelahin, because, through a fault in the dam, all the water of the “Virgin’s Fount” was disappearing down this channel. A third aqueduct has recently been discovered running off at a higher level than the other two. It is a channel deep cut in the rock with curious trough-like stones along its floor. It appears to be made for water, but the branch of it which Hezekiah used, was directed toward its end. The pottery, which is early Hebrew, shows that it is very ancient. The whole accumulated débris around the source is full of pre-Israelite and early Israelite debris. See W. E. G. Masterman.

GILALAI, gil’al-a’i, gi-là’âl (גְּלָלָי, gidalay): A musician in the procession at the dedication of the wall, son of a priest (Neh 12 36).

GILBOA, gil-bô’a, MOUNT (גִּילְ חוֹא, har ha-gil’boa, “Mount of the Gibboa”): Unless we should read “Gibboa” for “Gilead” in 176 (see below, 2) this mountain is mentioned in Scripture only in connection with the last conflict of Saul with the Philistines and his disastrous defeat (1 S 28 4; 31 1, 5; 2 S 1 6, 21; 21 12; 1 Ch 10 18). If Zer’in be identical with Jezreel—a point upon which Professor R. A. S. Macalister has recently cast some doubt—Saul must have occupied the slopes on the N.W. side of the mountain, near “the fountain which is in Jezreel” (1 S 29 1). The Philistines attacked from the plain, and the battle went some miles inland to the south of Israel, who broke and fled; and in the flight Jonathan, Abinadab and Malchishua, sons of Saul, were slain. Rather than be taken by his lifelong foe, Saul fell upon his sword and died (1 S 31 1 ff).

The modern name of the mountain is Jebel Fek’a. It rises on the eastern edge of the plain of Esdraelon, and, running from Zer’in to the S.E., it then sweeps southward to join the Samaritan uplands. It presents an imposing appearance from the plain, but the highest point, Sheikh Durkan, is not more than 1,006 ft. above sea level. In the higher reaches the range is rugged and barren; but vegetation is plentiful on the lower slopes, esp. to the W. The Kishon takes its rise on the mountain. Under the northern cliffs rises Alin Jal‘âd, possibly identical with Haror, Welly of, which see. In Jal‘ân, a village on the western declivity, there is perhaps an echo of the old name. W. Ewing.

GILEAD, gil’e-ad (גִּילָאָד, ha-gil’ád, “the Gilead”): The name is explained in Gen 31 41.51, as derived from Gibel, “gentleness,” agreeing in meaning with the Aram. γφφαρςάβδα (Pharshabdu). The Arab. jil‘ad means “rough,” “rugged.”

(1) A city named in Hos 6 8; 12 11, possibly to be identified with Gilead near to Miraph (Jgs 10 17). If this is correct, the ancient city may be represented by the modern Ji‘âd, a ruin about 5 miles N. of es-Salâ,

(2) A mountain named in Jgs 7 3. Gideon, ordered to reduce the number of men who were with him, commanded all who were “fearful and trembling” to “return and depart from Mt. Gilead.” R.Vm reads “return and go round about from Mt. Gilead.” Gideon and his army lay to the S. of the plain of Jezreel on the lower slopes of Gilead. It has been suggested (Studer, Comm., ad loc.) that, as the Midianites lay between the men of the northern tribes and their homes, they were told to cross the Jordan, make a détour through Gilead, and thus avoid the enemy. Possibly, however, we should read Gilboa for Gilead; or part of the mountain may have borne the name of Gilead. The last suggestion is favored by the presence of a strong spring under the northern declivity of Gilboa, nearly 2 miles from its base, possibly to be identified with the Well of Harod. In the modern name, ‘Ain Jal‘âd, there may be an echo of the ancient Gilead.
(3) The name is applied generally to the mountain mass lying between the Yarmuk on the N., and the Jordan on the S. The name of it is Jezin.

1. The Land being the boundary on the W., while of Gilead on the E. it marched with the desert.

Mount Gilead—lft. “Mount of the Gilead”—may refer to some particular height which we have no means of identifying (Gen 31:23). The name Jelab Jâdlâd is still, indeed, applied to a mountain S. of Nahr ez-Zerbâk and N. of es-Salta; but this does not meet the necessity of the passage as it stands. The same expression in Dt 3:12 obviously stands for the whole country. This is probably true also in Cant 4:1. The name Gilead is sometimes used to denote the whole country E. of the Jordan (Gen 37:25; Josh 22:9; 2 S 2:9, etc.). Again, along with Bashan, it indicates the land E. of Jordan, as distinguished from the ancient Bashan.

2. Bashan Moab plateau (Dt 3:10; Josh 13:11; 2 K 10:33). In the N. Gilead bordered upon Geshur and Maacah (Josh 13:11,13); and here the natural boundary would be formed by the deep gorge of the Yarimsh and Wady esh-Skellâth. In pre-Israelite times the Jabbok (Nahr ez-Zerbâk), which cuts the country in two, divided the kingdom of Sihon from that of Og (Dt 3:16; Josh 12:2). The frontiers between the tribes of Reuben, Gad, and Manasseh (19:13) are not clearly indicated with any certainty. Probably they varied at different times (cf. Josh 13:21 f.; 1 Ch 5:8.9.11.16). It greatly increases the difficulty that so many of the cities named are still unidentified. But in any case it is clear that the bulk of Gilead fell to Gad, so that Gilead might stand for Gad (Jgs 6:17). Havytt-Jair (which see), “the villages of Jair,” lay in Gilead (Jgs 10:4). The modern division of the country follows the natural features. From the Yarmuk to the Zerbâk of Ajlun; and from the Zerbâk to the Arnon is el-Belkâ.

The geological formation is the same as that of Western Pal, but the underlying sandstone, which does not appear W. of the Jordan, forms the base slopes of the chain of Moab and Gilead, and is traceable as far as the Jabbok. It is covered in part by the more recent white marls which form the curious peaks of the foothills immediately above the Jordan valley; but rises above the level of the Jabbok and in Jelab Jâdlâd, rising on an average 1,500 ft. above the sandstone and forming the bed of the copious springs. It also dips toward the Jordan valley, and the water from the surface of the plateau, sinking down to the surface of its formation, bursts out of the hill slopes on the W. in perennial brooks. It was from the ruggedness of this hard limestone that Gilead obtained its name. Above this again the white chalk of the desert plateau, the same as that found in Samaria and Lower Galilee, with bands of flint or chert in contorted layers, or strewn in pebbles on the surface. Where this formation is deep the country is bare and arid, supplied by cisterns and deep wells. Thus the plateau becomes desert, while the hill slopes abound in streams and springs; and for this reason Western Gilead is a fertile country, and Eastern Gilead is a wilderness (Conder, DB, s.v.).

The uplands of Gilead may be described as the crumbling of the edge of the great eastern plateau, and as such are ploughed. The average height of the range is about 4,000 ft. above the Jordan valley, or 3,000 ft. above the Mediterranean. The greatest height is toward the S., where it culminates in Jbel Dshâ (3,597 ft.), to the N. of es-Salt. This mountain commands a most splendid view. To the S. is the hollow (an old lake bottom) of el-Bukhâr, fully 1,500 ft. lower. In the N. we have Jbel Hakart (3,408 ft.), W. of Reimâm. Almost as high (3,430 ft.) is Jbel Kofafah, about 12 miles to the N. E. A striking point (2,785 ft.) fully 2 miles N.W. of Ajlun, is crowned by Kâl’ât er-Rabad, whence again a view of extraordinary extent is gained.

The Yarmuk and the Zerbâk—see JABBOK—are the main streams, but almost every valley has a stream as the volcanic locus in the N. and in and the S., the soil of Gilead amply repays the labor of the husbandman. Of flowers the most plentiful are the phlox, the cistus and the narcissus. Hawthorn, mastic and arbous abounds, while many a glen and slope is shady with shaggy oak woods, and, in the higher reaches, with pines. The streams are fringed with oleander. The monotony of the stony plateau is broken by clumps of the hardy broom that grows in the lower ground are found the tamarisk and the lotus, with a many waving cane-brake. The scenery is more beautiful and picturesque than that of any other district of Pal. The soil is not now cultivate to its greatest capacity; it is waste pasture for many flocks and herds (Cant 6:5).

The Ishmaelites from Gilead (Gen 37:23) were carrying “spicery and balm and myrrh.” From old time Gilead was famed for its Balm (q.v.). The Bâl, or “myrrh” in the above passage, was probably the gum produced by the Clusus ladaniferus, a flower which still abounds in Gilead.

After the conquest, as we have seen, Gilead passed mainly into the hands of Gad. An Ammonite district of Gad was the back of the Arnon, with Calebites and Geshurites as inhabitants (2 Ch 13:19). Solomon had two commissariat districts in Gilead (1 K 4:13 f.19). Before Ramoth-gilead, which he sought to win back from the Syrians who had wrenched it from him, Ahab received his death wound (22:1 f.). The Syrians asserted their supremacy in Gilead (2 K 10:32 f) where Moab and Israel had contended with varying fortune (M.S.). At length Tigris-pelser overran the country and transported many of the inhabitants (2 K 16:29). This seems to have led to a reconquest of the land by heathenism, and return to Gilead was promised to Israel (Ze 10:10).

At a later time the Jewish residents in Gilead were exposed to danger from their heathen neighbors. On their behalf Judas Maccabaeus invaded the country and met with striking success (1 Mac 6:9 f). Alexander Jannaeus, who subdued Gilead, was forced to yield it again to the king of Arabia (Ant, XIII, xiv, 2; BJ, I, iv, 3). During the Roman period, esp. in the 2d and 3d cents. A.D., the land enjoyed great prosperity. Then were built such cities as Gadera and Gerasa, which are still imposing, even the one passed by the Moslem armies was the signal for its decay. Attempts were made to recover it for Christianity by Baldwin I (1118 AD) and Baldwin II (1121 AD); and the Crusaders left their mark in such strongholds as Kallat nr-Behad, and the castle at es-Salt. With the resurrection of Muslim supremacy a curtain falls over the history of the district; and only in comparatively recent times has it again become known to travelers. The surveys directed by the Pal Exploration Fund, in so far as they have been carried out, are invaluable. N. of the Jabbeck are many villages, and a fair amount of cultivation. Es Salt is the only village of any importance in the S. It is famous for its raisins. Its spacious uplands, its wooded and well-watered valleys have been for centuries the pasture-land of the nomads.

(1) A son of Machir, grandson of Manasseh (Nu 26:29,30).

(2) The father of Jephthah (Jgs 11:1,2).

(3) A Godite, the son of Michael (1 Ch 5:14).

Gilead, BalM of. See BalM of Gilead.

Gilead, Mount. See Gilead (2).

Gileadites, gil’ê-ad-îs:

(1) A branch of the tribe of Manasseh (Nu 26:29).

(2) Natives of the district of Gilead (Jgs 10:3; 11:1, etc.).

Giglal, gig’îl, Gîlal, Gîlal, Gílal, Gîlô: The art. is always with the name except in Josh 5:9. There are three places to which the name is attached:

(1) The first camp of Israel after crossing the Jordan (Josh 4:19; 5:9-10; 6:10; 14:6; 16:7; Dt 11:30). According to Josh 15:7 it lay to the N. of the valley of Achor, which formed the border between Judah and Benjamin. Here 12 memorial stones taken from the bed of the river were set up by Joshua, after the miraculous crossing of the Jordan; and here (Josh 5:5ff) the people were circumcised preparatory to their possession of the land, when it is said in Josh, with a play upon the word, "The day have I rolled away the reproach of Egypt from off you." Whereupon the Passover was celebrated (ver 10) and the manna ceased (ver 12). To Gilgal the ark returned every day after having compassed the city of Jericho during its siege (6:11). Hither the Gibeonites came to make their treaty (9:3ff), and again (10:6) to ask aid against the Amorites. Gilgal was still the headquarters of the Israelites after the battle with the Amorites (ver 15); again after Joshua's extensive victorious campaign in the hill country of Judæa extending to Kadesh-barnea and Gaza (10:15ff); and still later upon his return from the great battle at the Waters of Merom (14:6). At the conclusion of the conquest (18:1), the headquarters were transferred to Shiloh on the summit of the mountain ridge to the W.

Gilgal reappears frequently in subsequent history. Samuel (1 S 7:10) made it one of the three places where he annually held circuit court, the other places being Bethel and Mizpah. The LXX text adds that these were holy places. The place continued of especial request for sacrifices (10:8; 13:6,9,10; 15:21), while it was here that Samuel hewed Agag to pieces before the Lord (15:33), and that Saul was both crowned (11:14,15) and rejected as king. It was at Gilgal, also (2 S 12:15), that the people assembled to welcome David as he returned from his exile beyond Jordan during Abialem's rebellion. The early prophets refer to Gilgal as a center of idolatry in their day (Hos 4:15; 5:15; 12:11; Am 4:4; 5:5). Micah (6:5) represents Gilead as at the other end of the Dead Sea from Shittim.

In 1874 Conder recognized the name Gilgal as surviving in Birket Jiylak, a pool beside a tamarisk tree 3 miles E. of old Jericho. The pool measures 100 ft. by 84, and is surrounded with a wall of roughly hewn stones. N. of the pool Bliss discovered lines of masonry 300 yds. long, representing probably the foundations of an ancient monastery. S. of the pool there are numerous mounds scattered over an area of one-third of a sq. mile, the largest being 50 ft. in diameter, and 10 ft. in height. On excavation some pottery and glass were found. These ruins are probably those of early Christian occupation, and according to Conder there is nothing against their marking the original site. Up to the Middle Ages the 12 stones of Joshua were referred to by tradition.

(2) According to 2 K 2:1; 4:38, Elisha for a time made his headquarters at Gilgal, a place in the mountains not far from Bethel identified by Conder as Jiylak, sitting on a high bank of the Wady el-Jib. It is lower than Bethel, but the phrase in 2 K 2:2, "they went down to Beth-el," may refer to their initial descent into the wady. It could not have been said that they went down from Gilgal to Bethel in the Jordan valley. It seems to be referred to in Neh 12:29 as Beth-gilgal.

(3) Gilgal of the nations: In Josh 12:23 Gilgal is mentioned as a royal city associated with Dor, evidently upon the maritime plain. Dor is identified with Tamarus, while Conder identifies this Gilgal with Jiylak, 30 miles S. of Dor and 4 miles N. of Anti-patris. George Frederick Wright

Gihon, gîhôn (גיהם, gîhôn, gîhôn): A town in the hill country of Judah mentioned along with Jattis, Socoh, Debir, Eshtemoa, etc (Josh 15:51). Athithophel came from here (2 S 16:12) and is called the Gilonite (2 S 23:34). Driver infers from this last that the original form was Gilon, not Gihon. Probably the ruins K. Feb, in the hills 3 miles N.W. of Halbuth, mark the site (FRP, II, 315, Sh XXI).

Gilonite, gîhôn-ît. See preceding article.

Gimele, gîmel’ (גִּמֵֽל, gîmel’, Gimel): The 3d letter of the Heb alphabet, and used as such to designate the 3d part of Ps 119; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia with the dagess as g, and without as gh (aspirated g). It came also to be used for the number three (3), and with the dieresis for 3,000. For name, etc, see Alphabet.

Gimzo, gim’zo (גימז, gimzo; Διμζω, Ganzo): A town of Judah on the border of the Phili plain, captured by the Philis in the days of Ahaz (2 Ch 28:18). It is the modern Jinsa, a small mud village about 33 miles S.E. of Ludd (Lydda), on the old mule road from there to Jerus (Robinson, BR, II, 248-49; SW P, II, 297).

Gin, jîn (גין, mākēsh, jîn, pāk): A noise of hair or wire for snaring wild birds alive. There are over half a dozen traps and net devices indicated by different terms in the Bible. The gin was of horse-hair for small birds alive. There is it mentioned in Am 3:5: "Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no gin is set for him? Shall he snare one in the ground, when there is none at all?" Job working in mental and physical discomfort on the ash heap included all methods mentioned in one outburst:
"For he is cast into a net by his own feet, And he walketh upon the toils. A gin shall take him by the heel, And a snare shall lay hold on him. A noose is hid for him in the ground, And a trap for him in the way" (Job 18:8 ff).

GINATH, gî'nâth (גִּנֹ֖את, ginâth): Father of Töbi, the unsuccessful rival of Omri (1 K 16 21, 22).

GINNETHOI, gî'né-thô (AV Ginnetho), GINNETHON, ginêt-thôn (גִּנְנֵתָו, ginnetôw, and גִּנְנֵתָו, ginnetôw): The head of a priestly family. Ginnethoi (Ginnetho) is found in Neh 12 4, and Ginnethon in 10 6; 12 16.

GIRDLE, gîrdl'. See Armor; Dress.

GIRGASITE, gîr'gà-sît (גִּרְגָּשִׁי, girgâshi; גִּרְגָּסִי, girgassî; גַּרְגָּסִי, Gergessâ; also punctuated [?]): Gergase (Gen 10 16 AV); A son of (the land of) Canaan (Gen 10 16), and accordingly enumerated along with the Canaanite in the list of tribes or nationalities inhabiting that country (Gen 15 21; Dt 7 1; Josh 3 10; 24 11; Neh 9 8). It has been supposed that the name was survived in that of "the Gergasene (Gerasenes)" (AV, Dt 32 20; Lk 10 13), Mt 8 28, on the E. side of the Sea of Galilee; Jos (Ant, I, vi, 2), however, states that nothing was known about it. The inscriptions of the Egypt king, Rameses II, mention the Qarqish who sent help to the Hittites in their war with Egypt; but Qarqish was more probably in Asia Minor than in Syria. Finch (The OT in the Light of the Historical Records, 324) would identify the Girgasites with the Kirkishati of an Assyrian tablet; the latter people, however, seem to have lived in the E. of the region and it may be that, as in the case of the Hittites, a colony of the Qarqish, from Asia Minor, was established in Pal. A. H. Sayce.

GIRL, gîrl: Twice in the OT as the rendering of נְפָרָי (nâfarî), wîlsâh (Joel 3 13; Zec 8 5), in both cases in association with boys. Same word rendered "damsel" in Gen 34 4. See Daughter; Maid, Maiden.

GIRZITES, gîr'zît's. See Girzites.

GISHPA, gîsh'pa (AV Gispa; נַפָּשָׁ, gîshpâ): An officer of the Nethinim (Neh 11 21). A companion, seen to have lived in the E of the region and it may be that, as in the case of the Hittites, a colony of the Qarqish, from Asia Minor, was established in Pal. A. H. Sayce.

GITAH-HEPHER, git-â'hé-fîr (גִּתָּה הֶפֶר, gitâh hêpher): AV (Josh 19 13) for Gath-hepher. Gitah is correctly Gath with hê (히) locale, meaning "toward Gath."

GITTAIM, git'a-im (גִּתַּיָּם, gitaiyam): The town to which the Beerothites fled, and where they lived as gärâm, or protected strangers (2 S 4 3). The place need not have been beyond the boundaries of Benjamin, so it may be identical with Gittaim of Neh 11 33, which was occupied by Benjaminites after the exile. It is named with Hazor and Ramah; but so far the site has not been discovered.

GITTITES, git'tîts (גִּתִּים, gîttîm, pl. of gittî): The inhabitants of Gath. They are mentioned along with the inhabitants of the other chief Philistines in Josh 13 3. It would seem that numbers of them emigrated to Judah, for we find 600 of them acting as a bodyguard to David with Ittai at their head (2 S 15 18 ff; 18 2). Obed-edom, to whom David intrusted the ark when he was frustrated in bringing it into the city of David, was a Gittite (2 S 6 11; 1 Chr 13 13). The Gittites seem to have been remarkable for their great stature (2 S 21 19; 1 Ch 20 5 ff).

GITTITH, gî'tîth. See Music; Psalms.

GIVE (נָתוּנָה, nàthân, נָתָה, yàthâh, נָתָה, sâm; םִּיתּ, sidômî): "Give" is a very common word in the OT. It is most frequently the tr of nàthân, "to give" (Gen 1 28; 3 6; Ex 2 9; Dt 5 20, etc., over 800 instances); nàthân is also tr. of "to give up" (Dt 23 14; Isa 43 6; Hos 11 8); of yàthâh, "to give" (Gen 30 1; 1 Ch 16 28 AV). In Ps 55 22 we have the perfect with suffix, "Cast thy burden upon Jeh," in "what he hath given thee"; elsewhere it is the imperative "Give" (AV in Gen, "Go to"); sâm, "to put", "place" (Nu 6 26; Prov 8 29); rûm, "to lift up," "exalt" (2 Ch 30 24 bis; 35 7.8.9, "to give to"); shâbêh, "to cause to turn back" (Lev 25 51.52; 2 K 17 3, "to give again"); various other words in single instances (tôdômî,

In the NT, the common word is didômî, "to give" (Mt 4 9; Jn 1 12; Rev 1 1; 21 6, etc); we have also apodidômî, "to give away (from one's self)" (Mt 12 36; Lk 16 2; Acts 4 33; 19 40; Rev 22 12); prodidômî, "to give into the hands of" (2 Th 3 5); eidoimô, "to give up or besides" (Mt 7 9.10; Jn 13 26); mealadidômî, "to give a share" (Rom 12 8); paradidômî, "to give over to" (Rom 1 28; 1 Cor 13 5; Gal 2 20, etc); predidômî, "to give forth or for (from)" (Rom 10 5); metadidômî, "to give to appointment" (1 Pet 3 7); dôrêkamî, "to give as a gift" (Mk 15 45, RV "granted"; 2 Pet 1 3.4 AV; marturêô, "to give testimony or witness" (1 Jn 5 10); pariephêrô, "to bring forward therewith" (2 Pet 1 5); othôrôô, "to hold (in)" (1 Tim 3 13; Tit 3 8); kalâthêrô, "to bear against or down" (Acts 26 10); charismôzai, "to grant as a favor" (Lk 7 21; Acts 27 24; Rom 8 32; Gal 3 18; Phil 2 9; Philem ver 22 AV). A few other words mostly occurring singly are tê'dômî, "to give.

Of the many changes in RV, the following are among the most important: for "Thou hast also given me the necks of mine enemies," "Thou hast also made mine enemies turn their backs unto me" (2 S 22 41); Ps 18 40 for "He that layeth his hand upon his sword and his bow against unto him" (Job 40 19), ARV has "He only that made him giveth him his sword," ERVm "furnished"; for "hasten after another god" (Ps 16 4), ARV has "give gifts for" (ERVm); for "give" (Ps 43 3) for "give myself unto wine" (Eccl 2 3), "cheer my flesh with wine"; for "giveth his life" (Jn 10 11), "layeth down"; "given" is supplied (Acts 19 2), where we read instead of "We have not so much as heard whether there be any Holy Ghost" "We did not so much as hear whether the Holy Spirit was given," in "there is a Holy Spirit"; for "Christ shall give thee light" (Eph 5 14), "Christ shall shine upon thee"; for "give in charge" (1 Tim 5 8), "command"; for "not given to wine" (1 Tim 3 5; 2 Tim 1 7), "no brawler," "no quarellers over wine"; for "she that liveth in pleasure" (1 Tim 5 6), "giveth herself to"; for "All scripture is given by inspiration of God" (2 Tim 3 16), "Every scripture inspired of God"; for "given to filthy lucre" (Tit 1 7), "greedy of"; in He 2 16, ARV has "For verily not to angels doth he give help," m for "For verily not of angels doth he take hold, but he taketh hold," etc (cf Isa 44 9; 1 Pet 4 10; 2 Pet 2 4). In the Gr ERVm, "not of angels doth he take hold" (2 Pet 2 10), "Eden (of taking hold of to lift up or help); in 13 15 for "giving thanks to his name," RV reads make confession to his name; for giving all diligence" (2 Pet 1 5), "adding."
The prominence of "give" in the Bible reminds us that God is the great Giver (Jas 1:5), and of the words of the Lord Jesus, "It is more blessed to give than to receive" (Acts 20:35), "Freely ye received, freely give" (Mt 10:8).

GIZONITE, gi'zon-It: This gentile name in 1 Cb 11:34, "Hashem the Gizonite," is probably an error for "Guneite" (cf Nu 26:48), and the passage should be corrected, after 2 S 23:32, into "Jashen the Guneite.

GIZRITES, gi'zri'tes (גִּיזְרִי, gēzērī [Kethib]; AV Gezrites): Inhabitants of Gezer (q.v.). Kērē reads יֵזִיר, gēzērī; Girzites (1 S 27:8).

GLAD TIDINGS, tī'dingz (εὐαγγέλιον, euaggelíon): "Glad-tidings" occurs in AV in the tr of the vb. euaggélizeō, "to tell good news" (Lk 1:19; 8:1; Acts 13:32; Rom 10:15); in each instance, except the last, RV trn "good tidings." The vb. is also very frequently trn in AV "to preach the gospel," the original meaning of which word (god-spell) is "good news or tidings" (Mt 11:5; Lk 4:18; 7:22; 9:6; 20:1); in the first two passages RV substitutes "good tidings," m. "the gospel"; in the last two instances "the gospel" is retained, AV has "the gospel," viz. that of God's reconciliation of the world to Himself in Christ; RV in some passages substitutes "good tidings," or gives this in the margin; but "glad tidings" stands only in Rom 10:15.

GLASS, glas (גָּלַס, ḫākhāb); Glass, kyōs; kalos): Glass is of great antiquity. The story of its discovery by accident, as related by Pliny

1. History (NH, xxxvi.65), is apocryphal, but it was natural for the Greeks and Romans to ascribe it to the Phoenicians, since they were the producers of the article as known to them. The Egypt monuments have revealed to us the manufacture in a time so remote that it must have preceded that of the Phenicians. A representation of glass-blowing on monuments of the Old Empire, as formerly supposed, is now regarded as doubtful, but undoubted examples of glazed pottery of that age exist. A fragment of blue glass has been found inscribed with the name of Antef III, of the Xth Dynasty, dating from 2000 or more BC (Davis, Ancient Egypt, 324). The oldest dated bottle, or vase, is one bearing the name of Thothmes III, 1500 or more BC, and numerous examples occur of later date. The close connection between Egypt and Syria from the time of Thothmes on must have made glass known in the latter country, and the Phenicians, so apt in all lines of trade and manufacture, naturally seized on glass-making as a most profitable art and they became very proficient in it. The earliest glass was not very transparent, since they did not know how to free the materials used from impurities. It had a greenish or purplish tinge, and a large part of the examples we have of Phoenician glass exhibit this. But we have many examples of blue, red and yellow varieties which were purposely colored, and others quite opaque and of a whitish color, resembling porcelain (Perrot and Chipiez, Art in Ancient Phoenicia and Its Dependencies). But both they and the Egyptians made excellent transparent glass also, and decorated it with brilliant coloring on the surface (ib; Beni Hasan, Archaeol. Survey of Egypt, Pt IV). Layard (Nineveh and Babylon) mentions a vase of transparent glass bearing the name of Sargon (522-505 BC), and glass was early known to the Babylonians.

Phoenicia was the great center, and the quantities found in tombs of Syria and Pal to go confirm the statement that this was one of the great industries of this people, to which some ancient authors testify (Strabo, Geog.; Pliny, NH). Jos refers to the sand of the Beha as that from which glass was made (BJ, II, x). It seems to have been esp. adapted for the purpose, but there are other places on the coast where plenty of suitable sand could be obtained. The potash required was obtained by burning certain marine and other plants, and saltpetre, or nitre, was also employed. The manufacture began centuries BC on this coast, and in the 12th cent. AD a factory is mentioned as still being worked at Tyre, and the manufacture was later carried on at Hebron, even down to recent times (Perrot and Chipiez).

Both the Egyptians and Phenicians gained such proficiency in making transparent and colored glass that they imitated precious stones with such skill as to deceive the unawary. Necklaces are found composed of a mixture of real brilliants and glass imitators. Cut glass was manufactured in Egypt as early as the XVIIIth Dynasty, and diamonds were used for the art. Glass composed of different colors in the same piece was made by placing layers of glass wire, of different colors, one above the other and then fusing them so that they became united in a solid mass without intermingling. Colored designs on the surface were produced by treating the patterns, while the glass was still warm and plastic, deep enough to receive the threads of colored glass which were imbedded in them. The whole was heated again sufficiently to fuse the threads and attach them to the body. The surface was then made even by polishing. By this process vessels and ornaments of very beautiful design were produced. Many of the specimens, as found, are covered by an exquisitely iridescent which is due wholly to the decomposition of the surface by chemical action, from being buried for centuries in the soil which thus acts upon it. This is often lost in handling by the scaling off of the outer surface.

Glass, in the strict sense, is rarely mentioned in Scripture, but it was certainly known to the He-

Glass, sea of (θάλασσα σαλίνη, thalassa hulain; Rev 4 6; 15 2): In the vision of heaven in these two apocalyptic passages a “glassy sea” is seen before the throne of God. The pure transparency of the sea is indicated in the Hebrew by the former reference “crystal”; and the fiery element that may symbolize the energy of the Divine holiness is suggested in the latter passage by the trait, “mingled with fire.” On the margin of this sea—on the inner side—stood the victorious saints, with harps, singing the song of Moses and of the Lamb (15 2–4). The imagery here points to a relation with the triumphal song in Ex 15, after the deliverance from Pharaoh at the Red Sea. It is not easy to define the symbolism precisely. The sea, reflecting in its crystaline depths the purity and holiness of the Divine character and administration, speaks at the same time of difficulties surmounted, victory obtained and safety assured, the after-glow of the Divine judgments which this result has been secured still illuminating the glassy expanse that has been crossed. James Orr Gleaning, glean ing (עֵקֵב, qēb, הָעַקֶב, 'akeb): The custom of allowing the poor to follow the reapers in the fields and glean the fields, or “to pluck the handfuls,” is strikingly illustrated in the story of Ruth (Ruth 2 2–23). This custom had back of it one of the early agricultural laws of the Hebrews (Lev 19 9; 23 22;Dt 24 19–21). Breaking this law was a punishable offense. The generosity of the master of the field determined the value of the gleanings, as the story of Ruth well illustrates (Ruth 2 16). A reaper could easily impose upon the master by leaving too much for the gleaners, who might be his own children. The old Levitical law no longer holds in the land, but the custom of allowing the poor to glean in the grain fields and vineyards is still practised by generous landlords in Syria. The writer has seen the reapers, even when they exercised considerable care, drop from their hands frequent spears of wheat. When the reapers have been hirelings they have carelessly left bunches of wheat standing behind rocks or near the boundary walls. The owner usually sends one of his boy or girl helpers to glean these. If he is of a generous disposition, he allows some needy woman to follow after the reapers and benefit by their carelessness. It is the custom in some districts, after the main crop of grapes has been gathered, to remove the watchmen and allow free access to the vineyards for gleaning the last grapes.

Gideon touched the local pride of the men of Ephraim when he declared that the glory of their conquest surpassed his, as the gleanings of their vineyards did the whole crop of Abiezzer (Jgs 8 2). Gleaned is used of a captured enemy in Jgs 20 45.

Figurative: Israel, because of her wickedness, will be utterly destroyed, even to a thorough gleaning and destruction of those who first escape (Jer 6 9). The same picture of complete annihilation is given in Jer 49 9.10. James A. Patch

Glede, glede (גָּלֶד, gāled; γάλας, galas): A member of the hawk species. It is given among the list of abominations in Dt 14 15, but not in the Lev list (Lev 11 14). The kite is substituted. The Arabs might have called one of the buzzards the glede. In England, where specimens of most of these birds appear in migration, the glede is synonymous with the kite, and was given the name from glede, to emphasize a gliding motion in flight. See illustration, p. 1235.

Glistering, glistering (גָּלֶד, gāled, "dye" [spec. "ebizium"]; "fair colors": στιλβωτικα, stilbonia); “Glistering stones” (1 Ch 29 2) is better

Brews, and occurs in Job 28 17 (trn “crystal” in AV). Bottles, cups and other vessels in glass must have been in use to some extent. The wine cup of Prov 23 31 and the bottle for tears mentioned in Ps 66 6 were most likely of glass. Tear bottles are found in great quantities in the tombs throughout the land and were undoubtedly connected with funeral rites, the mourners collecting their tears and placing them in these bottles to be buried with the dead. As mourners were hired for the purpose, the number of these bottles would indicate the extent to which the deceased was honored. These were, of course, small, some quite diminutive (see illustration), as also were the vials or pots to contain the ointment for the eyebrows and eyelashes, used to heighten the beauty of the women, which was probably a custom among the Hebrews as well as their neighbors. Rings, bracelets and anklets of glass are very common and were doubtless worn by the Hebrew women (see Isa 3 18). In the NT the Gr ἰαλοὶ occurs in Rev 21 18–21, and the adj. derived from it (ιαλοῖν) in 4 6 and 15 2. In the other passages, where in AV “glass” occurs, the reference is to “looking-glass,” or mirror, which was not made of glass, but of bronze, and polished so as to reflect the light similar to glass. The Heb word for this is מַרְדָּח, mara'kh (Lev 9 22), or מִרְדָּח, marah (Ex 39 8), and the Gr ἦρατορος, έκρατορος (1 Cor 13 12; Jas 1 23; cf Wind 7 26; Sir 12 11).

The composition of the Phoen glass varies considerably. The analysis shows that, besides the ordinary constituents of silica, lime, lead, potash or soda, other elements are found, some being used for the purpose of coloring, such as manganese to give the purplish or violet hue, cobalt for blue, copper for red, etc. The articles illustrated above are of ordinary transparent glass with an iridescent surface, caused by decomposition, as mentioned above, indicated by the scaly appearance. than the 'inlaid' of RV; for some kind of colored, brilliant stone seems meant' (HDB, II, 182); cf. Isa 54 11 RVm. The term is employed in Mk 9 3 to denote the white, lustrous appearance of Christ's garments at the transfiguration. It occurs nowhere else in the NT. For once the Divine effulgence shone through the veil of the humiliation (cf. Jn 1 14).

GLITTER, glit’er, GLITTERING, glit’er-ing (כַּכָּה, bāraḵ, "lightning"): The word is used in sense of "glittering" in the OT with "sword," "spear" (Dt 32 41; Job 20 25; Ezk 21 10; Nah 3 8; Hab 3 11). In Ezk 21 10 RV changes "glitter" to "as lightning," and in Dt 32 41 RVm gives, "the lightning of my sword." In Job 39 23, where the word is different (kāḇabḵ), RV has "flashing."

GLORIFY, glôr’i-fi: The Eng. word is the equivalent of a number of Heb and Gr words whose essential significance is discussed more fully under the word GLORY (q.v.). The word "glorious" in the phrases "make or render glorious" is used most frequently as a tr. of vb’s. in the original, rather than of genuine adj’s. In dealing with the vb. it will be sufficient to indicate the following most important uses.

(1) Men may glorify God, that is, give to Him the worship and reverence which are His due (Isa 24 15; 25 3; Ps 22 23; Dan 5 23; Sir 43 30; Mt 5 16, and generally in the Synoptic Gospels and in some other passages of the NT).

(2) God, Yahweh (Jehovah), glorifies His people, His house, and in the NT, His Son, manifesting His approval of them and His interest in them, by His interposition on their behalf (Isa 55 5; Jer 30 19; Wisd 18 8; Sir 45 3; Jn 7 39, and often in the Fourth Gospel).

(3) By a usage which is practically confined to the OT, Jeh glorifies Himself, that is, secures the recognition of His honor and majesty, by His direction of the course of history, or by His interposition in history, either the history of His own people or of the world at large (Lev 10 3; Isa 26 15; Ezek 28 22; Hag 1 8). Walter R. Betteridge

GLORIOUS, glôr’i-us: The adj. "glorious" is used in the majority of cases as the tr. of one of the nouns which are fully discussed in the article GLORY, and the general meaning is the same, for the glorious objects or persons have the quality which is described by the word "glory." That is, they are honorable, dignified, powerful, distinguished, splendid, beautiful or radiant. It is worthy of note that in many passages in the NT where AV has "glorious," RV has the noun "glory." So among others in Rom 8 21, AV has "glorious liberty." RV "liberty of the glory of the sons of God." The obsolete sense of the word "glorious" is, the word the glory in the sense of "boastful," "vain-glorious," "vagarious," "eager for glory," as it is used in Wycliffe, Tindale and Bacon, and once or twice in Shakespeare, as in Cymbeline, I, 7, in the first speech of Imogen, "Most miserable is the desire that's glorious," and in Gower's Prologue to Pentalc, 1, 9, "The purchase of it is to make men glorious" occurs at least once in the apocryphal books, 4 Macc 16 4, AV, "but also lifted up with the glorious words of lewd persons." I. Method of Treatment. In this art. we deal, first, with a group of words, ἀρετή, "glory" in the EV, and in which the ideas of size, rarity, beauty and adornment are prominent, the emphasis being laid in the first instance in each case upon some external physical characteristic which attracts the attention, and makes the object described by the word significant or prominent.

These are ἀδερθή (ἀδερθή, especially connected with the Assyry root ἀσαρθή, meaning "wide," "great": ἀδερθή, ἀδερθάργη, ἀδερθάρω, perhaps with root-meaning of "brightness": ἀδερθή, ἀδερθάργη, with essentially the same meaning of "brightness," "light": ἀδερθάργη, Ps 89 44, tr. "glory" in AV, in RV rendered "brightness"; τῶν ἀσαρτῶν, an Aram. root meaning "rare": τῶν ἀσαρτῶν, with the root-meaning of "beauty"; and finally ἀδερθή (ἀδερθή, perhaps on the basis of the Assyry ἀσαρθή, meaning "desire," "desirable.

Secondly, this art. will discuss the most common and characteristic word for "glory" in the OT, the Heb kāḇāhḵ (קַבְּחָה) including the special phrase "the glory of God" or "the glory of Jehovah." In dealing with the OT usage, attention will also be called to the original Heb of the Book of Eccles or Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sira. The word will be used in the concluding paragraphs in which the use of the word glory as a vb. will briefly be discussed. It will be possible within the limits of this art. to give only the main outlines of the subject as illustrated by a few of the most significant references. The lexicons and the commentaries must be consulted for the details.

II. General Use of the Terms

1. As Applied to External Things—In the first group, as has already been stated, the ideas of beauty, majesty and splendor are prominent. And these qualities are predicated first of all, of things. David determines to make the temple which Solomon is to build "a house of fame and of glory" (1 Ch 22:5). Then, and more commonly, glory belongs to men, and esp. to men of prominence, like kings. This glory may consist in wealth, power or honor, or even in the inherent majesty and dignity of character of his possessor. The reference is most frequently, however, to the external manifestations. Physical power is suggested in Dt 33:17, where "glory" of AV is replaced by "majesty" in RV. The king's glory consists in the multitude of his people (Prov 14:28). The glory and the pomp of the rebellious people shall descend into Sheol (Isa 5:14). Here the reference is clearly to those external things upon which the people depend for the possession of which is the ground of their confidence.

But chiefly glory is the possession and characteristic of Jeh, and is given by Him to His people or to anything which is connected with Him. In Isa 60:7 the Lord promises to glorify the house of His glory, and the meaning is clearly that He will impart to His house something of the beauty and majesty which belong to Him. Glory is one of the attributes which are indicative of Jeh (1 Ch 29:11); and Isaiah, in one of his earliest utterances, uses the word "glory" to describe Jeh's self-manifestation in judgment to bring to naught the pride and power of men (Isa 2:19.21). The use of the word in Ps 78:61 is not quite certain. The most natural interpretation would perhaps be to refer it to the ark as the symbol of the presence of Jeh, but in view of the word "strength," it is perhaps better to interpret glory as meaning power, and to suppose that the Psalmist means that Jeh allowed His power to be temporarily obscured, and Himself to be seemingly humiliated on account of the sin of His people.

2. As Applied to Jehovah—The use and significance of "kabhôd" in the OT and in Sir: The fundamental idea of this root seems to be "weight," "heaviness," and hence in its primary use it conveys the idea of some external, physical manifestation of dignity, preeminence or majesty. At least three senses may be distinguished: (1) It defines the wealth or other material possessions which give honor or distinction to a person; (2) the majesty, dignity, splendor or honor of a person; (3) most importantly of all, it describes the form in which Jehovah (Yahweh) reveals Himself, or is the sign and manifestation of His presence.

In Gen 31:1 (in "wealth") it describes the flocks and herds which Jacob has acquired; in Ps 45:6, "as the parallelism indicates, it refers to the wealth of the sinner; and Wealth in Isa 10:3 it said that in the day of desolation the heartless plunderers of the poor shall not know where to leave their ill-gotten gain. This idea is also probably to be found in Hag 2:7, where the parallelism seems to indicate that the glory with which Jeh will fill the house is the treasure which He will bring into it. See also Sir 9:11, where the glory of the sinner which is not to be envied is probably his wealth.

In Gen 45:13, Joseph bids his brethren tell their father of his glory in Egypt; according to Ex 28:40, the priestly garments are intended for the glorification of their wearers; in Is 4:11, the loss of the ark means, for Israel, the loss of her possession of the majesty and power of Jehovah, his majesty and preeminence over, her neighbors; in Isa 22:23 it is said that Elisha is to be a throne of glory, i.e. the source and manifestation of the splendor and dignity of his father's house; in Zech 14:10, the complaint that God has stripped him of his glory must be taken to refer to his dignity and honor. Reference may also be made to the numerous passages in which the glory of Israel and other nations is described in terms of dignity, majesty or distinction; so we hear of the glory of Ephraim (Hos 9:11), of Moab (Isa 16:14), of Kedar (Isa 21:10). This use is quite common in Sir. Sir 3:10 states that the glory of man comes from the honor of his father; the possessor of wisdom shall inherit glory (4:13; 37:26); note also 4:21 with its reference to "a shame that is glory and grace," and 49:5 where the forfeited independence of Judah is described by the terms "power" and "glory.

Closely related to this use of "kabhôd" to describe the majesty of men is the group of passages in which the phrase "my glory" in parallelism with nephes (םינפ), "soul," "Soul": the "self," or some similar expression, Self means the man himself in his most characteristic nature; according to the blessing of Jacob (Gen 49:6) we read, "unto their assembly, my glory, be not thou united." Other passages are Ps 4:2; 7:5; 16:9; 30:12; 57:8; 108:1 and perhaps Job 29:20. Some recent interpreters, partly because of the LXV rendering in Gen 49:6 (אָנָהּ הקַבֵּר בְּנֵי, "my liver," and partly because of the Assyr. root, kôbîhtu, meaning "temper" or "heart" (see Delitzsch, Assyrisches Handwörterbuch, 317a), would read in all these passages kabhôd, lit. "liver," as in Lam 2:11, and interpret the figure as referring to the emotions as the expression of the self. The arguments in favor of the change are not without weight. Of course on either interpretation the language is highly figurative. It hardly seems necessary to change the reading, esp. as the LXX renders the passages in the Ps's and in Job by doza, the ordinary Gr rendering for kabhôd, and it does not seem improbable that in poetry the word kabhôd might be used to describe the man himself, indicating that man as a being of majesty and glorious, possibly because as in Ps 8:1, he is thought of as having been crowned by his Creator with glory and honor.

Before leaving this use of kabhôd it is necessary to call attention to the fact that in a few cases it is used to describe things, perhaps because these things are thought of as practically personified. The "glory of the forest" (Isa 10:18) is clearly a personification, referring to the majestic force of the Assyrians. We may probably assume a personification also in the case of the glory of Lebanon in Isa 35:2; 60:13, and of the nature of God in Ezek 11:21, makes it probable that personification is intended in ver 15.

But unquestionably the most important use of the word kabhôd is its employment in the following gen. God or Jeh, or absolutely, to describe the method or the circumstances of the self-manifestation of God. In discussing this subject we shall make it as clear as possible the use of the term as connected with actual or anticipated manifestations of the Deity, and then with its use to describe the characteristic features of the ideal state of the future, or, otherwise stated, the Messianic kingdom.

(1) Ex 23:18 ff.—The significance of the phrase in its earliest occurrence is by no means clear. Notwithstanding the uncertainly as to the exact documentary connection of the famous passage in Ex 33:18 ff, it seems quite certain that we may claim that this is the historical reference, and that the OT contains to the glory of Jeh. "And he [Moses] said, Show me, I pray thee, thy glory. And he [Jeh] said, Thou canst not see my face; and it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a cleft of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand until I have passed by, then will I take away my hand, and thou shalt see my back; but my face shall not be seen." The passage in its present form bears unmistakable evidences of the editorial hand, due perhaps, as Brunstsch (Handkommentar zu Ex 34) suggests, to a desire to transform the primitive, concrete, physical theophany into a revelation of the ethical glory of God, but in its basis it belongs to J and is therefore the earliest literary reference to the glory of God in the OT. The glory of Jeh is clearly a physical manifestation, a form with hands and rear parts, of which Moses is permitted to catch only a passing glimpse, but the implication is clear that he actually does see Jeh with his physical eyes.

It seems not improbable that in its original form it was related to the story of the glory, i.e., the form of Jeh, and thus that we are to find in this narrative the source for the passage of Nu 12:8. (In Ex 34:6 Moses beheld (or perhaps better rendering the sense as a frequentative), beholds the form of Jeh (see also the description, Ex 33:19-23). The mention of the cloud (Ex 34:5) as the accompaniment of the manifestation of the glory, and of the cloud being outlined in cloud and flame, and that Jeh was originally thought of as manifesting Himself in connection with meteorological or more probably volcanic phenomena.

The glory of Jeh is here regarded as something visible, something, a part of which at least, isiah sees. The glory as such has no ethical significance except as it is the method of manifestation of one who is undoubtedly an ethical being. The phraseology of theokeophany, in Ex 34:6, the skirt with the skirts without, the glory which fills the whole earth refer to the phenomena of fire and smoke. Some think that the smoke is that which rose from the burning of incense, and would fill the temple in connection with the sacrificial observances. But horror of these observances, this interpretation is very questionable. A more probable interpretation connects the clouds and gloom with the phenomena of a great storm, and even possibly of an earthquake, for it seems highly plausible that the call of Isaiah in the year of the death of King Uzziah coincided with the great earthquake in the days of Uzziah referred to in Zec 14:8. (It seems at least probable that the references to the darkness and light in Zec 14:6 ff may have their origin in the phenomena attendant upon this earthquake. It is probable that the earthquake by which the prophecy of Amos is dated (Am 1:1) is also some historic earthquake.) The clouds and fire attendant upon the form or earth said to become visible by which the glory of Jeh is made known to the youthful prophet, and this glory partly, reveals and passes away, is the presence of Jeh which, through, and in part by means of, these phenomena, Isaiah is made so vividly conscious.

This conception of Isaiah that the glory of Jeh fills the earth is closely related to the thought that "the heavens declare the glory of God; and the firmament sheweth his handiwork," the difference being that in the psalm Jeh's glory is manifested in the ordinary mind rather than in the extraordinary phenomena. Parallel thoughts may be found in Ps 8:1; 17:5; 21:6; 29:11; 115:3. In Ps 29:1-2:5:9, as in Isaiah, the glory of Jeh is revealed in the extraordinary physical phenomena which the psalm describes. Glory here is a purely external, meteorological thing and is the manifestation of the presence of Jeh. It is not a matter of interpretation that the psalm is regarded, as it usually is, as a description of a thunderstorm, or whether with von Gall and others it is taken as a description of the phenomena which accompany the inauguration of the Messianic kingdom (see Joel 2:28 f). Nevertheless the psalm is, as it is generally said, in the account of the dedication of Solomon's temple (1 K 8:10 f; 2 Ch 5:14). The cloud which filled the house of Jeh, preventing the priests from ministering, is identified with the glory of Jeh which filled the house. It is noteworthy that in 2 Ch 7:1-3 the glory of Jeh which fills the house manifests itself in the form of the cloud of smoke from the sacrifices which were consumed by the fire coming down from heaven.

(5) Ezekiel's vision. Perhaps the most elaborate description of the glory of Jeh to be found in the OT is that given by Ezekiel in the various accounts of his visions. It is not easy to interpret his conception, but it seems clear that he does not identify the glory with a cloud, but sees it as being like a man upon the throne (ver 26). The same idea is indicated in 9:3 which states that "the glory of the God of Israel was gone up from the cherub, wherupon it was." that is, the glory is something peculiar to Jeh, and is not quite identical with the phenomena which accompany it. This is true of all his visions. The glory of Jeh manifests itself with all the accompaniments which he describes with such richness of imagery, but the accompaniments are not the glory. For other descriptions of the glory of Jeh in Ezekiel, see 3:12:23; 8:4; 10:4.18:8; 11:22.

Very similar to this conception of Ezekiel is that given in those passages of the Pentateuch which are usually assigned to the P. When the children of Israel murmured at the barren wilderness, the Lord punished them with a lack of food, the glory of Jeh appeared in the cloud as they "looked toward the wilderness" (Ex 16:7:10; cf Ex 24:16 f). And just as in Ezek, the glory is distinguished from its attendant circumstances; for after the completion of the Tent of Meeting, the cloud covers the tent, and the glory of Jeh fills the tabernacle (Ex 40:34; see also Lev 9:23; Nu 14:21; 16:19-42; 20:6). The same thought is suggested in the references in Sir 17:13; 46:3.

(6) Messianic ideal.—These passages just cited stand on the border between the historical and the ideal descriptions of the glory of Jeh, for whatever may be one's views as to the historical worth of P's account of the Exodus and the wilderness sojourn, all must agree in seeing in it really the program or constitution for the ideal state of the future. And in this state the distinguishing characteristic is to be the manifest presence of Jeh in His sanctuary, and this manifestation is the view of Ezekiel, for whom the essential action in the establishment of the new community is the return of the glory of Jeh to the house of Jeh (Ezek 43:24.5; 44:4). The same thought is very clearly in Is 40:4, which may suggest the basis of a slight rearrangement and regrouping of the original, 'And Jeh will create over ...' Mt. Zion.
. . . a cloud and smoke by day, and the shining of a flaming fire by night; for over everything the glory of the Lord shall be spread abroad: and it shall serve as a shelter from the heat, and a refuge and a covert from the storm and the rain.' This has the advantage that it furnishes an intelligible and characteristic conclusion to the description of the Messianic age which the chapter contains.

Isa. 11 10, reading with RVm, "and his resting-place shall be glory," has the same thought, for it is clearly the glory of Jeh that is manifested in the resting-place of the root of Jesse, and this resting-place can be identified with Zion (cf. Ps 84 2) and the OT discussion of kâbÂ°bÂ°h, so that the root of Jesse is the hope of Israel, and the thought is Jeh, even though the words may be Gr.

(1) As applied to external things.—It will be perhaps a little more convenient to deal with the usage of the Apoc separately, following essentially the order in which the OT discussion of kâbÂ°bÂ°h, and bearing in mind that the usage of doza in the OT is under the OT. The use of the word "glory" to describe the honor, reputation and splendor which may be ascribed to God is perhaps the commonest. Ezek. 1 13 refers to the glory of Josiah, while in Wisd. 10 14 the perpetual glory given by Wisd. to Joseph must be interpreted in the same way. In 2 Macc. 5 16 20 glory refers to the beautification and adornment of the temple in a sense like that of Isa 80 10. Jth 15 9 "glory" is the tr. of the Gr kurtama, and indicates that Judith is the pride of Israel.

(2) As applied to men.—But the most significant use of doza in the Apoc is that in which it refers to the sight and splendor which are regarded as the accompaniments of God. The reference may be to the historic manifestation of God in glory, as in Ex 14 22 Ezk 8 19, or to the manifestation of God in Israel, which is to be the especial characteristic of the Messianic kingdom, as in 1 Enoch 5 3, where the praise of the Lord, "because his goodness and his glory are forever in Israel," are based on the fact that Jeh is about to establish the Messianic kingdom among the people who have bound themselves to obey His law. In several passages in 2 Esd the tr. of doza is not to the Messianic kingdom in the historical sense, but rather to that kingdom of God which the saints are to inherit after death. This is clearly the thought in 2 Esd. 2 36 and in 7 52; also in 8 51 where the context shows clearly that the reference is to the Paradise, which is the heritage of all those who are like Ezra in their devotion to Jeh (cf. Isa 11 50).

But most frequently in the Apoc, in a sense which approximates that of the NT, the word "glory" refers to the blaze of light and splendor which is the essential expression of the holy majesty of Jeh. The prayer of Manasseh refers to the unapproachable majesty of the glory of Jeh; while 2 Esd 8 30, trusting in Jeh's glory is equivalent to trusting in Jeh Himself; and in 16 53 the oath "before God and his glory" is simply before the Lord God Himself. The same thought is expressed in Tob. 19 13; 14; Wisd. 7 25; 25 3. In the Three, vs. 31 the glory of Jeh refers to His self-manifestation in His heavenly kingdom, and this is undoubtedly the significance of the frequently recurring doxologies, "Thine is the glory forever."

(1) As applied to men.—In the NT, much the same variety of usage is to be noted as in the OT and the Apoc, and it is not easy to trace the exact relationship and order of the various meanings. The classical use of the word in the sense of "opinion," "judgment," "view," occurs in Hel. 17 5 (18) on the authority of Thayer.

It is perhaps as convenient to follow generally the order adopted in the preceding discussion. In some places the word refers to the manifestations and insignia of rank and power, as in the familiar phrase, "Solomon in all his glory" (Mt 2 29), or the glory of the kings, as in 1 Enoch 51 11, or the glory of the kings and nations of the earth which shall be brought into the heavenly city (Rev 21 24. 26). Doza also defines the praise, honor and dignity of men. This is the meaning in Jn 5 41 44, where Christ speaks of the relationship between Jeh and Himself in that He receives not glory from men, while they receive glory one of another (cf. also Jn 7 18).

In Eph. 3 13, Paul declares that his tribulations for those to whom he is writing are a glory or distinction to them, while in 1 Thess. 2 20 he declares that the Thessalonian Christians are his glory and joy.

(2) As applied to God.—Closely related to this usage is the employment of the word to ascribe honor and praise to God; see Lk 17:18, where only the stranger returned to give glory to God; or Jn 9:24, where the man who had been born blind is bidden to give glory to God; or the phrase "to the glory of God" in Rom 15:7, where the meaning is to secure the honor and praise of God always. Similarly is the use in the frequently recurring doxologies such as, "Glory to God in the highest," "to him," that is, to God, "be glory," etc.

While the foregoing meanings are frequently illustrated in the NT, it is undoubtedly true that the characteristic use of the word doxa in the NT is in the sense of brightness, brilliance, splendor; and first of all, in the literal sense, referring to the brightness of the heavenly bodies, as in 1 Cor 15:40, or to the supernatural brightness which overcame Saul of Tarsus on the road to Damascus (Acts 22:11).

(3) As applied to the saints.—But the most common use of the word is to describe the brilliance which is the characteristic of all persons who share in the heavenly glory. Moses, Elijah and Jesus Himself have this glory on the Mt. of Transfiguration (Lk 9:31). It was the same glory which gave the angel who came out of heaven power to lighten the earth (Rev 1:16), and also which the shepherd mentioned above came and appeared unto them (Lk 2:9). Paul refers to this glory, when he speaks of the face of Moses as it appeared after God had spoken with him (2 Cor 3:7). And as in the case of Moses, so here, the source of this glory is God Himself, who is the God of glory (Acts 7:2, and frequently).

(4) As applied to the Messianic kingdom.—It is also used to describe the ideal Messianic kingdom of the future. It is applied to Christ to describe His royal majesty when He comes to set up His kingdom. So James and John ask to sit, one on His right hand and one on His left in His glory (Mk 10:37). Christ is to appear in glory with the angels (Mt 16:27 and often), for His condition in the coming age as it was before the incarnation is a condition of glory (Lk 24:26; Jn 17:5-22). But not merely the Messiah, but all His followers shall share in the glory of the Messianic kingdom. This use is so common that it is scarcely necessary to illustrate or reference. The glory is to be revealed to all Christians in the future (Rom 8:17; 21; 9:23; cf also 1 Cor 2:7; 2 Cor 4:17).

In all these cases it has a distinctly ethical significance, for the term is used to describe the essential nature, the perfection of the holy and holy, and is used by others because they are made partakers of the Divine nature. So Paul refers to "the glory of the incorruptible God" (Rom 1:23; cf also Eph 1:17, and often). And the essential nature of Christ comes to be described in the same way. He has glory as of the only begotten of the Father (Jn 1:14); he shows His glory in the performance of miracles (Jn 2:11); and like the Father, He is the Lord of glory (1 Cor 2:8).

As a vb. in the OT the most common significance of the word "glory," is to make one's boast in or of anything, usually of the pious glorifying in Yahweh (Jeh), but occasionally with some other reference, as in Jer 9:23 of man glorying in his riches, might or wisdom. In all these cases it represents the Heb hith-ki'd. In Ex 8:9 this phrase, "Have the people, say, glory me," is the tr. of the Heb hith-ki'd. And means to take the honor or distinction as regards me. In 2 K 14:10 it translates the Heb hik-kabbeh, "honor thyself," i.e. be satisfied with the home which you have already attained.

In the apocryphal books it means either "glory thyself" in the tr. of the vb. doxa, as in Sir 3:10, where the original Heb has hik-kabbeh, or "to exult," "boast over," as in Jth 9:7, where it represents the Gr glaurōma; or "to boast," "to take pride in," where it represents, as it does equally in the NT, the Gr kauchēma (Sir 17:9; 24:1; 38:25; 39:8; 45:4, in the second and fourth of which cases it represents the Heb kauchēma). In the NT the vb. is used 3 t in Jas, and several times in the Eph. of Paul, and everywhere is used to translate the vb. kauchēma, or, in two cases in Jas, the same vb. is compounded with the preposition kaló, In all these cases the meaning is "to take pride in," "to congratulate oneself," upon anything.

In this connection attention may be called to the use of the noun "glory," one's twice rendered "to glory," where the meaning is either the occasion or ground of glorying, or sometimes the act of glorying. The original has kauchēma or kauchēsē, This usage occurs in Jas 4:16; He 3:6, and several times in the Eph. of Paul.

Literature.—In addition to the commentaries and works on biblical and theological topics (cf. D. Bruce, ICC on the Pse. Scribner, N.Y., 1906, esp. the note in 1, 66, 67; and Nades. Bib. Theology of the Old Testament, Leipzig, 1882-83, may be mentioned esp. the chief works on the subject are von Gall, Die Herrlichkeit Gottes, Halle, 1906, and Deshag. Der Herrlichkeit Gottes im Hebräischen, Leipzig, 1908. The discussions by Gr. Gray and J. M. Robinson are also valuable, and the also brief but significant article by Zecca in the Standard Bible Dict., Funk & Wagnalls, N.Y., 1906.

Walter R. Betteridge

GLOWING, glo'ing, SAND (Jas 3:15). See MIRAGE.

GLUTTON, glut'n, GLUTONOUS, glut'n-us (καυχόμενος, καφυας, φραγκός): "Glutton" (from glut, to swallow greedily) is the tr. of καυχόμενος from καυχάμαι, to be ashamed, to be prouder, proud, to be haughty. It is usually a doublet for glut, the use in 2:20, "this son . . . is a glutton and a drunkard," the word might mean a squanderer or prodigal; RV has "a riotous living." In Prov 23:21, "For the drunkard and the glutton shall come to poverty" (following καυχάμαι, "be haughty, be proud," RV "gluttonous eaters of flesh"); "glutton" in the usual sense is included; "a man gluttonous" ("a gluttonous man"); (RV) (phi'gas, an eater,"a glutton") was a term applied to Christ in His freedom from asceticism (Mt 11:19; Lk 7:34).

RV has "idle gluttons" (in Gr, 'bellies') for "slow bellies" (Tit 1:12); "gluttonous" "gluttons," for "riotous" (Prov 23:20; 28:7)

W. L. Walker

GNASH, nash (ןָה, Ḥānār; Ṣḇryyās, brugnos): "Gnash" is used of grinding or striking together the teeth in rage, pain or misery of disappointment. In the OT it is the tr. of Ḥānār, a mimetic word, and represents for the most part rage, anger, hatred (Job 16:9; "He gnasheth upon me with his teeth," RV "he gashed upon me"); Ps 35:16; 37:12; 112 10, grief; Lam 2:16; contempt or derision); brugnos); "gnash the teeth in rage, LXX for Ḥānār (Acts 7:54, of Stephen, "They gashed on him with their teeth"). The several instances of brugnos, "gnashing," in the Gospels seem to express disappointment rather than anger (Mt 8:12; "Here shall be weeping and gnashing of teeth," RV "the weeping and the gnashing of teeth"; 13:42-50; 22:13; 24:51; 25:30; Lk 13:28—"a vivid representation of the misery of disappointed expectations; cf. Eclesius 30:10, "test thou shalt gnash thy teeth in the end"; 31:1, "the teeth shall gnash in the teeth"; tiz'ah (Mt 9:18), which means "to give out a creaking, grating sound," "to screak," is used in the NT (in the above instance) only to mean "to grate or gnash with the teeth," indicating the effect of a paroxysm, RV "grindeth his teeth."
GNATIAE (Gnatia, Gnatia, Gnatia), nat. in E.V., only in Mt 23:24, Κάνων, κάνονος. In Ex 8:16, for "lice," one of the plagues of Egypt, Κανών, κανών, or κανανον, κανανον, in RVm "sand flies" or "beetles" (Genesis: "gnats"). For Κανων κανων [Isa 51:6], E.V. "in like manner," LXX σατωρ τατα, λαος τατου, Vulg. sicul hase, RVm has "like gnats," since περεκανων, elsewhere "thus," may here be taken to be a sign of the form κανων, κανων, which occurs in Ex 8: In the NT passage, the difference in meaning between RVm and E.V. should be noted.

"Strain at a gnat, and swallow a camel!" is changed to "strain out the gnats and swallow the camel," the reference being to the inconsistency of the Jewish religious leaders in taking extraordinary pains in some things, as in the preparation of food, while leaving weighty matters unattended to.

In Isa 51:6, the suggestion of RVm, "They that dwell therein shall die like gnats," seems a decided improvement on the "shall die in like manner" of E.V., esp. as to the "thus" (see supra), is a repetition of κανων, whose meaning is practically the same, "in like manner" being the rendering in E.V. of Κανων κανων.

As to the creatures, κανων, of the Egypt plague, there is little difference between "lice" in E.V. and the others suggested, except as we may be influenced by the LXX rendering, Κανωνον, which may mean "gnats" or "mosquitoes." See Flea, Lice.

Gnosticism—except perhaps in 1 Tim 6:20, where St. Paul warns Timothy against "the gnatas, which is falsely so called"—is not directly alluded to in the NT. Nevertheless its leaven was actually working, as will immediately be seen, and constituted a most serious peril in the apostolic church. "That strange, obscure movement, partly intellectual, partly fanatical . . . . In the 2d cent. spread with the swiftness of a fire over the church from Syria to Gaul" (Law, The Tests of Life, 26). It is therefore of high importance to gain a right conception of the nature of this potent anti-Christian influence. This is not easy. The difficulty in dealing with Gnosticism is that it was not a homogeneous system of either religion or philosophy, but embraced many widely divergent systems, and the opinions drawn from a great variety of sources.

"The infinitely varied shapes assumed by the systems render it almost impossible to classify them, or even to give an account of their leading ideas, which shall not be open to objection. We might, as well as try to classify the products of a tropical jungle, or the shapes and hues of the sunset clouds, which change under our view as we look at them" (Orr, The Progress of Doxygia, 55).

I. General Definition.—On the general definition of Gnosticism a few authorities may be cited.

"Gnosticism," says Dr. Gwatkin, "may be provisionally described as a number of schools of philosophy, oriental in general character, but taking in the idea of a redemption through Christ, and further modified in different sects by a third element, which may be Judaism, Hellenism, or Christianity . . . . The Gnostics took over only the idea of a redemption through Christ, not the full Christian doctrine, for they made it rather a redemption of the philosophers from matter, than a redemption of mankind from sin" (Early Church History to AD 313, II, 20).

Dr. Orr writes, "Gnosticism may be described generally as the fantastic product of the blending of certain Christian ideas—particularly that of redemption through Christ—with speculations and imaginings derived from a medley of sources (Gr, Jewish, Fasch; philosophies, religions, theosophies, mysteries) in a period when the human mind was in a kind of ferment, and when opinions of every sort were jumbled together in an unimaginable welter. It involves, as the name denotes, a claim to knowledge, knowledge of a kind of which the ordinary believer was incapable, and in the period of our session of which 'salvation' in the full sense consisted. This knowledge of which the Gnostic boasted, related to the subjects ordinarily treated of in religious philosophy; Gnosticism was a species of religious philosophy" (The Early Church, 71).

Neander has described Gnosticism as "the first notable attempt to introduce into Christianity the existing elements of mental culture, and to render it more complete on the hitherto rather neglected side of theoretical knowledge; it was an attempt of the mind of the ancient world in its yearning after knowledge, and in its dissatisfaction with the present, to bring within its grasp and to appropriate the treasures of this kind which Christianity presented!" (Neander, Intro, 190).

Gnosticism accordingly comprehends in itself many previously existing tendencies; it is an amalgam into which quite a number of different elements have been fused. A heretical system of thought, at once subtle, speculative and elaborate, it endeavored to introduce into Christianity a so-called higher knowledge, which was grounded partly on the philosophic creed in which Greeks and Romans had taken refuge consequent on the gradual decay and breaking up of their own religions, partly as will be shown, on the philosophies of Plato and of Philo, and still more on the philosophies and theosophies and religions of the East, especially those of Persia and of India.

"For a long time the pagan beliefs had ceased to be taken seriously by thoughtful men and had been displaced by various creeds derived from philosophic speculation. These in themselves were abstract and unsatisfying, but had been partly vitalized by union with the theosophies and theopoesies, the attempt was made on the part of this philosophic religion to effect an alliance with Christianity. A section of the church was dissatisfied with the simplicity of the gospel, and sought to advance to something higher by adopting the current speculationism; books of the NT are all occupied, more or less, with this mister the more dangerous as it threatened the church from within" (Professor E. Scott, The Apologetic of the NT, 14).

Gnosticism, though usually regarded as a heresy, was not really such: it was not the perverting of Christian truth; it came, rather, from outside.
Having worked its way into the Christian church, it was then heretical. "Although it became a corrupting influence within the church, it was an alien by the touch of its philosophy. And in the pace of Judaism, it enjoyed immunity from this plague; but as soon as it broke through these narrow bounds, it found itself in a world where the decaying religions and philosophies of the West were in acute fermentation under the influence of a new and powerful leaven from the East; while the infusion of Christianity itself into this fermenting mass only added to the bewildering multiplicity of gnostic sects and systems it brought forth" (Law, The Tests of Life, 26).

II. Sources of Gnosticism.—Mansel (in his work on The Gnostic Heresies, 32) sums up the principal sources of Gnosticism in these three, Platonism, the Pers religion, and the Buddhism of India. To Platonism, the source of all philosophies and tending to develop itself into a Christian church, Gnosticism has turned the Gop opposition between spirit and matter, and the sharp Zoroastrian dualism, which, where the Gr mind conceived of a higher and a lower world, saw instead two hostile worlds standing in contrast.
and the dualism from which it is derived—gnosis, "knowledge." Gnosticism puts knowledge in the place which can only rightly be occupied by Christian faith. To the Gnostic the great question was not the intensely practical one, "What must I do to be saved from sin?" but "What is the origin of evil?" "How is the primitive order of the universe to be restored?" In the knowledge of these and of similar questions, and in the answers given to these questions, there was redemption, as the Gnostic understood it.

"These little gnostic sects and gnostics all lived in the conviction that they possessed a secret and mysterious knowledge, in no way accessible to those outside, which was not to be divulged or propagated save by the initiated, and anxiously guarded as a secret. This knowledge of theirs was not on revelation or even mystic inquiry and proof, but on revelation. It was derived directly from the times of primitive Christianity, from the Saviour Himself and His disciples and friends, with whom they claimed to be connected by a secret tradition, or else from later prophets, of whom messianic boasters
It was laid down in wonderful mystic writings, which were in the possession of the various circles.

In short, Gnosticism in all its various sects, its form and its character, falls under the category of mystic religions, which were so characteristic of the decadent life of decadent antiquity. In Gnosticism, as in the other mystic religions, we find the same contrast of the initiated and the uninitiated, the same inner organization, the same kind of petty sectarianism and mystery-mongering.
All alike boast a mystic revelation and a deeply veiled apostolism" (Bekker, op. cit., 150).

The questions, therefore, with which Gnosticism concerned itself were those of the relation of the finite and the infinite, the origin of the world and of evil, the cause, meaning, purpose Pose and destiny of all things, the reason of Gnosticism of the difference in the capacities and in the lot in life of spiritual men and the method of salvation. The following may be regarded as the chief points in the characteristics of the gnostic systems: (1) a claim on the part of the initiated to a special knowledge of the truth, a which is now imprisoned in the flesh. The wise man, therefore, will break the thread of the flesh, and will rise to reach the inner vision of God. It will be seen how much of this teaching was assimilated by the various gnostic sects.

The Zoroastrian or Pers system was based on the assumption that there existed two original and independent powers of good and evil, of light and darkness, Ormuzd (Ahrura-Mazda), the wise Lord, and Ahriman (Angua-Mainyu), the wicked spirit.
These powers were born into the world when the Good Spirit, supreme in his own domain. The earth, which was created by Ormuzd, became the battlefield of the two powers. Ahriman led away the first man and woman from their allegiance to Ormuzd, and so all evil results to mankind. "In oriental (Pers) dualism," says Professor Bouset, "it is within this material world that the good and the evil powers are at war, and this world beneath the stars is by no means conceived as entirely subject to evil. Gnosticism has combined the two and its dualism, which, where the Gr mind conceived of a higher and a lower world,
saw instead two hostile worlds standing in contrast.
and the combination of these two dualisms arose the teaching of Gnosticism with its thoroughly going pessimism and its fundamental asceticism" ("Gno-

III. Nature of Gnosticism.—"Gnosticism," says Dr. Oultin, "is Christianity perverted by learning and speculation" (Early Church History, 73).
The intellectual pride of the Gnostics refined away the gospel into a philosophy. The clue to the understanding of the Gnostics is to grapple with the problem of the meaning of the words for which it is derived—gnosis, "knowledge." Gnosticism puts knowledge in the place which can only rightly be occupied by Christian faith. To the Gnostic the great question was not the intensely practical one, "What must I do to be saved from sin?" but "What is the origin of evil?" "How is the primitive order of the universe to be restored?" In Philosophy, to expound the OT in terms of Plato's thought and to discover allegorical meanings where none were intended.

In Philo's teaching there is a sharp line drawn between God and the material world: with him God cannot exert any action upon the world of matter, except through intermediate agency, the Jewish angels and the heathen demons. Philo has much to say in regard to the Logos. His utterances on this subject may be compared with what is said of the attributes of "Wisdom" in ch 8 of the Book of Proverbs, and also with the Logos or "Word" of the Gospel of John. With Philo, the Logos is the power of God, or the Divine reason endowed with energy, and embracing within itself all subordinate potencies. The Logos is impersonal in its relations to God; and herein is one huge difference between Philo's conception and that in the gospel. Philo thinks that the Logos is the only firstborn of God, the chief of the angels, the vicerey of God, and representative of God. See Logos.

According to Philo the creation of the universe was a gradual moulding out of matter; hence arises evil. He also teaches the preexistence of the soul, tendency to regard knowledge as superior to faith, and as the special possession of the more enlightened, for ordinary Christians did not possess this secret and higher doctrine. (2) The essential separation of matter and spirit, the former of these being essential to the latter. This arises directly from the soul of all evil has arisen. (3) An attempt at the solution of the problems of creation and of the origin of evil by the conception of a Demiurge, i.e. a Creator or Artificer of the world as distinct from the Supreme Deity, and also by introducing explanations concerning between God and the visible universe. It should be observed that this conception merely concealed the difficulties of the problem, and did not solve them. (4) A denial of the true humanity of Christ, a doctrine Christology, which丧ked upon the earthly life of Christ and esp. on His sufferings on the cross as unreal. (5) The denial of the personality of the Supreme God, and the denial also of the free will of man. (6) The teaching, on the one hand, of asceticism, as the means of attaining to spiritual communion with God, and, on the other hand, of an indifference which led directly to licentiousness. (7) A syncretistic tendency which combined certain more or less misunderstood Christian doctrines, various elements from the Jewish and other sources. (8) The Scriptures of the OT were ascribed to the Demiurge or inferior Creator of the world, who was the God of the Jews, but not the true God. Some of these characteristic ideas are more clearly in view, and some of them in others of the gnostic systems. The relation of these ideas to Christian facts and doctrines is dealt with more particularly below.

IV. Gnosticism in the Christian Church.—

1. Colossians—

In Col a great deal is said regarding a false teaching, an insidious theosophical doctrine, the teachers of which taught that ordinary Christians in Colosse from the gospel, and were disseminating its speculations, which led to the worship of Christ, to esoteric exclusiveness wholly opposed to the universalism of the gospel, and to the introduction into Christian freedom, and derogatory to the human soul, and made it as it were by the Holy Ghost. These texts are identical with the theosophical conceptions of the generation succeeding that of the apostles; and at the root of the teaching is the same error which the gnostic mind had no way of meeting, viz. that there could be no connection between the highest spiritual agency, that is God, and gross corporeal matter.

From this theoretical basis arose another error—that as sin is inherent in the material substance of the body, therefore the only way by which perfection can be reached is to punish the body by asceticism, so that through the infliction of pain and the mortification of the flesh the region of pure spirit may be reached, and thus man may be exalted and become like God. This ascetic tendency is wonderfully widespread; it reappears century after century, and shows itself in many forms of religion, not only in Christianity, but in the Hindu religions, in Buddhism and elsewhere. In the Epistle to the Colossians, accordingly, there are definite references to ascetic practices which were indulged in by the false teachers at Colosse. The very terms which they employed have been preserved "Touch not," "Take not," "Handle not." It was in this way that these teachers had "at their own hand" invented a worship of the nature of an abstract ideal, which endeavored to attain the deliverance of the soul by the neglection of the body. At any rate, a certain number of them showed these tendencies still more boldly when Paul wrote his First Epistle to Tim (see below), for he describes the false teachers of Colosse as "carnal" and "struggling with all sin and meats," and "to them the Lord is nothing." These ascetic practices were taught by various gnostic systems, the Encratites, the followers of Saturnus, and others.

These tendencies in the Colossian church St. Paul set himself to correct in his epistle. The method which he adopts is not so much to demolish error, as to establish the contrary truth, setting before the Colossians the person and work of Christ, Christ the true GOD in whom these errors not merely some or even much of the fulness of God, but all the fulness of the Godhead bodily. Christ, the God of providence, is over all things, in whom man and all creatures and all events "consist" and have their being; Christ, the one whom we have reconciled unto God through the blood of the cross. In view of truths like these, Colossian error and all other forms of Gnosticism crumble into decay and vanish. See COLOSSIANS, EPISTLE TO THE.

The Epistle to the Col is the first of the Pauline Epistles in which distinctly gnostic teaching is found in its attack upon the Christian faith. But from incidental notices in epistles of Paul written at an earlier period, it can be seen how congenial to the soil of which it sprang. See Gnosticism.

2. 1 Cor. 2:10-12—

"Knowledge and knowledge" at Corinth was the soil into which gnostic teaching was about to fall. For even in Corinth when Paul wrote his First Epistle to the church, there had been a claim on the part of some that they possessed "knowledge," as if others were destitute of it, a claim which the apostle refuses to admit, and meets with stern resistance. They thought themselves "wise," they were given to disputing, they professed that they "all had knowledge" (13 2); but this knowledge did not edify them, did not build them up, it only puffed them up (8 1); it did not make them sympathetic or tender-hearted toward the weak (8 7-11).

In 1 Tim. 6:20 Paul speaks of the "knowledge [the gnōsis] which is falsely so called; which some professing have erred concerning the faith. In other places in that epistle Paul speaks of the "knowledge of God" as exactly those of Gnosticism. In 1 Cor. 2:9-10 the apostle speaks of "fables and endless genealogies, which minister questionings, rather than a dispensation of God which is in faith." Philo had given a great impetus to an allegorizing interpretation of the OT. His writings were well known and were popular in many of the Jewish schools. These fanciful interpretations would hinder the growth of the Christian church; and this allegorizing of Scripture is made to tend to which which are evidently ascetic practices which were regarded by their votaries as most meritorious. To abstain from marriage and from various kinds of food was regarded as contrary to the gnostic teaching was unnatural, as contrary to the constitution of the world, as that has been arranged by a holy and wise Creator, and it is also subversive of Christian liberty. Nothing can be esteemed common or unclean without throwing a reproach upon the Creator. Antinomian development.—But another and contrary result also followed from the principles of the sinfulness of man, and of redemption as deliverance from the flesh, viz. that there was an easier way of relief, by teaching the soul of man to think of himself as divided into two parts, as a separate entity which has nothing in common. Let the soul go its own way on the wings of spiritual thought, while the body may indulge its earthly desires. For, so it was held, as body and soul are entirely distinct in their nature, the spiritual cannot be defiled by anything, however carnal and gross, that the body can do. This was the antinomian development of Gnosticism. Many traces of this are to be found in Pastoral Epistles and in 2 Pet. and Jude. The Gnostic Christian of Colosse Paul warns Timothy, were "lovers of self, lovers of money, boastful, haughty, railers, disobedient to parents, unthankful, unholy, without natural affection, implacable, slanderers, without self-control, fierce, no lovers of good, traitors, headstrong, puffed-up, lovers of pleasure rather than lovers of God; holding a form of godliness, but having denied the power thereof" (2 Tim 3:3-4). Such, too, is the testimony borne regarding them by Ignatius (Law, The Tests of Life, 30): "They give no heed to love, care not for what is right; in their midst is satanism; they are not idolaters, nor do they practice the works of pagans; neither for those who are in bonds, nor for those who are released from bonds, neither for the hungry nor the thirsty." Such persons professed that God knew, but by their works they denied Him; they were abominations; "for they are not good, before God, and they are wicked, and without God, and reprobate" (Tit 1:16). They enticed others into sins of impurity (2 Tim 3:5-6). They allure others through the lusts of the flesh; and the means by which they succeeded in doing this was that they spoke great swelling words of vanity, and the end was that in their destroying others they themselves also were surely destroyed (2 Pet 2:12-18). They were ungodly men, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness and denying our only Master and Lord, Jesus Christ; they gave themselves up to the sins of the flesh, and ran riotously after error in hope of a gain in money; they were sensual men, not having the Spirit (Jude vs 4.8.11.19). The entire Ep. of Jude is directed against this antinomian and licentious development of the Gnostic teaching. It is a description of an unholy life (see below on Book of Rev).

In the First Epistle of John there is a distinct polemical purpose. There is no book of the NT which is more purposeful in its attack of error. There is the "spirit of error" (1 Jn 4:6), opposing the Spirit of truth. "Many false prophets are gone out into the world; but the love of the Father is proved by this, that we abide in his Son and he in us; (2 Jn ver 11); the great sign, which the apostle writes, and from which he seeks to defend the church, was Gnosticism, as is proved by what is said again and again in the epistle of the characteristics of this insidious and deadly teaching.

(1) Gnostic claims. The gnostic claim to knowledge throws light upon many passages in this epistle. St. John refers to his opponents' using such phrases as "I know God," "I abide in Christ," etc. (1 Jn 5:13). There were some who did not love their brethren on earth, who did not walk in Christ's footsteps. Most of these are those who have no destitute of love. The apostle therefore describes these lofty claims as false, because those who made them possessed not true love nor knowledge.

In contrast to these gnostic claims—for those who made them were not other than the early Gnostics—St. John shows how the Christ of history is the Christ of experience. He is not the great long-expected one who is from the beginning, and who they know the Father. "We know him that is true, and we abide in him that is true, even in Jesus Christ. This is the true God and eternal life." (1 Jn 5:20). This knowledge of God and communion with Him are attained, not by gnostic speculations, but by the obedience of faith, the outcome of which is brotherly love and a life in which the Christian walks even as Christ did (2 Jn 6). And thus all obedience and brotherly love are the test of the profession which any man may make that he knows God. Every one that doeth righteousness is begotten of him" (2 Jn 20); "Whosoever doeth not righteousness is not of God; neither he that loveth not his brother" (1 Jn 4:20).

(2) Its loveless nature. Gnosticism was distinguished by an unethical, loveless intellectualism. It was a denial of the fact that the gnostic was against which this epistle is directed. The apostle describes the very knowledge which it is that life untouched by love, and which led men, while they professed to love God, nevertheless to remain destitute of love to their fellow men. If they really loved God, they would love their brethren, and that love is the test of the knowledge which is from God. If one doeth righteousness he is of God; if he doeth not righteousness, he is not of God. (1 Jn 3:10). The Epistle of John as Docetism is; but evidences are manifest that the apostle had it clearly before him. "Little children," he writes, "let no man lead you astray; he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous;" (3 Jn 8).

(3) Its antinomian side. The antinomian side of Gnosticism is dealt with so directly and so vigorously in the First Epistle of John as Docetism is; but evidences are manifest that the apostle had it clearly before him. "Little children," he writes, "let no man lead you astray; he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous;" (3 Jn 8).

As time advanced, and the later books of the NT were written, Gnosticism assumed more of its distinctive peculiarities. "Those who had knowledge" regarded themselves as "above disciples" (Acts 20:34). The use of their phrases was "to know the depths" (Rev 24:36). This is a peculiar phraseology, characteristic of the books of the Apocalypse. (Mansi, The Gnostic Heresies, 105). The claim of the Ophites was that they alone knew the "depths." "Yes," is the apostle's reply to claims of this kind, "as the depths, bowels of God's house." (1 Jn 1:5). This is a just description of a teaching which ascribed the origin and the working of evil to God. It is in the light of gnostic teaching of this sort that the meaning can be seen in the words of the bearer of the name, "And this is the message which we have heard from him and announce unto you, that God is light, and in him is no darkness at all" (1 Jn 1:5).

The Nicolaitans. In the Epistles to the Seven Churches in the Apocalypse there are other references to Gnosticism. Who the Nicolaitans were (2.6.15) is not absolutely certain; but it is not unlikely that they were so called because of their having assumed the name of "Nicolaius, a prographs of Antioch" (Acts 6:5). The first step to the reception of gnosticism into the Christian church on an equal footing with the Jews may have been the appointment of Nicolaius as one of the first deacons, for the facts that he was a native of Antioch and a proselyte, show that he had been a heathen by birth. And it is not improbable to think that a person appointed to office in the church at so very early a period, even before the conversion of the apostle Paul. The Nicolaitans therefore may have distorted in an antinomian sense the doctrine taught by Nicolaius, who in his Doceticism, proclaimed the liberty of the gospel, as his fellow-deacon, Stephen, did (Acts 7:7). But the liberty claimed by the Nicolaitans was liberty to sin. They are mentioned in the Epistle to Ephesus, and their deeds are characterized as deeds which...
Christ hates (Rev 2 6). Their name occurs again in the Epistle to Pergamum, and there also their doctrine is described as a doctrine which the Lord hates (ver 15). Their teaching is one of licentiousness—eating anything accursed and committing fornication (ver 14). Again in the Epistle to Thyatira, the Gnostics are spoken of as practising the same evil courses, and as holding a doctrine of "the depths of Satan" (vs 20.21.24 AV) as described in the Epistle to Philadelphia were also evidently Gnostics. They are described as being "of the synagogue of Satan" (3 9).

"In the language of St. Jude, as in that of St. Peter, which is closely imitated, we may clearly discern a reference to the gnostic sect of the Nicolaitans mentioned by name in Rev. The comparison in all these passages, of the error condemned with that of Balas, is decisive as to the identity of the persons intended. The other characteristics noted by St. Peter are also repeated by St. Jude—their denial of the Lord, their prodigal lives, their contempt of government, and evil speaking of dignitaries of the church that they know not, their pollution of the feasts of charity, their great swilling words. The antinomian, no less than the ascetic side of Gnosticism, seems by this time to have fully manifested itself" (Man- sel, The Gnostic Heresies, 71).

V. The Christian Antithesis.—The principal points of contrast between Gnosticism and Christian teaching in regard to leading doctrines will now be approximately set forth as briefly as possible.

According to the Gnostics, God is thought of as the ultimate, nameless, unknowable Being, of whom they speak as the " Abyss." He is 1. God and the world. The Divine nature appears to play no part; or does it come to exist at all? What is the source of its imperfections and evils?

How did the world originate?—The Gnostic answer is that the plērōma or fulness of the Deity (see Fowlers) could flow out in no other way than in emanations or eons or angels, all of which are necessarily imperfect, the highest of these emanations or eons or angels being more spiritual than the grade immediately below it. Of these eons there is a gradation so numerous, that at length the lowest of all is almost wholly corporeal, the spiritual element having been gradually diminished or eliminated, until at last the world of man and of matter is reached, the abode of evil. In this way the gods is not the God and the world of mankind. The highest eons approximate closely to the Divine nature, so spiritual are they and so nearly free from matter. These form the highest hierarchy of angels, and these as well as many other grades of angels and hosts are to be worshipped.

In opposition to this view, Christian faith worships God as the free self-sufficient Creator, infinitely good and wise and powerful and holy, the Author of all things, and affirms creation as an incomprehensible fact revealed to faith, and which rises above the grasp of the understanding. "By faith we understand that the worlds have been framed by the word of God, so that what is seen hath not been made out of things which do appear" (He 11 3 AV).

The doctrine of evil follows directly from the above account of the relation of God to the world. 2. Evil. According to Gnosticism the manifestation of God is possible only through its self-revelation in His part, as in His essence God is the unfathomable Abyss. Through this Divine self-limitation are evolved, first, the Divine powers or attributes, which previously were hidden in the Abyss of His being. These Divine powers (the plērōma) are time after time the principles of all further developments of life. Life continues to be unfolded in such a way that its successive grades sink farther and farther from the purity of God, the life is feebler the nearer they come to matter, with which, at length, they blend. Such, according to Gnosticism, is the origin of evil.

Whenever men are aware of knowing evil to have come from their own free will, which has chosen to forsake its absolute dependence upon God; whenever they go beyond this and seek for another origin of evil, then one of two results follows. They either limit the holiness of God, and find the cause of evil hid in the Abyss; or, they limit the power of God by granting the existence of an eternal evil power beyond the control of God—which is Pantheism; or they limit the power of God by granting the existence of an eternal evil power beyond the control of God—which is Dualism. In an attempt at self-excision, attributing all of evil to the human will, which has chosen to forsake God's abiding self-subsistent nature, which is to make it absolute as God Himself is. As absolute self-subsistence can be affirmed of none but God, the eternally self-subsistent evil of Dualism cannot possibly be, because it is not good. Here is the self-contradiction on which Gnosticism was wrecked.

(1) The Christian doctrine of sin.—Directly contrary to this is the Christian doctrine, according to which evil is the refusal of the creature-will to lean absolutely and utterly on God, upon His care and love and upholding grace. Sin is that which ought not to be; it has no right to exist at all; it is defiance of God; it is moral transgression of man's nature cannot be exaggerated. If it could, it would dethrone God. It has defied His righteousness and wisdom and holiness and even His grace. Sin therefore is dealt with by God in two ways, either by direct punishment or by redemption. In the latter provision is made for its removal by its being borne by the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world.

The gnostic idea of the origin of evil follows at once from, and is more or less directly involved in, their dualistic interpretation of nature. The question "What is sin?" is no mere academic or philosophical discussion, in which one opinion may be as good as another. "Everything in Christianity is connected either directly or indirectly with the great facts of Sin and Redemption; and the plan of Redemption, which is the essence of Christianity, cannot be rightly understood until the doctrine of Sin be adequately recognized and established. Here, certainly, if anywhere, God's power and efficacy appear " (Julius Müller, quoted in Dr. Orr's Sin as a Problem of Today, 6).

(2) Sin and the moral law.—The universality of sin, its persistence, its gravity, its power to destroy life and to deprave those facts which can hardly be exaggerated. To view sin aright, it is impossible to leave out of sight its relation to moral law, to God, and to His kingdom. Sin is the transgression of moral law; it is transgression also against a holy God, of whose character and will moral law is a transcript or reflection. "Sin is transgression against God, the substitution of the creature-will for the will of the Creator; revolt of the creature-will from God" (Sin as a Problem of Today, 7). It is the resolve of the will to make itself independent of God and to renounce His authority. Sin is self-will, false independence, freedom which ends in bondage and misery.

But in Gnosticism sin is something quite different; it is not the act and the disposition of the human will in rebellion against God; it is only a physical fact or quality inherent in the body and in matter everywhere. Redemption therefore does not consist in the work of Christ for us on the cross, and the applying of the benefits of that work by the Holy Spirit of God in the renewal of the moral nature of man. Redemption is simply each man's efforts to secure emancipation from the flesh—from physical evil.
The Christology of the Gnostics accordingly assumed one of two types. "One class of early Gnostics separated the spiritual being Christ from the man Jesus, they supposed the Christ entered Jesus at the time of His baptism, and left Him at the moment of His crucifixion. Thus the Christ was neither born as a man nor suffered as a man. In this way they obviated the difficulty, insuperable to the gnostic mind, of conceiving the connection between the highest spiritual agency and gross corporeal matter, which was involved in the Catholic doctrine of the Incarnation and Passion, and which Gnostics of another type more especially set aside by the doctrine of Doceticism, i.e. by assuming that the human body of Our Lord was only a phantom body, and not real flesh and blood. Irenaeus represents the former class as teaching that Jesus was the receptacle of the Christ, and that the Christ 'descended upon Him from heaven in the form of a dove, and after He had declared to mankind the nameless Father, entered again into the πλωρώμα imperceptibly and invisibly.' Here no names are given. But in another passage he speaks of the same person, without however naming the πλωρώμα, to Corinthus." (Lightfoot, Col., 264).

How strenuously this doctrine was combated in apostolic circles has already been shown in speaking of St. John's First Epistle.

The necessity of the doctrine of Gnostic theory in an ascetic morality which passed over by sure steps into antinomian license has likewise been fully illustrated in the foregoing, and need not be further enlarged on. The whole has its root in a false intellectivism, to which the gospel in its inculcation of humility, faith and dependence upon God's Spirit for guidance into truth is, in its utmost principle, opposed.

VI. Harnack's View of Gnosticism.

Harnack's view of Gnosticism differs from that now given in laying the chief emphasis on its Judaic-Hellenistic side. He describes well how, when Christianity appeared, 'an extensive spiritualizing or allegorizing of the OT had already taken place. This spiritualizing was the result of a philosophic view of religion, and this philosophic view was the outcome of a lasting influence of Grecian philosophy, and of the Grecian spirit generally, upon Judaism. In consequence of this view, all facts and sayings of the OT in which one could interpret the allegorizings. Nothing was what it seemed, but was only the symbol of something invisible. The history of the OT was here sublimated to a history of the emancipation of reason from passion' (History of Dogma, I, 225).

This allegorical interpretation disclosed to the mature mind a wealth of relations, of hints and of intuitions from the OT, which to the uninitiated was only a dry record of fact. This view of the OT gave its readers a strange interest, which proceeded to transfer their ancient Jewish hopes into the world of Greek philosophy, and to result into a metaphysic. When these thinkers entered the Christian church, Christian hopes and terms were added to the already existing Judaic-Gr-Alexandrian compound, and such was Gnosticism. It is also the Hellenizing of Christianity. The Gnostics are therefore those Christians, who, in a swift advance, attempted to capture Christianity for Hellenic culture, and Hellenic culture for Christianity, and who gave up the OT in order to facilitate the conclusion of the covenant between the two powers and make it possible to assert the absoluteness of Christianity' (p. 227).

Harnack indeed grants that there were other elements in Gnosticism, but he strongly asserts that the Gr element was the predominating one. In this he seems to us to be in error. Laying the chief emphasis on Hellenism, he fails to give the due and preponderating place to eastern dualism. As Neander wisely remarks, 'Gnosticism is the chief element in Gnosticism. This eastern source is also acknowledged by Harnack, but only as if it were subsidiary to Hellenism. As he regards it, 'Gnosticism was an acute Hellenizing of Christianity' (p. 296).

In regard to the fundamental philosophic doctrines of Gnosticism, the indefinable nature of the Divine primateal Being, the sinfulness of matter, the fulness of God in aeons, the Demiurge, etc. Harnack again elsewhere prophetically adds, 'All these are ideas for which we find the way prepared in the philosophy of the time, anticipated by Philo, and represented in neo-Platonism as the great final result of Gr philosophy' (p. 233).

VII. Influence and Development of Gnosticism.

Gnosticism is peculiarly the heresy of the 2nd cent., and in itself a proof of the extent to which a knowledge of the Christian faith had, at that early period, penetrated in literary and philosophical circles. Though it is true that Christianity at first influenced chiefly the higher circles, yet we may be permitted to state that these persons that the various gnostic heresies arose.

Gnosticism was a product which did not spring up spontaneously. The consequences of the mechanists and slaves and women and children whom most, like Celsus, suppose to have formed the bulk of the Christian communities, but could only have taken, its rise in minds of a more cultured and speculative cast. This indeed, was its claim—to be a religion of 'gnosis' or knowledge, for the highly trained or ältere Welt could only exist at all, therefore, as the result of a Christian ferment which had entered these speculative circles, and was there powerfully at work. Baur rightly appreciates the situation, when he says: 'Gnosticism gives the clear and most proof that Christianity had the most important factors in the history of the time, and it shows up what a mighty power of attraction the new Christian principles possessed for the intellectual life then to be found either in the pagan or in the Jewish world.' Above all, the system by which the impression produced on the heathen mind by the great Christian idea of redemption. 'When the gnostic systems,' says Neander, 'detected the movement which was produced in the kingdom of the Demiurge by the appearance of man as the very might principle which had entered the precincts of this lower world, they give us to understand how powerfully was the impression which the comparative spirit of Christ and His influence on humanity, had left on the mind of the founders of these systems, making all earlier institutions seem to them as nothing in comparison with Christianity.' We must beware, therefore, of underestimating either the extent or the intellectual ferment set up by the gospel in the heart of heathenism' (Orr, Neglected Factors, etc., 196).
The earliest of the Gnostics known to us by name is Cerinthus, the antagonist of the apostle John. It seems to be beyond reasonable doubt that these two encountered thus: His each other at Epheusus. Irenaeus Teaching relates on the authority of those who heard the story from Polycarp how the apostle and Cerinthus met in the public baths in that city. When St. John discovered that Cerinthus was in the same building with him, he instantly left, exclaiming that he could not remain while Cerinthus, the enemy of God and of man, was there. From the accounts which have been preserved of this interview, it can be gathered that he taught that the world was created not by the Supreme God, but by an inferior power, and that he also taught a docetic theory of the Incarnation. Caius of Rome, a disciple of Irenaeus, records that he encountered John on this occasion, and, being asked by his host, "What do ye think of Cerinthus?" he replied, "Irenaeus, the testimony of Irenaeus, that it was written to oppose that form of Gnosticism which was taught by Cerinthus, and, before him, by the Nicomantians. The nature of that heresy may be stated in the words of Irenaeus, 'Cerinthus, he says, 'in Asia, taught that the world was not made by the Supreme God, but by some power altogether separate and distinct from that Sovereign Power which is over the universe, and one ignorant of the God who is over all things. He taught, moreover, that Jesus was not born of a virgin (for this seemed to him to be impossible), but was the son of Joseph and Mary, born after the manner of other men; though preeminent above other men in justice and prudence and wisdom: and that after His baptism the Christ, in the form of a dove, descended upon Him from this Sovereign Power which is over all things: and that He then announced the unknown Father and wrought miracles; but that, at the end, the Christ departed again from Jesus, and that Jesus suffered and was raised from the dead, and continued in His ascension, as a spiritual being' (Manvel, The Gnostic Heresies, 74).

Such a passage as Jn 19 34.35 seems to refer to docetic Gnosticism, and to be a personal protest against it. After describing the piercing of Christ's side by the soldier's spear and how 'there came out blood and water,' the apostle adds, 'And he that hath seen hath borne witness, and his testimony is true: and he knoweth that he saith true, that ye also may believe. There are many other passages which seem to be directed against the Gnosticism, e.g. Doccetism, e.g. 'The Word became flesh, and dwelt among us (and we beheld his glory)!' (1 14); 'Jesus therefore, being wearied with his journey, sat thus by the well!' (4 6); 'Reach hither thy right hand, and receive, and hither thy hand, and put it into my side: and be not faithless, but believing' (20 27).

Cerinthus seems to have taught that the religion of Christ was identical with unlimited Mosaicism, including even circumcision and the earthly kingdom of the future. The Cerinthian theory, however, was held under various forms by its adherents, so that even if the theory that the God of the OT was, at the best, a subordinate angel of unlimited power, wisdom and goodness, and that the creation of the world was very imperfect. Others went so far as to identify the God of the OT with Satan. The ethical standards of these Gnostics, therefore, went even beyond the lengths of libertinism.

Generally, the forms under which Gnosticism appeared varied greatly in different periods. Some went farther than others from the Christian faith. Some communities, such as the Encratites, laid the greatest stress on the necessity for asceticism; other communities were wholly docetic; the Carpathocarians taught that God is identical with communion of Plato. One of these teachers, Epiphanes, was honored as a god, and this sect crowned the image of Jesus along with those of Pythagoras, Plato and Aristotle. Further, there were imitators of all varieties: magicians, alchemists, witches, adepts, deceivers and hypocrites, 'who appeared using mighty words with a host of unintelligible formulae and taking up with scandalous ceremonies in order to rob men of their money' (Harnack, op. cit., 230), and even for vile purposes.

(1) The Ophites.—Gnosticism, before reaching its full development, is chiefly represented by the ophite sects or systems. These were so named from the word ophis, 'serpent,' to which they paid honor as a symbol of intelligence. They held that the Creator of the world was an ignorant and imperfect being, Taldaboth, the Son of Chaos; and that it was a meritorious act when the serpent peradventure Adam and Eve to disobey him. There were several of the ophite sects, such as the Cainites, who reversed all the standards of moral judgment, choosing as their heroes the persons whom the Bible condemned, such as Cain, the men of Sodom, Esau and Enoch.

(2) Valentinus.—By the time of Justin Martyr (c 150 AD), Gnosticism had become divided into a variety of sects and schools, Valentinians, Basilides, Saturninians and Marcionites. In the Valentinian system, Christ and the Holy Spirit were two and not one. The Valentinians granted that ordinary Christians were better than the heathen, and that they might look forward to a kind of salvation; even now ordinary Christians occupied a middle position, better than the poor (or 'psychic' but inferior to the 'pneumatic' or 'spiritual,' as the Gnostics termed themselves.

(3) Basilides. —The Basilideans take their name from Basilides of Alexandria, a man of powerful intellect. He and his son Isidore taught this system, which was afterward considerably modified for the purpose of popular apprehension. The world is continuously evolved from a panspermia or 'seed of the world,' in which all things were originally potential. It is contained by two great Archons, who yet subserve the designs of the Supreme. There are no aeons, but the highest light 'descends through the successive spheres till it rests on Jesus of Nazareth. The process is complete when the Divine element ('hominis') is all drawn out and restored to God; oblivion then falls on lower intelligences. Many fine sayings are attributed to Basilides, e.g. 'I will say anything rather than doubt the goodness of Providence' (Orr, The Early Church, 76).

(4) Saturninus.—The Saturninians were so called from Saturninus, said to be a disciple of Menander, who in turn is said to have been a disciple of Simon Magus. The system of Saturninus is marked both by a strong dualism and by a gluttony asceticism. He is also reported to have been one of the founders of the Encratite heresy, which condemned marriage. Tatian, Justin Martyr's disciple, became a member of this gnostic sect, holding, it is alleged, the usual theory of aeons and that there was a Demiurge, who was not the Supreme God.

(5) Marcion. —Marcion, a native of Pontus, taught in Rome c 140–55 AD. His system differs much from ordinary gnostic theories, except that he absolutely distinguished between the God of the OT, who is regarded as merely just, harsh, viler, and the God of the NT, who is wholly love. He also held to the usual gnostic dualism and doceism. Marcion's system has been described as an overstrained Paulinism, as he lays the stress on faith, not on knowledge. Marcion was the author of a book called the Anathemas, which contrasted the OT with the NT. He also drew up a canonic list of books, which he designated, viz., Lk in a mutilated state, and ten Epistles of Paul. Marcion was a rigorous ascetic. In the Lord's Supper he allowed only water to be used instead of wine. The Marcionites refused baptism to married persons. This sect or "church" endured for several centuries.

"All the gnostic systems had one feature in common, viz., that they regarded the OT and the NT as revelations of two different Gods, the God of the Jewish religion, who was identified with the Demiurge, or Maker of the world. But under this common assumption there was room for two very opposite estimates of the older revelation and of the God whom it reveals. Some of the gnostic sects regarded the Demiurge as being altogether alien from and opposed to the Supreme God; others considered him merely as a subordinate inferior but holy God, hostile to the Supreme God, and acting before the coming of the perfect revelation, as his unconscious organ" (Manuel, The Gnostic Heresies, 45).

"There can be no doubt that the gnostic propaganda was seriously hindered by the inability to organize and discipline churches, which is characteristic of all philosophic systems of religion" (Harnack, History of Dogma, I, 252). "From about 210 they ceased to be a factor of the historical development, though the church of Constantine and Theodosius was alone really able to bear the true and counteract the pseudognostic systems and to prevent their spreading as far as they did" (Ib, 251).

In contrast to Gnosticism the Christian church held fast to these great facts, that Jesus Christ is the Son of God, preexistent before the Creation, the Incarnation, and manifest in the flesh, he wrought miracles for us and for our salvation; that He rose from the dead; that the OT is a true revelation of the one supreme and holy God, the Creator of all things. Dualism, the eternity of matter and its inherent evil, as well as the inferior and mythologized Deity were accordingly rejected as contrary to the Christian faith. During the period of the prevalence of Gnosticism there took place the earlier developments of Christian theology. On Theology and the influences of Gnosticism on Theology are an important impetus to the formation of a NT canon of Scripture, and to the shaping of the earliest creed. See Apostles' Creed.

In the revulsion from Gnosticism and Doceism it should not be forgotten that there is truth to be found even amid the errors of these systems. Doceism was an overstatement of a great truth, an overstatement so large as to destroy the human nature of Christ. The mythology of the divine nature, ends by depriving it of every attribute which can make God the object of any religious feeling or the source of any moral obligation" (The Gnostic Heresies, 11).

"The author and object of good, and truth and moral law, but the mind is occupied with the ascetical relation between God and the world, as absolute and relative, cause and effect, principle and consequence, and God becomes identical with the world. It is easily seen how teaching of this sort strikes at the root of all religion and morality. The personality of God, the personality and free will of man, the existence of moral evil, the incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ, the redemption which He accomplished for the world, His resurrection, the whole significance of His Person and His work—all is denied. This is the spirit and the meaning of Gnosticism."

Dr. Gwatkin sums up the matter thus: "Gnosticism undermined Christian monothelitism by its distinction of the Creator from the Supreme, Christian morals by its opposition of the philosopher to the unlearned, Christian practice by its separation of knowledge from action; and it cut away the very basis of the gospel whenever it explained away its history. In no case did it have on one side—the reality of evil in the world, the function of knowledge in religion, the difference between the letter and the spirit; but fragments of truth are not enough for a gospel, which is false if all truth is not summed up in Christ. Therefore there could be VIII. Modern Gnosticism.—Gnosticism in its ancient form has passed away, but it is interesting to observe how its spirit reappears from time to time in modern days. Gnosticism, as already seen, is not one aspect of thought alone, but many. And in one form or another it is seen again and again. For example, the modern denial of the virgin birth of Christ by our Lord's (see the Gnosticism, when the Holy Ghost descended upon Him from heaven.

Phases of gnosticism teaching are reproduced in modern pantheistic philosophies and other forms of religious doctrine, which hold that there has been no objective atonement and no resurrection of Christ from the dead. "Basilides with his powerful speculative grasp and all-embracing evolutionary process might be termed the Hegel of the movement; Valentines with his role of fantasy and triple fall and redemption was its Schelling; Marcion with his severe practical bent, his doctrine of faith, and his antitheses of the just God and the good, might without straining be termed its Ritschl" (Orr, The Progress of Dogma, 58). "Fichte said, There were no external realities at all, they were the mere objectivity of the subject or creations of the inward idea"; after Fichte came Schelling, and Schelling said, 'Then this creating eye is God's own eye; of a more perfect revelation, as his unconscious organ' (Manuel, The Gnostic Heresies, 45)."

GO (יָני, ālākh, יָד, yādāh, נָדָב, bô, נְדָב, yōdād; ādān, āḏān, ēḏān, ēḏān, אַדָּאָנָא, ādānā, ēḏānā, ēḏānā, ērōchomā, ērōchomā, ērōchomā, ērōchomā, ērōchomā, pērēnoman, pērēnoman, pērēnoman). "Go" ("went," etc) occurs very frequently in the Eng. Bible, and is the tr of a great many different Heb and Gr terms. As the word implies movement of all kinds, physical and mental, it has naturally many applications.

1. in the OT ālākh and yādāh are among the commonest meanings, word "to go" in its original sense of "to walk," but also in the most varied senses, according to the verbal conjugations, etc., the prep. attached, and also the words in connection with which the terms stand; ālākh and yādāh are often used figuratively (tr of "to walk," etc) for to live, to pursue a way of life, e.g. "to walk ever in his ways" (Dt 19 9; cf Ps 16 2; 69 30; 1 K 2 31; 3 3, etc); to die (the departed Heb went "without being desired!" (2 Ch 21 20); bô, properly "to go in," "to enter" (e.g. Gen 7 9), is very common, and yōdād, "to go or come out," also occurs frequently; yōdād has frequently the meaning "to go forth," e.g. Gen 3 7 (He sent a raven, and it went forth). Other frequent words are yārdēth, "to go down" (Gen 11 7, etc); ālāh, "to go or come up" (Gen 2 6, etc; Isa 15 5, "go up, AV") used also figuratively, e.g. "to rise up or excel," "Thou excellest all them" (Prov 31 29), "to come up on the heart," to be remembered, "The former things shall not be remembered, nor come into mind" (Isa 66 17; Jer 3 16); āḇābar, "to go or pass over," "to cross" (Gen 41 46, etc), also used figuratively "to pass away," e.g. "as chaff blown away" (Isa 29 5), "passeth by transgression" (Mic 7 18); shāḇā, "to go again" (Gen 43 2, etc); sēḏāḵ and sār, "to go aside," occur several times with the meaning of wrongdoing (e.g. Nu 5 12; Dt 28 14, RV "turn aside, etc.") (Ex 34 4, AV "take away") as an act of mercy, the children of Israel that they go forward" (ver 19 "removed"; Nu 2 24, etc; āḏāz (Aram.), "to go away or about" (Ezr 4 23; Dan 11, 2 etc). Many other words occur only once or twice, e.g. āraḥ, "to travel" (Job 34 8); āḇbar, "to go straight or right" (Prov 4 14; 9 6, RV "walk"); dōrākh, "to tread" (Isa 69 8); dōḏāh, "to go softly" (Ps 42 4; Isa 38 15, RV "as in solemn procession"); rāḏḥal, "to stir," "to move," "I taught Ephraim to go" (Hos 11 3, RV "to walk").

The obsolescent word "go" (to derived from Tindaile) is the tr of ālākhāh in Gen 11 3; 11; 38 10; Ex 1 10, "come on," RV "come"; of bō (2 K 5 5 RV, "go now"); nē (Jgs 7 3; Is 5 5; Jer 18 11, omitted in RV).

In the NT ānabainē is "to go up" (Mt 3 16; 5 1, etc); erchomai, "to go on" (Mt 12 9, etc); aperchomai, "to go off or away" (Mt 22 22; 24 4, etc); perephōma, "to go or return" (2 Th 2 8; 1 K 28 32); hupagō, "to go away" (Mt 5 41; 8 32, etc). We have also other combinations with different shades of meaning, e.g. kubāperhānā, "to go over or beyond" (1 Thess 4 6); eisērēchomai, "to go into" (Mt 7 13; 15 11, etc); properthomai, "to go before" (Lk 1 76; Acts 7 40), and other forms; ādān (aphomen), "Let us go" (Mt 26 46; Jn 14 31, etc); ādā is rendered "go to" (Jas 4 13; 5 1), RV "come." "Go about to! AV is the tr of ūzēbih, "to seek," in Jn 7 19, "Why go ye about to kill me?" RV "Why seek ye me, and would ye kill me, as ye would to try," "attempt" (Acts 24 6, RV "assayed"); and of peirōdomai (26 21, RV "assayed"), of epichreō to "lay hands on" (Acts 9 29), which remains in ERV unchanged, ARV "seeking," to let go is the tr of apōllō, "to loose off" or "away" (Lk 4 4, etc), "to go astray," of plēndō (Mt 16 12, etc).

Various other words occurring singly are trs by forms of "go," e.g. phēros, "to bear on," AV "Let us go unto perfection" (He 6 1, see below); epipōs, "to go in upon," "Let not the sun go down upon your wrath" (Dph 4 20).

Among the many changes in RV are the following:

For "go" Ex 4 26, "alone"; Lev 9 7, "draw near"; Nu 3 31, "set forth"; 16 46, "carry in"; Is 11 15; 27 4, "march"; Mt 11 4; Jn 8 11, "Go your way"; Lk 17 7, "Come straightway"; 18 25, "enter in"; 21 36, "come." "Go" is substituted for "pass" (Ex 12 13, "come," "pass") (18 24, "be put") (Lev 6 12, "enter") (Job 38 33, "come") (Ecc 2 22, "come") (Ecc 8 11, "should be cast") (Mt 5 10, "If I go up," "I will come up") (Ex 33 10, "I will make myself known for" "go about even now") (Dt 31 21, ARV, "frame this day:" for "go well") (Jgs 20 29, "are" for "go") for "suffer us to go" (Mt 8 31, "send us") (a different text); for "not to think of men above that which is written" (1 Cor 4 6), "Who go beyond the things which are written"; for "that no man go beyond" (1 Thess 4 6), "transgress," "move over," "go" or "Let us go and unto perfection" (Heb 6 1), ARV, "and press," ARV "Let us press on unto perfection."

GOAID, god (יוֹדָּאָד, dōḏhānām, bō, nē, malahdā, kōtōrōn, kōtōron). The goad used by the Syrian farmer is usually a straight branch of oak or other strong wood from which the bark has been stripped, and which has at one end a pointed spike and at the other a flat, chisel-shaped iron. The pointed end is to prod the oxen while plowing. The flattened iron at the other end is to scrape off the earth which clogs the ploughshare. The ancient goad was probably similar to this instrument. It could be used for the kick against the goat" (Acts 26 14). It was as useless for Saul to keep on in the wrong way as for a frantox to attempt to leave the furrow. He would surely be brought back with a prick of the goad.

GOA, go'ā (יוֹדָּא, go'āv; AV GOATH, go'āth; LXX reads δικτητόν lóthōn, ex dikteōn lithōn). A place named in describing the boundaries of Jerus as restored in the "days to come" (Jer 31 30). If Gareb is the R, then, more likely, the one identified with the N.W. hill, which is called by Jos "the camp of the Assyrians" (BJ, V, vii, 3, xii, 2). See Jerusalem.

GOAT, go'. The common generic word for "goat" is ἰρ, ἱρ (of Arab. ḥir, ḥir, "she-goat; ḥir, atz, used often for "she-goat" (Gen 1 Names 15 9; Nu 15 27), also with ḥrēt, ḥrēt, "kid," as δικτητόν ἤρ, ἤρ, "kid of the goats" (Gen 38 17), also with τζω, τζω, "she-goat, as sp. "she-goat," τζω "she-goat," "kid of the goats" or "she-goat" or τζω simply "kids," as in 1 K 20 27, "The children of Israel encamped before...
there are only a few domestic breeds of goats, and these are often cross-bred with sheep. The best-known are the Persian, which is used for milk, and the Angora, which is used for wool. The milk of the goat is richer in protein than that of the cow, and is therefore better for infants. The meat of the goat is also of high quality, and is used in many parts of the world as a source of protein.

The goat is often associated with the figure of the goat, who is a symbol of fertility and abundance in many cultures. The goat is also a symbol of intelligence and resourcefulness, and is frequently used in stories and legends as a source of wisdom.

The goat is a hardy animal, able to live in a wide range of climates and environments. It is well-adapted to living in mountainous regions, and is often able to graze in areas where other animals cannot. The goat is also able to live in areas with limited water supplies, as it can drink salty water and is able to store water in its udder for periods of time.

The goat is an important source of food, especially in many parts of the world where other foods are scarce. The meat of the goat is used in many different dishes, and is often considered to be a delicacy. The milk of the goat is also used in many different ways, including in the production of cheese and yogurt.

The goat is also used for its skin, which is used to make leather. The skin of the goat is also used to make gloves, shoes, and other products. The goat is also used for its hair, which is used to make wool. The hair of the goat is also used to make rugs and other products.

The goat is an important animal in many cultures, and is often associated with spiritual and symbolic meanings. In many cultures, the goat is seen as a symbol of fertility and abundance, and is often used in rituals and ceremonies. The goat is also seen as a symbol of intelligence and resourcefulness, and is often used as a source of wisdom.

sleeping (I S 19:13-16). Goat's hair cloth is admirably suited to stand the hard usage of a frequently shifting encampment. The children of Israel appreciated its utility, even for the tabernacle, where there was the modern critical eye it would have looked out of place, matched against scarlet and fine linen (Ex 25:4; 36:29). The fact that goats' hair was used is good indication of the comparative crudeness of the tabernacle, when contrasted with present-day furnishings. See also HAIR; WEAVING.

LITERATURE

1. Introduction to the General Idea.—Religion gives the idea of God, theology constructs and organizes its content, and philosophy establishes its form. Religion, or religious consciousness, is the innermost spiritual experience of man, in which he is confronted with the idea of God, or with the sense of a real power which is greater than himself. Religion is as universal as man, and every religion involves some idea of God. Of the various philosophical ideas of God, each has its counterpart and antecedent in some actual religion. Pantheism is the philosophy of the religious consciousness of India. Deism had prevaled for centuries as an actual attitude of men to God, in China, in Judaism and in Islam, before it found expression as a rational theory in the philosophy of the 18th cent. Theism is but the attempt to define in general terms the Christian conception of God, and of His relation to the world. If Pluralism claims a place among the systems of philosophy, it can appeal to the religious consciousness of that large portion of mankind that has hitherto adhered to Polytheism. But all religions do not issue in speculative reconstructions of their content. It is true in a sense that all religion is an unconscious philosophy, because it is the reaction of the whole mind, including the intellect, upon the world of its experience, and that, therefore, every idea of God involves some kind of an explanation of the world. But conscious reflection upon their own content emerges only in a few of the more highly developed religions. Brahmanism, Buddhism, Judaism, Islam and Christianity are the only religions that have produced great systems of thought, exhibiting their content in a speculative and rational form. The religions of Greece and Rome were unable to survive the reflective period. They produced no theology which could ally itself to a philosophy, and Gr philosophy was from the beginning to a great extent the denial and supersession of Gr religion.

Bib. lit. nearly all represents the spontaneous experience of religion, and contains comparatively little reflection upon that experience. In the OT it is only in Second Isa, in the Wisdom literature and in a few Ps that the human mind may be seen turning back upon itself to ask the meaning of its practical beliefs and behavios! (Thus nothing appears of the nature of a philosophy of Theism or of religion, no theology, no organic definition and no ideal reconstruction of the idea of God. It never occurred to any OT writer to offer a proof of the existence of God, or that anyone should need it. Their concern was to bring men to a right relation with God, and they propounded right views of God only in so far as it was necessary for their practical purpose. Even the fool who “hath said in his heart, There is no God” (Ps 14:1; 53:1), and the wicked nations “that forget God” (Ps 78:20), were no theorists, ideal atheists, but wicked and corrupt men, who, in conduct and life, neglect or reject the presence of God.

The NT contains more theology, more reflection upon the inward content of the idea of God, and upon its cosmic significance; but here also, no system appears, no coherent and rounded-off doctrine, still less any philosophical construction of the idea on the basis of experience as a whole. The task of exhibiting the Bib. idea of God is here therefore, not that of setting together a number of texts, or of writing the history of a theology, but rather of interpreting the central factor in the life of the Heb and Christian communities.

Logically and historically the Bib. idea stands related to a number of other ideas. Attempts have been made to find a definition of so general a nature as to comprehend them all. The older theologians such as the Idea of God was assumed the Christian standpoint, and put into their definitions the conclusions of Christian doctrine and philosophy. Thus Melanchthon: “God is a spiritual essence, intelligent, eternal, true, good, pure, just, merciful, most free and most powerful and wise.” Thomas more briefly defines God as “the absolute personality.” These definitions take no account of the existence of lower religions and ideas of God, nor do they convey much of the concreteness and nearness of God revealed in the OT. A similar recent definition, put forward, however, avowedly of the Christian conception, is that of Professor W. N. Clarke: “God is the personal Spirit, perfectly good, who in holy love creates, sustains and orders all.” (Outline of Christian Theology, 65). The rise of comparative religion has shown that “while all religions involve a conscious relation to a being called God, the Divine Being is in different religions conceived in the most different ways; as one and as many, as natural and as spiritual, as like to and manifested in almost every object in the heavens above or earth beneath, in mountains and trees, in animals and men; or, on the contrary, as being incapable of being represented by any finite image whatsoever; and, again, as the God of a family, of a nation, of a race, of humanity;” (C. Caird, Evolution of Religion, 1, 62). Attempts have therefore been made to find a new kind of definition, such as would include under one category all the ideas of God possessed by the human race. A typical instance of this kind of definition is that of Professor W. Adams Brown: “A god in the religious sense is an unseen being, real or supposed, to whom an individual or a social group is united by voluntary ties of reverence and service” (Christian Theology in Outline, 30). Many similar definitions are given: “A supersensible being or beings” (Lotze, A. M. Fairbairn); “a higher power” (Allan Menzies); “spiritual beings” (E. B. Taylor); “a power not ourselves making for righteousness” (Matthew Arnold).

This class of definition suffers from a twofold defect. It says too much to include the ideas of the lower religions, and too little to suggest those of the higher. It is not all gods that are “unseen” or “supersensible,” or “making for righteousness,” but all these ideas are not other beings than gods, and they do not connote that which is essential in the higher ideas of God. Dr. E. Caird, looking for a definition in a germinative principle of the genesis of religion, defines God “as the unity which is presupposed in the difference of the self and not-self, and within which they act and re-act on each other” (op. cit., i, 40, 64). This principle admittedly finds its full realization only in the highest religion, and it may be doubted whether it does justice to the transcendent personality and the love of God in Christ. In the lower religions it appears only in fragmentary forms, and it can only be detected in them at all after it has been revealed in the absolute religion. Although this definition may be neither adequate nor its method realistic, it can only be one true idea and definition of God, and yet that all other ideas are more or less true elements of it and approximations to it. The Bib. idea does not stand alone like an island in mid-ocean, but is rather the light of life which radiates out in other religions with varying degrees of purity.

It is not the purpose of this article to deal with the problem of the philosophy of religion, but to give an account of the idea of God as it is developed, and within a limited area of thought. The absence of a final definition will present no practical difficulty, because the denotation of the term God is clear enough; it includes everything that is or has been an object of worship; it is its connotation that remains a problem for speculation.

A third class of definition demands some attention, because it raises a new question, that of the knowledge or truth which any idea of God may be said to represent. For Herbert Spencer’s definition of God may be taken as representative: God is the unknown and unknowable cause of the universe, “an inscrutable power manifested through all things” (First Principles, V, 31). This means that there can be no definition of the idea of God, because we can have no idea of Him, no knowledge “in the strict sense of knowing.” For the present purpose it might suffice for an answer that idea of God actually exist; that they can be defined and are more definable, because fuller and more complex, the higher they rise in the scale of religions; that they can be gathered from the folklore and traditions of the lower races, and from the sacred books and creeds of the higher religions. But Spencer’s view means that, in so far as the ideas are definable, they are not true. The more we define, the more fictitious becomes our subject-matter. While nothing is more certain than that God exists, His being is to human thought utterly mysterious and inscrutable. The variety of ideas might seem to support this view. But variety of ideas has been held of every subject that is known, as witness the progress of science. The variety proves nothing.

And the complete abstraction of thought from existence cannot be maintained. Spencer himself does not succeed in doing it. He says a great many things about the “unknowable” which implies an extensive knowledge of Him. The traditional

(1) Animism is the name of a theory which comprehends the oldest (and perhaps the earliest) forms of religion, and also the principle of all religion, as the belief in the ubiquity of souls, or the spirit, which "are held to affect or control the events of the material world, to exercise and to hinder their course and behavior, and it holds that they hold intercourse with men, and receive pleasure or displeasure from human actions, the belief in the existence of gods nad demons, and it might almost be said, inevitably, sooner or later, to active reverence."

(2) Fetishism is sometimes used in a general sense for "the view that the fruits of the earth and things in general are divine, or animated by powerful spirits" (J. G. Frazer, Adonis, Attis, Osiris, 254); or it may be used in a more restricted sense of the belief that "spirits take up their abode, either temporarily or permanently, in some object...and this object, as endowed with higher power, is then worshipped" (F. Tiele, "The History of Religion," 9).

5. Ideology is a term of still more definite significance. It means that the object is at least selected, as being the permanent habituation or symbol of the deity; and, generally, it is marked by some degree of human workmanship, designed to enable it to be more adequately to represent the deity. It is not to be supposed that men ever worship mere "stocks and stones." but they address their worship to objects, whether fetishes or idols, as being the abodes or images of the deity. It is a natural and common idea that the spirit has a form similar to the visible object in which it dwells. Paul reports that the heathen were not more accurate or correct in the heavenliness when he said, "We ought not to think that the Godhead is like unto gold, or silver, or stone, graven by art and device of man" (Col. 2:18).

6. Polytheism. The belief in many gods, and the worship of them, is an attitude of soul compatible with Animism, Ideology, or Fetishism, may be independent of them all. The term Polytheism is more usual, however, to designate the worship of a finite number of well-defined deities, whether regarded as pure disembodied spirits, or as residing in the greater objects of Nature, such as planets or mountains, or as symbolized by images "graven by art and device of man." In ancient Greece or modern India the great gods are well defined, named and venerable, and it is clearly understood that, though they may be symbolized by images, they dwell apart in a spiritual realm above the rest of the world.

7. Monotheism. There is, however, a tendency, both in individuals and in communities, even where many gods are believed to exist, to set one god above the others, and to confine worship in the gods alone. "The monothestic tendency exists among all peoples, after they have reached a certain level of culture. There is a difference in the degree in which this tendency is emphasized, but whether we turn to Babylonia, Egypt, India, China, we find it everywhere" (Jastrow, The Study of Religion, 76). This attitude of mind has been called Henotheism or Monolatry — the worship of one God confined to the existence of many. This tendency may be governed by metaphysical, or by ethical, or by sentimental reasons, or by personal attachment to one political or moral rule.

8. Pantheism. Where the former principle predominates, Polytheism merges into Pantheism, as is the case in India, where Brahma is not only the supreme, but the only God. In that case the gods are but different manifestations of his manifestation. But, in India, the vanquished gods have had a very complete revenge upon their vanquisher, for Brahma has become so abstract and remote that worship is mainly given to the other gods, who are forms of him. Monolatry has been described as a less thorough application of it, may take the opposite line toward Shiva, and may produce similar results. The Supreme Being, who is the ultimate reality and power of the universe, may be conceived in so vague and abstract a manner, he may be so regarded, that it becomes a practical necessity to interpose between him and man, to produce similar results as objects of worship. In ancient Greece, Necessity, in China, Tien or Heaven, were the Supreme Beings; but in a more simple and fewer gods were worshipped. The angels of Zoroastrianism, Judaism and Mohammedism all venerate the same Supreme Being, an immediate and personal, but not a universal, concept. This tendency, Pantheism, where, though they have had considerable vogue as philosophical theories, have proved unstable and impossible as a form of worship, if they have invariably reverted to some kind of polytheism and idolatry, which seems to indicate that they are false processes of the historic tendency.

9. Monotheism, ethical and personal: One further principle may combine with Monolatry to produce a stable Monotheism, that is the conception of God as the judge in moral relations, the cause of all things, but whose nature and works are not the objects of worship. In this conception of God, man becomes to be venerated as supreme and unique. The heathen conception, by other beings called gods, are the ultimate, but they survive for us; while their power is based of all the attributes of deity when they are to be seen by inferior or opposed to the God who rules in conscience. Not only are they not worshipped, but their worship by others comes to be regarded as immoral and useless. The ethical factor of the monotheistic conception of God determines it from diverging into Pantheism or Deism and thus reverting into a personal and individual God necessarily involves His personality, His transcendence as distinct from the world and above it, and also His intimate and personal relation with man. If He is not venerated and the angel host. A thoroughly moralized conception of God emerges first in the OT where it is the prevailing type of thought.

II. The Idea of God in the OT—Any attempt to write the whole history of the idea of God in the OT would require a preliminary study of 1. Course of the development in the literary and historical character of the documents, which lies beyond the scope of this article and the province of the New Testament study. There are no systematic statement of the doctrine of God, or even a series of statements that need only to be collected into a consistent conception. The OT is the record of a rich and varied life, extending over more than a thousand years, and the ideas that ruled and inspired that life must be largely inferred from the deeds and institutions in which it was realized; nor was it stationary or all at one level. Nothing is more obvious than that revelation in the OT has been progressive, and that the idea of God it conveys has undergone a development. Certain well-marked stages of the development can be easily recognized, without entering upon any detailed criticism. There can be no serious question that the age of the Exoduses, the Chaldean and the personal reality of Moses, witnessed an important new departure in Heb religion. The most ancient traditions declare (perhaps not unanonymously) that God was then first known to Israel under the personal name of Jehovah (Yahweh). In this demand for personal reason, or by personal attachment to one political or moral rule.

their king, who ruled over their destinies in their new heritage. But the settlement of Jeh in Canaan, like that of His people, was challenged by the native gods and their peoples. In the 9th cent. we see the war against Jeh carried into His own camp, and Baal-worship attempting to set itself up within Israel. His prophets therefore assert the sole right of Jeh to the worship of His people, and the great prophets of the 8th cent. base their attacks on His moral transcendent. Thus they at once reveal new depths of His moral nature, and set His uniqueness and supremacy on higher grounds. During the exile and afterward, Israel’s outlook broadens by contact with the great world; it draws out the logical implications of ethical monotheism into a theology at once more universalistic and abstract. Three fairly well-defined periods thus emerge, corresponding to three stages in the development of the OT idea of God: the pre-prophetic period governed by the Mosaic conception, the prophetic period during which ethical monotheism is firmly established, and the post-exilic period with the rise of abstract monotheism. But even in taking these large and obvious divisions, it is necessary to bear in mind the philosopher’s maxim, that “things are not cut off with a hatchet.” The most characteristic ideas of each period may be described within their period; but it should not be assumed that they are altogether free from interaction; and, in particular, it should not be supposed that ideas, and the life they represent, did not exist before they emerged in the clear witness of history. Mosaism had undoubtedly its antecedents in the life of Israel; but any attempt to define them by the native a very morass of conjectures and hypotheses, archaeological, critical and philosophical; and any results that are thus obtained are contributions to comparative religion rather than to theology.

Religious experience must always have had an inward and subjective aspect, but it is a long and difficult process to translate the objective language of ordinary life for the uses of subjective experience. “Men look outward before they look inward.” Hence we find that men express their consciousness of God in the earliest periods in language borrowed from the visible and objective world. It does not strike them that God is in a secret way, because they speak of Him in the language of the senses, which alone was available for them. On the other hand, thought is never entirely independent of language, and the degree in which men use sensing-language may give of spiritual facts varies with different persons.

(1) The face or countenance (pānām) of God is a natural expression for His presence. The place where God is seen is called Peniel, the face of God (Gen 32:30). The face of Jeh is His people’s blessing (Nu 6:25). With His face (RV “presence”) He brought Israel out of Egypt, and His face (RV “presence”) goes with them to Canaan (Ex 33:14). To be alienated from God is to be hid from His face (Gen 4:14), or God hides His face (Dt 31:17,18; 32:20). In contrast with this idea is said elsewhere that man cannot see the face of God and live (Ex 33:20; of Dt 5:24; Jgs 6:22; 13:22). In these later passages, “face” stands for the entire being of God, as distinguished from what man may know of Him. This phrase and its cognates emphasize also that fear of God, which shrinks from His majesty even while approaching Him, which enters into all worship.

(2) The voice (šāq) and word (dāḇāq) of God are forms under which His communion with man is communicated from the earliest days to the latest. The idea ranges from that of inarticulate utterance (1 K 19:12) to the declaration of the entire law of conduct (Dt 5:22-24), to the message of the prophet (Isa 2:1; Jer 1:2) and the personalization of the whole counsel and action of God (Ps 106:19; 147:18,19; Hos 6:5; Isa. 40:8).

(3) The glory (kāḇḇāḏōṯ) of God is both a peculiar physical phenomenon and the manifestation of God in His works and providence. In certain passages in Ex (ascribed to the PC), the glory is a bright light, “like devouring fire” (24:17); it fills and consecrates the tabernacle (29:43; 40:34,35) and it is reflected as beams of light in the face of Moses (34:29). In Ex, it is a frequent term for the prophet’s presence. It is, however, rare in a physical sense, as of a rainbow (1:28; 10:4; 43:2). In another place, it is identified with all the manifested goodness of God, and is accompanied with the proclamation of His name (Ex 33:17-23). Two passages in Isa seem to combine under this term the idea of a physical manifestation with that of God’s effective presence in the world (3:8; 6:3). God’s presence in creation and history is often expressed in the Ps as His glory (19:1; 57:5.11; 63:2; 97:6). Many scholars hold that the idea forms the core of the earliest form, and that the physical meaning is quite late. It would, however, be contrary to all analogy, if such phenomena as rainbow and lightning had not first impressed the primitive mind as manifestations of God.

(4) The angel (mālāḵū) of God or of Jeh is a frequent mode of God’s manifestation of Himself in human form, and for occasionable purposes. It is a primitive conception, and its exact relation to God, or its likeness to the angel, is more difficult to determine. In some passages, it is assumed that God and His angel are the same being, and the names are used synonymously (as in Gen 16:7ff; 22:15,16; Ex 3:2,4; Jgs 2:4.5); in other passages they are distinguished, and a duum comes into varying degrees of differentiation (Gen 18; 24:10; Ex 23:21; 33:23; Jgs 13:8,9). But everywhere, it fully represents God as speaking or acting for the time being; and it is to be distinguished from the subordinate and intermediate beings of later theology. Its identification with the Messiah and the Logos is only true in the sense that these later terms are more definite expressions of the idea of revelation, which the angel represented for primitive thought.

(5) The spirit (rāḇḥ) of God in the earlier period is a form of His activity, as it moves warrior and prophet to act and to speak (Jgs 6:34; 13:25; 1 S 10:10), and it is in the prophetic period that it becomes the organ of the communication of God’s thoughts to men. See Holy Spirit.

(6) The name (šēm) of God is the most comprehensive and frequent expression in the OT for His self-manifestation, for His person as it may be known to men. The name is something visible or audible which represents God to men, and which, therefore, may be said to do His deeds, and to stand in His place, in relation to men. God reveals Himself by making known or proclaiming His name (Ex 6:3; 33:19; 34:6). His self-manifestation and authority from His name (Ex 3:13,15; 1 S 17:45). To worship God is to call upon His name (Gen 12:8; 13:4; 21:33; 26:25; 1 K 18:24-26), to fear it (Dt 5:28), to praise it (2 S 22:50; Ps 7:17; 84:6), to glorify it (Ps 86:9). It is wicked to take God’s name in vain (Ex 20:7,9) to profane and blaspheme it (Lev 8:21; 24:16). God’s dwelling-place is the place where He chooses to “cause His name to dwell” (2 S 7:8; 1 K 8:2; 5:35; 8:16-19; 18:32; Dc 12:11-13). God’s name defends Himself (Ps 20:1; 20:27). His name’s sake He will not forsake them (1 S 12:22), and if they perish, His name cannot remain (Josh 7:9). God is known by different names, as expressing various forms of His self-manifestation (Gen 16:13; 17:1; Ex 3:6; 34:6). The name even confers its revelation-status upon the angel (Ex 2:20-23). All God's names are, therefore, significant for the revelation of His being.

(7) Occasional forms.—In addition to these more or less fixed forms, God also appears in a variety of exceptional or occasional forms. In Nu 12:6-8, it is said that Moses, unlike others, used to see the form (‘mĕnāk) of Jeh. Fire, smoke and cloud are frequent forms or symbols of God's presence (e.g. Gen 15:17; Ex 3:2-4; 19:18; 24:17), and notably (‘הָיָה, 'ehyeh, "I am, that I may be") and its pillar of fire by night" (Ex 13:21). According to other names, the cloud rested upon the tabernacle (Ex 40:34), and in it God appeared upon the ark (Lev 16:2). Extraordinary occurrences or miracles are, in the early period, frequent signs of the power of God (Ex 7:11; 1 K 17:11).

The questions of the objectivity of any or all of these forms, and of their relation to the whole Divine essence raise large problems. OT thought had advanced to the point of identifying God with the phenomena, but we should not read into its figurative language the metaphysical distinctions of a Gr-Christian theology.

All the names of God were originally significant of His character, but the derivatives, and therefore the original meanings, of several have been lost, and new meanings have been found for them.

3. The Names of God

(1) Generic names.—One of the oldest and most widely distributed terms for Deity known to the human race is 'El, with its derivations 'Ĕlīm, 'Ĕlōhīm and 'Ĕloah. Like theos, Deus and God, it is a generic term, including every member of the class deity. It may even denote a position of honor and authority among men. Moses was 'Ĕlōhīm to Pharaoh (Ex 7:1) and to Aaron (Ex 4:16; cf Jgs 5:4; 1 S 2:25; Ex 21:5-6; 22:7f; Ps 58:11; 82:1). It is, therefore, a general term expressing majesty and authority, and it only came to be used as a proper name for Israel's God in the later period of abstract monotheism when the old proper name Jehovah was held to be too sacred to be uttered. The meaning of the root 'Ĕl, and the exact relation to it, and to one another, of 'Ĕlōhīm and 'Ĕloah, lie in complete obscurity. By far the most frequent form used by OT writers is the pl. 'Ĕlōhīm, but they use it regularly with sing. vbs. and it is singular in use. Several exegetical speculations have been offered of this usage of a pl. term to denote a sing. idea—that it expresses the fulness and manifoldness of the Divine nature, or that it is a pl. of majesty used in the manner of royal persons, or even that it is an early imitation of the Trinitarian; other cognate expressions are found in Gen 1:26; 3:22; 1 K 22:19f; Isa 6:8. These theories are, perhaps, too ingenuous to have occurred to the early Heb mind, and a more likely explanation is, that they are survivals in language of a polytheistic stage of thought. In the OT they signify only the general notion of Deity.

(2) Attributive names.—To distinguish the God of Israel as supreme from others of the class 'Ĕlōhīm, certain qualifying appellations are often added. 'El 'Ĕlōyān designates the God of Israel as the highest, the most exalted, among the 'Ĕlōhīm (Gen 14:18-20); so do Jehovah (Ps 7:17) and 'Ĕlōyān alone, often in Ps and in Isa 14:14. 'Ĕl Shaddāy, or Shaddāy alone, is a similar term which describes the strength of some tradition is tr. "God Almighty"; but its derivation and meaning are quite unknown. According to Ex 6:3 it was the usual name for God in patriarchal times, but other traditions in the Pent seem to have no knowledge of this.

Another way of designating God was by His relation to His worshippers, as God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob (Gen 24:12; 26:24); "God of the Canaanites," of the Hebrews (Ex 3:18), and of Israel (Gen 33:20).

Other names used to express the power and majesty of God are čât, "Rock" (Dt 32:18; Isa 30:20); 'dškr (str dr 'dškr), "the Strong One" (Gen 49:24; Isa 1:24; Ps 132:2); melēk, "King"; 'dšōhn, "lord," and 'dšōhnyāy, "my lord" (Ex 23:17; Isa 10:16:33; Gen 18:27; Isa 6:1). Also bu'āl, "proprietor" or "master," may be inferred as a designation once in use, since it appears in such Heb terms as Je무ルbbaal and Ish-baal. The last three names describe God as a Master to whom man stands in the relation of a servant, and they tended to fall into disuse as the necessity arose to differentiate the worship of Jehovah from that of surrounding nations.

A term of uncertain meaning is Yāhweh or 'Ĕlōhīm čôb'dāth, "Jehv" or "God of hosts." In Heb usage "host" might mean an army of men, or the stars and the angels—which, apart or in conjunction, made up the host of heaven. God of Hosts in early times meant the war god who led the armies of Israel (1 S 4:4; 2 S 7:8). In 1 S 17:45 this title stands in parallelism with "the God of the armies of Israel." It is the title of the God of Hosts in Ex 15:14. In the Prophets, where the term has become a regular appellation, it stands in relation to every form of the power and majesty, physical and moral, of God (e.g. Isa 2:12; 6:1-5; 10:20-33). It stands in parallelism with Isaiah's peculiar title, the Holy One of Israel (Isa 5:16:24). It has, therefore, been thought that it refers to the host of heaven. In the Prophets it is practically a proper name. Its original meaning may well have been forgotten or dropped, but its new special significance was "attached to the word 'hosts." The general meaning of the whole term is well expressed by the LXXX tr, kários pantocratór, "Lord Omnipotent."

(3) Jehovah (Yāhweh).—This is the personal proper name par excellence of Israel's God, even as Chemosh was that of the god of Moab, and Dagon that of the god of the Phils. The original meaning and derivation of the word are unknown. The variety of modern theories about its etymology, particularly, several derivations are possible, but that the meanings attached to any one of them have been imported and imposed upon the word. They add nothing to our knowledge. The Hebrews themselves connected the word with the verb "to be," and Ex 3:14 Jehovah is explained as equivalent to 'ēyeḥ, which is a short form of 'ēyeḥ 'âšer 'ēyeḥ, tr2 in RV "I am that I am." This has been supposed to mean "self-existence," and to represent God as the Absolute. Such an idea, however, would be a metaphysical abstraction, not only impossible to the time at which the name originated, but alien to the Heb mind at any time. And the imperfect 'ēyeḥ is more accurately tr2 I will be, a Sem idiom, and it is "all that is necessary as the occasion will arise," a familiar OT idea (cf Isa 7:4; Ps 23).

This name was in use from the earliest historical times till after the exile. It is found in the most ancient lit. According to Ex 3:15f, and esp. 6:2-3, it was first introduced by Moses, and was the medium of a new revelation of the God of the fathers to the children of Israel. But in parts of Gen it is represented as being in use from the earliest times. Theories that derive it from Egypt or Assyria, or that trace it etymologically with Jove or Zeus, are supported by no evidence. We have to be content either to say that Jehovah was the tribal God of Israel from time immemorial, or to accept a theory that is practically identical with that of Ezekiel, it was adopted through Moses from the Midianite tribe into which he married. The Kenites, the tribe of Midianites related to Moses, dwelt in the neighborhood of Sinai, and attached themselves to Israel (Jgs 1 6; 4 11). A few passages suggest that Sinai was the original home of Jeh (Jgs 6 4-5; Dt 33 2). But there is no direct evidence bearing upon the origin of the worship of Jeh: to us He is known only as the God of Israel.

(i) Jeh alone was the God of Israel.—Jeh's theology consists essentially of the doctrine of Jeh and its implications. The teachers and leaders of the people at all times worshiped and enjoined the worship of Jeh alone. Conceptions "It stands out as a prominent and of Jeh incontestable fact, that down to the reign of Ahab . . . no prominent man in Israel, with the doubtful exception of Solomon, known by name and held up for condemnation, worshipped any other god but Yahveh. In every national and individual crisis, in all times of danger and of war, it was Yahveh and Yahveh alone who was invoked to give victory and deliverance" (Montefiore, Hübbert Lectures, 21). This is more evident in what is, without doubt, very early lit., even in later writings (e.g. Jgs 6 6; Dt 33 2; Am 3 2). The isolation of the desert was more favorable to the integrity of Jeh's sole worship than the neighborhood of powerful peoples who worshipped many other gods. Yet that early religion of Jeh can be called monotheistic only in the light of the end it realized, for in the course of its development it had to overcome many limitations.

(a) The early worship of Jeh did not exclude belief in the existence of other gods. As other nations believed in the gods of Jeh (1 S 4 2; 2 K 17 27), so Israel did not doubt the reality of other gods (Jgs 11 24; Nu 21 29; Mic 4 5). This limitation involved two others: Jeh is the God of Israel only; with them alone He makes a COVENANT (q.v.) (Gen 16 18; Ex 6 4; 2 K 17 34-35), and their worship only He seeks (Dt 4 32-37; 32 9; Am 3 2). Therefore He works, and can be worshipped only within a certain geographical area. He may have been associated with His original home and later nation in Canaan (Jgs 5 4; Dt 33 3; 1 K 18 19), but gradually His home and that of His people became identical (1 S 26 19; Hos 9 3; Isa 14 22-25). Even after the departure of the ten tribes, Canaan remains Israel's (2 K 14 24-25). The Canaanites are, therefore, more properly described as Monolatrist or Monotheists than as Monotheists. It is characteristic of the religion of Israel (in contrast with, e.g. thought) that it arrived at absolute Monolatry along the line of moral and religious experience, rather than by that of rational insight. Even while they shared the common Sem belief in the reality of other gods, Jeh alone had for them "the value of God."

(b) It is necessary to distinguish between the teaching of the religious leaders and the belief and practice of the people generally. The presence of a higher religion never wholly excludes superstitious practices. The use of Teraphim (Gen 31 30; 1 S 19 13-16; Hos 3 4), Ephod (Jgs 18 17-20; 1 S 23 9-10; 30 7), Urim and Thummim (1 S 28 6; 14 40, LXX), for the purposes of magic and divination, to obtain oracles from Jeh, was quite common in Israel. Necromancy was practised early and late (1 S 25 7 ff.; Isa 8 19; Dt 18 10, 11). Sorcery and witchcraft were not unknown, but were definitely condemned (Jgs 5 19; 1 S 28 3). The burial places of ancestors were held in great veneration (Gen 35 20; 50 13; Josh 24 30). But these facts do not prove that Jeh religion was animistic and polytheistic, any more than similar phenomena in Christian lands would justify such an inference about Christianity.

(c) Yet the worship of Jeh maintained and developed its monotheistic principle only by overcoming several hostile tendencies. The Baal-worship of the Canaanites and the cults of other neighboring tribes proved a strong attraction to the mass of Israelites (Jgs 2 13; 3 7; 8 33; 10 10; 1 S 8 8; 12 10; 1 K 11 5-33; Hos 2 5-17; Ex 20, 20 5; 22 20; 34 16.17). Under the conditions of life in Canaan, the sole worship of Jeh was in danger of modification by three tendencies, coordination, assimilation and disintegration.

(iii) When the people had settled down in peaceful relations with their neighbors, and began to have commercial and diplomatic transactions with them, it was inevitable that they should render their neighbor's gods some degree of reverence and worship. Courtesy and friendship demanded as much (cf. 2 K 5 18). When Solomon had contracted many foreign alliances by marriage, he was also bound to admit foreign worship into Israel (1 K 11 5). But Ahab was the first king who tried to set up the worship of Baal, side by side with that of Jeh, as the national religion (1 K 18 19). Elijah's stand and Jehu's revolution gave its death blow to Baal-worship and vindicated the monotheistic principle of Jeh's allegiance. The prophet was defending the old religion and Ahab was the innovator; but the conflict and its issue brought the monotheistic principle to a new and higher level. The supreme, relentless and inalienable authority of Jeh was a natural monopoly into a conscious and moral adherence to Jeh alone (1 K 18 21.39).

(ii) But to repudiate the name of Baal was not necessarily to be rid of the influence of Baal-worship. The ideas of the heathen religions survived in a more subtle way in the worship of Jeh Himself. The change from the nomadic life of the desert to the agricultural conditions of Canaan involved some change in religion. Canaan, the God of flocks and wars, had to be recognized as the God of the vintage and the harvest. That this development occurred is manifest in the character of the great religious festivals. "Three times thou shalt keep a feast unto me in the year. The feast of unleavened bread shalt thou keep in the beginning of spring in the year. Thou shalt bring the first-fruit of thy labors, which thou sowest in the field: and the feast of ingathering, at the end of the year, when thou gatherest in thy labors out of the field" (Ex 23 16). The second and the third, obviously, and the first probably, were agri-cultural festivals, which could have no meaning in the desert.

Israel and Jeh together took possession of Canaan. To doubt that would be to admit the claims of the Baal-worship; but to assert it also involved some danger, because it was to assert certain similarities between Jeh and the Baalim. When those similarities were embodied in the national festivals, they loomed very large in the eyes and minds of the mass of the people (W. R. Smith, Prophets of Israel, 49-57). The danger was that Israel should regard Jeh, like the Baals of the country, as a Nature-god, and, by local necessity, a national god, who gave His people the produce of the land and protected them from their enemies, and in return received from them such gifts and sacrifices as corresponded to His nature. From the appearance in Israel, and among Jeh worshippers, of such names as Jeru-baal, Esh-baal (son of Saul) and Beeliah (son of David, 1 Ch 14 7), it has been inferred that Jeh was called Baal, and there is ample evidence that this was the case of the Canaanite Baalim. The bulls raised by Jeroboam (1 K 12 26 ff.) were symbols of Jeh, and in Judah the Canaanite worship was imitated down to the time of Asa (1 K 14 22-24; 15 12.13). Against this tendency above all, the great prophets of the 8th cent. contended. Israel worshipped Jeh as if he were one of the Baalim, and Hosea calls it Baal-worship (Hos 2 3; Am 2 8; Isa 1 10-13). Jeh was conceived as one of the Baalim or Masters of the land, he became, like them, subject to disintegration into a number of local deities. This was probably the gravenom of Jeroboam's sin in the eyes of the "Deuteronomist" historian. In setting up separate sanctuaries, he divided the worship, and, in effect, the godhead of Jeh. The localization and naturalization of Jeh, as well as His assimilation to the Baalim, all went together, so that we read that even in Judah the number of gods was according to its cities (2 K 20; 11 13). The vindication of Jeh's moral supremacy and spiritual unity demanded, among other things, the unification of His worship in Jerusalem (2 K 23). As one respect the religion of Jeh successfully resisted the influence of the heathen cults. At no time was Jeh associated with a goddess. Although the corrupt sensual practices that formed a large part of heathen worship also entered into Israel's worship, Jeh's mention as such is certainly regarded as exceptional (Jgs 11 30-40). Perhaps it is rightly regarded as a unique "survival." Then the story of the sacrifice of Isaac, while reminiscent of an older practice, represents a more advanced view. Jeh's sacrifice, though not demanded, is not abhorrent to Jeh (Gen 22). A further stage is represented where Ahas' sacrifice of his son is condemned as an "abomination of the nations" (2 K 16 3). The belief's centering in Jeh that they are condemned by the prophets as a late and foreign innovation which Jeh had not commanded (Jer 7 31; Ezek 16 20). Other cases, such as the execution of the chiefs of Shittim (Nu 25 4), and of Saul's son "before Jeh" (2 S 21 9), and the Babel ban, by which whole communities were devoted to destruction (Jgs 21 10; 1 S 15), while they show a very inadequate idea of the sacredness of human life, are not sacrifices, nor were they demanded by Jeh's worship. They were condemned by the prophets as a violation of the law, and as such have no moral right. Jeh's religion had not yet abolished.(2) The nature and character of Jeh are manifested in His activities. The OT makes no statements about the essence of God; we are left to infer it from his action in Nature and history and from His dealing with men.

(a) In this period, His activity is predominantly national. As Israel's Deliverer from Egypt, "Jeh is a man of war" (Ex 15 3). An ancient account of Israel's journey to Canaan is called the "book of the Wars of Jeh" (Nu 21 14). By conquest in war He gave His people their land (Jgs 5; 2 S 5 24; Deut 33 27). He is, therefore, more concerned with men and nations, with the moral, than with the physical world.

(b) Even His activity in Nature is first connected with His martial character. Earth, stars and rivers come to His battle (Jgs 5 20-21). The forces of Nature do oblige of Israel's Deliverer from Egypt, "Jeh is a mighty man of war" (Ex 14 15). The moral power shines in the sun and moon to stand while He delivers up the Amorites (Josh 10 12). Later, He employs the forces of Nature to chastise His people for infidelity and sin (2 S 24 15; 1 K 17 1). Amos declares that His moral rule extends to other nations and that it determines their destinies. In harmony with this idea, great catastrophes like the Deluge (Gen 7) and the overthrow of the Cities of the Plain (Gen 19) are ascribed to His moral will. In the same pragmatic manner the oldest creation narrative describes His creating man to rule over the world as He needed (Gen 2), but as yet the idea of a universal cause had not emerged, because the idea of a universe had not been formed. He acts as one of great, but limited, power and knowledge (Gen 11 5-8; 18 20). The more universal conception of Gen 1 belongs to the same stratum of thought as Second Isa. At every stage of the OT the metaphysical perfections of Jeh follow as an inference from His ethical preeminence.

(3) The most distinctive characteristic of Jeh, which finally renders His teaching and His religion absolutely unique, was the moral factor. In saying that Jeh was a moral God, it is meant that He acted by free choice, in conformity with ends which He set to Himself, and which He also imposed upon His worshippers as the law of conduct.

(a) The most essential condition of a moral nature is found in His vivid personality, which at every stage of His self-revelation shines forth with an intensity that might be called aggressive. Divine personality is never expressly defined or named in the OT; but nowhere in the history of religion are they more clearly asserted. The modes of their expression are, however, qualified by anthropomorphisms, by limitations, moral and physical. Jeh as Judge (Ex 20 5; Deut 5 9; 6 15), His wrath and anger (Ex 32 10-12; Deut 7 4) and His inviolable holiness (Ex 19 21-22; 1 S 6 19; 2 S 6 7) appear sometimes to be irrational and immoral; but they are the assertion of His individuality, in so far as He distinguishes Himself from all else, in the moral language of the time, and are the conditions of His having any moral nature whatever. Likewise, He dwells in the tabernacle and moves from it (Jgs 6 5); men may see Him in visible form (Ex 24 10; Num 12 8): He is always represented as having organs like those of the human body, arms, hands, feet, mouth, eyes and ears. By such sensuous and figural language, Jehovah teaches us, "It is possible for a personal God to make Himself known to men.

(b) The content of Jeh's moral nature as revealed in the OT developed with the growth of moral ideas. Though His activity is most predominantly martial, it is most probably, in its savage customs connected with tribal unity, which the higher morality of Jeh's religion had not yet abolished. The moral law stands in the OT, developed with the growth of moral ideas. Though His activity is most predominantly martial, it is most probably, in its savage customs connected with tribal unity, which the higher morality of Jeh's religion had not yet abolished. life to the religious idea, he may have taught them too that murder and theft, adultery and false witness, were abhorred and forbidden by their God' (Montefiore, Hibbert Lectures, 397). The moral teaching of the OT effected the transition from the national and collective to the individual and personal relation with Jeh. The most fundamental defect of Jeh's morality was that its application was confined within Israel itself and did little to determine the relation of the Israelites to people of other nations; and this limitation was bound up with Monotheism, the idea that Jeh was God of Israel alone. The consequence of this national conception of Jeh was that there was no religious and moral bond regulating the conduct of the Hebrews with men of other nations. Conduct which between fellow-Hebrews was offensive in Jeh's eyes was inoffensive when practised by a Hebrew toward one who was not a Hebrew (Dt 23 19f). . . . In the latter case they were governed purely by considerations of expediency. This ethical limitation is the real explanation of the 'spoilings of the Egyptians' (Ex 11 23) (G. Buchanan Gray, The Divine Directive of Israel, 46, 48). The first line of advance under the teaching of the prophets was to expand and deepen the moral demands of Jeh. So they removed at once the ethical and the theological limitations of the earlier view. But they were conscious that they were only developing elements already latent in the character and law of Jeh. Two conditions called forth and determined the message of the 8th-cent. prophets—the degradation of morality and religion at home and the external threats of invasion. Jeh and Judah of God in 5. The Idea the growing danger to Israel and Judah from the all-victorious Assyrian. With the Prophetic Period one voice the prophets declare and condemn the moral and social iniquity of Israel and Judah (Hos 4 1; Am 4 1; Isa 1 21-23). The worship of Jeh had been assimilated to the heathen religions around (Am 2 8; Hos 3 1; Isa 30 22). A time of prosperity had produced luxury, license and an easy security, depending upon the external bonds and ceremonies of religion. In the threatening attitude of Assyria, the prophets see the complement of Israel's unfaithfulness and sin, this the cause and that the instruments of Jeh's anger (Isa 10 5-6). (1) Righteousness.—These circumstances forced into the forefront of Jeh's thought of righteousness of Jeh. It was an original attribute that had appeared even in His most martial acts (Jgs 5 4; 1 S 12 7). But the prophet's interpretation of Israel's history revealed its content on a larger scale. Jeh was not like the gods of the heathen, bound to the purposes and fortunes of His people. Their relation was not a natural bond, but a covenant of grace which He freely bestowed upon them, and He demanded as its condition, loyalty to Himself and obedience to His law. Impending calamities were not, as the naturalistic conception implied, due to the inpen- tence of Jeh against the Assyrs gods (Isa 31 1), but the judgment of God, whereby He applied impartially to the conduct of His people a standard of righteousness, which He both had in Himself and declared in the growing upon them. The prophets did not at first so much transform the idea of righteousness, as assert its application as between the people and Jeh. But in doing that they also rejected the external views of its realization. It consists not merely in the unloaehorfulness of their own best instincts, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly with thy God?" (Mic 6 8). And it tends to become of universal application. Jeh will deal as a righteous judge with all nations, including Israel, and Israel as the covenant people bears the greater respon-sibility (Am 1 3). And a righteous judge that metes out even justice to all nations will deal similarly with individuals. The ministry of the prophets produced a vivid consciousness of the personal and individual relation of men to God. The prophets themselves were not members of any class, no worker or school or profession, but men impelled by an inner and individual call of God, often against their inclination, to proclaim an unpopular message (Am 7 14:5; Is 6; Jer 1 6-9; Ezek 3 14). Jeremiah and Ezekiel in terms announced the old idea of collective responsibility (Jer 31 29 f; Ezek 18). Thus in the prophets' application of the idea of righteousness to their time, two of the limitations adherring to the idea of God, at least in popular religion hitherto, were transcended. Jeh's rule is no longer limited to Israel, nor concerned only with the nation as a collective whole, but He deals impartially with every individual and nation alike. Other limitations also disappear. His anger and wrath, that once appeared irrational and unjust, now become the intensity of His righteousness. Nor is it merely forensic and retributive righteousness. It is rather a moral end, a chief good, which He may realize by loving-kindness and mercy and forgiveness however much as by His law and terror. Jeh thought knew no opposition between God's righteousness and His goodness, between justice and mercy. The covenant of righteousness is like the relation of husband to wife, of father to child, of loving-kindness and everlasting love (Hos 11 1; 11 4; Isa 1 18; 30 18; Mic 7 18; Isa 43 4; 54 8; Jer 31 3 f; 34; 9 24). The stirring events which showed Jeh's independence of Israel revealed the fulness of grace that was always latent in His relation to His people (Gen 33 15; 2 S 20 3). It was enshrined in the Decalogue (Ex 20 6), and proclaimed with incomparable grandeur in what may be the most ancient Mosaic tradition: "Jeh, Jeh, a God gracious, slow to anger and abundant in loving-kindness and truth; keeping loving-kindness for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin" (Ex 34 6 7). (2) The holiness of Jeh in the Prophets came to have a meaning distinct from His righteousness. As an idea more distinctly religious and exclusively applied to God, it was subject to greater changes of meaning with the development and de-gradation of religion. It was applied to anything withdrawn from common use to the service of religion—utensils, places, seasons, names. Originally it was so far from the moral meaning it now has that it was used of the "sacred" prostitutes who ministered to the licentiousness of Canaanitish worship (De 23 18). Whether or not the root-idea of the word was "separateness," there is no doubt that it is applied to Jeh in the OT to express his separateness from men and his sublimity above them. It was not always a moral quality in Jeh; for He might be unapproachable because of His mere power and terror (1 S 5 20; Isa 8 13). But in the Prophets, and esp. in Isa, it acquires a distinctly moral meaning. In his vision, Isaiah hears Jeh proclaimed as "holy, holy, holy," and he is filled with the sense of his own sin and of that of Israel (Isa 6; cf 1 4; Am 2 7). But even here the term conveys more than moral perfection. Jeh is already "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity, whose name is Holy" (Isa 67 15). It expresses the full Divinity of Jeh in His uniqueness and self-existence (Am 5 1 2; 1 S 26 10). It is a concept that no longer seem to stand in antithesis to righteousness, as expressing those qualities of God, metaphysical and moral, by which He is distinguished and separated from men, while righteousness involves those moral activities and relations which man may share with God. But in the Prophets, God's entire being is moral and His whole activity is righteous. The meanings of the terms, though not identical, coincide. Great holiness is realized in righteousness; "God the Holy One is sanctified in righteousness" (Isa 5 16). So Isaiah's peculiar phrase, "the Holy One of Israel," brings God in His most exalted being into a relation of knowledge and moral reciprocity with Israel.

3. The moralizing of righteousness and holiness universalized Deity.—From Amos downward Jeh's moral rule, and therefore His absolute power, were recognized as extending over all the nations surrounding Israel, and the great-world-power of Assyria is but the rod of His anger and the instrument of His righteousness (Am 1–5; Isa 10 5; 13 5 f; 19 1 f). Idolatrous and polytheistic worship of all kinds are condemned. The full inference of Monotheism was only a gradual process, even with the prophets. It is not clear that the 8th-cent. prophets all denied the existence of other gods, though Isaiah's term for them, "ellilim" ("things of nought," "no-gods"), points in that direction. At least the monotheistic process had set in. And Jeh's becoming the center of historical movements to the merely from Israel's point of view. The issue of the judgment upon the two great powers of Egypt and Assyria was to be their conversion to the religion of Jeh (Isa 19 24–25; cf 2 2–4= Mic 1–4). Yet from this time onward the idea that all nations should find their share in Jeh through Israel (Zec 8 23). The nations from the ends of the earth shall come to Jeh and declare that their fathers' gods were 'lies, even vanity and things wherein there is no profit' (Jer 44 19). It is stated categorically that "Jeh he is God in heaven above and upon the earth beneath; there is none else" (De 4 39).

4. The unity of God was the leading idea of Josiah's reformation. Jerus was cleansed of every accretion of Baal-worship and of other heathen religions that had established themselves by the side of the worship of Jeh (2 K 23 4–8.10–14). The semi-heathenism is in many local shrines, which tended to disintegrate His unity, was swept away (2 K 23 8.9). The reform was extended to the Northern Kingdom (2 K 23 15–20), so that Jerus should be the sole habitation of Jeh on earth, and there alone and should be the symbol of unity to the whole Heb race.

But the monotheistic doctrine is first fully and consciously stated in Second Isa. There is no God but Jeh: other gods are merely graven images, and the only permission of worshipping the work of their own hands (Isa 42 8; 44 8–20). Jeh manifests His deity in His absolute sovereignty of the world, both of Nature and history. The prophet had seen the rise and fall of Assyria, the coming of Cyrus, the deportation and return of Judah's exiles, as incidents in the training of Israel for her world-mission to be "a light of the Gentiles" and Jeh's "salvation unto the end of the earth" (42 1–7; 49 1–6). Israel's world-mission, and the control over historical movements to the grand final purpose of universal salvation (45 23), is the philosophy of history complementary to the doctrine of God's unity and universal sovereignty.

5. Creator and Lord.—A further inference is that He is Creator and Lord of the physical universe. Israel's call and mission is from Jeh who "created the heavens, and stretched them forth; he thatspread abroad the earth and that which cometh out of it; he that giveth breath unto the people upon it, and spirit to them that walk thereon" (42 5). Creation and control over the universe and the moral order are inseparably linked. All the essential factors of Monotheism are here at last exhibited, not in abstract metaphysical terms, but as practical motives of religious life. His coun-

6. Idea of God in the Godhead. Jeh is God of all the earth, and God—oligarchy all other beings stand at an infinite distance from Him (Ps 18 31; 24 1 f; 115 3 f). The generic name God is frequently applied to Him, and the tendency appears to avoid the peculiar and proper name Jeh (see esp. Pss 73–89; Job; Ecol).

(1) New conditions.—Nothing essentially new appears, but the teaching of the prophets is developed under new influences. And what then was a new world of ideas was enforced by the teaching of the many. The teaching of the prophets had been enforced by the experiences of the exile. Israel had been punished for her sins of idolatry, and the faithful among the exiles had learned that Jeh's rule extended over many lands and nations. The foreign influences had been more favorable to Monotheism.

The gods of Canaan and even of Assyria and Babylon had been overthrown, and their peoples had given place to the Persians, who, in the religion of Zarathushtra, had advanced nearer to a pure Monotheism than any earlier race had done; for although they posited two principles of being, the Good and the Evil, they worshipped only Ahura-Mazda, the Good. When Persia gave way to Greece, the more cultured Greeks, the Greek who had ideas to discern and separate, and who established schools at Antioch or Alexandria, was a pure Monotheist.

(2) Divine attributes.—Although we do not yet find anything like a dogmatic account of God's attributes, the larger outlook upon the universe and the moral order have produced more comprehensive and far-reaching ideas of God's being and activity. (a) Faith rests upon His eternity and unchangeableness (Ps
God

90 1:2; 102 27). His omniscience and omnipresence are expressed with every possible fulness (Ps 139; Job 26 6). His mighty power is expressed in the confidence of piety, and the rebuke of blasphemy (Ps 74 12-17; 104 et passim; Job 36; 37 et passim; Ecclus 16 17 f.). (b) His most exalted and comprehensive attribute is His holiness, by it He swears as by Himself (Ps 69 55); He expresses His majesty (Ps 99 5.9) and His supreme power (Ps 60 6 f.). (c) His righteousness marks all His acts in relation to Israel and the nations around (Ps 119 137-144; 129 4). (d) That both holiness and righteousness were con- ceived as moral excellences is reflected in the profound sense of sin which the pious knew (Ps 51 4) and revealed in the moral demands associated with them; truth, honesty and fidelity are the qualities of those who shall dwell in God's holy hill (Ps 15); purity, diligence, kindness, honesty, humility and wisdom are the marks of the righteous man (Prov 10-11). (e) In Job and Prov wisdom stands forth as the pre-eminent quality of the ideal man, combining in itself all moral and intellectual excellences, and wisdom comes from God (Prov 2 6); it is a quality of His nature (Prov 8 22) and a mode of His activity (Prov 3 19; Ps 104 24). In the Hellenistic circles of Alexandria, wisdom was transformed into a philosophical conception, which is at once the principle of God's self-revelation and of our creative activity. Philo identifies it with His master-conception, the Logos. "Both Logos and Wisdom mean for Him the reason and mind of God, His image upon the universe, His agent of creation and providence, the creator through which He communicates Himself to man and the world, and His law imposed upon both the moral and physical universe" (Mansfield Essays, 296). In Book of Wids it is represented as proceeding from God, "a breath of the power of God, and a clear effulgence of the glory of the Almighty . . . an unspotted mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness" (7 25-26). In man, it is the author of knowledge, virtue and piety, and in the world it has been the guide and arbiter of its destiny from the beginning (chs 10-12). (f) But in the more purely Heb lit. of this period, the moral attribute of God that comes into greatest prominence is His benevolence. Goodness and mercy, faithfulness and loving-kindness, righteousness and redemption are His willing gifts to Israel. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so Jeh pitieth them that fear him" (Ps 103 13; 146 8; 103 8; Ecclus 2 11). To say that God is loving and like a father goes far on the way to the doctrine that He is Love and Father, but not the whole way; for as yet His mercy and grace are manifested only in individual acts, and they are not the natural and necessary outflow of His nature. All these ideas of God meant less for the Jewish than for the Christian mind, because they were yet held subject to several limitations.

(3) Survival of limitations.—(a) We have evidence of a changed attitude toward anthropomorphisms. God no longer walks on earth, or works under human limitation. Where His eyes or ears or face or hands are spoken of, they are clearly figurative expressions. His activities are universal and invisible, and He dwells on high forevermore. Yet anthropomorphic limitations are not wholly overcome. The idea that God is not to be spoken literally, implies a defect of His power (Ps 44 23).

(b) In the metaphysical attributes, the chief limitation was the idea that God's dwelling-place on earth was on Mt. Zion in Jers. He was no longer confined to "the sin of Pal; His voice ascends in heaven (Ps 114; 103 19), and His glory above the heavens (113 4); but

"In Judah is God known: His name is great in Israel. In Salem also is his tabernacle, And his dwelling-place in Zion." (Ps 76 1.5; 110 2; cf. Ecclus 24 8 f.).

That these are no figures of speech is manifested in the yearning of the pious for the temple, and their despair in separation from it (Ps 42, 43; cf. 122).

(c) This involved a moral limitation, the sense of God's favoritism toward Israel, which sometimes developed into an easy self-righteousness that had no moral basis. God's action was determined by His favor toward Israel, and His loving acts were confined within the bounds of a narrow nationalism. Other nations are wicked and sinners, adversaries and oppressors, upon whom He is called to execute savage vengeance (Ps 109; 137 7-9). Yet Israel did not wholly forget that it was the servant of Jeh to proclaim His name among the nations (Ps 96 2.3; 117). Jeh is good to all, and His tender mercies are over all His works (Ps 145 9; cf. Ecclus 18 15; cf. Ps 104 14; Ecc 14 16, and the Book of Jonah, which is a rebuke to Jewish particularism.

(d) God's holiness in the hands of the priests tended to become a material and formal quality, which fulfilled itself in established ceremonial, and His righteousness in the hands of the Pharisees to become an external law whose demands were satisfied by a mechanical obedience of works. This external conception of righteousness reacted upon the conception of God's government of the world. From the earliest times the Heb mind had associated suffering with the punishment of sin, and blessedness with the reward of virtue. In the post-exilic age the relation came to be thought of as one of strict correspondence between righteousness and reward and between sin and punishment. Righteousness, both in man and God, was not so much a moral state as a measurable sum of acts, in the one case, of obedience, and in the other, of reward or retribution. Conversely, every calamity and evil that befell men came to be regarded as the direct and equivalent penalty of a sin they had committed. The Book of Job is a somewhat inconclusive protest against this prevalent view. These were the tendencies that ultimately matured into the narrow externality of the scribes and Pharisees of Our Lord's time, which had substituted for the personal knowledge and service of God a system of mechanical acts of worship and conduct.

(4) Tendencies to abstractness.—Behind these defective ideas of God's attributes stood a more radical defect of the whole religious conception. The purification of the religion of Israel from Polytheism and idolatry, the affirmation of the unity of God and of His spirituality, required His complete separation from the manifoldness of visible existence. It was the only way, until the more adequate idea of a personal or spiritual unity, that embraced the manifold in itself, was developed. But it was an unstable conception, which tended on the one hand to empty the unity of all reality, and on the other to replace it by a number of entities which was not a unity. Both tendencies appear in post-exilic Judaism.

(a) The first effect of distinguishing too sharply between God and all created being was to set Him above and apart from all the world. A tendency had already appeared in Ezk, whose visions were rather symbols of God's presence than actual experiences of God. In Dnl even the visions appear only in dreams. The growth of the Canon of sacred lit. as the final record of the laws which the case of the scribal in its professional interpreters, signified that God need not, and would not, speak face to face with man again; and the stricter organization of the priesthood and its sacrificial acts in Jesus fulfilled. He shut men generally out from access to God, and to true worship to a mechanical performance. A symptom of this fact was the disuse of the personal name Jehovah and the substitution for it of more general and abstract terms like God and Lord.

(b) Not only an exaggerated awe, but also an element of skepticism, entered into the disuse of the proper name, a sense of the inadequacy of any name. In the Wisdom literature, God's incomprehensibility and remoteness appear for the first time as a convention formed by Him and a difficulty to find Him (Job 15:18-21; 23:3,8,9; Prov 30:2-4). Even the doctrine of immortality developed with the sense of God's present remoteness and the hope of His future nearness (Ps 17:15; Job 19:25). But the rationalistic Deism, Men's religious experiences apprehended God more intimately than their theology professed.

(c) By a "happy inconsistency" (Montefiore) the name and remembrance both in nature (Ps 104; Wisd 8:1; 10:12) and in the inner experience (Prov 15:3; 1 Ch 28:9; 29:17,18). Yet that transcendence was the dominating thought is manifest, most of all, in the formulation of a number of mediating conceptions, which, while they connected God with the world, also revealed the gulf that separated them.

(5) Logos, memra (mem'ra) and angels.—This process of abstraction had gone farthest in Alexandria, where Jewish thought had so far assimilated Platonist philosophy, that Philo and Wisd conceive God as pure being who could not Himself come into any contact with the material and created world. His action and revelation are therefore mediated by His Powers, His Logos and His Wisdom, which, as personified or hypostatized attributes, become His vicegerents on earth. But in Pale, too, many mediating agencies grew up between God and man. The memra, or word of God, was not unlike Philo's Logos. The deified law partly corresponded to Alexandrian Wisdom. The Messiah had already appeared in the Prophets, and now in some circles He was expected as the child of Jehovah to his special favor to Israel. The most important and significant innovation in this connection was the doctrine of angels. It was not entirely new, and Bab and Pers influences may have contributed to its development; but its chief causative factors lay in the Alexandrian growth of thegnikecome intermediaries of revelation (Zec 1:9; 12:9,19; 3:1 ff.), the instruments of God's help (Dnl 3:28; 2 Macc 11:6), and of His punishment (Apopo Bar 21:23). The ancient gods of the nations became their patron angels (Dnl 10:13-21); but Israel's hatred of their gentle enemies often led to their transforming the latter's deities into demons. Incidentally a temporary solution of the problem of evil was thus found, by shifting all responsibility for evil from Jehovah to the demons. The unity and supremacy of God were maintained by the doubtful method of delegating His manifold, and esp. His contradictory, activities to subordinate and partially to hostile spirits, which involved a new Polytheism.

The problem of the One and the Many in ultimate reality cannot be solved by merely separating them. Heb Monotheism was unstable; it maintained its own truth even partially by affirming contradictions, and it contained in itself the demand for a further development. The few pluralistic phrases in the OT (as Gen 1:26; 23:22; 11:7; Isa 5:8, and 'Elōšîm) are not adumbrations of the Trinity, but only philological survivals. But the Messianic hope was an open confession of the incompleteness of the OT revelation of God.

III. The Idea of God in the NT.—The whole of the NT preacher testifies and proclaims upon the OT. Jesus Christ and His disciples inherited the

1. Depend-idea of God revealed in the OT, as it once on OT survived in the purer strata of Jewish religion. So much was it to them and their contemporaries a matter of course, that it never occurred to them to proclaim or enforce the idea of God. Nor did they consciously feel the need of amending or changing it. They sought to correct some fallacious deductions made by later Judaism, and, unconsciously, they dropped the crederer authority of the idea of the OT idea. But their point of departure was always the higher teaching of the prophets and Psalms, and their conscious endeavor in presenting God to men was to fulfill the Law and the Prophets (Mt 5:17). All the worshiping ideas concerning God evolved in the OT reappear in the NT. He is One, supreme, living, personal and spiritual, holy, righteous and merciful. His power and knowledge are all-sufficient, and He is not limited in place. Nor can it be said of Him, that distinctly new attributes are ascribed to God in the NT. Yet there is a difference. The conception and all its factors are placed in a new relation to man and the universe, whereby their meaning is transformed, enriched and enriched with the idea of particularism, with its tendency to Polytheism, disappears. God can no longer bear a proper name to associate Him with Israel, or to distinguish Him from other gods, for He is the God of all the earth, who is no respecter of persons or nations. Two new elements entered men's religious thought and gradually lifted its whole content to a new plane—Jesus Christ's experience and manifestation of the Divine Fatherhood, and the growing conviction of the church that Christ Himself was God and the full and final revelation of God.

Gr thought may also have influenced NT thought, but in a comparatively insignificant and subordinate way. Its content is not thought of as if it was that of Heb thought, and it did not influence the fountain head of NT ideas. It did not color the mind and teaching of Jesus Christ. It affected the form rather than matter of NT teaching. It appears in the clean-cut distinction between the thought of the God of the law and the God of the Spirit which emerges in Paul's Ep., and so it helped to define more accurately the divinity of God. God is the self-disclosure of himself in Christ, and the kindred idea of Christ as the image of God in Paul and He, owe something to the influence of the Platonic and Stoic goals. As this is the case, the idea of God, employed in the NT to define the religious significance of Christ and to manifest a deepening acquaintance to God, it modifies the idea of God itself, by introducing a distinction within the unity into its innermost meaning.

Philosophy never appears in the NT on its own account, but only as subservient to Christian experience. In the NT as in the OT, the existence of God is taken for granted as the universal basis of all life and thought. Only in three passages of the NT Paul's, addressed to heathen audiences, do we find anything approaching a natural theology, and these are concerned rather with defining the nature of God, than with proving His existence. When the people of Lystra would have worshipped Paul and Barnabas as heathen gods, the apostle protests that God is not like men, and bases His majesty upon His supernatural things (Acts 14:15). He urges the same argument at Athens, and appeals for its confirmation to the evidences of man's need of God which he had found in Athens itself (Acts 17:23-31). The same natural witness of the soul, face to face with the last great universe, is again in Rom made the ground of universal responsibility to God (1:18-21). No formal proof of God's existence is offered in the NT. Nor are the metaphorical attributes of God, His infinity, omnipotence and omniscience, as defined in systematic theology, at all set forth in the NT. The ground for these deductions is provided in the religious experience that finds God in Christ all-sufficient.

The fundamental and central idea about God in NT teaching is His Fatherhood, and it determines all that follows. In some sense the idea was not unknown to heathen religions. Greeks and Romans acknowledged Father Zeus or Jupiter as the creator and preserver of Nature, and as standing in some special relation to men. In the OT the idea appears frequently, and his relation to men is clear. Not only is God the creator and preserver of Israel, but He deals with her as a father with his child. "Like as a father pitieth his children, so Jehovah pitieth them that fear Him" (Ps 103:13; cf. Dt 1:31; 32:6; Jer 3:19; 31:20; Isa 63:16; Hos 11:1; Mal 3:17). Even His chastisements are "as a man chasteneth his son" (Dt 8:5; Isa 64:8). The same idea is expressed under the figure of a mother's tender care (Isa 49:15; 66:13; Ps 27:10), and it is embedded in the covenant relation. But in the OT the idea does not occupy the central and determinative position it has in NT, and it is always limited to Israel.

(1) In the teaching of Jesus Christ—God is personified in the Father figure. This is his customary term for the Supreme Being, and it is noteworthy that Jesus' usage has never been quite naturalized. We still say "God" where Jesus would have said "the Father." He meant that the essential nature of God, and His relation to man, as expressed by the attitude and action of a father to his children; but God is Father in an infinitely higher and more perfect degree than any man. He is "good" and "perfect," the heavenly Father, in contrast with men, who, even as fathers, are evil (Mt 5:48; 7:11). What in them is an ideal imperfectly and intermittently realized, is in Him completely fulfilled. Christ thought not of the physical relation of origin and derivation, but of the personal relation of love and care which a father bestows upon his children. The former relation is indeed implied, for the Father is ever working in the world (Jn 5:17), and all things lie in His power (Lk 22:42). By His preserving power, the least as well as the greatest creature lives (Mt 6:26; 10:29). But the fact of His creative, preserving, and governing power, so much as the manner of it, that Christ emphasizes. He is absolutely good in all His actions and relations (Mt 7:11; Mk 10:18). To Him men and beasts turn for all they need, and in Him they find safety, rest and peace (Mt 6:26; 7:11). His goodness goes forth spontaneously and averts all living things, even upon the unjust and His enemies (Mt 5:45). He rewards the obedient (Mt 6:1; 7:21), forgives the disobedient (Mt 6:15), and restores the prodigal (Lk 15:11 ff.). "Fatherhood is love, original and undervived, anticipating and undeserved, forgiving and educating, communicating and drawing to his heart" (Beysschlag, W. Theol., 1:82). To the Father, therefore, should men pray for all good things (Mt 6:6), and He is the ideal of all perfection, to which they should seek to attain (Mt 5:48).

Such is the general character of God as expressed in His Fatherhood, but it is realized in different ways by those who stand to Him in different relations to Him.

(a) Jesus Christ knows the Father as no one else does, and is related to Him in a unique manner. The idea is central in His teaching, because the fact is fundamental in His experience. His first personal appearance in history He declares that He must be about His Father's business (Lk 2:49), and at the last He commends His spirit into His Father's hands. Throughout His life, His filial consciousness is perfect and unbroken. "I and the Father are one" (Jn 10:30). Christ, the Son of the Father, so the Father knows and acknowledges Him. At the opening of His ministry, and again at its climax in the transfiguration, the Father bears witness to His perfect sonship (Mt 4:11; 9:7). It was a relation of shared love and unwavering unalloyed and infinite. "The Father loveth the Son, and hath given all things into his hand" (Jn 3:35; 5:20).

The Father sent the Son into the world, and intrusted Him with his message and power and purpose (Mt 11:27). By the Father's own hand He was given to Him, to receive His word (Jn 6:37.44.45; 17:6.8). He does the works and speaks the words of the Father who sent Him (Jn 6:36; 8:18.29; 14:24).

(b) His dependence upon the Father, and His trust in Him are equally complete (Jn 11:41; 12:27; 17:5). In this perfect union of Christ with God, unclouded by sin, unbroken by infidelity, God first became for a human life on earth all that He could and would become. Christ's filial consciousness was in fact and experience the full and final revelation of God. "No one knoweth the Son, save the Father; neither doth any know the Father, save the Son, and he to whomsoever the Son willeth to reveal him" (Mt 11:27).

Not only can we see in Christ what perfect filial consciousness is, but He tells us that by His ideal of Fatherhood He is so completely reflected that we may know the perfect Father also. "He that hath seen me hath seen the Father" (Jn 14:9; cf. 8:19). Nay, it is more than a reflection: so completely is the mind and will of God expressed by the Father, the Filial, and the Fatherhood, that they interpenetrate, and the words and works of the Father shine out through Christ. "The words that I say unto you I speak not from myself: but the Father abiding in me doeth his works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me" (Jn 14:10.11).

As the Father, so is the Son, for men to honor or to hate (5:23; 15:23).

In the last day, when He comes to execute the judgment which the Father has intrusted to Him, He shall come in the glory of the Father (Mt 16:27; Mk 8:38; Lk 9:26). In all this Jesus is aware that His relation to the Father is unique. What in Him is original and realized, in others can only be an ideal to be gradually realized by His communication. "I and the Father are one," and this is the ideal of the Father, that they interpenetrate, and the words and works of the Father shine out through Christ. "The words that I say unto you I speak not from myself: but the Father abiding in me doeth his works. Believe me that I am in the Father, and the Father in me" (Jn 14:9; 11). He is, therefore, rightly called the "only begotten son" (3:16), and His contemporaries believed that He Made Himself equal to God (6:18).

(c) Through Christ, His disciples and hearers, too, may know God as their Father. He speaks of "your Father," "your heavenly Father." To them as individuals, it means a personal relation; He is "thy Father" (Mt 6:4,18). Their whole conduct should be determined by the consciousness of the Father's intimate presence (6:1.4). To do His will is the ideal of life (7:21; 12:50). More explicitly, it is to act as He does, to love and forgive as He loves and forgives (5:45); and, finally, to be perfect as He is perfect (5:48). Thus do men become sons of their Father who is in heaven. Their peace and safety lay in their knowledge of His constant and all-sufficient care (6:32.33). The ultimate goal of men's relation to Christ is that through Him they shall at last come to a realization that their Father is like His relation both to the Father and to them, wherein Father, Son, and believers form a social unity (Jn 14:21; 17:23; of ver 21).

(d) While God's fatherhood is thus realized and revealed, originally and fully in Christ, derivatively and partially in his hearers, it also has significance for all men. Every man is born a child of God and heir of His kingdom (Lk 18:16). During child-all men are objects of His fatherly love and care (Mt 18 10), and it is not His will that one of them should perish (18 14). Even if they become His enemies, He still bestows His beneficence upon the evil and the unjust (Mt 5 44,45; Lk 6 35). They may break the law although the God may be broken, but His nature and attitude are not changed. He is the Father absolutely, and as Father He is perfect (Mt 5 48). The essential and universal Divine Fatherhood finds its eternal and continual object in the only begotten Son who is in the bosom of the Father. As a relation with men, it is qualified by their attitude to God; while some by faithlessness make it of no avail, others by obedience become in the reality of their experience sons of their Father in heaven. See CHILDREN OF GOD. (2) In the apostolic teaching, although the Fatherhood of God is not so prominently or so abundantly exhibited as it was by Jesus Christ, it lies at the root of the whole system of salvation there presented. Paul makes the Fatherhood by faith a universal, but the scholastic form of the parable of the Prodigal Son. John's one idea, that God is love, is but an abstract statement of His fatherhood. In complete accord with Christ's teaching, that only through Himself men know the Father and come to Him, the whole apostolic system of grace is mediated through Christ the Son of God, sent because "God so loved the world" (Jn 3 16), that through His death men might be reconciled to God (Rom 5 10; 3 8). He speaks of the Father in the fulness of His glory, and the very image of His substance (He 1 3). The central position assigned to Christ involves the central position of the Fatherhood.

As in the teaching of Jesus, so in that of the apostles, we distinguish three different relationships in which the fatherhood is realized in varying degrees: (a) Primarily He is the God and Father of Our Lord Jesus Christ (Rom 15 6; 2 Cor 1 3). As such He is the source of all life and blessing in the heavenly places in Christ (Eph 1 3). Through Christ we have access unto the Father (Eph 2 18). (b) He is, therefore, God our Father (Rom 1 7; 1 Cor 1 3). Believers are sons of God through faith in Christ Jesus (Ga 3 26). "As many are led by the Spirit of God, these are sons of God" (Rom 8 14). These receive the spirit of adoption whereby they cry, Abba, Father (Rom 8 15; Gal 4 6). The figure of adoption has sometimes been understood as implying the denial of man's natural sonship and God's essential Fatherhood, but that would be pressing the figure beyond Paul's purpose. (c) The apostles' teaching, like Christ's, is that man in sin cannot possess the filial consciousness or know God as Father; but God, in His attitude to man, is always and essentially Father. In the sense of creaturehood and dependence, man in any condition is a son of God (Acts 17 28). And to speak of any other natural sonship which is not also morally realized is meaningless. From God's standpoint, man even in his sin is a possible son, in the personal and moral sense; and the whole process and power of his awakening to the realization of his sonship issues from the fatherly love of God, who sent His Son to reconcile His anger. He is "the Father" absolutely, "one God and Father of all, who is over all, and through all, and in all. But unto each one of us was the grace given according to the measure of the gift of Christ" (Eph 4 5,7).

After the Divine Fatherhood, the kingdom of God (Mk and Lk) or of heaven (Mt) is the next ruling conception in the teaching of Jesus. As the doctrine of the Fatherhood sets forth the individual relation of Christ, so the Kingdom, defined, as God's rule, sets forth their collective and social condition, as determined by the rule of the Father.

(1) The kingdom of God.—Christ adopted and transformed the OT idea of Jehovah's rule into an inner spiritual and in part, spiritual rule of Jesus, without, however, quite detaching it from the external and apocalyptic thought of His time. He adopts the Jewish idea in so far as it involves the enforcing of God's rule; and in the immediate future He anticipates such a reorganization of social conditions in the manifestation of God's reign over men and nature, as will ultimately amount to a regeneration of all things in accordance with the will of God (Mk 9 1; 13 30; Mt 16 28; 19 28). But He eliminated the particularism and favoritism toward the Jews, as well as the non-moral, easy optimism as to their destiny in the kingdom, which obtained in contemporary thought. The blessings of the kingdom are moral and spiritual in their nature, and the conditions of entrance are moral, not necessarily external (Ga 3 21 21 54; 23 37,38; Lk 13 29). They are humility, hunger and thirst after righteousness, and the love of mercy, purity and peace (Mt 5 5 10; Mt 13 13; cf Mt 20 26 28; 25 45; T 23; Lk 17 20 21). The king of such a kingdom is, therefore, righteous loving and grace-toward all men; He governs by the inner communion of spirit with spirit and by the loving coordination of the will of His subjects with his own will. (2) Is Jesus the King? (a) Generally in Mk and Lk, and sometimes in Mt, it is called the kingdom of God. In several parables, the Father takes the place of king, and it is the Father that gives the kingdom (Lk 12 32). God the Father is therefore the King, and we are entitled to argue from Jesus' teaching concerning the kingdom to His idea of God. The will of God is the law of the kingdom, and the ideal of the kingdom is, therefore, the character of God. (b) But in some passages Christ reveals the continual blessing of his kingdom. He approvingly Peter's confession of His Messiahship, which involves Kingship (Mt 16 16). He speaks of a state in the immediate future when men shall see "the son of man coming in His kingdom" (Mt 26 64). As God the Father is the King, He is also a spiritual king, who is, as many are (Mk 5 35; Lk 19 38). He accepts the title king from Pilate (Mt 27 11; Mk 16 2; Lk 23 3; Jn 18 37), and claims a kingdom which is not of this world (Jn 18 36). His disciples look to Him for the restoration of the kingdom (Acts 1 6). His kingdom, like that of God, is inner, moral and spiritual. (c) But there can be only one moral kingdom, and only one supreme authority in the spiritual realm. The coordination of the two kingdoms must be found in their relation to the Fatherhood. The two ideas are not necessarily independent. They may have been separate and even opposed as Christ found them, but He used them as two points of apprehension in the minds of His hearers, by which He communicated to them His one idea of God, as the Father who ruled a spiritual kingdom by love and righteousness, and ordered Nature and history to fulfil His purpose of grace. Men's prayer should be that the Father's kingdom may come (Mt 6 10). They enter the kingdom by faith, in which He in the Father's good pleasure to give them the kingdom (Lk 12 32). The Fatherhood is primary, but it carries with it authority, government, law and order, care and provision, to set up and organize a kingdom reflecting a Father's love and expressing His will.
And as Christ is the revealer and mediator of the Fatherhood, He also is the messenger and bearer of the kingdom. In His person, preaching and works, the kingdom is present to men (Mt 4:1723; 12:28), and as its King He claims men's allegiance and obedience. (Mt 11:28-29). His sonship constitutes His relation to the kingdom of God. As Son He obeys the Father, depends upon Him, represents Him to men, and is one with Him. And in virtue of this relation, He is the messenger of the kingdom and its prince, and at the same time He shares with the Father its authority and its kingship.

(3) Apostolic teaching.-In the apostolic writings, the emphasis upon the elements of kingdom, authority, law and righteousness is greater than in the gospels. The kingdom is related to God (Gal 5:21; Col 4:11; 1 Thes 2:12; 2 Thes 1:5), and to Christ (Col 1:13; 2 Tim 4:1182; 2 Pet 1:11), and to both together (Eph 5:5; cf. 1 Cor 15:24).

The phrase "the kingdom of the Son of his love" sums up the idea of the joint kingship, based upon the relation of Father and Son.

The nature and character of God are summed up in the twofold relation of Father and King in which He stands to men, and any abstract statements that may be made about the Father and the Son that may be ascribed to Him, are deductions from His royal Fatherhood.

(1) Personality.-That a father and king is a person needs not to be argued, and it is almost tautology to say that a person is a spirit. Christ relates directly the spirituality of God to His Fatherhood.

"The true worshippers shall worship the Father in spirit and truth: for such doth the Father seek to be his worshippers. God is Spirit" (Jn 4:23-24). Figures of speech with the same truth are the Johannine phrases, 'God is life' (1 Jn 5:20), and "God is light" (1 Jn 1:5).

(2) Love is the most characteristic attribute of Fatherhood.

It is the abstract term that most fully expresses the concrete character of God as Father. In John's theology, it is used to sum up all God's perfections in one general formula. God is love, and where no love is, there can be no knowledge of God and no realization of Him (1 Jn 4:8-16). With only one exception, the phrase "the love of God" appears in the teaching of Jesus and only as it is represented in the Fourth Gospel. There it expresses the bond of union and communion, issuing from God, that holds together the whole spiritual society, Christ and believers (Jn 15:10; 14:21). Christ's mission was the revelation of the nature of that love rather than of interpretation, and what in person and act He represents before men as the living Father, the apostles describe as almighty and universal love. They saw and realized this love first in the Son, and esp. in His sacrificial death. It is "the love of God, which is in Christ Jesus our Lord" (Rom 8:39). "God commendeth his own love toward us, in that, while we were yet sinners, Christ died for us!" (Rom 5:8; cf. Eph 2:4).

Love was fully made known in Christ's death (1 Jn 3:16). The whole process of the incarnation and death of Christ was also a sacrifice of God's and the one supreme manifestation of His nature as love (1 Jn 4:9-10; cf. Jn 3:16). The love of God is His fatherhood to Christ extended to men through Christ. By the Father's love bestowed upon us, we are called children of God (1 Jn 3:1). Love is not only an emotion of tenderness and benevolence which bestows on men the greatest gifts, but a relation to God which constitutes their entire law of life. It imposes upon men the highest moral demands, and communicates to them the moral energy by which alone they can be met. It is law and grace combined. The love of God is perfected only in those who keep the word of Jesus Christ the Righteous (1 Jn 2:5). "For this is the love of God, that we keep his commandments" (1 Jn 5:3). It is manifested esp. in brotherly love (1 Jn 4:20). It cannot dwell with worldliness (1 Jn 2:15) or callous selfishness (3:17). Man derives it from God as he is made the son of God, begotten of Him (4:7).

(3) Righteousness and holiness were familiar ideas to Jesus and His disciples, as elements in the Divine character. They were current in the thought of their time, and they stood foremost in the OT conception. They were therefore adopted in their essential in the NT, but they stand in a different context. They are coordinated with, and even subordinated to, the idea of love. As kingship stands to fatherhood, so righteousness and holiness stand to love.

(a) Once we find the phrase "Holy Father" spoken by Jesus (Jn 17:11; cf. 1 Pet 1:15,16). But generally the idea of holiness is associated with God in His activity through the Holy Spirit, which renew, enlightens, purifies and cleanses the lives of men. Righteousness of a moral, non-moral meaning disappears from the idea of holiness in the NT. The sense of separation remains only as separation from sin. So Christ as high priest is "holy, guileless, undefiled, separated from sinners" (He 9:14). Where His holiness is coupled with the fruit of the light (Eph 5:9; cf. 1 Tim 6:11; 2 Tim 2:22). It implies a rule or standard of conduct, which in effect is one with the life of love and holiness. It is brought home to men by the conviction of the Holy Spirit (Jn 16:8). In its essence it is the righteousness of God (Mt 6:33; cf. Jn 17:25). In Paul's theology, "the righteousness of God through faith in Jesus Christ unto all them that believe" (Rom 3:22) is the act of God, out of free grace, declaring and translating the standard righteousness, that he thereby may become righteous, even as "we love, because he first loved us" (1 Jn 4:19). The whole character of God, then, whether we call it love, holiness or righteousness, is revealed in His work of salvation, wherein He goes forth to men in love and mercy, that they may be made citizens of His kingdom, heirs of His righteousness, and participators in His love.

The abstract being of God and His metaphysical attributes are implied, but not defined, in the NT.

7. Meta- Attributes are not enunciated in terms, but physical science are postulated in the whole scheme of salvation which He is carrying to completion. He is Lord of heaven and earth (Mt 11:25). The forces of Nature are at His command (Mt 5:45; 6:30). He can answer every prayer and satisfy every need (Mt 7:7-12). All things are possible to Him (Mt 19:26; 14:36). He created all things (Eph 3:9).

All earthly powers are derived from Him (Rom 13:1).

By His power, He raised Christ from the dead and subjected to Him "all rule, and authority, and power, and dominion" in heaven and on earth (Eph 1:20,21; cf. Mt 28:18). Every power and condition of existence are subjected to the sway of His love unto His saints (Rom 8:38,39). Neither time nor place can limit Him: He is the eternal God (Rom 16:20).

His knowledge is as infinite as His power. He knows what the Son and the angels know not (Mk 13 32). He knows the hearts of men (Lk 16 15) and all their needs (Mt 6 8.32). His knowledge is esp. manifested in His wisdom by which He works out His purpose of salvation, “the manifold wisdom of God, according to the eternal purpose which He purposed in Christ Jesus our Lord” (Eph 3 10.11). The teaching of the NT implies that all perfections of power, condition and being cohere in God, and are revealed in His love. They are not developed or established on metaphysical grounds, but they flow out of His perfect fatherhood. Earthly fathers do what good they can for their children, but the Heavenly Father does all things for the best for His children—“to them that love God all things work together for good”—because He is restricted by no limits of power, will or wisdom (Mt. 7 11; Rom 8 28).

It is both assumed through the NT and stated categorically that God is one (Mt 12 29; Rom 3 30; Eph 4 6). No truth had sunk more deeply into the Hebrew mind than the unity of God this time than the unity of God.

8. THE GOD OF NATURE.—It is obvious from what has been written, that Jesus Christ claimed a power, authority and position that they can only be adequately described by calling Him God; and the apostolic church both in worship and in doctrine accorded Him this honor. All that they knew of God as now fully and finally revealed was summed up in His person dwelt in the fulness of the Godhead bodily” (Col 2 9). If they did not call Him God, they recognized and named Him everything that God meant for them.

(2) The Holy Spirit.—Moreover, the Holy Spirit is a third person in the life of the Son. It is to the manner in which His presence is accorded a Divine person in the experience, thought and language of Christ and His disciples. In the Johannine account of Christ’s teaching, it is probable that the Holy Spirit is identified with the risen Lord Himself (Jn 14 16.17; ver 15), and Paul seems also to identify them in at least one passage: “the Lord is the Spirit” (2 Cor 3 17). But in other places the three names are ranged side by side as representing three distinct persons (Mt 28 19; 2 Cor 13 14; Eph 4 4–6).

(3) The church as the body of Christ problem.—But how does the unity of God cohere with the Divine status of the Son and the distinct subsistence of the Holy Spirit? Jesus Christ affirmed a unity between Himself and the Father (Jn 10 30), a unity, too, which might be realized in the mind of the Father, who is the Father, the Son and believers should form one society (17 21. 23), but He reveals no category which would conduce the unity of the Godhead in a manifestation of representation. The experience of the first Christians as a rule found Christ so entirely sufficient to all their religious needs, so filled with all the fulness of God, that the tremendous problem which had arisen for thought did not trouble them. Paul expresses his conception of the relation of Christ to God under the figure of the image. Christ “is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation” (Col 1 15; 2 Cor 4 4). Another writer employs a similar metaphor. Christ is “the effulgence of [God’s] glory, and the very image of His substance” (He 1 3). But these figures do not carry us beyond the fact, abundantly evident elsewhere, that Christ in all things represented God because He participated in His being. In the prologue to the Fourth Gospel, the doctrine of the Word is developed for the same purpose. The eternal Reason of God who was ever with Him, and of Him, issues forth as revealed thought, or spoken word, in the person of Jesus Christ, who therefore is the eternal Word of God incarnate. So far and no farther the NT goes. Jesus Christ is God re-vealed; we know nothing of God, but that which is manifest in Him. His love, holiness, righteousness and purpose of grace, ordering and guiding all things to realize the ends of His fatherly love, all this we know in and through Jesus Christ. The Holy Spirit takes of Christ’s and declares it to men (Jn 16 14). The problems of the coordination of the One with the Three, of personality with the plurality of consciousness, of the Infinite with the finite, and of the Eternal God with the Word made flesh, were left over for the church to solve. The Holy Spirit was given to the church to kindle the desire in it to the truth (Jn 16 13). “And lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world” (Mt 28 20).

GOD, IMAGE OF: In Gen 1 26.27, the truth is declared that God created man in His own image (qdm, after His likeness (dwmath). The two ideas denote the same reality to God. The like conception of man, tacit or avowed, underlies all revelation. It is given in Gen 9 6 as the ground of the prohibition of the shedding of man’s blood; is echoed in Ps 8; is reiterated frequently in the NT (1 Cor 11 7; Eph 4 24; Col 3 10; Isa 3 9). The nature of this image of God in man is discussed in other arts.—see esp. Anthropology. It lies in the nature of the case that the ‘image’ does not consist in a bodily form, since it can only reside in the representation in man’s mental and moral attributes as a self-conscious, rational, personal agent, capable of self-determination and obedience to moral law. This gives man his position of lordship in creation, and invests his being with the sanctity of personality. The image of God, defaced, but not entirely lost through sin, is restored in yet more perfect form in the redemption of Christ. Descriptive and Figurative Names

1. Introduction.—To an extent beyond the appreciation of modern and western minds the people of Biblical times valued the name of the person. They always gave to it symbolical or character meaning.

While our modern names are almost exclusively designatory, and intended merely for identification, the Biblical name is descriptive, often prophetic. Religious significance nearly always inhered in the name, a part relating to the child to the Deity for discretion or consecration to the Deity, by joining the name of the Deity with the service which the child should render, or perhaps commemorating in a name the favor of God in the gracious gift of the child, e.g. Nathan ("gift of God"); Samuel ("heard of God"); Adonijah ("Jeh is my Lord"). It seems to us strange that at its birth, the life and character of a child should be forecast by its parents in a name; and this unique custom has been regarded by an unsympathetic criticism as evidence of the origin of the names and their constant narratives long subsequent to the completed life itself. Not a few names for example, as Abraham, Sarah, etc. But that this was different and that it was regarded as a matter of course, is proved by the name given to Our Lord at His birth; "Thou shalt call His name Jesus; for it is He that shall save His people." (Mt 1:21). It is not unlikely that the giving of a character name represented the parental confidence and fidelity in the training, resulting necessarily to giving to the child's life that very direction, which the name indicated. A child's name, therefore, because both the child and its recipient, and its rearing and education in character became often a necessary psychological and religious preparation or dissonance, was attached to the name. The OT writings contain many and varied instances of this. Sometimes contempt for certain repugnant men would be most expressively indicated by a change of name, e.g. the change of Es-haai, "man of Baal" to Jehovah (2 S 2:6) and the omission of Jeh from the name of the apostle king, Abas (2 K 15 38, etc). The name of the last "king of Judah was most expressively changed by Nehemiah, from Mattaniah to Zedekiah, to assure his fidelity to God, and it was by a man who made him king (2 K 24:17). See Names, Proper.

Since the Scriptures of the OT and NT are essentially for purposes of revelation, and since the Hebrews laid such store by names, we should confidently expect them to make the "Name the Divine name a name of the highest of the first importance. People Name" accustomed by long usage to signify character indications in their own names, necessarily would regard the names of the Deity of His service to be very to them the "name of Jeh," or "His name," as applied to the Deity in Biblical, is most interesting and suggestive, sometimes expressing comprehensively His revelation in Nature (Ps 8:1; cf 138:2); or marking the place of His worship, where men will call upon His name (Dt 12:5); or used as a synonym of His various attributes, e.g. faithfulness (Isa 48:9), grace (Ps 23:3), His honor (Ps 79:9), etc. "Accordingly, since the name of God denotes this "God Himself as He is revealed as He desires to be known by His creatures, when it is said that God will make a name for Himself by His mighty deeds, or that the new world of the future shall be unto Him a name, we can easily understand that the name of God may embody both the glowing, glorious God, and that the expressions for both are combined in the utmost variety of words, or used alternately." (Schultz, OT Theology, ET, I, 124-25; cf Ps 72:19; Isa 63:14; also Davidson, OT Theol, 37-38).

From the important place which the Divine name occupies in revelation, we would expect frequency of occurrence and diversity of form; and this is just that which we find to the be true. The many forms or varieties of the Subject of the name will be considered under (1) Absolute or Personal Names, (2) Attributive, or Qualifying Names, and (3) Names of God in the NT.

and in course of time attributive names tend to crystallize through frequent use and devotional regard into personal names; thus the attributive adj. kadôshô, "holy," becomes the personal, transcendental name for Deity in Job and Isa. For fuller details of each name reference may be made to separate articles.

2. Absolute or Personal Names.—The first form of the Divine name in the Bible is אֱלֹהִים, אֱלֹהִים, ordinarily transliterated "God" (Gen 1:1). This אֱלֹהִים, is the most frequently used name in "God," the OT, as its equivalent דָּוִד, דָּוִד, is in the NT, occurring in Gen alone approximately 2004. It is one of a group of kindred words, to which belong also גָּאוֹן, גָּאוֹן (1). Its form is pl., but the construction is uniformly singular, i.e. it governs a sing. vb. or adj., unless used of heathen divinities (Ps 96:5; 97:7). It is characteristic of Heb that extension, magnitude and dignity, as well as actual multiplicity, are expressed by the pl. It is therefore to be expected that plurality of form indicates primitive Sem polytheism. On the contrary, historic Heb is unqualified and uniformly monothestic.

a. The derivation is quite uncertain. Gesenius, Ewald and especially Kittel regard the ultimate source of the root אָלָה, "to be strong," from which are derived ṣāqî, "ram," and ṣâḥî, "terebinth"; it is then an expanded pl. form of ṣāqî; others trace it to ṣânî, "to be strong." The sing. form is found in the infrequent פָּנָה, פָּנָה, which occurs chiefly in poetic books; BDB inclines to the derivation from פָּנָה, פָּנָה, "to be strong," as the root of the three forms, אֱלֹהִים, אֱלֹהִים and אלֹהִים, although admitting that the whole question is involved in uncertainty (tor the same view see Ewald; while most Bab and Arabic suggest the connection with the prep. פָּנָה, פָּנָה, signifying God as the "goal" of man's life and aspiration. The origin must always lie in doubt, since the derivation is problematic, and the name, with its kindred words אֱלֹהִים and אלֹהִים, is common to Sem languages and religions and beyond the range of Heb records.

b. It is the reasonable conclusion that the meaning is "might" or "power"; that it is common to Sem language; that the form is pl. to express majesty or "all-mightiness," and that it is a generic, rather than a specific personal, name for Deity, as is indicated by its frequency in the OT. A few of the Deity (Jgs 6:8; Ps 82:1) or who are in His presence (1 S 28:13).

The sing. form of the preceding name פָּנָה, פָּנָה, אֱלֹהִים, is confined in its use almost exclusively to poetry, or to poetic expression, being 2. אֱלֹהִים, characteristic of the Book of Job, occurring oftener in that book than in any other parts of the OT. It is, in fact, found in Job oftener than the elsewhere more ordinary pl. אֱלֹהִים. For derivation and meaning see above under 1 (2). Of all the Aram. form פָּנָה, פָּנָה, אֱלֹהִים, found frequently in Ezr and Dn.

In the group of Sem languages, the most common word for Deity is אל,阿尔, represented by the Arab. אל. It is found throughout the OT, but oftener in Job and Ps than in all the other books. It is seldom in the historical books, and not at all in Lev. The same variety of derivations is attributed to it as to אלהים (q.v.), most probable of which is פָּנָה, פָּנָה, "to be strong." BDB interprets פָּנָה as meaning "to be in front," from which came אֵל, אֵל, the one in front of the flock, and אלהים, the prominent or "terebinth" deriving El from דָּוִד, דָּוִד, "to be strong." It occurs in many of the more ancient names; and, like אלהים, it is used of pagan gods. It is frequently combined... with nouns or adjectives to express the Divine name with reference to particular attributes or phases of His being, as 'El 'Elgôn, 'El-Rô', etc. (see below under III, "Attributive Names").

An attributive name, which in prehistoric Heb. had already begun to pass over into a generic name of God, is יְהוָה, יְהוָה, יְאָדֹנִי, the 4. 'Adhôn, latter formed from the former, being 'Adhônay the const. pl., 'Adhôné, with the 1st pers. ending ay, which has been lengthened to 'ây and so retained as characteristic of the proper name and distinguishing it from the possessive 'ôy. AV does not distinguish, but renders both as possessive, "my Lord" (Jgs 6 15; 13 8), and as personal name (Ps 2 4); RV also, in Ps 16 2, is in doubt, giving "my Lord," possessive, in text and "the Lord" in m. 'Adhônay, as a name of Deity, emphasizes His sovereignty (Ps 2 4; Isa 7 7), and corresponds closely to Kûrîós of the NT. It is frequently combined with Jeh (Gen 15 8; Isa 7 7, etc) and with 'Elshâm (Ps 86 12). Its most significant service in MT is the use of its vowels to point the unpronounceable tetragramm. In combination, that the word 'Adhônay should be spoken instead of Yahweh. This combination of vowels and consonants gives the transliteration "Jehovah," adopted by ARV, while the other EV, since Coverdale, represents the combination by the capsular LXX. LXX represents by Kurios.

The name most distinctive of God as the God of Israel is Jehovah (יְהוָה), a combination of the tetragrammaton with the vowels of 'Adhônay, transliterated Yhôvah, but read by the Hebrews 'Adhônay). While both derivation and meaning are lost to us in the uncertainties of its antebiblical origin, the following inferences seem to be justified by the facts: (1) This name was common to religions other than Israel's, according to Friedr. Delitzsch, Hommel, Winckler, and Kuthe (EB, s.v.), having been found in Bab inscriptions. Ammonite, Arab, and Egyptian names appear also to contain it (cf Davidson, OT Theol., 52 f); but, while, like Elohim, it was common to primitive religions, it became Israel's distinctive name for the Deity.

(2) It was, therefore, not first made known at the call of Moses (Ex 3 13-16; 6 2-8), but, being already known, was at that time given a larger revelation and interpretation: One to be known to Israel henceforth under the name "Jehovah" and in its fuller significance, was the One sending Moses to deliver Israel; "when I shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them? And God said . . . . I WILL BE THAT I WILL BE . . . . say . . . . I WILL BE hath sent me" (Ex 3 13-14 m). The name is assumed as known in the narrative of Gen; it also occurs in pre-Mosaic names (Ex 6 20; 1 Ch 2 25; 7 8). (3) The derivation is from the archaic יְהוָה, hâwâh, "to be," better "to become," in Bib. Heb. hâyâh; this archaic use of w for y appears also in derivatives of the similar יְהוָה, hâyâh, "to live," e.g. hâsâh in Gen 3 19. It is evident from the interpretative passages (Ex 3 6) that the form is the fut. of the simple stem (Kâl) and not fut. of the causative (Hiph'il) stem in the sense "giver of life"—an idea not born out by any of the occurrences of the word. The fanciful theory that the word is a combination of the proper and perfect tenses of the vb., signifying "the One who will be, is, and was," is not to be taken seriously (Stier, etc, in Oehler's OT Theol., in loc.). (5) The meaning may with some confidence be inferred from Origen's transliteration, Ἰαυ, the form in Sam, Ἰαβ, the form as combined in OT names, and the evident signification in Ex 3 and other passages, to be that of the simple fut., יְהֹוָה, yahweh, "he will be." It does not express causation, nor existence in a metaphysical sense, but the covenant promise of the Divine presence, both at the immediate time and in the Messianic age of the future. And thus it became bound up with the Messianic hope, as in the phrase, "the Day of Jehovah," and consequently both it and the LXX tr Kûrîos were applied by the OT to titles of God (6) It is the personal name of God, as distinguished from such generic or essential names as 'El, 'Elshâm, Shadday, etc. Characteristic of the OT is its insistence on the possible knowledge of God as a person; and Jehovah is His name as a person. It is illogical, certainly, that the later Hebrews should have shrunk from its pronunciation, in view of the appropriateness of the name and of the OT insistence on the personality of God, who as a person has this name. ARV quite correctly adopts the transliteration "Jehovah" to emphasize its significance and purpose as a personal name of God revealed.

Five t in the "Song" of Moses (Dt 32 4 15.18. 30.31) the word יְהוָה, "Rock," is used as a title of God. It occurs also in the Ps. Isa and LXX. The passages of this kind are found also in proper names, Elazar, Zuriel, etc. Once in AV (Isa 44 8) it is tr' "God," but "Rock" in ARV and ARVm. The effort to interpret this title as indicating the amnistic origin of OT religion seems unnecessary and a pure product of the imagination. It is customary for both OT and NT writers to use descriptive names of God: "Rock," "fortress," "shield," "light," "bread," etc. and is in harmony with all the rich figurative sense of the Scriptures; the use of the article in many of the cases cited further corroborates the view that the word is intended to be a descriptive title, not the name of a Nature-deity. It presents the idea of God as stedfast: 'The appellation of God as cûr, "rock," "safe retreat," in Dt refers to this" (Oehler, OT Theol.). It often occurs, in a most striking figure, with the pers. suffix as "my rock," "their rock," to express confidence (Ps 28 1).

The name (יְהוָֹה, kôdosh, "holy") is found frequently in Isa and Pss, and occasionally in the prophets, of a Deity.

7. Kâdôsh, of Isa, being found 32 t in that book. "Holy One" It occurs often in the phrase יְהוָֹה יָשָׁרְת, kôdôsh yîsârêl, "Holy One of Israel." The derivation and meaning remain in doubt, but the customary and most probable derivation is from kâdôsh, "to be separate," which best explains its use both of man and of the Deity. When used of God it signifies: (1) His transcendence, His separateness above all other beings, His aloteness as compared to other gods; (2) His peculiar relation to His people Israel unto whom He separated Himself, as He did not unto other nations. In the former sense Insha was used of His sole deity (40 26); in the latter of His peculiar and unchanging covenant-relation to Israel (43 3; 48 17), strikingly expressed in the phrase "Holy One of Israel." Kâdôsh was rather attributive than personal, but became personal in the use of such absolute theists as Job and Isaiah. It expresses essential Deity, rather than personal revelation.

In the patriarchal lit., and in Job particularly, where it is put into the mouths of the patriarchs, it is sometimes in the

8. Shadday, compound יְהוָֹה שָׁדָֹי, El shadday, sometimes also "Almighty" times alone. While its root meaning also is uncertain, the suggested derivation from יְהוָֹה, shâdâhod, "to destroy," "to terrify," seems most probable, signifying the God who is manifested by the terribleness of His mighty acts.

"The Storm God," from נַעֲרָה, šādāh, "to pour out," has been suggested, but is improbable; and even more so the fanciful נ, she, and נ, day, meaning "who is sufficient." Its use in patriarchal days marks an advance over looser Sem conception and introduces the monotheistic idea of almightiness, and is in accord with the early consciousness of Deity in race or individual as a God of awe, or even terror. Its monotheistic character is in harmony with its use in the Abrahamic times, and is further corroborated by its use in LXX and NT, ἡγεσίον, σεβασμός, "all-powerful."

III. Attributive, or Qualifying Names.—It is often difficult to distinguish between the personal and the attributive names of God, the two divisions necessarily shading into each other. Some of the preceding are really attributive, made personal by usage. The following are the most prominent descriptive or attributive names.

This name (נַעֲרָ, 'abhr), is used in the LXX as ἡμέρα, "to be strong," from which is derived the word נַעֲרָ, 'ebhr, "mighty," used of the strongest wing of the eagle (Isa 40 31), fig. of God in Dt 32 11. It occurs in Jacob's blessing (Gen 49 24), in a prayer for the sanctuary (Ps 132 2, 6), and in Isa (1 24; 49 26; 60 16), to express the assurance of the Divine strength in behalf of the oppressed in Israel (Isa 1 24), or in behalf of Israel against his oppressors; it is interesting to note that this name was first used by Jacob himself.

The name נְאַ, נְאַ, 'El, is combined with a number of descriptive adjectives to represent God in His various attributes; and these by usage have become names or titles of God. For example, the remarkable phrase 'E- 'Elohe-Israel (Gen 33 20), see separate art.

This name (נַעֲ, 'elyon, "highest") is a derivative of נַעֲ, 'alah, "to go up." It is used of persons or things to indicate their elevation or exaltation: of Israel, favored "Most High" above other nations (Dt 32 19), of the abode of "the upper pool" (Isa 7 3), etc. This indicates that its meaning when applied to God is the "Exalted One," who is lifted far above all gods and men. It occurs alone (Dt 32 8; Ps 18 18), or in combination with other names of God, most frequently with El (Gen 14 18; Ps 78 55), but also with Jehovah (Ps 77 17; 97 9), or with Elohim (Ps 56 2 AV; 78 36). Its early use (Gen 14 18?) points to a high conception of Deity, an unquestioned monotholism in the beginnings of Heb history.

The ancient Hebrews were in constant struggle for their land and liberties, a struggle most intense and patriotic in the heroic days of Saul and David, and in which there was developed a band of men whose great deeds entitled them to the honorable title "mighty men" of valor (נַע, gibborim). These were the knights of David's Round Table. In like manner the Hebrews thought of God as fighting for him, and easily then this title was applied to God as the Mighty Man of war, occurring in David's psalm of the Ark's Triumphant Entry (Ps 24 8), in the alleegory of the Messiah-King (45 8), either alone or combined with El (Isa 9 5; Jer 32 18), and sometimes with Jehovah (Isa 45 18). When Hagar was fleeing from Sarah's persecutions, Jehovah spoke to her in the wilderness of Shur, words of promise and cheer. Whereupon she "called the name of Jehovah that His servant spoke unto her, Thine own God be aGod: for He has not forsaken thee" (Gen 16 13 m. In the text the word נְאַ, נְאַ, div of râ'dh, "to see," is tr'd "that seeth," lit, "of sight." This is the only occurrence of this title in the OT.

One of the covenant attributes of God, His righteousness, is spoken of so often that it passes from adj. to substantive attribute to "The Righteous One." This name is also used of men (as "Riteo") and nations (as "Righteous Nations," or "the Righteous one") and properly should be taken as a proper noun—the name of the Messiah-King.

Frequently in the Pent., oftenest in the 3 VSS of the Commandments (Ex 20 5; 34 14; Dt 5 9), it is used of Jehovah. The name נְאַ כַּהָ ("Jealous Jehovah") is explained from the verb נְאַ כַּהָ, "to be straight" or, "right," signifies fidelity to a standard, and is used of God's fidelity to His own nature and to His covenant-promise (Isa 41 10; 42 6; cf Hos 2 10); it occurs alone (Ps 34 17), with El (Dt 32 4), with Elohim (Ex 19 15; Ps 7 9; 116 5), but most frequently with Jehovah (Ps 129 4, etc). In Ex 9 27 Pharaoh's people, in acknowledging his sin against Jehovah, calls Him Jehovah Righteous." using the article. The suggestive combination, "Jealous our Righteousness," is found in the Heb. It is used of men (as "Jealous of the Branch") (Jer 23 6) and properly should be taken as a proper noun—the name of the Messiah-King.

most frequent is the name “God” (Θεός, Θεός) occurring over 1,000 t, and corresponding to El, Elohim, etc., of the OT. It may, as with the Hebrew, be a contraction for a title or appellation of heathen gods; but in its true sense it expresses essential Deity, and as expressive of such it is applied to Christ as to the Father (Jn 20:28; Rom 9:5).

Five t “Lord” is a tr of bê’dê, despôû (Lk 2 29; Acts 4 24; 2 Pet 2 1 AV; Jude ver 4; Rev 6 10 AV). In each case there is evident emphasis on sovereignty and “Lord” correspondence to the ’Adônîn of the OT. The most common Gr word for “God” in the NT is Kôneô, Kôrus, representing both Jeh and ’Adônîn of the OT, and occurring upwards of 600 t. Its use for Jeh was in the spirit of both the Heb scribes, who pointed the consonants of the covenant name with the vowels of Adhonaí, the title of dominion, and of the LXX, which rendered this combination as Kôrus. Consequently quotations from the OT in which Jeh occurs are rendered by Kôrus. It is applied to Christ equally with the Father and the Spirit, showing that the Missianic hopes conveyed by the name in the OT were fulfilled in Jesus Christ; and that in Him the long hoped-for appearance of Jeh was realized. As in the OT, so in the NT various attributes, descriptive or fig. names are found, often corresponding to those in the OT.

3. Descrip- are: The “Highest” or “Most High” tive and (bê’rôn, hûpsíôstas), found in this sense (Acts 1 32; 3; above); Figurative only in Lk (1 32; 35; 24 14, etc), and Names equivalent to Eloyn (see III, 3; above); in the Lord’s Prayer, and elsewhere (Mt 6 9; 11 25; Jn 17 25; 2 Cor 12 18); “King” (1 Tim 1 17); “King of kings” (1 Tim 6 15); “King of kings,” “Lord of lords” (Rev 17 14); “Potentate” (1 Tim 6 15); “Master” (kurîos, Eph 6 9; 2 Pet 2 1; Rev 20 10); “Shepherd,” “Bishop” (1 Pet 2 25).

GODDESS, godôs (γôôs, ’êlohim, ãôã, theôa). There is no separate word for “goddess” in the OT. In the only instance in which the word occurs in EV (1 K 11 538), the gender is determined by the noun—“Ashestoreth, the god [goddess] of the Sidonians.” In the NT the term is applied to Diana of Ephesus (Acts 19 27 35-37).

GODHEAD, god’head: The word “Godhead” is a simple doublt of the less frequently occurring “Godhood.” Both forms stand side by side in the Ancren Riwle (about 1226 AD), and both have survived until today, though not in equally common use. They are representative of a large class of abstract subs., formed with the suffix -head or -hod, most of which formerly occurred in both forms almost indifferently, though the majority of them survive only, or very preponderatingly (except in Scottish speech), in the form -hod. The two suffixes appear in Middle Eng. as -hode and -had, and presuppose in the Anglo-Saxon which lies behind them a fem. hêtô (which is not actually known) by the side of the masc. héad. The Anglo-Saxon word “was originally a distinct sub-, meaning ‘person’ or ‘substance’ of a rank” (Bradley, in A New Eng. Dict. on a Historical Basis, s.v. “-hood”), but its use as a suffix early superseded its separate employment. At first -hode appears to have been appropriated to adj., -hod to substs.; but, this distinction breaking down and the forms coming into indiscriminate use, -hode grew obsolete, and remains in common use only in one or two special forms, such as “Godhead,” “maidenhead” (Bradley, as cited, s.v. “-head”).

The general designation of the throne in -head has been followed by a fading consciousness, in the case of the few surviving instances in this form, of the qualitative sense inherent in the suffix. The words accordingly show a tendency to become simple denominatives. Thus “6: Godhead” is frequently employed merely as a somewhat strong synonym of “God,” although usually with more or less emphasis upon that in God which makes Him God. One of its established usages is to denote the Divine essence as such, in distinction from the three “hypostases” or “persons” which share its common possession in the doctrine of the Trinity. This usage is old: Bradley (op. cit.) is able to adduce instances from the 16th cent. In this usage the word has long held the rank of a technical term, e.g., “The Three Divine Articles of the Church of England, 1571, Art. I: “And in the unitie of this Godhead, there be three persons” (of the Irish Articles of 1615, and the Westminster Confession, II, 3); Westminster Shorter Catechism “The Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are persons in the Godhead.” Pursuant to the fading of the qualitative sense of the word, there has arisen a tendency, when the qualitative consciousness is vivid, to revive the obsolete “Godhood,” to take its place; and this tendency naturally shows itself esp. when the contrast with humanity is expressed. Carlyle, for example (French Revolution, III, Book vi, ch iv, §1), speaking of the posthumous reaction against Marat, writes: “Shorter godhead had no divine man”; and Phillips Brooks (Sermons, XIII, 237) speaks of Christ bridging the gulf between the Godhead and the manhood.” “Godhead” seems, indeed, always to have had a tendency to appear in such contexts, as if the qualitative consciousness were more acute in it than in “Godhead.” Thus it seems formerly to have suggested itself as an inevitably to designate the Divine nature of Christ, as “Godhead” did to designate the common Divine essence of the Trinity. Bradley cites instances from 1563 down.

The fundamental meaning of “Godhead” is, nevertheless, no less than that of “Godhood,” the state, dignity, condition, quality, of a god, or, as monotheists would say, of God. As manhood is that which makes a man a man, and childhood that which makes a child a child, so Godhead is that which makes God, God. When we ascribe Godhead to a being, therefore, we affirm that all that enters into the idea of God belongs to Him. “Godhead” is thus the Sanskrit equivalent of the Lat “Divinity,” or, as it is now becoming more usual to say, “Deity.” Like these terms it is rendered concrete by prefixing the article to it. As “the Divinity,” “the Deity,” so also “the Godhead” is only another way of saying “God,” except that when we say “the Divinity,” “the Deity,” “the Godhead,” “the God,” or “God’s,” we mean more abstractly and more qualitatively, that is with more emphasis, or at least with a more lively consciousness, of the constitutive qualities which make God the kind of being we call “God.”

The word “Godhead” does not occur in the AV (Acts 17 29; Rom 1 20; Col 2 9), and oddly enough it translates in these 3 passages, 3 different, though closely related, Gr. words, ὁ θεός (ὁ θεόν), theos (θεόν), theōs (θεός), thea (θεά), thea (θεά).

To θεός means "that which is Divine," concretely, "a god" (though the term is never used to indicate a heathen god). Among the Greeks it was in constant use in the sense of "the Divine Being," and particularly as a general term to designate the Deity apart from reference to a particular god. It is used by Paul (Acts 17 29) in addressing the heathens to indicate which is inserted into a context in which it is flanked by the simple term "God" (ho theos, s theos) on both sides. It is obviously deliberately chosen in order to throw up into emphasis the qualitative idea of God; and this emphasis is still further heightened by the direct use of the term "God," it is brought with the term "man," "Being, then, the offspring of God, we ought not to think that it is to gold or silver or stone graven by art and device of man that the Godhead is like." In an effort to bring out this qualitative emphasis, RV suggests that we might substitute for "the Godhead" here the periphrastic rendering, "that which is Divine." But this seems both clumsy and ineffective for its purpose. From the philological standpoint, "the Godhead" is a very awkward term for it is differing as it does from the simple "God" precisely by its qualitative emphasis. It may be doubted, however, whether in the partial loss by "Godhead" of its qualitative force in its current usage, one of its synonyms, "the Divinity," that the twist of the "Deity," as the Rhetorica Lat. version (or of the "Deity," the Deity, would not better convey Paul's emphasis to modern readers.

Neither of these terms, "Divinity," "Deity," occurs anywhere in AV, and "Deity" does not occur at all in the RV, but the RV rendering (the Rhetorica Lat. version) substitutes "Divinity" for "Godhead" in Rom 1 20. Of the two, "Divinity" was originally of the broader connotation; in the days of heathendom it was applicable to all grades of Divine beings. "Deity" was introduced by the Christian Fathers for the express purpose of providing a stronger word by means of which the uniqueness of the Christians' God should be emphasized. Perhaps "Divinity" retains even in its Eng. usage something of its traditional weaker connotation, although, of course, in a monosyllabic consciousness the two terms coalesce in meaning. There exists a tendency to insist, therefore, on the "Deity" of Christ, rather than his mere "Divinity" in the feeling that "Divinity" might lend itself too little to "that Christ possessed but a secondary or reduced grade of Divine quality. In Acts 17 20 Paul is not discriminating between grades of Divinity, but is preaching monotheism. In this context, then, to theon does not lump together "all that is called God or is worshipped," and declare that all that is in any sense Divine should be esteemed beyond the power of material things worthy to represent. Paul has the idea of God at his height before his mind, and having quickened his hearers' sense by his elevated description of Him, he demands of them whether this Deity can be fitly represented by any art of man working in dead stuff. He uses the term to theon, rather than to theos, not merely in courteous adoption of his hearers' own language, but because of its qualitative emphasis. On the whole, the best Eng. tr. of it would probably be "the Deity." "The Godhead" has ceased to be sufficiently qualitative: "the Godhood" is not sufficiently current; "the Divine" is not sufficiently personal enough; "Divinity" is perhaps too strongly "Deity" without the article loses too much of its personal reference to compensate for the gain in qualitative: "the Deity" alone seems fairly to reproduce the apostle's thought.

The Gr. term in Rom 1 20 is theōtēs, which, again, as a term of quality, is considerably rendered by "Godhead." What Paul says here is that "the everlasting power and Godhead" of God "are clearly perceived by means of His works." By "Godhead" by "the Apostles of the Deity," the Godhead by which the realities of the Christians' God are constituted what we mean by "God." By coupling the word with "power," Paul no doubt intimates that his mind is resting esp. upon those qualities which enter most intimately into and constitute the exaltation of God; but we must beware of limiting the connotation of the Godhead by the current attributes are glorious. The context shows that the thought of the apostle was moving on much the same lines as in Acts 17 29; here, too, the contrast which determines the emphasis is with "corruptible man," and along with him, with the lower creatures in general (ver 23). How could man think of the Godhead under such simulit— the Godhead, so clearly manifested in its glory by its works! The substitution for "Godhead" here of its synonym "Divinity" by RV is doubtless due in part to a desire to give distinctive renderings to distinct terms, and in part to a wish to emphasize, more strongly than "Godhead" in its modern usage emphasizes, the qualitative implication which is so strong in the Rhetorica Lat. version: the Sun is not altogether fictitious. "Divinity," in its contrast with "Deity," may have a certain weakness of connotation clinging to it, which would unsuit it to represent theōtēs here. It is quite true that the "Divinity" of Paul's special term for the persons of the Trinity was in sequence to attempt which were being made to ascribe to the Son and the Spirit a reduced "Divinity" and it was the need the Lat. Fathers felt in the same interest which led them to coin "Deity" as a more accurate rendering, as they say, of theōtēs. Meanwhile theōtēs and "Divinity" had done service in the two languages, the former as practically, and the latter as absolutely, the only term in use to express the idea that Christ possessed a unique and classical Gr. "Deity" non-existent in classical Lat. To represent theōtēs uniformly by "Divinity," if any reduced connotation at all clings to "Divinity," would therefore be to represent it often very inadequately. And that is the case in the present passage. What Paul says is clearly made known by God's works, is His everlasting power and all the other everlasting attributes which form His Godhead and constitute His glory.

H. in His Godhead Col 2 9. Here Paul declares that "all the fulness of the Godhead" dwells in Christ, "bodily." The phrase "fulness of the Godhead" is an emphatic one. It means everything without exception which goes to make up the Godhead, the totality of all that enters into the conception of Godhood. All this, says Paul, "dwells in Christ "bodily," that is after such a fashion as to be manifested in connection with a bodily organism. This is the distinction of Christ: In the Father and in the Spirit the whole personality of the Godhead dwells also, but not "bodily"; in them it is not manifested in connection with a bodily life. It is the incarnation which Paul has in mind; and he tells us that in the incarnate Son, the fulness of the Godhead dwells. The term "bodily," the Godhead here is the strongest and the most unambiguously decisive which the language affords.
GODLESS, god-lish: This word is not found in the text of AV. It is found, however, in Apoc (2 Macc 7:34, ‘O godless [RV ‘unholy’] man’). RV substitutes the word ‘godless’ for the word ‘hypocrite’ in the following passages: Job 8:13; 13:10; 15:34; 17:8; 20:5; 27:8; 34:30; 36:13; Prov 11:9; Isa 33:14. RV does not seem to be consistent in carrying out the idea of ‘godless’ for ‘hypocrite’; for in Isa 9:17; 10:6; Ps 35:16 this same Heb word ḫânēph is tr4 ‘profane.’ The principal idea lying at the root of the word is that of pollution and profanity; a condition of not merely being without God but assuming an attitude of open and bold opposition toward God. The godless man is not merely the atheistic, unbelieving or even irreligious, but the openly impious, wicked and profane man. Indeed it can hardly be rightly claimed that the idea of hypocrisy is involved in the meaning of the word for ‘the godless’ man is not the one who professes one thing and lives another, but the one who openly avows not only his disbelief in, but his open opposition to, God. Doubtless the idea of pollution and defilement is also to be included in the definition of this word; see Jer 3:9; Nu 35:33; Dn 11:31.

GODLINESS, god-ill-nes. GODLY, god-li (elev-βας, eusebēs, eusebēs); In the OT the word rendered ‘godly’ in Ps 4:3; 32:6 (τεκνίτ, ἡσυχία) is lit. ‘kind;’ then ‘pious’ (RV renders it in the former passage, ‘one that he favor-eth.’). Sometimes in both the OT and the NT a paraphrase is employed, of God’s, according to God (e.g. ‘godly sorrow’ 2 Cor 7:10). Godliness, as denoting character and conduct determined by the principle of love or fear of God in the heart, is the summing up of genuine religion. There can be no true religion without it: only a dead (‘frigid’; ‘dead’; ‘cold’) heart is to be found as a favorite one in the Pastoral Epistles. The incarnation is ‘the mystery of godliness’ (1 Tim 3:16).

hawk, was one of the earliest of all. The cat, the bull, etc., were worshipped at times. The phallic symbols of Egypt were specially directed against these wretched deities (Nu 33 4; Ex 12 12). Jeh took vengeance on all the gods of Egypt. These terrible events showed that "Jeh is greater than all gods." (18 11). He redeemed His people from the nations and its gods (2 S 7 23). Jeremiah predicted the time when Jeh should destroy the gods of Egypt (Jer 45 12 f.; 46 25).

Of the deities of the Amorites (Jgs 6 10) no names are given, but they probably were the same as the gods of the Canaanites.

(5) The gods of the Canaanites were Nature-gods, and their worship was that of the productive and chiefly reproductive powers of Nature. Their service was perhaps the most immoral and degrading of all. The high places and altars of the different Baals, Ash'toreths, etc., were numerous throughout Canaan. These deities were always represented by images and Moses makes frequent reference to them with warnings against this seductive worship (Dt 7 25; 12 33.30.31; 13 7; 20 18; 29 18; 32 7). See also IDOLATRY; BAAL; ASHTORETH; ASHERAH, etc.

(6) Gods of the Philis: The champion, Goliath, cursed by his gods (1 S 17 40). Perhaps it would be better rendered "god." Saul's and his son's armor was put into the house of their gods (1 Ch 10 10). See also DAGAN; BAALZE'BUB.

(7) The two golden calves erected by Jeroboam at Bethel and Dan to keep the people from going to Jerusalem to worship are called gods (1 K 12 23; 2 Ch 13 8 f.). See CALF; GOLDEN.

(8) The gods of Damascus: Ben-hadad was accustomed to worship in the house of the god Rimmon (2 K 15 12). Yet other names are mentioned, but from 2 Ch 28 25 it is clear that there were many gods in Syria. See RIMMON.

Solomon's many wives worshipped their own gods, and he provided the means for their worship. Chief among these were Chemosh of Moab and Molech of Ammon (1 K 11 24.5). See CHEMOSH; MOLCHEH.

(10) The mixed peoples transplanted into Samaria by Sargon had their various gods and mingled their service with that of Jeh, after being taught by a priest in Damascus, these gods were Succoth-benoth, Nergal, Ashima, Nibhas, Tartak, Adrammelech (2 K 17 29.30.31.33). See separate articles.

(11) Of the gods of Seir, which were brought to Jerusalem by Amaziah, the names are not given (2 Ch 25 14).

(12) Of the gods of the nations conquered by Sennacherib and his fathers, viz. Hamoth, Arpad, Sepharvaim, Hena, Ivvah (2 K 18 32–35; 19 13). Also those conquered by Sennacherib's fathers, Gozan, Haran, Rezeph, Eden or Telassar (2 K 19 12; Isa 36 18.19.20; 2 Ch 32 13 f.).

(13) Gods of Moab are mentioned in Ruth 1 15; 1 K 11 1.7. Possibly Ruth 1 15 should be tr'ed "god." See CHEMOSH.

(14) Gods of Babylon: The graven images of her gods referred to in Isa 21 9; 42 17; Bel and Nebo mentioned in Isa 46 1; other gods of silver and gold (Exr 1 7; Dn 4 5.9.18; 6 41.14.23).

(15) Ninevah's gods were merely referred to in Nah 3 5. Nineveh was the seductive whipping in the house of Nisroch his god when slain by his sons (2 K 19 37).

(16) The coastslands or borders and peninsulas of the Aegean Sea had numerous idol gods, shrines, etc., and Isaiah challenges them to prove that they are gods (Isa 41 22 f.).

Jeh was "greater than all gods" (Ex 15 11; 18 11); "God of gods and Lord of lords" (Dt 10 14, 17); "The Mighty One" (Josh 22 22); "to be feared above all gods" (1 Ch 16 25; 2 Ch 16 29; 96 4); "King above all gods" (Ps 95 3; 4. The Su- 97 7.9; 86 8; 135 5; 136 2; 138 1; Jer 10 11; Zeph 2 11; Dn 2 18.47). Jehovah to Jeremiah advances so far toward a Other Gods pure and well-defined monotheism that he had no reproaches of all other gods as "not gods." They have no existence to him (Jer 2 11; 5 7; 16 20). A similar position is taken in Isa 41, 43, etc.

The laws of Moses give no uncertain sound concerning them. The Decalogue begins: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me."

6. Regulations concerning the gods of the other nations. Whatever may be the exact meaning of this, it is perfectly clear that Israel should have nothing to do with any gods of the God but Jeh (Ex 20 3; Dt 5 7).

Nations No images shall be made of them (Ex 20 4.23; 34 17; Lev 19 4; Dt 5 8). No mention shall be made of them (Ex 23 13; Josh 13 7). They shall not be worshipped but destroyed (Ex 23 24). They shall make no covenant with the people or their gods would be a snare to them (Ex 23 32; Dt 6 14; 7 4.25). A curse will follow any deviation from Jeh to them (Dt 11 29.32; 28 14 f.). These gods are an abomination to Jeh (Dt 12 31; 20 18; 29 17; 32 37; Ex 7 20; 1 K 11 5; 2 K 23 13). They are to be as foreign gods to Israel (1 S 7 3 f.; Josh 24 20.23; Jgs 10 16; 2 Ch 14 3; 33 15).

The constant tendency of Israel to go after other gods was first made manifest at Sinai (Ex 32 14.8.; 32 31; 34 15). Hosea says (11 2), Israel's "the more the prophets called them, the more they went from them."

Tendency to go away from the Lord. Other Gods thy father, and thy mother was a Hit- tite," referring doubtless to the idolatrous taint in the blood of Israel. The tendency manifested itself also at Baal-peor where Israel was led into the licentious rites of the Moabites (Nu 25 24). Moses saw the taint in the blood, foresaw the danger and repeatedly warned them (Dt 17 3; 18 20; 29 26; 30 17; 31 18). Perhaps the most striking passages in Dt are chs 13 12–26, 30, where Israel are pictured in this way. The gods were changed. Joshua also warns them (33 7), and the history of the period of the Judges is the story of their periodical defection from Jeh and the punishment resulting therefrom (Jgs 2 12.17.19; 6 8; 10 1 f. 1 S 15 13). Solomon's later aversion to the worship of other gods is doubtless due to his mother's influence. Balaam, Joshua, Elisha, and, Isaias, Jeremiah, etc., availed not to stop the tide of idolatry. The result was the destruction of the kingdom (2 K 17 7 f.; Jer 3 6–8; 1 Ch 5 25). The Southern Kingdom fared better. Other gods were countenanced by Rehoboam, Abijah, Athaliah, Jehoram, Ahaz, Amon, Manasseh, Jehoiakim, etc. Reform movements were attempted by Asa, Jehoash, Hezekiah and Josiah, but did not wholly avail. In the reign of Manasseh the nation plunged into the worship of all sorts of heathen gods, in places like Bethel, Rehoboam, Jerusalem, etc., availed not to stop the tide (2 Ch 34 25; Jer 11 13; 5 19; 2 K 22 17; Jer 1 16; 19 4; 7 6; 13 10; 16 11; 44 5.8). The nation was carried into exile because of its going after other gods (2 K 22 17; Dt 29 25 f). The captivity had its desired effect. The Israel that returned and perpetuated the nation never again lapsed into the worship of other gods.

II. In the Apocrypha.—The Apoc reiterates much of the evidence of the OT. The conflict between Israel (2 Esd 1 f); the gods of the nations (Jhh 3 8; 8 15); the gods which their fathers worshipped (5 7 f); the sin of Israel (Ad Est 14 7). The Book of Wisdom refers to the 'creatures which they supposed to be gods' (12 27); 13 2; 3 10; 15 15). Mention is made of the gods of Babylon (Bar 1 12; 6 6--7; passion; Bel 1 27).

III. In the NT.—The expression "gods" occurs in six places in the NT: (1) Jesus, in reply to the Pharisees, who questioned His right to Himself as the Son of God, quoted Ps 82 6: "I said, Ye are gods." He argues from this that if God Himself called them gods to whom the word of God came, i.e. the judges who acted as representatives of God in a judicial capacity, could not He who had been sanctified and sent into the world justly call Himself the Son of God? It was an argumentum ad hominem (Jn 10 34--37). (2) When Paul and Barnabas preached the gospel in Lystra they haled a certain man, a cripple from birth. The Lycaonians, seeing the miracle, cried out in their own dialect, "The gods are come down to us in the likeness of men. And they called Barnabas, Jupiter; and Paul, Mercury" (Acts 14 11 f). Their assumption of the apostles in the midst of the scene shows their familiarity with the Gr pantheon. (3) As Paul preached Jesus and the resurrection at Athens the people said he seemed to be a setter forth of strange gods. The conception of only one God, a set apart for the glory of the OT God (Acts 17 18).

(4) In 1 Cor 8 5f Paul speaks of "gods many, and lords many," but the context shows that he did not believe in the existence of any god but one; "We know that no idol is anything in the world." (5) While at Ephesus, Paul was said to have "persuaded and turned many away, speaking that they are no gods, that are made with hands" (Acts 19 26). (6) The Galatians had been "in bondage to them that by nature are no gods" (Gal 4 8). Included are the gods of Persia, from which the Galatians were external to the Acts 17 10, where Paul observed the city full of idols. Likewise in Rom 1 22 f.25 ff. Paul refers to the numerous gods of the heathen world. These were idols, birds, four-footed beasts and creeping things. The results of such neglecting God, are set forth in Acts 17 10. See also IDOLATRY; GOD, NAMES OF.

GOD(S), STRANGE, strâne: The word "strange," as used in this connection in the OT, refers to the fact that the god or gods do not belong to Israel, but are the gods which are worshipped by other families or nations. In several cases a more exact tr would give us the "gods of the stranger" or foreigner. So in Gen 36 24; Josh 24 2; 13 16; Dtt 31 16; 82 12, etc. A few passages like Dtt 32 16; Ps 44 20; 81 9; Isa 43 12, the word is an adj, but the idea is the same: the gods are those which are worshipped by other peoples and hence are forbidden to Israel which is under an obligation to worship Yahwè alone (of 2 Esd 1 6).

In the NT the phrase occurs only once, in the account of Paul's experiences in Athens (Acts 17 15), when some of the "He among them that are far off, a setter forth of strange gods" (êkàs bássus, zênâ domôsê). Here the thought is clearly that by his preaching of Jesus he was revealing the stranger god, that is one who was strange or foreign to the Athenians and of whom they had no knowledge. Before. Like the Romans of this period the Athenians were doubtless interested in, and more or less favorable to, the numerous new cults which were coming to their attention; as a result of the constant intercourse with the Orient. See preceding article.

GODSPEED, godsped (xêpôs, charôr): "Godspeed" occurs only in 2 Jn vs 10.11 AV as the tr of charôr, the inif. of charôs, and is rendered in RV "greeting." It means "rejoice," "be of good cheer," "be it well with thee"; charôr, charârê, charôs are common forms in RV "greeting," with a meaning of good-will and desire for the person's prosperity, tr in the Gospels, "Hail!" "All Hail!" (Mt 26 49; 27 29; 28 9, etc); charôr is the LXX for shâldôm (Isa 46 22; 67 21; cf. 2 Mac 10 1). "Godspeed" first appeared in the Wycliff version; Wykfl had "hell!" "Rhemus, "God save you."

In the passage cited Christians are forbidden thus to salute false teachers who might come to them. The instruction does not imply any breach of courtesy; it would not be right to wish to anyone success in advocating what was believed to be false and harmful. We should be sincere in our greetings; formal courtesy must yield to truth, still courteously, however, and in the spirit of love.

GOEL, go'el (גֹּאֵל, "redeemer"): Goel is the participle of the Heb word ga'el ("to deliver," "to redeem") which aside from its common usage is frequently employed with Heb haemat, as "the redemption of the blood." It is the technical term applied to a person who as the nearest relative of another is placed under certain obligations to him. (1) If a Jew because of poverty had been obliged to sell himself to a wealthy stranger or sojourner, it became the duty of his relatives to redeem him. Cf Lev 25 47 ff and the art. JUBILEE. (2) The same duty fell upon the nearest kinsman, if his brother, being poor, had been forced to sell some of his property. Cf Lev 25 23; Ruth 4 4 ff, and the art. JUBILEE. (3) It also devolved upon the nearest relative to marry the childless widow of his brother (Ruth 3 13; Tob 3 17). (4) In Nu 5 5 ff a law is stated which demands that restitution be made to the nearest relative, and after that to the priest, if the injured party has died (Lev 6 1 f). (5) The law of blood-revenge (BlutRâche) made it the sacred duty of the nearest relative to avenge the blood of his kinsman. He was called the go'el ha-dâm (גֹּאֵל הַדָּם, "the avenger of blood."

This law was based upon the command given in Gen 9 5: "Whoso sheddeth man's blood, by man shall his blood be shed," and was carried out even if an animal had killed a man; in this case, however, the payment of a ransom was permitted (Ex 21 28 ff). A clear distinction was made between an accidental and a deliberate murder. In both cases the guilty person is called to give an account of his guilt before the altar of the sanctuary; if, however, the investigation revealed presumptuous manslaughter, he was taken from the altar to be put to death (Ex 21 12 f; 1 K 5 10; 28). In Nu 35 9 ff definite regulations as to the duties of the Goel are given. Six cities were to be appointed as "cities of refuge," three on each side of the Jordan. The congregation has judgment over the murderer. There must be more than one witness to convict a man. If he is found guilty, he is delivered to the Goel; if murder was committed by accident he is permitted to live within the border of the city of refuge; in case the manslayer leaves this city before the death of the high priest, the avenger of blood has a right to slay him. After the death of the high priest the murderer may return to his own city. Ransom cannot be given for the life of a murderer; no expiation can be made for a murder but by the blood of the murderer (Dt 19 4 ff; Josh 20; 2 S 14 16 ff). According to the Mosaic law the criminal that is guilty of murder cannot be held responsible for the crime of his father (Dt 24 16; 2 K 14 6), but see 2 S 21 1 f. The order in which the nearest relative was considered the Goel is given in Lev 25 48 f: first a brother, then an uncle, then an uncle's son, and after them any other near relative. This order was observed in connection with (1) above, but probably also in the other cases except (4).

For the figurative use of Goel ("redeemer") see Ps 119 154; Prov 23 11; Job 19 25; Isa 41 14b. See also AVENGER; MURDERER; REFUGEE; CITIES OF.

GOG, gōg (גֹּג, גָּגוֹ), Gēḡ (גֶּגֶּשׁ). (1) A son of Joel, and descendant of the tribe of Reuben (1 Ch 5 4).

(2) The prince of Rosh, Meshech and Tubal (Ezk 38 21; 39 1–16). His territory was known as the land of Magog, and he was the chief of those northern herders who were the first final onslaught upon Israel while enjoying the blessings of the Messianic age. He has been identified with Gigi, ruler of Salkhi, mentioned by Assurbanipal, but Professor Sayce thinks the Heb name corresponds more closely to Gyges, the Lydian king, the Gogu of the cuneiform inscriptions. According to Ezekiel’s account Gog’s army included in its numbers Persia, Cush, Put, Gomer or the Cimmerians, and Togarmah, from the extreme N. They are represented as a vast mixed horde from the far-off parts of the N., the limits of the horizon, completely unarmed and equipped for war. They were to come upon the mountains of Israel and cover the land like a cloud. Their purpose is plunder, for the people of Israel are rich and dwell in towns and villages without walls. In Ezekiel’s time the capital, by which the seers of Israel, shall be accompanied by a thorough and great convulsions in Nature. A panic shall seize the hosts of Gog, rain, hailstones, pestilence, fire and brimstone shall consume them. Their bodies shall be food for the birds; their weapons shall serve as firewood for seven years and their bones shall be buried E. of the Jordan in Hamon-gog and thus not defile the holy land. The fulfilment of this strange prophecy can never be literal. In general it seems to refer to the last and desperate attempts of a dying heathenism to overturn the true religion of Jeh, or make capital out of it, profiling by its great advantages.

(3) In Rev 20 7 Satan is let loose and goes to the four corners of the earth, Gog and Magog, to muster his hosts for the final struggle against God. In Ezek the invasion of Gog occurs during the Messianic age, while in Rev it occurs just at the close of the millennium. In Ezek Gog and Magog are gathered by Jeh for their destruction; in Rev they are gathered by Satan. In both cases the number is vast, the destruction is by supernatural means, and is complete and final. See Magog.

GOIM, gōyīm (גוֹיִים, גֹּיוֹיִם): This word, rendered in AV “nations,” “heathen,” “Gentiles,” is commonly used simply “nations” in RV. In Gen 14 1 where AV has “Tidal, king of nations,” RV retains the text in the Heb “Goim” as a proper name. Some identify with Gutium. The Heb word is similarly retained in Josh 12 23.

GOING, gō’ing, GOINGS, gō’ings: Besides, occasionally, forms of the common words for “go” (see Go), for “going” and “goings,” the Heb has גָּוַי (gō’ay), גָּוָי (gō’ay), “step,” פַּרְשָׁנָא (bārshānā), גָּוָי (gō’ay). The word “goings” is sometimes used lit., as in Nu 33 52. “Going” for “their going forth” (Heb moṣād).

“Going up,” maṭā’el, is in many passages rendered in RV (as in Nu 34 4; 2 S 15 30 AV) as “ascent,” as in Josh 15 7; Jps 1 36; Neh 12 37 (ARV only). In Ezek 45 5, AR substitues “sgress” (way out of place of going forth). “The going out place of going forth” (Heb māskhāth) occurs frequently. The verbal forms bā’, mābbā’, also māl (Dnl 6 14), are used of the sun, set, “the going down of the sun.” Thus Josh 8 29 RV, AV “as soon as the sun was down.”

In the NT, RV substitutes “going out” for “gone out” (φανέρωμα) (Mt 25 8); “going up” for “ascending” (Lk 19 28); “going in” for “coming in” (Acts 9 28); “going about” for “wandering” (1 Tim 5 13); “seeking” for “going about” (Rom 10 18).

Metaphorically: “Goings” is used for a man’s ways or conduct (Ps 17 5, RV “steps”; 40 2; Prov 14 15, etc.). In Ps 17 5 “Hold up my goings in thy paths, that my footsteps slip not” becomes in RV “My steps have held fast to thy ways; my feet have not slipped.” Conversely, “The way he goes forth all his goings,” is in RV “He maketh level all his paths,” m “weighteth carefully”; conversely, in Ps 37 23, RV has “goings” for “steps”; in Jas 1 11 “goings” for ways. In the important prophetic passage, Mic 5 2, it is said of the Ruler from Bethel, “whose goings forth have been from old, from everlasting,” RV “are from old, from everlasting,” m “from ancient days.” Of God it is said in Hab 3 6 “His ways are everlasting,” RV “His goings were as of old, His ways are everlasting.”

GOLAN, gō’lan (גֹּלָן, גא’לון), GAULONITIS (Gaulonitis, Gaulonitiss): Golan was a city in the territory allotted to Manasseh in Bashan, the most w. part of the kingdom of Israel, situated about 10 miles E. of the Jordan (Dt 4 43; Josh 20 8); assigned with its “suburbs” to the Geshonite Levites (Josh 21 27; 1 Ch 6 71). It must have been a great and important city in its day; but the site cannot now be determined with any certainty. It was known to Jos (Ant, XIII, xv, 3). Near Golan Alexander was ambushed by Obodas, king of the Arabians; and his army, crowded together in a narrow and deep valley, was broken in pieces by the multitude of camels (2 M 1, iv, 4). This incident is located at Gadara in Ant, XIII, xiii, 5. Later, Golan was destroyed by Alexander. It had already given its name to a large district, Gaulonitis (B/III, iii, ii, 3; IV, 1, 1). It formed the eastern boundary of Galilee. It was part of the tetrarchy of Philip (Ant, XVII, viii, 1; XVIII, iv, 6). The city was known to Eusebius as a “large village,” giving its name to the surrounding country (Onom, s.v. Pahlw, Gaulon). This country must have corresponded roughly with the modern central-northern part of the N. It was of ancient name is preserved. The boundaries of the province today are Mt. Hermon on the N., Jordan and the Sea of Galilee on the W., Wady Yarmuk on the S., and Nahr ‘Allān on the E. This plateau, which in the N. is about 3,000 ft. high, slopes gradually southward to a height of about 1,000 ft. It is entirely volcanic, and there are many cone-like peaks of extinct volcanoes, esp. toward the N. It affords good pasturage, and has long been a favorite summer grazing-ground of the nomads of the N. (most of these, and of the region generally, will be found in Schumacher’s The Jaulan, and Across the Jordan.)

To him also we owe the excellent maps which carry us eastward to the province of el-Har‘ān.

Schumacher inclines to the belief that the ancient Golan may have been represented by a village fully 4 miles E. of Nahr ‘Allān, and 4 miles S.E. of Tseit. The extensive ruins probably date from early in the Christian era. The buildings are of stone, many of them octagonal in plan, while their streets are wide and straight. The inhabitants number not more than 250. The surrounding soil is rich and well watered, bearing excellent crops. The present writer, after personal examination, corroborates Dr. Schumacher's description. Standing in the open country, it could be seen afar and it was easily accessible from all directions.

GOLD, gold (Σηλην, sēlēn; Ἑρά, chrusas): No metal has been more frequently mentioned in OT writings than gold and none has 1. Terms more terms applied to it. Among these terms the one most used is sēlēn. The word, however, is still the common name for gold throughout Pal, Syria and Egypt. With sēlēn frequently occur other words which, it is mean "pure" (Ex 25 11), "refined" (1 Ch 28 18), "finest" (1 K 10 18), "beaten" (1 K 10 17), "Ophir" (Ps 45 9).

Other terms occurring are: TE, ἐρυθρόν, "fine gold" (Job 28 17; Ps 19 10; 21 3; 119 127; Prov 4 18; Cant 4 11.5; Lam 4 2; Eccl 2 8; Ps 68 13; Prov 3 14; 8 10.19; 16; Zec 9 8; κέρατον, kēraton, "tusk." "carved out" (Job 28 16.19; 31 24; Prov 25 12; Lam 4 1; Dan 10 5). γραφή, ἑραττόν (1 K 6 20; 7 50; Job 28 15): , beget (in A V only: Job 22 24; RV "treasure").

Sources definitely mentioned in the OT are:

1. Havilah (Gen 2 11.12): Ophir (1 K 9 28; 10 11; 22 48; 1 Ch 29 4; 2 Ch 8 18; 9 10).
2. Sources: Job 22 24; 28 16; Ps 45 9; Isa 13 12; 19; 1 K 10 2.10; 2 Ch 9 1.9; Ps 72 15; Isa 60 6; Ezek 27 22; 38 13; Arab 2 (Ch 9 14). We are not justified in locating any of these places too definitely. They probably all refer to some region of Arabia.

The late origin of the geological formation of Pal and Syria precludes the possibility of gold being found in any quantities (see Metals), so that the large quantities of gold used by the children of Israel in constructing their holy places was not the product of mines in the country, but was from the spoil taken from the inhabitants of the land (Nu 31 52), or brought with them from Egypt (Ex 3 22). This gold was probably mined in Egypt or India (possibly Arabia), and brought by the great caravan routes through Arabia to Syria, or by sea in the ship built for Hiram (1 K 9 27; 2 Ch 9 21-22). There is no doubt about the Egypt sources. The old workings in the gold-bearing veins of the Egyptian desert and the ruins of the buildings connected with the mining and refining of the precious metal still remain. This region is being reworked with the prospect of its becoming a source of part of the world's supply. It might be inferred from the extensive spoils in gold taken from the Midianites (£100,000 HDB, s.v.) that their country (Northwestern Arabia) produced gold. It is more likely that the Midianites had, in turn, captured most of it from other weaker nations. The tradition that Northwestern Arabia is rich in gold still persists. Every year Moslem pilgrims, returning from Mecca by the Damascus route, bring with them specimens of what is supposed to be gold ore. They secure it from the Arabs at the stopping-places along the route. Samples analyzed by the writer have been iron pyrites only. No gold-bearing rock has yet appeared. Whether these specimens come from the mines mentioned by Burton (The Land of Midian Revisited) is a question.

Gold formed a part of every household treasure (Gen 13 2; 24 35; Dt 8 13; 17 17; Josh 22 8; 28 4.6). It was used (a) in the form of nuggets (Job 28 6 RVm), (b) in regularly or irregularly shaped slabs or bars (Nu 7 14.20.84.86; Josh 7 21.24; 2 K 5 5), and (c) in the form of dust (Job 28 9). A specimen of yellow dust, which the owner claimed to have taken from an ancient jar, unearthed in a ruin near Samaria, was brought to the writer's laboratory. On examination it was found to contain iron pyrites and metallic gold in finely divided state. It was probably part of an ancient household treasure. A common practice was to make gold into jewelry with the dual purpose of ornamentation and of treasuring it. This custom still prevails, esp. among the Moslems, who do not let out their money at interest. A poor woman will save her small coins until she has enough to buy gold jewelry. This she will wear or put away against the day of need (cf Gen 24 22.53). It was weight and not beauty which was noted in the jewels (Ex 3 22; 11 2; 12 35). Gold coinage was unknown in the early OT times.

1. The use of gold as the most convenient way of treasuring wealth is mentioned above. (2)

4. Uses (Nu 31 50), bracelets (Gen 24 22), chains (Gen 41 42), crescent (Jgs 8 26), crowns (2 S 12 30; 1 Ch 20 2), earrings (Ex 32 23.1; Nu 31 50; Jgs 8 24.26), rings (Gen 24 22; 41 42; Jas 2 2). (3) Making and decorating objects in connection with places of worship: In the description of the building of the ark of the covenant in the tabernacle in Ex 25 ff, we read of the lavish use of gold in overlaying wood and metals, and in shaping candlesticks, dishes, spoons, flagons, bowls, snuffers, curtain chasps, hooks, etc (one estimate of the value of the gold used is 200,000; see HDB). In 1 K 6 6 ff; 1 Ch 28 2; 2 Ch 1 ff are records of still more extensive use of gold in building the temple. (4) Idols were made of gold (Ex 20 23; 32 4; Dt 7 25; 29 17; 1 K 12 28; Ps 115 4; 155 15; Isa 30 22; Rev 18 20). (5) Gold was used for lavish display. Among the fabulous luxuries of Solomon's court was his gold drinking-vessals (1 K 10 21), a throne of ivory overlaid with gold (1 K 10 18), and golden chariot trimmings (1 Ch 28 18). Sacred treasure saved from votive offerings or portions dedicated from booty were principally gold (Ex 25 36; Nu 7 14.20.84.86; 31 50.52-54; Josh 6 19.24; 1 S 8 11.15; 2 S 8 11; 1 Ch 15 7.10.11; 22 14, 16; Mt 25 17). This treasure was the spoil most sought after when the Israelites attacked the Philistines (1 K 5 5). The contribution (1 K 15 15; 2 K 12 18; 14 12; 16 8; 16 14-16; 23 33.35), or taken as plunder (2 K 24 13; 25 15).

Gold is used to symbolize earthly riches (Job 3 15; 22 24; Isa 2 7; Mt 10 9; Acts 3 6; 20 33; Rev 18 12). Finer than gold, which, physically speaking, is considered non-perishable, typifies incorruptibility (Acts 17 29; 1 Pet 1 7.18; 3 3; Jas 5 3). Refining of gold is a figure for great purity or a test of steadfastness (Job 23 10; Prov 17 3; Isa 1 25; Mal 3 2; 1 Pet 1 7; Rev 3 18). Gold was the most valuable of metals. It stood for anything of great value (Prov 3 14; 8 10.19; 15 16. 22; 25 12), was most wisely used for worship-shipping (Ex 25 ff; Rev 1 12.13.20, etc), and the adornment of angels (Rev 16 5) or saints (Ps 45 13). The head was called golden as being the most precious part of the body (Cant 5 11; 2 Ch 24; of "the golden bowl," Ecle 12 5). The "golden city" meant Babylon (Isa 14 4), as did also "the golden cup," sensuality (Jer 51 7). A crown of gold was synonymous with royal honor (Est 2 17; 6 8; Job 19 9; Rev 4 4; 14 14). Wearing of gold was typified as not being necessarily shrunken (Ps 40 4; 10 4; 1 Tim 2 9; 1 Pet 3 3; Rev 17 4). Comparing men to gold suggested their nobility (Lam 4 1.2; 2 Tim 2 20). JAMES A. PATCH

GOLDEN, gold’n, CALF: Probably a representation of the sun in Taurus. See ASTROLOGY, 7; CALF, GOLDEN.

GOLDEN, gold’n, CITY: The tr "golden city" (Isa 14 4) is an attempt to render the received text (גֶּדִילָה, madhâbâbâh), but can hardly be justified. Almost all the ancient VSS read גֶּדִילָה (marhâbâh), a word which connotes unrest and insolence, fitting the context well.

GOLDEN NUMBER, gold’n num’bër: Used in the regulation of the ecclesiastical calendar, in the "Metonic cycle" of 19 years, which almost exactly reconciles the natural month and the solar year. See ASTRONOMY, 1, 5.

GOLDSMITH, gold’smith (גֵּלֶדשִׁם, ָגֵלֶדשִׁם): Goldsmiths are first mentioned in connection with the building of the tabernacle (Ex 31 4; 36 1). Later, goldsmiths' guilds are mentioned (Neh 3 8 32). The art of refining gold and shaping it into objects was probably introduced into Pal from Phoenicia (see CHALDÆA). Examples of gold work from the earliest Egypt peroid are so numerous in the museum of the world that we do not have to draw on our imaginations to appreciate the wonderful skill of the ancient goldsmiths. Probably their designs and methods were those used by the Jews. The goldsmiths' art was divided into (1) the refining of the impure gold (Job 28 1; Prov 17 3; 26 4; 27 21; Isa 1 25; Mal 3 3); (2) shaping of objects, (a) casting idols (Nu 33 52; Hos 15 2), (b) making graven images (2 Ch 34 3 4; Jer 10 14; Nah 1 14), (c) the making of beaten or turned work (Ex 25 18), (d) plating or overlaying (Ex 25 11; 1 K 6 20), (e) soldering (Isa 41 7), (f) making of wire (Ex 28 6; 39 3). Most of these processes are carried on in Bible lands today. In Damascus there is a goldsmiths' quarter where the refining, casting and beating of gold are still carried on, probably in much the same way as in Solomon's time. Jews are found among the goldsmiths. In Beirut, it is a Jew who is esp. skilled in making refiners' pots. Daily, one can see the gold being refined, cast into lumps, beaten on an anvil, rolled between rollers into thin sheets, cut into narrow strips (wire), and wound on bobbins ready for the weaver. There are houses in Damascus and Aleppo still possessing beautiful gold overlaid work on wooden walls and ceilings, the work of goldsmiths of several centuries ago.

GOLGOtha, gol’go-tha (골고따, Golgothá, from Aram. נַגְּדָוֹת, nag’gadót, "a skull"): In three references (Mt 27 33; Mk 15 22; Jn 19 17) it is interpreted to mean קָרָדָוֹת כִּדּוֹר, karadót kîdor, "the place of a skull." In Lk 23 33 AV it is called "Calvary," but in RV simply "The skull." From the NT we may gather that it was outside the city (He 13 12), but close to it (Jn 19 20), apparently near some public thoroughfare (Mt 27 39), coming from the country (Mk 15 21). It was a spot visible, from some points, from afar (Mk 15 40; Lk 23 49).

Four reasons have been suggested for the name Golgotha or "skull": (1) That it was a spot where skulls were to be found lying about 1. The Name of execution. This tradition apparently originates with Jerome (346-420 AD), who refers to (3), to condemn it, and says that "outside the city and without places where the heads of condemned criminals are cut off and which have obtained the name of Calvary—that is, of the beheaded." This view has been adopted by several later writers. Against it may be urged that there is no shadow of evidence that there was any special place for Jewish executions in the 1st cent., and that, if there were, the corpses could have been allowed burial (Mt 27 58; Mk 15 40). The law (Jn 19 38), in conformity with Jewish law (Dt 21 23) and with normal custom (Jos, B. J., IV, v, 2). (2) That the name was due to the skull-like shape of the hill—a modern popular view. No early Lat or Gr writer suggests such an idea, and there is no evidence from the Gospels that the Crucifixion occurred on a raised place at all. Indeed, Epiphanius (2d cent.) expressly says: "There is nothing to be seen on the place resembling this name; for it is not situated upon a height that it should be called [the place] of a skull, answering to the place of the head in the human body." It is true that the tradition embodied in the name Mona Calvary appears as early as the 4th cent., and is materialized in the traditional site of the Crucifixion in the church of the Holy Sepulcher, but that the hill was skull-like in form is quite a modern idea. Gutherz (2 and 3) and considers that a natural skull-like elevation came to be considered, by some folklore ideas, to be the skull of the first man. One of the strangest ideas is that of the late General Gordon, who thought that the resemblance arose from the contours of the ground as laid down in the ordinance survey map of Jerus. (3) That the name is due to an ancient pre-Christian tradition that the skull of Adam was found there. The first mention of this is by Origen (185-253 AD), who was himself lived in Jerus 20 years. He writes: "I have received a tradition to the effect that the body of Adam, the first man, was buried upon the spot where Christ was crucified etc. This tradition was afterward referred to by Athanasius, Epiphanius, Basil of Caesarea, Chrysostom and other later writers. The tomb and skull of Adam, still pointed out in an excavated chamber below the traditional Calvary, marks the survival of this tradition on the spot. This is by far the most ancient explanation of the name Golgotha and, in spite of the absurdity of the original tradition about Adam, is probably the true one.

(4) The highly improbable theory that the Capitulums of Elia Capitulums (the name given to the new Jesus) stood where the Church of the Holy Sepulcher now is, and gave rise to the name Golgotha, is one which involves the extraordinary assumption that Name of Jesus Golgotha in the 3d cent., and that all the references in the Gospels were inserted then. This is only mentioned to be dismissed as incompatible with history and common sense.

With regard to the position of the site of the Crucifixion (with which is bound up the site of the Tomb) the NT gives us no indication 2. The Site whatever; indeed, by those who abandon tradition, sites have been suggested on all sides of the city—N., S., E., and W. Two views hold the field today: (1) that the site of the Crucifixion, or at any rate that the tomb itself, is included within the limits of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher; and (2) that a prominent, rounded, grassy hill above the so-called "Grotto of Jeremiah," N.E. of the Modern Damascus Gate, has at least a very high probability of being the true site. It is impossible here to go into the whole question, which requires minute and long elaboration, but excellent review of the whole evidence may be consulted in "Golgotha and the Holy Sepulcher," by the late Sir Charles W. Wilson, of PEFS. Here are a few points (3). (1) For the traditional view it may be said that it seems highly improbable that so sacred a spot as this, particularly the empty tomb, could have been entirely forgotten. Although it is true that Jews and Heb Christians were driven out of Jerus after the second great revolt (130–33 AD), yet gentle Christians were free to return, and there was no break long enough to account for a site like this being supplanted. The crucifixion of Christ is supposed to have been on a supposed tradition that this spot was the Jewish place of stoning. This so-called tradition is worthless, and spot a trace of either. More traditional is the idea that this site was deliberately defiled by pagan buildings to annoy the Christians. Eusebius, at the time of Constantine, writes as if it were well known that a Temple of Aphrodite lay over the tomb.

He gives an account of the discovery of the spots still venerated as the Golgotha and the Tomb, and of the erection of churches in connection with them (Life of Constantine, III, 25–40). From the time of Constantine there has been no break in the reverence paid to these places. Of the earlier evidence Sir C. Wilson admits (loc. cit.) that “the tradition is so preconceived and the evidence is undoubtedly so unsatisfactory as to raise serious doubts.”

The topographical difficulties are dealt with in the art. Jerusalem. It is difficult for the visitor to Jerusalem sufficiently to realize that the center of gravity of the city has much changed; once it was on the Hill Ophel, and the southern slopes, now bare, were in Christ’s time crowded with houses; in later times, from the 4th cent., it was the Church of the Holy Sepulchre round which the city tended to center. There is no insurmountable difficulty in believing that the site of the Crucifixion may be where tradition points out. As Sir C. Wilson says at the end of his book, “No objection urged against the sites [i.e. Golgotha and the Tomb] is of such a convincing nature that it need disturb the minds of those who accept, in all good faith, the authenticity of the places which are hallowed by the prayers of countless pilgrims since the days of Constantine” (loc. cit.).

(1) The so-called “Skull Hill” or “Green Hill” appears to have appealed first to Otto Theunis (1845), but has received its greatest support through the advocacy of the late Col. Conder and of the late Dr. Selah Morrill, U.S.A., consul at Jerusalem. The arguments for this site are mainly: (a) its conspicuous and elevated position—a position which must impress every reverent pilgrim as strikingly suitable for an imaginary reconstruction of the scene. The very greenness of the hill—it is the first green spot in the neighborhood of the city—may influence the subconsciousness of those who have been brought up from childhood to think of the “green hill far away,” as the popular hymn puts it. When, however, we consider the question historically, there is not the slightest reason to expect that the crucifixion of Jesus, one of many hundreds, should have been dramatically located in a setting so consonant with the importune with which the world has since learned to regard the event. Not to mention the evidence of our Lord that the crucifixion was on a hill, much less on such a conspicuous place. (b) The supposed resemblance to a human skull strikes many people, but it may be stated without hesitation that the most arresting points of the resemblances are in the front and the roof, top, are not ancient; the former are due to artificial excavations going back perhaps a couple of centuries. Probably the whole formation of the hill, the sharp scarp to the S. and the N. or more feet of earth accumulated on the summit are both entirely new conditions since NT times. (c) The nearness of the city walls and the great N. road which make the site so appropriate today are quite different conditions, while the present N. wall can be proved to be on the line of the second wall that the argument holds good. On this see Jerusalem.

Goliath, gō-lî’ath (גּוֹלִיָּה), Goliad; Goludh, Goloth): (1) The giant of Gath, and champion of the Philistine army (1 S 17 4–23; 21 9; 22 10; 2 S 21 19; 1 Ch 20 5 ff.). He defied the armies of Israel, challenging anyone to meet him in single combat while the two armies faced each other at Ephes-dammim. He was slain by the youthful David. Goliath was almost certainly not of Philistine blood, but belonged to one of the races of giants, or aboriginal tribes, such as the Anakim, Avvim, Rephaim, etc. The name was contracted to Goliath, and the term “The Goliath” was used of a giant in any manner. Perhaps it was from such a giant, the ‘goliath’ or ‘goliad,’ that the giant was of that race. His size was most extraordinary. If a cubit was about 21 inches, he was over 11 ft. in height; if about 18 in., he was over 9 ft. in height. The enormous weight of his armor would seem to require the larger cubit. This height probably included his full length in armor, helmet and all. In either case he is the largest man known to history. His sword was wielded by David to slay him and afterward carried about in his wanderings, so that it could be seen by all the world. It is a symbol of the story of his encounter with David is graphic, and the boasts of the two champions were perfectly in keeping with single combats in the Orient. (2) The Goliath of 2 S 21 19 is another person, and quite probably a son of the first Goliath. He was slain by Elhanan, one of David’s mighty men. The person mentioned in 1 Ch 20 5 is called Lahmi, but this is almost certainly due to a corruption of the text. “The brother of Goliath” was the younger Goliath, and probably one of the Goliaths, who had four sons, giants, one of them having 24 fingers and toes. See Elhanan; Lahmi.

Gomer, gō’mēr (גֹּמֶר), Gamor): Given in Gen 10 2 f.; 1 Ch 1 5; 5 as a son of Japheth. The name evidently designates the people called Gom截至 by the Assyrians, Kimmerians by the Greeks. They were a barbaric horde of Aryans who in the 7th cent. BC left their abode in what is now Southern Russia and poured through the Caucasus into Western Asia, causing serious trouble to the Assyrians and other nations. One division moved eastward toward Media, another westward, where they conquered Cappadocia and made it their special abode. They fought also in other parts of Asia Minor, conquering some portions. The Armenian name for Cappadocia, Gamir, has come from this people. In Ezek 38 6 Gomer is mentioned as one of the northern nations.

Gomer, gō’mēr (גֹּמֶר), Gamor, Gam’er): Wife of Hosea. Hosea married Gomer according to Divine appointment, and this was the beginning of God’s word to him (Hos 1 3; 3 1–4). She was to be a wife of whoredom and they were to have children of whoredom. They were not meant that at the time of marriage she was thus depraved, but that before the evil taint in her blood, had inherited immoral instincts. These soon manifested themselves, and the unfaithful, degraded wife of the prophet went deeper into sin. She seems to have left him and became the wife of her paramour (1:1). Hosea is now commanded by Jeh to buy her back, paying the price of the ordinary slave. The prophet keeps her in confinement and without a husband for some time. This experience of the prophet was typical of Israel’s unfaithfulness, of Israel’s exile, and of God bringing her back after the punishment of the exile. See HÖSEA.

GOMORRAH, gō-mōr’a (גֹּםְרוֹרָא, ʾgōmrārāh; LXX and NT Γομόρρα, Gómōrra, or Γομόρρα, Gómorrah; Arab. Gharmara, “to overwhelm with water”): One of the Cities of the Plain (q.v.) destroyed by fire from heaven in the time of Abraham and Lot (Gen 19:23–28). It was located probably in the plain S. of the Dead Sea, now covered with water. See ARABAH; Cities of the Plain; Dead Sea. De Sauley, however, with others who place the Cities of the Plain at the N. end of the Dead Sea, fixes upon Khurnan (or Guarnan), marked on the Survey Map of Pal N. of Rass Feshekeh, where there are ruins about a mile from the Dead Sea. But there is nothing to support this view except the faint resemblance of the name and the inconclusive arguments placing the Cities of the Plain at that end of the sea. GEORGE FREDERICK WOHNTRÜ

GOOD, good (םָעָד, tōḇ, לְבֵי, tōḇ, לְבֵנ, yāṭāḥb; ἀγαθός, ἀγαθή, ἀγαθόν, καλός, καλόν, kalōn; in Eng. “good” is used in various senses, most of which are represented in the Bible. (1) In the OT the word occurs very frequently and in a great variety of ways. Of the different shades of meaning, which frequently run into each other, the following may be distinguished: (a) Possessing desirable qualities, beneficial, agreeable, e.g. “good for food” (Gen 2:9); “We will do thee good!” (Nu 10:29); “Who will show us any good?” (Ps 4:6); “good tidings of good” (Isa 55:7). (b) Moral excellence, piety: “to know good and evil” (Gen 3:22), “that which is right and good” (Dt 6:18a; 1 S 12:23); “good and bad” (1 K 3:9, RV “evil”); “Depart from evil and do good” (Ps 37:27); “a good man” (Prov 12:2); cf. Isa 5:20; Mic 6:8, etc. (c) Kind, benevolent: “The men were very unto the heathen, and the place was called Gomorrah by he for it was good” (1 Ch 14:34); “the good Jeh” (2 Ch 30:18); “God is good to Israel” (Ps 73:1); “Jeh is good to all” (Ps 145:9), etc. (d) Serviceable, adequate, sufficient: “saw the light that it was good” (Gen 1:3); “Jeh is good” (Ps 72:15); “a good dowry” (30:20); “good ears,” “years,” “kine” (41:24,26,35); “good understanding” (1 S 25:3); “good trees”—“land” (2 K 13:29, etc. (f) Not blemished, fair, honorable: “tender and good” (Gen 18:17); “good kid” (2 K 2:3); “Jeh 24:2); and the renderrings “fair” (Gen 26:7, etc.), “beautiful” (2 S 11:2), “pleasant” (2 K 2:19, etc. (g) Pleasure-giving, happy: “glad of heart” (1 K 6:66; Est 5:9); sometimes in AV and RV trd “merry” (Jer 18:36; 1 K 5:6; 2 S 12:28; Prov 14:15, RV “cheerful,” etc. Changes that may be noted in RV are such as, “good” for “ready” (Isa 41:7); “I have no good beyond thee” for “My goodness extendeth not to thee” (Ps 10:2); “good” for “good” (46:1); “good” for “goodness” (107:9); “good” for “well” (Zec 8:15), Good means something good, e.g. “the good of the land” (Gen 46:18,20; Dt 6:11; Job 21:16, RV “prosperity”)

Yāṭāḥb, “to do good,” occurs several times, as, “I will surely do thee good” (Gen 32:12); “to do good” (Lev 5:4); “Make your ways and your doings good,” RV “amend” (Jer 16:11; Zeph 1:12, etc). Numerous other Heb words are rendered “good” in various verbal connections and otherwise, as “to bring good tidings” (2 S 4:10; Isa 40:9, etc.). “take good heed” (Dt 2:4; 4:15; Josh 23:11); “make good” (Ps 107:29, RV “well”); “God will” (Lev 33:16; Mal 2:13); “what good?” RV “what advantages?” (kisthrōn, Ecl 5:11); “good for nothing” RV “profitable” (gāṭhōh, Jer 13:10). In Jer 18:4, “as seemed good to the potter,” the word is yāṭāhz, which means lit. “right.”

In the NT the words most frequently trd “good” are agathos and kalos. The former, agathos, denotes good as a quality, physical or moral. Thus: “He maketh his sun to rise on the evil and the good” (Mt 5:48); “good gifts” (7:11); “Good Master” RV “Teacher.” What callest thou me good? none is good save one” (Mt 10:17; Lk 18:17; cf. Mt 16:19); “they that have done good” (Jn 3:29). Sometimes it is equivalent to “kind” (Thus Tit 2:4) RV: “agathos is “a good thing,” “a good gift” (Acts 5:25; Rom 7:13; 1 Thess 5:15; 1 Pet 3:13), etc. “that which is honest,” RV “honorable” (2 Cor 13:7); “meet” (Mt 15:26; Mk 7:27); “worthy,” RV “honorable” (Jas 2:7); agathos is “a good thing,” “good things to do” (7:11). Cal is yāṭāḥb, a good thing come out of Nazereth?” (Jn 1:46) etc.; agathoergos (1 Tim 6:18), and agathoepioth (Mt 3:4); Acts 14:17, etc., “to do good.” Good is properly, “beautiful,” “pleasing,” “useful,” “moral,” “worthy” in a moral sense, e.g. “that they may see your good works” (Mt 5:16); “She hath wrought a good work on me” (Mt 26:10; Mk 14:6); “the good shepherd” (Jn 10:11,14); “Many good works” RV “moral works” (Acts 1:25); “I showed you your good” (10:32); “good fruit” (13:22); “good seed” (13:24); but the idea of useful may underlie such expressions; kalos is properly “that which is beautiful.” It occurs in Rom 7:18,21; 1 Thess 5:22; “Hold fast that which which is good” etc. In Rom 8:33, it seems to be used interchangeably with agathos. In Rom 5:7, “the good man” (ho agathos) is distinguished from “a righteous man” (dikanos): “For the good man some one would even dare to die” (cf Rom 7:16; He 5:14; 2:4); kalos is “pleasantly,” “beautifully,” “good” (Lk 6:27; Jas 2:3); kalotidukakos (Tit 2:3), “teachers of good things,” RV “of that which is good.”

“Good” occurs in the rendering of many other Gr words and phrases, as euōkia, “good pleasure” (Eph 1:9); “good will” (Lk 2:14; Phil 1:15); sumphēro, “to bear together,” “not good to marry” (Mar 19:10), RV “expedient”; philagathos, “a lover of good” (Tit 1:8); chrēstolojia, “good words” (Rom 15:18), RV “smooth speech,” etc.

The following changes in RV may be noted. In Lk 2:14 for “men of good will” (euōkia) RV reads “in whom he is well pleased,” in “good pleasure among men, Gr men of good pleasure.” The meaning is “men to whom God is doing will or acceptance”; cf Lk 4:19, “the acceptable year of the Lord!” 4:43, “Preach the good tidings of the kingdom of God.” In Mt 11:5; Lk 4:43; 7:22; 1 Pet 2:25 and (AV) Rev 14:6 “the gospel.”
is changed into “good tidings.” In Mt 18:8 f; Mk 9 43-45.47; Lk 5 39, “good” is substituted for “better”; on the last passage in notes “Many authorities read ‘better’”; in 1 Cor 9 15, “good . . . rather” for “better”; “good” is substituted in Acts 13 22 for “glad”; in Acts 6 8 for “honest”; in Heb 13 9 for “a good thing.” In 2 Thess 1 11, “all the good pleasure of his goodness” becomes “every desire of goodness” (in Gr good pleasure of goodness); in 1 Tim 3 2, “good (kosmios) becomes “ordinately.” There are many other passages of like changes. See Goodness; Good, Chief.

GOOD, CHIEF: What this consisted in was greatly discussed in ancient philosophy. Varrus enumerated 288 answers to the question. By Plato “the good” was identified with God.

In the OT while the “good” of the nation consisted in earthly well-being or prosperity (Dt 28 etc), that of the individual was to be found only in God Himself (Pr 16 2 RV. “I have no good beyond thee”); 42 1-5; 43 5; 73 25-28; Jer 31 33 f; Hab 3 17-19. This implied godly conduct (Mic 6 8, etc), and led to the experience described as “blessedness” (Ps 1, etc; Jer 17 7, etc). In the “Wisdom” extolled in Prov 1 20; 8 1 (cf Eccle 1 1 f; 5 1 f), elsewhere described as “the fear of Jeh.” That God alone can be the true “good” of man is implied in the fact that man was created in the image of God (Gen 1 27).

In the NT the true “good” is placed by Jesus in “the kingdom of God” (Mt 6 33; 13 44 etc). This means nothing earthly merely (Mt 6 19), but heavenly and eternal. It implies the OT conception that God is the true “good”; for to seek the Kingdom supremely means whole-hearted devotion to God as our heavenly Father and to His righteousness. It was also spoken of by Jesus, as sonship to the heavenly Father (Mt 5 45, etc). This “good” is not something merely to be given to men, but must be sought after and won through taking up a right attitude toward God and our fellows, cherishing the Love that God is, and acting it out in kindness and righteousness, in resemblance to our God and Father (Mt 6 43-48; here Gen 1 27 is implied).

In some of the epistles Christ is represented as the true “good” (Phil 3 8 f; Col 3 1-4.11). This is because in Him God was manifested in His Truth and Grace. The Son of Man was present through His cross the world is so reconciled to God as men can find acceptance and rest in Him as their “good”; Christ Himself in the Spirit is our Life; in Him we have “God with us.” Having God as our good, nothing but good, in the truest and highest sense, can come to us. Even the most seemingly adverse things are turned into good “to them that love God” (Rom 8 28).

Our true “good” is found thus in God even in this present life; but its fulness can be realized only in the eternal life beyond. Placing our “good” in God leads to such life in devotion to the “good” that God is, as tends to bring all that is best to this present world. It is man’s failure to do this that is the source of our misery (Jer 2 15, etc). The ultimate ideal is that God shall be “all in all” (1 Cor 15 28).

GOODLINESS, goodli-ness: This word is found in Isa 40 6 as the tr of בְּנָכָר, hezesh, commonly tr “mercy,” “kindness,” etc.: “All flesh is grass, and all the goodliness of beauty, charm, comeliness thereof is as the flower of the field.” The rendering is retained by ERV and ARV as appropriate in this place; hezesh is frequently tr “goodness.” In Isa 40 6 LXX has ἀξον, “glory” (so also 1 Pet 1 24), which also fittingly expresses the idea of the passage.

GOODLY, אוֹלָדָה, אוֹלָדָה (tôbh; kalês, kalôs, λαρπρός, λαμπρός): In the OT various words are tr “goodly,” the most of them occurring only once; tôbh (the common word for “good”) is several times tr “goodly,” chiefly in the sense of form or appearance, e.g. “a goodly child” (Ex 2 2); “that goodly mountain” (Dt 3 23); ýôpkeh (“fair”) is similarly tr in Gen 39 6, RV “comely,” and marêh in 2 S 23 21. Other words, such as addîr imply excellence, honor, etc, e.g. Exx 17 23, “bear fruit, and be a goodly cedar”; nókh, “his goodly horse” (Zec 10 13); others imply beauty, ornament, such as ptr, “goodly bonnets,” RV “head-tires” (Ex 39 28); shôphar (“bright,” “fair”), “a goodly heritage” (Ps 16 6); once ’Ĕl (“God of might”) is employed, RV “cedars of God,” m “goodly cedars” (Ps 80 10); râdôtx (joyous soundings or shoutings) is tr in Job 39 13, “goodly wings,” probably from the sound made in flying or flapping; ERV has “The wing of the ostrich rejoiceth.” ARV (wings) “wave proudly.” For “goodly castles” (Nu 31 10) RV has “encampments”; “goodly vessels” (2 Ch 32 27) for “pleasant jewels”; “goodly” is substituted for “good” (Ps 45 1; Cant 1 3); “goodly things” for “all the goods” (Gen 24 10), “goodly frame,” ARV for “comely proportion” (Job 41 12).

In the NT kaiô (“beautiful”) is tr “goodly” in Mt 13 45, “goodly pearls” and Lk 21 3 “goodly stones”; lamprôs (“bright”) in Jas 2 2, “goodly apparel,” RV “fine clothing,” and Rev 18 14 “dainty and goodly,” RV “dainty and sumptuous.” In He 11 25, RV substitutes “goodly” for “proper.” “Goodly” occurs in Apoc. 1 4 18; Jth 8 7 (hóretos): 2 Mac 9 16, “goodly gifts,” kallístes, RV “goodliest.”

GOODLY TREES (מָרַח, אַמְרָח, אַמְרָח, “the fruit [AV ‘boughs’] of goodly [=beautiful or noble] trees“): One of the four species of plants used in the Feast of Tabernacles (Lev 23 40). In the Talm (Sukkah 35a) this is explained to be the citron (Citron (Citrus medica)) known in Heb as ʿethrog. This tradition is ancient, at least as old as the Maccabees. Joel (Ant, XIII, xi, 5) records that Alexander Jannaeus, while serving at the altar during this feast, was pelting by the infuriated Jews with citrons. This fruit also figures on coins of this period. It is probable that the citron tree (Malum Persica) was imported from Babylon by Jews returning from the captivity. A citron is now carried in the synagogue by every orthodox Jew in one hand, and the ḫōtkh (of myrtle, willow, and palm branch) in the other, on each day of the Feast of Tabernacles.

Originally the "goody trees" had a much more generic sense, and the term is so interpreted by the LXX and Vulg. See FEASTS AND FASTS; Boor.

GOODMAN, gōd-man (יוֹדָן, tōb; οἰκοδεσπότης, oikodespōtēs): The word occurs 12 times in the Synoptics, and nowhere else. AV and RV have 3 translations of the word, ARV 2. In 4 places AV has "goodman" while ARV has "householder" or "master of the house" (Mt 20 11; Lk 12 39; 22 11). In all the other places it is τῷ ἔσχατον "householder" or "master of the house"; the RV retains "goodman" in Mk 14 14 and Lk 22 11. The word is used, e.g., "master of the house," or "husband." The adj. is a mark of respect, and is used somewhat as our word "Mr.," an appellative of respect or civility. Relationship by marriage was not distinguished by this epithet, as "good-father," "good-sister," both in England and Scotland. Later the adj. lost its distinguishing force and was swallowed up in the word.

GOODNESS, gōd-nēs: This word in the OT is the tr of τὸ ἰδίος (Ex 18 9; Ps 15 2, RV "good"; 29 6, etc.; of τὰ ἱδία (Ex 33 19; Ps 31 19; Jer 31 14; Hos 5 5), etc. of ἄρετος (Ex 34 6), abundant in ג, ER "plenteous in mercy," ARV "abundant in loving kindness." The g. of God endures continually. RV "mercy," ARV "loving kindness," etc.

In the NT it is the tr of καθόλου ("usefulness," beneficence); "the riches of his g." (Rom 2 4; 11 22, thence; of εὐδοκίας," "good will," "kind," as in Lk 6 35); "The g. of God leadeth thee to repentance" (Rom 2 4); of ἀγαθοστοί (found only in the NT and LXX and writings based thereon), "full of g." (Rom 15 14); "gentleness, goodness, faithfulness" (Gal 5 22, RV); and righteousness and truth" (Heb 5 8); "all the good pleasure of his g." RV "every desire of g." (2 Thess 1 11).

The thought of God as good and the prominence given to "good" and "goodness" are distinctive features of the Bible. In the passage quoted above from Gal 5 22, "goodness" is one of the fruits of the indwelling Spirit of God, and in that from Eph 5 9 it is described as being, along with righteousness and truth, "the fruit of the light which Christians had been made in Christ. Here, as elsewhere, we are reminded that the Christian life in its truth is likeness to God, the source and perfection of all good. 2 Thess 1 11 regards God Himself as expressing His goodness in and through us. See GOOD; Good, Chief.

GOODS, gōdz (יוֹודָן, rkhsh, ḫōtkh, ḫōtb; תּוֹדָחוֹת, ḡwḥrnhnta): In the OT its tr of καθόλου ("substance") is most frequently τῷ ἰδίος goods, as in Gen 14 11,13,16,21; etc.; τὰ ἱδία. In AV RV "good things," m. "all the goods"; Neh 9 25, RV "good things;" Job 20 21, RV "prosperity." Other words are ὣν (Job 10 32), RV "wealth;" ἡγέτης (force, "Ne 31 9; Zeph 1 13, RV "wealth"); ἄρχον (Dt 28 11, RV "good;" Ecc 5 11; mād kḥāq ("work,") Ez 22 8,11); nikhōn (Aram. "riches," Ezr 6 8; 7 26); kîyān, "getting" (Ezk 38 12 f). We have ἱπαχρονότα (lit. "the things existing") in Mt 24 47; "ruler RV, all his goods," Acts 8 29; etc. Abagāh is tr "goods" in Lk 12 18 f; skelos ("instrument") in Mt 12 29; Mk 3 27; τὰ σά ("the things belonging to thee") in Lk 6 30; oūstā ("substance") in Lk 16 12, RV "substance;" ἡπιorizōs ("existence;" "substance") in Acts 2 45; ἀλόκειος ("to be without;" Rev 3 17, RV have gotten riches. In RV "goods" stands instead of "carriage" (Job 18 21), of "stuff" (Lk 17 31), of "good" (1 Jn 3 17). "Goods" was used in the sense of "possessions" generally; frequently in this sense in Apoc (1 Esd 6 32); ἱπαχρονότα (Job 1 20); Ecc 5 1, "Set not thy heart upon thy goods" (cētēma), etc.

GOPHER WOOD, gō'far wōd (יוֹדָן, מָגֵר פָּחֵר): The wood from which Noah's ark was made (Gen 6 14). Gopher is a word unknown elsewhere in Heb or allied languages. Lagarde considered that it was connected with ג,gophrith, meaning "brimstone," or "pitch," while others connect it with ג,gōshēr, also meaning "pitch." Hence, along being a tree, it yielded some resinous wood, and pine, cedar, and cypress have all had their supporters. A more probable explanation is that which connects gopher with the modern Arab. kūfā, a name given to the boats made of interwoven willow branches and palm leaves with a coating of bitumen outside, used today on the rivers and canals of Mesopotamia. In the Gilgamsē story of the flood it is specially mentioned that Noah daubed his ark both inside and out with a kind of bitumen. See DELPHIC.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

GORE, gōr (יוֹדָן, ṭâghâth): "Gore" occurs only three times in AV, viz. Ex 21 28 31 bis, "if an ox gore a man or a woman," etc; in vs 29 32 36 AV has "push" (with his horn), RV "gore." The same vb. in Piel and Hiphəpal is elsewhere tr "push" and "pushing" (Dt 33 17), "He shall push the peoples," Rv "gore"; 1 K 22 11; Ps 44 5; Ezk 33 21; Dn 8 4; 11 40, RV "contend," m. "He push at, as an ox pushes with his horns so should the king fight—a lifting description of warfare.

GORGEOUS, gōr'jus, GORGEOUSLY, gōr'-jus-li (יוֹדָן, m̄ēk̄hōl, lāwārēs, lānprōs): Mēk̄hōl occurs twice in the OT, tr "of beauty" and RV "most gorgeously" (Ezk 13 12); in Ezk 36 4, AV translates "all beautiful" (of armor) to mean "beautiful armor." Lānprōs ("shining," "bright"), is only once tr"gorgeous" (Lk 23 11); "Herod . . . arrayed him in a gorgeous robe," RV "gorgeous apparel. We have also in Lk 7 25, "They are gorgeously apparelled (ἐν δορθοσιμίοις, "splendid," "glorious") . . . are in kings' courts." They were scarcely to be looked for among the prophets, or in the new community of Jesus.

GORGET, gōr'jet: Appears only once in AV (1 S 17 6), being placed in the margin as an alternative to "target (of brass)" in the description of the armor worn by Goliath of Gath. The Heb word tr (יוֹדָן, kātōhon) really means "a javelin," and is so rendered in RV and ARV here, and in 1 S 17 45 ("Thou comest to me without a sword, and with a spear, and with a javelin"). See ARMS I, 3, (4). Gorget, though so rarely used in Scripture and now displaced in our revised versions, occurs not infrequently and in various senses in Eng. lit. In the meaning of "a piece of armor or a thrust" which seems to have been in the mind of King James's translators, it is found in early Eng.
writers and down to recent times. Spenser has it in Faerie Queene, IV, iii, 12:

"His wasand-pipe it through his gorget cleft";

Scott, Marmion, V, ii:

"Their brigantines and gorget light;"

and Prescott, Ferdinand and Isabella, III, 47: "The gorget gave way and the sword entered his throat."

T. NICOL

GORGIAS, gur'ja-as (Targ. Gorgias): A general in the service of Antiochus Epiphanes (1 Mac 3 38; 2 Mac 8 9). Lyssias, who had been left as regent during the absence of Antiochus in Persia, appointed Gorgias to take the command against Judaea in 166 BC. In 1 Mac 4 1–24 is recorded a night attack by Gorgias with 5,000 foot and 1,000 horse upon the camp of Judas Maccabaeus in the neighborhood of Emmaus, in which Judas was completely victorious. The victory was all the more striking as the force of Judas was considerably smaller in number and had "not armor nor swords to their minds" (1 Mac 4 6). Later on (164 BC) he held a garrison in Jamnia, and gained a victory over the forces of Joseph and Azarias who, envying the glory of Judas and Jonathan, in direct disobedience to the orders of Judas, attacked Gorgias and were defeated.

Jamnia as given in Jos, Ant, XII, viii, 6, is probably the correct reading for Idumaean in 1 Mac 12 32. The doings of Gorgias in 2 Mac are recorded with some confusion. He was regarded with special hostility by the Jews. In 2 Mac 12 35 he is described as "the accursed man." J. HUTCHISON

GORTYNA, gor'ti-nə (Targ. Gortina): A city in Crete, next in importance to Gnossus. It is mentioned in 1 Mac 15 23. See CRETE.

GOŠHEN, go'šen (יֶבֶן, gošhen; Τεσσαρία, Gešem): The region where the Hebrews dwelt in Egypt. If the LXX reading Gešem be correct,

1. Meaning: the word, which in its Heb form has of Name no known meaning, may mean "cultivated"—comparing the Arab. root jashima, "to labor." Egyptologists have suggested a connection with the Egyptian Jps, meaning "inundated land" because Gošhen was apparently the same region, called by the Greeks the "Arabian nome," which had its capital at Phakousa representing the Egypt Pa-ous (Brugsch, Geog., I, 298), the name of a town, with the determinative for "pouring forth." Vander Hardt, indeed, more than a century ago (see Sayce, Higher Criticism, 235), supposed the two words to be connected. Dr. Naville in 1857 found the word as denoting the vicinity of Pi-Sept (now Safi el Henneh), 6 miles E. of Zoápis—in the form K-as-s. He concludes that this was the site of Phakousa, but the latter is usually placed at Tell el Fakáds, about 15 miles S. of Zoán (q.v.), and this appears to be the situation of the "City of Arabis" which St. Silvia, about 385 AD, identifies with Gešem or Gošhen; for she reached it in her journey from Heróópolis, through Gošhen to Tathmos or Taphnis (Daphnai), and to Pelusium.

It is generally agreed that Gošhen was the region E. of the Bubastic branch of the Nile; and in Ps 78 12,43, it seems to be clearly identified

2. Situation: the "field [or pastoral plain] of Zoán," which was probably also the "land of Ramessus" mentioned (Gen 47 11) as possessed by Jacob's family (see RAMESSUS; ZOÁN). Where first mentioned (Gen 45 10), Goshen is promised by Joseph to Jacob as a land fit for flocks, and the LXX here reads, "Gešem of Arabia," probably referring to the Arabian nome which took its name from the "desert" which defended the E. border of Egypt. In the second notice (Gen 46 28 f.), the boundary of the land of Gošhen, where Joseph met his father, is called in the LXX Εδρούον (Ephrōs), and also (ver 28) "the land of Ramesses(s);" so that in the 3d cent. BC Goshen seems to have been identified with the whole region of the Arabian nome, as far S. as Heróópolis which (see PRINON) lay in Wady Tumeidt. Gošhen included pastoral lands (Gen 46 34; 47 14.6.27; 50 8) and was still inhabited by the Hebrews at the time of the Exodus (Ex 8 22; 9 26), after which it is unnoticed in the OT. The name, however, applied to other places which were probably "cultivated" lands, including a region in the S. of Pal (Josh 10 41; 11 16), "all the country of Gošhen (LXX Gošon), even unto Gibeon," and a city of Judah (Josh 15 51) in the mountains near Beersheba. These notices seem to show that the word is not of Egypt origin.

The region thus very clearly indicated was not of any great extent, having an area of only about 900 sq. miles, including two very different districts. The western half, immemorially E. of the Bubastic branch of the Nile, stretches from Zoán to Bubastis (at both of which sites records of the Hittites and later Aegyptian ruler Apepi have been found), or a distance of about 35 miles N. and S. This region is an irrigated plain which is still considered to include some of the best land in Egypt. The description of the land of Ramessus (see RAMMESIS), in the 14th cent. BC, shows its fertility; and St. Silvia says that the land of Gošhen was 16 miles from Heróópolis, and that she traveled for two days in it "through vineyards, and baban plantations, and orchards, and tilled fields, and gardens." The region narrows from about 15 miles near the seashore to about 10 miles between Zogazig and Tell el Kebir on the S. E. of this, a sandy and gravelly desert lies between the Nile plain and the Suez Canal, broadening southward from near Daphnai (Tell Defennah) to Wady Tumeidt, where it is 40 miles across E. and W. S. of this valley an equally waterless desert stretches to Suez, and from the Bitter Lakes on the E. to the vicinity of Heliopolis (S.E. of Cairo) on the W. Thus Wady Tumeidt, which is fertilized by the Nile waters (see PHARAOH), and contains villages and corn fields, is the only natural route for a people driving with their flocks and herds by which the vicinity of the Red Sea can be reached, the road leading from the S. end of the "field of Zoán" near Bubastis, and 40 miles eastward to the "edge of the wilderness" (see ETHEM) and the head of the Bitter Lakes. This physical conformation is important in relation to the role of the Israelites (see EXODUS); and Wady Tumelat possibly is intended to be included in Goshen, as the LXX translators supposed.

GOSHEN, gō'shen (יוֹשֵׁן, gōšēn): (1) Mentioned as a country (יוֹשֵׁן, ergōn) in the S. of Judah distinct from the "hill country," the Negeb and the Shephelah (Josh 10 41; 11 16). Undentified.

(2) A town in the S.W. part of the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 51), very probably connected in some way with the district (1).

(3) See preceding article.

GOSPEL, gō'spel (τὸ εὐαγγέλιον, τὸ εὐαγγέλιον): The word "gospel" is derived from the AS word which meant "the story concerning God." In the NT the Gr word εὐαγγέλιον means "good news." It proclaims tidings of deliverance. The word sometimes stands for the record of the life of Our Lord (Mk 1 1), embracing all His teachings, as in Acts 20 24 "gospel" has a peculiar use, and describes primarily the message which Christianity announces. "Good news" is its significance. It means a gift from God. It is the proclamation of the forgiveness of sins and sonship with God restored through Christ. It means remission of sins and reconciliation with God. The gospel is not only a message of salvation, but also the instrument through which the Holy Spirit works (Rom 1 16).

The gospel differs from the law in being known entirely from revelation. It is proclaimed in all its fulness in the revelation given in the NT. It is also found, although obscuringly, in the OT. It begins with the prophecy concerning the 'seed of the woman' (Gen 3 15), and the promise concerning Abraham, in whom all the nations should be blessed (Gen 12 3; 15 5) and is also indicated in Acts 10 43 and in the argument in Rom 4.

In the NT the gospel never means simply a book, but rather the message which Christ and His apostles announced. In some places it is called "the gospel of God," as, for example, Rom 1 1; 1 Thess 2 2 9; 1 Tim 1 11. In others it is called "the gospel of Christ" (Mk 1 1; Rom 1 16; 15 19; 1 Cor 9 12 18; Gal 1 7). In another place it is called "the gospel of the grace of God" (Acts 20 24); in another "the gospel of peace" (Eph 6 15); in another "the gospel of your salvation" (Eph 1 13); and in yet another "the glorious gospel!" (2 Cor 4 4 AV). The gospel is Christ: He is the subject of it, the object of it, and the life of it. It was preached by Him (Mt 4 23; 11 5; Mk 1 14; Lk 4 18 m.), by the apostles (Acts 16 10; Rom 1 15; 2 16; 1 Cor 9 16) and by the evangelists (Acts 8 25).

We must note the clear antithesis between the law and the gospel. The distinction between the two is important because, as Luther indicates, it contains the substance of all Christian doctrine. "By the law," says he, "nothing else is meant than God's word and command, directing what to do and what to leave undone, and requiring of us obedience of works. But the gospel is such doctrine of the word of God that neither requires our works nor commands us to do anything, but announces the offered grace of the forgiveness of sin and eternal salvation. Here we do nothing, but only receive what is offered through the word." The gospel, then, is the message of God, the teaching of Christianity, the redemption in and by Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, offered to all mankind. And as the gospel is bound up in the life of Christ, His biography and the record of His works, and the proclamation of what He has to offer, are all gathered into this single word, of which no better definition can be given than that of Melanchthon: "The gospel is the gratuitous promise of the remission of sins for Christ's sake." To hold tenaciously that in this gospel we have a supernatural revelation is in perfect consistency with the spirit of scientific inquiry. The gospel, as the whole message and doctrine of salvation, and as chiefly efficacious for contrition, for faith, justification, renewal and sanctification, deals with facts of revelation and experience.

IX. THE PROBLEM OF THE GOSPELS

1. Introductory—The present art. is confined to the consideration of the relations and general features of the first 3 Gospels (Mt, Mk, Lk).

2. The Synoptic Gospels in One Volume—In a similar spirit is "The Synoptic Gospels," the number and ask these authors as their authors. Justin Martyr in the middle of the century, freely quotes from "Memoirs of the Apostles," which are of the Gospels, first given in Jerusalem, repeated in the catechetical schools (cf. Lk 1:4, RV), and intrusted to the trained memories of the Christian converts, is held to be authentic for the phenomena of the 3 Gospels. The oral Gospel took its essential form in Palestine, and written editions of it would be seen in more or less complete form (Lk 1:1). The first distinguished advocate of the oral hypothesis was Gieseler (1818). It was upheld in Britain by Alford and Westcott, and is today advocated, with modifications, by Dr. A. Wright in his Synopsis of the Gospels in Gr (2d ed., 1898).

(2) The mutual use hypothesis: As old as Augustine, this hypothesis, which assumes the use of one of the Gospels by the other two, has been frequently advocated by scholars of repute in the history of criticism. There have been many variations of the hypothesis. Easton, for instance, sets forth his own account without reference to the other two, and, with the partial exception of Luke (1:14), does not tell his readers anything about the sources of his Gospel. His problem was to make the relation of the three to one another, and the problem, though it approaches a solution, is not yet solved. A history of the Synoptic problem will be found in outline in many recent works; the most elaborate and best is Maurice's (3d ed., 1913). It briefly indicates what the problem was as it presented itself to the church in the earlier centuries, and gives in detail the history of the discussion from the time of Tertullian (1778) to the present day. It is not possible to present all of this history briefly, though it may be remarked that, as the discussion went on, large issues were raised; every attempt at solution seemed only to add to the difficulty of finding an adequate one; and at length it was seen that no more complex problem was ever set to literary criticism than that presented by the similarities and differences of the Synoptic Gospels.

Of the hypotheses which seek to account for these similarities and differences, the following are the most important. (1) The hypothesis of oral tradition: This theory has Solutions rather fallen into disfavor among recent critics. Dr. Stanton, e.g., says, "The relations between the first 3 Gospels cannot be adequately explained simply by the influence of oral tradition" (Gospels as Hist. Documents, II, 17; similarly Moffatt, op. cit., 180 ff). Briefly stated, the theory is this. It assumes that each of the evangelists wrote independently of the others, and derived his written narratives not from written ten sources, but from oral narratives of sayings and doings of Jesus, which, through dint of repetition, had assumed a relatively fixed form. The teaching in the 15, 16, 18 1-14, etc.). This Sondergut of Mt and Lk will be more appropriately treated in the arts. which deal with these Gospels respectively. Here it is sufficient to point out that the criticism of the Synoptic Gospels has not completely stifled it has found a probable source (a) for what is common to them all, (b) for what is common to any two of them, and (c) for what is peculiar to each.

The literature on the subject is so voluminous that only a few references can be given. In addition to those named, the following works may of the first set forth the present condition of the Synoptic problem: B. Weiss, Intro to NT, and other works; Harnack, Luke the Physician, The Sayings of Jesus, The Acts of the Apostles, Dale of the Acts of the Apostles and of the Synoptic Gospels (El); Wellhausen, Einleitung in die drei ersten Evangelien, and works on each of the Synoptic Gospels, esp. Studies in the Synoptic Problem, edited by Dr. Sanday.

III. Literary Analysis and Oral Tradition.—Looked at merely as a problem of literary analysis, it is scarcely possible to advance farther than has been done in the works of Harnack, of Sanday and his collaborators, and of Stanton, referred to above. The Synoptic Problem has been, however, the most patient and persevering kind.

No clue has been neglected, no labor has been spared, and the interrelations of the three Gospels have been almost exhaustively explored. Yet the problem remains unsolved, and it must not be forgotten that the materials of the Synoptic Gospels were in existence before they assumed a written form. Literary analysis is apt to forget this obvious fact, and to proceed by literary comparison alone. The Gospel was confessedly at first and for some years a spoken Gospel, and this fact has to be taken into account in any adequate attempt to understand the phenomena. It is not enough to say with Dr. Stanton that "the relations of the first three Gospels cannot be adequately explained simply by the influence of oral tradition"; for the question arises, Can the relations between the first three Gospels be explained simply by the results of literary analysis, be it as exhaustive and thorough as it may be? Let it be noted that the critical analysis has accomplished a great deal; that it has almost compelled assent to the two-source hypothesis; that it has finally made good the priority of Mk; that it has made out a probable source consisting mainly of sayings of Jesus, yet many scholars remain for which literary analysis cannot touch, at least has not touched. There is the problem of the order of events in the Gospels, which is so far followed by all three. How are we to account for that sequence? Is it sufficient to say, as some do, that Mk set the style of the Gospel narrative, and that the others so far followed that style? All Gospels must follow the method set by Mk, so it is affirmed. But if that is the case, how did Mt and Lk depart from that copy by writing a fore-history? Why did they compile a genealogy? Why did they give so large a space to the sayings of Jesus, and add so much not contained in the Gospel which, on the hypothesis, set the pattern of what a Gospel ought to be? These questions cannot be answered on the hypothesis that the others simply followed a fashion set by Mk. Sometimes the 2d Gospel is described as if it were suddenly launched on the Christian world; as if no one had ever heard of the story contained in it before Mk wrote it. From the natural assumption that the church had knowledge of many of the facts in the life of Christ, and in possession of much of His teaching before any of the Gospels were written. So much is plain from the Epistles of St. Paul. How many facts about Jesus, and how much of His teaching may be gathered from these epistles, we do not inquire at present. But we do learn much from St. Paul about the historical Jesus.

The Christian church in its earlier form arose out of the teaching, example and influence of the apostles of Jesus. It was not merely a Christian sect.

2. Influence testimony as to the life, character, of Oral teaching, death and resurrection of Instruction Jesus Christ. That testimony told the church what Jesus had done, what He had taught, and of the belief of the apostles as to what He was, and what He continued to be. We read that the early church "continued steadfastly in the apostles' teaching and fellowship" (Acts 2 42). The "teaching" consisted of reminiscences of the Lord, of interpretations of the facts about Jesus and of agreements between these and the OT. The first instruction given to the church was oral. Of this fact there can be no doubt. How long oral teaching continued we may not say, but it is likely that it continued as long as the apostles dwelt together at Jerusalem. To them an appeal could constantly be made. There was also the strictly catechetical teaching given to the converts, and this teaching would be given after the matter to which they had been introduced in their earlier section. It consisted mainly in committing accurately to memory, and in repetition from memory (see Catechism; Catechumen). There would thus be a stricter tradition, as it was taught in the catechetical classes, and the people of the church would be as well informed as the people could carry with them from the preaching of the apostles at the weekly assemblies. Those, besides, who were present at the day of Pentecost, and others present at the feasts at Jerusalem, who had passed under Christian influence, would carry with them on their return to their homes some knowledge of the life and death, resurrection and ascension of Jesus. It may have been a meager Gospel that these carried with them to Antioch, to Rome, or to other cities in which the diaspora dwelt. But that they did carry a Gospel with them is plain, for from their testimony arose the church at Antioch, where the Christians had without question a knowledge of the Gospel, which informed their faith and guided their action.

IV. Order of Events and Time of Happenings in the Synoptic Gospels.—It is known from Acts that the main topic of the preaching of the Apostles was the resurrection of the Lord. "Witness apostles their witness of the resurrection of the Lord Jesus" (Acts 4 33). It is evident, however, that the apostolic witness would not be limited to the events of the Passion week, or to the fact of the resurrection. There would arise a thirst for information regarding the life of Jesus, what He had done, what He had said, what manner of life He had lived, and what teaching He had given. Accounts of Him and of His work would be given by the apostles, and once these accounts were given, they would continue to be given in the same form. Tell a story to a child and he will demand that it be always given in the form in which he first knew it. Human nature is very patient of variations in the subsequent telling of it. Memory is very tenacious and very conservative. It is clear that the first lessons of the apostles were accounts of the Passion week, and of the resurrection. But it was necessary for events and incidents in the life of Jesus, and on the order as we read the Synoptic Gospels, we see that the order was dictated by the events themselves. They are grouped together for no other reason than that they happened so. Most of the incidents are hung on a geographical thread. In the 2d Gospel, which seems to preserve most faithfully the traditional order, this is obvious to every attentive reader; but in all three Gospels many of the narratives go in well-established cycles. To illustrate: A narrative, which may many times be instanced, the healing of the woman with the issue of blood is represented as occurring in the course of the walk to the house of Jairus (Mk 5:21 ff.). The only explanation is that this was the actual mode of its happening. Events happened, incidents arose, in the course of the journeys of Jesus and His disciples, words were also spoken, and in the memories of the disciples, when the journey was recalled, there arose also what had happened in the context of the journey; as we follow the journey through Galilee, to the coasts of Tyre and Sidon, through Samaria, down the valley of the Jordan, through Jericho to Jerusalem, we find that the grouping of the material of the Gospels is determined by the facts. Most of what is recorded happened in the course of the journeys, and was borne in the memories of the disciples in the order of its happening. The order, then, is not arbitrary, nor is it the product of reflection; it is the outcome of the facts. It is true that in pursuance of their several plans, Mk sometimes, Mt frequently, deserts the order of Mk, but it is noteworthy that they never do so together. As Professor Burkitt says, "Mt and Mk never agree against Lk in transposing a narrative. Lk sometime, when the order of Mk can be read, but not often does so; but in these cases Mk is always supported by the remaining Gospels" (op. cit., 36). In Mt, after 19:1, the events follow each other quite as in Mk.

When one studies the rather kaleidoscopic political geography of Bible times, the first 40 years of one era, he will find many confirmations of

2. Time of the historic situation in the Synoptic

Happenings. The birth of Jesus was in the time of Herod the Great, when the whole of Pal was under one government. After the death of Herod, Pal was under several rulers. Archelaus had possession of Judaea until the year 9 AD. Galilee was under Herod Antipas until the year 37, and the tetrarchy of Philip had a distinct government of its own. About the year 40 Pal was again under one government under Herod Agrippa. Now it is clear that the events of the Gospels happened while Herod Antipas ruled in Galilee and Peraea, and while Pilate was procurator in Judaea (see Synoptico-op. cit., and Josephus, B.C.J). Nor is the significance of this environment exhausted by the reference to the time. As Professor Burkitt has shown (op. cit., in his chapter entitled "Jesus in Exile"), in the itinerary recorded in Mk 6, the parts avoided are the dominions of Herod Antipas. It is said in Mk 3:6, "And the Pharisees went out, and straightway with the Herodians took counsel against him, how they might destroy him." The significance of this alliance between the Pharisees and the Herodians is well drawn out by Professor Burkitt in the work cited above. It is simply noted by Mk, and on it the evangelist makes no remark. But the conspiracy had a great effect on the work of Jesus. A little later we find Jesus no more in any of the synagogues. He devotes Himself to the training of the Twelve, and is outside of the dominions of Herod Antipas. It is not to be forgotten that during these months Jesus is an exile from His own land, and it was during that period of exile that the issue of His work became clear to Him, and from the time of the great confession at Caesarea-Philippi He began to tell His disciples of the decease He should accomplish at Jerusalem (Mt 16:21 ff.).

5. Dating of the Synoptic Gospels. — The question as to the dates at which the Synoptic Gospels appear in a published form may more suitably be dealt with in connection with the arts. On the separate Gospels. It need only be observed here that opinion is tending toward much earlier dates than were common till lately. By all but extreme Methodism, all but 1. Return to Earliest the first 3 Gospels fall well within the Dating limits of the apostolic age. In the Preface to his work on Luke (1905), Harnack reminded his readers that 10 years before he had told them that "in the optimism of the sources of the best Christians we are in a movement backward to tradition." The dates he formerly favored were, for Mk between 65 and 70 AD, for Mt between 70 and 75, for Lk between 75 and 95. Harnack's most recent pronouncement of the date of Acts, which he states with all the emphasis of italics, "It seems now to be established beyond question that both books of this great historical work were written while St. Paul was yet alive" (Date of the Acts and the Synoptic Gospels, 124, ET), must have a determining influence on critical opinion. If Acts were written during the lifetime of St. Paul (of Acts 28:30), then the 3 Gospels must have been written earlier. It is likely that Lk had all used the Synoptic Gospels at least during the life of Paul at Caesarea. If he made use of the 2d Gospel, then Mk must have had a still earlier date, and the whole problem of the dating of the Gospels is revolutionized. The essential thing is that the 3 Gospels were probably written before the destruction of Jerusalem (70 AD). There is nothing in their contents that makes this view untenable.

It is still to be remembered, however, that the materials of which the Gospels are composed existed before their

2. The Material Still Older form. Every discussion must take note of that fact. The lit. of the NT presupposes just such accounts of the life of Jesus as we find in the Synoptic Gospels, and the Gospels have a right to rest on their veracity and sufficiency as accounts of Jesus, of what He was, of what He said, and of what He did. They are their own best witnesses.

VI. The Messianic Idea in Its Bearings on Historicity of the Gospels. — In a striking passage in his Das Evangelium Marci (65, 66), Wellhausen vividly sets forth the significant contrast between the Jewish and the Christian conceptions of the Messiah. We quote the words, notwithstanding the fact that Wellhausen does not regard the passage, Mk 8:31 ff., as historical. With him what is set forth there is not the figure of the historic Jesus, but a picture of the persecuted church.

"The confession of Peter, "Thou art the Messiah," affords," he says, "the occasion for setting forth the character of what up to this time was latent. He has elicited the confession and accepted it. Nevertheless He accepts it with a correction; a correction that follows as a matter of course. He is not the Messiah who will restore the kingdom of Israel, but another Messiah altogether. He does not set up the kingdom does He go to Jerusalem, and He goes in order to be crucified. Through sorrow and death He goes into glory, and only by this way can others also enter. The kingdom of God is no Judaistic kingdom; the kingdom is destined only for some chosen individuals for disciples. The thought of the possibility of a messianism of the people has wholly disappeared. Into the place of a command to repent addressed to all souls the command to follow, and that can be obeyed only by a very few. The conception of following loses now all its proper forces and takes a higher meaning. It does not mean what it means in the first instance, viz., to accompany and to follow Him during His lifetime, the command to follow, that is to follow Him unto death. The following is an act of faith possible only for a very few. One must bear his cross, follow Him. The situation of the oldest congregation and its tone is thus foreshadowed by Jesus as He goes to meet His fate."

A similar passage occurs in the Einleitung, which ends with the significant sentence, "All these are noteworthy signs of the time in which He takes His standpoint" (81).

Elsewhere Wellhausen admits that the sections of the Gospels following the scene at Caesarea-Philippi contain what was known as the dis-Ciples of the apostolic church in the Gospels following the scene at Caesarea-Philippi contain what was known as the dis-bility of the But this Gospel owed its origin to the Christian apo

tic church itself. It is a question of the highest importance, and the answer cannot be determined by mere literary criticism: Is the Christian conception of the Messiah due only to the influence of the view of the church? Which is the more probable? It is agreed, Wellhausen being witness, that the Christian conception was subversive of the Jewish, that the two were in contradiction in many ways. One can understand the Christian conception, and its success over the Jewish among the Christian people, if it had been set forth by the Master; but it is unintelligible as a something which originated in the congregation itself. The conception of a crucified Messiah, of a suffering Saviour, was a conception which was, during the years of His earthly ministry, in the mind of Jesus alone. It was not in the minds of the disciples, until He had risen from the dead.

And it was not in the minds of His contemporaries.

But the conceptions of the Jesus church, as it is as in the Epistles of St. Paul. No: the conception of the suffering Saviour was not the invention of the church, nor did it rise from her thought of her own needs; it was a gift to her from the suffering and risen Lord. Not without a great impulse, nor without a strong source of persuasion, do men displace notions which they have cherished for generations, and substitute notions which are contradictory and subversive of those fiercely and firmly held.

We take the chapters that follow chapters 21-25, and as descriptive of the historical Jesus. If we can do so, then the matter is intelligible, not otherwise.

It is also to be observed in this relation that the needs of the church are new needs. There is no provision in the NT for the needs of the natural man. The critical view often puts the cart before the horse, and this is one illustration of the fact.

The needs of the church are the creation of Christ.

They are new needs, or needs only imperfectly felt by humanity before Jesus of Nazareth.

Be the needs of the church as great as they may,

they are not creative; they are only responsive to the higher call. Nor is it a possible hypothesis that lies at the basis of the criticism of Whiston and of many other modern commentators, that the religious sentiment of the OT was invented by Christ, or else

by some apostle of whom Christ was the keystone.

This is another case of the hyateron proteron.

It is the historical Jesus that has given concreteness and definiteness to the Messianic expectation. Without such a centre, the OT is a series of hints, fragments, and traditions, and the OT no more a complete book than the Bible as a whole. That view is confirmed by the conception of the OT as a record of the life of Christ, like the OT as the Word of God, and as authoritative for the guidance of life and conduct. It is one thing to admit and assert this; it is another thing to say that the story of the OT molded and directed the story of Jesus as it is in the Synoptic Gospels.

This has been widely asserted, but without adequate proof. As a matter of fact Christianity, when it accepted the OT as the word of God, interpreted it in a fashion which had not been accepted before.

It interpreted it in the light of Jesus Christ. Tendencies, facts, meanings, which had been in the OT came into light, and the Bible of the Christians was a Bible which testified of Christ. That on which the Jews laid stress passed into the background, and that which they had neglected came into prominence. This view is set forth by St. Paul: "Unto this day, when they read the Old Testament, they see the heart's meaning." (2 Cor 3 15.) Or as it is put in Lk.

"O foolish men, and slow of heart to believe in all that the prophets have spoken! Behooved it not the Christ to suffer these things, and to enter into his glory?" (Lk. 24 26 f.) The critical interpretation stress was laid on meanings which Jewish readers had neglected, and so the church read the OT in the new light, and things formerly hidden leaped into view. So the suffering servant of Jer.

was turned into the righteous ruler of the world in the New Testament, and the Jewish sacrifices and ceremonies of the OT obtained a new meaning. The story of Israel and its patriarchs, lawgivers, priests, kings and prophets, became full of significance for the new religion, and its laws and prophetic utterances were studied because they testified of Christ. This is not the place to inquire into the truth of the Christian interpretation, but the fact is undeniable. The inference is that the OT did not, as it was understood by the Jews, influence the conceptions which the Christian Church took from the OT; but, rather the influence of Christ, His commanding personality, and His history gave a new meaning to the OT, a meaning undreamt of before. The Epistle to the Hebrews might have as an alternative title, "How the church in the OT already had the true Christ, with Christ's personal grace in His

A glance may be taken at Jesus under His more general aspect as thinker. As thinker, Jesus stands alone. He speaks with authority, and He must obey.

The Synoptic Gospels, in this respect, are unique. There is nothing like them in literature. Not even in the Bible is there anything to compare with them. Even in the other books of the N.T. we do not find anything like the attitude of Jesus to the common things of life. The world's literature shows no parallel to the parables of the Gospels. Here, at any rate, we are on safe ground in saying that these are not due to the refection, but to the preaching of Jesus. They are an individual stamp which accredits them as the product of one mind.

But a great deal more may be said on the characteristic features of the thinking of Jesus. He is the only thinker who goes straight from the common things of daily life and daily experience into the deepest mysteries of life. The deepest thoughts which man can think are suggested to Him by what everybody sees or does. It is not easy within reasonable limits to do justice to this feature of the Synoptic Gospels. Jesus is at home amid the common things and common occupations of life, because He discerns the Father's presence in them all.

What a series of pictures of the world, and of occupations of men, could be gathered from these Gospels! The mirror of the trades of men neglected under men under the teaching of poets and painters returned into sympathy with external Nature. We are only beginning to see what wealth, from this point of view, is in the Gospels. Poetic sympathy with Nature is apprehensively mirrored in the Gospels, and, yet it is in the Gospels. Wind and weather, mountain and valley, secdime and harvest, summer and winter, sowing and reaping, buying and selling, all are there, transfigured into higher meanings, and made the symbol of the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven. Other thinkers rise gradually, and by many steps, from common experience, into what they have to describe of the higher thought and wider generalizations through which they see to interpret the mystery of life and of the universe. But this thinker needs no middle terms. He sees, e.g., a woman preparing bread for the use of the family, and in this process perceives the mystery of the kingdom of heaven. Whenever He touches on these things, it is as if they were transfigured. They become luminous with the presence of the spiritual world, and earth becomes full of heaven, and every bush is affame with God.

We note these things because they have a close bearing on the other and characteristic of the Synoptic Gospels. They bear the stamp of a unique, a creative personality. Be the processes through which the materials of the Gospels have passed what they may, yet these have not obliterated nor blunted the essential characteristics of that unique personality. When the comparisons of the similarities and differences of the Gospels have been exhausted, the problem of their origin remains, and that problem can be solved only by the recognition of a creative personality who alike by word and work was unlike any other that the world has ever seen.

IX. The Problem of the Gospels.—The Jesus of the Gospels is the Son of God. Stated in its highest form, the problem which the evangelists had in hand was how to represent a Divine being under human conditions, and to set Him forth in such a way that in that presentation there should be nothing unworthy of the Divine, and nothing inconsistent with the human conditions under which He worked and lived. This was the greatest problem ever attempted by any evangelist, and the preaching of the evangelist already shares. Jesus is the miraculous Son of God, in whom men believe, whom men put wholly on the side of God" (Was wissen wir von Jesus? 54, 57). The contrast between the Jesus of the Synoptic Gospels and the Jesus of the first and second centuries, so often emphasized, thus begins to disappear. The purpose of the Synoptics, as of Jn, is to lead men to "believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God," that, believing, they "may have life in his name" (Jn 20:31).

GOTHIC, gôth'ik, VERSION. See Versions.

GOTHOLIAS, goth-ôl'-ias (Todolías, Gotholias): Father of Josias, one of the sons of Elam who returned from Babylon with Ezra (1 End 8 33). The name corresponds to Athaliah, the Gr G being substituted for the Heb guttural 'ayin, as in Gomorrha, Gata, etc. Taken with 2 K 12 12 it seems to have been used for both men and women.

GOTHONIEL, gô-to-ân'â-el (Todowia, Gothoniad): The same as Othniel, father of Chabrias who was one of the governors of the city of Bethulia (Jth 6 15).

GOUD, gôd, goöd (גָּדוֹל, bâlâyôn): The Vulg has hâdera ("ivy"), which is impossible. Philologically kôd means "to appear" and kôd Kes (kikîth), which was the Egypt name for the castor oil plant (Ricinum communis). This grows plentifully all over the Orient, and under favorable conditions may reach a height of 10 to 15 ft.; its larger leaves are a grateful sight. The red fruits of the narrative in Jon 4 6ff are, however, much more suitably met by the "bottle gourd" (Cucurbita lanepinaria), the Arab. kar'âh. This is a creeping, vine-like plant which may frequently be seen trained over the rough temporary sun-shelters erected in fields or by the roadside in Pal and Mesopotamia.

GOURD, WILD, wild (גָּדוֹל, pakbu'oth sadkehe), 2 K 4 39: The v פֶּרֶס, pakâ; means "to splint" or "burst open," and on this ground these "wild gourds" have been identified with the fruit of the squiring cucumber (Eccallium elatum). This little gourd, 1 to 2 in. long, when fully ripe falls suddenly when touched or shaken, the bitter, irritant juice flows, injuring a considerable distance, and the seeds are thrown all around. It is exceedingly common in Pal, and its familiar poisonous properties, as a drastic cathartic, made it unlikely that under any circumstances its fruit could be mistaken for any edible gourd; it is, too, in no way vine-like ("wild vine," 2 K 4 39) in appearance, for the stem is stiff and upright, and there are no tendrils. The traditional plant, Cucumis prophetarum, which grows in the desert, and has very small "gourds," has nothing really to recommend it. By far the most probable plant is the Colocynthis (Citruscolocynthis), belonging like the last two to N.O. Cucurbitaceae. This view has the support of the LXX and Vulg. It is a vinelike plant which spreads over the ground or attaches itself by its spiral tendrils to other plants. The rounded "gourds" are 3 in. or more in diameter, and contain a pulp intensely bitter and, in any but minute quantities, extremely poisonous.

GOVERNMENT, guv'ern-mark: The government of the Hebrews varied at different periods, of which we may distinguish seven: (1) the nomadic period, from the Exodus to the entrance into Canaan; (2) the period of transition from nomadic to civil life; (3) the monarchy; (4) the period of subjection to other nationalities; (5) the period from Ezra to the Greeks; (6) Greek rule; (7) Roman rule.

The government of the primitive period is that proper to nomadic tribes composed of families and clans, in no wise peculiar to the Hebrews, but shared in its essential features by the most diverse peoples at a corresponding stage of civilization. Though we might draw illustrations from many sources, the government of the Bedouins, Sem nomads inhabiting the steppes of Arabia, affords the most instructive parallel. In the patriarchal state the family is the household (including slaves and concubines) of the father, who is its head, having power of life and death over his children (Gen 22; Jgs 11 31 ff.). A clan is a collection of families under a common chieftain, chosen for his personal qualifications, such as prowess and generous hospitality. The composition of the clan was essentially shifting, subject, according to circumstances, to the loss or accession of individuals and families. Although the possession of the same grazing-grounds doubtless played a large part in determining the complexion of the clan, the fiction of descent from a common ancestor was maintained, even when kinship was established by the blood covenant. In all probability community of worship, which cemented the tribe, served as the most effective bond of union also in the clan. Vestiges of such clan cults are still to be detected (1 S 20 5 ff.; Jgs 18 19). The family tradition of the twelve tribes must not be allowed to blind us to the evidence that the tribe also was not constant. Mention of the Kenites (Jgs 1 16) and the list of tribes in the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5) remind us that such organizations vanished. In the readjustment incident to the change from the pastoral life of the nomad to that of the settled agricultural population of Pal, many units were doubtless shifted from one tribe to another, and the same result may be established following from the endless strife between the tribes before and during the period of the kings. The large and powerful tribe of Judah seems to have originated comparatively late. The union of the tribes under the leadership of Moses was essentially similar to the formation of a new tribe out of a group of clans actuated by a desire to accomplish a common end. Many such temporary aggregations must have originated, only to succumb to the centrifugal forces of jealousy and conflict interests. Even after the entrance of the Hebrews into Pal, their history for long is that of kindred tribes, rather than that of a nation. The leadership of Moses rested on personal, not on constitutional, authority, and was rendered precarious by the claims of family and of clan, as in the case of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram (Nu 16). The authority of Moses naturally extended to the administration of justice, as well as to matters pertaining to war and religion. The appointed officers to assist him in this judicial function (Ex 15 21 ff.), but the laws according to which they rendered judgment were those of custom and usage, not those of a written code. As among the tribal chieftains, important matters were referred to the leader, who, in case of doubt or in defect of recognized custom, resorted to the lot or to the oracle.

When the nomad tribes settled in Pal to become an agricultural people, there ensued a period of unrest due to the necessity for readjustment to changed conditions. The old tribal organization, admirably suited to the demands of primitive life, could no longer meet the conditions of the new environment entirely from within, but was unquestionably in large measure influenced by the institutions existing among the Canaanite population, only a part of which had been expelled by the invaders. When the tribal organization fell to pieces under the impact of a new influx of a powerful seminomadic element from a common ancestor, which was embodied in the accepted genealogies with their filiation of clans into tribes and of tribes into a nation, that which henceforth passed as a "tribe" was less an aggregation of kindred units than a geographical unit or group of units. The times were turbulent, disturbed by contending parties and by foes without the tribes. Then it was that there arose a class of chieftains of strongly marked character, called by a new name. The "judge" (ṣēpēh, shophēh) was not the ruler of a nation, but the chieftain of a tribe, winning and maintaining his authority by virtue of his personal prowess. The cases of Gideon and Abimelech (Jgs 8, 9) show that the authority of the "judge" was not hereditary. Agreeably to the generally changed conditions, the "elders" (זדפ, ḥēnaim), who were formerly heads of families or kindreds, now came, possibly under the influence of the Canaanite, to be constituted an aristocratic upper class, with certain functions as administrative officers and counselors. Cities also grew and acquired importance, so that the adjacent hamlets were subordinated to them, probably even ruled from them as executive centers. In all this there is a certain similarity to the process by which, in the period just preceding the beginning of real history, Athens became the metropolis of Attica, and conventional tribes supplanted those based on kinship, which were preserved in the Homeric period as the "Peoples" or "Clans." The demos led speedily to the appearance of the "tyrants." The high places of clans and tribes continued to be frequented, and certain "seers" (1 S 9:6 ff) enjoyed considerable prestige by virtue of their peculiar relation to the tribal gods.

While the succession of tribal chieftains and of the "judges" depended on personal qualifications, the principle of heredity is essential to the institution of monarchy, which could not, of course, be invoked in the appointment of Saul, the first king (1 Sam 9:17; 20:25, etc.); recorder, or promtory (1 K 4:3); king's counselor (2 S 16:12); and, perhaps, the king's friend (2 S 16:17; 18:16); overseer of taskwork (2 S 20:21); leader of the army (2 S 21:16); commander of the king's guards (7 S 22:18; 20:23).

The simplicity of Saul's rule was such as to make slight demands upon the resources of the people. He lived in the manner of a tribal chieftain on his ancestral estate, receiving from his subjects voluntary gifts (1 S 10:27; 16:20), and also, without doubt, his due share of the booty. Whether he instituted a regular tax (of 1 S 17:25) is not certain. With the growth and prosperity of the nation, David changed the character of the court, imitating in a measure the state of other oriental potentates. It is not clear whether he levied a regular tax, although it may be surmised that he had it in view, together with the regulation of taskwork, in ordering the census taken in his time (2 S 24:1 ff). We know that he received his portion of the booty (2 S 8:11; 12:30). The increasing luxury of Solomon's court required the imposition of additional taxes. It is probable that some income was derived from the imposition of crown lands (1 S 8:12), although the taskwork, which became extremely burdensome and subsequently provoked the secession of the Northern Kingdom, was chiefly applied to public works. The tribute of the subject peoples (1 K 9:26) was considerable (1 K 10:14). We now for the first time hear of taxes upon caravans and merchants, although it was in all probability a source of income even in the time of the nomad chieftains; there was also revenue from the carrying of the national merchant fleet (1 K 10:11,22) and from the trade in horses and chariots carried on with Egypt (1 K 10:28 ff). Solomon also divided his kingdom into twelve provinces commanded by princes, who should provide victuals for the king and his household: each prefect had to make provision for a month in the year (1 K 4:7 ff). It does not appear whether Judah, which is not included in the list of provinces, was as a mark of special favor exempted from this tax, or whether the omission is to be otherwise explained. The seizure of the vineyard of Naboth by Ahab (1 K 21) makes it seem not improbable that the property of persons condemned on certain charges might be confiscated by the representatives who thus became part of the royal establishment. It is to be noted that the sacerdotal or sacerdotal character of the king, which was merely an extension of his privileges as individual and head of a household, was not emphasized among the Hebrews to a like extent as among other oriental peoples; and the priests whom he appointed were perhaps in the first instance court chaplains, though in time they came to assume greater authority. The responsibility of the king for the public safety carried with it the obligation to guard the state treasures, to which the treasures of the temples were felt to belong; and it was his privilege to use them when necessary for defense. The levying of taxes, also, and the collection and use of revenues from various sources likewise fell of necessity to the king and his representatives.

(1) Royal prerogatives.—The history and functions of monarchy defined the prerogatives and duties of the king. Just as the head of the family, or the chieftain of a tribe, functioned as representative of those subjects to him in matters of religion, war, and the administration of justice, so also was it with the king. In all these spheres he was supreme, exercising not merely authority either personally or through representatives who thus became part of the royal establishment. It is to be noted that the sacerdotal or sacerdotal character of the king, which was merely an extension of his privileges as individual and head of a household, was not emphasized among the Hebrews to a like extent as among other oriental peoples; and the priests whom he appointed were perhaps in the first instance court chaplains, though in time they came to assume greater authority. The responsibility of the king for the public safety carried with it the obligation to guard the state treasures, to which the treasures of the temples were felt to belong; and it was his privilege to use them when necessary for defense. The levying of taxes, also, and the collection and use of revenues from various sources likewise fell of necessity to the king and his representatives.

(2) Officers.—In regard to the constitution of the king's court under Saul and David we learn comparatively little; even touching that of Solomon we are not informed, although we know that it must have been far removed from the original simplicity. We may classify the known officers as follows: (a) religious: priests (2 S 8:17; 20:23 ff); (b) household: cupbearer (1 K 10:5); master of the household (1 K 4:6), who probably was a eunuch (1 K 22:9 m; 2 K 8:6 m; 9:32); (c) state: scribe or clerk (2 S 17:20:25, etc.); recorder, or promtory (1 K 4:3); king's counselor (2 S 16:12); and, perhaps, the king's friend (2 S 16:17; 18:16); overseer of taskwork (2 S 20:21); leader of the army (2 S 21:16); commander of the king's guards (7 S 22:18; 20:23).
Conversely, the “elders of the people,” as the (albeit aristocratic) representatives of the communities, occasionally had a voice even in larger matters of state.

The principle of local autonomy was widely observed in the oriental states, which concerned themselves chiefly about political and military organization and about the collection of revenues. Hence there is no occasion for surprise on finding that the Jews enjoyed a large measure of autonomy during the period of their subjectation to other oriental powers. But during the exile they resorted, in matters of dispute, to their own representatives for judgment. Under Pers rule Pal formed part of the satrapy lying W. of the Euphrates and had, for a time, its own governor.

Ezra and Nehemiah endeavored to introduce a new code, which, after a period of perhaps two centuries, established a dual form of 5. After the government subject to the supreme Restoration authority of the Persian power. By the new code the secular officers were subordinated to the high priest, who thus virtually assumed the position of a constitutional prince, ruling under the Law. The “prince,” however, as the re tributary of the royal family, and the “elders of the people,” as the representatives of the communes, continued to exercise a certain limited authority.

Under the Gr rulers of Egypt and Syria the Jews continued to enjoy a large measure of autonomy, still maintaining in general the type of internal government formulated under the Greeks, as Ezra and Nehemiah. We now hear of a council of “elders” presided over by the high priest. The latter, appointed by the king, was recognized as such by both the Ptolemies and the Seleucids and held accountable for the payment of the tribute, for the execution of which he was, of course, empowered to levy taxes. The brief period of political independence under the Hasmonaeans (see ASMONAEANS) did not materially alter the character of the government, except that the high priest, who had long been a prince in everything but in name, now openly so styled himself. The council of the “elders” survived, although with slightly diminished authority. In other respects the institutions made itself felt.

When Pompey terminated the reign of the Hasmonaeans, the government still continued with little essential change. Following the example of the Gr kings, the Romans at first appointed the high priest to the “leadership of the nation.” He was soon, however, shorn for a time of his political dignity, the country being divided into five districts, each governed by its “synod”; but Caesar once more elevated the high priest to the office of ethnarch. Under Herod, the high priest and the synedrium (Sanhedrin), appointed or deposed at will as his interests seemed to require, lost much of their former prestige and power. After the death of Herod the land was again divided, and a procurator, subordinate to the governor of Syria, ruled in Judaea, having practical independence in his sphere.

In their internal affairs the Jews now, as under former masters, enjoyed a large measure of freedom. The high priest no longer exercised any political authority, the synedrium in whose favor he was a member, now gained in influence, being in fact an aristocratic council in many respects not unlike the Roman senate. It combined judicial and administrative functions, limited in the exercise of its authority only by the provision that its decisions might be reviewed by the procurator. (See GOVERNOR.) Naturally the outgoing jurisdictions were organized on the same model, each with its synedrium competent in local matters. The synedrium at Jerus served also as a governing board for the city.

GOVERNOR, guvْ-nәr-ә: The word “governor” is employed in EV in rendering a great variety of Heb and Gr words and presents, therefore, no consistent etymology. It is employed in the OT in various passages, notably the Pentateuch and the Psalms, to render such Hebrew terms as: "shahar, "leader." (2 Chron 1:11-12). The term is also used in the NT to render such words as: "senator," "senator," "proconsul," "proconsul," "architect," "architect," "president of the ban-quet." (Jn 2:5, ARV “ruler of the feast.”)

The word “governor” in EV renders almost equal variety of Gr words. GRACE, grá'ba. See AGASSA.

GRACE, grá:s; In the Eng. NT the word “grace” is always a tr of χάρις (charis), a word that occurs in 1 Gr text something over 170t. 1

1. The Word In secular Gr of all periods it is also a very common word, and in both Bib. and secular Gr it is used with far more meanings than can be represented by any one term in Eng. Primarily a pleasurable external appearance, “gracefulness,” “loveliness”; of the personification in “the Graces.” Such a use is found in Lk 4:22, where “wondered at the charm of his words” is a good tr; and similarly in Col 4:6. (b) Objectively charis may denote the impression produced by “gracefulness,” as in 3 In ver 4 ‘greater gratification have I none than this’ (but many MSS read charad, ‘joy’ here). (c) As a mental attribute charis may be tr by “graciously,” or, when directed toward a particular person or persons, by “favor to.” (d) As “favored of Jesus” in Lk 2:52, ‘in favor with God and men.’ (d) As the complement to this, charis describes the emotion awakened in the recipient of such favor, i.e. “gratitude.” So Lk 17:9 reads lit. ‘Has he gratitude to that servant?’ In a slightly transferred sense charis designates the words or expression in which gratitude is expressed, and so becomes “thanks” (some 10t, Rom 6:17, etc.). (e) Concretely, charis may mean the act by which graciousness is expressed, as in 1 Cor 16:9, where AV translates by “liberality,” and RV by “charity.” These various meanings naturally tend to blend into each other, and in certain cases it is difficult to fix the precise meaning that the writer meant the word to convey, a confusion that is common to both NT and secular Gr. In secular Gr the word has a still larger variety of meanings that scarcely concern the theologian.

2. Grace as Power It is at least as legitimate to try to construct on the basis of all the occurrences of the word a single doctrine that will account for all the various usages. That one word could express both “favor, grace,” and “thankfulness for blessings” was doubtless felt to be a mere accident, if it was thought of at all. But, none the less, the very plasticity of the word enabled it to receive still another—new and technically Christian—meaning. This seems to have originated in the attempt by fusing together two of the ordinary significances. In the first place, as in (a) above, charis may mean “a gift.” In 1 Cor 16:3; 2 Cor 8:19 it is the money given by the Corinthians to the Jerusalem Church. In 1 Cor 9:8 it is the increase of worldly goods that God grants for charitable purposes. In 2 Cor 1:15 it is the benefit received by the Corinthians from a visit by St. Paul. In a more spiritual sense charis is the endowment for an office in the church ( Eph 4:7), more particularly for the apostolate (Rom 1:7; 12:3; 15:15; 1 Cor 3:10; Eph 3:20). So in 1 Cor 4:7; 2 Thess 2:7 charis is expanded into “word and all knowledge,” endowments with which the Corinthians were esp. favored. In 1 Cor 16:14, the future “inexhaustibly blessedness that Christians are to receive; in 3:7 it is the present gift of “life.” In the second place, charis is the word for God’s favor, a sense of the term that is esp. refined by St. Paul (see below). But God’s favor differs from man’s in that it cannot be conceived of as inactive. A favorable “thought” of God’s about a man involves of necessity the reception of some blessing by that man, and “to look with favor” is one of the commonest Bib. paraphrases for a bestowal of a blessing. Between “God’s favor” and “God’s favors” there exists a relation of active power, and as charis denoted both the favor and the favors, it was the natural word for the power that connected them. This use is very clear in 1 Cor 15:10, where St. Paul says, “not I, but the grace of God which was with me” labored more abundantly than they all; grace is something that labors. So in 2 Cor 12:9, “My grace is sufficient for thee: for my power is made perfect in weakness;” of 2 Tim 2:1, “strengtheneth.” In Eph 3:20, “stewards of the manifold grace.” Evidently in this sense “grace” is almost a synonym for the Spirit (see Holy Spirit), and there is little real difference between “full of the Holy Spirit” and “full of grace and power” in Acts 6:8, while there is a very striking between Eph 4:7-13 and 1 Cor...
12 4-11, with "gifts of grace" in the one passage, and "gifts of the Spirit" in the other. And this connection between grace and the Spirit is found definitely in the formula "Spirit of grace" in He 10 20 (cf. Zech 1 11, 12). It is from this sense of the word that the Catholic doctrine of grace developed.

This meaning of charis was obtained by expanding and combining other meanings. By the opposite process of narrowly restricting 3. Grace in one of the meanings of the word, it justification came again into Christian theology as a technical term, but this time in a sense quite distinct from that just discussed. The formation of this special sense seems to have been the work of St. Paul. When charis is used with the meaning "favor," nothing at all is implied as to whether or not the favor is deserved. So, for instance, in the NT, when in 2 2 52 it is said that "Jesus advanced ... in favor with God and men," the last possible thought is that Our Lord did not deserve this favor. Cf. also Lk 2 40 and Acts 2 57; as less clear cases, Lk 1 30; Acts 7 46; He 4 16; 12 15,18. But the word has another popular Christian sense, as favor, and St. Paul seized on this meaning of the word to express a fundamental characteristic of Christianity. The basic passage is Rom 11 5-6, where as a definition is given, "If it is by grace, it is no more of works: and if it is of works, it is no more of grace." That the word is used in other senses could have caused no 1st.-cent. reader to miss the meaning, which, indeed, is unmistakable. "Grace" in this sense is an attitude on God's part that proceeds entirely from within Him and is not conditioned in any way by anything in the objects of His favor. So in Rom 4 4. If salvation is given on the basis of what a man has done, then salvation is given by God as the payment of a debt. But when faith is reckoned for what it is not, i.e. righteousness, there is no claim on man's part, and he receives as a pure gift something that he has not earned. (It is quite true that faith involves moral effort, and so may be thought of as a sort of "work"; it is quite true that faith does something as a preparation for receiving God's further gifts.) In salvation this is made quite plain in the exegetical issue to bring these ideas in here, as they certainly were not present in St. Paul's mind when the verses were being written.) "Grace," then, in this sense is the antonym to "works" or to "law"; it is a simple gift of God (Rom 5 20; 6 1), and has almost exactly the same sense as "mercy." Indeed, "grace" here differs from "mercy" chiefly in connoting eager love as the source of the act. See justification. Of course it is this sense of grace that dominates Rom 3-6, esp. in the thesis 3 24, while the same use is found in Gal 2 21; Eph 2 5-8; 2 Tim 1 9. The same strict sense underlies Gal 1 6 and is found, less sharply formulated, in Tit 3 5-7. (Gal 5 4 is perhaps different.) Outside of St. Paul's writings, his definition of the word seems to be adopted in Jn 1 17; Acts 15 11; He 13 9, while a perversion of this definition in the direction of antinomianism is the subject of the invective in Jude 4. And of course, it is from the word in this technical Pauline sense that the elaborate Protestant doctrine of grace has been developed.

A few special uses of the word may be noted.

That the special blessing of God on a particular undertaking (Acts 14 26; 15 40) shows 4. Special Uses that the technical sense of "grace" needs no explanation. In Lk 6 33-34, and 1 Pet 2 19, 20, charis seems to be used in the sense of "that which deserves the thanks of God," i.e. a specifically Christian act as distinguished from an act of "natural morality." "Grace for grace" in Jn 1 16 is a difficult phrase, but an almost exact is in Philo (Postcr, Cain, 43) may fix the sense as "benefit on benefit." But the tendency of the NT writers is to combine the various meanings of the word, known, it is particularly well illustrated in 2 Cor 8, 9. In these two chapters the word occurs 101, but in so many different senses as to suggest that St. Paul is consciously playing with the term. Charis is the money given to the Jerusalemites by the Corinthians (8 19), it is the increase of goods that God will grant the Corinthians (9 8), it is the disposition of the givers (8 6), it is the power of God that has wrought this disposition (8 1; 9 14), it is the act of Christ in the Incarnation that contrast the distinction between "God's grace" and "Christ's act" in He 2 9, it is the thanks that St. Paul renders (2 Cor 9 15). That all a Christian is and all that he has is God's gift could have been stated of course without the use of any special term at all. But in two of these two chapters St. Paul has taught this truth by using for the various ideas always the same term and by referring to this term to God at the beginning and the end of the section. That is, to the multiplicity of concepts there are a spiritual unity, corresponding to the unity given the multiple aspects of man's life by the thought of entire dependence on God. So charis, "grace," becomes almost an equivalent for "Christianity," viewed as the religion of dependence on God and more grace, i.e., a kind of entering Christianity, abiding in it, or falling from it, so one may speak of entering into (Rom 6 2), abiding in (Acts 13 43), or falling from (Gal 5 4) grace; of 1 Pet 5 12. So the teaching of Christianity, i.e. the sum of its ideas, is a gospel of grace (Acts 14 3; 20 24-32). So "grace and peace" with you closes the Epistles as a sufficient summary of all the blessings that can be wished Christian readers. At the beginning of the Epistles the words "grace and peace" are usually added, but this is due only to the influence of the Jewish greeting "peace be with you" (Lk 10 5, etc.), and not to any reflection on "grace" and "peace" as separate things. (It is possible that the Gr use of charitn, "rejoice," as an epistolary salutation [so in Jas 1 1] influenced the Christian use of charis. But that "grace and peace" was consciously regarded as a universalistic combination of Jewish and gentile custom is altogether unlikely.) The further expansion of the introductory formula by the introduction of "mercy," as in Acts 7 16 and 2 Tim 1 17 is quite without theological significance.

In the Gr Gospels, charis is used in the words of Christ only in Lk 6 32-34; 17 9. As Christ spoke in Aram., the choice of this word is due 5. Teaching to St. Luke, probably under the influence of Christ's use of its common Christian use in his own day. And there is no word in Our Lord's recorded sayings that suggests that He employed habitually any special term to denote grace in any of its senses. But the ideas are unambiguously present. That the pardon of sins is a free act on God's part may be described as an essential in Christ's teaching, and the lesson is taught in all manner of ways. The giving of an unmerited grace (Lk 15 20), the publican without merit to urge (Lk 18 13), the sick who need a physician (Mk 2 17), they who hunger and thirst after righteousness (Mt 6 6), these are the ones for whom God's pardon is inexhaustible. And positive blessings, but a temporal blessing, are to be looked for from God, with perfect trust in Him who clothes the lilies and knows how to give good gifts to His children (Mt 7 11; here Lk 11 13 has "Holy Spirit" for "gifts," doubtless a Lukan interpretation, but certainly a correct one). Indeed, it is not too much to say that Christ knows but one unpars

Grace Gravity

Donable sin, the sin of spiritual self-satisfaction—"That which is exalted among men is an abomination in the sight of God" (Lk 16:15; cf Lk 17:7-10; Mt 20:1-16).

There is no word in Heb that can represent all the meanings of charis, and in the LXX charis itself is used, practically, only as a tr of the

6. In the OT Heb ḥĕn (חֶנֶּן), "favor," this restriction of meaning being due to the desire to represent the same word by the same Gr word as far as possible. And ḥĕn, in turn, is used chiefly only as far as the phrase "find favor" (Gen 6:8, etc.), whether the reference is to God or men, and without theological import. Much nearer St. Paul's use of charis is ἀδόκιμος (ἀδόκιμος), "acceptance," in such passages as Isa 56:10, "in my favor have I had mercy on thee"; Ps 44:3, "not...by their own sword...but...because thou wast favorable unto them." Perhaps still closer parallels can be detected in the use of ἰκανίας (ἰκανίας), "kindness," "mercy," as in Ex 20:6, etc. But, of course, a limitation of the sources for the doctrine to passages containing the only term, or which would be altogether unjust.

The main lines seem to be these: (1) Technically, salvation by grace in the NT is opposed to the OT doctrine of salvation by works (Rom 3:10, 11). This is, what the same thing, by law (Rom 6:14; Js 1:17); i.e., one thought of as parties to a contract, to be fulfilled by each independently. Most of the legislation seems to presuppose some idea of man as a quantity quite outside of God, while Dt 30:11-14 states explicitly that the law is not too hard nor too far off for man. (2) Yet even this legalism is not without important modifications. The keeping of the law is man's work, but that man has the law to keep for something for which God only is to be thanked. Ps 119 is the essence of legalism, but the writer feels overwhelmed throughout by the greatness of the mercy that disclosed such statutes to men. After all, the initial (and vital!) act is God's not man's. This is stated most sharply in Ezek 33:1-4—Oholibah and her sister became God's, not because of any virtue in them, but in spite of most revolting conduct. Cf Dt 7:7, etc. (3) But even in the most legalistic passages, an absolute liberty keeps the law in view and not even in a passage as Nu 15:30-31 made a condition of salvation. The thought of transgression is at all times tempered with the thought of God's pardon. The whole sacrificial system, in so far as it is explained, is regrowth of God's grace, and it is something in place of legal obedience, while the passages that offer God's mercy without demanding even a sacrifice (Isa 1:18; Mic 7:18-20, etc.) are countless. Indeed, in Ezek 16, 20, 23, mercy is promised to a nation that is spoken of as hardly even desiring it, a most extreme instance. (4) But a mere negative granting of pardon is a most deficient definition of the OT idea of God's mercy, which delights in conferring positive benefits. The gift to Abraham of the land of Canaan, liberation from Egypt, food in the wilderness, salvation from enemies, deliverance from exile—all of Israel's history can be felt to be the record of what God did for His people through no duty or compulsion, grateful thanksgiving for such unmerited blessings filling, for instance, much of the Psalter. The hearts of men are in God's keeping, to receive from Him the impulse toward what is right (1 Ch 29:18, etc.). And the promise is made that the God who has manifested Himself as a forgiving Father will in due time take toward His children back works in them actual righteousness (Isa 1:26; 4:3; 33:1-8; 32:24; Jer 31:33-34; Ezek 36:25-26; Zec 8:11; Dn 9:24; Ps 51:10-12) With this promise—for the OT always a matter of the future—the OT teaching passes into that of the NT.

Most of the discussions of the Bib. doctrine of grace have been faulty in narrowing the meaning of "grace" to some special sense, and then

7. Summary endeavoring to force this special sense on all the Bib. passages. For instance, Roman Catholic scholars, starting with the meaning of the OT word in (say) Ps 89, have made Rom 3:24 state that men are justified by the infusion of Divine holiness into them, an interpretation that utterly ruins St. Paul's argument. On the other hand, Protestant extremists have tried to reverse the process and have argued that grace cannot mean anything except favor as an attitude, with results that are equally disastrous from the exegetical standpoint. And a confusion has resulted that has prevented men from seeing that the Bible passages which the extremists narrowing the meaning of grace to some special sense, the Rom 3:24 statement is not, the Bible teaching. The kingdom of heaven is reserved for those who become as little children, for those who look to their Father in loving confidence for every benefit, whether it be for the pardon so freely given, or for the gifts and blessings which God works in them both to will and to do.

BIBLIOGRAPHY.—All the Bib. theologies contain full discussions of the subject; for the NT the closest definitions are given by Bernard Weiss. But for the meaning of "grace" in any particular place the commentaries must be consulted. Exegetes usually agree that raising above the level of discussions that argue too closely from what may seem to be individual passages.

GRACIOUS, grā' shus (גָּרָשׁ, hānān; χάρις, charis): In general, the word means "to favor," "to show kindness" to an inferior and "to be compassionate." All OT passages are derived from the same root, and yet there are two evident shades of meaning derived from it. (1) As above, "favorable" or "cautious," "to cause to be g.," as "Jeh make his face to shine upon thee, and be g. unto thee" (Nu 6:25); "And the Lord was g. unto them" (2 K 13:23 AV); "The Lord is g. and full of compassion" (Ps 145:8 AV). (2) "To be merciful," "winsome," or "attractive," as applied particularly to persons and things. Used thus 3t in the OT and once in the NT. "A g. woman retaineth honor" (Prov 11:16 AV; cf Eccl 10:12 and Lk 4:29).

The word is used once in the NT from root of Gr word χάρις, charis, meaning "useful" as a benefit: "if ye have tasted that the Lord is g." (1 Pt 2:3).

In the main, however, the adj. is applied in the OT to Jeh, as indicative of His favor and mercy, His long-suffering and general inclination of favor and kindness.

GRAFF, graft (γυγεντρίς, egkentríza; RV GRAFT; AV GRAFT): The word occurs 6 t in Rom 11. Paul assumed that those living about Rome were familiar with the process of grafting olive trees, for olive culture had been adopted by the Greeks and Romans in Paul's time. The wild olive trees (Arab. coloquial, zeitān beerti) are cut back, slits made on the freshly sawed branch ends, and two or three grafts from a cultivated olive (Arab. colloquial, zeitān joufū) are inserted in such a way that the bark of the branch coincides with the exposed ends are smeared with mud made from clay, and then bound with cloth or date straw, which is held by thongs made from the bark of young mulberry branches. The fruit thus obtained is good. Wild olives cannot be made cultivated olives by ingrafting, as Paul implies (ver 25), but a wild olive branch thus grafted would thrive. So Gentiles would flourish spiritually when grafted into the fulness of God's mercy, first revealed to the world through Israel.

GRANARY, grán'-a-ri. See Garner; Storehouses.

GRAPES, grāps. See Vine.

GRAPEs, WILD (βυσσίνια, b'w'si'nia, Isa 5 24). A word closely allied to βυσσός, bo'sós, Job 31 40, tr4 “cockle” (which see). It implies something noisome or worthless, but no particular fruit.

GRASP, grasp: The word ἀργώρυς, karpowdmos (Phil 2 6), is rendered by AV “robbery,” by RV “a prize,” and by ARV “a thing is grasped.” By derivation the term may denote either an act of seizing or the aim or result of the action. In the context Paul is discussing, not Christ’s opinion of His equality with God, but His amazing self-sacrifice in laying aside His equality for our sakes. He treated it not as a treasure to be held for Himself, but laid it aside for us. It is better to render with RV “a prize.”

GRASS, gras:

(1) קֶש, kesh, from root meaning “greenness”; cf Arab. Khudara, which includes grasses and green vegetables (1 K 18 5; 2 K 19 26; Job 40 15; Ps 104 11, etc.). Isa 15 6 is tr4 in AV “hay,” RV “grass”; Prov 27 25, EV “hay,” m Heb “grass.” Nu 11 5 EV translates “leeks.” It is a term for herbage in general.

(2) נֶש, nesh, from root meaning “to sprout abundantly.” Generally tr4 “tender grass” (Gen 1 11; 2 23 4; Job 6 5; Isa 16 6; 66 14; Jer 14 5, etc.); tr4 “grass” (Job 8 6; Jer 14 6); tr4 “herb” (2 K 19 26; Ps 27 2; Isa 37 27; 66 14). In Jer 50 11 we have “heifer at grass” (neshéh) in AV and RVm, but in RV “heifer that treadeth out the grain.” נֶש, neshéh, the Aram. form, occurs in Dtn 4 15 23, and is tr4 “tender grass.”

(3) פֶש, peshesh, probably “dry” or “cut grass;” cf Arab. بُحِشَاء, bhasha, “dry fodder” or “cut grass” (Isa 5 24, AV “chaff,” RV “dry grass”; 33 11, EV “chaff”).

(4) פֶש, pes, lekasch, from root meaning “to come late,” hence used in Am 7 1 for the latter growth of grass after mowing.

(5) פֶש, pes, yerek, lit. “green thing” (Nu 22 4, elsewhere tr4 “herb”).

(6) פֶש, pes, tsedek (Dtn 11 15, etc.), generally tr4 “herb” (for [5] and [6] see Hebr).

(7) ἄθροον, chérōs (Mt 6 30; 14 19; Mk 6 39; Lk 12 28; Jn 6 10; Jas 1 10 11, 1 Pet 1 24; Rev 8 7; 9 4); tr4 “blade” (Mt 13 26; Mk 4 28); tr4 “hay” (1 Cor 3 12).

There are 243 species of true grasses (N.O. Gramineae) in Pal, but Heb, like modern Arab., does not discriminate between these and other herbs which together make up herbage. Actual turf is practically unknown in Pal, and grass seed is not artificially sown; young green barley is used in the neighborhood of towns as fresh fodder for horses and cattle. It is not the native custom to cut herbage for hay, though the writer has seen many carloads of sweet-smelling hay being carried from the land by Circassian settlers, E. of the Jordan.

The “grass upon the house tops” (Ps 129 6; Isa 27 27), the growth which springs from the seeds mingled with the mud of which the roof is made, springs up quickly with the rains, but as quickly dries up before it reaches half its normal height—or not infrequently is set fire.

Dew, rain or showers upon the grass are mentioned (Dt 32 6; Prov 19 12; Mic 5 7; Ps 72 6, “rain upon the mown grass,” i.e. the grass eaten short by cattle).

GRATE, grát, GRATING, grá'ting (םָּדַר, mikh-bár, מָדַר), resheb; AV Grate: This “grating of network of brass” (Ex 27 4; 38 4), called also “the net” (27 4), and “grating of brass” (38 4), was that reticulated casting or wrought work of bronze which, in the tabernacle system, formed an element of the altar of sacrifice. Its position is well defined: “Thou shalt put it under the ledge round the altar beneath, that the net may reach halfway up the altar” (27 3; cf 38 4). The altar being a hollow box—“hollow with planks” (27 8)—3 cubits high, overlaid with brass, and presumably filled with stones, there appears to have been a ledge round about it halfway from the base, from which depended vertically this grating of bronze. On the grating were four rings through which the staves were passed by which the altar was borne (27 4 7). If the ledge was for the priests to stand on while handling the sacrifices on the altar, the grating need be thought of only as an ornamental support for the ledge. Others ascribe to it different uses.

GRAVE, gráv. See Burial.

GRAVE (adj.). See Gravity.

GRAVE, GRAVING, gráv'ing. See Crafts; Engraving.

GRAVEL, gravel (בּוּשָם, bosham, from root בּוּש, bosh, “to divide.” Kindred roots have the meaning of “to cut,” “to hew,” “to sharpen,” hence בּוּש, bow, “arrow” [2 K 13 17; Ps 64 7 and often]; cf Arab. حِجَض, haqga, “to fall to the lot of,” حِجَض, “portion”): In Prov 20 17, we have:

“Bread of falsehood is sweet to a man:
But afterwards his mouth shall be filled with gravel.”

And in Lam 3 16:

“He hath also broken my teeth with gravel stones; he hath covered me with ashes.”

The only other occurrence of the word is in Ps 77 17, where it is the equivalent of בּו, bow, “arrow” (see supra):

“The clouds poured out water;
The skies sent out a sound:Thine arrows also went as lead.”

Prov 20 17 and Lam 3 16 both suggest the frequent occurrence of grit in the course broad, the source of the grit being not necessarily the grindstone, but possibly even small stones originally mingled with the wheat and never properly separated from it.

GRAVITY, gráv'i-té (γερατής, semdotés): The word, meaning properly “venerableness,” “sanctity,” is used in 2 Mac 3 12 of the “sanctity” of the temple. In 1 Tim 3 4 the writer declares that a characteristic of a bishop should be that he has "the children of his objectification." Titus enjoins (2 T T) in his "doctrine" (teaching) to show "incorruptness, g., sound speech (RV), that cannot be condemned" (cf 1 Tim 3 8). In 1 Tim 2 2 the same word is tr 4 "honesty" (RV "gravity"), "that we may lead a tranquil and quiet life in all goods" (cf 10 2). A better word of seminatness might be "dignity or "dignified seriousness" (Olshausen), which quality is necessary, both on the part of parents in relation to their children, if they are to be properly trained, and on the part of preachers and teachers, if their "doctrine" is to be worthily represented. All mere lightness of demeanor (the opposite of gravity) tells against the great trusts committed to both parents and teachers (cf 1 Tim 3 11; Tit 2 2). Such "gravity" or "dignified seriousness" ought indeed to characterize Christian demeanor in general, as in 1 Tim 2 2 above.

GRAY, græ. See Colors; Hoary.

GREASE, græs (lical, ἁδεβ, "fat," "suet"): The word occurs once in the metaphorical sense "prosperous," then dull, gross, brutal: Their heart is as fat as grease" (Ps 119 70; cf Isa 6 10, and see FAIR).

GREAT, græ, GREATNESS, græt'nes: "Great" occurs very often in Scripture. The chief words so t 4 are Ĥadôh, ḫôb, rahb; μῦσω, μέγας, πολύς, polis.

(1) In the OT many other terms are employed:
(a) ḥâḏâh is used to express greatness in various senses, chiefly of magnitude, including excellence, e.g. "great lights" (Gen 1 16); "the great city"
(10 12); "a great nation" (12 2); "a great sight" (Ex 3 3); "Moses was very great" (11 3); "the great God" (Dt 10 17; Neh 1 5); "great is Jehu" (Ps 48 1). It is sometimes tr 4 by "mighty" (Dt 4 37; 7 21, "a mighty God," RV "great"). It is e also used to designate the high priest (lit. "great," Lev 21 10; Zec 3 1, etc); also to express the "elder" of a family, e.g. Gen 27 1, "Ezau his eldest son," RV "elder"; probably also of great stature:
"a great man among the Anakims," RV "the greatest" (Josh 14 15). (b) rob denotes, rather, quantity, number, therefore, often, "many" (Gen 21 34, etc); "a multitude" (Ex 33 11). (c) Eôb (Ex 36 15, Num 12 2); see similar terms: thus we have "a great people" (Josh 17 14); "His miracles are great," RV "many" (2 S 24 14; 1 Ch 21 13);
"Great was the company," RV "a great host" (Ps 89 11); "great reward" (Ps 19 11); "Mine inlenity, a-, is great" (25 11); "exceedingly" (Ps 123 3). In the LXX robh is, for the most part, t 4 by polus. But it is used for "great" in other senses, e.g. "the great [God]" (Prov 26 20), RV "as t was the most Hispanic" (Heb text obscure);
"a saviour, and a great one," RV "defender," in"or a mighty one" (Isa 19 20); "Great shall be the peace" (Isa 56 13, etc). It is sometimes tr 4 "mighty" (Ps 69 50; RVm "many”; Isa 35 3). (d) Other terms thus are kâôdêd, "heavy", e.g. "so great a people," RV "very great people,
m "heavy" (1 K 3 9); moŷôth, implying force, eight, e.g. "with all his might" (2 K 23 25).
Él and Élôhím are sometimes used to express greatness. In Ps 36 6, we have "Thy righteousness is as the mountains," RV "as the mountains of God"; in Gen 30 8, "with great [Élôhím] wrestlings," RV "mighty," m "wrestlings of God" and in 1 S 14 15 "a very great [Élôhím] trembling," RV "exceeding great," m "a trembling of God.

(2) a Mégas denotes magnitude, in its various signifies, physical, moral, etc, e.g. "great joy" (Mt
2 10); "a great light" (Mt 4 16); "the great King" (5 35); "in the kingdom" (5 19, etc); "Great is thy faith" (15 28); "The great is charity" (love), RVm "greater" (1 Cor 13 13); "a great high priest" (He 4 14); "the great shepherd" (13 20); "a great voice" (Rev 1 10); in Rev much is very frequent. (b) Polus denotes properly number, multitude, e.g. "great multitudes" (Mt 4 25); "a great company" (Lk 5 29); RV "a great multitude" frequent in the Gospels; "great possessions" (Rom 10 20) is the sense of multitude, e.g. "great plainness of speech," RV "holliness" (2 Cor 3 12; 7 4); "a great trial of affliction," RV "much proof" (8 2); "great love" (Eph 2 4). (c) Among other terms we have tôôkôôs, "so great" (in degree), "so great a savalation" (He 2 3); tòôdôôs, "so great" (in quantity),
"so great faith" (Mt 8 10; Lk 7 9); "so great a cloud of witnesses" (He 12 1); àôôs, "how great" in (quantity) (Mt 8 19) and héôôs, "how great"
(in degree) (Col 2 1; Isa 3 5); "how great a matter," RV "how much wood," m "how great a forest"; plâôôkôs, "how great" (in degree) (He 7 4); àôôs, "how great" (in quantity) (Mt 6 23), etc.

(3) In His person and teaching, Jesus introduced into the world a new conception of greatness.
It was to be found in humility and self-forgetting service: Whosoever would become great among you shall be your minister (RVm "servant"); and whosoever will be first among you shall be your servant (RVm "Gr bond-servant"); even as the Son of man came not to be ministered unto, but to minister, and to give his life a ransom for many" (Mt 20 26-28; cf also Mt 18 1-4; 23 11; Phil 2 5-11).

GREAVES, grævz. See Armor, Arms, IV, 4.

GRECIANS, græ'zhanz, GREEKS, græks: In the OT the word "Greeks" occurs but once (Job 3 4 6). For references to Greeks in the OT see Javan. In AV of the OT Apoc "Greeks" and "Greeks" are used without distinction, e.g. 1 Mac
10 1; 6 2; 8 9; 2 Mac 4 15.36. Thus in 1 Mac 1 1, Alexander the Great is spoken of as king of Greece and in 1 Mac 9 15, the Macedonian empire is called "the kingdom of the Greeks" (βασιλεία Ἐλλήνων, βασιλεία Ἑλληνική). In 2 Mac 13 2 the army of Antiochus, king of Syria, is called "Grecian" (βασιλεία Ἑλληνική, διάνοια Ἑλληνική), and in 2 Mac 6 8 the "Greek cities" (Ῥώμαι Ἑλλήνες, πόλεις Ἑλληνίδαι) are Macedonian colonies. Reference is made in 2 Mac 6 1 to an aged Athenian who was sent by Antiochus the king charged with the duty of Hellenizing the Jews; in 2 Mac 9 15 Antiochus vows that he will make the Jews equal to the Athenians; in 1 Mac 12 14 reference is made to negotiations of Jonathan, the high priest, with the Spartans, whom he calls brethren, seeking the renewal of a treaty of alliance and amity against the Syrians. With the mouth of Gr power and influence, everything not specifically Jewish was called Gr; thus in 2 Mac 4 36; 11 2; 3 Mac 3 8 the "Greeks" contrasted with the Jews are simply non-Jews, so called because of the prevalence of Gr institutions and culture, and "Greek" even came to be used in the sense of "anti-Jewish" (2 Mac 4 10 15; 6 9; 11 24).

In Isa 9 12 the LXX reads τῶν Ἑλλήνων, τοις Ἑλνέασι, ἕνας Ἑλλήνα, πληθύν, "Philistines", but we are not therefore justified in assuming a racial connection between the Philis and the Greeks.
Further light on the ethno-graphy of the Mediterranean basin may in time show that there was actually such a connection; but the rendering in question means nothing, since the ‘overpressing sword’ of Jer 46 16 and 50 16 is likewise rendered in the LXX with “the sword of the Greeks” (μαχαίρα Ἐθνικής, μαχαίρα Ἑλληνικῆς). In all these cases the translators were influenced by the conditions existing in their own day, and were certainly not disclosing obscure relations long forgotten and newly discovered.

In the NT, EV attempts to distinguish between Ἐθνὲς (Hellenes), which is rendered “Greeks,” and Ἑθνικός (Ἑλληνικός), which is rendered “Greeksian” or “Greecan descent” (Ἑλληνικὲς), e.g. Acts 6 1; 9 29. These latter were Jews of the Dispersion, who spoke Greek (see Hellenes; Hellenist), as distinguished from Palestinian Jews; but since many of the latter also spoke Gr by preference, the distinction could in no sense be absolute. Indeed in Jn 7 35, “the Dispersion among [RVm Gr of] the Greeks,” can hardly refer to any but “Grecian Jews” (Ἑλληνικός), although Hellenes is used, and in Jn 12 20 the ‘Greeks’ (Hellenes), who went up to worship at the feast of the Passover were almost certainly “Grecian Jews” (Ἑλληνικός). Thus, while EV consistently renders Ἑλληνικός with “Greeks,” we are not by that rendering apprised of the real character of the people so designated, and thus it is not infrequently rendered by the fact, already noted in connection with the OT Apoc, that, in consequence of the spread of Hellenism, the term Ἑλληνικός was applied not only to such as were of Hellenic descent, but also to all those who had appropriated the language, Graecia, as the Portuguese means of communication, and the ideals and customs collectively known as Hellenism. The latter were thus in the strict sense Hellenists, differing from the “Grecians” of EV only in that they were not of Jewish descent. In other words, Hellenes (except perhaps in Jn 7 35 and 12 20, as noted above) is, in general, equivalent to ἡ θνῆ, “Gentiles” (see Gentiles). The various renderings of the MSS (and hence the difference between AV and RV) in 1 Cor 1 23 well illustrate this. There is consequently much confusion, which it is quite impossible, with our limited knowledge of the facts in particular cases, to clear up. In general, it would seem probable that where “Greeks” are comprehensively contrasted with “Jews” (Acts 10 25), as in Acts 14 1; 17 4; 18 14; 19 10.17; 20 21; Rom 1 16; 10 12; 1 Cor 1 22–24 (RV “Gentiles,” representing Ἠθνίκες, Ἑθνικοὶ); Gal 3 28; Col 3 11. In Mk 7 26 the woman of Tyre called “a Greek” (RVm “Gentile”), a Syriacism, was clearly not of Hellenic descent. Whether Titus (Gal 2 3) and the father of Timothy (Acts 16 1.3) were in the strict sense “Greeks,” we have no means of knowing. In Rom 1 14, “I am debtor both to Greeks and to Barbarians,” there is an undoubted reference to Greeks strictly so called; possibly, though by no means certainly, the “Greeks” of Acts 21 28, alluding to Trophimus the Ephesian (Acts 21 29), are to be taken in the same sense. References to the Gr language occur in Jn 19 20 (Lk 23 35 is properly omitted in RV); Acts 21 37; Rev 9 11.

In Acts 11 20 the MSS vary between Ἐθνικός, Ἑθνικός, and Ἐθνὲς, Ἑθνικός (AV “Greecan,” RV “Greeks”), with the preponderance of authority in favor of the former; but even if we adopt the latter it is not clear whether true Greeks or Gentiles are intended.

GREECE, grēs, GRAECIA, grēsha: In the earliest times there was no single nation universally and exclusively the mother of the people or of the land of Greece. In Homer, three appellations, Ἀχαιός, Ἀσσαλός (Danaios), Ἀργείος (Argelois), were with no apparent discrimination applied to all the Hellenes by the Homeric poets, who called Ionians. See IONIAN. The name Ἑλλήνης (Hellenes), which in historical times came into general use as a collective appellation, was applied in Homer to a small tribe in Thessaly. But the corresponding name Ἑλλῆς (Helleis) was not primarily a geographical term, but designated the abode of the Hellenes wherever they had their own states or cities. In the 4th cent. BC many felt, as did Locrates, that even “Helleis” stood not so much for a distinction in race, as for preeminence in learning, as RV, “Hellenist.” The word Ἑλληνικός (Hellenikos, Lat Grece) occurs in Aristotle, who says that it was an older name for those who were later called Hellenes. The meaning and truth of this statement are alike in doubt, but he probably refers only to the tribe inhabitating the vicinity of Ionia, in Ephesus. At any rate, Graeci and Graecia owed their introduction practically to the Romans with their contact with the Greeks in the war with Pyrrhus, and in consequence they included (what “Hellenes” and “Helleis” did not) all “Grecian,” as the land of the Hellenes, is used in a broad sense to include not only Greek proper, but also the islands of the Ionian and Adriatic seas, the seaboard of the Hellenic and Arian peninsulas, and as the name of those flourishing regions of Magna Graecia and Sicily, Crete, and occasionally Cyprus, Cyrene, and the scattered colonies dotting the shore of the Mediterranean, almost to the Pillars of Hercules. “Greece” however, was used in a more restricted sense as applying to “Continuous” (or continental) Greece, which forms the southern extremity of the Balkan peninsula. While the Romans included Macedonia and Epirus, it will be well for us to limit Greece to the territory lying roughly below 40°, and extending almost to 38° N. lat., and ranging between 17° and 23° E. long. If, as is proper, we include the immediately adjacent islands, its greatest length, from Mt. Olympus in the N. to Corfù in the S. is about 500 miles. Of the N. greatest breadth, from Cephallenia in the W. to Euboea in the E., is about 240 miles. The area, however, owing to the great irregularity of its contour, is far less than one might expect, amounting to about 20,000 square miles. Within an area three times considerably less than that of Portugal, Greece has a coastline exceeding in length that of Spain and Portugal combined. In Greece the ratio of coastline to area is 1:34, whereas that of the Iberian peninsula is 1:25.

The northern boundary of Greece is formed by an irregular series of mountain chains, beginning on the W. with the Acrocorinian range and continuing in Mt. Olympus structure on the N. extending southward to Mt. Tymphrestus (now, Velouchi, 7,610 ft.) in Aetolia, at which point spurs radiate through Central Greece. The highest peaks are Mt. Corax (now, Vardousia, 8,180 ft.) in Aetolia, Mt. Oeta (7,060 ft.), Parnassus (now, Lykaoura, 8,070 ft.), Helecon (now, Paio Ymnos, 5,740 ft.), Cithaeron (now, Elatus, 4,630 ft.), lying on the boundary between Boeotia and Attica, and Mt. Lysia (now, Makri Plaghi, 4,500 ft.), N. of the Isthmus, and, in Attica, Parnes (now, Oese, 4,640 ft.), Pentelicus (now, Mendel, 3,640 ft.) and Hymettus (now, 1295 GREECE, Greece, Graecia
The rainfall in Greece is not abundant and is confined largely to late autumn and winter. Whether the present rainfall difference has resulted from the progressive denudation of the mountains during the 5th cent. AD must be a subject of dispute in antiquity, however, the rivers of Greece were much like the streams of the 5th cent. It is not improbable that the rivers of Greece were dependent on the immediate rainfall. Among the rivers of Greece may be mentioned, in Northern Greece, the Peneius, with its tributaries, in Thessaly: the Central Greece, the Acheloos and the Evros, in Aetolia: the Sperches, and Oetaea, with the adjacent island of Euboea, on the E., separated by a group of lesser states, Aenis, Oetace, Doris, Locres and Phocis. Southern Greece is separated from Central Greece by the present isthmus of Corinth, which almost meet at the Isthmus of Corinth, and are now after repeated efforts, dating from the time of Julius Caesar, united by a sea-level canal, Megaritis, which, by its position, belongs to Central Greece, has been, in accordance with its position and the predilections, classed with Corinth, the keeper of the Isthmus, as belonging to Southern Greece. Facing the Corinthian Gulf, Achaia forms the northern division of the Peloponnesus, touching Elis, Arcadia and Argolis, which belt the peninsula in this order from W. to E. Arcadia is the only political division which does not have access to the sea, occupying as it does the great central plateau intersected by lesser ranges of varying height. The southernmost divisions, Messenia and Laconia, are deeply indented by the Messenian and Laconian Gulfs, and Laconia is separated from the peninsula of Argolis by the Argolic Gulf, all of which head somewhat W. of N. Of the subjacent islands, which a reasonable view must include in the boundaries of Greece, Euboea has already been mentioned; but we should add the group of great islands lying in the Ionian Sea, viz. Corea (now, Corfu), Leuks, Ithaca, Cephalonia (now, Cephalonia), Zacynthus (now, Zante) and Cephalus (now, Cerigo), at the mouth of the Laconian Gulf, as well as Salamis and Aegina in the Aegorean Gulf.

Greece was never, in ancient times, a united state, but consisted of a large number of separate states. These were essentially of two types, (a) city-states, in which a city dominated the adjacent territory.
whose free population constituted its citizenship, or (b) confederacies, in which neighboring cities or districts combined into political organizations which we may call federal states. These matters cannot, however, be discussed except in connection with the history of Greece, for which the reader must consult the standard works. It may be advisable here, however, to name the principal cities of Greece. Northern Greece had no great cities which developed as commercial centers. Aegina was the first to attain to special importance, then Corinth and Athens; Chalkis and Eretria, in Euboea, were for a time rich and prosperous, and Megara, in Megarid, and Argos, in Arcadia, became formidable rivals of Athens. Sparta, though never a commercial center, early won and long maintained the hegemony of Greece, for a while disputed by Athens, in virtue of her power as the home of the militant Dorian aristocracy, which was disastrously defeated by the Boeotians under Epaminondas, when Thebes, for a time, assumed great importance. Megalopolis, in Arcadia, enjoyed a brief prominence at the time of the Achaean League, and Corycya flourished in the 5th and 4th cent. B.C. We should also not fail to mention three great centers of Gr religion: Olympia, in Elis, as the chief sanctuary of Zeus; Delphi, in Phocis, as the oracular seat of Apollo; and Eleusis, in Attica, as the shrine which to which the pilgrims shrank to where all Greeks sought who were initiated in the mysteries. Delphi and Corinth also possessed a far-famed shrine of Hera, and Thermopylae and Calauria were the centers at which the councils of influential amphictyonies. Epidaurus was famous for her sanctuary of Asclepius. Delos, a little island in mid-Aegean, celebrated as a sanctuary of Apollo and as the meeting-place of a most influential amphictyon, falls without the limits of Greece proper; but Dodona, in Southern Epirus, should be mentioned as the most ancient and venerable abode of the oracle of Zeus. The Greeks, incorrigibly particularistic in politics, because of the almost insuperable barriers erected by Nature between neighboring peoples in the lofty mountain ranges, were in a measure united by their religion which, like the sea, another element making for intercourse and union, touched them at nearly every point.

For Greece in the OT, see JAVAN. In the NT "Greece" occurs but once—Acts 20 2—where it is distinguished from Macedonia.

LITERATURE

1. THE GREEK GODS.—The gods of ancient Greece are well known to our western civilization through the myths which have found so large a place in our literature. In Greek Myths itself, fancy had free play in dealing with these divine beings, and the myths were the main treasure-house from which the poet drew; the same myths and the same gods, under different names, reappear in Rome; and Rome passed them on, a splendid heritage of imagination, to the literatures of later Europe. It is characteristic of myths that they deal with persons, not so different from men in their nature, but with more than human powers. Gods, nymphs and satyrs, noble "heroes" or evil spirits have superhuman powers in varying degree, but they remain persons with a human interest because of their human type. And, further, as men are organized in families, cities and states, so there is a tendency to organize the beings of myth into social groups, and even to bring men, heroes and gods together into one large social organism, the universe of persons.

These Gr myths, the story of Athena's birth full-armed from the brain of Zeus, of Circe's magic potion, of Poseidon's chariot on the waves, and of Apollo's shafts are familiar to us from childhood. To regard them as expressing the content of Gr religion is as natural as it is false. Very few myths have any religious meaning at all, in spite of the large part the gods play in them. A little comparison with the facts of worship serves to show that here the gods are quite different from the gods of story. Some of the gods hardly appear in myths, and some of the beings worshipped in worship are not worshipped; in worship, each god is for the time being the only god thought of, not a member of the hierarchy established in myth; moreover in myth the gods are treated as universal, while the gods of worship are most closely attached, each to one shrine. Along with these external differences goes the one essential difference between a being of story and an object of worship. The failure to recognize the deep meaning of Gr religion results from the superficial assumption that myths constitute a peculiar kind of theology, when in reality they teach but little, and that, indirectly, about religion proper.

The essential fact about the gods of Gr religion is that each god was worshipped in a unique form at one or another particular shrine by a group of worshippers more or less definite. The group might include the state, the dwellers in one locality or simply the family; whatever its limits, it included those connected with the god by a social-religious tie, and the fundamental purpose of the worship was to strengthen this tie. In a city like Athens there were hundreds of such shrines, varying in importance, each the place where one particular phase of a god was worshipped at specified times. The particular form of the god was ordinarily indicated by an epithet attached to his name, Zeus Olimpios, Dionysus Eleutherios, Athena Nike. This epithet might refer to the locality of the worship (Aphrodite of the Gardens), to the center from which the worship was brought (Artemis Promachos), to some local spirit identified with the greater god (Poseidon Erechtheus), or to the nature of the god himself (Apollo Patroos). Each of the many shrines in Athens had thus its unique god, its group of worshippers connected with the god, its particular form of worship, its times of worship, its own officials.

While the state exercised general supervision over all the shrines, they were not organized in a hierarchy under any distinctly religious officials, but remained as independent units. Religious worship in a given city meant the aggregation of independent worshippers at the different local shrines.

The god of worship, then, was the god of a local shrine whose blessing and favor were sought at certain times by those who had the right to worship there. As in myth the gods were drawn after human types, of Worship that is, with human virtues and human frailties, and bodies almost human, except that they were not made to die; so in worship the gods were persons not unlike men in their nature. Worship proceeds on the assumption that gods are like human rulers, in that men honor the gods by games and processions, seek to please them by gifts, and ask them to share banquets made in their honor. Only the humanness of the gods in worship is something more subtle, more intimate than in myth. No stress is laid on human form or the vagaries of human character in the gods of worship; in form they remain spirits more or less vague, but spirits who care for men, who may be approached as a man approaches his ruler, spirits bound to man by close social ties which it is his duty and pleasure to strengthen. Zeus is father of gods and men, a father not untouched by the needs of his children; Athena cares for the city of Athens as her special pride; each family worships gods which are all but akin to the family; in the gymnasium, Apollo or Hermes is represented as the patron and ideal of the youths who exercise there; the drama is part of the service of Dionysus; in a word each form of human activity, be it work or pleasure, was a point of contact with the gods. The real forces at work in the world were first men, and secondly beings with a nature like man’s, but with powers superior to man’s; worship was the attempt to ally the gods more closely to man by social-religious ties, in order that as both worked together the ends of life might be successfully attained. This conception of the gods as higher members of society is the keynote of Gr religion. In some ethnic religions the gods seem to be evil beings whose desire for mischief man must overcome; in others they are beings to be avoided as much as possible; or again they are rulers who delight in man’s abject servitude; or again by cultivating the friendship of one god, man may hope to win blessing and avoid harm from the others. In Greece all the gods of worship were essentially friendly to man, because they were akin to him and a part of the society in which he lived.

The relation of the gods to Nature is not so simple as might at first appear. Within certain limits the forces of Nature were subject to the will of the gods. From the Gr point of view, however, the relation is much more intimate, in that the forces in the world, at least in so far as they affect man, are personal activities, activities that express the will of divine beings. We say that Poseidon personifies the sea, Gaia the earth, Helios the sun; and the origin of religion has been sought in man’s awe before the forces of Nature. The truer statement is that the Gr world, including the physical world, was made up of spiritual beings, not of physical forces. “The fire, as useful as it is treacherous, is the presence of Hephæstus; all the dangers and changes of nature are reflected in Poseidon and his followers; an Artemis is there to guide the hunter, a Demeter to make the grain sprout, a Hermes or Apollo to watch over the herds; Athena is the spirit of wisdom, Hermes of shrewdness, Poseidon of tumult ... In a word the Gr gods are in the world, not above the world, superior beings who embody in personal form all the forces that enter into human life.” The contrast between such a personal point of view and the mechanical view of modern science is as marked as the contrast between it and the Heb conception of a universe brought into being and controlled by a God quite distinct from the physical world.

Of the particular gods, little need be said. The five greater gods, Zeus, Hera, Athena, Apollo and Artemis, are not closely connected with any one phenomenon of Nature or human life, though Zeus has to do with the sky, and Apollo and Artemis acquire a connection with the sun and moon. The most important worship of Zeus was at Olympia, where the pan-Hellenic games were held in his honor. Elsewhere he was worshipped mainly in connection with the weather and the changing seasons. Apparently much of his preeminence in Gr thought was due to myth. Hera was worshipped with Zeus on mountain tops, but her special place in worship was as the goddess of marriage. Athena, the maiden goddess of war and of handicrafts, was worshipped esp. in Northern Greece. War dances found a place in her worship, and she was rarely represented without aegis, spear and helmet. All the arts, agriculture, handicrafts, even the art of government, were under her care. Apollo was worshipped widely as the protector of the crops, and of the shepherd’s flocks. In this aspect his festivals included purifications and rites to ward off dangers. He was also the god of music and of prophecy. At Delphi his prophetic powers won great renown, but the Pythian games with their contests in music, in rhythmic dancing, and in athletic sports were hardly less important. Artemis, in myth the chaste sister of Apollo, was worshipped as the queen of wild creatures and the mother of life in plants as well as in animals. She was the patron and the ideal of young women, as was Apollo of young men.
The gods most closely associated with Nature were not so important for religion. Gaia, mother earth, received sacrifices occasionally as the
8. Nature abode of the dead. Rhea in Crete, Gods Cybele in Asia Minor, also in origin of the earth-mother, received more real worship; this had to do primarily with the birth of vegetation in the spring, and again with its destruction by drought and heat. Rivers were honored in many places as gods of fertility, and springs as nymphs that blessed the land and those who cultivated it. Poseidon was worshipped that he might bless fishing and trade by sea; inland he was sometimes recognized as the “father of waters” and a god of fertility; and where horses were raised, it was under the patronage of Poseidon. The heavenly bodies marked the seasons of worship, but were rarely themselves worshipped. In general, the phenomenon of Nature seemed to have been too concrete to rouse sentiments of worship in Greece.

A third class of gods, gods of human activities and emotions, were far more important for religion.

Demeter, once no doubt a form of the original earth-goddess, was the goddess of the grain, worshipped widely.

9. Gods of Human Activity and Emotions people; Dionysus, god of souls, of the inner life, and of inspiration by divine power, was worshipped by all who cultivated the vine or drank wine. The Attic drama was the most important development of his worship. Hermes was quite generally honored as the god of shepherds and the god of roads. As the herald, and the god of trade and gain, he found a place in the cities. Aphrodite was perhaps first the goddess of the returning life of the spring; in Greece proper she was rather the goddess of human love, of marriage and the family, the special patron of women. Ares, the Thracian god of war, was occasionally worshipped in Greece, but more commonly the god of each state was worshipped to give success in battle to his people. Hephaestus, pictured as himself a lame blacksmith working at the art which was under his protection, was worshipped now as the fire, now as the patron of cunning work in metal. Aesculapius received men’s prayers for relief from disease.

II. Revelation: Inspiration.—For the Greeks revelation was a knowledge of the divine will in special circumstances, and inspiration was evinced by the power to foresee the divine purpose in a particular case. There is no such thing as the revelation of the divine nature, nor any question of universal truth coming to men through an inspired teacher; men knew a god through his acts, not through any seer or prophet. But some warning in danger or some clue to the right choice in perplexity might be expected from gods so close to human need as were the Gr gods. The Homeric poems deplore the gods as appearing to men to check them, to encourage them or to direct them.

In Homer also men might be guided by signs; while in later times divine guidance came either from signs or from men who were so close to the gods as to foresee something of the divine purpose.

The simplest class of signs were those that occurred in Nature. In the Iliad the thunderbolt marked the presence of Zeus to favor his friends or check those whose advance he chose to stop. The Athenian assembly adjourned when rain began to fall. Portents in Nature—meteors, comets, eclipses, etc.—claimed the attention of the superstitious; but there was no science of astrology, and superstition had no great hold on the Greeks. In the Homeric poems, birds frequently denoted the will of the gods, perhaps because their place was in the sky beyond any human control, perhaps because certain birds were associated with particular gods. The presence of an eagle on the right hand (toward the E.) was favorable, esp. when it came in answer to prayer. At times, the act of the bird is significant, as when the eagle of Zeus kills the gese eating grain in Odysseus’ hall—portent of the death of the suitors. In later Gr history there are but few references to signs from birds. The theory of these signs in Nature is very simple: all Nature but expresses the will of the gods, and when the gods wish to give men some vague hint of the future, it is necessary only to cause some event not easily explained to attract man’s attention.

From the 5th cent. on, divination by means of sacrificial victims took the place ordinarily of signs such as have just been described. In

2. Divination by Sacrifice was prevalent in the Gr world, and was offered before important undertakings, animals being killed and the parts of the victim consumed.

Sacrifice was burned freely and without disturbing the arrangement on the altar, success might be expected. The theory was very simple: if the gods were pleased and accepted the sacrifice, their favor was assured; but if the sacrifice deviated in any way from the normal, it would not please the gods. Thus any sacrifice might have prophetic significance, while sacrifices offered before important undertakings had special meaning. The practice arose of repeating sacrifices before a battle until a favorable one was obtained, and at length, as religion began to lose its hold, the time came when a general might disregard them completely.

An important means of learning the will of the gods was through dreams, when the ordinary channels of perception were closed and the mental barrier was free to receive the message from the gods. The treacherousness of dreams was fully recognized, even in the Homeric poem; students of natural science came to recognize that dreams arose from natural causes; none the less they were generally regarded as a source of knowledge about the future, and gradually a science for interpreting dreams was evolved. For Pindar and for Plato, the soul was more free when the body slept, and because the soul was the divine part of man's nature it could exercise the power of divination in sleep. Many of the recorded dreams are signs which came to the mind in sleep, like the dreams of Joseph and of Pharaoh, signs that needed later interpretation. See Divination; Dreams.

Prophets and seers were not as important in Greece as among many peoples. The blind Teiresias belongs to the realm of myth, though there were great families of seers, like the Iamidiæ at Olympia, who were specially gifted to interpret dreams, or signs from sacrifices. Ordinarily it was the 'chresomologist,' the man with a collection of ancient sayings to be applied to present events, whose advice was sought in time of need; or else men turned to the great oracles of Greece.

The most important oracle was that of Apollo at Delphi. Hither came envoys of nations 4. Oracles as well as individuals, and none went away without some answer to their questions. After preliminary sacrifices, the priestess purified herself and mounted the tripod in the temple; the question was propounded to her by a temple official, and it was her function also to put her wild ravings into hexameter verse for the person consulting the oracle. A considerable number of these answers remain to us, all, of course, somewhat vague, many of them containing shrewd advice on the question that was brought to the oracle. The honor paid to the oracle and its influence, on the whole an influence making for high ethical standards and wise statesmanship, must be recognized. The early Christian Fathers held that the Pythian priestess was inspired by an evil spirit; later critics have treated the whole institution as a clever device to deceive the people; but in view of the respect paid to the oracle through so many generations, it is hard to believe that its officials were not honest in their effort to discover and make known the will of the god they served.

III. Forms of Worship.—It has already been pointed out that Gr religion centered about local shrines. While in early times the

1. Shrines shrines consisted of an altar with perhaps a sacred grove, and later it might be no more than a block of stone on which offerings were laid, the more important shrines consisted of a plot of land sacred to the god, a temple or home for the god, and an altar for sacrifices. The plot of land, esp. in the case of shrines outside a city, might be very large, in which case it often was used as a source of income to the shrine, being cultivated by the priests or leased under restrictions to private persons. In the temple stood the temple, facing toward the E, so that the morning sun

2. Temples would flood its interior when it was opened on a festival day. With one or two exceptions, the temple was not a place of assembly for worshipers but a home for a god. It contained some symbol of his presence, after the 5th cent. BC ordinarily an image of the god; it served as the treasure-house for gifts brought to the god; worship might be offered in it by the priests, while the people gathered at the sacrifice outside. And as a home for the god, it was the god with all the beauty and magnificence that could be commanded. The images of the gods, the noblest creation of sculpture in the 5th and 4th cents., were not exactly "idols"; that is, the images were not themselves worshipped, even though they were thought to embody the god in some semblance to his true form.

In Greece men worshipped the gods themselves, grateful as they were to artists who showed them in what beautiful form to think of their deities.

Each of these shrines was directly in the hands of one or more officials, whose duty it was to care for the shrine and to keep up its worship in due form. Occasionally the priesthood was hereditary and the office was held for life; quite as often priests were chosen for a year or a term of years; but it was exceptional when the duties of the office prevented a man from engaging in other occupations. In distinction from the priests of many other forms of religion, the Gr priest was not a sacred man set apart for the service of the gods; the office may be called sacred, but the office was distinct from the man. The result was important, in that the priests in Greece could never form a caste by themselves, nor could they claim any other powers than were conferred on them by the ritual of the shrine. Thus Gr religion remained in the possession of the people, and developed no esoteric side either in dogma or in worship.

The seasons of worship varied with each particular shrine. While the state observed no recurring taboo day, it recognized a certain number of religious festivals as public conveyances of worship: days; thus at Athens the number of Festivals religious holidays in the year was somewhat larger than our fifty-two Sundays.

The tradition of each shrine determined whether worship should be offered daily or monthly or yearly, and also what were the more important seasons of worship. The principle of the sacred days was that at certain seasons the god was present in his temple expecting worship; just as it was the principle of sac-cred places that the temple should be located where the presence of the god had been felt and therefore might be expected again. Neither the location of the temple nor the seasons of worship were determined primarily by human convenience.

The elements of worship in Greece were (1) prayers, hymns, and votive offerings, (2) the sacrificial meal, (3) propitiatory sacrifice and
5. Elements purification, and (4) theprocessions, of Worship musical contests and athletic games, which formed part of the larger festivals. The heroes of Homer prayed to the gods at times, now a word of prayer in danger, now more formal prayers in connection with a sacrifice; and such was doubtless the practice in later times. In the more formal prayers, it was customary to invoke the god by his name, or in some various epithets, to state
6. Prayer the petition, and to give the reason why a favorable answer might be expected—either former worship by the petitioner, or vows of future gifts, or former answers to prayer, or an appeal to the pity of the god. Sometimes a prayer reads as if it were an attempt to win divine favor by gifts; more commonly, if not always, the appeal is to a relationship between man and his god, in which man's gifts play a very subordinate part.

Thanksgiving finds small place in prayer or in sacifice, but it was rather expressed in votive offerings.
In every temple these abounded, as in certain Roman Catholic shrines today; and as is the case today they might be of value in themselves, they might have some special reference to the god, or they might refer to the human need in which the giver had found help. So far as the great public festivals are concerned, the prayer seems to have been merged with the hymn of praise in which the element of petition found a small place.

The most common form of worship consisted of the sacrificial meal, like the meat offering or meal offering of the Hebrews. The sacri-cifice consisted of a domestic animal,
7. Burnt, Offering or selected in accordance with the ritual Sacred Meal of the shrine where it was to be offered. First the animal was led to the altar, consecrated with special rites and killed by the offerer or the priest while hymns and cries of worship were uttered by the worship-ners. Then some of the inward parts were roasted and eaten by priests and worshippers. Finally the remainder of the creature was prepared, the thigh bones wrapped in fat and meat to be burned for the god, the balance of the meat to be roasted for the worshippers; and with libations of wine the whole was consumed. The religious meaning of the act was evidently found in the analogy of a meal prepared for an honored guest. The animal, an 8. Meaning of the sacrificial dinner, is object valuable in itself, is devoted to these religious service; the god and his worshippers share alike this common meal; and the god is attached to his worshippers by a closer social bond, because they show their desire to honor and commune with him, while he concedes to accept the gift and to share the meal they have prepared. Possibly the animal was once thought to have been made divine by the act of consecration, or the god was believed to be present in his flesh, but there is no evidence that such a belief existed in the 6th cent. B.C., or later.)

The simple, rational character of this worship is characteristic of Gr religion.

When men felt that the gods were displeased or in circumstances where for any reason their favor was

While in general this
3. Propitiatory Sacrifice type of sacrifice may be called propitiatory, its form, if not in purpose, varied greatly. It might be worship to spirits of the earth whose anger was to be feared; it might be offered when an army was going into battle, or when the crops were in danger of blight, or of drought; or again it was the normal form of worship in seasons of pestilence or other trouble. Sometimes the emphasis seems to be laid on the purification of anger by an animal wholly devoted to the god, while at other times there is the suggestion that some evil substance is removed by the rite. The later conception is more common in rites of purification, where, by washing, by fire, or by the blood of an animal slain for the purpose, some form of defilement is removed. In the sacrifice of a pig to Demeter for this purpose, or of a dog to Hecate, some mystic element may exist, since these animals were sacred to these respective goddesses.

These various elements of worship were combined in varying degree in the great religious festival, these lasted from a day to a fortnight. After purification of the worshippers, which might be simple or elaborate, and some preliminary sac-ritual, it was often a splendid procession followed 11. The Great Religious Festivals

In the greater festivals, this was followed by athletic games and horse races in honor of the god, and sometimes by contests in music and choral dancing, or, in the festivals of Dionysus at Athens, by the performance of tragedy and comedy in the theater. In all this, the religious element seems to retreat into the background, though analogies may be found in the history of Christianity. The religious mystery plays were the origin of our own drama; and as for the horse races, one may still see them performed as a religious function, for example, at Siena. The horse races and the athletic games were performed for the gods as for some visiting potentate, a means of affording them pleasure and doing them honor. The theatrical performances apparently originated in ceremonies more essentially religious, in which men acted some divine drama depicting the experiences attributed to the gods themselves. This last feature is most evident in the mysteries at Eleusis, where the experiences of Demeter and Persephone were enacted by the people with the purpose of bringing the worshippers into some more intimate connection with these goddesses, such that their blessing was assured not only for this world, but for the life after death.

In all the forms of Gr worship perhaps the most striking feature was the absence of magic or superstition, almost the absence of mystery. Men approached the gods as they would approach superior men, bringing them petitions and gifts, making great banquets for their entertainment, and performing races and games for their pleasure, although this was by no means the whole of Gr religion, a phase of religion far more highly developed in the rational atmosphere of Gr thought than among other races. As the Gr gods were superior members of the social universe, so Gr worship was for the most part social, even human, in its character.

IV. The Future Life.—Gr thought of the life after death was made up of three elements which developed successively, while the earlier ones never quite lost their hold on the people in the presence of the later. The oldest and most permanent thought of the future found its expression in the worship of ancestors. Whether the body of the dead was buried or burned, the spirit was believed to survive, an unsubstantial shadowy being in the likeness of the living man. And rites were performed for these shades to lay them to rest and to prevent them from injuring their survivors, if not to secure their positive blessing. As at other points in Gr religion, the rites are fairly well known, while the belief must be inferred from the rites. The rites consisted first of an elaborate funeral, including sometimes animal sacrifices and even athletic games, and secondly of gifts being at stated intervals, gifts of water for bathing, of wine and food, and of wreaths and flowers. The human wants and satisfaction of the spirit are thus indicated. And the purpose perhaps was to keep the spirit alive, certainly to keep it fresh and happy. It will not interfere with the survivors and bring on them defilement which would mean the wrath of the gods. At the same time, any contact with death demands purification before one can approach the gods in worship.

The second element in Gr thought of the future life appears in the Homeric poems, and through the epic exerted a wide influence on later periods. Here the separateness of the souls of the dead from the human life is emphasized. Once the bodies of the dead are burned, the souls go to the realm of Hades, whence there is no return even in dreams, and where (according to one view) not even consciousness remains to them. It would seem that the highly rational view of the world in the epic, a point of view which laid stress on the greater Olympian gods, banished the belief in souls as akin to the belief in simier and magic influences. We might almost say that the thought of the greater gods as personal rulers tended to drive out the thought of lesser and more mystic spiritual influences, and made a place for souls only as shades in the realm of Hades. Certainly the result for Gr religion was to render far less vivid any idea of a real life after death.

The third element was associated with the worship of the gods of the lower world, and in particular Demeter and Persephone. In this

3. Later worship, particularly at Eleusis, the Beliefs in Immortality fact of life after death was assumed, a doctrine which was formulated by Plato in a manner which profoundly affected early Christian thought. If the epic emphasis on the greater gods made the souls mere shades in Hades, it was again a religious movement, namely the worship of gods like Persephone and Dionysus, which taught to some Greeks the divine reality of the soul and its hope for a blissful life in communion with the gods.

This development in Greece is the more interesting because there are indications of the same thing in Heb history. In the OT there are found traces of an old worship of souls, practised by races akin to the Hebrews if not by the Hebrews themselves; this worship was brought to an end under the clarifying power of the worship of Jeh; and finally the of the gods, a dependence which showed itself in obedience to the divine rule, in true and just confidence that the gods would bless their worshippers, in resignation when misfortune came, and particularly in the belief in the loving care and protection of the divine rulers. In Greece, the religious man looked to the gods not so much for salvation from evil, as for positive blessings.

VI. The Influence of Greek Religion on Christianity.—This is not the place to speak of the decay of Gr religion, of its ameliorating influence on the Alexandrian Church, or of the control it exercised over the Rom state. Its most permanent effect is found rather in Christianity. And here its shaping influence is first noted in Christian theology, beginning with Paul and the Apostle John. For although Gr religion was more free from dogmas or anything that could be called theology than are most religions, it furnished the religious content to the greatest philosophical systems we know; and all through the centuries the leaders of Christian thought have been trained in the religious philosophy of Plato and of Aristotle. Our Christian conceptions of the nature of God and the soul, of the relation of God to the physical universe, and of God’s government of the world, have all been along the lines laid down by these Gr thinkers. And while the debt is primarily to Gr philosophy, it should never be forgotten that Gr philosophy formulated these conceptions out of the material which Gr religion furnished; and one may believe that it was the religious conceptions formulated by centuries of thoughtful worshippers which found final expression in the Gr religious systems.

Again, the organization of the early Christian church and its form of government was quite as much Gr as it was Heb in origin.

2. Greek Influence on Christian Liturgy organization had its religious side, be it family, or school, or state; and further, that some phases of religion in Greece were quite thoroughly organized in a manner that was adapted without much difficulty to the conditions of the new religion. Moreover the thought of the Gr priest as not a sacred man, but a man appointed by the community to a sacred office, was naturally adopted by the nascent Christian communities. Even in the organization of worship, the hymns and liturgy which gradually developed from the simplest beginnings, it is not difficult to trace the influence of what the Gr converts to Christianity had been brought up to regard as worship of the gods.

The most striking case of the effect of the old religion on the new is found in the method of celebrating the Christian sacraments. In the 2d cent. AD, the baptismal bath took place after a brief period of instruction, and at the common meal sacraments the bread and wine were blessed in commemoration of the Master. Three centuries passed and this simplicity had given way to splendid ceremony. Baptism ordinarily was performed only on the “mystic night,” the night before Easter. Almost magic rites with fasting had exercised evil from the candidate; uncircumcised, with loose hair and bare feet, he went down into the water, and in an act of sacrifice, took the gift of the Holy Spirit; then the candidates, dressed in white, wearing crowns, and carrying torches, proceeded to their first communion in which a mixture of honey and milk might take the place of... wine. The whole ceremony had been assimilated to what Gr religion knew as an initiation, in which the baptized underwent some essential change of nature. They were said to have "put on the dress of immortality."

The Lord's Supper was carefully limited to those who had, in some way, been initiated, and even among these, at length, degrees of privilege arose. The ceremony came to be known as a mystery, the table as an altar, the officiating priest as a "hierarch," and the result as a blessed "vision" of sacred things by which the resurrection life was imparted. In its formal elements and the interpretation of its meaning, as well as in the terms used to describe it, the effect of the Gr mysteries may be seen.

Yet during these three centuries Christianity had been waging a life-and-death struggle with the old religion. It is indeed impossible to believe that converts to Christianity should intentionally copy the forms of a worship which they had often at much cost to themselves rejected as false. The process must have been slow and quite unconscious. As the Christian Church was forming, polytheistic customs used in forming a Christian theology, so the conceptions and practices which had developed in Gr religion found their way into the developing Christian ritual. Much of this ritual which had no essential place in Christian worship was later rejected; some still remains, the contribution of the religious life of Greece to the forms of worship in our world religion.

The passage doubtless refers to the captive Hebrews who are held by the Greeks. The exhortation is to insurrection against the Greeks. Although bearing a striking similarity to the passage in Joel 3 6, there is no connection between the two. In the first, there was conflict between the nations; in the second, simply a reflection upon Tyre and Sidon for having sold into Greece certain Jewish captives. From a Jewish standpoint the Macedo-

GREETING, grí'ting (Gk., shā'āl; chēlōμ, chārō, ēpistaríaμ, aspámasμ, ēpistaríaμ, aspázomai):

1. Shā'āl means "to ask," "to inquire of anyone respecting welfare," hence "to greet." In the OT "greet" occurs only once in AV or RV, viz. in 1 Jn 25, 6, to Nabal, and "greet him in my name." But it is implied in other places where shālām ("well," "prosperity," "peace"), the common Heb greeting, is used; e.g. in Gen 37 4, it is said of Joseph that "his brethren could not speak peaceably unto him," i.e. could not give him the common friendly greeting of "Peace!" "Peace be to thee!" So, in Gen 43 27, RV "He asked them of their welfare" (AVm "peace") ; Ex 18 7, "They asked each other of their welfare" (AVm "peace"); 2 S 11 7, "How Josahad given them the name of the prophet of God?" (2 Sm 12 20, 22; "of the peace of God"); Josab said to Amasa (2 S 20 9), RV "Is it well with thee, my brother?" (Heb "Art thou in peace, my brother?"); Boaz greeted his reapers with 'Jeḥ be with you,' and they answered, 'Jeḥ be with thee' (Ruth 2 4; of Ps 128 8, "The blessing of Jeḥ be upon you, both in the name of Jeḥ"). For the king, we have, AV and ERV "God save the king" (in "Let the king live," AV ["Long live the king"] (1 S 10 24, etc); "Let my lord king David live for ever" (1 K 1 53; see also Neh 2 3; Dtn 4 3, etc). In Eccles 6 5 it is said "a fair-speaking tongue will increase kind greetings," RV "multiply courtesies" (euprosigora).

2. When Jesus sent forth His disciples to proclaim the kingdom, they were to "salute" the house they entered, the elders, and the sick (Lk 10 5), "Peace [eirènē] be to this house!" if it was not worthy, the blessing should return to themselves. After His resurrection He said to His disciples, "Peace be unto you" (Lk 24 36, Jn 20 19, 21.26). He left His "peace" with the disciples, the *greeting (Jn 14 27)—"not as the world giveth," in a formal way. A frequent form of greeting in the NT is chairō ("to rejoice," imp. and inf., chaire, chairen, "Joy to thee," Joy to thy tongue") (Hall 26 49; and "All hail thee" Lk 1 15; 1 Kg 1 3), "Rejoice!" (Phil 1 3; ERV "farewell"). Another word for greeting is aspasmos, "greetings in the markets" (AV Mt 23 7; Mt 22 8, "salutations"; Lk 11 43, "greetings," Lk 20 40; also Lk 1 29 41; Col 4 18; 2 Thess 3 17; in all these places RV has "salutation").

3. Of epistolary greetings we have examples in Eze 4 17, "Peace" (shēlām), etc.; 5 7; Dtn 4 1; 6 25. These are frequent in the Apoc: 1 Eza 6 7, "to King Darius greeting" (chairō); 8 9; 1 Mac 18 10, etc; 2 Mac 1 10, "greeting, health," etc. We have the same form in Acts 16 23; 23 26. In 3 Jn ver 14 it is, "Peace [be eaten to thee]. The friends salute thee, Paul of Ephesus, with the special Christian greeting, "Grace to you and peace from God our Father and the Lord Jesus Christ" (Rom 1 7; 1 Cor 1 3, etc). Also at the close, "The grace of the Lord Jesus Christ be with you" (1 Cor 16 23; 2 Thess 3 16). The epistles of Paul, the "apostle of the Gentiles," are salutations sent to various persons, and sends greetings from those with whom he is with (Rom 16 5-23; 1 Cor 16 19; 2 Cor 13 13; Phil 4 21; Col 4 10, etc). In those cases the words is aspasmoi, and RV translate "salute," etc (cf Jn 1 1; 1 Pet 1 2; 5 14; 2 Pet 1 2; 2 Jn vs 8,13; Jude vs 2). See Godspeed; Kiss.

GRIEF, grīf, GRIEVE, grīv: There are some 20 Heb words in AV by "grief," "grieve," "to be grieved," etc. Among the chief are הָדָלָא, hādālā, הָלָה, hālāh, הָלָל, hōlāl, יָגַהְנָן, yāghānān, כָּנָא, κάνα, ָּגָּהַב, ָּגָּהַב. They differ, partly, in their physical origin, and partly, in the nature and cause of the feeling expressed. RV in several instances gives effect to this.

1. Hālāh, hōlāl express the sense of weakness, sickness, pain (e.g. Samson, in Jgs 16 7.11.17, "Then shall I become weak [hādālā], and be as another man"); Isa 17 11 AV, "a heap in the day of grief"; 53 3.4, "a man of sorrows, and acquainted with grief," "He hath borne our griefs" (hōlē), RV "Heb sickness, sicknesses"; ver 10, "He hath put him to grief," RV "made him sick" (hōlāk) (tr-p by others, "bitter"), Isa 53 11; Nah 3 10; yāḏōn, perhaps from the pain and weariness of toil (Ps 31 10), "for my life is spent with grief," RV "sorrow"; "The Lord added grief to my sorrow," RV "sorrow to my pain" (Jer 6 26); lūḥān implies provocation, anger, irritation; this Hannah added to Eli (AV, "Out of the abundance of my complaint and my grief [RV 'provocation'] have I spoken") (1 S 1 16). Ps 6 7; 31 9, "grief; Prov 17 25, "a foolish son is a grief to his father" (10), "the word of rendered 'wrath'" in 12 16, AV "a fool's wrath," RV " vexation"; so also 27 3); Job 6 2, "Oh that my grief were thoroughly weighed," RV "Oh that my vexation were but weighted" (in 2 AV the same word is tr "wrath," RV " vexation"); lā'ēth 3, "sorrow," pain", properly 'to hurt,' it occurs in Job 2 13, "His grief [RV 'or pain'] was very great," also 16 6 RV, "grief," mākāth 6, "sorrows," pain," suffering," 2 Ch 6 29, RV "sorrows"; Ps 38 26, RV "in pain"; Isa 55 9, "a man of sorrows"; ver 4, "Surely he hath carried our sorrows;") mārāch and mārār indicate "bitterness" (Gen 26 35; 49 23; 1 S 30 6; Ruth 1 13; Prov 14 10). The heart knoweth its own bitterness, man's sorrow is a weariness for stubbling only in 1 S 55 31, "This shall be no grief unto thee," RV "Heb cause of staggering"; rā' a (common word for "evil") denotes an evil, a calamity, only once in AV tr "grief," viz. of Jonah's gourd, "to deliver him from his grief" (Jon 1 10); yā'ār, "to be evil," Dt 15 10, RV "thy heart shall not be griefed when thou givest unto him" (also 1 S 1 8; Neh 2 10; 13 8; several times tr "grievous"); bāḥāq, "to burn," to be wroth," (Gen 4 6, "Why art thou wroth?"") tr 14 "grieve!" in Gen 45 5, and 1 S 15 11 AV (RV "Samuel was wroth"); the same word is often used of the kindling of anger; lā'āh, "to be weary," tīrēd, "faint" (Pro 26 15), AV The oblivious hidest his hand in his bosom. It giveth him to bring it again to his mouth, RV "weariest," also Job 4 2; ṣāḇāth, "to grieve," tr "be vexed," occurs in Gen 6 6; 34 7; 45 5; etc. Ps 78 40, "How oft did they . . . grieve him in the desert." Of other words tr "grieve" may be mentioned kāb, "to weary of," to loath (Ps 95 10), "Forty long years was I grieved with that generation"; in 119 158; 139 21, RV "loathè;" hāmēq, implying to be bitterly or violently moved, soar (often as tr. "leavened"), only in Ps 78 21, RV "For my soul was grieved," m "Heb was in a ferment." (2) In the NT "grief," "grieve," etc. are infrequent. The commonest words are lēpē (1 Pet 2 19), RV griefs, elsewhere tr "sorrow," lēpē, "to grieve," "afflict" (Mt 10 22, RV "sorrowful"); in 21 17, "Peter was grieved;" Rom 14 15; 2 Cor 2 4, RV "made sorry"; ver 5, "caused sorrow"; Eph 4 30, "Grieve not the Holy Spirit of God"; diapodigo, lit. to labor through, "to grieve self," occurs twice (Acts 4 2; 16 18, RV "sore troubled"); stendāʾ, "to groan, or sigh," only once tr "grief" (He 13 17), RV "groaning"; prosōchitāzō, "to be indignant," etc. twice (He 3 10, RV "displeased"). The reference is to Ps 96 10, where the LXX by this Gr word tr kātō (see above). The less frequency in the NT of words denoting "grief" is significant. Christ came "to comfort all that mourn—to give a garland for ashes, the oil of joy for mourning, the garment of praise for the spirit of heaviness." Christians, however, cannot but feel and be grieved by the loss of loved ones, and it is to be noted that in both the OT and NT, God Himself is said to be susceptible to grief. W. L. WALKER

GRIEVANCE, grev'ans (Gr. ἁρπαγμός, ἄμαλ); Occurs only in AV as a tr of Hab 1 3, "Why dost thou show me iniquity, and cause me to behold grievance?" (RV "look upon perpetrators"); ἄμαλ is also tr "perversioneness" by AV and RV in Nu 23 21, "perverseness in Israel"; Isa 10 1, AV "grievousness," RV "perversioness." In Hab 1 13, AV tr the same word "iniquity" (m "grievances"). Thou art of purer eyes than to behold evil and cannot not look on iniquity" (m "grievances") in "perversioness." The word means originally "toil," "labor" with sorrow, misery, etc., as the consequence, and is often so tr². It is the word in Isa 53 11, "He shall see of the travail of his soul, and shall be satisfied." W. L. WALKER

GRIEVOUS, grev'us, GRIEVOUSLY, grev'us-ly, GRIEVOUSNESS, grev'us-ness: In addition to several of the words mentioned under Guzea (q.v.), we have kōbōth ("heavy") St, e.g. Gen 12 10, "The famine was grievous in the land," RV "sore"; mārāq ("powerful"), "a grievous curse" (1 K 2 8); sūr, "to turn aside" (Jer 6 28), "grievous revolvers; kāḥōk, "to make sharp," Ps 21 9; 2 Ch 10 4; kāḇōlām (Ch 6 4), "They call all grievous deaths," RV "deaths of sicknesses"; ṭāḇēk (Ps 31 18), which speak grievous things proudly, RV "against the righteous insolently;" hāl, "sin" (Lam 1 8), "Jerus hath grievously sinned" (lit. "hath sinned a sin") (Ezk 14 13), "trespassing grievously" (lit. "trespassing a trespass"); RV "committing a trespass;" kōbōthāh, "weight" (Isa 21 15), "grievousness;" bārā, "heavy," "grievous wolves" (Acts 20 29), "grievous charge" (20 7), "not the commandments of our fathers, but of his "grievousness" (1 Jn 3 5); ōkōrēs, RV "irksome" (Phil 3 1); pōnērōs, "evil" (Rev 16 2), a "grievous sore;" dūsēbdakōs, "to be grieved" (Mt 23 4; Lk 11 46), "deemed greatly," "grievously" "mentally" (Mt 8 6); kalōs, "badly;" "grievously vexed" (Mt 15 22). GRINDER, grind'er. See MILL.

GRINDING, grind'ing. See CRAPTS.

GRISLED, griz'ld, GRIZZLED. See COLORS.

GROAN, grōn (Gr. γένος, nābæk, γηνάκ, ἄνακ; στριφώ, stendāʾ, ἱψαμμοφόρον, embromidomai). The Eng. word, noun and vb., is an attempt to imitate the vocal sound which is expressive of severe pain or distress, physical or mental. It is cognate with the Scottish dialect word grōn, and with grōn the original obsolete sense, as used in the Anglican Prayer-book version of Ps 59 6 14, "grin like a dog and go about the city;" here "grin" is a tr of hāmāh, and means the sound of the nightly howling of the pariah dogs in Jerusalem and other oriental cities. It is used in the OT: (1) To denote the expression accompanying physical suffering, as in the case of the Israelites in Egypt oppressed by Pharaoh's taskmasters (Ex 2 24; 5 11), or in Pali under the yoke of the Canaanites (De 2 13, "nābæk"). It is also used in Job's description of the sufferings and wretchedness of the poor (24 12), as well as in his complaint concerning his own suffering when smitten by the hand of God (23 2). The Psalmist speaks of groaning when feversicken and remorseful, AV and RV "roaring all the day long" (Ps 32 3; 38 9; 102 5; 22 1). (2) The expression of suffering on the part of beasts, hungry and thirsty in drought (Job 1 15). (3) The manifestation of mental and spiritual distress as in Ps 6 6; 102 20 (RV "anguish"). (4) Metaphorically groaning is the despairing note of Egypt in the prophecy of her overthrow by Grief, Grieve

Babylon, the sound being that uttered by a deadly wounded man (Ezk 30 24); similarly in the prophecy of the Persa conquest the misery of Babylon is thus represented by Jer 51 53; and the misery of Tyre when taken by Babylon is similarly described (Ezk 26 15, AV "cry").

The word for "sigh" ("nānāh") is closely allied, and the meanings are sufficiently akin, so that the terms seem interchangeable. A sigh is physically a sign of respiratory distress due to depressed action of the heart; the causes are consequent on the indication of physical weakness or mental disquietude, as Ps 12 5; 31 10; 79 11; Isa 21 2; 24 7; 35 10; Jer 46 2.

Nāhā is the crying of persons dying or starving, as in Ezk 30 24; Job 24 12. A somewhat similar word, hāghāh, means the complaining sound like that of the cooing of doves (Isa 59 11; Nah 2 7).

Nēhā is the sound of lamentation of the dead (Jer 9 10; 31 15; Am 6 6).

In the NT "groaning" is used for the expression of mental distress. In Jn 13 13-35 the word used is part of the vb. embrimaomai, which conveys the idea of deep and earnest emotion. The same word in two other passages is tr' "strictly charged," and indi-cates the seriousness of the death (Mt 19 30; Mk 1 43). Elsewhere "sighing" and "groaning" are renderings of words derived from the vb. stenazō, as in Rom 8 23; 2 Cor 5 2; Mk 7 34; 8 12.

Stephen calls the groaning of Israel in Egypt stenargōs (Acts 7 34), and the united wail of the travelling creation is expressed by St. Paul by the word sunstendzei (Rom 8 22). The sigh is a characteristic sign of woe in Isa 21 2; 34 7; Jer 45 3; Lam 1 4 8 11 12; Ezek 9 4; 21 6.

GROSS, grōs (ῥήγα, ῥήγα, ῥάφα): Used twice with "darkness" in Isa 60 2; Jer 13 16. In the NT the vb. σπανίζω, pōchānō, "to make fat," is applied twice to "making gross" the heart (Mt 13 16; Acts 28 27). See GREASE.

GROUND, ground, GROUNDED, ground'ed (ῥήγας, ῥάθαμάς, χρήσ, γρεχ, γη, geb):

(1) "Ground" is in AV the tr of "rāthāmāh," the "soil," the ground so called from its red color, frequently also "earth" and "land" (Gen 2 3 f. Ex 3 5; 8 21, etc.); it is more often the tr of erech, which means rather the earth, oftenest tr "earth" and "land" (Gen 18 2; Ps 74 7; Isa 5 26, etc.) other words are helahk, "portion," "field" (Isa 5 9 10 12; RV "plot"); ḥiqk, "plotting," "plotting" (1 S 8 12); sādāh, "a portion," "a field" (1 Ch 11 13; RV "plot of ground"); for other special words see DRY; FALLOW; PARCHED.

(2) In the NT the common word for "ground" is ὀγγ, "earth," "soil," "land" (Mt 13 8; Acts 7 53, "pious ground," etc.); other words are ἀγκρός, "field" (Lk 14 18, "I have bought a piece of ground," RV "field"); ἄρτων, "spot," "place" (Jn 4 4, "parcell of ground").

(3) As part past. of "to grind," "ground" appears as the tr of ῥήγωθ, pounded corn (2 S 17 19; RV "bruised"); "grounded" is also the tr of ῥήγα (Ex 32 20; Nu 11 8; Dt 9 21, RV "grinding").

(4) "Ground," as the basis of the tr of ἥγετραμα (from ἥγεο), "the pillar and ground of the truth," RVm "stay." "Grounded" is used in the sense of founded, based, fixed (Isa 33 26). In every place where the grounded staff shall pass, which the Lord shall lay upon him. AVm "Heb every passing of the rod founded," RV "and every stroke [in Heb passing] of the appointed staff [in "Or staff of doom (Heb foundation)"] which Jehovah shall lay upon him, ver 31; "with his rod he will be Jehovah's;" delittsch, "every stroke of the rod of destiny which Jehovah causes to fall upon Assyria;" the word is nāsādāh, from gāādāh, "to place," "to found," "to appoint," "to ordain," hence "appointed rod [of punishment]," seems the simplest rendering.

In Eph 3 17 we have "rooted and grounded in love," and in Col 1 23, "if ye continue in the faith, grounded and settled," RV has "both themelioth, to lay a foundation." In Eccles 18 6 "ground" is used for the "bottom of things," but RV has "to track them out" (ezchinheloth, "to trace out."

(5) Figurative uses of "ground" are as representing the heart in relation to its reception of words of truth and righteousness (Jer 4 3; Hos 10 12, "Break up your fallow ground"); to the word of the kingdom as preached by Christ (Mt 13 8 23); dry, parched, thirsty ground stands for a poor condition (Ps 107 33 35; Isa 55 7; 44 3; 53 2; Ezek 19 13).

GROVE, grōv: (1) ἄμπελος, "ashêrâh." See ASHER.

(2) νησις, "nêšél" (Gen 21 33 AV, RV "a tamarisk tree"). See TAMARISK.

GRUDGE, gruj (בעז, nêžôr; סטנזה, stenâzô, goqgummos, goqgummos): "Grudge" (perhaps a mnemonic word, cf Gr grô) is to "grobble" or "murmur" at any person or thing, to entertain an envious or contentious feeling, to be offended or grieved unwillingly, etc. It occurs in AV as the tr of nêtur, "to keep anger" (Lev 19 18, "Thou shalt not . . . bear any grudge against the children of thy people"); in Ps 59 15, as the tr, in text, of Heb nênt â or lîn, "to pass the night," "to tarry," Niphal, "to show oneself obstinate," "to murmur or complain" (of the enemies who were hunting David like dogs), "Let them wander up and down for meat, and grudge if they be not satisfied," in "If they be not satisfied then will they curse;" RV "And tarry all night if they be not satisfied;" but see Ex 15 24; 16 2; Nu 14 2; Josh 9 18, etc., where the tr is "murmur;" may not the meaning be "and growl [or howl] if they be not satisfied?" "Grudge" formerly implied open expression of discontent, etc, e.g. Wyclif has in Lk 15 2, "The faries and scribbs grychiden seynge," etc.

In Jas 5 9, stenazō, "to groan," "to complain" (from affliction or from impatience or ill-humor), is used "to grudge" (Gr grudge or against another, brethren, RV "murmur not," goqgummos, "a murmuring" (of Jn 7 12); Acts 6 1), is rendered "grudging" (1 Pet 4 9), "Use hospitality one to another without grudging," RV "murmuring will;" of Phil 2 14, "not with a grudging spirit," Romans, "not out grudging" (2 Cor 9 7, RV "not grudgingly, m "Gr of sorrow"); in Eccles 10 25 we have "will not grudge" (goqgôsô, RV "murmur"). "Grudge" was frequent in the earlier VSS, but is changed in AV for the most part into "murmur" in RV completes the change, except Lev 19 18, and text of 2 Cor 9 7.

GUARD, gâرد: (1) הַשַּׁר, "sar ha-habbâhâm, captain of the guard," lit. "slaughterers" (Gen 37 36; 39 9; 40 34; 41 10.12); הַשָּׁר, rabh habbâhâm (2 K 25 8.11.20; Jer 39 3 etc.); הַשָּׁר, rabh habbâhâm (Dan 11 4), "guard," AV "footmen" (1 S 22 17); םַרְּאָה הָרָאָה, "chief of the guard," AV "captains of the guard" (1 K 14 27); id hâ-râhâm, "guard-chamber," (1 K 14 28; cf. Ezek 40 21 etc., where "lodges" are "guardrooms;" see A. B. Davidson ad loc.).

(2) מִשְׁמַחְר, mishmar, "guard," a defence to a point of danger (Neh 4 22; Ezk 30 7). (3) פּוּפָה, mishma'ath, "guard" (2 S 25 25, where AVm and RVm have "council," the body over which Beniah was set by David and whose functions were perhaps those of consultation). (4) Ἐγκατακόμησαν, spekoukámu- tís, ‘guard’ (Mt 6 27, ‘a man of Herod’s guard,’ where, as in Lk 9:34, Mark, writing for Romans, simply transliterates the Lat \textit{spectator} “a scout,” “an executioner,” as in loc.). (5) Στρατευ- τέρας, stratopedarchés, “captain of the guard” AV “captain of the praetorian guard” RVm, Acts 25 16; See-Cam. (6) Καταδίκη, katanádiké, “watch” AV “guard” ARV and RV (Mt 27 65,66; 28 11).

An oriental monarch’s body-guard consisted of picked men attached to his person and ready to take his place in important and confidential concerns. At the courts of Egypt and Babylon the members of the guard were known as ‘slaughter- ers,’ “executioners” (Gen 37 30 AVm, where Potipher is called their captain); 2 K 25 8, where Nebuzaradan is called their captain (AVm “chief marshal”). Whether it had ever been the function of the body-guard to kill meat for the royal table there is little directly to show; that they acted as executioners can be well understood. In Israel they were known as “the footmen” (1 S 22 17 AV, ARVm and RVm “runners”) who acted as royal messengers or couriers from the time of Saul onward (2 K 10 25; 11 6); and this designates them as the couriers of the kings of Persia. (Est 3 13,15; 8 14, where our VSS render “posts,” though the Heb is rácym).

The men of the royal body-guard were usually foreigners like the janissaries of oriental monarchs drawn to modern times, who prefer to have around their persons warriors uninfluenced by family connection.

2. Composed of Foreigners with the people of the land. The names

I had such a body-guard whose commanders ranked with the great officers of the crown (Maspero, \textit{Struggle of the Nations}, 766). David’s body-guard of 600, known also as the gibbórim or “mighty men,” consisted of Cherethites, Pelethites, and Gittites (2 S 15 18; 20 23), and we read of Carites (2 K 11 19), who may have been Cartians or Cretans, as forming part of the guard at the coronation of King Jehoshaphat. That this guard had duties in connection with the temple as well as the king’s house seems clear. They were employed as slaughterers of the sacrifices before the Levites with were intrusted with the office is unknown. The Temple, likely, inasmuch as this guard is not said to have been attached to the temple but of “runners” but of “runners.” But they accompanied King Rehoboam when he visited the temple (1 K 14 28), and to their captains were committed the shields of brass which took the place of the shepherds of gold which Solomon had hung up in the temple; Jehoshaphat employed their captains to put Athaliah to death and to exterminate the worshippers of Baal who had fled to the temple precincts (2 K 11 4 ff); the temple gate leading to the palace was called “the gate of the guard” (2 K 11 19). At this time, and for this occasion, at least, the royal body-guard were the temple guards; and when Ezekiel drew up his plans for the temple which he conceived to replace the temple destroyed by Nebuchadrezzar, the ‘lodges’ or ‘little chambers’ were rooms for the accommodation of the temple guards (Ezk 40 7.10.21,23, etc.).

GUIDE, gil (Prov 9:7, mirmāh; 55:10, dōlos): "Guide" is the tr of mirmāh, "fraud, "deceit" (Ps 55:10); they link in speaking guile; 56:11, deceit, and guilt, RV "oppression in [fraud] and guile"); sometimes of "ormāh, "craftiness, "guile," deception," fraud" (Ps 52:14); for r'mtyd, in whose spirit there is no guile") in the NT of dolos, "bait," is not generally, "fraud," "guile," deceit; LXX for mirmāh (Isa 53:9, EV "deceit") and for r'mtyd (Job 13:7, EV "deceitfully"); 1 John 4:7; 2 Cor 12:16, "Being crafty, I caught you with guile." 1 Thess 3:1; 2 Tim 2:22; 5:10; quoted from Ps 52:13; Rev 14:5, "their mouth worketh no guile," RV after corrected text, "no lie").

St. Paul's words in 2 Cor 12:16 have sometimes been quoted in justification of 'guile' in religious work, etc; but he is not describing his actual procedure; but that which the Corinthians might have attributed to him; the lips of the Christian must be kept free from all guile (Ps 34:13; 1 Pet 2:1, etc; 1 John 1:5, "a holy spirit of discourse will flee deceit" [dolos], RV "a holy spirit"). "Guile" does not appear in Apc, but frequently appears "deceit." RV has "guile" for "subtilty" (Gen 27:35; Acts 13:10); "cover itself with guile" for "is covered by deceit" (Prov 26:26); "with guile" for "deceitfully" (Gen 34:13); "spiritual milk which is without guile" for "pure milk of the word," EV "meaningless," ARV "Gr belonging to the reason" (Rom 12:1; 1 Pet 2:2); "guileless" for "harmless" (He 7:26). W. L. WALKER GUILT, guilt: The Christian idea of guilt involves three elements: responsibility (Gr atilia, "cause"), depending upon a man's real freedom), blameworthiness (Lat reatus culpas, depending upon a man's knowledge and purpose) and the obligation to make good through punishment or compensation (Lat peccator peccati, "debt"); Mt 6:12). In other words, in thinking of guilt we ask the questions of cause, motive and consequence, the central idea being that of the personal blameworthiness of the sinner.

1. In the OT.—Not all of this is found at once in the OT. The idea of guilt corresponds to that of righteousness or holiness. When these are ritual and legal, instead of ethical and spiritual, they will determine similarly the idea of guilt. The ritualistic conception of guilt may be first noted. Personal blameworthiness does not need to be present. "If any one sin, and do any of the things which Jeh hath commanded not to be done; though he knew it, yet is he guilty, and shall bear his iniquity" (Lev 5:17). The man is guilty, not because he might or should have known; he may merely have touched unwittingly the body of an unclean beast (Lev 6:25). The guilt is here because the law has been transgressed and must be made good (cf Lev 6:15. 16). 3:13; 22:27; see also 5:23.4.17).

Moreover, the element of personal responsibility is sometimes lacking where guilt is assigned. The priest may sin "so as to bring guilt on the people" (Lev 4:3). One man's wrongdoing may "cause the land to sin" (Dt 24:4). Israel has sinned in Achan's greed and therefore suffers. Even when the guilty man is found, his children and his very cattle must bear the guilt and punishment with him, though there is no suggestion of their participation or even knowledge (Josh 7:21, cf 2 Sam 24; 1 Chron 28:6). Here the full moral idea of sin and guilt is wanting because the idea of personality and personal responsibility has not come to its own. The individual is still merged here in the clan or nation.

The central idea in all this is not that of the individual, his responsibility, his motive, his blame. It is that of a rule and the transgression of it, which must be made good. For this reason we see the ideas of sin and guilt and punishment constantly passing over into each other. This may be seen by noting the use of the words whose common root is shen, the distinctive Heb term for guilt. In Lev 5 to 7 in the adj. form it is rendered "guilty," in the noun as "trespass offering." In Hos 5:15 it seems to mean punishment (see "how is the guilt," and of Ezk 6:6), while in Nu 5:7 the idea is that of compensation (rendered "restitution for guilt").

With the prophets, the ideas of sin and righteousness come out more clearly as ethical and personal, and so we mark a new stage in the conception of guilt. It is not Teaching ritual correctness that counts with God, insecence and sacrifices and new moons and Sabbaths, but to cease to do evil, to learn to do good (Isa. 1). The idea of the inner spirit comes in (Mic 6:8; Isa 57:15; 66:1-12), and guilt gains a new depth and quality. At the same time the idea of personal responsibility comes.

A man is to bear his own sins. The children's teeth are not to be set on edge because the fathers have eaten sour grapes (Jer 31:29; 33:1; K 14:6; of 2 Sam 17; 20: In the NT.—Here as elsewhere Jesus came to fulfill. With Him it is the inner attitude of the soul that decides. It is the penitent publican who goes down justified, not the Jesus Pharisee with his long credit account (Lk 15:9-14). That is why His attitude is so kindly toward some notorious sinners and so stern toward some religious pharisaical people. The Pharisees are outwardly correct, but their spirit of bigotry and pride prevents their entering the kingdom of heaven, while the penitent harlots and publicans take it by storm.

Because we are not primarily a matter of the outward deed but of the inner spirit, Jesus marks different degrees of guilt as depending upon a man's knowledge and motive (Lk 11:29-32; 12:47,48; 23:34). And yet Jesus does not lighten the sense of guilt but rather deepens it. The strength of the OT thought lay in this, that it viewed all transgression as a sin against God, since all law came from Him. This religious emphasis remains with Jesus (Lk 15:21; cf Ps 14:5). But with Jesus guilt is far more than the subject of rules. He gives Himself. And so the guilt is the deeper because the sin is against this love and mercy and fellowship which God offers us. Jesus shows us the final depth of evil in sin. Here comes the NT interpretation of the cross, which shows it on the one hand as the measure of God's love in the free gift of His Son, and on the other as the measure of man's guilt whose sin wrought this and made it necessary.

Paul also recognizes differences in degree in guilt, the quality of personal responsibility which is not simply determined by looking at the outward transgression (Acts 17:30; Eph 4:18; Paul Rom 2:9; 3:26; 5:13; 7:13). He, too, looks within to decide the question of guilt (Rom 14:23). But sin is not a matter of single acts or choices with Paul. He sees it as a power that comes to rule a man's life and that rules in the race. The question therefore arises, Does Paul think of guilt also as native, as belonging to man because man is a part of the race? Here it can merely be pointed out that Rom 5 12–21 does not necessarily involve this. Paul is not discussing whether all men committed sin in Adam's fall, or whether all are guilty by virtue of their very place in a race that is sinful. It is not the question of guilt in fact or degree, but merely the fact that through one man all men are made righteous as before through one sin came upon them all. This no more involves native guilt as a non-ethical conception than it does the idea that the righteousness through Christ is merely forensic and non-ethical. Paul is simply passing over the other elements to assert one fact. Rom 1 suggests how Paul looked at one passage as involving guilt because universal knowledge and choice entered in. See also Sin.

GUILT OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

GUiltless, gil'tles: The primary meaning of the Heb word is "to be clean." Sometimes the meaning is "freedom from blame," at other times to be "free from punishment," these two ideas running over into each other as with the word "guilt." The latter meaning seems to predominate in Ex 20 7; Dt 5 11; 2 S 14 9; 1 K 2 9. The other meaning holds in Nu 32 22; Josh 3 19; 2 S 3 28; Mt 12 5 7.

GUILTY, gil'ti: In addition to the general discussion under Guilt (q.v.), several NT passages demand special notice because the word "guilt" is not used in the principal sense of blameworthiness, but with one of the two lesser meanings noted above which go to make up the complete idea. In 3 of these passages AV renders "guilty," and RV gives another rendering. In Mt 26 60 AV, Jesus' foes declare he is "guilty of death" (ἐγένετο τὸν θάνατόν, "liable to"). Here "guilty" simply means the one who is legally held, and the reference is not to the blame but to the consequence. This is a true use of the word in the lower and legal sense. It does not correspond with our higher usage, and so we have it in RV "worthy of death." So in Rom 3 19, "guilty" is changed to "under the judgment," and in Mt 28 18, to "debtor."

In Jas 2 10 and 1 Cor 11 27, the word "guilty" is also used in the lesser or more primitive sense, not primarily as involving blame but as involving the sinner's authorship or responsibility. This is the element suggested in the definition of guilt given above, just as the preceding passages illustrate the third element. The man who stumbles in one point is "guilty" of the whole law. James does not refer here to the degree of blameworthiness. "Guilty of" means transgressor of, and he has transgressed the whole because the law is one. So in 1 Cor 11 27, those "guilty of the body and the blood of the Lord" are those who have transgressed in the matter of the body and the blood of the Lord.

GULF (χαλκόν, chalmo, "a chasm," "vent," "a gaping opening"—a great interval; from χαλέων, chatōn, "to gape" or "yawn"): Occurs only in Lk 16 26, "Between us and you there is a great gulf fixed" (cf "sfar off" in ver 23). This is very different from, though it probably reflects, the rabbinical conception of the separation between the two compartments of Hades (Sheol) by a "hand's breadth," "a wall," or even, later, "a chasm," as the parable can be given here only a figurative significance, and is of purely ethical import. The fundamental difference between the Rich Man and Lazarus lies not in their conditions but in their characters. For "besides all this" (ver 26) RVm gives "in all these things," thus implying that the moral distinctions which exist in this life (ver 25) become more pronounced ("fixed") in the next world, and the "gulf" is impassable in the sense that a change of condition will not necessarily produce a change of soul. See also ABRAHAM'S BOSOM; HADES.

GUNL, gū'āl, GUNITES, gū'ānīs (וגנים; ᪐נים): (1) The name of a Naphthite clan (Gen 46 24; Nu 26 48; 1 Ch 7 13). In Nu 26 48 the gentile "Gunites" is also found, having in Heb the same form, with the article.

(2) The head of a Gadite family (1 Ch 5 15).

GUR, gūr, THE ASCENT, a-sent, OF (הַגָּן, ma'ālēh gān): The place where the servants of Jehu mortally wounded Ahaziah, king of Judah (2 K 9 27). The ascent (AV "going up") was hard by Ibleam, the site of which is identified about 1 mile S of Jenin.

GUR-BAAL, gūr-bā'al (גּור-בָּאָל, gūr ba'āl): The residence of certain Arabs against whom God helped Uzziah, king of Judah (2 Ch 26 7). Its mention immediately after the Philis may have suggested the "Gerar" of the Ta. Association with the Meunim points to the E. It may be taken as certain that Jebel Neby Harun, near Petra, has always been crowned by a sanctuary. This may have been "the dwelling place of Baal," or, accepting Kittel's emendation (för ba'āl), "the rock," or "mountain of Baal." The Arabs probably dwelt in the region before the days of Petra (EB, s.v.)

HAHASHTARI, hā-ħash’ta-ri (חָאשָׁתָר, ħā-‘hashātār), possibly a corruption of חָשָׁתָר (hashātār): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4:6). The name is probably corrupt. If the emendation suggested above is accepted, it means the Ashurites, and is a description of the preceding section.

HABAIAH, ha-bā’ya, HOBABIAH (חֹבַבְיָה, ḫobbayāh), ḫobbayāh): A post-exilic priestly family which was unable to establish its pedigree. “Habahiah” is the form in Ezra 2:61; in the passage (Neh 7:63), AV has “Habaiah,” and RV “Hobaiah”; in the passage in 1 Esd 5:38, the form is Obdā (‘ōbdā), B, Obbead.

I. The Author.—Habakkuk (חַבָּקַק, ḫabbakkuk) means “embrace,” or “ardent embrace.” Some of the ancient rabbis, connecting the name with 2 K 4:16, “Thou shalt embrace a son,” imagined that the prophet was the son of the Shunammite woman. The LXX form of the name, ḫambakokim, Theod. Hambakovuk, presupposes the Heb ḫhabbakuk. A similar word occurs in Assyr as the name of a garden plant.

 Practically nothing is known of Habakkuk. The book bearing his name throws little light upon his life, and the rest of the OT is silent concerning him; but numerous legends have grown up around his name. The identification of the prophet with the son of the Shunammite woman is one. Another, connecting Isa 21:6 with Hab 2:1, makes Habakkuk the watchman set by Isaiah to watch for the fall of Babylon. One of the recensions of the LXX text of Bel declares that the story was taken “from the prophecy of Habakkuk, the son of Jesus of the tribe of Levi.” This must refer to an unknown apocryphal book ascribed to our prophet. What authority there may be for calling his father Jesus we do not know. The claim that he was of the tribe of Levi may be based upon the presence of the musical note at the end of the third chapter. According to the Lives of the Prophets, ascribed, though perhaps erroneously, to Epiphanius, bishop of Salamis in Cyprus during the latter part of the 4th cent. AD, he belonged to Bethqóhar, of the tribe of Simeon.

A very interesting story is found in Bel (33–39), according to which Habakkuk, while on his way to the field with a bowl of pottage, was taken by an angel, carried to Babylon and placed in the lions’ den, where Daniel ate the pottage, when Habakkuk was returned to his own place. According to the Lives, Habakkuk died two years before the return of the exiles from Babylon. All these legends have little or no historical value.

II. The Book.—It is necessary to consider the interpretation of chs 1 and 2 before giving the contents of the book, as a statement of the contents of these chapters will be determination of their meaning by their interpretation. The Chs 1 and 2 different interpretations advocated may be grouped under four:

1. According to the first view: 1:2–4: The corruption of Judah; the oppression of the righteous Jews by the wicked Chaldaeans, which calls for the Divine manifestation in judgment against the oppressors.

2. The next view: 1:5–11: Jeh in 1:12–17: The prophet is perplexed. He cannot understand how a righteous God can use these barbarians to execute judgment upon a people more righteous than they. He considers the Chaldaeans wicked, and, as the righteous are in Babylon, the Chaldaeans are worse than the Chaldaeans. 2:1–4: Jehovah solves the perplexing problem by announcing that the exaltation of the Chaldaeans will be but temporary; in the end they will meet their doom, while the righteous will live. 2:5–20: Woes against the Chaldaeans.

3. The third view also finds it necessary to alter the present arrangement of the verses 1:5–11; in their present position, they will not fit into the interpretation. For this reason Wellhausen and others omit these verses as a later addition; on the other hand, Giesebrecht would place them before 1:2, as the opening verses of the prophecy. The transposition would require a few other minor changes, so as to make the verses a suitable beginning and establish a smooth transition from ver 11 to ver 2. Omitting the troublesome verses, the following outline of the two chapters may be given: 1:2–4: The oppression of the righteous Jews by the wicked Chaldaeans. 1:5–11: Appeal to Jeh on behalf of the Jews against their oppressors. 2:1–4: Jehovah promises deliverance (see above). 2:5–20: Woes against the Chaldaeans.

4. The fourth view also finds it necessary to alter the present arrangement of the verses. Again 1:5–11, in the present position, interferes with the theory; therefore, these verses are given a more suitable place after 2:4. According to this interpretation the outline is as follows: 1:2–4: Opposition of the righteous Jews by the wicked Chaldaeans or Egyptians (G. A. Smith). 1:12–17: Appeal to Jeh on behalf of the oppressed against the oppressor. 2:1–4: Jehovah promises deliverance (see above). 2:5–11: The Chaldaeans will be the instrument to execute judgment upon the oppressors and bring deliverance to the Jews. 2:12–20: Woes against the Assyrians or Egyptians.

A full discussion of these views is not possible in this article (see Eisselen, Minor Prophets, 405–65). It may be said that any attempt to give the first interpretation, which requires no omission or transposition, seems to satisfy most completely the facts in the case.

The contents of chs 1 and 2 are indicated in the preceding paragraph. Ch. 3 contains a lyrical passage called in the title “Prayer.” The work of Jeh for his people; the thought of them causes him to tremble; nevertheless, he calls for a repetition of the ancient manifestations (ver 2). In majestic pictures the poet describes the wonderful appearances of Jeh in the past (vs 3–11) for His chosen people (vs 12–15). The remembrance of these manifestations fills the Psalmist with four and trembling, but also with joy and confidence in the God of his salvation (vs 16–19).
3. Style Driver, "is considerable. Though his book is a brief one, it is full of force; his descriptions are graphic and powerful; thought and expression are alike poetic; he is still a master of the old classical style, terse, parallelistic, pregnant; there is no trace of the often prosaic diffusiveness which manifests itself in the writings of Jeremiah and Ezekiel. And if ch 3 be his, he is, moreover, a lyric poet of high order; the grand imagery and the rhythmic flow of this ode will bear comparison with some of the finest productions of the Heb muse."

More than half of the book, including 1–5:11; 2:9–20, and ch 3 entire, has been denied to the prophet Habakkuk. If the prophecy is rightly interpreted (see above), no valid reason for rejecting 1:5–11 can be found. Vs 9–20 of ch 2 are denied to Habakkuk chiefly on two grounds: (1) The "woes" are said to be in part, at least, unsuited, if supposed to be addressed to the Chaldean king. This difficulty vanishes when it is borne in mind that the king is not addressed as an individual, but as representing the policy of the nation, as a personification of the nation. (2) The long date in ch 3:14, "cause largely of citations and reminiscences of other passages, including some late ones" (cf ver 12 with Mic 3:10; ver 13 with Jer 61:58; ver 14 with Isa 11:9; ver 16b with Jer 25:15:16; vs 18–20 with Isa 44:9 ff; Jer 10:1–16:7; Jer 10:1–16:10:19), points from the fact that the argument from literary parallels is always precarious, in this case the resemblances are few in number and of such general character that they do not necessarily presuppose literary dependence. Ch 3 is different even more persistently, but the arguments are by no means conclusive. The fact that the chapter belongs to the psalm literature does not prove a late date unless it is assumed, without good reasons, that no psalms originated in the preexilic period. Nor do the historical allusions, which are altogether vague, the style, the relation to other writers, and the character of the religious ideas expressed, point necessarily to a late date. The only doubtful verse, "the day of salvation," is famous in other than the invasion of the Chaldeans; and Driver says, not without reason, "Had the poet been writing under the pressure of a hostile invasion, the invasion itself would naturally have been emphasized, and the prophecy would be more prominent in that picture." Hence, while it may be impossible to prove that Habakkuk is the author of the prayer, it is equally impossible to prove the contrary; and while there are a few indications which seem to point to a situation different from that of Habakkuk, they are by no means definite enough to exclude the possibility of Habakkuk's authorship.

3. The Time.—The question of date is closely bound up with that of interpretation. Buddo, on the theory that the oppressors, threatened with destruction, are the Assyrians (see above, 3), dates the prophecy 621 to 615 BC. Granting that the Assyrians are in the mind of the prophet, the date suggested by Betteridge (AJ 7, 1903, 674 ff), c 701 BC, is to be preferred; but if the Assyrians are not the oppressors, then with the Assyrians fall the dates proposed by Buddo and Betteridge. If the prophecy is directed against Egypt, we are shut up to a very definite date, before 604 BC, for the Egypt supremacy in Judah continued during these years only. If the Egyptians are not the oppressors, another date will have to be sought. If the Chaldeans are the oppressors of Judah, the prophecy must be assigned to a date subsequent to the battle of Carchemish in 605–604, for only after the Chaldeans carried out a policy of world conquest and it was some years after that event that the Chaldeans first came into direct contact with Judah. But on this theory, 1:2–4:12 if; 2:8 ff, presupposes the lapse of a considerable period of conquest, the subduing of many nations, the cruel oppression of Judah for some length of time; therefore, Nowack is undoubtedly correct, on this theory, in bringing the prophecy down to a period subsequent to the first exile in 597 or, as he says, "in round numbers about 590 BC."

A different date must be sought if 1:2–4 is interpreted as referring to the oppression of Jews by Jews, and 1:5 ff, as a threat that Jeh will raise up the Chaldeans, already known as a nation thirsting for blood, to punish the wickedness of Judah. These voices would seem to indicate (1) that the Chaldeans had not yet come into direct contact with Judah, and (2) that they had already given exhibitions of the cruel character of their warfare. Nebuchadnezzar advanced against Judah about 600 BC; but the years since the fall of Nineveh, in 607–606, and the battle of Carchemish, in 605–604, had given abundant opportunity to the Chaldeans to show what could be done. But the prophet and his contemporaries to become acquainted with this cruel successor of Nineveh. On this theory, therefore, the prophetic activity of Habakkuk must be assigned to shortly before 600 BC.

If Habakkuk prophesied about 600 BC, he lived under King Jehoiakim. The pioues and well-meaning Josiah had been slain in an attempt to stop the advance of Egypt against Assyria. With his death the brief era of reform ended. No prophet ever did more to prepare the way for a reign of three months Jehoahaz was deposed by Pharaoh-nechoh, who placed Jehoiakim on the throne. The latter was selfish, tyrannical and godless. In a short time the deplorable conditions of Manasseh's reign returned. It was this situation that caused the prophet's first perplexity: "O Jeh, how long shall I cry, and thou wilt not hear? I cry out unto thee of violence, and thou wilt not save" (1:2).

IV. Its Teaching.—In the Book of Hab a new type of prophecy is developed. It is directed to a calamity other than the invasion of the Chaldeans; and Driver says, not without reason, "Had the poet been writing under the pressure of a hostile invasion, the invasion itself would naturally have been emphasized, and the prophecy would be more prominent in that picture." Hence, while it may be impossible to prove that Habakkuk is the author of the prayer, it is equally impossible to prove the contrary; and while there are a few indications which seem to point to a situation different from that of Habakkuk, they are by no means definite enough to exclude the possibility of Habakkuk's authorship.

The Book of Hab is a book of religious reflection. It exhibits the communion and questionings of his soul—representative, no doubt, of many other pious spirits of the time—with God; and records the answers which the Spirit of God taught him for his own sake and for the sake of tried souls in every age.

Habakkuk has been called the prophet of faith. He possessed a strong, living faith in Jeh; but he, like many other pious souls, was troubled and perplexed by the apparent inequalities of life. He found it difficult to reconcile these with his lofty conception of Jeh. Nevertheless, he does not sulk. Boldly he presents his perplexities to Jeh, who points the way to a solution, and the prophet comes forth from his trouble with a faith stronger and more profound. It is in connection with his attempts to solve the perplexing problems raised by the unpunished sins of his countrymen and the unlimited success of the Chaldeans that Habakkuk gives utterance to two sublime truths:
(1) Jeh is interested not only in Israel. Though Habakkuk, like the other prophets, believes in a special Divine Providence over Israel, he is equally convinced that Jeh’s rule embraces the whole earth; the destinies of all the nations are in His hand. The Chaldaeans are punished not merely for their sins against Judah, but for the oppression of other nations as well. Being the only God, He cannot permit the worship of other deities. Temporarily the Chaldaeans may worship idols, or make might their god, they may “sacrifice unto their net,” and burn incense “unto their drag,” because by them “their portion is fat and their food plenteous”; but Jeh is from everlasting, the Holy One, and He will attest His supremacy by utterly destroying the boastful conqueror with his idols.

(2) The second important truth is expressed in 2:4: “The righteous shall live by his faith” (ARVm “faithfulness”). Faithfulness assures the wrinkled exiled of his posterity. The thought “expressed by the prophet is not identical with that expressed by the apostle who quotes the words (Gal 3:11); nevertheless, the former also gives expression to the truth of prophecy and significance. “Faithfulness” is with the prophet an external thing; it signifies integrity, fidelity, steadfastness under all provocations; but this implies, in a real sense, the NT conception of faith as an active principle of right conduct. A living faith determines conduct; religion and ethics go hand in hand, and esp. in the hour of adversity a belief in Jeh and unflinching reliance upon Him are the strongest preservers of fidelity and integrity. Faith with them was dead; faith expresses itself in life. Habakkuk places chief emphasis upon the expressions of faith, and he does so rightly; but in doing this he also calls attention, by implication at least, to the motive power behind the external manifestations. As an expression of living faith, 3:17-19 is not surpassed in the OT.

HABAZINIAH (חֲבָצִיָּה), həḇātsīyāh. Thus in AV, but more correctly as in RV HABAZINIAH, hāḇāzī-nā’ (Jer 35:3): The grandfather of Jazaniah, who was the leader of the Rechabites who were tested by Jeremiah as to their obedience to their ancestor’s command with reference to wine. Their loyalty and the commands of Jonadab was effectively used by Jeremiah in an appeal to the people of Judah to obey the words of Jeh.

HABERGON, hab’er-gon, hāb’er-gon, AV (N T E, tah’dá): In RV, Ex 28 32; 39 23, etc., “coat of mail”; in Job 41 26, “pointed shaft,” m “coat of mail,” See Arms, Armor.

HABITATION, hab-i-tā’-shun: Properly a place of sojourn or dwelling. The term in AV representing some 16 Heb words (miskhāh, mishkān, mishkān, nēkh, etc.), and 6 Gr words, is variously changed in certain passages in RV, as Gen 49 5, “swords”; Lev 13 46, “dwellings”; Job 6 24; Jer 26 306. 37, “fold”; Ps 89 14; 97 2, etc., “foundation”; Ps 132 5, “tabernacle”; Lk 15 9, “tabernacles,” etc. Conversely, “habitation” appears in RV for AV “dwelling place” in 2 Ch 30 27; Ps 79 7; “house”; Ps 83 12; 2 Cor 2 6, “tabernacle,” Acts 7 46, etc. See House. HABOR, hāb’or (חַבֹּר), həḇōr; ’Aḇōr, Habōr, ‘Aḇōr, Habōr; Lorid of Charax, Abaras [’Aḇẇpə̇š]. Zosias, Abaros): Is described in 2 K 17 6; 18 11 (cf 1 Ch 5 26) as “the river of Gozan.” It is the Arab. Ch, equably by 24; swords “fold”; 3, descriptive 97 Tiglath-pileser 37, parallel, the valley of the Tigris on the W. The river ultimately joins the Euphrates after receiving its chief tributary, the Janghia Su (Mygdonius), at Ctesiphon (Kirkisayeh). The meaning of its name is doubtful, but Delitsch has suggested a Sumerian etymology, namely, hābor, “the fish-waterway,” or it may be connected with “mother Habor,” a descriptive title of Timat (see MERODACH; RAHAH). Layard found several interesting Assyrian remains in the district, including man-headed bulls bearing the name of Mı̂zek-Nabu, probably an Assy governor. Philological considerations exclude the identification of the Chebar of Ezek 1 3, etc., with the Habor.

HACALIAH, hak-a-l’a (חָכָלָי), hāḵālāy, meaning doubtful, perhaps “wait for Jeh”; AV Hachaliah: Father of Nehemiah ( Neh 1 1; 10 1).

HACHILAH, hak-a-l’a, hill of (חָכִילָה), hāḵhĩlāh; A hill in the wilderness of Judah, associated with the wanderings of David. It is stated (1 S 23 19) to be “on the S. of the desert” (or Jeshimon), and (1 S 26 1) to be “before [on the front (i.e. edge) of the desert. It was near Ziph and Maon. The only plausible hypothesis is that it is represented by the ridge Daharē el-Kôlah in the wilderness of Ziph, toward the desert of En-gedi (PEF, III, 313, Sh XXI).

HACHMONI, hak-mo’ni, hak’mō-ni, or probably HACHMONITE (חֲחַמוֹנִי), h̄ah-khмонί, “wise”): The same word is rendered “Hachmoni,” a proper name, in 1 Ch 27 32 and “a Hachmonite” in 1 Ch 11 11. The form of the Heb word suggests that the latter tr should be adopted in both passages, and that it describes the warrior in one case, and the companion or tutor of David’s sons in the other, as a member of a certain family—a Hachmonite of which nothing further is known. 2 S 23 8, “Josheb-bashebeth a Tachchemonite,” bears the marks of a corrupt text, and should be || with 1 Ch 11 11 so far as the name goes, reading Jashobeam the Hachmonite, So Kluetermon, Driscoll, Wellhausen, Budde, etc. GEORGE RICE HOVEY HADAD, hād-dad: (1) (חָדָד, “sharpness,”): One of the twelve sons of Ishmael (Gen 25 15, where AV, following a mistake in Heb text, has “Adad”); but “Hadad” is found in passage 1 Ch 1 30; RV reads “Haddad” in both places).

HADADEZER, had-ad-e'zer (חָדָדֵזֶר), a king of Damascus, whose name is found in Scripture in the names of Syrian kings, Benhadad, Hadadezer. The god Hadad (perhaps, 'maker of loud noise') is mentioned in Assyrian inscriptions, and called on the monolith of Shalmaneser the god of Aleppo. In the Assyrian inscriptions he is identified with the air-god Rimmon or Rimmon. The union of the two names in Zec 12 11 suggests this identity, though the reference is uncertain, some regarding Hadadrimmon as the name of a place, others as the name of the god. 'Hadad' (בַּדַּד) and the name 'Hadad' is found in various other forms: Adad, Dadu, and Dadda. See A. H. Sayce in HDB s.v. 'Hadad'.

GEORGE RICE HOVEY

HADADEZER, had-ad-e'zer (חָדָדֵזֶר), hâdâdâhk'ezer; cp. 2 S 8 1; 1 K 11 23; but הָדָד, hâdâd'hazer, 2 S 10 1; 1 ch 18; Mentioned in connection with David's wars of conquest (2 S 8 3 f.; 2 S 10 1-19; 1 ch 18 3 f.); was king of Zobah in Syria. The exact position and size of this Syrian principality are uncertain, but it seems to have extended in David's time southward toward Ammon and eastward to the Ephrathites. When the Ammonites had put themselves in the wrong with David by the insult done to his ambassadors (2 S 10 1-5) they summoned to their aid against the encamped king of Israel the Syrians of various adjoining principalities, among them the Syrians of Zobah under Hadadezer, the son of Rehob. The strategy of Joab, who set the force under command of Abishai his brother in array against the Ammonites, and himself attacked the Syrian allies, won for Israel a decisive victory. Not content with this result, Hadadezer gathered together another Syrian force, summoning this time also 'the Syrians that were beyond the River' (2 S 10 16), with Shobach the chief against them at the pass of Mount Hermon, so that Israel might be left between its enemies. When this occasion Shobach himself took command of the Israelitish forces, and again defeated them near Helam, Shobach being left dead on the field. Hadadezer and his Syrian vassals, finding resistance hopeless, 'made peace with David, and served them' (2 S 10 19). For the name Hadad—or Hadarezer see BENHADAD.

HADADRIMMON, hâd-dâd'rim'on, had-ad-rim'mon (חָדָדֵדַּם הָרִים), hâdâdâh'dâh rim'môn): A name which occurs, along with Megiddon, in Zec 12 11. It was long thought that this was a place in the plain of Megiddo, and that the mourning referred to was that for Josiah, slain in battle with Pharaoh-nechoh (2 K 23 29). This last, however, was certainly at Jerus. Jerome (Comm. on Zec) identifies Hadadrimmon with Maximopolis, a village not improbably Legie, the ancient Megiddo. Possibly, however, the form 'Hadadrimmon' has arisen through the combination of two divine names; and the weeping may be that for Tammuz (Ezk 8 14), with whom the old Sem deity had become confused in the popular mind.

HADASHAH, ha-dâ'sha, ha'dâ-sâ (Hadad), hâdâdâhk'hâth (new): A town in the Shephelah of Judah, named with Zemar and Mikdash-god (Josh 15 37). According to the Mish (Er 2 7), it was the smallest town in Judah. It is not identified.

HADASSAH, ha-dâ'sâ (Hadad), hâdâhâakh'hâth (myrtle): The Heb name (Est 2 7) formerly borne by Esther (q.v.).

HADATIAH, ha-da'tâ (Hadad), hâdâhâtk'hth (new): See HAZOR.

HADES, hâ'des ('A'des, Haides, ἡ θάνατος, hades), 'not to be seen': Hades, Gr originally Haidos, in genitive, 'the house of Hades,' then, as nominative, designation of the abode of the dead itself. The word occurs in the NT in Mt 11 23 (cf. Lk 10 15); 16 18; 18 22; Acts 2 27-31; Rev 1 18; 6 8; 20 13f. It is also found in TR 1 Cor 15 55, but here the correct reading (Tischendorf, WH; RV) is probably ἤθανατος, 'O Death,' instead of ἡ αιωνία, 'O Hades.' AV renders 'Hades' by 'hell' in all instances except 1 Cor 15 55, where it puts 'grave' (m 'hell') in dependence on Hos 13 14. RV everywhere has 'Hades.'

In the LXX Hades is the standing equivalent for Sheol, but also translates other terms associated with Sheol, such as death and the state after it.

1. In OT: The Gr conception of Hades was that of a locality receiving into itself all the dead, but divided into two regions, one a place of torment, the other of blessedness. This conception should not be rashly transferred to the NT, for the latter stands not under the influence of Gr pagan belief, but gives a teaching and reflects a belief which model their idea of Hades upon the OT through the LXX. The OT conception of Hades, while formally and historically bearing a close resemblance to Hades, was not the common receptacle of all the dead, differs from it, on the one hand, by the absence of a clearly defined division into two parts, and, on the other hand, by the emphasis placed on its association with death and judgment of the dead and the grave, when it is a person's death, it is the case with the OT vision of the judgment of the dead, when the dead are called to account, and when they are judged to be a people or a nation. The OT thus concentrates the partial light it throws on the state after death on the negative, undesirable side of the prospect apart from redemption. When in the progress of OT revelation the state after death begins to assume more definite features, and becomes more sharply differentiated in dependence on the religious and moral issue of the present life, this is not accomplished in the canonical writings (otherwise in the apocalyptic literature) by dividing Sheol into two compartments, but by holding forth to the righteous the promise of deliverance from Sheol, so that the latter becomes more definitely outlined as a place of evil and punishment.

The NT passages mark a distinct stage in this process, and there is, accordingly, a true basis in Scripture for the identification in a

2. In NT: A certain aspect of Sheol—Hades—with Hades as hell as reflected in AV. The theory according to which Hades is still in the NT the undifferentiated provisional abode of all the dead until the day of judgment, with the possibility of ultimate salvation even for those of its inmates who have not been saved in this life, is neither in harmony with the above development nor borne out by the facts of NT usage. That dead believers abide in a local Hades cannot be proven from 1 Thess 4:16; 1 Cor 15:25, for these passages refer to the event of the resurrection, not to a gathering-place of the dead. On the other hand Lk 23:43; 2 Cor 15:5; 1 Cor 15:35; Phil 1:23; Rev 6:9; 7:9; 15:2ff teach that the abode of believers immediately after death is with Christ and God.

It is, of course, a different matter, when Hades, as not unfrequently already the OT Sheol, designates not the place of the dead but the state of death or disembodied existence. In this sense even the soul of Jesus was in Hades, according to Peter's statement (Acts 2:27-31—on the basis of Ps 16:10). Here the abstract sense is determined by the parallel expression, "to see corruption." None the less from a comparatively early date this passage has been quoted in support of the doctrine of a local descent of Christ into Hades.

The same abstract meaning is indicated for Rev 20:13. Death and Hades are here represented as delivering up the dead on the eve of the final judgment. If this is more clearly poetical duplication of terms, Hades will stand for the personified state of death, Death for the personified cause of this state. The personification appears plainly from ver 14: "Death and Hades were cast into the lake of fire." In the number of these "dead" delivered up by Hades, believers are included, because, even on the chiliasm interpretation of vs 4-6, not all the saints share in the first resurrection, but only those "beheaded for the testimony of Jesus and for the word of God," i.e. the martyrs. A similar personifying combination of Death and Hades occurs in Rev 6:8 ("a pale horse: and he that sat upon him, his name was Death; and Hades followed with him"). In Rev 1:18, on the other hand, Death and Hades are represented as prisoners from which Christ, in virtue of His own resurrection, has the power to deliver, a representation which again implies that in some, not necessarily local, sense believers also are kept in Hades.

From these passages, when the abstract meaning prevails and the local conception is in abeyance, the remaining references to Hades, as in Lk 16:22-23 are more or less locally conceived. Of these Lk 16:23 is the only one which might seem to teach that recipients of salvation enter after death into Hades as a place of abode. It has been held that Hades is here the comprehensive designation of the locality where the dead reside, and is divided into two regions, "the bosom of Abraham" and the place of torment, a representation for which Jewish parallels can be quoted, aside from its resemblance to the Gr bisection of Hades. Against this view, however, it may be urged, that if "the bosom of Abraham" were conceived as one of the two divisions of Hades, the other division would have been named with equal concreteness in connection with Dives. In point of fact, the distinction is not between "the bosom of Abraham" and another place, as both included in Hades, but between "the bosom of Abraham" and Hades as antithetical and exclusive. The very form of the description of the experience of Dives: "In Hades he lifted up his eyes, being in torments," leads us to associate Hades as such with pain and punishment. The passage, therefore, does not prove that the saved are saved after death in Hades. In further estimating its bearing upon the problem of the local conditions of the disembodied life after death, the parabolic character of the representation must be taken into account. The parable is certainly not intended to give us topographical information about the realm of the dead, although it presupposes that there is a distinct place of abode for the righteous and wicked respectively.

The two other passages where Hades occurs in the teaching of Our Lord (Mt 11:22 [Lk 10:15]; Mt 16:18) may be similarly interpreted.

6. Mt 11:23 use of the conception, which, however, is based on the local sense. In the former utterance it is predicted of Capernaum that it shall in punishment for its unbelief "go down into Hades." As in the OT Sheol is a figure for the greatest depths known (Dt 33:22; Isa 7:11; 57:9; Job 11:5; 36:6), this seems to be a figure for the extreme of humiliation to which city was to be reduced in the course of history. It is true, ver 24, with its mention of the day of judgment, might seem to favor an eschatological reference to the ultimate doom of the unbelieving inhabitants, but the usual restriction of Hades to the punishment of the intermediate state (see below) is against this.

In the other passage, Mt 16:18, Jesus declares that the gates of Hades shall not kaischelein the church He intends to build. The

7. Mt 16:18 vb. kaischelein may be rendered, "to overpower" or "to surpass." If the former be adopted, the figure implied is that of Hades as a stronghold of the power of evil or death from which warriors stream forth to assail the church as the realm of life. On the other rendering there is no reference to any conflict between Hades and the church (or the church and the agents of death), merely the strength of the church, the gates of Hades, i.e. the realm of death, serving in common parlance as a figure of the greatest conceivable strength, because they never allow to escape what has once entered through them.

The above survey of the passages tends to show that Hades, where it is locally conceived, is not a provisional receptacle for all the dead, but plainly associated with the punishment of the wicked. Where it comes under consideration for the righteous there is nothing to indicate a local sense. On 1 Pet 3:19; 4:6 (where, however, the word "Hades" does not occur), see arta. ESCHATOLOGY OF THE NT; SURLS IN PARADISE.

The element of truth in the theory of the provisional character of Hades lies in this, that the NT never employs it in connection with the final state of punishment, as Final State subsequent to the last judgment. For the special terms that are used. Dives is represented as being in Hades immediately after his death and while his brethren are still in this present life. Whether the implied differentiation between stages of punishment, painstakingly obvious on the difference between the disembodied and reembodied state of the lost, also carries with itself a distinction between two places of punishment, in other words whether Hades and Gehenna are locally distinct, the evidence is scarcely sufficient to determine. The NT places the emphasis on the eschatological developments at the end, and leaves many things connected with the intermediate state in darkness.

HADID, hā-ḏid (חָדִית, hādāḥīth): A city in Benjamin (Neh 11:33) named with Lod and Ono (Ezr 2:33; Neh 7:87), probably identical with Adda (LXX Ἀδᾶ, Hadidda) of 1 Mac 12:83; 13:13, "over against the plain," which was fortified by Simon Maccabaeus as a rallying point for the modern el-Haditheh, about 3 miles N.E. of Lydda.

HADLAI, hadlāʾi (חַדְלָי, hadlāḥay, "resting"): An Ephraimite (2 Ch 26:12), father of Amasa, who was one of the heads of the tribe in the time of Pekah, king of Israel.
HADAROM, ha-dō'ram (הָדֹ֣רָם, ħādōrām): (1) Son of Joktan and apparently 6th in descent from Noah (Gen 10:27 [1 Ch 1:21]). (2) Son of Pero, king of Arvad, sent by his father with presents to King David (1 Ch 18:10). In 2 Sa 8:9,10, written probably incorrectly “Jo-ram,” “son of Tori.”

He was sent by Rehoboam as messenger to Israel at the time of the revolt of the ten tribes and was stoned to death by them.

HADRACH, hā-drāk, had’rak (חָדְרָךְ, hādrāḵ): “The land of Hadrach” is mentioned only once in Scripture (Zec 9:1), and there it is grouped with Damascus, Hamath, Tyre and Sidon. It may be safely identified with the “Hatarikka” of the Assyrians, and with the same name in the Hittite tables.

In the passage (Zec 9:1) Hadrach is stated to be the native land of King David’s father Jesse. It was a place of beauty, ease and solemnity.

HAGAB, hā’gab (גַּהֲב, hāghab), “locust”): Ancestor of some of the Nethinim who returned from the Babylon captivity with Zerubbabel and Nehemiah. The name occurs second after Hagabah in Ezra 2:46, but is omitted entirely from the list of Neh 7:48.

HAGABA, ha-ga’ba, hag’a-bā (גַּהֲבָה, hāghabāh): Same as the following (Neh 7:48).

HAGABAH, ha-ga’ba, hag’a-bā (גַּהֲבָה, hāghabāh), “locust”): Like Hagab, an ancestor of some of the Nethinim who returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:46); spelled Hagaba in the passage (Neh 7:48).

HAGAR, hā’gār (גָּרָ֣ה, hāghār), “emigration,” “flight”; “A-yāp, Ha-gār, A-yāp, A-gār): An Egyptian woman, the handmaid or slave of Sarai; a present, perhaps, from Pharaoh when Abram diselled his wife in Egypt (Gen 12:10). Mentioned in the following of her in two passages (Gen 16:16; 21:8–21).

In the first narrative (Gen 16) it is related that Sarai, despairing at her age of having children, gave Hagar to Abram as a concubine. Abram acceded to the request, and Hagar lived in the household of Sarai. And for ten years she bore him Ishmael. Then she conceived and returned to Pharaoh’s court, and the Egyptian king ordered the removal of the child.

1. The Scornful Handmaid hold slave but the peculiar property of Handmaid her mistress (of 29:24,29), any off- and Her Flight spring which she might bear to Abram would be reckoned as Sarai’s (of 30:3–9). In the prospect of becoming a mother, Hagar, forgetting her position, seems to have assumed an insolent bearing toward her childless mistress. Sarai felt keenly the contempt shown her by her handmaid, and in angry tones brought her conduct before Abram. Now that her plan was not working out smoothly, she unfairly blamed her husband for what originated with herself, and appealed to Heaven to redress her grievance. Abram refused to interfere in the domestic quarrel, and renouncing his right over his concubine, and her claims on him, put her entirely at Sarai’s disposal.

Under the harsh treatment of her mistress, Hagar’s life became intolerable, and she fled into the wilderness, turning her steps naturally toward Egypt, her native land.

But the angel of Jehovah (who is here introduced for the first time as the medium of the theophany) appeared to her as she was resting by a spring and commanded her to return with provision of bread and water. This is an allusion to the similar provision made for Hagar in the desert.

2. Her Vision and Return promising her an innumerable seed through her unborn son, concerning whom she uttered a striking prediction (see Isra-MEL). To the angel (who is now said to be Jehovah) Hagar gave the name “Thou art a God of seeing” (RV “that seeth”), for she said, “Have I not seen him in the face of the Lord, whose manifestations were supposed to be confined to particular places, might not be expected to reveal Himself looked after him that seeth me?”—the meaning being that while God saw her, she was only while the all-seeing God in the person of His angel was departing that she became conscious of His presence. The spring where the angel met with her was called in Hebrew tradition בּּהְלַגְּרָ֗דֶה (the well of the living one who seeth me”) (RVm).

Obedient to the heavenly vision Hagar returned, as the narrative implies, to her mistress and gave birth to Ishmael, Abram being then eighty-six years old.

The idea in ver 13 is not very clearly expressed. The word תְּלִיוּ לְהוֹ (there) generally means “hither,” and there is no explanation of the “living one” in the name of the well. It has therefore been proposed to emend the Heb text and read “Have I even seen God, and lived after my seeing”—an allusion to the belief that no one could “see” God and live (cf Gen 32:30; Ex 33:20). But there are difficulties in the way of accepting this emendation.

The name of God, “a God of seeing,” would require to be interpreted in an objective sense as “a God who is seen,” and the consequent statement of Hagar that “He that seeth me liveth,” would make God, not Hagar, as in ver 13, the speaker.

The other narrative (Gen 21:8–21) relates what occurred in connection with the weaning of Isaac.

The presence and conduct of Ishmael during the family feast held on the occasion roused the anger and jealousy of Sarah who, fearing that Ishmael would share the inheritance with Help Isaac, peremptorily demanded the expulsion of the slave-mother and her son. But the instincts of Abraham’s fatherly heart recoiled from such a cruel course, and it was only after the revelation was made to him that the ejection of Hagar and her son would be in the line of the Divine purpose—for Isaac was his real seed, while Ishmael would be made a nation too—that he was led to forego his natural feelings and accede to Sarah’s demand. So next morning the bondswoman and her two sons took their provision of bread and a skin of water into the wilderness of Beersheba. When the water was spent, Hagar, unable to bear the sight of her boy dying from thirst, laid him under a shrub and withdrew the distance of a bowshot to weep out her sorrow. But the angel of God, calling to her out of heaven, comforted her with the assurance that God had heard the voice of the lad and that there was a great future before him. Then her eyes were opened to discover a well of water from which she filled the skin and gave her son to drink. With God’s blessing the lad grew up amid the desert’s hardships, distinguished for his skill with the bow. He made his home in the wilderness of Paran, and his mother took a wife for him out of her own country.

The life and experience of Hagar teach, among other truths, the temptations incident to a new position; the foolishness of hasty action and of personal mistakes. Lessons care exercised over the lonely by the all-seeing God; the Divine purpose in the life of everyone, however obscure and friendless; how God works out His great design even through seemingly harsh methods; and the strength, comfort and encouragement that ever accompany the hardest experiences of His children.
5. Critical Points in the Documents

The Isaac narrative in Leviticus and Genesis is highly complex. It is a multi-layered text that includes references to the festival of the red heifer, righteous Isaac, and the Isaac who is a child playing. The narrative in Leviticus (14:1-10) is a legal text that references the sacrifice of a lamb, but it also has a deeper meaning related to the festival of purification. In Genesis (18:1-15), the narrative is not just about righteousness but also about the covenant of God with Abraham. The text in the Dead Sea Scrolls (1QIsa) provides a different perspective on the Isaac narrative, emphasizing the role of the sons of Issachar and Issachar itself as a child playing. The Isaac narrative in the Dead Sea Scrolls is a reflection of the covenantal relationship between God and humanity.

6. Allegorical Use of the Story by St. Paul

St. Paul uses the story of Isaac to support his argument for the transition of the Jewish faith to the Christian faith. In Galatians 4:21-31, Paul refers to Isaac as an allegory for the transition from the Mosaic law to the law of Christ. He uses the story to argue that the law of the Mosaic covenant was given to Israel, but the law of the Christian faith is given to the Gentiles in Christ. In Colossians 2:16, Paul also uses the story of Isaac to emphasize the uniqueness of the Christian faith. He states that the law of Moses was a shadow of the things to come, but Christ is the substance of all things.

HAGGAI, hag'gā-i, hag'gā-i (חר‎, ḥaggay, an adj. formed from ָחר, ḥag, “fast”): The word “Haggai” may mean “festal,” the prophet having been born perhaps on a festival day; of the Rom name Festus. Heb proper names were sometimes formed from the word חרב, “iron.” Haggai may, however, be a shortened form of Haggiah (1 Ch 6:30), meaning “festival of Jeh,” as Mattaniah, or ʻAznah, and Adonias, sometimes Haggai (Ezr 2:50; and 1 Esd 2:51). Haggai is the 10th in the order of the Twelve Prophets.

Little is really known of his personal history. But we do know that he lived soon after the captivity, being the first of the prophets of the Second Restoration. From 2:2 of his prophecies cies it is inferred by many that he had seen the first temple, which, as we know, was destroyed in 586 BC. If so, he must have prophesied when a comparatively old man, for we know the exact date of his prophecies, 520 BC. According to Ezr 5:1; 6:14, he was a contemporary of Zechariah, and was associated with him in the work of rebuilding the temple; besides, in the Gr and Lat and Syr VSS, his name stands with Zechariah's at the heads of certain Psalms (Ps 112, 113, in the Vulg alone; Ps 125, 126, in the Pesh; Ps 137, in the LXX alone; Ps 145, 147, 148, in LXX and Pesh; and Ps 145, in LXX, Pesh and Vulg; perhaps these psalms were introduced into the temple-service, with their references to the prophet of great faith (cf 2:1–5); it is possible that he was a priest also (cf 2:10–19). Like Malachi he bears the name of “Jeh’s messenger” (1:13; cf Mal 3:1). According to Jewish tradition, he was a member of the house of Great Synagogue in Jerusalem.

Haggai's work was intensely practical and important. Jeh employed him to awaken the conscience and stimulate the enthusiasm of his compatriots in the rebuilding of the temple. “No prophet ever appeared at a more critical juncture in the history of the people, and, it may be added, no prophet was more successful” (Marcus Dods). Zechariah assisted him (cf Hag 1:1; Zec 1:1).

Haggai's prophecies, like Ezekiel's, are dated in the “second year of Darius” (1:1; 2:1), i.e. 520 BC. The Jews, 42,360 strong (Ezr 2:64), had returned from Babylon 10 years before. The leadership of Zerubbabel, the civil head of the community, and Joshua, the ecclesiastical. The generous edict of Cyrus had made return possible (Ezr 1:1–4). The new colonists had settled in Jerusalem and its neighboring towns of Bethlehem, Bethel, Anathoth, Gibeah, Kiriath-jearim, and others adjacent (Ezr 2:20 ff). Eager to reestablish the public worship of the sanctuary, they set about at once to erect the altar of burnt offering upon its old site (Ezr 3:2–3; cf Hag 2:4). Plans were also made for the immediate rebuilding of the temple, and the foundation stone was actually laid in the 2d month of the 2d year of the return (Ezr 3:8–10), but the work was suddenly interrupted by the jealousy of the aristocratic, semi-pagan Samaritans, descendants of the foreign colonists introduced into Samaria in 722 BC (cf 2 K 17:24–41), whose offer to cooperate had been refused (Ezr 4:1–5:24). For 16 years thereafter nothing was done toward rearing the superstructure (Ezr 4:5:24; 5:2), indeed, “the Jews became indifferent, and began to build for themselves ‘coiled houses’” (Hag 1:4). (W. H. Kosters has attempted to show that there was no return under Cyrus, and that Haggai and Zechariah, who never allude to return, but look upon the work still in the future [cf Zec 2:7], preached to the Jews who remained in Jerusalem, never having been carried by Neb-uochadnessar into captivity in 586 BC. But this theory is opposed by too many converging lines of Scriptural statement to warrant serious credence.) With the accession of Darius Hystaspes (i.e., Darius, the son of Hystaspes), the tide turned. Darius was a true successor to Cyrus, and favored religious freedom. Through the influence of the prophet Haggai and Zechariah, the people were roused from their lethargy, and the work of rebuilding was resumed with energy in 520 BC (Hag 1 14.15). The foundations were re-laid (Hag 2 18). Four years later, in the 7th year, the whole structure was completed and dedicated (Ezr 6 15). Meanwhile important events were taking place in the Pers empire. On the death of Cambyses in 522 BC, the throne had been seized by a usurper, the so-called Pseudo-Smerdis, who held it, however, for some 7 months only. He was murdered by Darius, and the latter was elevated to the throne. But this gave other ambitious pretenders cause to rebel, and many provinces revolted, among them Susiana, Media, Assyria, Armenia, Parthia, and others (cf the famous Behistun inscription). Altogether Haggai fought 19 battles in putting down his rivals, and did not succeed in vanquishing all of his foes till the year after Haggai prophesied. This account for the prophet's rapid delivery to Jeh's "shaking" the nation (5.7.21.22). Haggai expected to regard "shaking" of the nations as the precursor of the Messianic age. It was, therefore, important from the prophet's point of view, that Jeh's temple should be made ready for the Messiah's advent, that it might be opposed to the glory of the world (cf Isa 2 2–4). The exact date of Haggai's preaching was from September to December, 520 BC.

Haggai's prophecies are dated and therefore easily analyzable. They are composed of four distinct discourses, all four being delivered within 4 months' time in the year 520 BC: (1) Ch 1, delivered on the 1st day of the 6th month (September), in which the prophet reproaches the people that they were indifferent to the work of rebuilding the temple, and warns them to consider their ways; assuring them that their procrastination was not due to want of means (1 4), and that God on account of their apathy was withholding the presence of his glory (1 6). The effect was that 24 days later, all the people, including Zerubbabel and Joshua, began the work of reconstruction (1 14.15). (2) 2 1–9, delivered on the 21st day of the 7th month (October), which was above all a jubilee year in which the word had been delivered, containing a note of encouragement to those who felt that the new structure was destined to be so much inferior to Solomon's temple. The prophet, on the contrary, assures them that the latter glory of the new house shall eclipse that of Solomon's magnificent temple, for so great a "shaking" on Jeh's part among the nations will usher in the Messianic age, and the precious things of all nations will flow in to beautify it (cf He 12 26–28). (3) 2 10–19, delivered on the 24th day of the 9th month (December) which was exactly 3 months after the building had been resumed, and containing, first the first discourse, a rebuke to the people because of their indifference and inertia. The discourse is couched in the form of a parable (v 11–14), by means of which the prophet explains why the prayers of the people go unanswered. It is because they have so long postponed the completion of the temple; a taint of guilt vitiates everything they do, and blasting and mildew and hail, and the curse of Darius, the latter is present. On the other hand, if they will but press forward with the work, Jeh will again bless them, and fruitful seasons will follow their revived zeal (2 19; cf Zec 8 9–12). (4) 2 20–23, delivered on the 24th day of the 9th month, the very same day as that on which the discourse in 2 10–19 was delivered. The sequence is immediate. For when Jeh "shakes" the nations, He will establish Zerubbabel, the representative of the Davidic dynasty and the object of patriotic hopes. When the heathen powers are overthrown, Zerubbabel will stand as Jeh's honored and trusted viceroy, and as the precious signet on Jeh's hand (cf Jer 22 24; Cant 8 6).

The most striking feature in Haggai's message is its repeated claim of divine origin: 5 in the 38 verses of his prophecies, he tells us the "word of Jeh came unto him" (1 1.3; 2 1.10.20); 4 t, also, he used the formula, "Thus saith Jeh of hosts" (1 2. 5.7; 2 11); 5 t "saith Jeh of hosts" (1 9; 2 6. 9.23); and 4 t simply "saith Jeh" (1 13; 2 4.14.17). Altogether he uses the exalted phrase "Jeh of hosts" 14 t, besides 19 repetitions of the single but ineffable name "Jeh." The most striking sentence in all his prophecies is probably that found in 1 13, "Then speak Haggai, the messenger in Jeh's name unto the people." His single purpose, as we have above seen, was to encourage the building of the temple. This he seems to have regarded as essential to the purity of Israel's worship. The "four ways" (1 5 7; cf 2 15.18). His prophecies reflect the conditions of his age. He points to judgments as a proof of the Divine displeasure (1 9.10; 2 15–19) and, unlike the earlier prophets, he does not pronounce judgment on the heathen nations, but on the people of Israel and Judah. He has a task of prophecy for the world of 520 BC. The chief interest centers in the somewhat unusual parable contained in 2 10–19, which seems to be a type of prophecy for 16 years that will have been unclean in God's sight, and had brought them no blessing, because they had left the temple in ruins; and, that while a healthy man cannot give his health to another by touching him, a sick man may easily spread contagion among all the people. He then prophesies that Haggai may or may not have been a prophet, "but in so short a prophecy this elaborate allusion to ritual is very significant." Another very striking thought in Haggai's book is the repeated designation of Zerubbabel as Jeh's "servant" and "signet," whom Jeh has chosen (2 23). Wellhausen regards these words as an equivalent to making Zerubbabel the Messiah; but it is enough to think that the prophet is attempting only to restore him to the honorable position from which his grandfather, Jehoiachin, in Jer 22 24, had been degraded. Thus would the prophet link Zerubbabel, the political hope of the post-exilic congregation, to the royal line of Judah. Isaiah speaks of Cyrus in similar terms without any Messianic implication (Isa 44 28; 45 1). On the other hand, the implicit Messianic import of 2 7.8 is recognized on all sides.

Haggai's style is suited to the contents of his prophecies. While he is less poetical than his predecessors, yet parallelism is not altogether wanting in his sentence (2 8). Compared with the greater books of prophecy, his brief message has been declared "plain and unabounded," "tame and prosaic"; yet it must be remembered that he is dealing in pathos when he reproves, or in force when he exhorts. Though he labors under a poverty of terms, and frequently repeats the same formulae, yet he was profoundly in earnest, and became the most successful in his purpose of all his class. He was esp. fond of interrogation. At best we have only a summary, probably, of what he actually preached.

The critical questions involved in Haggai's case are not serious: 2 5a, for example, is wanting in the LXX; to 2 14 the LXX adds from 8. Criticism Am 5 10; 2 17 is very similar to, and seems dependent on, Am 4 9; 1 7b and 13, are rejected by some as later interpolations; while Klostermann and Marti hold that the book as a whole was not written by Haggai at all, but rather about his prophetic activity, a perfectly gratuitous assumption without any substantial proof in its favor.

HAGGI, hag'i (*Haggii, hagghi, "feast of Jehovah"): The second son of Gad (Gen 46 16; Nu 26 15). The latter refers to his descendants as Haggites, of whom nothing else is known.

HAGGIAH, ha-g'iy'a (חָגִיָּה, ḥagīyah, "feast of Jehovah"): Named in 1 Ch 5 30 as among the descendants of Levi.

HAGGITH, hag'îth (חָגִית, ḥagîth, "feastal"): According to 2 3 4; 1 K 5 11; 2 13; 1 Ch 3 2, the fifth wife of David and the mother of his fourth son, Adonijah. The latter was born in Hebron while David's capital was there (2 3 45).

HAGRI, hag'rî (*Haggirî, haghrî, "wanderers"); AV Haggeri): The father of Mihrab, one of the "mighty men" who rallied round David during his foreign wars. He is mentioned only in 1 Ch 11 38, whose I passage, 2 S 23 36, gives, instead, the name "Bani the Gadite."

HAGRITES, ha-g'rît's (חָגרִיתֵי, ḥagrîtîm): An Arab tribe, or confederation of tribes (1 Ch 5 19 20 AV "Hagrites"); 27 31 AV "Hagerite"; Ps 83 6 "Hagarenes"), against which the Reubenites fought in the days of Saul. In Gen 25 12-18 are recorded the descendants, "generations," of Ishmael, whom Hagar the Egyptian, Sarah's handmaid, bare unto Abram. (2, and possibly three, of these tribes, Jetur, Naphish and Kedemah (ver 15), appear to be identical with the 3 tribes whom the Reubenites and the other Israeliitish tribes E of the Jordan conquered and possessed (1 Ch 8). The correspondence of names in Gen and 1 Ch leaves little doubt that "Hagrite" is a generic term roughly synonymous with "Ishmaelite," designating the irregular and shifting line of desert tribes stretching along the E. and S. of Pal. Those E of Gilead," "Jetur, Naphish and Kedemah," were overthrown by Reuben: "The Hagrites were delivered into their hand, and all that were with them.... And they took away their cattle.... They dwelt in their stead until the captivity" (1 Ch 5 20-22).

These along with other Arab tribes are mentioned in the inscriptions of Tiglath-pileser III (745-727 BC). Jeter gave his name to the Ituraeans of Roman times, who were famed soldiers dwelling in Anti-Libanus. Cf Curtis, Comm. on Ch, Skinner, Gen, ICC, in loc. EDWARD MACK

HA-HIROTH, ha-hî-roth. See P.HAHIROTH.

HAI, ha'i (חָי, ḥay, "the heap"): Gen 12 8; 13 3 AV; RV At (which see).

HAIL, hâl (חָלָה, ḥalâh; "bōrādāh; xDBa撒, ḥâlâsāh): Hail usually falls in the spring or summer during severe thunder storms. Hailstones are made up of alternate layers of ice and snow. Occurrence and sometimes reach considerable size, causing great damage by their fall. Upward currents of air carry raindrops already formed to the colder regions above, where they freeze, and as they again pass through layers of cloud, their bulk increases until, too heavy to be carried by the current, they fall to the ground. Hail-storms, like thunder storms, occur in narrow belts a few miles in breadth and are of short duration. Almost without exception they hold that after these daytime. If they take place before the time of harvest they do great damage to grain and fruit, and in extreme cases have injured property and endangered life.

Hailstorms, while by no means common in Syria and Pal, are not unusual and are of great severity. They occasionally take place in Egypt.

2. In Syria

Within a few years hailstones of unusual size fell in Port Said, breaking thousands of windows.

(1) The plague of hail (Ex 9 23-24; Ps 78 47), which was a local storm, as they usually are, falling on the Egyptians and not striking the children of Israel in the wilderness. It was an instance of great severity. "There was hail, and fire mingled with the hail, very grievous, such as had not been in all the land of Egypt since it became a nation" (Ex 9 24). It took place in January, for the barley was in the car, and the flax was in bud and car in bloom" (ver 21), and caused a great damage. (2) After the battle with the Amorites at Gibeon, "Jehovah cast down great stones from heaven upon them unto Asnah, and they died: they were more who died with the hailstones than they whom the children of Israel slew with the sword" (Josh 10 11).

Hail is often spoken of as a means of punishing the wicked: "As a tempest of hail... will he cast down" (Isa 26 2); "The hail shall sweep away the refuge of lies" (ver 17); and as symbols of God's anger: "I will rain... great hailstones, fire, and brimstone" (Ex 38 22); "There shall be... great hailstones in wrath to consume it" (Ex 13 15; cf Isa 30 30; Hag 2 17; Rev 8 7; 11 19; 16 21).

Jehovah's power and wisdom are shown

5. God's controlling the hail: "Hast thou not seen from the foundations of the earth?" (Job 28 22); "Fire and hail, snow and vapor... fulfilling his word" (Ps 148 8).

HAIR, hār (חֵר, se'ar, s'ar, sa'ar, Aram. ṣaw, ṣ'aw, ṣ'ar, and their derivatives; ḫēg, thērīx, gen. case τριχος, ṭērōs, ṭōmān, kōmē): Hair was worn in different fashions by the Fashions Orientals of Bib. times, and not always in the same way among the same people in different epochs. We know this clearly from Egypt lit. and monuments, as well as from the writings of Gr authors (esp. Herodotus), that the dwellers on the Nile had their heads shaved in early youth, leaving but a side lock until maturity was attained, when this mark of childhood was taken away. Priests and warriors kept their heads closely shaved; nothing but the exigencies of arduous warfare were allowed to interfere with this custom. On the other hand, the Hebr people, like their Bab neighbors (Herod. i.105), affected long and well-cared-for, bushy curls of hair as emblems of manly beauty. Proofs thereof are not infrequent in the Scriptures and elsewhere. Samson's (Jgs 16:13,19) and Absalom's (2 S 14:26) long luxuriant hair is specially mentioned, and the Shu-lumite sings of the locks of her beloved which are "bushy [RV 'curling'], and black as a raven" (Cant 5:11). Jos (Ant. VIII, vii, 3 [185]) reports that Solomon's body-guard was distinguished by youthful beauty and "luxuriant heads of hair." In the history of Samson we read of "the seven locks of his head" (Jgs 16:19). It is likely that the expression signifies the plaits of hair which are even now often worn by the young Bedawin warrior of the desert.

It is well known that among the surrounding heathen nations the hair of childhood or youth was often shaved and consecrated at idolstrous shrines (cf Herod. ii.65 for Egypt). Frequently this custom marks an initiatory rite into the servi-tice of a divinity (e.g. that of Orotal [Bacchus] in Arabia, Herod. iii.8). It was therefore an abomination of the Gentiles in the eyes of Mohammedans, the periodical cropping of the hair, when it had become too emulous, was connected with some sort of festivity, when the weight of the hair was ascertained, and its weight in silver was given in charity to the poor. At least, the weighing of Absalom's hair (2 S 14:26) may be referred to some such custom, which is not unparalleled in other countries of barbarity in connection with the shaving-off of the hair in Ezek 5:1 is certainly out of the common. See illustration, "Votive Offering," on p. 1302.

We may also compare the shaving of the head of the Nazirite to these heathen practices, though the resemblance is mere superficial. The man who made a vow to God was re-

Nazirite responsible to Him with his whole body

Vow and being. Not even a hair was to be injured willfully during the whole period of the vow, for all belonged to

He who made the vow. The Conclusion of the Nazirite vow was marked by sacrifices and the shaving of the head at the door of the sanctuary (Nu 6:1-21), indicative of a new beginning of life. The long untouched hair was therefore considered as the emblem of personal devotion (or devotedness) to the God of all strength. Thus it was an easy step to the thought that in the hair was the seat of strength of a Samson (Jgs 16:17,29). God has numbered the very hairs of the head (Mt 10:30; Lk 12:7), which to human beings conveys the idea of the innumerable (Ps 40:12; 69:4). What God can number, He can also protect, so that not even a hair of the head might "fall to the earth" or perish. These phrases express complete safety (1 S 14:45; 2 S 14:14; 1 K 1:52; Lk 21:18; Acts 27:34).

In NT times, esp. in the Diaspora, the Jews freestly adopted the fashion of the Romans in copping the hair closely (1 Cor 11:14); still the fear of being tainted by the idolatrous practice of the heathen, which is specially forbidden in Lev

21:5, was so great that the side locks remained unbearded and were permitted to grow ad libitum.

This is still the custom among the Jews of Eastern Europe and the Orient. See also Head.

If Heb men paid much attention to their hair, it was even more so among Heb women. Long black tresses were the pride of the Jewish women and matron (Cant 5:5; Jn Hair 11:2; 1 Cor 11:5-6,15), but many of the expressions used in connection with the "coiffures" of women do not convey to us more than a vague idea. The "locks" of AV in

Cant 4:1; 6:7; Isa 47:2 (יוֹצָפָה, kōmākh) probably do not refer to the hair, but should be τίμη (as does RV, which follows the LXX) by "vail." דָּלָל, dalalah (Cant 7:5), signifies the slender threads which represent the unfinished web in the loin (cf Isa 38:12), and thence the flowing hair of women (RV "hair"). דָּלַל, dalalah (RV "tresses"), in the same ver of the Song of Songs means lit. the "gutters" at which the flocks were watered (cf Gen 30:38), and thus the long plaits of the maiden with which the lover toys and in which he is hold captive. The braiding or dressing of woman's hair is expressed in 2 K 9:30 and Jth 10:3. In NT times Christian women are warned against following the fashionable world in elaborate hairdressing (1 Tim 2:9; 1 Pet 3:3). The care of the hair, esp. the periodical cutting of the same, early necessitated the trade of the barber. The Heb word דָּלַל, dalalah,

6. Barbers is found in Ezek 5:1, and the pl. form of the same word occurs in an inscription at Cition (Cyprus) (CIS, 1856), where the persons thus described clearly belonged to the priests or servants of a temple. See Barber.

Numerous were the cosmetics and ointments applied to the hair (Ecc 9:8; Mt 6:17; perhaps Ruth 3:3), but some, reserved for sacramental purposes, were prohibited for profane use (Ex 30:22; Ps 133:2).

Such distinction we find also in Egypt, where the walls of temple laboratories were inscribed with extensive recipes of such holy oils.

while the medical papyri (see esp. Papyrus Ebers, plates 64–67) contain numerous ointments for the hair, the composition of some of which is ascribed to a renowned queen of antiquity. Even Gr and Rom medical authors have transmitted to us the knowledge of some such prescriptions compounded, it is said, by Queen Cleopatra VI of Egypt, the frivolous friend of Caesar and Antony (see my dissertation, Die über die medicinischen Kenntnisse der alten Aegypter berichtenden Papyri, etc., Leipzig, 1888, 123–32). We know from Jos (Ant, XVI, viii, 1 [233]), that Herod the Great, in his old age, dyed his hair black, a custom, however, which does not appear to be specifically Jewish, as hair-dyes as well as means for bleaching the hair were well known in Greece and Rome. It is certain that the passage Mt 5:36 would not have been spoken, had this been a common custom in the days of the Lord. A special luxury is mentioned by Jos (Ant, VIII, viii, 3 [185]), who states that the young men who formed the body-guard of King Solomon were in the habit, on festive occasions, of sprinkling their long hair with gold-dust (φιγμα χρυσος, ραβγμα χρυσος).

For the Jews the anointing of the head was synonymous with joy and prosperity (cf Ps 23:5; 92:10; He 1:9; cf also "oil of joy," Isa 61:3, and "oil of gladness," Ps 45:7). It was also, like the washing of feet, a token of hospitality (Ps 23:5; Lk 7:46).

On the contrary, it was the custom in times of personal or national affliction and mourning to wear the hair unanointed and disheveled, or to cover the head with dust and ashes (2 S 14:2; Josh 7:6; Job 2:12), or to tear the hair or to cut it off (Exr 9:3; Neh 13:25; Jer 7:29).

We have referred to the thickness of hair which supplied the Heb with a suitable expression for the conception "innumerable." Hair is also expressive of minuteness; thus the 700 left-handed men of Benjamin were able to "sling stones 8. Symbolism— at a hairbreadth, and not miss" (Jgs 16:31; 20:20; 2 Macc 6:23). Besides expressing old age (Isa 46:4), they stand for wisdom (Wis 4:9 [10]). Sometimes white hair is the emblem of a glorious, if not Divine, presence (Dnl 7:9; 2 Macc 15:13; Rev 1:14). Calamity betelling the gray-haired was doubtfully terrible (Gen 42:48; 44:29). The "hair of the flesh" is said to "stand up" (Job 4:15; Sir 27:14) when sudden terror or fear takes hold of a person. The symbolical language of Isa 7:20 uses the "hair of the feet" (see Feet) and the "beard" as synonymous with "the humble" and the "mighty of the people."

Camel's hair (Mt 3:4; Mk 1:6) is mentioned in connection with the description of John the Baptist's raiment. It represents, according to Jerome, a rough skirt worn under the coat or wrapper, though a rather soft fabric is produced in Arabia from the finer wool of the camel.

Goat's hair was the material of a cloth used for wearing apparel and for a more or less waterproof covering of tents and bundles. It is probably the "black tent-cloth of Kedar" (Cant 1:5; Ex 26:7; 36:14). In NT times it was the special product of St. Paul's native province, Cilicia, whence its name cedium, and its manufacture formed the apostle's own trade (Acts 18:3). It is also mentioned as a material for stuffing pillows (1 S 19:13). See also Weaving.

HA-JEHUDIJAH, ha-je-hu-di'ja (حاشعيء, ha-ya-hudiyah): Named in the genealogical list (1 Ch 4:18). Possibly a proper name (RVm), but probably "the Jewess" (RV). May be so given in order to distinguish from the Egypt named in this verse. AV translates "Jehudi."

HAKKATAN, hak'a-tan (חָקְטָן, ha-k'at'an, "the little one"): The father of Johanan, who returned with Ezra to Jerusalem (Ezr 8:12–Akeran, 1 Ead 8:38).

HAKKOZ, hak'oz (חָקָז, hakk'oz, or ha-k'oz, "the nimble"): (1) A priest and chief of the 7th course of Aaron's sons selected by David (1 Ch 24:10). According to Ezr 2:61; Neh 3:2; 7:63, his descendants returned with Zerubbabel from the captivity. But AV considers the name in Ezr and Neh as having the art. prefixed, hence renders "Koz." (2) One of Judah's descendants (1 Ch 4:8).

HAKUPHA, ha-k'ufa (חָקֵפָה, hak'apha), "incitement"): A family name of some of the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (Ezr 2:51; Neh 7:53).

HALAH, ha-la (הָלָה, halah; "A'lah, Halak, Z'u'da, Halade, XaXa, Chatob, for XaXa, Chalal, XaXa, Chalad; Vulg: Hala"): Mentioned in 1. Many 2 K 17:6; 18:11; 1 Ch 5:26, as identifications of the places to which the kings of ancient Armenia and the led Israelites (see Gozan; Habor). Various identifications have been proposed, all of them except the last more or less improbable for philological reasons: (1) the Assyrl Kala (Nimrud, the Calah of Gen 10:11); (2) the Assyrl Hakkak (Cilicia);
(3) Chalkitis in Mesopotamia (Ptol. v.18, 4), adjoining Gauzanitis (Gozan) —a good position otherwise; (4) the Calachene of Strabo, in the N. of Assyria. Equally unsuitable, and (5) the Chalchitis, and Strabo, N.E. of Assyria, notwithstanding that this was apparently called Hakal by the Syrians. An attractive identification was (6) with the river Balkh (by change of H into B) to that of LXX “in Halac and in Habor, rivers of Gozan” —but even this has to be abandoned in favor of (7) the Assyry Halahju, which

It is mentioned in the W. Asia Inscrip-Thems II, pl. 53, l. 30, between Arrapha (Arrapachitis) and Rasappu (Reseph). According to thetablet K. 123, where it is called ma't Halalibu, “the land of Halakhu,” it apparently included the towns Se-Isa, Se-Arisu, Lu-ammu’ti, and Se-Akakulani, apparently four grain-producing centers for the Assyrian government. The first quotation implies that Halah was near or in Gauzanitis, and had a chief town of the same name. Of the 8 personal names in K. 123, 5 are Assyrian, the remainder being Syrian rather than Israelite.

HALAK, hâl’lak, MOUNT (חַלֹק, הָֽלָֽקָּר הָֽלָֽקָּר): A mountain that marked the southern limit of the conquests of Joshua (Josh. 11 17; 12 7).

It is spoken of as the “mount Halak” (lit. “the bare or “smooth mountain”) that goeth up to Seir.”

The latter passage locates it on the W. of the Arabah. The southern boundary of the land is defined by the ascent of Akrabhum (Nu 34 4; Josh. 15 3).

This may with some certainty be identified with the point known today as nabl es-Safa, “pass of the smooth rock,” through which runs the road from the S. to Hebron. To the S.W. opens Wady Maderah, a continuation of Wady el-Fikrak, in which there rises a conspicuous hill, Jebel Madnerah, composed of limestone, answering well the description of a bare or smooth mountain. It is a striking feature of the landscape viewed from all sides, and may well be the mount here referred to. See also Hor, Mount.

HALAKHA, ha-lâ'ka. See TALMUD.

HALF, hâf, vb., HALING, hâl'ing (OE halen): “To pull” or “drag,” the AV tr of swî, swîd, “to draw or drag.” (Acts 8 3, “haling men and women,” ARV “dragging”), and of katarw, katastrw, “to drag down” or “force along” (Lk 12 58, “lest he hale thee to the judge,” ARV “lest haply he drag thee unto the judge”). A more frequent modern form is “haul.”

HALF, hâf. See NUMBER.

HALHLUL, ha-hul (חָלָל, חָֽלֶל): A city in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 58), “Halhul, Beth-zur and Gedor.” It is without doubt the modern Halbâl, a village on a hill, surrounded by fine fields and vineyards, some 4 miles N. of Hebron and less than a mile to the E. of the modern carriage road. It is conspicuous from a considerable distance on account of its ancient mosque, Wely Nebi Yânas, the “shrine of the Prophet Jonah”—a tradition going back at least to the 14th cent. The mosque, which has a minaret or tower, is built upon a rock platform artificially levelled. In the 14th cent. it was stated by Isaac Chilo (a Jewish pilgrim) that the tomb of Gad the Seer (1 S 22 5; 2 S 24 11 f) was situated in this town. Beth-zur (Beit Sûr) and Gedor (Jethro) may be both near. In Jos (Jud, IV, ix, 6) we read of an Alurus (where the Idumaeans assembled), and in Jerome (OS 119 7) of a village

Alula near Hebron, which both probably refer to the same place (PEF, III, 305; Sh XXI).

HAL, hâl’ (טוּת, בַּל): A term used with Helkath, Beten and Achshaph on the border of Asher (Josh 19 25). No certain identification is possible; but it may be represented by the modern Khirbet ‘Alta, c 13 miles N.E. of Acre.

HALICARNASSUS, hal-i-kâr-nas’us (Ἀλεξάν-드ρωτος, Ἡλίκαρνασσός): The largest and strongest city of the ancient country of Caria in Asia Minor, situated on the shore of a bay, 15 miles from the island of Cos. Its site was beautiful; its climate temperate and even; the soil of the surrounding country was unusually fertile and noted for its abundance of fig, orange, lemon, olive and almand trees. When the ancient country fell into the possession of the Persians, the kings of Caria were still permitted to rule. One of the rulers was the famous queen Artemisia who fought at the battle of Salamis. The most famous of the kings, however, was Maussollos (Mausolús), who ruled from 373 to 353 BC, and the tomb in which he was buried was long considered one of the wonders of the ancient world. Pliny describes the tomb as a circular structure, 140 ft. high, 411 ft. in circumference, and surrounded by 36 columns; it was covered with a pyramidal dome. The ancient writer Vitruvius, in his description of the city, says that the tomb was built along the shore; back of it was the mausoleum, and still farther away was the temple of Mars. To the right of the agora were the temples of Venus and Mercury, and to the left was the palace of Maussollos. Alexander the Great destroyed the city on account of a long siege, but he was unable to take the acropolis. The city never quite recovered, yet it was later distinguished as the supposed birthplace of Herod-cus and Dionysus. That a number of Jews lived there is evident from the fact, according to 1 Mac 15 23, that in the year 139 BC, a letter was written by the Roman Senate in their behalf. In the 1st cent. BC, a decree was issued granting to the Jews in Halicarnassus liberty to worship “acto the Jewish laws, and to make their prosneuchë at the sea-side, according to the customs of their forefathers” (Jos, Ant, XIV, x, 23).

The modern town of Bodrum, which represents the ancient Halicarnassus and covers a part of its site, stands only a mile to the W. of the modern village of St. Peter. This castle was erected by the Knights of Rhodes in 1404 AD, partly from the ruins of the mausoleum. Lord Redcliffe, who explored the ruins in 1846, sent many of the sculptured slabs from the castle to the British Museum where they may now be seen. Sir C. Newton conducted excavations there in 1857–88, adding other sculptures to the collection in the British Museum. He discovered the foundation of the Ionic temple of Aphrodite, and the greement of the foundation of the mausoleum which modern Turkish houses had been built. He also opened several tombs which were outside the ancient city. The city walls, built by Maussollos about 360 BC, and defining the borders of the ancient city, are still preserved; but the ancient harbor which was protected by a mole, has now disappeared. The ruins may best be reached by boat from the island of Cos.

HALLEL, ha-lâ’l, ha-l’l: In the fifth book of the Psalms (107–50) there are several groups of Hallelujah Psalms: 104–6; 111–13; 116–17; 135; 146–50. In the worship of the synagogue Pss 135-136 and 146-50 were used in the daily morning service. Pss 113-18 were called the "Egypt Hallel," and were sung at the Passover festivities. In Pss 113 and 114 (according to the school of Shammai only) Ps 113 were sung before the feast, and Pss 115-18 after drinking the last cup. The song used by Our Lord and the disciples on the night of the betrayal (Mt 26 30), just before the departure for the Mount of Olives, probably included Pss 116-18.

Halleljah, hal-le-lö'ya (חַלְלָיָ֑ה), hal-lö-yah, "praise ye Jeh;" ἀλληλουιά, alleluia): The word is not a compound, like many of the Heb words which are composed of the abbreviated form of "Jehovah" and some other word, but has become a compound word in the Gr and other languages. Even if the Jews perhaps had become accustomed to use it as a compound, it is never written as such in the text. In some Ps. H. is an integral part of the song (Ps 133 5), while in others it simply serves as a liturgical interjection found either at the beginning (Ps 111) or at the close (Ps 104) of the psalm or both (Ps 66). The H. Ps are found in three groups, 104-106 113-115 110-50. In the first group H. is found at the close of the psalm as a lit. interjection (106 1 is an integral part of the psalm). In the second group H. is found at the beginning (113 9 is an integral part of the psalm dependent on the adj. "h61-ed") In the third group H. is found both at the close and at the beginning of the psalms. In all other cases (Pss 115, 116, 117) H. seems to be an integral part of the psalms. These three groups were probably taken from the creation of psalms like the group of Ps 130-34. In the NT H. is found as part of the song of the heavenly host (Rev 19 1). The word is preserved as a liturgical interjection by the Christian church generally.

Hallohes, ha-lö-thes (חַלְלֹ֑הַס), ha-lethes, "the whisperer," "the slanderer"): A post-exilic chief whose son Shallum assisted in repairing the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3 12, AV "Hallohes"). He was also one of the leaders who signed the national covenant (24 Deh 25).

Hallo, hal'oh, HAWLOWED, hal'od, hal'od-ed "to render or treat as holy," AS hlyqan, from hdyq, "holy"): It translates several forms of כָּדָשׁ, kôdash, "set apart," "devote," "consecrate," frequently rendered in AV, RV, ARV "consecrate," "dedicate," "holy," and esp. "sanctify." "Closely synonymous, "hallow" perhaps containing more of the thought of reverence, sacredness, holiness. It embraces the idea of marked separateness. It is applied to persons, as the priest (Lev 22 23); to places or buildings as the midst of the camp (Lev 16 32); to God (K 8 64; P 16 9; Ez 43 3); to things, like the portion of the sacrifice set apart for the priests (Nu 18 8); to times and seasons, as the Sabbath (Jer 17 19; Ez 20); and the Jubilee year (Lev 25 10); to God Himself (Lev 20 24). Its underlying idea of the separateness of holy nature or holy use works out into several often overlapping senses: (1) To set apart, dedicate, offer, reserve, for the worship or service of God: Ex 28 38, "The holy things, which the children of Israel shall make all their gifts;" also Lev 22 3; Nu 18 29; Ez 3 8; Jer 12 4, "All the money of the hallowed things" (AV "dedicated"); (2) To make holy, by selecting, setting apart, claiming, or acknowledging as His own: Gen 2 3, "God blessed the seventh day, and hallowed it" (AV "sanctified"); but Ex 20 11 (AV, ERV, ARV), "hallowed." So of the temple (1 K 9 7); of the firstborn, spared in Egypt (Nu 3 13). (3) To dedicate or consecrate by formal ceremonial, with the accompanying idea of cleansing from sin and uncleanness: 20, "This is the thing that thou shalt do unto them [Aaron and his sons] to hallow them, to minister unto me in the priest's office."

The whole chapter is devoted to the elaborate ceremonial, consisting of ablutions, endowment in priestly robe and paraphernalia, anointing with oil, the offering of a bullock for a sin offering and of a ram, the placing of the blood of another ram upon the right ear, right thumb, right great toe of each, the wave offering, the anointing of the holy garments, and the eating of the consecrated food, all this lasting seven days, and then repeated annually. In the completeness with which they were set apart, the deep necessity of purification, and the solemnity and sacredness of the office. The tabernacle and its furniture were similarly "hallowed" by a simpler ceremony, using the anointing oil; (4) To render formally fit for religious service, worship, or use: Lev 16 10, "Hallow it [the altar with the sprinkled blood] from the uncleannesses of the children of Israel;" Nu 2 8 11, "The Lord shall... make atonement for him, for that he sinned by reason of the dead, and shall hallow his head that same day." (5) To hold sacred, reverence, keep holy: Jer 17 22, "But hallow ye the Sabbath day," by keeping it distinct and separate, esp. (Jer 17 22) by refraining from unnecessary work, from "burring" it, or traffic (Neh 13 16). See Ex 20 8—11 (the Sabbath Commandment). (6) To revere, hold in awe, and reverence as holy and "separated from sinners" in majesty, power, sacredness: Lev 22 3, "Ye shall not profane my holy name; but I will hallow among the children of Israel." Kôdash is elsewhere tԻ "sanctify" in this connection, meaning "to be manifested in awe-producing majesty, power, or grace;" and Ex 38 28, "sanctify myself, and I will make myself known in the eyes of many nations; and they shall know that I am Jeh;" cf Ex 28 22 23, etc.

In the NT "hallow" occurs only in the "Lord's Prayer," through rendering ἅγια, Halt, hölt (חָלְּתָ), ḫol'; to limp; ἑλικός, čelobís, "lame," "crippled"): ARV in Gen 32 31 prefers "limped"; in Mic 4 6 7, Zeph 3 19, "is [or was] lame;" in Lk 14 21, ARV and ERV have "lame." In Ex 1 K 18 12 a different text of the text, in a different verbal form, is given: "How long halt ye between two opinions?" ARV renders, "How long go ye limping between the two sides?"

Ham, ham (חַם), hám; Xàu, Chdm):

The youngest son of Noah, from whom sprang the western and southwestern nations known to the Hebrews. His name first occurs in Gen 5 32, where, as in 11 19 elsewhere, it occupies the second place.

Youngest Son of Noah

In Gen 9 18 Ham is described as "the father of Canaan," to prepare the reader for vs 23—27, where Noah, cursing Ham for having told Shem and Japheth of his nakedness, refers to him as Canaan. On account of this, it has been suggested that “Canaan” stood originally in all the passages where the three brethren appear, and that it was later changed to “Ham,” except in the verses containing the curse. It seems more likely, however, that the name “Canaan” is inserted prophetically, as Noah would not desire to curse his son, but only one branch of that son’s descendants, who were later the principal adversaries of the Hebrews.

The name given, in Ps 105 23 27; 106 22 (cf 78 51), to Egypt as a descendant of Ham, son of Noah. As Shem means “dusky,” or the like, and Japheth “fair,” it has been supposed that Ham meant, as is not improbable, “black.” This is supported by the evidence of Heb and Arab, in which the word hāmān means “to be hot” and “to be black,” the latter signification being derived from the former. That Ham is connected with the native name of Egypt, Kem, or, in full pā tā en Kem, “the land of Egypt,” in Bashmurian Captive Khem, is unlikely, as this form is probably of a much later date than the composition of Gen, and, moreover, as the Arab shows, the guttural is not a true kh, but the hard breathing h, which are both represented by the Heb hēth.

Of the nationalities regarded as belonging to Ham, none can be described as really black. First on the list, as being the darkest, is Cush or Ethiopia (Gen 10 6), after which comes Mṣṣṣṣyam, or Egypt, according to Japheth, language—bothered by the Sabaeans, Halifah (Yemen), and Sheba, whose queen visited Solomon. Professor Sayce, moreover, has pointed out that ʿAḥor is the original home of the Phoenicians, who spoke a Sem language.

The sons of Ham are mentioned as having been the home of the Phoenicians, who spoke a Sem language. Professor F. L. Griffith has pointed out that the Egypt Priapic god of Panopolis (ʿAḥhrm, sometimes called Menu, but also apparently known as Khem, may have been identified with the ancestor of the Hamitic race—he was worshipped from the coast of the Red Sea to Coptos, and must have been well known to Egypt’s eastern neighbors. He regards the characteristics of Menu as being in accord with the shameseness of Ham as recorded in Gen 9 20 ff. See Japheth; Shem; Table of Nations.

Hammom (ḥāmān, ħāmān, Hammon):

1. A place E. of the Jordan named between Ashereth-karnaim and Shaveh-kirjathaim, in which Chedorlaomer smote the Zu-zim (Gen 14 5). No mention is made of its inhabiting Amorites. It is read hāhām, “with them,” instead of bḥām, “in them.” Some have thought that “Ham” may be a corruption from “Ammon”; or that it may be the ancient name of Rabbath-ammon itself.

2. A poetical appellation of Egypt: “the land of Ham” (Ps 105 23, etc) is the land of Jacob’s journeying, i.e. Egypt, and the land of Ham (Ps 78 51) are the dwelling of the Egyptians. It may be derived from the native name of Egypt, Kēm, or Khēm. See Mērez; Shēm. W. Ewing HAMAN, ḫāˈman [حرفان], hāmān; Ṭaˈav, ḫamān): A Persian noble and vizier of the empire under Xerxes. He was the enemy of Mordecai, the cousin of Esther. Mordecai, being a Jew, was unable to protrude himself before the great official and to render him his acknowledgment which was due to him in accordance with Pers custom. Haman’s wrath was so inflamed that one man’s life seemed too mean a sacrifice, and he resolved that Mordecai’s nation should perish with him. This was the cause of Haman’s downfall and death. A ridiculous notion, which, though widely accepted, has no better foundation than a rabbinic suggestion or guess, represents him as a descendant of Agag, the king of Amalek, who was slain by Samuel. But the language of Scripture (1 S 15 32) indicates that when Agag fell, he was the last of his house. Besides, why should his descendants, if any existed, be called Agagites and not Amalekites? Saul’s posterity are in no case termed Saulites, but Benjaminites or Lakeites. He has been swept away by recent discovery. Agag was a territory adjacent to that of Media. In an inscription found at Khorsabad, Sargon, the father of Sennacherib, says: “Thirty-four districts of Media I conquered; I added this and the domain of Assyria: I imposed upon them an annual tribute of horses. The country of Agaz [Agag] . . . . I ravaged, I wasted, I burned.” It may be added that the name of Haman is not Heb, neither is that of Ham. Dr. Oppert, in his “History of the Middle East,” writes M. Oppert, the distinguished Assyriologist, “as well as that of his father, belongs to the Medo-Persian.”

JOHN UHRATH

HAMATH, ḫāˈmath [حرفاث], hāmāth; ḫūˈā, ḫēˈmat, ḫiˈā, ḫamāth; Swote also has ḫemāth):

The word signifies a defence or citadel, and such designation was very suitable for this chief royal city of the Hittites, situated between their northern and southern provinces, as it was situated on a gigantic mound beside the Orontes. In Am 6 2 it is named Great Hamath, but not necessarily to distinguish it from other places of the same name. The Hamathite is mentioned in Gen 10 18 among the sons of Japheth, but not in any other place, and as the population, as the personal names testify, seems to have been for the most part Sem. The ideal boundary of Israel reached the territory, but not the city of Hamath (Nu 34 8; Josh 13 5; Ezek 13 21). David entered into friendly relations with Toi, its king (2 S 8 9 ff), and Solomon erected store cities in the land of Hamath (2 Ch 8 4). In the days of Ahab we meet with it on the eumorphic inscriptions, under the name mat hamat, and its king Irhuleni was a party to the alliance of the Hittites with Ben-hadad of Damascus and Ahab of Israel against Shalmaneser II; but this was broken up by the battle of Qarqar in 854 BC, and Hamath became subject to Assyria. Jeroboam II attacked, partially destroyed, and held it for a short time (2 K 14 28; Am 6 2). In 730 BC, its king Eini-lu paid tribute to Tiglath-pileser, but he divided its lands among his generals, and transported 1,228 families of its inhabitants. In 720 BC, Sargon “rooted out the land of Hamath and the skin of Tibi-idi [or Jaub-idi] its king, like wool,” and colonized the country with 4,300 Assyrians, among whom was Deloecs the Mede. A few years later Sennacherib also claims to have taken it (2 K 18:34; 19:13; 1 Ch 36:19; 57:13). In Isa 11, mention is made of Israel's captivity at Hamath, and Hamathites were among the colonists settled in Samaria (2 K 17:24) by Esarhaddon in 675 BC. Their special object of worship was Ashima, which, notwithstanding various conjectures, has not been identified.

The Hamathite country is mentioned in 1 Mac 12:25 in connection with the movements of Demetrius and Jonathan. The Seleucidae renamed it Epiphanea (Jos, Ant, 1, vi, History 2), and by this name it was known to the Greeks and the Romans, even appearing as Paphunya in Midr. Br Rab ch 37. Locally, however, the ancient name never disappeared, and since the Moslem conquest it has been known as Hama. Saladin's family ruled it for a century and a half, and after the death of Abul-Fida in 1331 it sank into decay.

The position of Hama in a fruitful plain to the E. of the Nussairiyeh Mountains, on the most frequented highway between Mesopotamia and Egypt, and on the new railway which gives it a new importance, is a singular significance, and it is once more rising in importance. The modern town is built in four quarters around the ancient citadel mound, and it has a population of about 80,000. It is now noted for its gigantic irrigating wheels. Here, too, the Hittite inscriptions were first found and designated Hamathite.

In connection with the northern boundary of Israel, "the entering in of Hamath" is frequently mentioned (Nu 13:21; 1 K 8:65).

4. Entering etc. ARV "entrance!". It has been in of sought in the Orontes valley, between Hamath Antioch and Seleucia, and also at Wady Naher el-Bardil, leading down from Homs to the Mediterranean to the N. of Tripoli. But from the point of view of Pal. it must mean some part of the great valley of Coele-Syria (Biqa'a). It seems that instead of translating, we should read here a place-name—"Libo of Hamath"—and the presence of the ancient site of Libo. Leboub, 14 miles N.N.E. of Baalbek, at the head-waters of the Orontes, commanding the strategic point where the plain broadens out to the N. and S., confirms us in this conjecture.

HAMATH-ZOBAH, hā'math-zō'ba (תֵּבַע, hāmelekh, "hot spring"): (1) "The father of the house of Rechab" (1 Ch 2:55). (2) One of the fenced cities of Naphtali, named with Zer, Rakkahat and Chinnereth (Josh 19:38).

HAMATH, ham'ath (הָמהָת, hammath, "hot spring"): (1) "The father of the house of Rechab" (1 Ch 2:55).

This is repeated by the modern el-Hammām, nearly 2 miles S. of Tiberias. It was, of course, much nearer the ancient Tiberias, which lay S. of the present city. The hot baths here, "useful for healing," in the time of Jos, have maintained their reputation. In recent years, indeed, there has been a marked increase in the number of sick persons from all parts who visit the baths. The waters are esteemed specially valuable for rheumatism and skin troubles. In the large public bath the water has a temperature of over 140° Fahr. Parts of the ancient fortification still cling to the mountain side above the baths; and the remains of an aqueduct which brought fresh water from sources in the S.W. may be traced along the face of the slopes. Hammath is identical with Hammon (1 Ch 6:76); and probably also with Hammoth-dor (Josh 21:32).

HAMMEAH, ha-m′ē-ah, ha-m′ē-a, the TOWER OF (צֵבָע, zamah'ah; נֶמֶר, nemer, "useful"): The father of Hama (Est 3:1). He is generally termed the "Agagite": the name is Pers etymology, signifying "given by the moon."

HAMMELECH, ha-m′ē-lēk (צֵבָע, zamah'elēk), "the king": Wrongly tr as a proper name in AV. It should be rendered "the king," as in ARV (Jer 36:28; 38:6).

HAMMER, ham′er: The Heb נֵפֶשׁ, madkebhebeth, occurs in Jgs 4:21, where it refers to the mallet (probably wooden) used to drive tent-pins into the ground. The same word occurs in 1 K 6:7; Isa 44:12; Jer 10:4 as applied to a workman's hammer. נָפָטָשׁ, paffesh (or Arab. jafš), occurs in Isa 41:7; Jer 22:29; 50:23. It was probably a blacksmith's hammer or heavy hammer used for breaking rock. There is doubt about the rendering of Jgs 5:26, where the word, נַפָטָשׁ, hamedOTH, occurs. From the context, the instrument mentioned was probably not a hammer. In Ps 74:6, נָפָטָשׁ, klephah, is better tr as "axes," not "hammers." See TOOLS.

JAMES A. PATCH

HAMMIPHKAD, ha-mi′fkad, GATE OF (צֵבָע, zamah'ikād, "shār ha-mi-phkād, "Gate of the Muster"): One of the gates of Jerus (Neh 3:31) not mentioned elsewhere; probably situated near the N.E. corner of the Temple area.

HAMMOLCHETH, ha-mol′ē-keth (צֵבָע, zamah'oleketh, "the queen"); LXX Μάλακης, Malacheth; AV Hammolcheth): The daughter of Machir and sister of Gilead (1 Ch 7:18).

HAMMON, ham′on (גָּלֶם, hammon, "glowing"): (1) A place on the seaward frontier of Asher, named with Rehob and Kanah (Josh 19:28), to be sought, therefore, not far from Tyre. The most probable identification so far suggested is with Lemm'el'ad, "mother of the column" (or 'Awânîm, "columns"), at the mouth of Wady Hamil, on the shore, about 10 miles S. of Tyre. An inscription found by Renan shows that the place was associated with the worship of Ba'al Hammâni (CIS, I, 8).

(2) A city in Naphthali, given to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6:76). It is identical with Hammath (Josh 19:35), and probably also with Hammath-dor (Josh 21:92).

W. Ewing

HAMMOTH-DOR, ham-oth-dö'r (נְבָה דֶּרֶךְ), hasmôth dô'r; Egyptian Emathôdrôr, as several corrupt forms); A fenced, Levitical city of Naphthali (Josh 19:36; 21:32); also named Hammon (1 Ch 6:61 Heb.). Probably the Hammata of the Karnack lists, and the hamamat of WAI, I, 53; certainly the Emmaus of Jos, Ant., XVIII, ii, 3; BJ, IV, i, 3; Hamata of Eredûhîn v. 5; Mughâlah II, and the modern el-Hammâmâ, 14 miles S. of Tiberias. The name signifies "hot springs," and these, 4 in number, still exist. They have a temperature of 144° F., are salt and bitter in taste and sulphurous in smell. Considered inviolable for rheumatism, they are crowded in June as a health resort. This health-giving reputation is of ancient date. It is mentioned in Jos, BJ, IV, i, 3; and a coin of Tiberias of the reign of Trajan depicts Hygeia sitting on a rock beside the springs, feeding the serpent of Aesculapius. Being used for pleasure also, they were submitted to the Jews on the Sabbath, whereas they had been used only medicinally, they would have been forbidden (Talm Bab, Shab 109a; cf. Mt 12:10).

HAMMUEL, ham't-el (הַמָּעָל), hammâ'el, "ravir of God"): A son of Mishma, a Simeonite, of the family of Shaul (1 Ch 4:26).

Hammurâbi, hammûrâbî; 1. Etymology of his name, with reference to Amraphel. His Dynasty.
2. The years following his accession.
4. The Capture of Rim-Sin.
5. Various Works, and an expedition to Mesopotamia.
6. His final years.
7. No record of his expedition to Palestine.
8. The period when it may have taken place.
9. Hammurâbi's greatness as a S. J. By

The name of the celebrated warrior, builder and lawgiver, who ruled over Babylonia about 2000 BC.

In accordance with the suggestion of the late Professor E. Schrader, he is almost universally identified with the ancient ruler, of Gen. 14:1, etc. (q.v.). Hammurâbi was apparently not, with reference to Bab origin, the so-called "Dynasty of Babylon," to which he belonged, having probably come from the W. dynasty.

The commonest form of the name is as above, but Hamûmâ(ò)-ra'bi (with ministration) is also found. The reading with initial ū in the second element is confirmed by the Bab rendering of the name as Kini'ta-rapâshû, "my family is widespread," or the like, showing that ra'bi was regarded as coming from ra'ôh, "to be great." A late letter-tablet, however (see PSBAB, May, 1901, p. 91), gives the form Ammûrâpi, showing that the initial is not really ū, and that the ū of the second element had changed to p (of Tiglath-pil-eser for Tukulti-abîl-éar, etc.). Amraphel (for Ammârâpah, Ammâbel, Amârah) would therefore seem to be due to Assyrian influence, but the final ū is difficult to explain. Professor F. Hommel has pointed out that the Bab rendering, "my family is widespread," is simply due to the scribes, the first element being the name of the Arab. deity 'Am, making 'Ammu-ra'bi, "Am is great." Admitting this, it would seem to be certain that Hammurâbi's dynasty was that designated Arabian by Berosus. Its founder was apparently Summû-râbi, and Hammurâbi was the fifth in descent from him. Hammurâbi's father, Sin-muballit, and his grandfather, Ablî-Sin, are the only rulers of the dynasty which have Bab names, all the others being apparently Arabic.

Concerning Hammurâbi's early life nothing is recorded, but as he reigned at least 43 years, he must have been young when he came to the throne. His accession was apparently marked by some improvement in the administration, the latter wherein, as Eliezer's Lists, says he "established righteousness." After this, the earlier years of his reign were devoted to such peaceful pursuits as constructing the shrines and images of the gods, and in his 6th year he built the wall of the city of Lâz. In his 7th year he took Urug (Erech) and Isin—two of the principal cities of Babylonia, implying that the Dynasty of Babylon had not held sway in all the states.

While interesting himself in all the important work of digging canals, he found time to turn his attention to the land of Yamâbûlu, and in his 10th he possibly conquered, or received the homage of, the city of Pious Maiga or Malga. Next year the city of Rim-Sin. Inauguration of Iskur, and also, seemingly, a place called Salûbû. The inauguration of Image the throne of Zer-pa'nituâ, and the setting up, seemingly, of some kind of royal monument, followed, and was succeeded by other religious duties—indeed, work of this nature would seem to have occupied him every year until his 21st, when he built the fortress or the fortification of the city Bânû. His 22nd year is described as that of his own image as king of righteousness; and the question naturally arises, whether this was the date when he erected the great stele found at Susa in Elam, inscribed with his Code of Laws, which is now in the Louvre. Next year he seems to have fortified the city of Sippur, where, it is supposed, this monument was originally erected.

Pious works again occupied him until his 30th year, when the army of Elam is referred to, possibly invading warlike Elamites who had paved the way for the great campaign of his 31st year, when, "with the help of Enûma, Anu and Enûl," he captured Yamâbûlu and King Rim-Sin, the well-known ruler of the S. By.
In his 33rd year he destroyed the army of Aznûna or Esânunak.

After these victories, Hammurâbi would seem to have been at peace, and in his 33d year he dug the canal Hammurâbi-nuhañi-û朝, "Hammurâbi the abundance of the people," bringing to the fields of his subjects fertility, "according to the wish of Enûla. The restoration of the great temple at Erech came next, and was followed by the erection of a fortress, "built on a mountain rock like a mound on the banks of the Tigris. He also built the fortification of Rabûk on the bank of the Tigris, implying preparations for hostilities, and it was possibly on account of this that the next year he made supplication to Tasmfitû, the house of Nebû. The year following (his 37th), "by the command of the gods," Enûla's fortifications of Maur and Malka were destroyed, after which the country enjoyed a twelve-month of peace. In all probability, however, this was to prepare for the expedition of his 39th year, when he subjugated Turâkû, Ragmû and Subartû, a part of Mesopotamia. The length of this yeardate implies that the expedition was regarded as being of importance. Untroubled by foreign affairs, the chief work of Hammurabi during his 40th year was the digging of the canal Tislit-Enilla, at Sippar.

6. His following this up by the restoration of the temple E-nure-ur-sag and a splendid temple-tower dedicated to Zagaga and Istar. The defences of his country were apparently his last thought, for his 43rd year, which seemingly terminated his reign and his life, was devoted to strengthening the fortifications of Sippar, a work recorded at greater length in several cylinder-inscriptions found on the site.

Unfortunately none of the documents referring to his reign makes mention of his attack, in company with the armies of Chedorlaomer, Tidal and Arioch, upon the rebellions of Sodom and Gomorrah. This naturally throws doubt on the identification of Hammurabi with the Amraphel of Gen 14:1-15. It must be remembered, however, that we do not possess a complete history either of his life or his rule. That he was a contemporary of Arioch seems undoubted, and if this be the case, Chedorlaomer and his contemporaries were too. Various reasons might be adduced for the absence of references to the campaign in question—his pride may have precluded him from having a year named after an expedition—no matter how satisfactory it may have been—carried out for another power—his saviour; or the allied armies may have suffered so severely from attacks similar to that delivered by Abraham, that the campaign became an altogether unsuitable one to date by.

If Eri-Aku were, as Thureau-Dangin has suggested, the brother of Rim-Sin, king of Larsa (Elasar), he must have preceded him on the throne, and, in that case, the expedition against Marduk in the 30th year, when he claims to have defeated Rim-Sin. As Place the date of Rim-Sin’s accession is doubtful, the date of Eri-Aku’s (Arioch’s) death is equally so, but it possibly took place about 5 years before Rim-Sin’s defeat. The expedition undertaken must therefore have been undertaken during the first 25 years of Hammurabi’s reign. As Amraphel is called king of Shinar (Babylon), the period preceding Hammurabi’s accession ought probably to be excluded.

Of all the kings of early Babylonia so far known, Hammurabi would seem to have been one of the greatest, and the country made good progress under his rule. His conquests with Elam suggest that Babylonia had become strong enough to resist that warlike state, and his title of addu or “father” of Martu (= Amuru, the Amorites) and of Yamutbālǔ on the E. implies not only that he maintained the country’s influence, but also that, during his reign, it was no longer subject to Elam. Rim-Sin’s claim to the state of Larsa, however, were not conquered until the time of Samsu-iluna, Hammurabi’s son. It is noteworthy that his Code of Laws (see above) not only determined legal rights and responsibilities, but fixed the rates of wages, thus obviating many difficulties.

Literature
1. Historical.—When Professor Meissner published, in 1898, some fragments of cuneiform tablets from the library of the Assyrian king Ashurbanipal (686-628 BC), he also then suggested that the Code parts of a copy of an Old Book of Law from the time of the so-called First Babylon Dynasty, one of the kings of which was Hammurabi (more exactly Hammurapi, c 2100 BC). A few years later this suggestion was further established. In December, 1901, and January, 1902, a French expedition under the leadership of M. J. de Morgan, the chief aim of which was the exploration of the old royal city Susa, found there a diorite stone, 2.25 m. high and almost 1 m. in circumference. This stone had a relief (see below) and 44 columns of ancient Bab cuneiform writing graven upon it. Professor V. Scheil, O.F., the Assyriological member of the expedition, recognized that this stele contains the collection of laws of King Hammurabi, and published this characteristic discovery as early as 1902 in the official report of the expedition: Délégation en Perse (Tome IV, Paris).

At the same time Scheil gave the first tr. of the text. Since then the text has several times been published, tr. and commented upon; of

The stone has the form of a column the cross-section of which is approximately an ellipse. The upper part of the face has a relief (see illustration). We see the king in supplicating attitude standing before the sun-god who sits upon a throne and is characterized by sun rays which stream out from his shoulders. As the king traced back the derivation of the Code to an inspiration of this god, we may suppose that the relief represents the moment when the king received the oracles from the mouth of the god. Lower on the face of the stone are 16 columns of text, which read from top to bottom; 7 other columns were erased some time later than Hammurabi in order to make room for a new inscription. The reverse side contains 28 columns of text.

The stone was set up by the king, toward the end of his reign of 43 years, in the temple Esagila at Babylon, the capital of his dominion (c 2100 BC). It was probably stolen from there by the Elamite king Shutruk-Nakhunte, in the 12th cent. BC, at the time of the plundering of Babylon, and set up as a trophy of war in the Elamite capital of Susa. The same king had, it would appear, the 7 columns from the face side of the stele erased in order to engrave there an account of his own deeds, but through some unknown circumstance this latter was not accomplished. After the discovery of the stele it was brought to Paris where it now forms one of the most important possessions of the Louvre.

Marduk the god of Babylon was elected king of the gods, Hammurabi was predestined by the gods "to cause justice to radiate over the land, to surrender sinners and evildoers to destruction, and to take care that the king shall not run away with the Law." Hammurabi's Code is, indeed, conceived from this standpoint.

Farther on, the king lauds his services to the principal cities of Babylonia, their temples and cults. He appears as a true server of the gods, as a protector of his people and a gracious prince to those who at first would not acknowledge his supremacy. To be sure, this introduction is not entirely free from presumption; for the king describes himself as "god of the kings" and "sun-god of Babylon"! The hopes of a Saviour, which heathen antiquity also knew, he regards as realized in his own person.

The Code itself may be divided into 12 divisions. It manifests, in no way, a very definite logical system; the sequence is often interrupted, and one recognizes that it is not so much a systematic and exhaustive work as a collection of the legal stand-ards accumulated in the course of time. Much that we would expect to find in a Code is not even mentioned.

The first five paragraphs treat of some principles of legal process. In the first place false accusation is considered. The unprovable charge of surgery is dealt with in an especially interesting manner (§ 2). The accused, in this case has to submit to an ordeal at the hands of the River-god; nevertheless nothing is said concerning the details of this ordeal. If he is convicted by the god as guilty, the accuser receives his property, in the opposite case, the accuser is condemned to death and the accused receives his house. The law also proceeds rigorously against false witnesses: in a process in which life is at stake, conscious perjury is punished with death (§ 3). Finally the king strives also for an uncorrupt body of judges; a judge who has not carried out the judgment of the court correctly has not only to pay twelve times the sum at issue, but he is also dismissed with disgrace from his office.

The next sections (§§ 6-25) occupy themselves with serious theft, burglary, robbery and other crimes of a like nature. Theft from palace or temple, or the receiving and concealing of stolen goods, is punished with death or a heavy fine according to the nature of what is stolen (§§ 6, 8). As it was a custom in Babylonia to effect every purchase in the presence of witnesses or with a written deed of sale, one understands the regulation that, in certain cases in which witnesses were not forthcoming, or a deed could not be shown, theft was assumed: the guilty person suffered death (§ 7). A careful procedure is prescribed for the case in which lost goods are found in the hands of another: he who, in the investigation, cannot prove his legitimate right, suffers death, just as a deceiver who tries to enrich himself through making a false accusation (§§ 8 ff). Kidnapping of a free child or carrying away and concealing a slave from the palace is punished with death (§§ 14 ff). As slavery had the greatest economic significance in Babylonia, detailed regulations concerning the seizing of runaway slaves and similar matters were given (§§ 17 ff). Burglary, as also robbery, is punished with death (§§ 21 ff). If a robber is not caught, the persons or corporations responsible for the safety of the land had to make compensation (§§ 22 ff). Whoever attempts to enrich himself from a building in conflagration, or from a burnt house grown into, is also punished.

The next paragraphs (§§ 26-41) cover vassalage, particularly in reference to rights and duties of a military kind, concerning which we are not yet quite clear. Here also Hammurabi’s care for those who
3. Laws concerning Vassalage and duties. The crown had, in every case, authority in reference to estates in fee which a vassal could not sell, exchange or transmit to his wife or daughters (§§ 36 ff, 41); as a rule the sons took over the estates after the death of the father together with the accompanying rights and duties. The same was the case if, in the service of the king, the father had been lost sight of (§§ 28 f).
The estates in fee of what we may call “lay-priestesses” (concerning whom we shall have to speak later) take a special position (§ 40).

not the means to do this could be sold with his family into slavery (§§ 58 ff). Special regulations protect the landowner from unlicensed grazing on his fields of crops (§§ 57 f).
The regulations concerning horticulture (§§ 59–
60) are similar; here also the relation of the proprietor to the gardener who had to plant or to cultivate the garden is carefully considered; the same is true with respect to the business liabilities of the owner. These regulations concerning horticulture are not entirely preserved upon the stele, but, through the above-mentioned duplicates, we can restore them completely.

Our knowledge concerning the legal relations between house-owners and tenants (§§ 67 ff) is less, because the parts dealing with these on the stele are entirely lost and can only be partially restored from

A longer section (§§ 41 ff) is given to immovables (field, garden, house) for the economic life of the ancient Babylonians depended first of all upon the cultivation of grain and date-palms; the legal relations of the land tenants are exactly explained (§§ 42 ff): neglect of his work does not liberate the tenant from his duties to his overlord. On the other hand, in cases of losses through the weather, he is so far released from his duties that of the rent not yet paid he has to pay only an amount corresponding to the quantity of the product of his tenancy (§§ 45 f). Also the landowner with liabilties, who suffers through failure of crops and inundation, enjoys far-reaching protection (§ 48), and his business relations generally are adequately regulated (§§ 49 ff). As the regular irrigation of the fields was the chief condition for profitable husbandry in a land lacking rain, strong laws are made in reference to this: damage resulting from neglect has to be compensated for; indeed, whoever had duplicates. Reference is once more made to vassalage (§ 71). The relations between neighbors are also regulated, but we cannot ascertain how in detail (§§ 72 ff). Concerning the precise rights of tenants and landlords we are also but slightly informed (§ 78).

On account of the gaps, we are not able to determine how far the regulations concerning immovable extended. In the gaps there seem to have been still other laws concerning business liabilities.
The number of missing paragraphs can only approximately be determined, so that our further enumeration of the paragraphs cannot be regarded as absolutely correct.

The text begins again with the treatment of the legal relations between the trader and his agents (§§ 100–107); these agents are a kind

5. Trader of officials for the trader whose business and Agent they look after. While the Code discusses their responsibilities and duties to their masters, it also protects them from unjust and deceitful ones.
The taverns of Babylonia (§§ 105–11) seem very often to have been the resort of criminals. As a rule they were in the hands of profiteers who were responsible for what took place on their premises (§ 109).

6. Taverns were sometimes made subject to the same regulations as taverns outside the city proper (§ 110).

Priestesses were forbidden to visit these houses under penalty of being burned (§ 110). The next division (§§ 112–26) deals esp. with deposits, although some of its regulations apply indirectly therewith connected. De- posit-seepers are to be punished (§ 112). The debtor is protected from violent encroachments of the creditor (§ 113). Detailed regulations are given concerning imprisonment for debt (§§ 114 ff.). The creditor must guard himself from mistreating a person imprisoned for debt, in his house; if a child of the debtor dies through the fault of the creditor, the jis talionis is resorted to: a child of the creditor is killed (§ 116). The members of a family imprisoned for debt have to be released after three years (§ 117). If anyone desires to give something to another to be saved for him, he must do it in the presence of witnesses or draw up a statement of the transaction; otherwise later claims cannot be substantiated (§§ 122 ff.).

Whoever accepts the objects is responsible for them (§ 125), but is also protected from unjustified claims of his client (§ 126).

The house occupied with the rights of the family are very extensive (§§ 127–56). Matrimonial rights rest upon a contract (§ 128).

7. Family and preserves the persistent fidelity of the wife (§§ 129 ff.), while the husband is not bound in this respect to any kind. An unfaithful wife may be thrown into the water, but the partner of her sin may also, under certain circumstances, suffer the penalty of death. Long unpreventable absence of the husband justifies the wife to marry again only when she lacks the means of support (§§ 133 ff.). On the part of the husband, there are no hindrances to divorce, so long as he settles any matters with his wife concerning her property, provides for the upbringing of the children and, in certain cases, gives a divorce-sum as compensation (§§ 137 ff.). Disorderly conduct of the wife is sufficient for the annulling of the marriage; in this case the husband may reduce the wife to the state of a slave (§ 141). The wife may only annul the marriage if her husband neglects his duties toward her (§ 142). If a wife desires the annulment of the marriage for any other reason, she is drowned (§ 143).

As a rule polygamy is not allowed. If a barren wife gives birth to a husband a slave girl who bears children to him, then he may not marry another wife (§ 144); otherwise he might do so (§ 145). The slave given to the husband is bound to show due deference to her mistress; if she does not do this she loses her privileged position, but she may not be sold if she has borne a child to the husband (§§ 146 ff.). Incurable disease of the wife is a ground for the marriage of another wife (§§ 148 ff.).

Gifts of the husband to the wife may not be touched by the children at the death of the husband, but nevertheless property has to remain in the family (§ 150). Debt contracted before the marriage by one side or the other are not binding for the other, if an agreement has been made to that effect (§ 151 f.).

Rigid laws are made against abuses in sexual life. The wife who kills her husband for the sake of a lover is impaled upon a stake (§ 163). Incest is punished, according to the circumstances, with exile or death (§ 164).

9. Concerning Wounding, usually accepted money instead (§§ etc 106 ff.). A box on the ears inflicted by a free man upon a free man cost the former 60 shekels (§ 203); in the case of one half-free, 10 shekels (§ 204); but if a slave so strikes a free man, his ear is to be cut off (§ 205). Unintentional wounding of the body, which proves to be fatal, is covered by a fine (§ 207 f.). Anyone who strikes a pregnant free woman, so as to cause a miscarriage and thereby the death of the child, is punished by having his daughter killed (§ 210); in the case of a half-free woman or a slave, a money compensation was sufficient (§§ 212 ff.).
1. Hammurabi and Moses

Hammurabi was not only king of Babylonia but also of Amurru ("land of the Amorites"), called later Pal and Western Syria. As his successors also retained the domain over Amurru, it is quite possible that, for a considerable time, the laws of Hammurabi were in force here also, even if perhaps in a modified form. In the time of Abraham, for example, one may consider the narratives of Sarah and Hagar (Gen 16:1ff.), and Rachel and Bilhal (Gen 30:1ff.), which show the same juridical principles as the Code (cf. §§144ff.; see above). Other narratives of the OT indicate the same customs as the Code does for Babylonia; cf. Gen 24:53, where the bridal gifts to Rebekah correspond to the Bab juridical terms (§154ff.).

Between the Code and the Law of Moses, esp. in the so-called Book of the Covenant (Ex 20:22—23:33), there are indeed extraordinary parallels. We might mention here the following examples:

Ex 21:2: If thou buy a female slave, six years she shall serve: and in the seventh she shall go out free for nothing.” Similarly, CH, §117: “If a man become involved in debt, and give his wife, his son or his daughter for silver or for labor, they shall serve three years in the house of their purchaser or bondmaster: in the fourth year they shall regain their freedom.”

Ex 15:1: “And he that smiteth his father, or his mother, shall be surely put to death.” CH, §185: “If a son strike his father, his hand shall be cut off.”

Ex 15:18f: “And if men contend, and one smite the other with a stone, or with his fist, and he die not, but keep his bed; if he rise again, and walk abroad upon his staff, then shall he that smote him be quit: only he shall pay for the loss of his time, and shall cause him to be thoroughly healed.” CH, §206: “If a man strike another man in a noisy dispute and wound him, that man shall swear, ‘I did not strike him knowingly;’ and he shall pay for the physician.”

Ex 21:22: “If men strive together, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart, and yet no harm follow; he shall surely be fined, according as the woman’s husband shall lay upon him: and he shall pay as the judges determine.” CH, §206: “If a man strike a free woman and cause her fruit to depart, he shall pay ten shekels of silver for her fruit.”

Ex 21:24: “Eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot.” CH, §196: “If a man destroy the eye of a free man, his eye shall be destroyed.” § 197: “If he break the bone of a free man, his bone shall be broken.” § 200: “If a man knock out the teeth of a man of the same rank, his teeth shall be knocked out.”

Ex 21:28-32: “If an ox gore a man or a woman to death, the ox shall be surely stoned, and its flesh shall not be eaten; but the owner of the ox shall be quit. But if the ox was wont to gore in time past, and it hath been testified, and he hath not kept it in, but it hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and its owner also shall he put to death. . . . If the ox gore a man-servant or a maid-servant, there shall be given unto their master thirty shekels of silver, and the ox shall be stoned.” CH, §§ 250ff: “If an ox, while going along the street, gore a man and cause his death, no claims of any kind can be made. If a man's ox be addicted to goring and have manifested to him his failing, if he be addicted to goring, and, nevertheless, he have neither blunted his horns, nor fastened up his ox; then if his ox gore a free man and cause his death, he shall give 30 shekels of silver. If it be a man's slave, he shall give 20 shekels of silver.""

Ex 22 7 ff reminds one of CH, §§ 124 ff; Ex 22 10 ff of CH, §§ 244 ff and 266 f.

The resemblances between the other parts of the Pentateuch are not so striking as those between the Code and the Book of the Covenant; nevertheless one may compare Lev 19 35 f with CH, § 5; Lev 20 10 with CH, § 129; Lev 24 19 f with CH, §§ 196 ff; Lev 25 39 with CH, § 117; Dt 19 16 ff with CH, §§ 3 f; Dt 22 22 with CH, § 129; Dt 24 1 with CH, §§ 137 ff and §§ 148 f; Dt 24 7 with CH, § 14; esp. Dt 21 15 ff, 18 ff, with CH, §§ 167, 168 f, where, in both cases, there is a transition from regulations concerning the property left by a man, married several times, to provisions referring to the punishment of a disobedient son, certainly a remarkable agreement in sequence.

One can hardly assert that the parallels quoted are accidental, but it is as little easy to say that they are directly taken from the Code; for they bear quite a definite impression due to the Israelitish culture, and numerous marked divergences also exist. As we have already mentioned, the land Amurru was for a long time Bab territory, so that Bab law must have found entrance there. When the Israelites came into contact with Bab culture, on taking possession of the land of Canaan (a part of the old Amurru), it was natural that they should employ the results of that culture as far as they found them of use for themselves. Under no circumstances may one suppose here direct quotation. Single parts of the Laws of Moses, esp. the Decalogue (Ex 20), with its particularly pointed concreteness, have no in CH.

It has also been attempted to establish relations between the Code and other legal systems. In the Talm, esp. in the fourth order of the Legal Systems Mishnah called מְשִׁיחַ (i.e. "damages") is the title of a regulation which reminds one of the Code. But one must bear in mind that the Jews during the exile could hardly have known the Code in detail; if there happen to be similarities, it is to be explained by the fact that many of the regulations of the Code were still retained in the later Bab law, and the Talm drew upon this later Bab law for many regulations which seemed useful for its purposes. The connection is therefore an indirect one.

The similarities with the remains of old Arabian laws and the so-called Syrio-Rom Lawbook (5th cent. AD) have to be considered in the same way, though some of these agreements may have only come about accidentally.

That the similarities between Rom and Gr legal usages and the Code are only of an accidental nature may be taken as assured. This seems all the more probable, in that between the Code and other legal systems there are quite striking similarities in individual points, even though we cannot find any historical connection, e.g. the Salic law, the lawbook of the Salic Franks, compiled about 500 AD, and which is the oldest preserved Germanic legal code. Until a whole number of lost codes, as the Old Amorithic and the neo-Bab, are known to us in detail, one must guard well against hasty conclusions.

In any case it is rash to speak of direct borrowings where there may be a whole series of mediating factors.

ARTHUR UNGARD

HAMONAH, ha-mô'nah (חָמוֹנָה), hâ'monâh): The name of a city which stood apparently near Hamon- ights (Ezk 19 36).

HAMON-GOg, hâmôn-gôg (חָמוֹנִי-גָּד), hâmön-gôg, "the multitude of Go'g"): The name of the place where "Gog and all his multitude" are to be buried (Ezk 39 11.15). By a change in the pointing of ver 11, ха-דבֹּרִים הָא-דבֹּרִים, we should read "valley of Abarim" for "valley of them that pass through." In that case it would seem that the prophet thought of some ravine in the mountains E. of the Dead Sea.

HAMOR, hîmôr (חָמוֹר, ha'mor), "an ass"; 'Ekkup, Ebbmôr): Hamor was the father of Shechem from whom Jacob bought a piece of ground on his return from Paddan-aram for one hundred pieces of silver (Gen 33 19), and the burial place of Joseph when his body was removed from Egypt to Canaan (Josh 24 32). The men of Hamor were inhabitants of Shechem, and suffered a great loss under the invasion of Abimelech, a prince over Israel (Jgs 9 22-49). Dinah, Jacob's daughter, was criminally treated by Hamor, who requested her to be given to him in marriage, in which plan he had the cooperation of his father, Shechem. The sons of Jacob rejected their proposition and laid a scheme by which the inhabitants of the city were circumcised, and in the hour of helplessness slew all the males, thus wreaking special vengeance upon Hamor and his father Shechem. It is mere conjecture to claim that Hamor and Dinah were personifications of early central Palestinian clans in sharp antagonism, and that the course of Simeon and Levi was really the treachery of primitive tribes. Because the word Hamor means "an ass" and Shechem "shoulder," there is no reason for rejecting the terms as designations of individuals and considering the titles as mere tribal appellations. HAMRAN, hâm'rân. See HEMDAN.

HAMEEL, ha-m'el, ha-mî'el. See HAMUEL.

HAMUL, hâm'ul (חָמוּל, ha'mul), "pitied," "spared!"): A son of Peres, and head of one of the clans of Judah (Gen 46 12; 1 Ch 2 5; Nu 25 21). His descendants were called Hamuites.

HUMATUL, ha-mut'âl (חָמוּת-לָל, hâmâ'tâl), "father-in-law" or "kinsman of the dâu"): A daughter of Jeremiah of Lihama, and wife of King Joniah, and mother of Jehoahaz and Zedekiah (2 K 23 31; 24 18; Jer 52 1). In the last two references and in the LXX the name appears as "Hamitul." Swete gives a number of variants, e.g. 2 K 24 18: B, Ἱματίλ, I'mâdâl, A, 'Airmâd, A'midâl; Jer 52 1: B, 'Airmâdâl, Hamitâl, l'A'mâdâl, l'Airmâdâl, Hamitâl.

HANAMEL, ha-nâ'-me'l (חָנָמֵל, hânâmî'el; AV HANAMEL, ha-nam'â-îl): The son of Shallum, Jeremiah's uncle, of whom the prophet, while in prison, during the time when Jeremiah was besieged by the Chaldeans, bought a field with due formalities, in token that a time would come when house and vineyards would once more be bought in the land (Jer 33:6–15).

HANAN, ḫānān (חָנָן, hānān, “gracious”):
(1) A chief of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8:23).
(2) A son of Asiel, a descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8:38; 9:44).
(3) One of David’s mighty men of valor (1 Ch 11:43).
(4) The head of a family of the Nethinim who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:46; Neh 7:49).
(5) An assistant of Ezra in expounding the law (Neh 8:7). Possibly the same person is referred to in Neh 10:10 (11).
(6) One of the four treasurers put in charge of the tithes by Nehemiah (Neh 13:13).
(7, 8) Two who “sealed the covenant” on the eve of the restoration (Neh 10:22 [23]:26 [27]).
(9) A son of Igdaliah, “the man of God,” whose sons had a chamber in the temple at Jerus (Jer 35:4).
Byron H. DeMent

HANANEL, han-an-el, the tower of Chanan, ħānān ’el, “[el] is gracious”; AV Hananeel, ha-nan ’el: A tower in the walls of Jerus adjoining (Neh 3:1; 12:39) the tower of Hammeah (q.v.). The company of Levites coming from the W. passed the Gihon gate, and the tower of Hananel, and the tower of Hammeah, even unto the sheep gate” (Neh 12:39). In Jer 31:38 it is foretold “that the city shall be built to Jeh from the tower of Hananel unto the gate of the corner”—apparently the whole stretch of N. wall. In Zec 14:10 it says Jerus “shall dwell in her place, from Benjamin’s gate unto the place of the first gate, unto the corner gate, and from the tower of Hananel unto the king’s winepresses.” These last were probably near Siloam, and the distance “from the tower of Hananel unto the king’s winepresses” describes the greatest length of the city from N. to S. All the indications point to a tower, close to the tower of Hammeah, near the N.E. corner, a point of the city always requiring special fortification and later the site successively of the Baris and of the Antonia. See Jerusalem.

HANANI, ha-na’ni (חָנָן, hānān, “gracious”):
(1) A musician and son of Human, David’s seer, and head of one of the courses of the temple service (1 Ch 25:24,25).
(2) A seer, the father of Jehu. He was cast into prison for his courage in rebuking Asa for relying on Syria (1 K 15:17; 2 Ch 19:2; 20:34).
(3) A priest, of the sons of Iddo, who had married a foreign wife (Ezr 10:20).
(4) A brother or kinsman of Nehemiah who carried news of the condition of the Jews in Pal to Susa and became one of the governors of Jerus (Neh 1:2; 7:2).
(5) A priest and chief musician who took part in the dedication of the walls of Jerus (Neh 12:36).

HANANIAH, han-a-ni (חָנָן, hānān; חָנָנָיהוּ, hānānyāhū; אָרָבִים, Aravīs; אָרָבִיאס, Aravias; also with aspirate, “Jeh hath been gracious”): This was a common name in Israel for many centuries.
(1) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8:24).
(2) A captain of Uzziah’s army (2 Ch 26:11).
(3) Father of one of the princes under Jehoiakim (Jer 36:12).
(4) One of the sons of Heman and leader of the 16th division of David’s musicians (1 Ch 25:43,25).
(5) Grandfather of the officer of the guard which apprehended Jeremiah on a charge of desertion (Jer 37:13).
(6) A false prophet of Gibeon, son of Azazur, who opposed Jeremiah, predicting that the yoke of Babylon would be broken in two years, and that the king, the people and the vessels of the temple would be brought back to Jerus. Jeremiah would be glad if it should be so, nevertheless it would not be. The question then arises Which is the false prophet Hananiah or Hanani? Jeremiah claimed that he was right because he was in accordance with all the great prophets of the past who prophesied evil and their words came true. Therefore his words are more likely to be true. The prophet of God; however, may or may not have his prophecy fulfilled before he can be accredited. Hananiah took off the yoke from Jeremiah and broke it in pieces, symbolic of the breaking of the power of Babylon. Jeremiah was seemingly beaten, retired and received a message from Jeh that the bar of wood would become a bar of iron, and that Hananiah would die during the year because he had spoken rebellion against Jeh (Jer 28:29, passim).
(7) One of Daniel’s companions in Babylon whose name was changed to Hanachar (Dnl 1:7,11,19).
(8) A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3:19,21).
(9) A Levite, one of the sons of Bebai, one of those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10:28; 1 Esd 9:29).
(10) One of the perfumers (AV “apothecaries”) who wrought in rebuilding the wall under Nehemiah (Neh 3:8).
(11) One who helped to repair the wall above the horse gate (Neh 3:30). This may be the same person as no. 10.
(12) A governor of the castle, i.e. the birah or fortress, and by Nehemiah placed in charge of the whole city of Jerus, because “he was a faithful man, and feared God above many (Neh 7:2).
(13) One of the sons who sealed the covenant under Nehemiah (Neh 10:23); a Levite.
(14) A priest who was present at the dedication of the walls of Jerus (Neh 12:41).

Hand

1. The Human Hand
Hand: ornaments of the hand, e.g. Gen 24:22.30.47; Ezk 16:11; 23:42, or Uses where the Bible speaks of hands the hands (Jgs 15:14, etc). On the other hand, it cannot seem strange that occasionally the expression “hand” may be used for a part, e.g. the fingers, as in Gen 41:42, etc. According to the lex talionis, justice demanded “hand for hand” (Ex 21:24; Dt 19:21). We enumerate the following phrases without claiming to present a complete list: “To fill the hand” (Ex 32:29 m; 1 Ch 29:5 m) means to consecrate, evidently from the filling of hands with sacrificial portions for the altar. Of also Lev 7:37; 8:22.25; 29:31.33, where the sacrifice, the rapt, the basket of consecration are mentioned. “To put or set the hand unto” (Dt 15:10; 23 20; 28 8.20), to commence to do; "to put forth the hand" (Gen 3 22; 8 9); "to stretch out the hand" (Exk 9 21). "To shake or wag the hand upon" (Isa 10 32; Zeph 2 15; Zec 2 9), to defy. "To lay the hand upon the head" (2 S 13 19) is an expression of sadness and mourning, as we see from Egyptian representations of scenes of mourning. Both in joy and in anger hands are "summoned together" (Nu 24 10), and people "clap their hands" at a person or over a person in spiteful triumph (Job 27 23; Lam 2 15; Nah 3 19). "To put one’s life into one’s hand" is to risk one’s life; "to put one’s hand to" is used in the sense of making (Mt 19 13), or is symbolic in the act of miraculous healing (Mt 9 18; Mk 8 23; Acts 28 8), or an emblem of the gift of the Holy Spirit and His endowments (Acts 8 17–19; 13 3; 1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6); but it also designates the infliction of cruelty and punishment (Gen 37 22; Lev 24 14), the imposition of responsibility (Nu 8 10; Dt 34 9). Thus also the sins of the people were symbolically transferred upon the goat which was to be sent into the wilderness (Lev 16 21). This act, rabbinical writings declare, was not so much a laying on of hands, as a vigorous pressing. "Lifting up the hand" was a gesture accompanying an oath (Dt 32 40) or a blessing pronounced by the High Priest in the name of God (Lev 23 32). A prayer (Ps 119 48). "To put the hands to the mouth" is indicative of (compulsory) silence (Job 21 5; 40 4; Prov 30 32; Mic 7 16). To "slack one’s hand" is synonymous with negligence and carelessness (Gen 45 21). "To hold or bury the hand in the dish" is descriptive of the slothful, who is tired even at meals (Prov 19 24; 26 15).
Hand

Hand

The hand in the sense of power and authority: (of Assy fhis, "strength"); Josh 8 20 m., "They had no hands [RV ‘power’] to flee this way or that way"; Jgs 1 35. "The Hand as hand of the house of Joseph prevailed".

Power Ps 76 5, "None of the men of might have found their hands"; Ps 89 45 m., "shall deliver his soul from the hand [RV ‘power’] of Sheol"; 2 K 3 15, "The hand of Jeh came upon him"; Ex 14 31 m., "Israel saw the great hand [RV ‘work’] which Jeh did upon the Egyptians"; Dt 34 12, "in all the mighty hand... which Moses wrought in the sight of all Israel".

The hand of God in the sense of person: "His hand shall be against every man" (Gen 16 12).

3. The Hand for the Person was (2 M 8 10) to do for a person: "His hand shall be against every man" (Gen 16 12).

3. The Hand for the Person was (2 M 8 10) to do for a person: "His hand shall be against every man" (Gen 16 12).

4. Hand, Meaning Side of the Heb of Ps 140 5(6) (םִּבּוּכַּיָּהוּ), (t̄yāḏ ma’pād); On the side (Heb "hand") of their oppressors there was power (Ecc 4 1); "I was by the side (Heb ‘hand’) of the great river" (Dn 10 4).

Dunl must also be made here of the Eng. idiom, "at hand," frequently found in our VSS of the Scriptures. In Heb and Gr there is no reference to the word "hand" by words designating the nearness of time or place are used. The usual word in Heb is בְּדֶרֶךְ, kārāḇ, "to be near," and בְּדֶרֶךְ, kārōḇ, "near"; in Gr ἐγγέλα, εὔγελα, "near," and the vb. ἐγγέλω, ἐγγέλθη, "to come near." Rarely other words are used, as ἐκτρεπόμενεν, ἐνεστόκεν, "has come," ERV "is now present," Thes. 2 (2), and ἐκτρεπόμενον, εὐγελός, "to shake or wag the hand upon" (Ps 15 4; 16 6).

Frequently the words refer to the "day" or "coming of the Lord;" still it must not be forgotten that it may often refer to the nearness of God in a local sense, as in Jer 23 23, "Am 1 a God at hand, saith Jeh, and not a God afar off?" and probably in Phil 4 5, "The Lord is at hand," though many, perhaps most, commentators regard the expression as a version of the Aram. μάκαρ δέ, μαριν αἱθέλ (1 Cor 16 22). Passages such as Ps 31 20; 119 151; Mt 28 20 would, however, speak for an interpretation which lays the stress on the abiding presence of the Lord with the believer.

Note.—The ancients made a careful distinction of the respective values of the two hands. This is perhaps best seen from Gen 48 13–16, the act of blessing the two hands of aged Israel upon the heads of Joseph’s sons seems unfair to their father, because the left hand is being placed upon the elder, the right hand upon the younger son. The very word šinumōm proves the same from the Gr point of view. This word is a euphemistic synonym of ares, and is used to avoid the unlucky omen the common word may have for the person spoken to. Thus the gods, i.e. the bodiless, are at the left hand of the great Judge, while the righteous appear at His right hand (Ps 33 20; 9). We read that a wise man’s heart is at his right hand; but a fool’s heart at his left," i.e. is inclined to evil. As the Jews orientated their tables with the right hand on the sun (Lat. orienis, the east), the left hand represented the north, and the right hand the south (Isa 21 4; 28 5). The right hand was considered the more honorable (1 K 19 18; Ps 45 9); therefore it was given in the attestation of a contract, a federation or fellowship (Gal 2 9). It is the more valuable in battle; a friend or protector may place his right hand on the shield to protect it (Ps 16 8; 73 23; 109 31; 110 5; 121 5), but the enemy will, for the same reason, try to assail it (Job 30 12; Ps 109 6; Zec 3 1). It was also the unprotected side, because the shield was carried on the left hand as a protection against danger (Ps 68 15; 105 16; 110 1; Mt 22 44; Mt 20 21). Both hands are mentioned together in the sense of close proximity, intimate association, in Mk 16 10.

HANDBREADTH, handbreadth (יוּלְדָה, yōlah, 1 K 7 26; 2 Ch 5 4; Ps 39 5; Ex 25 25; 37 12; Ezek 40 5 4; 43 13); A Heb linear measure containing 4 fingers, or digits, and equal to about 3 in. See Weights and Measures.

HANDFUL, hand’tĭōl: There are five words in Heb used to indicate what may be held in the hand, either closed or open.

(1) יִפָּח, ḥophën, ḥophēnit, hophanyim. The fist or closed hand occurs in the dual in Ex 9 8, where it signifies what can be taken in the two hands joined, a double handful.

(2) יִפָּח, kaph, “hollow of the hand,” the palm, an open handful (Lev 9 17; 1 K 17 12; Ecc 4 6).

(3) יִפָּח, ʿdmr, “sheaf or bundle.” It signifies the quantity of a gleaner may gather in his hand (Jer 9 22 [Heb 21]).

(4) יִפָּח, ʿomṣem, “the closed handful” (Gen 41 47; Lev 2 2; 5 12; 6 15 [Heb 6 8]; Nu 5 26).

(5) יִפָּח, ʿshuʾal, “the hollow of the hand,” or what can be held in it (1 K 20 10; Ezek 13 19).

In Isa 40 13 it signifies “meaningless” or “abundance” (Isa 40 13).

(6) יִפָּח, ḫāḏāth (Ps 72 16) is rendered "handful" by AV, but is properly "abundance" as in RV.

HARDICKERFORD, ha-nir-čef (στόμαχον, sōmākon, σωμάτω, σωματί). A loan-word from the Lat. sudarium, found in pl. in Acts 19 12, σωματάρν; of sudor, “perspiration”; lit. “a cloth used to wipe off perspiration.” Elsewhere it is rendered “napkin” (Lk 19 20; Jn 11 44; 20 7), for which see Dress; ὅπαμ. See HANDICKERFORD, ha-nir-čef (στόμαχον, sōmākon, σωμάτω, σωματί).
HANDLE, han'dl (Kg, kaph): The noun occurs once in Cant 5 5, "handles of the bolt" (AV "lock"). The vb. "handle" represents several Heb words ("'abaz, māshāh, tāpāh, etc) and Gr (στήλων, στήλην, etc) and is also sometimes substituted in RV for other renderings in AV, as in Cant 3 8 for "hold"; in Lk 20 11, "handled shamefully," for "entreated shamefully"; in 2 Tim 2 15, "handling airtight," for "rightly dividing," etc.

HANDMAID, han'mād: Which appears often in the OT, but seldom in the NT, like bondmaid, is used to translate two Heb words (נָשָׁה, shi'qāh, and רָשָׁה, 'āmōh), both of which normally mean a female slave. It is used to translate the former word in the ordinary sense of female slave in Gen 16 1; 26 12; 29 24; Prov 30 20; Jer 34 11; Joel 2 29; to translate the latter word in Ex 23 12; Jgs 19 19; 2 S 6 20. It is used as a term of humility and respectful self-deprecation in the presence of great men, prophets and kings, to translate the latter word in Ruth 2 3; 1 S 15 18; 17 17; 19 21; 2 S 14 6; 2 K 4 2; it translates the latter word in the same sense in Ruth 3 9; 1 S 1 16; 26 24; 31 14; 2 S 20 17; 1 K 1 13; 3 20. It is also used to express a sense of religious humility in translating the latter word only, and appears in this sense but in three passages, 1 S 1 1; Ps 66 16; 116 16.

In the NT it occurs 3 t; in a religious sense, as the tr of δόμην, doule, "a female slave" (Lk 1 35 45; Acts 2 18), and twice (Gal 4 22 23) as the tr of χειρίζοντος, paidii, AV "bondmaid."

HANDS, IMPOSITION, im-pō-shi'zōn (LAYING ON), of (ἐπιτίθεσις, epithesis cheitron), Acts 8 18; 1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6; He 6 2): The act or ceremony of the imposition of hands appears in the OT in various connections: in the act of blessing (Gen 48 14 15); in the ritual of sacrifice (hands of the offerer laid on head of victim, Ex 29 10.15.19; Lev 1 4; 2 8 13; 4 24.29; 8 14; 16 21); in witness-bearing in capital offences (Lev 24 14). The tribe of Levi was set apart by solemn imposition of hands (Num 8 10); Moses appointed Joshua to be his successor by a similar act (Nu 27 18 23; Dt 34 9). The idea in these cases varies with the purpose of the act. The primary idea seems to be that of consecration or transference (of Lev 16 21), but, confused with this, in certain instances, are the ideas of identification and of devotion to God.

In the NT Jesus laid hands on the little children (Mt 19 13 15; Mk 10 16) and on the sick (Mt 9 18; Mk 6 5, etc), and the apostles laid hands on those whom they baptized so that they might receive the Holy Spirit (Acts 8 17 19; 19 6), and in healing (Acts 12 17). Specially the imposition of hands was used in the setting apart of persons to a particular office or work in the church. This is noticed as taking place in the appointment of the Seven (Acts 6 6), in the sending out of Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13 3), at the ordination of Timothy (1 Tim 4 14; 2 Tim 1 6), but though not directly mentioned, it seems likely that it accompanied all acts of ordination of presbyters and deacons (of 1 Tim 5 22; He 6 2). The presbyters could hardly convey what they had not themselves received (1 Tim 1 14). Here again the fundamental idea is communication. The act of laying on of hands was accompanied by prayer (Acts 6 6; 15 13) and the blessing sought was imparted by God Himself. No ground is afforded by this symbo logical act for a sacrament of "Ordin". See SACRIFICE; MINISTRY; ORDINATION.

HANDSTAFF, hand'stāf (τῆς ἀρτῆς, maqhe'el yădāh): In pl in Ezk 39 9, among weapons of war. See STAFF.

HAND WEAPON, hand'wē'pûn (Nu 35 18 AV). See ARMOR.

HANDWRITING, hand'rit-ing. See WRITING; MANUSCRIPTS.

HANES, hā'nez (Σάη, hánēs): Occurs only in Isa 30 4. The one question of importance concerning this place is its location. It has never been certainly identified. It was probably an Egyptian city, though even that is not certain. Pharaoh, in his selfish haste to make league with the kingdom of Judah, may have sent his ambassadors far beyond the frontier. The language of Isa, "their ambassadors came to H.," certainly seems to indicate a place in the direction of Jerusalem from Tanis. This indication is also the sum of all the evidence yet available. There is no real knowledge concerning the exact location of H. Opinions on the subject are little more than clever guesses. They rest almost entirely upon etymological grounds, a very precarious foundation when not supported by historical evidence. The LXX has, "For there are in Tanis princes, wicked messengers." Evidently knowing no such place, they tried to translate the name. The Aram. version gives "Tabpanhes" for H., which may have been founded upon exact knowledge, as we shall see.

H. has been thought by some commentators to be Heracleopolis Magna, Egypt Huenenuden, abridged to Huenen, Copt Ahnes, Heb Hanëš, Arab. Ahnyes, the capital of the XXth Nome, or province, of the ancient Egypt. It lay on a large island between the Nile and the Bahr Yuseph, opposite the modern town of Benu Suf. The Greeks identified the ram-headed god of the place with Hermes, hence, "Heracleopolis." The most important historical notes in Egypt and the best philological arguments point to this city as H. But the plain meaning of Isa 30 4 points more positively to a city somewhere in the delta nearer to Jerusalem than Tanis (of Naville's cogent argument, "Ahmes el Medineh."). Dümichen considered the hieroglyphic name of Tabpanes to be Hens. Knowledge of this as a fact may have influenced the Aram. rendering, but does not warrant the arbitrary altering of the Heb text.

HANGING, hang'ing ( SYNCAP, tālāh, "to hang up," "suspend." 2 S 21 12; Dt 28 66; Job 26 7; Ps 137 2; Cant 4 4; Hos 11 7): Generally, where the word is used in connection with punishments, it appears to have reference to the hanging of the corpse after execution. We find but two clear instances of death by hanging, i.e. strangulation—those of Ahithophel and Judas (2 S 17 23; Mt 27 5), and both these were cases of suicide, not of execution. The foregoing Heb word is clearly used for "hanging" as a mode of execution in Est 5 14; 6 4; 7 9 ff; 8 7; 9 13 14 25; but probably the "gallows" or "tree" (תֶּל, šek) was a stake for the purpose of impaling the victim. It could be lowered for this purpose, then raised "fifty cubits high" to arrest the public gaze. The Gr word used in Mt 27 5 is ἀναφέρεσθαι, ἀπαγγέλθαι, "to strange oneself." See HDB, art. "Hanging," for an exhaustive discussion.

HANGINGS, hang'ingz: (1) In EV this word in the pl represents the Heb תֶּלֶת, klu'am, the "certain of fine twined linen" with which the court of the tabernacle was inclosed.
These were five cubits in height, and of lengths corresponding to the sides of the inclosure and the space between the wall in front, and were suspended from hooks fastened to the pillars of the court. They are described at length in Ex 27 9-15; 38 9-18. See, besides, Ex 35 17; 39 40; Nu 3 34; 4 36; 4 26; of the screen of similar workmanship at the entrance of the tabernacle (Ex 26 36.37; 35 15; 36 37; 39 38; 40 5.28; Nu 3 28; 4 25); and once (Nu 3 31) of the tapestry veil, adorned with cherubim, at the entrance of the Holy of Holies (elsewhere, pàròkhek, "veil." Ex 26 31-33, etc., or pàròkhek ha-màsàkkh, "veil of the screen," Ex 35 12, etc.). In Nu 3 26, AV renders màsàkkh "curtain," and in Ex 35 12; 39 34; 40 21 (of also Nu 4 4), "covering.

(3) In 2 K 23 7 we read of "hangings" (Heb "houses") which the women wove for the Asherah. If the text is correct we are to think perhaps of tent shrines for the image of the goddess. Lucian's rendering (aulaidà, "robes") is preferred by some, which would have reference to the custom of bringing offerings of clothing for the images of the gods. In 1 K 7 29 RV, "wreaths of hanging work" refers to a kind of ornamentation on the bases of the lavers. In Est 1 6, the "hangings" was supplied by the translators.

HANIEL, han'iel. See HANNIEL.

HANNAH, han'a (חנָנָה, hānāh, "grace," "favor");'Avva, Hânnâ): One of the two wives of Elkanah, an Ephraimite who lived at Ramathaim-zophim. Hannah visited Shiloh yearly with her husband to offer sacrifices, for there the tabernacle was located. She was greatly distressed because they had no children. She therefore prayed earnestly for a male child whom she promised to dedicate to the Lord from his birth. The prayer was heard, and she called her son's name Samuel ("God hears"). When he was weaned he was carried to Shiloh to be trained by Eli, the priest (1 S 1). Hannah became the mother of five other children, three sons and two daughters (2 2). Her devotion in sending Samuel a little robe every year is one of the tenderest recorded instances of maternal love (2 19). She was a prophetess of no ordinary talent, as is evident from her elevated poetic deliverance elicited by God's answer to her prayer (2 1-10).

HANNATHON, han'ã-thôn (חנַתון, hannâthôn): A city on the northern boundary of Zebulun (Josh 19 14). It is probably identical with Kefar Hananyah, which the Mish gives as marking the northern limit of lower Galilee (Neubauer, Geogr. du Tadm, 179). It is represented by the modern Kefr 'Anan, about 3 miles S.E. of cr-Râmeh.

HANIEL, han'iel (חניאל, hanniel): (1) The son of Ephod and a prince of Manasseh who assisted in dividing Canaan among the tribes (Nu 34 23).

(2) A son of Ulla and a prince and hero of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 39); AV "Haniel."

HANOCH, hān'ok, HANOCHITES, hān'ok-ht's (חָנוֹך, hânôkh, "initiation," "dedication"): (1) A grandson of Abraham by Keturah, and an ancestral head of a clan of Midian (Gen 26 4; 1 Ch 1 33, AV "Henoch").

(2) The eldest son of Reuben (Gen 46 9; Ex 6 14; 1 Ch 5 3).

The descendants of Hanoch were known as Hanochites (Nu 26 5).

HANUN, hā'nūn (חָנַן, hânûn, "favored," "pitied"): (1) A son and successor of Nahash, king of Ammon. Upon the death of Nahash, David sent sympathetic communications to Hanun, which were misinterpreted, and the messengers dishonored. Because of this indignity, David waged a war against him, which caused the Ammonites to lose their independence (2 S 10 1 f; 1 Ch 19 1 f).

(2) One of the six sons of Zalaph who assisted in repairing the E. wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 13).

(3) One of the inhabitants of Zanoah who repaired the Valley Gate in the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 3 13).

HAP, hap, HAPLY, hap'li (חָפָל, mísrekh, נָפָל, mísreph, mísphote):

Hap (a Saxon word for "luck, chance") is the tr of mísrekh, "a fortunate chance," "a lot" (Ruth 2 3, AV "her hap was to light on a part of the field belonging unto Boaz"); in 1 S 6 9, the same word is the tr "chance" (that happened); "event," in Ecc 9 2, with "happeneth," in 2 14.

Haply (from "hap") is the tr of là, "if that" (1 S 14 30, "if haply the people had eaten freely"); of ès àra, "if then" (Mk 11 13, "if haply he might find anything of his son"); of ès dráge (Acts 17 27, "if haply they might feel after him"); of mísphote, "lest ever," "lest perhaps," etc (Lk 14 20; Acts 5 39); of mó pós, "lest in any way" (2 Cor 9 4 AV, "lest haply, RV "lest by any means").

RV has "haply" for "at any time" (Mt 6 5; 8 13; 13 15; Mk 4 4; Lk 4 11; 21 34; He 3 1); introduces "haply" (Mt 7 6; 13 29; 15 32; 27 64; Mk 14 8; Lk 3 15; 12 34; 15 14; Acts 2 40; 30 41); etc. Has "haply there shall be," for "lest there be" (He 3 13).

HAPHAIRAM, hal-à-rám (חַפַּראָם, haphâra-im; AV Haphiram, hap-rám, possibly "place of a moat"): A town in the territory of Issachar, named with Shunem and Anaarath (Josh 19 19). Onom identifies it with "Affarea," and places it 6 miles N. of Legio-Megiddo. This position corresponds with that of the modern el-Ferriyeh, an ancient site with remarkable tombs N.W. of el-Łājūn.

HAPPEN, hap'n (חָפָל, kârâd; מָסְכִּים, sunbainô): "Happen" (from "hap"), "to fall out," "befall," etc, "come to anyone," is the tr of kârâd, "to meet," "to go," etc (1 S 26 10). "There shall no punishment happen to thee," RV 'giml 'cuit come upon thee'; 2 S 3 16; Est 4 7; Ecc 2 14.15; 9 11 Isa 41 22) of kârâd, "to meet," "cause to happen," etc (2 S 20 1); of háyâh, "to be" (1 S 6 9, "It was a chance that happened to us"); of nádpâh, "to touch," "to come to" (Ecc 8 14 16) in the NT it is sometimes used in the tr of sunbainô, "to go" or "come up together," "to happen" (Mk 10 32; Lk 24 14; Acts 3 10; 1 Cor 10 11; 1 Pet 4 2; 12 Pet 2; once of píwam, "to become"), "to happen" (Rom 11 25, RV "befallen"). "Happeneth" occurs (Ecc 2 15, "as it happeneth to the fool") (mísphote); 2 Ecc 10 6; Bar 3 10 (lit estin). RV supplies "that happened" for "were done" (Lk 24 35). See also CHANCE. W. L. WALKER

HAPPINESS, hap'î-nes. See BLESSEDNESS.

HAPPIZEEZ, hap'î-ze (חָפָזֶז, ha-pîzûs; AV Aphas): A priest on whom fell the lot for the 18th
HARA, ḫā'ra (S'ln, ṣārā); LXX omits: A place named in 1 Ch 6 26 along with Halah, Habor, and the Remarbins, the Gadites and the half-tribe of Manasseh were carried by Tiglath-pileser. In 2 K 17 6; 13 11, Hara is omitted, and in both, "and in the cities of the Medes" is added. LXX renders ṣp ḫādor, ḥēḏ Mēdōn, "the mountains of the Medes," which renders, ḥārdī-ḥādē, "mountains of Media," or, ṣārā ṣārāy, "cities of Media." The text seems to be corrupt. The second word may have fallen out in 1 Ch 6 26, ḥārd being changed to ṣārā.

HARADAH, ḫā-rā'da, ḫār'ā-dā (σαράδα, ḥārādah, "fearful"): A desert station of the Israelites between Mt. Shephelah and the Negev. It was also placed (Nu 33 24 25) See Wandernings of Israel.

HARAN, ḫā-rān (Ϊγ, ḫārān); Ṣaḥāḏāv, Charh-rān): The city where Terah settled on his departure from Ur (Gen 11 31), whence Abram set out on his pilgrimage of faith to Canaan (12 1 ff.). It was probably "the city of Nahor" to which Abraham's servant came to find a wife for Isaac (24 10 ff.). Hither came Jacob when he fled from Esau's anger (27 43). Here he met his bride (29 4), and in the neighboring pastures he tended the flocks of Laban. It is one of the cities named by Rabshakeh as destroyed by the king of Assyria (2 K 19 12; Isa 37 12). Ezekiel speaks of the merchants of Haran as trading with Tyre (27 23).

The name appears as Assyro-Bab as Harran, which means "ruined"; possibly because here the trade route from Damascus joined that from Nineveh to Carchemish. It is mentioned in the prism inscription of Tiglath-pileser I. It was a seat of the worship of Sin, the moon-god, from very ancient times. A temple was built by Tiglath-pileser II. Haran seems to have shared in the rebellion of Assur (763 BC, the year of the solar eclipse, June 15). The privileges then lost were restored by Sargon II. The temple, which had been destroyed, was rebuilt by Ashurbanipal, who was here crowned with the crown of Sin. Haran and the temple suffered much damage in the invasion of the Umman-Manda (the Medes). Nabunâd restored temple and city, adorning them on a lavish scale. Near Haran the Parthians defeated and slew Crassus (53 BC), and here Carracalla was assassinated (217 AD). In the 4th cent. it was the seat of a bishopric, but the cult of the moon persisted far into the Christian centuries. The chief temple was the scene of heathen worship until the 11th cent., and was destroyed by the Mongols in the 13th.

The ancient city is represented by the modern Harrān to the S.E. of Edessa, on the river Behis, an affluents of the Euphrates. The ruins lie on both sides of the stream, and include those of a very ancient castle, built of great basaltic blocks, with square colonnades, 8 ft. thick, which support an arched roof some 30 ft. in height. Remains of the old cathedral are also conspicuous. No inscriptions have yet been found here, but a fragment of an Assyrian lion has been uncovered. A well nearby is identified as that which Eliezer met Rebekah.

In Acts 7 24, AV gives the name as Charan.

HARARITE, ḫā-ra-īt (γαράρητ, ḥā-hārārī, or ḥā-rērē, ḥā-rā-rē): Lit. "mountaineer," more particularly an inhabitant of the hill country of Judah. Thus used of two heroes:

(1) Shammah, the son of Agee (2 S 23 11 33). The passage, 1 Ch 11 34, has "Shage" in place of "Shammah." (2) Abiami, the son of Sharar the Ararite (2 S 23 33). In 1 Ch 11 35, "Sacar" for Sharar as here.

HARBONA, HARBONAH, ḫār-bō'na (babbōνά, ḫār-bbō'na), ḫār-bbō'nā, ḫār-bbā'nā): One of the seven eunuchs who served Ahasuerus and to whom was given the command to bring Queen Esther before the king (Est 1 10). It was he who suggested that Haman be hanged upon the self-same gallows that he had erected for Mordecai (7 9). Jewish tradition has it that Harbona had originally been a member of the imperial bodyguard of Haman, but, upon noting the failure of the latter's plans, abandoned him. The Pers equivalent of the name means "donkey-driver."

Harbour, ḥār-bōr. Used figuratively of God in Joel 3 16 AV, "Hab, place of repair. or, harbour" (AV "hope," RV "refuge"). See Haven; Ships and Boats, I, II, (I, II), 3.

Hard, hård, HARDINESS, hârd'nis, HARDLY, hård'li (σκληρός, kāshek, Σκληρός, pālā, \\σκληρός, kēlērōs): The senses in which hard is used may be distinguished as:

(1) "Firm," "stiff," opposite to soft: Job 41 24, \\γακόν, "to be firm," "his heart ... as hard as a piece of the nether millstone," RV "firm." Ezek 3 7, kāshek, "sharp," "hard of heart:" \\hāḏāk, "firm," "As an adamantine harder than if I have made I thy forehead;" Jer 5 3, "They have made their faces harder than a rock;" Prov 21 20, "dōz, "to make strong," "hard," "impudent," "a wicked man hardened his face;" Prov 13 15 probably belongs here also where ṭěḥān is ṭf "hard": "The way of the transgressor is hard," RV "The way of the transgressor is rugged." The Heb word means, "lasting," "firm," "poet, "rocks."" (the earth's foundations; Mic 5 3), and the meaning seems to be, not that the way (path) of transgressors, or the transgressor (Delitzsch has "uncultivated"), is hard (rocky) to them, but that their way, or mode of acting, is hard, unsympathetic, unkind, "destitute of feeling," in things which, as we say, would soften a stone (Delitzsch on passage); also Mt 25 24, skēlōs, "stiff," "thou art a hard man;" Wisd 11 4, skēlōs, "hard stone," RV "flinty rock," m "the steep rock." (2) "Sore," "tiring," "painful," kāshek (Ex 1 14, "hard service;" Dt 26 6; 2 S 3 9; Ps 60 3; Isa 14 3); ṭākāh, "to have it hard" (Gen 35 16 17; Dt 15 18); "ḥāḏāk, "stiff;" (Ps 94 4 AV, "They utter and speak hard things"); skēlōs (Jn 6 60, "This is a hard saying")—hard to accept, hard in its nature; Acts 9 5 AV; 26 14; Jude ver 15, "hard speech"; Wisd 19 13.

(3) "Heavy," "pressing hard," kāḇbōḥēḏ, "weighty" (Ezk 3 5 0, "a people of a strange speech and of a hard language;" RV "Heb deep of lip and heavy of tongue"); etsmāk, "to lay" (Ps 88 7, "Thy wrath lieth hard upon me").

(4) "Difficult," "hard to do," "know," etc., pālā, "difficult to be done" (Gen 18 14, "It is anything too hard for Jehovah;" Lv 26 17 27; Dt 17 8; 2 S 13 18; kāshek (Ex 18 26, "hard causes"); ṭākāh (Dt 1 17; 2 K 2 10); ṭāḏāh, "something twisted,"
"Harden" occurs most frequently in the phrase "to harden the heart," or "the neck. This hardening of men's hearts is attributed both to God and to men themselves, e.g. with reference to the hearts of Pharaoh and the Egyptians; the Hiphil of ḫḏḥḵ, "to make strong," is frequently used in this connection (Ex 4:21; "I will harden his heart," RVm "Heb make strong"); 7:13, "And he hardened Pharaoh's heart," RV "was hardened," m "Heb was strong"); 7:22; 8:19; 9:12; 10:20, 27, etc.; 14:17, "I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians," RVm "Heb make strong," m "Heb was strong"); 20:13, "to be heavy," "to make hard" (Ex 7:3); ḫḏḥḵḏ, "heavy," "slow," "hard," not easily moved (Ex 10:1, RVm "Heb made heavy"). When the hardening is attributed to man's own act (cf. Ex 7:13, "He hardened his heart, and hearkened not," RVm "Heb made heavy"); 8:32, "Pharaoh hardened his heart" (RVm as before); 9:7:34; 1 S 6 6 bis). The "hardening" of men's hearts by God is in the way of punishment, but it is always a consequence of their own self-hardening. In Pharaoh's case we read that "he hardened his heart" against the appeal to free the Israelites; so hardening himself, he became always more confirmed in his obstinacy, till he brought the final doom upon himself. This is how sin is to become, for believers, the means of their own destruction. It was not confined to Pharaoh and the Egyptians, nor does it belong to the past only. As St. Paul says (Rom 9:18), "Whom he will he hardeneth" (sklērūnā); 11:7, "The election obtained it, and the rest were hardened." As in AV, pārā, "to make hard" or "callous"; ver 25, a "Hardening in part hath befallen Israel" (pārōsia); of Jn 12:40 (from Is 6 10), "He hath blinded their eyes, and he hardened their heart"; Isa 63 17, "O Jeh., why dost thou mak[e] us to err from thy ways, and hardenest our heart from thy fear?" (ḵḏḵhāh, "to harden"); of on the other side, as expressing the human blameworthiness, Job 9:4, "Who hath hardened himself against him, and prospered?"

(2) "Harden" in the sense of "to fortify one's self" (make one's self hard) is the tr of ḥḏḥāth, "to leap," "exult," (Job 6 10 AV "I would harden myself in sorrow," RV "Let me exult in pain," m "harden myself")

(3) In Prov 21 29 "harden" has the meaning of "boldness," "defence" or "chamelessness" (brazen-faced); ʾaʿāz, ḥariph, "to strengthen one's countenance," ʾaʿāz, ḥariph, "A wicked man hardeneth his face," Delitzsch, "A godless man shoveth boldness in his mien"; of 7:13; Eccl 8 1; see also HARD.

For "harden" RV has "stubborn" (Ex 7:14; 9:7 m "heavy"); "hardened" (Isa 63 17); "made stiff" (Jer 7:26; 19:15); for "is hardened" (Job 39 16, ARV "is dealteth hard and confirmeth the hardness of") instead of "for the hardness" (Mk 3 5) "hardening" for "blindesth" (Eph 4 18).

HARD SAYINGS, sāʾiqū; HARD SENTENCES, sāʾiqū; seṭem-siʿā': In Dn 5 12 AV (Aram. ʾm ṣīʿāʾ, ṣāʾīḳāh), RV "dark sentences," of enigmatic utterances which preternatural wisdom was needed to interpret; in Jn 6 60 (ἐκνηπόσωσται ὁ λόγος, sklērōs . . . ὅ λόγος, sklērōs . . . ὅ λόγος), of sayings (Christ's words at Capernaum about eating His flesh and drinking His blood) difficult for the natural mind to understand (cf ver 52).

HARE, ḫīr (חִרֹת, arnēbēth [Lev 11 6; Dt 14 7]) of Arab. ʾḥēbāb, "hare"): This animal is mentioned only in the lists of unclean animals in Lev and Dt, where it occurs along with the camel, the coney and the swine. The camel, the hare and the coney are unclean animals, because they chew the cud but part not the hoof, the swine, "because he parteth the hoof . . . but cheweth not the cud." The hare and the coney are not ruminants, but might be supposed to be from their habit of almost continually moving their jaws. Both are freely eaten by the Arabs. Although arnēbēth occurs only in the two places cited, there is no doubt that it is the hare. LXX has ἀστρον,

HARISH, hāˈrit (حرف, حرف, حرف), hariph, harmonic: One of those who returned from exile under Zerbabbel and helped to seal the covenant under Nehemiah and Ezra (Neh 7 24; 10 19 [20]). Ezra 2 18 has "Jorah."

HARLOT, hărˈlot: This name replaces in RV "whore" of AV. It stands for several words and phrases used to designate or describe the unchaste woman, married or unmarried, e.g. נזרה, zônāh, נזרה נזרה נזרה, 'ishšāhok nokhrīyāh, תמר, tērāšāh; LXX and NT πόρνη, pōrnik, πορνή, πορνή is used chiefly of prenuptial immorality, but the married woman guilty of sexual immorality is said to be guilty of πόρνη (Mt 5 32; 19 9; cf Am 7 17). These and cognate words are applied esp. in the OT to those devoted to immoral service in idol sanctuaries, or given over to a dissolute life for gain. Such a class existed in peoples, and may be traced in the history of Israel. Evidence of its existence in very early times is found (Gen 38). It grew out of conditions, sexual and social, which were universal. After the corrupting foreign influences and influences of Solomon’s day, it was developed to even fuller shamelessness, and its voluptuous songs (Isa 23 16), seductive arts (Prov 6 24), and blighting influence are vividly pictured and denounced by the prophets (Jer 7 10 13 23; Is 3 16 3); Jer 3 3; 6 7; Ezek 16 25; cf Dt 23 17). Money was lavished upon women of this class, and the weak and unwary were taken captive by them, so that it became one of the chief concerns of the devout father in Israel to "keep [his son] from the evil woman," who "hunteth for the precious life" (Prov 6 24-26). From the title given her in Prov, a "foreign woman" (23 27), and the warnings against "the flattery of the foreigner’s tongue" (6 24; cf 1 K 11 1; Ezr 10 2), we may infer that this class was made up of strangers from without. The whole subject must be viewed in the setting of the times. Even in Israel, then, apart from breaches of marriage vows, immoral relations between the sexes were deemed "jealousy" (Dt 22 20), which was forbidden to compel his daughter to sin (Lev 19 29); to "proflane [her] and make her a harlot," but she was apparently left free to take that way herself (cf Gen 38). The children of the harlot, though, were outlawed (Dt 23 2), and later the harlot is found under the sternest social ban (Mt 21 31 32).

The subject takes on even a darker hue when viewed in the light of the hideous conditions that prevailed in ancient Syria. Writing this practice. The harlot represented more than a social peril and problem. She was a ḫākāhāh, one of a consecrated class, and as such was the concrete expression of the most insidious and powerful influence and system menacing the purity and permanence of the religion. The religion of Israel defined the reproductive organs and forces of Nature and its devotees worshipped their ideal symbols in grossly licentious rites and orgies. The temple prostitute was invested with sanctity as a member of the religious caste, as she is today in India. Men and women thus prostituted themselves in the service of their gods. The Canaanite sanctuaries were grounded under the sanctuaries of religion. For a time, therefore, the supreme religious question was whether such a cult should be established and allowed to take root in Israel, as it had done in Babylon (Herod. 1.199) and in Greece (Strabo viii.6). That the appeal thus made to the bolder passions of the Israelites was all too successful is sadly clear (Am 2 7; Hos 4 13 ff). The prophets give vivid pictures of the syrens of Baal and Ashtar with that of Jeh and the extent to which the local sanctuaries were given over to this form

Harim, hāˈrim (حرم, حرم, حرم): A family name.

(1) A non-priestly family that returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 39); mentioned among those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 31); also mentioned among those who renewed the covenant (Neh 10 27).

(2) A priestly family returning with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 39; Neh 7 42; 12 3 15 [see REHEM])

mention of this Neh 7 24 as co-founder of Beth-gader (Neh 7 27). The subject takes on even a darker hue when viewed in the light of the hideous conditions that prevailed in ancient Syria. Writing this practice. The harlot represented more than a social peril and problem. She was a ḫākāhāh, one of a consecrated class, and as such was the concrete expression of the most insidious and powerful influence and system menacing the purity and permanence of the religion. The religion of Israel defined the reproductive organs and forces of Nature and its devotees worshipped their ideal symbols in grossly licentious rites and orgies. The temple prostitute was invested with sanctity as a member of the religious caste, as she is today in India. Men and women thus prostituted themselves in the service of their gods. The Canaanite sanctuaries were grounded under the sanctuaries of religion. For a time, therefore, the supreme religious question was whether such a cult should be established and allowed to take root in Israel, as it had done in Babylon (Herod. 1.199) and in Greece (Strabo viii.6). That the appeal thus made to the bolder passions of the Israelites was all too successful is sadly clear (Am 2 7; Hos 4 13 ff). Har-Magedon, hārˈmā-gə-dən (Ἀρμαγέδών, Harmagelos from Heb har meqiddō, "Mount of Megiddo": AV Armageddon): This name is found only in Rev 16 16. It is described as the rallying-place of the kings of the whole world who, led by the unclean spirits issuing from the mouth of the dragon, the beast and the false prophet, assemble here for "the war of the great day of God, the Almighty." Various explanations have been suggested; but, as Nestle says (HDB, s.v.), "Upon the whole, to find an allusion here to Megiddo is still the explanation. In the history of Israel it had been the scene of never-to-be-forgotten battles. Here took place the fatal struggle between Josiah and Pharaoh-necho (2 K 23 29; 2 Ch 35 22). Long before, the hosts of Israel had won great victories here in the bloody battle of Israel and her host (Jgs 19). These low hills around Megiddo, with their outlook over the plain of Esdraelon, have witnessed perhaps a greater number of bloody encounters than have ever stained a like area of the world's surface. There was, therefore, a peculiar appropriateness as the scene of the last mighty struggle between the powers of good and evil. The choice of the hill as the battlefield has been criticized, as it is less suitable for military operations than the plain. But the thought of Gilboa and Tabor and the uplands beyond Jordan might have reminded the critics that Israel was not unaccustomed to mountain warfare. Megiddo itself was a hill-town, and the district was in part mountainous (cf Mt, Tabor, Jgs 4 6 12. "the high places of the field," 6 18). It will be remembered that this is a euphemism. Har-Magedon may stand for the battlefield without indicating any particular locality. The attempt of certain scholars to connect the name "the mount of congregation" in Isa 14 13 (Hommel, Genkel, etc), and with Báb mythology, cannot be pronounced successful. Ewald (Die Johann. Schrift, II, 204) found that the Heb forms of "Har-Magedon" and "the great Rome" have the same numerical value—304. The historical persons alluded to in the passage do not concern us here. W. Ewing Harnepher, hɑrˈnɛpər, hɑrˈnɛpər (חֲרַמְפֵּר, harnepher): A member of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 36).

HarNess, hɑrnˈes: A word of Celtic origin meaning "armour" in AV; it is the tr of shirya', "a coat of mail" (1 K 22 34; 2 Ch 18 33; of neshēk, "arms," "weapons" (2 Ch 9 24, RV "armor") of ḫarām "to bind" (Jer 45 4), "harness the horses," probably here "yoke the horses": cf 1 S 8 17; 1 S 8 17; "tie the kite to the cart" (bind them), Gen 46 29; another rendering is "put on their accoutrements"; of 1 Macc 6 43, "one of the beasts armed with royal harness" (kāpoq, thērāz, RV "breechplates", of 1 Macc 3 9; "warlike harness"; 6 41 (sāla, ḫāpla, RV "arms"; 2 Macc 3 25, etc; harnessed represents hāmashīm, "armed," "girded" (Ex 13 18, "the children of Israel went up harnessed," RV "armed"). Tindale, Cranmer, Geneva have "harness" in Lk 11 22, Wielch "armament." W. L. Walker

Harod, hɑrˈəd, WELL OF (hαρῶδης, hāroδēs, "fountain of trembling"): The fountain beside which (probably above it) Gideon and his army were encamped (Jgs 7 1). Moore (Judges, in loc.) argues, inconclusively, that the hill Moreh must be sought near Shechem, and that the well of Harod must be some spring in the neighborhood of that city. There is no good reason to question the accuracy of the common view which places this spring at 'Ain Jalāl, on the edge of the vale of Jezreel, about 2 miles E. of Zer'ān, and just under the northern cliffs of Gilboa. A copious spring of clear cold water rises in a rocky cave and flows out into a large pool, whence it drains off, in Nahr Jalāl, down the vale past Benjamin to the Jordan. This is probably also to be identified with the spring "which is in Jezreel," i.e. in the district, near which Saul encamped before the battle of Gilboa (1 S 29 1). 'Ain el-Meyı́jeh, just below Zer'ān on the N., is hardly of sufficient size and importance to be a rival to 'Ain Jalāl. See ESDELAN. W. Ewing Harodite, hɑrˈərdit, hɑrˈərdit (חָרָדוֹת, hārodōṯ, "Harorite": Two of David's heroes, Shamma and Elika, are so called (2 S 23 25). LXX omits the second name. In 1 Ch 11 27, the first is called "Shammoth the Harorite," in whom the second is omitted. "Harorite" is a clerical error for "Harodite," being taken for

1. Possibly Harodite may be connected with the well of Harod (q.v.).

Haroe, ha-ro'e (חָרוֹא, hā-ro'ēh, "the seer"): A Judahite (1 Ch 2:22).

Harorite, hā-ro'rit. See Harodite.

Harosheth, ha-ro'sheth, of the gentiles, or of the nations (הָרֹושֶת הָעָרִים, hāro'shēth ha-ʿārīm): There is now no means of discovering what is meant by the phrase "of the nations." This is the place whence Sisera led his hosts to the Kishon against Deborah and Barak (Jgs 4:13), to which the discomfited and leaderless army fled after their defeat (ver 10). No site seems so well to meet the requirements of the narrative as el Harithiyeh. There are still the remains of an ancient stronghold on this great double mound, which rises on the N. bank of the Kishon, in the throat of the pass leading by the base of Carmel, from the coast to Esdraelon. It effectually commanded the road which here climbs the slope, and winds through the oak forest to the plain; Megiddo being some 16 miles distant. The modern also preserves a remembrance of the ancient name. By converting the text, Cheyne would here find the name "Kadashon," to be identified with Kadesh in Galilee (EB, s.v.). On any reasonable reading of the narrative this is unnecessary.

Harp, hārp. See Music.

Harrow, harō (חָרֹא, sādḥadh): Sādḥadh occurs in 3 passages (Job 39:10; Isa 28:24; Hos 10:11). In the first 2 it is tāfharrow, in the last "break the clod." That this was a separate operation from plowing, and that it was performed with an instrument drawn by animals, seems certain. As to whether it corresponded to our modern harrowing is a question. The reasons for this uncertainty are: (1) the ancient Egyptians have left no records of its use; (2) at the present time, in those parts of Pal and Syria where foreign methods have not been introduced, harrowing is not commonly known, although the writer has been told that in some districts the ground is levelled after plowing with the three-lug-sledge or a log drawn by oxen. Cross-plowing is resorted to for breaking up the lumpy soil, esp. where the ground has been baked during the long rainless summer. Lumps not reduced in this way are further broken up with a hoe or pick. Seed is always sown before plowing, so that harrowing to cover the seed is unnecessary. See Agriculture. Fig. used of affliction, discipline, etc (Isa 28:24).

Harrors, har'ōs (חָרוֹס, hārōs): Harōs has no connection with the vb. tāfharrows. The context seems to indicate some form of pointed instrument (2 S 12:31; 1 Ch 20:3; see esp. RVm).

Harsa, hār'sha (הָרוֹשָה, harōshā): Head of one of the families of the Nethinim (Ezr 2:52; Neh 7:54); 1 Esd 5:32, "Charea."

Harsith, har'sīth (הָרֹשִׁית, harōsīth): One of the gates of Jerus (Jer 19:2 RV); in AVa suggests gate of the potters' field; AV "sun gate" and AV "sun gate," both deriving the name from לֶאָרֹש (le-aros) "harm"; "harm." The gate opened into the valley of Hinnom. See Jerusalem; Potsdemi.

Hart, hārt. See Deer.

Harum, hār'um (חָרוּם, hārum): A Judahite (1 Ch 4:8).

Harumaph, ha-ro'māph (חָרוּמָפ, hāro'māph): Father of Jediah who assisted in repairing the walls of Jerus under Nehemiah (Neh 3:10).

Haruphite, ha-ro'uphit (חָרוּפִית, hāro'uphit, or חָרוֹפִית, hāro'phīth): In 1 Ch 12:5 Shephatiah, one of the companions of David, is called a Haruphite (K) or Haruphite (Q). If the latter be the correct reading, it is connected with Haraph or perhaps Haraph (q.v.).

Haruz, hār'uz (חָרוּע, haru'ā): Father of Meashulmehet, the mother of Amon, king of Judah (2 K 21:19).

Harvest, hār'vest (חָרָבָשׁ, kāṭir; ἵπποιθασος, therismos): To many of us, harvest time is of little concern, because in our complex life we are far removed from the actual production of our food supplies, but for the Heb people, as for those in any agricultural district today, the harvest was a most important season (Gen 8:22; 45:6). Events were reckoned from harvests (Gen 30:14; Josh 3:15; Josh 15:13; 1 S 6:12, 22; 2 S 12:20; 1 K 22:19; 2 K 19:13). The three principal feasts of the Jews corresponded to the three harvest seasons (Ex 23:16; 34:21, 22); (1) the feast of the Passover in April at the time of the barley harvest (cf Ruth 1:22); (2) the feast of Pentecost (7 weeks later) at the wheat harvest (Ex 34:22), and (3) the feast of Tabernacles at the end of the year (October) during the fruit harvest. The seasons have not changed since that time. Between the reaping of the barley in April and the wheat in June, most of the other cereals are reaped. The grapes begin to ripen in August, but the gathering in for making wine and molasses (dība), and the storing of the dried figs and raisins, is at the end of September. Between the barley harvest in April and the wheat harvest, only a few showers fall, which are welcomed because they increase the yield of wheat (cf Am 4:7). Samael made use of the unusual occurrence of rain during the wheat harvest to strike fear into the hearts of the people (1 S 12:17). Such an unusual storm of excessive violence visited Syria in 1912, and did much damage to the harvests, bringing fear to the superstitious farmers, who thought some greater disaster awaited them. From the wheat harvest of the fruit harvest no rain falls (S 2:11; Jer 5:24; cf Prov 26:1). The harvesters long for cool weather during the reaping season (cf Prov 25:13).

Many definite laws were instituted regarding the harvest. Gleaning was forbidden (Lev 19:9; 23:22; Dt 24:19) (see Gleaning). The first-fruits were required to be presented to Jeh (Lev 23:10). In Syria the Christians still celebrate 'id er-rubb ("feast of the Lord"), at which time the owners of the vineyards bring their first bunches of grapes to the church. The children of Israel were enjoined to reap no harvest for which they had not labored (Lev 25:5). In Prov the ants' harvesting is mentioned as a lesson for the sluggard (Prov 6:10; 10:5; 20:4).

Figurative: A destroyed harvest typified devastation or affliction (Job 5:5; Isa 16:9; 17:11; Jer 5:17; 50:16). The "time of harvest," in the OT frequently meant the day of destruction (Jer 61:33; Hos 8:11; Joel 3:13). "Joy in harvest" typified great joy (Isa 9:3), "harvest of the Nile," an abundant harvest (Isa 23:3). "The harvest is past" meant that the appointed time was gone (Jer 8:20). Jeh chose the most promising time to cut off the wicked, namely, "when there is a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest" (Isa 18:4,5). This occurrence of hot misty days just before the ripening of the grapes is still common. They are welcome because they are supposed to hasten the harvest. The Syrian farmers in some districts call it t-talbakk el dinib wa ifin ("the fireplace of the grapes and figs").

In the Gospel, Jesus frequently refers to the harvest of souls (Mt 9:37-38; 13:30; 39; Mk 4:29; Jn 4:35; cf. Jn 4:35-36). In explaining the parable of the sower, he said, "The harvest is the end of the world" (Mt 13:39; cf Rev 14:15). See also AGRICULTURE.

(7) A Levite whom Ezra induced to return from exile with him (Ezr 8:19). 1 Esd 8:48 has "Assibas."

(10) A Levite (Neh 11:22).

HASHBANAH, has-sh-'n'a (חַשְׁבָּנָה, ḫṣḥḇn'yāh): One who helped to seal the covenant under Nehemiah (Neh 10:25).

HASHBANELOH, hash-ab'-el'-a (חַשֶּבָּנֶלֶו, ḫṣḥḇln'yāyāh): AV Hashbaniah, hash-ab'-e-l'a.

(1) Father of one of the builders of the wall (Neh 3:10).

(2) A Levite mentioned in connection with the prayer preceding the signing of the covenant (Neh 5:5); possibly identical with the Hashabiah (hashabhb'yāyāh) of Ezr 8:19;24; Neh 10:11; 12:22; 12:24, or one of these.

HASHBADANA, hash-ba'-d'a-na, HASHBADANA, hash-bad'a-na (חַשְׁבָּדָנו, ḫṣḥbddn'yāh): Probably a Levite. He was one of those who stood at Ezra's left hand when he read the law, and helped the people to understand the meaning (Neh 8:4). 1 Esd 9:44 has "Nabarins" (Nab_artn, Nabareesa).

HASHEM, hā'shem (הַשֵּהָם, ḡšḥām): The "sons of Hashem" are mentioned (1 Ch 11:34) among David's mighty men. The passage (2 S 23:32) has "sons of Jashen."

HASHMONAH, hash-mo'-na (חַשְׁמֹנָה, ḫṣḵmnāh, "fatness"); A desert camp of the Israelites between Mithkah and Moseroth (Nu 33:29-30). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

HASHUBAH, ha-sho-ō'na (חַשּׁוֹנָה, ḫsh'n') hshb'hāyāh, "consideration"); One of the sons of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3:20).

HASHUM, ha-sh'um (חַשּׁוּם, ḫsh'um): (1) In Ezr 2:19; Neh 7:22, "children of Hashum" are mentioned among the returning exiles. In Ezr 10:33 (cf 1 Esd 9:33, "Asom"), members of the same family are named among those who married foreign wives.

(2) One of those who stood on Ezra's left at the reading of the law (Neh 8:4; 1 Esd 9:44, "Lothassubus"). The sign of the covenant (Neh 10:18) is possibly the same.

HASIDAEANS, has-i-d'âns (חֵסִידָאֵי, ḫṣyd'â'î), a transliteration of ḫṣydâ'îm, "the pious, "Puritans"); A name assumed by the orthodox Jews (1 Mac 2:42; 7:13) to distinguish them from the Hellenizing faction described in the Maccabean books as the "impious," the "lawless," the "truce breakers." They held perhaps narrow but strict and seriously honest views in religion, and recognized Judas Maccabaeus as their leader (2 Mac 14:6). They existed as a party before the days of the Maccabees, standing on the ancient ways, caring little for politics, and having small sympathy with merely national aspirations, except when affecting religion (1 Mac 1:61; 2:6 Mac 18:17; Jth 12:2; Ant, XIV, iv, 3). Their cooperation with Judas went only to the length of securing the right to follow their own religious practices. When Bacchides came against Judea, they were quite willing to make peace because Alcimus, "a priest of the seed of Aaron," was in his company. Him they accepted as high priest, though sixty of them soon fell by his treachery (1 Mac 7:13). Their desertion of Judas was largely the cause of his downfall.

HASMONEANS. See ARMONKANS.

HASRAH, ha-s'-rā, ha-s'-rā (חֲסָרָה, ḫs'r'h): Grandfather of Shallum, who was the husband of Huldah the prophetess (2 Ch 34:22).

In 2 K 22:14, HARRAS (q.v.).

HASSENAH, has-s'-n'a (חָסְנָה, ḫsn'yāh): In Neh 3:3 the "sons of Hassenah" are mentioned among the builders of the wall. Probably the same as Sennaah (Ezr 2:35; Neh 7:38) with the definite article, i.e. ha-sennaah. The latter, from the connection, would appear to be a place-name. See also Hassencar.

HASSENUAH, has-s'-n'a (חָסְנָע, ḫs'n') (q.v.): A family name in the two lists of Benjamite inhabitants of Jerus (1 Ch 9:7, AV "Hassenuah"); Neh 11:9, "Sennah"). The name is possibly the same as Hassenaah (q.v.), yet the occurrence of the singular ("son of H.") does not so well accord with the idea of a place-name.

HASHUB, hā'shub, hash'ub (q.v.): AV everywhere Hashub except 1 Ch 9:14: (1) A builder of the wall (Neh 3:11).

(2) Another builder of the same name (Neh 3:23).

(3) One of the signers of the covenant (Neh 10:23).

(4) A Levite chief (Neh 11:15; 1 Ch 9:14). BDB makes (1) and (3) identical.

HASSOPHERETH, has-o-ē'reth. See SOPHERETH.
HASTE, hast (חָשָׁה, ḥaphah, שָׁה, ḫāh, מָהָר, ṣētūdāh, ṣētūdāh), head- is catch. It (6). Sometimes, 43.44; 139 The cf Jambs 34. The head-covering. He 29, Isa 2, 17-20, said He 22). A "hasten my head-covering, hastily" K (Esd 22), RV (Ex 22 3, 22). Is as (40 14), "shall speedy" for; "hasten after another god" (Ps 16 4). ARV has "gives gifts for another god." RV exchange the Lord for: for "hasten hereunto," RV 29 27, "hasten enjoyment" for "hasten hitter" (1 K 22 9). "Catch quickly" for; "any other" (Ps 38 10). So "hasten to" (Job 9 26); "swoopeth on;" for hasteth in it; "hasten" (20 10; 101 3; 159 21, 22, etc.). The NT law softens this feeling as regarding persons, bringing it under the higher law of (Mt 5 43, 44; cf Rom 12 17-21), while intensifying the hatred of evil (Jude verse 23; Rev 2 6). God himself is hated by the wicked (Ex 20 5; Ps 159 21; cf Rom 8 7). Sometimes, however, the word "hate" is used hyperbolically in a relative sense to express only the strong preference of one to another. God loved Jacob, but hated Esau (Mal 1 3; Rom 9 13); father and mother are to be hated in comparison with Christ (Lk 14 26; cf Mt 10 37). See ENMITY.

HATHACH, hāthak (הָתָח, hāthakh), "terror": Son of Othniel and grandson of Kenaz (1 Ch 4 13).

HATIPA, ha-tt'fa, hat'fā (חָתְפָה, ḥātaphā), "taken," "captive"?): The ancestral head of a family of Nethinim that returned from Babylon (Ezr 2 34; Neh 7 56—"Atiphah," 1 Ezd 5 32).

HATTITA, ha-t'ta, hat-t'ā (חָתֵיתָה, ḥāṭītāh), head of a family among the "children of the porters" who returned from exile (Ezr 2 42; Neh 7 45; 1 Ezd 5 28, "Ateta").

HATSIMMENUCHOTH, hat-si-ham-en-ū-koth: A marginal reading in 1 Ch 2 52 AV. It disappears in RV, which reads in text, "half of the Menunoth" (q.v.). (Heb ḫēṣt ha-m'nnūbāh.)

HATTIL, hat'il (חָטִיל, ḫāṭīl): A company of servants of Solomon appearing in the post-exilic literature (Ezr 2 57; Neh 7 59). Same called "Agis" in 1 Ezd 5 34.

HATTUSH, hat'ūsh (חָתְשׁ, ḫāṭash): (1) Son of Shemaiyah, a descendant of the kings of Judah, in the 5th generation from Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 22). He returned with Zerubbabel and Ezra from Babylon to Jerus (Ezr 8 2; Neh 12 2).

HAUNT, hōnt, hānt: The vb. in OE was simply "to resort to," "frequent;" a place of dwelling or business was a haunt.

HAUNTED, hōntd, hāntd: The haunt of Sieber demons, in the hideous landscape of Szzek (Neh 10 4).

HAURAN, hōrân (Aram, hawrân; LXX Apavrus, Auranitis, also with aspirate): A province of Eastern Pal which, in Ezk 17.18, 16, was dishonored by the infidel Jebel S. to the S. and the S. of the desert. Its extent was from Dan in the N. to Gilead Province in the S., including the S. of the desert, a fertile land (Neh 10 4). It is a fertile land which, however, has nothing above ground which is older than the Jericho period. The human occupation is found in different parts, e.g. at Jer, may be very ancient.

HAURAN: The rema...er the hill of Jericho, may be very ancient.

TURKS ever since: and whether or not the recent operations against them (January, 1911) will result in their entire subjugation, remains to be seen.
HAVILAH, hav'i-lä (חָוִלָּה, hāwîlah; Εὐδάκα, Heudad):
(1) Son of Cush (Gen 10 7; 1 Ch 1 9).
(2) Son of Yektan, descendant of Shem (Gen 10 29; 1 Ch 1 23).
(3) Mentioned with Shur as one of the limits of the territory of the Ishmaelites (Gen 25 18); of the same limits of the land of the Amalekites (1 S 15 7), where, however, the text is doubtful. It is described (Gen 2 11.12) as bounded by the river Pishon and as being rich in gold, bdellium and "shoham-stone" (EV "onyx"). The shoham-stone was perhaps the Assyr sattu, probably the malachite or turquoise. The mention of a Cushite Havilah is explained by the fact that the Arabian tribes at an early time migrated to the coast of Africa. The context of Gen 10 7 thus favors a situation on the Ethiopian shore, and the name is perhaps preserved in the kolpos Aulisites and in the tribe Abalaita on the S. side of the straits of Bab-el-Mandeb. Or possibly a trace of the name appears in the classical Aulis, now Zeila in Somaliland. But its occurrence among the Yektanite Arabs (Gen 10 29) suggests a later origin in Arabia. South Arabian inscriptions mention a district of Khaulan (Haulan), and a place of this name is found both in Thama and S.E. of San'a. Again Strabo's Chaolotaiot and Hwaula in Bahrein point to a district on the Arabian shore in the Pers Gulf. No exact identification has yet been made.

HAVOC, hav'ok: "Devastation," "to make havoc of" is the tr of ἀποκαταστάσεων, lamakatosai, 'to stain," "to disgrace," in the NT "to injure," "destroy" (Acts 8 3. "As for Saul he made havoc of the church," RV "laid waste"; 1 Mac 7 7, "what havoc," RV "all the havoc," exozothreusis, "utter destruction"). RV has "made havoc of" (porthô) for "destroyed" (Acts 9 21; Gal 1 26), for "wasted" (Gal 1 13).

HAVVAH, hav'a (חֳוֵה, hayvah): Heb spelling, rendered Eve, "mother of all living." Gen 3 20 RVm. See EVE.

HAVVOTH-JAIR, hav-oth-jâ'îr (חַוֹּתֶת הָיִר, hōwhth yâ'thîr), "the encampments" or "tent villages of Jair"; AV Havoith-Jair, há-vóth-jâ'îr): The word hōwhth occurs only in this combination (Num 32 41; Dt 3 14; Josh 10 4), and is a legacy from the nomadic stage of Heb life. Jair had thirty sons who possessed thirty "cities," and these are identified with Havvoth-jair in Josh 10 3 ff. The district was in Gilead (ver 5; Num 32 41). In Dt 3 13 ff, it is identified with Bashan and Argob; but in 1 K 4 13, "the towns of Jair" are said to be in Gilead, while he also "possessed the region of Argob, which is in Bashan, terracree great cities with walls and brazen bars." There is evident confusion here. If we follow Josh 10 3 ff, we may find a useful clue in ver 5. Kamon is named as the burial place of Jair. This probably corresponds to Kamon taken by Antiochus III, on his march from Pella to Gephyrin (Polyb. v.70, 12). Schumacher (Northern 'Ajlûn, 137) found two places to the W. of Irbid with the names Kamm and Kumeim (the latter a diminutive of the former) with ancient ruins. Kamm probably represents the Heb Kamōn, so that Havvoth-jair should most likely be sought in this district, i.e. in North Gilead, between the Jordan valley and Jebel ez-Zumlek.

HAZAEL, ha-zâ'el, hâ'za-el, haz'a-el (חָזָאֵל, hāzâ'èl and חוּזָאֵל, hōzâ'èl; 'Atashâ, Hazaâl; Assyra'aza'du): Comes first into Bib. history as a high officer in the service of Ben-hadad II, king of Syria (2 K 8 7 ff; of 1 K 19 15 ff). He had been sent by his sick sovereign to inquire of the prophet Elisha, who was then in Damascus, whether he should recover of his sickness or not. He took with him a present “even of every good thing of Damascus, forty eunuchs' balsam, and six measures of honey, and ten tunics.” Elisha looked stedfastly at Hazael and wept, explaining to the incredulous officer that he was to be the perpetrator of horrible cruelties against the children of Israel: “Their strongholds will thou set on fire, and their young men will thou slay with the sword, and wilt dash in pieces their little ones, and rip up their women with child!” (2 K 8:12). Hazael protested against the very thought of such things, but Elisha assured him that he had shown him that he was to be king of Syria. No sooner had Hazael delivered to his master the answer of the man of God than the treacherous purpose took shape in his heart to hasten Ben-hadad’s end, and “He took the coverlet, and dipped it in water, and spread it on his face, so that he died” (2 K 8:15). The reign which opened under such sinister auspices proved long and successful, and brought the kingdom of Syria to the zenith of its power. Hazael soon found occasion to invade Israel. It was at Ramoth-gilead, “the city where the hand of the Lord was broken” (2 K 8:15), that the first overt clash between the two peoples occurred, and a scene of a fierce conflict between Israel and Syria when Ahab met his death, that Hazael encountered Joram, the king of Israel, with whom his kinsman, Ahaziah, king of Judah, had joined forces to retain that important fortress which had been recovered from the Syrians (2 K 9:14-15). The final issue of the battle is not recorded, but Joram received wounds which obliged him to return across the Jordan to Jezreel, leaving the forces of Israel in command of Jehu, whose anointing by Elisha’s deputy at Ramoth-gilead, usurpation of the throne of Israel, slaughter of Joram, Ahaziah and Zechariah, and vengeance upon the whole house of Ahab are told in rapid and tragic succession by the sacred historian (2 K 9-10).

Whatever was the issue of this attack upon Ramoth-gilead, it was not long before Hazael laid waste the whole country E. of the Jordan—“all the land of Gilead, the Gadites, and the Reubenites, and the Manassehites, even Aroer, which is by the valley of the Arnon, even Gilead and Bashan” (2 K 10:33; cf Am 1:3). Nor did Judah escape the heavy hand of the Syrian oppressor. Marching southward through the plain of Esdraelon, and following a route along the maritime plain taken by many conquerors before and since, Hazael fought against Gath and took it, and then “set his face to go up to Jerus” (2 K 12:17). As other kings of Judah had to do with other conquerors, Jehoash, who was now upon the throne, bought off the invader with the gold and the treasures of temple and palace, and Hazael withdrew his forces from Jerusalem.

Israel, however, still suffered at the hands of Hazael and Ben-hadad, his son, and the sacred historian mentions that Hazael oppressed Israel all the days of Jehoahaz, the son of Jehu. So grievous was the oppression of the Syrians that Hazael “left not to Jehoahaz of the people save fifty horsemen, and ten chariots, and ten thousand footmen, for the king of Syria destroyed them, and made them like the dust in threshing” (2 K 13:1-7). Forty or fifty years later Amoz, in the opening of his prophecy, recalled these Syrian campaigns against the little nation whose capital city was to come upon Damascus. “Thus saith Jeh . . . I will send a fire into the house of Hazael, and it shall devour the palaces of Ben-hadad” (Am 1:3,4).

Already, however, the power of Syria had passed its meridian and had begun to decline. Events of which Hazael and his son stood more or less witness were proceeding which ere long, made it possible for the son of Jehoahaz, Jehu, to recover the honor of Israel and recover the cities that had been lost (2 K 13:5). For all this, the full recital of these events we must turn to the Assyrian annals preserved in the monuments. We do read in the sacred history that Jehu gave to Israel “a savagery, so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians” (2 K 13:5). The annals of the Assyrians give this period clearly and qualitatively the invasion and occupation of the region by the Assyrians, and the passage quoted above is instructive. The relief that came to Israel was due to the crippling of the power of Syria by the aggression of Assyria on the lands of the Wathians. From the Black Obelisk in the British Museum, on which Shalmaneser III (859–829 BC) has inscribed the story of the campaign he carried on during his long reign, there are instructive notices of this period of Israelish history. In the 13th year of his reign (842 BC), Shalmaneser made war against Hazael. On the Obelisk the record is short, but a longer account is given on one of the pavements slabs from Ninroud, the ancient Kalâb. It is as follows: “In the 13th year of my reign for the 16th time I crossed the Euphrates. Hazael of Damascus trusted to the strength of his arm and marched his troops in full array. I sent Senir (Pamphylia) from the south, and a limit which is in front of Lebanon, he made his stronghold. I fought with him; his defeat I accomplished; 600 of his soldiers I killed, and his horses I killed 470 of his horses, with his camp I took from him. To give my life, he heaped it up; I purged with a sword his royal city. He shut him up. His plantations I cut down. As far as the mountains of the Hauran I marched. Cities without number I smote. Hazael of Damascus was in fire. Their spoil beyond count I carried away. As far as the mountains of Raal-Rosh, which is a headland of the sea (at the mouth of the Nahr el-Kbl, Dog River), I marched; my royal likeness I set there up. At that time I received the tribute of the Syrian and of the lands of Hamath and of Yahua [Jehu] the son of Khummri (Omri)” (Ball, “From the Tablet of Khummri and the Days of Hazael,” Ch. 2).

From this inscription we gather that Shalmaneser did not succeed in the capture of Damascus. But it still remained an object of his ambition to Assur, and king Ahab began to fear for the safety of his kingdom. Rameses III, the grandson of Shalmaneser, succeeded in capturing it, and reduced Hazael to submission. We read of Rama, who was “the saviour” whom God raised up to deliver Israel from the hand of Syria. Then it became possible for Israel under Jehoash to recover the cities he had lost, but by this time Hazael had died and Ben-hadad, his son. Ben-hadad III, called Mari on the monuments, had become king in his stead (2 K 13:24-25).

HZAHAIAH, ha'-zi'ya (יהזיה, ‘Jah seen’): Among the inhabitants of Jerusalem mentioned in the list of Judahites in Neh 11:5.

HAZAR, ha'-zar (חצר, hāṣer, constr. of לְחָצֵר, le-ḥāṣer, ‘an inclosure,’ ‘settlement,’ or ‘village’): is frequently the first element in Heb place-names.

Hazar-Addar (Heb hāṣar 'addār), a place on the southern boundary of Judah (Nu 34:4), is probably identical with Hazron (Josh 16:3), which, in this case, however, is sometimes rendered from Addar (AV “Adar”). It seems to have lain somewhere to the S.W. of Kadesh-barnea.

Hazar-enan (Heb hāṣar 'ēnān, “village of springs”: 'ēnān is Aram., a place, undetermined, at 2 Hazar- the junction of the northern and eastern enan- enans, the frontier of the land promised to the Israelites (Nu 34:9 f; cf Eze 47:17; 48:1). To identify it with the sources of the Orontes seems to leave too great a gap between this and the places named to the S. Buhi (GAP, 66 f) would draw the northern boundary from Nahr el- Kāsimiyeh to the foot of Hermon, and would locate Hazar-enan on Bōnás. The springs there lend fit B. Buhi (GAP, 66 f) would draw the northern boundary from Nahr el- Kasimiyeh to the foot of Hermon, and would locate Hazar-enan on Bōnás. The springs there lend fit circumstances to the placing of the capital city as at Hādr, farther east, suggested by von Kießer. But there is no certainty.
Hazar-gaddah (Heb הָazor-גַּדָּדָה), a place in the territory of Judah “toward the border of Edom in the South” (Josh 15 21.27).

3. Hazar-gaddah—untouched parts of the Darama, overlooking the Dead Sea. This might point to the site of Masada, or to the remarkable ruins of Umm Batayak farther south (GAP, 185).

Hazar-hatticon (RV HAZER-HATTICON; Heb חָazor-הֵתִכְו, “the middle village”), a place named on the ideal border of Israel (Ezek 47:16). The context shows that it is identical with Hazar-enan, for which this is apparently another name. Possibly, however, it is due to a script error.

Hazar-navveh (Heb חָazor-נָבָה), the name of a son of Joktan attached to a clan or district in South Arabia (Gen 10:28; 1 Ch 1:20).

5. Hazar-navveh—that broad, a rightful valley running nearly parallel with the coast for about 100 miles, north of el-Yemen. The ruins and inscriptions found by Glaser show that it was once the home of a great civilization, the capital being Sabata (Gen 10:7) (Glaser, Skizze, II, 20, 423 ff).

Hazar-shual (Heb חָazor-שְׂעָל; 1 Ch 24:1). It is represented by the modern Hadramaut, a broad and fruitful valley reaching nearly parallel with the coast for about 100 miles, north of el-Yemen. The ruins and inscriptions found by Glaser show that it was once the home of a great civilization, the capital being Sabata (Gen 10:7) (Glaser, Skizze, II, 20).

6. Hazar-shual—rightful valley running nearly parallel with the coast for about 100 miles, north of el-Yemen. The ruins and inscriptions found by Glaser show that it was once the home of a great civilization, the capital being Sabata (Gen 10:7) (Glaser, Skizze, II, 20).

7. Hazar-susah (Heb חָazor-סָעָה; Jos 18:24). As it stands, the name means “station of a mare” or “of horses,” and it occurs along with Beth-marcaboth, “place of chariots,” which might suggest depots for trade in chariots and horses. The site has not been identified.

HAZAZON-TAMAR, haz'a-zon-ta-mar (חָazor-תָּמָר), ḥoṣaqin tāmar; AV Hazezon Tamar): “Hazar of the palm trees,” mentioned (Gen 14:7) as a place of the Amorites, conquered, together with En-mishpat, by the Egyptians under Chedorlaomer; in 2 Ch 20:2 it is identified with En-Geder (q.v.); and if so, it must have been its older name. If this identification is accepted, then Hazazon may survive in the name Wady Hassahah, N.W. of 'Ain Jidah. Another suggestion, which certainly meets the needs of the narrative better, is that Hazazon-tamar is the Thamar of OS (86 3; 210 86), the ḥoṣaqin, Thamarah, of Ptol. xvi.3. The ruin Kurmus, 20 miles W.S.W. of the S. end of the Dead Sea—on the road from Hebron to Elath—is supposed to mark this site.

HAZELENPO, haz-el-el-'ō-ni. See HAZEELENPO.

HAZER-HATTICON. See HAZAR.

HAZERIM, ha-zér-im (하זרים), ḥāzē-rim): Is rendered in AV (Dt 2:23) as the name of a place in the S.W. of Pal, in which dwelt the Avvim, ancient inhabitants of the land. The word means “villages,” and ought to be translated as in RV. The sentence means that the Avvim dwelt in villages—not in fortified towns—before the coming of the Caphtorim, the Philis, who destroyed them.

HAZEROTH, ha-zērōth, haz'er-oth (חָazor-וֹת, ḥoṣaqin the enclosures): A camp of the Israelites, the 3d from Sinai (Nu 11 35; 12 16; 33 17; Dt 1). It is identified with Ain Ḥadra (spring of the enclosure), 30 miles N.E. of Jebel Musa, on the way to the Aravah. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

HAZEOZON-TAMAR, haz-ezon-ta-mar (חָazor-תָּמָר), ḥaṣṭaqon tāmar, Gen 14 7 AV; ḥaṣṭaqon tāmar, 2 Ch 20 2). See HAZAZON-TAMAR.

HAZIEL, hā'zi-el (חָזִי-אל, “God sees”): A Levite of the sons of Shimiel, of David’s time (1 Ch 29 3).

HAZO, hā'zo (חָזו, ḥa'zo, fifth son of Nahor [Gen 22:22]). Possibly the eponym of a Nahorite family or clan.

HAZOR, hā'zōr (חָזוֹר, ḥa'zōr; Na'ërōp, Na'ōrō, S, Ḫ怀抱, Ḫawā'; Ḫa'ērōp, 1 Mace 11 67) (1) The royal city of Jabin (Josh 11 1), which, before the Israelite conquest, seems to have been the seat of a wide authority (ver 11). It was taken by Joshua, who exterminated the inhabitants, and it was the only city in that region which he destroyed by fire (vs 11-13). At a later time the Jabin Dynasty appears to have recovered power and restored the city (Jgs 4 2). The heavy defeat of their army at the hands of Deborah and Barak led to their final downfall (vs 23-27). It was in the territory allotted to Naphtali (Josh 19 30). Hazor was one of the cities for the fortifications with which Solomon raised a levy (1 K 9 15). Along with other cities in Galilee, it was taken by Tiglath-pileser III (2 K 15 29). In the plain of Hazor, Jonathan the Maccabees gained a great victory over Demetrius (1 Mace 11 67 ff).

In Tob 1 2 it is called “Asher” (LXX Ἀσήρ, Ἀσήρ), and 'Ascher is said to be “above” it. Jos (Ant, V, v, 1) says that Hazor was situated over the lake, Senechnonitis, which he evidently identifies with the Waters of Merom (Josh 11 13). It must clearly be sought on the heights W. of el-Huleh. Several identifications have been suggested, but no certain conclusion can be reached. Some (Wilson and Guérin) favor Tell Harrekh to the S.E. of Kedès, where there are extensive remains of a late village. For the site of Khureibeh, 2 3 miles S. of Kedes, where, however, there are no ruins. We may take it as certain that the ancient name of Hazor is preserved in Merv el-Hafeeth, S.W. of Kedes, and N. of Wady Ubo, and in Jebel Hafeeth, E. of the Mount, although it has evidently drifted from the original site, as names have so often done in Pal. Conder suggests a possible identification with Hazor, farther S., “at the foot of the chain of Upper Galilee ... in a position more appropriate to the use of the chariots that belonged to the king of Hazor” (HDB, s.v.).

(2) A town, unidentified, in the S. of Judah (Josh 15 23).

(3) A town in the S. of Judah (Josh 15 25).

See KEROOTH-HEBREW.

(4) A town in Benjamin (Neh 11 33) now represented by Khirbet Ḥuzzär, not far to the E. of Nebi Samwil.

(5) An unidentified place in Arabia, smitten by Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 49 28.33).

HAZOR-HADATTAH, hāzōr-ba-dāt'a (Aram, ḥa'zōr bā-ḥadattāh, “New Hazor”): “An Aram. adj., however, in this region is so strange that the reading must be questioned" (Di). One of the "uttermost seas," of Judah toward the border of Edom (Josh 15:25). Eliseu and Jerome describe a "New Hazer" to the E. of Asealon, but this is too far N.

HAZZELELPONI, has-a-eel-pa'ni (חֹזַלְפּוֹן): A feminine name occurring in the list of the genealogy of Judah (1 Ch 4:3); probably representing a clan.

HE, hih (?): The fifth letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as h. It came also to be used for the number 5. For name, etc., see ALPHABET.

HEAD, head (ד'ה, נְפִּשׁ, Aram. נַפְּשׁ, נפָּשׁ, and in special sense הַנֵּפֵר, goli'beth, lit. "skull," "cut-off head of foremost, uppermost, originaly: "the head that stands at the head"; cf. "God is with us at our head" (2 Ch 13:12); "Knowest thou that Jehovah will take away thy master and thy people from thy head?" (2 K 2 3); "head-stone," RV "top-stone," i.e. the uppermost stone (Zec 4 7). Israel is called the head of nations (Dt 28 13); "The head (capital) of Syria is Damascus, and the head [prince] of Damascus is Rezin" (Isa 7 8); "heads of their fathers' houses," i.e. elders of the clans (Ex 6 14); of "heads of tribes" (Dt 1 15), also "captain," lit. head (Nu 14 4; Dt 1 15; 1 Ch 11 42; Neh 9 17). The phrase "head and tail" (Isa 9 14; 19 15) is explained by the rabbis as meaning the nobles and the common people; of "palm-tree and rush" (9 14), "hair of the feet . . . and beard" (7 20), but of also Isa 9 15. In the NT we find the remarkable statement of Christ being "the head of the church" (Eph 1 22; 5 23), "head of every man" (1 Cor 11 4), "head of all principality and power" (Col 2 10), "head of the body, the church" (Col 1 18; cf Eph 4 15).

The context of 1 Cor 11 3 is very instructive to a true understanding of this expression: "I would have you know, that the head of every man is Christ; and the head of the woman is man; and the head of Christ is God" (cf Eph 5 23). Here, clearly, reference is had to the lordship of Christ over His church, not to the oneness of Christ and His church, while in Eph 4 16 the dependence of the church upon Christ is spoken of. These passages should be closely considered before belief in the idea of Christ being the intellectual center, the brain of His people, from whence the members are passively governed, for to the Jewish mind the heart was the seat of the intellect, not the head. See HEAVER.

As the head is the most essential part of physical man, calmity and blessing are said to come upon the head of a person (Gen 49 26; Dt 6 8). There are various cases of the head being either to be used for evil or to be used for good (Ex 12 49; 1 Ki 20 12; Eze 9 3; 25 23; Rom 12 20). This phrase is dark as to its origin, but quite clear as to its meaning and application (cf Rom 12 7-17). The Jew was inclined to swear by his head (Mt 5 36), as well as to extend it to the whole mortal body (Nu 24 20; Lam 2 10; Am 2 7), or to its parts (Zec 4 7; Jer 19 3; Heb 6 20). The head is said to be under a vow (Nu 6 18 19; Acts 18 18; 21 23), because the Nazirite vow could readily be recognized by the head.

There are numerous idiomatic expressions connected with the head, of which we enumerate the following: "the hoary head" designates old age (see HAIR); "to round the corners of the head," etc. (Lev 19 27; cf. also Dt 14 1; Am 8 10), probably refers to the shaving of the side locks or to the whole scene of the heathen. The term is also often done in idolatrous shrines or in token of initiation into the service of an idol. It was therefore forbidden to Israel, and its rigid observance gave rise to the peculiar Jewish custom of wearing long side locks or a "turbant" (cf Num 6 5; 23 5; 92 10; He 1 9) a sign of joy and hospitality, while the "covering of the head" (2 S 16 30; Est 6 12; Jer 14 3), "putting the hand upon the head" (2 S 13 19) and putting earth, dust or ashes upon it (Josh 7 6; 1 S 4 12; 2 S 1 2; 13 19; Lam 2 10; cf Am 2 7) were expressive of sadness, grief, deep shame and mourning. In Est 7 8 Haman's face is covered as a condemned criminal, or as one who has been utterly put to shame, and who has nothing more to say for his life. In this connection the Pauline injunction as to the veiling of women in the public gatherings of the Christians (1 Cor 11 5), while men were instructed to appear bareheaded, must be mentioned. This is diametrically opposed to the Jewish custom, according to which men wore the head covered by the tallith or prayer shawl, while women were considered sufficiently covered by their long hair (1 Cor 11 15). The apostle here simply commends a Gentile custom for the use of the Gentile women. In other populations; in other words, he recommends obedience to local standards of decency and good order.

HEALING, hə'ling (NEB, marpē', tappa', t'ēlah, tēhāh): In the OT this word is always used in its figurative sense; marpē', which lit. means "a cure," is used in Jer 14 19 twice, and in Mal 4 2; t'ēlah, which lit. means "an irrigation canal," here means something applied externally to the body, in which sense it is used metaphorically in Jer 30 13; tēhāh occurs only in Nah 3 19 AV and is tr4 "assuaging" in RV.

In the NT tēh is therapeō; once (Acts 10 38) idomai; in the other passages it is either sama, as in 1 Cor 12 9-30, or tassō, as in Acts 4 22, derivatives from this vb.

HEALING, GIFTS OF (χαρίσματα λατρείας, chartismata tamidōn): Among the "spiritual gifts" enumerated in 1 Cor 12 4-11.28 are included "gifts of healings." See SPIRITUAL GIFTS. The subject has risen into much prominence of recent years, and so calls for separate treatment. The points to be considered are: (1) the NT facts, (2) the nature of the gifts, (3) their permanence in the church.

The Gospels abundantly show that the ministry of Christ Himself was one of healing no less than of teaching (cf Mt 11 5). The healing miracles of the Lord's Gospel, if it does not preserve words actually used by Christ Himself, bears witness at all events to the traditional belief of the early church that after His departure from the world His disciples would still possess the gift of healing. The Book of Acts furnishes plentiful evidence of the exercise of this gift by apostles and other prominent men in the primitive church (Acts 3 7; 5 12-16; 8 7; 19 12; 28 8f), and the Ep. of Jas refers to a ministry of healing carried on by the elders of a local church acting in their collective capacity (Jas 5 14f). But Paul in this passage speaks of "gifts of healings" (the pl. "healings" apparently refers to the variety of ailments that were cured) as being distributed along with other spiritual gifts among the ordinary members of the church. There were men, it would seem, who occupied no official position in the community, and who might not otherwise be distinguished among their fellow-members, on whom this special charism of healing had been bestowed.

On this subject the NT furnishes no direct information, but it supplies evidence from which conclusions may be drawn. We notice that the exercise of the gift is ordinarily conditional on the faith of the recipient of the blessing (Mt 6 5f; 10 52; Acts 14 9)—faith not only in God but in the human agent (Acts 3 4f; 6 15; 9 17). The healer himself is a person of great faith (Mt 17 19f), and he, like his power, is confirmed and authenticated by the patients with confidence points to the possession of a strong, magnetic personality. The diseases cured appear for the most part to have been not organic but functional; and many of them would now be classed as nervous disorders. The conclusion from these data is that the gifts of healing to which Paul alludes were not miraculous endowments, but natural therapeutic faculties raised to their highest power by Christian faith.

Modern psychology, by its revelation of the marvels of the subliminal self or subconscious mind and the power of "suggestion," shows how it is possible for one man to lay his hand on the very springs of personal life in another, and so disclose the psychological source of the gift of healing. The medical science of our time, by its recognition of the dependence of the physical upon the spiritual, of the

But Paul in this passage speaks of "gifts of healings" (the pl. "healings" apparently refers to the variety of ailments that were cured) as being distributed along with other spiritual gifts among the ordinary members of the church. There were men, it would seem, who occupied no official position in the community, and who might not otherwise be distinguished among their fellow-members, on whom this special charism of healing had been bestowed.

On this subject the NT furnishes no direct information, but it supplies evidence from which conclusions may be drawn. We notice that the exercise of the gift is ordinarily conditional on the faith of the recipient of the blessing (Mt 6 5f; 10 52; Acts 14 9)—faith not only in God but in the human agent (Acts 3 4f; 6 15; 9 17). The healer himself is a person of great faith (Mt 17 19f), and he, like his power, is confirmed and authenticated by the patients with confidence points to the possession of a strong, magnetic personality. The diseases cured appear for the most part to have been not organic but functional; and many of them would now be classed as nervous disorders. The conclusion from these data is that the gifts of healing to which Paul alludes were not miraculous endowments, but natural therapeutic faculties raised to their highest power by Christian faith.

Modern psychology, by its revelation of the marvels of the subliminal self or subconscious mind and the power of "suggestion," shows how it is possible for one man to lay his hand on the very springs of personal life in another, and so disclose the psychological source of the gift of healing. The medical science of our time, by its recognition of the dependence of the physical upon the spiritual, of the of Nature, provides the physiological basis. And may we not add that many incontestable cases of Christian faith-cure (take as a type the well-known instance in which Luther at Weimar "tore Melanchthon," as the latter put it, "out of the very jaws of death"; see RE, XII, 520) furnish the religious basis, and prove that faith in God, working through the soul upon the body, is the mightiest of all healing influences, and that one who by his own faith and sjrmpathy and force of personality can stir up faith in others may exercise by God's blessing the power of healing diseases?

There is abundant evidence that in the early centuries the gifts of healing were still claimed and practised within the church (Justin,
Apol. ii.6;
3. Permanence of 32, 4; TertuUian, Apol. xxiii; Origen. Contra Celsum, vii.4). The free exercise of these gifts gradually ceased, the Church partly, no doubt, through loss of the early faith and spirituality, but partly through the growth of an ascetic temper which ignored Christ's gospel for the body and tended to the view that pain and sickness are the indispensable ministers of His gospel for the soul. All down the history of the church, however, there have been notable personalities (e.g. Francis of Assisi, Luther, Wesley) and little societies of earnest Christians (e.g. the Waldenses, the early Moravians and Quakers) who have reasserted Christ's gospel on its physical side as a gospel for sickness no less than for sin, and claimed for the gift of healing the place

Paul assigned to it among the gifts of the Spirit.
In recent years the subject of Christian healing has risen into importance outside of the regularly organized churches through the activity of various faithThat the leaders of these movements have laid hold of a truth at once Scriptural and scientific there can be little doubt, though they have usually combined it with what we regard as a mistaken hostility to the ordinary practice of medicine. It is worth remembering that with all his faith in the spiritual gift of healing and personal experience of its power, Paul chose Luke the physician as the companion of his later journeys; and worth noticing that Luke shared with the apostle the honors showered upon the missionaries by the people of Melita whom they had cured of their diseases (Acts 28 10). Upon the modern church there seems to lie the duty of reaffirming the reality and permanence of the primitive gift of healing, while relating it to the scientific practice of medicine as another power ordained of God, and its natural ally in the task of diffusing the Christian gospel of health.

HEART,


As representing the man himself, it was considered to be the seat of the emotions and passions and appetites (Gen 18:5; Lev 19:17; Ps 105:18), and embraced likewise the intellectual and moral faculties—though these are necessarily ascribed to the “soul” as well. This distinction is not always observed.

“Soul” in Heb can never be rendered by “heart”, nor can “heart” be considered as a synonym for “soul” (Cramer has well observed: “The range of the Heb nephesh, to which the Gr ψυχή alone corresponds, differs so widely from the ideas connected with ψυχή, that utter confusion would have ensued had ψυχή been employed in an unlimited degree for ליב ("heart")). The Bib. ליב never, like ψυχή, denotes the personal subject, nor could it do so. That which in classical Gr is ascribed to ψυχή [a good soul, a just soul, etc.] is in the Bible ascribed to the heart alone and cannot be otherwise” (Crenmer, Lexicon, art. “Kardia,” 437 ff, German ed).

In the heart vital action is centered (1 K 21:7). "Heart,” existing as a term in the Bible, is never ascribed to animals, as is the case sometimes with nephesh and ῥαψ(Lev 17 of Vital 11, nephesh; Gen 2:19; Nu 16:22; Action Gen 7:22, ῥαψ). "Heart” is thus often used interchangeably with these two (Gen 41:8; Ps 86:4; 119:20); but it “never denotes the personal subject, always the personal organ.”

As the central organ in the body, forming a focus for its vital action, it has come to stand for the center of its moral, spiritual, intellectual life. “In particular the heart and mind is the place in which the process of self-consciousness is carried out, in which the soul is at home with itself, and is conscious of all its being and suffering as its own” (Oehler). Hence it is that men of "courage" are called "men of the heart"; that the Lord is said to speak “in his heart” (Gen 8:21); that men “know in their own heart” (Deut 5:5), that “no one consid- ereth the heart” (Isa 44:19 AV). “Heart” in this connection is sometimes rendered “mind,” as in Nu 16:28 ("of mine own mind"). Vulg ex propria corde, LXX ἐκ αὐτοῦ; the fooliah “is void of understanding,” i.e. “heart” (Prov 6:32, where the KJV renders "soul"). Luther “der ist ein Narr”). God is represented as “searching the heart” and “trying the reins” (Jer 17:10 AV). Thus “heart” comes to stand for "conscience," for which there is no word in Heb, as in Job 27:6, “My heart shall not reproach me,” or in 1 S 24:5, "David’s heart smote him,” or 1 S 25:31. From this it appears, in the words of Owen: “The heart in Scripture is variously used, sometimes for the mind and understanding, sometimes for the will, sometimes for the affections, sometimes for the conscience, sometimes for the whole soul. Generally, it denotes the whole soul of man and all the faculties of it, not absolutely, but as they are all one principle of moral operations, as they all concur in our doing of good and evil.

The radiating reflection of human nature is clearly taught in Scripture and brought into connection with the heart. It is “uncircumcised” (Jer 9:26; Ezek 44:7; cf Acts 7:51; 11:29; 12:15, "uncircumcised").

6. Figurative Senses and “hardened” (Ex 4:21; Ps 44:23); “deceitful” (Prov 11:20); “godless” (Job 36:13): “deceitful and desperately wicked” (Jer 17:9 AV). It defiles the whole man (Mt 15:19:20); resists, as in the case of Pharaoh, the repeated call of God (Ex 7:13).

There, however, the law of God is written (Rom 2:15); there the work of grace is wrought (Acts 15:9), for the “heart” may be “renewed” by grace (Ezk 36:26), because the “heart” is the seat of sin (Gen 6:5; 8:21).

This process of heart-renewal is indicated in various ways. It is the removal of a “stony heart” (Ezk 11:19). The heart becomes "clean” (Ps 51:10); “fixed” (Ps 112 of Heart 7) through “the fear” of the Lord (Jer 10:20).

7. Process “renewal” (ver 1); “With the heart man believeth” (Rom 10:10); on the “heart” the power of God is exercised for renewal (Jer 31:33). To God the bereaved apostles pray as a knower of the heart (Acts 1:24—a word not known to classical writers, found only here in the NT and in Acts 15:8, kardionostē). In the “heart” God’s Spirit dwells with might (Eph 3:16, τὸν ὄντα ἁπλον; in the “heart” God’s love is poured forth (Rom 5:5). The Spirit of His Son has been “sent forth into the heart” (Gal 4:6); the "earnest of the Spirit" has been given “in the heart” (2 Cor 1:22). In the work of grace, therefore, the heart occupies a position almost unique.

We might also refer here to the command, on which both the Law and NT rest their warmth of love, as based: “Thou shalt love Jec thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy might” (Dt 6:5), where “heart” always takes the first place, and in a form which in the NT rendering remains unchanged (cf Mt 22:37; Mk 12.30.33; Lk 10:27, where “heart” always takes precedence).

A bare reference may be made to the employment of the term for that which is innermost, hidden, deepest in anything (Ex 15:8; 9. A Term Jon 2:3), the very center of things, for “Deep- est” This we find in all languages. Cf est”

J. I. MARAISSHEARTH, hārāth: Occurs 7 t in AV: Gen 18:6; Ps 102:3; Isa 30:14; Jer 36:22.23 bis; Zec 12:6; 4 t in RV: Lev 6:9; Isa 30:14; Ezek 45:15.16 ("altar hearth"); Ps 29:8.9. In his heart it was noted that the renderings of the two VSS agree in only one passage (Isa 30:14).

(1) The hearth in case of a tent was nothing more than a depression in the ground in which fire was kindled, and where ashes were gathered. It is mentioned in Gen 18:6, in the ashes or upon hot stones. In this passage, however, there is nothing in the Heb corresponding to AV "on the hearth." In the poorer class of houses also the hearth consisted of such a depression, of varying dimensions, in the middle or in one corner of the room. There was no chimney for the smoke, which escaped as it could, or through a latticed opening for the purpose (the "chimney" of Hos 13:5). While the nature of the hearth is thus far more rich or less uncertainty attaches to specific terms used in the Heb. In Isa 30:14 the expression means simply “that which is kindled,” referring to the bed of live coals. From this same vb. (עֵכָד, “be kindled”) are formed the nouns עֵכָד (Ps 102:3 [Heb 4]) and עֵכָד (Lev 6:9 [Heb 2]), which might, according to their formation, mean either the material kindled or the place where a fire is kindled. Hence the various renderings, "firebrand," "hearth," etc. Moreover in Lev 6:26 (26) the termination -עֵכָד (moktib) may be taken as the personal suffix, "its"; hence RV “on its firewood.”

(2) Two other terms have reference to heating in the better class of houses. In Jer 36:22.23 the word "דַב" means a "braizer" of burning coals, with which Jehoiakim's "winter house" was heated. The same purpose was served by the "pan [κεπρόν] of fire" of Zez 12:6 RV, apparently a wide, shallow vessel used for cooking (1 S 22:14, RV "pan"), or as a wash basin (cf Ex 30:18; 1 K 7:38, etc., "lav'er").

(3) Another class of passages is referred to the signification 'altar hearth,' which seems to have been a term applied to the top of the altar of burnt offering. The mōrēdāh of Lev 6:9 [2], though related by derivation to the words discussed under (1) above, belongs here (cf also Ecclus 50:12, "by the hearth of the altar," παρ' ἱραρχῶν βασιλέων, παρ' ἱεράρχων βασιλέων in Ezekiel's description of the altar of the restored temple (43:15,16)), he designates the top of the altar by a special term (RV 'altar vessel,' which is by most understood to mean "altar hearth" (so RV). With this may be compared the symbolic name given to Jesus (Isa 29:1), and variously explained as "lion [or lioness] of God," or "hearth of God.

HEARTILY, hār'-ii-li: Occurs (Col 3:23) as the tr of εἰσέβαλλεν, εἰσέβαλλον, "whatsoever ye do, do it heartily as unto the Lord [who sees the heart and recompenses whatsoever good thing a man does]" and not unto men (however they, your masters according to the flesh, may require; 1 K 19:16; RV 'work heartily,' m 'Gr from the soul').

In 2 Mac 4:37, we have "Antiochus was heartily sorry," psuchódos ('from the soul').

HEAT, hēt (ς, hēm, Ἰησοῦς, ἱδρώμα, θηρευθ, 'drought,' Job 30:30; Isa 4:6; 25:4; Jer 36:30; ἑπτα), skārēthā, Isa 49:10, tr in RV 'miserable'; see MIRAGE: The heat of the summer is greatly dreaded in Pal, and as a rule the people rest under cover during the middle of the day, when the sun is hottest. There is no rain from May to October, and scarcely a cloud in the sky to cool the air or to screen off the burning vertical rays of the sun. The first word of advice given to visitors to the air to protect themselves from the sun. Even on the mountains, where the temperature is lower, the sun is perhaps more fierce, owing to the lesser density of the atmosphere. This continuous summer heat often causes sunstroke, and the glare causes diseases of the eye which affect a large percentage of the 2. Causes population of Pal and Egypt.

Disease is it to be expected that in these times of heat and drought the ideal pleasure has come to be to sit in the shade by some cool flowing fountain. In the mountains the village which has the coolest spring of water is the most desired. These 3. Relief considerations give renewed meaning to the passages: "as cold waters to a thirsty soul" (Prov 25:25); "He maketh me to lie down in green pastures; he leadeth me beside still waters" (Ps 23:2). What a blessing to be "under the shadow of the Almighty" (Ps 91:1), where "the sun shall not strike upon them, nor any heat" (Rev 7:16)!

The middle of the day is often referred to as the 'heat of the day' (1 S 11:11). It made a great difference to the army whether it could win the battle before the midday heat. Saladin won the great battle at Hittin by the heat of the heavens. The apostle Paul speaks of himself as caught up into "the third heaven," which he evidently identifies with Paradise (2 Cor 12:2). 6. The End Correspondent to the Beginning
7. The Cosmical Heavens: He 12 26-29

9. A Purified Universe

The formal conception of new heavens and a new earth occurs in Isa 65 17; 66 22; 2 Pet 3 13; (cf. Trito-Hebrews 26-29). The idea in substance is also found in theological Isa 51 16; Mt 19 28; 2 Cor 5 17; Idea He 12 26-28. In each case the reference is eschatological, indeed the adj. "new" seems to have acquired in this and other connections a semi-technical eschatological sense. It must be remembered that the OT has no single word for "universe," and that the phrase "heaven and earth" serves to supply the deficiency. The promise of a new heavens and a new earth is therefore equivalent to a promise of world renewal.

It is a debated question how old in the history of revelation this promise is. Isaiah is the prophet with whom the idea first occurs in an explicit form, and that in passages which many critics assign to the post-exilic period (the so-called Trito-Isaiah). In general, until recently, the trend of criticism has been to represent the universalistic-cosmic type of eschatology as developed out of the particularistic-national type by a gradual process of widening of the horizon of prophecy, a view which would put the emergence of the former at a comparatively late date. More recently, however, Greffmann (Die Ursprache der irakaschischen Schriftliche Welt, 1902) and others have endeavored to show that often even prophecies belonging to the latter type embody material and employ means of expression which presuppose acquaintance with the idea of a world-catastrophe at the end. On this view the world-eschatology would have, from ancient times, existed alongside of the more narrowly confined outlook, and would be even older than the latter. These writers further assume that the cosmic eschatology was not ingrafted among the Hebrews, but of oriental (both) origin, a theory which they apply not only to the more developed system of the later apocalyptic writings, but also to its preformations in the OT.

The cosmic eschatology is not believed to have been the distinctive property of the great ethical prophets, but rather a commonly current mythological belief to which the prophets refer without 3. Different formally endorsing it. Its central thought is said to have been the belief that the end of the world-process must correspond to the beginning, that consequently the original condition of things, when heaven and earth were new, must repeat itself at some future point, and the state of paradise with its concomitants return. The belief supposed to have rested on certain astronomical observations.

While this theory in the form presented is unproven and unacceptable, it deserves credit for having focused attention on certain phenomena of which clearly, from Cosmical national, prophecy, and Conception particularly the world-embracing scope which it assumes in some predictions, is far older than modern criticism had been willing to concede. The phenomenon of the cosmic type of eschatology also puts the eschatological promise on the broadest racial basis (Gen 3). It does not first ascend from Israel to the new humanity, but at the very outset takes its point of departure in the race and from this descends to the election of Israel, always keeping the universalistic goal in clear view. Also in the earliest accounts, already elements of a cosmic universalism find their place side by side with those of a racial kind, as when the nature is represented as sharing in the consequences of the fall of man.

As regards the antiquity of the universalistic and cosmic eschatology, therefore, the conclusions of these writers may be registered as a gain, while on the two other points of the pagan origin, either the the character of the expectation involved, or the dissent from them should be expressed.

5. The Cosmical Dependence on the Ethico-Religious

According to the OT, the whole idea of world-renewal is of strictly supernatural origin, and in it the cosmic follows the ethical basis. The cosmic eschatology is simply the correlate of the fundamental Bib. principle that the issues of the world-process depend on the ethico-religious developments in the history of man (cf. 2 Pet 3 13).

But the end correspondent to the beginning is likewise a true Scriptural principle, which the theory in question has helped to reemphasize.

6. The End Correspondence—Scripture does not look forward to a restoration of the primeval harmony on a higher plane such as precedes all further disturbance. In the passages above cited, there are clear intimations of the account of creation (Isa 65 18, "I will plant the heavens, and lay the foundations of the earth"); 65 17, "I create new heavens and a new earth"; 2 Pet 3 13 compared with vs 4-6; Rev 21 1 compared with the imagery of paradise throughout the chapter.

Besides this, where the thought of the renewal of earth is met with in older prophecy, this is depicted in colors of the state of paradise (Isa 11 6-9; Hos 2 18-21). The "regeneration" (palingenesia) of Mt 19 28 also points back to the first generation of the world. The "inhabited earth to come" (iskoumene mellousa) of He 2 5 occurs at the opening of a context throughout which the account of Gen 1-3 evidently stood before the writer's mind.

In the combined Hebrew, mythological, and a new earth, the terms "heavens" must therefore be taken in the sense imposed upon it by the story of creation, where "heavens" designate not the celestial habitation of God, but the cosmic heavens, the region of the superhuman sun and moon and stars. The Bible nowhere suggests that there is anything abnormal or requiring renewal in God's dwelling-place (He 9 23 is of a different import). In Rom 8 19, where "the new heaven and the new earth" appear, it is at the same time stated that the new Jesus comes down from God out of heaven (cf vs 12.10). In He 12 26-28 also the implication is that only the lower heavens are subject to renewal. The "shaking" that accompanies the new covenant and corresponds to the shaking of the law-giving at Sinai, is a shaking of "not the earth only, but also the heaven." This shaking, in its reference to heaven as well as to earth, signifies a removal of the things shaken. But from the things that can be shaken (including heaven), the writer distinguishes "those things which are not shaken," which are destined to remain, and these are identified with the kingdom of God. The kingdom of God, however, according to the saying of Jesus and the teaching of the epistle, has its center in the heavenly world. The words "that have been made," in ver 27, do not assign their created character as the reason why Heaven and earth can be shaken, an exegesis which would involve us in the difficulty that among that which is subject to destruction lies God: the true construction and correct paraphrase are: "as of things that were made with the thought in the mind of God that those things which cannot be shaken may remain," i.e. already at creation God contemplated an unchangeable universe as the ultimate, higher state of things.

In Mt 19:28 the term palingenesia marks the world-renewing as the renewal of an abnormal state of things. The Scripture teaching, therefore, it is the renewal of the center of God's heaven, which is not subject to deterioration or renewal, a new cosmic heaven and a new earth will be established to be the dwelling-place of the eschatological humanity. The light in which the premise thus appears reminds us that the renewed kosmos, earth as well as cosmic heavens, is destined to play a permanent (not merely provisional, on the principle of chiliasm) part in the future life of the people of God. This is in entire harmony with the prevailing Bib. resurrection conception, not only in the OT but likewise in the NT (cf Mt 5 5; He 2 5), although in the Fourth Gospel and in the Pauline Epistles the emphasis is to such an extent thrown on the renewal of the future life that the rôle to be played in it by the renewed earth recedes into the background. Rev. on the other hand, recognizes this element in its imagery of "the new Jerusalem" coming down from God out of heaven upon earth.

That the new heavens and the new earth are represented as the result of a "creation" does not necessarily involve a production ex nihilo. The terms employed in 2 Pet 3 13 seem rather to imply that the renewal will out of the old humanity a purified universe, whence also the catastrophe is compared to that of the Deluge. As then the old world perished by water and the present world arose out of the flood, so in the end-crisis the heavens shall be dissolved by fire and the elements melt with fervent heat," to give rise to the new heaven and the new earth in which righteousness dwells. The term palingenesia (Mt 19 28) points to renewal, not in the sense of "the heavens and the earth were created at the close of the Hexemeron (1) of Isa 66 22, "the new heavens and the new earth." HEAVY, hevî, HEAVINESS, hevî-nîs (עֲשָׂפָה, kabhedh, עֹשֶׂפָה, di'ahApphah; Körn, tlapè): Heavy (heave, to lift) is used lit. with respect to material things, as the tr of kabhedh, "heaviness" (Mt 26 37, v. "heavy upon earth"); of a people of God. 1. Literal kabhedh, "to be weighed" (1 S 4 18; 2 S 14 26; Lam 3 7); of ãmaš, "to load" (Isa 46 1 AV; of Mt 26 43; Mk 14 40; Lk 9 32, "Their eyes were heavy"); bârōmenô, "to be weighed down on".

It is used (1) for what is hard to bear, oppressive, kabhedh (Ex 18 18; Nu 11 14; 1 S 5 611; Ps 38 4; Isa 24 20); miyâh, "a yoke" (Isa 26 20; Mt 26 38, 43; Mk 14 40); Lk 9 32, "Their eyes were heavy"); barōmenô, "to be weighed down on".

(2) for what is heavy upon earth, a stone is heavy (Mt 23 4); (2) for sad, sorrowful (weighed down), mar, "bitter" (Prov 31 6, RV "bitter"); ra, "evil" (Prov 25 20); adœmonsô, lit. "to be sated, "wearyed," then, "to be very heavy," "dejected" (Mt 26 37, of Our Lord in Gethsemane, [he] began to be sorrowful and very heavy," RV "sore troubled"); "adœmonein denotes a consciousness of being in a state of extremity, distraction and bewilderment, the intellectual powers reeling and staggering under the pressure of the ideas presented to them" (Mason, The Conditions of Our Lord's Life on Earth); of Mk 14 37, (3) "bitter" (Isa 6 10, "make their ears heavy"); 69 1, "neither [is] his ear heavy"); (4) "tired" seems to be the meaning in Ex 17 12, "Meshe's hand was heavy" (kabhedh); of Mt 26 43 and is above.

Heavily is the tr of kabhêdath, "heaviness" (Ex 14 25), meaning "with difficulty"; of kâbhar, "to be black," "to be a mourner" (Ps 36 14 AV, RV "I bowed down mourning"); of kabhêth (Isa 47 6).

Heaviness has always the sense of anxiety, sorrow, grief, etc; di'ahApphah, "fear," "dread," "anxious care" (Prov 12 25, "Heaviness in the heart of a man maketh it heavy," RV "or care"); kâbhah, "to be feeble," "weak" (Isa 51 3, "the spirit of heaviness"); pârah, "face," "aspect" (Isa 27 9), RV "will leave off my heaviness," RV "[sad] countenance"; of 2 Esd 6 16; Wisd 17 4; Ecclus 25 23; taîyâthah, from ãndaḥ, "to groan," to sigh" (Isa 29 2, RV "mourning and lamentation"); tâghâthah, "sadness," "weariness" (Ps 119 13; Prov 11 14; 14 13); taîtûthâth, "affliction of one's self," "fasting" (Ezr 9 5, RV "humiliation," m "fasting"); kabëphêa, "dejection," "sorrow" (lit. "of the eyes") (Isa 4 6, "your joy [turned] to heaviness"); lupû, "grief" (Rom 3 3, RV "great sorrow"); 2 Cor 2 1, RV "sorrow"); lupûmâni (1 Pet 1 6, RV "put to grief"); for nâsh, "to be sick," "feebile" (Ps 69 20, RV "sore sick"); and adœmonê (Phil 2 26 RV "sorrow troubled"), AV has "full of heaviness." "Heaviness," in the sense of sorrow, sadness, occurs in 2 Esd 10 7, 8 24; Tob 2 5; lupê (Ecclus 22 4, RV "grief"); 30 21, "Give not thy soul to heaviness," RV "sorrow"; 1 Mace 6 4; lupê (Ecclus 30 9, RV "will grieve thee"); pêthôth (1 Mace 3 51, etc).

AV has "heavier work" for "more work" (Ex 5 9); "heaviness upon men" for "common among men" (Esd 6 1); for "were heavy laden" (Isa 46 1), "are made a burden"; for "burden the earth is heavy" (Isa 30 27), "in thick rising smoke." W. L. WALKER

HEBER, hâbér (ֶבֵר, hâbèr, "associate" or, possibly, "enchanter"); "Êbê, Êber"). A name occurring several times in the OT as the name of an individual or of a clan.

(1) A member of the tribe of Asher and son of Berach (Gen 46 17; Nu 26 45; 1 Ch 7 31 f).

(2) A Kenite, husband of Jael, who deceptively slew Sisera, captain of the army of Jabin, a Canaanite king (Jgs 4 17; 5 24). He had separated himself from the main body of the Kenites, which accounts for his tent being near Kedesh, the place of Sisera’s disastrous battle (Jgs 4 11).

(3) Head of a clan of Judah, and son of Mered by his Jewish, as distinguished from an Egyptian, wife. He was father, or founder, of Socco (1 Ch 4 18).

(4) A Benjamite, or clan or family of Elpaal belonging to Benjamin (1 Ch 8 29).

(5) Heber, of Our Lord’s genealogy (Lk 3 35 AV), better, Eber.

So, the name “Eber,” הָבֵר, “bër, in 1 Ch 5 13; 8 22, is not to be confounded with Heber, הָבֵר, hâbèr, as in the foregoing passages.

Ἡβρόη, Ἡβρωνή; Ἑβραϊκός, Ἑβραίος, Ἑβραῖος, Ἑβραίοτης), HEBRATOS): The earliest name for Abraham (Gen 14 13) and his descendants (Joseph, Gen 39 14; 45 16; 50 12; 43 22; Israelites in Egypt, Ex 1 15; 2 6; 3 18; 40 12; laws, Ex 21 2; Deut 15 12; in history, 1 Sam 5 6; 13 7; 19; etc. later, Jer 34 9, “Hebrew,” 14; Jon 1 9; in the NT, Acts 6 1; 2 Cor 11 22; Phil 3 5). The etymology of the word is disputed. It may be derived from Eber (Gen 10 21 32, etc.), or, as some think, from the vb. הָדְרָן, Ἡβράω, “to cross over” (people from across the Euphrates; cf Josh 24 2). A connection is sought by some with the apri or epri of the Egyptian monuments, and again with the Habiri of the Am. Tab. In Acts 6 1, the “Hebrews” are contrasted with “Hellenists,” or Greek-speaking Jews. By the "Heb" tongue in the NT (Ἑβραίος, Ἰν 5 1; 19 13; 7; 20 16) is meant ARAMAIC (q.v.), but also in Rev 9 11; 16 16, Heb proper.

HEBREWS, hēb’roŭz, EPISTLE to the:

I. Title
II. Literary Form
III. The Author
IV. Destination
V. Date
VI. Contents
VII. Letters

I. Title.—In AV and ERV the title of this book describes it as “the Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the Hebrews.” Modern scholarship has disputed the applicability of every word of this title. Neither does it appear in the oldest MSS, where we find simply “to Hebrews” (πρὸς Εβραίους). This, too, seems to have been prefixed to the original writing by a collector or copist. It is too vague and general for the author to have used it. And there is nothing in the body of the book which affirms any part of either title. Even the shorter title was an inference from the general character of the writing. Nowhere is criticism less hampered by problems of authenticity and inspiration. No question arises, at least directly, of pseudonymity either of author or of readers, for both are anonymous. For the purpose of tracing the history and interpreting the meaning of the book, the absence of a title, or of any definite historical data, is a disadvantage. We are left to infer its historical context from a few fragments of uncertain tradition, and from the general references to historical conditions as the document itself contains. Where no date, name or well-known event is fixed, it becomes impossible to decide, among many possibilities, what known historical conditions, if any, are presupposed. Yet this very fact, of the book’s detachment from personal and historical incidents, renders it more self-contained, and its exegesis less dependent upon understanding the exact historical situation. But its general relation to the thought of its time must be taken into account if we are to understand it at all.

II. Literary Form.—The writer was evidently a man of culture, who had a masterly command of the Gr language. The theory of Clement of Alexandria, that the work was the Author’s a tr from Heb, was merely an in-

Culture and Style

1. The Author's Epistle or Treatise? It was first addressed to Heb-speaking Christians. It bears none of the marks of a tr. It is written in pure idiomatic Gr. The writer had an intimate knowledge of the LXX, and was familiar with Jewish life. He was well-read in Hellenic lit. (e.g. Wisd), and had probably made a careful study of Philo (see VI below). His argument proceeds continuously and methodically, in general, though not strict, accord with the rules of Gr rhetoric, and without the interruptions and digressions which render Paul’s arguments so hard to follow. “Where the literary skill of the author comes out is in the deft adjustment of the argumentative to the hortatory sections” (Moffatt, Intro, 424 F). He has been classed with Lk as the most “cultured” of the early Christian writers.

It has been questioned whether He is rightly called a letter at all. Unlike all Paul’s letters, it opens without any personal note of address or salutation; and at the outset set forth, in rounded periods and in philosophical language, the central theme which is developed throughout. In this respect it resembles the Johannine writings alone in the NT. But as the argument proceeds, the personal note of application, exhortation and exhortation emerges more clearly (2 1; 3 1–12; 4 14; 5 11; 6 9; 10 9; 13 7; and it ends with greetings and salutations (13 18 ff). The writer calls it “a word of exhortation.” The vb. epistle (RV “I have written”) is the usual expression for writing a letter (13 22). Hebrew begins like an essay, proceeds like a sermon, and ends as a letter.

Deissmann, who distinguishes between a “true letter,” the genuine personal message of one man to another, and an “epistle,” or imitation of the form of a letter, but with an eye on the reading public, puts He in the latter class; nor would he “consider it anything but a literary oration—hence not as an epistle at all—if the epistle, and the greetings at the close, did not permit of the supposition that it had at one time opened with something of the nature of an address as well” (Bible Studies, 49–50). There is no textual or historical evidence of any opening address having ever stood as part of the text; nor does the opening section bear any mark or suggestion of fragmentariness, as if it had once followed such an address.

Yet the supposition that a greeting once stood at the beginning of our document is not so impossible as Zahn thinks (Intro to the NT, 11, 313 f), as a comparison with Jas or 1 Pet will show.

So unusual is the phenomenon of a letter without a greeting, that among the ancients, Pantaenus had offered the explanation that Paul, out of modesty, had refrained from putting his name to a letter addressed to the Hebrews, because the Lord Himself had been apostle to them.

In recent times, Jülicher and Harnack have conjectured that the author intentionally suppressed the greeting, either from motives of prudence at time of persecution, or because it was unnecessary, since the bearer of the letter would communicate the name of the sender to the recipients.

Fr. Overbeck advanced the more revolutionary hypothesis that the letter once opened with a greeting, but from someone other than Paul, that in order to satisfy the general conditions of canonization, the non-apostolic greeting was struck out by the Alexandrians, and the personal references in 13:22–25 added, in order to represent it as Pauline.

W. Woerde, starting from this theory, rejects the first part of it and adopts the second. He does not base his hypothesis on the conditions

3. A Unity or a Composite Writing?

Deissmann’s rejected alternative, and argues that the main part of the book was originally not an epistle at all, but a general doctrinal treatise. Then ch. 13, and esp. vs. 18 ff., were added by a later hand, in order to represent the whole as a Pauline letter, and the book in its final form was made, after all, pseudonymous.

The latter supposition is based upon an assumed reference to imprisonment in 13:19 (cf Philen. ver 22) and upon the reference to Timothy in 13:23 (cf Phil. 2:19); and the proof that these supposed Pauline phrasing by Paulines is derived in a suppressed contradiction between 13:19 and 13:23. But ver 19 does not necessarily refer to imprisonment exclusively or even at all, and therefore it stands in no contradiction with ver 23 (cf Ro. 1:9–13). And Timothy must have associated with many Christian leaders besides Paul. But why should anybody who wanted to represent the letter as Pauline and who scrupled not to add it for that purpose, refrain from the obvious device of prefixing a Pauline biblical or personal note? He therefore makes special pleading that the 1:1–13 are a mere doctrinal treatise, devoid of all evidences of a personal relation to a circumscribed circle of readers. The present form of the readers’ conversion are defined (2:3 f.).

Their present spiritual condition is described in terms of such anxiety and hope as betoken a very intimate personal relation (6:11 f.; 9:8–11). Their past conflicts, temptations, endurance and triumph are recalled and personal encouragement under present trials, and both past and present are defined in particular terms that point to concrete situations well known to writer and readers (10:32–36).

There is, it is true, not in He the same intense and all-embracing personal note as in the earlier Pauline letters; the writer often loses sight of his particular audience and develops his argument in detached and abstract form. But it cannot be assumed that nothing is a letter which does not conform to the Pauline model. And the presence of long, abstract, arguments does not justify the excision or explaining away of undoubted personal passages. Neither the language nor the logic of the book either demands or permits the separation of doctrinal and personal note after one another, so as to leave for residuum a mere doctrinal treatise.

Doctrinal statements lead up to personal exhortations, and personal exhortations form the transition to new arguments; they are indissolubly involved in one another; and ch. 13 presents no such exceptional features as to justify its separation from the whole work. There is really no reason, but the unwarrantable assumption that an ancient writer must have conformed with a certain convention of writing, where, in fact, it is all too clear for what it appears to be—a defence of Christianity written for the benefit of definite readers, growing more intimate and personal as the writer gathers his argument into a practical appeal to the hearts and consciences of his readers.

III. The Author.—Certain coincidences of language and thought between this epistle and that of Clement of Rome to the Corinthians

1. Tradition: that he was known in Rome toward the end of the 1st cent. AD (cf. 1 Cor xii 38, 39, and 1 Cor iv 19, 20). Clement makes no explicit reference to the book or its author: the quotations are unacknowledged. But they show that he already had some authority in Rome. The same inference is supported by similarity of expression found also in the Shepherd of Hermas. The possible marks of its influence in Polycarp and Justin Martyr are too uncertain and indefinite to justify any inference. Its name does not appear in the list of NT writings compiled and acknowledged by Marcion, moreover, that other Muratorian Fragment. The latter definitely assigns letters by Paul to only seven churches, and so inferentially excludes He.

When the book emerges into the clear light of history toward the end of the 2d cent., the tradition as to its authorship is seen to divide into three different streams.

(1) In Alexandria, it was regarded as in some sense the work of Paul. Clement tells how his teacher, apparently Pantaenus, explained why Paul’s letters do not in any personal manner mention readers under his name. Out of reverence for the Lord (II, 2, above) and to avoid suspicion and prejudice, he as apostle of the Gentiles refrains from addressing himself to the Hebrews as their apostle. Clement accepted this explanation with many Christian leaders besides Paul. But why should anybody who wanted to represent the letter as Pauline and who scrupled not to add it for that purpose, refrain from the obvious device of prefixing a Pauline biblical or personal note? He therefore makes special pleading that the 1st to 13 are a mere doctrinal treatise, devoid of all evidences of a personal relation to a circumscribed circle of readers. The present form of the readers’ conversion are defined (2:3 f.).

Their present spiritual condition is described in terms of such anxiety and hope as betoken a very intimate personal relation (6:11 f.; 9:8–11). Their past conflicts, temptations, endurance and triumph are recalled and personal encouragement under present trials, and both past and present are defined in particular terms that point to concrete situations well known to writer and readers (10:32–36).

There is, it is true, not in He the same intense and all-embracing personal note as in the earlier Pauline letters; the writer often loses sight of his particular audience and develops his argument in detached and abstract form. But it cannot be assumed that nothing is a letter which does not conform to the Pauline model. And the presence of long, abstract, arguments does not justify the excision or explaining away of undoubted personal passages. Neither the language nor the logic of the book either demands or permits the separation of doctrinal and personal note after one another, so as to leave for residuum a mere doctrinal treatise.

Doctrinal statements lead up to personal exhortations, and personal exhortations form the transition to new arguments; they are indissolubly involved in one another; and ch. 13 presents no such exceptional features as to justify its separation from the whole work. There is really no reason, but the unwarrantable assumption that an ancient writer must have conformed with a certain convention of writing, where, in fact, it is all too clear for what it appears to be—a defence of Christianity written for the benefit of definite readers, growing more intimate and personal as the writer gathers his argument into a practical appeal to the hearts and consciences of his readers.

(2) In the West, the Pauline tradition failed to assert itself till the 4th cent., and was not generally accepted till the 6th cent. In Italy, another tradition prevailed, namely, that Barnabas was the author. This was the only other definite tradition of authorship that prevailed in antiquity. Tertullian, introducing a quotation of He 6:14–6, writes: ‘There is also an Ep. to the Hebrews under the name of Barnabas . . . . and the Ep. of Barnabas is more generally received among the churches than that apocryphal “Shepherd” of adulterers’ (De Pudicitia, 20). Tertullian is not expressing his own personal hypothesis, but the tradition which had so far established itself as to appear in the title of the epistle in the MS, and he betrays no consciousness of the existence of any other tradition. Zahn infers that this view prevailed in Montanist churches and may have originated in Asia. Moffatt thinks that it had also behind it "some Rom tradition" (Intro, 437). If it was originally, or at any time, the tradition of the African churches, it gave way there to the Alexandrian view, in the course of the 4th cent. A Council of Hippo, in 399, from thirteenth verse of the apostle Paul, and one by the same to the Hebrews." A council of Carthage in 419 reckons "fourteen epp. of the apostle Paul." By such gradual stages did the Pauline tradition establish itself.

(3) All the evidence tends to show that in Rome and the remaining churches of the West, the epistle was originally anonymous. No tradition of authorship appears before the 4th cent. And Stephen Gobarius, writing in 600, says that both Irenaeus and Hippolytus denied the Pauline authorship. Photius repeats this statement as regards Hippolytus. Neither he nor Gobarius mentions any alternative view (Zahn, Intro, II, 310). The epistle was known in Rome (to Clement) toward the end of the 1st cent., and if Paul's name, or any other, had been associated with it from the beginning, it is impossible that it could have been forgotten by the time of Hippolytus. The western churches had no reason for refusing to admit He into the Pauline and canonical books, except only that they did not believe it to be the work of Paul, or of any other apostle.

It seems therefore certain that the epistle first became generally known as an anonymous writing. Even the Alexandrian tradition in its infancy, for it appears first as an explanation by Pantaenus why Paul concealed his name. The idea that Paul was the author was therefore an Alexandrian inference. The religious value of the epistle was naturally first recognized in Alexandria, for, as the chief letter-writer of the church, at once occurred to those in search for its author. Two facts account for the ultimate acceptance of that view by the whole church. The spiritual value and authority of the book were seen to be too great to relegate it into the same class as the Shepherd or the Ep. of Barnabas. And the conception of the Canon developed into the hard-and-fast rule of apostolicity. No writing could be admitted into the Canon and considered as the work of an apostle, when it could no longer be excluded, it followed that its apostolic authorship must be affirmed. The tradition already existing in Alexandria supplied the demand, and who but Paul, among the apostles, could have written it?

The Pauline theory prevailed together with the scheme of thought that made it necessary, from the 5th to the 16th cent. The Humanists and the Reformers rejected it. But it was again revived in the 17th and 18th cents., along with the recrudescence of scholastic ideas. It is clear, however, that tradition and history shed no light upon the question of the authorship of He. They neither prove nor disprove the Pauline, or any other theory.

We are therefore left to search for such evidence as the epistle itself affords, and that is wholly inferential.

2. The Witness of the Epistle Itself

It seems probable that the author was a Hellenist, a Gr-speaking Jew. He was familiar with the Scriptures of the OT and with the religious ideas and worship of the Jews. He claims the inheritance of their sacred history, traditions and institutions (1 1), and dwells on them with an intimate knowledge and enthusiasm that would be impossible in a person who was not personally and still more in a Christian convert from heathenism. But he knew the OT only in the LXX tr., which he follows even where it deviates from the Heb. He writes Gr with a purity of style and vocabulary to which the writings of Lk alone in the NT can be compared. His mind is imbued with that combination of Heb and Gr thought which is best known in the writings of Philo. His general typological mode of thinking, his use of the allegorical method, and the general terms that are most familiar in Alexandrian thought, all reveal the Hellenistic mind. Yet his fundamental conceptions are in full accord with the teaching of Paul and of the Johannine writings.

The central position assigned to Christ, the high estimate of His person, the saving significance of His death, the general trend of the ethical teaching, the writer's opposition to asceticism and his esteem for the rulers and teachers of the church, all bear out the inference that he belonged to a Christian circle dominated by Pauline ideas. The author and his readers alike were not personal disciples of Jesus, but had received the gospel from those who had heard the Lord (2 3) and who were no longer living (13 7). He had lived among his readers, and had probably been their teacher and leader; he is now separated from them but he hopes soon to return to them again (13 18 f).

Is it possible to give a name to this person?

(1) Although the Pauline tradition itself proves nothing, the general signs of Paulianism are sufficient to identify it. We know enough about Paul to be certain that he could not have written He, and that is all that can be said with confidence on the question of authorship. The style and language, the categories of thought and living preoccupation, all differ widely from those of any writings ascribed to Paul. The latter quotes the OT from the Heb and LXX, but He only from LXX. Paul's formula of quotation is, "It is written," or "The scripture saith," or "He saith," or "The Holy Spirit," or "One somewhere saith." For Paul the OT is law, and stands in antithesis to the NT, but in He the OT is covenant, and is the "shadow" of the New Covenant. Paul's characteristic terms, "Christ Jesus," and "Our Lord Jesus Christ," are never found in He; and "Jesus Christ" only 3 t (10 10; 13 8), and "the Lord" (for Christ) only twice (2 3; 7 14)—phrases used by Paul over 600 t (Zahn). Paul's Christology turns around the death, resurrection, and living presence of Christ in the church, that of He around His high-priestly function in heaven. Their conceptions of God differ accordingly. In He it is Judaistic-Platonistic, or (in later terminology) Deistic. The revelation of the Divine Fatherhood of God by the immanence of God in history and in the world had not possessed the author's mind as it had Paul's. Since the present world is conceived in He as a world of "shadows," God could only intervene in it by mediators.

The experience and conception of salvation are also different in these two writers. There is no evidence in He of inward conflict and conversion and of constant personal relation with Christ, which constituted the entire spiritual life of Paul. The apostle's central doctrine, that of justification by faith, does not appear in He. Faith is less the personal, mystical relation with Christ, that it is for Paul, than a general hope which lays hold of the future to overcome the present; and salvation is accomplished by cleansing, sanctification and perfection, not by justification. While Paul's mind was not uninfluenced by Hellenistic thought, as we find it in Alexandria (as, e.g. in Col and Eph), it nowhere appears in his epistles in the same manner as it does in He. Moreover, the author of He was probably a member of the community to which he writes (13 18 f), but Paul never stood in quite the relation supposed here to any church. Finally, Paul could not have written He 2 3, for
He emphatically declares that he did not receive his gospel from the older disciples (Gal 1 12; 2 6).

The general Christian ideas on which He was in harmony with Paul were the Levite tradition, the heritage of which the apostle had left to all the churches. The few more particular affinities of He with certain Pauline writings (e.g. He 2 2 || Gal 3 19; He 12 22; 1 3 || Gal 4 25; He 8 10 || Rom 11 36, also with Eph; see also addend, Hand-Companion, 3) are easily explicable either as due to the author's reading of Paul's Epistles or as reminiscences of Pauline phrases that were current in the churches. But they are too few and slender to rest upon them any presumption in the arguments which disprove the Pauline tradition.

2. The passage that is most conclusive against the Pauline authorship (2 3) is equally conclusive against any other apostle being the author. But almost every prominent name among the Christians of the second generation has been suggested. The epistle itself excludes Timothy (3 23), and Titus awaits his turn. Otherwise Luke, Clement of Rome, Barnabas, Silas, Apollos, Priscilla and Aquila, Philip the Deacon, and Aristion have all had their champions.

(a) The first two, Luke and Clement, were brought in through their connection with Paul. Where it was recognized that a direct Pauline authorship must not be ruled out, the Pannese tradition might still be retained, if the epistle could be assigned to one of the apostle's disciples. These two were fixed upon as being well-known writers. But this very fact reveals the improbability of the theory. Luke's style is too modern, and Clement's thought is too derived from the comparison of He with the Pauline writings avail also in the comparison of He with the writings of Lk and Clement. Both these disciples of the apostle adhere much closer to his system of thought than He does, and they reveal none of the influences of Alexandrian thought, which is predominant in He.

(b) Of all the other persons suggested, so little is known that it is impossible to establish, with any convincing force, an argument for or against their authorship.

(c) Barnabas was a Levite of Cyprus (Acts 4 36), and once a companion of Paul (Acts 13 2 21). Another ancient writer is called "the Epistle of Barnabas" by Philo, and he begins it with the "the ancient tradition of the occurrence of the word "consolation" in Barnabas' name (Acts 4 36) and in the writer's description of his He (13 22) is quite irrelevant. Tertullian's tradition is the only positive argument in favor of the Barnabas theory. It has been argued against it that Barnabas, being a Levite, could not have shown the opposition to the Levitical system, and the unfamiliarity with it (He 7 27; 9 4), which is supposed to mark our epistle. But the author's Levitical system was derived, not from the Heb OT, nor from the Jewish temple, but from Jewish tradition; and the supposed inaccuracies as to the daily sin offering (7 27), and the position of the golden altar of incense (9 4) have been traced to Jewish tradition (see Moffatt, Intro, 438). And the writer's hostility to the Levitical system is not nearly so intense as that of Paul to Pharisaism. There is nothing that renders it intrinsically impossible that Barnabas was the author, nor is anything known of him that makes it probable otherwise. It is a mystery why the tradition was confined to Africa.

(d) Harnack has argued the probability of a joint authorship by Priscilla and Aquila. The interchange of "I" and "we" he explains as due to a dual authorship by persons intimately acquainted, and such an interchange of the personal "I" and the epistolary "we" can be paralleled in the Epistles of Paul (e.g. Rom) where no question of joint authorship arises.

The probable relation of the author to a church in Rome may suit Priscilla and Aquila (cf Rom 16 5 with Heb 13 2 3). Indeed, the coincidence of the aforementioned passages were correct, it is possible and probable that Luke, Barnabas, Apollos, and certainly Clement, stood in a similar relation to a Roman church. Harnack, on this theory, explains the disappearance of the author's name as due to prejudice against women teachers. This is the only novel point in favor of this theory as compared with several others; and it does not explain why Aquila's name should not have been retained within the address. The position of a feminine mind behind the epistle are highly disputable. On the other hand, a female disciple of Paul's circle would scarcely assume such authority in the church as the author of He does (13 17 f; cf 1 Cor 14 34 f). And nothing that is known of Priscilla and Aquila would suggest the culture and the familiarity with Alexandrian thought possessed by this writer. Acts 18 26 does not prove that they were expert and cultured teachers, but only that they knew and could repeat the salient points of Paul's early preaching. So unusual a phenomenon as this theory supposes demands more evidence to make it even probable. (But see Rendel Harris, Sidelights on NT Research, 148-76).

(e) Apollos has found favor with many scholars from Luther downward. No ancient tradition supports this theory, a fact which tells heavily against it, but not conclusively, for someone must have written the letter, and his name was actually lost to early tradition, unless it were Barnabas, and that tradition too was unknown to the vast majority of the early churches. All that is known of Apollos suits the author of He. He may have learnt the gospel from "them that heard" (2 3); he was a Jew, "an Alexandrian by race, a learned [or eloquent] man," "mighty in the Scriptures," "he powerfully confuted the Jews" (Acts 18 24 ff), who knew the "truth" and he belonged with He (14 29). The coincidence of the occurrence of the word "consolation" in Barnabas' name (Acts 4 36) and in the writer's description of the He (13 22) is quite irrelevant. Tertullian's tradition is the only positive argument in favor of the Barnabas theory. It has been argued against it that Barnabas, being a Levite, could not have shown the opposition to the Levitical system, and the unfamiliarity with it (He 7 27; 9 4), which is supposed to mark our epistle. But the author's Levitical system was derived, not from the Heb OT, nor from the Jewish temple, but from Jewish tradition; and the supposed inaccuracies as to the daily sin offering (7 27), and the position of the golden altar of incense (9 4) have been traced to Jewish tradition (see Moffatt, Intro, 438). And the writer's hostility to the Levitical system is not nearly so intense as that of Paul to Pharisaism. There is nothing that renders it intrinsically impossible that Barnabas was the author, nor is anything known of him that makes it probable otherwise. It is a mystery why the tradition was confined to Africa.

IV. Destination. The identity of the first readers of He is, if possible, more obscure than that of the author. It was written to Christians, and to a specific body or group of Christians (see I above). The title the Hebrews and Greek mean properly inferences drawn from the contents of the document, and the tradition it embodies was unanimously accepted from the 2d cent. down to the early part of the last cent. Now, however, a considerable body of critics hold that the original readers were Gentiles. The question is entirely one of inference from the contents of the epistle itself.

The readers, like the writer, received the gospel first from "the things which were heard" (2 Cor 11:13) from the personal disciples of the Lord, but they had.

1. General were not of their number. They had Character of witnesses "signs and wonders" and the Readers "manifest powers" and "gifts of the holy Spirit" (2 4). Their conversion had been thorough, and their faith and Christian life had been of a high order. They had a sound knowledge of the first principles of Christ (6 1 f). They had become "partakers of Christ," and had need only to "hold fast the beginning of [their] confidence firm unto the end" (3 14). They had been fruitful in good works, ministering unto the saints (6 10), enduring suffering and persecution, and sympathising with whose were imprisoned (10 32-34).

All this had been in former days which appeared now remote. Their youth and activity of those days are now dead (13 7). And they themselves have undergone a great change. While they should have been teachers, they have become dull of hearing, and have need again to be taught the rudiments of the oracles of God (6 12), and they are in danger of a great apostasy from the faith. They need warning against "an evil heart of unbelief, in falling away from the living God" (3 12).

They were become sluggish (6 12), profane like Esau (12 16), worldly-minded (6 11). The religion was tending toward a false asceticism and outward works (13 4.9). And now that this moral dulness and spiritual indifference had fallen upon them, they are being subjected to a new test by persecution, that they. The Gentile Christians adopted the Jewish tradition as their own in consequence of, and secondary to, their attachment to Christianity. Even Judaizing Gentile Christians, such as may be supposed to have belonged to the Corinthian churches, had adopted some parts of the Jewish law only as a supplement to Christianity, but not as its basis.

Von Soden and others have argued with much reason that these Christians were not in danger of falling back into Judaism from Christianity, but rather of falling away from all faith into unbelief and materialism, like the Israelites in the wilderness (3 7 ff), or Esau (12 16). With all its references to OT sacrifice and ceremonial, the letter contains no such indications; nor any indications that the readers were in danger of so doing (Hand-Commentar, 12-16). But it has been too readily assumed that these facts prove that the readers were not Jews. The pressure of social influence and persecution rendered Jewish Gentile Christians, as well as gentile Christians, liable to apostatize to heathenism or irreligion (Wisd 2 10.20; 2 Mace 4, 6, 7; Philo, De Migracione Abraham, XV; Mt 24 10.12; Acts 20 30; 1 Cor 10 7.14; 2 Thess 4; 1 Jn 2 18, 21; Pliny Ep. X, 96). Von Soden's argument really cuts the other way. If the writer had been dealing with gentile Christians who were in danger of relapsing into heathenism, or of falling into religious indifference, his argument from the shadowy and temporary glories of Judaism to the perfect salvation in Christ would avail nothing, because, for such, his premises would depend upon his conclusion. But if they were Jewish Christians, even though leaning toward heathenism, his argument is well calculated to call up on its side all the dormant force of their early religious training. He is not arguing them out of a "subtle Judaism" quickened by the zeal of a propagandist (Moffatt, Intro, 449-50), but from "drifting away" (2 1), from "neglect" (2 3), from "an evil heart of unbelief" (6 12), from "disobedience" (4 11), from "a dulness of hearing" (5 11), but into "dulgence . . . . that ye be not sluggish" (6 11), into "boldness and patience" (10 35 f), and to "lift up the hands that hang down, and the palsied knees" (12 13); and this he might well do by his approach to their religious experience, both Jewish and Christian, and to the whole religious history of their race.

The question of the locality of these "Hebrews" remains a matter for mere conjecture. Jerus., Alexandria, Rome, Antioch, Colossae, Ephesus, Berea, Ravenna and other places have been suggested. Tradition has it, since Clement of Alexandria, fixed on Jerus., but on the untenable ground that the letter was addressed to a community speaking Aramaic. The undisputed fact that it was written in Gr tells against Jerus. So does the absence of all reference to the temple ritual, and the mention of almsgiving as the chief grace of the "Hebrews" (6 10). Jerus. received rather than gave ALS. Nor is it likely that all the personal disciples of the Lord would have died out in Jerus. (2 3). And it could not be charged against the mother church that it had produced no teachers (6 12). These points also tell with almost equal force against any Palestinian locality.

Alexandria was suggested as an alternative to Jerus., on the supposition that those references to Jewish ritual which did not correspond with the Jerus. ritual (10 4; 10 11) might refer to the temple at Leontopolis. But the ritual system of the epistle is that of the tabernacle and of tradition, and not of any temple. The Alexandrian character of the letter has bearing on the identity of the author, but not on that of its readers. The erroneous idea that Paul was the author arose in Alexandria, but it would have been least likely to arise where the letter was originally sent.

Rome has lately found much favor. We first learn of the existence of the letter at Rome. The phrase "thee of Italy salute you" (13 24) implies that either the writer or his readers were in Italy. It may be more natural to think of the writer, with a small group of Italian friends away from home, sending greetings to Italy, than to suppose that a greeting from Italy generally was sent to a church at a distance. It is probable that a body of Jewish Christians existed in Rome, as in other large cities of the Empire. But this view does not, as von Soest thinks, fit in any way between Heb. and Rom. A Rom origin might. It could explain the use of He by Clement. But the letter might also have come to Rome by Clement's time, even though it was originally sent elsewhere. The slender arguments in favor of Rome find favor chiefly because no arguments can be adduced in favor of any other place.

V. Date.—The latest date for the composition of He is clearly fixed as earlier than 96 AD by reason of its use by Clement of Rome 1. Terminal about that time. There is no justification for the view that He shows dependence on Jos. The earliest date cannot be so definitely fixed. The apparent dependence of He on Paul's Epp., Gal, 1 Cor and Rom, brings it beyond 50 AD.

But we have data in the epistle itself which require a date considerably later. The readers had been converted by personal disciples of the Lord (2 3). They did not belong to the earliest group of Christians. But it is not necessary for a long interval between the Lord's ascension and their conversion.

The disciples were scattered widely from Jerus. by the persecution. Following the speech of Stephen (Acts 8 1), "We may well believe that the vigorous preaching of St. Stephen would set a wave in motion which would be felt even at Rome" (Sunday, Romans, xxviii). They are not, therefore, necessarily to be described as Christians of the 2d generation in any strict chronological sense. But the letter was written a considerable time after their conversion. They have had time for great development (5 12). They have forgotten the former days after their conversion (10 32). Their early leaders are now dead (13 7). Yet the majority of the church still consists of the first converts (2 3; 10 32). And although no argument can be based upon the mention of 40 years (3 9), for it is only an incidental phrase in a quotation, yet no longer interval could be permitted between the writing of the letter and the writing of the letter. It might be shorter. And the church may have been founded at any time from 52 to 70 AD.

The doctrinal development represented in He stands midway between the system of the later Pauline Epp. (Phil, Col, Eph) and that of the Johannine writings. The divergent strand of the Docetists, and strange teachings mentioned in- clude only such ascetic tendencies about which both Paul and others have been concerned at Rome 3. Doctrinal tions 4. The Full Problem of Jerus—emann 5. Timothy 23, but it does not carry us far. Timothy was a young man and already a disciple, when Paul visited Galatia on his 2d journey about 46 AD (Acts 16 1). And he may have lived to the end of the century or nearly to it. It cannot be safely argued from the mere mention of his name alone, that Paul and his other companions were dead.

Two incidents in the history of the readers are mentioned which afford further ground for some such late date. Immediately after their conversion, they suffered perse- cutions, "a great conflict of sufferings; partly, being made a gazingstock both by reproaches and afflictions; and partly becoming partners with them that were so used" (He 10 32 f). And now, when the letter is written, they are entering upon another time of similar trial, in which they "have need of..."
patience" (10 36), though they "have not yet resisted unto blood" (12 4). Their leaders, at least, it would appear, the writer and Timothy, have also been in prison, but one is at liberty and the other expects to be soon (13 19-23). It has been conjectured that the sharp persecution was that under Nero in 64 AD, and the second, that in the reign of Domitian, after 81 AD. But when it is remembered that in some part of the Empire Christians were almost always under persecution, and that the locale of their presence is very uncertain, these last criteria do not justify any dogmatizing. It is certain that the letter was written in the second half of the 1st cent. Certain general impressions, the probability that the first apostles and leaders of the church were dead, the absence of any mention of Paul, the development of Paul's theological ideas in a new medium, the disappearance of the early enthusiasm, the many and great changes that had taken place in the community, point strongly to the last quarter of the century. The opinions of scholars at present seem to converge about the year 80 AD or a little later.

The theme of the epistle is the absoluteness of the Christian religion, as based upon the preeminence of Jesus Christ, the one and only mediator of salvation. The essence of Christ's preeminence is that He alone is mediator of salvation, the one and only mediator of salvation. The author's working concept is the Logos-doctrine of Philo; and the empirical data to which it is related is the religious history of Israel, so far as it culminates in Christianity. He makes no attempt to prove either his ideal first principles or his historical premises, and his philosophy of religion takes no account of the heathen world. The inner method of his argument is to fit Judaism and Christianity into the Logos-concept; but his actual relation to the ideal in the way of Plato's antithesis of shadow and reality, of pattern and original, rather than in Aristotle's way of development, although the influence of the latter method may often be traced, as in the history of faith, which is carried back to the beginnings of the history of faith, but is made perfect in the Christian consummation (11 40). In a number of other ideas the teleological movement may be seen cutting across the categories of shadow and reality (1 3; 1 10; 4 8 f.; 8 8 f.; 9 12; 10 12; 12 22).

The form of the argument may be described as either rabbinical or Alexandrian. The writer, after laying down his proposition, proceeds to prove it by quotations from the OT, taken out of their context and historical connection, adapted and even changed to suit his present purpose.

This practice was common to Palestinian and Alexandrian writers; as was also the use of allegory, which plays a large part in He (e.g. 3 7—4 11; 13 11 f.). But the writer's allegorical method differs from that of the rabbis in that it is like Philo's, a part of a conscious philosophy, according to which the whole of the past and present history of the world is only a shadow of the true realities which are laid up in heaven (8 5; 9 23 f.; 10 1). His interest in historical facts, in OT writers, in Jewish institutions and even in the historical life of Jesus, is quite subordinate to his presupposition with the eternal and heavenly realities which they, in more or less shadowy fashion, represent. That the affinities of this writer with the Alexandrian rather than Palestinian is further proved by many philological and literary correspondences with Wisd and Philo. Most of the characteristic terms and phrases of the epistle are also found in these earlier writers. It has been argued that He and Wisd came from the same hand, and it seems certain that the author of He was familiar with both Wisd and the writings of Philo (Plumptre in Espos., I, 329 ff; 409 ff; von Soden in Hand-Commentar, 5-6). In Philo the dualism of appearance and reality finds its ultimate synthesis in his master-conception of the Logos, and although this term does not appear in He in Philo's sense, the doctrine is set forth in Philonic phraseology in the opening verses (1–4). As Logos, Christ excels the prophets as ruler of God's superior to the angels who were the mediators of the old Covenant, and is more glorious than Moses as the builder of God's true tabernacle, His eternal house; He is a greater Saviour than Joshua, for He brings his own to final rest; and He superseded the Aaronic priesthood, for while they ministered in a "holy place made with hands, like in pattern to the true," under a "law having a shadow of the good things to come, not the very image of the things" (9 24; 10 1), He "having a better and more high priest of the good things to come, through the greater and more perfect tabernacle, not made with hands . . . nor yet through the blood of goats and calves, but through his own blood, entered in once for all into the holy place, having obtained eternal redemption" (9 11 f).

Yet it is possible to exaggerate the dependence of He on Alexandrian thought. Deeper than the allegorical interpretation of passages even from the LXV, is the deeper than the LOGOS-philosophy which formed the framework of his thought, is the writer's experience and idea of the personal Christ. His central interest lies not in the theoretical scheme which he adopts, but in the living person who, while He is the eternal reality behind all shadows, and the very image of God's essence, is also our brother who lived and suffered on earth, the Son of the Father of the "uttermost that draws near unto God through him, seeing he ever liveth to make intercession for them" (1 1–4; 2 14 ff; 2 10; 5 7–9; 4 14–15; 6 20; 20), as Paul and Jn, so in He, the historical Jesus. The ever-living Christ is in as an original and creative element, which transforms the abstract philosophy of Hellenistic thought into a living system of salvation. Because of His essential and personal preeminence over the institutions and personalities of the Old Covenant, He has founded a new Covenant, given a new revelation and proclaimed a new gospel. The writer never loses sight of the present bearing of these eternal realities on the lives of his readers. There is in their warning against apostasy, for their encouragement in the face of persecution, and for their upholding hope while they "run the race that is set before [them], looking unto Jesus the author and perfecter of . . . faith" (2 5; 3 12 ff; 4 1 ff; 10 28 f; 12 1 f 23 f).

LITERATURE

"The Gospel according to the Hebrews" was a work of early Christian literature, which reference is frequently made by the Church Fathers in the first five centuries, and of which some twenty or more fragments, preserved in their writings, have come down to us. The book itself has long disappeared. It has, however, been the subject of many critical surmises and discussions in the course of the last century. It has been regarded as the original record of the life of Jesus, the Archimedepoint of the whole gospel history. From it Justin Martyr has been represented as deriving his knowledge of the works and words of Christ, and to it some have been referred the gospel quotations found in Justin and other early writers when these deviate in any measure from the text of the canonical gospels. Recent discussions have thrown considerable light upon the problems connected with this Gospel, and a large literature has grown up around it of which the most important works will be noted below.

Speaking of Papias Eusebius mentions that he has related the story of a woman who was accused of many sins before the Lord, which is contained in the "Gospel according to the Hebrews." This does not prove that Papias was acquainted with this Gospel, for he might have obtained the story, which cannot any longer be regarded as part of St. John's Gospel, from oral tradition. But there is a certain significance of Eusebius' mentioning it in this connection (Euseb., H.E., III, xxxix, 16). Eusebius, speaking of Ignatius and his ep., takes notice of a saying of Jesus which he quotes (Ep. ad Smyrn, iii, cf. Lk 24 39), "Take, handle me, and see that I am not an incorporeal spirit." The saying differs materially from the saying in St. Luke's Gospel, and Eusebius says he has no knowledge whence it had been taken by Ignatius. Jerome, however, twice over attributes the saying to the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," and Origen quotes it from the "Teaching of Peter" (First. 17). There is no evidence whatever that this Gospel has been known to the Church, and we cannot, therefore, be sure that he knew this Gospel.

The first early Christian writer who is mentioned as having actually used the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" is Hegesippus, who flourished in the second half of the 2d cent. Eusebius, to whom we owe the reference, tells us that Hegesippus in his "Memorix quotes passages from "the Syriac Gospel according to the Hebrews" (HE, IV, xxi, 7).

Irenæus, in the last quarter of the 2d cent., says that the Ebionites use only the "Gospel according to Matthew" and reject the apostle Paul, calling him an apostate from the law (Adv. Haer., i, 26, 2). There is reason to believe that there is some confusion in this statement of Irenæus, for we have the testimony of Epiphanius, Jerome and Eusebius that it was the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" that was used by the Ebionites. With this qualification we may accept Irenæus as a witness to this Gospel.

Clement of Alexandria early in the 3d cent. quotes from the Gospel of Matthew with the acypotherial formula as he employs for quotation of Holy Scripture (Strom., ii, 9). Origen, Clement's successor at Alexandria, has one very striking quotation from the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" (Comm. in Joann, ii), and Jerome says this Gospel is often used by Origen.

Busebius, in the first half of the 4th cent., mentions that the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" take small account of the others (He, i, xvii, 4). He has, besides, other references to it, and in his widely known classification of Christian Scriptures into "acknowledged," "doubted," and "rejected," he mentions this Gospel which he says some have put in the last category, although those of the Hebrews who have accepted Christ are delighted with it (He, i, xvii, 5). Busebius had himself in all probability seen and handled the book in the library of his friend Pamphilus at Caesarea, where Jerome, a hundred years later, found it and read it.

Epiphanius, who lived largely in Pal, and wrote his treatise on heresies in the latter half of the 4th cent., has much to say of the Ebionites, and the Nazarenes. Speaking of the Ebionites, he says they received the "Gospel according to Matthew" to the exclusion of the others, mentioning that it alone of the NT books is in Heb speech and Heb characters, and is called the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" (Hær., 12.2). He goes on to say that their "Gospel according to Matthew," as it is named, is not complete but falsified and mutilated, "and they call it the Heb Gospel" (Hær., xxi.13). The quotations which Epiphanius proceeds to make show that this Gospel diverges considerably from the canonical Gospel of Mt and may well be that according to the Hebrews. It is more likely that "the Gospel according to Matthew, very full, in Hebrew," of which Epiphanius speaks, when telling about the Nazarenes, is the "Gospel of the Hebrews" attested by Papias, Ireneus, and a widespread early tradition. But as Epiphanius confesses he does not know whether it has the genealogies, it is clear he was not himself acquainted with the book.

Jerome, toward the end of the 4th cent., is our chief authority for the circulation and use of the "Gospel according to the Hebrews," although his later statements on the subject do not always agree with the earlier. He was proud of being "trilinguis," acquainted with the Heb as well as with Lat and Gr. When he says "there is a Gospel," he says, "which the Nazarenes and Ebionites use, which I lately read in the Heb tongue into Gr and which is called by many the authentic Gospel of Matthew" (Comm. on Mt. 13:13). The fact here mentioned is considerable, that he reads the work, seems to imply that this Gospel was really something different from the canonical Mt which he had in his hands. In another place, however, he writes: "Matthew . . . . first of all composed the Gospel of Christ in Heb letters and words, in Judaea, for behalf of those of the circumcision who had believed, and it is not quite certain who afterward transcribed it into Gr. But the very Heb is preserved to this day in the Caesarean library, which Pamphilus the Martyr, with such care, had stored; I myself was allowed the opportunity of copying it by the Nazarenes in Beroea who use this volume. In which it is to be observed that the evangelist, when he uses the testimonies of the OT, either in his own person, or in that of the Lord and Saviour, does not follow the authority of the LXX translators, but that of the Heb. So these, the following are two examples: 'Out of Egypt have I called my Son' (Mt. 2:15 AV); and 'He shall be called a Nazarene' (Mt. 2:23)" (De Vir. Ill., iii). It certainly looks as if in the former instance Jerome meant the Gospel according to the Hebrews, and in the latter the well-authenticated Heb Gospel of St. Matthew. At a later time, however, Jerome appears to withdraw this and to introduce a confusing or even contra-tradictory note. His words are: "In the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which was written in Ethiopian, and in the Chaldee-Syr (Aram.) language, but in Heb characters, which the Nazarenes use as the 'Gospel of the Apostles,' or as most people think the 'Gospel according to Matthew,' which was written in Gr and Lat, and was used frequently by Origen" (Comm. in Galat., i.9). Jerome names the actual Gospel were frequent, detailed and unequivocal.

Neophorus at the beginning of the 9th cent. puts the Gospel according to the Hebrews in his list of disputed books of the NT along with the Apocalypse of St. John, the Apocalypse of Peter, and the Epistle of Barnabas. This list is believed to rest upon an authority of about the year 500 AD, and, in the stichometry attached, this Gospel is said to have occupied 2,200 lines, while the canonical Mt occupied 2,500.

Codex A of the 9th cent. discovered by Tischendorf, and now in the Bodleian Library, is affixed to four passages of Mt giving the readings of Ioudatike, the lost Gospel according to the Hebrews (Signer, Textual Criticism, i, 180; see also Plate xi, 30, p. 131).

All that survives, and all that we are told of this work, show that it was of the nature of a Gospel, and that it was written in the manner of the Synoptic Gospels. It seems to describe the life and ministry of Jesus, to make an attempt to show that it was written by a Jewish writer, and that it was limited to the limited circles of Jewish Christians who preferred it. And it never attained canonical authority. The Muratorian Fragment has no reference to it. Ireneaus knew that the Ebionites used only the Gospel according to Matthew in Heb, although, as we have seen, this may be really the Gospel according to the Hebrews; but his fourfold Gospel comprises the Gospels of Mt, Mk, Lk and Jn, which we know. There is no reason to believe that it was the copy of the Gospel as attested by the early writers. The name Ap. is derived from the Aramaic word ʿapomemononuma, or of quotations made anonymously by others of the early Fathers. Like the Synoptic Gospels, however, it contained narratives of events as well as sayings and discourses. It has an account of the crucifixion and of the ministry, of the baptism of Jesus, of the call of the apostles, of the woman taken in adultery, of the last supper, of the denial of Peter, of appearances of Jesus after the resurrection; and it contained the Lord's Prayer, and sayings of Jesus, like the forgiveness of sins, the great commandment, the question of the rich young ruler, and others. One or two sayings have a gnostic tinge, as when Jesus calls the Holy Spirit His mother, and is made to express His unwillingness to eat the flesh of the paschal lamb. There are apocryphal additions, and these sayings are narrated belonging to the canonical Gospels, and there are sayings and incidents wholly apocryphal in the fragments of the Gospel which have survived. But these superfluities do not imply any serious deviation from Catholic doctrine; they only prove, as Professor Zahn says, "the earnestness of the redactor of the Gospel according to the Hebrews to enrich the only Gospel which Jewish Christians possessed up to that time from the still unexhausted source of private oral tradition" (GK, ii, 717).

The very title of the work suggests that it circulated among Jewish Christians. Those Christians of Pal to whom Jesus was the ecclesiastical center bequeathed themselves, after the troubles which belf the Holy City, to the less frequented regions beyond the Jordan, and were thus cut off from the main stream of catholic Christianity. In fact, the Ebionites were considered a separate and heretical group for their unique beliefs and practices.

3. Its Circumcision and of exclusiveness to assert itself among Language and also for heretical tendencies to develop. The Ebionites went forth in the mainstream of Catholic Christianity. However, among those Jews who rejected the spirit of circumcision and its teachings, the Ebionites stood out as a distinct and heretical group.

The Nazarenes, as all Jewish Christians were called at first, observed the ceremonial law themselves, but did not impose it upon gentile Christians. And the third of the three periods of the Church, the person of Christ. It was among a community of these Nazarenes at Beroea, the modern Aleppo, that Jerome, during a temporary residence at Chalcis in Northern Syria, found the Gospel according to the Hebrews in circulation. No fewer than 9 times he mentions that this Gospel is their one Gospel, and only once does he connect the Ebionites with them in the use of it. Epiphanius draws a clear line of distinction between the Ebionites and the Nazarenes, and we can scarcely suppose that a Gospel which satisfied the one would be wholly acceptable to the other.

There is reason to believe that the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew was most to the mind of the Heb Christians, and that it took different forms in the hands of various communities to which the Jewish Christians were attached. The Gospel of the Nazarenes was the Gospel according to the Hebrews, which in all probability had some affinity with the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew. The Gospel of the Ebionites, which seems to have been the same as the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles, was something of a more diverse doctrinal tendency suited to the diverse and heretical views of that sect. But it is not easy to reconcile the statements of Epiphanius with those of Eusibus and Jerome.

That the Heb tongue in which Papias says St. Matthew composed his Logia was the Aram. of Pal is generally accepted. This Aram. was closely akin to the Syr spoken between the Mediterranean and the Tigris. It was the same as the Chaldei of the books of Ezr, Neh, and Dnl, of which examples have so recently been found in the Aram. papyri from Elephantine at Assouan. Euseibus and Jerome are emphatic and precise in recording the fact that the Heb Gospel was not only Heb or Aram. in composition, but written in the square Heb characters, so different from the Old Heb of the Moabite Stone and the Siloam inscription. That there was a Gr br before the time of Jerome is certain, but there is no record of a Heb Gospel which was used by Origen, Clement of Alexandria, and others, is strenuously affirmed by Professor Harnack (Altchristliche Literatur, 1, 6 ff) and as strenuously denied by Professor Zahn (Gk, II, 48). The reason why the book never attained to any ecclesiastical authority was no doubt its limited circulation in a tongue familiar, outside the circle of Jewish Christians, to only a learned few. For this reason also it is unlikely that it will ever be found, as the Epistle of Barnabas, the Shepherd, and other works have been.

It is natural to seek for traces of special relationship between the Gospel according to the Hebrews, circulating among communities of Jewish Christians, and the Gospel of St. Matthew. But the soil of Pal, and which was originally composed in the interest of Jewish Christians, and circulated at a very early period in a form separate from that of the canonical Gospel of Mt and now altogether lost. We have already seen that Irenaeus in all likelihood confused the "Gospel according to the Hebrews" with the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew; and that Jerome says the Gospel used by the Nazarenes was called by many the authentic Gospel of St. Matthew. However, among those Jews who have survived, there are more which resemble St. Matthew's record than either of the other Synoptics. E. B. Nicholas, after a full and scholarly examination of the fragments and of the references, puts forward the hypothesis that St. Matthew wrote at different times the canonical Gospel and the Gospel according to the Hebrews, or, at least, that large part of the latter which runs parallel to the former (The Gospel according to the Hebrews, 104). The possibility of two editions of this form of the same document has recently received illustration from Professor Bliss's theory of two recensions of the Acts and of St. Luke's Gospel to explain the textual peculiarities of these books in Codex D. This theory has received the adhesion of eminent scholars; but Nicholas has more serious differences to explain, and it cannot be said that his able argument and admirably marshaled learning have carried conviction to the minds of NT scholars.

If we could be sure that Ignatius in his Ep. to the Smyrneans derived the striking saying attributed to Our Lord, “Take, handle me, and see that I am not an incorporeal spirit,” we might have less difficulty in seeing it as part of the Heb composition of the Gospels.

3. Composition of the Hebrew Gospel. The composition of the Heb Gospel of St. Matthew is as at any rate within the 1st cent. The obscurity of its origin, the primitive cast of its contents, and the respect accorded to it down to the 9th cent., have disposed some scholars to assign it an origin not later than that of the synoptic Gospels, and to regard it as continuing the Aram. tradition of the earliest preaching and teaching regarding Christ. The manifestly secondary character of some of its contents seems to be against such an early origin. Professor Zahn is rather disposed to place it not earlier than 130, when, during the insurrection of Bar-cochba, the gulf that had grown up between Jews and Jewish Christians was greatly deepened, and with an exclusively gentle church in Jesus, the Jewish Christians had lost their center and broken off into sects. The whole situation seems to him to point to a date somewhere between 130-50 AD. The data for any precise determination of the question are wanting.

4. Relation to St. Matthew. The Gospel according to St. Matthew bore the name of Matthew, and was supposed to be the genuine Gospel of St. Matthew. There is, however, no record of a written work of the Evangelist, or of any other ancient writer, who assigns to St. Matthew the composition of a Hebrew Gospel.

5. Incidents. The Holy Spirit took me by one of my hairs, and bore me away to the great mountain Thabor (Orig., In Joam., ii; it is quoted several times both by Origen and Jerome). Jerome more than once quotes from it a saying of the Lord to His disciples: “Never be joyful except when ye look on your brother in love” (Hieron. in Eph 6:4; in Eccl 18:7). In his comm. on Mt (6:11) Jerome mentions that he found in the third petition of the Lord’s prayer for the difficult and unique Gr word tâmbâr, âmâsias, which he translates supersubstantialis, the Aram. word màthar, crasinus, so that the sense would be, “Tomorrow’s bread give us today.” Of unrecorded incidents the most notable is that of the appearance of the Risen Lord to James: “And when the Lord had given His linen cloth to the servant of the priest, He went to James and appeared to him. For James had sworn that he would not eat bread from that hour wherein he knew the eucharist.” We saw Him rising from the dead. Again a little afterward the Lord says, Bring a table and bread. Immediately it is added: He took bread and blessed and brake, and afterward gave it to James the Just and said to him, My brother, eat thy bread for the Son of Man has risen from them that sleep" (Hieron., De Vir. Illust., "Jacobus").

Jerome also tells that in the Gospel according to the Hebrews there is the following passage: "Lo the mother of the Lord and His brethren said unto Him: John the Baptist is baptising for the remission of sins; let us go and be baptized by him. But He said to them: What sin have I committed that I should go and be baptized by him? Unless perchance this very word which I have spoken is a sin of ignorance" (Hieron., Ado. Pelag., III.2).

Rahmán, "the friend of the Merciful," i.e. of God, a favorite name for Abraham; cf Jas 2 23. The city is some 20 miles S. of Jerus, situated in an open valley, 3,040 ft. above sea-level.

1. History of the City.—Hebron is said to have been founded before Zoan (i.e. Tanis) in Egypt (Nu 13 22); its ancient name was Kiriath-arba, probably meaning the "Four Cities," perhaps because divided at one time into four quarters, but according to Jewish writers so called because four patriarchs, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob and Adam were buried there. According to Josh 10 13 it was so called after Arba, the father of Anak.

This Gospel is not to be classed with heretical Gospels like that of Marcion, nor with apocryphal Gospels like that of James or Nicodemus. It differed from the former in that it did not deviate from any essential of catholic truth in its representation of Our Lord. It differed from the latter in that it narrated particulars mostly relating to Our Lord's public ministry, while they occupy themselves with matters of curiosity left unrecorded in the canonical Gospels. It differs from the canonical Gospels only in that it is more florid in style, more diffuse in the relation of incidents, and more inclined to sectional views of doctrine. Its uncritical sayings and incidents may have come from oral tradition, and they do lend a certain interest and picturesque to the narrative. Its language confined it to a very limited sphere, and its sectional character prevented it from ever professing Scriptural authority or attaining to canonical rank. See also Apocryphal Gospels.

Abram came and dwelt by the oaks of Mamre (q.v.), "which are in Hebron" (Gen 13 18); from here he went to the rescue of Lot and brought him back after the defeat of Chedorlaomer (14 13); here his name was changed to Abraham (17 5); to this place came the three angels with the promise of a son (18 10); Sarah died here (23 2); and for her sepulcher Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah (23 17); here Isaac and Jacob spent much of their lives (35 27; 37 14); from here Jacob sent Joseph to seek his brethren (37 14), and hence Jacob and his sons went down to Egypt (46 1). In the cave of Machpelah all the patriarchs and their wives, except Rachel, were buried (49 30; 50 13).

The spies visited Hebron and near there cut the cluster of grapes (Nu 13 22f). Hoham (q.v.), king of Hebron, was one of the five kings defeated by Joshua at Beth-joshua and horon and slain at Makkedah (Josh Judges 10 3f). Caleb drove out from Hebron the "three sons of Anak" (14 12; 15 14); it became one of the cities of Judah (15 54), but was set apart for the Kohathite Levites (21 10), and became a city of refuge (20 7). One of Samson's exploits was the carrying of the gate of Gaza "to the top of the mountain that is before Hebron" (Jgs 16 3).

David, when a fugitive, received kindness from the people of this city (1 S 30 31); here Ahner was treacherously slain by Joab at the gate (2 S 3 27), and the sons of Rimmon, after their hands and feet had been cut off, were hanged "beside the pool" (4 12). After the death of Saul, David was here anointed king (6 3) and reigned here 71 years, until he captured Jerus and made that his capital (6 5); while here, six sons were born to him.

3. The Days (3 2). In this city Absalom found a center for his disaffection, and repairing

Monarchy there under pretense of performing a yow to Jeh, he raised the standard of revolt (15 7 f). Jos mistakenly places here the dream of Solomon (Ant, VIII, ii, 1) which occurred at Gibeon (1 K 3 4). Hebron was fortified by Rehoboam (2 Ch 11 10).

Abraham's Oak.

Probably during the captivity Hebron came into the hands of Edom, though it appears to have been colonized by returning Jews (Neh 11 4. Later 25); it was recovered from Edom by Simon Maccabaeus (1 Mace 5 65; Jos, Ant, XII, viii, 6). In the first great revolt against Rome, Simon bar-Giorias captured the city (BJ, IV, ix, 7), but it was retaken, for Vespasian, by his general Cerealis who carried it by storm, slaughtered the inhabitants and burnt it (ib, 9).

During the Muslim period Hebron has retained its importance on account of veneration to the patriarchs, esp. Abraham; for the same reason it was respected by the Crusaders who called it Castellum ad Sanctum Abraham. In 1165 it became the see of a Lat bishop, but 20 years later it fell to the victorious arms of Saladin, and it has ever since remained a fanatic Moslem center, although regarded as a holy city, alike by Moslem, Jew and Christian.

II. The Ancient Site. Modern Hebron is a straggling town clustered round the Haram or sacred enclosure built above the traditional cave of Machpelah (q.v.); it is this sacred spot which has determined the present position of the town all through the Christian era, but it is quite evident that an exposed and indefensible situation, running along a valley, like this, could not have been that of earlier and less settled times. From many of the pilgrim narratives, we can gather that for long there had been a tradition that the original site was some distance from the modern town, and, as analogy might suggest, upon a hill. There can be little doubt that the site of the Hebron of OT history is a lofty, olive-covered hill, lying to the W. of the present town, known as er Rumelidy. Upon its summit are cyclopin walls and other traces of ancient occupation. In the midst are the ruins of a mediaeval building known as Der el-Arba'm, the "monastery of the forty" (martyrs) about whom the Hebronites have an interesting folklore tale. In the building are shown the tombs of Jesse and Ruth. Near the foot of the hill are several fine old tombs, while to the N. is a large and very ancient Jewish cemetery, the graves of which are each covered with a massive monolith, 5 and 6 ft. long. At the eastern foot of the hill is a perennial spring, 'Ain el Jadeh; the water rises in a vault, roofed by masonry and reached by steps. The environs of this hill are full of folklore associations; the summit would well repay a thorough excavation.

A mile or more to the N.W. of Hebron is the famous oak of Mamre (q.v.), or "Abraham's oak," near which the Russians have erected a hospice. It is a fine specimen of the Holm oak (Quercus coccifera), but is gradually dying. The present site appears to have been pointed out as that of Abraham's tent since the 12th cent.; the earlier traditional site was at Ramet el Khallit. See Mamre.

III. Modern Hebron. Modern Hebron is a city of some 20,000 inhabitants, 55 per cent of whom are Moslems and the remainder mostly Jews. The city is divided into seven quarters, one of which is known as that of the "glass blowers" and another as that of the "water-skin makers." These industries, with the manufacture of pottery, are the main sources of trade. The most conspicuous building is the Haram (see Macpelah). In the town are two large open reservoirs the Birkef el Kassain, the "pool of the glass blowers" and Birkef es Sallal, the "pool of the Sultan." This latter, which is the larger, is by tradition the site of the execution of the murderers of Ishbosheth (2 S 4 12). The Moslem inhabitants are noted for their fanatical exclusiveness and conservatism, but this has been greatly modified in recent years through the patient and beneficent work of Dr. Paterson, of the U. F. Ch. of S. Med. Mission. The Jews, who number about 1,500, are mostly confined to a special ghetto; they have four synagogues, two Sephardic and two Ashkenazic; they are a poor and unprogressive community.

HEDGE, hej;

(2) ἑρμή, ἱδρή, and ἱδρή, ἱδρή, "hedgerows" in RV only in Ps 89 40, elsewhere "fence." GED-

ERAH (q.v.) in RV is tr. hedgers' (1 Ch 4 23).

(3) ἑρμῆν, na'dak, "thorn-hedges" (Isa 7 19).

(4) φαραγός, phраг nós, tr. "hedge" (Mt 21 33; Mk 12 1; Lk 14 23); "partition" in Eph 2 14, which is its literal meaning. In the LXX it is the usual equivalent of the above Heb words.
Loose stone walls without mortar are the usual "fences" around fields in Pal, and this is what ḡāther and ḡātheraḥ signify in most passages. Hedgehogs made of cut thorn branches or thorny bushes are very common in the plains and particularly in the Jordan valley.

HEED, hēd: This word, in the sense of giving careful attention ("take heed," "give heed," etc.), represents several Heb and Gr words; chief among them are ἦθα, shānā, "to watch"; ἤθελον, ἤθελον, "to look," ἐθικόν, ἐθικόν, "to see." As opposed to thoughtlessness, disregard of God's words, of the counsels of wisdom, for care of one's ways, it is constantly inculcated as a duty of supreme importance in the moral and spiritual life (Dt 4 9,15,23; 27 9, AV, etc.; Jos 22 5; 23 11; Ps 59 1; Mt 16 6; Mk 14 3; Lk 12 15; 1 Cor 3 10; 8 9; 10 12; Col 4 17, etc.).

HEEL, hēl (בְּרָא, "ačekab"): "The iniquity of my heels" (Ps 49 5 AV) is a literal tr., and might be understood to indicate the Psalmist's "false steps," erroneous or erra, but that meaning is very doubtful here. RV gives "iniquity at my heels." RVM gives a still better sense, "When the iniquity of them that would supplant me compasseth me about, even of them that trust in . . . riches'"—treacherous enemies ever on the watch to trip up a man's heels (of Hos 12 3). Of Judah it was said, "Thy heels shall suffer violence" (Jer 13 22) through being "made bare" (AV), and thus subject to the roughness of the road as she was led captive.

Figurative: (1) Of the partial victory of the evil power over humanity, "Thou shalt bruise [in "lie in wait for"][m "lie in wait for"] his heel" (Gen 3 15), through constant, insidious suggestion of the satisfaction of the lower desires. Or if we regard this statement as a part of the Protevangelium, the earliest proclamation of Christ's final and complete victory over sin, the destruction of "the serpent" ("He shall bruise thy head"), then the reference is evidently to Christ's sufferings and death, even to that which He endured in His body, nature, and in the hands of the tribe of Dan in war, "An adder in the path, that biteth the horse's heels" (Gen 47 17), by which it triumphed over foes of superior strength. (2) Of violence and brutality, 'Who . . . hath lifted up his heel against me' (Ps 41 9; Jn 13 18), i.e. lifted up his foot to trample upon me (cf Jos 10 24).

HEGAL, ḫe’gl, HEGE, ḫe’ge (חָגַל, hagahay; ʼaṭ, Gal [Est 2 8,15], and ḫe’gē, ḫe’gē, Hege [Est 3 3]): One of the officers of the Pers king Assuerus; a chamberlain or eunuch (keeper of women), into whose custody the "fair young virgins" were delivered from whom the king intended to choose his queen in the place of the discredited Vashti.

HEGEMONIDES, ḫe’g-e-mon’i-des, ḫe’g-e-mon’i-des (Ἱγμανοιδῆς, Ἡγεμόνιδες): The Syrian officer placed in command of the district extending from Potomalis to the Gerermains (2 Mace 13 22). It is not easy to see how LXX and AV even in Swete's revised text the word can be taken as a mere appellative along with stratēgon, the two being rendered "principal officer": one of the two could certainly be omitted (Swete, 3d ed, 1905, capitalizes Hēgemonides). In RV the word is taken as the name of some person otherwise unknown.

HEIFER, ḫe’fr (חָפר, pārāh, in Nu 19 [see following,] and Hos 4 16; ḩp, ἕγγαλή, elsewhere in the OT; ḫdʿalq, ḧmāla, in He 9 13): For the "heifer of three years old" in AV, RVm of Is 15 5; Jer 48 34, see EGLATI-SHELISHIYAH. A young cow (contrast BULLOCK). The ἕγγαλη figures specifically in religious rites only in the ceremony of Dt 21 1,9 for the cleansing of the land, where an unexplored murder had been committed. This was not a sacrificial rite—the priests are witnesses only, and the animal was slain by breaking the neck—but sacrificial purity was required for the heifer. Indeed, it is not uncommon supposed that if the animal is killed when it now stands is a rededication of one that formerly had been sacrificial. In the sacrifices proper the heifer could be used for a peace offering (Lev 3 1), but was forbidden for the burnt (Lev 1 3) or sin (4 3 14) offerings. Hence the sacrifice of 1 S 16 2 was a peace offering. In Gen 15 9 the ceremony of the ratification of the covenant by God makes use of a heifer and a she-goat, but the reason for the use of the females is altogether obscure. Cf following article.

Figuratively: The heifer appears as representing meekness combined with helplessness in Jer 46 20 (cf the comparison of the soldiers to 'stalled calves' in the next verse). In Jer 50 11; Hos 10 11, the heifer is pictured as a victim of大家一起's war. This was particularly light work, coupled with unusually abundant food (Dt 25 4), so that the threshing heifer served esp. well for a picture of contentment. ("Wanton") in Jer 50 11, however, is an unfortunate tr in RV. Hb he'ge', Hb 'ge', RV "heifer," predicts that the "heifers" shall be set to the hard work of ploughing and breaking the sods. In Jgs 14 18, Samson uses "heifer" in his riddle to refer to his wife. This, however, was not meant to convey the impression of licentiousness that it gives the modern reader.

HEIFER, RED. In Nu 19 a rite is described in which the ashes of a "red heifer" and of certain objects are mixed with running water to obtain the so-called "water for impurity." (Such is the correct tr of ARV in Nu 19 5.13.20.21; 31 23. In these passages, AV and ERV, through a misunderstanding of a rather difficult Hb term, have "water of separation"; LXX and the Vulg have "water of separation": English versions are ambiguous.) This water was employed in the removal of the uncleanness of a person or thing that had been in contact with a dead body, and also in removing ritual defilement from booty taken in war.

The general origin of the rite is clear enough, as is the fact that this origin lies back of the official sacrificial system of Israel. For the removal of impurity, ritual as well as physical, water, preferably running water (ver 17; of Lev 14 5 ff; 15 13). In these passages, AV and ERV, through a misunderstanding of a rather difficult Hb term, have "water of separation"; LXX and the Vulg have "water of separation": English versions are ambiguous.) This water was employed in the removal of the uncleanness of a person or thing that had been in contact with a dead body, and also in removing ritual defilement from booty taken in war.

1. Origin and Significance of the Rite is the natural means, and is employed universally. But where the impurity was unusually great, mere water was not felt to be adequate, and various substances were mixed with it in order to increase its efficacy. So (among other things) blood is used in Lev 14 6.7, and dust in Nu 5 17 (see Water of Bitterness). The use, however, of ashes in Nu 19 17 is unique in the OT, although parallelism from elsewhere can be suggested. So e.g. in Ovid Fasti, iv.639-40, 725, 733, in the last of these references, "The blood of a horse shall be purified, and a ashes of calves," is remarkably close to the OT. The ashes were obtained by burning the heifer completely, "her skin, and her flesh, and her blood, with her dung" (the contents of the entrails) (ver 5; of Ex 29 14). Here only in the OT is blood burned for a ceremonial purpose, and here only is burning a "proliminary; elsewhere it is either a child act or served to consume the remnants of a finished sacrifice—Lev 4:12 and Nu 19:3 are altogether different.

The heifer is a female. For the regular sin offering for the congregation, only the male was permitted (Lev 4:14), but the female was used in the purificatory ceremony of Dt 21:3 (a rite that has several points of similarity to that of Nu 19). An individual sin offering by one of the common people, however, required a female (Lev 4:28), but probably only in order to give greater prominence to the purificatory aspect of the rite. There is even a "sacrifice of purification" in Lev 15:10, and Lev 16:14 and 16:18, where a woman was punished by being cast out, and a heifer, was offered whereof the priest was to sprinkle the blood (Nu 5:1).

The heifer is mentioned only in Lev 4:14, in which case it was to be a "female," and Lev 4:16, in which case it was to be a "young heifer." The female, being the "female," was used to purify the sins of the congregation, while the "male," being the "male," was used to purify the sins of the individual. The reason for this distinction is not clear, but it is possible that the female was chosen because it was considered to be less "sinful" than the male, and therefore more appropriate for the purificatory purpose.

The heifer was used in the purification ceremony of Lev 15:10 and 15:15, but not in Lev 16:16, where a woman was punished by being cast out, and a heifer, was offered whereof the priest was to sprinkle the blood (Nu 5:1).

HEIGHT, hit; HEIGHTS: The Eng. terms represent a large number of Heb words (gdbhah, mdbrnm, etc.). A very thing to notice is that in RV "height" and "heights" are frequently substituted for other words in AV, as "cost" (Josh 12:23), "region" (1 K 4:11), "boundaries" (Josh 11:2), "countries" (Josh 17:11), "strength" (Ps 96:4), "high places" (Isa 41:18; Jer 5:21; 7:29; 12:14; 16:6), "high mountain" (Ps 114:4) and the other, for "height" in AV, RV has "statute" (Ezk 31:5.10), "raised baseament" (Ezk 41:8), etc. In the NT we have ἀπογέη, prop. of space (Rom 8:39), and ἀπόστασις of measure (Eph 3:18; Rev 21:16).

HEIR, är: In the NT "heir" is the invariable tr of κληρονόμος, kleronomos (15 t), the technical equivalent in Gr, and of the common Heb. word קָנָה, qannah, "obtain, receive." It is used in Rom 8:17; Eph 3:6; Heb 11:9; 1 Pet 3:7 (in Gal 4:30; Heb 11:14, contrast AV and RV). In the OT "heir" and "to be heir" both represent some form of the common vb. עָנָן, yarash, "possess," and the particular rendition of the vb. as "to be heir" is given only by the context (cf e.g. AV and RV in Jer 49:2; Mic 1:15). Exactly the same is true of the words ἐριθη, "inherit," "inheritance," which in by far the greatest majority of cases would have been represented better by "possess," "possession" (see Inheritance and OHL on פִּי showing). Consequently, when God said, as in the instances of having given Palestine to Israel as an "inheritance" (Lev 20:24, etc.), nothing more need be meant than "given as a possession." The LXX, however, for the sake of variety in its rendition of Heb words, used κληρονομοῖς in many such cases (esp. Gen 15:7; 22:17), the thereby fixed on 'heir' the sense of 'recipient of a gift from God.' And so the word passed in this sense into NT Gr.—Rom 4:13, 14; Gal 3:29; Tit 3:7; Heb 6:17; 11:7; Jas 2:5; cf Eph 3:6; He 11:9; 1 Pet 3:7. On the meaning of the word is found in Mk 12:7 (and [es] and Gal 4:1—in the latter case being suggested by the transferred meaning in 3:29—while in Rom 8:17; Gal 4:7, the literal and transferred meanings are blended. This blending has produced the phrase "heirs of God," which, literally, is meaningless and which doubtless was formed without much deliberation, although it is perfectly clear. A similar blending has applied "heir" to Christ in He 1:2 (cf Rom 8:17 and perhaps Mk 12:7) as the recipient of all things in their totality. But depart from these "blended" passages, it would be a mistake to think that sonship is always consciously thought of where "heir" is mentioned, and hence too much theological implication should not be assigned the latter word.

The heirs of property in the OT were normally the sons and, chief among these, the firstborn. (1) Dt 21:15-17 provides that the OT Law shall hold that in firstborn shall inherit a "double portion," whereas the other sons shared equally. It should be noted that in this law the firstborn is the eldest son of the father, not of the mother as in Ex 13:2.) Uncertain, however, is what Dt 21:15-17 means by "wife," and the practice must have varied. In Gen 21:10 the son of the handmaid was not to be heir with Isaac, but in Gen 30:1-13 the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah are reckoned as legitimate children of Jacob. See MARRIAGE. Nor is it clear that Dt 21:15-17 forbids settling aside the eldest son before his own death or that the right of the firstborn could be set aside by the father (1 Ch 26:10). That the royal dignity went by primogeniture is asserted only (in a particular case) in 2 Ch 21:3, and both David (1 K 11:13) and Hezekiah (2 Ch 21:23) chose younger sons as their successors.

A single payment in the father's lifetime could be given in lieu of heritage (Gen 26:6; Lk 16:12), and it was possible for two brothers to make a bargain as to the disposition of the property after the father's death (Gen 25:31-34).

(2) When there were sons alive, the daughters had no right of inheritance, and married daughters had no such right in any case. Job 42:15 describes an altogether exceptional procedure. Possibly unmarrried daughters went under the charge of the firstborn, as the new head of the family, and he took the responsibility of finding them husbands. Nu 27:1-11; 36:1-12 treat of the case where there were no sons—the daughters inherited the estate, but they could marry only within the tribe, lest the tribal possessions be confused. This right of the daughters, however, is definitely stated to be a new thing, and in earlier times the property probably passed to the nearest male relatives, to whom it went in the same way as if there were no daughters. In extreme cases, where no other heirs could be found, the property went to the slaves (Gen 15:3; Prov 30:23, noting that the meaning of the latter word is uncertain), but this could have happened only at the rarest intervals. A curious instance is that of 1 Ch 2:34,35, where property is preserved in the family by marrying the daughter to an Egyptian slave belonging to the father; perhaps some adoption-idea underlies this.

(3) The wife had no claim on the inheritance, though the disposition made of her dowry is not explained, and it may have been returned to her. If she was childless she resorted to the Levirate marriage (Dt 25:5-10). If she was able or was without issue she returned to her own family and might marry another husband (Gen 38:11; Lev 22:13; Ruth 1:8). The inferior wives (concubines) were part of the estate and went to the heir; indeed, possession of the father's concubines was proof of possession of his dignities (2 S 15:22; 1 K 2:13-25). At least, such was the custom in the time of David and Solomon, but at a later period nothing is heard of the practice.

(4) The disposition of land is a very obscure question. Nu 36:4 states explicitly that each heir had a share, but the continual splitting up of an estate through successive generations would have produced an impossible state of affairs. Possibly the land went to the eldest born as part of his portion, possibly in some cases it was held in common by the members of the family, possibly some member bought the shares of the others, possibly the practice differed at different times. But our ignorance of the facts is complete.

Norm.—The dates assigned by different scholars to the passages cited have an important bearing on the discussion.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

HELAH, hēlāh (חֵלָה, helah): A wife of Ashhur, father of Tekoa (1 Ch 4:57).
HEM, hēl'lam (חֵלֵם, hēlām, 2 S 10 16 f.; in ver 17 with † locale; LXX Aἰάμη, Hēlām): A place near which David is said to have defeated the Philistines now called Khalem (2 S 10 16 f). Its site is unknown. Cornilli and others introduce it into the text of 1 Esch 47 16 from the LXX (ח'דֵה, Hēlām). This would place it between the territories of Damascus and Hamath, which is not unreasonable. Some scholars identify it with Aleppo, which seems too far north.

HELBAN, hel'ba (חֶלְבָּא, helbā): A place in the territory assigned to Asher (Jgs 3 1). It may be identical with Mahallaba of Samachert's prism inscription. The site, however, has not been recovered.

HELBON, hel'bon (חֶלְבּוֹן, helbōn; Ἡλέβων, Helbon, Χελβων, Helbōn, Chelbōn): A district from which Tyre received supplies of wine through the Damascus market (Ezk 27 18); universally admitted to be the modern Halbus, a village at the head of a fruitful valley of the same name among the chalk slopes on the eastern side of Anti-Lebanon, 13 miles N.W. of Damascus, where traces of ancient vineyard terracing still exist. Records contemporary with Ezek mention mat helbunim or the land of Helbon, whence Nebuchadnezzar received wine for sacrificial purposes (Belshazzar Cylinder, I, 23), while Karan halbus, or Helbonian wine, is named in WAI, II, 44. Strabo (xv.735) also tells us that the kings of Persia esteemed it highly. The district is still famous for its grapes—the best in the country—but these are mostly made into raisins, since the population is mainly Moslem. Helbon must not be confused with Chalybon (Ptol. v.15, 17), the Gr-Rom province of Haleb or Aleppo.

HELCHIAH, hel-kii'a. See HELKIAH.

HELDAI, hel'dāi (חֵלְדָי, helday): (1) A captain of the temple-service, appointed for the 12th month (1 Ch 27 15). Same as Heled (חֵלֵד, hēledh) in I 11 30, and is probably also to be identified with Heleb, son of Baanah the Metopharchite, one of David's heroic leaders (2 S 23 29). (2) One of a company of Jews who brought gifts of gold and silver from Babylon to assist the exiles under Zerubbabel (Zec 6 10).

HELEB, hē'leb (חֶלֶב, helēb, 2 S 23 29). See HELDAI.

HELED, hē'led (חֵלֶד, helēd, 1 Ch 11 30). See HELDAI.

HELEK, hē'lek (חָלֵק, helēk): Son of Gilead the Manassite (Nu 26 30; Josh 17 2). Patronymic, Helekites (Nu 26 30).

HELEM, hē'lem: (1) חֵלֶם, helēm; LXX B, Βαλαὰς, Balaam, omitting "son," A, בָּלָאָה, Balaolah, "son of Elam." (2) CHXidBupos, Helchos. A great-grandson of Asher, called Hotham in ver 32. The form "Elam" appears as the name of a Levite in 1 Esd 8 33. (2) חֵלֶם, helēm, "strength," regarded by LXX as a common noun (Zec 6 14). One of the ambassadors from the Jews of the exile to Jesus; probably the person called Helkai in ver 10 is meant.

HELEPH, hē'leph (חֵלֶף, helēph): A place on the southern border of Naphtali (Josh 19 33); unidentified.

HELEZ, hē'lez (חֵלֵז, helēz, "vigor"); LXX Χαλέζ, Chalēz, Xelēz, Chelēz: (1) 2 S 22 36; 1 Ch 11 27; 27 10. One of David's mighty men, assigned to 1 Ch 27 10, he belonged to the sons of Ephraim and was at the head of the 7th course in David's organization of the kingdom. (2) LXX Chelēs, 1 Ch 2 39. A man of Judah of the clan of the Jerahmeelites.

HELIODORUS, hē-ii-o-dō'rus (Ἁλιοδόρος, Heliodōros): Treasurer of the Syrian king Seleucus IV, Philopator (187-175 BC), the immediate predecessor of Antiochus Epiphanes who carried out to its utmost extremity the Hellenizing policy begun by Seleucus and the "sons of Tobias." Greatly in want of money to pay the tribute due to the Romans as one of the results of the victory of Scipio over Antiochus the Great at Magnesia (190 BC), Seleucus learned from Apollonius, governor of Coele-Syria (Pal) and Phoenicia, of the wealth which was reported to be stored up in the Temple at Jerusalem and commissioned H. (2 Macc 3) to plunder the temple and to bring its contents to him. On the wealth collected in the Temple at this time, Jos (Ant, IV, vii, 2) may be consulted. The Temple seems to have served the purposes of a bank in which the private deposits of widows and orphans were kept, and another security, and in 2 Macc 15-21 is narrated the panic at Jerusalem which took place when H. came with an armed guard to seize the contents of the Temple (see Stanley, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, III, 287). In spite of the protest of Onias, the high priest, H. was proceeding to carry out his commission when, "through the Lord of Spirits and the Prince of all power," a great apparition appeared which caused him to fall down "compassed with great darkness" and speechless. When "quite at the last gasp" he was by the intercession of Onias restored to life and strength and "testified to all men the works of the great God which he had before his eyes." The narrative given in 2 Macc 3 is not meant to be taken by any other historian, and in 2 Macc refers to the plundering of the Temple and assigns the deed to Apollonius. Rassaffe used the narrative in depicting, on the walls of the Vatican, the triumph of Pope Julius II over the enemies of the Pontificate. J. HURVISON

HELKIAH, hel'ki-a. See HELKIAH.

HELEK, hēlek (חָלֵק, helēk); perhaps an abbreviation for Helkiah, "he is my portion." Not in LXX B; LXX L, Xelēas, Chellesias [Neh 12 15]: The head of a priestly house in the days of Joakim.

HELKATH, hel'kath (חֹלָכָה, holkath [Josh 19 25]; helkath [21 31]; by a scribal error hokbed [1 Ch 6 75]): A town or district on the border of Asher, assigned to the Levites; unidentified.

HELKATH-HAZZURIM, hel'kath-ha-zū'rim, -ha-zū'rin, -ha-zū'rim, hekath ha-ćurim; Mapu vīr em bōhūn, Merō tān em bōhōn: The name as it stands gives "field of the strangers," and is applied to the scene of the conflict in which twelve champions each from the army of Joab and that of Abner perished together, each slaying his Hellenism, hel-en'is-m, HELLENIST, hel'en-ist: Hellenism is the name we give to the manifold achievements of the Greeks in social and political institutions, in the various arts, in science and philosophy, in morals and religion. It is customary to distinguish two main periods, between which stands the striking figure of Alexander the Great; and to apply to the earlier period the adj. "Hellenic," that of "Hellenistic" to the later. While there is no abundant reason for making this distinction, it must not be considered as resting upon fortuitous changes occasioned by foreign influences. The Hellenistic age is rather the sudden unfolding of a flower whose bud was forming and maturing for centuries.

Before the coming of the Hellenic peoples into what we now call Greece, there existed in those lands a flourishing civilization to which we may give the name "Aegean." 1. The Expansion of The explorations of archaeologists of the Greek peoples during the last few decades have brought it to light in many places on the continent, as well as on the islands of the Aegean and notably in Crete. When the Hellenic peoples came, it was not as a united nation, nor even as homogeneous tribes of a common race; though without doubt predominantly of kindred origin, it was the common possession of an Aryan speech and of a common religion that marked them off from the peoples among whom they settled. When their southward movement from Ilyria occurred, and by what causes it was brought about, we do not know; but it can hardly have taken the word of the (in 31 out of 65 occurrences of that word it is so tr"), and in all places, save one (1 Cor 15 55) in the NT, for the Gr word Hades (this word occurs 11; in 10 of these it is tr" "hell"; 1 Cor 15 55 reads "grave," with "hell" in m). In these cases the word has its older general meaning, though in Lk 16 23 (parable of Rich Man and Lazarus) it is specially connected with a place of "torment," in contrast with the "Abraham's bosom" to which Lazarus is taken (ver 22).

In the above cases RV has introduced changes, replacing "hell" by "Sheol" in the passages in the OT (ERV retains "hell" in Isa 14 9.15; ARK makes no exception), and Word in RV by "Hades" in the passages for the NT (see under these words).

Besides the above uses, and more in accordance with the modern meaning, the word "hell" is used in the NT in AV as the equivalent of Gehenna, "a pit," Mt 6 22.28; 10 28; 13 40; 18 8, etc; RV in these cases puts "Gehenna" in m. Originally the Valley of Hinnom, near Jerusalem, Gehenna became among the Jews the synonym for the place of torment in the future life (the "Gehenna of fire," Mt 5 22, etc; see GEHENNA).

In yet one other passage in the NT (2 Pet 2 4), "to cast down to hell" is used (AV and RV) to represent the Gr tartarō, ("to send into hell") in the place of punishment of the fallen angels: "sacked not angels when they sinned, but cast them down to hell, and committed them to pits [or chains] of darkness" (cf Jude ver 6; but also Mt 25 41). Similar ideas are found in certain of the Jewish apocalyptic books (Book of En, Book of Jub, Apoc Bar, with apparent reference to Gen 6 1-4; of ESCHATOLOGY of the OT).

HELLENISM, hel'en-iz'm, HELLENIST, hel'en-ist: Hellenism is the name we give to the manifold achievements of the Greeks in social and political institutions, in the various arts, in science and philoso conquered peoples. But the strong individuality of the Hellenic population manifested itself everywhere in its civilization. In the evolution from the Homeric kingship (supported by the nobles in council, from which the commonly was excluded, or perhaps it was in the main sense to express assent or dissent to proposals laid before it) through oligarchic or aristocratic rule and the usurped authority of the tyrants, to the establishment of democratic government, there is nothing surprising to the man of today. That is because the civilization has become typical of all western civilization. In the earlier stages of this process, moreover, there is nothing strikingly at variance with the institutions of the Hebrews, at least so far as concerns the outward forms. But there existed throughout a subtle difference of spirit which made it possible, even inevitable, for the Greeks to attain to democratic institutions, whereas to the Hebrews such a development was impossible, if not unthinkable. It is difficult to define this spirit, but one may say that it was marked from the first by an inclination to permit the free development and expression of individuality subordinated to the common good; by a corresponding recognition of human limitations over against divine Deity; by an instinctive dread of excess as inhuman and provoking the just punishment of the gods; and lastly by a sane refusal to take oneself too seriously, displaying itself in a certain good-humored irony even among men who, like Socrates and Epicurus, regarded themselves as charged with a sublime mission, in striking contrast with the Heb prophets who voiced the thunders of Sinai, but never by any chance smiled at their own earnestness. Even the Macedonians did not attempt to rule Greece with despotic sway, leaving the states in general in the enjoyment of their liberties; and in the Orient, Alexander and his successors, Rom as well as Gr, secured their power and extended civilization by the foundation and encouragement of Hellenic cities in extraordinary numbers. The city-state, often confederated with other city-states, displaced the organization of tribe or clan, thus substituting a new unit and a new interest for the old; and the city-state, as a petty republic, radiated influences and made for order and good government everywhere. But in accordance with the new conditions the state took on a somewhat different form. While the city preserved local autonomy, the state became more and more the oriental conglomeration of the king reinforced by the Hellenic tendency to defy the benefactors of mankind, eventuated in modes of speech and thought which powerfully influenced the Messiahic hopes of the Jews.

The life of the Greeks, essentially urban and dominated by political interests fostered in states in which the individual counted for much was of a type wholly different from the oriental. Although the fegance of life cultivated by the Hellenic city-state as by the Sem tribe, it was more transparent in the former, particularly in the newer communities formed in historical times. There was thus a powerful stimulus to mutual tolerance and concession which, supported as it was by the strong love of personal independence and the cultivation of individuality, led to the development of liberty and the recognition of the rights of man. A healthy social life was the result for those who were of the cultivated classes, and for those who, in hardly less degree, for those resident aliens who received the protection of the state. Women also, though not so free as men, enjoyed, even at Athens where they were most limited, liberties unknown to the Orientals. In the Hellenistic age they attained a position essentially similar to that of modern Europe. There were slaves belonging both to individuals and the state, but their lot was mitigated in general by a steadily growing humanity. The amenities of life were many, and were cultivated no less in the name of religion than of art, literature, and science. No less than to express the aims of the Hellenic spirit, the civilization of the Greeks was essentially a civilization from the life of the people without artificial constraints imposed from within, or overpowering influences coming from without; a fortune which no other great movement in art or letters can boast. Or art was largely developed in the service of religion; but owing to the circumstance that both grew side by side, springing from the heart of man, their reactions were mutual, art contributing to religion quite as much as it received. The creative genius of the Hellenic people expressed itself with singular directness and simplicity in forms clearly visualized and subject to the conditions of psychologically effective grouping in space or time. Their art is marked by the expressiveness of expression, imposed by a certain natural restraint due to the preponderance of the intellectual element over the purely sensuous. Its most characteristic product is the ideal type in which only enough individuality enters to give to the typical the concreteness of life. What has been said of art in the narrower sense applies equally to artistic letters. The types thus created, whether in sculpture, architecture, music, drama, history, or oratory, though not regarded with super-itious reverence, commanded themselves by the sheer force of inherent truth and beauty to succeeding generations, thus steadying the course of development and restraining the exuberant originality and the tendency to individualism. In the Hellenistic age, individualism gradually preponderated where the lessening power of creative genius did not lead to simple imitation.

The traditional views of the Hellenic peoples touching Nature and conduct, which did not differ widely from those of corresponding stage of culture, maintained themselves down to the 7th cent. of conduct. Along with and following the colonial and commercial expansion was the awakening intellectual curiosity, or rather the shock of surprise necessary to convert attention into question. The mythology of the Greeks had contained a vague theology, without authority indeed, but satisfactory because adequate to express the national thought. Ethics there was none, morality being customary. But the extending horizon of Hellenic thought discovered that customs differed widely in various lands; indeed, it is altogether likely that customs filled the quivers of the militant Sophists in the 5th cent. had its inception in the 6th and possibly the 7th cent. At any rate it furnished the fiery darts of the adversary until ethics was founded in reason by the quest of Sococrates for the universal, not in conduct, but in judgment. As ethics arose out of the irreconcilable contradictions of conduct, so natural philosophy sprung from the contradictions of mythical theology and in opposition thereto, and also from the strata of conceptions touching supernatural beings; one, growing out of a primitive animism, regarded their operations essentially from the point of view of magic, which refuses to be surprised at any result, be it never so ill-portioned to the means employed, so long as the mysterious word was spoken or the requisite act performed; the other, sprung from a worship of Nature in her most striking phenomena, was turned to order, and pertained to the moral order, in her operations. When natural philosophy arose in the 6th cent., it instinctively at first, then consciously, divested Nature of personality by stripping off the disguise of myth and substituting a plausible and reasoned tale founded on mechanical principles. This is the spirit which pervades pre-Socratic science and philosophy. The quest of Socrates for universally valid judgments on conduct directed thought to the laws of mind, which are teleologically construed to the laws of matter, which are mechanical; and thus in effect dethroned Nature, regarded as material, by giving primacy to mind. Henceforth Gr philosophy was destined, with relatively few and unimportant exceptions, to devote itself to the study of human conduct and to be essentially idealistic, even where the foundation, as with the Stoics, was ostensibly materialistic. More and more it became true of the Gr philosophers that they sought God, "if haply they might feel after him and find him," conscious of themselves as instruments of the human mind and defining philosophy as the endeavor to assimilate the soul to God.

The Homeric poems present a picture of Gr life as seen by a highly cultivated aristocratic society. The student must be familiar with the commoner of the Hellenic races.

6. Hellenic ality. Hence we are not to regard and Hellen- Homeric religion as the religion of the istic Re- Hellenic peoples in the Homeric age.

Our first clear view of the Hellenic commoner is presented by Hesiod in the 8th cent. Here we find, alongside of the worship of the Olympians, evidences of chthonian cults and abundant hints of human needs not satisfied by the well-regulated religion of the several city-states. The conventionalized monarchy of Zeus ruling over his fellow-Olympians is known to be a fiction of the poets, having just as much — no more — foundation, in fact, as the mythical overlordship of Agamemnon over the assembled princes of the Achaenians; while it caught the imagination of the Greeks and dominated their literature, each city-state possessed its own shrines sacred to its own gods, who might or might not be called by the names of Olympians. Yet the great shrines which attracted Greeks from every state, to the shrine of Zeus at Dodona (chiefly in the period before the 7th cent.) and Olympia, of Apollo at Delos and Delphi, and of Hera at Argos, were the favored abodes of Olympians. Only one other should be mentioned: that of Demeter at Eleusis. Her worship was of a different character, and the great reputed of her shrine dates from the 5th cent. If the Zeus of Olympia was predominantly the benign god of the sky, to whom men came in joyful mood to delight him with pomp and festive gatherings, performing feats of strength and prowess in the Olympic games, the Zeus of Dodona, and the Delphian Apollo, as oracular deities, were visited in times of doubt and distress. The 7th and 6th cents. mark the advent — or the coming into prominence — of deities whose appeal was to the deepest human emotions of ecstatic enthusiasm, of fear, and of hope. Among them we must mention Dionysus, the god of teeming Nature (see Dionysus), and Orpheus. With their advent comes an awakening of the individual soul, whose aspiration to commune with the essential unity of the Divine and to preserve a friendly relationship with the states. Private organizations and quasi-monastic orders, like those of the Orphics and Pythagoreans, arose and won countless adherents. Their deities found admission into older shrines, chiefly those of chthonian divinities like that of Demeter at Eleusis, and wrought a change in the spirit and to a certain extent in the ritual of the "mysteries" practised there. It was in these "mysteries" that the Christian Fathers, according to the mood or the need, polemical or apologetic, of the moment, set forth the diabolically instituted counterfeit, of the sacraments and ordinances of the church. The spirit and even the details of the observances of the "mysteries" are difficult to determine; but one must beware of accepting the hostile judgments of Christian writers who were in fact retapping upon the Greeks criticisms leveled at the church: both were blinded by partisanship and so misread the symbols.

If we thus find a true praeparatio evangelica in the Hellenistic developments of earlier Hellenic religion, there are parallel developments in the other religions which were adopted in the Hellenistic age. The older national religions of Persia and Egypt underwent a similar change, giving rise respectively to the worship of Mithra and of Isis, both destined, along with the chthonian mysteries of the Greeks, to be dangerous rivals for the conquest of the world of Christianity, itself a younger son in this prolific family of neo-sacredness of the human age. Hence, in consideration of these religious movements, the family resemblance of which with Christianity is becoming every day more apparent; but so much at least should be said, that while every candid observer of experience will agree that Christian moral content and adaptation to the religious nature of man, the difference in these respects was not at first sight so obvious that the successful rival might at the beginning of the contest have been confidently predicted. The Jews, on the contrary, with their historical past and contemporary Jewish life, the Hellenistic spirit, so, too, in matters of religion, it was the free development of living institutions that most strikingly distinguishes the Greeks from the Hebrews. They had priests, but were never ruled by them; they possessed a literature regarded with veneration, and in certain shrines treasured sacred writings containing directions for the practice and ritual of the cults, but they were neither intended nor suffered to fix for all time the interpretation of the symbols. In the 5th and 4th cents. the leaders of Gr thought rebuked the activity of certain priests, and it was not before the period of Rom dominion that priests succeeded even in a small measure in usurping the powers of the Hellenic oracles. The influence of Gr thought upon Jewish writings began to exercise an authority remotely comparable to that recognised among the Jews.

A most interesting question is that concerning the extent to which Gr civilization and thought had penetrated and influenced Judaism. During the three centuries before the advent of Jesus, Hellenism had been a power in Syria and Judaea. The earliest writings of the Hebrews showing this influence are Dn and the OT Apoc. Several books of the Apoc were composed in Gr. The LXX show strong influence of Gr thought. The LXX, made for the Jews of the Dispersion, early won its way to authority even in Pal, where Aram. had displaced Heb, which thus became a dead language known only to a few. NT quotations of the OT are almost without exception taken from the LXX. Thus the sacred literature of the Jews was for practical purposes Gr. Though Jesus spoke Aram., He unquestionably knew some Gr. Yet there is no clear evidence of special acquaintance with this thought, the presuppositions of which are Jewish or generally those of the Hellenistic age. All the writings of the NT were originally composed in Gr, though their authors differed widely in the degree of proficiency in the use of the language and in acquaintance with Hellenic thought. Their debt to these sources can be profitably considered only in connection with the individual writers; but one who is acquainted with the Heb and Gr literature instinctively feels in reading the NT that the national character of the Jews, as reflected in the OT, has all but vanished, remaining only as a subtle tension of national earnestness and as an imaginative coloring, except in the simple story of the Synoptic Gospels. But for the bitterness aroused by the destruction of Jerusalem, it is probable that the Jews would have yielded completely to Hellenic influences.

HELM, helm. See SHIPS.

HELMET, hel'met. See ARMS, ARMOR.

HELON, hēlon (יוֹ לְ, hōlōn, "valorous"); LXX B, Χαλάν, Chalān: The father of Eliab, the prince of the tribe of Zebulun (Nu 1 9; 2 7; 7 24; 10 16).

HELP: With the sense of the that which brings aid, support, or deliverance, "help" (nount (v.15) and vb.) represents a large variety of words in Heb and Gr (noun forms, Gr. participle, and vb). A principal Heb word is יָּפֵל "help", אֵזֶר, "to help," with the corresponding nouns יָּפַל, יָּפַל, "aid, help;" a chief Gr word is βοήθεια, βοήθεια (Mt 15 25; Mt 9 22.24, etc.). True help is to be sought for in Jeh, in whom, in the OT, the believer is constantly exhorted to trust, with the renouncing of all other confidences (Ps 20 2; 23 20; 42 5; 46 1; 115 9.10.11; 121 2; Isa 41 10. 13.14, etc.). In Rom 8 26 it is said, "The spirit also helpeth our infirmity," the vb. here (συναθλισμός) having the striking meaning of "to take hold along with one." In the story of Eden, Eve is spoken of as "a help meets" for Adam (Gen 2 18.20). The idea in "meet" is not so much "suitability," though that is implied, likeness, correspondence in nature (Vulg similitud simile). One like himself, as taken from him, the woman would be an aid and companion to the man in his tasks.

HELMETEET, help'mēt. See HELP.

HELP (διαντιδισθειμαι, antilæmpseis, I Cor 12 28): In classical Gr the word antilæmpseis means "remuneration," the hold one has on something, then perception, apprehension. But in Bib. Gr it has an altruistic meaning. Thus it is used in the LXX, both in the OT Scriptures and in the Apocrypha (Ps 22 19; 89 19; 1 Esd 8 27; 2 Macc 15 7). Thus we obtain a clue to its meaning in our text, where it has been usually understood as referring to the deacons, the following word κυβέρνεσις, τος "governments," being explained as referring to the presbyters.

Henry E. Dosker

HELVE, helv (יוֹ לְ, ἡλὼν, "wood," "tree"): The handle or wooden part of an ax. "The hand [m "iron"] slippeth from the helve" (m "tree"), Dt 19 5). The marginal reading suggests that "the ax is supposed to glance off the tree it is working on."

HEM (קָּרָסֵדְבֶּנ, kārsed-bōn): The classic instance of the use of "hem" in the NT is Mt 9 20 (cf 14 30), where the woman "touched the hem of his (Christ's) garment." The reference is to the fringe or tassel with its traditional blue thread which the faithful Israelite was directed to wear on the corners of the outer garment (Nu 15 37 ff; Dt 23 12). Great importance came to be attached to it, the ostentation of Pharisees making it very broad or large (Mt 22 5). Here the woman clearly thought there might be peculiar virtue in touching the tassel or fringe of Jesus' garment. Elsewhere the word is rendered BORDER (q.v.). See also DRESS; FRINGE.

HEMAM, hē'mam (Gen 56 22 and ERV). See HEMAM; HOMAM.

HEMAM, hē'man (יִּנְמָן, hēmān, "faithful"): The name of two men in the OT.

1. A musician and seer, a Levite, son of Joel and grandson of the prophet Samuel; of the family of the Kohathites (1 Ch 6 33), appointed by David as one of the leaders of the temple-singing (1 Ch 15 17; 2 Ch 5 12). He had 14 sons (and 3 daughters) who assisted their father in the chorus. Heman seems also to have been a man of spiritual power; is called "the king's seer in matters of God" (1 Ch 26 5; 2 Ch 35 15).

2. One of the noted wise men prior to, or about, the time of Solomon. He was one of the three sons of Mahol (1 K 4 31 [Heb 5 11]); also called a son of Zerah (1 Ch 2 6). Ps 88 is inscribed to Heman the Ezrahite, who is probably to be identified with the second son of Zerah.

Edward Baerg Polland

HEMATH, hē'math. See HAMMATH (1 Ch 2 55).

HEMDAN, hēm'dan (יִּנְמָנָן, hemdān, "pleasant"): A descendant of Seir, the Horite (Gen 36 29). Wrongly tr'd "Arman" by AV in 1 Ch 1 41 (RV "Hamran"), where the transcribers made an error in one vowel and one consonant, writing hemdān (יִּנְמָנָן) instead of hemdān (יִּנְמָנָן).

HEMLOCK, helm'lock. See GALL.

HEN, hen (יִּנְנָל, hēn, "favor"). In Zec 6 14, EV reads, "And the crowds shall be to Helem . . ." and to Hen the son of Zebaphiah. But as this person is called Josiah in ver 10, RV "for the kindness of the son of Zebaphiah" is probably right, but the text is uncertain. See JOSIAH.

HEN (הֵנַּס, hēnas): Mentioned in the accounts of the different disciples in describing the work of Jesus (Mt 23 37; Lk 13 34).

HENA, hē'na (יִּנְנָת, hēnāt; "Ava, Ana"): Named in 2 K 19 13, as one of the cities destroyed by Sennacherib along with Sepharvaim. It does not appear in a similar connection in 17 24. The text is probably corrupt. No reasonable identification has been proposed. Cheyne (EB, s.v.) says of the phrase "Hena and Ivah" that "underlying this is a witty editorial suggestion that the existence of cities called Hēnā and Hēnā respectively has passed out of mind (cf Ps 9 6[7]), for Hēnā, Hēnā, was "tweaked, clearly means 'he has driven away and overthrown' (so Tg, Sym.). He would drop Hēnā, Hommel (Expos 7 I X, 330) thinks that here we have divine names; Hena standing for the Arab. star-name al-han'a, and Ivah for al-lamaw'd. See IVAH.

HENADAD, hen'a-dad (יִּנְנָדַד, hēnāddād, "favor of Hadad"); LXX Ἡνᾶδας, Ἡνᾶδας; Ἡνᾶδας, Ἡνᾶδας; Ἡνᾶδας, Ἡνᾶδας [Exx 3 9; Neh 3 18.24; 10 9]): One of the heads of the Levites in the post-exilic community.

HENNA, hē'na (Cant 1 14; 4 13): An aromatic plant.

HENOCH, hē'noch (יִּנְנָכ, hēnāk; Ev'n, Henōch; in 1 Ch 1 3 AV RV, "Enoch"); in Gen 25 4, AV and RV “Hanoch”; 1 Ch 3:33, AV “Henech,” RV “Hanoch”): The name of a Midianite, a descendant of Abram.

HEPHAER, hê-fee’r, HEPHERITES, hê-fer-its (םֶפֶה, hêpher, ἱφερ, hêphēr):
1. LXX ὦφερ, Ἡφερ (Nu 36 32 f.; 27 1; Josh 17 3), the head of a family or clan of the tribe of Manasseh. The clan is called the Hophrites in Nu 36 32.
2. LXX Ἰαβᾶ, Ἡφαβᾶ (1 Ch 4 6), a man of Judah.
3. LXX ὦφερ, Ἡφερ (1 Ch 11 30), one of David’s heroes.

HEPHZIBAH, hêf-si’-ba (יְפֶצִיבָה, ἱφεζίβα, “my delight is in her”):
1. LXX ὠψάει, Ὑψάει, Ἀψάει, Ὑψάει, ὦψάει, Ὑψάσει, Ὑψάσσει, the mother of Manasses (2 K 21 19).
2. The new name of Zion (Isa 62 4); LXX translates Θεοῦ λύβα, Θιλένα ἐμοί, “my delight.”

HERAKLES, hêr’a-kle’s (Ἡρακλῆς, Hēraklēs). See HERCULES.

HERALD, her’a-ld: The word occurs once (Dnl 3 4) as the tr. of the Aram. word צבָזִי, ἡραλίς (cf ἐραλίς, khrus): “Then the herald cried aloud.” See also GAMES.

HERB, hûr’b, urch, herb:
1. צְבָזִי, yârâb, “green thing” (Ex 10 15; Isa 15 6); “a garden of herbs” (Dt 11 10; 1 K 21 2); “a dinner, portion of herbs” (Prov 15 17).
2. צְבָזִי, ἑαβῆ; cf Arab. ʿushb, “herbage,” “grasses,” “herbs yielding seed” (Gen 1 11); “herb or grass for seed” (Gen 1 30; Jer 14 10); a “gras[es]” (Dt 15 15; Am 7 2); “herbs” (Prov 27 25, etc).
3. צְבָזִי, deshe’, tr “herb” (2 K 19 26; Prov 27 25; Isa 37 27; 66 14 AV); but generally GRASS (q.v.).
4. צְבָזִי, ᥣָץ, vegetation generally, but tr GRASS (q.v.).
5. צְבָזִי, צְבָזִי, ʿôrûkh (pl only), “green plant” or “herbs.” In 2 K 4 39 the Talm interprets it to mean “cadowel,” but it may mean any edible herbs which had survived the drought. In Isa 26 19 the expression “dew of herbs” is in tr “dew of light,” which is more probable (see DREW), and the tr “heat upon herbs” (Isa 18 4 AV) is in RV tr “clear heat in sunshine.”
6. בָּרָה, בָּרָה (He 6 7).
7. λαίκας, λαίκανα = yârâb (Mt 13 32). See also BITTER HERBS. E. W. G. Masterman

HERCULES, hûr’k-kl’s (Ἡρακλῆς, Hēraklēs): The process of Hellenezing the Jews which began at an earlier date was greatly promoted under Antiochus Epiphanes (175–164 BC). Jason, who supplemented his brother Onias in the office of high priest by promising Antiochus an increase of tribute, aided the movement by setting up under the king’s authority a Gr palaestra for the training of youth in Gr exercises, and by registering the inhabitants of Jerusalem as citizens of Antioch (2 Mac 4 8 f.). Certain of these Antiochians of Jerusalem sent to Tyre, where games were held every five years in honor of Hercules, that is, the national Tyrian deity Melkart, identified with Baal of OT history. According to Jos (Ant, VII, v, 3) Hiram, king of Tyre in the days of Solomon, built the temple of Hercules and also of Astarte. Jason’s deputies carried 300 drachmas of silver for the sacrifice of Hercules, but they were so ashamed of their commission that they thought it not right to use the money for any sacrifice, and “on account of present circumstances it went to the equipment of the galleys” (2 Mac 4 18–20). HERD, hûrd. See CATTLE.

HERDSMAN, hûrd’s-man (יוּדּ, bóker; AV, ERV “herdsman”): A cowherd (Am 7 14). The same word is used in Syria today. יוד, ’roeh, has its equivalent in the language of Syria and Pal (Arab. ra’), and is a general term for any kind of a herdsman (Gen 15 7:8; 26 20; 1 S 21 7). יוד, nâḵēḏa, occurs in one passage (Am 1 1); lit. it means one who spots or marks the sheep, hence a herdsman. Spotting the wool with different dyes is still the method of distinguishing between the sheep of different flocks. The herdsman is solely the owner of the sheep, but a hireling. See SHEEP; SHEEP TENDING. James A. Patch

HERE, hêr, in composition:
Hereafter, hêr-af’ (here this present and after) represents Heb ʾaḥār, “hinder part,” “end” (Isa 41 23), “the things that are to come hereafter” (ʾāḥār after, behind the present), with ʾān, “this,” ʾāḥār ʾān, “the time after, behind” (Gen 29 30; Ex 20 20). Gr α’π’ ἀρτ”, “from now,” (Mt 26 64), “Hereafter ye shall see the Son of man sitting on the right hand of power, and coming in the clouds of heaven,” which does not mean “at a future time,” according to the more modern usage of “hereafter,” but (as the Gr) “from now,” RV “henceforth”; Tindale and the chief VSS after him have “hereafter,” but Wiclif has “fora hennes forth.” Jn 1 51, “Hereafter ye shall see the heaven opened,” etc, where “hereafter” has the same meaning, it is omitted by RV after a corrected text (Wiclif also omits): ʾān, “yet,” “still,” “any more,” “any longer” (Jn 14 30, RV “I will no more speak much with you,” Wiclif, “now I shall not”); μετέο, “no more,” “no longer” (Mt 11 4, “no more bearing of fruit hereafter” RV “henceforward”); απ’ βο’ μυ’ν, “from now” (Lk 22 69, RV “From henceforth shall the Son of man be seated at the right hand of the power of God,” Wiclif “after this time”); meta tōta (Jn 15 7, “Thou shalt know [RV ‘understand’ hereafter,” Wiclif “afterward”).

Hereby, hêr-bi’, represents b’zōth, “in or by this” (Gen 42 15, “Hereby ye shall be proved); ek tolōw, “out of this” (Jn 4 6, RV “by this”); en toûtō, “in this” “by this mean” (1 Cor 4 4; 1 Jn 2 3.5; 3 16.19.24; 4 2.3.13).

Herein, hêr-in’, Heb b’zōth, “in! “or “by this” (Gen 34 22, RV “on this condition”); en toûtō (Jn 4 37; 9 30; 16 5; Acts 24 16; 2 Cor 8 10; 1 Jn 4 10.17).

Herewith, hêr-’w, Gr huper, “this” (Mt 9 26); kóttos, “this” (He 5 3, RV “thereof”).

Heretofore, hêr-ťō-fōr’, Heb t’mol, “yesterday,” “neither heretofore, nor since” (Ex 4 10; cf 5 7.8.14; Josh 3 4; Ruth 2 11; “aterno shalshôm, “yesterday,” “third day” (1 S 7 6), “There hath not been such a thing heretofore.”

Hereunto, hêr-un’-tü’; Gr eis toûto, “unto,” “with a view to this” (1 Pet 2 21, “For hereunto were ye called”: “hereunto” is supplied (Ecol 2 1375 THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA Helm Here 25, “Who else can hasten hereunto more than I,” R.V “who can have enjoyment,” m “hasten there to”.

Hereweth, hā-rāw’ēth, Heb bā-dō’îth, bra’dōth, “in,” “by,” or “with this” (Ex 16 29; Mal 3 10, “Prove me now herewith, saith Jeh’f”).

HEREDITY, bē-rē’d-i-ti: Heredity, in modern, logical and psychical, in their offspring, their qualities, their characteristics, physiological and psychical, in their offspring, the most uncultured peoples. The references to it in the Bible are of various kinds.

Curiously enough, little mention is made of physiological heredity, even in so simple a form as the resemblance of a son to his father, but there are a few references, e.g., the phrase “great giants for sons” (2 S 21 18–22; 1 Ch 20 4–8; cf Gen 6 4; Nu 13 33; Dt 1 28, etc). Moreover Dt 23 59–61 may contain a thought of hereditary diseases (2 S 21 18–22). On the psychological side the data are almost equally scanty. That a son should resemble his father may differ entirely is taken for granted and mentioned repeatedly (esp. in Ex 18 5–20). Even in the case of the king, the frequent changes of dynasty prevented such a phrase as “the seed royal” (2 K 11 1; Jer 41 1) from being taken very seriously. Yet, perhaps, the inheritance of mechanical dexterity is hinted at in Gen 4 20–22, if “father” means anything more than “teacher.” But, in any case, the fact that “father” could have this metaphorical sense, together with the corresponding use of “son” in such phrases as “son of Belial” (Jgs 19 22 AV), “son of wickedness” (Is 89 22), ‘sons of the prophets’ (Am 7 14m, etc), “son of the wise . . . of ancient kings” (Isa 19 11; this last phrase may be meant literally), shows that the inheritance of characteristics was a very familiar fact. See Son.

The question, however, is considerably complicated by the close solidarity that the Hebrews ascribed to the family. The individual.

2. Hebrew vidual was felt to be only a link in the Conception chain, his “personality” (very vaguely of Heredity conceived) somehow continuing in the family.

The two towns in association with Ir-shemesh and many authorities hold the pharohian sun, and, har, being perhaps a cognate for ἁρ, “city,” we have in Jgs 1 34 a reference to Beth-shemesh, the modern ‘Atin Shems. Conder thinks that ‘Batn Hardakeh, N.E. of Aijalon, a prominent hill, may be the place referred to. Budde thinks Har-heres may be identified with the Bit-Ninib (Ninib being the fierce morning sun) of the Am ‘Tar; this place was in the district of Jerusalem.

HERES, hā-re’s, hā-re’s: (1) חָרָה־מִים, har-heres, “Mount Heres” (Jgs 1 34 f), a district from which the Amorites were not expelled; it is mentioned along with Aijalon and Shalhim. In Josh 19 41 f we have then two towns in association with Ir-shemesh and many authorities hold the pharohian sun, and, har, being perhaps a cognate for ἁρ, “city,” we have in Jgs 1 34 a reference to Beth-shemesh, the modern ‘Atin Shems. Conder thinks that ‘Batn Hardakeh, N.E. of Aijalon, a prominent hill, may be the place referred to. Budde thinks Har-heres may be identified with the Bit-Ninib (Ninib being the fierce morning sun) of the Am ‘Tar; this place was in the district of Jerusalem.

(2) חָרָה מִים, ma’dō’hā he-heres, “the ascent of Heres” (Jgs 8 13, AV “before the sun was up”), the place from which Gideon returned to Succoth after his defeat of Zophah and Zalmona. RV is probably a great improvement in spelling, but both the text and the topography are uncertain.

(3) חָרָה הָרְאֹת, ἁρά-ερας, “City of Heres” E.Vn, “City of Destruction” (חָרָה, herem) EV, or “City of the sun” (חָרָה, heres) EVn. This is the name of one of the “five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jeh of hosts” (Isa 19 18). See also (4) חָרָה הָרְאֹת.
