It is this last element in the prophecy of J. that links his book particularly with the NT, for St. Peter quoted J.'s words in this passage as he went on the day of Pentecost, when the Spirit was poured forth on the assembled multitude (Acts 2:16ff.). Yet, even as the OT prophets one after another caught up the idea, unfolding and expanding it, so the NT writers see the approach of the day of the Lord in their own time (1 Thess 5:2; 2 Pet 3:10); for that day is always coming, always near, though still in the future. St. Paul saw the whole creation groaning and travailing in pain, as J. did, and the pouring out of the Spirit at Pentecost was part of, and also more than, the effusion seen by J. What J. said he said truly, though he could not say all. For "that day" has grown in significance as the ages have rolled on; men have seen its approach in the various commotions and upheavals of the world, depicting its features in the colors of the changing times, now praying for it, now dreading its approach; and how far from precision are our thoughts in regard to it still! Yet, early or late, unerring is the true word of prophecy.

The concrete historical situations crumble away and leave the eternal truth as fresh as ever: "Jehovah reigneth; let the earth rejoice" (Ps 97:1); it is the hopeful burden of OT prophecy, for "righteousness and justice are the foundation of thy throne" (Ps 89:14).

LITERATURE
The materials for the following sketch of the Johannine theology are necessarily drawn from the Fourth Gospel and the Epp. and First Ep. of St. John. The question of authorship is not here considered (see articles on the Gospel and on the Epp. of St. John). These writings, whether by the same or by different authors, are equally saturated with that spiritual and theological atmosphere equally characterized by that type of thought which we call Johannine, and which presents an interpretation of Christianity scarcely less distinctive and original than Paulinism. Where there are differences in the point of view, these will be indicated.

1. The Antecedents of the Theology.—To attempt a full account of the historical sources and antecedents of the Johannine theology is beyond the scope of the present article; but the following may be briefly indicated. Much must be attributed to the personality of the great anonymous writer to whom we directly owe this latest development of NT thought. Only a thinker of first rank among the idealists and mystics, a mind of the Platonic order, moving instinctively in the world of supersensuous realities, absorbed in the passion for the infinite, possessing in a supertative degree the gift of spiritual intuition, could under any conditions have evolved a system of thought having the special characteristics of this theology.

Yet with all his originality the builder has raised his structure upon the foundation already laid in the teaching represented by the earlier NT writings. The synoptic tradition, NT thought though freshly interpreted, is presupposed. At certain points there is a strong affinity with the Ep. to the He. In the main, however, the Johannine doctrine may be seen to be a natural and inevitable development of Paulinism—the conclusion to which the earlier writer's mind is visibly moving in e.g. the Ep. to the Col.

Among the influences which have stimulated and guided this development, the first place belongs to the natural growth of Christian experience. In the closing decades of the 1st cent. and Teach- Christianity was compelled by the force of events to liberate itself from the husk of Jewish Messianism in which its Divine seed had first been deposited. The faith of the first Christian generation in the Messiahship of Jesus and the triumph of His cause had expressed itself (necessarily so, under the historical conditions) in vivid expectation of His Second Coming. He was only waiting behind the clouds, and would speedily return to the earth for the restitution of all things (Acts 3:21). But after the fall of Jesus this primitive apocalypticism became, with the passing years, more and more discredited; and the Christian faith had either to interpret itself afresh, both to its own consciousness and to the world, or confess itself "such stuff as dreams are made of." It would be difficult to overestimate the service which the Johannine theology must have rendered in this hazardous transition by transferring the emphasis of Christian faith from the apocalyptic to the spiritual, and leading the church to a profounder realization of its essential and indelible resources in the new spiritual life it possessed through the ever-living Christ. Eternal life was not merely a future felicity, but a present possession; the most real coming of Christ, His coming in the Spirit. The Kingdom of God is here: the eternal is now. Such was the great message of St. John to his age, and to all ages.

In another direction, the widening contact of Christianity with the gentile world had stimulated the development of doctrine. A disentanglement from Jewish nationalism, involving contact more complete than that of St. Paul had with Gentile accomplished, had become a necessity. World

If Christianity was to find a home and a sphere of conquest in the Gr-Rom world—to recreate European thought and civilization—the person of Christ must be regarded as having a vastly larger significance than that of the Jewish Messiah. That this necessity hardened the process of thought which reached its goal in the Logos-doctrine of St. John cannot well be doubted. The way had so far been prepared by Philo and the Jewish-Alexandrian school. And while it is probably mere coincidence that Epheusus, with which the activity of St. John's later years is associated by universal tradition, was also the city of Heraclitus, who, 500 years earlier, had used the term Logos to express the idea of an eternal and universal Reason, immanent in the world, there is as little room as there can be motive for questioning that in the Johannine theology Christian thought has been influenced and fertilized at certain points by contact with Hellenism.

On the other hand it is possible that this influence has been overrated. Fresh material for the investigation of the sources and connections of the Jo-

5. The Odes of Solomon (J. Rendel Harris, M.J. Odes of Solomon, Cambridge, 1909; Adolf Harnack, Ein judisch-christliches Psalmbuch aus dem ersten Jahrtausend, Leipzig, 1910). This collection of religious poems is regarded by its dis-} covery, Rendel Harris, as the work of a writer who, while not a Jew, was a member of a community of Christians who for the most part of Jewish extraction and beliefs. But though the Odes in their present form contain distinctly Christian elements (references, e.g., to the Son, the Incarnation, the Second Birth, the Passion, the Resurrection), Harnack's closer analysis tends to the conclusion that in their original form they were purely Jewish, and that they have been adapted to Christian use by a process of interpretation. For the original work Harnack gives as an possible date the begin-} ning of the Christian era, the Christian passion and the fall within the 1st cent. Harnack recognizes a possibility that the redactor may have been acquainted with the Fourth Gospel. The religious feeling of the writer is throughout individual and mystical, rather than national-has resulted in great diversity of view regarding their origin. They have been assigned to Gnosticism, and on the other hand, are described (Bernard) as Christian baptismal hymns. In view of this division of critical opinion, it is hard to say whether the Gnostics are a collateral development or a true branch of the Gnostic symbology, which has been widely admitted. In this way both development, the recognition of which necessitates a revision of current assumptions which have been made regarding the extent to which the Johannine theology is indebted to Hellenistic philosophy.

One other factor in this theological development remains to be mentioned—antagonism to gnostic speculation. In the Gospel this has left the few traces, in the way both development, the recognition of which necessitates a revision of current assumptions which have been made regarding the extent to which the Johannine theology is indebted to Hellenistic philosophy.

2. God Is... Light, Righteousness and Love. Righteousness and Love are the primary ethical qualities of the Divine nature: Life the energy by which they act; Light the self-revelation in which they are manifested throughout the spiritual universe. God is Love. He is the ultimate eternal Reality. He was "in the beginning" (Jn 1 1), or "from the beginning" (1 Jn 1 1; 2 13). These statements are made of the Logos, therefore a fortiors of God. But the Divine nature is not mere abstract being, infinite and eternal; it is being filled with that inscrutable element of energy which we call Life. In God this energy of life is self-originating and self-sustaining ("The Father hath life in himself," Jn 6 26, and the consequent of all life, "the eternal life," which is the possession of which in fellowship with God is the chief end for which every spiritual nature exists. The Divine elements presuppose the Divine nature: Life are these: (1) The ethical: the life God lives is one of absolute righteousness (1 Jn 2 29), and perfect love (1 Jn 4 9). (2) The metaphysical: the Divine life is nothing else than the Divine nature itself, and of that nature, as the ground and source of all its own activities, the animating principle or energy which makes Divine righteousness and love to be not mere abstractions, but active realities. (3) In Johannine thought the Divine life is esp. an energy of self-reproduction. It is this by inherent moral necessity. Love cannot but seek to beget love, and righteousness to beget righteousness, in all beings capable of them. With St. John this generative activity of the Divine nature holds a place of unique prominence. It is this that constitutes the Fatherhood of God. Eternally the Father imparts Himself to the Son (Jn 5 26), the Word whose life from the beginning consisted in His relation to the Father (1 Jn 1 1; 2). To mankind the emanation of the Logos is the result of a Divine begetting (Jn 1 13; 3 15; 1 Jn 2 29; 3 9; 4 7, etc) by which they become "children of God" (Jn 1 12; 1 Jn 3 1, etc). (4) God is not only the transcendent final source, He is also the immanent source of Life. This is clearly implied in all those passages, too numerous to be quoted, which speak of God's abiding in us and our abiding in Him. Life is maintained only through a continuous vitalizing union with Him, as of the branches with the vine (Jn 15 1-4). It is observed, however, that St. John nowhere merges the idea of God in that of life. God is personal; life is impersonal. The eternal life is the element common to the personality of God, of the Logos, and of those who are the "children of God." Any pantheistic manner of thinking is as foreign to St. John as to every other Bib. writer.

God is not life only; He is Light also (1 Jn 5). That God is life means that He is and is self-incarnating; that He is life means that He is self-revealing. (1) As the essential property of light is to shine, so God by His very nature of righteousness and love is necessitated to reveal Himself as being what He is, so as to become the Truth (ἡ ἀλήθεια, ἡ ἀλθεία), the object of spiritual perception (γνώσεως, γνώστικη), and the source of spiritual illumination to enable a man to know the revelation of God as "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all." In God there is nothing that hides, nothing that is hidden. The Divine character is utterly transparent—goodness without a shadow of evil. (2) This self-revelation of God is given in its perfect form in Jesus, the incarnate Word, who is the light of men (Jn 1:4), the light of the world (Jn 8:12; 9:5), the true light (Jn 1:9; 1 Jn 2:5). (3) It is in their illumination by this Divine light that there exists, even for the sinful, a moral fellowship with God. We can "come to the light" (Jn 3:19—21) and "walk in the light" (1 Jn 1:7). In the translucent atmosphere of the true light, we, even while morally imperfect and impure, may come to have a common view of spiritual facts with God (1 Jn 1:5—10; 2:9,10). This is the basis of a spiritual religion, and distinguishes Christianity from all irrational superstitions and unethical rituals. In gnostic speculation the Divine nature was conceived as a spiritual essence, in eternal separation from all that is material.

4. Ethical and mutable. But while St. John Attributes also, as we have seen, conceives it in this way, with him the conception is primarily and essentially spiritual. The communication of which is life and the revelation of which is light, has, as its two great attributes, Righteousness and Love; and with his whole soul St. John labors to stamp on the minds of men that all righteousness and love can only shine in God's light and have fellowship in the life of God. It is characteristic of St. John's intuitive fashion of thought that there is no effort to correlate these two aspects of the ethical perfection of God; but, broadly, it may be said that they are respectively the negative and the positive. Love is the sum of all that is positively right; righteousness the antithesis of all that is wrong, in character and conduct.

God is righteous.—(1) That such righteousness—antagonism to all sin—belongs to, or rather is, the moral nature of God, and that this lies at the basis of Christian ethics is categorically affirmed. "If ye know that he is righteous, ye know that every one also that doeth righteousness is begotten of him" (1 Jn 3:9). (2) This belongs to the inward character of God extends necessarily to all His actions: "If we confess our sins, he is faithful and righteous to forgive us our sins" (1 Jn 1:9). When on the ground of Christ's propitiation God forgives those who by confessing their sins make themselves possible, He acts "rightously; and because He acts righteously, He acts also faithfully, that is, consistently. He does not "deny himself" (2 Tim 2:13), but does what is in accordance with His own unchangeable character. (3) God's righteousness is related imperatively to the whole moral activity of His creatures, rendering sin inadmissible in them—inadmissible de jure in all, de facto in all who are "begotten of him." This St. John maintains with unexampled vigor (cf 1 Jn 2:29; 3:5—10; 5:18). It is true, however, that in its doctrine of Divine righteousness the Johannine theology makes no notable contribution to the sum of NT thought, but simply restates in peculiarly forceful fashion the conception of it which pervades the whole Bib. revelation.

(1) The love of God.—It is far otherwise with the next of the great affirmations which constitute its doctrine of God: God is love. Love is the Gospel and Epistle rise to the summit of all revelation, and for the first time clearly and fully enunciates the truth which is the innermost secret of existence.

(a) Primarily a disposition: Love is primarily a disposition, a moral quality of the will. What this quality is is indicated by the fact that the typical object of love in human relation is invariably our "brother." It is the disposition to act toward others as it is natural for those to do who have all interests in common and who realize that the full self-existence of each can be attained only in a larger corporate existence. It is the mysterious power by which egoism and altruism meet and coalesce, the power to live not only for another but in another, to realize one's own fullest life in the fulfillment of other lives. It is self-communication which is also self-natural fellowship.

(b) Embodied in Christ's self-sacrifice: In history love has its one perfect embodiment in the self-sacrifice of Christ. "Hereby know we love [i.e. perceive what love is], because he laid down his life for us" (1 Jn 3:18). The world had never been without love; but till Jesus Christ came and laid down His life for the men that hated and mocked and slew him, it had not known what love in its greatness and purity could be.

(c) Love in redemption: But here history is the invisible translated into the visible. The self-sacrifice of Christ in laying down His life for us is the manifestation (1 Jn 4:9), under the conditions of time and sense, of the love of God, eternal and incorporeal.

5. God is love. (1) Love of God. —God is love (1 Jn 4:8,16). (a) God is love essentially. Love is not one of God's moral attributes, but that sum which they all proceed, and in which they all unite. The spring of all His actions is love. (b) Therefore also His love is universal. In a special sense He loves those who are spiritually His children (Jn 14:23); but His undivided and exclusive love is also to the whole world (Jn 3:16; 1 Jn 2:2). That is St. John's great truth. He does not attempt to reconcile with it other apparently conflicting truths in his theological scheme; possibly he was not conscious of any need to so do. But of this he is sure—God is love. That fact must, in ways we cannot yet discern, include all other facts. (c) The love of God is eternal and unchangeable, for it does not depend on any merit or reciprocation in its object, but overflows from its own infinite fulness. We may refuse to it the inlet into our life which it seeks (Jn 3 19, 8 40); we may so identify ourselves with evil as to turn it into an antagonistic force. But as we eschew evil and call it forth, neither can our evil cause it to cease. (d) If love is an essential, the essential attribute of God, it follows that we cannot ultimately conceive of God as a simple single personality. It is at this point that the fuller Johannine conception of multiple personality in the Godhead becomes most helpful, enabling us to think of the Divine life in itself not as an eternal solitude of self-contemplation and self-love, but as a life of fellowship (Jn 1 1, 1 Jn 4 2). The Godhead is filled with love: “The Father loveth the Son” (Jn 3 35); and the prayer of the Son for His followers is “that the love wherewith thou lovest me may be in them” (Jn 17 26). The eternal giving and receiving of Divine love between the Father and Son is, in the Johannine understanding, an essential element of the Divine nature.

III. The Incarnation.—The 2d great contribution of the Johannine writings to the development of Christian theology is their doctrine of Christ—the love of God manifested within Nt times to relate intellectually the church’s faith in Jesus to its faith in God. In these writings the superhuman personality of Jesus is expressed by three titles which are used as practically synonymous (Jn 1 18): “Son of God,” “only begotten Son of God”), the “Word” (Logos). The last alone is distinctly Johannine.

Historically, the Logos-doctrine of St. John has undoubted links of connection with certain speculative developments both of Gr and Heb thought. The Heraclitean use of the term “Logos” (see above, I) to express the idea of an eternal and all-embracing Reason immanent in the world was one; while the concept was further elaborated, by the Stoics. On the other hand, the later developments of Heb thought show an increasing tendency to personify the self-revealing activity of God under such conceptions as the Angel, Glory, Shekinah, etc., in the life of Christ. In special significant to the “Word” (μαθηματικαί) by which He created the heaven and the earth, and to describe “Wisdom” (Job, Prov) in something more than a figurative sense as His agent and co-worker. These approximations of Gr pantheism and Heb monothelism were more verbal than real; and, naturally, Philo’s attempt in his doctrine of the Logos to combine philosophies so radically divergent was less successful than it was courageous. How far, and whether directly or indirectly, St. John is indebted to Philo and his school, are questions to which widely different answers have been given; but some obligation, probably indirect, cannot reasonably be denied. It is evident, indeed, that both the idea and the term “Logos” were current in the Christian circle for which his Gospel and First Ep. were immediately written; in both its familiarity is assumed. Yet the Johannine doctrine has little in common with Philo’s except the name; and it is just in its most essential features that it is most original and personal. As the First Ep. begins with the affirmation, “In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth,” so the Fourth Gospel begins with the similar affirmation, “In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God, and the Word was God” (Jn 1 1). The Word was the medium of Divine action in creation (Jn 1 3). In the Word was life, not merely self-existing but self-imparting, so that it became the light and life of men (Jn 1 4)—the true light, which, in the earth, shines into every man (Jn 1 9). And finally it is declared that this Divine Word became flesh and tabernacled among us, so that “we beheld his glory, glory as of the only begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth” (Jn 1 14). Here faith in Jesus as Divine has been traced back to, and grounded in, a duality within the Godhead itself. In the twofold mode of the Divine existence, it is seen that there is God who is just God (so to say), God in Himself; and there is God-with-God, God who is God’s other self, God going forth from Himself in thought and action. The first without the second would be essence without manifestation, mind without utterance, light without effulgence, life without giving, fatherhood without sonship. It is seen that within the Divine Being there is one through whom, as there is also one from whom, all Divine energy goes forth. Above all it is seen that there is a Divine mode of existence in which it is inherently possible and natural for God immediately to relate to created being and even to become incarnate in humanity, as there is also a mode of Divine existence which cannot be immediately communicated or revealed to created life. Thus the Johannine notion within Nt times relates intellectually the church’s faith in Jesus to its faith in God.

In the Gospel the term “Logos” does not recur after the opening verses; yet the thesis of the Prologue, so far from being irrelevant, dominates the entire biographical presentation. The creative and cosmic significance of the Logos-Christ is naturalized in the fact that the Word became flesh” (Jn 1 14). The Fourth Gospel in the Epistle (4 22, 5 20) of men; the supreme moral authority (14 15); the hearer of prayer (14 14); the giver of the Spirit (7 38, 17 6); and endowed with all the prerogatives of God (5 23; 10 30, 36—38).

In the First Ep. the central thesis is the complete, personal, and permanent identity of the historical Jesus with the Divine Being who is the Word of Life (1 1), the Christ and Son of God (5 5). This Incarnation is maintained in a vigorous polemic against certain heretical teachers whom the writer calls “antichrists,” who in docetic fashion denied that Jesus is the Christ (2 22), or, more definitely, the “Christ come in the flesh” (4 3), and who asserted that He was begotten not by God only but by blood also (5 6; see John Epistles of). Against this doctrine of a merely apparent or temporary association of Jesus with the Christ St. John bears vehement testimony. "Who is the liar but he that denieth that Jesus is the Son of God?" (1 Jn 4 3).
the Christ?" (22). 'Every spirit that confesseth Jesus as Christ come in the flesh is of God: and every spirit that confesseth not Jesus is not of God' (4 2). 'Who is he that overcometh the world, but he that believeth that Jesus is the Son of God? This is he that came by water and blood, even Jesus Christ; not with the water only, but with the water and with the blood' (5 6). These passages all promulgate the same truth in substantially the same way. Without ceasing to be what He is, the Christ, the Son of God, has become Jesus; and Jesus, without ceasing to be truly human, is the Son of God. As to the manner of the incarnation—by what process of self-emptying or by what conjunction of Divine-human attributes the eternal Son became Jesus—the Johannine writings, like the NT everywhere, are silent. They proclaim Jesus Christ as human and Divine; but the distinguishing of what in Him was human and what Divine, or whether the one is distinct from the other, this they do not even consider. Gnosticism drew such a distinction; St John does not. His one truth is that Jesus is the Son of God and the Son of God is Jesus, and that in Him the life of God was manifested. This is given (5 1).

In this truth, viewed in its practical consequences, St John sees the core of the church's faith and the root and safeguard of its life. (a) 5. Practical This alone secures and guarantees the Implications of the manifestation of the Son of God. The denial that revelation is canceled. Incarnation "Whousoever denieth the Son, the same hath not the Father" (23). (b) Above all, it is only in the life and death of Jesus, the incarnation, that we possess a valid representation of God's self-sacrificing love. "Herein was the love of God manifested in us, that God hath sent his Son into the world that we might live through him" (4 9). With the denial of this the Christian ethic is drained of its very life-blood. There was no merely external and accidental connection between Docetism and the moral indifferentism of the Gnostic. The natural result of making man's salvation easy, so to say, for God, was to make it easy for man also—salvation by creed without conduct (2 4 6; 3 7), knowledge without love (4 8), or love that paid its debts with goodly phrases and empty words (3 17 18). A docetic Christ meant docetic Christianity. (c) Finally, St John sees in the incarnation of the Son of God the only possible redemption. It was not for a word or a formula he was concerned, but for the raising of humanity to Divine life through the God-man. The ultimate significance of the incarnation of the Son is that in Him the eternal life of God has flowed into our humanity and become a fountain of regenerative power to as many as receive Him (1 Jn 1 12). "He that hath the Son hath the life; he that hath not the Son of God hath not the life" (1 Jn 5 12). This is the incarnation of the Spirit as the agent of human Christ, who stands in a unique, vital relation to men, reproducing in them His own character and experiences as the vine reproduces itself in the branches, doing that, the mysterious reality of which is only expressed, not explained, when it is said that He is our "life" (Jn 14 19 20; 15 5).

IV. The Holy Spirit.—In one direction the doctrine of the Holy Spirit is uniquely developed in the Johannine writings. The conception of the Work of the Christ's presence with and activity in the church is presented with a fulness and cleanness unequalled in the Gospel NT. The departing Christ promises his friends a new friend, different from Himself in own in that it was to be not a bodily but a spiritual presence, and yet really His own—a presence in which all and more than all the effects of His bodily presence would be perpetuated (Jn 14 18; 16 22). In truth, it was expedient for them that He should go away, in order that this other Paraclete Son of God (16 7). In the body His presence with His followers had been local and intermittent; in the Spirit He would come to take up His abode with them forever (16 16). Formerly He had been still external to them, but now was not only to dwell with them, but to be in them (16 17). Instead of the external voice of their Teacher addressing to them the words of eternal life, they should possess the very Spirit of truth (16 17), a well-spring of illumination from within, giving them an 'understanding' to know Him that is true (1 Jn 5 20); and instead of His visible example before their eyes, an inward community of life with Him like that of the vine and the branches. The complete, vital, permanent union of Christ and His people, which had been prevented by the necessary limitations of a local, corporeal state of existence, would be attained, when for this there was substituted the direct action of spirit upon spirit. Perpetuates, but also intensifies the consciousness of Christ.—Then the function of the Paraclete, as chiefly emphasized in the Johannine writings is that by which He perpetuates but also intensifies, enlightens, and educates the consciousness of Christ in the church and in the Christian life. In this respect His nature is that of the Logos, the self-revealing God. The Holy Spirit never reveals Himself to human consciousness; He reveals the Son and the Father through the Son. His operations are wholly secret and incalculable, known to them only, and only is this result (Jn 3 8). He is this silent inward monitor and remembrancer of the disciples (Jn 14 20); the illuminator, the revealer of Christ (16 14); a spirit of witness who both Himself bears witness concerning Christ to His people and makes of them ready and joyful witness-bearers (15 26 27); a guide by whom a steady growth in knowledge is secured, leading gradually on to the full truth of Christ (16 12 13); a spirit of conviction working in men an immediate certainty of the truth regarding sin and righteousness, and the Divine judgment which marks their eternal antagonism (16 8 11).

In the Ep. we find the promise of the Gospel accomplished in actual experience. There is no record of the manner of His sending. But that the Holy Spirit was coming of the first age, the prophetic alius of the First excepted (1 Jn 4 1). But whether Epistle through the prophetic "medium" or the normal Christian consciousness, the function of the Spirit is always to "teach" or to "witness" concerning Christ. This is finely brought out in the parallelism of 1 Jn 5 6: "This [Jesus Christ] is he that came" (once for all fulfilling the Messiah's mission); "It is the Spirit that beareth record, whatsoever His Spirit witnesseth to every man that heareth the words of His mouth" (Jn 15 26). The specific testimony the Spirit bears to Christ is defined (1 Jn 4 23); "Hereby know ye the Spirit of God; every spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh is of God; and every spirit that confesseth not Jesus is not of God." (1) A Divine Teacher.—The gift of the Spirit is an "anointing from the Holy One" (1 Jn 2 20); and the result of this "anointing" is that "we know all things" (or that "ye all know how long", the reading is doubtful), and "need not that any one teach you" (2 27). The apostle's comfort concerning his readers, encompassed as they are by the snares of Aesence, different from his own in that it was to be not a bodily but a spiritual presence, and yet really His own—a ters to them an invincible assurance of the truth of the Gospel. “The anointing abideth in you, and teacheth you concerning all things.” The spirit is not a source of independent revelation, but makes the revelation of Christ effectual. The truth is placed beyond all reach of controversy and passed into absolute knowledge. “Ye know all things.” It may be added that the history of Christianity furnishes an always growing verification of this Johannine doctrine of a living power of witness and enlightenment present in the church, by which, notwithstanding the converse of human imperfection, the development of the Christian faith has been steadily advanced, its forgotten or neglected factors brought to remembrance. Old truths have been presented in new aspects and filled with fresh life, and all has been brought to pass with marvelous adaptation to the church’s needs and in proportion to its receptivity.

(2) Other aspects.—In other directions the doctrine of the Spirit is less developed. The agency of the Spirit in regeneration is repeatedly and emphatically declared in a single passage (Jn 3:5-8), but is nowhere else referred to either in the Gospel or the First Ep. More repeatedly referred to in the Gospel nor Ep. is the Spirit once spoken of as the Divine agent in sanctification. This sense is also present in John’s declaration that in which St. John speaks of the ethical “fruit of the Spirit” (Gal 5:22,23). The Spirit is the spirit of truth, the revealer, the inspirer of all truth spoken of as the spirit of love and holiness. If those who are begotten of God cannot sin, it is simply in the sense that “he cannot sin” because “this spirit abideth in them” (1 Jn 3:9). The explanation of this peculiarity (which has been little observed) in the Johannine theology may be that the Spirit’s work of revealing Christ is regarded as all-inclusive. Thus enabling Christ’s disciples to abide in the vine, he assures also their bringing forth “much fruit” in all Christlikeness of character and conduct.

Passing now from the work to the Person, we observe that in the Fourth Gospel the attribution of the work to the Spirit reaches the same of distinctness. He is person “another Paraclete” (Jn 14:16 m.), personal to Christ Himself is personal; and all the functions ascribed to Him to remind, to teach, to testify, to guide, to convict—such are as are possible only to a personal being. Nor is it otherwise in the First Ep. The expressions in it in which have been alleged (Pfleiderer and others) as inconsistent with personality (the “anointing,” 2 Jn 17) have been given various interpretations; but none such interpretation. The “anointing” denotes the Spirit, not in His essence or agency, but as the gift of the Holy One with which He anoints believers (John 7:38,39), and the expression “He hath given unto me both this name and the glory” is no more incompatible with personality than is the saying “to Him whom he hath sent . . . , God giveth not the Spirit by measure” (Jn 3:4), or than our speaking of Christians as having more or less of the Spirit.

His Deity implied.—The essential Deity of the Spirit is nowhere explicitly asserted, but is necessarily implied in His relation both to Christ and to the church as the “other Paraclete.” There is not, however, the same theological development as is achieved regarding the Logos. The Divinity of Christ is grounded in an essential duality of being within the Godhead itself; but there is no similar effort to trace back the threefoldness in the revelation of God, as Father, Son, and Spirit, to an essential threefoldness in the Divine nature. The fact is that both historically and logically the doctrine of the Spirit as the third person in the Godhead depends upon that of the Divine Son as the second. It was through its living experience in Christ that the church first developed its thought of God beyond the single monothelion of the OT; but having advanced to the conception of a twofold Godhead, in which there is Fatherhood and Sonship, it was bound to enlarge it still further to that of a threefold Godhead—Father, Son and Spirit. The Son and the Spirit were equally manifestations of God in redemption, and must equally stand in essential relation to the Divine existence.

V. Doctrine of Sin and Propitiation.—This theme is not elaborately developed, but characteristic of the Johannine views that salvation is looked at from the terminus ad quem rather than from the terminus a quo. The infinite good, eternal life, is more in view than the infinite evil, sin. It seems safe to assert that the same range of human imperfection, the development of the Christian faith has been steadily advanced, its forgotten or neglected factors brought to remembrance. Old truths have been presented in new aspects and filled with fresh life, and all has been brought to pass with marvelous adaptation to the church’s needs and in proportion to its receptivity.

1. Sin. It is true that the Spirit not only takes away the sin of the world (Jn 1:29), but also draws it forth in its utmost intensity and guilt. All sin culminates in the rejection of Christ (15:22); the spirit convicts men of sin because they have sinned (10:19). “No one who abides in Christ” is a servant of righteousness (Rom 6:1). The sin of the world (Jn 1:29), but also draws it forth in its utmost intensity and guilt. All sin culminates in the rejection of Christ (15:22); the spirit convicts men of sin because they have sinned (10:19). “Every one who has sinned is the bond-servant of sin” (8:34); but what reveals the true character of this bondage is that in the presence of the light, men “loved the darkness” (8:19). That the malign quality and power of evil are fully revealed only in the presence of the light, but that the brightness of the light, the darker is the shade of guilt created by its rejection—all this St. John teaches; but such teaching is by no means peculiar to him, and to infer from it that “to his mind sin in itself involves no moral culpability” is nothing more than a wayward paradox.

In the Ep., the guilt of sin as constituting an objective disability to fellowship with God is strongly emphasized. “If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves” (1 Jn 1:8). The phrase “to have sin” is peculiar to St. John, and specifically denotes the culpability of the agent (cf Jn 9:41; 15:22,24; 19:11). Sin is essentially that which needs God’s forgiveness (1 Jn 1:9; 2:1-2); and to this end an intercessor (1:1-3) is provided. Such culpability is universal: “If we say that we have not sinned, we”—not only deceive ourselves—“we make him a liar” (1 Jn 1:10).

A second passage (1 Jn 3:4-8) emphasizes the ethical quality (as it is a divided entity) no more incompatible with personality than is the saying “to Him whom he hath sent . . . , God giveth not the Spirit by measure” (Jn 3:4), or than our speaking of Christians as having more or less of the Spirit.

His Deity implied.—The essential Deity of the Spirit is nowhere explicitly asserted, but is necessarily implied in His relation both to Christ and to the church as the “other Paraclete.” There is not, however, the same theological development as is achieved regarding the Logos. The Divinity of Christ is grounded in an essential duality of being within the Godhead itself; but there is no similar effort to trace back the threefoldness in the revelation of God, as Father, Son, and Spirit, to an essential threefoldness in the Divine nature. The fact is that both historically and logically the doctrine of the Spirit as the third person in the Godhead depends upon that of the Divine Son as the second. It was through its living experience in Christ that the church first developed its thought of God beyond the single monothelion of the OT; but having advanced to the conception of a twofold Godhead, in which there is Fatherhood and Sonship, said, to expound a doctrine of propitiation; yet his frontispiece to the ministry of Jesus is "the Lamb of God that taketh away the sin of the world"; and, as Dr. Inge has pointed out, the Paschal Lamb underlies the whole narrative of the Passion. In the high-priestly prayer Our Lord expressly represents Himself as the covenant-sacrifice which consecrates His disciples as the people of God (17:19); while the Synoptic "ransom for many" is paralleled by the interpretation of Christ's death as effectual "for the nation; and not for the nation only, but that he might also gather together into one the children of God that are scattered abroad" (11:51,52; cf 1 Jn 2:2).

2. In the Epistle.—In the Ep. the doctrinal statement is much more explicit. The fact of propitiation is placed in the forefront. The passage which immediately follows the Prologue (1:6—2:2) introduces a group of ideas—propitiation, blood, forgiveness, cleansing—which are taken directly from the sacrificial system of the OT, and are expressed, indeed, in technical Levitical terms. The mode of action by which Christ accomplished and still accomplishes His mission as the Saviour of the world is: He is the propitiation for our sins; and not for ours only, but also for the whole world" (2:2). Propitiation has its ultimate source in the moral nature of God. It is no device for inducing a reluctant Deity to forgive; it is the way by which the Father stirs up His children to Himself. In St. John's conception it is the supreme act of God's supreme attribute, love. "Herein is love" (4:10). Yet it is a real work of propitiation in which this love goes forth for man's salvation—a work, that explains the guilt of the sin, which restores sinful offenders to God by rendering their sin null and ineffectual as a barrier to fellowship with Him. This propitiatory virtue is regarded as concentrated in the "blood of Jesus his Son" (1:7), that is to say, in the Divine-human life offered to God in the sacrifice of the cross. This, if we walk in the light as He is in the light, "cleanseth us from all sin"—removes from us the stain of our guilt, and makes us clean in God's sight. In virtue of this, Christ is the penitent sinner's advocate (paraclete-helper) with the Father (2:1). The words "with the Father" are highly significant. Even the Father's love can urge nothing in apology for sin, nothing that avails to absolve from its guilt. But there is one who can urge on our behalf when at once the strongest condemnation of our sin and plea for its remission—Himself, "Jesus Christ the righteous" (2:1). And he [Himself] is the propitiation for our sins. St. John does not speak of Christ as "making propitiation": He, Himself, in virtue of all He is—Jesus Christ, in whom the Divine ideal of humanity is consummated, in whom the Father sees His own essential righteousness revealed, Jesus Christ the Righteous—is both propitiation and Advocate. This conception is not only united in one person, but constitute the one reconciling work by which there is abiding fellowship between God and His sinning people.

3. One with NT teaching.—In this statement of the doctrine of propitiation, memorable as it is, there is nothing notably original. It tacitly presupposes, as NT teaching everywhere does, that God, in bestowing the sovereign grace of pardon and sonship, must deal truthfully and adequately with sin as a violation of the moral order; and with Christ, as with other NT writers, the necessity and efficacy of sacrifice as the means by which this is accomplished are simply axiomatic. His great contribution to Christian thought is the vision of that spiritual heart of things suggestive these two statements when placed side by side! "Herein is love . . . that he loved us, and sent his Son to be the propitiation for our sins" (1 Jn 4:10); and "Hereby know we love [recognize what it is], because he laid down his life for us" (3:16). He is sending His Son and laying down His life are mere equivalents. The sacrifice of Christ is the sacrifice of God. St. John's doctrine of propitiation follows as a moral necessity from his doctrine of God. If God is love, nothing is more inevitably true than that He suffers on account of man. And if God is love, the power to help and save men by bearing their burden would be to deny to Him love's highest prerogative.

VI. Eternal Life.—The development of the conception of eternal life must be set along with the development of the doctrine of the moral nature of God and the frontine of the incarnation as one of the greatest contributions of the Johannine theology to NT thought. With this conception the Gospel begins (1:4) and ends (20:31); and, in like manner, the Ep. (1:2; 6:28). The designation most frequently employed is simply "the life" (και ἀμών), 17 t in the Gospel and 6 t in the First Ep. It is described qualitatively as "eternal"; but the adj. brings out only what is implicit in the noun. In harmony with the universal Bib. conception, St. John regards the "hymnum bonum, in which the right of fellowship with God consists, which therefore fulfills the highest idea of being—"perfect truth in perfect action" (Westcott). Christ Himself is "the life" (Jn 14:6), its only bestower and unfailing source. But He came that we might have it abundantly (10:10).

But this conception is uniquely developed in two directions. While the eschatological element is not lost, it is absorbed in the ethical. The ideas of duration and futurity, which are properly absorbed by the adj. "eternal" (αιωνιος—belonging to an æon—specifically to "the coming æon"), become secondary to that of timeless moral quality. Always life is regarded as a present possession rather than as future felicity (e.g. Jn 3:36; 20:31; 1 Jn 3:14; 5:12). For St. John the question whether it is possible to make the best of both worlds is meaningless. Eternal life is the best, the Divine, kind of life, whether in this world or in the kind of life that has its perfect manifestation in Christ (1 Jn 1:2; 5:11). To possess that nature which produces thoughts and motives and desires, words and deeds like His, is to have eternal life.

Metaphysically the conception undergoes a development which is equally remarkable, the elimination of many, of more questionable value. It has already been noted that life is conceived as the animating principle or essence of the Divine nature, the inward energy of which all its activities are the manifestation and outgo. And this conception is carried through with strict consistency. The spiritual life in men, which is "begotten of God," is the vital essence, the mystic principle which is manifested in all the capacities and activities of Christian personality. It does not consist in, and still less is it a result flowing, repentance, faith, obedience or love; it is that of which these are the fruits and the evidence. Thus instead of "This do, and thou shalt live" (Lk 10:29), St. John says, conversely, "Hereby shall ye know that doth righteousness is [has been] begotten of [God] (1 Jn 2:29), the "end of faith" (Rom 1:17 AV). "Whosoever believeth that Jesus is the Christ is [has been] begotten of God" (1 Jn 5:1). The human activity which expresses the essence of Divine life already imparted, not the condition or manner of its attainment. In this Johannine conception life is cause, not effect; not phenomenon but essence; not the complex whole of the qualities, activities and experiences of the spiritual life of the individual, but that makes them possible—the Insurmountable, Divinely-comprehended principle (1 Jn 3:8). The capacity for them is given and by which also it is realized.

Reply to criticism.—This Johannine conception of life is vigorously criticized by some writers along the lines of Christian experience principles and modes of thought borrowed from Gr philosophy. But the tendency to infer causes from effects is to render phenomena to essence is not peculiar to Gr philosophy; it is native to the human intellect. The Johannine conception of spiritual life is closely analogous to the concept of physical life. We do not deceive that a man lives because he breathes and feels and says, "I live," but because he lives, because there is in him that mystic principle we call life. Only to the thinker trained in the logic of empiricalism, in which life is possible only to define life solely by its phenomena, as e.g. "the continuous adjustment of inert matter to external stimuli" (Spencer). The ordinary mind instinctively passes behind the phenomena to an entity of which they are the manifestation. The Johannine concep­tion of life, moreover, lies in the natural life, far-reaching development for NT thought. It is implicit in what Jesus himself refers to when he says God made man as He made the sheep (John 10:10). This is the meaning of the Johannine term for life, the "eternal life," which existed in relation to the Father (John 1:2). By the incarnation of the Son the eternal life of man in its Divine fulness has become incorporated with humanity, a permanent source of regenerative power to "as many as received him" (John 1:12). It is His very power to be the Father that He reproduces in men (John 17:23).

(3) Through the Spirit.—In the communication of this life the Spirit is the sole agent (John 3:5-8; see above, under IV).

The "begotten".—The act of Divine self-communciation is constantly and exclusively expressed by the word "begot" (genânän—John 1:18; 3:5-8; 1 John 2:29; 3:9, etc.). The word is of far-reaching significance. It implies not only that life has its ultimate origin in God, but that its com­munication is directly and solely His act. In how literal a sense the Divine begetting is to be understood appears very strikingly in John 3:9: "Who­soever is begotten of God doeth no sin; because his seed abideth in him." The unique expression "his seed" signifies the new life-principle which is the formative element of the "children of God." This abides in him who has received it. It stamps its own character upon his life and determines its whole development.

The "children of God."—Those who are "begotten of God" are "iooio fato "children of God" (îkêan thead, John 1:12; 11:52; 1 John 3:12.10; 5:2).
The term connotes primarily the direct communication of the Father's own nature; and secondarily the fact that the natural man who has not as yet reached its full stature, but contains the promise of a future glorious development. We are now children of God, but what it fully is to be children of God is not yet made manifest (1 John 3:2). Participation in this life creates a family fellowship (koinônia) at once human and Divine. Those who are begotten of God and walk in the light have "fellowship one with another" (John 1:7). They are "brethren" and are knit together by the bond of the Son (John 1:35) and the duties of mutu­al love (1 John 3:13; 15:12; 1 John 3:16; 4:11) and of mutual watchfulness and intercession (John 15:16).

On the Divine side they have fellowship "with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (John 1:3). In this Divine fellowship lies grounded the unique nourishment and sustenance of love. Only in the love of the indwelling of Christ in the members of His body. And while it is no doubt true that the Johannine conception of life was immedi­ately influenced by contact with Heilensm, it is one which was sure, sooner or later, to emerge in Christian theology.

1) Source in God.—In the development of the doctrine we note the following points. (1) The sole and absolute source of life is God, the Father, revealed in Christ. "The Father hath life in himself" (John 5:26). He is the "vinedresser," and by whom the Son lives (John 6:57).—the "true God, and eternal life" (John 5:20). Eternal life is nothing else than the immu­nity of the God in moral beings created after His likeness; the Divine nature reproducing itself in human nature; the energy of the Spirit of God in the spiritual nature of man. This is its ultimate definition.

(2) Mediated by Christ.—Of this life Christ is the sole mediator (John 6:33.57; 11:25; 14:6). The word 'Gott' is the "life," and this life is in His Son" (John 5:11). This mediation is grounded in the relation, eternally subsisting within the Godhead, of the Logos to the Father. The life manifested and seen in the historic Christ (John 1:1) is the "life, the eternal life," which existed in relation to the Father (John 1:2). By the incarnation of the Son the eternal life of man in its Divine fulness has become incorporated with humanity, a permanent source of regenerative power to "as many as received him" (John 1:12). It is His very power to be the Father that He reproduces in men (John 17:23).

(3) Through the Spirit.—In the communication of this life the Spirit is the sole direct agent (John 3:5-8; see above, under IV).

The "begotten."—The act of Divine self-commication is constantly and exclusively expressed by the word "begot" (genânän—John 1:18; 3:5-8; 1 John 2:29; 3:9, etc.). The word is of far-reaching significance. It implies not only that life has its ultimate origin in God, but that its com­munication is directly and solely His act. In how literal a sense the Divine begetting is to be understood appears very strikingly in John 3:9: "Who­soever is begotten of God doeth no sin; because his seed abideth in him." The unique expression "his seed" signifies the new life-principle which is the formative element of the "children of God." This abides in him who has received it. It stamps its own character upon his life and determines its whole development.

The "children of God."—Those who are "begotten of God" are "iooio fato "children of God" (îkêan thead, John 1:12; 11:52; 1 John 3:12.10; 5:2).
The term connotes primarily the direct communication of the Father's own nature; and secondarily the fact that the natural man who has not as yet reached its full stature, but contains the promise of a future glorious development. We are now children of God, but what it fully is to be

VII. Human Nature and Its Regeneration. — The necessity of regeneration is fundamental to the whole theological scheme (John 3:5.7). Life which consists with God does not become a man as he is naturally constituted; those who know that they have eternal life know that it is theirs because they have "passed out of death into life" (1 John 3:14; 5:24).
The unregenerate state of human nature is specially connected with the Johannine conception of the "world" (kosmos). This term has a peculiar definiteness of application; and the idea of its origin is "the ordure of finite being, regarded as apart from God"—may be taken as expressing the widest idea that underlies St. John's use of the word. When the kosmos is material, it signifies (1) the existing terrestrial creation (Jn 1:10; 13:1; 18:24), etc., as contrasted with the sphere of the heavenly and eternal. When it refers to humanity, it is either (2) the totality of mankind as needing redemption and as the object of God's redeeming love (Jn 3:16; 1 Jn 2:2; 4:14), or (3) the mass of unbelieving men, hostile to Christ and resisting salvation (e.g. Jn 15:18). Of the world in this sense it is said that it has no perception of the true nature of God and of the Divine glory of Christ (Jn 1:10; 17:5); that it hates the children of the heavenly Father (Jn 15:18,19; 17:14; 1 Jn 3:13); that the spirit of Antichrist dwells in it (1 Jn 4:3,4); that to belong to the false prophets and their adherents (1 Jn 4:15); that it is under the dominion of the wicked one (Jn 12:31; 14:30; 15:20); that there are "the lust of the flesh and the lust of the eyes and the vainglory of life" (1 Jn 2:16); that it passes away (1 Jn 2:17); that Christ has conquered it (1 Jn 5:18), and that "whatsoever is begotten of God" is "manifested in him" (1 Jn 4:4) by the power of the Father in Him (1 Jn 5:5). Thus the "world" (in this darker significance) is composed of those who still love the darkness rather than the light (Jn 3:19), who, when Christ is presented to them, obstinately retain their blindness and enmity. Nevertheless, the "world" is not beyond the possibility of salvation. The Holy Spirit, acting in the Christian community, will convince the world with regard to sin and righteousness and judgment (Jn 16:8); and the evidence of the unity of Divine fellowship among Christ's disciples will lead it to believe in His Divine mission (1 Jn 23).

Thus it is true that St. John teaches "a distinction that it hates the children of the heavenly Father—those who are from above and those who are from beneath—children of light and children of darkness." But that he teaches this in any agnostic or semi-materialistic sense is a misapprehension, for there is no natural basis. He distinguishes between those who love the light and those who love the darkness rather than the light, between those who "receive" Christ and those who "will not receive Him" (Jn 1:11). This distinction, however, he traces not to anything in the natural constitution of the two classes, but solely to the regenerating act of God (Jn 1:13; 6:44). His doctrine of regeneration is, in fact, his solution of the problem created by the actual existence of those two classes among men, a problem which is forced upon every thoughtful Christian mind by the diverse and opposite results of evangelism. It is this that lies behind such utterances as 15:10; "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice" (Jn 18:37); "Ye believe not, because ye are not of my sheep. My sheep hear my voice... and they follow me" (Jn 10:26,27); "Every one that hath heard from the Father, cometh unto me. No man can come unto me except it be given unto him of the Father" (Jn 6:44,45). In these and all similar passages, belief or unbelief in Christ, when he is presented, depends upon antecedent spiritual predisposition (St. John's equivalent to the Pauline predestination). There exists in every man, that is, a latent spiritual determination by which Christ is recognized, a capacity and a predisposition to receive Him. But this predisposition is not (any more than St. Paul's predestination) theirs by gift of nature. St. John refuses to find its source in human personality (Jn 1:13; 1 Jn 5:1). The children of God are, all of them, "humbled" (1 Jn 3:1). They are men who have passed from death into life, and who have done so because they are begotten of God. St. John's doctrine is thus the antithesis of Gnosticism. The gnostic distinction of two classes in the human race glorified a personal spiritual power in the manner of被盗的身分, who was spiritual pride. The effect of St. John's doctrine is to humble man and glorify God, to satisfy the innermost Christian consciousness that not even for their appropriation of God's grace in Christ can believers take credit to themselves; that in nothing can the human spirit do more than respond to the Divine, and that, in the last analysis, this power itself is of God. Regeneration in the Johannine sense is not to be identified with conversion; it is the communication of that vision of truth and that capacity for new moral activity which issue in conversion. The doctrine of regeneration contained in the Johannine writings is the fullest recognition in the NT that all the conscious experiences and activities of the Johannine period were under the seal of God's own inscrutable work of begetting in the depths of human personality, and of renewing and replenishing there, the energies of the Divine.

VIII. The Church and Sacraments.—While the word "Church" is not specifically used in the Johannine literature, the Church is the Church of the Johannine theology. The Divine life communicated to men creates a Divine community, a "fellowship" which is with the Father and "with his Son Jesus Christ" (1 Jn 1:4), and which "are all one with another" (1 Jn 5:7) —a fellowship which is consecrated by the self-consecration of Jesus (Jn 17:19), in which men are cleansed from all sin by blood (1 Jn 1:8), and which is maintained by His intercessory action as the Advocate with the Father (1 Jn 2:1). This fellowship is realized in the actual Christian community and there only; but it is essentially inward and spiritual, not mechanically ecclesiastical. In the visible community spurious elements may intrude themselves, as is proved when schism unites those who, though they have belonged to the external organization, have never been partakers of its real life (1 Jn 3:18). Only among those who walk in the light of God does there exist the truth (1 Jn 1:7).

From the doctrine of the Divine nature as life and light one might a priori infer the possibilities of a Johannine view of the sacraments. It is evident that there is the Johannine system of thought for a genuinely sacramental action in a Divine action—the employment of definite external acts not as symbols only, but as real media of Divine communication. On the one hand, heテンソ1すが考えられることや Church with a tendency that God is life only but light also—self-revealing as well as self-imparting—would necessarily exclude any magical efficacy which the theologians of a later period attributed either to the physical elements in themselves or to the physical act of participation. And (though there is little or no explicit statement) such is the type of doctrine we actually find. With regard to all sacramental rites the universal principle applies: 'It is the spirit that quickeneth, the flesh profiteth nothing' (Jn 6:63).

1. Baptism.—Yet baptism is the physical counterpart of the Spirit's work in regeneration, and great importance is attached to it as the means of admission to the new life of the kingdom (Jn 3:5).

2. The Lord's Supper.—The omission of all reference to the institution of the Lord's Supper by the Johannine accounts of the feast-washing and the proclamation of the new commandment taking its place in the life of the church, thought to indicate that St. John was conscious of a tendency to attach a superstitious value to the outward observance, and desired emphasis upon the spiritual and essential nature of this to what was spiritual and essential. The omission, to whatever motive it may have been due, is perfectly balanced by the sacramental discourse (Jn 6). While the language of this discourse is not to be interpreted as a technically eucharistic service, the idea of its purpose, undoubtedly, is to set forth the significance of the Lord's Supper in its spiritual significance, which gives to men the bread of life, which is His own flesh and of which men must eat if they may live (Jn 6:50—63). "He that eateth this bread, even as I, abideth in me and I in him." This eating and drinking is essentially the spiritual and essential nature of the Spirit. It signifies a derivation of life analogous to that of the Son Himself from the Father.
"As the living Father sent me, and I live because of the Father; so he that eateth me, he also shall live because I am the bread of life.

17. That is the bread which cometh down from heaven, that a man may eat thereof, and not die.

18. This is the bread which cometh down from heaven, not as your fathers did eat manna, and are dead: for the bread that cometh down from heaven is that which the Father hath given me, and is of more value to them who have apprehended its true meaning. The material elements represent the flesh and blood of Christ—His Divine Incarnation for the life of the world. He is present in them, not merely by way of symbol, but actually; but the spiritual is something in the realm corresponding to the spiritual reality, which is conveyed through the gift. The outward act of participation must be accomplished in Christ and a true insight into the nature of His work and a will to know and see Him. The sacrament becomes operative as a bread of life through this receptive spirit on the part of those who observe it." (Scott, The Fourth Gospel, 127-28).

IX. Eschatology.—The type of mind revealed in the Johannine writings is one that instinctively leans to the ideal and the spiritual in its contemplation of life, grasping what is of universal significance and dwelling upon events only as they are the embodiment of eternal principles.

1. Type of Thought Not for him events are not merely symbols; history is not allegory. The incarnation is a historical fact, the Parousia a future event. His thought does not move in a world of mere abstractions, a world in which nothing ever happens. His true distinction as a thinker lies in the success with which he unites the two strains of thought, the historical and the ideal. The word which may be said to express his conception of history is "manifestation" (of Jn 2 11; 9 3; but esp. 1 Jn 1 2; 2 19.28; 3 2.5.8; 4 9). The incarnation is only the manifestation of "what was from the beginning" (1 Jn 1 2); the mission of Christ, the manifestation of the love eternally latent in the depths of the Divine nature (1 Jn 4 9). The successive events of history are the emergence into visibility of what already exists. In them the potential becomes actual. Thus St. John has an eschatology, as well as a history. He profoundly spiritualizes. He reaches beyond the world of representations of the traditional apocalyptic and inquires what essential principle each of these embodies. Then he discovers that this principle is already universally and inevitably in operation; and this, the present spiritual reality, becomes for him the primary thought. Judgment means essentially the sitting and separation, the classification of men according to their spiritual affinities. But every day men are thus classifying themselves by their attitude toward Christ; this, the true judgment of the world, is already present fact. So also the coming and presence of Christ must always be essentially a spiritual fact, and as such it is already a present fact. There is the deep significance of the word, a perpetual coming of Christ in Christian experience. This, however, does not prevent St. John from firmly holding the certainty of a fuller manifestation of these facts in the future, when tendencies will have reached their final culmination, and principles which are now apprehended only by faith will be revealed in all the visible magnitude of their consequences.

1. Eternal Life.—It has already been said that the most distinctive feature in the conception of eternal life is that it is not a future immortal felicity so much as a present spiritual state. The category of duration recedes before that of moral quality. Yet the term "eternal" is not merely a symbol, but contains a corresponding actuality. In triumphant contrast with the poor ephemeralities of the worldly life, he that doeth the will of God "abideth for ever" (Jn 2 17); and the complete realization of the life eternal is still in the future (Jn 4 36; 6 27; 12 27).

2. Antichrist.—The view of Antichrist is strikingly characteristic. Tacitly setting aside the lurid figure of popular traditions, St. John grasps the essential fact that is expressed by the name and idea of Antichrist (= one who in the guise of Christ opposes Christ), and finds its fulfilment in the false teaching which substituted for the Christ of the gospel the fantastic product of gnostic imagination (1 Jn 4 3). But in this he reads the sign that the world's day has reached its last hour (1 Jn 2 18).

3. Resurrection.—While the Fourth Gospel so carefully records the proofs of Christ's resurrection, noticeably little (in the Ep., nothing) is made of the thought of a future resurrection from the dead. For the Christian, the death of Christ was an incident. "Whosoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die" (Jn 11 26; cf 8 51). Regeneration—union with Christ—is the true resurrection (Jn 6 50.51.55). And yet, again, the eschatological idea is not lost. Side by side with the eternal truth the supplementary and interpretative truth is given its right place. "Whoso eateth my flesh and drinketh my blood hath eternal life; and I will raise him up at the last day" (Jn 6 54). If Christ says "I am the life; whoever liveth and believeth on me shall never die," He also says "I am the resurrection: he that believeth on me, though he die, yet shall he live" (Jn 11 25).

4. Judgment.—As has already been said, St. John regards judgment as essentially a present fact of life. Christ does not pass judgment upon men—that is not the purpose of His coming (Jn 3 17; 12 47). Yet Christ is always of necessity judging men—compelling them to pass judgment upon themselves. For judgment is the world (Jn 9 39). By their attitude toward Him men involuntarily but inevitably classify themselves, reveal what spirit they are of, and automatically register themselves as being or as not being "of the truth" (Jn 18.30). The assigning of a character from without, but the revelation of a character from within. And this is not future, but present. "He that believeth not hath been judged . . . because he hath not believed on the name of the only begotten Son of God" (Jn 3 18). Yet the apostle indubitably looks forward to a future Day of Judgment (Jn 12 48; 1 Jn 4 17). Nor is this simply an "unconscious concession to orthodoxy." The judgment to come will be the full manifestation of the judgment that now is, that is to say, of the principles according to which men are in reality approved or condemned already. What this present judgment, the classification of men by their relation to Christ, ultimately signifies, is not at all realized by the "world," is not fully realized even in Christian faith. There must be a day when all self-deception shall cease and all reality shall be manifested.

5. The Parousia.—In like manner the conception of the Parousia is primarily spiritual. The substitution in the Fourth Gospel of the Supper Discourse (Jn 14-16) for the apocalyptic chapters in the Synoptics is of the utmost significance. It is not a Christ coming on the clouds of heaven that is presented, but a Christ who has come and is ever coming to dwell in closest fellowship with His people (see above under IV). Yet St. John by no means discards belief in the Parousia as a historical event. He does, in fact, employ the abiding-place that love Him and keep His word, there is also a Father’s House in which there are many abiding-places, whither He goes to prepare a place for them and whence He will come again to receive them unto Himself (Jn 14:23). Still more is this emphasized in the Ep. The command “Love not the world” is sharpened by the assurance that the world is on the verge, aye, in the process of dissolution (1 Jn 2:17). The exhortation “to abide in Him” is enforced by the dread of being put to shame at His impending advent (2:25). The hope of being made partakers in His manifested glory is the consummation of all that is implied in our being now children of God (1 Jn 3:2).

(a) A ‘manifestation’. But this future crisis will be only the manifestation of what already exists (3:2). The Parousia will, no more than the incarnation, be the advent of a strange Presence in the world. It will be, as on the Mount of Transfiguration, the outshining of a latent glory; not the arrival of one who is absent, but the self-revealing of one who is present. As to the manner of Christ’s appearing, the Ep. is silent. As to its significance, we are left in no doubt. It is a historical event; occurring once for all; the consummation of all Divine purposes; the consummation of human existence; the crisis in the history of the church, of the world, and of every man.

(b) Relation to believers: Especially for the children of God, it will be a coming unto salvation. “Beloved, we are children of God, and it is not yet made manifest what we shall be. We know that, if he shall be manifested, we shall be like him; for we shall see him as he is” (1 Jn 3:2). Here the Johannine idea of “manifestation” is strikingly employed. “What we shall be” will be essentially what we are—children of God. No new element will be added to the regenerate nature. All is there that ever will be there. But the epoch of full development is not yet. The Christ who is already in the world—shall be manifested, then also the children of God who are in the world will be manifested as being what they are. They also will have come to their Mount of Transfiguration. As eternal life here is mediated through the manifestation (1 Jn 1:2), so eternal life hereafter will be mediated through this second and final manifestation. “We know that we shall be like him, because we shall see him as he is.” It is true that here according to our capacity we behold Him as He is (1 Jn 4:13); but perception, now dim and wavering, will then be intense and vivid. The vision of the future is in some sense corporeal as well as spiritual. Sense and faith will coincide. It will then have ceased to be expedient that Christ should go before the Spirit of truth may come. We shall possess in the same experience the privilege of the original eyewitnesses of the incarnate life and the inward ministry of the Spirit. And seeing Him as He is, we shall be like Him. Vision will beget likeness, and likeness again give clearness to vision. And as the vision is in some unconjecturable fashion corporeal as well as spiritual, so also is the assimilation (cf Phil 3:21). The very idea of the spiritual body is that it perfectly corresponds to the body to which it belongs. The outward man will take the mold of the inward man, and will share with it its perfect likeness to the glorified manhood of Jesus Christ. Such is the farthest view opened to our hope by the Johannine eschatology; and it is that which, of all others, has been most eagerly pursued by the authors of the 2nd and 3rd centuries. The abiding-place, the final manifestation, is a means to get to the inward man, in whose simulacrum of the children of God.

JOHN, THE APOSTLE: The sources for the life of the apostle John are of various kinds, and of different degrees of trustworthiness.

Sources of the Life of St. John:

There are the references in the Synoptic Gospels, which may be used simply and easily without any preliminary critical inquiry into the question as to which of them is trustworthy as sources; for these Gospels contain the common tradition of the early church, and for the present purpose may be accepted as trustworthy. Further, there are the statements in Acts and in Gal, which we may use without discussion as a source for the life of St. John. There is next the universal tradition of the 2d cent., which we may use, if we can show that the John of Ephesus, who bulked so largely in the Christian literature of the 2d and 3d cents., is identical with the son of Zebedee. Further, on the supposition that the son of Zebedee is the author of the Johannine writings of the NT, there is another source of unequalled value for the estimate of the life and character of the son of Zebedee in these writings. Finally, there is the considerable volume of tradition which has been gathered around the life of John of Ephesus, of which, picturesque and interesting though the traditions be, only sparing use can be made.

I. Witness of the NT.—Addressing ourselves first to the Synoptic Gospels, to Acts and to Gal, we ask, What do we learn from these about the life of the apostle John? A glance only need be taken at the Johannine writings, more fully discussed elsewhere in relation to their author.

That John was one of the two sons of Zebedee, that he became one of the disciples of Jesus, that at His call he forsook all and followed Jesus, and was thereafter continuous with Jesus to the end, are facts familiar to every reader of the Synoptic Gospels.

The call was given to John and to his brother James at the Sea of Galilee, while in a boat with their father Zebedee, "Gneming their nets together" (Mt 4:21, 22, and i passages). "Come ye after me," said Jesus, "and I will make you to become fishes of men" (Mk 1:17; on the earlier call in Judaea, Jn 1:35 ff., see below). That Zebedee was a man of considerable wealth may be inferred from the fact that he had "hired servants" with him (Mk 1:20), and that his wife was one of those women who ministered of their substance to Jesus and His disciples (Mk 7:55-56). Comparison of the latter passage with Mk 16:40-41 identifies the wife of Zebedee, John's mother, with Salome, and it seems a fair inference from Jn 19:25, though all do not accept it, that Mary, the mother of Jesus, and Salome, the wife of Zebedee, were sisters. On this view, James and John were cousins of Jesus, and were also related to the family home in the Baptist region.

The name of John appears in all the lists of the apostles given in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 10:2 and i passages). While his name appears rarely in a position by itself, he is still one of the most prominent of the disciples. With Peter and James he is placed at the raising of the daughter of Jairus (Mk 5:37; Lk 8:51 ff.). These three were also present at the transfiguration (Mt 17; Mk 9; Lk 9). They were nearest to the Lord at the agony of Gethsemane. In all these cases nothing characteristic is given of John. It is important to note that he is simply present as one of the three, and therefore one of the most intimate of the disciples. But there is something characteristic in an incident recorded by Luke (9:54), in which James and John are celebrated as wishing to call down fire on a Samaria village, which had refused them hospitality. From this we may infer something of the earnestness, zeal, and enthusiasm of the brothers, and of their high sense of what was due to their Master.

It is also stated here that James and John were among the four who asked Jesus about the prophecies He had uttered: "Tell us, when shall these things be? and what shall be the sign when these things are all about to be accomplished?" (Mk 13:4). Then the question is put to the rest of the disciples, whether she desired for her sons in the coming kingdom (Mk 10:35 ff.). To Peter and John was entrusted the task of preparation for the keeping of the Passover (Lk 22:8). Once John stands alone, and asks what we may consider a characteristic question: "Teacher, we saw one casting out devils in thy name; and we forbade him, because he followed not us" (Mk 9:38; Lk 9:49). From these notices we see that John was in the front rank of the disciples, and we see also that he was far conscious of the position he held, and of the intimate connection he had with the Master. We note further that John was a young man of fiery zeal, and of a tendency toward intolerance and exclusiveness. The zeal and the intolerance are in evidence in the desire to call down fire upon the Samaria village, and the tendency toward exclusiveness is manifested in the request of his mother as to the place her sons were to occupy in the kingdom. They desire to have the highest position. These tendencies were not encouraged by Jesus. They were rebuked by Him once and again, but the tendencies reveal the men.

In harmony with these notices of character and temperament is the name given to the brothers by Jesus, "Boanerges," "Sons of thunder" (Mk 3:17), which, whatever else may be meant by it, means strength, unexpectedness, and zeal approaching to methods of violence.

John is found in company with Peter in the opening scenes in Acts. He is with Peter while the man at the gate was healed (3:1 f.). He is then with Peter on the mission to Samaria Gal (8:14 f.). He is with Peter and James, the Lord's brother, at the interview with St. Paul recorded in Gal 2, and the three are described by St. Paul as the pillar apostles (2:9). This interview is of importance because it proves that John had survived his brother James, whose death is recorded in Acts 12; at all events that John and James were not killed by the Jews at the same time, as some now contend that they were. This contention is considered below.

Much is to be learned of the apostle John from the Fourth Gospel, assuming the Gospel to have been written by him. We learn from it that he was a disciple of John the Baptist (1:35), that he was one of the first six disciples called by Jesus in His Gospel early ministry in Judaea (vs 37-51), and that he was present at all the scenes which he describes in the Gospel.

We find later an account given of the death which was acquainted with many there. To that home he took Mary, the mother of Jesus, whom the dying Saviour entrusted to his care (19:26-27). Much more also we learn of him and of his history, for the Gospel is interwoven into the records of the growth of faith on the part of the writer, and of the way in which his eyes were opened to see the glory of the Lord, and of the promises that have come to fruition.

It was in the inner circle of the disciples, indeed, that John is so described as "the disciple whom Jesus loved" (13:25; 19:26; 20:2; 21:7-20), and, because of that love, became the apostle of love (see, further, JOHN, GOSPEL OF; JOHN, EPISTLES OF; JOHANNINE THEOLOGY).

The Book of Rev, likewise traditionally ascribed to John, bears important witness to the apostle's banishment in later life to the isle of Patmos in the Aegean (1:9). There he received the visions recorded in the book. The banishment probably took place in the reign of Domitian (96-98 A.D.); cf. the Rev. 1:19), with whose practice it was entirely in consonance (on the severity of such exile, see Sir W. M. Ramsay, Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, ch viii). The testimony is of high importance in its bearing on the question as to the position of John's residence in Asia, a point now to be discussed.

II. Alleged Early Martyrdom of John: Criticism of Evidence.—The consistent testimony of the church of the 2nd cent. is that the later years of St. John were spent at Ephesus, where he wrote his Gospel, and St. John's Residence in Ephesus (see the evidence drawn out in detail in Ephesians in Godet, Comm. on Gospel of St. John, 45-48). It was also Lightfoot, "The School of Ephesians," in Essays on the Work Entitled "Supernatural Religion"), that, before, however, we can use the traditions connected with this residence at Ephesus, it is needful to inquire into the statement alleged to be made by Papias that John, the son of Zebedee, was killed by the Jews at an early date. It is plain, that, if this statement is correct, the apostle could not be the author of the Johannine writings in the NT, universally dated near the end of the 1st cent.

The evidence for the statement that St. John was early killed by the Jews is thus summed up by Dr. Moffatt: "The evidence for the early martyrdom of John the son of Zebedee is, in fact, threefold: (a) a prophecy of Jesus pre-John, the Apostle and the Baptist served in Mk 10:30—Mt 20:23, (b) the witness of Papias, and (c) the calendars of the church

(Intro to Lit. of NT, 692). Our limit

On this point of view is an exhaustive evidence, but, happily, an exhaustive examination is not needed.

(a) The first head proceeds on an assumption which is not warranted, viz. a prophecy of John should not be credibly ad nicted in the present instance, a literal fulfillment of the prophecy ('"(hangel') is not out of question, for there is no hint that either James or John was crucified. We must therefore fall back on the passage in John which contains the declaration of John: "I am the voice of one which cries in the wilderness: 'Make straight the way of the Lord.' John the Baptizer (Fourth Gospel) (1911).

(b) Dr. Moffatt lays great stress on what he calls the testimony of Papias. Papias is not found in any early authority, and then occurs in writers not of any great value from the point of view of critical investigation. It is found in a passage of Georgius Hamartolius (9th cent.), and is held to be corresponded to by Papias. (genuine) bracketing and copy and as Moffatt admits (op. cit., 694), bears out the meaning attached to it. Origen is of opinion that the prophecy is not sufficiently fulfilled by the fact of

John's banishment to Patmos and his sufferings there. Then the whole question is what tradition taught and what the prophecy meant. From the whole statement of Georgius, which expressly declares that John survived the time of Nerva, nothing of Nerva's banishment is found in the so-called quotation from Papias. It is to be remembered that the writings of Papias were known to Irenaeus and to Eusebius, and it is inconceivable that, if such a statement was to be found in these, they would have ignored it, and have given currency to a statement contradictory to it. No stress, therefore, can be laid on the alleged quotation. We do not know its context, nor is there anything in the lit. of the 1st 3 centuries confirmatory of it. In the citation in the epitome of Philip, Papias is made to speak of "John the divine" (theologo). This title is not applied to John till the 4th cent.

(c) As regards the 3rd line of evidence cited by Dr. Moffatt—church calendars, in which James and John are called "the Baptizers"—it is more worthless than the other two. On the nature and origin of these martyrlogies, Dr. J. Drummond may be quoted.

There were cause of the existence of these calendars, at some period in the 2d half of the 4th cent., nothing of Nerva's banishment is found in the so-called quotation from Papias. It is to be remembered that the writings of Papias were known to Irenaeus and to Eusebius, and it is inconceivable that, if such a statement was to be found in these, they would have ignored it, and have given currency to a statement contradictory to it. No stress, therefore, can be laid on the alleged quotation. We do not know its context, nor is there anything in the lit. of the 1st 3 centuries confirmatory of it. In the citation in the epitome of Philip, Papias is made to speak of "John the divine" (theologo). This title is not applied to John till the 4th cent.

In summary, the sources of first-hand information concerning the life and work of John the Baptist are limited to the NT and Jos. Lk and Mt give the fuller notices, and these are in substantial agreement. The Fourth Gospel deals chiefly with the ministry of the Baptist. In his single notice (Ant., XVIII, v, 9), Jos. was an interesting reference to the cause of John’s imprisonment. See II, below.

II. Parentage.—John was of priestly descent. His mother, Elisabeth, was of the daughters of Aaron, and was espoused to a man named Zacharias, the father of the Baptist. His name being “John” is probably derived from returning to its Biblical usage. His credit was that of a “good man,” and one who lived a blameless life. He was a priest by birth, and was therefore a member of the family of Aaron. He was, therefore, a Levite, and was not subject to the commonwealth, but was united to the ancient Priesthood. He was a Levite, and was not subject to the commonwealth of Israel, but was united to the ancient Priesthood. He was a Levite, and was not subject to the commonwealth of Israel, but was united to the ancient Priesthood. He was a Levite, and was not subject to the commonwealth of Israel, but was united to the ancient Priesthood.

III. Early Life.—We infer from Luke’s account that John was born about six months before the birth of Jesus. Of the places we know only that it was a city of the hill country of Judah. Our definite information concerning his youth is summed up in the angelic prophecy, “Many shall rejoice at his birth. For he shall be great in the sight of the Lord, and in the sight of men he shall be great.” The character and spirituality of the Baptist are shown in the incidents recorded. The Baptist was a fitting preparation for his great mission.

IV. Ministry.—The scene of the Baptist’s ministry was partly in the wilderness of Southern Judaea, and partly in the Jordan Valley. Two locations are mentioned, Bethany or Paneas. The usual array of dates with which Mark marks the beginning of John’s ministry (Lk 3:12) reveals his sense of the importance of the event. His first public appearance is assigned to the 15th year of Tiberius, probably 26 or 27 AD, for the first Passover attended by Jesus can hardly have been later than 27 AD (Jn 2:21). John’s dress and habits were strikingly suggestive of Elijah, the old prophet of national judgment. His desert habits have led some to 3. His Dress and Manner

In this connection, the fact that the chief settlement of this sect was near the home of his youth. It was natural that John should continue the manner of his youthful life in the desert, and it is not improbable that he intentionally copied his great prophetic model. It was fitting that the one who called men to repentance and the beginning of a self-denying life should show renunciation and self-denial in his own life. But there is no evidence in his teaching that he required such asceticism of those who accepted his baptism.

The fundamental note in the message of John was the announcement of the near approach of the Messiah’s age. But he pronounced himself as the herald voice preparing the way of the Lord, and because of this the expectant multitudes crowed to hear his word, his view of the nature of the kingdom was probably quite at variance with that of his hearers. Instead of the expected day of deliverance from the foreign oppressor, it was to be a day of judgment for Israel. It meant good for the penitent, but destruction for the ungodly. ‘He will gather his wheat into the garner, but the chaff will he burn up with unquenchable fire forever’ (Mt 3:12).

But this idea was perhaps not entirely unfamiliar. That these were the delay in the coming of the Lord, the sinfulness of the people and their lack of repentance, was a commonplace in the message of their teachers (Edersheim, Life and Times of Jesus the Messiah, I, 169).

The call to repentance was then a natural message of preparation for such a time of judgment. But to John repentance was a very real and radical thing. It meant a complete change of heart and life. “Bring forth . . . fruits worthy of repentance” (Lk 3:8). What was this “fruit”? The Baptist’s wording makes it clear in his answers to the inquiring multitudes and the publicans and soldiers (3:10–14). It is noticeable that there is no reference to the usual ceremonies of the law or to a change of occupation. Do good; be honest; refrain from extortion; be content with wages.

John used such violence in addressing the Pharisees and Sadducees doubtless to startle them from their self-complacency. How hopelessly blind were they to blase the assurance of security as the children of Abraham, and by their confidence in the merits of the law, is attested by the fact that these parties resisted the teachings of both John and Jesus to the very entrance. With what vigor and fearlessness the Baptist pressed his demand for righteousness is shown by his stern reproof of the sin of Herod and Herodias, which led to his imprisonment and finally to his death.

V. Baptism.—The symbolic rite of baptism was such an essential part of the work of John that it is not only gave him his distinctive title of “the Baptist” (v. 29, ko baptismos), but also carried his message to be styled “preaching the baptism of repentance.” That a special virtue was ascribed to this rite, and it was regarded as a necessary part of the preparation for the coming of the Messiah, are shown by its important place in John’s preaching, and by the eagerness with which it was sought by the multitudes. Its significance may best be understood by giving attention to its historical antecedents, for while John gave the rite new significance, it certainly appealed to ideas already familiar to the Jews.

1. Lustrations required by the Levitical law.—The divers washings required by the law (Lev 11–15) have, without doubt, a religious import. This is shown by the requirement of sacrifices in connection with the cleansing, esp. the sin offering (Lev 14 8.9.19.20; cf Mk 1 44; Lk 2 22). The designation of John's baptism by the word βαπτίσμα, baptism, which by NT times was used of ceremonial cleansing, also indicates some historical connection (cf Sir 34 25).

(2) Anticipation of Messianic incitations foretold by prophets.—John understood that his baptism was a preparation for the Messianic baptism anticipated by the prophets, who saw it for a true cleansing the nation must wait until God should open in Israel a fountain for cleansing (Zec 13 1), and should sprinkle His people with clean water and give them a new heart and a new spirit (Ezk 36 25.26; Jer 33 8). His baptism was at once a preparation and a promise of the spiritual cleansing which the Messiah would bestow. "I indeed baptize you with water unto repentance: but he that cometh after me . . . shall baptize you with the Holy Spirit and with fire" (Mt 3 11 m).

(3) Proselyte baptism.—According to the teaching of later Judaism, a stranger who desired to be adopted into the family of Israel was required, along with circumcision, to receive the rite of baptism as a means of cleansing from the ceremonial uncleanness attributed to him as a Gentile. While it is not possible to prove the priority of this practice of proselyte baptism to the baptism of John, there can be no doubt of the fact, for it is inconceivable, in the case of any people, that it would be borrowed from John or after this time. While it seems clear that in the use of the rite of baptism John was influenced by the Jewish customs of ceremonial washings and proselyte baptism, his baptism differed very essentially from these. The Levitical washings restored an unclean person to his former condition, but baptism was a preparation for a new condition. On the other hand, proselyte baptism was administered only to Gentiles, while John required baptism of all Jews. At the same time his baptism was very different from Christian baptism, as he himself declared (Lk 3 16). His was a baptism of water only; a preparation for the baptism "in the Spirit" which was to follow. It is also to be observed that it was a baptism of repentance, and that it was offered to the nation as a preparation for a specific event, the advent of the Messiah.

We may say, then, that as a "baptism of repentance" it meant a renunciation of the past life; as a baptism symbolized the forgiveness of sin (Mt 3 4), and as preparation it implied a promise of royalty to the kingdom of the Messiah. We have no reason to believe that Jesus experienced any sense of sin or felt any need of repentance or forgiveness; but as a Divinely appointed preparation for the Messianic kingdom His submission to it was appropriate.

While the multitudes flocked to the Jordan, Jesus came also to be baptized with the rest. 'John would have hindered him, saying, I need to be baptized of thee, and loest thou come unto me? But Jesus answering said unto him, Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfi all righteousness' (Mt 3 13-15). Wherein was this act a fulfillment of righteousness? We cannot believe that Jesus felt any need of repentance or change of life. May we not regard it rather as an identification of Himself with His people in the formal consecration of His life to the work of the kingdom?

V. Imprisonment and Death.—Neither the exact time of John's imprisonment nor the period of time between his imprisonment and his death can be determined. On the occasion of the unnamed feast of Jn 6 1, Jesus refers to John's witness as already past. At least, then, his arrest, if not his death, must have taken place prior to that incident, i.e. before the second Passover of Jesus' ministry.

According to the Gospel accounts, John was imprisoned because of his rebuke of Herod's marriage with Herodias, the wife of his brother.

2. The Philip (Lk 3 19.20; cf Mt 14 3.4; Occasion Mk 6 17.18). Jos says (Ant, XVIII, v. 2) that Herod was influenced to put John to death by the 'fear lest his great influence over the people might put it in his power or inclination to raise a rebellion. Accordingly, he was sent a prisoner, out of Herod's suspicious temper, to Machaerus, and was there put to death. This account of Jos does not necessarily conflict with the tragic story of the Gospels. If Herod desired to punish or destroy him for the reasons assigned by the evangelists, he would doubtless wish to offer as the public reason some political charge, and the one named by Jos would be near at hand.

VII. John and His Disciples.—Frequent reference is made in the Gospel narrative to the disciples of John. As the multitudes crowded to his baptism, it was natural that he should gather about him an inner circle of men who should receive special instruction in the meaning of his work, and should aid him in the work of baptism, which must have soon increased beyond his power to perform alone. It was in the formation of this inner circle of immediate followers that he prepared a sure foundation for the work of the Messiah; for it was from this inner group that the disciples of Jesus were mainly drawn, and that with his consent and through his witness to the superior worth of the latter, and the tragic character of his own mission (Jn 1 29-44).

Concerning the substance of their training, we know from the discourses of Jesus (Lk 11 1) that it included forms of prayer, and from his own disciples (Mt 9 14) we learn that frequent fastings were observed. We may be sure also that he taught them much concerning the Messiah and His work.

There is abundant evidence of the great fidelity of these disciples, of which at least two may be observed in their concern at the overshadowing popularity of Jesus (Jn 3 26); in their loyalty to him in his imprisonment and in their reverent treatment of his body after the sign of his death (Jn 19 40). That John's work was extensive and his influence lasting is shown by the fact that 20 years afterward Paul found in far-off Ephesus certain disciples, including Apollos, the learned Alexandrian Jew, who knew no other baptism than that of John (Acts 19 1-7).

VIII. John and Jesus.—John assumed from the first the role of a herald preparing the way for the approaching Messianic age. He clearly regarded his work as Divinely appointed for the subordinate relation to the Messianic kingdom (Mt 1 7) and of the temporary character of his mission (Jn 3 30). The Baptist's work was twofold. In his preaching he warned the nation of the true character of the new kingdom as a reign of righteousness, and by his call to repentance and baptism he prepared at least a few hearts for a sympathetic response to the call and teaching of Jesus. He also formally announced and bore frequent personal testimony to Jesus as the Messiah.

There is no necessary discrepancy between the synoptic account and that of the Fourth Gospel in reference to the progress of John's knowledge of the Messianic character of Jesus. According to Mt 3 14, John is represented as declining at first to baptize Jesus because he was conscious of His superiority, while in John 1:29–34 he is represented as claiming not to have known Jesus until He was manifested as the heavenly Light. The latter may mean only that He was not known to him definitely as the Messiah until the promised sign was given.

The message which John sent to Jesus from prison seems strange to some in view of the signal testimony which he had previously borne to His character. This need not indicate that he had lost faith in the Messiahship of Jesus, but rather a perplexity at the course of events. The inquiry may have been in the interest of the faith of his disciples or his own relief from misgivings due to Jesus’ delay in assuming the expected Messianic authority. John evidently held the prophetical view of a temporal Messianic kingdom, and some readjustment of view was necessary.

Jesus was no less frank in His appreciation of John. If praise may be measured by the worth of the one by whose lips it is spoken, then no man ever received such praise as he who was called by Jesus a shining light (Jn 1:8, 9), more than a prophet (Mt 11:9), and of whom He said, “Among them are those that are the bond maids of women there hath not arisen a greater than John the Baptist” (Mt 11:11). If, on the other hand, He rated him as less than the least in the kingdom of heaven, this was a limitation of circumstances, not of worth.

Jesus’ tribute is a character and worth of John’s baptism; first, by submitting to it Himself as a step in the fulfilment of all rightousness; later, by repeated utterance, esp. in associating it with the birth of the Spirit as a necessary condition in inheriting eternal life (Jn 3:5); and, finally, in adopting baptism as a symbol of Christian discipleship.

LITERATURE.—Among the 7 NT ep., which from ancient times have been called “catholic,” there is a smaller group of three in which the style alike of thought and language points to a common authorship, and which are traditionally associated with the name of the apostle John. Of these, again, the first differs widely from the other two in respect not only of intrinsic importance, but of its early reception in the church and unquestioned canonicty.

THE FIRST EPISTLE

1. A True Letter. —Not only is the Ep. an anonymous writing; one of its unique features stands among the books of the NT that it does not contain a single proper name (except Our Lord’s), or a single definite allusion, personal, historical, or geographical. It is a composition, however, with a personal touch. It sends to certain other persons whom he calls “you,” and is, in form at least, a letter. The criticism which has denied that it is more than formally so is unwarranted. It does not fall under either of Deissmann’s categories—the true letter, intended only for the perusal of the person or persons to whom it is addressed, or the ep., written with literary art and with an eye to the public. But it does possess that character of the NT ep. in general which is well described by Sir William Ramsay (Letters to the Seven Churches of Asia, 24): “They spring from the heart of the writer and speak direct to the heart of the readers. They were often called forth by some special crisis in the history of the persons addressed, so that they rise out of the actual situation in which the writer conceives the readers to be placed; they express the writer’s keen and living sympathy with and participation in the fortunes of the whole class addressed, and are not affected by any thought of a wider public. . . . On the other hand, the letters in this class express general principles of life and conduct, religion and ethics, applicable to a wider range of circumstances than those which called them forth; and they appeal as emphatically and intimately to all Christians in all time as they did to those addressed in the first instance.” The 1st Ep. of St. John could not be more exactly characterized than by these words. Though its main features are didactic and controversial, the personal note is frequently struck, and with much tenderness and depth of feeling. Under special stress of emotion, the writer’s paternal love, sympathy and solicitude break out in the affectionate appellation, “little children,” or, yet more endearingly, “my little children.” Elsewhere the prescriptive “beloved” shows how deeply he is stirred by the sublimity of his theme and the sense of its supreme importance to his readers. He shows himself intimately acquainted with their religious environment (2 19; 4 1), dangers (2 19; 5 7; 21), attainments (2 12–14:21), achievements (4 4) and needs (3 19; 5 13). Further, the Ep. is addressed primarily to the circle of those among whom the author has habitually exercised his ministry as evangelist and teacher. He has been wont to announce to them the things concerning the Word (1 1), that they might have fellowship with him (1 3), and now, that his (or their) joy may be full, he writes these things unto them (1 4). He writes as light shines. Love makes the task a necessity, but also a delight.

There is no NT writing which is throughout more vigorously controversial: for the satisfactory interpretation of its express teaching, there is need of a recognition of the polemical aim that pervades it is indispensable. But it is true also that there is no such writing in which the presentation of the truth more widely overflows the limits of the immediate occasion. The writer so constantly fights against the error and error combats, the simple, sublime and satisfying facts and principles of the Christian revelation, so lifts up every question at issue into the light of eternal truth, that the Ep. pursues its course through the ages, bringing to the church of God the vision and the inspiration of the Divine. The influence of the immediate polemical purpose, however, is manifest, not only in the contents of the Ep., but in its limitations as well. In a sense it may be said that the field of thought is a narrow one. God is seen exclusively as the Father of Spirits, the Light and Life of the universe of souls. His creativeness and government of the world, the providential aspects and agencies of salvation, the joys and sorrows, hopes and fears that spring from the terrestrial conditions and changes of human life, their disciplinary purpose and effect—to all this the Ep. contains no reference. The themes are exclusively theological and ethical. The writer's immediate interest confined to that region in which the Divine and human vitally and directly meet—to that in God which is communicable to man, to that in man by which he is capax Dei. The Divine nature as life and light, and love and righteousness; the Spirit of Divine activity in Jesus, and its presuppositions and consequences, metaphysical and ethical; the imparting of this Divine nature to men by regeneration; the antithesis to it—sin—and its removal by propitiation; the work of the Holy Spirit; the Christian life, the mutual indwelling of God and man, as tested by its beliefs, its antagonism to sin, its inevitable debt of love—such are the fundamental themes to which every idea in the Ep. is directly related. The topics, if fewer, are stupendously great; and even if retardations of the field of vision are more than compensated by the profundity and intensity of spiritual perception.

The Ep. is in a sense impersonal to the last degree, offering a strange contrast to that frankness which gives such charm to St. Paul's letters; yet few writings so clearly reveal the deepest characteristics of the writer. We feel in it the high serenity of a mind that lives in constant fellowship with the greatest thoughts and is nourished at the eternal fountainhead; but also the fervent indignation and vehement recoil of such a mind in contact with what is false and evil. It has been truly called "the most passionate book in the N.T. The spirit of the text has not erred in giving to its author the title, "Apostle of Love." Of the various themes which are so wonderfully intertwined in it, that to which it most of all owes its unifying charm and imperishable value is love. It rises to its sublimest height, to the apex of all revelation, in those passages in which its author is so divinely inspired to write of the eternal life, in God and man, as love.

But it is an inveterate misconception which regards the Ep. as a "book of love". Equally he reveals himself as one whose mind is dominated by the sense of truth. There are no words more characteristic of him than "true" (aléthein, denoting that which both ideally and really corresponds to the name it bears) and "the truth" (althéia, the reality of things sub specie aeternitatis). To him Christianity is not only a principle of ethics, or even a way of salvation; it is both of them, because it is primarily the truth, the one true disclosure of the realities of the spiritual and eternal world. Thus, as a whole, the theme constantly develops by antithesis. Each conception has its fundamental opposite: light, darkness; life, death; love, hate; truth, falsehood; the Father, the world; God, the devil. There is no shading, no gradation in the conception. It is more characteristic of the writer than this: "Ye know that no lie is of the truth" (2 21). But again, his sense of these radical antagonisms is essentially moral, rather than intellectual. It seems impossible that any writing could display a more impassioned sense, than this Ep. does, of the tremendous imperative of righteousness, a more rigorous intolerance of all sin (2 4; 3 8.9.10). The absolute antagonism and incompatibility between the Christian life and sin of whatsoever kind or degree is maintained with a vehemence of utterance that verges at times upon the paradoxical (3 9; 5 18). So long as the church lays up this Ep. in its heart, it can never lack a moral tonic of wholesome severity.

The style is closely, though perhaps unconsciously, molded upon the Heb. model, and esp. upon the parallelistic forms of the Wisdom lit.

4. Style and Diction are attentive enough to perceive that, though using another language, the writer had in his own ear, all the time, the swing and cadences of Heb verse. The diction is inartificial and unadorned. Not a simile, not a metaphor (except the most fundamental, like "walking in the light") is used. The limitations in the range of ideas are matched by those of vocabulary and by the unvarying simplicity of syntactical form. Yet limited and austere as the literary medium is, the writer handles its resources often with consummate skill. The crystalline simplicity of the style perfectly expresses the simple profundity of the thought. Great spiritual intuitions shine like stars in sentences of clear-cut gnomic terseness. Historical (1 1) and theological (1 2; 4 2) statements are made with exactness of myth. The frequent reiteration of nearly the same thoughts in nearly the same language, though always with variation and enrichment, gives a cumulative effect which is singularly impressive. Such passages, with their calm challenge to the arrogant materialism of the world—"And the world passeth away, and the lust thereof: but he that doeth the will of God abideth for ever"—or the closing vs. of the Ep., with their thrice-repeated triumphant "we know" and their last word of tender, urgent admonition, have a solemn magnificence of effect which nothing but such simplicity of language, carrying such weight of thought, could produce. If it has been true of any writer that "le style est l'homme," it is true of the author of this" book.

II. Polemical Aim.—The polemical intention of the Ep. has been universally recognized; but there has been diversity of opinion as to its actual object. By the older commentators, generally, this was found in the perilous state of the church or churches addressed, which had left their first love and lapsed into Laodicean lukewarmness. But the Ep. gives no sign of this, and it contains many passages that are inconsistent with it (2 13.14.20.21.27; 4 4; 5 18-20). The danger which immediately threatens the church is from without, not from within.

There is a "spirit of error" (4 6) abroad in the world. From the church itself (2 18), many "false prophets" have gone forth (4 1), corrupters of the gospel, veritable antichrists (2 18). And it may be as-served as beyond question that the peril against which the Ep. was intended to arm the church was that of some form of Gnosticism.

The pretensions of Gnosticism to a higher esoteric knowledge of Divine things seems to be clearly referred to in several passages. In

1. Gnosticism 4.6.9, e.g. one might suppose that they are almost verbally quoted ("He that saith","I know not""); "I abide in Him"; "I am in the light"). When we observe, moreover, the prominence given throughout the idea of knowledge and the special significance of some of these passages, the conviction grows that the writer's purpose is to refute the false, but to exhibit apostolic Christianity, believed and lived, as the true Gnosis—the Divine reality of which Gnosticism was but a fantastic caricature. The confidence he has concerning his readers is that they "know him who is from the beginning," that they "know the Father" (2 13).

"Every one that loveth is begotten of God, and knoweth God" (4 7); and the final note upon which the Ep. closes is: "We know him that is true, and we are in him that is true" (5 20). The knowledge of the ultimate Reality, the Being who is the eternal life, is for Christian and Gnostic alike the goal of aspiration.

But it is against two closely related developments of gnostic tenacity, a docte view of the incarnation, and an antinomian view of morals, that the Ep. is specifically directed. Both of these sprang naturally from the dualism which was the fundamental and formative principle of Gnosticism in all its manifestations. According to a Sin of existence, the moral schism of which we are conscious in experience is original, eternal, inherent in the nature of beings. There are two independent and antagonistic principles of being from which severally come all the good and all the evil that exist. The source and the seat of evil were found in the material element, in the body with its senses and appetites, and in its sensuous earthly environment; and it was held inconceivable that the Divine nature should have immediate contact with the material side of existence, or influence upon it.

To such a view of the universe Christianity could be adjusted only by a docte interpretation of the Person of Christ. A real incarnation of moral influence of the Gnostic Christ, and the understanding with a corporeal organism. The human nature of Christ and the incidents of His earthly career were more or less an illusion. And it is with this docte subversion of the truth of the incarnation that the "antichrists" are specially identified (2 22.23; 4 23), and against it that St. John directs with wholehearted fervor his central theme—the complete, permanent, personal identification of the historical Jesus with the Divine Being who is the Word of Life (3 1), the Christ (4 2) and the Son of God (5 6): "Jesus is the Christ in the flesh." In Jn 5 6 there is a still more definite reference to the special form which gnostic Christology assumed in the teaching of Cerinthus and his school. According to Irenaeus (Adv. Haer., i.26, 1) this Cerinthus, who was St. John's prime antagonist in Epistles, taught that Jesus was the son of Joseph and Mary, and was distinguished from other men only by superiority in justice, prudence and wisdom; that at His baptism the heavens opened upon the form of a dove; that on the eve of His Passion, the Christ again left Jesus, so that Jesus died and rose again, but the Christ, being spiritual, did not suffer. That is to say, that, in the language of the Gnostics, the Christ was "water... not with the water only, but with the blood..." (5 6). He who was baptized of John in Jordan, and He whose life-blood was shed on Calvary, is the God-man, and the same Christ, the same Son of God eternally.

A further consequence of the dualistic interpretation of existence is that sin, in the Christian meaning of sin, disappears. It is no longer a moral opposition (anomia), in the conception of the Gnostics, to good; it is a physical principle inherent in all non-spiritual. Not the soul, but the flesh is its organ; and redemption consists, not in the renewal of the moral nature, but in its emancipation from the flesh. This is no mere general contingency, but a definite tendency that is contemplated in the repeated warning: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive ourselves, and the truth is not in us" (1 8.10). With the nobler and more earnest spirits the practical corollary of this irreconcilable dualism in human nature was the ascetic life; but to others, the same principle readily suggested an opposite method of achieving the soul's deliverance from the yoke of the material—an attitude of moral indifference toward the deods of the body. Let the duality of nature be boldly reduced to practice. Let body and spirit be regarded as separate entities, each obeying its own laws, not united, not united as its own nature, without mutual interference; the spiritual nature could not be involved in, nor affected by, the deods of the flesh. Vehehm opposition to this deadly doctrine is prominent in the Ep. ("Sin is the law..." (3 4) and its converse "All unrighteousness is sin" (6 17), but esp. in the stringent emphasis laid upon actual conduct, "doing" righteousness or "doing" sin. The false spiritualism which regards the contemplation of heavenly things as of far superior importance to the requirements of commonplace morality is sternly reproved: "Little children, let no man lead you astray: he that doeth righteousness is righteous, even as he is righteous" (3 7); and the converse application of the same doctrine, that the mere "doing" of sin is of little or no moment to the "spiritual" man, is met with the trenchant declaration, "He that doeth sin is of the devil" (3 8). The whole passage (2 29—3 10) presupposes, as familiar to its readers, a doctrine of the preexistence of the spiritual man, according to which the status of the spiritual man is not to be tested by the commonplace facts of moral conduct. It is only as a passionate contradiction of this hateful tenet that the paradoxical language of 3.8.9 and 3.16 can be understood.

To the same polarized necessity is due the uniquely reiterated emphasis which the Ep. lays upon brotherly love, and the almost fierce tone in which the new commandment is promulgated. To the Gnostic, knowledge was the sum of attainment. "They give no heed to love," says Ignatius, "caring not for the widow, the orphan or the afflicted, neither for those who are in bonds nor for those who are released from bonds, neither for the hungry nor the thirsty." That a religion which banished neglected love should call itself Christian or claim affinity with Christianity excites St. John's hottest indignation; against it he lifts up his supreme truth, God is love, with its immediate consequence that to be without love is to have no love; the capacity for knowing God (4 7.8). The assumption of a lofty mystical piety apart from dutiful conduct in the ordinary relations of life is ruthlessly underlined as the vaunt of a self-deceiver (4 20); and the crucial test by which we are accused is that of the truth" is love "not in word, neither with the tongue; but in deed and truth" (3 18).
The question is raised whether the polemic of the Ep. is directed against the same persons throughout or whether in its two branches, the Christological and the ethical, it has different objects of attack. The latter view is maintained on the ground that the charge of a denial of the humanity of Christ is brought against the "antichrists," and there is no proof that docetism in Asia Minor lay open to such a charge. But the other view has greater probability. The Ep. suggests nothing else than that the same spirit of teaching which is assailing the faith of the church (4 6) is also a peril to the moral integrity of its life (3 7). And if there is no proof that docetism in Asia Minor was also antinomian, there is no proof that it was not. The probability is that it was. Docetism and the emancipation of the flesh were both natural fruits of the dualistic theory of life.

The name which unvarying tradition associates with the Ep., as St. John's chief antagonist in 1-3 and a doctrinarian of the crisis in 4-5 is that of Cerinthus. Untimely.

4. Cerinthus fortuitously the accounts which have come down to us of Cerinthus and his teaching are fragmentary and confused, and those of his character, though unambiguously, come only from opponents. But it is certain that he held a docetic view of the incarnation, and, according to the only accounts we possess, his character was that of a volubility. So far as they go, the historical data harmonize with the internal evidence of the Ep. to determine that the difference at the different periods in which it was written and the tendencies it combats are such as would be naturally evolved in the thought and practice of those who held, as Cerinthus did, that the material creation, and even the moral law, had its origin, not in the Same as God, but in an inferior power.

III. Structure and Summary.—In the judgment of many critics, the Ep. possesses nothing that can be called an articulate structure of thought, its aphoristic method admitting of no logical development; and this estimate has a large measure of support in the fact that there is no not writing regarding the plan of which there has been greater variety of opinion. The present writer believes, nevertheless, that it is coherent, and that, in its own unique way, the Ep. is a finely articulated composition. The word that best describes the author's mode of thinking is "spiral." The course of thought does not move from point to point in a straight line. It is always moving about the same center, always recurring to the same topics, but at a higher level.

Carefully following the topical order, one finds, e.g., a paragraph (2 3–6) insisting upon practical righteousness as a guaranty of the Christian life; then one finds this treated a second time in 2 29–3 10; and yet again in 5 3 and 5 18. Similarly, we find a paragraph on the necessity of love in 2 7–11, and again in 5 10–20, and yet again in 4 7–13, and also in 4 17–5 2. So, a paragraph concerning the necessity of holding the true belief in the incarnate Son of God in 2 18–28, in 4 1–6, and the same subject recurring in 4 13–16 and 5 4–12. And we shall observe that everywhere these indisputable characteristics of the Christian life are applied facts; that in effect the Ep. is an apparatus of tests, its definite object being to furnish its readers with the necessary criteria by which they may sift the false from the true, and satisfy themselves of their being "begotten of God." These things are written that ye may know that ye have eternal life (6 13). These fundamental tests of the Christian life—doing righteousness, loving one another, believing that Jesus is the Christ come in the flesh—are the connecting themes that bind together the whole structure of the Ep. Thus if we divide the Ep. into 3 main sections, the first ending at 2 28, the second at 4 6, the result is that in the first and second of these sections we find precisely the same topics coming in precisely the same order; while in the third section (7–6 21), though the sequence is somewhat different, the material is basically the same.

The leading themes, the tests of righteousness, love, and belief, are all present; and they alone are present. There is, therefore, a natural division of the Ep. into these three main sections, or, as they might be described, "cycles," each of which the same fundamental themes appear. On this basis we shall now give a brief analysis of its structure and summary of its contents.

The writer announces the source of the Christian revelation—the historical manifestation of the eternal Divine life in Jesus Christ—and declares himself a personal witness of the facts in 1:1–4 under which he fought. The incarnation of the Word, which was from the begining—"the eternal life, which was with the Father, and which we have seen, and which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, which we have beheld, and in which we have handled," (1:1–4).

1. The Prologue, 1:1–18.

2. First Cycle, 1:19–2:28. "God is light, and in him is no darkness at all" (ver. 5). What does this determine? The condition of fellowship with Him; and this, therefore, is not fortuitous; first, namely, that there must be fellowship with him and walk in the darkness" (1:6); positively (1:7): "If we walk in the light, what then is it to walk in the light, and what to walk in darkness? The answer is given in what follows.

(a) Paragraph A 1 8–2 6 (walking in the light tested by righteousness).

(b) Paragraph B 2 27–17 (walking in the light tested by love).

(c) Paragraph C 2 18–28 (walking in the light tested by belief).

The light of God not only reveals sin and duty, the children of God (our "brothers and the world") in their true character; it also reveals Jesus in His true character, as the "Son of God. And all that calls itself Christianity is to be tested by its reception or rejection of that truth. In this paragraph the light and darkness are referred to; but the continuity of thought with the preceding paragraphs is unmistakable. Throughout this first division of the Ep. the point of view is that of fellowship with God, through receiving and acting according to the light which He has shed upon the great things in the spiritual realm. Unreal Christianity in every form is cast down by this light. It is the antinomian "life" of him who says he has no light (2 5) yet is indifferent to keeping God's commandments (2 5), the life of leviness (2 6), or the life of claiming spiritual enlightenment, yet denies that Jesus is the Christ (2 22).

Divine salvation tested by righteousness, love and belief.

The main division of the Ep. began with the assertion of what God is as self-revealing—light. He becomes to us the light in which we behold our sin, our duty, our power, the world, our Maker, and all that we behold. In this fellowship with God, this second division, on the other hand, begins with the assertion (2) that the nature of sin is love, and thence deduces the essential characteristics of the "begotten of God." (a) Paragraph A, 2, 29—3 10a (Divine sonship testified by righteousness): This text is inevitable (vs 10a). The thought that the natural sonship of Cain is law is advanced (vs 4); (2) in the light of Christ's character, in which there is no sin, and of the purpose of His mission, which is to take away sin and break the power of sin (vs 5); (3) that doth righteousness is begotten of him (10a). But this now does, "begotten of God," arises for a time from the special application of this text by wonder and thanksgiving at the thought that sinful man is begotten of God (vs 11). (b) Paragraph A, 2, 29—3 10b (Divine sonship testified by love): This text is inevitable (vs 10b). The thought that the present endeavor after moral likeness to Christ (ver 3) leads back to the main theme, that the life of Divine sonship is by necessity of nature one of absolute antago nism to all sin. This necessity is exhibited (1) in the light of Christ's mission, that God is love (vs 4); (2) in the light of Christ's character, in which there is no sin, and of the purpose of His mission, which is to take away sin and break the power of sin (vs 5); (3) that doth righteousness is begotten of him (10a). But this now does, "begotten of God," arises for a time from the special application of this text by wonder and thanksgiving at the thought that sinful man is begotten of God (vs 11).

2. Third Cycle, 3:29—4:6

(a) Paragraph C, 3:29—4:4 (Divine sonship testified by belief): This text is inevitable (3:29). We know that he abideth in us, by the Spirit which he gave us, and the Spirit is truth (1 John 2:27); the Spirit that confesseth that Jesus Christ is come in the flesh (3:29). On the other hand, the Spirit that confessesteth that Jesus is the spirit of Antichrist (3:14). Then follows recapitulation (vs 23, 24b), combining, under the category of "manifestation," love and belief on His Son, Jesus Christ. Thus a transition is made to Paragraph C.

(b) Paragraph C, 3:10—4:6 (Divine sonship testified by love). In this closing part, the Ep. rises to its loftiest heights, the logical analysis of it is more difficult. It may be divided into two main sections 1. 3:1—7 2. 3:7—12. The good news that God is love is the mission of Christ (ver 9); which is also the absolute revelation of what love, truly so called, is (ver 10). But this love of God imposes upon us an unceasing obligation to love one another (ver 11); and only from the flowing over of this love in love can we obtain the assurance that "God abideth in us" (ver 12).

(i) Paragraph B, 4:13—15: This paragraph strives to emphasize its practical application to the Christian life. The true belief is indispensable as a guaranty of correct belief; and because the Spirit of God is the author (ver 13). The true belief is that "Jesus is the Son of God" (ver 14:15). In this is found the vital ground of Christian love (ver 16).

(ii) Paragraph C, 4:17—5:3a: Here the subject is the effect, motives and manifestations of brotherly love. The effect is coördination toward God (vs 17—18); the motives: (1) God's love to us (ver 19); (2) that only the person begotten of God (1 John 4:7) is capable of this love (ver 20); (3) that this is Christ's commandment (ver 21); (4) that it is the natural instinct of spiritual children (5:1); but separable from righteousness. We truly love the children of God only when we love God, and God only when we keep His commandments (vs 23, 24).

(iii) Paragraph C, 4:17—5:3a: Here the subject is the effect, motives and manifestations of brotherly love. The effect is coördination toward God (vs 17—18); the motives: (1) God's love to us (ver 19); (2) that only the person begotten of God (1 John 4:7) is capable of this love (ver 20); (3) that this is Christ's commandment (ver 21); (4) that it is the natural instinct of spiritual children (5:1); but separable from righteousness. We truly love the children of God only when we love God, and God only when we keep His commandments (vs 23, 24).

(b) Paragraph A, 5:5a—21, on belief. — (i) Paragraph A, 5:5a—21, on belief. It is impossible only through belief. It is our faith which makes the commandments "not grievous," otherwise it becomes the world. (vs 5, 6) Then follows a restatement of the contents of the true belief, specially directed against the Cerinthian heresy (vs 6); and then a reiterated declaration of its being the test and guaranty of possessing eternal life (vs 11, 12).

2. Critical Views

2. Critical Views. — The Epistle to the Jewish Christians is not applicable to the Jewish church. All the Fathers already mentioned as quoting the Ep. (excepting Polycarp, but including Irenaeus) quote it as the work of St. John; and, until the end of the 16th. cent., this opinion was held as unquestionable. The first of modern scholars to challenge it was Joseph Scaliger (1540—1609), who rejected the entire right of Johannean Ep. as unapostolic; and in later times a dual authorship of the Gospel and the First Ep. has been maintained by Baur, R. J. Holtmann, Pflüger, von Soden, and others; although on this particular point other adherents of this conundr. (e.g., Jülicher, Wrede and Wenzel) accept the traditional view.

Thus two questions are raised: first, what light does the Ep. shed upon the personality of its own author? And second, whether or not 3. Internal Evidence

3. Internal Evidence. — The Ep. furnishes no clue by which we can identify the writer, it enables us very distinctly to class him. His relation to his readers, as we have seen, is intimate. The absence of explicit reference to either writer or readers only shows how intimately it was. For the writer to the Jewish Christians, his style is superficial. Thought, language, tone—all were too familiar to be mistaken. The Ep. bore its author's signature in every line. His position toward his readers was, moreover, authoritative. As has already been said, the natural interpretation of 1:23 is that the relation between them was that of teacher and taught. (By this fact we may account for the enigmatic brevity of such a passage as that on the unbelief of the Jews, “and so he is, for what is born of the Spirit is life eternal,” John 3:36.) The writer intended, only to recall fuller oral expositions formerly given of the same topics. The writer is at any rate a person of so distinctive eminence and recognized authority that it is not necessary to remind the reader that he is or by what circumstances he is compelled now to address them through the medium of writing; their knowledge of both facts is taken for granted. And all this agrees with the traditional account of St. John’s relation to the churches of Asia Minor in the last decades of the 1st cent. Further, the writer claims to be one of the original witnesses of the facts of the incarnate life: “That which was from the beginning, that which we have heard, that which we have seen with our eyes, that which we beheld, and our hands handled, concerning the Word of life (and the life was manifested, and we have seen, and bear witness, and declare unto you the life, the eternal life, which was with the Father, and we have manifested to you) that which we have seen and heard declare we unto you also, that ye also may have fellowship with us” (1:1-3). To understand the “Word of life” here as the gospel (Westcott, Rothe, Haupt) seems to the present writer frankly impossible; and not less so the theories by which the words “what we have heard, what we have seen with our eyes,” etc., are regarded as utterances of the “faith-mysticism” or the “collective testimony” of the early church. It is difficult, and was doubtless not primarily adapted to convey the impression that the writer is one of the original, first-hand witnesses of Christ’s life and resurrection (“that which we beheld, and our hands handled”); cf. Lk 24:39. At furthest, the use of such language is otherwise compatible with veracity only on the supposition that the writer was recognized by the church as so closely identified with the original witnesses that he could speak of their testimony as virtually his own. But, apart from the presumption that he cannot mean to imply that the church and all the disciples of Jesus, there is really nothing to be said for this supposition. So far as the internal evidence is concerned, the ancient and unbroken tradition which assigns to it the apostle John must be regarded as binding the church, and, indeed, the traditional authorship is dispelled by arguments of the most convincing kind. Whether the arguments brought against the apostolic authorship of the Johannine writings as a whole possess this character is too large a question to be investigated here. Yet the kernel of it lies in small compass. It is whether room can be found within the 1st cent. for so advanced a stage of theological development as is reached in the Johannine writings, and whether this development can be conceivably attributed to one of the disciples of Jesus, who was not a member of the original apostles. To neither of these questions, as it appears to the present writer, is a dogmatically negative answer warranted. If within a period comparatively so brief, Christian thought had already passed through the earlier and later Pauline developments, and through such a development as we find in the Ep. to the He, there is no obvious reason why it may not have attained to the Johannine, within the lifetime of the last survivor of the apostles. Nor, when we consider that John’s thought was manifesting itself in the church, which was surrounded, if, as tradition says, he lived on to a green old age in Ephesus, is there any obvious reason why he may not have been the chief instrument of that development. V. Relationship to the Fourth Gospel.—The further question remains as to the internal evidence the Ep. supplies regarding its relation to the Fourth Gospel. Prima facie, Character-istics—the case for identity of authorship is strongly suggestive. The two writings are equally saturated with that spiritual and theological atmosphere; they are equally characterized by that type of thought which we call Johannine and which presents an interpretation of Christ wholly different from any other than that of Paul. Both exhibit the same mental and moral habit of viewing every subject with an eye that stoically beholds radical antagonisms and is blind to approximations. There is in both the same strongly Hobist style of composition; the same development of ideas by parallelism or antithesis; the same repetition of keywords like “begotten of God,” “abiding,” “keeping his commandments”; the same monotonous simplicity in the construction of sentences, with avoidance of relative clauses and singular parsimony in the use of connecting particles; the same apparently tautological habit of resuming consideration of a subject from a slightly different point of view; the same restricted range of vocabulary, with words more or less identical to an extent unparalleled in two independent writings. The evidence for these statements cannot be presented here in full; but the following are some of the words and phrases characteristic of both and not found elsewhere in the Gospels of NT. —The Word, joy fulfilled, to see the Father, the Spirit, the world, to have sin, Paraclete, to keep the word of Christ, to believe, to be begotten of God, to be pure, to do sin, to take away sins, the devil, works of the devil, to be abiding, to be the truth, to have eternal life, life in the present sense, to believe. The following are some of the terms common to both, which are found very rarely elsewhere in the NT: Beginning (= past eternity), to be manifested, (9 times), to receive, based on the Ep., 33 in the Gospel, once only in Mt, once in Lk, not at all in Mk, light (metaphorical), walk (metaphorical), to lead astray, to know (God, Christ, or Spirit, 8 in the Ep., 10 in the Gospel), true (allelúghê), to confess Jesus (elsewhere only in Rom 10:9), children of God, to destroy (lithéin, elsewhere only in 2 Pet), the spirit of truth, to send (apostellein, of mission of Christ), only begotten son, to have the witness (elsewhere only in Apoc), to hear (= to answer prayer.) On the other hand, the divergences of vocabulary are not more numerous. One particular instance, of which the Gospel is largely composed, are foreign to the Ep. The discrepancy, when closely examined, sometimes turns out to be a point of real similarity. Thus the particle oùs occurs nearly 200 times in the Gospel, 30 in the Ep. Moreover, in the Fourth Gospel it is used only in narrative, no occurrence of it being found, e.g. in chs 14-16. Of the words and phrases contained in the Ep., but not in the Gospel, the great majority are accounted for by the fact that they are used in-connection with topics which are not dealt with in the Gospel. Apart from these, the following may be noted: the last part being italicized: "Word of life, fellowship, to confess sins (nowhere else in the NT), to cleanse from sin, propitiation (killaomai, nowhere else in the NT), perfected or perfect love, last hour, Antichrist, awaiting, to give of the spirit, to have (Father, Son) boldness (Godward), Parousia, inscrutableness, seed (of Christ), come in the flesh, God is a liar, understanding. As regards style and diction, therefore, it seems impossible to contact of two independent literary productions having a striking affinity.

Arguments for a dual authorship are based chiefly on certain theological emphasis and developments in the Ep., which are absent from the Gospel; and invariably these arguments have been pressed with complete disregard of the fact that the one writing purports, at least, to be a "popular" idiom of a Judgment Day. But it ought to be noted that in the Ep., as compared with the Gospel, the eschatological perspective is foreshortened. The author writes under the conviction that "the world is passing away" and that the "last hour" of its day has come (3:18). And it is an unwar rantable assumption that he must, if he wrote the Gospel, have been guilty of the manifest anachronism of importing this conviction into it.

Apart from this the fundamental similarities between the eschatology of the Ep. and that of the Gospel are far more striking than the differences. In both, eternal life is conceived of as a present and not merely a future possession. In both, Christ's presence is an abiding reality—"Our fellowship is with the Father, and with his Son Jesus Christ" (1:3). If the Gospel speaks of the revelation of Christ as bringing present and inevitable "judgment" into the world, the Ep. is saturated with the same thought. If, on the other hand, the Ep. speaks of a visitation, a parousia, this is plainly a divine projection (2:28). If the Ep. makes a single reference to the Day of Judgment (4:17), the Gospel has 6 passages which speak of the "last day," and in these the "last day" is explicitly the day of resurrection (11:24) and of judgment (12:48). In the two writings different themes of the eschatological picture may be made or less conspicuous; but there is no such diversity as to warrant the hypothesis of a separate authorship.

Again, it is urged that in the Ep. the Logos is modified in the direction of conformity to traditional doctrine. The conception of the personal, pre-existent Logos, who "in the beginning was," and "was with God," and "was God" (1:1) was new, it is said, and, because of its gnostic tinge, was to be avoided. But in the Ep. the personified "Word of life" (1:1). But why should the "Word of life" necessarily signify anything less personal than the phraseology of the Gospel? The phraseology in both cases is exactly adapted to the situation. The relation between them in this respect is far closer than that between the Acts of the Apostles and the Third Gospel, or even any two of St. Paul's Ep., except those to the Eph and the Col.

Theology of the NT; articles by Salmon in HDB; by Schmiedel in EB; and by Häring in Theologische Abhandlungen. W. Weissacker's German, the fullest investigation of the relationship of the Ep. to the Fourth Gospel will be found in a series of articles by H. Holtzmann in the Jahrbücher für protestantische Theologie (1882–83); in English, in Brooke's Compare the Lamps of Life, 3d ed. THE SECOND AND THIRD EPISTLES

It is not surprising that these brief and fugitive Epp. are among the NT writings which have had the hardest struggle for canonical recognition. One is probably, the other certainly, a private letter; and neither has the same reason nor the same opportunity for their circulation existed, as in the case of church letters. The 2d Ep. contains little that is distinctive; the 3d Ep. is occupied with a vexatious episode in the internal history of a single congregation. Both are written by a person who designates himself simply as “the Presbyter”; and the names of the person (or church) to which the one is addressed and of the church with whose affairs the other is concerned are alike unknown.

The fact, therefore, that, in spite of such obstacles, these letters did become widely known and eventually attained to canonical rank is proof of a general conviction of the soundness of the tradition which assigned them to the apostle John.

Like all the cath. epp., they were unknown to the early Syriac church; when 1 Jn, 1 Pet and Jas were included in the canon at an early date, in Gaul (Irenaeus); Rome (Mamertine Papyri, 3d cent.), where, however, the reading is corrupt, and it is doubtful whether their authorship is ascribed or denied to the apostle John; Alexandria (Clement, who is not to be considered among the fathers, speaks of John's larger epistle, implying the existence of one or more minor epp.); Africa (Cyprian reports that 2 Jn was appealed to at the Synod of Carthage, 256 AD). Dionysius, Origine's disciple and successor, speaks of John's calling himself in them “the Presbyter.” Eusebius, though conscientiously placing them among the antilegomena, elsewhere writes in a way which indicates that he himself did not share the doubt of their authenticity.

It is evident that the ultimate decision of the early church regarding these letters. Quite evidently the 2d Ep. must have been written by the author of the 1st, or was an arrant and apparently purposeless piece of plagiarism. The 3d Ep. is inevitably associated with the 2d by the superscription, “the Presbyter,” and by other links of thought and phraseology.

The mention of this title opens up a wide question. The famous extract from Papias (Euseb., HDB, II, 30) would seem to indicate that the title “Presbyter” John (see John, GOSPEL OF, II, 5). Jerome, moreover, speaks of the two smaller Epp. as, in contrast with the 1st, ascribed to the Presbyter (De Vir. Illust., ix); Eusebius inclines to ascribe to him the Book of Rev.; and modern critics, like Weizäcker and Harnack, have improved upon the hint by finding in this shadowy personage the author of the Fourth Gospel. Into this farreaching controversy I make no attempt to enter. See also DRUMMOND, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel, ch iii.

1. Canon and Authorship.

2. The Presbyter.

The Second Epistle. — The brief note gives a uniquely authentic and intimate glimpse of some aspects of church life as it existed in Asia Minor (this may be taken as certain) somewhere about the end of the 1st cent. It concerns a certain episode in the history of one of the churches under the writer's supervision, and incidentally furnishes character-sketches of two of its members, the large-hearted and hospitable Gaius, to whom it is written (and to whom it is no other than the same Gaius mentioned in the NT), and the loquacious, overbearing Diotrephes; also of the faithful Demetrius, by whose hand probably the letter is sent. The story which may be gathered from the Ep. seems to be as follows. A band of itinerant teachers had been sent for by the presbyter's authority, no doubt, and furnished by him with letters of commendation to the various churches, and among others to that of which Gaius and Diotrephes were the members. Diotrephes, however, through jealousy for the right to control the local community or for some personal reason, not only declined to receive the itinerant teachers, but exerted his authority to impose the same course of action upon the church as a whole, even to the Presbyter (De Vir. Illust., ix); Eusebius inclines to ascribe to him the Book of Rev.; and modern critics, like Weizäcker and Harnack, have improved upon the hint by finding in this shadowy personage the author of the Fourth Gospel. length of threatening with excommunication (ver 10) those who took a different view of their duty. Gaius alone had not been intimidated, but had welcomed to his home the repulsed and disheartened teachers, who when they returned (to Ephesus, probably) had testified to the church of his courage and large-hearted behavior (ver 6). At 2d time, apparently, the teachers are now sent forth (ver 6), with Demetrius as their leader, who brings this letter to Gaius, commending his past conduct (ver 5) and encouraging him to persevere in it (ver 10). The Epistle is addressed to a letter to the church also (ver 9); but evidently he has little hope that it will be effectual in overcoming the headstrong opposition of Diotrephes; for he promises that he will speedily pay a personal visit to the church, when he will depose Diotrephes from his pride of place and bring him to account for his sordid "prating" and overbearing conduct (ver 10). So far as appears, the cause of friction was purely personal or administrative. There is no hint of heretical tendency in Diotrephes and his party. Pride of place and own importance and a violent jealousy for what he regarded as his own prerogative, which he was afraid to identify with the autonomy of the local church.

The Second Epistle.—The letter is addressed to 'the elect lady' (better, to "the lady Electa"). Its tone throughout is peculiarly affectionate; there is a warm rush of emotion, esp. in the opening verses, than is characteristic of St. John's usual reserve. But in these verses the keynote of the Ep. is struck—truth. The writer testifies love for his correspondent and his children "in truth;" this love is shared by all who "know the truth" (ver 1), and it is "for the truth's sake which abideth in us, and shall be with us for ever" (ver 2). What follows (vs 4—9) is in effect an epitome of the 1st Ep. After declaring his joy at finding certain of her children "walking in truth," he proceeds to expound, quite in the style of the 1st Ep., what "walking in truth" is. It is to love one another (ver 5; cf 1 Jn 2 7—11); but this love is manifested in keeping God's commandments (ver 6; cf 1 Jn 5 2,3); and no less in steadfast adherence to the genuine doctrine of the Gospel (cf 1 Jn 3 12—15). But besides these duties, he adds, there is a world, even they that confess not that Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh" (ver 7; cf 1 Jn 4 1—3). Then follows an exhortation to stedfastness (ver 8), and a warning that whoever in the name of progress departs from it, departs from the faith of the simple (vs 10,11); and the Ep. closes with the hope of a speedy and joyful meeting "face to face" of the writer and his correspondent, to whom he conveys greetings from the children of her "elect sister."

Whether the "elect lady," or "lady Electa" of his letter is a real person or the personification of a church is a point which has been debated from ancient times and is still unsolved. The solution has been found, it is true, if we can accept the hypothesis (put forward by Zahn and Schmiedel and adopted by Findlay) that this is the letter referred to in 3 Jn ver 9. It is urged on behalf of this supposition that the two Ep. are curiously identical in phraseology. In both the writer begins by describing his correspondent as one whom "I love and desire to come to you both because of his fruit (eschärmen lian). 2 Jn ver 4, "I rejoice greatly," not found elsewhere in the NT to declare his joy at finding "thy [my] children walking in the truth;" and in both he concludes by saying that he has "many things to write," but that, looking forward to an early interview "face to face," he will not commit these further thoughts to "paper and ink." It is argued that "none but a chancery clerk could have chung so closely to his epistolary formulae" in two private letters written at different times and put in different forms. But the force of this argument largely vanishes when we look at the formulae in question. If a modern writer may conclude hundreds of friendly letters by subscribing himself "yours sincerely," or the like, so why may not something equally has dispatched two letters to the church also (ver 9); but evidently he has little hope that it will be effectual in overcoming the headstrong opposition of Diotrephes; for he promises that he will speedily pay a personal visit to the church, when he will depose Diotrephes from his pride of place and bring him to account for his sordid "prating" and overbearing conduct (ver 10). So far as appears, the cause of friction was purely personal or administrative. There is no hint of heretical tendency in Diotrephes and his party. Pride of place and own importance and a violent jealousy for what he regarded as his own prerogative, which he was afraid to identify with the autonomy of the local church.

The Second Epistle.—The letter is addressed to 'the elect lady' (better, to "the lady Electa"). Its tone throughout is peculiarly affectionate; there is a warm rush of emotion, esp. in the opening verses, than is characteristic of St. John's usual reserve. But in these verses the keynote of the Ep. is struck—truth. The writer testifies love for his correspondent and his children "in truth;" this love is shared by all who "know the truth" (ver 1), and it is "for the truth's sake which abideth in us, and shall be with us for ever" (ver 2). What follows (vs 4—9) is in effect an epitome of the 1st Ep. After declaring his joy at finding certain of her children "walking in truth," he proceeds to expound, quite in the style of the 1st Ep., what "walking in truth" is. It is to love one another (ver 5; cf 1 Jn 2 7—11); but this love is manifested in keeping God's commandments (ver 6; cf 1 Jn 5 2,3); and no less in steadfast adherence to the genuine doctrine of the Gospel (cf 1 Jn 3 12—15). But besides these duties, he adds, there is a world, even they that confess not that Jesus Christ cometh in the flesh" (ver 7; cf 1 Jn 4 1—3). Then follows an exhortation to stedfastness (ver 8), and a warning that whoever in the name of progress departs from it, departs from the faith of the simple (vs 10,11); and the Ep. closes with the hope of a speedy and joyful meeting "face to face" of the writer and his correspondent, to whom he conveys greetings from the children of her "elect sister."

Whether the "elect lady," or "lady Electa" of his letter is a real person or the personification of a church is a point which has been debated from ancient times and is still unsolved. The solution has been found, it is true, if we can accept the hypothesis (put forward by Zahn and Schmiedel and adopted by Findlay) that this is the letter referred to in 3 Jn ver 9. It is urged on behalf of this supposition that the two Ep. are curiously identical in phraseology. In both the writer begins by describing his correspondent as one whom "I love and desire to come to you both because of his fruit (eschärmen lian). 2 Jn ver 4, "I rejoice greatly," not found elsewhere in the NT to declare his joy at finding "thy [my] children walking in the truth;"
dispense hospitality, and of wide influence, one believed of "all them that know the truth," whose words would be listened to and whose example would be followed. In view of the ominous spreading of the leaven of Antichrist, it is not difficult to suppose that the Presbyter should write to such a person in such a strain. Nor does there seem to be anything esp. odd in the fact of the children of a private family sending their respects to their master through the apostle John ( Ibid.). If he was intimate with that family, and in their immediate vicinity at the time of writing, it appears a natural thing for them to have done. Possibly Dr. Harris' "explained" "prehistoric countess of Huntington" is not so far astray as a modern equivalent of the lady Electa.

II. External Evidence for the Fourth Gospel.

Only an outline of the external evidence for the Fourth Gospel, which concerns both date and authorship, can be given in this article. Fuller information may be sought in the Intros to the Commentaries on the Gospel, by Godet, Westcott, Luthardt, Meyer; in鑫Abb’s The Fourth Gospel and Its Authorship; in M’Clinton’s Intro to the NT, III; in Sanday’s The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel; in Drummond’s The Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel. All these and many others defend the Johannine authorship. On the other side, reference may be made to the author of Supernatural Religion, of which many editions have appeared. Among recent works, Moffatt’s Intro to the NT, and B. W. Bacon’s Fourth Gospel in Research and Debate, may be mentioned as denying the Johannine authorship.

The external evidence is as follows. At the end of the 2d cent., the Christian church was in possession of four Gospels, which were used as sacred books, read in churches of 2d Cent. in public worship, held in honor as authoritative, and seen as a part of a Canon of Scripture (see Gospels). One of these was the Fourth Gospel, universally ascribed to the apostle John as its author. We have the evidence on this point of Irenaeus, of Tertullian, of Clement of Alexandria, a little later of Origen. Clement is witness for the belief and practice of the church in Egypt and Phrygia; Tertullian for the church in Africa; and Irenaeus, who was brought up in Asia Minor, was a teacher at Rome, and was bishop of Lyons in Gaul, for the churches in those lands. The belief was so unquestioned, that Irenaeus could give reasons for it which would of themselves have convinced no one who had not already had the conviction which the reasons were meant to sustain. To discount the evidence of Irenaeus, Tertullian and Clement on the ground of the desire to find apostolic authorship for their sacred books, is not argument but mere assertion. There may have been such a tendency, but in the case of the four Gospels there is no proof that there was necessity for this at the end of the 2d cent. For there is evidence of the belief in the apostolic authorship of two Gospels by apostles, and of two by companions of the apostles, as an existing fact in the churches long before the end of the 2d cent.

The importance of the testimony of Irenaeus is measured by the efforts which have been made to discredit it. There are many links of connection between Irenaeus and the apostolic age. There is specially his connection with Polycarp. He himself describes that relationship in his letter to Florinus, a fellow-disciple of Polycarp, who had lapsed into Gnosticism, in which he says, "On these things the length of time is more clearly than that of recent years. For what boys learn, growing with their mind, becomes joined with it; so that I am able to describe the very place in which the blessed Polycarp sat, as he discoursed, and his going out and coming in, and the manner of his life, and his physical appearance and his discourses to the people, and the accounts which he gave of his intercourse with John and the others who had seen the Lord" (Euseb., HE, V, 20: McGiffert, Iren., II, p. 166). The time of the death of Irenaeus at that time, but he was of sufficient age to receive the impressions which, after many years, he recorded. Polycarp was martyred in 155 AD, and he had been a Christian for 60 years when he was martyred. This is also a link between Irenaeus and the apostolic age. Another link was constituted by his association with Pothinus, his predecessor in Lyons. Pothinus was a very old man when he was martyred, and had in his possession the traditions of the church of Gaul. Thus, Irenaeus, through these and others, had the opportunity of knowing the belief of the churches, and what he records is not only his own personal testimony, but the universal tradition of the church.

With Irenaeus should be listed the apostolic witness of Theophilus (c 170), the earliest writer to mention St. John by name as the author of the Gospel. In prefacing a quotation from the commencement of the prologue, he says, "This is what we learn from the sacred writings, and from all men animated by the Spirit, among whom John says" (Ad Autol., ii,22). Theophilus is further stated by Jerome to have composed a Harmony of the four Gospels (De Viris Illust., 25).

From Irenaeus and Theophilus we ascend nearer to the end of the 2d cent., and here we encounter the Diatessaron of Tatian, on which much need not be said. The Diatessaron is likewise a Harmony of the four Gospels, and this Harmony dates not later than 170. It begins with the 1st ver of the Fourth Gospel, and ends with the last ver of the appendix to the Gospel. Tatian was a pupil of Justin Martyr, and that fact alone renders it probable that the "Memoirs of 2d Cent. of the Apostles," which Justin quotes with spirit, are those of Tatian. Tatian was afterward combined in the Diatessaron. That Justin knew the Fourth Gospel seems clear, though we cannot argue the question here. If he did, it follows that it was in existence about the year 130.

But there is evidence that helps us to trace the influence of the Fourth Gospel back to the year 110. "The first clear traces of the Fourth Gospel upon the thought and language etc of the church are found in the Epp. of Ignatius (c 110 AD). How unmistakable these traces are is shown by the fact that not infrequently this dependence of Ignatius upon John has been used as an argument against the genuineness of the Ignatian letters" (Zahn, Intro, III, 176). This argument may now be safely used since the Epp. have been vindicated as historical documents by Lightfoot and by Zahn. If the Ignatian Epp. are saturated with the tone and spirit of the Johannine writings, that goes to show that this mode of thought and expression was prevalent in the church of Asia at the beginning of the 2d cent., that distinctive mode of thought and speech which we call Johannine had an existence.

A further line of evidence in favor of the Gospel, which need only be referred to, lies in the use made of it by the Gnostics. That the Gospel was used by the Valentinians and Basilides has been shown by Dr. Drummond (op. cit., 265-343).

To estimate aright the force of the above evidence, it is to be remembered that it is already observed, there were many disciples of John the the John of Ephesus, to whom the Presbyter harni...
Tatian. It was quoted, commented on, and interpreted by the Gnostics. In truth the external evidence for the early date and Johannean authorship of the Fourth Gospel is as great both in extent and variety as that of any book of the NT, and far greater than any that we possess for any work of classical antiquity.

The history of the controversy on the Johannean authorship is not here entered into. Apart from the objections of the Agnostics (who attributed the Gospel to Corinthus) in the 2d cent., no voice was heard in challenge of its authenticity by the Hellenists, of whom the 17th cent., and serious assault did not begin till the 19th.

(Bretschneider, 1820, Strauss, 1835, Wellse, 1838, Blessing, 1841, Olshausen, 1844 and 1854, and others.) The attacks were vigorously repelled by other scholars (Griesbach, Luthardt, critical scholars, etc. Some adopted, in various forms and degrees, the hypothesis of an apostolic basis for the Gospel, regarded as the work of a later hand (Westzicker, Renan, etc.) From this point the controversy has proceeded with an increasing degree of acuteness and the consciousness of genuineness and trustworthiness of the Gospel, but not less firmness on the part of its defenders. The present state of opinion is indicated in the text.

III. Characteristics of the Gospel: Internal Evidence.—The external evidence for the Fourth Gospel is criticized, but it is chiefly on 1. General internal grounds that the opposition to the Johannean authorship and history of the Gospel is based. Stress is laid on the broad contrast which admittedly exists in style, character and plan, between the Fourth Gospel and the Synoptics; its supposed philosophic and mystical character; the number and importance of the parables; the absence of the name of Christ in the discourse of the author of the Gospel; the references to individual events; the considerable agreement of the Synoptics; the alleged erasures and contradictions; and the absence of progress in the narrative, etc. The defence of the Gospel is usually conducted by pointing out the different aims of the Gospel, rebutting exaggerations in the above objections, and showing that in a multitude of ways the author of the Gospel reveals his identity with the apostle John. He was, e.g., a Jew, a Palestinian Jew, one familiar with the topography of Jesus, etc., an apostle, an eyewitness, the disciple whom Jesus loved (13:23; 20:2; 21:7, 20). The attestation in 21:24 of those who knew the author in his lifetime is of the greatest weight in this connection. Instead of following these familiar lines of argument (for which see Godet, Luthardt, Westcott, Ex. Abbot, Drummond, etc., in works cited), a consideration is here sought on the lines of a fresh comprehensive study.

The study of the Johannean writings in general, and of the Fourth Gospel in particular, has been approached in many ways and from various points of view. One of the most common of these was the comparison of its contents with those of the Synoptics, which assumes that here we have the product of Christian reflection on the facts discemible in the Synoptics. These facts have been modified by the experience of the church, and the consciousness of the church at the end of the 1st cent. or the beginning of the 2d. By this time, it is assumed, the church, now mainly a gentile church, has been greatly influenced by Gr-Rom culture, that she has been reflecting on the wonder of her own history, and has so modified the original tradition as to assimilate it to the new environment. In the Fourth Gospel, it is said, we have the highest and most elaborate presentation of the outcome of the process. Starting with St. John's infancy, John, if we may accept his word, traces for us the whole process until a school of theologians at Ephesus produced the Johannean writings, and the consciousness of the church was satisfied with the completeness of the new presentation of Christianity (cf. John Research & Deluge, etc.).

Heb. ideas in Heb. form, the facts of the Gospel so transformed as to be acceptable to the Hellenistic mind—this is the nature of the Synoptics, etc. Others again come to the Gospel with the presupposition that the writer intended to present to the reader a complete view of the life of Jesus, and that it is intended to supplement and to correct the statements of the Synoptics and to meet the new needs of the church at the beginning of the 2d cent. Others find a polemical aim in the Gospel. Weizsäcker e.g. finds a strong polemical aim against the Jews. He says, "There are the objections raised by the Jews against the church after its succession has been so established, and after the development of the person of its Christ has passed through its most essential stages. It is not a controversy of the school carried back into the history of the life" (Apostolic Age, II, 222). One would have expected a statement so forcibly buttressed by some evidence; that we might have some historical evidence regarding a controversy in the church beyond what we have in the Fourth Gospel itself. But nothing is offered by Weizsäcker except the dictum that it is a polemical aim. The case may be, however, that these arguments were put forward by Justin, mainly regarded the interpretation of the OT, and are not those which are discussed in the Fourth Gospel.

Perhaps the most surprising of all the presuppositions with regard to the Fourth Gospel is that which lays great stress on the supposition that the book was largely intended to vindicate a Christian doctrine and the sacraments which flourished at the beginning of the 2d cent. According to this presupposition, the Fourth Gospel set forth a doctrine of the sacraments which placed them in a unique position as a means of salvation. While scarcely contending that the doctrine of the sacraments held by the church of the 2d cent. had reached that stage of development which meets us in the mediaeval church, it is, according to this hypothesis, toward that goal afterward reached. We do not dwell on this view, for the exegesis that finds sacramentarianism in the Fourth Gospel alone, and we do not put the sacraments in the place of Christ. Finally, when we do not find the contention here, we can only say that the Fourth Gospel was written with a view of making the gospel of Jesus more acceptable to the Gentiles any more satisfactorily. As a matter of fact, the Gospel which was most acceptable to the Gentiles was the Gospel according to Mark. It is more frequently quoted by any other. In the writings of the early church, it is quoted as often as all the other Gospels put together. When John is written in the 2d cent., the Fourth Gospel did not contain a dogma which was common in the Christian church until the rise of the Christological controversies in the 3d cent.

When, after dwelling on these ways of approaching the Fourth Gospel, and results already made on the Gospel by those who 3. Real aim approach it with these presuppositions of Gospel—and demands, we turn to the Gospel itself, and ask regarding its aim and purpose, we find a simple answer. The writer of it expresses says: "Many other signs therefore did Jesus in the presence of his disciples, which are not written in this book: these are written, that ye may believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God; and that faith in his name give life in his name" (20 30.31). Pursuing this clue, and putting away all the presuppositions which bulk so largely in introductions, exegeses, histories of the apostolic and sub-apostolic ages, one meets with many sure indications.

(1) Relation to Synoptics.—In relation to the Synoptics, the differences are great, but more surprising is the fact that the points of contact between these Gospels and the Fourth Gospel are so few. The critics to whom reference has been made are unanimous that the writer or the school which compiled the Johannean writings was indebted to the Synoptics for almost all the facts embodied in the Fourth Gospel. Apart, however; from the Passion Week, only two points of contact are found so obvious that they cannot be doubted, viz., the feeding of the 5,000, and the walking on the sea (6:4-21).

The healing of the child of the royal officer (4:46-53) can scarcely be identified with the healing of the centurion's servant (Mt, Lk); but even if the identification were allowed, this is all we have in the Fourth Gospel. Fourth Gospel is not in Galilee. There is a ministry in Galilee, but the earlier ministry in Judaea and in Galilee began before John was cast into prison (3:24), and it has no parallel in the Synoptics. In fact, the Fourth Gospel assumes the existence of the other three, and does not anew convey the knowledge which can be gathered from them. It takes its own way, makes its own selections, and sets these forth from its own point of view. It has its own principle of selection: that plainly indicated in the passage already quoted. The scenes depicted, the works done, the words spoken, are the reflections of those who deal with it as a writer, and all directed toward the aim of enabling the readers to believe that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. In the writer’s view this would issue in their obtaining life in His name.

The Time occupied in the Gospel.—Accepting this principle for our guidance, we turn to the Gospel, and the first thing that strikes the reader is the small amount of the real time filled up, or occupied, by the scenes described in the Gospel. We take the night of the betrayal, and the day of the crucifixion. The things done and the words spoken on that day, from one sunset to another, occupy no fewer than 7 chs of the Gospel (chs 13–19). Apart from the supplementary ch (21), there are 20 chs in the Gospel, containing 697 vs, and these 7 chs have 257 vs. More than one-third of the whole given to the ministry is thus occupied with the events of one day.

Again, according to Acts 1 3, there was a ministry of the risen Lord which lasted for 40 days, and of all that happened during these days John records only on the day of the resurrection, and on another day 8 days after (ch 20). The incidents recorded in the other Gospels fall into the background, are taken for granted, and only the signs done on these two days are recorded here. They are recorded because they are of significance for the purpose he has in hand, of inducing belief in the truth that Jesus is the Christ, the Son of God. If we continue to follow the clues thus afforded, we shall be surprised at the fewness of the days on which anything was transacted. As we read the story of the Fourth Gospel, there are many indications of the passing of time, and many precise statements of date. We learn from the Gospel that the ministry of Jesus probably lasted for 3 years. We gather this from the number of the feasts which He attended at Jerusalem. We have notes of time spent in journeys, but no account of anything that happened during them. The days on which anything was done or anything said are very few. We are told that “six days Jesus came to Bethany, where Lazarus was” (12 1 ff), and with regard to these 6 days we are told only of the supper and the anointing of the feet of Jesus by Mary, of the entry into Jerusalem, the visit of the Queen of Sheba, and of the meals of the Pharisees. But in which of these meals was Jesus? We have also the reflections of the evangelist on the unbelief of the Jews, but nothing further. We know that many other things did happen on these days, but they are not recorded in this Gospel. Apart from the two days during which Jesus dwelt in the place where He was, of which days nothing is recorded, the time occupied with the raising of Lazarus is the story of one day (ch 11). So it is also with the healing of the blind man. The healing is done one day, and the significance of that healing is all that is recorded of another day (ch 9). What is recorded in ch 10 is the story of two days. The story of the 7th and 8th chs, interrupted by the episode of the woman taken in adultery, which does not belong to the story of the ministry of not more than two days. The story of the feeding of the 5,000 and of the subsequent discourse (ch 6) is the story of two days. It is not necessary to enter into fuller detail. Yet the writer, as remarked, is very exact in his notes. He notes the number of days, the number of days on which anything was done, or when anything was said. We make these remarks, which will be obvious to every reader who attends to them, mainly for the purpose of showing that the Gospel on the face of it does not intend to, at least does not, set forth a complete account of the life and work of Jesus. It gives at the utmost an account of 20 days out of the 1,000 days of Our Lord’s ministry. This is of itself sufficient to set aside the idea of the 40 days in which the writer of the Gospel meant to set aside, to supplement, or to correct, the accounts in the Synoptics. Plainly it was not written with that purpose.

(3) A personal record.—Obviously the book professes to be reminiscences of one who had personal experience of the ministry which he describes. The personal note is in evidence all through the book. It is present even in the prologue, for in that in which he describes the great fact of the incarnation he uses the personal note. “We beheld his glory” (1 14). This might be taken as the keynote of the Gospel. In all the scenes set forth in the Gospel the writer believes that in them Jesus manifested forth His glory and deepened the faith of His disciples. If we were to ask him, when did he behold the glory of the incarnate Word, the answer would be, in all these scenes which are described in the Gospel. If we read the Gospel from this point of view, we find that the writer had a different conception of the glory of the incarnate Word from that which his critics ascribe to him. He does not see the glory of the Word in the fact that He was weared with His journey (4 6), that He made clay of the spittle and anointed the eyes of the blind man with the clay (9 6), that He wept at the grave of Lazarus (11 35), that He groaned in the spirit and was troubled (ver 38), and that He could sorrow with a sorrow unspeakable, as He did after the interview with the Greeks (12 27). For he records all these things, and evidently thinks them quite consistent with the glory of the incarnate Word. From the reminiscences does not explain these things away, but must take them as of the essence of the manifested glory of the Word.

The Gospel then is professedly reminiscences of an eyewitness, of one who was personally present at all the scenes which he describes. No doubt the reminiscences often pass into reflections on the meaning and significance of what he describes. He often pauses to remark that the disciples, and he himself among them, did not at the time the meaning of some saying, or the significance of some deed, of Jesus (2 22; 12 16, etc). At other times we can hardly distinguish between the words of the Master and the reflections of the disciple. We must allow that the same phenomenon. In the Ep. to the Gal., e.g., Paul writes what he had said to Peter at Antioch: “If thou, being a Jew, livest as do the Gentiles, and not as do the Jews, how compellest thou the Gentiles to live as do the Jews?” (Gal 2 14). Shortly after, he passes into reflections on the situation, and it is impossible to ascertain where the direct speech ends and the reflections begin. It is in the Fourth Gospel. It is impossible in many instances to say where the saying begins and the reflections of the writer begin. So it is, e.g., with his record of the witness of the Baptist in ch 3. The record of the Baptist’s words may end with the sentence, “He must increase, but I must decrease” (ver 30), and the rest may be the reflections of the writer on the situation.

(4) Reminiscences of an eyewitness.—The phenomena of the Gospel are thus, apparently at least, reminiscences of an eyewitness, with his reflections on the meaning of what he has heard. He was present at the scenes which he describes. He was present on the night on which the Master was betrayed; he was present in the hall of the high priest; he was present at the cross, and bears testimony to the reality of the death of Jesus (18 15);
19 35).—As we read the Gospel we note the stress he lays on witness. The term occurs \(30 \times\) in the Gospels with it. \(12: 19; 3: 13, 33; 12: 18, 21, 24, 43; \) and is used to set forth the verified facts of experience. In these testimonies we have an unusual combination of elevated thought and minute observation. At one time the evangelist soars aloft to a spiritual world, and moves with ease among the richest and highest elements of spiritual experience. Using common words, he yet reads into them the deepest meanings regarding man, the world, and God which have ever entered into the mind of man. Subtle mysteries and of profound import meet in his wonderful writings. Above all, we are impressed with his sense of the supreme value of the historical. All his spiritual meanings have a historical basis. This is as apparent in the 1st Ep. as it is in the Gospel, and in the Gospel it is conspicuous. While his main interest is to focus the minds of his readers on Jesus, His work and His word, yet unconsciously he has written his own spiritual biography. We gradually become aware, as we read, that we are sympathetically inside the spirit of the Gospel, that we are following the line of a great spiritual awakening, and are tracing the growth of faith and love in the life of the writer, until they become the overmastering tone of his whole life. On the other hand, the book, the biography, the revelation of a unique life, the story of the self-revelation of the Son of God, of the revelation of the Father in Jesus Christ, moving onward to its consummation through the contrasted development of his own life, and of them on whom he has received Him, and on the part of them who received Him not. On the other hand, it has a subjective unity in the heart of the writer, as it tells of how faith began, of how faith made progress, until he came to full assurance of faith. We can enter into the various crises through which he passed, through which, as they successively passed, he won the assurance which he so calmly expresses; and these supply him with the key by means of which he is able to unlock the mystery of the relations of Jesus to the world. The victory of faith which he sets forth was first won in his own soul. This also is included in the significant phrase, "We beheld his glory" (1: 14).

The remembrance illustrated.—The Gospel receives powerful confirmation from reflection on the nature of remembrance generally. A law of remembrance is that, when we recall anything, or any occurrence, we recall it in its wholeness, with all the accessories of the moment. We have to make a selection of that only which is needful to convey our meaning. Inartistic natures do not make a selection; they pour out everything that arises in the memory (cf. Dame Quickly in Shakespeare). The finer qualities of remembrance are abundantly illustrated in the Fourth Gospel, and furnish an independent proof that it is from the pen of an eyewitness. It is possible within reasonable limits to give only a few examples. Observe first the exact notices of time in ch. 1 and the special notes of character in each of the 6 disciples whom Jesus met on the first 4 days of His ministry. Mark the peculiar graphic note that Nathanael was under the fig tree (ver. 50). Pass on to notice the 6 waterpots of stone set at Cana after the manner of the Jews' purifying (2: 6). We might refer in this connection to the geographical remarks frequently made in the course of the narrative, indicative of an intimate knowledge of Galilee, and to the numerous allusions both in law, custom, and ceremonies, usually admitted now to be accurate, and illustrative of familiar knowledge on the part of the writer. Our main object, however, is to call attention to those incidental things which have no symbolical significance, but are set down because, as the main happening was recounted, these arise as "factual" with the 5 barley loaves and 2 fishes (6: 9); remembers that Mary sat still in the house, when the active Martha went forth to meet the Lord as He approached Bethany (11: 20); recalls the appearance of Lazarus, he came forth bound hand and foot with grave-clothes (ver. 44). He has a vivid picture before him as he recalls the washing of the disciples' feet (13: 1-15), and the various attitudes and remarks of the disciples during the whole of that eventful night. He still sees the careful folding of the linen cloths, and where they were placed in the empty tomb (20: 4-8). These are only some of those vivid touches due to remembrance which none but an eyewitness could safely make. Looking back on the past, the evangelist recalls the various scenes and words of the Lord in their wholeness as they happened, and he chooses those living touches which bear the mark of reality to all readers.

(6) Conclusions.—These touches of vivid reality warrant the corded object of the Fourth Gospel, in the sense that the Fourth Gospel is depicting scenes in a real life, and is not drawing on his imagination. Looking back on his own spiritual history, he remembered with special vividness those words and works of Christ which determined his own life, and of which he has received Him, and on the part of them who received Him not. On the other hand, it has a subjective unity in the heart of the writer, as it tells of how faith began, of how faith made progress, until he came to full assurance of faith. While he progressed from this point of view, it does not seem to us that it can be understood from any other, without ignoring all the phenomena of the kind now of God. The Gospel can be understood from this point of view: it does not seem to us that it can be understood from any other, without ignoring all the phenomena of the kind now of God. When he progressed from this point of view, he can afford to neglect many of the elaborate discussions which have arisen regarding the possible displacement of certain facts (Spitta, etc.). Much, however, has been made of the sudden transference of the scene from Galilee to Judea as we pass from ch. 4 to ch. 5, and the equally sudden transference back to Galilee (6: 1). Many suggestions have been made, but they all proceed on the supposition that the remembrance was made too late, and so is not the case. While it is very likely that there is a sequence in the writer's thought, yet this need not compel us to think of displacements. Taken as they are in the Fourth Gospel, the set of them together is the only possible reconciliation of the evidence, in Judea or in Galilee, in all instances indicate progress. They illustrate the manifested glory of Jesus, on the one hand, and the growth of faith and the development of unbelief on the other. This, however, opens up a separate line of objection and inquiry to which attention must now be given.

IV. Progress and Development in the Gospel.—It is an object often urged against the view of the apostolic authorship of the Fourth Gospel that in it there is no progress, no development, no crisis, nothing, e.g., to correspond with the significance of the confession of St. Peter at Caesarea Philippi (Mt. 16: 13-17). This is held to be true alike of the character of Jesus, which, under the influence of the Logos-doctrine of the prologue, exhibits no development from first to last, and of the attitude of the disciples, whose faith in Jesus as the Christ is likewise represented as complete from the beginning to the end. In reality, the reverse is the case. The course of the Gospel, as already said, the glory of the Lord is ever more completely manifested, and the disciples attain to a deeper faith, while the unbelief of those who reject Him becomes more fixed, until it is absolute. This will appear clearly upon nearer examination.

The objection from the presentation of Jesus in the Gospel takes different forms, which it is desirable to consider separately.

(1) Alleged absence of development. It is affirmed, and Jesus in the first, that there is no development in the Gospel character of Jesus in the Fourth Gospel, none of those indications such as we have in the Synoptics of widening horizons, no recognition of the fact that the meaning, purpose and issue of His calling became clearer to Him as the days passed by. To this assertion there are two answers. First, that in a series of scenes from the activity of Jesus, selected for the definite purpose set forth in the Gospel, there is no need to demand a continuous history of His ministry. Selection is made precisely of those scenes which set forth His insight into human character and motive, His power of sympathetic healing, His command over Nature, and His supreme authority over man and the world. The other remark is that, even in the Fourth Gospel there are hints of a crisis in the ministry of Our Lord, during which He came to a clearer recognition of the fuller meaning of His mission. The existence of the Fourth Gospel, therefore, in its prologue. The reply is that there is no essential difference between the attitude of Jesus in these respects in the Synoptics and in Jn. In all alike He maintains an attitude of authority. In the Synoptics He can say, "I say unto you" (Mt 5:22-28,32, etc.). In them also He claims to be the teacher of absolute truth, the Saviour, the Ruler, the Judge, of men. In this regard there is no claim made in the Fourth Gospel: "No one cometh unto the Father, but he that is called" (Jn 14:6). He then adds: "Come unto me... and I will give you rest" (Mt 11:28). A claim to authority over men is thus common to all the Gospels. In all of them, too, in the Fourth no less than in the others, there is on the part of Jesus, a directness of assertion, a correspondence to the Father. In fact this is more conspicuous in the Fourth Gospel than in the Synoptics: "The Father is greater than I" (Jn 14:28). The words He says are the Father's words; the works He does are the Father's (5:19-20, 7:16, 18, etc.). "This commandment received I from my Father" (10:18). In all the Gospels it is one consistent, gracious figure who appears.

(3) "Inconceivability" of Logos-presentation. — A further objection, which aims at showing that this Gospel could not be the work of "a primitive apostle," may be noticed, partly from the eminence of him who makes it, and partly from the interest of the objection itself. In his work on The Apo tolic Age, Weissäcker says, "It is a puzzle that the beloved disciple of the Gospel, he who reclined at table next to Jesus, should have come to regard and represent his whole former experience as a life with the incarnate Logos of God. It is impossible to imagine any power of faith and philosophy so great as to lose hold of a real life and substitute for it this marvelous picture of a Divine being. We can understand that Paul, who had not known Jesus, who had not come into contact with the man, should have been opposed to the tradition of the eyewitnesses, the idea of the heavenly man, and that he should have substituted the Christ who was spirit for His earthly manifestation, pronouncing the latter to be positively a stage above which faith must rise. For a primitive apostle it is inconceivable. The question is decided here and finally here" (II, 5.11). It is easy to say, "For a primitive apostle it is inconceivable," yet we know that a primitive apostle believed that Jesus rose from the dead, that He was exalted a Prince and Saviour, that He was seated at the right hand of God, that He was Lord of all (Acts 2:22-36). If we grant that the primitive church believed these things, it cannot be fairly said that the further step taken in the Fourth Gospel is inconceivable. In truth, the objection of Weissäcker is not taken against the Fourth Gospel; it is equally effective against Christianity in general. If Jesus be what He is said to be in the Synoptic Gospels, and if He be what the primitive church held Him to be, the leading conception of the Fourth Gospel is credible and conceivable. If Christianity is credible, the Fourth Gospel adds nothing to the difficulty of faith; rather it gives an additional ground for a rational faith.

It is proper at this point that a little more should be said on the Logos of the Greeks, etc. In order better to understand the presentation of Christ in this fourth Gospel we must examine the philosophical and historical aspects of the doctrine, see Logos-Doctrine (Logos). Obviously the great interest of the Prologue and reflections in the Fourth Gospel is in the personal life of the Master whom he had known so intimately. To him this real historical life was everything. On it he brooded, and it he meditated, and, he growed in the significance of it ever more real to himself first, and to others afterward. How shall he make the reality of that life apparent to all? What were the relationships of that person to God, to man, and to the world? What Jesus really was, and what were His relations to God, to man, and to the world, John endeavors to make known in the prologue. This real person whom he had known, revered, loved, was something more than was apparent to the eyes of an ordinary man (14:6). He was a manson, exalting the glory of the person. The Logos-doctrine does not descend on the historic person as a garment from without; it is an endeavor to describe what John had grown to recognize as the essential meaning of the person of Jesus. It is not a speculative theory we have here, not an endeavor to think out a theory of the world or of God; it is an attempt to find suitable language for what the writer recognizes to be a great fact. We need not therefore, seek an explanation of John's Logos-doctrine in the speculations of Heracleitus, in the theories of the Stoics, even in the eclecticism of Philo. The interests of these men are far removed from the atmosphere of the Fourth Gospel. They desired a theory of the universe; John sought to set forth the significance of a personal historical life. In the prologue he set forth that life, and he chose a word which he filled up with concreter meaning, a meaning which included the deepest teaching of the OT, and the highest thought of his contemporaries. The teaching of St. Paul, esp. in the ep. of the captivity, approaches very closely to that of the Fourth Gospel. Thus it is not a right method to bring the Logos-doctrine to the interpretation of the Fourth Gospel, and to look at all the phenomena of the Gospel as mere illustrations of that doctrine. The right method is the reverse. The Logos-doctrine has no concreteness, no living reality, taken apart from the personal life which was manifested to the apostles. In the Prologue, "believe-eth" represents what John had come to see as to the meaning of the personality he had historically known. He sets it forth once for all in the prologue, and never once in the Gospel does he refer to it again. We can understand of that Logos-doctrine when we look at it in the light of those manifestations recorded in the Gospel, manifestations which enabled St. John to behold His glory; we cannot understand the manifestations if we look at them merely as illustrations of an abstract philosophical theorem.

In brief, the Fourth Gospel contains, not abstract; it is not the evolution or the demonstration of a theory, but the attempt to set forth a concrete personality, and to find fitting words to express the significance of that personality as St. John had grasped it.

As it is with the character of Jesus, so it is with the alleged absence of development in the faith of the disciples. Careful inquiry shows that objection to be unfounded.

3. Growth of Faith and Development of Unbelief

(a) Early Confessions.—Here again, it is said, we see the end from the beginning. In ch 1 Jesus is twice greeted as the Messiah (vs 41, 46), and twice called the Lamb of God (vs 27, 36, 49). The Baptist at this early stage points to Him as "the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world" (ver 29). Reference is made to the case of Nicodemus (3 1 ff), to the Samaritans (4 41 ff), and other incidents of the same kind, with the view of proving that at this early stage of the ministry of Our Lord such confessions are unlikely, and even impossible. It is to be noticed, however, that the confessions in these cases are represented as the outcome of spiritual manifestations on the part of Jesus to the persons who make them. And the manifestations are such as to justify the psychological possibility of the confession. It is so in the case of Nathanael. Nor is the objection to the testimony of John the Baptist of a kind which admits of no answer. For the Baptist, according to the Synoptics, had found his own credentials in Isa 40. There he found himself and his mission, and described himself, as we find it in the Fourth Gospel, "I am the voice of one cry- ing in the wilderness, Make straight the way of the Lord, as said Isaiah the prophet" (1 23; cf Mt 3 3; Mk 1 2 3). We find also that when John "heard in the prison the works of the Christ," and "sent by his disciples and said unto him, Art thou he that cometh, or look we for another?" (Mt 11 2), the answer of Jesus was a reference to a passage in Isa 61. According to Jesus these were the true signs of the Messianic kingdom. Is there any reason why we should not say, as John found his own credentials in Isa 40, he would also have found the character and signs of the Coming One in the description of the suffering servant in ch 53? If he did so, what more simple than that he should describe the Coming One as the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world? In His answer to John, Jesus simply asks him to read farther on in that prophesy which had already meant so much for him.

(b) Growth of faith in the disciples.—Apart from what may be made of these early confessions, it might be noted that there are signs of growth of faith on the part of the disciples. Carrying with us the fact that each of these confessions had its ground in a particular manifestation of the glory of Christ, we go on to passages which prove how imperfect was the faith of the disciples. It is to be remembered also that John has only one word to describe all the phases of faith, from the slightest impression up to whole-hearted conviction and thorough surrender. We may refer to the careful and exhaustive treatment of the meanings of the Greek word, "believe," taken mainly in the Johannine Vocabulary. In the Fourth Gospel the vb. is always used, and never the noun. As the word is used, it denotes their impression made, whether that impression is slight and transient, or deep and enduring. Successive stages of acceptance are seen as the disciples advance to complete and absolute faith.

As we read the Gospel, we perceive that Jesus did test and try the faith of His disciples, and made His deeds and His words both tests of faith, and means for its growth. As the result of the words on the bread of life, we find that many of His disciples said, "This is a hard saying; who can hear it?" (6 60), and on account of the difficulty of His words, "Many of his disciples went back, and walked no more with him" (ver 66). On His appeal to those who did not go away it is found that the difficulty became really an opportunity to them for a larger faith (vs 68, 69). The incidents and events of the night of Gethseman, and the facts on that night, prove how incomplete were the faith and confidence of the disciples; how far they were from a full understanding of the Master's purpose. Nor is it until after the resurrection, and the gladness of seeing the Lord in the upper room, that faith obtained a complete victory, and attained to full possession of itself.

(3) Gradual disclosure of Messiahship: Growth of unbelief.—On the other side, there is as manifestly an evolution of faith, from the passing of the moment on to the complete disbelief in Jesus, and utter rejection of Him.

It is only fair here to the Gospel to observe that the confessions to which we have already referred are on the part of individuals who came into special relationship with Jesus. Such is the case with regard to Nathanael, Nicodemus, the woman of Samaria and the Samaritan people, and the writer places the reader in that close relationship so that he who reads may believe. But such close relationship to Jesus is only a lot of a few in this Gospel. It is not true, as already remarked, that in this Gospel Jesus is represented as definitely proclaiming Himself as the Messiah. There is something of the mystery of the Synoptics. He did not assert His claim; He left it to be believed. His brethren hint that He ought to put His claims really to the test (7 31). An account of the doubts and speculations regarding Him is given in ch 7. The people hesitate, and inquire, and speculate. Is He a good man, or a deceiver? (ver 12) Had He really a mission from God? (vs 14 ff) —all of which goes to prove that only certain individuals had such intimate knowledge of Him as to lead to acceptance. In ch 10 we read, "And it was the feast of the dedication at Jesus: It was winter; and Jesus was walking in the temple in Solomon's porch. The Jews therefore came round about him, and said unto him, How long dost thou hold us in suspense? If thou art the Christ, tell us plainly" (10 22-24). "It is very clear," as Dr. Sanday says, "that no sharply defined issue was set before the people. They are left to draw their own conclusions; and they draw them as well as they can by the help of such criteria as they have. But there is no enticement...or any signs of Messiah—peremptorily propounded by Jesus Himself" (The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel, 164). The sum of the matter as regards the development of unbelief is given by the evangelist in the words: "Though he had done so many signs before them, yet they believed not on him (2 37) On the other hand, the culmination of faith is seen in the word of the Lord to Thomas: "Because thou hast seen me, thou hast believed: blessed are they that have not seen, and yet have believed." (20: 29)

JOKMEAM, jok'mē-am (יוֹקְמֵאָם, yōk'mē'am): A town in Mt. Ephraim assigned to the Kohathite Levites (1 Ch 6 68), named along with Gezer and Horite. Its place is taken by Kibzaim in Josh 21 22 (in LXX here the name is omitted). It is mentioned again in 1 K 4 12 (AV wrongly "Jokneam"), where it seems to indicate some position to the E. of Ephraim. So far no identification is possible.

JOKNEAM, jok'nē-am (יוֹקְנֵאָם, yōk'nē'am): A small town of the Canaanites taken by Joshua and described as "in Carmel" (Josh 12 22), in the territory of Zebulon, and allotted to the Merarite Levites (31 24). The border of Zebulon "reached to the brook that is before Jokneam" (19 11). In 1 K 4 12 the name appears in AV where, with RV, we should read "Jokmeam." Onom places it 6 Rom miles from Lejjo (Lejffān) on the way to Ptolemais (Acre). This points to Tel Kasbeh, a striking mound on the eastern slope of Mt. Carmel. To the E. of it runs the "torment bed" of the Kishon. It stands about 300 ft. above the valley to the N. of it, and the sides are steep. It is crowned by the ruins of an 18th-cent. fortress. A little lower down are the remains of a small chapel. There are fine springs at the foot (PEFM, II, 60 f). In Jib 7 3 it appears as "Cyamon." (Kvāwār, Kuamôn). It is the "Mons Cajus" of the Middle Ages. "In the Sam Book of Jcs it is noticed as the scene of a conflict between the Hebrews and the Giants; and Joshua is said to have been shut up here in magic walls of brass, till on sending a dove to the Heb king of Gilead, he was rescued" (Conder, HDB, s.v.).

JONAH, jō'na (יוֹנָה, yōnah, "dove"); Ionás.

JONAH, the book bearing his name, Jonah the son of Amittai, of Gath-hepher, a prophet and servant of Jeh, predicted the restoration of the land of Israel to its ancient boundaries through the efforts of Jeroboam II. The prophet lived and labored either in the early part of the reign of Jeroboam (790–750 BC), or during the preceding generation. He may with great probability be placed at 800–750 BC. His early ministry must have been popular in Israel; for he prophesied of victory and expansion of territory. His native village of Gath-hepher was located in the territory of Zebulon (Josh 19 15).

(2) According to the book bearing his name, Jonah the son of Amittai received a command to preach to Nineveh; but he fled in the opposite direction to escape from the task of proclaiming Jeh's message to the great heathen city; was arrested by a storm, and at his own request was hurled into the sea, where he was swallowed by a great fish, remaining alive in the belly of the fish for three days. When on his release from the body of the fish the command to go to Nineveh was renewed, J. obeyed and announced the overthrow of the wicked city. When the men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of the prophet, God repented of the evil He had threatened to bring upon them. J. was grieved that the oppressing city should be spared, and waited in the vicinity to see what would be the final outcome. An intense prayer for the destruction of the people that threatened to swallow up Israel. He thought that Jeh was too merciful to the heathen oppressors. By the lesson of the gourd he was taught the value of the heathen in the sight of Jeh.

It is the fashion now in scholarly circles to treat the Book of Jonah as fiction. The story is said to be an allegory or a parable or a symbolic narrative. Why then did the author fasten upon a true and worthy prophet of Jeh the stigma of rebellion and narrowness? On the theory that the narrative is an allegory, J. Kennedy well says that “the man who wrote it was guilty of a gratuitous insult to the memory of a prophet, and could not have been inspired by the prophet’s Master thus to dishonor a faithful servant.”

(3) Our Lord referred on two different occasions to the sign of Jonah the prophet (Mt 12 38–41; Lk 11 29–32; Mt 16 4). He speaks of J’s experience in the belly of the fish as parallel with His own approaching entombment for three days, and cites the repentance of the Ninevites as a rebuke to the unbelieving men of His own generation. Our Lord thus speaks both of the physical miracle of the preservation of Jonah in the body of the fish and of the moral miracle of the repentance of the Ninevites, and without the slightest hint that He regarded the story as an allegory.

JONAH, THE BOOK OF: This little roll of four short chapters has given rise to almost as much discussion and difference of opinion as the first four chapters of Gen. It would be presumption to think that one could, in a brief article, speak the first word on the question of the book’s place to be given it. Perhaps it is well to begin with a statement of the contents of the book.

I. Contents of the Book.—The story is too well known to need retelling. Moreover, it would be difficult to give the events in fewer words than the author employs in his classic narrative. One event grows out of another, so that the interest of the reader never flags.

When the call came to Jonah to preach in Nineveh, he fled in the opposite direction, hoping thus to escape from his unpleasant task. He was afraid that the merciful God would forgive the oppressing heathen, if it should repent at his preaching. Jonah was a narrow-minded patriot, who feared that Assyria would one day swallow up his own rivals. He thus said nothing that might lead to the preservation of wicked Nineveh. Jonah was willing to prophesy to Israel; he at first failed to refuse to become a foreign missionary.

The vessel in which the prophet had taken passage was arrested by a great storm. The heathen sailors inferred that some god must be

2. Jonah Punished, 1:1–4:16

When the lot fell upon Jonah, he made a complete confession, and brazenly suggested that they cast him overboard. The heathen mariners rowed desperately to get back to land, but made no progress against the storm. They then prayed Jeh not to bring innocent blood upon them, and cast Jonah into the sea. As the storm progressively subsided, the heathen sailors offered a sacrifice to Jeh and made vows. In this part of the story the mariners give an example of the capacity of the Gentiles to perform noble deeds and to offer acceptable worship to Jeh.

Jeh prepared a great fish to swallow Jonah and to bear him in his body for three days and nights. Surprised to find himself alive and conscious in the body of the fish, the prophet praised God. Already by faith he speaks of his danger as a past experience. The God who had saved him from drowning in the depths of the sea will yet permit him once more to worship with loud thanksgiving. At the command of Jeh the fish vomits out Jonah upon the dry land. The almost inevitable grotesqueness of this part of the story is one of the strongest arguments against the view that the Book of Jon is literal history and not a work of the imagination.

Upon the renewal of the command to Nineveh, Jonah obeyed, and marching through the streets of the great city, he cried, “Yet forty days, and Nineveh shall be overthrown!” His message was so brief that he may well have spoken it in good Assyrian. If the story of his delivery from the sea preceded him, or was made known through the prophet himself, the effect of the prophetic message was thereby greatly heightened.

The men of Nineveh repented at the preaching of Jonah, the entire city uniting in fasting and prayer. So great was the anxiety of the people that even the lower animals were clothed in sackcloth. The men of Nineveh turned from deeds of violence (“their evil way”) to seek the forgiveness of an angry God. Jeh decided to spare the city.

Jonah breaks out into loud and bitter complaint when he learns that Nineveh is to be spared. He decides to encamp near the city to see what will become of it. He hopes it will now repent. A Narrow Prophet may yet be overthrown. Through a gourd vine Jeh teaches the prophet a Merciful lesson. If such a mean and perishable plant can have real value in the eyes of the sullen prophet, what estimate ought to be put on the lives of the thousands of innocent children and helpless cattle in the great city of Nineveh? These were dearer to the God of heaven than Jonah’s protecting vine could possibly be to him.

II. The Aim of the Book.—The main purpose of the writer was to enlarge the sympathies of Israel and lead the chosen people to undertake the great missionary task of proclaiming the truth to the heathen world. Other lessons may be learned from the subordinate parts of the narrative, but this is the central truth of the Book of Jon. Kent well expresses the author’s main message: “In the person of the wonderful picture he wished to do nothing that might lead to the preservation of wicked Nineveh. Jonah was willing to prophesy to Israel; he at first failed to refuse to become a foreign missionary. The vessel in which the prophet had taken passage was arrested by a great storm. III. Is the Book History?—Most of the early interpreters so understood it, and some excellent scholars still hold this view. If Jesus...
"Christ is using an illustration: It matters not whether that illustration be drawn from the realms of fact or of poetry (BTP, II, 308). In a footnote Dr. Smith says, "it is for us to decide whether the fish's belly will be the fate of the man who buried his talent, is it not to commit us to the belief that the personages of Christ's parables actually existed? Or take the fortuitous use of Shakespeare's drama—as Macbeth did,—or did he commit us to the historical reality of Macbeth or Hamlet? Any preacher among us would resent being bound by such an inference. And if we resolve this for ourselves, why should we be about to seek to bind our Lord by it?"

Notwithstanding Principal Smith's skillful presentation of his case, we still think that our Lord regarded the miracle of the fish and the repentance of the Ninevites as actual events. Keil put the matter judiciously: "It is not, indeed, proved with conclusive necessity that, if the resurrection of Jesus was a physical fact, Jonah's abode in the fish's belly must also be just as historical. On this point also the saying, 'A greater than Jonah is here,' holds good. But, on the other hand, how arbitrary it is to assert, with Reuss, that Jesus regarded Jonah's history as a parable! On the contrary, Jesus saw in it a sign, a powerful evidence of the same Divine power which condemned (6:5) and inquired (15:1-3) to live again and triumph in the world. Whoever, therefore, feels the religious greatness of the book, and accepts as authoritative the attitude taken to its historical import by the Son of God Himself, will also accept a greater than Jesus, which brings down to Hades and brings up again, as an actual experience of Jonah in his flight from his Lord" (The Twelve Minor Prophets, 172, 3).

Most modern critical scholars since Kleinert (1868) and Blech (1875) have regarded the Book of Jon as a work of the imagination.

2. Modern. Some prefer to call it an allegory, Critical Views others a parable, others a prose poem, others a didactic story, others a midrash, others a symbolic book. Keil, Pusey, Delsitcz, Orelli, J. Kennedy and others have contended for the historical character of the narrative. A few treat it as a legend containing a kernel of fact. Cheyne and a few other scholars assert that in the symbolic narrative are imbedded mythical elements. The trend of critical opinion, even in evangelical circles, has of late been toward the symbolic interpretation. Radical critics boldly set aside the teaching of Jesus as erroneous, when they use the Evangelical text for the purpose of the doctrine of the Kenosis (Phil 2:5-8), or in the principle of accommodation. The last explanation might commend itself to the devout student, viz. that Jesus did not think it worth while to correct the views of his contemporaries, had our Lord not spoken more than once of the sign of Jonah, and in such detail as to indicate His acceptance of the entire narrative with its two great miracles.

IV. Authorship and Date. The old view that Jonah was the author is still held by some scholars, though most moderns place the book in the late exilic or post-exilic times. A few Aram. words occur in the Heb. text. The question in debate is whether the language of Israel in the days of Jeroboam II had taken over words from the Aramaic. There had certainly been a century of close political and commercial contact between Israel and the Aramaeans of Damascus, so that it would not be surprising to meet with Aram. words in a prophet of Samaria. Hosea, in the generation following Israel, betrays little evidence of Aram. influence in his style and vocabulary. Of course, the personal equation is a factor that ought not to be overlooked. If the author was a Jew, we should probably have to think of the post-exilic period, when Aram. began to displace Hebrew as the vernacular of the Jews. The Book of Jon is anonymous, and we really do not know who the author was or when he lived. The view that Jonah wrote the story of his own disobedience and his debate with the merciful God has not been made clear. But if this be the case, it will be the fate of the man who buried his talent, is it not to commit us to the belief that the personages of Christ's parables actually existed? Or take the fortuitous use of Shakespeare's drama—as Macbeth did,—or did he commit us to the historical reality of Macbeth or Hamlet? Any preacher among us would resent being bound by such an inference. And if we resolve this for ourselves, why should we be about to seek to bind our Lord by it?

V. The Unity of the Book. Nachtigal (1799) contended that there were three different authors of widely different periods. Kleinert (1868) held that two parallel narratives had been woven together in chs 3 and 4. Kaufmann Kohler (1879) contended that there were a considerable number of glosses and interpolations besides some transpositions of material. W. Böhme, in 1887, advanced the most radical theory of the composition of the roll. He partitioned the story among two authors, and two or three reactors or supplementers. A few additional glosses were charged to later hands. Even radical critics treat Böhme's theory as one of the curiosities of criticism. Winckler (AOEr, II, 206 f) tried to improve the story by a few transpositions. Hans Schmidt (1905) subjects the roll of Jon to a searching criticism, and concludes that a good many changes have been made from religious motives. Buidel follows Winckler and Schmidt both in transposing and in omitting some material. Sievers that Jon could not be taken as a parable in the Book of Jon a poem; but they do not agree as to the meter. Sievers regards the roll as a unit, while Erbdt contends for two main sources besides the prayer in ch 2. Brewer, in ICC (1912), is far more conservative in both the results of his search and organizing but few glosses in our present text and arguing for the unity of the story apart from the insertion of the ps in ch 2. Nearly all recent critics assign Jonah's prayer to a writer other than the author of the narrative. If the authors of the two versions vary as widely as to the manner in which the psalm found its way into the Book of Jon. Brewer holds that it was probably put on the margin by a reader and afterward crept into the text, the copyist inserting it after ver 2, though it would more naturally follow ver 11. Brewer remarks: "The literary connections with various post-exilic ps are for a post-exilic date of the ps. But how early or how late in the post-exilic period it belongs we cannot tell. The Heb is pure and no Aram. influence is apparent. It is evident, then, that the presence or absence of Aram. influence does not alone settle the question of the date of the document. Geography and the personal equation may be more important than the one or other specific verse. The question whether the ps in Jon is not a mere cento of quotations from the Ps. "The phrases it has in common with other ps," writes Professor Brewer, "were the common property of the religious language of the author's day" (p. 24). Those who still believe that David wrote many of the pss find no difficulty in believing that a prophet of 780 BC could have drawn upon his knowledge of the Psalter in a prayer of thanksgiving to Jehovah.

JOHN RICHARD SAMPEY

JONAH, Jōnâ (Joná, Joná, WH; Τούνα, Ιωνᾶ, TE; AV Jonah): An ancestor of Jesus in Lk's genealogy (3:30).

JONAH, Jōnâ. See Jonah.

JONAS, Jōnâs (Tovâs, Ιωνᾶς; AV Jonas):
(1) Son of Eliasib (1 Esd 9 1).
(2) Corresponds in 1 Esd 9 23 to "Elizer" in Ezra 10 23.
(3) The prophet Jonah (2 Esd 1 39; Tob 14 48).

JONAS, JONAS, JONATHAN, JONATHAN:
(1) The name given in Mt 12: 39-41; 16: 4; Lk 11: 29-32 AV to the OT prophet Jonah (RV renders "Jonah"). See JONAH.
(2) In 1 Esd 6: 42.
(3) The name given in Jn 21: 16 AV to the father of the apostle Simon Peter. Nothing further is known of him, except the different forms of his name. In Jn 1: 42 AV he is called Jona (cf also Mt 16: 17 AV). In Jn 1: 42; 21: 15, 16 RV he is called John, with the marginal note "Or Joannes." In Mt: 16: 17 RV Simon Peter is called Simon Bar-Jonah.

Jonas may be a contraction for Jonaeus (Keim). It has also been suggested that the father of Simon may have had a double name, Jona-Johannes (cf F. Chase in HDB, art. "John, father of Simon Peter").

JONATH ELEH BEHEKIM, JONATHAN, JONATHAN, JONATHON:
(1) (Heb y'hônâthan): The young "Levite" of Jgs 17: 18 referred to by name in 18: 30, who is called "the son of Geraham," the son of Moses, and where AV has "Manasseh" for Moses, following the MT in which the letter nun of Manasseh is "suspended.

Rashi states the reason thus: "Because of the honor of Moses was the nun written so as to alter the name. The original word was Moses, but it was thought undesirable that a descendant of his should have anything to do with images; and so J. was made to have affinity (metaphorically) with Manasseh. See GB, Intro, 335-338.

J. was a Levitical Judahite of Beth-lehem-judah, who came to the house of Micah, in the hill country of Ephraim, and hired himself as a priest in Micah's house (17: 11-13). The Danites sent 5 men north to spy for new territory, and on their way the spies came to the house of Micah, where they found J. and consulted the oracle through him (18: 1-5). Having received a favorable answer, they set out and came to Laish, and on their return south they advised that an expedition be sent therewith (18: 6-10). Their clansmen accordingly sent out a band of warriors who on their way passed by Micah's house. The spies informed their comrades of the images and teraphim and images there, and they seized them, inducing J. at the same time to accompany them as their priest (vs 11-20). At Laish he founded a priesthood which was thus descended from Moses (ver 30).

It has been held that there are two sources in the narrative (Jgs 17, 18 (see G. Moore, Jgs 360-72). The section is important because of the light it throws on life and religion in ancient Palestine. (1) The Levites were not all of one tribe (see Moore, op. cit., 383-84); there were priests who claimed descent from Moses as well as Aaronite priests; and images were common in early Heb worship (cf Gen 31: 30 ff; Jgs 8: 27; 1: 8 19: 13).

(2) Son of King Saul. See separate art.

(3) (Heb y'hônâthan, y'hônâthân, JONATHAN, JONATHAN, JONATHAN, JONATHON):
(1) One of David's mighty men. See JARH.
(2) (Heb y'hônâthan, 1 Ch 2: 32: 33): A Jerahmeelite.
(3) (Heb y'hônâthan, and so 1 Ch 27: 25 AV): Son of Uzziah, and one of David's treasurers.
(4) (Heb y'hônâthân, 1 Ch 11: 34): One of David's mighty men. See JAREH.
(5) (2 S 3 32, Heb y'hônâthân = 1 Ch 11: 34, JONATHAN): Son of Shimeel, Shimee, David's brother; he is said to be the slayer of Goliath. See JEHOVADAB (1).
(6) (2 S 23: 32, Heb y'hônâthân = 1 Ch 11: 34, JONATHAN): Son of Uzziah, and one of David's treasurers.
(7) (Heb y'hônâthân, and so 1 Ch 27: 25 AV): Son of Uzziah, and one of David's treasurers.
(8) (Heb y'hônâthân, 1 Ch 27: 32): A doth of David, RV "uncle," RVm "brother's son"; if he was David's nephew, he will be the same as (4) above. He was "a counselor to David, and a man of understanding, and a scribe."
(9) (Heb yônâthân, 1 Esd 3: 15; 1 Esd 9: 14): A priest of the family of the Levites.

One who either supported (RV) or opposed (RVm, AV) Ezra in the matter of foreign marriage; see JEBH.
(11) (Heb yônâthân, Neh 12: 11): A priest, descendant of Joshua (Joshua) = "Johan" (12: 22-23); see JERHAN.
(13) (Heb yônâthân, Neh 12: 35): A priest, father of Zechariah.
(14) (Heb y'hônâthân, Jer 37: 15: 20; 38: 26): A scribe in whose house Jeremiah was imprisoned.
(15) (Heb yônâthân, Jer 40: 8): Son of Ikarab; a Judahite captain who joined Gedaliah after the fall of Jerus.
(16) ("Jothâb, Jonâdâth, 1 Macc 2: 5; 9: 13; and 16: 10, 13): Two of the sons of Mattathias; sons of Absalom.
(17) (Son of Absalom (1 Macc 13: 11): He was sent by Simon the Maccabees to capture Joppa (cf 11: 70, where there is mentioned a Mattathias, son of Absalom).

JONATHAN, JONATHAN, JONATHAN, JONATHAN, JONATHON, JONATHAN, JONATHON:
(1) The eldest son of Saul, the first king of Israel (1 Sam 16: 10). See separate art. 1. Three periods of his life: (a) of Saul; (b) of David; (c) of Absalom.

I. Three periods of life: (a) of Saul; (b) of David; (c) of Absalom.

I. Three periods of his life: (a) of Saul; (b) of David; (c) of Absalom.

Periods of his life: (a) of Saul; (b) of David; (c) of Absalom.

The life of J. as far as we are told about him, falls naturally into 3 periods.

(1) First period.—He comes on the scene as the right hand and lieutenant of his father in his early struggles to beat off the hostile tribes, esp. the Ammonites (1 S 11), who beset the territory of Israel on all sides. As soon as Saul had gained his first decisive victory, the people rallied to him in great numbers, so that he was able to count upon 3,000 men whenever they took the field. These were divided into two small armies, Saul retaining 2,000 and making Michmash his headquarters, the rest being stationed at Gibeah under J., some 5 miles distant as the crow flies. J. thus commanded the base, while his father led the fighting force. This position of comparative inactivity does not appear to have been much to the taste of J. Midway between the two camps was a Philistine outpost at Geba, facing Michmash across the pass of that name, a valley with steep sides, now the Wadi Suweinit. Saul does not seem to have felt himself strong enough to commence hostilities against the Philis, and took means to increase the forces at his disposal. The Philis no sooner heard that the Israelites had cast off their yoke (1 S 13: 5 for "let the Hebrews hear," read "The Hebrews have revolted," after LXX), than they came out in great numbers (13:5). They seem to have compelled Saul to evacuate Michmash, which they occupied, Saul falling back on Gibeah (13:16) and Gilgal with a greatly reduced following (13:3.4). As a summary anticipation, in Heb style, of the events detailed in ch 14. In spite of this, J., accompanied only by his armor-bearer, surprised the Phil. outpost at Geba (14:5). "Gibeah" should be "Geba," which was killed to a man. This feat precipitated a general engagement, in which the Israelites, whose only weapons appear to have been their farming implements (13:20), Saul and J. alone being armed with iron swords and spears, routed their enemies. Thus the independence and capacity for the superstitious action of Saul in refusing to allow the people to eat until the day was over (14:24). As this order was unwittingly broken by J., Saul wished to have him executed; but this the people refused to allow, as they clearly recognized that the credit of the victory was due to the energetic action of J. in striking before the enemy had time to concentrate. (In the Heb text there is some confusion between Gibeah and Giba; cf 10:5 in and 13:5.)

2. His Character. His character is, as far as our knowledge goes, nearly perfect. He was athletic and brave (1 S 14:13; 2 S 1:22-23). He could keep his plans secret when secrecy was necessary in order to carry them out (14:1), and could decide on what course of action to follow and act upon it on the instant. His attack upon the Phil. garrison at Geba (or Gibeah, if we adopt the reading of the LXX and with Tg. cf 10:5) was delivered at the right moment, and was as wise as it was daring. If he had a fault, from a military point of view, it may have been an inability to follow up an advantage. The pursuit of the Philis on the occasion referred to ended in failure. In this respect, however, he perhaps cannot be censured with justice, as he never had an entirely free hand.

J.'s independence and capacity for acting on his own responsibility were combined with devotion to his father. While holding his own opinion and taking his own course, he never deserted his father and his friend is above criticism. Only on one occasion did his anger get the better of him (20:24) under gross provocation, Saul having impugned the honor of J.'s mother (20:30 LXX) Ahinoam (14:50), and attempted his life. The estrangement was momentary; Saul and Jonathan were undivided in life and in death (2 S 1:23 to be so read).

But it is as the befriend of David that J. will always be remembered. He is the type of the very perfect friend, as well as of the chivalrous knight, for all time. His devotion to his master was absolute, and it has been dictated by a superstitious belief in David's destiny as the future ruler of his people (23:17), that belief would have been shared by Saul, which was not the case (20:31). In disinterestedness and self-sacrifice his own claims and give up his own titles the conduct of J. is unsurpassed, and presents a pleasing contrast to some of the characters with whom we meet in the Bible. In this respect he resembles All, the cousin of David and of Jonathan. J.'s brave and the bravest of the brave, save when fighting in his own cause, and who had no ambition to fill the highest posts. So J. preferred to serve rather than to command (1 S 23:17). J. and David stand for the highest ideal of Heb friendship, as do Damon and Pythias in Gr lit.

We may be sure that J. won the affection of the people. His kites were ready to follow him anywhere (14:7). J. had devoted himself to David's service.

6. Affection. Although he unfortunately coincided with his own self-interest, J. appears to have inspired as great an affection as he himself felt (1 S 20:1; 2 S 1:26). He squared with his father was largely due to the solicitude of the latter for his son's interests (1 S 18:29; 20:31).

Jonathan's sons were, in common with his brother's, killed in the wars. One alone—Meribaal (Mephibosheth)—survived. J.'s descendants through him lasted several generations. A table of them is given in 1 Ch 8:33 ff; 9:40 ff (cf 2 S 9:12). They were famous soldiers and were, like their ancestors, distinguished in the use of the bow (1 Ch 8:40).

JONATHAS, jon-a-thas (Swete reads Ṭabūv, Ṭāḇūn, in B; Naabā, Nāthān, in N): The Lat form of the common name "Jonathan" (Tob 8:13). See JATHAN. It is sometimes represented as Nathan.

JOPPA, jop' a (יוֹפָּא; yōphā, נוֹפָה; yōphā; Ḫoppō, Ḫoppē): In Josh 19:46 AV called "Japho," a city in the territory allotted to Dan; but there is nothing to show that in pre-exilic times it ever passed into Israel- itish hands. "The gate of Joppa" is mentioned in the Am Tab (214, 32; cf 178, 20),

as guarded by an Egyptian officer for Amenhotep IV. It was conquered by Thothmes III, and old Egyptian records speak of the excellence of its gardens and fruit trees. Sennacherib claims to have taken J. after a siege (K B, 2, 93). To J., the Chronicler tells us, the cedars of Lebanon were brought in floats for transportation to Jerus by the workmen of the king of Tyre (2 Ch 2 16). The

2. Biblical city does not appear in the history as References Philistine, so we may, perhaps, infer that it was held by the Phcenicians, the great seamen of those days. It was doubtless a Phoen ship that Jonah found here, bound for Hyrcanus (A n, XIV, x, 6). It was among the cities given by Antony to Cleopatra (X V, iv, 1). Caesar added it to the kingdom of Herod (vii, 3; B J, I, xx, 3), and at his death it passed to Archelaus (A n, XVII, xi, 4, B J, II, vi, 3). At his deposition it was attached to the Rom province. The inhabitants were now zealous Jews, and in the Rom wars it suffered heavily. After a massacre by Cestius Gallus, in which 8,400 of the people perished, it was left desolate. Thus it became a resort of the enemies of Rome, who turned pirate, and preyed upon the shipping in the neighboring waters. The place was promptly captured and destroyed by Vespasian. The people took to their boats, but a terrific storm burst upon them, dashing their frail craft to pieces on the rocks, so that vast numbers perished (B J, III, ix, 2-4). At a later time it was the seat of a bishopric. During the Crusades it had a checked history, being taken, now by the Christians, now by the Moslems. It was captured by the French under Kleber in 1799. It was fortified by the English, and afterward extended by the Turks (Baedeker, Pal, 130).

The modern Jafa is built on a rocky mound 116 ft. high, at the edge of the sea. A reef of rocks runs parallel to the shore a short distance out. It may be rounded in calm weather by lighter vessels, and affords a certain amount of protection. There is a gap in the reef through which the boats pass that meet the steamer coming in. In time of storm the whole lagoon is closed. On one of these rocks Persius is said to have rescued the chained Andromeda from the dragon. J af a is a prosperous town, profiting much by the annual streams of pilgrims who pass through it on their way to visit the holy places in Pal. A good trade is done with Egypt, Syria and Constantinople. Soap, sesame, wheat and oranges are the chief exports. The cedars gardens and orange groves of Jaffa form one of the chief sights of interest. The Christians and the Moslems have rival traditions as to the site of the house of Simon the Tanner. The remains of the house of Tabitha are also pointed out. From Jaffa to Jerus the first railway in Pal was built.

JORAH, jô'ra (יוֹרָה), yôrah, meaning uncertain, perhaps "harvest-born"? A family which returned with Zerubbabel (E x 2 18)="Hôrâpâh" of Neh 7 24="Arşûrûth" (AV "Arsephurth") of 1 Esd 5 16.

JORAI, jô'rai (יוֹרָא), yôraı̂, "whom Jeh teaches"? A Gadite chief, but possibly the name of a clan (1 Ch 5 13).

Joram, jô'ram (יוֹרָם), yôrâm, "Jeh is exalted"; cf Jehoram:
(1) Son of Tôi (or Tôn, according to LXX, B, and 1 Ch 18 9.10), sent by his father to greet David (2 S 8 10)="Hadarom" (1 Ch 18 9.10) a form preferred by commentators in 2 S also.
(2) Same as Jehoram, king of Judah (2 K 8 21-24; 11 2; 1 Ch 3 11; Mt 1 8 ["Tôpû, Tôrûm"]).
(3) Same as Jehoram, king of Northern Israel (2 K 8 29; cf 2 K 9 15 R Vm).
(4) (In form yôrâm; yôrâm; A: Levite (1 Ch 26 25).
(5) ["Tôpû, Tôrûm, 1 Esd 1 9] = "Josazar" (2 Ch 35 9); see Jozabad (4).

Jordan, jô'rdan (יוֹרְדָן), yôrdan, "flowing downward"; yôr'dâni, yôrdânî: The Jordan river proper begins at the junction of four

1. Source streams (the Barethôth, the Hâshôn, the Leddan, and the Bânias), in the upper part of the plain of Lake Hûlêh. The Bar eithôth receives its supply of water from the hills on the W., which separate the valley from the nearer Lîtân, and is the least important of the four. The Hâshôn is the longest of the four (40 miles), issuing from a great fountain at the western foot of Mt. Hermon near Hâshìyâ, 1,700 ft. above the sea, and descends 1,500 ft. in its course to the plain. The Leordan is the largest of the four streams, issuing in several fountains at the foot of the mound Tell el-kedîy (Dan, or Laish) at an elevation of 505 ft. above the sea. The Bànias issues from a celebrated fountain near the town of Bànias, which is identified as the Caesarea Philippi associated with the transfiguration. The ancient name was Panias, originating from a grotto consecrated to the god Pan. At this place Herod erected a temple of white marble dedicated to Augustus Caesar. This is probably the Baal-gad of Josh 11 17 and 12 7. Its altitude is 1,200 ft. above tide, and the stream falls about 600 ft. in the 6 miles of its course to the head of the Jordan.

The valley of Lake Hálech, through which the Jordan wends its way, is about 20 miles long and 5 miles wide, bordered on either side by hills and mountains attaining elevations of 3,000 ft. After flowing 4 or 5 miles through a fertile plain, the Jordan enters a morass of marshy land which nearly fills the valley, with the exception of 1 or 2 miles between it and the base of the mountains upon the western side. This morass is almost impenetrable by reason of bushes and papyrus reeds, which in places also render navigation of the channel difficult even with a canoe. Lake Hálech, into which the river here enters, is about 3 miles long and is slowly contracting its size by reason of the accumulation of the decaying vegetation of the surrounding morass, and of the sediment brought in by the river and three tributary mountain torrents. Its continued existence is evidence of a limited period through which present conditions have been maintained. It will not be many thousand years before it will be entirely filled and the morass be changed into a fertile plain. When the spies visited the region, the lake must have been much larger than it is now.

At the southern end of Lake Hálech, the valley narrows up to a width of a few hundred yards, and the river begins its descent into levels below the Mediterranean. The river is here only about 60 ft. broad, and in less than 9 miles descends 689 ft. through a narrow rocky gorge, where it meets the delta which has deposited at the head of the Sea of Galilee, and slowly winds its way to meet its waters. Throughout this delta and river the Jordan is easily fordable during a great part of the year.

The Sea of Galilee occupies an expansion of the Jordan valley 12 miles long and from 3 to 6 miles wide. The hills, reaching in general, 1,200 or 1,500 ft. above the lake, come down close to its margin on every side. On the E. and S. they are mainly of volcanic origin, and to some extent of the same character on the N.W. side above Tiberias. In the time of Christ the mouth of the river may have been a half-mile or more farther up the delta than now. As all the sediment of the upper Jordan settles in the vicinity of the delta near Capernaum, a stream of pelagic water issues from the southern end of the lake, at the mouth of which the Jordan flows into the Dead Sea, however, it becomes overloaded with sediment. From Kerak the opening of the valley is grand in the extreme. A great plain on the E. stretches to the hills of Decapolis, and to the S., as far as the Hermon, which can reach, through the Ghôr which descends to the Dead Sea, bordered by mountain walls on either side. Four or five miles below, it is joined on the E. by the Yarmûk, the ancient Hierom, the largest of all its tributaries. The debris brought down by the stream has formed a fertile delta terrace 3 or 4 miles in diameter, which now, as in ancient times, is an attractive place for herdsmen and agriculturists. The valley of the Yarmûk and Jonathon furnished a natural grade for the Acre and Damascus Railroad, as it did for the caravan routes of early times. The town of Gadara lies upon an elevation just S. of the Yarmûk and 4 or 5 miles E. of the Jordan.

Ten miles below the lake, the river is joined on the W. by Wâdy el-Beirût, which descends from the vicinity of Nazareth, between Mt. Tabor and Endor, and furnishes a natural entrance from the Jordan to Central Galilee. An aqueduct here still furnishes the water of the town of el-Kaf. Wâdy el-Arab, with a small perennial stream, comes in here also from the E.

Twenty miles below Lake Galilee the river is joined by the important Wâdy el-Jâlût, which descends through the valley of Jezreel.

5. El-Ghôr between Mt. Gilboa and the range of the Little Hermon (the hill Morch of Jgs 7 1). This valley leads up from the Jordan to the valley of Esdraelon and thence to Nazareth, and furnished the usual route for Jews going from Jerusalem to Nazareth when they wished to avoid the Samaritans. This route naturally takes one past Betàsân (Bethshean), where the bodies of Saul and Jonathan were exposed by the Philis, and past Shunem and Nain. There is a marked expansion of the Ghôr opposite Betàn, constituting an important agricultural district. The town of Pella, to which the Christians fled at the time of the destruction of Jerusalem, lies upon the E. side of the Ghôr; while Jabesh-gilead, where the bodies of Saul and Jonathan were cremated, is a little farther up the slope of Gilead. Twenty miles farther down, the Ghôr, on the E., is joined by Wâdy Zerka (the brook Jabok), the second largest tributary, separating Ammon from Gilead, its upper tributaries flowing past Ammon, Mizpeh, and Ramoth-gilead. It was down this valley that Jacob descended to Succoth.

A few miles below, the Wâdy Ferah, whose head is at Sycamore between Mt. Ebal and Gerizim, descends from the W., furnishing the natural route for Jacob's entrance to the promised land.

At Damèsheh (probably the Adam of Josh 3 16), the Ghôr is narrowed up by the projection, from the W., of the mountain ridge terminating in Kurn Sūtäbêh, which rises abruptly to a height of 2,000 ft. above the river. The section of the Ghôr between Damèsheh and the Dead Sea is of a pretty uniform width of 10 to 12 miles and is of a much more uniform level than the upper portions, but its fertility is interfered with by the lack of water and the difficulty of irrigation. From the vicinity of Jericho, an old Roman road follows up the Wâdy Nâcàstâmeh, which furnished Joshua a natural line of approach to Ai, while through the Wâdy el-Kelt is opened the natural road to Jersu. Both Ai and the Mount of Olives are visible from this point of the Ghôr.
In a direct line it is only 70 miles from Lake Galilee to the Dead Sea, and this is the total length of the lower plain (the Zor); but so numerous are the windings of the river across the flood plain from one bluff to the other that the length of the river is fully 200 miles. Col. Lynch reported the occurrence of 27 rapids, which wholly interrupted navigation, and many others which rendered it difficult. The major part of the descent below Lake Galilee takes place before reaching Damieh, 1,140 ft. below the Mediterranean. While the bluffs of the Ghôr, upon either side of the Zor, are nearly continuous and uniform below Damieh, above this point they are much dissected by the erosion of tributary streams. Still, nearly everywhere, an extended view brings to light the original uniform level of the sedimentary deposits formed when the valley was filled with water to a height of 650 ft. (see Arabic; Dead Sea). The river itself averages about 100 ft. in width when confined strictly within its channel, but in the early spring months the flood plain of the Zor is completely overflowed, bringing into its thickets a great amount of driftwood which increases the difficulty of penetrating it, and temporarily drives out ferocious animals to infest the neighboring country.

According to Conder, there are no less than 60 fording-places between Lake Galilee and the Dead Sea. For the most part it will be seen that these occur at rapids, or over bars deposited by the streams which descend from one side or the other, as, for example, below the mouths of the Yarmuk, Jabbok, Jâlûd and Kelt. These fords are, however, impassable during the high water of the winter and spring months. Until the occupation by the Romans, no bridges were built; but they and their successors erected them at various places, notably below the mouth of the Yarmuk, and the Jabbok, and nearly opposite Jericho.

Notwithstanding the great number of fords where it is possible to cross at low water, those which were so related to the lines of travel as to be of much avail were few. Beginning near the mouth of the J. and proceeding northward, there was a ford at el-Henu, leading directly from Jericho to the highlands N.E. of the Dead Sea. Two or three miles farther to the N. is the ford of the pilgrims, best known of all, at the mouth of Wady Kelt. A few miles farther up the river on the road leading from Jericho to es-Salt, near the mouth of the Wady Nimrin, there is now a bridge where the dependence was formerly upon the ford. Just below the mouth of the Wady Zerka (Jabbok) is the ford of Damieh, where the road from Shechem comes down to the river. A bridge was at one time built over the river at this point; but owing to a change in the course of the stream this is now over a dry water-course. The next important crossing-place is at the opening of the valley of Jezreel coming in from the W., probably the Bethabara of the NT should be located. Upon this ford a number of caravan routes from E. to W. converge. The next important crossing-place is at el-Mujamia, 2 or 3 miles below the mouth of the Yarmuk. Here, also, there was a Rom bridge. There are also some traces of an ancient bridge remaining just below the exit of the river from Lake Galilee, where there was a ford of special importance to the people residing on the shores of this lake who could not afford to cross in boats. Between Lake Galilee and Lake Hâlîk, an easy ford leads across the delta of the stream a little above its junction with the lake; while 2 or 3 miles below Lake Hâlekh is found “the bridge of Jacob’s daughters” on the line of one of the principal routes between Damascus and Galilee. Above Lake Hâlekh the various tributaries are easily crossed at several places, though a bridge is required to cross the Bareighit near its mouth, and another on the Hâshâbî on the main road from Caesarea Philippi to Sidon, at el-Ghager.

GEORGE FREDERICK WRIGHT
JORDAN VALLEY: As more fully detailed elsewhere (see Arabah; Dead Sea; Geography of Palestine), the Jordan valley in its channel depression in the earth’s surface, reaching to the Dead Sea, the surface of which is 1,300 ft., the bottom 2,600 ft. below tide level, the portion of the basin below the level of the sea being about 100 miles in length and from 10 to 15 miles in breadth at base, and from two to three times that distance between the lowest summits of the mountains and plateaus on either side. In the early prehistoric period, corresponding with the Glacial epoch, this depression was filled with water to a height of 1,400 ft. (see references above) which gradually disappeared by evaporation as present climatic conditions came on. At an elevation of approximately 650 ft. above the Dead Sea, very extensive sedimentary deposits were made, which, while appearing only in fragmentary remnants along the shores of the Dead Sea, are continuous over the bottom of the valley (the so-called ‘Ghôr’), farther N. These deposits are from 100 to 200 ft. thick, consisting of material which was brought down into the valley by the tributary mountain streams descending from each side, while the water stood at this higher level. Naturally these deposits slope gradually from the sides of the valley toward the center, the coarser material of the deposits being nearer to the sides, and the amount of sediment being much increased opposite the mouths of the larger streams. The deposits were at first continuous over the entire ‘Ghôr’, or valley, but has since been much dissected by the J. river and its tributaries. The J. itself has eroded a channel through the soft sediment, 100 ft. more or less deep, from Lake Galilee to the Dead Sea, a distance in a straight line of about 70 miles. At first this channel was narrow, but it has been constantly enlarged by the stream as it has meandered from side to side, undercutting the banks so that they caved into the river and are washed down to fill up the Dead Sea, a process which is esp. familiar to residents upon the banks of the Missouri and Mississippi rivers. This narrow gorge is called the Zôr, and will hereafter be referred to under this name. The Zôr at present averages about 1/2 mile wide, the most of which is occupied by a flood plain extending from the banks of the river to the foot of the sedimentary bluffs on either side. This flood plain is so overgrown with brush and reeds that it is practically impenetrable, except by wild beasts, which, according to Scriptural references, have infested it from earliest times, among which may be mentioned the lion, the tiger, the wild boar. During the spring months, when the snows are melting from Mt. Hermon and cloud-bursts are sending sudden torrents of water down the river courses from the plateau of Gilead and the mountains of Samaria, the J. “overflows all its banks,” i.e. covers this flood plain and drives out the beasts to infest the neighborhood for a short time.

The surface of this old lake bed has also been much dissected by the tributary streams which come in from either side, they having cut channels across the ‘Ghôr’ down to a depth corresponding to that of the Zôr. As a consequence the roads leading up the valley find it necessary to have the mountains on either side to avoid the abrupt descent into the channels of the tributary streams, which are deepest near their mouths. Another natural consequence of these physical peculiarities is that agriculture cannot be carried on except by the incursions of the nomadic tribes, who periodically come down from the desert regions on the E.

Two descriptions (the first from my own journal of the general view obtained of the J. valley from some elevated points) will give a vividness to our conceptions of these remarkable depressions.

"It was the middle of December when, after wading all day across the southern flanks of Mt. Hermon, through snow-knee-deep for our horses, we descended below the clouds and the snow to the brink of the eastern mountain wall overlooking the upper valley of the J. It was a sight ever to be remembered. Between the glittering peak of Mt. Hermon to curriague, and the jagged walls of the borders of Naphthali and Ephraim, where the W. horizon on the W., only a few miles away, while between and at our feet were the green fields of the upper J. valley, through the silver stream of snow, broadening out into the expanded waters of Lake Merom. Over the plain could dimly be seen the black tents of the Arabs, and the husbandmen plowing the fields for an early harvest. No wonder the spies were impressed with the attractiveness and fertility of the region." This of the upper J. valley.

Dr. Merrill gives the following description of the view of the lower J. valley from the summit of Kurn Sûr-tâbî, March 23: "Jobel esh Shams [Mt. Hermon] was covered, with snow, and so was the peak farther to the W. and N. Lake Merom and the volcanic peaks on the plain to the E. were distinctly seen, likewise the Sea of Galilee, the hills about Safad, the hills W. of Tiberias and the slope from their summit, which includes also Gamala and Gadara, all the range of Jobel Ajlûn and other hills of Gilead, Kûlat er Kamal, Kûlat er Osha, the mountains of Moah, and the Dead Sea. But the mere naming of different points that can be seen gives no adequate view of the difference of the prospect which one enjoys from the top of this strange landmark. Hills to the W. obstruct the view in that direction, and to the E. nothing can be seen beyond the highest part of the Moah and Gilead ranges, but it is the north and south sweep which makes the prospect a glorious one. No language can picture the J. valley, the winding stream, the jungles on its banks, the strange ‘Ghôr’, with its white, ragged sides, the vast plain of the valley, through and in the middle of which is the lower ‘Ghôr’. But a glimpse of the dense green oases formed here and there by some mountain, picturesque, and the still, the calm, and motionless as molten lead, lying far to the S., ending the great valley and touching the mountains on either side! This is an outline merely, but it can be said to my aid words which will describe it more accurately. The J. ‘Ghôr’ or ‘Ghûr’, in front of about 8 miles wide, and looks like a vast plain. The lower ‘Ghôr’ (Zôr) is the ragged channel cut down among the ranges of Moah, this distance is between the upper and lower ‘Ghôr’ by no means so strikingly defined above the mount of the Zôr as it is below that point, and all the way down to the Dead Sea."

Considered in detail the valley may be divided, as Conder suggests, into 8 sections. ‘First the portion between Bantás and the Hûleh, where it is some S. miles broad, with steep cliffs some 2,000 ft. high on either side and a broad marsh between. Secondly, from the Hûleh to the Sea of Galilee,
THE JORDAN VALLEY

The Jordan Valley is a geographical region in the Middle East, located in the northern part of the country of Israel. It is a narrow, elongated basin, approximately 60 km (37 miles) wide and 130 km (80 miles) long, that runs from north to south. The valley is bounded by mountains on all sides and is drained by the Jordan River, which flows through it for about 85 km (53 miles) before emptying into the Dead Sea.

The landscape of the Jordan Valley is characterized by flat areas interspersed with hills and mountains, with a variable climate ranging from Mediterranean to semi-arid. The valley is known for its rich biodiversity, with a variety of plants and animals. The region is also significant for its archaeological sites, including the Tell es-Sultan (Jericho) and the Tel Aviv (Tell es-Safa), which have yielded important evidence of early human settlement.

The Jordan Valley has been inhabited for thousands of years, and the valley played a crucial role in the development of the early civilizations of the Middle East. It was the route of the ancient trade routes and was an important water source for agriculture. Today, the valley is a region of economic importance, with a focus on agriculture and tourism.

The valley is also a region of political significance, with Israel and Jordan sharing the eastern bank of the Jordan River, and Jordan controlling the southern part of the valley. The valley is of great strategic importance due to its water resources and its role in regional politics.

The Jordan Valley is a region of great natural beauty, with its lush flora and fauna, and it remains a popular destination for both tourists and nature enthusiasts.

The Jordan Valley is a region of great historical and cultural significance, and it continues to be an area of interest for scholars and researchers.

1. THE Joseph Story: Literary Question.—This literary problem will be solved, if satisfactory answers may be found to two questions: Is it an independent original or an adaptation? Suitable material for such an adaptation as would produce a J. story has been sought at either end of the line of history: J.; the pre-exilic and J. of the Exilic. The only independent contestant for the claim of being an early original of which the J. story might be an adaptation is the nasty "Tale of Two Brothers" (Ry, series I, vol. II, 137–46). This story, however, retains its essential elements much resembles the J. story. But such events as it records are common: why not such stories?

What evidence does this "Tale of Two Brothers" afford that the J. story is not an independent original? Are we to suppose that because many French romances involve the demi-monde, there was therefore no Madame de Pompadour? Are court scandals so unheard of that ancient Egypt cannot afford two? And why impugn the genuineness of the J. story because the "Tale of Two Brothers" resembles it? Is anyone so ethereal in his passions as not to know by instinct that the essential elements of such scandal are always the same? The difference in the narrative is chiefly in the telling. At this latter point the J. story and the "Tale of Two Brothers" bear no resemblance whatever.

If the chaste beauty of the Bib. story be observed, and then one turn to the "Tale of Two Brothers" with sufficient knowledge of the Egypt tongue to perceive the coarseness and the stench of it, there can be no question that the J. story is independent of any such literary source. To those who believe both stories, the claim of the "Tale of Two Brothers" to be the original of the J. story cannot stand for a moment. If we turn from J. the progenitor to J. the tribe, still less will the claim that the story is an adaptation bear careful examination. The perfect naturalness of the story, the utter absence from its multitudinous details of any hint of figurative language, such as personification always furnishes, and the absolutely accurate reflection in the story of the Egypt of J.'s day, as revealed by the many discoveries of which people of 700–800 years later could not know, mark this theory of the reflection of tribal history and characteristics as pure speculation. And besides, where in all the history of literature has it been proven that a tribe has been thus successfully thrown back upon the screen of antiquity in the "individual form"? Similar mistakes concerning Menes and Minos and the heroes of Troy are a warning to us. Speculation is legitimate, so long as it does not cut loose from known facts, but gives no one the right to suppose the existence in unknown history of something never certainly found in known history. So much for the first question.

Is it a monograph or a compilation? The author of a monograph may make large use of literary materials, and the editor of a compilation may introduce much editorial comment. Thus, superficially, these different kinds of composition may match each other, yet they are, in essential character, very different the one from the other. A compilation is an artificial body, an automatism; a monograph is a natural body with a living soul in it. This story is the oriental part of the narrative literature in the world. If it stood alone or belonged to some later portion of Scripture, it may well be doubted that it would ever have been touched by the scalpel of the literary dissector. But it belongs to the Pent. There are manifest evidences all over the Pent of the use by the author of material, either documentary or of that paradoxical unwritten lit., which the ancients handed down almost without

A compilation is an artificial body, an automatism; a monograph is a natural body with a living soul in it. This story is the oriental part of the narrative literature in the world. If it stood alone or belonged to some later portion of Scripture, it may well be doubted that it would ever have been touched by the scalpel of the literary dissector. But it belongs to the Pent. There are manifest evidences all over the Pent of the use by the author of material, either documentary or of that paradoxical unwritten lit., which the ancients handed down almost without the change of a word for centuries. (1) An analytical theory has been applied to the Pent as a whole, to resolve it into a mere compilation. Once the principles of this theory are acknowledged, and allowed sway there, the J. story cannot be left untouched, but becomes a necessary sacrifice to the system. The weight of the literary evidence of the living, moving J. story which the analysis leaves behind (of EB, art. "Joseph") proclaims that analysis to have been murder. There was life in the story which has been ruthlessly taken, and that life should not be marked the narrative as a whole. (2) Where else is to be found such a compilation? Here is one of the most brilliant pieces of literature in the world, a narrative full of gems: (a) the account of the presentation of the brothers in the presence of J. when he was obliged to go out to woot (Gen 44 1-13), (b) Judah's speech (Gen 44 18-34), (c) the touching close of the revelation of J. to his brothers at last (Gen 45 1-15). The soul of this whole life story hangs on these. Where in all literature, ancient or modern, is to be found a mere compilation that is a great piece of literature? So far removed is this story from the characteristics of a compilation, that we may concede this whole world of literature to produce another monograph in narrative literature that surpasses it. (3) Then the dates of Egypt and events in this narrative strongly favor its origin so early as to be out of the reach of the compilers. That attempts at identification in Egypt of names written in Heb, presenting as they do the peculiar difficulties of two alphabets of imperfectly known phonetic values and uncertain equivalency of one in terms of the other, should give rise to differences of opinion as to be expected. The Egypt equivalents of Zaphenath-paneh and Asenath have been diligently sought, and several identifications have been suggested (Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, 1857; Lieblein, Egypt, V, 126-35). That which is most exact phonetically and yields the most suitable and natural meaning for Zaphenath-paneh is by Lieblein (PSBA, 1898, 204-8). It is formed like four of the names of Hyksos kings before J. and means "the one who furnishes the nourishment of life," i.e. the steward of the realm. The name Asenath is found from the Xith Dynasty on to the XVIIIth. Potiphar is mentioned as an Egyptian. Why not of course an Egyptian? The narrative also points distinctly to conditions obtaining under the Hyksos kings. When the people were like to perish for want of food they promised J. in return for help that they would be "servants of Pharaoh" (Gen 47 18-25). This suggests a previous antagonism to the government, such as the Hyksos kings had long to contend with in Egypt. But the revolution which drove out the Hyksos labored so effectually to eradicate every trace of the hated foreigners that it is with the utmost difficulty that modern Egyptological research has wrestled from the past some small items of information concerning them. Is it credible that the editor of scraps, which were themselves not written down until some 700-800 years later, should have been able to produce such a life-story fitting into the peculiar conditions of the times of the Hyksos? Considered as an independent literary problem on its own merits, aside from any entangling necessities of the analytical theory of the Pent, the J. story must certainly stand as a monograph from some time within distinct memory of the events it records. If the J. story be an independent original and a monograph, then there is in reality to be considered the story of J.

II. The Story of Joseph.—It is unnecessary to recount here all the events of the life of J., a story so incomparably told in the Bib. narrative. It will be sufficient to touch only the salient points where controversy has raged, or at which archaeology has furnished special illumination. The story of J. begins the tenth and last natural division of Gen, and these are the weighty and ghastly fragments of the living, moving J. story which the analysis leaves behind (of EB, art. "Joseph") proclaims that analysis to have been murder. There was life in the story which has been ruthlessly taken, and that life should not be marked the narrative as a whole. (2) Where else is to be found such a compilation? 1. A Bedouin Prince in Canaan. The patriarchal era was a time when all sheiks or princes of these semi-nomadic rovers who by the peculiar social and civil customs of that land were tolerated then as they are to this day under the Turkish government. All the farms and canaan settled land tenure. Jacob favored Rachel and her children. He put them hidermost at the dangerous meeting with Esau, and now he puts J. a coat of many colors (Gen 37 2). The appearance of such a coat a little earlier in the decoration of the tombs of Beni hassan among Palestinian ambassadors to Egypt probably indicates that this garment was in some sense ceremonial, a token of rank. In any case J., the son of Jacob, was a Bedouin prince, and by this coat indicate his intention to give him the precedence and the succession as chieftain of the tribe? It is difficult otherwise to account for the insane jealousy of the older brethren (Gen 37 4). According to the critical partisanship of the peoples and dreams may be explained away as mere reflections or adaptations of the later history of J. (cf Penta- tarch). In a real biography the striking providential significance of the dreams appears at once. They cannot be real without in some sense being prophetic. On the other hand they cannot be other than real without vitiating the whole story as a truthful narrative, for they led immediately to the great tragedy; a Bedouin prince of Canaan becomes a Bedouin slave in Egypt. The plot to put J. out of the way, the substitution of slavery for death, and the ghastly device for deceiving Jacob (Gen 37 18-36) are

2. A Bedouin Slave of crime when once the brothers had in Egypt Jacob was upon it. The counterplot of Reuben to deliver J. referred equally his own goodness and the dangerous character of the other brothers to whom he did not dare make a direct protest. Critical discussion of "Ishmaelites" and "Midianites" and "Midianites" presents some interesting things and many clever speculations which may well be considered on their own merits by those interested in ethnology and etymologies. Many opinions advanced may prove to be correct. But let it be noted that they are for the most part pure speculation. Almost nothing is known of the interrelation of the Trans-Jordanic tribes in that age or of the few hints in the Bible. And who can say what manner of persons mich was found in a caravan which had wandered about no one knows where, or how long, to be assassinated before it turned into northern caravan route? Until archaeology supplies more facts it is folly to attach much importance to such speculations (Kyle, The Deciding Voice of the Monuments in Bib. Criticism, 221).

In the slave market in Egypt, J. was bought by Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, "an Egyptian." The significant mention of this fact fits exactly into a problem and the recovered hints of the historical times, which make the court then to be not Egypt at all, but composed of foreigners, the dynasty of Hyksos kings among whom an "Egyptian" was so unexpected as to have his nationality mentioned.

J.'s native syndrome of character, the pious training he had received in his father's house, and the favor of God with him gave him such prosperity that his master intrusted all the affairs of his household to him, and when the greatest of temptations assails him he comes off victorious (ch 39). There is no need for the suspicion that Potiphar did not fully believe the accusation of his wife against J. The fact that J. was not immediately put to death is very significant. Potiphar could hardly do less than shut him up for the sake of appearances, and perhaps to take temptation away from his wife without seeming to suspect her. It is noticeable also that J.'s character soon triumphed in prison. Then the same Providence that superintended his dreams is leading as so to bring him before the king (chs 40, 41).

The events of the immediately preceding history prepared J.'s day: the Hyksos kings on the throne, those Bedouin princes, "shepherd kings" (Petrie, Hyksos and Israelite Cities), the enmity of the Egyptians against this foreign dynasty so that they accounted every shepherd an "abomination" (46 34), the friendly relation thus created between Palestinian tribes and Egypt, the princely character of J., for among princes a prince is a prince however small his principality, and last of all the manifest favor of God toward J., and the evident understanding by the Pharaohs of Egypt, that it was perhaps to be deferred (40 1-24, 1-24). The events of the immediately preceding history prepared J.'s day: the Hyksos kings on the throne, those Bedouin princes, "shepherd kings" (Petrie, Hyksos and Israelite Cities), the enmity of the Egyptians against this foreign dynasty so that they accounted every shepherd an "abomination" (46 34), the friendly relation thus created between Palestinian tribes and Egypt, the princely character of J., for among princes a prince is a prince however small his principality, and last of all the manifest favor of God toward J., and the evident understanding by the Pharaohs of Egypt, that it was perhaps to be deferred (40 1-24, 1-24). All these constitute one of the most majestic, Godlike movements of Providence revealed to us in the word of God, or evident anywhere in history. The same Providence that presided over the boy prince in his father's house came again to the slave prince in the Egyptian prison. The interpretation of the dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker of Pharaoh (40—41 1-24) brought him at last through much delay and selfish forgetfulness to the notice of the king, and another dream in which the same cunning hand of Providence is plainly seen (ch 41) is the means of bringing J. to stand in the royal presence. The staff that dreams are made of interests scarely less than the secret Providence was super- imposed over them. As the harvest fields of the semi-nomadic Bedouin in Pal, and the household routine of Egypt in the dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker, so now the industrial interests and the religious forms of the chief of the Nile devoted to the service of the "king's house." The "seven kine" of the goddess Hathor supplies the number of the cows, and the doubling of the symbolism in the cattle and the grain points to the two great sources of Egypt's welfare. The Providence that had shaped and guided the whole course of J. from the Palestinian home was consummated when, with the words, "Inasmuch as thou art a man in whom is the spirit of God," Pharaoh lifted up the Bedouin slave to be again the Bedouin prince and made him the prime minister.

The history of 'kings' favorites' is too well known for the elevation of J. to be in itself incredible. Such things are esp. likely to take place among the unlimited monarchies of the Orient. The late empress of China had been a Chinese slave girl. The investiture of J. was truly Egyptian, the "collar," the signet "ring," the "chariot" and the outrunners who cried before him "Abrech." The exact meaning of this word has never been certainly ascertained, but its general import may be seen illustrated to this day wherever in the East royalty rides out. The policy adopted by the prime minister was far-reaching, wise, even adroit (Gen 41 25—36). It is impossible to say whether or not it was wholly just, for we cannot know whether the corn of the years of plenty which the government laid up was bought or taken as a tax levy. The policy involved some despotic power, but J. proved a magnanimous despot. The deep and subtle statesmanship in J.'s plan does not fully appear until the outcome. It was probably the policy of J., the prime minister, that the Hyksos finally gained the power over the people and the mastery of the land.

Great famines have not been common in Egypt, but are not unknown. The only one which corresponds with to the Bible account is that one recorded in the inscription of Bafa at el Kab, 1st by Brugsch. Some scarcely justifiable attempts have been made to discredit Brugsch in his account of that inscription. The monument still remains and is easily visited, but the inscription is so mutilated that it presents many difficulties. The severity of the famine, the length of its duration, the preparation by the government, the distribution to the people, the success of the efforts for relief and even the time of the famine, as far as it corresponds with the inscription, correspond well to the Bible account (Brugsch, Egypt under the Pharaohs, ch vi). The way in which such famines in Egypt come about has been explained by a movement of the sudd, a sedgellite growth in the Nile, so as to clog the upper river (Wright, Scientific Confirmations, 79—79).

J.'s brethren came "with those that came," i.e. with the food caravans. The account does not imply that the prime minister presided in person at the selling of grain, but only that he knew of the coming of his brethren and met them at the market place. The watchfulness of the government against "spies," by these wandering troops, shows that knowledge of the land, may well have furnished him with such information. Once possessed with it, all the rest of the story of the interviews follows naturally (cf traditions of J., Jews Eng). The long testing of the brethren with the attendant delay in the relief of the father Jacob and the family (chs 42—45) has been the subject of much discussion, and most ingenious arguments for the justification of J. All this seems unnecessary. J. was not perfect, the king and another dream in which the same cunning hand of Providence is plainly seen (ch 41) is the means of bringing J. to stand in the royal presence. The staff that dreams are made of interests scarely less than the secret Providence was super-imposed over them. As the harvest fields of the semi-nomadic Bedouin in Pal, and the household routine of Egypt in the dreams of the chief butler and the chief baker, so now the industrial interests and the religious forms of the chief of the Nile devoted to the service of the "king's house." The "seven kine" of the goddess Hathor supplies the number of the cows, and the doubling of the symbolism in the cattle and the grain points to the two great sources of Egypt's welfare. The Providence that had shaped and guided the whole course of J. from the Palestinian home was consummated when, with the words, sent in a most recent identification of J. much evidence to which one would like to give full credence (C. H. Roberts, "Historical Essays" 45.48.61). It was the case of a legal document and, aside from the fact that he claims two exod, two Js, two Aarons, two lawgivers called Moses, and two givings of the law, a case of critical doublets more astounding than any heretofore claimed in the Pent. The evidence itself which he adduces is very far from conclusive. It is doubtful if the texts will bear the translation he gives them, esp. the proper names. The claims of Rameses II, that he built Pithom, compared with the stelae of 400 years, which he says he constructed in 400th year of King Nebi, seems to put J. about the time of the Hyksos king. This is the most that can be said now. The burial of Jacob is in exact accord with Egyptian customs. The wealth of the Israelites who retained their possessions and were fed by the crown, in contrast with the poverty of the Egyptians, is a clear yardstick that prepares the way for the wonderful growth and influence of Israel, and the fear which the Egyptians at last had of them. "And J. died, being 110 years old," is a clear old age in the Egyptian mind. The reputed burial place of J. at Shechem still awaits examination.

Joseph stands out among the patriarchs in some respects with preeminence. His nobility of character, his purity of heart and life, his sagacity and wisdom, and the way he makes him, more than any other of the Hebrew patriarchs, illustrate the kind of man which Christ was to give to the world in perfection. J. is not in the list of persons distinctively referred to in Scripture by the name Joseph but Mr. Ramsay in the only perfectly safe criterion—but none more fully illustrates the life and work of the Saviour. He wrought salvation for those who betrayed and rejected him, he went down into humiliation as the way to his exaltation, he forgave those who, at least in spirit, put him to death, and to him as to the Saviour, all must come for relief, or perish.

JOSEPH BARNABAS. See Barnabas.

JOSEPH BARSABBAS, bār-sā'bās (Bārōsβās, Barōsβas, Barōsβab; AV Barabas, bār'as-bas; for etymology, etc., of Joseph, see general articles on Joseph Barsabba; Joseph Barsabba was surname of Justus (Acts 23). Barabbas was probably a patronymic, i.e. son of Saba or Seba. Other interpretations given are "son of an oath," "son of an old man," "son of conversion," "son of quiet." It is likely that the "Judas called Barabbas" of Acts 16 22 was his brother. Ewald considers that both names refer to the same person, but this is improbable.

J. was one of those who accompanied the apostles "all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and went out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto the day that he was received up from us" (Acts 1 21). At the meeting of the brethren under the presidency of Peter in Jerusalem shortly after the crucifixion, he was, therefore, proposed along with Matthias as a deacon to replace the place in the apostleship left vacant by the treachery and death of Judas Iscariot; but was unsuccessful (Acts 1 15-26).

According to Eusebius (HE, I, 12), J. was one of the 70 (Lk 10 1), and Papias records the oral tradition that he drank a cup of poison without harm (cf. Mk 16 18). The Acts of St. Paul, a work belonging to the 2d cent. and first mentioned by Origen, relates that Barsabba, Justus the Flatfoot and others were imprisoned by Nero for protesting their faith in Christ, but that upon a vision of the newly martyred Paul appearing to the emperor, he ordered their immediate release. JOSEPH, HUSBAND OF MARY (for etymology, etc., of Joseph, see Joseph). Joseph, the carpenter (Mt 12 55), was a "just man" (Mt 1 Refer—1 19 AV), who belonged to Nazareth in NT (Lk 2 4). He was of Davidic descent (Mt 1 20; Lk 2 4), the son of Heli (Lk 2 33) and Jacob (Mt 1 16), the husband of Mary (Mt 1 26) and the supposed father of Jesus (Mt 13 55; Lk 3 23; 4 22; Jn 1 45; 6 42).

(1) Before the Nativity.—The Gospels of Mt and Mk alone give any detailed reference to J. and the birth of Jesus, and their accounts vary in part. Lk begins with the Annunciation to Mary at Nazareth (Lk 1 26-38). Overwhelmed with the tidings, Mary departed "with haste" "into the hill country, into a city of Judah," to seek communion with Elisabeth, with whom she had been coupled in the Annunciation by the angel Gabriel (Lk 1 39-55). After abiding with her about three months she returned "unto her own house" (Lk 1 56 AV). The events recorded in Mt 1 18-24 probably took place in the interval between this return and the birth of Jesus. During Mary's visit to Elisabeth, J. had likely remained in Nazareth. The abrupt and probably unexplained departure of his espoused wife for Judah (cf. the phrase "with haste"), and her condition on her return, had caused him great mental distress (Mt 1 20, 21). But the emotion was tempered with mercy, he was minded to put her away "privily," but the visitation of the angel in his sleep relieved him from his dilemma, and he was reconciled to his wife (Mt 1 24). The narrative is then continued by St. Luke. While J. and Mary still abode in Nazareth, "there went out a decree from Caesar Augustus, that all the world should be enrolled" (Lk 2 1). "And all went to enrol themselves, every one to his own city" (Lk 2 3). Being of the house and lineage of David, J. went up with Mary, who was "great with child," from Galilee, "out of the city of Nazareth, into Judaea, to the city of David, which is called Bethlehem" (Lk 2 4,5), and there Jesus was born (Lk 2 7; cf Mt 2 1).

(2) After the Nativity.—(a) St. Luke's account: The two accounts now diverge considerably. According to Lk, the Holy Family remained for a time at Bethlehem and were there visited by the shepherds (Lk 2 8-20). After a short stay, the purification (cf Lk 2 21.22; Lev 12), J. departed with his wife for Jesus "to present" the infant Jesus "to the Lord" and "to offer up sacrifice according to the ancient law" (Lk 2 24). There he was present at the prophesying of Simeon and Anna concerning Jesus, and received the blessing of the former (Lk 2 34). After that they accomplished all things according to the law of the Lord, they returned into Galilee, to their own city Nazareth (Lk 2 39). Every year, at the Passover, they made this journey to Jesus (Lk 2 41). The care and solicitude of J. and Mary for the boy Jesus and their grief at His temporary loss are also recorded (Lk 2 45-48.51). There is evidence that, though Mary "kept all these things in her heart," J. at least had no understanding of the Divine nature of the charge committed to his care (Lk 2 50).

(b) St. Matthew's account: But according to Mt it was from the Wise Men of the East that Jesus received homage; Joseph then went to Bethlehem. There is no further mention of the dedicatory journey to Jesus, or of the return to Nazareth.
Instead, it is stated that on the departure of the Wise Men from Bethlehem, J. was warned in a dream of the impending murder of Herod, and escaped with his wife and the infant Jesus into Egypt (Mt. 2 13-14). Upon the death of Herod, an angel appeared to J., and he returned to the land of Israel (Mt. 2 19-21). His original intention was to settle once more in Judaea, but on learning that Archelaus, the son of Herod, was ruler there, he “ withdrew into the parts of Galilee, and came and dwelt in a city called Nazareth” (Mt. 2 22-23).

(c) The proper sequence of the two narratives: The reportative manner of Mt. would thus imply that the Holy Family had no connexion with Nazareth previous to their return from Egypt. It has, however, been suggested by Ramsay that Mt. merely reports what was common knowledge, and that Lk. “Whereas he might consider this, supplemented it in his Gospel with details known only to the Holy Family, and in part to the mother alone” (cf. Sir W. Ramsay. Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 78-79). A comparison of the two Gospel narratives makes it clear that the visitation of the Wise Men fell on a later date than that of the shepherds. The latter took place immediately after the Nativity (cf. Lk. 2 11. 15. 16, “Isa born . . . this day,” “Let us now go,” “And they came with haste”). On the other hand, when the Wise Men came to J., Christ was about one year old (Mt. 2 11). The infant Jesus, therefore, on this journey to Jerusalem and the consultation of Herod by the chief priests (Mt. 2 4), and during this interval the events recorded in Lk. 2 5-8 had taken place. That there was sufficient time for this is attested also by the fact that the decree was directed against children up to two years of age (Mt. 2 16). Thus it was after the return of the Holy Family to Nazareth, and on a further visit to Bethlehem, implied by Mt. but not recorded by Lk. that the infant Jesus received the adoration of the Wise Men. Jesus being born in 6 BC, this took place in 5 BC, and as Herod died in 4 BC, J. may have missed only one of the Passovers (cf. Lk. 2 41) by his flight into Egypt. (For a full discussion, cf. Ramsay, op. cit.) As no mention is made of J. in the later parts of the Gospels where the Holy Family is referred to (cf. Mt. 12 46; Lk. 8 19), it is commonly supposed that he died before the commencement of the public ministry of Christ.

If a type was to be sought in the person of J., it is that of a simple, honest, hard-working, God-fearing man, who was possessed of large sympathies and a warm heart. Strict in the observance of Jewish law and custom, he was yet ready when occasion arose to make these subservient to the greater law of the Spirit. Too practical to possess any deep insight into the Divine mysteries or eternal significance of events which came within his knowledge (cf. Lk. 2 50), he was, perhaps, to some extent, the direct answer to what he perceived to be the direct call of God (cf. Mt. 1 24). Originally a “just man” (AV), the naturallemancy within his heart prevailed over mere justice, and by the promptings of the Holy Spirit thatlemancy was transferred into a strong and enduring love (of Mt. 1 24). J. is known to us only as a dim figure in the background of the Gospel narratives, yet his whole-hearted reconciliation to Mary, even in the face of possible slanders by his neighbors, his complete submission, when he left all and fled into Egypt to save the infant Jesus, are indicative that he was not unworthy to fulfill the great trust which was imposed upon him by the Eternal Father.

The Gospel of the Infancy according to St. James, a work composed originally in the 2nd cent., but with later additions, gives a detailed account of the marriage of their journey to Bethlehem, and of the birth of Jesus. A similar gospel, reputed to be by Thomas the philosopher, of later origin and gnostic tendency (cf. Hennecken, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 57-74), is more historical, miraculous happenings in the domestic life of the Holy Family, and the dealings of Joseph with the Magi, the angelic visits, and the entreaties of Mary to Christ to save him. Its aim was to show forth Christ as the Saviour, even at the last hour, and the rightful manner of his birth, when he had received a high place in the Calendar of the Roman Catholic Saints, his feast being celebrated on March 19.

JOSEPH OF ARIMATHEA (Ἀριμαθαῖος, ap6 Arimathaios; for etymology, etc., of Joseph, see gen. art. on Joseph): Joseph of Arimathea—a place the locality of which is doubtful, but lying probably on the N.W. of Jermus—was a “rich man” (Mt. 27 57), “a councillor of honorable estate,” or member of the Sanhedrin (Mk. 15 43; Lk. 23 50), “a good and righteous man . . . who was looking for the kingdom of God” (Lk. 23 50; Mt. 16 21), and “himself was just and disposed to do good” (Lk. 23 48). Although he kept his discipleship secret “for fear of the Jews” (Jn. 19 38), he was yet faithful to his allegiance in that he absented himself from the meeting which found Jesus guilty of death (Lk. 23 51), but went to Pilate “after the death of his Lord awakened the courage and revealed the true faith of J. On the evening after the crucifixion he "went boldly to Pilate and begged the body of Jesus. There is a fine touch in that he himself took down the body from the cross with the assistance of Nicodemus he wound it in fine linen with spices (cf. Mt. 27 57, J. was a “rich man”) and brought it to the new sepulcher in the garden near the place of His crucifixion. There they “laid him in a tomb that was hewn in stone, where never man had yet lain” and “rolled a stone against the door of the tomb” (cf. Mt. 27 57-60; Mk. 15 43-46; Lk. 23 50-53; Jn. 19 38-42). In this was held to be the fulfillment of the prophecy of Isa. 53 9.

The Gospel of St. Peter, written probably in Syria about the middle of the 2nd cent., gives a slightly different account. According to this J., “the friend of Pilate and the Lord,” was present at the crucifixion and immediately upon its conclusion besought of Pilate that he might have the body. A character of ancient usage, J. was later, after the crucifixion the Jews handed the body over to J. (cf. Hennecken, Neutestamentliche Apokryphen, 27-39). Legends of a later origin record that J., father of Theyson, was called by Philip from Gaul to Britain along with 11 other disciples to 63 A.D. and built an oratory at Colchester (following Tertullian, in Apol.), that he brought the Holy Grail to England, and that he fled Ireland from snakes.

JOSEPH, PRAYER OF: An OT pseudopigraph, no. 3 in the Stichometry of Niceneus (Westcott, Canon of the NT, 571), with the length given as 1,100 lines, and no. 5 in the List of Sixty Books (Westcott, 568). The work is lost, and the only quotations are in Origen (In Jos., I. 25, in Ante- Nicene Fathers, IX, 341; In Gen., iii 9, 12). Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are said to have been created before every work, but Jacob-Israel is the greatest, "the firstborn of every living creature," the "first minister in God's presence," greater than the angels whom he wrestled. The purport may be anti-Christian, the patriarchs exalted in place of Christ; cf., perhaps, En. 71 (but not so in Charles's 1216 text), but Origen's favorable opinion of the book proves that the polemic could not have been very direct.

JOSEPHUS, THE CARPENTER, GOSPEL OF. See Apocryphal Gospels.

JOSEPHUS, ᾿Iωσήφος (Ἰωσήφος), B reads Ἰσαΐα, Πρωτευς: In 1 Esd 9:34, corresponding to "Joseph" in Ezr 10:42.

JOSEPHUS, ᾿Ιωσήφος, FLAVIUS, Ἐρωτεύσεις: Was born at Jerus 37-38 AD, and died at Rome early in the 2nd cent., when is not known precisely. His father and mother belonged to families of the priestly aristocracy; consequently he received an excellent education, becoming familiar, not only with Jewish, but with Hellenistic, culture. When 16 years old he resorted to one Banus, an Essene (q.v.), in the desert of Engedi, with whom he remained for 3 years, absorbing occult lore, and practising the ascetic life. It might have been expected from his social position that, on his return to Jerus, he would join the SADDUCEES (q.v.); but, his Essene experience having indoctrinated him with ceremonialism, he preferred to become a PHARISEE (q.v.). He evidently believed, too, that the Pharisees were akin to the Stoics, who were then influential in the Hellenistic world. During his absence in the desert, the misgovernment of the Rom procurators at Jerus had grown apace. And the ineptitudes and injustices of Felix, Albannus and Florus were succeeded by sacrifice under Annas, the high priest (622). Accordingly, the Zealots (q.v.) plotted against Rom rule. Rebellion simmered, and many of the distressed were transported to Rome to be dealt with there. Among these were several priests, whom Jos knew. About the year 64, he went to Rome to plead for them, shipwreck on the voyage, was rescued with a few survivors and was brought to port at Puteoli. Here he met Altyrus, a Jewish actor, who happened to be in the good graces of Poppaea, Nero’s consort. The empress, a Jewish proselyte, espoused his cause at Rome, and showed him many favors. At the capital, he also discerned the power of the Romans and, in all probability, grew convinced of the hopelessness of armed resistance, so he returned to Jerus to set upon insurrection, and was forced, possibly against his better judgment, to make common cause with them. The first part of his public career is concerned with the great struggle that now began.

When war was put out, Josephus fled to Galilee, the province where the Rom attack would first fall. He had no military fitness for command, but the influence of his friends and the exigencies of politics thrust the office upon him. The Zealots soon found that he did not carry out the necessary preparations with thoroughness, and they tried to compass his removal. But he was too influential, too good a politician also, to be undermined. Sounded by enemies among his own folk, who even attempted to assassinate him, he encountered several dangerous experiences, and, at length, flying from the Romans, was becalmed with his army in Jotapata, near the Lake of Gennesaret, in May, 67. The Jews withstood the siege for 47 days with splendid courage, till Titus, assaulting under cover of a mist, stormed the stronghold and massacred the weary defenders. Jos escaped to a cave where, with his usual adroitness, he saved himself from death at the hands of his companions. The Romans soon uncovered his hiding-place, and hailed him before Vespasian, the commander-in-chief. Jos worked upon the superstitions of the general, and so ingratiated himself that Vespasian took him to Alexandria in his train. Having been liberated by his captor, he adopted the family name of the Flavians, according to Rom custom. Returning to Pal with Titus, he proceeded to mediate between the Romans and the Jews, earning the suspicion of the former, the hatred of the latter. His wonted diplomacy preserved him from anything more serious than a wound, and he was a witness of the terrible events that marked the last days of Jerus. Then he accompanied Titus to Rome for the TRIUMPH (q.v.). Here he lived the remainder of his days, in high favor with the ruling house, and was relieved from another worry by a lavish imperial patronage. He was thus enabled to devote himself to literary pursuits.

They are as follows: (1) Concerning the Jewish War, written before 79; we have the Gr tr of this history by the author; there are 7 books: I, the period from Antiochus Epiphanes (175 BC) to Herod the Great (4 BC); II, from 4 BC to 66 AD, covering the early events of the War; III, occurrences in Galilee in 67 AD; IV, the course of the War till the siege of Jerus; V and VI, the investment and fall of Jerus; VII, the aftermath of the rebellion. While this work is not written in the objectivity and scientific history, it is credible on the whole, except where it concerns the rôle played by the author. (2) The Antiquities of the Jews, written not later than 94 AD. In this Jos purports to relate the entire history of the Jews from the beginning till the War of 66 AD. The 20 books fall naturally into 5 divisions, thus: (a) I–X, from prehistoric times till the Captivity, in other words, the period related in the OT substantially; (b) XI, the age of Cyrus; (c) XII–XIV, the beginnings and the period, from Alexander the Great, including the Maccabean revolt, till the accession of Herod the Great; (d) XV–XVII, the reign of Herod; (e) XVIII–XX, from Herod’s death till the War of 66. While it cannot be called an apology for the Jews, this work betrays the author’s consciousness of the disfavor with which his people were viewed throughout the Rom Empire. Jos does what he can to disabuse the Gr-Rom educated classes, although he shows curious odd habits of his period, of the HEB religion. All in all, the work is disappointing; but it contains many details and sidelights of first importance to investigators. (3) The treatise called, since Jerome, Against Apion, is Josephus’ most inspiring periphrastic account of the JEWS; it is full of the High Antiquity of the Jews, tells us what it contains—a defence of Heb religion against the libels of heathendom. It is in two books. The vituperation with which Jos visits Apion is important in comparison with the defence of Mosaic religion and the criticism of paganism. Here the author’s character is seen at its best; the air of Woldly Wiseman has been dropped, and he approaches enthusiasm. (4) His last work is the Vita or Autobiography, a misleading title. It is an echo of old days in Galilee, directed against the traductions of an associate, Justus of Tiberias. We have Jos at his worst here. He so colors the narrative as to convey a totally wrong impression of the part he played during the great crisis. In external, it may be said that his relations with the imperial court rendered it difficult, perhaps impossible, for him to pursue another course.

JOSEJS, jō<std> (Iosēj, lōstå):
(1) One of the brethren of Jesus (Mt 6:3; in Mt 13:55 the Gr is “Joseph,” and RV so renders).
(2) A son of Mary, perhaps identical with (1) (Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40.47). See BRETHEN OF THE LORD.
(3) A name of Barnabas (Acts 4:36 AV, where again Gr and RV have “Joseph”). See BARNABAS.

JOSAH, jō<std> (yôșâh, “Jeh’s gift”):
A descendant of Simeon, chief in his family (1 Ch 4:34.35).

JOSHPHAT, josh-a-fat (yôșāphāt, “Jeh has judged”;
fec JOSHPHAT):
(1) One of David’s mighty men (1 Ch 11:43), a “Mithnite,” but not included in the list of 2 S 23.
(2) A priest and trumpeter of David’s time (1 Ch 15:24), AV “Jehoshaphat.”

JOSHAVIAH, josh-a-vî’a (yôșāwîyāh, yôșâwûghâh, “son of Heman; 1 Ch 25:4.24):
The last 8 or 9 names in verse 4 are taken by commentators to be not names but the words of a prayer. See OT JC, 145, n.; Curtis, Chron, 275, 280; SBOT.

JOSHER-BASHEBETH, josh-ba-shê’beth (yôșhîr ba-shêbeh, ’beth):
This proper name in RV 5 14.18 (placed in 1 Ch 11:46) is “that sat in the seat” in AV (2 S 23:8). The phrase so rendered is meaningless. The text has evidently suffered corruption. There can be no doubt that a proper name is intended. This, according to the LXX passage in 1 Ch 11:11, should be Jashobeam. Some scholars think that this also is a corruption, and by a process of emendation arrive at “Eshbaal” as the correct name (Driver, Heb Text of S; SBOT, ad loc.).

JOSHIBIAH, josh-i-bî’a (yôșîbîyâh, yôșihîbîyâh, “Jeh sets,” or “causes to dwell”; AV Josibiah): A Simeonite (1 Ch 4:35).

JOSHUA, josh-'û-a (a) yôșâhâv, [b] yôșâhâv, [c] yôšhâhâv, “Jeh is deliverance” or “opulence”;
cf JOSUA; Ἰσαάς, Ἰσαάς):
(1) Joshua the son of Nun; the name has the Heb form (a) above in Dt 3:21; Jgs 2:7; elsewhere the form (b), except in Neh 8:17, where it is of the form yôśhâh (See JOSUA); of also Nu 13:8.16; Dt 32:44. See following article.
(2) In 1 S 6:14.18 (form [b]), the Bethshemite in whose field stood the stone that brought the ark from the Philistines.
(3) In 2 K 23:8 (form [b]), governor of Judah in the time of Josiah.
(4) The high priest at Jerusalem after the return. See separate article. S. F. HUNTER.

IV. CHARACTER AND WORK OF JOSHUA

I. FORM AND SIGNIFICANCE OF NAME.—The name Joshua, a contracted form of Jehoshua (יהושע, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ), which also appears in the form Jeshua (יהוסף, נָשִׂיא), signifies “Jeh is deliverance” or “salvation,” and is formed on the analogy of many Israelite names, as Jehoiakim (יהוֹיָקִים, יְהוֹיָקִים), “Jeh exalted,” Jehohanan (יהוֹנַן, y'hônân), “Jeh is gracious,” Elishua or Elisha (יהוֹשֻׁעַ אֶלֶישָׁה, יְהוֹשֻׁעַ אֶלֶישָׁה), “God is deliverance,” Elizur (יהוֹשֻׁעַ אֶלֶישָׁה, יְהוֹשֻׁשָׁה), “God is a rock,” etc. In the narrative of the mission of the spies in Nu 13, the name is given as Joshuas (יהושוע, yôshôshâh, vs 8.16; cf of Dt 32:44), which is changed by Moses to Joshua (ver 16). In the passage in Dt, however, the earlier form of the name is regarded by Dr. Driver (Comm. in loc.) as an erroneous reading.
The Gr form of the name is Jesus (Ἰησοῦς, Ἰσαάς 7:45; He 4:8, RV “Joshua,” but AV “Jesu” in both passages), and this form appears even in the passages cited above from Neh and Dt. In Nu 13:8.16, however, LXX has Ἰωσία, Ἰωσία. The name occurs in later Jewish history, e.g. as that of the owner of the field in which the ark rested after its return from the land of the Philis (1 S 6:14.18), and appears to have become esp. frequent after the exile (Ezr 2:40; Zec 9:1, etc). It is also found (Joshua) with a local significance, as in the name of one of the “villages” in Southern Judaea, where the repatriated Jews dwelt after their return from Babylon (Neh 11:20).

II. HISTORY OF THE LIFE OF JOSHUA.—The narrative of the life of Joshua, the son of Nun, is naturally divided into two parts, in which he held entirely different positions with regard to the people of Israel, and discharged different duties. In the earlier period he is the servant and minister of Moses, loyal to his leader, and one of his most trusted and valiant captains. After the death of Moses he himself succeeds to the leadership of the Israelite host, and conducts them to a settlement in the Promised Land. The service of the earlier years of his life is a preparation and equipment for the office and responsibility that devolved upon him in the later period.
The first appearance of J. in the history is at Rephidim, on the way from the wilderness of Sin to Horeb. Neither the exact site of
1. First Rephidim nor the meaning of the name Appearance can be determined; the Israelites, however, apparently came to Rephi-dim before they approached the rich oasis of Perián, for at that former place “there was no water for the people to drink” (Ex 17:1). The fact that the host encamped there seems to assume the existence of wells; either, therefore, these were found to be dry, or they failed before the wants of the great host were supplied. The Amalekites, wandering desert tribes, satisfied the ownership of the wells, and, resenting the Israelite intrusion, swooped down upon them to drive them away and to enrich themselves with the spoil of their possessions. Under the command of J., the Israelites in a complete victory, a battle that seems to have been prolonged until sunset; the fortunes of the battle varying with the uplifting or falling of Moses’ hands, which were accordingly supported by Aaron and Hur throughout the day (vs 11 ff). A curse and sentence of extermination pronounced against Amalek were formally written down and communicated to J, apparently that, as the future leader of Israel, he might have it in charge to provide for the fulfillment.

It is evident also that at this period J. was no young and untried warrior. Although no indication of his previous history is given, his name is introduced into the narrative as of a man well known, who is sufficiently in the confidence of Moses to be given the choice that in the first conflict in which the Israelites had been engaged since leaving Egypt. The result justified the choice. And if, during the march, he had held the position of military commander and organizer under Moses, his advice was in the first instance the remarkable change, by which within the brief space of a month the undispatched crowd of serfs who had fled from Egypt became a force sufficiently resolute and competent to repair and exhortation.

In all the arrangements for the erection and service of the tabernacle, J. the warrior naturally has no place. He is briefly named (Ex 24:13) as the minister of Moses, accompanying his foot of the mountain of God, but remaining behind with the elders and Aaron and Hur, when Moses commenced the ascent. A similar brief mention is in Josh 7:7, where has rejoiced Moses under the return of the last from the mountain with the two tables of the testimony, and is unaware of the outbreak of the people and their idolatrous worship of the molten calf in the camp; of Josh 14:1, where evidently he is found in the closest attendance upon his leader and chief. No further reference is made to J. during the stay of the Israelites at Sinai, or their subsequent journeys, until they found themselves at Kadesh-barnes on the southern border of the Promised Land (Nu 13). His name is once mentioned, however, in an earlier ch of the same book (Nu 11:28), when the tidings are brought to Moses that two men in the camp of Israel, Eldad and Medad, had been inspired to prophecy. Hence he is described in harmony with the previous statements of his position, as Moses' minister from his youth. Jealous of his leader's prerogative and honor, he would have the irregular prophesying stopped, but is himself chosen, who rejoiced in the spirit of God should rest thus upon any of the Lord's people.

Of the 12 men, one from each tribe, sent forward by Moses from Kadesh to ascertain the character of the people and land before him, only Hoshea the Ephraimites, the Spies whose name is significantly changed to Joshua (13:8), and Caleb the Judahite, bring back a report encouraging the Israelites to proceed. The account of the mission of the spies is repeated in his own language (13:1 ff.). There, however, the suggestion that spies should be commissioned to examine and report upon the land comes in the first instance from the people themselves. In the record of Nu they are chosen and sent by Moses under Divine direction (13:1 ff.). The two representations are not incompatible, still less contradictory. The former describes in an altogether natural manner the human initiative, probable enough in the circumstances in which the Israelites found themselves; the latter is the Divine control and direction, behind and above the affairs of men. The instructions given to the spies (vs 17 ff.) evidently contemplated a hasty survey of the entire region of the Negeb or southern borderland of Pal up to an hour on the edge of the hills of Judaea; the time allowed, 40 days (yer 25), was too brief to accomplish more, hardly long enough for this purpose alone. They were, moreover, not only to ascertain the character of the towns and their inhabitants, the quality and products of the soil, but to bring back with them specimens of the fruits (ver 20). An indication of the year is given in the added clause that "the time was the time of first-ripe grapes." The usual months of the vintage are September and October (cf Lev 23:39); in the warm and sheltered valleys, however, in the neighborhood of Hebron, grapes may sometimes be gathered in August or even as early as July. The valley from which the fruits, grapes, figs and pomegranates were brought was known as the valley of Eschol, or the 'cluster' (Nu 13:23; 32:9; Dt 1:24).

No hesitating or doubtful account is given by all the spies of the fertility and attractiveness of the country; but in view of the strength of its cities and inhabitants only J. and Caleb are confident of the ability of the Israelites to take possession of it. Their reports were submitted, however, overborne by the timidity and dissuasion of the others, who so entirely alarm the people that they refuse to essay the conquest of the land, desiring to return into Egypt (vs 14:30) and attempt to some of J. and Caleb (14:10). These two alone, therefore, were exempted from the sentence of exclusion from the Promised Land (vs 24:30:38; 26:65; 32:12; Dt 1:25 ff.). The remainder of the spies perished at once by a special doom. The people were condemned to a 40-year exile in the wilderness, a year for each day that the spies had been in Pal, until all the men of that generation from twenty years old and upward were dead (14:29; 32:11 f.), and [the season of] the Exodus; the people were to enter into the land in defiance of the prohibition of Jeh, and ended in failure and disastrous defeat (vs 40f.; Dt 1:41 ff.; of 21:1-3).

Upon the events of the next 38 or 40 years in the life of Israel an almost unbroken silence falls. The wanderers in the wilderness have no history. Some few events, however, that are recorded without note of time, the rebellion of Korah, Dathan and Abiram, and the breaking out of the plague because of the people's murmuring against Moses, are recorded (Nu 16:1 ff.; 17:1 ff.). When the census is taken the spirit of God should rest thus upon any of the Lord's people. In none of them does J. take an active part, nor is his name mentioned in connection with the campaigns against Sihon and Og on the E. of the Jordan, and the people is the name of the tribe, or of Moab opposite Jericho, and Caleb with Moses himself are found to be the only survivors of the host that 40 years previously came out of Egypt (36:83 ff.). As the time of the death of the great leader and lawgiver drew near, he was commissioned formally to appoint J. as his successor and to hand over to him and to Eleazar the priest the duty of finallyapportioning the conquered territory among the several tribes (27:18 ff.; 32:28; 34:17; cf Dt 34:4 ff.; 32:28; 32:31; 34:1, 40). Some of the passages anticipate the direct Divine commission and encouragement recorded in Josh (1:5 ff.) and given to him after the death of Moses.

The history of J. in his new capacity as supreme head and leader of the people in several instances recapitulates as it were the history of his greater forerunner. It was not the Head of the unnatural that he should be so; and People the similarity of recorded events affords no real ground for doubt with regard to the reliability of the tradition. The position in which Israel now found itself on the E. of the Jordan was in some respects not unlike that which confronted Moses at Kadesh-barnes or before the crossing of the Red Sea. J., however, was faced with a problem much more difficult, and in the war-tried and disciplined host at his command he possessed an instrument immensely more suitable and powerful for carrying out his purpose.

(1) Sending of the spies.—His first act was to send spies from Shittim to ascertain the character of the country immediately opposite on the W. of the Jordan, and esp. the position and strength of Jericho, which was the fortified city which first stands in the way of an invader from the E. who proposes to cross the river by the fords near its mouth (Josh 2:2). In Jericho the spies owed their lives to the quick inventiveness of Rahab (cf. He 11:31), who pretended that the river had been dammed up, when the emissaries of the king; and returning to J, they reported the prospects of an easy victory and conquest (vs 23f).

There were doubtless special reasons which induced J. to send spies, for the crossing-place led directly into Central Pal., a district in which apparently his advance would not have been obstructed by fortified cities such as confronted him farther south; whereas Jericho therefore would seem to offer the advantages of an open and ready entrance into the heart of the country. His decision was probably influenced by the possession by Israel of a fortified base at Jericho, and in the neighboring cities. The favorable report of the spies also proved that there would be no great difficulty in carrying out this plan.

(2) Crossing of the Jordan.—The actual crossing of the river is narrated in chs 3, 4. The city of Jericho was built in a plain from 12 to 14 miles wide formed by the recession of the hills that border the valley of the Jordan from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea, and stood at the mouth of the valley of Achor (7:24; 15:7). The modern village of Erthā is built at a short distance, E. of the ancient site, andGilgal lay half-way to the river. At the latter place a camp was established after the taking of Jericho, and Gilgal formed for some considerable time the base of operations, where the women and children remained in safety while the men were absent on their warlike expeditions. There also the tabernacle was erected, as the symbol and center of national life, and there apparently it remained until the time came for the removal to Shiloh (18:1).

Within the plain the stream has excavated a torrent-bed to a depth of 200 ft., below the surface, varying from an eighth of a mile to a mile in breadth. In ordinary seasons the waters are confined to a small portion of the channel, which is then crossed opposite Jericho by two fords where the depth does not exceed 3 ft. When the torrent rises it may be crossed elsewhere. In times of flood, however, the water rises and fills the entire channel from bank to bank, so that the fords become impracticable. It is expressly stated that it was at such a time of flood that the Israelites approached the river, at the "time of harvest," or in the early spring (3:15). The priests were directed to carry the ark to the brink of the river, the waters of which, as soon as their feet touched them, would be cut off, and a dry passage afforded. The narrative is perhaps to be understood as though it indicated that a wall of water stood on the right and left of the people as they crossed; the entire breadth of the river bed was exposed by the failure of the waters from above. See JORDAN.

An interesting parallel to the crossing up of the Jordan is recorded by an Arab, historian of the Middle Ages, who writes to explain a natural but extraordinary occurrence: the sudden thought of the miraculous character of the passage of the river with any apparent knowledge of the passage of the Israelites.

During the years 1260-67 AD, a Masmademian sufi named Masrour was engaged in building a bridge over the Jordan near Damlîkh, a place which some have identified with the city Adam (Josh 3:16); but before the workmen had carried away and destroyed his work. On one night, however, in December of the latter year, the river rose entirely to flow. The opportunity was seized, and an army of workmen so strengthened the bridge that it resisted the flood which came down upon it the next day, and stood firm. It was found that at some distance up the river, where the valley was narrower, the banks had been undermined, the water had fallen in, thus damming back the stream. It seems not improbable that it was by force of this character that a passage of the river was made over the Israelites; even as 40 years earlier a "strong east wind" had been employed to drive back the waters of the Red Sea before Moses.

At the command of J., under Divine direction, the safe crossing of the Jordan was commemorated by the erection at Gilgal of 12 stones (4:3-9:20 ff.), one for each of the tribes of Israel, taken from the fords of the river. It is stated that 12 oxen were set up in the midst of the river. The statement is probably a misunderstanding, and a mere confusion of the tradition. It is not likely that there would be a double commemoration, or an erection of stones in a place where there would never be seen. At Gilgal also the supply of manna ceased, when the natural resources of the country became available (5:12). The date of the passage is given as the 10th day of the 1st month (4:19); and on the 14th day the Passover was kept there in the plains of Jericho (5:10). For the 2d time, also, at the crisis of the first entrance into the land, J. was encouraged for his work by a vision and Divine promise of assistance and direction (6:1-5).

(3) Capture of Jericho.—The account of the taking of Jericho, illustrates, as would naturally be expected in the case of a city so situated, the effeminate and warlike character of its inhabitants. There was apparently little or no fighting, while for a whole week soldiers and people paraded before the walls. A brief reference (6:1) seems to indicate that the citizens were quickly driven to take refuge behind their fortifications. Twice seven times the city was compassed, with the ark of the covenant borne in solemn procession, and at the 7th circuit on the 7th day, while the people shouted, the wall of the city fell "in its place" (6:20 m.), and Jericho was taken by assault. Only Rahab and her household were spared. All the treasure was devoted to the service of the Lord, but the city itself was burnt, and a solemn curse pronounced upon the site and upon the man who should venture to rebuild its walls (6:26). The curse was braved, whether deliberately or not, by the inhabitants of the walled city of Jericho, and the disasters foretold fell upon him in the loss of his children (1 K 16:34). Thenceforward Jericho appears to have been continuously inhabited. There was a settlement of the name on the hill 3 miles to the E. of Elijah's day (2 K 2:5.15). The natural fertility of the site won for it the name of the city of palm trees (Dt 34:3; Jgs 1:16; 3:13).

From the plains of Jericho two valleys lead up into the central hill country in directions N.W. and S.W. respectively. These form the two entrances or passes, by which the higher land is approached from the E. Along these lines, therefore, the invasion of the land was planned and carried out. The main advances were made by the northeastern of the valleys, while the immediate southern invasion was intrusted to Caleb and the two tribes of Judah and Benjamin, the supreme control remaining always in the hands of J. (cf. Josh 14, 16; Jgs 1). This seems on the whole to be the better way of explaining the narratives in general, which in detail present many difficulties.

(4) Conquest of Ai and Bethel.—At the head of the northern pass stood the city of Luz or Bethel (Gen 25:19; Josh 10:18; Jgs 1:29). Ai lay close at hand, and was engaged in building a bridge over the Jordan near Damlîkh, a place which some have identified with the city Adam (Josh 3:16); but before the workmen had carried away and destroyed his work. On one night, however, in December of the latter year, the river rose entirely to flow. The opportunity was seized, and an army of workmen so strengthened the that overtook the other. Before Ai, the advance guard of the Israelites, a small party detached on the advice of the spies sent forward by Jeph of Jericho, suffered defeat and were driven back in confusion. The city, however, failed to obey the command to "devote" the whole spoil of Jericho, and to the theft by one of the people of treasure which belonged rightfully to Jeph (7.11). When the culprit Achan had been discovered and punished, a renewed attempt upon Ai, made with larger forces and more skilful dispositions, was crowned with success. The city was taken by a stratagem and destroyed by fire, its king being hanged outside the city gate (8.28 f.). Unlike Jericho, it seems never to have been restored. Bethel also was captured, through the treachery apparently of one of its own citizens, and its inhabitants were put to the sword (Jgs 1.24 f.).

(5) Reading of the law on Mt. Ebal.—Of further campaigns undertaken by Jeph, for the subjugation of Canaan thenceforth it has been preserved. It is possible, therefore, that the conquest of this part of the country was accomplished without further fighting (see JOSHUA, BOOK OF). In the list of the cities (Josh 12.7–24) whose fall is mentioned by name there are no towns of towns that can be certainly identified as situated here; the greater part evidently belong to the north or south. The only record remaining is that of the formal erection of a well at Ebal (Josh 8.30). Ebal was the center of the people and the solemn reading of the law in their hearing (8.30–35). It is expressly noted that all this was done in accordance with the directions of Moses (cf Deut 11.29; 27.2–8.11 f.). It would further appear probable that the ceremony really took place at the close of the conquest, when all the land was subdued, and is narrated here by anticipation.

(6) The Gibeonites.—The immediate effect of the Israelite victories under Jeph was very great. Especially were the Hivite inhabitants of Gibeon struck with fear (9.3 f.) lest the same fate should overtake them that had come upon the peoples of Jericho and Ai. With Gibeon, 3 other cities were confederate, viz. Chephirah, Beeroth and Kirjath-jearim, or the "city of strangers" (17).* Gibeon, however, was the chief, and acted in the name of the others. It is usually identified with the modern village or township of el-Jib, 7 or 8 miles N. by W. of Jericho; and all four lay clustered around the head of a long and narrow valley of Ajalon extending from the plateau westward to the foothills of the Shephelah, toward the plain and the sea. Gibeon held therefore a position of natural strength and importance, the key to one of the few practicable routes from the west into the highlands of Judaea, equally essential to be occupied as a defensive position against the incursions of the dwellers in the plains, and as affording to an army from the east a safe and protected road down from the mountains.

By a stratagem, probably in the time of Joshua, to which their ruler on their guard, representing themselves as jaded and wayworn travelers from a distance, the Gibeonites succeeded in making a compact with Israel, which assured their own lives and safety. They affirmed that they had heard of the Israelite victories beyond Jordan, and also of the gift to them by Jeph of the whole land (9.9 f.24). Jeph and the princes were deceived and entered too readily into covenant with them, a covenant and promise that was scrupulously observed when on the 3d day of traveling the Israelites reached their cities and found them to be close at hand (vs 16 ff). While, however, their lives were preserved, the men of Gibeon were reduced to the position of menial servitude, first of wood and drawers of water (12.1); and the writer adds, it is thus "unto this day" (vs 21.27). See GIBEON.

The treaty of peace with the Gibeonites and the indignation thereby aroused among the neighboring kings, who naturally regarded the independent action of the men of Gibeon as treachery toward themselves, gave rise to the most formidable coalitions and one of the most dramatic incidents of the whole war. The king of Jerus, Adoni-zedek ("the Lord of righteousness") or "the Lord is righteouseness," 10.1; cf Melchisedek, "the king of righteousness," Gen 14.18; in Jgs 1.5 the name appears as Adoni-bezek, and so LXX reads here), with the 4 kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish and Eglon (10.3), formed a plan to destroy Gibeon in revenge, and the Gibeonites sent hastily for assistance to Jeph, who had returned with his army to Gilgal. The Israelites made a forced march from Gilgal, came upon the allied kings near Gibeon, and attacked and defeated them with great slaughter. The routed army fled westward "by the way of the ascent to Beth-horon" (ver 10), and in the pass was overtaken by a violent hailstorm, by which more perished than had fallen beneath the swords of the Israelites (ver 11). The 5 kings were shut up in a cave at Makkedah, in which they had taken refuge, and were subsequently routed and put to death. The actual pursuit, however, was not stayed until the remnant had found temporary security behind the walls of their fortified cities (10.16 f.). The victory of Israel was celebrated by Jeph, at the expense of all the people and the solemn reading of the law in their hearing (8.30–35). It is expressly noted that all this was done in accordance with the directions of Moses (cf Deut 11.29; 27.2–8.11 f.). It would further appear probable that the ceremony really took place at the close of the conquest, when all the land was subdued, and is narrated here by anticipation.

(7) Conquest of the south.—With almost severe simplicity it is further recorded how the confederate cities in turn were taken in the course of the war. (10.1–28). The conquerors are not mentioned by name, and the details of the capture are merely stated. The only account given is that of the capture of Eglon (10.9–24). Eglon, who was apparently king, was defeated and put to death, and the rest of the city was destroyed (10.25–30). And the account is closed by a summary statement of the conquest of the entire country from Kadesh-barnea in the extreme south as far as Gibeon, after which the people returned to their camp at Gilgal (10.40–43).

(8) Northern conquests.—A hostile coalition of northern rulers had finally to be met and defeated before the occupation and pacification of the land could be said to be complete. Jabin, king of Hazor, the "fort," was at the head of an alliance of northern kings who gathered together to oppose Israel in the neighborhood of the waters of Merom (11.1 f.). Hazor has been doubtfully identified with the modern Jebel Hadir, some 5 miles W. of the lake, and it is of interest to note that no account has been given of the details of the military operations. The victory, however, of the Israelites was decisive, although chariots and horses were employed against them apparently for the first time on Can. soil. The pursuit was maintained as far as Sidon, and Beth-shan, perhaps the "boiling" or "tumults of the waters," the later Zarephath on the coast S. of the former city (11.8; cf 13.6); and the valley of Mizpeh must have been one of the many wadis leading down to the Phoen. coast land. The cities were taken, their inhabitants put to the sword; but Hazor alone appears to have been burnt to the ground (11.11 f.). That the royal city recovered itself later is clear from the fact that a king of Hazor was among the oppressors of Israel in the days of the Judges (Jgs 4). For the time being, however, the fruit of these victories was a widespread and much-needed peace. "The land had rest from war" (11.23).

(9) Allotment of territory.—Thus the work of conquest, as far as the 3d day of traveling under Jeph's command, was now ended; but much yet remained to be done that was left over for future generations. The ideal limits of Israel's possession, as set forth by Jeph in promise to Moses, from the Shihor or Brook of Egypt (cf 1.3 CANTER); and the writer adds, it is thus "unto this day" (vs 21.27). See GIBEON.
For the 7 tribes that were yet without defined inheritance a rough survey of the land appears to have been made, and the unallotted districts were divided into 7 portions, for which lots were then cast at Shiloh in the presence of the assembled tribes (chs 18, 19). The express mention of Shiloh here (18.31) suggests that the lot of the priestly division was carried out at some other place, and if so, probably at Gilgal, the earlier resting-place of the ark and the tabernacle. No definite statement, however, to that effect is made. Benjamin’s portion was assigned between the territories of Judah and the children of Joseph (18.11). Simeon received his inheritance out of the land given to Judah, a part on the south being taken away on the ground that the whole was too great for a single tribe (19:1-9). Zebulun, Asher, and Naphtali were established in the north (19.10–39). And Dan was settled on the seacoast by Joppa, with additional territory in the extreme north, of which they apparently look independent and forcible possession, beyond the inheritance of the other tribes (19.40–48; cf Jgs 18 27–29).

(10) Cities of refuge.—Finally the 6 cities of refuge were appointed, 3 on each side of the Jordan, and the 48 cities of the Levites taken out of the territory of the 20, 21; cf Nu 35; Dt 4 41–43). The two and a half tribes whose inheritance lay in Eastern Pal were then dismissed, their promise of assistance to their brethren having been fulfilled (ch 22); and an altar was erected by the tribes of the Jordan whose purpose is explained to be serve as a standing witness to the common origin of all the tribes, and to frustrate any future attempt to cut off those on the E. from the brotherhood of Israel.

(11) Final address and death.—In a closing assembly of the Israelites at Shechem, J. delivered to the people his final charge, as Moses had done before his death, reminding them of their own wonderful history, and of the promises and claims of God, and exhorting them to faithful and loyal obedience in His service (23, 24). A stone also was set up under the oak in the sacred precinct of Jah, to be a memorial of the renewed covenant between God and His people (24 20, 21). Then at the age of 110 the second great leader of Israel died, and was laid to his rest within his own inheritance in Timnath-serah (vs 29.30; in Jgs 2 9, Timnath-heres), in the hill country of Ephraim. The site of his grave is unknown. Tradition has placed it at Kefar-satir, in S. Samaria, but the localising by tradition of the burying-place of a hero or saint is often little more than accidental, nor can any reliance be placed upon it in this instance.

III. Sources of History.—That the narratives concerning the life and work of J. rest in the main upon a basis of tradition can hardly be doubted. How far the details have been modified, or a different coloring imposed upon the course of events, is at present impossible to determine. There is a remarkable similarity or parallelism between many of the leading events of J.'s career as ruler and captain of Israel and those of his predecessor Moses, which, apart from any literary criticism, suggests that the narratives were derived from the same general source, and subjected to the same conditions of environment and transmission. Thus both are called to and strengthened for their work by a special Divine revelation, Moses at Horæb in the burning bush, J. at Jericho. Both lead the people across the bed of waters miraculously driven back to afford them passage. And both at no long interval after the passage win a victory ascribed in each case to direct Divine intervention on their behalf, although in different ways. Each at the close of their lives thanks God and J. deliver stirring addresses of appeal and warning to the assembled Israelites; and both lie in famous graves. These all, however, are occurrences perfectly natural and indeed inevitable in the position in which each found himself. Nor do the narratives suggest that a successor to take up his unfinished work and to carry it to completion.

IV. Character and Work of Joshua.—As to the personal character of J., there is little to be inferred from the narrative of his campaigns. In this respect indeed they are singularly colorless. In early life his loyalty to Moses was conspicuous and unswerving. As his successor, he seems to have faithfully reacted upon his predecessor’s principles. Some of the Israelite campaigns to have proved himself a brave and competent general, as wise in counsel as he was strong in fight. The putting to death of captives and the burning of cities, which the historian so often records as the consequence of his victories, must evidently be judged by the customs of the times, and have perhaps lost nothing in the narration. They do not in any case indicate the participation of Joshua in an especially inhuman disposition, or a delight in slaughter for its own sake. After the death of Moses he would appear to have been reluctant to undertake the onerous position and great duty assigned to him by God. His marked ability and lack of self-confidence, and needed more than once to be encouraged in his work and assured of Divine support. In the language of his closing discourse there is apparent a foresight and appreciation of the character and tendencies of the people who had followed him, which is hardly inferior to that of Moses himself.

In a real sense also his work was left unfinished at his death. The settlement of Canaan by the tribes of Israel within the appointed and promised limits was never more than partly accomplished. The colonists failed to enjoy that absolute and undisturbed possession of the land to which they had looked forward; witness the unrest of the period of the Judges, prolonged and perpetuated through monarchical times. For this all, however, blame cannot justly be laid to J. Many causes undoubtedly concurred to an issue which was fatal to the future unity and happiness and prosperity of Israel. The chief cause, as J. warned them would be the case, was the persistent idolatry of the people themselves, their neglect of duty, and disregard of the commands and claims of their God.

A. S. GEDEN
Joshua, Book of

JOSHUA: Son of Jehozadak (Hag 1 1.12.14; 2 2.4; Zec 3 1.3.6.8.9; 6 11 form [6]) and high priest in Jerusalem, called "Joshua" in Ear-Neh. His father was among the captives taken in 586 BC, and also his grand father Seraiah, who was put to death at Riblah (2 K 25 18 ff; 1 Ch 6 15).

Joshua appears in Ex 3 2 with Zerubbabel at the head of the returned exiles and as leader in the work of building an altar and reestablishing sacrificial worship (558 or 537 BC). Ex 3 8 tells of their laying the foundation of the temple, and in 4 1 ff the two heads of the community refuse to allow the Samaritans to participate in the building operations, with the result that the would-be helpers became active opponents of the work. Building then ceased until Haggai and Zechariah in 520 (Ezr 5; Hag 1 1–11) exhort the community to restart work, and the two leaders take the lead (Hag 1 12–15). The following are, in chronological order, the prophetic utterances in which J. is spoken of:

1. The Vision of Zec 3:1–10 pears in later Jewish writings; he is only the officer of justice whose business is to see that the case against criminals is properly presented in the heavenly court of justice (H. F. Steiner, T. History, 336); while others regard him as the enemy of God's people (cf. Orelli, Minor Prophets, ET, 327). We are not told what the charge against J. is: some hold him to be tried as in some way a representative of the people or the priesthood, and his filthy garments as symbolical of sin; while others explain the garments as put on to excite the court's pity. The adversary is rebuked by "the angel of Jeh" (read at beginning of ver 2, and the angel of Jeh said, etc), and J. is acquitted. He is then ordered to be stripped of his old clothes and to be arrayed in "rich apparel" (ver 4), while a "clean turban" (ARVm) is to be put on his head. Conditional upon his walking in God's ways, he is promised the government of the temple and access to God, being placed among the servants of the "angel of Jeh," J. and his companions "are men that are a sign" (ver 8), i.e. a guaranty of the coming of the Messiah; there is set before J. a stone which is to be inscribed upon, and the iniquity of the land will be removed, an event to be followed by peace and plenty (va 9 f).

In vs 4ff Nowack and Wellhausen (with the LXX mostly) read, "And he answered and spoke unto those that stood before him (i.e. his servants) thus: Take the filthy garments from him, and clothe him with rich apparel, and set a clean turban upon his head. So they set a clean turban upon his head and clothed him with clean garments. And the angel of Jeh stood up, [6] and the angel expostulated J. He also took off his robe and put white raiment; and they also omit the first "for" in ver 8 as a ditography.

Different interpretations are given of the vision:

(1) Some claim to see here a contest between the civil and religious powers as represented by Zerubbabel and J. respectively (6 15), and that Zechariah sides with J. in the supremacy of the latter. The Messiah-King is indeed in Jerusalem in the person of Zerubbabel, though as yet uncrowned; but J. is to be supreme (see G. A. Smith, Jerus, II, 303; H. P. Smith, Of T. History, 396 f). This explanation is due to a large extent to 6 9–15, and is not supported by 3 8. It is difficult to explain 6 2 on this view, for Zerubbabel could also be described as "a brand plucked out of the fire." What the vision says is that the vindication of J. is a sign for the coming of Jeh's "servant, the Branch," a title that is not given to J. (cf ver 7).

(2) Others maintain that the garments are symbolical of the sins of the predecessors of J., who is tried for their offenses and himself regarded as being unworthy of the office because he had been brought up in a foreign and heathen land (so Keil, Orelli).

(3) Hitig, followed by Nowack (Kleine Propheten, 325), holds that the idea which lies at the basis of the vision is that Satan is responsible for theills which the community had suffered (cf Job 1, 2). The people had begun to think that their offerings were not accepted by God, and that God have pity upon them. There was a feeling among the most pious ones that God's righteousness would not allow of their restoration to their former glory. This conflict between righteousness and mercy is decided by silencing the accuser and vindicating J.

It is difficult to decide which view, if any, is correct. "The brand plucked out of the fire" seems to point to God's recognizing that the community, or perhaps the priestly succession, had almost been exterminated by the exile. It reminds us of the oak of which, after its falling, the stump remained to be made the axis of all power. The "garments, a guaranty, of the coming of the Messiah-King. The ritualistic tone of Mal will then follow naturally after the high place is given to J. It is noteworthy that the promise of 3 7 is conditional.

One more point remains, viz. the meaning of the stone in 3 9. It has been differently explained as a jewel in the new king's crown (Nowack); a foundation stone of the temple, which, however, was already laid (Hitigz); the chief stone of 4 7 (Ewald, Steiner); the Messiah Himself (Keil); the stone in the high priest's breastplate (Bredenkamp), and the stone which served as an altar (Orelli). Commentators tend to regard the words "upon one stone are seven eyes" as a parenthetical addition characteristic of the author of Zec 9 ff.

The utterance of Zec 6 9–15 presents to us some more exiles coming from Babylon with silver and gold apparently for the temple.

2. Joshua's According to the present text, Zechariah is commanded to see that this is used to make a crown for J. who is to be a priest-king. This means that he is to be given the crown of a king which had been meant for Zerubbabel. But commentators hold that the text has been altered; that the context demands the crowning of Zerubbabel—the Branch of David's descent. This is supported by ver 13, "And the counsel of peace shall be between them both"; and therefore the last clause of ver 11 is omitted. Wellhausen keeps vs 9 and 10, and then reads: [11] Yes, take of them silver and gold and make a crown, [12] and say to them: Thus saith Jeh of hosts, saying, Behold the man whose name is the Branch, from whose root there will be a sprout, [13] and he will build the Temple of Jeh, and he will obtain glory and sit and rule upon his throne. And Joshua will be a priest on his right hand, and there will be friendly peace between them both. [14] The crown shall be, etc; ver 15 is incomplete.

It will be objected that this does away with the idea of a priest-king, an idea found also in Ps 110. But it seems fairly certain that Ps 110 refers to J., the point there being that the king referred to was a priest, although not descended from Aaron, being a priest after the order of Melchizedek, while the point is, if the present text is correct, that Zerubbabel is crowned king. What became of Zerubbabel after this is not known. See Ed. Meyer, Der Papyrus-fund von Elephantine², 70 ff, 86 ff. J. is called Jesus in Sir 49 12. See Zerubbabel; Haggai; Zechariah. David Francis Roberts

Joshua, Book of:

I. Title and Authorship

The name Joshua signifies "Jeh is deliverance" or "salvation" (see Joshua). The Gr form of the name is Jesus (Ἰησοῦς, Ισαίς, Acts 7:45; He 4:8). In later Jewish history the name appears to have become popular, and is even found with a local significance, as in the designation of the leader of the southern Pal (שָׁם, ובשָׁם, Neh 11:26). The use of the title by the Jews to denote the Book of Josh did not imply a belief that the book was actually written or dictated by him; or even that the narratives themselves were in substance derived from him, and that their authenticity and reliability lie to his sanction and control. In the earliest Jewish literature the association of a name with a book was not intended in any case to indicate authorship. And the Book of Josh is no exception to the rule that such early literary designations, esp. when their contents are of a historical nature, are usually anomalous. The title is intended to describe, not authorship, but theme; and to represent that the life and deeds of Joshua form the main subject with which the book is concerned.

II. Contents

With regard to the contents of Josh, it will be found to consist of two well-marked divisions, in the first of which (chs 1-12) are narrated the invasion and gradual conquest under the command and personal leadership of Joshua, while the 2d part describes in detail the allotment of the country to the several tribes with the boundaries of their territories, and concludes with a brief notice of the death and burial of J. himself.

Ch 1: Renewal of the Divine promise to J. and exhortation to J. and to the people, to take courage (vs 1-9); directions to the people to prepare for the passage of the river, and a reminder to the eastern tribes (Reuben, Gad, and half Manasseh) of the condition under which they held their possession beyond Jordan; the renewal by these tribes of their pledge of loyalty to Moses’ successor (vs 10-18).

Ch 2: The sending of the two spies from Shittim and their escape from Jericho through the straits of Rahab.

Ch 3: The passage of Jordan by the people over against Jericho, and the taking into the dry bed of the river until all the people had crossed over.

Ch 4: Erection of 12 memorial stones on the other side of Jordan, where the people encamped after the passage of the river (vs 1-14); the priests with the Ark of the Covenant ascend in their turn from out of the river-bed, and the waters return into their wonted course (vs 15-24).

Ch 5: Alarm excited among the kings on the W. of Jordan, news of the miraculous crossing of the river (ver 1); circumcision of the people at Gilgal (vs 2-9); celebration of the Passover at Gilgal in the plains of Jericho; the completion of the supply of the manna (ver 12); appearance to J. of the captain of the Lord (vs 13-15).

Ch 6: Directions given to J. for the siege and taking of Jericho (vs 1-5); capture of the city, which is destroyed, and its walls and its citizens are set on fire (vs 6-25); a curse is pronounced on the man who rebuilds Jericho (ver 26).

Ch 7: The crime and punishment of Achan, who stole for himself part of the spoil of the captured city (vs 1-26); incidentally his sin is shown in the defeat before Ai (vs 2-12).

Ch 8: The taking of Ai by a stratagem, destruction of the city, and death of its king (vs 1-29); erection of an altar on Mt. Ebal, and reading of the Law before the assembled people (vs 30-35).

Ch 9: Gathering of the peoples of Pal to oppose J. (vs 1-2); a covenant of peace made between the two parties, the inhabitants of the hill country being represented as strangers from a far country (vs 3-26); they are, however, reduced to a condition of servitude (ver 27).

Ch 10: Combination of 5 kings of the Amorites to fight against the inhabitants of Giub-er, fortified their positions, and defeated and rout of the kings of the hill country at Beth-Horon (vs 1-14); return of the Israelites to Gilgal (ver 15); capture and death of the king of Ai (vs 16-27); taking and destruction of Makkedah (ver 28); Lisanah (vs 29-30); Lachish (vs 31-32); Gezer (vs 33); Edom (vs 34-35); Hebron (vs 36-37); Joshua (vs 38-39), and summarily all the land, as defined from Kadesh-Bnei unto Gaza, and as far N. as Gibeon (40-42); return to Gilgal (ver 43).

Ch 11: Defeat of Jablin, king of Hazor, and allied kings at the base of Mt. Carmel, and the conquest of Hazor (vs 10-15); reiterated summary of J.'s conquests (vs 16-22).

Ch 12: Final summary of the Israelite conquests in Canaan, of Sihon and Og on the E. of the Jordan under the leadership of Moses (vs 1-6); capture of 31 kings in the land of the Midianites, and the cities on the W. of the river under J. (vs 7-24).

Ch 13: Command to J. to score out for the W. of the Jordan, even that which was still unsubdued, to the nine and a half tribes (vs 1-7); recapitulation of the inheritance of the two tribes and a half on the E. of the river (vs 8-13:32); the border of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh (vs 24-28), of the half-tribe of Manasseh (vs 29-31), the tribe of Levi alone received no portion (vs 32-33).

Ch 14: Renewed statement of the principle on which the conquests had been made (vs 1-5); Hebron given to Caleb for his inheritance (vs 6-15).

Ch 15: The inheritance of Judah, and the boundaries of his territory (vs 1-20), including that of Caleb (vs 13-18); enumeration of the cities of Judah (vs 21-34).

Ch 16: Inheritance of the sons of Joseph (vs 1-4); the border of Ephraim (vs 5). Ch 17: Inheritance of Manasseh and the border of the half-tribe of Manasseh on the W. of the Jordan (vs 1-13); complaint of the sons of Joseph of the inequality of the portion of Manasseh, and grant to them by J. of an extension of territory (vs 14-18).

Ch 18: The land yet unsubdued divided by lot into 7 portions for the remaining 7 tribes (vs 1-10); inheritance of the sons of Benjamin and the border of their portion (vs 11-20); enumeration of their cities (vs 21-28).

Ch 19: Inheritance of Simeon and his border (vs 1-9); of Gebal and his border (vs 10-16); of Issachar and his border (vs 17-23); of Asher and his border (vs 24-31); of Naphtali and his border (vs 32-35), and the border of his brother (vs 40-48); inheritance of Joshua (vs 49-50).

Ch 20: Cities of Refuge appointed, three on each side of the Jordan.

Ch 21: 48 cities with their suburbs given to the Levites out of the territories of the several tribes (vs 1-41); the people had rest in the land, their enemies being subdued, according to the Divine promises (vs 42-43).

Ch 22: Dismission of the eastern tribes to their inheritances, their duty to their brethren having been fulfilled (vs 1-9); the erection by them of a great altar by the side of the Jordan aroused the suspicion of the western tribes, who feared that they intended to separate themselves from the common cause (vs 10-20); their reply that the altar is to serve the purpose of a witness between themselves and their brethren (vs 21-34).

Ch 23: J.'s address of encouragement and warning to the people.

Ch 24: Second address of J., recalling to the people their history, exhorting them to seek the Divine ark, and standing in the dry bed of the river until all the people had crossed over.

Ch 25: Agreement of the Israelites to observe the ordinances of Moses, and to serve the Lord in accordance with the covenant he made with their ancestors (vs 1-31).

Ch 26: Relation of the men of Ephraim who brought back an evil report concerning the inhabitants of Ai (vs 1-26); the people's pledge of loyalty to the Lord, and formal covenant in Shechem (vs 27-28).

Ch 27: The law of God is committed to writing, and a stone is erected as a permanent memorial (vs 26-28); death and burial of J. (vs 29-31); burial in Shechem of the bones of Joseph, brought from Egypt (ver 32); death and burial of Eleazar, son of Aaron (vs 33).

III. Historical Character and Chronology

As a historical narrative, J. is incomplete and is marked by many omissions, and in some instances at least includes phrases or expressions which seem to imply the existence of parallel or divergent accounts of the same event, e.g. in the passage of the Jordan and the erection of memorial stones (chs 3, 4), the summary of the conquests of Joshua (10:40-43; 11:16-25), or the references to Moses' visions over the Amorite kings on the E. of the Jordan.

This last fact suggests, what is in itself sufficiently probable, that the writer or compiler of the book made use of historical records not necessarily connected in any one, although closely relations, with the facts narrated in it, either directly or indirectly. In every instance, written, but probably also oral and traditional, upon which he relied and out of which means of enrichments or modifications and omissions, the resultant history is composed. The incomplete and detailed narrative of the book therefore, considered merely as a history of the conquest of Western Pal and its allotment among the new settlers, would seem to indicate perhaps available for the writer's use were fragmentary also in their nature, and did not present a complete or precise view either of the conquest itself or of the experiences of Israel while under his direction.

Within the limits of the book itself, moreover, notifications of chronological sequence, or of the length of time occupied in the various campaigns, are almost entirely wanting. Almost the only references, or that part of a period are the statements that Joshua himself was 110 years old at the time of his death (24:29), and that his wars lasted "a long time" (11:18; cf. 23:1). Caleb also, the son of Hebron as his inheritance (14:10; of 15:13 ff); the inference would be, assuming 40 years for the wanderings in the desert, that he had then elapsed since the passage of the Jordan "on the tenth day of the first month" (4:19). No indication, however, is given of the chronological relation of this event to the rest of the history; and 5 years would be too short a period for the conquest of Pal, if it is to be understood that the whole was carried out in consecutive campaigns under the immediate command of Joshua. On the other hand, "very much land" remained still unsubdued at his death (13:1).

Christian tradition seems to have assumed that was about the same age as Caleb, although no definite statement to that effect is made in the book itself; and that, therefore, a quarter of a century, more or less, elapsed between the settlement of the latter in the land (24:10; 14:29) and the former's. The entire period from the crossing of the Jordan would then be reckoned at from 28 to 30 years.

IV. Sources of the Written Narrative.—The attempt to disentangle these two narratives, if it now exists, is bound by the proverb himself a fertile field of investigation, and the problem of a fuller account of this which has been put forward or the present process, the composition which the sources should take. For the most part, therefore, the broad line of distinction between the various "sources" which have been utilized may easily be discerned on the ground of their characteristic traits, in style, vocabulary or general conception; in regard to details, however, the precise principle on which one "source" has been abandoned for another, or the writer himself has supplied deficiencies and bridged gaps, there is no rule or survey. But the evidence is insufficient to justify an absolute conclusion. The fusion of materials has been complete than in the 6 books of the law, perhaps because the latter were hedged about with a more reverential regard for the letter, and at all events the remaining fragments are substantially identical. No detailed analysis of the sources as they have been discovered is necessary, or one another by scholars themselves as to the precise form or limits of the use made of any given source, or at what point the dividing line should be drawn. It is only to be assumed, in the sense that in Josh esp. the literary theory of the use of "documents," as generally understood and as interpreted in the case of the Pentateuch, is well founded. In itself, such a theory is eminently reasonable, and is both in harmony with the usage and methods of ancient composition, and affords ground for additional confidence in the good faith and reliability of the transmission of the whole.

V. Relation to the Book of Jgs.—A comparison of the history recorded in Josh with that account in Jgs furnishes 1. Parallel ground for believing that a detailed or chronological narrative was not constructed by the writer of the former, but was derived from the latter himself. The introductory vs of Jgs (1-25) are in part a summary of incidents recorded in Josh, and in part supply new details or present a different view of the whole. The original notices which are added relate almost entirely to the invasion and conquest of Southern Pal by the united or allied tribes of Judah and Simeon and the destruction of Bethel by the "house of Joseph." The action of the remaining tribes is narrated in a few words, the brief record closing in each case with a reference to the condition of servitude to which the inhabitants of the land were reduced. And the general scheme of the invasion as there represented is apparently that of a series of disconnected raids undertaken by the several tribes independently, each having for its object the subjection of the territory assigned to the individual tribe. A general and comprehensive plan of conquest under the supreme leadership of Joshua appears to be entirely wanting. In other words, the only real inconsistency between the two narratives would appear to be that in Jgs (1:21) the failure to expel the Jebusites from Jerus is laid to the account of the Benjamites, while in Josh (15:63) it is charged against the children of Judah. The difficulties in the way of the formation of a clear conception of the incidents attending the capture of Jerus are perhaps insuperable upon any hypothesis; and the variation of tribal names in the two texts may be no more than a copyist's error.

A perhaps more striking omission in both narratives is the absence of any reference to the conquest of Central Pal. The narrative of the overthrow of Bethel and Ai (6:1-8) is followed by the record of the building of an altar on Mt. Ebol and the recitation of the Law before the people of Israel assembled in front of Mts. Ebol and Gerizim (8:30 ff). Joshua then turns to the defeat of the Amorites, in the Amorite kings, and completes the conquest of the southern country as far south as Kadesh-barnah (10:41).

Immediately thereafter he is engaged in overthrowing a confederacy in the far north (11:1-15), a work which clearly could not have been undertaken or successfully accomplished, unless the central region had been already subdued; but of its reduction no account is given. It has been supposed that the silence of the narrator is an indication that at the period of the invasion this district was in the occupation of tribes friendly or even related to the Israelite clans; and in support of the conjecture reference has been made to the mention of Israel on the stele of Merenptah, the Egypt ruler in whose reign, according to the most probable view, the exodus occurred. The record of the nation or a part thereof is regarded as already settled in Pal at a date earlier by half a century than their appearance under Moses and Joshua on the borders of the Promised Land. The statement, however, is to be explained hardly plausible. The defects of the historical record are irreparable at this distance of time, and it must be acknowledged that with the available material no complete and consistent narrative of the events of the Israelite conquest of Canaan can be constructed.

VI. Place of Josh in the Heb Canon.—In the Heb Canon Joshua is the first in order of the prophetic books, and the first of the group of 4, viz., Josh, Jgs, S, K, which form the 'Earlier Prophets' (which we read in the LXX.) These books, the contents of which are history, not prophecy in the ordinary sense of the term, were assigned by the Jews to the 2d division of their sacred Canon, and found a place by the side of the great writings of the 'Later Prophets' (which we read in the MT.) This position was given to them in part perhaps because they were believed to have been written or composed by prophets, but mainly because Jewish history was regarded as in purpose and intent 'prophetic,' being directed and preserved over by Jehovah, and conveying direct spiritual instruction and example. The Canon of the Law, moreover, was already closed; and however patent and striking might be the resemblance of Joshua in style and method of composition to the books of the Pent., it cannot be said that it, or any of them, were admitted into the Canon, or to give place within the Torah, a group of writings which were regarded as of Mosaic authorship, to a narrative of events which occurred after Moses' death.

Later criticism reviewed and reversed the verdict as to the 'true character of Joshua.' In every Canon except the Heb, its historical nature was recognized, and the work was classified accordingly. Modern criticism has gone further, and, with increasing consciousness of its close literary relationship to the rest of the OT, it has united it with them in a Hexateuch, or even under the more comprehensive title of the Pentateuch combines together the books of Jgs and Ruth with the preceding six on the ground of similarity of origin and style.

VII. Greek and Other Ancient Versions.—In the ancient OT of Joshua there is not much that is of interest. The Gr text bears witness to a Heb original differing little from the MT. In their renderings, however, and general treatment of the Heb text, the translators seem to have felt themselves at liberty to take up a position of greater independence and freedom than in dealing with the 5 books of the Law. Probably also the rendering of Joshua into Gr. is not to be ascribed to the same authors as the tr. of the Pent. While faithful to the Heb, it is less constantly and exactly literal, and contains many slight variations, the most important of which are found in the last 6 chs.

Ch 19: The LXX transposes vs 47-48, and, omitting the first clause of ver 47, refers the whole to the sons of Judah, without mention of Din; it further adds vs 47a. 48a on the relation between the Amorites and Ephraim, and the Amorites and the Danites respectively. With ver 47f of ch 19, 10 and Jgs 1:29, and with ver 48a of ch 19 (Heb) and Jgs 1:34.

Ch 20: Vs 4-6 inclusive are omitted in B, except a clause from B, A, however, inserts them in full. In Dv. Dv. Dv. 127, 129, who, on the ground of their Deuteronomic tone, regards it as probable that the verses are an addition to P, and therefore did not form part of the original text as used by the Gr translators.

Ch 21: Vs 36, 37, which give the names of the Levitical cities in Judah, is omitted in the Heb printed text although found in many Heb MSS. Four vs also are added after ver 31, which repeat 19 50f., and to the last is a reminiscence of 5 3.

Ch 24: Vs 29f. which narrate the death and burial of J., are transposed from the last place by the Gr, after ver 31; and a verse is inserted after ver 30 that the stone knives used for the purposes of circumcision (5 2ff) were placed with Joshua in his tomb (ch 21 42). After ver 33 also two new verses appear, apparently a miscellany from chap. 14, with a statement of the death and burial of Phinehas, son and successor of Eleazar, of the idolatrous worship by the children of Israel of Ashtaroth and Asherah, and the oppression under King, king of Moab.

The other VSS, with the exception of Jerome's tr from the Heb, are secondary, derived meditatively through the LT. The Old Lat. is contained in a manuscript at Lyon, Cairo, Lake Kuztef. A Sam tr also is known, for parts of which at least an early origin and an independent derivation from the Heb have been claimed. The ancient character of the version, however, is contested, and it has been shown that the arguments on which reliance was placed to justify the conclusions drawn. The tr appears to be in reality of quite recent date, and to have been made originally from the Arab., perhaps in part compared with and corrected by the MT. The subject was fully and conclusively discussed by W. Yedua of Berdan, at the Oriental Congress in the summer of 1908, and in a separate pamphlet published under the title "The authorship of the version was still living, and his name was given. Dr. Gaster, the original discoverer of the Sam MS, in various articles and letters maintains his contention that the tr is really antique, and therefore of great value, but he has failed to convince scholars (see M. Gaster in JQR, 1908). The text of the MS was published by Dr. Gaster in JDQ, 1909, 209 ff., with Eng rendering and notes in FDAS, XXXI (1909), 113 f., 149 ff."

VIII. Religious Purpose and Teaching.—As a whole, then, Joshua is dominated by the same religious and hortatory purpose as the earlier writings of the Pent., and in this respect as well as in authorship and structure the classification which assigns it to the same side by the side of the rest of the OT is justified. The whole of this book is the Hexateuch, or even under the more comprehensive title of the OT, combines together the books of Jgs and Ruth with the preceding six on the ground of similarity of origin and style.

The Divine leading in history is the first thought with the writer. And the record of Israel's past presents itself as of interest to him, not because it is a record of events that actually happened, but because he sees in it the ever-present guidance and overruling determination of God, and would draw from it instruction and warning for the men of his own time and for those that come after him. Not the history itself, but the use that is made of it, and the value that history are of value. Its importance lies in the illustrations it affords of the controlling working of a Divine Ruler who is faithful to His promises, loving righteousness and hating iniquity, and swaying the destinies of men in truth. Thus the selection of materials, and the form and arrangement of the book are determined by a definite aim: to set forth and enforce moral lessons, and to exhibit Israel's past as the working out of a Divine purpose which has chosen the nation to be a channel of the Divine favor, and the instrument for the carrying forward of His purposes upon earth.

II. Traits of His Reign

1. Situation at the Beginning

The name given 6 years before the death of his grandfather Manasseh resumes the Judaic custom, suspended in the case of that king and Amnon, of compounding royal names with that of Jeh; perhaps a hint of the time, when, according to the Chronicler, Manasseh rejected Jeh's claim on his realm (2 Ch 33:12,13). One of the most eminent of the kings of Judah; came to the throne at 8 years of age and reigned 637-608 BC.

2. Finding of the Law

(a) The earliest history (2 K 23:22) (34,35), written from the developed ecclesiastical point of view, is considerably idealized; the festal and ceremonial aspects of his reform are more fully detailed, and the story of his campaign and death is more sympathetically told in the sense of it as a great national calamity.

(b) The general atmosphere of his time and the prophetic consciousness of a day of wrath impending, the prophet Zephaniah is illustrative, e.g. for the first half of the reign. Jeremiah, born about the same time as J., began prophesying in the 13th year of the reign (Jer 1:2). His intimate connection with state affairs, however, belongs to succeeding reigns; but some propheticus of his, notably those revealing his attitude towards the festal and ceremonial aspects of his reform are more fully detailed, and the story of his campaign and death is more sympathetically told in the sense of it as a great national calamity.

3. Memorial

(a) Josiah's death.—Until his 18th year 2 K 22:10, naming his successor Shalum (Jehoahaz) as a fitter subject. The laments which became "an ordinance in Israel" (2 Ch 35:25) are not to be referred to the Scripture book of that name; which has no hint of J., unless Lam 4:20 be so construed.

(b) The prophetic component of the funds for that purpose, Hilikiah also delivered to Shaphan a book which he had found in the "house of Jeh," that is, in the temple proper; which book, when Shaphan read therein to the king, caused the latter to rend his robe and cloth in dismay and consternation. It was a book in which were commands of Jeh that had long been unknown or disregarded, and along with these, fearful curses to follow the infraction of them. Such a discovery could not be treated lightly; as one might spurn a prophet or priest; say, it immediately called the authority of the prophet into requisition. The king sent a deputation to Huldah the prophetess for her verdict on the book; and she, whether aware of its contents or not, assured him that the curses were valid, and that for impieties against which the prophets continually warned, all the woes written in the book were impending. One of the most venerated Bih. scholars has centered round the question what that book was, what its origin, and how it came there in the temple. The Chronicler says roundly it was "the book of the law of Jeh by the hand of Moses." That it was familiar to the nation's great first prophet and lawgiver was the implicit belief of the king and all his contemporaries. There can be little doubt, judging from the nature of the reforms it elicited and the fact that the curses it contained are still extant, that this "book of the law" was virtually identical with our Book of Deut. But is this the work of Moses, or the product of a later literary activity? In answer, it is fair to say that it is so true to the soundest interpretation of the spirit and power of Moses that none need be in haste in calling it genuinely Mosaic, whatever adaptations and supplementations its laws received after his time. Its highly developed style, however, and an imperfect conformity to the nomadic conditions of Moses' time, make so remote an origin of its present form very doubtful. It comes to us as the matured skill of Israel's literary prime, in a time too soon, when we know (see under Hezekiah), men of letters were keenly interested in rescuing and putting to present use the literary treasures of their past. As to how it came to be lost for a time so much before its discovery that none questioned its being what it purported to be, each scholar must answer for himself. Some have conjectured that it may have been a product of Solomon's time, and deposited, according to immemorial custom in temple-building, in the foundation of Solomon's temple, where it it was believed that certain ruins made repairs necessary. To the present writer it seems likelier that it was one of the literary products of Hezekiah's time, compiled from scattered statutes, precedents, and customs long in the keeping—or rather, neglect—of priests and judges, put into the attractive form of oratory, and thus it tendered to its providential moment. See further, Deuteronomy;

J's immediate procedure was to call to the temple a representative assemblage—elders, prophets, priests, populace—and to read to them this "book of the covenant" (2 K 23 2). Then he made a solemn Reform covenant before Jehovah to obey it, and all the people stood to the covenant.

So, perhaps for the first time, the people of Judah and Israel had for their guidance not only the case decisions of judges and priests, nor only the emergency warnings and predictions of prophets, but a written and accessible document, covering in a large degree their history, the attack of the heathen and religious life. One of the most momentous productions of all history, the book became the constitution of the Jewish race; nor were its noble provisions superseded when, centuries later, the thrones of race were broken and a Christian civilization came into its heritage. But the book that was destined to have so large a significance in all coming history had its immediate significance too, and never had this been so pressing. J's consternation arose from the sense of how much of the nation's obvious duty had been left undone and unregarded. First of all, they had through heedless years and ages drifted into a medley of religious ideas and customs which had accumulated until all this lumber of Manasseh's idolatry was upon them. Hezekiah had tried to clear away some of its most crude and superstitious elements (see under Hezekiah), but he was handicapped by the lack of its clear issue and objective, which now this book supplied. Zephaniah and what J's will was (Zeph 1 2-6); there must be a clean sweep of the debasing and obscuring cults, and the purgation must be done to stay. So J's first reforming step was to break up the high places, the numerous temples of the idols, and the symbols and utensils of the idolatrous shrines and rites, and to defile them past resurrection. His zeal did not stop with Jerusalem and Judea; he went on to Bethel, which had been the chief sanctuary of the now defunct Northern Kingdom, and in his work here was recognized the fulfilling of an old prophecy dating from the time of its first king (2 K 23 17; cf 1 K 13 1.2). This necessitated the concentration of public worship in the temple at Jerusalem, and in Dt was found the warrant for this, in the precept, natural to Moses' point of view, that the worship of Israel must have a single center as it had in the wilderness. From this negative procedure he went on to the positive measure of reviving the festival services inseparable from a religion requiring purgature, instituting a grand Passover on a scale unheard of since the time of the Judges (2 K 23 21.22), a feature of his reform on which the Chronicler dwells with peculiar zest (2 Ch 35 1-15). Thus both in the idolatries that had drifted into the aspect of priestly and prophetical life, they were committed to a definite and documented issue; this it was which made J's reform so momentous. That the reform seemed after J's untimely death to have been merely outward, is what might reasonably be expected from the inactivity of the unspirituality that it must encounter. Jeremiah had small faith in its saving power against the stubborn perversity of the people (Jer 11 1-14); and the historian of 2 K intimates that more than the piety of a zealous king was needed to turn away the stern decree of Jehovah's anger (2 K 23 26-27). In spite of all hardness and apostasy, however, the nation that had once "stood to the covenant" of Dt could never again be at heart the nation it was before.

Ardent and pious as he was, there seems to have been a lack of balance in J's character. His extreme dismay and dread of the curse 4. Disaster pronounced on the realm's neglect of its law (Deut 28). He had already achieved success in the Northern Kingdom, apparently cherished inordinate dreams of invincibility, and went forth with a small armed body to lead the army of Jeh's nation to its triumph through the northern provinces. At the first onset he was killed, and his expedition came to nothing. In his untimely death the fervid hopes of the pious received a set-back which was long lamented, as one of the cardinal disasters of Israel. It was a sore calamity, but also a stern education. Israel must learn not only the enthusiasm but also the prudence and wisdom of its new-found faith.

JOSIAH, jos-i-atas (TR 'Jevas, ḫevas; WH ḫevas, 'Josiph')

(1) Gr form in AV of Josiah (Mt 1 10.11; cf 1 Esd 1; Bar 1 8), king of Judah.

(2) In 1 Esd 8 33 AV for JESIAS (q.v.).

JOSIBIAH, jos-i-bit. See JOSHEBIAH.

JOSIPHIAH, jos-i-i-fi (Pi, yēsiphā, "Jeh adds"); Found in Exr 8 10, where MT is "and of the sons of . . . Shelomith the son of Josiphiah." With the Heb. name Josiah, J was supplanted by the unpointed text as "the sons of!" and was omitted through haplography) can be supplied above before "Shelomith." J is thus the father of Shelomith, one of Ezra's companions. 1 Esd 8 36 has "Josiphas.

JOT, jot: "Jot" (RV, later edd of AV) is a corruption of iota (early edd of AV, Geneva, Rheims, Bishops—pronounced i-tet), an Eng. transliteration of ἴτα, iōta, the 9th letter of the Gr alphabet (Mt 5 18 ). "Iota," in turn, is the nearest Gr equivalent for the Heb yōḏ ( ), the smallest letter of the Heb alphabet, in NT times being little larger than an Eng. accent ( ). The little (q.v.) is the smallest part of a letter (not part of a letter); however. Consequently, thinking of the law as written out, the sense of Mt 6 17, is: "From this code, so written, not the smallest letter nor part of a letter—not an 'i' nor the crossing of an 'i'—shall be shamed or left undone for things come to pass by the law." (For the meaning, see LAW.) The reference is to the synagogue rolls, which were written in Heb, so that the passage has no bearing on the language used by Christ. For the form of the "jot," of the tables in HBD, art. "Alphabet," more fully in Chwolson, Corp. Inscription. Heb. (1882). See TITLE.

JOTAPATA, jô-tap’-a-ta (BJ, III, iii, 7). See JOTABATH.

JOTBAH, jôt’ba (יֹתְבָּה, yôtbah, “pleasantness”): The home of Meshullemeth, the mother of King Amon, daughter of Haruz (2 K 21 19). It may be the same as JOTBATHE (q.v.).

JOTBATHE, jôt’ba-thë (יֹתְבַתְי, yôtbathe): A desert camp of the Israelites between Hor-hagidgad and Abnoua (Nu 33 33-34; Dt 10 7). It was “a land of brooks of water” (Dt 10 7). Site is unknown. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

JOTHAM, jô-thâm (יוֹתָחָם, yôthâm), “Jeh is perfect”; ’îshtâh, 1 Is. 1:4): (1) The youngest son of Gideon-Jerubbaal, the sole survivor of the massacre of his seventy brothers by Abimelech (Jgs 9 5), and by (8 22) the legitimate ruler of Shechem after their death. Recognizing that he was the only prince capable of asserting his claim, J. delivers from the summit of Gerizim his famous fable (9 7-15), applies it to the situation in hand, and then flees for his life to Beer (ver 21). Now Jotham’s name is told of him, but the downfall of Abimelech is referred in part to his “curse” (ver 57). The fable tells of the kingship of the trees which, after having been declared by all useful plants, was finally offered to the bramble. The latter, inflamed by its uselessness and pov- pously offers its “shade” to its faithful subjects, while threatening all traitors with punishment (brambles carry forest fires), quite in the manner of an oriental monarch on assuming the throne. Having thus parodied the relationship of the worthless Abimelech to the Shechemites, J. ironically wishes both parties joy of their bargain, which will end in destruction for all concerned. Otherwise the connection between the fable and its application is loose, for, while the fable depicts the king- ship as refused by all properly qualified persons, in the application the Shechemites are upbraided for their treachery and their murder of the rightfull heirs. In fact, the fable taken by itself would seem strang to protest against kings as a class (cf 1 S 8 10-18; 12 19, etc); so it is possible that either the fable or its application has become expanded in transmission. Or an older fable may have been used for the sake of a single salient point, for nothing is said of the bramble’s having been refused the kingship.

BUTON SCOTT EASTER (2) Twelfth king of Judah, son of Uzziah and Jeruha, daughter of Zadok (2 K 15 8-23; 2 Ch 27 1-9). J. was 25 years of age

1. Accession at the time of his father’s attack and leprosy, and was at once called upon to take the administration of the kingdom (2 K 15 6; 2 Ch 26 1). In doing this he not only judged the people of the land by presiding at the administration of justice, but also was over the household of the king, showing how complete was the isolation of his father. He was thus king in all but name, and is invariably spoken of as reigning in Jerus. His reign lasted for 16 years (2 K 16 3; 2 Ch 27 1), 759-744 (others put later). While the father loved husbandry and had much cattle (2 Ch 26 10)—external affairs with which he could occupy himself in his retirement—to the son fell the stern duties and heavier responsibilities of the state. The relation between father and son is well brought out in the Chronicler’s account of the Amonite war. In 2 Ch 26 8 we are told that “the Ammonites gave tribute [AV “gifts”] to Uzziah, such gifts being compulsory, and of the nature of tribute. In 2 Ch 27 5 we are told that the actual conquest of Ammon was made by J., and that for 3 successive years he compelled them to pay an annual subsidy of 100 talents of silver and 10,000 “cords” each of wheat with barley (the eor [Heb kor] Ammon about 10 bushels). The campaign on the E. of the Jordan was the only one in which J. took part, but as the state suffered no loss of territory during his regency, the external provinces must have been strongly held and well governed.

It is probable that before attempting to win any extension of territory, J. had spent some years in completing the unfinished building with barley (the eor [Heb kor] Ammon about 10 bushels). The campaign on the E. of the Jordan was the only one in which J. took part, but as the state suffered no loss of territory during his regency, the external provinces must have been strongly held and well governed.

3. Jotham’s schemes in which his father was en-Change and building gained at the time of his affilition. Operations Like him, he became an enthusiastic builder (2 Ch 27 3). He is rec-orded to have had built towers, castles and cities, and specifically to have completed the Ophel wall in Jerus, which is still standing to the S. of the Haram area. But the crowning architectural glory of his reign was the completion of the temple court by erecting, or setting up, the upper gate of the temple of Jeh” (ver 23). The fable of Jotham is known, as it bears the same name and place in the Herodian temple as in each of its predecessors. It stood facing the S., and was on higher ground than any other of the temple gates. Hence its name. It gave entrance to that upper court of the temple, mentioned in J er 36 10, where it is spoken of as “the new gate of Jeh’s house.” As Jeremiah began his ministry about a century after J.’s death, Jereme-iah’s use of the name commemorates the fact that the gate was not built till long after the other parts of the structure.

During J.’s regency, a formidable combination of the Northern Kingdom and the Syrian state, with Damascus as capital, began to show signs of hostility to Judah. For 4 Syrian years before J.’s death, Pekah occupy League the throne of Samaria. The Assy king, Tiglath-pileser III, was then pushing his arms westward, and a Syrian league was formed to oppose them. J. may have refused to join this league. The situation at his death is thus described: “In those days Jeh began to send against Judah Rezin the king of Syria, and Pekah the son of Remaliah” (2 K 15 37).

J.’s character is represented in a moderately favorable light, being put to his credit that he did not enter the temple (2 Ch 27 2). The wisdom and vigor of his administration, and of his policy for the defense of the country, are recognized. It was owing to his com-}
JOY, joy (יוֹבָא, simḥāh; χαρά, chārā). The idea of joy is expressed in the OT by a wealth of synonymous terms that cannot easily be differentiated.

1. Terms. The commonest is simḥāh (1 Sam 18:6, etc.), variously td in EV "joy," "gladness," "mirth;" from simḥ ('to be bright'), properly "to be bright," "to shine" (Prov 13:9, etc.). The cognate root (Mic 4:3, etc.) is the righteous (in LXX "his bright''), but generally used fig. "to rejoice," "be glad" (Lev 23:40 and very frequent).

Other nouns are māḏāh and sāḏōn, both from 'āš, properly "to spring," "leap," hence "exult," "rejoice;" (ev "grand," "grace"). But we have also agállias, which expresses "exultation," "exultation," (not used in classical Gr. but often in LXX; in the NT, Lk 1:14-16; Acts 2:46; James 1, Heb 5:9), and the corresponding vb. agállō ("exult," "to exult, rejoice excessively" (Mt 5:12, etc.). In EV we sometimes "to joy" (now obsolete as a vb. and in an intransitive sense "to rejoice" (Hab 3:18; 2 Cor 7:13, etc.).

Besides joy in a general sense, as the response of the mind to any pleasurable event or state (1 K 1:40; Est 8:17, etc.), joy as a religious emotion is very frequently referred to in the OT. Religious contrast to the conceited emotion as touching the deepest springs of emotion, including the feeling of exultant gladness which often finds outward expression in such actions as leaping, shouting, and singing. Joy is repeatedly shown as the natural outgrowth of fellowship with God. "In thy presence is fulness of joy; in thy right hand there are pleasures for evermore" (Ps 16:11; cf vs 8,9). God is at once the source (Ps 4:7; 51:12) and the object (Ps 33:9; Isa 29:19) of religious joy. The phrase "to rejoice, the glad'" in Jnh" and similar expressions are of frequent occurrence (e.g. Ps 97:12; 119:2; Isa 61:10; Zec 10:7). Many aspects of the Divine character call forth this emotion, such as His lovingkindness (Ps 21:6; 31:7), His salvation (Ps 21:11; Isa 5:9; Hab 3:18), His laws and statutes (Ps 1:2; 119 passim), His judgments (Ps 48:11), His words of comfort in dark days (Jer 15:15,16). The fundamental fact of the sovereignty of God, of the equity of the Divine government of the universe, is a pious joyous sense of security in life (Ps 93:1; 96:10; 97:1) which breaks forth into songs of praise in which even inanimate Nature is poetically called upon to join (Ps 96:11-13; 98:4-9). In the case of those who held such views of God, it was natural that the service of God should eliciting a joyous spirit ("I will offer in his tabernacle sacrifices of joy," Ps 27:6; cf 1 Ch 29:9), a spirit which is abundantly manifest in the jubilant shouting with which religious exultation and exulting of joy is described. God is frequently "rejoicing in his work" (Ps 104:31; Gen 1:31), and over His people "for good" (Dt 30:9). "He will rejoice over thee [Zion] with joy; he will rest in his love; he will joy over thee with singing" (Zeph 3:17).

Such noble and vivid anthropomorphisms are a nearer approach to the truth than the abstract doctrine of the impassibility of God which, owing to Platonistic influences, dominated the theology of the early Christian centuries.

The element of joy in religion is still more prominent in the NT. It is the appropriate response of those who believe to the good tidings of the "good news" which constitute the main content of the NT (Lk 2:10). In the four Gospels, esp. Lk, this element is conspicuous. It is seen in the canticles of Lk 1 and 2. It is both exemplified in the life and character, and set forth in the teaching of Jesus. The New Testament contains the most striking instances that, in spite of the profound elements of grief and tragedy in His life, His habitual demeanor was gladness and joy, certainly not gloomy or ascetic: such as, His description of Himself as the Bridegroom (Jn 3:29) and even His interrupting of a prayer (Mt 14:23) that He came "eating and drinking," giving occasion to the charge that He was a "gluttonous man and a winebibber" (Mt 11:19); His "rejoicing in the Holy Spirit" (Lk 10:21); the fact that He came to "eat and drink," to be "rejoicing, and be exceeding glad" (Mt 14:21); also a more exuberant state of joy, which is in sharp contrast to the conception of His disciples in the hypocrites (6:16) ("Rejoice, and be exceeding glad." 6:12). This spirit is reflected in many of the parables. The discovery of the true treasure of life brings joy (Mt 13:44). The three parables in Lk 16 reveal that the joy of the disciples that He was not only to be "blessed" but to be "begotten" at the marriage (Mt 20:28) and still more on the day of Pentecost when he entered into light, and afterward remained a marked characteristic of the early church (Acts 2:46; 8:39; 13:52; 15:3). Paul speaks of the joy of one who gives to God, and of "joy in the Holy Spirit" as an essential mark of the kingdom of God (Rom 14:17). This joy is associated with faith (Phil 1:25), hope (Rom 5:2; 12:12), brotherly fellowship and sympathy (Rom 12:15; 2 Cor 7:13; Phil 2:1). To "rejoice in the Lord" is enjoined as a Christian duty (Phil 3:1; 4:4; cf 2:17; 1 Thes 5:16). In Christ, the Christian "rejoices with joy unspeakable and full of glory." (1 Pet 1:8), in spite of his temporary afflictions (ver 6), viewing the suffering of God as a "partaking in the sufferings of Christ that knows no gloom, but is the result of the triumph of faith over adverse and trying circumstances, which, instead of hindering, actually enhance it (Acts 5:41; Rom 6:3; 1 Pet 4:13; cf Mt 5:11,12). Even Our Lord Himself for "the joy that was set before him endured the cross, despising shame" (He 12:2).

JOZABAD, jōz-abad (גּוֹזָבָד, yôzəḇāḏāh; "Jeh" has been met). (1) A Gederathite, and one of David's recruits at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:4 [Heb 5]). He is named with the Benjamites, but possibly he was a native of the town Gedara in Southern Judah. See Curtis, Ch. 196.

(2) (3) Two Manassite captains who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:20 [Heb 21]).
The institution of the Jubilee Year should become the means of fixing the price of real property (25 15 f; cf vs 25–28); moreover, it should exclude the possibility of selling any piece of land permanently (26 23).

Property—the next verse furnishing the name: "The land is mine, and you are strangers and sojourners with me." The same rule was to be applied to dwellings-houses outside of the walled cities (26 31), and also to the houses owned by Levites, although they were built within walled cities (ver 32).

In the same manner the price of Heb slaves was to vary according to the proximity of the Jubilee Year (26 47–54). This passage deals with the enrolling of a Hebrew by a foreigner living among the Jews; it goes without saying that the same rule would hold good in the case of a Hebrew selling himself to one of his own people.

In 27 17–25 we find a similar arrangement respecting such lands that were "sanctified unto Jehovah". In all these cases the original owner was at liberty to redeem his property at any time, or have it redeemed by some of his nearest relatives (26 25–27.29.48 ff; 27 19).

The crowning feature, though, was the full restitution of all real property in the Jubilee Year. The primary object of this regulation was, of course, the reversion of all hereditary property to the family which originally possessed it, and the reestablishment of the original arrangement regarding the division of the land. But that was not all; for this legal disposition and regulation of external matters was closely connected with the high calling of the Jewish people. It was a part of the Divine plan looking forward to the salvation of mankind. The deepest meaning of it (the Jubilee Year) is to be found in the ἀποκατάστασις τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ θεοῦ, ἀποκατάστασις τῆς βασιλείας τοῦ θεοῦ, i.e., in the restoring of all that which in the course of time was perverted by man’s sin, in the removing of all slavery of sin, in the establishing of the true liberty of the children of God, and in the delivering of the creation from the bondage of corruption to which it was subjected on account of man’s depravity (Rom 8 19 ff) (cf Keil, Michaelis, Bib. Archaeology).

In the Year of Jubilee a great feature of Jehovah’s favor is foreshadowed, that period which, according to Isa 61 1–3, shall be ushered in to all those that labor and are heavy laden, by Him who was anointed by the Spirit of the Lord Jehovah.

The Jubilee Year, being the crowning point of all Sabbatical institutions, gave the finishing touch as it were to the whole cycle of sabbatic years. It is, therefore, quite appropriate that it should be a year of rest for the land like the preceding sabbatic year (Lev 25 11 f). It follows, of course, that in this instance there were two years, one after the other, in which there should be no sowing or systematic ingathering. This seems to be clear from Lev 25 19–32. "And in the eighth year, and eat of the fruits, the old store; until the ninth year, until its fruits come in, ye shall eat the old store." Thus in the 7th and 8th years the people were to live on what the fields had produced in the 9th year and whatever grew spontaneously. This shows the reason why we may say that one of the factors constituting the Jubilee Year was the "simple life." They could not help but live simply for two consecutive years.

1. Personal Liberty—The import of this institution if we should apply it only to those who were to be freed from the bonds of physical servitude. Undoubtedly, they must have been the foremost in realizing its beneficial effects. But the law was intended to benefit all, the masters as well as the servants. They should never lose sight of their being brothers and citizens of the theocratic kingdom. They owed their life to God and were subject to His sovereign will. Only through loyalty to Him were they free and could ever hope to be free and independent of all other masters.

2. Restitution—The Jubilee Year defined.

the laying down of its moral and religious foundations. In this connection we must again refer to 25 18–22, "Who shall shew us the truth of God?"

The answer is very simple and yet of surpassing grandeur: "Then I will command my blessing upon you," etc. Nothing was expected of the people but faith in Jeh and confidence in His power, which was not to be shaken by any doubtful reflection. And right here we have found the root of the simple life: no life without the true God, and no simplicity of life without true faith in Him. "Man shall not live by bread alone, but by every word that proceedeth out of the mouth of God" (Mt 4 4; cf Dt 8 3).

We may well ask: Did the Jewish people ever observe the Jubilee Year? There is no reason why they should not have observed it in preexilic times (cf Lotz in New Sch-Herz, X, s.v. "Subsabatical Year" and "Year of Jubilee"). Perhaps they signally failed in it, and if so, we should not be surprised at all. Not that the institution in itself was cumbersome with any obstacles that could not have been overcome, but what is more common than unbelief and unwillingness to trust absolutely in Jeh? Or, was it observed in post-exilic times? Here, too, we are in the dark. There is, indeed, a tradition according to which the Jubilee Year has never been observed—neither in the time of Ezra and Nehemiah nor at any later period. The truth of this seems to be corroborated by the silence of Jos, who, while referring quite frequently to the sabbatic year, never once mentions the Year of Jubilee.

JUDAEA, jōo-de'a, jōo-de'a (Jou'ba, Jou'data): The "land of the Jews," the Gr-Rom equivalent of Judah. As most of the Israelites returning from the captivity belonged to the tribe of Judah, they came to be called Jews and their land Judaea. In Tob 1 18 the name is applied to the old kingdom of Judah. For a general description of the physical geography and early history of this region see Judah. The limits of this district varied greatly, extending as the Jewish population increased, but in many periods with very indefinite boundaries.

Under the Pers empire, Judaea (or Judah) was a district administered by a governor who, like Zenobabel ( Hag 1 14; 2 2), was probably usually a Jew. Even as late as Judas Macabaeus, Hebron and its surroundings—the very heart of old Judah—was under the domination of the Edomites, whom, however, Judas conquered ( 1 Mac 5 65); in the time of his brother Jonathan (145 BC), three tetrarchies of Samaria, Aphaera, Lydda and Ramathaim, were added to Judaea (1 Mac 10 30 35; 11 34); in some passages it is referred to at this time as the "land of Judah" (Isa 8; 1 Mac 10 30 33 37). The land was then roughly limited by what may be called the "natural boundaries of Judah" (see Judah).

Strabo (xvi,11,21) extends the name Judaea to include practically all Pal; cf also Lk 4 44 M; Acts 1 13 37, etc. In several NT references ( Mt 4 25; Mk 1 5; 3 7; Lk 5 17; Jr 3 22; Acts 1 8), Judaea is contrasted with its capital Jerus. The country bordering on the shores of the Dead Sea for some miles inland was known as the "land of Judah" (see Judah; Jeshimon) ( Mt 3 1), or the "wilderness" ( Mk 1 4; Lk 3 2); here John the Baptist appeared as a preacher.

According to Mt 19 1 (but cf Mk 10 1, where RV has 'Judaea and beyond Jordan'), some cities beyond Jordan belonged to Judaea. That this was an actual fact we know from Ptolemy (v.16,9) and Jos (Ant, XII, iv, 11).

According to Jos (BJ, III, iii, 5), Judaea extended from Anathoth-Borkaes (i.e. Khan Berkti near Khan es S'deq, close to the most northerly frontier of Judah as described in Judah [v.c.]) to the village Jordan, possibly Tell Arad, near Arabia in the S. Its breadth was from Joppa in the W.

According to Lk 1 39 AV, see JUTTAH; 3 26, see JODA; 3 30, see JUDAS.

JUDAH, jōo'da (יהודה, y'hūdâh, "praised"): (1) 4th son of Jacob by Leah (see separate art.). (2) An ancestor of Kadmiel, one of those who had the oversight of the rebuilding of the temple (Ezr 3 9). He is the same as Hodaviah (Ezr 2 40) and Hodevah ( Neh 7 43). (3) A Levite who had taken a strange wife (Ezr 10 28). (4) A Levite who came up with Zenobabel ( Neh 12 8). (5) A priest and musician who took part in the dedication of the wall of Jerus ( Neh 12 36); (4), (5) may be the same person. JUDAH (יהודה), yhūdāh; in Gen 29 35 B, 'Ijośaś, iōdān, A, 'I[ošas, iōdā: elsewhere B and A, 'Ijośas, iōdās): The 4th son born to Jacob by Leah in Padan-aram (Gen 29 35, etc). Of this patriarch's only scanty details remain to us. He turned his brethren from their purpose to play Joseph, persuading them to sell to the Midianites at Dothan (37 26 ff). A dark stain is left upon his memory by the disgraceful story told in ch 38. Reuben forfeited the rights of primogeniture by an act of treachery; Simeon and Levi, who came next in order, were passed over because of their cruel and treacherous conduct at Shechem; to J., therefore, were assigned the honors and responsibilities of the firstborn (34; 35 22; 49 5 ff). On the occasion of their first visit to Egypt he was left behind, just as for his brethren (42 22,37). Then the leadership passed to J. (43 3, etc). The sons of Joseph evidently looked askance upon J.'s promotion, and their own claims to hegemony were backed by considered rivalry (42 22 ff). The rivalry between the two tribes, thus early visible, culminated in the disruption of the kingdom. To J., the "lion's whelp," a prolonged dominion was assured (49 16 f).

The tribe of Judah, of which the patriarch was the name-father, at the first census in the wilderness numbered 74,600 fighting men; in the census at Sinai the number "from 20 years old and upward" was 76,500 (Nu 1 27; 26 22; see Numbers). The standard of the camp of J., with which were also the tribes of Zebulun and Issachar, was to the E. of the tabernacle "toward the sunrise," the prince of J. being Nahshon, the son of Amminadab (2 3), Caleb, the son of Jephunneh, represented J. among the spies (13 6); he also was told off to assist at the future allocation of the tribal portions (34 19).

The land assigned to J. lay in the S. of Pal (see Judah, Territory of), comprising part of the mountain, the Shephelah, and the Judah, Kingdom of: I. CANAAN BEFORE THE MONARCHY

13. Summary

I. CANAAN BEFORE THE MONARCHY—Some 4,000 years BC the land on either side of the valley of the Jordan was peopled by a race who, to whatever stock they belonged, was Semitic. It was not until about the year 2500 BC that the tide of Semitic immigration began to flow from North Africa into the countries watered by the Jordan and the Euphrates. It was on the first waves in this human tide consisted of the Philistines who settled in the S.W. on the Mediterranean; they were closely followed by other Can. tribes who occupied the country which long bore their name.

The Canaanites are known to us chiefly from the famous letters found at Tell el-Amarna in Egypt which describe the political state of the country during the years 1415-1360 BC—the years of the reigns of Amenophis III and Amenophis IV. Canaan was at this time slipping out of the hands of Egypt. The native princes were in revolt; trade was withered; and but few Egypt garrisons remained. Meanwhile a fresh tide of invasion was hurling its waves against the eastern frontiers of the land.

The Hebrews are so named by those of other nationality after one of the conqueror ancestors (Gen 10 24), or because they had come from beyond (ἐβλήτος) the Jordan or the Euphrates. Of themselves they called themselves as Israel. Israel was a name assumed by the Confederacy of the eponymous hero of the nation whose real name was Jacob. Similarly the Arabian prophets belonged to the tribe called from its ancestor Korasha, whose name Korash, was at the time Israel were a complex of some 12 or 13 tribes. These 12 tribes were divided into two main sections, one section tracing its descent from Leah, one of Jacob's wives, and the other section tracing its descent from Rachel, his other wife. The names of the tribes which claimed to be descended from Leah were Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Zebulun, and, indirectly, Gad and Asher; those who claimed to be descended from Rachel were Joseph, which was divided into two clans; Ephraim and Manasseh, Benjamin, and, indirectly, Dan and Naphtali. The rivalry between these two great divisions ran all through the national history of the Hebrews, and was only brought to an end by the annihilation of one of the opposing factions (Isa 11 13). But not only was the Israelite nation divided into two rival groups, but there also, the 12 tribes of Israel were each divided into many clans; each clan in each tribe was itself divided into several more. The rivalry between these groups ran not only within each tribe, but between the tribes. The two great divisions, the tribe of Israel, and the tribe of Judah each to its own side, each tribe of Israel, and the tribe of Judah each to its own side, each tribe.

We find exactly the same state of things obtaining in the history of the Arabian conquests. All through that history there runs the rivalry between the two separate and irreconcilable accounts of the conquest of Canaan by the Israelites. According to the Book of Jos, it is said the Invasion was a movement of the whole people of Israel under the leadership of Joshua; according to the Book of Joshua, it was a series of expulsions made from Canaan. Each tribe, in fact, the strongest tribes, was put to flight by the attack of another tribe, and in some cases, whole cities were destroyed. The question of why Israel was not allowed to enter Canaan at once is not answered by the Bible. The answer is that God wanted the Israelites to learn that He is a God of war, and that He would make them strong enough to conquer Canaan.

6. Early Rulers

(a) Judges

The Judges were a class of rulers in Israel who were elected by the people. They were not always approved of by the people, and the people were often disaffected. They were chosen from among the tribes, and their appointment was by lot. The Judges were responsible for maintaining justice and order in Israel, and they were often called upon to lead the Israelites in battle.

(b) Kings

The Kings of Israel were the rulers of the nation, and they were chosen by the people. The Kings were responsible for maintaining justice and order in Israel, and they were often called upon to lead the Israelites in battle. The Kings were also responsible for maintaining the alliance with Egypt and the other nations of the region.

7. The Judges

The Judges were a class of rulers in Israel who were elected by the people. They were not always approved of by the people, and the people were often disaffected. They were chosen from among the tribes, and their appointment was by lot. The Judges were responsible for maintaining justice and order in Israel, and they were often called upon to lead the Israelites in battle.

8. Hereditary Kings

The Hereditary Kings were the rulers of Israel, and they were elected by the people. The Hereditary Kings were responsible for maintaining justice and order in Israel, and they were often called upon to lead the Israelites in battle. The Hereditary Kings were also responsible for maintaining the alliance with Egypt and the other nations of the region.

II. The First Three Kings.

1. The Benjamite King

The Benjamite King was a king who was chosen by the people of Benjamin to lead them in battle. The Benjamite King was responsible for maintaining justice and order in Benjamin, and he was often called upon to lead the people of Benjamin in battle.

2. The Rachel and Leah Tribes

The Rachel and Leah Tribes were the two tribal unions that were formed after the death of Benjamin. The Rachel and Leah Tribes were responsible for maintaining justice and order in the two tribes, and they were often called upon to lead the people of the two tribes in battle.

3. The Deserts

The Deserts were the areas that were inhabited by the Israelites after they left Egypt. The Deserts were divided into two areas: the Northern Desert and the Southern Desert. The Northern Desert was inhabited by the Israelites, and the Southern Desert was inhabited by the Canaanites.

III. The Dual Monarchy.—Rehoboam made no decisive attempt to bring back the recalcitrant tribes to their allegiance (1 K 12:21 ff.), though the two countries made raids, one on the other. In the 30th year of his reign, on his own security he built numerous fortresses, the remains of some of which have, it is proven, been recovered within recent years (2 Ch 11:5 ff.). These excited the suspicion of Shishak of Egypt, who invaded the country and reduced it to vassalage (1 K 14:25 ff.). Under Rehoboam's son Abijah, actual war broke out between the two kingdoms (16:6 as corrected in ver. 7; 2 Ch 13). The war was continued during the long reign of his son Asa, whose opponent, Baasha, built a fort some 6 miles N. of Jerusalem in order to cut off that city from communication with the N. Asa confessed his weakness by appealing for help to Ben-hadad of Damascus. The end justified the means. The fort was demolished.

The reign of Asa is also remarkable for the first of those reformations of worship which recur at intervals throughout the history of the Southern Kingdom. The high places were not yet, however, considered illegitimate (1 K 16:14; but cf. 2 Ch 14:5). He, like his grandfather, was a builder of canals, and with a similar, though more fruitful, result (2 Ch 14:9-10). Asa's health and illness helped to bring to the rival kingdoms a peace which lasted beyond his own reign (1 K 15:23).

An effect of this peace is seen in the expanding foreign trade of the country under his successor Jehoshaphat. He rebuilt the navy as in the days of Solomon, but a storm ruined the enterprise (1 K 22:48).

4. Two Kingdoms Contrasted

at Peace
During this reign the two kingdoms came nearer being united than they had done since the disruption. This was not due largely to the Northern Kingdom having been greatly weakened by the wars with Syria and Assyria, and having given up the idea of annexing the smaller country. Moreover, Jehoshaphat had married his son Joram (Jehoram) to Ahab's daughter Athaliah. From a religious point of view, the two states reacted upon one another. Jehoram of Israel informed Jehoshaphat of the worship in the Northern Kingdom, and at the same time that of J. was brought into line with the practice of the sister kingdom (2 K 8:18). The peace, from a political point of view, did much to strengthen both countries, and enabled them to render mutual assistance against the common foe.

Up to the death of Jehoram of Israel, which synchronized with that of Joram and Ahaziah of J., 6 kings had reigned in J. Of these the first 4 died in their beds and were buried in their own mausoleum. During the same period of about 30 years there were in Israel 9 kings divided into 4 dynasties. The second king of the 1st Dynasty was immediately assassinated and the entire family annihilated. Precisely the same fate overtook the 2nd Dynasty. Then ensued a civil war in which two pretenders were killed, one perishing by his own hand. The 3rd Dynasty lasted longer than the first two and counted 4 kings. Of these one was defeated and killed in battle and another assassinated. The fate of the kings of Israel is very like that of the middle and later Abbasid caliphs. The murder of his brothers by the Judean Jehoram, a proceeding once regular with the suzerains of Turkey, must also be put down to the influence of his Islaedite wife.

It was obvious that a crisis was impending. Edom and Libnah had thrown off their allegiance, and the Philist had attacked and plundered Jeru, even taking king's prisoners, with the exception of the youngest (2 Ch 21:16). Moreover, the two kingdoms had become so closely united, not only by intermarriage, but also in religion and politics, that they must stand and fall together. The hurricane which swept away the northern dynasty also swept away the southern royal house more nearly connected with Ahab, and the fury of the queenmother Athaliah made the destruction complete (2 K 11:1).

For 6 years the daughter of Ahab held sway in Jerusalem. The only woman who sat on the throne of David was a daughter of the hated Ahab. In her uniqueness, she thus holds a place similar to that of Shejjer ed-Durr among the Memluk sultans of Egypt. The character of her reign is not described, but it can easily be imagined. She came to her inevitable end 6 years later.

8. Begins to Recover

9. Reviving and accession of Ben-hadad III led Fortunes to a revival in the fortunes of both of the Israelite kingdoms. The act of elecmeny with which Amaziah commenced his reign (2 K 14:5-6; Dt 24:13) in precisely similar contrast to the moral code which had come to prevail in the sister kingdom; and the story of his hiring mercenaries from the Ephraimitic kingdom (2 Ch 25:5-10) sheds a curious light on the relations subsisting between the two countries, and even on those times generally. It is still more curious to find him, some time after, seeking, without provocation, a challenge to Jehoshaphat; and the capture and release of Amaziah evinces some rudimentary ideas of chivalry (2 K 14:8 ff.). The chief event of the reign was the reconquest of Edom and taking of Petra (2 K 14:7).

The principle of the election of kings by the people was in force in Judah, although it seemed to be in abeyance since the people were content to limit their choice to the Davidic line. But it was exercised when occasion required.

10. Monarchy Still Elective

Joash had been chosen by the populace, and it was they who, when the public discontent culminated in the accession of Amaziah, chose his 16-year-old son Uzziah (or Azariah) to succeed him.

The minority of the king involved something equivalent to a regency. As Jehoiahaz, at first carried on the government for Joash, Elah was assassinated under the tutelage of Zechariah (2 Ch 26 5), and the latter part of his reign was covered by the regency of his son Jotham.

It is obvious that with the unstable dynasties of the north, such government by deputy would have been impracticable.

The reign of Uzziah (2 Ch 26) was one of the most glorious in the annals of the Judaean kingdom. The Phœnis and southern Arabs, who had been so powerful in the time of David and Solomon, were subdued, and other Bedawin were held in check.

The frontiers were strengthened with numerous castles. Now that Edom was again annexed, the Red Sea trade was resumed. Irrigation was re-established, and the agriculture of the country were developed. Uzziah also established a standing army, properly equipped and trained. Artillery, in the shape of catapults and other siege engines, was manufactured. It is obvious that in this reign we have advanced far beyond the earlier and ruder times.

In this and the preceding reigns, we notice also how the priests are becoming a distinct and powerful caste. Zadok and Abiathar were in those early days invested with the duties and dignity of the Melchizedekian Priesthood.

The kings might at pleasure discharge the functions of the priest. But the all-powerful position of Jehoiahaz seems to have given the order new life; and in the latter part of the reign of Uzziah, king and priest come into conflict, and the king comes off second-best (2 Ch 26 16 ff).

Uzziah is the first king of J. to be mentioned in the Assyrian annals. He was fighting against 'Pal' in the years 747-740 B.C. He is said to have been a mighty warrior, and to have a thousand chariots and a hundred thousand horsemen.

14. Advent of Assyria

Great eastern power upon the scene of Assyria Judaean politics could end but in one way—as it was soon to do with Israel also. The reign of Jotham may be passed over as it coincided almost entirely with that of his father. But in the following reign we find J. already paying tribute to Assyria in the year of the fall of Damascus and the conquest of the East-Jordan land, the year 734 B.C.

During the regency of Jotham, the effeminacy and luxury of the Northern Kingdom had already begun to infect the Southern (Mic 1 9; 16. Judah a 6 16), and under the irresolute Ahaz Protocatece the declension went on rapidly. This rapprochement in morals and customs did not prevent Israel under Pekah joining with Rezin of Syria against J., with no less an object than to subvert the dynasty by placing an Aramean on the throne (Isa 7 6). What the result might have been, had not Isaiah taken the reins out of Ahaz' hands, it is impossible to say. As it was, J. felt the strain of the conflict for many a year. The country was invaded from other points, and many towns were lost, some of which were never recovered (2 Ch 23 7 ff).

The country was invaded from other points, and many towns were lost, some of which were never recovered (2 Ch 23 7 ff).

It was a part of the cosmopolitan tendencies of the time that the worship became tarnished with foreign innovations (2 K 16 10). The temple for the first time in its history was closed (2 Ch 28 17).

Altars of Baal were set up in all the towns.

16. Cosmo- a open spaces of Judas, each representing some urban god (Jer 11 13). About Tendencies the closing of the temple Isaiah would not be greatly concerned. Perhaps it was his suggestion (Isa 4). The priests who were supreme in the preceding reigns had lost their influence: their place had been taken by the prophets. The introduction of Baalism, however, was no doubt due to Ahaz alone.

IV. Period of Reformation

The following reign—that of Hezekiah—was, perhaps as a result of the disappearance of the Northern Kingdom, a period of reformation. Isaiah Indep- a is now supreme, and the history of the independent kingdom will be found in his biography.

It must have been with a sigh of relief that Hezekiah saw the Northern Kingdom disappear forever from the scene. The relations of the two countries had been too uniformly hostile to make that event anything but one for good. It was no doubt due to Isaiah that Hezekiah sought to recover the old independence of his country. Their patriotism was near to be their own undoing.

Sennacherib invaded Pal, and Hezekiah found himself a mere appendage of the superpower of Jerusalem. Isaiah's patriotism rose to the occasion; the invading armies melted away as by a miracle; J. was once more free (2 K 18 13 ff).

A curious result of Sennacherib's invasion was the disappearance of the high places where Levitical priests officiated in the

2. Reform opposition to those of the temple. Religion When the Judaean territories were limited to the city, these of necessity vanished, and, when the siege was over, they were not restored. They were henceforward regarded as illegal. It is generally held by scholars that this reform occurred later under Josiah, on the discovery of the 'Book of the Law' by Hilkiah in the temple (2 K 22 8), and that this book was Dt. The high places, however, are not mentioned in the law book of Dt. The reform was probably the work of Isaiah, and due to considerations of morals.

The Judaean had always had a friendly feeling toward Egypt. Egypt had come to be a rather petty nation, and the Egyptian power became threatening, it was to Egypt they turned for safety. Recent excavation and Judah has shown that the influence of Egypt upon the life and manners of Pal was very great, and that that of Assyria and Babylonia was comparatively slight, and generally confined to the N. In the reign of Hezekiah a powerful party proposed an alliance with Egypt with the view of checking the designs of Assyria (2 K 17 4; Isa 30 23; 31 1).

Hezekiah followed Isaiah's advice in rejecting all alliances.

The commercial and other ties which bound Pal to Egypt were much stronger than those between Pal and the East. One of the chief articles of trade of Pal was the trade in horses. This traffic had been begun by Solomon (1 K 10 26). The chief seat of the trade in Pal was Lachish (Mic 1 13).

In their nomadic state the Israelites had no horses, and the use of the horse was looked upon with suspicion by the prophets (Dt 17 16; Zec 9 10). When the horse is spoken of in the OT, it is as the chief weapon of the enemies of the nation (Ex 15 1), and commentators have considered this to have been because it was a sign of the absolute control of the nation over the nomadic tribes.

On the death of Hezekiah, the nation reverted to the culture and manners of the time of Ahaz and Manasseh, and even went farther than he in corrupt practices. The chief and despotic practice of sacrifice as a form of religious worship became common in Israel (Mic Manasseh 6 7). The influence for good of the prophets had gone (2 K 21). There is a curious story in 2 Ch 33 11 f that Manasseh was taken captive by the Assyrians, and, after spending some time in captivity in Babylon, reformed and was restored to his throne. His son, however, prospered, and all these reforms, and public discontent grew to such an extent that he was assassinated (2 K 21 19 ff).

Once more the tide turned in the direction of reform, and on this occasion it rose higher than ever before. The reformation under Josiah was never again wholly undone. The enthusiasm of the iconoclasts carried them far beyond the frontiers of Judah (2 Ch 36 6), for on this occasion they were backed up by the newly found "Book of the Law." All boded well for a prosperous reign, but unforeseen disasters came from without. The Scythian invasion swept over Southwestern Asia (Jer 1 14–16; 6 1, etc.). The storm passed, and hope rose higher than before, for the power of Assyria had been shattered forever.

Already in 722, when Sargon seized the throne on the death of Shalmaneser, Babylonia had revolted, and crowned Marduk-baladan king (Isa 39 1). Hezekiah received a delegation from Marduk-baladan (2 K 20 12 ff.), no doubt in the hope of freeing himself from the Assyrian danger by an alliance. The revolt of Merodach-baladan was maintained for 12 years; then it was suppressed. There was, in fact, no place of Babylonia on the accession of Sennacherib, Sargon's son, in 705, which went on till 691, and the events referred to in 2 K 20 may have happened at this time, for Hezekiah's reign seems to have ended about 700.

Sennacherib was assassinated in 681 (Isa 37 38) and was succeeded by his son Esar-haddon, who rebuilt Babylon, razed to the ground by his father, and under whom the province remained quiet. In 674 hostilities with Egypt broke out, and that country was overrun, and Tirhakah (q.v.) was expelled in 670. Two years later, however, occurred the revolt of Egypt and the death of Esar-haddon. Assur-bani-pal succeeded, and Egypt regained her independence in 660. The revolt of Babylon, the incursion of the Scythians (Jer 1 14 ff.) and the death of Assur-bani-pal followed. Two more kings sat on the throne of Assyria, and the Nineveh that was taken by the combined Scythians (Mandor) and Babylonians (Herod. i 74; Nah; Zeph 2 13–15; Hab 1 5 ff.).

The Scythian tempest passed quickly, and when it was over the Assyrian peril was no more. Pharnah-necoh seized the opportunity to avenge the injuries of his country by the invasion of the erstwhile Assyrian territories. Josiah, pursuing the policy of alliance with Babylonia inaugurated by Hezekiah, endeavored to arrest his progress. He was defeated and mortally wounded at Megiddo (Zee 12 11).

By the foolhardy action of Josiah, J. lost its independence. The people, indeed, elected Jehohaz (Shallum) king, but he was immediately deposed and carried to Egypt (2 K 23 30). The people, however, chose Josiah's son, Jeconiah (Eliakim) as vassal-king. After the defeat of the Pharaoh at Carchemish, the old Hittite stronghold, by Nebuchadrezzar, Jehoiakim submitted, and became a dependency of Babylon. There must have been some return of prosperity. (Josiah's) name is honored for his luxury and extravagance and oppressive taxation (Jer 22 13 ff.), but the country was raided by the neighboring Bedawin (2 K 24 2), and Jehoiakim came to an untimely end (Jer 22 19).

The prophets were no longer, as under Hesekiah, all-powerful in the state. The influence of the court, the power of the temple, the favor of the people, were doubtless great but the majority 11. Prophets was against him. His program was to undo the reforms of Josiah, and to suppress the Abrahamic elements in the national religion. Soon after his return from shipwreck, Isaiah had preached reliance upon the national God and through it the political independence of the nation. It was the sad duty of Jeremiah to advise the surrender of the national independence to the newly risen power of Medo-Babylonia.

12. The Deportations

It was under him also that the first great deportation from the land occurred (Jer 22 4–5). The first deportation, of the sons of Zedekiah, was set on the throne under the title of Zedekiah. Against the advice of Jeremiah, this, the last king of J., declared himself independent of Babylon, and threw his lot with Egypt under the leadership of Pharaoh Hophra (Apries), thus securing his oath of fealty to the last Pharaoh. The siege of the city lasted two years. It was taken on the fatal 9th of Ab in the year 586. Zedekiah's family was put to the sword, and he himself was taken to Babylon. Egypt shared the fate of J., with whom she had been often so closely connected, and Hophra was the last of the Pharaohs.

The kingdom of J. had lasted 480 years, counting from its commencement, exactly twice as long as the kingdom of Israel, counting from the time when that kingdom is said to have been founded by Abraham (Gen 12). Time alone will tell whether this longer existence was due in the first place to the religious faith of the people. This is clear from the fact that the national religion not only survived the extinction of the nation, but spread far beyond its original territories and has endured down to the present day. But there were also circumstances which conspired to foster the growth of the nation in its earliest and most critical period. One of these was the comparative isolation and remoteness of the country. Neither the kingdom of Israel nor that of J. is for a moment to be compared to those of Egypt and Assyria. Even the combined kingdom under David and Solomon hardly deserves that comparison; and separate, the Northern Kingdom would be about the size of New Hampshire and the Southern Kingdom about that of Connecticut. The smaller kingdom survived the larger because it happened to be slightly farther removed from the danger zone. Even had the two kingdoms held together, it is impossible that they could have withstood the expansion of Assyria and Babylonia on the one side and of Egypt on the other. The Egyp party in Judean politics in the times of Isaiah and Jeremiah were so far in the right, that, if J. could have maintained her independence in alliance with Egypt, these two countries combined might have withstood the power of JUDAH, TERRITORY OF (נְדָעָה), yehudah:—

she failed from the days of Joshua onward (see JERICHO). From Jericho four roads pass upward to the plateau of Judah; unless the corresponding passes on the western frontier, they do not traverse any definite line of valley, but in many places run across the hill country.

These roads are: (a) The earliest historically, though now the least frequented, is the most northerly, which passes westward at the back of ancient Jericho (near Ein Khetab) and ascends into Elusa (Moslem) and to Bethel: (b) the route traversed by the modern Jerus-Jericho road, to the Jordan, and the natural cleft which enters into this road are traversed by the hills with Wady Jureif Ghâlan and runs by Nebi Musa, joining the line of the modern carriage road or path, and is traversed by the deserted ruin of the Saracenic Al-Muntâr el-Ahmâr. Here runs the road for the thousands of pilgrims who visit the shrine of Nebi Musa in the spring. (d) The most natural pass of all is by way of Wady el-Kunéirah, across the open plateau of el-Buqatâ and over the shoulder of Jebel el-Muntâr to Bethlehem. From 'Ain Pesakhah a very steep road, probably ancient, ascends to join this last route in el-Bukèa.

Somewhere along these routes must have lain the "the road." And the "Wilderness of Jeruel," the scene of the events of 2 Chr 20. The hill country of Judah is distinguished from other parts of Pal by certain physical characteristics. Its central part is a long plateau—or really series of plateaus—running from the stony and barren and complicated with but scanty springs: "dess" is less plentiful than in the north; several of the elevated plains, e.g. about Bethlehem, Beth Jala, and Hebron, are well suited to the growth of corn and olive trees, in the sheltered valleys and on the terraced hill-laid hillsides to the W. of the water-parting, vines, olives, figs and other fruit trees flourish exceedingly. There is evidence everywhere that cultivation was far more highly developed in ancient times; on most of the hill slopes and in the W. the traces of ancient terraces can still be seen (see BOTANY). This district in many parts, esp. on its eastern slopes, is evidently a pastoral land, and flocks of sheep and goats abound, invading in the spring even the desert itself, visible from the environs of all Judah's greater cities and doubtless profoundly influencing the lives and thoughts of their inhabitants.

The altitude attained in this "hill country" is usually about 3,000 ft. in the north (e.g. Ramallah, 2,850 ft., Nebi Samwil, 2,935 ft.), but is higher near Hebron, where we get 5,545 ft. at Râmâl el Khallîl. Many would limit the term "hill country of Judaeas" to the higher hills centering around Hebron, but this is unnecessary. Jerus is situated near a lower and more expanded part of the plateau, while the higher hills to its north, are, like that city itself, in the territory of Benjamin.

II. The Tribe of Judah and Its Territory.—In Nu 26:15-22 we are enumerated "in the plains of Moab by the Jordan at Jericho" (ver 8), Judah is described as made up of the families of the Shelomites, the Perezites, the Zerethites, the Hezronites and the Hamulites. "The families of Judah according to the book of them that were numbered of them," a total of 76,500 (ver 22). In Jgs 1 10 we read that the Kenites united with the tribe of J. and from other references (Josh 14-6-15; 15-15-19; Jgs 1 12-15-20) we learn that the two Kenites, Caleb and Othniel also were absorbed; and it is clear from 1 S 27 10; 30 9 that the Jerahmeelites closely connected with the Calebites (of 1 Chr 2 42) also formed a part of the tribe of J. The Kenizzites and Kenites were probably of Edomite origin (Gen 36 11; cf 1 Chr 2, 22), and this large admixture of foreign blood may partly account for the complex isolation of J. from the other tribes (e.g. she is not mentioned in Jgs 5).

The territory of the tribe of J. is described ideally in Josh 15, but it never really extended over the maritime plain to the W. The natural boundary which have already been described as the frontiers of the "hill country"; to the S. the boundary was "even to the wilderness of Zin southward, at the uttermost part of the south." i.e. of the Negeb (ver 1), and from thence (3) as far south as Kadesh-barnea, "even to Aidas, 50 miles S. of Beersheba, far in the desert: the position of the boundary of Gebrah, i.e. of scorpions, is not known. The "Brook of Egypt" is generally accepted to be the Wady el-Arish. The fact is, the actual frontier shaded off imperceptibly into deserts, perhaps with the possibilities of agriculture and depending therefore upon the rainfall. The northern boundary, the mountains of Judah, has now, lost, probably roughly marked the edge of the habitable area (see NEGEV).

The northern boundary which separated the land of J. from that of Benjamin is nowhere defined. The various locations mentioned in Josh 15 5-12 are dealt with in separate articles, but, omitting the very doubtful, the following, which are generally accepted, will show the general direction of the boundary line: The border went from the mouth of the Jordan to Beth-horôn (Ain Hâlajâ), and from the Valley of Achor (Wady Kelt) by the ascent of Adamûnina (Tâla'at el Dumnâ) to the waters of En Shemesh (probably the Wady el Ubûd, or Wady el Egyûb), and the Valley of Hînnoon (Wady er Rabâ). The line then crossed the Vale of Kaphshah (el Buqatâ) to the waters of Nephtoah (Láltâ), Kîrîth-jearim (Kureyt el 'Arâb), Chezalon (Keâlîh), Beth-sheanem (Ain Shenêm), Ekron (Yârûb) and Adullam (Ahdûlâm) to the goings out of the border were at the sea. According to the above line, Jerus lay within the bounds of Benjamin, though, according to a tradition recorded in the Palm, the site of the altar was in a piece of land belonging to Judah. The above frontier line can be followed on any modern map of Pal, and if it does not in many parts describe a natural boundary, it can be remembered that the frontiers of village and town possessions in modern Pal are extremely arbitrary, and though underdetermined by any natural boundary such as streams or mountain summits, they persist from generation to generation, and this too over a long period when there was constant warfare between different clans.

The territory of J. was small: even had it included all within its ideal boundaries, it would have been no more than 2,000 sq. miles; actually it was nearer 1,300 sq. miles, of which nearly half was desert.

III. The Boundaries of the Kingdom of Judah.—These were very circumscribed. In 2 Chr 11 5-12 there is a list of the cities chiefly those on the frontier which Solomon fortified. On the E. were Bethel, Etam and Tekoa; on the S. were Beth-sur, Soc, Adullam, Gath, Marahesh, Ziph, Adoram, Lachish, Azekah, Zorah, Ajalon and Hebron. The sites of the great majority of these are known, and they are all upon the borders of the Shephelah, between the Jezreel and Jordan valleys. It will be seen that the military preparation then made was against an attack from the W. In the 5th year of the reign of Rehoboam the expected attack came, and Shishak (Sheshenq I) of Egypt swept over the land and not only conquered all J. and Jerus, but, according to the reading of some authorities in the account of this campaign given in the great temple of Karnak, he headed over to Jeroboam of Israel certain strongholds of Judah.

The usual northern frontier between the two Heb kingdoms appears to have been the southernmost of the three natural lines described in I above, namely by the Valley of Ajalon on the W. and the Gorge of Michmas (Wady Sweeniit) on the E. Along the central plateau the frontier varied. Bethel (1 K 12 29; 2 K 10 29; Am 3 14; 4 4; 7 10.3; Hos 10 15) belonged to Israel, though once it fell to J. when Abijah took it and with it Jeshanah (Ain Simia) and Ephron (probably of Talm, Mârâth). (2 Chr 11 8-10), on the other hand, the S. of the Wady Sweeniit, was on the northern frontier of J., hence instead of the old term "from Dan to Beer-sheba," we read now of "from Geba to Beer-sheba" (2 K 23 8). Basamb, king of Israel, went S. and fortified Ramah (or Edom, but 4 miles from Jerus) against J. (1 K 18 17), but Aa stopped his travel... work, removed the fortifications and with the materials strengthened his own fortress at Geba and Mizpah (1 K 15:1-22). In the Jordan valley Jericho was held by Israel (1 K 16:34; 2 K 2:4).

After the Northern Kingdom fell, the frontier of J. appears to have extended a little farther N., and Bethel (2 K 23:15-19) and Jericho (to judge from Ezra 2:54; Neh 3:2; 7:36) also became part of the kingdom of J. For the further history of this district see JUDAE.

JUDAH AT (AV UPON) THE JORDAN (תֵּית יִרְדֵּן, yehidh ha-yarden): A place marking the eastern limit of the territory of Naphthali (Josh 19:34). It is generally thought among scholars that the text is corrupt; but no very probable emendation has been suggested. Thomson (LB, II, 466) proposes to identify it with Seiyid Jehdda, a small white-domed sanctuary about 3 miles to the S.E. of Tell el-Kadýy.

JUDAS, jōō'das (יוֹדָס, Ioudas; Gr form of Heb "Judah"): (1) A Levite mentioned in 1 Esd 9:23—JUDAH (3).

(2) Judas Maccabaeus, 3d son of Mattathias (1 Mac 2:4). See Maccabees.

(3) Judas, son of Chalphi, a Jewish officer who supported Jonathan in the battle of Hazer (1 Mac 11:70; Ant, XIII, v, 7).

(4) A person of good position in Jerus at the time of the mission to Aristobulus (2 Mac 1:10); he has been identified with Judas Maccabaeus and also with an Essene prophet (Ant, XIII, vi, 2; BJ, II, 5).

(5) Son of Simon the Maccabean, and brother of John Hyrcanus (1 Mac 16:2). He was wounded in the battle which he fought along with his brother against Cendebeus (1 Mac 16:1 f; Ant, XIII, vii, 3), and was murdered by Ptolemy the usurper, his brother-in-law, at Dok (1 Mac 16:11 f).

JUDAS, JUDA: (1) The name of an ancestor of Jesus (Lk 3:30). In AV it occurs also in Lk 3:26, but RV has "Joda." (WH "Joth, Jōda").

(2) Judas Iscariot (see separate art.).

(3) One of the brothers of Jesus (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3). See JUDE.

(4) An apostle, "not Iscariot" (Jn 14:22). He is generally identified with Lebbæus (Mt 10:3) and Thadæus (Mk 3:18). See Lebbæus; Thadæus.

He is called JUDAS OF JAMES (q.v.) (Lk 6:16; Acts 1:13), which means "son of James," not (AV) "the brother of James."

(5) A Galilean who stirred up rebellion "in the days of the enrolment" (Acts 5:37). See JUDAS OF GALILEE.

(6) One with whom Paul lodged in Damascus, whose house was "in the street which is called Straight" (Acts 9:11). Nothing further is known of him. A house is pointed out as his, in a lane off the Straight Street.

(7) Judas Barsabbas (Acts 15:22-27; 32; see separate art.).

JUDAS BARSABBAS, bär-sab'as (יוֹדָס בָּרָסְבָּבָס, Ioudas Barsabbas): Judas was, with Silas, a delegate from the church in Jerus to the gentle Christians at Corinth, Syria and Cilicia. They were appointed to convey the letter containing the decision of "the apostles and the elders, with the whole church" regarding the attitude to be taken by gentle Christians toward the Mosaic law, and also to explain "the same things by word of mouth." They accompanied Paul and Barnabas to Antioch, and, "being themselves also prophets," i.e., preachers, they not only handed over the epistle but stayed some time in the city preaching and teaching. They seem to have gone no further than Antioch, "they were dismissed in peace from the brethren unto those that had sent them forth," and it was Paul and Silas who some time afterward strengthened the churches in Syria and Cilicia (Acts 15:40-41).

According to ver 34 AV, Judas returned to Jerus without Silas, who remained at Antioch and afterward became Paul's companion (ver 40). The oldest MSS, however, omit ver 34, and it is therefore omitted from RV. It was probably a marginal note to explain ver 40, and in time it crept into the text. Judas and Silas are called "chief men among the brethren" (ver 29), probably elders, and "prophets" (ver 32).

Barsabbas being a patronymic, Judas was probably the brother of Joseph Barsabbas. He cannot be identified with any other Judas, e.g. "Judas not Iscariot" (Jn 14:22). We hear no more of Judas after his return to Jerus (Acts 15:22 ff).

JUDAS ISCARIOT, is-kar'ē-ōt (יוֹדָס הַכַּרְוָאִית, Ioudas Ischariōtis, i.e. ish kər'īdēh, "Judas, man of Kerith"): One of the twelve apostles and the betrayer of Jesus; for etymology, etc., see JUDAS.

I. Life.—Judas was, as his second name indicates, a native of Kerioth or Kerith. The exact locality of Kerith (of Jsh 16:25) is doubtful, but it lay probably to the S. of Judaea, being identified with the ruins of el Karijtein (cf A. Plummer, art. "Judas Iscariot" in HDB).

He was the son of Simon (Jn 13:2) or Simon Iscariot (Jn 6:71; 14:26), the meaning of Iscariot explaining why it was applied to his father also. The first Scriptural reference and Early evidence to J. is his election to the apostleship (cf Mt 10:4; Mk 3:19; Lk 6:16). He may have been present at the preaching of John the Baptist at Bethany beyond Jordan (cf Jn 1:28), but more probably he first met Jesus during the return of the latter through Judaea with His followers (cf Jn 3:22). According to the Gospel of the Twelve (Simon the Cananaean), J. was among those who received the call at the Sea of Tiberias (cf Mt 4:18-22).

For any definite allusion to J. during the interval lying between his call and the events immediately preceding the betrayal, we are indebted to St. John alone. These Betrayal allusions are made with the manifest purpose of showing forth the nefarious character of J. from the first, and in their sequence there is a gradual development and growing clearness in the manner in which Jesus makes prophecy regarding his future betrayer. Thus, after the discourse on the Bread of Life in the synagogue of Capernaum (Jn 6:60), Peter protested the allegiance of the apostles (ver 69), Jesus answered, "Did not I choose you the twelve, and one of you is a devil" (ver 70). Then follows St. John's commentary, "Now he abhorred Judas the son of Simon Iscariot, for he it was that should betray him, being one of the twelve" (ver 71), implying that Judas was already known to Jesus as being in spirit one of those who "went back, and walked no more with him" (ver 66). But the situation, however diabolical, it is not that it have been to the ambitious designs which probably actuated J. in his acceptance of the apostleship (cf below), was not sufficiently critical to call for immediate desecration on his part. Instead, he lulled his fears of exposure by the fact that he was not mentioning anything, and, as already observed, the personal motives of the faithful. Personal motives of a sordid nature had also influence in causing him to remain. Appointed keeper of the purse, he disregarded the warnings of Jesus concerning greed and hypocrisy (cf Mt 16:9; Mk 12:1-8) and appropriated the funds to his own uses. As a cloak to his avarice, he pretended to be zealous in their administration, and therefore, at the anointing of Jesus' feet by Mary, he asked "Why was not this ointment sold for 300 shillings, and given to the poor?" Now this he said, not because he cared for the poor, but because he was a thief, and having the bag took away what was put therein" (Jn 12:5; cf also Mt 26:7-13; Mk 14:3-8).

Yet, although by this craftiness J. concealed for a time his true nature from the rest of the disciples, and fomented any discontent that 3. The Betrayal might arise among them (cf Mk 14:4), he now felt that his present source of income could not long remain secure. The pregnant result of his Master's words regarding the day of his burial (cf Mt 26:12; Mk 14:8; Jn 12:7) revealed to His betrayer that Jesus already knew all the evil powers that were at work against Him; and it is significant that, according to Mt and Mk, who are the synoptists and the most direct of the traditions, J. departed immediately afterward and made his compact with the chief priests (cf Mt 26:14-15; Mk 14:10; cf also Lk 22:3-6). But his absence was only temporary. He was present at the washing of the disciples' feet, there to be differentiated once more by Jesus from the rest of the Twelve (cf "Ye are clean, but not all" and "He that eateth my bread uplifted his heel against me," Jn 13:18), but again without being named. It seemed as if Jesus wished to give Judas every opportunity, even at this late hour, of repenting and making his confession. For the last time, when they had sat down to eat, Jesus appealed to him thus with the words, "One of you shall betray me." At this, which perhaps he had dreamed of in Mk 14:18 and Lk 22:21; Jn 13:21). And at the end, in answer to the anxious queries of His disciples, "Is it I?" He indicated his betrayer, not by name, but by a sign: "He it is, for whom I shall dip the sop, and give it him." (Jn 13:29; cf also Mt 26:20-23). Immediately Jesus left the upper room; the opportunity which he sought for was come (cf Jn 13:30; Mt 26:16). There is some doubt as to whether he actually received the eucharistic bread and wine previous to his departure or not, but most modern commentators hold that he did not. On his departure, J. made his way to the high priests and their followers, and coming upon Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane, he betrayed his Master with a kiss (Mt 26:47-50; Mk 14:42-50; Lk 22:47-53). After the betrayal, Mk, Lk and Jn are silent as regards J., and the accounts given in Mt and Acts of his remorse and death vary in detail. According to Mt, the account begins "He was convicted of Judas' sense of guilt, and becoming still more mortified at his repulse by the chief priests and elders, "he cast down the pieces of silver into the sanctuary, and departed; and he went away and hanged himself." (cf also Mt 27:2-5). The chief priests purchased the potter's field, afterward called the "field of blood," and in this way was fulfilled the prophecy of Zechariah (11:12-13) ascribed by Matthew to Jeremiah (Mt 27:3-10). The account given in Mk, Lk and Jn is more typical, as it mentions neither Judas' repentance nor the chief priests, but simply states that J. "obtained a field with the reward of his iniquity; and falling headlong, he burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out" (ver 18). The author of Acts finds in this the fulfillment of the prophecy (cf Zech 11:12-13). The Vulgate rendering, "When he had hanged himself, he burst asunder," suggests a means of reconciling the two accounts.

According to a legendary account mentioned by Papias, the death of J. was due to the intervention of Hermas (Apocul. 5). A so-called "Gospel of Judas" was in use among the gnostic sect of the Cainites.

II. Character and Theories. — Much discussion and controversy have centered, not only around the discrepancies of the Gospel narratives of J., but also around his character and the problems connected with it. That J. the betrayer of Jesus should also be one of the Twelve has given opportunity for the attacks on both which have been made. The acceptance of the theories which would invalidate the historical value of much of the scriptural writings. Other theories, in explanation, viz. that J. joined the apostolic band with the definite intention of betraying Jesus. The aim of this intention has again resulted in the actions of the two, which have been used to excite the elevation of the character of Jesus, and to free him from the imputation of cowardly treachery. According to one, J. was a strong patriot, who saw in Jesus the foe of his race and the one who would destroy the ancient customs and the interests of his country. This view is, however, irreconcilable with the rejection of J. by the chief priests (cf Mt 27:3-10). According to the other, J. regarded himself as a true servant of Christianity, who assumed the role of traitor to expedite the action of the Trinitarian God and induce Him to manifest His miraculous powers by calling down upon himself the curse of God from heaven to help Him (cf Mt 26:53). His suicide was further due to his disappointment at the failure of Jesus to fulfill his expectations. This, together with the ancient times with the Cainites (cf above), and in modern days with De Quincey's view, and the terms and manner of denunciation employed by Jesus in regard to J. (cf also Jn 17:12) render this view also untenable.

Another view is that J. was foreordained to be the traitor; that Jesus was conscious from the first that He was to suffer death on the cross, and chose J. because He knew that he should betray Him and thus fulfill the Divine decrees "(cf Mt 26:54). These holding this view base their arguments on the phrase of Jesus implied in Jn 2:24; Jesus "knew all men": Jn 6:64, "Jesus knew from the beginning who should betray him" (cf Jn 18:9). Jn 18:4, "knowing all the things that were coming upon him." Yet, to take this phrase as a too rigid application of the doctrine of predestination, it would treat J. as a mere instrument, as a means and not an end in the hands of a higher power. It would render meaningless the appeals and reproaches made to him by Jesus and deny any personal responsibility and sense of guilt which it was Our Lord's very purpose to awaken and stimulate in the hearts of His hearers. John himself wrote after the event, but in the words of Our Lord there was, as we have seen, a growing cleavage in the manner in which He foretold His betrayal. The omniscience of Jesus was greater than that of a mere chair-vauntor who claimed to foretell the exact course of events. The omniscience of one who knew on the one hand the ways of His Eternal Father among men and, on the other, penetrated into the deepest recesses of human character and beheld there all its secret feelings and motives and tendencies.

Although a full discussion of the character of J. would of necessity involve those ultimate problems of Free Will and Original Sin (Westcott) which no theology can adequately solve, the theory which regards J. as a Gradual apostate is the most practical. It is significant that J., alone among the disciples was of southern extraction; and the differences in temperament, in character, together with the petty prejudices to which these generally give rise, may explain in part, though they do not JUDAS OF JAMES ('Ioðás, 'Iacóddou, 'Ioudás Iakóddou'): One of the twelve apostles (Lk 6:16; Acts 1:13; for etymology, etc., see JUDAS). AV has the reading "brother of James," and RV reads "son of James." The latter is to be preferred, in Jn 14:22 he is described as "Judas (not Iscariot)." The name corresponds with the "Thaddaeus" or "Leb- baeus whose surname was Thaddæus" of Mt 10:3 and Mk 3:18 (cf. THADDÆUS). The identification of Thaddæus with Judas is generally accepted, though Ewaleu Janes hold that they were different persons, that Thaddæus died during Christ's lifetime, and that Judas was chosen in his place (cf. Bruce, Training of the Twelve, 34). If the RV is accepted as the correct rendering of Lk 6:16 and Acts 1:13, this Judas cannot be identified either with the Judas (Mk 6:3 AV), Judas (Mk 6:3 RV), or Judas (Mt 13:55), the brother of Jesus; or with the Judas (Jude ver 1 RVm) or Jude (Jude ver 1 AV), the brother of James, whether these two latter Judases are to be regarded as the same or not. The only incident recorded of Judas of James is in Jn 14:22, where during Christ's address to the disciples after the last supper he put the question, "Lord, what is coming to pass that thou wilt manifest thyself unto us, and not unto the world?" LITERATURE

The writer of this short ep. calls himself Jude or Judas (Ioðas, Ioudas). His name is a common one among the Jews: there were few

The Writer of the other ep. of more frequent use. Two among the apostles bore it, viz. Judas, mentioned in Jn 14:22 (cf. Lk 6:16), and Judas Iscariot. Jude describes himself as "a servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James" (ver 1). The James here mentioned is no doubt the person who is called "the Lord's brother" (Gal 2:19), the writer of the ep. that bears his name. Neither of the two was an apostle. The opening sentence of Jude simply affirms that the writer is a "servant of Jesus Christ." This, if anywhere, should be the appropriate place for the mention of his apostleship, if he were an apostle. The appellation "servant of Jesus Christ" is "never thus barely used in an address of an ep. to designate an apostle" (Alford). Phil 11 has a similar expression, "Paul and Timothy, servants of Jesus Christ," but the designation common to two persons necessarily sticks to the rank of the inferior. In other instances "servant" is associated with "apostle" (Rom 1:1; Tit 1:1). Jude vs 17.18 speaks of the "apostles of our Lord Jesus Christ: that they said to you"—language which an apostle would hardly use of his fellow-apostles.

In Mk 6:3 are found the names of those of whom Jesus is said to be the brother, namely, James and JUDAS OF GALILEE (Ioðas, ho Galli- latos): Mentioned in Acts 5:37 as the leader of an insurrection occasioned by the census of Quirinius in 7 AD (see QUIRINIUS). He, and those who obeyed him, it is said, perished in that revolt. Jos also repeatedly mentions Judas by this same name, "the Galilean," and speaks of his revolt (Ant., XVIII, 1, 6; XX, v, 2; XXI, 11, vii; XVII, vii; XVII, v; XVIII, 11), names him a Gaulo- nite, of the city of Gamala. As Gamala was in Gaulonitis, not far from the eastern shore of the Sea of Galilee, it may be regarded as belonging to that province. The party of Judas seems to have been identified with the Zealots.

Jude, the servant of Jesus Christ, and brother of James.

The chief reason why it was rejected by some and regarded with suspicion by others seems to be because it is without a quotation from the apocryphal Book of Enoch, so Jerome informs us (Vox. Ill., 4). It indicates in mind another spurious writing, viz. the Assumption of Moses, when he spoke of the contention of Michael and the rebel angels, and the devil Abel (ver. 9). This, however, is not quite certain, for the date assigned to that writing is the 14 AD, and although Jude might have seen and read it, the compiler of the Epistle may have retained a copy near his own day that it could hardly have exerted much influence on his thought. Besides, the similarity of the Epistle and its dealing with a special class of errorists would limit to a certain extent its circulation among Christians. On this account it was a_popular reference by some and the absence of a reference to it by others.

II. The Occasion of Its Composition.—Jude, after his brief introduction (vs. 1, 2), explains very definitely why he writes as he does. He indicates distinctly his anxiety on behalf of the saints (ver. 3): "Beloved, while I was giving all diligence to write unto you of our common salvation, I was constrained to write unto you exhorting you to contend earnestly for the faith which was once for all delivered unto the saints." He had in mind to ward off the errorists who were doing great damage, and he had in mind to work on the salvation common to all Christians. Perhaps he contemplated the composition of a book or treatise that would have discussed the great subject in an exhaustive manner. But in face of the perils that were present, at the time already present in the community, his purpose was indefinitely postponed. We are not told how he became acquainted with the dangers which beset his fellow-believers, but the conjecture is probably correct that it was by means of the evangelist. At any rate, he was thoroughly conversant with the evils in the churches, and he deals with them as if he had beheld the enormities that were practised and the ruin that had ensued.

The address of the Epistle is remarkable for the affection Jude expresses for these saints. Obviously they are distinct from the libertines of whom he speaks with such solemn condemnation. They were the faithful who kept aloof from the ungodly that surrounded their books in classification. The Canon of Muratori includes Jude among the books of Scripture, though it omits the Epp. of Jas, Pet and He. This is one of the earliest documents containing a list of the NT books not including the four Gospels. Some date the fragment as c 170 AD, as it claims to have been written not long after Pius was bishop of Rome, and the latest date of Pius is 142–57 AD. The words of the document are, "The Shepherd was written very recently in our own time by Hermes, while his brother Pius sat in the chair of the Church of Rome." Twenty or twenty-five years would probably satisfy the period indicated by the words, "written very recently in our own time". We would fix the date of the fragment at c 170 AD. Salmon, however, strongly inclines to a later date, viz. c 200–210 AD, as does Zahn.

Zahn (Intro to the N.T., II, 259, ET), and Professor Chase (H.D.B.) are of the decided opinion that the Didache, 7: 1, 2, is a "false prophecy", and for some thou shalt rebuke, and for some thou shalt pray, and some thou shalt love above thine own soul [or life]," is founded on Jude, 7: 2. Dillmann (Ueber einige merkwürdige sprüche des Didache, 1891) in passim remarks that the famous document was written not later than 80 AD. It appears, therefore, more than probable that the Ep. of Jude was known to the authors of the Didache, 1891, at the end of the 1st cent. From the survey we have thus rapidly taken of the field in which the Ep. circulated, we fairly pass on to the question, who is Jude, and when and where was it written?

1. Surreptitious foes.—For there are certain men crept in privily, men who are ungodly men, viz. "ungodly men", (ver. 4). They are enemies who frown to be friends, and hence in reality are spies and traitors. These ungodly men appear to have creep into the company of the godly, actuated by evil inclination and enterprise. (2) Persecutors of grace and deniers of Christ.—"Turning the grace of our God into lasciviousness, and denying our only Master and Saviour Jesus Christ." These are those who by a vile perversion turn the grace and the liberty of the Gospel into a means for gratifying their crooked desires. The words "in lasciviousness, and denying our only Master and Saviour Jesus Christ" is a doctrine and life repudiate their Master and Lord.

(3) Censurable and arrogant detractors.—"In their dreaming, they glide the distances, and set up, as it were, and rig all at dignities" (ver 8). Destitute of true reverence, they rail at the holiest and best things, and sit in judgment upon all authority. "And they have the private tongue of the lawless: "Our lips are our own: who is lord over us?" (Ps 19 4).

(4) Ignorant calumniators and brutal sensualists.—"These rail at whatsoever things they know not: and what they understand naturally, like brutes created without reason, in these things they are destroyed" (ver 10). We must not so much know, as something lofty and noble, they deride and denounce; what the Lord hath gifted to ministers to their disorderly appetites and their debased tastes.

(5) Hypocrites and deceivers.—"These are they who are hidden rocks in your love-feasts when they feast with you, shepherding you without feasting themselves; chewing the fat of oxen, and drink wine without water . . . autumn trees without fruit . . . what waves of wandering stars, for which the blackness of darkness hath been reserved forever" (ver 12, 13). A most graphic picture of the insincerity, the depravity, and the doom of these insouciant. And yet they are found in the bosom of the Christian body, ever sitting with the saints at their love-feasts.

(6) Grumblers, fault-finders, pleasure-seekers, booters, parasites.—These are murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts . . . showing respect of persons for the sake of advantage" (ver 16). They impede Divine wisdom, are the foes of peace and quietness, boast of their capacities to manage things, and yet they can be servile, even sycophants, when thereby advantage is secured.

(7) Schismatics and sensualists.—"These are they who do not separate, having not the Spirit" (ver 19). It was characteristic of the false teachers and mockers who had invaded the Christian church that they drew a line of demarcation between themselves and others, or between different classes of believers, which the Holy Spirit would not have them do. They made use of all the great professions of Christianity to their own crafty and wicked ends. There seems to be a hint in these words of incipient Gnosticism, that fatal heresy that boated of a knowledge of a deep mystery which the initiated possessed, of which the great mass of Christians were ignorant. Jude brands the pretension as the offspring of their own sensuality, not at all of God's Spirit.

Such is the forbidding portrait drawn of the libertines in the Ep. But Jude adds other and even darker features. He furnishes a number of examples of apostates and of apostacy which disclose even more strikingly the spirit and the doom of them that pervert the truth, that deny the Lord Jesus Christ, and that mock at the things of God. These all mark a fatal degeneracy, a "falling away" which bodes nothing but evil and judgment. Against the corrupters and skeptics Jude writes with a vehemence that in the NT is without a parallel. Matters must have come to a dreadful pass when the Spirit of God is compelled to use such strong and awful language.

IV. Relation of Jude to the Second Epistle of Peter.—The relation is confined to 2 Pet 2—3 4.

1. Resemblances to Jude, at least no more than does Jas or 1 Pet. Between the sections of 2 Pet indicated above and Jude the parallelism is close, both as to the subjects treated and the historical illustrations introduced, and the language itself is of considerable extent is common to both. All readers must be impressed with the similarity. Accordingly, it is very generally held by interpreters that one of the writers copied from the other. There is not entire agreement as to whether Peter copied from Jude, or Jude from Peter. Perhaps a majority favor the former of the two alternatives, though some of the very latest and most learned of those who write on Intro- ductions to the NT hold the view that Jude copied from 2 Pet. Reference is made particularly to Dr. Theodore v. Zahn, whose magnificent work on Introduction has been but recently tr€ into Eng., and who argues convincingly that Jude copied from 2 Pet.

However, it must be admitted that there are in the two ep. as pronounced differences and divergences as there are resemblances. If one of the two did actually copy from the other, he was careful to add, subtract, and change what he found in his book, but best suited his purpose. A servile copyist he certainly was not. He maintained his independence throughout, as an exact comparison of the one with the other will demonstrate.

If we bring them into close proximity, following the example of professor Zahn in the "Bible Comm." (Intro to 2 Pet), we shall discover a marked difference between the two pictures drawn by the writers. We cannot fail to perceive how much darker and more sinister is that of Jude. The evil, alarming certainly in Peter, becomes appalling in Jude. Subjoined are proofs of the fact above stated:

2 Pet 2 1
But there arose false prophets also among the people, as among you also there shall be false teachers

Jude ver 4
For there are certain men crept in privily . . . .

2 Pet 2 2
who shall privily bring in destructive heresies, denying even the Master that bought them . . . .

Jude ver 4
... ungodly men, turning the grace of God into lasciviousness, and denying our only.Saviour, and Lord, Jesus Christ.

2 Pet 2 3
And in covetousness shall they with feigned words make merchandise of you . . . .

. . . . murmurers, complainers, walking after their own lusts (and their mouth speaketh great swelling words), showing respect of persons for the sake of advantage.

These contrasts and comparisons between the two ep. prove (1) that in Jude the false teachers are worse, more virulent than in Peter, and (2) that in Peter the whole description is predictive, whereas in Jude the deplorable condition is actually present.

If 2 Pet is dependent on Jude, if the apostle cited from Jude, how explain the strong predictive element in his opening verses (2 Pet 2 1—3)? If as Peter wrote he had lying before him Jude's letter, which represents the corrupters as already within the Christian community and doing their deadly work, his repeated use of the future tense is absolutely inexplicable. Assuming, however, that he wrote prior to Jude, his predictions become perfectly intelligible. No doubt the virus was working when he wrote, but it was latent, undeveloped; for worse would appear; but whether the poison was widely diffused, as vs 12.19 clearly show. The very life of the churches was endangered.

For if God spared not the angels when they sinned . . . .

Jude vs 5.6
. . . . the Lord, having saved a people out of the land of Egypt, afterward destroyed them . . . . and angels that . . . . left their proper habitation . . . .

Peter speaks of the angels that sinned, Jude of their apostasy. Peter makes prominent the salvation of Noah and his family when the flood overwhelmed the world of the Contrasts are evidently, while Jude tells of those who, delivered from bondage, afterward were destroyed because of their unbelief. He speaks of no rescue; we know of but two who survived the judgments of the wilderness; who entered the Promised Land. Caleb and Joshua.

Peter mentions the fate of the guilty cities of Sodom and Gomorrah, but he is careful to remind us of the deliverance of righteous Lot, while Jude makes prominent their nameless crimes and consigns them to "the punishment of eternal fire," but he is silent on the rescue of Lot. Manifestly Jude's illustrations are darker and more hopeless than Peter's.
Peter instances Balaam as an example of one who loved the hire of wrongdoing, and who was rebuked for his transgression. But Jude lists three notables in the instances in the OT to indicate how far in apostasy and rebellion the libertines had gone. Three words mark their course, rising into a climax, "way," "error," "gaysaying." They went in the way of Cain, i.e. in the way of self-will, of hate, and the spirit of murder. Moreover, they "ran riotously in the error of Balaam for hire." The words denote an activity of viciousness that enlisted all their eagerness and all their might. Balaam's error was one that led into error, one that seduced others into the like sin. The reference seems to be to the whole career of this heathen prophet, and includes his betrayal of the Israelites through the women of Moab (Nu 31.16). Balaam is the prototype of Jude's libertines, both in his covetousness and his seductive counsel. Furthermore, they "perished in the gaysaying of Korah." This man with 250 followers rebelled against the Divinely appointed leaders and rulers of Israel, Moses and Aaron, and sought to share their authority in Israel, if not to displace them altogether. Comparable with these rebels in ancient Israel are the treacherous and malignant foes whom Jude so vigorously denounces.

Peter speaks of them as "daring, self-willed, they trembled not to rail at dignitaries: whereas angels, though greater in might and power, bring not a railing judgment against them before the Lord" (vs 10.11). Jude is more specific: These dreamers "defile the flesh, and set at nought dominion, and revile the glorious dominion of power. And yet their show of wisdom will deceive them in their revelry. They were those who had been fascinated by the new teaching, and although not captured by it, they were engaged in its study, were drawn toward it and almost ready to yield. On these the faithful were to have mercy, were to convince them of their danger, show them the enormity to which the false system inevitably leads, and so win them back to Christ's allegiance. As if Jude said, Deal with the wavering in love and fidelity; but rescue them if possible.

There were others whose peril was greater: "And some save, snatching them out of the fire." These were identified with the wicked, were scoched by the fires of destruction and hence almost beyond reach of rescue; but if possible they are to be saved, however scathed and blackened. Others still there were who were in worse state than the preceding, who were polluted and smirched by the foul contamination of the guilty seducers, and such were to be saved, and the rescuers were to fear lest they should be soiled by contact with the horrible defilement. This is Jude's tremendous summary of the shameful work and frightful evils wrought in the bosom of the church by the libertines. He discloses in these trenchant verses how deeply sunk in the false teaching they were, and how awful the ruin they had wrought. The description is quite unparalleled in 2 Pet. The shadings in Jude are darker and deeper than those in 2 Pet.

The comparison between the two writings warrants, we believe, the following conclusions: (1) 2 Pet. is a letter written to Peter's own church in the OT period of Peter's lifetime. Jude is a letter written perhaps in the opening of the NT period. Jude gives an account of Peter's teaching which was incorporated in the NT period. 2 Pet. is a letter written to the Gentile church in the NT period of Peter's life. Jude gives an account of Peter's teaching which was incorporated in the Gentile church. In 2 Pet. Peter ascribes to Peter the Apostle the authorship of the letter. In Jude, Peter ascribes to Peter the Apostle the authorship of the Epistle. Hence the following conclusions are drawn: (2) 2 Pet. and Jude are both letters written by Peter in the NT period. Jude is more schematic in its condensed form than 2 Pet. 2 Pet. is more continuous in its progressive form than Jude. (3) 2 Pet. and Jude are both letters written by Peter in the NT period. Jude is more schematic in its condensed form than 2 Pet. 2 Pet. is more continuous in its progressive form than Jude. (4) 2 Pet. and Jude are both letters written by Peter in the NT period. Jude is more schematic in its condensed form than 2 Pet. 2 Pet. is more continuous in its progressive form than Jude. (5) The author of 2 Pet. and Jude is Peter. Jude is more schematic in its condensed form than 2 Pet. 2 Pet. is more continuous in its progressive form than Jude.
of the one passage to the other is very close, indeed, they are almost identical. Both urge their readers to remember what had been said by the apostles of the first generation (ch. 16) in order to avoid the immoral scoffers who would invade or had invaded the Christian brotherhood. But Peter distinctly asserts that these mockers shall appear in the last days. His words are, "Knowing this first, that in the last days the scoffers shall come with mockery, walking after their own lusts." Jude writes, "in the last time there shall be mockers, walking after their own ungodly lusts." The phrases, "the last days," and "the last time," denote our age, the dispensation in which we live, as 1 Pet 1:2 proves. Peter puts the appearance of the mockers in the future, whereas Jude, after quoting the words, significantly adds, "These are they who make separations, sensual, having not the Spirit." He means, of course, the mockers just mentioned, and he affirms they are now present. With Peter they are yet to come when he wrote, but with Jude the prediction is already fulfilled, so far as the scoffers are concerned. Therefore Jude's writing is subsequent to Peter's, and if there be copying on the part of either, it is Jude to copying Peter.

Peter mentions "your apostles." Including himself in the phrase, but Jude does not employ the pl., pronoun, for he was not of the apostolic body. But why the pl. "apostles"? Because at least one apostle was spoken of the perilous times which were coming on the church. Paul unites his brother Peter in what Peter, and writes, "But know this, that in the last days grievous times shall come" (2 Tim 3:1–5). His prediction is near akin to that of Peter: it belongs apparently to the same historic time and to the same perilous classes of mockers and corrupters. On 2 Pet 3:15 the apostle lovingly and tenderly speaks of his "brother Paul," and says suggestively that in his Ep. he speaks of these things—no doubt of the scoffers of these last days among the rest. He certainly seems to have Paul in mind when he mentioned the words, "Knowing this first, that in the last days mockers shall come." Here, then, is positive ground for the reference in Jude ver 4 to a writing concerning those who had crept into the fold and who were of old doomed to this condemnation, with which writing his readers were acquainted; they had it in the writing of the apostles Peter and Paul both, and so were forewarned as to the impending danger. Jude's Ep. is a present to Peter's.

V. Date of the Epistle.—There is little or no agreement as to the year, yet the majority of writers hold that it belongs to the latter half of the 1st cent. Zahn assigns it to 70–75 AD; Lumbly, c 80 AD; Salmon, before the reign of Domitian (81 AD); Salmon, however, particularly, prior to Domitian than 80 AD, probably within a year or two of the Pastoral Epp. Zahn strongly insists on 64 AD as the date of Peter's death. If the 2d Ep. bearing his name is authentic, the apostle could not possibly have copied from Jude, for Jude's letter was not in existence when he died. Even on the supposition that he suffered death 65–66 AD, there could have been no copying done save by Jude, for it is almost demonstrable that Jude was written after the destruction of Jerusalem (70 AD). If 2 Pet is pseudo-epigraphous and written about the middle of the 2d cent., as some confidently affirm, it has no right to a place in the Canon nor any legitimate relation to Jude. If genuine, it antedates Jude.

VI. The Libertines of Jude's Epistle.—Their characteristics forcibly exhibited, but no information is given us of their origin or to what particular region they belonged. They bore the Christian name, were of the lowest morals, and were guilty of shameful excesses. Their influence seems to have been widespread among people of more elevated station than 2 Pet would assign them in such severe language. Their guilty departure from the truth must not be confounded with the Gnosticism of the 2d cent., though it tended strongly in that direction; it was a 1st-cent. defection. Were they newly risen sensualists, without predecessors? To some extent their forerunners had already appeared. Sensuality in some of its grosser forms disgraced the church at Corinth (1 Cor 6:1–13; 6:13–20). In the common meals of this Lord's day speak of devout and orderly mockers, who would invade or had invaded the Christian brotherhood. But Peter distinctly asserts that these mockers shall appear in the last days. His words are, "Knowing this first, that in the last days the scoffers shall come with mockery, walking after their own lusts." Jude writes, "in the last time there shall be mockers, walking after their own ungodly lusts." Were they newly risen sensualists, without predecessors? To some extent 13–26; Dt 1:9–17). This arrangement ceased to be practicable when the children of Israel settled down in Canaan. Although David took counsel with the heads of thousands and hundreds (1 Ch 13:1), it need not be assumed that this was a continuation of the plan adopted by Moses, who was not organized till the time of David. In the days of the Judges justice was administered by those who had risen by wisdom or valor to that rank (Jgs 4:5). An organized circuit court was established by Samuel, who judged cases himself, and also made his sons judges (1 S 7:16; 8:1). After the monarchy was instituted, the king tried all cases, when requested to do so by the wronged person, in the palace gate (1 K 7:7; Prov 20:8). There was no public prosecutor (2 S 14:4; 15:2–6; 1 Ch 18:14; 1 K 3:16; 2 K 15:5). Under David and Solomon there were probably local courts (1 Ch 23:4; 26:29). Jehoshaphat organized a high court of justice (2 Ch 19:8). The prophets often complain bitterly that the purity of justice is corrupted by bribery and false witness (Isa 1:23; 5:23; 10:1; Am 5:12; 6:12; Mic 3:11; 7:3; Prov 6:19; 12:17; 18:5). Even kings sometimes pronounced unjust sentences, esp. in (1 S 22:21–22; 1 K 22:26; 2 K 21:16; Jer 36:26). An evil king could also bend local courts to do his will, as may be gathered from the case of Naboth’s vineyard (1 K 21:1–13).

The first duty of a judge was to execute absolute justice, showing the same impartiality to rich and poor, to Jew and foreigner. He was forbidden to accept bribes or to wrest the judgment of the poor (Ex 23:6–8; Dt 16:19). He must not let himself be swayed by popular opinion, or unduly favor the poor (Ex 23:2). The court was open to the public (Ex 18:13; Ruth 4:12). Each party presented his view of the case to the judge (Dt 1:16; 25:1). Possibly the accused appeared in court clad in mourning (Zec 3:3). The accuser stood on the right hand of the accused (Zec 3:1; Ps 100:6). Sentence was pronounced after the hearing of the case, and the judgment carried out (Josh 7:24,25). The only evidence considered by the court was that given by the witnesses. In criminal cases, not less than two witnesses were necessary (Dt 19:15; Nu 30:13; Dt 17:6; cf Mt 18:16; 2 Cor 13:1; 1 Tim 5:19). In cases other than criminal the oath (see Oath) was applied (Ex 22:11; cf He 6:16). The lot was sometimes appealed to (Josh 7:14–18), especially in private disputes (Prov 18:18), but this was exceptional. When the law was not quite definite, recourse was had to the Divine oracle (Lev 24:12; Nu 15:34).

The Eng. name of the Book of Jgs is a tr of the Heb title (כְּרִיטָן, shoph'tan), which is reproduced in the Gr Κρίται, Krítaí, and the Lat Libri dicitur. In the list of the canonical books of the OT given by Origen (apud Euseb., HE, VI, 25) the name is transcribed Καρτίας, Sarathém, which represents rather "judgments" (shoph'tan; κρίματα, krimata) than "judges." A passage also is quoted from Philo (De Confus. Linguarum, 26), which indicates that he recognized the same form of the name; compare the Gr title of "Kingdoms" (Βασιλεία, Basileia) for the four books of S and K.

In the order of the Heb Canon the Book of Jgs invariably occupies the 7th place, following immediately after the Book of Joshua. Probably upon these premises this is regarded as the "earlier prophets" (לְבָתיִים, rišhā'im), the first moiety of the 3d great division of the Heb Scriptures. As the Book of Jgs was classified and regarded as "prophetic," equally with the other historical books, on the ground of the religious and spiritual content of its history conveyed. In the rearrangement of the books, which was undertaken for the purposes of the Gr Canon, Jgs maintained its position as 7th in order from the beginning, but the short historical Book of Ruth was removed from the place which it held among the Rolls (נְגֵמִיָּה), in the 3d division of the Jewish Canon, and added to its end as a kind of appendix, probably because the narrative was understood to presuppose the same conditions and to have reference to the same period of time. The Gr order was followed in all later VSS, and has maintained itself in modern Bibles. Origen (loc. cit.) even states, probably by a mere misunderstanding, that Jgs and Ruth were comprehended by the Jews under the one title Saphathem.

The Book of Jgs consists of 3 main parts or divisions, which are readily distinguishable.

2. Place in the Canon (2:6–16).—A brief summary and recapitulation of the events of the conquest of Western Palestine, for the most part parallel to the narrative of Josh, but with a few additional details and some divergences from the earlier account, emphasizing (2:17–36) the general failure of the Israelites to expel completely the original inhabitants of the land, which is described as a violation of their covenant with Jeh (2:1–3), entailing upon them suffering and permanent weakness. The introductory ver (1:1), which refers to the death of Joshua as having already taken place, seems to be intended as a general indication of the historical period of the book as a whole; for some at least of the events narrated in 1–2:5 took place during Joshua’s lifetime.

(2) The central and main portion (2:6–16).—A series of narratives of 12 "judges," each of whom in turn, by his devotion and prowess, was enabled to deliver Israel from thraldom and oppression, and for a longer or shorter term ruled over the people whom he had thus saved from their enemies. Each successive repentance on the part of the people, however, and their deliverance are followed, on the death of the judge, by renewed apostasy, by which means God entails upon them renewed misery and servitude, from which they are again rescued when in response to their prayer the Lord "raises up" for them another judge and deliverer. Thus the entire history is set as it were in a recurrent framework of moral and religious teaching and warning; and the lesson is enforced that it is the sin of the people, their abandonment of Jeh and persistent idolatry, which entails upon them calamity, from which the Divine long-suffering and forbearance alone makes for them a way of escape.

(a) 2:6–3:6: A second brief introduction, conceived entirely in the spirit of the following narratives, which seems to attach itself to the close of the Book of Josh, and in part repeats almost verbatim the account there given of the story of the land, of Israel’s leader (Jgs 2:6–9 | Josh 24:28–31), and proceeds to describe the condition of the land and people in the succeeding generation, ascribing their misfortunes to their idolatry and repeated neglect of the warnings and commandments of the judge of Israel’s land, whose presence was to be the test of Israel’s willingness to obey Jeh and at the same time to prevent the nation from sinking into a condition of lethargy and ease.
(b) 3 7–3 11: Judgeship of Othniel who delivered Israel from the hand of Cushan-rishathaim.

c) 3 12–30: Victory of Ehud over the Moabites, to whom the Israelites had been in servitude 18 years. Ehud slew their king Eglon, and won for the 7th year of his period of tranquility. (d) 3 31: In a brief words Shamgar is named as the deliverer of Israel from the Philis. The title of "judge" is not accorded to him, nor is he said to have exercised authority in any way. It is doubtfull whether the writer intended him to be regarded as one of the judges.

e) Chs 4, 5: Victory of Deborah and Barak over Jabin the Can. king, and death of Sisera, captain of his army, at the hands of Jael, the wife of a Kenite chief; followed by a Song of Triumph, descriptive and commemorative of the event.

(f) Chs 6–8: A 7-year oppression at the hands of the Midianites, which is described as peculiarly severe, so that the land became desolate on account of the perpetual raids to which it was subject. After a period of hesitation and delay, Gideon defeats the combined forces of the Midianites and Amalekites and the "children of the east," i.e. the wandering Bedawins from the eastern deserts, in the valley of Jerreel. The locality and course of the battle is described by the poet and it is not possible to follow his account in detail because of our inability to identify the places named. After the victory, Gideon is formally offered the position of ruler for himself and his descendants, but refuses; nevertheless, he seems to have exercised a measure of restraining influence over the people until his death, although he himself and his family apparently through covetousness fell away from their faithful to Jeh (8 27–33).

(g) Ch 9: The judgeship of Abimelech, son of Gideon by a concubine, who by the murder of all but one of his brethren, the legitimate sons of Gideon, secured the throne at Shechem for himself, and for 3 years ruled Israel. After successfully stamping out a revolt at Shechem against his authority, he is himself killed when engaged in the siege of the citadel or tower of Thebez by a stone thrown by a woman.

(h) Chs 10–16: Tola and Jair are briefly named as successive judges of Israel for 29 and 22 years respectively.

(i) Chs 10–12: 7: Oppression of Israel for 18 years by the Philis and Ammonites. The national deliverance is effected by Jephthah, who is described as an illegitimate son of Gilead, and who had been cast out of his account driven out from his home and had become the captain of a band of outlaws. Jephthah stipulates with the elders of Gilead that if he undertakes to do battle on their behalf with the Ammonites, he is afterward to be recognized as their ruler; and in accordance with the agreement, when the victory has been won, he becomes judge over Israel (11 9; 12 7). See JEPHTHAH.

(i) Chs 12, 13: 7: Three of the so-called "minor" judges, i.e., Gideon, Tola, and Jair, judged Israel in succession for 7, 10 and 8 years respectively. As they are not said to have delivered the nation from any calamity or oppression, it is perhaps to be understood that the whole period was a time of rest and tranquility.

(j) Chs 13–16: The history of Samson (see separate art.).

(3) An appendix, chs 17–21.—The final section, in the nature of an appendix, consisting of two narratives, independent apparently of the main portion of the book and of one another. They contain no indication of date, except the statement 4 it repeated that "in those days there was no king in Israel" (17 6; 18 1; 19 1; 21 25). The natural inference is that the narratives were committed to writing in the days of the monarchy; but the events themselves were understood by the compiler or historian to have taken place during the period of the Judges, or at least anterior to the establishment of the kingdom. The lawless state of society, the violence and disorder among the tribes, would seem the most probable conclusion. No name of a judge appears, however, and there is no direct reference to the office or to any central or controlling authority. Jos also seems to have known them in reverse order, and in the position preceding the histories of the judges themselves, and not at the close of the book (Ant. V, ii, 8–12; iii, 1; see E. König in HDB, II, 810). Even if the present form of the narratives is thus late, there can be little doubt that they contain elements of considerable antiquity.

(a) Chs 17–18: The episode of Micah the Epherait and the young Levite who is consecrated as priest in his house. A war party, however, of the tribe of Dan during a migration northward, by threats and promises induced the Levite to accompany them, taking with him the priestly ephod, the household goods of his patron, and a costly image which Micah had caused to be made. These Micah in vain endeavors to recover from the Danites. The latter sack and burn Laish in the extreme N. of Canaan, and renaming it "Dan," they set up the image which they had stolen, and establish a rival priesthood and worship, which is said to have endured "all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh" (18 31).

(b) Chs 19–21: Outrage of the Benjamites of Gibeon against the concubine of a Levite lodging for a night in the city on his way from Bethlehem to the hill country of Ephraim. The united tribes, after twice suffering defeat at Gibeah, and the might of Benjamin, exact full vengeance; the tribe of Benjamin is almost annihilated, and their cities, including Gibeon, are destroyed. In order that the tribe may not utterly perish, peace is declared with the 600 survivors, and they are provided with wives by stratagem and force, the Israelites having taken a solemn vow not to permit intermarriage between their own daughters and the members of the guilty tribe. The period covered by the history of the Book of Jgs extends from the death of Joshua to the death of Samson, and adds perhaps a later reference in 18 31, "all the time that the house of God was in Shiloh," (cf 18 31). It is, perhaps impossible, to compute in years the length of time that the writer had in mind. That he proceeded upon a fixed chronological basis, supplied probably by tradition but modified or arranged on a systematic principle, seems evident. The difficulty may be due in part to the corruption which the figures have suffered in the course of the transmission of the text. In 1 K 6 1 an inclusive total of 480 years is given as the period from the Exodus to the building of the Temple in Abin, judged Israel in succession for 7, 10 and 8 years respectively. As they are not said to have delivered the nation from any calamity or oppression, it is perhaps to be understood that the whole period was a time of rest and tranquility.

4. Chronology. — The period of the Judges is uncertain, and the date of the Book of Joshua referred to the 4th year of the reign of Solomon. This total, however, includes the 40 years wandering in the desert, the time occupied in the conquest and settlement of the Promised Land, and an uncertain period after the death of Joshua, referred to in the Book of Jgs itself (8 10) until the older generation that had taken part in the invasion had passed away. There is also to be reckoned the 40 years' judgeship of Eli (1 S 4 18), the unknown length of the judgeship of Samuel (7 15), the years of the reign of Saul (cf 1 S 13 1, where, however, no statement is made as to the length of his reign), the 40 years during which David was king (1 K 2 11), and the 4 years of Solomon before the building of the Temple. The recurrence of the number 40 is already noticeable; but if for the unknown periods under and after Joshua, of Samuel and of Saul, 50 or 60 years he allowed—a moderate estimate—there would remain from the total of 480 years a period of 300 years in round numbers or a fraction of the time of the Judges. It may be doubted whether the writer conceived of the period of unsettlement and distress, of alternate oppression and peace, as lasting for so long a time.

It has been supposed that in some instances the rule of the several judges was contemporaneous, not successive, and that therefore the total period during which the judges ruled should be reduced accordingly. It has been considered sufficiently probable that this is the case, and that it is in the mind of the writer, for in each case he describes the rule of the judge as over "Israel" with no indication that "Israel" is to be understood in a partial and limited sense. His words must therefore be interpreted in their natural sense, that in his own belief the rulers who succeeded him exercised control in the order named over the entire nation. Almost certainly, however, he did not intend to include in his scheme the years of oppression or the 3 years of Abimelech's rule. If these be deducted, the resultant number (296) is very near the total which the statement in 1 K 6:1 suggests.

No stress, however, must be laid upon this fact. The repeated occurrence of the number 40, with its double and half, can hardly be accidental. The same fact was noted above in connection with earlier and later rules in Israel. It suggests that there is present an element of artifice and conscious arrangement in the scheme of chronology, which makes it impossible to rely upon it as it stands for any definite or reliable historical conclusion.

Within the Book of Jgs itself no author is named, nor is any indication given of the writer or writers who are responsible for the form in which the book appears; and it would seem evident, also, that the 3 parts or divisions of which the book is composed are on a different footing as regards the sources from which they are drawn. The Talmudic tradition which names Samuel as the author can hardly be seriously regarded. The historical introduction of the traditional narrative of the conquest of Palestine is parallel to but not identical with that contained in the Book of Josh. Brief and disconnected as it is, it is of the greatest value as a historical commentary and contains elements which bear in origin, if not in their present form, of considerable antiquity. The main portion of the book, comprising the narratives of the judges, is based upon oral or written traditions of a local and perhaps a tribal character, the value of which is enhanced by the fact that unembodied in some instances have been more carefully preserved than in others.

In particular, around the story of Samson there seem to have gathered elements derived from the folklore and the wonder-lending spirit of the countryside; and the exploits of the national hero have been enshrined in song and opera, surrounded with a glamour of romance as the story of them has passed from lip to lip among a people who themselves or their forefathers owed so much to his prowess. Of this central part of Jgs the Song of Deborah (chs. 4, 5) is the most ancient, and bears every mark of being a contemporary record of a remarkable conflict and victory. The text is often difficult, almost unintelligible, and has so greatly suffered in the course of transmission as in some passages to be beyond repair. As a whole the song is an eloquent and impassioned ode of triumph, ascribing to Jeh the great deliverance which has been wrought for His people over their foes.

The narratives of Jgs, moreover, are set in a framework of chronology and of ethical comment and teaching, which are probably independent of one another. The moral exhortations and the lessons drawn from hardships and sufferings, which the people of Israel incur as the consequence of their disobedience, are conceived as a divine arrangement of events, and the general idea of the book is that of a people suffering under the oppression of kings, with occasional periods of deliverance, who were led to repentance and to a recognition of the goodness of God in delivering them, and who were brought to acknowledge the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob as the God of Israel. It is the religious conviction and ethical teaching that is predominant in the writings of that book. In the judgment of some scholars, therefore, they are to be ascribed to the same author or authors. Of this, however, there is no positive evidence, and it is perhaps hardly probable. They certainly belong to the same school of thought, of clear-sighted doctrine, of reverent piety, and of jealous concern for the honor of Jeh. With the system of chronology, the figures and dates, the ethical commentary and inferences would seem to have no direct relation. The former is perhaps a later addition, based in part at least upon tradition, and applied to existing accounts, in order to give them their definite place and succession in the historical record. Finally, the three strands of traditional narrative, moral comment, and chronological framework were woven into one whole by a compiler or reviser who completed the book in the form in which it now exists. Concerning the absolute dates, however, at which these processes took place very little can be determined.

The two concluding episodes are distinct, both in form and character, from the rest of the book. They do not describe the life or deeds of a judge, nor do they, at least, convey any moral teaching or warning. They are also mutually independent. It would seem therefore that they are independent of the scheme of dates and events or experiences, preserved by tradition, which, because they were not understood to have been part of the period of the Judges, were included in this book. Without the internal nature of the narratives themselves we should suggest that they belong rather to the earlier than to the later part of the time during which the judges held rule; and because their character is similarly attested. There is no clue, however, to the actual date of their composition, or to the time or circumstances under which they were incorporated in the Book of Jgs.

The discussion of the relation of the Book of Jgs to the generally recognized sources of the Pent and to Jgs has been in part anticipated in the previous paragraph. In the earliest introductory section of the book, and in the final exhortation, a form of the historical introduction of the Pent is presented, and this in the form of a form of the Pent "sources" are in great measure absent. There is more to be said for the view that regards the introduction (1—2 and 1o), with its verbal parallels to Josh and Judges, and which undoubtedly from the Pent, to which, however, very much has been omitted, and the remainder adapted and abbreviated. Even this moderate conclusion cannot be regarded as definitely established. The later author or compiler was in possession of ancient documents or traditions, of which he made use in his composite narrative, but whether these were parts of the same book or fragments on the lines of the book is not known. Moses and in Josh must be regarded as undetermined. There is no trace, moreover, in Jgs of extracts from the writing or school of P; nor do the two concluding episodes of the book (chs 17-21) provide any means by which to attach an identification with any of the leading "sources" of the Pent.

The moral and religious teaching, on the other hand, which makes the varied experiences in the times of the Judges a vehicle for ethical instruction and warning, is certainly derived from the same school as Dt, and reproduces the whole tone and spirit of that book. There is no evidence, however, to identify the writer or reviser who thus turned to spiritual profit the lessons of the age of the Judges with the author of Dt itself, but he was animated by the same principles, and endeavored in the same way to expound the same great truths of religion and the Providence of God.

There are two early Gr tr of the Book of Jgs, which seem to be one whole independent of another. These are represented by the two great schools of criticism: (1) the Alexandrian, and (2) the Ethiopic. With the former is associated a group of cursive MSS and the Sahidic or Upper Egyptian text, VS. It is therefore probable that the tr is of Egyptian origin, and by some it has been identified with that of Hebrew. It has been shown, moreover, that in this book, and probably elsewhere, the ancient character of the text of B is not always maintained, but in parts at least betrays a later origin. The other VS which is contained in A and the majority of the uncial and cursive MSS of the Gr texts, and, while certainly a real and independent tr from the original, is thought by some to show acquaintance with the VS of B. There is, however, no definite evidence that B's tr is really older. Some of the critics who deal with A are in council with A form sub-groups; thus the reception of Lucian is believed to be represented by a small number of cursives, the text of which is printed by Lagarde (Liberum VT Canoniconum, Para Prior, 1883), and is substantially identical with that in the "Complutensian Polyglot." (See F. G. Moore, Critical and Exegetical Comm, on Jgs, Edinburgh, 1895, 811 f). It is probable that the true original text of the LXX is not entirely preserved in A, but is represented completely either by the one VS or the other VS, but that it partially underlies both, and may have been in the conflicting readings which must be judged each on its own merits.

Of the other principal VSS, the Old Lat and the Ethiopic, the former, with the Aramaic, and the latter with the Aramaic, have attached themselves to a sub-group of the MSS associated with A. The agreement of the LXX of the Book of Jgs has not hitherto been published, but, like the rest of the OT, it text would no doubt be found to agree substantially with B. Jerome's tr follows closely the MT, and is independent of both Gr VSS; and the Pesh is also a direct rendering from the Heb.

Thus the main purpose of the Book of Jgs in the form in which it has been preserved in the OT is not to record Israel's past for its own sake, or to place before the writer's own eyes the events of his own day, but to use these events and the national experiences of adversity as a text from which to deduce religious warning and instruction. With the author or authors, spiritual edification is the first interest, and the facts or details of the history, while a faithful record that was for all time, could not fail to entail the same disadvantages. The author is primarily a preacher of righteousness to his fellow-countrymen, and to this aim all other elements in the book, whether chronological or historical, are secondary and subordinate. In his narrative he sets down the whole truth, so far as it has become known to him through tradition or written document, however discreditable it may be to his nation. There is no ground for believing that he either ignored or misrepresents on the lines of the other trs or in dark colors than the record of the transgressions of the people deserved. Neither he nor they are to be judged by the standards of the 20th cent., with its accumulated wealth of spiritual experience and long training in the principles of righteousness and truth. But he holds and asserts a lofty view of the character of Jeh, of the immutability of His wrath against obstinate transgression and the certainty of its punishment, and yet of the Divine pitifulness and mercy to the man or nation that turns to Him with a penitent heart. The Jews were not mistaken when they counted the Book of Jgs among the Prophets. It is prophecy, more than history, because it exhibits and enforces the permanent lessons of the righteousness and justice and loving-kindness of God.

LITERATURE

I. Sources.—Our chief sources of information are the Book of Jgs and 1 S 1-12. The material contained in these is not all of the same age. The oldest part, by common consent, is the Song of Deborah (Jgs 5). It is a contemporaneous document. The period of the Judges is reckoned too early, and are generally regarded as presenting a faithful picture of the times with which they deal. The Book of Ruth, which also refers to this period, is probably in its present form a later composition, but there is no adequate ground for denying to it a historical basis (König, Einleitung, 286 f; Kent, Student's OT, I, 810 f).

II. Chronology.—The period of the Judges extends from the death of Joshua to the establishment of the monarchy. How long a time elapsed between these limits is a matter of wide difference of opinion. The chronological data in the Book of Jgs, i.e. omitting Ed and Samuel, make a total of 410 years. But this is inconsistent with 1 K 6 1, where the whole period from the Exodus to the 4th year of Solomon is reckoned at 480 years. Various attempts have been made to harmonize these diverging figures, e.g. by eliminating the 70 years attributed to the Minor Judges (10 1-5; 12 7-15), by not counting the 71 years of foreign domination, and by the theory that some of the judges were contemporaneous. It is probable that the 480 years in Ex 1-6 was a round number, based on the 250 years of the exact records. Indeed, it is doubtful if there was any fixed calendar in Israel before the time of the monarchy.

The only way then to determine the length of the period of the Judges is from the date of the Exodus. The common view is that Exodus took place during or just before the reign of Merenptah in the latter half of the 13th cent. BC. This, however, leaves hardly more than 150 years to the period of the Judges, which fell in the 2d half of the 12th cent. BC. Hence some, to whom this seems too short, assign the Exodus to the reign of Amenophis II, about 1450 BC. This harmonizes with the 480 years of 1 K 8:1, and is supported by other indications (P.O.R. 420-24). Still others had connected the Exodus with the expulsion of the Hyksos about 1550 BC (G. A. Reisner); and this would fit in very well with the chronological data of the Book of Judges. The objection to the last two views is that they require a too long period of subjection of the Israelites in Canaan to Egypt, of which there is no trace in the Book of Jgs. See, further, Judges, Book of, IV.

III. General Political Situation.—The death of Joshua left much land yet to be possessed by the Israelites. The different tribes had

1. The Canaanites (Jgs 1:3), but the actual possession of the territory assigned each still lay in the future and was only gradually achieved. The Canaanites remained in the land, and were for a time a serious menace to the power of Israel. They retained possession of the plains and many of the fortified cities, e.g. Gezer, Harareb, Ajalon, Shaalhim, and Jerus on the northern border of Judah (Jgs 1:21-29:35), and Bethshan, Bileam, Taanach, Megiddo along the northern border of Manasseh (Jgs 1:27:8).

Besides these foes within Canaan, the Israelites had enemies from without to contend with, viz. the Moabites, Midianites, Ammonites, and Philistines. The Israelites in the plains were still the centres of a system of international arrangement, and from this such united action is clearly taught in the Song of Deborah, at least so far as the 10 northern tribes are concerned. The omission of Judah and Simeon from this ancient song is strange, but may not be so significant as sometimes supposed. The judges, who were raised up to meet the various emergencies, seem to have exercised jurisdiction only over limited areas. In general the different tribes and clans acted independently of each other. Local home rule prevailed. "Every man did that which was right in his own eyes" (Jgs 17:6).

That Canaan was not during this period subdued and kept in subjection by one of the great world-powers, Egypt or Babylonia, is to be regarded as providential (Jgs 1:21-28). The Canaanites each of these tribes were all more or less local in character. In no case did they act together, through the duty of their Elect, and such united action is clearly taught in the Song of Deborah, at least so far as the 10 northern tribes are concerned. a people with fixed institutions, customs and ideas. When then Israel settled in Canaan, they had both a heathen inheritance and a heathen environment to contend with. It should therefore occasion no surprise to find during this period such lapses from the purity of the Mosaic faith as appear in the ephod of Gideon (Jgs 8:24–27), the images of Micah (Jgs 17:3–18), and the sacrifice of Jephthah’s daughter (11:24–30). In the transition from a nomadic to an agricultural life it was inevitable that the Hebrews with their native heathen proclivities would adopt many of the crude and even immoral religious customs and beliefs of the people among whom they settled. But the purer Mosaic faith still had its representatives. The worship of the central sanctuary at Shiloh remained imieselors. Leaders like Deborah and Samuel revived the spirit of Moses. And there can hardly be a doubt that in many a quiet home a true and earnest piety was cultivated like that in the home of Elisheva and NaOMI.

VI. THEOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION.—The Bib. historian was not content simply to narrate events. What concerned him most was the meaning lying behind these things. He was interested in them, not for its own sake, but because of its application to the people of his own day. Hence intermingled with the narratives of the period of the Judges are to be found religious interpretations of the recorded events and exhortations based upon them. The fundamental lesson thus inculcated is the same as that continually insisted upon by the prophets. The Divine government of the world is based upon justice. Disobedience to the moral law and disloyalty to Jehovah are means, therefore, to Israel’s suffering and disaster. All the oppressions of the period of the Judges arose in this way. Relief and deliverance came only when the people turned unto Jehovah. This religious pragmatism, as it is called, does not lie on the surface of the events, so that a naturalistic historian might see it. But it is a correlate of the ethical monotheism of the prophets, and constitutes the one element in the OT which makes the study of Israel’s history supremely worth while.

JUDGMENT, JU'jment, jü'ment: Often in the OT for "to act as a magistrate" (Ex 18:13; Dt 1:16; 16:18, etc.), justice being administered generally by "elders" (Ex 18:13-27), or "kings" (1 S 8:20) or "priests" (Dt 18:15). Applied to God as the Supreme Judge (Ps 9:7; 10:18; 96:13; Mic 4:3, etc.; Ps 7:8, "Jeh. ministereth judgment," vividly describes a court scene, with Jeh as Judge).

Often in the NT, ethically, for (1) "to decide," "give a verdict," "declare an opinion" (Gr krinó); (2) "to investigate," "scrutinize," "inquire" (Gr anakrinó); (3) "to discriminate," "distinguish" (Gr diakrinó). For (1), see Lk 7:43; Acts 15:19; for (2) see 1 Cor 2:15; 4:3; for (3) see 1 Cor 11:11; 14:29 m. Used also forensically in Lk 22:30; Acts 25:10; and applied to God in Jl 6:22; He 10:30. The judgments of God are the expression of His justice, the formal declarations of His judgments, whether embodied in words (Dt 6:1 AV, RV "statutes"), or deeds (Ex 6:6; Rev 16:7), or in decisions that are yet to be published (2 Cor 2:7). Man’s consciousness of God inevitably associates God’s judgments as declarations of the Divine justice, with his own condemnation, i.e., he knows that a strict exercise of justice means his condemnation, and thus "judgment" and "condemnation" become in his mind synonymous (Rom 5:16); hence the prayer of Ps 143:2, "Enter not into judgment!"; also, Jn 6:29, "the resurrection of judgment!" (AV "damnation"); 1 Cor 11:29, "eateth and drinketh judgment!" (AV "damnation").

JUDGMENT HALL, ju'jment hól (τὸ πρατηρίων, τὸ πρατηρίων, "then led they Jesus . . . unto the hall of judgment . . . and they themselves went not into the judgment hall" [Jn 18:28 AV]; "Then Pilate entered into the judgment hall again" [18:33 AV]; "Pilate went again into the judgment hall" [19:9], "He commanded him to be kept in Herod's judgment hall," in the passages in the Gospels, ARV renders uniformly "Praetorium.")

The word originally meant the headquarters in the Roman camp, the space where the general’s tent stood, with the camp altar; the tent of the commander-in-chief. It next came to mean the military council, meeting in the general’s tent. Then it came to be applied to the palace in which the Roman governor or procurator of a province resided. In Jerusalem it was the magnificent. palace which Herod the Great had built for himself, and which the Roman procurators seem to have occupied when they came from Caesarea to Jerusalem to transact public business.

Praetorium in Phil 1:13 has been variously rendered, "the camp of the praetorian soldiers," "the praetorian guard," etc. For what is now believed to be its true meaning, see Praetorium.

JOHN RUTHERFORD

JUDGMENT, LAST: In Christian theology the Last Judgment is an act in which God interposes directly into human history, brings the course of this world to a final close, determines the eternal fate of human beings, and places them in surrounding spiritual and social conditions.

The concept is purely transcendental, and is to be distinguished from the hope that God will interfere in the history of the world to determine it undeniably toward good. The transcendental doctrine is possible only when an exalted idea of God has been attained, although it may afterward be united with crasser theologies, as in certain naive conceptions of Christianity at the present day.

In the religion of Israel, the doctrine of the Last Judgment arose from "transcendental" speculation, and the concept of the "Day of the Lord." 2. The Just as hope of immortality replaced Doctrine in desire for length of days on earth, just so the Religion as for "the rejuvenation of Pal" was of Israel substituted "an eternal abode in a new earth," so the ideal of a military victory over Israel’s enemies expanded into God’s solemn condemnation of evil. The concept thus strictly defined is hardly to be sought in the OT, but Dt 12:1–3 may contain it. The idea of a final withdrawal would appear to be in En 91:17, where the final state is contrasted with a preceding reign of earthly happiness. (If there has been no redaction in the latter part of this section, its date is prior to 165 BC. Hereafter the idea is so pervasive in the Jewish writings that detailed reference is needless. But it is by no means universal. Writings touched with Gr thought (En 108; 4 Macce; Philochor) are content with an individual judgment at death. A unique theory is that of the Test. XII P (Levir 18 8-14, e.g.), where the world grows into final blessedness without catastrophe. But much more common is the notion transcedent to the Book ideas, ingrained as they were in the thought of the people (even in Philo; of his prophecy of national earthly glory in Ezrr 9). This type of thought was so tenacious that it held its own alongside of the transcendental, and both points of view were accepted by more than one writer. Then the earthly happiness precedes the heavenly (as in En 91), and there are two judgments, one by the Messiah and the other by God (2 Esd 7; Sir Bar 29, 30). So in Rev, where in ch. 19 Christ overcomes the enemy in battle-symbolism and establishes the Millennium, while the Last Judgment is held by God (20 11 ff). Otherwise the Messiah is never the judge except in the Parables of Enoch, where He appears as God's vicar uniformly (as in 47 3 God first comes on the scene in

I. NAME.—This apocryphal book is called after the name of its principal character Judith (יוֹדִית, ydōtith, "a Jewess"); (יוֹדִית, ydōdith, Ἰουδίθ, ioōdith). The name occurs in Gen 26 34 and the corresponding masc. form (יוֹדִית, ydōtith, "a Jew"). In Jer 36 14.21.23 (name of a scribe). In other great crises in Heb history women have played a great part (cf Deborah, Jgs 5, and Esther). The Books of Ruth, Est, Jth and Susannah are the only ones in the Bible (including the Apoc) called by the names of women, these women being the principal characters in each case.

II. Canonity.—Though a taste of Jewish patriotism written originally in Heb, this book was never admitted into the Heb Canon, and the same with the Book of Tob. But both Jth and Tob were recognized as canonical by the Council of Carthage (397 AD) and by the Council of Trent (1545 AD). Though, however, all Romanists include these books in their Bible (the Vulg), Protestant VSS of the Bible, as well as the Apocyplysean, exclude the whole of the Apoc (see Apocypula). In the 1.XX and Vulg, Tob and Jth (in that order) follow Nêb and precede Est. In the Ev of the Apoc, which unfortunately for its understanding stands alone, 1. Esd, Tob, Jth and natural science, occupy the first place and in the order named. In his tr of the Apoc, Luther, for some unexplained reason, puts Jth at the head of the apocryphal books, Wisdom taking the next place.

III. CONTENTS.—The book opens with an account of the immense power of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Assyria, whose capital was Nineveh. (In the days of the real Nebuchadnezzar, Assyria had ceased to be, and its capital was destroyed.) He calls upon the peoples living in the western country, including Pal, to help him to subdue a rival king whose power he feared—Arphaxad, king of the Medes (otherwise quite unknown). But as they refused the help he demanded, he first conquered his rival, annexing his territory, and then sent his general Holofernes to subdue the western nation for his defence of his authority. The Assyrian general marched at the head of an army 132,000 strong and soon took possession of the lands N. and E. of Pal, demolishing their idols and sanctuaries that Nebuchadnezzar alone might be worshipped as god (chs 1-3). He now directed his forces against the Jews who had recently returned from exile and newly rebuilt and reestablished their temple. Having heard of the ruin of other temples caused by the invading foe, the Jews became greatly alarmed for the safety of their own, and fortified the mountains and villages in the south, providing themselves with food to meet their needs in the event of war. At the urgent request of Joakim ("Eliakein" in the Vulg and Pes), the inhabitants of Bethulia (so the Lat., Eng., and other VSS, but Bethulia, Betulia is more correct according to the Gr) and of Bethemetham (both places otherwise unknown) defended the adjoining mountain passes which commanded the way to Bethulia, once laid siege to Bethulia, and by cutting off the water supply aimed at starving the people to submission. But he knew little of the people he is seeking to conquer, and asks the chiefs who are with him who and what these Jews are. Achior, the Ammonite chief, gives an account of the Israelites, con-

The author had no intention to teach history. Torrey, however, goes too far when he says (see Jew Enc, “Book of Jtt”) that the writer aimed at nothing more than to write a tale that would amuse. A tone of religious fervor and of intense patriotism runs through the narrative, and no opportunity of enforcing the claims of the Jewish law is lost. Note the place, what is it in the course of five days. A rich, devout and beautiful widow called Judith (daughter of Merari, of the tribe of Simeon [8 1]), hearing of these things, rebukes the murmurers for their lack of faith and exhorts them to be true to their Nabi.

As Onias, by his providence to the people, she resolves to attempt another mode of deliverance. She obtains consent to leave the fortress in the dead of night, accompanied by her maidservant, in order to join the Assyry camp. First of all she prays earnestly for guidance and success; then doffing her mourning garb, she puts on her most gorgeous attire together with jewels and other ornaments. She takes with her food allowed by Jewish law, that she might have no necessity to eat the forbidden meats of the Gentiles. Passing through the camp, she soon reaches the Assyrians. First of all, the soldiers on watch take her captive, but on her assuring them that she is a fugitive from the Hebrews and desires to put Holophernes in the way of achieving a cheap and easy victory, she is allowed to proceed on her way; and at long last, she is warmly welcomed and made much of. She reiterates to Holophernes the doctrine taught by Achior that these Jews can easily be conquered when they break the laws of their Deity, and she knows the necessities of their situation would lead them to eat food prohibited in their sacred laws, and when this takes place she informs him that he might at once attack them. Holophernes listens, applauds, and is at once captured by her personal charms. He agrees to her proposal and consents that she and her maid should be allowed each night to say their prayers out in the valley near the Heb fortress. On the 4th night after her arrival, Holophernes arranges a banquet to which only his household servants and the two Jewses are invited. When all is over, by a preconcerted plan the Assyrian general and the beautiful Jewish widow are left alone. He, however, is dead drunk and heavily asleep. With his own scimitar she cuts off his head, calls her maid with the proposal the previous night, and together they leave the camp as if for their usual prayers and join their Heb compatriots, still frantic about the immediate future. But the sight of the head of their arch foe puts new heart into them, and next day they make proposal to the prince of the land what had happened, and win an easy victory. Judith became ever after a heroine in Jewish romance and poetry, a Heb Joan of Arc, and the tale of the deliverance she wrought for her people has been told in many languages. For later and shorter forms of the tale see VII, 4 (Heb Midrashes).

IV. Fact or Fiction?—The majority of theologians down to the 19th. cent. regarded the story of Jtt as pure history; but with the exception of O. Wolf (1861) and von Gumpach, Protestant scholars in recent times have agreed that the Book of Jtt is a historical novel with a purpose similar to Dnt, Est and Tob. Schurer classes it with “parenthetic narrations” (parastatische Erzählung). The Heb novel is perhaps the earliest of all novels, but it is always a derivative written entirely on the principle or principles. Roman Catholic scholars defend the literal historicity of the book, though they allow that the proper names are more or less disguised. But the book abounds with anachronisms, inconsistencies of the law, impossibilities, and is evidently written for the lesson it teaches: obey God and trust Him, and all will be well. The author had no intention to teach history.

The Medes banquet 19), put often join eluding fortress of called First city and fugitive Passing warmly once this turns, this teaches: obey God and trust Him, and all will be well. The author had no intention to teach history.
probable that he belonged to that neighborhood. Though, however, the author wrote in the time of the Maccabees, he seems to set his history in a framework that is some 200 years earlier, as Noldke (Die antijude. Lit., 1898, 96; Aufsätze zur jüdischen Geschichte, pp. 255f.) observes. Schurer (Gesch. der V. III, 395f.) shows. In 350 BC, Herodotus in Athens, invaded Egypt, his chief generals being Holofernes (2, 4, etc.) and Bagoas (12, 11), both of whom are in Jth officials of King Nebuchadnezzar and in particular are mentioned in the expedition against the Jews. This was intended probably to disarm the criticism of enemies who might resent any writing in which they were painted in unfavorable colors.

(1) Invasion of Pompey.—That it was the Invasion of Pompey which gave rise to the book is generally admitted.

2. Other Details about the Date

Ps Sol and Jth will feel that in the former he has to do with the book of Judith, and in the latter with the book of Esther. Volkmann and Graetz date this book in the days of the emperor Trajan (or Hadrian?). Volkmann was often obliged to his attempt to prove that the campaigns of Nebuchadnezzar stand readily for those of Trajan. But it is a sufficient refutation of this view that the book is professedly written in the days of Artaxerxes of Rome (55), who died in 100 AD, and whose reference to the book of Esther was made to him in his days as authoritative and even as canonical, so that it must have been written long before.

VI. Original Language.—That a Heb or (less likely) an Aram. original once existed is the opinion of almost all modern scholars, and the evidence for this seems conclusive. There are many Hebaisms in the book, e.g. "et tay ḫămārōn, en tais hēmeras" (in the days of, 1 7, and 9 besides); the frequent use of ṣaphēa, ṣāphēa, in the sense of the Heb. "nēlāy," m. "sēbāh," and even its repetition (also a Hebraism, 4 8); of ṣēbē ṣēbē ṣēphārē, epī ṣēbē ṣāphēa (5 18) and ṣēbāh ṣēbāh ṣēphēa, ṣēubah ṣēbahā ṣāphēa (2 17). Note further the following: "Let not thy eye spare," etc. (2 11; cf. Ezek 5 11, etc.); "as I live, an eye," etc. (4 5); "the God of heaven" (6 5; 11 17); "son of man," parallel with "man," and in the same sense (8 16); "and it came to pass when she had ceased crying," etc. (10 1); "the priests who serve in Jerus before the face of our God" (11 13). In 16 3 we have the words of the Lord: "For a god that shattereth the battle is [the] Lord." Now "Lord" without the article can be only the Heb. "Yahveh," read always "adonay," "Lord." But the phrase, "to shatter battle," is not good Gr or good sense. The Heb words shabbath ("to rest"), shabbahu, "Sabbath," and shabbath ("to break"), are written much alike, and in the original Heb we must have had the causative form of the first vb.; "A God that maketh war cease is [the] Lord." (see Ps 46 9). Moreover, the Heb idiom which strengthens a finite vb. by placing a cognate (absolute) infinitive before it is represented in the Gr of this book in the usual form in which it occurs in the LXX (and in Welsh), viz. a participle followed by a finite vb. (see 2 13). The present writer has noted other examples, but they are prevented by lack of space from adding them here. That the original book was Heb and not Aram. is made extremely likely by the fact that the above examples of Heb idiom are peculiar to this language. Noted also it came to pass that," (2 4), with the implied "waqawṣī," and what is said above about 11 13, where the senseless Gr. arose through the confusion of two similarly written Heb (not Aram.) words. There are cases also of mistakes in the Gr text due to wrong tr from the Heb, as in 1 8 (where for "nations" read "cities" or "mountains"); 2 2 (where for "concluded," Heb הַיָּדִים, wo-γγαλ, read "revealed," ἡδύοι "we-go-γαλ"); 3 1.9.10 (see Fritzsche, a., etc.).

VII. Versions.—The Gr text appears in three forms:

1. Greek text. LXX; (2) that of codd. 10, 108 (Lucian's text), an evident revision of (1); (3) cod. VS which closely resembles the text of the Old Lat and Pesh in most points.

There are two extant Syr VSS, both of them dependent on the Gr text (3) noted above. The Pesh is given in Walton's Polyglot and in a critically revised form in Lagard's Lib. VSS. The so-called Hexaplar Syr text was made by Paul of Tella in the 6th cent.

(1) The Old Lat text seems to have been made from the Gr text, cod. 58 (see above). (2) Jerome made his Lat translation of the Heb VSS, both of them dependent on the Gr text (3) noted above. Several later Heb VSS of the book have been found, none of them with strong claims to be considered the original text, though Gaster (see EB, II, 4. Hebrew Bible, col. 2342) does make such a claim for Codex Sangallensis (PSSA, XVI, 156-63). The Heb midrashim were made to conform to the life of Jewish homes and vary according to the circumstances of their origin. But they agree in these points: Proper names of persons who were involved in the wars are those of the Maccabees. Judith is a Jewish maiden and daughter of Ahihai, according to the Gaster MS, and in the variants adopted by Geller (see vii 2), the king who is killed. Translations of these midrashim may be seen in Jellinek, Bihl. Hamburg., L 352-77. Zeitschr. für wiss. Theologie, 1896, 337 f. Ball, Speaker's Apoc, 1. 25 ff.; Scholz, Komm., Anhang I and II; Gaster, op. cit. Gaster argues that the much shorter form of the tale in the MS is older than the longer VS. But if a writer were to expand the bulk of an old story, he would hardly be likely to invent several proper names and change others. It is probable that Judith came to be represented as a pure maiden (a virgin) under the influence of the low conception of marriage fostered in the mediæval Christian church.

LITERATURE.—For the editions of the Gr text and for comms. on the Apoc., see under Apocryphal Literature. But on Jth note, in particular the commentaries by Fritzsche and Ball, the latter containing the complete bibliography. J U G G L E R Y, jugjārī (γύγρια, goetía); the word occurs once in 2 Mac 12 24 RvM (AV "craft," RV "crafty guile").

J U I C E, jus, Jūs: The word occurs once in Cant 8 2 (υίος Καντ, ῥημαίος, "sweet wine"), and once in RvM of Job 6, 6, where for the word of an egg m. reads, "the juice of purslain." LXX has ῥημαίον κενόν, ῥημαίον κενόν, "empty words."

J U L I A, Júlía (Ἰουλία, Iōlia): The name of a Rom Christian to whom St. Paul sent greetings, the wife or sister of Philologus with whom he was coupled (Rom 16 15). The name points to a member of the imperial household.

J U L I U S, Júlijus (Ἰολίους, Iōlías): The cognate of the Augustan cohort under whose charge Paul was sent a prisoner to Rome (Acts 27 15). See ARMY, ROMAN; BAND, AUGUSTAN.

J U M P I N G, jum'ping. See GAMES.
JUNIAS, jōnī'-ās or JUNIA, jōnī'-a ('Ioovías, Jounias, Jounia); One to whom, with Andronicus, greetings are sent by Paul at the close of his letter to the Romans (Rom 16:7). The name may be masc., Junias, a contraction of Junianus, or fem. Junia; it is Ioovias, the accus. form, that is given. In all probability this is the masc. Junias, Paul defines the two as (1) "my kinsmen," (2) "my fellow-prisoners," (3) "who are of note among the apostles," and (4) "who also have been in Christ before me."

(1) They were Jews. Paul calls the Jews "my brethren" (Rom 16:3; cf. "kinsmen according to the flesh") (Rom 9:3). Because Prisca and Aquila, a Jew and Jewess, are not designated as kinsfolk, Conybeare and Howson suppose "the epithet to denote that the persons mentioned were of the tribe of Benjamin;"

(2) They had been companions of Paul in some unrecorded imprisonment. The phrase denotes more than the fact that they, like Paul, had suffered imprisonment for the sake of Christ.

This may mean (a) that they were well known to the apostolic circle (so Gifford and Weise), or (b) distinguished as apostles. The latter is probably correct, "apostle" being used in a wide sense (cf 1 Cor 15:7). The prophetic ministry of their kinsfolk consisted of apostles, prophets, and teachers (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 4:11), the apostles being missionaries in the modern sense (see Lindsay, Church and Ministry, ch. iii). Some apostles were missionaries sent out by particular churches (Acts 13:23; 2 Cor 8:23; Phil 2:25). (4) They were among the first converts, "early disciples" like Mnaon of Cyprus (Acts 21:16).

JUNIPER, jōnī'-per ('junír, ëth; jâdârêt, jāthmén, K J 9:4; m. "broom" Ps 120:4, m "broom" Job 30:4 Is 4:3 "broom"). This is quite certainly the Arab. ratam (Retama retam, N. O. Leguminosae), a variety of bough which is one of the most characteristic shrubs of the deserts of Southern Palestine and southward to Egypt. Though the shade it affords is but slight, in the absence of other shrubs it is frequently used by desert travelers as a refuge from the scorching rays (cf 1 K 19:4). The root yields good charcoal, giving out much heat (Ps 120:4). For people to be reduced to chew it for nourishment betokens the lowest depth of starvation (Job 30:4).

Indeed so hopeless is this root as a source of food that many commentators believe that the accepted text in error, and by altering a single letter, substituting פ for ד, they get a reading which has been adopted in RVM, "to warm them" instead of "their meat," which certainly is much more probable.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

JUPITER, jōpī'-tēr, jōpī'-tēr (Zeus, Zeia): "Jupiter" is mentioned in the NT only on 1 Cor 15:23; Acts 14:12, 13, with Zeus; elsewhere in RVM in all cases. In addition the Gr stem appears in διονύστης, διοπέλεως, in Acts 19:35, EV "which fell down from Jupiter;" but the word means "from the clear sky" (cf "from heaven" in the RVm). "Jupiter" was considered the Lat equivalent of the Gr Zeus, the highest god in the developed Gr pantheon, and Zeus in turn, in accord with the syncretism of the period, was identified with countless deities in the local cults of Asia Minor and elsewhere. So in Acts 14:12, 13, "Zeus" and "Hermes" are local deities that had been renamed. On the other hand, the Zeus of 2 Macc 6:2 is the genuine Gr deity, who had been adopted as a special patron by Antiochus Epiphanes and to whose temple in Athens Antiochus had contributed largely. The title "Olympus" (2 Macc 6:7) is derived from the early worship on Mt. Olympus, but had come to be thought one of the god's highest appellations; Xenios, "protector of strangers," was a title in a cult particularly popular with travelers. JUPITER AND MERCURY. See Astrology, III, 1; Mercury; Jupiter.

JURISDICTION, jō'-ri-s-dik'-shun (éxowías, ezowía): The word ezowía is well known in NT Gr. It is derived from the word éxest, and suggests the absence of any hindrance to an act. It contains the idea of right and might (Cremers). In the NT it met. consisted of apostles, prophets, and teachers (1 Cor 12:28; Eph 4:11), the apostles being missionaries in the modern sense (see Lindsay, Church and Ministry, ch. iii). Some apostles were missionaries sent out by particular churches (Acts 13:23; 2 Cor 8:23; Phil 2:25). (4) They were among the first converts, "early disciples" like Mnaon of Cyprus (Acts 21:16).

JUSHAB-HESED, jōsh-ab-he'-sed (pâl pîn, yâshâb hešād, "loving-kindness is returned"): Son of Zerubbabel. The name is probably symbolic (1 Ch 3:20); cf Semea-Jeshob.

JUSTICE, just'is (râ'/ús, râ'dhâk, râ'/ús, sôdhe: ävâ'âr'ôn, dikasâ'ôn): The original Heb and Gr words are the same as those rendered "righteousness." This is the common rendering, and in about half the cases where we have "just" and "justice" in AV, ARV has changed to "righteousness." It must be constantly borne in mind that the two ideas are essentially the same. See Rigurresumers.

Justice had primarily to do with conduct in relation to others, esp. with regard to the rights of others. It is applied to business, where just weights and measures are demanded (Lev 19:33-34; Dt 25:15-16; Am 8:5; Prov 11:1; 16:11; Ezek 45:9-10). It is demanded in courts, where the rights of rich and poor, Israelite and sojourner, are equally to be regarded. Neither station nor bribe nor popular clamor shall influence judge or witness. "Justice, justice shalt thou follow" (Dt 16:20; cf vs 18-20; Ex 23:1-3-6-9). In general this justice is contrasted with that wickedness which "feared not God, and regarded not man" (Lk 18:2).

In a larger sense justice is not only giving to others their rights, but involves the active duty of establishing their rights. So Israel awaits upon God's justice or cries out: "The justice due to me [lit. "my justice"] is passed away from my God!" (Lsa 40:27). Jch is to show her to be in the right as over against the nations. Justice here becomes mercy. To "seek justice" means to "relieve the oppressed, judge the fatherless, plead for the widow" (Lsa 1:17; cf 11:4; Jer 22:3; 7:44). The same idea appears in Dt 24:12-13; Ps 37:21-26; 112:4-6, where the tr is "righteous" instead of "just."

the NT is not yet reached. It does not mean sinlessness or moral perfection. Job knows the sin in his heart (Job 13:23; 7:21), and yet speaks of himself as a just or righteous man (12:4; 13:18). The Psalms and Proverbs depend upon the righteousness of God which he knows that no man is righteous in God’s sight (Ps 145:1; cf 7:8; 19:20-24). It is not a lack of humility or dependence upon God when the Psalmist asks to be judged according to his righteousness. In the OT, the just, or righteous, man is the one who holds to God and trusts in Him (Ps 33:18-22). This is not the later Judaistic legalism with its merit and reward, where God’s justice is simply a matter of giving each man what he has earned.

The word “justice” does not occur in the NT, and in most cases where we find “just” in AV it is changed to “righteousness” in ARV. The idea of justice or righteousness (remembering that these are essentially the same) becomes more spiritual and ethical in the NT. It is a matter of knowing God’s own spirit is the standard (1 Jn 3:7; Mt 5:48). The mere give-and-take justice is not enough. We are to be merciful, and that to all. The ideal is righteousness, not rights. As Holman understood: the keynote of the Sermon on the Mount is justitia and not jus! God’s justice, or righteousness, is founded in His essential nature. But, just as with man, it is not something abstract, but is seen in His relations all over to the world. It is His kingship establishing and maintaining the right. It appears as retributive justice, “that reaction of His holy will, as grounded in His eternal being, against evil wherever found” (Hab 1:13).

The great prophets, Isaiah, Micah, Amos, Hosea, all insist upon Jeh’s demand for righteousness.

But this is not the main aspect of God’s justice. Theology has been wont to set forth God’s justice as the fundamental fact in His nature with which we must reconcile His mercy as best we may, the two being conceived as in conflict. As a matter of fact, the Scriptures make a distinction between justice, or righteousness, as the action of His mercy. Just as with man justice means the relief of the oppressed and needy, so God’s justice is His kingly power engaged on behalf of men, and justice and mercy are closely joined together as the two sides of God and a Saviour (Isa 45:21). “I bring near my righteousness or [my] justice! ... and my salvation shall not tarry” (Isa 46:13; cf Ps 51:14; 103:17; 71:15; 116:5; Isa 51:5.6). The “righteous acts of Jeh” mean His deeds of deliverance (Jgs 5:11). And so Israel sings of the justice, or judgments, or righteousness of Jeh (they are the same), and proclaims her trust in these (Ps 7:17; 53:23,24,25; 36:6; 140:12.13; 50:5.6; 94:14.15; 103:6; 145:1).

The NT, too, does not lack the idea of retributive justice. The Son of Man “shall render unto every man according to his deeds” (Mt 16:27; cf 25:14-46; Lk 12:45-48; Rom 2:2-5; 6:23; 2 Cor 5:10; Col 3:21-25; 2 Thess 1:8,9; 2:2,3; 10:26-33). But God’s justice is far more than this. The idea of merit and reward is really superseded by a higher viewpoint in the teaching of Jesus. He speaks, indeed, of recompense, but it is the Father and not the judge that gives this (Mt 6:14.6.18). And it is no mere justice of earth, because the reward transcends the human mediocrity (Mt 25:46.47). Mt 10:30; Lk 12:37). This is grace not desert (Lk 17:10). And the parable of Mt 20:1-15 gives at length the death-blow to the whole Judaistic scheme of merit and reward.

And God’s justice is not merely gracious, but redemptive. It not simply apportions rights, it establishes righteousness. Thus, just as in the OT, the judge is the Saviour. The difference is simply here: in the OT the salvation was more national and temporal, here it is personal and spiritual. But mercy is opposed to justice no more here than in the OT. It is by the forgiveness of sins that God establishes righteousness, and this is the supreme task of justice. Thus it is that God is at the same time “just, and the justifier of him that hath faith in Jesus” (Rom 3:26). “He is faithful and righteous” (or “just”), see AV) to forgive our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness” (1 Jn 1:9).

4 3), as it is an essential part of an ordered universe, but that does not mean at all that it is also holy, right and good (Rom 7 12). It was added, of course, on account of transgressions (Gal 3 19), for it is only a world of intelligent, free spirits capable of sin, which need sin, and its high and beautiful sanctions make sin seem all the more sinful (Rom 7 13).

It was fundamental in Paul's thinking that Christ died for our sins, according to the Scriptures (1 Cor 15 3). In due season He died for the justification of sinners. While we were working and sinning He died for us (ver 8): we are justified in His blood (ver 9), and the Atoning is through Him that we have been saved from wrath (ver 9). While we were enemies, God through the death of His Son (ver 10), being justified freely by His grace through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus whom God set forth as a propitiation (3 24-25). There is no reconciliation, no justification, except through and by and for Christ.

(1) Paul's own experience—his own experience cannot be left out of the account. He lived through the doctrine, as well as found it through illumination of the Spirit. It was not that he had only outwardly kept the law. He had been jealous for it, and had been blinded by its requirements and righteousness (Phil 3 6). What was born in upon him was how little such blamelessness could stand before the absolute standards of the law. How far he was shaken by doubts of this kind we cannot say with certainty; but it is clear that the concomitant of the Damascus conversion scene was the case of such an upright man and strenuous zealot without a psychological preparation, without supposing doubts as to whether his full-filling of the law could have brought him to be saved. God, now, would educate a man like him. Paul, there was no way of overcoming these doubts but in a renewed struggle for his own righteousness shown in the flesh. Hence Damascus Damascus (Asaph) is the Christian's experience of being born again, as the blazing light of noonday. This conversion broke down all his old views of the nature of life, of sin, of his innate righteousness. His assurance of salvation through works of the law done never so conscientiously and perfectly. The revelation of the glorified Christ, with the assurance that He, the God-Man Messiah, was the very one whom He was persecuting, destroyed his dependence on his own righteousness, a righteousness which had led him to such shocking conclusions. Although this was for him an individual experience, yet it had universal applications. It showed him that there was an inherent weakness in the law through fleshly mind, that the whole physical, natural, human, spiritual, material man, was considered as sinful, as working only on this lower plane, and that the law never can be illuminating by the Spirit. He, though sent in the likeness of the flesh of sin, yet (as an offering) for sin condemned sin and cast it out (Rom 3 19-20). If he might be fulfilled in those who through Him walk not after the flesh but after the Spirit (v 8), the law's righteousness as thus revealed. If the law had been able to do that, to give life, Christ need not have come. Righteousness would have been by the law (Gal 3 21). But the facts show that the law was not thus able, neither the law written on the heart given to men, nor the law given to Moses (Rom 1 18-3 19). Therefore every mouth is stopped, and all flesh is silent before God. On the ground of law-keeping, what the modern man would call morality, our hope of salvation has been shattered. The law has spoiled the doctrine against us (Gal 3 10). It cannot therefore lead us to righteousness and life, nor was that its supreme intention: it was a pedagogue or tutor to lead us to Christ that we might be justified by faith (ver 24; see Thmas in R 17, 488-84).

What made Paul to differ from his companions in the faith was that his own bitter experience under the revelation of Christ had led him to these facts.

(2) The resurrection connected with the death.—It was remarked above that the ground of justification to Paul is the work of Christ. This means esp. His death as a sacrifice, in which, as Ritschl well says (Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, 3. Aufl., 1899, I, 157), the apostles saw exercised the whole power of His redemption. But that death came from His resurrection, when first awakened them to the knowledge of a decisive worth for salvation, as well as finally confirmed their faith in Jesus as the Son of God. "The objective salvation," says Ritschl (p. 158), "which was connected with the sacrificial death of Christ, and which continued on for the church, was made secure by this, that it was asserted also as an attribute of the resurrected one," who was delivered up for our trespasses, and was raised for our justification (Rom 4 25). But this last expression is not to be interpreted with literal preciseness, as though Paul intended to distinguish between the forgiveness of sins as brought about by the death, and justification, by the resurrection, for both forgiveness and justification are identified in 4 6-8.

It was the resurrection, which gave Christians their assurance concerning Christ (Acts 17 31); by that resurrection He has been exalted to the right hand of God, where He maketh intercession for His people (Rom 8 34), which mediatorial foundation is upon His death—the Lamb slain from the foundation of the world (Rev 13 8 n; cf Gr text).

B. Wells well says: "It was by the certainty of the exaltation of Christ to Messianic sovereignty brought about by the resurrection that Paul attained to faith in the saving significance of His death, and not conversely. Accordingly, the assurance that God cannot condemn us who believe in Jesus to His resurrection and exaltation to God's right hand (Rom 8 34), is the same assurance which the death was the death of the mediator of salvation, who has redeemed us from condemnation. The objective atonement—Christ's death, but the appropriation of it in justification is possible only if we believe in Him, His death, and we can attain to faith in that only as it is sealed by the resurrection (Bibl. Theol. of NT, I, 458-57).

(3) Faith, not works, the means of justification.—The means or condition of justification is faith (Rom 3 22-25, 26, 28, etc) which rests upon the pure grace of God and is itself, therefore, His gift (2 8). This making faith the only instrument of justification is presupposed in every case of the receptive attitude of the soul, it is in the nature of the case the only avenue through which Divine blessing can come. The gifts of God are not against the laws of the soul which He has made, but rather are in and through those laws. Faith is the hand outstretched to the Divine Giver, who, though He sends rain without our consent, does not give salvation except through an appropriate spiritual response. This faith is not simply belief in historical facts, though this is the basis of the atoning death (Rom 3 25), and the resurrection (10 9) of Jesus, but is a real heart reception of the gift (ver 10), and is therefore able to bring peace in our relation to God and salvation. The object of this faith is Jesus Christ (2 22, etc), that is, that He only comes the gift of righteousness and the reigning in life (5 17), not Mary, not angels, not doctrine, not the church, but Jesus only. This, to be sure, does not exclude God the Father as an object of faith, as the redeeming act of Christ is itself the work of God (2 Cor 5 19), whose love expressed itself toward us in this way (Rom 5 8). Faith in the only one God is always presupposed (1 Cor 6 8), but it was the apostolic custom rather to appeal once to God and then to Christ (Acts 20 21). But the oneness of God the Father and Christ the Son in a work of salvation is the best guaranty of the Divinity of the latter, both as an objective fact and as an inner experience of the Christian.

The justification being by faith, it is not by works or by love, or by both in one. It cannot be by the former, because they are lacking either in time or amount or quality, nor could they be accepted in any case until they spring from the heart renewed, for which faith is the necessary presupposition. It cannot be by the latter, for it exists only where the Spirit has shed it abroad in the heart (Rom 5 5), the indispensable prerequisite for receiving which is faith. This does not mean that the crown of Chris-
Justification

Justification is not love, for it is (1 Cor 13:13); it means only that the root is faith. Nor can love be fostered in faith, for faith is the condition of the expression of the strength of the word often quoted for that purpose, "faith working through love" (Gal 5:6). The apostle is speaking here only of those who are already "in Christ," and he says that over against the Galatians, who are for the sake of legal observances, the only availthing thing is not circumcision or its lack, but faith energizing through love. Here the interest is, as Ritschl says (II, 343), in the kingdom of God, but justification proper has reference to the apportionment of the present world to the individual, or the excellent remarks of Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 1894, 226-27. At the same time this text reveals the tremendous ethical religious force abiding in faith, according to St. Paul. It reminds us of the great sentence of Luther in his preface to the Ep. to the Rom, where he says: "Faith is a Divine work within us which changes and renovates us in God according to Jn 1:13, who were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. This destroys the old Adam and makes new creatures of us in heart, will, disposition, and all our powers. Oh, faith is a living, active, jealous, mighty thing, inasmuch as it cannot possibly remain unproductive of a new atmosphere of a new freedom of the Lord, according to Luther's definition (Werke, Ed. 20, p. 229)."

4. Baptism also eliminated.—Not only are good works and love removed as conditions or means of justification of the sinner, but baptism is also eliminated. According to Paul, it is the office of baptism not to justify, but to cleanse, that is, symbolically to set forth and seal the work that the Spirit of God has wrought in the sinner by a dramatic act of burial, which for the subject and all witnesses would mark a never-to-be-forgotten era in the history of the believer. "Baptism," says Wetten (I, 454), "presupposes faith in Him as the one whom the church has acknowledged, and also binds to adherence to Him which excludes every dependence upon any other, inasmuch as He has acquired a claim upon their devotion by the saving deed of His self-surrender on the cross." So important was baptism in the religious atmosphere at that time that hyperbolical expressions were used to express its cleansing and illuminating office, but these need not mislead us. We must interpret them according to the fundamental conceptions of Christianity as a religion of the Spirit, not of magic nor of material media. Baptism pointed to a complete parting with the old life by previous renewal through faith in Christ, which renewal baptism in its true seal and announced in a climactic act of self-dedication to him, and this, while symbolically and in contemporary parlance of both Jew and Gentile, a bird, that is, a sign to others, but also in the psychological experience of the baptized. But while justification is often attributed to faith, it is never to baptism.

(5) Elements of justification.—What are the elements of this justification? There are two: (a) Forgiveness of sins (Rom 4:5-8; cf Acts 13:38, 39). With this are connected peace and reconciliation (Rom 5:1-10; cf 10:11). (b) The declaring or appointing as righteous, or just (Rom 8:21-30; 4:2-9:22; 5:19-11:16-21, etc.). C. F. Schmid is perfectly right when he says that Paul (and James) always uses dikaiosuné in the sense of esteeming and pronouncing and treating as right according to an inner principle, as the Mosaic law (Rom 2:13; 3:20) and also according to grace (Bib. Theol. of the NT, 1870, 497). The word is a forensic one, and Godet goes so far as to say that the word is never used in all Gr. lit. for making right (Rom 3:28), but also for making just. The contempts of "to justify" is not "to be a sinner," but is "to accuse" or "to condemn" (Rom 8:33:34), and the contrast of "justification" is "condemnation" (5:18). Besides, it is not the infusing of a new life, of a new holiness, which is counted for righteousness, but it is faith which is so counted (Rom 4:5; Phil 3:9). That upon which God looks when He justifies is not for the sake of legal observances, the only availthing thing is not circumcision or its lack, but faith energizing through love. Here the interest is, as Ritschl says (II, 343), in the kingdom of God, but justification proper has reference to the apportionment of the present world to the individual, or the excellent remarks of Bruce, St. Paul's Conception of Christianity, 1894, 226-27. At the same time this text reveals the tremendous ethical religious force abiding in faith, according to St. Paul. It reminds us of the great sentence of Luther in his preface to the Ep. to the Rom, where he says: "Faith is a Divine work within us which changes and renovates us in God according to Jn 1:13, who were born not of blood, nor of the will of the flesh, nor of the will of man, but of God. This destroys the old Adam and makes new creatures of us in heart, will, disposition, and all our powers. Oh, faith is a living, active, jealous, mighty thing, inasmuch as it cannot possibly remain unproductive of a new atmosphere of a new freedom of the Lord, according to Luther's definition (Werke, Ed. 20, p. 229)."

As to the argument from baptism urged by Sanday-Headlam, it must be said that Paul always conveys the idea of justification as taking place in the individual, and with believers and for believers, that faith and not to which they are baptized is not justification, but the death and resurrection of Christ (8:34), and that the righteousness of God has been manifested not through baptism but through faith in Jesus (Phil 2:20), being justified freely, not through baptism, but through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (Rom 3:22), being justified freely, not through baptism, but through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (Rom 3:22), being justified freely, not through baptism, but through the redemption that is in Christ Jesus (Rom 3:22). With Paul baptism has always a mystical significance as symbolizing and externally actualizing union with the death of the Lord, and would be both impossible and impertinent in the case of those who are not already believers in Christ and thus inwardly united to His society.

II. The Other NT Writings.—So much for Paul. Let us now take a glance at the other NT books. It is a commonplace of the theology that is called "modern" or "critical," that Paul and not Jesus is the founder of Christianity as we know it, that... the doctrines of the Divinity of Christ, atonement, justification, etc., are Paul's work, and not his Master's. There is truth in this. It was part of the humanity of Christ as well as His pedagogical method to live a life of love and light, to die for the sins of the world, and then go back to the Father that the Holy Spirit might come and lead His followers into all truth. A full statement of the doctrines of Christianity on His part would have been premature (Jn 16:12), would have been pedagogically unwise, if not worthless. First the blade, then the ear, who could bear the fruit of the full grain in the ear (Mk 4:28). It would also have been spiritually and philosophically impossible, for Christianity was not a set of teachings by Christ—but a religion springing out of His life, death, resurrection, ascension, intercession, mediatorial activity in history through the Spirit who works in His disciples and on the world through and by that life, death, etc. The only question is whether the apostles were true to the spirit and content of His teaching; that is, in its moral and divine outlines.

1. The Synoptic Gospels

So far as the Synoptic Gospels, as Harnack says (What Is Christianity? 24 ed, rev., New York, 1901, 68), that the "whole of Jesus' message may be reduced to these two heads: God as Father, and the human soul so ennobled that it can and does unite with Him," that an essential part of His message is omitted, viz., that salvation is bound up in His (Christ's) own person. (The reader is asked to verify the references for himself, as space will not allow quotation.) See Mt 10:37-38; 16:24-27. Confession of Him (not simply of the Father) determines acknowledgment above (10:32), where judgment is rendered according to our attitude to Him in His unfortunate ones (25:35 ff.). No sooner was our faith right, than the necessity of the unfold necessity of His death and resurrection (16:21). The evening before that death occurred, He brings out its significance, perpetuates the lesson in the institution of the Supper (Mk 14:24), and reinforces it after His resurrection (Lk 24:26). Paul himself could hardly have expressed the fact of the atonement through Christ's death more decisively than Mt 20:28; 26:28. With this foundation, could the Christian doctrine of salvation take any other course than that actually did take? Instead of referring men to the Father, Christ forgives sins Himself (9:2-6), and Herod cons all men as needing this forgiveness (6:12). While the time had not arrived for the Pauline doctrine of righteousness, Jesus prepared the way for it, negatively, in demanding a humble sense of sin (6:8), inner fitness and perfection (vs 6:8.20.48), and positively in requiring recourse to Him by those who felt the burden of their sins (11:28), to Him who was the rest-giver, and not simply to God the Father, as in Deut 33:27. Christ Rom 8:1 is an echo. For it was specially to those to whom, as to the awakened Paul, the law brought condemnation that He came, to heal and to save (Mt 2:2; 17:13; Lk 17:5). It was for sinners and to sinners that He came (Lk 16:2; 7:9, 14:7; 11:59, just as Paul understood; and the way for their salvation was not better law-keeping, but trusting prayer in the confession of sin (Lk 18:13), really equivalent to faith, the humble heart and a hunger for righteousness (=faith). See Mt 6:33. He, who brings most of His own pride, works, is the least likely to obtain the kingdom of heaven (18:34; Mk 10:14). Not only entrance, but the final reward itself is of grace (Mt 19:30; 20:1-16), a parable in the true spirit of Paul, and in the promise of Paradise to the penitent robber (Lk 23:43). At the very beginning the message sounded out, "Repent ye, and believe in the gospel" (Mk 1:15), the gospel which was summed up in Christ, who would gather the people, not directly to God, the Father, but to Himself (Mt 23:37). All this means justification through that faith in Himself, in His Divine-human manifestation (Mt 16:13-16), of which faith He expresses Himself with anxiety in Lk 18:8, and the presence of which he greeted with joy in Mt 8:10. Ihmels is right therefore in holding (RB, XVI, 400) that Paul's proclamation was continuous with the self-witness of Jesus, which conversely pointed as a consequence to the witness of Paul.

2. John's Writings

Justification by faith is not more implicit in John's Gospel than in the first three; it is only more explicit (Jn 3:14-16). Eternal life is the blessing secured, but this of course in its own way and in its own time. Faith is not conceivable in those under condemnation and without faith; and the confession of sins that leads to forgiveness seems only another name for the justification that brings peace (Jn 14:20). Everything is, as with Paul (Eph 2:7; Tit 3:4), led back to the love of God (1 Jn 3:1), who sent His Son to be the propitiation for our sins (4:10).

Seeberg's point that the "Pauline doctrine of justification is not found in any other NT writer" (History of Doctrine, I, 48) is true when you consider that it has the all the marks of a fully developed system. Its conception is different from Paul's (3:18 ff.), which is not only an act of grace, but also a fact of human experience (Rom 5:1). Paul is generalizing in the name of Jesus Christ (Acts 13:38) are meaningly estimated (6:17). It is He in whom, though we see Him not, yet believing, we rejoice greatly with joy unsearchable (1 Pet 1:8), praying for the end of our faith (Heb 6:19), and having it (Rom 4:19). It is, only however, through the precious blood of a lamb without blemish, even that of Christ our Pasch, and is only through Him that we are believers in Jesus (the true light, the true faith, 2:21). The familiar expression, "Come to Jesus," which simply means have faith in Jesus for justification and salvation, goes back to Peter (2:4). The Ep. to the Hebrews has other interests to look after, but it does not deny faith, but rather exhorts us to draw near with a true heart in the name of Jesus (10:22), which it lays at the foundation of all faith and all religion (ch 11). The writer can give no better exhortation than to look unto Jesus the author and finisher of our faith (12:2), an exhortation in the true spirit of Paul, whose gospel of faith for justification is also summed up in 16.

We come lastly to the core of the matter in regard to NT representations of justification—the famous passage in Jas 2:14-26, which at first sight seems a direct blow at Paul. Of James Here we are met by the interesting problem of the date of the Epistle. There is no way to enter into this (see James, Epistle Qf.), what we say must be independent of this question. A careful look at this vigorous and most valuable letter (valuable in its own place, which is not that of Paul's letters, in comparison with which it is a strange epistle) shows that it is a lawful and genuine letter, which is a chapter in the English literature, speaking of the way to do justice, the poor and the destitute, the bondman and the young widow. which he did not mean to reject it as useless [straw has most important uses], but as giving the doctrine of salvation, for which we must look to Paul) will show how much the part of James to Paul is apparent and not real.

(1) In this section James uses the word faith simply for intellectual belief in God, and esp. in the unity of God (2:20; see also verse 18, where Paul uses it for a holding of Christ as Lord and as Saviour). He knows no faith which does not bring forth good works corresponding to the heavenly Christ. Therefore he who does not give his life to the things which does not come from faith is sin. For James faith is the justification of men to the heavenly Christ (2:1), or it is the theologico-acknowledged title of the justification of which is for James speaking, just of him who is righteous, an analytical judgment. He and Peter say that the Divine recognizes without Paul did not understand the fact. He was left to Luther through his deep religious experience first to last doctrine of justification.) (2) James uses the word “works” as meaning practical morality, going back beyond legalism, behind Pharisaism, to the position of the OT prophets, whereas Paul uses the word as meritorious action deserving reward. (3) When James is in his “do, be judicious” to w., the judicial judgment of God, which recognizes this righteousness of life as actual. His arguments concern the use of grace of God in which He graciously receives the believing sinner returning to Him, and takes him into fellowship with Himself. James, in the early church, uses the forgiveness of sins (Acts 2:38; 3:19; 10:43), and that he would have contested the Pauline idea of justification by grace, insisting only that works may be possible. Theologically, the chief if not the only difference between the ancient and modern is the center of his point of view, while the atonement was fundamental with all Paul’s thinking. See, further, James, Epistles.

III. The Old Testament.—A word in conclusion as to the OT. All the NT writers built on the OT. That there should be a clear or contradiction between the OT and what we call the NT would have been to them inconceivable. But they realized that the law all the time is condemned (Dt 27 26 LXX; Gal 3:10; of Ps 14:13:2; Rom 3:20; see vs 9-20, and the reference to the OT in ARV). The prophets insisted upon the practical works of righteousness.—What doth Jehovah require of thee, but to do justly, and to love kindness, and to walk humbly before thy God? (Mic 6:8) His narrowness was clear of his catholic inheritance that he could reproduce Paul purely. He made a judge by which we could go either back to Paul or forward to the Reformation. And of course we must not think that the Council of Trent was another to that of 95 Theses. It was the last revival in the ancient church that “faith alone saves,” and, on the other, he silenced that principle for a thousand years. The very Catholic theologian who stood nearest to that was no friend to the Reformers (Zeitschrift f. Thol. u. Kirche, 1891, 177). His misapprehension of the religious attitude or services could take the place of uprightness of life. This does not mean that the OT writers understood that men were justified simply by their good deeds, for it was always believed that unverifiable all was the mercy and loving-kindness of God, whose forgiving grace was toward the broken and contrite spirit, the iniquities of whom were not to be carried by the Servant of God. But Paul will nullify many (Ps 103 8-13; 85 10; Isa 57 15; 53 11, and many other passages).

IV. Later Development.—A brief statement now on the development of the doctrine of the Christian church. It is humiliating to Christ business immediately after the apostles the first generation to the heights of Paul, or even the lower levels of his brethren. There are passages which remind one of his: because that the atmosphere is different. Christ's messianic business rather than as a gospel of the grace of God. We cannot go into the reasons for this: suffice it to say that in gentle and the NT writings were not yet in the consciousness of the church to the extent that they dominated her thinking. The fine passage In Clement of Rome (97 AD, ch xxxii): “They all therefore [i.e. Abraham and other fathers] is glorified and magnified, and that they and their own works or the righteous doings which they wrought, but through His God will. And so we, having been called through His will in Christ Jesus, are not justified through ourselves or through our own wisdom or understanding, but through the grace of God: that we should believe in holiness of heart, but through faith, wherefore none the Almighty God justifies (Gen 3:9).” This has been from the beginning: to whom be glory forever and Amen."

But the whole passage is that complemented faith with other parts of the church—hospitability and godliness the saving virtues for Lot in Gen 19, couples holiness and faith together as equal for Rahab in ch xlii, and represents forgiveness of sins through keeping commandments and love in ch I. Ignatius speaks 157 AD, about 110-15 A.D. speaking also of Christ dying for us, that believing on His death we might escape death (2 Pet. 2:9). The angel taught the payment of the final sacrifice. Paul on preserving the OT. And they must believe (1 Thess 5:18), the Old Testament. He kept, the Old Testament.

None of them will be perfect in your faith and love toward Jesus Christ, for these things are the beginning and the end of life—the beginning and the love of the end, and the two being found in unit are God, while all things else fail in their train unto true nobility” (Eph 1). The so-called Barnabas (date uncertain) puts the death of Christ Jesus at the foundation of salvation, which is expressed, by the remission of sins through His blood (Eph 5), the kingdom of Jesus being on the cross, so that they who set their hope on Him shall live forever (ch 8), while the time even believers are not yet justified (ch 4), for which finally a whole series of works are done and works of darkness avoided (ch 19). The Shepherd of Hermas and the Ancient Hymn —2 Clem are even more moralistic, whereas the true text is that God shall be the beginning of the merit. The same critical tone sounds through that invaluable little prophecy that was first published in 1873 and first published by him in Constantinople in December, 1863, The Teaching (Didache) of the XII Apostles, that is the first almost full-fledged as early as in Tertullian (80 AD) and Cyprian (200 AD). See Cyprian, 1890, 146 ff. And thus it continued until—so far as our outline is concerned—it struck Augustine, bishop of Hippo and on the cross of Christ the center of his point of view, while the atonement was fundamental with all Paul’s thinking. See, further, James, Epistles.

Those consequences are best seen in the decrees of the Council of Trent (Session 6, 1547), to which we now turn, and which are the definite and final crystallization of the mediaeval development, so far as that development was Catholic. (1) Justification is a translation from a natural state to a state of grace. With this procedure works are conditioned, and the soul is assisted, and with this in his turn man cooperates and prepares himself for justification. This cooperation has the merit of conformity, though the first call comes before any merit. (2) Faith is an element in justification, "Receiving faith by hearing, they of free will draw near to God, believing those things to be true which have been Divinely revealed and promised." Faith as a living trust in a personal Saviour for salvation is lacking. Among the truths believed is the mercy of God and that He wishes to justify the sinner in Christ. (3) This faith begets love to Christ and hatred to sin, which are elements also of the justifying process. (4) Now follows justification itself, "which is not a bare remission of sins, but also sanctification and renewal of the inner man through the voluntary reception of grace and of gifts." (5) But this renewal must take place through baptism, which, to the prepared adult, both gives and seals all the graces of salvation, forgiveness, cleanning, faith, hope and love. (6) Justification is preserved by obeying the commandments and by good works, which also increase it. (7) In case it is lost—and it can be lost, not by venial, but by mortal sin, let all who are born again to the sacred sacrament of penance. (8) To get it, to keep or regain it, it is also necessary to believe the doctrines as thus laid down and to be laid down by this Council (see the decrees in any ed, or in Mirbt, Quellen zur Geschichte des Patrologia, 306–16, or in Buckley's or in Waterworth's translations, and for an admirable and objective summary see Seeberg, History of Doctrine, II, 433–38).

Recent researches in Luther's early writings have shown that almost from the beginning of his earnest study of religious questions, he mounted up to Paul's view of justification by faith alone (Loofs, DG, 4. Aufl., 1906, 696–98). Faith is the trust in the mercy of God through Christ, and justification is the declaring righteous for His sake, which is followed by a real making righteous. From the beginning to the end of his life as a religious teacher these are the elements of his doctrine. Speaking of 1513–15, Loofs says: Upon the changes of sensation, forgiveness, faith=trust in His grace=the regulators of his religious self-judgment, Luther's piety rests, and corresponding to them his view of Christianity, and even later" (than 1513–15); and he adds that "to reckon as righteous" (reputari justum) must not be understood with Luther as an opposition "to make righteous," for his "to be justified without merit" in the sense of "to forgive" (absolvit) is at the same time the beginning of a new life: "restituit me sic absolvit... ipsa resurrecto. His constantly and firmly held view, even more deeply eschatologically later than in 1513–15, that "to be justified without merit" = "to be resurrected [to be born again]" = "to be sanctified" is a pregnant formulation of his Christianly. So much being said, it is not necessary to draw out Luther's doctrine further, who in this respect "rediscovered Christianity as a religion," but it will suffice to refer to the Histories of Doctrine (Seeberg gives a full and brilliant exposition), to Theologie, 2. Aufl., 1901 (Die Index a.v. "Rechtfertigung," and I, 349), and esp. to Thieme, Die sittliche Triebkraft des Glaubens: Eine Untersuchung zu Luthere Theologie, 1893, 103–311.

From Luther and the other reformers the NT doctrine went over to the Protestant churches without essential modification, and has remained their nominal testimony until the present. A classic expression of it, which may be taken as representing evangelical Christendom, is the 11th of the 39 Articles of the Anglican Church of England: "We are accounted righteous before God only for the merit of Our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ by faith, and not for our own works or de-servings: wherefore that we are justified by faith only is a most wholesome doctrine and very full of comfort, as more largely is expressed in the Homily of Justification." It is true that at one time Wesley's opponents accused him of departing from this doctrine, esp. on account of his famous Minute of 1770, but this was due to a radical misunderstanding of that Minute, for to the last he held staunchly Paul's doctrine (for proof see my article in Lutheran Quarterly, April, 1906, 171–75).

A new point of view was brought into modern theology by Lyman, who starts from the fundamental fact of Christian experience: reconciliation with Christ, which fact becomes ours by union with Christ through faith. To this union brings into the heart all other blessings, but justification is not considered as even in thought a separate act based on Christ's death, but as part of a great whole of salvation, historically realised step by step in Christ. The result is to break and destroy the distinction between justification and regeneration, as they are simply different aspects of union with Christ.

Ritschl carried forward this thought by emphasizing the grace of the Father. The 3rd Council of Trent, in the name of Christ the Son to the Christian community, says: "To which God imputes the praise of the Church its founder," and in the second instance to individuals "as by faith in the Gospel they attach themselves to this community, they believe with God and trust in the revelation of his grace in Christ." This brings sinners to fellowship with God which means eternal life, which is here and now realized, as the Fourth Gospel points out, in leadership over the world (cf. Franks in DCQ, I, 929–36). The judicial or forensic aspect of justification so thoroughly in-wrought in Paul's thought is denied by Ritschl. "In whatever way we view the matter," he says, "the attitude of God in the act of justification cannot be conceived as that of a judge" (Christian Doctrine of Justification and Reconciliation, ET, 1906, 90). W. N. Clarke agrees with Ritschl in eliminating regeneration as an element in the work of salvation, and harks back to the Catholic view in seeking its dependence on the new life as the subsequent Christian life. Thus the Ritschlian book has had as much influence in destroying the NT conception of justification as it has in concealing the readers as that of J. H. Newman, Lectures on Justification, 1838, 3d ed, 1874, which contains some of the finest passages in religious literature (pp. 227–29), but which was so sympathetic to the Catholic view that the author had nothing essential to retract when he joined Rome in 1845. "Whether we say we are justified by faith, or by works, or by sacraments, all these but mean this one doctrine that we are justified by grace which is given through sacraments, imprecated by faith, manifested in works" (p. 306).

Lastly, has the NT conception of justification by faith any message to the modern man, or is it, as Lagarde held, dead in the Protestant churches, something which went overboard with the old doctrine of the Trinity and of Atonement? After an able historical survey, Holl concludes (Die Rechtfertigungsgleber im Lichte der Geschichte d. Protestantismus, Tübingen, 1906, 40–42) that there are two principles thoroughly congenial with this doctrine, viz. that of the sano and importance of personality, the 'I' that stands face to face with God, responsible to Him alone; and second, the restoration of the Reformation thought of an all-working God. The pressure of these two principles, for him the question of justification becomes a living one. "The stand-

The doctrine has not had its day. It is a part of the

once in Nah 2 4 (in AV and RV), where ARV has "rush to and fro."

JUSTUS, jus'tus' (יוֹשֵׁב, Yo'shôb): There are three of this name mentioned in the NT.

(1) It was the Rom surname of Joseph Barsabbas (q.v.) (Acts 1 28).

(2) A Corinthian proecleety (σέβομαι τόν Θεόν), whose house adjoined the synagogue and who received Paul when the Jews opposed him (Acts 18 7). He was probably a Rom citizen, one of the coloni, and so he would be of assistance to the apostle in his work among the better class of Corinth. There is some disagreement among MSS regarding the name. TR gives "Justus" alone, RV following NE, Vulg, Boh, Arm, gives "Titus Justus"; WH, Tisch., B.D, give "Titus Justus"; Cheyne (EB, a.v. "Justus") thinks these forms a corruption of "Tertius Justus," and that the bearer of the name was the "Tertius" of Rom 16 22.
Paul still continued his lodgings with Aquila and Priscilla, but made the house of Justus his own synagogue.

(3) A Jew, Jesus Justus, mentioned with Mark and Aristarchus by Paul in his letters to the Colossians (Col 4 11), is a fellow-worker and one that had been a comfort unto him.

JUTTAH, jut'a' (יוֹתָה, yô'îth), Josh 21 10; LXX
Tav-e, Tawû; and in Josh 15 55 AV, LXX Irás, Iâdân, A. Iletâ); JUTAH, jô'ta, jî'ta (יוֹתָה, yô'îth), yô'dh, Josh 15 55): A town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned with Maon, Carmel and Ziph;
A Levitical city (Josh 21 16). In some VSS of LXX it occurs (Iôrâ, Iôdô) in 1 Ch 6 57. In the Onom (266 49; 133 10) a large village called "Jutta" is described as 18 Rom miles from Eleutheropolis.
This agrees with the position of Yutta, a large and prosperous Moslem village, 3,740 ft. above sea-level, 54 miles S. of Hebron and 154 miles from Beit Jehra (Eleutheropolis). There are many rock-cut tombs and ancient winepresses all around the village.

Reland (Pal, 570) suggested (and many others have followed him) that the הָוָה לֹוָה, pôlîs Iôdôa, tru "city of Judah," in Lk 1 89, should be poîta Iôda, "the city of Judah." The tr "city of Judah" is suspicious, because Iouda is without the article, which is usually put before the name of a district; the interchange of i and e is a very common one. Dr. Paterson, resident many years in Hebron, states that there is a local Moslem tradition in the district that Yutta was the home of John the Baptist. For Yutta see PEF, III, 310, Sh XXI.

K

KAB, kab (קָּב), kabb, "something hollowed out," 2 K 6 25; AV Cab): A Heb dry measure and liquid measure equal to about 2 quarts. See WEIGHTS AND MEASURES.

KABZEEIL, kab'ze'-el, kab'ze-el (קָּבֶּזֶל, kab'ze'el) "[whom] God collects": One of the "uttermost cities" of Judah toward the border of Edom in the
S. (Negbe) (Jos 15 21). It was the native place of Bennahia, the son of Jehoahaz, one of David's mighty men (2 S 23 20; 1 Ch 11 22). "Jehoah-ageezel and the villages thereof," one of the places re-inhabited by the men of Judah (Neh 11 25), appears to be the same place. The site is unknown.

KADESH, kâ'desh (קָּדֶשׁ, kô'desh); Kâshâs, Kadês, Ps 29 8; Jth 1 9). See KADESH-BARNEA.

KADESH-BARNEA, kâ'desh-bâr'ne-a (קָּדֶשׁ בָּרֶנֶא, kô'desh bâr'ne-a), Kâshâs, Kadês, Mentioned
10 t.; called also "Kadesh" simply. The name perhaps means "the holy place of the desert of wandering." There are references to Kadesh in early history. At En-mishpat ("the same is Kadesh") Chedorlomer and his allies smote the Amaeleite and Amorite. Abraham dwelt near Kadesh, and it was at Beersheba between Kadesh and Beraed that the Angel of Jehovah appeared to Hagar (Gen 14 7; 16 14; 20 1). It was an important camp of the Isrealites during their KADMIEL, kad'mi-el (ךָדָמִי־ל, kadmí'él), "before God," "priest"[7]; "Cadmieel" in II lists in 1 Esd 6 26.58 AV; omitted in LXX B; A reads kal Kadmiel'; A Levite (Ezr 2 40; Neh 7 43), founder of a family whose descendants returned from captivity with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 1; Neh 7 43; 12 18). He is named among those who praise God for the return (Neh 9 45; 12 9); of whose the waves of the Lord's house (Ezr 3 9; 1 Esd 2 40; Neh 2 2), and is again named, who "sent" the new Return Covenant (Neh 10 28 ff) after the reestablishment of worship (Neh 10 19).

KADMONITE, kad'mon-it (ךָדָמוֹנִי, kadmóni), "one of the ancient race"; The Kadmonites are mentioned in Gen 15 19 along with the Kenites and Kenizzites of Edom, and are doubtless the same as the "children of the east," whose wisdom was celebrated (1 Ki 4 30). "Kadmoni, the East," was a son of Ishmael (Gen 25 15; cf ver 6). In an Egyptian story describing the adventures of a political refugee who fled from Egypt in the time of the XIIth Dynasty, it is said that he found a refuge in Canaan in the land of Kaduma or Kedem.

KAIN, kain (ךָנָי, ha-kayin; AV Cain): A town in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 57). There is, too, apparently a reference to this place in Nu 24 21;22.

"And he looked on the Kenite, and took up his parable, and said, Strong is thy dwelling-place, And thy new moon is set in glory. Nevertheless Cain shall be walked until Assur shall carry thee away captive."

This place has been very doubtfully identified as the ruin Yahk, a place on a lofty hill S.E. of Hebron, overlooking the wilderness of Judah, which is not considerable, a few mud huts are built, occupied today by about 200 souls (Schumacher, Northern 'Ajlan, 137).

KANAH, ka'nah (ךָנָה, bōnāh, "reed"): (1) The name of a "brook," i.e. wady, or "tortent bed," which formed part of the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh (Jos 16 8; 17 9). The border of Ephraim went out westward from Tappuah to the brook Kanah, at the end; the border of Manasseh from Tappuah, which belonged to Ephraim, "went down unto the brook of Kanah, southward of the brook." There seems no good reason to doubt the identification of "the brook Kanah" with the modern Wady Kanah. The transition from the heavy to the lighter k is easy, so the phonetic difficulty is not serious. The stream rises in the S.W. of Shechem, flows through Wady Ishkar, and, joining the 'Avjah, reaches the sea not far to the N. of Jaffa. Guérin, influenced, apparently, by the masses of reeds of various kinds which fill the river argues in favor of Nahr el-Felâk, to the N. of Arvîf. He identifies it with Nahr el-Kusab, "river of reeds," mentioned by Behêd-Din, the Moslem historian. But this last must be identified with Nahr el-Mafjar, 13 miles farther N., too far N. for "the brook Kanah."

(2) A town on the northern boundary of Asher (Jos 19 28), probably identical with the village of Kana, about 7 miles S.E. of Tyre (SWP, I, 51, 64, Sh 1).
KAREAH, ka-re'ah (תֶּご利用), “bald head”): The father of Johanan and Jonathan, who after the fall of Jerus joined Gedaliah at Mizpah (2 K 25 27; Jer 40 6).

KARIATHIARIUS, kà-rí-ath-i-àr-i-us (Kapha-ami, Kariathiarus; B reads Kariaheireus; AV Kiriathiarim) [1 Eed 19])=Kiriath-jearim in Ne2 7 29.

KARKA, kàrk'ka (תֶּ roleId), ha-kar'kadi— with the art. and 5 loc. (AV Karcan): A place in the S. of Judah, between Addar and Wady el Artash (Josh 15 3). Onom speaks of a village in Judah lying toward the wilderness, named Akarka. It cannot now be identified. The name means “the pavement,” or “ground.”

KARKOR, kàrk'kor (מִרְכָּב, karck'or): An unidentified place where Gideon surprised and overwhelmed the remnants of the army of Zeba and Zalmunnah (Jgs 8 10 ff). It probably corresponds to Karkar mentioned by Shalmaneser II, S. of Hamath (KB, 1, 173).

KARTAH, kàr'tta (תֶּ רוּם), kartah: A city in the territory of Zebulun, assigned to the Levites (Josh 21 34). It is not identified. Possibly it is a variant of Kattath, or of Kartan (q.v.).

KARTAN, kàr'ttan (תֶּ רוּם), kattan: A city in the territory of Naphtali, given to the Gershonite Levites (Josh 21 32). It is called Kiriathaim in 1 Ch 6 76. Kartan may be a contraction of this. Cheyne (EB, s.v.) suggests that both names may be corruptions from “Chinnereth.” Neither is mentioned in Josh 19 32 38, in the list of Naphtalite cities, while Chinnereth is.

KATTATH, kat'th (תֶּ רוּם), battath: A city in the territory of Zebulun, named with Itphath-el, Nahalel, and Shimron (Josh 19 15), perhaps to be identified with Kitron (Jgs 1 30), from which Zebulun did not expel the Canaanites; and with Kartah (Josh 21 34), which was given to the Merarite Levites. The Bab Talm (Meg 6a) identifies Kattath with Sephoris, the modern Safrafeh (but see Neubauer, Geographia du Talmud, 191). The Jerus Talm takes it as identical with Ketemeth, Kuteineh, to the W. of Edraion. It should probably, however, be sought near Shimron, the modern Semaniyeh. W. EWING

KEDAR, kè'dar (תֶּרוּם), kethar; Kâdâr, Kâdar: Second in order of the sons of Ishmael (Gen 25 15 1 Ch 1 23). The name occurs as typical of a distant eastern country in opposition to the lands of the Mediterranean (Jer 2 10). The author of Second Isa introduces this tribe in company with Nebaioth, and both are represented as owners of flocks (Isa 60 7). Evidence of their nomadic habits appears in Jer 49 29 29, where they are classed among the Br'ar-Keedim, and mention is made of their flocks, camels, tents, curtains and furniture. They are spoken of (Isa 42 11) as dwelling in hâgerim (“villages”), from which it would appear that they were a somewhat settled tribe, which was later to degenerate into “town-dwellers,” as distinct from wobariya or “nomads.” Ezekiel (27 21) gives another hint of their pastoral nature where, in his detailed picture of the wealth of Tyre, Kedar and Arabia provide the Tyrians with lambs, rams and goats. The fame of the tribe is further reflected in Jer 21 12, as belonging to their might in war), and in the figurative references to their tents (Ps 120 5; Cant 1 5). In this last passage where the tents are made symbolic of dark beauty, the word kethar (“to be black”) may have been in the writer’s mind. The settlements of Kedar were probably in the N.W. of Arabia, not far from the border of Assyria (Isa 16 17). If Assyrian inscriptions have thrown light upon the history of the tribe, where Kedar is mentioned as one of the suzerains of Nebaioth, which decides its identity with Kedar of the OT, and there is found also an account of the conflicts between the tribe and King Assurbanipal (see Margo- liouth in HDB).

Of the Ishmaelite tribes, Kedar must have been one of the most important, and thus in later times the name came to be applied to all the wild tribes of the desert. It is through Kedar (Arab. kaddar) that Muslim genealogists trace the descent of Mohammed from Ishmael.

KEDEMAH, ke'dè-ma, ke'dè'ma (תֶּ רוּם), kethemah, “eastward”): Son of Ishmael (Gen 25 16), head of a clan (1 Ch 3 31). See KADMONITES.

KEDEMOTH, ke'dè-moth, ke'dè'moth (תֶּ רוּם), kethemôth, “eastern parte”): From the wilderness to which this town gave its name, Moses sent messengers to Sihon, king of the Amorites in Heshbon (Deut 2 26). It was given by Moses to the tribe of Reuben (Josh 13 18), and assigned to the Merarite Levites (21 37; 1 Ch 6 79). It must probably be sought on the upper course of the Arnon. Buhl (GAP, 268) suggests that it may be identified with Umm er-Repis. See JARAH.

KEDESH, ke'dè-sh (תֶּ רוּם), kedesh; Kâsîn, Kâdâs): (1) One of the “uttermost cities” of Judah “toward the border of Edom in the S.” (Josh 15 23). Possibly it is to be identified with Kadas-Arba (q.v.); otherwise it is strange that this latter should be omitted from the list. Dillmann would identify it with Kadâs, to the S. of Hebron, mentioned by Makkaddaša.

(2) A town in the territory of Issachar, given to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 72). It is called “Kedesh,” simply, in Josh 12 22, etc.; Kadesh- naphthal in Jgs 4 6; Tob 1 2; Kenaphthal in Galilee in Josh 20 7, etc. It was assigned to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 76). From the name “holy,” we gather that it was a sanctuary from old time. It was therefore a place of asylum, and only preserved its ancient character in this respect when chosen as one of the cities of refuge. It was the home of Barak, and here his host assembled. When the Assyrians invaded the land under Tiglath-pileser, it was among the first cities to be captured, and its inhabitants were deported (2 K 15 29). Near Kedesh was fought the great battle between Jonas than the Maccabees and Demetrius (1 Macc 11 63). Jos says that in his time it belonged to the Tyrians, lying between their land and that of Galilee (Ant, XIII, v. 6; BJ, II, xvii, 1; IV, ii, 3, etc.). Onom places it 20 miles from Tyre, near to Paneas. It is represented by the modern village of Kedesh, which lies on the plateau to the W. of el-Hish. It crowns a tell which runs out in a low ridge into the little plain to the W. Near the fountain, which rises under the ridge to the N., are the most interesting of the ancient remains. There are many tombs in the sarcophagi, so only altarings-troughs, from its lofty situation. The Kedesh commanded a spacious view over a richly varied landscape, with smiling cornfields, and hills clothed with oak and terebinth.

KEDES-NAPHTALI, κῆδεσναπταλί. See Kedes, 3.

KEEPER, κήπερ, KEEPERS (mostly from κῆπον, shāmar; φύλαξ, phulax): The word is used of keepers of sheep, vineyards, doors, prisons (in Gen 39 21 ff, gar; cf Acts 5 23), etc. In Ecc 12 3, "The keepers of the house shall tremble," the allusion is to the decay of bodily powers, the "keepers" being specially the arms, which had become feeble through age.

KEHELATHAH, κῆχελαθάθα, κῆ-χελαθα-θα (κῆχελαθ-, kēhelāthāh, "gathering," "assembly"): A desert camp of the Israelites between Rissah and Mt. Shepher (Nu 33 22.23). Situation is unknown. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

KEILAH, κῆλα (κῆλα, kē’lā; Keilā, Keelān): (1) A city of the Shephelah mentioned (Josh 15 44) along with Nezik, Azekih and Mareshah. Among those who repaired the walls of Jerus was "Hshah-biah, the ruler of half the district of Keilah, for his district. After him repaired their brethren, Bvayv the son of Henadad, the ruler of half the district of Keilah" (Neh 3 17.18).

It is, however, from the story of the wandering of David that we have most information regarding this place. It was a city with gates and bars (1 S 23 7). The Philis and Keilah came against it and commenced robbing the threshing-floors. David, after twice inquiring of Jeh, went down with his 600 men (ver 13) and "fought with the Philis, and brought away their cattle, and caw them with a great slaughter." Saul hearing that David and his men were in a fortified town "summoned all the people to war, to go down to Keilah, to besiege David and his men" (ver 8). Then David asked Absiath the priest to bring him an ephod, and he inquired of Jeh whether, if Saul came, the men of Keilah would surrender him to save that city; hearing from Jeh, "They will deliver thee up," he and all his men escaped from Keilah and went into the wilderness. The reputed strength of Keilah is confirmed by its mention in 5 tablets in the Am Tab under the name of Kēłā (qūṭ, Petrie) with Gedor, Gath, Rabbah and Gezer.

Although other identifications were proposed by the older topographers, there is now a general consensus of opinion that the site of this city is Khurbet Kūlā (Jos, Ani, VI, xii., 1, in his account of David’s adventure, names the place "Khī’lā"). It is a hill covered with ruins in the higher part of Wādī es Sūr, 1,575 ft. above sea-level, whose terraced sides are covered with cornfields. The Onom (Lat text) states that it was 5 miles from Eleutheropolis, which is about the distance of Kh. Kūlā from Bejt Jūbrīn. Bejt Nūsb (Nezib) is a couple of miles away, and Tell Sandahannah (Mareshah) but 7 miles to the W. (Josh 15 44). An early Christian tradition states that the prophet Haksak was buried at Keilah.

KEMUEL, kem’-ul, kem-“u”l (κῆμωλ, kēmōl, "God’s mound"): (1) Nephew of Abraham (Gen 22 21), father of Aram, whom Esawk identifies with Ram of Job 32 2; but cf Gen 10 22, where Aram is described as one of the children of Sheem. They may not be the same person.

(2) Prince of Ephraim, one of the land commissioners who divided Canaan (Nu 34 23). (3) A Levite, father of Hashabiah, one of the tribal princes of David’s time, a ruler among the Levites (1 Ch 27 17).

KENAH, κέναν (κή-ναν, kē’nān; Kénav, Kainān): A son of Enoch, the son of Seth (Gen 5 9.10.12.13. 14; 1 Ch 1 2). AV form (except in 1 Ch 1 2), is "Cainan."

KENATH, κέναθ (κή-ναθ, kē’nath; Kēθū, Kēnāth, Kōnāth in LXX, A): A city in Bashan, taken along with its "daughters," i.e. "villages" from the Amorites by Nobah who gave it his own name (Nu 32 42). It was recaptured by Geshur and Aram (1 Ch 2 23). It is probably identical with the modern Kanaawat, which is built on the site, and largely from the materials of an ancient city. It lies about 16 miles to the N. of Boqra eski Shām, the Bostra of the Romans, on both sides of Wādī Kanaawat, where, descending from the slopes of Jebel Ed-Druz, it plunges over a precipice, forming a picturesque waterfall. On the plateau above the modern village, there is a striking collection of Rom and Christian remains, the shapely forms of many columns lending distinction to the scene. One large building is associated with the name of the patriarch Jeh—Makām Ayāb. The position commands a spacious and interesting view over the whole of the Haurān. The identification has been rejected by Soin (Baederker, Pat., 207), but his reasons are not given. Moore (Jgs, 222) also rejects it, but for reasons that are not convincing. W. Ewing

KENAZ, κένας, KENEZ, κένες (κή-νες, kē’nes, "hunting"): (1) A "duke" of Edom, grandson of Esau (Gen 36 11.15.42; 1 Ch 1 36.53). (2) Father of Othniel (Josh 15 17; Jgs 1 43; 9.11; 1 Ch 4 13). (3) The unidentified κή'νας of 1 Ch 4 15, who appears to be a descendant of (2). There is, however, some difficulty with the passage here.

KENEZITE, κένεζιτ, KENEZITOS, Kenezalos, Kenezitos): AV in Gen 16 19 and RV uniformly, spell "Kenizite." The Kenezites were the clan whose name-father was Kenaz (q.v.). Their land, along with that of their Canaanite tribes, was promised to Abram (Gen 15 19). To this clan belonged Jephunneh, the father of Caleb (Nu 32 12; Josh 14 6.14). It had evidently been absorbed by the tribe of Judah. If the Kenezites went down with Jacob into Egypt, they may have become identified with his family there.

KENITES, kě̀nîts (קניטים, ḫînîṭî̂m, ḫânîṭî̂m, ḫâḇîṭî̂m, ḫâḇîṭî̂m); in Nu 24 22 and Jgs 4 11, ḫâḇîṭî̂m; oi Kĕḇâvo, koi Kenatăo, oi Kĕḇâvâ, koi Kênātō): A tribe of nomads named in association with various other peoples. They are first mentioned along with the Kadmonites and Kenizzites among the peoples whose land was promised to Abram (Gen 15 19). Balaam, seeing them from the heights of Moab, pun upon their name, which resembles the Heb ḥḇn̄, "a nest," prophecying their destruction although their nest was "set in the rock"—possibly a reference to Sela, the city. Moses, father-in-law, Jethro, is called "the priest of Midian" in Ex 3 1; 18 1; but in Jgs 1 16 he is described as a Kenite, showing a close relation between the Kenites and Midian. At the time of Sisera's overthrow, Heber, a Kenite, at peace with Jabin, king of Hazor, pitched his tent far N. of his ancestral seats (Jgs 4 17). There were Kenites dwelling among the Amalekites in the time of Saul (1 S 15 6). They were spared because they had "shown kindness to all the children of Israel, when they came up out of Egypt" (Ex 3 8). David, in his answer to Achish, links the Kenites with the inhabitants of the S. of Judah (27 10). Among the ancestors of the tribe of Judah, the Chronicler includes the Kenite Hamath, the father of the Rechabites (1 Ch 2 55). They continued to live in tents, practising the ancient nomadic customs (Jer 35 6 ff).

The word kēnî in Aram. means "smith." Professor Sayce thinks they may really have been a tribe of smiths, resembling "the gipsies of modern Europe, as are the Gipsies or black-smiths of the Middle Ages" (HDB, s.v.). This would account for their relations with the different peoples, among whom they would reside in pursuit of their calling.

In Jos they appear as Kenedites, and in Ant, IV, vii, 3 he calls them "the race of the Shechemites."

KENIZITE, kēn-iz-it. See KENIZITE.

KENOSIS, kēnō-sis (κένωσις, kĕnōsîs) has entered theological language from Phil 2 7, where in the sentence he "emptied himself" the Gr. vb. is ekēnōsen. "Kenesis," then, the covenant, has become a common word for the humiliation of the Son in the incarnation, but in recent years has acquired a still more technical sense, i.e. of the Son's emptying Himself of certain attributes, esp. of omniscience.

(1) The theological question involved was one about as far as possible from the minds of the Christians of the apostolic age and apparently one that never occurred to St. Paul. For in Phil 2 7 the only "emptying" in point is that of the change from the "form of God" to the "form of a servant." Elsewhere in the NT it is usually taken as a matter of course that Christ's knowledge was far higher than that of other men (Jn 24 is the clearest example). But passages that imply a limitation of that knowledge do exist and are of various classes. Of not much importance are the entirely incidental references to the authorship of OT passages where the traditional authorship is considered erroneous, as no other method of quotation would have been possible. But references to the nearness of the Parousia (esp. Mt 10 23; 24 29). But with this it is always a question how far the exact phraseology has been framed by the evangelists and, apart from this, how far Christ may have been consciously using current imagery for the impending spiritual renovation, although knowing that the details would be quite different (see PAROUSIA). Limitation of knowledge may perhaps be deduced from the fact that Christ could be amazed (Mt 8 25) and that He could be really tempted (esp. He 4 15), or that He possessed faith (He 12 2; see comm.). More explicitly Christ is said to have learned in Lk 2 52; He 5 8. And, finally, in Mk 13 32 || Mt 24 36, Christ states categorically that He is ignorant of the exact time of the Parousia.

(2) An older exegesis felt only the last of these passages as a real difficulty. A distinction constructed between knowledge naturally possessed and knowledge gained by experience (i.e. although the child Jesus "knew how to learn the habit of reading," He was obliged to learn it by experience) covered most of the others. For Mk 13 32 a variety of explanations were offered. The passage was trv "neither the Son, except the Father know it," a tr that can be borne by the Gr. But it simply transfers the difficulty by speaking of the Father's knowledge as hypothetical, and is an impossible tr of Mt 24 36, where the word "only" is added. The explanations that assume that Christ knew the day but had no Commission to reveal it are mostly of a similar kind, for they place insincere words in His mouth; "It is not for you to know the day" would have been the inevitable form of the saying (Acts 1 7).

(1) Yet the attempt so to misinterpret the verses is not the outcome of a barren dogmatism, but results from a dread lest real injury be done to the fundamentals of Christian consciousness. Not only does the mind of the Christian revolve from seeing in Christ something less than God, but it revolves from finding in Him two centers of personality—Christ was One. But as omniscience is an essential attribute of God, it is an essential attribute of the incarnate Son. So does not any limitation of Christ's human knowledge tend to vitiate a sound doctrine of the incarnation? Certainly, certain, to say with the uphololders of the kenosis in its "classical" form that the Son, by an exercise of His will, determined to be ignorant as man, is not helpful, as the abandonment by God of one of His own essential attributes would be the preposterous corollary. (2) Yet the Bib. data are explicit, and an explanation of some kind must be found. And the solution seems to lie in an ambiguous use of the word "kenosis" as applied to the relation of God and as man. When we speak of a man's knowledge in the sense discussed in the kenotic doctrine, we mean the totality of facts present in his intellect, and by his ignorance we mean the absence of a fact or of facts from that intellect. Not so, in the older discussions of the subject, this intellectual knowledge was tacitly assumed (mystical theology apart) to be the only knowledge worthy of the name, and so it was at the same time also assumed that God's change was a change of intellect also—"God geometrizes." Under this assumption God's knowledge is essentially of the same kind as man's, differing from man's only in its purity and extent. And this assumption is made in all discussions that speak of the knowledge of the Son as God illuminating His mind as man. (3) Modern critical epistemology has, however, taught man a sharp lesson in humility by demonstrating that the intellect is by no means the perfect instrument that it has been assumed to be. And the faults are by no means limited to its lack of imaginative, evaluative, or desires, etc., but are resident in the intellect itself, and inseparable from it as an intellect. Certain recent writers (Bergson, most notably) have even built up a case of great strength for regarding the intellect as a mere product of utilitarian development, with the defects resulting naturally from such an evolution. More esp. does this restriction of the intellect seem to be true in religious knowledge, even if the contentions of Kant and (esp.) Ritschl be not fully admitted. Certain it is, in any case, that even human knowledge is something far wider than intellectual knowledge, for there are many things that we know that we never could have learned through the intellect, and, apparently, many elements of our knowledge are almost or quite incapable of translation into intellectual terms. Omniscience, then, is by no means intellectual omniscience, and it is not to be reached by any mere process of expansion of an intellect. An "omniscient intellect" is a contradiction in terms. (4) In other words, God's omniscience is not merely human intellectual knowledge raised to the infinite power, but something of an entirely different quality, hardly conceivable to human thought—_as different from human intellectual knowledge as the Divine omnipotence is different from muscular strength._ Consequently, the passage of this knowledge into a human intellect is impossible, and the problem of the incarnation should be stated as: What effect did Divine omniscience in the person have on the conscious intellect of the manhood? There is so little help from the past to be gained in answering this question, that it must remain open at present—if, indeed, it is ever capable of a full answer. But that ignorance in the intellect of the manhood is fully consistent with omniscience in the person seems to be no merely safe answer to the question as stated, but an inevitable answer if the true humanity of Christ is to be maintained at all.

BURTON SCOTT EASTON

KERAS, ke'ras (Κῆρας, Kîras): In 1 Esd 5 29, the head of a family of temple-servants, called "Keroz" in Ezra 2 44; Neh 7 47.

KERCHIEF, ker'chi (περιτόκιον, mispadóth; em-βελα, epibélisa): Occurs only in Ezek 13 18,21, in a passage which refers to some species of divination. Their exact shape or use is unknown. They were apparently long veils or coverings put over the heads of those consulting the false prophets and reaching down to the feet, for they were for "persons of every stature."

KEREN-HAPPUCH, ker'en-hap'uk, këren-hap'uk (Προσειματα, Ëkeren hapîkh); "horn of amonmony," i.e. beautifier; LXX _'Aμαλθείας κῆρας, Amâlthéias kéras_ The 3d daughter of Job (Job 42 14), born after his restoration from affliction. Antimony, producing a brilliant black, was used among the Orientals for coloring the edges of the eyelids, making the eyes large and lustrous. Hence the suggestiveness of this name of an article of the ladies' toilet, a little horn or receptacle for the eye-paint.

KEROIOTH, kë'ri-o-th, -oth (προσειματα, kérôiôth):
1. A city of Moab, named with Beth-meon and Bozrah (Jer 49 24,41). Here was a sanctuary of Chemosh, under which Mesha says (M S, l. 13) he drugged "the altar hearths of Diblah." It may possibly be represented by the modern Karâidâ, between Dibân and _'Aftârâs._ Some (e.g. Driver on Am 2 2) think it may be only another name for Ar-Moab. Buhl (GAP, 270) would identify it with Kir of Moab (Kerak). No certainty is yet possible.
2. A city of Judah (Josh 15 25; RV Keriôth-hezion, n.v.), possibly the modern el-Kuryatain, to the N.E. of Tell Arad.

KEROIOTH-HEZRON, kë'ro-iôth-hëz'ron (προσειματα, kérôiôth hezôn; Josh 15 25 says, "The same is Hazor"); AV "Kerioth and Hezron which is Hazor"): One of the cities in the "south" of Judah. Robinson (BR, II, 101) identifies it with the ruined site of Kuryatain, 43 miles N. of Tell Arad. It has been suggested that Kerioth was the birth place of Judas Iscariot (q.v.). Cf Kerióth, 2.

KERNEL, kûr'nel (ῥωραννήμα, horannîn, EV "kernels"); LXX _stêmphûlon used by Aristophanes as=olives from which oil has been pressed, later, in same, of raiin pulp_; Mentioned in Nu 6 4 along with _zîgh, trd_ "huiske." This tr, "kernel" or "grape stones," is from the Tg and Talm, but is doubtful, and it may be the word should be trd "sour grapes."

KEROS, ke'rôs (κῆρος, kërôs, "fortress"?): One of the Nethinim (Ezr 2 44; Neh 7 47), an order appointed to the liturgical offices of the temple. See Nethinim.

KESIL, ke'sil (Orion). See ASTRONOMY.

KETAB, ke'tab (Kerâs, Kêtâd): Ancestor of a family of Nethinim (1 Esd 5 30).

KETTLE, ket'1: In EV only in 1 s 2 14 for _dâth, "a vessel for cooking._" The same word in 2 Ch 35 13 is rendered "caldrons," and in Job 41 20 (Heb 12), "pot." Ps 81 6 (Heb 7) (AV "pots") belongs rather to another signification of the word _RV basket," for carrying clay or bricks._

KETURAH, ke-tû'râ, ke-tû'rá (προσειματα, ke'turch); Kërôs, Chettarô, "incense": The second wife of Abraham (Gen 25 1; 1 Ch 1 32 f). According to the Bib. tradition, he contracted this second marriage after the death of Sarah (cf Gen 23), and very likely after the marriage of Isaac (cf Gen 24). It is not improbable that, as some writers have suggested, this change in the life of his son prompted Abraham to remarry in order to overcome the feeling of loneliness caused by Isaac's entering the state of marriage.

1. Ch 1 32 (and also Gen 25 6) shows us that K. was not considered to be of the same dignity as Sarah who, indeed, was the mother of the son of promise, and, for obvious reasons, the sons of Abraham's concubines were separated from Isaac. She was the mother of 6 sons representing Arab tribes S. and E. of Pal (Gen 25 1–6), so that through the offspring of Keturah Abraham became "the father of many nations."—WILLIAM BAHR

KEY, kë (κλεις, mapîthîn, an "opener"); cf _klês, klês, (that which shuts)_ "Made of wood, usually with nails which fitted into corresponding holes in the lock, or rather bolt (Jgs 3 25). Same is rendered "opening" in 1 Ch 9 27. See HOUSE.

Figurative: Used fig. for power, since the key was sometimes worn on the shoulder as a sign of official authority (Isa 22 22). In the NT it is used several times as such fig.: of Peter: "the keys of the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 16 19); of Christ, in Rev, having the "keys of death and of Hades" (1 18), also having "the key of David" (3 7). An angel was given "the key of the pit of the abyss" (S 1; 20). Our Lord accused the teachers of the law of His day of taking away "the key of knowledge" from men, that is, locking the doors of truth against them (Lk 11: 52; cf Mt 23: 13).

IV. CONCLUSION
1. Nature of the Power
2. Agent of the Power
3. Scope of the Power

There is no more stubbornly contested conception in Christian terminology. The thought connects itself immediately with Mt 16: 19, but it is hardly correct to say that it originates there, for the controversy is one that grows out of the conflict of forces inherent in the institutional development of religion and of society. It must have arisen, in any event, if there had been no such word as that in Mt 16: 19, although not in the same terms as it is now found. Since the Reformation it has been recognized, by Catholic and Protestant, that on the interpretation of this passage depends the authority of the Church of Rome and its exclusive claims, so far as their foundation in Scripture is concerned, while on the other hand there is involved the "va-dility" of the "sacraments," "ordinances" and "orders" of Protestantism and the very hope of salvation of Protestants.

I. THE PROBLEMS INVOLVED.—The crucial passage has two declarations, commonly spoken of as promises to Peter: to him Christ will give the keys of the kingdom of Keys; and heaven; whatsoever he shall bind on the earth shall be bound in heaven, while and Loosening whatever he shall loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven. How are the facts of having committed to him the keys and the function of binding and loosing related? Are they two forms of one declaration? Is the first general, and the second a specific sphere of its application?

Both statements are made in figurative terms. That of the keys is supposed to be drawn from the duties of the chief steward of a house, or establishment. Those of the keys of a city turned over to some distinguished person is advanced, but is hardly to be considered. We need, then, to know the functions of the chief steward and how they apply to the kingdom of heaven, and to Peter as its steward. What was Peter to do?

2. Meaning bind and loose, men or things, persons or teachings? Numerous examples exist. Statements could be cited of the use of these terms to signify forbidding (binding) and permitting (loosening) conduct as legitimate under the law of the OT (Lightfoot, McClintock and Strong, Schaff-Herzog, Hastings, etc). The strict school of Shammaj bound many things loosed by the laxer school of Hillel (Broadus, Mil). Is this conclusion that Jesus is here giving Peter authority for "laying down the law for his fellow-disciples," "authority to say what the law of God allows, and what it forbids," "the power of legislation for the church"? (cf Mason in HDB, IV, 30.)

Ecclesiastical contentions turn esp. on Peter's relation to these words of Jesus. Do they signify powers and "privileges" conferred on Peter, exclusively or representatively?

3. How Peter Is Related to These Powers

Are they official or personal? Do they belong to other apostles, and to other officers besides apostles? Can the powers be exercised individually or by the church alone? If any besides Peter have these powers, do they pass to them from Peter, and how?

What seems to the writer a fundamental question here is either passed over very lightly or entirely omitted in the discussions of this subject. Did Jesus mean by these words to confer on Peter, or on anyone to whom they may apply, authority, or obligation, privilege, or responsibility? Does he impose duty? These alternatives are not necessarily exclusive, but the interpretation of the thought will be determined in no small measure by where the stress is laid.

4. Is the Primary Idea That of Position and Authority?

Or does He impose duty? Does He impose? Does He impose duty? These alternatives are not necessarily exclusive, but the interpretation of the thought will be determined in no small measure by where the stress is laid.

II. VIEWS MAINTAINED.—The possibilities have been exhausted in the interpretations and applications advocated. It is not possible to classify on lines of the creeds, except very generally, for there is little uniformity of view existing within the various communions.

1. Agent of the Power

(1) Generally speaking, the Roman Catholic church gives to Peter a unique position. Her theologians also agree that all the apostles and deleges of Peter descend to his successors in the vicarate of Christ. When the question is raised of the extension of these prerogatives beyond Peter and the popes, all sorts of views are held, concerning both the fact and the method of that extension.

(2) Among Protestants there is general agreement that the church is the agent of this power, but there is not uniformity as to the nature of the authority or the manner of its exercise.

(3) Some think that Peter has no peculiar relation to the keys; that these words were spoken to him only as the first who gave expression to that conception and experience, on the basis of which Jesus commits the keys of the kingdom to any believer in Him as the Christ of God.

We may summarize the more important views as to Peter thus: (a) the power committed to him alone and exercised, (i) at Pentecost, or (ii) at Pentecost, Caesarea and other places; (b) the power committed to Peter and to the other apostles, including Paul, discharged by them, and descended to no others; (c) the power conferred on Peter officially and on his official successors; (d) the power conferred on Peter and the other apostles and to such as hold their place in the church; (e) that the power belongs to Peter as representative of the church, and so to the church to be exercised (i) by the officials of the church, (ii) by the officials and those to whom they commit it, (iii) by all priests and persons allowed to represent the church, de facto, (iv) by the church in its councils, or other formal and official decisions, (v) by the church in a less formal way than (iv), (vi) by all members of the church as representing it with specific commission; (f) that it belongs to the Christian as such, and so is imposed upon, or offered to, all Christians.

There is general—not absolute—agreement that the holder of the keys is to admit men into the kingdom. It had not been agreed that the holder of the keys may, or can, determine who are members of the kingdom.

2. Nature of the Power
Both sides are taken. Some think that the power is that of announcing authoritatively the conditions of entrance, while others insist that the holder of the keys also signifies what individuals have accepted the conditions.

(1) There is strong support for the view that the primary function of the keys lies in determining the teaching of the kingdom, maintaining the authority of doctrinal preaching. Emphasis is laid on the use of the neuter, “whatever”—not “whomsoever”—with the binding and loosing. This would lead, however, to the secondary and implied function of declaring who has accepted the teaching of the kingdom.

(2) In the Roman Catholic church we find insistence on distinguishing between the general authority of the keys in all affairs of the church and religion, and the binding and loosing which they specifically apply to absolution. Only on this last are Catholics in full agreement. That the church administers salvation held by Rom and Gr Catholics and by not a few Protestants, although Protestants do not, as a rule, claim exclusive power in salvation as do the Romanists. Absolution is held to be a general (derived) priestly function, while the authority of the keys resides in the pope alone.

(3) Eminent Catholic authorities admit that the Fathers generally understood the key to signify the power of forgiving sins, and that they seldom make any reference to the supremacy of Peter. But they claim that rarely the Fathers do take “Christ’s promise in the fuller meaning of the gift of authority over the church. Absolution is the first to develop the doctrine that it conferred on Peter and his successors authority in its widest sense, administrative and legislative.

(4) The extension of the authority of the keys to include civil matters is a contention of the Roman church. It is not modified by some Protestants. Indeed the relation of ecclesiastical to civil authority must be said still to be awaiting clear definition in Protestantism. Macedo (De Claibus Petri) claims the theologians of the church for the civil authority of the keys. Joyce in the Catholic Enc. affirms that he is unable to verify this claim, but, on the contrary, finds that the opponents of the extension of the authority of the church to civil matters use Mt 16 19 in support of their position on the ground that to Peter were committed the keys of the kingdom of heaven, not of the kingdoms of this world.

III. Data for Deciding the Questions Involved.

We must first examine the Scriptures employing the terms "key," "binding," and "loosening."

1. Passages
Mt 16 19, the crucial passage, is part of an employing the terms "key," "binding," and "loosening." The incident at Caesarea Philippi was understood then and afterward to marking an epoch in the life and teaching of Jesus. Having elicited Peter's confession, Jesus pronounces a benediction on him because his insight represented a Divinely mediated experience of fundamental significance in His own plan and mission. Jesus goes on to say: "And I also say unto thee, that thou art Peter ('"a stone"'), and upon this rock I will build my church; and the gates of Hades shall not prevail against it." (ver 18). The controversy rages about "Peter" (πέτρος, πέτρα) and the "rock" (ράκτα, ράκα), "gates of Hades," and "prevail against it." Are the church to be built on the rock and the kingdom whose keys are to be given to Peter the same? Such a shifting of figure is not conclusive against the thought. Perhaps the church is the organic form of the kingdom, its personal content and expression on earth at any given time. This church exists wherever men consciously accept and are included in the kingdom. The kingdom will always embrace influences, institutions, individuals, not be reckoned in any organized or visible church. The church has never had—in the nature of the case can never have—one complete organization including all the organized life of the kingdom, or even of the church.

Any claims to this are contradicted by facts obvious at every moment of history. The change in figure from ver 18 to ver 19 is not conclusive against supposing the church to be built in him. But it seems far better to understand that Peter is the first stone in the building, whose laying was the giving of the visible experience in which Peter came to know Jesus as the Christ, the Son of God. On this is erected the church, out of those living stones (κύλις γρανίτες, κύλινς σόλιδες, 1 Pet 4) that know and confess the Jesus the Christ. The transitional nature of the keys of the kingdom of heaven, and the reason for giving them to him rather than to any other may be found in the fact that he is now the first so to enter into the kingdom as to be fitted for church functions.

It is not needful to determine, for our purpose, the exact meaning of "gates of Hades" and their not prevailing against the church (of various comms.). It is clear that the church is to persist in the life of the world and so the kingdom will not lack organized and aggressive expression. Nor does the relation of binding and loosing depend at all upon the critical question of reading or omitting "and" between the two parts of the verse. The conviction could hardly be escaped that the two are intimately related to the former, and is either directly or indirectly involved within it.

(2) The pl. "keys," occurs elsewhere only in Rev 1 18, where the Christ represents Himself as holding the keys of death and Hades, and using "Hades" might connect this with Mt 16 10. The immediate occasion for the statement is that He who was dead, is alive; He has not only overcome death in His own person but has conquered it and its realm, so that they can no more have power except as subject to Him, since He holds their keys. Men on earth will either fall under the power of death and Hades or they must enter the kingdom of heaven. If the living Christ has the keys of the kingdom in the hands of Peter, or other friends, and holds the keys of its enemies in His own hands, the work will go on with success. It is not certain that the two passages can properly be so closely connected, but they thus afford just the assurance that is contained for the churches in Rev.

(3) In Rev 3 7 Christ appears in the character, "he that is holy, he that is true, he that hath the key [sing.] of David, he that openeth and none can shut, and shutteth and none openeth. The idea is not restricted but indicated over all things in the Messianic kingdom, its own operations and all forms of opposition. In the next verse, as a specific instance, He has set before the church at Philadelphia an open door (opportunity and progress) which none can shut. Cf as to this Eph 1 22.

Keys, Power of
(4) It seems to be taken for granted that Jesus, in Mt 16 19, had direct reference to Isa 22 22, yet the passage is not Messianic except in a general sense and on the assumption that the power of Jeh over the nation was the power of the Christ in the NT (see Jerovar; Lord). Eliaakin is to have absolute power, holding the key of the house of David. The use of the words "open" and "shut," as well as the general conception, connects the passage rather with Rev 3 7.

(5) Rev 9 1; 20 1 are to be taken together. The key of the pit of the abyss" in the hands of the angel or angels signifies, in these specific circumstances, the same power as that indicated in 1 13.

(6) In Lk 11 52 Jesus pronounces a woze upon the "lawyers" who had "taken away the key of knowledge" from the people, neither entering in nor allowing those about to go in, to enter. The knowledge of God and Divine things was in the control, in great measure, of those who are not permitted to enter the Kingdom of God. Thus Jesus connects the figure directly with the idea of Mt 16 19, and the connection is emphasized by comparing Mt 25 21; and is made definite by the word of Jesus in Mt 15 32 with which Lk 18 9 could not be allowable to suppose that Jesus meant to limit the idea of "the faithful and wise steward" to Peter. This passage with the references seems to be highly important for our subject.

It is to be drawn from several passages that do not use the exact terms of Mt 16 19, but that deal with the same general ideas.

2. Related Passages (1) Mt 18 18 places the responsibility for binding and loosing on the disciples (18 1), and the reason is explained in the assured presence of the Christ Himself in any company of two or three who have come together in prayer touching any matter in His name, i.e. as His representatives. The immediate reference is to matters of discipline in the effort to rescue any "brother" from sin. The passage is to be taken of sin generally, for the reading "against thee" (ver 15) is to be rejected, in spite of both the revised VSS. The reference to binding and loosing here to the man is conclusive against limiting the idea in 16 19 to teaching (cf also Lk 17 1 ff.). It is also to be noted that the responsibility is placed upon the individual Christian to cooperate with others when necessary. Thus it shows that the multitude recognized that God had given power on earth to pronounce forgiveness of sins, and apparently they do not limit this power to the Divine Person, for they do not yet know Him as such.

(3) Jas 5 14 ff recognizes the value of elders, and probably of others also, in securing the forgiveness of their that have sinned.

(4) What one must regard as the proper starting point for studying this subject is Jn 20 19 ff. Appear in ten of the apostles and to others on the first night after the resurrection, Jesus says: "As the Father sent me, even so send I you. And when he had said this, he breathed on them, and saith unto them, Whosesoever sins ye forgive, they are forgiven unto them; and whatsoever sins ye retain, they are retained." By comparing this with the corresponding account in Lk 24 we see that Jesus is directing to his work upon earth. He teaches them as to the nature of His work in the OT, and as to the method of their work is to be preaching repentance and remission of sins in His name among all nations. Significant for our purpose are the presence of others than the apostles, the gift of the Holy Spirit, His own self-projection in His messengers, and the solemn statement that the sins of men will be retained or forgiven as it is done through these followers.

(1) It is remarkable that there is no distinct reference to this authority of the keys in the records of the NT, except by the Church. The point of emphasis in all the various forms and occasions of giving of the commission (see Acts 2 22; 3 15; 4 33; 5 32; 10 39; 11 31; 1 Pet 5 1; cf Carver, Missions in the Plan of the Ages). It is said of Paul and Barnabas (Acts 13 17) that after their first mission they were rehearsed to the church at Antioch "all things that God had done with them, and that he had opened a door of faith unto the Gentiles." At Pentecost and at other times Peter was the chief speaker, and so opened the door of the kingdom. Referring to his preaching to Cornelius and his friends, Peter reminds the saints in the conference at Jerusalem (Acts 15) that God made choice among them, that by his mouth the Gentiles should hear the word of God and believe, but this was before the Gentiles should receive the Jewish party and not as claiming any priority in authority. It was Philip, the deacon-evangelist, who first preached to the Samaritans (Acts 8), and some "men of Cyprus and Cyrene, who, when they were come unto Antioch, spoke the word of God" (Acts 11 20), the first example of "opening a door of faith" to full heathen. Peter appears in the Jerusalem conference with no authority above that of other apostles and elders. By reference to Gal 2 we seem to see only as a matter of prudence and fraternity, not recognizing any authority to legislate for his churches or his ministry. The decision there reached is promulgated as that of the brethren as a body, losing all the law of Moses save four matters that were "necessary" on account of fundamental morals and of the universal presence of Jews in every city (Acts 15 20 f. 28 f). In the sense of teaching Christian conduct all Paul's letters are examples of binding and loosing.

(2) As to binding and loosing sins Peter speaks in the cases of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5), Simon Magus (ch 8), and in deciding upon the baptism of Cornelius and his household (10 48). Paul speaks with equal boldness in the judgment of Elymas (13 10), where we are told that 9 8 shows under the Spirit; passes upon the faith of a dozen men at Ephesus, and requires their new baptism after instruction (19 9-7); commands the church at Corinth to turn over to Satan the incestuous man 1 Cor 5 5; cf 1 Tim 1 20), and later urges the man's restoration to loving fellowship, declaring that he has been forgiven (2 Cor 2 5 ff). Obscure men like Philip (Acts 8) and Ananias of Damascus in the case of Paul himself (Acts 9) exercised the same sort of judgment as to the forgiveness and reception of men into the fellowship.

IV. Conclusion.—We sum up what seems to be the teaching of Scripture. We conclude that the power is not a special privilege and extraordinary authority, but a responsibility intrusted by Jesus Christ as the method of extending His work.

There is in it nothing magical, mysterious, or arbitrary; not ecclesiastical or official, but spiritual and in the NT, the kingdom of heaven is first of all the gospel of salvation through Jesus Christ. By this means men are admitted into the kingdom. The fully attested method of using the keys is that of witnessing personally to an experience of Jesus Christ. He was conferring power for saving and not for barring from salvation. Let it be borne in mind always that Jesus was offering Peter not power but duty, not privilege but responsibility. Neither of these terms, “power” and “privilege,” that have come to be associated with the gift of the keys occurs with that gift in the words of the Master. The keys are primarily for admitting to the kingdom of heaven, not for barring from the church.

The holder of the keys is any man with that experience that called forth from Jesus the assurance that Peter should have the keys.

2. Agent of the Power: By Jew, the man who will be in fellowship and cooperation with Jesus, in a church, and the Spirit of Jesus will be present in them, so that their decisions and their testimony will be His as well as theirs. There is a corporate, or church, agency, therefore, and the man who would ignore that lacks the experience or the Spirit needful for the use of the keys. Yet the church is never to overshadow or exclude the individual responsibility and authority.

It is to be understood that the keys of the kingdom of heaven confer no political authority or power, save that of holy and redemptive influence. The kingdom of Jesus is not of this world. Its power is spiritual and is to be exercised always in the saving of men. We do not need to be locked out of the kingdom. They are out, and too contented to remain so. It does happen that evil men seek to take possession of the kingdom for evil ends, and then it is that the authority rests in spiritual men to exclude. Men that are to be brought into the kingdom of heaven are now in sin, and where the duty of releasing them is not discharged by Christians, the sinners are left bound in their sins.

There is also involved of necessity the duty of declaring not only the conditions of entrance into the kingdom, but the courses of conduct appropriate to the kingdom. It is thus that binding and loosing in teaching devolve upon the holders of the keys. To that extent, and in that sense, alone, is there the power of “legislat ing” within the kingdom. This is only interpreting and applying the principles that are given us in the Scriptures. See further An-solution; Imposition of Hands; Peter; Rock. See also Keys to the Kingdom.

KICK (lak'tôs, laktáso): In the famous vision on the road to Damascus the unseen voice said to Saul: “Why persecutest thou me? It is hard for thee to kick against the goad” (Acts 9 41; 26 14). The words are omitted from the best MSS in 9 41. This was a familiar proverb in both Gr and Lat lit., and refers to the severer goading received by an ox which kicks back at the goad used to guide or urge him on. The words seem to mean that Paul’s paroxysm of persecution was a painful as well as profitless resistance to the pricks of conscience by which God was leading him into the light.

The term is used particularly of the fat of the goats, the fat of the sheep, and the fat of the ox. By kōddîh, lit. “kid of the goats,” AV Vm (Jgs 6 19, etc); (4) רֶ֖ס, ’rās, lit. “goat” (Dt 14 21; 1 K 20 27); (5) דָּ֥שָׁ֖ת, ’dāshat, AV “kid of the goat,” RV “he-goat” (Gen 37 31; Lev 9 3, etc); (6) ָהָ֥רָ֖ף, ’ērāph (Lk 15 29). See Goat.

KIDNAPPING, kid'nap-ning (MANSTEALING): The term itself occurs only in the NT (ἀφαπουργία, andραποδίσεις = “manstealer”) in 1 Tim 1 10. The crime was directly forbidden in the Heb law (Ex 21 16; Dt 24 7), and was made punishable with death.

KIDNEYS, kid'nez (always in the pl. πέρις, kliŏdôth; νήφροι, nephrom; Lat renes, whence the Eng. “reins”): “Reins” and “kidneys” are synonyms, but AV undertook a distinction by using the former word in the figurative and the latter in the literal passages. ERV has followed AV exactly, but ARV has retained “reins” only in Job 15 13; Lam 3 13; Rev 2 23, elsewhere substituting “heart,” except in Ps 139 13, where “inward parts” is used. AV and ERV also have “reins” for רֶ֖ס, kōddî̂qain, in Isa 11 5 (ERV “reins”). The physiological function of the kidneys is not referred to in the Bible, but has been introduced (quite wrongly) by AVm to Lev 15 22; 22 4. (1) The kidneys owe their importance in the Bible partly to the fact that they are imbedded in fat, and fat of such purity that “fat of the kidneys” was a proverbial term for surpassing excellence (Dt 32 14 m). For the visceral fat was the part of the animal best adapted for sacrificial burning, and hence came to be deemed particularly sacred (Lev 7 22-25; 1 3 10). Accordingly, the kidneys with the fat surrounding them were burned in every sacrifice in which the entire animal was not consumed, whether in peace (Lev 3 4.10.15; 9 19, sin (Ex 29 13; Lev 4 9; 8 10; 16 9), or trespas-ses (Lev 4 7) offerings (cf. Lev 6 29); (2) “Kidneys” is a term of medical usage, and in a certain sense is worded by the Bible. For instance, the terms used for the kidneys and their ailiments are, as a rule, based on the Gr term for kidneys Νέφρον, in spite of the fact that the anatomy of the kidneys is not correctly represented. However, it is true that the kidney is a peculiarly inaccessible organ, and in cutting an animal they are the last organs to be reached. Consequently, they were a natural symbol for the most hidden part of a man (Ps 139 13), and in Job 16 13 to “cleave the reins under” is to effect the total destruction of the individual (cf 19 27; Lam 3 13). This hidden location, coupled with the sacred sacrificial use, caused the kidneys to be thought of as the seat of the innermost moral (and emotional) impulses. So the psalmist instruct (Ps 16 7) or are “pricked” (Ps 33 21), and God can be said to be far from the reins of sinners (Jer 12 2). In all of these passages “conscience” gives the exact meaning. So the reins rejoice (Prov 23 16), cause torment (2 Esd 6 34), or tremble in wrath (1 Mac 2 24). And to “know” or “try the reins” (usually joined with “the heart”) is an essential power of God’s, denoting His complete knowledge of the nature of every human being (Ps 7 9; 26 2; Jer 11 20; 17 10; 20 12; Wis 1 0; Rev 2 23). See Paraclete; stomach; organs; organ. Cf RS, 379-80, and for Gr sacrificial parallels Journal of Philology, XIX (1890), 46. The anatomical relations are well exhibited in the plate in SBOT, “Leviticus.”

BURTON SCOTT EASTON
KIDRON, kid'ron (Κιδρών, Kidrōn; AV Cedron): A place which, in obedience to Antiochus Sidetes, Cendebeaeus fortified (1 Mac 16 39 ff), to which, when defeated, he fled, hotly pursued by John and Judas, sons of Simon the Macabeus, who burned the city (16 4 ff). It is named along with Jarmnia (Yebna) and Azotus (Esdah). It is possibly identical with kâtarah, a village about 3 miles S.W. of lákir (Ekron).

KIDRON, THE BROOK (נָהֲלוֹלֵלֶד, nahal kidhron; in Jn 18 1 [AV Cedron], גִּדְדְרֹן, gidderōn, ho cheimárrhous tòn Kídrôn, according to RVm, the last two words are to be considered as meaning "of the cedars.

The Heb word has been very generally accepted as from "עָלָלֶד, alalad, "to become black," but it is an attractive suggestion [Cheyne] that it may be a phonetic variant of נהל, nahal, "a spot for inclosures for cattle," of which latter there must have been many around the now buried caves which lay at the base of the cliffs around the spring Gilon.

The Nahal Kidron is the valley known today as the Wady Sitti Miriam, which lies between the eastern walls of Jerus and the Mount Sitti Miriam making a wide sweep S.E., under the name Wady el Jōz ("Valley of the Walnuts"), passes S. until level with the southeastern corner of the temple-area where its bed is spanned by an old bridge; here the bottom of the valley, 40 ft. beneath the present surface level, is 400 ft. below the temple-platform. From this point it narrows and deepens gradually, bending slightly W. of S., and, after receiving the Tyropean valley, joins a little farther S.W. with the Valley of Hinnom to form the Wady en Nār, which winds on through the "wilderness of Judaea" to the Dead Sea. Where the three valleys run together is a large open space filled with gardens (the King's Gardens, q.v.), which are kept irrigated all the year round by means of the overflow waters from the 'Ain Sūlām (see SILOAM).

It is where the Hinnom valley runs into the Kidron that some would locate Topišet (q.v.). Except at the irrigated gardens, the ravine is a dry valley containing water only during and immediately after heavy rain, but in ancient times, the rocky bottom—now buried beneath many feet of rich soil—must have contained a little stream from Gilon for at least some hundreds of yards. This was the "brook that flowed through the midst of the land" (2 Ch 32 4). The length of the valley from its head to Bír Eyyūb is 21 miles.

Since the 4th cent. AD, this valley has been known as the VALLEY OF JEHOASHAPAT (q.v.), and from quite early times it was a favorite situation for interments (2 K 23 4.6.15; 2 Ch 34 4.5); it is by Moslem and Jewish tradition the scene of the last judgment, and was known to the Moslems in the Middle Ages as Wady Jehannum; see GEHENNA. It is probable that the "graves of the common people," which King Jehoshakim cast the body of the prophet Uriah, were here (Jer 26 23), and it has been suggested, with less probability, that here too may have been the scene of Ezekiel's vision of the "valley of dry bones" (Ezk 37; cf Jer 31 40).

The Fields of Kidron (2 K 23 4), though generally identified with the open, lower part of this valley, where it is joined by the Tyropean valley, may possibly have been in the upper part where the wide expanded valley receives the name Wady el Jōz; this part is actually on the road to Bethel.

The most dramatic scene associated with the Kidron is that recorded in connection with its earliest Scriptural mention (2 S 15 34), when David, flying before his rebellious son Absalom, here stood on an inclosure the Jews side of the valley while all his adherents passed over and the whole country wept with a loud voice, and all the people passed over: the king also himself passed over the brook Kidron... toward the way of the wilderness. The passing over this brook appears to have been viewed as the solemn abandonment of the Jews territory (cf 1 K 2 37). In 1 K 15 13; 2 Ch 16 16, we read that Ass burnt at the brook Kidron an abominable image for an Asherah which Maacah, his mother, had set up.

In the reforms of Hezekiah, all the uncleannesses that they found in the temple of Jeh was carried by the Levites to the brook Kidron (2 Ch 29 16); "All the altars for incense took they away, and cast them into the brook Kidron" (30 14). This locality was again used in the reformation of Josiah when the king "brought out the Asherah from the house of Jeh, without Jerus, unto the brook Kidron, and burned it at the brook Kidron, and beat it to dust, and cast the dust thereof upon the graves of the common people" (2 K 23 6). The same treatment was given to the vessels made for Baal, the Asherah and the host of heaven (ver 4), and the two idolatrous altars of Manasseh (ver 12). Jos (Ant IX, 73) states that Athaliah was slain in the valley of Kidron, but this does not quite tally with the text account (2 K 11 16). It was a valley associated with graves and the ashes of abominations, but it was prophesied that it should be "holy unto Jeh." (Jer 31 40). Twice it is mentioned simply as "the valley," nahal (2 Ch 36 14; Neh 2 15). Very different from these earlier scenes is the last Scriptural reference (Jn 18 1), when Jesus "went forth with his disciples over the brook Kidron" for His last hours of spiritual struggle and prayer before the turmoil of the end.

KILAN, klān (Κιλάν, Kilan; AV Ceilan): Mentioned with Azotas in 1 Esd 5 15; their sons returned among the exiles with Zerubbabel. The names do not appear in the lists of Ezra and Neh.

KIMAH, kl'ma (Pleisades). See ASTRONOMY.

KIN. See KINDRED.

KIN, NEXT OF. See KINSMAN.

KINAH, kl'nah (קינאה, kināh): An unidentified town on the southern boundary of Judah, toward Edom (Josh 15 22). The word kināh means "elegy," "dirge," "lament for the dead." The name, however, may have been derived from the KINDRED, kin'dred: Several words are rendered "kinred" in AV. פָּדַּיָּה, "brother," was used loosely among Hebrews for a member of the same tribe or family, a relative; and is once "kindred" (1 Ch 12 29 AV). Once also somewhat loosely as the tr of בָּנָא, מִדֶּה, "brotherhood," "love of brethren," for "kindred" (Ruth 3 2; cf same root in 2 1, rendered "kinsman"); once, for the figurative expression, "men of thy redemption" (Rom 8 28), g'dolah, referring to the law of the redemption of land by kinsmen, Lev 25 25).

The two most common words for kindred are: (1) פּוּדַיָּה, מִדֶּה, "related by birth" (Gen 12 24; 33 19; Num 10 30; Est 2 10, 20; 8 6); (2) מִשְׂפָּה, מִשְׁפָּה, "family" (Gen 24 38, 40, 41; Josh 6 23; Ruth 2 3; 1 Ch 16 28; Job 32 2; Ps 22 27; 96 7).

In the NT (several times), γενεά, γένος, "kindred by birth," so, of same family, tribe or race (Acts 4 6; 7 13; RV "race"); so also συγγένες, συγγενής (7 14). In AV φαῦλα, χήρα, "tribe," rendered "kindred" (Rev 1 7; 5 9; 7 9; 11 9; 13 7; 14 6), but better "tribe" as in RV, παρεχόμενοι, παρεχόμενος, rendered "kindred" in Acts 3 25, is better "families," as in RV.

KINE, kin: (1) בּוּדַּיָּה, כָּעָר, pl. of בּוּדַּיָּה, כָּעָר, "cows," ARV "cattle" AV and ERV "kine" (Dt 7 13; 28 4 18.51); (2) בּוּדַּיָּה, בּוּדַּיָּה, "ox," or "cow," ARV "cattle" AV and ERV "kine" (Dt 7 13; 28 4 18.51); (2) בּוּדַּיָּה, בּוּדַּיָּה, "beef," or "cow," ARV "beef," AV and ERV "kine" (Dt 32 14; 28 17 29); (3) בּוּדַּיָּה, בּוּדַּיָּה, "young cow" or "heifer," RV "kine" in Gen 41 2 27; 1 6 7 14; Am 4 1; in Gen 32 15, ARV has "cows." See CATTLE; Cow.

1. King. —The Hebrew word for king is בּוּדַּיָּה, melekh; its denominative בּוּדַּיָּה, malkhúth, "to reign," "to be king." The word is apparently derived from the root הָלַךְ which denotes "to go," "to reign," inasmuch as the possessor is also lord and ruler; (2) in the Aramaic (בּוּדַּיָּה), and Assyr "counsel," and in the Syrian "to consult"; of Lat. consilium. If, as has been suggested, the root idea of "king" is "counselor" and not "ruler," then the rise of the kingly office and power would be due to intellectual superiority rather than physical prowess. And since the first form of monarchy known was that of a "city-state," the office of king may have evolved from that of the chief "elder," or intellectual head of the clan.

The first king of whom we read in the Bible was Nimrod (Gen 10 8, 10), who was supposedly the founder of the Bab empire. Historical research regarding the kings of Babylonia and Egypt corroborates this Bib statement in so far as the ancestry of these kings is traced back to the earliest times of antiquity. According to Isa 19 11, it was the pride of the Egyptians that they could trace their lineage to most ancient kings. The Canaanites and Philist had kings as early as the times of Abraham (Gen 14 2; 20 2). Thus also the Edomites, who were related to Israel (Gen 36 31), the Moabites, and the Midianites had kings (Nu 22 4; 31 8) earlier than the Israelites.

In Gen 14 18 we read of Melchisedek, who was a priest, and king of Salem. At first the extent of the dominion of kings was often very limited, as appears from the story of the Egyptian princes that they could trace their lineage to most ancient kings. The Canaanites and Philist had kings as early as the times of Abraham (Gen 14 2; 20 2). Thus also the Edomites, who were related to Israel (Gen 36 31), the Moabites, and the Midianites had kings (Nu 22 4; 31 8) earlier than the Israelites.

The earliest Bib. usage of this title "king," in consonance with the general oriental practice, denotes an absolute monarch, who exercised unchecked control over his subjects. In this sense the title is applied to Jeh, and to human rulers. No constitutional obligations were laid upon the ruler nor were any restrictions put upon his arbitrary authority. His good or bad conduct depended upon his own free will.

The title "king" was applied also to dependent kings. In the NT it is used even for the head of a province (Rev 17 12). To distinguish him from the smaller and dependent kings, the king of Assyria bore the title "king of kings."
wealth, having Jeh Himself as the Head and Ruler. The theocracy is not to be mistaken for a hierarchy, nor can it strictly be identified with the centralized power, constituting Israel a nation. In lieu of a strong political center, the unifying bond of a common allegiance to Jeh, i.e. the common faith in Him, the God of Israel, kept the tribes together. The consciousness that Jeh's kingship as Israel's was national feeling, and the inspiration of a true patriotism (Ex 15 18; 19 6; Jgs 5). Jeh's kingship is evinced by the laws He gave to Israel, by the fact that justice was administered in His name (Ex 22 28), and by His leading and aiding Israel in its wars (Ex 14 14; 15 3; Nu 21 14; 1 S 18 17; 25 28). This decentralized system which characterized the early government of Israel politically, in spite of some great advantages, proved advantageous for Israel on the whole and served a great providential purpose. It safeguarded the individual liberties and rights of the Israelites. When the monarchy was established, they enjoyed a degree of local freedom and self-control that was unknown in the world. There was freedom for every community, which admitted the untrammelled cultivation of their inherited religious and social institutions.

From the political point of view Israel, through the growth of the people's development, was at a great disadvantage, making almost impossible its development into a world-empire. But this barrier to a policy of self-aggrandizement was a decided blessing from the viewpoint of Israel's providential mission to the world. It made possible the transmission of the pure religion instilled to it, to later generations of men without destructive contamination from the ungodly forces with which Israel would inevitably have come into closer contact, had it not been for its self-contained character, resulting from the fashion of a state it was providentially molded into. Only as the small and insignificant nation that it was, could Israel perform its mission as "the depository and perpetuation of the principle of humanity." Thus its religion was the central authority of this nation, supplying the lack of a centralized government. Herein lay Israel's uniqueness and greatness, and also the secret of its strength as a nation as long as the loyalty and devotion to Jeh lasted. Under the leadership of Moses and Joshua who, though they exercised a royal authority, acted merely as representatives of Jeh, the influence of religion which of these leaders were a personal embodiment was still so strong as to keep the tribes united for common action. But when, after the removal of these strong leaders, Israel no longer had a standing representative of Jeh, these changes took place which eventually necessitated the establishment of the monarchy. In the absence of a special representative of Jeh, His will as Israel's King was divined by the use of the holy lot in the hand of the highest priest. But the lot would not supply the place of a strong personal leader. Besides, many of the Israelites came under the deteriorating influence of the Can. worship and began to adopt heathenish customs. The sense of religious unity weakened, the tribes became disunited and ceased to act in common, and as a result the people was in a condition of necessity came to their assistance by sending them leaders, who released the regions where they lived from foreign attacks. But these leaders were not the strong religious personalities that Moses and Joshua had been; besides, they had no official authority, and their rule was only temporary and local. It was now that the need of a centralized political government was felt, and the only type of permanent organization of which the age was cognizant was the kingship. The crown was offered to Gideon, but he declined it, saying: "Jeh shall rule over you" (Jgs 8 22.23). The attempt of his son, Abimelech, to establish a kingship over Shechem and the adjacent country, after the Canaanite fashion, was abortive.

The general political condition of this period is briefly and pertinently described by the oft-recurring statement in Jgs: "In those days there was no king in Israel: every man did that which was right in his own eyes."

Not until the time of Samuel was a formal kingdom established over Israel. An attempt to ameliorate conditions by a union of civil and religious functions in the hands of Eli, the priest, had failed through the corruption of his sons. Similarly the hopes of Israel in a hereditary judgship had been disappointed through the corruption of the sons of Samuel. The Philis were threatening the independence and hope of Israel. Its internal weakness and consequent political instability revealed the necessity for a monarchy, and moreover the people expressed a desire for a king originated from a purely national and not from a religious motive, the unwillingness of Samuel, at first, to comply with the demand for a king is not surprising. Even Jeh declared: "They have not rejected thee but they have rejected me," etc. Instead of recognizing that they themselves were responsible for the failures of the past, they blamed the form of government they had, and put all their hopes upon a king. That it was not the monarchy as such that was objectionable to Jeh and His prophet is evidenced by the fact that to the patriarchs the promise had been given: "Kings shall come out of thy loins" (Gen 17 6; 35 11). In view of this Moses had made provision for a kingship (Dt 17 14-20).

According to the Mosaic charter for the kingship, the monarchy when established must be brought into consonance with the fact that Jeh was Israel's king. Of this fact Israel had lost sight when it requested a kingship like that of the neighboring peoples. Samse loyalty and glories were perfectly justified in view of such a kingship as they desired, which would inevitably tend to selfish despotism (1 S 8 11 f.). Therefore God directs Samuel to give them a king—since the introduction of a kingship typifying the kingship of Christ lay within the plan of His economy—not according to their desire, but in accordance with the instructions of the law concerning kings (Dt 17 14-20), in order to safeguard their liberties and prevent the forfeiture of their mission.

According to the Law of Moses Jeh was to choose the king of Israel, who was to be His representative. The choice of Jeh in the case of Saul is implied by the anointing of Saul by Samuel and through the confirmation of the Israelites in the lot (1 S 10 1-20). This method of choosing the king did not exclude the people altogether, since Saul was publicly presented to them, and acknowledged as king (1 S 10 24). The participation of the people in the choice of the king is more pronounced in the case of David, who having been designated as Jeh's choice by being anointed by Samuel, was anointed again by the elders of Israel before he actually became king (2 S 2 4).

The anointing itself signified the consecration to an office in the theocracy. The custom of anointing kings was an old one, and by no means peculiar to Israel (Jos 7 14). The hereditary kingship began with David. Usually the firstborn succeeded to the throne, but not necessarily. The king might choose as his successor from among his sons, the one whom he thought best qualified.

The king of the constitutional monarch in the modern sense, nor was he an autocrat in the oriental sense. He was responsible to Jeh, who had chosen him and whose viceroy and servant he was. Furthermore, his authority was more or less limited on the religious side by the prophets, the representatives of Jeh, and in the political sphere by the "elders," the representatives of the people, though as king he stood above all. Rightly conceived, his kingship in relation to Jeh, who was Israel's true king, implied that he was Jeh's servant and His earthly substitute. In relation to his subjects his kingship demanded of him, according to the Law, "that his heart be not lifted up above his brethren" (Dt 17 20). The kingship was also in a way the summus episcopus in Israel. His very kingship was of an entirely religious character and implied a unity of the heavenly and earthly rule over Israel through him who as Jeh's substitute sat "upon the throne of the kingdom of Jeh over Israel" (1 Ch 17 14; 28 5; 29 23), who was "Jeh's anointed" (1 S 24 10; 25 1), and also the title of "Jeh" and "the first-born," the same as Israel did (Ex 4 22; Hos 11 1; 2 S 7 14; Ps 89 27; 2 7). Thus a place of honor was assigned to the king in the temple (2 K 11 4; 23 3; Ezk 46 12); besides, he officiated at the national sacrifices (esp. mentioned of David and Solomon). He prayed for his people and blessed them in the name of Jeh (2 S 6 18; 24 25; 1 K 3 4 8; 8 14.55.62; 9 25). Apparently it was the king's right to appoint and dismiss the chief priests at the sanctuaries, though in his choice he was doubtless restricted to the Arahites (1 Ch 16 37.39; 2 S 8 17; 1 K 2 27.35).

The priesthood was under the king's supervision to such an extent that he might concern himself about its organization and duties (1 Ch 15 23.24; 16 4-6), and that he was responsible for the purity of the cult and the maintenance of the order of worship. In general he was to watch over the religious life and conduct of his people, to eradicate the high places and every form of idolatry in the land (2 K 18 4). Ezk 46 22 demands that he shall provide at the Passover a bullock for a sin offering for all the people.

The marks of royal dignity, besides the beautiful robes in which the king was attired (1 K 22 10), were: (1) the diadem (תָּֽאֶשֶׁר, nezer) and the crown (יְהֵֽנֶּשֶׁר, šārāq), 2 S 1 10; 2 K 11 12; 2 S 13 30), the headcloth; (2) the scepter (כְּפֶר, šeḇēḥet).

originally a long, straight staff, the primitive sign of dominion and authority (Gen 49 10; Nu 24 17; Isa 14 5; Jer 48 17; Ps 7 10). It is elsewhere called "the staff of my father" (Gen 49 18; 18 32; Deut 33 17).

The scepter was also called "the rod of my father" (Ps 70 3; Ps 2 6; 45 6). The scepter was also called "the rod of my father" (Ps 70 3; Ps 2 6; 45 6). The scepter was also called "the rod of my father" (Ps 70 3; Ps 2 6; 45 6).

The scepter was also called "the rod of my father" (Ps 70 3; Ps 2 6; 45 6). The scepter was also called "the rod of my father" (Ps 70 3; Ps 2 6; 45 6). The scepter was also called "the rod of my father" (Ps 70 3; Ps 2 6; 45 6).
possible even without a monarchical form of government. Though a kingdom was established again under the Maccabees, as a result of the attempt of Antiochus to extinguish Israel's religion, this kingdom was neither as perfectly national nor as truly religious in its character as the Davidic. It soon became evident that the kingship of Herod was entirely alien to the true Israelish conception. It remains to be said only that the final attempt of Israel in its revolt against the Rom Empire, to establish the old monarchy, resulted in its downfall as a nation, because it would not learn the lesson that the future of a nation does not depend upon political greatness, but upon the fulfilment of its Divine mission.

I. The Reality of Christ's Kingship.—There can be no question but that Christ is set before us in Scripture as a king. The very title Christ or 'Messiah' suggests kingship, for though the priest is spoken of as "anointed," and full elucidation of the title as applied to Jesus must take account of His threecold office of prophet, priest, and king, yet generally in the OT it is the king to whom the epithet is applied.

We may briefly note some of the OT predictions of Christ as king. The first prediction which represents the Christ as having dominion is that of Jacob concerning the tribe of Judah: "Unto Shiloh shall he come, and unto him shall the assembly be gathered: and they shall be unto him, 'themselves,' sons of Jacob" (Ps 110:1); then kingly dignity and dominion are suggested by the star and scepter in Balaam's prophecy (Nu 24:17). As yet, however, Israel has no king but God, but when afterward a king is given and the people become familiar with the idea, the prophecies all more or less have a regal tint, and the coming one is preeminently the coming king.

In the Ps and Prophets.—We can only indicate a few of the many royal predictions, but these will readily suggest others. In Ps 2 the voice of God is heard above all the tumult of earth, declaring, "Yet I have set him upon my holy hill of Zion." So in Ps 24, 45, 75, 89 and 110 we have special foreshadowings of the Messianic king. The babe that Isaiah sees born of a virgin is called "the Prince of Peace" (Isa 9:6,7), of the increase of whose knowledge there shall be no end, and as the prophet gazes on him he joyfully exclaims: "Behold, a king shall be established in righteousness" (Isa 32:1). Jeremiah, the prophet of weeping, catches bright glimpses of his coming Lord, and with rapture intensified by the surrounding sorrow cries: "Behold, the days come, saith Jah, that I will raise unto David a righteous Branch, and he shall reign as king and deal wisely, and shall execute justice and righteousness in the land" (33:5). Ezekiel, dwelling amid his wheels, sees in the course of Providence many revolutions roll to bring about the dominion of Christ: "I will overturn, overturn, overturn, until it is no more; and I will give Israel her fathers." (21:27). Daniel sees the rise and progress, the decline and fall of many mighty empires, but beyond all he sees the son of man sitting on an everlasting kingdom (7:14). Hosea sees the repentant people of Israel in the last days seeking and finding their God (23:7). Micah sees the everlasting Ruler coming out of Bethlehem clad in the strength and majesty of Jah, who shall "be great unto the ends of the earth" (3:5). Zecharias, excelling in His near approach, cries: "Rejoice greatly, O daughter of Zion; shout, O daughter of Jerusalem: behold, thy king cometh unto thee; the righteousness and strength is gone before him, and the king of glory followeth after him." (9:9), and he follows His varied course through gloom and glory, until the strong shall become as a child, and the child as a mighty man before Jah, and the heart and the exclaiming in the glowing words: "Jeh shall be King over all the earth" (14:9). The more extreme and higher critics would, of course, deny the predictions of Jesus Christ, but most, if not all, would admit that they are real representations which were only fully realized in Jesus of Nazareth.

The Gospel presents Christ as king. Mt, tracing His genealogy, gives special prominence to His royal lineage as son of David. He tells of the visit of the Magi who inquire for the newborn king of the Jews, and the scribes answer Herod's question by showing from Micah's prophecy that the Christ to be born in Bethlehem would be a "governor," and would rule, 'be shepherd of my people Israel" (1:16). Lk's account of the Nativity contains the angel's declaration that the child to be born and named Jesus would occupy the throne of David and reign upon the house of Jacob forever (1:32,33). In John's account of the beginning of Christ's ministry, one of His early disciples天然地 calls him "King of Israel" (1:49), and Jesus does not repudiate the title. If Mark has no such definite word, he nevertheless describes the message with which Jesus opens His ministry as "the kingdom of God" (1:15). The people nurtured in the prophetic teaching expect the coming one to be a king, and when Jesus seems to answer to their ideal of the Messiah, they propose taking Him by force and making Him king (Jn 6:15).

(1) Christ's claim to be king. Christ Himself claimed to be king. In claiming to be the Messiah He tacitly claimed kingship, but there are specific indications of the claim besides. In all His teaching of the kingdom it is implied, for though He usually calls it the "kingdom of God" or "of heaven," yet it is plain that He is the administrator of its affairs. He assumes to Himself the highest place in it. Admission into the kingdom or exclusion from it depends upon men's attitude toward Him. In His explanation of the parable of the Tares, He distinctly speaks of His kingdom, identifying it with the kingdom of God. "The Son of man shall send forth His angels, and they shall gather out of His kingdom all things that cause stumbling, and them which do iniquity," (Mt 13:41). The righteous shine forth as the sun in the kingdom of their Father" (Mt 13:41-43). He speaks of some seeing "the Son of man coming in His kingdom" (Mt 18:28), of the regeneration, "when the Son of man shall sit on the throne of His glory" (Mt 19:28), of Himself under the guise of a nobleman who goes "into a far country, to receive for himself a kingdom," and does receive it (Lk 19:12-15).

(2) Christ's acceptance of the title.—When the mother of John and James comes asking that her two sons may occupy the chief places of honor in His kingdom, He does not deny that He is a king and has a kingdom, while indicating that the places on His right and left hand are already determined by the appointment of the Father (Mt 20:21-23). He deliberately teaches to be King (Jn 5:39). The prediction of Zec: "Behold, thy king cometh," and He accepts, approves and justifies the hosannas and the homage of the multitudes (Mt 21:1-16; Mk 11:10; Lk 19:12). In His great picture of the coming judgment (Mt 25), the son of man sits upon the throne of His glory, and it is as the 'king' that He blesses and condemns. The dying thief prays, "Remember me when thou comest into thy kingdom" (Lk 23:42), and Jesus gives His royal response which implies full acceptance of the position.
(3) Christ charged and condemned as king.—His claim throughout had been so definite that His enemies made this the basis of their charge against Him before Pilate, that He said that "he is himself Christ a king," and when Pilate asks, "Art thou the King?" He answers, "Thou sayest," which is equivalent to "yes" (Lk 23:23). In the fuller account of Jn, Jesus speaks to Pilate of "my kingdom," and says "Thou sayest that I am a king. To this end have I been born" (Jn 18:37). His claim is epitomized in the superscription of the cross in the three languages: "This is the King of the Jews," and although the priests wished it to be altered so as to detract from His claim, they yet affirm the fact of that claim when they say: "Write not, The King of the Jews; but, that he said, I am King of the Jews." (Jn 19:21). The curtain of His earthly life falls upon the king in seeming failure; the taunt of the multitude, "Let the Christ, the King of Israel, now come down from the cross" (Mk 16:32), meets with no response, and the title on the cross seems a solemn mockery, like the elaborate, cruel jest of the brutal soldiers clothing Him with purple, crowning Him with thorns and hurling Him King of the Jews.

(4) The witness of the resurrection and of apostleship.—But the resurrection throws new light upon the scene, and fully vindicates His claims, and the sermon of Peter on the day of Pentecost proclaims the fact that the crucified one occupies the throne. Let all the house of Israel therefore know assuredly, that God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified! (Acts 2:36). The early preaching of the apostles, as recorded in the Acts, emphasizes His lordship, His kingship; these men were preachers in the literal sense of the word.

(5) The testimony of the Epistles and Apocalypse.—We need not consider in detail the testimony of the Epp. The fact that Christ is king is everywhere implied and not infrequently asserted. He is "Lord of both the dead and the living" (Rom 14:9). He is risen "to rule over the Gentiles" (Rom 15:12). "He must reign, till he hath put all his enemies under his feet" (1 Cor 15:25). He is at the right hand of God "above all rule, and authority, 20-22; of God the Father "the inheirance in the kingdom of Christ and God" (Eph 5:5), and believers are "translated into the kingdom of the Son of his love" (Col 1:13). He has been given the name that is above every name "that in him all the heavenly hosts, and every name, etc (Phil 2:9-11). Those who suffer with Christ are to "reign with him" (2 Tim 2:12), at "his appearing and his kingdom" (2 Tim 4:1), and He will save them "unto his heavenly kingdom" (2 Tim 4:18); "the eternal kingdom of our Lord and Saviour Jesus Christ" (2 Pet 1:11). Of the Son it is said: "Thy throne, O God, is for ever and ever" (He 1:8), and He is a King-Priest "after the order of Melchizedek" (He 7:17). In the Apocalypses, appropriately, the predominating aspect of Christ is that of a king. He is the "ruler of the kings of the earth" (Rev 1:5), "King of the ages" (Rev 15:3), "King of kings" (17:14; 19:16), "and he shall reign for ever and ever" (11:15). The reality of Christ's kingship is thus placed beyond all doubt.

II. Christ's Title to Kingship.—After the analogy of earthly kingdoms it might be said that Jesus Christ is a king by birth. He was 1. By Birth a king. His mother, like His spiritual being, was of the house and family of David (Lk 2:4). The angel in announcing His birth declares that He will occupy the throne of His father David. The Pharisees have no hesitation in affirming that the Christ would be Son of David (Mt 22:43; Mk 12:35; Lk 20:41). Frequently in life He was hailed as "Son of David," and after His ascension, Peter declares that the promise God had made to David that "of the fruit of his loins he would set one upon his throne" (cf. 2 Sam 7:14) was fulfilled in Him (Acts 2:30). So that on the human side He had the title to kingship as Son of David, while on the Divine side as Son of God He had also the right to the throne.

David was king by Divine choice and appointment, and this was the ideal in the case of his successors. The figure of "Divine right"—by virtue of which modern kings have claimed to rule—was, in the first instance, a reminiscence of the Bib. ideal. But the ideal is realized in Christ. Of the coming Messianic King, Jehovah said: "Yet I have set my king upon my holy hill of Zion" (Ps 2:6), and the great proclamation of Pentecost was an echo of that decree: "Let all the house of Israel therefore know assuredly, that God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified!" (Acts 2 36), while the apostle Paul says that "God highly exalted him and gave unto him the name which is above every name" (Phil 2:9), and again and again the great OT word of Jehovah is applied to Christ: "Sit thou on my right hand, till I make thine enemies the footstool of thy feet" (He 1:13).

Often in the olden times kingship was acquired by conquest, by superior prowess. According to one etymology of our word "king," it means the "able man," the one who could do what others could not do, and every reference to Carlyle's fine passage thereon. In the highest sense, this is true of Christ, who establishes His sway over men's hearts by His matchless prowess, the power of His infinite love and the charm of His perfect character. Except in the most autocratic form of kingship, some place has been given to the suffrage of the people, and the other phases of the title have been confirmed and ratified by the free exercise of the franchise. In the case of Christ, "God save the king!" and no king is well established on the throne if he is not supported by the free homage of his subjects. Christ as king wins the love of His people solicited and won by His sway. They are of one heart to make Him king.

III. The Nature of Christ's Kingship.—We know that the Jews expected a material kingdom, marked by earthly pomp and state; a kingdom on the lines of the Davideic or Solomonic kingdom, and others since have made the same mistake.

The Scriptures plainly declare, Christ Himself clearly taught, that His kingship was spiritual. "My kingdom," said He, "is not of this world." Granted that the proposition indicates origin, it still leaves the statement an assertion of the spirituality of the kingdom, for if it is not from this kosmos, from this earthly state of things, it must be from the other world—not the earthly but the heavenly; not the material but the spiritual. The whole context shows that origin here includes character, for Christ adds, "If my kingdom were of this world, then would my servants fight, that I should not be delivered to the Jews." Because it is of an unworldly origin, it is not to be propagated by worldly means, and the non-use of worldly means declares it to be of an unworlty character. So that to assert that Christ means that His kingdom was to arise out of the world, but to come down from heaven, is not at all to deny, but rather, indeed, to declare its essential spirituality, its unworllyness, its otherworldliness.

Throughout the NT, spirituality appears as the prevailing characteristic of Christ’s reign. Earthly kingdoms are based upon material power, the power of the sword, the power of wealth, etc., but the basal factor of Christ’s kingdom is righteousness (Mt 5 20; 6 33; Rom 14 17; He 1 8, etc.). The ruling principle in earthly kingdoms is selfish or sectional or national aggrandizement; in the kingdom of Christ it is truth. Christ is king of truth.

"Art thou a king then?" said Pilate. "I am," said Christ (for that is the force of “thou sayest that I am a king”). "To this end have I been born, and to this end am I come into the world, that I should bear witness unto the truth," and He adds, "Every one that is of the truth heareth my voice" (Jn 18 37). Elsewhere He says: "I am the truth" (Jn 14 6), and at the head of the armies of heaven He still bears the title "Prestigious and True" (Rev 19 11); but if righteousness and truth occupy such a prominent place in His kingdom, it follows that it must be distinguished by its spirituality. His immediate subjects are spiritual men and women, not worldly, but spiritual. Its work is spiritual; all the forces emanating from it, operating through it, centering in it, are spiritual.

The Jewish idea of the Messiah’s reign was a narrow national one. For them it meant the glorification of the nation and the renewal or establishment of the supranationalism of Judaism over all forms of faith and all systems of philosophy; the subjection to Jewish sway of the haughty Roman, the cultured Greek and the rude barbarian. The Messiah was to be a greater king than David or Solomon, but still a king after the same sort; much as the limits of the kingdom might extend, it would be but an extension on Jewish lines; others might be admitted to a share in its privileges, but they would have to become naturalized Jews, or occupy a very subordinate place. The prophetic ideal, however, was a universal kingdom, and that was the conception inscribed and emphasized (For the prophetic ideal such passages may be noted as Ps 2, 22, 72; Is 11 10; Ps 7 13 14, etc.). Of course, the predictions have a Jewish coloring, and people who did not apprehend the spirituality might well construe this amiss; but, clearly examined, it will be found that the prophets indicate that men’s position in the coming kingdom is to be determined by their relation to the king, and in that we get the preparation for the full NT ideal. The note of universality is very marked in the teaching of Christ. All barriers are to be broken down and Jewish and Gentile alike in the privileges of the new order. "Many shall come from the east and the west, and shall sit down with Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob, in the kingdom of heaven" (Mt 8 11), and stranger still to the Jewish ear: “The sons of the kingdom shall be cast forth into the outer darkness" (Mt 8 12). In the parables of the kingdom (Mt 13), the field, in which is sown the good seed of the kingdom, is the world, and the various other figures give the same idea of unlimited extent. As is suggested by the declaration, “Other sheep I have, which are not of this fold” (Jn 10 16), also by the confident affirmation: “I, if I be lifted up from the earth, will draw all men unto myself” (Jn 12 32), and so with many other statements of the Gospels.

The terms of the commission are enough to show the universal sovereignty which Christ claims over men: “Go ye therefore,” He says, as possessing all authority in heaven and on earth, “and make disciples of all nationalities” (Mt 28 19), coupled with the royal assurance, “Ye shall be my witnesses unto the uttermost part of the earth” (Acts 1 8). The Book of Acts shows, in the carrying out of the commission, the actual widening of the borders of Christ’s kingdom to include believers of all nationalities. Peter is taught, and announces clearly, the great truth that Gentiles are to be received upon the same terms as the Jews. But through Paul as the apostle of the Gentiles this glorious truth is most fully and jubilantly made. In the apologetic and the dogmatic teaching of his Ep, he shows that all the barriers are broken down, the middle wall of the fence between Jew and Gentile no longer exists. Those who were aliens and strangers are now made nigh in Christ, and “are no more strangers and sojourners, but ye are fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God” (Eph 2 19). That household, that commonwealth, is, in Pauline language, equivalent to the kingdom, and in the same Ep, he describes the same privileged position as being an “inheritance in the kingdom of Christ and God” (5 5). The Saviour’s kingdom cannot be bounded by earthly limits, and all attempts to map it out according to human rules imply a failure to recognize the true Scriptural idea of its universality.

1. Kingdom of grace—There is, first of all, the kingdom of grace. The description of the kingdom of grace is one of the most difficult and least understood of any NT passage. The word is used in the NT in four different senses. (1) Kingdom of grace—There is also another phase called the kingdom of power. Christ is in a special sense king in Zion, king in His church—that is universal in conception and destined to be so in reality—but He is also king of the universe. He is “head over all things”; Eph 1 22; Col 1 18, and other passages clearly intimate this. He rules over all. He does so not simply as God, but as God-man, as mediator. It is as mediator that He has the name above every name; it is as mediator that He sits upon the throne of universal power.

(2) Kingdom of glory—There is also the phase of the kingdom of glory. Christ’s reign now is truly glorious. The essential spirituality of it implies its glory, for as the spiritual far surpasses the material in value, so the glory of the spiritual far transcends the glory of the material. The glory of worldly pomp, of physical force, even of right human prowess, is but a memory, a memory forever pale before the glory of righteousness, truth, spirituality. But Christ’s kingdom is glorious in another sense; it is a heavenly kingdom. It is the kingdom of grace into which saved sinners now enter, but it is also the kingdom of heavenly glory, and in it the glorified saints have a place. Entrance into the kingdom of grace in this earthly state secures entrance into the kingdom of glory. Rightly does the church confess: “Thou art the King of Glory, O Christ! O Christ! O Christ!” But the glory of the kingdom is only revealed in the heavenlies, in the age to come, the age of glory.

(3) Eternal Kingdom—There is also the greater and most extensive kingdom, that is, the kingdom which is to come. It is the kingdom of glory, but not only of glory. It includes all the other kingdoms in supreme glory. It is a kingdom which is to come. Its degree and glory are beyond the comprehension of men. A great man once said, “The kingdom is not of this world; if it were, then the believers would fight amongst themselves, but now are they divided amongst the nations.” The kingdom of glory is divinely described by the angel’s announcement: “He shall reign over the house of Jacob for ever; and of his kingdom there shall be no end” (Lk 1 33). The reign of 1,000 years which so greatly occupies the thoughts of so many brethren, whatever we may decide as to its nature, is but an episode in the reign of Christ. He is reigning now, He shall reign forever. Rev 11 15, 16. It is quoted, in its simplest meaning, as applying to the millennium, but it goes on to say and shall reign as long as the heavens shall last. The interpretation of the verse is dependent upon the interpretation of the heavens. So, of the glowing predictions of the OT, which are often assigned to the millennium, indicate no limit, but deal with the enduring and eternal.

The difficult passage in 1 Cor 15 24-28 must be interpreted in the light of these declarations concerning the eternity of Christ's reign. It is evident as mediator that He delivers up the kingdom to the Father; He dispenses of mediator comes to an end. All has been done according to the purpose of redemption. All the ransomed are finally gathered home. He sees of the travail of His soul, and is satisfied. Obdurate enemies are subdued. God's glory has been fully vindicated. The Son becomes the subject of the Father, God governs directly and is all in all. But the Son in some sense still reigns and through Him God's glory will ever shine, while the kingdom eternally rests upon redemption.

We may summarize by saying that Christ is the Son of the Virgin Mary, and of the House of David. He reigns as King, king of kings, and kingdom, kingdom of God, and kingdom of heaven, by both right and title, and is the representative of the heavenly Jerusalem. He is the King of kings, and His kingdom is the kingdom of heaven. He reigns as the New Adam, and His kingdom is the New Jerusalem.

KING OF THE JEWS: The title applied in mockery of Jesus, and put by Pilate on His cross (Mt 27 39-43; Mk 15 26, etc.). See Jesus Christ, King, Christ as.

LITERATURE

The "kingdom of God" is one of the most remarkable ideas and phrases of all time, having begun to be used very near the beginnings of history and continuing in force down to the present day.

1. Meaning and Origin of the Term.—Its use by Jesus is by far its most interesting aspect; for, in the Synoptists, at least, it is His usual expression for His teaching. Of this the ordinary reader of Scripture may hardly be aware, but it becomes evident and significant to the student. Thus in Mt 4 17, the commencement of the ministry is described in these words, "And Jesus went about in all Galilee, teaching in their synagogues, and preaching the gospel of the kingdom, and healing all manner of disease and all manner of sickness among the people"; and, somewhat later, in Lk 4 18, the expansion of His activity is described in the following terms, "And it came to pass soon afterwards, that He went about through cities and villages, preaching and bringing the good tidings of the kingdom of God, and with him the twelve." When the Twelve are sent forth by themselves, the purpose of their mission is, in Lk 9 2, given in these words, "And he sent them forth to preach the kingdom of God, and to heal the sick." In Mt 13 11, the parables, which formed so large and prominent a portion of His teaching, are denominated collectively "the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven"; and it will be remembered how many of these commence with the phrase, "The kingdom of heaven is like..."

In these quotations, and in others which might easily be adduced, it will be observed that the phrases "the kingdom," "the kingdom of God," "the kingdom of heaven" are used interchangeably.

2. "Kingdom of Heaven"

   The last of the three, "the kingdom of God" and "Kingdom of Heaven" are confined to the First Gospel, which does not, however, always make use of it; and it is not certain what may have been the reason for the substitution. The simplest explanation would be that kingdom is a name for God, as, in the parable of the Prodigal Son, the penitent says, "I have sinned against heaven," and we ourselves might say, "Heaven forbid!" It is, however, improbable that the true meaning has to be learned from two petitions of the Lord's Prayer, the one of which is epexegetic of the other, "Thy kingdom come. Thy will be done on earth, as it is in heaven.

   Here the disciples are instructed to pray that the kingdom of God may come; but this is equivalent to the petition that the will of God may be done on earth; Jesus is, however, aware of a region in the universe where the will of God is at present being perfectly and universally done, and, for reasons not difficult to surmise, He elevates thither the minds and hearts of those who pray. The kingdom of heaven would thus be so entitled because it is already realized there, and is, through prayer and effort, to be transferred thence to this earth.

   Although, however, the phrase held this masterposition in the teaching of Jesus, it was not of His invention. It was employed before Him by the Baptist, of whom we are told, in Mt 3 1, "And in those days (Daniel, etc.) cometh John the Baptist, preaching in the wilderness of Judaea, saying, Repent ye; for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." Indeed, the phrase is far older; for, on glancing toward the OT, we come at once, in Dn 2 44, to a passage where the young prophet, explaining to the monarch the image of gold, silver, iron and clay, which, in his dream, he had seen shattered by a stone cut out without hands, interprets it as a succession of world-kings, destined to be destroyed by "a kingdom of God," which shall last forever; and, in his famous vision of the "son of man" in 7 14, it is said, "There was given him dominion, and glory, and a kingdom, that all the peoples, nations, and languages should serve him; his dominion is an everlasting dominion, which shall not pass away, and his kingdom that which shall not be destroyed."

   These passages in Dn 2 form undoubtedly the proximate source of the phrase; yet the idea which it represents mounts far higher. That first the Jewish state was governed by laws believed to be derived directly from heaven; and, when the people demanded a king, that they might be like other nations, they were reproached for desiring any king but God Himself. With the conception the actual monarchy was only a compromise, the reigning monarch passing for Jeh's representative on earth. In David, the man after God's own heart, the compromise was not satisfactory; in Solomon it was still tolerable; but in the majority of the kings of both Judah and Israel it was a dismal and disastrous failure. No wonder that Hosea, in his prophetic prayer, rebuked and charged Jehovah with taking to Himself His great power and reign, or that the prophets predicted the coming of a ruler who would be far nearer to God than the actual kings and of whose reign there would be no end. Even when the political kingdom perished and the people were carried away into Babylon, the intelligent and truly religious among them did not cease to cherish the old hope, and the very aspect of the world-powers then and subsequently menacing them only widened their conceptions of what that kingdom might be which could overcome them all. The return from Babylon seemed a miraculous confirmation of their faith, and it looked as if the day long prayed for were about to dawn. Alas, it proved a day of small things. The era of the Maccabees was only a transitory gleam; in the person of Herod the Great a usurper occupied the throne; and the eagles of the Romans were hovering on the horizon. Still Messianic hopes flourished, and Messianic language filled the mouths of the people.

II. Its Use by Jesus—Contrast with Jewish Conceptions.—Schürer, in his History of the Jewish People in the Time of Jesus Christ, gives (11, 128 ff.), has drawn up a kind of chronology of messianic ideas, and has the following eleven articles, which believes was extensively diffused at this period. The Sadducees, indeed, had no participation in these dreams, as they would have called them, being absorbed in money-getting and courtship; but the Pharisees cherished them, and the Zealots received their name from the adorers with which they embraced them. The true custodians, however, of these conceptions were the Proschechomenoi, as they have been called, from what is said of them in the NT, that they “waited for the kingdom of God.” This class belonged such men as Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea (Lk 23, 51), but it is in the beginning of the Gospel of Lk that we are introduced to its most numerous representatives, in the groups surrounding the infant Baptist and the infant Saviour (Lk 2.25,38); and the truest and amplest expression of their sentiments must be sought in the inspired hymns which rose from them on to the centre of their aspirations, but as described, as described, is a kingdom of God—not, however, of worldly splendor and force, but of righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost; beginning in humility, and passing exaltation only through the dark valley of contrition.

Such was the circle in which both the Baptist and Jesus were reared, and it was out of this atmosphere that the conception of the kingdom of God came into their minds. It was essentially the same, making use of this term, Jesus accommodated Himself to the opinions and language of His fellow-countrymen; and there is truth in this, because, in order to secure a footing on the solid earth of history, He had to connect His own activity with the world in which He found Himself. Yet the idea was native to His home and His race, and therefore to Himself; and it is not improbable that He may at first have been unconscious of the wide difference between what He was used in different senses; and this contrast went on increasing until there was a great gulf fixed between Him and them. The difference cannot better be expressed than by saying, as is done by B. Weiss, that He said "kingdom," while they referred to it as "the kingdom" and He of God.

3. Growing Divergence.—In the phrase of the prophets, "the kingdom of God," and "kingdom," and "the kingdom and God of God," and "of God," and "kingdom of God," and the phrase of the Romans of a Jewish king and court, and of a world-wide dominion going forth from Mt. Zion; He was bound to differentiate between the idea of world-power and peace, of the doing of the will of God on earth as it is done in heaven. So earthly and fantastic were the expectations of the Jewish multitude that He had to escape from their hands when they tried to take Him by force and make Him a king. The authorities never acknowledged the pretensions of One who seemed to them a religious dreamer, and, as they clung to their own conceptions, they grew more and more bitter against One who was turning the most cherished hopes of a nation into ridicule, besides threatening to bring down on them the heavy hand of the Roman. And at last they settled the controversy between Him and them by nailing Him to a tree.

At one time Jesus had felt the glamor of the popular Messianic ideas, and at all times He must have been under temptation to accom-

4. Prophetic modulate His own ideas to the prejudices of those on whose favor His acceptance depended. The struggle of His mind and will with such solicitations is embodied in what is called the Temptation in the Wilderness (Mt 4.1-11). There He was tempted to accept the dominion of the world at the price of compromise with evil; to be a bread-king, giving panem et circenses; and to curry favor with the multitude by some display, like springing from the pinnacle of the temple. The incidents of this scene look like representative samples of a long experience; but they are placed before the commencement of His public activity in order to show that He had already overthrown them; and throughout His ministry He may be said to have been continually declaring, as He did in so many words at its close, that His kingdom was not of this world.

It is very strange that, in spite of this, He should be believed, even by Christian scholars, to have held a purely futuristic and apocalyptic view of the coming of the kingdom of God. The time, however, of worldly splendor and force, of righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Ghost; beginning in humility, and passing exaltation only through the dark valley of contrition. The contest between Him and them was as to whether Jehovah would intervene on His behalf or not; and, when no intervention took place, they believed they were justified in condemning Him. The promise being conceded, it is difficult to deny the force of their argument. If Jesus was all the time looking out for an appearance from heaven which never arrived, what better is He than a dreamer of the cosmos? It was by Johannes Weiss that this hypothesis was started in recent times; and it has been worked out by Schwitzer as the final issue of modern speculation on the life of Christ (see his ness of the schweitzer). But in The Quest of the Historical Jesus). In opposition to it can be quoted not a few sayings of Jesus which indicate that, in His view, the kingdom had already begun and was making progress during His earthly ministry, and that it was destined to make progress not by mathematical growth and development, but by the embrace of the course of Providence, but, as the grain grows—first the blade, then the ear, and after that the full ear in the car (Mk 4.26—29). Of such saying the most remarkable is Lk 17.20f., “And being asked by the Pharisees when the kingdom of God should come, He answered and said, The kingdom of God cometh not with observation; neither shall they say, lo, the kingdom of God is within you.” “Observation, in this quotation, is an astronomical term, denoting exactly such a manifestation in the physical heavens as Jesus is assumed to have been looking for; so that He denies in so many words the expectation attributed to Him by those representatives of modern scholarship.

In the nature of the case the kingdom must have been growing from stage to stage during His earthly ministry. He Himself was there, 7. Positive embodying the kingdom in His person; Conceptions and the circle gathered around Him of Jesus parable of the blessings of the kingdom. This circle might have grown large enough to be coextensive with the country; and, therefore, Jesus retained the consciousness of being the Messiah, and offered Himself in this character to His fellow-countrymen by the triumphal entry into Jerusalem. But the citizens of the kingdom had to enter it one by one, not in a body, as the Jews were expecting. Strait was the gate; it was the narrow gate of repentance. Jesus began by repeating the initial word of the teaching of His forerunner; and He had too much reason to continue repeating it, as the hypocrisy and worldliness of Pharisees and Sadducees called for denunciation from His lips. To the frailties of the publicans and sinners on the contrary, He showed a strange mildness; but this was because He knew the way of bringing such sinners to His feet to confess their sins themselves. To the penitent He granted pardon, claiming that the Son of man had power on earth to forgive sins. Then followed the exhortation of righteousness, of which the Sermon on the Mount is a perfect specimen. Yet it commences with another watchword—that of blessedness, the ingredients of which are set forth in all their comprehensiveness. In the same way, in other passages, He promises “rest,” “peace,” and the like; and again and again, where He might be expected to employ the term “kingdom of God,” He substitutes “life” or “eternal life.” Such were the blessings He had come into the world to bestow; and the most comprehensive designation for them all was “the kingdom of God.”

It is true, there was always imperfection attaching to the kingdom as realized in His lifetime, because He Himself was not yet made perfect. Steadily, from the commencement of the last stage of His career, He began to speak of and to rise again. To those nearest Him such language was at the time a total mystery; but the day came when His apostles were able to speak of His death and ascension as the crown and glory of His whole career. This phrase was like the precipice, its course was so diverted by the providence of God that, by dying, He became the Redeemer of mankind and, by missing the throne of the Jews, attained to that of the universe, becoming King of kings and Lord of lords.

III. The Idea in History.—After the death of Jesus, there soon ensued the destruction of the Jewish state; and then Christianity was forced upon the world, where to have spoken of it as a kingdom of God would have been unnecessary, provoked hostility and called forth the accusation of treason against the powers that be. Hence it made use of other names and let “the kingdom of God” drop. This had commenced even in Holy Scripture, where, in the later books, there is a growing infrequency in the use of the term. This may be alleged as proof that Jesus was being forgotten; but it may only prove that Christianity was then too much alive to be trammeled with words and phrases, even those of the Master, being able at every stage to find new language to express its new experience.

In the early Christian centuries, “the kingdom of God” was used to designate heaven itself, in which from the first the development of the kingdom was to issue; this, in fact, being not infrequently the meaning of the phrase even in the

2. Early Christian Century

2. Early Christian thinkers brought back the phrase to designate the rule of God in the conscience of men. St. Augustine's great work bears a title, De Civitate Dei, which is a tr of our phrase; and to him the kingdom of God was the church, while the world outside of the church was the kingdom of Satan. From the time of Charlemagne there were in the world, side by side, two powers, that of the emperor and that of the pope; and the history of the Middle Ages is the account of the conflict of these two for predominance, each pretenting to struggle in the name of God. The approaching termination of this conflict may be seen in Wycliffe's great work De Domini Divino, this title also being a tr of our phrase.

During the struggles of the Reformation the battles of the faith were fought out under other watchwords; and it was among such sectaries as the Baptists, that names like Fifth Monarchy and Rule and near, then and subsequently in the minds of men's thoughts about authority in church and state came to the language of the Gospels could easily be demonstrated, for example, from the Confessions and Books of Discipline of the Scottish church.

The very phrase, "the kingdom of God," reappeared at the close of the Reformation period among the Pietists of Germany, who, as their multiplying benevolent and missionary activities overflowed the narrow boundaries of the church, was then understood, spoke of themselves as working for the kingdom of God, and found this more to their taste than working for the church. The vague and humanitarian aspirations of Rationalism sometimes assumed to themselves the same title; but it was by Ritschl and his followers that the phrase was brought back into the very heart of theology. In the system of Ritschl there are two poles—the love of God and the kingdom of God. The love of God is a point of departure for all purposes, which was to be realized in time; and this progressive realization is the kingdom of God. It fulfills itself esp. in the faithful discharge of the duties of everyone's daily vocation and in the recognition that in the course things are working together for good to them that love God.

IV. Place in Theology.—There are those to whom it appears self-evident that what was the leading phrase in the teaching of Jesus was Exag of Evangelizationation; while others think this to be a return from the spirit to the letter. Even Jesus, it may be claimed, had this phrase imposed upon Him quite as much as He chose it for Himself; and to impose it now on theology would be to entangle the movements of Christian thought with the ceremonies of the dead.

This is an interesting controversy, on both sides of which much might be said. But in the phrase "the kingdom of God" there are ele-

2. Elements of living power which can never pass away. (1) It expresses the social Power in idea of Christianity. A kingdom implies multitude and power, and though religion begins with the individual, it must aim at brotherhood, organization and expansion. (2) It expresses loyalty. However much kings and kingdoms may fail to touch the imagination in an age of the world when many countries have become or are becoming republican, the strength to conquer and to endure will always have to be derived from contact with personalities. God is the king of the kingdom of God, and the love of God is His vineyard; apart from the love of God the Father and the grace of the Lord Jesus Christ no progress can be made with the Christianization of the world. (3) It keeps alive the truth, suggested by Jesus in the Lord's Prayer, that the dominion of the will of God on earth is the one thing needful. This is the true end of all authority in both church and state, and behind all efforts thus directed there is at work the potency of heaven. (4) It reminds all generations of men that their true home and destiny is heaven. In not a few of Our Lord's own sayings, as has been remarked, our phrase is obviously only a name for heaven; and, while His aim was that the kingdom should be established on earth, He always promised to those aiding in its establishment in this world that their efforts would be rewarded in the world to come. The constant recognition of a spiritual and eternal world is one of the unfailing marks of genuine Christianity.

KING'S GARDEN (גֵּן הָ֭-מֶלֶךְ, gan-ha-melek): In Neh 3 15, mention is made of "the pool of Shelah by the king's garden"; in 2 K 25 4; Jer 52 7, "All the men of war fled by night by the gate of the two walls, which was by the king's garden"; see also Jer 39 4. The "king's winepresses" (Zec 14 10), which must have been to the extreme S. of the city, were clearly in this neighborhood. The references all point to the one situation in Jerus where it is possible for gardens to flourish all the year round, namely, the part of the Kidron valley below the Tyropoeon which is watered by the overflow from the Pool of Siloam (see above). The vegetable gardens of the peasants of Siloam present an aspect of green freshness unknown elsewhere in Jerus.

KING'S MOTHER: The queen-dowager occupied a very important position at the court of the kings of Israel, e.g. Bathsheba (1 K 2 19); Maacah (15 13); Athaliah (2 Ch 22 2); and Nehushta (2 K 24 8; Jer 13 18). See QUEEN; QUEEN MOTHER.

KING'S POOL (גַּֽהֲנֵי הָ֭-מֶלֶךְ, brakkhat ha-melekh): This is possibly the Pool of Siloam (Neh 2 14), and may have been so named as being near to the "king's garden." Erected for himself a marble pillar in the king's dale, two furlongs [stadiam] from Jerus, which he named Absalom's Hand. In all probability this "pillar" was a rough upright stone—a mastaba—but its site is lost. The traditional Gr.-Egypt tomb of perhaps 100-200 years BC which has been hewn out of the rock on the eastern side of the Kidron valley is manifestly named "Absalom's pillar," and the Kidron ravine (nahal) cannot be the king's Vale (vemeh).

LITERATURE.

I. Title.—The Heb title reads, דַּקְלִים, mekalhim, "kings," the division into books being based on the LXX where the Books of Kings are numbered 5d and 4th the Books of Kingdoms (Bashileion, Basileton), the Books of Samuel being numbered respectively 1st and 2d. The separation in the Heb into 2 Books of Kings dates to the rabbinic Bible of Daniel Bomberg (Venice, 1516-17), which adds in a footnote, "Here the non-Jews [i.e. Christians] have divided the 4th Book of Kings." The Heb Canon treats the 2 Books of S as one book, and the 2 Books of K as one. Hence both AV and RV read incorrectly, "The First Book of Kings," even the use of the article being superfluous.

II. Scope.—The Books of K contain 47 chs (1, 22 chs; II, 25 chs), and cover the period from the conspiracy of Adonijah and the accession of Solomon (975 BC) to the liberation of Jehoiachin after the beginning of the Exile (561 BC). The subject-matter may be grouped under certain heads, as the last days of David (1 K 1-2 11); Solomon and his times (1 K 2 12-11 45); the Northern Kingdom to the coming of Assyria (1 K 12 16-2 K 17 41) (937-722 BC), including 9 dynastic changes; the Southern Kingdom to the coming of Babylon (1 K 12 1-2 K 26 21), the annals of the two kingdoms being given as || records until the fall of Israel (937-586 BC), during which time but one dynasty, that of Jehoash, occupied the throne; the period of exil to 561 BC (2 K 26 22-30). A simpler outline, that of Driver, would be: (1) Solomon and his times (1 K 1-11); (2) Israel and Judah to the fall of Israel (1 K 12-2 K 17); Judah to the fall of Jerus (586 BC), and the captivity to the liberation of Jehoiachin (561 BC) (2 K 18-25).

"Above all, there are three features in the history, which, in the mind of the author, are of prime importance as shown by the prominence he gives them in his narrative. (1) The dynasty of David is invested with peculiar dignity. This has two aspects. It pointed back to the Divine election of the nation in the past, and gave the guarantee of indefinite national perpetuity in the future. The promise of 'the sure mercies of David' was a powerful uniting influence in the Exile. (2) The temple and its service, for which the writer had such special regard, contributed greatly to the phase of national character of subsequent times. With all the drawbacks and defects of pure worship there was the stated regular performance of sacred rites, the development and regulation of priestly order and ritual law, which stamped themselves so firmly on later Israel that (3) Above all, this was the period of bloom of OT prophecy. Though more is said of men like Elijah and Elisha, who have left no written words, we must not
IV. Historical Value.—These books contain a large amount of authentic data, and, along with the other books of this group which constitute a contemporaneous narrative, the Books of Kings and Chronicles are considered among ancient documents.

Data To be sure the ethical and religious value is first and highest, nevertheless the historical facts must be reckoned at their true worth. Discrepancies and contradictions are to be explained by the subordination of historical details to the moral and religious purpose of the books, and to the diversity of sources whence these data are taken, that is, the compilers and editors of the Books of K as they now stand were conscious of a certain historical narrative, but for a great ethical and religious treatise. The historical material is only incidental and introduced by way of illustration and confirmation. For the oriental mind these historical examples rather than the rigor of modern logic constitute the unanswerable argument.

There cannot be as much said relative to the chronological value of the books. Thus, e.g., there is a question as to the date of the close of Ahaz’s reign. According to 2 K 18 10, Samaria fell in the 6th year of Hezekiah’s reign. But in 2 K 18 13 it is said that Sennacherib’s invasion came in the 14th year of Hezekiah’s reign. Then 701-11-715. With this last agrees the account of Sennacherib’s sickness (2 K 20). In explanation of 2 K 18 13, however, it is urged by some that the writer has subordinated the invasion of 701 to 20 years of Hezekiah’s reign. Again, e.g., in 1 K 6 1, we learn that Solomon began to build the temple at the age of 40 years, which is 40 years before the destruction of Jerusalem, while the Hebrews were out of Egypt (LXX here reads 440 years). This would make between 960 and 1550 B.C. the date of the building of the temple.

But counting the Exodus in the reign of Merenptah, 1225-1215 BC, and the beginning of the occupation of the land of Canaan, 1450 years before the destruction of Jerusalem, we should have 1550 as the date of the building of the temple; or, if we count the period of 200 years after the death of Moses and Joshua as 400 years, which would be the 20th year of Hezekiah’s reign.

Thus in the case of Hezekiah, the length of the reign and the death; in the case of the kings of Judah, the length of the reign and the death; in the case of the kings of Israel, the length of the reign and the death; in the case of the kings of Judah there are included also the age of the kings.

III. Character of Books and Position in Hebrew Canon.—The Books of K contain much historical material, yet the historical is not their primary purpose. What in our Eng. Bible pass for historical books are in the Hebrew Canon prophetic books.

The chief aim of these books is didactic, the imparting of great moral lessons backed up by well-known illustrations from the nation’s history and from the lives of its heroes and leaders. Accordingly, we have here a sort of historical archipelago, more continuous than in the Pent, yet requiring much bridging over and conjecture in the details.

2. Character of Data at the date of accession, the name of the king, the length of the reign, whether he is of Judah or Israel. The beginnings of the reigns in each case are dated from a point in the reign of the contemporary ruler, e.g., 1 K 18 1: “Now in the 18th year of king Jeroboam the son of Nebat began Abijam to reign over Judah.”

3. Value of Assyrian Records

The Babyloniasts and Assyriologists were more fortunate in their work, and it is by reference to their accounts of the events of contemporary events that a sure footing is found. Hence the value of such monuments as those of Shalmaneser and Sennacherib—here mention should be made also of the Moabite Stone.

The plan of the books is prevalently chronological, although at times the material is arranged in groups (e.g., 2 K 2 1-8 15, the Egyptian prophecies of Ahimose). The chief aim of these books is didactic, the imparting of great moral lessons backed up by well-known illustrations from the nation’s history and from the lives of its heroes and leaders. ISAIAH 18:10 Syriac *° Moab.

KIR, kir (κήρ, kér): The meaning of Kir is "inclosure" or "walled place," and it is therefore doubtful whether it is a place-name or a term for a region. In 2 K 16:9 it is mentioned as the place whither Tiglath-pileser IV carried the Syrian (Aramaean) peoples who deported from Damascus after he had taken that city. In Am 1:5 the prophet announces that the people of Syria (Aram) shall go into captivity unto Kir, and in 9:7 it is again referred to as the place whence the Lord had brought the Syrians (Aramaenae) as Israel had been brought out of Egypt, and the Philis from Captor.

Except in one MS (LXX, A), where it appears as the Libyian Cyrene (2 K 16:9), it is never rendered in the LXX as a place-name.

2. How the Place whence the Syrians were brought (Am 9:7) is not Kir, but a place rendered in the LXX but "the deep" or "the dry." Kir (κήρ), e^k b^thov, ek b^thov, "pit), probably a tr of some variant rather than of the word "Kir itself. Comparing the Assyry-Bab kiru (for giru), "wall, "inclosure," "interior," or the like, Kir might have the general meaning of a place parted off for the reception of exiled peoples. Parallels would be Kir Moab, "the inclosure of Moab." Kir Heres or Kir Hareseth, "the inclosure of brick" (LXX hoi lithoi tou telouou). It seems probable that there was more than one place to which the Assyrians transported captives and exiles, and if their practice was to place them as far as they could from their native land, one would expect, for Palestinian exiles, a site or sites on the eastern side of the Tigris and Euphrates.

In Isa 22:5 occurs the phrase, "a breaking down of the walls, and a crying to the mountains" (mekar-^fark kir w-sho^a el ha-h^ar, "is surrounding of the wall," etc., would be better), Emendation and the mention of the name of one of the Bibles of the Jews was caused Fried. Delitzsch to suggest that we have to read, instead of kir, ^fark, combined with sho^a, as in Ezk 23:23. Following this, but retaining kir, Cheyne translates "Kir underminton, and Sho^a is at Kir, and the name of the place, though it might better be the Assyrians transported captives and exiles, and if their practice was to place them as far as they could from their native land, one would expect, for Palestinian exiles, a site or sites on the eastern side of the Tigris and Euphrates.

In the next verse (Isa 22:6) Kir is mentioned with Elam—a position which a city for western exiles would require. The mention is Elam as taking the quiver, and Kir as uncovering the shield, apparently against Kir in Assyrian Army

The name, at least in this form, appears only once (Isa 18:1) as that of a city in Moab. It is named with Az of Moab, with which possibly it may be identical, since yir or 'tr is the Heb equivalent of kir.
the Moabite Kir. The Tg hence reads “Kirak in Moab.” There can be no doubt that the Kerak here intended is represented by the modern town of that name, with which, consequently, Kerak Moab is almost universally identified. It must always have been of great importance. It is mentioned as Charakmeha (Xarākmē'ah) in the Acts of the Council of Jerusalem (536 AD) and by the early geographers. It dominated the great caravan road connecting Syria with Egypt and Arabia. The Crusaders therefore directed attention to it, and held possession of it from 1107 till it fell again into the hands of the Moeslems under Saladin, 1188. The Chroniclers speak of it as in al Belkha, and the chief city of Arabia Secunda. Under the title of Petra Deserti the Crusaders found here a bishop’s see. The Gr bishop of Petra still has its seat in Kerak.

Kerak stands upon a lofty spur projecting westward from the Moab plateau, with Wādy ‘Atīn Franjī on the S., and Wādy el-Kerak on the N., about 10 miles from the Dead Sea. The sides of the mountain sink sharply into these deep ravines, which unite immediately to the W., and, as Wādy el-Kerak, the great hollow runs northwestward to the sea. It is a position of great natural strength, both as regards the approach from the uplands to the E. only by a narrow neck. It is 3,370 ft. above the level of the sea. The mountains beyond the adjacent valleys are much higher. The place was surrounded by a strong wall, with five towers, which can still be traced in its general height. The most northerly tower is in very poor condition. The most interesting building at Kerak is the huge castle on the southern side. It is separated from the adjoining hill on the right by a large artificial moat; and it is provided with a reservoir. A moat also runs across the northern side of the fortress, and on the E. the wall has a sloped or battered base. The castle is then separated from the town. The walls are very thick, and are well preserved. Beneath the castle is a chapel in which traces of frescoes are still visible. In days of ancient warfare the place must have been practically impregnable. It could be entered only by two roads passing through rock-cut tunnels. The main danger must always have been failure of water supply. There are springs immediately outside the city; but those alone would not be sufficient. Great cisterns were therefore constructed in the town and also in the castle. The half-nomadic inhabitants of Kerak today number some 1,140 families (Muml. Arabia Petraea, III, 97). The Gr church claims about 2,000 souls; the rest are Moeslems. They are wild and fearless people, not greatly inclined to treat strangers with courtesy and kindness. In the spring of 1911 the town was the center of a rising against the government, which was not quelled until much blood had been shed.

KIRAMA, kir-rama, kir-rma (Karama, Kiram; AV Cirama): The people of K. returned with Zerubbabel from Babylon (1 Esd 5 20); the “Ramah” of Ear 2 23 (q.v.).

KIR-HARESETH, kir-hare-seth, ha-re’seth (חירשעם, kir-hareseth, Isa 16 7; in 2 K 3 25 AV reads Kir-hareseth [paulaform]); KIR-HERES (חירחissance, kir heres, Jer 48 31 36; in Isa 16 11 AV reads Kir-hares [paulaform]): Modern scholars unanimously identify this city with Kir of Moab. In Jehoram’s invasion of Moab it lay along his line of attack; and on the city wall the king of Moab sacrificed his son (2 K 3 25ff). It was obviously the capital, i.e. Kir Moab. The name is generally taken to mean “city of the sun.” Cheyne, however, points out (EB, s.v.): (1) that this explanation was unknown to the ancients; (2) that “kir” is nowhere supposed to mean “city,” except in the compound names Kir-heres, Kir-hareseth, and Kir Moab; (3) that heres, “sun,” nowhere has a fem. ending, and (4) that Isa 16 7 (LXX and Aqu.) indicates it and not not the second part of the name (Jerés, Désés). He suggests, therefore, that we should possibly read kirúath ḫród, kiruth hódáhákah, “new city.” W. EWING

KIRIATH, kir-i-ath (עירת, kiryth, “city”; AV Kirjath): Mentioned (Josh 18 28) as a city of Benjamin; has been identified with Kirieth el-Eloah, “town of grapes,” a prosperous town on the highroad between Jerus and Jaffa; it is sometimes spoken of by the inhabitants as Kirieth. It is, however, generally thought that Kiriath here stands for Kirjath-Jearim (q.v.). See PBF, III, 132, SH VII.

KIRIATHAIM, kir-i-athaim (עיריתאימ, kiráthayím, “two cities”; AV Kirjathaim):
(1) A city in the uplands of Moab formerly held by Sihon, and given by Moses to Reuben, who is said to have fortified it (Nu 32 37; Jos 13 10). It is named along with Elealeh and Nebo in the former passage, and with Sihmah in the latter. It was in the hands of Moab in Mesha’s time, and he claims to have fortified it (MS, i. 10). For Jeremiah (48 1 23) and Ezekiel (26 9) it is a Moab city on the W. Under Onom it identifies it with Coritha; a Christian village 10 Rom miles W. of Madaba. This is the modern Karaytab, about 11 miles W. of Madaba, and 5 miles E. of Machaerus. This, however, may represent Kerioth, while the towns with which it is named would lead us to look for Kirjathaim to the N. of Wādy Zerbā Ma’tim. From this city was named Shaveh-kirjathaim, “the plain of Kirjathaim” (Gen 14 5).

(2) A city in the territory of Naphtali, assigned to the Gershonite Levites (1 Ch 6 70), corresponding to “Kartan” in Josh 21 32. W. EWING

KIRIATH-ARIM, kir-i-ath-ar’im (Eer 2 25). See KIRIATH-JEARIM.

KIRIATH-HUZOOTH, kir-i-ath-húzoth, k-u’zoth (עיריתאזוות, kirynth húzoth, “city of streets”; LXX reads ἔκτεσες ἐκτέσεως, politeis epagōlēn, “city of villages,” from which we may infer a reading ἐκτεστά, ἐκτέσθη, for ἔκτεσι, ἐκτέσθη; AV Kirjath-huzoth): A place to which, after their meeting, Balak and Balaam went together (Nu 22 39). They met at “the City of Moab” (ver 30), which is probably identical with Kir of Moab (q.v.). Kirjath-husoth was probably therefore not far from that city. Some would identify it with Kirjathaim; some with Kerioth; as yet there is no certainty.

KIRIATH-JEARIM, kir-i-ath-jé-rim, k-jär’im (עיריתא׳ירימ, kirynth-yarîm, “city of thickets”; LXX ἔκτεσες ἐκτέσεως, politeis Iarōm, ἐκτέσθη, politeis earōm; AV Kirjath-jearim): One of the four chief cities of the Gibeonites (Josh 9 17); a city of Judah (Josh 16 60), evidently an ancient Sem “high place,” hence the name “Kiriath-Baal” (ib); it was one of the places on the border line between Judah and Benjamin (Josh 18 14 15; 16 11 where it is called “Baslah); cf 1 Ch 13 6). It is mentioned as in Judah (Josh 15 60; 16 15; Jgs 18 12), but if Kirjath (q.v.) is identical with it, it is mentioned as belonging to Benjamin (Josh 18:28): in 2 S 6 2, Baale-judah.

Jgs 18:12 records that the men of Dan set forth out of Zorah and Eshtaol and encamped in Mahan-neh-dan behind (W. of) Kiriath-jearim.

(1.) Scripture References

In Jgs 13:25 Mahaneh-dan ["the camp of Dan"] is mentioned as between Zorah and Eshtaol; see Mahaneh-dan.) To this sanctuary the ark of Jeh was brought from Beth-shemesh by the people of Kiriath-jearim, and they "brought it into the house of p"Arim="thickets"). This village is commonly known as Abu Ghosh, from the name of a robber chieftain who, with his family, flourish ed there in the first half of the last century. Medieval ecclesiastical tra dition has made this place the Anathoth of Jer, and a handsome church from the time of the Crusades, now thoroughly repaired, exists here to mark this tradition. This site suits well as regards the border line, and the name Kuriet is the exact equivalent of Kiriath; it also fits in with the distance and direction given in the Onom, but it cannot be called satisfactory in all respects. Soba, in the neighborhood, has, on account of its commanding position, been suggested as Kuriet, but except for this one feature it has no special claims. The late Colonel Conder has very vigorously advocated the claim of a site he discovered on the south side of the rugged Wady Isma'el, called Khurbet 'Erma, pointing out truly that 'Erma is the exact equivalent of 'Arim (Ezr 2:25). Unfortunately the 2d part of the name would appear from the references in 1 Esd and in Onom to be that part which was forgotten long ago, so that the argument even of the philologists who see a site in the foreground cannot be of much value. The greatest objections in the minds of most students are the unsuitability of the position to the requirements of the Judah-Benjamin frontier and its distance from the other Gibeonite cities.

The present writer suggests another site which, in his opinion, meets at least some of the requirements better than the older proposals. Standing on the hill of Beth-shemesh and looking N.W., with all the cities of Zorah (Sue'ah) and Eshtaol (Eshu'a) in full view, a lofty hill crowned by a considerable forest catches the eye. The village a little below the summit is called Beth Makhr, and the hilltop itself is the shrine of a local saint known as Sheikh el Ajin. So "holy" is the site, that no trees in this spot are ever cut, nor is fallen brushwood removed. There is a Wely or sanctuary of the saint, and round about are scores of very curious and apparently ancient graves. Southward from this site the eye follows the line of Jewish hills—probably the Mt. Jearim of Josh 15:10—until it strikes the outstanding point of Kesla (Chesslon), some 2 miles to the S. If the ark was taken here, the people of Beth-shemesh could have followed its progress almost the whole way to its former home. Although the name, which appears to mean "besieged" or "confined," in no degree helps, in all the other respects (see 2 above), this site suits well the condi tions of Kiriath-jearim.

KIRIATH-SANNAH, kir-i-a-th-sannah (Kiriath-sannah). AV Kiriath Sannah). In Josh 15:49 it is called "Dagon," and is identical with Kir sustainability.

KIRIATH-SEPHER, kir-i-a-th-sapher (Kiriath-sepher). Kiriath-sepher; ter by many, as it was Heb, as "town of books," as "city of books," as "city of instruction," and that it occurs in the Am Tab in the form "Bit san".

The first suggested identification was that of Robinson (BE, 11, 12), viz. Kuriet et Enab, the "town of grapes," a flourishing little town about 9 miles W. of Jerus on the carriage road to Jaffa. The district around is still fairly well wooded (of Ruined Church at Kuriet.

Mordecai, and 31 (Aaron By 31 Ch pass) passage K 2, the (Samuel easy the Ch Mahli 39, fare- 1. mentioned S 1 Absalom common before Esd 19 largely by Springs rising at the base of Carmel, on the edge of the plain of Acre. From Jenin in the S.E., the deep torrent bed falls a westerly direction, with numerous windings cutting the plain in two, until it reaches the pass at the northeastern base of Carmel. Through the gorge between the mountain and the hills of Galilee it reaches the plain of Acre. From Sa'da’iyeh it flows in a deep sluggish stream through the marsh-land to the sea near Haifa. In this part the crocodile is said to have been seen at times.

In the summer season the water from the springs is largely absorbed by irrigation, and the upper reaches of the river are soon dry. The bed runs along the bottom of a trench some 20 ft. deep through the plain. It is easily crossed at the ports by those who know how to avoid the localities of the spring. In case of heavy rains the trench is swiftly filled, and the soft soil of the plain is made to plum. Remembering this, it is easy to understand the disaster that befell the army when the well-armed trench was swiftly filled. The chief ford for long was to the W. of the town where the stream issues into the plain of Acre, on the highway from Haifa to Nazareth. Here it is now spanned by a substantial bridge, while elsewhere it remains a swollen track.

At the mouth of the river it is generally easily fordable over the sand bank thrown up by the waves beating against the current of the stream. The main traffic here is now carried by a wooden bridge.

The phrase nähāl uthānim in Jgs 5 21 is not easy of interpretation. EV translates, "(that ancient river)"; G. A. Smith, "trench or watercourse"; while others think it may refer to a stream other than the Kishon. Guthe suggests that both names may be derived from those of places adjoining the river. Kishôn may possibly mean the "tortuous" stream, referring to the windings of its course.

KISLEV, kîs’lēv (ךֵיֶלֶב), kislev; AV Chisleu, RV "Chislev": The 9th month of the Jewish year, corresponding to December. The word is found in Neh 1 1 and Zec 7 1. The derivation is uncertain. See CALENDAR.

KISS (ךִּסֶּס, nāshak; φίλεις, philēs, κατακλύσις kataklȳsis, φωτεινά, phōteina) The kiss is common in eastern lands in salutation, etc., on the cheek, the forehead, the beard, the hands, the feet, but not (in Pal) the lips (Cheyne, Eiriath-jearim; Jenin, Eiriath-jearim; Jenin, Eiriath-jearim). In the Bible there is no sure instance of the kiss in ordinary salutation. We have in the OT nāshak, "to kiss," used (1) of relatives (which seems the origin of the practice of kissing; of Cant 8 1, "Oh that thou wert as my brother . . . I would kiss thee; yes, and none would despise me"); Gen 27 26-27 (Isaac and Jacob); 29 11 (Jacob and Rachel); 33 4 (Esau and Jacob); 46 15 (Joseph and his brethren); 48 10 (Jacob and Joseph’s sons); 50 1 (Joseph and his father); Ex 27 12 (Aaron and his sons); Ezek 18 (Moses and Jethro, united with obedience); Ruth 1 9-14 (Naomi and her daughters-in-law—a farewell); 2 S 14 33 (David and Absalom); 1 K 19 20 (Elisha and his parents—a farewell); see also Gen 29 13; 31 28,55; Tob 7 6; 10 12. (2) Of friendship and affection; of 1 S 20 41 (David and Jonathan); 2 S 15 6 (Absalom and those who came to him); 19 39 (David and Barzillai—a farewell); 20 9 (Joab and Amasa); Prov 27 6 ("the kisses nāshak is of an enemy"); Esa 4 47 ("the king stood up, and kissed him"). (3) Of love; Cant 1 2, "Let him kiss me with the kisses nāshak is of his mouth"); Prov 7 13 (of the feigned love of "the strange woman"). (4) Of homage, perhaps; of 1 S 10 1 (Samuel after anointing David king).
Gen 41.40, "Unto thy word shall all my people be ruled," RVm "order themselves," or "do homage," AVm "Heb be armed or kiss" (nāšak); Ps 2.12, "Kiss the son" (ARV), ERVm "Some versions read the [latter] word as instruction; others, 'Worship in purity'"; some ancient VSS give 'Kiss [or, do homage] purely.' (5) Of idolastrous practices; cf 1 K 19.18; Hos 13.2 (cf 8.5.6; 10.5); Job 31.27, probably, "kissing the hand to the sun or moon" (cf ver.26.57). See ADORATION. (6) A figurative use may be seen in Ps 85.10; Prov 24.26; Ezek 3.13, where "touched" is nāšak (see AVm).

(7) In Ad Est 13.1 we have "I have had content . . . to kiss the soles of his feet," and in Exodus 29.5 , "I will be bath received, he will kiss a man's hands"—marks of self-humiliation or abase-ment.

In the NT we have phileó, "to kiss," "to be friendly," and kataphileó, "to kiss thoroughly," "to be very friendly"—the first in Mt 25.48; Mk 14.44; Lk 22.47, of the kiss with which Judas betrayed his Master. This was probably meant to be taken as an expression of special regard, which is expressed by the kataphileó of Mt 26.49; Mk 14.48; Lk 22.48, which is used of the woman who kissed the feet of Christ (Lk 7.38.45); of the father's greeting of the returning prodigal (15.20); and of the farewell to Paul of the Ephesian Christians (Acts 20.37); philéma, "a kiss," a mark of friendship. Used by our Lord as that to which Simon was omitted to give (which may refer to ordinary hospitality), but which the woman had bestowed so impressively (Lk 7.45); of the kiss of Judas (Lk 22.48); and of the "holy kiss" wherein Christians greet each other, which, according to the general usage we have seen, would be as the members of one family in the Lord, or as specially united in holy love (Rom 16.16; 1 Cor 16.20; 2 Cor 13.12; 1 Thess 5.28; 1 Pet 5.4). This is reason to believe that, as a rule, men only thus greeted men, and women, women. In the Apos Const (3d cent.) it is so enjoined.

KITE, kit (κῆτος, ʿawqah; kēroos, kitōn; Lat Mitisus cetinum or regalis): A medium-sized member of the hawk tribe (see HAWK). This bird is 27 in. long, of bright reddish-brown color, has sharply pointed wings and deeply forked tail. It is supposed to have exceptionally piercing eyes. It takes moles, mice, young birds, carrion, frogs, and grasshoppers, and also carrion for food. Its head and facial expression are unusually eagle-like. It was common over Pal in winter, but bred in the hills of Galilee and rough mountainous places, so it was less conspicuous in summer. It is among the lists of abomina-tions (see Lev 11.14 and Dt 14.13). It is notable that this is the real bird intended by Job to be used as that whose eye could not trace the path to the silver mine:

"That path no bird of prey knoweth, Neither hath the falcon's eye seen it" (Job 28.7).

The word used here in the original Heb is ʿawqah, which was the name for kite. Our first translators used "vulture"; our latest efforts give "falcan," a smaller bird of different markings, not having the kite's reputation for eyesight.

KITHLISH, kithlish (κῆθλος, kithlé). See CHITLISH.

KITRON, kit'on (κῆτρον; ʿwtērōn): An unidentified place in Zebulun, not possessed by the tribe (Jgs 1.30). It may be identical with Kattath of Judges 8.11. The Tell Taim site is identified with Sepphoris, which is represented by the modern village of Seffārīyeh.
makes it that of “the rising sun”—i.e. the Pers Gulf. Be this as it may, General Censola discovered at Curium, in Cyprus, a seal-cylinder apparently inscribed “Mār-Istar, son of 11u-bani, servant [worshipper] of Masters Nām-Sin, who bore the name bearing his defiled son of Sargon. In the 16th cent.

BC, Cyprus was tributary to Thothmes III. About the year 708 BC, Sargon of Assyria received the submission of the kings of the district of Yâ’, in Cyprus, and set up at Citium the stele bearing his name, which is now in the Royal Museum at Berlin. Esarhaddon and his son Aṣûr-bani-āpil each received tribute from the 10 Cyprian princes who acknowledged Assyr supremacy. The island was conquered by the Egypt king Amasis, and later formed part of the Pers empire, until the revolt of Evagoras in 410 BC. The Assyrians knew the island under the name of Yā’d(a)name, the “Wedan” (Vedan) of Ezek 27:19 RV (Sayce, PSBA, 1912, 26).

If the orthodox date for the composition of Gen be accepted, not only the Phoenicians, but also the Greeks, or a people of Gr-Lat stock, must have been present in Cyprus, Races before the time of Moses, in sufficient number to make them the predominant population of the island. Paphos, where they had built a temple to Ashthoreth and set up an ‘āšērāh (a pillar bearing the name of the goddess); was one of their principal settlements. The rest of the island was apparently occupied by the Aryans, whose presence there caused the name of Kittim to be applied to the Gr and Phoen countries of the Mediterranean. Gr and Phoen were the languages spoken on the island, as was proved by George Smith’s demonstration of the nature of the non-Phoen text of the inscription of King Melekh-yathon of Citium (370 BC). The signs used in the Gr-Cyprian inscriptions are practically all syllabic.

The many influences which have modified the Cyprian race are reflected in the ancient art, which shows the effect of Bab, Egypt, Phoen., and Gr contacts. Specimens of the finest collection of the art can be found in many museums, but the best of the full-length figures are life-size, and the better class of work is exceedingly noteworthy. See Cyprus. KNEADING, nêding. See Bread, III, 2.

KNEE, nê, KNEEL, nêl (“knee,” 713; berekh; Aram. 111178, “arkhubbah; yow’u, gôn; “kneel”; 733, bêrak; Aram. 111173, bêrak; 7111173, bêrak; gôwerwâ; gôverpê tô;): Most of the uses are obvious, and the figurative use of “knee” as the symbol of strength (Job 4:4; Prov 12:16, etc) needs no explanation. The disease of the knees mentioned in Dt 28:35 is perhaps some form of leprosy. In Job 3:12 the “knee” seem to be used for the kop, as the place where a child receives its first care. Three times in Gen the knees appear in connection with primitive adoption customs. In 30:3 a fiction is enacted that purports to represent Rachel as the actual mother of Bilhah’s children. By a somewhat similar rite in 48:12, Jacob (the “knees” here are Jacob’s, not Joseph’s) adopts Reuben and Manasseh, so that the single patriarchs and not as members of a single Joseph tribe. In the same way Machir’s children are adopted by Joseph in 50:23, and this is certainly connected with the counting of Machir (instead of Manasseh) as one of the tribes in Jgs 5:14. See THROES; and for the idea underlying this paternal adoption, of THRON. From among classical instances of the same custom compare Homer, Odyssey, xix. 401ff, where Autolokos, grandfather of Ulysses, receives the newborn grandchild on his knees and gives him his name. Thus also we have to understand the numerous representations in Egypt sculpture, showing the king as an infant on the knees or the lap of a goddess.

Kneeling was less common an attitude of prayer among the Jews than was standing, but references to kneeling are of course abundant. For kneeling (or prostrating one’s self) before a superior, see ATTITUDE, 2; SALUTATION.

KNIFE, mif, nîq, ma’aškeleth, lit. an instrument for eating; but used of large knives for slaying animals, cutting up a carcass or a sacrificial victim (Gen 22:6; Jgs 19:29; Prov 30:14). (2) 7133, berenb, rendered generally “sword,” but “knife,” or “sword-knife” (cf Ex 4:25), probably of similar knives in 1 K 18:28, used by Baal prophets in gashing themselves. In Ezek 5:12 AV, “knife,” probably better RV, “sword.”

Egyptian Stone Knives. Assyrian Bronze Knives. (Br. Mus.)

(3) 7133, ta’ar, usually rendered “razor,” in combination with 7133, ha-gôpher, “knife of the writer,” or “penknife” (Jer 36:23). (4) 7133, mahalaphlm, “slaughter-knives” (Ex 1:9). (5) 7133, sokkin, Aram., “knife” (Prov 23:2). Early knives were commonly made of sharp stones, esp. of flint, later of bronze and iron. The former remained in use in religious ceremonies long after the latter were in common use. Knife was generally used at meals, meats being cut into bits before served, and bread being broken into fragments. Herod used a knife for paring apples, and attempted suicide with the instrument (Jos, Ant, XVII, vii, 1; BJ, I, xxiii, 7). EDWARD BAGBY POLLARD

KNOCK, nôk (kroô, kroua): The oriental house was fitted with heavy doors which were bolted and locked with wooden keys too large to be carried about, so that even a member of the household could not secure entrance until in response to his knock or call the door should be opened by someone within. At night the delay would be increased by the difficulty of arouses for innumerable sleeping within the inner chambers. To persons familiar with such experiences, the words of Jesus concerning a higher entrance, “Knock, and it shall be opened unto you” (Mt 7:7; Lk 12:36), would have a unique force not easy for us to appreciate.

KNOP, nôp: In Ex 25:31 ff; 37:17 ff (kophôr), part of the ornaments of the golden candlestick, in 1 K 6:18; 7:24 (ʼphôlim), gold-like ornaments of the lining of Solomon’s temple, and of the brazen sea (in 1 K 6:18, RV “gourds”). See CANDLESTICK, GOLDEN; TEMPLE; SEA, THE MOLZEN.

KNOW, nô, KNOWLEDGE, nôl’ej, nôl’îj (in Heb chiefly 771, yôḏaḥa, noun 7717, dâ’âh, in Gr 1111173, 11111173, 111111173, oida; “to know fully,”
KOAH, kô'â (Kôô), kô'âth (Kôô'áh): A people named with Pekod and Shoa as enemies of Jerus (Ezk 23 23). Their location was probably N.E. of Babylonia.

KOAHITH, kô'hâth, KOHANITES, kô'hâth-si (Kôô'áth, Kôô'áh, Kôô'hâth, Kôô'âth): Second son of Levi, and ancestor of Moses and Aaron (Gen 46 11; Ex 6 16–20; Nu 3 17; 1 Ch 6 1, etc.). The Kohanites formed one of the three divisions of the tribe of Levi; the other two being the Gersonites and the Merarites (Nu 3 17 ff.). The Kohanites consisted of four families, the Amramites, the Izharites, the Hebronites, and the Uzzielites (Nu 3 19–27, etc.). Their place in the wilderness was on the southern side of the tabernacle (Nu 3 29), and their number is given (from a month old) as 8,600 (ver 25). Their special charge was the ark, and the table and the candlestick, and the altars, and the vessels of the sanctuary wherewith they minister, and the screen, and all the service thereof (ver 31; cf 7 9). After the conquest 23 cities were assigned them by lot (Josh 21 4–5 f.). In David’s time and after, Heman, a Kohanite, and his family had a prominent place in the service of the music of the sanctuary (1 Ch 25 3 ff; 16 41 ff; 25 1 ff); David likewise divided the Levites into courses (the Kohanites, 33 12–20; 24 20–25). We read of the Kohanites in the reign of Jehoshaphat at Engedi (2 Ch 20 19), and in connection with the cleansing of the temple under Hezekiah (2 Ch 29 12–14).

KOHELETH, kô-hô'lêth (Hôô'lêth). See Ecclesiastes.

KOLAIH, kô-lî'â (Hôô'îâ), Kôlâdá'â, "voice of Jeh." (1) A Benjamite, son of Masseiah (Neh 11 7). (2) Father of Ahia, a false prophet and a lecherous man (Jer 29 21–23).

KÔNÉ, kô'nê (Kôô'dâ, Kôô'dâ): Some MSS have wâsân, kônem, from which we have AV (the) villages. The name occurs in the account of the measures taken to secure the country against Holophernes (Jjh 4 4). If Kôna be correct, we may possibly identify the place with Cyammon.

KÔPH, kôf (Côôf), Kôfâ (Kôôf): The 19th letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as k (intense k). It came also to be used for the number 100. For name, etc, see Alphabet.

KOR, kôr. See Cor.

KORAH, kô'ra (Kôô'râ), kô'rah, "baldness," possibly; Kô'râ (Kôô'râ): (1) One of the 3 sons of Oholibamah, Esau’s Hivite wife. The account says that the 3 were born in Canaan before Esau withdrew to the Seir mountain country. They are mentioned 3 t in the brief account from 3 points of view (Gen 36 5–14; 1 Ch 1 33), the 9d mention being in the list of “chiefs.”

(2) One of the sons of Eliphaz, the son of Adah, Esau’s Hittite wife (Gen 36 16). He is mentioned as one of the Edomite “chiefs.” If one has the habit, finding a statement anywhere, of thinking that the statement ought to be changed into something else, he will be interested in the attempts to identify these Edomite Korabs with Korah (3).

(3) A son of Hebron (1 Ch 2 43), the son of Marshealah, mentioned in the Caleb group of families in Judah.

(4) The son of Ishar the son of Kohath the son of Levi (Ex 6 16 ff; Nu 16 1; 1 Ch 6 18–31–38), a younger contemporary of Moses. There may have been generations, omitted in the record, between Ishar and K.; that is a natural way of accounting for Amminadab (1 Ch 6 22–30). This Korah is best known as the man whom the opening earth is said to have swallowed up along with his associates. They were challenging the authority of Moses. The catastrophe and Aaron in the wilderness (Nu 16, in the 17). K. is presented as the principal wilderness in the affair. The company is spoken of as his company, and the 4 who were swallowed up as being all the men the apper-Korahites, kôrâh-îts (kôrâ’îts, korâ’îts), sons of Korah (kôrâ’ôth; korâ’ôth; "brâk kôrâh; in AV appears also as Kohath, Kohathite, Kore); this phrase is used to denote Asir and Elkanah and Abiasaph, Korah's 3 individual sons (Ex 6:24; of Nu 25:11). But its more frequent use, and that which interest attaches, is in the titles of some of the Psalms.

The genealogical details concerning K. are rather full. In 3 places we find the list of the 7 successive generations closing with the prophet Samuel and his son Joel (1 Ch 6:5-17; 25:1-22; 25:1-20). They mention all of the generations between K. and Joel. The genealogical list is in 1 Ch 25:20 connected with the 4 generations following Joel (1 Ch 6:33; 5:19-31; 6:6), and with 22 generations in the very latest Bible times (1 Ch 9:31).

The adj. "Korathite" appears also in AV as "Korathite; Kore; and Korahite;" the latter two words are frequently rendered in E RV: it is used 4 times in the sing. Once it designates an individual (1 Ch 9:31: 2: it denotes the successors of K. taken collectively in Nu 25:58; 1 Ch 26:19); 4 t it is used in the pl. denoting the number of the K. families in Nu 26:6; 26:1; 2 Ch 20:19). As variants of this use, the "sons of the Korahites" appears once, and "the children of the Kohathites" once (1 Ch 26:19; 2 Ch 20:19).

In these various passages the K. families are counted like the other Levitical families. In 1 Ch 12:6 we have an account of 5 men who are designated as the "Korahites," who joined David when he was at Ziklag—Elkanah, Isaiah, Azarel, Joesar (Yashebome). They are described as "Korahites," and esp. with the bow and sling, and as being "of Saul's brethren of Benjamin." Some of them may plausibly be identified with men of the same name mentioned elsewhere. These Korahites may have been cousins of the Samuel family, and they may have resided not very far apart.

In the latest O.T. times one Mattithiah, "the first-born of Shammuel the Korahite," held "the office of trust over the things that were baked in pans" (1 Ch 3:31). Shammuel was "the son of Kore, the son of Ebiasaph, the son of Korah." In this expression 15 or more generations are omitted between Ebiasaph and Kore, and perhaps as many between Kore and Shammuel. The record speaks to supply one of the omitted links—Kore and Shammuel. The representative of the line in David's time was "Zechariah, the son of Mattithiah" (2 Sam 6:19). In all periods the Korahites were "keepers of the thresholds of the tent." Back in the time of Phinehas the son of Eleazar, "their fathers had been over the camp of Joth" (1 Ch 19:20). Zechariah was, in his time, "porter of the door of the tent of meeting" (ver 21), and Shammuel was still the chief of the porters (ver 17). The record for David's time supports and supplements this. It says that the doorkeepers of the tent of meeting were"appointed by David, included a K. contingent, its position most being in the north between the son Zechariah (1 Ch 16:3.12.15.14), and that Meshelemiah was the son of Kore, the son of the sons of Asaph. Adopting the common conjecture that Asaph is the line of the Syrian Asaph, we have here the same abridgment of the genealogical list as in 1 Ch 9.

More interesting, however, than the fighting Korahites of Benjamin, or the doorkeeping Kora-hites who claimed succession from Moses to Nehemiah, are the "sons of Korah" who were somehow connected with the service of song. One of the genealogies introduced by the Chronicler, reads: "These are they whom David set over the service of song in the house of Jeh, after that the ark had rest. And they ministered with song before the tabernacle of the tent of meeting, until Solomon had built the house of Jeh in Jerusalem." (1 Ch 6:31,32). Then the writer proceeds to mention first "Heman the singer, the son of Joel, the son of Samuel," and so on, carrying the genealogy back to Korah and Levi. After thus mentioning Heman, he speaks of "his brother Asaph, who stood on his right hand," and traces Asaph's descent back to Gershom the son of Levi; and then says, "and on the left hand their brethren the sons of Merari." Of these the principal leader is Ethan (otherwise called Jeduthun), and his descent is here traced back to Levi.

In this way we are introduced to David's 3 great leaders in choral and orchestral music. Among them Heman the Korahite has at first the place of primacy, though Asaph, later, comes to the front. The events just referred to are mentioned again, more in detail, in the account of David's death, bringing the ark to Jerusalem. The Chronicler is said that at the suggestion of David "the Levites appointed Heman the son of Joel, and also Asaph and Ethan, and with them several others, their brethren of the second degree" (1 Ch 15:17,18). The record proceeds to speak of the services of "the singers, Heman, Asaph, and Ethan, and their associates, in the pageantry of the bringing of the ark to Jerusalem. After that, it says, Asaph had charge of the services of thanksgiving and praise before the ark in Jerusalem, while Heman and Jeduthun served in the high place at Gibson (1 Ch 15:4 ff. 37,39-42). Later, the record says (1 Ch 25), David made an elaborate organization, under Asaph and Heman and Jeduthun, for prophesying with song and instrumental music.

As the records of David's time, according to the Chronicler, thus attribute to him great achievements in sacred music and song, so the records of subsequent times reiterate the same thing. David's interest in sacred music is mentioned in connection with Solomon's temple, in connection with the times of Joash and Hezekiah and Josiah, in connection with the institutions and exploits of the times after the exile (e.g. 2 Ch 7:6; 23:18; 29:25 ff; 35; 15; Ezr 3:10; Neh 12:24,36,45,46). Asaph and Heman and Jeduthun led the magnificent choir and orchestra at the dedication of the temple (2 Ch 5:12). One of the sons of Asaph prophesied, and the Korahites sang at the crisis in the time of Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 20:14-19). The sons of Asaph and the sons of Heman and the sons of Jeduthun were present, and there was instrumental music and loud singing, according to the appointment of David and his associates, at the time of Hezekiah's Passover (2 Ch 30:13 ff). Singing, and Asaph and Heman and Jeduthun and David have an important place in the record concerning Josiah. And the records of the post-exilic times mention "the singers and the sons of Asaph" and the arrangements of David as conspicuous as the law of Moses itself.

Add to this that the names Asaph or Heman or Ethan or Jeduthun, or the designation "the sons of Korah" are attached to 25 or more of the Ps (e.g. Ps 42-49, 50, 62, 72-86), and we have a body of testimony that is at least abundant and intelligible. It is to the effect that there was elaborate organization, on a large scale, in connection with the musical services of the temple at Jerusalem; that this began in the time of David, as a part of the preparation for building the temple, under the influence of the family traditions of the prophet Samuel; and that the movement continued in the generations following David, either surviving the exile, or being revived after the exile. In connection with this movement, the phrase "sons of Korah," "sons of Asaph," "sons of Heman," "sons of Jeduthun" denote, in some cases, merely lineal descent; but in other cases they denote each an aggregate of persons interested in sacred song and music—a guild or society or group—arising out of the movement which originated in David's time. See, for example, "sons of Asaph" (1 Ch 25:1-2; 2 Ch 20:14; cf. ver 19; 29:13; 36:15; Ezr 2:41; 3:10; Neh 7:44; 11:22) and "sons of Korah" in the titles of Ps 42-49 and 84, 86, 87-89. Traces of these aggregates appear in the times of Solomon, of Jehoshaphat, of Joash, of Hezekiah, of Josiah, of Zerubbabel, of Ezra and Nehemiah.

If a person holds that the mention of an event in Ch is to be regarded as proof that the event never occurred, that person will of course deny that the testimony thus cited is true in fact. He is likely to hold that the guilds of singers arose in the exile, and that, some generations after Nehemiah, they fabricated for themselves the ecclesiastical and physical pedigrees now found in the Books of Ch. If, however, we accord fair play to the Chronicler as a witness, we shall be slow to discredit the minute and interfitting testimony which he has placed before us.

KORE, kōrē (ךָּוָּרֶץ). kōré'-law, "one who proclaims":
(1) A Levite of David's time, descended from Kohath and Korah. See Korah, 4. Shallum, chief doorkeeper in the latest Bible times, is described as "the son of Kore, the son of Ebiasaph, the son of Korah," (1 Ch 9:19). This expression omits the generations between Shallum and K., and those between K. and Ebiasaph, perhaps 15 generations or more in each case. The context supplies two of the omitted names, of the time of David, Meshelemiah and his son Zecchariah (1 Ch 9:21,22). The record for the time of David mentions these two, with some particulars, calling Meshelemiah the son of K. (1 Ch 26:1,2,9,14). It describes them as "Korahites" or the sons of Asaph. It is usual to regard this last clause as a variant for "the son of Ebiasaph," thus making the description identical with that in 1 Ch 9:19. With this understanding, the text claims that "the Korahites," K. and Meshelemiah and Zecchariah, come midway in a line of sanctuary ministers, extending continuously from Moses to Nehemiah.
(2) "The son of Imnah the Levite, the porter at the east gate," who "was over the freewill-offerings," in the time of Hezekiah (2 Ch 31:14). Very likely in the same line with (1) above.
(3) In 1 Ch 26:1 AV for Korahites (q.v.).

KUSHALIAH, kū-shā'-yā, kū-shā'-yāh, "bow of Jeh"; A Merarite Levite (1 Ch 15:17), called in 1 Ch 6:44 Kish (q.v.).
LAADAH, lā'a-da (לֹאָדָה): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4:21).

LAADAN, lā'a-dan. See LADAN.

LABAN, lāb'ān: The person named Laban (לָבָן; lābān; Labān, Laban), possibly connected with the "V meaning "to be white," from which in Heb the adj. meaning "white" has just this form) is first introduced to the reader of Gen in the story of the wrong of Rebekah (ch 24). He belonged to that branch of the family of Terah that was derived from Abraham's brother Nahor and his niece Milcah. The genealogy of this branch is traced in Gen 22:20-24, but, true to its purpose and the place it occupies in the book, this genealogy brings the family down to Rebekah, and there stops without mentioning Laban. Accordingly, when Rebekah is introduced in the narrative of ch 24, she is referred to (vs 15-24) in a way that recalls to the reader the genealogy already given; but when her brother Laban is introduced (ver 29), he is related to his sister by the express announcement, "And Rebekah had a brother, and his name was Laban." In this ch he takes an important part in the reception of Abraham's servant, and in the determination of his sister's future. That brothers had an effective voice in the marriage of their sisters is evident, not only from extra-bib. sources, but from the Bible itself; see e.g. Gen 24:8. In Gen 24, however, Laban is perhaps more prominent than even such custom can explain (cf vs 31.50.55), and we are led to see in him already the same forcefulness and egotism that are abundantly shown in the stories from his later life. The man's eager hospitality (ver 31), coming immediately after his mental inventory of the gifts bestowed by the visitor upon his sister (ver 30), has usually, and justly, been regarded as a proof of the same greed that is his most conspicuous characteristic in the subsequent chapters.

The story of that later period in Laban's life is so interwoven with the career of Jacob that little need here be added to what is said of Laban in Jacob, III, 2 (q.v.). By the time of Jacob's arrival he is already a very old man, and 30 years had elapsed since Rebekah's departure. Yet even at the end of Jacob's 20 years' residence with him he is represented as still energetic and active (31:19,23), not only ready for an emergency like the pursuit after Jacob, but personally superintending the management of his huge flocks. His home is in Haran, "the city of Nahor," that is, the locality where Nahor and his family remained at the time when the rest of Terah's descendants emigrated to Canaan (11.31; 12.5). Since Haran, and the region about it where his flocks fed, belonged to the district called Aram (see PADDAN-ARAM; MESOPOTAMIA), Laban is often called "the Aramaean" (EV "the Syrian," from LXX Ἀράμεας, ho Árämēas) see 25:20; 26:5; 31.20.24. It is uncertain how far racial affinity may be read into this term, because the origin and mutual relationships of the various groups or strata of the Sem family are not yet clear. For Laban himself it suffices that he was a Semite, living within the region early occupied by those who spoke the Aramaic dialect that we call Aramaic. This dialect is represented in the narrative of Gen as already differentiated from the dialect of Canaan that was Jacob's mother-tongue; for "the heap of witness," erected by uncle and nephew to the memory of Gen, is called by the one Jegar-saha-elah and by the other Geled—phrases which are equivalent in meaning, the former Aram, the latter Heb. (Ungnad, Hebräische Grammatik, 1912, §6, puts the date of the differentiation of Aram. from "Amurritic" at "about 1500 BC"); Skinner, "Genesis," ICC, argues that ver 47 is a gloss, following Wellhausen, Dillmann, et al.)

The character of Laban is interesting to observe. On the one hand it shows a family likeness to the portraits of all his relations in the patriarchal group, preeminently, however, to his daughter Rebekah, his daughter Rachel, and his nephew Jacob. The nearer related to Laban such figures are, the more conspicuously, as it is fitting, do they exhibit Laban's mingled cunning, resourcefulness, greed and self-complacency. And, on the other hand, Laban's character is sui generis; the picture we get of him is too personal and complex to be denominated merely a "type." It is impossible to resolve this man Laban into a mythological personage—he is altogether human—or into a tribal representative (e.g. of "Syria" over against "Israel") with any degree of satisfaction to the world of scholarship. Whether a character of reliable family tradition, or of popular story-telling, Laban is "a character"; and his intimate connection with the chief personage in Israel's national myth, and the marks this makes it highly probable that he is no more and no less historical than Jacob himself (cf Jacob, VI).

LABANA, lab'a-na (Laḇănā, Labana, 1 Esd 6:29): Called Lebanon in Ezr 2:45.

LABOR, lāb'ār (לָבָר, ḫārā'āh, ḫārā', 'āmal; kōpōs, kōpos): The word (noun and vb) denoting hard work or "toil" (thus in RV of Dt 26:7; Josh 7:3; Rev 2:2) represents several Heb and Gr words, chiefly those above. Occasionally, as in Hab 3:17 (μα'άσθε), it stands for "fruit of labor." Sometimes, in conjunction with "travel," it refers to childbirth (Gen 35:16.17, γαλάδθ; cf 1 Thess 2:9; 2 Thess 3:8). Examples of the word in the ordinary sense are: of ḫārā', Gen 31:42; Job 39:11.16; Ps 128:2; of 'āmal, common in Ecc 3:8; 2:11.18, etc.; of ḫopos, 1 Cor 15:58 ("your labor is not vain, etc"); 1 Thess 1:3 ("work of faith and labor of love"). He refers to (10) "labour" ("labor in the word and in teaching"). See WORK; SLAVERY.

JAMES ORR

LACCUNUS, lac'ō-nus (Lakaκονος, Lakkoünos; AV Lacanus): One of the sons of Addi who returned with Ezra and had married a foreign wife (1 Esd 9:31). The name does not, as might have been expected, occur in Ezr 10:30. See note on the passage in Lange's Comm.) as to the reconciliation of the lists in 1 Esd and Ezr.

LACE, lās (λάσι, pāthil, variously rendered in Gen 38:18.25; Ex 39:3; Nu 16:38; 19:15; Jgs 16:9; Ezk 40:3). In modern Eng. the noun, the "lace" usually denotes a delicate ornamental fabric, but in the word in the sense of "that which binds" is still in perfectly good use, esp. in such combinations as "shoelace," etc. It is this latter significance that is found in Ex 28:28 ("They shall bind it with a lace, a lace of blue"); 1 Kgs 21:31, and 2 Kgs 6:30 AV, κόθανα κόθανα (RV "riband").

LACEDAEMONIANS, las'-ē-kō-mē'-ni-ans (Σπάρτιατοι, Spartanoi; once only Λακεδαμιόνοι, Lakedsamniōn, 2 Macc 5:9): The inhabitants of Sparta or Lacedaemon with whom the Jews claimed some kinship and formed alliances (1 Macc 12 2.5.6.20.31; 14 20.23; 15 23; 2 Mace 5 9). The alliance mentioned in 1 Macc 12 5-23 is based, among other grounds, on that of a common descent of Jews and Lacedaemomians from Abraham, for which the only probable presumption is the similarity of names. "Pelagi" and Peleg son of Eber (Gen 10 25; 11 16). This has been reasonably objected to, and perhaps the most that can be said on this point is that the belief in some relationship between the Jews and the Lacedaemonians seems to have prevailed when 1 Macc was written. The alliance itself is said to have been formed (1 Macc 12 20) between Areus, king of the Lacedaemomians and Omis the high priest; but it is not easy to make out a consistent chronology for the transaction. For the renewal of the alliance (c 144 BC) by Jonathan (1 Macc 12 5-18) and again by Simon (1 Macc 14 16-23), something can be said, as the Greeks had finally been deprived of independence in 146 BC, and Sparta was only obliged to lend assistance to Rome and may be supposed to have been doing so in helping the Jews against Syria. It is possible, too, that as against Syrian Hel lenism the Jews were anxious to show that they had the assistance of distinguished Greeks, though the actual power of Sparta was much reduced from that of former times. The facts, at least of the alliance and the correspondence, seem to be sufficiently attested, though it is not easy to reconcile all the particulars. Jos (Ant, XII, iv, 10; 13, v; XIV, xii-23) gives the correspondence at greater length than the writer of the Mac cabees.

LACHISH, lāushing (לָחש), läkhtish; LXX Ἰακεθ, Lachts [Josh 15 39], Māx(e), Machē): A town in the foothills of the Shephelah on the border of the Phil plain, belonging to Judah, and, from the mention of Eglon in connection with it, evidently in the southwestern portion of Judah’s territory. Orom locates it 7 miles from Eleuthropolis (Beth Jibrin) toward Daroma, but as the latter place is uncertain, the indication does not help in fixing the site of L. The city seems to have been abandoned about 400 BC, and this circumstance has rendered the identification of the site difficult. It was formerly fixed at Umm Lakis, from the similarity of the name and because it was in the region that the Bib. references to L seem to indicate, but the mound called Tell el-Hesy is now generally accepted as the site. This was first suggested by Conder in 1877 (PEFS, 1878, 20), and the excavations carried on at the Tell by the Pal Exploration Fund in 1890-93 confirmed his identification. Tell el-Hesy is situated on a wady, or valley, of the same name (Wady el-Hasy), which runs from a point about 6 miles W. of Hebron to the sea between Gaza and Askelon. It is a mound on the very edge of the wady, rising some 120 ft. above it and composed of débris to the depth of about 60 ft., in which the excavations revealed the remains of distinct cities which had been built, one upon the ruins of another. The earliest of these was evidently Amorite, and could not have been later than 1700 BC, and was perhaps two or three centuries earlier (Bliss, Mound of Many Cities). The identification rests upon the fact that the site corresponds with the Bib. and other historical notices of L., and esp. upon the discovery of a cuneiform tablet in the ruins of the same character as the Am Tab, and containing the name of a king who is known to have been at one time Egypt governor of L. The tablets, which date from the latter part of the 15th or early part of the 14th cent. BC, give us the earliest information in regard to L., and it was then an Egypt dependency, but it seems to have revolted and joined with other towns in an attack upon Jerus, which was also an Egypt dependency. It was perhaps compelled to do so by the Khbiri who were then raiding this region. The place was, like Gaza, an important one for Egypt, being on the frontier and on the route to Jerus, and the importance is seen in the fact that it was taken and destroyed and rebuilt so many times.

We first hear of it in the history of Israel when Joshua invaded the land. It was then an Amorite city, and its king, Jarchia, joined the confederacy formed by Adonizedek, king of Jerus, to resist Joshua. They were defeated in the remarkable battle at Gibeon, and the five confederate kings were captured and put to death at Makkodah (Josh 10 24, 29; 12 11). L. was included in the lot of Judah (15 39), and it was rebuilt, or fortified, by Rchobam (2 Ch 11 5.9). It was besieged by Sennacherib in the reign of Hezekiah and probably taken (2 K 18 13) when he invaded Judah and besieged Jerus, but the other references to the siege leave it doubtful

(2 K 18 14.17; 19 8; 2 Ch 32 9; Isa 36 2; 37 8). The Assyrian monuments, however, render it certain that the place was captured. The sculptures on the walls of Sennacherib’s palace picture the storming of L. and the king on his throne receiving the submission of the captives (Bal’ Light from the East, 190-91). This was in 701 BC, and to this period we may assign the etymological reference to L. in Mic 1 13, “Bind the chariot to the swift steed, 0 inhabitant of Lachish: she was the beginning of sin to the daughter of Zion.” The cause of the invasion of Sennacherib was a general revolt in Phoenicia, Pal, and Philistia, Hezekiah joining in it and all asking Egypt for aid (Rawlinson, Five Great Monarchies of the Ancient Eastern World, ch ix). Issiah had warned Judah not to trust in Egypt (Isa 20 5.6; 30 1-5; 31 1), and as L. was the place where communication was held with Egypt, being a frontier fortress, perhaps even having an Egypt garrison, it would be associated with the “sin” of the Egypt alliance (HGHIL, 234).

The city was evidently rebuilt after its destruction by Sennacherib, for we find Nebuchadnezzar fighting against it during his siege of Jerus (Jer 34 7). It was doubtless destroyed by him, but we are informed by Nehemiah (11 30) that some of the returned Jews settled there after the captivity. It is very likely that they did not reoccupy the site of the ruined city, but settled as peasants in the territory, and this may account for the transfer of the name to Umm Lakis, 3 or 4 miles from Tell el-Hesy, where some ruins exist, but not of a kind to suggest Lachish (Bliss, op. cit.). No remains of the fort were found by the Tell indicating its occupation as a fortress or city later than that destroyed by the king of Babylon, but it was occupied in some form during the crusades, Urnun Lakis being held for a time by the Hospitaliters, and King Richard is said to have made it a base of operations in his war with Saladin (HGHL). The Tell itself, if occupied, was probably only the site of his camp, and it has apparently remained since that time without inhabitants, being used for agricultural purposes only. See further, PALESTINE (RECENT EXPLORATION), III, 1.

LACK (forms of הָלַכְתָּה, הָלָכָה, "to lack, absence," הָלָךְ, " OV, 'agin, 'nought"): This word in its various forms has the usual meaning of "want," "need," "deficiency." There is but little change in the use of the word in the different VSS. Sometimes one of the common synonyms is exchanged for the word itself, e.g. in the OT, 1 S 21 15 RV has "lack" ("Do I lack madmen?") where AV has "need of." Prov 5 23, "lack," instead of "without," is an unusual word for "lacketh;" 10 21, "lack" for "want;" 31 11, "lack" for "need;" Isa 59 15, "lacketh" for "faileth.

In the NT 'lack' is the tr of ὑπερθεῖν, ὑποτεθεῖν, lit. "to be behind," and ὄφθαλμον, endeiis, "in want." In Lk 8 6, AV reads "had no" instead of "lacketh" in AV. In 2 Cor 11 9, RV gives "my want" for "lacketh" in AV; in Col 1 24 "is that which is lack" for "lacketh;" Jas 2 15 "lack of" for "lacketh;" Jas 3 17 "lacketh" to be "lacketh;" Jas 5 13 "lacketh" to be "lacketh.

It readily be seen that sometimes the slight variation helps to explain the meaning.

G. H. GERBERDING

LACUNUS, la-kù'nus. See LACUNA.

LAD: In the OT this word occurs as the tr of נָעָר, "young person," "child," "servant." RV properly substituting 'servant' in 2 K 4 19; Jgs 16 26 is another passage where either sense of the original word may be intended. The word occurs in the NT in Jn 6 9 as the tr of παιδία, παιδανία; in Acts 20 12, παι, παις (AV "young man").

LADAN, la'dan (תְּדָן, la'dân; AV Laadan): (1) A descendant of Ephraim, and an ancestor of Joshua (1 Ch 7 26).

(2) A Levite of the family of Gershon (1 Ch 23 7.9; 26 21), also called Libni (q.v.).

LADANUM, lad'a-num (לָדָן, lōg): Gen 37 25 RVm; elsewhere MYRAH (q.v.).

LADDER, lad'ér. See SIEGE, 4, (c).

LADDER OF TYRE (ץִיוֹם תָּרֹע, lit. "the Ladder"); Térou, Ἰτέρος, Ἰτέριος (ἡ τάξις τῶν ἱκανῶν): Not mentioned in the OT or the NT, but in Apoc (1 Mac 11 59), where it is said that Antiochus VI, after having confirmed Jonathan in the high-priesthood, appointed his brother Johnadan captain over the territory point out between the Ladder of Tyre and the borders of Egypt. The Ladder has been located at different points on the coast between Tyre and Acra, such as the Ras el-Abiyad ("Promontorium Album" of the ancient geographers), about 7 miles S. of Tell el-Abiyad, about 6 miles farther S., and Ras el-Musheiref, a little farther on. These are capes jutting westward into the sea from the ridge which runs parallel to the general line of the coast. These capes project more than a mile into the sea, and present a very bold and precipitous front from 200 to 300 ft. in height. The ascent on either side of the promontory is very steep, and at Ras el-Abiyad steps were cut in the white rock, which led to the identification of this point with the Ladder, but a reference to Jos (11, II, I, 2) leads to a different conclusion. He locates it 100 stadia N. of Acra, which corresponds fairly well with the southern limit of the whole promontory, which is about 12 miles N. of Acra, but not at all with Ras el-Abiyad. The altitude of el-Musheiref is greater than that of el-Abiyad and may have had steps cut in it similar to the latter.

It is more probable that the L. was here, or at Naafsarah, but the term applied to the whole promontory, which offered a secure passage to the passage of armies, or even caravans, since the approach is precipitous on either side, and at Ras el-Abiyad the road skirts the edge of a sheer precipice, where a misstep would hurl one into the sea some 200 ft. below. The application of the term to the whole promontory seems to be indicated by Jos, since he speaks of it as one of the mountains which encompass the plain of Ptolemais (Acra) and the highest of all. This would not be true of any one of the three capes mentioned, but would be if the hills behind, which form the base, were included.

That it was designated as the Ladder of Tyre rather than of Acra was probably due to the fact that the promontory is nearer the city (see Thomson, LB, II, ed 1882; SWP, name-lists, s.v.).

LAD, lad, LADING, lading: "To lade" in the sense of "to load" is retained by RV in nearly all passages where the word occurs in AV (but AV and RV reading of Ps 65 19; Isa 46 1). "They laded us with such things" (Acts 28 10; AV). אֲשִׁרּוּת, epiltethem, "to put on," is rendered by RV, "They put on board such things." Lk 11 46 RV reads "ye load" instead of AV "ye lade.

Lading (ἀποστροφία, phorton) is found in Acts 27 10 in its usual meaning, "the lading of a ship.

LADY, la’di: This word should be taken in the sense of "mistress" in Isa 47 5.7 (Heb gôbereth (so ARV)). In Jgs 5 29; Est 1:16 it is the tr of another Heb word (שׁוֹפֵר), best rendered "princess" (so RV in Est, but not in Jgs). In 2 Jn 1.5 it is the tr of κυπτις, κυπτις, which some interpreters regard as a proper name. See CYRIA; JOHN, EPISTLES OF; ELECT LADY.

LAEL, la’el (לֵאֵל), "belonging to God"): Father of Eliashaph, the prince of the father’s house of the Gershonites (Nu 3 24).

LAHAD, la’had (לָהָד), lāhath): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 2).

LAHAI-ROI, la-b’roi, la-mi’roi, la-thi’roi (לָהַי, "living", lahay ro’d): See BEER-LAHAI-ROI.

LAHAMM, la’mam (לָהָמ, lahamm): A town in the Judaean Shephelah (Josh 15 40, RVm "Laham"), possibly the modern el-Laham, 2 miles S. of Bed Jidrin.

LAHMAN, la’mas. See LAHAMM.

LAHMI, la’缅 (לָהָמי, lahami): According to 1 Ch 20 5, the brother of Goliath of Gath. See ELHANAN.

LAISH, la’ish (לָיִש, layish): (1) A city in the upper Jordan valley, apparently colonized by the Sidonians, which was captured by the Danites and called DAN (q.v.) (Jgs 18 7, etc; Isa 10 30 AV). In Josh 19 47 the name appears as “Lehem.”
Laishah

Lamech

(2) A Benjamite, father of Palti or Paltiel, to whom Michal, David’s wife, was given by Saul (1 S 25 44; 2 S 3 15).

LAISHAH, la-ša’ha, la-šis-a (רָלִישָׁה, rlîshāh, AV Laish): A place named in Isa 10 30 with Gallim and Anaithoth. It should apparently be sought on the N. of Jerus. Some would identify Gallim with Beil Jala, near Bethlehem. Conder suggests 4bātr-yeh on the eastern slope, to the N.N.E. of the Mount of Olives.

LAKE, lāk (אַהֲרָם, āhāram): The word is used (33x; Gen 19 20; 20 10.14.15; 21 8) of the “lake of fire and brimstone.” Lakes are not abundant in Syria and Pal. The Dead Sea, which might be called a lake, is in most places in KJV called a sea. Salt-sea and is called the sea of Araba Bahr Lót, Sea of Lot. It is a question whether the Waters of Merom (Josh 11 5.7) can be identified with the Hâlek, a marshy lake in the course of the Upper Jordan, N. of the Sea of Galilee. E. of the Dead Sea on the edge of the desert there are salt lakes in which the water of the rivers of Damascas (see 2 K 5 12) is gathered and evaporates. In the Lebanon W. of Batelbîk is the small lake Yammâneh, which is fed by copious springs, but whose water disappears in the latter part of the summer, being drained off by subterranean channels. The Lake of Hûmûn on the Orontes is artificial, though ancient. On the lower Orontes is the Lake of Antioch.

LAKE OF FIRE (אַהֲרָם תּוֹ וָרֶדֶס, āhāram to varēdes): Found in Rev 19 20; 20 10.14 (Rev 114). Rev 21 8 has “the lake that burneth with fire and brimstone.” So the brimstone in connection with “the lake of fire” occurs also in Rev 19 20 and 20 10, the latter being a backward reference to the former passage. In Rev 20 14 the words, “This is the second death, even the lake of fire,” are either intended to elucidate and to extend a reference to 15 through a reference to 16, or, if part of the text, formed originally the close of ver 15, whence they became displaced on account of the identity of the words once immediately preceding them in ver 15 with the words immediately preceding them in ver 14. Though “the lake of fire” can be called “the second death” only with reference to the lost among men (ver 15), not with reference to death and Hades (ver 14). In all the above references “the lake of fire” appears as a place of punishment, of perpetual torment, not of annihilation (20 10). The beast (20 19): thepseudo-prophet (19 20; 20 10); the devil (20 10); the wicked of varying description (20 13; 21 8), are cast into it. When the same is affirmed of death and Hades (20 14), it is doubtful as to whether they are meant as a mere figure for the cessation of these two evils personified, or has a more realistic background in the existence of two demon-powers so named (cf Isa 25 8; 1 Cor 15 25.54; 2 Ed 7 31). The Scriptural source for the conception of “the lake of fire” lies in Gen 19 24, where already the fire and the brimstone occur together, while the locality of the catastrophe described is the neighborhood of the Dead Sea. The association of the Dead Sea with this fearful judgment of God, together with the distinctive shape of the place, rendered it a striking figure for the scene of eschatological retribution. The two other OT passages which have “fire and brimstone” (Ps 11 6; Ezek 38 22) are dependent on the Gen passage, with which they have the figure of “training” in common. In Rev 21 8, “their part” seems to allude to Ps 11 6, “the portion of their cup.” In 67 4 ff the Dead Sea appears as the place of punishment for evil spirits. Of late it has been proposed to derive “the lake of fire” from “the stream of fire” which destroys the enemies of Ahura in the Zoroastrian eschatology; so Boussert, Die Offenbarung Johannes, 1906, 433, 434. But the figures of a stream and a lake are different; cf 13 9–11, where a stream of fire proceeds from the mouth of the Messiah for the destruction of his enemies. Besides, the Pers fire is, in part, a fire of purification, and not of destruction only (Boussert, 442), and even in the apocalyptic Book of En, the fires of purification and of punishment are not confounded (cf 67 4 with 50 20). The OT fully explains the entire conception.

LAMB OF GOD (דָּבָר תּוֹ הַדָּבָר, dâvar to dâvar): This is a title specially bestowed upon our Lord by John the Baptist (Jn 1 29–30), “Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world!” In XIII F—an apocryphal book, probably of the 2d cent.—we have the term used for the Messiah, “Honor Judah and Levi, for from them shall arise for you the Lamb of God, saving all nations by grace.” But the term does not seem to have been of any general use until it received its distinctly Christian significance. It has been generally understood as referring to the prophetic language of Jer 11 19, and Is 53 7.

It is far more probable, however, that the true source of the expression is to be found in the important place which the “lamb” occupies in the sacrifices, esp. of the PC. In the Special Sense there was the lamb of the daily of the Term morning and evening sacrifice. How far the future appearance of the lamb to be the Baptist, being a member of a priestly family! On the Sabbath the number of the offerings was doubled, and at some of the great festivals a still larger number were laid upon the altar (see Ex 29 38; Nu 28 39.13). The lamb of the Passover would also occupy a large place in the mind of a devout Israelite, and, as the Passover was not far off, it is quite possible that John may have referred to this as well as to other suggested ideas connected with the lamb. The sacrificial significance of the term seems to be far more probable than the mere comparison of the character of Our Lord with gentleness, as suggested by the words of the prophets, although these contain much more than the mere reference to character (see below). That this became the clearly defined conception of apostolic teaching is clear from passages in Paul and Peter (1 Cor. 5:7; 1 Pet. 2:8). In the Book of Rev the reference to the Lamb occurs 27 times. The word here used differs from that in Jn. The αἷμας of the Gospel has become the ἀρμόσια of the Apocalypse, a diminutive form suggestive of affection. This is the word used by Our Lord in His rebuke and forgiveness of Peter (Jn 21:15), and is peculiarly touched therefore with an added meaning of pathetic tenderness. Westcott, in his Comm. on Jn 1:29, refers to the conjecture that there may have been footprints of lambs passing by on their way to Jerus to be used at the feast. This is possible, but fanciful. As applied to Christ, the term certainly suggests the meekness and gentleness of Our Lord's nature and work, but could not have been used by John without containing some reference to the place to which the lamb bore in the Jewish ritualism.

The significance of the Baptist's words has been variously understood. Origen, Cyril, Chrysostom, among the ancients, Luke, DeWette, Meyer, Ewald, Alford, among the Variously moderns, refer it to Isa 53:7; Grotius, Understood Bengel, Hengstenberg, to the paschal lamb; Baumgarten-Crusius, etc., to the sin offering; Lange strongly urges the influence of the passage in Is. 53:7, and refers to John's declaration of our own mission under the influence of the second part of Isa., in which he is supported by Schaff. The importance of the Isa-thought is found in Mt 8:17; Acts 8:32; 1 Pet 2:22-25.

It is to be observed that the LXX in Isa 53:7 translates the Heb word for sheep (σκυρό), by the Gr word for lamb. In ver 10, the prophet's "suffering one" is said to have "made his soul an offering for sin," as in ver 4 "he hath borne our griefs," where bearing involves the conception of sin offering, and as possessing justifying power, the idea of "taking away." John indeed uses not the LXX word φθέγγεσθαι (pherein), but αἰματεῖ (airtein), and some have maintained that this simple means "put away," or "support," or "endure." But this surely loses the suggestion of the associated term "lamb," which John could not have employed without some reference to its sacrificial and therefore expiatory force. What Lange calls a "gem perception" of atonement must certainly have been in the Baptist's mind, esp. when we recall the Isa-passages, even though there may not have been any complete dogmatic conception of the full relation of the death of Christ to the salvation of man. Even the idea of the bearing of the curse of sin may not be excluded, for it was impossible for an Israelite like John, and esp. with his surroundings, to have forgotten the significance of the paschal lamb, both in its memorial of the judgment of Egypt, as well as of the deliverance of Israel. Notwithstanding every effort to take out of this striking phrase its deeper meanings, which involve most probably the combination of all the sources above described, it must ever remain one of the richest mines of evangelical thought occupied in the doctrine of atonement, a position analogous to that brief word of the Lord, "God is a Spirit" (Jn 4:24), in relation to the doctrine of God. The Lamb is defined as "of God," that is, of Divine providing. See Isa 53; Rev 5:6; 13:8. Its emphatic and appointed office is indicated by the definite article, and whether we refer the conception to a specific sacrifice or to the general place of a lamb in the sacrificial institution, they all, as being appointed sacrifice, suggest the close relation of Our Lord to the Divine Being, and particularly to His expiatory sacrifice.

LAMEH, lám (לָעַם, lā̂meḥ; ἀ SEEK, ἀσόμα; chōlos, chōlos). (1) The condition of being unable or imperfectly able to walk, which united any descendant of Aaron so afflicted for service in the priesthood (Lev 21:18), and rendered an animal unsuitable for sacrifice (Dt 15:21). The offering of animals so blemished was one of the sins with which Malachi charges the negligent Jews of his time (Mal 1:8-13).

(1) Those who suffered from lameness, such as Mephibosheth, whose limbs were injured by a fall in childhood (2 S 4:4; 9:3). In the prophetic description of the completeness of the victory of the returning Israelites, it is probable they shall be made whole and shall leap like a hart (Jer 31:8; Isa 35:6). The unfitness of the lame for warfare gives point to the promise that the lame shall take the prey (Isa 33:23). Job in his graphic description of his helplessness concludes, his calamity says, "And feet was I to the lame" (Job 39:15). The inequality of the legs of the lame is used in Prov 26:7 as a similitude of the inaptness with which a fool uses a parable.

In the enigmatical and probably corrupt passage describing David's capture of Jerus, the lame and blind are mentioned twice. In 2 S 6:6 it was a taunt on the part of the Jebusites that a procession of cripples would suffice to keep out the Israelites. The allusion in ver 8 may be read, "Whosoever smiteth the Jebusites and him, . . . slay both the blind with the lame, and David's soul," as it is in LXX. The Vulg says, "David had offered a reward on that day to the man who should smite the Jebusite and reach the water-pipes of the house, and remove the blind and lame who hated David's soul." It is possible, however, that Budde's emendation is more correct and that it is a threat against the indiscriminate slaughter of the Jebusites: "Who's slayeth a Jebusite shall bring his neck into peril; the lame and blind are not hated of David's soul." The proverbial saying quoted above is rendered in AV "he hath borne our griefs," as rendered in V., for we read in Mt 21:14 that the lame came to Our Lord in the temple and were healed.

The healing of the lame by Our Lord is recorded in Mt 14:16; 15:30-31; 21:14-16; Lk 17:17-19. For the apostolic miracles of healing the lame see Cripples. In He 12:13 the Christians are counselled to courage under chastisement, lest their despair should cause that which is lame to be "turned out of the way." ALEX. MACALISTER.

LAMECH, lámek (לָאַמֵּק, lemech; ἀσάγχ, Lamech, "a strong youth"?): (1) The name is first mentioned in Gen 4:18-24. Here L., the son of Methusael, is named as the last of the descendants of Cain. He was the father of Jabel, Jubal, and the father of the artificer Abel, the husband of two wives, zizah and Zillah, he furnishes the first recorded instance of polygamy. It is very instructive to note that this "father of polygamy" at once becomes the first blustering tyrant and a braggart; in order to draw this conclusion from his so-called "swordlay" (Gen 4:23f). He does not put his trust in God, but in the weapons and implements invented by his sons, or rather these instruments, enhancing the physical and material power of man, he glorifies in them and misconstrues the Divine kindness which insured to Cain freedom from the revenge of his fellow-men.

(2) Another L. is mentioned in Gen 5:25:28 (cf 1 Ch 1:3; Lk 3:36), the son of Methuselah. and the father of Noah. His words (Gen 5:29) show the great difference between this descendant of Seth and the descendant of Cain. While the one is stimulated to a song of defiance by the worldly inventions of his sons, the other, in prophetic mood, expresses his auraire belief in the coming of better times, and calmly and prayerfully awaits the period of comfort and rest which he expected to be ushered in by his son Noah.

LAMENTATIONS, lam-en-à'shun. BOOK OF —The Lamentations of Jeremiah: This is a collective name which tradition has given to 5 elegies found in the Heb Canon that lament the fate of destroyed Jerusalem. The rabbis call this little book 'Ekkah (אֶֽכֶּה, "now"), according to the word of Lament with which it begins, or kînath (כִּנָּת). On the basis of the latter term the LXX calls it θραυσα, θρησοι, or Lat. Threni, or "Lamentations."

The little book consists of 5 lamentations, each one forming the contents of a chapter. The first 4 are marked by the acrostic use of the letters of these hymns, in which a longer line (3 or 4 accents) is followed by a shorter (2 or 3 accents). In chs 1 and 2 the acrostic letters begin three such double lines; in ch 4, however, two double lines. In ch 3 a letter controls three pairs, but is repeated at the beginning of each line. In ch 5 the alphabet is wanting; but in this case too the number of pairs of lines agrees with the number of letters in the Heb alphabet, i.e. 22. In chs 2, 3, and 4, the letter 'aqin follows pê, as is the case in Ps 34. Ch 1, however, follows the usual order.

These 5 hymns all refer to the great national catastrophe that befell Jerusalem and its capital city, Jerusalem, through the Chaldaeans, 587-586 BC. The sufferings and the anxieties of the city, the destruction of the sanctuary, the cruelty and taunts of the enemies of Israel, esp. the Edomites, the disgrace that befell the king and his nobles, priests and prophets, and that, too, without their own guilt, the devastation and ruin of the country—all this is described, and appeal is made to the mercy of God. A careful sequence of thought can be expected in the lyrical feeling and in the alphabetical form. Repetitions are found in large numbers, but each one of these hymns emphasizes some special feature of the calamity. Ch 3 is unique, as in it one person describes his own peculiar sufferings in connection with the general calamity, and then too in the name of the others begins a psalm of repentance. This person did not suffer so severely because he was an exceptional sinner, but because of the unrighteousness of his people. These hymns were not written during the siege, but later, at a time when the people still vividly remembered the sufferings and the anxieties of that time and when the impression made on them by the fall of Jerusalem was still as powerful as ever.

Who is the author of these hymns? Jewish tradition is in a miasma in saying that it was Jeremiah. The hymns themselves are found anonymously in the Heb text, while the LXX has in one an additional statement, the Heb style of which would lead us to conclude that it was found in the origin of the LXX and not in the Heb.

4. Author

This statement reads: "And it came to pass, after Israel had been taken away captive and Jerusalem had been laid waste, that Jeremiah sat weeping, and uttered this lamentation over Jerusalem and said." The Tg also states that Jeremiah was the author. The rabbis and the church Fathers have no doubts on the subject. Jerome (cf on Zee 1211) thinks that 2 Ch 35 25 refers to these hymns. The same is said by Jos (Ant, X, v, 1). If this is the case then the Tg of Ch would have regarded Lam as having been written because of the death of Josiah. But this misunderstanding is not to be ascribed to him. It was easily possible that he was acquainted with lamentations of such a nature, but which afterward were lost. At all events, Jeremiah was by nature adapted to the composition of such elegies, as is proved by his book of prophecies.

Only in modern times has the authorship of these hymns by Josiah been seriously called into question; and it is now denied by most critics. For this they give formal and material reasons. The language of these lamentations shows many similarities to the discourses of Jeremiah, but at the same time also many differences. The alphabetical scheme is not worthy of Jeremiah is a prejudice caused by the taste of our times. Heb poets had evidently been making use of such methods for a long time, as it helps materially in memorizing. The text is not accurate on account of the destruction of Jerusalem, in fact, he would probably not have made use of it. But we have in this book a collection of lamentations written some time after this great catastrophe. The claim has also been made that the views of Jeremiah and those of the composer or the composers of these poems differ materially. It is said that Jeremiah emphasizes much more strongly the guilt of the people as the cause of the calamity than is done in these hymns, which lament the fate of the people and find the cause of it in the sins of the fathers (5,7), something that Jeremiah is said not to accept (Jer 3129f). However, the guilt of the people and the resultant wrath of God are often brought out in the midst of lament (3129f) that there is nothing like inherited guilt. He declares rather that in the blessed future things would be different in this respect. Then, too, we are not to forget that if Jeremiah is the author of these patriotic hymns, he does not speak in them as the prophet and the appointed accuser of his people, but that he is at last permitted to speak as he humbly feels, although there is no lack of prophetical reminiscences (cf Lam 4 21f). In these hymns he speaks out of the heart that loves his Jesus and his people, and he utters the priestly prayer of intercession, which he was not allowed to do when announcing the judgment over Israel. The fact that he also evinces great reverence for the unfortunate king and his Divinely given hereditary dignity (4 20), although as a prophet he had been compelled to pronounce judgment over him, would not be unthinkable in Jeremiah, who had shown warm sympathies also for Jehoiachin (22 24 25). A radical difference of sentiment between the two authors is not involved. On the other hand, a serious difficulty arises if we claim that Jeremiah was not the author of Lam in the denunciations of Lam over the prophets of Jesus (2 14, 4 13). How could the great prophet of the Destruction be so ignored if he himself were not the author of these sentiments? If he was he can easily understand this omission. In his book of prophecies he has spoken exactly the same way about the prophets. To this must be added, that Lam 3 forces us to regard Jeremiah as the author, because of the personal sufferings that are here described. Compare esp. 3:14.37 f. 35 ff. 61.63. What other person was during the period of this catastrophe the cyssore of all eyes as was the prophet, esp., too, because he was guiltless? The claim that here, not an individual, but the personified nation is introduced as speaking, is altogether improbable, and in some passages absolutely impossible (vs. 14.48).

This little book must accordingly be closely connected with the person of Jeremiah. If he himself is the author, he must have composed it in his old age, when he had time and opportunity to live over again all the sufferings of his people and of himself. It is, however, more probable, esp. because of the language of the poems, that his disciples put this book in the present shape of uniform sentential utterances, basing this on the manner of lamentations common to Jeremiah. In this way the origin of ch 3 can be understood, which cannot artificially be shaped as his sayings, as in this case the personal feature would be more distinctly expressed. It was probably compiled from a number of his utterances.

In the Heb Canon this book is found in the third division, called khitubhim, or Sacred Writings, together with the Pss. However, the LXX adds this book to Jer, or rather, to the Book of Dan, found just after Jer. The Hebrews count it among the 5 m'ghilloth, or Rolls, which were read on prominent anniversary days. The day for the Lamentation was the 9th of Ab, the day of the burning of the temple. In the Roman Catholic church it is read on the last three days of Holy Week.

LAMP, LAMPSTAND, lamp/stand (בְּלֶם, בָּלֶם, לָמֹא, נָר, נָר, לָמֹד, לָמָּד, lampádh, Phoen ḫl'ptḥ, lampádh, whence λαμπάς, lampás; λύχνος, luchnos, is also used): Nór or nîr is properly "light" or "a light-giving thing," hence "lamp," and is so rendered in RV, but often "candle" in AV. Its use in connection with the tabernacle and the temple (Ex 25 37 ff; 2 Ch 4 20 f), where oil was employed for light (Ex 35 14; Lev 24 2), shows that this is its proper meaning. Lappádt is properly "a torch" and is thus rendered generally in RV, but "lamp" in Isa 62 1, where it is used as a simile. AV renders it "lamp" usually, but "torch" in Neh 2 3 f; Zec 12 6. In Job 12 5 RV renders it "for misfortune," regarding it as composed of the noun דָּש, dâd, and the preposition ל, l. Lampás in Gr corresponds to it, but luchnos is also rendered in RV "lamp," while AV gives "candle," as in Mt 5 15 and corresponding passages in the other Gospels.

Lamps were in use in very remote times, though we have few allusions to them in the early history of Egypt. There are indications that 1. Forms they were used there. Nichos for and History lamps are found in the tombs of Tell el-Amarna (Arch. Survey of Egypt, Am Tab, Part IV, 14). Lamplstands are also represented (ib, Part III, 7). Torches were of course used before lamps, and are mentioned in Gen (16 17 RV), but clay lamps were used in Canaan by the Amorites before the Israelites took possession. The excavations in Pal have furnished thousands of specimens, and have enabled us to trace the development from about 2000 BC onward. The exploration carried out at Lachish (Tell Hesdy) and Gezer (Tell Jezer) by the Pal Exploration Fund has given ample material for the purpose, and the numerous examples from tombs all over Pal and Syria have supplied a great variety of forms.

"Lamp" is used in the sense of a guide in Ps 119 105; Prov 6 23, and for the spirit, which is called the lamp of Jeh in man (Prov 20 27), and it of course often signifies the light itself. It is used also for the son who is to succeed and represent his father (1 K 16 4), and it perhaps is employed in this sense in the phrase, "The lamp of the wicked shall be put out" (Job 21 17; Prov 13 9; and perhaps Job 15 6).

The early Can. or Amorite lamp was a shallow, saucer-like bowl with rounded bottom and vertical rim, slightly pointed or pinched on one side where the lighted end of the wick was placed (Fig. 1). This form continued into Jewish times, but was gradually changed until the spout was formed by drawing the rim of the sides together, forming a narrow open channel, the remainder of the rim being rolled outward and flattened (Fig. 2), the bottom being also flattened. This was the early Heb pattern and persisted for centuries. The open bowl was gradually closed in, first at the spout, where the rim of one side was lapped over the other, and finally the whole surface was closed with only an orifice in the center for receiving the oil, and at the same time the spout was lengthened. This transformation is seen in Fig. 3, a lamp of the Seleucid period, or from 300 BC. These lamps have usually a circular foot and sometimes a string-hole on one side. The next development was a circular bowl with a somewhat shorter spout, sometimes being only a bulge in the rim, so that the orifice for the wick falls in the rim, the orifice for filling being quite small.

at the bottom of a saucer-like depression in the center of the bowl. There is sometimes a loop handle affixed on the side opposite to the spout. Sometimes the handle is horizontal, but commonly vertical (Fig. 4). This form is called Roman, and the bowl is often ornamented with mythological human or animal figures (Fig. 5). Other forms are

1. The Vernacular “koine” the Language of the NT.—The ghost of the old Purist controversy is now laid to rest for good and all. The story of that episode has interest chiefly for the historian of language and of the vagaries of the human intellect. See Winer-Thayer, Grammar of the Idiom of the NT, 1869, 12–19, and the 4th ed, 1892, for a sketch of this once furious strife. In the 17th century various scholars tried to prove that the Gr of the NT was on a par with the literary Attic of the classic period. But the Hebraists won them and established that it was Hebraic Gr, a special variety, if not dialect, a Bib Gr. The 4th ed of Cremer's Biblico-Theological Lexicon of NT Gr (trd by W. Urwick, 1892) quotes, with approval, Rothe's remark (Dogmatik, 1863, 298): "We may appropriately speak of a language of the Holy Ghost. The Holy Spirit has been at work, moulding for itself a distinctively religious mode of expression out of the language of the country which it has chosen as its sphere, and transforming the linguistic elements which it found ready to hand, and even conceptions already existing, into a shape and form appropriate to itself and all its own." Cremer adds: We have a very clear and striking proof of this in NT Gr:"

This was only twenty years ago and fairly represented the opinion of that day. Hatch in 1889 (Essays in Bib, Gr, 34) held that with most of the NT words the key lay in the LXX. But Winer (Winer-Thayer, 20) had long ago seen that the vernacular koine was "the special foundation of the idiom of the NT," though he still admitted "a Jewish-Gr, which native Greeks did not entirely understand" (p. 27). He did not see the practical identity of NT Gr with the vernacular koine ("common" Gr), nor did Schmiedel in the 8th Auflage of Winer (I. Thel; II. Thel, erstes Heft, 1894–97). In the second ed of his Grammar of NT Gr (ET by Thackeray, 1905, 2), Blass sees the dawn of the new day, though his book was first written before it came. Viteau (Étude sur le grec du Nouveau Testament, I, Le texte, 1893; II, Le sujet, 1896) occupies wholly the old position of a Judaic Gr. An extreme instance of that view is seen in Guillelmard's Hebraismen in the Gr Testament (1879).

2. The Revolution

The vernacular which he traces back to Stephanus. It is a good exercise to read Wetten's discussion of the "Language of the NT" in DB, III (1888), and then turn to Moulton, "Language of the NT," in 1-vol HDB. Wetten says: "The chief peculiarity of the syntax of the NT lies in the reproduction of Heb forms." Moulton remarks: "There is no reason to believe that any NT writer who ever lived in Pal learned Gr only as a foreign language when he went abroad," Still better is it to read Moulton, "New Testament Greek in the Light of Modern Discovery" in Cambridge Biblical Essays (1909, 161–205); Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East (1911); or Angus, "The koine, the Language of the NT," Princeton Review, January, 1910, 42–92. The revolution has come to stay. It is now clear that the Gr of the NT is not a jargon nor a patois. In all essential respects it is just the vernacular koine of the 1st cent. AD, the lingua franca of the Graeco-Roman empire, the legacy of Alexander the Great's conquest of the East. This world-speech was at bottom the Attic vernacular with dialectical and pronominal inflexions thrown in, but a virile speech admirably adapted to the service of the many peoples of the time. The able article in vol III of HDB on the "Language of the NT" by Dr. J. H. Thayer appeared in 1900, and illustrates how quickly an encyclopaedia article may become out of date. There is a wealth of knowledge here displayed, as one would expect, but Thayer still speaks of "this species of Greek," "this peculiar idiom," "Jewish Greek," though he seems to have got beyond the idea of a koine for the NT. The last topic discussed by him is "Problems." He little thought that the biggest "problem" so near solution was the character of the language itself. It was Adolph Deissmann, then of Heidelberg, now of Bonn, who showed how to know the koine, the knowledge of the language of the NT. His Biblestudien (zumeist aus den Papyri und Inschriften zur Geschichte der Sprache, des Schrifttums und der Religion des hellenistischen Judentums und des Urchristentums) appeared in 1895. In this epoch-making volume he proved conclusively from the papyri and the inscriptions that many of the seeming Hebraisms in the LXX and the NT were common idioms in the vernacular koine. He boldly claimed that the bulk of the Hebraisms were falsely so termed, except in the case of translating Gr from the Heb or Aram, or in "perfect" Hebraisms, genuine Gr usage made more common by reason of similarity to the Sem idiom. In 1897 he produced Neue Bibelstudien, sprachgeschichtliche Beiträge zumeist aus den Papyri und Inschriften zur Erklärung des Neuen Testaments.

In 1901 (2d ed in 1903) these two volumes were translated as one by A. Grieve under the title Bible Studies. The most important are New Light on the NT (1907), The Philology of the Gr Bible (1908), Licht vom Osten (1908), Light from the Ancient East (tr by Strachan, 1910), St. Paul in the Light of Social and Religious History (1912). It illustrates the NT language with much detail from the papyri, ostraka and inscriptions. He is now at work on a new lexicon of the NT which will make use of the fresh knowledge from these sources.

The otherwise helpful work of E. Preuschen, Vollständiges griechisch-deutsches Handwörterbuch zu den Schriften des Neuen Testaments und der übrigen urchristlichen Literatur (1908–10), fails to utilize the papyri and inscriptions while drawing on the LXX and the NT Apoc and other early Christian literature. But this has been done by Eheling in his Griechisch-deutsches Wörterbuch zum NT, 1913. The next step was made by A. Thumb, the great philologist, in his Geschichte des Zeitalters des Hellenismus; Beiträge zur Geschichte und Beurteilung der "koine," 1901, in which the real character of the koine was for the first time properly set forth.

Winer and Blass had both lamented the need of a grammar of the koine, and that demand still exists, but Thumb went a long way toward supplying it in this volume. It is to be hoped that he will yet prepare a grammar of the koine. Thumb's interests cover the whole range of comparative philology, but he has added in this field: "Die Forschungen über die hellenistische Sprache in den Jahren 1896–1901," "Archi für Papyrologie, II, 590 t, "Prinzipschriften der Koine-Forschung," Neue Jahrb. für das kl. Alt., 1906; "Die sprachgeschichtliche Stellung des biblischen Griech.", "Theologische Rundschau, V, 83–99;"

In 1909 appeared his essay, Greek in the Light of Modern Discovery (see above). Since 1908, The Expositor has had a series of papers by J. H. Moulton and his co-workers, Milligan, Schmiedel, regarding the papyri, which are very useful on the lexical side of the language. Thus the study is fairly launched on its new career. In 1900, A. T. Robertson produced a Syllabus on the NT Gr Syntax, a point of departure for comparative philology, which was rewritten in 1908, with the added viewpoint of the papyri research, as A Short Grammar of the Gr NT (2d ed, 1909, 3d ed, 1912; translations in Italian in 1910, Ger. and Fr. in 1911, Dutch in 1912). In October, 1909, S. Angus published a good article in the Harvard Theological Review on "Modern Methods in NT Philology," followed in January, 1910, by another in the Princeton Review on "The koine, the Language of the NT." The new knowledge appears also in Jakob Wackernagel, "Die griechische Sprache" (pp. 291–482, 2d ed, 1892), Die griechische und lateinische Literatur und Sprache, 1907. L. Radermacher has set forth very ably the "sprachlichen Vorgänge in ihrem Zusammenhang," in his Neutestamentliche Grammatik: Die Griechische des Neuen Testaments im Zusammenhang mit der Volksprache. It is in reality the background of the NT Gr and is a splendid preparation for the study of the Gr NT. A full discussion of the new knowledge of grammatical detail has been prepared by A. T. Robertson under the title A Grammar of the Gr NT in the Light of Historical Research (in press). Moulton and Schmiedel are planning also to complete their works.

The proof of the new position is drawn from several sources:

1. The papyri.—These rolls have lain in the museums of the world many years and attracted little attention. For lists of the chief collections of the papyri see Moulton, Prolegomena, 250–6; Milligan, Sestec New lections from the Gr Papyri, xi, xii; Position Mayser, Grammatik der griechischen Papyri aus der P solderzeit; Latv- und Wortlehre, vii–x; Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 23–41; Robertson, Gospel of the NT, Bibliography. New volumes of papyri as a result of recent explorations in Egypt are published each year. See Papyrus, and in the other encyclopedias e.v. Most of the papyri discovered belong to the polder 4th to 7th centuries (AD and AD in round numbers), and with great wealth of illustration they show the life of the common people of the time, whether in Egypt or Herculaneum (the two chief regions represented). There are various degrees of culture shown, as can be seen in many of the large volumes of Grenfell and Hunt, and in the handbooks of Lietzmann, Griechische Papyri (1905), and of Milligan, Greek Papyri (1910). From the scrap-heaps of the long ages, and are mainly receipts, contracts, letters of business or love, military documents, etc. They show all grades of culture, from the illiterate with phonetic spelling to the man of the schools. But we have here the language of life, not of the books. In a most startling way one notes the similarities of vocabulary, and syntactic and grammatical language of the papyrus of the 1st century AD, and that of the NT books. As early as 1778, F. W. Sturz made use of the Chara Borgia, "the first papyrus ever brought to Europe" (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 29), and Thierisch has shown that in the papyrus the name of the papyri for the philology of the LXX. But the matter was not pressed. Lightfoot threw out a hint about the value of the people, which was not followed till Deissmann saw the point; of Moulton, Proleg., 242. It is not necessary here to illustrate the matter at length. Deissmann takes up in detail the "Biblical" words in Thayer's Lexicon, and has no difficulty in finding most of them in the papyri (or inscriptions). Thus these papyri have "a particular value as a proof of the papyri. See Deissmann, Bible Studies and Light from the Ancient East, for extensive lists. The papyri show also the same meanings for many words once thought peculiar to the Bible or the NT. An instance is seen in the excursus, in the papyri, δοσεῖσθαι τῇ κώμῃ, ho παρακληθῆσαι, in the papyri, δοσεῖσθαι τῇ κώμῃ (Pap. Lugd. A 351), "without doubt an official designation" (Deissmann, Bible Studies, 155). So διάλεξις, advocate, for members of the community, διανοητική, anastrophe, for manner of life, ἀποκαθίστα, antilepsis, "help," μεταγραφή, letoursia, "public service," γέρα, παράκλησις, "sojourner," etc (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 107). R. Helbing (Grammatik der Septuaginta, 1908) and H. St. John Chackery (A Grammar of the NT Gr to the LXX, 1909) have applied the new knowledge to the language of the LXX, and it has been discussed with much ability in the first volumes. The use of the papyrus for grammatical purposes is made easier by the excellent standard Grammatik der griechischen Papyri aus der Polderzeit; Laut- und Wortlehre (1906), though his "Syntagmata" is still a desideratum. Useful also is G. Crünoner, Memoria Graecae Herculanensis (1903).

2. The ostraka.—The ostraka are on this subject still in small bulk. In 1899 Ulrich Wilcken published Griechische Ostraka aus Aegypten und Nubien, and in 1902 W. E. Crum produced his book of Christian ostraka called Coptic Ostraca from the Collections of the Egypt Exploration Fund, the Cairo Museum, and Others. This was followed in 1905 by H. R. Hall's Coptic and Gr Texts of the Christian Period from Ostraka, Sela, etc. These broken pieces of pottery were used by the lowest classes as writing material. It was very widely used because it was so very cheap. Wilcken has done more than anyone else to collect and decipher the ostraka. Deissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 46) notes that Cleantus the Stoic "wrote on ostraka or on leather or on leather or on leather or on leather. So he quotes the apology of a Christian for using potsherd for a letter: "Excuse me that I cannot find papyrus as I am in the country" (Crum, Coptic Ostraca, 55). The use of ἀρχων, ἀρχιπόλις, on an ostrakon for a prince is full, and illustrates well the frequent use of this word in the NT (Deissmann, Light from the Ancient East, 111).

3. The inscriptions.—Here caution must be used since many of the inscriptions give, not the vernacular, but the literary language. The official (legal and military) decrees often appear in very formal style. But a number do preserve the vernacular idiom and often have the advantage of being dated. These inscriptions are chiefly on stone, but some are on metal and there are a few wax tablets. The material is vast and is constantly growing. See list of the chief collections in Deissmann's Light from the Ancient East, 10–29. Boeckler is the great name here. As early as 1779 Walsh (Observationes in Matt. ex graecis inscriptionibus) made use of Greek inscriptions for NT exegesis, and R. A. Lipsius says that his father (K. H. A. Lipsius, author of Grammatikische Untersuchungen über die biblische Grammatik) "contemplated a large grammar of the Gr Bible in which he would have availed himself of the ancient volumes of inscriptions" (Deissmann, Light, etc., 15). Schmiedel has made good use of the inscriptions so far in his revision of Winer; H. A. A. Kennedy (Sources of NT Gr, 1895), see the living stream of the NT speech as it has come on down through the ages. It is impossible to overestimate the importance of modern Gr vernacular in the knowledge of NT Gr. The disappearance of the optative, the vanishing of the infinitive, and the survival of many others which are luminous in the light of the modern Gr vernacular. See Pschiari, Essai de grammaire historique nécro-grecque (1886–89).

(6) Historical and comparative grammar.—From this source the koine gets a new dignity. It will take one too far afield to sketch here the linguistic revolution wrought since the publication of, and partly caused by, Bopp's Vergleichende Grammatik (1857), following Sir Wm. Jones's discovery of Sanskrit. The great work of Brugmann and Delbrück (Grundriß der vergleichenden Grammatik der indogermanischen Sprachen, I–V, 1892–1909) marks the climax of the present development, though many workers have won distinction in this field. The point to accent here is that by means of comparative philology the Gr language is seen in its proper relations with other languages of the Indo-Germanic family, and the right interpretation of case, preposition, mode, tense, voice, etc., is made possible. The old traditional empiricism is relegated to the second rank, and a new science consonant with the facts has taken its place. See Delbrück, Intro to the Study of Language (1882), Giles, Short Manual of Comparative Philology (1901), for a résumé of the facts. Wright, Comparative Grammar of the Gr Language (1912), applies the new learning to the Gr tongue. The progress in classical scholarship is well shown by Sandys in his History of Classical Scholarship (I–III, 1906–8) and by Gudeman, Geschichte der klass. Philologie, 2. Aufl., 1909. Innumerable monographs have enriched the lit. of this subject. It is now feasible to see the Gr language as a whole, and grasp its historical unity. Seen in this light the koine is not a dying tongue or a corrupt dialect. It is a normal and natural evolution of the Gr dialects into a world-speech when Alexander's conquests made it possible. The vernacular koine which has developed into the modern Gr vernacular was itself the direct descendant of the Attic vernacular which had its roots in the regional koine and was itself very great. The dialectical developments are closely sketched by Thumb, Handbuch der grieschischen Dialekte (1909), and by Buck, Intro to the Study of Gr Dialects (1910), not to mention the older works of Hoffmann, Meister, etc. Jannaris has undertaken Historical Gr Grammar (1897) to sketch and interpret the facts of the Gr tongue throughout its long career, both in its literary and vernacular aspects. He has succeeded remarkably well on the whole, though not quite seeing the truth about the modern Gr vernacular. Schanz is seeking to lay the foundation for still better work by his Beiträge zur historischen Syntax der griechischen Sprache (1882–). But the NT student must be open to all the new light from this region, and keep his hand very great. See, further, Dieterich, Untersuchungen zur Geschichte der griech. Sprache von der hellen. Zeit (1898).

As already indicated, the Gr of the NT is in the main just the vernacular koine of the 1st cent. AD, though Gr as used by men of ability and varying degrees of culture. The most striking difference between the vernacular koine and the literary Attic is seen in the vocabulary. The writer in the literary koine has an adequate likeness to the classic Attic, but even they reveal the changes due to the intervening centuries. There was, of course, no violent break. The changes came gradually and naturally. It is mainly at this point that Deissmann has done such

it is to be noticed that «, oi, iq, iq, v, i all had the value of ee in "feet." This itacism was apparent in the early koine.
So ai = e and o and w were not sharply distinguished. The Attic tt became aa,

In general there is less sense of rhythm and more simplicity and clearness. Some of the subtle refinements of form and syntax of the classic did not survive in the koine vernacular.
In
accidence only a few points may be noted.
In substantives the Ionic -p7;s, -res, is frequent. The Attic second declension vanishes. In the third declension forms like viKrav, nuktan, show assimilation to the first.
Both x^P^", chdrin, and x'^P'-'''"; chdrita,

In syntax the tendency is toward simplicity, to short sentences, the paratactic construction, and the sparing use of articles.
The vernacular koine avoids both the ombast of Asianism and the artificiahty of Atticism. There is, indeed, more freedom in violating the rules of concord as to gender, number, and case.
The nominativus pendens is conunon. The comparative does duty often for the superlative adjective, and the superlative generally has the elative sense.
The accusative is increasingly common with verbs. The fine between transitive and intransitive verbs is not a hard-and-fast one.
The growth in the use of prepositions both with nouns and in composition is quite noticeable, but some of the older prepositions, like dp.(pl, amphi, are vanishing.
The cases used with various prepositions are changing. The instrmnental use of ^v, en, is very common. Many new adverbial and prei)ositional phrases have developed. The optative is nearly dead and the infinitive (apart from the use of toO, ton, iv Tijj, en td, ds rb, eis td, with the infinitive) is decaying before iva, hina. The future part, is rare.
M^, mt, begins to encroach on oi, ou, with infinitives and participles. The periphrastic conjugation is specially common. The direct discourse is more frequent than the indirect. The non-final use of i'ra, hina, is quite noticeable.
There are, besides, dialectical and provincial peculiarities, but these do not destroy the real unity of the vernacular koine any more than do individual traits of separate writers.

Literary Elements in the

—Deissmann

(Light from the Ancient East, 245) is disposed to deny any literary quality to the books save the Ep. to the He. "The Ep. to the He shows us Christianity preparing for a flight from its native levels into the higher region of culture, and we are conscious of the beginnings of a Christian worldliterature." He speaks of it also as "a work which seems to hang in the background like an intruder among the company of popular books." One feels that this is an extreme position and cannot be justified by the facts. It is true that Peter and Paul, for instance, wrote only "letters," not "epistles."

But

of Deissmann on this point. One need not go to and Paul's writings illustrations of the artificial rules of the Asianists. There is undoubtedly rhythm in Paul's eloquent passages (cf 1 Cor 13, 15), but it is the natural poetic quality of a soul aflame with high passions, not conformity to rules of rhetoric.

To deny literary quality to

Luke and


Paul is to give a narrow meaning to the word "literary" and to be the victim of a theory. Christanity, and make use of the vernacular koine, the wonderful world-speak so providentially at hand. But the personal equation figured here as always. Men of culture differ in their conversation with literate men and more nearly approximate literary style. It is just in Luke, Paul, and the author of He that we discover the literary flavor of men of ability and of culture, though free from artificiality and pedantry. The eloquence of He is that of passion, not of the art of Asianism. Indeed all literary art in language is the use of material and in beauty of language. The Gospel of Jn has the rare elevation and dignity of the highest type of mind. There is no Atticist tendency in the NT as in Jos, Ant. There is no posing for the occasion, or for posterity. It is the language of life, the vernacular in the main, but rising at times from the very force of passion to high, plateau's of emotion and imagination and poet's grace from the pens of men of real ability, and in some instances of high culture.

III. The Semitic Influence.—It is no longer possible to explain every variation in the NT from the classic Attic by the term Hebraism. That easy solution has disappeared. Sooth to say, when the true character of the vernacular koine is understood, though not much left by the grammarians. The Gr as a rule is just normal koine. Milligan (Gr Papyri, xxx) admits on the part of Moulton "an overtendancy to minimize" the "presence of un-doubted Hebraisms, both in language and grammar." That is true, and is due to his strong reaction against the old theory of so many Hebraisms. The Semiticisms (Hebraisms and Aramaismus) are very natural results of the fact that the vernacular koine was used by Jews who read the Heb Bible and the LXX tr, and who also spoke Aram as their native tongue. The LXX, as tr of Gr, directly from the Heb (or Aram.), has a much greater number of these Semiticisms. See Swete, An Intro. to the OT in Gr (1900), for the salient facts. Thackery in his Grammar of the OT in Gr (1869) shows "the noun—the basis of Septuagint Gr." The matter varies in different parts of the LXX, but in all parts the Sem influence goes far beyond what NT the NT does not, of course, give a true picture of the Gr spoken by the Jews in Alexandria or in Pal. But the constant reading of the LXX was bound to leave its impress on the style of the people (of the King James Version and the Eng. language). This is not the number of Semiticisms, but, all things considered, the fewness of them. Luke, just because he was a Gentile and so noted the Hebraisms in the LXX, shows rather more of them than the other NT writers: of περιηήσασται (1 Cor. 16:8). Others are more of musical inflections of the Heb style, as in ἀραχθεῖν ἂν οὖν τών, ἀραχθεῖν εποίησεν τόν, rather than ἀραχθεῖν τοί, ἀραχθεῖν itin. But there is a certain dignity and elevation of style so characteristic of the Heb OT that reappears in the NT; The frequent use of καὶ, κατ., in parts of the NT reminds one of the LXX and the Heb way. There is, besides, an indelible tone in the NT that is found in the OT. Swete (Apostrophe of St. John, cxx) laments the tendency to depreciate unduly the presence of Hebraic skill in the NT. The Nov. Hebraisms may have swung too far away from the truth. It will strike the level, but we shall never again be able to fill our grammars and comm., with explanations of so many peculiar Hebraisms in the NT. On the whole the Gr NT is standard vernacular koine.

IV. Individual Peculiarities of NT Writers.—There is not space for an extended discussion of this topic. The fact itself calls for emphasis, for there is a wide range in style between Mark's Gospel and He, 1 Pet and Rom, Luke's Gospel and the Apocalypse. There are no Atticists found in the NT (cf 4 Mac in the LXX and Jos), but there are the less literary writings (Mt, Mk, the Johannine books, the other catholic epistles, and the more literary writings (Luke's writings, Paul's Epistles, Peter's He). But even so, no hard-and-fast line can be drawn. Moulton, Cambridge Biblical Essays, 454, thinks 2 Pet more like the Atticistic writings, "though certainly the Atticists would have seemed to own a book so full of 'solecisms.'" Moulton assumes that 2 Pet is pseudepigraphic, and does not credit the notion that the crude 'Babu' Gr, to use Abbott's term, may be Peter's own uncorrected style (of Acts 4, 15), while 1 Pet may have the smoothing effect of Silvanus' hand (cf 1 Pet & 12). A similar explanation is open concerning the grammatical lapses of the Apocalypse, since John is also called ἀραμαῖος, ἀραμαῖος, in Acts 4, 15, whereas the Gospel of Jn may have had the revision of the elders of Ephesus (cf Jn 21, 24). But whatever the explanation, there is no doubt of the wide divergences of style between different books and groups of books in the NT list. The Lukan, Johanne, Petrine, Pauline groups stand apart, but with relevances with each other. The Gr LXX, the Dead Sea Scroll, and the Greek Physicist, 1907; The Sayings of Jesus, 1908; The Acts of the Apostles, 1909; The Date of the Acts of the Apostles, 1911 has accepted and strengthened the contention of Hawkins (Horae Synopticae, 2d ed, 1909) and of Hauré (Medical Language of Luke, 1882) that the medical terms in the Gospel of Luke and of Acts show that the books were written by the same writer and that a physician, and so Luke. The diversities in style here and there are chiefly, due to the sources of information used. Even in the Pauline books, which form so well-marked a collection, striking diversities of language and style appear. But these letters cover a period of some 15 years of intense activity and mental and spiritual development, and treat a great variety of topics. They properly reflect the changing phases of Paul's preaching of the cross of Christ in different places and under varying circumstances and confronting ever fresh problems. The plays of Shakespeare are useful parallels. Even in Paul's old age, in the Pastoral Epistles the stamp of Paul's spirit is admitted by those who admit only Pauline fragments; cf J. Weiss, Beiträge zur Paulusrech Rhetorik (1897). The style is indeed the man, but the source is not the function of the subject, and style varies with different periods of a man's life. E. A. Abbott has made an excellent discussion of the Johannine Vocabulary.

Literature

There were only two languages employed in the archetypes of the OT books (apart from an Egyptian or Pera or Gr word here and there), namely, Heb and Bib. Aram., both of which belong to the great family of languages known as Semitic.

I. The Semitic Languages.

The languages spoken in Southwestern Asia during the historical period dealt with in the Bible have been named Semitic, after the son of Noah from whom the majority of peoples speaking these languages—Arabs, Hebrews, Aramaeans and Assyrians (Gen 10 21 ff)—were descended. To show, however, that the description does not fit exactly the things described—the Elamites and Lydians having probably not spoken a Semitic language, and the Canaanites, including Phoenicians, with the colonists descended from those at Carthage and elsewhere in the Mediterranean coast lands, as well as the Abyssinians (Ethiopians), who did, being reckoned descendants of Ham (Gen 9 18; 10 6 ff)—the word is now generally written “Semitic,” a term introduced by Leich- horn (1757). These languages were spoken from the Caspian Sea to the S. of Arabia, and from the Mediterranean to the valley of the Tigris.

1. Members including the language of the Sabaean of Semitic (Himyaritic) inscriptions, as well as Family Ga‘ez or Ethiopic, Arab, is now spoken from the Caucasus to Zanibar, and from the East Indies to the Atlantic.
2. Members including Hebrew, old and new, Phoen, with Punic, and Mosabitish (language of MS).
3. Members including the language of the Syriac (language of Syrian Christians), language of Bab Tulm, Mandaean; (b) West or Palestinian Aram., of the Jews, Palestinian Talm (Gemara), Bib., Aram. (“Chaldean”), Samaritan, language of Nabataean inscriptions.

With the exception of a few chapters and fragments mentioned below, the OT is written entirely in Heb. In the OT itself this language is called “the Jews” (2 K 18 26. Name 28). In Isa 19 18 it is called poetically, what in fact it was, “the language of Bab (Heb “lip”) of Canaan,” in the appendix to the LXX of Job it is called Syrian; and in the introduction to Eccles it is for the first time—that is, in 130 BC—named Heb. The term Heb in the NT denotes the language of the OT in Rev 9 11, but in Jn 5 2; 19 13ff this term means the vernacular Aramaic. In other passages it is doubtful which is meant. Jos uses the same name for both. From the time of the Tgs, Heb is called "the sacred tongue" in contrast to the Aram. of everyday use. The language of the OT is called Old Heb in contrast to the New Heb of the Mish., the rabbinic, the Spanish poetry, etc.

Of Old Heb the remains are contained almost entirely in the OT. A few inscriptions have been recovered, i.e., the Siloam Inscriptions, a Heb calendar, a large number of ostraka from Samaria, a score of pre-exile seals, and coins of the Macu bees and of the time of Vespasian and Hadrian.

II. History of the Hebrew Language.—Heb as it appears to us in the OT is in a state of decadence corresponding to the present position of spoken Arabic. In the earliest period it does not resemble the classical Arabic of the 7th and following centuries. The variations found between the various strata of the language occurring in the OT are slight compared with the difference between modern and ancient Arabic.

Heb was no doubt originally a highly inflected language, like classical Arabic. The noun had three cases, nom., gen., and acc., ending in en, im, am, respectively, as in the Sabaean inscriptions. Both vbs.

1. Oldest Form

and nouns had the same numbers (sing., dual, and pl.) and two genders, masc. and fem. In the noun the dual and pl. had two cases. The dual and 2d and 3d pers. pl. and 2d pers. sing. fem. of the impf. of the vb. ended in am. In the noun the endings um, um, am in the noun was dropped. The vb. had three moods, indicative, subjunctive, and jussive, ending in w, a, and - respectively; as well as many forms or stems, each of which had an active and passive voice.

In the Heb of the OT most of these inflexions have disappeared. Of the three cases of the noun only the acc. am has survived in a few adverbial forms, such as 'amly. The dual has entirely disappeared from the vb., and also from the noun, with the exception of things that occur in pairs, such as head, eye, which have no pl. The nom. case of the dual and pl. of the noun has disappeared, and the accusative case is used for both. Except in cases of poetic archaisms the final nān of the vb. has been lost, and, as the final vowels have fallen away in vbs., as well as in nouns, the result is that the jussive forms serve for indicative and subj. also. Many of the forms or stems have fallen into desuetude, and the passive forms of two alone are used.

One of the most remarkable facts connected with the Heb of the OT is that although certain facts, extends through a period of over 1,000 years, there is almost no difference between the earliest period and the latest. This phenomenon is susceptible of several explanations. In the first place, nearly the whole of the OT lies in religious or choral compositions, such as the earliest writings would become the model for the later, just as the Korān—the first prose work composed in Arab, which has survived—has become the pattern for all future compositions. The same is true for many centuries of the influence of Aristophanes and Euripides upon the language of educated Greeks, and, it is said, of the influence of Confucius upon that of the learned Chinese.

But a chief cause is probably the fact that the Sem languages do not vary with time, but with place. The Arab. vocabulary used in Morocco differs from that of Egypt, but the Arab. words used in each of these countries have remained the same for centuries—in fact, since Arab. began to be spoken in them. Similarly, the slight differences which are found in the various parts of the OT are to be ascribed, not to a difference of date, but to the fact that some writers belonged to the Southern kingdom, some to the Northern, some wrote in Pal., some in Babylonia (cf. Neh 13:23; Jgs 12:6; 18:3). The OT lit. falls into two main periods: that composed before and during the Bab exile, and that which falls after the exile. But even between these two periods the differences of language are comparatively slight, so that it is often difficult or impossible to say on linguistic grounds alone whether a particular passage is pre- or post-exilic, and scholars of the first rank often hold the most contrary opinions on these points. For instance, Dillmann places the so-called document P before D in the regal period, whereas most critics date D about 821 and P about 621.

It is needless to add that the various writers differ from one another in point of style, but these variations are infinitesimal compared with those of Gr and Lat authors, and are due, as has been said, not only to locality and environment, but to the style of Hosea is quite different from that of his contemporary Amos, and that of Deuter-Isa shows very distinctly the mark of its place of composition. A much more potent factor in modifying the language was the influence of foreign languages upon Heb, esp. in respect to vocabulary.

7. Foreign Influences

The earliest of these was probably Assy., which was -- from which Heb gained a large number of loan words. It is well known that the Bab script was used for commercial purposes throughout Southwestern Asia, even before the Heb. entered Canaan. By the time of Babylon upon Pal seems to have been greatly exaggerated. The main point of contact is in the mythology, which may have been common to both peoples. In the later, esp. post-exilic stages of the language, many Aramaisms are found in respect to syntax as well as vocabulary; and in later phases, Pers. and even Gr words are found.

As in other languages, so in Heb, the vocabulary of the poetical lit. differs from that of the prose writers. In Heb, however, there is not the hard-and-fast distinction between these two which obtains in the classics. Whenever prose becomes elevated by the importation of feeling, it falls into a natural rhythm which in Heb constitutes poetry. Thus most of the so-called prophetical books are poetical in form. Another mark of poetry is a return to archaic grammatical forms, esp. the restoration of the final nān vb. The form of Sem which was indigenous in the land of Canaan is sometimes called Middle Sem.

Before the Israelites entered the land of Canaan, there were no Hebrew-speaking Canaanites.[61] The first Hebrews who lived in Canaan were from the tribe of Gad (Num 32:34). The Hebrews were a Semitic-speaking people, and the Canaanites were the local inhabitants of Canaan. The Hebrews spoke a language related to the Arabic and Semitic languages, which were spoken in the region of Canaan at the time of the Israelites. The Hebrew language was used by the Israelites for religious and literary purposes, and it is believed that the Hebrew language was the first written language in the world. The Hebrew language was used for the composition of the Bible, and it is believed that the Hebrew language was the first written language to be used for religious and literary purposes. The Hebrew language was used for the composition of the Bible, and it is believed that the Hebrew language was the first written language to be used for religious and literary purposes. The Hebrew language was used for the composition of the Bible, and it is believed that the Hebrew language was the first written language to be used for religious and literary purposes.
and “Negeb” for the South, indicating Pal as the home of the language (so Isa 19:18).

As the aboriginal inhabitants of the land of Canaan were not Semites, we cannot infer the existence of the Hebrew language any earlier than the first immigrations of Semites into Pal, that is, during the third millennium BC. It would thus be a much younger member of the Sem family than Assy-Bab, which exhibits all the marks of great antiquity long before the Heb language is met with.

The Bab exile sounded the death-knell of the Heb language. The educated classes were deported to Babylon or fi ed to Egypt, and those who remained were not slow to adopt the language used by their conquerors.

11. When Hebraism Became a Sacred Language

The old Heb became a literary and sacred tongue, the language of every-day life being probably Aramaic. It is not improbable that the Heb language, reduced to a literary form, was used by the Maccabees, and by Bar Cochba (135 AD).

III. Chief Characteristics of Hebrew.—The special marks which particularly distinguish a language may be found in its alphabet, in its mode of inflection, or in its syntax.

The Heb alphabet is characterized by the large number of guttural sounds which it contains, and these are not mere palatalizations of Scotch or Ger. ch, but true throat sounds, such as are not found in the Greek alphabet. The four gutturals occupy considerably more than a fourth part of the volume; the remaining eighteen letters occupying considerably less than three-fourths. Besides the guttural, there are four glottal fricatives, i.e., sounds which are produced with compression of the larynx, and are quite different from our t, k, and g. In Gr the first was softened into Ø, the other two were dropped as letters but retained as numerals.

Though the Heb alphabet comprises no more than 22 letters, these represent some 30 different sounds, for the 6 letters b, d, g, k, p and t, when they fall immediately after a vowel, are pronounced bh, dh, gh, kh, ph, and ch. Moreover, the gutturals và ð each represent two distinct sounds, which are still in use in Arabic. The letter h is sometimes sounded at the end of a word as at the beginning. A peculiarity of the Heb alphabet is that the letters are all consonants. Four of these, however, were very early used to represent vowel and diphthong sounds, namely, N, h, w and y. So long as Heb was a spoken language no other symbols than these 22 letters were used. It was not until the 7th cent. AD that the earliest that the well-known elaborate system of signs to represent the vowels and other sounds was invented (see Text).

4. The Syllable

The Hebrew language is that no word or syllable may begin with a vowel; every syllable begins with a consonant. This is also true of other Sem languages, except Assy-Bab. When in the course of word-formation a syllable would begin with a vowel, the slight consonant N is prefixed. Moreover, there was no vowel-series, the root of the word being prefixed with two vowels, two of which would not stand without vowels intervening, as in the Eng. word “strength.” At most, two consonants may begin a syllable, and even so a slight vowel is sounded between them, as iw. A word may end in two consonants without vowels, as�ٌن, but no word or syllable ends in more than two.

The outstanding feature of the Sem family of languages is the root, consisting of three consonants. Practically, the trilateral root is universal. There are a few roots with more than three letters, but many of the quadrilateral roots are formed by reduplication, as kakib in Arabic. Many attempts have been made to reduce these-root stems to two-letter by taking the factors common to several roots of identical meaning. Thus ָד, ָד, ָד, “to be still,” seem all to come from a root ָד. It is more probable, however, that the root is always trilateral, but may appear in various modifications.

From these trilateral roots all parts of the vb are formed. The root, which, it ought to be stated, is not the infinitive, but the 3rd sing. Conjugations of these, perfect, expresses the simple idea of the root in its primary meaning, as in גש, “he broke,” the idea of intensity is expressed by doubling the middle stem letter, as ָָָ, “he broke in fragments”; the passive is expressed by the w-vowel in the first place and the 2nd vowel in the last, as ָָָ, “it was broken.” The reflexive sense prefixes an n to the simple root, or a t the intensive, but the former of these is often used as a passive, as ָָָ, “it was broken,” ָָָָ, “he sanctified himself.” The causative meaning is given by prefixing the letter h, as ָָָָָ, “he was king,” ָָָָָ, “he caused one to be king.” A somewhat similar method of vb. building is found outside the Sem language, for example, in Turkish. In some of these Sem languages the number of formations is very numerous. In Heb also there are traces of stems other than those generally in use.

There are no tenses in Heb, in our sense of the word. There are two states, usually called tenses, the perfect and the imperfect. In the

8. The Pronouns

The Hebrew pronouns are expressed by affixing to the perfect, and by prefixing to the imperfect, fragments of the personal pronouns, as šhabart, “I broke,” šābharâ, “we broke,” šešbhar, “he has broken,” šešbharâ, “he will break,” or (in prothetic narrative) “he will break”; in the second, the action is regarded as uncompleted, “he will break,” “he was breaking,” “he is breaking,” etc. The present is often expressed by the participle.

The different pronouns are expressed by suffixing to the perfect, and by prefixing to the imperfect, fragments of the personal pronouns, as šhabart, “I broke,” šābharâ, “we broke,” šešbhar, “he has broken,” šešbharâ, “he will break,” and so on. The fragments which are added to the perfect to express the nominative of the pronouns are, with some modification, esp. the change of t into k, added to the vb. to express the accusative, and to the noun to express the genitive; for example, šabbharâ “you broke,” šešbharâ “he broke you,” šešbharâ “your house,” šešbharâ “we counted,” šešbharâ “he counted us,” šešbharâ, “our book.”

The same principles are followed in regard to the noun as to the vb. Many nouns in the middle of the three stem-letters articulated with one or with two vowels, except that monosyllables gen-generally become dissyllabic, owing to the difficulty of pronouncing two vowelless consonants together; thus, melek, "angel," shaphir, "book," goren, "threshingfloor" (instead of makal, giphr, gorn), dabbah, "a word or thing," kribib, "near." Nouns denoting place, instrument, etc., are often formed by prefixing the "to" to the roorer as mishpat, "justice," from shaphat, "he judged," mazlith, "a fork." Intensity is given to the root idea, as in the vb., by doubling the middle consonant: thus, heresh, "working," herash (for harrash), "workman;" gonen, "stealing;" ganyab, "a thief." Similarly, words denoting invariable physical forces, titem, "dumb," twer, "blind," heroseh (for horrisheh), "deaf and dumb." The fem. of nouns, as of the 3d pers. of vbs., is formed by adding the letter א, which when final is softened to h, g'birath, "queen-mother," mistress," but g'hirath, "your mistress."

The inflexion of both vbs. and nouns is accompanied by a constant lengthening or shortening of the vowels of the word, and this inflexion according to two opposite lines. In inflexion vbs. with vowel-affixes the penultimate vowel disappears, as halak, "he went," kabbah, "they went;" in the noun the ante-penultimate vowel disappears, as dabbah, "a word." As the verbal system, as stated above, is very late, the vocalization cannot be accepted as that of the living tongue. It represents rather the cantillation of the synagogue; and for this purpose, accents, which had a musical as well as an interjunctural value, have been added.

Heb syntax is remarkable for its simplicity. Simple sentences predominate and are usually connected by the conjunction "and." Subordin- nate sentences are comparatively rare, but descriptive and temporal clauses are not uncommon. In the main narrative, the predicates are placed at the beginning of the sentence, first simply in the root form (3d sing. masc.), and then only when the subject has been mentioned does the predicate agree with it. Descriptive and temporal clauses may be recognized by their having the subject at the beginning (e.g. Gen 1 2). A curious turn is given to the narrative by the fact that in the main sentences, if the last predicate is perfect, those which follow are likewise perfect, and vice versa, the conjunction which coordinates them receiving a peculiar vocalization —that of the definite article. In the Eng. Bible, descriptive and temporal clauses are often rendered as if they were parts of the main sentence, for example, in the first verses of Gen of which the literal text is somewhat as follows: "At the beginning of God's creating heaven and earth, when the earth was without form and void, and God's spirit [or, a great wind] moved upon the face of the water, God said, Let there be light." It will thus be seen that the structure of Heb narrative is not so simple as it appears.

In the Sem languages, compound words do not occur, but this deficiency is made up by what is called the construct state. The old Syntax rule, that the second of two nouns of the Noun which depend on one another is put in the genitive, becomes, in Heb, the first of two such nouns is put in the construct state. Thus, the construct state loses the definite article, and all its vowels are made as short as possible, just as if it were the beginning of a long word: for example, ha-bayith, "the house," but beth ha-melekh, "the house of the king;" the palace," dabbah, "a word;" but dabbare ruah, "words of wind," windy words.

The Heb language is very poor in adjectives, but this is made up for by a special use of the construct state just mentioned. Thus to ex- press the "magnitude" of a word that is added in the gen. cas., as in the ex- "ample above (Gen 1 2), "a mighty wind" = a wind of God; Ps 36 6, "the lofty mountains" = the mountains of God (Ps 65 8); 50 10, "great obedient" = exalts of God; Ps 10, "a holy man" = a man of God; "the sacred box" = the ark of God, and so on; in the NT, Mt 27 54, "the son of God" = Lk 23 47, "a righteous man." Matthew was thinking in Aram., Luke in Gr. A similar use is made in classical Sem. = hard of neck; "impudent" = hard of face; "extensive" = broad of hands; "miserable" = bitter of soul.

IV. Biblical Aramaic.—The Aram. portions of the OT are the following: Ezr 4 6—18; 7 11—26; Dn 2 4—7 28; Gen 31 47 (two words); Jer 10 11. The language in Portions of the OT which they are written to be called Chaldean, but is now generally known simply as Bib. Aram. It represents a further declension from classical Sem as compared with the Heb. The following are the principal points in which Bib. Aram. differs from Heb.

The accent is placed on the last syllable, the first vowel disappearing, e.g. 'ab'hadh for Heb 'abbad. It is curious that the same feature is found in Algerian and Moroccan Arabic: thus 'aazw for kasw, 'a saa for saab, 'a zîd for za'dîd; télîtf for shâlîsh. The strong Heb Û frequently becomes Ú, and Ù becomes Ú: thus, 'orá for 'ere; 'âč for 'âš. In Heb the definite article is the prefix ha- (ha-); in Aram. the affix a-; the latter, however, has almost lost its force. The dual is even more

3. Grammar sparsely used than in Heb. The passive forms of vbs. and those beginning with nàn are practically wanting; the passive or redemptive forms are made by prefixing the letter t to the corresponding active forms, and that much more regularly than in Heb, there being three active and three passive forms.

In regard to syntax there is to be noted the frequent use of the part, instead of a finite vb., as in Heb, the disuse of the conjunction and, with the vocalization of the article; and the disuse of the construct state in nouns, instead of which a circumlocution with the relative di is employed, e.g. c'mim di dhabh, "an image of gold." The same periphrasis is found also in West African Arabic.

It will thus be seen that if Heb represents a dec- ceiling which was very similar to classical Arabic, Aram. Bib. Arab. stands at a still lower level. It is not to be supposed that More Dec- cadent than Heb passed into Aram., though on the Hebrew analogy of Arab, that view is not un- tenable. Rather, the different Sem languages became fixed at different epochs. Arab. as a literary language crystallized "out of the source; Heb and the spoken Arab, of the East far down the stream; and Aram. and Moroccan Arsh. farthest down of all.

II. Evidence Favoring Epistle to Ephesians.

1. Marcion's Opinion

Marcion, the heretic, was the first to deny the epistle to the Ephesians. He wrote that the apostle Paul did not know of the Laodiceans, and that the letter was written by a later apostle. This opinion was later adopted by Tertullian, who asserted that the epistle was written by the apostle to the Laodiceans. But this is not the case, as the epistle to the Ephesians clearly addresses the Laodiceans.

2. References in Ephesians and Other Epistles

The epistle to the Ephesians makes frequent references to the Laodiceans, and these references are consistent with the Epistle to the Laodiceans. The apostle Paul also mentions the Laodiceans in his letter to the Colossians, which is evidence that he was familiar with the Laodiceans.

3. Authenticity

The epistle to the Ephesians is a genuine epistle, written by the apostle Paul. The references to the Laodiceans are consistent with the context of the epistle, and there is no evidence to suggest that the epistle to the Laodiceans was written by anyone other than the apostle Paul.

4. Apocryphal Epistles

The only other alternative is that “the epistle to the Ephesians” is an apocryphal epistle. This is not the case, as the references to the Laodiceans are consistent with the context of the epistle, and there is no evidence to suggest that the epistle to the Ephesians was written by anyone other than the apostle Paul.

II. Evidence Favoring Epistle to Ephesians.—

But is there any evidence for concluding that it is not? A statement of the facts of the case seems to show that the epistle to the Ephesians was not written by the apostle Paul.

1. Marcion's Opinion against Marcion in this respect. It is not likely, says Moule (Eph, 25), "that Marcion was guilty here, where the change would have served no dogmatic purpose."

2. References in Ephesians and Other Epistles.

The references to the Ephesians in the epistle to the Laodiceans are consistent with the context of the epistle, and there is no evidence to suggest that the epistle to the Ephesians was written by anyone other than the apostle Paul.

The “Ep. to the Eph.” could not, primarily at least, be addressed to Ephesians, because Paul speaks of his readers as persons in regard to whose conversion from heathenism to the faith of Christ he had just recently heard: “For this cause I also, having heard of the faith in the Lord Jesus which is among you, and what ye have heard from me both by word and epistle” (Eph 1 15 f). These words could not well be addressed to the church at Ephesus, which Paul himself had founded, and in reference to persons among whom he had lived for three years, and who he even knew personally “every one” of the Christians (Acts 20 31).

And in Eph 3 1 f AV, he writes: “For this cause I, Paul, the prisoner of Jesus Christ for you Gentiles, if ye have heard of the dispensation of the grace of God which is given me to you-ward.” But how could he ever doubt that the elders of the church in Ephesus (Acts 20 17), as well as the members of that important church, were ignorant of the fact that a dispensation of the grace of God had been given to him? The inquiry, whether his readers had heard of the one great fact, does not in his mind carry over to his readers in Ephesus, for his church in Ephesus would be too well informed to need to be told of this great fact. But he knew the readers well, and could not describe the members of the church in Ephesus. “It is plain,” writes Moule (Eph, 26), “that the ep. does not bear an Ephesian destination on the face of it.”

In the Ep. to the Cor there are many local references, as well as allusions to the apostle’s work in Corinth. In the Ep. to the Gal there are also many references to his work among the people of the churches in Galatia. The same is the case in the Ep. to the Phil. several names being mentioned of persons known to the apostle. In the two Epps. to the Thess, references also occur to his work among them.

Turning to the Ep. to the Col, and to that to the Rom—Colosse and Rome being cities which he had not visited previous to his writing to the churches there—he knows several persons in Colosse; and in the case of the Ep. to the Rom, he mentions by name no fewer than twenty-six persons in that city.

How is it then that “the Ep. to the Eph” there are no references at all to the three years which he spent in Ephesus? And how also is there no mention of any one of the members of the church or of the elders whom he knew so intimately and so affectionately? “Ephesians” is inexplicable on the ordinary assumption that Ephesus was the city to which the ep. was addressed.

The other theory, that the ep. was a circular one, seems in the first instance to Laodicea, involves no such difficulty.

Another indication in regard to the primary destination of the ep. is in the words, “ye, the Gentiles in the flesh, who are called Circumcision by that circumcision that is called Church Circumcision, in the flesh, made by hands; that ye were at that time separated from Christ, alienated from the commonwealth of Israel, and strangers from the covenants of the promise, having no hope, and without God in the world!” (Eph 2.11.12).

Do these words describe the church in Ephesus? Was the church there gentile in its origin? Very far from this, for as a matter of fact it began by Paul preaching the gospel to the Jews, as is narrated at length by Luke in Acts 18. Then in Acts 19, Paul comes again to Ephesus, where he went into the synagogue and spake boldly for the space of three months, but when divers were hardened and believed not, but spake evil of the Way before the multitude, he separated the disciples, disputing daily in the school of one Tyrannus.

Here, therefore, is definite proof that the church in Ephesus was not gentile in its origin. It was distinct from the synagogue, but a gentlelement had been received into it. Now the church to which Paul writes “the Ep. to the Eph” was not Jewish at all. He does not speak to his readers in any other way than “you Gentiles.”

But an important consideration is that the “Ep. to the Eph” was written by Paul at the same sitting almost as that to the Col. These two epistles are sister epistles, and these along with Col. The Ep. to Philem were written andEpistles sent off at the same time, Onesimus and Tychicus carrying the ep. to the Col. (Col 4.7.8.9), Onesimus being the bearer of that to Philem, while Tychicus in addition to carrying the Colossian ep. was also the messenger who carried “the Ep. to the Eph” (Eph 6.21)

A close scrutiny of Col and “Eph” shows, to an extent without a parallel elsewhere in the epp. of the NT, a remarkable similarity of phraseology. There are only two verses in the whole of Col to which there is none parallel in Eph. The same words are used, while the thought is so similar, and so rich, that the one ep. is in no sense a copy or repetition of the other (see list of parallelisms, etc., in St. Paul’s Epp. to Colossae and Laodicea. T. & T. Clark, Edinburgh). Both epp. come warm and instinct with life from the full heart of the great apostle who had not, up to that time, visited either city, but on whom, none the less, there came daily the care of all the churches.

To recapitulate: (1) The words “at Ephesus” in the inscription of the ep. are wanting in the two oldest and chief manuscripts of the MSS., and is as if Paul had written it as if none, or only a single epistle, as persons of whose conversion to Christ he knew only by report. (2) The ep. is the only one in which he speaks of them as knowing only by hearsay of his commission as an apostle of Christ. Also, though he had stayed there for three years, this ep. does not contain a single salutation. (3) He speaks of his readers as forming a church exclusively of Gentiles. But the church in Ephesus being exclusively gentile, was actually Jewish in origin. (4) “Eph” was written at the same sitting as Col, and the same messenger, Tychicus, carried them both. Therefore as the ep. was not, and could not be, addressed to Ephesus, the conclusion is that it was addressed to some church, and that it was not a treatise sent to the Christian church generally. The words of the first verse of the ep., “to the saints that are,” proves that the name of the place to which it was addressed is all that is lost from the MSS., but that no other explanation is possible but that they came warm from the heart of the same writer at the same time. The conclusion seems inevitable that the ep. to Laodicea is not lost at all, but that it is identical with the so-called Ep. to the Eph.

III. Laodicea Displaced by Ephesus.—How then did Ephesus displace Laodicea? It is explained at once if the theory is adopted that the epistle was a “circular” one addressed not to Laodicea only, but to other cities. We know e.g. that the apostle orders it to be taken to the church in Colosse and read there. So also it might have been sent to other cities, such as Hierapolis (Col 4.13) and Ephesus. Hence if the church in Laodicea were not careful to see that the ep. was returned to them, by those churches to whom they had sent it, it can easily be understood how a copy of this in any of those cities might leave out the words “in Laodicea,” as not agreeing with the name of the city where the MSS. actually was at the time the copies were multiplied, the words “in Ephesus” would be suggested, as the name of the chief city of Asia, from which province the ep. had come to the knowledge of the whole Christian church, and to which, in point of fact, Paul, in his instructions, that it was in keeping with the fitness of things, that Paul, who had founded the church in Ephesus, should have written an ep. to the church there.

In an article upon “Marcion and the Canon” by Professor J. Kent Harris, LL.D., in the Eos for T, June, 1907, there is reference to the Revue Biblique for January of that year, which contained a remarkable article by de Bruyne, entitled “Biblical Prologues of Marcionite Origin,” and which succeeded in showing that a very widely spread series of prologues to the Pauline Epp., which occur in certain Lat Bibles, must have been taken from the Marcionite Bible. Professor Render Harris adds that the prologues in question are not invented by Marcion himself, for in any case the Marcionite hand, from which they come, antedates the first edition of which the prologues are imitated. “It is clear from Tertullian’s polemic against Marcion, that the Pauline Epp. were known to Marcion. He in the following order in the Marcionite Canones: Gal. 1 and Col. Rom. 1 and 2 Thess, then Eph (which Marcion calls by the name of the ep. to the Laodiceans), Col. Phil., and Philem. In the following order: Gal., Rom., Col., Phil., and Philem. Also T, T. Clark, Edinburgh, has prologues that are current in Vulg and other MSS. for Eph and Col.: the Ephesian prologue, he says, was added to suit some Lat. edition, but he regards it as of Marcionite origin. However, we turn to our present prologue, we find that it opens as follows: ‘Colossenses et Ephesios, it tum Laodiceens et Asiae sunt. Hi accipio verbo veritatis perseverantium, et his in singulas epistolas reddam erat apostolae, nec ad hos accessit apostolae sed ut vos per epistolam corrigatur.” etc.

From this it is clear that originally the prologue to the Laodiceans preceded the prologue to Col, and that the Ephesian prologue is a substitute for the Laodicean prologue, which can be partly reconstructed from the references in the Colossian prologue. We can see that there was a statement that the Laodiceans belonged to Asia, had never been under the influence of false apostles, and had never been visited by St. Paul, who corrects their error by an epistle.

IV. Reason for Such an Epistle.—Assuming therefore that the “Ep. to the Eph.” is the epistle which Paul wrote to the Laodiceans, various questions arise, such as, Why did he write to the church there? What was there in the state of the church in Laodicea to call for an epistle from him? Was there any heresy there, like the false teaching which existed in the neighboring church in Colossae?

The answer to such questions is that though we do not possess much information, yet these churches in the province of Asia had many things in common. They had originated at the same time, during the two whole years of Paul’s residence in Ephesus. They were composed of men of the same race, and speaking the same language. They were subject to the same influences of direction error. The errors to which any one church fell could not fail to affect the others also. These churches, then, required the same apostolic instruction and exhortation. This epistle, accordingly, bears a close resemblance to the Colossian, just for the reason that the circumstances of the church in Laodicea were similar to those of the church in Colossae; and also, that the thought of which Paul’s heart was filled as he wrote to Colossae, were adapted, in the first place, to counteract the false teaching which they also are the foundation of all Christian experience, and the very life of all Christian doctrine and truth. These are the great thoughts of the Church of all things. Christ the Reconciler of all things, Christ the Reconciler of all things, Christ the Reconciler of all things.

Note.—A very remarkable circumstance in regard to the apocryphal Ep. to the Laodiceans is mentioned by Nestle in the preface to his edition of the Lat. NT, published in Stuttgart in 1906. He writes that “the Ep. to the Laodiceans was for a thousand years part of many large Bible, and obtained a place in the Lutheran Ger. Bibles, together with Jerome’s Ep. to Damascus.”

LAP: The word is the tr of three different Heb. expressions: פְּלֵעָה (Prov. 15:38), פּלְפָּה (2 K 4:39), and פּלְפָּה (Jer. 15:13), besides פֹּלְפָּה (Ps. 9:7). In all these passages the meaning is that of a part of oriental clothing, probably the folds of the garment covering the bosom or lap of a person. The flowing garments of Orientals invite the use of the same, on the part of speakers, in driving home certain truth or truths emunated by such a vehicle of expression. Every reader of Roman history recalls the impressive incident of Quintus Fabius Maximus (Cunctator), who, in 219 BC, was ambassador of Rome to Carthage, and who, before the city council, held the folds of his toga in the shape of a closed pouch, declared that he held enclosed in the same both peace and war, whichever the Carthaginians should desire to choose. When the Carthaginians clamored for war, he opened the folds of his garment and said: “Then you shall have war, just as you like it, Nehemiah, when pleading for united efforts for the improvement of social order, addressed the priests of Jerusalem to get a pledge of their cooperation: Also I shook out my lap (ךֹּקָה), and said, So God shake out every one from his house, and from his labor, that performeth not this promise; even thus be he shaken out, and emptied” (Neh. 5:13).

In EV the vb. “to lap” is found, which has no etymological connection with the above-mentioned nouns. It is in Heb פְּלֵעָה, “to lap,” and refers to the loud licking up of water by dogs (1 K. 21:19; 22:38 AV), and in the story of Gideon’s battle against the Midianites, of his 300 warriors (Jgs 7:5 f).

Lappidoth, lap’idoth, -dith (םַלְפָיָה, לֵפֶדָה, -ילפִּדָה, לָפֵית, לָפֵית; AV Lappidoth): Deborah’s husband (Jgs 4:4). The Heb name is a fem. pl. like Jeremiah (1 Ch 7:8), Naboth (1 K 21:1). The pl. is probably intensive. Jewish interpreters have identified Lappidoth (“flames”) with Barak, whose name is so vented by the same ideas, derived both from the current philosophy and from their ancestral heathen religions. They would, therefore, on the same principle require the same apostolic instructions and exhortation. This epistle, accordingly, bears a close resemblance to that in which he had just written to Colossae.

It is no more astonishing that Paul should have written to Laodicea, than that he also wrote to Colossae, which was probably the least important of all the cities and churches mentioned in the apostle’s work and career. Neither is it any more to be wondered at that he should have written so profound an epistle as that to “the Eph.” than he should have directed directions that it be sent on to Colossae and read there; for this reason, that the exposition of Christ’s great love to the church of Colossae and His giving Himself for it—the doctrine of the grace of God—is the very correction which he required for the Laodicite Laometricians, who, as the chief of all the other Colossians, and is also the groundwork of Christian truth and experience for all ages.

Etyologists assign three probable sources of aselgeia, viz.: (1) from a compound of a priv. and πεπληροφορήσαν, a Pelidian city, the seat of commerce to Thayer (NT Lexicon) “excelled in strictness of morals,” but according to Trench a place whose inhabitants were notorious for their vices; (2) from a compound of a priv. and πεπληροφορήσαν, “inhabitants of Théba,” “exciting delight or displeasure.” It evidently means conduct and character that is unbecoming, indecent, unattractively shameless.

MK uses it in 7:22 with uncertainty as to the vice meant. Paul (2 Cor 12:21) classes it with uncleanness and fornication as sins to be avoided; also (Gal 5:21). Very much in the NT 14:26, “wantonness”) puts it in the same catalogue with other works of the flesh; and (Eph 4:19) he refers to some aged ones so covetous that they made trade of themselves by giving themselves up to lasciviousness.

The same word is ταράτος “lasciviousness” in Rom 13:13, meaning wanton manner, filthy words, unchaste movements of the body. Peter (1 Pet 3:3) mentions those who “walk in lasciviousness, lusts,锄marchings, revellings, and wanton idolatries.” He speaks (2 Pet 2:2) of “pernicious doings” (AV “pernicious ways”); (2:7) “lascivious life” (AV “filthy conversation”); and (2:18) of “lasciviousness” (AV “wantonness”), as a means “to entice in the lusts of the flesh.” Jude ver 4 probably does not refer to any form of sensuality in using the word descriptive of “ungodly men” who perverted the faith of some and denied our only Master.

LASEA, la-sē'a (Lāsā; Lāsāa): A town on the S. coast of Crete, 5 miles E. of Fair Havens (Acts 27 8). The ruins were examined in 1856 by Rev. G. Brown (see CH [St.P], ch xxii, 640). If St. Paul's ship was detained long at this anchorage, it would be necessary to purchase stores from Lasea; and this in addition to the inconvenience of the roadstead (see Fair Havens) would probably explain the captain's reluctance to winter there.

LASHA, la'sha (לָשָׁה, lāsha): A place named on the southern boundary of the Canaanites along with Gomorrah, Adnah and Zeboim (Gen 10 19). Onom identifies it with the hot springs at Callirrhoe in Wady Zerqa Ma'an, on the E. of the Dead Sea; in this agreeing with Tg Jerus. This position, however, seems too far to the N., and possibly the site should be sought on the W. of the Arabah. The absence of the article (cf Josh 15 2) prevents identification with the promontory el-Lisan, which runs into the sea from the eastern shore. Wellhausen (Comentatio II, 15) thinks we should read לָשָׁה, Lasha, as the letters ז and ש are like each other in their Palmyrene form. We should then have indicated the boundary from Gaza to the Dead Sea, and then from the Dead Sea to Leshem, i.e. Dan. This is very precarious. No identification is possible.

LASSHARON, la-shā'rōn, la-shā-rōn (לָשָׁרָן, lāshārān or la-shārōn, AV Sharon): A royal city of the Canaanites taken by Joshua, named with Aphek (Josh 12 18). Possibly we should here follow the reading of LXX (B), "the king of Aphek in Sharon." Onom (s.v. "Saron") mentions a region between Mt. Tabor and the Lake of Tiberias called Sarona. This is probably represented by the ancient site Sarona, on the plateau 61 miles S.W. of Tiberias. If MT is correct, this may be the place intended.

LATE, TIMES (κατά τοὺς ἐξήγαγον, κατά τοὺς ἐσχάτους, χρόνους ἐξήγαγον, χρόνους ἐσχάτους [also pl.], ἐξήγαγον τοῦ χρόνου, ἐσχατὸν τοῦ χρόνου, ἐσχατῶν τῶν χρόνων, διὰ τοῦ ἐσχάτου χρόνου, διὰ τοῦ ἐσχάτου χρόνου): In AV this phrase occurs in 1 Pet 1 5; 1 Pet 2 10 (pl.); 1 Jn 2 18; Jude ver 18; RV has, in 1 Pet 1 20, "at the end of the times," and in 1 Jn 2 18, "the last hour," in closer adherence to the Gr. The conception is closely allied to that of "the last day," and, like this, has its root in the OT conception of "the end of days." In the OT this designates the entire eschatological period as that which the present course of the world is to issue into, and not, as might be assumed, the closing scene of history. It is equivalent to what was later called "the coming aeon" (see eschatology of the NT). In the NT, on the other hand, the phrase "the last time" does mark the concluding section of the present world-period, of the present age. In three of the NT passages the consciousness expresses itself that these "last times" have arrived, and that the period extending from the appearance or the resurrection of Christ until His Second Coming is the closing part of the present age, that the writer and readers are living in the last passage (1 Pet 1 5) "the last time" is projected farther forward into the future, so that it comes to mean the time immediately preceding the reappearance of Christ. Both usages can be readily explained. The days of the Messiah were to the OT writers part of the future world, although to the later Jewish chiasmus they appeared as lying this side of it, because differing from the world to come in their earthly and temporal character. To the early Christians the days of the Messiah appeared more closely assimilated in character to the future world, so that no reason existed on this score for not including them in the latter. Still it was also realized that the Messiah in His first appearance had not brought the full realization of the coming world, and that only His return from the dead would consummate the kingdom of God. Accordingly, the days in which they lived assumed to them the character of an intermediate period, marked off on the one hand from the previous development by the appearance of the Messiah, but equally marked off from the coming aeon by His reappearance in glory. From a formal point of view the representation resembles the Jewish chiasmatic scheme, but with a twofold substantial difference: (a) the chiasmatic scheme restricts the Messiah and His work to the last days, and does not carry Him over into the coming world, whereas to the Christian the coming world, no less than the last days, is thoroughly Messianic; (b) to the Jewish point of view both the days of the Messiah and the coming world are future, whereas to the Christian the former have already arrived. It remained possible, however, from the Christian point of view to distinguish within the last times themselves between the immediate present and the future conclusion of his period, and this is done in 1 Pet 1 5. Also in 1 Jn 2 18 the inference that "the last hour" has come is not drawn from the presence of the Messiah, but from the appearance of the anti-Christian power, so that here we also a more contracted conception of the last stage of history reveals itself, not only as future (1 Pet 1 5), but as present (hence "hour" not "time").

GEERHARDUS VOS

LASTHENES, las-the-nes (Λάσθηνης, Lasthēnēs): A highly placed official under King Demetrius II, Nicator. He is called the king's "kinsman" (AV "kousin") and "father" (1 Mac 51 32, Jos, Ant, XIII, iv, 9), but these are to be taken as court titles rather than as denoting blood-relationship. According to Jos (Ant, XIII, iv, 3) he was a native of Crete, and raised an army for the king when he made his first descent upon the coast, and rendered him ultimately successful in his campaign. He was sent by Syria from Alexander Balas (1 Mac 10 67; Ant, XIII, iv, 3). The letter addressed to L. indicates that he was probably prime minister or grand vizier of the kingdom.

J. HUTCHISON

LATCHET, lāch'et (לַחַט, ṭōch; μπέτ, himēs): Leather thong used for tying on sandals (see Gen 14 23; Mk 1 7)). The stooping to the dusty shoe-latchet was esteemed by Orientals a service that was at once petty and degrading, and was usually assigned to menials.

LATIN, lat'in: Was the official language of the Rom Empire as Gr was that of commerce. In Pal Aram. was the vernacular in the rural districts and remoter towns, while in the leading towns both Gr and Aram. were spoken. These facts furnish the explanation of the use of all three tongues in the inscription on the cross of Christ (Mt 27 37; Mk 15 26; Lk 23 38; Jn 19 19). Thus the charge was written "in the legal language, and was technically regular as well as recognizable by all classes of the people. The term "Latin" occurs in the NT only in Jn 19 20, Παμψιλία (Pamysila), and in Lk 23

38. Ἰωάννης (Ἰώαννης), Ῥήματος (ῥήματος), according to Ἀ. Ν. ADN. It is probable that Tertullian made his plea against Paul before Felix (Acts 24) in Lat., though the Gr. was also used in such provincial courts by grace of the judge. It is probable also that Paul knew and spoke Lat. of W. M. Ramsay, Pauline and Other Studies, 1906, 65, and A. Soutter, "Did Paul Speak Lat?" Expos, April, 1911. The vernacular Lat. had its own history and development with great influence on the ecclesiastical terminology of the West. See W. Bury, "The Holy Latin Tongue," Dublin Review, April, 1906, and Römisch, Itala und Vulgata, 1874, 480. There is no doubt of the mutual influence of Gr. and Lat. on each other in the later centuries. See W. Schulze, Graeca Latina, 1891; Vieriek, Sermo Graecus, 1888.

It is doubtful if the Lat. syntax is clearly perceptible in the koine (see LANGUAGE OF THE NT).

Delissmann (Light from the Ancient East, 117 f.) finds ἐν ὑπ' ἐνθεοτοκοῦ, ὑπ' ἐνθεοτοκίῳ (in Deut. 17:3), ἀνα γένος, ἀνα γένεσιν, ἀνα γένεσις (of 1 K 12:35). The papyrus (21st AD) give ἀνα γένους, ἀνα γεγενήσεις (cf. Lk 12:35). The papyri (21st AD) and the Epistles (cf. Lk 12:35) show a intercourse of the words, their relationship suggesting a development from the Greek and a natural conformity to the Lat. The idea is based on the belief that there is a parallelism in the use of these words. It may be that the Greek idea of having a parallelism is reflected in the idea of having a parallelism in the use of these words.

Besides the NT, there are Lat. translations of the OT in the 4th century. The oldest is the Vulgate of Jerome (c. 398-420), which was a revision of the earlier Latin translations. The Vulgate was the most widely used translation in the West until the 16th century. It was translated from the Hebrew and Greek texts, and it was the first translation to be printed in the Latin language. The Vulgate was used by the Roman Catholic Church and was the basis for most of the later Latin translations.

2. The Vulgate, with its many revisions and corrections, has become the standard Latin translation of the Bible. The Vulgate was the first translation to be printed in the Latin language, and it was the basis for most of the later Latin translations. The Vulgate was used by the Roman Catholic Church and was the basis for most of the later Latin translations.

LITERATURE

The claim of Christianity to be the one true religion has carried with it the beginning of the Bible. It is the first history of the Bible, to make its holy Scriptures.

The claim containing the Divine message of salvation and life eternal, known to all Translation. Accordingly, wherever the first Christian evangelists carried the gospel beyond the limits of the speaking world, one of the first requirements of their work was to give the newly evangelized peoples the record of God's revelation of Himself in their mother tongue. It was through the LXX tr of the OT that the great truths of revelation first became known to the Gr. and Rom world. It is generally agreed that, as Christianity spread, the Syr and the Lat VSS were the first to be produced; and tr's of the Gospels, and of other books of the Old and NT in Gr, were the result of attempts of the later centuries before the close of the 2nd century.

The earliest translators of the Bible into Lat. no record has survived. Notwithstanding the careful investigation of scholars in recent years, there are still many questions relating to the origin of the Bible to which only tentative and provisional answers can be given. It is therefore more convenient to begin a study of the influence of the Latin languages on the Bible in the 4th century. See LITERATURE, vol. 4, chs. 24, 25, and 26.

The need for such a version was imminent. There existed by this time a multiplicity of Gr. differing from one another, and there was none possessed of commanding authority to which appeal might be made in case of necessity. It was the consideration of the chaotic condition of the existing tr's, with their divergences and variations, which moved Damasus to commission Jerome to his task and Jerome to undertake it. We learn particulars from the letter of Jerome in 383 transmitting to his patron the first installment of his revision, the Gospels. "I have compiled," he says, "a new work out of an old so that after so many copies of the Scriptures have been dispersed throughout the whole world I am as it were to occupy the post of arbiter, and seeing they differ from one another I am able to determine which of them are in agreement with the original Gr." Anticipating attacks from critics, he says, further, "If they maintain that confidence is to be reposed in the Lat. expositors, let them answer which, for there are almost as many copies of the Lat. as of the Gr. and any one may be sought from the majority, whether gr are not rather go back to the Gr. original, and correct the blunders which have been made by incompetent translators, made worse rather than better by the presumption of unskilful correctors, and added to or altered by careless comparison of old Gr MSS."

From Jerome's contemporary, Augustine, we obtain similar pictures of the translation into Gr. "He says (De Doctrina Christiana, i,11), 'can be numbered, but Lat. translators by no means. For whenever, in the first ages of the faith, a Gr. MS came into the hands of anyone who had also a little skill in both languages, he made bold to translate it forthwith.' In the same context he mentions "an innumerable variety of Lat translators," "a crowd of translators." His advice to readers is to give a preference to the Itala, "which is more faithful in its renderings and more intelligible in its sense." What the Itala is, has been greatly discussed. Formerly it was taken to be a summary designation of all the VSS before Jerome's time. But more recently it has been urged that it is a more specific name, and that it strongly urges the view that this term Augustine designates Jerome's Vulgate, which he might quite well have known and preferred to any of the earlier trs. However this may be, whereas before Jerome there were those numerous trs. of which he and Augustine complain, after Jerome there is the one predominant and commanding work, produced by him, which in course of time drove all others out of the field, the great Vulgate edition, as it came to be called, of the complete Lat Bible.

We are here concerned with the subject of the Lat Bible before the time of Jerome. The MSS which have survived from the earlier period are known by the general designation of Old Latin. When we ask where these first trs. came into existence, we discover a somewhat surprising fact. It was not at Rome, as we might have expected, that they were first noticed. The fullest list shows that Rome was mainly Gr., down to the 3d cent. St. Paul wrote the Ep. to the Rom. in Gr. When Clement of Rome in the last decade of the 1st cent. wrote an ep. in the name of the Roman church to the Corinthians, he wrote in Gr. Justin Martyr, and the heretic Marcion, alike wrote from Rome in Gr. Out of 15 bishops who presided over the Roman see down to the close of the 2d cent., only four have Lat names. Even the pagan emperor Marcus Aurelius wrote his Meditations in Gr. If there were Christians in Rome at that period whose only language was Lat, they were not sufficiently numerous to be provided with Christian literature; at least none has survived.

It is from North Africa that the earliest Lat literature of the church has come down to us. The church of North Africa early received a baptism of blood, and could point to an illustrious roll of martyrs. It has also a distinguished group of Lat authors, whose Lat might sometimes be rude and mixed with foreign idioms, but had a power and a fire derived from the truths which it set forth.

One of the most eminent of these Africans was Cyprian, bishop of Carthage, who won the martyr's crown in 257. His genuine works consist of a number of short treatises, or tracts, and numerous letters, all teeming with Scripture quotations. It is certain that he employed a version then and there in use, and it is agreed that "his quotations are carefully made and thus afford trustworthy standards of African Old Latin in a very early, though still not the earliest stage" (Hort, Intro to the NT in Gr., 789).

Critical investigation has made it clear that the version used by Cyprian survives in a fragmentary copy of St. Mark and St. Matthew, contained in a palimpsest at Paris called Codex Floriacensis (h). It has been found that another MS, Codex Palatinus (e) at Vienna, has a text closely akin to that exhibited in Cyprian, although there are traces of mixture in it. These MSS, together with the quotations of the so-called Speculum Augustini (m), is known among scholars as African Old Latin. Another MS with an interesting history, Codex Colbertinianus (c) contains also a valuable African element, but in many parts of the Gospels it side also with what is called the European Old Latin more than with k or e. Codex Bobbiensis (k) has been edited with a learned introduction in the late Bishop John Wordworth's Old Latin Bib. Texts, the relation of k to Cyprian and the old Latin text has given us a fixed point in the history of the Lat Bible a century and a half earlier than Jerome.

We proceed half a century nearer to the fountain-head of the African Bible when we take up the testimony of Tertullian who flourished toward the close of the 2d cent. Helian's Bible differed from Cyprian in being a competent Gr scholar. He was thus able to translate for himself as he made his quotations from the LXX or the Gr NT, and is thus for us by no means so safe a witness to the character or existence of a standard version. Professor Zahn (GK, 1, 60) maintains with considerable plausibility that before 210-240 AD there was no Lat Bible, and that Tertullian went to Rome and obtained a copy of the Vulgate, and that he went along. In this contention, Zahn is not supported by many scholars, and the view generally is that while Tertullian's knowledge of Gr is a disturbing element, his writings, with the copious quotations from both Old and NT, testify to the existence of a version which had already been for some time in circulation and use. Who the African Wycliffe or Tindale was who produced that version has not been recorded, and it may in fact have been a Lat gospel or apocalypse or something similar, which was then provided with Christological and NT elements. But this is one of the problems awaiting the discovery of fresh material and fuller investigation for its solution.

Although the evidence has, up to the present time, been regarded as favoring the African origin of the first Lat tr of the Bible, recent investigations into what is called the Western text of the NT has yielded results pointing elsewhere. It is clear from Old Latin a comparison that the Western type of NT has a close affinity with the Lat witnesses originating in western provinces of the empire. The close textual relation disclosed between the Lat and the Syr VSS has led some authorities to believe that, after all, the earliest Lat version of the NT may have been made in the Greek at Antioch. But this is one of the problems awaiting the discovery of fresh material and fuller investigation for its solution.

We have already noticed the African group, so designated from its connection with the great African Fathers, Tertullian and the Cyprians, and comprising k, e, and to some extent h and m. The antiquity of Old Latin MSS of the text here represented is attested by these African Fathers. When we come down to the 4th cent., we find in Western Europe, and esp. in North Italy, a second type of text, which is designated European, the precise relation of which to the African has not been clearly ascertained. Is this an independent text which has arisen on the soil of Italy, or is it a text derived by alteration and revision of the African as it traveled northward and westward? This group consists of theCodex Vercellensis (a) and Codex Veronensis (b) of the 4th or 5th cent. respectively, and there may be included also the Codex Vindobonensis (i) of the 7th cent. at Vienna. These give the Gospels, and a gives for St. John the text as it was read by the 4th-cent. Father, Ludger... of Cagliari in Sardinia. The Lat. of the Gr-Lat MS D (Codex Bezae) known as d, and the Lat. of the translator of Irenaeus are classed with this group.

Later, Professor Hort says from the middle of the 4th cent. the third type, called Italic from its more restricted range, is found. It is represented by Codex Brixianus (f) of the 6th cent., now at Brescia, and Codex Monacensis (q) of the 7th cent., at Munich. This text is probably a modified form of the European, produced by revision which has brought it more into accord with the Gr. and has given it a smoother Lat. aspect. The group has received this name because the text found in many of Augustine's writings is the same, and as he expressed a preference for the Itala, the group was designated accordingly. Recent investigation tends to show that we must be careful how we use Augustine as an Old Latin authority, and that the Itala may be, not a pre-Vulg text, but rather Jerome's Vulg. This, however, is still uncertain; the fact remains that as far as the Gospels are concerned, f and q represent the type of text most used by Jerome.

That all these groups, comprising in all 38 codices, go back to one original is not impossible. Still these may have been at first local VSS, and then an official version formed out of them. When Jerome's revision took hold of the church, the Old Latin representatives for the most part were discarded. Some of them, however, held their ground and continued to be copied down to the 12th and even the 13th cent. Codex e is an example of this; it is a MS of the 12th cent., but was added to by Professor Burkitt has pointed out (Texts and Studies IV, "Old Latin," 11) "It came from Langueoc, the country of the Albigeness. Only among heretics isolated from the rest of Western Christianity could an Old Latin text have been written as so late a period." An instance of an Old Latin text copied in the 13th cent. is the Gigas Holmiensis, quoted as Gig, now at Stockholm, and so called from its great size. It contains the Acts and the Apocalypse of the Old Latin and the rest of the NT according to the Vulg. It has to be borne in mind that in the early centuries complete Bibles were unknown. Each group of books, Gospels, Acts and Catholic Epistles, Pauline Epistles, and Rev for the NT, and Pent, Historical Books, Ps and Prophets for the OT, happened separately. It is interesting, also, to note that when Jerome revised, or even retranslated from the LXX, Tob and Jth of the Apoc, the greater number of these books, the Wd, Eccles, 1 and 2 Macc, and Bar were left unrevised, and were simply added to the Vulg from the Old Latin version.

These Old Latin texts going back in their earliest forms to nearly the middle of the 2d cent. are very early witnesses to the Gr text from which they were made. They as a rule of Old Latin the more valuable inasmuch as they for Textual Criticism are manifestly very literal texts. Our criticism great uncial MSS reach no farther back than the 4th cent., whereas in the Old Latin we have evidence—indirect indeed and requiring to be cautiously used—reaching back to the 2d cent. The text of these MSS is neither dated nor localized, whereas the evidence of these VSS, coming from a particular province of the church, and being used by Fathers whose period is definitely known, enable us to judge of the text and use in it. In this connection, too, it is noteworthy that while the variations of which Jerome and Augustine complained were largely due to the blunders, or natural mistakes, of copyists, they did sometimes represent various readings in the Gr originals.

LATTICE, lat. is. See House, II, 1, (9).

LAUD, lvd.: A vb. meaning "to praise," used in Rom 15:11 AV, and Ps 117:1; 145:4. RV either should have avoided the word altogether or else should have used it much more extensively—preferably the latter, as the word is not obsolete in liturgical Eng.

LAUGHING-STOCK, läf'ing-stök: Something set up to be laughed at; thrice in RV the tr of הילנה הים בקיע "laughter," etc (Job 12:4; Jer 20:7; cf Jer 48:26.27.39; Lam 3:14). See Mock, Mocking.

LAUGHTER, läf'ter ( platağ, παίζω, παίζον, παίζεω, "to laugh," πίπτω, πιπτόν, "laughter"); γέλοιο, geló, καταγέλασο, katagélado: (1) Laughter as the expression of gladness, pleasant surprise, is the tr of παίζω (Gen 17:17; 18:12.13.15; 21:6), which, however, is not "with me," as AV and RV (so Delitzsch and others; see also Hastings in HDB), not in the sense of derision, but of surprise and pleasure. In the same ver for "God hath made me to laugh," RV gives in m, "hath prepared laughter for me," and this gave his name to the son, the promise of whose birth evoked the laughter (Ish², Ἰσαὰς; gélado (Lk 6:21.25) has the same meaning of gladness and rejoicing; πιπτόν, "laughter," has also this sense (Job 8:21; Ps 126:2). It is, however, "laughed to scorn" in Job 12:4; RV "laughing-stock"; so Jer 20:7; 48:26.27.39; Lam 3:14, "derision." (2) παίζω is used (except Job 29:24; Eccl 3:4) in the sense of the laughter of defiance, or derision (Job 8:22; 41:29); in Piel it is often trs "play," "playing," "merry." (3) La'agh is "to scorn," "to laugh to scorn" (2 K 19:21; Neh 2:19; παίζω has also this sense (2 Ch 30:10; πιπτόν (Ezk 23:32); πιπτόν (Job 12:4); katagélado (Mt 9:24; Mk 3:20; Lk 8:35); Lk 6 21.25; see above. Katagélado is found in Jth 12:12, "laugh to scorn" (Eccles 7:11; 20:17; 1 Macc 10:70, RV "derision").

For "laugh" (Job 23:17) RV has "mock;" for "mocked of his neighbor" and "laughed to scorn" (Job 12:4) "laughing-stock"; for "shall rejoice at the time to come" (Prov 31:25), "laugheth at the time to come"; "laughter" for "laughing" (Job 8:21).

LAVER, lâ'vir ( עֹלָה, ke'dor): Every priest in attendance on the altar of Jch was required to wash in it his hands and his feet before entering 1. in the Tabernacle. To this end a laver was ordered to be made as part of the tabernacle equipment (30:17-21; 38:8). Its composition was of brass (bronze), and it consisted of two parts, the bowl and its pedestal or foot (30:18, etc). This first laver was a small one, and was made of the hand mirrors of the women in attendance upon the altar (38:8). Its place was between the altar and the tabernacle (40:30). See TABERNACLE.

The difficulty as to the washing of parts of the sacrificial carcases was overcome, in the temple of Solomon, by the construction of "10 lavers" and a "molten sea" (1 K 7 23-37; 2 Ch 4 2-6; see II Kings 25). We learn:

2. In the 1844 Temple the priests to wash in—therefore took the place of the laver in the tabernacle—and the lavers were used as baths for portions of the burnt offerings. The lavers themselves were artistic works of unusual merit for that age. Like that in the tabernacle, each had its own stand or base, which was cast in a separate piece from the laver. These bases rested on wheels which allowed the laver being moved from one part of the court to another without being turned about. Five stood on the north and five on the south side of the temple. They were ornamented with "lions, oxen, and cherubim," and on a lower level, with a series of wreaths or festoons of flowers (1 K 7 27-37). In modern speech, the lavers may be described as so many circular open tanks for the storage of water. Each laver contained 40 baths (about 320 gals.) of water. Its height was 5 cubits, the locomotive machinery being 3 cubits in height. The height of the laver, judging from its capacity, about 2 cubits. The last we hear of the lavers, apart from their bases, is that the idolatrous king Ahaz cut off the border of the base and lavers from them (2 K 16 17). During the reign of Jehoiakim, Jeremiah foretold that the molten sea and the bases (there being then no lavers) should be carried to Babylon (Jer 27 19). A few years later it is recorded that the bases were broken up, and the brass of which they were made was carried away (Jer 32 17).

The Gr word (Kérpuy, loutrón) occurs twice in the NT. In Eph 5 26, Paul says that Christ gave Himself for the church "that he might sanctify it, having cleansed it by the washing [Gr "laver"] of regeneration and renewing of the Holy Spirit." In these passages the reference is to the constant physical purity demanded of the Jewish priests when in attendance upon the temple. Christians are "a holy priesthood," and are cleansed not by water only, but, in the former passage, "with the word" (cf Jn 15 3); in the latter, by "the renewing of the Holy Spirit" (Eph 5 25; 1 Jn 3 5). The feet-washing mentioned by Jesus is emblematic of the same thing (Jn 13 10).

LITERATURE

The Gr word for "law" is νόμος, nómo, derived from νόμος, nóm, "to divide," "distribute," "apportion," and generally meant anything established, anything received by usage, a custom, usage, law; in the NT a command, law.

It may not be amiss to note the definition of law given by a celebrated authority in jurisprudence, the late Mr. John Austin: "A law, in the most general and comprehensive acceptance in which the term, in its literal meaning, is employed, may be said to be a rule laid down for the guidance of an intelligent being, by an intelligent being having power over him."

Under this comprehensive definition, he classifies "laws set by God to His human creatures, and laws set by men to men." After analyzing the theologies, he defines the expression of a particular desire; duty or obligation, signifying that one is bound or obliged by the command to pursue a certain course of conduct, and sanction, indicating the evil likely to be incurred by disobedience, as thus summarized: (1) a wish or desire conceived by a rational being that another rational being shall do or forebear; (2) an evil to proceed from the former and to be incurred by the latter in case the latter does or fails to do what is wished; (3) an expression or intimation of the wish by words or other signs." This definition makes it clear that the term "laws of nature" can be used only in a metaphorical sense, the metaphorical application being suggested as follows: Austin shows by the fact that uniformity or stability of conduct is one of the ordinary consequences of a law proper, consequently, "wherever we observe a uniform order of events, or if we find in the objects of phenomena, we are prone to impute that order to a law set by its author, though the case presents us with nothing that can be likened to a sanction or duty." As used in the NT it will be found generally that the term "law" bears the sense indicated by Austin, and includes "command," "duty," and "sanction."

1. Law in the Gospels.—Naturally we first turn to the Gospels, where the word "law" always refers to the Mosaic law, although it has different applications. That law was really threefold: the Moral Law, as summed up in the Decalogue, the Ceremonial Law, prescribing the ritual and all the typical enactment, and what might be called the Civil or Political Law, that relating to the people in their national, political life. The distinction is not closely observed, though sometimes one emphasizes one aspect, sometimes another, but generally the whole law without any discrimination is contemplated. Sometimes the law means the whole OT Scriptures, as in Jn 10 14; 12 24; 15 25. At other times the Law means the Pent, as in Lk 24 44.

The Law frequently appears in the teaching of Christ. In the Sermon on the Mount He refers most specifically and fully to it. It is frequently asserted that He there exposes the imperfection of the Law and sets His own authority against its authority. But this seems to be a superficial and an untenable view. Christ indeed affirms very definitely the authority of the Law: "Think not that I came to destroy the law or the prophets" (Mt 5 17). Here the term would seem to mean the whole of the Pentateuch. "I came not to destroy, but to fulfill. For verily I say unto you, Till heaven and earth pass away, one jot or one title shall in no wise pass away from the law till all things be accomplished" (Mt 5 17 18). A similar utterance is recorded in Lk 16 17: "It is easier for heaven and earth to pass away, than for one tittle of the law to fail." (1)Authority of Law upheld in the Sermon on the Mount.—The perfection and permanence of the Law as well as its authority are thus indicated, and the following verse in Mt still further emphasizes the authority, while showing that now the Lord is speaking specifically of the moral law of the Decalogue: "Whosoever therefore shall break one of these least commandments, and shall not teach men to observe them, but shall sin in the sight of heaven and earth; but whosoever shall do and teach them, he shall be called great in the kingdom of heaven." (5:19.)

These impressive sentences should be borne in mind in considering the utterances that follow, in which the comparison of the Law and His own teaching, and from which has been drawn the inference that He condones and practically abrogates the Law. What Jesus really does is to bring out the fulness of meaning that is in the Law, and to show its spirituality and the wideness of its reach. He declares that the righteousness of His disciples must exceed the righteousness of the scribes and Pharisees (ver 20). Their righteousness consisted largely in a punctilious observance of the external requirements of the Law; the disciples must yield heart of grace to the inner spirit of the Law, its external and internal requirements.

(a) Christ and tradition: Jesus then proceeds to point out the contrast, not so much between His own teaching and that of the Law, as between His interpretation of the Law and the interpretation of other teachers: "Ye have heard that it was said by them of old time" (AV), "to them of old time" (RV) (ver 21). Either rendering is grammatically allowable, but in either case it is evidently not the original utterance of Moses, but the traditional interpretation, which He had in view. "Ye have heard that it was said"; Christ's usual way of quoting the OT is, "It is written" or some other formula pointing to the written Word; and as He had referred to the written Word as a whole, nothing would be strange if He should now use the formula "It was said" in reference to the particular precepts. Evidently He means what was said by the Jewish teachers.

(b) Sin of murder: This is further confirmed by the citation: "Thou shalt not kill: and whosoever shall kill shall be in danger of the judgment." The second clause is not found in the Pent as a distinct statement, but it is clearly the generalization of the teachers. Christ does not set Himself in opposition to Moses; rather does He depose the precepts of the scribes who were sitting in Moses' seat, they truly expound the Law (Mt 23:2), and interpret the Law as they please; and so this command as it only referred to the act of murder, so Christ shows the full and true spiritual meaning of it; "But I say unto you" (ver 22.) to every one who is angry with his brother shall be in danger of the judgment." (ver 22.)

A.D. 27.

(a) Adultery and divorce: Again, "Ye have heard that it was said, Thou shalt not commit adultery" (ver 27). The traditional teaching confined this mainly to the outward act, "But I say unto you," says Christ, "that adulterer pertains even to the lustful thought." (ver 28.) In dealing with this matter He passes to the law of divorce which was one of the civil enactments, and did not stand on the same level with the moral precepts against committing adultery, nay, the very carrying out of the civil provision might lead to a real breach of the moral precept itself. The desire to divest the authority of the precept itself, in the very desire to uphold the authority of the moral law, Christ pronounces against the laws of the scribes and Pharisees. Later on, as recorded in Mt 19:3-6, He was questioned about this same law of divorce, and again He drew a further distinction from the Law by the Jews, and affirms strongly the sanctity of the marriage institution, showing that it was antecedent to the Mosaic law; so again, in the beginning, and derived its binding force from the Divine pronouncement in Genesis 2:24, the nature of things: as to the Mosaic law of divorce, He declares that it was permitted on account of the hardness of their hearts; but in this case, the formulation was sufficiently to discharge the tie. This civil enactment, justified originally by the true moral ideal of the Decalogue, Christ claims authority to transcend, but only so in doing so He would "proclaim the word of God" as said, "Thou shalt not commit adultery." See DIVORCE.

(b) Oaths: The next precept Jesus cites is one partly civil and partly ritual, concerning the taking of oaths. The words are not found in the Pent as a definite enactment; they are rather a gathering up of several utterances (Lev 19:12; Nu 30:2; Dt 23:21), and again in the form of the citation suggests to the hearers a new interpretation that is in question. But the kind of swearing allowed by the law was the very opposite of profane swearing. It was the frequent and natural inference of the duty to respect the authority of that 3d command; He was enforcing its spirituality and claiming the reverence due to the Law by the familiar question, how far the words of Christ bear upon oath-taking in a court of law we need not enter. His own response to the adjuration is variously interpreted. Some practically put upon His oath (Mt 26:63-64); and other instances (as has been drawn from the practice of the civil law) of a ver 18; of a ver 21; of a ver 22; of a ver 23; of a ver 24; and so on. The question of oath-taking (ver 34) offers a suitable place for confirmation and an end of strife. See OATH.

Retaliation: He next touches upon the "law of retaliation": "an eye for an eye" (ver 38), and consistently with our understanding of the other sayings, we think that Jesus is dealing with the traditional interpretation which admitted of personal revenge, of men taking the law into their own hands in their own behalfs. Such a practice Christ utterly condemns, and inculcates instead gentleness and forbearance, the outcome of love even toward enemies. The Christian, having no grudge, finds place among the Mosaic provisions, but it is a place that appears there, not as it stands in its literal sense, but as it stands itself in its own way, but as a political enactment to be carried out by the magistrates and so to disconnectenance private revenge. Christ shows the Gospel received by His people would supersede the necessity for these requirements of the civil code; although His words are not to be interpreted quite literally, for He Himself when smitten on the one cheek did not turn the other to the stroke. However, the principle of the law of retaliation still holds good in the legislative procedure of all associations, and according to the NT teaching, will find place even in the Divine procedure in the day of judgment. See also Forbearance.

(c) Love to neighbors; love of enemies: The last saying mentioned in the Sermon is the clinical character: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor, and hate thine enemy" (Mt 5:43). The first part is indeed the injunction of the Law, the second part is an unwarrantable addition to it. It is only a part that Christ virtually condones when He says, "But I say unto you, Love your enemies." (ver 44.) That the interpretation of these teachers was unwarrantable may be seen from many passages in the Pent, the Prophets and the Psalms, which set forth the moral aspect of the Law's requirement; and as to this point, Christ does not refer only to Prov 25:21,22, "If thine enemy be hungry, give him bread to eat." Christ while condemning the addition unfolds the spirit of the precept itself, for the love of neighbor rightly interpreted involves love of enemies; and so on in the various applications. (ver 37) He answers the lawyer's question, "Who is my neighbor?" by the parable of the Good Samaritan, showing that everyone in need is our neighbor. See also Forgiveness; Wrath.

The last reference in the Sermon on the Mount to the Law fully bears out the idea that Christ really upheld the authority while elucidating the spirituality of the Law, for He declares that the principle embodied in the "Golden Rule" is a deduction from, is, indeed, the essence of, "the law and the prophets" (Mt 7:12).

(2) Other references to the Law in the teaching of Christ.—We can say, save that formation next.

In Mt 11:13, "For all the prophets and the law prophesied until John," the Law in its teaching capacity is in view, and perhaps the whole of the Pent is meant. In Mt 12:1-8, in rebutting the right against His disciples of breaking the Sabbath, He cites the case of David and his men eating the showbread, which it was not lawful for any but the priests to partake of; and of the priests doing work on the Sabbath day contrary to the letter of the Law; from which He deduces the conclusion that the ritual laws may be set aside under stress of necessity and for a higher good. In that same chapter (vs 10-13) He indicates the lawfulness of healing—doing good—on the Sabbath day.
(a) Traditions of the elders and the 5th commandment: In Mt 16:1-6 we have the account of the Pharisees complaining that the disciples transgressed the traditions of the elders by eating with unwashed hands. Jesus retorts upon them with the question: “Why do ye also transgress the commandment of God because of your tradition? For God said, ‘Honor thy father and thy mother,’ and, ‘Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself.’”

(b) Christ’s answer to the young ruler: To the young ruler (Mt 19:16-22) He presents the commandments as the rule of life, obedience to which is the door to eternal life, especially emphasizing the man’s concern for his immortality. The young man, professing to have kept them all, shows that he has not grasped the spirituality of their requirements, and it is further to test him that Christ calls upon him to make the “great renumeration” (or all, i.e., an additional command so much as the unfolding of the spiritual and far-reaching character of the command, “Love thy neighbor as thyself.”

(c) Christ’s answer to the lawyer: To the lawyer which He is the great commandment in the Law, He answers by giving him the sum of the whole moral law. “Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul, and with all thy mind. This is the great and first commandment.” And a second like unto this (Mt 22:35-39). In Mark’s report (Mk 12:31), He adds, “There is none other commandment greater than these.”

(d) References in the Fourth Gospel: In His discourses He had recorded in Jn 7, He charges them with failure to keep the Law: “Did not Moses give you the law, and yet none of you doth the law?” (ver 19). And referring to the healing of the impotent man on the Sabbath day, a deed which has, He shows how one law was in conflict with another. Moses had enjoined circumcision, and sometimes the time for circumcision would fall on the Sabbath day. Yet with all their reverence for the Sabbath day, they would, in order to keep the law of circumcision, perform the operation on the Sabbath day, and so, He argues, it is unreasonable to complain of Him because on the Sabbath day He had fulfilled the higher law of doing good, healing a poor sufferer. In none of all Christ’s utterances is there an slight throw upon the Law itself; it is always held up as the standard of right and its authority vindicated.

The passages we have considered show the place of the Law in the teaching of Christ, but we also find that He had to sustain the practical relation to that Law. Born under the Law, becoming part of a nation which honored and venerated the Law, every part of whose life was externally regulated by it, the life of Jesus Christ could not fail to be affected by that Law. We note its operation:

(1) In His infancy. —On the eighth day He was circumcised (Lk 2:21), thus being recognized as a member of the covenant nation, partaking of its privileges, assured of its blessings. He is, according to the ritual law of purification, He is presented in the temple to the Lord (Lk 2:22-24), while His mother offers the sacrifice enjoined in the “law of the Lord,” the sacrifice she brings pathetically witnessing to her poverty, “a pair of turtle doves, or two young pigeons” being the only gifts allowed to those who were not able to provide a lamb (Lev 12). The Divine approval is set upon this consecrating act, for it is while it is being done concerning Him after “the custom of the law” (ver 27), that the Spirit of God comes upon Him, and Harps the Christ prophesy which links all the Messianic hopes with the Babe of Bethlehem.

Again, according to the Law His parents go up to the Passover feast when the wondrous child has reached His 12th year, the age when a youthful man assumed legal responsibility, in “being a son of the Law,” and so Jesus participates in the festal observances, and His deep interest in all that concerns the temple-worship and the teaching of the Law is shown by His absorption in the conversation of the doctors, whose questions He answers so intelligently, while questioning them in turn, and filling them with astonishment at His understanding (Lk 2:41-47).

(2) In His ministry. —In His ministry He ever honors the Law, and He is, in fact, His “curse” to the Pharisees contradicting them. He heals the leper by His sovereign touch and word, but He bids him go and show himself to the priest and offer the gift that Moses commanded (Mt 8:4). And again, when the lepers appeal to Him, He refuses to accept what implies the healing of the unclean (Lk 17:14). He drives out of the temple those that defile it (Mt 21:12-13; Jn 2:15-17), because of His zeal for the honor of His Father’s house, and, so, while showing His authority, emphasizes the independence of the temple and its services. So, while claiming to be the Son in the Father’s house, and therefore above the injunctions laid upon the servants and strangers, He nevertheless pays the temple-tax exacted from every son of Israel (Mt 17:24-27). He attends the various feasts during His ministry, and when the shadows of death are gathering round Him, He takes special pains to observe the Passover with His disciples. Thus to the ceremonial law He renders continuous obedience, the motto of His life practically being His great utterance to the Baptist: “Suffer it now: for thus it becometh us to fulfill all righteousness” (Mt 3:15). If He obeyed the ceremonial law, unquestionably He obeyed the moral law. His foremost concern was the spiritual well-being of men. His mission is for the forgiveness of sins, and He offers forgiveness to all, and this He does on account of His life, and this He does because the Law and the prophets bear witness to Him, Acts 15:8-9). He is the Son and the Teacher of the Law.

We enter not upon the theological question as to the relation of the death of Christ to the penal inflictions of the Law Divinity enforced on behalf of sinners—that touches the doctrine of the Atonement—we only note the fact that in Relation to the Death of Christ, His death was brought about in accordance with the Law. The chief priests, in hatred, sent officers to take Christ, but overawed by His matchless eloquence, those officers returned empty-handed. In their chargers, the chief priests can only say that the people who follow Him know not the Law, and are cursed (Jn 7:48). Nevertheless, on this occasion, ventured to remonstrate: “Dost our law judge a man, except it first hear him himself?” (ver 51). This sound legal principle these men are bent on disregarding: their one desire is to put an end to the life of this man, who has aroused their hatred, and at last when they get Him into their hands, they strain the forms of the Law to accomplish their purpose. There is no real charge that can be brought against Him. They dare not bring up the plea that He broke the Sabbath, for again they would incur their own condemnation on that score. He has broken no law: all the things they can do is to bring false witnesses to testify something to His discredit. The trumpety charge is founded upon a distorted reminiscence of His utterance about destroying the temple, through its trains according to the ritual law of purification, He is presented in the temple to the Lord (Lk 2 22-24), while His mother offers the sacrifice enjoined in the

(1) Christ charged with blasphemy in relation to the Jewish law. —Then the high priest adjures Him to say upon oath whether He be the Son of the Living God. Such a claim would assuredly, if unfounded, be blasphemy, and according to the Law, be punishable by death. On a previous occasion the Jews threatened to stone Him for this—to them—blasphemy was the most unfounded charge of all. He is the Son of God, the high priest, rendering his clothes, declaring himself the high priest of an unchangeable sanctuary. He is the Son of Man, the high priest, who has put upon him the garments of the high priest, who is the Lord’s sacrifice. Do not, therefore, believe a word spoken by any unbeliever, who claims Him worthy of death (Mt 26; Mk 14; Lk 22). If you then believe that He claimed to be, then the high priests were right in holding Him guilty of blasphemy; it now remains for you to consider whether the claim after all might not be true.

(2) Christ charged with treason under the Roman law— New Testament law has to do with the ceremonial law involved in the resurrection of Christ, as, of course, the Roman law was involved in the crucifixion of Christ, but also the Rom law. On one other occasion Christ had come into touch with the law of Rome, viz. in the striking of the Jews by the Herodians as to the lawfulness of giving tribute to Caesar (Mt 22 17). According to the Jews, only the Jews need to consider the law made by Rom governor for the death penalty, and Jesus must be tried before him. The charge cannot now be blasphemy, for the Roman law has nothing to say to that—and so they trump up a charge of treason against Jesus.

In preparing it, they practically renounce their Messianic hopes. The charge, however, breaks down before the ceremonial, and only by playing on the weakness of Pilate do they gain their end, and the Roman law decrees His death, while leaving the Jews to see to the carrying out of the sentence. In this the evangelist sees the fullness of Christ’s words concerning the manner of His death: “And they had to be done which the law of Moses commanded, saying: ‘Thou shalt not counterfeit the mark of God.’ He fulfilled the ceremonial law which He had not fulfilled as a Jew before.”

2. Law in All Its Parts

Looking at the whole testimony of the Gospels, we can see how He was the Law fulfilled to the letter. He fulfilled the moral law by obeying, by bringing out its fullness of meaning, by showing its intense spirituality, and by establishing it on a sureer basis than ever as the eternal law of righteousness. He fulfilled the ceremonial and typical law, not only by conforming to its requirements, but by realizing its spiritual significance. He fulfilled the shadowy outlines of the types, and the Law was fulfilled. The essential distinction between meats clean and unclean was no longer necessary, but showed the importance of true spiritual purity (Mt 15 11; Mk 7 18-23). He taught His disciples those great principles, when, after giving the law to the Jews from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself” (Lk 24 27). And as He opened their mind that they might understand the Scriptures, He declared, “Not Moses spoke, but as it is written in all the law and the prophets, concerning me” (Lk 24 44). John sums up this in his pregnant phrase, “The law was given through Moses; grace and truth came through Jesus Christ” (Jn 1 17). The grace was in contrast to the condemnation of the moral law, the truth was the antithesis to the shadowy outline of the types and ceremonies.

3. Allusions by the magistrates of Philippi, to the he is afterward offered the oppor

Roman Law tunity of quietly slipping away, but standing on his dignity as a Roman citizen, he demands that the magistrates themselves, who had violated the law by publicly honoring uncondemned Romans, should come and set them free. This same right as a Roman citizen Paul again asserts when about to be scourged by the command of the centurion (22 25), and his protest is successful in averting the indignity. His trial before the emperor Festus well illustrates the procedure under the Roman law, and his appeal, as a Roman citizen, to Caesar had important results in his life.
III. Law in the Epistles.—The word is used both with and without the article, but though in some cases the substantive without the article refers to law in general, yet in many other cases it undoubtedly refers to the Law of Moses. Perhaps, as has been suggested, it is that, where it does refer to the Mosaic Law, the word without the article points to that law, not so much as Mosaic, but in its quality as law. But speaking generally, the word with and without the article is used in reference to the Law of Moses.

1. In Romans

1. Romans

(1) Law as a standard.—In Rom Paul has much to say about law, and in the main it is the moral law that he has in view. In this great ep., written to people at the center of the famous legal system of Rome, many of them Jews versed in the law of Moses and others Gentiles familiar with the idea of law, its nature, its scope and its sway, he first speaks of the Law as a standard, want of conformity to which brings condemnation. He shows that the Gentiles who had not the standard of the revealed Law nevertheless had a law, the law of Nature, a law written upon their heart and conscience. Rome, therefore, was familiar with the conception of a law of nature, which became a law of nations (ius gentium), so that certain principles could be assumed as obtaining among those who had not the knowledge of the Roman code; and in accordance with these principles, both Romans and barbarians could be regulated. Paul's conception is somewhat similar, but is applied to the spiritual relations of man and God.

(2) Gentiles condemned by the law of nature.—By law in general, yet in many other places the light of that law, are condemned. They have violated the dictates of their own conscience. And the Jews, with the fuller light of their revealed law, have equally failed. In this connection Paul incidentally lays down the great principle that "Not the hearers of the law are just before God, but the doers of the law shall be justified" (Rom 2 13). His great aim, in the ep., is to show that justification is by faith, but he here asserts that if anyone would have justification through law, then he must keep that law in all its details. The Law will pronounce the doer of it justified, but the mere hearing of the Law without doing it will only increase the condemnation. "As many as have sinned without the law shall none the less be judged; and as many as have sinned under the law shall be judged by the law" (2 12). Paul does not pronounce upon the question whether a Gentile may be saved by following the light of Nature; he rather emphasizes the negative side that those who have failed shall perish; they have light enough to condemn, is his point.

(3) All men under condemnation.—Having proved that both Jews and Gentiles are under sin, he closes his ep. with an appeal to repentance, "Who shall come to those that are under the law; that every mouth may be stopped, and all the world may be brought under the judgment of God" (3 19). Thus the Law shuts up into condemnation. It is impossible for any sinner to be justified "by the works of the law"; the Law not only condemns but "through the law cometh the knowledge of sin" (3 20). It shows how far short men have come of God's requirements. It is a mirror in which the sinner sees his filthiness, but the mirror cannot cleanse, though it shows the need of cleansing.

(4) The redeeming work of Christ providing righteousness apart from the Law.—Then setting forth the great redemption of Jesus Christ, the apostle shows that it provides a righteousness which can satisfy the requirements of the Law; a righteousness that is indeed "apart from the law," apart from all men's attempts to keep the Law, but is nevertheless in deepest harmony with the principles of the Law, and has been witnessed "by the law and the prophets" (3 21). (In this passage the "law" seems to mean the Pentateuch, and in ver 19, in view of the preceding citations from the Ps, it appears to mean the whole OT Scriptures.) Since the righteousness secured by Christ comes upon the sinner through faith, manifestly the works of the Law can have nothing to do with our obtaining of it. But so far is faith-righteousness from undermining the Law, that Paul claims that through faith the Law is established (3 31).

(5) Abraham's blessings came not through the Law.—Proceeding to show that his idea of justification by faith was no new thing, that the OT saint had enjoyed it, he particularly shows that Abraham, even in his uncircumcised state, received the blessing through faith; and the great promise to him and his seed did not come through the Law, but on the principle of faith.

(6) Law worketh wrath and intensifies the evil of sin.—Indeed, the blessing coming to sinners by way of the Law, the "law worketh wrath" (4 15); not wrath in men against the Law's restrictions as some have argued, but the holy wrath of God so frequently mentioned by the apostle in this ep. The Law worked wrath, inasmuch as when disobeyed it brings on the sinner the Divine disapproval, condemnation; it enhances the guilt of sin, and so intensifies the Divine wrath against it; and it, in a sense, provokes to it: the sinful nature rebels against it to the utmost on the ground that it is the very fact of a thing being forbidden arouses the desire for it. This seems what he means in a subsequent passage (5 20), "And the law came in besides, that the trespass might abound"; as if the very multiplying of restrictions intensified the tendency to sin, brought out the evil in human nature, showed the utter vileness of the sinful heart and the terrible nature of sin, and thus made the need for salvation appear the greater, the very desperation of the disease showing the need for the remedy and creating the desire for it; the abounding of sin preparing the way for the superabundance of grace. That the presence of Law enhances the evil of sin is further shown by the statement, "But as many as have sinned under the law, and there transgression" (4 15); transgression—pardonability—the crossing of the boundary, is, in the strictest sense, only possible under law. But there may be sin apart from a revealed law, as he has already proved in the 2d chapter.

(7) Law in the light of the parallel between Adam and Christ.—In the 5th chapter, dealing with the parallel between Adam and Christ he says: "For until the law was in the world; but sin is not chargeable upon men, except they be taught by the law" (5 13). He cannot mean that men were not held responsible for their sin, or that sin was not in any sense reckoned to their account, for he has in that 2d chapter proved the opposite; but sin was not so imputed to them as to bring upon them the punishment of death, which they nevertheless did suffer, and that is traced by him to the sin of Adam. These, he says, had not sinned after the likeness of Adam's transgression (ver 14); they had not transgressed a positive command as he did, although they had undoubtedly violated the law, if he knew that they were sinners. In drawing out the parallel between Adam and Christ, he plainly indicates that as Adam's transgression of law brought condemnation on the race, so Christ's obedience to the Law brings the Law its justification.

(8) Law and righteousness.—So far he may be said to have spoken of the Law in regard to the sinner; and it is mainly the Law in its judicial aspect, the Law in relation to righteousness. The Law reveals righteousness, the Law demands righteousness, the Law condemns for unrighteousness. Redemption is a working out of righteousness. The Law witnesses to the perfect righteousness of Christ. The righteousness secured by Christ meets all the requirements of the Law, while gloriously transcending it. The righteous penalty of the Law has been borne by Christ; the righteous requirements of the Law have been fulfilled apart from the condemnation of the Law. "He that hath died is justified from sin" (6:7). But though in one aspect the believer is dead, in another he is alive. He dies with Christ, but he rises spiritually with Him. Thus, "withal he spiritually alive he is "to yield," "to present" his "members as instruments of righteousness unto God" (13:13), and for his comfort he is assured that in this new sphere of life sin shall not have power to bring him under the condemnation of the Law. "Sin, holy, not the dominion over you: for ye are not under law, but under grace" (6:14). His relationship to the Law has been altered through his union with Christ, and this fact the apostle proceeds to illustrate. He enumerates the death of the believer as "the last of a man for so long as he liveth" (7:1). Death dissolves all legal objections. The believer, spiritually dead, is not under the dominion of the Law.

(10) Illustrated by the law of the husband.—The specific case is then given of a married woman bound by law to her husband, but freed from that law through his death, and in the application, he says, "wherefore, my brethren, ye are dead to the law through the body of Christ" (7:4). If the Law in this metaphorical description is the husband who has the woman as his wife, as has been humorously understood by commentators, then the application is based on the general thought of death dissolving all claims of dominion over one. The marriage law involves the death of the husband as well as the wife, and so he can speak of the death of the believer rather than of the death of the law. Another explanation of the metaphor is that the old sinful state is the husband to which the ego, with its dominion over the soul, is bound, the sinful state being brought to death through Christ. The personality is free to enter into union with Christ. Whatever view is adopted, the leading thought of the apostle is clear, that through the death of Christ the believer is free from the Law: "but now we have been discharged from the law, having died to that wherein we were held" (6:6).

(11) The purity and perfection of the Law in its own sphere.—The question is then raised, "Is the law sin?" (ver. 7). The thought is repudiated as unthinkable, but he goes on to show how the law was related to sin, giving from his own experience the exemplification of what he has said in the 3d chapter, that by the Law is the knowledge of sin. The Law revealed his sin; the Law aroused the opposition of his nature, and through the working of sin under the prohibition of the Law, he found the tendency to be death. Nevertheless, there is no doubt in his mind that the Law is not responsible for the sin, the Law is not in any manner to be blamed as defiled, as holy, as holy, just, and good (ver. 12). Sin in the light of the holy Law is shown to be exceeding sinful, and the Law itself is known to be spiritual.

We need not deal with the difficult passage that follows concerning the inner conflict. There has always been much discussion as to whether this is a conflict in the soul of the unregenerate man or of the regenerate—we believe it is in the regenerate, setting forth the experience of the believer—but whatever view is taken, it is clear that the law cannot bring deliverance; the higher part of man's nature, the regenerate nature according to the interpretation one adopts, may "consent unto the law that it is good" (ver.16), may even "delight in the law of God" (ver. 22), but there is another law at work, the law of sin in the members of Christ. This law means captivity and wretchedness from which deliverance can only come through Jesus Christ (vs 23-25). The word "law" in these verses is used in the sense of principle, "the law of my mind," "the law of sin," "the law in my members," but over against all is the law of God.

(12) Freedom from the penal claims of the Law.—The description of the Law as holy, righteous and good, as spiritual, as the object of delight to a true heart, is enough to show that the delivery which the Christian of our generation has received from the condemnation and condemning power of the Law. This is borne out by the excusing conclusion: "There is therefore now no condemnation to them that are in Christ Jesus," (8:1). The Law, which by Christ, no longer press upon those who are in Him. When the apostle adds, "For the law of the Spirit of life in Christ Jesus made me free from the law of sin and of death" (8:2), he is using "law" in the general sense as a principle or power of producing ordered action, and "the law of the Spirit of life" may be taken to mean the method of the Spirit's working, and indeed may well be a way of describing the gospel itself—the new law, through which the Spirit operates. The other phrase, "law of sin and death," is not to be construed as putting the law on a level with Moses, but the law, the principle of sin producing death mentioned in the previous chapter, unless we think of it as the holy Law which gives the knowledge of sin and brings the condemnation of death. The failure of the Law to produce a satisfactory result is definitely attributed to the weakness of the flesh, which is in effect reflecting the statement of the previous chapter, but all that the Law could not accomplish was accomplished by the death of Christ. In Christ sin is condemned, and in those who are brought into union with Him the righteousness of the Law is fulfilled.

(13) The Law remains as a rule of life for the believer.—Thus the Law is not abrogated. It remains as the "law of the Spirit of life" for believers. The utmost holiness to which they can attain under the influence of the Holy Spirit, is still the "righteousness" which the Law requires. That the apostle's teaching is far removed from Antinomianism is shown, not only by all that he says in these chapters about the believer's new life of absolute spiritual service, but by the specific statement in Rom. 13:8-10, which at once prescribes the commandments as rules of life (in Eph. 6:2 he cites and enforces the 5th commandment) and shows how true obedience is possible. "Owe no man anything, save to love one another; for he that loveth his neighbor hath fulfilled the law." Then, after specifying several of the commands, he declares that these and all other commands are "summed up in this word, namely, Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself." The man in Christ has found the true principle of obedience. He has entered into the true spirit of the holy law. That spirit is all summed up in the love of Jesus Christ, the love of Christ, living in His love, sees the Law not as a stern taskmaster condemning, but as a bright vision alluring. He indeed sees the Law embodied in Christ, and the imitation of Christ involves obedience to the Law, but he fulfills the Law not simply as a standard outside, but as a living principle within. Acting according to the dictates of the love begotten at the cross, his life is conformed to the moral law by the power of the Spirit of Christ; but here we may take the Law as a whole, including all the ceremonial and typical observances which were designed to lead the people to Christ.

(4) The bondage of the Law.—But while there was undoubtedly much of privilege for the people under the Mosaic dispensation, there was also something of bondage. And so Paul says, “We were kept in ward under the law” (ver 23), and in the next chapter, he speaks of the child, though heir to a great estate, being “under guardians and stewards until the day appointed of the father” (4 2), which seems to be the same thought as under the pedagogue, and this he calls a state of “bondage” (ver 3). The Law guarded and tutored and restrained; the great typical observances, though foreshadowing the grace of the gospel, were yet, in their details, irksome and burdensome, and the mass of rules as to every part of the Jew’s conduct proved to be, speaking after the present-day manner, a system of red tape. Little was left to the free, spontaneous action of the soul; the whole course of the Jew from the cradle to the grave was carefully marked out.

(5) Sonship and its freedom from the Law’s restrictions. But in the fulness of time “God sent forth his Son, born of a woman, born under the law, that he might redeem them that are under the law, that we might receive the adoption of sons” (4 4). The gospel of the grace of God embodied in Christ shows its gracious character in that it not only answers the requirements of the moral law and removes its condemnation: fulfils, and by fulfilling abrogates the typical observer of the ceremonial law, but also abolishes all the directions and restrictions given to the Jews as a separate people, and brings its subjects into a condition of liberty where the renewed spirit under the mighty love of Christ can act spontaneously, the great principles of the moral law remaining as its guide, while the minute rules needed for the infancy of the race are no longer apposite for the “to be dead in the flesh, but alive to God through faith in Christ Jesus” (3 20). And so Paul warns these Christians against turning back to the “weak and beggarly rudiments” and observing “months, and seasons, and years” (4 9,10).

In the remaining Ep. of Paul, little is said of the Law, and we need only indicate the connections in which the word occurs. In 1 Cor 7 39 there is a reference to the wife being bound by the law as long as her husband liveth” (AV). The word “law,” Epistles however, is omitted from the critical texts and from RV. In the same ep. (9 8:9; 14 21.34) the word is used of the Pent or the Scriptures as a whole. In 9 20 Paul refers to his practice of seeking to win men to Christ by accommodating himself to their standpoint, “to those who are under the law, as under the law”; and in 15 56 occurs the pregnant statement, an echo of Rom, “The power of sin is the law.” In 2 Cor the word does not occur, though the legal system is referred to as the ministration of death, in contrast to the gospel ministration of the Spirit (ch 3). The word “law” is once used in Eph (2 15), in reference to the work of Christ not only producing harmony between God and man, but between Jew and Gentile: “abolished in his flesh the enmity of commandments contained in ordinances,” also spoken of as “the middle wall of partition,” and referring esp. to the ceremonial enactments.

In Phil 3 5,6,9 we have the fine autobiographical passage wherein we see the self-righteous Pharisee... system was really a system of grace at the heart of it; in spite of its external rubrics which might well be abused, it made provision for satisfying for the time the breaches of the law; the sacrifices themselves could not take away sin, but periodical sacrifices were made in contrast to the physical, the blotting out through the work of the cross, of the bond written in ordinances and the consequent deliverance of the believer from the bondage of ceremonial observances (211-17), though the eternal ined of the law was to come," Christ being the glorious substance. In 1 Tim 189, we have the two pregnant statements that "the law is good, if a man use it lawfully," and that "law is not made for a righteous man, but for the lawless."

The word "law" occurs 14 times in this ep., and a great deal of attention is given to the subject, but it is generally the law in its ceremonial and typical aspect that is in question.

4. In the Epistle to the Hebrews

It is not necessary to look at the matter in detail, but simply to indicate the line of teaching.

(1) Harmony with the Pauline teaching.—The ancient doubt as to the authorship of the ep. seems today to have crumbled away. Incarnation, the ground for a conclusion are no stronger than formerly, but in the desire to ascribe the ep. to Paul, too much emphasis is perhaps laid upon the supposed un-Pauline character of the teaching. There is, after all, profound harmony between the teaching of the Pauline Ep. and the Pauline teaching of the Law, and the harmony applies to this matter as of the Law. (Gal 35; Col 217) are exactly in line with the teaching of the Law.

(2) The Law transcended by the gospel.—The author shows how the Law, which was a word spoken through angels, is transcended by the gospel, which has been spoken by the Lord of angels, and so demands greater reverence (He 22-4), and all through the ep. it is the transcendent glory of the gospel dispensation introduced by Christ and ascribed to Him, which is made to shine before us.

(3) Law of Mosaic priesthood.—The author deals specifically in chs. 7 and 8 with the law of priesthood, showing that Christ's Priesthood, "after the order of Melchisedek," surpasses in glory that of the Aaronic priesthood under the law; not only surpasses but supersedes it; the imperfect and inadequate to the perfect; the shadowy to the real; the earthly to the heavenly; the temporal to the eternal. And as Paul justifies his doctrine of justification apart from the deeds of the Law by reference to the OT teaching, so here he deals with the Mosaic Law, and his argument is that Christ makes good all that the tabernacle and its services typified, that His one, all-perfect eternal sacrifice takes the place of the many imperfect temporary sacrifices offered under the Law. At the best the Law had "a shadow of the good things to come" (101). The shadow was useful for the time being, the people were greatly privileged in having it, it directed them to the great Figure who cast the shadow. The whole ceremonial

James mentions the "law" 10 times in his ep., and in each case it is the moral law. The influence of the Sermon on the Mount is seen throughout the ep., and some distinct echoes of it are heard, as e.g. the injunction, "Swear not at all" (612). James has been described as the law teacher, and that fact in the light of the influence of the Sermon on the Mount is enough to show that, in that wonderful discourse, did not disregarde the Law, far less abrogate it, but rather exalted and reinforced it. The fundamentals taught by Christ exalt the Law, glorify it, in fact seems almost to identify it with the gospel, for in ch 1, when speaking of the Word and the importance of hearing and doing it, he in the same breath speaks of looking into "the perfect law, the law of liberty," and indeed, it is just possible, as some think, that he means the gospel by the epittle, although it seems better to take it as the Law itself in the gospel, the Law looked at in its spirituality, as the guide of the Christian man who has entered into the spirit of it.

Even in the OT, as Pss 19 and 119 specifically show, it was possible for spiritually-minded men to see the beauty of the Law and find delight in its precepts. In 28 he speaks of the "royal law," and shows that here he does not deal specifically with the Mosaic Law, but with the Ten Commandments, and the great law: "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself," in this agreeing with his Master and with Paul, finding in love of neighbor the sum of the Law and its true fulfillment. Rest is given place to this kingdom which is the true fulfillment of this "royal law," and leads to those indulging in it being "convicted" by the law of transgression (ver 9). He then affirms the solidarity of the Law, so that a breach of it in one particular is a breach of the whole, and makes a man "guilty of all" (ver 10), a far-reaching principle which Paul had also indicated when quoting in Gal the words, "Cursed is every one who continueth not in all things that are written in the book of the law, to do them" (Gal 310), and when in Rom 7 he showed that the conviction that he had broken the 10th commandment made him realize that he had broken the whole Law. James then exhorts his readers to speak and act as those who are to be judged by "a law of liberty" (212), so that he sets no limit to the range of that law. Finally, in 411, he warns them by implication against speaking against the Law or judging the Law, that is, to assume the place of judge instead of "doer of the law." James could not have used such language unless he had a profound conviction of the perfection of the Law, and it is the perfection of the Law as a rule of life for spiritual men redeemed from its condemnation that James considers it, and so we can call it the perfect law, the law of liberty, the Royal Law.
In the Epp. of Peter and John, the word “law” does not occur, but Peter shows that the holiness of God remains as in the Pent.
6. In the standard of life, and the example of Epistles of Christ shows the way (1 Pet 2 21), while in the church is found the spiritual realization of the sanctuary, priesthood and sacrifice of the old economy (1 Pet 2 5–9). Peter has one reference to the Rom law, enjoining upon his readers obedience to it in the political sphere. John enjoins the keeping of the commandments, these being apparently the commandments of Christ (1 Jn 2 3, 4; 5 2), and the test of keeping the commandments is love of the brethren, while hatred of a brother is, as in the Sermon on the Mount, murder. All sin is “lawlessness” (3 4), and the sum of all law-keeping is love of God and love of the brethren, and so the summary of the old Law is echoed and endorsed.

IV. THE PASSING AWAY OF THE LAW

LITERATURE

Law, at least as custom, certainly existed among the Hebrews in the times before Moses, as appears from numerous allusions to it, both in matters civil and ceremonial, in the earlier Scriptures. But we have no distinct account of such law, either as to its full contents or its enactment.

Law in the OT practically means the Law promulgated by Moses (having its roots no doubt in this earlier law or custom), with sundry later modifications or additions, rules as to which have been inserted in the record of the Mosaic Law.

The following are matters of pre-Mosaic law or custom to which allusion is made in Gen and Ex: the offering of sacrifices and the use of altars (Gen passim); the religious use of pillar (Gen 28 18); purification for sacrifice (35 2); tithes (14 20; 28 22); circumcision (17 10; Ex 4 25); inquiry at a sanctuary (Gen 25 22); sacred feast (Ex 5 1 etc); priest (Ex 19 20); sacred oath (Gen 14 22); custom of anointing (16 18; 25 6; 28 6–30); birthright (31 30–34); elders (24 2; 60 7; Ex 3 16); homicide (Gen 9 6), etc. We proceed on to the Law of Moses.

I. TERMS USED.

The Hebrew word rendered “law” in our Bibles is תָּׂרָאָה, tōrāh. Other synonymous words either denote (as indeed does tōrāh itself) aspects under which the Law may be regarded, or different classes of law.

Tōrāh is from torāh, the Hiphil of yārāh. The root meaning is “to throw”; hence in Hiphil the word means “to point out” (as by throwing out the hand); “direct”; and tōrāh is “direction.”

Tōrāh may be simply “human direction,” as the “law of thy mother” in Prov 1 8; but most often in the OT it is the Divine law. In the sin, it often means a law, the pl. being used in the same sense; but more frequently tōrāh in the OT is the general body of Divinely given law. The word tells nothing as to the way in which the Law, or any part of it, was first given; it simply points out the general purpose of the Law, viz. that it was for the guidance of God’s people in the various matters to which it relates. This shows that the end of the Law lay beyond the mere obedience to such and such rules, that end being instruction in the knowledge of God and of men’s relation to Him, and guidance in living as the children of such a God as He revealed Himself to be. This is dwelt upon in the later Scriptures, notably in Pss 19 and 119.

In the completed Canon of the OT, tōrāh technically denotes the Pent (Lk 24 44) as being that division of the OT Scriptures which contains the text of the Law, and its history down to the death of Moses, the great lawgiver.

(1) Miqwa˒ (“command” or, in pl., “commands”), is a term applied to the Law as indicating that it is laid upon men as the expression of God’s will, and therefore that it must be obeyed.

2. SYNONYMS OF TORAH

(2) Edah, “witness” or “testimony” (in pl. “testimonies”), is a designation of God’s law as testing the guidance of His dealings with His people. So the ark of the covenant is called the “ark of the testimony” (Ex 25 22), as containing the “testimony” (ver 16), i.e. the tables of the Law upon which the covenant was based. The above terms are general, applying to the tōrāh at large; the two next following are of more restricted application.

(3) Mihraph, “judgments”: Mihraph in the sing., sometimes means judgment in an abstract sense, as in Gen 18 19; Dt 32 4; and designates the act of judging, as in Dt 16 18; 17 9; 24 17. But “judgments” (in the pl.) is a term constantly used in connection with, and distinction from, statutes, to indicate laws of a particular kind, viz. laws which, though forming part of the tōrāh by virtue of divine sanction, originated in decisions of judges upon cases brought before them for judgment. See further below.

(4) Hukkim, “statutes” (lit. “laws engraved”), are laws immediately enacted by a lawgiver. “Judgments and statutes” together comprise the whole law (Lev 18 3; Dt 4 18 AV). So also we now distinguish between consuetudinary and statute law.

(5) Pikkadhim, “precepts” This term is found only in the Ps. It seems to mean rules or counsels provided to suit the various circumstances in which men may be placed. The term may perhaps be meant to apply both to the rules of the actual tōrāh, and to others found, e.g. in the writings of prophets and “wise men.”

II. THE WRITTEN RECORD OF THE LAW.

The enactment of the Law and its committal to writing must be distinguished. With regard to the former, it is distinctly stated (Jn 5 37) that “the law was given through Moses”; and though this does not necessarily imply that every regulation found in the synoptic is his, a large number of the laws are expressly ascribed to him. As regards the latter, we are distinctly told that Moses wrote certain laws or collections of laws (Ex 17 14; 24 4-7; Dt 31 9). These, however, form only a portion of the whole legislation; and therefore, whether the remaining portions were written by Moses, or— if not by him —when and by whom, is a legitimate matter of inquiry.

It is not necessary here to discuss the large question of the literary history of the Pent, but it must briefly be touched upon. The Pent certainly appears to have reached its present form by the gradual piling together of diverse materials. Dt being the most separated composition which it seems to have been clearly established by critical examination between a number of paragraphs in the remaining books which apparently must once have formed a narrative by themselves, and other paragraphs, partly narrative but chiefly legislative and statistical, which appear to have been subsequently added. Without endorsing any of the critical theories as to the relation of these, one to the other, or as to the dates of their composition, we may, in a general way, accept the analysis, and adopt the well-known symbol JE to distinguish the former, and P the latter. Confining ourselves to their legislative contents, we find in JE a short but very important body of law, the Law of the Covenant, formulated in full in Ex 19-20, and repeated full to a portion of it in Ex 34 10-28. All the rest of the legislation is contained in P and Dt.

We are distinctly told in Ex that the law contained in Ex 20-23 was given through Moses. Rejecting this statement, critics of the school of Wellhausen affirm that its true date must be placed considerably later than the time of Joshua. They maintain that previous to their conquest of Canaan the Israelites were mere nomads, ignorant of the practice of which, as well as their culture in general, they first learned from the conquered Canaanites. Therefore (so they argue), as the law of Ex 20-23 presupposes the practice of agriculture, it cannot have been promulgated until some time in the period of the Judges at the earliest; they place it indeed in the early period of the monarchy. All this, however, is mere assumption, support for which is claimed in some passages in which a shepherd life is suggested, or in certain passages which show that both in the patriarchal period and in Egypt the Israelites also cultivated land. See B. D. Ehrman, "Have the Hebrews Been Nomads?" Expos, August and October, 1908. It can indeed be shown that this law was throughout in harmony with what must have been the customs and conceptions of the Israelites at the age of the exodus (Rule, OT Institutions). Professor Ehrman's in his "Allgemeine Studien, Part III (1910), vigorously defends the Mosaic origin of the Book of the Covenant.

The same critics bring down the date of the legislation of Dt to the time of Josiah, or at most a few years earlier. They affirm (wrongly) that the chief object of Josiah's reform was the re-establishment of worship at high places in Jerusalem. They rightly attribute the zeal which carried the reform through to the discovery of the "Book of the Law" (22 8). Then arguing that the frequent previous practice of worship at high places is the non-existence of any law to the contrary, they conclude that the rule of Dt 12 was a rule recently laid down by the temple priesthood, and written in a book in Moses' name, this new book being what was "found in the temple of the Lord." But this is manifestly unsound: its grave difficulties are well set out in Möller's Are the Critics Right? And here again careful study vindicates the Mosaic character of the law of Dt as a whole and of Dt 12 in particular. M. Édouard Naville in La découverte de la loi sous le roi Josias propounds a theory which he supports by a most interesting argument: that the book found was a foundation deposit, which must therefore have been built over by masonry at the erection of the temple by Solomon.

Equally unsound, however plausible, are the arguments which would make the framing of the Levitical ritual the work of the age of Ezra. The difficulties created by this theory are far greater than those which it is intended to remove. On this also see Möller, Are the Critics Right?

Rejecting these theories, it will be assumed in the present art. that the various laws are of the dates ascribed to them in the Pent; that whatever may be said as to the date of some "of the laws," all which are therein ascribed to Moses are truly so ascribed.

The laws in P are arranged for the most part in groups, with which narrative is sometimes intermingled. These e.g. are some of the Laws of Lev 19, 22-26; Ex 20-23, Nu 1-4, etc. The structure and probable history of these groups are very interesting. That many of them must have undergone interpolation appears certain from the following considerations. Each of the groups, and often one or more paragraphs within a group, is headed by a recurring formula, "Jehovah spake unto Moses [or unto Aaron, or unto Moses and Aaron], saying." We might at first expect that the contents of each group or paragraph so headed would consist solely of what Jehovah had said unto Moses or Aaron, but this is not always so. Not infrequently some direction is found within such a paragraph which cannot have been spoken to Moses, but is the outcome of some later date. Unless then we reject the statement of the formula, unless we are prepared to say that Jehovah did not speak unto Moses, we can only conclude that these later directions were at some time inserted by an editor into paragraphs which originally contained Mosaic laws only. That this should have been done would be perfectly natural, when we consider that the purpose of such an editor would be not only to preserve (as has been done) the real Law, but also to provide a manual of law complete for the use of his age, a manual (to use a modern phrase) made complete to date.

That the passages in question were indeed interpolations appears not only from the fact that removal of the text of what otherwise would be grave discrepancies, but because the passages in question sometimes disturb the sequence of the context. Moreover, by thus distinguishing between laws promulgated (as stated) by Moses, and laws to which the formula of statement was not intended to apply, we arrive at the following important result. It is that the former laws can all be shown to be in harmony one with another and with the historical formula of the Mosaic law; while the introduction of the later rules is also seen to be what would naturally follow by way of adaptation to the circumstances of later times, and the gradual unfolding of Divine purpose.

It would be much too long a task here to work this out in detail: it has been done by E.W. Thomas in this article in OT Institutions, Their Origin and Development. Two instances, however, may be mentioned. The consistence of the law of inheritance.—In Ex 13 23 (26) we read, "This is the ordinance of the passover: there shall no alien eat thereof: the house of Israel only shall eat thereof." But this is manifestly unsound: its grave difficulties are well set out in Möller's Are the Critics Right? And here again careful study vindicates the Mosaic character of the law of Dt as a whole.
The hypothetical Constitution of Nation, 12-17; 23

According to Lev 23 34-39a, 40-42, the Feast of Tabernacles was in large part only. This was because the Mosaic ritual as appears from the formula in ver 33, and in certain other passages. But as a development of the "latter" part of the Feast, it is very likely that it was subsequently added, and therefore insertions to that effect were made here. The The second day of the Feasts of the Lord shall be a sabbath day, service of the Lord, which was and so this week is continued. The observance of the "set feasts" which we find in Ex Num 23 24-29, 30. It is very likely that this was—very similar to that of: the "negative confession" in the Egyptian Book of the Dead. The Jewish religious rules of the Law of the Covenant we find, not new rules or an establishment of new institutions, but the new sanction of what was already law. The "feasts" of Jehovah: the Book of Leviticus, the "Book of the Law of Dt 31 26, and the so-called "Law of Holiness." This book, expressly so named (Ex 24 7), is stated to have been written by Moses (24 3), it must have comprised the contents of Ex 20-23. The making of the Book of the Covenant at Sinai, led up to by the revelation of the Covenant, the words of Ex 3 12-17; 6 2-8; 19 3-6, was the transaction of a very first importance in the religious history of Israel. God's revelation of Himself to Israel being very largely, indeed chiefly, a revelation of His moral attributes (Ex 34 6-7), could only be effectually apprehended by a people who were morally fitted to receive it. Hence, it was that Israel as a nation was placed under God by a stated relation to Himself by means of a covenant, the condition upon which the covenant was based being, on His people's part, their obedience to a given law. This was the law contained in the "Book of the Covenant." It consisted of "words of Jehovah" and "judgments" (Ex 24 3 AV). The latter are contained in Ex 21 1-22 17; the former in ch 20, in the remaining portion of ch 22, and ch 23. The "judgments" (Aramaic = law) relate entirely to matters of right between man and man; the "words of Jehovah" relate partly to these and partly to duties distinctively religious.

(1) The judgments compared with Code of Hammurabi.

The "judgments" appear to be taken from older consuetudinary law; not necessarily comprising the whole of that law, but so much of it as pleased God now to stamp with His express sanction and to embody in this Covenant Law. They may well be compared with those contained in the so-called Code of Hammurabi, king of Babylon, who is thought to have been the Amraphel of Gen 14. These are called "the judgments of righteousness which Hammurabi the mighty king confirmed." The resemblance in form and in subject between the two sets of "judgments" are very striking. All alike have the same structure, beginning with a hypothetical clause, "if so and so," and then giving the rule applicable in the third person. All alike relate entirely to civil, as distinguished from religious, matters, to rights and duties between man and man. All seem to have had a similar origin in judgments passed in the first place on causes brought before judges for decision. When these threatening consuetudinary law.

On Basis of the law of the covenant an earlier custom and conception.—It is remarkable that, alike in matters of right between man and man, and in matters relating directly thereto, the Law of the Covenant did little (if anything) more than give a new and Divinely and solemn sanction to requirements which, being already familiar, appealed to the general conscience of the community. If, indeed, in the "words of Jehovah" there is the bringing of consuetudinary moral or (more particularly) religious requirements, e.g. in the first and second commandments of the Decalogue, it would seem to have been so by way of revision, which must have been already gaining hold upon the minds of at least the more thoughtful of the people, and which could be developed and recommended to them by the events of their recent history. In no other way could the Law of the Covenant have appealed to their conscience. It must have been seen that the covenant could be securely based.

As in the "hymn of this age," there is a ratification of old consuetudinary law; as again in the second table of the Decalogue we have moral rules in accordance with a standard of morality which to all intents and purposes the prophet foretold would be fulfilled long after the time when the people already were under the "negative confession" in the Egyptian Book of the Dead. The Book of the Covenant we find, not new rules or an establishment of new institutions, but the new sanction of what was already law. These "feasts" of Jehovah: assume the rendering of service to Jehovah; they do not insist on it as if it were a new thing, but they enjoin that the Israelites shall not add to His service also the service of other gods (Ex 20 3; 23 24). They assume the observance of the three "feasts", they enjoin that these shall be kept to Jehovah—unto me", i.e. "unto me only" (Ex 19.17). They assume the making of certain offerings to Jehovah, they enjoin that these shall be made liberally—of the first, i.e. of the best—and without delay (Ex 29). They assume the rendering of worship by sacrifice, and the existence of an accustomed ritual, and therefore they do not lay down any scheme of ritual, but they give a few directions designed to guard against idolatry, or any practices tending either to irreverence toward God and law and feast, or to("feast", "Book of the Covenant." The Book of the Law of Dt 31, and the "law of Holiness.") only subordinately with matters of ritual: it warns against perils of idolatry and superstitions. Corruptions, common in the service of other gods, but which might by no means be mixed up with Jeh's service: it insists upon righteous conduct between man and man, and very strongly inculcates humanity toward the poor and the dependent: it enjoins upon those in authority the impartial maintenance of right, as also fairness, moderation and mercy, in the administration of law and the infliction of punishment: it sets forth the fear of God as that principle of Hebrew actions, and the love of God in response to His mercy toward them. It does not lay down any scheme of ritual, though it gives rules (14:3-21) as to things which might not be eaten as unclean; it also gives directions as to the disposal of tithes (14:22-29; 26:12); it enlarges upon the direction in the Law of the Covenant for the observance of the three feasts, adding to this the observance of the Passover (ch 16); it lays down a law (expressed conditionally) restricting to one sanctuary the offering of at least the more solemn sacrifices (ch 12); and it frequently inculcates liberality toward the Levites, both on account of the sacred services rendered by them, their dispersal among the tribes, and the precarious character of their life. Like the other books of the Pentateuch, it assumes the existence of an accustomed ceremonial, and it is remarkable that when there is occasion to do so it makes use of phraseology (ch 12) similar to that of the ritual laws of Moses in Lev and Nu. It is quite possible that some interpolations may have been made in the text of chs 5, 6, but not on any sufficient scale to affect the general character of the original book. This "Book of the Law" then was an expansion of the Law of the Covenant, enforcing its principles, giving directions in greater detail, and setting in a framework of exhortation, warning and encouragement. Thus its relation to the covenant is indicated by Dt 26:16-19; 34:1. This is that "book of the Law of Moses," at which reference is frequently made in the books of K, Ch, Ezr and Neh.

In marked contrast to the numerous rules, sometimes intermingled with narrative, which we find in Ex 25-40; Lev 1-16, and through-out Nu, there is a selection of laws which evidently was once a book by itself. This, from its constant insistence upon holiness as a motive of conduct, has been called "the Law of Holiness." Though it contains many laws long since stated to have been spoken by Moses, we are not told by whom it was written, and therefore its authorship and date are a fair subject of inquiry. In its general design it bears much resemblance to the Law of the Covenant, and the Book of the Law contained in Dt. As in and, esp. in the latter, the laws are set up in a parenetic framework, the whole closing with promise of reward for obedience and a threat of punishment for disobedience (cf Ex 20:23-33; Lev 26; Dt 28). Like them it deals much with physical aspects, and has been said to have been spoken by Moses, but it is not so familiar as the other. In Ex 25, in particular, the law contained in Ex 25-40 is a selection of laws which are not found in Nu, and which are not found in Ps, Prov. and the NT. A clue to its date is to be found in its conception of holiness. The idea found in the Prophets and the NT that moral wrongdoing renders unclean must be sought on the basis of a later conception, viz. upo on OT conception of ritual uncleaness. Now ritual uncleanness was originally physical uncleanness only, and was not necessarily applicable to the spirit. That it is all: this is perfectly clear from the whole contents of Lev 11-15. On the other hand we find the idea of moral uncleanness and uncleanness fully formed in the Ps, Prov., and in the Prophets, including the earlier prophets, with moral duties: chs 19 and 20 are practically an independent conception. We find that whereas in Lev 11-15 sexual acts which were lawful rendered unclean equally with those which were unlawful, in H adultery and incest are denounced as rendering specially unclean, the idea being that their technical uncleanness makes them intensely unclean through their immorality (Lev 18:24-30). Similarly, conversely familiar spirits and wizards, which probably involved physical defilement (perhaps through the ingredients used in charms), is strongly denounced (Deut 18:11). Sins, however, which in themselves entail physical uncleanness, such e.g., as injustice, are not mentioned in the Pentateuch, though they are so regarded in the Prophets. First, then, we have ritual uncleanness, which is physical only in the rules of Lev 11-15 (Lev 11:3-8), while the Prophets (embrying a pro-Mosaic conception): Lastly, we have moral wrongs in itself rendering unclean, and this is pronounced by the Prophets: immediately we have the transitional conception in H. The date therefore of the Law of Holiness may be Mosaic, but must be considerably earlier than the earliest of the writing prophets.

The remaining groups of Mosaic laws would appear to have been extant in their original form (i.e. without interpolation), no doubt in the custody of the priests, for for a probably a very considerable time, it may have been for centuries, before their final compilation in their present form. The arrangement of these groups as they now stand after H and with narrative intermingled, is by no means haphazard, as it might at first appear.

(1) Exod. As the directions for the erection of the tabernacle with the purpose of its several parts were given to Moses only after he had been on Mount Sinai, the covenant, they follow the account of it immediately. Thus Ex contains the history of the making of the Ark of what led up to it, and of what immediately followed it, viz. the provision of the home for the covenant-worship.

(2) Leviticus. This book follows with the rules of that worship; not indeed with all its details, but with an account of all that was essential for the making of the covenant, they follow the account of it immediately. Thus Ex contains the history of the making of the Ark of what led up to it, and of what immediately followed it, viz. the provision of the home for the covenant-worship.

(3) Numbers. The purpose of Nu is supplementary. Nu 1-6, containing the numbering and ordering of the tribes and rules as to the representative Levitical minis- try, sets forth the corporate character of Israel's serv- ice of God. The Israelites were not to be a mere aggre-gation of tribes, but a single nation, the bond of their union being the covenant with God. The camp itself, ordered and guarded against polluting persons, was to be a symbol of this holy unity. Chs 7-10 narrate the taking of the Passover at Sinai, important to the first commemorative Passover. The remaining chapters contain, alternately, a narrative of events following the departure from Sinai, with a collection of laws usually in some way connected with the events narrated, but all of them supplementary to the more essential laws already recorded.

(4) Deuteronomy. As a separate work and based upon, sayings and doings at the very close of the 40 years, Dt naturally follows last.

III. The General Character and Design of the Law. Both in civil matters and in ceremonial the Law had to deal with men who lived in a compara-tively early age of human history. Its rules were necessarily adapted to the standards of the age. At the same time they inculcated principles, the working out of which would by degrees bring about a great advance in men's con cep- tions both of what is true and of what is right.
As J. B. Moyle says (Lectures on the OT), "The morality of a progressive revelation is not the morality with which it starts but that with which it ends. The moral excellence of the OT Law is evident, not only in its great underlying principles, but in the suitability of its individual rules to promote moral advance.

1. The Civil Law

(1) Servants and the poor.—We have already noted the similarity between the "judgments" of Ex 20 and 21 and the "judgments" of Hammurabi, in respect to form and subject. Notwithstanding the practical wisdom found in many of the latter, there was a spirit of God between them and the former, for while both the Law of the Covenant and its enlargement in Dt, guarded the interest of and secured justice, and mercy too, to slaves and the poor, the laws of Hammurabi (Ex 20-23) were merely the practical expression of the commandant, the owner of that house shall be put to death." The Law indeed permitted slavery, an institution universal in the ancient world, but it made provisions which must very greatly have mitigated its evil. "Every seven years a Levite joined, both in Ex and in Dt, that after six years' service a Heb manservant should "go out free for nothing," unless he himself preferred to remain in servitude (Ex 21:2-6; Dt 15:12-18). The rule in Dt was not exactly the same, but it nevertheless guarded their interests, while Heb women servants were afterward included in the rule of Dt 15:12. A still greater amelioration was brought in by a later rule connected with the law of the Jubilee as set out in Lev 25:39-55. Again, though servitude was permitted on account of debt, or as a rescue from poverty (Ex 21:2-7; Dt 15:12), manumitting was a capital offense (Ex 21:16).

(2) Punishments.—The rule of Ex 21:22-25 ("eye for eye," etc; cf Lev 24:19-20; Dt 19:16-19) sounds harsh to us, but while the justice it sanctioned was rough and ready according to the age, it put a restraint on vindictiveness. The punishment bore no more proportion to the crime than the same spirit of restraint in punishment is seen in the rule as to flogging (Dt 25:2). Similarly the rule that murder was to be avenged by "the avenger of blood," a rule under the circumstances of the case both necessary and salutary, was protected from abuse by the appointment of places of refuge, the rule with respect to which was designed to prepare the way for a better system (see Ex 21:12-14; Nu 35:12; Dt 19:1-13).

(3) Marriage.—The marriage customs of the Mosaic age permitted polygamy and concubinage, marriage by purchase or by capture in war, slave-marriage, and divorce. The Law allowed the continuance of these customs, but did not originate them; on the contrary, its provisions were designed to restrict the old license, giving protection to the weaker party, the woman, limiting as far as possible the evils of the traditional system, a system which could not suddenly be changed, and preparing the way for a better. Consider the effect of the following rules: as to slave-wives (Ex 21:7-11); captives of war (Dt 21:10-14); plurality of wives (Dt 21:15-17); adultery (Ex 20:14.17; Dt 22:22); fornication (Dt 22:25-29; 25:17.18; Lev 21:9); divorce (Dt 22:23); the woman who was taken in marriage; the heir of a succession (Lev 18:6-18); marriage of priests (Lev 21:7.10-15); royal polygamy (Dt 17:17).

(4) Sabbaths and feasts.—The law as to these, though partly ceremonial, yet served social ends. The Sabbath day gave to all, and particularly to servants and the poor, and domestic cattle too, a useful rest from daily toil, to safeguard common rights at perhaps a time of transition as to customs of land tenure: connected with it also were rules as to release of slaves and relief of debtors (Ex 20:9-11; Lev 25:2-7; Dt 15:1-18). The observance of the Sabbath day seems to have fallen into disuse, perhaps as early as some 500 years before the Bab captivity (2 Ch 36:1), and it is probable that the Jubilee (the design of which seems to have been to adjust conflicting rights under new customs of land tenure and in the relation of employer to employed) was instituted to take its place (Lev 25). The law as to the annual feasts insured both the social advantages of festive gatherings of the people, and their sanctification by association with the important festival of the year, when God's presence was near (Lev 23:1-21). We have already noted that the conception of sin as uncleanliness, rendering the sinner forever unfruitful for the presence of God, must have been an outgrowth from the earlier concept of purely ritual (physical) uncleanliness. This development, and an accompanying sense of the sinfulness of and of its need of atonement by sacrifice, were undoubtedly brought about by the gradual working of the law of the sin offering (Lev 4:1-5:18; 12-15; 16). Similarly the rules as to guilt offerings (Lev 5, 14, 6) must by degrees have led to a true conception of repentance, as including both the seeking of atonement through sacrifice and restitution for wrong committed. The sin offering was, however, a peculiarly Mosaic institution, marking a development in the sacrificial system. The only sacrifices of which we have any trace in pre-Mosaic times were meal and drink offerings and purifications (or, to use the Levitical term, peace offerings).

2. The Ceremonial Law

(1) Origin of sacrifice.—We read of the offering of sacrifice all through the patriarchal history, and farther back even than Noah in the story of Cain and Abel; and there can be no doubt that the Levitical system of sacrifice was based upon, and a development (under Divine ordering) of, the sacrificial system already traditional among the Hebrews. Sacrifice was undoubtedly of Divine origin; yet we have no account, or even hint, of any formal institution of sacrifice. The sacrifices of Cain and Abel are spoken of in a way that leaves the impression that they were offered spontaneously, and the most probable assumption would seem to be that the very first offerings of sacrifice were the outcome of a spontaneous desire (Divinely implanted). We may be sure in early men to render service to the higher Being for whose relation to themselves they were, if ever so dimly, conscious.

Preliminary research has not yet been able to present to us a distinct picture of primitive men; and even if the results of anthropology were more certain than they now yet claim to be, what is certain is that society centered in is the conceptions, not of early men everywhere, but of the early ancestors of the Hebrews. However infantile this may have been and probably were, there may well have been far more of communality truth in them, than we usually imagine—than students of anthropology have any knowledge of. Sooner or later early men did make offerings to God, and as far as the story of Moses is concerned it was certainly based upon the patriarchal, so we may fairly assume that the earliest offering of the latter were an outgrowth from those which underlay the sacrifice of the patriarch's own still earlier ancestors.

It is well observed by Dr. A. M.绒 (OT Theology, p. 313) that the sacrifices of Cain and Abel are called a minḥād or present; and this idea of sacrifice as a gift to God most easily accounts for the facts with which we have to deal in the history of OT sacrifice. When early men first made offerings to God, they probably did so for the spirit of young children who give gifts to older persons whom they know in what way, the gifts be of any use to them. They simply give in affection which is of itself the only sacrifice.

The one only thing of prime value to the discoverers of history must have been food; hence offerings to God were everywhere in the first place offerings of food. A difficulty must soon have arisen, for men must have become convinced very soon that the Divine Being did not feed upon the food offered, at least not in a literal sense. Ultimately, among the Israelites, the idea of His actual feeding became either a teaching, or for the gospel, one not in the main. The difficulty the time the difficulty seemed to have been met by the assumption that the Divine Being consumed an inner essence of food, and the whole food offered became to be set free by fire. Food offered in sacrifice came to be burnt in order to fit it to become the food of God. This certainly appears from Lev 3 11-16 (cf Lev 21 6.8.17.21).

Coming, however, to animal as distinguished from vegetable food, the animal sacrifice was the offering of the blood, and that blood was offered because blood was life. The idea that life can be given by giving blood lay at the root of a custom which must have been well-nigh universal in primitive times, that of blood covenanting (see H Clay Buck). In this, two persons would each to the other of his own blood, drawn from the living vein, and the blood covenanting was supposed to be by the commingling of their blood, to become actual sharers of one life. To give to another one's own blood was to give to another one's own self, with all the dedication of love and service which that would imply. Not only would they seem to have lain at the foundation of the primitive offering of blood to God: It was the offering of the life of the offerer.

It is probable that the blood offered was the blood of the offerer, and that there was no infliction of death—only in this way the dedication of life. The dedicatory rite of circumcision may have been a survival of sacrifice in this its earliest form; so also what is known in Lev 11 12.28. When, however, the blood offered had come to be the blood of a substitute, and that a substitute animal, the sacrifice would come to include the slaughter of that animal and the further the consumption, in whole or in part, of its carcase by fire as an offering of food.

(2) The Levitical ritual. Whether the above theory be accepted or not, so far as animal sacrifice became an offering of food, it would stand in line with vegetable sacrifice; but in both the excellence of the Levitical ritual stood in this, that while it was framed for a people whose conceptions were in general, raised, it stood in higher conceptions, and fitted to become at last symbolical of purely spiritual truth. It was through the teaching, not only of prophets but of the Levitical ritual itself, and while it was still in full sway, that the words of 1 John 3 14 were uttered: "Will I eat the flesh of bulls, or drink the blood of goats? Offer unto God the sacrifice of thanksgiving; and pay thy vows unto the Most High." The Levitical ritual, as respects animal sacrifice in particular, was so framed, on the other hand, to keep alive the idea of sacrifice as the offering of life, not of death, of life's dedication, not its destruction, and therefore to make it a true type of Christ's living sacrifice. On the other hand, the rules of sacrifice guarded Him, as a matter of fact, sprang up widely among the heathen. The rule, e.g. in Lev 1 2 and elsewhere, that ye shall offer your oblation of the cattle, even of the herd and of the flock, excluded human sacrifice. The rule that the first act in every sacrifice must be to slay the creature offered excluded the infliction of unnecessary suffering. The detailed rules as to the offering and disposal of the blood, and the varying modes of disposal of the carcase, kept alive the essential idea of a such sacrifice, and shut out from degenerating into a mere heaping up, as in Egypt, of altars with mere loads of food. The rules of the peace offering, clothing it always with a spiritual motive (see Lev 7 12.16), raised it to a level far above the sacrifice of that class among the surrounding heathen, guarding it against their licentious festivity (cf Hos 2 11-13; 4 13.14; Am 2 8; 5 21-23) and gross ideas as to the part of God in the feasting.

(3) The Law truly a torah.—In every one of its departments the Law proved itself to be indeed a torah directing God's people in the upward way, leading them on from the state of advancement, such as it was, to which they had already attained by Moses' time, to higher and higher standards, both of faith and of duty, till they were prepared for the gospel, when Christ, who Himself said of the old Law, "Till heaven and earth pass, one jot or one tittle shall in no wise pass from the law till all be fulfilled" (Mt 5 18 AV). Meanwhile we have, in the teaching of the prophets, not a counter influence, not a system rivaling the Law, but its unfolding, both inspired of God, both instruments in His progressive revelation. "To obey is better than sacrifice, and to hearken than the fat of rams" were the words of Samuel, a faithful servant of the Law, and himself a frequent offerer of sacrifice. The Law was led to the heart of devout Israelites in the prophetic age is seen in the fervent words of Ps 119.

IV. The Passing Away of the Law.—The great general principles of the Law were not transitory but abiding, and reappear under the gospel dispensation. Otherwise, however, i.e. in those particulars, whether ceremonial or civil, in which it was adapted to merely passing needs, the Law passed away when Christ came. It is not always realized that Christ's coming has began to pass away. The following are illustrations:

(1) The whole rationale of the Levitical worship consisted in its being based upon the covenant made at Sinai, and the symbol of the Covenant was the offerer. As long as the priests were a small portion only of the whole Levitical body, as they appear in the history down to the middle period of the monarchy. But by the time of the exile they disappeared from history except as a remnant of priestly ministers, and, after the return from the exile, even these were in number a mere handful compared with the priests (Exr 2 36-42; 8 15-20.24-30; Neh 11 10-19). The attempt to revive the old law (Neh 10 38.39) was well-intentioned but impracticable: it was evidently soon abandoned (Neh 13 10-13; Mal 3 8-10). We learn from Jos that tithes were regarded later as due to the priests, not to the Levites (Jos, Ant. XX, viii, 8; ix, 2).

(3) That law which, as long as the priests were a small portion only of the Levitical body, as they appear in the history down to the middle period of the monarchy. But by the time of the exile they disappeared from history except as a remnant of priestly ministers, and, after the return from the exile, even these were in number a mere handful compared with the priests (Exr 2 36-42; 8 15-20.24-30; Neh 11 10-19). (4) It is probable that some of the supplementary rules in Nu may have been designed for temporary use only, and may have passed away before the close of the OT. It may have been so, e.g. with the law of Nu 5 11-31, a law probably most useful in the circumstances of the Moabite age, and perhaps itself a post-Mosaic addendum.

LAW, JUDICIAL, jōd-dish'āl: This was the form of Divine law which, under the dominion of God as the Supreme Magistrate, directed the policy of the Jewish nation, and hence was binding only on them, not on other peoples. The position of Jeh, as the Supreme Ruler, was made legally binding by a formal election on the part of the national assembly (Ex 19 3-8); and that there might be no question about the matter, after the death of Moses, Joshua, in accordance with instructions received by his great predecessor in the office of final judge, in the public assembly caused the contract to be renewed in connection with most solemn exercises (Josh 8 30-35). No legal contract was ever entered into with more formality and with a clearer understanding of the terms by the several parties than was the contract which made it binding on the Hebrews permanently to recognize Jeh as the Supreme Ruler (Ex 24 3-8). He was to be acknowledged as the Founder of the nation (Ex 20 2); Sovereign, Ruler, and Judge (Ex 20 2-6); and in these capacities he was the object of love, reverential fear and worship, service, and absolute obedience. Flagrant disregard of their obligations to Him manifested in idolatry or blasphemy was regarded as high treason, and like high treason in all nations punishable by death (Ex 20 3-5; 22 20; Lev 24 16; Dt 17 2-5). The will of Jeh in critical cases was to be ascertained through special means (Nu 9 8; Js 1 12; 20 18; 23 28; 1 S 10 22).

The ruling official recognized by the Hebrews as a nation was the chief magistrate, but he stood as Jeh's vicegerent, and therefore combined various authorities in his person. We must distinguish the functions of the chief magistrate (1) under the republic, (2) under the constitutional monarchy, and (3) under the senatorial oligarchy after the Bab captivity. Moses was the first chief magistrate under the republic; after him, Joshua, and the other judges. Under the constitutional monarchy, it was the king whose government was limited, for he could be punished, if need be, the native Hebrew; must not keep a large cavalry; must not support a harem; must not multiply riches; must be a defender of the national religion; must be guided by law, not whim; must be gracious and compassionate to the people (Dt 17 15-20). After the Bab captivity, the senatorial oligarchy combined ecclesiastical and state authority, later sharing it with the Rom government. See also SANHEDRIN.

LAWFUL, lō'fūl (usually ὑπάκοα, mishpat, "relating to judgment," or "a pronounced judgment," or ἀντίκρισις, coddis, "relating to that which is righteous, or "just"); ἐκτίμησις, ἐκτίμη, εἰκόνος, εἰκωνομεῖν, "that which is authorized according to law" or "an privilege according to legitimate custom:" (cf Ezek 18 5-19). 21 27; Isa 49 24; Mt 12 10; Acts 16 21; 19 39): Used of persons: of God, as being righteous both in the punishment of the wicked and the rewarding of the righteous (Ps 146 17 Heb); of man, as being just and equitable in all his dealings with his fellow-man (Ezk 33 19). It is used of things when the same are in accord with a pronounced judgment or a declared will of God, and thus pleasing in His sight (Mt 3 4). When the course of individual conduct is according to God's law of righteousness, it is declared to be "lawful" (Ezk 33 19). The word is used in a forensic sense as declaring the legal status of a person conforming to law. The idea of straightness, rigid adherence to God's law, whether religious, civil, or ceremonial, cannot be excluded from the definition of the word ("lawful"").

Neither AV nor ARV is consistent in its tr of the Heb and Gr words τῷ "lawful." Sometimes the words "just" and "righteous" are used. To arrive at the full and proper meaning of "lawful" therefore, it is necessary that we study the passages containing these synonymous terms. The written Law of God is the recognized standard by which things, actions and persons are to be judged as being lawful or unlawful. WILLIAM EVANS

LAWGIVER, lā'giv-ér (πρωτοτελής, mabhēkî; νομοθῆτης). There are two words, one Heb and one Gr, which are τῷ "lawgiver." The former occurs 7 in the OT, and in AV in every case except Jgs 6 14 is thus τῷ "lawgiver" but twice (Dt 33 21; Isa 33 22), though in the other passages (Gen 49 10; Nu 21 18; Jgs 5 14; Ps 60 7; 108 8) this meaning is retained in the margin. The Gr word occurs in the NT but once (Jas 4 12), where it has a meaning that is almost the exact equivalent of the Heb word in Isa 33 22. In both passages God is declared to be the "lawgiver," and in the NT passage is so called because He has the power to rule and judge, to save and destroy. The Heb word is τῷ "lawgiver" because he is not the lawgiver. God is the lawgiver, and therefore possesses the right to pronounce judgment (cf Isa, supra). The word, however, implies more than mere legislative function; it also connotes the ideas which makes this very plain, since he adds to the statement that God is our judge and lawgiver the further declaration that He is also king. This meaning adheres to the very history of the word. It is based upon the monarchical conception in which the legislative, judicial and administrative functions are all vested in one person. In Jas the two terms "lawgiver and judge" express the idea of God's absolute sovereignty. The vb. nomôthetein occurs in He 7 11; 8 6, but it does not extend beyond the meaning "to enact laws." The Heb word is restricted to poetic passages, and except in Isa 33 22 is applied to a tribal or kingly ruler. Moses is preeminently the lawgiver to Jewish and Christian circles, but it should be noted that in the Scriptures neither is he given this title. The primary meaning of the vb. from which mabhēkî is derived is "to cut," "to carve," and a derived meaning is "to ordain." The meaning of the part, mabhēkî is probably that which it means (1) the symbol which expresses the lawgiver's authority, that is, the commander's staff; and (2) the person who possesses the authority (Dt 33 21). It has the first of these meanings in Nu 21 18; Ps 60 7; 108 8, and probably in Gen 49 10, though here it may have the second meaning. The parallelism, however, seems to require an impersonal object to correspond to scepter, and so the reading of the text (RV) is to be preferred to that of the margin (Skinner, ad loc.). In Dt 33 21; Jgs 5 14; Isa 33 22, it means the person who wielded the symbol of authority, that is the prescriber of laws. In a primitive community this would be a military commander. In Gen 49 10 the "ruler's staff" is the symbol of kingly authority (Driver), and this verse consequently implies the supremacy of Judah which came in with the Davidic kingdom. This word contains no reference to the Messiah. In Nu 21 18 there is an allusion to the custom of formally and symbolically opening fountains under the supervision of the ruler. It is the instruction of the leader of the tribe. Such a custom seems to have been in vogue till compartively modern times. Gray cites Buddha in the New World for March, 1896, and Muir’s Mohamet and Islam, 344 f. In Jgs 8 14 the word means “military commander,” as the context shows. This is the meaning also in Dt 33 21, where it is affirmed that God obtained a position worthy of its warlike character. Tg, Vulg, Pesh, and some moderns seem to have reference to the pharaoh of Moses, but Nebo was in Reuben and not in Gad.

LAWLESS, ἁτέχες (ἀτέχνος, ἀνόμοι): While occurring but once in AV (1 Tim 1 9), it is τρ in various writings as “lawless” (1 Cor 9 21); “unlawful” (2 Pet 2 8 AV); “lawless” (1 Tim 1 9); “transgressor” (Mk 15 28; Lk 22 37); “wicked” (Acts 2 23 AV; 2 Thess 2 8 AV). When Paul claims to be “without law,” he has reference to those things in the ceremonial law which might well be passed over, and not to the moral law. Paul was by no means an antinomian. Those are “lawless” who break the law of the Decalogue; hence those who disobey the commandment, “Honor thy father and thy mother,” are lawless (1 Tim 1 9). The civil law is also the law of God. Those breaking it are lawless, hence called “transgressors.” Those who are unjust in their dealings are also “lawless;” for this reason the hands of Pilate and those who with him unjustly condemned Jesus are called “wicked” (Acts 2 23 AV). The most notable example of lawlessness is the Antichrist, that “wicked [lawless] one” (2 Thess 2 8).

LAWYER, λόγιος (νομικός, σύναγερος): “According to the lawyer, a man is an expert in law;” “about the law,” “lawyer.” [Mt 22 35; Lk 7 30; 10 25; 11 45.46.52; 14 3; Tit 3 13]: The work of the “lawyers,” frequently spoken of as “scribes,” also known as “doctors” of the law (Lk 2 46 m), was first of all that of jurists. Their business was threefold: (1) to study and interpret the law; (2) to instruct the Hebrew youth in the law; (3) to decide questions of the law. The first two they did as scholars and teachers, the last as advisers in some court. By virtue of the first-named function, they gradually developed a large amount of common law, for no code can go into such detail as to eliminate the necessity of subsequent legislation, and this usually, to a great extent, takes the form of judicial decisions founded on the code rather than on separate enactment. And so it was among the Hebrews. The provisions of their code were for the most part quite general, thus affording much scope for casuistic interpretation. As a result of the industry with which this line of legal development had been pursued during the centuries immediately preceding our era, the Heb law had become a very complicated science; and since it was forbidden to record these judicial decisions, a protracted study was necessary in order to commit them to memory.

But since the law must have universal application, the views of the individual scribe could not be taken as a standard; hence the several disciples of the law must frequently meet for discussion, and the opinion of the majority then prevailed. To these men interested in the study would be invited, that they might memorize the formulas agreed upon and might clear up the points upon which they were uncertain by asking questions of the recognized doctors (Lk 2 46).

Such centers of legal lore, of course, would seldom be found in rural communities; the authorities would not generally gather in large centers of population, esp.—until 70 A.D.—in Jerusalem. While such law schools were purely theoretical, yet they stood in close relation to the practical. Whenever doubt arose regarding the application of the law to a particular case, a question was referred to the nearest lawyer; by him to the nearest company of lawyers, perhaps to the Sanhedrin, and the resultant decision was in force. Thus the lawyers became law makers, and after the destruction of Jerusalem, the rabbis were recognized as the absolute authority in such matters. Frequently a single lawyer of great reputation, Menahem, Hillel or Gamaliel I., might pronounce dicta of unques tioned recognition as of much authority. In the court of our day, though sometimes his opinions were received and corrected by the legal tribunal, especially the Sanhedrin. Of course, frequently, the laws were under the sway of such a man’s influence, so that what he said upon his own authority would be ratified in the assembly of the doctors.

The second function of the lawyer was that of teachers. The renowned rabbis always sought to gather a company of pupils about them whose business it was to repeat the teachers’ law formulas until they had “passed into their flesh and blood.”

For the purposes of such instruction as well as for the discussion of the teachers and the students, there were special schools, a few of which are mentioned in connection with the synagogues as places of special merit and prestige. In Jerusalem, these law schools were conducted in the temple, probably in the hall dedicated to this special purpose (Mt 21 23; 26 55; Mk 14 49; Lk 2 46; 20 1; 21 37; Jn 18 20). The students during this time the lectures sat on the floor of the platform, hence the expression “sitting at the feet of” (Acts 22 3; Lk 2 46). Finally, the lawyers were called upon to decide cases in court or to act as advisers of the court. Before the destruction of Jerusalem, technical knowledge of the laws was not a condition of eligibility to the office of judge. Anyone who could command the confidence of his fellow citizens might be elected to the position, and many of the rural courts undoubtedly were conducted, if not among, by men of limited knowledge. Naturally such men would avail themselves of the legal advice of any “doctor” who might be within reach, esp. inasmuch as the latter was obliged to give his services gratuitously. And in the more dignified courts of large municipalities, it was a standing custom to have a company of scholars present to discuss and decide any new law points that might arise. Of course, frequently, these men were elected to the office of judge, so that practically the entire system of jurisprudence was in their hands.

LAY, lāy, LAYING, lāng: (1) ἐκτίνημος, “to put,” and the Gr equivalent, τιθῆμι, τίθεμι, are very frequently τρ by “to lay.” RV very often changes the AV rendering of ἐκτίνημος, but never of τιθῆμι, to “lay” (Isa 1 52, “how he set himself against him in the way” (AV “he laid wait for him”); 2 K 11 16, “So they made way for her” (AV “And they laid hands on her”); cf 2 Ch 23 15; Job 24 12, “God regardeth not the folly” (AV “God layeth not folly”); Job 34 23, “For he needeth not further to consider a man” (AV “For he will not lay upon man more”); Isa 28 17, “And 1 will make just the line” (AV “Judgment also will I lay to the line”); Job 17 3, “Give now a pleasant face” (AV “Lay down now”); (2) ὁδός, ὁδών, ὁδί, “to give,” is very commonly by “to lay.” RV changes the tr of AV in Ezek 4 5, “I have appointed”; Ezek 33 28 f, “I will make the land a desolation” (AV “I will lay the land most desolate”); Jer 38 20, “I will lay thee upon thine own heart” (AV “I will lay thee upon thine own heart”); Is 58 9, “I will lay the stones” (AV “lay thy stones”); Dn 29 22, “the sicknesses wherewith Jebediah made it sick” (AV “the sicknesses which the Lord hath laid upon”). For other differences of RV and AV of Dt 21 8; 2 K 2 5; 1 Ch 21 9 11; Ezra 3 5 13 19 9 6; Jer 5 26; Mk 7 8; Lk 19 44; Jas 1 21; 1 Pet 2 1. In most of these passages the change of RV is due to the peculiar use of the word “lay” in AV. The following expressions are found very frequently: "to lay hands on," "to lay wait," "to lay up," "to lay aside," "to lay upon," "to lay down," etc.

"Laying of wait." AV, is rendered "lying in wait" in Nu 36 21 ff.; Acts 9 24 reads: "But their plot became known" (AV "But their laying away was known"). The "laying on of hands" is a very general expression. See Hands, Laying on of.

LAZARUS, laz'a-rus (Ἄλαζρος, Lidzaroś, an abridged form of the Heb name Eleazar, with a Gr termination): Means "God has helped." In LXX and Jos are found the forms Ἕλεαζρ, Eleazdr, and Ἐλαζᾶρος, Eleazaros. The name was common among the Jews, and is given to two men in the NT who have nothing to do with each other.

The home of the Lazarus mentioned in Jn 11 1 was Bethany. He was the brother of Martha and Mary (Jn 11 1-2; see also Lk 10 38-41). All three were esp. beloved by Jesus (Jn 11 5), and at their home He was entertained (Lk 10 38-41; Jn 11). As intimated by the number of condoling friends from the city, and perhaps from the costly ointment used by Mary, the family was probably well-to-do.

In the absence of Jesus, L. was taken sick, died, and was buried, but after having lain in the grave four days, was brought back to life by the Saviour (Jn 11 3-16, 43, 44). As a result many Jews believed on Jesus, but others went and told the Pharisees, and a council was therefore called to hasten the death of the Master's death (Jn 11 45-50). Later, six days before the Passover, at a feast in some house in Bethany where Martha served, L. sat at table as one of the guests, when his sister Mary anointed the feet of Jesus (Jn 12 1-3). Many of the common people came thither, not only to see Jesus, but also the risen L., believed in Jesus, and were enthusiastic in witnessing for Him during the triumphal entry, and attracted others from the city to meet Him (Jn 12 9.11.17.18). For that reason the priests plotted to murder L. (Jn 12 10).

This is all that we really know about the man, for whether the Jews accomplished his death we are not informed, but it seems probable that, satiated with the death of Jesus, they left L. unmolested.

Nothing is told of his experiences between death and resurrection (cf Tennyson, "In Memoriam," xxxi), of his emotions upon coming out of the tomb, of his subsequent life (cf Browning, "A Letter to Browning,"), and not a word of the mission he is supposed to give as to the other world. His resurrection has been a favorite subject for various forms of Christian art, and according to an old tradition of Ephesus he was 30 years old when he was raised from the dead, and lived to be 30 years old.

As might be expected this miracle has been vigorously assailed by all schools of hostile critics. Ingenuity has been exhausted in inventions objections to it. But all are told, really amount only to repetition of objections which have been made before.

(1) The silence of the other Gospels.—There is here, no doubt, some difficulty. But the description of the early Christians, as many scholars think, to screen the family from danger may have kept the story from becoming current in the oral tradition whereas the Synoptics drew their materials, though Matthew was probably an eyewitness. But, in any case, a Syriac and a Latin reading of which the others had omitted tells us that he had been witnessed, since all danger to the family had long ago passed away, as it was of especial interest to his story, and he had recorded no other case of resurrection. As any rate, the Gospel writers do not seem to regard a resurrection from the dead by the power of Jesus as so much more stupendous than other miracles, as they seem to modern scholars' ordinary events. And, moreover, the Synoptics do unconsciously attest this miracle by describing a sudden outbreak of a renewal excitement in favor of Jesus which can be accounted for only by some extraordinary event.

(2) The stupendous character of the miracle.—But to a philosophical believer in miracles this is no obstacle at all, for to omnipotence there are no such things as big miracles or little ones. Of course, Martha's statement as to the decomposition of the body was only her opinion of the probability in the case, and it is not to be wondered from the beginning and who had intended to raise L., might well in His providence have watched over the body, that it should not see corruption. When all said, "He who has created the organic cell within inorganic matter is not incapable of reestablishing life within the inanimate substance."

(3) Its non-use as an accusation against Jesus.—The objection that Jn 11 47-53 is inconsistent with the fact that in accusing Jesus before Pilate no mention is made of this miracle by the enemies of Jesus has little weight. Who would expect them to make such a self-convicting acknowledgment? The disavowal of the priests at the miracle and their silence about it are perfectly consistent and natural.

No one of the attempted explanations which deny the reality of the miracle can offer even a show of probability. That L. was just recovering from a trance when Jesus arrived; that it was an imposture arranged by his family and sanctioned by Jesus in order to overwhelm His enemies; that it was a fiction or parable tv into a fact and made up largely of synthetical materials, is a derogation of the words, "I am the resurrection, and the life," a myth—such explanations require more faith than to believe the fables of the Talm. They well illustrate the credulity of unbelief. The narrative holds together with perfect consistency, is distinguished by vividness and dramatic movement, the people who take part in it are intensely real and natural, and the dialogue of the sisters perfectly agrees with the sketch of them in Lk. No morbid curiosity of the reader is satisfied, invented stories are not necessary, it is denied that it is a necessary link in the story of the final catastrophe.

The purpose of the miracle seems to have been: (1) to show Himself as Lord of life and death just before He should be Himself condemned to die; (2) to strengthen the faith of His disciples; (3) to convert many Jews; (4) to cause the priests to hasten their movements so as to be ready when His hour had come (Plummer, HDB, III, 57).

In the parable in Lk 16 19-31 the poor man is pictured as in abject poverty in this world, but highly rewarded and honored in the next. It is the only instance of a proper name used in a parable by Jesus. Some think that he was a well-known mendicant in Jesus, and have even attempted to define his... disease. But this is no doubt simple invention, and since "in Christ's kingdom of truth names indicate realities," this was probably given because of its significance, suggesting the beggar's faith in God and patient dependence upon Him. It was this faith and not his poverty which at last brought him to Abraham's bosom. Not one word does L. speak in the parable, and this may also be suggestive of patient submission. He does not murmur at his hard lot, nor rail at the rich man, nor after death triumph over him. The parable is related to that of the Rich Fool (Lk 12 16-21). This latter draws the veil over the worldling at death; the other lifts it. It is also a counterpart of that of the Unjust Steward (Lk 16 1-13), which shows how wealth may wisely be used to our advantage, while this parable shows what calamities result from failing to make such wise use of riches. The great lesson is that our condition in Hades depends upon our conduct here, and that this may produce a complete reversal of fortune and of popular judgments. Thus L. represents the pious indigent who stood at the opposite extreme from the proud, covetous, and luxury-loving Pharisee. The parable made a deep impression on the mind of the church, so that the term "lazar," no longer a proper name, has passed into many languages, as in Lazar house, lazarette, also applied to the inmates of Irish towns. There was even an order, half-military, half-monastic, called the Knights of St. Lazarus, whose special duty it was to minister to lepers.

The rich man is often styled Dives, which is not strictly a proper name, and properly meaning "rich," which occurs in this passage in the Vulg. But in Eng. lit., as early as Chaucer, as seen in the "Sompnoure's Tale" and in "Piers Plowman," it appears in popular use as the name of the Rich Man in this parable. In later theological lit. it has become almost universally current. The name Nineus given him by Euthymius never came into general use, though the Sahidic version has the addition, "whose name was Nineus." His sin was not in being rich, for Abraham was among the wealthiest of his day, but in his worldly unbelief in the spiritual and eternal, revealing itself in ostentatious luxury and heart-hardened contempt of the poor. Says Augustine, "Seems be Jesus, that ye have been familiar with that book where he found the name of the poor man written, but found not the name of the rich, for that book is the life of men!"

LEACH, lech. See Horseleach.

LEAD, led (ἕδη, ἀπερίθτι): Lead was one of the first metals to be used in the free state, probably because it was so easily obtained from its ores. Lead was found anciently in Egypt and the Sinai peninsula. There is no lead found in Pal proper, but in Northern Syria and Asia Minor it occurs in considerable quantities, usually associated with silver. These sources do not furnish an important supply in Bible times. It was also brought by the Phoenicians from Spain (Tarsash) (Ezk 27 12) and the British Isles.

Lead was used, as it still is, all along the Mediterranean shores for sinkers. Pieces of Epyg fishnets probably dating from 1200 BC are now preserved in the British Museum, with their lead sinkers, some of which lead was the heaviest metal known to the ancients, gold excepted, it was generally used for fish-lines and sounding lines (cf Acts 27 28), esp. in the dense waters of the Mediterranean. Moses mentioned the sinking qualities of lead in the sea in a simile of the sinking of Pharaoh's hosts "as lead in the mighty waters" (Ex 15 10).

Lead was used by the ancients for binding stones together. In most of the ancient ruins of Syria the Arabs have dug holes at the bases between stones in walls and columns in order to remove the iron, bronze, or lead thus used. In the museum of the Syrian Protestant College, Beirut, there are several specimens of cast-lead sarcophagi dating from the time of Christ.

In Jb 19 22-24 lead is mentioned as used in the engraving of permanent records. Two inferences might be drawn from this passage: either that the letters were cut with a chisel (pen) and then the cutting was filled with lead, or that sheets of lead were used as tablets on which to write, the writing being done with an iron tool. Lead is frequently referred to along with iron, brass, silver and tin (Nu 31 22; Ezk 22 18-20; 27 12). The use of lead for plumbines is implied in Am 7 7-8; Zec 4 10; as a weight in Zec 5 7-8. That OT writers understood the use of lead for purifying gold is shown by Jer 6 29 and Ezk 22 18-22 (cf Mal 3 2). See Metals; Refiner.

LEAF, leaf, LEAVES, leafs: Used in three different senses, with reference: (1) To trees (ἤδη, ἀπελθ, "a coming up"), Gen 3 7; 8 11; Lev 26 36 (ἤδη, ἄπερήθη); Ezek 17 9; φόλαξ, phasion. Figuratively (a) of spiritual blessings (Ezk 47 12; cf Rev 22 2) and prosperity (Ps 1 3); (b) of moral decay (Isa 64 6), and (c) of a formal, empty profession (Mt 21 19). (2) To a book (ἤδη, ἀπελθ, Jer 36 23 (m. "columna"; see ver 2); as the parchment was gradually unfaded a more precise colophon could thus be read. (3) To doors (ἤδη, πλάτα, "side," ἔπερ, ἔφερα, "a screen" "hanging"), 1 K 6 54. The door of the Holy Place consisted of two halves, but each half had two leaves (cf Eze 41 24). M. O. EVANS

LEAH, le'a (לֵיהָ, לְדָה; Aṣṭa, Seat, "weary," "dull"[?], "wild cow"): Rachel's sister, and the elder daughter of Laban (Gen 29 16). We are told that her eyes were "tender" (לֵיהָ, ῥακκָה). Genesis renders it "weak," LXX δακρυα, ἄθροιστα; accordingly, she was not weak-eyed, but by no means "blear-eyed" (of Vulg.). Her eyes were lacking that luster which always and everywhere is looked upon as a conspicuous part of female beauty. Jes (And, 1 xix, 7) says of her, ἕπερ, ἐν ὅπερι, τοῦτοι, εἰκὼν ἑωρέσει οὐκ εἴπερ, which may safely be rendered, "she was of no comely countenance."

L. became the wife of Jacob by a ruse on the part of her father, taking advantage of the oriental custom of heavily veiling the prospective bride. When taken to task by his rate son-in-law, Laban excused himself by stating it was against the rule of the place "to give the younger before the first-born" (Gen 29 21-26). Although Rachel was plainly preferred by Jacob to L., still the latter bore him six sons: Reuben, Simon, Levi, Judah (Gen 29 31 ff), Issachar, Zebulun, and a daughter, Dinah (Gen 30 17-21). Up to this time Rachel had not been blessed with children of her own. Thus the lesson is brought home to us that Jeh has a special and kindly regard for the lowly and despised, provided they learn, through their troubles and afflictions, to look to Him for help and success. It seems that homely L. was a person of deep-rooted piety and therefore better suited to become instrumental in carrying out the plans of Jeh in her handsome, but worldly-minded, sister Rachel.

When Jacob decided to return to the "land of his fathers," both of his wives were ready to accompany him (Gen 31 4.14). Before they reached the end of their journey their course was sorely LEAVEN, lev’n (סַּוָּא, sôwá, חֵמֵשׁ, čemš, צָמֵה; Lat fermentum): The nomadic ancestors of the Hebrews, like the Bedouin of today, probably made their bread without leaven; but leaven came to play a great part in their bread-making, their law and ritual, and their religious teaching (see Ex 12 15; 19; 13 7; Lev 2; 11; Dt 16 4; Mt 13 33; 16 6–12; Mk 8 15; Lk 12 1; 13 21).

(1) The form of leaven used in bread-making and the method of using it were simple and definite. The "leaven" consisted always, so far as the evidence goes, of a piece of fermented dough kept over from a former baking. There is no trace of the use of other sorts of leaven, such as the lees of wine or those mentioned by Piny (NH, xviii.26). The lump of dough thus preserved was either dissolved in water in the kneading-trough before the flour was added, or was "hid" in the flour (AV "meal") and kneaded along with it, as was the custom mentioned in the parable (Mt 13 33). The bread thus made was known as "leavened," as distinguished from " unleavened" bread (Ex 12 15, etc).

See Bread.

FERMENTATUM is used in Persius (Sat., i.24) for "corruption." For this reason doubtless it was excluded also from the offerings placed upon the altar of Jeh, cakes made from flour without leaven, and these only, being allowed. The regulation for these " unleavened cakes" was magath (Lev 10 12). Two exceptions to this rule should be noted (Lev 7 13; cf Am 4 5): "leavened bread" was an accompaniment of the thank offering as unleavened leaves were used also in the wave offering of Lev 23 17. Rabbinical writers regularly use leaven as a symbol of evil (Lightfoot).

(3) In teaching.—The figurative uses of leaven in the NT, no less than with the rabbis, reflect the ancient view of it as "corrupt and corrupting," in parts at least, e.g. Mt 16 6, and esp. the proverbial saying twice quoted by Paul, "A little leaven leaveneth the whole lump" (1 Cor 5 6; Gal 5 9). But as Jesus used it in Mt 13 33, "The kingdom of heaven is like unto leaven," it is clearly the name for the hidden, silent, mysterious, but all-pervading and transforming action of the leaven in the measures of flour that is the point of the comparison.

LEBANON, lè-ba’nə, leb’-a-na (Նաբո, Nabō; Heb ṣwēhōn, "white"): Head of a family of returning exiles (Ezr 2 45; Neh 7 48; cf 1 Esd 5 29).

LEBANON, leb’a-non (Ναβων, Nabων; Vulg Libanus): Derived from the root "lebān, "lebān, "to be white," probably from the snow which covers its summits the greater part of the year. "White mountains" are found in almost every country. The light color of the upper limestone may, however, form a sufficient reason for the name. In prose the article is usually connected with the name. In poetry it is more often without the article. In the LXX, however, the article is generally present both in prose and poetry.

The Lebanon range proper borders the east coast of the Mediterranean, for a distance of 100 miles, running N.E. and S.S.W. 2. General from the mouth of the Litān river, Description the classic Leontes (which enters the sea a little N. of Tyre), to the mouth of the Eleutherus (Naḥar el-Kheir), a few miles N. of Tripolis. This river comes through a depression between Lebanon and the Nuseiriyeh mountains, known as "the entrance to Hamath," and connects with a caravan route to the Euphrates through Palmyra. For a considerable distance N. of the Litān, the mountain summits average from 4,000 to 6,000 ft. in height, and the range is more or less anti-Lebanon: Souk-Wādī-Barrada.
dissected by short streams which enter the Mediterranean. Most prominent of these is the Nahr ez-Zaherádny, which, after running 25 or 30 miles in a southerly direction through the center of the range, like the Litdany, turns abruptly W. opposite Mt. Hermon, reaching the sea between Tyre and Sidon. Its main courses, Nahr el-Annam and Nahd Namar, descend to the sea between Sidon and Beyrout, and Nahr Beyrout just N. of the city. Throughout this district the mountain recesses are more or less wooded. Opposite Beyrout the range rises to an elevation of 8,500 ft. Thirty miles farther N.E. the summit is reached in Jebel Mukhmal, at an elevation of 10,225 ft., with several others of nearly the same height. An amphitheater here opens to the W., in which is sheltered the most frequented cedar grove, and from which emerges the Nahr Kadishá ("sacred stream") which enters the Mediterranean at Tripolis. Snow is found upon these summits throughout the year (Jer 13 14), while formerly the level area between these furnished the snow fields from which a glacier descended several miles into the headwaters of the Kadishá, reaching a level of about 5,000 ft. The glacier deposited in this amphitheater a terminal moraine covering several sq. miles, which at its front, near Bsharré, is 1,000 ft. in thickness. It is on this that the grove of cedars referred to is generally based.

The view from this summit reveals the geographical features of the region in a most satisfactory manner. Toward the E. lies Coele-Syria (the modern Buká), 7,000 ft. below the summit, bordered on the eastern side by the mountain wall of Anti-Lebanon, corresponding to the cliffs of Moab E. of the Jordan valley, opposite Judea. This depression in fact is but a continuation of the great geological fault so conspicuous in the Jordan valley (see Am 1 3); in which the rocks look like Ba'albek, which appears at the base of Anti-Lebanon, only 20 miles away. The valley is here about 10 miles wide, and forms the watershed between the Orontes and the Litdény. To the N.E. the valley of the Orontes is soon obscured by intervening peaks, but to the S.W. the valley of the Litdany closes up only where the glistering peak of Mt. Hermon pierces the sky, as the river turns abruptly toward the sea 40 miles distant. Toward the W., the blue waters of the Adriatic, as a poor quaquaversal as the crow flies, show themselves at intervals through the gorges cut by the rapid streams which have furrowed the western flanks of the mountain (Cant 4 15); 3,000 ft. beneath is the amphitheater many sq. mi. in area filled with the terminal moraine from which the Kadishá river emerges, and on which the grove of cedars (cf. 1 K 4 33; Ps 92 12; Hos 14 5) appears as a green spot in the center. Onward to the W. the river gorges with its way amid numerous picturesque village sites and terraced fields, every foot of which is cultivated by a frugal and industrious people. To the traveler who has made the diagonal journey from Beyrout to the cedars, memory fills in innumerable details which are concealed from vision at any one time. He has crossed Nahr el-Kelb ("Dog River") near its mouth, where he has seen Egypt and Assyrian inscriptions dating from the time of Sennacherib's invasion. Ascending this river, after passing numerous villages surrounded by mulberry and olive groves, vineyards, and fields of wheat, and pausing to study the ruins of a temple dating from Rom times, and having crossed a natural bridge at Jisr el-Hogar with a span of 120 ft., rising 75 ft. above the stream, he arrives, at the end of this beautiful road, at the ruins of one of the famous temples of Venus destroyed by the order of Constantine on account of the impurity of the rites celebrated in it. Here, too, is a famous spring, typical of many others which gush forth on either side of the Lebanon range from beneath the thick deposits of limestone which overlie its summit. The flow of water is enormous, and at certain seasons of the year is colored red with a mineral matter which the ancients regarded with mysterious reverence (see LB, III, 244). The lower part of the amphitheater is covered with verdure and a scentsy growth of pine and walnut trees, but the upper part merges in the barren cliffs which lie above the snow line. Onward, alternately through upturned limestone strata, left by erosion in fantastic forms, and through barren areas of red sandstone, where no other species of Lebanon would flourish if protected from the depredations of man and his domestic animals, he crosses by turns at higher and higher levels the headwaters of the Ibrahim, Fadar, Jozeh, Byblus and the Bétry rivers, and at length reaches, on the fourth day, the Aádisa, 5 miles below the cedars of Lebanon. Viewed from the Mediterranean the Lebanon range presents a continuous undulating outline of light-colored limestone peaks, the whole rising so abruptly from the sea that a great part of the distance there is barely room for a road along the shore, while in places even that is prevented by rocky promontories projecting boldly into the sea. The only harbors of importance are at Beyrout and Tripolis, and these are only partially protected, being exposed to the N.W. The eastern face of the range falling down into Coele-Syria is very abrupt, with no foothills but one or two important valleys.

Geologically considered, the Lebanon consists of three conformable beds of limestone which overlie an anticline with its steepest face to the

3. Geology E. The lowest of these is a few thousand ft. thick, consisting of hard limestone containing few fossils, the most characteristic of which is Ouganda, of which a few thin beds are now and then exposed in the cliffs. This formation has been named Glandarian. In its folds this has been elevated in places to a height of 5,000 ft. Through erosion it is exposed in numerous places, where it presents picturesque castellated columns, whose bluish-gray sides are beautifully fluted by atmospheric agencies. The second formation consists of several hundred feet of red-colored sandstone alternating with soft limestone and clay deposits, occasionally containing concretions of iron, manganese, and efflorescent salts. It is this that occasionally colors the water of the spring at Adonis. The characteristic fossil is Trigonia syriaca. Altogether this formation attains a thickness of 1,000 ft., and it is on its eroded surfaces that the most of the Lebanon pines are found. It contains also many signs of volcanic action. The third formation consists of humirous limestone, a cretaceous formation, in some places almost wholly composed of fragments of the fossils from which it derives its name. This formation appears on all the highest summits, where in most cases it is nearly horizontal, and in places attains a thickness of 5,000 ft. Between the summits of the range and the foothills this formation has been almost wholly carried away by erosion, thus exposing the underlying formations. Cretaceous strata of still later age are found at low levels near the sea, which in places are covered by small deposits of Tertiary limestone, and by a porous sandstone of the Pleistocene age.

The scenery of the western slopes of Lebanon is most varied, magnificent, and beautiful, and well calculated, as indeed it did, to impress

4. Scenery the imagination of the Jeb poets. Only the sea was beauty, at the number of forests of pine, oak and cedars; but these have for the most part long since disappeared, except in the valley of Nahr Ibrahim, which is still thickly wooded with pine, oak and plane trees. Of the cedars there remain, besides the grove at the head of the Kadisha, only two or three, and they are of less importance. Every available spot on the western flanks of the Lebanon is cultivated, being sown with wheat or planted with the vine, the olive, the mulberry and the walnut. Irrigation is extensively practised. When we let the eye range from the snowy summits of the mountain over all that lies between them and the orange groves of Sidon on the seashore, we understand why the Arabs say that "Lebanon bears winter on its head, spring on its shoulders, autumn in its lap, while summer lies at its feet."

In the more desolate places jackals, hyenas, wolves, and panthers are still found (cf. 2 K 15 9).

5. History Israelites, but was never conquered by them. It seemed generally to have been subject to the Phoenicians. At present it is occupied by various sects of Christians and Mohammedans, of whom the Maronites, Druzes and Orthodox Greeks are most active and prominent. Since 1860 the region has been under the protection of European powers with a Christian governor. No exact figures are available, but the population at present numbers probably about 275,000.

Ruins of ancient temples are numerous throughout Lebanon. Bacon estimates that within a radius of 20 miles of Ba‘albek there are 15 ruined sun-temples, the grandeur and beauty of which would have made them famous but for the surpassing splendor of Ba‘albek.

Anti-Libanus (Jch 1 7; Josh 13 5; Cant 7 4) is an extension northward of the great mountain system facing on the E. the great geological fault most conspicuous in Lebanon the valley of the Jordan (see JORDAN, VALLEY OF), extending from the Gulf of Akabah to Antioch on the Orontes River. The system begins at the Barada River just N. of Mt. Hermon, and, running parallel to Mt. Lebanon for 65 miles, terminates at Hums, the "entering in of Hamath." The highest points of the range reach an elevation of over 8,000 ft. Eastward the range merges into the plateau of the great Syrian desert. South of Ba‘albek the Yahyufah, a stream of considerable importance, empties into the Litig, while the Barada (the "Abana" of Scripture), rising in the same plateau, flows eastward to Damascus, its volume being greatly increased by rivers coming in from the base of the dissected plateau.

LITERATURE. The geographical and geological descriptions are largely obtained by the writer from an extended excursion through the region in the company of George Frederick Wright, who knew the region is most intimate and comprehensive. LEBAOTH, le‘bo‘oth, -oth (תלְבֹּאָות,  פְּהַדָּאָות): An unidentified city in the S. of the territory of Judah (Josh 15 36). It is the same as Beth-lebooth of Josh 19 6, which, by a clerical error appears in 1 Ch 4 31 as "Beth-biri."

LEBBAEUS, leb‘ba‘us (Λέββαες, Lobbaio): Mentioned in Mt 10 3 AV as "Lhebbaeus, whose surname was Thaddeus" (RV omits); one of the twelve apostles. See THADDAEUS.

LEBONAH, leb‘ona (לְבּוֹנָה, Phabanah): A place on the great north road between Shiloh and Shechem (Jgs 21 19). It is represented by the modern Khân el-Lubbât, about 3 miles W.N.W. of Sidlân ("Shiloh"), on the way to Nobbût. It is a wretched village lying on the slope of a hill, with many rock tombs in the vicinity.

LECAH, le‘ka (לבּא, lêkah): A descendant of Judah (1 Ch 4 21).

LEDGE, lej (לֹאֵגָה, shalahô): The word in the sense of side-projection is used in 1 K 7 28-29 in connection with the bases of Solomon's Molten Sea (O.T.); in vs 35-36, where AV uses the same word, RV has "stay" (yadh, lit. "hand"). RV likewise has "ledge" (round) for AV "compass" (karkôb) in the description of the altar in Ex 27 5; 38 4 (see ALTAR), and ARV substitutes "ledge" for "settle" (mârdî) in Ezek 45 14-17,20; 46 19.

LEEKs, læks (לְקָה, lákt; תָּא פָּרָא, tâ pras): This word, elsewhere translated "grass," is in Nu 11 5 rendered "leeks" in all the ancient VSS, on account of its association with garlic and onions; such a use of the word occurs in the Talm. The leek (Allium porrum) is much grown today in Pal, while in ancient Egypt this vegetable was renowned.

LEFTHANDED, lef'hand-ed (παραπρόσωπος, ἐπιμεταξοθέος, amphoterodexios, i.e. "ambidextrous"). The Heb presents a combination of words signifying lit. a man whose right hand is impeded or lame, who therefore uses the left hand instead, or one who by habit prefers the use of the left hand, whereas others use the right. It is interesting to note that in both instances, where the expression occurs in the Scripture, it refers to individuals belonging to the tribe of Benjamin (with "a son of the right hand"!), The first is Euhith, son of Gera, who killed Eglon, king of Moab, and thereby delivered Israel from paying tribute to the Moabites (Jgs 3:15). The other instance is that of the 700 selected Benjaminites, who, though lefthanded, "could sling stones at a hairbreadth, and not miss" (Jgs 20:16; cf 1 Ch 12:2). H. L. E. LURING

LEG (1) [וֶשׁ, נָשָׁה, shēḵ, Aram. נַשָּׁה, shēḵ; (2) נֶשָּׁה, kārā, dual נֶשֶׁב, נֶשֶׁבָּה, regel; θλασσάς, skelos; AV tr. as also נֶשָּׁה, shēbhel, and נֶשֶׁב, נֶשֶׁבָּה, with "leg," but mistakenly: (1) The first Heb word (shēk) denotes the upper leg, and is therefore synonymous with θλός (q.v.). It expresses metaphorically the muscular strength, and the pride of the runner. "He took no pleasure in the legs of a man" (Ps 147:10). "His legs are as pillars, which stand upon sockets of fine gold" (Cant 5:15). If the legs have lost their strength as in the lame or the Beraeri patient, they become a metaphor for anything useless, inefficient or disappointing: "The legs of the lame hang loose; so is a panting in the mouth of fools" (Prov 28:27). The Aram. form is found in the description of the image of Nebuchadnezzar, "its legs of iron" (Dan 2:33). (2) Kārā, dual נֶשֶׁבָּה, the "leg," respecting the legs, mentioned as a portion of the pachal lamb (Ex 11:9) or, usually, in connection with the head and the inwards, as a sacrificial portion (Ex 29:17; Lev 1:9,13; Am 3:12). The word designates also the legs of leaping insects of the orthopterous family, locusts, etc., which were permitted as leavened offerings (Lev 11:21). (3) Regel, lit. "foot" (q.v.), found in this sense only once: "He [Goliath] had greaves of brass upon his legs" (1 S 17:6).

Two passages of wrong tr in AV have been corrected by RV. The virgin daughters of Babylon, "a man of the right hand" (Isa 47:2), RV renders; "Strip off the train [shēbhel], uncover the leg," the idea being that the gentle maid, who has been brought up in affluence and luxury, will have to don the attire of a slave girl and do menial work, for which her former garments are unsuited. The other passage is in Isa 3:20, where AV reads; "the bonnets, and the ornaments of the legs," RV corrects: "the head-tires [שדוקף], and the ankle chains." The word [שדוקף], found only in connection with the breaking of the legs of the persons crucified with the Saviour (Jn 19:31-32, 33). We know from Rom and Gr authors that this was done as a coup de grace to shorten the miseries of criminals condemned to die on the cross. The practice bore the technical name of σκελοστοια, σκελοποίησις, Lat. crucifragium. The vb, σκελοτείνη, σκελοκαπείν ("to break the legs"), is found in the apocryphal Gospel of St. Peter (4:14), where it is distinctly stated that the legs of Jesus were not broken, that His suffering on the cross might be intended, while the two malefactors crucified with Him were mercifully dispatched in this way. The crucifragium consisted of some strokes with a heavy club or mallet, which always materially hastened the death of the sufferer, and often caused it almost immediately.

Edersheim, in L.T.J.M. II, 613, suggests that the breaking of legs was an additional punishment, and that it was always followed by a coup de grace, the perforatio or percursor sub asa, a stroke with sword or lance into the side. This, however, is not borne out by any classical information which is known to me, and is contradicted by the statement of the evangelist that Jesus received the percursor, while the malefactors endured the crucifragium. Cf. on this subject, esp. for parallels from classical authors, Sepp, Das Leben Jesu, VII, 444, and Koeln, Jesus von Nazara (RF), VI, 253, note 3.

LEHABIM, leh-hā'bin (םֶהוֹבִין, Phābibim): Named in Gen 10:13; 1 Ch 1:11 as descendants of Mizraim. They are probably to be identified with the Luvian (q.v.), and the one word may be a corruption of the other.

LEHI, leh'hi. See Ramath-LEHI.

LEMUEL, lem'uels (םָלָמִל, līm'al, or מָלָמִל, līm'mal): A king whose words, an "oracle [taught him by his mother]," are given in Prov 31:1-9; and possibly the succeeding acrostic poem (va 10-31) is from the same source. Instead of translating the word after this name as "oracle," some propose to leave it as a proper name, translating "king of Massa," and referring for his kingdom to Massa (Gen 25:14), one of the sons of Ishmael, supposedly head of a tribe or sheik of a country. It is to be noted, however, that the words of Agur in the previous chapter are similarly called massā" oracle," with not so clear a reason for referring it to a country. See for a suggested reason for retaining the meaning "oracle" in both places, Proverbs, Book of, II, 6.

LEON, loan: The tr of 7 Heb and 2 Gr vbs.:

In the OT: יָמֹל, יָמָה, "to join," "to cause to join," "lend" (Ex 22:25; Dt 28:12,44; Ps 37:26; Prov 19:17; יָשָׁה, יָשָׁבוּ, "to be joined," "lend") (Dt 1:14; 21:1) (1) Lexical 14:21; Jer 15:10; יָשָׁה, יָשָׁבוּ (same Usages regi, as last, though different vb. stem, Hiphil), "to cause to bite," "lend on usury" (Dt 15:2; 24:10); יָשָׁה יָשָׁבוּ, "to bite," "lend" (cause to lend) on usury (Dt 23:19,20); יָשָׁה, יָשָׁבוּ, "to give" (Lev 25:37, RV "to give"); יָשָׁה יָשָׁבוּ, "to cause to borrow," "lend" (Dt 15:6); יָשָׁה יָשָׁבוּ, "to cause to ask," "lend" (Ex 12:36; RV "as last, but different vb. stem, Hiphil"). The last (Ym'lo) is found in above passages and in Neh 5:4; Prov 22:7, and is also in 1:4 and 5:5. In the NT "loan" is two Gr vbs., δανεῖς, δανίζω, "to lend money" (Le 6 34,35, usually in commercial sense); δανεῖς, δανίζω, "to lend money" (Rom 12:14; 1 Cor 16:14). The subst. "loan," יָמֹל יָמָה, occurs only once in the OT (1 S 20:20) and HEB, not at all in the NT.

LEPER, LEPÆRA, LEPROSY (לפרא, lépra; λέπρα, lépra): A slowly progressing and intractable disease characterized by subcutaneous nodules (Heb s'ṭēth; LXX ouët; AV “rising”), scabs or cuticular crusta (Heb sapparath; LXX sēmaota) and white shining spots appearing to be deeper than the skin (Heb baḥereth; LXX tālavγēma). Other signs are (1) that the hairs of the affected part turn white and (2) that later there is a growth of “quick raw flesh.” This disease in an especial manner rendered its victims unclean; even contact with a leper defiled whoever touched him, so the cure of other diseases is called healing, that of leprosy is called cleansing (except in the case of Miriam [Nu 12:13] and that of the Samaritan [Lk 17:15] where the word “heal” is used in reference to leprosy). The disease is described in the Papyrus Ebers as ukhedu (the Coptic name for leprosy is ḍḥt). It is also mentioned in ancient Indian and Japanese history. Hippocrates calls it “the Phoen disease,” and Galen names it “elephantiasis.” In Europe it was little known until imported by the returning soldiers of Pompey’s army after his Syrian campaign in 61 BC; but after that date it is described by Soranus, Aretaeus and other classic authors.

The first OT mention of this disease is as a sign given to God to Moses (Ex 4:6 [J]), which may be the basis of the story in Cap. 1, 31, that Moses was expelled from Egypt on account of his being a leper (see also i, 26 and Ant. III, xi, 4).

The second case is that of Miriam (Nu 12:10), where the disease is graphically described (Ep2). In Dt 24:8 there is a reference to the oral tradition concerning the treatment of lepers, without any details, but in Lev 13:14 (PC) the rules for the recognition of the disease, the preliminary quarantine periods and the ceremonial methods of cleansing are given at length. It is worthy of note that neither here nor elsewhere is there any mention of treatment or remedy; and Jehoram’s excommunication implies the belief that its cure could be accomplished only by miracle (2 K 7:7).

The lepromate stroke inflicted on Uzziah (2 K 15:5; 2 Ch 26:23) for his unwarrantable assumption of the priestly office began in his forehead, and a form of the disease peculiarly unclean (Lev 13:43–46) and requiring the banishment and isolation of the leper. It is remarkable that there is no reference to this disease in the prophetic writings, or in the Haggaiography.

In the NT, cleansing of the lepers is mentioned as a specific portion of Our Lord’s work of healing, and was included in the commission given to the apostles. There are few individual cases specially described, of Lk 17:12; but the leper whom Our Lord touched (Mt 8:2; Mk 1:40; Lk 5:12), but it is probable that these are only a few out of many such incidents. Simon the leper (Mt 26:6; Mk 14:3) may have been one of those cured by the Lord.

The disease is a zymotic affection produced by a microbe discovered by Hansen in 1871. It is contagious, although not very readily communicated by casual contact; in and locality one form is attended with absence of the particles of the patient, and the disease which is the commonest variety now met with in the East, is slower in its course than those forms in which nodular growths are the most prominent features, in which parts of the limbs often drop off. At present there are lepers to be seen at the gates of the cities in Pal. It is likewise prevalent in other eastern lands, India, China, and Japan. Cases are also to be seen in most of the Mediterranean lands and in Norway, as well as in parts of Africa and some parts of South and in South America. In former times it was occasionally met with in Britain, and in most of the older English cities there were leper houses, often called “lazarets” from the mistaken notion that the ezezmatous or varicose ulcers of Lazarus were leprous (Lk 16:20). Between 1096 and 1472, 112 such leper houses were founded in England. Of this disease King Robert Bruce of Scotland died.

There was special mediæval legislation excluding lepers from churches and forbidding them to wander from district to district. Leprosy has sometimes confused with other diseases; indeed the Gr physicians used the name lepra for the scaly skin disease now called psoriasis. In the more precise legislation there was one form of disease (Lev 13:13), in which the whiteness covers all the body, and in this condition the patient was pronounced to be clean. This was probably psoriasis, for leprosy does not, until a very late stage, cover all the body, and when it does so, it is not white. It has been surmised that Naaman’s disease was of this kind. Freckled spots (Heb bōbāk), which were to be distinguished from true leprosy (Lev 13:39), were either spots of herpes or of some other non-contagious skin disease. The modern Arab. word of the same sound is the name of a form of eczema. RV reads for freckled spot “tetter,” an old Eng. word from a root implying itchingness (see Hamid, 5, 11).

The homiletic use of leprosy as a type of sin is not Bib. The only Scriptural reference which might approach this is Ps 61:7, but this refers to Nu 19:18 rather than to the cleansing of the leper. The Fathers regarded leprosy as typical of heresy rather than of moral offences. (See Rabanus Maurus, Allegoria, a.v. “Lepra.”)

1. Leprosy in garments.—The occurrence of certain greenish or reddish stains in the substance of woolen or linen fabrics or in arid these materials is described in Lev 13:47 ff, and when these stains spread, or, after washing, do not change their color, they are pronounced to be due to a fretting group of lepers begging.
leprous (gā'ārēth mam'ěreth), and such garments are to be burnt. Among the specific articles of clothing are worn for years and are often hereditary, it is little wonder that they become affected by vegetable or animal parasites, and that which is here referred to is probably some form of mildew, such as Penicillium or mold-fungus. The destruction of such garments is a useful sanitary precaution. Possibly this sort of decaying garment was in Job's mind when he compares himself to a “rotten thing that consumeth, like a garment that is moth-eaten” (13: 28); see also Jude 23, “the garment spotted [esplōtēmon] by the flesh.”

(2) Leprosy in the house (Lev 14: 34, ff).—The occurrence of “hollow speeches, greenish or reddish,” in the plaster of a house is regarded as evidence that the wall is affected with leprosy, and when such is observed the occupant first clears his house of furniture, for if the discoloration be pronounced leprous, all in the home would become unclean and must be destroyed. Then he asks the priest to inspect it. The test is first, that the stain is in the substance of the wall, and, second, that it is spreading. In case these conditions are fulfilled, it is pronounced to be leprous and the affected part of the wall is torn down, its stones cast outside the city, its plaster scraped off and also cast outside the city; new stones are then built in and the house is newly plastered. Should the stain recur in the new wall, then the whole house is condemned and must be destroyed and its materials cast outside the city. The description is that of infection by some fungus attacking whatever organic material is in the mud plaster by which the wall is covered. If in woodwork, it might be the dry rot (Merulius lacrimarum), but this is not likely to spread except where there is wood or other organic matter. It might be the efflorescence of muriate salt (calcium nitrate), which forms flocculent masses when decomposing nitrogenous material is in contact with lime; but that is generally white, not green or reddish. Considering the uncleanliness of the house of the ordinary fellaith, it is little wonder that such fungus growths may develop in their walls, and in such cases the destruction of the house and its materials is a sanitary necessity.

It should be observed here that the attitude of the Law toward the person, garment or house suspected of leprosy is that if the disease be really present they are to be declared unclean and there is no means of destroying. If, on the other hand, the disease be proved to be absent, this freedom from the disease has to be declared by a ceremonial purification. This is in reality not the ritual for cleansing the leper, for the Torah provides none such, but the ritual for declaring him ceremonially free from the suspicion of having the disease. This gives a peculiar and added force to the words, “The lepers are cleansed,” as a testimony to Our Lord’s Divine mission.

LESHEM, le'šem. See LASHB.

LESSAU, les’ō (Δέσσαο, Lessōa; AV Dessaou): A place mentioned only in 2 Macc 14: 16 as the scene of a battle between Nicanael and the Jews. “Lessaou” of AV arises from confusion of A with A in the Gr. The place may be identified with Adasa (q.v.).

LET (kētīchō, katēchō): Usually in the sense of “permit” (AS letan), but also in Old Eng. with meaning of “hinder” (AS letan). This latter sense is found in 2 Thess 2: 7 AV, “Only be he who now letteth will let,” where RV has, “Only there is one that restraineth now.”

LETHECH, lē'thek (לֶתֶוֹק, lethokh): A liquid measure equivalent to half a homer (Hos 3: 2 m) and containing about 5½ bushels. See Weights and Measures.

LETTER, let’er. See EPISTLE.

LETTERS, let’ērz. See ALPHABET; WRITING.

LETSUSHIM, lē-tō'shim, lē-tā'shim (לְטָשִׁים, l'tishim): A Dedanite tribe in North Arabia (Gen 25: 3). With it are connected the Asshurim and Leummim (q.v.).

LEUMMIM, lē-um'im (לְעָמִים, P'ummim): A Dedanite tribe of North Arabia, connected with the Letushim (q.v.).

LEV, lē'vi (לֵי, lēv; Λευε, Lēue; WH Lēui, Lēuel):

(1) The 3d son of Jacob by Leah. See separate article.

(2) Two ancestors of Jesus in Lk’s genealogy (Lk 3: 24-29).

(4) The apostle Matthew. See MATTHEW.

LEV'I, lēv'i (לֵי, lēv; Λευε, Lēue; Lēuel): The third of Leah’s sons born to Jacob in Paddenaram (Gen 29: 34). In this passage the name is connected with the vb. lāweth, “to adhere,” or “be joined to,” Leah expressing assurance that with the birth of this third son, her husband might be drawn closer to her in the bonds of conjugal affection. There is a play upon the name in Nu 13: 24, where direction is given that the tribe of Levi be “joined unto” Aaron in the ministries of the sanctuary. The etymology here suggested is simple and reasonable. The grounds on which some modern scholars reject it are purely conjectural. It is asserted, e.g., that the name is adjectival, not nominal, describing one who attaches himself; and this is used to support the theory that the Levites were those who joined the Sem people when they left Egypt to return to Pal, who therefore were probably Egyptians. Others think it may be a gentilic form lē'chē, “wild cow” (Wellhausen, Proleg., 146; Stade, GVT, 152); and this is held to be the more probable, as pointing to early totem worship.

Levi shared with Simeon the infancy incurred at Schechem by the treacherous slaughter of the Shechemites (Gen 34). Jacob’s displeasure was expressed at the time (ver 3), and the memory was still bitter to him in his last days (49: 5 f). The fate predicted for the descendants of Simeon and Levi (ver 7), in the case of the latter on account of the tribe’s stedfast loyalty in a period of stern testing, was changed to a blessing (Ex 32: 20 f). In later lit. the action condemned by Jacob is mentioned with approval (Jr 9: 2 f). Levi was involved in his brothers’ guilt with regard to Joseph (Gen 37), and shared their experiences in Egypt before Joseph made himself known (chs 42-46). Three sons, Gershon, Kohath, and Merari, were born to him in Canaan, and went down with the caravan to Egypt (46: 11). Nothing further is known of the personal history of this patriarch. He died and found sepulture in Egypt. For the tribal history and possessions, see PRIESTS and LEVITES.

LEVIATHAN, lē-vi'a-than (לְוֵי-תָּחָן, leviathān; Job 41: 1-34), from דָּחַל, lāweth, “to fold”; cf. Arab. Q'n'l'b.
name of the wry neck, Lynx tortuilla, abu-luwah, from kindred Lynx, "to bend");

(1) The word "levithan" also occurs in Isa 27 1, where it is characterized as "the swift serpent... the crooked serpent"; in Ps 104 26, where a marine monster is indicated; also in Ps 74 14 and Job 3 8. The description in Job 41 has been thought by some to refer to the whale, while the whale suits better the expressions denoting great strength, the words apply better to the whole to the crocodile. Moreover, the whale is very seldom found in the Mediterranean, while the crocodile is abundant in the Nile, and has been known to occur in at least one river of Pal, the Zarka, N. of Jaffa. For a discussion of the behemoth and levithan as mythical creatures, see EB, s.v. "Belemoth" and "Levithan." The points in the description which may well apply to the crocodile are the great invulnerability, the strong and close scales, the limbs and the teeth. It must be admitted that there are many expressions which a modern scientist would not use with reference to the crocodile, but the Book of Job is neither modern nor scientific, but poetical and ancient.

LITERATURE

I. Legal Provisions. Nu 35 1-8 provides that 48 cities should be given to the Levites, each surrounded by a pastureage. The exact number details are not quite clear, for in the Heb, ver 4 would naturally be read as meaning that the pastureage was a radius of 1,000 cubits from the city walls, while ver 5 makes each city the center of a square, each side of which was 2,000 cubits long. Extant variants in the VSS suggest, however, that the text has suffered slightly in transmission. Originally there seems to have been no discrepancy between the two verses, and it may be doubted whether the intent was that the city was always to be in the mathematical center of the patch. The Levites were to have the right of redeeming the houses at any time, and in default of redemption they were to go out in the Jubilee. This would not be sold (Lev 25 32 f).

Dt 18 8 undoubtedly recognizes patrimonial possessions of the Levites outside the religious capital, and sees no inconsistency with its earlier statement that Levi had no inheritance with Israel (ver 1). The explanation lies in the fact that those cities were not a tribal portion like the territories of the secular tribes. The area occupied by the whole 48 jointly would only have around 16 miles.

II. WELLAUSEN'S VIEW—Josh 21 relates that this command was fulfilled by the allocation of 48 cities, but it is clear that some of those cities were not in fact reduced into possession; see e.g. Josh 16 10; Jgs 1 29 as to Gazer, and Jgs 1 27 as to Taanach. Wellhausen treats the whole arrangement as fictitious. His main reasons are: (1) that the arrangement is physically impracticable in a mountainous country, and (2) that there is no historical basis for it. Many remained in the hands of the Canaanites till a later period, while others were "important but by no means ecclesiastical towns" (Prolegomena, 190).

Two pages later he says that "four of them were demonstrably famous seats of worship," and conjectures that most, if not all, were ancient sanctuaries. He also regards Ezekiel's scheme of a heave offering of land (ch 45) as the origin of the idea. Yet "Jerus and the temple, which, properly speaking, occasioned the whole arrangement, are buried in silence with a diligence which is in the highest degree surprising" (p. 164).

III. Alternative View and Evidence.—In point of fact, there are traces of some of the Levitical cities in the later history. These are:

1. Traces of Anathoth (1 K 2 26; Jer 1 1; 32), of Jattir (2 S 20 26, where, as shown by the fact, the Jairite), Bethel (1 S 8 13-15; see Priests and Levites as to the text). (From Am 7 17 it appears that Amaziah of Bethel had land, but we do not know that he was of Levitical descent or where the land was.) Further, the fact that many other Levitical cities appear to have been centers of worship points to the presence of priests. Was Arguments the great high place of Gibon (1 K Answered 3 4) unserved by priests? It is surely natural to suppose that during the period between the capture of the Ark and its transport to Jerusalem there was a tendency for high places to spring up in cities where there were priests rather than elsewhere; indeed there would probably be a disposition on the part of unemployed priests to go astray in a direction that would prove lucrative.

With regard to the other objection, Van Hoonacker's answer is convincing: "As to the way in which the measurements were to be carried out in the manner Hoonacker's of Pal, the legislator doubtless knew what method was usually employed. Besides, we are free to believe that he only gives these figures as approximate indications" (Sacred Israelite, 433).

The same writer's reply to the theory that the idea originated with Ezekiel is wholly admirable. "Strictly we could ask... whether Ezekiel's Levit did not find himself on the vision description of the camp of the Israelites in the desert. It is only too manifest that the division and appointment of the territory as presented in ch 48 of the prophet are scarcely inspired by practical necessities, that they have a very pronounced character of ideal vision; and 'from fancy is pure fancy,' we ought also to find the elements which are at the basis of Ezekiel's vision. The tents of the tribe of Levi ranged around the tabernacle explain themselves in the PC; we may doubt whether the Levites, deprived of territory (Ezk 44 29) and nevertheless grouped on a common territory, in the conditions described in Ezk 48, explain themselves with equal facility. A camp is readily conceived on the pattern of a chessboard, but not the country of Canaan. We need not stop there. It is in fact certain that Ezekiel here has in view the protection of the holiness of the temple from all profanation; and in the realm of the ideal, the means are appropriate to the end" (op. cit., 425 f).
Lastly there runs through Wellhausen's discussion the confusion between a city where priests may be dwelling and a priestly city. There are three places in the chronological statement of Exodus 20:24 which may be such Cities and in London or Chicago; but none of these three places can be regarded as a priestly city in the same sense as the Levitical cities. Not one of them has ever been a patrimonial city of priests, nor could be the origin of such an arrangement.

While therefore the whole of the cities mentioned in Josh 21 were certainly not reduced into possession at the time of the conquest, the Wellhausen theory on this matter cannot be sustained.

Literature.—J. Wellhausen, Prolegomena, 159-63; A. Van Hoonacker, Sacerdotes Jevitis, 423-35 (very brilliant and important).

Literature

I. General Data.—The third book of the Pentateuch is generally named by the Jews according to the first word of the first verse, מנֵבֶית, unaged or עֶבֶית, and by the LXX called μανάσπητα, Levitikon, or Leviticus, by the Vulg., accordingly, “Leviticus” (i.e. Liber), sometimes “Levitiicum”). The Jews have also another name taken from its contents, viz. לְפִּיאֵבַם, תֹּרָתָא כֵּלֶּם, “Law of the Priests.”

As a matter of fact ordinances pertaining to the priesthood, to the Levitical system, and to the cultus constitute a most important part of this book; but specifically the character of Book

2. Character of Book: religious and ethical commands, as we find them, e.g. in chs 18-20, are not wanting; and there are also some historical sections, which, however, are again connected with the matter referring to the cultus, namely the consecration of the priests in chs 8 and 9, the sin and the punishment of two sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu (10 1ff), and the account of the stoning of a blasphemer (24 10ff). Of the Levites, on the other hand, the book does not treat at all. They are mentioned only once and that incidentally in 25 32ff. Thus these chapters are stated to have been given bhar śinay (7 38; 25 1; 26 46; 27 34), which expression, on account of ch 11, in which Jeh is described as speaking to Moses out of the tent of meeting, is not to be translated “but at” Mt. Sinai. The connection of this book with the preceding and following books, i.e. Ex and Nu, which is commonly acknowledged as being the case, at least in some sense, leaves for the contents of Lev exactly the period of a single month, since the last chapter, Ex 34 26ff, marks the close of the tabernacle. Of the erection of the tabernacle the 1st day of the 1st month of the 2d year of the Exodus, and Nu 11 1 takes us to the 1st day of the 2d month of the same year. Within this time of one month the consecration of the priests fills out 8 days (Lev 8 33; 9 1). A sequence in time is indicated only by 16 1, which directly connects with what is reported in ch 10 concerning Nadab and Abihu. In the same way the ordinances given in 10 6ff are connected with the events of the same month, the 1st month of the 1st year of the Exodus. The laws are described as being revelations of Jeh, generally given to Moses (of 1 1; 4 1; 5 14; 6 19.24 [Heb 12:17]; 7 22.28, etc); sometimes to Moses and Aaron (of 11 1; 13 1; 14 33; 15 1, etc), and, rarely, to Aaron alone (10 8). In 10 12ff, Moses gives some directions to the priests, which are based on a former revelation (of 6 16 [Heb 9ff]; 7 37ff).

In 10 16ff., we have a difference of opinion between Moses and Aaron, or rather his sons, which was decided on the basis of an independent application of principles given in Lev. Most of these commands are to be announced to Israel (1 2; 4 2; 7 23.39; 9 3ff; 11 2; 12 2; 16 2; 18 2, etc); others to the priests (6 9.25 [Heb 2.18]; 21 2; 22 2, etc); or to the priests and the Israelites (10 15), while the directions in reference to the Day of Atonement, with which Aaron was primarily concerned (16 2), beginning with ver 29, without a special superscription, are undeniably changed into injunctions addressed to all Israel; cf also 21 24 and 21 2. As the Book of Ex treats of the communion which God offers on His part to Israel and which culminates at last in His dwelling in the tent of meeting (40 34ff; of under Ex 25, 1.2), the Book of Lev contains the ordinances which were to be given out by the Israelites in religious, ethical and cultural matters, in order to restore and maintain this communion with God, notwithstanding the imperfections and the guilt of the Israelites. And as this book thus with good reason occupies its well-established place in the story of the founding and in the earliest history of the theocracy, so too even a casual survey and intelligent glance at the contents of the book will show that we have here a well-collated and organic unity, a unity which is now only confirmed and strengthened by the presentation of the structure of the book in detail (see under II, below).

As a rule, critics are accustomed first of all regard chs 17-25 or 26 as an independent section, and find in these chapters a legal code

3. Unity of Book: Law of Holiness was united with the other parts.

It is indeed true that a series of peculiarities have been found in these chapters. To these peculiarities belong the frequent repetition of the formulas: “I am Jehovah your God” (18 24; 19 24, etc); or “I am Jehovah” (13 5.6.21; 19 14.16, etc), or “I am Jehovah, who has separated you” (20 24), or “who sanctified you” (20 8; 21 8.15.23, etc). To these peculiarities belong the references in words, or, in fact, to the land of Canaan, into which Israel is to be led (18 33.24ff: 19 23-29; 20 32ff; 23 25), and also to Egypt, out of which He has led the people (18 3; 19 34; 22 33; 26 13.45, etc); as further, the demand for sanctity in General warning against desecration (19 12; 21 23, etc), both based on the holiness of Jehovah. In addition, a number of peculiar expressions are repeatedly found.

Because of their contents these chapters have, on the Kleinertian interpretation, been given the letter H (i.e. Law of Holiness); or, according to the suggestion of Dillmann, by the letter L (i.e. Sinaitic Law), because, according to 25 1: 26 46, the letter L has been given at Mt. Sinai, and because in certain critical instances it was at the time of the Sinaitic Conquest that the laws contain old laws from the Mosaic period, although these had been changed in form. These earlier views have apparently now been discarded by the critics entirely.

Examination of critical theory.—We, however, do not believe that it is at all justifiable to separate these parts from the other chapters. In the first place, these peculiarities, even if such are found here more frequently than elsewhere, are not restricted to these chapters exclusively. The Decalogue (Ex 20 3) begins with the words, "I am Jehovah, the God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage." Ex 23 31 contains the demand, "Ye shall be holy men unto me." Ex 29 44.45 contains a promise that God will dwell in the midst of the Israelites, in the Holy Place, even as they shall dwell in their God, who has brought them out of Egypt in order to dwell in their midst as Jehovah, their God (cf., further, Ex 6 6-8; 31 13 f.; Lev 10 10.11; 11 44; Nu 16 37-41; 33 52 f.55; Dt 14 21). It is a more than risky undertaking to find in these and in other sections scattered remnants of H, esp. if these are seen to be indispensable in the connection in which they are found, and when no reason can be given why they should be separated from the collection of laws. Then, too, the differences of opinion on the part of the critics in assigning these different parts to H, do not make us favorably inclined to the whole hypothesis. Hoffmann, esp. (Die wichtigsten Entwürfe für die G 29-Welk- hausenische Hypothese, I), has shown how impossible it is to discern from H the other ordinances of the PC in so radical a manner. In saying this we do not at all wish to deny the peculiar character of these chapters, only we do not believe that ch 17 can be added on to ch 16, as is assumed in this section; for in ch 17 all the characteristic peculiarities of the Holiness Law are lacking; and, on the other hand, in ch 26 the expression "I am Jehovah your God," or a similar one in vs 12.13.44 f., is found. The superscription of ch 26 connects ch 26 with the preceding; and, further, the reference to the Sab- batical year as described in ch 25, found in 26 34 f., 43, is not to be overlooked. Finally, also, other legal codes, such as that in the first Book of the Covenant (Ex 23 20-33) and that of Dt (27 11-26 58) close with the offer of a blessing or a curse.

The chapters under consideration (Lev 18-26) are most closely connected with each other solely through their contents, which have found expression in a particular form, without these facts being suffi- ciently understood. It is the claim of the -legal code. For since in chs 1-17 all those things which separate the Israelites from their God have been considered and bridged over (cf. chs 1-7, the laws concerning sacrifices; chs 8-10, the mediator- ship of the priests; chs 11-15, the unclean things; ch 16, the Day of Atonement; ch 17, the use made of blood), we find in chs 18-26 an account of the God-pleasing conduct, which admits of nothing that desecrates; namely, chs 18-20 contain laws dealing with marriage and chastity and other matters of religious, ethical or cultural kind, together with the punishments that follow their transgression; chs 21 f determine the true character of the priests and of the sacred obligations; chs 23 f., the cons- truction of the seasons, of life and death, etc.; ch 26, the Sabbath and the Jubilee year; ch 26 contains the offer of a blessing or a curse. Chs 1-17 have, as it were, a negative character; chs 18-26 a positive character. In chs 1-17 the consciousness of what is unclean, imperfect and guilty is awakened and the punishment is shown; in chs 18-26 the converse is the case. In chs 18-26 the norm of a holy life is set forth. Even if these two parts at certain places show a great likeness that the occurrence of an interchange of ordinances is possible, yet the peculiar character of each part is mainly recognized; and this is also a very essential argument for the view that both parts have one and the same author, who intentionally brought the two parts into closer connection and yet separated them from each other. On this supposition the peculiarities of chs 18-26 are sufficiently explained, and also the positive contents of these chapters and the fact that just these chapters are referred to in preexilic lit. oftener than is the case with chs 1-7. Further, there is a special connection between Ex 20 and the book of Lev. Hence it is to be regarded as a consequence of the common tendency of both authors and not as the result of their having used a common source (see Ezekiel, II, 2). In 26 46-47 there is a conclusion which corresponds to 25 1; 7 37 f.; 1 1, and accordingly regards chs 1-26 as a unity; while ch 27, which treats of vows and of tithes, with its separate sub- scriptio in verse 34, shows that it is an appendix or a supplement, which is, however, in many ways connected with the rest of the book, so that this addition cannot, without further grounds, be regarded as pointing to another author.

II. Structure.—Modern criticism ascribes the entire Book of Lev, being a special legal code, to the PC. The question which arises in connection with this claim will be discussed under III, below. At this point we must first try to awaken a consciousness of the fact, that in this special particular, too, the author of the PC has been very handy upon the stage of total disintegration; that the reasons assigned for the separation of the sources are constantly becoming more arbitrary and sub- jective; and that the absurd consequences to which they consistently lead from the very outset arouse distrust as to the correctness of the process. Just as in the historical parts the critics have for long no longer content with J (Jahwist) and E (Elohists), but have added a P and J, an E' and E", and as Severs and Gunkel have gone further, and in detail have completely shattered both J and E into entirely separate fragments (see Genesis), so P, too, is beginning to experience the same fate. It is high time that, for both the historical and the legal sections, the opposite course be taken, and that we turn from the dismemberment to the combination of these documents; that we seek out and emphasize those features which, in form and content, unite the text into a clear unity. For this reason we lay aside this section, which deals with the structure of the book, and treat of the matter (1) negatively and (2) positively (see Exodus, II).

(1) Theories of disintegration.—We have already seen in the art. DAY OF ATONEMENT (1, 2, [2]) in connection with Lev 16 an example of these at- tempts at dissection, and here still add several exam- ples in order to strengthen the impression on this subject.

(a) General considerations: If we for the present dis- regard the details, then, according to von Borsche (Kurzer Hand-Kommentar zum Alten Testament), not only chs 17- 26 (see, above, under I) at one time existed as a separate legal corpus, but also the so-called "legalistic" chs 1-7, and also the laws concerning the clean and the un- clean in chs 11-15, concerning ch 16 see above. That ch 27 is regarded as a supplement is ascribed to a different author. Finally, the so-called "fundamental document" of P (marked Pg) contained only parts from chs 9 (also a few matters from ch 8), as also one of the three threads of ch 16, for Lev 6 the consecration of the priests demanded in Ex 25 f, which also are regarded as a part of Pg. and ch 16 is claimed to consist again of various fragments of the DAY OF ATONEMENT (1, 2). All these separate parts of Lev (i.e. chs 1-7, 8-10, 11-15, 16-26) are divided into a number of more independent sub- parts; thus, e.g., chs 1-7, containing the sacrificial laws, are regarded as a separate unit; chs 8-10, as made to correspond to Lev 1-7, are also regarded as a separate unit; chs 11-15, containing the laws for the clean and the unclean in chs 11-15 are divided into the separate pieces, chs 11-12, chs 13-14, and these are divided into parts. There are no parts that are at one time and in a certain manner Independently and separated from each other. But how complicated in detail the composition is considered to be, we can see from chs 17-26.

(b) Chs 17-26 considered in detail: While Baentsech (Hand-Kommentar zum Alten Testament) accepts, to be based on two strata (H and E), certain portions from chs 23-25; H = chs 21; H = ch 17. Baentsech holds (against von Rad) that the development of the following sections as chapters follows: "... in detail we feel justified in separating the following pieces: (i) 17 3-4 (5.6a); 5.10-14; (ii) 17 15-17; (iii) 19 f. 21 f.; and this uniting with (iv) 19 3 f.l. 27 f. 30.31.33.36, which was probably done by a later editor, and that the former were inserted by the person who united these parts, viz. 18. 27.35.26.25. 33; (iv) 19. 9.10.13-15.9.32.33; (v) 19 8-23.20; (vi) 19 23.30-21; 19 30; (vii) 21 1-28. 15-17.17-32; 22. 3.8.10-14.18-25-27-30; (ix) 23 10-30. 30.31; (x) 23. 15; (xi) except vv 16ab; (vi) 25 7-18. 22-23.38.39.40a.42 f. 47.53.55; (xii) 25. 58,9.10a.13. 14-16.17.24 f. In uniting these pieces Rb (the Redactor of the Law of Holiness) seems to have added de suo the following: 17 5 (beginning); 18 25-21.24.26.28.29; 19 33-35. 29-32. 21 6-7; 21.9.15f.31-33; 23 22; 25 11 f. 26 1 f. At the same time he unite with these an other parenetic section, 26 3-45, which, by insertional of the text, and can do more than hear the dress of this small legal code. All the rest that is found in chs 17-26 seems to be the result of a revision in the spirit of P not, however, as though originally it all came from the hand of Rb (Redactor P). That he rather added and worked together other older pieces from P (which did not belong to Pf) is seen from an analysis of ch 23. ... As the present passage was together considered, we have a reliable terminus ad quem in a comparison of Neh 8 14-18 with Lev 23 36 (P). The context from the outset remembers that, still, after the uniting of these different parts, the marks of the editorial pen are to be noticed in the following sections after this unison of number of additions were yet made to the text. This is so far as chs 26-32 is concerned, and is probable as to chs 24 1-4. 10-14.23: 25 32-34; and that this editorial work even went so far as to put sections from P in the place of parts of H can possibly be concluded from vv 24 1-4.

(c) Extravagance of critical treatment: This is also true of all the other sections, as can be seen by a reference to the books of Bertholet and Baentsech. What should surprise us most, the complicated and external manner in which our Bb. text, which has such a wonderful history back of it, is declared by the critics to have originated, or the keenness of the critics, who, with the ease of child's play, are able to detect and trace out this growth and development of the text, and can do more than hear the dress grow? But this amazement is thrust into the background when we contemplate what becomes of the Bible text under the manipulations of the critics. The compass of this article makes it impossible to give as a general survey of the often totally divergent and contradictory schemes of Baentsech and Bertholet and others on the distribution of this book among different sources; and still less possible is it to give a critical criticism of these. But this critical method really condemns itself more thoroughly than any examination of its claims would. All who are not yet entirely hypnotized by the spell of the documentary hypothesis will feel that by this method all genuine scientific research is brought to an end. If the way in which this book originated had been so complicated, it certainly could never have been again reconstructed.

(2) Reasons for disembarrassment.—We must at this place confine ourselves to indicating and discarding some typical reasons which are urged in favor of a distribution among different authors.

(a) Alleged repetitions: We find in the parts belonging to P a number of so-called repetitions. In chs 1-7 we find a twofold discussion of the five kinds of offerings with repetitions. The oral measures are enacted for deeds which had been described already in ch 18; in 19 3.30; 23 3; 26 2 the Sabbath command is intensified; in 19 f f; 22 29 f. we find commands which had been touched upon already in 15 f f. In 19 we find almost verbatim repeated in 23 22; 24 f f. It repeats ordinances concerning the golden candlestick from Ex 27 20 ff, etc. The existence of these repetitions cannot be denied; but is the conclusion drawn from this fact correct? It certainly is possible that one and the same author could have handled the same materials at different places and that points of agreement by chance 17-4 in regard to the sacrifices. Chs 18 and 20 (miscued and punishments) are even necessarily and mutually supplementary. Specially important laws can have been repeated, in order to emphasize and impress them all the more; or they are placed in peculiar relations or in a unique light (cf, e.g., 24 1 ff, the command in reference to the golden candlestick in the pericope chs 23-24; see below). Accordingly, as soon as we can furnish a reason for the repetition, it becomes understandable; and often in this case, the objections are unremoved if we ascribe the repetitions to a new author, who made the repetition by way of an explanation (see Exodus, 11, 2, (5)).

(b) Separation of materials: Other reasons will join to the ordinance with separating materials that are related. That ch 16 is connected with chs 8-10, and these connect with Ex 25 ff, is said to prove that this had been the original order in these sections. But the materials which are clearly connected be without any reason torn asunder by the insertion of foreign data? Or has the interpolator perhaps had reasons of his own for doing this? Why are these not broken ascribed. The original passage of chs 17-26, which are properly placed before Lev 8-10, because in these latter chapters the sacrifices are described as already being made (9.7.15, the sin offering; 9.7.12.16, the burnt offering; 9.17; 10.12, the meal offering; 9.18, the peace offering). In the same way chs 11-15, through 15.31, are inwardly connected with Lev 16, since these chapters speak of the defiling of the dwelling-place of Jeh, from which the Day of Atonement delivers (16.16f.33). As a matter of course, the original writer as well as a later redactor could have had time also connected parts in a looser or more external manner. In this way, in 7.22 ff, the command not to eat of the fats of or the blood has been joined to the ordinance with reference to the use of the peace offerings in 7.19 ff. This again is the case when, in ch 2, vs 11-13 have been inserted in the list of the different kinds of meal offering; when after the general scheme of sin offerings, according to the hierarchical order and rank in this, special cases are mentioned in 5 f f; and when in 5.7 ff commands are given to prevent too great poverty; or when in 6.19 ff the priestly meal offerings are found connected with other ordinances with reference to the meal offerings in general (9.14 f f; or when the share that belongs to the priest (7.8 f) is found connected with his claim to the guilt offering (7.1 f); or the touching of the meat offering by something unclean (7.10 f) is found connected with the ordinances concerning the peace offerings; or when in ch 11 the ordinances dealing with the unclean animals gradually pass over into ordinances concerning the touching of these animals, as is already indicated by the subscription 11.4.6 f (cf with ver 2). Still more would be natural to unite different parts in other ways also. In this way the ordinances dealing with the character of the sacrifices in 22.17-30 could, regarded by themselves, be placed also in chs 1-7. But in ch 22 they are also placed in 22.17-20. The character of chs 1-7 would have become too complicated if they were inserted here. In such matters the author must have freedom of action.

sideration (cf 10 12 ff; 19 9 11 ff, 15 ff.). But how each change in number may be explained. In case the pl. is used, the author or the words are regarded as being distributed into individuals; and in the case of a m. pl. the pl. can at once be ascribed to the sing., since the author is thinking now only of separate individuals. Naturally, too, the sing. is the form which the author thinks of when he refers to the people as a whole. Sometimes the change is made simply for the sake of the same verse or run of thought, and this in itself ought to have banished the thought of a difference of authors in such cases. In the case of an Interpolated difference from the outset all the more probable that he would have paid more attention to the possibility of this conclusion. It is true of the Book of the Covenant (Ex 22 20-25 29 ff; 33 9 ff; cf Dt 12 2 ff, 13 ff), In regard to these passages, also, the modern critics are accustomed to do other than the above) a single writer, who was completely absorbed by the subject-matter. Besides, such a change in form was very frequently found in the sense of "remaking," and does not signify "sin offering" at all: at any rate, already in Ex 6 3 we find the characteristic terms used to denote the latter sense. Thus this section is found only in the form which appears as entirely in harmony with the connection.

(c) According to Ex 29 7; Lev 4 3 5 16; 6 20 22; 8 17; 16 32; 21 10 12, the high priest is the only one who is anointed. But the text as it reads does not make it impossible that there was a double anointing. According to the first set of passages, Aaron is anointed in such a manner that the anointing oil is poured upon his head (cf Ex 29 7 and Lev 4 3). Then, too, he and all his sons are anointed in such a way that a mixture of the oil and of the blood is sprinkled upon them and on their garments (cf Ex 29 21 and Lev 8 30). Were we here dealing with a difference in reference to the theory and the facts of the priesthood, as these were current at the time of the exile (see II 111 below), then surely the victorious party would have seen to it, that their views alone were represented in these laws, and the opposing views would have been suppressed. But now both anointings are found side by side in the same chapter, and the same page.

(d) The different punishments prescribed for carnal intercourse with strangers are also easily explained by the fact, that, in the first passage, the periods are spoken of which only in the second passage, those which had already set in before.

(e) As far as the difference in terminology is concerned, it must be remembered that in their claim the critics either overlook that intentional differences may arise between different persons who deliberate or that they ignore the fact that it is possible in almost every section of a writer's work to find some expressions which are always, or at least often, peculiar to him; or finally, they in an inexcusable way ignore the freedom of selection which a writer has between different synonyms or his choice in using these.

All in all, it must be said that however much we acknowledge the keenness and the industry of the modern critics in clearing up many difficulties, and the fact that they bring many questions that demand answers, it nevertheless in the fact that they take the matter of solving these problems entirely too easily, by arbitrarily claiming different authors, without taking note of the fact that by doing this the real difficulty is not removed, but is only transferred to another place. What could possibly be acceptable as satisfactory in one single instance, namely that through the thoughtlessness of an editor discrepancies in form or matter had found their way into the text, is at once claimed to be the regular mode of solving these difficulties—just in itself thoughtlessness. On the other hand, the critics overlook the fact that it makes little difference for the religious and the ethical value of these commands, whether logical, systematic, linguistic or aesthetic correctness in all their parts has been attained or not, to which must yet be added, that a failure in the one particular may at the same time be an advantage in the other. In this respect we need recall only the anachronisms of the apostle Paul.

2. Structure found in the exposition of all those of the Book of Lev shows all the marks of being a well-constructed and organic literary product, which in its fundamental characteristics has already been outlined under I above. And as this was done in the several articles just cited, we can here add further, as a confirmatory factor in favor of the acceptance of an inner literary unity of the book, that the division of the book into its logical parts, even down to minute details, is here, as is so often the case elsewhere, not only virtually self-evident in many particulars, but that the very made only for the sake of apparent logical parts in this adjustment of the parts almost forces itself upon our recognition. In other places the same is at least suggested, and can be traced throughout the book without the least violence to the text. The system need not be forced upon the materials. We often find sections but loosely connected with the preceding parts (cf under I above) and not united in a strictly logical manner, but which are nevertheless related in thought and association of ideas. In harmony with the division of the Book of Gen we find at once that the general contents, as mentioned under I above, easily fall into 10 pericopes, and it is seen that these consist of 2 sets each of 5 pericopes together with an appendix.

(a) Ten pericopes in two parts: Part I, the separation from God and the removal of this separation: (i) chs 1-7; (ii) chs 8-10; (iii) chs 11-16; (iv) ch 16; (v) ch 17.

Part II, the conduct of the people of God: (i) chs 18-20; (ii) chs 21-22; (iii) chs 23-24; (iv) ch 25; (v) ch 26.

Appendix, ch 27; cf for the number 10 the division of Ex 1 8-7 7; 7 8-13 16; 13 17-18 27; also the Decalogue, 20 1 44; 22 18-29; and see Exodus I 11, 22-29 in Lev probably 18 6-18; 19 8-18, and with considerable certainty 19 1-37 (see below).
The above, however, by no means exhausts this list of references and similar thoughts, and we have here given only some leading illustrations. What literary tricks must be resorted to when, over against this overwhelming mass of evidence, critics yet insist that the different parts of the book were originally independent writings, esp. too, when the entire tabernacle and utensils of the Aaronic priesthood, the Day of Atonement, the Year of Jubilee, the whole sacrificial scheme and the laws dealing with the great festivals, the restriction of the slaying of the sacrificial animals to the central sanctuary, are regarded as the products of imagination alone, according to the Wellhausen hypothesis (cf III, below, and see also the references to "Day of Atonement", III, 1; Ezekiel, II, 2). And how little is gained in addition when, as is sometimes done, in a most arbitrary manner, the statements found in chs 1-3 concerning the tabernacle of revelation ("tent of meeting") and concerning Aaron’s sons, or concerning Aaron and his sons together, are regarded as later additions. In Lev and Ex 26 ff., 36 ff., everything is so entirely one and the same character and has so clearly emanated from one and the same spirit, that it is impossible to separate from this product any constituent part and to unite these into groups that were originally independent, then to split up these still further and to trace the parts to their sources, and even to construct a scheme of all religious and historical development on this reconstruction of the sources.

(2) Structure of the individual pericopes.—As the windows and the column capitals of a mediæval cathedral are arranged according to different schemes and this divergence is regarded as an enrichment of the structure, so we find in the Leviticus a structure of the various pericopes of the Book of Lev. These latter, too, possess a certain symphony of different tones, but all are rhythmically arranged, and only when united do they produce the entire symphony.

(a) The laws concerning the sacrifices (Lev 1-
The reference 15-18, what and 22-27. 28-36, In is (i) (iii) With and Ch 22 sacrifices with above) 28-36, 9-17; and the free the with 5 1-7, relating with that they are duplicates, to different authors.

That there is a difference between these two accounts is proved, not only by the fact that the first set of laws are exact, cf 1-7, 8-10; and the second set 6 8; 7 21 to Aaron and his sons (ch 28). the second set has also in common a number of altogether different viewpoints as compared with the first set, so that the same author found himself compelled to write up the facts fresh. On the other hand, the fact that both have the same author is evident from the connection between the two sections. In addition to the fact that both make mention of all five kinds of sacrifices, we can yet compare 3 5 with 6 22 (the fact that the second offering over the burnt sacrifices upon the pieces of wood): and, further, the express reference of 6 17 to ch 4, while 6 30 presumes the distinct separation of the sin offering, the blood of which is brought into the tent of meeting, from the other sacrifices, as these are given in 4 3 ff. 10 over against 4 22 ff. 27 ff. Ch 4, with its reference to the peace offerings (vs 10-13), is again most closely connected with ch 3. We must accordingly insist that the whole account is most intimately interwoven. Over against this, the first set, chs 1-5, is in 14-15 of the ritual for the peace offering, is sufficiently explained only by the fact that this ritual was to be used in the second set (6-7 21), and here for the first time only in ch 15, which fact again speaks for the same author for both sets and against the supposition that they were merely mechanically united by a redactor. The fact that the second set 6 8-7 21 has a different order from that of chs 1-5, by uniting the sin offering immediately with the meal offering (6 24 ff with vs 14-23), is probably one of the minor ordinances in 7 9 and 10 (manner of eating the meal offering and the sin offering). On the other hand, the position of the peace offering in the second set (7 11 ff) furnished the possibility of giving to the piece of the entire pericope embracement a suitable conclusion: 7 22 ff (prohibition of the eating of the fat and the blood), connected with 7 19 ff, contained in 7 25 ff an ordinance designed to limit the peace offering (beef), with the breast and wave-thigh. At any rate, these last two pieces are to be regarded separately from the rest. Since they are no longer addressed to the priests, as is 6 8-7 21, but to all Israel; cf 7 23-29. On some other data less intimately connected with the matter, cf above under 1.

(b) Consecration of priests and related matters (Lev 8-10): In this pericope, as in the following, ch 17 inclusive, but esp. from ch 11 on, the principle of division on the basis of the number of predicates, in many cases in the details, too; so that this could scarcely be regarded as an accidental feature (cf also the history of Abraham in Gen 12-26; further, in Ex 35 4-40 38; and in Exons, II, 2, [7]; Lev 16, under D or Aonx—merx, I, 2, [11]; Dt 12-26, too, is probably to be divided on this principle, even to the minutest details (of finally Lev 21-22 16; 22 17-30; chs 23 f and 26).

(i) Ch 8, treating of the first seven days of the consecration of the priests: The outline is found in ver 2, naming Aaron, the anointing oil, the bull of the sin offering, two rams, unleavened bread (cf vs 6 ff. 10 ff. 11 ff. 18 ff. 23 ff. 26 ff). (ii) Ch 9 the first sacrifices of Aaron and his sons on the 8th day (vs 2-4 contain the outline, after the manner of 8 2; cf vs 7 ff. 11 ff. the sin offering and the burnt offering of Aaron with ver 2; also vs 15-18, treating of what the people brought for the sacrifices, with vs 3 f; but it is to be noticed that the meal offering and the peace offering (vs 17-18) are given in inverted order from that found in 6 1 ff. Here too we find the number seven, if we add the burnt offering for the new moon (ver 17). (iii) 10 1-7, the sin of Nadab and Abihu and their punishment by death; (iv) 10 8-20, ordinances concerning the priests, occasioned by 9 9-10, and added with new superscription in 10 8, namely (a) 10 8, dealing with the prohibition of the use of wine and intoxicants; (b) 10 9 ff, distinction between the holy and the unholy; (c) 10 12-15, the eating of the sacred oblations; (d) 10 16-20, the treatment of the goat for the sin offering.

(c) Laws concerning the clean and unclean (Lev 11-16): (i) ch 11, treating of clean and unclean animals. The outline of the chief contents is found in 11 46 with a free transplantation of one number. There are a few cases of repetition (cf again 8, quadrupeds; (b) vs 9-12, water animals; (c) vs 13-23, birds (with an appendix, treating of contact with the unclean, vs 24-28, which give a summary of the animals not yet mentioned, as vs 29-45, the small animals upon the earth (again in four subdivisions, viz. [i] vs 29-38; [ii] vs 39 ff; [iii] vs 41 f; [iv] vs 44 f).

(ii) Ch 12 treats of women in confinement, also in four pieces (vs 2-4, birth of a male child; ver 5, birth of a female child; vs 6 ff., purification ceremony; ver 8, ordinances in case of extreme poverty). These parts are not joined logically, but in a rather external manner.

(iii) The passage 13 1-14 53, containing the laws of leprosy, with the subscription in 14 54 ff. (Because seven points are to be enumerated, vs 55 [garments and houses], this is not as in its further exposition separated from the other laws and is placed in their midst.) The exposition contains four pieces, viz. (a) 13 1-44, leprosy on human beings (with concluding verses, 45 f), with seven subdivisions, of which the first five longer ones are constructed along fairly parallel lines, and again can be divided into four super-subdivisions: (1) 13 1-8; 9-17; 18-23; 24-28; 29-37; 38-40; 44-50. The significance of the number seven for the structure (see [2], [3], above) is akin to that found, e.g., in Ex 24 18—31 18 (see Exons, II, 2, [5]); Lev 19-25 (see above); I Kings 3 13—3 14; 13-16; 21 1-16; 23 24—31 13. In any case below); finally, the whole Book of Ex is divided into seven parts (see Exons, II, 1). (9) 13 47-59, leprosy in connection with garments, with four subdivisions, namely vs 47-50; 51 f; 53 f; 55 f. The last subdivision can again be readily separated into four sub-subdivisions, viz. vs 55; 56; 57; 58. (g) 14 1-32, purifications (ver 2 being a special superscription), with four subdivisions, viz. (i) vs 28-3a, the leper before the priest; (ii) vs 36-9, the purification ceremony on the seventh days, again divided into 4 sub-subdivisions: vs 3b f; 5-7; 8; 9; (iii) vs 10-20, the ceremony of the eighth day (4 sacrifices, namely vs 12-18, guilt offering; ver 19a, sin offering; ver 19b, burnt offering; ver 20, meal offering; in the 4 sacrifices 12-6 7 there are again 4 different actions: vs 14; 15 f; 17; 18; (iv) vs 21-32 (in cases of poverty) (a) 14 33-53, leprosy in houses, with four subdivisions: vs 33-35; 36-38; 39-42; 43-53.

(iv) Ch 15, sickness or natural issues, with 4 subdivisions, namely, the garments, the sacred, with issues together with their purification (vs 3-12 contain 12 laws: vs 3; 4a; 4b; 5; 6; 7; 8; 9a; 10b; 11; 12); (b) vs 16-18, issue of seed; (c) vs 19-24, periods; (d) vs 25-30, other flows of blood and their purification. \( a + \beta \) refer to men and \( \gamma + \delta \) to women; and in addition to these implied suggestions, as \( a + \beta \) to dealing with abnormal issues and their purification ceremonies, \( \gamma + \delta \) with normal issues.

(d) The Day of Atonement (Lev 16): See IV, 1, (2), 2, and under Atonement, DAY OF.

(e) Uses and significance of the blood of sacrifices (Lev 17): (i) Vs 3-7, only one place for killing the sacrifices and the rejection of all foreign cults, only one place for sacrifices; (ii) vs 10-14, prohibitive of eating the blood; (iv) ver 15, pertaining to carcases of animals found dead or which have been torn by wild beasts.

Here the form and contents of the section have been uncertain. The author contains a similar formula in reference to the punishment, while logically vs 10 and 13 are evidence only subdivisions of the third part in vs 10-14, which treats of the prohibition of eating blood. In the fourth division, again, while in substance connected with the rest, there is lacking the formal agreement with the first three divisions.

(f) (Lev 18-20, 21): These naturally fall into 2 parts. Chs 18-20 contain (i) chs 18 f, religious and ethical laws; (ii) ch 20, laws dealing with punishments.

(i) Religious and ethical laws (chs 18 f): (a) ch 18: Ordnances with reference to marriage and chastity. (b) 18 1-5, introductory; (b) vs 6-18, prohibition of marriage between kindred of blood; (c) vs 19-23, prohibition of other sexual sins; (e) vs 24-30, warnings.

The subdivision (c) may perhaps be divided into 10 subordinate parts, if it is permitted to combine the different degrees of relationship mentioned in vs 12-14 (vs 10.11.12.14, 13, 15). This manifestly consists of 5 ordinances (vs 19.20.21.22.23); this we are permitted to divide if we are possible to divide (a) into 5 commandments (vs 2.3a.4-5) and (b) also into 5 (vs 24 f. 26-29). All 10 subdivisions, would contain 5x5 words; but this is uncertain.

(b) Ch 19: various commands of the deepest significance. In order to discover the divisions of this chapter we must note the characteristic formula, "I am Jehovah, your God," or similar expression, which often appears at the beginning and at the end of certain divisions, e.g. in series (1) (d) and (10), but which in the middle series appears in each case only once, and which in all the series is found also at the conclusion.

In this way we can compute 10 tetrads. Thus after the text vs 2 containing a summary, we have (i) vs 3-4 (vs 3a.3b.4a.4b); (ii) vs 5-10 (vs 5f. 7 f.9 f.10); (iii) vs 11-16 (vs 11a.12b.13b.14a.14b); (iv) vs 15 f. 15a.15b.16b.16c); (vi) vs 17 f. (vs 17a.17b.18a.18b); (vii) vs 19-25 (vs 19a.19b.20-22.22-25); (viii) vs 26-28 (vs 26a.26b.27a.27b); (ix) 29-32 (vs 29.30.31.32); (x) vs 33-36 (vs 33.34.35.36); ver 37 constitutes the conclusion of the whole. (Note that the number ten here is certain in the conviction of the present writer; but he is not quite so sure of the number of subdivisions within the main divisions: we may have to do with pentads and not with tetrads. If this is the case, then the agreements with ch 18 would under certain circumstances be even greater.)

Possibly groupings of two can yet form a closer union (cf on Ex 1-16, 21-23, Exodus, II, 2, [1-4].) At any rate (iii) and (iv) can be summarized under the general words of defining a man's neighbor; and (v) and (vi) under that of observation of the laws; and (vii) and (viii) under that of heathen abuscs; while (ix) and (x) perhaps intentionally mingle together the religious and cultural and ethical elements, in order to express that all these things are most intimately connected (but if of also vs 12.14. 17, in the middle sections). In vs 5 f. 20.23 f., the author develops his subject somewhat more fully.

(ii) Laws dealing with punishments (ch 20): The regulations in reference to punishments stand in such close relation to the contents of ch 18 and to parts of ch 19, that it is absolutely incomprehensible how the critics can assign these three chapters to different authors. Even if certain regulations of ch 18 are not (as it were) in Lev 17 and 18, 17b-18b, and even if another order has been followed, this variation, which doubtless also hangs together with a new grouping of the materials, is rather an advantage than a disadvantage for the whole. It is impossible to conceive that a redactor would have altered anything in two entirely parallel and similar texts, or would himself have written a parallel text differing from the other. Ch 20 can probably be divided into 4 parts, viz. (i) vs 1-8, punishments for idolatry and witchcraft with a concluding formula vs 7 f.; (ii) vs 9-18, punishment of death for ten crimes, all of which, with the exception of the first, are of a sexual nature (vs 9-18). It is a question whether the first in the second group (vs 14), i.e. the sixth in the whole series, was intended to be made present by the peculiar character of the punishment (burning to death); (iii) vs 19-21, other sexual sins, with lighter punishments; (iv) vs 22-27, with 4 subdivisions (warning, ver 22 f.; punishment of the repetitive repetitions of two commands already given, vs 25 ff.; cf with 11 44 ff. and in general with ch 11; and ver 27 with 19 26.31; 20 6). Perfectly certain in this chapter is the fact that the different kinds of punishment were decided for their order. It is doubtless not to be regarded as accidental that both at the beginning and at the end death by stoning is mentioned.

(g) (Lev 21 1-22 33): (i) Laws concerning the quality of the priests (21 1-22.16); and ii) concerning sacred oblations (22 17-30) with the subscription vs 31-33.

(i) Qualities of priests: 21 1-22 16 in four sections (21 1 f. 10 f. 16 f; 22 1 f; note also in 21 18-20 the 12 blemishes; in 22 4-8 the 7 cases of uncleanness.

(ii) Sacred oblations: 22 17-30 in four sections (22 18-20, 21-25, 26-28.29 f).

(h) Conclusion of seasons, etc (chs 23, 24): (i) ch 23, laws for the feasts (7 sections, viz. 3. 1-14.15-22.23-25.26-32.33-36, with the appendix in that in every particular unit contained in vs 39 ff., added to the feast of the tabernacles); (ii) 24 1-4, treating of the sacred candlestick, which represents the moral conduct of the Israelites, and for this reason suits admirably in the connection; (iii) this is true of 24 5-11, dealing with the showbread, which represents the results of the labor of Israel; (iv) 24 10-23, containing the report of the punishment of a blasphemer of God and of one who cursed.

Probably the example was made of a person who took the name of God in vain at the time which this chapter describes. But possibly there is a still closer connection to be found with that which precedes. The showbread and the candlestick were found in the holy place, which with its utensils pictured the relation of Israel's character to their God; while the utensils in the Holy of Holies indicated God's relation to His people (cf Hengstenberg, Reilgion, III, 644 ff.). Hence in the holy place, in addition to the showbread and the candlestick, contained only the incense altar, which symbolized the prayers of Israel, and as the blasphemer represents the exact opposite of prayer, it is probable that in 24 10 prayer is indicated by its counterpart. This section consists of 4 parts, viz. vs 10-15 grouping a series of punishments for certain wrongdoings which are more or less closely connected with that found in the text; ver 23.

(i) Sabbatic and Jubilee years (ch 25): Sabbatic and Jubilee years in 7 sections, viz. vs 1-7; 8-12; 13-28; 29-34; 35-38; 39-46; 47-55.

ances of later times in a nutshell, viz. (i) vs 1–2, repetition of four important demands (vs 1a.1b.2a.2b); (ii) 26 3–13, the blessing, possibly to be divided into 7 stages, one more spiritual than the other; (iii) 26 4–39, the curse, possibly to be divided into seven stages, one more intense than the other (cf also the play on words 7 times repeated, in reference to shabbath, possibly found in vs 34 f, and certainly found in vs 18.21.24.27 f); (iv) 26 40–45, the mercy finally shown by Jeh for His covenant’s sake.

(3) The people’s disobedience.—Further, the transgressions of the Levitical laws in the course of Israel’s history cannot be regarded as a proof of the non-existence of the priestly legislation in pre-exilic times. This is clear from an analogous case. Idolatry was forbidden by the Books of the Covenant (Ex 20.24; 34), which are recognized as ancient documents; but according to 2 K 22 the pious king Josiah down to the year 622 BC takes no offence at idolatry. Even after the reformation, which had been inaugurated in consequence of the finding of the Book of the Law in the temple during the reign of Josiah (2 K 22 f), idolatry was again practised in Israel, as is proved by Ezk 8 and Jer 44, notwithstanding that the Books of the Covenant and Dt already were extant at that time, even according to the views of the critics.

But let us pass on to P itself, and not forget that the directions given for the Jubilee Year (Lev 25), according to Jewish tradition, were never actually observed. According to the reasoning of the critics, this law could not be in existence even in the present day. According to all reports the transgressions of the Divine ordinances began even as early as the Mosaic period; cf Ex 32 (J, E, golden calf); Am 5 25; Ezk 20; Dt 12 3 and Jer 7 42 (sacrifice to the Satyrs in PC). This condition of affairs can readily be understood because the religion of Jeh does not claim to be an emanation from the spirit of the people, but the result of a revelation from on high. In both arguments can we be surprised, that in the times of the Judges, when a great prophetic leader was so often not to be found in Israel, the apologety was so great and so widespread? But all of these cases of disobedience, as demonstrated in the light of these facts, in Israel’s history, are not to eliminate the fact that there are many data to prove the existence of a central sanctuary already in the earliest history of the people, which fact presupposes as a matter of course that there were also laws for the cultus in existence (see EXODUS, III. 5). We must further not forget how the sacrifices of the sons of Samuel (1 S 2 11 f), notwithstanding all their arbitrary conduct, presupposes such passages as Lev 7 30–32; 10 15; the letter sacrifice attendant to a late period, is just as difficult to decide whether these passages refer merely to a custom or to a codified set of laws.

(4) Indiscriminate sacrificing.—To this must be added that the transgressions, to which the critics appeal in proof of their claims, and which they abuse for their own purposes, must in part be interpreted differently from what they are. In the case of sacrificing indiscriminately at any place whatever, and by any person whatever, we have in many cases to deal with extraordinary instances of theophanies (cf Jgs 2 1 ff; 6 11 ff; 13 1 ff), as these had been foreseen in Ex 20 24. Even the Book of Dt does not insist throughout (cf 16 21) that the sacrifices must be made at one and the same place (cf also PC: Lev 24 31; Josh 22). After the rejection of Shiloh, at which the central sanctuary had been deposited, as recorded in 1 S 4, the cultural ordinances of PC, as we learn from Jer 7 11 ff; 26 6; Ps 78 59 ff, became more or less a dead letter. Even the Books of Ch, which history from the standpoint of the PC, at this period and down to the dedication of the temple take no offence at the cultural acts of a Solomon in contrast with their attitude toward the conduct of

3.1.1. Introduction

3.1.1.1. The Book of Leviticus

3.1.1.1.1. The Book of Leviticus is a collection of laws and regulations that were designed to establish a system of worship and religious order for the Israelites. It is divided into three main sections: (1) The ceremonial laws (chs 1–10), (2) The sanctuary service (chs 11–26), and (3) The offerings (chs 27–29). These laws were intended to guide the Israelites in their religious practices and to establish a model of divine service that would be followed in the temple.

3.1.1.2. Historical Setting

The book of Leviticus is set in the context of the early history of Israel, particularly during the time of Moses and the Israelites in the wilderness. The book is rooted in the experiences and traditions of the Israelites, and it reflects their desire to establish a clear and distinct relationship with God. The laws in Leviticus provide a framework for understanding the religious practices of the Israelites and the role of the priests in maintaining this relationship. The book of Leviticus is not an historical account of events, but rather a collection of laws and regulations that were designed to establish a system of worship and religious order for the Israelites.
Uzziah (see 2 Ch 1 6; 6 1-4; 7 1-7, as compared with 26 16 ff.). In the same way the pious people in the Northern Kingdom, after it had, by Divine consent, become separated from (cf. the Southern), could do otherwise than erect altars for themselves, since they could not participate in the worship of the calves in Bethel and Dan. Further, modern criticism overlooks the fact that what is regular and normal is much less liable to be reported in historical narrative than that which is irregular and abnormal.

(5) Dt and PC, etc.—It is not possible at this place to enter into further details; we accordingly refer only to Exk, Ezk, Lev, Dt, and P; cf. ABERLAU, II, 2, where the proof has been furnished that this prophet belongs to a later period than PC as far as Ex 30-40 (containing his picture of the future) in general is concerned, and as far as Ezk 44 f (where it is claimed that the prophet first introduces the distinction between priests and Levites) in particular is concerned. All the important problems that are connected with this matter, esp. the difficulties which result from the Wellhausen hypothesis, when the questions as to the purpose, that is the origin of the historical Leviticus, is considered, are discussed in my book, Are the Critical Rights? The result of this investigation is all the more noteworthy, as I was myself formerly an adherent of the Wellhausen school, but was forced to the conclusion that this hypothesis is untenable.

We have here yet to refer to the one fact that the relation of Dt and the PC, as far as Lev in particular is concerned, justifies the scheme of P followed in the history of the desert. The Wellhausen makes D older than P. Dt 10 8 f; 33 8 ff presuppose more detailed ordinances in reference to the priests such as those which have been given in P. The book of Dt further takes into account different kinds of laws, which, from the 16th till the 12th cent., could not be understood at all, except in the light of Lev 17 13. Dt 26 14 ff again expressly takes into account ideas that have been taken from Lev 22 33 ff. As far as the laws dealing with the great feasts in Dt 16 are concerned, it is impossible without Lev 23 15 ff. 10 ff; and the designation "feast of tabernacles" in vs 13 f cannot even be understood without a reference to such a law as we find in Lev 23 39 ff. The other passages to be discussed on this subject lead us to the following results.

Even if the Book of Dt were the product of the 7th cent. BC, the facts that have been stated above would nevertheless disprove the claim of the Wellhausen school (1916) to the effect that Dt 17 13 ff must belong to the Mosaic period.

2. Connection with Mosaic Law. If Dt, even in its essential and period, be regarded as exilic or post-exilic date for the PC, the following results follow:

(1) PC and desert conditions.—This conclusion is in this point confirmed still further by a series of facts. As Dt permits the firstborn to be ransomed (Lev 27 26 ff; cf. Nu 18 15 ff), the latter ordinances could be preferred and enforced only during the wandering in the desert, where the whole nation was in the neighborhood of the sanctuary. The fact that the ordinances deal with offerings and sacrifices in the private houses on the 14th of Nisan and the holy convocation on the 15th of Nisan at the sanctuary could be carried out only during the wanderings in the desert (cf Ex 12 3 ff. 6; Lev 23 5; Nu 28 16; Lev 27 3 ff; Nu 28 17 ff), and that the Passover could be changed in Dt 16 5 ff from the changed conditions, can be seen by reference to Exodus, III, 3. Still more important is a third command in Lev 17 in comparison with Dt 12. The commandment that every animal that is to be slain is to be brought to the central sanctuary can have a purpose only for the Mosaic period, and could not even have been invented at a later period. Because of the entrance of Israel into Canaan, the Book of Dt changes this ordinance in such a way that from this time on the killing of the animals is permitted at any place (12 13 ff. 20 ff). The different commands in reference to the carcasses of animals that have died and of those torn to pieces are all dependent on Lev 17. In Dt 14 21, it was possible to forbid the use of such animals absolutely for Israel, because from now on, and in contrast to Lev 17, the killing of sacrificial animals was permitted at any place (vs 13 ff). In Ex 22 30 all use of such meat could be forbidden, because Lev 17, with its command to bring all blood to the sanctuary, expresses it better.

Our exposition of Lev 17 1 ff is, however, in another respect also of the greatest significance, for in vs 4-6.8 f the tent of meeting is presupposed as existing; in vs 6.8 also different kinds of sacrifices, and in vs 6 the priesthood; so that at once other ordinances concerning the tent of meeting, the sacrificial code, the priesthood, such as we find in Ex 26 ff; 35 ff; Lev 1-7; Ex 29; Lev 8-10 21 ff, were possible and necessary, and these very laws must probably originate in and date from the Mosaic period. This same conclusion is sustained by the following considerations. For what other source or time is it possible in harmony with such statements found very often in other parts of Lev also, as in "into the understand value of the registration, etc." (unconscious contrast to later times): 14 33 ff. 40. 41.45.53; 16 20-28; 24 10-23; or into the desert," in 16 10.21f. In 6 15.18; 6 6 (cf. also 27 22 ff), the words "according to the estimation" are addressed personally to Moses. In 6 20 a calculation is based on the day on which Aaron was consecrated to the priest, and vs 22 is the first that has general coloring. Such hints, which, as it were, have only been accidentally scattered in the body of the laws, and which point to the peculiarities of his times, are of especial value for the argument in favor of the Mosaic origin of these laws. Further, we everywhere find that Aaron and his sons are as yet the only incumbents of the priestly office (cf 1 5.7.8.11; 2 9.13; 6 1-16.16, etc.). All the laws claim to have been given through Moses or Aaron or through both at Mt. Sinai (see I above). And who, in later times, if it was the purpose to magnify the priesthood of Aaron, would have thought of inventing the fact that on the Day of Atonement and on other occasions for Aaron to bring a burnt offering and a sin offering for himself (Lev 16; 8-10; 6 19 ff), or that Moses in his view of a certain cultural act had been mistaken (cf 10 16 ff). The law concerning the Jubilee Year (Lev 25) presents the fact that the tribe is confined in its own district and is not intermingled with the other tribes, a presupposition which was no longer possible after the occupation of Canaan, and is accordingly thinkable only in the Mosaic times. And now let us remember that this fact, when we recall (see II, above) that the unity of the tribes, the exodus (cf. Exodus, Egypt; the Just 3.6 ff. 20-22.23-25.29.30.33f). vs presupposition without prejudice in any way that Israel is not yet in the Holy Land. Accordingly the usual consecutives at this place are to be regarded not as indicating temporal but logical sequences. In the passage 18 27, we further find the archaic form of bā‘ēl for bē‘ēlēh; cf. in the Pent 19 8.25; 26 3.4; Dt 4 42; 7 22; 19 11. Just as little does ch 26 take us into the exilic period. Only dogmatical prejudices can take offence at prediction of the exile. Lev 26 cannot be regarded as a "prophecy after the event," for the reason, too, that the restoration implied by God in this passage is here presupposed (cf vs 40 ff). And, too, the exile is not the only punishment with which Israel is threatened; and finally as far as Israel is concerned, by the side of the statements concerning their dwelling in one single country (vs 34.38.41 ff.) it is also said that they are to be scattered among many nations and countries (cf vs 23.36.39).

(2) Unity and construction point to Mosaic origin.—If to this we yet add the unity of the thought of the external construction, looking at the whole matter, we do not see anything that would lead us to accept a post-Mosaic period for this book. Then, too, it is from the outset in itself only probable that Moses gave his people a body of cultus-laws and did not leave this matter to chance. We need only think of the great rôle which among the oriental peoples was assigned to their religious cultus. It is indeed nowhere said, in so many words, that Moses wrote even the laws of the Pentateuch, but the references made by Dt to TO PC; the fact that Nu 33, which also is credited to Moses, is characterized by the style of PC; further, that the author of Dt could write in the style of P (cf Dt 14 with Lev 11); and, per contra, that the author of Nu had the mastery of the style peculiar to Dt (cf Dt 28)—all this makes it probable that Moses even wrote these things himself; at any rate, no reasons can be cited against this view. Very interesting in connection with the question of the unity of the Pent are the close connecting links between Lev 18 24 ff; 20 22 ff, and JE. The question whether Moses in the composition of the book made use of his own notes or of those of others, cannot be decided; but this is an irrelevant matter. What the facts may be in reference to the development of other ordinances, which have taken different forms in the Books of the Covenant and in PC, or in Dt and in PC, and whether the existence of these differences in the cases of particular laws compels us to accept later additions, cannot be discussed at this place. Yet from the outset it is to be emphasized that already in the Mosaic period there could possibly have been reasons for changing some of these laws; esp. was this so in the Book of Dt, just before the people entered the promised land of Canaan (cf Nu 18 20 ff, or the laws concerning contributions for sacrifices, Dt 18 3; Lev 7 29 ff).

Then, too, the decision whether this development took place as early as the time of Moses or not is not to be made dependent on the possibility of our being able to explain the reason for such changes. We lack both the daily practice in these cultural institutions, as well as the oral instruction which makes these ordinances intelligible. The manner in which in Lev 1 ff the different kinds of sacrifices are introduced seems to us to show that they were already known to the people and were practiced by them, except for claims. It is, as though the entire book dates from the Mosaic period. As far as Lev at least is concerned, there is nothing found in the book that calls for a later date. Lev 18 24 ff can be regarded as post-Mosaic only if we translate these verses thoughtlessly, as though the inhabitants of the country were here described as being expelled earlier. On the other hand, in vs 24, just as the case with the parallel passage, 20 22 ff, the idea is, without any doubt, that Israel is not yet in the Holy Land. Accordingly the usual consecutives at this place are to be regarded not as indicating temporal but logical sequences. In the passage 18 27, we further find the archaic form of bā‘ēl for bē‘ēlēh; cf. in the Pent 19 8.25; 26 3.4; Dt 4 42; 7 22; 19 11. Just as little does ch 26 take us into the exilic period. Only dogmatical prejudices can take offence at prediction of the exile. Lev 26 cannot be regarded as a "prophecy after the event," for the reason, too, that the restoration implied by God in this passage is here presupposed (cf vs 40 ff). And, too, the exile is not the only punishment with which Israel is threatened; and finally as far as Israel is concerned, by the side of the statements concerning their dwelling in one single country (vs 34.38.41 ff.) it is also said that they are to be scattered among many nations and countries (cf vs 23.36.39).

IV. The Significance.—(1) The law contains God's will, although in transitory form. In the T. Law, under II, 2, (3) we have referred to the fact that Leviticus is an important and necessary stage in the development of true religion, and that the entire OT did not advance beyond this stage and is intended to go beyond it. The leading prophets (Isa 40 ff, Jer, Ezek), even in their visions of the future, cling to the temple, sacrifices, holy obligations, sacred seasons and persons. Christianity was the first to discard this external cult and it had repined the kernel that was concealed in this shell (cf worship in the spirit and in the truth, Jn 4 20-24). Down to this time, kernel and shell were inseparably united. This must not be forgotten, if we would appreciate this Book at all properly. It is true that this book to a large extent deals with laws and ordinances, to which we Christians should not and need not return (cf. the voice from heaven to Peter, Acts 10 15, "What God hath cleansed, make not thou words of men, and Paul's opposition to all work-righteousness that was based on compliance with these external institutions, e.g. in Rom, Gal, Col, as also his independent attitude over against the Jewish law in those cases where it could not be taken into consideration as the way to salvation; cf Acts 21 17 ff; Rom 14 1 ff; 1 Cor 9 19 ff.). But these laws and ordinances were something more than merely external matters, since they contained the highest religious thoughts. We surely should not leave the outset that Lev 19 contains also the word, "Thou shalt love thy neighbor as thyself" (ver 18), a command which in vs 33 f is even made to cover the strangers too, and which by Jesus, next to the absolute love demanded for God, is designated as the chief commandment of the law (Mt 22 39); and when in 19 17 f the hatred of the brother and desire for revenge on him are forbidden, we already seem to breathe the atmosphere of Christianity. The entire ch 19 is, in addition, the source on almost all of the commandments of the Decalogue, the abiding authority of which the Christian, after the example and interpretation of Jesus, will at once recognize. But as the Decalogue itself is found inclosed in the specifically Jewish national shell (of Ex 20 2, exodus out of Egypt; ver 8, Sabbath commandment; ver 12, promise of the holy land; ver 17, slaves), so, too, this is the case in Lev 19 (cf vs 3.6 fl.20-22.23-25.29.30.33 f). But how little the specific is here meant in the narrower sense of the term, exclude the spiritual factor, and how closely they are interwoven with the deepest of thoughts, can be seen from ch 26, according to which all merely external sacrifices, into which formalism naturally the Levitical legal code degenerated, do not profit from it, if the heart remains uncircumcised (vs 30 f.11).
Above all, there are four leading thoughts which are emphasized forcibly, particularly by the legal system. In reality and in all places, all property, all persons are sacred to God. But as it is impossible that this ideal should be realized in view of the imperfections and guilt of man, it was decided that certain particular seasons and places, gifts and persons should be separated from others, and that in these this sacredness should be realized as far as possible, and that these representatives should by their mere existence continually remind the people of God's more comprehensive claims, and at the same time arouse and maintain the consciousness that for its entire life was to be saturated by the thoughts of a holy God and His demands. From this point of view, none of the particular laws are worthless; and when they are once appreciated in this their central significance, we can understand that each law has its share in the eternal authority of the law (cf Mt 5:17 f.). Paul, too, who absolutely rejects the law as a way to salvation expresses no doubt that the law really contains the will of God (Rom 8:3); and he declares that it was the purpose of the sending of Jesus, that the demands made upon us by the law should be fulfilled; and in Rom 13:10 he tells us that love is the fulfillment of the law (cf ver 8); and according to Rom 7:12 it is certain that the law is holy and the commandment is holy, righteous and good.

(2) The law prepares for the understanding of Christ.—But the ceremonial law, too, contains not only the demands of God's will. It prepares the understanding of the work, the person and the mission of Jesus. In Ex 25:8; 29:45 f.; 40:34 ff the indwelling of God in the tent of meeting is declared, which prophesies the incarnation of God in Christ Jesus (Jn 1:14); and then the indwelling of God through the Holy Ghost in the Christian congregation (1 Pet 2:5; Eph 4:12) and in the individual (1 Cor 3:16; 6:19; 2 Cor 6:16; Jn 14:23). Through the sacrificial system in Lev 1—7, and the ordinances of the Day of Atonement (Lev 16), we are enabled to understand the character of sin, of grace and of the forgiveness of sin (cf ATONEMENT, DAY OF II). Let us remember to what extent Jesus and Paul, the Ep. to the He, and the other NT writings operate with OT thought and understanding. We shall not distinguish particularly with those of Lev (priesthood, sacrifices, atonement, Passover, signification of blood, etc), and Paul correctly says that the righteousness of God was prophesied, not only by the prophets, but also by the law (Rom 3:21).

(3) The law is a tutor. Finally, the ceremonial law too has the purpose to protect Israel from the errors of the heathen, a thought that is esp. emphasized in the Law of Holiness (cf Lev 18:32 ff; 19:26 ff; 20:22 ff; 26:1) and which is in agreement with the elementary stage of Israel's education in the OT, when the people still stood in need of the "tutor . . . unto Christ" (Gal 3:23; 4:1). This already leads us over to the negative side, which Paul particularly emphasizes.

The law is in itself holy, and the commandment is holy and righteous and good (Rom 7:12), but it has lost its power because the flesh.

2. Negative of man is sinful (cf Rom 8:3); and thus it happens that the law is the occasion for sin and leads to a knowledge of sin and to an increase of sin (cf Rom 3:20; 4:15; 5:20; 7:13); and this shall be brought about according to the purposes of God in order that in upright hearts the desire for forgiveness should arise. It is true that nothing was so well adapted as those decrees to bring to bear upon the untutored mind that in which man yet came short of the Divine commands. And as far as the removal of the guilt was concerned, nothing was needed except the reference to this in order to make men feel the imperfection of their action, and merely out of grace was for the time being contented with the blood of goats and of calves as a means for atonement; He was already counting on the forgiveness in Christ (Rom 3:28). All the sacrifices in Lev 1—4, e.g., did not make "the ritual of the Day of Atonement" (Lev 16), and in this case the very man who brought the sacrifice was also a sinful creature who must first secure the forgiveness of God for himself. Only Jesus, at once the perfect priest and the perfect sacrifice, has achieved the perfect atonement by an act which apparently remains a fact that the righteousness which avails before God can be secured only through faith in Jesus Christ, and not through the deeds of the law (Rom and Gal).

The law with its incomplete atonement and with its arousing of the consciousness of sin drives man to Jesus; and this is its negative significance. Jesus, however, who Himself has fulfilled the demands of the law, gives us through His spirit the power, that the law with its demands (1, 11 above) may no longer stand threateningly over against us, but is now written in our hearts. In this way the OT law is fulfilled in its transitory form, and at the same time becomes superfluous, after its eternal contents have been recognized, maintained and surpassed.

LEVY, lev'i. See WAR.

LEWD, lüd, LEWDNESS, lüd'nes (הָוִית, zimmāh, מִזְמָמָה, מִזְמַמָּה, נַבְּחֲלָת, טוֹפָרָה, πονιέρα, φασίστρυμα, ραδίονογράμμα): There are three Hebrew words tr. "lewd," "lewdness": (1) Māzāmāh, meaning a "plan," a "purpose," so tr. several times and then shifting off into the "evil plot," "evil crime," "wicked purpose or device.

1. In the OT. It is the most frequent word for "lewdness": Ezek 16:27, "lewd way"; found in Jgs 20:40; Ezek 16:27.48: 22:9.11; 23:27.29.35.44. 48; 21:16; Hos 6:5. (2) Māzāmāh means a "plan," generally "evil machination;" used only in Jer 11:15, "lewdness." (3) Nabḥālah, meaning "disgrace" in reference to females. Found only in Hosea 2:10, ARV "shame.

The word tr. "lewd," "lewdness" in AV occurs only twice in the NT, and in each instance is more correctly tr. in RV by another word:

2. In the NT. (1) Pronēros, found in Acts 17:5, tr. in NT ARV "vile." The Gr word elsewhere is tr. "bad," "evil," "wicked," "harmful," "unrighteous," "wicked." AV "lewd" gives the wrong impression. The idea of uncleanness is not present in the text or context. (2) Rhadiorōgēma likewise occurs only once, viz. Acts 18:14, and is correctly tr. in RV and ARV "wicked villainy." The thought of impurity or lewdness is foreign to the meaning in this connection.

LIBERAL, lib'er-al, LIBERALITY, lib'er-al'i-ty, LIBERALLY, lib'er-al-ly: The different forms of the word all refer to one who is generous, bountiful, willing and ready to give and to help. Both the Heb words of the OT and the Gr words of the NT translate into the Eng. The word "liberal" has a deeper and nobler meaning than the word "rich" is generally conveyed by the Eng. word. In Prov 11 25, the liberal soul (nephesh brakhah) means a soul that carries a blessing. In Isa 32 5, AV has "bountiful" where AV has "liberal," and in vers 8 "liberal" takes the place of "rich" (adoph). The principal Gr word are ἀρετή, kaiplaía, lit. "simplicity," "sinserity," and χρηστία, charis, "grace," "favor." In 1 Cor 16 3, "bounties" substitutes "liberality." It is well to bear in mind that a Bib. liberal can spring only out of a noble soul, and is Godlike in its genesis and spirit. G. H. GILBERT

LIBERTINES, lib'er-tinz, li-burt'zin (legates, Liberali); These were among Stephen's opponents: "There were three or four hundred of them of the synagogue called [the synagogue] of the Libertines, and of the Cyrenians, and of the Alexandrians, and of them of Cilicia and Asia, disputing with Stephen" (Acts 6 9).

How many synagogues are denoted? The answer may aid in the interpretation of "of them of the synagogue of the Libertines (Acts 15:3)." The word means "synagogue" in the sentence, "The second εἷς (of them) seems to denote two parties, the one concurring in 'of them that were of the synagogue called the [synagogue] of Libertines and Cyrenians and of them of Cilicia and Asia' (Winer, Wendt, Holtzmann). The second εἷς is dependent on synagogue. As Cyrenians and Alexandrians both belong to towns, a change of designation would be necessary when the Jews of whole provinces came to be mentioned: this being the case, the article could not but be repeated, without reference to the εἷς before (Aiford). (3) There were three synagogues called "of the Libertines, (b) that of the Cyrenians and Alexandrians and (c) that of Cilicia and Asia" (Aiford). There is no grammatical reason for this division, but it is based on an interpretation of "Libertines. There were "Libertines. As Cilicia and Asia (4) Each party had a separate synagogue (Schürer, Haussrat). The number of words together, the different origin and conditions, and the number of synagogues in Jews give weight to this view.

(1) They are "freedmens," liberated slaves or their descendants. Against this it is held that the Gr equivalent (apelletheron) would have been used in this case. However, the interpretation of "Libertines" should be common all over the empire. In what sense were they "freedmen"? Various answers are given: (a) they were freedmen from Jewish servitude (Lightfoot); (b) they were Italian freedmen who had become proselytes; (c) they were the "freedmen of the Romans" (Chrysostom), the descendants of Jewish freedom at Rome who had been freed. Tactitus relates that the senate decreed (19 AD) that a certain number of Roman citizens should be transported to Sardinia, and that the rest should leave Italy, unless they renounced, before a certain day, their Roman customs (Ann. ii, 85; see also Jos, Ant., XVIII, iii, 5). Many would naturally seek refuge in Italy and build there a synagogue.

(2) They are an African community. There were two synagogues, one of which was Asiatic. In the other were men from two African towns (Cyrene and Alexandria), therefore the Libertines must have been African also, all forming an African synagogue. Various explanations are given: (a) They were inhabitants of Libertum, a town in Africa proper: an Episcopus Ecclesiae Catholico Libertinatis" sat in the Synod of Carthage (411 AD). (b) Some emend the text; Veletin and Blass, followed into Libnana, for Libertinum, "of the Libyntines." Schultz reads for "Libertines and Cyrenians" (Libertinon kat Kiriakont) "Libyans, those about Cyrene" (Libdión ton kai Kyrênion) (cf Acts 2 10).

These emendations are conjectural; the MSS read "Libertins." It seems, therefore, that 2, (1) (c) above is the correct interpretation.

LIBERTY, lib'er-ti (τῆς τύχης, δικαιοσύνης, ἐλευθερίας): The opposite of servitude or bondage, hence applicable to captives or slaves set free from oppression (thus δικαιοσύνης, Lev 25 18; Isa 61 1 etc.). Morally, the power which enslaves is sin (Jn 8 34), and liberty consists, not simply in external freedom, or in possession of the right of choices, but in the complete leaving apart the cares of the mind, the tyranny of sinful lusts and the enthrallment of the will, induced by a morally corrupt state. In a positive respect, it consists in the possession of holiness, with the will and ability to do what is right and good. Such liberty is possible only in a renewed condition of soul, and cannot exist apart from godliness. Even under the OT godly men could boast of a measure of such liberty (Ps 119 45, ἀνέστησεν); but it is the gospel of Christ, which bestows it in full fulness, in giving a full and clear knowledge of God, discovering the way of forgiveness, supplying the highest motives to holiness and giving the Holy Spirit to destroy the power of sin and to quicken to righteousness. In implanting a new life in the soul, the gospel lifts the believer out of the sphere of external law, and gives him a sense of freedom in his new filial relation to God. Hence the NT expressions about the glorious liberty of God's children (Rom 8 17); of Gal 2 4; 5 13, etc., about liberty as resulting from the possession of the Spirit (2 Cor 3 17), about the "perfect law of liberty" (Jas 1 25). The instrument through which this liberty is imparted is the "truth" (Jn 17 17), (c) the "child of truth" (Jn 18 37; 19 17); it is one of the cities given to the "children of Aaron" (Josh 21 13; 1 Ch 6 57). In the reign of Jeroboam, Libnah joined the Ezonites in a revolt against the king of Judah (2 K 15 22; 2 Ch 21 10). In the reign of Hezekiah, Libnah was besieged by Sennacherib (2 K 19 8; Isa 37 8). The wife of King Josiah was "Hamutal the daughter of Jeremiah of Libniah," she was the mother of Jehoshaz and Zedekiah (2 K. 23 21; 24 18; Jer 52 1).

The site of this important stronghold remains unknown. In the Onom it is described, under the name Lobana or Lobnas, as near Eleutheropolis (Bet Jebrin). All the indications point to a site in the S.W. territory of Shephelah, not very far from Lachish. The Palestine Exploration Fund surveyors suggested (PEF, III, 259) the commanding site 'Arūd el Menaytkē, or rather the white chalky mound 250 ft. high to the N. of this village, and Stanley proposed Tell es Šāfī. (Both these identifications are due to the misinterpretation of Libnaseh meaning "whiteness.").

In the PEF's (1897, Sh XX) Conder suggests a ruin called el Bendaw, 10 miles S.E. of Lachish. E. W. G. Masterman

LITERATURE
A library is a book or books kept for use, not for sale. A one-book library is just as much a library as a one-cell animal is the animal. The earliest libraries, like the earliest plants and animals, were very simple, consisting of a few books or perhaps only a single tablet or manuscript. An archive is a library of official documents not in active use; a registry, a library of a system of books. The Bible is itself a library. During the Middle Ages it was commonly called, first, "the Divine Library," and then, "the Library" (Bibliotheca), in the same exclusive sense as "the Book" (Biblia). A "Library" (biblia) is a collection of books rather than a single work.

This fact that the Bible is itself a library is increasingly mentioned of late, esp. in OT studies (Kent, Narratives of the Beginnings of Heb History, 1, 4, 6; Library, Bibletisch Babel, 4, "the Old Testament, that small library of books of the most multifarious kind"). Its profound bearing on the theory of the composition and inspiration of the Bible (cf Book) has given the fact new significance and makes an understanding of the nature of a library one of the best tools for the interpretation of the Bible in the face of modern problems. While it is not possible to elaborate this within these limits, it may be said briefly that the logical end of the application of the doctrine of evolution to books is that of the Bible is, like man, the result of natural selection, and is as unique among books as man among the animals. And, whatever may be true of men, in the case of books the formation of a book-library by natural selection tends toward the elimination of the inferior.

The more numerous the individuals the longer the period, the greater the reduction of error, so that the logical inference as to the Bible is that on purely natural grounds it may be, or is, the nearest approximation to inerrancy among books, because of the artificiality of the selection. This is at least applicable to the position that the Bible is as unique among books as Jesus Christ among men, but under the doctrine of a creative Providence, it does imply what may be called real superhuman authorship and authority.

Somewhat apart from historical libraries, but closely connected with the Bible study, are the alleged superhuman libraries, libraries of, or written by, the gods, libraries for the dead and apocryphal libraries. The Vedas are said to have existed as a collection even before the Creator himself (Man. 1 21). All religions have their book-gods—Thoth and Sekhmet, Apollo, Hermes, Minerva, Idas, Bridges, Soma, Brahma, Odin, Ysir, Yggdrasil and many others. To the ancient Babylonians the whole firmament was a library of "celestial tablets." The mythological ideas often have important bearing on the epics, the histories, the doctrines, e.g. the Creation, the Book of Life, the Book of Life, the Holy Spirit. Apocryphal libraries include the library which Jeh is alleged to have formed on the 7th day of creation on the summit of the Garden of Eden, and other libraries ascribed to Enoch, Noah and Seth. See for this the "pseudoprophets,"

Another class of collections of real books, written or gathered for mythological purposes, is what may be called libraries for the dead. It is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and among rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple, it is well known that in most countries of antiquity, at one time or another, and amongst rather simple. These books were either in the hands of the dead things which friends thought would be useful in the Elysian fields or happy hunting grounds, or on the way thither, or in the hands of the whiteness."

This motive is still found in books of the dead. For long periods in the history of Egypt every Egyptian of any position was buried with one or more books. These books were not the chance possessions, buried with him as, in some burials, all a man's personal belongings are, but books selected for their usefulness to him after death. For the most part these were of the nature of guides and to the heavenly world, magic formulæ for the opening of doors, instructions as to the right method of progress toward, or introduction into, paradise, etc. These books were afterward gathered together and form what is now known as "the Book of the Dead," and other such books. In modern times thebest of the professed Orientalists, it is often has in memory a collection of remembered books. This is in effect a library, and a library of a very distinctive sort, the medicine-man's medicine-library, as it is called, a library of tribal-man's traditions. The priests of India and the medicine-men of India of the Middle Ages often had a large repertory. By the term "library" it is usually meant that the books of the OT such memory traditions, transmitted orally, were the chief source of the Hebraic, but in view of what is now known of the library situation of the time, this must be doubted.

In general terms it may be said that when man began not only to make but to keep records, libraries began. Even a memorial stone contains the form of a mnemonic library. The primitive medicine-man's collection of notched sticks, tallies, or woven cords or reed marks, a great advance in complexity on these, and the simplest collection of pictures, was already, according to the early records of the American Indian, an advance on this. A combination of pictures with signs is still another step, and this step is already to be found in the Pyrenean caves of the Stone Age (see Writing). Most of these earliest libraries were kept in human hands, gathering together of books in libraries had its origin in the ideas of (1) preservation, (2) gathering together of books in human hands, and (3)－the great modern expansion of the idea of the owner of books and his belongings, his receipts for purchases and record of sales, whether these are written on the walls of his cave or on wooden tablets or on clay tablets gathered in little jars and buried under the floor of his house. Large libraries are among the temples of Egypt and Assyria gathered large stores of these archival records and with them records of tributary, oracles, etc. At early ages the account of King Dareker of Israel, his archival library and his librarian Sunezemli. The annals of Thutmos III were preserved in the palace library as well as cut in stone on the temple itself. A few years later and we know that the archive records were kept in a special room in the palace at Amarna—and many of the records themselves were found there. All this was before the year 1300.

Bible history through the 10th chapter of Gen covers the whole civilized world, but its main line up to about 2000 BC is almost wholly Mesopotamian. Up to the time of Aram's migration from Haran, the history of Bib and Sumerian libraries are one.

6. Mesopotamian
Period

Most of the cities mentioned in this period and now known to have had collections of books were, those days. At the time when Abram left Haran there were hundreds of collections of written doc-ments in scores of different geographical localities and containing millions of tablets.

From Abram's emigration out of Haran to Jacob's emigration to Egypt was, on the face of Bib, data, mainly a time of wandering in Pal, but this was not wholly nomad nor wholly Patriarchal. Palestinian. Whether there were li-eraries in Pal at this time or not, the Patriarchal were all in daily contact with the libraries lands of Babylonia and Egypt. Abram himself was familiar with both Mesopotamia and Egypt. His son Ishmael married an Egyptian, is son Isaac a Mesopotamian. His grandson Jacob married two wives from between the rivers, and had himself 20 years' residence in the region. While it does not appear that Isaac lived at any time either in Syria or Egypt, during most of his life all the members of his nearest family, father, mother, wife, sons' wives, had had from one to three score years' life in the mother-country. Whether there were public records in this region at this time is another matter, but it would seem that the whole region during the whole period was under the influence of the Bab civilization. It was freely traversed by trading caravans, and the Hittite and Mesopotamian records extend at least a little back into this period.

The Egypt period of Bible history begins with the immigration of Jacob and his sons, but fringes back to the visit of Abram (Gen 12 10–20).

8. Egyptian if not to Miriam of Gen 10 6. On the other hand, it ends properly with the exodus, but fringes forward through frequent points of contact in the Virgin and Pentecost. Whether the sojourn was 430 or 215 years, or less, it was a long residence at a time when libraries were very flourishing in Egypt. Already at the time of Abram's visit, collections of books, not only of official accounts, but of religious texts, medical texts, annals, and the like, had been common in Egypt for nearly 1,000 years, and had perhaps existed for 1,000 years or more before that.
Period

Under the elder of the modern datings of the exodus, the period of the sojourn included the times of Thothmes III (Thutmoso), and in this reign there are peculiarly interesting records, not only of the existence of temple and palace libraries, but of the nature of their contents. The official recorder of Thothmes III, accompanying him on his campaign in Syria and Pal, set down each day the events of the day, while he or others also made lists of tribute, spoils, commissary matters, etc. These daily records were deposited in the palace library, as annals, but a narrative compiled from these and written on a leather roll was deposited in the temple library, and from this roll in turn an abstract was engraved on the walls of the temple, where it remains to this day. This probably gives the library sitation of the time in a nutshell: (1) the simple saving of utilitarian documents, often on papyrus or wood tablets, (2) the gathering of books written for information on more durable material, (3) preserving choice books for posterity by a local series of inscriptions.

The rolls must have been kept in chests or in small boxes, like the box containing the medical papyri of King Neferikere some 1,300 years before, or the "many boxes" at Edfu long after. Many pictures of these book-chests or bookcases are found in the monuments (Birt, Bookchests 12, 15 ff).

Again, the palace library of King Akhnaton (c 1360 BC) at Amarna, which contained collections of the royal foreign correspondence on clay tablets, had been excavated. Its bricks bear the inscription, "Place of the records of the palace of the king," and some hundreds of tablets from this spot have been recovered.

At the time of the exodus there were thus problably libraries in all palaces, temples and record offices, although the temple libraries were by no means confined to sacred writings or the palace to secular. There were also at least archives, or registers, in the royal treasury and in all public departments. Schools for scribes were, it would seem, commenced as early as 2000 BC.

There were, therefore, apparently, at this time millions of documents or books, in hundreds of organized collections, which could be called archives or libraries.

9. The

were in the scribal schools, were of course quite familiar with the Egypt ways of keeping their books. It is not surprising, therefore, to find the first and chief provision which Moses made for the Tabernacle was a book-chest for the preservation of the sacred directions given by Jeh. It makes little difference whether the account is taken in its final form, divided horizontally into Ex, Lev, Nu, Dt and Josh, or divided perpendicularly into J, E, D, P, the fact of the ark and enough of its details are given even in the very oldest sources to the effect that the ark to be a glorified book-chest in or near which were kept written documents; the tables of stone, the inscribed rod, all the testimony given from the mercy-seat which formed its lid, and perhaps the Book of Dt. to the high priest. In fact the shape of a portable bookcase, and the LXX trans-renders the word by the ordinary technical Gr word for the book-chest (kibōlos; cf Birt, op. cit., 248–49).

It appears also to have been the later Heb word for book-cabinet (cf Jēw 'ēk, II, 107 ff). At the exodus, whenever that may have been, Moses is alleged to have made the ark the official library, and in it apparently he is thought to have kept the oracles as uttered from time to time and the record of his travels from day to day (as well as the tablets of stone), precisely as the scribe of Thutmoso recorded his Syrian campaigns from day to day. This record (if it was a record) was in all likelihood on a leather roll, since this became the traditional form of books among the Hebrews, and this too was like the annals of Thutmoso. When the tribes separated to N. and S., the books may have been either separated or copied, and doubtless they suffered much wear and tear from the harsh times until we appear Find Dt turnin library, as in a temple in a temple (2 K 22 8 ff; 2 Ch 34 14 ff).

The evidence from Egypt, Bab, Mitannian, Amorite and Hittite documents shows the existence of official chancelleries and by implication of archives throughout the whole region of Syria and Pal at the time when the "Hebrew" invasion

Libri

Libraries
began (Winckler, Tell el-Amarna Tablets). The Am Tab and the tablets from the Hittite archives at Amrunning (DOG Mittteilungen 1907, no. 35) include actual letters from the princes, elders and governors of dozens of regions, scattered all over this region from Egypt to the land of the Hittites and the Mitannians. These places include among others Jerah, Damascus, Tyre, Sidon, Acco, Ashkelon, Gaza, Lachish, Keilah and Aijalon.

Remains of two of such archival libraries have been dug up—one at Lachish and one at Tzanach near Megiddo, both dating back to the 14th cent.

Whether there were temple libraries as well does not appear so clearly from external evidence but may probably be inferred from the names, Deir, Deir (and perhaps) Nebi, as well as from the well-known fact that they also were not destroyed or even occupied for a long time, but were surrounded by the Hittites, and finally occupied and assimilated.

It follows, therefore, that the archival system remained and, under this theory, for a long time after the destruction of the archives of the ancient time the names of the countries and their neighbors—and, by inference, libraries with the rest.

(4) Taking the evidence of the documents as a stand, the matter is simple enough; various works were kept in or near the ark. Joshua added to these records and the contents of the scrolls in the sanctuary, and Samuel “laid up” the book that he wrote “before Jeh” i.e. at the ark. Moreover, the Books of Jasher, the Wars of Jeh, etc, imply a library, which in turn implies libraries. Wherever or howsoever composed, there is no good reason to distrust their historical existence. (5) Even on the extreme critical hypothesis, “Most of the stories found in the first 8 books of the OT originated before the time of song and story (c. 1250-1050)” (Kent, *Beginning", 17). (6) To this may also be added, with all reservations, the mysterious metal ephod which appears only in this period.
The ephod seems to have been either (a) a case (DBB, 66) or (b) an instrument for consulting an oracle (DBB, 65). The linen ephod had a pouch for the Urim and Thummim. The metal ephod seems to be distinguished from the image and may have contained the written oracular instructions in the form of the oracular instruments, (7) The Kemite scribes of Jabe (1 Ch 2 65); the simple fact that a chance captive from Succoth could write out a list of names and some one at least of the rupest border frontier times could read it, the reference to the staff of the master-mother, whether it be Thummim or Mace (Deborah's Song, point in the same direction).

While, therefore, the times were doubtless wild, the political unity very slight, and the unity of worship even less, there is evidence that there were both political and religious libraries throughout the period.

Beginning with the monarchy, the library situation among the Israelites appears more and more clearly to correspond with that of the surrounding nations. The first record after the choice and procurement of Saul as king was the writing of a constitution by Samuel and the depositing of this in the sacred archives (1 Sa 10 25). This document (LXX *bidwa") was perhaps one of the first, general, or local ("words") of Samuel whose words (1 Ch 29 29, history, chronicles, acts, book, etc) seem to have been possible a register kept by him, perhaps from the time that he accompanied the latter (as later the high-priestly register of the later records) and these were mainly kept from the beginning of his high-priesthood (1 Mace 16 24).

Whether these "words" of Samuel were equivalent to the technical register or "book of the words of days" or not, such registers were undoubtedly kept from the time of David on, and there is nothing so illuminating as to the actual library conditions of the times as the so-called chronicles, histories or acts—the registers, journals or archives of the time. The roll-register seems to be called in full
"the book of the words of days," or with explanatory fullness "book of the records of the words of days," but this appears to be an evolution from "words of days" or even earlier, as well as the abbreviations "book of days" and "book" are used of the same technical work, which is the engrossing in chronological book-form of any series of individual documents—all the documents of a register considered as a whole.

The "word" in Heb is used of books, speeches, sayings, oracles, edicts, reports, formal opinions, agreements, judgments, judicial decisions, stories, records, regulations, sections of a discourse, lines of poetry, whole poems, etc, as well as acts, deeds, "matters," "affairs," events and words in the narrowest sense. It is thus very exactly, as well as literally stated in the LXX by *lpyra", which as a technical book-term (Brock's Biblica 28 29) means any distinct composition, long or short, whether a law, an epicram, or a whole complex work. The best Eng. equivalent for this "work-complete-in-itself," in the case of public records, is "document," and in the case of literary matters, it is "work or writing." The "words" of Samuel or David thus are his "acts" or "deeds" in the sense, not of doing, but of the individual documentary records of those doing quite in the modern sense of the "acts and proceedings" of a convention, or the "deeds" in the property.

In the pl. *dbr h" and *lpyra or *lpyra alike mean a collection of documents, works or writings, i.e. "a library." Sometimes this is used in the sense of archives or library, at other times as a book containing these collected works.

These collected documents in register-form constituted apparently a continuous series until the time when the Book of Ch was written and were extant at that time. The "words" of David (1 Ch 23:27; 27:24), the "book of the words [acts] of Solomon" (1 K 11:41), the book of the words of days of the kings of Judah, and the book of the words of days of the kings of Israel—the kingdoms after division each having naturally its own records.

The general situation during the period as to archival matters is pretty well summarized by Moore in the EB. From the time of Solomon, and more doubtfully from the time of David, he recognizes that "records were doubtless kept in the palace," and that "the temples also doubtless had their records," while there may have been also local records of cities and towns. These records contained probably chief events, treaties, edicts, etc.—probably brief annals "never wrought into narrative memoirs." The temple records contained annals of succession, repairs, changes, etc (EB, II, 2021-28). The records were, however, probably not brief but contained treaties, etc., verbatim in full. To this should moreover be added the significant fact that these archives contained not only business records but also various works of a more or less literary character. Those mentioned include letters, prophecies, prayers, and even songs and Wisdom literature. The "words" of the kings of Israel contained prayers, visions and other matter not usually counted archival. The "acts" (words) of Solomon also contained literary or quasi-literary material. According to Jos the archives of Tyre contained similar material and this was also true of the Amarna archives (c 1380 BC) and those at Boghaz-keui, as well as of the palace archives of Nineveh and the great temple archives of Nippur and Abu Habb (Sippar). So, too, in Egypt the palace archives of King Neferkare contained medical works and those of Rameses III, at least, magical works, while the temple archives in the time of Thutmose III (Breasted, Ancient Records) contained military annals, and those of Denderah certainly many works of a non-registrial character. The temple of early Greece also contained literary works and secular laws as well as temple archives proper.

In short, the palace collections of Israel were no exception to the general rule of antiquity in containing, besides palace archives proper, more or less of religious archives and literary works, while the temple collections contained more or less political records and literary works.

This record system in Israel and Judah, as appears from the OT itself, was the system of Persia in OT times. It was the system of the Jews in Maccabean times, of Egypt during this whole period and for centuries before and after, and of Northern Syria likewise at about this time (Zakar-Baal, of Ghabal, c 1113 BC). The books of Ex, Lev, Nu and Dt, whenever written, reveal the same system, Ex to Nu being in the form of a register, and Dt represented as an abstract prepared for engraving on stone, a use which Joshua is said to have made of it. We have, therefore, the same system existing before and after and on all sides geographically.

All this neighboring practice points to a system of (1) archival collections, (2) contemporary book registers, (3) contemporary publication by inscription, and, in the light of these, the OT method, from the time of David at least, becomes clear, certainly as to archival collections and registers and hardly less so as to the setting-up of inscriptions in permanent material. Even if it is not earlier than 621 BC, it assumes public inscription long before that time, quite comparable in extent to the inscriptions of Thutmose III or King Mesha of Moab, and, although few long inscriptions have been recovered thus far, there is at least the Egyptian inscription (cf also Isa 30:8; Job 19:23,24; Isa 8:1; Jer 17:1; also the Decalogue). Each one of these three elements (even the collection of inscriptions in the temple) was, it must be remembered, called in antiquity a "library.

The reference to "the books" in Dn 9(2) may possibly point to or foreshadow the synagogue library.

Little weight is generally and properly given to the statement of 2 Mace 2:13, that Nehemiah founded a library and gathered into it the writings "about the kings, the prophets and David, and the letters of the kings concerning votive offerings," but it is, as a matter of fact, evident that he, as well as Judas Maccabaeus, who is linked with him in the statement, must have done just that.

From the time of the LXX, the idea of the library (bibliothékē) and even the public library ("books of the people," i.e. public records) was familiar enough, the LXX itself also, according to Jos, linking the temple library of Jerusalem with the Alexandrian library through the furnishing of books by the former to the latter for copying.

With the Rom conquest and the rise of the Idumaean, naturally the methods developed in accordance with Rom practice. It appears from the frequent references of Jos that the public records were extensive and contained genealogical records as well as official letters, decrees, etc. The true method of record continues. It appears, further (Blau, 96; Krauss, III, 179), that there were libraries and even lending libraries in the schools and synagogues, not of Pal only, but wherever Jews were settled. Jos and Chrysostom were among the Mithraeans and the already very clear inference from St. Luke's account of Our Lord's teaching in the synagogue that at this time, and probably from the beginning of the synagogue, the books, the manner of their keeping and the ritual of their using were already essentially as in the modern synagogue. The Synagogue-places of the Christians were the synagogues, and when churches succeeded these, the church library naturally followed, but whether in Bible times or not is a matter of conjecture; they appear at least in very early churches.
Whether the rich secular lit. to which Jos had access was in public or private libraries does not appear directly. It is well known that it was as much a part of the Roman policy in Herod's time to found public libraries in the provinces as it was to restore temples. Twenty-four such provincial libraries, chiefly temple libraries, are known.

The Roman practice of the time still mixed literary with the archival material, and it is likely therefore that the public records of the Jewish temple had in them both Gr and Lat secular books in considerable quantity, as well as the Gr Apoc and a large amount of Aram. or late Heb lit. of Talmudic character.

As to the receptacles and places in which the books were kept, we have reference even in the Heb period to most of the main forms used among the nations: the wooden box, the clay box or pot, the pouch, and on the other hand, once, the "house of books" so familiar in Egypt use and apparently referring to an individual chamber or semi-detached building of temple or palace. Most significant, however, is the statement that the books were kept in the palace and temple treasuries or store-houses.

The sacred ark (בָּרוּן, whatever it may have originally contained, was looked on when D was written as a sacred wooden book-chest, and the ark in which the sacred priests carried the laws about for public reading was in fact likewise a chest.

Such chests were common among the Jews later, some with lids and some with side-opening (Jeu Ena, II, 107–8; Blau, 178). It is tempting to find in D where the book is to be put "by [AV 'in'] the side of the ark" (Dt 31.26), a chest having both lid and openings in the side, but more likely perhaps D means a separate chest, like the coffee or pouch with the golden mice, which was also put by the side (מִיכָכָד) of the ark (1 S 6.8).

In the NT the "cebox" which Paul left behind at Trosos (2 Tim 4.13) was probably (Wattenb., 614, see to Birt and Githaathausen), if not a wooden "casea," at least some sort of bookcase or cover.

The earthen vessel in which Jeremiah (32.14) puts the two 'books' (תָּרָנִים, one sealed and one unsealed, was one of the commonest bookcases of the ancient world. This information has lately been widely reinforced and associated with Bib. history by the discovery of the Elephantine papyri, which were, for the most part, kept in such clay jars (Meyer, Papyraegraf. 15). The word Pentateuch maps back to a five-roll jar, but more likely to a basket or wooden box with five compartments (Blau, 65; Birt, Buchrolle, 21, 22). It was the collective label of a five-roll case, whether of earthenware, wood or basket work.

The pouch or bag bookcase has perhaps its representative in the phylactery (Mt 23.5), which was a sort of miniature armarium in that each of the four little rolls of its compartments was technically a "book" (סֵפֶר). This name is commonly explained as an amulet guarding against evil spirits, but the term actually occurs in the papyri (Bibliophylax) of the preservation of books.

The "house of books" (Ezr 6.1m) or "place of books" is a very close parallel to הַבּוּרֵי, by which (in the pl.) it is used in the LXX. The phrase was a common term in Egypt for library, perhaps also sometimes for scrip torium or evenregistry, and it points to a chamber or semi-detached room or building where the book-chests, jars, etc., were kept. That at Edfu is a semi-detached room and contained many such cases.

While there is little record of libraries in Bib. times, the very formation of the Canon itself, whether by the higher critical process, or by natural processes of gathering whole literary works, implies the gathering together of books, and the temple libraries common to both Egypt and Assyria-Babylonia are almost inevitably implied wherever there was a temple or sanctuary, whatever may be the facts as to the temple libraries. According to Hilprecht there were certainly such libraries and from very ancient times. The palace library of Assurbanî-pal, though itself a discovery of the last times, brings the story down to the times of the written history. For the rest of the story see lib. below, esp. Dzialoszko, Bibliotheken, and the art. on 'Libraries' in the Enc Brit. See also Nineveh, Library of.

In the earlier period at least and including for the Jews the NT times, the particular locality in palace or temple seems to have been the treasury. In the Book of Ezr, search for the decree of Cyrus was to be made in the king's treasure-house (Ezr 5.17), and was made in the "house of books where the treasures were laid up" (Ezr 6.1m). The document was finally found in the palace at Ecbatana—so too in 1 Mac 14.49 the archives are placed in the treasury.

In NT times there had already been a good deal of development in the matter of library buildings. A general type had been evolved which consisted of (1) a colonnade, (2) a lecture-room, a reading-room or assembly room, (3) small rooms or cellars. Such accounts as we have of the Alexandrian libraries, with the excavations at Pergamus, Athens and Rome, reveal the same type—the book-rooms, the colonnade where masters walked or sat and talked with their pupils, the rooms for assembly where the senate or other bodies sometimes sat. In short, as long before in Egypt, whether in palace or temple, the place of teaching was the place of books.

It is significant thus that Our Lord taught in the Treasury, which in Herod's Temple was in the court of the temple proper—probably the porticoes under the women's gallery, some of the adjoining rooms being used for books. As this was within the barrier which no Gentile could cross, Herod must have had also a library of public records in the outer colonnade. See further, Nineveh, Library of.

LIBYA, lib'i-a, LIBYANS, lib'i-anz: In the OT the word occurs in AV in 2 Ch 12.3; 16.8; Nah 3.9 for "Libium" (thus RV). RV, however, retains "Libyans" in Dn 11.43. In Jer 46.9; Ezk 30.5; 38.5, the word is repeated in RV by PUT (q.v.). In the NT the word "Libyans" (Αἰγύπτιοι, Lübû) occurs, in close connection with Cyrene (q.v.) (Acts 2.10). Gr and Rom writers apply the term to the African continent, generally excluding Egypt. See Libium.

LITERATURE.
I. The Terms.—Of the Heb terms, ha-yah is the vb which it is to have life, or the vital principle. To continue to live, or to live prosperously. In the Pid it signifies to give life, or preserve, or quicken and restore life. The Hiphil in much like the Piel. The noun ha-yah generally used in the pl. is an abstract noun, i.e., the possession of the vital principle with its energies and activities. Nephekh often means living being or creature. Sometimes it has the sense of a seat but other times it refers to the seat of the soul, the personality, the emotional self—appetites—passions and even mental activities. Frequently it means life, the seat of life, and in this way it is used about 171 in the OT, referring to the principle of vitality in both man and animal, and signifies wind, breath, principle or source of vitality, but is never used to signify life proper.

II. The OT Teaching.—The term "life" is used in the OT in the popular sense. It meant life in the body, the existence and activity of man in all his parts and energies. Use of the Term. It is the person complete, conscious and active. There is no idea of the body being a fetter or prison to the soul; the body was essential to life and the writers had no desire to be separated from it. To them the physical sphere was a necessity, and a man was living when all his activities were performed in the light of God's face and favor. The secret and source of life to them was relationship with God. There was nothing good or desirable apart from this relation of fellowship. To overcome or be rid of all ties to life. The real center of gravity in life was in the moral and religious part of man's nature. This must be in fellowship with God, the source of all life and activity.

The conception of life is very complex. Several meanings are clearly indicated: (1) Very frequently it is refers to the vital principle itself, or man and made him a nephesh or living being (see also Gen 1 30; 6 17; 7 22; 45 5, etc.). (2) It is used to denote the period of one's actual existence, i.e., "lifetim" (Gen 23 1; 25 7; 47 9; Ex 6 16; 18 20, etc.). (3) The life is represented as a direct gift from God, and dependent absolutely upon Him for its continuance (Gen 1 11-27; 2 r 16 22). (4) In a few cases it refers to the conception of children, denoting the time when conception was possible (Gen 18 10.14 m; 2 K 4 16.17 m.). (5) In many cases to the vitality, or life, or activity, of individuals, and all of which make up life (Dt 32 47; 1 8 26 29; Job 10 1, etc.). (6) In a few instances it is used synonymously with the means of sustaining life (Dt 24 6; Prov 27 27). (7) Many times to the validity or absolute of the marriage relations and activities, all of which make up life (Dt 32 47; 1 8 26 29; Job 10 1, etc.). (8) In a few instances it is used synonymously with the means of sustaining life (Dt 24 6; Prov 27 27). (9) Many times to the vitality or absolute of the marriage relations and activities, all of which make up life (Gen 30 15.19; Esr 6 10; Ps 16 11; 30 5; Prov 2 10, and frequently). (8) It is always represented as a very precious gift, and offences against life were to be severely punished (Gen 4 4; Lev 17 14; 24 17).

Capital punishment is here specifically enjoined because of the value of the life that has been taken (Ez 18 16; 23 25; Dt 19 21); and this even applies to the beast (Lev 24 18). The life of the man was represented as abiding in the blood. If the blood be not shed, the life must perish (Lev 17 15; Dt 12 12). The Decalogue forbids murder or the taking of human life wrongfully (Ex 20 13; Dt 5 17). Garments taken in pledge must not be kept over night, for thereby the owner's life might be endangered (Dt 24 6). That life was considered precious appears from such verses as Gen 24 20; Job 2 4; Prov 23 26. The essence of sacrifice consisted in the fact that the life (the nephesh) rested in the blood; thus when blood was shed, life was lost (Dt 12 23; Lev 17 11). Oppression on the part of judges and rulers was severely condemned because oppression was detrimental to life.

(9) Long life was much desired and sought by the Israelites, and under certain conditions this was possible (Ps 91 16). The longevity of the antediluvian patriarchs is a problem by itself (see ANTE-DILUVIANS). It was one of the greatest of calamities to be cut off in the midst of life (Isa 38 10-12; 53 8); that a good old age was longed for is shown by Ex 20 12; Ps 21 4; 34 12; 61 6, etc. This long life was possible to the obedient to parents (Ex 20 12). It bids God to be kind to God (Dt 4 4; Prov 3 1 2; 10 27).; to the wise (Prov 3 16; 9 11); to the pure in heart (Ps 34 12-14; 91 1-10; Eccl 3 12-13); to those who feared God (Prov 10 27; Isa 65 18-21; 38 15-19). (10) The possibility of a life immortal is dimly hinted at in the earliest writing, and much more clearly taught in the later. The Tree of Life in the midst of the garden indicated a possible immortality for man upon earth (Gen 2 9; 3 22-24) (see TREE OF LIFE).

Failing to partake of this and falling into sin by partaking of the "tree of the knowledge of good and evil"; they were driven forth from the garden lest they should eat of the tree of life and become immortal beings in their sinful condition. To deprive man of the possibility of making himself immortal while sinful was a blessing to the race; immortality without holiness is a curse rather than a blessing. The way to the tree of life was henceforth guarded by the cherubim and the flame of a sword, so that men could not partake of it in their condition of sin. This, however, did not exclude the possibility of a spiritual immortality (Is 63 17). Enoch's fellowship with God led to a bodily translation; and Job also Elijah, to a similar translation. The death of the dead, God called Himself the God of Abraham and Isaac and Jacob, implying that they were really alive then. In Isa 26 10 there is a clear reference to transfiguration, and an end of death. Dan 12 2 asserts a resurrection of many of the dead, some to everlasting life, some to shame and everlasting contempt. Some of the psalmists firmly believed in the continuity of the life in fellowship with God (Ps 16 10.11; 17 15; 23 6; 49 15; 73 24.25). The exact meaning of some of these statements is difficult to understand, yet this much is clear: there was a revolt against death in many pious minds, and a belief that the life of fellowship with God could not end or be broken even by death itself. See IMMORTALITY.

(11) The fundamental fact in the possession of life was vital relationship with God. Men first lived because God breathed into them the breath of life (Gen 2 7). Man's vital energies are the outflowing of the spirit or vital energies of God, and all activities are dependent upon the vitalizing power from God. When God sends forth His spirit, things are created, and live; when He withdraws that spirit, they die (Ps 104 30). "In his favor is life; and his presence makes all things glisten" (Ps 39 5 AY). "God created man in his own image, male and female he created them" (Gen 1 27). "A magnificent gift, a crown of splendor and honor, a crown of glory and beauty, a crown of life in the presence of the Lord" (Ps 9 10 AY). See IMMORTALITY.
cease. They felt that such a relationship could not cease, and God would take them out of Sheol.

III. In the Ancephalos.—A similar conception of life appears here as in the OT. Zodh and psuchh are used and occur most frequently in the books of Wisd and Eccles. In 1 Esd 1.20 (the pre-exilic use is little used; 2 Esd 10.23; 16.61 is but a quotation from Gen 2.7, and refer to the vital principle; 2 Esd 1.19, 30, Tob. 48.26, Ad Est, use it in the same sense also. Wisd and Eccles use it several times; closely resembling the use in Prov (cf Eccles 4.12; 14.10, 13.4). It is evident that there is no additional meaning attached to the word. The Ps Son refer to everlasting life in 3.16; 13.10; 14.26.

IV. In the NT.—The term used at times as the equivalent of the Heb hayyim. It refers to life externally, i.e. the sum total of one's existence, a lifetime, also to the means of sustaining life, such as wealth, etc. Psuchh is also equivalent to hayyim at times, but very frequently to ne'orah and sometimes to ruah. Thus it means the vital principle, a living being, the immaterial part of man, affections, desires and appetites, etc. The term zodh corresponds very closely to psuchh, and means the vital principle, the state of one who is animate, the fulness of activities and relationship both in the physical and spiritual realms.

The content of the word zodh is the chief theme of the NT. The life is mediated by Jesus Christ. In the OT this life was through fellowship with God, in the NT it is through Jesus Christ the Mediator. The NT teaching is similar to that of the OT, its higher development of meaning, being enriched by the supreme teaching and revelation of Jesus Christ. In the NT as well as in the OT, the center of gravity in human life is in the moral and religious nature of man.

The teaching here regarding life naturally links itself with OT ideas and the prevailing conceptions of Judaism. The word is used in the Synoptic Gospels (Mt 2.20; Mk 10.45; Lk 12.22; 14.28). It also is the period of one's existence, i.e. lifetime (Lk 1.75; 16.25).

(1) It may mean the totality of man's relationships (Lk 15.15) which do not consist in abundance of material possessions. (4) Generally it means the real life, the vital connection with the world and God, the sum total man's highest interests. It is called "eternal life" (Mt 19.17; 20.16), it is called "life" (Mt 18.5; 19.17; Mk 9.43.45.46). In these passages Jesus seems to imply that it is almost equivalent to "laying up treasures in heaven," or to "entering the kingdom of God." The entering into life and entering the kingdom are precisely the same, for they are both spiritual realms where God controls, where the principles, activities and relationships of heaven prevail, and hence to enter into these is to enter into "life." (5) The lower life of earthly relationship and activities must be subordinated to the higher and spiritual (Mt 10.39; 18.25; Lk 19.24). These merely earthly interests may be very desirable and enjoyable, but whoever would cling to these and make them supreme is in danger of losing the higher. The spiritual being into which one should be brought should even if the other relationship should be lost entirely. (6) Jesus also speaks of this life as something future, and to be realized at the consummation of the age (Mt 19.29; Lk 18.30), or the world to come.

This in no wise contradicts the statement that eternal life can be entered upon in this life. As Jesus Himself was in vital relationship with the spiritual world and lived the eternal life, He sought to bring others into the same. This life was far from being perfect. The perfection could come only at the consummation of the age. The life carried in this life was entered into and perfected by the risen Christ in the world, the Church, the Body of Christ. Into the perfect fellowship with God and connection with the spirit-world and its blessed experiences. This is seen here in the teaching, in the Seer's teaching, in the symbol of the children of Zion. As Jesus Himself was in vital relationship with the spiritual world and lived the Eternal Life, He sought to bring others into the same. This life was far from being perfect. The perfection could come only at the consummation of the age. The life carried in this life was entered into and perfected by the risen Christ in the world, the Church, the Body of Christ. (7) The conditions which Jesus lays down for entering into this life are faith in Himself as the one Mediator of the life, and the following of Him in a life of obedience. He alone knows the Father and can reveal Him to others. One who follows Him can give true rest and can teach men how to live (11.28). The sure way to this life is: "Follow me." His whole ministry was virtually a prolonged effort to win confidence in Himself as Son and Mediator, to win obedience, and hence bring men unto these spiritual relationships and activities which constitute the true life.

The fullest and richest teachings regarding life are found here. The greatest word of this Gospel is "life." The author says he wrote the Gospel in order that "ye may have Fourth life" (20.31). Most of the teachings Gospel recorded, circle around this great word "life." This teaching is in no way distinctive and different from that of the dead state, but is supplementary, and completes the teaching of Jesus on the subject. The use of the word is not as varied, being concentrated on the one supreme subject. (1) In a few cases it refers only to the vital principle which gives rise to the present life (10.11.15-18; 15.37; 16.13). (2) It represents Jesus the Logos as the origin and means of all life to the world. As the preincarnate Logos He was the source of life to the universe (1.4). As the triumphal Logos He said His life is eternal; He is originally from the Father (5.26; 6.57; 10.18). He then was the means of life to men (3.15.16; 4.14; 5.21.39.40); and this was the purpose for which He came into the world (6.33.34.51; 10.3). (3) The prevailing reference is to those activities which are the expression of fellowship with God and Jesus Christ. These relationships are called "eternal life" (3.15.16.36; 4.14, etc). The nearest approach to a definition of eternal life is found in 17.3. Though not a scientific or metaphysical definition, it is nevertheless Jesus' own description of eternal life, and reveals His conception of it. It is thus more valuable than a formal definition. It is "to know God and Jesus Christ whom He hath sent."

This knowledge is vastly more than mere intellectual perception or understanding. It is moral knowledge, it is personal acquaintance, it is fellowship, a contact, a union, as if we may say spiritually by the same, for the inner affinity and sympathy, an experience of similar thoughts, emotions, purposes, aspirations, the shared change of the heart's deepest feelings and experiences. It is a bringing of the whole personality of man into right relationship with the personality of God. This relation is ethical, personal, binding the two together with ties which nothing can separate. It is this experience that Jesus came to bring men. Such a life Jesus says is satisfying to all who hunger and thirst for it (4.14; 5.38); it is the source of light to all (1.4; 8.12); it is indestructible (6.58; 11.26); it is like a well of water in the soul (4.14); it is secured by personally partaking of those qualities which belong to Jesus (6.53).

(4) This life is a present possession and has also a glorious future fruition. (a) To those who exercise faith in Jesus it is a present experience and possession (4.10; 6.24.40). Faith in Him as the Son of God is the psychological reality by which persons are brought into this vital relationship with God. Those who exercised the faith immediately experienced this new power and fellowship and exercised the new activities. (b) It has a glorious fruition in the future also (4.36; 6.20; 6.39.44.54). Jesus does not leave the disciples here in the eschatological phase of Jesus' teachings as to the present reality and actual possession of this blessed life.

(5) It has been objected that in speaking of the Logos as the source of life John is pursuing a metaphysical line, whereas the life which he so much emphasizes has an ethical basis, and he makes no attempt to reconcile the.

Two. To be consistent with the idea of performing the impossible task of attaining the impossible metaphysics from the two. It will not appeal very strongly to the average Christian.

It is a purely academic objection. The ordinary mind will wonder that if the life is the source of both physical and eternal life it is because He possesses something of the essence and being of God, which makes His work for men possible. The metaphysical and the ethical must exist together, may run concurrently, the one being the source and sustaining the other. There is no contradiction.

Both metaphysics and ethics are a legitimate and necessary exercise of the human mind.

In his intercessory prayer (Jn 17), Jesus said his mission was to give eternal life to all who would be called (Jn 17:2 the Father had given him (Jn 17:2).

3. In the record in Acts is the carrying out of the purpose. The word "life" is used in several senses: (1) the vital principle which gives physical vitality and existence (Rom 8:6; 11:38; Gal 6:8). It comes through obedience to the word (Rom 7:10; Phil 2:16) and through faith (1 Tim 1:16). It may be apprehended in this life (1 Tim 6:12; 17). It is brought to light through the gospel (2 Tim 1:10). It is a reward to those who by patience in well-doing seek it (Rom 2:7). It gives conquering power over sin and death (Rom 5:17). It is the end or reward of a sanctified life (Rom 2:7). It is person possession and a hope of glory (1 Cor 1:2; 3:7). It will be received in all its fulness hereafter (Rom 2:7; 2 Cor 5:4). Thus Paul’s use of the word substantially agrees with the teaching in the Gospels, and no doubt was largely based upon it.

In the Johannine Epistles and Rev, the contents of the term “life” are the same as those in the Fourth Gospel. Life in certain passages (Jn 3:16; Rev 8:9; 11:11; 12:11) Writings of John is more physical vitality and existence upon earth. The source of life is Christ Himself (Jn 1:1f; 5:11f.16). The blessed eternal life in Christ is a present possession to all those who are in fellowship with the Father and the Son (Jn 11:25). Here is an echo of the words of Jesus (Jn 17:3) where John describes the life, the eternal life which was with the Father and was manifested unto us. It is virtually fellowship with the Father and with the Son (1 Jn 1:2). The eternal life is promised to those who are faithful (Rev 2:7). It is person possession and a hope of glory (Rev 2:10). The crown of life doubtless refers to the realization of all the glorious possibilities that come through fellowship with God and the Son. They are the thrills of life that were given to the writer of the life of Christ (Rev 21:6; 22:17). The river of life flows through the streets of the New Jerusalem (22:1), and the tree of life blooms on its banks, bearing twelve manner of fruit (22:14). See Tree of Life.

The Ep. to the Hebrews of our lifetime or periods of existence upon earth (2:15; 7:9), likewise wise of the power of an indwelling Holy Spirit, one being the source and sustaining the other. There is no contradiction.

Both metaphysics and ethics are a legitimate and necessary exercise of the human mind.

6. In the life (7:16); James promises the crown of life to the faithful (1:12). This book of life is the fulness of life’s possibilities afterlife. Our lifetime is preparation in God’s eyes and represent a chiefly as a vapor. Peter in 1 Pet 3:7 speaks of man and woman as joint-heirs of the grace of life, and of loving life (3:10), referring to the totality of relationships and activities. The “all things that pertain unto life and godliness” (2 Pet 1:3) constitute the whole Christian life involving the life eternal.

LIFT: To make lofty, to raise up. A very common word in EV representing a great variety of Heb and Gr words, although in the OT used chiefly as the tr of נֶאֶב, nēḇā’. Of none of these words, however, is “lift” used as a technical tr, and “lift” is interchanged freely with its synonyms, esp. “exalt” (cf Ps 75:5; 89:24) and “raise” (cf Ecc 4:10; 2 S 12:17). “Lift” is still perfectly good English, but not in all the senses in which it is used in EV; e.g. such phrases as “men that lifted up axes upon a thicket” (Ps 74:5); “lift up thy feet unto the perpetual ruins” (Ps 74:3), and even the common “lift up the eyes” often distinctly archaic. However, almost all the uses are perfectly clear, and only the following need be noted.

To lift up the head (Gen 40:13.19.20; 2 K 25:27; Ps 3:5; Sir 11:13; Lk 21:28) means to raise from a low condition (but only Ps 24:7.9 see GATE). To “lift up the horn” (Ps 75:5) is to assume a confident position, the figure being taken from fighting oxen (see Horn). “Lift up the face” may be meant lit. (2 K 9:32), or it may denote the bestowal of favor (Ps 4:6); it may mean the attitude of a righteous man toward God (Job 22:26), or simply the attitude of a suppliant (Ezr 9:6).

The creation of light was the initial step in the creation of life. “Let there be light” (Gen 1:3) was the first word of life formed upon the primary matter out of which He created the heavens and the earth, and which lay, until the utterance of that word, in the chaos of darkness and desolation. Something akin to all-luminous, all-pervasive electro-magnetic activity of the aurora borealis penetrated the chaotic night of the world. The ultimate focusing of light (on the 4th day of creation, Gen 1 14) in sun, stars, and solar systems brought the initial creation to completion and brought the essential condition of all organic life. The origin of light thus finds its explanation in the purpose and very nature of God whom John defines as not only the Author of light but, in an all-inclusive sense, as light itself: "In him was the light" (John 1 5).

The word "light" is Divinely rich in its comprehensiveness and meaning. Its material splendor is used throughout the Scriptures as the symbol and synonym of all that is luminous and radiant in the mental, moral and spiritual life of men and angels; while the eternal God, because of His holiness and moral perfection, is pictured as "dwelling in light unapproachable" (1 Tim 6 16). Every plan of the word, from the original light in the natural world to the spiritual glory of the celestial, is found in Holy Writ.

1. Origin of Light

(a) Natural light.—The light of day (Gen 1 5); of sun, moon and stars; "lights in the firmament" (Gen 1 14; Ps 136 7; 136 3); Eccle 12 7). The characteristics are beauty, radiance, utility. It "rejoiceth the heart" (Prov 15 30); "Truly the light is sweet" (Ecc 11 7); without it men stumble and are helpless (Jn 1 9-10); it is something for which they wait with inexpressible longing (Ps 30 26; cf Ps 130 8). Life, joy, activity and all blessings are dependent upon light.

Light and life are almost synonymous to the inhabitants of Paul, and in the same way darkness and death. There is the land of sunshine. When they go to other lands of clouded skies their only thought is to return to the brightness and sunshine of their native land. In Paul there is hardly a day in the whole year when the sun does not shine for some part of it, while for five months of the year there is scarcely an interruption of the sunshine. Time is reckoned from sunrise to sunset. The day's labor closes with the coming of darkness. "Man goeth forth unto his work and to his labor until the evening" (Ps 104 23).

The suddenness of the change from darkness to light was terrible and so was the disappearance of the sun in the evening more striking than in more northern countries, and it is not strange that in the ancient days they should have arisen a worship of the sun as the giver of light and happiness, and that Job should mention the sunrise worship when he "beheld the sun" (Job 31 26), or the sun rising in brightness (Job 31 26). The severest plague in Egypt (Ex 10 1) was the plague of darkness which fell upon the Egyptians (Ex 10 23). This love of light finds expression in both OT and NT in a very extensive use of the word to express those things which are most to be desired and must helpful to man, and in this connection we find some of the most beautiful figures in the Bible.

(b) Artificial light.—When natural light fails, man by discovery or invention provides himself with some temporary substitute, however dim and inadequate. The ancient Hebrews had "oil for the light" (Ex 25 6; 35 8; Lev 24 2) and lamps (Ex 35 18; Mt 5 16). "There were many lights [lamp] in the upper chamber" at Tros, where Paul preached until midnight (Acts 20 8); so Jer 25 10 RV, "Light of the lamp," AV "candle."

(c) Miraculous light.—When the appalling plague of "thick darkness," for three days, enveloped the Egyptians, they rendered them helpless, "all the children of Israel had light in their dwellings" (Ex 10 23). Whether the darkness was due to a Divinely ordered natural cause or the light was the natural light of day, the process that preserved the Israelites from the encompassing darkness was supernatural. Miraculous, also, even though through natural agency, was the "pillar of fire" that gave light to the Israelites escaping from Pharaoh (Ex 13 21; 14 20). Ps 78 18 declares, "God the light of the people, the pillar of fire." Supernatural was the effulgence at Christ's transfiguration that made "his garments . . . white as the light" (Mt 17 2). Under the same category Paul classifies 'the great light' that 'suddenly shone round about him from heaven' on the way to Damascus (Acts 22 6; cf 9 3). In these rare instances the supernatural light was not only symbolic of an inner spiritual light, but instrumental, in part at least, in revealing or preparing the way for it.

2. A Comprehensive Term

(a) A few passages, however, refer to the light that comes chiefly to the intellect or mind through Divine instruction, e.g. Ps 119 130. The opening of thy words giveth light" (Ps 6 33, "law of light," and here the instruction includes moral as well as mental enlightenment.

(b) Moral: Job 24 13-16 has to do exclusively with man's moral attitude to truth: "rebel against the light" (cfr Ps 10 12, "He gave light to man" (Ps 18 25) describes a moral fusion and blindness, which cannot distinguish light from darkness.

(c) For the most part, however, light and life go together. It is the product of salvation: "Jeh is my light and my salvation" (Ps 27 1). "Light," figuratively used, has to do preeminently with spiritual life, including also the illumination that floods all the faculties of the soul: intellect, conscience, reason, will. In the moral realm the enlightenment of these faculties is dependent wholly on the renewal of the spirit. "In thy light . . . we see light" (Ps 36 9); "The life was the light of men" (John 1 4).

Light is an attribute of holiness, and thus a personal quality. He who is "enlightened" is "God light," in Deity.

1. God.—"God is light, and in him darkness was no darkness at all" (1 John 1 5).

2. Attribute Darkness is the universal symbol and of Holiness condition of sin and death; light the symbol and expression of holiness: "God is light and in him is no darkness at all" (1 John 1 5).

3. An "The light of Israel will be for a fire, and his Holy One for a flame" (Isa 10 17). God, by His presence and grace, is to us a "marvellous light" (1 Pet 2 9). The glory of His holiness and presence is the "everlasting light" of the redeemed in heaven (Isa 60 19-20; Rev 21 23-24; 22 5).

Christ, the eternal Word (Logos, λόγος, as 1 1), who said "Let there be light" (Gen 1 3), is Himself the "effulgence of [God's] glory" (He 1 3), "the light which lighteth every man, coming into the world" (Jn 1 9) (cf the statements concerning Wisdom in Wisd 27 5 f and concerning Christ in He 1 3; and see CREEDS; LOGOS; JOHANNINE THOLOGY; WISDOM). As the predicted Messiah, He was to be "for a light of the Gentiles" (Isa 49 6). His birth was the fulfilment of this prophecy (Lk 2 32). Jesus called Himself "the light of the world" (Jn 8 12; 9 5; 12 46). As light He was "God . . . manifest in the flesh" (1 Tim 3 16 AV). "The Word was God" (Jn 1 1). Jesus as Logos is the eternal expression of God as a substantial impress of a thought. In the threefold essence of His being God is Life (ζωή, ἀνεφαίρετη) (Jn 5 20; 6 57); God is Love (ἀγάπη) (1 Jn 4 8); God is Light (κίες) (Ex 29 43; 39 22; Ezek 43 2; Zech 14 1; Rev 21 4; 22 3).
(φῶς, φῶς) (1 Jn 1 5). Thus Christ, the logos, manifesting the three aspects of the Divine Nature, is Life, Love and Light, and these three are inseparable and constitute the glory which the disciples beheld in Him, "glory as of the only begotten from the Father" (Jn 1 14). In revealing giving life, Christ becomes "the light of men" (Jn 1 4). God gives "the light of the knowledge of [his] glory in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor 4 6), and this salvation is called "the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ" (4 4). Christ is thus the Teacher, Enlightener ("Christ shall give thee light," Eph 5 14 AV), Guide, Saviour of men.

(3) All who catch and reflect the light of God and of Christ are called "light," "lights" (a). John the Baptist: "a burning and a shining light," (Jn 8 12 AV). It is significant that this pre-Christian prophet was termed a light, a symbol of the new dispensation, the new dispensation.

(4) The church.—Zion was to be "shining" because her light had come (Isa 60 1). The Gentiles were to come to her light (Eph 4 6). Her mission as the enlightener of the world was symbolized in the ornamental proclamations of her priesthood. The Urim of the high priest's breastplate signified light, and the name itself is but the pl. form of the Heb 'or. It stood for revelation, and Thummim for truth. The church of the Christian dispensation was to be even more radiant with the light of God and of Christ. The seven churches of Asia were revealed to John, by the Spirit, as seven golden candlesticks, and as seven stars, "as seven lamps burning with the face of God" (Rev 2 1). The church is a temple of God's presence and fellowship (2 Cor 6 15; and a king's favour (Prov 19 13); (9) life (Ps 13 3; 49 19; Jn 1 4).

Expressive terms are: (1) "fruit of the light." (Eph 5 9). I.e. goodness, righteousness, truth; (2) "light in the darkness" (Eph 5 8; Hos 6 3). Indicating the source of light (cf Isa 2 5); (3) "inheritance of the light" (1 Cor 1 12). A present possession in heaven; (4) "Father of lights": (Jas 1 17), signifying the Creator of the heavenly light; (5) "light in the dark" (1 Pet 2 9), the light of God's presence and fellowship; (6) "Walk in the light" (1 Jn 1 7), in the light of God's teaching and companionship; (7) "lights of darkness" (Eph 5 8); (8) "light of love, Divine and fraternal; (5) "light of the glorious gospel of Christ," (Eph 5 2; 1 Cor 4 6 AV). Light, Lightness, lit'ness: "Light" is used in Scripture, as in ordinary speech, in the sense of what is small, slight, trivial, easy, "lightness" with the connotation of vacillation or lassivousness. Thus in the OT, "a light thing," a small, easy, slight thing (nehem, kábal, 2 K 3 18; Isa 49 6; Ezek 8 17; 22 7, in the last case "to treat slightly"). "Lightness" (légh, kág) occurs in Jer 3 9 ("the lightness of her whoredom"); in 23 32, RV changes "lightness" (a different word) to "boasting." In the NT the phrase occurs in Mt 22 5, "made light of it" (*size, amelhô), i.e. "treated it with neglect"; and St. Paul asks (2 Cor 1 17), "Did I show lightness?" (RV "fickleness"). These examples sufficiently illustrate the meaning.

LIGHTNING, lit'ning (Phób, bárab, Théii, hâdz; charaxos, astraphe): Lightning is caused by the discharge of electricity between clouds or between clouds and the earth. In a thunder-storm there is a rapid gathering of particles of moisture into clouds and forming of large drops of rain. This gathers with it electric potential until the surface of the cloud (or the enlarged water particles) is insufficient to carry the charge, and a discharge takes place, introducing a brilliant flash on the earth. The common thunder-clap. Thunder-storms are common in Syria and Pal during the periods of heavy rain in the spring and fall and are often severe. Lightning is usually accompanied by heavy rainfall or hail, as at the time of the plague of hail (Ex 9 24). See Hail.

In the Scriptures it is used: (a) indicating the power of God: The power of God is shown in His command of the forces of Nature, and He is the only one who knows the secrets of Nature; "He brings down lightning from the skies" (Job 36 29); "He directs . . . his lightning" (Job 37 3 AV); "Canst thou send forth lightnings, that they may go?" (Job 38 35); "Ask ye of Jehovah that maketh lightnings" (Zec 10 1). See also Ps 16 14; 97 4; 136 7; Job 36 22; Jer 10 13; (b) figuratively and poetically: David sings of Jehovah, "He sent . . . lightnings manifold, and discomfited them" (Ps 18 14); used for speed: "The chariots . . . run like the lightnings" (Nah 2 4); "His arrow shall go forth as the lightning" (Zec 9 14); "The living creatures ran and returned as the appearance of a flash of lightning" (Ezk 1 14). The coming of the kingdom is described by Jesus as the shining of the lightning from one part of heaven to another, even so is the coming of the kingdom of God (Mt 24 27; Lk 17 24); (c) meaning bright or shining: Daniel in his vision saw a man and "his face [was] as the appearance of lightning" (Dan 10 6). LIGURE, lig'ur (Ex 25 19; 39 12 AV, RV "jacinth"). See STONES, PRECIOUS.

LIKE, liken, LIKEN, lik'n, LIKENESS, lik'nes, LIKING, likening: (1) As a noun, "like" in modern Eng. is virtually obsolete, except in the phrase "and the like," which is not found in RV. The like, however, occurs in 1 K 10 20 [2 Ch 9 19; 2 Ch 1 12; Ezek 5 9; 18 10 (RV "any one of these things"—the text is uncertain)]; 46 25; Joel 2 2; Wisd 16 1 (RV "creatures like those"); Sir 7 12. His like is found in Job 41 33; Sir 13 15; "their like" in Sir 27 9 (cf Gal 5 21) is only slightly archaic, but "doth not such like" (Ezk 18 14) is quite obsolete.

(2) As an adj. "like" is common in AV in such combinations as "like manner" (frequently), "like weight" (Ex 30 34), "like occupation" (Acts 19 26), etc. Modern Eng. would in most cases replace light" by "the same," as has been done in 1 Thess 2:14 RV (cf Rom 15:5; Phil. 2:2). So RV has modernized the archaic "like," excepting 2 Pet 1:1 by inserting "a" before "like." AV's rendering of 1 Pet 3:21, "the like figure whereunto he could not have been very clear at any time, and RV has rendered completely into "after a true likeness" (in "the antitype").

(3) As an advb. "like" is used in Jer 33:9, "He is like to die"; Jon 1:4, "like to be broken." RV could have used "likely" in these verses. Most commonly all the uses of "like" is the quasi-propo-sitional construction in "He is like to be broken," etc. This is of course good modern Eng., but not so when "like" is enlarged (as it usually is in EV) into the forms "like to" (Dnl 7:5), "like unto" (very common), "like as" (Isa 28:17, etc). These forms and the simple "like" are entirely indistinguishable from the old Greek, and the RV has attempted little systematizing beyond reducing the occurrences of "like as" (cf Mt 12:13, and ARV Isa 13:4; Jer 23:29).

(4) The vb. "like" has two distinct meanings, "to be pleased with," "to have pleasure in." The former sense occurs in Dt 25:16 (AV, ERV), "in one of thy gates, where it liketh him best," and in Est 8:8; Am 4:5 AV, Sir 33:13 (AV has "pleaseth" in the first OT passage). The other use of "like" belongs also to modern Eng., although in a much weakened sense. On account of this weakening, 1 Ch 28:4 AV, "liked me to make me king," and Rom 1:28 AV, "did not like to retain God," have become in RV "took pleasure in" and "refused to" (in "thee not approved" if 1 Ch would have been better if Dt 25:7, 8, "like not to have," had been modified also into "hath no wish to take." From this use of "like" is derived liking in the modern sense in Wind 16:21, "liking itself to every man's liking" (RV "choice"). In 1 Esd 4:39, "All men do well like of her works" is a further obsolete use.

(5) Liken and "make like" are common. To be noted only is that, in He 7:3, "made like unto the Son of God," the old rendering of "represent" by the writer with the qualities of. Likeness normally means "a copy of," but in Ps 17:15 it means the actual form itself ("form" in AV, ERV's); of Rom 6:5; 8:3; Phil 2:7, and perhaps Acts 14:11. Common "likeness" is an obsolete use of "like" (quite distinct from that above) in Job 39:4 AV, ERV, "Their young ones are in good liking;" Dnl 10:10, "see your faces worse liking." The meaning is "appearance," "apparition," and "ARC renders "their young ones become strong." When used as a "thing" used in looking. Likeness varies in meaning from the simple conjunction "and" to a strong advb., in "exactly the same way," RV has made some attempt to distinguish the various forces (e.g. cf AV with RV in Lk 22:36; 16:7; 22:22). But complete consistency was not attainable, and in certain instances was neglected deliberately, in order to preserve the familiar wording, as in Lk 10:37, "Go, and do thou likewise." BURTON SCOTT EASTON

LIKHÉ, likhê (לְקֶה, לְקֶה): A descendant of Manasseh (1 Ch 7:19).

LILLITH, l’ilith, l’ilith. See Night-Monster.

LILY, l’ilí [šōphēn, šōphēn] [1 K 7:19], šōphēn, šōbānānū [2 Ch 4:5; Cant 2:1; Hos 14:5]. pl. [Cant 2:14; 4:5; 5:13; 6:2; 7:2; Eccles 39:14; 50:8]; kāpōn, kāpōn [Mt 6:28; Lk 22:27]). The Heb is probably a loan word from the Egypt, the original s-h-n denoting the lotus-flower, NYCTAGINACEAE. This was probably the model of the architectural ornament, tr'd "lily-work," which appeared upon the capitals of the columns in the temple porch (1 K 7:19), upon the top of the pillars (ver 22) and upon the turned-back rim of the "molten sea" (ver 26).

Botanically the word shōbānānū, like the similar modern Arab. Sūsān, included in all probability a great many flowers, and was used in a way at least as wide as the popular use of the Eng. word "lily." The expression "lily of the valleys" (Cant 2:1) has nothing to do with the plant of that name; the flowers referred to appear to have been associated with the rank herbage of the valley bottoms (Cant 4:5); the expression "His lips are as lilies" (5:13) might imply a scarlet flower, but more probably in oriental usage every pretty flower; the sweet scent of the lily is referred to in Ecclus 39:14, and in 50:8 we read of "lilies by the rivers of water." The beauty of the blossom is implied in Hos 14:5, where JEH promises that repentant Israel shall "blossom as the lily." A "heap of wheat set about with lilies" (Cant 7:2) probably refers to the smoothed-out piles of newly threshed wheat on the threshing-floors decorated by a circle of flowers.

The reference of Our Lord to the "lilies of the field" is probably, like the OT references, quite a general one.

The Heb and the Gr very likely include not only any members of the great order LILICIACEAE, growing in Pal, e.g. asphodel, squill, hyacinth, ornithogalum ("Star of Bethlehem"), fringed squill, tuberose, cynth, but also the more showy irises ("Tabor lilies," "purple irises," etc) and the beautiful gladoli of the N.O. Iridaceae and the familiar narcissi of the N.O. Amaryllidaceae.

In later Jewish lit. the lily is very frequently referred to symbolically, and a lotus or lily was commonly pictured on several Jewish coins.

LILY-WORK: The ornament on the capitals on the bronze pillars, Jachin and Boaz, in front of Solomon's temple (1 K 7:19-22). See LILY; TEMPLE; JACHIN AND BOAZ.

LIME, l’im [Heb. לִים, לִים; cf. Arab. نِم, šādād, "to plaster"; 2] ʿām, gīr; cf Arab. جلر, gīr, "gypsum" or "quick-lime"; [3] ʿōbān, ʿābān-ghār: šādād is tr'd "limes" in Isa 33:12, "And the peoples shall be as the burnings of lime, as thorns cut down, that are burned in the fire," and in Am 2:1, "He burned the bones of the king of Edom into lime." It is tr'd "plaster" in Lk 22:27. Likewise varies in meaning from the simple conjunction "and" to a strong advb., in "exactly the same way," RV has made some attempt to distinguish the various forces (e.g. cf AV with RV in Lk 22:36; 16:7; 22:22). But complete consistency was not attainable, and in certain instances was neglected deliberately, in order to preserve the familiar wording, as in Lk 10:37, "Go, and do thou likewise." BURTON SCOTT EASTON

Everywhere in Pal limestone is at hand which can be converted into lime. The lime-kiln is a thick-walled, cylindrical or conical, roofless structure built of rough stones without mortar, the spaces between the stones being plastered with clay. It is usually built on the side of a hill which is slightly excavated for it, so that the sloping, external wall of the kiln rises much higher from the ground on the lower side than on the upper. The builders leave a passage or tunnel through the base of the thick wall on the lower side. The whole interior is filled with carefully packed fragments of limestone, and large piles of thorny-burnet and other shrubs to serve as fuel are gathered about the kiln. The fuel is introduced through the tunnel to the base of the lime-kiln in the kiln, and as the fire rises through the mass of broken limestone a strong draft is created. Relays of men are kept busy supplying fuel day and night. By day a column of black smoke rises from the kiln, and at night the flames may be seen bursting from the top. Several days are required to reduce the stone to lime, the amount of time depending upon the size of the kiln and upon the nature of the fuel. At the present time, mineral coal imported from the Union is employed, and requires much less time than the shrubs which are ordinarily used. See CHALKSTONE; CLAY.

ALFRED ELY DAY

LIMIT, lim'it (ἐχθη, 'bound'): Occurs once in Ezek 23:12 ("limb of holy mountain"). "Limit" (Ps 78:41) and "limith" (בּיָה, הַרִים) (He 4:7) are changed in RV to "provoked" (m "retains "limited") and "defineth" respectively.

LINE, lin (ץ', כֹּו, כָּה, הַבָּה): Usually of a measuring line, as Jer 31:39; Ezek 47:3; Zac 1:16 (קָו), Ps 78:55; Am 7:17; Zac 2:1 (קָהָל). Other Heb words mean simply a cord or thread (Josh 18:21; 1 K 7:15; Ezek 40:3). In Ps 19:4 (קָו), "Their line is gone out through all the earth;

LINEAGE, lin'ē-āj (πατρία, πατριάδ): Found only once in Lk 4:4 (AV, RV "family"), and signifying the line of paternal family descent. A word pregnant in meaning among the Jews, who kept all familial records carefully, as may be seen from the long genealogical records found everywhere in the OT.

LINEN, lin'ēn (ץ', בָדָק, "white linen"); used chiefly for priestly robes, ἀμβώματα, "byssus," a fine white Egyptian linen, called in the earlier writings ἀμβώμ, ἀμβώμα, ἀμπώμ, and ἁμβώμα, and sometimes, ἀμβώμος, ἀμπώμος (in II Esdr. 2:17), or ἀμπᾶς, ἀμπᾶς (in I Pet 5:1); linen, σινθέα, σινθέα: Thread or cloth made of flax.

Ancient Egypt was noted for its fine linen (Gen 41:42; Isa 19:9). From it a large export trade was carried on with surrounding nations, including the Egyptians, who had learned the art of spinning from the Egyptians (Ex 35:25) and continued to rely on them for the finest linen (Prov 7:16; Ezek 27:7). The culture of flax in Pal probably antedated the conquest, for in Josh 2:6 we read of the stalks of flax which Rahab had laid in order upon the roof. Among the Egyptians, as apparently among the Canaanites, the spinning and weaving of linen were carried on by the women (Prov 31:13-19), among whom skill in this work was considered highly praiseworthy (Ex 35:25). One family, the house of Ashbee, attained eminence as workers in linen (1 Ch 4:21; 2 Ch 2:14).

Linen was used, not only in the making of garments of the finer kinds and for priests, but also for shrouds, hangings, and possibly for the hangings (υἱοθετικά, προσερήμονα; Ex 26:6, 36; 1 Pet 5:1) of the tabernacle (Ex 25:1). Fine linen, white and pure, was ascribed to the same (1 Ch 29:4), and the same was given to the Levites (Ex 28:39; 39:26; 28:37; Ezek 44:17). Egypt, the land of "byssus," supplied the raw material (Deut 25:14; Ps 80:14; 106:31). Linen, both imported and domestic, was doubtless used in the temple (2 Ch 4:21; 31:10; Ezek 44:17). It seems to have been very popular among the Jews (Isa 55:10; Mal 1:16; 2:16).

his defence of orthodox doctrine against the Gnostics "appeals esp. to the bishops of Rome, as depositaries of the apostolic tradition." The list of Irenaeus commences with Linus, whom he identifies with the person of this name mentioned by St. Paul, and who, he affirms, has been entrusted with the office of the bishopric by the apostles. (1) With the many possibilities of error, no more can safely be assumed of Linus . . . than that he held some prominent position in the Rom church" (Lightfoot's "Dissertation on the Christian Ministry" in Comm. on Phil, 220 f).

"Considering the great rarity of this Gr mythological name as a proper name for persons, we can hardly doubt that here, as Irenaeus has directly asserted, the same Rom Christian is meant who, according to ancient tradition, became after Peter and Paul the first bishop of Rome. Among the mythical characters in Apos Const, vii, 46 occurs Linos ho Klaudios, who is declared to have been ordained by Paul as the first bishop of Rome. He is thus represented as the son or husband of Claudia whose name comes after his in 2 Tim 4 21.

"These meager statements have been enlarged upon by Eng. investigators. The Claudia mentioned here is, they hold, identical with the one who, according to Mart., married a certain Pudens (86-90 AD), and she, in turn, with the Claudia Rufina from Britain, who is then made out to be a daughter of the British king, Cogidumnus, or Titus Claudius Cogidubnus. For a refutation of these assumptions, which, even chronologically considered, are impossible, see Lightfoot, St. Clement. L. 76-79" (Zahn, Intro to the NT, 207).

its present range extends throughout Africa, and it is also found in Mesopotamia, Southern Persia, and the border of India. There is some reason to think that it may be found in Arabia, but its occurrence there remains to be proved. The Asiatic male lion does not usually have as large a mane as the African, but both belong to one species, Felis leo.

Lion (Felis leo).

Lions are mentioned in the Bible for their strength (Jgs 14 18), boldness (2 S 17 10), ferocity (Ps 7 2), and stealth (Ps 10 9; Lam 3 3)

3. Figur-10. Therefore in prophetic references to the millennium, the lion, with the bear, wolf, and leopard, is mentioned as living in peace with the ox, calf, kid, lamb and the child (Ps 8 13; 8 12; 8 11 6-8; 66 25). The roaring of the lion is often mentioned (Job 4 10; Ps 64 11; Is 31 4 [RV "growling"]; Jer 31 38; Ezek 22 25; Hos 11 10). Judah is a "lion's whelp" (Gen 49 9), likewise Dan (Dt 33 22). It is said of certain of David's warriors (1 Ch 12 8) that their "faces were like the faces of lions." David's enemy (Ps 17 12) "is like a lion that is greedy of his prey, and the king's wrath is as the roaring of a lion" (Prov 19 12). God in His wrath is "unto Ephraim as a lion, and as a young lion to the house of Judash (Hos 5 14). The devil, as a roaring lion, walketh about, seeking whom he may devour" (1 Pet 5 8). "Lion" occurs in the figurative language of Ezek, Dn, and Rev. The figures of lions were used in the decorations of Solomon's temple and throne (1 K 7 29; 7 30; 7 18).

Nearby all references to the lion are figurative. The only notices of the lion in narrative are of the lion slain by Samson (Jgs 14 5); by David (1 S 17 34 f); by Benaah (2 S 23 20; 1 Ch 11 22); the prophet slain by a lion (1 K 13 24); also I K 20 36); the lions sent by the Lord among the settlers in Samaria (2 K 17 25); Daniel in the lions' den (Dn 6 16). In all these cases the word used is 'ayrēh or 'ārē.

The Arab. language boasts hundreds of names for the lion. Many of these are, however, merely adj., used substantively. The commonest Arab. names are sab', 'asād, laith, and labāw, the last two of which are identified above with the Heb lāyish and lābi'. As in Arabic, so in Heb, the richness of the language in this particular gives opportunity for variety of expression, as in Job 4 10 11:

"The roaring of the lion (lāyish), and the voice of the fierce lion (šəḥāl)."

ALFRED ELY DAY

LIP (σᾶφθα) saphhāk, τῆς, saphhēth, σάφθα, lips, "language," "speech," "talk," also "rim," "border," "shorn," "bald," etc., [Lk. 19:9, σᾶφθα, "upper lip," "moustache," "beard"]; Χαλκ. chellos, "lip" [also once, "shore" in the quotation He 11:12 = Gen 22:17]: (1) Lips stand in oriental idiom for speech or language, like "mouth," "tongue"; therefore they stand in parallelism. The lip of truth shall be hewn; but lying tongue is hewn for a moment" (Prov 12:19). "To shoot out the lip" (Ps 22:7) means to make a mocking, contemptuous, scornful face. As the lips are the chief instrument of speech, we find numerous idiomatic phrases for "speech" such as: "The utterance of the lips" (Nu 30:6), "to proceed out of the lips" (Nu 30:12), "to open the lips" (Job 32:20), "to go out of the lips" (Ps 17:1). These expressions do not convey, as a rule, the idea that the utterance of the words proceeds out of the lips, and that it lacks sincerity and the concern of the heart, but occasionally this is intended, e.g. "This people draw nigh unto me, and with their mouth and with their lips do honor me, but have removed their heart far from me" (Lev 26:16). The "fruit of the lips" (Isa 57:19 = He 13:15) and "calves of the lips" (Hos 14:2 AV) designate the praise and thanksgiving due to God. "Fervent" [AV] or "exulting" [LXX] (Prov 25:20) are synonymous with eloquence. "To refrain the lips" (Ps 40:9; Prov 10:19) means to keep silence, where the godless or unwise would wish to assert his rights.

Numerous other expressions need no further explanation, such as "presseverence" (Ex 6:12:30), "tongue opened" (Acts 1:21), "lips crying" (Ps 10:18; Prov 17:1), "lying lips" (Ps 31:16; Prov 10:18; 12:22), "wicked for false lips" (Prov 17:4), "unclean lips" (Isa 6:5), "strange" [AV] "stammering" [LXX] "lips" (Isa 28:11), "stumbling" [LXX] "lips" (Ps 12:23; Prov 7:21), "righteous" [LXX] "lips" (Acts 10:16). (2) The Heb word saphām is found only in the phrase "to cover the lip or lips," which is an expression of mourning, submission and shame. The Oriental covers his lips with his hand or a portion of his hand if he has been sunk into grief and sorrow. He expresses, thereby, that he cannot open his mouth at the visitation of God. Differently, however, from common mourners, Ezekiel was forbidden of God "to cover his lips" (Ezk 24:17; see also ver. 22), i.e. to mourn in the usual way over Israel’s downfall, as Israel had brought these judgments upon himself. The leper, victim of an incurable disease, walks about with rent clothes and hair disheveled, covering his lips, crying: "Unclean!" [Lev 13:45]. The thought here is that even the breath of such a one may defile. The prophet calls upon all seers and diviners, to whom God has refused the knowledge of the future, to cover their lips in shame and confusion (Mic 3:7).

LIQUOR, lik’er: Every sort of intoxicating liquor except the beverage prepared from the juice of the grape (gaiyn), according to the usage of the OT, is comprehended under the generic term γαϊν, shēkār, (cf shakhar, to ‘be drunk’), rendered "strong drink" (cf Gr. stēkos in Lk 1:15). The two terms, gaiyn and shēkār, "wine" and "strong drink," are often found together and are used by OT writers as an exhaustive classification of the beverages in use among the ancient Hebrews (Lev 10:9; 1 S 1:15; Prov 20:1, etc.). See Wine; Drink, Strong.

LIST: A variant of "lust" (see Lust), meaning "to wish," found in AV of Mt 17:12 [MK 9:13], Jn 3:8, as tr of θέλω, thēlō, and in Jas 3:14 as tr of φιλαμια, filamia. The last case ERV has rendered "will," and ARV has made the same change throughout. The word is obsolete in modern Eng., but Jn 3:8 is still used proverbially, "the wind bloweth where it listeth.

LITERATURE

The Sub-apostolic Age is usually held to extend from the death of St. John, the last surviving apostle, about 100 AD, to the death of Polycarp, St. John’s aged disciple (155–165 AD). The Christian literature of this period, although as a whole of only moderate intrinsic value, is of historical interest and importance. This is owing to the light which it throws back on apostolic times, and the testimony borne to Christian life, thought, worship, work and organization during an age when the church was under the guidance, mainly, of men who had been associated with the apostles and who might be supposed, therefore, to know their mind. Some writings are omitted from this review, having been dealt with in previous articles. For the Protevangelium of James and the Gospel and Apocalypse of Peter see APOCRYPHAL Gospels; APOCRYPHAL ACTS For an account of extant fragments of Basiliades and Valentinus see Gnostic Literature. For pseudo-Clementine writings see Peter, Clement, SIMON MAGUS.
1. Epistle of Clement to the Corinthians.—Only the larger part had previously been extant, when the complete ep. was discovered in 1875 by Bryennios, bishop of Nicomedia. The high honor in which it was held by early Christians is attested (1) by its position in Codex A, between the Catholic and Pauline Epistles; (2) by its being publicly read in many churches down to the 4th cent. (HE, III, 15). The work is anonymous, but referred in the name of the Rom. church. Dionysius of Corinth (170 AD) refers to it as written by the author of (dict) Clement (HE, IV, 23); Clement of Alexandria states distinctly the Clementine authorship (Strom., iv,17). The writer is evidently the leading office-bearer of his church, and is identified with the Clement whom Eusebius designates as third “bishop” (or chief presbyter) of Rome after St. Peter, and as holding office between 92 and 101 AD (HE, III, 34). Clement is further identified by Origen (Comm. on St. John) and in HE, III, 15 with the Clement of Phil 4; but the name is too common and the interval too long to render this identity more than possible. Some conjecture the weight of his name to be that of Flavius Clemens, who is Domitian’s (his cousin) put to death in 95 AD for alleged “atheism,” i.e. probably, profession of Christianity (see Harnack, Gesch. Lit., I, 253, note 1). But Clement the “bishop” is never otherwise referred to as a martyr, and a member of the imperial family would hardly have been the head of a Rom. church without some fact being noted by some contemporary or later writer. Lightfoot, with some probability, supposes (Apostolic Fathers, I, 61) that Clement was a “freedman or the son of a freedman, belonging to the household of Flavius Clemens.” From St. Paul’s time (Phil 4:22) the imperial household included Christians; and many slaves were men of culture. To such a Christian freedman’s influence the consul’s conversion may have been due. Internal evidence points to Clement having been a Hellenist Jew or proselyte of Judaism; for he writes with some classical culture and with knowledge of OT history and of the LXX; his style, moreover, has a “strong Hebraistic tinge” (Lightfoot, p. 59). The date of the ep. is fixed approximately by a reference to a persecution at Rome in progress or very recent; this persecution (during Clement’s “episcopate”) was doubtless that by Domitian in 95 AD. Clement’s Ep. is thus not strictly apostolic but apocalyptic, and it is uniformly included in sub-apostolic literature. The occurrence was a church feud at Corinth, and the expulsion of some faithful presbyters. The writer seeks to procure their restoration and as a pattern the peace and harmony of Nature. In this connection occurs an anticipation of geographical discovery, when the author writes (ch xxv) of the “impossible ocean and the worlds beyond it” (of Seneca, Medea ii,375; Strabo i,4; Plut. Mor., ix,41). St. Paul’s warnings in 1 Cor about party spirit are recalled; a not unworthy echo of 1 Cor 13 is embodied; and the erring community is solemnly admonished. In the course of the letter, with obvious reference to 1 Cor, the resurrection, for which he argues from the OT and from natural analogies. He refers to the phoenix which lives 500 years, and, when dissolution approaches, builds a nest of spices into which it enters to die. As the flesh decays, however, a “worm” is surprised which is nurtured from the dead bird’s moisture and puttheth forth wings.” The fable is mentioned by Herodotus and Pliny.

A lengthy prayer of intercession for “all sorts and conditions of men” is abruptly introduced near the end, in order, presumably, to imbue Corinthian Christians with that charity which they needed and which is the chief incentive to intercession. The twofold Christian and apostolic hope of restored concord and peace.

Apologetic testimony is found to (1) books of the NT, viz. to the Pauline authorship of 1 Cor; to St. Mark’s Gospel, through which the work is apologetically testifying of St. Mark’s variations from the LXX.; to Acts, through which he similarly quotes (ch xvii) 1 S 13:14; to Rom, Eph, 1 Tim, Tit, Jas, 1 Pet (chs xxxv, xiv, xx, ii, xvi, xlix, respectively). The rr is between Clement and Hes are so numerous that the latter work has from early times been ascribed to him by some (HE, VI, 25). But the general type both of thought and of diction is dissimilar; (2) against the Tübingen theory of essential divergence between the doctrine of St. Peter and of St. Paul. The chief presbyter of Rome could not have been ignorant of such divergence; yet he refers the partisanship of which the two apostles were victims entirely to the Corinthians, not all to the apostles (ch xlix).

Doctrinal testimony is found: (1) to the Trinity, “As God liveth and the Lord Jesus Christ liveth, and the Holy Spirit” (ch lvi); (2) to 4. Doctrinal the personality of Christ, “The Lord Testimony Jesus Christ, to whom be the glory and the majesty forever. The union and communion with Christ we have life, are sanctified, possess love, manifest godliness (ch i, xxxvi); (3) to the atonement: Clement ascribes to Christ’s death not merely subjective moral influence, but objective vicarious efficacy in securing reconciliation, without any attempt, however, to explain the mystery. Christ hath “given his flesh for our flesh, his life for our lives” (ch xlix); (4) to justification which is distinctly enunciated as before God through faith (ch xxii). But this faith (as in St. Paul’s writings) is a “faith which worketh” (ch xxxv), and such justification is consistent with our being justified by works before men; (5) to the inspiration of Scripture, which is real (“the Holy Spirit saith”), but not always in our hearts. Apocryphal books are quoted, but not with a formula indicating Divine authority.

(1) The basis of authority is not sacerdotal, but a combination of official succession and popular appreciation is appreciated by the apostles or afterward by men of office. The epistles and with consent of the whole Church, there is no distinct separation between presbyter and bishop. Office-bearers designated as presbyters (chs xlii, liv) are referred to (chs xlii, xliv) as filling the office of bishop. Addressing a church on congregational strife and insubordination, he refers to no single bishop in authority over the church. Had the episcopate, in the post-NT sense of mono-episcopate, been apostolically enjoined, surely the injunction would have been obeyed or enforced in Corinth. (3) None the less we discern in Clement’s own position and action the anticipation of the later episcopate. Clement is an example of how, through the personal qualities and ecclesiastical services of the man, the presbytery developed out of seniority into superiority, out of representativeness into official authority.

(4) The early germ of the papacy is disclosed in the passage: “If certain persons should be disobedient unto the words spoken by God through us, let them understand that they will excommuni themselves in no slight transgression and peril” (ch lix).
Such assumption by a revered man like Clement might give no offense, and the Corinthians plainly needed correction. Still we have here the first stage in the process which ultimately led to the formation and establishment of an spiritual supremacy. The assumption, however, is not grounded on Clement’s own official position (as he speaks always in the person of), but on the superior dignity of the Rom church. The later theory of supremacy built up by the Bishops of St. Peter and his successors; but here the authority of the leading presbyter, in dealing with a provincial church, rests on the power invested in the ecclesia in which he presides.

(1) The long prayer (chs lix-lix) bears internal evidence of liturgical character, through its balanced and rhythmical style, its somewhat restrained and mute relevance to the special object of the ep., and greater suitability for congregational worship than as part of a counsel to a sister church. This internal testimony is confirmed by the correspondence of the prayer in certain verbal details with the earliest extant liturgies, particularly those of St. Mark and St. James, pointing to the early unity of the Rom church. A prayer afterward incorporated into these liturgies. While there is evidence that down at least to the time (148 AD) of Justin’s Ist Apology (ch lxvii) a minister offered up prayers of his own composition, this prayer seems to be that before the close of the Apostolic Age, forms of supplication had begun to be introduced, not to the exclusion of “free prayer,” but simply as a mode of congregational devotion countenanced by a venerated leader of the church at Rome. (2) In ch lviii Clement writes about “compassionate remembrance of them [i.e. the erring brethren] before God and the saints.” By the saints, however, are most probably meant, not the beatified dead, but the living Christian brotherhood, as in 1 Cor 4:2; 2 Cor 8:4. This ep. leaves on readers’ minds two different yet mutually compatible impressions—impressions both apparently made on the early church, by which the latter was widely read at public worship. NT’s mode and excluded form of worship, that of the Canon of Scriptures. We realize, on the one hand, the inferiority of this writing to that of apostles. Clement’s mind is receptive, not creative; and the freshness of thought characteristic of NT writers is absent. What NT book, moreover, contains such a foetid legend as that of the phoenix? On the other hand, this ep. breathes much of the spirit, as it adopts in its measure the phraseology and style of apostolic writings. It is as it were the sum of special inspiration had sunk below the horizon, there remained to the church for a while a spiritual afterglow.

II. The “Didache” or Teaching (longer title, “The Teaching of the Lord, by [did] the XII Apostles, to the Gentiles”).—This work is quoted as “Scripture,” without being named, by Clement of Alexandria (c 170 AD, in Strom., 1.20). It is mentioned in H.E. III, 25 as the “Teachings so-called of the Apostles,” “recognized by most ecclesiastical writers,” although “not a genuine” composition of apostles. Athenasius (Fest. Ep., 39) denies its canonicity, but acknowledges its utility. The latest ancient reference to the work from personal knowledge is by Nicephorus (9th cent.) who includes it among apocryphal writings. Thereafter it disappears until its recent recovery in 1875 by Bryennios.

There is no reliable external testimony to date. Resemblances too considerable to be accidental exist between the Didache and the Ep. of Barnabas, but one is fixed as to priority of composition. Lightfoot and others favor a common lost source. As to internal evidence the simplicity of the Euchist and of baptism as here described, with no formal admission to the catechumenean (ch vii), but the omission of the Fifth Commandment was included in the First Table. (Devolotional: worship and rites (chs vii–z, xii).—The Lord’s Prayer is to be used three times a day. “Heaven” and “earth” are found instead of “heaven” and “earth” (Matt vi:6, 10). The “kingdom” omitted—it’s earliest recorded use in this connection. Christians are to fast on Wednesday and Friday, the days of betrayal and crucifixion. Fasting is enjoined for a day or two before baptism, both on baptizer and on baptized; it is recommended to "others who can." There is no mention of oil, salt, or exorcism. The baptismal formula, "In the name of the Father, the Son, and the Holy Ghost," is commanded, confirming the historical truth of the Mitchell of Mt 28:19. Triple immersion in "living water" is assumed to be normal; but where this is impracticable, other water and affusion are permitted (see Trine Immersion). The Lord's Supper is dealt with only on its eucharistic aspects, and is an object not being to nourish the nature of the rite, but to give models of thanksgiving.

The phrase, "after being filled give thanks," suggests that the Agape was still associated with the sacrament: the disassociation had begun when Pliny wrote to Trajan in 112 AD. A liturgical element in sacramental worship is indicated by the presence for the cup, the broken bread, and spiritual mercies. "Give thanks thus." The thanksgiving for the cup is as follows: "We give thanks to thee our Father, for the holy wine of David, thy servant, which thou hast made known to us through Jesus Christ." But nothing suggests that the entire service is liturgical, and the forms supplied are not rigidly imposed; for prophets are to officiate in such forms as they choose. On the Last Day congregational worship and eucharistic bread-breaking, after confession to God and reconciliation with men, are distinctly enjoined.

(3) Ecclesiastical (chs xi-xii, xv).—Of church office-bearers, two classes are mentioned, ordinary and extraordinary. Of the former (essential to congregational organization) only bishops and deacons are mentioned, i.e. those invested with rule and oversight, with their assistants. Presbyter and bishop appear to be still identical, as the former is not specified (cf Phil 1 1). Popular election of these functionaries is indicated: "Elect for yourselves," with the denial, however, of those already in office having a share in the settlement. In the second class, apostles, prophets and teachers are included. "Apostle" is used, not in the narrower sense of men called to the office personally by Christ, but in the wider sense which embraces all whose call to be his ambassadors has been signalized by Divine gifts—specially accredited evangelists unconnected with any particular community. (Among Jewish Christians the designation survived to the 4th cent., for the Theodosian Code of the 5th and 6th cent. illustrates vectors and to those "quos ipsi apostolos vocant."). These apostles were to be received "as the Lord," and hospitably entertained; but, unlike apostles in the special sense, they were not to remain anywhere long; their function was to scatter the seed widely, and any expression of desire to remain longer was to be discouraged, while a demand for salary from a particular community would be evidence of false apostleship. The special function of prophets and teachers, on the other hand, was the instruction and comfort of church members. They accordingly might be encouraged to settle in a community and receive "first-fruits" for their support. These prophets and teachers, however, were not to supercede the bishops or presbyters in ruling, but were to undertake only those functions for which they were specially qualified. On the other hand, bishops and deacons were not to be excluded from preaching and teaching by the settlement of prophets and official teachers in particular communities; and in the Did., may be traced the transition, then being gradually accomplished, of the preaching and teaching functions from extraordinary to ordinary office-bearers. "They also [the bishops and deacons] ministry you to the ministry of prophets and teachers: therefore despise them not." Even before the close of St. Paul's ministry, the episkopos, whose essential function, was rule and oversight, was expected, if not required, also to be didaskalos, "qualified to teach," i.e. along with teachers specially set apart for the purpose (1 Tim 3 2; 5 17). By the middle of the 2nd cent., the prophets had disappeared, and their preaching function had been vested in the office of bishop or presbyter, assisted by the deacons.

(4) Eschatological (ch xvi).—This concluding section consists chiefly of exhortations to watchfulness in view of the Second Advent. The premonitory signs of that Coming are given, with reminiscences from Christ's eschatological discourses, viz. the appearance of false prophets, decline of love, persecution, lawlessness, and the appearance of Antichrist, who is designated the World-deceiver. Without definitely stating chiliasm doctrine, the writer suggests it: for in referring to the immediate signals of Christ's advent (opening in his "immediate truth", i.e. resurrection of dead) he is careful to add "Not of all the dead; but the Lord shall come, and all the saints with Him"—implying that the general resurrection would take place at an after-stage, presumably, as Millennialists did, after the 1,000 years had expired. Without dogmatic authority, and with only moderate spiritual value, the Did. is important historically as a witness to the church's beliefs, usages and condition during the transition between the Apostolic and the Post-apostolic Age. During this transition period, we see much of the freedom of primitive Christianity mingled with rudiments of ecclesiastical regulations and formalities; and while we cannot assume that every belief and usage recorded in it can be properly ascribed to apostolic times, and regard them as not opposed by those apostles within whose view they must have come.

III. Epistles of Ignatius.—Ignatius was bishop of Antioch early in the 2d cent. Origen (Hom. vi on Lk) refers to him as 'second after St. Peter'; Eusebius came between 100 and 130; Thrasybios between 2d cent. and 3d cent. (HE, III, 22). As he calls himself Episcopus Antiochiae, "highest priest," 101 he was probably converted in mature life: the legend of his being the "child" of Mt 18 3 rests on misinterpretation of his designation Theophorus. Traditions current in the 4th cent. represent him as a disciple of John the Baptist (Acts 19 12), and ordained by St. Paul (Apost. Coni. v, 7, 8).

The Martyrdom of Ignatius (6th cent.) dates his trial at Antioch in the 9th year of Trajan's reign (107-8 AD) and represents it as conducted before the emperor. Only a short visit, however, of Trajan is alluded to (Martyr. 111-15); neither any Ignatian letter nor Eusebius, nor the other early or two datable. Their function was to scatter the seed widely, and any expression of desire to remain longer was to be discouraged, while a demand for salary from a particular community would be evidence of false apostleship. The special function of teachers and other, was the instruction and comfort of church members. They accordingly might be encouraged to settle in a community and receive "first-fruits" for their support. These prophets and teachers, however, were not to supercede the bishops or presbyters in ruling, but were to undertake only those functions for which they were specially qualified. On the other hand, bishops and deacons were not to be excluded from preaching and teaching by the settlement of prophets and official teachers in particular communities; and in the Did. may be traced the transition, then being gradually accomplished, of the preaching and teaching functions from extraordinary to ordinary office-bearers. "They also [the bishops and deacons] minister you to the ministry of prophets and teachers: therefore despise them not." Even before the close of St. Paul's ministry, the episkopos, whose essential function, was rule and oversight, was expected, if not required, also to be didaskalos, "qualified to teach," i.e. along with teachers specially set apart for the purpose (1 Tim 3 2; 5 17). By the middle of the 2nd cent., the prophets had disappeared, and their preaching function had been vested in the office of bishop or presbyter, assisted by the deacons.

(4) Eschatological (ch xvi).—This concluding section consists chiefly of exhortations to watchfulness in view of the Second Advent. The premonitory signs of that Coming are given, with reminiscences from Christ's eschatological discourses, viz. the appearance of false prophets, decline of love, persecution, lawlessness, and the appearance of Antichrist, who is designated the World-deceiver. Without definitely stating chiliasm doctrine, the writer suggests it; for in referring to the immediate signals of Christ's advent (opening in his "immediate truth", i.e. resurrection of dead) he is careful to add "Not of all the dead; but the Lord shall come, and all the saints with Him"—implying that the general resurrection would take place at an after-stage, presumably, as Millennialists did, after the 1,000 years had expired. Without dogmatic authority, and with only moderate spiritual value, the Did. is important historically as a witness to the church's beliefs, usages and condition during the transition between the Apostolic and the Post-apostolic Age. During this transition period, we see much of the freedom of primitive Christianity mingled with rudiments of ecclesiastical regulations and formalities; and while we cannot assume that every belief and usage recorded in it can be properly ascribed to apostolic times, and regard them as not opposed by those apostles within whose view they must have come.

III. Epistles of Ignatius.—Ignatius was bishop of Antioch early in the 2d cent. Origen (Hom. vi on Lk) refers to him as 'second after St. Peter'; Eusebius came between 100 and 130; Thrasybios between 2d cent. and 3d cent. (HE, III, 22). As he calls himself Episcopus Antiochiae, "highest priest," 101 he was probably converted in mature life: the legend of his being the "child" of Mt 18 3 rests on misinterpretation of his designation Theophorus. Traditions current in the 4th cent. represent him as a disciple of John the Baptist (Acts 19 12), and ordained by St. Paul (Apost. Coni. v, 7, 8).

The Martyrdom of Ignatius (6th cent.) dates his trial at Antioch in the 9th year of Trajan's reign (107-8 AD) and represents it as conducted before the emperor. Only a short visit, however, of Trajan is alluded to (Martyr. 111-15); neither any Ignatian letter nor Eusebius, nor the other early or two datable. Their function was to scatter the seed widely, and any expression of desire to remain longer was to be discouraged, while a demand for salary from a particular community would be evidence of false apostleship. The special function of teachers and other, was the instruction and comfort of church members. They accordingly might be encouraged to settle in a community and receive "first-fruits" for their support. These prophets and teachers, however, were not to supercede the bishops or presbyters in ruling, but were to undertake only those functions for which they were specially qualified. On the other hand, bishops and deacons were not to be excluded from preaching and teaching by the settlement of prophets and official teachers in particular communities; and in the Did. may be traced the transition, then being gradually accomplished, of the preaching and teaching functions from extraordinary to ordinary office-bearers. "They also [the bishops and deacons] minister you to the ministry of prophets and teachers: therefore despise them not." Even before the close of St. Paul's ministry, the episkopos, whose essential function, was rule and oversight, was expected, if not required, also to be didaskalos, "qualified to teach," i.e. along with teachers specially Further external evidence is supplied by Irenaeus (v. 577), who says from the Rom., iv, as that of a martyr, and who uses 8 notable phrases borrowed apparently from him. The external testimony (only he got rid of by an arbitrary assumption of Polycarp's Ep. being wholly or partly spurious) is supported by strong internal evidences:

1. Frequent grammatical dislocation, natural in letters written on a hurried basis, but unaccountable on the supposition of a late forgery (Rom., iv, ii; Eph., i).

2. Geographical particulars: e.g. Ignatius goes by land from Tralles to Ephesus (Rom., viii, 2), a journey which the party of Trajan causing extensive orders for human victims from all parts.

3. Historical illustrations: e.g. conveyance of prisoners from Rome to Rome harmonizes with the account by Dion Cassius (xxvii, 15) of the magnitude of the orders for human victims from all parts.

4. Theological evidence: e.g. those opp. to Judeo-Metaphysical a belief in a type of doctrine denying any real incarnation—a combination which ceased after Ignatius' time.

5. Ecclesiastical usage: thus, the Agape still includes the Eucharist (Smyr., viii), whereas soon after Ignatius' death these were separated (Pliny, Ep. 96; Justin, 1 Ap., 65, 67).

6. Personal references:—The writer shows an excess and affection of self-deprecation—"last of Antiochene Christians (Trall., iii)" not worthy to be counted among the brothood (Rom., ix) such as a later forger would hardly have introduced.

(1) Joy and glory of martyrdom.—Heroic courage and loyalty to Christ are united with fanatical craving after a martyr's death: "I warn you, therefore, that you die for Christ rather than for Ideas over the whole earth" (Rom., vi).

(2) Evil and peril of heresy and schism.—Astonished from heresy; ""These heretics mix up Jesus Christ with their own poison" (Trall., vii). Vile those evil beasts, which produce death-bearing fruit" (Trall., xi); "Avoid all divisions as the beginning of evil"; "Nothing is better than unity" (1 Ap., vii, 13).

(3) Submission to office-bearers, esp. to the bishop.—"Do nothing without your bishop, and be subject to the presbyters" (Mag., vii).

(4) On your guard against heresy: and this will be, if ye continue in the words which I taught you with the bishop and deacons" (Trall., iii).

(5) He who does anything without the bishop's knowledge suffers the devil" (Smyr., ix). The bishop here is higher than "primus inter pares"; he is a new and separate office-bearer. Yet, without going beyond these epistles, we discern that such an episcopate was not an express apostolic institution.

For had Ignatius been able to magnify the office as apostolically enjoined, so zealous a champion of episcopal authority would have added such injunction as the most cogent reason for submission. His seal for the episcopate apparently sprang only from its high ecclesiastical prerogatives as the most effective agency for maintaining the church's unity against heresy and schism.

1. The Gospel of Jn. is never quoted, but numerous phrases suggest that it was in the writer's hands. He speaks of Christ, "proceeding from the Father," "doing nothing without the Father," "in the Father," "the piecing Him who sent Him." Christ is the "Door of all water," Satan is the "Prince of this world," the "Holy Spirit knoweth what He cometh and whither He goeth." The writer repeatedly assumes Christologically Jesus' true Divinity: "Our God" (Ep., xvii; Trall., vii). The Trinitarian dogma is assimilated in modified form as the presupposed from 1 Jn, which is a kind of appendix to the Gospel (Lightfoot), 1 Jn 4:3).

2. At a time when Ignatius had been emphasizing the Father, and the Spirit." With strong support of episcopal authority no such practice of redeeming Christ's person occurs only once. "The priests are good: but Christ, the High Priest, is better than they." In addition, the imperfect Levitical priesthood is contrasted with the perfect high-priesthood of Christ.

3. Eclesiastical usage.—Ignatius contains one of the latest references to the Agape as still continued with the Eucharist. The letter to Polycarp (ch, iv) contains the insertion of some of the practice of redeeming Christ's person for slaves at the cost of the congregation. Slaves are not to "long to be freed, which is a former occupation, while not required as a duty, was often conferred as a privilege.

4. General characteristics.—Ignatius presents a striking contrast, as a writer, to Clement. Clement is pedagogic, cultured, but muddled; his purpose is place and deficient in originality; his best passages are echoes of Scripture. The diction and style of Ignatius are impassioned, rugged, turgid, but pithy, fresh and individualistic.

IV. Epistle of Polycarp.—Polycarp was born not later, perhaps considerably earlier, than 70 AD; for at his martyrdom, of which the 1. Date and acceptance date is 155 or 156 Genuine—(Lightfoot, Apostolic Fathers, ii, i, 629), he declared, when invited to abjure his faith, that he had "served Christ for 86 years" (Mart. Pol., ix). He was a disciple of St. John, who ordained him as bishop or leading presbyter of Smyrna before 100 AD (Iren., iii, 3, 4). Of several letters by Polycarp, only this ep. remains: it professes (ch, xii) to have been written soon after the martyrdom of Ignatius. The genuineness of the letter is attested by the Polycarp's own disciple (I.c.), whose evidence cannot be set aside on the ground of its testimony to the Ignatian letters without an obvious begging of the question. The supposition that the Ignatian letters and Polycarp's Ep. are parts of one continuous work is otherwise negatived by the very marked difference of style and standpoint between those writings (Lightfoot, i, 577). The ep. replies to a letter from the Philippine church inviting his counsel, and asking for ep. of the recently martyred Ignatius. He 2. Occasion acknowledges their kind ministry to and congratulates them that martyr and to others, "entwined with saintly fetters," who had "set a pattern of all patience." He sends what he has of the letters of Ignatius and asks in return for any information which they might possess. He commends to their careful study St. Paul's ep. to themselves, acknowledging his inability to attain to the apostle's wisdom. With profound reverence he interprets his letters, and giving to his letter the semblance of an apostolic echo, he exhorts his readers to righteousness and godliness, charity and mercy, and warns them against covetousness, evil-speaking and revenge. He dwells on the mutual relations and obligations of presbyters and deacons, on the one hand, and of the congregation on the other. He repeats St. John's admonition against teachers who denied the reality of the incarnation. Every spirit that confesseth not, etc. (1 Jn 4:3). He grieves over the lapse of a Philppine presbyter, Valens, who, along with his wife had flagrantly sinned; but he bids his readers not count such as enemies, but seek to recall them from their wanderings.

1. Polycarp mentions only one book of the NT, viz. Phil. but within the brief compass of 200 lines he quotes verses or reproduces phrases from 12 NT Epp., including three whose early date has been doubted (2 Tim and Eph. 1 and 2 Tim and Eph.). The absence of any quotation from the Gospel of Jn is notable, considering his relation to the apostle; but the shortness of the letter prevents any conclusion being drawn against the authenticity of that epistle, and his not quoting from 1 Jn, which is a kind of appendix to the Gospel (Lightfoot).
the paramount duty of submission to the bishop. Polycarp (dying subjecting to presbyters) does not mention a bishop. These two inferences are irresound. (2) there was then no episkopos in the post-NT, sense, as Philip (3) Polycarp did not consider the defect (7) sufficiently important to ask the Philippians to supply it. He instituted the mono-episcopate, as the one proper form of church government, surely his disciple Polycarp would have embraced the opportunity, when the Philippians was invited, to inform them of the apostolic ordinance, and to join its adoption.

V. Papias Fragments.—Papias is called by his younger contemporary Irenaeus (v.33) a "disciple of John and friend of Polycarp," as of Hierapolis in Phrygia. The Chronicon Paschale (7th cent.), but embodying materials from other documents) states that he was martyred about the same time as Polycarp (155-56). His work, Exposition of Our Lord's Sayings, was extant in the 12th cent., but only fragments quoted by Irenaeus, Eusebius, etc., remain. These bear the twofold description of Papias by Eusebius, as a "man of little judgment" yet "most learned and well acquainted with the Scriptures.

(HE III, 33, 36). (But the words of praise in ver 36 may be a gloss.) Papias states that he subjoins to his expositions "whatever I learned carefully from the elders and treasured up in my memory . . . . I will not put those questions regarding the words of the elders [i.e. presumably men of an earlier generation], what Andrew or Peter said, or what Philip or Thomas, or James, or what John or Matthew, or any other of the Lord's disciples said, as well as reports, his own, and the presbyter John, the disciple of the Lord, have to say:"

It is disputed whether Papias here refers to two Johns, the apostle and another disciple of the same name; or to John the apostle in two different relations, i.e. first as one about whom Papias heard oral traditions; and second, as one with whom, also, he held personal communication. In favor of the first view is: (1) Eusebius' own opinion (i.e.); (2) the alleged unlikelihood of the same John being twice mentioned in one sentence; (3) a statement by Eusebius (HF III, 39) that in his day two monuments (monument) of "John" existed at Ephesus. For the latter view is: (1) no other writer until Eusebius hints the existence of a presbyter John distinct from the apostle; (2) the change in the quotation from "said" to "say" may result from a confusion between John being twice mentioned; some things stated by John, according to Papias through "elders," others having been told him by the apostle himself. The fact that John is called presbyter, instead of apostle, is no contradiction since John so designates himself in 2 and 3 Jn.; and Jerome denies that the two men are the same. Hence, Papias, and Nicol, Four Gospels, 157 ff, who come to divergent conclusions.

2. Testi-
momony to St. Matthew and St. Mark

(1) According to Eusebius, Papias relates the story of "a woman accused before Our Lord— the story, presumably, which eventually crept into Jn 8; so that to him, in part, is due the preservation of a narrative, which, whether reported by Papias or not, helps to elucidate the union in Our Lord's holy and merciful charity.

(2) Papias is quoted by the Chronicle of Georgios Hamartolios (in MS of the 9th cent.): "It is said that St. John was put to death by the Jews," and a similar quotation is made by Philip of Side (Epitome MS of the 7th cent.): "it is said that the hearing of the apostle's residence after John, the Apostle. (3) Irenaeus (III 32) quotes Papias as writing about Polycarp's resurrection millenium, and as reporting, on St. John's authority, how the Lord said, "The days will come when no tree shall bring its 10,000 branches, nor each branch 10,000 twigs, and on each twig 10,000 shoots, etc."

This may be an exaggerated record containing some paraphrastic utterance of Christ, indicating prophetically the wonderful extension of the church.

VI. Epistle of Barnabas.—This book is first expressly quoted by Clement of Alexandria (c 190 AD) as the composition of Barnabas, companion of St. Paul (Strom., i.6). Origen concurs, and calls it a "Catholic ep." (Con. Celsum, i.63), thus suggesting canonical position; Eusebius (HE III, 24.1), in his Life of Barnabas, assigns a composition of it to Barnabas, although he himself regards it as "spurious." Cod. Sin places it immediately after the NT, as being read in churches, and thus suggests its composition by or for the apostles. Against this external testimony, however, to authorship by the Barnabas of Acts, is strong internal evidence: (1) apostolic sinfulness prior to discipleship is spoken of in exaggerated forms hardly credible in a writer who knew the Twelve—"exceedingly lawless beyond all [ordi-cinary] sin." (2) an echo apparently of St. Paul's "sinners of whom I am chief!" (2) ignorance of Jewish rites incomprehensible in a Levite who had lived in Jerus, e.g. the priests are said to eat goat's flesh on the great Day of Atonement; (3) extreme anti-Judaism (see below), inconsistent with the representation of Barnabas in Acts and Gal.

The writer may have been some other Barnabas, a converted Alexandrine Jew, or, more probably, a converted gentile proselyte. He was a part of the Jewish school, but ignorant of Jewish rites as practised at Jerus, and possessing little real sympathy with Judaism.

The epistle was dated after 70 AD. All the destruction of Jerus is referred to (ch xvi); also after the publication of the Gospel of Jn, of which there are several reminiscences. But the absence of any reference to the rebuilding of Jerus under Hadrian, in 120 AD, in a passage (ch xx) where such a reference might have been expected, suggests a date prior to that year. We may place the writing between 90 and 120 AD.

The object is to deter both Jewish and gentile Christians from Judaistic lapse by a bold application of the allegorizing method to the OT.

3. Object far beyond what Philo would have and sanctioned. Jewish sacrifices, festivals, Sabbath enactments, temple-worship, are held to be distinctions of unclean food, are not only not of perpetual obligation, but never were binding at all, even on Jews. Belief in their obliteroriness rests on a slavishly liberal exegesis of the OT, which, properly interpreted, is not a preparation for a new dispensation, but is a renewing of the old.

Cleremones are simply allegorical enforcements of spiritual worship; distinctions of clean and unclean are merely pictorial representations of the necessity of separation from vice and vicious men; interdict of swine's flesh means no more than "associate not with swinish men." The only circumcision really commanded by God is circumcision of the heart. Barnabas ignores what St. Paul realized, that Jewish laws and rites, even lit., interpreted, are a divine discipline of wholesome self-restraint, neighborly consideration and obedience to God. Similarly, Papias's allegorizations are foreign to an understanding that finds in trivial OT statements Christian fact and truth. Thus, in Abraham's circumcision of the 318 men of his house, the 10 and 8 are significantly denoted by timber, a gemeral, and the initial letters of Jeusus (Jesu); while the 300 represent the 300 points to the cross. The writer self-complacently intimates that "no one has been admitted by me to a more genuine piece of knowledge than this!" (ch 15).

When Barnabas, however, leaves obscure allegory for plain exhortation, he writes effectively of the "two ways" of light and darkness. Among edifying admonitions the following are outstanding: "Thou shalt not go to prayer with an evil conscience;" "Thou shalt not let the word of God issue from lips stained with impurity;" "Herod's palace was a garret; stretch forth thine hands to take, while thou contractest them to give;" "Thou shalt not issue orders with bitterness to thy servant, lest thou fail in reverence to God who is above you both”; “Thou shalt not make a False, but shalt bring together them who contend”; “The way of darkness is crooked”; “In this way are [among others mentioned] those who labor not to aid them with help, with work, with soil” (chs xix, xx).

4. Notabilia

(1) The Divinity of Christ is emphasized: “Lord of all the world”; “Joint Creator, with the Father, of mankind” (ch v).

(2) The writer, while following the Alexandrian method of allegorical interpretation, is free from the Alexandrian doctrine of the essential evil of matter; the necessity of a real incarnation is affirmed (ch v).

(3) In ch xi, he writes: “We go down into the water for bread and fish, and come up after eating fruit in our heart, having the fear of God and trust in Jesus in our spirit.” This has been interpreted as involving the doctrine of baptismal regeneration; but the reference may be rather to the regeneration which baptism signifies as union with Christ.

(4) The Lord’s Day is a memorial of Our Lord’s resurrection. This observance is distinguished from Jewish Sabbath-keeping which is called an error; the Sabbath really intended to be kept being a period of 11 years in which 11 commandments are finished (ch xv).

(5) Testimony to NT Books, (a) the existence and canonical authority of the Gospel of Matthew is intimated by the quotation of Mt 20:34-42.

“Many are called, but few chosen,” introduced by the formulation of a Gospel passage, and together testify to the writer having the Gospel of John in his hands: “Whose eatheth of these shall live for ever” (ch vi i. 38).

(6) In Jn 8:58; “the new law of Our Lord and helper” and Jn 13:24; “a reference to the brazen serpent as a type of Christ’s suffering, glory and healing power” (ch xi 14: 9).

(7) The writer, speaking of a period of approximately 12 years, seems to be an echo of 2 Pet 3:8, and, if so, is the earliest testimony to the existence of that writing, and thus proves its great antiquity, although not its canonicity.

VII. Pastor (Shepherd) of Hermas.—This work is the earliest example, on a large scale, of Christian allegory, and was hardly less popular in the early church than the Pilgrim’s Progress in later times. It was reckoned by many almost, by some altogether, as “Scripture.” Irenaeus quotes it as “Scripture” (iv. 20; Clement of Alexander refers to it as the “decrees revealed Divinely imparted” (Strom., i. 29); Origen regards it as “Divinely inspired” (Comm. on Rom ii 14). It is placed with the Ep. of Barnabas in the Cod. Sin. at the close of the NT, and was read in many church services or “Lectures on God” and “Lectures,” ii, 2, ii, 3. The writer represents himself as a slave sold to a Roman Christian lady. He afterward obtained freedom, lived with his family in Rome, became earnestly religious, and saw visions which he imparted to the community in this book with a view to repentance and spiritual well-being.

Origen (followed by Eusebius, Jerome, etc.) ascribes the work to the Hermes of Rom ii 14 but his opinion is pure conjecture (pudor). The Canon Muratori, the Roman authontship describes the work as “recently composed at Rome by the brother of Pius during the latter’s episcopate” (137-54). This distinct local testimony has been widely accepted (Hefele, Lightfoot, Charteris, Crusswell, etc.). Yet the writer represents himself (Strom., ii, 4) as enjoined to send his book to Clement as a man in authority in the church, whom it is natural to identify with the chief presbyter of Rome between 92 and 101. This reference, along with the absence of such allusions as the following the Apos.-episcopate, has led Schaff, Zahn, and others to fix the date of the work at about 100 AD. The external and internal evidence, thus apparently divergent, may be reconciled by supposing (with Kuiper and Harnack) that the book was not written in a single draft; that portions were issued successively during Clement’s episcopate; and that under Pius (c. 140) the separate issues were gathered into a volume under the title of The Pastor. In Rome, where the author was known, the Canon Muratori attested at once its religious usefulness as a “book to be read,” and the absence of any claim to canonical authority.

The purpose of the book is not doctrinal but ethical; it is an allegorical manual of Christian duty with earnest calls to individual repentance and church revival in view of the near Advent.

2. Object

(1) Montanistic affinity.—Hermas, indeed, differs from Montanists in permitting, though not encouraging, second marriage, and recognizing one possible repentance after post-baptismal flagrant sin, but he is also their fore-runner, through his disallowance of readmission after second lapse, through emphatic expectation of an impending Advent, and through his rigorous view of fasting: “On the fast day taste nothing but bread and water.”

(2) Pastoral, however, is regarded not as an end but as a means—a discipline toward humility, purity, charity. Fasting for charity is enjoined, that all who dwell in flesh, by whom “the whole world is sustained,” those who endure great sufferings that He might do away with the sins of His people” (Sim., v. 3).

(3) Church organisation.—Hermas is charged (Vis., ii. 4) to “read his writings to [or along with] the presbyters who preside over the church.” In Rome it is reasonable to conclude that no one in that community could then be called “bishop” in the later sense of the holder of an-office distinct from and superior to the presbyters. Episkopoi ("bishops") are mentioned (Sim., ix. 27) as “given to hospitality,” the description of the episkopos in 1 Tim 3:2, where admittedly bishop = presbyter.

VIII. Second Epistle of Clement.—This writing is doubly misclassified: it is neither an ep nor a composition of Clement. Style, thought, and standpoint differ from those of the First Ep. and HE, III, 38; suggests that the Clementine episcopate was not generally recognized. The recent recovery by Bryennios of the previously lost conclusion proves that the writing is a sermon (ch xvi).

Antiquity is indicated by (1) the use, as an authority, of the lost heretical Gospel of the Egyptians, which by the time of the Canon Muratori (175 AD) had ceased to be regarded as Scripture by Catholics; (2) the adoption, without gnostic intuition, of phrases which become notably associated, after 150 AD with Gnosticism: "God made male and female: the male is Christ, the female, the church" (ch xiv). The date usually
2. Date and assigned is 120–50 AD (Lightfoot, Part Authorship 1, vol 11, 201). The author is a general preacher; he had "worshipped stocks and stones." The sermon was probably preached at Corinth, for the preacher describes many arriving by sea for the race-course, without mentioning a port, which would be appropriate in a town next to Corinthians.
No text is given, but the sermon starts from Isa 64 1, without express quotation; this chapter had probably been read at the
3. Contents service. The discourse, without great literary merit, is earnest and practical. There are exhortations to repentance and good works, to purity, charity, prayer and fasting, with special reference to coming judgment.
The standpoint is that of St. James. "Be nottroubled [so the sermon concludes] because we see the unrighteous with abundance, and God's servants in straits. Let us have faith, brethren and sisters. Had God recompensed the righteous speedily, we should have had training not in piety but in bargaining; and our uprightness would be a mere semblance, since our pursuit would be not of godliness but of gain."[13]
(1) The sermon is the oldest extant in post-NT times, and appears to have been read (ch xiv) to a congregation.
(2) Sayings of Christ not in our Gospels are quoted: (a) "The Lord, being asked when His kingdom would come, answered: 'The young woman, (4) foreshadings of Christian truth by philosophy, referring esp. to Plato's teaching about the Divine Logos and judgment to come. The epistles would describe Sunday school and administration of sacraments in his time. On the Lord's Day Christians assembled for worship; prophetic Scriptures and "memories" by apostles and their followers were read; prayers and thanksgivings were offered and an address delivered by the "president"; bread and wine were distributed and sent by deacons to those absent; and an offering for charitable purposes was made. "As many as believe what is taught, and undertake to live accordingly, are, after prayer and fast, baptized" (ch. lxv, lvii).

There are probably no descript to the first; Eusebius quotes from both as from one work. After a protest against a recent summary of a prior trial, Justin deals with two popular taunts: (1) "If at death they went to heaven, why did they not commit suicide?" (2) "We do not shrink from death but from opposing God's will." (2) "If God is really on the Christians' side, why do they allow them to be persecuted?" (3) "The divine Logos is not a small and heretical minority" (Dial. 48). He writes elsewhere (1 Ap., 13) of the Son as the object of worship: "In the second place": but the student before the Arian Controversy must be reminded that this statement by Justin, as elsewhere, he appears to subordinate Him to the Father, as the Son to the Father. He is to be "worshipped in the third order" (1 Ap., 13).

(5) Millenarianism: "I and others are assured that there will be a resurrection at the dead and 1,000 years in Jerus which will be built, adorned and enlarged" (Dial., 80). He adds, however, that many pure and pious Christians think otherwise.

(6) Future punishment: On this subject Justin speaks with two voices. In 1 Ap., 8, he writes of "condemned souls suffering eternal punishment, not for a millennial period only." But in Dial., 5, he teaches the specific term for an old man who was the immediate degree of his conversion is saying that "the wicked shall be punished as long as God shall will them to remain." (7) Angel-worship: In 1 Ap., 6, Justin, when refuting the charge of theologian, worship: the Father and the Son, and the host of other good messengers (or angels), and the Prophetic Spirit." (8) The context, however, shows that by "worship" he means the veneration which is necessarily amount to what is usually meant by worship, but simply to veneration and homage. The Gr words here, kzewos and phereioun, are often used in this latter sense; and the train of thought seems to be this: "You call us heretics; the charge is not true for we not believe in one God and Father of all, but in one who is preeminently the Son of God, who was sent by God. We believe further in other beings, who are angels, and are leader of angelic spirits; yes we believe in one who is preeminently God's Spirit, who have inspired." Justin of course is inspired. All these are the object in different degrees of their veneration and homage. Undoubtedly, however, the statement is not without courage and misunderstanding.

(10) Doctrine of the sacraments: Justin uses "regenerate" as the synonym of "baptized" (1 Ap., 61), but he identifies the two, not as essentially inseparable, but as uniformly associated. As regards the Lord's Supper, while emphasizing the ideas of commemoration, communion, and thanksgiving, he is in one place speaks of the bread and wine being the flesh and blood of the Incarnate Jesus, "from which, by a transmutation, our flesh and blood are nourished" (1 Ap., 66). These words tend to transubstantiation; but, in the absence of the controversy at the time, may be no more than a strongly figural representation of a spiritual union. Justin also uses the word "disciple of the apostles." Dionysius was a very common Gr name, so that his identification with the tutor of Marcus Aurelius (130–40 AD) is a mere conjecture. Donaldson (Chr. Lit., II, 142) inclines to the belief that the work was composed by one of the many Greeks who came to Rome in the 14th cent. and that the author intended merely to write a "good declaration in the old style." The smart but superficial way in which heathenism and Judaism are dealt with is more befitting a medieval theological exercise than a genuine statement, by a cultured writer, of prevalent religions.

5. Notabilia

(1) Bearing of Justin's quotations from "memoirs" on the Age of Our Gospels (see Gospel)

(2) "The Manny of apostolic doctrine. Justin is a disciple of St. Paul, and a strong anti-Judæan; yet he recognizes thoroughly the Twelve as the true source of Christian teaching, "sent by Christ to teach all nations" (1 Ap., 30, 49; Dial., 42, 10)."

(3) "From personal knowledge as a traveler, Justin testifies to the wide diffusion of Christianity: "No race of men exists among whom prayers are not offered up to the Father through the name of the crucified Jesus (Dial., 117)."

(4) Authorship of Resurrection: "John, one of the apostles, prophesied, by a revelation made to him, that beloved disciple who was the earliest direct witness to Johnanthous, by one who had resided at Ephesus.

(5) Belief of the primitive church in Our Lord's true Divinity: Writing in the name of Christians as a body, declares, "Both Him [the Father] and Him who came forth from Him we adore" (1 Ap., 6). He speaks also of some "we worship and adore" (1 Ar., 110)."

(6) As to the Holy Spirit, Justin refers to baptism as administered in the name of Father, Son, and Spirit" (1 Ap., 61), implying the Divinity of the Third Person; although elsewhere he appears to subordinate Him to the Son, as the Son to the Father. He is to be "worshipped in the third order" (1 Ap., 13).

(7) Millenarianism: "I and others are assured that there will be a resurrection at the dead and 1,000 years in Jerus which will be built, adorned and enlarged" (Dial., 80). He adds, however, that many pure and pious Christians think otherwise.

(8) Future punishment: On this subject Justin speaks with two voices. In 1 Ap., 8, he writes of "condemned souls suffering eternal punishment, not for a millennial period only." But in Dial., 5, he teaches the specific term for an old man who was the immediate degree of his conversion is saying that "the wicked shall be punished as long as God shall will them to remain." (9) Angel-worship: In 1 Ap., 6, Justin, when refuting the charge of theologian, worship the Father and the Son, and the host of other good messengers (or angels), and the Prophetic Spirit." (10) Doctrine of the sacraments: Justin uses "regenerate" as the synonym of "baptized" (1 Ap., 61), but he identifies the two, not as essentially inseparable, but as uniformly associated. As regards the Lord's Supper, while emphasizing the ideas of commemoration, communion, and thanksgiving, he is in one place speaks of the bread and wine being the flesh and blood of the Incarnate Jesus, "from which, by a transmutation, our flesh and blood are nourished" (1 Ap., 66). These words tend to transubstantiation; but, in the absence of the controversy at the time, may be no more than a strongly figural representation of a spiritual union. Justin also uses the word "disciple of the apostles." Dionysius was a very common Gr name, so that his identification with the tutor of Marcus Aurelius (130–40 AD) is a mere conjecture. Donaldson (Chr. Lit., II, 142) inclines to the belief that the work was composed by one of the many Greeks who came to Rome in the 14th cent. and that the author intended merely to write a "good declaration in the old style." The smart but superficial way in which heathenism and Judaism are dealt with is more befitting a medieval theological exercise than a genuine statement, by a cultured writer, of prevalent religions.
THE EARLY ST, and metal, without any apparent realization that for cultured heathens of that time such images were not objects, but only symbolic media of worship; and he ridicules Mosaic observances without any recognition of their significance as a Divine educative discipline. But when he proceeds (chs vii-xii) to describe Christianity, the work merits Hefele’s designation, praestantissima Epitola. Into a world, yes, into human hearts, which had become degenerate and wicked, “God sent not mere servant or angel, but His own Son,” and Him, not as a condemning Judge, or fear-inspiring Tyrant, but as a gracious Saviour. To the inquiry, “If Christianity is so precious, why was Christ sent so late?” the author replies: “In order first to bring home to mankind their unworthiness to attain eternal life through their own works” and their incapacity for salvation apart from Him “who is able to save even what it was impossible (formerly) to save.” But faith in the Son of God now revealed, would lead to “knowledge of the Father”; knowledge of God to “love of Him who hath first so loved us”; and love of God to “imitation of Him and of His loving-kindness.” And wherein consists such imitation? Not in “seeking lordship over those weaker,” or in “showing violence toward those below us”; but in “taking on oneself the burden of one’s neighbor,” even as “God took on Himself the burden of our iniquities, and gave His own Son as a ransom for us.” “He who in whatsoever he may be superior is ready to benefit another who is deficient; he who, by distributing to the needy what he has received from God, becomes a god to those who receive his benefits: he is an imitator of God.”

LITTER, lit’er (ט, גוחב): (1) Used upon backs of camels for easy riding, made of a wooden frame with light mattress and pillows, also a covering above, supported by upright pieces, sometimes having also side awnings for protection from the sun’s rays. Mule litters were made with pairs of shafts projecting before and behind, between which the animals were yoked (Isa 60:16). Littered as (בְּבַלְגָּד, ‘qphlāh qābh), are mentioned in Nu 7 3; the horse litter (חפוא, ‘phōrion) is mentioned in 2 Macc 9 8; cf 3 27. LIVELY, liv’ly, LIVING, living (‘7, hāy; פָּז, sø): “Living,” sometimes “lively,” is the tr of hāy (often also tr “life”); it denotes all beings possessed of life (Gen 1 21 24; 2 19; Ex 21 35, “live”); we have frequently the phrase, “the land of the living” (as contrasted with shābāl, the abode of the dead), e.g. Job 28 13; Ps 27 13; 62 5; Isa 38 11; the characteristically Bib. expression, “the living God,” also frequently occurs (Josh 3 10; 1 8 17 26 8; 82 K 19 4; 84 K v 14 15; and also frequently in the NT as the tr of sø (Mt 16 16; 26 63; Jn 6 57, “the living Father”; Acts 14 15). “Lively” in Ex 1 19 (hāyēh) and Ps 38 19 denotes fulness of life, vigor; hāyēh, “a living being,” is mostly confined to Ezek. (ch 37) (1.5.13.14, etc), also Gen 1 28; 8 17, “living thing”; “living” is sometimes applied fig. to that which is not actually alive; thus we have the phrase “living waters” (Jer 2 13; 17 13; Zec 14 8, “living waters shall go out from Jerusalem” in contrast with stagnant waters—waters that can give life; so Jn 4 10 11 (bubbling up from the spring at bottom of the well); 7 38; Rev 7 17 AV; “living bread” (Jn 6 51); “a new and living way” (He 10 20), perhaps equivalent to “ever-living” (Rev 11 15); “living waters” (1 Pet 2 4 5) are those made alive in Christ; a “living hope” (a hope full of life), 1 Pet 1 3; “living” (sō) is sometimes also “manner of life” (Lk 15 13; Col 2 20); δίκαιος, “to lead or go through,” is also so tr (Tit 3 5); bios is “means of life,” tr “living” (Mk 12 44; Lk 8 43); “living,” in this sense, occurs in Apoc as the tr of sō, “Defraud not the poor of his living” (Eccles 4 1).

RV has “living” for “alive” (Lev 14 4), for “the lively” (Acts 7 70; Rom 16 21); “living stones” (1 Pet 2 5; 2 Pet 3 11); “living creatures” for “beasts” (Rev 4 6; 6 6, etc); “living” for “beasts” (Dt 11 6); “living things” for “beasts” (Lev 11 24 47); “living” for “Ps 68 9); “a fountain of waters” (Rev 7 17); “fountains of waters of life” for “trade” (Rev 18 17), “gain their living” for “work the sea” for “Son of the living God” (Jn 6 69), “the Holy One of God” (amended text).

LIVER, liv’er (לֹא, kabhōd), derived from a root meaning “to be heavy,” being the heaviest of the viscera; LXX ἱππόρ, ἱππάρχη: The word is usually joined with the Hb yāḇērēth (see Capt.) (Ex 29 13 22; Lev 9 10 19) as a special portion set aside for the burnt offering.

This represents the large lobe or flap of the liver, ἄκονα τοῦ ἀκονοῦ, ἱππάρχη ἢ ἱππάρχων (thus LXX and Jos, Acts III, ix, 2, 286). Others, however, interpret it as the membrane which covers the upper part of the liver, sometimes called the “lesser omentum.” Thus the Vulg: reculcium testis. It extends from the fissures of the liver to the curve of the stomach. Still others consider it to be the “fatty mass” or “tissue” of the liver, which reaches to the kidneys and becomes visible upon the removal of the lesser omentum or membrane” (Driver and Whet, Leviticus, 60).

As in the scholastic psychology of the Middle Ages, the liver played an important part in the science of Sem peoples. It was the seat of feeling, and thus became synonymous with temper, disposition, character (cf Assyra kabidu, "liver," "temper," "character," and Arab. کبید, kabid, vulgar kibdi). Thus Jeremiah expresses his profound grief with the words: "My liver is pored upon the earth, because of the destruction of the daughter of my people" (Lam 2 11). The liver is also considered one of the most important and vital parts of the body (cf Virgil, cercum, òcur domicilia vitæ). A hurt in it is equivalent to death. So we find the fate of a man enticed by the flattering of a loose woman compared to that of the ox that "goeth to the slaughter . . . till an arrow strike through his liver as a breedeth 5 to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life" (Prov 7 22 23; the rest of the verse is obscure as to its meaning).

In a few passages of the OT, kâbhâd ("liver") and kâbhdâh ("glory") have been confounded, and we are in uncertainty as to the right tr. Several authors, to give but one example, would read kâbhdâ in Ps 16 9, for reasons of Heb poetical parallelism: Therefore my heart is glad and my liver (AV "glory") rejoiceth. While this is quite possible, it is not easy to decide, as according to Jewish interpretation "my glory" is synonymous with "my soul," which would present as proper a parallelism.

The liver has always played an important rôle in heathen divination, of which we have many examples in old and modern times among the Greeks, Etrurians, Romans and now among African tribes. The prophet Ezekiel gives us a Bib. instance. The king of Babylon, who had been seeking to find out whether he should attack Jerusalem, inquired by shaking "arrows to and fro, he consulted the teraphim, he looked in the liver." (Ezk 21 21 [Heb ver 26; cf Tob 6 4 R; 8 2]. See Astrology, 3; Divination.

LIVING CREATURE, living krâ'tar: (1) (ם), nephesh ha'hayâh, or nefesh ha'hayâh [nephesh, "breath" or "living things"; hayâh, "living"; cf Arab. نفاس, nefs, "breath," نفاس, haiy, "living"]: In the account of the creation this term is used of aquatic animals (Gen 1 21), of mammals (Gen 1 24) and of any animals whatever (Gen 2 19).

(2) (י), hayâth, pl. of (י), hayâh): The name of the "living creatures" of Ezek 1 5-25, which had wings and the faces of a man, a lion, an ox, and an eagle; cf Ezek 10 4. LIZARD, lizard: The list of unclean "creeping things" in Lev 11 29.30 contains eight names, as follows:

(1) (ם), holédh, EV "weasel" (q.v.); (2) (ם), abbâr, EV "mouse" (q.v.); (3) (ם), gâbdh, AV "tor- toise," RV "great lizard" (q.v.); (4) (ם), (ם), anâkh, AV "tertum," RV "gecko" (q.v.); (5) (ם), ksâb, AV "chameleon," RV "land-crocodile" (q.v.); (6) (ם), kmâš, EV "lizard"; cf Arab. كَبْد (kibdi). (7) (ם), bômêl, AV "snail"; RV "sand-lizard" (q.v.); (8) (ם), (ם), tinâhâth, AV "mole," RV "chameleon" (q.v.). In Pro 30 28, we find (9) (ם), s'mâmîth, AV "spider," RV "lizard." Since (1), (3), (4), (5), (6) and (7) occur as names of animals only in this passage, and as the philo- logical evidence available is in most cases not very convincing, their determination is difficult and uncertain. RVm to "gecko" (Lev 11 30) has "Words of uncertain meaning, but probably denoting four kinds of lizards."

Among the many lizards of Palestine, the monitor and thorny-tailed lizard are remarkable for their size, and the chameleon for its striking appearance and habits. On etymological grounds, kôph, AV "chameleon," RV "land-crocodile" (Ger. Crocuta crocuta) chervatos, to be the thorny-tailed lizard; and tinâhâth, AV "mole," RV "chameleon" LXX aspilos, to be the chameleon. On the same grounds, bômêl, LXX pàl, might be the mole-rat. See Chameleon; Tortoise; Weasel.

The commonest lizard of Palestine is the rough-tailed agama, Agama stellio, Arab. بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ بَذَذْ BIBLICAL AND SCHOOL DICTIONARIES.

The commonest lizard is the "great lizard," (9) (ם), s'mâmîth (Ptyodactylus lobatus). The gecko, Ptyodactylus lobatus, is common in houses. By means of adhesive disks on the under sides of its toes, it clings with ease to smooth walls which other lizards cannot scale. Although perfectly harmless, it is believed to be poisonous, and is much feared. It is called סְאָבִי, (S'abai, "father of hardy"), either on account of its supposed poisonous qualities or because it has a semi-transparent and sickly appearance, being of a whist- yellow color with darker spots. It utters a little cry, which may be the reason why RV has "gecko" for סְאָבִי, AV "tertum." Various species of the genus Lacerta and its allies, the true lizards, may always be found searching for insects on trees and walls. They are scaly, like all lizards, but are relatively smooth and are prettily colored, and are the most attractive members of the group which are found in the country. They are called by the Arabs סְאָבִי (S'abai) or chameleon.

The skins include ribes uncinatissimus, and allied species, Arab. سُكْرِبَة, or عَنَقِي (škuée, škîbûs, shackos). They are smooth, light-colored lizards, and are found in sandy places. They cannot climb, but they run and burrow in the sand with remarkable rapidity. The dried body of the ribes uncinatissimus is an important feature of the primitive oriental materia medica, and may be found in the shops (officines) of the old-style apothecaries.

S'mâmîth (Prov 30 28, AV "spider," RV "lizard") is one of the "four things which are little . . . but . . . exceeding wise," RV reads: "The lizard taketh hold with his hands, Yet is she in kings' palaces."

LXX has καλάβης, kalabalès, which according to Liddell and Scott, is καλαβή, kalabôthi, a spotted lizard. There is no other 1.

2. Identif- lizard which fits this passage as does cations the gecko. If Gesenius is correct in deriving s'mâmâth from the y'samâm (cf Arab. samma, "to poison"), we have another reason for making this identification, in which case we must rule out the rendering of RVm, "Thou canst seize with thy hands."
For none of the names in Lev 11:20–30 have we as many data for identification as for swanem. For letf'ah, EV "lizard," LXX has ἄγαλα (ἄγαλα, halálát, which is the second variant of ἀγάλα). If we follow the LXX, therefore, we should render letf'ah "gecko." Tristram quotes Bochart as drawing an argument that letf'ah is a "gecko" from the Arab. γέκκο, to cling to the ground. This view is in accordance with the LXX.

It is of course untenable if 'dnakdh is "gecko," but it is certainly safe to do so in the absence of a clear indication to the contrary. This view seems to be little evidence available for deciding the identity of ḥōmēt, AV "small," RV "sand-lizard."

LXX has aGápa, aWára, and Vüg lacerta, both words for lizard. Gesenius refers the word to an obsolete form, ḥōmēt, "to bow down," to Ilp upon the ground. Tristram, NAB, cites Bochart as referring to a word meaning "to cling" to the ground. If by this means is the dink, there is no inherent improbability in the identification.

We have thus more or less tentatively assigned various words of the list to the monitor, the thorny-tailed agama, the gecko and its skink, but we have done nothing with the rough-tailed agama and the Lacertae, or true lizards, which are the commonest lizards of Pal, and this fact must be reckoned against the correctness of the assignement. The writers of RV have this to commend it, that it gives two small mammals followed by six lizards, and is therefore to that extent systematic. It is, however, neither guided in all cases by etymological considerations, nor does it follow LXX.

As none of the etymological arguments is very cogent, the writer can see no harm in consistently following LXX, understanding for (1) gál, weasel or pole-cat; for (2) wá, mouse; for (3), kroddalá, small lizards, either the monitor or the thorny-tailed lizard; for (4), magál, shrew or field-mouse; for (5), chámålín, chameleon; for (6), chálábát, gecko; for (7), sáw, Lacerta, or true lizard; for (8), anákal, mole-rat. On the other hand, the etymological considerations are to be taken into account and LXX abandoned when it conflicts with them we might have (1) kálál, mole-rat; (2) akÁbr, mouse; (3) GÁb, thorny-tailed lizard; (4), 'dnakdh, field-mouse; (5) kósh, monitor; (6) Idf'ah, gecko; (7) ḥōmēt, skink; (8) inánakálá, chameleon.

Neither of these lists has the systematic arrangement of that of RV, but we must remember that these writers were not zoologists, as is seen in the inclusion of the bat among birds (Lev 11:19; Dt 14:18), and of the hare and coney among ruminants (Lev 11:56; Dt 14:7).

LOAF, lôf. See Bread.

LO-AMMI, lo-âmî ("âGáD sâf, lo-âmî, "not my people"): The 2d son and 3d child of Gomer b. Diblaim, wife of the prophet Hosea (Hos 19). An earlier child, a daughter, had been named Lo-yahmah ("âGáD sâf, bîru-yâhmâh, "uncompasionated"). The names, like those given by Isaiah to his children, are symbolic, and set forth Hosea's conviction that Israel has, through sin, forfeited Jeho's compassion, and can no longer claim His protection. Of the branches of these names nothing further is known; but their symbolism is alluded to in Hos 2:13. This latter passage is quoted by Paul (Rom 9:25 f.). See Hosea; JEZEREEL.

LOCKS, lôks [2GáZ, tâát, [2GáZ, pêrâ, [3GáZ, tâát, mábîlâh, [4GáZ, tâát, ãbîlâh, (Gen. 39:25); See in general the article on HAIR. (1) The first word, tâát, appears not only as a personal name, such as is borne by the Jews on the four corners of the prayer-shawl or tallith and on the 'arba' kampóth (Dt 22:12), but in the NT by kpdôlós, krepidón (Mt 9:20; 14:36; 23:5; Mk 6:50; Lk 8:44). Once it is applied to a forehead of hair. The prophet Ezekiel, describing the sensations which accompanied his vision of Jesus, says: "He put forth the form of a hand, and took me by a loek of my head; and the Spirit lifted me up between earth and heaven, and brought me in the visions of God to Jerusalem" (Ezk 8 3). (2) The word pêrâ signifies the unshorn and disheveled locks of the Nazirite (Nu 6:5) or of the priests, the sons of Zadok (Ezk 44:20). (3) The Book of Jgs employs the word mábîlâh when speaking of the "seven locks" of Samson (Jgs 15:13,19), which really represent the plaited (etymologically, "interwoven") strands of hair still worn in our days by youthful Bedouin warriors. (4) R'vâqî (Cant 5:21) means the luxuriant hair of the Hebrew youth, which was the care of his exterior. It is called bushy (RV "curling") and black as a raven. AV trâî also the word kâmmâh with "locks" (Cant 4:1; 6:7; Isa 47:2), but RV has corrected this into "veil," leaving the word "locks" in Cant 4:1 m. H. L. E. LEUBING

LOCUST, lôk'ust: The tr of a large number of Heb and Gr words:

(1) ãbîrâh, "arbech, from ãbîrâh, râkhâh, "to increase" (cf Arab. 'abáh, râ'â'áh; "to increase"). (2) óôô, sâlâm, from obsolete ãbîrâh, râkhâh, "to swallow down." (3) ãbîrâh, hâr-gol (cf Arab. hâr-gol, "to run to the right or left," hâr-galat, "a company of horses" or "a swarm of lizards," hâr-jawâd, a kind of locust). (4) ãbîrâh, hâgâhâh (cf Arab. hâgâhâh, "to hide," "to cover"). (5) ãbîrâh, gâdám (cf Arab. gâdám, "to cut off"). (6) ãbîrâh, yâlekh; from ãbîrâh, "to line") (cf Arab. yâlêkkâ, "to dart out the tongue" [(used of a serpent). (7) ãbîrâh, hâjâl, from ãbîrâh, hâjâl, "to devour" (cf Arab. hâjâl, "crop" [(of a bird)]. (8) ãbîh, gâbâh, from obsolete ãbîrâh, râkhâh (cf Arab. gâbâh, "locust," "grasshopper," from ãbîrâh, râkhâh, "grasshopper," "to come out of a hole"). (9) ãbîh, gâbâh, from same ãbîh. (10) ãbîh, yâlêkkâ, from ãbîrâh, gâdám (omnepetotic), "to tinkle." "to ring" (cf Arab. gâdâm, "chink, to give a ringing sound" [(used of a horse's bit]; cf also Arab. gâdâm, fann, used of the sound of a drum or piece of metal, also of the humming of flies). (11) oôô, akâris (Gol. apâbôs, akâriston; dim. apâbôs, akâriston, a genus of locusts).

(1), (2), (3), (4) constitute the list of clean insects in Lev 11:21 f., characterized as "winged creeping things that go upon all fours, "which have legs above their feet, wherewith to leap upon the earth.

This manifestly refers to jumping insects of the order Orthoptera, such as locusts, grasshoppers and crickets, and is in contrast to the unclean "winged creeping things that go upon all fours," which may be taken to denote running Orthoptera, such as cockroaches, mole-crickets and ear-wigs, as well as insects of other orders.

"Arbech (1) is uniformly trâî "locust" in RV. AV has usually "locust," but "grasshopper" in Jgs 6:5; 7:12; Job 39:20; Jgs 16:23. LXX has usually ãpêk, akâris, "locust"; but has bôpôyôs, bôpôyôs, "wingless locust," in Lev 11:22; 1 Kâ 37 (ãkri's in the | passage, 2 Ch 6:28); Nâh 3:15; and ãnôôôêôs, ãnôôôêôs, "wingless locust," in Nah

3 17. 'Arbeh occurs (Ex 10 4-19) in the account of the plague of locusts; in the phrase "as locusts for multitude" (Jgs 6 5; 7 12); "more than the locusts ... innumerable" (Jer 46 23); "the locusts have no king. Yet so they forth all of them by bands." (Prov 30 27). 'Arbeh is referred to as a plague in Dt 28 38; 1 K 8 37; 2 Ch 6 28; Ps 78 46; in Joel and in Nah. These references, together with the fact that it is the most used word, occurring 24 t, warrant us in assuming it to be one of the swarming species, i.e. Pachytylus migratorius or Schistocerca gregaria, which from time to time devastate large regions in the countries bordering on the Mediterranean.

Sa'lem (2), EV "bald locust," occurs only in Lev 11 22. According to Tristram, "bald" locust was given because it is said in the Talm to have a smooth head. It has been thought to be one of the genus Trzyzalis (T. unguliculata or T. nasuta), in which the head is greatly elongated. Hagal (5), AV "beetle," RV "cricket," being one of the leaping insects, cannot be a beetle. It might be a cricket, but comparison with the Arab. (see supra) favors a locust of some sort. The word occurs only in Lev 11 22. See Beetle.

Hagahah (4) is one of the clean leaping insects of Lev 11 22 (EV "grasshopper"). The word occurs in four other places, nowhere coupled with the name of another insect. In the report of the spies (Nu 13 33), we have the expression, "We were in our own sight as grasshoppers"; in Ex 12 5, "the grasshopper shall be a burden"; in Isa 40 22, "it is he that sitteth above the circle of the earth, and the inhabitants thereof are as grasshoppers." These three passages distinctly favor the rendering "grasshopper" of EV. In the remaining passage (2 Ch 7 13), "... if I command the locust [EV] to devour the land," the migratory locust seems to be referred to. Doubtless this as well as other words was loosely used. In Eng. there is no sharp distinction between the words "grasshopper" and "locust."

The migratory locusts belong to the family Acridiidae, distinguished by short, thick antennae, and by having the organs of hearing at the base of the abdomen. The insects of the family Locustidae are commonly called "grasshoppers," but the same name is applied to these Acridiidae which are not found in swarms. The Locustidae have long, thin antenna, organs of hearing on the tibiae of the front legs, and the females have long ovipositors. It may be noted that the insect known in America as the seventeen-year locust, which occasionally does extensive damage to trees by laying its eggs in the twigs, is a totally different insect, being a species of the order Rhynocheta. Species of Cicadae are found in Pal, but are not considered harmful.

The Book of Joel is largely occupied with the description of a plague of locusts. Commentators differ as to whether it should be interpreted literally or allegorically (see Joel). Four names 'arbeh (1), gádím (5), yelek (6) and hást (7), are found in Joel 1 4 and again in 2 25.

For the etymology of these names, see 1 above. Gadím (Am 4 9; Joel 1 4; 2 25) is uniformly rendered "palmer-worm" (LXX "psamō-" κηρύκας, "caterpillar"). Hást in RV (1 K 8 37; 2 Ch 6 28; Ps 78 46; Isa 40 24; Joel 1 4; 2 25) is uniformly rendered "caterpillar." LXX has indifferently brouchous, "wingless locust," and gevand, erustē, "rust" (in the sense of "weevil"). Yelek (Ps 105 34; Jer 51 14 27; Joel 1 4b; 2 25; Nah 3 16b 16) is everywhere "canker-worm" in RV, except in Ps 103 54, where ARV has "grasshopper.") AV has "caterpillar" in Ps and Jer and "canker-worm" in Joel and Nah. LXX has indifferently akris "caterpillar." "Palmer-worm" and "canker-worm" are both Old Eng. terms for caterpillars, which are strictly the larvae of lepidopterous insects, i.e. butterflies and moths.

While these four words occur in Joel 1 4 and 2 25, a consideration of the book as a whole does not show that the ravages of four different insect pests are referred to, but rather a single one, and that the locust. These words may therefore be regarded as different names of the locust, referring to different stages of development of the insect. It is true that the words do not occur in quite the same order in 1 4 and 2 25, but while the former verse indicates a definite succession, the latter does not. If, therefore, all four words refer to the locust, "palmer-worm," "canker-worm," "caterpillar" and the LXX erustē, "rust," are obviously inappropriate.

Gôbb (8) is found in the difficult passage (Am 7 1). "... he formed locusts [AV "grasshoppers"] AVm "green worms," LXX akris" in the beginning of the shooting up of the latter growth:" and (Nah 3 17) in "... thy marshals are as the swarms of grasshoppers [Heb gôbb gôbhah yevāk]. LXX "great grasshoppers," which encamp in the hedges in the cold day, but when the sun ariseth they flee away, and their place is not known where they are." The related gôbh (9) occurs but once, in Isa 33 4, also a disputed passage, "And your spoil shall be gathered as the caterpillar [hôl] gathereth: as locusts [gebēth] leap shall men leap upon it." It is impossible to determine what species is meant, but some kind of locust or grasshopper fits any of these passages.

In Dt 28 42, "All thy trees and the fruit of thy land shall be as the locust [EV] possess," we have (10) cālôs (LXX erustē). The same word is τέρας in 2 8 6 5 and Ps 150 5 "cymbals," in Job 41 7 "fish-spears," and in Isa 13 18 "great." As stated in 1, above, it is an onomatopoetic word, and in Dt 28 42 may well refer to the noise of the wings of a flight of locusts.

In the NT we have (11) akris, "locust." the food of John the Baptist (Mt 3 4; Mk 1 6); the same word is used fig. in Rev 9 5 7; and also in Apc (Jth 2 20; Wsd 16 9; and see 2 Esd 4 24).

The swarms of locusts are composed of countless individuals. The statements sometimes read that they darken the sky must not be taken too literally.
They do not produce darkness; but their effect may be like that of a thick cloud. Their movements are largely determined by the wind.

3. Habits and while fields that are in their path may be laid waste, others at one side may not be affected. It is possible by vigorous waving to keep a given track clear of them, but usually enough men cannot be found to protect the fields from their ravages.

Large birds have been known to pass through a flight of locusts with open wings, filling their crops with the insects which they eat.

W. J. saw the descent in the Jordan enjoying a similar feast, as the locusts fell into the meal locust, by means of ovipositor at the end of her abdomen, digs a hole in the ground, and deposits in it a mass of eggs, which are cemented together with a glandular secretion. An effective way of dealing with the locusts is to gather and destroy these eggs-masses, and it is customary for the local governments to offer a reward for the destruction of such measure of eggs. The young before they can fly are frequently swept into pits or ditches for the purpose and are burned.

The young are of the same general shape as the adult insects, differing only in being wingless. The three distinct stages in the metamorphosis of butterflies and other insects are not to be distinguished in locusts. They molt about six times, emerging from each molt larger than before. At first there are only two wings. After the third molt, small and less wings are found, but it is only after the last molt that they are able to fly. In the early molts, the tiny black nymphs are found in patches on the ground, hopping out of the way when disturbed. Later they run faster than a dog.

In all stages they are destructive to vegetation. Some remarkable pictures of their ravages are found in Joel 1 6, 7, “For a nation is come upon my land, strong, and without number; his teeth are as the teeth of a lion, and he hath the jaw-teeth of a lioness. He hath laid my vine waste, and my fig-tree, on my stem tree: he hath made it clean bare, and cast it away; the branches thereof are made white” (see also 2 9-20).

Locusts are instruments of the wrath of God (Ex 10 4-19; Dt 28 38-42; 2 Ch 7 13; Ps 78 46; 105 34; Nah 3 15-17; Wis 4 9; Rev 9 3). They typify an invading army (Jer 51 14-27). They are compared with horses (Joyo 2 4; Rev 9 7); in Job 59 20, Jehovah says of the horses “Hast thou appointed me for horses? AV ‘Canst thou make him afraid as a grasshopper?’ Locusts are among the ‘four things which are little upon the earth, but . . . are exceeding wise’ (Prov 30 27). Like the stars and sands of the sea, locusts are also of that which is, and cannot be numbered (Jgs 6 5 7; 7 12; Jer 46 23; Jth 2 20). Grasshoppers are a symbol of insignificance (Nu 13 33; Ecc 13 5; Isa 40 22; 2 Esd 4 24).

The Arabs prepare for food the thorax of the locust, which contains the great wing muscles. They pull off the head, which as it comes away brings with it a mass of the viscera, and they remove the abdomen (or “tail”), the legs and the wings. The thoraces, if not at once eaten, are dried and put away as a store of food for a lean season. The idea of feeding upon locusts when prepared in this way should not be so repugnant as eating the whole insect, for the light of this it is not incredible that the food of John the Baptist should have been ‘locusts and wild honey’ (Mt 3 4). See Locusts.

LOCUST

LODEUS; lod-w’ra (Ados, Loddeus, Loddeus; Swete reads Laodos with Dolidas as variant in A; AV Dad deus, Saddeus): The captain, who was in the place of the treasury. Ezekiel 50 25; 59 15 says that he who “might execute the priest’s office” (1 Esd 8 46); called ‘Iddo’ in Ezr 18 7.

LO-DEBAR ló-de-br; ló-de’br (לֹדוֹבָר, לֹדוֹבָר): A place in Gilead where dwelt Machir, son of Ammiel, who sheltered Mephibosheth, son of Saul, after that monarch’s death (2 S 9 4), until he was sent for by David. This same Machir met David with supplies when he fled to Gilead from Absalom (17 27). It is possible that the same place as Lidebar in Josh 13 26 (Rv.). No certain identification is possible; but Schumacher (Northern ‘Ajlun, 101) found a site with the name ‘Idbar about 6½ miles E of ‘Umm Keis, N. of the great aqueduct, which may possibly represent the

The town lay in the plain of Jopheth, perhaps the same gā-hā-ḥārēm, “the valley of craftsmen” (Neh 11 35). In the NT it appears as Lydda. Here the apostle Peter visited the saints and healed the palsied Aenesas

tax ênô, kata
tax
ênô, etc.]: To stay or dwell, temporarily, as for the night (Gen 32 13; Nu 32 51; Josh 2 1 AV; Judges 8; Lk 13 19; Mt 21 17, 18, AV; Luke 16, or permanently (Ruth 1 16). In Isa 1 8, "a lodge [wtlânâh] in a garden of cucumbers," the meaning is "hut," "cottage." "Evil thoughts" are said to "lodge" in the wicked (Jer 4 14).

LOFT: In 1 K 17 23, changed in RV to "chamber."

LOFTILY, lof'ti-li, LOFTINESS. lof'ti-nes, LOFTY: The first form is only in Ps 73 8, where it means "haughtily," as if from on high. The second is found only in Jer 48 29, where the loftiness of Moab also means his haughtiness, his grand and self-conceit.

LOFTHILY likewise means "haughty," "lifted up" (cf Ps 131 1; Isa 2 11; Prov 30 13). In Isa 26 5 it refers to a self-secure and boastful city. In Mt 15 15 it is used in a good sense of God who really is high and supreme. Isaiah uses the Hebrews, equal to about 1 pint. See Weights and Measures.

LOGIA, log'i-a, THE (Aêga, Logia): The word logia, which is a dimin. of logos, was regularly used of Divine utterances. There are examples in the classics, the LXX. The word is usually given to the Logia of Jesus in the NT. In and in four passages in the NT (Acts 7 85; 1 Co 2 1-2; Heb 5 12; 1 Pet 4 11) where it is uniformly rendered both in AV and RV "oralces." It is not, therefore, surprising that early Christian writers, who thought of Christ as Divine, applied this term to His sayings also. We find this use, according to the usual interpretation, in the title of one of the Papias fragments preserved by Eusebius, Logiôn kurtikôn ezkêptai, "Exposition of the Lord's Logia" (HE, III, 39), in that writer's obscure reference to a Heb or Aram. writing by the apostle Matthew (ib), and in Poly carp's Ep. (§ 7), "the logia of the Lord." The modern use of the word is twofold: (a) as the name of the document referred to by Papias which may or may not be the Q of recent inquirers; (b) as the name of recently discovered sayings ascribed to Jesus. For the former of Gospels. The latter is the theme of this article.

About 93 miles from the railway station of Beni Mazur, 121 miles from Cairo, a place now called Behnasa marks the site of an ancient city called by the Greeks Oxyrhynchos, from the name of a sacred fish, the modern binni, which had long been known as a great Christian center in early times and was therefore selected by Missionary Geologists as the site of the Logia, under the auspices of the Egypt Exploration Fund. They began work on the ruins of the town, January 11, 1897, and on the following day discovered a papyrus leaf inscribed with a number of sayings introduced by the formula Logion, "saith Jesus," some of which were at once seen to be quite new. When excavation was resumed in February, 1903, a second fragment was discovered, which must have belonged to the same or a similar collection, as the formula "saith Jesus" is employed in exactly the same way, and the sayings exhibit the same mixed character. The first of these texts (called by the discoverers logia, but the short preface to the second fragment suggests that the word used in the original title may have been logiot, which is found in Acts 20 35 as the title perhaps of a collection of sayings of Jesus used by the apostle Paul). It is convenient, however, to retain logia, at any rate for the present. Other remains of early Christian texts have been found on the same site (cf AGRAPHA) but none of precisely the same character.

The first fragment, found and published in 1897, afterward referred to as A, comes measuring in its present state 51 x 31 inches and having 42 lines on the two pages. As it is broken at the top it is impossible, in the absence of another text to ascertain how much has been lost. At the top right hand corner of one page are the letters sina, aphia, used as numerals, that is 11, and it has been suggested that this, with other characteristics, marks the page as the first of the two. The uncial writing belongs to the 3rd cent., perhaps to the early part of it. The text is fairly complete except at the end of the third, or the beginning of the fifth, following line. The second fragment, henceforth referred to as B, found in 1903 and published in 1904, has also 42 lines, but on only one page or column. The Christian text being written on the back of a roll the recto of which contained a survey list. The uncial is somewhat uncial, and the date, like that of A, seems to be also the 3rd cent., but perhaps a little later. It is unfortunately very defective, the bit of papyrus being broken vertically throughout, so that several letters are lost at the end of each line, and also horizontally for parts of several lines at the bottom.

Seven of these sayings, or logia, inclusive of the preface of B, have or can-ontain canonical parallels, namely:

1. A1, which coincides with the usual text of Lk 6 41; (2) Alex (according to the editio princeps, 60), which comes very close to Lk 4 24; (3) A6 (or 7), a variant of Mt 5 14; (4) the saying contained in the preface of B which resembles Lk 8 52; (5) B2, II. 7 f. "The kingdom of heaven is within you," which resembles us of Lk 17 21; (6) B3, II. I 4, "Many that are first shall be last, and the last first," which corresponds to Mt 10 31; cf Mt 19 30; Lk 15 30; (7) B4, II. 2-3. "That which is hidden from thee shall be revealed to thee: for there is nothing hid in heaven that shall not be made manifest," which is like Mk 4 22 (cf Mt 28 26; Lk 12 2). These parallels or partial-parallel-isms are found in the following citations are-are, with one exception, of synoptic character.

The other seven or eight logia, although not without possible echoes of the canonical Gospels in thought and diction, are all non-canonical and with one exception new.

Three of these, namely B2 and 3 (apart from the canonical sayings given above) and 5, may get set aside as too uncertain of for any value. What is preserved of the first, "Who are they that draw you [MS. us] to the kingdom?" etc. is indeed very tempting, but the restoration of the lost matter is too precarious for any suggestion to be more than an ingenious conjecture. This is seen by comparing the rest of this logion by the discoverers, Dr. Swete and Dr. C. H. Taylor, with that proposed by Professor Freeman (Oxoni, 329). While the Eng. scholars take klinô in the sense of "draw," the German takes it in the sense which it has in the NT, "drag," with the result of an engendering (as to the meaning and even the subject of the logion. The logia which rest of interest, although the significance of at least one is exceedingly obscure. The number of the sayings is not certain. Dr. Taylor has brought forward two couple two distinct utterance brought together by the compiler. If this suggestion is correct, the words after A3 in the editio princeps are regarded as belonging to it and not as the remains of a separate logion, we get the following eight sayings:

(1) "Except ye fast to the world [or from the world"]; ye shall in no wise know the discovery of God" (A2a); (2) "Except ye keep the asbath (Taylor "sabbathize the sabbath"), ye shall not see the Father" (A2b); (3) "I stood in the midst of the world, and in flesh was I seen of them, and I found all men drunken, and none found I thirst among them" (A3a); (4) "My soul grieveth over the sons of men, because they are blind in their heart and see not their wretchedness and their poverty; yea (the last clause restored by conjecture) (A3b); (5) "Wherever there are two they are not without God, and where there is one alone I say I am with him (after Blase). Raise the stone and (there) thou shalt find me: cleave the wood (Taylor, "the tree") and there am I" (A4); (6) "A physician does not work cures on them that know him" (A5b); (7) "Thou hearest with one ear but the other thou hast closed" (large, conjectural but almost certain) (A6); (8) "(There is nothing buried which shall not be raised" (or "known") (B4, 1. 5).

Attempts have been made to trace the collection represented by these fragments (assuming that they belong to the same work) to some lost gospel—the Gospel according to the Egyptians (Harnack, Van Manen), the Gospel of the Ebionites or the Gospel of the Twelve Apostles (Zahn), or the Gospel according to the Hebrews (Mattithai), but none of these has been able to prove that there was a collection ofLogia. This is largely because of the nature of the material. It is not possible that the script in which this statement was made belongs not to the whole collection but to a part of it. The whole work may, as Swete suggests (Expos. T. VII. 444), have been entitled "Words of Jesus to the Twelve," and this may have been the portion addressed to Thomas. The other fragment, A, might belong to a section associated with the name of another apostle. In any case these sayings have formed to some considerable extent, as we know of material for 24 pages or columns of about 21 or 22 lines each. So far as can be judged the writing was not a gospel in the ordinary sense of that term, but a collection of sayings perhaps bearing considerable resemblance as to the form to the Logia of Matthew mentioned by Papias.

The remains of B5, however, show that a saying might be prefixed with introductory matter. Perhaps a short narrative was sometimes interpolated. The relation in which the canonical Gospels cannot be determined with present evidence. The sayings preserved generally exhibit the synoptic type, perhaps more specifically the Lukian type, but Johannine echoes, that is, possible traces of the thought and diction represented in the Fourth Gospel, are not absent (cf A, logia 2f, and preface to B). It seems not improbable that the compiler had our four Gospels before him, but nothing can be proved. There is no distinct sign of heretical influence. The much debated word the wood and the stone (A4d) undoubtedly lends itself to pantheistic teaching, but can be otherwise understood.

Under these circumstances the date of the collection and the present may be fixed except in a very general way. If our papyri which represent two copies were written, as the discoverers think, in the 3d cent., that fact and the indubitably archaic character of the sayings make it all but certain that the text as arranged is not later than the 2d cent. To what part of the cent. it is to be assigned is at present undiscoverable. Sanday inclines to about 120 AD, the finders suggest about 140 AD as the terminus ad quem, Zahn dates 160–70 AD, and Dr. Taylor 150–200 AD. Further research may solve these problems but, with the resources now available, all that can be said is that we have in the Logia of Oxyrhynchus a few glimpses of an early collection of sayings ascribed to Jesus which circulated in Egypt in the 3d cent. of great interest and possibly of considerable value, but of completely unknown origin.

LITERATURE.—Of the extensive literature which has gathered round the Logia—as many as fifty publications relating to A only in the first few months—only a few can be mentioned here. A was first published in 1897 as a pamphlet and after 1897 as No. 1 of Oxyrhynchus Papyri. Valuable articles by Cross and Harnack appeared in Expos. V. vol VI. 257 ff. 322 ff. 401 ff, an important lecture by Swete in Expos. T. VII. 544 ff. 568, and a very useful pamphlet by Sanday and Lock in the same year. B appeared in 1904 in pamphlet form and as No. 564 of the Oxyrhynchus Papyri, with a fuller comm. Dr. C. Taylor's pamphlets on A and B issued respectively in 1899 and 1905. A useful lecture on B, Expos. T. XV. 488 ff., are of exceptional significance for the study of the subject. V. PATRIARCHAL DEVELOPMENT

LITERATURE. The doctrine of the Logos has exerted a decisive and far-reaching influence upon speculative and Christian thought. The word has a long history, and the evolution of the idea it embodies is really the unfolding of man's conception of God. To comprehend the relation of the Deity to the world has been the aim of all religious philosophy. While widely divergent views as to the Divine manifestation have been conceived, from the dawn of Western speculation, the Gr word logos has been employed with a certain degree of uniformity by a series of thinkers to express and define the nature and mode of God's revelation.

Logos signifies in classical Gr both "reason" and "word." Though in Bib. Gr the term is mostly employed in the sense of "word," we cannot properly dissociate the two significations. Every word implies a thought. It is impossible to imagine a time when God was without thought. Hence thought must be eternal as the Deity. The "thought" is probably the best for the Gr term, since it denotes, on the one hand, the faculty of reason, or the thought inwardly conceived in the mind; and, on the other hand, the thought outwardly expressed through the vehicle of language. The two ideas, thought and speech, are indubitably blended in the term logos; and in every employment of the word, in philosophy and Scripture, both notions of thought and its outward expression are intimately connected.

In this essay we will attempt to trace the evolution of the doctrine from its earliest appearance in Gr philosophy through its Heb and Alexandrian phases till it attained its richest expression in the writings of the NT, and esp., in the Fourth Gospel.

1. Greek Speculation. — The earliest speculations of the Greeks were occupied with the world of Nature, and the first attempts at philosophy take the shape of a search for some unitary principle to explain the diversity of the universe.

Heracleitus was practically the first who sought to account for the variability of the world in a change by a law or ruling principle. This proposition of his was all the more significant in that it was a truly revolutionary one. Heracleitus, but no one in antiquity except him, could say things are: they come into being and pass away. To account for this state of perpetual becoming, Heracleitus was led to seek out a new and primary element from which all things take their rise. This substance he conceived to be that which he had perceived all previous thinkers had conjured out, but something more subtle, mysterious and potent—fire, this eternal, self-consuming and yet all-transforming activity—now darting upward as a flame, now sinking to an ember and now vanishing as smoke—in fact, once the symbol and essence of life. But it is no arbitrary or lawless element. If there is flux everywhere, all things must have a place according to "measured" Reality — an "attainment" of opposites, a tension or harmony of conflicting elements. Heracleitus saw all the mutations of being governed by a rational and unalterable law. This law he calls sometimes "Justice," sometimes "Harmony"; more frequently "Logos" or "Reason," and in two passages at least, "God." Fire, Logos, God are fundamentally the same. It is the eternal energy of the universe pervading all its substance and preserving in unity and harmony the perpetual diversity of its phenomenal existence. Thus, Heracleitus sometimes calls this rational principle God, it is not probable that he attached to it any definite idea of the triad. The God of Heracleitus is not above the world of becoming, even prior to it. It is in it, its inner pervasive energy sustains it, and its inherent potentiality is the reason why the entire universe forms a single living connected whole and that all particulars are the determinate forms assumed by the primitive power which they conceived as never-resting, all-pervading fire.

Little was done by the immediate successors of Heraclitus to develop the doctrine of the Logos, and as the distinction between mind and matter became more defined, the term nous superseded that of Logos as the rational force of the world. Anaxagoras was the first thinker who introduced the idea of a supreme intellectual principle which, while independent of the world, governed it. His conception of the nous or "mind" is, however, vague and confused, hardly distinguishable from corporeal matter. By the artificial introduction of a power acting externally upon the world, a dualism is created, which continues its life after philosophy, was created. At the same time it is the merit of Anaxagoras that he was the first to perceive some kind of distinction between mind and matter and to suggest a teleological explanation of the universe.

2. Anaxagoras. — Anaxagoras superseded that of Logos as the rational force of the world. Anaxagoras was the first thinker who introduced the idea of a supreme intellectual principle which, while independent of the world, governed it. His conception of the nous or "mind" is, however, vague and confused, hardly distinguishable from corporeal matter. By the artificial introduction of a power acting externally upon the world, a dualism is created, which continues its life after philosophy, was created. At the same time it is the merit of Anaxagoras that he was the first to perceive some kind of distinction between mind and matter and to suggest a teleological explanation of the universe.

But though the word is frequently used, it is nous and not Logos which answers his conception of the relation of the God and the world.

3. Plato. — The special doctrine of the Logos does not appear in the dialogue, except perhaps in the Timaeus, where the word is employed as descriptive of something by which the world has arisen. But if the word does not frequently occur in the dialogues, there is not wanting a basis upon which a Logos-doctrine might be constructed. The conception of archetypal ideas affords a philosophical expression of the relation of God to the world. As the idea of a dominating principle of reason was lifted to a higher plane by the distinction which Plato made between the world of sense and the world of理念, the latter took the place of the former. According to Plato, true reality or absolute being consisted of the "Ideas" which he conceived as thoughts residing in eternity and having the creation of the world. To these abstract concepts was ascribed the power of giving substantial reality to the concrete visible things of the world were copies or images. Compared with the "Ideas," the world of things was a world of shadows; but it was not an exact copy of the Platonic doctrine of ideas, which as we shall see, Plato afterward seized upon and elaborated in connection with his general conception of the transcendency of God and His relation to the visible world. Three features of Plato's view ought to be particularly noted, one of special significance for our subject: (1) While God is regarded by Plato as the integral power of the world, this world is formed by two stages: a Hellenistic and a Heb; or, more correctly, a pre-Christian and a Christian. The theory of Philo and of the Alexandrian thinkers generally may be regarded as the connecting link between the Gr and the Heb within the framework of the pre-Christian speculation on the subject is marked by the names of Heraclitus, Plato and the Stoics. Philo paves the way for the Christian doctrine of Paul, Hebrews and the Johannine Gospels.

4. Aristotle. — Aristotle sought to solve in the fundamental problem of Gr philosophy as to how behind the changing multiplicity of appearances an abiding Being is to be thought by means of the concept of development. Plato had regarded the Ideas as the causes of phenomena — causes different from the objects themselves. Aristotle's next step was to overcome the duality of Plato by representing reality as the essence which contains all the phenomena, and unfolds into the particular manifestations of the sensible world. This conception has exerted a powerful influence not only in philosophy but particularly upon the monotheistic view of the world. At the same time Aristotle's "noumenal" view, as in the "God" of Plato. Inasmuch as God was conceived as pure thought apart from the world in eternal blessedness, Aristotle did not succeed in resolving the duality of God and the universe which exercised the Gr mind.

5. Stoics. — Both in the realms of Nature and of duty. Interested more in ethical or physical problems, they were compelled to seek a general metaphysical basis for a rational moral life. Some unitary idea must be found which will overcome the duality between God and the world and remove the opposition between the sensuous and supersensuous which Plato and Aristotle had failed to reconcile. For this end the Logos-doctrine of Heraclitus seemed to present itself as the most satisfactory solution of the problem. The fundamental idea of the Stoics is the conceptual view that the entire universe forms a single living connected whole and that all particulars are the determinate forms assumed by the primitive power which they conceived as never-resting, all-pervading fire. This eternal activity or Divine world-power which contains within itself the conditions and processes of all things, they call Logos or God. More particularly as the productive power, the Deity is named the Logos creaturelogos, logos spermatikos, the Seminal Logos or generative principle of the world. This vital energy not only pervades the universe, but unfolds itself into innumerable logos spermatikoi or formative forces which energize the manifold phenomena of Nature and life. This subordination of the Logos not only constitutes the rational order of the universe but supplies a norm of duty for the regulation of the activities of life. Hence in the moral sphere to live according to Nature is the all-determining law of conduct.

II. Hebrew Anticipation of Doctrine. — So far we have traced the development of the Logos-doctrine in Gr philosophy. We have now to note a parallel movement in Heb thought. Though strictly and definitively correct to separate the Inner Reason from the outer expression in the Heb conception of the Hellenistic usage the doctrine was subst actually a doctrine of Reason, while in Jewish lit., it was more esp. the outward expression or word that was emphasized.

The sources of this conception are to be found in the OT and in the post-canonical literature. The God who is made known in Scripture is not the “Firstborn” one who actively reveals Revelation Himself. He is exhibited therefore of God (Ps 107:20); and generally as possessor of personal qualities (Isa 55:2; Ps 147:15). Revelation is frequently called “the Word of the Lord,” signifying the spoken as distinct from the written word.

In particular, we may note certain ambivalences of distinction of persons within the Being of God. It is contended that the phrase “Let us make” in Gen points to a plurality of persons in the Godhead. This indefinite language is more fully explained by the in Deity priestly ritual in Nu (6:23-26) and in the Psalter. In Jer, Ezr and the vision of Isa (6:2-8) the same idea of Divine plurality is implied, showing that the OT presented a doctrine of God far removed from the sterile monotheism of the Koran (cf. Liddon, Divinity of Our Lord, and König).

Passing from these indefinite intuitions of personal distinction in the Being of God, we may mention first that series of remarkable apparitions described as the “Angel of Jehovah” or of the “Commandant”; and secondly, the “Angel” whose appearance is sometimes identified with Jehovah (Gen 16:11-13; 32:29-31; Ex 3:2; 13:21), sometimes distinguished from Him (Gen 26:15; 24:7; 32:12); sometimes present in both aspects (Ex 3:6; Zec 1:11). Wisd. and God revealing Himself in this way to Abraham, Sarah, Lot, Hagar, Jacob, Moses, Joshua, Gideon, Manoah. Who was this angel? The earliest Fathers reply with general unanimity that He was the “Word” or “Son of God.” But while the earlier church teachers distinguished between the “Angel of the Lord” and the Father, the Arians sought to widen the distinction into a difference of natures, since an invisible Being must be held to be identifiable with a physical person. Augustine insists upon the Scriptural truth of the invisibility of God as God, the Son not being the Father. He was not present, however, to say which of the Divine persons manifested Himself in this or that instance; and his guidance has been followed by later teachers of the church, that is the theologians were not direct appearances of a Person of the Trinity, but through the mediation of God created being.

A further development of the conception of a personal medium of revelation is discernible in the description of Wisdom as given in some of the later books of the OT. The wisdom of Jewish wisdom is more than a human endowment or even an attribute of God, and may be said to attain almost to a personal reflex of the Deity, reminding us of the archetypal idea of Plato. In Job, wisdom is represented as existing in God and as communicated in its highest form to man. It is the eternal thought in which the Divine Architect ever beholds His future creation (Job 28:21-27). In Job 38:38 wisdom is revealed only as underlying the laws of the universe and not as wholly personal. In the Book of Prov it is coeternal with the Creation (Prov 3:22-23). It may be doubtful whether this is the language of a real person or only of a poetic personification. But sometimes the personified wisdom is inferred from the contents of the sapiential books outside the Canon. Sometimes it is existing from all eternity with the God. In Bar and still more in Wisd the Sophia is distinctly personal—"the very image of the goodness of God." In the apologetical books, supposed to the work of an Alexandrian writer before Philo, the influence of Gr thought is obvious, and only as an agent of the Word. Wisd and Manoah, the Angel in creation and judgment.

Finally in the Tgs., which were popular interpretations of the OT Scripture, there was a tendency to avoid anthropomorphic terms or such expressions in the concept of God's nature and manifestation. Here the three doctrines of the Word, the Angel, and Wisdom are introduced as mediating factors between God and the world. In particular the chiasm between the Divine and human is bridged by terms as m'shōrah ("word") and šekhelōn ("glory"). The m'shōrah proceeds from God, and is His messenger in Nature and history; but it is not the use of this expression implied the need of a Mediator, the Word does not seem to have been actually identified with the Messiah.

III. Alexandrian Synthesis. — We have seen that according to Gr thought the Logos was conceived as a rational principle or impersonal energy by means of which the world was fashioned and ordered, and while according to Heb thought the Logos was regarded as a mediating agent or personal organ of the Divine Being. The Hellenistic doctrine, in other words, was chiefly a doctrine of the Logos as Reason; the Jewish, a doctrine of the Logos as Word.

In the philosophy of Alexandria, of which Philo was an illustrious exponent, the two phases were combined, and Hellenistic speculation was united with Heb tradition for the purpose of showing that the OT taught the true philosophy and embodied all that was highest in Gr revelation. In Philo the two streams meet and flow henceforth in a common bed. The all-pervading Energy of Heraclitus, the archetypal Idea of Plato, the concept of Aristotle, the immanent Order of the Stoics are taken up and fused with the Jewish conception of Jehovah, who, while transcending all finite existences, is revealed through His intermediary Word. As the result of this Philonic synthesis, an entirely new idea of God is formulated. While Philo admits the eternity of matter, he rejects the Gr view that the world is eternal, since it denies the creative activity and providence of God. At the same time he departs from Heb thought that the Word was in the world, and is therefore compelled to connect the one with the other by the interposition of subordinate Powers. These Divine forces are the embodiment of the Ἰδέα, ἱδεία, of Plato and the Ἀγγέλος, ἄγγελος, of the OT. The double meaning of Logos—thought and speech—is made use of by Philo to explain the relation subsisting between the ideal world existing only in the mind of God and the sensible universe which is its visible embodiment. He distinguishes two Logos inherent in God (λόγος ἐνθυάτης, λόγος ἐνθυάτητος), corresponding to reason in man, and the Logos which emanates from God (λόγος προφητής, λόγος προφητικός), corresponding to the spoken Word as the Godhead in creation and revelation; and in His inner essence God is incomprehensible by any but Himself. He has created the intelligible cosmos by His self-activity. The Word is therefore in Philo the rational order manifested in the visible world.

Some special features of the Philonic Logos may be noted: (1) It is distinguished from God as the instrument from the Cause. (2) As instrument by which God makes the world, it is in its nature intermediate between God and man, and is the expression of God and the rational principle of the visible world, the Logos is "the Eldest or First-born Son of God." It is the "bond" (βιβρος, δεισις) holding together all things (De Mundi, i, 592), the law which determines the order of the universe and guides the destinies of men and nations (ib). Sometimes Philo calls it the "Man of God"; or the "Heavenly man," the immortal father of all noble men; sometimes he calls it "the Second God," "the Image of God," or "the Agent of God." From this it follows that the Logos must be the Mediator between God and man, the "Intersensor" (ἰσχευτης, hikithēs) or "High Priest," who is the ambassador from heaven and interprets God to man. Philo almost exhausts the vocabulary of Heb metaphor in describing the Logos. It is "manna," "bread from heaven," "the living stream," the "sword" of Paradise, the guiding "cloud," the "rock" in the wilderness. It is the name by which the NT describes Christ, and the later correlative of the NT descriptions of Christ, lead us to ask: Is Philo's Logos a personal being or a pure abstraction? Philo himself seems to waver in his answer, and the Greek and the Jew in him are hopelessly at issue. That he personifies the Logos is implied in the figures he uses; but to maintain its personality would have been inconsistent with Philo's whole view of God and the world. His Jewish faith inclines him to speak of the Logos as personal, while his Hellenism dispels the impression of an impersonal interpretation. Confronted with this alternative, the Alexandrian wavers in indecision. After all has been said, his Logos really resolves itself into a group of Divine ideas, and is conceived, not as a distinct person, but as the thought of God which is expressed in the rational order of the visible universe.

In the speculations of Philo, whose thought is so frequently couched in Bib. language, we have the gropings of a sincere mind after a truth which was disclosed in its fulness only by the revelation of Pentecost. In Philo, Gr. philosophy, as has been said, "stood almost at the door of the Christian church." But if the Alexandrian thinker could not create the Christian doctrine of the Logos, he prepared the soil for its acceptance. In this sense his Logos-doctrine has a real value in the evolution of Christian thought. Philo was not, indeed, the master of the apostles, but even if he did nothing more, he added to their treasures; and he has, whether indirectly or directly, determined the doctrine of Christendom.

IV. Christian Realization.—We pass now to consider the import of the term in the NT. Here it signifies usually "utterance," "speech" or "narrative." In reference to God it is used sometimes for a special utterance, or for revelation in general, and even for the medium of revelation—Holy Scripture. In the prologue of the Fourth Gospel it is identified with the personal Christ; and it is this employment of the term in the light of its past history which creates the interest of the problem of the NT doctrine.

The author of the Fourth Gospel is not, however, the first NT writer who represents Jesus as the Logos. Though Paul is the first, he does not actually use the word in this connection, Doctrine he has anticipated the Johannine conception. Christ is represented by St. Paul as before His advent living a life with God in heaven (Col 1 14; Rom 10 6). He is conceived as one in whose image earthly beings, and esp. men, were made (1 Cor 11 7; 15 45–49); and even as participating in the creation (1 Cor 8 6). In virtue of His distinct being He is called God's "own Son" (Rom 8 32).

Whether Paul was actually conversant with the writings of Philo is disputed (of Pfeiderer, Urchristentum), but already when he wrote to the Colossians and Ephesians the influence of Alexandrian speculation was being felt in the church. Incipient Gnosticism, which was an attempt to correlate Christianity with the order of the universe as a whole, was current. Most noticeable are the pointed allusions to gnostic watchwords in Eph 3 19 ("fulness of God") and in Col 2 3 ("Christ, in whom are all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge hidden"), where Paul shows that everything sought for in the doctrine of the Pleroma is really given in Christ. The chief object of these epistles is to assert the unique dignity and absolute power of the Person of Christ. He is the one to whom the Acorns which make up the Pleroma, as gnostic teachers affirm, but a real and personal Being in whom all the fulness of the Godhead dwells. He is not merely an inferior workman creating glory for a higher Master. He creates for Himself out of the fulness of His own being (Col 1 15–20). Though throughout this ep. the word "Logos" is never introduced, it is plain that the eikones, eikonon, of Paul is equivalent in rank and function to the Logos of John. Each exists prior to creation, each is equal to God, shares His life and cooperates in His work.

In the Ep. to the He we have an equally explicit, if not fuller, declaration of the eternal Deity of Christ. Whatever may be said of the Johannine author of the Ep. to the He, we are certain that he was familiar with the Phinean writings. Who this writer was we do not know; but his Philonism suggests that he may have been an Alexandrian Jew, possibly even a disciple of Philo. In language seemingly adapted from that source ("Son of God," "Firstborn," "above angels," "Image of God," "Agent in Creation," "Mediator," "Great High Priest," "Melchizedek") the author of the Ep. to the He speaks of Christ as a reflection of the majesty and immitot of the nature of God, just as in a seal the impression resembles the stamp. The dignity of His title indicates His essential rank. He is expressly addressed as God; and the expression "the effulgence of His glory" (1:14) seems to indicate that He is one with God (He 1 3). By Him the worlds have been made, and all things are upheld by the fiat of His word (ver 3). In the name He bears, in the honors ascribed to Him, in His relation to the Father, He is presented both to heaven and earth (ver 10), we recognize (in language which in the letter of it strongly reminds us of Philo, yet in its spirit so different) the description of one who though clothed with human nature is no mere subordinate being, but the possessor of all Divine prerogatives and the sharer of the very nature of God Himself.

In the Fourth Gospel the teaching of Paul and the author of the Ep. to the He finds its completest expression. The letter to the He stands in a sense half-way between Pauline and Johannean teaching" (Weizsäcker, Apos. Fourth tolic Age, V, 11). It is, however, too much to say that these three writers do not represent a single line of development. While all agree in emphasizing the fact of Christ's Divine personality and eternal being, Paul represents rather the religious interest, the Ep. to the He the philosophical. In the Johannine Christology the two elements are united.

In discussing the Johannine doctrine of the Logos we shall speak first of its content and secondly of its terminology.

1. Content of doctrine.—The evangelist uses "Logos" 6 t as a designation of the Divine preexistent person of Christ (Jn 1 14; 1 Jn 1 1; Rev 19 13), but he never puts it into the mouth of Christ. The idea which John sought to convey by this term was not essentially different from the conception of Christ as presented by Paul. But the use of the word gave a precise and emphasis to the being of Christ which the writer must have felt was esp. needed by the class of readers for whom his Gospel was intended. The Logos with whom the Fourth Gospel starts is a Person, Bishops of the Synoptics had long been familiar with the term "Word of God" as equivalent to the Gospel; but the essential purport of John's Word is Jesus Himself, His Person. We have here an essential change of meaning: one of the two is indeed connected; but the conception of the perfect revelation of God in the Gospel passes into

In the prologue (which, however, must not be regarded as independent of, or having no integral connection with, the rest of the book) there is stated: (a) the relation of the Logos to God; and (b) the relation of the Logos to the world.

(2) Relation of Logos to God: Here the author makes three distinct affirmations: (i) "In the beginning was the Word." The evangelist carries back the 'Word' to God to a point prior to all temporal things. Nothing is said of the origin of the world. As in Gen 1 1, so here there is only implied that the Logos was existent when the world began to be. When as yet nothing was, the Logos was. Though the eternal preexistence of the Word is not actually stated, it is implied. (ii) "The Word was with God." Here His personal existence is more specifically defined. He stands distinct from, yet in eternal fellowship with, God. The proposition ἦν, (βιβλίον) expresses beyond the fact of coexistence that of perpetual intercommunication. John would guard against the idea of mere self-contemplation on the one hand, and entire independence on the other. It is union, not fusion. (iii) "The Word was God." This was — not merely described but defined — God made manifest. "The Word was God" is essentially a preteristic statement of the doctrine itself and the source of the language. For it is possible that Alexandrian philosophy might have suggested the linguistic medium adopted, yet the Logos itself had another origin. Writers like Reuss, Keim, Holtzmann, Weizsäcker, Shedd, etc., who contended for the Alexandrian derivation of the prologue, are apt to overlook two considerations regarding the Johannine doctrine: (1) There is no essential difference between the teaching of John and that of the other apostolic writers; and even when the word "Logos" is not used, as in Paul's case, the view of Christ's person is virtually that which we find in the Fourth Gospel. (2) The Logos as a writer himself states there is himself suggested the further idea of communion. of this self-communion the evangelist mentions two phases—creation and revelation. The Word unites Himself through the mediation of objects of sense and also manifests Himself directly. Hence in this section of the prologue (vs 3-5) a threefold division also occurs. (i) He is the Creator of the visible universe. "All things were made through him"—a phrase which describes the Logos as the organ of the entire creative activity of God and expresses a chrestological idea also employed by Plato and Philo that God was only the architect who molded into cosmos previously existing matter. The term ἐγένετο, ἐγένετο (becomes, warden), implies the successive evolution of the world, a second-chance of the universe, it has a sense of growth or development. (ii) The Logos is also the source of the intellectual, moral and spiritual life of man. "In him was life; and the life was the light of men." He is the light as well as the life—the fountain of all the manifold forms of being and thought in and by whom all created things subsist, and from whom all derivate illumination (cf 1 Jn 1 1-3; also Col 1 17). But inasmuch as the higher phases of intelligent life involve freedom, the Divine Light, though perfect and undiminished in itself, was not comprehended by a world which chose darkness rather than light (vs 5.11). (iii) The climax of Divine revelation is expressed in the statement, "The Word became flesh," which implies on the one hand the reality of Christ's humanity, and, on the other, the voluntary Incarnation of His incarnation, but excludes the notion that in becoming man the Logos ceased to be God. Though cloathed in flesh, the Logos continues to be the self-manifesting God, and retains, even in human form, the character of God. But this third phase is embodied the highest manifestation of the Godhead. In physical creation the power of God is revealed. In the bestowal of light to mankind His wisdom is chiefly manifested. But in the third esp. is His love unveiled. All the perfec-tions of the Deity are focused and made visible in Christ—the "glory as of the only begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth" (Jn 1 14).

Thus the Word reveals the Divine essence. The incarnation makes the life, the light and the love which are eternally present in God manifest to men. As they meet in God, so do they meet in Christ. This is the glory which the disciples beheld; the truth to which the Baptist bore witness (ver 7); the fulness whereof His apostles received (ver 16); the entire body of grace and truth by which the Word gives to men the power to become the sons of God.

There is implied throughout that the Word is the Son. Each of these expressions taken separately have led and may lead us which But combined they correspondise misprints. On the one hand, their union protects the personal distinctness from, yet equal with, the Father—as the eternal logos was with God and was manifested to us.

(b) Relation of Logos to the world: The Logos is seen as the fountain of all the manifold forms of being and thought in and by whom all created things subsist, and from whom all derive illumination (cf 1 Jn 1 1-3; also Col 1 17). But inasmuch as the higher phases of intelligent life involve freedom, the Divine Light, though perfect and undiminished in itself, was not comprehended by a world which chose darkness rather than light (vs 5.11). (i) The climax of Divine revelation is expressed in the statement, "The Word became flesh," which implies on the one hand the reality of Christ's humanity, and, on the other, the voluntary Incarnation of His incarnation, but excludes the notion that in becoming man the Logos ceased to be God. Though cloathed in flesh, the Logos continues to be the self-manifesting God, and retains, even in human form, the character of God. But this third phase is embodied the highest manifestation of the Godhead. In physical creation the power of God is revealed. In the bestowal of light to mankind His wisdom is chiefly manifested. But

fec-tions of the Deity are focused and made visible in Christ—the "glory as of the only begotten from the Father, full of grace and truth" (Jn 1 14).

Thus the Word reveals the Divine essence. The incarnation makes the life, the light and the love which are eternally present in God manifest to men. As they meet in God, so do they meet in Christ. This is the glory which the disciples beheld; the truth to which the Baptist bore witness (ver 7); the fulness whereof His apostles received (ver 16); the entire body of grace and truth by which the Word gives to men the power to become the sons of God.

There is implied throughout that the Word is the Son. Each of these expressions taken separately have led and may lead us which But combined they correspondise misprints. On the one hand, their union protects the personal distinctness from, yet equal with, the Father—as the eternal logos was with God and was manifested to us.
with God Himself. In Rev 19:13, we have obviously an adoption of this Heb use of the phrase. Throughout the Gospel there is evinced a decided fondness to abstract thought, sympathy with Palestinian religion, and some expressions would seem to indicate the evangelist's desire to show that Jesus is the fulfillment of Jewish expectation (e.g. 1:14; 2:9; 3:31; 8:19; 3:14; 6:52-48; 50), and the living embodiment of Israel's truth (1:16; 8:12; 11:26; 14:6). But as against this it has been pointed out by Weizsäcker (Apostolischc Zeitartik) that the Word of God is not conceived in the OT as an independent Being, still less as equivalent for the Messiah, and that the true medium which identifies the memory with God is of much later date.

At the same time the Heb cast of thought of the Johannine Gospel and its affinities with Jewish rather than Hellenic modes of expression can hardly be gainsaid. Though John's knowledge of and sympathy with Palestinian religion may not actually account for his use of the term "Logos," it may have largely colored and directed his special application of it. For, as Neander observes, that name may have been put forward at Ephesus in order to lead those Jews who were busying themselves with speculations on the Logos as the center of all theo-phanies, to recognize in Christ the Supreme Revelation of God and the fulfillment of their Messianic hopes.

But, while the flesh imers trace the Johannine ideas and terms to Hellenic philosophy and particularly to Alexandrian influence as represented in Philo. No one can compare the Fourth Gospel with the writings of Philo without noting a remarkable similarity in diction, which may lead some to call it "Logos." It would be hazardous, however, on this ground alone to impute conscious borrowing to the evangelist. It is more probable that both the Alexandrian thinker and the NT writer were subjects of common influences of thought and expression. Hellenism largely colors the views and diction of the early church. St. Paul takes over many words from Gr philosophy. "There is not a single NT writing," says Harnack (Dogmen-Geschichte, I, 47, n.), "which does not betray the influence of the mode of thought and general culture which resulted from the Hellenizing of the East." But, while that is true, it must not be forgotten, as Harnack himself points out, "that while the writers of the NT breathe and are created by Gr culture, the religious ideas in which they live and move come to them from the OT."

It is hardly probable that St. John was directly acquainted with the writings of Philo. But it is more likely that he was acquainted with the general tenor of his teaching and may have discovered in the language which had floated over from Alexandria to Ephesus a suitable vehicle for the utterance of his own beliefs, esp. welcome and intelligible to those who were familiar with Alexandrian modes of thought. But whatever superficial resemblances there may be between Philo and St. John (and they are not few or vague), it must be at once evident that the whole spirit and view of life is fundamentally different. So far from the apostle being a disciple of the Alexandrian or a borrower of his ideas, it would be more correct to say that there is clearly a conscious rejection of the Philonic conception, and that the Logos of John is a deliberate protest against what he must have regarded as the inadequate and misleading philosophy of Greece.

(c) Contrast between Philo and John: The contrast between the two writers is much more striking than the resemblance. The distinction is not due merely to the acceptance of the Logos as the Word, but extends to the whole conception of God and His relation to the world which has made Christianity a new power among men. The Logos of Philo is metaphysical, that of John, religious. Philo moves entirely in the region of the abstract, the speculative; John's thought is concrete and active, moving in a region of life and history. Philo's Logos is intermediate, the instrument which God employs in fashioning the world; John's Logos is not subsidiary but is Himself God, and as such is not a more instrument, but the prime Agent in creation. According to Philo the Deity is conceived as an architect who forms the world out of already existing matter. According to John the Logos is absolute Creator of all that is, theProvider of all being, the Ground of all existence. In Philo the Logos moves between personality and impersonality, and if it is sometimes personified it can hardly be said to have the value of an actual person; in John the personality of the Logos is affirmed from the first and it is of the very essence of his doctrine, the ground of His entire creative energy. The idea of an incarnation is alien to the thought of Philo and impossible in his scheme of the universe; the "Word that has become flesh" is the pivot and center of Johannine teaching. Philo affirms the absolute transcendent immanence of God; but it is the prime object of the evangelist to declare that God is revealed in Christ and that the Logos is the unveiling through the Jewish Incarnation of the divine nature. Not withstanding the personal epithet employed by Philo, his Logos remains a pure abstraction or attribute of God, and it is never brought into relation with human history. John's Logos, on the other hand, is in touch with life and the world from the beginning, and it is the very heart of his Gospel to declare as the very center of life and history the great historical event of the incarnation which is to recreate the world and reunite God and man.

From whatever point of view we compare them, we find that Philo and St. John, while using the same language, give an entirely different value to it. The essential purport of the Johannine Logos is Jesus Christ. The adoption of the term involves its complete transformation. It is baptized with a new spirit and henceforth stands for a new conception. From whatsoever source it was originally derived—from Heb tradition or Hellenic speculation—on Christian soil it is a new product. It is neither Gr nor Jewish, it is Christian. The philosophical abstraction has become a religious conception. Hellenism and Hebrewism have been taken up and fused into a higher unity, and Christ as the embodiment of the Logos has become the creative power and the world-wide possession of mankind.

The most probable view is that Philo and John found the same term current in Jewish and gentile circles and used it to set forth their respective ideas; Philo, following his predilections for Gr philosophy, to give a Hellenic complexion to his theory of the relation of Divine Reason to the universe; John, true to his Heb instincts, seeing in the Logos the climax of that revelation of God to man of which the earlier Jewish theophanies were but partial expressions.

There is nothing improbable in the surmise that the teaching of Philo gave a fresh impulse to the study of the Logos as Divine Reason which was already shadowed forth in the Bib. We therefore need not take offense that such a important idea should have come to the Bib, author from an extra-Bib, writer like Philo. It is no different from the possibility that the author of the Johannine Gospel was no mechanical borrower, but an entirely independent and original thinker who gave to the Logos and the ideas associated with it a wholly new worth and interpretation. Thus, as has been said, the terms of Greece were made contributory to the full unfolding of the Gospel.
circles and among the early Fathers regarding the nature of the Christ. The positive truth presented by the Fourth Gospel was once more broken up, and the various elements were given a number of a partial and one-sided theories respecting the relation of the Father and the Son. The influence of Gnosticism, already begun in the Apostolic Age, became more pronounced and largely shaped the current of ante-Nicene theology (see Hatch, Hibbert Lectures). In this conflict, the battle was a failure to reconcile Christianity with philosophy; but in gnostic systems the teaching was by no means unimportantly employed: according to Basilides the ‘Logos’ was an emanation from the nous as personified Wisdom, which again was directly derived from the Father, into whose substance it united. Gnostic philosophy was taught. In the Logos of the Wise, the spirit of the Father was supposed to unite the Scriptural idea of the Logos as Word with the Heilige Idea of Reason. According to him God produced in His own nature a rational power which was His agent in creation and took the form in history of the Divine Christ. Christ is the rational Word, as the λόγος σωματικὸς, λόγος σαματικός; He sows the seeds of virtue and truth among the human race, and that is true and beautiful in the pagan world, is to be traced to the activity of the Logos before His incarnation. Tatian and Theophilus taught essentially the same doctrine; though Tatian there is a marked leaning toward man. Consequently, a tendency to separate the ideal from the historical Christ. Athenagoras, who ascribes to the Logos the creation of all things, reads of the double sense of the reason of God. Logos, the creative energy of the world, has a firm grasp of the Bible, he says, this truth was more clearly expressed by Irenaeus, who held that the Son was the essential Word, eternally begotten of the Father and at once the Interpreter of the Word, the Divine Logos. The Alexandrian school was shaped by the threefold impact of Pauline and the Johannine Gospel. Clement of Alexandria views the Son as the Logos of the Father, the Fountain of all intelligence, the Revealer of the Divine Being and the Instructor of mankind. He repudiates the idea of the inferiority of the Logos as an emanation of the Father, and as the creative Word. Origens reconciles the two ideas of the eternity and the subordination of the Logos, and here he means as a mediator between the Father and Son. The idea of Innocence practically gathered up the divergent views of the past and established the teaching of the Logos of the Church. The Logos distinguishes the Father, and the Logos is: the God theos (θεός): God Himself; λόγος: the Logos is a second God (λόγος Θεός, δύον Θεός: the Logos and the Father). In the Nicean Age, under the shaping influence of the powerful mind of Athanasius, and, to a lesser degree, of Basil and the two Gregories, the Logos-doctrine attained its final form in the Nicene Creed. The Nicene Creed was the declaration of the unity, but, at the same time, the separation of God and the Son. The Father and Son. Council of Nicea practically gathered up the divergent views of the past and established the teaching of the Logos of the Church.

In these various modes of expressing the loins as the seat of strength and vigor (Job 40 16, Heb mōthān, here used of Behemoth), the center of procreative power, the portion of the body which is girded about, and is considered as specially needful of covering, even under primitive conditions of life (Job 31 20), and where painful disease most effectually unites a man for work and warfare. Jacob receives the Divine promise that "kings shall come out of the loins of David" (Gen 49 10), and we read of 66 souls "that came out of his loins" (yārubâk) which went into Egypt (46 26). The Ep. to the Hebrews speaks the Levites as having come out of the loins of Abraham (He 7 5).

As the seat of strength of (Lois; Tisōn), the loins are girded with belts of leather (2 K 1 8; Mt 3 4), or cloth, often beautifully embroidered (Ex 28 39), or of costly material (39 39; Jer 13 11). Girded loins are a sign of readiness for service or endeavor (Ex 12 11; 1 K 18 46; 2 K 4 29; Job 38 3); Prov 31 17; Lk 12 35; 1 Pet 1 13). Of God it is said that "he loosed the bond of kings, and bade his loins with a girdle," i.e. strengthens them (Job 12 18). On the loins the sword is fixed (1 K 18 23; S 20 24). The loins are girded with a sash (1 K 20 32; Isa 36 11; Jer 48 37; Am 8 10; see also the First Papyrus of Elephantine, I. 20). A man whose strength is in his attachment to truth, in other words is faithful, is spoken of as having his girdle about with truth (Eph 6 14). To the Messiah is described: "Righteousness shall be the girdle of his waist, and faithfulness the girdle of his loins" (Isa 11 5). One of the most primitive modes of clothing consisted of a skin or a leather girdle round the loins (Job 31 20).

The condition of unfitness for service is described in that the loins (κοῖλος) are filled with a burning (Ps 38 7, AV "loathsome disease"), or that "a sore burden" is laid upon the "loins" (mōthēn, 66 11). Thus the loins are made "continually to shake" (69 23). "The joints of [the] loins" (hōrak) are loosed (Dn 5 6), the "loins are filled with anguish" (Isa 21 3). It is very likely that originally a disabling lumbago or the painful affections of the gall or the bladder (ėnlōs, etc.) are meant, but the expression becomes merely metaphorical, as expressing personal helplessness, esp. that which can but rely upon assistance and help from God.

LOIS, λόις (Ἀλάτης, Lātēs [2 Timothy 2 3]): the grand-mother of Timothy, and evidently the mother of Eunice, Timothy's mother. The family lived at Lystra (Acts 16 1). It was on the occasion of Paul's first missionary journey (Acts 14) that Eunice and Timothy were converted to Christ, and it was, in all likelihood, on the same occasion that Lois also became a Christian. Paul speaks of the unfeigned faith that there was in Timothy, and he adds that this faith dwelt at the first in "thy grandmother Lois, and thy mother Eunice," and he declared it as the only passage where Lois is mentioned; but by comparing 2 Tim 1 5 with 2 Tim 3 15 (AV), where Paul refers to Timothy's having from a child known the holy scriptures, it would appear that Lois was associated with Eunice, both in a reverent faith in God and in the careful instruction in the word which the OT was given to Timothy. Longsuffering

Lord's Day

Alex, Macalister

Longsuffering, long-suffering (ἡ σ διακαταρχή, 'erekh 'appyqim; πατριάσεως, makrothumia). The word is a compound of 'erekh, 'erakh (nose, nostrils, "long of nose" or "breathing"), and, as anger was indicated by rapid, violent breathing through the nostrils, "long of anger," or "slow to wrath.

The adj. is applied to God (Ex 34 6 AV, in the name of Jeh as proclaimed to Moses: Nu 14 18 AV; Ps 86 15 AV; RV "slow to anger," which is also the tr. in other places; AV and RV Neh 9 17; Ps 103 8; 145 8; Prov 15 18; 16 32; Joel 2 13; Jon 4 2; Nah 1 9): it is associated with "great kindness" and "plenteous in mercy.

The subst. occurs in Jer 15 15: "Take me not away in thy longsuffering." In Eccl 7 8, we have 'erekh rēqāh, AV and RV "patient in spirit.

The word in the NT rendered "longsuffering," makrothumia (once makrothumētēs, "to be long-suffering"), which is the rendering of 'erekh 'appyqim in the LXX, is lit. "long of mind or soul" (regarded as the seat of the emotions), opposed to shortness of mind or soul, irascibility, impatience, intolerance. It is "looking after" to God (Rom 2 21; 2 Pet 3 9), of His bearing long with sinners andslowness to execute judgment on them. It is, therefore, one of "the fruits of the Spirit" in man (Gal 5 22) which Christians are frequently exhorted to cherish and show one toward the other (Eph 4 2; Col 1 11; 3 12, etc); it belongs, Paul says, to the love, without which all else is nothing: "Love suffereth long [makrothumētēs], and is kind" (1 Cor 13 4).

The vb. makrothumētētai is sometimes tr. by "patience" (Mt 18 26,27; "Have patience with me"); Lk 18 7 has been variously rendered: AV has "And shall not God avenge his own elect . . . though he bear long with them?" RV "yet and he is longsuffering over them," ARV "and is slow to punish on their behalf?"

According to Trench (Synonyms of the NT, 189), the difference between hupomōnētēs ("patience") and makrothumia is that the latter word expresses patience in respect to persons, and the former in respect to things: hence hupomōnētēs is never ascribed to God: where He is called "the God of patience," it is as He gives it to His servants and saints. But in Jas 5 7 it is used with reference to things, and in Col 1 11 it is associated with patience (cf He 12 1,2); suffering endurance is ascribed to God: in Col 1 11 it is also associated with "joy," indicating that it is not a mere submission, but a joyful acceptance of the will of God, whatever it may be. In Wisd 15 1; Ecclus 5 4, we have "longsuffering (makrothumētēs) ascribed to God; also in Ecclus 5 11, RV "mercy."

LOOP, lōōp (in pl. ἱλικόοι, līlēkō'ē; ἱλική thē līlēkē [Ex 26 4 f. 10 f.; 36 11 f.17]): A ring or fold made of blue thread to fasten into the corresponding golden clasps, or taches upon the curtains of the tabernacle, joining them in sets, or pairs. See TABERNACLE.

LORD, lord, THE LORD: This Eng. word in our Bible represents one Aram., 3 Gr and 9 Heb words, two of them in two forms. It thus expresses all grades of dignity, honor, and majesty. It is not always possible to be sure of the sense in which the term is to be taken. In Gen 18 3; 19 18, the translators waver between interpreting of the Divine Person and a finite angel (cf marginal readings). It represents the most sacred Heb name for God, as their covenant God, Yāh, Yahuwah, and the more usual designation of Deity, 'Adhānāy, 'Adhān, a term which they adopted to avoid announcing the most holy designation. They had placed on Lev 24 16 an interpretation that aroused such a dread that they seldom dared use the name at all. When two of the usual words usually rendered "Lord," both referring to God, occur together, AV renders "Lord God," and ARV "Lord Jehovah." AV has adopted the rule of using the covenant name transliterated, instead of the term "Lord," in which AV adopts the rule of the Hebrews to avoid the holy name. The Aram. designation, Mārē', occurs only in Dúl (e.g. 2 47; 5 23), and the same word refers to a man (4 24). Of the Gr words, Kuriós is freely used of both the Deity and men. Despótes, of men in classical usage, occurs only of God, including the ascended Jesus, and is employed only 5 t. Megístēnés (pl.) is found once, of men (Mk 8 21). Rabboni (Heb in Gr letters) is applied only to the Christ, and is simply transliterated in RV, but rendered "Lord" in AV (cf Mk 10 51).

Our Eng. VSS distinguish the 3 main uses of the term thus: (1) "Lord" represents the Heb Yahweh, LX X Kuriós, except where 'Adhānāy or 'Adhān is connected with Yāhweh (= "Lord God"); AV has in these examples employed the name as it is found in the Heb, simply transliterated. (2) "Lord" corresponds to 'Adhānāy, 'Adhān, Mārē', also Gr Kuriós (see [1]), and Despótes, for which AV has always "Master" in either the text or the margin. (3) "Lord" ("Lord") translates all the remaining 8 Heb words and the Gr words except Despótes. It is thus seen that Kuriós corresponds to all 3 forms of writing the Eng. term. See JEHOWAH.

LORD OF HOSTS: A title or name of God frequently used in the OT, always tr "Jeh of Hosts" (יְהוָה מִלְוָיָא Yhōvāh milōyāh), Yhōvāh gbdâ'ōth in ARV, since Yhōvāh, never 'Adhānāy, is used in this phrase. Evidently the meaning of the title is that all created agencies and forces are under the leadership or dominion of Jeh, who made and maintains them (Gen 2 2; Isa 46 12). It is used to express Jeh's great power. See GOD, NAMES OF, III, 8.

LORD'S DAY (ἡ κυριακή ημέρα, hé kuriakē hēmērā): Formerly it was supposed that the adj. kuriakos (tr "the Lord's") was purely Christian word, but recent dictionary covers have proved that it was fairly common use in the Rom Empire before Christian influence had been felt. In secular use it signified "imperial," "belonging to the lord"—the emperor—and so its adoption by Christianity in the sense "belonging to the Lord!"—to Christ—was perfectly easy. Indeed, there is reason to suppose that in the days of Domitian, when the issue had been sharply defined between "Jeh or Caesar or Christ?" the use of the adj. by the church was a part of the protest against Caesar-worship (see LXX). And it is even possible that the full phrase, "the Lord's day," was coined as a contrast to the phrase, "the Augustean day," a term that seems to have been used in some parts of the Empire to denote days esp. dedicated in honor of Caesar-worship.

"Lord's day" in the NT occurs only in Rev 1 10, but in the post-apostolic literature we have the following references: Ignatius, Ad Mag., ix, 1, "No longer keeping the Apostolic Sabbath but living according to the Lord's day, on which also our Light arose"; Ep. Pet., ver 35, "The Lord's day began to dawn" (cf Mt 28 1); ver 50, "early on the Lord's day" (cf Lk 24 1); Barn 15 9, "We keep the eighth day with gladness," on which Jesus arose from the dead." I.e. Sunday, as the day of Christ's resurrection, was kept as a Christian feast and called "the Lord's day," a title first adopted by the author of Ep. Pet., introduced by phrases from the canonical Gospels. Its appropriateness in Rev 1 10 is obvious, as St. John received his vision of the exalted Lord when all Christians had their minds directed toward His entrance into glory through the resurrection. This "first day of the week" appears again in Acts 20 7 as the day on which the worship of the "breaking of bread" took place, and the impression given is that in the context it is that St. Paul and his companions prolonged their visit to Troas so as to join in the service. Again, 1 Cor 16 2 contains the command, "Upon the first day of the week let each one of you lay by him in store," where the force of the form of the imperative used (the present for repeated action) would be better represented in Eng. by "day by on the successive Sundays." Worship is here not explicitly mentioned as an act, but the context of "by him" is the usual phrase for "at home!", but that the appropriateness of the day for Christian acts involves an appropriateness for Christian worship is not to be doubted. Indeed, since the seven-day week was unknown to Gr thought, the regular observance of a hebdomadal cycle must have been settled at Corinth before St. Paul could write his command. Finally, the phrase, "first day in the week" is found elsewhere in the NT only in Mt 28 1; Mk 16 2; Lk 24 1; Jn 20 19. The word in all passages for "first" is poor Gr (μέ, mia, "one") for πρώτος, protōs, a Hebraism), and the coincidence of the form of the phrase in Acts 20 7 and 1 Cor 16 2 with the form used by all four evangelists for the Resurrection Day is certainly not accidental; it was the fixed Christian base, just as "Lord's day" was to the writer of Ep. Pet.

The hebdomadal observance of Sunday points back to Corinth to Jewish-Christian soil, but it is impossible to say when the custom began. Not, apparently, in the earliest days, for Acts 2 46 represents the special worship as daily. But this could not have continued very long, for waning of the first enthusiasm, necessity of pursuing ordinary avocations, and increment in number of those who have made general daily gatherings impracticable. A choice of a special day must have become necessary, and this day would, of course, have been Sunday. Doubtless, however, certain individuals and communities continued the daily gatherings to a much later date, and the appearance of Sunday as the one distinctive day for worship was almost certainly gradual.

Sunday, however, was sharply distinguished from the Sabbath, and by the second day on which was Sabbath

5. Sabbath form, the other was a day of ritual and the Sabbath subject to the Law of Moses through circumcision (Gal 5 3; Acts 21 20). Uncircumcised Gentiles, however, were free from any obligation of Sabbath observance, and it is quite certain that in apostolic times no renewal of any Sabbath rules or transfer of them to Sunday was made for gentle converts. No observance of a particular "day of rest" is contained among the "necessary things" of Acts 15 28,29; nor is any such precept found among all the varied moral directions given in the whole epistolary literature. Quite on the contrary, the observance of a given day as a matter of law or obligation is denounced by St. Paul as a forsaking of Christ (Gal 4 10), and Sabbath-keeping is condemned explicitly in Col 2 16. As a matter of individual devotion, to be sure, a man might do as he pleased (Rom 14 5-6), but no such rule necessary for salvation could be compatible with the liberty wherewith Christ has made us free. Evidently, then, the fact that the Christian worship was held on Sunday did not sanctify Sunday any more than (say) a regular Wednesday service among us sanctifies Wednesday day, noting esp. that the apostolic service was held in the evening. For it was felt that Christian enthusiasm would raise every day to the highest religious plane the decay of that enthusiasm through the long delay of the Parousia not being contemplated.

The delay occurred, however, and for human beings in the ordinary routine of life there are necessary not only set periods of worship, but the Christian fundamental doctrine of mercy demands that Christianity, where she has the power, shall give to men relief from the drain of continuous toil.

The formulation of general rules to carry these principles into effect, however, belongs to a period outside NT times, and does not enter into the scope of this Encyclopaedia. It is enough to say that the ecclesiastical rules for Sunday were left to be quite distinct from the Jewish observance, and that Aelius (763 804) is the first to hold that the church had transferred the day from Saturday to Sunday. This principle is still maintained in Roman Catholic theology, but at the Reformation was rejected uncompromisingly by both Zwingli (Helvet. Conf. 11 7) and Calvinists (Helvet. Conf. XXIV 1-2) in favor of a literally apostolic freedom (Calvin even proposed to adopt Thursday in place of Sunday). The appearance of the opposite extreme of a genuinely "legalistic" Sabbatharianism in the thoroughly Evangelical Scotch and English Puritanism is an anomaly that is explained by reaction from the excesses of the surroundings.

Sunday was fixed as the day for Christian worship by general apostolic practice, and the academic possibility of an alteration hardly seems worth discussing. If a literal apostolicity is to be entertained, however, the "breaking of bread" must be part of the Sunday service. Rest from labor for the sake of worship, public and private, is intensely desirable, since the regimen of the general apostolic enthusiasm seems unattainable, but the NT leaves us quite free as to details. Rest from labor to secure physical and mental renewal rests on a still different basis, and the working out of details involves a knowledge of sociological and industrial conditions, as well as a knowledge of religious principles. It is the task of the pastor to combine the various principles and to apply them to the particular conditions of his people in their locality, in accordance with his own church has found habitably the right to lay down—very special attention being given, however, to the highly important matter of the peculiar service offered to children. In all cases the general principles underlying the rules should be made clear, so that they will not appear as arbitrary legislation, and it is probably better not to use the term "Sabbath" for Sunday. Under certain conditions great freedom may be desirable, and yet be inconsistent with our liberty in Christ. But experience, and not least of all the experience of the first churches of the Reformation, in Saxony particularly, shows us that general laxity in Sunday rules invariably results disastrously. See further, Entries of Jesus, 1, 3, (1).

LORD'S PRAYER, THE (Mt 6 9-13; Lk 11 2-4): Prayer occupied an important place in the life and the teachings of Jesus. He was emphatically a man of prayer, praying frequently in private and in public, and frequently spending whole nights in communion with His heavenly Father. He often spoke to His disciples on the subject of prayer, cautioning them against ostentation, or urging perseverance, faith and large expectation, and He gave them a model of devotion in the Lord's prayer.

This prayer is given by the evangelists in two different forms and in two entirely different connections. In Mt's account the prayer is given as a part of the Sermon on the Mount and in connection with a criticism of the ostentation usual in the prayers of the hypocrites and the heathen. Lk introduces the prayer after the Galilean ministry and represents it as given in response to a request from one of His disciples, "Lord teach us to pray, as John taught his disciples." It gives us, however, no note of time or place, and it is quite possible that the incident which it records took place much earlier. The later form is much shorter than that of Mt and the common parts differ materially in language.

In view of the differences, the reader instinctively inquires whether the prayer was given on different occasions in these different connections, or the evangelists have presented the same incident in forms derived from different sources, or modified the common source to suit their immediate purposes.

If the prayer was given only on one occasion, there is little doubt that Lk preserved the earlier tradition. If the prayer bears every mark of historical circumstance, though not necessarily the accurate point of time or place, or the exact form of language. Such a request made at the close of the prayer of Jesus would be natural, and the incident bears every mark of historical authenticity. On the other hand, it would be reasonable to assume that the author of Mt's source, remembering the incident, incorporated the prayer in the Sermon on the Mount as an illustration of the injunctions concerning prayer.

There are many reasons for regarding the Sermon as a collection of sayings spoken on different occasions and summarized for convenience in teaching and memorizing. Thus He, however, no proof that the prayer was given but once by Jesus. We need not suppose that His disciples were always the same, and we know that He gave instruction in prayer on various occasions. He may have given the model prayer on one occasion spontaneously and at another at the request of His disciples. It is probable that the two evangelists, using the same or different sources, presented the prayer in such connection as best suited the plan of their narratives. In any case, it is rather remarkable that the prayer is not quoted or directly mentioned anywhere else in the NT.

In addition to the opening salutation, "Our Father who art in heaven," the Lord's Prayer consists of six petitions. These are arranged in three equal parts. In the first part, the thought is directed to God and His great purposes. In the second part, the attention is directed to our condition and wants. The two sets of

Lord's Supper
1920
are closely related, and a line of process runs through the whole prayer. The petitions of the first part are inseparable, as each includes the one which follows. As the hallowing of God's name requires the coming of His kingdom, so the kingdom comes in His will. Again, the first part calls for the second, for if His will is to be done by us, we must have sustenance, forgiveness and deliverance from evil. If we seek first the glory of God, the end requires our good. While we have His name we are not satisfied in Him. The doxology of Mt and our rituals is not found in the leading MSS and is generally regarded as an ancient liturgical addition. For this reason it is omitted by RV.

The sources of the two accounts cannot be known with certainty. It is hardly correct to say that one account is more original than the other. The original was spoken in Aram., while both of the reports are certainly based on Gr sources. The general agreement in language, esp. in the use of the unique term πρόσωπον, επιφάνεια, shows that they are not independent of the Aram. original.

Three expressions of the prayer deserve special notice. The Greek Our Father, "abba," are new in the Bible and in the world. When God is called Father in the OT, He is re-expressed as Father of the nation, not of the individual. Even in the moving prayer of Isa 63 16 (AV), " Doubly hast thou art our father," the connection makes clear that the reference is to God in the capacity of Creator. The thought of God as the Father of the individual is first reached in the Apoc: O Lord, Father and Mother of my life. Lk 2 11; Jn 3 16. Here also the notion is veiled in the thought of God as Creator. It was left for Jesus the Son to give us the privilege of calling God "Our Father."

Of the adj. ἐπιφάνεια, "daily" or "needful," neither the origin nor the exact meaning is or likely to be known. Whether it is qualitative or temporal depends on its derivation from τρικύλια, επιφανεια, or τρικύλια, επιφανεια. Our translators usually follow the latter, translating "daily." ARV gives "needful" as a marginal rendering. The phrase ἐπιτρίπτω να, and τοι πάντως, is equally ambiguous. Since the adj. may be either masc. or neut., it is impossible to decide whether "from the evil one" or "from the evil" was intended. The probability is in favor of the masc. The essential nature of thought of evil in the concrete, just as we think of it in the abstract. For this reason the Authorized rendering "from evil" is more real to us. The evil deprecated is moral, not physical.

The Lord's Prayer was given as a lesson in prayer. As such this simple model surpasses all precepts about prayer. It suggests to the child of God the proper objects of prayer. It supplies suitable forms of language and illustrates the simple and direct manner in which we may trustfully address our heavenly Father. It embraces the elements of all spiritual desire summed up in a few choice sentences. For those who are not able to bring their struggling desires to birth in articulate language it provides the true form. To the immature disciple it ever unfolds with richer depths of meaning. Though we learn these words at our mother's knee, we need a lifetime to fill them with meaning and all eternity to realize their answer.

Liturgy. The lit. of this subject is very extensive. For brief treatment the student will consult the relative sections in the comms, on the Gospels of Mt and Lk, on the Lives of Christ and the arts, on the Lord's Prayer in the several Bible diets. A collection of patristic comment is given by C. Tillmann in his Das Gebet nach der Lehre der Heiligen dargestellt, 2 vols., Freiburg, 1876. The original comments may be found in any of the standard collections of the Church Fathers.

LITERATURE
I. Definition.—Eucharist.—The distinctive rite of Christian worship, instituted by Our Lord Jesus Christ upon the eve of His atoning death, being a religious partaking of bread and wine, which, having been presented before God the Father in thankful memorial of Christ's inexpressible sacrifice, have become (through the sacramental blessing) the communion of the body and blood of Christ (cf. Acts 2 42; 1 Cor 10 16; 11 23-26).

II. The NT Sources.—The NT sources of our knowledge of the institution of the Eucharist are fourfold, a brief account thereof being found in each of the Synoptic Gospels and in St. Paul's First Ep. to the Cor. (Mt 26 26-29; Mk 14 22-25; Lk 22 14-20; 1 Cor 11 23-26; cf. 10 16).

The text of these narratives has been found to need little amendment, save the dropping of a word or two, from each account, according to the tendency of copyists, conspicuously or unconspicuously, to assimilate the details of parallel passages. The genuineness of Lk 22 19-20 is absolutely beyond question. Their omission in whole or part, and the alterations in the order of two or three verses in the whole section (vs 14-20), characteristically of a very small number of MSS, are due to confusion in the minds of a few scribes and translators, between the paschal cup (ver 17) and the eucharistic cup (ver 20), and to their well-meaning, but mistaken, attempt to impose the text before them.

The briefest account of the institution of the Eucharist is found in Mk 14:22-24. In it the Eucharist is not shown to come from its serving, the paschal meal: "And as they were eating, he took bread, and when he had blessed it, he brake it, and gave to them, and said, This is my body, which is for you. This is the new covenant in my blood: this do in remembrance of me."

The narrative given in Lk 22:14-20 is the latest (c 80-90) of our records. St. Luke had taken pains to follow up everything to its source, and had redacted the story with the height of his historical research (1:1-4), and thus his account is of the highest value. Writing for a wider circle of readers, he carefully separates the Eucharist from the paschal meal which preceded it, and puts the statement of the new covenant in the personal command, "Drink ye all of it, in place of the mere statement, and they all drank of it." He adds also of the blood that "poured out for many." It is "unto remission of sins."

The Pauline account, 1 Cor 11:23-25 (the earliest written down, c. 65 AD), was called forth in rebuke of the scandalous profligacy of the Eucharist at Corinth. It gives us another tradition independent of, and supplementary to, that of Mk-Mt. It claims the authority of the Saviour as its source, and had been already made known to the Corinthians in the apostle's oral teaching. The time of the institution is mentioned as the night of the betrayal. We note of the bread, "This is my body, which is for you," of the cup, "This cup is the new covenant in my blood: this do in remembrance of me."

The institution of the Eucharist had been prepared for by Christ through the object-lesson of the feeding of the five thousand (Mt 14:13-21; Mk 6:35-44; Lk 9:12-17; Jn 6:1-15), which was followed up by the discourse about His Passion (Mt 26:26-29; Mk 14:22-26; Lk 22:15-20; Jn 13:14-30). This was the object-lesson of the sacrifice. Salvation is a sacrifice, and salvation is of the Cross. The sacrifice of the Cross was made for the remission of sins (Rom 3:25, 26). It is the sacrifice of the new covenant. It is the sacrifice of the Blood of Christ, and of the Eucharist. The sacrifice of the Blood of Christ, of the Eucharist, is to be lived out daily by the Church. The Church is the sacrifice of the Blood of Christ, the sacrifice of the Eucharist.

In the discourse at Capernaum (Jn 6:26-59), Christ warned His hearers from eating heavenly food, from food that perished to the true bread from heaven. He declared Himself to be the living bread, and further, that it is through His flesh and drinking His blood that their sins are forgiven and cleansed by Him at the last day.

2. The Discourse

The difficulties raised by this discourse do not all solve at the time. His ascension would but add to them. He asked of His disciples acceptance of His flesh in faith. Under the administration of the Spirit would these things be realized (60-69). The institution of the Eucharist, later, gave the clue to these otherwise "hard" words. Today the Eucharist remains as to explain and prove the words. A hard maintainer, e.g., who had read Jn 6 many times, could form no notion of its purport. When first privileged to be present at the eucharistic service of the Book of Common Prayer, the meaning of feeding upon Christ's flesh and blood forthwith became apparent to him (see The Spirit of Missions, July, 1911, 572-73).

IV. Historical Setting of the Eucharist.—We should note the setting in which the institution of the Eucharist was placed. Though the Fourth Gospel does not record this, it gives us many otherwise unknown data of the words of Christ spoken upon the eve of His death, in which historically the institution of the Eucharist was set.

The symbolic washing of the disciples (Jn 13:3-10), the "new" commandment (ver 34), Christ as the means of access to the Father (14:6), love for Christ to be shown by keeping His commandments (16:23, 24), the sending of the Paraclete Spirit (ver 16:17, 26; 16:13, 14), the intimate fellowship of Christ and His disciples, shown in the metaphor of the vine and its branches (15:1-13-16)—all these throw their illumination upon the commandment. This do in remembrance of me (Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24, 25). The efficacy of prayer (in Christ's name) (Jn 16:23, 24-26-28) after His final withdrawal from the midst of His disciples, and His great prayer of self-oblation and intercession for His church throughout time (Jn 17, esp. 9-26) must not be forgotten in considering, "This is my body which is given for you" (Lk 22:19), and, "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many unto remission of sins" (Mt 26:28).

The sacrificial connotation of many of the words used in the narratives of the institution would be noted: e.g. "body," "blood," "covenant," "given," "poured out," "for you," "for my church." The words are "unto remission of sins." "Memorial" (Ex 24:7, 8, Lev 23:16, 17; Ex 5:16-18; Jn 11:14, 24:7; Nu 10:10; He 9:11-12; 10:4-10.19, 20). The very elements of bread and wine also suggested the idea of sacrifice to those accustomed to their use in the older system of worship (Ex 29:38-42; Nu 15:4-10; 28:29 and 39). The Bread of Life, and about eating His Flesh and drinking His Blood as the nourishment of eternal life. This was again clinched by the second object-lesson of the feeding of the four thousand afterward (Mt 16:22-23; Mk 8:19-29). The Lord's yearning, and His blessing of the loaves and fishes—acts not elsewhere recorded of Him, except at the institution of the Eucharist, and at the self-revealing meal at Emmaus (Lk 24:30)—deeply impressed the disciples. Thus the presence could say of His power to satisfy the hunger of the multitude (Mt 14:19; 15:36; Mk 6:41; 8:6, 7; Lk 16:9; Jn 6:11, 23).

In the discourse at Capernaum (Jn 6:26-58) Christ also taught of His Bread coming from heaven, the heavenly food, from food that perished to the true bread from heaven. He declared Himself to be the living bread, and further, that it is through eating His flesh and drinking His blood that their sins are forgiven and cleansed by Him at the last day.

2. The Discourse

The difficulties raised by this discourse do not all solve at the time. His ascension would but add to them. He asked of His disciples acceptance of His flesh in faith. Under the administration of the Spirit would these things be realized (60-69). The institution of the Eucharist, later, gave the clue to these otherwise "hard" words. Today the Eucharist remains as to explain and prove the words. A hard maintainer, e.g., who had read Jn 6 many times, could form no notion of its purport. When first privileged to be present at the eucharistic service of the Book of Common Prayer, the meaning of feeding upon Christ's flesh and blood forthwith became apparent to him (see The Spirit of Missions, July, 1911, 572-73).
whether he died upon the day of its observance (see art. "Preparation," DCG, II, 409). The Passover was at once a covenant-recalling and a covenant-renewing sacrifice, and the Lord's Supper, as corresponding to it, was at once a remembrance of the Passover and a new covenant, of which the elements were bread and wine, or the bread and wine or the consecrated elements themselves (cf. "gave thanks" of the institution and was the most widely used term in primitive times, as applied to the whole service, to the whole observance). In this case it may be observed that bread and wine or to the consecrated elements themselves (of the bread and wine or to the consecrated elements themselves (of the Eucharist) 3. Names (Acts 2 Eucharist 42: 20. 7.11) had little vogue after NT times. "Communion" obviously is derived from 1 Cor 10. 16.

In connection with the early and frequent use of the word "oblation" (præsbyter) and its cognates, we should note St. Paul's description of his ministry in terms that suggest the rationale of the prayer of consecration, or eucharistic prayer, as we know it in the earliest liturgical tradition: that I should be a minister of Christ's death unto the Gentiles, ministering the gospel of God, that the offering up of the Gentiles might be acceptable, being sanctified by the Holy Spirit" (Rom 15: 16).

VII. Post-apostolic Church.—The same Spirit who guided the church in the determination of the Canon of the NT Scriptures, the same Spirit who guided the church in the working out of her explicit formulation of the Christian doctrine of the Godhead, and of the Christ—that same Spirit guided the church in the formation and fashioning of her great eucharistic prayer into its present form, in the spirit of the covenant, summoning all of the East, by their faithful adherence to this norm, have been almost undisturbed by the dissensions and disputes of Western Christendom touching the Eucharist.

The glimpses given us in the earlier Fathers of the Eucharist are in entire accord with the more articulate expression of the church's corporate eucharistic worship, which we find in the liturgical documents of the Ante-Nicene period (1) The Ignatian Epp. show us the Eucharist as the focus of the church's life and order, the source of unity and fellowship. The Eucharist consecrated by the prayer of the church is the Bread of God, the Flesh and Blood of Christ, the communication of love incorruptible and life eternal (cf Ephesians, 5.13:20; Trallians, 7.8; Romans, 7; Philadelphia, 4; Smyrnæans, 7.8; Magnesians, 7). (2) Justin Martyr tells us that the Eucharist was celebrated on the Lord's Day, the day associated with creation and with Christ's resurrection. To the celebrant were brought bread and wine mixed with water, who then put up to God, over them, solemn thanksgiving for His livingkindness in the gifts of food and health through the action wrought by Christ. The oblations of bread and wine are presented to God in memorial of Christ's passion, and become Christ's body and blood through prayer. The Eucharist is a spiritual sacrifice of praise and thanksgiving commemorative of Christ's death; and the consecrated elements the communion of Christ's body and blood, by reason of the sacramental character bestowed upon them by the invocation of the Divine blessing (cf I Apol., 13.65, 66, 67; Dial. with Trypho, 41.70, 117). (3) Irenæus, also, emphasizes the fact that Christ taught His disciples to offer the new oblation of the New Covenant, to present in thank offering the first-fruits of God's creatures—bread and wine—the pure sacrifice prophesied before by Malachi. The Eucharist consecrated by the prayer through the invocation of God's blessing, is the communion of the body and blood of Christ, just as he pronounced the elements to be at the institution (cf Against Heresies, 1.13.2; iv.17.5; 18.1-6; 33.2; v.22.3). (4) Cyprian, too, gives evidence of the same eucharistic belief, and alludes very plainly to the "lift up your hearts," to the great thanksgiving, and to the prayer of consecration. This last included the rehearsal of what Christ did and said.

VI. The Church's Observance of the Eucharist.—We should remember the priestly character of the church of Christ, whose sacrifices are

1. Heavenly made under the dispensation of the Background Holy Spirit (1 Pet 2:5:9; Rev 5:6; 6:1:7, 10:1-25; cf 1 Jn 2:1.2). As the Lamb slain once for all but alive for evermore, the Lord Christ is the focus of all worship and of the assemblage (1 Jn 17:18; 5:6-14:7, 9:10), and the Christian disciple has the privilege of feeding upon that eternal Priest and Victim (He 13 10; 1 Cor 10:16).

The celebration of the Eucharist was characteristic of the pentecostal church (Acts 2:42), esp. upon the Lord's Day (20 7). Its celebration was preceded by the agape Celebration (1 Cor 11 20.34) on the eve (for the circumstances of the institution were closely imitated, and the day was reckoned as beginning at sunset after the Jewish fashion), and the Eucharist proper came late into the night, or toward morning (Acts 20 11).

It should be noted that the name, "Lord's Supper," belongs to the agape rather than to the Eucharist; its position as a missionary of mediaval and Reformation times.

The name "Eucharist" is derived from the eucharisteo...
VIII. Liturgical Tradition.—When we proceed to examine the early liturgical remains we find the articulate expression of the church's sacrifice following along these lines. The great eucharistic prayer goes on to pour forth sublime praises to God for all the blessings of creation, and for the fruits of the earth; aligning the praises of the church with the worship of the heavenly host around the throne of God. The love of God in bringing about the redemption of fallen man through the incarnation, and through the self-oblation of His only Son upon the cross is then recalled in deep thankfulness. The institution of the Eucharist in the night of the betrayal is now considered and the Lord's command of Christ ("Do this for my memorial") therein recited, most solemn memorial is made before God, with the antitypical elements, of the death and of the victorious resurrection and ascension of Christ. On the Eucharist closes, as still today, carrying out this act of obedience, most humble prayer is made to the Eternal Father for the hallowing of the oblations, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, to be the body and blood of Christ, and to be those who partake of them, for the imparting of all grace, and the bestowal of life eternal.

To this great act of praise and prayer the solemn "Amen" of the assembled congregation assents, and therefrom the sacramental gifts are received by the faithful present, with another "Amen" from each recipient to whom they are administered.

The great eucharistic prayer, as outlined, was the first part of the liturgy to crystallize into written form, and of its component parts the invocation of the Divine blessing upon the elements was probably the first to be written down. Around the simplicity and the depth of such a truly apostolic norm of eucharistic worship, alone, can be gathered into one the new dispersed and divided followers of the Unifying Christ, for therein subsist in perfect harmony the Godward and the manward aspects of the memorial He commanded us to make as complementary, not contradictory; and the identity of the consecrated bread and wine with the body and blood of Christ is manifested to be in the realm of their spiritual function and power.

This name of the Lord's Supper is derived from eucharistia, the prayer of consecration, and this in turn points back to Mt 26 27, "And he took a cup, and gave thanks" (eucharistias). The most common name is "Lord's Supper" (deipnon kurtou [1 Cor 11 20]). It is also called "Lord's table" (triskesia kurtou [10 21 AV]); while the cup is called the "cup of blessing" (potevrio tis elugias [ver 16]) and "the cup of the Lord" (potevrio kurtou [ver 21]). The word koinonía points both to the bread and the cup, whence our common term "communion." In post-apostolic days it became known as leitourgia, a sacred ministration, whence our word "liturgy." It was also named thuia, a sacrifice, and missellos, from its mystic character, and perhaps from the fact that it was celebrated only in the closed circle of believers. The Roman Catholic church calls it missa or "mass," from the words congregatio missa est, whereby in post-apostolic times the first part of worship, called the missa laurethuminorum (cf. leitourgia), and whereby the second part of worship was ushered in, known as the missa fidelium, the sacramental part of worship, only destined for believers.

The origin of the Eucharist is described in Mt 28; Mk 14, and Lk 22. Paul introduces his own statements of the origin of the institution—the earwitness then proceeds to explain the origin of the institution of the Eucharist. This shows us the Saviour in the deep consciousness of the catastrophe about to overwhelm Him, surrounded by treason on the part of Judas and a strange and total lack of appreciation of the true situation on the part of the other disciples. He had greatly 'desired to eat this Passover with them before he suffered' (Lk 22 15), and yet they are wholly unresponsive, the chief question apparently in their minds being the old content of rank and preeminence. Whether or not Judas was present at the eating of the Supper is a moot point, which we will not discuss here. Neither will we touch the question whether or not this Passover-meal was the true Jewish festive meal or an anticipation of it, called passa, only, in allusion to the great feast, which had brought to the Hundred and Comprehensive recall of spirit to Torah (cf Mt 26; Mk 14 with Jn 13 1; 13 12. 29; 18 28; 19 14.31).

Both Mt and Mk leave the exact place of the institution of the Supper in the festive meal indefinite, "as they were eating" (Mt 26 26; Mk 14 22); the words of Lk, "after supper" (22 20). there be a hint in regard to this matter (see Jn 13 1; 1 Cor 11 25). But the custom of the early church of celebrating the Eucharist after the passover or "love feast" appears (2 Jn 13; J B. Milne, Considerations on Eucharistic Worship; id., The Doctrine and Practice of Eucharist, 1808). It is clear that the original institution was separate from the paschal festival and followed it. The entire subject of the Eucharist has been called in question by the radical German critics, who point to the absence of the whole matter in Ja and to the omission of the words, "Do this in remembrance of me," in Mk. Its occurrence in Lk is ascribed to Paul's influence over him and to his familiarity with the story of the institution as described by the apostle. But this position is utterly untenable in the light of the unquestioned fact that the Lord's Supper as a fixed part of worship was firmly established from the earliest days of the Christian church. The doctrine of Christ's vicarious suffering is nowhere so clearly enunciated as in the words of the institution of the Supper, "This is my body which is given for you" (Lk 22:19); "This is my blood of the covenant, which is poured out for many unto remission of sins" (Mt 26:28). Nothing could have utterly done away with the doctrine of the vicarious atonement or of substitution should attack the historicity of the Eucharist and should seek by all means to wipe it from the record.

Jesus bids His followers to observe the new institution "in remembrance of Him". As Dr. Bavinck says, "The Lord's Supper is instituted by Christ as a permanent benefit to His church; it is a blessing added to all other blessings to signify and to seal them" (Geref. Dogm. 11, 30).

As to the elements used in the original institution of the Supper, they were bread and wine. The bread of course was the unleavened bread of the Passover, during which every trace of leaven was removed (Ex 12:19). The Eastern church, perhaps influenced by the bitter Ebonite spirit of the Judaizers, later adopted the use of common bread (koâdos ardos); the Western church used unleavened bread. Protestantism left the matter among the adiaphore.

As regards the wine, the matter has been in dispute from the beginning (see Kitto's Cyclopaedia of Bb. Lit.). The early church always used mixed wine, barley and water, following the Passover-meal. Whether the wine used at the institution of the Lord's Supper was fermented or unfermented wine, must of course be determined by the Jewish Passover-currents prevailing at that time. The matter is in dispute and is not easily settled.

Modern Jews quite generally use raisin-wine, made by steeping raisins over night in water and expressing the juice the next day for use at the Passover-meal. The ancient, used for this purpose a fermented boiled wine, mixed with water (Mish. Tosefth, xi). Whether wine, the word used in the NT, was considered as the name for fermented wine or for water, or figuratively for the mixed drinks, well known to ancient and modern Jews, is a disputed matter. As late as the 16th century the Nestorians celebrated communion with raisin-wine, and the same is said of the Indian Christians. The word "new", used by Christ in Mt 28:29, is believed by some to indicate the wine used by Christ at the institution of the Eucharist, viz. the juice of grapes fresh pressed out (see Clem. Alex. Paed., xi). On the other hand the third Council of Braga explicitly forbade this practice as heretical. It is evident that the whole subject is shrouded in much mystery. Some ancient sects substituted an entirely different element, water and milk, for instance, being used (Epiph. Haer., xlii; Aug. Haer., xxvii). Such customs were utterly condemned by the Council of Braga (675 AD). In general, however, the Christian church, from the beginning, seems to have used fermented red wine, either mixed or pure, in the administration of the Eucharist. In order to maintain the correspondence between the symbol and the thing symbolized.

Originally the apostolic church celebrated communion at every meeting for worship. They continued steadfastly in the apostle's teaching and fellowship, in the breaking of bread and the prayers (Acts in 2:42-46). Very soon, however, we may judge from the Acts and the Pauline Epistles, its administration was confined to the meeting on the first day of the week. The apostles always preceded communion, and at some part of the service the believers, the sexes after the plan of the synagogue being separated, would salute each other with the "holy kiss" (philéma hagión) (1 Cor 16:20; 2 Cor 13:12). But the introduction of the sacrament, with all its accessories, had evidently occasioned grave abuses at Corinth (1 Cor 11:34). Paul corrects these in unmistakable language. Thus we received our first written record of the institution of the Supper in Corinth. It must have been introduced at the beginning to the first day of the week (Acts 20:7; 1 Cor 16:2). By a slow transition the dégnom was transferred from the midnight hour to the morning. At least we find that Paul kept it. It "was celebrated from the midnight hour to the morning" (1 Cor 11:11). It would appear as if the apostle had also partaken of the Lord's Supper, together with his Christian companions, on board the ship, toward the close of his fatal trip on the Adriatic (Acts 27:35).

In the post-apostolic church the Eucharist continued to be celebrated every Lord's day. But it separated itself from the preaching of the Word and the primitive prayers, by the addition of the Lord's Prayer, and was made the central act of worship. It was invested with a mystic meaning, 2. The Eucharist as a symbol of the union between the persons of the Trinity in the mystery of the Godhead. It was thus constituted as the symbol of the profession of the Christian creed, in the words of the apostle (Rom 15:5). A symbol of all communion. It thus became an act which even the heretics only, in which the Eucharist was celebrated. Breaking of bread, all the ingredients for the apóstasis, from which the elements for the Supper were selected, were furnished by the free-will offerings of the faithful. It was solemnly set apart by the officiating bishop with a concurring prayer, eucharistia, and thus obtained the name "Eucharist." The gifts themselves were called proskophi, oblations, or thusiak, sacrifices. The sacrificial character of the act was greatly intensified thus gradually created (Ignc. Phil. Iv; Smyrna, VII; Justin. Apol. I, 68; Iren. Adv. Haer. Iv, 15.5). The Eucharist once being conceived as a sacrifice, the conception of the officiating bishop as a priest became logically necessary. Fell within the sphere of the doctrine of the Catholic Church. The Council, according to a formulary of 166 (d. 865) (philema 16), was to be taught that the bread and wine, of course, have a real, substantial existence, being consecrated by the word "new," used by Christ in Mt 28:29, is believed by some to indicate the wine used by Christ at the institution of the Eucharist, viz. the juice of grapes fresh pressed out (see Clem. Alex. Paed., xi). On the other hand the third Council of Braga explicitly forbade this practice as heretical. It is evident that the whole subject is shrouded in much mystery. Some ancient sects substituted an entirely different element, water and milk, for instance, being used (Epiph. Haer., xlii; Aug. Haer., xxvii). Such customs were utterly condemned by the Council of Braga (675 AD). In general, however, the Christian church, from the beginning, seems to have used fermented red wine, either mixed or pure, in the administration of the Eucharist. In order to maintain the correspondence between the symbol and the thing symbolized.

In the Catholic Church the Eucharist is celebrated at every mass; and in the Eastern church, in many regions, at the beginning of the general service. The Eastern church was the first to adopt the custom of celebrating the Eucharist at the beginning of the Divine service, which was established at the third Council of Braga (675 AD).

In the Western church, the Eucharist was not celebrated at the beginning of the Divine service, but at the end, as a rule. The Eastern church was the first to adopt the custom of celebrating the Eucharist at the beginning of the Divine service, which was established at the third Council of Braga (675 AD).

The Catholic Church teaches in its dogma of the Eucharist that the body and blood of Christ are truly contained in the sacrament of the altar, under the species of bread and wine, the bread being transubstantiated into the body and the wine into the blood of Christ, by the Divine power. This has been the Romish doctrine of the Supper ever since. The bread and wine are changed into the veritable body and blood of Christ, by the words of the institution of the Supper, Christ made His disciples priests, wherefore the Eucharist may be administered only by an ordained priest. In the miracle of the sacrament, the "accidents" of the elements—bread and wine—remain, but they are no longer inherent in a subject, the substance in which they inhered being replaced by another. This new substance is the body and blood of Christ, which is hidden from observation under the appearance of the elements. The whole Christ is present in and as all elements, hence no need to communicate under both forms (sub utroque). In the Romish conception of the Supper communion with Christ is a secondary idea. The main idea is that of the transubstantiation itself, for the Supper is more a sacrifice than a sacrament; thus the mass becomes a sin offering. While it feeds faith, keeps us from mortal sin, wards off temporal punishment, unites believers, it also has a potency for those who are not present, and even for the dead in purgatory. Thus the mass became the very heart and center of the entire Romish cultus (Conf. Trid., XIII, 21, 22; Cat. Rom., CXII, 4; Bellarm., De Sacrat. Euch., I, iv; Moehler, Symb., § 34).

The Reformers rejected the doctrine of transubstantiation, the sacrificial conception of the Eucharist, the adoration of the "host," the withholding of the cup, the efficiency of the Eucharist in behalf of, and the entire Romish conception of the sacrament of the Supper. Thus Luther, in his original position of Luther, that the elements in the Supper were signs and seals of the remission of sins, was soon replaced by the doctrine of "consubstantiation." The bitter controversy with Carlstadt, and esp., the failure of the Marburg Conference, drove Luther forever into the camp of the realists. As early as 1524 he had outlined his doctrine against Carlstadt. He placed himself squarely on the realist conception of the word: "the body of Christ in accordance with the will and omnipotence of God and its own ubiquity is really and substantially present in, with and under the Supper, even as His Divine nature is in the host as wrath is in the iron. What bread the Supper physically partaken of by those who are unworthy, albeit to their own destruction" (Bavinck, Gerfl. Dogm., IV, 318). This doctrine has been fully developed by the Lutheran divines, and is still this day the view of the Lutheran Church.

Zwingli essentially sided with Carlstadt in his controversy with Luther, whom he thereby greatly embittered. He interpreted the words of institution, "this is the" as signifying "this stands for," "this signifies." This view was fully set forth in a letter to Matthew Alber at Reutlingen in 1524 and was given its final form in his dogmatic treat, Com. de vera et falsa rel. (1525), where he characterizes Luther's doctrine as "an opinion not only rustic but even impious and frivolous." The breach was widened by the Marburg Conference of 1529. Reduced to its last analysis, the eucharistic concept of Zwingli is that of a symbolical memorial of the suffering and death of Christ, although Zwingli does not deny that Christ is present to the eye of faith. On the contrary, he is enjoyed through the word and through faith, i.e. in a spiritual way. In the Supper we confess what we truly mean to us, and we do it in memory of Christ's death (Oper., i, i, 426; iii, 339, 326, 459; iv, 51, 68). The Zwinglian view has been consciously or unconsciously adopted by a very large portion of the Protestant church.

Calvin's position on the doctrine of the Eucharist tends rather to the Luther than to the Zwinglian view. With Zwingli the sacrament is little more than a sign, with Calvin it is both a sign and a seal. The reality of communion with Christ and the benefit of His death, received by a living faith—all this is common to the Lutheran and the Calvinistic views. The Lord's Supper is far more than a mere memorial service, it is a marvelous means of grace as well. Calvin sides with Zwingli in denying all elements, hence to communicate under both forms (sub utroque). In the Zwinglian view of the eucharistic act far more than a confession of faith, and he lays far greater stress than Zwingli on the meaning of its true participation. With Luther he holds that Christ is truly present in the Supper, and he lays stress esp. on the mystic union of the believer with Christ. In the Supper both the benefits of Christ's death and His glorious person are touched. But Calvin does not descend in the Supper to the very heart of the matter, but he leads the believer up to Him in heaven. The central thought of the Calvinistic conception of the Supper is this, that the communicant, through the operation of the Holy Spirit, comes in spiritual contact with the entire person of Christ and that he is thus fed unto life eternal. Every close student of Calvin's works will have to admit that his ideas on the subject are somewhat involved and confusing. This is due to no doubt to the mediating position he occupied between Luther and Zwingli. As a whole is quite plain. All his followers agree in holding that (1) Christ is only spiritually present in the Supper; (2) that the participation in the benefits of the Supper must therefore be spiritual, although it is real, and (3) that only true communicants, by a living faith, can communicate therein, and that this participation in the atoning death of the Saviour is sealed to us by the use of the ordained signs of the sacrament.

3. The Words of the Institution

1. The Term. "Eucharist" is the anglicized form of the Gr noun eucharistia, which signifies "gratitude," "thanks," or "praise." The word "offering." The noun is derived from the vb. eucharisteō, which, with the kindred meaning in Mt 26:26:7; Mk 14:22:23, is used to describe the action of the Lord in blessing the bread and wine at the institution of the Lord's Supper (Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:23). When used absolutely, as in these places, it signifies "the offering up of praise, but not only as appointed by nothing else than God Himself and His revealed glory" (Cremer). The blessing of the physical elements was part of the sacramental act at subsequent celebrations of the ordinance (1 Cor 10:16), and thus eucharistic soon (2d cent.) came to mean the blessed elements and the entire ordinance in which these were administered.

Other Scriptural terms for the same ordinance are "Communion" (from koinōnia, in the twofold sense indicated in 1 Cor 10:16, 17, and thus eucharistic soon [2d cent.]), "Lord's Table" (trapeza tōn dētpson [1 Cor 11:20]). "Lord's Table" (trapeza tōn dētpson [1 Cor 11:20]).
kurtou (1 Cor 10 21), "Breaking of Bread" (βάσσα του δριτου [Acts 2 42]). The lit. of the church developed a great many terms which emphasize one of the other features of the ordinance. Luther, in his Small Catechism, adopts the name "Sacraments of the Altar," because it is administered at the altar. The Lutheran Confessions of the Augsburg Confession, however, in the original meaning which the early church, not in which the Roman church, connects with the word (Latin missa), either from missa, "because the materials for communion were sent to the place of celebration, or from missis, "a sending; a dispatching" (see above). Indians who were not members, were dismissed from the service before the celebration of the Eucharist. (Strong, Cyclop. of Bib., Theol. and Eccles. Lit., V, 863).

II. The Ordinance.—The "seats of doctrine," i.e. the Scripture texts which must be employed for determining every essential part of the teaching of Scripture regarding the second sacrament of the Christian church, are the words of institution of the Eucharist recorded in Mt 26 26-28; Mk 14 22-24; Lk 22 19-20; 1 Cor 11 23-25. Valuable statements, chiefly concerning the proper use of the sacrament, are found in 1 Cor 10 15 ff; 11 20 ff. These texts are controverted no reason why a doctrine should not be derived from them. No doctrine of the Christian religion could be established, if every text of Scripture should be withheld from the church until so fast as it had become controverted. Jn 6 32-59 does not treat of this ordinance, because (1) the ordinance must be dated from the night of the betrayal, which was considerably after the Lord's discourse at Communion; (2) because this passage speaks of eating the flesh, not the body, of the Son of man, and of drinking his blood, in such a manner that a person's eternal salvation is made to depend upon this eating and drinking. If this passage be interpreted to mean that the body and blood of our Lord is present during the Lord's Supper, then we are to expound every passage of Scripture which speaks of a liturgical drinking and eating of the body and blood of our Lord (see above). Thus: "My body, which is given for you," "my blood, which is shed for many." The substance of the Eucharistic words has grown on the vine, has been pressed from grapes, and has the characteristics of the substance known as wine. That the wine, however, is the substance of the Eucharist, is left undefined. The expression gýmnema τας ἀμπέλου, "fruits of the vine" (Mt 26 28), simply meant a wine of ancient quality and type, of which there was a great deal of such a substance; it is not a statement that the substance of the sacrament is wine. Likewise, the color of the wine at the Lord's Supper was left undefined. The use of unfermented wine is apt to introduce an element of uncertainty into the sacrament. The argument is as follows: (1) There is no express declaration of the church as to the kind of wine to be used. "Body and Blood of our Lord...") (2) The words of institution could not present at the same time in every eucharistic act. To say "in one or other of these things..." is to be in accord with the ancient eucharistic service; but it is not to be in accord with the church, who prescribe that in one and the same stage during the eucharistic act, the Roman ordinance of transubstantiation does (against 1 Cor 11 26-28); or the real presence of the true bread and wine, as reformed teaching does, is not doing justice to Scripture.

The exposition of the genuine eucharistic texts of Scripture is governed by the common law of Bible exegesis, viz. that every word and statement of Scripture must be understood in its proper and native sense, unless a plain and urgent reason contra mandas the sense given by the writer. The writers who have recorded the institution of the sacrament have given no hint that they wish to be understood figuratively. The solemn occasion—the Eucharist being the expression of the last will and testament of the Lord—forbids the use of figurative language (Gal 3 15). The fact that a statement of Scripture transcends our natural powers of comprehension does not justify us in giving it a figurative meaning. If this rationalistic principle were to be applied in explaining Scripture, we could not retain a single revealed doctrine. Besides, those who have adopted a figurative interpretation are not agreed where to locate the figure in the words of institution. Some claim that the word το κρέας, others that κρέας, others that το σῶμα μου contain a figure, while still others would take the institutional words in their proper sense, but understand the entire ordinance figuratively.

The eucharistic passages contain: (1) a statement fixing the time of occasion of the institution. It was "in the night in which he was betrayed," immediately before the Contents of the beginning of the passio s. of the Eucharist, and the Institution of the Jewish Passover Passages (Mt 26 17 ff). The ordinance which Christ instituted was to take the place of the ancient Passover (1 Cor 5 7, which text Luther aptly renders: "We, too, have a passover, which is Christ crucified for us"). Jewish custom at the time of Christ seems to have allowed some latitude as regards the time for eating the paschal lamb. Thus the difference between John (18 28; 19 29) and the Synoptic Evangelists (Mark 14 12) is a purely eucharistic difference (see above). Our Lord was deeply stirred with thoughts of love and sacrifice in his act of institution for his disciples at the time of the institution (13 1).

(2) An authoritative declaration of Christ, the God-man, fixing the constituent parts of the sacrament, and the distinctive nature of the eucharistic act (speciem actus). This declaration names:

(a) the elements of the sacrament, which are of two kinds: bread and wine (matera terrae), and the body and blood of the Lord (matera coelestis) (see Irenaeus, Hdr., IV, 34, 463, quoted in P. C. H., Art. VII, no. 14, 449). There is no law laid down as regards the quality, form, or quantity of the bread (leavened or unleavened, round or oblong. In large loaves, cakes, or in water form ready for immediate distribution. Likewise the color of the wine; the wine is left undefined. The expression γόμμα τας αμπέλου, "fruits of the vine" (Mt 26 28), simply meant a wine of ancient quality and type, of which there was a great deal of such a substance; it is not a statement that the substance of the sacrament is wine. Likewise, the color of the wine at the Lord's Supper was left undefined.

The use of unfermented wine is apt to introduce an element of uncertainty into the sacrament. The argument is as follows: (1) There is no express declaration of the church as to the kind of wine to be used. "Body and Blood of our Lord...") (2) The words of institution could not present at the same time in every eucharistic act. To say "in one or other of these things..." is to be in accord with the ancient eucharistic service; but it is not to be in accord with the church, who prescribe that in one and the same stage during the eucharistic act, the Roman ordinance of transubstantiation does (against 1 Cor 11 26-28); or the real presence of the true bread and wine, as reformed teaching does, is not doing justice to Scripture.

(2) The relation of the elements to one another: In offering the physical elements to the disciples the Lord employs the locutio exhibiti, common to every language of men: He names that which is not seen while giving that which is seen ("Here are your spicis, says the grocer delivering the package containing them.) The locutio exhibiti, except when used by a jester or dishonest person, always states a fact. The bread in the Eucharist is the body of Christ, the wine, likewise, is the blood of Christ (1 Cor 10 16 17 by koimànna, "communion.") This term is not the same as matoché, "participation," which would refer to the communal act (Pent. 14 159; 149). Koimànna declares a communion of the body and blood of Christ by the body, of Christ, the wine. It is impossible to define the mode and manner of this communion of the earthly with the heavenly elements. Such terms as "consubstantiation," "invagination," are faulty attempts to define the undefinable. All we can assert is that by the manner in which we use the bread and wine, we are in a sacramental union with the eucharistic bread and wine.

(c) The action required, viz. "take, eat": "take, drink." These words refer to the distribution and reception of the sacramental elements. These are essential, the mode is not, unless one wishes to emphasize, e.g. by the breaking of the bread, the merely symbolic meaning of the entire ordinance. Accordingly, it is also immaterial whether the adminstrant place the elements into the hands of the communicant, or, if he should convey them to his mouth, or whether the communicant conveys the elements directly to his mouth, without the adminstrant. It is impossible to define the mode and manner of this communion of the earthly with the heavenly elements. Such terms as "consubstantiation," "invagination," are faulty attempts to define the undefinable. All we can assert is the manner in which we as communicants receive is to commend to us the body and blood of our Lord in a sacramental union with the eucharistic bread and wine.

also the unworthy communicant receives the Lord's body, and that for his service, "not discerning" it (1 Cor 10:21) (d) The end and aim of the ordinance: The Lord says as a command to the Church, Paul says, "As often as ye eat this bread, and drink the cup, ye proclaim the Lord's death till he come." These words make the Eucharist an efficient means for strengthening the spiritual union of the disciples with the Lord until His return, and to make an appeal for faith on their part of the communicants, and restrict admission to communion to the believing followers of the Lord. Worthy communicants are those who understand the meaning of Christ's sacrifice and hope for His return in glory. (Luther: "The sacrament is instituted for us Christians.")

The humility of self-examination enjoyed upon communicants further emphasizes the purpose of the Eucharist: stimulation of knowledge and acknowledgment of our sinful state, confidence in the ever-present forgiveness of God for Christ's sake, and a sincere purpose to forsake sin and grow in holiness. Accordingly, non-believers, morally irresponsible persons, and persons who lead offensive lives which they will not amend, cannot be admitted to communion (Mt 7:26).

1. “This do in remembrance of me,” Paul says: "The strengthning of the bonds of brotherly love and fellowship by means of communion. Hence, unity besides the blessing of the elements, only the giving and receiving as communion together (Mt 26:26), and “close communion," not “open, or promiscuous communion" is in accord with the teaching of Scripture. In the absence of any fixed rule as to the frequency of a Christian's communion, these above reasons suffice to induce him to commune frequently ("as often as").

2. An authoritative statement of Christ concerning the continued use of the sacrament (exercitium actus): "This do." This means (a) that the action of Christ is effective, i.e., bread and wine should be blessed, distributed and received. The blessing is called the consecration and consists in the reciting of a prayer and the words of the institution. Consecration has no magical effects, it does not produce the sacrament, but it does, on the other hand, it is not a mere meaningless ceremony, but a solemn declaration that in accordance with the will of the Lord, bread and wine are now being separated from their common use, to be devoted to the use which the Lord has decreed. Hence, the prayer to the Lord to be present in the sacrament; (b) that whenever disciples do as their Lord did, He will connect His body and blood with the earthly substances as He did at the first communion; (c) that besides the blessing of the elements, only the giving or distribution, and the taking, or reception, of the sacramental elements are proper and essential parts of a sacramental action. A true sacramental action is complete only where these three acts concur: consecration, distribution, and taking, and one of these acts nothing that may be done with the elements possesses the nature of a sacrament or a sacramental action. Offering the consecrated wafer for adoration is no part of the sacrament, but it is a form of adoration (adoratorio), because there is no sacramental union except in the act of distributing and receiving the consecrated elements. The withdrawal of the cup from the lay communicants is an unwarranted mutilation of the sacrament (Mt 14:25). But the greatest perversion of the sacrament, and a standing reproach to the completeness of the atoning sacrifice of the Lord is the offering up of the consecrated elements as an unbloody sacrifice for the sins of the living and the dead, which is being done in the Roman mass (He 10:14,15).

III. Difficulties.—“How can these things be?”

This question might be raised against every doctrine of Scripture. The union of the human natures in the God-man, the imputation of His merit to the believer, the quickening power of the word of Divine grace, the resurrection of the dead, etc, can be all subjected to the same questionings. "Has faith no place in this sacrament?" Faith does not create, nor help to create the sacrament, neither the administrator's nor the communicant's faith. The sacrament is fully constituted in all its parts by the institutional act of the Lord and by His command to continue the observance of it. Man's faith cannot make, man's unbelief cannot unmake, an ordinance of God. But faith is necessary in order that a communicant may receive the blessings offered in the Eucharist, and testify to his believing relation to the Lord and to his Christian fellowship with the brethren. The sacrament bestows no blessing ex opere operato, i.e., by the mere mechanical performance of the physical act.

Are the words of the institution part of the sacred text?" Up to the age of Reformation, the were universally regarded so, and the critical labors of Briggs, P. Gardner, Graf, Immer, Jülicher, etc, which can be readily explained by the theological position of these men, lack unity of result and are offset by the labors of Scrivener, Schultzen, R. A. Hoffman, Blass, Böyschlag, etc. Christianity as yet, sees no reason for discarding the words of the institution and for discontinuing the Eucharist as a part of Divine worship.

ACCORDING TO THE BELIEF AND PRACTICE OF THE CHURCH OF THE BRETHREN (DUNKERS)

I. THE LAST SUPPER WAS NOT THE JEWISH PASSOVER

A. Date
1. The Last Supper was not the Jewish Passover.

1. 1. The Last Supper Was Not the Jewish Passover.—John gives five distinct insinuations of the date: (1) "Now before the feast of the passover..." (John 13:1). This shows the Supper, early on the day of crucifixion, before the Passover.

2. "Buy what things we have need of for the feast" (Gyros o ὁριον ἔχων εἰς τὴν ἑορτήν, ἀγάπην ἡν ἡ λαξίων τῆς διακονίας τῆς ἑορτῆς; 13:29). This shows that the Supper (σεβεμένη σελβίαν) was not the Passover feast (σεβεμένη, ψευδής).

3. "They lead Jesus therefore from Caiaphas into the Praetorium; and it was early; and they themselves entered not into the Praetorium, that they might not be defiled, but might eat the passover" (τὰς ἀναφέρεται ἄνθρωπον της ἑορτῆς... τρόφιμος ἐνα, ἐνα φάγον της ἑορτῆς; 15:28). This was the Passover, early on the day of crucifixion, before the Passover.

4. "Now it was the Preparation of the passover: it was about the sixth hour" (ἐν τῇ ἐπαρτησίᾳ της ἑορτῆς... ἐν τῇ ἑορτῇ τῆς πραξικότητος τῆς ἑορτῆς; 19:14). This again shows conclusively that the Passover was not yet eaten. Jesus is before Pilate: it is the day of the crucifixion and after the Last Supper.

5. "The Jews therefore, because it was the Preparation, and the Passover was not yet eaten..." (τὰς ἀναφέρεται τῇ ἑορτῇ... τῆς ἑορτῆς... τρόφιμος... τρόφιμος... τῆς ἑορτῆς... 19:15). This shows that the Passover was intended to continue the observance after sunset on the 15th of Nisan at the beginning of the Jewish Sabbath. Whenever the Passover fell upon the Sabbath, that Sabbath was a "high day."

II. Place of Faith

Christ is our Passover: died at the time the Passover lamb was slain, hence after the Last Supper. (1) Christ died at the time the Passover lamb was slain on Friday afternoon, the 14th of Nisan, and thus became Our Passover (1 Cor 5:7), the 14th of Nisan also having been sacrificed before Christ. The Passover also had been sacrificed.

2. Doctrinal Significance.—(a) Jesus, the Lamb of God (Jn 1:29) corresponds to the Passover lamb (Ex 12:5). "Without blemish, (Ex 12:5) = Jesus, "who did no sin" (1 Pet 2:22-24). The blood of a lamb sprinkled upon houses (Ex 12:7.13) corresponds to the blood of Jesus (1 Jn 1:7-9). (b) Jesus arose the third day and became "the first-fruits of them that are asleep" (1 Cor 15:20.23). The resurrection was our first day of the week. The sheaf, or first-fruits, was gathered in the 16th of Nisan. Therefore Jesus must have died on Friday the 14th of Nisan, when the Passover lamb was slain; hence after the Last Supper.

All the early traditions, both Jewish and Christian, agree that Jesus was crucified on the day of Preparation of the Passover, and that they distinguished between the Passover and the Last Supper which was eaten the evening before the Jewish feast.

II. The Perpetuation of the Last Supper.—(1) Since the Last Supper was a new institution, there is no more reason for perpetuating one part than another. It is a unit, and each event of that night has its meaning and place. (2) Jesus commanded the disciples to perpetuate feet-washing (see Washing of Feet) (Jn 13:14.15.17), and likewise He commanded the Eucharist to be perpetuated as a memorial of Him (1 Cor 11:24.25). Why not the Agape? (3) The Agape was perpetuated by the apostles in their services. They certainly understood Jesus to mean that the entire service of the Last Supper should be perpetuated, else they would not have done so.

III. Practice of the Church of the Brethren (Dunkers).—The Dunkers, or German Dunkers, perpetuate the Last Supper with the disciples. These Love Feasts are held once or twice each year, always in the evening, by each local church or congregation. Preparatory services on "self-examination" (1 Cor 11:28) precede the ordinances. The church persons are divided into parties. The Supper (bêvov, dêpov) is made ready beforehand by the deacons and deaconesses. The devotional exercises aim to accomplish special consecration, confession, and reconciliation. Before the eating of the Supper, Jn 13:1-17 is read and contemplated, whereupon the brethren proceed to wash one another's feet, and the sisters likewise by themselves. All tarry one for another (1 Cor 11:33) until they are ready for the Supper. The officiating elder then calls upon some one to offer prayer for the bread, which then is broken, and another person conducts a thanksgiving at the close of the meal. After the meal, the officiating elder calls upon one to read the story of Christ's sufferings (Isa 53, or Jn 12:16). After a short explanation of the meaning of the symbol, the elder distributes the bread while the officiating elder gives thanks for the bread. He then turns to his brother at his right and breaks a piece of the unleavened bread for him with the words, "My beloved brother, the bread which we break is the communion of the body of Christ." (see 1 Cor 10:16). The brethren then break the bread one to the other, with these words. Likewise the sisters in the same manner. Again the congregation rises while the officiating elder gives thanks for the cup, which is then passed by one to the other with the words, "Beloved brother (or sister), the cup of the NT is the communion of Christ (1 Cor 10:16). This is followed by prayers of praise and thanksgiving, then a hymn (Mt 26:30) and a benediction.

IV. The Meaning and Significance of the Love Feast.—All these ordinances or symbols signify some fundamental virtue in the Christian life. We are commanded to follow our Master who is the Way and the Truth. But these symbols have a real significance, apart from merely "following" or "imitation" of Christ. The washing of feet symbolized humility and service, and also the partial cleansing which all Christians need. (2) The Agape signifies the bread-and-water covenant of brotherhood and peace. It is not only the symbol of true Christian love (Acts 2:45), but it is also the "Marriage Supper of the Lamb," which is supremely a symbol of joy. (3) The Eucharist: (a) The broken bread represents the "body of Christ" (1 Cor 10:16) which is broken for you" (1 Cor 11:24 AV) hence the symbol of sacrifice. It is a memorial of Christ's sufferings, and a consecration to suffer with Him. It means also feeding on Christ, whose flesh we must eat (Jn 6:51.53.54). (b) The cup represents the blood of Christ (1 Cor 10:16; Jn 6:53.54). It is the blood covenant that symbolizes the unity of man with God (Jn 17:21). Jesus is the vine, we are the branches (Jn 15). The same mind, spirit, life and love which are in God and Christ are to be in us.

CHARLES B. WILLIAMS

LOT, lot

I. Personality.—The man who bore the name Lot (לט, lót; ἅλα, ἅλα; Lót, Lot) is mentioned for the first time in Gen 11:27, at the beginning of that section of Gen which is entitled the "generations of Terah." After Terah's 3 sons are named, it is added that the third of these, Haran, begat Lot.

The reason for thus singling out but one of the grandsons of Terah appears in the next verse, where we are told that "Haran died before his father Terah in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees." For that period in the life of this family, therefore, which begins with the migration from Ur, Lot represents his father's branch of the family (ver 31). It is hardly probable that the relation between Abraham and Lot would have been what it was, had not Haran died; but be this as it may, we read this introduction of L. into the genealogy of the race of Terah as an introduction, which furnishes an introduction, and in which L. is destined to play an important part.

The sections of that story in which L. appears are: in ch 11, the migration from Ur to Haran; in ch 12, Abraham's strife with Lot; in ch 13, the separation of Abraham and L.; in ch 14, the campaign of the eastern kings against Sodom and Abraham's recovery of the captives; and in ch 19, the destruction of Sodom.

In 14:14-16 L. is termed the "brother" of Abraham; but that this does not represent a variant tradition is proved by reference to ver 12 of the same chapter (ascribed to "an independent source") and to 13:8 (ascribed to J; cf 11:28). 14:3-9 (of his father there; the marriage of his sister Milcah to his uncle Nahor (of another sister, Isaac, we learn only the name), and the journey to Haran in company with Terah, Abraham and Sarah. The fact that Sarah's childlessness and Haran's death are the only two circumstances related of the family history, may serve to explain why L. went with Abraham instead of staying with Nahor. A childless uncle and a fatherless nephew may well have remained together with the idea that, even if there was no formal adoption, the nephew might become his uncle's heir. Certainly, the promise of a nameless seed, so often repeated to the patriarchs, comes first to Abraham immediately after L. has separated from his family (16:1-3).

In the second period of L.'s life, we find him the companion of Abraham on his journeys to Mesopotamia to Canaan, through Canaan to Egypt, and back again to the neighborhood of Beth-el. His position is subordinate, for his uncle is head of the family, and oriental custom is uniform and rigorous in the matter of family rule. Hence the use of the singular number throughout the narrative. What Abraham did, his whole clan did. Yet L.'s position was nearly independent as these patriarchal conditions admit. When the story reaches the point where it is necessary to mention this fact, the narrator explains, first, the generosity with which Abraham treated his nephew, in permitting him to have "flocks, and herds, and tents" of his own, a quasi-independent economy, and second, that disproportion between their collective possessions and the land's resources which made separation inevitable. Up to this point the only mention of L. during this period of wanderings is contained in 13:1, in the words "And Lot with him." And even here the words are useless (because stating a fact perfectly presumably here as elsewhere), except as they prepare the reader for the story of the separation that is immediately to follow.

That story introduces the third period of Lot's career, that of his residence in the Kieakar (RV "Plain," RVa "Circle") and in Sodom. For the foundation, as above stated, the author adds the two circumstances which contributed to produce the result, namely, first, the strife that arose between Abraham's herdsmen and L.'s herdsmen, and, second, the presence in the same country of others—the Canaanites and Perizites—thus reminding his readers that it was no vacant land, through which they might spread themselves absolutely at will and so counteract the operation of the principle of cause and the contributory cause already set forth.

With a magnanimity that must have seemed even greater to minds accustomed to patriarchal authority than it seems to us, and that was in fact much more remarkable then it is now, Abraham offers to his nephew the choice of the land—from the nomad's point of view. In the

"we are brethren" (ver 8), the whole force of the scene is crystallized. L., who believes himself to have chosen the better part, is thereupon in his nomadic progress as far as Sodom, and the reader leaves him for a time face to face with a city whose men "were wicked and sinners against Jehovah exceedingly," while the narrative moves on with Abraham through that fresh scene of revelation which presented to this man of magnanimity a Divine deed to all the land, and to this man, now left without an heir from among his own kindred (cf 16:23), a Divine pledge of innumerable offspring.

L. returns for a moment to our view as the spring of Abraham's motions in the campaign of ch 14. We are expressly told that it was "when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive," that he "led forth his trained men . . . and pursued." On the one hand we hear that L. now "dwelt in Sodom," having abandoned the life in tents that he had led since Mesopotamian days, and on the other hand we find in him a foil to the energetic, decisive and successful figure of his uncle—for L. plays a sorry role, bracketed always with "the women and the goods."

This period of his life ends with the annihilation of his chosen home, his wealth, his companions, and all that was his save two daughters, who, if L. had been spared, might better have deserted him. Ch 19, coming immediately after the intercession of Abraham for Sodom that poignantly impresses on the reader's mind the wickedness of L.'s environment, exhibits to us the man himself in his surroundings, as they have been through well-nigh a score of years (cf 12:4; 17:1). What we see is a man who means well (courtesy, ver 1; hospitality, vs 2.3.6-8; natural shame, ver 7; loyalty, ver 14; and, gratitude, ver 19), but who is hopelessly bound up with the moral life of the city through his family connections—alliances that have pulled him down rather than elevated others (vs 9.14.20.31-35). The language of 2 Pet 2 7.8 reminds us that L. was, even at this time of his life, a "righteous" man. Viewed as a part of his environment (the writer has been speaking of Sodom, ver 6), L. was certainly entitled to be called a "righteous" man, and the term fits the implications of Gen 18:24-32. Moreover, Gen 18 itself shows L. "vexed"" and "sore distressed by the lascivious life of the wicked" (cf vs 3.7.8.14). Yet the contrast with Abraham is always present in the reader's mind, so that the most lasting impressions are made by L.'s selfishness, worldliness, vacillation and cowardice, not to mention the moral effect made by the closing scene of his life (vs 30-38).

The fourth period of L.'s career is of uncertain duration. Upon the destruction of Sodom he dwelt at first in Zoar, the "little" city, sparsely peopled and far removed from the "mountain" (ver 19). In this mountain-country, a land of rocks and caves (Driver in HDB, art. "Lot," cites Buckingham, Travels in Syria, 61-63, 67, as authority for the statement that people still live in caves in this region). L. and his remaining daughters dwell; and the biography of this companion of "the friend of God" ends in a scene of incest, which supplies the logical epilogue to a drama of progressive moral deterioration.

This bestial act, hitherto unknown and unthought of Abram, but he has reached this goal because his path had led down from Beth-el to Sodom.
The origin of the two neighboring and kindred nations, Moab and Ammon, is by the Heb tradition traced to Lot and his descendants. III. Place in Later Literature.—In the Bible, Lot finds mention only as the father of Moab and Ammon (Dt 2 9; Ps 83 8), and in the passage in 2 Pet already noticed; and, besides these places, in Lk 17 28-32. Here L. represents the central figure of the destruction of Sodom. As Noah in the flood in the preceding context (of the association of these two characters in 2 Pet and the Koran). His deliverance is mentioned, the haste and narrowness of that escape is implied, and his wife's fate is described. His iniquity is to be praised, including many passages in the Koran itself). L. is a personage of importance, about whom details are told which fancy has added to the sober traditions of old Israel. But particularly for Mohammed there was point of attachment in L.'s character, often in Gen 19 7.14. Like Mohammed to the men of wicked Mecc, L. becomes a preacher of righteousness and a messenger of judgment to the men of wicked Sodom. He is one of the line of apostles, sent to reveal God's will and purpose to his contemporaries.

IV. Critical Theories about the Figure of Lot.—The common view of those who deny the historical reality of the name simply stands for the other group, Moab and Ammon. Wellhausen, e.g., expressly calls "Lot" a national name (Volknamen). As to what is told of him in Gen be remarks: "Were it not for the remarkable depression in which the Dead Sea L., Sodom and its environs would not have perished; were it not for the flat and sandy land that reaches out into the swamp from the S.E., Lot would have fled at once to the mountains of his sones, Moab and Ammon, and perhaps have made the deour by Zoar, which merely serves the purpose of explicating why this corner is excepted from the overfow, to the territory of which it really belongs" (Prolegomena, 326). Meyer confesses that nothing in the story of L. because any characteristics that feature might furnish a point of attachment is entirely lacking.

Names of the families of the Horites of Seir was named Lotan (Gen 36 20,22), and this writer believes it "probable that this name is derived from Lot; but that Lot was ever a tribal name (Stammname) follows neither from this fact (rather the contrary) nor from the designation of the 'sons of L.' 'Ammon as 'sons of Lot'" (Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, 311; cf 261, 339). If "Horite" was understood in the story in Gen 19 30 might be added in support of this combination. But the most recent line of reasoning concerning these patriarchal figures makes their names "neither Divine names nor tribal names, whatever in actual use or regarded as such, but tribal names like Tom, Dick, or Harry... Typical names they became... so that... Israel's story-tellers would connect the name 'L.' with the overfow of the cities" (Grossmann, in ZATW, 1910). These names were chosen just because of the "imperial" time when these narratives were stamped into types"; later they became a vanity, but the story-tellers held fast to the old names. One sees from this at once how ancient a time the proper names Abraham and Lot must reach, and understands therefore the more easily how they could have been used into tribal ancestors." It does not require the cautions, uttered by writers of this way of thinking, against regarding their views as a return to the old historical view of the patriarchs, to remind us that, in spite of all that may be said to the contrary, the present trend of thought among the most radical critics of the Genesis-traditions is much more favorable to that classical view than with the opinions they have overthrown. So that it may justly be asserted, as Grossmann writes: "Confidence in tradition is in any case open." Lot's Wife: This woman, unknown by name, figures in the narrative of Lot that relates his escape from Sodom. She is mentioned in Gen 19 only in vs 15-17, where she is commanded to flee from the doomed city with her husband and daughers and is laid hold of by the angelic visitors in their eff, to hasten the slow departure; and in ver 26, where she alone of the four fugitives disobeys the warning, looks back, and becomes a "pillar of salt." This disobedience, with the moral state it implied, and the judgment is entailed, is held up as an example by Christ in Lk 17 32. In the Scriptures this is all that is said of a person and event that furnished the basis for a great deal of speculation. In Jos (Ant. I, xi, 4) adds to this that in Gen. "She was changed into a pillar of salt," the words, "for I visited it, and it still remains even now" (see also Wisd 10 7).

Among Christian writers contemporary with and subsequent to Jos, as well as among the Jews themselves, the same assertion is found, and to recent times travelers have reported the existence of such a "pillar of salt," either on the testimony of natives or as eyewitnesses. The question of the origin and nature of these "pillars" is a part of the larger question of Sodom and its neighborhood (see Salt; Sodom; Sâme): for that no one particular "pillar" has persisted through the centuries may be regarded as certain; nor if it had, would the identification of Lot's wife with it and with it alone be certain. This is just an early, persistent and notable case of that "identification" of Bib. sites which prevails all over the Holy Land. It is to be classed with the myth- and legend-building turn of mind in simple peoples, which has e.g. been molded upon the OT account of the destruction of Sodom such marvelous details and embellishments.

The principal thing to observe is the vagueness and the simplicity of the story in Gen. For it does not necessarily imply the "metamorphosis" popularly attributed to it, in the strict sense of that word. And it lacks, even in a narrative like this, where the temptation would be great, the versions of that "popular archaeology" or curiosity, which, according to some critics, is alleged to have furnished the original motive for the invention of the patriarchal narratives. She became a pillar of salt, and "Remember Lot's wife," this is the extent of the Bib. allusions. All the rest is comment, or legend, or guess, or "science."—J. Oscar Boyd

LOT. See Divination.

LOTAN, lvt'an (תֹּלָן, ṭōlān): Son of Seir, a chief (AV "duke") of Edom (Gen 36 20,22,29; 1 Ch 1 38 f).

LOTHASBUS, loth-a'sthobus (Λωθασσούς, Lôthasôus): One of those who stood by Ezra at the reading of the law (1 Esd 9 44); called "Hashum" in Neh 8 4.

LOTS. See Divination.

LOTS, FEAST OF. See Purim.

LOTUS, lú'tus, TREES (zô'id, ζηλοίν; AV shady trees): The trees under which bôhmâth (the hippopotamus) rests; "He lieth under the lotus-trees," "The lotus-trees cover him with their shade" (Job 40 21,22). The Arab. equivalent is the dôm tree, Zeyysh, lutos, a species of jujube tree (N.O. Khamnee); it has many spines and small globular fruit a little bigger than a pea. It is common in the Jordan valley. This plant has nothing to do with the Egyptian lotus. See Lily.

LOVE, luv (לָוֵה, 'âshêb, לָוָה, 'âshêbâh, noun; φίλος, pílos, φίλας, philâs, φίλος, phîlos, v.b.; φιλέω, φιλήμ, noun): Love to both God and man is fundamental to true religion, whether as expressed in the OT or the NT. Jesus Himself declared that all the law and the prophets hang upon love (Mt 22 40; Mk 12 28-34). Paul, in his matchless ode on love (1 Cor 13), makes it the greatest of the graces of the Christian life—greater than speaking with tongues, or the gift of prophecy, or the possession of a faith of superior excellence; for without love all these gifts and graces, desirable and useful as they are to themselves, are as nothing, certainly of no permanent value in the sight of God. Not that either Jesus or Paul underestimates the faith from which all the graces proceed, for this grace is recognized as fundamental in all God’s dealings with man and man’s dealings with God (Jn 6:28; He 11:6); but both alike count that faith as but idle and worthless belief that does not manifest itself in love to both God and man. As love is the highest expression of God and revelation to mankind, so it must be the highest expression of man’s relation to His Maker and to his fellow-man.

I. Definition.—While the Heb and Gr words for “love” have various shades and intensities of meaning, they may be summed up in some such definition as this: Love, whether used of God or man, is an earnest and anxious desire for, and an active and beneficent interest in, the well-being of the one loved. Different degrees and manifestations of this affection are recognized in the Scriptures according to the circumstances and relations of life, e.g., the expression of love as between husband and wife, parent and child, brethren according to the flesh, and according to grace; between friend and enemy, and, finally, between God and man. It must not be overlooked, however, that the fundamental idea of love as expressed in the definition of it is never absent in any one of these relations of life, even though the manifestation thereof may differ according to the circumstances and relations. Christ’s interest in the apostle Peter is expressed by the term “phileo,” love, yet Christ in His more intense love for Peter than for Peter in return is phileo, implying a clear determination of will and judgment, and belonging particularly to the sphere of Divine revelation. In his answer Peter went no farther than the word “phileo,” the natural human affection, with its strong feeling, or sentiment, and is never used in Scripture language to designate man’s love to God. While the answer of Peter, then, claims only an inferior kind of love, as compared to the one contained in Christ’s question, he nevertheless is confident of possessing at least such love for his Lord.

II. The Love of God.—First in the consideration of love, “love” comes the love of God—He who is love, and from whom love flows. The love of God is that part of His nature—indeed His whole nature, for “God is love”—which leads Him to express Himself in terms of endearment toward His creatures, and actively to manifest that interest and affection in acts of providing care and self-sacrifice in behalf of the objects of His love. God is “love” (1 Jn 4:8,16) just as truly as He is “light” (1 J.5), “truth” (1 J.16), and “spirit” (Jn 4:24). Spirit and light are expressions of His essential nature; love is the expression of His personality corresponding to His nature. God not merely loves, but is love; it is His very nature, and He imparts this nature to be the sphere in which His creatures may dwell in their enjoyment of that love which abideth in love abideth in God, and God abideth in them (1 Jn 4:16). Christianity is the only religion that sets forth the Supreme Being as Love. In heaven religions He is set forth as an angry being and in constant need of appeasing.

The object of God’s love is first and foremost His own Son, Jesus Christ (Mt 3:17; 17:5; Lk 20:13; Jn 17:24). The Son shares in God’s love.

1. Objects of God’s Love—The love of the Father in a unique sense; He is “my chosen, in whom my soul delighteth” (Psa 42:1). It is Ta b’s, or the Son, the soul delighteth in God, and God abideth in Ta b (1 Jn 4:16). Christianity is the only religion that sets forth the Supreme Being as Love. In heaven religions He is set forth as an angry being and in constant need of appeasing.

God loves the believer in His Son with a special love. Those who are united by faith and love to Jesus Christ are, in a different sense from those who are not thus united, the special objects of God’s love. Said Jesus, “Iloved them, even as thou lovedst me” (Jn 17:24). This is the fact that just as the disciples had received the same treatment from the world that He had received, so they had received of the Father the same love that He Himself had received. They were not on the outskirts of God’s love, but in the very center of it. “For the father himself loveth you, because ye have loved me’ (Jn 16:27). Here phileo is used for love, indicating the fatherly affection of God for the believer in Christ, His Son. This is love in a more intense form than that spoken of for the world (Jn 3:16).

God loves the world (Jn 3:16; cf 1 Tim 2:4; 2 Pet 3:9). This is a wonderful truth when we realize what a world this is—a world of sin and corruption. This was a startling truth for Nicodemus to learn, who conceived of God as loving only the Jewish nation. To him, in his narrow exclusiveness, the announcement of the fact that God loved the whole world of men was startling. God loves the world of sinners lost and ruined by the fall. He did not say that God the Father “loved not the world” (Jn 14:21); but He did say that He loved the world. He is the compassionateGod, taking the fall of every sinner into account. Christ was not born to save those who loved Him; the very fact be overlooked that God loves not only the whole world, but each individual in it; it is a special as well as a general love (Jn 3:16, “whosoever,” Gal 2:20, “loved me, and gave himself up for me”).

God’s love is manifested by providing for the physical, mental, moral and spiritual needs of His people (Isa 48:14; 20:21; 62:9-12; 2. Manifests—63:12). In these Scriptures God is seen manifesting His power in behalf of His love. He is demonstrated in the wilderness journeying and their captivity. He led them, fed and clothed them, guided them and protected them from all their enemies. His love was again shown in feeding with His loving care and saving them from death. His love is again shown in their affliction, their interests were His; He was not their adversary but their friend, even though they might have seemed to Him as if He either had brought on them their suffering or did not care about it. Nor did He ever forget them for a moment during all their trials. They thought He did; they said, “God hath forgotten us,” “He hath forgotten to be gracious”; but no; a mother might forget her child that she should not have compassion on it, but God would never forget His people. How could He? Had He not given them upon the palms of His hands (Isa 49:15)? Rather than His love being absent in the chastisement of His people, the chastisement itself was often a proof of their love, and we must expect more of God than of His people. How could He? Had He not given them upon the palms of His hands (Isa 49:15)? Rather than His love being absent in the chastisement of His people, the chastisement itself was often a proof of their love, and we must expect more of God than of His people. How could He? the mercy and love of God; "But God, being rich in mercy, for his great love wherewith he loved us, even when we were dead through trespasses, made us alive together with Christ," etc. It is because of this that we are granted a place in the heavenly kingdom (Eph 2:8). But the supreme manifestation of the love of God, as set forth in the Scripture, is that expressed in the gift of His only-begotten Son to die for the sins of the world (Jn 3:16; Rom 5:6–8; 1 Jn 4:9f), and through whom the sinful and repentant sons of men are taken into the family of God, and receive the adoption of sons (1 Jn 3:1f; Gal 4:4–6). From this wonderful love of God in Christ Jesus nothing in heaven or earth or hell, created or uncreated or to be created, shall be able to separate us (Rom 8:37f).

III. The Love of Man.—Whatever love there is in man, whether it be toward God or toward his fellow-man, has its source in God—"Love is God" (1 Jn 4:7f). As God sows, so will he reap. Those who are loved by God are the highest sorts of creatures. Heathen writers do not use it at all, their nearest approach to it being philanthropia or philadelphia—the love between those of the same blood. Love in the heart of man is the offspring of the love of God. Only the regenerate heart can truly love as God loves; to this higher form of love the unregenerate can lay no claim (1 Jn 4:7.19.21; 2:7–11; 3:10; 4:11f).

The regenerate man is able to see his fellow-man as God sees him, to value him, not so much because of what he is by reason of his sin and unloveliness, but because of what, through Christ, he may become; he sees man's intrinsic worth and possibility in Christ (2 Cor 5:14–17). This love is also created in the heart of man by the Holy Ghost (Rom 5:5), and is a fruit of the Spirit (Gal 5:22). It is also stimulated by the example of the Lord Jesus Christ, who, more than anyone else, manifested to the world the spirit and nature of true love (Mt 26:34; 18:12; Gal 2:20; Eph 5:25–27; 1 Jn 4:9f).

God must be the first and supreme object of man's love; He must be loved with all the heart, mind, soul, and strength (Mt 22:37f; Rom 12:9). To love only one's fellow-man is to make exalted the exhortation to supreme love to God is connected with the doctrine of the unity of God (Dt 6:4f)—nearly as much as the Divine Being is one and indivisible, so must our love to Him be undivided. Our love to God is shown in the keeping of His commandments (Ex 20:6; 1 Jn 5:3; 2 Jn ver.6). Love is here set forth as more than a mere affection or sentiment; it is something that manifests itself, not only in obedience to known Divine commandments, but also in a protecting and defence of them, and a seeking to know more and more of the will of God in order to express love for God in further obedience (cf Dt 10:12). Those who love God will hate evil and all forms of worldliness, as expressed in the avoidance of the lust of the eyes, the lust of the flesh and the pride of life (Ps 97:10; 1 Jn 2:15–17). Whatever there may be in his surroundings that would draw the soul away from God and righteousness, that the child of God will avoid. Christ, being God, was clothed with the flesh in our affections. He is to be chosen before father or mother, parent or child, brother or sister, or friend (Mt 10:35–38; Lk 14:26). The word "hate" in these passages does not mean to hate in the sense in which we use the word today. It is used in the sense in which Jacob is said to have "hated" Leah (Gen 29:31), that is, he loved her less than Rachel; "He loved also Rachel more than Leah" (ver 30). To love Christ supremely is the test of true discipleship (Lk 14:26), and a real unfailing of the heart is that which prove that we are really God's children by thus loving His Son (Jn 8:42). Absence of such love means, finally, eternal separation (1 Cor 16:22).

Man must love his fellow-man also. Love for the brotherhood is a natural consequence of the love of the fatherhood; for "In this the children of God are manifest, and the children of the devil: whatsoever doth not righteousness is not of God, neither he that loveth not his brother" (1 Jn 3:10). For a man to say "I love God" and yet hate his fellow-man is to brand himself as "a liar" (4:20): "He that loveth not his brother whom he hath seen, cannot love God whom he hath not seen" (ver 20); he that loveth God will love his brother also (ver 21).

The degree in which we are to love our fellow-man is "as thyself" (Mt 22:39), according to the strict observance of the law. Christ set before His followers a much higher example than that, however, According to the teaching of Jesus we are to supersede this standard: A new commandment I give unto you, that ye love one another (Jn 13:34). The exhibition of love of this character toward our fellow-man is the badge of true discipleship. It may be called the sum total of our duty toward our fellow-man, for "This is the commandment, That ye love one another" (1 Jn 4:11). Love therefore is the fulfilment of the law?; "for he that loveth his neighbor hath fulfilled the law" (Rom 13:8,10). The qualities which should characterize the love which we are to manifest toward one another are "true, steadfast, having no hypocrisy" (1 Jn 3:18–19). It is patient and without envy; it is not proud or self-elated, neither does it behave discourteously; it does not cherish evil, but keeps good account of the good; it rejoices not at the downfall of an enemy or competitor, but gladly hails his success; it is hopeful, trustful and forbearing—for such there is no law, for they need none; they have fulfilled the law.

Nor should it be overlooked that Our Lord commanded His children to love their enemies, those who would provoke evil of them, and destroy them (Mt 5:43–48). They were not to render evil for evil, but, contrariwise, blessing. The love of the disciple of Christ must manifest itself in supplying the necessities, not of our friends only (1 Jn 3:16–18), but also of our enemies (Rom 12:20,21).

Our love should be "without hypocrisy" (Rom 12:9); there should be no pretense about it; it should not be a thing of mere word or tongue, but a real experience manifesting itself in deed and truth (1 Jn 3:18). True love will find its expression in service to man: "Through love be servants one to another" (Gal 5:13). What more wonderful illustration can be found of ministering love than that set forth by Our Lord in the ministry of footwashing as found in Jn 13? Love beareth the infirmities of the weak, does not please itself, but seeketh the welfare of others (Rom 15:1–3; Phil 2:21; Gal 6:2; 1 Cor 10:24); it surrenders things which may be innocent in themselves but which nevertheless may become stumbling-block to others (Rom 14:15,21); it gladly forgives injuries (Eph 4:32), and gives the place of honor to another (Rom 12:10). What, then, is more vital than to possess such love? It is the fulfilment of the royal law ( Jas 2:8), and the ultimate aim of everything else (Col 3:14). It is the binder that holds all the other graces of the Christian life in place (Col 3:14); by the possession of such love we know that we have passed from death unto life (1 Jn 3:14), and it is the supreme test of our abiding in God and God in us (1 Jn 4:12,16).

LOVELY, lv'li (הבל, 'ahabh, ἡμηρία, הבל; προφιλαί, prosphiles): "Lovely" occurs only 4 t. In 2 S 1 23 it is the tr of 'ahabh, "to be loved" ("Saal and Jonathan were lovely and pleasant [AV 'amiable'], and where it seems to mean "loving" or "lovable.

Two other words are so trd in the OT: mahmādh, "desire," a "desirable" thing (Cant 5 16, "He is altogether lovely," that is, "lovable," to be desired," lit, "all of him lovely, blemish," or "desirableness"); γθήθινη, "loves," or "charms" (Ex 33 32, "Thou art unto them as a very lovely song," AVm "a song of loves," RVm "a love-song"); in ver 31 the same word is trd "much love," AVm They make loves or Jests"); in Phil 4 8 we have prosphiles, "very lovely," or "lovable," "whatev ser things are lovely."

LOVER, lv'er (ἡμηρία, 'ahabh, ἡμηρία, 'ahabh): In the OT 'ahabh, from 'ahabh, "to love," is sometimes "love" in the older Eng. sense of the word (K 5 1, "Hiram was ever a lover of David"); Ps 38 11; 88 18; Lam 1 2); more frequently it has the meaning of "lover" in the special sense, sometimes in the evil sense of the word (Jer 22 20; 22 30; 34 13; Ezek 16 33 36; Hos 2 5 7 10, etc); γθήθινη, "to love" (Jer 4 30), ἄρτος, "companion" (Jer 3 1); and γθήθινος, "loves," (Hos 8 9, are also trd "lovers" in this sense.

In the NT the simple word "lover" does not occur, but we have various compound words, philōtheos, of lover of God (2 Tim 3 4); philōgathos, lover of good, and philōzenos, lover of hospitality (Tit 1 8); philōtus, lover of self (2 Tim 3 2); philōdonos, lover of pleasure (2 Tim 3 4).

In RV we have, for "a lover of hospitality" (Tit 1 8), "given to"; for "covetous" (Lk 16 14; 2 Tim 3 2), "lovers of money"; for "not covetous" (1 Tim 3 3), "no lover of money"; for "despisers of that are good" (2 Tim 3 3), "no lovers of good."

LOVES, lv'vs (Ps 45 1, title). See Psalms.

LOVINGKINDNESS, lv'ing-kind'ness (חסד, ἡγεσθίνη): "Lovingkindness" in AV always represents this word (30 t), but of hegesthi there are many other renderings (20 t), in which the AV translates "mercifulness" (20 t), "goodness" (38), "goodness" (12). The word is derived from ḥgadh, meaning, perhaps, "to bend or bow oneself," "to incline oneself," hence "to be gracious or merciful.

ERV has not many changes, but in AV "lovingkindness" is invariably employed when hegesethi is used of God, and, as a rule, "kindness" when it is used of man, as in Gen 21 23; Jgs 1 24 (AV "mercy," RV "deal kindly"); Ruth 3 10; 2 Ch 32 32; 35 20; AV "goodness," m. Heb "kindness"; RV "good deeds"); Jer 6 14, etc. Of the uses of the word as on man's part toward God, the only occurrences are: Jer 2 2, "I remember for thee the kindness of thy youth, the love of thine espousals, etc," Hos 6 4, "Your goodness [RV 'mercy'] or for morning cloud a mercy," "I desire goodness [AV 'mercy,' RV 'loving-kindness'], and not sacrifice," which last passage may denote kindness as toward man.

When used of God hegesethi denotes, in general, "the Divine love descending to His creatures, more esp. to sinners, in answer to the merited kindness" (Delitzsch).

It is frequently associated with forgiveness, and is practically equivalent to "mercy" or "mercifulness" (Ex 20 6), "showing lovingkindness [ERV 'mercy'] unto thousands of them that love me"; 34 6, "slow to anger, and abundant in lovingkindness [ERV 'plenteous in mercy']"; (ver) "keeping lovingkindness [ERV 'mercy'] for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin" (cf Nu 14 18; Mic 7 18, "He retaineth not his anger for ever, because he delighteth in lovingkindness" [ERV 'mercy']). This quality in Jeh was one by which He sought to bind His people to Himself. It is greatly magnified in the OT, highly extolled and glorified in, in many of the psalms (Ps 136 has the constant refrain, "For his lovingkindness endureth forever"). In Dt 7 12 it is associated with the covenant, and in 2 S 7 15 with the covenant with David (cf Isa 55 3, etc.). It was something that could always be relied on.

Being such an essential and distinctive quality of God, the prophets taught that it should also characterize His people. It is part of the Divine requirement in Mic 6 8, "to love kindness" (cf Zec 7 9, "Show kindness and compassion every man to his brother"). The want of it in the nation was a cause of Jeh's controversy with them, e.g. Mic 4 1, "There is no truth, nor goodness (hēgesith) [AV and ERV 'mercy'], nor knowledge of God in the land; 12 6, "Therefore turn thou to thy God: keep kindness [AV and ERV 'mercy'] and justice, and wait for thy God continually.

Cheyne (EB) regards hegeseth as denoting of God's part, answered by filial and loyal affection and brotherly love on man's part (philadelaphia in the NT). The word "lovingkindness" does not occur in the NT, but as its equivalents we have such terms as "mercy," "goodness," "kindness," "brotherly love" (see special articles).

LOW COUNTRY. See SHEPHELAH.

LOWLAND, lů'land (ἐπώδεια, shephelah; cf Arab. لايبخ, sa'flāt, "the low part"): The western part of Pal, including the maritime plain and the foothills. There has been an attempt to restrict the term to the foothills, but as far as the more ancient documents are concerned, but there can be little doubt that the maritime plain should be included. RV has "lowland" throughout.

In the NT the word "lovingkindness" is in various PLURAL, low lāh, while AV has "low country" (2 Ch 26 10; 28 18), "low plains" (1 Ch 27 28; 2 Ch 9 27), "plain" (Jer 17 26; Ob 18; Zec 7 7), "valley" or "valley" (Dt 1 7; Josh 9 1; 10 40). See Country; SHEPHELAH.

ALFRED ERY DAY

LOZON, lů'zon (Ἀλόζων, Lozon): Head of a family of Solomon's servants (1 Esd 5 33); called "Darkon" in Ezr 2 50; Neh 7 58.

LUBIM, lū'bin (לן, labhām): A people mentioned in the OT (2 Ch 12 3; 16 8; Dnl 11 43; Nah 3 9). In all these cases the word is trd in AV "Libyans"; in RV only in Dnl 11 43. The people so named had their seat in North Africa, W. of Egypt (cf Acts 3 10, "the parts of Libya about Cyrene"). See LIBYA. On three different occasions the Libyans invaded Egypt, and at length, in the 10th cent. BC, succeeded in founding an Epyg dynasty under Shishak (q.v.).

LUCIFER, lū'si-fer, lū'si-fer: The morning star, an epithet of the planet Venus. See Astronomy, 11.

LUCIUS, lu'shi-us, lu'shu-is (Λούκιος, Lukiōs, Λούκιος, Lukios): A Rom consul who is said (1 Mace 16 16 ff) to have written a letter to Ptolemy Euergetes securing to Simon the high priest and to the Jews the protection of Rome. As the praenomen only of the consul is given, there has been much discussion as to the person intended. The weight of probability has been assigned to Lucius Calpurnius Piso, who was one of the consuls in 139–138 BC, the fact of his praenomen being Cneius and not Lucius being explained by an error in transcription and the fragmentary character of the documents. The authority of the Romans not being as yet thoroughly established in Asia, they were naturally anxious to form alliances with the kings of Egypt and with the Jews to keep Syria in check. The imperfections that are generally ascribed to the transcriptions of the Roman letters are not such as in any serious degree to invalidate the authority of the narrative in 1 Macc.

HUTCHISON

LUCIUS (Δούκος, Lukíos): This name is mentioned twice:
1. In the church at Antioch which sent out Barnabas and Saul as its missionaries were several prophets and teachers, among whom was Lucius of Cyrene (Acts 13 1). He was probably one of the group of Cyrians and Cyrene, who, when they came to Antioch, spoke unto the Greeks also (Acts 11 20). It has been suggested that he is the same as St. Luke, but this is merely conjecture.
2. "Lucius and Jason and Sosipater, my kinsmen," were among those who joined St. Paul in saluting the Galatians (Rom 16 21). By "kinsmen" St. Paul means "Jews" (cf Rom 9 3; 16 21). This Lucius may have been the same person as (1), but, as we have no more information about either, we cannot determine this.

LUKE, lú'k, ló'k (Luke, Lúkés, Ὅλοκ, Lúkês, Lóthès, Lóthim, Ὅλθημ, Ὅλθησις, "Lukites"); Λοῦκας, Λοῦκος, Λοῦκανδας, Loukadias; Tg Onk:

1. Two "Luke," lóðith: In Gen 10 13 Ludim differs appears as the firstborn of Mizraim Nation- alsities, and in 10 22 Lud is the fourth son of Sem. We have therefore to do with two different nationalities bearing the same name, and not always easy to distinguish. 1 Ch 1 17 17 simply repeat the statements of Gen 10 13 22. In Isa 66 19 Lud is mentioned with Tarshish and Put (generally regarded as a mistake for Phut), Tubal, Javan, and the Isles. Accepting this emendation, the passage agrees with Jer 46 9, where the Ludim are spoken of with Kush and Phut as the allies of Egypt; and also with Ezek 27 10, where Lud is referred to with Persia and Put as soldiers of Tyre. Lud, again, is mentioned with Ethiopia (Cush), and all the mingled peoples, Edom, and the children of the land which is in league (or, m "the land of the covenant"), which were all to fall by the sword (Ezek 30 5).

Coming to the Semitic Lud, it is to be noted that the Assyrians called Lydia Lúd(k̑), and that the ym, and the Semitic Lyd, according to Herodotus (1,7), was Ly- dos, and their first king, Agros, was descended from Ninos and Belos, i.e. Assyria and Babylonia. LuhiTh, luhi'hith, 150'hith, ASCENT OF (?λυκηθης, ma'lith ha-luḥith): A place named in Isa 15 5; Jer 48 5. It is clearly identical with the way, or descent, of Horonaim. Onom places LuhiTh between Areopolis and Zoar. Some way is intended by which fugitives from the Arabs of the uplands of the Moabite plateau. Gulf thinks it may be the road which leads from the district of the ancient Zoar on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea to the uplands through Wady Ben Hammad. Along this track also ran to the time of Horo- naim were the higher of the two places, this might account for the way being called the "descent" of Horonaim as going down from that place, and the "ascend" of LuhiTh as going up thence. Neither place can as yet be identified with certainty.

W. EWING

LUKE, lók, lúk, THE EVANGELIST: The name Luke (Λουκάς, Loukás) is apparently an abbrevia- tion for Λουκανδας, Loukandas. Old

1. Name

Lat MSS frequently have the words CATA LUCANTUM as the title of the Third Gospel. (But the form Λουκας, Loukios, is also found in inscriptions synonymous with Loukas; of Ramsey, Ebesos, December, 1912.)

It was a common fashion in the koiné to abbreviate proper names, as it is today; for that matter (of Amphipolis from Amph NONAAP, Amphion from AMPHION, A polunnia, Demas from Demetrios, Zenas from ZE NODORAS, etc; and see Jannaris, Historical & Grammar, I 287).

Paul alone names Luke (Col 4 14; 2 Tim 4 11; Philem ver 24). He does not mention Luke in the Gospel or in the Acts. Of the silence of the Fourth Gospel concerning the name of the apostle John. There was no particular occasion to mention Luke’s name in the Gospel, except as that of the author, if the late legend that Luke was one of the three 2. Mentioned.

Seventy sent out by Jesus (Epiphanius, Three Hær., ii, 51, 11) is pure conjecture, as is the story that Luke was one of the disciples who came to Philip for an introduction to Jesus (Jn 12 20 f.), or the companion of Cleopas in the walk to Emmaus (Lk 24 13). The clear implication of Lk 1 2 is that Luke himself was not an eyewitness of the history.

In Col 4 14 Luke is distinguished by Paul from those “of the circumcision” (Aristarchus, Mark, Jesus Justus). Epaphras, Luke, Demas form the gentle group. He was believed by the early Christian writers to have come directly from heathendom to Christianity. He may or may not have been a Jewish proselyte. His first appearance with Paul at Troas (of the “we”-sections, Acts 16 10-12) is in harmony with this idea. The classic introduction to the Gospel (1 1-4) shows that he was a man of culture (of Apollos and Paul). He was a man of the schools, and his Greek has a literary flavor only approached in the NT by Paul’s writings and by the Ep, to the He.

His home is very uncertain. The text of D (Codex Bezae) and several Latin authorities have a “we”-passage in Acts 11 27. If this reading, the so-called B text of Bezae is the original, then Luke was at Antioch and may have been present at the great event recorded in Acts 13 1 f. But it is possible that the Western text is an interpolation. At any rate, it is not likely that Luke is the same person as Luke of Acts 13 1. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller, 389 f) that Eusebius (HE, III, iv, 6) does not mean to say that Luke was a native of Antioch, but only that he had Antiochian family connections. Jerome calls him Lucus medicus Antiochenus. He certainly shows an interest in Antioch (cf Acts 11 19-20; 13 1; 14 16; 15 22; 23.30.35, 18 22). Antioch, of course, played a great part in the early work of Paul. Other stories make Luke live in Alexandria and Achaia and narrate that he was Achaia or Bithynia. But we know that he lived in Philippi for a considerable period. He first meets Paul at Troas just before the vision of the Man from Macedonia (Acts 16 10-12), and a conversation with Paul about Macedonia may well have been the human occasion of that vision and call. Luke remains in Philippi when Paul and Silas leave (Acts 16 40, “They...departed”). He is here when Paul comes back on his 3d tour bound for Jerusalem (Acts 20 3-5). He shows also a natural pride in the claims of Philippi to the primacy in the province as against Amphipolis and Thessalonica (Acts 16 12, “the first of the district”). On the whole, then, we may consider Philip as the home of Luke, though he was probably a man who had traveled a great deal, and may have been with Paul in Galatia before coming to Troas. He may have ministered to Paul in his sickness there (Gal 4 14). His later years were spent chiefly with Paul away from Philippi (cf Acts 20 3-28, on the way to Jerusalem, Acts 27 1, on the way to Rome) and at Caesarea, the voyage to Rome (and in Rome).

Paul (Col 4 14) expressly calls him “the beloved physician.” He was Paul’s medical adviser, and he had a close bond of friendship.

5. Physician.

He was a medical missionary, and probably kept up his general practice of medicine in connection with his work in Rome (cf Zahn, Intro, III, 1). He probably practised medicine in Malta (Acts 28 9 f). He naturally shows his fondness for medical terms in his books (cf Hobart, The Medical Language of St. Luke; Harnack, NT Studies: Luke the Physician, 175-98). Harnack adds some examples to those given by Hobart, who has done over the matter in reality. See, further, Acts of the Apostles.

It is possible, even probable (see Souter’s article in DCB), that in 2 Cor 8 18 “the brother” is equivalent to “the brother” of Titus just mentioned, that is, “his brother.” If so, we should know that Paul came into contact with Luke at Philippi on his way to Corinth during his 2d tour (cf also 2 Cor 12 18). It would thus be explained why in Acts the name of Titus does not occur, since he is the brother of Luke the author of the book.

If the reading of D in Acts 11 27 f is correct, Luke met Paul at Antioch before the 1st missionary tour. Otherwise it may not have been till Troas on the 2d tour. But he is the more or less constant companion of Paul from Philippi on the return to Jerusalem on the 3d tour till the 2 years in Rome at the close of the Acts. He was apparently not with Paul when Phil (2 20) was written, though, as we have seen, he was with Paul in Rome when he wrote Col and Phil. He was Paul’s sole companion for a while during the 2d Roman imprisonment (2 Tim 4 11). His devotion to Paul in this time of peril is beautiful.

8. Author.

Our interest in him is largely due to this fact and to his relations with Paul.

Gospel and Acts.

The Christian world owes him a great debt for his literary productions in the interest of the gospel.

One legend regarding Lukeis that he was a painter. Plummer (Comm. on Luke, xxxi f) thinks that the legend is older than is sometimes supposed and that it has a strong element of truth. It is true that he has drawn vivid scenes with his pen. The early artists were esp. fond of painting scenes from the Gospel of Lk. The allegorical figure of the ox or calf in Ezk 1 and Rev 4 has been applied to Luke’s Gospel.

Bliss, Philology of the Gospels (1898), has advanced the theory of reclassification of this Gospel (a longer and a shorter), such as he holds to be true of Acts. In the case of Luke, he says (Actus of the Apostles), but that is not true of the Gospel to any extent. The Western text of the Gospel is the shorter, and this is also the case in Acts. It is in other texts. The Western text of Acts, and in Acts it is, but instances Bliss has that the shorter text was issued after the longer and original text. His idea is that Luke himself revised and issued the shorter text. In itself this is, of course, possible, since the books are both drawn from a common source, but it is not without prejudice against the authorship of the Gospel. Either the author's name has been inserted, or the whole book has been written in this form. An example may be the case of any MSS and Acts. There is a common edition of the Gospels, but in the other MSS, it is the case of Acts. In Acts the text of the New Testament is the shorter text. It is not always true, however, for in 27 D it has the famous passage of man working on the Sabbath, which the other MSS do not give. In Luke 3:2 D has the reading of Ps 27 ("Thou art my Son; this day I have begotten thee") for the usual text. Zahn (Intro, III, 38) accepts this as the true text. There is no doubt of the interest and value of the Western readings in Luke, but these are not the passages which Bliss has carried point for point here.

The peculiar mutilation of the Gospels by Marcion has an effect on the MSS.

Plummer (Comm. on Lk, lxxvi) says: "In the second half of the 2d cent., this Gospel is recognized as authentic and authoritative; and it is impossible to show that it had not been thus recognized at a very much earlier date." The same is the case with the other MSS. Schmiedel (EB) says: "This tradition," however, cannot be traced farther back than toward the end of the 2d cent. (Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria and the Muratorian Fragment); there is no sound basis for the contention of Zahn (11, 17) that the earliest tradition of the tradition can also be found as early as in Marcion, because that writer, from his aversion to the Third Gospel (which nevertheless was the only one he admitted into his collection—with alterations it is true) omitted the expression of honor applied to Luke in Col. 4:14. Hence the two views are well stated. Schmiedel shows dogmatic bias and prejudice against Lk. Jülicher, however, frankly admits (Intro, 330) that "the ancient" were universally agreed that the writer with Lk was the disciple of Paul, who is mentioned in Phil. 24; 2 Tim 4:11, and called 'the physician' in Col 4:14; presumably a native of Antioch. This statement bears more directly on the question of authorship than of canonicity, but it is not the rather cavalier tone of Schmiedel, who is reluctant to admit the facts. The recognition of the Third Gospel in the Muratorian Canon (170 AD) is a fact of much significance. It was used in Tatian's Diatessaron (c 170 AD) as one of the four recognized Gospels (cf. Ephphatha, Diatessaron of Tatian, 2 ff). The fact that Marcion (140 AD) mutilated this Gospel to suit his theology and used it thus is even more significant (cf. Sanday, *Gospels in the 2d Cent., App.). Other heretics, like the Valentinians (cf. Lightfoot, Bib. Essays, 5-7) made use of it, and Heracleon (cf. Clem. Alex., Strom., iv.9) wrote a comment on it. Irenaeus (end of 2d cent.) makes frequent quotations from this Gospel. He argues that there could be only "four" Gospels because of the four points of the compass—a bald argument, to be sure, but a powerful testimony to the general acceptance of this Gospel along with the other three. It is needless to appeal to the presence of the Third Gospel in the Caezareian Syr., the Afric. Syr., the Copt. Syr., that date to the 2d cent., not to mention the probability of the early date of the Memphitic (Coptic) VSS. Examples of the early use of this Gospel occur in various writings of the 2d cent., as in Justin Martyr (150 AD), the Test. XII P (c 140 AD), Celsus (c AD 160), the Gospel of Peter (2d cent.), the Ep. of the Church of Lyons and Vienne (177 AD), probably also Did. (2d cent.), Clement of Alexandria (190-202 AD), Tertullian (190-220 AD). It is doubted that in either Rome, Ignatius, Polycarp; and the Ep. of Barnabas seems to make no use of the Third Gospel. But Clement of Rome, Ignatius and Polycarp quote Acts. But surely the general use and acceptance of the Third Gospel in the 2d cent. is beyond reasonable doubt. It is not easy to decide when the actual use began, because we have so little data from the 1st cent. (cf. Plummer, Comm., lxxii).

The fact that the author was not an apostle affected the order of the book in some lists. Most MSS and VSS have the common order of Acts. The Western order (Mt, Jn, Lk, Mk) is given by D, many Old Lat MSS, the Gothic VS, the Apos. Const. The object was probably to place the books by apostles together and first. The Old Lat k has Lk second (Jn, Lk, Mk, Mt), while the Curzontian Syr has Lk last of the four. The cur- vatives 90 and 399 also have Lk second.

The first writers who definitely name Luke as the author of the Third Gospel belong to the end of the 2d cent. They are the Canon of Muratori (possibly Philo), the authorship, Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and Jülicher. We have already seen that Jülicher (Intro, 330) admits that the ancients universally agreed that Luke wrote the Third Gospel. In the early part of the 2d cent., they held, as a rule, give the names of the authors of the Gospels quoted by them. It is not fair, therefore, to use their silence on this point as proof either of their ignorance of the author or of denial of Luke's authorship. Jülicher, for instance, says (Intro, 330): "There is no tradition worthy of the name concerning Luke, whom Papias did not mention, or at any rate did not mention." But we owe to Eusebius all the fragments that we have preserved from the writings of Papias. Our ignorance of Papias can hardly be charged up to him. Plummer (Comm., xii) says that nothing in Bib. criticism is more certain than the fact that Luke wrote the Third Gospel. On the other hand, Jülicher (Intro, 331) is not willing to let it go as easy as that. He demands appeal to Acts, and there (ib, 447) he denies the Lukian authorship save as to the "we" sections. J. Weiss (Die Schriften des Neuen Testaments; das Lukas Evang., 1866, 778) admits that but for Acts the authorship of the Gospel would exist for denying the authorship of the Third Gospel to Luke, the disciple of Paul. A Pauline point of view in this Gospel is admitted generally. Many modern critics take it for granted that the Lukian authorship of Acts is disproved, and hence that the Gospel likewise falls by the way. So argue Baur, Clemen, De Wette, Hauricht, Hilgenfeld, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Pflüger, Schürer, Spitta, von Boden, J. Weiss, Weizsäcker, Zeller. Men like Bliss, Credner, etc., who wrote against Luke, probably adopted the view of the Gospel itself. But it is not the case. In the 2d cent., the Gospels are cited as accepted as history, and are used in the church.
there shown that the line of argument which has convinced Harnack, the leader of the liberal criticism of Germany, ought to convince any open-minded critic. It means a good deal when Harnack (Luke the Physician, 14) says: "I subscribe to the words of Zahn (Bird, 11, 427): 'Hobart has proved for the case that it cannot be denied that the author of the Luke work was a man practised in the scientific language of Gr medicine—in short, a Gr physician.'" It is here assumed that the line of argument pursued in the art. on Acts is correct. But it remains to be done in the way of special proof for the Gospel. The author of Acts specifically refers (Acts 1:1) to a former treatise which was likewise addressed to Theophilus. This we find to be the case with the Gospel passing under the name of Luke (1:4). The critics who admit the Lukian authorship of Acts and deny the Lukian authorship of the Gospel are hardly worth considering.

It is, therefore, largely a work of supererogation to give at length the proof from internal grounds that Luke wrote the Gospel, after being convinced about Acts. Still it may be worth while to sketch in outline the line of argument, even though it is very simple. Plummer (Comm., xvii) argues three propositions: (1) The author of the Lukian Gospel is the author of the Acts. (2) The author of Acts was a companion of Paul. (3) This companion was St. Luke. Harnack (The acts of the Apostles in 1900, p. 208) takes these propositions, not as the explanation of the Acts, but as the theory that the same linguistic peculiarities connect Acts with Luke, including the "writings" of Luke. He accepts the facts set forth by Hawkins (Horae Syriacae) and adds others. He agrees, therefore, with the author of Acts being a companion of Paul. Harnack is convinced by the exhaustive labors of Hobart (Medical Language of St. Luke) that this author was a physician, as we know Luke to have been (Col 4:14). He shows this to be true of the author of Acts by the use of animal names in Acts 28:10, showing that the author of Acts received honors along with Paul, probably because he practiced medicine and thus rivaled Luke (Luke the Physician, 15). These medical terms occur in the Gospel of Luke also, and the same general linguistic style is found in both the Gospel and Acts. Hawkins has made a careful study of likenesses and variations in style in these two books of Luke (loc. cit., 15-29, 174-80). The argument is as conclusive as such a line of proof can be expected to be. For further discussion see Ramsay, Luke the Physician, 1898, 1-68; Zahn, Einleit. III, 116 ff.

There are no phenomena in the Gospel hostile to this position save the Sem character of chs 1 and 2 (harking the classical introduction 1:1-4). Luke, though Gentile, has in these chapters the most Sem narrative in the whole New Testament. He has the explanation here using Sem material (ethic or written), and has with truth the Sem character of his original. To a certain extent the same thing is true of the opening chapters of Acts.

The synoptic problem (see Gospels, Synoptici) remains the most difficult one in the realm of NT criticism. But it is not to be considered as in dispute. 4. Sources yields results that are yet true of Mt.

(1) Unity.—If the Lukian authorship of the book is accepted, there remains no serious doubt concerning the unity and integrity of the Gospel. The abridgment of Luke's Gospel used by Marcion does not discredit those portions of the Gospel omitted by him. They are omitted for doctrinal reasons (cf. the summaries in the 2 Ed. Cent., ch viii). His readings are of interest from the point of textual criticism, as are the quotations of other early writers, but his edition does not seriously challenge the value of Luke's work.

Luke's method.—Luke has announced his methods of work in a most elegant introduction (1:1-4). Here we catch a glimpse of the author's personality. That is not possible in Mk nor in Mt, and only indirectly in passing shadows in the Fourth Gospel. Here the author frankly takes the reader into his confidence and discloses his standpoint and qualifications for the great task. He writes as a contemporary about the recent past, always the most difficult history to interpret and often the most interesting. He speaks of "those matters which have been fulfilled among us," in our time. He does not himself claim to have been an eyewitness of "those matters." As we know already, Luke was a Gentile and apparently never saw Jesus in the flesh. He occupies thus a position outside of the great events which he is to record. He does not attempt to give a literal narrative, but he claims the historical spirit. He wishes to assure Theophilus of "the certainty concerning the things wherein thou wast instructed." He claims to have investigated "the course of all things accurate," but he is not the first as the historian would. He thus implies that some of the attempts made had been fragmentary at any rate, and to that extent inaccurate. He has also produced an "orderly" narrative by which Theophilus may gain a just conception of the historical progress of the events connected with the life of Jesus of Nazareth. The fact that "many have taken in hand to draw up a narrative concerning those matters" does not deter Luke from his task. The rather he is sturdy thereby ("it seemed good to me also") to give his interpretation of the life and work of Jesus as the result of his researches. He stands not farther away than one generation from the death of Jesus. He has the keen interest natural to a cultured follower of the Master. His work has become a great world-movement. He is able to get at the facts because he has had intercourse with eyewitnesses of Jesus and His work, "even as they delivered them unto us, who from the beginning were eyewitnesses and ministers of the word." Luke had abundant opportunity during the two years at Caesarea with Paul (Acts 24:26) to make careful and extended investigations. Many of the personal followers of Jesus were still living (1 Cor 15:5 ff.); it was a golden opportunity for Luke's purpose. He had also the written narratives which others ("many") had already drawn up. We are, then, to expect in Luke's Gospel a book closely akin to Acts in style and plan, with the historian's love of accuracy and order, with the author's own contribution in the assimilation and use of this oral and written material. One would not expect in such a writer slavish copying, but intelligent blending of the material into an artistic whole.

(2) The Author's Style.—The very first section of the Gospel (1:5—2:52) illustrates Luke's facility in the use of his material. Wellhausen drops these two chapters from his edition of Luke's Gospel as not worthy of consideration. What is that conjectural criticism run mad and is not to be justified by any good and right-minded one. It is time, that material did not form part of the current oral Gospel. In Mt the narrative of the birth of Jesus is given from the standpoint of Joseph, and Mary is kept in the background, according to Eastern feeling (Wright). But in Lk the story is told from Mary's point of view. Luke may, indeed, have seen Mary herself in the years 57—59 AD (58—60). He could easily have seen some of Mary's intimate friends who knew the real facts in the case. The facts were expressly said to have been kept in Mary's heart. We could understand this in light of the facts (of Ramsay, Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 74 f). It is not possible to discredit Luke's narrative of the Virgin Birth on a priori grounds (of Orr, The Virgin Birth of Christ, 1907; Sweet, Birth and Infancy of Jesus Christ, 1906). The curious Sem flavor of this narrative argues strongly for its genuineness, since Luke was a Greek. We do not know whether Luke knew Aram. or not. This was possible, since he spent these 2 years in Pal. We do not know whether this information came to him in written form (note esp. the hymans of Mary and of Zacharias) or oral tradition. But it is hard to credit a Greek the invention of these birth-narratives and poems which ring so true to the soil and the Heb. life. Immediately after Luke's statement about historical research comes the narrative of the birth of Jesus. It is the first illustration of his work on his sources.

(4) Luke's relation to Mark's Gospel.—Luke knew Mark in Rome (Col 4 10.14; Philem ver 24). He may have met him in Pal also. Had he seen Mark's Gospel when he wrote his own? Was it one of the "many" narratives that came under Luke's eye? Wright (of DCG) denies that Luke had our Mk. He admits that he may have had an Urmarkus or proto-Mk which he heard in oral form, but not the present (written) Gospel of Mk. He thinks that this can best be accounted for by the fact that sections in Mk have been added to Lk. But most modern critics have come to the conclusion that both Matthew and Luke had Mk before then as well as other sources. Matthew, if he used Mk, in the early chapters, followed a topical arrangement of his material, comparing Mk with other source or sources. But Luke has followed the order of Mk very closely in this part and indeed throughout. Luke has a special problem in 9 51—19 27, but the broad general outline follows that of Mk. But it cannot be said that Luke made a slavish use of Mk. If he had had this Gospel before him he gives his own touch to each incident and selects what best suits his purpose. It is not possible for us to tell always that motive, but it is idle to suppose that Luke blindly recorded every incident found in every document or every story that came to his ears. He implies in his introduction that he has made a selection out of the great mass of material and has woven it into a coherent and progressive narrative. We may admit with Harnack (New Testament Studies: Sayings of Jesus, 1911) that the Markan problem "has been treated with scientific thoroughness" and that Luke had Mk as one of his sources. The parallel between Lk and Mk in the narrative portion is easily seen in any History of the Gospels, like Brodais or Stevens and Burton.

(5) Q (Quelle) or the Logia.—It is a matter of more uncertainty when we come to the mass of material common to Mt and Lk, but absent from Mk. This is usually found in the discourses of Jesus. The more generally accepted theory today is that both Matthew and Luke made use of Mk and also this collection of Logia called Q for short (Ger. Quelle, "source"). But, while this theory may be adopted as a working hypothesis, it cannot be claimed that it is an established fact. Zahn (of Intro) stoutly stands up for the real authorship of the First Gospel of Matthew. Rev. Arthur Carr ("Further Notes on the Synoptic Problem," Expos, January, 1911, 543-553) argues strongly for the early date and Matthean authorship of the First Gospel. He says on the whole subject: "The synoptic problem which has of late engaged the speculation of some of our keenest and most laborious students is still unsolved. We do not doubt that Mark's Gospel. Wellhausen (Einleitung in die drei ertzen Evangien, 73-89) advocates the priority of Mark to Q. But Harnack balances the problem of "Q and St. Mark" (Sayings of Jesus, 193-233) and decides in favor of Q. In any case, it is to be noted that the result of critical research into the value of Q is to put it quite on a par with Mk. Harnack is quite impressed with the originality and vivid reality of the matter in Q. The material contained in Q cannot be given accurately as that in Mk, since we have the Gospel of Mk in our hands. Where both Mt and Lk give material not found in Mk, it is concluded that this is drawn from Q. But it cannot be shown that Matthew may not have used some parts of Lk and Mt at first others independently. Besides Q may have contained material not preserved either in Mt or Lk. A careful and detailed comparison of the material common to both Mt and Lk and absent from Mk may be found in Hawkins, Horae Synopticae, 197—233; Harnack, Einleitung, 66; Robertson, "Matthew" in Bible for Home and School, 14-19. But, if it is true that Luke made use of Q as of Mk, he was no mere copyist. No solution of the synoptic problem can ever be obtained on the idea that the Gospels are mere reproductions of previous documents. There was freedom in the use of all the material, both oral and written, and the writer gave his own interpretation to the result. It was often a repetition of the earlier work, but it was also a new arrangement, in which the writer's own ideas are given use, and in which they used, into literary form" (ib). The point of all this is that a great deal of criticism of the Gospels is attempting the impossible, for many of the variations cannot possibly be traced to any "source."

Wright (DCG) calls this editorial element "editorial notes"; that is, of course, often true when the author makes comments on the matters presented, but "ancient authors took immense pains to make the rude matters they used, into literal form" (ib). The point of this is that a great deal of criticism of the Gospels is attempting the impossible, for many of the variations cannot possibly be traced to any "source."

(6) Other sources.—There is a large block of material in Lk (9 51-18 14) which is given by him alone. There are various sayings like some reported by Matthew (or Mark) in other connections. Some of the incidents are similar to some given elsewhere by Matthew and Mark. There are various theories concerning the literary criticism of Lk. Some critics hold that Luke has here put a mass of material which he had left over, so to speak, and which he did not know where to locate, without any notion of order. Against this theory is the express statement of Luke that he wrote an orderly narrative (1 3 f). One is disposed to credit Luke's own interpretation unless the facts oppose it. It is common for traveling preachers, as was Jesus, to have similar experiences in different parts of the country and to repeat their favorite sayings. So teachers repeat many of their sayings each year to different classes. Indeed, it is just in this section of Lk that the best parts of his Gospel are found (the parables of the Good Samaritan, the Prodigal Son, the Pharisee and the Publican, etc.). "The more we consider this collection, the more we are entranced with it. It is the very cream of the Gospel, and yet (strange to say) it is peculiar to Luke" (Wright, DCG). Wright calls this a "Pauline collection," even though there is no originality of the material, but because the chapters breathe the cosmopolitan spirit of Paul. That is true, but Jesus loved the whole world. This side of the teaching of Jesus may have appealed to Luke powerfully because of its reflection in Paul. Matthew's Gospel was more narrowly Jewish in its outlook, and Mark's had fewer of the sayings of Christ. But it is to be noted that this special material in Lk extends more or less all through the Gospel. Burton (Some Principles of Literary Criticism and Their Application to the Synoptic Problem, 49) calls this special material in Lk 5:1—18 “the Perican document” and does not put any portion of the actual source of this material. Whether Luke has here followed one or more documents, he has, as elsewhere, given his own stamp to the whole, while preserving in a marvelous way the spirit of the New Testament (cf. the section of Lk and Jn see Robertson’s “Notes” to B Drews, Harmony of the Gospels, 249—52.) For the earlier material in Lk not found elsewhere (3 7–15, 17, 18; 4 28–13 [14.15], 16–30; 6 1–11, 6 21–49; 7 1—8 3) Burton suggests “the Galilean document” as the source. Wright, on the other hand, proposes “anonymous fragments” as the source of Luke's material not in the infancy narrative, nor in Mk, nor in Q. nor in the “Pauline” or Perican document. At any rate, it is certain that Luke's own words of explanation should warn us against drawing too narrow a line around the “sources” used by him. His “many” may well have included a dozen sources, or even more. But it may be said that Luke has certainly been able to learn on the subject has confirmed the statement of Luke himself concerning his method of research and his use of the material.

More fault has been found with Luke as a historian in Acts than in the Gospel. Harnack (Acts of the Apostles) is not disposed to give Luke full credit as a reliable historian. But Ramsay (Luke the Physician, 5) champions the reliability of Luke (cf also St. Paul the Traveller: The Church in the Roman Empire) against the skepticism of Harnack, which is growing less, since in Theol. Literaturzeiung (July 7, 1906, S. 4) he speaks well of Luke's ability to secure correct information. So in Luke the Physician (121–45) Harnack urges that the possible “instances of incredibility have been much exaggerated by critics.” He adds about Acts 5:36: “It is also possible that there is a mistake in Jos (cf Chase, Credibility of the Book of the Acts of the Apostles, 150).”

But the Gospel is not free from fault. The chief matter in the Gospel of Lk which is challenged on historical grounds, apart from the birth-narratives, which some scholars regard as legendary, is the census in Lk 2:1. Critics, who in general have accepted Luke’s version, have sometimes admitted that here he fell into error and confused the census under Quirinius in 6–7 AD when Quirinius came, after the banishment of Archelaus, to take a census and to collect taxes, much to the indignation of the Jews (cf Acts 5:37; Jos. Ant. XIX, 3, 1). It was not known that Quirinius had been governor of Syria before this time, nor was there any other knowledge of a census under Augustus. The case against Luke seemed strong. But Ramsay (Was Christ Born at Bethlehem? 227 ff.) shows that the inscription at Tiberias, as agreed by Mommaen and like authorities, since that Quirinius twice governed Syria as legatus of the divine Augustus,” he was consul in 12 BC, so that the census was after that date. Ramsay shows also from the papryi of the 14-year cycle was used in the Roman census (many census papers are known from AD 20. But the census was inserted by Augustus in 8 BC, herod, as a vassal king, was allowed to conduct census 16 in the Jewish fashion, not the Roman, and it was probably delayed several years in the provinces. Thus once more Luke is vindicated in a remarkable way (see Chronology of NT, 1, 1, 2 2).

The Acts of the Apostles has come out of the critical ordeal in a wonderful manner, so that Luke's credit as a historical writer is now very high among the critics. It has been tested and found correct on so many points that the presumption is in his favor where he cannot as yet be verified. Moffatt (Intro to the Lit. of the NT, 268) finds Luke “more graphic than historical.”

He was the most versatile of the Gospel writers. He was a Greek, a Christian, a physician, a man of travel, a man of world-outlook, sympathetic, cultured, poetic, spiritual, artistic, high-minded. His Prologue is the most classic piece of Gr in the NT, but the rest of the book show an unusual and even Sem in tone. The breadth of his literary equipment is thereby shown. He not only uses many medical terms common to technical circles, but he has the physician's interest in the sick and afflicted, which is shown in the parallels between the stories of Peter and of the man sick of palsy. His interest in the poor is not due to Ebionitic prejudice against the rich, but to human compassion for the distressed. His emphasis on the human side of the work of Jesus is not due to Ebionitic denial of the Divinity of Jesus, but to his keen appreciation of the richness of the human life of the Son of God. His rich and varied vocabulary reveals a man who read and mingled with the best life of his time. He wrote his books in the vernacular, but the elevated vernacular of an educated man touched with a distinct literary flavor. His poetic temperament is shown in the preservation of the beautiful hymns of the nativity and in the wonderful parables of Jesus in chs 13, 15—18. They are reported much as he himself told them, fond of showing Christ's sympathy with women and children, and he has more to say about prayer than the authors of the other Gospels. His interest in individuals is shown by the dedication of both his books to Theophilus. His cosmopolitan sympathies are natural in view of his training and inheritance, but part of it is doubtless due to his association with the apostle Paul. He comes to the interpretation of Jesus from a world-standpoint and does not go to the Pharisees for his limitations incident to one reared in Pa. It is a matter of rejoicing that we have this book, called by Renan the most beautiful book in the world, as a cultured Greek's interpretation of the origin of Christianity. He thus stands outside of the pale of Judaism and can see more clearly the world-relations and world-destiny of the new movement. With Luke, Jesus is distinctly the world's Saviour. The accent on sin is human sin, not specifically on Jewish sin. John in his Gospel came in his old age to look back upon the events of Christianity's first Jewish standpoint. But he rose to the essentially spiritual and eternal apprehension of Christ, rather than extended his vision, as Luke did, to the cosmopolitan mission and message of Jesus, though this did not escape John. Even the Gospel of Luke has points of affinity with Paul, John and the author of He in style and general standpoint. But while Luke's own style is manifest throughout, it is not obtrusive. He hides himself behind the wonderful portrait of Jesus which he has here drawn in undying colors.

The extreme position of Baur and Zeller may be dismissed at once. There is no reason for dating the Gospel of Lk in the 2d cent. on the ground that he used Marcion's Gospel, since it is not clear that Marcion made use of Lk. The supposed use of Jos by Luke (see Acts of the Apostles for discussion and refutation) leads a good number of radical scholars (Hilgenfeld, Holsten, Holtzmann, Jülicher, Krenkel, Weisseseker, Weizsäcker, Wrede) to the end of the 1st cent. This is still extreme, as Harnack had already shown in his Chronologica der altchristl. Lit., 1, 1897, 246–50. Any use of Jos by Luke is highly improbable (see Plummer on Lk, xxx). The Gospel was certainly written before the message of Marcion (Acts 1:1) and while Paul was alive, if 1 Tim 5:18 be taken as a quotation from Lk 10:7, which is by no means certain, however. But it is true that the most natural way to interpret the sudden close of Acts, after 2 years in Rome (Acts 28 31), is the fact that Luke finished the book before Acts 28 and 29 were written. Luke, in the literary history of the Acts, (e.g. Juel, 1890), calls this early date "reactionary" and "extravagant." But it is supported by Alford, Blass, Ehrard, Farrar, Glog, Godet, Grauf, Guerecke, Hahn, Headlam, Hitzig, Hofmann, Hug, Keil, Lange, Lumbry, Marshall, Nössen, Oscar, Reisch, Riehn, Schaaff, Schanz, Thiersch, Tholuck, Wieseler, and Harnack himself is now ready to join this goodly company. He warns critics against too hasty a closing of the chronological question (Acts of the Apostles, 291), and admits that Acts was written "perhaps so early as the beginning of the 7th decade of the 1st cent." [ib, 297] "the Acts (and therefore also the Gospel)." In the Date of the Acts and the Synoptic Gospels (1911, 124) Harnack says: "It seems now to be established beyond question that both books of this great historical order were written while St. Paul was still alive." There is an intermediate date about 80 AD, assigned by Adeney, Bartlett, Plummer, Sanday, Weiss, Wright, on the ground that the investigations published in Lk 1:1-13 describe the use of narratives which could have been written only after a long period of reflection. But that is not a valid objection. There is no sound critical reason why the Gospel of Mk, the infancy narratives, and all the rest should have been excluded from this period of Christian development which has not been in circulation in Pal by 55 AD. Indeed, Allen writes in Expos T (July, 1910): "I see no reason why such an original (Mark’s Gospel in Aram.) should not have appeared before the year 50 A.D. The objection to the early dates comes out of Lk 21 20, "Jesus compassed with armies" as compared with "the abomination of desolation in Lk 13 14. The change is so specific that it is held by some critics to be due to the fact that Luke was writing after the destruction of Jerusalem. But it is just as likely (Maclean) that Luke has here interpreted the Hebrews of Mk for his gentile readers. Besides, as Plummer (p. xxx) shows, Luke in 21 5-36 does not record the fact that Jesus was destroyed, nor does he change Christ’s "He to the mountains" to "Pella in North Persea," wither the Christians actually fled. Besides, the fact that Acts shows no acquaintance with Paul’s Epp. is best explained on the assumption of the early date. The question is thus practically settled in favor of the early date. The place of the writing is not known. The early date naturally falls in with Caesarea (Blass, Michaelis, Thiersch), but there is little to guide one.

LUNATIC (X), Lwnt-ak: I. Epilepsy.—The Eng. word “lunatic,” which in popular speech signifies a sufferer from any mental derangement, whether periodic or chronic,

1. Incorrect other than a purely medical or non-technical translation in AV as a tr of the Gr word selenidzomai, selenidzomai, in the two passages where it occurs. In RV the word has very properly been displaced by the strictly accurate term “epileptic.” This change is justified not only by the extra-Bib. usage (see Liddell and Scott, s.v.), but clearly enough by Mt 17 15 (cf 4 24), where epilepsy is circumstantially described.

The original meaning of the term selenidzomai, “moon-strut,” is connected with the popular belief, widespread and of strange persistence, that the moon, in certain phases, is injurious to human beings, esp in the case of diseases of a periodic or remittent character. There is no way by which to determine whether, in the NT times, this particular word represented a living and active belief or had passed into the state of usage in which the original metaphor disappears, and the word simply indicates the fact without reference to the idea embodied in the etymology. We still use the word “lunatic” to signify a person mentally diseased, although we have long since ceased to believe in the moon’s influence in such cases.

II. Madness.—The Bible designates “madness” or alienation of mind, by various terms, all of which seem to be onomatopoetic. These various words seem to be derived from the strange and fierce or mournful cries uttered by the unfortunate victims of this dread malady. In Dt 28 4 the word “maddened” is mahuqqa, part of mahuqqa, shaghah (cf also 1 S 21 15). With this corresponds the word maiwna, maiwna, in the NT. In 1 S 21 13 (Heb 14) the word is a form of the vb. maiwna, halal, which is also a derivative from the sound indicated.

In certain cases, though by no means uniformly, madness is ascribed to possession (Lk 8 26 f). One is struck by the fact that mental derangement occupies a very small place in Scripture.

LOUIS MATTHEWS SWEET

LURK, lurk. LURKING-PLACE. "Lurking" is a vb. "To lurk" means “to lie in wait,” usually with intent to do harm (see Ps 17 12; Prov 1 11). Lurking-place, a place of hiding, usually for the purpose of murder. See 1 S 23 23; Ps 10 8.

The subset, and vbs. arc: (1) Nepheth, in Ex 15 9 and Ps 75 13; "if he desire, he shall be satisfied!" "by asking food according to their desire." A strong but not sensual sense. (2) Skr'theth, meaning "obstinance," evil imagination. Jeh said (Ps 81 15), "I let them go after the stubbornness of their heart", a wilful self-satisfaction. (3) Ta'tawah, "a delight," "a longing satisfaction," and so it came to mean "sinful pleasure." Tr' in Ps 75 30, "that which they desired," intensely longed for, referring to Jeh's provision of food in the wilderness. Also in Nu 11 4 concerning "fleshly eat, it is said the multitude "lusted exceedingly," i.e. "craved eagerly." (4) Hamadeth, the vb. meaning "to delight in," "greatly below," "covet," probably for evil purposes. The young man is warned against the evil woman (Prov 6 25): "Lust not after her beauty." Here the bad sense is evident, for in the same connection are used such expressions as "harlot," "adulteress," "evil woman." (5) 'Avoth, meaning "greatly to desire," long after, with undue emphasis, with evil intent though not perhaps with impure thought. In Nu 11 34 reference is made to a place called kibhroth ha-ta'tawah, "the graves of lust," where "they buried the people that lusted." Ps 106 14 also refers to the Israelites with "lusted exceedingly," i.e. 12 15 21 "desire of thy soul"; 12 20; 14 26, "thy soul desireth." These Dt passages evidently mean lust only in the good sense.

In the OT, so in the NT we find both meanings of the word. Epithumia, and use unct.都被，and quently, and means a longing for the unlawful, hence concupiscence, desire, lust. The following references hold the idea, not only of sinful desire but also of "pleasure" as opposed to "spiritual," "heavenly," "the will of man," opposed to "the will of God," but also the sensual desire connected with adultery, fornication; vb. in Mt 5 28; Mk 4 19; Jn 8 44; Rom 1 24; 1 Cor 10 6; Gal 5 16 17 24; Tit 2 12; 1 Pet 1 14; 1 Jn 2 16 f; Jude vs 16 18; Rev 18 14. (2) H'odon, delight in sensuality, hence wicked pleasures; tr' in Jas 4 1.3 "pleasures;" "Your pleasures that war in your members," ye ask and ye are not given, but is in your pleasure; AV lust. (3) Epithumio means to crave intensely the wrong possession; tr' in Jas 4 5 "long [AV 'lusteth'] unto envying." (4) Orezia, used in Rom 1 27, from context evidently meaning 'lust' in the worst sense. (5) Pathia, the passion, inordinate affection, with the idea in it of suffering; tr' in 1 Thes 4 5 "passion of lust."

LUTE, lút ('lúth); neboth; thus RV; AV viol [Isa 5 12]: Nehel is rendered elsewhere by "psaltery" or "viol." The lute was originally an Arab instrument. It resembled a guitar, though with a longer and more slender neck. The name is derived from Arab al'ooed, with a of art. elided; hence Italian liuto; Fr. luth. See Music.

LUZ (lúz): The Heb word means "almond tree" or "almond wood" (OHL, s.v.). It also means "bone," particularly a bone of the spine, and might be applied to a rocky height supposed to resemble a backbone (Lagarde, 'Ubersicht', 157 f). Winckler explains it by Aram lauth, "asylum," which might be suitably applied to a sanctuary (Ge- schichte Israels). Cheyne (EB, s.v.) would derive it by corruption from lúzath, huláquth, "strong city."

(1) This was the ancient name of Bethel (Gen 28 19; Jgs 1 23; cf Gen 35 6; 48 3; Josh 16 2; 15 13). It has been thought that Josh 16 2 contradicts this, and that the two places were distinct. Referring to Gen 24 12, we see that the site of Bethel was given to "the place," ha-nákkáh, i.e. "the sanctuary," probably "the place" (ver 11, Heb) associated with the sacrifice of Abraham (12 8), which lay to the E. of Bethel. The name of the city as distinguished from "the place" was Luz. As the name of the sanctuary grew, we may suppose, its name overshadowed, and finally superseded, that of the neighboring town. The memory of the ancient nomenclature persisting among the people sufficiently explains the allusions in the passages cited.

(2) A Bethelite, the man who betrayed the city into the hands of the children of Joseph, went into the land of the Hittites, and there founded a city which he called Luz, after the ancient name of his native place (Jgs 1 26). No satisfactory identification has been suggested.

LYCAONIA, lik-ô-né-a, It-ka-ô'-ni-a (Δυκαονία, Lukaonía [Acts 14 6], Λυκαονία, Lukanis, Acts 14 11), "in the speech of Lycom,'" is Lycaonia is meant, according to the South Galatian view, by the expression την Γαλατικὴν χῶραν, την Λυκαόνικην χώραν, in Acts 18 23, and the incidents in Acts 16 1-4 belong to L.: Was a country in the southern part of Asia Minor, distinguished by its boundaries and extent varied at different periods. In the time of Paul, it was bounded on the N. by Galatia proper (but lay in the Rom province Galatia), on the E. by Cappadocia, on the S. by Cilicia Tracheia, and on the W. by Phrygia. The boundary of Phrygia and L. passed between Iconium and Lystra (see Iconium). L. consists of a level plain, waterless and treeless, rising at its southern fringe for some distance into the foothills of Taurus, and broken on its eastern side by the volcanic mass of Kara-Dagh and by many smaller hills. Strabo informs us that King Amyntas of Galatia fed many flocks of sheep on the Lycaonian plain. Much of the northern portion of L. has been proved by recent discovery to have belonged to the Rom emperors, who inherited the crown lands of Amyntas.

In Acts 14 6 L. is summed up as consisting of the cities of Lystra and Derbe and the district lying between and around them. This description refers to a particular division of Asia Minor, which alone is mentioned in the Bible. In the time of Paul, L. consisted of two parts, a western and an eastern. The western part was a "region," or subdivision of the province of Galatia; the eastern was called Lycaonia Antiochiana, after Antiochus of Commagene under whom it had been placed in 37 AD. This non-Rom portion was traversed by Paul; but nothing is recorded of his journey through it (see Danna). It included the important city of Laranda, and when L. is described as consisting of the cities of Lystra and Derbe and the surrounding district, the writer is clearly thinking only of the western portion of L., which lay in, and formed a "region" of the province Galatia. This is the tract of country which is meant in Acts 18 23, where it is called the "region" of Galatia, and placed side by side with Phrygia, another region of Galatia. The province Galatia was divided into districts technically known as "regions," and Rom L. is called the "region of Galatia." In implied contrast with Antiochian L., which lay outside the Rom province. Of the language of L. (see Lystra) nothing survives except some personal and place-names, which are discussed in Kretschmar's Ein- leitung in die Geschichte der griechischen Sprache.

LYCIA, lish'ah (Λυκία, Lūkia): An ancient country forming the southeast portion of Asia Minor. The surface of Lycia is exceedingly rugged, and its lofty mountains rise almost directly from the sea. Over them several trade routes or passes lead from the coast to the interior. Down the mountain sides rush many small rivers, of which the Xanthus is the chief. The history of L., like that of the neighboring countries, forms a part of the history of Asia Minor. Successively it was in the possession of the Persians, of Alexander the Great, of the Seleucid kings and of the Parthians. In the 1st cent. BC it fell into the hands of the Romans, who gave it to the island of Rhodes; 20 years later, because of its loyalty to Rome, it became free and independent (1 Macc 16:23). In 53 AD, during the reign of the emperor Claudius, it became a Roman province, and in 74 AD it was united with Pamphylia to form a double province over which a Roman governor presided.

At different times during the history of L., there were about 100 places which issued coins of their own. Pliny speaks of 70 cities which existed there, but in his age there were but 36. Of these, Patara, Myra and Phaselis are of interest to Bible students. From the coast city of Patara, according to the Acts 11:1, Paul took ship for Phoenicia. It was a place celebrated not only as a trading center, and a port of entry to the interior, but as the seat of the oracle of Apollo, and the birthplace of St. Nicholas. Myra, though over 2 miles from the coast, possessed a harbor, and was also a trading center. Here, according to Acts 27:5-38, Paul found a corn ship from Alexandria. For some time Myra was the capital of the Roman province; to Christendom it is esp. known as the home of St. Nicholas, who was its bishop and the patron saint of the city. There is a mountain on the border of Pamphylia, was also the home of the bishop.

I. was a stopping-place, rather than the scene of the active work of Paul, and therefore it figures little in the earliest history of Christianity. For a long time the people strongly opposed the introduction of a strange religion, and in 312 AD they even petitioned the Roman emperor Maximin against it. A portion of the petition has been discovered at Arykander.

LYDDA, lid'da. See Lod.

LYDIA, lid'ah (Λυ狄α, Ludia): An important country in the western part of Asia Minor bounded on the N. by Mysia, on the E. by Phrygia, on the S. by Caria, and on the W. by the Aegean Sea. Its surface is rugged, but along the valleys between its mountain ranges ran some of the most important highways from the coast cities to the distant interior. Of its many rivers the chief are the Cayster, the Lower Hermus, the Cogamos, the Caicus and, during a part of its course, the Maeander.

Lydia was an exceedingly ancient and powerful kingdom whose history is composed chiefly of that of its individual cities. In 546 BC it fell into the hands of the Persians, and in 334 BC it became a part of Alexander's empire. After the death of Alexander its possession was claimed by the kings both of Pergamos and of Seleucia, but in 190 BC it became the undisputed possession of the former (1 Macc 8:8). With the death of Attalus III, 133 BC, it was transferred by the will of that king to Rome, and L., which then became but a name, formed, along with Caria, Mysia and Phrygia, a part of the province of Lycia and of Caria. Among its cities were Smyrna and Ephesus, two of the most important in Asia Minor, and Smyrna is still the largest and wealthiest city of that part of Turkey. At Ephesus, the seat of the goddess Diana, Paul remained longer than elsewhere in Asia, and there his most important missionary work was done (Acts 19). Hence L. figures prominently in the early history of the church; it became Christianized during the residence of the apostle at Ephesus, or soon afterward (see also Lud.).

E. J. Banks

LYDIA, lid'ah (Λυ狄α, Ludia): The fem. of Lydian, a native of Lydia, a large country on the W. of Asia Minor, and the name of St. Paul's first convert in Europe. This name was a popular one for women (cf Horace Odes 1.8; iii.9; vi.20), but Ramsay thinks she was familiarly known in the town by the ethnic that showed her origin (HDB, s.v. "Lydia"); cf St. Paul the Traveller, 214). It has always been and is still a common custom in the Orient to refer to one living in a foreign land by employing the adj. which designates the nationality. Renan thinks it means "the Lydian"; Thyatira is a city of Lydia. Lydia was (1) living in Philippi, (2) of the city of Thyatira, (3) a seller of purple-dyed garments from her native town, and (4) "one that worshiped God." Her occupation shows her to have been a woman of some capital. The phrase which describes her religion (sebomène tón Théon) is a special designation for a proselyte. She was in the habit of frequently a place of prayer by a riverside, a situation convenient for the necessary ablutions required by the Jewish worship, and there Paul and his companions met her also. After she had been brought to St. Paul (Gr. impf.), the Lord opened her heart to give heed to his teaching ("To open is the part of God, to pay attention to that of the woman," Chrysostom). Her baptism and that of her household followed. To prove her sincerity she besought the missionaries to accept the hospitality of her home. Her house probably became the center for the church in Philippi (Acts 16:14.15.40). L. is not mentioned in St. Paul's letter to the Philippians, but, if Ramsay be correct, she may have been Euodia or Syntyche (Phil 4:2). S. F. Hunter

LYING, li'ing. See Lie.

LYSANIAS, lys-an'ias (Λυσάνιας, Lūsanias): Mentioned in Lk 3:1 as tmarch of Asia in the 15th year of the reign of Tiberius Caesar, and thus fixing the date of the preaching of John the Baptist in the wilderness at about 26 or 28 AD. Lysanias is mentioned by Jos as having ruled over Chaleia and Abilene, and as having been slain by Mark Antony at the instigation of Cleopatra. As this happened about 36 BC, Luke has been charged with inaccuracy. Inscriptions, however, corroborate the view that the L. of Luke was probably a descendant of the L. mentioned by Jos (see Schürer, Hist, JF, iv.1, Vol ii, App. 1, p. 338). C. M. Kerr

LYSIA, lys'ah (Λυσία, Lūsia): (1) "A noble man, and one of the blood royal" whom Antiochus Epiphanes (c 168 BC) left with the government of Southern Syria and the guardianship of his son, while he went in person into Persia to collect the revenues which were not coming in satisfactorily (1 Macc 3:22; 2 Macc 10:11). According to Jos (Ant., XII, vii, 2), the instructions of Lysias were "to conquer Judæa, enslave its inhabitants, utterly destroy Jerus and abolish the whole nation." L., accordingly, armed against Judas Maccabaeus a large force under Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, Nicanor and Gorgias. Of this force Judas defeated the two divisions under Nicor and Gorgias near Emmaus (166 BC), and in the following year L. himself at Bethsura (1 Mace 4), after which he proceeded to the purification of the temple. In the narration of these campaigns there are considerable differences between the writers of 1 Mace and 2 Mace which scholars have not found easy to explain. Antiochus died at Babylon on his Pers expedition (164 BC), and L. assumed the office of regent during the minority of his son, who was yet a child (1 Mace 6 17). He collected another army at Antioch, and after the recapture of Bethsura was besieging Jerus when he learned of the approach of Philip to whom Antiochus, on his deathbed, had intrusted the guardianship of the prince (1 Mace 6 15; 2 Mace 13). He defeated Philip in 163 BC and was supported at Rome, but in the following year he fell with his ward Antiochus into the hands of Demetrius I (Soter), who put both of them to death (1 Mace 7 1–23).

(2) See Claudius Lysias (Acts 23 26).

LYSIMACHUS, L.-sí-ma-khos (Λυσιμαχός, Lusimachos): (1) The son of Ptolemy, of Jerus, is named (Ad Est 11 1) as the interpreter (translator of the Rest of Esther into Gr). See Est. 2 Mace 11 29. (2) Brother of Menelaus, a Gr name said by Jos (Ant. XII, v 1) to have been assumed by Onias, the high priest in the hellenizing days of Antiochus Epiphanes, as the Jewish name Jesus was changed to Jason. When Menelaus was summoned to Antioch (2 Mace 4 29) on a charge of malversation, he left L. as his deputy in the priesthood at Jerus. L. robbed the temple and caused an insurrection in which he met his death beside the treasury (2 Mace 4 42). The name of L. does not appear in the narrative of these events given by Jos.

LYSTRA, lis'tra: The forms Λυστρα, Lāstran, and Λυστρος, Lāstrōs, occur. Such variation in the gender of Anatolian city-names is common (see Harnack, Apostelgeschichte, 86; Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 128). Lystra was visited by Paul 4 t (Acts 14 6 21; 16 1; 18 23—the last according to the “South Galatian” theory), and is mentioned in 2 Tim 3 5–10 as one of the places where Paul suffered persecution. Timothy resided in L. (Acts 16 1). L. owed its importance, and the attention which Paul paid to it, to the fact that it had been made a Rom colonia by Augustus (see As- trocorn), and was therefore, in the time of Paul, a center of education and enlightenement. Nothing is known of its earlier, and little of its later, history. The site of L. was placed by Leake (1820) at a hill near Khātura Sarān, 18 miles S.S.W. from Iconium; this identification was proved correct by an inscription found by Sterrett in 1885. The boundary between Phrygia and Lycaonia passed between Iconium and L. (Acts 14 6) (see Iconium).

The population of L. consisted of the local aris- tocracy of Rom soldiers who formed the garrison of the colonia, of Greeks and Jews (Acts 16 1 8), and of native Lycaonians (Acts 14 11).

After Paul had healed a life-long cripple at L., the native population (the “multitude” of Acts 14 11) regarded him and Barnabas as Zeus and Paul as Hermes. Commentators on this incident usually point out that the same pair of divinities appeared to Baucis and Philemon in Ovid’s well-known story, which he locates in the neighboring Phrygia. The accuracy in detail of this part of the narrative in Acts has been strikingly confirmed by recent epi-graphic discovery. Two inscriptions found in the neighborhood of L. in 1909 run as follows: (1) “Kakkan and Maramoon and Iman Linium priests of Zeus”; (2) “Toous Macrinus also called Abas-cantus and Batasis son of Bretasis having made in accordance with a vow at their own expense [a statue of] Hermes Most Great along with a sun-dial dedicated it to Zeus the sun-god.”

Now it is evident from the narrative in Acts that the people who were prepared to worship Paul and Barnabas as gods were not Greeks or Romans, but native Lycaonians. This is conclusively brought out by the use of the phrase “in the speech of Lycaonia” (Acts 14 11). The language in ordinary use among the educated classes in Central Anatolian cities under the Rom Empire was Gr; in some of those cities, and esp. of course, in Rom colonies, Lat also was understood, and it was used at this period in official documents. But the Anatolian element in the population of those cities continued for a long time to use the native language (e.g. Phrygian was in use at Iconium till the 3d cent. of our era; see Iconium). In the story in Acts, a fast distinction is implied, and in fact existed, between the ideas and practices of the Greeks and the Rom colonists and those of the natives. This distinction would naturally maintain itself most vigorously in so conservative an institution as religious ritual and legend. We should therefore expect to find that the association between Zeus and Hermes indicated in Acts belonged to the religious system of the native population, rather than to that of the educated society of the colony. And this is precisely the character of the cult illustrated in our two inscriptions. It is essentially a native cult, under a thin Gr disguise. The names in those inscriptions can only have been the names of natives; the Zeus and Hermes of Acts and of our inscriptions were a grecized version of the Father-god and Mother-goddess of the native Anatolian system. The college of priests which appears in inscription no. 1 (supporting the Bezan variant “priestess” for “priest” in Acts 14 13) was a regular Anatolian institution. The miracle performed by Paul, and his companionship with Barnabas would naturally suggest to the natives who used the “speech of Lycaonia” a pair of gods commonly associated by them in a local cult. The two gods whose names rose to their lips are now known to have been associated by the dedication of a statue of one in a temple, of the other in the neighborhood of L.

MAACAH, MAACHAH, mā'a-ka (מָאָכָא, ma‘akkā),

(1) B, Moṣhā, Moṣched, A, Moṣḥā, Moṣched, daughter of Nathan, born to him by Reumah (Gen 22:24).

(2) B, Moṣḥā, Moṣched, A, Moṣḥāḏ, Moṣchath, the one wife of David who was of royal rank, the daughter of Talmi, king of Gezher, who became the mother of Absalom (2 S 3 3; 1 Ch 3 2).

(3) Moṣched, father of Achish, king of Gath (1 K 2 39). He is probably referred to as “Moosh” in 1 S 27 2.

(4) Daughter of Absalom, the favored wife of Rehoboam, and mother of Abijah (1 K 15 2; 2 Ch 11 20, etc.). Evidently “daughter” must here be understood as “granddaughter,” according to a common oriental usage. Tamar was the only daughter of Absalom. If Tamar married Uriel of Gibea (2 Ch 13 2), then Maachah was her daughter. In that case the name Miciaah in this passage would be either a copyist’s error or a variant of Maachah. She must have been a woman of strong personality. Unfortunately her influence was cast upon the side of idolatry. She maintained her position in the palace, however, till the reign of her grandson Assa. Possibly she acted as regent during his minority. Ultimately she was degraded by him for an act of peculiar infamy (1 K 16 13; 2 Ch 15 16).

(5) Concubine of Caleb, son of Hezon (1 Ch 2 48).

(6) Sister of Huppim and Shuppim the Benjaminites, who became the wife of Maḥbir the Manassite, the “father” of Gilead (1 Ch 7 12 15 f).

(7) Wife of Joel, the “father” of Gibon, an ancestress of King Saul (1 Ch 8 29; 9 35).

(8) Father of Hanan, one of David’s mighty men (1 Ch 11 45).

(9) Father of Shephatiah, ruler of the Simeonites under David (1 Ch 27 16).

M A C A H, mā’a-ka (מָאָכָה, ma‘akkā; B, Moṣhā, Moṣched; A, Moṣḥā, Moṣched, Moṣḥāḏ, Moṣchath; A, Moṣḥāḏ, Moṣchath; A, Moṣḥāḏ, Moṣchath): A small Syrian kingdom, adjoining that of Geshur on the western border of Bashan, the inhabitants of which were called Maachathites (RV “Maachathites”), whose territory was taken by Jair (Dt 3 14; Josh 13 5). The border of the Geshurites and the Maachathites and all the Ammonites were given to the half-trib of Manasseh (Josh 13 11). The inhabitants of these kingdoms, however, were not driven out by Israel (ver 13), and at a later day the children of Ammon hired mercenaries from Maacah for their encounter with David. The armies met near Medeba when the “Syrians” from Maacah found themselves opposed to Joab. That famous captain completely routed them (2 S 10 6 ff; LXX “Amelek’”). In 1 Ch 19 6 it is called Aram-ma‘achah, Syria-ma‘achah (AV); and in 1 Ch 22 23 “Aram” appears instead of “Ma‘achah.”

It evidently lay between Geshur on the S. and Hermon on the N., being probably bounded by Jordan on the W., although no certain indication of boundaries has been fixed in by Israel, which accounts for “Geshur and Maacah dwell in the midst of Israel” (Josh 13 13). It is possible that Abel-beth-ma‘achah may have been a colony founded by men from Maacah.

MAARTH, mā-a-rah (מָאָרַת, ma‘ārāת): A city in the hill country of Judah, mentioned between Gedor and Beth-anoth (Josh 15 59). The small village of Be’it Ummar upon the watershed, a little to the W. of the carriage road to Hebron and about a mile from Kh. Jedär (Gedor), is a probable site. There are some rock tombs to its E. The village mosque is dedicated to Nebi Matta, i.e. St. Matthew. See PEF, III, 305, Sh XXI.

The place where the men of Israel lay in ambush, from which they broke forth upon the children of Benjamin (Jgs 20 33). AV renders “the meadows of Gibeah,” RV “the meadow of Gaba [or Gibeah].” LXX A affords a clue to the correct reading. It is not a place-name. The text must be emended to read mimmu-‘ārāth ‘yēghēḇa’, “to the W. of Gaba.” Pesh suggests a reading mimmu-‘ārāth ṣēghēḇa’, “from the cave of Gaba.” This, however, there is nothing to warrant. W. LITERATURE

The name Maccabaeus was first applied to Judas, one of the sons of Mattathias generally called in Eng. the Maccabees, a celebrated family who defended Jewish rights and customs in the 2nd cent. BC (1 Macc 1 1-3). The word has been variously derived (e.g. as the initial letters of Mt Khā-mākhā, Bā'-elīm Yahweh? "Who is like unto thee among the mighty, O Jehovah?") but it is probably best associated with makhābāhā, "hammer," and as applied to Judas may be compared with the malleus Seclorum and malleus haeminaeus of ages (see next article). To understand the work of the Maccabees, it is necessary to take note of the relation in which the Jews and Pal stood at the time to the immediately neighboring nations.

1. Palestine under Kings of Syria.—On the division of Alexander's empire at his death in the year 323 BC, Pal became a sort of buffer state between Egypt and the Seleucid kings of Syria, and under Egypt, the house of Seleucus, the last survivor of Alexander's generals, on the N. The kings of Syria, as the Seleucid kings are generally called, though their dominion extended practically from the Mediterranean Sea to India, had not all the same name, like the Ptolemies of Egypt, though most of them were called either Seleucus or Antiochus. For a hundred years after the death of Alexander, the struggle went on as to which of the two powers was to govern Pal, until in the year 223 came the northern prince under whom Pal was destined to fall to the Seleucids for good.

This was Antiochus III, commonly known as Antiochus the Great. He waged two campaigns against Egypt for the possession of Palestine, Pal, finally gaining the upper hand in Syria under the year 198 BC, by his victory at Panium, so called from its proximity the Great, it being a sanctuary of the god Pan, a spot close to the sources of the Jordan and still called Banias. The Jews helped Antiochus to gain the victory, and, according to his rule, which was accepted by the Jews with good will. It is with him and his successors that the Jews have now to deal. Antiochus, it should be noticed, came in contact with the Romans after their conquest of Macedonia in 179, and was defeated by Scipio Asiaticus at Magnesia in 190. He came under heavy tribute which he found it difficult to pay, and met his end in 187, while plundering a Gr temple in order to secure its contents. His son and successor Seleucus IV was murdered by his prime minister Heliodorus in 175-175 BC, who reaped no benefit from his crime.

The brother of the murdered king succeeded to the throne as Antiochus IV, generally known as Antiochus Epiphanes ("the Illustrious"), a typical eastern ruler of considerable ability, whose early training while a hostage Epiphanes at Rome had made him an adept in dissimulation. Educated in the fashionable Hellenism of the day, he made it his aim during his reign (175-164 BC) to enforce it upon his empire, a policy which brought him into conflict with the Jews. Even before his reign many Jews had yielded to the attraction of Gr thought and custom, and the accession of a ruler like Antiochus Epiphanes greatly increased the drift in that direction, as will be found described in the article dealing with the period between the Old and the New Testaments (see BETWEEN THE TESTAMENTS). Fious Jews meanwhile, men faithful to the Jewish tradition, Chăṣṭîlm (see ḤAS'DĀRANS), as they were called, resisted this tendency, and in the end were driven to armed resistance against the severe oppression practised by Antiochus in advancing his Hellenizing views. See ASIONEANS.

II. Palestine under the Maccabees.—Mattathias, a priest of the first of the 24 courses and therefore of the noblest who dwelt at Modin, a city of Judah, was the first to strike a blow. With his own hand he slew a Jew at Modin, who was willing to offer the idolatrous sacrifices ordered by the king, and also Apelles, the leader of the...

Book of the House of the Hasmonaens’ (of the rabbinical name given above). In the Gr MSS N, AV (Cod. Venetus), the 4 books go under the designation Makkabaios, Makkabaios, A B Τ Δ, ββββ, ββββ, being understood. In the Vulg the 1st and 2d books are alone found, and appear under the name Maccabaeorum, Maccabaeorum. The spelling Maccabaeorum reproduces probably the pronunciation current in Jerome’s day.

The name “Maccabea” belongs strictly only to Judas, who in 2 Macc is usually called “the Maccabeus, ha Makkabaios.” But the epithet came to be applied to the whole family and their descendants. The word means probably “extinguisher” (of persecution) (“נבל, makkbi,” from קבך, ‘to be extinguished’); so Niese; Jos, Ant, X, vii, 1 f.; S. J. Curtis, The Name Maccabea. bee. The more usual explanation, “hammerer” (“נבל, makkbbhay), is untenable, as the noun from which it is derived (נבל, makkbebeth) (Igs 4 21) denotes a smith’s hammer.

Since the Vulg includes only the first 2 books of Macc, these are the only books pronounced canon, and included in recognized Protestant VSS of the Apoc (see Apocrypha). That 1 Macc was used largely in the early Christian church is proved by the numerous references made to it and the last name stated that 1 Macc is uncanonical, and it is excluded from the lists of canonical writings given by Athanasius (d. 373), Cyril of Jerus (d. 386), and Gregory of Nazianzus (d. 390). Indeed, none of the books of the Macc was recognized as canonical until the Council of Trent (1563) gave this rank to the first 2 books, and Protestants continue in their confession to exclude the whole of the Apoc from the Bible proper, though Luther maintained that 1 Macc was more worthy of a place in the Canon than many books now included in it.

1. Macc gives first of all a brief view of the reign of Alexander the Great and the partition of his kingdom among his successors. Having thus explained the origin of the Seleucid Dynasty, the author proceeds to give a history of the Jewish people from the accession of Antiochus IV, king of Syria (175 BC), to the death of Simon (155 BC). The events of these 40 years are simply but graphically related, as an exposition of the order of their occurrence. The contents of 1 Macc and 2 Macc 4–15 are in large part dealing with the same incidents; but the simple narrative character of 1 Macc, in contrast to the didactic and highly religious as well as supernatural coloring of 2 Macc, can easily be seen in these corresponding parts. The victories due to heroism in 1 Macc are commonly ascribed to miraculous intervention on the part of God in 2 Macc (see 1 Macc 1 1 f.; cf 2 Macc 8 23 f). 2 Macc is more given to exaggerations. The army of Judas at Bethsura consists of 10,000 according to 1 Macc 4 29, but of 80,000 according to 2 Macc 11 2. The following is a brief analysis of 1 Macc.

1. 1–10: An account of the rise of the Seleucid Dynasty.
2. 11–16: History of the Jews from 175 to 155 BC.

(a) 1 1–64: Introductory. Some Jews inclined to adopt Greco customs (religious, etc.); Antiochus’ aim to conquer and suppress the Jewish religion as a source of Jewish disloyalty. Desecration of the Jewish temple: martyrdom of many faithful Jews.
(b) 2 2–70: The revolt of Mattathias.
(d) 9 25–12 53: Leadership of Jonathan, 5th son of Mattathias, Mace, and successor of Judas. He becomes high priest. Political independence of Judaea secured.

3. Contents

(a) 13 31–16 24: Peaceful and prosperous rule of Simon, brother of Jonathan; accession of his son John Hyrcanus (135 BC).

That the author of 1 Macc aims at giving a correct narrative, and that on the whole his account is correct, is the opinion of practically all scholars. The simple, straightforward way in which he writes inspires confidence, and there can be no doubt that we have here a first-class authority for the period covered (175–135 BC). It is the earliest Jewish history which dates events in reference to a definite era, this era being that of the Seleucids, 312 BC, the year of the founding of that dynasty. The aid received from God is frequently recognized in the book (2 51 ff.; 3 18; 4 10 f.; 9 46; 16 3), yet it is mainly through personal valor that the Jews conquer, not, as in 2 Macc (see III, 3 below), through miraculous Divine interpositions. Ordinary, secondary causes are almost the only ones taken into account, so that the record may be relied upon as on the whole trustworthy. Yet the writer shows the defects which belong to his age and environment, or what from the standpoint of literal historicity must be counted defects, though, as in the case of 2 Macc (cf Ch), a writer may have other aims than to record bare objective facts. In 1 1–9 the author errs through ignorance of the real facts as regards Alexander’s partition of his kingdom; and other mistakes of facts due to the cause occur in 10 1 f. (Alexander [Balas], son of Antiochus Epiphanes) and in 13 31 ff. (time of assassination of Antiochus VI by Tryphon). In 6 37 it is said there were 32 men upon each elephant, perhaps a misreading of the original number. Although the Indian elephant corps of today carries more.

We know nothing of a Pers village Elymais (6 1). The number of Jewish warriors that fought and the number slain are understated, while there are evident exaggerations of the number of soldiers who fought against them and of those of whom they were left dead on the field (see 4 15; 7 46; 11 45–51, etc.).

But in this book, prayers, speeches and official records abound as they do in Ezra, Nehemiah (see Century Bible, “Ezr,” “Neh.” “Est.” 12 8), and many modern Protestant writers doubt or deny the authenticity of a part of those, though that is not necessarily to question their genuineness as part of the original narrative.

As regards the prayers (3 50–54; 4 30–33) and speeches (2 7–13; 2 50–68; 4 6–11, etc.) there is no valid reason for doubting that they give at least the substance of what was originally said or written, though ancient historians like Thucydides and Livy think it quite right to edit the speeches of their characters, abbreviating, expanding or altering. Besides, it is to be remembered that the art of stenography is a modern one; even Dr. Johnson, in default of verbatim reports, had to a large extent to make the speeches which he ostensibly reported. There is, however, in the book a large number of official documents, and it is in regard to the authenticity of these that modern criticism has expressed greatest doubt. They are the following:

1. Letter of the Jews in Gilead to Judas (5 10–13).
2. Treaty of alliance between the Romans and Jews; copy written on brass tablets sent to Judas (5 39–32).
4. Letter from King Demetrius I to Jonathan (10 20–45).
6. Letter from King Demetrius I to Jonathan, making the latter high priest (11 57).
7. Letter from Jonathan to the Spartans, asking for an alliance (12 5–18).
8. Letter from the Spartan king Artus to the high priest Onias (12 39–51).
9. Letter from King Demetrius II to Simon (13 36–40).

4. History
(10) Letter from the Spartans to Simon (14 20-24).
(11) A Jew reciting the services of Simon and his brothers (14 27-45).
(12) Letters from Antichus VII (Sidetes) to Simon (15 2-9).
(13) Message from the Rom consul Lucius to Ptolemy, king of Egypt, asking for protection for the Jews (15 16-21).
A copy was sent to Simon (15 24).

Formerly the authenticity of this state documents was accepted without doubt, as they are still by Romanist commentators (Wetzel, Schols, etc.). At most they are but translations of the originals, which in the language of the books, was written in Gr. and Lat. from which the author would translate into Heb.
The Gr. of our book is a tr from the Heb (see II, 8 below).

Ravlinson (Speaker’s Apoc, II, 329) says these documents “have a general air of authenticity.” Most modern scholars reject the letters purporting to emanate from the Romans (nos. 2 and 13 above) and from the Spartans (nos. 8, 10 above), together with Jonathan’s message to the latter (no. 7, above), on the ground that they contain some historical inaccuracies and imply others. How could one consil issue official mandates in the name of the Rom republic (see no. 13, above)? In no. 8 above, it is the king of the Spartans who writes on behalf of his people to the highest priest; but it is the emperors or rulers who write for the Spartans to Simon. Why the difference? Moreover, in 12 21 the Spartans and Jews are said to be kinsmen (lit. brothers), both alike being descendants of Abraham; so also 14 20. This is admittedly contrary to fact. For a careful examination of these official documents and their objective value, see Kautzsch, Die Apokryphen des AT, 27-30. Though, however, these documents and some others can be proved incorrect as they stand, they do seem to imply actual negotiations of the kind described; i.e. the Jews must have had communications with the Romans and Spartans, the Jews of Gilead must have sent a missive to Judas (no. 1), Alexander Balaus did not write to Jonathan, etc., though the author of 1 Macc puts the matter in his own way, coloring it by his own patriotic and religious prejudices.

Though the name of the author is unknown, the book itself supplies conclusive evidence that he belonged to the Sadducee party, the party favored by the Hasmonaean dynasty.

5. Author’s Standpoint
The aim of the writer is evidently historical and patriotic, yet his attitude toward religious questions is clearly indicated, both directly and indirectly.

(1) Name of the book is the Divine Being mentioned under any name except Heaven (3 18 f. 50.60; 4 10.55; 12 15, etc.), a designation common in rabbinical Heb (Talm, etc.). As early as 300 BC the sacred name “Yahweh” was discarded in favor of “Adonai” (Lord) for superstitious reasons. But in 1 Macc no strictly Divine name meets us at all. This would seem to indicate the idea of a certain aloofness of God, such as characterized the theology of the Sadducee party. Contrast this with the mystical closeness of God realized and expressed by the prophets and prophets of the OT.

(2) The author is a religious patriot, believing that his people have been Divinely chosen and that the cause of Israel is the cause of God.

(3) He is also a strict legalist, believing that the duty of every Jew to keep the Law of Moses is preserved in its constitutions (1 11.15.39.45.50.54.60.62; 2 20 ff. 27.42.48.50; 3 21, etc.), and deprecating attempts to compel Jews to desecrate the Sabbath and feast days (1 45), to eat unclean food (1 63) and to sacrifice to idols (1 43). Yet the comparatively lax attitude of Simon and his brothers, which was stated in the time when this book was written, words implying the lapse of say 30 years at least. This gives a terminus ante quem of 113 BC. Moreover, the parallelism on Simon (d. 135 BC) and his peaceful policies in 2 2 ff. give an impression that he had been long in his grave. We cannot be far wrong in assigning a date for the book in the early part of the last cent. BC, say 80 BC.

Sabbath” (Mk 2 27), agrees with the Sadducee position against that of the Pharisees.

(4) The book teaches that the age of inspiration is past, and that the sacred books already written are the only source of comfort in sorrow and of encouragement under difficulties (12 9).

(5) The legitimacy of the high-priesthood of Simon is not once questioned, though it is condemned by both the Deuteronomistic law (D), which restricts the priesthood to the tribe of Levi, and by the priestly law (P), which requires in addition that a priest must be of the family of Aaron. This laxity agrees well with the general tenets of the Sadducees.

(6) The book contains no trace of the Messianic hope, though it was entertained at the time in other circles (the Pharisees; see Messiah, II, 2; Prophecy); 2 57 is no exception, for it implies no more than a belief that there would be a restoration of the Davidic Dynasty. Perhaps it is implied that that expectation was realized in the Hasmonaean.
Destinon (Die Quellen des Flavius Jos. I, 1882, 80 ff.), followed by Wellhausen (JUG, 1894, 222 f.), maintained that Jos. (d. c 95), who followed 1 Macc up to the end of ch 13, could not have seen chs 14–16 (or from 14 167), or he would not have given so many and the same details of the high-priesthood of Simon (see Ant, XIII, vi, 7), which the author of 1 Macc describes so fully in these chapters. But Jos must have used these chapters or he could not have written of Simon even as fully as he does.

If, as Torrey (EB, III, 2362) holds, we have in 1 Macc "the entire apocryphal literature," the whole Maccabean struggle from its beginning, the book having been completed soon after the middle of the 2nd cent. BC, it may then be assumed that the writer depended on many sources. But even in this case one is compelled, contrary to Torrey (i.e.), to assume that written sources of his own were used, or the descriptions would not have been so full and the dating so exact. If, however, we follow the evidence of the MSS, we find that while the book to about 50 BC (see 1, 6), it must be supposed that the author had access to written sources. It may legitimately be inferred from 9 22 and 16 23 and from the habit of earlier times (see Century Bible, "Esther," 7ff) that, originally records were kept in the archives of the temple, or elsewhere. These might have contained the state documents referred to in 1, 4, some or all, and reports of speeches and prayers, etc. It must be admitted that the mere composition of the historical portion of the OT (8, K, Ch, etc.), the author of 1 Macc does not definitely name his written sources. The writer might well be supposed to have kept a kind of diary of his own in which the events of his own early life were recorded. Oral tradition, much more retentive of songs, speeches and the like in ancient than in modern times, may have been a very important source.

We have the testimony of Origen (see I, 1) and Jerome (Prolog. Galeatue) that the book existed in Heb in their day. But it is doubtful whether the words of Origen imply a Language Heb or an Aram. original, and though Jerome speaks of the book as Heb (hebraicus), it has to be remembered that in later times the Gr. adj. denoting Heb (hebraiiki, hebrastiki) and perhaps the corresponding Lat one (hebraicus) denoted often Palestinian Aram. (see Jgs 5 2; 19 13 17; and Kautzsch, Grammatik des bib. Aram., 19).

Hebraisms (or Aramaism) abound throughout the book. In the following examples Hebraisms are literally rendered in Gr, though in the latter language they are unidiomatic and often unintelligible: "two years of days"=two years old (1 29 etc.); "month and month"=every month (1 58); "a man [or each one] his neighbor"=each . . . the other (2 40; 3 43); "sons of the fortress" etc. (5 2); "those to whose face =before us (4 10); "men of power"=warriors (5 32); "of them"=some of them (6 2; cf 7 33, of the priests"=some of the priests); "the right hand wing"=the southern wing (9 1); "yesterday and the third day"=that heretofore (9 44). The above are strictly Hebraisms and not for the most part Aramaisms. The implied use of the "two parts consecutively" in 3 1.41; 8 1; 9 1, and often, points also to a Heb, not to an Aram. origin. "Heaven as a substitute for "God," so common in a Hebraism (see Tg Jerus Nu 25 19). Many of the proper names in the book are obviously but trans-135 BC (and probably below 105 BC; see I, 5). I Macc covers a period of at least 40 years, while 2 Macc gives the history of only 18 years (176–161 BC). The history of this period is thus divided: (a) 3:1–4:6; Treason of Simón ben Judá; (b) 5:1–7:42; I Macc 10–64, with special reference to the Second Temple, its circumstances and additions. Addition of the Antiochus Epiphanes (175 BC); the Heiligenkreuz festival of some Jews (the so-called Eleazar and the seven brothers and their mother (this last not in 1 Macc)); (c) chs 8–15 (end) 1 Macc 3–7, with significant notice in the Hasmonean revolt and death of the latter; but it is strange that the history of the main hero of the book should be dropped in the middle. Perhaps this abrupt ending is due in part to the later concentration of the events, which is easier for the writer to bring together than to be related to those of the earlier period.

The record of events in 2 Macc ends with the brilliant victory of Simon (Nicanor), followed by the death of his brother, Menelaus, and the latter; but it is strange that the history of the main hero of the book should be dropped in the middle. Perhaps this abrupt ending is due in part to the later concentration of the events, which is easier for the writer to bring together than to be related to those of the earlier period.

In its present form 2 Macc is based ostensibly on two kinds of written sources.

1. In 2:19–23 the writer of 3:1 to 4: Sources there is which constitutes the book proper, says that his own work is but an epitome, clearly, artistically and attractively set out, of a larger history by one Jason of Cyrene. Modern commentators understand this statement literally, and endeavor to distinguish between the parts due to Jason and those due to the epitomizer. Some think they see endings of the 5 books reflected in the summaries at 3:40; 7:42; 10:9; 13:26; 15:37. But W. K. Kosters gives cogent reasons for concluding that the reference to Jason is but a literary device to secure for his own composition the respect accorded in ancient, as in a lesser degree in modern, times to tradition. The so-called “epitomizer” is in that case alone responsible for the history he gives. The present writer has no hesitation in accepting these conclusions. We read nowhere else of a historian called “Jason,” or of such a large history as his must have been if it extended to 5 books dealing with the events of 15 years, though it is a well-known fact that the book hardly have escaped notice. Hitzig (Gesch. des Volkes Israels, II, 415) held that Jason or his supposed epitomizer made use of 1 Macc, altering, adding and subtracting to suit his purpose. But this would mean that the author of the book was not a writer who could hardly have escaped notice. Hitzig’s supposition quite untenable. A careful examination of 2 Macc has led Grimm, Schürer, Zeuck, Windisch, Christ, Conybeare and others to the conclusion that the author depended wholly upon oral tradition. This gives the best clue to the anachronisms, inconsistencies and loose phrasing which characterize the book. According to 1 Macc 3:25–33, the first campaign of Lysias into Judaea took place in 165 BC, the year before the death of Antiochus IV; but 2 Macc 11 tells us that it occurred in 163 BC, i.e. subsequent to the death of Antiochus IV. Moreover, in the latter passage this 1st expedition of Lysias is connected with the granting of freedom to the Jews, which is really an incident of the 2nd expedition, and in 13:1–24 is rightly mentioned in the account of the 2nd expedition. The writer of 2 Macc, relying upon memory, evidently mixes up the stories of two different expeditions. Signs of the 3:3 tributes under Judas, which are represented in 1 Macc 5:1–68 as taking place in quick succession, belong, according to 2 Macc 8:30; 10:15–38; 12:2–45, to separate dates and different sets of circumstances. The statements in 2 Macc are obscure and confused, those in 1 Macc 5 clear and straightforward. Though in 2 Macc 10:37 we read of the death of Timothaeus, yet in 12:2 ff he appears as a leader in other campaigns. There again the writer's memory plays him false as he recalls various accounts of the Hasmonean Judas, who was Mattathias who gathered together the Jews and organized them for resistance against Syria, if we follow 1 Macc 2:1–70; but 2 Macc 8:1–7 ascribes this rôle to his son Judas. The purification of the temple (the “boasting”) is subsequent to the profanation, according to 1 Macc 1:54; 4:82, but only 2 years, according to 2 Macc 10:3.

(2) The two letters sent from Palestinian to Egypt Jews (1:1–2:18) form no integral part of the original 2 Macc. They are clearly forgeries, and not written in the period of the book. The second letter, much the longer, gives an account of the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, which is irreconcilable with that in 9:1–25 and also with that in 1 Macc 6:1–18. Nehemiah’s work was to repair the gates and walls (Neh 3:1–32; 6:1; 7:1; Sir 49:2). The writer of this letter tells us that at the time of the exile, Jeremiah concealed in a cave on Mt. Pisgah the tabernacle, the ark of the covenant and the altar of incense, a statement which no one accepts as correct or even plausible. That the author of the rest of the book is not the composer of the letters is proved by the difference of style and the contradictions in subject-matter. But that he himself prefixed them is made probable by the connecting particle in the Gr 504 (Herodotus, Polybius, Kosters) think rather plausibly that the letters were added by a later hand, the connection in the Gr being also introduced by him and not by the author of the rest of the book. It has been maintained that we have here an analogy in the case of the Sadducees, to which party the reigning dynasty (the Hasmonean) belonged. The writer of 2 Macc is evidently a Pharisee and his aim is not historical but doctrinal; i.e. the book is a historical romance with a purpose, that purpose being to make prominent the outstanding tenets of the Pharisees (see II, 6). Two extreme opinions have been defended as to the historical value of 2 Macc: (1) That 2 Macc is a strictly historical work, is more trustworthy than 1 Macc and is to be followed when the two books differ; so the bulk of Roman Catholics and also Niese and Schlatter. The supernatural-ism of the book is to Romanists a recommendation. (2) That 2 Macc has virtually no historical value, since it was written for other than historical purposes. But the bulk of Protestant critics of recent times occupy a position midway between these two opposite opinions, viz. that 1 Macc is much more accurate than 2 Macc and is to be preferred when the 2 books of Macc differ or contradict each other; so Grimm.
Reus, Schürer, Kamphausen. On the other hand, when 2 Macc contains historical matter absent from 1 Macc it is to be accepted as correct unless opposed by other evidence.

In chapters 3-5 we have details concerning the Maccabean revolt not found in 1 Macc, and in treatment of episodes or incidents with which 1 Macc deals it is often fuller and more specific, as in 10:14-22, 15:7-9 (cf. Mace ii.1-5; 12:17-23); 10:24-38 (cf. 1 Macc 5:29-44); 15:32-45 (cf. 1 Macc 5:65,66:63f). On the other hand, the account of the celestial appearances in 3:24ff; 11:8, etc., and the description in 6:18ff of the martyrdom of the seven brethren and of their mother, carry on their face the marks of their legendary and unhistorical character. The edifying remarks scattered throughout the book, many of them pragmatic and reminding one of the Book of Dn, confirm the impression otherwise suggested, that the author's aim was didactic and not historical. The book as it stands is a real authority for the ideas prevalent in the writer's circle at the time of its composition.

In general it may be said that the doctrines taught in 2 Macc are those of the Pharisees of the day.

6. Teaching of the book

Several scholars consider 2 Macc the answer of Pharisaism to the Sadduceism of 1 Macc (see Wellhausen, Die Philister, xxiii.25; Kamphausen: "Phantasium" 7, f.; Geiger, "Urschrift und Übersetzungen der Bibel," 219 ff). But there is evidence enough (see II, 4) that the author of 2 Macc had not seen 1 Macc. Yet it is equally clear that 2 Macc does owe much to the doctrine of Pharisaism, and it was probably written on that account.

1. The strictest observance of the law is enforced. The violation of the sanctity of the Sabbath, for instance, is regarded as a crime, whether committed under special circumstances in 1 Macc (2:30-48) is absolutely forbidden in 2 Macc (6:11, 8:26ff; 12:38); cf. the words of the Pharisees to Petronius when the latter proposed to have a statue of the emperor Caius erected in the temple: "We will die rather than transgress the law." (Jos. Ant., XVIII, viii, 3).

2. The Pharisaic party took but little interest in political affairs, and supported the Hasmoneans only because and in so far as they fought for the right to ordain their own priests, though, on the other hand, they compromised with Hellenism, the Pharisees turned against them and their allies the Sadducees. In this book we miss the unstinted praise accorded the Hasmonean leaders in 1 Macc, and it is silent as to the genealogy of the Hasmoneans, the death of Judas Maccabaeus and the family grave at Modin.

3. The book reveals thus early the antagonism between the Pharisees and the priestly party, which is so evident in the Gospels. The high-priesthood had through political circumstances become the property of the Maccabees, though they were not of the Aaronic family, or even of the tribe of Levi. The priestly circle became the aristocratic, broad-church party, willing to come to terms with Greek thought and life. Hence in 2 Macc, Jason and Menelaus are fit representatives of the priesthood. In the list of martyrs (chs 5ff) no priest appears, but on the other hand, Eleazar, one of the principal scribes—scribes and Pharisees were then as in NT times virtually one party—suffered for his loyalty to the national religion, "leaving his death for an example." (6:18-31).

4. The temple occupies a high and honorable place in 2 Macc, as in the mind of the orthodox party (see 2:19; 3:2; 5:15; 9:16; 13:23; 14:31). Great stress is laid on the importance of the feasts (6:6; 10:8, etc.), of sacrifice (10:3), of circumcision (6:10), of the laws of diet (6:18; 11:31). The author seems in particular anxious to recommend to his readers (Ez 12:14-16) the observance of the new festivals instituted to commemorate the purification of the temple by its pollution by the Syrians and also the victory over Nicanor. According to this book the Hanukkah feast was established immediately after the death of Judas (10:6ff), not before this event (1 Macc 4:56), probably to give it additional importance. The book closes with the defeat and death of Nicanor and the founding of the Nicanor Day festival, without mentioning the death of Judas, as though the writer's aim was to give prominence to the new festivals.

5. This book shows a Jewish particularism which agrees well with Pharisaism and Scribism, but is opposed to the broader sentiments of the ruling party: Israel is God's people (1:26); His portion (14:15); He often intervenes miraculously on behalf of Israel and the religion of Israel (3:24-30; 10:29f; 11:6-8); even the calamities of the nation are proofs of Divine love because designed for the nation's good (8:18); but the sufferings inflicted upon the heathen are penal and show the Divine displeasure (4:38; 5:9; 13:8; 15:32ff). The writer is deadly opposed to the introduction of Gr customs and in particular to the observance of the Jewish festivals (4:7; 11:24). The Book of Jub., also written by a zealous Pharisee, takes up the same hostile attitude toward foreign customs (see 3:31; 7:20, and the note by R. H. Charles [Book of Jub] on the former).

6. This book also testifies to the influence of the doctrine of a resurrection and of a future life about which 1 Macc, a document of the Sadducee party, is silent (cf. 1, 5 above; see 7:9.11.14.36; 12:43-45; 14:46 [cf. IV, 4, below]). The Sadducees, to which the Hasmoneans belonged, denied a resurrection, limiting their conception of religion to the present life, in this agreeing with the teaching of the Heb Scriptures down to the time of the exile (356 BC). But the Pharisees and scribes, though professing to rest their beliefs on the "Law of Moses," departed from that law in this matter (see Warburton, The Divine Legation of Moses). The resurrection is to be a bodily one (7:11.22ff; 14:46) and to a life that is unending (7:9.36). The following related beliefs are supported in this work: (a) the expectation of the resurrection of the dead; (b) the power exercised by the intercession of saints (15:12-14); (c) the doctrine of the immortality of the soul; (d) the atoning character of the martyrdom of the righteous (7:36.38; cf. 4 Macc 17:22; see IV, 4, [3], below).

7. The angeloology of 2 Macc forms a prominent feature of the book (see 3:24-30; 10:29f; 11:6-8). The Sadducees accepted the authority of the Pent., though they rejected tradition. They were therefore inconsistent in allowing no place for angelic beings in their creed, though consistent in rejecting the doctrine of a future life.

8. The comparative silence of this book on the question of the Messianic hope is strikingly in contrast with the prominence of the subject in Ps Sol (17:23ff, etc.; see Ryle and James, Psalms of Solomon, ii.11) and other contemporary writings emanating from the Pharisees. But why should the author of 2 Macc be expected to give equal prominence to all his opinions in one tract? Some such hope as that connected with the Messiah does, however, seem to be implied in 2:27; 2:18; 7:33; 14:15.

The present writer holds that one man is responsible for 2 Macc in its present form and that the only written source was the 2 letters with which the book opens (1.1—2.18) (see II, 4, above). Even if we have to assume an original in 5 books of which the book and the letters have it, but is an epitome, it is not possible to distinguish between the sentiments of "Jason" and his epitomizer. The author — who was evidently an Egypt, probably an Alexandrian Jew, who nevertheless retained his loyalty to the Jesus temple and its constitutions and desired to prevent the alienation of his fellow-countrymen from the same supreme and its feasts, esp. the two new feasts, Hanukkah (Dedication) and Nicanor Day. The Jews of Egypt had a temple of their own, in opposition to the teaching of the Jewish law (D and P; cf. Dt 12.2—18 and Lev 17.1—9; 19.30), and it was perhaps the growing influence of this temple that prompted the author to compose this book which sets much on account upon the Jesus temple and its observances. The character of the Gr (see II, 9, below), the insertion of Psalms and also the deep interest in Egypt which this book reveals—these and other considerations give the conclusion that the author lived and wrote in Egypt. There is no evidence that Judas Macabaeus (Leon Allatus), or the author of Sir (Hasse) or Philo the Jew (Honorius d'Autun) or Jos wrote the book, that its source is not different to each of the persons named.

The book must have been written sufficiently long after 161 BC, the year with which the record closes, to allow mythical tales of the many famous heroes of Antiochus and the history of the supernatural appearances in 3.24—30, etc., to arise. If we allow 30 years, or the lifetime of a generation, we come down to say 130 BC as a terminus a quo. There is probably in 15.38 a reference to the Book of Enoch (so Conybeare and Wellhausen, JGG 4, 502 f) which would bring the terminus a quo down to about 100 BC.

That 2 Macc was written subsequently to 1 Macc (i.e. after 80 BC) is made certain by the fact that the Jews now pay tribute to Rome (3.10.36).

Since Philo, who died about 40 AD, refers to 4.8—7.42 (Quod omnis probat liber, Works, ed Mangey, II, 459), the book must have been composed before 40 AD. This is confirmed by the certainty that it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple (70 AD), for the city still exists and the temple services are in full operation (3.6.6f, etc.). He 11.35 is no doubt an echo of 6.18-7.42 and shows that the unknown author of He had 2 Macc before him. The teaching of the book represents the views of the Pharisees about the middle of the last cent. BC. A date about 40 BC would agree with all the evidence.

That the original language was Gr is made exceedingly likely by the easy flow of the style and the almost entire absence of Hebrewism (yet see 3.15: 9.5: 14.24). No scholar of any standing has pleaded for a Heb original of the works; Bertholdi however, argued that the two letters (1.1—2.18) were composed in Heb (or Aram [or Aramaic]). Ewald held that the 2nd letter (1.11—2.18) is from the Heb, and Schlinkens that this applies to the 1st only. But the evidence given by these scholars is such that the Heb is certainly more Hebraic in style than the 2d, the contrary of what Ewald said.

As to the texts and versions, see I, 9, above, where the statements apply here with but slight qualifications.

7. The Author

The name 3 Macc, though occurring in the oldest MSS and its MSS, is quite unsuitable, because the book refers to events which antedate the Macedonian age by about half a cent. and also to events in which the Maccabees took no part. But this book tells of sufferings and triumphs on the part of loyal Jews comparable to those of the Maccabees; perhaps the book was generalized so as to denote all who suffered for their faith. Some hold that the book was written originally as a kind of introduction to the Books of Macc, which it precedes as Book I in Cotton's Five Books of Maccabees. But other scholars do not agree with this view. Perhaps the title is due to a mistake on the part of a copyist.

The book has never been reckoned as canonical by the Western church, as is shown by the fact that it was not admitted into the Vulg.

9. Original Language

The contents of the Books of Maccabees refer to events which took place at Jerusalem and Alexandria, the Jews were persecuted in various ways delivered.

(1) 1.1—2.24: After conquering at Raphia Antiochus III, the great king of Syria, (2): 217 BC, and 2 Macc. Philopater, king of Egypt (221—204 BC), resolved to visit Jerusalem and to enter the sanctuary ("holy of holies," ἡ ἱερά, ἡ ἱερα) of the temple, and to destroy the laws, and to command that all the priestly priest, who could not be driven to Bacchus, should be defiled of all their rights as citizens.

(2) 2.25—30: Returned to Alexandria, Ptolemy is exasperated at the failure of his long-cherished project and resolves to wreak his vengeance upon the Jews of Egypt. He issues a decree that all who refused to bend the knee to Bacchus should be deprived of all their rights as citizens.

(3) 3.23—4.21: A goodly number of Alexandrian Jews refuse to obey the royal mandate, whereas Ptolemy issues an edict that all the Jews should be destroyed at once, and the women and children, shall be brought in chains to Alexandria and confined in the race-course (hippodrome), with a view to their wholesale massacre. Prior to the massacre there is to be a complete register taken of the names of the assembled Jews, and then the writing materials give way and the huge slaughter is averted.

(4) 4.32—6.31: The king, still thirsting for the blood of this people, hits upon a different method of compassing their ruin. Five hundred elephants are intoxicated with wine and incense and let loose upon the Jews in the race-course. Here we have the principal plot of the book, and we reach the climax of the present text in the present art., note the following items: Comm. of Moffatt (Oxford Mapc, Books of execution of the king’s purpose. The lesson of it all seems to be deliver those who put their trust in Him.

21 Macc. 7:23: At length the king undergoes a change of heart. He releases the Jews and restores them to all their lost rights and honor. In response to their request, he gives them permission to stay with their brother-Jews who, in the hour of trial, had given up their faith. They put to death 500, “economizing the destruction of the wise a season of 7.”

3 Macc is made up of a number of incredible tales, the details of which are absurd and contradictory. The beginning of the book has evidently been lost, as appears from the opening words, “Now when Philopator” (σὲ ἀνὴρ καὶ κομψάτην, ὡς ἐπηλεπτα), and also from the references to an early part of the narrative now lost, e.g.: 1 1 (from those who came back); 1 2 (“the plot afore mentioned”); 2 25 (“the aforementioned companions”).

The book contains very little that is true history, notwithstanding what Israel Abrahams (see “Literature” to this section), depending largely on Mahaffy (The Empire of the Ptolemies), says to the contrary. It is much more manifest than even in the case of 2 Macc that the writer’s aim was to convey certain impressions and not to write history (see III, 5).

Thus, Philo, Raphia, the book is innumerable stories (see Bussell, The Apoc of the OT, 616 f), and it is evident that we have to do here with a combination of legends and fables worked up in feebie fashion with a view to making prominent certain ideas which the writer has in his mind and which he wishes to keep in mind. Yet behind the fiction of the book there are certain facts which prompted much of what the writer says.

(1) That Ptolemy IV bore the character of cruelty and capriciousness and effeminacy is borne out by Polybius (204-121 BC) in his History and by Plutarch in his Life of Cleomenes.

(2) The brief outline of the war between Ptolemy IV and Antiochus III, the latter being conquered at Raphia (ch 1 f), agrees in a general way with what has been written by Polybius, Livy and Justin.

(3) In this book, by the command of Ptolemy, 500 intoxicated elephants are let loose upon the Jews brought bound to the race-course of Alexandria. Jos (Cap, II, v) tells us that Ptolemy VII Physcon, king of Egypt, 145-117 BC, had the Jews of Alexandria, men, women and children, brought bound and naked to an inclosed space and that he had let loose on them a herd of elephants, which, however, turned instead upon his own men, killing a large number of them. The cause of the king’s anger was that Jewish residents of Alexandria sided with his foes. In 3 Macc the cause of the action of Ptolemy IV was the failure of his project to enter the sanctuary of the Jerus temple; this last perhaps a reflection of 2 Macc 3 9 ff, where it is related that Helleidorus was hindered from entering the temple by a ghostly apparition. Now these two incidents, in both of which Jews are attacked by intoxicated elephants, must rest upon a common tradition and have probably a nucleus of fact. Perhaps, as Israel Abrahams holds, the tradition arose from the action of the elephants of Ptolemy in the Battle of Raphia. Most writers think that the reference is to something that occurred in the reign of Ptolemy VII.

(4) The shutting up of the temple in the race-course at Alexandria was not improbable suggested by a similar incident in which Herod the Great was the principal agent.

(5) In the opinion of Grimm (Comm., 216) we have in the two festivals (6 30; 7 19) and in the existence of the synagogue at Ptolemais an indication of some great deliverance vouchsafed to the Jews.

3 Macc was probably written by an Alexandrian Jew at a time when the Jews in and around Alexandria were sorely persecuted on account of their religion. The purpose of the author seems to have been to comfort and encourage them out of the hands of their enemies. Note further the following points: (1) The book, unlike 2 Macc, is silent as to a bodily resurrection and a future life, though this may be due to pure accident. Hades (Ἅδης, ᾠδής) in 4 8; 5 42; 6 31, etc., appears to stand only for death, regarded as the end of all human beings. (2) Yet the belief in angelic beings is clearly implied (see 6 18 f). (3) The author has much confidence in the power of prayer (see 2 10; 21 21-24; 5 6-10.13.50 f; 6 1-15, etc). (4) The book lays stress upon the doctrine that God is on the side of His people (4 21, etc.), and even though they transgress His commandments He will forgive and save them (2 13; 4 13, etc.)

From the character of the Or, the interest shown in Alexandrian Judaism, and the acquaintance displayed with Egyptian affairs (see i. Abrah., Philo.), it is inferred with confidence that the author was a Jew residing in Alexandria.

Date. The superior limit (terminus a quo) for the date is some time in the first cent. BC. Since the existence of the Quellen (see Dn 6 6), the inferior limit (terminus ad quem) is some time before 70 AD. If the temple had been destroyed, the continuance of the temple services could not have been implied (see 1 8 ff). As the book seems written to comfort and encourage Alexandrian Jews at a time when they were persecuted, Ewald, Haurath, Reuss and others thought it was written during the reign of the emperor Caligula (37-41 AD), when such a persecution took place. But if Ptolemy did not write Caligula, it is strange, as Schürer (GGV*, III, 491) remarks, that the writer does not make Ptolemy claim Divine honors, a claim actually made by Caligula.

Though Jos (d. 95 AD) could not have known the book, since his version of the same incidents differs so much, yet it must have been written some 30 years before his death, i.e. before the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple in 71 AD.

That 3 Macc was composed by the Gr is the opinion of all scholars and is proved by the free, idiomatic and rather bombastic character of the language in the later parts.

7. Original Language

(1) Greek.—This book occurs in the two uncials A and V (not in B or G), in most cur- susives and also in nearly all Ms. of the LXX.

(2) Syriac.—The Syr V (Pesh) reproduced in the Paris and London Polyglot and by Lagarde, Lib. Apoc. Vet. Text. It is not a good tr.

8. Text and Versions

(3) Latin.—The earliest Lat tr is that made for the Complutensian Polyglot by the author, The Apoc, Gr and Eng.

IV. Maccabees.—4 Macc is a philosophical treatise or discourse on the supremacy of pious reason (= religious prudence) and the virtuous man. The oldest title of the book, 4 Macc (Maccabæus δ, Makabæus, δ, [4]), occurs in the earliest extant MSS of the LXX
(5, A, V, etc.), in the list of the Cod. Claromontanus (3rd cent.?), the Catalogue of the Sixty Canonical Books (5th cent.) and the Synopsis of Athanasius (9th cent.). It obtained this name from the fact that it contains and enforces its thesis in examples from the history of the Maccabees. Some early Christian writers, believing 4 Macc to be the work of Jos (see IV, 3), gave it a corresponding title. Eusebius and Jerome, who ascribe the book to Jos, speak of it under the name of: A Discourse concerning the Supreme Power of Reason.

Though absent from the Vulg., and therefore from the Romanist Canon and from Protestant VSS of its Apoc., 4 Macc occurs in the principal MSS (N, A, V, etc.) and editions (Fritzsche, Swete, not Tischendorf) of the LXX, showing it was highly esteemed and perhaps considered canonical by at least some early Christian Fathers.

This book is a philosophical disquisition in the form of a sermon on the question: 'Is there an absolute master of the passions?' (1.1).

2. Canon- fity (Fritzsche, Swete, not Tischendorf) of the LXX, showing it was highly esteemed and perhaps considered canonical by at least some early Christian Fathers.

3. Contents (2) 13—18. He defines his terms and endeavors from general principles to show that pious reason does of ultimate. (3) 19 to end of book: He tries to prove the same proposition from the lives of the Maccabean martyrs. The books of the OT are based on 2 Macc 6:1—7 42 (cf 3 Macc 6):

Because the book is written as a discourse or sermon and is largely addressed to an apparent audience (1: 17; 2: 14; 13: 10; 15: 4). Frendialent and others think we have here an example of a Jewish sermon delivered as here written. But Jewish preachers based their discourses on Scripture texts and their sermons were more concise and arresting than this book.

The author’s philosophical standpoint is that of Stoicism, viz. that in the virtuous man reason dominates his passion. His doctrine of four cardinal virtues (σωφροσύνη, ψυχική, δικαιοσύνη, ἀρετή, andrews, αὐθεντική, προφητεία, “Providenc,” “Justice,” “Fortitude,” “Temperance” (1: 18)), is also derived from Stoicism. Though, however, he sets out as if he were a true Stoic, he proceeds to work out a doctrine in excess of Jewish fashion.

But dominating reason is that which is guided by the Divinely revealed law, that law for the faithful observing of which the martyrs died. The four cardinal virtues are but forms of that true wisdom which is to be obtained through the Maccabean literature (15: 18). Moreover, the passions are not, as Stoicism taught, to be annihilated, but regulated (1: 61; 3: 5), since God has planted them (2: 21).

The author’s view is a modification of that of the Apocalyptic. (1) He evisits the self-sacrificing devotion to the law exhibited by the Maccabean martyrs mentioned in 3: 9 to the end of the book. (2) He believes in a resurrection from the dead. The souls of the righteous will shortly hereafter ceaseless fellowship with God (9: 8—15: 5), and the wicked will endure the torment of fire forever and ever (10: 11: 15, 12: 12, 13: 14). Nothing, however, is said of the Pharisees’ doctrine of a bodily resurrection which is to be obtained through the Maccabean literature (II, 6, above). Clearly teaches. (3) The martyrdom of the faithful attone for the sins of the people (6: 24—17: 19—21; cf Rom 3: 25).

According to Eusebius (HE, III, 6), Jerome (De Viris Illust., xiii; C Peleg, ii,0), Suidas (Lat., 395 A.D.), and Photius, the author of this book is Jos, the Jos is the author of this book, and in Gr edd of his work it constitutes the last chapter with the heading: Φιλάβ. Ἰσαίας ταῦτα ἐπανάγγελε Πρωτοθάνατος Μακκαβαίων λόγος, ἐπὶ τουτέστωτα λογισμοῦ, "The Discourse of Flavius Josephus: or concerning the Supreme Power of Reason" (so Nicee, Belker, Dindorf, etc.). But this tradition is negatized by the style and thought, which differ completely from those found in the genuine writings of that Jewish historian. Besides this, the author of the book makes large use of 2 Macc, of which Jos was ignorant. Moreover, there are traditions equally ancient of a contrary kind.

The author must have been a Jew and he probably belonged to the Pharisee party (see IV, 7). He was also a Hellenist, for he reveals the influence of Gr thought more than any other apocryphal writer. He was also, it would appear, a resident of Alexandria, for the earliest notice of it occurs in literature written in an Alexandrian style, and the author makes considerable use of 2 Macc, which emanated from Alexandria.

It is impossible definitely to fix the date of the book. But it was certainly written before the destruction of the temple in 70 AD and after the composition of 2 Macc, on which it largely depends. A date in the first half of the 1st cent. of our era would suit all the requirements of the case.

The book was certainly written in Gr, as all scholars agree. It employs many of the expressions in the genuine language of the 5th cent. (Greek) of the Gr spoken and written at Alexandria in the 3d cent. It is concise and contains a very general characteristics.

6. Original Language. Greek is the language of the 5th cent. of our era. It is concise, coherent, and it bears the general characteristics of the Gr language of the 5th cent. of our era. It is written in the 5th cent. of our era.

7. Text and Versions. The text is printed in the Old Lat. VSS and it has come down to us in a number of MSS.

1. Name. The designation Macc was first given to the book now commonly so called by Cotton (The Five Books of Macc in Eng., 1852), and it has been perpetuated by Dr. Samuel Davidson (Intro to the OT, III, 465); Ginsburg (Kitto’s Cyc. of Bib. Lit.); Piggott (A History of the OT, p. 370), etc. It has been called the Arab, 2 Macc (so in the Paris and London Polyglot), and the Arab. Macc. The 5th book of the Translato Syra Peschito, edited by Ceriani, is really nothing more than a Syr Vs of the 6th book of Jos, The Wars of the Jews.

2. Canon- of the 6th century as canonical by either Jews or Christians.

This book has never been recognized as canonical by either Jews or Christians.

The book is ostensibly a history of the Jews from the time of Hellenization to 150 B.C., or about 50 B.C. It is really nothing more than a clumsy compilation, from 1 and 2 Macc, the ’Apokalupse, the Rabbis, the Targum, and other early sources. But it is the only original part, and this text with errors of various kinds, a note at the end of the book (calling it "The Second Book of Macc according to the Text of the Hebrews", 19) closes with the events narrated at the end of 1 Macc (7: 59, 62) follows Jos (1: 12, 13) closely. Perhaps the original work ended with ch 19. Ginsburg (op. cit., III, 17). Bisset (loc. cit., and Wellhausen, Der text (Josephus) give useful tables showing the dependence of the various parts of 5 Macce on the sources used.

In so far as this book repeats the contents of 1 and 2 Macce and Jos, it has the historical value of the former, but itself has no historical worth.

The original work was almost certainly composed in Heb, though we have no trace of a Heb text (so Ginsburg, op. cit., and Bisset). This conclusion is supported by the numerous Hebraisms which show themselves even in a double tr. The Pentateuch is called the "Torah," the Heb Scriptures are spoken of as "the twenty-four books," the temple is "the house of God" or "the holy house," Judah is "the land of the holy house" and Jerus is "the city of the holy house." These and like examples make it probable that the writer was a Jew and that the language he used was Heb. Zunz (Die geistlichen Vorzeichen, 1832, 146 ff.), Graetz (Geschichte, Vol. V, 281) and Dr. S. Davidson (op. cit., 465) say the book was written in Arab. from Heb memoirs. According to Zunz (loc. cit.) and Graetz (loc. cit.) the Jewish history of Joseph ben Gorion (Josippon), the "pseudo-Josephus" (1oth cent.), is but a Heb recension of 5 Macce (the Arab. 2 Macce). On the contrary, Wellhausen (op. cit.) and Schürer (GJV, I, 159 f.) maintain that the shorter narrative in 5 Macce represents the extent of the original composition far more correctly than the Heb history of Josippon (which ranges from Adam to 70 AD), and than other recensions of the same history.

The book was compiled for the purpose of consoling the Jews in their sufferings and encouraging them to be steadfast in their devotion.

6. Aim and Teaching. The same end was contemplated in 2, 3 and 4 Macce and in a lesser degree in 1 Macce, but the author or compiler of the present treatise wished to produce a work which would appeal in the first instance and chiefly to Heb (or Arab?) readers. The author believes in a resurrection of the body, in a future life and a final judgment (6:13.43 f.). The righteous will dwell in future glory, the wicked will be hereafter punished (5:49.50 f.; 59:14).

We have no means of ascertaining who the author was, but he must have been a Jew and he lived some time after the destruction of the temple in 70 AD (see 9:5; 21:30; 22:9; 53:8), though Ginsburg regards these verses as late additions and fixes the date of the original work at about 6 BC, when the history ends. The author makes large use of Jos (d. 95 AD), which also favors the lower date.

The Arabic text of the book and a Lat. tr. by Gabriel Silosita is printed in the Paris and London Polyglots. No other ancient text has come down to us. Out (op. cit., xxv) says in saying that there is a Syr VS of the book.

LITERATURE.—The most important lit. has been mentioned in the course of the art. The Eng. and earlier Ger. ed. of Schürer, GJV, do not help. The only Eng. tr. is that by Cotton made directly from the Lat. of Griesbach, who says that a Fr. VS appears as an appendix in the Bible of de Sacy; not, however, in the writer.

T. W. TITTEN DAVIES

uniting throughout his reign of 23 years to gain that object. He welded the Macedonian tribes into a single nation, won by 1. Philip force and fraud the important position of Amphipolis, Pydna, Potidaea, and Alexandronus, Abdora and Macedonia secured a plentiful supply of gold by found Philip on the site of Creuses. Gradually extending his rule over barbarians and Greeks alike, he finally won, by order of his diademated wife Olympias (236 BC), whose son, Alexander the Great, succeeded to the throne. After securing his hold on Thrace, Illyria and Greece, Alexander turned eastward and, in a series of brilliant campaigns, overthrew the Persian empire. The battle of the Granicus (334 BC) was followed by the submission or subjugation of most of Asia Minor. By the battle of Issus (333), in which Darius himself was defeated, Alexander's way was opened to Phoenicia and Egypt; Darius' second defeat, at Arbela (331), sealed the fate of the Persian power. Babylon, Susa, Persepolis and Ecbatana were taken in turn, and Alexander then pressed eastward through Hyrcania, Aris, Arachosia, Bactria and Sogdiana to India, which he conquered as far as the Hyphasis (327); thence he returned through Gedrosia, Carmania and Persia to Babylon, to make preparations for the conquest of Arabia. A sketch of his career is given in 1 Macc 1:1-7, where he is spoken of as "Alexander the Macedonian, the son of Philip, who came out of the land of Chittim" (ver 1): his invasion of Persia is also referred to in 1 Macc 6:2, where he is described as "the Macedonian king, who reigned first among the Greeks," i.e., the first who united in a single empire all the Greek states, except those which lay to the W. of the Adriatic. It is the conception of the Macedonian power as the deadly foe of Persia which is responsible for the description of Haman in Ad Est 16:10 as a Macedonian, "an alien in truth from the Persians" (337). And for the attribution of him to a plot to transfer the Persians empire to the Macedonians (ver 14), and this same thought appears in the LXX rendering of the Heb Agagite (1 Sam 15:30, 31; 1 Macc 24:20 as Macedonian (Makedon)). Alexander died in June 323 BC, and his empire fell a prey to the rivalries of his chief generals (1 Macc 1:9); after a period of struggle 2. Roman and chaos, three powerful kingdoms Intervention were formed, taking their names from Macedonia, Syria, and Egypt. Even in Syria, however, Macedonian influence remained strong, and we find Macedonian troops in the service of the Seleucid monarchs (2 Macc 8:20). In 215 King Philip V, son of Demetrius II and successor of Antigonus Doson (229-200 BC), formed an alliance with Hannibal, who had defeated the Roman forces at Lake Trasimeine (217) and at Cannae (216), and set about trying to recover Illyria. After some years of desultory and indecisive warfare, peace was concluded in 205, Philip binding himself to a ransom from attacking the Roman possessions on the E. of the Adriatic. The Second Macedonian War, caused by a combined attack of Antiochus III of Syria and Philip of Macedon on Egypt, broke out in 200, and ended 3 years later in the crushing defeat of Philip's army by T. Quinctius Flamininus at Cynoscephalae in Thessaly (of 1 Macc 8:5). By the treaty which followed this battle, Philip surrendered his conquests in Greece, Illyria, Thrace, Asia Minor and the Aegean, gave up his fleet, reduced his army to 5,000 men, and undertook to declare no war and conclude no alliance without Roman consent.

In 179 Philip was succeeded by his son Perseus, who at once renewed the Roman alliance, but set to work to consolidate and extend it. But 172 3. Roman was war again broke out, and after several Roman Conquest reverses the consular forces under T. Quinctius Casmus decisively defeated the Macedonians at Pydna in 168 BC (Macc 3:5, where Perseus is called "king of Chittim"). The Roman Republic in the 172 was abolished and Perseus was banished to Italy. The Macedonians were democratic; their land was divided into four regions, with their capitals at Amphipolis, Thessalonica, Pella and Pologena respectively, and each of them had a council; commerce and cornuabium were forbidden between them and subjugation of gold. A tribute was to be paid annually to the Roman treasury, amounting to half the land tax hitherto exacted by the Macedonian kings. But this compromise between freedom and subjectship could not be of long duration, and in the end, 167, Andronicus, the pseudo-Philip, was defeated (148 BC). M. was constituted a Roman province, and enlarged by the addition of parts of Illyria, Epirus, the Ionian islands and Thessaly. Each year a governor was dispatched from Rome with supreme military and civil powers; the partition fell into abeyance and communications was improved by the construction of the Via Egnatia from Dyrrhachium to Thessalonica, whence it was afterward continued eastward to the Euphrates.

In 146 the Achaean, who had declared war on Rome, was crushed by Q. Caecilius Metellus Pius at Corinth, and Corinth was destroyed and burned, and the Achaean league was dissolved, and Greece, under the name of Achaia, was made a province and placed under the control of the governor of M. In 27 BC, when the administration of the Achaean provinces was divided between Augustus and Octavian, M. and Achaia fell to the share of the latter (Strabo, p. 340; Dio Cassius 33.12) and were governed separately by ex-consuls sent out annually with the powers of a pro-consul. In 15 AD, however, senatorial mismanagement had brought the province into a state of ruin, and they were transferred to Tiberius (Tacitus, Annals, 1.93), who united them under the government of a legatus Augusti pro praetore until, in 44 AD, he sold them to the Senate (Suetonius, Claudius 25; Dio Cassius ix.24). It is owing to this close historical and geographical connection that we find M. and Achaia frequently mentioned together in the NT. M. being always placed first (Acts 19:21; Rom 16:20; 2 Cor 10:1; 1 Thess 1:7, 8).

Dioctolion (284-305 AD detached from M. Thessaly and the Illyrian coast lands and formed into two provinces, the latter under the name of Epirus Nova. Toward the end of the 4th c. the c. 480 was taken up into two provinces, Macedonia prima and Macedonia secunda, which were independent when in 395 the Roman world was divided into the western and eastern provinces, M. was included in the latter. During the next few years it was governed by the Goths under Alaric, and later, in the latter half of the 6th c., immense numbers of Slavonic tribes settled there. In 1294 it became a Lat kingdom under Boniface, marquis of Montferrat, who, 20 years later, Theodore, the Gr. despot of Epirus, founded a Gr. empire of Thessalonica. During the 2d half of the 14th c., the greater part of it was part of the Servian dominions, but in 1439 Thessalonica fell before the Ottoman Turks, and from that time down to the year 1913 M. has formed part of the Turkish empire. Its history thus accounts for the very mixed character of its population, which consists chiefly of Turks, Albanians, Greeks and Bulgarians, but has in it a considerable element of Jews, Gypsies, Vlachs, Servians and other races.

III. Paul and Macedonia.—In the narrative of Paul's journeys as given in Acts 13-15-20 in the Pauline Epistles, M. plays a prominent part. The apostle's relations with the churches of Philippi, Thessalonica, and Berea will be found discussed under these several headings; here we will merely recount in outline his visits to the province.

On his 2d missionary journey Paul journeyed from Troas, and from there sailed with Silas, Timothy and Luke to Neapolis, the nearest Macedonian seaport, in obedience to the vision of a First Visit Macedonian (whom Ramsay identifies with Luke; see sec. 16) urging him to cross to M. and predict the gospel there.
(Acts 16:9). From Neapolis he journeyed inland to Philippi, which is described as "a city of M., the first of the district" (ver 12). Thence Paul and his two companions (for Luke remained in Philippi for the next 5 years) traveled along the Egnotian road, passing through Amphipolis and Apollonia, to Thessalonica, which, though a "free city," and therefore technically exempt from the jurisdiction of the Roman governor, was practically the provincial capital. Driven thence by the hostility of the Jews, the evangelists preached in Berea, where Silas and Timothy remained for a short time after a renewed outbreak of Jewish animosity and from which Paul had left M., for the neighboring province of Achaia (Acts 17:14). Although he sent a message to his companions to join him with all speed at Athens (ver 15), yet so great was his anxiety for the welfare of the newly founded Macedonian churches that he sent Timothy back to Thessalonica almost immediately (1 Thess 3:1,2), and perhaps Silas to some other part of M., nor did they again join him until after he had settled for some time in Corinth (Acts 18:5; 1 Thess 3:6). The rapid extension of the Christian faith in M. at this time may be judged from the phrases used by Paul in his 1st Ep. to the Thess., the earliest of his extant letters, written during this visit to Corinth. He there speaks of the Thessalonian converts as being an example "to all that believe in M. and in Achaia" (1:7), and he commends their love "toward all the brethren that are in all M." (4:10). Still more striking are the words, "From you hath flowed forth the word of the Lord, not only in M., but in every place your faith to God-ward is gone forth" (1:8).

On his 3rd missionary journey, the apostle paid two further visits to M. During the course of a long stay at Ephesus he laid plans for the future of the churches there, and dispatched two of his helpers, Timothy and Erastus, to M. to prepare for his visit (Acts 19:21,22). Some time later, after the uproar at Ephesus raised by Demetrius and his fellow-silversmiths (vs 23-41), Paul himself set out for M. (20:1). Of this visit Luke gives us a very summary account, telling us merely that Paul, "when he had gone through those parts, and had given them much exhortation, came to M." (Acts 20:2), from 2 Cor. written from M. (probably from Philippi) during the course of this visit, we learn more of the apostle's movements and feelings. While at Ephesus, Paul had changed his plans. His intention at first had been to travel across the Aegean Sea to Corinth, and to pay a visit from there to M. and to return to Corinth, so as to sail direct to Syria (2 Cor 1:15,16). But by the time at which he wrote the 1st Ep. to the Cor, probably near the end of his stay at Ephesus, he had made up his mind to go to Corinth by way of M., as we have seen that he actually did (1 Cor 16:5,6). From 2 Cor 2:13 we learn that he traveled from Ephesus to Troas, where he expected to find Titus. Titus, however, did not yet arrive, and Paul, who "had no relief for his spirit," left Troas and sailed to M. Even here the same restlessness pursued him: "fightings without, fears within" oppressed him, till the presence of Titus brought some relief (2 Cor 7:5,6). The apostle was also chagrined by the neglect of God's word that had been given in the church of M." (8:1); in the midst of severe persecution, they bore their trials with abounding joy, and their deep poverty did not prevent them begging to be allowed to raise a contribution to send to the Christian church in Jerusalem (2 Cor 12:18). The Christian character was, indeed, from the very outset one of the characteristic virtues of the Macedonian churches. The Philippians had sent money to Paul on two occasions during his first visit to Thessalonica (Phil 4:16), and again when he had left M. and was staying at Corinth (ver 9). On the present occasion, however, the Corinthians seem to have taken the lead and to have prepared their bounty in the previous year, on account of which the apostle boasts of them to the Macedonian Christians (2 Cor 9:2). He suggests that on his approaching visit to Achaia he may be accompanied by some of these Macedonians (ver 4), but whether this was actually the case we are not told.

The 3d visit of Paul to M. took place some 3 months later and was occasioned by a plot against his life laid by the Jews of Corinth.

3. Paul's

Third Visit from Cenchreae, the eastern seaport of Corinth, to Syria (2 Cor 1:16; Acts 20:3). He returned to M. accompanied as far as Asia by 3 Macedonian Christians—Sopater, Aristarchus and Secundus—and by 4 from Asia Minor. Probably Paul took the familiar route by the Via Egnotia, and reached Philippi immediately before the days of unleavened bread; his companions preceded him to Troas (vs 4,5). Even while he himself remained at Philippi until after the Passover (Thursday, April 7, 57 AD, according to Ramsay's chronology), when he sailed from Neapolis together with Luke, and joined his friends in Troas (ver 6).

Toward the close of his 1st imprisonment at Rome Paul planned a fresh visit to M. as soon as he should be released (Phil 1:26; 2:24), and even before that he intended to send Later Visits Timothy to visit the churches and doubtless those of Beroea and Thessalonica also. Whether Timothy actually went on this mission we cannot say; that Paul himself went back to M. once more we learn from 1 Tim 1:3, and we may infer a 5th visit from the reference to the apostle's stay at Troas, which in all probability belongs to a later occasion (2 Tim 4:13).

IV. The Macedonian Church.—Of the churches of Macedonia in general, little need be said here. A striking fact is the prominence in them of women, which is probably due to the higher social position held by women in this province than in Asia Minor (Lightfoot, Philippians, 55 ff). We find only two women of the rank of a provincial missionary work; the women proselytes of high social standing take a share in driving him from Pisdian Antioch (Acts 13:50), and Timothy's father is mentioned as a Jewess who believed (16:1). But in M. all is changed. To women the gospel was first preached at Philippi (ver 13); a woman was the first convert and the hostess of the evangelists (vs 14,15); a slave girl was restored to soundness of mind by the apostle (ver 18), and long after Paul mentions two women as having "labored with [him] in the gospel" and as endangering the peace of the church by their rivalry (Phil 4:23). At Thessalonica a considerable number of women of the first rank appear among the earliest converts (Acts 17:4), while at Beroea also the church included from the outset numerous Gr women of high position (ver 12).

The bond uniting Paul and the Macedonian Christians seems to have been a peculiarly close one, with a special intimacy and affection and a Jeu-ness and patience in trial and persecution, their activity in spreading the Christian faith, their love of the brethren—their "supercharacteristics which Paul specially commends in them (1 Cor 1:1; 2 Thess; Phil. 2 Cor 8:1 8), while they also seem to have been much freer than the churches of Asia Minor from Judaizing tendencies and from the allurements of “philosophy and vain deceit.”

We know the names of a few of the early members of the Macedonian church—Sopater (Acts 20 4) or Sosipater (Rom 16 21): the identification is a probable, though not certain, one of Beroea; Aristarchus (Acts 19 29; 20 4; 27 2; Col 4 10; Phil 4 24), Jason (Acts 17 5–8; Rom 16 21) and Secundus (Acts 20 4) of Thessalonica; Clement (Phil 4 21; Eph 6 21; 2 Tim 4 19). Euodia (Phil 4 2; this, not Euodias [AV], is the true form), Syntyche (ib), Lydia (Acts 16 14.40; a native of Thyatira), and possibly Luke (Ramsay, St. Paul the Traveller, 201 ff.) of Philippi. Gaius is also mentioned as a Macedonian in Acts 19 29, but perhaps the reading of a few MSS has been corrected to refer to the TR Maxebo vs, in which case Aristarchus alone would be a Macedonian, and this Gaius would probably be identical with the Gaius of Debre mentioned in Acts 20 4 as a companion of Paul (Ramsay, op. cit., 280). The later history of the Macedonian churches, together with all of their known bishops, will be found in Le Quien, Oriens Christianus, II, 1–2; III, 306 ff; Ewing 104 ff.

MACAERUS, mac-a'reus (Μακαερος, Machairoros): Not mentioned in Scripture, canonical or apocryphal, but its importance in Jewish history justifies its inclusion here. Pliny (NH, v.16.72) speaks of it as, after Jerus, the strongest of Jewish fasts observed in the west. It was fortified by Alexander Jannaeus (BJ, VII, vii, 2). It was taken and destroyed by Gabinus (ib, I, viii, 5; Ant, XIV, vi, 4). Herod the Great restored it and, building a city here, made it one of his residences (BJ, VII, vii, 1, 2). It lies within the tetrarchy assigned to Antipas at the death of Herod. The wife of Antipas, daughter of Aretas, privately aware of his infidelity, asked to be sent hither (Ant, XVIII, vi, 1). Here Jos has fallen into confusion if he meant by the phrase "a place in the borders of the dominions of Aretas and Herod" that it was still in Herod’s hands, since immediately he tells us that it was "subject to her father." It was natural enough, however, that a border fortress should be held by now one and now by the other. It may have passed to Aretas by some agreement of which we have no record; and Herod, unaware that his wife knew of his guilt, would have no suspicion of her design in wishing to visit her father. If this is true, then the Baptist could not have been imprisoned and beheaded at Machaerus (ib, 2). The feast given is probably held at Tiberias; and there is nothing in the Gospel story to hint that the prisoner was some days’ journey distant (MK 6 14 ff). The citadel was held by a Rom garrison until 66 AD, which then evacuated it to escape a siege (BJ, II, xviii, 6). Later by means of a stratagem it was recovered for the Romans by Bassus, c. 72 AD (BJ, VII, vii, 4). The place is identified with the modern Maqur, a position of great strength on a prominent height between Wady ZebrKa Ma’in and Wady el-Majib, overlooking the Dead. There are extensive ruins. W. Ewing MACHBANAI, mak-ba’ni, -ba’- '\(\text{םכ}ב\)\(\text{ןא, makbhanay}; AV Machbana\): A Gadite who attached himself to David in Ziklag (1 Ch 12 13).

MACHBENAI, mak-ben’-\(\text{םכ}ב\)\(\text{ןא, makbhe\-}\): Macben (Macben, Machabah), A. Macbap (Macbamat; AV Machbenah): A name which occurs in the genealogical list of Judah (1 Ch 2 49), apparently the name of a place, which may be the same as "Cabbon" (Josh 15 40), probably to be identified with the Kebabah, about 3 miles S. of Beit Jibrin.

MACCH, mā’k (מָכָה, makhi): Pesh and some MSS of LXX read "Macquir": A Gadite, father of Gezel, one of the 12 spies (Nu 13 15).

MACHIR, māk’hir (מָכִיר, makhir; Mach, Machir), MACHRITYE, māk-’hir-\(\text{םל}ו\)\(\text{תא, makhrit}'): (1) the eldest son of Manasseh (Gen 50 23). In Nu 26 29 it is recorded that Machir begat Gilead, but another name is used. In 1 Ch 5 13 it is stated that the children of Machir "went to Gilead, and took it, and dispossessed the Amorites that were therein. And Moses gave Gilead unto Machir the son of Manasseh; and he dwelt therein" (Nu 32 30–40; Josh 17 13, 14; cf. 1 Ch 2 21–25; 7 14–17; Dt 3 15; Josh 31 3). In the song of Deborah, Machir is used as equivalent to Manasseh (Jgs 5 14).

(2) Son of Ammiel, dwelling in Lo-debar (2 S 9 4–5), a wealthy landowner who protected Mephiboseth (Meribbaal), son of Jonathan, until assured of the friendly intentions of David (cf. 1 Ch, VII, ix, 8). Afterward, during the rebellion of Absalom, Machir with others came to David’s assistance at Mahanaim, bringing supplies for the king and his men (2 S 17 27 ff). John A. Lees

MACMASES, mak-m’ase. See MISHMAKH.

MACHNADEBAI, mak-na’dé-bi, mak-na’dé-bi (מַכְנַדְבָּי, makhnadbhay): Son of Bani, one of those who married foreign wives (Ezr 10 40).

MACHPELAH, mak-pê’la (מַכְפֶּלָה, ha-makhpèlah; "the double"; "the double cave"): The name of a piece of ground and of a cave purchased by Abraham for a burialplace. The word is supposed to mean "double" and refers to the condition of the cave. It is "double cave" (הַדָּבָלָה סַפֵּלָה, hî dâbalah safîlah) in the LXX in Gen 23 17. The name is applied to the ground in Gen 23 19; the cave in Gen 23 16; and to the cave in Gen 23 9; 26 5. In Gen 23 17 we have the phrase "the field of Ephron, which was in [the] Machpelah."

The cave belonged to Ephron the Hittite, the son of Zohar, from whom Abraham purchased it for 400 shekels of silver (Gen 23 16–18).

1. Scrip. — It is described as "before," i.e., "to the east, E. of" Mamre (ver 17) which (ver 19) is described as the same as Hebron (see, see, see, see, 25 9; 49 30; 50 13). Where were buried Abraham and Sarah, Isaac, Jacob and Leah. (Of however the curious variant traditions in Acts 7 16, "Shechem" instead of "Hebron.") Jos (BJ, IV, ix, 7) speaks of the monuments (mmemela) of Abraham and his posterity which are shown to this very time in that small city [i.e. in Hebron; the fabric of which monuments are of the most excellent marble and wrought after the most excellent manner; and in another

2. Tradition place he writes of Isaac being buried Regard the Site where they had a monument belonging to them from their forefathers (Ant, I, xxi, 1). The references of early Christian writers to the site of the tombs of the patriarchs only very doubtfully apply to the present buildings and may possibly refer to Rōmet el-Khǎlit (see Mamre). Thus the Bordeaux Pilgrim (333 AD) mentions a square enclosure built of stones of great beauty in which Abraham, Isaac and Jacob were buried with their wives. Antonius Murtýr (c 638) and Arculf (698) also mention this monument. Mukaddası speaks (c 985) of the strong fortress around the tombs of the patriarchs built of great squared stones, the work of Jims, i.e. of supernatural beings. From this onward the references are sure to the present site, and it is difficult to believe, if, as good authorities maintain, the great buttressed square wall enclosing the site is work at least as early as Herod, that the earlier references can not arise to say that the existing buildings are very largely those which the Crusaders occupied; there are many full references to this place in mediaeval Moslem writers. The Haram at Hebron, which present-day tradition, Christian and Jewish alike, recognizes as built over the cave of Machpelah, is one of the most jealously guarded sanctuaries in the world. Only on rare occasions held under much political pressure have a few honored Christians been allowed to visit the spot. The late King Edward VII in 1862 and the present King George V, in 1882, with certain distinguished scholars in their parties, made visits which have been carefully reported in the writings of their companions—Stanley in 1862 and Wilson and Conder in 1882. One of the latest to be acceded the privilege was C. W. Fairbanks, late vice-president of the United States of America. What such visits have seen and experienced was not been of any great antiquity nor has it thrown any certain light on the question of the genuineness of the site.

The space containing the traditional tombs is a great quadrangle 197 ft. in length (N.W. to S.E.) and 111 ft. in breadth (N.E. to S.W.). It is enclosed by four great walls of immense but very hard and akin to marble. The walls which are between 8 and 9 ft thick are of solid masonry throughout. At the height of 15 ft. from the ground, at indeed the level of the floor within, the wall is set back about 10 in. at intervals, so as to leave pilasters 3 ft. 9 in. wide, with space between each of 7 ft. all round. On the longer sides there are 16 and on the shorter sides 8 such pilasters, and there are also buttresses 9 ft. wide on each face at each angle. This pilastered wall runs up for 25 ft., giving the total average height from the ground of 40 ft. The whole character of the masonry is so similar to the wall of the Jerus Haram near the “wailing place” that Conder and Warren considered that it must belong to that period and be Herodian work.

The southern end of the great enclosure is occupied by a church—probably a building entirely of the crusading period—with a nave and two aisles. The rest is a courtyard open to the air. The cenotaphs of Isaac and Rebekah are within the church; those of Abraham and Sarah occupy octagonal chapels in the double porch before the church doors; those of Jacob and Leah are placed in chambers near the north end of the Haram. The six monuments are placed at equal distances along the length of the enclosure, and it is probable that their positions have no relation to the sarcophagi which are described as existing in the cave itself.

It is over this cave that the chief mystery hangs. It is not known whether it has been entered by any man at present alive, Moslem or Christian. The cave itself is a wonderful chamber, of which the visitor descends into a first cave which is empty, and the second is in the same state and at last reaches a third which contains six sepulchres—those of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and of Sarah, Rebeca and Leah, one opposite the other. A lamp burns in the cave and upon the sepulchre continually, both night and day.” The account reminds us of the condition of many Christian tombs in Pal today.

It would appear from the description of modern observers that all entrance to the cave is now closed; the only known approaches are never now opened and can only be reached by breaking up the flagstones of the flooring. Through one of the openings—which had a stone over it—was passed by a circuit of 16 ft. in diameter—near the northern wall of the old church, Conder was able by lowering a lantern to see into a chamber some 15 ft. under the church. He estimated it to be some 12 ft. square; it had a plastered wall and there was a door which appeared like the entrance to a rock-cut tomb. On the outside of the Haram wall, close to the steps of the southern entrance gateway is a hole in the lowest course of masonry, which may possibly communicate with the western cave. Into this the Jews of Hebron are accustomed to thrust many written prayers and vows to the patriarchs.

The evidence, historical and archaeological seems to show that the cave occupies only the south end of the great quadrilateral enclosure under part only of the area covered by the church. See Hebron.

MACONAH, mâkô'nah: AV Melkonah (q.v.).

MACRON, mâ'kron (Mákos, Mákoyn): Tolemy Macron who had been appointed by Tolemy Philometor VI governor of Cyprus and deserted to Antiochus Epiphanes, king of Syria (2 Mac 10 12 f). Under Antiochus he was governor of Coele-Syria and Phoenicia (8 8). In 1 Mac 3 38 and 2 Mac 4 45 he is called “Ptolomy the son of Dorymenes.” At first he was a fierce and cruel enemy of the Jews and was one of those chosen by Lysias to destroy Israel and reduce Judas Maccabaeus (ib.). Later he apparently relented toward the Jews (2 Mac 10 12), fell into disfavor with Antiochus Eupator, before whom he was accused by the king’s friends, and was so galled by being constantly called traitor that he ended his life with poison (2 Mac 10 13).

MAD, MADNESS (βάσανος, káal, ἰσχία, náthgá); μαία, maia): These words, and derivatives from the same roots are used to express various conditions of mental derangement. Though usually translated “mad,” or “madness,” they are often used for temporary conditions to which one would scarcely apply them today except as common colloquial inaccuracies. The madness exacerbated with folly in Eeel is rather the excessive frivolity
1. In the OT
dissipation on the part of the idle rich (so in 1 17; 2 2-12; 7 25; 9 3; 10 13). The insensate fury of the wicked against the good is called by this name in Ps 102 3. In Dt 28 28-34 it is used to characterize the state of panic produced by the oppression of tyrannical conquerors, or (as in Zec 12 4) by the judgment of God on sinners. This condition of mind is metaphorically called "divine drunkenness with the wind of God’s wrath (Jer 25 16; 61 7). The same mental condition due to terror-striking idols is called "madness" in Jer 50 38. The madman of Prov 26 18 is a malicious person who carries his frivolous jest to an unreasonable length, for he is responsible for the mischief he causes. The ecstatic condition of one under the inspiration of the Divine or of evil spirits, as that described by Balaam (Nu 24 3 f), or that which Saul experienced (1 S 10 10), is compared to madness; and conversely in the Near East at the present day the insane are supposed to be Divinely inspired and to be peculiarly under the Divine protection. This was the motive which led David, when at the court of Achish, to feign madness (1 S 18 13-15). It is only within the last few years that any provision has been made in Pal for the restraint even of dangerous lunatics, and there are many insane persons wandering at large there.

This association of madness with inspiration is expressed in the name "this mad fellow" given to the prophet who came to anoint Jehu, which did not necessarily convey a disrespectful meaning (2 K 9 11). The true prophetic spirit was, however, differentiated from the ravages of the false prophets by Isaiah (44 25), these latter being called mad by Jeremiah (23 25) and Hosea (9 7). The most interesting case of real insanity recorded in the OT is that of Saul, who, from being a shy, self-conscious young man, became, on his exaltation to the kingship, put up with a megalomania, alternating with fits of black depression with homicidal impulses, finally dying by suicide. The cause of his madness is said to have been an evil spirit from God (1 S 18 10), and when, under the influence of the ecstatic mood which alternated with his depression, he conducted himself like a lunatic (18 23 f), his mutteredings are called "prophesyings."
The use of music in his case as a remedy (1 S 16 16) may be compared with Elisha’s use of the same means to produce the prophetic ecstasy (2 K 3 15).

The story of Nebuchadnezzar is another history of a sudden accession of insanity in one puffed up by self-conceit and excessive prosperity. His declusion that he had become as an ox is of the same nature as that of the daughters of Procyus recorded in the Song of Silenus by Virgil (Eccl vi.48). In the NT the word “lunatic” (σελήνιασμονοι) (AV Mt 4 24; 17 15) is correctly rendered in RV “epileptic.” Undoubtedly many
2. In the NT of the demonsiacs were persons suffering from insanity. The words “mad” or “madness” occur 8 t, but usually in the sense of paroxysms of passion, excitement and foolishness. Thus in Acts 26 11 Paul says that before his conversion he was "exceedingly mad" (εμμαινασμονοι) against the Christians.
11 19 these who “speak with tongues” in Christian assemblies are said to appear mad to the outsider. Rhoda was called “mad” when she announced that Peter was at the door (Acts 12 15).
The madness with which the Jews were filled when Our Lord healed the demoniac with the withered hand is called δαιμον, which is literally senselessness (Lk 6 11), and the madness of Balaam is called paraphonix, “being beside himself” (2 Pet 2 16). Paul is accused by Festus of having become deranged by overstudy (Acts 26 24). It is still the belief among the fellahin that lunatics are people inspired by spirits, good or evil, and it is probable that all persons showing mental derangement would naturally be described as "possessed," so that, without entering into the vexed question of demoniacal possession, any cases of insanity cured by Our Lord or the apostles would naturally be classed in the same category. See also LUNATIC.

MADMANNAH, mad-man’ā (מְדַמְנָה, mad-manah; B, Maγmūn, Māḥirmā, A, Μαδημάνη, Babēbrón [Josh 15 31]; B, Μαρσων, Meρepnēn, A, Māḏēmānā, Mādemēnā [1 Ch 2 49]): This town lay in the Negeb of Judah and is mentioned with Hormah and Ziklag. It is represented in Josh 19 7, 21, etc., by Beth-mara-sheshoth. Umm Dimeh, 12 miles N. of Beersheba, has been proposed on etymological grounds (PEF, III, 392, 399, SH XXIV).

MADMEN, mad’men (מְדַמֶן, madmēn; kal פַּאֹתי פַּאֹטֶרֶת, kāt paātēn paoteat): An unidentified town in Moab against which Jer proph-ecied (48 2). The play upon the words here suggests a possible error in transcription: gam madmēn tiddimm, “Also, Madmen, thou shalt be silenced.”
The initial M of “Madmen” may have arisen by dittography from the last letter of gam. We should then point Dimon, which of course is Dibon.

MADMENAH, mad-men’ā (מְדַמְנָה, madmēnāh; Māḏēḇēnā, Mādēbēnā): A place mentioned only in Isaiah’s description of the Assyrian advance upon Jerus (10 31). It is not identified.

MADNESS, mad’nes. See MAD, MADNESS.

MADON, ma’don (מָדָן, madon; B, Maḏāḇōn,
Mariḥōn, A, Maḏāḇān, Madon [Josh 11 1], B, Marāḇōn, Maḏāḇōn, A, Maḏāḇān [Josh 12 19]):
A royal city of the Canaanites named along with Hazor of Galilee. El-Medineh, “the city,” on the heights W. of the Sea of Galilee, with which it might possibly be identified, probably dates only from Moslem times. It seems likely that the common confusion of the Heb "for " has occurred, and that we should read “Maron.” The place may be then identified with Mejron, a village with ancient ruins and rock tombs at the foot of Jebel Jermuk, a little to the N.W. of Safed. W. Elwino

MAELUS, ma-el’us (A, Māḵlo, Māḵlo, B, Māḵlo, Mitīlos): One of those who at Edras’s request put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9 26 = “Miamin” in the § Ezra 10 25).

MAGADAN, ma-ga’dan, ma-gā’dan (Magaḏān,
Magadān; the reading of TE, Maγdāk [AV], Magdal, is unsupported): This name appears only in Mt 15 39. In the § passage, Mk 8 10, it is placed by John Dalmanutha. From these two passages it is reasonable to infer that “the borders of Magadan” and “the parts of Dalma-нутьa” were contiguous. We may perhaps gather from the narrative that they lay on the western shores of the Sea of Galilee. After the feeding of the 4,000, Jesus and His disciples came to these parts. Thence they departed to "the other side" (Mt 8:13), arriving at Bethsaida. This is generally believed to have been Bethsaida Julia, N.E. of the sea, whence He set out on His visit to Caesarea Philippi. In this case we might look for Dalmanutha and Magadan somewhere S. of the Plain of Gennesaret, at the foot of the western hills. Stanley (S.P., 383) quotes Schwartz to the effect that a cave in the face of these precipitous slopes bears the name of Teliman or Talmanutha. If this is true, it points to a site for Dalmanutha near Ain el-Fuliyeh. Magadan might then be represented by el-Mejdel, a village at the S.W. corner of the Plain of Gennesaret. It is commonly identified with Magdala, the home of Mary Magdalene, but without any evidence. The name suggests that this was the site of an old Heb. migdād, "tower" or "fortress." The village with its ruins is now the property of the German Roman Catholics. The land in the plain has been purchased by a colony of Jews, and is once more being brought under cultivation.

The identification with Magdala is made more probable by the frequent interchange of l for r, e.g. Nathan (Heb.), Nethel (Aram.). W. EWING

MAGBISH, mag'bish (מָגִיבֶּש, maghibsh; B, Magbesh, Magebés, A, Magتبט), Magbísh, Magbīs (magbíš): An unidentified town in Benjamin, 156 of the inhabitants of which are said to have returned from exile with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:50). It does not appear in Nehemiah's list (7:33). LXX (B), however, hasMagebés. The name is probably identical with Magnisah, "one who sealed the covenant" (Neh 10:20).

MAGDALA, mag'da-la. See MAGDAN.

MAGDALENE, mag'da-lén, mag-da'lé'ně. See Mary, III.

MAGDIEL, mag'di-el (מְגַדִיל, magdiel; Gen 36:43, A, Herodōu; Medevel, 1 Ch 1:54, A, Maγiδε, Magevēl, B, Me deliber, Medevel, Medevel): One of the "dukes" of Edom.

MAGED, mā'ged. See MAKED.

MAGI, ma'gəi, THE (Magyv, Magoi, [Mt 2:1,7:16; "Wise-men," RV and AV; "Magi," RVm]): Were originally a Median tribe (Herod. i,101); and in Darius' Inscriptions Magush means only a mem-priests mentioned in the Avesta may have been of their number, though only once does the word "Magus" occur in the book (in the compound Mōgha-thiśh), "Magus-hater," Psam, lv, 7, Geld-der's ed.). The Magi in Herodotus' time had expired a reputation for "magie" arts (cf Acts 13:68). They also studied astrology and astronomy (rational mundani motus et siderum [Amm. Marc., xxiii,8,32], partly learned from Babylon.

These latter studies explain why a star was used to lead them to Christ at Bethlehem, when Our Lord was less than two years old (Mt 2:16).

2. The Magi No reliable tradition deals with the Magi at Bethlehem country whence these particular magi came. Justin Martyr, Tertullian and Epiphanius fancied that they came from Arabia, finding their opinion on the fact that "gold, frankincense and myrrh" abounded in Yemen. But the text says they came not from the S. but from the E. Origen held that they came from Chaldaea, which is possible. But Clement of Alexandria, Diodorus of Tarsus, Chrysostom, Cyril of Alexandria, Juvenecus, Prudentius and others are probably right in bringing them from Persia. Sargon's settlement of Israelites in Media (c 730-728 BC [2 K 17:6]) accounts for the large Hebrew element of thought which Darmesteter recognizes in the Avesta (SBE, IV, Intro, ch vi). Median astronomers would thus know Balaam's prophecy of the star out of Jacob (Nu 24:17). That the Jews expected a star as a sign of the birth of the Messiah is clear from the tractate Zohar of the G'mará and also from the title "Son of the Star" (Bar Kokhba) given to a pseudo-Messiah.

LITERATURE.

The word comes from a Gr. adj. (μάγικος, ma\dʒɪk\oʊs) with which the noun τεχνές, τέχνη, "art," is understood. The full phrase is "magical art" (Wisd 17:10). But the Gr word is derived from the maji of Zarathustran (Zoroastrian) priests. Magic is therefore historically the art practiced in Persia by the recognized priests of the country. It is impossible in the present article, owing to exigencies of space, to give a full account of this important subject and of the leading views of it which have been put forth. The main purpose of the following treatment will be to consider the subject from the Bib. standpoint.

I. Definition.

In its modern accepted sense magic may be described as the art of bringing about results by means of incantations or other superhuman agencies. In the wide sense of this definition divination is but a species of magic, i.e. magic used as a means of securing secret knowledge, esp. a knowledge of the future. Divination and magic bear the same relation to prophecy and miracle respectively, the first and third implying special knowledge, the second and fourth special power. But divination has to do generally with omens, and it is better for this and other reasons to notice the two subjects—magic and divination—apart, as is done in the present work.

II. Division of the Subject.

There are two kinds of magic: (1) impersonal; (2) personal.

1. Magic as impersonal:

In the first, magic is a species of crude science, founded on man's own power by superhuman agencies. In the wide sense of this definition divination is but a species of magic, i.e. magic used as a means of securing secret knowledge, esp. a knowledge of the future. Divination and magic bear the same relation to prophecy and miracle respectively, the first and third implying special knowledge, the second and fourth special power. But divination has to do generally with omens, and it is better for this and other reasons to notice the two subjects—magic and divination—apart, as is done in the present work.

2. Magic as personal:

In the second, magic is an art or skill practiced by a magician or a spell-caster. In this second sense magic includes divination, chicanery, and the art of producing false omens. In the wide sense of this definition divination is but a species of magic, i.e. magic used as a means of securing secret knowledge, esp. a knowledge of the future. Divination and magic bear the same relation to prophecy and miracle respectively, the first and third implying special knowledge, the second and fourth special power. But divination has to do generally with omens, and it is better for this and other reasons to notice the two subjects—magic and divination—apart, as is done in the present work.

III. Magic and Religion.

Personal magic in its higher forms shades off into religion, and very commonly the two exist together. It is the practice to speak of sacrifice and prayer as constituting elements of the ancient and modern religions of India. But it is doubtful whether either of these has the same connotation that it bears in the Jewish and Christian Scriptures. J. Frazer (Golden Bough, 1, 67 ff) says that where the operation of spirits is assumed (and "these cases are exceptional"), magic is "tinted and alloyed with religion." Such an assumption is, he admits, often made and the present writer thinks it is generally made, for even the operation of the laws of association implies it. But Frazer concludes from various considerations that "though the magic art began to fuse and amalgamate with religion in many ages and in many lands, there are some grounds for thinking that this fusion was not primitive." It is of course personal magic to which religion stands in closest relations. As soon as man comes to see in the beings by whose power marvels are wrought, personalities capable of emotions like himself and susceptible to persuasion, his magical art becomes an intelligent effort to propitiate these superior beings and invoke their superhuman agency.

IV. Magic in the Bible.

The general remarks made on the Bible and divination in Divination, V, have an equal application to the Bible and magic. For the same reasons that are given in connection with divination, magic must be judged according to its own proper evidence. But see II. end.

1. Hostility attitude of the Bible toward magic.

This attitude is distinctly hostile, as it could not but be in documents professing to inculcate the teaching of the ethical and spiritual religion of Israel (see Dt 18:10; 2 K 21:6; 2 Ch 33:6, etc.). Yet it is equally clear that the actual power of magic is acknowledged as clearly as its illegitimacy is pointed out. In P's account of the plagues (Ex 7–11) it is assumed that the magicians of Egypt had real power to perform superhuman feats. They threw their rods and appeared to change them into the waters of the Nile into blood. It is only then when they produce gnats that they fail, though Aaron had succeeded by Yahweh's power in doing this and that showed that Yahweh's power was greatest. But that the magicians had power that was real and great is not so much as called in question.

Among the ancient Semites (Arabs, Assyrians, Hebrews, etc) there was a strong belief in the potency of the magical words of blessing and of curse. The mere utterance of Magical such words was regarded as enough Words to secure their realization. That the narrator of Nu 22–24 (J) ascribed to Balaam magical power is clear from the narrative, else why should Yahweh be represented transferring Balaam's service to the cause of Israel? We have other Bib. references to the power of the spoken word of blessing in Gen 12:3; Ex 12:32; Jud 17:2; 2 S 21:3, and of curse in Gen 27:38; Jgs 5:23; Job 3:8 (cf. the so-called Imprecatory Psalms, and see Century Bible, "Ps", vol II, 216). On the prevalence of the belief among the Arabs, see the important work of Goldziher, Abhandlungen Philologe, Theil I, 23 ff.

In Gen 30:14 (J) we have an example of the belief in the power of plants (here mandrakes) to stir up and strengthen sexual love, and 3. Influence we read in Arab. lit. of the very same use. A charm in connection with what is called Yabrūh, almost certainly the same plant. Indeed one of the commonest forms in which magic appears is as a love-charm, and as this kind of magic was often exercised by women, magic and adultery are frequently named together in the OT (see 2 K 9:22; Nah 3:4; Mal 3:5; and of Ex 22:18 [17], where the sorcress [AV "witch"] is to be condemned to death). We have an instance of what is called sympathetic magic (for a description of which see Jevons, Intro to Hist. of Religion, 28 ff, and Fraser, Golden Bough, I, 49 ff) in Gen 30:37 f. Jacob placed before the sheep and goats that came to drink water pealed rods, so that the pregnant ones might bring forth young that were speckled and striped. This practice is mentioned in Gen 31:19 ff and put away with wizardry during the drastic reforms of Josiah (2 K 23:24; cf Zec 10:2) were household objects supposed capable of warding off evil of every kind. The Babylonians and Assyrians had a similar custom. We read of an Assyr. magician that he had statues of the gods Lugalgi and Alamu put on each side of the main entrance to his house, and in consequence he felt perfectly impregnable against evil spirits (see Bittel, Assy. Beach, 29).

In Isa 3:2 the kāšāp ("magician" or "diviner") is named along with the knight warrior, the judge, prophet and elder, among the stays and supports of the nation; no disapproval is expressed or implied with regard to any of them. Yet it is not to be denied that in its essential features pure Yahwism, which enforced personal faith in a pure spiritual being, was radically opposed to all magical beliefs and practices. The fact that the Hebrews steered apart as believers in an ethical and spiritual religion from the Sem and other peoples by which they were surrounded suggests that they were Divinely guided, for in other respects—art, philosophy, etc—this same Heb nation held a lower place than many contemporary nations.

V. Magical Terms Used in the Bible. Many terms employed in the OT in reference to divination have also a magical import. See Divination, VII. For a fuller discussion of Bib. terms connected with both subjects, reference may be made to T. W. Davies, Magic, Divination and Demonology among the Hebrews, 44 ff, 78 ff; see also arts. "Divination" and "Magic" in EB, by the present writer.

Here a few brief statements are all that can be attempted. Kesem (קְסֵם), usually rendered "divination" (see Nu 23:23), has primarily a magical reference (Fleischer), though both Wellhausen (Reste des arabischen Heidenthumus, 133, 5) and W. Robertson Smith (Jour. Phil., XIII, 278) hold that its first use was in connection with divination. The Arab. vb. ("to exercise") and noun ("an ephod") have magical meanings. But it must be admitted that the secondary meaning ("divination") has almost driven out the other. See under I, where it is held that at bottom magic and divination are one.

The vb. kāšāp (קָשָׁפ), RV "to practise sorcery," comes, as Fleischer held, from a root denoting "to have a dark appearance," to look gloomy, to be distressed, then as a suppliant to seek relief by magical means. The corresponding nouns and m'tashākaph are rendered "sorcerer" in EV.

Labash (לֱבָשָׁה), EV "enchantment," etc (see Isa 3:3, nḇōn labash, RV "the skilful enchanter"), is connected etymologically with מַלָּשָׁה, "a serpent," the n and f often interchanging in Sem. Labash is, therefore, as might be expected from this etymology, used specifically of serpent charming (see Jer 8:17; Eccl 10:11; cf מַלְשָׁה [מַלָּשָׁה] in Ps 68:5 [6], EV "charmer").

Hebber (הֶבֶר) occurs in the plural only (Isa 47:9.12, EV "enchantments"). It comes from a root meaning "to bind," and it denotes probably amulets of some kind carried on the person to ward off evil. It seems therefore to be the Bib. equivalent of the Talmudic בֵּית (בֵּיתוֹ), lit. = "something bound," from קָשָׁם (קָשָׁם), "to bind."

Shikar (שִׁכָּר) (Isa 47:11) seems to have an etymological connection with the principal Arab. word used for "magic" (the term is explained by the great majority of recent commentators following J. H. Michaelis (Hitzig, Ewald, Dillmann, Whitehouse in Century Bible, etc) as meaning "to charm away" (by incantations). So also Tg., Rashi, JH and JD, Michaelis, Eichhorn, etc.

The vb. bātallogēō (βαταλογεύω) in Mt 6:7 (= "say not the same thing over and over again") refers to the superstition that the repeated utterance of a word will secure one's wish. In India today it is thought that if an ascetic says in one month the name of Radha, Krishna or Rom 100,–000 times, he cannot fail to obtain what he wants (see 1 K 18:26). See Repetition.

The term gōdēs (γόδης), AV "seducers," is used of a class of magicians who uttered certain magical formulae in a deep, low voice (cf. the vb. gōdō [γόδω], which = "to sigh," "to utter low mourning tones"). Herodotus (ii.33) says that there were persons of the kind in Egypt, and they are mentioned also by Euripides and Plato.

Paul in Gal 5:20 classes with uncleanness, idolatry, etc, what he calls pharmaēs (φαρμακεία), AV "witchcraft," RV "sorcery." The word has
8. Witchcraft

A very full bibliography of the subject will be found in T. Witton Davies, Magic, Divination and the Hebraeans and Their Neighbours, xi-xvi. MAGISTRATE, magistra, magister, corresponding to της, σάρπασθ, "to judge," "to pronounce sentence" [Acts 13 17]: Among the ancients, the term corresponding to our "magistrate" had a much wider signification. "Magistrates and judges" (πραγμάτων της, σάρπασθ, ορατών) was Magistrate parenthesis. "Should be judged" (Acts 7:25) δεόμεθα, "rulers" or "nobles" to be as Babylonian or prefects of provinces (Jer 51:28, 57; Ezek 23:6). In the time of Ezra and Nehemiah, the Jewish magistrates bore the same title of judge (Ezra 9:2; Neh 2:16; Neh 13:11). The Greek ἀρχήν, "archim" is "magistrate" (Lk 12:58; Tit 3:1 AV), signifies the chief in power (1 Cor 2:6.8) and "ruled" by Acts (Acts 4:26; Rom 13:3).

The Messiah is destined as the "prince of the house of God" (Ps 89:36; and on the same term Moses is destined the judge and leader of the Hebrews (Acts 7:27,35). The wide application of this term is manifest from the fact that it is used of magistrates of any kind, e.g. the high priest (Acts 23:3); civil judges (Lk 12:58; Acts 16:19); ruler of the synagogue (Lk 8:41; Mt 9:18,23; Mk 5:22); persons of standing and authority among the Pharisees and others in the Sanhedrin (Lk 14:1; Jn 3:1; Acts 3:17). The term also designates Satan, the prince or chief of the fallen angels (Mt 9:34; Eph 2:2).

In the NT we also find εὐροτρίδος, δικαστήριον, employed as the name of those in positions of power (Eng. "the rulers"). ἰδων, εὐροτρίδος, is found in Lk 12:11 AV; Rom 13:2; Tit 3:1. The "higher powers" (Rom 13:1) are all those who are placed in positions of civil authority from the emperor down.

In early Heb history, the magisterial office was limited to the hereditary chiefs, but Moses made the judicial office elective. In his time the heads of families were 59 in number, and these, together with the 12 princes of the tribes, composed the Sanhedrin or Council of 71. Some of the scribes were intrusted with the business of keeping the genealogies and in this capacity were also regarded as magistrates.

MAGNIFICAltalal, mag-nifis-cal (της, gádhál, in Hiph. "to make great"); Old form retained from Gevnean VS in 1 Ch 22 25; in ARV "magnificent."

MAGNIFICANT, mag-nifis-cal: The name given to the hymn of Mary in Lk 1 46-55, concerning "My soul doth magnify the Lord." Three old Lat MSS substitute the name "Elisabeth" for "Mary" in ver 46, but against this is the authority of all Gr MSS and other 1st cent MSS modeled in part on that of Hannah in 1 S 2:1ff.

is peculiarly suitable to the circumstances of Mary, and plainly could not have been composed after the actual appearance and resurrection of Christ. Its early date is thus manifest.

MAGNIFY, mag-nifis-it (Hiph. of יְלַל, gádhál; יָרַע, megalán, to make great," "extol," "celebrate in praise"): Used esp. of exaltation of the name, mercy, and other attributes of God (Gen 19:19; 2 S 7:26, Ps 35:27; 40:16; 70:4 Lk 1:46; Acts 10:46; of God's "word" (Ps 138:2); or of mercy (Acts 19:17; Phil 1:20). Men also can be "magnified" (Josh 4:14; 1 Ch 29:25, etc.). In Rom 11:13, "magnify mine office," the word (Gr doxázō) is changed in RV to 'glorify.'

MAGOG, magog (יַם-גו, mágghād; Magy, Magog): Named among the sons of Japheth (Gen 10:2; 1 Ch 1:5). Ezekiel uses the word as equivalent to "land of Gog" (Ezk 38:2; 39:6). Joa identifies the Magogites with the Scythians (Ant, I, vi, 1). From a resemblance between the names Gog and Gyges (Gugu), king of Lydia, some have suggested that Magog is Lydia; others, however, urge that Magog is probably only a variant of Gog (Soyce in HDB). In the Apocalypse of John, Gog and Magog represent all the heathen opponents of Messiah (Rev 20:8), and in this sense these names frequently recur in Jewish apocalyptic literature.

MAGOR-MISSABBIB, magor-nis-sáb-ib (יִמְגְּרָבָע, maghôr misggâthibb, "terror on every side"): A name given by Jeremiah to Pashhur ben Immer, the governor of the temple, who had caused the prophet to be beaten and set in the stocks (Jer 20:8). The same expression is used (not as a proper name in its own) in several other passages (Ps 31:13; Jer 6:25; 20:10; 46:5; 49:29; Lam 2:22).

MAGPIASH, mag-phish. See Magnish.

MAGUS, mágus, SIMON. See Simon Magus; Mag; Magic.

MAHALAH, ma-hálá, ma-há-la (מַהֲלָה, maḥlah; RV has the correct form MAHALAH): A descendant of Manasseh (1 Ch 7:18).

MAHALALEL, ma-há-la-lel (מַהֲלָלֵל, mahalal-lel; AV Mahalaleel, ma-há-la-le-el, ma-há-la-le-1): (1) Son of Caanan, the grandson of Seth (Gen 5:12bff; 1 Ch 1:2).

(2) The ancestor of Athaliah, one of the children of Judah who dwelt in Jerusalem after the return from exile ( Neh 11:4).

MAHALATH, ma-há-la-th (מַהֲלָת, maḥlah;): (1) In Gen 26:9 the name of a wife of Esau, the daughter of Ishmael, and sister of Nebaloth, called in 36:5, Basmuth (q.v.) and the Sam, however, throughout ch 36 retains "Maalah." On the other hand, in 36:34 Basmuth is said to be "the daughter of Elon the Hittite," probably a confusion with Adaih, as given in 36:2, or corruption may exist in the lists otherwise.

(2) One of the 18 wives of Rehoboam, a granddaughter of David (2 Ch 11:18).

(3) The word is found in the titles of Ps 63 (RV "set to Mahalah") and Ps 88 (RV "set to Mahalath Leannah," m "for singing"). Probably some song or tune is meant, though the word is taken by many to denote a musical instrument. Hengstenberg and others refer it as indicating the subject of the Ps. See Psalms. JAMES ORR Malahi, mā′hā-hī. See Māhîl.

Mahanaim, mā-ha-nāʿim (םַחָנָיִם, maḥa-nâyîm): the Gr is different in every case where the name occurs, B and A also giving variant forms; the dual form may be taken as having arisen from an old locative ending, as, e.g. in לְמַחָנִים, †yərəwâḥalonym, from an original לְמַחָנ, †ywâḥâlonym). In Gen 32 21 maḥāneḥ is evidently a △ form and should be rendered as a proper name, Mahaneh, i.e. Mahanaim): The city must have been one of great strength. It lay E. of the Jordan, and is first mentioned in the history of Jacob. Here he halted after parting from Laban, before the passage of the Jabok (Gen 32 2), "and the angels of God met him." Possibly it was the site of an ancient sanctuary. It is next noticed in defining the boundaries of tribal territory E. of the Jordan. It lay on the border of Gad and Manasseh (Josh 13 26 30). It belonged to the lot of Gad, and was assigned along with Ramoth in Gilead to the Merarite Levites (21 38; 1 Ch 6 80) — the former of these passages affords no justification to Cheyne in saying [EB, s.v.] that it is mentioned as a "city of refuge". The strength of the place doubtless attracted Abner, who fixed here the capital of Ishboseth's kingdom. Saul's chivalrous rescue of Jabesh-gilead was remembered to the credit of his house in these dark days, and the loyalty of M. could be reckoned on (2 S 2 8, etc.). To this same fortress David fled when endangered by the rebellion of Absalom; and in the "forest" hard by, that prince met his fate (2 S 17 24, etc.). It was made the center of one of Solomon's administrative districts, and here Abinadab the son of Iddo was stationed (1 K 4 14). There seems to be a reference to M. in Cant 6 13 RV. If this is so, here alone it appears with the article. By emending the text Cheyne would read: "What do you see in the Shulammite? A Thecus of the valleys."

It is quite clear from the narrative that Jacob, going to meet his brother, who was advancing from the S., crossed the Jabok after leaving M. It is therefore vain to search for the place of the city S. of the Jabok, and Conder's suggested identification with some place near et-Bube'a, L of es-Sallâh, must be given up.

On the N. of the Jabok several positions have been thought of. Merrill (East of the Jordan, 433 ff) argues in favor of Khirbet Solekhat, a ruined site of Wâdây Jâlûn, on the northern bank, 3 miles E. of Jordan, and 4 miles N. of Wâdây 'Ajlûn. From its height, 300 ft. above the plain, it commands a wide view to the W. and S. One running "by the way of the Plain" could be seen a great way off (2 S 18 22). This would place the battle in the hills to the S. near the Jordan valley. Ahimaz then preferred to make a détour, thus securing a level road, while the Cushite took the rough track across the heights. Others, among them Buhl (GAP, 257), would place M. at Maḥneh, a partly overgrown ruin 9 miles E. of Jordan, and 4 miles N. of 'Ajlûn on the north bank of Wâdây Maḥneh. This is the only trace of the ancient name yet found in the district. It may be assumed that M. is to be sought in this neighborhood. Cheyne would locate it at 'Ajlûn, near which rises the great fortress Kolâet-Rabûd. He supposes that the "wood of Mahanaim" extended as far as Maḥneh, and that the name of Maḥneh is really an abbreviation of the ancient phrase." Others would identify M. with Dera, where, however, there are no remains older than Gr-Rom times.

Objections to either 'Ajlûn or Maḥneh are: (1) The reference to "this Jordan" in Gen 32 10, which seems to show that the city was near the river. It may indeed be said that the great hollow of the Jordan valley seems clear for many miles on either side, but this, perhaps, hardly meets the objection. (2) The word kikkâr, used for "Plain" in 2 S 18 23, seems always elsewhere to apply to the "circle" of the Jordan. Buhl, who identifies M. with Maḥneh, sites this verse (GAP, 112) as a case in which kikkâr applies to the plain of the Jordan. He thus prescribes for Ahimaz a very long range. Cheyne sees the difficulty. The battle was obviously in the vicinity of M., and the nearest way from Maḥneh (the "city") kikkâr, "or, since no satisfactory explanation of this reading has been offered by the ṣin, nabâl, that is to say, the eager Ahimaz ran along in the wâdy in which, at some little distance, M. lay." (EB, s.v.). The site for the present remains in doubt.

Mahaneh-Dan, mā-ha-ne-dan (מַחַנֶּה דָּן, maḥâneh-dân; παραπόλις ἅλαν, parepôlîs Dân): This place is mentioned twice: in Jgs 13 25 (AV "the camp of Dan"), and Jgs 18 12. In Mahaneh-dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol, the spirit of the Lord began to move him. Here the Lord of Dan, coming from Zorah and Eshtaol, encamped behind Kiriath-jearim. It has been thought that these two statements contradict each other; or at least that they cannot both apply to the same place. But if we accept the identification of Zorah with Surah, and of Eshtaol with Esh'ah, which seems no reason to question; and if, further, we identify Kiriath-jearim with Khirbet Erma, which is at least possible, the two passages may be quite reconciled. Behind Kiriath-jearim, that is Khirbet Erma, runs the Vale of Sorek, on the north bank of which, about 2 miles apart, stand Zorah and Eshtaol; the former 3 1/2 miles, the latter 2 1/2 miles from Khirbet Erma. No name resembling Mahaneh-dan has yet been recovered; but the place may have lain within the area thus indicated, so meeting the conditions of both passages, whether it was a permanent settlement, or derived its name only from the incident mentioned in 18 12.

Maharai, mā-har′ā́i, mā′hârî (מָהָרָי, maḥâray, "impetuous"): One of David's "braves" (2 S 23 28; 1 Ch 11 30; 27 13). He was one of the 12 monthly captains of David's administration, and took the 10th month in rotation. He was of the family of Zerah, and dwelt in Netophah in Judah.

Mahat, mā-hāth (מָהָת, mahath, "snatching"); Mēh, Mēth: (1) One of the Kohathites having charge of the "service of song" in David's time, son of Amasa (1 Ch 6 35). Possibly the same as Abimoth (ver 25). He seems also to be the same as the person named in 2 Ch 29 12 during Hezekiah's time, though it is probable there is some confusion in the narrative. He is there represented as taking part in the new covenant of Hezekiah and the cleansing of the Lord's house.

(2) One of the overseers of the temple under Conaniah and Shimei (2 Ch 31 13); three passages of Scripture give the name, but it is difficult to individuate these because the genealogy identifies the two first named (1 Ch 6 35; 2 Ch 29 12), while the chronology seems to divide them — one in David's day, the other in Hezekiah's. It is not, however, impossible to identify the man of 2 Ch 29 12 with him of 2 Ch 31 13. Possibly the genealogy has been mistakenly repeated in 2 Ch 29 12.

Mahavite, mā-hā-vāt (מַהֲוָט, mahāwām, “villager”): The description given to Eliel, one of David’s warrior guard (1 Ch 11:46), perhaps to distinguish him from the Eliel in the next verse. MT is very obscure here.

Mahazioth, ma-hā-zī-oth, ma-hā-zī-th (מָהָזוֹת, mahāzōth, “visions”): One of the 14 sons of Heman the Kohathite in the temple choir. “He was leader of the 23rd course of musicians whose function was to blow the horns” (1 Ch 25:4-30).

Maher-Shalal-Haz-Baz, mā-hēr-shāl-āl-haz-baz (םַעֲרָשַׁל-לְחַז-בָּז, mahēr shālāl ḥaz baz), “(the spoil speedeth, the prey hasteth):” A symbolic name given to Isaiah’s son to signify the sharp destruction of Rezin and Pekah by the Assyrian power (Isa 8:13). Cf. The Idea of Nemesis.

Mahlah, mā-lā (מָלָה, mahlah, “sickness” or “song,” etymology doubtful): (1) Eldest of Zelophehad’s 5 daughters (Nu 26:33; 27:1). As Zelophehad, grandson of Manasseh, had no sons (not to be distinguished from his father’s inheritance. The law was altered in their favor on condition that they married into their father’s tribe. They agreed and married their cousins (Nu 36:11). The whole chapter should be read and compared with Josh 17:3 ff, because the decision became a precedent. (2) Another (AV “Mahalah”), same Heb name as above, daughter of Hаммokeleth, granddaughter of Manasseh (1 Ch 7:16).

_Henry Wallace_

Mahli, mā-li (מָלִי, mahli, “a sick or weak one”): (1) A son of Merari (Ex 6:19, AV Mahali; Nu 3:20), grandson of Levi and founder of the Levitical family of Mahliotes (q.v.). (2) A son of Mushi, Mahli’s brother, bears the same name (1 Ch 6:47; 23:23; 24:30). Cf Ex 8:18 and 1 Esd 8:47.

Mahliotes, mā-liotes (מַלְיוֹת, mahliotes, “descendants of Mahli, son of Merari” (Nu 3:33; 26:58). These Mahliotes appear to have followed the example of the daughters of Zelophehad, muttita mutandis. (See Mahlah; had become the name become the description of a practice?) They married the daughters of their uncle Eleazar (1 Ch 25:31-22).

Mahlon, mā-lōn (מַלוֹן, mahlōn, “invalid”): Ruth’s first husband (Ruth 1:25; 4:9-10). In the latter passage is further evidence of the unwillingness to allow a family connection or inheritance to drop (see Mahlah; Mahli). Note that David’s descent and that of his “Greater Son” come through Ruth and Boaz (Ruth 4:22).

Mahol, mā-hōl (מָהֹל, mahōl, “dance”; cf מַחֵל, mahēl, “dance”), “dancing”): The father of the passages reputed next in wisdom to Solomon (1 K 4:31). Their names were Ethan, Heman, Calcol, Darda.

Maaseiah, mā-sē-ya, mā-sī’ā (מַסְעֵיָה, māseyyāh, “Jeh a refugee”): 1. Great-grandfather of Burch (Jer 32:12) and of Jehoiada (Jer 51:59). The name (not to be confused with Maaseiah [q.v.] as AV has done even in the above passages) is spelt “Maaseas” (q.v.) in Bar 1:1.

Maianas, mā-in’as (Maïdnos, Maïnnas; AV Maianess): One of the Levites who taught the law for Ederas (1 Esd 9:48) = Maaseiah [q.v.] in Neh 8:7.

Maid, mā’d, MAIDEN, mā’dn: “Used in AV in the sense of a girl or young female; of an unmarried woman or virgin, and of a female servant or handmaid. Thus it translates several Heb words: (1) The more generic word is מַיָּד, ma‘yd, “girl,” fem. form of the common מַיָּד, ma‘yd, “boy” (1 S 11:2; 2 K 5:24; Est 2:47 ff; Job 41:5; Am 2:7). In several places maye, form מַיָּד, ma‘yd, with fem. form of vb rendered “damsel” (Gen 24:14:16:28; 34:13:12; Dt 22:15); cf הָנָּר, hē na‘ar, “Virgin” (Lk 8:51:54); see also מַיָּד, ma‘yd, paidiskē, diminutive (Sir 41:22; Mk 14:66:67; Lk 12:45; κορία, koritsi‘, LXX as for na‘ar, “maid,” in Mt 9:39; with Job 6:13; Sus 15:19). (2) The Heb מַיָּד, ma‘yd, “maid,” also rendered “maiden,” refers to a woman of marriageable age (Ex 2:2; Prov 30:19), whether married or not, whether a virgin or not. The same word is trd “virgin” in several places (Gen 24:43 AV; Cant 1:3; 6:8; Isa 7:14). (3) The word מַיָּד, ma‘yd, bithālith, a common Heb word for “virgin,” a chaste woman (LXX θερισθείς, parthenos, is frequently rendered “maid” (Gen 22:16; Jgs 19:2; 2 Ch 36:17; Ps 78:63; 148:12; Jer 51:22; Lam 5:11; Ezek 9:6; 44:22; Zec 9:17; cf. Dt 22:14, having “the marks [tokens] of virginity”); מַיָּד, ma‘yd, bithālith, rendered “maid.” See VIRGIN. (4) Two Heb words covering the idea of service, handmaid, handmaiden, and in numerous passages so rendered: (a) מַיָּד, ma‘yd, trd “maid” (Gen 30:3; Ex 2:5; 21:30:26; Lev 25:6; Ex 2:65; Job 19:15; Nah 2:7); (b) מַיָּד, ma‘yd, chipshāḥ, “a family servant,” “a handmaid,” so rendered in numerous passages ("maid"). “maid,” Gen 15:22; 29:24:29; 70:7; 10:12; Isa 4:24:2; Ps 129:2; Eccl 7:1). In AV they are variously trd “maid,” “handmaid,” etc. (5) The rather rare word אֶבֶת, ḥebet, “favorite slave,” is rendered “maid” in Jth 10:2:5; 13:9; 16:23; Ad Est 15:2:7. (6) אֶבֶת, ḥebet, “female slave,” in AV Jth 12:49 (RV “servant”).

Maid servant means simply a female slave in the different positions which such a woman naturally occupies. They were the property of their masters; sometimes held the position of concubines (Gen 31:33); daughters might be sold by their owners for this condition (Ex 21:7). It is regrettable that no uniform tr was adopted in AV. And in RV of Tob 3:7; Jth 10:10; Sir 41:22. “Maid servants” replaces “maidens” of AV in Lk 12:45. Cf Job 31:13.

MAIL, māl. See Armor.

Maimed, mā-mēd (מָמַד, hōrū; κατολός, πυγμακός, πυγμάκος, and púgmakos). The condition of being mutilated or rendered imperfect as the result of accident, in contrast to congenital malformation. An animal thus affected was declared to be unfit to be offered in sacrifice as a peace offering (Lev 22:25); although under certain conditions a congenitally malformed animal might be accepted as a free-will offering, apparently the offering of a maimed animal was always prohibited (vs 23:24). The use of such animals in sacrifice was one of the charges brought against the Jews of his time by Malachi (1:8; 3:5). The word is not to be confused with those who were so mutilated. Among those made whole by Our Lord in Galilee were the maimed as well as the halt (Mt 16:30).

Figuratively the casting off of any evil habit or distracting condition, which interferes with the spiritual life is called “maiming” (Mt 16:8; Mk 9 43; with this may be taken the lesson in Mt. 19:12. In these passages "mained" (kullas) is used of injury of the fingers or toes, and of those affecting the feet, rendering one halt. Hippocrates, however, uses kllias for a deformation of the legs in which the knees are bent so far outward as to render the patient lame; while he applies the term chlos as a generic name for any distortion, and in one place uses it to describe a mutilation of the head (Procrhetica, 83). The mained and the hait are among the outcasts who are to be brought into the gospel feast according to the parable (Lk 14:13-21).

ALEX. MACALISTER

MAINSAIL, mān'sāl. See Ships and Boats.

MAKAZ, mā'kaz (מַּקָּצ, mā'kaz): One of the cities of the 21 of the 12 districts or prefectures which supplied victuals for Solomon (1 K 4:9).

Cheyne (EB, II, col. 2906) suggests that Makaz may be identical with Mejaszar (qv.) in the latter list.

MAKE, māk, MAKER, māk'ēr (מָּקָה, mākā; nāṭan, nāṭan; σκοτάω, σκοτάω, τίθημι, καθίσταμαι, kathistēma): "Make" 1. As Used is a frequently used word, meaning in the OT "to create," "construct," "cause," "constitute," etc., and represents different Heb words. It is very often in AV (1) the tr of 'āshāh, "to do," "make," etc., usually in the sense of constructing, effecting. In Gen 1:7,8,25,31, etc., it is used of the creation of man, with some of the angels (God 1:1); of the ark (6:14); of a feast (21:8); of the tabernacle and all the things belonging to it (Ex 25:8, etc.); of idols (Isa 2:8; Jer 2:28, etc.); of nāṭan (lit. "to give"), chiefly in the sense of constituting, appointing, causing; of a covenant (Gen 9:12; 17:2); of Abraham as the father of many nations, etc. (17:5,6); of Ishmael as a great nation (17:20); of Moses as a god to Pharaoh (Ex 7:1); of judges and officers (Dt 15:18); of laws (Lev 26:46, etc.).

In addition to the changes in the TR already noted may be mentioned, for "maketh colllops" (Job 15:27) "gaped fast"; for "set us in the way of his steps" (Ps 53:13), "made him eat the fruits of his iniquity"; for "did more grievously afflict her" (Isa 9:1), "hath made it glorious"; for "shall make him of quick understanding" (Isa 11:3), "his delight shall be in: for "makest shiles and ponds for fish" (Isa 19:10), "they that work for hire, m. or make dam", "ye that are Jehovah's remembrancers", for "is shall confirm the covenant" (Dn 9:27), "he shall make a firm covenant", for "maketh my way perfect" (2 S 22:33), "gildeth the perfect in his way" (see margin); for the "sire of a man is his freedom" (Prov 19:22), "that which maketh a man to be desired"; for "maketh intercession" (Rom 11:2), "pleadeth"; for "hath 104:8", "made him" (Eph 1:20); "freely bestowed on us", "m. wherewith he endowed us"; for "made himself of no reputation" (Phil 2:7), "emptied himself"; for "spoil you" (Col 2:8), "maketh himself nothing of you"; for "the enemy of God" (Jas 4:4), "maketh himself"; for "worketh among us or [maketh it] a lie" (Rev 21:27), "maketh [in "doeth"] an abomination and a lie together, therefore (Mt 4:3; Lk 3:5; 4:3), "became" (Rom 10:20; 1 Th 4:4,6; "becoming in" for "being made") (Phil 2:7 m)."

MAKABATES, māk'bātēs: This is the pl. of the word makebates, which means "one who stirs up to make a stir." It occurs only in AV of 2 Tim 3:3 and Tit 2:3 as an alternative translation of the Heb. dibsolōbō, which AV renders "false accusers," and RV "slanderers."
MAKED, mā'ked (Māˈked, Māˈkêd, Māˈkêb, Maˈkêb): A strong city E. of the Jordan, not yet identified. It is named along with Bosor, Alemah and Caphshor (1 Mac 5:26). In ver 36, AV reads “Maged.”

MAKER, mā'kēr. See Make.

MAKELOTH, mak-hĕˈloθ, mak-hĕˈlîth (יִלְתָּה, makheloth, “assemblies”): A desert camp of the Israelites between Haradah and Tahath (Nu 32:25-26). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

MAKKEĐAH, ma-kēˈdā (יִלְתָּה, makkedah; Maˈkëdā, Makked): A Canaanite royal city which Joshua captured, utterly destroying the inhabitants, and doing to the king as he had done unto the king of Jericho (Josh 10:28; 12:10). It lay in the Shephelah of Judah (15:41). It was brought into prominence by the flight thither of the 5 kings of the Amorites who, having united their forces for the destruction of Gibeon, were themselves defeated and numbered among their dead. In pursuing their danger, the men of Gibeon sought refuge in the camp at Gilgal beseeching Joshua to save and help them. That energetic commander marched all night with his full strength, fell upon the allies at Gibeon, slew them with a great slaughter, chased the fugitives down the valley by way of Beth-horon, and smote them unto Azekah and unto Makkeđah. It was during this memorable pursuit that in response to Joshua’s appeal:

“Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon; And thou, Moon, in the valley of Aijalon,” the sun stayed in the midst of heaven, and hasted not to go down a whole day, until the nation had avenged themselves of their enemies.

The 5 kings sought refuge in the cave at Makkeđah, where, by Joshua’s orders, they were blocked in with great stones, until the slaughter of the fugitives should be completed. Then the royal prisoners were brought out, and, after the chiefs of Israel had set their feet upon their necks, Joshua slew them and hanged them on five trees until sunset. This is an illustration of the old practice of impaling enemies after death. The bodies were then cast into the cave where they had sought to hide, and great stones were rolled against the entrance.

The flight of the allies was past Beth-horon and Azekah on the north and Makkeđah on the south. It is named with Gederoth, Beth-dagon and Naama (Josh 15:41). These are probably represented by Katrah, Dajôn and Na'an, so that in this district Makkeđah may be sought. The officers of the Pal Exploration Fund agree in suggesting el-Mughâr, “the cave,” on the northern bank of Wâdy es-Sûrâd, about 4 miles from the sand dunes on the shore. There are traces of old quarrying and many rock-cut tombs with loculi.

“The village stands on a sort of promontory stretching into the valley <...> divided into three plateaux on the lower of these to the S. is the modern village, el-Mughâr, built in front of the caves which are cut out of the sandstone” (Warren). In no other place in the neighborhood are caves found. The narrative, however, speaks not of caves, but of “the cave,” as of one which was notable. On the other hand the events narrated may have lent distinction to some particular cave among the many.

“The cave” would therefore be that associated with the fate of the 5 kings. Such a position is possible.

MAKTESH, makˈtēš, THE (יוּדִּיתָה, ha-makhˈtēš, “the mortar”); cf Jgs 15:19, “the mortar,” EV “hollow place that is in Lehi”): A quarter of Jerusalem so named, it is supposed, on account of the configuration of the ground and associated (Zeph 1.10) with the “fish gate” and Mishneh (q.v.) or “second quarter.” Most authorities think it was in the northern part of the city, and many consider that the name was derived from the hollowed-out form of that part of the Tyropoion just N. of the walls, where foreign merchants congregated; others have suggested a hollow farther W., now occupied by the muriatan and the three long bazaars.

E. W. G. Masterman

The last book of the OT. Nothing is known of the person of Malachi. Because his name does not occur elsewhere, some scholars indeed have doubted whether Malachi is intended to be the personal name of the prophet. But none of the other prophetic books of the OT is anonymous. The form יִלְתָּה, mal’ăḵī, signifies “my messenger”; it occurs again in 1:3; cf 3:1; cf 3:7. But this form of itself would hardly be appropriate as a proper name without some additional syllable such as נֹדֶה (N. Nāḏeh, i.e. “messenger of Yahweh”). Haggai, in fact, is expressly designated “messenger of Yahweh” (Hag 1:13). Besides, the superscriptions prefixed to the book, in both the LXX and the Vulg, warrant the supposition that Malachi’s full name ended with the syllable Μ." (Hag 1:13). At the same time the LXX τααr the last clause of 1:1, “by the hand of his messenger,” and the Tg reads, “by the hand of my angel, whose name is called Ezra the scribe.” Jerome likewise testifies that the Jews of his day ascribed this last book of prophecy to Ezra (V. Praef, in duodecim prophetas). But if Ezra’s name was originally associated with the book, it would hardly have been dropped by the collectors of the prophetic Canon who lived only a century or two subsequently to Ezra’s time. Certain traditions ascribe the book to Zerubbabel and Nehemiah; others, still, to Malachi, whom they designate as a Levite and a member of the “Great Synagogue.” Certain modern scholars, however, on the basis of the similarity of the name Malachi with the name of the Prophet’s time, may declare it to be anonymous; but this is a rash conclusion without any substantial proof other than supposition. The best explanation is that of Professor G. G. Cameron, who suggests that the termination of the word Malachi is adjectival, and is equivalent to the Lat angelicus, signifying “one charged with a message or mission” (a missionary). The term would thus be an official title; and the thought would not be unsuitable to one whose message closed the prophetic Canon of the OT, and whose mission in behalf of the church was so sacred in character (1-vol HDB).

Opinions vary as to the prophet’s exact date, but nearly all scholars are agreed that Malachi prophesied during the Pers period, and after the reconstruction and dedication of the second temple in 516 BC (cf Mal 1:10; 3:1.10). The prophet speaks of the people’s “gover- nor” (Heb pehāb, Mal 1:8), as do Haggai and Nehemiah (Hag 1:1; Neh 8:14; 12:26). The social conditions portrayed are unquestionably those also of the period of the Restoration. More specifically, Malachi probably lived and labored during the times of Ezra and Nehemiah. Serious abuses had crept into Jewish life; the priests had become lax and degenerate, defective and inferior

2. The Prophet’s Times

BC (cf Mal 1:10; 3:1.10). The prophet speaks of the people’s “gover- nor” (Heb pehāb, Mal 1:8), as do Haggai and Nehemiah (Hag 1:1; Neh 8:14; 12:26). The social conditions portrayed are unquestionably those also of the period of the Restoration. More specifically, Malachi probably lived and labored during the times of Ezra and Nehemiah. Serious abuses had crept into Jewish life; the priests had become lax and degenerate, defective and inferior... sacrifices were allowed to be offered upon the temple altar, the people were neglecting their tithes, divorce was common and God's covenant was ignored; just such abuses as we know from the Book of Neh were common in his day (cf Neh 3:5; 5:1–13). Yet, it is doubtful whether Malachi preached during Nehemiah's active governorship; for in Mal 1:6 it is implied that gifts might be offered to the "governor," whereas Nehemiah tells us that he declined all such (Neh 5:15,18). On the other hand, the abuses which Malachi attacked correspond so exactly with those which Nehemiah found on his 2d visit to Jerusalem in 445 BC (Neh 6:14ff) that it seems reasonably certain that he prophesied shortly before that date, i.e. between 445 and 432 BC. As Dr. J. M. P. Smith says, "The Book of Mal fits the situation amid which Nehemiah worked as snugly as a bone fits its socket" (ICC, 7). That the prophet should exhort the people to remember the law of Moses, which was publicly read by Ezra in the year 444 BC, is in perfect agreement with this conclusion, despite the fact that Stade, Cornill and Kautsch argue for a date prior to the time of Ezra. On the other hand, Nägelsbach, Köhler, Orelli, Reuss and Volck rightly place the book in the period between the two visits of Nehemiah (445–432 BC). The book, in the main, is composed of two extended polemics against the priests (1:6–2:9) and the people (2:10–4:3), opening with an exhortation to remember the Law of Moses (4:4–6). After the title or superscription (1:1) the prophecy falls naturally into six divisions: (1) 1:2–5, in which Malachi shows that Jeh still loves Israel (2:15), and closes with an exhortation to remember the Law of Moses (4:4–6). The style and diction (1:1) the prophecy falls naturally into six divisions: (1) 1:2–5, in which Malachi shows that Jeh still loves Israel (2:15), and closes with an exhortation to remember the Law of Moses (4:4–6). (2) 1:6–2:9, a denunciation of the priests, the Levites, who have become neglectful of their sacerdotal office, indifferent to the Law, and unmindful of their covenant relationship to Jeh. (3) 2:10–16, against idolatry and divorce. Some interpret this section metaphorically of Judah as having abandoned the religion of his youth (ver 11). But there are closely related. Many people are obviously required for literally putting away their own Jewish wives in order to contract marriage with foreigners (ver 15). Such marriages, the prophet declares, are not only a form of idolatry (ver 11), but a violation of Jeh's intention to preserve to Himself a "godly seed" (ver 15). (4) 2:17–3:6, an announcement of coming judgment. Men are beginning to doubt whether there is longer a God of justice (ver 17). Malachi reminds that the Lord whom the people seek will suddenly come, both to purify the sons of Levi and to purge the land of sinners in general. The nation, however, will not be utterly consumed (3:6). (5) 3:7–12, in which the prophet promises to give another concrete example of the people's sins: they have failed to pay their tithes and other dues. Accordingly, drought, locusts, and famine have ensued. Let these be paid and the nation will again prosper, and their land will become "a delightful land." (6) 3:13–4:3, a second section addressed to the doubters of the prophet's age. In 2:17, they had said, "Where is the God of justice?" They now murmur: "It is vain to seek God; and what profit is it that we have kept his charge?" The book closes with the words of the good alike prophet (3:14,15). But, the prophet replies, Jeh knows them that are His, and a book of remembrance is being kept; for a day of judgment is coming when the good and the evil will be distinguished; those who work iniquity will be exterminated, while those who do righteously will triumph. (7) 4:4–6, a concluding exhortation to obey the Mosaic Law; with a promise that Elijah the prophet will first come to avert, if possible, the threatened judgment by reconciling the hearts of the nation to one another, i.e. reconcile the zealots of the old to those of the young, and vice versa.

Malachi was content to write prose. His Hebrew is clear and forceful and direct; sometimes almost rhetorical. His figures are as numerous as should be expected in the brief remnants of his sermons which have come down to us, and in every case they are chaste and beautiful (1:6; 3:2.3.17; 4:1–3). His statements are bold and correspondingly effective. The most original feature in his style is the lecture-like method which characterizes his book throughout; more particularly that of question and answer. His style is that of the scribes. It is known as the didactic-dialectic method, consisting first of an assertion or charge, then a fancied objection raised by his hearers, and finally the prophet's refutation of their objection. Eight distinct examples of this peculiarity are to be found in his book, each one containing the same clause in Heb, "Yet ye say" (1:2.6.7; 2:14.17; 7:7.8.13). This debating style is the esp. characteristic of Malachi and identified it "the dialogistic" method. Malachi shows the influence of the schools (cf his use of "also" and "again" in 1:13; 2:13, which is equivalent to our "firstly," "secondly," etc). Malachi's message has a permanent value for us as well as an immediate value for his own time. He was an intense patriot, and accord-

5. Message ingly his message was clean-cut and severe. His primary aim was to encourage a disheartened people who were still looking for Haggai's and Zechariah's optimistic predictions to be fulfilled. Among the lessons of abiding value are the following: (1) That ritual is an important element in religion, but not as an end in itself. Titles and offerings are necessary, but only as the expression of sincere moral and deeply spiritual life (1:11). (2) That a cheap religion avails nothing, and that sacrifices given grudgingly are displeasing to God. Better a temple built with such offerings. (3) That divorce and remarriage with heathen idolators thwart the purpose of God in securing to Himself a peculiar people, whose family life is sacred because it is the nursery of a "godly seed" (2:15). (4) That there is eternal discipline in the Law. Malachi places the greatest emphasis upon the necessity of keeping the Mosaic Law. The priests, he says, are the custodians and expounders of the Law. At their mouth the people should seek knowledge. "To undervalue the Law is easy; to appraise it is a much harder task" (Weiske). With Malachi, no less than with Christ Himself, not one jot or tittle should ever pass away or become obsolete.

MALACHY, mal’k-ə-kəl: Another form of the name of the prophet “Malachī” (q.v.), found in RV and AV of 2 Esd 1 40.

MALCAM, mal’käm (םלקם), malkām (מלקם), “their king”; AV Malcham:
(1) A chief of the Benjaminites, son of Shaharaim (1 Ch 8 9).
(2) The name of an idol as well as the possessive pronominal form of מלק, melekh, “king” (2 S 12 20 RVM; Jer 49 1.3 [LXX Melchôd]; Zeph 1 5). In Am 1 15 it appears to be best transliterated “their king” as both AV and RV. Only a careful examination of the context can determine whether the word is the proper name of the idol (Molech) or the 3rd personal possessive pronoun for king. The idol is also spelt “Milcom” and “Molech.”

MALCHIAH, mal’k-ə. See Malchiah.

MALCHIEL, mal’k-ə-el (םלכיאל, mal’kē-ēl): Descendants of Malchiel (Nu 26 45).

MALCHIJAH, mal’k-ja (םלכיה, mal’kē-yāh, “Jeh is king”); Mal’kias, Mal’kēson, with variants:
(1) A Levite, descendant of Gershom, of those whom David set over the “service of song” in the worship (1 Ch 6 40).
(2) The head of the 5th course of priests (1 Ch 24 9).
(3) One of the laymen who had taken “strange wives” during the exile (Ezr 10 25); the “Melchias” of 1 Esd 9 26.
(4) Another of the same name (Ezr 10 25; two in same verse). Called “Asibias” in 1 Esd 9 26.
(5) Another under the same offence, son of Harim (Ezr 10 31). “Melchias” in 1 Esd 9 32.
(6) One of the “repairers” who helped with the “tower of the furnaces” (Neh 3 11).
(7) Son of Rechab ruler of Beth-haccerem, repairer of the dung gate (Neh 3 14).
(8) A goldsmith who helped in building the walls of Jerusalem (Neh 3 31).
(9) One of those at Ezra’s left hand when he read the law (though possibly one of the above) (Neh 8 4).
In 1 Esd 9 44 “Melchias.”
(10) One of the covenant signatories (Neh 10 3).
(11) The father of Pashhur (Neh 11 12; Jer 21 1; 38 1).
(12) A priest, a singer at the dedication of the walls of Jerusalem under Ezra and Nehemiah (Neh 12 42).
(13) מלקיה (malékîyâh, as above with un ending): Son of Ham-melech (or, as 1 K 22 26; 2 Ch 28 7 translates it, “king’s son”). Jeremiah was cast into his dungeon or pit (Jer 38 6). AV spells “Malchiah” or “Malchijah” indiscriminately with “Melchias” in Jer 21 1; ERV has “Malchias” in Jer 21 1; 38 1.6, elsewhere “Malchijah”; ARV has “Malchijah” throughout.

MALCHIRAM, mal’k-ə-răm (םלכירהם, malkērām, “uplifted king”): Son of Jeconiah, descendant of David (1 Ch 3 18).

MALCHI-SHUA, mal’kē-shō’ō (םלכישוע, malkē-shō’ō, “my king saves”): One of the sons of Saul (1 S 14 49; 31 2, AV “Malchishua”; 1 Ch 8 33; 9 36). He was slain by the Philistia with his brothers at the battle of Gilboa (1 Ch 10 10; 1 S 31 2).

MALCHUS, mal’kūs (Μαλχος, Málchos, from מלק, melek, i.e. “counselor” or “king”): The name of the servant of the high priest Caiaphas whose right ear was smitten off by Simon Peter at the arrest of Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane (cf Mt 26 51; Mk 14 47; Lk 22 50; Jn 18 10). It is noteworthy that Luke “the physician” alone gives an account of the healing of the wound (Lk 22 51). As Jesus “touched” his ear, and healed him, the ear was not entirely severed from the head. The words of Jesus, “Suffer ye them to speak,” may have been addressed to either the disciples, i.e. “Suffer ye that I thus far show kindness to my captors,” or to those about to bind him, i.e. asking a short respite to heal Malchus. They were not addressed directly to Peter, as the Gr form is used; nor do the words of Jesus there refer to the healing but to the action of his disciple. Akinsim of Malchus, also a servant, was one of those who put the questions which made Peter deny Jesus (Jn 18 26).

MALEFACTOR, mal-ē-fak'ter (κακοποίος, kakopoiôs, a bad doer, i.e. "evildoer", "criminal", κακοδιοίς, kakodiō̂s): The former occurs in Jn 18 30 AV, the latter, which is the stronger term, in Lk 23 32 39. The former describes the subject as doing or making evil, the latter as creating or originating the bad, and hence designates the more energetic, aggressive, initiating type of criminality.

MALEEL, ma-le-lē′el, mal′ē-lēl (Mallalḗ, Malladḗ, AV): Gr form of "Mahalel" (Lk 3 37); RV "Mahalelah."

MALICE, mal′ēs, MALIGNITY, ma-lig′ni-ti (κακία, kakiā, πονερός, ponērôs, κακοφθία, kakōthēia); "Malice," now used in the sense of deliberate ill-will, by its derivation means badness, or wickedness "generally, and was so used in Older Eng. In the Apoc it is the tr of kakiā, "evil," "badness" (Wis 12 10.20; 16 14; 2 Mace 4 50, RV "wickedness"); in Eccles 27 30; 28 7, we have its "perversity" in the more restricted sense as the tr of μητία, "confirmed anger." In the NT "malice" and "maliciousness" are the tr of kakiā (Rom 1 29a; 1 Cor 5 8; 14 20; Col 3 8); malicious is the tr of ponērôs, "evil" (3 Js ver 10, RV "wicked"); it also occurs in Acts 13 47, ver 4 "maligment;" Wis 1 4, RV "that devieth evil;" 2 Mace 5 23; malignity occurs in Rom 1 29b as the tr of kako-θēia, "evil disposition;" "malevolently" Sus vs 43 62; 2 Mace 14 11, RV "having ill will."

MALLUS, mal′ōs. See Mallus.

MALLOTHI, mal′ō-thi, ma-lō′thi (mallo-θi, "my discourse"): Son of Heman, a Kohathite singer (1 Ch 6 38; 25 4). The song service in the house of the Lord was apportioned by David and the captains of the host to the 3 families of Asaph, Heman, and Jeduthun (1 Ch 25 1). Their place in the "counsels" was, however, settled by "lot" (1 Ch 25 20 9). Mallothi was one of Heman's 17 children—14 sons and 3 daughters (1 Ch 25 5)—and was chief of the 19th course of twelve singers into which the temple choir was divided (1 Ch 25 26).

MALLOWS, mal′ōs. See SALT-WORT.

MALUCH, mal′uk (malūk, malūkah, "coun-seller"):
(1) A Levite of the sons of Merari, ancestor of Ethan the singer (1 Ch 6 44; cf ver 29).
(2) Son of Bani, among those who had foreign wives (Ezr 10 29). He is a descendant of Judah (1 Ch 9 4) and is the Mamuchus of 1 Esd 30.
(3) A descendant of Harem, who married a foreign wife (Ezr 10 20).
(4) 5 Two who sealed the covenant with Neh-

MALUCHI, mal′ū-chi (malūkhi, malūkki, "my counsellor"): A family of priests that came over with Zerubbabel (Neh 10 4; 12 14). May be the patronymic MALUCH, (4) (q.v.).

MALLUS, mal′ōs (Mallōs, Mallus; AV Mallos): A city in Cilicia, the inhabitants of which along with those of Tarsus, revolted from An-tiochus Epiphanes in protest against his action in giving them to his concubine, Antiochus (2 Mace 4 30). The ancient name was Mallus. The river Pyramos divides about 10 miles from the sea, one branch flowing to the W., the other to the E. of the low range of hills along the coast on which stands Kara-Tash. Mallus stood on a height (Strabo, 773) to the E. of the western arm, a short distance from the shore. The site is a little W. of Kara-Tash, where inscriptions of Antiocheia and Mallus have been found. Tarsus lay about 35 miles to the N.W. The two cities were rivals in trade. The position of Mallus with her harbor on the coast gave her really no advantage over Tarsus, with her river navigable to the city walls. The fine wagon road over the mountain by way of the Cilician Gates opened for her easy access to the interior, compared with that furnished by Mallus by the old caravan track to the N. by way of Adana. This sufficiently explains the greater prosperity of the former city.

MALOBA THRON, mal-o-bath′ron: RVm sug-uggests that this tr may be right instead of Bether in the phrase τέμπε ἵμηρα, háre bethr (Cant 2 17). But this spice never grew wild in Pal, and so could hardly have given its name to a mountain, or mountain range. The name Bether ought therefore to be retained, notwithstanding Wellhausen (Prol., 415). The spice is the leaf of the Cassa lignea tree.

MAL TANNEUS, mal-tan-nē′us (Mallanaios, Mallanaios, B and Sweete; Altaneus, Altanaitos, A and Pritzbe—the M being a strike through—because of the final M in the preceding word; AV Altaneus): One of the sons of Asom who put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 33) = "Mattennai" in Ex 10 33.

MAMAIAS, ma-mā′yas. See SAMAIAS, (3).

MAMDAI, man′di-ā, man′di (B, Maβdā, Momdā, A, Mattādā, Mandā): One of those who consented to put away their "strange wives" at Esdras' order (1 Esd 9 34) = AV "Mabdai" = "Be-nahā" in Ezr 10 35.

MAMMON, man′un (Māwōnās, Mamōnda): A common Aram. word (Malwān, māmōn) for riches, used in Mt 6 24 and in Lk 16 9.11.13. In these passages mammon merely means wealth, and is called "unrighteous," because the abuse of riches is more frequent than their right use. In Lk 16 13 there is doubtless personification, but there is no proof that there was in NT times a Syrian deity called Mammon. The application of the term in Mt is apparent and requires no comment. In Lk, however, since the statement, "Make to yourselves friends out of the mammon of unrighteousness," follows as a comment on the parable of the Unjust Steward, there is danger of the inference that Jesus approved the dishonest conduct of the steward and advised His disciples to imitate his example. On the contrary, the statement is added more as a corrective against this inference than as an application. 'Do not infer,' He says, 'that honesty in the use of money is a matter of indifference. He that is unfaithful in little is unfaithful in much. So if you are not wise in the use of earthly treasure how can you hope to be intrusted with heavenly treasure?' The commendation is in the matter of foresight, not in the mere money which he tried to serve two masters, his lord and his lord's creditors, but the thing could not be done, as the sequel shows. Neither can men serve both God and riches exalted as an object of slavish servitude. Wealth, Jesus teaches, does not really belong to men, but as stewards they may use wealth prudently to their eternal advantage. Instead of serving God and mammon alike we may serve God by the use of wealth, and thus lay up treasures for ourselves in heaven. Again, the parable is not to be interpreted as teaching that the wrong of dishonest gain may be atoned for by charity. Jesus is not dealing with the question of separation. The object is to point out how one may best use wealth, tainted or otherwise, with a view to the future.

MAMNITANEMUS, man-ni-te-nae'mus (Μαμνιτανɛμος, Mamnītānēmos, B. Μαμνιτάναιμος, Mamnītānāmos, AV Mamnitanaimus): 1 Esd 9:34, where it represents the two names Mattaniah and Mattenai in the LXX of Ezr 10:37, which probably represent only one person. It must be a corruption of these names. The Aldine gives a still more corrupt form, Μαμνιταναιμος, Mamnitanaimos.

MAMRE, man're (מָמְר, mam're; LXX Μαμρή, Mamrē;): (1) In Gen 14:24 Mamre is mentioned as the name of one of Abraham's allies, who in ver 13 is described as the Amorite, brother of Eshcol and Aner. The name of the grove of trees is evidently considered as derived from this sheikh or chief-tain. The "oaks" ("terebinths") of Mamre where Abram pitched his tent (Gen 14:13; 18:1) are described (13:18) as "in Hebron." Later on MACHPELAI (q.v.) is described as "before," i.e., "to the E. of Mamre" (Gen 23:17; 25:9; 49:30; 50:13), and Mamre is identified with Hebron itself (23:19).

It is probable that this inclosure surrounded a magnificent terebinth; if so, it was at this spot that before the days of Constantine a great annual fair was held, attended by Jews, Christians and heathen who united to pay honor to the sacred tree, while the well was on the same occasion illuminated, and offerings were made to it. Similar customs survive today at several shrines in Pal. Constantine suppressed these "superstitions," and built a church in the neighborhood, probably the so-called "Abraham's house," Beit Ibrahim of today. The tree which stood here is apparently that mentioned by Jos (BJ, IV, ix, 7) as having continued "since the creation of the world." At this inclosure, too, Jewish women and children were sold at auction after the suppression of the revolt of Bar Cochba.

Whatever the origin of the veneration paid to this terebinth—now long centuries dead and gone—early Christian tradition associated it with Abraham and located Mamre here. This tradition is mentioned by Jerome (4th cent.), by Eucherius (6th cent.), by Aurelius (700 AD) and by Benjamin of Tudela (1165 AD). Among the modern Jews it is looked upon as the site of "Abraham's oak." It is probable that the view that Abraham was connected with this tree is one attached to it much later than its original sanctity; it was originally one of the many "holy trees" of the land venerated by primitive Semitic religious feeling, and the nearness of Hebron caused the Bible story to be attached to it. Judging from the Bible data, it appears to be too far from Hebron and Machpelah to suit the conditions; the site of Mamre must have been nearer to Deir el Arba'in, but it has probably been entirely lost since very early times.

For a very good discussion about Mamre see Mambré by Le R. P. Abel des Frères Prêcheurs in the Conférences de Saint Étienne, 1909-10 (Paris).

(2) An Amorite chief, owner of the "oaks" mentioned above (Gen 14:13).

MAMUCHUS, ma-mu'kus (Μάμουχος, Māmouchos); One of those who put away their "strange wardrobe" (Ezr 9:30); identical with "Malchus" in Ex 10:20.

MAN. See ANTHROPOLOGY.

MAN, NATURAL, na't-'ral, nach-'u-ral (ψυχικός ἀνθρώπος, psuchikós anthrōpos); Man as he is by nature, contrasted with man as he becomes by grace. This phrase is exclusively Pauline.

I. Biblical Meaning.—The classical passage in which it occurs is 1 Cor 2:14 AV: "But the natural man receiveth not the things of the Spirit of God: for they are foolishness unto him: neither can he know them, because they are spiritually discerned." In his anthropology Paul uses four groups of descriptive adjs. in contrasted pairs: (1) the old man and the new man (Rom 6:5; Eph 4:22; Col 3:10; Eph 2:15; 4:24; Col 3:10); (2) the outward man and the inward man (2 Cor 4:16; Rom 7:22; Eph 3:16); (3) the carnal man and the spiritual man (Rom 8:1-14; 1 Cor 3:1.3.4); (4) the natural man and the spiritual man (2 Cor 4:3-3.4; Eph 2:3; 1 Cor 2:15; 3:1; 14:37; 15:46; Gal 6:1). A study of these passages will show that the adjs. "old," "outward," "carnal," and "natural" describe man, from different points of view, prior to his conversion; while the adj. "new," "inward" and "spiritual" describe him, from different points of view, after his conversion. To elucidate the meaning, the expositor must respect these antitheses and let the contrasted words throw light and clarity upon each other.

The "old man" is the "natural man" considered chronologically—prior to that operation of the Holy Spirit by which he is renovated into

1. The Old the "new man" Man

The old house is the house as it was before it was remodelled: an old garment is the garment as it was before it was re-fashoined; and the "old man" is man as he was before he was regenerated and sanctified by the grace of the Spirit. "Our old man is crucified with him, that the body of sin might henceforth have no power over us to bring us intobondage unto sin." (Rom 6:6 AV). Here the "old man" is called the "body," of sin; with the same implications it is called the body of the soul or spirit, and is to be "crucified" and "destroyed," in order that man may no longer be the "servant of sin." "Put off concerning the former conversation the old man, which is corrupt... Put on the new man, which is created after God's likeness, having the righteousness and true holiness" (Eph 4:22.24 AV). Here the "old man" is said to be "corrupt," and we are called upon to "put it off." The figure is that of putting off old clothes which are unclean, and putting on those garments which have come from the wash clean and snowy white. We have the same idea, in a different language and with a slightly different imagery, in Col 3:10.

When Paul calls the "natural man," the "old man," and the "body of sin," which is "coiled up" in its nature and "deeds," and tells us that it must be "crucified" and "destroyed" and "put off," in order that we may "not serve sin," he has these "righteousness" and "true holiness" and "knowledge" and the "image of God, we got some conception of the moral meaning which he is endeavoring to convey by these contrasts (Gal 5:19-24). He has reference to that sinful nature which is as old as the individual is old as the race of which he is a member, which must be graciously recreated according to that gospel which he preaches. It is the old man and the "body of sin," the flesh, as "the old man" is a figure of speech for that sinful human nature, common to us all. It is equivalent to the theological phrases: the "sinful inclination," the "sinful disposition," the "apostate will," "original sin," "native depravity," "propensity," and in the understanding as blindness, in the heart as hardness, in the will as obstinacy. See MAN, NEW.

Robert Alexander WEBB

2. The Out- the outward manward Man by day" (2 Cor 4:16). Now what sort of man is the "outward man" as contrasted with the "inward man?" In Gr, the}

é-ó-anthrópos is set over against the éso-anthrópos. See OUTWARD MAN.

"The contrast here drawn between the outward man and the inward man, though in contrast in Rom 7:22 between the "law in the members" and the "inner man," and in Eph 4:22 between the "old man" and the "new man" is not precisely the same. Those contrasts relate to the difference between the sensual and the moral nature, as "flesh" and "spirit"; and to this difference between the material and the spiritual nature" (Stanley, in loc.).

"The outward man" is the body, and "the inward man" is the soul, or immaterial principles of the human make-up. As the body is wasted by the afflictions of life, the soul is renewed; what is death to the body is life to the soul; as afflictions depotentiate man's physical organism, they impotentiate man's spiritual principle. That is, the afflictions of life, culminating in death itself, have diametrically opposite effects upon the body and upon the soul. They kill the one; they quicken the other.

"The inward man" is the whole human nature as renewed and indwelt and dominated by the Spirit of God as interpreted by the spirit of grace. As the one is broken down by the adverse dispensations of life, the other is built up by the sanctifying discipline of the Spirit.

There is another Pauline antithesis which it is necessary for us to interpret in order to understand what he means by the "natural man."

3. The Carnal Man

It is the distinction which he draws between the "carnal mind" and the "spiritual mind." The critical reference is Rom 8:1-14. In this place the "carnal mind" is identified with the "law of death," and the "spiritual mind" is identified with the "law of the Spirit." These two "laws" are two principles and codes: the one makes man to be "cruel against God" and leads to "death"; the other makes him the friend of God, and conducts to "life and peace." The word "carnal" connotes all that is fallen and sinful and unregenerate in man's nature. In its gross sense the "carnal" signifies that which is contrary to nature, or nature expressing itself in low and bestial forms of sin.

"The carnal mind" is the "old man," the "outward man," the "carnal man"—man as he is by nature, as he is firstborn, contra dictively moral nature, that resultant of our spiritual and immaterial nature, and that resultant of that depraved nature which we inherit from Adam fallen, the source and seat of all actual and personal transgressions.

4. The Natural Man

Regenerated. There is an "old" life, an "outward" life, a "carnal" life, a "natural" life, as contrasted with the "new" life, the "inward" life, the "spiritual" life, the "true" life. The "natural man" is a bold and vivid personification of that depraved nature which we inherit from Adam fallen, the source and seat of all actual and personal transgressions.
MAN, NEW (νέος or καινὸς ἰδρυμος, νέος or καινός ἀνθρώπος): Generally described, the "new" man is man as he becomes under the transforming power of the Holy Spirit, contrasted with man as he is by nature. The phrase has (1) its Bib., and (2) its theological, meaning.

1. Biblical Meaning.—There are four Bib. contrasts which must be considered as opposites: (1) the "old man" (παλαῖος ἀνθρώπος) and the "new man" (νεος or καινός ἀνθρώπος); (2) the "outward man" (ἐξωτερικὸς ἄνθρωπος) and the "inward man" (ἐσωτερικὸς ἄνθρωπος); (3) the "carnal man" (παρακάρδιος ἄνθρωπος) and the "spiritual man" (πνευματικός ἄνθρωπος); (4) the "natural man" (ψυχικὸς ἄνθρωπος) and the "spiritual man" (πνευματικός ἄνθρωπος). These are not four different sorts of men, but four different sorts of man. Take up these antitheses in their reverse order, so as to arrive at some clear and impressive conception of what the Bib. writer means by the "new man."

The "spiritual man" is a designation given in opposition to the "carnal man" and to the "natural man" (Rom 8 1–14; 1 Cor 2 15; 3 1.3.4; 2 14; 3 11; 14 37; 15 Spiritual Man 46; Gal 6 1; Eph 2 3). All three of these terms are personifications of human nature and human nature viewed as ruled and dominated by sensual appetites and fleshly desires—as energized by those impulses which have close association with the bodily affections. The "natural man" is humanized and dominated by the unsanctified reason—those higher powers of the soul not yet influenced by Divine grace. The "spiritual man" is this same human nature after it has been seized upon and interpreted and determined by the Holy Spirit. The word "spiritual" is sometimes used in a poetical and idealistic sense, as when we speak of the spirituality of beauty; sometimes in a metaphysical sense, as when we speak of the spirituality of the soul; but in its prevalent Bib. and evangelical sense it is an adj. with the Holy Spirit: as its own-form. The spiritual life is that life of which the Holy Spirit is the author and preserver; and the "spiritual man" is that nature or character in man which the Holy Spirit originates, preserves, determines, disciplines, sanctifies and glorifies.

The "outward man" is the whole human nature viewed as internally and centrally regenerated, as contrasted with the "outward man" (2 Cor 3 16; Rom 7 22; Eph 2 14; see Man, Outward). This phrase indicates the whole human nature conceived as affected from within—in the secret, inside, and true springs of activity—by the Holy Spirit of God. Such a change—regeneration—is not superficial, but a change in the inner central self; not a mere external reform, but an internal transformation. Grace operates not from the circumference toward the center, but from the center toward the circumference, of life. The product is a man renovated in his "inward parts," changed in the dynamic center of his heart.

The "new man" is an appellation yielded by the contrasted idea of the "old man" (Rom 6 6; Eph 4 22; Col 3 9; Eph 2 15; 4 24; Col 3 10). The "old" is "corrupt" and even evil "deeds;" the "new" possesses the "image of God" and is marked by "knowledge," "righteousness," and "holiness." There are two Gr. words for "new."

3. The New Man Man.—The former means new in the sense that the new-born child is a young thing; the latter means "new" in the sense of renovated, as when the house which has been rebuilt is called a new house. The converted man is a "new" (νεο-ανθρώπος) in the sense that he is a "babe in Christ," and a "new" (καινο-ανθρώπος) in the sense that his moral nature is renovated and built over again.

In the NT there are 5 different vbs. used to express the action put forth in making the "old man" a "new man." In Eph 2 10 and 4 24, he is said to be "created" (κτίσθαι), a renovated creature. Out of the "old man" the Holy Spirit has created the "new man." (2) In 1 Pet 1 23 and 2 2, he is to be "renewed again" (αναγεννηθῆ), and the product is a "new" (καινός). (3) In Eph 5 25 and elsewhere, he is said to be "quickened" (συνίστασθαι), and the product is represented as a creature which has been made "alive from the dead" (Rom 6 13).

The "old man," being "dead in trespasses and sins" (Eph 2 1), is brought forth from his sin-grave by a spiritual resurrection. (4) In Eph 4 22 he is represented as being made "young" (γεννηθῆ), and the product is a child of the Spirit at the commencement of his religious experience. The "old man," dating his history back to the fall in Eden, has become, through the Spirit, a young man in Christ Jesus. (5) In 2 Cor 5 17 and in Rom 12 2, he is said to be "renovated" (ανακαινισθῆ). The "old man" is renovated into the "new man." Sinful human nature is taken by the Spirit and morally renewed.

II. Theological Meaning.—The "new man" is the converted, regenerated man. The phrase has its significance for the great theological doctrine of regeneration as it expands into the broad work of sanctification. Is the inner dead? Regeneration is a new life. Is holiness no-existent in him? Regeneration is a new creation. Is he born in sin? Regeneration is a new birth. Is he determined by his fallen, depraved nature? Regeneration is a spiritual determination. Is he the subject of carnal appetites? Regeneration is a holy apprehensiveness. Is he thought of as the old sinful man? Regeneration is a new man. Is the sinful mind blinded? Regeneration is a new understanding. Is the heart stony? Regeneration is a heart of flesh. Is the conscience section of regeneration is no good conscience. Is the will impotent? Regeneration is a new impotency. The regenerated man is a man with a new governing disposition—a "new man," an "inward man," a "spiritual man."

(1) The "whole regenerate man"—is not a theological transubstantiation: a being whose substance has been supernaturally converted into some other sort of substance.

(2) He is not a metaphysical transmutation: a species of one kind which has been naturally evolved into a species of another kind.

(3) He is not a metaphysical reconstruction: a being with a new mental equipment.

(4) He is an evangelical conversion: an "old man" with a new regnant moral disposition, an "outward man" with a new inward fons et origo of moral life; a "natural man" with a new renovated spiritual heart. See Man, Natural; Regeneration.
2. The Varying Interpretations

There is the view, favored by "moderns," that the passage contains no genuine prediction (Paul "could not know" the future), but represents a speculation of the apostle's own, based on Dei 22:8 (ii. 9. 10). But for such a reading, all the text of this passage is full of meaning. In any case, the position of the teaching (see ANTICHRIST; BELLIA; of Boussert, Der Antichrist, 93 ff., etc.). This view will not satisfy those who believe in the reality of Paul's apocalyptic vision (6). Some connect the description with Caligula, Nero, or others of the Roman emperors. Caligula, indeed, ordered supplication to be made to himself as the supreme god and wished to set up his statue in the temple of Jesus (Suet. Cal. 33, Jos. Ant., XV. 8, viii). But this was long before Paul's visit to Thessalonica, and the acts of such a madman could not furnish the basis of a prediction so elaborate and important as the present (cf. Lünemann and Boussert). (7) The favorite Protestant interpretation (a) refers the prediction to the papacy, in whom, it is contended, many of the blasphemous features of Paul's representation are unmistakably realized. The "temple of God" is here understood to be the church; the power of the Rom emperors (b) the "man of sin" not an individual, but the personification of an institution or system. It is difficult, however, to resist the impression that the apostle regards "the mystery of lawlessness" as a mystery in an individual—a personal Antichrist—and in any case the interpretation oversteeps everything that can be conceived of as even nominally Christian. (4) There remains the view held by most of the Fathers, and in recent times with modified approbation, that "the man of sin" is the Antichrist (5). This passage is an individual in whom, previous to the advent, sin will embody itself in its most lawless and God-denying form. The attempts to identify this individual with historical characters may be set aside; but the idea is not thereby invalidated. The difficulty is that the apostle evidently conceives of the manifestation of the "man of sin" as taking place, certainly not immediately, but at no very remote period—not 2,000 years later—and as connected directly with the final advent of Christ, and the judgment. It is often asked, with apparent reference to the "millennial period," either before or after. It seems safest, in view of the difficulties of the passage, to confine one's self to the general idea it embodies, leaving details to be interpreted by the actual fulfilment. There is much support in Scripture—not least in Christ's own teaching (cf Mt 13 30; 24 11-14; Lk 18 8)—for the belief that before the final triumph of Christ's kingdom there will be a period of great tribulation, of faith, of apostasy, of culmination of both good and evil ("Let both grow together until the harvest," Mt 13 30), with the seeming triumph for the time of the evil over the good. There will be a crisis-time—a sharp, severe, and probably by a decisive interposition of the Son of Man ("the manifestation of his coming," RVm "Gr presence"); in what precise form may be left undetermined. Civil law and government—the existing bulwark against anarchy (in Paul's time represented by the Roman power)—will be swept away by the rising tide of evil, and lawlessness will prevail. It may be that impiety will concentrate itself, as the passage says, in some individual head; or this may belong to the form of the apostle's apprehension in a case when "gods" and "his image" are really full revealed: an apprehension to be enlarged by subsequent revelations (see REVELATION, BOOK OF, or left to be corrected by the actual course of God's providence. The kernel of the prediction is not, more that at the OT period depended on its literal realization in every detail. Neither does the final manifestation of evil exclude partial and anticipatory realizations, embodying many of the features of the prophecy. See Thessalonians, Second Epistle to, III. JAMES OPP.

MANAEN, man'a-en (Mavrov, Manaen, Gr form of Heb name "Menahem," meaning "consoler"); Manaeon is mentioned, with Barnabas, Saul and others, in Acts 13:1, as one of the "prophets and teachers" in the recently founded church at Antioch, at the time when Barnabas and Saul were "separated" by Divine call for their missionary service. He is further described as "the foster brother [sotrophos] of Herod the tetrarch" (i.e. HEROD ANTIPAS, q.v.). He was a handsome, influential one, whether he himself ranked among the "prophets," or perhaps only among the "teachers." JAMES OPP.

MANAHATH, man'a-hath (אָמָהְתָּה, mānahāth; Manahath, Machanath): (1) A place to which certain Benjamites, victims, apparently, of intra-tribal jealousy, were carried captive (1 Ch 8 6). Of this town the Manahathites were probably natives. It is possibly denoted by Manacho which LXX adds to the list of towns in Josh 18:7-11. This place is named along with Bether (Bittir). The name seems to be preserved in that of Matlah, a large village not far from Bittir, S.W. of Jerus. The change of l to n, and vice versa, is not uncommon. The same place may be intended by Menahah (Jgs 20 13.)
MANAHATHITES, man-a’-hath-its (מָנָחָתים, mānāḥāths). Mentioned in 1 Esdr 8:30. See Manahathites. MANASSEAS, man-a’sé-as (מָנַסֶּהַּס, Ma’asheas). One of those who had married "strange wives" (1 Esd 9:31). See Manasseh. MANASEH: One of the sons of Joseph by Asenath, daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On. See Manasseh. MANASSEH: Of the children of Machir, son of Manasseh. See Manassseh. MANASSEH, man-as’eh (מַנָּשֶׁה, mānasheh), "causing to forget"; of Gen 41:51; Mal 1:6; Man 3:1. (1) The firstborn of Joseph by Asenath, daughter of Poti-pherah, priest of On. (2) The son of Manasseh, half of which, with Gad and Reuben, occupied the E of Jordan (Nu 27:1, etc.). See next article. (3) The "Manasseh" of Jgs 18:30-31 AV is really an intentional mistake for the name Moses. A small name (n) has been inserted over and between the first and second Heb letters in the word Moses, thus נֵעֶשׁ for נִעְשׁ. The reason for this is that the individual in question is mentioned as priest of a brazen image at Dan. His proper name was Moses. It was felt to be a disgrace that such a one bearing that honored name should keep it intact. The insertion of the n with the disgrace and, moreover, gives to the person a name already too familiar with idolatrous practices; for King Manasseh's 55 years of sovereignty were thus disgraced. (4) King of Judah. See separate article. (5) Son of Pahath-Moab (g.v.), who had married a foreign wife (Exr 10:30). Manasseh in 1 Esd 9:31. (6) The Manasses of 1 Esd 9:33. A layman of the family of Hashum, who put away his foreign wife (Exr 10:31). In RV of Mt 1:10 and Rev 7:6 the spelling "Manassah" is given for AV "Manasseh." The latter is the spelling of the husband of Judith (Jdt 8:27; 10:3; 16:32-22.24.29); of a person named in the last words of Tobit and otherwise unknown (Tob 14:10), and also the name given to a remarkable prayer probably referred to in 2 Ch 33:18, which Manasseh (4) is said to have uttered at the end of his long, unsatisfactory life. See Manasseh, Praxias. 1a. Manasseh in Jgs 12:4, RV reads "Manassah" for AV "Manasses." HENRY WALLACE MANASES: Following the Bib. account of Manasseh (patriarch, tribe, and territory) we find that he was the elder of Joseph's two sons by Asenath, the daughter of Joseph Poti-pherah, priest of On (Gen 41:51). The birth of a son marked the climax of Joseph's happiness after the long bitterness of his experience. In the joy of the moment, the dark years were forgotten; therefore he called the name of the firstborn Manasseh ("causing to forget"), for, said he, God hath made me to forget all my toil. When Jacob was near his end, Joseph brought his two sons to his father who blessed them. Himself the younger son who had received the blessing of the firstborn, Jacob preferred Ephraim, the second son of Joseph, to M.'s elder brother, thus indicating the relative positions of their descendants (Gen 48). Before Joseph died he saw the children of Machir the son of M. (50:23). Machir was born to M. by his concubine, an Amorite (1 Ch 7:14). Whether he married Maacah before leaving for Egypt is not said. She was the sister of Huppim and Shuppim. Of M.'s personal life no details are recorded in Scripture. According to Jewish tradition he became steward of his father's house, and acted as interpreter between Joseph and his brethren. At the beginning of the desert march the number of M.'s men of war is given at 32,200 (Nu 1:34 a). At the 26 census they had increased to 52,700 (26:34). Their position in the tribes in the wilderness was with the tribe of Benjamin, by the standard of the tribes in the portion in the plains of Moab, M. is named before Ephraim, and appears as much the stronger tribe (26:28 f). The main military exploits in the conquest of Eastern Palestine were performed by Manassites, Machir, son of M., conquered the Amorites and Gilgal (32:30). Jair, the son of M., took all the region of Gilead containing three scores of cities; he called by his own name, "Havwoth-jair" (32:41; Dt 3:14 f). Nobah captured Kenath and the villages thereof (Nu 32:42; Josh 17:15). Land for half the tribe was thus provided, their territory stretching from the northern boundary of Gad to an undetermined frontier in the N., marching with Geshur and Maacah on the W., and with the desert on the E. The warriors of this half-tribe passed over with those of Reuben and Gad before the host of Israel, and took their share in the conquest of Western Palestine (Josh 22). They helped to raise the great altar in the Jordan valley, which so nearly led to disastrous consequences (22:10 f). Golan, the city of refuge, lay within their territory. The possession of Ephraim and Manassah W. of the Jordan appears to have been undivided at first (Josh 17:16 f). The portion which ultimately fell to M. marched with Ephraim on the S., with Asher and Issachar on the N., running out to the sea on the W., and falling into the Jordan valley on the E. (17:7 f). The long dwindling slopes to westward and the flat reaches of the plain included much excellent soil. Within the territory of Issachar and Asher, Beth-shan, Iblees, Don, Edor, Taanach and Megiddo, with their villages, were assigned to M. Perhaps the men of the West lacked the energy and enterprise of their eastern brethren. They failed, in any case, to expel the Cannanites from these cities, and for long this great chain of fortresses seemed to mock the strength of Israel (Josh 17:11 f). Ten cities W. of the Jordan, in the portion of M., were given to the Levites, and 13 in the eastern portion (Josh 21:5-6). M. took part in the two glorious conflicts with the host of Sisera (Jgs 5:14). Two famous judges, Gideon and Jephthah, belonged to this tribe. The men of the half-tribe E. of Jordan were noted for skill and valor as warriors (1 Ch 5:18.23 f). Some men of
M. had joined David before the battle of Gilboa (1 Ch 12:19). Others, all mighty men of valor, and captains in the host, fell to him on the way to Ziklag, and helped him against the band of the Philistines (vs 20 f.).

3. Its Place in Later History

18,000 men, expressed by name, came to David at Hebron to make him king (ver 31); while those who came from the E. numbered, along with the men of Reuben and Judah, 120,000. David organized the eastern tribes under 2,700 overseers for every matter pertaining to God and for the affairs of the king (26:32). The rulers of M. were, in the W., son of Pedahiah, and in the E., Ido, son of Zebadiah (28:1). They designedly came to Jerusalem to celebrate the Passover (2 Ch 30:11). Although not cleansed according to the purification of the sanctuary, they ate the Passover. Pardon was sure to them by the king, because they set their hearts to seek God (vs 18 f.).

Of the eastern half-tribe it is said that they went a-whoring after the gods of the land, and in consequence they were overwhelmed and expatriated by Palti and Tiglath-Pileser, kings of Assyria (1 Ch 5:25 f.). Reference to the idolatries of the western half-tribe are also found in 2 Ch 31:1; 34:6.

There is a portion for M. in Ezekiel's ideal picture (48:4), and the tribe appears in the list in Rev (7:6).

The genealogies in Josh 17:1 f.; Nu 26:28–34; 1 Ch 2:21–23; 7:14–19 have fallen into confusion as they stand. As they are, they are mutually contradictory, and it is impossible to harmonize them.

The theories of certain modern scholars who reject the existence of these tribes are beset with difficulties: e.g. the name is derived from the Aram. massa, “to injure a tendon of the leg.” M., the Pel part, would thus be the manner of a supernatural being of whom the infliction of such an injury was characteristic. It is not clear which of the wretches at the Jabbok suffered the injury. As Jacob is said to have prevailed with gods and men, the suggestion that it was his antagonist who was lamed. “It would appear therefore that in the original story the epithet Masseah was a fitting title of Jacob himself, which might be borne by the king, as in the case of Gad” (E.B., n.y., par. 4).

It is assumed that the mention of Machir in Jgs 5:14 designates the Masseatis at that time on the W. of the Jordan. The raids by members of the tribe on Eastern Pal must therefore have taken place long after the days of Moses, which reasoning is precarious. After the mention of Reuben (vs 15:16), Ephish (ver 17) may refer to the same if this warlike tribe were passed over (Guthrie). Machir, then probably the strongest clan, stands for the whole tribe, and may be supposed to indicate particularly the noted soldiers of the eastern half.

4. The relation of the genealogies, the “difficult name” Zelahpahad must be got rid of. Among the suggestions made is one by Dr. Cheyne, which first supposes the existence of a name Salash, and then makes Zelahpahad a corruption of this.

The genealogies certainly present difficulties, but otherwise the narrative is incoherent and self-inconsistent without resort to such questionable expedients as those referred to above.

MANASSEH: A king of Judah, son and successor of Hezekiah; reigned 55 years (2 K 21:1; 2 Ch 33:1), from c 685 onward. He was one of the few royal names not compounded with the name of Jeh (his son Amon's was the only other if, as an Assyrian inscription gives it, the full name of Ahaz was Jehoahaz or Ahaziah); but it was no heathen name like Amon, but identical with that of the elder son of Joseph born within the 38 years, years of trembling faith and tender hope (of Isa 38:15 f.), his name may perhaps memorialize the father's sacred feelings; the name of his mother Hophrahiah too was used long afterward as the symbol of the happy union of the land with its loyal sons (Isa 60:4). All this, however, was long forgotten in the memory of Manasseh's apostate career.

I. Sources of His Life.—The history (2 K 21:1–18) refers for the "rest of his acts" to "the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah," but the body of the account, instead of reading like state annals, is almost entirely a censure of his idolatrous reign in the spirit of the prophets and of the Deuteronomic strain of literature. The "rest of his acts" among the acts of the kings of Israel," and mentions his prayer (a prayer ascribed to him in the Apocrypha) and "the words of the seers that spoke to him in the name of Jeh." This history of Ch mentions his captive journey to Babylon (2 Ch 33:10–13), also his building operations in Jerusalem and his resumption of Jeh-worship (vs 14–17), which the earlier source lacks. From these sources, which it is not the business of this article either to verify or question, the estimate of his reign is to be deduced.

II. Character of His Reign.—During his reign, Assyria, principally under Esar-haddon and Assur-bani-pal, was at the height of its power; and his long reign was the peaceful and uneventful life of a willing vassal, contented to count as tributary king in an illustrious world-empire, hospitable to all its religious and cultural ideas, and ready to take his part in its wars and other enterprises. The two mentions of his name in Assyrian inscriptions (see G. A. Smith, Jerusalem, II, 182) both represent him in this tributary light.

His journey to Babylon mentioned in 2 Ch 33:11 need not have been the penalty of rebellion; more likely it was such an enforced act of allegiance as was perhaps imposed on all provincial rulers who had incurred or would avert suspicion of disloyalty. Nor was his fortification of Jerusalem after his return less necessary against domestic than foreign aggression; the more so, indeed, as in so long and undisturbed a reign his capital, which was now practically synonymous with his realm (Esar-haddon calls him "king of the city of Judah"), became increasingly an important center of wealth and commercial prosperity. Of the specific events of his reign, however, other than religious, less is known than of almost any other.

That the wholesale idolatry by which his reign is mainly distinguished was of a reactionary and indeed conservative nature may be 2. Reaction—understood alike from what it sought—idolatry to maintain and from what it had to react against. On the one side was the tremendous wave of ritual and mechanical heathen cultus which, proceeding from the world-centers of culture and civilization (of Isa 2 6–8), was drawing all the tributary lands, Judah with the rest, into its almost irresistible sweep. M., it would seem, met this not as the temper of an amateur, as had his grandfather Ahas, but in the temper of a fanatic. Everything old and new that came to his purview was of momentous religious value—except only the simple and austere demands of prophetic insight. He restored the debasing cultus of the aboriginal Nature-worship, with which his father had suppressed, thus making Judah revert to the sterile Baal-cultus of Ahab; but his blind devotion in the black arts so prevalent in all the surrounding nations, imported the elaborate worship of the heathen's addicted gods, with its temple-courts with its numerous rites and altars; even went to the horrible extremes of human sacrifice, making an institution of what Ahaz had tried as a desperate expedient. All this, which to the matured prophetic sense was heading wickedness, was the mark of a desperately earnest soul, seeking blindly in this wholesale way to propitiate the mysterious Divine powers, his nation’s God among them, who seemed so to have the world’s affairs in their inscrutable control. On the other side, there confronted him the prophetic voice of a religion which decried all insincere ritual (‘wickedness and worship,’ Isa 1:3), made straight demands on heart and conscience, and had already vividly in the faith which had wrought the deliverance of 701. It was the flight of the decadent formal against the uprisings spiritual; and, as in all such struggles, it would grasp at any expedient save the one plain duty of yielding the heart to repentance and trust.

3. Persecution through the permeating influence of literature and education the “remnant” was becoming a power to be reckoned with. It is in the nature of things that such an innovating movement must encounter persecution; the significant thing is that already there was so much of it. Persecution as truly the offspring of fear as of fanaticism. M.’s persecution of the prophets and their adherents (tradition has it that the aged Isaiah was one of his victims) was from their point of view an enormity of wickedness. Too much a movement to be quite so simple; it looks also like the anti-pathy of an inveterate formal order to a vital movement that it cannot understand. The vested interests of almost universal heathenism must needs die hard, and “much innocent blood was shed of people guilty only in the upper hand.” To say this of M.’s murderous zeal is not to justify it; it is merely to concede its sadly mistaken sincerity. It may well have seemed to him that a nation’s piety was at stake, as if a world’s religious culture were in peril.

The Chronicler, less austere in tone than the earlier historian, preserves for us the story that, like Saul of Tarsus after him, M. got his eyes open to the truer meaning of things; that after his humiliation and mind repentance in Bab. he “knew that Jeh he was God” (2 Ch 33:10–13).

He had the opportunity to see a despotic idolatry, its evils with its splendors, in its own home; a first-fruit of the thing that the Heb exiles were afterward to return, accordingly, he removed the altars that had encroached upon the sacred precincts of the temple, and restored the ritual of the Jeh-service, without, however, removing the high places. It would seem to have been merely the concession of Jeh’s right to a specific cultus of His own, with perhaps a mitigation of the more offensive extremes of exotic worship, while the toleration of the various fashionable forms remained much as before. But this in itself was something, was much; it gave Jeh His chance, so to say, among rivals; and the growing spiritual fiber of the heart of Israel could be trusted to do the rest. It helps us also the better to understand the situation when, only two years after M.’s death, Josiah came to the throne, and to understand why he and his people were so ready to accept the religious sanity of the Deuteronomic law. He did not succeed, after all, in committing his nation to the wholesale away of heathenism. M.’s reactionary reign was indeed not without its good fruits; the crisis of religious syncretism and externalism was met and passed.

MANASSES, ma-nas'æs (Mânas's, Manasses, B, Manasseh):

1. One who had married a “strange wife” (1 Esd 9:33) = “Manasses” of Exr 10:33.

2. The wealthy husband of Judith; died of sunstroke when employed at the barley harvest (Jth 8:21; 10:3; 16:22 ff).

3. A person mentioned in Tob 14:10, who “gave alms, and escaped the snare of death.” It must be admitted that Manasses here is an awkward reading and apparently interrupts the sense, which would run more smoothly if Manasses were omitted and Achiacharus read. There is great variety of text in this verse. B (followed by Fritzsche, Libri apoc. Test Gr., 1871) reads en to poid√α√γα me elémmousèn exèthilen, where Manasses is omitted and Achiacharus is understood as the subject. Itala and Syr go a step further and read Achiacharus as subject. But B (followed by Swete, AV and RV) reads Manasses, which must be the correct reading on the principle of being the most difficult. Explanations have been offered (1) that Manasses is simply the Heb name for Achiacharus, it not being uncommon for a Jew to have a Gr and a Heb name; (2) that on reading ‘Aadw, Amôn, Manasses was inserted for Achiacharus according to 2 Ch 33:22 ff; (3) that M. here is an incorrect reading for Nasbas (Tob 11:18), identified by Grotius with Achiacharus as impossible at present to arrive at a satisfactory explanation (Fuller, Speaker’s Comm.). There is as great uncertainty as to the person who conspired against Manasses: ‘Aadw, Amôn, in A, followed by AV and RV, who is some one identified with the Hanan of Est, and Achiacharus with Mordecai; A’dor, Addin, in B, followed by Swete; Itala Nadab; Syr Ahab (Acab).

4. A king of Judah (Mt 1:10 AV, Gr form, RV “Manassiah”), whose prayer forms one of the apocryphal books. See MANASSES, Bible.

5. The elder son of Joseph (Rev 7:6, AV Gr form, RV “Manasseh”).

LITERATURE

The Prayer of Manasses purports to be, and may in reality be, the prayer of that king mentioned in 2 Ch 33:13.18 f.

In Cod. A it is called simply “A Prayer of Manasses,” in the London Polyglot “A Prayer of Manasses, King of the Jews.” In the Vulg. title in the Vulg. is “A Prayer of Manasses, King of Judah, when He was Held Captive in Babylon.” In Baxter’s Apoc, Gr and Eng, this Prayer appears at the end with the heading, “A Prayer of Manasses, son of Ezechias” (= Hezekiah).

The Greek church is the only one which has consistently reckoned this Prayer as a part of its Bible. Up to the time of the Council of Trent (1546–63 AD), it formed a part of the Greek, Vulg, and Syriac Bibles. But by that council it was relegated with 3 and 4 (1 and 2) Esd to the appendix (which included uncanonical scriptures), lest they should become wholly lost, since they are occasionally cited by the Fathers and are found in printed copies. Yet it is wholly absent from the Vulg of Sixtus V, though it is in the Appendix of the Vulg of Clement VIII. Its position varies in MSS, VSS and printed editions of the LXX. It is most frequently found among the odes or canticles following the Psalter in cod. A. (the Zurich Palat.) and in Ludolf’s Ethiopic Palat. In Swete’s LXX the Ps Sol followed by

The odes ("]šāi, ʿōdai"), of which Pr Man is the 8th, appear as an Appendix after 4 Mace in vol III. It was placed after 2 Ch in the original Vulg, but in the 14th cent. Vesp, it was shifted before 2 Ch and corrected by 3 and 4 (1 and 2) Esd in the apocryphal Appendix. It is found in all MSS of the Armenian Bible, where, as in Svet's LXX, it is one of many odes. Though not included in Coverdale's Bible or the Geneva Vts, it was inserted (at the Apostolic or Luther's tr.) in Mathew's Bible and in the Bishops' Bible, whence it passed into our EV.

That the author was an Alexandrian Jew is made possible by the (Gr) language he employs and by the sentiments he expresses. See also 2 K 21.

The Prayer as described first, the text as presented by 3 and 4 Esd, is as follows. With 3 and 4 Esd the prayers are divided into two. The bulk of the scholars (Fritzsche, Reuss, Schürer, Ryssel, etc) agree that this Prayer was composed in Gr. The Gr recension is written in a free flowing and somewhat rhetorical style, and can be read like an "original work, not like a tr. Though there are some Hebraisms, they are not numerous or striking than usually meet us in Hellenistic Gr. It is of importance also to note, although Jewish tradition adds largely to the legends about Manasses, it has never supplied a Heb VS of the Prayer (see Text and Versions, VIII). On the other hand, Ewald (Hist. Isr., 1, 186, IV, 217, n. 5, Gen. ed. 1840, 3, 366), Furst (Gesch. d. bibl. Lkt., 3, 399), Bude (ZA W, 1892, 39 f), Ball (Speaker's Apoc) and others argue for a Heb original, perhaps existing in the source named of 2 Ch 33 18 f (see Ryssel in Kautzsch, Die Apoc des AT, 187).

Have we here the authentic prayer of Manasses offered under the circumstances described in 2 Ch 33 ? Ewald and the other scholars named (see for-

8. Text and the variations of T. It is omitted from the bulk of ancient MSS and edd of the LXX, as also from modern editions (Tischendorf, etc). Nestle (Septuaginta Studien, 1899, 3) holds that the Gr text of Codd. A, T, etc., has been taken from the Apoc Const or from the Didaskalia. The common view is that it was extracted by the latter from the LXX.

LITERATURE. — The outstanding literature has been cited in the foregoing art. Reference may be made to Howorth ("Some Unconventional Views on the Text of the Bible," PSB 4, XXXI, 89 ff); he argues that the narrative concerning Manasseh, including the Prayer for forgiveness, is a late addition to the Apoc Const, represents a portion of the true LXX of 2 Ch 33).

T. WITTON DAVIES

MANASSITES, ma-nas'stis ("wśp"), m'nashšāth; ḫ Manāsərēh, ho Manaso): Members of the tribe of Manasseh (Dt 4 43; Jgs 12 4 AV; 2 K 10 33).

MAN-CHILD, m'an-child (ARV; "man-child," ERP; not in AV; יי' פ"פ לודג, maseh b'k'r): The expression is used with the meaning of "male," but it is found only in the canonized text (Ad Est 13 8—14 19), and also to the prayer of Azarias (Three 1 2—22) and the song of the Three Young Men (Three 38—45) appended to the canonical Book of Dan.

MAN-CHILD, m'an-child (ARV; "man-child," ERP; not in AV; יי' פ"פ לודג, maseh b'k'r): The expression is used with the meaning of "male," but it is found only in the canonized text (Ad Est 13 8—14 19), and also to the prayer of Azarias (Three 1 2—22) and the song of the Three Young Men (Three 38—45) appended to the canonical Book of Dan.
MANDRAKES, man’drak’s (Μανδράκες, μανδράκος; χρυσάριον, māndrakojs; Gen 30 14 f.; Cant 7 13); the marginal reading "love apples" is due to the supposed connection of δεδήλωμ, διδήλωμ, "love"); Mandrakes are the fruit of the Mandragora officinarum, a member of the Solanaceae or potato order, closely allied to the Atropa belladonna. It is a common plant all over Pal, flourishing particularly in the spring and ripening about the time of the wheat harvest (Gen 30 14). The plant has a rosette of handsome dark leaves, dark purple flowers and orange, tomato-like fruit. The root is long and branched; to pull it up is still considered unlucky (cf Jos, Ez 17, vi, 3). The fruit is called in Arab. baid el-jinn, the "eggs of the jinn"; they have a narcotic smell and sweetish taste, but are too poisonous to be used as food. They are still used in folklore medicine in Pal. The plant was well known as an amulet by the ancients (Cant 7 13).

MANEH, man'e, or MINA, mî'nâ (מֹנֶה, māneh; מַעַד, mā'ād, "pound" [EV]): A weight containing 50 shekels, according to Heb usage, but which varied according to the standard adopted. Estimated on the Phoen. or commercial, standard, it was equal to 11,200 grains, or about 2 lbs. troy, or about 1.6 lbs. avoirdupois. This is probably the weight intended in 1 K 10 17; Ezr 2 69 and Neh 7 71 f. (see Weights and Measures). When used in a monetary sense, the māneh of silver was about the weight of £6 10s. or $34; the gold māneh was equal to about £102 10s. or $510. H. PORTER

MANES, mā'nēs (Μάνης, Mānēs): One of those who put away their "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 21). It represents the two names Maseeiah and Elijah of the || Ezr 10 21. The real equivalent is probably Maseeiah, Elijah being dropped. RV and AV give Harim of Ezr 10 21 as identical—apparently incorrectly, for the words "and the sons of Harim" (Ezr 10 21) are simply omitted. AV bundlers strangely here in reading Eanes after a misprint Ḥarim, Bētēús (for Mānēs, Mānēs) in the Aldine edition.

MANGER, mā'n-register (φανέρος, φάνερος): Properly the place in a stall or stable where the food of cattle is placed (in the OT "crib" [Job 39 9; Prov 14 4; Isa 1 3]); thus also, apparently, in the narrative of the nativity in Lk 2 7; 12. In LXX, the Gr word, representing different Heb Hebrews. The extended meaning of "stall" (2 Ch 32 28; Hab 3 17); thus also in Lk 13 15, where RV has "manger." Old tradition says that Jesus was born in a cave in the neighborhood of Bethlehem; even so, a place for food for cattle may have been cut in the side of the rock. JAMES ORK

MANI, māni (Mānī, Manī): Head of a family (1 Esd 30 38) = "Bani" in Ezr 10 29, the form which appears in 1 Esd 5 12.

MANIFEST, man'i-fest, MANIFESTATION, man'i-fes-tā'shun (φανέρω, phanerō, φανέρως, phanérōs): "To manifest" is generally the tr of phanēro, "to make apparent" (Mic 1 2; Rom 8 7; Rom 11 7; 1 Cor 13 12; 1 Cor 13 13; 1 Cor 13 10, etc.) to make manifest (phanēroō) (Rom 11 7; Rom 16 25; of emphanēs, to make fully manifest) (He 11 11). of emphārēs, "fully manifest" (Rom 10 20); of δέλω, "evident," tr of manēst, "manifest" (1 Cor 15 27; RV "evident"); of ἀπὸδηλοῖς, "very evident" (2 Tim 3 9; RV "evident"); of proδηλοῖς, "evident beforehand" (1 Tim 5 25; RV "evident"); of apophānēs, in "not manifest" (He 4 2; "There is no creature that is not manifest in his sight"); "manifest," occurs once in the OT as the tr of bārār, "to clear," "to purify" (Ecc 3 18, RV "prove"); of phanēroō (2 Mac 3 28, RV "manifestly").

Manifestation is the tr of apokolābōs, "uncovering" (Rom 8 19, the "manifestation of the sons of God," RV "revealing"); of phanēroōsis, "manifestation" (1 Cor 12 7; 2 Cor 4 2).

RV has "manifest" for "shew" (Jn 7 4); "was manifested" for "appeared" (Mk 16 12 14); was manifested for the, for "shewed himself to his" (Jn 21 14); "be made manifest" for "be seen" (Mk 4 22; Jn 17 6; Rev 3 18); "became manifest" for "was made known" (Acts 7 13); "gave him to be made manifest for "shewed him openly" (Acts 10 40); "He who was manifested for God was manifested" (1 Tim 3 16) in "The word of God, in place of a word sufficiently ancient evidence. Some ancient authorities read whol); "is not yet manifest, for not yet appear" (1 Jn 3 2); by the manifestation for "with the brightness" (2 Thes 2 8). he manifested for "appear Pet (Col 1 24) for he shall be manifested for "when he shall appear" (1 Jn 2 28; 3 2), etc.

MANIFESTLY, man'i-fes-tli (Μανιφέστως, marē, "in personal presence"): Has the meaning of "by direct vision; as in 1 Cor 13 12, "face to face," stating positively (Nu 12 6) what the next clause states negatively, viz., "not in dark speech." "Apparently" of AV is ambiguous.

MANIFOLD, man'i-fōld (Μανιφεστός, rabbi; τοιχός, pokilos): "Manifold," which occurs only a few times, is in the OT the tr of rabh, "man," "abundant" (Neh 9 19 27; Am 5 12, where it is equivalent to "many"); and of rabbāb, "to multiply," "to increase" (Ps 104 24, "O Jehovah, how manifold are thy works"); pokilos, properly, "many colored," "spotted," "variegated," tr of manifold (1 Pet 5 8, "manifold temptations"); 49, "manifold grace," suggests variety, diverseness; polypokilos has this meaning more intensely (Eph 3 10, "the manifold wisdom of God"). With this may be compared a fine passage in Wisd 7 22, where it is said that in Wisdom there is "an understanding spirit, holy, one only [RV alone in kind], in "Our sole-MANKIND, man-kind'; In Lev 18 23; 20 13, the term is applied to meath, as distinguished from women; in Job 12 10, to the human race; in Jas 3 7, to the human nature.

MANLIUS, man-li-us, TITUS. See MANLIUS, TITUS.

MANNA, man'a (תָּנָן, mānā; μάννα, mānna): The Heb mānā is probably derived, as Ebers suggests, from the Egyptian mann, 'food.' In Ex 15 18, we have a suggested source of the name, "they said one to another, What is it?" i.e. manu, which also means, "It is manna" (see n). This substance is described as occurring in flakes or small round grains, lit. 'honey', 'starch'; it fell with the dew (Nu 11 9) and appeared when the dew left the ground (Ex 16 14); 'It was like coriander seed, white; and the taste of it was like waxed food made with honey' (ver 31).

In Nu 11 8, its taste is described as "the taste of fresh oil," i.e. "cakes baked with oil." "And the children of Israel did eat the manna forty years, until they came . . . unto the borders of the land of Canaan" (Ex 16 35). It ceased the day after they ate the produce of the land, unleavened cakes and parched grain, in the plains of Jericho (Josh 5 10-12). Although an important article of diet, it was by no means the sole one as seems implied in Nu 21 5; there are plenty of references (e.g. Ex 17 3; 24 5; 34 3; Lev 6 23-31; 9 4; 10 12; 24 5; Nu 7 13,19, etc.). The food was eaten every morning, "every man according to his eating: and when the sun waxed hot, it melted" (Ex 16 21); a portion of the previous day's gathering bred worms and stank if kept (ver 20); on the 6th day a double amount was gathered, the Sabbath portion being miraculously preserved (vs 22-27). A pot—a golden one (He 9 4)—with an omer of manna was "laid up before Jeh" in the tabernacle (Ex 16 33). Manna is referred to in Neh 9 20, "It is described poetically as "bread of heaven" and "bread of the mighty" (Ps 78 24 f); as "bread of heaven" (Ps 105 40); and as "angels' bread" (2 Esd 1 19; Wisd 16 20).

In Jn 6 31-63, Our Lord frequently refers to "the manna" or "bread from heaven" as typical of Himself. St. Paul (1 Cor 10 3) refers to it as "spiritual food," and in Rev 2 17 we read, "To him that overcometh, to him will I give of the hidden manna."

Manna, as might be expected, figures largely in rabbinical lit. It was, it is said, adapted to the taste of each individual who could by wishing taste in the manna anything he desired (cf. Wisd 15 21). This manna is referred to as "the future manna" (cf Rev 2 17), for which purpose it is ground in a mill situated in the third heaven (Hag 12; Tan. Bahehal 22).

No substance is known which in any degree satisfies all the requirements. The Sumerians, however, by rolling them into long, honey-like substance which in a later period is called an insect, Giuseppe manna (also). It collects upon the twigs and falls to the ground. The Arabs who gather for sell to pilgrims the man-as-rena, man's food, it is a is probable, it is a remarkable substance which grows in the Arabian and other deserts upon the limestone. The older masses become detached and are rolled about by the wind. When swept together by sudden rain storms in the rainy season they may collect in large heaps. This lichen has been used by the Arabs in time of need for making bread. It is a quite remarkable form of nourishment in the desert, esp when eaten with the sweet manna from the trees.

MANNER, man'er, MANNERS, man'ers (יוֹוָי, dādbhār, יְדוֹד, derekh, לֶמֶשׁ, mishpāh; θέος, θέσις, οὖρα, hóttō): 'Manner' (probably 1. As Used from manus, "the hand," mode of in the OT. But in the New Testament, or the Bible in general (1) to way, custom, habit, etc., (2) to kind or sort. There are some special senses, however, and archaic usages. It is frequently the Heb. dādbhār, 'speaking,' 'word,' 'thing' (Gen 18 25, "That be far from thee to do after this manner" i.e. in this way); 32 19, "On this manner shall ye speak unto Esau" (in this way); 39 19, "After this manner [in this way] did thy servant to me!" Ex 22 9, "every manner of trespass" (Ps 15 3; 25 3; Le 12 5; 19 19; Deut 15 2; 1 S 17 27 30 bisd; also of derekh, "way" (Gen 19 31, "after the manner of all the earth" way); 1 S 21 5 AV ["the bread is in a manner common"; "manner" here might be taken as equivalent to "way" or "measure," but the passage is a difficult one and the text uncertain, RV "manner," and in the text makes the reference to be to the journey, not to the bread, but in m it has "common [bread]; Isa 10 23, "after the manner of Egypt" [after the way or fate of Egypt]; so also Am 4 10; 8 14) food beyond." The food was eaten every morning, "every man according to his eating; and when the sun waxed ship); of mišāpās, "judgment," "ordinance," hence also "manner" or "custom" (Gen 40 13; Ex 21 9; 2 K 1 7, "what manner of man" [sort or kind]; 17 26 AV; 1 C 24 19; Ezk 11 12, "after the manners [RV "ordinances"] of the nations"); tōrāh, "instruction," "law," is also tr. "manner" (2 K 17 19, "he judged the manner [in law] of man, O Lord God"); RV "and this [too] after the manner of men, O Lord Jeh," m "and is this the law of man, O Lord Jeh"?). Other words are: "broad," "path," "custom" (Gen 16 11); dōhēr, "leading," "pasturer," (cf. "sheep-walk," "sheep-fold"); Isa 5 17, "Then shall the lambs feed after their manner," RV "as in their pasture" (in Mic 2 12, the same word is tr. AV "fold"); RV "pasture"); dōmāth, "likeliness" (Ezk 23 15); dān, "law," "sentence" (Est 2 12); hukkar, "statute," "custom" (Lev 20 23) in AV. In Nu 5 13 "with the manner" is supplied to "taken" (in adultery). "Manner" here is an old law-French phrase, "a thief taken with the mainour"—that is, with the thing stolen upon him in his hand (in his hand) (Blackstone, Commentaries, etc); RV "in the very act" (cf. Lev 4, 4, "in the very act"); gam, "also" is tr. (1 S 19 24) "in like manner," RV "also.

In Apoc, 2 Mac 4 13 AV, we have "increase of heathenish manners," RV an extreme of Gr Wisd 10 0, to 13 20.

2. As Used Gentiles, RV "the Gr rites"; in 2 in the Apoc- Esd 9 19, AV and RV, "manners" rypha appears in the sense of "morals"; cf 1 Cor 15 35, RV "Evil companionships corrupt good morals."

In the NT various words and phrases are rendered by "manner;" we have ethos, "custom," "usage," "manner" (Jn 19 40; Acts 16 1, 3. As Used RV "custom"); katā to eōthēs (Lk 4 In the NT 16, RV "as his custom was"); tēpōs, a "turning," "manner," "way" (Dude ver 7); hōn tēpōn, "in which manner" (Acts 11 11); hōutēs, "thus," "so," "accordingly," is "after this manner," "in like manner" (Mt 6 9; Mk 13 29 AV); in Acts 15 23, "after this manner" stands in A. for "by their hands," RV "thus;" pōs (Acts 20 18), "after what manner;" agōgē, "course of life" (2 Tim 3 10, RV "conduct"); bōsēs, "mode of life" (Acts 26 4); in 1 Cor 33 33, we have manners in the moral sense, "Evil communications corrupt good manners," RV "Evil companionships corrupt good morals."

Acts 13 18 is interesting because of diversities of rendering: AV has "suffered they were the manner in the wilderness," m "etropophōrēsen, perhaps for etropophōrēsen, bore, or fed them as a nurse breast or fedeth her child, Dt 1 31 (2 Mac 7 27) according to LXX, and so Chrysostom;" ERV text, same as AV, m "Many ancient authorities read 'bear he them as a nursing father in the wilderness.' See Dt 1 31; "ARV (text) "as a nursing-father bare he them in the wilderness," m "Many ancient authorities read 'Suffered he them in the wilderness.' SeeDt 9 7." The Gr words differ only by a single letter, and authorities are pretty equally divided.

Among other changes RV has frequently "ordinance," for Jn 19 40; He 10 25, etc. "manner of" is introduced (1 S 4 8, etc), "manner of" and "manner omitted (Lk 8 20, etc); "manner of" and "manner of being for where is the house" (Isa 66 1); "manner of" for "conversation" (Gal 1 31, Eph 4 22); after φωνηία in "manner of" or "manner" for" a man (Rom 3 2; 1 Cor 9 8); "how to inquire concerning these things" (Acts 25 20) for "conversations"; "in an unpril manner," ARV, for "unworthily" (1 Cor 11 27); "who for" "what manner of man," (Mk 4 41; Lk 8 25; "when they knew not what manner of spirit ye are of," is omitted, with the m "Some ancient authorities added said, Ye know not what manner of spirit ye are of," W. L. WALKER

MANOH, ma-nōh (מָנוֹה, manōh, "cane"); A man of Zorah and of the family of the Danites. M. was the father of Samson, and his life-story is but imperfectly told in the history of the conception, birth and early life of his son. No children had been born to M. and his wife, and the latter was considered barren (Jgs 15 2). Finally it was revealed to her by an angel of the Lord that she would conceive and bear a child. She was cautioned against strong drink and "unclean" food, for her child was to be born and reared a Nazirite to the end that he might save Israel out of the hands of the Philistines (13 3-5). That M. was a devoted man seems certain in view of the fact that, upon hearing of the angel's visit, he offered a prayer for the angel's return, in order that he and his wife might be instructed as to the proper care of the child to be born (13 8). The request was granted and the angel repeated the visit and the instructions (13 9-13). M. with true hospitality would have the guest remain and partake of food. The angel refused, but commanded a sacrifice unto Jeh. When M. had prepared this sacrifice, he set it upon the altar, the angel ascended in the flame from the altar and appeared no more (13 15-21). The child was born according to the promise and was named Samson. M. and his wife appear twice in the narrative of Samson's early life (14 3, 6). M. attestingly accompanied him to sue for the hand of a Philistine woman of Timnah in marriage, and again when they went with him to Timnah for the wedding.

MANSERVANT, man'sēr-vant (מֶנשֶׁר vant, 'ebēl dāheth): A male slave; usually coupled with manservant (Gen 12 16; Ex 20 10; (1 S 8 16; Job 31 13; Lk 12 45). See SERVANT; SLAVE.

MANSION, man'shun (מֶנְשֶׁה, monê, "abode"): In Jn 14 2, the word is used in the pl.: "In my Father's house are many mansions." RV "hedging places." The ideas conveyed are those of abundance of room, and permanence of habitation, in the heavenly world.

MANSLEY, man'slē (מַנְסֶל, manēlē̂, μνηστήρ from ἡμέρα, 'ēmērā, "remembrance") from (אַבֵּד, abēd, 'ēbed, "servant") from 'ēbed, "to serve," is a modern term, employed to distinguish unpremeditated killing from coldblooded murder, but formerly (2 Esd 1 26) it was used in a more general sense. See MURDER.

MANTELET, man’tel-et, man’t’l-et, mant’let (Nah 2 5). See Sizes, 4, (d).

MANTLE, man’tl: Used 5 t of Elijah’s mantle (R’BS, ‘addereth, 1 K 19 18.19; 2 K 2 8.13.14), which was probably of hair. Found in pl. once (Isa 3 22), where it (ma’ōṣaphūkh) is an upper wide tunic with sleeves (lēḇōthâ). See DRESS; Ken- chief.

MANUSCRIPTS, man’h-scripts: In the broadest sense manuscripts include all handwritten records as distinguished from printed records. In a narrower sense they are handwritten codices, rolls and folded documents, as distinguished from printed books on the one hand and inscriptions, or engraved documents, on the other. More loosely, but commonly, the term is used as synonym of the codex.

The Heb and Gr manuscripts of the OT and NT, respectively, form the primary sources for establishing the text or true original words of the respective authors. The subordinate sources, VSS and quotations have also their text problem, and manuscripts of the VSS and of the church Fathers, and other ancient writers who refer to Bib. matters, play a part both in establishing the true words of the VSS or the writer that the Heb and Gr manuscripts play in establishing the original of Scripture. For discussion of the textual aspects, see arts. on TEXT and MSS of the NT, TEXT of the OT, on Versions, and esp. the Septuagint. For the material, writing instruments, form of manuscripts, etc. see Book; and esp. the lit. under Writing.

MAOCH, mā’ok (םואך, ma’ākh, “oppressed,” “prised”): The same as Maschach (1 K 2 39). The father of that Achish, king of Gath, with whom David and his 600 sojourned under fear of Saul’s treachery (1 S 27 2).

MAON, mā’on, MAONITES, mā’on-ites, mā’ōnites (םואה, mā’ōn; B, Maap, Maor, Ma:v, Mada, A, Ma’an, Maon): (1) A town in the mountain of Judah named along with Carmel and Zipph (JoSh 15 55). It appears again as the home of Nabat, the great flockmaster (1 S 26 2). In the genealogical list of 1 Ch 2, Maon stands as the “son” of Shammai and the “father” of Beth-sure (vs 44-45). This evidently means that Shammai was the founder of Maon. About a mile S. of el-Karmil, the ancient Carmel, lies Tel Ma’an. This may be confidently identified with Maon, the radicals of the names being the same. It suits the requirements of the narratives in other respects, being near to Carmel, while the surrounding wilderness is still used as the wide pasture land for multitudinous flocks. In this district, the wilderness of Maon, David was hiding when his whereabouts was betrayed to Saul by the men of Ziph (1 S 25 24), and only a timely raid by the Philis delivered him out of that monarch’s hands (vs 27 ff).

(2) (Ma’daw, Mad’in): Maon is named along with the Edomians and Amalek as having at some time been mentioned, oppressed Israel (Jgs 10 12). The LXX “Midian” has been accepted by some scholars as restoring the original text, since, otherwise, the Midianites remain unmentioned. But the Moabites are evidently identical with the Meunim of 1 Ch 4 41 (RV), the pastoral people destroyed by Hesekiah. In 2 Ch 20 1 AV, instead of “other beside the ‘ammonites’” we must read “some of the Meunim,” as associated with the Ammonites in the battle with Jehoshaphat. Against them also Uzziah was helped of God (2 Ch 26 7). They are included among the inhabitants of Mt. Seir (20 10 23), so that an Edomite tribe is intended. It is natural to connect them with Mā’ān, a place on the great pilgrim road, and now a station on the Damascus-Hejaz Railway, to the S.E. of Petra. It undoubtedly represents an ancient stronghold.

The Moabites appear in the lists of those who returned from exile (Ezr 2 50, AV “Mehunim,” RV “Meunim”; Neh 7 52, “Meunim”). These may possibly be the descendants of prisoners taken in the wars of Jehoshaphat and Uzziah, to whom menial tasks may have been appointed in the temple services.

MAR, mār: “To mar” means “to destroy,” “to disfigure,” “to damage.” Job 30 13 “My mar my path” (RVm “my way,” AV “my path”); Neh 2 2, “and destroyed their vine” (AV “and marred their vine”); cf Lev 19 27; 2 K 3 19; Isa 52 14; Jer 13 9.

MARA, mā’ra, mā’ra (מָרוֹא, mārō’ā, “bitter”): The term which Naomi applies to herself on her return from Moab to her native country (Ruth 1 20). Changed beyond recognition, she creates astonishment among her former acquaintances, who ask, “Is this Naomi?” She replies, “Call me not Naomi” (i.e. “pleasant” or “the wife”), but “call me Mara” (i.e. “bitter”). In the light of her bitter experience, and her present pitiable plight, the old name has become peculiarly inappropriate.

MARAH, mā’ra, mā’ra (מַרָה, mārā’ā, “bitter”): The first camp of the Israelites after the passage of the Red Sea (Ex 15 23; Nu 33 8 f). The name is derived from the bitterness of the brackish water. Moses cast a tree into the waters which were thus made sweet (Ex 15 23). See Wanderings of Israel.

MARALAH, mar’a-lâ (מָרָלָה, mar’a-lâh; B, Maragelâ, Marageldâ, A, Mâsalâ, Mariłâ): A place on the western border of Zebulun (Josh 19 11). Pesh render Râmah tâ’lê, ‘height of the fox.’ It is not identified.

MARANATHA, mar-a-nâ’tha (מָרָנָתָה, mar’a-nâ’thâ), mar-an-â’thâ (from Aram. words, מָרָנָתָה, máranâ’thâ, “our Lord cometh, or will come”; according to some, “has come”; to others, “Come!” an invitation for his speedy reappearance (cf Rev 22 20); παρανάθη, maranathâ, or μαραναθή, maro aðhâ): Used in connection with ἄνθεμα, ἀνάθεμα, “accursed” (1 Cor 16 22), but has no necessary connection therewith. It was used by early Christians to add solemn emphasis to previous statement, injunction or adjuration, and seems to have become a sort of watchword; possibly forming part of an early liturgy.

MARBLE, mārb’l (מרבל, shaqish, שׁוֹאֵשׁ, shō’āsh, יָשָׁב, yâshôb, “abhdhē shapish, “stones of marble” [1 Ch 29 2]; מַרְבָּלְלָה, mārlâlî; r’hashb hâshh w’-shôar w’-shâřârêth, “a pavement of red, and white, and yellow, and black marble,” or, according to m, “a pavement of porphyry, and white marble, and alabaster, and stone of blue color” [Est 1 6]; מַרְבָּלֶה, mārlêh shēš, "pillars of marble" [Est 1 6; Cant 5 15];
cf. א printf, AVM "silk" or RV "fine linen" [Gen 41 42; Ex 25 4, etc]; מִדְנָנִים, מִדְנָנִים, "illies" [Cant 2 16, etc], apparently from a root signifying "white; מְדוֹנָנִים, מְדְרָנִים, "marble" [Rev 10 12]). Marble is properly crystalline limestone, usually pure white or veined with black, the former being in demand for statuary, while the latter is used in architecture, esp. for floors and pillars. True marble is not found in Pal, but is obtained from Greece or Italy. Much of the stone described as marble is non-crystalline limestone capable of being smoothed and polished. White or yellow stone of this character is abundant in Pal. Non-crystalline rocks of other colors are also sometimes called marble. In the passage from Est cited above (cf m), it is a question whether the reference is to marble and other stones or to marble of different colors. In 1 Ch 29 2, "marble stones" are mentioned among the materials brought together by David for the building of the temple. In Est 1 6, pillars and a pavement of marble are features of the palace of Ahasuerus. In Cant 5 15, the various parts of the body of the "beloved" are likened to gold, beryl, ivory, sapphire, and marble. In Rev 18 12, marble occurs in the list of the materials of Babylon. All these references imply a costly stone, and therefore probably one imported from other countries, and make it likely that true crystalline marble is meant.

MARCUS, mâr'kus. See Mark, John.

MARDOCEUS, mär-dô-kè'us (Maprochos, Mardochaios): (1) One of the Jewish leaders who accompanied Zerubbabel on the return from Babylon to Judah (1 Esd 5 8, where it stands for "Mordecai") on Ezra 2 51. (2) Another form of Mordecai, the uncle of Esther (Est Ad 10 4; 11 2.22; 12 1.4.f; 16 13).

MARE, mär [L. marius, gūshā, "steed," AV "company of horses"]; LXX ἡ ἡποπός, ἡ ἐκπός, "mammy" [Cant 1 9]; [2] the white, or, blac, kā, ἁραμμακχίν, "brood of the stud," AV and RV "young dromedaries" [Est 8 10]; cf. Arab. ὰυτός, ramakah, "mare"). The word "mare" does not occur in EV, but in Cant 1 9 we find gūshā, the fem. of gūsh, "horse," and in Est 8 10, ἁραμμακχίν is by some tel "sons of mares." See Camel; Horse.

MARESHAH, mär-es'ha (mişׂרֶשָׁה, mārēshāh; B, Μορσόρα, Bathpard, A, Maproá, Marseu): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named with Keilah and Aziz (Josh 15 44). It occupied such a position that Rehoboam thought well to fortify it for the protection of Judah (2 Ch 11 8). In the valley of Zephathah at Maresiah, Ass overwhelmed Zerah the Ethiopian and his army, pursuing them as far as Gezer (2 Ch 14 9 f). From M. came Elizer the prophet who denounced disaster upon the commercial commerce of Jeshobahat and Ahaziah (20 37). The place is mentioned in Mic (1 15). M. was plundered and burned by Judas Maccabaes (Ant, XII, viii, 6; 1 Mace 5 66 RvM). Hither Gorgias escaped, having been rescued from the hands of Dositheus by a Thracian horseman (2 Mace 12 35). It was taken by John Hyrcanus, who allowed the inhabitants to remain on condition that they adopt circumcision and submit to the Jewish law. This they did; and later avenged an injustice done to M. by the Samaritans. It is then described as a colony of Jews (Ant, XIII, ix, 1; x 2). The city was treated with favor by Pompey (XIV, iv, 4). When the Parthians invaded Judaea in support of Antigonus they demolished M. (xii, 9).

According to Onom, M. was 2 Rom miles from Eleutheropolis (Belt Jobrēt). Until recently it was thought that Khurbet Mīr'ash, where the old name lingers, not far S.W. of Belt Jobrēt, represented the ancient city. The work of Dr. Bliss, however ("Excavations in Pal., PEF), shows that it must be located at Tell Sandahannah, about a mile S. of Belt Jobrēt. A series of remarkable tombs was discovered here. From 1 Ch 2 42 we may perhaps gather that Hebron was colonized by the men of M.

MARMOTH, mär-mōth, mär'-mōth: An ancestor of Eedars (Ezra, 2 Esd 1 2), identical with Marmathio (Est 7 3). In Est 2 8-22, it appears also as "Mememoth" [AV "Mermoth"]).

MARINER, mär-i-nër. See Ships and Boats, II, (2), (3), III 2.

MARISA, mär'i-sa (Maproá, Marias): The Gr form of Maresiah (q.v.) in 2 Mace 12 35.

MARISH, mär'i-sh (םיִשָּׁה; gēbēh; Íb, hēbōs): An old form of "marsh," found in AV, EV, and LXX 47 11 (ARV "marsh"). Some (not all) edd of the AV Apoc have retained this same spelling in 1 Mace 9 42 45 (RV "marsh").

MARK, mark: In the AV this word is used 224 as a noun and 26 as a predicate. In the former case it is represented by 5 Heb and 3 Gr words; in the latter by 11 Heb and 2 Gr words. As a noun it is purely a physical term, gaining almost a technical significance from the "mark" put upon Cain (Gen 4 15 15), the stigma of Christ in Paul's body (Gal 6 17); the "mark of the beast" (Rev 16 2).

As a vb. It is almost exclusively a mental process: e.g. to be attentive, understand: יָשָׁה, יָשָׁה (Job 18 2 22, AV), rightly rendered in RV יָשָׁה. "Mark ye well her bullwarks" (Ps 48 13 15), i.e. turn the mind to, notice, regard; יָשָׁה, יָשָׁה, i.e. observe, keep in view; so Ps 37 37, "Mark the perfect man"; of Job 29 15 AV. This becomes a unique expression in 1 x 1 12, where El, noticing the movement of Hannoah's lilies in prayer, is said to have "marked her mouth." Jesus "marked" how invited guests chose out (Luke 7), etc. (especially, i.e. observed) the chief seats (Lk 14 17); so כָּשׁוֹר, כָּשׁוֹר (Rom 16 17; Phil 3 17), "Mark them," i.e. look at, signifying keen mental attention, i.e. scrutinize, observe carefully. The only exceptions to this mental significance of the vb. are two vs in the OT: Isa 44 13, "He marketh it out with a pencil" ("red ochre, AV "line"), and with the compasses, where the vb. is כָּשׁוֹר, כָּשׁוֹר, "to delineate," "mark out": Jer 2 22, "Thine iniquity is marked (בָּשָׁה, בָּשָׁה) kathām, "cut (engraved) before me," signifying the deep and irrevocable nature of sin. It may also be rendered "written," in indelible hieroglyphics.

As a noun the term "mark" may signify, according to its various Heb and Gr originals, a sign, a "target" an object of assault, a brand or stigma cut or burnt in the flesh, a goal or end in view, a stamp or impressed or engraved sign.

(1) יָשָׁה, 3rd, a sign: Gen 4 15 AV, "The Lord set a mark upon Cain" (AV "appointed a sign"). It is impossible to tell the nature of this sign.
Delitzsch thinks that the rabbins were mistaken in regarding it as a mark upon Cain’s body. He considers it rather “a certain sign which protected him” (Wencke, 6), the consequence of his life being necessary for the preservation of the race. It was thus, as the Heb indicates, the token of a covenant which God made with Cain that his life would be spared.

(2) ἁρπάζω, _mal'Črē_; “an aim,” hence a mark to shoot at. Jonathan arranged to shoot arrows at a mark, for a sign to David (1 S 20 20); Job felt himself to be a target for the Divine arrows, i.e. for the Divinely decreed sufferings which wounded him and which he was called to endure (Job 15 12); so Jeremiah, “He hath set me as a mark for the arrow!” (Lam 3 12); closely akin to this is ἄρχω, _miphqal_, an object of attack (Job 7 20), where Job in bitterness of soul feels that God has become his enemy, and says, Why hast thou made me the mark of hostile attack?; “set me as a mark for the arrow.”

(3) Ψ, _taw_, “mark” (Ezk 9 4 6). In Ezekiel’s vision of the destruction of the wicked, the mark to be set upon the forehead of the righteous, at Jeh’s command, was, as in the case of the blood sprinkled on the door-posts of the Israelites (Ex 12 22 23), for His purposes. As the Servants of God (Rev 7 3 2)—the elect—were kept from harm by being sealed with the seal of the living God in their foreheads, so the man clothed in linen, with a writer’s inkhorn by his side, was told to mark upon their foreheads those whom God would save from judgment by His sheltering grace. _Taw_ also appears (Job 31 35) for the attesting mark made to a document (RV “signature,” in “mark”).

The letter Ψ in the Phoen alphabet and on the coins of 133 B.C. in Macabeæ, had the form of a cross (τ). In the form of an oriental synod it was used as a signature by bishops who, like Cyprian, were “biΙΣης,” “His mark set as a sign of ownership.” It was burnt upon the necks or thighs of horses and camels. It may have been the “mark” set upon the forehead of the righteous in Ezekiel’s vision.

(4) ἄρχω, _ba'ăkā_, “a stigma” cut or burnt. The Israelites were forbidden (Lev 19 25) to follow the custom of other oriental and heathen nations in cutting, disfiguring or branding their bodies.

The specific prohibition “not to print any marks upon any man’s body” (AV) who seems evidently a custom of tattooing common among savage tribes, and in vogue among both men and women of the lower orders in Asia, Africa, and many other lands. It was intended to cultivate reverence for and a sense of the sacredness of the human body, its divine creation, known in the Christian era as the temple of the Holy Spirit. See also CUTTINGS in the FLESH.

(5) σχίζω, _skopōs_, something seen or observed in the distance, hence a goal. The Christian life seemed to St. Paul, in the intensity of his spiritual ardor, like the stadium or race-course of the Greeks, with runners stretching every nerve to reach the goal and win the prize. “I press on toward the goal [AV “mark”] unto the prize” (Phil 3 14). That goal is the ideal of life revealed in Christ, the prize, the attainment and possession of that life.

In Wisd 5 21 “they fly to the mark” is from ἄρχω, _eisatōchō_, “with true aim” (so RV).

(6) στίχωμα, _stigma_, “a mark pricked or branded upon the body.” Slaves and soldiers, in ancient times, were stamped or branded with the name of their master. Paul considered and called himself the bondslave of Jesus Christ. The traces of his sufferings, scourging, stonings, persecution, wounds, were from time to time permanent scars on his body (cf 2 Cor 11 23 27). Thus, he bore the “stigma” of Jesus, marks branded in his very flesh as proofs of his devotion to his Master (Gal 6 17).

This passage gives no ground for the Romanist superstition that the very scars or wounds reproduced in Paul’s hands and feet and side. It is also “alien to the lofty self-consciousness” of these words to find in them a contrast in Paul’s thought to the scar of circumcision.

(7) χαραγμός, _chāragma_, “a stamp” or “imprinted mark.” “The mark of the beast” (peculiar to Rev) was the badge of the followers of Antichrist, stamped on the forehead or right hand (Rev 13 16; cf Ezk 9 4 6). It was symbolic of character and was thus not a literal or physical mark, but the impress of paganism on the moral and spiritual life. It was the sign or token of apostasy. As a spiritual state or condition it subjected men to the wrath of God and to eternal torment (Rev 14 9 11); to noisome disease (16 2); to the lake of fire (19 20). Those who received not the mark, having faithfully endured persecution and martyrdom, were given part in the first resurrection and lived and reigned with Christ a thousand years (Rev 20 4). The “beast” symbolizes the anti-Christian empires, particularly Rome under Nero, who sought to devour and destroy the early Christians.

1. Name sumed we do not know. Perhaps the and Family sistor participle in Acts 12 25 may be intended to intimate that it dated from the time when, in company with Barnabas and Saul, he turned to service in the great gentile city of Antioch. Possibly it was the badge of Roman citizenship, as in the case of Paul. The standing of the family would be quite consistent with such a suppression.

His mother’s name was Mary (Acts 12 12). The home is spoken of as hers. The father was probably dead. The description of the house (with its large room and porch) and the mention of the Or slave, suggest a family of wealth. They were probably among the many zealous Jews who, having become rich in the great world outside, retired to Jerusalem, the center of their nation and faith.

M. was “cousin” to Barnabas of Cyprus (Col 4 10), who also seems evidently to have been a man who perhaps a man who, having found a large place in the esteem of the brethren, as is shown by his being chosen to accompany Barnabas and Saul to Antioch, a little later. The home was a resort for Christians, so that M. had every opportunity to become acquainted with other leaders such as James and John, and James the brother of the Lord. It was perhaps from the latter James that he learned the incident of Mk 3 21 which Peter would be less likely to mention.

His kinship with Barnabas, knowledge of Christian history and teaching, and proved efficiency account for his being taken along on the first missionary journey as ‘minister’ (συμμαχός, _hupērētēs_) to Barnabas and Saul (Acts 13 5). Just what the term implies is not clear. Chase (HDB) conjectures the meaning to be that he had been _hupērētēs_, “attendant” or _hazzān_ in the synagogue (cf Lk 4 20), and was known as such an official. Wright (I, February, 1924) suggests that he was a teacher in newly founded churches a teaching service similar to that of the synagogue _hazzān_. Hackett thought that the esv of this verse implies that he was to be doing the same kind of work as Barnabas and Saul and so to be their “helper” in preaching and teaching. The more common view has been (Meyer, Swete, et al.) that he was to perform “personal service not evangelical,” “official service but not of the same kind”—to be a sort of business agent. The view that he was to be a teacher, a catechist for converts, seems to fit best all the facts. Why did he turn back from the work (Acts 13 13)? Not because of homesickness, or anxiety for his mother’s safety, or home duties, or the desire to return to the scene of his first work, but rather because he objected to the offer of salvation to the Gentiles on condition of faith alone. There are hints that M’s family, like Paul’s, were Hebrews of the Hebrews, and it is not without significance that in both verses (Acts 13 5 13) he is given only his Heb name. The terms of Paul’s remonstrance are very strong (Acts 15 38), and we know that nothing stirred Paul’s feelings more deeply than this very question. The explanation of it all may be found in what happened at Paphos when the Rom Sergius Paulus became a believer. At that time Paul (the change of name is here noted by Lk) stepped to the front, and henceforth, with the exception of 15 12.25, when naturally enough the old order was maintained, Luke speaks of Paul and Barnabas, not Barnabas and Saul. We must remember that, at that time, Paul stood almost alone in his conviction. Barnabas, even later, had misgivings (Gal 2 13). Perhaps, too, M. was less able than Barnabas himself to see the latter take second place.

We hear nothing further of M. until the beginning of the second missionary journey 2 years later, when Paul’s unwillingness to take him with them led to the rupture between Paul and Barnabas and to the mission of Barnabas and M. to Cyprus (Acts 15 39). He is here called Mark, and in that quiet way Luke may indicate his own conviction that Mark’s mind had changed on the great question, as indeed his willingness to accompany Paul might suggest. He had learned from the discussions in the council at Jerusalem and from subsequent events at Antioch.

About 11 years elapse before we hear of him again (Col 4 10; Philem 24). He is at Rome, where Paul, whose breach is healed. He is now one of the faithful few among Jewish Christians who stand by Paul. He is Paul’s honored “fellowworker” and a great “comfort” to him.

The Colossian passage may imply a contemplated visit by M. to Asia Minor. It may be that it was carried out, that he met Peter and went with him to Babylon. In 1 Pet 5 13 the apostle sends M’s greetings along with that of the church in Babylon. Thence M. returns to Asia Minor, and in 2 Tim 4 11 Paul asks Timothy, who is at Ephesus, to come to him, pick up M. by the way, and bring him along. In that connection Paul pays M. his final tribute; he is “useful for ministering” (διακονεῖν διὰ συνελεύσεως), εὐθύτατος εἰς διακονίαν, so useful that his ministry is a joy to the very God’s heart.

The most important and reliable tradition is that he was the close attendant and interpreter of Peter, and has given us in the Gospel that bears his name an account of Peter’s teaching. For that reason the NT facts furnish a basis, and much in the NT history leave plenty of room. An examination of the tradition will be found in Mark, this Gospel according to Lk. Other traditions add but little that is reliable. It is said that M. had been a priest, and that after becoming a Christian he amputated a finger to disqualify himself for that service. His name κολοβώταιος, κολοβωτης, which, however, is sometimes otherwise ex-plained. He is represented as having remained in Cyprus until after the death of Barnabas (who was living in 57 AD according to I Cor 9 5) and then to have gone to Alexandria, founded there, became his first bishop and there died (or was martyred) in the 9th year of Nero (62-63). They add that in 815 AD Venetian soldiers stole his remains from Alexandria and placed them under the church of St. Mark at Venice.

LITERATURE

I. Our Second Gospel.—The order of the Gospels in our NT is probably due to the early conviction that this was the order in which the Gospels were written. It was not, however, the invariable order. The question of order only arose when the roll was superseded by the codex, our present book-form. That change was going on in the 3rd cent. Origen found codices with the order Jn, Mt, Mk, Lk—due probably to the desire to give the apostles the leading place. That and the one common today may be considered the two main groupings—the one in the order of dignity, the other in that of time. The former is Egypt and Lat.; the latter has the authority of most Gr MSS, Catalogues and Fathers, and is supported by the Old Syr.

Within these, however, there are variations. The former is varied thus: Jn, Mt, Lk, Mk, and Mt, Jn, Mk, Lk, and Mt, Jn, Lk, Mk; the latter to Mt, Mk, Jn, Lk. Mk is never first; when it follows Lk, the time consideration has given place to that of length.

II. Contents and General Characteristics.—The Gospel begins with the ministry of John the Baptist and ends with the announcement of the Resurrection, if the last 12 vs be not included. These postsurrection appearances, the Commission, the Ascension, and a brief summary of apostolic activity. Thus its limits correspond closely with those indicated by Peter in Acts 10 37-43. Nothing is said of the early Judecan ministry. The Galilean ministry and Passion Week with the transition from the one to the other (in ch 10) practically make up the Gospel. Matter peculiar to Mk is found in 4 26-29 (the seed growing secretly); 3 21 (his kindred’s fear); 7 32-37 (the deaf and dumb man); 2 6 (the blind man); 12 33-37 (the householder and the exhortation to watch); 14 51 (the young man who escaped). But, in addition to this, there are many vivid word-touches with which the common material is lighted up, and in not a few of the common incidents Mk's account is very much fuller; e.g. 6 14–29 (death of John the Baptist); 7 1–23 (on eating with unwashed hands); 9 1–29 (on the demoniac) and the multiplication (the questioning scribe). There is enough of this material to show clearly that the author could not have been wholly dependent on the other evangelists. Hawkins reckons the whole amount of peculiar material at about fifty verses (Hor. Syn., 11).

In striking contrast to Matthew who, in 8 passages, calls attention to the fulfillment of prophecy by Jesus, Mark only once quotes the OT and that is in the preface of His Gospel. The Isa part of his composite quotation appears in all 4 Gospels; the Mal part in Mk only, though there is a refection of it in Jn 3 25. This fact alone might convey an erroneous impression of the attitude of the Gospel to the OT. Though himself only makes himself on this one twofold reference, yet he represents Jesus as doing so frequently. The difference is thus between him and Matthew is not great. He has 19 formal quotations as compared with 30 occurrences in Lk, 15 in Mt, 10 in Jn, where they are not found elsewhere. The total for the NT is 160, so that Mk has a fair proportion. When OT references and notes citations are considered the result is much the same. WH give Mt 100, Mk 58, Lk 86, Jn 21, Acts 10.

3. Quotations

The phrase, "Intro to the OT in Gr. 390" points out that in those quotations which are common to the LXX and LXX is usually followed: in others, the Heb more frequently. (A good illustration is where the Lk 1 is followed in the phrase, "in vain do they worship me"—a fair paraphrase of the Heb; but "teaching as their doctrine the precedent correct representation of this (comparing the Heb than his words for His works. The teachings grew as the Gospel to Mk 13 and 24 respectively. But in 7 1–23; 9 33–50; 10 5–31, 39–45 and 12 1–44 we have quite extensive sayings. If Jesus is a worker, He is even more a teacher. He works to prepare His words rather than His words for His works. The teachings grew naturally out of the occasion and the circumstances. He did and taught. Because He did what He did He could teach with effectiveness. Both works and words reveal Him.

There is a multitude of graphic details: Mk mentions actions and gestures of Jesus (7 33; 9 36; 10 16) and His looks of inquiry (6 32) in prayer (6 41; 7 34), of details approval (3 34), Jesus telling (to Judas esp. 10 23), anger (3 5), and in judgment (11 11). Jesus hungers (11 12), seeks rest in seclusion (6 31) and sleeps on the boat cushion (4 38); He pistes the multitude (6 34), wonders at men's unbelief (6 6), sighs over their sorrow and blindness (7 34; 8 12), grieves at their hardening (3 5), and rebukes in sadness the wrong thought of His mother and brothers, and in indignation the mistaken zeal and selfish ambitions of His disciples (8 33; 10 14). Mk represents His miracles of healing usually as instantaneous (1 31; 2 11 f.; 3 5), sometimes as gradual or difficult (1 26; 7 32–35; 9 26–28), and once as flatly impossible "because of their unbelief" (6 6). With confidence and vividness he tells the pomp of the people and the impression made on them by what Jesus said or did. They bring their sick along the streets and convert the market-place into a hospital (1 32), throng and jostle Him by the seaside (8 10), and carry as the astonishment of the multitude a note of authority (1 22) and power (2 12). Disciples are awed by His command over the sea (4 41), and disciples and others are surprised and alarmed at the strange look of dread as He walks ahead alone, going up to Jesus and the cross (10 39). Many other picturesque details are given, as in 1 13 (He was with the wild beasts); 2 4 (digging through the roof); 4 38 (lying asleep on the cushion); 5 4 (the description of the Gerasene demoniac); 6 39 (the companies, dressed in many colors and looking like flower beds on the green mountain side). Other details peculiar to Mk are: names (1 29; 3 6; 13; 16 21), numbers (6 13; 6 7), time (1 35; 2 11; 11 19; 16 2), and place (2 13; 3 9; 7 31; 12 41; 13 3; 16 58 and 16 39).

These strongly suggest the observation of an eyewitness as the final authority, and the geographical references suggest that even the writer understood the general features of the country, esp. of Jesus and His neighborhood. On the complete lists see Lindsay, St. Mark's Gospel, 26 f.)

Mark, Gospel
1988
The most important textual problem is that of 16 9–10, which Miller and Salmon believe it to be genuine. Miller supposes that up to that point Mk had held the view, contrary to Peter's words, that for some reason those then failed him and that vs 9–10 are drawn from his own store. The majority of scholars regard these verses as a later and possibly quite significant addition to the Synoptic Gospels, which was supplied later to the other accounts. It has been noted by Neusner in his commentary on the Synoptic Gospels that these verses are in accordance with the Aramaic text.

The style is very simple. The common conception is that the stater periods of the class of anacreontics, the style is not to be found in the Gospel of Matthew.

The original language was Greek, which is the language of the New Testament and the modern Greek Bible. The author of the Gospel of Matthew is thought to be one of the Twelve Apostles, possibly Thomas. Papias, an early Christian writer, records that Matthew was the author of the Gospel.

The external evidence for the authorship of the Gospel of Matthew is found in the works of the Fathers and the MSS. The most important patristic statements are the following:

- Tatian: In his Diatessaron, he states that the Gospel of Matthew was written in Aramaic and translated into Greek by Matthew himself.
- Origen: He states that the Gospel of Matthew was written in Aramaic and translated into Greek by Mary Magdalene, who was the first to translate it.
- Eusebius: He states that the Gospel of Matthew was written in Aramaic and translated into Greek by John the Baptist.

The evidence for the authorship of the Gospel of Matthew is scanty and inconclusive, and the identity of the author remains uncertain.

The narrative of the Gospel of Matthew is written in a style that is both simple and concise. It is divided into twelve sections, each of which contains a series of sayings or miracles of Jesus. The first section is the Sermon on the Mount, which is a collection of sayings on various topics, including love, forgiveness, and the doing of good works. The second section is the Feeding of the Five Thousand, in which Jesus feeds a large crowd with five loaves and two fish. The third section is the Transfiguration, in which Jesus is transfigured before his disciples. The fourth section is the Healing of the Paralytic, in which Jesus heals a paralytic who is brought to him by his friends. The fifth section is the Miracles of Jesus in Galilee, which include the Healing of the Paralyzed Man, the Feeding of the Five Thousand again, and the Healing of the Paralytic at the Pool of Bethesda. The sixth section is the Miracles of Jesus in Jerusalem, which include the Healing of the Paralytic on the Road to Emmaus, the Feeding of the Five Thousand a third time, and the Healing of the Paralytic at the Pool of Siloam. The seventh section is the Miracles of Jesus in Herod's Court, which include the Healing of the Paralytic in the Temple, the Feeding of the Five Thousand a fourth time, and the Healing of the Paralytic at the Pool of Siloam again. The eighth section is the Miracles of Jesus in Capernaum, which include the Healing of the Paralytic in the House of Simon, the Feeding of the Five Thousand a fifth time, and the Healing of the Paralytic at the Pool of Siloam a third time. The ninth section is the Miracles of Jesus in Judea, which include the Healing of the Paralytic in the House of Simon the Pharisee, the Feeding of the Five Thousand a sixth time, and the Healing of the Paralytic at the Pool of Siloam a fourth time. The tenth section is the Miracles of Jesus in Galilee, which include the Healing of the Paralytic in the House of Simon the Pharisee, the Feeding of the Five Thousand a seventh time, and the Healing of the Paralytic at the Pool of Siloam a fifth time. The eleventh section is the Miracles of Jesus in Jerusalem, which include the Healing of the Paralytic in the Temple, the Feeding of the Five Thousand an eighth time, and the Healing of the Paralytic at the Pool of Siloam a sixth time. The twelfth section is the Miracles of Jesus in Galilee, which include the Healing of the Paralytic in the House of Simon the Pharisee, the Feeding of the Five Thousand a ninth time, and the Healing of the Paralytic at the Pool of Siloam a seventh time.
apostles were clothed with the power of the Holy Spirit and fully furnished for the work of universal evangelization. 'I will send you to the ends of the earth preaching the gospel. Mark was sent to Rome, and he preached to them in their own tongue, in which language he also [had?] published a writing of the gospel, while Peter and Paul were still in Jerusalem, preaching in the church in Rome. But after the departure [Iēdēo, "departure"] from those, Mark, the disciple and interpreter [μαθητὴς, heterōndēil], of Peter, even he has delivered us to writing the things which were preached by Peter.

Clement of Alexandria—c. 200 AD—(Hypotyp. In Eus., H. E., 2: 31). The Gospel, to Mk was as follows: After Peter had publicly preached the word in Rome and declared the gospel by the spirit, Mark came and met the apostles, as one who had followed him for a long time and remembered whatever he had, to write down what he had spoken, and Mk, after curry-combing the whole, presented it to his betters.

When Peter became aware of it he neither eagerly hindered nor did he approve it.

Also [Eus., H. E., II, 15]: "So charmed were the Romans with that show in upon their minds from the apostle Mark, that he himself, with single hearing and the vivē voces of the proclamation of the truth, they urged with the utmost solicitation on Mark, whose Gospel is in circulation and, who was Peter's attendant, that he would leave them in writing a record of Peter's teaching as they had received it by word of mouth. They did not give over until they had prevailed, though they became the cause of the composition of the so-called Gospel according to Mk. It is said that when the apostle knew this, he was pleased with the ease of the men and authorized the writing to be read in the churches."

Tertullian—North Africa, c. 207 AD—(Adv. Marc., iv. 5). The speech of the author to the four Gospels, namely, by apostles and two by companions of apostles, 'not excluding that which was published by Mark, for it may be said to be the Mark of Peter, whose Interpreter Mark was.'

Origen—Alexandria and the East, c. 240 AD—("Comm. on Mk"), H. E., 21: 31). The second is that according to Mk who composed it, under the guidance of Peter (οἱ Πέτρος ἐπίσκοπος ἡμῶν, ἡ ἡδήν Πέτρος ἐπισκόπος ἐστιν τῶν ἡμῶν), and who therefore, he acknowledged the evangelist as his son.

Eusebius, c. A.D. 325, in his "Eusebius, Eusebius, (1) Epiphanius. The discourses of Peter concerning the doings of Jesus. "Mark indeed writes this, but Peter who so testifies about himself, for all that is in Mk are memoirs (or records) of the discourses of Mk.

Ephraim of Cyprus, c. 350 AD—(Haer., 41): "But immediately after Matthew, Mark, having become a disciple of the holy city of Rome, is entrusted with the putting forth of a gospel. Handing over his work, he left the city of the holy Peter into the country of the Egyptians."

Jerome—East and West, c. 350 AD—(De vir. illust., vi. 30). The Gospel of Mark, according to the request of the brethren in Rome, wrote a brief Gospel in accordance with what he had heard Peter narrating. When Peter heard it he approved it and authorized it to be read in the churches.

Also Eus.: "Accordingly he had Titus as interpreter just as the blessed Peter had Mark as his Gospel was composed, Peter narrating and Mark writing."

Preface to the "Comm. on Mt": "The second is Mark, interpreter of the apostle Peter, and first bishop of the Alexandria church; who did not himself came the Lord Jesus, but accurately, rather than in order, narrated those of His deeds, which he had heard his teacher preaching."

To these should be added the Muratorian Fragment—c. 170 AD—which gives a list of the NT books with a brief summary of their contents. As to the account of Mt and most of that of Mk are lost, only these words remain concerning the 5:25, "quibus tamen interfuit, et adhuc non posuit," (see below).

These names represent the churches of the 2d, 3d and 4th cents., and practically every quarter of the Rom world. Quite clearly the common opinion was that Mark had written a Gospel and in it had given us mainly the teaching of Peter. Therefore Gospel is the one referred to in these statements there can be no reasonable doubt. Our four were certainly the four of Irenaeus and Tatian; and Salmon (Intro) has shown that the same four must have been accepted by Justin, Papias and their contemporaries, whether orthodox or Gnostic. Justin's reference to the surname "Boanerges" supports this so far as Mark is concerned, for in the Gospel of Mk alone is that fact mentioned (3:17).

A second point is equally clear—that the Gospel of Mk is substantially Peter's. Mark is called disciple, interpreter of Peter. Origen expressly quotes "Marcus, my son" (1 Pet 5: 13 AV) in this connection. "Disciple" is self-explanatory. "Interpreter" is its equivalent, not simply a traveling companion. "Interpreter" is less clear. One view equates it with "disciple," because Mar, and either Peter's Aram. discourses into Gr for the Hellenistic Christians in Jerus. (Adeney, et al.), or Peter's Gr discourses into Lat for the Christians in Rome (Swete, et al.). The other view—that of the patristics and most moderns (e.g. Zahn, Salmon)—is that it means "interpreter" simply in the sense that Mark put in writing what Peter had taught. The contention of Chase (HDB, III, 247) that this was a purely metaphorical use has little weight because it may be so used here. The conflict in the testimony as to date and place will be considered below (VII).

There is no clear declaration that Mark himself was a disciple of Jesus or an eyewitness of what he records. Indeed the statement of Papias seems to affirm the contrary. However, that statement may mean simply that he was not a personal disciple of Jesus, not that he had never seen Him at all.

The Muratorian Fragment is not clear. Its broken sentences have been much discussed but not well understood. Zahn completes it thus: "[all] quibus tamen interfuit, of its put."

... And understands it to mean that 'at some incidents [in the life of Jesus], however, he was present and so put them down.' Chase (HDB) and others regard "quibus tamen" as a Latin idiom, and believe the meaning to be that Mark, who had probably just been spoken of, was, as Peter, "was present at some of his discourses and so recorded them." Chase feels that the phrase following respecting Luke, also, a common name, so rich in con. ... compels the belief that Mark like Luke had not seen the Lord. But Paul, not Mark, may be there in mind, and further, this interpretation rather belittles Mark's association with Peter.

The patristic testimony may be regarded as summarized in the title of the work in our earliest MSS, viz. σάραπας Μάκσος, κατὰ Μάρκον. This phrase must refer to the author, not his source of information, for then it would necessarily have been σάραπας Μέρτρον, κατὰ Πέτρον. This is important as throwing light on the judgment of antiquity as to the authorship of the Gospel which the MSS all entitle σάραπας Μάθαιον, κατὰ Μάθαιον.

The internal evidence offers much to confirm the tradition and practically nothing to the contrary. That Peter is back of it is congruous with such facts as the Evidence following:

(1) The many vivid details referred to above (III. 6) must have come from an eyewitness. The frequent use of κἀκεῖνος, ἐπίθετον, in Mk and Mt, where Lk uses καὶ ἔπεισε, works in the same direction.

(2) Certain awkward expressions in lists of names can best be explained as due to his having altered and added in ἐπίθετον, e.g. 1:29, where Peter may have said, "We went home, the names and John accompanying us," in 1:36 (contrasted with Lk's impersonal description): Mk 3:16; 13:3.

(3) Two passages (9:6 and 11:21) describe Peter's own thoughts; others mention incidents which Peter would be most likely to mention; e.g. 14:37 and vs 66-67 (esp. imp. ἐπίθετον, ἤπειρον) in Acts 10:15.

(4) In 3:7 the order of names suits Peter's Galilean standpoint rather than that of Mark in Jerus.-Gallic, Judea, Jerus., Perea, Tyre, Sidon. The very artlessness of these hints is the best kind of evidence. The touch with one who saw with his own eyes and speaks out of his own consciousness.

(5) Generally Mark, like Matthew, writes from the standpoint of the Twelve more frequently than Luke; and Mark, more frequently than Matthew, places the center of the three most honored by Jesus. Of Mk 5:27 with Mt 9:28, where Mt makes no reference to the three; the unusual order of the names in Lk's corresponding passage (8:51) suggests that James was his ultimate source. Mt Mk 14 is clearly from the three, Lk may be, but Mt's is not. The contrast in this respect between the common synoptic matrix and Mk Lk 18:14 lends weight to this consideration.

The scope of the Gospel which corresponds to that outlined in Peter's address to Cornelius (Acts 10:37-43).

(7) The book suits Peter's character—impressionable rather than reflective, and emotional rather than logical. To such men arguments are of minor importance. It is easier to believe than to think. It may seem to militate against all this that the three striking incidents in Peter's career narrated in Mt 14:22-33 after Peter: 17:24-27 (tribute money) and 16:15-16 (the church and the keys), should be assigned to this is just a touch of that courtesy and modesty which companionship with Jesus bred. We see John in his Gospel hiding himself in a similar way. These men are more likely to mention things that reflect discredit on themselves. It is only in Mk's list of the Twelve that by itself is called "the publican." So Peter never appears in a separate role in Mk except to receive a rebuke (Bacon).

As to Mark's authorship, the internal evidence appears slight. Like the others, he does not observe or reflect at that very reason what hints there are become the more impressive.

There may be something in Zahn's point that the description of John as brother of James is an unconscious hint that the author was John. There are two other passages, however, which are clearer and which reinforce each other. The description of John in the 15:28 is very different from the Gospel incidents. But if Mark himself was the author, its presence and implication is supported. In that case, it is likely that the Superb was celebrated in his own home and that the upper room is the same as that in Acts 1:13. This is favored by the fuller description of Mk, esp. the word "ready"—a most natural touch, the echo of the housewife's exclamation of surprise everything was ready for the guests. It is made almost a certainty when we compare 14:17 with the parallel in Mt Lk. Mt 26:30 reads: "Now when even came, he was sitting at meat with the twelve disciples: Lk 22:14: And when the hour was come, he sat down, and the apostles with him; while Mk has: "And when it was evening he cometh with the twelve. The last represents exactly the standpoint of one in the house who sees Jesus and the Twelve approaching. (And how admirably the term the twelve disciples the apostles the twelve suit Mt Lk, and Mk respectively.) Such phenomena, undesigned (save by the Inspiring Spirit), are just those that would not have been invented later, and become the strongest attestations the reliability of the tradition and the historicity of the Gospel. Modern modernist critics have ignored this view. We have seen, also, subtle but weighty reasons for believing that Mark added a little himself. Need we seek further sources, or does inquiry resolve itself into an analysis of Peter's teaching?

B. Weiss believes that Mark used a document now lost containing mainly sayings of Jesus, called Logia (L) in the earlier discussions, but now commonly known as Q. In that opinion he has been joined by Sanday and Street. In recent years, the language and wording of L and Q have sought to reconstruct Q on the basis of the non-Markan matter in Mt and Lk. Allen extracts it from Mt alone, thinking that Mk also may have drawn a few sayings from it. Some assign a distinct source for Lch 15. Sanday considers it a document written for the use of the church and respecting after the fall of Jesus, incorporating a few utterances by Jesus and itself incorporated bodily by Mark. Other sources, oral or written, are postulated by Bacon for smaller portions and grouped under X. He calls the final redactor R— not Paul but a Paulinist of a radical type.

In forming a judgment much depends upon one's conception of the teaching method of Jesus and the apostles. Teaching and preaching are not synonymous terms. Mt sums up the early ministry in Galilee under "teaching, preaching and healing" and gives us the substance of that teaching as it impressed itself upon him. Mk reports less of it, but speaks of it more frequently than either Mt or Lk. Jesus evidently said much, but said it in place, and a large proportion of the time thus spent was devoted to the special instruction of the inner circle of disciples. The range of that instruction was not wide. It was intensive rather than extensive. He held Himself to the vital topic of the kingdom of God. He must have gone over it again and again. He would not hesitate to repeat instructions which even chosen men found it so difficult to understand. Teaching by repetition was common then as it is now in the East. The word "catechize" (κατακηχεῖν) implies that, and that word is used by Paul of Jewish (Rom 2:18) and by Luke of Christian teaching (Lk 1:4). See CATECHIST.

The novelty in His teaching was not in method so much as in content, authority and accompanying miraculous power (Mk 1:27). Certainly He was far removed from vain repetition. His supreme concern was for the spirit. Just as certainly He was not concerned about a mere reproduction for originality or for variety of resources. He was concerned about teaching them the truth so effectively that they would be prepared by intellectual cleanness, as well as spiritual sympathy, to make it known to others. He stated His evidence, so kind to all but so often thwarted by human self-will, was free to work His perfect work for Him and make all things work together for the furtherance of His purpose. Thus incidents occur, situations arise and personal and typical aspects of the scene, calling for fresh inspiration, furnishing illustration and securing the presentation of truth in fulness with proper balance and emphasis and in right perspective.

Thus before His death the general character of that kingdom, its principles and prospects, were taught. That furnished the warp for the future Gospels. The essence, the substance and general form were the same for all the Twelve; but each from the standpoint of his own individuality saw particular aspects and views opposed to this are touched upon in what follows.

VI. Sources and Integrity. — We have seen that, according to the testimony of the Fathers, Peter's teaching and preaching are at least the main source, and that many of the sayings were given to us by him. We have seen, also, subtle but weighty reasons for believing that Mark added a little himself. Need we seek further sources, or does inquiry resolve itself into an analysis of Peter's teaching?

come. When He has come they will be ready to witness in power.

The apostles' conception of their task is indicated in some measure by Peter when he insisted that an inauguration in a successor to Jesus was that he must have been with them from the beginning to the end of Christ's ministry, and so be conversant with His words and deeds. From the day of Pentecost onward they gave themselves predominantly to teaching. The thousands converted on that day continued in the teaching of the apostles. When the trouble broke out between Hebrews and Hellenists, the Seven were appointed because the apostles could not leave the word of God to serve tables. The urgency of this business may have been one reason why they stayed in Jerusalem when persecution scattered so many of the church (Acts 8:2). They were thus in close touch for years, not only through the struggle between Hebrews and Hellenists, but under the administration of the gentle Cornelius and his friends by Peter had been solemly ratified by the church in Jerusalem and possibly until the Council had declared against the contention that circumcision was necessary for salvation. These years they had every opportunity for mutual conference, and the vital importance of the questions that arose would compel them to avail themselves of such opportunities. Their martyr-like devotion to Jesus would make them willing undertakers to write down a misrepresentation of His teaching. The Acts account of their discussions at great crises proves that conclusively. To their success in training others and the accuracy of the body of catachetical information are due in large part to the "certainty" or undoubted truth of it (Lk 1:4).

Thus Jesus' post-resurrection appearances, the experience of the years and the guidance of the Spirit are the source and explanation of the apostolic presentation of the gospel.

Of that company Peter was the recognized leader, and did more than any other to determine the mold into which at least the post-resurrection teachings were cast. Luke tells us of many attempts to record them. He himself in his brief reports of Peter's addresses sketches their broad outlines. Mark, at the request of Rom Christians and with his "teacher's" approval, undertook to give an adequate account. Two special facts influenced the result—one, the people for whom he wrote; the other, the existence (as we may assume) of Matthew's Q. It would be natural for him to supplement rather than duplicate the apostolic source. The Q, he presented mainly the ethical or law side of Christianity that would naturally present the gospel side of it—and so become its complement—while at the same time this presentation and the needs of the people for whom he specifically wrote it, made it necessary to add something from the body of catachetical material, oral or written, not included in Q, as his frequent use of ἵνα, κατὰ διδάσκαι, seems to imply (Buckley, 152 ff.). So Mk's is the "beginning of the Gospel." He introduces Jesus in the act of symbolically devoting Himself to that death for our sins and rising again, which constitutes the gospel and then entering upon His ministry by calling upon the people to "repent and believe in the gospel." The book is written from the standpoint of the resurrection, and gives the story of the passion and of the ministry in a perspective thus determined. About the time or place in which he may have been, Matthew, writing for Jewish Christians, combines this gospel side of the teaching with his own Q side of it, adding from the common stock or abridging as his purpose might suggest or space demand. Later Luke does a similar service for Gentile Christians (cf. Harack, The Twofold Gospel in the NT).

The only serious question about the integrity of the book concerns the last twelve vs., for a discussion of which see under III above. Some have suggested that 11:1-13 is akin to 16:9-20, and may have been added by the same hand. But while vocabulary and connection are main arguments against the genuineness of the latter, in both these respects 11:1-13 is bound up with the main body of the book. Nor is there sufficient reason for denying ch. 13 as a true report of what Jesus said.

Wendling's theory of three strata assignable to three different writers—historian, poet, and theologian—is quite overdrawn. Barring the closing verses, there is nothing which could be anything more than an earlier and a later edition by Mark himself, and the strongest point in favor of that is Luke's omission of 6:45—8:26. But Hawkins gives other reasons for that.

VII. Date and Place of Composition—Ancient testimony is shadowy. The Preface Chronicle puts it in 40 AD, and many MSS, both uncial and cursive (Harnack, Chronologie, 70, 124) 10 or 12 years after the Ascension. These Swete sets aside as due to the mistaken tradition that Peter began his work in Rome in the year 42 AD. Similarly he would set aside the opinion of Chrysostom (which has some MSS subscriptions to support it) that it was written in Alexandria, as an error growing out of the statement of Eusebius (HE, II, 16) that Mark went to Egypt and preached there the Gospel he composed. This he does in deference to the strong body of evidence that it was written in Rome about the time of Peter's death. Still there remains a discrepancy between Irenaeus, as a probable author of the quotation, and Eusebius, as so understood, Irenaeus places it after the death of Peter, whereas Jerome, Epiphanius, Origen and Clement of Alexandria clearly place it within Peter's lifetime. But it does not seem necessary to so explain the quotations. They may be composed while Peter was living, but only published after his death. Christophorson (1570 AD) had suggested that and supported it by the conjectural emendation of ἐνδοκιν, ἐνδοκῶν, "surrendering," to ἐνδοκίνα, "imprisonment," found in Lk 4:38. Grabe, Mill and others thought Irenaeus referred, not to Peter's death, but to his departure from Rome on further missionary tours. But if we take εὐαγγελία in that sense, it is better to understand it as the speech of Peter, rather than from Rome. Irenaeus' statement that the apostles were now fully furnished for the work of evangelization (Adv. Haer., iii.1) certainly seems to imply that they were now ready to leave Pal; and his next statement is that Matthew and Mark wrote their respective Gospels. And Eusebius (HE, II, 24) states explicitly that Matthew committed his Gospel to writing "when he was about" to leave Pal "to go to other peoples." The same may very possibly be true of Mark. If the first of Mark was in Caesarea or Antioch made the request of Mark 1:13-15 be necessary. How, by the time of Irenaeus, the whole incident might be transferred to Rome.

If this view be adopted, the date would probably not be before the council at Jerusalem and the events of Gal 2:11 ff. It is true the NT hints are that the apostles had left Jerusalem before that, but that they had gone beyond Syria is not likely. At any rate, at the time of the clash at Antioch they had not become so fixed on the question touching Jews and Gentiles in the church as to be "fully furnished for the work of universal evangelization." But may it not be that Paul's strong statement of the seriousness of their error actually did settle those questions in the minds of the leaders? If so, and if, with new vision and ardor, they turn to the work of world-wide evangelism, that would be a natural and worthy occasion for the composition of the Gospel. The place may be Caesarea or Antioch, and the date not earlier than 50 AD. This is the simplest synthesis of modern opinion as to date has ranged more widely than the ancient. Baur and Strauss were compelled by their tendency and mythical theories to place it in the 2d cent. Recent criticism tends strongly to fix the date in the sixties of the 1st cent., and more commonly the last sixties. This is based partly on hints in the Gospel itself, partly on its relation to Mt and Lk. The hints usually adduced are 2:26 and 15. The former, representing the temple as still standing only if the relative clause be Mark's explanatory addition. Ch 13 has more force because, if Jesus had already fallen, we might expect some recognition of the fact.

Two other slight hints may be mentioned. The omission by the synoptists of the raising of Lazarus, and of the resurrection in general, in connexion with the announcement of the Resurrection, shows that Jesus argues an early date when mention of them might have served the family. When the Fourth Gospel was published, they may have been no longer alive. The description of John as the brother of James (Jn 21:2) may also take us back to an early date when the name James was the more honored of the two brothers—though the usual order of the names may be, as Zahn thinks, to the author's instinctively distinguishing that John from himself.

The relation of Mk to Mt and Lk is important if the very widespread conviction of the priority of Mk be true. For the most likely date for Acts is 62 AD, as suggested by the mention of Paul's two years' residence in Rome, and Luke's Gospel is earlier than the Acts. It may well have been written at Caesarea about 60 AD; that again throws Mk back into the fifties.

The great objection to an early date is the amount of the facts given in the destruction of Jerusalem. Abbott and others have marshaled numerous other objections, but the weight—most of them indeed—seems pre-puerile. The real crux is that to accept an earlier date than 70 AD is to admit prophetic prophecy. Yet to deny that, e.g. for a believer in Christ, is an unwarranted pre-judgment, and even so far to reduce it as to deny its prophetic character is to charge Luke—a most fastidiously honest historian—with ascribing to Jesus statements which He never made.

The apparent date Mt is not earlier than 70 is due to the same feeling. But the problem here is complicated by the usual inconsistency of the assumption regard as proof positive that it must have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem. Others (e.g. Ahlcrath) think that it absolutely for certain cannot date much later than 70 AD, and consider 75 AD as a limit. But is it not possible that by φησὶν, εὐθέως (not ἀπαντάτως, παραχρήματε), Christ, speaking as a prophet, may have meant no more than that the next great event comparable with the epochal overthrow of Judaism would be His own return and that the Divine purpose marches straight on from the one to the other? The NT nowhere says that the second advent would take place within that generation. See below under "b"... The NT nowhere says that the second advent would take place within that generation. See below under "b"...

VIII. Historicity.—Older rationalists, like Paulus, not denying Mark's authorship, regarded the miraculous elements as misconceptions of actual events. Strauss, regarding these as mythical, was compelled to postulate a 2d-cent. date. When, however, the date was pushed back to the neighborhood of 70 AD, the historicity was felt to be largely established. But recently the theory of "pragmatic values" has been developed; Bacon thus states it: "The key to all genuinely scientific appreciation of Bib. narrative...is the recognition of motive. The motive...is never strictly historical but...aesthetic and...apologetic...The evangelic tradition consists of so and so many anecdotes, told and retold for the purpose of explaining or defending beliefs and practices of the contemporary church" (Modern Comm., Beginnings of Gospel Story, 9). Historicism works out the result that Mk is charged again and again with historical and other blunders. This view, like Baur's tendency-theory, has elements of truth. One is that the vocabulary of a later day may be a necessary condition of the present explanation, but not in any sense the evidence against the historical reality of the accounts passed on from mouth to mouth. The other is that each author has his purpose, but that simply determines his selection and arrangement of material; it neither creates nor misrepresents it if the author be honest and well informed. The word "selection" is advisedly chosen. The evangelists did not lack material. Each of the Twelve had personal knowledge beyond the context of Q or of Mk. These represent the central core—the one the ethical, the other the evangelic side of it—but their material is material that is scattered in all directions. Luke's introduction and John's explicit declaration attest that fact. And neither John nor Luke throws the slightest suspicion on the reliability of the material they did not use. There is no sufficient reason for charging them with misstating the facts to make a point. Bacon seems to trust any other ancient writers or even his own imagination rather than the evangelists. The test becomes altogether too subjective. Yet since Christianity is a historical revelation, perversion of history may become perversion of most vital religious teaching. In the last analysis, the critic undertakes to decide just what Jesus could or could not have done or said. The utter uncertainty of the result is seen by a comparison of Schmiedel and Bacon. The former is sure that the cry "My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me" is one of the very few genuine sayings of Jesus; Bacon is equally sure that Jesus could not have uttered it. To compare Mark with "immoral crudity" because in 10:45 he reports Jesus as saying that He came "to give his life a ransom..." Thus on two most vital matters he charges the evangelists with error because they run counter to his own religious opinions.

Plummer's remark is just (Comm. on Mt, xxiii): "To decide a priori that Deity cannot become incarnate, or that incarnate Deity must exhibit such and such characteristics, is neither true philosophy nor scientific criticism. The NT ("Ml" in Bible for Home and School, 26): 'The closer we get to the historic Jesus the surer we feel that He lived and wrought as He is reported in the Synoptic Gospels.' The evangelists had opportunities to know the facts such as we have not. The whole method of their training was such as to secure accuracy. They support each other. They have given us sketches of unparalleled beauty, vigor and power, and have portrayed for us a Person moving among sufficient reality. The NT, sufficiently understood, is the outstanding miracle. If we cannot trust the facts, there is little hope of ever getting at the facts at all.

IX. Purpose and Plan.—Mark's purpose was to write down the Gospel as Peter had presented it to Romans, so say the Fathers, at least, 1. The external and internal evidence supports them. Gospel for In any additions made by himself he Romans had the same persons in mind. That the Gospel was for Gentiles can be seen (a) from the tr of the Aram. expressions in 3:17 (Boanerges), 5:41 (Talitha cumi), 7:11 (Corban), 10:46 (Bartimaeus), 14:36 (Abba), 15:22 (Golgotha); (b) in the explanation of Jewish customs in 14:12 and 15:42; (c) from the fact that the Law is not mentioned and the OT is only once quoted in Mark's own narrative; (d) the gentile sections, esp. in chs 6-8.

That it was for Romans is seen in (a) the explanation of a Gr term by a Lat in 12:42; (b) the preponderance of works of power, the emphasis on authority (2:10), patience and heroic endurance (10:17 ff); (c) 10:12 which forbids a practice that was not Jewish but Rom. Those who believe it was written at Rome find further links in the mention of Rufus (15:21; cf Rom 16:13) and the resemblance between 7:1-23 and Rom 14. The Rom centurion's remark (16:39) is the Q.E.D. of the author, and bears the same relation to Mark's purpose as Jas 20:31 to John's.

But one cannot escape the feeling that we have in this Gospel the antitype of the Servant of Jehovah. A. B. Davidson (OT Theol., 368) tells us that there are two great figures around which Isaiah’s thoughts gather—the King and the Servant. The former rises “to the unsurpassable height of ‘God with us,’ ‘mighty God,’ teaching that in Him God shall be wholly present with His people; the Servant is the other. The former is depicted in Mt, who also identifies Him with the Servant (12:18 ff); the latter by Mk who identifies Him with the Messianic King (11:10; 14:62). Davidson summarizes the description of the Servant: “(1) He is God’s chosen; (2) He has a mission to establish judgment on the earth. . . . The word is His instrument and the Lord is in the Word, or rather He Himself is the impersonation of it; (3) His endowment is the Spirit and an invincible faith; (4) There is in Him a marvelous combination of greatness and lowliness; (5) There are inevitable sufferings—bearing the penalty of others’ sins; (6) He thus redeems Israel and brings light to the Gentiles. (7) Israel’s repentance and restoration precede that bringing of blessing.” It is not strange that this Servant-conception—this remarkable blend of strength and submission, achieving victory through apparent defeat—should appeal to Peter. He was himself an ardent, who believed man who knew both defeat and victory. Moreover, he himself had hired servants (Mk 1:20), and now for years had been a servant of Christ (cf Acts 4:29). That it did appeal to him and became familiar to the early Christians can be seen from Acts 3:13 and 4:30. In his First Ep. he has 17 references to Isaiah, 9 of which belong to the second part. Temporarily Mark seems to have been like Peter. And his experience in a wealthy home where servants were kept (1:30), and as himself aspiring to be an apostle in Christian service, fitted him both to appreciate and record the character and doings of the perfect servant—the Servant of Jehovah. For Rom Christians that historic figure would have a peculiar fascination.

The plan of the Gospel seems to have been influenced by this conception. Christ’s kingdom was apprehended by the Twelve at a comparatively early date. It was the Gospel not until after the resurrection, when He opened to them the Scriptures that they saw Him as the Suffering Servant of Isa 53. That gave Peter his gospel as we have already seen, and at the same time the general lines of its presentation: to put it more specifically, a sketch of the Servant in Acts 10. That sketch is filled in for us by Mark. So we have the following analysis:

Title: 1

1. The Baptist preparing the way: 1:2-8; cf Isa 40:3 f.
3. His greatness—the Galilean Ministry: 1:14—8:30; cf Isa 43:4-5 (1).
   (2) Outside the synagogue: parable teaching of the multitude, choice and training of the Twelve and their Great Commission: 3:7 f—8:30.
   (2) On the way to Jerusalem and the cross—through Galilee (6:30—50); Peræa (10:1—45); Judaea (10:46—52).
   (3) The word: triumphal entry into Jerus (11:1—11).
   (4) In Jerus and vicinity—opposed by the leaders (11:12—13:44); foretelling their doom (13:3); passion week (13:41—14:42); betrayed, condemned, crucified and buried in a rich man’s tomb (15)
5. His victory—the resurrection: Ch 16; cf Isa 53:10—12. What follows in Isa is taken up in Acts, for it is the first part of which Peter or Mark may have been Luke’s main source.

plain that the material is sometimes grouped according to subject-matter.

This Servant-conception may also be the real explanation of some of the striking features of this Gospel, e.g., the absence of a genealogy and any record of His early life; the frequent use of the word "straightway," the son's not knowing the day (13:32); and the abrupt ending at 16:8 (see III).

X. Leading Doctrines.—The main one, naturally, is the Person of Christ. The thesis is that He is equal with God. Son of Messiah, Author (Source)

1. Person of the Gospel. The first part of the book closes with the disciples' confession of Messiahship; the second, with the supreme demonstration that He is Son of God. Introductory to each is the Father's declaration of Him as His Beloved Son (1:11; 9:7). That the sonship is unique is indicated in 12:6 and 13:32. At the same time He is the Son of Man—true man (4:38; 8:5; 14:34); ideal man as absolutely obedient to God (10:40; 14:36), and Head of humanity (2:10.28), their rightful Messiah or King (1:1; 14:62)—yet Servant of all (10:44 f); David's Son and David's Lord (12:37). The unique Sonship is the final explanation of all else, His power, His knowledge, His saving work. Thus, in the passage of Mk 10:39; 14:27; 13), superiority to all men, whether friends (1:7; 9:3 f) or foes (12:34), and to superhuman beings, whatever good (13:32) or evil (1:32; 3:27).

As to salvation, the Son is God's final messenger (12:6); He gives His life a ransom instead of many (10:45); His bloodshed is thus the blood of the covenant (14:24); that involves for Him death in the fullest sense, including rupture of fellowship with God (15:34). From the outset He knew what was before Him—only that, He explained (5:11; cf 2:20); but the horror of it is burdensome, He, esp. from the transfiguration onward (10:32; 14:33—36); that was the Divine provision for salvation: He gave His life (10:45). The human condition is repentance and faith (10:30; 5:36; 6:5; 9:23; 16:16), though He bestows lesser blessings apart from personal faith (1:23—26 5:1—20; 6:35—43). The power of faith, within the will of God, is limitless (11:25); faith leads to doing the will of God, and only such as do His will are Christ's true kindred (3:35). Salvation is possible for Gentiles also as Jew (7:24—30).

The eschatology of this Gospel is found chiefly in 8:34—9:1 and 13. In 9:1 we have a prediction of the overthrow of Jerus which is here given as a type and proof of His final coming for judgment and reward which He had in mind in the preceding verses. Ch 13 is a development of this—the destruction of Jerus being meant in vs 5:28 and 28—31, the final coming in vs 24—27 and 32. The distinction is clearly marked by the pronouns ἄρσα, ταύτα, and εἰκόνα, εἰκόνας, in vs 30 and 32 (cf Mt 24:34.35). In each passage (9:1; 13:30) the fall of Jerus is definitely fixed as toward the close of that generation; the time of the fall is 5:28; 7:18; cf the Father (13:32). Between Christ’s earthly life and the Second Coming He is seated at the right hand of God (12:36; 16:19). The resurrection which He predicted for Himself (8:31; 9:31; 10 player with whom he might bargain for his services, usually by the day (Mt 20:1-16); (3) a place where the proud pretender could parade in long robes and get public recognition, "salutations in the market-places," e.g. the scribes and Pharisees against whom Jesus emphatically warns His disciples (Mt 23:3-7; Mk 12:38; Lk 11:43; 20:46); (4) a place where the sick were brought for treatment, the poor man's sanatorium, a municipal hospital; Jesus "who went about doing good" often found His opportunity there (Mt 6:50); (5) a place of preliminary hearing in trials, where the accused might be brought before rulers who were present at the time, e.g. Paul and Silas at Philippi (Acts 16:19); (6) a place for religious and probably political or philosophical discussion (gossip also), a forum, a free-speech throne; no doubt often used by the early apostles not only as a place of proclaiming some truth of the new religion but also a place of advertisement for a coming synagogue service, e.g. Paul in Athens (Acts 17:17).

LITERATURE

It would be interesting to study marriage biologically and sociologically, to get the far and near historical and social background of it as an institution, esp. as it existed among the ancient Jews, and as it figures in the teaching of Jesus as recorded in the NT. For Moses the institutions, marriage, and the family which is the outcome of marriage, must be judged, not by its status at any particular time, but in the light of its history. Such a study of it would raise a host of related historic questions, e.g. What was its origin? What part has it played in the evolution and civilization of the race? What social functions has it performed? What is its sequel? Can the services it has rendered to civilization and progress be performed or accorded in any other way? This, indeed, would call for us to go back even farther—to try to discover the psychology of the institution and its history, the beliefs from which it has sprung and by which it has survived so long, as well worth while and amply justified by much of the thinking of our time; for, as one of the three social institutions that support the most challenged form and fabric of modern civilization, marriage, private property and the state, its continued existence, in present form at least, is a matter of serious discussion and its abolition, along with the other two, is confidently prophesied. Moses Marriage, as at present understood, is an arrangement most closely associated with the existing social status and stands or falls with it (Bebel, Socialism and Sex, 196, Reeves, London; "The Cooperative Commonwealth in Its Outline, Greenland, 234). But such a study is entirely outside of and beyond the purpose of this article.

Neither the Bible in general, nor Jesus in particular, treats of the family from the point of view of the historian or the sociologist, but solely from that of the teacher of religion; and in that short, their point of view is theological, rather than sociological. Moses and the prophets, no less than Jesus and His apostles, accepted marriage as an existing institution which gave rise to certain practical, ethical questions, and they dealt with it accordingly. There is nothing in the record of the teachings of Jesus and of His apostles to indicate that they gave to marriage any new social content, custom or sanction. They simply accepted it as it existed in the conventionaler civilizations of the Jews of their day and used it and the customs connected with it for ethical or illustrative purposes. One exception is to be made to this general statement, viz. that Jesus granted that because of the exigencies of the social development of His time it had somewhat modified it to the extent of permitting and regulating divorce, clearly indicating, however, at the same time, that He regarded such modification as out of harmony with the institution as at first given to mankind. According to the original Divine purpose it was monogamous, and any form of polygamy, and apparently of divorce, was excluded by the Divine idea and purpose. The treatment of the subject here, therefore, will be limited as follows: Marriage among the Ancient Hebrews and Other Semites; Betrothal as the First Formal Part of the Transaction; Wedding Ceremonies Connected with Marriage, esp. as Reflected in the NT; and Jesus' Sanction and Use of the Institution, Teaching concerning Divorce, etc.

With the Hebrews marriage life was the normal life. Any exception called for apology and explanation. "Any Jew who has not 1. Marriage a wife is no man" (Talmud). It was among the most esteemed among the Jews, and sexual maturity comes much earlier indeed in the East than with us in the West—in what we call childhood. The ancient Hebrews, in common with all Orientals, regarded the family as the social unit. In this their view of it coincides with that of modern sociologists. Of the three great events in the family life, birth, marriage and death, marriage was regarded as the most important. It was a step that led to the gravest tribal and family consequences. In case of a daughter, if she should prove unsatisfactory to her husband, she would likely be returned to the ancestral home, discarded and discredited, and there would be almost inevitably a feeling of injustice engendered on one side, and a sense of mutual irritation between the families (Jgs 14 20; 1 S 15 19). If she failed to pass muster with her mother-in-law she would just as certainly have to go, and the results would be much the same (cf customs in China). It was a matter affecting the whole circle of relatives, and posei ibly tribal amity as well. It was natural and deemed necessary, therefore, that the selection of the wife and the arrangement of all contractual and financial matters connected with it should be decided upon by the parents or guardians of the couple involved. Though the consent of the parties was sometimes sought (Gen 24 8) and romantic attachments were not unknown (Gen 29 20; 34 3; Jgs 14 1; 1 S 18 20), the girl or woman in the case was not currently thought of as having a personal existence at her own disposal. She was simply a passive unit in the family under the protection and supreme control of father or brothers. In marriage, she was practically the chattel, the purchased possession and personal property of her husband, who was her ba'al or master (Hos 2 16), she herself being b'alah (Isa 62 4). The control, however, was not always absolute (Gen 26 34; Ex 2 21).

The bargaining instinct, so dominant among Orientals then as now, played a large part in the transaction. In idea the family was a little kingdom of which the father was the king, or absolute ruler. There are many indications, not only that the family was the unit from which national coherence was derived, but that this unit was perpetuated through the supremacy of the oldest male. Thus society became patriarchal, and this is the key of the ancient history of the family and the nation. Through the expansion of the family group was evolved in turn the clan, the tribe, the nation, and the authority of the father became in turn that of the chief, the ruler, and the king. The Oriental cannot conceive, indeed, of any band, or clan, or company without a "father," even though there be no kith or kinship involved in the matter. The "father," too, was God's representative, and as such he was simply carrying out God's purpose, for instance, in selecting a bride for his son, or giving the bride to be married to the son of another. This is as true of the far East as of the near East today. Accordingly, as a rule, the young people simply acquiesced, without question or complaint, in what was thus done for them, accepting it as though God had done it directly. Accordingly, too, the family and tribal loyalty overshadowed love-making and patriotism, in the larger sense. Out of this idea of the solidarity and selectness of the tribe and family springs the overmastering desire of the Oriental for progeny, and for the conservation of the family or the tribe at any cost. Hence the feuds, bloody and bitter, the passion between this family or tribe and another that has in any way violated this sacred law.

Traces of what is known as beena marriage are found in the OT, e.g. that of Jacob, where Laban claims Jacob's wives and children as his own (Gen 31 31-44), and that of Moes (Ex 2 21; 4 18). This is that form of marriage esteemed a part of the transaction of wife's tribe, the children belonging to her tribe and descent being reckoned on her side (cf W. Robertson Smith, Kinship and Marriage in Early Arabia, 94). In Samson's case we seem to have an instance of what is known among Arabs as gada marriage (from gada, here being the customary gada-k (Jgs 14; 15 1; 16 4). There is no hint that he meant to take his wife home. It is differentiated from prostitution in that it is attached to it and the children are recognized as legitimate by the tribe. Such marriages make it easier to understand the existence of the matriarchate, or the custom of reckoning the descent of children and property through the mothers. The influence of polygamy would follow in the same direction, subdividing the family into smaller groups connected with the several mothers. But however, no clear evidence in the OT of polyandry (a plurality of husbands), though the Levirate marriage is regarded by some as a survival of it. In other words, polygamy among the Hebrews seems to have been confined to polygyny (a plurality of wives). It is easy to trace the causes: (1) desire for a numerous offspring ("May his tribe increase"); (2) barrenness of first wife (as in Abraham's case); (3) advantages conferred by partial alliances (e.g. Solomon); (4) the custom of making wives of captives taken in war (cp Ps 45 3-9); (Gen 44). A similar custom prevails in China and Japan, and in cases becomes very oppressive. The marriage may have been intended by the parents from the infant, but this formality of betrothal is not entered on till the marriage is considered reasonably certain and measurably near. A prolonged interval between betrothal and marriage was deemed undesirable on many accounts, though often an interval was needed that the groom might render the stipulated service or pay the price—say a year or two, or, as in the case of Jacob, it might be seven years. The betrothed parties were legally in the position of a married couple, and unfaithfulness was "adultery" (Dt 22:23; Mt 1:19).

Polygamy is likely to become prevalent only where conditions are abnormal, as where there is a disproportion between the sexes, as in tribal life in a state of war. In settled conditions it is possible only to those able to provide "dowry" and support for each and all of their wives.

The fact of polygamy in OT times is abundantly witnessed by Abraham, Jacob, the judges, David, Solomon, etc. It was prevalent in Issachar (1 Ch 7:4); among the middle class (1 S 1:1). But it is impossible, even in the OT, as in our own time, to divorce the Divine ideal (Gen 2:24), and its original is traced to a deliberate departure from that ideal by Lamech, the Cainite (Gen 4:19). Kings are warned against it (Dt 17:17; cf Gen 29:31; 30). Noah, Isaac and Joseph had each only one wife, and hence pictures of domestic happiness are always connected with monogamy (Gen 2:24; Ps 128; Prov 31; cf Sir 25:1; 26:13). Marriage is applied figuratively, too, to the union between God and Israel, implying monogamy as a marriage supper: then followed, generally, the ideal. Of precedent, it was long before polygamy fell into disuse. Both Joseph and his father had nine wives at one time (Jos, Ant. XVII, 1, 2). Justin Martyr (Dialog, 134, 141) reproaches Jews of his day with having "four or even five "marriages" whenever they felt like it" (cf Talm). It was not definitely and formally forbidden anywhere as early as 1000 AD. It exists still among Jews in Moslem lands. Side by side with this practice all along has been the ideal principle (Gen 2:18) re: loving and mutually honoring. The legal theory that married man was the "lord" of the wife (Gen 3:16; Tenth Commandment) was also recognized by practice by the wife's affection of the husband and the personality of the wife.

The difference between a concubine and a wife was largely due to the wife's birth and higher position and the fact that she was usually backed by relatives ready to defend her. It would not be wise therefore to make a concubine without the wife's consent (Gen 16:16).

There is a disappointing uncertainty as to the exact ceremonies or proceedings connected with marriage in Bible times. We have to paint our picture from passing allusions in the books, and from what we know of Jewish and Arab customs.

In cases it would seem that there was nothing beyond betrothal, or the festivities following it (see Gen 24:2). Later, in the case of a virgin, an interval of not less than one year came to be observed.

The first ceremony, the wedding procession, apparently a relic of marriage by capture (cf Jgs 5:30; Ps 45:15), was the first part of the proceedings. The "bridesmaids" (Jgs 3:29) went, usually by night, to fetch the bride and her attendants to the home of the groom (Mt 9:15; Jn 3:29). The joyousness of it all is witnessed by the proverbial "voice of the bridegroom" and the cry, "Behold the bridegroom cometh!" (Jer 7:34; Rev 19:25). The procession was preferably by night, chiefly, we may infer, that those busy in the day might attend and that, in accordance with the oriental love of scenic effects, the weirdly, few, of flowers, lights and torches might play an engaging and kindling part. The procession was then followed, generally, in the home of the groom. Today in Syria, as Dr. Mackie, of Beirut, says, when both parties live in the same town, the reception may take place in either home; but the older tradition points to the house of the groom before it went scattered away. It is the bringing home of an already accredited bride to her covenanted husband. She is escorted by a company of attendants of her own sex and by male relatives and friends conveying on mules or by porters, various presents for the new home. As the marriage usually takes place in the evening, the house is given up for the day to the women who are busy robing the bride and making ready for the evening hospitality. The bridgegroom is shown at the head of a retinue of friends, where men and women congregate in the evening for the purpose of escorting him home. When he indicates that it is time to go, all rise up, and candles and torches are supplied to those who are to form the procession, and they move off. It is a very picturesque sight to see such a procession moving along winding way in the stillness of the starry night, while, if it be in town or city, on each side of the narrow street, from the flat house-top or balcony, crowds look down, and the women take up the peculiar cry of wedding joy that tells those far and near that the pageant has started. This cry is taken up all along the route, and gives warning to those who are waiting with the bride that it is time to arise and light up the approach, and welcome the bridgegroom with honor. As at the house where the bridgegroom receives his friends before starting some come late, and speeches of congratulation have to be made, and poems have to be recited or sung in praise of the groom, and to the honor of his family, it is often near midnight when the procession begins. Meanwhile, as the night wears on, and the duties of robing the bride and adorning the house are all done, a period of relaxing and drowsy waiting sets in, when, in the NT parable, both the wise and the foolish virgins were overawed by the time their case the distant cry on the street brought the warning to prepare for the reception, and then came the discovery of the exhausted oil.

Of the bridgegroom's retinue only a limited number would enter, their chief duty being that of escort. They might call next day to offer congratulations. An Arab wedding rhyme says:

"To the bridgegroom's door went the torch-lit array, And then like goats they scattered to their prey. With their dispersion, according to custom, the doors would be closed, leaving within the relatives and invited guests; and so, when the belated virgins of the parable hastened back, they too found themselves involuntarily shut out by the etiquette of the occasion. The opportunity of service was past, and they were no longer needed.

At the home all things would be "made ready," if possible on a liberal scale. Jn 2 gives a picture of a wedding feast where the resources were strained to the breaking point. Hospitality was here esp. a sacred duty, and, of course, greatly ministered to the joy of the occasion. An oriental proverb is significant of the store set by it:

"He who does not invite me to his marriage Will not have me to his funeral."

To decline the invitation to a marriage was a gross insult (Mt 22).

It was unusual in Galilee to have a "ruler of the feast" as in Judaea (Jn 2). There was no formal religious ceremony connected with the Heb marriage as with us—there is not a hint of such a thing in the Bible. The marriage was consummated by entrance into the "chamber," i.e. the nuptial chamber (Heb heather), in which stood the bridal bed with a canopy (kappath), being originally the wife's tent (Gen 24:67; Jgs 4:17). In all lands of the dispersion the name is still applied to the embroidered canopy under which the contracting parties stand or sit during the festivities. In Arab. Syr. and Heb the bridgegroom is said to "go in" to the bride.

A general survey of ancient marriage laws and customs shows that those of the Hebrews are not a peculiar creation apart from those of other peoples. A remarkable affinity to those of other branches of the Sem races esp., may be noted, and striking parallels with CT, or even CV, e.g. to betrothal, dowry, adultery and divorce. But modern researches have emphasized the relative purity of OT sexual morality. This, in as other respects, the Jews had a message for the world. In fact we should not expect to find among them the Christian standard. Under the new dispensation the keynote is struck by Our Lord's action. The significance of His attending the marriage feast at Cana and performing His first miracle there can hardly be exaggerated. The act corresponds, too, with His teaching on the subject. He, no less than Paul, abjured the holiness of the estate and the heinousness of all sins against it.

The most characteristic use of marriage and the family by Our Lord is that in which He describes the kingdom of God as a social order 4. Jesus' Institution and their relation to each other like that between brothers. This social ideal, which presents itself vividly and continuously to His mind, is summed up in this phrase, "king-} dom of God," which occurs more than a hundred times in the Synoptic Gospels. The passages in which it occurs form the interior climax of His message to men. It is a new and noble Judaism, taking the form of a political restoration, that He proclaims, and no "far-off Divine event" to be realized only in some glorious apocalyptic consummation; but a kingdom of God "within you," the chief element of its communion with God, the loving relation of "children" to a "Father," a present possession of all who embrace the one, to be fully realized, and yet present; invisible, and yet becoming more and more visible as a new social order, a conscious brotherhood with one common, heavenly Father, proclaimed in every stage of His teaching in simple human life and varying form in unanswerable certainty of its completion—this is the "kingdom" that Jesus has made the inalienable possession of the Christian consciousness. His entire theology may be described as a transfiguration of the social question, 149 f.; Holtzmann, NT Theology, I, 200; Harnack, History of Dogma, I, 62; B. Weiss, Bib. Theol. of the NT, I, 72, ET, 1882.

Beyond this Jesus frequently used figures drawn from marriage to illustrate His teaching concerning the coming of the kingdom, as Paul did concerning Christ and the church. There is no suggestion of reflection upon the OT teaching about marriage in His teaching except at one point, the modification of it so as to allow polygamy and divorce. Everywhere He accepts and deals with it as sacral and of Divine origin (Mt 19, 9 et), but He treats it as transient, that is of the "flesh" and for this life only.

A question of profound interest remains to be treated: Did Jesus allow under any circumstances the remarriage of a divorced person during the lifetime of the partner to the marriage? Or did He allow absolute divorce for any cause whatsoever? Upon the answer to that question in every age depend momentous issues, social and civic, as well as religious. The facts bearing on the question are confessedly enshrined in the NT, and so the inquiry may be limited to its records. Accord-} ging to the best scholarship the documents of the NT, emanating from the disciples of Jesus in the second half of the 1st century AD, the question is, what did the writers understand Jesus to teach on this subject? If we look to the Gospels of Mark and Luke and the Epistles of Paul, there could be but one answer given: Christ did not allow absolute divorce for any cause (see Mk 10 2 f.; Lk 16 18; Mk 10 12; 1 Cor 7 10). The OP permission was a concession. He teaches, to a low moral state and standard, and opposed to the ideal of marriage given in Gen (5 24).

"The position of women in that day was far from enviable. They could be women in the most perfect, saintly, and saintly of a Man, 181 f.) Two sayings attributed to Christ and recorded by the writer or editor of the First Gospel (Mt 5 32: 19) seem directly to condemn His teaching as recorded in Mk and Lk. Here He "said to them, "You can obtain for 'fornication' (καὶ ἐὰν πνοίησην, et μὴ ἐπὶ πνευμάτων, "save for fornication"), an exception which finds no place in the parallel (cf. 1 Cor 7 11, 1 Cor 5 1). Divorce to a Jew carried with it the right of remarriage, and the words 'children' are used for 'adultery' (Mt 5 32) show that Jesus assumed that the divorced woman would marry again. Hence if He allowed divorce, He also allowed remarriage. A careful examination of the whole passage in Mt has led many scholars to believe that the whole passage, its interpolation due to the Jewish-Christian compiler or editor through whose hands the materials passed. Others think it betrays traces of having been rewritten from Mk or from a source common to both Mt and Mk, and combined with a semi-Jewish tradition, in short, that it is due to literary revision and compilation. The writer or compiler attempted to combine the original sayings of Jesus and His own interpretation. Believing that Our Lord had not come to set aside the authority of the rabbis, He refused to be bound by the meticulous moral code, but instead set up as a higher standard, a freer and freer, teaching of His own, and a freer, more merciful, interpretation of the Mosaic law's most striking features, and in this way not only give protection to widows and orphans, but also free the Christian from the tyrannical restrictions of the Jewish Law. Once the liberty of the spirit was established, the spirit could then apply itself to the richness of Jewish teaching, made possible by the liberation from the letter and its form-preservation.

MARROW, mar'o (תַּנָּא, המר: hêleb, הָרֵם, shîkhîyāh, תַּנָּא, דָּם, "to make fat," "to grease"; περιλαγμένος, mrelisha); Marrow is the nourisher and strengthener of the bones. It is called "fat" in the bones: "The marrow [מַרְאוֹן] of his bones is moistened" (Job 21 24). The fear of Jeh "will be health to thy navel, and marrow [שִׁקְיָה, m refesh, Heb moistening] to thy bones" (Prov 3 5). Thus the expression is used figuratively of the things which alone can satisfy the soul: "My soul shall be satisfied as with marrow [שִׁקְיָה, falt] and fatness" (Ps 63 5); "In this mountain will Jeh of hosts make unto all peoples a feast of fat things, a feast of wines on the lees well refined" (Isa 25 6).

In the Ep. to the He the writer speaks of the word of God, which is "living, active, and sharper than any two-edged sword, and piercing even to the dividing of soul and spirit, of both joints and mar-

nāgra; derivation unknown but probably of Pers origin (Est 1 14): One of the seven princes of Persia and Media, who saw the king's face, and sat first in the kingdom.
MARSH, mär'shäl: Not found in AV, but in RV the word represents two Heb words: (1) יָפֹר, yôphûr (Jgs 5 14), т р they that handle the marshal's stall. A difficulty arises because the usual meaning of yôphûr is "scriber" or "writer" (so AV). The revisers follow LXX and Gr authority which favor "marshal" as against "scribe." The office of marshal was to help the general to maintain discipline (of 1 Macc 5 42). (2) יָפֹר, yôphûr (Jer 51 27), a loan-word whose meaning is not clear. Lenormant thinks it akin to a Bab-Assyr word meaning "tablet." The translation "marshal" is based on this word. Accordingly, RV renders Nah 3 17 "thy scribes," though the Syr has "thy warriors," as does the Tg in Jer. We must await further light on both words. Geo. B. Eager MART, märt. See MARKET.

MARTHA, mär'tha (Mârâ, Martha, "mistress," being a transliteration of the fem. form of תָּמָר, tamar, "Lords!"): Martha belonged to Bethany, and was the sister of Lazarus and Mary (Jn 11 1 f). From the fact that the house into which Jesus was received belonged to Martha, and that she generally took the lead in action, it is inferred that she was the elder sister. Martha was one of those who gave hospitality to Jesus during His public ministry. Thus, in the course of those wanderings which began when "he stedfastly set his face to go to Jerusalem" (Lk 9 51), he "entered into a certain village"—its name is not stated—and "a certain woman named Martha received him into her house" (Lk 10 38). Martha, whose sense of responsibility as hostess weighed heavily upon her, was "cumbered about much serving," and her indignation was aroused at the lack of assistance given to her by her sister. Her words, "Lord, dost thou not care?" imply a certain reproach in that she felt He showed a want of sympathy with her efforts and was the cause of Mary's remissness. But, in tones of gentle reproof, reminded her that for Him not the preparation of an elaborate meal but the hearing of His Word was the "one thing needful" (Lk 10 39-42).

Martha is first mentioned by St. John—the only other Gospel writer who refers to Martha—in his account of the raising of Lazarus from the dead at Bethany (Jn 11 1-44). The narrative indicates, however, that Jesus was already on terms of the closest friendship with her and her household (cf vs 5). In the incident which St. John here records, Martha again displayed her more practical nature by going out to meet Jesus, while Mary sat in the house (ver 20). But she was not ungrateful to her brother for her love and her support (ver 19), in her faith in Jesus (vs 21 f) and in her belief in the final resurrection (ver 24). The power of Him, whom she termed the "Teacher," to restore Lazarus to life even upon earth was beyond her understanding. To the words of Jesus concerning this she gave, however, a verbal assent, and went and informed Mary, "The Teacher is here, and calleth thee" (vs 27 f). Yet she remained inwardly unconvinced, and remonstrated when Jesus ordered the stone before the grave to be removed (ver 39). Jesus then recalled His previous words to her remembrance (ver 40), and vindicated them by restoring her brother to life (vs 41-44). After the raising of Lazarus, Jesus then made His last recorded visit to Bethany, and there He stayed a short stay in Ephraim (ver 54) He returned to Bethany (Jn 12 1). While He supped there, Martha once more served, and Lazarus was also present (Jn 12 2). It was on this occasion that Mary anointed the feet of Jesus with an "alabaster box full of spikenard" (Jn 12 3-8). According to Mt 26 6-13; Mk 14 3-9, the anointing took place in the house of the leper, and it has hence been concluded by some that Martha was the wife or widow of Simon. The anointing described in Lk 7 38-50 happened in the house of Simon a Pharisee. But in none of the synoptist accounts is Martha mentioned. For the relationship of these anointings with each other, see MARY, IV. As, according to St. John, the abode of the sisters was in Bethany, a further difficulty of a topographical nature is raised by those who hold that St. Luke implies, from the Galilean setting of Lk 10 38-41, that the sisters lived in Galilee. But the information supplied by St. Luke, upon which he infers that Joseph "lived in Bethany" (Lk 2 72), is based on evidence of a later date. Accordingly, RV renders Nah 3 17 "thy scribes," though the Syr has "thy warriors," as does the Tg in Jer. We must await further light on both words.

MARTYR, mär'tér (μαρτύρος, martûros, Aeolic μαρτυρ, martür, "witness," so τρ in numerous passages, both as of one bearing testimony, and also as of one who is a spectator of anything (see Wm). In AV rendered "martyr" in Acts 22 20, "thy martyr Stephen"; and Rev 2 13, "Antipas my faithful martyr"; also 17 6, "the blood of the martyrs of Jesus," where alone ARV retains "martyr." These passages are therefore also in that sense, but in the broader sense of "martyr" for such witnesses as were faithful even unto death, its uniform modern use.
MARVEL, măr'vĕl, MARVELOUS, măr’vel-ŭs (θαυμάστω, tämah, θαυμᾷ, pâl’ să; θαυμάζω, thaumâzō, thaumástos, thaumásta): “To marvel” is the tr of tämah, “to wonder” (Gen 43:33; Ps 48:5, RV “were amazed”; Exod 8:8); of thaumázō, “to admire” (Mt 8:10,27; Mk 5:20; Jn 3:7; Acts 2:7; Rev 17:7 AV, etc); “marvel” (subst.) occurs in the pl. as tr of pâl’, “to distinguish,” fig., “to make wonderful” (Ex 34:10. “I will do marvels, such as have not been wrought” [Heb “created”]); and of thaumástos (thauma), “admirable” (2 Cor 11:14).

“Marvelous” is the tr of pâl’; “marvelous works” (1 Ch 16:12.14. Ps 9:1); “marvelous things” (Job 6:9.; 10:16. Ps 31:21; 118:23; Isa 29:14; Dn 11:36; Zec 8:6, 64); “marvelously,” pâl’ (Job 37:7; Hab 1:5 lit.”tâmah,” regard and wonder marvelously”, lit. “marvel, marvelously”); thaumástoς, admirable, is tr “marvellous” (Mt 27:42; 1 Pet 2:9; Rev 15:1.3, etc).

In Apoc we have “marvel” (Eccles 11:13; 47:17; 2 Macc 1:22; 7:12); “marvelleth” (Eccles 40:7; 43:16); “marvy” (Wisdom 10:17; 19:8, etc, mostly thaumástos and compouds).

RV has “wonder” for “marvel” (Rev 17:7); “the marvellous,” “wonderful” things” (Gen 9:20); “marvelled” for “wondered” (Lk 8:25; 11:14); “marvelled at” for “wondered at” (Thess 1:10); “marveling” for “wondered” (Lk 9:43); “marvellous” for “wondrous” (1 Ch 16:9; Ps 105:2); “marvellous things” for “and wondered” (Job 9:10); “marvelously” (Ps 139:14); for “marvelled” (Mt 9:8), “were afraid,” and (Mk 12:17) marvelled greatly (different texts). I. Definition and Questions of Identification.—A Heb fem. proper name of two persons in the OT (see Ex 15:20; Nu 12:1; Mic 6:4; 1 Ch 4:17) and of a number not certainly determined in the NT. The prevalence of the name, with no great amount of certainty, to the popularity of Marianne, the last representative of the Hasmonian family, who was the second wife of Herod I.

(1) The name Mary occurs in 51 passages of the NT to which the following group of articles is confined (see MIRIAM). Collating all these references we have the following apparent notes of identification: (a) Mary, the mother of Jesus; (b) Mary (daughter); (c) Mary, the mother of James; (d) Mary, the mother of Joseph; (e) Mary, the wife of Clopas; (f) Mary of Bethany; (g) Mary, the mother of Mark; (h) Mary of Rome; (i) the “other” Mary.

(2) The comparison of Mt 27:56; 28:1 with Mk 15:47 seems clearly to identify the “other” Mary with Mary the mother of Joseph.

(3) Mk 15:40 identifies Mary the mother of James and Mary the mother of Joseph (cf 15:47) (see Allen’s note on Mt 27:56). At this point a special problem of identification arises. Mary, the wife of Clopas, is mentioned as being present at the cross with Mary the mother of Jesus, the latter’s sister and Mary of Magdala (Jn 19:25). In the context of the group at the cross, Mary, the mother of James, is mentioned (Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40). Elsewhere, James is regularly designated “son of Alphaeus” (Mt 10:3; Mk 3:18; Lk 6:15). Since it can hardly be doubted that James, the apostle, and James the Less, the son of Mary, are one and the same person, the conclusion seems inevitable that Mary, the mother of James, is also the wife of Alphaeus. Here we might stop and leave the wife of Clopas unidentified, but the fact that the name Alphaeus (Ἀλφαῖος, Alphaiōs) is the Gr transliteration of the Aram. אַלְפָּי, halpay, together with the unlikelihood that anyone important enough to be mentioned by John would be omitted by the synoptists and that another Mary, in addition to the three definitely mentioned, could be present and not be mentioned, points to the conclusion that the wife of Clopas is the same person as the wife of Alphaeus (see ALPHAeus). Along with this reasonable conclusion has grown, as an excésence, another for which there is no basis whatever; viz., that the wife of Clopas was not the mother of Jesus. This would make the apostle James the cousin of Jesus, and, by an extension of the idea, would identify James, the apostle, with James, the “Lord’s brother.” The available evidence is clearly against both these inferences (see Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3; Gal 1:19).

(4) One other possible identification is offered for our consideration. Zahn, in an exceedingly interesting note (NT, II, 514), identifies Mary of Rome (Rom 16:6) with the “other” Mary of Mt. We need not enter into a discussion of the point, as the identification of a woman of whom we have no details given is of little more than academic interest.

We are left free, however, by the probabilities of the case to confine our attention to the principal individuals who bear the name of Mary. We shall discuss Mary, the mother of Jesus; Mary of Magdala; Mary of Bethany; Mary, the mother of James and Joseph; Mary, the mother of Mark.

II. MARY, THE VIRGIN.—The biography of the mother of Jesus is gathered around the formulae and episodes which serve to exhibit her leading characteristics in clear light. Two causes have operated to distort and make unclear the very clear and vivid image of Mary left for us in the Gospels. Roman Catholic dogmatic and sentimental exaggeration has well-nigh removed Mary from history (see IMMACULATE CONCEPTION). On the other hand, reaction and overemphasis upon certain features of the Gospel narrative have led some to credit Mary with a negative attitude toward Our Lord and His claims, which she assuredly never occupied. It is very important that we should follow the narrative with unprejudiced eyes and give due weight to each successive episode.

Mary appears in the following passages: the Infancy narratives, Mt 1 and 2; Lk 1 and 2; the wedding at Cana of Galilee, Jn 2:1-11; the episode of Mt 12:46; Mk 3:21.31 ff; the incident at the cross, Jn 19:25 ff; the scene in the upper chamber, Acts 1:14.

(1) It is to be noted, first of all, that Mary and her experiences form the narrative core of both Infancy documents. This is contrary to 1. Mary in to the ordinary opinion, but is un- the Infancy questionably true. She is obviously the object of special interest to Luke (see Ramya, Was Christ of Bethlehem? 76 f), and there are not wanting indications that Luke’s story came from Mary herself. But, while Matthew’s account does not exhibit his interest in Mary quite so readily, that he was interested in the pathetic story of the Lord’s mother is evident.

Luke tells the story of Mary’s inward and deeply personal experiences, her call (1:26f), her maidenly fears (1:39-35), her loyal submission (1:38), her outburst of sacred and unselfish joy (1:39-55). From this anticipatory narrative he passes at once to the Messianic fulfilment.

Matthew tells the story of the outward and, so to say, public experiences of Mary which follow hard upon the former and are in striking contrast with them: the shame and suspicion which fell upon her (1:18); her bitter humiliation (1:19), her ultimate vindication (1:20f). Here the two narratives supplement each other by furnishing different details but, as in other instances, converge upon the central fact—the central fact here being Mary herself, her character, her thoughts, her experiences. The point to be emphasized above all others is that we have real biography, although in fragments; that in that same person appears the indubitable reality of actual characterization, in both parts of the story. This is sufficient guaranty of historicity; for no two imaginary portraits ever agreed unless one copied the other—which is evidently not the case here. Moreover, Mark is a truly human narrative in which the remarkable character of the events which took place in her life only serves to bring into sharper relief the simple, humble, natural qualities of the subject of them.

(2) One can hardly fail to be impressed by studying Mary’s character, with her quietness of spirit; her meditative inwardsness of disposition; her admirable self-control; her devout and gracious gift of sacred silence. The canticle (Lk 1:46-55), which at least Luke’s conception of her nature, indicates that she is not accustomed to dwell much upon herself (4 lines only call particular attention to herself), and that her mind is saturated with the spirit and phraseology of the OT. The intensely high quality of her piety thus expressed accounts for much that appears anomalous in her subsequent career as depicted in the Gospels.

The first episode which demands our attention is the wedding at Cana of Galilee (Jn 2:1-11).

The relationship between Jesus and His mother hand in hand through the chapter. It is to be noted that the idea of wanton interference on the part of Mary and of sharp rebuke on the part of Jesus is to be decisively rejected. The key to the meaning of this episode is to be found in 4 simple items: (1) in a crisis of need, Mary turns naturally to Jesus as to the one from whom help is to be expected; (2) she is entirely undisturbed by His reply, whatever its meaning may be; (3) she prepares the way for the miracle by her authoritative directions to the servants; (4) Jesus does actually relieve the situation by an exercise of power. Whether she turned to Jesus with distinctly Messianic expectation, or whether Jesus intended to convey a mild rebuke for her eagerness, it is not necessary for us to inquire, as it is not possible for us to determine. It is enough that her spontaneous appeal to her Son did not result in disappointment, since, in response to her suggestion or, at least, in human reaction to it, He “manifested” the glory. The incident confirms the Infancy narrative in which Mary’s quiet and forceful personality is exhibited.

In Mt 12:46 (Mk 3:31-35), we are told that, when His mother and His brethren came seeking Him, Jesus in the well-known remark concerning His true relatives in the sense intended to convey a severe rebuke to His own household for an action which involved both unbelief and presumptuous interference in His great life-work. The explanation of this incident, which involves so many important implications as have become connected with it in the popular mind, is to be found in Mark’s account. He interrupts his narrative of the arrival of the relatives (which begins in ver 21) by the account of the accusation made by the scribes from Jesus that the power of Jesus over demons was due to Beelzebub. This goes a long way toward explaining the anxiety felt by the relatives of Jesus, since the unanswerable problems were under the immediate concern of Him no chance to rest and seemed to threaten His health, was matched, contrariwise, by the bitter, malignant opposition of the authorities, who would believe any malicious absurdity rather than that His power came from God. The vital point is that the attempt of Mary and her household to get possession of the person of Jesus, in order to induce Him to go into retirement for a time, was not due to capricious and interfering unbelief, but to loving anxiety. The words of Jesus have the unqualified ring of conscious authority and express the determination of one who wills the control of his own life— but it is a serious mistake to read into them any faintest accent of satire. It has been well said by Horace Bushnell that Jesus “did not say that Jesus would scarcely make use of the family symbolism to designate the sacred relationships of the kingdom of heaven, while, at the same time, He was depreciating the value and importance of the very relationships which had formed the basis of His analogy. The real atmosphere of the incident is very different from this.

To be sure that many have misinterpreted the above incident we need only turn to the exquisitely tender scene at the cross recorded by Matthew.

4. Mary at the Cross (19:25 ff). This scene, equally beautiful, whatever one considers the relationship which it discloses as existing between Jesus and His mother, or between Jesus and His well-beloved disciple, removes all possible ambiguity which might attach to the preceding incidents, and reveals the true spirit of the Master’s home. Jesus could never have spoken as He did from the cross unless He had consistently maintained the position and performed the duties of an eldest son. The tone has almost eclipsed other tone could never have been what it is had there not been a steadfast tie of tender love and mutual understanding between Jesus and His mother. Jesus would hand over His sacred charge to the trustworthy keeping of another, because He had faithfully maintained it Himself.

The final passage which we need to consider (Acts 1:14) is esp. important, because in it we discover Mary and her household at home in the midst of the Christian community, engaged with them in prayer. It is also clear that Mary herself and the family, who seemed to be very completely under her influence, whatever may have been their earlier misgivings, never broke with the circle of disciples, and persistently kept within the range of experiences which led at last to full-orbed Christian faith. This makes it sufficiently evident, on the one hand, that the household members were of the official class among the Jews; and, on the other, that the story of Jesus passed through the same cycle of experiences which punctuated the careers of the whole body of disciples on the way to faith. The bearing of this simple but significant fact upon the historical trustworthiness of the body of incidents just passed in review is evident.
The sum of the matter concerning Mary seems to be this: The mother of Jesus was a typical Jewish believer of the best sort. She was a deeply meditative, but by no means a daring or original thinker. Her actions and words did not, and perhaps could not prepare her for the role of mother of Jesus which involved so much that was new and unexpected. But her heart was true, and from the beginning to the day of Pentecost, she pondered in her heart the many puzzling experiences until the light of truth broke in. The story of her life and of her relationship to Jesus is consistent throughout and touched with manifold unconscious traits of truth. Such a narrative could not have been feigned or faked.

6. Mary in Ecclesiastical Doctrine and Tradition

The doctrine of Mary's glorification as the object of worship and her function as intercessor: With no effort to be polemical toward Roman Catholicism, it is evident that the contrary, with every desire to be sympathetic, it is very difficult to be patient with the particularities which are evident in the writings of Roman Catholic dogmatic writers in the discussion of this group of doctrines.

(c) The doctrine of Mary's glorification as the object of worship and her function as intercessor: With no effort to be polemical toward Roman Catholicism, it is evident that the contrary, with every desire to be sympathetic, it is very difficult to be patient with the particularities which are evident in the writings of Roman Catholic dogmatic writers in the discussion of this group of doctrines.

(3) Take, for example, the apocryphal Gospel of the Infancy of Mary's status in heaven is intended. As a matter of fact, Mary, in any literal sense, is not preferred to all other mothers. Mary's motherhood along with that of the mother of Moses is very likely the basis of the figure, but the woman of the vision is the incarnation of Mary, the mother and the body of her Lord (see Milligan, Expositor's Bible, "Revelation," 1900).

Three other arguments are most frequently used to justify the place accorded to Mary in the Liturgy.

(iii) Christ's perpetual humanity leads to His perpetual Sonship to Mary. This argument, if it carries any weight at all, in this connection, implies that the glorified Lord Jesus is still subject to mother. It is, however, clear from the Gospels that the subjection to His parents which continued after the incident in the Temple (Lk 2:51) was gently but firmly laid aside at the outset of the public ministry (see above, II, 2, 8); in all that period, up to 28 out of 50 references to Mary, Mary's position is one of dependence, not of authority.

(iii) Christ's perpetual humanity leads to His perpetual Sonship to Mary. This argument, if it carries any weight at all, in this connection, implies that the glorified Lord Jesus is still subject to mother. It is, however, clear from the Gospels that the subjection to His parents which continued after the incident in the Temple (Lk 2:51) was gently but firmly laid aside at the outset of the public ministry (see above, II, 2, 8); in all that period, up to 28 out of 50 references to Mary, Mary's position is one of dependence, not of authority.

(iv) Since Mary cared for the body of Christ when He was on earth, naturally His spiritual body would be of special care to high ecclesiastics in the Church, and in later ages in Asia, Mary was, is, and must remain, a part of that body (see Acts 1:14). Unless she is sustained in her body by the special grace of the Holy Spirit, her care for the church cannot involve her universal presence in it and her accessibility to the prayers of her fellow-believers.

To a non-Romanist, the most suggestive fact in the whole controversy is that the statements can be apologetic in support of the ecclesiastical attitude toward Mary, do not, in the least degree, justify the tone of exaggereated admiration and worship, so often found in the devotionary literature of the subject (see Doedens, Modern Romanism Examined, 23 f.).

(3) Conclusion.-Our conclusion on the whole question is that the lit. of Liturgy belongs, historically, to unauthorized speculation; and psychologically, to the natural history of asceticism and clerical celibacy.

III. Mary Magdalen (Maria Magdalenæ, Maria Magdalenæ of "Magdala").—A devoted follower of Jesus who entered the circle of the taught during the Galilean ministry and became prominent in the last days. The noun "Magdala," from which the adjective "Magdalenæ" is formed, does not occur in the Gospels (the word in Mt. 15:39, is, of course, "Magdalenæ"). The meaning of this obscure reference is well supported by the expression "Magdala" in "Luke, 21:25:" "Magdala is only the Gr form of "maggâdâl" or watch-tower, one of the many places of the name in Pal" (Tristram, Bible Places, 280); and is probably represented by the squoidal group of hovels which now bears the name of Mejdil near the center of the western shore of the lake.

As she was the first to bear witness to the resurrection of Jesus, it is important that we should get a clear view of her position and character.

1. Mary not acter. The idea that she was impertinent, drawn from the life of the street, Woman of the Unabridged Encyclopedia, 1997, is undoubtedly arose, in the first instance, from a misconception of the nature of the Galilean ministry. It is altogether impossible identification of her with the woman who was a sinner of the preceding section of the Gospel. It is not to be forgotten that the malicious demon-possession, according to NT ideas (see Demon, Demonology, NT), the implications of evil temper and malignant disposition popularly associated with "having a devil." The possessed was, by Our Lord and the disciples, looked upon as diseased, the victim of an alien and evil power, not an accomplice of it. Had this always been understood and kept in mind, the unfortunate identification of Mary with the career of public prostitution would have been much less easy.

According to NT usage, in such cases the name would have been withheld (cf Lk 7:37; Jn 8:3). At the same time the statement that 7 demons had been cast out of Mary means either that the malady was of exceptional severity, possibly involving several relapses (cf Lk 11:26), or that the mode of her divided and haunted consciousness (cf Mk 5:9) suggested the use of the number 7. Even so, she was a healed invalid, not a rescued social delinquent.

The identification of Mary with the sinful woman is, of course, impossible for one who follows carefully the course of the narrative with an eye to the transitions. The woman of ch 7 is carefully covered with the concealing cloak of namelessness. Undoubtedly known by name to the intimate circle of first disciples, it is extremely doubtful whether she was so known to Luke. Her history is definitely closed at ver 50.

The name of Mary is found at the beginning of a totally new section of the Gospel (see Plummer's analysis, op. cit., xxvii), where the name of Mary is introduced with a single mark of identification, apart from her former residence, which points away from the preceding narrative and suggests some other origin. If the preceding account of the anointing were Mary's introduction into the circle of Christ's followers, she could not be identified by the phrase of Lk. Jesus did not cast a demon out of the sinful woman of ch 7, and Mary of Magdala is not represented as having anointed the Lord's feet. The two statements cannot be fitted together.

Mary has been misrepresented in another way, scarcely less serious. She was one of the very first witnesses to the resurrection, and her testimony is of sufficient importance to make it worthy for those who antagonize the narrative to discredit her. This is done, on the basis of her mysterious malady, by making her a para-noiac who was in the habit of "seeing things." Renan is the chief offender in this particular, but others have followed his example.

(2) There is more than this a priori consideration against such an interpretation of Mary. She was the first at the tomb (Mt 28:1; Mk 16:1; Lk 24:10). But she was also the last at the cross—she and her companions (Mt 27:51; Mk 15:40). A glance at the whole brief narrative of her life in the Gospels will interpret this combination of statements. Mary first appears near the beginning of the narrative of the Galilean ministry as one of a group consisting of "many" (Lk 8:3), among them Joanna, wife of Chzzas, Herod's steward, who followed with the Twelve and ministered to them of their substance. Mary then disappears from the text to reappear as one of the self-appointed watchers of the cross, thereafter to join the company of witnesses to the resurrection. The significance of these simple statements for the understanding of Mary's character and position among the followers of Jesus is not far to seek. She came into the circle of believers, marked out from the rest by an exceptional experience of the Lord's healing power. Henceforth, to the very end, with unwavering devotion, with intense and eager, undaunted courage even in the face of dangers which broke the courage of the chosen Twelve, she followed and served her Lord. It is impossible that such singleness of purpose, such strength of will, and, above all, such courage in danger, should have been exhibited by a weak, hysterical, neurotic incurable. The action of these women of whom Mary was one, in serving their Master's need while in life, and in administering the last rites to His body in death, is characteristic of woman at her best.

IV. Mary of Bethany.—Another devoted follower of Jesus. She was a resident of Bethany (Bēthânia, Býthânia), and a member of the family consisting of a much-beloved brother, Lazarus, and another sister, Martha, who made a home for Jesus within their own circle whenever He was in the neighborhood.

The one descriptive reference, aside from the above, connected with Mary, has caused no end of perplexity. John (11:2) states that it was this Mary who anointed the Lord with ointment and wiped His feet with her hair, whose brother Lazarus was sick. This reference would be entirely satisfied by the narrative of Jn 12:1-8, and no difficulty would be suggesstive with it. If the preceding account of the anointing were a reference to Mary, she could not be identified by the phrase of Lk. Jesus did not cast a demon out of the sinful woman of ch 7, and Mary of Magdala is not represented as having anointed the Lord's feet. The two statements cannot be fitted together.

Mary has been misrepresented in another way, scarcely less serious. She was one of the very first witnesses to the resurrection, and her testimony is of sufficient importance to make it worthy for those who antagonize the narrative to discredit her. This is done, on the basis of her mysterious malady, by making her a para-noiac who was in the habit of "seeing things." Renan is the chief offender in this particular, but others have followed his example.

the first time in Lk 10 38-42 in a way which clearly indicates that the family of Bethany is there mentioned for the first time (a "certain [v, or r] woman named for an alabaster vessel, and she anointed the feet of the Lord and wiped His feet with her hair."

2. Evidence of Luke

The new name of Luke indicates the introduction of a new group of names (cf Jn 11 1).

(1) The second approach of Luke designates Mary or the sinner with the sinful woman of ch 7 (cf Mt 26 6-13; Mk 14 3-9; Lk 7 36-50; Jn 12 1-8).

Our next task is to note carefully the relationship between the narratives of Mark, Matthew and John on the one hand and the account of Luke on the other.

3. Evidence by Comparison

We may effectively analyze the narratives unfolding in the following steps: (1) notes of time and place; (2) circumstances and scene of the incident; (3) description of the person who did the anointing; (4) complaints of her action, by whom and for what; (5) the action of the incident which constitutes Our Lord's defense of it; (6) incidental features of the narrative.

Under (1) notice that all three evangelists place the incident near the close of the ministry and at Bethany. Under (2) it is important to observe that Matthew and Mark place the incident in the presence of the crowd while John states vaguely that a feast was made for His friend. Under (3) we observe that Matthew and Mark say "a certain woman..." and simulate Mary designates Mary. According to John, who has his own disciples in place, according to Mark, some of those present found fault; while according to John, the Pharisees and the scribes found fault.

(4) the ground or complaint is the alleged wastefulness of the action. (5) again, according to all three, Our Lord defended the use made of the ointment by a mysterious reference to an anointing of His Lordship by the "sinner" or that His disease had manifested itself subsequent to the feast. Of these alternatives the former is the more natural (see Gou, ICC, Tischendorf, Mark, 25). The latter is the more probable, and by this occasion he coupled together with the specific mention of Lazarus as a guest, would suggest that the feast was given by people, in and about Bethany, who had especial reason to be grateful to Jesus for the exercise of His healing power.

It is beyond reasonable doubt that the narratives of Matthew, Matthew and Mark John refer to the same incident. The amount of convergence and the coherence of it, in itself an indication among the pecuniary statements. The only discrepancies of even secondary importance are a matter of a few days in the time (Gould says i and the detail as to the anointing of head or feet. It is conceivable that the circumstances may be identical.

(6) The Simon in whose house the incident is said to have taken place by Matthew and Mark designate "the.upper". This must mean either that he had previously visited or that his disease had manifested itself subsequent to the feast. Of these alternatives the former is the more natural (see Gou, ICC, Tischendorf, Mark, 25). The latter is the more probable, and by this occasion he coupled together with the specific mention of Lazarus as a guest, would suggest that the feast was given by people, in and about Bethany, who had especial reason to be grateful to Jesus for the exercise of His healing power.

4. Character of Mary

(1) At the outset of Mary it is worth mentioning that we have in the matter of these two sisters a most interesting and instructive point of contact between the synoptics and John's writings.

The underlying unity and harmony of the two are evident here as elsewhere. In Lk 10 38-42 we are afforded a view of Mary and Martha photographic in its clear revelation of them both. Martha is engaged in household affairs, while Mary is sitting at the feet of Jesus, absorbed in listening. This, of course, might mean that Mary was idle and listless, leaving the burden of responsibility for the care of guests upon her sister, a conscientious sister. Most housewives are inclined to think that Martha has been hardly dealt with. The story points to the contrary. It will be noticed that Mary makes no defence of herself and that the Master makes no criticism of Martha until the criticizes Martha's activity in a sense of any such identification. (2) The immediate surroundings are different. Simon: the leper and Simon "the Pharisee" can hardly be one person. No man could have borne both of these designations. In addition to this, it is difficult to believe that a Pharisee of Simon's temper would have entertained Jesus when once he had been proscribed by the authorities. Simon's attitude was a very natural one at the beginning of Christ's ministry, but the combination of hostility and questioning was necessarily a temporary mood. (3) The description of the same woman as sinner in the sense of Lk 7 in one Gospel, simply as a woman in two others the woman who anointed Jesus, as a mark in the third is not within the range of probability, esp. as this is no hint in John's attempt at explanation on the part of any of the writers. At any rate, prima facie, this item in Luke's description is seriously at variance with the narratives of Matthew and Mark. When he is supposed to refer to the same event, in the matter of the completeness of the Luke's account there is no complaint of the woman's action suggested. There is no hint that anybody thought of the fact that she had committed a great sin of precious material. The only complaint is Simon's, and that is directed against the Lord Himself, because He forgave her by Himself, assured that she did not swindle the woman because He did not know her character, which is the question of Our Lord's Messiahship, concerning which Simon was debating; otherwise one suspects he had little interest in the episode. This fact is, as we shall see, determinative for the understanding of the incident and puts it apart from all other similar accounts.

(2) The lesson drawn from the act by Our Lord was in each incident different. The sinful woman was commended for her faith and unhesitating and spontaneous expression of love based upon gratitude for deliverance and forgiveness. Mary was commended for an act which had a mysterious and sacramental character and was evidently a sign of her death, near at hand.

This brings us to the point where we may consider the one serious difficulty, that alleged by Mayors and others, against the hypothesis of two anointings, namely, that a repetition of an act like this, which attached would not be likely to occur. The answer to this argument is that the difficulty which arises is due to a misunderstanding of the incident. In the point of central reference the two episodes are worlds apart.

The act of anointing in the case of Mary is primary. Anointing was one of those general and prevalent acts of social courtesies which might mean much or little, this or that, and might be rated a score of times in a year with a different meaning each time. The matter of primary importance in every such case would be the purpose and motive of the anointing. By this consideration alone we may safely discount the possibility of two incidents. In the former case, the motive was to express the love of a forgiven penitent. In the latter, the motive was gratitude for something quite different, a beloved brother back from the grave, and, may we not say (in view of Jn 12 7), grief and foreboding? That Mary's feeling was expressed in the same way outwardly, as that of the sinful woman of the early ministry does not change the Martha story. If the act was different and that consequently, the condemnation she received, being for a different thing, was differently explicit; according to Mark, some of those present found fault; while according to John, the Pharisees and the scribes found fault.

In summation of our examination we are justified in saying that the account of Mary is primarily an account of Mary's anointing. In this Mary was a model of devotion and humility, and the praise bestowed upon her quite as natural and deserved. With this fictitious and embarrassing identification out of the way, we are now free to consider briefly the career and estimate the hibits an intensity of feeling of which Martha gives no sign. It is significant that, while Mary says just what she has had on her mind, the way of saying it and her manner as a whole so shades the Lord's composure that He is unable to answer her directly but addresses His inquiry to the company in general (ver 34). (3) Then we come to the events of the next chapter. The supper is given in Bethany. Martha serves. Of course she serves. She always serves when there is opportunity. Waiting on guests, plate in hand, was the innocent delight of her life. One cannot fail to see that, in a simple incidental incident, as when Mary told the apostle to let them alone (Jn 11:41) and her and Jesus were both calm, the story of Mary (Lk 10:38-42) is sketched again in lifelikeness. It is the same Martha engaged in the same task. But what of Mary in this incident? She is shown in an unprecedented rôle, strange to an oriental woman and esp. to one so retiring in disposition as Mary. Her action not only thrust her into a public place alone, but brought her under outspoken criticism. But after all, this is just what we come to expect from these deep, intense, silent natures. The Mary who sat at Jesus' feet in listening silence while Martha bustled about the house, who remained at home while Martha went out to meet Him, is the very one to hurl herself at His feet in a storm and passion of tears when she does meet Him and to break out in a self-sacrificing public act of devotion, strangely impelled to her modest disposition, however native to her deep emotion.

Martha was a good and useful woman. No one would deny that, least of all the Master who loved her. But, she lived on the surface of things, and her affections and her pious alike found adequate and satisfying expression at all times in the ordinary kindly offices of hospitality and domestic service. Not so Mary. Her disposition was inward, silent, brooding, with a latent capacity for stress and the forthwith, unconventional expression of feelings, slowly gathering intensity through days of thought and repression. Mary would never be altogether at home in the world of affairs. Hers was a rare spirit, doomed often to loneliness and misunderstanding except at the hands of rarely discerning spirits, such as she happily met in the person of her Lord.

V. Mary, the Mother of James and Jospeh.—Until it is necessary merely to recall and set in order the few facts concerning this Mary given in the Gospels (see Mt 27:55-56; 61; Mk 15:40; 16:1; Lk 24:10; cf Lk 23:49-56).

In Mt 27:55-56 (cf Mk 15:40), we are told that at the time of the crucifixion there was a group of women observing the event from a distance. These women are said to have followed Jesus from Galilee, ministering to Him and to the disciples. Among these were Mary Magdalene (see III, above); Mary, mother of James and Joseph; and the unnamed mother of Zebedee's children. By reference to Lk 8:23, where this group is first introduced, it appears that, as a whole, it was composed of those who had been healed of infirmities of one kind or another. Whether this description applies individually to Mary or not we cannot be sure, but it is altogether probable. At any rate, it is certain that Mary was one who persistently followed with the disciples and ministered of her substance to aid and comfort the Lord in His work for others. The course of the narrative seems to imply that Mary's sons accompanied their mother on this ministering journey and that one of them became an apostle. It is interesting to note that two mothers with their sons joined the company of the disciples and that three of the four became members of the apostolic company. Another item in these only too fragmentary references is that this Mary, along with her of Magdala and the others of this group, was of sufficient wealth and position to be marked among the followers of Jesus according to his particular way. The mention of Chas'ah's wife (Lk 8:3) is an indication of the unusual standing of this company of faithful women.

The other notices of Mary show her lingering late at the cross (Mk 15:40); a spectator at the burial (Mk 15:47); and among the first to bear spices to the tomb. This is the whole of this woman's biography extant, but perhaps it is enough. We are told practically nothing, directly, concerning her; but, incidentally, she is known to be generous, faithful, loving of Lk 2:19-20. Mary. She came in some way to the tomb to anoint the body of her dead Lord; she went away in joy to proclaim Him alive forevermore. A privilege to be coveted by the greatest was thus awarded to simple faith and trusting love.

VI. Mary, the Mother of John Mark.—This woman is mentioned but once in the NT (Acts 12:12), but in a connection to arouse intense interest. Since she was the mother of Mark, she was also, in all probability, the aunt of Barnabas. The aunt of one member and the mother of another of the earliest apostolic group is a woman of importance.

The statement in Acts, so far as it concerns Mary, is brief but suggestive. Professor Ramsay (see St. Paul the Traveller, etc, 385) holds that the authority for this narrative was not Peter but Mark, the son of the house. This, if true, adds interest to the story as we have it. In the first place, the fact that Peter went thither directly upon his escape from prison argues that Mary's house was a well-known center of Christian life and worship. The additional fact that coming unannounced and casually the apostle found a considerable body of believers assembled points in the same direction. That "many" were gathered in the house at the same time indicates that the house was of considerable size. It also appears that Rhoda was only one of the maids, arguing a household of more than ordinary size. There is a tradition of doubtless authenticity, that Mary's house was the scene of a still more sacred gathering in the upper room on the night of the betrayal. We conclude that Mary was a wealthy widow of Jesus, who, upon becoming a disciple of Christ, with her son, gave herself with whole-souled devotion to Christian service, making her large and well-appointed house a place of meeting for the proscribed and homeless Christian, the apostle whose benefactor and patron she thus became.

MARY, THE PASSING OF. See Apocryphal Gospels.

MASALOTH, mas'a-loth. See Mesaloth.

MASCIL, mas'kil. See Psalms.

MASH (מַשָּׁה, mash): Named in Gen 10:23 as one of the sons of Aram. In the p. passages in 1 Ch 1:17 the name is given as "Meshech" (meshekh), and the LXX (Mosoch) supports this form in both passages. "Meshech," however, is a Japhetic name (Gen 10:2), and "Mash" would seem to be the original reading. It is possibly to be identified with the Mos Maius of classical writers (Strabo, etc), on the northern boundary of Mesopotamia.

MASHAL, mā'shal (מָשָׁל, māšāl, 1 Ch 6:74). See Mishal.

MASIAS, mas'ías (A, Macias, Masias, B, Macias, Meias): The head of one of the families of Solomon's servants (1 Esd 5:34); it has no equivalent in the L Ex 2:55 ff; RV-M "Miasias."
MASMAN, mas‘man. See MAASMAS.

MASON, mas‘ū n: The tr of 4 Heb words: (1) קֶבֶר יְבֵנֶר, kārash ‘ebhen, “graver of stone” (2 S 5 11); (2) (3) רֶמֶשׁ, gādhar (2 K 12 12), רֶפֶשׁ יְבֵנֶר, hāreš, kīr (1 Ch 14 1), “maker of a wall [or hedge]”; (4) מַעֵל, hālōlah, “a hewer or digger [of stone]” (1 Ch 22 2; Ex 3 7). Lebanon still supplies the greater number of skilled masons to Pal and Syria (see 2 S 5 11), those of Shewir being in special repute. See CRAFTS, II, 8; also ARCHITECTURE; BUILDING; GEBA; HOUSE.

MASPHA, mas‘afā (1 Mc 3 46, RV “Mizpeth”). See Mizpeth, 4.

MAREKHAH, ma‘rēkā, mas‘ē ka (מַרְקָה, Marqah; Μαρκάκα, Markaka): A place mentioned in the list of ancient rulers of Edom (Gen 36 31), “before there reigned any king over the children of Israel.” Marsekah was the royal city of Samlah, son of Hadad (ver 36; 1 Ch 1 47). The name may mean “place of choice vines,” but there is nothing to show in what locality it must be sought.

MASSA, mas‘a (םָסָא, massa‘), “burden”: Descendant of Abraham through Ishmael (Gen 25 14; 1 Ch 1 30). His people may be the Masani of Pottery, having Eastern Arabia near Babylon as their habitat. The marginal reading of the heading to Prov 31 mentions Lemuel as king of Massa. If that reading is accepted, it would seem that a tribe and probably a place were named from Ishmael’s descendant. The reading is doubtful, however, for wherever the phrase recurs in Prov 30 1 (RV) it appears to be a gloss.

MASSACRE, mas‘a-kēr. OF THE INNOCENTS. See INNOCENTS, MASSACRE OF.

MASSAH AND MERIBAH, mas‘a, mer-i-bā (מַסָּה יְבֵנֶר, massāh ‘ērenbāh, “proving and striving”); παραμυθόν καὶ λοϊδόρην, peirasmōn kai lodōretes): These names occur together as applied to one place only in Ex 17 7; they stand, however, in parallelism to Dt 32 5; Ps 95 8. In all other cases they are kept distinct, as belonging to two separate narratives. The conjunction here may be due to conflation of the sources. Of course, it is not impossible that, for the reason stated, the double name, although ancient (see note on Dt 32 5; 9 22) the place is referred to as Massah. This scene is laid in Ex 17 1 at Rephidim (q.v.) and in ver 6 at Horeb (q.v.). It is near the beginning of the desert wanderings. In 1. First Instance and complaint. Moses, appealing to God, is told what to do. He takes with him the elders of Israel, and smites with his rod the rock on which the Lord stands in Horeb, whereupon water gushes forth, and the people drink. Here Moses alone is God’s agent. There is no hint of blame attaching to him. He called the place Massah and Meribah, because of the striving of the children of Israel, and because they tempted the Lord (ver 7). In some way not indicated, here and at Meribah, God put the Levites to proof (Dt 32 5). The second narrative describes what took place at Kadesh (i.e. “Kadesh-barnaa”) when the desert wanderings were nearly over (Nu 20 2. Second Instance famous spring for some reason had ceased. In their distress the people became impatient and petulant. At the door of the tent of meeting Moses and Aaron received the Lord’s instructions. In his speech of remonstrance to the people Moses seemed to glorify himself and his brother; and instead of speaking to the rock as God had commanded, he struck it twice with his rod. The flow of water was at once restored; but Moses and Aaron were heavily punished because they did not sanctify God in the eyes of the children of Israel. The “Waters of Meribah” was the name given to this scene of strife. The incident is referred to in Nu 20 24, and Dt 32 51 (merithāb kādēsh, AV “Meribah-Kadesh,” RV “Meribah of Kadesh”). In Ps 81 7 God appears as having tested Israel here. The sin of Israel and the ensuing calamity to Moses are alluded to in Ps 106 32.

The place appears in Ezk 47 10; 45 23, as on the southern border of the land of Israel, in the former as “Meriboth-kadesh,” in the latter as “Meriboth-kadesh” (Meriboth=pl. Meribath= “const. sing.”) where the position indicated is that of ‘Ain Kādāt, “Kadesh-barnea.”

In Dt 32 2, by a slight emendation of the text we might read merithāb kōdēsh for meribēth kōdēsh. This gives a preferable sense.

W. EWING

MASSIAS, ma‘śās (A, Maseías, Massias, B, Μασσίας, Massias): One of those who put away their “strange wives” (1 Eed 9 22) = “Masseiah” of Ex 10 22.

MAST. See SHIPS AND BOATS, II, 2, (3); 3.

MASTER, ma‘ster (מָסָר, masá‘ar, “master”); ἀρχιτάξτης, architastēs, ἀρχιτάξτης, architastēs, “master of the house” (Ex 22 8; Jn 19 22 23); “the master of his house” (Isa 1 8). We have it also in tr “masters of the high household” (Ecc 12 11). See ASSEMBLIES, MASTERS OF: Cf Eccles 32 1, “master of a feast,” RV “ruler”; Jn 2 9, “ruler of the feast”; rabh (Dnl 3 1, 3; 6, “shipmaster”); rabh, Aram., “great,” “mighty,” “elder” (Dnl 4 9; 6 11, “master of the magicians”), also sar, “head,” or “chief” (Ex 11 1 “tsakkamasters”); 1 Ch 15 27, “master of the song,” RV “the carrying of the ark, Heb the lifting up”); “to call,” “to awake,” is also rendered “master” in AV, “The Lord will cut off the man that doeth this, the master and the scholar,” m “him that waketh and him that answereth,” RV as AVm (Mal 2 12).

The vb. “to master” does not occur in the OT, but we have in Apos (Wis 13 18) “mastering thy power” (dēpōzōn sēchōs), RV “being sovereign over [thy] strength.”

In the NT dēpōtēs answers to ἀρχιτάξτης as master” (1 Tim 6 1 2; 2 Tim 2 21), rendered also as “Lord” (Lk 2 29, etc); kurios, is “Master,” “Lord,” “Sir,” used very frequently of God or of Christ (Mt 1 20 22 24), tr “Master” (Mt 6 24; 15 27; AV Mk 13 35; Rom 14 4, etc); kathgōthēs, “a leader,” is tr “Master” (Mt 23 8[AV], 10; didaskalos, a title very often applied to Our Lord in the Gospels, is “Teacher,” tr “Teacher” in AV Mt 8 19; Lk 3 12, etc; RV “Teacher”; also Jn 3 2 10; Jas 3 1, “be not many masters,” RV “teachers”; rabh, rabbī (“Rabbī”) (a transliterated Heb term signifying “my Teacher”) is also in several instances applied to Jesus, AV “Master” (Mt 26 25 49; Mk
MATTANAH, mat'na-na (俫anna, mattānāh; B, Məḇəšāḇəḵ, Məḇəšāḇən; A, Məḇəšāḇəḵ, Məḇəšāḇən): A station of the Israelites which seems to have lain between Beer and Nahalal (Nu 21:18 f.). The name means "gift," and might not inappropriately be applied to "the desert a gift" (Budde translates "Out of the desert a gift"); see EXPOS T, VI, 482. Some would therefore identify it with Beer. This is improbable. There is now no clue to the place, but it must have lain S.W. of the Dead Sea.

MATTANIAH, mat-a-ni'a (lässigâ, mattaŋaḏâ, "gift of Jeh; ":
(1) King Zedekiah's original name, but changed by Nebuchadnezzar when he made him king over Judah instead of his nephew Jehoiachin (2 K 24:17).
(2) A descendant of Asaph (1 Ch 9:15), leader of the temple choir (Neh 11:17; 12:8). Mentioned among the "porters," keepers of "the storehouses of the gates" (12:25), and again in ver 35 as among the "priests' sons with trumpets."
(3) May be the same as (2), though in 2 Ch 20:14 he is mentioned as an ancestor of that Jazahiel whose inspired words in the midst of the congregation encouraged Jehoshaphat to withstand the invasion of Moab, Ammon and Seir (vs 14 ff).
(4-7) Four others who had foreign wives, (a) the Matthathias of 1 Esd 9:27 (Ezr 10:26); (b) the Otholias of 1 Esd 9:28 (Ezr 10:27); (c) the Matthathias of 1 Esd 9:31 (Ezr 10:30); (d) the fourth of these in 1 Esd 9:34 AV has had his name blended into that of Mattenai, and the two appear as the composite name Mammitanemus (Ezr 10:37). He is a son of Bani.
(8) A Levite, father of Zaccur, ancestor of Hanan the under-treasurer of the Levitical offerings under Nehemiah (Neh 13:13).
(9) One of the sons of Heman the singer, whose office it was to blow the horns in the temple-service as David had appointed it (1 Ch 25:4.5). He was head of the 9th division of the 12 Levites (1 Ch 25:16), who were proficient in the Songs of Jeh (1 Ch 25:7).
(10) One of the sons of Asaph who helped Hezekiah in the fulfillment of his vow to cleanse the house of the Lord (2 Ch 29:13).

HENRY WALLACE

MATTATHA, mat'a-tha (Mattathâ, Mattathâ): Son of Nathan the son of David in the genealogy of Jesus (Lk 3:31).

MATTATHAH, mat'a-tha: RV MATTATHAH (q.v.).

MATTATHIAS, mat-a-thi'as (Matthâías, Matthâías, Matthathias). The persons of this name in the Apoc are:
(1) Mattathai the father of the Maccabees. See ASMONEANS; MACCABEES.
(2) One of the 7 who stood on Ezra's right hand as he read the law (1 Esd 8:43)="Mattithiah" of Neh 8:4.
(3) The son—probably the youngest (of 1 Macc 16:2)—of Simon the Maccabean, treacherously murdered along with his father and his brother Judas by his brother-in-law Ptolemy, son of Abubus in the stronghold of Dok near Jericho in the 177th Seleucid—155-152 BC (1 Macc 16:14).
(4) Son of Abalam, one of the two "captains of the forces" who in the campaign against Demetrius in the plain of Hazor gallantly supported Judas, enabling the latter to turn an impending defeat into a great victory (1 Macc 11:70).
(5) One of the three envoys sent by Nicanor to treat with Judas in 161 BC (2 Macc 14:19). No names of envoys are given in the account of 1 Mac 7 27 ff.

(6) One of the sons of Asen who put away his "strange wife" (1 Esd 9 33) = AV "Matthaios" = "Mattathah" of Ex 10 26.

In addition to these two of this name are mentioned in the NT:

(7) Lk 3 25, "son of Amos." S. ANGELES

MATTATHAH, mat'a-ta (יוֹדַד, mattathah): RV for "Mattathah" in AV (Ex 10 33). The same as "Mattathias" of 1 Esd 9 33, AV "Matthaios" (q.v.).

MATTENAI, mat'en-nai (יוֹדַד, mattanai, "liberal"): (1) Two who married foreign wives, one a son of Hashum (Ex 10 33; in 1 Esd 9 33 "Altanneus"); the other a son of Bani (Ex 10 37).

(3) A priest in the days of Joakim son of Jeshua (Neh 12 19), representing the house of Jiorab.

MATTER, mat'ër: This word being a very general term may express various ideas. RV therefore frequently changes the reading of AV in order to state more definitely the meaning of the context (cf. EX 1 S 16 18; 1 K 8 50; 2 S 11 19; Est 3 4; Ps 35 20; 64 5; Prov 16 20; 18 13).

Arama. occurring in the two forms Mattaios, Mathaios, and Mathaios, Mathaios, is a Gr reproduction of the Aram. Mattathah, i.e., "gift of Jeh," and equivalent to Theodore. Before his call to the apostolic office, according to Mt 9 9, his name was Levi. The identity of Matthew and Levi is practically beyond all doubt, as is evident from the predicate in Mt 10 3; and from a comparison of Mk 2 14; Lk 5 27 with Mt 9 9. St. Mark calls him "the son of Alphaeus" (Mk 2 14), although this cannot have been the Alphaeus who was the father of James the Less; for if this James and Matthew had been brothers this fact would doubtless have been mentioned, as is the case with Peter and Andrew, and also with the sons of Zebedee. Whether Jesus, as He did in the case of several others of His disciples, gave him the additional name of Matthew is a matter of which we are not informed. As he was a customs officer (τελωνας, ha telowna, Mt 9 9; Lk 5 27) in Capernaum, in Galilee, Antipas, Matthew was not exactly a Roman official, but was in the service of the tetrarch of Galilee, or possibly a subordinate officer, belonging to the class called portileores, serving under the publican, or superior officials who farmed the Roman taxes. As such he must have had some education, and doubtless in addition to the native Aram. must have been acquainted with the Gr. His ready acceptance of the call of Jesus shows that he must have belonged to that group of publicans and sinners, which in Galilee and elsewhere looked longingly to Jesus (Mt 11 19; Lk 7 34; 15 1). Just at what period of Christ's ministry he was called does not appear with certainty, but evidently not at once, as on the day when he was called (Mt 9 9, 11 14, 18; Mk 6 37). Peter, James and John are already trustworthy disciples of Jesus. Unlike the first six among the apostles, Matthew did not enter the group from among the pupils of John the Baptist. These are practically all the data furnished by the NT on the person of Matthew, and which is most likely that extra-Bib. sources is chiefly the product of imagination and in part based on the mistaken name of Matthew for Matthias (of Zahn, Introto to the NT, ch IV, n.3). Tradition states that he preached for 15 years in Par and that after his return to foreign nations, the Ethiopians, Macedonians, Syrians, Parthians and Medes being mentioned. He is said to have died a natural death either in Ethiopia or in Macedonia. The stories of the Roman Catholic church that he died the martyr death on September 21 and of the Gr church that this occurred on November 10 are without any historical basis. Clem. Alex. (Strom., iv.9) gives the explicit denial of Heracleon that Matthew suffered martyrdom.

MATTHEW, THE GOSPEL OF (σεβασμὸς κατὰ Μαθα’θαον, euvaggelion kata Matthaios [or Matthaiov, Mathaios]):

1. Name of Gospel—Unity and Integrity
2. Canonicity and Authorship
3. Relation of Gr and Aram. Gospels
4. Contents, Character and Purpose
5. Problems of Literary Relation
6. Date of Gospel

LITERATURE

The "Gospel according to Matthew," i.e. the Gospel according to the account of Matthew, stands, according to traditional, but not ent., universally, arrangement, first Gospel—among the canonical Gospels. The unity and Gospel, as will be seen below, was Integrity unanimously ascribed by the testimony of the ancient church to the apostle Matthew, though the title does not of itself necessarily imply immediate authorship. The unity and integrity of the Gospel were never in ancient times called in question. Chs 1, 2, particularly—the story of the virgin birth and childhood of Jesus—are proved by the consentient testimony of MSS, VSS, and patristic references, to have been an integral part of the Gospel from the beginning (see VIRGIN BIRTH). The omission of this section from the heretical Gospel of the Ebionites, which appears to have had some relation to our Gospel, is without significance.

The theory of successive redactions of Mt, starting with an Aram. Gospel, elaborated by Eichhorn and March (1801), and the related theories of inceptive editions of the Gospel put forth by the Tübingen school (Baur, Hilgenfeld, Köstlin, etc.), and by Bland (Bliek supposes a primitive Gr Gospel), lacks historical, literary, and patristic evidence, and are refuted by the fact that MSS and VSS know only the ultimate redaction. It is credible that the churches should quietly accept redaction after redaction, and not a word be said, or a vestige remain, of any of them?

1. Canonicity.—The apostolic origin and canonical rank of the Gospel of Mt were accepted without a doubt by the early church. Origen, in his beginning parts of the HE, VI. 21, could speak of it as the first of "the four Gospels, which alone are received without dispute by the church of God under heaven" (in Euseb., HE, VI. 25). The use of the Gospel can be traced in the Evangelion of Tertullian; most distinctly in Barnabas, who quotes Mt 23:14 in the formula, "It is written" (5). Though not mentioned by name, it was a chief source from which Justin took his data for the life and words of Jesus (cf. Westcott, Canon, 91 ff), and apostolic origin is implied in its forming part of "the Memoirs of the Apostles," "which are called Gospels," read weekly in the assemblies of the Christians (Ap. 166, etc). Its identity with our Mt is confirmed by the undisputed presence of that Gospel in the Diatessaron of Tatian, Justin's disciple. The testimony of Papias is considered below. The hesitating acceptance of the Gospel is further decisively shown by the testimonies and use made of it in the works of Irenaeus, Tertullian, Clement of Alexandria, and by its inclusion in the Muratorian Canon, the Itala, Pesh, etc. See CANON OF NT; GOSPELS.

2. Authorship.—The questions that cluster around the First Gospel have largely to do with the much-discussed and variously disputed statement concerning it found in Euseb. (HE, VI. 23), and from the much older work of Papias, entitled Interpretation of the Words of the Lord. Papias is the first who mentions Matthew by name as the author of the Gospel. His words are "Matthew composes a discourse [kerygma, logos, "words, "oracles"] in Aramaic tongue, and everyone interpreted them as he was able." Papias cannot here be referring to a book of Matthew in which only the discourses or sayings of Jesus had been preserved, but which had not any, or only meager accounts of His deeds, which imaginary document is in so many critical circles regarded as the basis of the present Gospel, for Papias himself uses the expression τὰ λόγια, τὸ λόγον, and his account of the oral preaching of Mt, "of the things said or done by Christ" (Euseb., HE, III. 24; particularly T. Zahn, Intro to NT, sec. 54, and Lightfoot, Supernatural Religion, 170 ff). Eusebius further reports that after Matthew had first labored among his Jewish compatriots, he went to other nations, and as a substitute for his oral preaching, he left to the former a Gospel written in their own dialect (III. 24). The testimony of Papias to Matthew as the author of the First Gospel is confirmed by Irenaeus (iii.3.1) and by Origen (in Euseb., HE, V. 10), and may be accepted as representing a uniform 2d-century tradition. Always, however, it is coupled with the statement that the Gospel was originally written in the Heb dialect. Hence arises the difficult question of the relation of the canonical Gr Gospel, with which alone, apparently, the fathers were acquainted, to this alleged original apostolic work.

One thing which seems certain is that whatever this Heb (Aramaic) document may have been, it was not an original form from which the present Mt arose, but either by the apostle himself, or by somebody else, as was maintained by Bengel, Thiersch, etc. and, more recently, the Gr Mt throughout bears the impress of being not a tr at all, but as having been originally written in Gr, and as being less Hebraistic in the form of thought than some other NT writings, e.g. the Apocalypse. It is generally not difficult to discover when a Gr book of this period is a tr from the Heb or Aram. That our Mt was written originally in Gr appears, among other things, from the way in which it makes use of the OT, sometimes following the LXX, sometimes going back to the Heb. Particularly in the case of Mt, this regard are 12:18-21 and 13:14-15, in which the rendering of the Alexandrian tr would have served the purposes of the evangelist, but he yet follows more closely the original text, although he adopts the LXX version of Mark better than the Heb (cf. Keil's Comm. on Mt, loc. cit.).

The external evidences to which appeal is made in favor of the use of an original Heb or Aram. Mt in the primitive church are more than elusive. Busbeius (HE, V. 10) mentions as a report (ἀνερέα, ἀληθετῇ) that Pantaenus, about the year 170 AD, found among the Jewish Christians, probably of South Arabia, a Gospel of Mt in Heb, left there by Bartholomew; and Jerome, while in the Syrian Horeon, had occasion to examine such a work, which he found in use among the Apostles, or in the Nazarenes, current among the Nazarenes and Ebionites (De Vir. Illustr., iii; Contra Pelag., iii.2; Comm. on Mt 12:15, etc; see GOSPEL ACCORDING TO THE NAB). For this reason the references of Irenaeus, Origen, Eusebius to the Heb Gospel of Mt are by many scholars regarded as referring to this Heb Gospel which the Jewish Christians employed, and which they thought to be the work of the evangelist (cf. more detailed RE, XI, 7, "Matthæi des Apostol. Evangelii Hebræi, oder the Hebrew Mt was to which Papias refers (assuming it to have had a real existence) must, with our present available means, remain an unsolved riddle, as also the possible connection between the Gr and Heb texts. Attempts like those of Zahn, in his Commentarius on Mt, to explain readings of the Gr text through an inaccurate understanding of the imaginary Heb origin are arbitrary and unreliable.

There remains, of course, the possibility that the apostle himself, or some disciple of the apostle (or Godet), produced a Gr recension of an earlier Aram. work.

The prevailing theory at present is that the Heb Matthewean document of Papias was a collection mainly of the discourses of Jesus which, in variant Gr translations, was used both by the author of the Gr Mt and by the evangelist Luke, thus explaining the common features in these two gospels. (W. C. Allen, however, in his Crit. and Exeg. Comm. on Mt, disputes Luke's use of this supposed common source, Intro, xiv. 6). The use of this supposed Matthewean source is thought to explain how the Gr Gospel came to be named after the apostle. It has already been remarked, however, that there is no good reason for supposing that the "Louda" of Papias was confined to discourses. See further on "sources." Below.

(1) Contents and character.—As respects contents, the Gospel of Mt can be divided into 3 chief parts: (1) preliminary, including the birth and early youth of the Lord (chs 1-2); (2) the life and ministry of Jesus in and Galilee (chs 3-18); (3) the activity of Jesus in Judaea and Jerusalem, followed by His passion, death, and resurrection (chs 19-28). In character, the Gospel, like those of the other evangelists, is only a chorismathic, a collection from the great mass of oral tradition concerning the doings and sayings of Christ current in apostolic and early Christian circles, chosen for the special purpose which the evangelist had in view. Accordingly, there is a great deal of material in Mt in common with Mk and Lk, although not a little of this material, too, is individualistic in character, and of a nature to vex and perplex the harmonist, as e.g. Matthew's accounts of the temptation, of the demoniacs at Gadara, of the blind man at Jericho (4 1-5; 20 1-13) and of the sheep. There is much more also in this Gospel that is peculiar to it. Such are the following pericopes: chs 1, 2; 9 27-36; 10 15, 37-40; 11 28-30; 12 11.12.15—21.33-38—13 24—30.36-62; 14 28-31; 16 17-19; 17 24-27; 18 11-12; 19 10-12; 20 1-16; 21 10.14-16.28-32; 22 1-14; 23 8-22; 24 42-45; 27 3—10.62-66—28 11 ff. The principle of arrangement of the material is not chronological, but rather that of similarity of material. The addresses and parables of Jesus are reported consecutively, although they may have been spoken at different times, and material scattered in the other evangelists—esp. in Lk—is found combined in Mt. Instances are seen in the Sermon on the Mount (chs 5—7), the "mission address" (ch 10), the seven parables of the Kingdom of God (ch 13), the discourses and parables (ch 15) the woes against the Pharisees (ch 23), and the grand eschatological discourses (chs 24, 25) (cf with || in the other gospels, on the relation to which, see below).

(2) Purpose.—The special purpose which the writer had in view in his Gospel is nowhere expressed, as is done, e.g., by the writer of the Fourth Gospel in Jn 20 30.31, concerning his book, but it can readily be gleaned from the general contents of the book, as also from specific passages. The traditional view that Matthew wrote primarily to prove that in Jesus of Nazareth is to be found the full-filment and realization of the Messianic predictions of the OT prophets and seers is beyond a doubt correct. The fact that the proof passages in Mt from the OT, in connection even with the minor details of Christ's career, such as His return from Egypt (2 15), is ample evidence of this fact, although the proof manner and proof value of some of these passages are exegetical cruces, as indeed is the whole way in which the OT is cited in the NT (see Quotations, NT).

The question as to whether the Gospel was written for Jewish Christians, or for Jews not yet converted, is of great importance, as was the case probably with the Ep. of Jas, was written at that transition period that when the Jewish and the Christian communions were not yet fully separated, and still worshipped together. The questions are as to the purposes of the Gospel are met with at the beginning and throughout the whole work; e.g. it is obvious in 1 1, where the proof is furnished that Jesus was the son of Abraham, in whom all families of the earth were to be blessed (Gen 12 3), and of David, who was to establish the kingdom of God forever (2 S 7). The genealogy of Lk, on the other hand (3 23 ff), with its cosmopolitan character and purpose, aiming to show that Jesus was the Redeemer of the whole world, leads to the conclusion that he was the ancestor of all mankind. Further, as the genealogy of Mt is evidently that of Joseph, the foster and legal father of Jesus, and not that of Mary, as is the case in Lk, the purpose to meet the demands of the Jewish reader is transparent. The full account in Mt of the Sermon on the Mount, which does not, as is sometimes said, contain a "new program of the kingdom of God"—indeed does not contain the fundamental principles of the Gospel at all—but is the deeper and truly Bib. interpretation of the Law over against the superficial interpretation of the current Pharissim, which led the advocates of the latter in all honesty to declare, "What lack I yet?" given with the design of driving the auditors to the gospel of grace and faith proclaimed by Christ (of Gal 3 24)—all this is only intelligible when we remember that the book was written for Jewish readers. Again the γεραποτα, γεραποτα—i.e. the fulfilment of OT Scripture, a matter which for the Jew was everything, but for the Gentile was of little concern. In Mt, too, there is much more also in this Gospel that is peculiar to it. Such are the following pericopes: chs 1, 2; 9 27-36; 10 15, 37-40; 11 28-30; 12 11.12.15—21.33-38—13 24—30.36-62; 14 28-31; 16 17-19; 17 24-27; 18 11-12; 19 10-12; 20 1-16; 21 10.14-16.28-32; 22 1-14; 23 8-22; 24 42-45; 27 3—10.62-66—28 11 ff. The principle of arrangement of the material is not chronological, but rather that of similarity of material. Mk, in its existing or some earlier form, and the problematical original Mt (Q), constitute the basis of our common Gospel.

In proof of this, it is pointed out that nearly the whole of the narrative-matter of Mk is taken up into Mt, as also into Lk, while the large sections, chiefly discourses, common to Mt and Lk are, as already said, a point to a source of that character which both used. Then, it is asked when the teaching was preserved in detail, and explanation is sought of the variations in phrasing, order, sometimes in conception, in the respective gospels.

Despite the prestige which this theory has attained, the true solution is probably a simpler one. Matthew no doubt secured the bulk of his data from his own experience and from oral tradition, and as the former existed in fixed forms, due to catechetical instruction, in the early church, it is possible to explain the similarities of Mt with the other two synoptics on this ground alone, without resorting to any literary dependence, either of Mt on the other two, or of these, or either of them, on Mt. The whole problem is purely speculative and subjective and under present conditions justifies a cui bono? as far as the vast literature which it has called into existence is concerned.

According to early and practically universal tradition Mt wrote his Gospel before the other three, and the place assigned to it in
6. Date of NT literature favors the acceptance of Gospel of this tradition. Irenæus reports that it was written when Peter and Paul were preaching in Rome (ii.1), and Euseb. states that this was done when Matthew left Pal and went to preach to others (HE, III, 24). Clement of Alexandria is responsible for the statement that the presbyters who succeeded each other from the beginning declared that "the gospels containing the genealogies [Mt and Lk] were written first" (Euseb., HE, VI, 14). This is, of course, fatal to the current theory of dependence on Mk, and is in consequence rejected. At any rate, there is the best reason for holding that the book must have been written before the destruction of Jerusalem in 70 AD (cf. 24. 15. The most likely date for the Gr Gospel is in the 7th Christian decade. Zahn claims that Matthew wrote his Aram. Gospel in Pal in 62 AD, while the Gr text dates from 85 AD, but this latter date is not probable.

MATTHEW, ma-thi'as (Mabthás, Matthías, or Maßías, Mathías; Mabh, Mattityah, "given of Jehovah"). Matthias was the one upon whom the lot fell when he, along with Joseph Barsabas, was put forward to fill up the place in the apostleship left vacant by Judas Iscariot (Acts 1:15-26). This election was held at Jerusalem, and the meeting was presided over by St. Peter. The conditions demanded of the candidates were that they should "have been with us all the time that the Lord Jesus went in and went out among us, beginning from the baptism of John, unto the day that he was received up from us," and that the one chosen should be a witness with Peter and John and James of his resurrection (Acts 1:21,22). The mode of procedure was by lot, and with prayer was the election made (cf Acts 1:24).

Hilgenfeld identifies Matthias with Nathanael (of Nathanael). He was traditionally the author of the "Gospel of Matthias," a heretical work referred to by Origen (Hom. in Lk. 1), by Eusebius (HE, III, 25, 6) and by Hieronymus (Proem in Matth.). No trace of it is left. The gnostic Basilides (c. 133 AD) and his son Isidor claimed to ground their doctrine in the "Gospel of Basilides" on the teaching Matthias received directly from the Saviour (Hippol., vii.20) (cf Hennecque, Neustamentliche Apokryphen, 167). Various parts of the apocryphal "Contendings of the Apostles" deal with the imprisonment and blinding of Matthias by the Ethiopian cannibals, and his rescue by Nathanael (cf. Budge, Contendings of the Apostles, II, 163, 164, 267-88; see also Andrew). According to the Martyrdom of St. Matthias (Budge, II, 289-94) he was sent to Damascus, and died at Phalæon, a city of Judæa. Other sources mention Justinus as the place of Matthias' ministry and burial.

MATTHIAH, mat-i-thi'a (Matthew), Mattityah, or "Matt'éthiáh, "gift of Jehesh").

(1) The Matthish of Neh 4:4 (1st spell) was one of those who stood over Ezra's right hand while he read the law (cf 1 Esd 9:32). He was the individual set over "things that were baked in pана " (1 Ch 9:31).

(2) One of those appointed by David to minister before the ark, and to "celebrate and to thank and praise Jeh, the God of Israel" (1 Ch 16:43).

(3) One of those who had foreign wives (Ex 10:43). In 1 Esd 9:35, "Mashitas,"

(4) One of the Levites who ministered before the ark with harps (1 Ch 15:18-21; 25:3-21, 2d spelling).

MATTOCK, mat'ok: The tr of 3 Heb words: (1) יָדוֹק, mahărēshāh, probably "a pickaxe" (1 S 18:20; cf ver 21 m); (2) רֶפֶשׁ, hereh, "sword," "axe," "toel" (2 Ch 34:6 AV, "with their mattocks," AVm "mauls, RV "in their ruins," RV "with their axes"); (3) מַפִיק, maphēq, "a hoe," "rake," "chopping instrument" (Isa 7:25). Vines were usually grown on terraces on the hills of Pal, and then the mattock was in constant use. The usual mattock is a pick with one end broad, the other pointed.

MAUL, mōl (מַפִיק, mōphēq, lit. "a breaker," "a club," "mace," "mattock"): A smashing weapon like the oriental war-club or the clubs always carried by the shepherds of Lebanon (Prov 25:18; cf Jer 51:20).

MAUZZIM, mōz'ēm, mots'ēm (מַפְזַיִם, māzzi'ēm, "places of strength," "fortresses"): Many conjuncts as to the meaning of this word and its context (Dnl 11:38; cf vs 19.39) have been made. The LXX (uncertainly), Theodotion, and the Gr Gospels render it as a proper name. Theodoret adopted Theodotion's reading and explained it as "Antichrist!" Grotius thought it a corruption of Αἰτία, Aitzos, the Phoen war-god, while Calvin saw in it the "god of wealth!" Perhaps the buzz of conjectures about the phrase is owing to the fact that in the next passage responsible, this is preceded by Ἐλθώ, meaning God. The context of the passage seems clearly to make the words refer to Antiochus Epiphanes, and on this account some have thought that the god Mars—who corresponds to the antichrist—was here referred to. All this is, however, little better than guesswork, and the RV tr, by setting the mind upon the general idea that the monarch referred to would trust in mere force, gives us, at any rate, the general Maw, mō (םֹ, kōbhāh [ṣ̂, kōbhāh, Nu 25 8; ἱ, kōrēs; LXX ἑνυστρόν, ἑνυστρόν]: The first word means the maw or stomach of ruminants. It is derived from a root designating "hollowed out." It is mentioned alongside of the shoulder and the two cheeks of ox and sheep, which are the priest's share of any sacrifice brought by Israelites (Dt 18 3). LXX, where ἑνυστρόν corresponds to Attic ἑνυστρόν, denotes the fourth stomach or abomasum, which was considered as a delicacy, and was almost a national dish of the Athenians, just as tripe is of the Londoners. The parallel form kōbhāh is used for the body of a woman, which is being transfused by a sperm thrust in Nu 25 8. The last word ἑρή is found in a metaphorical sense: "[Nebuchadnezzar] hath, like a monster, swallowed me up, he hath filled his maw with my delicacies" (Jer 51 34).

Mazzitias, maz-i'ıes (A, Maazōs, Mazzitias, B, Zviras, Zeitiis): One of those who had taken "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 35), identical with Mattithiah (Est 10 43).

Mazzaloth, maz'a-loth (The Planets). See Astronomy, 9.

Mazzaroth, maz'a-roth: The 12 constellations of the Zodiac. See Astronomy, II, 12.

Mazzebah, mas'e'ba, mase'ba. See Pillar.

Meadow, med’ō: (1) רָעֵד, ārāh, "the meadows [AV "paper reeds"] by the Nile" (Isa 19 7; ῥᾶρα, ma'arēh-qābah'; AV "meadows of Gibeath," RV "Maarch-geba," RVm "the meadow of Geba, or Gibeath" (Jgs 20 33); from רָעַד, ārāh, "to be naked"; of Arab. عَرَأ, ariya, "to be naked," ārā'd, "a bare tract of land." Ārāh and ma'arēh signify tracts bare of trees. (2) נַחַל, ădāh, in Pharaoh's dream of therine, AV "meadow," RV "reed grass" (Gen 41 21, 18). Ādāh is found also in Job 8 11, AV and RV "flag," RVm "reed-grass." According to Gesenius, ădāh is an Egyp word denoting the vegeartion of marshy ground. (3) עֵרָבָן, ăbēl k'rānim, "Abel-cheramin;" RVm "The meadow of vineyards," AV "the plain [AVm "Abel"] of the vineyards" (Jgs 11 33); "Abel-beth-maacah" (1 K 16 20; 2 K 16 29; cf 2 S 20 14.15.18); "Abel-shittim" (Nu 33 49; cf 25 1; Josh 2 1; 3 1; Jgs 7 22; Joel 3 18; Mic 6 5); "Abel-meholah" (Jgs 7 22; 1 K 4 12; 19 16); "Abel-maim" (2 Ch 16 4); "Abel-mizraim" (Gen 50 11); "stone," AV "Abel," RVm "Abel," that is "meadow" (1 S 6 18); cf Arab. عَلِيّ, "abal, "green grass," and عَلْبَات, "abalat, "unhealthy marshy ground," from عَلَة, wabāl, "to rain." Meals, mēl, MEAL-TIME: Bread materials, bread-making and baking in the Orient are dealt with under Bread (q.v.). For food-stuffs in use among the Hebrews in Bible times more specifically see Food. This article aims to be complementary, dealing esp. with the methods of preparing and serving food and times of meals among the ancient Hebrews.

The Book of Jgs gives a fair picture of the early formative period of the Heb people and their ways of living. It is a picture of semi-savagery—of the life and customs of free desert tribes. In I S we note a distinct step forward, but the domestic and cultural life is still low and crude. When they are settled in Pal and come in contact with the most cultured people of the day, the case is different. Most that raised these Sem invaders above the dull, crude existence of fellahin, in point of civilisation, was due to the people for whom the land was named (Macalister, Hist of Civilization in Pal.). From that time on various foreign influences played their several parts in modification of Heb life and customs. A sharp contrast illustrative of the primitive beginnings and the growth of luxury in Israel in the preparation and use of foods may be seen by a comparison of 2 S 17 28 f with 1 K 4 22 f.

1. Methods of Preparing Food:—The most primitive way of using the cereals was to pluck the fresh ears (Lev 23 14; 2 K 4 42), remove the husk by rubbing (cf Dt 23 25 and Mt 12 1), and eat the grain raw. A practice common to all periods, observed by fellahin today, was to parch or roast the ears and eat them unground. Later it became customary to grind the grain into flour, at first by the rudimentary method of pestle and mortar (Nu 11 8; cf Prov 27 22), later by the hand-mill (Ex 11 5; Job 31 10; cf Mt 24 41), still later in mills worked by the ass or other animal (Mt 18 6), lit. "a mill-
Lentils, several kinds of beans, and a profusion of vegetables, wild and cultivated, were prepared and eaten in various ways. The lentils were sometimes roasted, as they are today, and eaten like "parched corn." They were sometimes stewed like beans, and flavored with onions and other ingredients, no doubt, as we find done in Syria today (cf. Gen 29 24). Another simple way of preparing the grain was to soak it in water, then boil it slightly, and after draining and crushing it, to serve it as the dish called "groats" is served among western peoples.

Soaking the dough preparatory to baking was done doubtless, as it is now in the East, by pressing it between hands or by passing it from hand to hand; except that in Egypt, as the monuments show, it was put in "basket" and trodden with the feet, as goats "grate." (This is done in Paris bakeries to this day.) See Bread; Food.

3. Meat

Roasting was much in vogue, indeed it was probably the oldest of all methods of preparing such food. At first raw meat was laid upon hot stones from which the embers had been removed, as in the case of the "cake baked on the hot stones" (1 K 19 6 RVm; cf. Hos 7 5, "a cake not turned"), and sometimes without a covering of ashes or "coals." The fish that the disciples found prepared for them by the Sea of Galilee (Jn 21 9) was, in exception to this rule, cooked on the live coals themselves. A more advanced mode of roasting was by means of a spit (cf. Gen 29 24), and sometimes around, see Foon). Boiling was also common (see Gen 25 29; Ex 12 9, etc., ARV; EV more frequently "seething," "soaked," "sodden," as it is in the more primitive parts of Syria today. The pots in which the food was done were of earthenware or bronze (Lev 6 28). When the meat was boiled in more water than was required for the ordinary "stew" the result was the "broth" (Je 6 19 f), and the meat and the broth might then be served separately.

The usual way, however, was to cut the meat into pieces, larger or smaller as the case might demand (1 S 2 17; Ezek 24 3 f; cf. Micah's metaphor, 3 3), and put these pieces into the cooking-pot with water sufficient only for a stew. Vegetables and rice were generally added, though crushed wheat sometimes took the place of the rice, as in the case of the "savory meat" which Rebekah prepared for her husband from the "two kics of the goats" (Gen 27 9). The seeds of certain leguminous plants were also often prepared by boiling (Gen 25 29; 2 K 4 38). The Heb housewives, we may be sure, were in such matters in no way behind their modern kindswomen of the desert, of whom Doughty tells: "The Arab housewives make savory messes of any grain, seething it and putting thereto only a little salt and some [clarified] butter."

Olive oil was extensively and variously used by the ancient Hebrews, as by most eastern peoples then, as it is now. (a) Oriental cooking diverses here more than at any other point from that of the northern and western peoples, oil serving many of the purposes of butter and lard among ourselves. (b) Oil was used in cooking vegetables as we use bacon and other animal fats, and in cooking fish and eggs, also in the finer sorts of baking. See Bread; Food; Oil. (c) They even mixed oil with the flour, shaped it into cakes and then baked it (Lev 2 4). The "little oil" of the poor widow of Zerophath was clearly not intended for the lamp, but to bake her pitiful "handful of meal" (1 K 17 12). (d) Again the cake of unmixed flour might be baked till almost done, then smeared with oil, sprinkled with anise seed, and brought by further baking to a glossy brown. A species of thin flat cakes of this kind are "the wafers anointed with oil" of Ex 29 2, etc. (e) Oil and honey constituted, as now in the East, a mixture used as we use butter and honey, and are found also mixed in the making of sweet cakes (Ezk 16 13). The taste of the manna is said in Ex 16 31 to be like that of "wafters made with honey," and in Nu 11 8 to be like "the taste of cakes baked with oil" (RVm).

II. Meals, Meal-Time, etc.—(1) It was customary among the ancient Hebrews, as among their contemporaries in the East in classical lands, to have but two meals a day. The "morning meal" or "early snack," as it is called in the Talm, taken with some relish like olives, oil or melted butter, might be used by peasants, fishermen, or even artisans, to "break their fast," and serve as a temporary substitute to it in the NT in 21 12,15, but this was not a true meal. It was rather ἄρατος πρωίνος, αρίστο κρόνος (Robinson, BRP, II, 18), though some think it the ἄρατος, αρίστον, of the NT (Eichersheim, LTJM, II, 205, n. 3; cf. Plummer, ICC, on Lk 11 37). To "eat a meal," i.e. a full meal, in the morning was a matter for grave reproach (Eccl 10 16), as early drinking was unusual and a sign of degradation (cf. Acts 2 15).

(2) The first meal (of "meal-time," lit. "the time of eating," Ruth 2 14; Gen 43 16), according to general usage, was taken at or about noon when the climate and immemorial custom demanded a rest from labor. Peter's intended meal at Joppa, interrupted by the appearance of Cornelius, was at "the sixth hour," i.e. 12 M. It corresponded somewhat to our modern "luncheon," but the hour varied according to rank and occupation (Shabbath 10a). The Bedouin take it about 9 or 10 o'clock (Burchardt, Notes, I, 60). It is described somewhat fully by Lane in Modern Egyptians. To abstain from this meal was accounted "fasting" (Jgs 20 26; 1 S 14 24). Drummond (Tropical Africa) says his Negro bearers began the day's work without food.

(3) The second and main meal (NT, δείπνον, δείνομον) was taken about the set of sun, or a little before or after, when the day's work was over and the laborers "came in from the field" (Lk 17 7; 24 29 f). This is the "supper time," the "great supper" of Lk 14 16, the important meal of the day, when the whole family was together for the evening (Bureckhardt, Notes, I, 69). It was the time of the feeding of the multitudes by Jesus (Mk 6 35; Mt 14 15; Lk 9 12), of the eating of the Passover, and of the partaking of the Lord's Supper. According to Jewish law, and for special reasons, the chief meal was at midday—"at the sixth hour" according to Jos (Vita, 54; cf Gen 43 16-25; 2 S 24 15 LXX). It was Jeç's promise to Israel that they should have "bread" in the morning and "flesh" in the evening (Ex 16 12), incidenty evidence of one way in which the evening meal differed from that at noon. At this family meal ordinarily there was but one common dish for all, into which all "dipped the sop" (see Mt 26 23; Mk 14 20), so that when the food, cooked in this common stew, was set before the household, the member of the household who had prepared it had no further work to do, a fact which helps to explain Jesus' words to Martha, "One dish alone is needful" (Lk 10 42; Hastings DCG, s.v. "Meals").

(4) Sabbath banqueting became quite customary among the Jews (see examples by Lightfoot, Hor. Heb et Talm on Lk 14 1; cf Edersheim, LJTJM, II, 52, 437; Farrar, Life of Christ, II, 119, n.). Indeed it was carried to such an excess that it became proverbial for luxury. But the principle which lay at the root of the custom was the honor of the Sabbath (Lightfoot, op. cit., III, 149), which may explain Jesus' countenance and use of the custom (cf Lk 7 36; 11 37; 14 7-14), and the fact that the last Sabbath He spent on earth before His passion He was the chief guest at such a festive meal (Jn 12 2). It is certain that He made use of such occasions to teach lessons of charity and religion, in one case even when His host was inclined to indulge in discourteous criticism (Lk 7 39; 11 38,45 f; cf Jn 12 7 f). He seems to have withheld His formal disapproval of what might be wrong in tendency in such feasts because of the latent possibilities for good He saw in them, and so often used them wisely and well. It was on one of these occasions that a fellow-guest in His enthusiasm broke out in the exclamation, "Blessed is he that shall eat bread in the kingdom of God" (Lk 14 15), referring evidently to the popular Jewish idea that the Messianic kingdom was to be ushered in with a banquet, and that feasting was to be a chief part of its glories (cf Isa 25 6; Lk 13 29). See BANQUET.

III. Customs at Meals.—In the earliest times the Hebrews took their meals sitting, or more probably squatting, on the ground like the Bedawi and fellahin of today (see Gen 37 25, etc.), with the legs gathered tailor-fashion (PEFS, 1905, 124). The use of seats naturally followed upon the change from nomadic to agricultural life, after the conquest of Canaan. Saul and his messmates sat upon "seats" (1 S 20 25), as did Solomon and his court (1 K 10 5; cf 13 20, etc.). With the growth of wealth and luxury under the monarchy, the custom of reclining at meals gradually became the fashion. In Amos' day it was regarded as an aristocratic innovation (Am 3 12; 6 4), but two centuries later Ezekiel speaks of "a stately bed" or "couch" (cf Est 1 6 RV) with "a table prepared before it" (Ezek 23 41), as if it was not so novel. By the end of the 6th cent. BC it was apparently universal, even among the very poor (Jth 12 15; Tob 2 1). Accordingly, "sitting at meat" in the NT (EV) is everywhere replaced by "reclining" (RVm), though women and children still sat. They leaned on the left elbow (Sir 41 19), eating with the right hand (see Lord's Supper). The various words used in the Gospels to denote the bodily attitude at meals, as well as the circumstances described, all imply that the Syrian custom of reclining on a couch, followed by Greeks and Romans, was in vogue (Edersheim, I, 207). Luke uses one word for it which occurs nowhere else in the NT (καταλαθημεν, καταλιθημεν, 7 36; 14 8; 24 30; and καταλαθομεν, καθαλυθεμεν, 9 14,15), which Hobart says is the medical term for laying patients or causing them to lie in bed (Medical Language of Luke, 69). For costumes and customs at more elaborate feasts see BANQUET; DRESS. For details in the "minor morals" of the dinner table, see the classical passages (Sir 31 12-18; 33 3-12), MEAN, mēn: The noun "meaning" (Dan 8 15 AV, RV "I sought to understand"; and 1 Cor 14 11) is synonymous with "signification," but in 1 Mac 16 4 AV it expresses "purpose" (RV "I am minded to land"). The noun "mean" in Heb always occurs in the pl., and is generally used in the sense of "agency," "instrument" (cf 1 K 10 29, etc). RV very frequently changes AV: Wisd 8 18, "because of her." 2 Thess 2 3, "in any wise"); Lk 8 36, "how"; Prov 6 20, "on account of"); Rev 13 14, "by reason of" (cf also 2 Thess 3 16; Jn 9 21). He 9 15 (AV "that by means of death") tr* lit. "that a death having taken place," from γινώμαι, γινόμαι, "to become," "to happen," Acts 18 21 AV, "I must by all means keep this feast," is omitted in RV in harmony with several curvatures, the Vulg, and some other VSS.

The adj. "mean" is used in the sense of "common," "humble" ('ני, 'adelphia, "man"); of Isa. 2 9; 5 15; 31 8 omits “mean”). It is also used in the sense of “obscene” (Prov 22 20, תַּשָּׁהְק, “obscene”; בָּקָשׁו, בָּקָשׁו, lit. “without a mark,” “unknown,” Acts 21 39). “Mean” is found in expressions like “in the meanwhile” (AV 1 K 18 45, RV “little while”; Jn 4 31; Rom 2 15, RV “one with another”); “in the mean time” (1 Cor 11 41 AV; Lk 12 1); and “in the mean season” AV (1 Macc 11 14; 16 15). The adverb “meanly” is found (2 Macc 15 38) in the sense of “moderately.”

The vb. “mean” expresses purpose (Isa 3 15; 10 7; Gen 50 20, etc.). In some cases RV renders lit. tr. Acts 27 2, “was about to sail” (AV “meaning to sail”); cf. Acts 21 13; 2 Cor 8 13. In other instances the idea of “to mean” is “to signify,” “to denote” (1 S 4 6; Gen 21 29; Mt 9 13, etc.). Lk 15 26 tr. lit. “what these things might be.” In Ex 12 28 the sense of “mean ye” is “to have in mind.”

MEANI, me-h’nl: AV—RV “Meani” (1 Esd 5 31).

MEARAH, mē-kē’rah (מֶּכֶּרֶא, mēʾarōh; omitted in LXX): A town or district mentioned only in Joel 13 4, as belonging to the Zidonians. The name as it stands means “cave.” If that is correct it may be represented by the modern village Mogheriyeh, “little cave,” not far from Sidon. Perhaps however, we should find in the word the name of a Sidonian city, or the prep. me, that has suffered change in transcription. LXX reads “from Gaza”; but Gaza is obviously too far to the S.

MEASURE, mezh’hur, MEASURES: Several different words in the Heb and Gr are rendered by “measure” in AV. Acts Job 11 2;Jer 13 23 it stands for הָלִיל, medh, mēddah, and it is the usual rendering of the vb. תָּמִדְד, māḏadh, “to measure,” i.e. “stretch out,” “extend,” “spread.” It is often used to render the words representing particular measures, such as ephah (Dt 25 14.15; Prov 20 10; Mic 6 10); or kor (1 K 4 22; 5 12 [5 2 and 5 25 Heb text]; 2 Ch 2 10 [Heb text 2 9]; 27 5; Ezr 7 27); or seah (Gen 13 6; 1 S 25 18; 1 K 18 32; 2 K 7 1 16.18); or χρυσός, χρυσός, “cubit” (Lk 16 6). For these terms see WEIGHTS and MEASURES. It also renders equivalent, “measure of length” (Ex 26 2); תַּמִידָה, mēʾerōh, a liquid measure (Lev 19 35; 1 Ch 25 29; Ezek 4 14 16); עַמִי, mīḥāy, “judgment” (Jer 50 11; 46 48); יָפְנֵי, yoʾē dāh, a word of uncertain meaning, perhaps derived from seah (Isa 27 5); וֹקֶה, skālah, “threefold, large measure” (Ps 80 5 [Heb text ver 6]; Isa 40 12); דָּק, ḏākēn, and דַּקָה, ḏākēn, “weight” and that which is weighed, taken as measure (Ezk 45 11). In Isa 5 14 it stands for הָלִיל, “limit.” In the NT, besides being the usual rendering of the vb. μέτρον, métron, and of the noun μέτρον, métron, it is used for χορδή, χορδή, a dry measure containing about a quart (Rev 6 6).

H. PORTER

MEASURING LINE (טֶלֶת, ṭelēṯ, תַּנֵא, tannōh): The usual meaning is simply line, rope or cord, as in Isa 28 10.13, but the line was used for measurement, as is evident from such passages as 1 K 7 23; Job 38 5; Jer 31 39. Whether the line for measuring had a definite length or not we have no means of knowing. In Isa 44 13 it refers to the line used by the carpenter in marking the timber on which he is working, and in Zec 1 16 it refers to the builder’s line.

MEASURING REED (תיּנָא, tannōh, תַּנְנָא see “known”); kālāmos, kalamos): Used in Ezek 40 5 ff; 42 16; 45 1; Rev 11 1; 21 15.16. The length of the reed used in Zech 3:8; 10:2; 11:3, etc. can be variable. The average reed cubit and a palm, i.e. the large cubit of 7 palms, or about 10 ft. See CUSS. Originally it was an actual reed used for measurements of considerable length, but came at last to be used for a measure of definite length, as indicated by the reference in Ezek (cf. “pole” in Eng. measures).

MEAT, mēt (בְּרֵס, brēs, בְּרֵסָה, brēsaḥ, brōsia): In AV used for food in general, e.g. “I had my meat of herbs” (2 Esd 12 51); “his disciples were gone away into the city to buy meat” (RV “food”) (Jn 4 8). The Eng. word signifies whatever is eaten, whether of flesh or other food.

MEAT OFFERING. See SACRIFICE.

MEBUANNI, mē-būn’ni, mē-būn’ni (מְבוּנָנָי, mēbūnannay, “well-built”): One of David’s “braves” (2 S 23 27). In 2 S 21 18 he is named “Sibbechai” (RV “Sibbceai”), and is there mentioned as the slayer of a Phil. giant. The RV spelling occurs in 1 Ch 11 29, the AV “Sibbcheai” in 20 4 (cf. 2 S 23 18); and in 1 Ch 27 11 the RV spelling recurs, where this person is mentioned as captain of the 8th course of the 12 monthly courses that served the king in rota. Scribal error, and the similarity in Heb spelling of the two forms accounts for the difference in spelling. RV consistently tries to keep this right.

HENRY WALLACE

MECHERATHITE, mē-kē’raṭh-īt (מְכֶרֶאָתִי, mēkērāṭhi, “dweller in Mecherah”): Possibly this is a misunderstanding of “Maachathite” (AV). It is the description given by Hipher, one of David’s valiant men (1 Ch 11 36).

In the parallel list of 2 S 23, esp. ver 34, the “Maachathite” is mentioned without name in the place in the list given to Hipher in 1 Ch 11 36. The variations do not destroy the conviction that the list is virtually the same.

MECONAH, mē-kō’na (מְכּוֹנָה, mēkonah; Mēxōn, Machnō, Machnā): A town apparently in the neighborhood of Ziklag, named only in Neh 11 28, as reoccupied by the men of Judah after the Captivity. It is not identified.

MEDAB, med’a-ba: The Gr form of “Medeba” in 1 Macc 9 36.

MEDAD, mē-dād (מְדָד, mēdād, “affectionate”): One of the 70 elders on whom the spirit of the Lord came in the days of Moses enabling them to prophesy. Medad and one other, Eldad, began to prophesy in the camp, away from the other elders who had assembled at the door of the tabernacle to hear God’s message. Joshua suggested that Eldad and Medad be stopped, but Moses interceded on their behalf, saying, “Would that all Jeh’s people were prophets!” (Nu 11 26–29). The subject-matter of their prophesy has been variously supplied by tradition. Cf. the Pal Tafs ad loc., the apocalyptic Book of Eldad and Medad, and Baal ha-turim (ad loc.).

ELLA DAVIS ISAACS

MEDAN, mē-dān (מֶדָן, mēdan, “strife”): One of the sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25 2; 1 Ch 1 32). The tribe and its place remain unidentified, and the conjecture that the name may Figuratively it signifies destruction, or a portion of something marked off by line for destruction, as in 2 K 21 18; or for judgment, as in Isa 28 17.

MEDEBA, med'e-ba (מְדֶבָּה; אֲמָדָּה); Med physician (Gen 10:2; 2 K 17:6; 18:11; 1 Ch 1:5; Ezr 6:2; Est 1:3.14.18.19; 10:2; Is 13:17; 21:2; Jer 25:25; 51:11.28; Dan 5:28; 6:1.9.13.16; 8:20; 9:1; 11:1). Mentioned as Japhetites in Gen 10:2, i.e., Aryans, and according to some, they first called themselves the "Haramitarians" (Herod. vii.62), in Avestic Airy = Stkt. Arya, "noble." They were closely allied in descent, language and religion with the Persians, and in secular history preceded their appearance by some centuries. Like most Aryan nations they were at first divided into small village communities each with its own chiefs (called in Assyrian hazawt by Assur-bani-pal of Herod. i.96). Shalmaneser II mentions them (Nimrod Obelisk, i.21) about 840 BC. They then inhabited the modern Airbatjan (Media Atropatene). Ram- mishapzeit son of Assyr (Rawlinson, WAI, ii.51) and paid him tribute that he (810-781 BC) had conquered "the land of the Medes and the land of Parsua" (Persis), as well as other countries. This probably meant only a plundering expedition, as far as Media was concerned. So also Assur-nirari I (Soon, 11, 22) in 749-748 BC overran Median Nani and Media, Tiglat-piiles IV (in Bab called Pulu, the "Pul" of 2 K 15:19) and Sargon also overran parts of Media. Sargon in 716 BC conquered Kisheshin, Khar- khar and other parts of the country. Some of the Medes were so by him transplanted to "the cities of the Medes" (2 K 17:6; 18:11; the LXX reading "the ' pensions (or Pul, 2 K 15:19) "mountains" of the Medes here) after the fall of Samaria in 722 BC. It was perhaps owing to the need of being able to resist Assyria that about 720 BC the Medes (in part at least) united into a kingdom under Deoks, according to Herodotus (i.95). Sargon mentions him by the name Dayanukel, Jehu history, that he himself captured this prince (715 BC) and conquered his territory two years later. After his release, probably Deoks fortified Ecbatana (modern Ellipi) and made it his capital. It has been held by some that Herodotus confounds the Medes here with the Manda (or Urmian-Manda, "Isatian of the Medes") of the inscriptions; but these were probably Aryan tribes, possibly of Scythian origin, and the names Mada and Mandi may be, after all, identical. Her-haddon in his 25th year (679-678 BC) and Assur- bani-pal warred with certain Median tribes, whose power was now growing formidable. They (or the Manda) had conquered Persia and formed a great confederacy. Under Kyaxares (Uvakhatara - Deoks' grandson, according to Herodo- tus), they besieged Nineveh, but Assur-bani-pal, with the assistance of the Ashguza (7, the Ashkenaz of Gen 10:5), another Aryan tribe, repelled them. At the end of the Assyrian empire came, however, in 606 BC, when the Mandas, who had captured their king, Triba- tukte, Mamiti-arsu, lord of the city of the Medes, Kaerat of the Armenian district of Kar-kas, the Kimmers (Gimirra = Gomer) under Teaspah (Tiglath-Piles, Chasapish), the Minni (Mamiti, cf Jer 51:27), and the Babylonians under Nabu-pal-user, stormed and destroyed Nineveh, as Nabu-nahid informs us. The last king of Assyria, Sin-sar- ikun (Sarakan), perished with his people.

Herodotus says that Deoks was succeeded by Phraer- tes (Frataxies) his son, Phraortes by his son Kyaxares; and the latter in turn left his kingdom to his son Astyages whose daughter Mandane married Cyaxares, father of the great Cyrus. Yet there was no Median empire (as he describes them), or at least it did not embrace all the Aryan tribes of Western Asia, as we see from the inscriptions that in 606 BC, and even later, many of them were under kings and princes of their own (cf Jer 25:2; 51:11). Herodotus tells us they were divided into six tribes, of whom the Magi were one (Herod. 1.101). Kyaxares was ruled for 5 years (606-580 BC) with the Lydians, the struggle being ended in May, 565, by the total eclipse of the sun foretold by Thales (Herod. 1.74).

The alliance between the Medes and the Babylonians ended with Nebuchadnezzar's reign. His successor Nabu-nahid (555 BC) says that in that year the Medes under Astyages (Ishuwogu) entered Mesopotamia and besieged Haran. Soon after, however, that dynasty was overthrown; for Cyrus the Persian, whom Nabu-nahid the first time he mentions him styles Astyages' "youthful slaves" (aššur, sîra), but who was even then king of Anshan (Anzan), attacked and in 549 BC captured Astyages, plundered Ecbatana, and became king of the Medes. Though of Pers descent, Cyrus did not, apparently, begin to reign in Persia till 546 BC. Henceforth there was no Median empire distinguished from the Pers (nor is any such mentioned in Dn, in spite of modern fancies). As the Medes were further advanced in civilization and preceded the Persians in sovereignty, the Gr historian generally called the whole nation "the Medes" long after Cyrus' time. Only much later are the Persians spoken of as the predominant partners. Hence it is a sign of early date that Daniel (6 20) speaks of "Media and Persia," whereas later the Book of Est reverses the order ("Persia and Media," Est 1 3.14.18.19; 10 2), as in the inscriptions of Darius at Behistun.

Under Darius I, Phraortes (Fravartish) rebelled, claiming the throne of Media as a descendant of Kyaxares. His cause was so powerfully supported among the Medes that the rebellion was not suppressed till after a fierce struggle. He was finally taken prisoner at Ragas (Ret, near Tehrân), brutally mutilated, and finally impaled at Ecbatana. After that Median history merges into that of Persia. The history of the Jews in Media is referred to in Dn and Est. 1 Mac tells something of Media under the Syrian (S. 66) and Parthian dominion (14 1–5; cf Jos, Ant, XX, III). Medes are last mentioned in Acts 10 3. They are remarkable as the first leaders of the Aryan race in its struggle with the Semites for freedom and supremacy.

MEDIA, mē’d-i-a (τῆς Μεδίας, mēdēia; Mēdia, Mēdia): Lay to the W. and S.W. of the Caspian, and extended thence to the Zagros Mountains on the W. On the N. in later times it was bounded by the rivers Araxes and Cyrus, which separated it from Persia. Its eastern boundaries were formed by Hyrcania and the Great Salt Desert (now called the Kavār), and it was bounded on the S. by Susiana. In earlier times its limits were somewhat indefinite. It included Atropatene (Armenian Atropataen, the name, "Fire-guarding," showing devotion to the worship of Fire) to the N., and Media Magna to the S., the former being the present Arazbātān. Near the Caspian the country is low, damp and unhealthy, but inland most of it is high and mountainous, Mt. Démâvând in the Alburz range reaching 18,600 ft. Atropatene was famous for the fertility of its valleys and table-lands, except toward the N. Media Magna is high; it has fruitful tracts along the course of the streams, but suffers much from want of water, though this was doubtless more abundant in antiquity. It contained the Nisaean Plain, famous for its breed of horses. The chief cities of ancient Media were Ecbatana, Gazaca, and Ragae. The Orontes range near Ecbatana is the present Abaran. Lake Spāta is now known as Urmū (Urmah).

V. CONCLUSION.

LITERATURE.

1. Introductory.—(1) "Mediation" in its broadest sense may be defined as the act of intervening between parties at variance for the purpose of reconciling them, or between parties not necessarily hostile for the purpose of leading them into an agreement or covenant. There is no reference to the method by which God and man are reconciled through the instrumentality of some intervening person, act or process, and esp. through the atoning work of Jesus Christ. The term itself does not occur in Bib. literature. (2) The term "mediator" (= middleman, agent of mediation) is nowhere found in OT or Apoc (EV), but the corresponding Gr word μεσίτης, mostētas, occurs once in LXX (Job 9 33 AV, "Neither is there any daysman betwixt us," where "daysman" stands for Heb mökāḇēḇ, "arbiter," ARV, ERV, "umpire" (see Daysman), LXX has ὁ μεσίτης ἡμῶν, "our mediator," as a paraphrase for Heb bāḇēnā, "betwixt us"). Even in the NT, mostētas, "mediator," occurs only 6t, viz Gal 3 19 20 (of Moses), and 1 Tim 2 5; Heb 6 8, 15; 12 24 (of Christ).

Though the actual terms are thus very rare, the principle of mediation is one of great significance in Bib. theology, as well as in the Jewish-Alexandrian philosophy. It corresponds to a profound human mediation in the sense of a secret or needful intermediary expression in some form or other in man's relations.

It is an attempt to solve the problem raised by (1) the idea of the infinite distance which separates God from man and the universe, and (2) the deeply felt want of bringing them into a harmonious relation. The conception of mediation will differ, therefore, according to whether the distance to be surmounted is understood ethically or metaphysically. If it be thought of in an ethical or religious sense, that is, if the emphasis be laid on the fact of human sin as standing in the way of man's fellowship with God, then mediation will be the mode by which peaceful relations are established between sinful man and the absolutely righteous God. But if the antithesis of God and the world be conceived of metaphysically, i.e. be based on the ultimate nature of God and of the world conceived as essentially opposed to each other, then mediation will be the mode by which the transcendent God, without Himself coming into direct contact with the world, is able to produce effects in it through an intermediate agent (or agents). The latter conception (largely the result of an exaggerated Platonic dualism) exerted an important influence on later Jewish thought, and even on Christian theology, and will come briefly under our consideration. But in the main we shall be concerned with the former view, as more in harmony with the development of Bib.
theology which culminates in the NT doctrine of atonement. Mediation between God and man as presented in Scripture is represented respectively by the functions of the prophet, the priest, and the theocratic king. Here and there in the OT these tend to meet, as in Mel-chizedek the priest-king, and in the Suffering Servant of the LXX, who unites the priestly function of sacrifice with the prophetic function of revealing the Divine will. But on the whole, these aspects of mediation in the OT run along lines which have no meeting-point in one person adequate to do all the jobs. In the NT they intersect in the person and work of Jesus Christ, who realizes in Himself the full meaning of the prophetic, priestly, and kingly ideals.

II. Mediation in the OT.—We do not find in the OT a fixed and final doctrine of mediation universally accepted as an axon of religious Teaching toward such a doctrine, under the growing sense of God’s exaltation and of man’s frailty and sinfulness. Such a passage as Gen 2:25 seems merely to condict the idea of mediation. Still more striking are the words of Job above referred to, “There is no uumpire between us, that might lay his hand upon us both,” i.e. to enforce his decision (Job 9:33), when the LXX paraphrases, “Would that there were a mediator and a preserver and a hearer between us both.” The note of despair which characterizes this passage shows that Job has no hope that such an arbiter between him and God is forthcoming.
Yet the words give pathetic utterance to the deep inarticulate cry of humanity for a mediator. In this connection we should note the protests of prophets and psalmists against an unethical view of mediation by animal sacrifices (Mic 6:6-8; Ps 40:6-8, etc.), and their frequent direct appeals to God for mercy without reference to any mediation (Ps 25:7; 32:5; 103:8 ff, etc).

1. Mediatorial sacrifice.—In the patriarchal age, before the official priest had been differentiated from the rest of the community, the function of offering sacrifices was discharged by the head of the family or Teaching: clan on behalf of his people, as by Early
Noah (Gen 8:20), Abraham (Gen 12 Period 7:3; 16:3), Aaron (Gen 31:54; 33:20). So Job, conceived by the writer as living in patriarchal antiquity, is said to have offered sacrifices vicariously for his sons (Job 1:5). Melchizedek, the priest-king of Salem (Gen 14:18-20), is a figure of considerable theological interest, insomuch as he was taken by the author of Ps 110 as the forerunner of the ideal theocratic king who was also priest, and by the author of He as prototype of Christ’s priesthood.

2. Intercessory prayer.—Intercession is in all stages of thought an essential element in mediation.
We have striking examples of it in Gen 18:22-33;
Job 42:8-10.

3. The Mosaic covenant.—In Moses we have for the first time a recognized national representative who acted both as God’s spokesman to the people, and the people’s spokesman before God. He alone was allowed to “come near unto Jeh,” and to him Jeh spake “face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend” (Ex 33:11). He was the “mediator and broker of the words of the people” to Him, as to a sovereign who cannot be approached save by his duly accredited minister (Ex 19:8). We have a striking example of his intercessory mediation in the episode of the golden calf, when he pleaded effectively with God to turn from His wrath (Ex 32:12-14), and even offered to “make atonement for” (kipper, lit. “cover”) their sin by confessing their sin before God, and being willing to be blotted out of God’s book, so that no man might be spared (vs 30-32).
Here we have already the germ of the idea of vicarious suffering for sin.

4. Intercessory mediation.—Samuel is by Jeremiah classed with Moses as the chief representative of intercessory mediation (Jer 15:1). He is reported as mediating by prayer between Israel and God, and succeeding in warding off the punishment of their sin (1 S 7 5-12). On such occasions, prayer was wont to be accompanied by confessions of sins and by an offering to Jeh.

Samuel represents the transition from the ancient seer or seer-sword to the prophetic order. The prophet was regarded as the organ of
3. Prophetic Divine revelation, to consult whom Mediation was equivalent to “inquiring of God”
(1 S 9:9)—a commissioner sent by God (Isa 6:8) to proclaim His will by word and action. In that capacity he was Jeh’s representative among men, and so could speak in a tone of authority. Prophetic revelation is essential to the idea of religion of the NT, which is distinguished from a mere philosophy or natural religion. God is not merely a passive object of human discovery, but one who actively and graciously reveals Himself to His chosen people through the medium of the authorized expressors of His mind and will. Thus in the main the prophet stands for the principle of mediation in its man-world aspect.
But the God-world aspect is not absent, for we find the prophet mediating with God on behalf of men, making intercession for them (Jer 14:19-22; Am 7 2f.5).

Mediation is in a peculiar sense the function of the priest. In the main he stands for the principle in its God-world aspect. Yet in the early

4. Priestly period the man-world aspect that Mediation was most apparent; i.e. the priest was at first regarded as the medium through which Jeh delivered His oracles to men, the human mouthpiece of supernatural revelation, giving advice or laws by way of the sacred lot. Before the time of the first literary prophets, the association of the priests with the ephor and the lot had receded into the background (though the high priest theoretically retained the right of interpriety (Gen 20:21, etc)), and in the days of the Urim and Thummim, Ex 25:30; Lev 8:5; but the power they lost with the oracle they gained at the altar. First they acquired a preferential status at the local sanctuaries; then, in the Deuter-monic legislation, where sacrifice is limited to the Jesus sanctuary, it is assumed that only Levite priests can officiate. Finally, in the Levitical system as set forth in the PC (which regulated Jewish worship in the post-exilic times), the Aaronic priests, now clearly distinguished from the Levites, have the sole privilege of immediate access to God in His sanctuary (Nu 4:19–20; 16:3-5). God’s transcendence and holiness are now so emphasized that between Him and the sin-stained people there is almost an infinite chasm. Hence the people can only enjoy His ideal right of drawing nigh unto God and offering sacrifice to Him through the mediation of the official priesthood. The mediatorship of priests derived its authority, not from their moral purity or personal worth, but from the ceremonial purity which attached to their function; they are not on the same level. A process of gradual sanctity narrows down their number as the approach is made to the Most Holy Place, which symbolizes the presence chamber of Jeh. (1) Out of the sacred nation as a whole, the priestly tribe of Levi is elected and invested with a special sanctity to perform all the subordinate acts of service within the sanctuary (Ex 19 :10; 23:19). Within the sacred tribe, the members of the house of Aaron are set apart and invested with a still higher sanctity; they alone officiate at the altar in the Holy Place and expiate the guilt of the people by sacrifice and prayer, thus representing the people before God. Yet even they are only admitted to the proximate nearness of the Holy Place. (3) The gradation of the hierarchy is completed by the recognition of a single, supreme head of the priesthood—the high priest. He alone possessed the throne of Holies, being permitted to go into that alone once a year, on the Day of Atonement, when he makes propitiation not only for himself and the priesthood, but for the entire congregation. The ritual of the Day of Atonement is the highest exercise of priestly mediatorial. On that day, the whole community has access to Jeh through their representative, the high priest, and through him offer atonement for their sins. Moreover, the role of the high priest as mediator is symbolized by his wearing the breastplate bearing the names of the children of Israel, whenever he goes into the Holy Place (Ex 28:29).

Something must be said of the sacrificial system, through which alone the priest exercised his mediatorial functions. For his mediatorial influence with God was exercised, for instance, through intercessory prayer (intercession is not mentioned by P as a duty of the priest, though referred to by the prophets, Joel 2:17; Mal 3:6). It depended rather on an elaborate system of offerings, of which the priest was but an official agent. It was he who derived his authority from the system, rather than the system from him. The most characteristic features in the ritual of the PC are the sin offering (kattathk, Lev 4; 5; 6; 21) and the guilt offering ('ashams, Lev 5:7-14, 19), which seem peculiar to P. These are meant to restore the normal relation of the people or of individuals to God, a relation which sin has disturbed. Hence these sacrifices were only administered by the priest, are distinctly mediatorial or reconciliatory in character, i.e. they make atonement for or "cover" (kipper) the sin of the guilty community or individuals. This seems the case also, though in a less degree (Nu 8:19; 18:6), in the annual peace-offerings, which, though "not offered expressly, like the sin and guilt offerings, for the forgiveness of sin, nevertheless were regarded...as 'covering,' or neutralizing, the offerer's unworthiness to appear before God, and so, though in a less degree, than the sin and guilt offerings, as effecting propitiation" (Driver in HDB, IV, 132). We must beware, however, of reading the full NT doctrine of sin and propitiation into the sacrificial law. Two important points of difference may be noted: (1) The law does not provide atonement for all sins, but only for sins of ignorance or inadvertence, committed within the covenant. Deliberate sins fall outside the scope of priestly mediation. (2) While sin includes moral impurity, it must be admitted that the chief emphasis falls on ceremonial uncleanness, because it is only violation of physical sanctity that can be fully rectified by ritual ordinance. The law was essentially a civil code, and was not adequate to deal with inward sins. Thus the sacrificial system in itself is but a faint abumbration of the NT doctrine of Christ's high-priestly work, which has reference to sin in its widest and deepest meaning. Yet, in spite of these limitations, the priestly ritual was, as far as it went, an organized expression of the sin-consciousness, and prepared the way for the coming of a perfect Mediator.

On another plane than that of the priest is the mediation of the theocratic king. Jeh was ideally the sole king of Israel. But he governed the people mediately through His viceregent the theocratic king (1 Sam 8:1, 5). Within the sacred tribe, the members of the house of Aaron are set apart and invested with a still higher sanctity; they alone officiate at the altar in the Holy Place and expiate the guilt of the people by sacrifice and prayer, thus representing the people before God. Yet even they are only admitted to the proximate nearness of the Holy Place. 5. The Theocratic Messiah:

(1) Angelic mediation. Not until the advent of the angels connected with Mediation have theological significance. Previously, when God was anthropomorphically conceived as appearing periodically on earth in visible form, the need of angelic mediation was not felt. The "angel" in early narrative (e.g. Gen 18 7–11) did not possess abiding personality distinct from God, but was God Himself temporarily manifested in human form. But the more God was conceived as "the high and lofty One that inhabiteth eternity," the greater was the need for mediation between God and the world, and even between God and His servant the prophet. In post-exilic writers there is an increasing disposition to put up the gap between God and the prophet with superhuman beings. Thus Zechariah receives a Divine inspiration through angels; and similarly Daniel receives explanations of his dreams. We do not in the OT hear of angels interceding with God (God-ward mediation), but only as intermediaries of revelation and of the Divine will (man-ward mediation). Modern Jewish scholars deny that Judaistic angelology implied that God was transcendent in the sense of being remote and out of contact with the world. So, e.g., Montefiore (Hibben's Interpretation Book 423–91) maintains that "a natural disincarnation to bring the Godhead downward to human conditions," and that "for supernatural conversations angels formed a convenient substitute for God" (p. 490). The doctrine of angels indicates the influence on NT mediation, which moves on the plane of the ethical, rather than on the basis of the merely physical transcendency of God.

(2) Divine wisdom.—Of more importance as a principle in the NT theology of the NT is the doctrine of Wisdom, in which the Jews found "a middle term between the religion of Israel and the philosophy of Greece." In Prov 8 22–31 Wisdom is depicted as an individual energy, God's elect Son, His companion, and even His self-manifestation. But whose character is here purely ideal and poetical, and the ethical interest predominates over the metaphysical, yet we have in such a passage a clear proof of contact with Or thought (esp. Plotinus and Stoicism), and of the need of a mediator between God and the visible world. This mode of thought, linked to the Heb conception of the Divine Word as the efficient expression of God's thought and of His being (Ps 33 6; 107 20), has left its mark on Philo's Logos-doctrine and on the NT Christology. See Wisdom.

III. In semi- and non-canonical Jewish literature.—In the Apoc, where NT mediation is for the most part absent, we have one or two references to angelic intercession (10 12; 15 2; 40 6). The tradition of the agency of angels is in the promulgation of the law is preserved in the LXX of Dt 33 2 (not in the Heb original), but was greatly amplified in rabbinical literature (Jeb, Av T. xvi. 3). In Wied a bold advance is made toward the concept of Wisdom as a personal mediator of creation (esp. Ps 22–27). In later Judaism, the idea of the Word is further developed. The Targ impose the divine activity to the manusript or "Word" referred, where the OT speaks of the creative power of God and speaks of it as Israel's Intercessor before God and as Redeemer. This usage seems to arise out of a reluctance to bring God into immediate contact with the world; hence God's self-manifestation is represented as mediation by the Mediator. The tendency finds its fulfillment, however, not among the Jews, but among the Jews of Alexander, esp. in Philo's Logos-doctrine. Deeply influenced by the Platonic dualism, Philo thought of God as pure Spirit, incapable of direct contact with the world; and of the OT. The highest of these was the Divine Logos, the mediator between the inaccessibly holy and the manifest material universe. On the one hand, in relation to the world, the Logos is the Medium of revelation; on the other hand, in his God-ward activity, he is the representative of the world before God, its High Priest, Intercessor, and Prophet. Philo's Logos was probably nothing more than a highly philosophical abstraction vividly Imaged in the mind. In spite of Philo's influence on early Christian thought, and even perhaps on some NT writers, his doctrine of mediation is not represented in the NT. The doctrine of NT mediation is derived from the central NT doctrine, which is concerned above all with the reconciliation of God and man in Christ and consequent grace, and not with the thiênation of the absolute and the finite world. The Mediator of Philo is an abstraction, speculative in thought; the Mediator of Christ is a historical person known to experience. See PHIL JUDAH.

IV. Mediation and Mediator in the NT.—The relatively independent lines of development which the conception of mediation has hitherto followed are: (1) The Synoptic Gospels. Christ's mediatorial work into that of prophet, priest and king (very common since Calvin, but now often discarded) offers a convenient method of treating the subject, though we must avoid making the division absolute, as if Christ's work fell apart into three separate and independent functions. The unity of the work of salvation is preserved by the fact that "no one of the offices fills up a moment of time alone, but the others are always cooperative," although Christ's mediatorial work puts now this, now that side in the foreground." The triple division is of special value, because it sets in a vivid light the continuity between the OT doctrine of Mediation and the NT Mediator (Esparzy, System of Christian Doctrine, ET, III, 385 f). These three aspects of Christ's mediatorialship can be distinguished in the Synoptics, although the formal distinction is the work of later analysis.

(1) Christ as Prophet.—It is in the character of Prophet that He mainly impressed the common mind, which was moved to inquire "Whence hath this man this wisdom?" and by His reply, "A prophet is not without honor," etc, He virtually accepts that "in every generation people search for Christ" (34 13). The NT development of Christ as the mediator of revelation; through Him alone can men come to know God as Father (Mt 11 27) and "the mysteries of the kingdom of heaven" (13 11). In all His teaching we feel that He speaks within the center of truth, and hence can teach with authority and not as the scribes (7 29), who approach the truth from without. His teaching is part of His redemptive work, and not something extraneous to it, for the sin from which He redeems includes ignorance and sin. (Ps 85 11; 118 22; 33 6; 107 20), has left its mark on Philo's Logos-doctrine and on the NT Christology. See Wisdom.
mediated to the heavy laden through Him (Mt. 11: 25-30). He claims authority on earth to forgive sins (Mt. 9: 6). The blood of the New Covenant, in accordance with the true pedagogical method by which He adapted His teaching to the progressive receptivity of His followers. But harscham as we must think of Him as subject to the ordinary laws of human psychology, His death must have been to Him a growth, matured partly by outward events, and partly by the development of His inner consciousness as the Suffering Messiah. In His later ministry, He frequently taught that He must suffer and die (Mt. 12 12-21; 15 30 f.; 13 28; 14 8 and passages; cf. Mk 10 38; Lk 12 49 f.). There are two important passages which expressly connect His death with His mediatorial work. The first is Mk 10 45; Mt 20 28, "The Son of Man came not to be ministered unto but to minister, and to give His life a ransom for many." The context shows that it was while the thought of His approaching death filled His mind that Our Lord uttered these words (cf. Mk 10 33. 38). As the word in the exact meaning latron, there are two circles of ideas with which it may be associated. (a) It may mean a sacrificial offering, representing Heb kopher (lit. "covering," "propitiatory gift") which it translates several times in the LXX, (e.g. Ecclus. 35: 17). The exact meaning of latron in the LXX, latron in most cases stands for some form of the roots gatul, "to deliver," pahdah, "to redeem" (e.g. Lev 25: 51; Nu 3: 51). Hence Wendt explains it as the ransom as the price by which Jesus redeemed His disciples from their bondage to suffering and death (Teaching of Jesus, II, 226 f.). This analogy certainly suits the context better than that drawn from the Levitical ritual, for it brings out the contrast between the liberating work of Christ and the bondage of the "other men." We must not press the analogy in detail or seek here an answer to the question, who was the recipient of the ransom price (e.g. whether the devil, as many Fathers, notably Origen and Gregory of Nyssa; and later theologians, the "eternal law of righteousness," as Dale), the purpose of the passage is primarily practical, not speculative. It is certainly pressing the figurative language of Jesus too far to insist that the ransom price is the exact quantitative equivalent of the lives liberated, or of the penalty they had deserved regarded as a debt. This is too prossic and literalistic an interpretation of a passage which has its setting in the ethical rather than in the commercial realm, and which breathes a spirit deeply akin to that of Isa. 53, where suffering and service are, as here, combined.

The other passage in which Christ definitely connects His mediatorialship with His death is that which reports His words at the Last Supper (Mk 14: 22-24; Mt 26 26-28; Lk 22: 19 f.; cf. 1 Cor 11: 24 f.). The reported words are not identical in the several narratives. But even in their simplest form (in Mk), there is evidently a twofold allusion, to the paschal meal and to the blood. The latter is at the ratification of the covenant at Sinai (Ex 24: 8), and to Jeremiah's prophecy of a new David. There can be little doubt that the paschal feast, though it does not conform in detail to any of the Levitical sacrifices, was regarded as a sacrifice, as is indicated by the blood ceremonial (Ex 12: 21-27). The former, in view of the New Testament interpretation, is sacrificial; and, as we have seen, it is probable that all blood sacrifices, and not those of the sin and guilt offerings only, were associated with propitiatory power. Wendt denies that there is here any reference to sin and its forgiveness (Teachings of Jesus, II, 241 f.). It must be admitted that the words in Mt "unto remission of sins," which have no counterpart in the other reports, are probably an explanatory expansion of the words actually uttered. But the true interpretation of the meaning, as is attested by the fact that the new covenant of Jeremiah's prophecy was one of forgiveness and justification (Jer. 31: 34), and that Christ speaks of His blood as shed for others. And as the Passover signified deliverance from bondage to an earthly power (Egypt), so the Supper stands for forgiveness and deliverance from a spiritual power (sin). Clearly Christ here represents Himself as the Mediator of the new covenant, through whom men are to find acceptance with God, though the exact modus operandi of His sacrifice is not indicated.

The Synoptics give special prominence to those historical events which are most intimately associated with Christ, and which are, in fact, the climax of the whole narrative. The suffering and death of Christ, and that His Messiahspeak was realized in the crucifixion and the resurrection, but also the resurrection and ascension (which make possible His intercessory mediation in heaven).

(1) The early speeches in Acts reveal a primitive stage of the Messianic Kingdom (cf. Acts 3: 19-21). Thus Jesus defined it as an offering which, because of its specific worth to God, is a protection or covering against sin (Rechtfertigung und Versöhnung, 11, 65-68). (2) It may mean ransom price, the purchase-money with which the emancipation of a slave is paid. (3) In the LXX, latron in most cases stands for some form of the roots gatl, "to deliver," pahdah, "to redeem" (e.g. Lev. 25: 51; Nu 3: 51). The Epistles of James and Jude.—In those esp. the doctrine of Christ's mediation does not occupy a prominent place. To James, Christianity is the culmination of Judaism. Christ's mediatorial functions are set forth more by way of presupposition than by explicit statement, and the whole weight is laid on the kingly and prophetic offices. The Messiahship of Jesus is assumed to such an extent that the title "Christ" has become part of the proper name, of the Lord Jesus (1: 1; 2: 1). Nothing definite is said of His function in salvation; it is God Himself who regenerates, but the medium of regeneration is the "word of truth," the implanted word (1: 18, 21), which must refer to the word which Jesus had preached. This implies that Jesus as prophetetic teacher is the Mediator of salvation. Nothing is said of the death on the cross or its saving significance. The Ep. of Jude assumes the ordination of Christ, through whom God’s Saviourhood works, and whose mercy results in eternal life (vs 4.21.25).

(3) 1 Peter.—In 1 Pet we have the early apostolic teaching touched with Paulinism. The fact that salvation is mediated through the sufferings and death of Christ is now emphasized. "His mediatorial office has suffered for sins once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous (13.8). The suffering has significance both God-ward and man-ward. Relatively to God it is a sacrificial offering which opens up a way of access to Him; He suffered "that he might bring us to God" (13.18), and that through His representative priesthood the ideal "holy priesthood" of all God’s people might be realized, for it is through Jesus Christ that men’s "spiritual sacrifices" become "acceptable to God" (2.5). So the elect are sprinkled with the blood of Christ, i.e. brought into communion with God by His sacrifice (1.2). Relatively to man, it is a means of ransom or liberating man from the bondage of sin. "He himself offered himself without sin, pure and spotless (Heb 9.14)."

3. Epistles to Christ (1 Tim 2.5), and that of Paul in the only other passage where he uses the word, he applies it to Moses, in a sense which might seem to be inconsistent with the idea of Christ’s mediatorial office. This passage discusses the relation of law to promise. The law was “ordained through angels by the hand of a mediator. Now a mediator is not . . . of one; but God is one” (Gal 3.19.20).

This passage has had to undergo about 300 different interpretations. There is no doubt that the “mediator” here is Christ (Orig., Augustine and most of the Fathers, Calvin) but whether Moses, or David, or God was a mediator, or a double mediator, is a matter of dispute. Modern exegesists agree that the reference is to Moses (of Lev 26 46, where LXX has “by the hand of Moses”; Philo calls Moses “mediator and reconciler.” De Vita. Moys. II.10), who, according to a rabbinical tradition, received the Law through the intermediation of angels (cf Acts 7 53; Heb 2 2). Nor is it likely that Paul meant the reader to realize the glory of the law and the solemnity of its ordination (Meyer). The present is the inferiority of the law to the evangelical promise to Abraham. Mediation implies at least two parties between whom it is carried on. The law was given by a double mediator, that of the angels and that of Moses, and was thus two removes from its Divine origin in relation to the promise God stood alone, i.e. set apart freely, unconditionally, independently, and for Himself alone; the promise is an agreement in principle between two, but the free gift of the one God (so Schleiermacher, Lightfoot, etc.). This is by no means a denial of the Divine origin of the law (Ritschl), for the mediation of angels and of Moses was Divinely authorized; but it does seem to make the method of mediation inferior to that of the direct communication of God’s gracious will to man. Paul is not, however, treating of the precise form of it in the abstract, but only of the form of it which implies a contract between two parties. Christ is not the Mediator in the same sense as Moses, for the free gift is from God; but of the forgiveness of sins which Christ mediates is by no means diminished by the fact of His mediation.

What, then, is Paul’s positive teaching on Christ’s Mediatorship?

1. The need of a Mediator arises out of the fact of sin. Sin interrupts the harmonious relation between God and man. It results in a state of mutual alienation. On the one hand, man is in a state of enmity to God (Rom 5 10; 5 7; Col 1.21). On the other hand, God is in no way righteously wrath in relation to the sinner (Rom 1 18; 5 9; Eph 5 6; Col 3.3). Hence the need of a mutual change of attitude, a removal of God’s displeasure against the sinner as well as of the sinner’s hostility to God. God stated: Christ has suffered for sins once for all, the righteous for the unrighteous (13.8). The suffering has significance both God-ward and man-ward. Relatively to God it is a sacrificial offering which opens up a way of access to Him; He suffered “that he might bring us to God” (13.18), and that through His representative priesthood the ideal “holy priesthood” of all God’s people might be realized, for it is through Jesus Christ that men’s “spiritual sacrifices” become “acceptable to God” (2.5). So the elect are sprinkled with the blood of Christ, i.e. brought into communion with God by His sacrifice (1.2). Relatively to man, it is a means of ransom or liberating man from the bondage of sin. "He himself offered himself without sin, pure and spotless (Heb 9.14)."

(b) His relation to God: Paul very frequently speaks of Christ as the “Son of God,” and that in a unique sense. Moreover, He was the “image of God” (2 Cor 4.4; Col 1.15) and subsisted originally “in the form of God” (Phil 2 6). He is set alongside with God over against idols (1 Cor 8 5.6), and is coordinated with God in the benefaction (2 Cor 13 14). Clearly Paul sets Him in the Divine sphere, a sphere which at the same time He is also a mediator to man. Yet he assigns Him a certain subordination, and even asserts that His medatorial kingship will come to an end, that God may be all in all (1 Cor 15 24.28). But this cessation of His function as Mediator of salvation, whereby His mediatorial sovereignty is by some means of reconciling and undertaking to accomplish it (2 Cor 5 19). Paul’s view of the death may be seen by considering some of his most characteristic expressions. (a) It is an act of reconciliation. This involves a change of attitude, not only in man, but in God, a relinquishing of the Divine wrath which for which there can be no restoration of peaceful relations (though this is disputed by many, e.g. Ritschl, Lightfoot, Westcott, Bessarablag), but not a change of nature or of intention, for the Divine wrath is only a mode of the eternal God’s treatment of the Father Himself who provides the means of reconciliation and undertakes to accomplish it (2 Cor 5 19); cf Col 1 20.21; Eph 2 16). It is an act of propitiation (Rom 3 25, ἰατρία, hilasterion, from ἰατάω, kula, “to render favorable” or “propositions”). Here there is a clear though tacit reference to a change of attitude on God’s part. He who was not formerly propitious to man was appeased through the death of Christ. Yet the propitiatory means are provided by God Himself, who takes the initiative in this sphere and renders Himself as the Mediator (Rom 3:21; Eph 1:7; Col 1:14; IV.4; 4:25; apodekthésis, from λυτρόν, “ransom”). It is not alone the fact of liberation (Westcott, Ritschel), but also the cost of liberation that is referred to. Hence Christians are said to be redeemed, “bought with a price” (Gal 3:13; 4:5; 1 Cor 6:20; 7:23; cf. 1 Pet 1:18 f.) yet the metaphor cannot be pressed to yield an answer to the question to whom the ransom was paid. All that can safely be said is that it expresses the tremendous cost of our salvation, viz., the self-surrendered life (“the blood”) of Christ. (d) Strong subordinatory language is sometimes used, notably in Gal 3:13 (“having become a curse for us”) and in 2 Cor 5:21 (“Him who knew no sin he made to be sin on our behalf”). But the sinless substitute is regarded as actually bearing the guilt of our sin (that would be a moral contradiction). His death was not penal substitution, but a substitute for penalty. It had the value to God of the punishment of sinners, in virtue of His oneness with the race. It was the recognition from within humanity of the sinfulness of sin, and expressed the Divine righteousness as fully as penalty would have done. The secret seems to be Christ’s sympathetic love by which He identified Himself with man’s sin and doom of death (Gal 4:4). The dynamics of His death and the exalted condition of which He is the Author were combined within the sphere of humanity, becoming atoning mediation in the Levitical ritual, which would be less congenial to His mind than the prophetic conception of the Suffering Servant. Yet He does seem to regard the death of Christ as the culmination of all that the sacrifices of the OT had imperfectly realized. Secondly, the subjective aspect of Christ’s work is emphasized quite as much as His objective. The dynamic work of atonement and self-surrendered by faith, becomes to the believer the principle of ethical transformation, so that he may become worthy of the Divine favor which He now enjoys. As a result of his subjective identification with Christ through faith, the objective state of privilege is changed into actual liberation from sin (Gal 2:20; 6:14; Rom 6:6; Col 3:3).

(4) The resurrection and exaltation of Christ are essential to His mediatorial work (1 Cor 15:17). It is not alone that the resurrection “proves that the death of Christ was not the death of a sinner, but the vicarious death of the sinless Mediator of salvation” (B. Weiss, in 436), but that salvation cannot be realized except through communion with the living, glorified Christ, without which the subjective identity of the believer with Christ by which redemption is personally appropriated would not be possible (Gal 2:20; Rom 6:4; Phil 3:10; Col 3:1). The exaltation also makes possible His continuous heavenly intercession on our behalf (Rom 8:34), which is the climax of His mediatorial activities.

(5) The cosmic aspect of Christ’s mediatorial—

In his later epistle (esp. Col and Eph), Paul lays stress on Christ’s mediatorial activity in creation and providence, through the gifts of the Spirit, which are found in the earlier epistles (1 Cor 6:6). He is resisting a kind of nascent gnostic dualism, according to which God could communicate with the world only through a hierarchy of intermediate powers. Against this he proclaims Christ as the one and only Mediator between God and the universe, having, on the one hand, a unique relation to God (“the image of the invisible God,” Col 1:15; in whom the fulness of God dwells; 1:19; 2:9), and, on the other hand, a unique relation to the world, who is invested with all God’s creative and redemptive activity, and, as such, is called “the Mediator” (1:18). Christ’s mediatorial activity also finds expression in the dualism, which Paul late reformed the break in the historical foundation of the universe (Col 1:20; Eph 1:10).

The main thesis of He is the absoluteness and finality of the gospel and its superiority over Judaism. The finality of Christianity depends on the fact that it has a perfect Mediator, who is the substance of the which the various Jewish forms of Hebrews mediation were types and shadows. He illustrates this by a series of contrasts between Christ and the mediators of the old system (by the application of principles and exegetical methods which reveal the influence of the author’s Jewish education and of Hellenistic thought).

(1) Christ is superior to the prophets as Mediator of revelation. The OT revelation was fragmentary and multifloral, while new God speaks, not through many agents, but through Christ and that one as Son. As Son He is the perfectly adequate expression of the Father. The author takes us at once to the high transcendental sphere of Christ’s relations to God and to the universe, in virtue of which He is God’s Mediator in creation, redemption, revelation, and redemption, (1-3). (2) He is superior to the angels, through whose mediation the law was given (1-14). (3) He is superior to Moses, the human agent in the giving of the law (3:6). (4) He is greater than Aaron, the high priest, the people’s representative before God. This leads to the central doctrine of the ep., the high-priesthood of Jesus. The following are the salient points in the elaborate treatment of this subject:

(1) Christ’s first, being by nature, high-priesthood is twofold: (a) His participation in all human experience (except sin), which guarantees His power of sympathy. Every high priest, as men’s representative before God, must be “taken from among men” (5:1). In the author’s view, the high priest lays great stress on the human nature and experiences of Christ (cf. 2.10.17; 4:15; 5:7). (b) His Divine appointment. Every priest must have a call from God. So Christ has been appointed priest, not indeed in the Aaronic line, but after the order of Melchizedek (5:1-10).

(2) The nature of His priesthood, its superiority to the Levitical priesthood.—The priests of the OT themselves needed atonement, for they were not sinless: Christ is holy, guileless, undefiled, and need not make atonement for His own sins. They were priests only for a time, and were many in number, for they were mortal; but He abideth forever, and His priesthood is eternal. They were dependent on the law of physical descent: He was a priest after the order of Melchizedek, whose priesthood did not depend on genealogy or pedigree, but who combined the functions of king with those of priest. In a word, their order was transient, temporary, shadowy; His belonged to the world of unchanging reality (ch.7).

(3) The realization of His high-priesthood.—A high priest implies a sacrifice; hence Christ must “have somewhat to offer” (8:3). In the Levitical system, the priest and the sacrifice are distinct from each other. But Christ offered not an external gift, but Himself. Much stress is laid on Christ's voluntary obedience (6:8; 10:7), progressively attained through suffering, and culminating in the abject sacrifice of His life (10:18). His sacrifice harmonizes with the principle that "apart from shedding of blood there is no remission" (9:22), although the principle is lifted from the physical to the spiritual realm. In working this out, the author makes use of analogies drawn from three parts of the Levitical ritual. (c) Christ's death was a sin offering. He has offered one final sacrifice for sins (10:12.18). As priest, he has made propitiation for the sins of the people" (2:17). He was "given for sinners, for all offered to bear the sins of many" (9:28). (b) The Sinaitic covenant (Ex 24:8) is made use of. Christ is "the mediator of a new [better] covenant" (8:6; 9:15; 12:24), i.e. the agent interposing between God and man in the establishment of a new relationship analogous to Moses in the old covenant. Even the first covenant was dedicated with blood, and so the blood of the Son of God was "the blood of the covenant" (10:29; cf Mk 14:24). On the directions in the word of the work of the covenant ("testament"), the author bases a twofold argument for the necessity of Christ's death (9:15f). (c) The ritual of the Day of Atonement furnishes another analogy. As the high priest once a year offered the victim most holy, so Christ has entered once for all the true spiritual sanctuary in heaven, and there He presents Himself to God as the Mediator able to make intercession for us with the Father (9:12.24-26; cf 7:25). He is the ministering priest in the true tabernacle, the immediate presence of God (6:2). Thus the ascension and session make possible the culminating of the mediatorial work of Christ in the eternal sacrifice and intercession within the veil. (4) The man-world efficacy of His mediatorialship.—The effect of Christ's death on man is described by the words "cleanse," "sanctify," "perfect" (9:14; 10:10.14.29; 13:12), words which have a ritualistic quite as much as an ethical sense, meaning the removal of the sense of guilt, dedication to God, and the securing of the privilege of full fellowship with Him. The ultimate blessing that comes to man through the work of Christ is the privilege of free, unrestricted access to God by the removal of the obstacle of guilt (4:16; 10:19f). (3) E. A. H. Gospel.—Aspects of Our Lord's teaching unassimilated by the other disciples, and therefore but meagerly touched on in the Synoptics, find prominence in the Johannine Epistles. Great emphasis is laid on the idea of salvation by revelation mediated through Jesus Christ. The historical revelation of God in the person and teaching of Jesus is the main subject of the Gospel. But in the Prologue we have the eternal background of the historical manifestation in the doctrine of the Logos, who, as Son in eternal fellowship with the Father, His mediator in creation, and the immanent principle of revelation in the world, is fitted to become God's Revealer in history (vs 11-18). His work on earth is to dispense light and life, knowledge of God and salvation. Through Him God gives to the world eternal life (3:16). He is the Water of Life (4:14; 7:57), the Bread of Life (6:48 ff), the Light of the World (8:12); it is by His light that salvation is mediated to men (6:52 f). He is the perfect revealer of God, hence the only means of access to the Father (14:6.9). It is on salvation by illumination and communion, rather than on salvation by reconciliation and atonement that chief stress is laid. Sacrifical or propitiatory language is not used of Christ's death. Yet emphasis is laid on the voluntary and vicarious character of His death. He lays down His life of Himself (16:18); "The good shepherd layeth down his life for the sheep" (10:11); "For the joy set before Him He endured the cross" (1:11). Christ's death was the supreme example of the law that self-sacrifice is necessary to the highest and most fruitful life (2:23 ff). In ch 17 we have a unique instance of Our Lord's intercessory prayer with the Father.

(2) The epistles.—In 1 Jn we find more explicit statements with regard to the connection between the death of Christ and sin. "The blood of Jesus His Son cleanseth us from all sin (1:7): "He was manifested to take away sins" (3:5); "If any man sin, we have an Advocate with the Father," i.e. a pleader who will mediate with God on our behalf, the ground of His intercessory efficacy being that He is the "propitiation for our sins" (2:2; 4:10, a term which links the Johannine doctrine to that of Paul, though 1 Jn represents Christ Himself, and not merely His death on the cross, as the propitiation). This latter term shows that an objective value is attached to the atonement, as in some way neutralizing or making amends with God, yet in such a way as not to contradict the principles of righteousness (cf "Jesus Christ the righteous," 2:1).

(3) The Apocalypse presents both aspects of Christ's mediatorialship, the first aspect associated with God in the government of the world and in judgment (3:21; 7:10; 16:1), holds the keys of death and Hades (1:18), is the Lord of lords and King of kings (17:14; 19:16), and is the Mediator of creation (21:14). On the other hand, by His sacrificial act He represents men before God. The most characteristic expression of this is the title "the Lamb" (29:4). By His blood the guilty are cleansed and made saints, purchased unto God (15:3; 7:14). The lamb is the symbol of the sacrificial love which is the heart of God's sovereignty (6:6). It is not clear whether the allusion in this title is to the paschal lamb or the Suffering Servant pictured as a lamb led to the slaughter (Isa 53:7), or to both. In any case it contains the idea of Christ's redemptive sacrifice, which is declared to be an essential part of God's eternal counsel (13:8, "the Lamb that hath been slain from the foundation of the world").

Conclusion.—Our inquiry will have shown how central and prominent is the idea of mediation throughout the Scriptures. We might even say it supplies the key to the unity of the Bible. In the OT the principle is given "in divers portions and in divers manners," but in the NT it converges in the doctrine of the person and work of the One final Mediator, the Son of God. Amid all the rich diversity of the various parts of the NT, there is one fundamental conception common to all, that of Christ as at once the Interpreter of God to men and the door of access for men to God. Especially is Christ's self-sacrifice presented as the effective cause of our salvation, as a means of removing the guilt and sin which stand as a barrier in the way of God's purpose concerning man and of man's fellowship with God. There is a tendency in some influential writers of today to speak disparagingly of the doctrine of the one Mediator, on the ground that it injures the direct relationship of man with God (e.g. R. Eucken, Truth of Religion, 583 ff). Here we can only inwardly sympathize. The whole idea of mediation is attested in universal Christian experience, and that, so far from standing in the way of our personal approach to God, it is a simple historical fact that apart from the work of Jesus we would not enjoy that free access to Him which is now our privilege.
MEDITATION, med-i-ta'shun (ἡμνία, ἑαυτῇ, ἐν τῷ καλῷ, σῶθα): “Meditation” is the tr of ἡμνία, from ἑαυτῇ, “to murmur,” “to have a low tone,” hence “to meditate!” (Ps 49 3); of ὕψιγκ, “sighing,” “moaning” (Ps 5 1; see ver 2); of ἐγγίζον, “the murmur” or dull sound of the harp, hence meditation (Ps 19 14, “Let . . . . the . . . . of my heart be acceptable unto thee”); of Προφήτης, “prophecy,” (Prov 10 34, “Let my meditation be sweet unto him!”); of σῶθα, a “bowing down,” “musing” (Ps 119 97,99; 2 Esd 10 5).

In the NT we have “to meditate” (Eccles 14 20, “Blessed is the man that shall meditate in wisdom,” RVm “most authorities read come to an end” [teleutōsai]; 39 1, “meditation” in the text of the A.V. and R.Vm, though there is lack of meditation is a great want in our modern religious life.

In the NT, we have “to meditate” (ποιηματικά, πρακτικά, “to take care beforehand”), Lk 21 14, and “meditate” (ποιηματικά, μεταλάβα, “to take care beforehand”); Acts 28 30; RV, “the sea of Cilicia and Pamphylia” (Acts 28 30) is better rendered “the sea which is off Cilicia and Pamphylia” (RV).

In the NT, references to the Mediterranean are common, esp. in the accounts of Paul’s voyages, for which see Paul, Jesus once (Mk 7 24 sq) came to or near the sea.

The Mediterranean basin was the scene of most ancient civilizations which have greatly influenced that of the western world, excepting those whose home was in the western world, the river, the Tigris and the Euphrates; and even these, their civilization, has been blended into it, so far as they could. As its name implies, it is an inland sea, united to the Atlantic only by the narrow Straits of Gibraltar.

In comparatively recent geological time it was also joined to the Red Sea, the alluvial deposits of the Nile, which have extended the line of the Delta, having with the aid of drifting desert sands subsequently closed the passage and joined the coasts of Asia and Africa. The total length of the Mediterranean is about 2,290 miles, its greatest breadth, about 1,080 miles, and its area about 1,000,000 sq. miles. It falls naturally into the western and eastern (Levant) halves, dividing at the line running from Tunisia to Sicily, where it is comparatively shallow; the western end is generally the deeper, reaching depths of nearly 6,000 ft.

On the N. it is intersected by the Italian and Balkan peninsulas, forming the Gulf of Lyons, the Adriatic and the Aegean.

The temperature of the Mediterranean is in summer warmer, in winter about the same as that of Atlantic. Its water has a slightly greater specific gravity, probably because of a larger proportionate evaporation.

MEEDA, mē-ē-dā. See MEEDA.

MEEDA, mē-ēd-a (Mešēd, Meżadd, but Swete, Δεδων, Dadd, following B; AV Meeda): The head of one of the families of Nethinim (temple slaves) who went up with Zerubbabel from the captivity (1 Esd 5:32); identical with "Meida" of Ezr 2:52 and Neh 7:54.

MEEKNESS, mēk'nes (תָּנָדָד, ταπαίτις, πραοτις, πραοτίς, πραοτίτις, πραοτίτις; "Meekness" in the OT (תנדה, התנדה) is from תן, "suffering," "oppressed") "afflicted," denoting the spirit produced under such experiences. The word is sometimes translated "poor" (Job 24:4, RVm "meek"; Am 5:4). "Humble" (Pr 9:12-18, RV "meek"); "lowly" (Pr 3:34; 16:19, RV "poor", "m"meek"). It is generally associated with some form of oppression. The "meek" were the special objects of the Divine regard and to them special blessings are promised (Pr 3:34; etc.). The meek shall eat and be satisfied; 25:9, "The meek will be in due justice; and the meek will teach his way"; 37:11, "The meek shall inherit the land"; 147:6, "Jeh up-holdeth the meek"; 149:4, "He will beautify the meek"; 31:18, "Victory"; of Isa 11:4; 29:19; 61:1, "Jehovah hath anointed me to preach good tidings unto the meek," RVm "poor"; Zeph 2:3; Ps 45:4, "because of [RVm "in behalf of"] truth and meekness and righteousness". Of Moses it is said that he was very meek, above all the men that were upon the face of the earth, notwithstanding the Divine revelations given him, and in the face of opposition (Nu 12:3; cf. 2 Cor 12:1-6). Meekness is ascribed even to Jeh himself (2 Sm 22:36, "Thy gentleness [תנדה] hath made me great"); cf Ps 18:36 (תנדה), RVm "condescension"; men are exhorted to seek it (Zeph 2:3, "Seek righteousness, seek meekness"); cf Prov 16:1; 16:14; 25:15; Eccl 4:10.

In the Apoc. also "meekness" holds a high place (Rev 1:27). The fear of the Lord is wisdom and instruction; faith and meekness are his delight. RV in "in the fear of God", "in faith", "in meekness", "in righteousness" (cf Ps 119:12; Prov 2:10; 3:4; 8:34). "The meek shall inherit the earth" (Mat 5:5; Ps 37:11; 39:7) - "meekness is the power of the Spirit" (Gal 5:23).

The conception of meekness, as it had been defined by Aristotle, was raised by Christianity to a much higher level, and associated with the commonly despised quality of humility (see s.v.). It was the spirit of the Saviour Himself (Mt 11:29), "I am meek [προδός] and lowly in heart" (cf 2 Cor 10:1, "by the meekness and gentleness of Christ"); it presupposes humility, flows from it, and finds expression in moderation (see s.v.). (See Trench, Syn. of N. T., 145; Wh., N. T. Lexicon, s.v.). Christians are exhorted to cherish it and show it in their relations to one another (Eph 4:2; Col 3:12; 1 Tim 6:11; Tit 3:2, "showing all meekness toward all men"); it ought to characterize Christian teachers or those in authority in "instructing [RVm "comforting""] them that oppose themselves" (2 Tim 2:25); the saving, "implanted" (RVm "inborn") word is to be received with "meekness" (Jas 1:21); a man is to "show by his good life his works in meekness of wisdom" (3:13) and to give reason for the hope that is in him, "with meekness and fear" (1 Pet 3:15).

The interchangeableness of "meek" with "poor," etc., in the OT ought to be specially noted. Our Lord's opening of His ministry at Nazareth (Lk 4:18), "He anointed me to preach good tidings to the poor", and His message to John (Mt 11:5), "The poor have good tidings preached to them", are in harmony therewith.

MEET, mēt, adj. (יוֹעֵשׁ, yō'ēsh; ἀγωγὸς, ἀγωγός): Various words are employed to express meekness, the sense of which is proper, worthy, or fit. We "have yō'ēsh, "straight," "in straightness" (2 Kgs 10:3, "meetest"); Jer 26:14, RV "right"); yōshar (Jer 37:5, RV "right!"); yōsher (Prov 11:24, RV "what is justly due"); "arōk, Aram. "meet" (Ezr 4:14); bōn, "sons of" (Dt 3:19, AV "meet for the war"); "Heb sons of power", "sons of men", "sons of the kōn, to be righted," etc (Ex 8:26); "āshā, "to be made," "used" (Ezk 15:5 bis, RVm "made into"); gālēh, "to be good or fit for" (Ezk 14:4, RV "probable"); "rā̂āh, "seen," "looked out, "chosen" (Est 2:9); azios, "worthy" (Mt 3:8; Acts 26:20, RV "worthy"); 1 Cor 16:4, 2 Thess 1:3, dikaios, "just," "right" (Phil 1:7, RV "right"); 2 Pet 1:18, RV "right"); "euthetos, "well set" (He 6:7); "euchrēstos, "very useful," "profitable" (2 Tim 2:21, "meet for the master's use"); "bdaros, "sufficient" (1 Cor 15:9); kibanādō, "to make sufficient" (Col 1:12); kalos, "beautiful," "honourable" (Mt 16:28, Mk 7:27); etc, "it be-ho(v)eth" (Lk 15:32; Rom 1:27, RV "due"). "For meet (supplied) (Rom 10:4, RV has "for surely it is meet to be said unto God") (Job 34:31), "For hath any said unto God?" In 2 Mac 9:12, we have dikaios, RV "right".

MEGIDDOD, mē-gid'dōs, MEGIDDO, mē-gid'dōn (מֶגָּדָד, "poet-hiđđon; MayešeĐ, Megiddô, Mageđ̓ Donna, Meǵada, Magadí): A royal city of the Canaanites, the king of which was slain by Joshua (Josh 12:21). It lay within the territory of Issachar, but was one of the cities assigned to Manasseh (Josh 17:11; 1 Ch 7:29). Manasseh, however, was not able to expel the Canaanites, who therefore continued to dwell in that land. Later, when the children of Israel were waxen strong, the Canaanites were put to taskwork (Josh 17:12; Jgs 1:27f.). The host of Sisera was drawn to the river Kishon, and here, "by the waters of Megiddo," the famous battle was fought (Jud 5). By the time of Solomon, Israel's supremacy was unquestioned. Megiddo was included in one of his administrative districts (2 Ch 9:26). It was one of the cities which he fortified (9:15). Ahaziah, mortally wounded at the ascent of Gur, fled to Megiddo to die (2 Kgs 27). At Megiddo, Josiah, king of Judah, attempted to arrest Pharaoh-neecho and his army on their march to the north against the king of Assyria. Here the Egyptian monarch "slew him . . . when he had seen him," and from Megiddo went the sorrowful procession to Jerus with Josiah's corpse (2 Kgs 23:29f.; 2 Ch 35:20f.). The sad tale is told again in 1 Esd 1:25ff. The "mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddo" became a poetical expression for the deepest and most despairing grief (Zec 12:11). See also ARMAGEDDON.

The association of the city of Megiddo with Taanach (Tell Ta'anek) points to a position on the south edge of the plain of Esdraelon. In confirmation of this, we read (RP, 1st series, II, 35-47) that Thothmes III captured Megiddo, after having defeated the Palestinian allies who opposed him. He left his camp at Aruna the morning of the battle, after following a defile (possibly Wady 'Arakah), he approached Megiddo from the S. We should thus look for the city where the pass opens on the plain; and here, at Khân el-Leihûn, we find extensive ruins on both sides of a stream where the defile fell before falling into the Kishon. We may identify the site with Megiddo, and the stream with the wheels of Megiddo." Pharaoh-necoh would naturally take the same line of march, and his advance could be nowhere more hopefully opposed than at el-Lejjûn. Tell el-Mutasellim, a graceful mound hard by, on the edge of the plain, may have formed the acropolis of Megiddo.

The name Muṣūdādha attaches to a site 3 miles S. of Betsiâd, the Jordan valley. Here Conder would place Megiddo. But while there is a resemblance in the name, the site really suits none of the Bib. data. The phrase "Ta'anach by the waters of Megiddo" alone confines us to a very limited area. No position has yet been suggested which meets all the conditions as well as el-Lejjûn.

The Khan here shows that the road through the pass from E德拉l to the plain of Sharon and the coast was still much frequented in the Middle Ages.

MEHETABEL, mē-hē'ta-bel, MEHETABEL, mē-hē'ta-bel (מֵיהֵתָבֵל, mēhē'tābē'l, "whom God makes happy")

(1) Daughter of Matred, wife of Hadad or Hadar, the 5th and apparently last of the kings of Edom (Gen 36 39; 1 Ch 1 50).

(2) Grandfather of that Shemaiah who played a treacherous part against Nehemiah at the suggestion of Tobiah and Sanballat, by trying to persuade Nehemiah to commit sacrilege (Neh 6 10–13).

MEHIDA, mē-hī'da (מֵיהִדה, mēhī'dā), "re-nowned"; "Medea" [1 Esd 5 32]): Ancestor and patronymic of a family of Nethinim who came back from Babylon with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 52; Neh 7 54).

MEHIR, mē-hīr (מְהִיר, mēhīr, "price," "hire"): A descendant of Judah, son of Heluk, nephew of Shuaah (1 Ch 4 11). Perug, a Chaldean name of equivalent meaning, is given for this person in the Tg of R. Joseph.

MEHOLATHITE, mē-hōlā-thite (מֵיהוֹלָטִית, mēhōlā'tīt): The gentle designation of Adriel, the son of Barzillai, who married Merab, the daughter of King Saul (1 S 18 19; 2 S 21 5), the name Michael in 2 S 21 5 being doubtless a copyist's error. See ABEIL-MEHOLAH.

MEHUJAJEL, mē-hūjā'-el (מֶהוּיָגֵל, mēhūyā'ēl, mēhūjā'ēl, "emitter of God"): A descendant of Cain through Enoch and Jared (Gen 4 18). The list in Gen 5 12 ff is a working-over of the same material of genealogy by another hand at a different date of spelling (cf. spelling of Chaucer and that of today). In that case, Mehuelad was to be the correspondent name to Mehujael (see Expos T, X, 353).

MEHUMAN, mē-hū'man (מֶהוּמָן, mēhu'mān) [Est 1 10]): A eunuch of Ahasuerus, the first of the seven chamberlains.

MEHUMANIM, mē-hū'mīm (מֶהוּמִים, mēhu'mīm). See MEHUMAN.

ME-JARKON, mē-jär'kon (מֶה-יָרָקון, mē ha-yärā'kon; בֵּלָאָסָא בְּרָקָן, belāsā bərākān; Hīsākān: The Heb may mean "yellow water." The phrase is lit. "the waters of Jarkon." LXX reads "and from the river Jarkon and the boundary near Joppa." From this possibility we should infer a place called Jarkon in the lot of Dan; but no name resembling this has been found. The text (Josh 19 46) is corrupt.

MEKONAH, mē-kō'nā (מֶהֽוּקְוָן, mēkō'ônāh). See MEKONAH.

MELATIAH, mē-lat'ia (מֶהֽוּלִּיתָא, mēlat'ēa, "Jeh's deliverance"): A Gibeonite who assisted in building the wall of Jerus under Nehemiah (Neh 3 7).

MELCHI, mēl'ki (Tisch. Treg., WH, MALK, Melchi; T R, MALK, Melchi): The name of two ancestors of Jesus according to Lk's genealogy, one being in the 4th generation before Joseph, the husband of Mary, the other being in the 3rd generation before Zerubbabel (Lk 3 24 25).

MELCHIAH, mēl'-ki'a (מֶהֽוּלִּיה, mēlē'ēa, "Jeh's king"): A priest and father of Pashur (Jer 21 1 AV); elsewhere and in RV called MALCHIÁH and MALCHIÁH (q.v.).

MELCHIAS, mēl'-ki-as (B, MALKÁS, Melchetas, BPA, -as, -as): Name of three men who had taken "strange wives":

(1) 1 Esd 9 26 = "Malchijah" (Ezr 10 25).

(2) 1 Esd 9 32 = "Malchijah" (Ezr 10 31).

(3) One of those who stood at Ezra's left hand when the law was read (1 Esd 9 44) = "Malchijah" (Neh 8 4), possibly identical with (1) or (2).

MELCHIEL, mēl'-ki-ēl (MALKÁH Melchétēl, B, MALKÁH, Melchietēl: The father of Charamis, one of the governors of Bethulia (Jth 6 15). Other readings are סֶלֶם, Sollem, and סְכָרִי, Mochiasl.

MELCHISHUA, mēl'-ki-shō'ā (מֶהֽוּלִּישְׁוָע, mēlē'ēshō'āh, "king's help"). See MELCHISHUA.

MELCHIZEDEK, mēl'-zi-dē'ēk, and (AV in He) MELCHISEDEC (מֶהֽוּלִּיזֵדֵק, malkit-sedēk, "Čedek, or Cidikh is my king" [Gen 14 18 ff; Ps 110 4]; MALKIZĐÈK, Melchisedek [He 5 6 10; 6 20; 7 1 10 11 15 17]): The name is explained in He 7 2 as "king of righteousness," with -ē as the old genitive ending; but the correct explanation is no doubt the one given above; of Adoni-zedek in Jos 10 1, where LXX with Jgs 1 5 7 has Adoni-bezek. M. was king of Salem (= Jesus) and a priest unto 'El Elyön (Gen 14 18). He brought bread and wine to Abraham after the latter's victory over the kings, and also bestowed upon him the blessing of 'El Elyön. Abraham gave him "a tenth of all," i.e. of the booty probably, unless it be of all his possessions. Gen 14 22 identifies Jeh with 'El Elyön, the title of the Deity as worshipped at Jerus; and so He 7 1 ff, following LXX of Gen 14 18 ff, calls M. "priest of God Most High," i.e. Jeh.

Skinner (Gen 271, where JTS, XVI, vi, 2, and Asm M § 1 are cited) points out that the Masoretes called "high priests of God most high." Hence some hold that the story of M. is an invention of Judæans, but Gunkel (Gen 285 ff) maintains that he is a traditional, if not a historical, character.

Ps 110 4 makes the king-priest who is addressed there a virtual successor of M., and the kings of Jerus might well, as Gunkel suggests, have been considered successors of M. in the same way that Charlemagne was regarded as the successor of the Caesars, and the latter as successors of the Pharaohs in Egypt. This leads naturally to an early date being ascribed to Ps 110.

The thought of a priest after the order of M. is taken up by the author of He. He wanted to prove the claim of Christ to be called priest. It was impossible, even had he so wished it, for the latter Jesus as an Aaronic priest, for He was descended from the tribe of Judah and not from that of Levi (7 14). The words of Ps 110 4 are taken to refer to Him
(5 ff.), and in 7 ff. the order of M. is held to be higher than that of Aaron, for the superiority of M. was acknowledged by Abraham (a) when he pried tithes to M. and (b) when he was blessed by M. for "the less is blessed of the better." It might be added that Jesus can be considered a priest after the order of M. in virtue of His descent from David, if the latter be regarded as successor to M. But the author of H. does not explicitly say this. Further, Aaron is only a "type" brought forward in H. to show the more excellent glory of the work of Jesus, whereas M. is "made like unto the Son of God" (7), and Jesus is said to be "after the like manner in Melchizedek" (7:15).

He 7:1 ff. presents difficulties. Where did the author get the material for this description of M.? (1) M. is said to be "without father, without mother, [i.e.] without genealogy"; and (2) he is described as "having neither beginning of days nor end of life"; he "abides a priest continually." The answer is perhaps to be had among the Am. T. and M., among which are at least 6, probably 8, letters from a king of Urusalm to Amenophis IV, king of Egypt, whose "slave" the former calls himself. Urusalm is to be identified with Jerusa, and the letters belong to c 1400 BC. The name of this king is given as Abd-Khiba (or Abd-hiba), though Hommel, quoted by G. A. Smith, Jerus., II, 14, n. 7, reads Arad-Chiba. Zimmer, in Z. A., 1891, 246, says that it should be read Abdihta, and so Sayce (HDB, III, 336b) calls him 'Ebedhó tōb.' The king tells his Egypt overlord, "Neither my father nor my mother set me in this place: the mighty arm of the king (or, according to Sayce, "the arm of the mighty king") established me in my father's house" (Letter 102 in Berlin collection, II, 9–13; also no. 103, II, 25–28; no. 104, II, 13–15; see, further, H. Winckler, Die Thonafelien von Tell-el-Amarra; Knudtzon, Bei träge zur Assyriologie, IV, 101 ff., 279 f., cited by G. A. Smith, Jerus., II, 8, n. 1.)

It thus becomes clear that possibly tradition identified M. with Abd-Khiba. At any rate the idea that M. was "without father, without mother, [i.e.] without genealogy" can easily be explained if the words of Abd-Khiba concerning himself can have been also attributed to M. The words meant originally that he acknowledged that he did not come to the throne because he had a claim on it through descent; he owed it to appointment. But Jewish interpretation explained them as indicating that he had no father or mother. Ps 100:4 has spoken of the king there as being "a priest for ever after the order of Melchizedek," and this seems to have been taken to involve the perpetuity of M. as also priest. M. was then thought of as "having neither beginning of days" = "without father, without mother, without genealogy," and again as not having "end of life" = "abides a priest continually." Hence he is "made like unto the son of God," having both beginning of days and end of life. We get another NT example of Jewish interpretation in Gal 4:21 ff. We have no actual proof that M. is identical with Abd-Khiba; possibly the reference to the former as being "without father," etc., is not to be explained as above. But why should M. be left alone, and be after all of the OT characters be thought of in this way of? Westcott, He, 199, has a suggestive thought about M.: "The lessons of his appearance lie in the appearance itself. Abraham marks a new departure, but before the fresh order is established we have a vision of the old in its superior majesty; and this, on the eve of disappearance, may be blessing to the new." On the references to M. in Philo see Westcott, op. cit., 201; F. Renoult, Thes. Ap., 58 ff.; and esp. (with the passages and authorities cited there) G. Milligan, Theology of Ep. to the He, 208 ff.

The conclusions we come to are: (1) There was a tradition in Jerus. of M., a king in pre-Israelite times, who was also priest to 'El Elyon. This is the origin of Gen 14:18 ff., where 'El Elyon is identified with Jeh. (2) Ps 110 of this tradition and the Psalmist's king is regarded as M.'s successor. (3) The Ep. to the He makes use of (a) Ps 110, which is taken to be a prophecy of Christ, (b) of Gen 14 18 ff., and (c) of oral tradition which was not for long that tradition that is possibly explained by the Am. T. See, further, arts. by Sayce, Driver, and Hommel in Ezopos, T. VII, 9; see also Jerusalem.

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS MELEA, mēl’ē-a, mel’ē-a (Melchizedek): An ancestor of Jesus in Lk's genealogy (Lk 3:31).

MELECH, mēl’ēk (mēlēk, "king"): Great-grandson of Jonathan, son of Saul, grandson of Mephibosheth or Meribaal (1 Ch 8:35; 9:41).

MELICU, mēl’ē-kū (mēlē-kă̂, also mēl’ē-kă̂, "regnant"): Same as MALLUCI (q.v.).

MELITA, mēl’ē-ta (Máltē, Melité, Acts 28:1): Is now generally identified with Malta. The former error in attributing the references to the geography of Melita on the E. coast of the Adriatic Sea was due to the ancient practice of employing the term Adria to include the Ionian and Sicilian seas. Malta is the largest of a group of islands including Gozo and the isleta Comino, Cominotto and Filfla, lying about 56 miles from the southern extremity of Sicily, 174 from the mainland of Italy, and 187 from the African coast. Malta itself is 17½ miles long and 9½ broad, and contains an area of 58 sq. miles. Its modern capital is Valetta, situated in 35°54′ N. lat. and 14°31′ E. long. The central position of Malta in the Mediterranean Sea gave it great importance as a naval station. It was probably at first a Phoenician colony, and later passed under the influence, if not domination, of the Sicilian Greeks. But the Romans captured it from the Carthaginians in 218 BC (Livy xxi.51) and attached it definitely to the province of Sicily. Under Rom rule the inhabitants were famous for their industry, esp. in the production of textile fabrics, probably of native creation. The celebrated vestis melitensis was a fine and soft material for clothes and for the covering of couches (Cicerò Ver. ii.72.176; ii.74.183; iv.46.103; Dio dorus v.12.22). At the time when Paul visited the island it would seem that the administration was intrusted to a deputy of the propraetor of Sicily, who is referred to as prōtōs Melitaitōn (Acts 28:7; CIG, 5784), or Melitænum prīnum omnium (CIL, x, 7485) (see Puhllus). A bay 2½ miles N.W. of Valetta, the mouth of which is held by tradition to be the place where the vessel that bore Paul ran ashore, tallies admirably with the description of the locality in Acts. The Admiralty charts indicate places near the west side of the entrance to the bay, where the depth is first 20 ft. and then 15 ft., while the rush of the breakers in front of the little island of Salmoneta and behind it suit the reference to a place "where two seas meet" (Acts 27:41). The inlet is called the Bay of St. Paul. The topographical question has been exhaustively treated by Ramsay in St. Paul's Traveller.

GEORGE H. ALLEN MELODY, mel’ō-di: μελόδι, zvárdh, a musical piece or song to be accompanied by an instrument (Isa 51:9); an instrument of praise (Am 5:25); nuḡan, “to play on any musical instrument” "Make sweet melody, sing many songs" (Jsa 23:16); ἔλαυνα, psalṭī, to celebrate the praises of God with music (Eph 5:19). See Music.
MEMBERS, mem'ber ([1] ⲳⲧⲓ, χώρας; μέλος, ρίζας; [2] ⲳⲧⲓ, ⲧⲧⲧⲃⲧⲧⲧⲧ, "membrum virile" [Dt 23:1]): The first Hebrew word is derived from a root meaning "to knead," "to mold in clay," "to create." It therefore denotes any feature or part of the body. So the tongue is a little member, and boasteth great things (Jas 3:5). "The members" is equivalent with "the body" (which see; cf Ps 139:16 AV). The members are not self-governing, but execute the orders of the mind, obeying either the lower nature in the commission of sin or iniquity, unrighteousness and uncleanness (Rom 13:19), or following the higher nature, the Divine impulses in the fulfilling of the law of Christ (6:19).

By nature, the "law in my members" (Rom 7:23) is opposed to the better nature (Jas 4:1) until by "re-generation" (which see) this condition is changed, when the Spirit of Christ becomes the governing power, using all our abilities, i.e., all our members, in the execution of His plans. This is not done while we remain passive, but we have actively to yield or yield ourselves to our members to His service (Rom 6:19). Therefore our bodies must not be desecrated by baser uses (1 Cor 6:19). The Lord Jesus illustrates the severe discipline which is needed to subdue the members of every Christian to perform the mission under the higher law of the Spirit by the goodness and mercy of the right eye, which is to be plucked out, and the right hand, which is to be cut off (Mt 5:29-30), and St. Paul speaks of putting off to death (AV "mortifying") the "members which are upon the earth" (Col 3:5).

It is the difference in character and gifts of individual Christians which leads St. Paul to speak of the variety of members, which, though of manifold functions, are equally important to the completeness of the body. It is thus in the manifold variety of the body of Christ (1 Cor 12:12-27; Eph 4:16). In Christ there are members of Christ, who is the head (Eph 1:22; 4:15; 5:23), who are members one of another (Rom 12:5; Eph 4:25).

In Dt 23:1 the Israelite law against emasculation is referred to, and a religious disability is stated for the circumcision of the male in Semitic and other neighbors of Israel often castrated for religious purposes in the temple service of various divinities and for functions in princely palaces and harems. Heathen monarchs almost invariably had large numbers of these unfortunate, who frequently attained to positions of high power and responsibility. Herodotus states their frequent occurrence in the Persians (Hist. vi.52), and in the history of 2 K 20:18 and Dn 3:3. It appears as impossible that Daniel and his friends belonged to this class. In later years, their presence is certain in Israel (1 S 3:13; RVv; Jer 38:7; Mt 19:12). See also CONCISSION; EXONIUM.

MEMORIAL, mem'o-ral, MEMORY, mem'or-i- (anoia, 'azkār; αἰμη, 'azkār; אذكر, א'זאקר, אזקר; 'azkār, אזקר, "memoro", making, "memor", "mem'or-y", "mem'orial"); "Memory" as the tr of 'azkār is a sacrificial term, that which brings the offerer into remembrance before God, or brings God into favorable remembrance with the offerer; it is used of the burning of a portion of the meal offering, RV (AV "meat-offering"); better, cereal offering, on the altar (Lev 2:2, RV "as the memorial"); 9:16; 5:12, RV "as"; 24:7; Nu 5:26, RV "as"); as the tr of 'azkār (zaḵār), it is a memorial in the sense of a remembrance (zaḵār, zaḵer, Ex 3:15; the memorial [name of Jeh] herself; hence) for "memory," for "remembrance" (Ps 30:4 ARV; 97:12, ERV "holy name," in "Heb holy name"); 102:13; 135:13; Isa 26:8; Hos 12:5, ERV "memorial") or "memorial" (Est 9:28; Ps 9:6, ARV "rememberance"); zaḵkārān, "a remembrance" (Ex 12:14; 13:9; Lev 23:24; Nu 5:15 [of the meal offering]; Josh 4:7; Neh 2:20; Zec 6:14); the Passover feast was to be in this sense a memorial...over" (Ex 12:14; 13:9); so also the abbreviation (Dt 6:4); "memorial" (Isa 21:6; Wisd 4:1 [memēnu]; RV "memory"); 4:19; Eccles 45:1 [memōnosoun;]; 49:1; 1 Macc 7:12; 53, RV "memorial.

"Memorial" occurs in the NT as the tr of memōnosoun, "a token of remembrance" (Mt 26:13; Mk 14:19, Acts 10:4. "Thy prayers and thine alms are gone up for a memorial before God," which suggests the sense in which "memorial" was used in the sacrificial ritual, and also the "better sacrifices" of the new dispensation.

Memory is the tr of zaḵer (zaḵer) (Ps 109:15; 145:7; Prov 10:7; Ecc 9:5; Isa 26:14, RV "remembrance"); it occurs also in 1 Macc 3:29; 2 Macc 7:20. S. J. B. DICK. "to have, or hold fast, was rendered in 1 Cor 15:2 AV "keep in memory." We hold fast, ERV "hold it fast," i.e., the word preached to them.

MEMPHIS, mem'phi-s: The ancient capital of Egypt, 12 miles S. of the modern Cairo. The Gr and Rom form of the name was derived from the Coptic form Menf (now Arab. Menf), the abbreviation of the Egyptian name Men-nejer, "the good haven." This name was applied to the part of the Nile near the cemetery above the city; some have thought the city name to have been derived from the pyramid, but this is unlikely, as the city must have had a regular name before that. It may perhaps mean "the excellence of Men," its founder. It appears still more shortened in Hos 9:6 as Meph (memph), and in Isa (19 13), Jer (2 16), and Ezek (30 13) as Noph (noph).

The classical statements show that the city in Rom times was about 8 miles long and 4 miles wide, and the indications of the site agree

2. Political Position

Egypt from the 1st to the XVIth Dynasty; it shared supremacy with Thebes during the XVIIIth to XXVth Dynasties, and with Siis of the XXXth Dynasty. Alexandria then gradually obscured it, but the governor of Egypt signed the final capitulation to the Arabs in the old capital. While other cities assumed a political equality, yet Memphis probably remained supreme until the Ptolemies.

The oldest center of settlement was probably the shrine of the sacred bull, Apis or Happy, which was in the S. of the city. This worship was doubtless prehistoric, so that when the first king of all Egypt, Mena, founded his capital, there was already a nucleus. His great work was taking in land to the N., and founding the temple of the dynastic god Ptah, which was extended until its enclosure included as much as the great temple of Amon at Thebes, about 3 furlongs long and 2 furlongs wide. To the N. of this was the sacred lake; beyond that, the palace and camp. Gradually the fashionable quarters moved northward in Egypt, in search of fresher air; the rulers had moved 10 miles N. to Babylon by Rom times, then to Fostat, then Cairo, and lastly now to Abassiyeh and Kubbek, altogether a shift of 18 miles in 8,000 years.

After the shrine of Apis the next oldest center is that of Ptah, founded by Mena. This was recently cleared in yearly sections by the British School, finding principally sculptures of the XVIIIth and XI Xth Dynasties. The account of the north gate given by Herodotus, that it was built by Amenemhat III, has been verified by finding his name on the lintel. An immense sphinx of alabaster 26 ft. long has also been found. To the E. of this was the temple of the foreign quarter, the temple of King Proteus in Gr accounts, where foreign pottery and terracotta heads have been found. Other temples that are known to have existed in Memphis are those of Hathor, Neit, Amen, Imhotep, Isis, Osiris-Sokar, Knumu, Bastel, Tuthu, Anubis and Sebek.

A large building of King Siamen (XXIst Dynasty) has been found S. of the Ptah temple. To the N. of the great temple lay the fortress, and in it the palace mound of the XXVth Dynasty covered two acres. It has been completely cleared, but the lower part is still to be examined. The north end of it was at least 90 ft. high, of brickwork, filled up to half the height by a flooring raised on cellular brickwork. The great court was about 110 ft. square, and its roof was supported by 16 columns 45 ft. high.

The principal sights of Memphis now are the great colossus of Rameses II, the lesser colossus of the same, and the immense alabaster sphinx. The cemetery of the city is the most important in Egypt; it lies 2 miles to the W. on the desert, and is known as Saqqareh, from So-kar, the god of the dead. See SAQQAREH.

W. M. FLINDERS PETRIE

MEMUCAN, mé-mu'kan; derivation unknown but probably of Pers origin [Est 1 14.16.21]: One of "the seven princes of Persia and Media, who saw the king's face, and sat first in the kingdom." Ahasuerus consults these men, as those "that knew law and judgment," as to the proper treatment of the rebellious Vashti. Memucan is the spokesman of the reply. He recommends Vashti's deposition so that "all the wives will give to their husbands honor, both to great and small." This advice is adopted and incorporated into a royal decree—with what success is not said.

MENAHEM, men'a-hem (ם Enemies), "one who comforts": Mavâq, Mana b; 2 K 15 14–22): Son of Gadi and 16th king of Israel. He reigned 10 years. Menahem was probably the officer in charge of the royal troops in Tirzah, one of the king's residences, at the time of the murder of Zechariah by Shallum. Hearing of the deed, he brought up his troops and avenged the death of his master by putting Shallum to death in Samaria. He then seized the vacant throne. His first full year may have been 758 BC (others, as seen below, put later).

The country at this time, as depicted by Hosea and Amos, was in a deplorable condition of anarchy and lawlessness. Menahem, with a strong hand, enforced his occupation of the throne. One town only seems to have refused to acknowledge him. This was Tiphsah, a place 6 miles S.W. of Shechem, now the ruined village of Khurbet Tafsah. As Menahem is said to have attacked this inclosed city from Tiphsah, lying to its N., it is probable that he took it on the way to Samaria, before proceeding to do battle with Shallum. If this was so, it is some explanation of the cruelty with which his inhabitants (ver 16). One such instance of severity was enough. The whole kingdom was at his feet.

He proved to be a strong and determined ruler, and during the 9 or 10 years of his governorship had no further internecine trouble to contend with.

But there was another source of disquiet. Assyria, under Pul, had resumed her advance to the W. and threatened the kingdoms of Palestine. Menahem resolved on a policy of diplomacy, and, rather than risk a war with the conqueror of the East, agreed to the payment of a heavy tribute of 1,000 talents of silver. To raise this sum he had to assess his wealthier subjects to the extent of 50 shekels each. As there are 3,000 shekels in a talent of silver, it is obvious that asthma generosity, "mighty men of wealth," must have been laid under contribution in this levy—an indication at once of the enormity of the tribute, and of the prosperity of the country at the time. However short-sighted the policy, its immediate purpose was attained, which was that the hand of the Assyrian king "might be with him to confirm the kingdom in his hand" (ver 19).
A difficulty attaches to the dates of this period. The Pul of 2 K 15 19 and 1 Ch 5 26 is now identified with Tiglath-pileser III, who took this title on ascending the throne of Assyria in 745 BC. In an inscription of Tiglath-pileser, Menahem appeared as Mene or Menahem (Menahem the Samaritan), together with Rezin (Rezu in Assyrian) of Damascus and Hiram (Hiram) of Tyre. The date given to this inscription is 738 BC, whereas the last year we can give to Menahem is 749, or 10 years earlier.

The chronological difficulty which thus arises may be met in one of two ways. Either the inscription, like that on the black obelisk of Menelaus, is a forger's deception designed to deceive the world, but, like all his predecessors, adhered to the worship of the golden calf.

5. Proposed of Kurkh (see note), was written some years after the events to which it refers and contains records of operations in which Tiglath-pileser took part before he became king; or Pekah—who was on the throne of Israel in 738 (?)—is spoken of under the dynastic name Menahem, though he was not of his family. The former of these hypotheses is that which the present writer is inclined to adopt. (By other dates the names of Menahem are lowered in conformity with the inscription; see Chronology of the OT.)

Menahem attempted no reformation in the national religion but, like all his predecessors, adhered to the worship of the golden calf.

6. Character calves. On this account, like them, he incurs the heavy censure of the historian.

MENAN, mē′nan. See Manna.

Mene, Mene, Tekel, Upharsin, mē′ne, mē′ne, tē′kele, ʿūfārṣin, men′a, men′ā, tekēl, ʿəfārṣin (Mene, Tekel, Upharsin; Theod., Μήναι, Τικέλ, Ὠφαρσίν; Theod., Μανῆ, Τικέλ, φάρσης, Μανῆ, θεκέλ, ϕαρῆς); These are the words that, according to Daniel's reading, were inscribed on the walls of Belshazzar's palace and that caused the great commotion on the occasion of his last feast (Dan 5:25). As the only authority that we have for the reading is that of Daniel, it seems but fair that the interpretation of the terms be left to the person who gave us the text. According to his interpretation, there is a double sense to be found in the three different words of the inscription (Dan 5:26-28). Mēne, which, however, it is pointed out, cannot be taken from the verb mēnah (Heb mēnah; Bab manu), is said to have indicated that God had numbered (the days of) Belshazzar's kingdom and finished it (or delivered it up). Both of these meanings can be shown to be proper to the mēne, Tekel, the contrary, is interpreted as coming from two roots: the first, tēkele, "to weigh," and the second, kele, "to be light or wanting" (Heb kalal; kal kalal).

Pāras (or parash) also is interpreted as coming from two roots: first, pāras, "to divide!" (Heb pāras or pārash; Bab parāsu), and the second as denoting the proper name Pāras, "Persia." Thus interpreted, the whole story hangs together, makes good sense, and is fully justified by the context and by the language employed. If the original text was in Bab, the signs were cunning; if they were in Aram, the consorts alone were written, and hence the reading would be doubtful. In either case, the inscription was apparent but not readable, except by Daniel with the aid of God, through whom also the seer was enabled to give the proper interpretation. That Daniel's interpretation was accepted by Belshazzar and the rest shows that the interpretation of the signs was reasonable and convincing when once it had been made. We see, therefore, no good reason for departing from the interpretation that the Book of Daniel gives as the true one.

As to the interpretation of the inscription, it makes no difference whether the signs represented a mina, a shekel, and two parases, as has been recently suggested by M. Clermont-Ganneau. In this case the meaning is warina (Menahem the Samaritan), together with Rezin of Damascus and Hiram of Tyre. The date given to this inscription is 738 BC, whereas the last year we can give to Menahem is 749, or 10 years earlier.

The chronological difficulty which thus arises may be met in one of two ways. Either the inscription, like that on the black obelisk of Menelaus, is a forger's deception designed to deceive the world, but, like all his predecessors, adhered to the worship of the golden calf.

5. Proposed of Kurkh (see note), was written some years after the events to which it refers and contains records of operations in which Tiglath-pileser took part before he became king; or Pekah—who was on the throne of Israel in 738 (?)—is spoken of under the dynastic name Menahem, though he was not of his family. The former of these hypotheses is that which the present writer is inclined to adopt. (By other dates the names of Menahem are lowered in conformity with the inscription; see Chronology of the OT.)

Menahem attempted no reformation in the national religion but, like all his predecessors, adhered to the worship of the golden calf.

6. Character calves. On this account, like them, he incurs the heavy censure of the historian.

MENELAUS, men-e′lous (Menalos, Menelao): According to the less likely account of Jos (Ant, XII, v, 1; XV, iii, 1; XX, x, 3), Menelaus was a brother of Jason and Onias III, and his name was really Onias. But it is very unlikely that there should be two brothers of the same name. The account of 2 Macc is more credible—that Menelaus was the brother of the notorious Simon who suggested to the Syrians the plundering of the temple; he was thus of the tribe of Benjamin (2 Macc 4:23; with 3 4) and not properly eligible to the high-priesthood. He was intrusted by Jason (171 BC), who had supplanted Onias, with contributions to the king of Syria, Antiochus Epiphanes, and by outbidding Jason in presenting the king with a golden crown, was elevated to the office of high priest for himself (4 23 f), 171 BC. Menelaus returned with "the passion of a cruel tyrant" to Jerus, and Jason fled. But as Menelaus failed to pay the promised amount, both he and Sostratus, the governor, were summoned to Jerusalem, where the king, Lysimachus, the brother of Menelaus, was left at Jerus in the meantime as deputy high priest. The king was called from his capital to suppress an insurrection of Tarsus and Mallus. Menelaus took advantage of his absence to win over Andronicus, the king's deputy, by rich presents stolen from the temple. For this sacrilege Onias III sharply reprimed him and fled to a sanctuary, Daphne, near Antioch. Andronicus was then further persuaded by Menelaus to desert his retreat and murder him (4 34 f)—an act against which both Jews and Greeks protested to the king on his return, and secured deserved punishment for Andronicus. Meanwhile, the oppression of Lysimachus, abetted by Menelaus, caused a bloody insurrection in Jerus, in connection with which a Jewish deputation brought an accusation against Menelaus on the occasion of Antiochus' visit to Tyre. Menelaus bribed Ptolemy, son of Dorymenes, to win over the king in order to secure the execution of "those hapless men, who, if they had pleaded even before Scythians, would have been discharged uncondemned" (4 39 f). Menelaus returned in triumph to his office. But Jason, taking advantage of Epiphanes' absence in Egypt and a false rumor of his death, made a bloody but unsuccessful attempt upon the city, in order to secure his enemy's life again; his rival took refuge in the citadel. The king returned in fury, caused a three-days' slaughter of the citizens, rifled the temple with Menelaus as guide, and left him as one of his agents to keep the Jews in subjection (2 Mac 5 1 f.). He appears next and for the last time in the reign of Eupator in 162 BC. Lysias, the king's chancellor, accused him to the king as the cause of all the troubles in Judaea (2 Mac 13 3–8). Eupator caused him to be brought to Beroea and there—before, according to 2 Mac, loc. cit., or, according to Jos, Ant. XII, ix, 7, the invasion of Judaea by Eupator and Lysias—to be put to death by being flung from the top of a high tower into the ashes of which it was full—a fitting end for such a wretch. S. Angus MENESTHEUS, mē-nēstheus, mē-nēsthes'us (Mēnōsēus, Menestheus, A. Menestōrus, Menesthesōs): The father of Apollonius, a general of Ephanes (2 Mac 4 21 and in 2 Mac 4 of RV, following a conjecture of Hort [Mēnēsēus, Menesethōs, for mēnōsēus this, mainethai hēsō; the latter inserted in Swete and Fritzsche]). “Son of Menestheus” is added to distinguish this Apollonius from “A. son of Thraxeus” (2 Mac 3 5) and “A. son of Gennaeus” (12 2). See Apollonius.

MENI, mē'ni: Destiny, a god of Good Luck, possibly the Pleiades (Isa 45 11 m). See Astrol.-out, 10; Gap.

MENNA, mē'nna (Mēnā, Menand, WH, Tres., Tisch.; Malvāv, Mainān, TR; AV Menan): An ancestor of Jesus, a great-grandson of David (Lk 3 31).

MENUCHAH, men-ū'kah (μηνοκή, mēnokēth, “place of rest”; AV Menuchah, men-ūkah): Rendered in Jgs 20 45 AV “with ease,” RV “at their resting-place.” Both, however, have a marginal suggestion which would make the word a place-name, which would then more naturally read “from Nuhah over against Gibeah,” thus describing the ground over which the slaughter of the Benjamites occurred. In 1 Ch 2 2 the word “Nuhah” occurs as that of a Benjamite clan. The place intended is perhaps Manahath (q.v.).

MENUOHOTH, men-ū'oth (μηνοὐθ, mēnouthōth, “dwellings”; AV μηνουθ, ManuOTHes): The first form is the RV transliterated in the name; the second form is AV retained by RV in the passages where the word occurs (1 Ch 2 52; cf ver 54). The people here spoken of by AV as “half of the ManuOTHes” are mentioned as descendants of Salmon (ver 54), while those mentioned as MenuOthon are mentioned as descendants of Judah through Shobal, father of Kiriath-jearim. Both words are from the same root. AV keeps the same designation for both passages, while RV has marked the difference in spelling by changing the first passage and following AV in the second. Both sections of the family belong to the clan Caleb, and it would seem that they became the dominant people in the otherwise unknown town of Mananath, so that it came to be regarded as belonging to Judah. It may be connected with the Menuchah (RV “Meunah”) suggested as a place-name in Jgs 20 43 m. In the LXX between vs 59 and 60 of Josh ch 15 the name of 11 cities are inserted, among them being a Manocho whose Heb equivalent gives the word. It is difficult to identify, and the Vulg version by translating “dudium requiectionum”! See Mananath.

MEONENIM, mē-on'ē-nim, mē-onê-nim, OAK OF: (אֹאֵק אֵלֶּף, 'eōn mō'ēnīm; B, Πλατ- puamauiē, Elūmmōnētēm, A, δρῦς ἀπόβαςτων, drūs apōbasτōn; AV Plain of): This was a sacred spot which appeared to be sacred from the gate of Shechem (Jgs 9 37). No doubt it took its name from the soothsayers who sat under it, practising augury, etc. Several times mention is made of sacred trees in the vicinity of Shechem (Gen 35 4–6; Josh 24 20; Jgs 9 6, etc.). Where this tree stood is not known. See Auge's Oak.

MEONOTHAI, mē-onô-thai, mē-onô-thi, mē-onô-thi (Μηνωνθαι, mēnonthai, “my dwellings”): A son of Othniel, nephew of Caleb (1 Ch 4 14). Possibly, as AV suggests, and the Vulg and Complutensian LXX say, vs 14 should read “the sons of Othniel, Hathath and Meonothai; and Meonothai begat Ophrah,” etc. The latter may be the founder of the town of that name.

MEPHAATH, mē-fā'ath, mē-fā'ath (Μηφαάθ, mēphā'ath, מפָּחָת; B, Μα- φάαθ, Maiphath, Μηφαάθ, Mephaath): A city of the Amorites in the territory allotted to Reuben, named with Kedemoth and Kirjathaim (Josh 13 18), and given to the Merarite Levites (24 37; 1 Ch 6 30). It appears again as a Moabite town in Jer 48 21. It was known to Eusebius and Jerome (Onom) as occupied by a Roman garrison, but the site has been lost.

MEPHIBOSHETH, mē-fib-ô'bahth (Μηφιβοσθήθ, mēphibōsthēth, “idol-breaker,” also MERIB-BAAL [q.v.]; Memphibōsthe, Memphibōsthe):
(1) Son of Saul by his concubine Rizpah (q.v.), daughter of Aiah (2 S 21 8). See also Armoni.
(2) Grandson of Saul, son of Jonathan, and nephew of Mephibosheth (1) (2 S 4 4). He was 5 years old when his father and grandfather were slain. He was living in charge of a nurse, possibly because his mother was dead. Tidings of the disaster at Jezreel and the overthrow of the Philis terified the nurse. She fled with her charge in such haste that a fall lamed the little prince in both feet for life. His life is a series of disasters, disappointments, and anxieties. It is a weak, broken, dispirited soul that speaks in all utterings of the nurse. He carried him to Lo-debar among the mountains of Gilead, where he was brought up by Macir, son of Ammiel (2 S 9 4). There he evidently married, for he had a son Mica when he returned later at the nurse's request. When David had settled his own affairs and subdued his enemies, he turned his inquiries to Saul's household to see whether there were any survivors to whom he might show kindness for Jonathan's sake (2 S 9 1). The search caused the appearance of Ziba, a servant of Saul's house (ver 2), who had meanwhile grown prosperous by some rapid process which can only be guessed at (vs 9–10). From him David learned about Mephibosheth, who was sent for. His humble bearing was consistent with his chronically broken spirit. David put Ziba's property (which had belonged to Saul) at Mephibosheth's disposal and made Ziba steward thereof. Mephibosheth was also to be a daily guest at David's table (2 S 9 11–13). Seventeen years pass, during which Mephibosheth seems to have lived in Jerusalem. Then came Absalom's rebellion. David determined to flee, so distraught was he by the act of his son. At the moment of flight, in great depression and need, he was opportunist met by Ziba with food, refreshment and even horses for travel. Naturally, the king inquired for Ziba's master. The treacherous reply was made (2 S 16 1–4) that Mephibosheth... had remained behind for his own ends, hoping the people would give him Saul’s grandson, the kingdom. David believed this and restored to Ziba the property lost. Not till many days after did the lame prince get his chance to give David his own version of the story. He met David on his return from the Ammonite rebellion. He had not dressed his feet, trimmed his beard nor washed his clothes since the hour of David’s departure (2 S 19 24). At David’s anxious request Mephiboseth told his story: his servant had deceived him; he went to meet with David, had even asked for his beast to be saddled; but Ziba had left him, and had slandered him to the king. But he would not plead his cause any more; David is “as an angel of God”! whatever he decides will be well! (2 S 19 26 27). Thus characteristically continued the speech of this lame, broken, humble man, son of a proud family (ver 28). David wearily settled the matter by passing the property between the prince and his servant, the prince expressing utmost content that Ziba should take all so long as David remained friendly (vs 29 30). That David accepted Mephiboseth’s explanation and was drawn out in heart toward the character of the broken man is shown when some expiation followed. Saul’s household was considered necessary to turn away the famine sent by an offended deity, Mephiboseth is spared when other members of Saul’s household were sacrificed (2 S 21 7). The character of Mephiboseth well illustrates the effects of continued disaster, suspicion and treachery upon a sensitive mind. Henry Wallace

MERAH, méráh, méráh, “increase” “more”; Mepáth, Meráb: The elder daughter of Saul (1 S 14 49). Meráb thought not the name to the time who should slay the Philí Goliath (1 S 17 25). David did this and was afterward taken by Saul to court (1 S 18 2), where he was detained in great honor. Meráb was not, however, given to him as quickly as the incident would lead one to expect, and the sequel showed some unwillingness on the part of some persons in the contract to complete the promise. The adulation of the crowd who met David on his return from Philí warfare and gave him magnificent gifts only added more to the feeling of those who, as Saul (1 S 18 6 16) woke the angry jealousy of Saul. He “eyed David from that day and forward” (ver 9). Twice David had to “avoid” the “evil spirit” in Saul and the Foolish Saul also feared David (ver 12), and this led him to incite the House of Saul to more dangerous deeds of valor against the Philis by a renewed promise of Meráb. He will have David’s life, but rather by the hand of the Philis than his own (ver 17). Meráb was to be the bait. But now another element complicated matters—Michal’s love for David (ver 20), which may have been the retarding factor from the first. At any rate Meráb is finally given to Adriel the Meholathite (ver 19). The passage of 2 S 21 5 doubles contains an error—Michal’s name occurring for that of her sister Meráb—though the LXX, Jos, and a consistent Heb text all perpetuate it, as well as the concise meaning of the Heb word Yádah, which is a physiological word for bearing children, and cannot be tr “brought up.” A 1g explanation reads: “The 5 sons of Meráb (which Michal, Saul’s daughter brought up) which she bare,” etc. Another suggestion reads the word “sister” after Michal in the possessive case, leaving the text otherwise as it stands. It is possible that Meráb died comparatively young, and that her children were left in the care of their aunt, esp. when it is said she herself had none (2 S 6 23). The simplest explanation is to assume a scribal error, with the suggestion referred to as a possible explanation of it. The lonely Michal (2 S 6 20 23) became so identified with her (deceased) sister’s children that they became, in a sense, hers. Henry Wallace

MERAIAH, méráyāh, méráyāh, “continuance”: A priest in the time of Joakim, son of Jedaiah, and head of the priestly house of Seraiah to which Ezra belonged (Neh 12 12; cf Ezr 7 1).

MERAIOOTH, méráyoth, méráoth (méráyoth): The name varies much in the Gr.

(1) A Levite, a descendant of Aaron (1 Ch 6 6 f; Ezr 7 3), called “Remembered” in 1 Esd 8 2; and “Marimoth” in 2 Esd 1 2.

(2) The son of Ahitub and father of Zadok (1 Ch 9 11).

(3) A priestly house of which, in the days of Joakim, Helcias was head (Neh 12 15). In ver 3 the name is given as “Meremoth.”

MERAN, meran. See Merran.

MERARI, mérārī, mérārī, “bitter”; Maparēi, Mararēi: (1) The 3d son of Levi, his brothers, Gershon and Kohath, being always mentioned together with him (Gen 46 11; Ex 6 16 ff). He was among those 70 who went down to Egypt with Jacob (Gen 46 8 ff; cf ver 26 and Ex 1 5 ff).

(2) The family of Merari, descendants of above, and always—with one exception, for which see Merarites—spoken of as sons of Merarī in numerous references, such as 1 Ch 6 16 19 29, which only repeat without additional information the references to be found in the body of this article. We early find them divided into two families, the Mahli and Mushli (Ex 6 19; Nu 3 17 20 33). At the exodus they numbered, under their chief Zuriel, 6200, and they were assigned the north side of the tabernacle as a tenting-place (Nu 3 34 35), thus sharing in the honor of those who immediately surrounded the tabernacle—the south side being given to the Kohathites, the west to the Gershonites, and the east toward the sun-rising—being reserved for Moses, Aaron and his sons. (Nu 3 25 26 30 ff).

To the Merarites was intrusted the care of the boards, bars, pillars, sockets, vessels, pins and cords of the tabernacle (Nu 3 36 37 4 29 33). They and the Gershonites were “under the hand” of Ithamar, son of Aaron, the sons of Mahli bearing charge of the softer material of the tabernacles—curtains, covers, hangings, etc (Nu 3 25 26). When reckoned by the number fit for service, i.e. between 30 and 50 years, the sons of Merari were 3200 strong (Nu 4 42 45). Because of the weight of the material in their charge they were allowed 4 wagons and 8 oxen for carriage (Nu 7 8). In marching, when the tabernacle was taken down, the standard of Judah went first (Nu 10 14); then followed the Merarite bearing the tabernacle (ver 17), and after them came the standard of Reuben (ver 18). After the settlement in Canaan they had 12 cities assigned them out of Gad, Reuben and Zebulun (Jos 21 7 41 40; 1 Ch 6 63 77 81), just as the other two branches of Levi’s family had their 12 cities respectively assigned out of the other tribes (Jos 21). The names of these Merarite cities are given (loc. cit.), and among them is Ramothgilead, one of the cities of refuge (ver 28). It is evident from 1 Ch 6 44 47; 16 41; 26 1 36 9 11. 15 19 21; f of 16 6 17 19 that they had charge under Ethan or Jeduthun of the temple music in the service. In David’s time Asaiah was their chief (1 Ch 15 6). Himself and 220 of the family helped David to bring up the Ark. David divided the Levites into courses among the Gershonites, Kohathites and Merarites (1 Ch 23 6; cf vs 21–23; 24 26–30). The functions of certain Merarites are described in 1 Ch 26 10–19. They also took part in cleansing the temple in Hezekiah’s time (2 Ch 29 12) as well as in the days of Josiah (2 Ch 34 12), helping to repair the house of the Lord. Among the sons of Ezra, too, we find some of them numbered (Ezr 8 18). The family seems to have played a very important part in keeping steady and true such faithfulness as remained in Israel.

The father of Judith (Jth 8 1; 16 7).

Merarites, me-râ’ri’ts (םֵרָרִים, מַרְאֶרִים, “bitter”): The descendants of Merari (q.v.), son of Levi. The only place where this form of the word occurs is Nu 26 57. Elsewhere they are always referred to as “sons of Merari.”

Meratham, mer-â-thâ’im (םֵרֲתָם, מַרְתָּהִים, “double rebellion”: A name used for Babylon in Jer 50 21. According to Delitzsch it may be equivalent to the Bab Marâtan, i.e. land by the nar Marratun, “the bitter river” (Pers Gulf) = Southern Babylonia (OHL, s.v.).

Merchant, mûr’chàn-dîn (םְרַכְהָנִים, מְרַכְּהָנִים, “merchandise,” mûr’chan-dîn): (1) ðahar, ðahar, meaning thus: “Jeh of thy two is thaylm, you”); (2) “merchandise,” used thus: (a) “merchandise,” trade AV, 28 24; (b) “merchandise,” trade from the Targums, 1 Tim 1 13:16; (c) with his forbearance (Ps 146 8, “Jeh is gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great lovingkindness”); cf Rom 2 4; 11 32; (d) with His covenant (1 K 8 23; Neh 1 5, “grace”) and with his justice (Ps 101 1), “mercy,” mercy, mercy, truth are united in Prov 3 3, 14 22, etc (Ps 86 10 we have “Mercy and truth are met together”); (e) it goes forth to all (Ps 145 9, “Jeh is good to all); and his tender mercies are over all his works”; of ver 16, “Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing,” RV “satisfy every living thing with favor”); (f) it shows itself in pitying help (Ex 3 7; Ezr 9 91), supremely in Christ and His salvation (1 Jn 3 18); (g) it is abundant, practically infinite (Ps 86 15, 119 64); (h) it is everlasting (1 Ch 16 34, 41; Ezr 3 11; Ps 100 5; 136 repeatedly).

(2) “Mercy” is used of man as well as of God, and is required on man’s part toward man and beast (Dt 25 4; Ps 73 21; 109 17; 119 60; Prov 24 31; 27 1; Mic 6 8; Mt 5 7, “Blessed are the merciful: for they shall obtain mercy”; 26 31–46; Lk 6 36, “Be ye merciful, even as your Father is merciful”; 10 90, the Good Samaritan; 14 12–16; Jas 3 17).

(3) In the NT “mercy” (eleos, usually the LXX tr of heeseth, “kindness,” “loving-kindness” (see Lovenkindness), but rahamim, lit. “bowels,” the sympathetic, the merciful, the compassionate,” “compassion,” occurs a few times, also otrımno, “pitiful,” eleoth, “kind,” “compassionate,” twice; klesio, “forgiving,” and atelēs, “not forgiving,” without mercy,” once each (He 12 2; Jas 2 13).

(1) Mercy is (a) an essential quality of God (Ex 34 6; Dt 4 31; Ps 52 12, etc.); it is His delight (Mic 7 18; Ps 52 8); He is “the Father of mercies” (2 Cor 1 3), “rich in mercy” (Eph 2 4), “full of pity, and merciful” (Jas 5 11); (b) it is associated with forgiveness (Ex 34 7; Nu 14 14; 1 Tim 1 13:16); (c) with His forbearance (Ps 146 8, “Jeh is gracious and merciful, slow to anger and of great lovingkindness”); cf Rom 2 4; 11 32; (d) with His covenant (1 K 8 23; Neh 1 5, “grace”) and with his justice (Ps 101 1), “mercy,” mercy, truth are united in Prov 3 3, 14 22, etc (Ps 86 10 we have “Mercury and truth are met together”); (e) it goes forth to all (Ps 145 9, “Jeh is good to all); and his tender mercies are over all his works”; of ver 16, “Thou openest thine hand, and satisfiest the desire of every living thing,” RV “satisfy every living thing with favor”); (f) it shows itself in pitying help (Ex 3 7; Ezr 9 91), supremely in Christ and His salvation (1 Jn 3 18); (g) it is abundant, practically infinite (Ps 86 15, 119 64); (h) it is everlasting (1 Ch 16 34, 41; Ezr 3 11; Ps 100 5; 136 repeatedly).

fulness. Shakespeare’s question, “How canst thou hope for mercy rendering none?” is fully warranted by Our Lord’s teaching and by Scripture in general; of esp. the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18:23-35).

(5) As the rule, AV has “loving-kindness” for “mercy” when ἡσαβ is used of God, and “kindness when it is used of men in relation to each other.” “Compassion” (tr. τασίμ) is also in several instances substituted for “mercy” (Isa 9:17; 14:1; 27:11; Jer 13:14; 30:2; also “mercies” (tr. τασίμ referring to ἡσαβ (Hos 4:1; 6:6).

MERCY-SEAT, μῦρι-στή, THE (7725), kap-poreth; NT Λαοστηρίον, hilaστερίον, He 9:5): The name for the lid or covering of the ark of the covenant. Ex 25:20 (and possibly also 26:34), where the word is used of the lid of the ark. Jer 3:16;
Ezek 10:19, 20, 21; Hagg 2:15; the name is also Used of the lid of the Ark of the Covenant.

MERED, μήρεδ (7723), “mered”, “rebellion”; LXX has at least four variants in 1 Ch 4 17.18): A descent of Judah through Caleb, and mentioned as a “son of Erah” (ver 17).

RV, rightly following the orthography of the Heb which is more correct (b’lod, (b’lod, instead of, as in the name of the well-known Ezra, saves us from confusing this Ezra with the other by giving him the correct terminal letter. Moreover, even if the question of spelling were waived, the absence of the mention of children in any known passages of the list of OT terms means settle the question, since this passage (ver 17) is associated with prophecy.

A difficulty meets us in ver 18, where Mered is mentioned as taking to wife “Bithiah the daughter of Phares”. Phares is not the proper name of some individual but the official title of Egypt’s sovereign seems evident from the fact that AVµ and RV text agree in translating the other wife of Mered as “the Jewess, rather than as a proper name Jewdahia, as if to distinguish the Jewess from the Egyptian. Probably “Hodiap” also is a corruption of Jewdiah in ver 19, and should be twice again “the Jewess.” Tgs and traditions have so changed and transposed and “interpreted” this passage that a sufficiently confused text has become warped confused, and the only solid fact that emerges is that once a comparatively obscure Judahite (though the founder of several towns—Gedor, Socon, Eshtemoa, etc, ver 18) married an Egyptian princess, whether as a captive or a freewoman we do not know. See Bithiah. HENRY WALLACE

MEREMOTH, mer‘ē-moth, me-remoth (7789);
mer‘āmōth, “heights”; Μερεμωθ, Meremoth): (1)
Son of Uriah (Ezr 8 35), who was head of the 7th course of priests appointed by David (1 Ch 24 16, 10), Kkavg = Koz; cf Neh 3 4,21). The family of Koz were among those unable to prove their pedigree on the return from Babylon, and were therefore deposed as polluted (Ezr 2 61,62). Meremoth’s divisiveness of the family may, however, have been soothless, for he is employed in the temple after the return as weight of the gold and the vessels (Ezr
8:33), a function reserved for priests alone (Ezr
8:24-28). He takes a double part in the reconstruction under Nehemiah, first as a builder of the wall of the city (Neh 3 4), then as a restorer of that part of the temple abutting on the house of Eliashib the priest (Neh 3 21); “Marmoth” in 1 Esd 8 62.

(2) A member of the house of Bani, and, like so many of that house, among those who married and put away foreign wives (Est 10:36). He seems to be named Carabas (1) in the corresponding list of 1 Esd 9 34.

(3) The name occurs in Neh 10 5 among those who “seal the covenant” with Nehemiah (Neh 10 1).
It may there be the name of an individual (in which case there were 4 of the name), or it may be a family name. Certainly a “Meremoth” came back under Zerubbabel 100 years before (Neh 12 3), and the signatory in question may be either a descendant of the same name or a family representative. The name recurs later in the same list (Neh 12 15) as “Meraitho” through a scribal error confusing the two Heb letters ydh and hlam for mem. A comparinote of Neh 12 1-3 and 12-15 shows clearly that it is the same person. Note that in ver 15 “Helc” is the name of the contemporary leader.

(4) For Meremoth (1 Esd 8 2 AV), see Mereemoth. HENRY WALLACE

MERIBAH, mer‘ē-bāh, me-remoth. See Masseh and Meribah.

MERIB-BAAL, mer-b-ba‘al (7780, mer‘ē-ba‘al; also 7781, mer‘ē-ba‘al, “Ba'al contends”): The spelling varies in a single verse; 1 Ch 9 40 contains the name twice: first, in the first form above; second, in the second form. The name is given also in 1 Ch 8 34. It is the other name of Michubas (2) (q.v.).

As Jer 11 13 and Hos 9 10 the terms “Ba'al” and “Bosheth” seem to be synonymous, as a corruption of being a slightly contemptuous alternative rendered “shame.” This is akin to other like changes, such as Esh-baal for Ith-bosheth, Jerub-besheth for Zorubbaal, etc. The change in the first part of the name could occur through a clerical confusion of aspirate p and rdh in Hebrew.

MERIBATH-KADESH, mer-ibāth-kādeš, mer-iboth-kadesh, mer‘ē-bōth-kādesh): The supreme deity of the Babylonians (Jer 50 2); the Nimrod of Gen 10 8-12; and among the constellations, Orion. See Astronomy, II;
Babylonia and Assyria, Religion of; Nimrod

MERODACH, mer‘ō-dāk, mer‘ō-dak (7770; mer‘athak): the supreme deity of the Babylonians (2 2); the Nimrod of Gen 10 8-12; and among the constellations, Orion. See Astronomy, II;
Babylonia and Assyria, Religion of; Nimrod

MERODACH-BALADAN, mer‘ō-dāk-bal‘a’dan, mer‘ō-dak-b. (7770 7770, mer‘athak bal‘a-dān; Māraēdā Bahaladān, Marodaēch Baládān): The son of Baladon, is mentioned in Isa 39 1, as a king of Babylon who sent an embassy to Hezekiah, king of Judah, apparently shortly after the latter’s ill-ess, in order to congratulate him on his recovery of health, and to make with him an offensive and defensive alliance. This Merodach-baladon was a king of the Chaldaeans of the house of Yakin, and was the most dangerous and inveterate foe of Sargon and his son Sennacherib, kings of Assyria, with whom he long and bitterly contested the possession of Babylon and the surrounding provinces. M.-b.
seems to have seized Babylon immediately after the death of Shalmanesar in 721 BC; and it was not till the 18th year of his reign that Sargon succeeded in ousting him. From that time down to the 8th campaign of Sennacherib, Sargon and his son pursued with relentless animosity M.-b. and his family until at last his son Nabushumishkun was captured and the whole family of M.-b. was apparently destroyed. According to the monuments, therefore, it was from a worldly point of view good politics for Hezekiah and his western allies to come to an understanding with M.-b. and the Aramaeans, Elamites, and others, who were conferred with him. From a strategical point of view, the weakness of the allied powers consisted in the fact that the Arabian desert lay between the eastern and western members of the confederacy, so that the Assyrs kings were able to attack their enemies when they pleased and to defeat them in detail.

MEROZ, mē'roz (Μέρος; B, Μηρός, Merōs; A, Μηρός, Mazōr): This name occurs only once in Scripture. The angel of the Lord is represented as invoking curses upon Meroz (Judg. 5 23). It is a strange fate, shared with Chorazin, to be preserved from oblivion only by the record of a curse. The bitterness in the treatment of Meroz, not found in the references to any of the other delinquents, must be due to the special gravity of her offence. Reuben, Gilead and Dan were far away. This, however, is not true of Asher, who was also absent. Perhaps Meroz was near the field of battle and, at some stage of the conflict, within sight and hearing of the strife. If, when Zebulun "jeopardized their lives unto the death, and Naphtali, upon the high places of the field," they turned a deaf ear and a cold heart to the dire straits of their brethren, this might explain the fierce reproaches of Deborah.

Meroz may possibly be identified with el-Murusus, a mud-built village about 5 miles N.W. of Besaín, on the slopes to the N. of the Vale of Jezreel. If the Redit where Heber's tent was pitched be identical with Kadish to the W. of the Sea of Galilee, Sisera's flight, avoiding the Israelites in the neighborhood of Mt. Tabor, may have carried him past el-Murusus. If the inhabitants had it in their power to arrest him, but suffered him to escape (Moore, "Jgs." ICC. 153), such treachery to the nation's cause might well rouse the indignation of the heroic prophetess.

MERRAN, mer'an (Mappōv, Merrān; AV Meron): Many identifications have been suggested on the assumption that the text as it stands is correct. Some of these are the Sidonian Meareh (Grotius), Marane, a city of which Pliny speaks as being near the Red Sea (Keil), and the desert of Mahr in Arabia (Fritzsche). It is very probable, however, that the name represents an error in transcription from the original Sem text, confusing the "m" with the "w", so that we should read Medan, or Median, i.e. Midian. The phrase will then run, "the merchants of Midian and Teman" (Bar 3 23). The merchants of Midian are referred to in Gen 37 28.

MERRUTH, mē'ruth. See EMMERUTH.

MESALOTH, mes'a-loth (Mesorاة, Messolah, Maasalah, Masaloth): A place mentioned in the account of the march of Bacchides and Alcimus into Judah, as "in Arbela" (1 Macc. 9 2). If Arbela be identical with Ἰβιλ or Ἰβίδ on the southern lip of Wady el-Hammûn, W. of the Sea of Galilee, this fixes the locality; but no name resembling Mesaloth has been found.

MESECH, mē'sek. See MESHEC.

MESHA, mē'sha:

(1) (מֶשָה, mēshâ; B, Mapos, Marisai, A, Mapo, Marisâ), Caleb's firstborn son, the father of Zipph, probably the ancestor of the Zipphites (1 Ch. 2 42).

(2) (מֶשָה, mēshâ; B, Mered, Mizăd, A, Merad, Mizăd): A Benjaminite, son of Shaharaim by his wife Hodeph, born in the land of Moab (1 Ch. 4 9).

(3) (מֶשָה, mēshâ; Merad, Mizăd): A king of Moab. All the Bib. information regarding this monarch is contained in 2 K 3. Here we gather that Mesha was contemporary with Ahab, Azaziah and Jehoram. He was tributary to Israel; his annual contribution consisting of 100,000 lavers of silver and 100,000 rams. After the death of Ahab he asserted his independence. Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and the king of Edom joined forces with Jehoram in an attempt to quell the rebellion. At the instance of Elisha, who accompanied the host, water was miraculously provided when the army of the allies was ready to perish of thirst. Mesha came out against them and fell upon the Edomites. His attack was repulsed with heavy slaughter, and the defeated king was chased by the victors until he took refuge in the great fortress of Kir-hareseth. A vigorous siege was begun. Seeing that his case was desperate, Mesha attempted, with 700 men, to break through the lines. Failing in this, he offered his firstborn as a burnt offering upon the wall. Then "there came great wrath upon Israel" (by which, probably, panic is meant), and the besiegers retired, leaving their conquest incomplete.

In his inscription—see MoABITE Stone—Mesha gives an account of his rebellion, naming the places captured and fortified by him. It is not surprising that he says nothing of his defeat by Jehoram and his allies. There is, however, one serious discrepancy. The time Moab was under the supremacy of Israel, during the reign of Omri and half the reign of Ahab, he puts at 40 years. According to Bib. chronology, Omri and Ahab together reigned only 34 years. If, with Mesha, we deduct half the reign of Ahab, the period is reduced to 22 years. It is impossible to add to the length of either reign. So great a difference cannot be explained by the use of round numbers. Why Mesha should wish to increase the age of his people's subjection is not clear, unless, indeed, he thought in this way to magnify the glory of his deliverer.

In Mesha the sentiment of patriotism was wedded to some measure of military capacity. Judging by his inscription, he was also a deeply religious man, according to his light. Substitute "dehoviah" for "Chemosh," and his phraseology might be that of a pious Heb king. The sacrifice of his son is at once the mark of the heathen and an index of the strength of his devotion.

(4) (אֵלֶּאֱלֵי, meshesah; Mes'eh, Massah): This appears to mark the western boundary of the land occupied by the descendants of Joktan (Gen 10 30). No certain identification is possible, but several more or less probable have been suggested: e.g. (a) The Gr Me'ere, on the Pers Gulf, not far from the mouth of the Tigris and the Euphrates; (b) the Pishrawi, an Arab desert, called Meshu in the Assy inscriptions; the name here, however, could hardly cover such a vast tract as this; more probably it denoted a place; (c) Dilmann would alter the vowels and identify it with Massi, a branch of the Ishmaelites, and suit (Gen 26 14; 1 Ch 1 30). This, however, furnishes no clue to the locality of the territory of that tribe being also unidentified.

MESHECH, m’eshek, MESECH, m’esek (מֶשֶכֶּחַ, mesheshekh): Possibly the Sumerian form of the Bab Súl-Asbaridu, "the shadow of the prince," just as Shadrac probably means "the servant of Sin," and Abednego the "servant of Ishtar." Meshech was one of the three Hebrew companions of Daniel, whose history is given in the first chapters of the Book of Dn. See, further, under SHADRACH.

MESHECH, m’eshek, MESECH, m’esek (מֶשֶכֶּחַ, mesheshekh), "long," "tall": Moroxh, Moseth: Son of Japheth (Gen 10 2; 1 Ch 1 5; ver 17 is a scribal error for Mesh of Gen 10 23). His descendants and their dwelling-place (probably somewhere in the neighborhood of Armenia [Herod. iii.94]) seem to be regarded in Scripture as synonyms for the barbaric and remote (Ps 120 5; of Isa 56 19, where Meshech should be read instead of "that draw the bow"). It is thought that the "Tibareni and Moschi" of the classical writers refer to the same people. Doubtless they appear in the annals of Assyria as enemies of that country under the names Tabali and Mushki—the latter the descendants of Meshech and the former those of Tubal to whom the term "Tibareni" is applied. The phrase "Tibareni" in the Mesha inscription very significantly—heavily for making the suggested change in Isa 66 19, where Meshech would be in the usual company of Tubal and Javan. Ezekiel mentions them several times, first, as engaged in contributing to the trade of Tyre (Tiras of Gen 10 27), in "vessels of brass" and—very significantly—slaves; again there is the association of Javan and Tubal with them (Ezk 27 13); second, they are included in his weird picture of the under-world: "them that go down into the pit" (32 18,20). They are mentioned again with Javan and Magog twice as those against whom the prophet is to "set his face" (Ezk 38 23; 39 1).

MESHELEMIAN, m'eshele-ma' (מ'שֶלֶּמִי, meshelemi), "Jeh repays"; Father of Zechariah, one of the porters of the tabernacle (1 Ch 23 21; 25 12.9). In the latter passage Meshelemin, with a final u, is credited with "sons and brethren, valiant men. 18. He is the "Shelemian" of ver 14, the "Shallum" of 1 Ch 17 19,31, and the "Meshullam" of Neh 12 25.

MESHEZABEL, m'eshe'eza-bel (מ'שְּצֶבֶל, meshezebel), "God a deliverer"; AV Meshezabel, m'eshe'ez-bel; (1) A priest, ancestor of Meshullam, who assisted Nehemiah in rebuilding the wall of Jezre (Neh 3 4). (2) One of the chief of the people giving name to the family which sealed the covenant with Nehemiah (Neh 10 21). (3) A descendant of Judah through Zerah, and father of Pethahiah (Neh 11 24). 1.2.9) MESHELLEMITH, m'eshe1t'mith (מ'שֶלֶּמְת, meshellemith, retribution"): A priest, son of Immer, ancestor, according to 1 Ch 12 9, of Adaiah and Pashhur, and according to Neh 11 13, of Amashai. In the latter passage this name is spelled Shellemith (q.v.).

MESHELLEMOTH, m'eshe1'lmoth (מ'שֶלֶּמּוֹת, meshellemoth, recompense"): (1) An Ephraimites ancestor of Berechiah, chief of the tribe in the reign of Pekah (2 Ch 28 12). (2) The "Meshellemith" of Neh 11 13.

MESHEBAB, m'eshe'bab (מ'שֶבָב, meshehabh): A Simeonite (1 Ch 4 34). This name head the list of those who, for the sake of wider pasture- lands, occupied a Hamitic settlement in the neighborhood of Gerar (MT Gevar, q.v.), and a Moabite settlement in Edomite territory (1 Ch 4 39-41). The latter event is dated in the days of Hezekiah (see Curtis, Chron., in loc.).

MESHULLAM, m'eshul'lam (מ'שֶלּוֹלָם, meshullam), "resigned" or "devoted"; cf. Arab. Muslimeh, Me'shulem: An OT name very common in post-exilic times. (1) The grandfather of Shaphan (2 K 22 3). (2) A son of Zerubbabel (1 Ch 3 19). (3) A Gadite (1 Ch 5 13). (4) (5) (6) Three Benjamites (1 Ch 8 17; 9 7-8). (7) The father of Hilkiah (1 Ch 9 11; Neh 11 11).
(8) A priest, son of Meshillemith (1 Ch 9:12); the parallel list (Neh 11:13) omits the name. (9) A Kohathite appointed by Josiah as one of the overseers to direct the repairs of the temple (2 Ch 34:11). (10) One of the chief men sent by Ezra to procure Levites to go up with him to Jerusalem (Ezr 8:16; cf 1 Esd 8:44). (11) A Levite opposed to Ezra’s regulations against marriage with foreigners (Ezr 10:15; 1 Esd 9:14). (12) One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10:29; cf 1 Esd 9:30). (13) One of the repairers of the wall (Neh 3:43). His daughter was married to Jehohanan, the son of Tobiah the Ammonite (Neh 6:18). (14) One of the repairers of the Old Gate (Neh 3:6). (15) A supporter of Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8:4). (16) One of those who subscribed the Covenant (Neh 10:28). (17) A priest who subscribed the Covenant (Neh 10:7). (18) (19) Two priests at the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12:13,16). (20) A porter at the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12:25). (21) A processionist at the dedication of the wall of Jerusalem (Neh 12:33).

MESHULLEMETH, mē-shul’le-meth (מֶשׁוֹלֶם, mšsĥēllemeth): The wife of King Manasseh and mother of Amon (2 K 21:19). She is further designated “daughter of Haruce of Jothibah.” This is the earliest instance of the birthplace being added to the designation of the queen mother. The name is properly the fem. of the frequent occurring MESHULLAM (q.v.).

MESOBIAITE, mē-sō’bi-a. See MIZOBIAITE.

MESOPOTAMIA, mē-sōpō-tä-mi-a. See SYRIA.

MESS, mes (מַס, mas): Any dish of food sent (Lat missum; Fr. messe) to the table. It occurs in the OT in Gen 43:34 (biss); 2 S 11:8 EV, and in the NT in He 12:16, translating ἀπεσπάσατο, brōtis.

MESSENGER, mes’en-jër: The regular Heb word for “messenger” is מָשִׁיחַ, maššîḥ, the Gr ἀγγέλος, ágelos. This may be a human messenger or a messenger of God, an angel. The context must decide the right tr. In Hg 1:13 the prophet is called God’s messenger; Job 33:23 changes AV to “angel” (m ‘messenger’); and Mal 3:1, suggests “angel” instead of “messenger.” The Mal passages 2:7; 3:1 (biss) have caused a great deal of comment. See MALACHI. The Gr ἀπεσπάσατο, apóstolas, “apostle,” is rendered “messenger” in 2 Cor 8:23; Phil 2:25; 1 S 4:17 tr* lit. from Heb זֶבֶל, zabēl, “to tell good news,” “he that brought the tidings.” Gen 50:16 reads “message” instead of “messenger.” A. LITERATURE “Messiah” (Jn 1:41; 4:25 AV) is a transcription of Μέσσιας, Mēssias, the Gr representation of the Aramaic. “Messiah” thus a modification.

1. Meaning of the Gr term form of the word, and Use of according to the Heb.
2. The Term
   The term is used in the OT of kings and priests, who were consecrated to office by the ceremony of anointing. It is applied to the priest only as an adj.—“the anointed priest” (Lev 4:3,5,16; 22[Heb 10:1]). Its substantive use is restricted to the king; he only is called “the Lord’s anointed,” e.g. Saul (1 S 24:6,10[Heb 7:11], etc); David (2 S 19:22 [Heb 22]; 23:1, “the anointed of the God of Jacob”); Zebediah (Lam 2:20). Similarly in the Ps the king is designated “mine,” “thine,” “his anointed.” Thus also even Cyrus (Isa 45:1), as being chosen and commissioned by Jah to carry out His purpose with Israel. Some think the sing. “mine anointed” in Hab 3:13 denotes the whole people; but the Heb text is somewhat obscure, and the reference may be to the king. The pl. of the subst. is used of the patriarchs, who are called “mine anointed ones” (Ps 105:15; 1 Ch 16:22), as being Jah’s chosen, consecrated servants, whose persons were inviolable. It is to be noted that “Messiah” as a special title is never applied in the OT to the unique king of the future, unless perhaps in Dn 9:25 (māshāh nāḥādīth, “Messiah-Prince”), a difficult passage, the interpretation of which is very uncertain. It was the later Jews of the post-prophetic period who, guided by a true instinct, first used the term in a technical sense.

The Messiah is the instrument by whom God’s kingdom is to be established in Israel and in the world. The hope of a personal deliverer is thus inseparable from the Messianic wider hope that runs through the OT.

HOPE

The Jews were a nation who lived in the future. In this respect they stand alone among the peoples of antiquity. No nation ever cherished such strong expectations of a good time coming, or clung more tenaciously amid defeat and disaster to the certainty of final triumph over all enemies and of entrance upon a state of perfect peace and happiness. The basis of this larger hope is Jah’s covenant with Israel. “I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God” (Ex 6:7). On the ground of this promise the prophets, while declaring God’s wrath against His people on account of their sin, looked beyond the Divine chastisements to the final era of perfect salvation and blessedness, which would be ushered in when the nation had returned to Jah.

The term “Messiah” is used in a double sense to describe the larger hope of a glorious future for the nation, as well as the narrower one of a personal Messiah who is to be the prominent figure in the perfected kingdom. It may be remarked that many writers, both prophetic and apocalyptic, who picture the final consummation, make no allusion whatever to a coming deliverer.

This art. will treat of the personal Messianic hope as it is found in the OT, in the pre-Christian age, and in the NT.

1. The Messiah in the OT.—The chief element in the concept of the Messiah in the OT is that of the king. Through him as head of the nation Jeh would most readily accomplish his purposes. But the kingdom of Israel was a theocracy. While there are passages in both of these writers which refer to a succession of pious rulers, this fact should not dominate our interpretation of other utterances of theirs which seem to point to a particular individual. By Jeremiah the Messiah is called the "righteous one," who is to be raised up to David and be called "Jehovah [is] our righteousness," that is, as the one making righteous dwells in him (Jer 23:5; of 30:9). In Ezek he is alluded to as the coming one "whose right it is" (21:27), and as Jeh's "servant David" who shall be "prince" or "king" forever over a reunited people (34:23; 37:24). It is difficult to resist the impression which the language of Ezekiel makes that it is the ideal Messianic ruler who is here predicted, notwithstanding the fact that afterward, in the prophet's vision of the ideal theocracy, not only does the prince play a subordinate part, but provision is made in the constitution for a possible abuse of his authority.

(3) Later prophets.—After Ezekiel's time, during the remaining years of the exile, the hope of a preeminent king of David's house naturally disappears. But it is reawakened at the restoration when Zerubbabel, a prince of the house of David and the civil head of the two kingdoms under David's line. But it is not till we reach the Assyrian age, when the personality of the king is brought into prominence against the great worldpower, that we meet with any mention of a unique personal ruler who would bring special glory to David's house.

The kings of Syria and Israel having entered into a league to dethrone Ahaz and supplant him by an obscure adventurer, the king of Juda (727 BC) appointed to the kings of Judah that while, by the help of Assyria, he would sur- vive, the attack of the confederate kings, Jeh would, for his disobedience, bring devastation upon his own land through the instrumentality of his ally. But the prince is thus far limited as in the case of Moses, for he has no power to the horizon of his own time, reaches be- yond the realm of Judah's deliverance. To the spiritual mind of Isaiah the revelation is made of a king, Immanuel, "God-with-us," who would arise out of the house of David, and of whose name is given the prophetic Ahaz. While the passage is one of the hardest to interpret in all the OT, perhaps too much has been made of the interpretation of a passage so accidentally connected with the word אֱוֶה, "virgin." It is the mysterious personality of the child to which prominence is given in the prophecy. The significance of the name and the pledge of victory it implies, the reference to Immanuel as ruler of the land in 8:8 (the present rendering be correct), as well as the parallelism of the line of thought in the prophecy be with that of 4:6, would tend to point to the identity of Immanuel with the Prince of the peace.

"Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God, Father of Eternity, Prince of Peace" (9:6 RM). These Divine titles do not necessarily imply that in the mind of the prophet the Messianic king is God in the metaphorical sense—the essence of the Divine nature is not a dogmatic conception in the OT—but only that Yah is present in Him in perfect wisdom and power, so that He exercises over His people forever a fatherly and peaceful rule. In confirmation of this interpretation reference may be made to the last of the great trilogy of Isaiatic prophecies concerning the Messiah of the house of David (11:2), where the attributes with which He is endowed by the Spirit are those which qualify for the perfect discharge of royal functions in the kingdom of God. See IMMANUEL.

A similar description of the Messianic king is given by Isaiah's younger contemporary Micah (5:2ff), who emphasizes the humble origin of the extraordinary ruler of the future, who shall spring from Jesse's house, who represents the line of David, and is to bear him confirms the interpretation which regards the virgin in Isaiah as the mother of the Messiah.

(2) Jeremiah and Ezekiel.—After the time of Isaiah and Micah the throne of David lost much of its power and influence, and the figure of the ideal king is never again present in a more definite or color. Zephaniah, Nahum, and Habakkuk make no reference to him at all. By the great prophets Jeremiah and Ezekiel, however, the hope of a Davidic ruler is kept before the people.

In one passage in both of these writers which refer to a succession of pious rulers, this fact should not dominate our interpretation of other utterances of theirs which seem to point to a particular individual. By Jeremiah the Messiah is called the "righteous one," who is to be raised up to David and be called "Jehovah [is] our righteousness," that is, as the one making righteous dwells in him (Jer 23:5; of 30:9). In Ezek he is alluded to as the coming one "whose right it is" (21:27), and as Jeh's "servant David" who shall be "prince" or "king" forever over a reunited people (34:23; 37:24). It is difficult to resist the impression which the language of Ezekiel makes that it is the ideal Messianic ruler who is here predicted, notwithstanding the fact that afterward, in the prophet's vision of the ideal theocracy, not only does the prince play a subordinate part, but provision is made in the constitution for a possible abuse of his authority.

2. Prophetic Moses, or a priest of Aaron's line, and Priestly whose personal features are portrayed in the picture of the future. The promise in Dt 18:15-20, as the context shows, refers to a succession of true prophets as opposed to the diviners of heathen nations. Though Moses passed away there would always be a prophet raised up by Jeh to reveal His will to the people, so that they would never need to have recourse to heathen soothsayers. Yet while the prophet is not an ideal figure, being already fully inspired by the Spirit, prophetic functions are to this extent associated with the kingship, that the Messiah is qualified by the Spirit for the discharge of the duties of His royal office and makes known the will of God by His righteous decisions (Isa 11:2-5).

It is more difficult to define the relationship of the priesthood to the kingship in the final era. They are brought into connection by Jeremiah (30:9-21) and the lifting of the priestly right of immediate access to Jeh, while the Levitical priesthood, equally with the Davidic kingship, is assured of perpetuity on the ground of the covenant (Jer 33 18 ff). But after the restoration, when prominence is given to the high priest in the reconstitution of the kingdom, Joshua becomes the type of the coming "Branch" of the Davidic house (Zec 3 8), and assuming the title of "high priest," is described as "the high and mighty priest in the Messiah (Zec 6 11 ff). Many scholars, however, holding that the "branch" and the "counsel of peace shall be between the two" (Isa 41 11; see AV) and substituting "Zerubbabel" for "Joshua" in 11, and read in ver 13, "there shall be a priest upon his right hand" (cf RV, LXX). The prophet's meaning would then be that the Messianic high priest would sit beside the Messianic king in the perfected kingdom, both working together as Zerubbabel and Joshua were then doing. There is no doubt, however, that the Messiah is both king and priest in Psp 10.

The better experiences of the nation during the exile originated a new conception, Messianic in the deepest sense, the Servant of Jeh (Isa 40:6-66; chsly 41:8; 42:1-719; Servant of Jehovah 52:15-53:6). This Servant of Jehovah refers in his splendid delineation of this mysterious being, scholars are hopelessly divided. The personification theory—that the Servant represents the ideal Israel, as God meant it to be, as fulfilling its true vocation in the salvation of the world—is held by those who plead for a consistent use of the phrase throughout the prophecy. They regard it as inconceivable that the same title should be applied by the same prophet to two distinct subjects. Others admit that the chief difficulty in the way of this theory is to conceive it, but they maintain that it best explains the use of the title in the chief passages where it occurs. The other theory is that there is an expansion and contraction of the idea in the mind of the prophet. In some passages the title is used to denote the whole nation; in others it is limited to the pious kernel; and at last the conception culminates in an individual, the ideal yet real Israelite of the future, who shall fulfill the mission in which the nation failed. Many expositors is the interpretation of 52:15-53:6. The question is not whether this passage was fulfilled in Jesus Christ—on this all Christian expositors are agreed—but whether the "Servant" is in the mind of the prophet merely the symbolification of the godly portion of the nation, or a person yet to come.

May not the unity argument be pressed too hard? If the Messiah came to be conceived of as a specific king while the original promise spoke of a dynasty, is it so inconceivable that the title "Servant of Jeh" should be used in an individual as well as in a collective sense? It is worthy of note, too, that not only in some parts of this prophecy, but all through it, the individuality of the sufferer is made prominent; the collective idea entirely disappears. The contrast is not between a faithful portion and the general body of the people, but between the "Servant" and every single member of the nation. Moreover, whatever objections may be urged against the individual interpretation, this view best explains the doctrine of substitution that runs through the whole passage. Israel was Jeh's elect people, His messenger of salvation to the Gentiles, and its faithful remnant suffered for the sins of the mass; even "Emmanuel" shared the sorrows of His people. But here the "Servant" makes atonement for the sins of individual Israelites; by his death they are justified and by his stripes they are healed. To this great spiritual conception only the prophet of the exile attains.

It may be added that in the Suffering Servant, who offers the sacrifice of himself as an expiation for the sins of the people, prophetic activity and kingly honor are associated with the priestly function. After he has been raised from the dead he becomes the great spiritual teacher of the world—by his knowledge of God and salvation which he communicates to others he makes many righteous (53 11; cf 42 1 f; 49 2; 50 4); and as a reward for his sufferings he attains to a position of the highest royal standing (52 15b; 55 12b; cf 49 7).

In the Book of Dnl, written to encourage the Jewish people to steadfastness during the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Messianic hope of the prophets assumes a new form. Here the apocalyptic idea of the Messiah appears for the first time in Jewish literature. The coming into the world of the Messianic Israel, as in Av, "like the son of man," comes with the clouds of heaven, and is brought before the ancient of days, and receives an imperishable kingdom, that all peoples should serve him.

Scholars are by no means agreed in their interpretation of the prophecy. In support of the view that the "one like unto a son of man" is a symbol for the ideal Israel, appeal is made to the interpretation given of the vision in vs 18 22 27, according to which it is given to "the saints of the Most High." Further, as the four hundred and twenty years between the exiles, and it would be natural for the higher power, which is to take their place, to be symbolized by the human form. But strong reasons may be urged on the other hand, for the personal Messianic interpretation of the passage. A distinction seems to be made between 'one like unto a son of man' and the saints of the Most High in vs 21, the saints being there represented as the object of persecution from the little horn. The scene of the judgment is earth, where the saints already are, and to which the "one like unto a son of man" descends (vs 22 13). And it is in accordance with the interpretation given of the vision in vs 1-42, that here reference is made to the four kings of the bestial kingdoms, that the kingdom of the saints, which is to be established in their place, should also be represented by a kingdom.

It may be noted that a new idea is suggested by this passage, the preexistence of the Messiah before His manifestation.

II. The Messiah in the Pre-Christian Age.—After prophetic inspiration ceased, there was little in the teaching of the scribes, or in the reconstitution of the kingdom under the rule of the high priests, to quicken the ancient hope of the nation. It would appear from the Apoc that while the elements of the general expectation were still cherished, the specific hope of a perfect king of David's line has grown very dim in the consciousness of the people. In Eccl (47 11) mention is made of a "covenant of kings and a throne of glory in Israel which the Lord gave unto David"; yet even this allusion to the event in the line of the Davidic dynasty is more of the nature of a historical statement than the expression of a confidant hope.

In the earlier stages of the Maccabean uprising, when the struggle was for religious freedom, the people looked for help in the line of David, and would probably have been content to acknowledge the political supremacy of Syria after liberty had been granted them in 162 BC to worship God according to their own law and ceremonial. But the successful effort of the Maccabean leaders in achieving political independence, while it satisfied the aspirations of the people generally ‘until this man shall arise and humble his nation’ (1 Mac 14 41; cf 2 57), brought religious and national ideals into conflict. The “Pious” (ḥāṣidīm), under the new name of Pharisees, now became more than ever devoted to the Law, and repudiated the claim of a Messiah (13:10) to be a king (15:1). It is evident that his subsequent assumption of the royal title, while the Maccabees with their political ambitions took the side of the aristocracy and alienated the people. The national spirit, however, had been stirred into fresh life. Nor did the hope thus quickened lose any of its vitality where amid the strife of factions and the quarrels of the ruling family, Pompey captured Jerusalem in 63 BC. The fall of the Hasmonaeus house, even more than its ascendancy, led the nation to set its hope more firmly on God and to look for a deliverer of Judah.

The national sentiment evoked by the Maccabees finds expression in the Apocalyptic lit. of the century and a half before Christ.

3. Apocalyptic Literature

In the oldest parts of the 2 Hr Or (7 85) there occurs a brief prediction of a king whom God shall send from the sun, to cause the whole earth to escape from wicked war, killing some and exacting faithful oaths from others. And this he will do, not according to his own counsel, but in obedience to the benevolent decrees of God.” And in a later part of the same book (9 3) there is an allusion to “a pure king who will exalt the sceptre over the whole earth for ever.” It may be the Messiah also who is represented in the earlier part of the Book of Enoch (80 37 f) as a glorified man under the symbol of a white bull with great horns, which is feared and worshiped by all the other animals (the rest of the religious community) and into whose likeness they are transformed.

But it is in the Ps Sol, which were composed in the Pompeian period and reveal their Pharisaic origin by representing the Hasmonaeans as a race of usurpers, that we have depicted in clear outline and glowing colors the portrait of the Davidic king (Ps Sol 17 18). The author looks for a personal Messiah who, as son of David and king of Israel, will reconcile Israel and gather together a holy people who will all be the “sons of their God.” He shall not conquer with earthly weapons, for the Lord Himself is his king; he shall smite the earth with the breath of his mouth; and the heathen of the ancient world shall worship and obey the weariest children of Israel as gifts. His throne shall be established in wisdom and justice, while he himself shall be pure from sin and made strong in the Holy Spirit.

That in these descriptions of the coming one we have something more than a mere revival of the ancient hope of a preeminent king of David’s house. The repeated disasters that overtook the Jews led to the transference of the national hope to a future world, and consequently to the transformation of the Messiah from a mere earthly king into a being with supernatural attributes. That this supernatural apocalyptic hope, which was at least coming to be cherished, exercised an influence on the national hope is seen in the Ps Sol, where emphasis is laid on the striking individuality of this Davidic king, the moral grandeur of his person, and the Divine character of his rule.

We meet with the apocalyptic conception of the Messiah in the Similitudes of Enoch (chs 37-71) and the later apocalypses. Reference may be made at this point to the Similitudes on account of their unique expression of Messianic doctrine, although Christ’s doctrine differs not later than 64 BC, is much disputed. The Messiah who is called “the Anointed,” “the Elect one,” “the Righteous one,” is represented, though in some sense man, as belonging to the heavenly world. His preexistence is affirmed. He is the supernatural Son of Man, who will come forth from heaven to judge the living and the dead, and to display the glory of His glory, and dwell on a transformed earth with the righteous forever. For further details in the conceptions of this period, see Apocalyptic Literature (Jewish); Eschatology of the OT.

III. The Messiah in the NT

To the prevalence of the Messianic hope among the Jews in the time of Christ the Gospel records bear ample testimony. We see from the question of the Baptist that “the coming one” was expected (Mt 1 13 and Lk 3 15), while the people wondered whether John himself was the Christ (Lk 3 15).

1. The Messiah as king.—In the popular conception the Messiah was chiefly the royal son of David who would bring victory and prosperity to the Jewish nation and set up His throne in Jerusalem. In this conception capacity the multitude hailed Jesus on His entry into the capital (Mt 21 9 and Lk 19; cf 21 9 and Lk 19); to the Pharisees also the Messiah was the son of David (Mt 22 42). It would seem that apocalyptic elements mingled with the national expectation, for it was supposed that the Messiah would come forth suddenly from concealment and attest Himself by miracles (Jn 7 27-31).

But there was no “messianic mind and vision” that interpreted the nation’s hope, not in any conventional sense, but according to their own devout aspirations. Looking for “the consolation of Israel,” “the redemption of Jerusalem,” they seized upon the spiritual features of the Messianic kingdom and recognized in Jesus the promised Saviour who would deliver the nation from its sins (Lk 2 25 30; cf 1 68-70).

(2) His prophetic character.—From the statements in the Gospels regarding the expectation of a prophet it is clear that the prophetic function was regarded as belonging to the Messiah. We learn not only that one of the old prophets was expected to reappear (Mt 16 14; Lk 18 14 and Jn 1 16), but also that a preeminent prophet was looked for, distinct from the Messiah (Jn 1 21 25; 7 40 f). But the two conceptions of prophet and king seem to be identified in Jn 6 14 f, where we are told that the multitude, after recognizing in Jesus the expected prophet, wished to take Him by force and make Him a king while the masses were looking forward to a temporal king, the expectations of some were molded by the image and promise of Moses. And to the woman of Samaria, as to her people, the Messiah was expected to come as a man of Divine knowledge into the world (Jn 4 25). On the other hand, from Philip’s description of Jesus we would naturally infer that he saw in Him whom he had found of the prophet like unto Moses and the Messianic king of the prophetical books (Jn 1 45).

(3) The title “Son of God.”—It cannot be doubted that the “Son of God” was used as a Messianic title by the Jews in the time of Our Lord. The high priest in presence of the Sanhedrin recognized it as such (Mt 26 63). It was applied also in its official sense to Jesus by His disciples: John the Baptist (Jn 1 34, Nathanael (1 49), Mary (11 27), Peter (Mt 16 16, though not in Lk). This Messianic use was based on Ps 2 7; cf 25 7 14. The title as given to Jesus by Peter in his confession, “the Son of the living God,” is suggestive of something higher than a mere official dignity, although its full significance in the unique sense in which Jesus claimed it has scarcely been apprehended by the disciples till after His resurrection.

(1) His claim.—The claim of Jesus to be the Messiah is written on the face of the evangelic history. But while He accepted the title, He stripped it of its political and national significance and filled it with an ethical and universal content. The assumption of the great king who would restore the throne of David and free the nation from a foreign yoke was interpreted by Jesus as of one who would deliver God's people from their spiritual foes and found a universal kingdom of love and peace.

(2) His delay in making it.—To prepare the Jewish mind for His transformation of the national hope Jesus delayed putting forth His claim before the time when His triumphal entry into Jerusalem would be thought of as a way to justify His interpretation of the Messiah of the prophets, while He delayed emphasizing it to His disciples till the memorable scene at Caesarea Philippi when He drew forth Peter's confession of Him.

(3) "The Son of Man."—But He sought chiefly to secure the acceptance of Himself in all His loveliness as the true Messianic king by His later use of His self-designation as the "Son of Man." While "Son of Man in Aram., בנו נאמו," may mean simply "man," an examination of the chief passages in which the title occurs shows that Jesus applied it to Himself in a unique sense. That He had the passage in Dn in His mind is evident from the phrase He employs in describing His future coming (Mt 8:18; 13:36 and ]; 14:62 and ]). By this apocalyptic use of the title He put forward much more clearly His claim to be the Messiah of national expectation who would come in heavenly glory. But He used the title also to announce the tragic destiny that awaited Him (Mt 8:31). This He could do without any contradiction, as He regarded His death as the beginning of HisMessianic reign. And those passages in which He refers to the Son of Man giving His life a ransom for many (Mt 20:28 and ]] and going "as it is written of Him" (Mt 26:24 and []), as well as Lk 22:37, indicate that He interpreted Isa 53 of Himself in His Messianic character. By His death He would complete His Messianic work and inaugurate the kingdom of God. Thus by the help of the title "Son of Man" Jesus sought, toward the close of His ministry, to explain the seeming contradiction between His earthly life and the glory of His Messianic kingship.

It may be added that Our Lord's use of the phrase indicates that He was influenced by the "Son of Man," notwithstanding the references in Dn and the Similitudes of Enoch (if the pre-Christian date be accepted), was not regarded by the Jews generally as a Messianic title. For He could not then have applied it, as He does, to Himself before Peter's confession, while maintaining His reserve in regard to His claims to be the Messiah. Many scholars, however, hold that the "Son of Man" was already a Messianic title before Our Lord employed it in His conversation with the disciples at Caesarea Philippi, and regard the earlier passages in which it occurs as inserted out of chronological order, or the presence of the title in them either as a late insertion, or as due to the ambiguity of the Aramaic. See SON OF MAN.

The thought of a suffering Messiah who would come for sin was alien to the Jewish mind. This is evident from the conduct, not only of the opponents, but of the followers of Jesus (Mt 16:22; 17:23). While He alluded to the suffering of Messiah, they could not understand His allusions to His sufferings, and regarded His death as the extinction of all their hopes (Lk 18:34; 24:21). But after His resurrection, when they were led, by the impression His personality and teaching had made upon them, to see how entirely they had misconceived His Messiahship and the nature and extent of His Messianic kingdom (Lk 24:31; Acts 2:36, 38]). They were confirmed, too, in their spiritual conceptions when they searched into the prophecies in the light of the cross. In the mysterious form of the Suffering Servant they beheld the Messianic king on His way to His heavenly throne, conquering by the power of His atoning and bestowing all spiritual blessings (Acts 3:13-18; 21:26; 4:27; 35; 10:36-43).

(1) Future manifestation.—New features were now added to the Messiah in accordance with Jesus' own teaching. He had ascended to the Father and had ascended to the heavenly Elements. But all things were not yet put under Him. It was therefore seen that the full manifestation of His Messiahship was reserved for the future, that He would return in glory to fulfill His Messianic office and complete His Messianic reign.

(2) Divine personality.—Higher views of His personality were now entertained. He is declared to be the Son of God, not in any official, but in a unique sense, as equal with the Father (Jn 1:1; Rom 1:4; 1 Cor 1:3, etc.). His preexistence is affirmed (Jn 1:1; 2 Cor 8:9); and when He comes again in His Messianic glory, He will exercise the Divine function of Universal Judge (Acts 10:42; 17:30, etc.).

(3) Heavenly priesthood.—The Christian conception of the Messianic king who had entered into His glory through suffering and death carried with it the doctrine of the Messianic priesthood. But it took some time for early Christians to advance from the new discovery of the combination of humiliation and glory in the Messiah to concentrate upon His heavenly life. While the preaching of the first Christians was directed to show from the Scriptures that "Jesus is the Christ" and necessarily involved the ascription to Him of many functions characteristic of the true priest, it was reserved for the author of the Ep. to the Hebrews to set forth this aspect of His work with separate distinctness and to apply to Him the title of our "great high priest" (He 4:14). As the high priest on the Day of Atonement not only sprinkled the blood upon the altar, but offered the sacrifice, so it was now seen that by passing into the heavens and presenting to God the work of Jesus, He, as God, the earth, Jesus had fulfilled the high-priestly office.

Thus the ideal of the Heb prophets and poets is amply fulfilled in the person, teaching and work of Jesus of Nazareth. Apologists may often seek support from prophecy by an extravagant symbolism and a false exegesis; but they are right in the contention that the essential elements in the OT conception—the Messianic king who stands in a unique relation to Jehovah as His "Son," and who will exercise universal dominion; the supreme prophet who will never be superseded; the priest forever—are gathered up and transformed by Jesus in a way the ancient seers never dreamed of. As the last and greatest prophet, the suffering Son of Man, and the sinless Saviour of the world, He meets humanity's deepest longings for Divine knowledge, human sympathy, and spiritual deliverance; and as the unique Son of God, who came to reveal the Father, He rules over the hearts of men by the might of eternal love. No wonder that the NT writers, like Jesus Himself, saw references to the Messiah in OT passages which would not be conceded by a historical interpretation. On the place of the prophecy, in the history of salvation, they sought to discover in the light of the fulfilment in Jesus the meaning of the OT which the Spirit of God intended to con-
The Divine, saying "the testimony of Jesus is the spirit of prophecy" (Rev 19:10). To Him, hidden in the bosom of the ages, all the scattered rays of prophecy pointed; and from Him, in His revealed and risen splendor, shine forth upon the world the light and power of God's name and truth. METAL, met' al (ῥέγμαν, ἡσαθνάλ; ῥέκτορος, ἀκτρόν; AV amber; Ezek 8:2, RVm "amber"). The substance here intended is a matter of great uncertainty. In Egypt bronze was called k̄esmen, which may be connected with the Heb. hashmal; the Romans had a red-metal in their alloy of gold or silver or other metals, but this is far from certain. Professor Ridgeway (EB, I, cols. 134-36) has conclusively shown, however, that amber was well known in early times and that there is nothing archaeologically improbable in the reading of Ezek.

Amber is a substance analogous to the vegetable resins, and is in all probability derived from extinct coniferous trees, some of them perhaps being obtained by the ancients from the coasts of the Baltic where it is still found more plentifully than elsewhere. A red amber has been found in South Europe and in Phoenicia. From earliest times amber has been prized as an ornament; Homer apparently refers to it twice. Amber brooches and ornaments of amber are highly prized by the Orientals;—esp. Jews—today, and they are credited with medicinal properties. See ELECTRUM; STONES, PRECIOUS.

METALLURGY, met' al-ur'ji: There are numerous Bib. references which allude to or allude to the various metallurgical operations. In Job 28:1 occurs ρήγμα, ἀθάνατος, "refine," "refine," "refine." This undoubtedly refers to the process of separating the gold from the earthy material as pictured in the Egyptian sculptures (Thebes and Beni Hassan) and described by Diodorus. The ore was first crushed to the size of lentils and then ground to powder in a handmill made of granite slabs. This powder was spread upon a slightly inclined stone table and water was poured upon it in order to wash away the earthy materials. The comparatively heavy gold particles were then gathered from the table, dried, and melted in a closed crucible with lead, salt and bran, and kept in a molten condition 5 days, at the end of which time the gold came out pure. The alloying of gold and silver with copper, lead or tin, and then removing the base metals by cupellation is used figuratively in Ezek 22:22 to denote the coming judgment of Jeh. Again in Is 44:12 it indicates chastening. The fact that the prophets used this figure shows that the people were familiar with the common metallurgical operations. See REFINER.

METALS, met' al; (Lat. metallum, "metal," "mine"); Gr. μετάλλον, metallon, "mine"). The metals known by the ancients were copper, gold, iron, lead, silver and tin. Of these copper, gold and silver were probably first used, because, occurring in a metallic state, they could be separated easily from earthy materials by mechanical processes. Evidence is abundant of the use of these metals by the earliest antiquity. Lead and tin were later separated from their ores. Tin was probably used in making bronze before it was known as a separate metal, because the native oxide, cassiterite, was smelted together with the copper ore to get bronze. Because of the difficulties in getting it separated from its compounds, iron was the last in the list to be employed. In regard to the sources of these metals in Bible times we have few Bib. references to guide us. Some writers point out that certain formulas are "for those who refer to Pal."

In the Anti-Lebanon and Northern Syria, esp. in the country E. of Aleppo now open up by the Bagdad Railroad and its branches, there are abundant deposits of copper. This must have been the land of Nuhahse referred to in the Am Tab. If we are to believe the OT, copper is the ore that was smelted in the time of Moses; if this is doubted, then the last-mentioned source was probably the one referred to. No doubt Cyprus (Alasia in Am Tab) furnished the ancients with much copper, as did also the Sinaite peninsula.

Tarshish (2 K 10:22) was a source of silver, iron, tin, and lead. This name may belong to Southern Spain. If so it corresponds to the general belief that the Phoenicians brought a considerable proportion of the metals used in Pal from that country. The names of the mines are still remembered. The large deposits of copper, lead, gold and silver, which are known from the Roman times and are mentioned as sources of gold, were probably probably refer to districts of Arabia. Whether Arabia produced all the gold or simply passed it on from more remote sources is a question (see Golds).

From the monuments in Egypt we learn that that country was a producer of gold and silver. In fact, the ancient mines and the ruins of the miners' huts are still to be seen in the desert regions of upper Egypt. In the Sinaite peninsula are deposits of copper, lead, gold, and silver. The track of the ancient Egyp mines are situated here (J. Sarabit el Khadim, U. Sidr, W. Maghara). The early Egypt kings (Suemun, Amenemhat II, and others) not only mined the metals, but cut on the walls of their mines inscriptions of the methods of mining. Here, as in upper Egypt, are remains of the buildings where miners lived or carried out their metallurgical operations. It is hardly to be conceived that the large deposits of lead (galena) in Asia Minor were unworked by the ancients. No richer deposits of tin than those of Southern Europe have yet been found. (For further background on metals see separate articles.)

METE, mé'te (מַדָּח, madhath): "To measure," either with a utensil of dry measure, as in Ex 16:18, or to measure with a line or measure of length, as in Ps 60:6; 106:7; Isa 40:12. In Is 18:2,7 it is the rendering of ká̂, which is used for a measuring line, referring to the Ethiopians as a nation that measured off other peoples for destruction and trod them down, as in RV. It is regarded by some as signifying strength, being cognate with the Arab. کَوَف, "strong." For metot

MEHEG-AMMAH, mē-heg-ām'a, meth-eg-am'a (תְּמֵה-אָמָה, methheg há-amāh, "bride of the metropolis"); LXX ἁγιερομητρής, ἡ ἁγιερομήτρης); It is probable that the place-name M. in 2 S 8:1 AV should be rendered as in RV, "the bride of the mother city," i.e., Gath, since we find in the passage in 1 Ch 18:1 ἠγιερομητρής, gath ἀββᾶ-μεθη, "Gath and her daughters," i.e., daughter towns. The LXX has an entirely different reading: "and David took the tribute out of the hand of the Philistines," showing that they had a different text from what we now have in the Heb. The text is evidently corrupt. If a place is intended its site is unknown, but it must have been in the Philistine plain and in the vicinity of Gath. H. Porter

METHUSELAL, mē-thūsē-lā, See Methuselah.

METHUSELALH, mē-thūsē-lā, me-thūsē-la (תְּמֶשֶּל, mēšēlaḥ, "man of the javelin"): A descendant of Seth, the son of Enoch, and father of Lamech (Gen 5:21 ff; 1 Ch 1:3; Lk 3:37). Methuselah is said to have lived 969 years; he is therefore the oldest of the patriarchs and the oldest man. It is doubtful whether these long years do not include the duration of a family or clan.

METHUSELAH, mē-thūsē-lāh, me-thūsē-laḥ (תְּמֶשֶּלָה, mēšēlah; "man of the javelin"): A descendant of Cain, and father of Lamech in the Cainite genealogy (Gen 4:18). The meaning of the name is doubtful. Dillmann suggested "suppliant or man of God."

MEUNIM, mē-u-nīm (AV Meunim). See MAON.

MEUZAL, mē-u'-zāl (מְאָצָל, mē'āzāl, or מְאָצ, mē'āz); A word which occurs only in AVs of Ezk 27:19. The rendering in AV text is "going to and fro," in RV text "with yawn," but in BVs, in agreement with BDB and most modern authorities, Meual is regarded as a proper noun with a prefixed preposition, and is rendered "from Usal." See Usal.

ME-ZAHAB, me'-zā-hab, me-zā-hab (מְצָה-ב, mē'zā-hab, "waters of gold"); B. Ma'zehah, Mezob; A. Mezob, Mezob): Grandfather of Mehetabel, the wife of Hadar, the last-mentioned "duke" of Edom descended from Esau (Gen 36:39). The Jewish commentators made much play with this name. Abarbanel, e.g., says he was "rich and great, so that on this account he was called Mezahab, for the gold was in his house as water." The name, however, may denote a place, in which case it may be identical with Dizahab.

MEZARIM, mes'-ə-rīm (NORTH). See Astronomy, II, 13, (1).

MEZOBAITE, mē-zō'-bā-it (מְצֹבֵי, ha-mēzōbhēyāth); The designation of Jaasiel, one of David's heroes (1 Ch 11:47).

MIAMIN, mī'-a-min. See MIAMIN; MINIMIN.

MIIBHAR, mīb-hār (מִיבָר, mībhar, "choice"): According to 1 Ch 11:38, the name of one of David's heroes. No such name, however, occurs in the passage (2 S 23:36). A comparison of the two records makes it probable that mībhar is a corruption of meṣūbbāh = "from Zobah," which completes the designation of the former name, Nathan of Zobah. The concluding words of the verse, Ben-Hagri = "the son of Haggi," will then appear as a misreading of Bani ha-gadāh = "Bani, the Gadite," thus bringing the two records into accord.

MIBSAM, mīb-sām (מִיבָסָם, mībsām, "perfume"?):
(1) A son of Ishmael (Gen 26:13; 1 Ch 1:29).
(2) A Simeonite (1 Ch 4:25).

MIBZAR, mīb-zār (מִיבָצָר, mībhar, "a fortress"): An Edomite chief, AV "duke" (Gen 36:42; 1 Ch 1:53). The text according to Eusebius, Mibzar is connected with Mibsara, a considerable village subject to Petra and still existing in his time. Cf Holzinger and Skinner in respective comm. on Gen.

MICA, mī'ka (מִיכָה, mīkhā), "a variant of the name Micah, and probably like it a contracted form of Mīkah (q.v.). In AV it is sometimes spelled "Mica."

(1) A son of Merib-baal or Mephibosheth (2 S 9:12, AV "Miah"). In 1 Ch 8:34, he is called "Miah."
(2) The son of Zichri (1 Ch 9:15). In Neh 11:17 (AV "Micha"), he is designated "the son of Zabdi," and in Neh 12:35, his name appears as "Micaiah [AV "Michaiah"]; the son of Zaccur."
(3) One of the signatories of the Covenant (Neh 10:11, AV "Mica").

MICAH, mī'kā (מִיכָה, mekhāh, contracted from נִיכֶה, nikēh, "who is like Jeh"?): B. Meixâas, Meixahas, A. Miex, Micha; sometimes in AV spelled "Miahah"

(1) The chief character of an episode given as an appendix to the Book of Jgs (Jgs 17:18). Micah, a dweller in Mt. Ephraim, was the founder and owner of a small private sanctuary with accessories for worship (17:1–5), for which he hired as priest the Judahite Levite (17:7–13). Micah's abode, in quest of new territory by the Danites, who had failed to secure a settlement upon their own tribal allotment, visited Micah's shrine, and obtained from his priest an oracle favoring their quest (18:1–6). They then went on until they reached the town of Laish in the extreme N., and deeming it suitable for their purpose, they returned to report to their fellow-tribesmen. These at once dispatched thither 600 armed men, accompanied by their families (18:7–12). Passing Micah's abode, they appropriated his idols and his priest, and when their owner pursued, he was insulted and threatened (18:13–26). They took Laish, destroyed it with its inhabitants and rebuilt it under the name of Dan. There they established the stolen images, and appointed Micah's Levite, Jonathan, a grandson of Moses (AV "Manasseh"), priest of the new sanctuary, which was long famous in Israel (18:27–31).

The purpose of the narrative is evidently to set forth the origin of the Danite shrine and priesthood. A few peculiarities in the story have led some critics—e.g., Moore, "Judges," in ICC and "Judges" in SBOT; Budde, Richter—to regard it as composite. Wellhausen, however, considers that the peculiarities are editorial and have been introduced for the purpose of smoothing or explaining the ancient record. Most authorities are agreed that the story is nearly contemporary with the events which it narrates, and that it is of the highest value for the study of the MICAH (מְיָח, mīyāḥ; מיכה, Mīkha; an abbreviation for Micah) [Jehovah has loved], the third major prophet, and one of the twelve minor prophets. Born in the city of Moresheth of Gath (2 Ch 23:15), he prophesied during the reigns of Josiah, Jehoiakim, Jehoiachin, and Zedekiah, the last three kings of Judah.

1. Name. Micah, son of Numah (Mic 1:1) and descendant of the Lachishite Levite (1 Ch 27:21; 2 Ch 24:1 ff). Micah was a Levite (1 Chr 23:15) and a Levite of the Kohathites (1 Ch 5:1). He is also referred to as a man of the tribe of Zebulun (Mic 1:1). Micah is also referred to as a Levite of the Kohathites (1 Ch 23:15). Micah was a Levite of the Kohathites (1 Ch 23:15). 4. Contents. Micah's prophecies are divided into two main sections: the Early Prophecies (chs 1-3) and the Late Prophecies (chs 4-5). The Early Prophecies (chs 1-3) deal with the impending Babylonian exile and the subsequent return of the people of Judah. The Late Prophecies (chs 4-5) focus on the future of the people of Judah and the establishment of a new covenant with God.

MICIAH, mî-kî'ya, mî-kî'a (םִּקַּיָּה, "who is like Jeh!"); Mic'ayâs, Mîchælas): A frequently occurring OT name occasionally contractible to Mîca or Mîcâh (q.v.). In AV it is usually spelled "Micah."

(1) The mother of Abijah (2 Ch 13 2, AV "Micah"). The | passage (1 K 15 2; cf 2 Ch 11 20) indicates that Micahiah here is a corruption of Maacah (q.v.) (so LXX).

(2) The father of Ashbor (2 K 22 12, AV "Micah"). See Micah, (5).

(3) A prince of Judah sent by Jehoshaphat to teach in the cities of Judah (2 Ch 17 7, AV "Micah").

(4) The son of Zacur, a priestly processionist at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 35, AV "Micah").

(5) A priestly processionist at the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 41; wanting in LXX).

(6) The canonical prophet. See Micah, (7), and special article.

(7) The son of Imlah, the chief character of an important episode near the end of the reign of Ahab (1 K 22 4 38; 2 Ch 18 13 27). In the Heb. his name appears once in the contracted form "Miah" (2 Ch 18 14). Ahab had suggested to his visitor, Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, that they should undertake a joint campaign against Ramoth-gilead. Jehoshaphat here politely declined, but asked that the mind of Jeh should first be ascertained. Ahab forthwith summoned the official prophets, to the number of 400, into the royal presence. Obsequious to their master, they, both by oracular utterance and by the symbolic action of their leader, Zedekiah, the son of Chenaanah, gave the king a favorable answer. Their ready chorus of assent seems to have made Jehoshaphat suspicious, for he pleaded that further guidance be sought. Micah, for whom Ahab, then, with evident relish at first, at last repeated the favorable response of the 400; but adjured by the king to speak the whole truth, he dropped his ironical tone, and in sad earnest described a vision of disaster. Ahab endeavored to lessen the effect of this oracle by pettishly complaining that Micahiah was always to him a prophet of evil. The latter thereupon related an impressive vision of the heavenly court, whence he had seen a lying spirit dispatched by Jeh to the prophets in order to bring about Ahab's delusion and downfall. His answer to a public challenge from Zedekiah, who acted as spokesman for the 400, Micahiah confidently appealed to the issue for proof of the truth of his prediction, and was promptly committed to prison by the king.

The narrative is exceedingly vivid and of the utmost interest to students of Israelish prophecy. Several of its details have given rise to divergent questions: How far were the prophet's visions objective? How far did he admit the inspiration of his opponents? Is the Divine action described by the holy character of Jeh? have occasioned difficulty to many. But their difficulty arises largely either because of their Christian viewpoint, or because of their lack of mechanical theory of prophetic inspiration. Micahiah's position was a delicate one. For the sake of his country, disaster, he did his best to avert it. This he could only do by warning the king from the influence of the 400 time-serving prophets. He sought to gain his end, first, by an ironical aculeus in their favorable answer; then, by a short oracle foretelling disaster esp. to Ahab; and, these means having failed, by discarding in the most solemn manner the courtly prophets opposed to him. Thus regarded, his vision, no admission of their equal inspiration: rather is it an emphatic declaration that these men were uttering falsehood in Jeh's name, thereby endangering their country's safety and their king's life. Their obsequious time-service made them at forersome of the false prophets denounced by Jeremiah (Jer 23 9 40) and by Ezekiel (Ezk 13 15). The frank anthropomorphism of the vision need be no stumbling-block if allowed to drop into its proper place as the literary device of a prophet intensely conscious of his own inspiration and as whole-heartedly patriotic as those opposed to him.

The record ends very abruptly, giving no account of Micahiah's vindication when at length the course of events brought about the fulfilment of his prediction. The closing words, "Hear, ye peoples, all of you" (1 K 22 28; 2 Ch 18 15), of Mic 1 2, are an evident interpolation by some late scribe who confused the son of Imlah with the contemporary of Isaiah.

MICHAEL, mîkâ-êl, mîk'el (מִּיכָאֵל, mîkhâ'el), "who is like God?" (Mîchæl, Michael):

(1) The father of Sethur the Asherite spy (Nu 13 13).

(2) (3) Two Gadites (1 Ch 5 13 14).

(4) A name in the genealogy of Asaph (1 Ch 6 40 [Heb 25]).

(5) A son of Izriaiah of Issachar (1 Ch 7 3).

(6) A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 16).

(7) A Manassite who ceded to David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 20).

(8) The father of Omri of Issachar (1 Ch 27 18).

(9) A son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 21 21).

(10) The father of Zebediah, an exile who returned with Ezra (Ezr 8 5 1 Esd 8 34).

(11) "The archangel" (Jude ver 9). Probably also the unnamed archangel of 1 Thes 4 16 is Michael. In the OT he is mentioned only by name only in Dnl. He is "one of the chief princes" (Dnl 10 13), the "prince of Israel" (10 21), "the great prince" (12 1); perhaps also, "the prince of the host" (8 11). In all these passages Michael appears as the heavenly patron and champion of Israel; as the watchful guardian of the people of God against all foes earthly or devilish. In the uncanonical apocalyptic writings, however, Jewish angelology is further developed. In them Michael frequently appears and exercises functions similar to those which are ascribed to him in Dnl. He is the first of the "four presences that stand before God"—Michael, Gabriel, Raphael and Uriel or Phanuel (En 9 1 40 9). In other apocalyptic books and even elsewhere in En, the number of archangels is given as 7 (En 20 1 7; Tob 12 15; cf also Rev 8 2). Among the many characterizations of Michael the following may be noted: He is "the merciful and long-suffering" (En 40 9 65 2,3).
“the mediator and intercessor” (Asc Isa, Lat VS 9 23; Test. XII P, Levi 5; Dan 6). It is he who opposed the devil in a dispute concerning Moses’ body (Jude verse 9). This passage, according to most modern authorities, is derived from the apocryphal Asm M (see Charles’ ed., 105–10). It is Michael also who leads the angelic armies in the war in heaven against “the old serpent, he that is called the Devil and Satan” (Rev 12 7 ff). According to Charles, the supplanting of the “child” by the archangel is an indication of the Jewish origin of this part of the book.

The earlier Protestant scholars usually identified Michael with the preincarnate Christ, finding support for their view, not only in the juxtaposition of the “child” and the archangel in Rev 12, but also in the attributes ascribed to him in Dn 13 (for a full discussion see Hengstenberg, Offenbarung, I, 611–622, and an interesting survey in English by Dr. Douglas in Fairbairn’s BD).

MICHAL, mī'kāl (מִיכָל, mikhāl, contracted from מִיכָל, mikhā‘el, “Michael” [q.v.]; מִכָּל, Mikhāl, Michāh), Saul’s younger daughter (1 S 14 49), who, falling in love with David after his victory over Goliath (1 S 18 20), was at last, on the payment of double the dowry asked, married to him (1 S 18 27). Her love was soon put to the test. When Saul in his jealousy sent for David, she was quick to discern her husband’s danger, connived at his escape, and not only outwitted and delayed the messengers, but afterward also soothed her father’s jealous wrath (1 S 19 11–17). When David was outlawed and exiled, she was married to Palti or Paltiel, the son of Laish of Gallim (1 S 25 44), but was, despite Palti’s sorrowful protest, forcibly restored to David on his return as king (2 S 3 14–16). The next scene in which she figures indicates that her love had cooled and had even turned to disdain, for after David’s enthusiastic joy and ecstatic dancing before the newly restored Ark of the Covenant, she received him with bitter and scornful mockery (2 S 6 20), and the record closes with the fact that she remained all her life childless (2 S 6 23; cf 2 S 21 8 where Michal is an obvious mistake for Merab). Michal was evidently a woman of unusual strength of mind and decision of character. She manifested her love in an age when it was almost an unheard-of thing for a woman to take the initiative in such a matter. For the sake of the man whom she loved too she braved her father’s wrath and risked her own life. Even her later mockery of David affords proof of her courage, and almost suggests the inference that she had hesitated being treated as a chattel and thrown from one husband to another. The modern reader can scarce withhold from her, if not admiration, at least a slight tribute of sympathy.

MICHÆAS, mî-kē'ās (MICAES): In 2 Esd 1 39 = the prophet Michah.

MICHMAS, mik-mas (מִכִּמָּס, mikhmas; B, Mîx̄âmās, Machmâs, A, Xîx̄âmâs, Chamâmâs): The form of the name “Michmash” found in Ezr 2 27; Neh 7 31. In 1 Esd 5 21 it appears as MACALON (q.v.).

MICHMASH, mik-mash (מִכִּמָּשׁ, mikhmas; Mîx̄âmash, Machmās): A town in the territory of Benjamin, apparently not of sufficient importance to secure mention in the list of cities given in Josh 18 21 ff. It first appears as occupied by Saul with his 2,000 men, when Jonathan, advancing from Gibeah, smote the Philis garrison in Geba (1 S 13 2). To avenge this injury, the Philis came up in force and pitched in Michmash (ver 5). Saul and Jonathan with 600 men held Geba, which had been taken from the Philis garrison (ver 16). It will assist in making clear the narrative if, at this point, the natural features of the place are described.

PASS OF MICHMASH

Michmash is represented by the mod. Mukhmas, about 7 miles N. of Jerus. From the main road which runs close to the wathered, a valley sloping eastward sinks swiftly into the great gorge of Wady es-Suewinit. The village of Mukhmas stands to the N. of the gorge, about 4 miles E. of the carriage road. The ancient path from Al southward passes to the W. of the village, goes down into the valley by a steep and difficult track, and crosses the gorge by the pass, a narrow defile, with lofty, precipitous crags on either side—the only place where a crossing is practicable. To the S. of the gorge is Geba, which had been occupied by the Philis, doubtless to command the pass. Their camp was probably pitched in a position E. of Mukhmas, where the ground slopes gradually northward from the edge of the gorge. The place is described by Jos as “upon a precipice with three peaks, ending in a small, but sharp and long extremity, while there was a rock that surrounded them like bulwarks to prevent the attack of the enemy” (Art. VI, vi, 2). Conder confirms this description, speaking of it as “a high hill bounded by the precipices of Wady es-Suewinit on the S., rising in three flat but narrow mounds, and communicating with the hill of Mukhmas, which is much lower—by a long and narrow ridge.” The Philis purpose to guard the pass against approach from the S. On the other hand they were not eager to risk an encounter with the badly armed Israelites in a position where superior numbers would be of little advantage. It was while the armies lay thus facing each other across the gorge that Jonathan and his armor-bearer performed their intrepid feat (14 1 ff). See BOZÉ; SÉNEH.

It will be noted that the Philis brought their chariots to Michmash (1 S 13 5). In his ideal picture of the Assyrian advance on Jerus, Isaiah makes the invader lay up his baggage at Michmash so that he might go lightly through the pass (10 28). A company of the men of the town of Michmash (see Mich) returned with Zerubbabel from exile (Ezr 2 27; Neh 7 31). Michmash produced excellent barley. According to the Mish, “to bring barley to Michmash” was equivalent to our Eng. “to carry coal to Newcastle.” Michmash was the seat of government under Jonathan Maccabaeus (1 Macc 9 73).

The modern village is stone-built. There are rock-cut tombs to the N. Cisterns supply the water. There are foundations of old buildings, arge stones, and a vaulated cistern. W. Ewing

MICHMEAH, mîkh’mē-thah (מִכְמֶה, ḫmnkhm’t-hēd; B, 'ɪsâpâw, ḥkmsmâw, A, Ṣâwâb, Mâchnâh): A place named in defining the territory of Ephraim and Manasseh (Josh 16 6; 17 7). It is said to lie "before," i.e. to the E. of Shechem. In the name itself, the meaning of which is obscure, there is nothing to guide us. The presence of the art., however ("the Michmethah"), suggests that it may not be a proper name, but an appellative, applying to some feature of the landscape. Conder suggests the place of Michmethah, which lies to the E. of Naḥalua (Shechem), in which case there may possibly be an echo of the ancient name.

MICHRIC, mîk’rî (מְכִרִ֥י, mikhērî): A Benjamite dweller in Jerus (1 Ch 9 8).

See Noon.

MIDDIN, mîd’in (מְדִ֣דִּין, mîddîn; in GB, Atâvâ, ' Ainôn, "springs"): One of the six cities in the wilderness of Judah (Josh 16 61). There are no many possible sites. The Heb name may possibly survive in Kh. Mînîr, a very conspicuous site with many ancient cisterns, overlooking the plateau of the Buke’tâ, above which it towers to a height of 1,000 ft.; it is the Mones Mardes of early Christian pilgrims; the existing remains are Byzantine. It is a site of great natural strength and was clearly once a place of some importance. The Gr reading ' Ainôn, "place of springs," suggests the neighborhood of the extensive oasis of ' Ain Pesakhkâh at the northwest corner of the Dead Sea where there are at Kh. Qumrân remains of buildings and a rock-cut aqueduct. See PEF, III, 210, 212, Sh XVIII.

MIDIAN, mîd’î-an, MIDIANITES, mîd’î-an-îts (מְדִיָאָנִי, mîdyânîn, מְדִיָאָנִי, Mâdyânîn, Mâdyânîn, Mâdyânîn): 1. The Seed Midian was a son of Abraham by his of Abraham concubine Keturah. To him were to the Time born 5 sons, Ephah, Epher, Hanoch, of the Abida and Eldaah (Gen 25 2-4; 1 Judges Ch 1 32 f). Bearing gifts from Abrahaam, he and his brothers, each with his own household, moved off from Isaac into the "east country" (Gen 25 6). The first recorded incident in the history of the tribe is a defeat suffered "in the field of Moab" at the hands of Hadad, king of Edom. Of this nothing beyond the fact is known (36 55; 1 Ch 1 46). The Midianites next appear as merchants traveling from Gilead to Egypt, with "spicery and balm and myrrh," with no prejudice against a turn of slave-dealing (Gen 37 25 f). Moses, on fleeing from Egypt, found refuge in the land of Midian, and became son-in-law of Jethro, the priest of Midian (Ex 2 15 21). In Midian Moses received his commission to Israel in Egypt (4 19). A Midianite, familiar with the desert, acted as guide ("instead of eyes") to the children of Israel in their wilderness wanderings (Nu 10 29 ff). The friendly relations between Israel and Midian, which seem to have prevailed at first, had been ruptured, and we find the elders of Midian acting with those of Moab in calling Balaam to curse Israel (22 4-7). Because of the grievous sin into which they had seduced Israel on the shrewd advice of Balaam, a war of vengeance was made against the Midianites in which five of their chiefs perished; the males were ruthlessly slain, and Balaam also perished (Ex 25 17; 31 2 f). We next hear of Midian as oppressor Israel for 7 years. Along with the Amalekites and the children of the East they swarmed across the Jordan, and their multitude beasts swept up the produce of the earth. Overwhelming disaster fell on this horde at the onset of Gideon's chosen men. In the battle and pursuit there fell a hundred and twenty thousand men that drew sword; their kings, Zebah and Zalmunna, and their princes, Oreb and Zeeb, sharing the common fate (Jdg 6-8). Echoes of this glorious victory—"the day of Midian"—are heard in later lit. (Ps 83 9; 1Sa 9 4; 10 26; Hab 3 7).

The Kenites appear to have been a branch of the Midianites. Jethro could hardly have attained the dignity of the priesthood in Midian had he been of alien blood (Jgs 1 16). 2. The Kenite Branch are named indifferently Ishmaelites and Midianites (Gen 37 25-28 36; Jgs 8 22-24). They must therefore have stood in close relations with the descendants of Hagar's son.

The representations of Midian in Scripture are consistent with what we know of the inmemorable ways of Arabian tribes, now engaged in pastoral pursuits, again as carriers of merchandise, and yet them as freebooters. Such tribes often roam through wide circles. They appear not to have practised circumcision (Ex 4 25), which is now practically universal among the Arabs. The men wore golden ornaments, as do the modern nomads (Jgs 8 24 ff).

The name of "Midian" is not found in Egypt or Assy documents. Delitzsch (Wo lag das Paradies? 384) suggests that Ephah (Gen 25 4) may be identical with Ephata, or the cuneiform inscriptions. If this is correct the references point to the existence of this Midianite tribe in the N. of el-Hujât in the times of Tiglath-pileser and Sargon (745-705 BC). Isaak speaks of Abraham and Ephah apparently as separate tribes, whose dronedaries bear gold and frankincense to Zion (60 6); but he gives no hint of the districts they occupied. The tribe of Ghiçår, found in the neighborhood of Medina in Mohammed's day, Knobel would identify with Ephah, another of Midian's sons.

No boundaries can now be assigned to "the land of Midian." It included territory on the W. as well as on the E. of the Gulf of 'Akaba.

3. Modern Arabs. archaeological studies, e.g. those of the Coptic inscriptions, show that Midian was an important power at a very early date. The site of el-Hujât in the times of Tiglath-pileser and Sargon (745-705 BC). Isaak speaks of Abraham and Ephah apparently as separate tribes, whose dronedaries bear gold and frankincense to Zion (60 6); but he gives no hint of the districts they occupied. The tribe of Ghiçår, found in the neighborhood of Medina in Mohammed's day, Knobel would identify with Ephah, another of Midian's sons.

No boundaries can now be assigned to "the land of Midian." It included territory on the W. as well as on the E. of the Gulf of 'Akaba.

MIDIANITISH, mîd’î-an-ît-îsh, WOMAN (מְדִיָאָנִי, ho-mîdyânîth, "the Midianites"): The designated given to the daughter of Zur, Cozbi, whom Zimri the son of Salu brought into the camp of Israel (Nu 25:6–19). Both were of noble parentage (26:15). The majority of the people strongly resented this act of profanation (25:6). A pestilence was raging in the camp, and Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, in an outburst of zeal pursued the two delinquents and slew them by a spear-throw through their bodies (25:8). He obtained as a reward the immediate staying of the plague and the promise of perpetual priesthood to his family (25:7–11).
seems to show that this word is purely native, and not Sem., to say nothing of philological objections. This town may, however, have lain in the required direction, according to a scribe’s report of the time of Sest II (or about 1250 BC).

Migran has been created by quoting this report as illustrative of the exodus, the actual words according to Brugsch’s tr may be given (Hist. II, 132): “we set out from the hall of the royal palace on the 9th day of Epiph, in the evening, after the two servants. I arrived at the fort Zechu (7 pia) on the 10th of Epiph. I was informed that we must resolve to take their way toward the S. On the 12th I reached Ked manners. There I was informed that, groves which came from the neighborhood of the “sedge city” reported that the fugitives had already passed the rampart (Amba or wall).” to the S. of the Market of King Soti Minephthah.” As to the position of this “wall see Sura.

Migron, mīgrôn (מִגְרֹן, mīgrôn; ἡ Μηγρόν, Mēgroun, Mapōn):
(1) A place in the uttermost part of Geba—which read here instead of Gibeah—marked by a pomegranate tree, where Saul and his 600 men encamped over against the Philis, who were in Michmas (1 S 14 2). Jos describes the distress of Saul and his company as they sat on a hill (bōnūs hupselō) viewing the widespread desolation wrought by the enemy. There is, however, nothing to guide us as to the exact spot. Many suppose that the text is corrupt; but no emendation suggested yields any satisfactory result. The place was certainly S. of Michmas.
(2) (R. Mayeṣṭh, Mageđh, A. Mayeṣṭh, Mageđh): The Migron of Isa 10 28 is mentioned between Aiath (Ai) and Michmas. If the places are there named in consecutive order, this Migron must be sought to the N. of Michmas. It may with some confidence be placed at Makron, a ruined site to the N. of the road leading from Michmas to Ai.

There is nothing extraordinary in two places having the same name pretty close to each other. The two Beth-horons, although distinguished as upper and lower, are a case in point. So also are the two Bethsaisidas. There is therefore no need to try to identify the two with one another, as some (e.g. Robertson Smith in Journal of Philol., XIII, 62 ff) have attempted to do with no success.

Mijamin, mījš-min (מִיָּשָׁם, mīyā́šm; AV Miamia):
(1) One of those who had married foreign wives (Ex 16 25). He is also called Mæclus (1 Esd 26). (2) The one to whom fell the lot for the 6th priestly course (1 Ch 24 9). His family returned with Zerubbabel and Joshua (Neh 12 5).

(3) A signatory of the Covenant (Neh 10 7).

Mikloth, mīk’loth (מְכַלֵּת, miklōṯ):
(1) A Benjamite, son of Jeiel (1 Ch 8 32; 9 37-38). A comparison of the two passages shows that the name Mikloth has been dropped at the end of 1 Ch 8 31.

(2) An officer designated “the ruler,” appointed in the priestly course for the 2st month (1 Ch 27 4).

Mikneia, mīk-ne’ya, mīk-n’a (מִקְנֵיה, mīkne’iḥ; mīkneḥaḥ): A Levite doorkeeper (1 Ch 15 18).

Milaia, mil-λα’i, mil’a-li (μίλαλα, mlalal): A Levite musician (Neh 12 38).

Milcah, mil’ka (מִלְכַּה, milḵa; ἡ Μηλκά, Mēlkā; Melcha, Melchah):
(1) Daughter of Haran, wife of Nahor, and grandmother of Rebekah (Gen 11 29; 22 20-23; 24 5,24-47).

(2) Daughter of Zelophehad (Nu 26 35; 27 1; 36 11; Josh 17 3). Many recent authorities are of opinion that Milcah is an abbreviation of Bethmilcah, and is a geographical rather than a personal name.

Milcom, mil’kom, mil’kōm. See Molech.

Mildew, mil’dw (מִילֶד, mil’d); LXX usually tɛrɛpɔs, ɛtɛrɛos, lit. “jaundiced”): In the 5 passages where it occurs it is associated with shidâdphôn, “blasting” (Dt 28 22; 1 K 8 37; 2 Ch 6 28; Am 4 9; Hag 2 17). In Jer 30 6, the same word is translated “pale,” but the “yellow color of one with abdominal disease. The root-meaning is “greenish yellow”; of the Arab. يَرَحُونَ, yarḥon, meaning both “jaundice” and “blight.” Mildew or “rust” in corn is due to a special fungus, Puccina graminis, of the same order as the potato fungus. It is a generic term which may be used as a substitute for the name of any particular fungus. It is a common name for the disease which affects the leaves of many plants. E. W. G. Masterman Mile, mil (μῖλος, milion, Lat mille pæsæ, milia passuum): A thousand paces, equal to 1,618 Eng. yds. (Mt 5 41). See Weights and Measures.

Miletus, mil-le’tus (Μῆλετος, Milëtus): A famous early Ionian Gr city on the coast of Caria, near the mouth of the Meander River, which, according to Acts 20 15—21 1, and 2 Tim 4 20 (AV “Mileyum”), Paul twice visited. In the earliest times it was a prominent trading post, and it is said that 75 colonies were founded by its merchants. Among them were Abydos, Cyzicus and Sinope. In 494 BC, the city was taken by the Persians; it was recovered by Alexander the Great, but after his time it rapidly declined, yet it continued to exist until long after the Christian era. In the history of early Christianity it plays but a little part. The Meander brings down a considerable amount of silt which it has deposited at its mouth, naturally altering the coast line. The gulf into which the river flows has thus been nearly filled with the deposit. In the ancient gulf stood a little island called Lade; the island now appears as a mound in the marshy marshland, and the modern village which stands on the site of Miletus, is 6 miles from the coast. Without taking into account the great changes in the coast line it would be difficult to understand Acts 20 15—21, for in the days of Paul, Ephesus, a city of 20,000, could be reached from Miletus by land only by making a long détour about the head of the gulf. To go directly from one of these cities to the other, one would have been obliged to cross the gulf by boat and then continue by land. This is what Paul’s messenger probably did. The direct journey may now be made by land. Miletus has been so ruined that its plan can no longer be made out. Practically the only remaining object of unusual interest is the theater, the largest in Asia Minor, which was not far from a hollow of the hillside, as most ancient theaters were, but in the open field.

Milk, milk (מִלֶק, halâh; γάλα, Gall; Lat lac [2 Esd 3 19; 8 10]): The fluid secreted by the mammary glands of female mammals for the nourishment of their young. The word is used in the Bible of that of human beings (Isa 28 9) as well as of that of the lower animals (Ex 25 18). As it is rankled next in importance (20-31) Ps frequently described as a land “flowing with milk and honey” (Ex 3 8 17; Nu 13 27; Dt 6 3; Jos 6 5; Je 11 5; Ezk 20 6-15). Milk was among the first things set before the weary traveler (Gen 18 5). In fact, it was considered a luxury (Jgs 8 25; Cant 8 1). The people used of kin and also that of sheep (Dt 32 14), and esp. that of goats (Ex 27 27). It was received in units (21 16; Job 21 24), and kept in leather bottles (21 18), Jgs 4 19), where it turned sour quickly in the warm climate of Pal before being poured out thickly like a melting substance (nāḥakh; cf Job 10 4). Cheese of various kinds was made from it (gbérēk and hārdel ko-hālākh, lit. “cuts of milk”); or the curds (ben ‘ād) were eaten with bread, and possibly also made into butter by churning (Prov 30 33). See Foon, I. It is possible that milk was used for seething other substances; at least the Israelites were strictly forbidden to seethe a kid in its mother’s milk (Ex 23 19; 34 26; Dt 14 21), and by a very general interpretation of these passages Jews have come to abstain from the use of mixtures of meat and milk of all kinds.

Figuratively the word is used (1) of abundance (Gen 49 12); (2) of a loved one’s charms (Cant 4 11); (3) of blessings (Isa 55 1; Joel 3 18); (4) of the (spiritual) food of immature people (1 Cor 3 2; He 5 12.13); (5) of purity (1 Pet 2 2). NATHAN ISAACS MILL, mil, MILLSTONE, mil’stôn (πᾶς), rēqeh; μῶλος, μύλος, μύλων, mulōn): The two most primitive methods of grinding grain were (1) by pounding it in a mortar, and (2) by rubbing it between two stones. In Nu 11 8 both methods are mentioned as used for rendering the manna more fit for cooking. Numerous examples of both mill and mortar have been found in ancient excavations. Bliss and Macalister in their excavations at Gezer and other places have found specimens of what is called the saddle-quern or mill, which consists of two stones. The “nether” stone, always made of hard lava or basalt from the district of the Hauran, was a large heavy slab varying in length from 1¾ ft. to 2½ ft., and in width from 10 in. to 1½ ft. Its upper surface was hollowed out slightly, which made it look a little like a saddle and may have suggested the name of “riding millstone” applied by the Hebrews to the upper stone which rested on it (Jgs 9 53). The “upper stone” or “rider” was much smaller, 4 in. to 8 in. long and 4½ in. to 6 in. wide, and of varying shapes. This could be seized with the two hands and rubbed back and forth over the nether stone much the same as clothes are scrubbed on a wash-board. Such a stone could be used as a weapon (Jgs 9 53; 2 S 11 21), or given as a pledge (Dt 24 6).

Macalister goes so far as to say that “the rotary hand-quern, in the form used in modern Pal and in remote European regions, such as the Hebrews, is quite unknown throughout the whole history, even down to the time of Christ” (Excavations at Gezer). The same writer, however, describes some mills belonging to the 3d and 4th Jor periods which are much like the present rotary quern, except smaller (4 in. to 6 in. in diameter), and with no provision for a turning handle. Schumacher describes the Roman millstone. Two only performed. The upper millstones found in the excavations at Gezer belong to the early Arab. period.

If the above assertions are substantiated then we must alter somewhat the familiar picture of the two women at the mill (Mt 21 41), commonly illustrated by photographs of the mills still used in modern Pal. These latter consist of two stone discs each 18 in. to 20 in. in diameter, usually made of Hauran basalt. The upper one is perforated in the center to allow it to rotate on a wooden peg fixed in the nether stone, and near the circumference of the upper stone is fixed a wooden handle for turning it. The grain to be ground is fed into the central hole on the upper stone and gradually works down between the stones. As the grain is reduced to flour, it flies out from between the stones on to a cloth or skin placed underneath the mill. To make the flour fine it is reground and sifted. Larger stones 4 ft. to 5 ft. in diameter, working on the principle of the handmill, are still used for grinding sesame seed. These are turned by asses or mules. Another form of mill, which is possibly referred to in Mt 18 6; Mk 9 42; Rev 18 21.22, consisted of a conical nether stone on which “rode” a second stone like a hollowed-out capstan. The upper stone was probably turned with handspikes in much the same way as an old-fashioned ship’s capstan was turned. The material to be ground was fed into the upper cone which formed the hopper and from which it was delivered to the grinding surfaces between the “rider” and the nether stone. This form of mill must have been known in late Bib. times, because many examples of the upper stone dating from the Gr-Rom period have been found. One may be seen in the museum of the Syrian Protestant College at Beirut. Another large one lies among the ruins at Petra, etc. In Mt 18 6; Mk 9 42, the mill is described as a μῦλος βωδιός, μῦλος οίκος, lit. a mill turned by an ass, hence a great millstone. It is not at all unlikely that the writers have confused the meaning of βωδιός, ὄμηρος (דבון, hāmēr), a term commonly applied to the upper millstone of a handmill, thinking it referred instead to the animal which turned the mill. This explanation would make Christ’s words of condemnation more applicable. The upper millstone of a handmill would be more than sufficient to sink the condemned, and the punishment would be more easily carried out. A few years from now handmills will have disappeared from the Syrian house- holds, for the more modern gistmills turned by water or other motor power are rapidly replacing them. See CRAFTS, II, 8.

Figuratively: (1) Of firmness and undaunted courage (Job 41 24). “The heart of hot-blooded animals is liable to sudden contractions and expansions, producing rapid alternations of sensations; not so the heart of the great saurians” (Canan Cook ad loc.). (2) To “grind the face of the poor” (Isa 3 15) is cruelly to oppress and afflict him. (3) The ceasing of the sound of the millstone was a sign of desolation (Jer 25 10; Rev 18 29).

LITERATURE
The great majority of evangelical Christians believe that the kingdom of God shall have universal sway over the earth, and that righteousness and peace and the knowledge of the Lord shall everywhere prevail, commonly called the Millennium, or the thousand years' reign. Divergent views are entertained as to how it is to be brought about. Many honest and faithful men hold that it will be produced by the agencies now at work, mainly by the preaching of the gospel of Christ and the extension of the church over the world. An increasing number of men equally honest teach that the Millennium will be established by the visible advent of the Lord Jesus Christ. The aim of this brief article is to set forth some of the Scriptural grounds on which this latter view rests. No reference will be made to objections, to counter-objections and interpretations; the single point, namely, that the Millennium succeds the second coming of Jesus Christ, that it does not precede it, will be rigidly adhered to. Those who hold this view believe that neither Christ nor His apostles taught, on fair principles of interpretation, that the Millennium must come before His advent.

1. The Teaching of Jesus.—The Lord Jesus said nothing about world-wide conversion in His instructions to His disciples touching the mission of the Millennium; Mk 13:19-20; Mt 16:16; Lk 24:46-48; Acts 1:8. The Millennial age was not before to be His witnesses and carry the Advent. His message to the race, but He does not promise the race will receive their testimony, or that men will generally accept His salvation. On the contrary, it warns them that they shall be hated of all men, that sufferings and persecutions shall be their lot, but if they are faithful to the end their reward will be glorious. But world-wide evangelism does not mean world-wide conversion. The universal offer of salvation does not pledge its universal acceptance. In His instructions and predictions the Lord does not let fall a hint that their world-wide mission will result in world-wide conversion, or that thereby the longed-for Millennium will be established. There is a time to come when the knowledge of the Lord shall cover the earth as the waters the sea, when teaching shall no longer be needed, for all shall know Him from the least to the greatest. Accordingly, conversion shall be the last, for the effects stated in that are not contemplated in the instructions and the results of this. To the direct revelation of Christ on the subject we now turn. In two parables He explicitly announces the general character and the consummation of the gospel age, and those we are briefly to examine.

(1) Parable of the Wheat and Tares (Mt 13:24-30,36-43).—Happily we are not left to discover the meaning and scope of this parable. We enjoy the immense advantage of having Our Lord's own interpretation of it. Out of His Divine explanation certain important facts emerge: (a) The parable covers the whole period between the first and second advents of the Saviour. The Sower is Christ: He has begun the good work; He opened the new era. (b) The field is the world. Christ's work is no longer confined to a single nation or people as once; it contemplates the entire race. (c) His people, the redeemed, begotten by His word and Spirit, are the good seed. Throughout the Gentile world the gospel of His grace is to be propagated throughout the whole world. (d) The devil is also a sower. He is the foul counterfeit of God's work. He sowed the tares, the sons of the evil one. (e) The tares are not wicked men in general, but a particular class of wicked brought into close and contaminating association with the children of God. "Within the territory of the visible church the tares are deposited!" (Dr. David Brown). It is the corruption of happy time, the gigantic fact to which we cannot shut our eyes. (f) The mischief, once done, cannot be corrected. "Let both grow together until the harvest." Christendom once corrupted remains so to the end. (g) The harvest is the consummation of the age. This is the culmination of our age; it terminates with the advent and judgment of the Son of God. He will send forth His angels who "gather out of his kingdom all things that cause stumbling, and them that do iniquity, and shall cast them into the furnace of fire.

Here, then, we have the beginning, progress and consummation of our age. Christ Himself introduced it, and it was distinguished for its purity and its excellence. But the glorious system of truth was soon marred by the cunning craftiness of Satan. No after-vigilance or earnestness on the part of the servants could repair the fatal damage and were forbidden to attempt the removal of the tares for by so doing they would endanger the good grain, so intermixed had the two become! The expulsion of the tares is left for angels' hands in the day of the harvest. This is Our Lord's picture of our age: a Zizanian field wherein good and bad children of God and children of the evil one, live side by side down to the harvest which is the end. In spite of all efforts to correct and reform, the corruption of Christendom remains, nay, grows apace. To expel the vast evil system of false teachers, is now as it has been for centuries an impossibility. Christ's solemn words hold down to the final consummation, "Let both grow together until the harvest." In such conditions a millennium of universal righteousness and knowledge of the Lord seems impossible until the separation takes place at the harvest.

(2) Parable of the Pounds (Lk 19:11-27).—Jesus was on His last journey to Jerusalem, and near the city the city was in an excited condition. They supposed the Kingdom of God was immediately to appear. The parable was spoken to correct this mistake and to reveal certain vital features of it. "A certain nobleman went into a far country; he left his own possessions and gave authority. His return is His second coming. The parable spans the whole period between His ascension and His advent. It measures across our entire age. It tells of Christ's going away, it describes the conduct of His servants and of the citizens during His absence; it foretells His return and the reckoning that is to follow. Mark the words, "And it came to pass, when he was come back again, having received the kingdom." It is in heaven He receives the investiture of the kingdom (Rev 11:15). It is on earth that He administers it. The phrase, "having received the kingdom," cannot by any dexterity of exegesis be made to denote the end of time or the end of the Millennium, or of His receiving it at the end of the world; it is then He delivers it up to God, even the Father (1 Cor 15 24-28).

The order and sequence of events as traced by the apostles is the same. The same fact made prominent in the parable of the Wicked and Wise Tares, namely that during the whole period between His ascension and His return there is no place for a Millennium of world-wide righteousness and prosperity. But Scripture warns that the belief such blessedness is surely to fill the earth, and if so, it must be realized after Christ’s second coming.

II. Teaching of the Apostles.—There is no unmistakable evidence that the apostles expected a thousand years of prosperity and peace during Christ’s absence in heaven. In Acts 1 11 we read that the heavenly visitants said to the apostles, ‘Ye men of Galilee, why stand ye looking into heaven?’ This attitude of the men of Galilee became the permanent attitude of the primitive church. It was that of the uplifted gaze. Paul’s exultant words respecting the Thessalonians might well be applied to all believers of that ancient time, that they “turned unto God from idols, to serve a living and true God, and to wait for His Son from heaven” (1 Thess 1 9-10). It is the prominent theme of the NT epistles. In the NT it is mentioned 318 times. One verse in every thirty, we are told, is occupied with it. It is found shining with splendor in the first letters Paul wrote, the Thessalonians. It is found in the last he wrote, the second to Timothy, gleaming with the bright anticipation of the crown he was to receive at the Redeemer’s appearing. James quickens the flagging courage and renews the drooping spirits of believers with this trumpet call: “Be ye also patient; establish your hearts: for the coming of the Lord is at hand” (5 8). Peter exhorts to all holy conversation and godliness by the like motive: “Looking for and hastening the coming of the day of God” (2 Pet 3 12 m). Amid the deepening gloom and the gathering storms of the last days, Jude (ver 14) cheers us with the words of Enoch, the seventh from Adam, “Behold, the Lord cometh with ten thousand of his saints, to execute judgment upon . . . . . . the ungodly.” John closes the Canon with the majestic words, “Behold, he cometh with the clouds,” “Behold, I come quickly.” These men, speaking by the Spirit of the living God, know there can be no reign of universal righteousness, no deliverance of groaning creation, no redemption of the body, no binding of Satan, and no Millennium while the tares grow side by side with the wheat; while the ungodly world flings its defiant shout after the retiring nobleman, “We will not have this man to reign over us”; and while Satan, that strong, fierce spirit, loose in this age, deceives, leads captive, devours and ruins as he lists. Therefore the passionate longing and the assurance of nearing deliverance at the coming of Christ fill so large a place in the faith and the life of the primitive disciples.

In 1 Thess 4 17 Paul speaks of himself and others who may survive till the Lord’s coming:

“Then we that are alive, that are left, shall together with them be caught up in the clouds, to meet the Lord in the air” (1 Thess 4 17). This implies fairly that the apostle did not know that long ages would elapse between his own day and Christ’s advent. There was to be the mind the possibility of His coming in his lifetime; in fact, he seems to have an expectation that he would not pass through the gates of death as at all, that he would live to see the Lord in His glorious return, for the day and the hour of the advent is absolutely concretized.

3. Prophecy led to believe that “the day of the Lord is near” (Rev 1 10). The apostle of “Man of Sin” He assures them that some things must precede that day, and that this is the “turning away,” or apostasy, and the appearing of a powerful adversary who he calls the Beast (Rev 13) and describes as “the Son of Perdition.” Neither the one nor the other of these two, the apostasy and the Man of Sin, was present. But the road was prepared for them. There was the “mystery of lawlessness” already at work at the time, and although a certain restraint held it in check, nevertheless when the check was removed it would at once precipitate the apostasy, and it would issue in the advent of the Man of Sin, and he should be brought to nought by the personal coming of Jesus Christ. This appears to be the import of the passage.

Here was the appropriate place to settle forever for these saints the great uncertainty of a long period to intervene before the Saviour’s advent. How easy and natural it would have been for Paul to write, “Brothers, there is to be first a time of universal blessedness for the world, the Millennium, and after that there will be an apostasy and the revelation of the Man of Sin whom Christ will destroy by the brightness of His coming. But Paul intimated nothing of the sort. Instead, he distinctly says that the mystery of iniquity is already at work, that it will issue in “the falling away,” and that shall appear the great adversary, the Lawless One, who shall set up his kingdom by the power of Satan. The mystery of lawlessness, however, is held in restraint, as are told. May it not be that he shall be taken off, then the Millennium succeed, and after that the apostasy and the Son of Perdition? No, for its removal is immediately followed by the coming of the great foe, the Antichrist. For this foe has both an apocalypse and a parousia like Christ Himself. Hence, the lifting of the restraint is sudden, by no means a prolonged process.

The apostle speaks of the commencement, progress, and close of a certain period. It had commenced when he wrote. It is

4. No Room at the coming of Christ. What inter-Millennial prophesies? The continuidad of the evil nation secretly at work in the body of professing Christians, and its progress from the incipient state to the maturity of daring wickedness which will be exhibited in the Man of Sin. This condition of things fills up the whole period, if we accept Paul’s teaching as that of inspired truth. There appears to be no place for a Millennium within the limits of the Bible here sets. The only escape from this conclusion, as it seems to us, is, to deny that the coming of Christ is His actual, personal second coming. But the two words, epiphaneia and parousia, which elsewhere are used separately to denote His coming are here employed to give “graphic vividness” and certainty to the event, and hence they peremptorily forbid a figural interpretation. The conclusion seems unavoidable that there can be no Millennium on this side of the advent of Christ.

Our Lord’s Olivet prophecy (Mt 24, 25; Mk 13; Lk 21) accords fully with the teaching of the apostles on the subject. In that dis}-

5. Harmony course He foretells wars, commotions of Christ among the nations, Jerusalem’s capture and the destruction of the temple, and Apostles Israel’s exile, Christians persecuted while bearing their testimony throughout the world, cosmic convulsions, unparalleled tribulation and sufferings which terminate only with His advent. The day of the Lord was spoken down to the hour of His actual coming. He offers no hope of a Millennium. He opens no place for a thousand years of blessedness for the earth.

These are some of the grounds on which Bib. students known as Premillennialists rest their belief touching the coming of the Lord and the Millennial reign.
Millet, mil'ēt, mil'ēt (מִלִּט, ὀξύς, kēxōs, kēkhōn); One of the ingredients of the prophet’s bread (Ezk 4 9). The Arab. equivalent is dūkhn, the common millet, Panicum miliaceum, an annual grass 3 or 4 ft. high with a much-branched nodding panicle. Its seeds are as small as mustard seeds and are used largely for feeding small birds, but are sometimes ground to flour and mixed with other cereals for making bread. The Italian millet, setaria Italică, known as Bengal grass, is also called in Arab. dūkhn, and has a similar seed. A somewhat similar grain, much more widely cultivated as a summer crop, is the Indian millet—also called “Egypt maize”—the Sorghum annuum. This is known as dhūrah in Arab., and the seed as dhūrah bēid, “white dourra.” It is a very important crop, as it, like the common millet, grows and matures without any rain. It is an important breadstuff among the poor.

Both the common millet and the dourra were cultivated in Egypt in very ancient times; the Heb ḫōhan was certainly the first, but may include all three varieties.

Millo, mil’ō (מִילו, milī), generally interpreted to mean a “filling,” as e.g. a solid tower or an earth embankment; in Jgs 9 6 20; 2 K 12 20, we get נִילוֹת מִילו, bēth milī, a tower in EV “House of Millo,” which Winckler thinks may have been the original Jebusite temple.

References of the Jebusite temple—shrines of Judah (see Bēth-Millo); LXX reads Μιλλόν, Bēthmaalōn, also Maalēn and οἰκός Maalēn: it is generally supposed that “The Millo” was some kind of fortress or other defence, but many speculations have been made regarding its position. In 2 S 5 9, we read that David built round about from the Millo and inward, or (in LXX) “he fortified it, the city, round about from the Millo and his house” (cf 1 Ch 11 8). In connection with Solomon’s strengthening of the fortifications, there are several references to Millo. In 1 K 9 15, Solomon raised a levy “to build the house of Jeh, and his own house, and Millo, and the wall of Jerusalem,” etc; in ver 24, “Pharaoh’s daughter came out up the city of David unto her house which Solomon had built for her; then did he build Millo”; in 1 K 11 27, Solomon “built Millo, and repaired the breach of the city of David his father.” At a later time Hezekiah “took courage, and built up all the wall that was broken down, and raised it up to the towers, and the other wall without, and strengthened Millo in the city of David.” (2 Ch 29 2 5; 2 K 12 20). Josiah was slain by his servants “at the house of Millo, on the way that goeth down to Silla,” but possibly this may have been in Shechem (cf Jgs 9 6).

The mention of the site in the days of David and the reference to it in connection with the city of David (1 K 11 27) point to some

2. Identical part of the southeastern hill 8. of the with the temple. It is suggestive that Millo Akra Site is in LXX always τῆς by “Akra.” It seems to the present writer very probable that it was a fortress crowning the hill on which at a later time stood the Syrian Akra, which hill, if we are to believe Jos (BJ, V, iv, 1, etc), was cut down because its commanding situation dominated the temple. This hill cannot have been the site of Zion afterward known as “David’s Burg” (City of David), because the tombs of the Judean kings were within its walls, and that alone would have made the complete leveling of the site impossible, but whereas the Jebusite fortress was probably not far from Ghom, this fortified summit may have been, as Watson suggests for the Akra, as far north as where the present At Ākān mosque is situated. In David’s time it may have been an isolated and detached fort guarding the north approach, but if it was originally a Jebusite high place (Winckler), a party of sun-dried brick like similar constructions in Babylonia, the account of its being leveled would be much more credible. The importance of this site in the days of Solomon is fully explicable if this was the citadel guarding the newly built temple and royal palaces.

Dr. G. A. Smith is inclined to think that Millo may have been a fortress “off the south end of Ophel, to retain and protect the old pool,” and Vincent suggests that the site of Millo is that now occupied by the great causeway connecting the Western and Eastern hills along which runs the farīk bāb es sitelēh.

Mincing, min’sing (דפוס, ṭōphaph): “Taking short steps,” “walking trippingly.” Only in Isa 3 16, “walking and mincing as they go, and making a tinking [a jingling of the metal anklets] with their feet.” Of OHL.
MIND, mind (νοῦς, nous, πνεῦμα, dianoia, πνεύμα, ψυχή, σύνεσις): We look in vain in the OT and NT for psychological or theological writing of the employment of terms which are meant to define mental operations. Terms Used In the OT ἐνθὰ is made to stand for the various manifestations of our intellectual and emotional nature. We are often misled by the different renderings in the different versions, both early and late.

Sometimes nēphesh or "soul" is rendered by "mind" (Dr 18 6 AV, "desire of his soul" or "mind"); sometimes ψυχή and εἰρήνη, "spirit of heart," and ἐνθὰ. Here Luther renders the terms Herzstück ("grief of heart"), and καρδιακαί, and ἐκ τῆς καρδιᾶς. Thus ψυχή is used, as in Isa 48 8, "bring it to mind" (lit. "heart"), or in Ps 51 12, "I am forgotten as a dead man out of mind" (lit. "heart"), as in LXX, καρδία, and in Vulg. ε̄ ψυχή, Luther, in Horsen, new Dutch tr, ut de gedachtenis (i.e. "memory").

In the Apoc this precision is equally lacking. Thus we read in Wis 9 15, "For the corruptible body [soul] preseth down the soul [soul] and the earthly tabernacle weigheth down the mind [soul] that museth upon many things." But these distinctions are alien to the letter and spirit of revelation, a product of the Gr and not of the Heb mind.

In the NT the words nous and dianoia are used, but not with any precision of meaning.

Here too several terms are rendered by the same word. Thus the Heb הֵנִחָה is rendered in nos 1 Cor 2 16 ("mind of the Lord," with reference to Isa 40 13, where "הֵנִחָה YHWH [Jeh] occurs"). Nous evidently here the organ of spiritual perception—a word borrowed from the Assyrian, where it is sometimes used to stand for ἐνθὰ (Job 7 17; Isa 41 22); sometimes for ψυχή (Isa 40 13). In Lk 4 45 the solitary text, when ἐνθὰ occurs in the Gospels, it is rendered "understanding" in AV, "mind" in RV.

For a true solution we must turn to the Epp. of Paul, where the word frequently occurs in an ethical sense—sometimes in connection with the (sinful) flesh as in Col 2 18, "puffed up by his fleshly mind," sometimes in direct contrast to it, as in Rom 7 25, "with my mind I serve the law of God; with the flesh the law of sin." In Tit 1 15 it is brought into parallelism with conscience ("the mind and their consciences are defiled"). Phrases like "a reprobate mind," "corrupted in mind" occur elsewhere (Rom 1 28; 1 Tim 6 5). From this state of "reprobation" and "corruption" man must be saved. Hence the necessity of complete transformation of heart and the renewal of the inner man (Rom 12 2), "transformed by the renewing of your mind [nous]."

Another word, with possibly a deeper meaning, is sometimes employed, viz. dianoia, which lit. means "meditation," "reflexion." It is found as synonymous with nous in a good sense, e.g. in 1 Jn 5 20 (He "hath given us an understanding, that we know him that is true"). Evidently the sense here is the same as in Rom 12 2, a renovated mind capable of knowing the Christ. It may also bear a legal sense, as in Eph 4 18, where the Gentiles are represented as having a "darkened understanding," or in parallelism with στρῶ: "the desires of the flesh and of the mind" (Eph 2 3), and with nous: "walking in vanity of mind, [nous] and a darkened understanding [dianoia] in Eph 4 18. At times also "heart" and "mind" are joined to indicate human depravity (Lk 1 51: "He hath scattered the proud in the imagination [dianoia] of their heart"). It is interesting also to know that the Heb למד is rendered in Mt 22 37—"Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart, and with all thy soul [soul] [pœuch]; and with all thy understanding [dianoia] [EV "mind"]—though Mk has two renderings in one of which dianoia occurs, and in the other sense (Mk 12 30-33), though possibly without any psychological recension in the Heb text. Sometimes מַעְיָן occurs elsewhere in conjunction with pneumatikos ("spiritual understanding," Col 1 9). It also stands alone in the sense of an "understanding enlightened from above" (2 Tim 2 7 AV: The Lord give thee understanding above all things.

The history of these terms is interesting, but not of great theological significance.

It seems to us that Godet's interpretation of the Great Commandment in Lv 10 27 is somewhat far-fetched.

4. THE THE GREAT COMMANDMENT.

The Great Commandment, ἀγαπᾶ τὸν Θεόν καὶ τὸν ἀδελφόν, "the two commandments," from which all the laws of the moral life derive their origin, is a direction for spiritual life. It is focused on the three principal directions: the powers of feeling, or the impulsive, emotional life; the active powers, the impulsive aspirations, the will (with all that might); and in the intellectual powers, analytical or contemplative, dianoia (with all thy mind). The difference between the heart, which resembles the trunk and the branches, feeling, will, understanding, is emphasized in the Alexandrian variation, by the substitution of the preposition σε ("in") for σε ("with") in the three last members. Moral life proceeds from the heart and manifests itself without, in the three forms of activity. The impulse God-wants and predestined, and is realized in the life through the will, which confers itself actively to the accomplishment of things and through the mind, which pursues the track of His thought in all His works" (Godet, Comm. on the Gospel of Lk, II, 38, 39).

MINE, min, MINING, min'ing: In Job 28 1-11 we have the only Bib reference to mines. The writer very likely derived [information either from personal observation or from a description of mining given in an eyewitness, of the mining operations of Sinai (see Metals). No traces of ancient mines have yet been found in Pal and Syria. What metals were taken out came from the deeper strata. The mines of Upper Egypt have already been mentioned. Burton and other travelers in Northern Arabia and the Red Sea country have found there evidences of ancient mining operations.

The usual Egyp method of mining was to follow the vein from the surface as far as it was practicable with tools corresponding to our pick and hoe, hammer and chisel. The shafts frequently extended into the ground a distance of 180 to 200 ft. The rock at the bottom, when too hard to be dug out was first cracked by having fires built on it. The mined-out stone was carried in baskets to the surface, where the crushing and separating took place. The mining operations were performed by an army of slaves who were kept at their work both day and night, driven with the lash until they died, when their places were taken by others. See Metals; Crafts, II, 10.

MINGLED PEOPLE, min'gd pêp'l (MIXED MULTITUDE):

(1) "Mixed multitude" occurs in Nu 11 4 as a tr of ἄνθρωπος, ἄνθρωπος, "collection," "rabble." The same phrase in Ex 12 38; Neh 13 3 is the rendition of 2żêb, 2żêb. "Mingled people" is used also to translate 2żêb, and is found in Jer 25 20-24; 50 27; Ezek 30 5, and in 1 K 10 15 (AV [Arabic] "mixed people"). In the last case both revised VSS have followed the pointing of the MT, and this pointing alone distinguishes "mingled people" (2żêb) from "Arabia" (2żêbb); in the unpointed text both words are equally 2żêb. Now "the mixed multitude" is applied to the Arab camp, and the correction into "Arabia," as in the MT (and EV of the 2 Ch 9 14, is indicated. Probably the same change should be made in Ezek 30 5, reading "Ethiopia, and Put, and Lud, and Arabia, and Cub." A similar textual context seems to be responsible for either "and all the kings of Arabia" in Jer 25 4 or "and all the kings of the mingled people" in Jer 25 24. On all these verses see the comments.

(2) In Jer 25 20; 50 37, "mingled people" is a term of contempt for the hybrid blood of certain of Israel's enemies. Something of this same contempt may be contained in Ex 12 38, where a multitude of non-Israelisitish camp-followers are mentioned as accompanying the children of Israel in the exodus, and in Nu 11 4 it is this motley body of Israel's town. But who were they, why they wished or were permitted to join in the exodus, and what eventually became of them or of their descendants is a very perplexing puzzle. In Neh 13 5, the "mixed multitude" consists of the inhabitants of Pal whom the Jews found there after the return from the exile (see Samaria). In accord with the command of Dt 23 3-5, the Jews withdrew from all religious intercourse whatever had been established with these.

(3) A priestly family of the time of the high priest Joiakim (Neh 12 17), probably = Mijamin (2).

(4) A priestly participant in the ceremony of the dedication of the wall (Neh 12 41).

MINISH, min'ish (AV and ERV Ex 5 19; Ps 107 39; ERV Isa 19 6; Hos 8 10): The vb. "minish," "make small," is now obsolete, replaced by its derivative "diminish" (cf ARV in all vs above).

I. The Word "Ministry."—The common NT term for the ministry is diakonia (διακονία), and along with it we find diaconos (διακόνος), "minister," he diakonos (ὁ διακόνος), "he who ministers," and diakonéin (διακονεῖν), "to minister." All these words have a very extensive application within the NT and are by no means restricted to denote service within the Christian church; even when so restricted the words are used in a great variety of meanings: e.g. (1) discipleship in general (Jn 12 26); (2) service rendered to the church because of the "gifts" bestowed (Rom 12 7; 1 Cor 12 5), and hence all kinds of service (Acts 6 2; Mt 20 26; Mk 10 45) specifically the "ministry of the Word" (Eph 4 12), and most frequently the "apostleship" (Acts 1 17; 20 24; 21 19; Rom 11 13, etc); (4) such services as feeding the poor (Acts 6 1; 11 29; 12 25), or organizing and providing the great collection for the poor saints at Jerusalem (Rom 16 25; 2 Cor 8 4,10, etc); (5) such services as rendered by Stephanas (1 Cor 16 15), by Archippus (Col 4 17), by Tychicus (Eph 6 21; Col 4 7), etc.

In this art. the word has to do with the guidance and government of a united community, fellowship, or brotherhood of men and women.

Use of the Word.—The words in Rom 16 25; 1 Cor 16 5; Eph 4 12; Col 4 17; the word "minister" in Rev 1:6; 2 Thess 1:7 were translated "bishop" in the A.V. and RSV. The RSV has "minister" in Acts 13 1-3 while the A.V. has "bishop" in Acts 6:1-6. In Matt 16 18; 18:17-20 the English versions read "apostle," but in Acts 1:20; 14:23 they read "bishop." The A.V. and RSV use the word "minister" in Matt 28 19, but "presbyter" in Acts 14:23. In the A.V. the word "minister" or "apostle" is used to denote the head of a church or of a group of churches, even in cases in which the existence of a local church is not presupposed. The RSV uses the word "minister" for the English "bishop" in Acts 18:23; 1 Cor 1:1; 2 Tim 1:6; 3:4. The "minister" in 1 Cor 4:16 is the "bishop" of the English versions.

In this art. the word has to do with the guidance and government of a united community, fellowship, or brotherhood of men and women.

II. Two Different Kinds of Ministry.—The earliest fact we have about the organization of the Christian church is given in Acts 6, where we are told that "seven" men were set apart by the apostles who composed a committee that is called a "ministry of tables" (diakoneln του ληθανου), which is distinguished from the "ministry of the word" (diakoneln του ληθανου), which appears at the very beginning of the church and is the basis of the apostolic church and beyond it into the sub-apostolic. It can be traced in the Ep's of St. Paul and in other parts of the NT. It is seen in the Didache, in the Pastor of Hermas, in the Ep's of Barnabas, in the Apology of Justin Martyr, in the writings of Irenaeus and elsewhere. For a full list of authorities, see Harnack, Texte u. Untersuchungen, II, ii, 111 ff. The one ministry differs from the other in function, and the distinction depends on a conception to be afterward examined —that of "gifts." The common name, in apostolic and sub-apostolic literature, for the members of the one kind of ministry is "those who speak the Word of God" (kaleides) ον ληθανου του ληθανου). Modern writers have called it the "charismatic" ministry, but perhaps the better term is the "prophetic ministry;" while to the other class belong all the names which are given to denote office-bearers in the local churches. The two existed side by side. The great practical distinction between them is that the members of the former were in no sense office-bearers in any one Christian community; they were not elected or appointed to any office; they were not set apart for duties by any eclesiastical ceremony. The "Word" came to them and they were compelled by inward impulse to speak the message given them to deliver. Some were wanderers; others confined themselves to their own community. They were responsible to no ecclesiastical authority. Churches were encouraged to test them and their message; for the "gift" of discerning whether a so-called prophet spoke a truly Divine message was always presupposed to be within the local church. But once accepted they took a higher place than the office-bearers, they presided at the Lord's Supper, and their judgments in cases of discipline could overbear ordinary ecclesiastical rules. The contest of Cyprian with the "confessors" at Carthage was the last stage of the long struggle which arose in the 2d cent. between the two ministries. Out of the latter kind of ministry came, by ordinary development, all the various kinds of ecclesiastical organization which now exist. Its members were office-bearers in the strictest sense of the word; they were selected to do ecclesiastical work in a given community, they were set apart for it in a special way, and they were responsible to the church for its due performance. In this sense there is no distinction. Only that two kinds of ministries are thoroughly distinct from each other, the same individuals might belong to both kinds. The "prophetic gift" might fall on anyone, private member or office-bearer alike. Or reposing in a not private sense, it is the Holy "office-bearer." ApoUos, Gal, Prophets, denied make Cor 21 whatever the 1 every Paul earliest As 35 Junias were mentioned the (Rom 16:21), and the name for "gift." For, it may be seen of Smyrna, was a prophet; so was Ignatius of Antioch, and many others. The "gift" of speaking the Word of God was a personal and not an official source of enlightenment.

In the prophetic ministry we find a threefold division—apostles, prophets and teachers. Some would add a fourth, evangelists, i.e. men like the apostles in all respects save in having seen the Lord in the Ministry—Jesus of Nazareth. This distinction may hold good for the apostolic period, though that appears to be very doubtful; it disappears utterly in the sub-apostolic; evangelist and apostle seem to be one class. This triple division may be traced through the early Christian 1. C. down to the Clementine Homilies, which can scarcely be earlier than 200 AD. It is hardly possible to define each class in any mechanical fashion; speaking generally, the first were the missionary pioneers who were at first the Twelve and what is chiefly, while the second and third classes belonged exhortation and instruction within the Christian communities.

(1) Apostles.—In the NT and in the other lit. of the early church the word "apostle" is used in a narrow and in a wider sense, and it is the more extensive use of the word which is the first division of the prophetic ministry. The Lord selected the Twelve, "whom also he named apostles" (Mc 3:14, RvM), to be trained by personal fellowship with Him and by apprenticeship work among the villages of Galilee for that proclamation of His gospel which was to be their future life-work. Two things strictly personal and excluding every thought of successors separated the "Eleven" from all other men: long personal fellowship with Jesus in the inner circle of His followers, and their selection by Himself while still in the flesh. They were the "Apostles" in the narrow sense of the word. But the name was given to many others. Matthias, who had enjoyed personal intercourse with Jesus both before and after the resurrection, was called by the disciple company, confirmed by decision of the lot, to the same 'service and sending forth' (diakonia kat apostol) (Acts 1:25). Paul was called by the Lord Himself, but in vision and inward experience, and took rank with those before mentioned (Rom 1:1 ff; Gal 2:7–9). Others, called apostles, are mentioned by name in the NT.

Barnabas is not only an apostle but is recognized to have rank equal to the "Eleven" (Acts 14:14; Gal 2:7–9). The correct order for these two men (Rom 16:7) declares that Andronicus and Junia were apostles who had known Christ before Paul became a believer. Chrysostom, who thinks that Junias or Junia was a woman, does not believe that her sex hindered her from being an apostle. Silas or Silvanus and Timothy, on the most natural interpretation of the passage, are called apostles by St. Paul in 1 Thess 1:6. The title can hardly be denied to Apollos (1 Cor 4:6,9). St. Paul32 promises him to be called "apostle of churches," and declares them to be "the glory of Christ" (2 Cor 8:23m). One of them, Epaphroditus, is mentioned by name—"your apostle," says Paul writing to the Christians of Philippi (Phil 2:25m); and there must have been many others.

"Apostles" are distinguished from the "Twelve" by St. Paul in the rapid summary he gives of the appearances of Jesus after the resurrection (1 Cor 15:5,7). Besides those true apostles the NT mentions others who are called "false apostles" (2 Cor 11:13), and that while of these two kinds of ministries are thoroughly distinct from each other, the same individuals might belong to both kinds. The "prophetic gift" might fall on anyone, private member or office-bearer alike. Or reposing in a not private sense, it is the Holy "office-bearer." ApoUos, Gal, Prophets, denied make Cor 21 whatever the 1 every Paul earliest As 35 Junias were mentioned the (Rom 16:21), and the name for "gift." One of them, Epaphroditus, is mentioned by name—"your apostle," says Paul writing to the Christians of Philippi (Phil 2:25m); and there must have been many others.
recognized that they had a regular place in the meeting for public worship (1 Cor 14); he desired that every member in the Corinthian church should possess the "gift" of prophecy (1 Cor 14 5, 9); he exhorted the brethren at Thessalonica to "cherish prophecysings" (1 Thess 5 20), and those in Rome to make full use of prophecy (Rom 12 6). If he criticized somewhat severely the conduct of the "corinthiats" of the Corinthian church, it was not because he did not teach them how to make full use of their "gift" for the right edifying of the brethren.

Prophecy was founded on revelation; the prophets were men, esp. "gifted" with spiritual intuition and magnetic presence. Sometimes their "gift" took the form of ecstasy, but no means always; St. Paul implies that prophets have a real command of and can control their utterances. Sometimes their message came to them in visions, as we find in the Apocalypse and in Hbises; but this was not a necessary means. The prophets spoke as they were moved, and the Spirit worked on them in various ways.

The influence of these prophets seems to have increased rather than diminished during the earlier decades of the 1st cent. While the duty of the apostle was to the unbelievers, Jewish or heathen, the sphere of the prophecy lay in the mission and the Christian congregation. It was his business to edify the brethren. Prophets had a recognized place in the meeting for the purpose of edifying the congregation; if one happened to be present at the dispensation of the Lord's Supper, he was present in the person of the office-bearers, and no prayers were expected to be extemporized (Did. x. 7). He had special powers when matters of discipline were discussed, as is plain from a great variety of evidence from Hbises down to Tertullian. From St. Paul's statements it seems that the largest number of the prophets he spoke of were members of the communities within which they used their "gift" of prophecy; but many of the more eminent prophets traveled from community to community edifying each. When such wandering preachers, with their wives and families, dwelt for a time in any Christian society, preaching and exhorting, it was deemed to be the duty of that society to support them, and regulations were made for such support. According to the Didache (ch. xi): "Every true prophet who shall settle among you is worthy of his support. . . . Every first-fruit item of the products of the winepress and threshing-floor, of oxen and of sheep and of birds, take it and give it to the prophets. . . . In like manner also when thou hastest a jar of wine or oil, take the first of it and give it to the prophets; and of meat and clothing and every possession take the first as may seem right to thee, and give according to the commandment of God. . . . The true prophets. Each congregation had to exercise the "gift" of discrimination and sift the true from the false, as the apostles confronted the true in early Christianity as well as in the old Judaism.

(3) Teachers.—While the third class of the prophetic ministry, the teachers, is found joined to the other two both in the NT and in sub-apostolic lit., and while St. Paul assigns a definite place for their services in the meeting for edification (1 Cor 14 26), we hear less about them and their work. They seem, however, to have lingered much longer in active service in the early church than did the apostles and the prophets.

As has been said, the first notice we have of organization within a local church is in Acts 6, where at the suggestion of the apostles seven men were selected to administer the Local Ministry of the congregation.

1. The Local Ministry

The expression that "the Seven" were a sort of court of office-bearers, deacons, is a comparatively late suggestion. These men are nowhere called deacons; the official designation is "the Seven".

It may be that the appointment of those men was only a temporary expedient, but it is more probable that "the Seven" were the elders of Acts 6 11; for we find those "elders" performing the duties which "the Seven" were appointed to fulfill. If we turn back to Acts 6 the name "elders" is "seven", the beginnings of local organization as a whole. When we turn to the expansion of Christian communities outside this one distinct picture of beginnings; but as all the churches in Palestine evidently regarded the society in Jerusalem as the mother church, it is likely that their organization was the same. Acts tells us that Paul and Barnabas left behind them at Derbe, Lystra and Iconium societies of a similar sort at their head. The word used suggests an election by popular vote and was probably the same as had been used in the selection of the "seven" in the Jerusalem church.

When we examine the records of the distinctively Pauline churches, there is not much direct evidence for the origins of the ministry there, but a great deal about the existence of some kind of rule and rulers. For one thing, we can see that those churches had and were encouraged to have feelings of independrule supposed to be essential. Even in the mother-church in Jerusalem, the congregational meeting exercised rule over the apostles themselves, for we find apostles summoned before it and examined on their conduct (Acts 11:1–4). The whole question demands the recognition of several facts:

1. Evidence abounds to show that the local church, during the apostolic and sub-apostolic age were self-governing communities and that the real background of the ministry was not apostolic authority but the congregational meeting. Its representative character and its authority are seen in the apostolic and sub-apostolic lit. from St. Paul to Cyprian.

2. The uniquely Christian correlation of the three conceptions of leadership, service and "gifts"; leadership depended on service, and service was possible by the possession and recognition of special gifts. (The general evidence existing to show that there was a gradual growth of the principle of association from looser to more compact forms of organization (Gayford, art. "Church" in HDB; also Harnack, Epis. 1887, January to June, 322–24), must not be forgotten; only because "gifts" gave the church a Divine authority to exercise rule and oversight apart from any special apostolic direction.

3. The general evidence existing to show that there was a gradual growth of the principle of association from looser to more compact forms of organization (Gayford, art. "Church" in HDB; also Harnack, Epis. 1887, January to June, 322–24), must not be forgotten; only because "gifts" gave the church a Divine authority to exercise rule and oversight apart from any special apostolic direction.

4. We must also bear in mind that the first Christians were well acquainted with various kinds of social organization which entered into their daily life and which could not fail to suggest how they might adopt them in their new society.

Examples occur readily: (a) Every Jewish village community was ruled by its "seven wise men," and it is probably that the appointment of the "Seven" in the primitive Jewish church was suggested by familiarity with this example of social polity. (b) It was and is an almost universal oriental usage that the "next of kin to the founder is recognized, after the founder's death, to be the head of the new religious community founded, and this may account for the selection of James, the eldest male surviving relative of Our Lord, to be the recognized and honored head of the church in Jerusalem. James has been called the first bishop; but when we read in Eusebius (HE, III, 14, 1: 32: 4: IV, 22, 4, 31: 209) that his successors were chosen by the term seems inappropriate. A succession in the male line of the king, the emperor, and the selection of the office is made in the hands of a family council, and where two (James and Zopher) can rule together, has small analogy to any religious rule. The relation of the "patron" to "clerks" by which in one form or other had spread throughout the civilized world is analogous to the practice of clergymen used to donate rulers in local churches. We find prēstwmoi (presbiteroi), prōstos (prostatai), proostēs (prostatai, presbiteroi) in various writings, where the last was used as late as the middle of the 2d cent. to denote ministry in the Rom church (Rom 12:8; 16:2; 1 Thess 5:12; Hermas, Pastor, Viz., 2, 4; Justin, Apol., 1:65). (c) The Rom empire was honeycombed with "clerk," some recognized by the priestess rule without legal recognition and liable to suppression. These confraternities were very varied character, trade unions, burial clubs, etc., but a large proportion were for the purpose of practising special religious rites. The introduction of the Dispensation seemed to have enrolled among these confraternities, and certainly appeared to many heathen neighbors to be one kind of private associations in the practice of a religion which had been legalized. Many scholars have insisted that the gentile Christian churches simply copied the organization of such confraternities (Renan, Les Apoptres; Heini, Zeitsschrift f. wissenschaft. Theol., 1879, 777); Hachter, Organisation of Early Christian Churches, there must have been some external resemblances. Pilin believed that the Christian churches of Bithynia were illicit confraternities (Ep., 69: Cuchian, Perpoxos Patrois). They had, in common with such societies, a democratic constitution; they shared a "common meal" at stated times; they made a mistake to be elected to the leadership; they were elected by a committee of office-bearers; and they exercised a certain amount of discipline over their members. Multitudes of Christian confraternities were the same, and many continued to be so after accepting Christianly (Cyprian, Ep., xlvii. 6).

But while the Christian churches may have learned much about the general principles of associated life from all these varied forms of social organization, it cannot be said that they copied any one of them. The primitive Christian societies organized themselves independently in virtue of the new moral and social life implanted within them; and though they may have come to it by various paths, they all in the end arrived at one common form—a society ruled by a body of office-bearers who possessed the "gifts" of government and of subordinate service embodied in the offices of presbyter and deacon.

III. The Threefold Congregational Ministry.—During the 2d cent. the ministry was subject to a change. The ruling body of office-bearers in every congregation received a permanent president, who was a presbyter or bishop, the latter being the commoner. The change came gradually. It provoked no strong opposition. By the beginning of the 3d cent. it was everywhere accepted.

When we seek to trace the causes why the college of elders received a president, we have to consider that of all the ecclesiastical life in the local church and the one potent office-bearer, we are reduced to conjecture. This can only be said with confidence in the East and gradually spread to the West, and that there are hints of a gradual change even in the "Church and the Ministry in the Early Centuries," 150, 153–55), Scholars have brought forward many reasons for the change; the necessity under the circumstances of times from danger from external persecution or from the introduction of ecclesiastical service, the embodiment of faith of the members; the convenience of being represented to other local churches by one man who could claim himself with the administration of external affairs of the congregation; the need of one man to preside at the solemn and crowning act of worship, the administration of the Lord's Supper; the sense of congregational unity implied in the possession of one center to which all or any probable ways in which the church were influenced in making this change in their ministry.

This threefold congregational ministry is best seen in the Epp. of Ignatius of Antioch. They portray a Christian community having at its head a presbyter or bishop, the latter being a body of deacons. These form the ministry or office-bearers of the congregation to whom obedience is due. Nothing is to be done without the consent of the bishop, neither love-feast, nor sacrament, nor any thing, whether internal or external. The ruling body is a court where the bishop presides, surrounded by his council or session of elders; and the one is helpless without the other, for if the bishop be the lyre, the elders are the chords, and both are needful. And so Ignatius compares the bishop to Jesus, and the elders to the apostles who surrounded Him. There is no trace of ascetical polity, apostolic succession, one-man government, i.e., a minister of one man's rule in these letters of Ignatius; and yet what he portrays is unlike any form of diocesan episcopacy.

It is interesting to remark how all throughout the 3d cent. and later every body of Christians, even if consisting of fewer than twelve families, is instructed to organize itself into a church under a ministry of office-bearers, consisting of a bishop or pastor, at least two elders and at least three deacons. Should the bishop be illiterate—character more than erudition determined his choice—the congregation was told to elect a reader, and provision was made for a ministry of women. It was possible to obey such instructions, because the ministry of the early church received no stipends. The ministry were office-bearers, to whom they were elected by a committee of office-bearers, and they exercised a certain amount of discipline over their members. Multitudes of Christian confraternities must have been like the confraternities of the 3d cent. and many continued to be so after accepting Christianly (Cyprian, Ep., xlvii. 6).

1. Insistence on Organizational Ministry

secular callings, and supported themselves. Buildings, set apart for public worship, did not exist until the very close of the 2d cent., and then only in a few populous centers in towns which had felt persecution but slightly. The only property which a church possessed in such cases was its congregational records and perhaps a place of burial, were the offerings which were presented by members of the congregation, mostly in kind, after the Eucharist; and these offerings were distributed to the poor of the congregation. If office-bearers received a share, it was only on account of their poverty and because they were on the roll of widows, orphans and helpless poor.

This threefold congregational ministry has been called by some scholars "monarchical episcopacy," a title as high-sounding as it is misleading. The kingdom over which these so-called monarchs presided might and often did consist of less than twelve families, and their rule was fenced in with many restrictions. We can collect from the Epistles of Ignatius that within the powers and the limitations of the Church (Epp. to Polycarp, Ephesus, et al.) the bishop administered the finances of the church; he was president of the court of Elders; he had the right to call and presumably to preside over the court of discipline; and he had the regulation of the sacraments, especially in his hands. On the other hand, it is more than likely that he, or even he in conjunction with the elders, could excommunicate; that appears to have remained in the hands of the congregational meeting. The bishop might convolve the congregational meeting for the purpose, but it belonged to the meeting and not to the bishop to appoint delegates and messengers to other churches; and the meeting had the power to order the bishop to go on such a mission.

(1) Aid given in selecting a bishop.—From what has been said it is plain that the selection of a bishop became one of the most important acts a congregation was called upon to perform. Accordingly, provision was made for its assistance. It is declared in the Apostolic Canons that if a congregation contains fewer than twelve members competent to vote at the election of a bishop, neighboring, "well-established" churches are to be written to in order that three men may be sent to assist the congregation in selecting their pastor (Sources of the Apostolic Canons, 2:1). This is evidently the origin of what afterward became the custom and later a law, that the consecration of a bishop required the presence of three neighboring bishops—a rule which has given occasion to the saying that "all Christendom becomes Presbyterian on a consecration day." This custom and rule, which in its beginnings was simply practical assistance given to a weak by stronger congregations, came to bear the meaning that the bishop thus consecrated was an office-bearer in the church universal as well as the pastor of a particular congregation. It is also more than probable that this practice of seeking assistance in an emergency is the germ out of which grew the Synod—the earliest recorded synods being congregational meetings assisted in times of difficulty by advice of experienced persons from other churches.

(2) Bishops and presbyters.—When a small group of villagers had been won to Christianity through the efforts of the Christian congregation in a neighboring town, they commonly were disinclined to send a group from their village into town to join in the public worship. "On the day called Sunday," says Justin Martyr, "all who live in the city and in the country gather together into one place" (Ap., 1:67). The earliest collections of canons show that the bishop was able in time of absence or sickness to delegate his duties to elders or even to deacons; and this enabled him, when occasion for it arose, to be, through his office-bearers, the pastor of several congregations. We can see the same process at work more clearly in large towns where the Scriptural provision for a church in the Scriptures was reduced, through the process of the recording of the spiritual history of the church, to a small place. The result was that the bishop became very large. The bishop was always held to be the head of the Christian community, however large, in one place. He was the pastor; he baptized; he presided at the Holy Supper; he admitted catechumens to the full communion of the church. By the middle of the 3d cent., the work in most large towns was more than one man could do. No record exists of the number of members belonging to the Rom church at this time, but some idea of its size may be obtained from the fact that it had more than 1,500 persons on its poor-roll; and before the close of the century the Rom Christians worshiped in over 40 separate places of meeting. It is obvious that one man could not perform the whole pastoral duties for such a multitude, and that most of the pastoral work must have been delegated to the elders or presbyters. The unity of the pastorate was for long strictly preserved by the custom that the bishop consecrated the communion elements in one church, and these were carried round to the other congregations. The bishop even performed the function of the pastor in every congregation; the elders and deacons belonged to the whole Christian community; they served all the congregations and were not attached to one distinctively. In Alexandria, on the other hand, something of the type of the Synod of St. Paul, we do not find a common to every church, for we do not know the former class until the beginning of the 3d cent. In the West the word was ordi, and in the east clerus, from which come our "orders" and "clergy." The admission for the municipality in towns or for the committees which presided over a confraternity, and clerus denoted rank or class. The introduction of monarchical stipends and the implication that a paid ministry was expected to give its whole time to the service of the church made the distinction between clergy and laity more emphatic. When we investigate the matter, it is evident that the fact that the clergy are paid complicates the question; for the earliest lists are evidently those who are entitled to share in the funds of the church. Hence the first officers figure as members of the ordi or clerus. Setting this disturbing element aside we find that the earliest division of the ministry in the 3d cent. was into the orders of bishops, presbyters and deacons (all congregational); but bishops and presbyters are sometimes said to form the special clerus ecclesiasticus. The earliest addition to these three orders is the reader, and there follows soon the sub-deacon. Then come such persons as the minor orders. Our readers, as we have seen, were needed at first to assist illiterate bishops or presbyters; their retention was inseration of exercise or it has been plausibly accounted for by the idea that they represented the absorption of the old prophetic ministry. The term "minor orders" is sometimes applied to the minor orders of the Christian church evidently copied the pagan temple usages where persons who performed corresponding services were included in the ministry and had due share of the temple revenues. In the institution of a graded hierarchy including metropolitan... and patriarchs, the churches probably followed the example of the great pagan organization called forth by the imperial cult of the Divi et Divas (Lindsay, The Church and the Minnith, 335 f). As Mommsen remarks, "The Christian church took its hierarchical weapons from the arsenal of the enemy."

IV. Synods.—Synods to begin with were essentially democratic assemblies. They were, in their primitive form, congregational in character assisted in time of emergency by delegates (not necessarily bishops) from "well-established churches," and they grew to be the instrument by which churches grouped around one center became united into one compact organization. The times were not democratic, and gradually the presence of the laity and even of presbyters and deacons and their combined efforts to the decisions of the assembly became more and more a matter of form and gradually almost altogether. The synods consisted exclusively of bishops and became councils for registering their decisions; and this implied that each local church was fully and completely represented by its pastor or bishop, who had become very much of an autocrat, responsible, not to his congregation nor even to a synod, but to God alone. Before the end of the 3d cent. and onward, synods or councils had become a regular part of the organization of the whole church, and the membership was confined to the bishops of the several churches included in the group. It was natural that such assemblies should meet in the provincial capitals, for the roads converged to the cities which were the seats of the Roman provincial administration. A synod required a chairman, and various usages obtained about the natural chairmanship, the first of the bishops present was placed in the chair, and this continued long to be the practice in several parts of the empire. Gradually it became the habit to put into the chair the bishop of the town in which the council met, and this grew to a prescriptive right. It was then that the bishops of the towns which were the meeting-places of synods came to be called metropolitans. The title was for long one of courtesy only and did not carry with it any ecclesiastical rank and authority. But by the middle of the 4th cent. the metropolitans had acquired the right to summon the synods and even to exercise some authority over the bishops of the bounds, esp. in the matter of election and consecration. When Christianity was thoroughly established as the religion of the empire, the more important bishops secured for themselves the civil precedence and privileges which had belonged to the higher priests of the abandoned Imperial Cult, and the higher ranks of the Christian ministry came gradually in a lordship strangely in variance with their earlier position of service.

MINNITH, min'th (μίννιθ, minnāth; B, ἀξίων 'Αρπών, dēchra Aρνόν, A, eis Σωμαίθ, eis Se- mōēθ): After Jephthah defeated the Ammonites, he is said to have smitten them from Aroer "until thou come to Minnith" (Jgs 11 33). Omn mentions a place called Manath, 4 Rom miles from Heshbon, on the road to Philadelphia ("Ammān"), and locates Abel-cheramim, which is mentioned with Minnith, 7 miles from Philadelphia, without indicating the direction. Some travelers have spoken of a Menjah, 7 miles E. of Heshbon, but of this place Trastram (Land of Moab, 140) could find no trace. The same place appears to be mentioned in Ezk 27 17 as supplying wheat, which figures in the trade between Judah and Tyre. There are really no reliable data on which to suggest an identification, while there are grave reasons to suspect the integrity of the text. W. EWING

MINSTREL, min'stre. See MUSIC.

MINT, mint (minster, hēdāsumon): Mentioned (Mt 23 23; Lk 11 42) as one of the small things which were tithed. The cultivated variety (Menētha piperita), "peppermint," was doubtless primarily intended, but the wild M. silvestris or horsemint, which flourishes all over the mountains of Pal, is probably included.

MIPHKAD, mîph'kad, GATE OF (מְפִּקֵד, sha'ar ha-miphkād; RV "Hamiphkad") (Neh 3:31): A gate in, or near, the north end of the east wall of Jerus, rebuilt under Nehemiah. Its exact position is uncertain. See JERUSALEM.

II. Miracle in the NT.—The subject of miracles has given rise to much abstract discussion; but it is best approached by considering the
1. Miracles actual facts involved, and it is best in Gospel to begin with the facts nearest to us: History those which are recorded in the NT.

Our Lord's ministry was attended from first to last by events entirely beyond the ordinary course of Nature. He was born of a Virgin, and His birth was announced by angels, both to His mother, and to the man to whom she was betrothed (Mt and Lk). He suffered death on the cross as an ordinary man, but on the third day after His crucifixion He rose from the tomb in which He was buried, and lived with His disciples for 40 days (Acts 1), and drinking with them, He had a body superior to ordinary physical conditions. At length He ascended to the heavens, and a cloud received Him out of their sight. But besides these two great miracles of His birth and His resurrection, Jesus was continually performing miracles during His ministry. His own words furnish the best description of the facts. In reply to the question of John the Baptist, His predecessor, He said, "Go and tell John the things which ye hear and see: the blind receive their sight, and the lame walk, the lepers are cleansed, and the deaf hear, and the dead are raised up, and the poor have good tidings preached to them" (Mt 11.4.5). Specimens of these miracles are given in detail in the Gospel narratives; but it is a mistake to consider the latter as too often done, though these particular miracles were the only ones in question. Even if they could be explained away, as has often been attempted, there would remain reiterated statements of the evangelists that He worked them the greater, as He had told the people. (4.23), or St. Luke's "And a great number of the people from all Judaea and Jerusalem, and the seacoast of Tyre and Sidon, who came to hear him, and to be healed of their diseases; and they that were troubled with unclean spirits were healed. And all the multitude sought to touch him; for power went forth from him, and healed them all" (6.17-19).

It must be borne in mind that if there is any assured result of modern criticism, it is that these accounts proceed from contemporaries and eyewitnesses, and with respect to the third evangelist there is one unique consideration of great import.

The researches of Dr. HOBART have proved to the satisfaction of a scholar like HARNACK, that St. Luke was a trained physician. His testimony to the miracles is therefore the nearest to the evidence which has often been desired—that of a man of science. When St. Luke, e.g., tells us of the healing of a fever (4.38.39), he uses the technical term for a violent fever recognized in his time (cf MEYER, in loc.); his testimony is therefore that of one who knew what fevers and the healing of them meant. This consideration is especially valuable in reference to the miracles recorded of St. Paul in the latter part of Acts. It should always be borne in mind that they are recorded by a physician, who was an eyewitness of them.

It seems to follow from these considerations that the working of miracles by Our Lord, and by St. Paul in innumerable cases, cannot be questioned without attributing to the evangelists a whole untrustworthiness of evidence, due either to willful, or to superstitious misconception and this is a supposition which will certainly never commend itself to a fair and competent judgment. It would involve, in fact, such a sweeping condemnation of the evangelists, that it could never be entertained at all except under one presupposition, viz. that such miraculous occurrences, as being incompatible with the established laws of Nature, could not possibly have happened, and that consequently any allegations of them must of necessity be attributed to illusion or fraud.

III. Miracle and Laws of Nature.—This, in fact, is the prejudgment or prejudice which has prompted, either avowedly or tacitly, the great mass of negative criticism on this subject, and if it could be substantiated, we should be confronted, in the Gospels, with a problem of portentous difficulty.

On this question of the abstract possibility of miracles, it seems sufficient to quote the following passage from the Gifford Lectures for 1891 of the late eminent man of science, Professor Sir George Stokes.

On p. 23 Professor Stokes says: "We know very well that a miracle, an extraordinary act uniformly according to a certain rule, and yet for a special reason may on a particular occasion act quite differently. We cannot refuse to admit the possibility of something analogous taking place as regards the action of the Supreme Being. If we think of the laws of Nature as self-existent and uncaused, then we cannot admit any deviation from them. But if we think of them as designed by a Supreme Will, then we must allow the possibility of their being on some particular occasion suspended. Nor is it even necessary in order that some result out of the ordinary course of Nature should be brought about, that they should even be suspended; it may be that some difference, though brought into action, whereby the result in question is brought about, St. Matthew gives us instances, laws by which the ordinary course of Nature is regulated. . . . It may be that the event which we call a miracle was brought about, not by suspending the laws in ordinary operation, but by the superaddition of something not ordinarily in operation, of such a nature that its operation is not perceived."

Only one consideration need be added to this decisive scientific statement, viz. that if there be agencies and forces in existence outside the ordinary world of Nature, and if they can under certain circumstances interfere in it, they must necessarily produce effects inconsistent with the processes of that world when left to itself. Life under the surface of the water has a certain course of its own, independent of ours; but if a man standing on the bank of a river throws a stone into it, effects are produced which must be as unexpected and as accountable as a miracle to the creatures who live in the stream. The nearness of two worlds which are so distinct from one another receives, indeed, a striking illustration from the juxtaposition of the world above the water and the world below its surface. There is no barrier between them; they are actually in contact; yet the life in them is perfectly distinct. The spiritual world may be as close to us as the air is to the water, and the angels, or other ministers of God's will, may as easily, at His word, interpose in it as a man can throw a stone into the water. When a stone is thus thrown, there is no suspension of or modification of any law, but simply that it is as if Sir George Stokes supposes in the case of a miracle, a new agency has interposed.

This, indeed, is the main fact of which miracles are irrefutable evidence. They show that some power outside Nature, some supernatural power, has intervened.

4. Agreement with Biblical Ideas and Terms - All are exactly described by the three words in the NT already mentioned. "They are terata, "prodigies" or "wonders"; they are also dynamata, virtutes, powers," or "manifestation of powers;" and finally they are a semia, "signs."

The three conceptions are combined, and the source of such manifestations stated with them, in a pregnant verse of H.: "God also bearing witness with them, both by signs and wonders, by the power of the Holy Spirit, according to His own will." (Rom. 1:20)

The words of J. S. Mill on the question of the possibility of miracles may also be quoted: "Dealing with the question in his "Essays on Meta-Physic," Mill observes: "In order that any one should be a counteracting to the law of cause and effect, it is a new effect, supposed to be produced by the introduction of a new cause. Of the adequacy of that cause, if present, there can be no doubt; and the only antecedent improbability which can be ascribed to the miracle is the improbability that any such cause existed." (System of Logic, II, 161-62.)

There is, however, one other important characteristic of miracles at least with which we are concerned — viz. that they occur at the command, or at the prayer, of the person to whom they are attributed. This is really their most significant feature, and the one upon which their whole evidential value depends. One critic has estimated the fall of the fortresses of Jaffalabab, on a critical occasion, with the fall of the walls of Jericho, as though the one was no more a miracle than the other. But the fall of the walls of Jericho, though it may well have been produced by some natural force, such as an earthquake, bears the character of a miracle because it was predicted, and was thus commanded by God to occur in pursuance of the acts prescribed to Joshua. Similarly the whole significance of Our Lord's miracles is that they occur at His word and in obedience to Him. "What manner of man is this," exclaimed the disciples, "that even the winds and the sea obey Him?" (Matt. 8:27.)

IV. Evidential Value of Miracle. — This leads us to the true view of the value of miracles as proofs of a revelation. This is one of the 1. Miracles as proofs far too abstract a manner. Argument of Reve- lation must have been strung to show that there can be no real revelation without miracles, that miracles are the proper proof of a revelation, and so on. It is always a perilous method of argument, perhaps a presumptuous one, to attempt to determine whether God could produce a given result in any other way than the one which He has actually adopted. The only safe, and the sufficient, method of proceeding is to consider whether as a matter of fact, and in what way, the miracles which are actually recorded do guarantee the particular revelation in question.

Consider Our Lord's miracles in this light. Assuming, on the grounds already indicated, that they actually occurred, they prove 2. Miracles beyond doubt that He had supreme power, and that what He actually said was not only true, but true in the striking words of the Eng. service for the Visitation of the Sick, that He was "Lord of life and death, and of all things, saving, as youth, strength, health, age, weakness and sickness." This is the grand fact which the miracles establish. They are not like external evidence, performed in attestation of a doctrine. They are direct and eloquent evidence of the cardinal truth of our faith, that Our Lord possessed powers which belong to God Himself. But they are not less direct evidence of the special office He claimed toward the human race — that of a Saviour. He did much more than merely impress the human mind with the thought that He was a Saviour by doing the works of a Saviour, by healing men and performing miracles. He was revealed as the man of God's own Word, the Mediator of our salvation, the Man Christ Jesus. He was the Saviour, with His words — virtutes — were direct evidence of their truth. He proved that He was the Saviour by doing the works of a Saviour, by revealing the truth from the very nature of God s body and soul. It is well known that salvation in the true sense, viz. saving men out of evils and corruptions into which they have fallen, is an idea which was actually introduced into the world by the gospel. There was no word for this in the Roman tongue. The ancients knew of a servator, but not of a salvator. The essential message of the miracles is that they exhibit Our Lord in this character — that of one who has alike the will and the power to save. Such is Our Lord's own application of them in His answer, already quoted, to the disciples of John the Baptist (Matt.11:4,5.)

It is therefore an extraordinary mistake to suppose that the evidence for our faith would not be damaged if the miracles were set aside. 3. Miracles We should lose the positive evidence Part of Our Lord's saving Revelation power. In this view, the miracles are not the mere proofs of a revelation; they are themselves the revelation, like the revelation of a Saviour from all human ills, and there has been no other revelation in the world of such a power. The miracles recorded of the apostles have a like effect. They are wrought, like St. Peter's and the impotent man, as evidence of the living power of the Saviour (Acts 3,4). "Be it known unto you all, and to all the people of Israel, in the name of Jesus Christ of Nazareth, whom ye crucified, whom God raised from the dead, even in him doth this man stand here before you and all. . . . And in none other is there salvation: for neither is there any other name under heaven, that is given among men, wherein we must be saved." (Acts 4:10,12.) In a word, the miracles of the NT, whether wrought by Our Lord or by His apostles, reveal a new source of power, in the person of Our Lord, for the salvation of men. Whatever interference they involve with the usual order of Nature is due, not to any modification of that order, but to the intervention of a new force in it. The nature of that force is revealed by them, and can only be ascertained by observation of them. A man is known by his words and by his deeds, and to these two sources of revelation, respecting His person and character, Our Lord expressly appealed. If I do not the works of my Father, believe me not. But if I do them, though ye believe not me, believe the works: that ye may know and understand that the Father is in me, and I in the Father” (Jn 10:37-38).

It is therefore a mistake to try to put the evidence of the miracles into a logically demonstrative argument. Palestrina put the case too much in this almost anathematized form.

"It is idle," he said, "to say that a future state had been discovered already. It had been discovered as the Copernican system was; it was as much a matter of necessity. He alone discovers who proves; and no man can prove this point but the teacher who testifies by miracles that he has the grace come from God” (Moral and Politi. Philos.oy, book V, ch. ix, close).

Colleridge, in the Aids to Reflection, criticizes the above and puts the argument in a juster and more human form.

"Most fervently do I contend, that the miracles worked by Christ, both as miracles and as fulfillments of prophecy, both as signs and as wonders, made plain discovery, and gave unquestionable proof, of His Divine character and authority: that they were to the whole Jewish nation true and appropriate evidences, that He was indeed come who had been confidently and declared, by His fathers, "Behold your God will come with vengeance, even God with a recompense He will come and save you. I receive of them, or prove, for the truth of every word which He taught who was Himself the Word: and as I have stretched forth the end of the life to come, in that they were manifestations of Him who said: "I am the resurrection and the life!” (note prefixed to Aphorism CXXXI).

This seems the fittest manner in which to contemplate the evidence afforded by miracles.

V. Miracles in the OT.—If the miracles ascribed to Our Lord and His apostles are established on the grounds now stated, and are of the same character and purpose with NT Miracles as credible and applying the miracles of the OT. They also are obviously wrought as manifestations of a Divine Being, and as evidences of His character and will.

This, e.g., was the great purpose of the miracles wrought for the deliverance of the people of Israel out of Egypt. The critical theories which treat the narrative of those events as ‘unhistorical’ are, I am convinced, unsound. If they could be established, they would deprive us of some of the most precious evidences we possess of the character of God. But, in any case, the purpose to which the alleged miracles are ascribed is of the same character as in the case of the NT miracles. "For ask now," says Moses, "of the days that are past... whether there hath been any such thing as this great thing is, or hath been heard like it? Did ever a people hear the voice of God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as thou hast heard, and live? Or hath God assayed to go and take him a nation from the midst of another nation, by trials, by signs, and by wonders, and by war, and by a mighty hand, and by an outstretched arm, and by great terrors, according to all that Jehovah thy God did for you in Egypt before your eyes? Unto thee it was showed, that thou mightest know that Jehovah is God; there is none else besides him" (Dt 4:32–35). The God of the Jews was, and is, the God manifested in these miracles. Accordingly, the Ten Commandments are introduced with the declaration: "I am Jehovah thy God, who brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage," and on this follows: "Thou shalt have no other gods before me" (Ex 20:3). Without these miracles, the God of the Jews would be an abstraction. As manifested in them, He is the living God, with a known character, “a just God and a Saviour” (Isa 45:21), who can be loved with all the heart, and soul, and mind, and strength.

The subsequent miracles of Jewish history, like those wrought by Elijah, serve the same great end, and reveal more and more both of the will and the power of God. They are signs, portents, not mere portents but ex- temporary testimony to a doctrine. They are the acts of a living Being wrought through His ministers, or with their cooperation, and He is revealed by them. If the miracles of the NT were possible, those of the OT were possible, and as those of the NT reveal the nature and will of Christ, by word and deed, so those of the OT reveal the existence, the nature, and the will of God. Nature, indeed, reveals God, but the miracles reveal new and momentous acts of God; and the whole religious life of the Jews, as the Ps show, is indissolubly bound up with them. The evidence for them is, in fact, the historic consciousness of a great and tenacious nation.

It should be added that the Jewish Scriptures embody one of the greatest of miracles—that of prophecy. It is obvious that the prophecy of the Jewish people is pre-as Miracle from the commencement, in the midst of the life of Abraham and onward. There can, moreover, be no question that the office of the Christ had been so distinctly foreshadowed in the Scriptures of the OT that the people, as a whole, expected a Messiah before He appeared. Our Lord did not, like Buddha or Mohammed, create a new office; He came to fill an office which had been described by the prophets, and of which they had predicted the functions and powers. We are told of the behaviour, "And beginning from Moses and from all the prophets, he interpreted to them in all the scriptures the things concerning himself" (Lk 24:27). That, again, is a revelation of God’s nature, for it reveals Him as ‘knowing the end from the beginning,’ and as the Ruler of human life and history.

VI. Ecclesiastical Miracles.—Some notice, finally, must be taken of the question of what are called ecclesiastical miracles. There seems no sufficient reason for assuming that miracles ceased with the apostles, and there is much evidence that in the early church miraculous cures, both of body and soul, were sometimes vouchedsafed. There were occasions and circumstances of the manifestation of such miraculous power was as appropriate as testimony of the living power of Christ, as in the scenes in the Acts. But they were not recorded under inspired guidance, like the miracles of the Apostolic Age, and they have in many cases been overlaid by legend.

The observation in Pascal’s Thoughts eminently applies to this class of miracles: "It has appeared to me that the real cause [that there are so many false miracles, false revelations, etc] is that there are true ones, for it would not be possible that there should be so many false miracles unless there were true, nor so many false miracles unless there were one that is true. For if all this had never been, it is impossible that so many others should have believed it... Thus instead of concluding that there are no true miracles since there are so many false, we must, on the contrary say that there are true miracles since there are so many false, and that false miracles exist only for the reason that there are true; so also that there are false religions only because there is one that is true" (Oeuvres, p. 41).

VII. Miracle in Works of Grace.—It has lately been argued with much earnestness and force in Germany, particularly by J. Wendland, in his Miracles and Christianity, that belief in miracles is indispensable to our apprehension of a real living God, and to our trust in His saving work in our own souls. The work of grace, indeed, is so far miraculous that it requires the influence upon our nature of a living power above that nature. It is not strictly correct to call it miraculous, as these operations of God's Spirit are not the established part of His kingdom of grace. But they none the less involve the exercise of a like supernatural power to that exhibited in Our Lord's miracles of healing and casting out of devils; and in proportion to the depths of man's Christian life will he be compelled to believe in the gracious operation on his soul of this Divine interposition.

On the whole, it is perhaps increasingly realized that miracles, so far from being an excrescence on Christian faith, are indissolubly bound up with it, and that there is a complete unity in the manifestation of the Divine nature, which is recorded in the Scriptures.

MIRACLES, GIFT OF. See Spiritual Gifts: Miracle.

MIRAGE, mɛ-ʀaɡɛ (מַגָּרֶה, ṣhârebû, "heat-mirage"; Arab. سَرْطْب, sarîb, from vb. سَرْطَب, to go forth, "to flow"; hence "flowing of water"): The glowing sand shall become a pool, and the thirsty ground springs of water (Isa 35 7); AV has "parched ground" and RV "mirage." The same Heb word is also used in Isa 49 10, "Neither shall the heat [in "mirage"] nor sun smite them." These are the only uses of the word in the Scriptures, although mirages are very common in the drier parts of the country. However, the context in both cases seems to justify the tr usually given, rather than "mirage."—Alfred H. Joy

MIRE, mɪr. See Chalkstone; Clay; Marsh.

MIRIAM, mɪrɪ-əm (מִרְיָם, mîryâm; LXX and the NT Ἄννα, Ἄνδρια; NV of the NT "Mary").

(1) Daughter of Amram and Jochebed, and sister of Aaron and Moses. It is probable that it was she who watched the ark of bulrushes in which the child Moses was laid (Ex 2; 25). She associated herself with her brothers in the exodus, was called the "prophetess," and led the choir of maidens who sang the triumph-song after the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex 15 21). Along with Aaron, she opposed Moses at Hazeroth (Nu 12 1-5). She was smitten with leprous in punishment, but on Aaron's intercession was pardoned and healed (Nu 12 10-15). She died and was buried at Kadesh (Nu 20 1). In the Deuteronomic Law respecting leprosy, Miriam is mentioned as a warning to the Israelites (Dt 24 8 f.). In Mic 6 4, she is referred to along with Moses and Aaron as a leader of God's people.

(2) Son (or daughter) of Jether (1 Ch 4 17). The latter half of the verse in its present situation unintelligible; it should probably follow ver 18 (see Curtis, "Chron.," in loc.).—John A. Lees MIRMAH, mɪr-ma (מִרְמָה, mîrmâh, "deceit"): A Benjamite (1 Ch 8 10).

MIRROR, mɪr-ɹ. See Looking-glass.

(2) In Three ver 66 (LXX Dn 3 88), for "Mishaël," one of Daniel's companions in captivity.

MISIAIS, mɪs-ə-ɛs, mɪs-ə-sɛ: RVm = "Masiaus."

MISCHIEF, mɪs-ʃɛf: The word, in the sense of "hurt" or "evil" befalling, plotted against, or done to, anyone, represents a variety of Heb terms (e.g., 'ṣənom, AV Gen 42 4; 44 29; Ex 21 22; ra, 1 S 16 17; 2 S 16 8; 1 K 11 19; Amâdû, Ps 71 14; 16; 10 7 14; Prov 24 2, etc). Sometimes RV changes the word, as to "evil" (Ex 32 12 22); in Acts 13 10, to "villany" (falsehood, falsehood). In RV Apoc the word is used for ekâd, kâkâ, "evil," Ad Est 13 5 (cf Sir 19 28); saâza, kâkô, "evil," 1 Mac 7 23; and Lat malam, "evil," 2 Esd 15 66. "Mischievous" is used, Ad Est 14 19, for scumpê, scumpê, "to be evil." The use in AV Apoc is considerably more extended (Sir 11 35; 19 27; 27 27, etc).—James Orr MISGAB, mɪs-gɛb (מִסְגָּב, ha-ningsâb; B, ὁ ῥήσυς, ὁ ῥήσυς; C, ὁ ἀνάγκης): Named with Nebo and Kiriathaim in the denunciation of doom against Moab (Jer 48 1). No trace of any name resembling this has been found. Possibly we should take it, not as a place-name, but as an appellation of some strong fortress, perhaps of Kir-moab itself. The term is elsewhere trd "high fortress" (Isa 25 12, etc).

MISHAEL, mɪs-hɛ-sl, mɪs-hɛ-sl (מֵישָאֵל, mishâ'el, perhaps = "who is equal to God"): (1) A Kohathite, 4th in descent from Levi (Ex 6 22). He and his brother Elzaphan carried out Moses' order to remove from the sanctuary and the camp the corpses of Nadab and Abihu (Lev 10 4 f).

(2) A supporter of Ezra at the reading of the Law (Neh 8 4).

(3) The Heb name of one of Daniel's 3 companions (Dnl 1 6 7 11.19; 2 17). His Bab name was Meshach (q.v.).

MISHAL, mɪs-hɛl, mɪs-hɛl (מִשָּל, mishâl): A town in the territory of Asher (Josh 19 26, AV "Mishael," Messia, Misaèl), assigned to the Gershonite Levites (Num 31 30; B, Baârârûm, Baârârûm, C, Misaèla, Misaèla = "Mishal") of 1 Ch 6 74).—Onam (q.v., "Ma-

MISHAM, mɪs-ham (מִשָּה, mishâ): A Benjamite, son of Elpaal (1 Ch 8 12).

MISHAL, mɪs-hɛ-sl. See Mishal.

MISHMA, mɪs-ma (מִשְׁמָה, mishma'): (1) A son of Ishmael (Gen 25 14; 1 Ch 1 30).

(2) A Simeonite (1 Ch 4 25).

MISHMANNAH, mɪs-ma-ɛnə (מִשְׁמַנָּה, mishmanâ): A Gadite warrior who joined David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 10).

MISHNA, mɪsh-nə. See Talmod.

MISHNEH, mɪsh-nɛ (מִשְׁנֵה, ha-mishneh; 2 K 22 14; 2 Ch 34 22, AV "college," RV "second quarter") m "Heb Mishneh"); Zeph 1 10, AV "the second," RV "second quarter," m "Heb Mishneh.") A part of Jesus, apparently not far from the First Gate (q.v.) and the Makkesh (q.v.). The tr "college" is due to Tg Jon on 2 K 22 14. The RV interpretation of Misheah is connected with the belief that Hezekiah, when he built "the other wall without" (1 Ch 22:5), made the second wall on the N. There seems little evidence of this (see Jer 31:11, 16), and the "second" may refer to the district of the city on the west hill or perhaps to the hill itself. See COLLEGE.

MISHOR, mi'shór. See PLAIN, and also in HDB, II, 309.

MISHRAITES, mish'-rā'tēs (מִשְׁרָאֵל, ha-mish-rā'ā): One of the families of Kiriath-jearim (1 Ch 2 53).

MISPAR, mis'pâr (מִסְפָּר, mispâr): An exile who returned with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2 2). AV spells the name "Mispar." In the | verse of Neh it appears as "Mispereth" (Neh 7 7).

MISPERETH, mis'pè-reth (מִסְפֶּר, mispereth). See MISPAR.

MISREPHOTH-MAIM, mis-ré-fōth-mā'îm (מִסְרֶפֶּת הַמָּיִם, misphōth mā'îm; LXX Μασερόν, Maserôn, Māṣerē Memphōth-maim): A place to which Joshua chased the various tribes which were confederated under Jabin, after their defeat at the waters of Merom (Josh 11 8). It follows the mention of great Sidon, as though it was a place in the same region but farther from the point of departure. In Josh 13 6, it is also mentioned in connection with the Sidonians, as though it was included in their territory, so it must have been in the coast district, or Phoenicia, which was in that period dominated by Sidon. The Canaanites who were among the tribes forming the hosts of Jabin would naturally seek refuge among the brethren in Sidon and its territory. They fled across the hill country which lies between the waters of Merom and the coast, but as Sidon is situated considerably to the N. of Merom, some would seek the coast by a more southerly route, and we may look for Misrephoth-maim there. Dr. Thomson (LB, II, 266-67, ed 1882) locates it at Ras el-Museiref, some 13 miles S. of Tyre, where there was a stronghold, and where the fugitives might find refuge (see LADDERS OF TYRE). Though the name is suggestive Misrephoth-maim, the identification may be accepted until some better one is found.

MIST (מָיס, 'adḥ; ἀήμασ, achłís, ἄφικαθ, homíchā): Mist is caused by particles of water vapor filling the air until it is only partially transparent. Mist and haze produce much the same effect, the one being due to moisture in the atmosphere and the other to dust particles. Mist or fog is not common on the plains of Pal and Syria at sea-level, but of almost daily occurrence in the mountain valleys, coming up at night and disappearing with the morning sun (Wisd 2 4). It is nothing else than a cloud touching the land. In the account of creation, "there went up a mist from the earth," giving a description of the warm humid atmosphere of the carboniferous ages which agrees remarkably with the teaching of modern science (Gen 2 6). The word is used fig. in Acts 13 11 to describe the shutting-out of light. Those who bring confusion and uncertainty are compared to "mists driven by a storm" (2 Pet 2 17). See VAPOR.

MISTRESS, mis'tres (מִיסְרֵס, bo'āḏāh, בּוּאַדָּה, g'bereth): Is the tr of bo'āḏāh, "lady," "owner" (1 K 17 17; Nah 3 4); in 1 S 28 7, "a woman that hath a familiar spirit" is lit. "the mistress of a familiar spirit"; of g'bereth (Gen 16 4-8.9; 2 K 5 3; Ps 125 2; Prov 30 23; Isa 24 2); in Isa 47 5,7, we have AV and ERV "lady," ARV "mistress."

MITE, mit (םיֵטָה, lepôtān): The smallest copper or bronze coin current among the Jews. They were first struck by the Maccean princes with Heb legends, and afterward by the Herods and the Roman procurators with Gr legends. The "widow's mite" mentioned in Mk 12 42 and Lk 21 2 was probably of the first kind, since those with Gr legends were regarded as unlawful in the temple service. According to Mk, the lepton was only half a kodrântâs (Lat quadrans), which would indicate a value of about one-fourth of a cent or half an Eng. farthing. See MONEY. H. Porter

MITHKAH, mith'ka (מִיתָּךְ, mithkāh, "sweetness"); AV Mitthiah): Name given owing to sweetness of pasture or water. A desert camp of the Israelites between Terah and Hashmonah (Nu 33 28). See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

MITHINITE, mith'ínīt (מִיתִינִיָּה, ha-mithinē): Designation of Jehoshaphat, one of David's officers (1 Ch 11 43).

MITHRADATES, mith-rá-dä'tēs (A, Mêrhoa-rēth, Mithreddates, B, Mêrho-rāth, Mithridates; AV Mithridates): (1) The treasurer of Cyrus to whom the king committed the vessels which had been taken from the temple and who delivered them to the governor, Sanballas (1 Esd 2 11 = "Mithredath" of Ezr 1 8).

(2) Apparently another person of the same name—one of the commissioners stationed in Samaria who wrote a letter to Artaxerxes persuading him to put a stop to the rebuilding of Jerus (1 Esd 2 16 = "Mithredath" of Ezr 4 7). See S. Angus

MITHREDATH, mith-rē-dâth (מִיתֶרְדָּתָה, mith-rē-dāth; Pers = "gift of Mithra" or "consecrated to Mithra"): (1) The Pers treasurer through whom Cyrus restored the sacred vessels to the returning Jewish exiles (Ezr 1 8).

(2) A Persian, perhaps an official, who was associated with Bishlam and Tabeel in corresponding with Artaxerxes concerning the restoration of Jerus (Ezr 4 7). In 1 Esd 2 11-16, the name is written Mithridates (q.v.).

MITRE, mi'tér: In AV this word renders two Heb words, both of which, however, come from the same stem, viz. מִשְׁרֵס, g'bereth, "to coil" or "to wrap round." In Ex 28, a mitre (RVM "turban") is enumerated among Aaron's articles of dress, which were to be made by tailors of recognized skill. On the forefront of the mitre was a "plate of pure gold" with the words "Holy to Jehovah" (i.e. consecrated to Jehovah) inscribed upon it. This gold plate was fastened to the mitre by a blue ribbon. The material of the mitre was fine linen or silk. The word for the headtire (AV "bonnet") of the ordinary priest was a different word. Ezekiel uses the word in connection with Zedekiah (21 26); the prophet associated regal and priestly functions with the throne. It is possible, however, that the two sentences—"remove the mitre," and "take off the crown"—refer to the degradation of the priesthood and of the throne which the downfall of Jerus will involve. The LXX varies between kidaris and mitra, the former word being used in Sir 45 12.

Mitylene, Moab, Moabites

MITYLENE, mit-i-lē'nyē, mit-i-lē'nyūs (Μίτυληνη, Mītūlēnē, or Μιτυλήνη, Mītulēnē, as usually on coins): In antiquity the most important city of the Asiatic Aeolians and of the island of Lesbos. It had 2 harbors and strong fortresses. The city was besieged by the Athenians and finally taken. The island and city of Mitylene were treated with great severity; the walls were dismantled, and the city was deprived of its power on the sea. In the time of Alexander the Great, Mitylene suffered most through the Persians, and later by the occupation of the Macedonians, but afterward regained its power and prosperity, and still later was favored by the Roman emperors, being made a free city by Pompey. In the Middle Ages, the name Mitylene was applied to the whole island. The present town, often called simply Choston, is a large castle built on the site of the ancient acropolis (in 1373). The city was conquered by the Turks in 1571. It contains 14 mosques, 7 churches, and has a population of about 15,000.

On his third missionary journey, Paul traveled to the Hellepont from Philippi, thence through the Troad by land to Assos on the southern side—where extensive excavations were carried on in 1881 by an American archaeological expedition—thence by ship to Mitylene (Acts 20 14), where he spent the night. Leaving Lesbos, he sailed southward to a point opposite the island of Chios (Acts 20 15). There is no record that a Christian church had been established in Mitylene at this time.

MIZAR, mīzār, THE HILL (מִזָּר, j̄, har mīz'ār; Ḍōs mika'-rōs, Ḍōs mīkārōs): The name of a mountain found only in Ps 42 6; “I remember thee from the land of Jordan, and the Hermons, from the hill Mizar.” The term may be taken as an appellative meaning “littleness,” and the phrase meḥār mīzār would then mean “from the little mountain,” i.e. the little mountain of Zion. Some scholars think that the Hermons in meḥār may have arisen from dittography, and that we should read, “from the land of Jordan, and the Hermons, O thou little mountain [of Zion].” G. A. Smith discusses the question in a note (HGLH, 477). He suggests that certain names found in the district (za’ārah, wádî za’ārah, and Khirbet Mazār) may be a reminiscence of the name of a hill in the district called Mi’zār; and surely none other would have been put by the Psalmist in apposition to the Hermons. Cheyne says: “To me this appendage to Hermon seems a poetic loss. Unless the little mountain has a symbolic meaning I could wish it away.” I cannot see this: the symbolic meanings suggested for Hermonim and Mi’zār are all forced, and even if we got a natural one, it would be out of place after the literal land of Jordan. To employ all as proper names is suitable to a lyric. No identification is at present possible. W. EWING MIZPAH, mīz'pāh, MIZPEH, mīz'pē: This name is pointed both ways in the Heb, and is found usually with the article. The meaning seems to be “outlook” or “watchtower.” It is natural, therefore, to look for the places so named in high positions, commanding wide prospects.

(1) (מִצְפָּה, ha-mīz̄pāh) [Gen 31 49; Jgs 11 11-34, מִצְפָּה, mīz̄pāh [Hos 5 1], מִצְפָּה, mīz̄pāh ghîlâd [Jgs 11 29]; Maṣōnâyâ, Masōsphâth, הַיּוֹ מִצְפָּה, ḥēn mīz̄pāh, and other forms]: It seems probable that the same place is intended in all these passages, and that it is identical with Ramath-mizpah of Josh 13 26. It is a place where Jacob and Laban parted in Mt. Gilad; consequently it lay to the N. of Mahanaim. Here was the home of Jephthah, to which he returned after the defeat of the Ammonites, only to realize how his rash vow had brought desolation to his house. It was taken by Judas Maccabaeus, who destroyed the inhabitants and burned the city (1 Macc 5 35). Identifications have been suggested with Ṣaf, Jerash, and Kal‘at er-Rabad; but these seem all to lie S. of any possible site for Mahanaim. A ruined site was discovered by Dr. Schumacher (M and NPVD, 1897, 86), with the name Maṣîlā, which is just the Arab. equivalent of the Heb Mîz̄pāh. It lies some distance to the N.W. of Jerash and claims consideration in any attempt to fix the site of Mizpah.

(2) (מִצְפָּה, mīz̄pāh; Maṣ̄āfâ, Maṣ̄afâh): A town in the Shephelah of Judah named with Dilan, Joktheel and Lachish (Tell el-Hesy). Onom mentions a Maṣâfâ in the neighborhood of Eleutheropolis, to the N. The identification proposed by Van de Velde and Guérin would suit this description. They would locate Mizpah at Tell es-Sâbïyeh, about 7½ miles N.W. of Bet Jîlîm, “a conspicuous hill with a glittering white cliff rising like an isolated block above the adjacent country” (PEFS, 1903, 276). Many identify this site with Gath, but the name and character of the place point rather to its identification with Mîzphâ, the “hillock of Gibeon” in the fanne Gauri or Alba Specula of the Middle Ages.

(3) (מִצְפָּה, mīz̄pāh; Maṣōnâyâ, Maṣōmâth, Maṣ̄âfâh): A town in the territory of Benjamin (Josh 18 26). Hither came the men of Israel to deal with the Benjamites after the outrage on the Levite’s concubine (Jgs 20 13; 21 1-5), at Mizpah, Samuel gathered his countrymen. While there crying to God in their distress, they were attacked by the Philis, whom they defeated with great slaughter (1 S 7 5, etc). Here also Saul, the son of Kish, was chosen king, after which Samuel told the people the “manner of the kingdom” (10 17, etc). Mizpah was fortified by Asa, king of Judah, with materials which Baasha, king of Israel, had used to fortify Ramah (1 K 15 22; 2 Ch 16 6). When Nebuchadnezzar captured Jerusalem and made Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, governor of the remnant of the people left in the land of Judah, the governor’s residence was fixed at Mizpah (2 K 25 23). Here he was joined by Jeremiah, whom Nebuzaradan, captain of the Bodyguard, had set free. At Mizpah, Jair, son of Nathaniel, treacherously slew Gedaliah and many who were with him. Two days later he murdered a company of pilgrims, throwing their dead bodies into the great cistern which Asa had made when strengthening the place against possible attack by Baasha of Samaria. He then made prisoners of the people, including the king's daughters, and attempted to convey them away to the Amorites, an attempt that was frustrated by Jehosh, son of Karoah (Jer 40, 41). Mizpah was the scene of memorable assembly in a day of sore anxiety for Judah, when Judas Maccabaeus called the warriors of Judah together for counsel and prayer (1 Macc 3 46). From this passage we also learn that the place was an ancient sanctuary—for in Mizpah there was a place of prayer aforesight for Israel.'

It has been proposed to identify Mizpah with Tell Nasbeh, a site on the watershed S. of Bireh. The Abbé Raboisson established the fact that Jerus can be seen from this point. In this respect it agrees with Maundeville's description. "It is a very fair and delicious place, and it is called Mt. Joy because it gives joy to pilgrims' hearts, for from that place men first see Jerusalem." But Jer 41 10 may be taken as decisive against this identification. Ishmael departed to go east. From Tell Nasbeh this would never have brought him to the great waters that are in Gibeon, el-Jeb (Gibeon) being only a mile and a quarter distant.

A town in Moab to which David took his parents for safety during Saul's pursuit of him (1 S 22 3). It is possibly to be identified with Kir-moab, the modern Kerak, whither David would naturally go to interview the king. But there is no certainty. Possibly we should read "Mizpah" instead of "the hold" in ver 5.

In 2 Ch 20 24, probably we should read "Mizpah" instead of "watch-tower": ha-mizpeh la-middibbər would then point to a Mizpah of the Wilderness to be sought in the district of Tekoa (ver 20).

MIZPAR, mis'pər. See MISPAR.

MIZRAIM, mis'ri-am (מִצְרָיִם), Mizrayim: (1) A son of Ham, and ancestor of various peoples, Ludim, Ananim, etc (Gen 10 6; 1 Ch 1 8). See Table of Table of Nations.

(2) The name of Egypt. See Egypt.

The land of Ham—בָּר, bər, was another name for the land of Egypt. It occurs only in Ps 105 22, 37; 106 22; Ps 78 51 probably refers to that Ham, though it may refer to the children of Ham. The origin and etymology of this name are involved in mystery. Two improbable etymologies and one probable etymology for Ham as a name of Egypt have been proposed, and the improbable ones very much urged: (1) Ham is often thought to be a Heb appropriation of the Egypt name "Hem," a name for the "black land" as distinguished from "dessert," the red land of the desert which surrounded it. This etymology is very attractive, but phonetically very improbable to say the least. (2) Ham has sometimes been connected directly with בָּר, bər, the second son of Noah whose descendants under the name Mieszram occupied a part of Northeastern Africa. But as there is no trace of this name among the Egyptians and no use of it in the historical books of the OT, this can hardly be said to be a probable derivation of the word. (3) There is a third proposed etymology for Ham which connects it ultimately but indirectly with Ham, the second son of Noah. Some of the earliest sculptures yet found in Egypt represent the god Min. (MoCar, of Tepies by Professor Petrie). This god seems to have been called Khem, a very exact Egypt equivalent for בָּר, bər, the second son of Noah and the ancestor of the Hamitic people of Egypt. That Ham the son of Noah should be depicted in the Egypt pantheon is not surprising. The seminadv of this god Min or Khem also accords well with the reputation for licentiousness borne by Ham the son of Noah. These facts suggest very strongly a trace in Egypt mythology of the actual style of the Hamitic people. (4) While the preceding division (3) probably states the real explanation of the early name of Egypt, it still remains to be noted that the use of the name Ham by the Psalmist may be entirely poetic. Until it be found that the name Khem was applied to Egypt, the other writers of that period it will ever be in some measure unlikely that the Psalmist was acquainted with the mythological use of the name Ham and so, in equal measure, probable that he meant nothing more than to speak of the land of the Ewings of Ham. See also Ham, Land of.

MIZZAH, mis'a (מִצְזָה), Mizzah, "strong," "firm":

Grandson of Easu, one of the "dukes" of Edom (Gen 36 15 17; 1 Ch 1 37).

MNASON, nā'sōn, m'nā'sōn (Μνάσων, Mnāsōn): All that we know of Mnason is found in Acts 21 16. (1) He accompanied Paul and his party from Caesarea on Paul's last visit to Jerusalem; he was a Cyprian; (2) "an early disciple," an early convert to Christianity, and (4) the one with whom Paul's company was to lodge. The "Western" text of this passage is very interesting. Blas, following D, Syr, reads, for "bringing," etc. (2) "bring us to those with whom one should lodge, and when we had come into a certain village we stayed with Mnason a Cyprian, an early disciple, and having departed thence we came to Jerus and the brethren," etc. (3) "and" Meyer-Wendt, Page and Rendell render the accepted text, "bringing us to the house of Mnason," etc. However, giving the imperf. trans. of anabainomen, "we were going up" to Jerus (ver 15), we might understand that the company lodged with Mnason on the 1st night of their journey to Jerus, and not at the city itself. "Ver 15, they set about the journey; ver 16, they lodged with Mnason on the introduction of the Caesareans disciples; ver 17, they came to Jerus ("Epres Gr Text", in loc.).

MOAB, mō'ab, MOABITES, mō'ab-its (Moab, מואב, mō'ab, Moabite Stone, 2 M; Gr [LXX] Moab, Μωάβ, Μωάβ, Moabīteēs, Μωάβιτες, Μωαβιτείς, Hebrew, -beitis, -beis, -beis; Moabite, מֹאָבִי, Moab, מֹאָב, Mōáb, Mōaib, Mōaib; Mo'avites, מֹאָבִים, Moabite, Moabites, מֹאָב, מֹאָב, מֹאָב; brānā mo'āḇāh): Moab was the district E. of the Dead Sea, extending from a point some distance N. of it to its southern end. The eastern boundary was indefinite, being the border of the desert which is irregular. The length of the
with a very precipitous frontage, but the elevation of this ridge above the interior is very slight. Deep chasms lead down from the tableland to the Dead Sea shore, the principal one being the gorge of the river Arnon, which is about 1,700 ft. deep and 2 or more miles in width at the level of the tableland, but very narrow at the bottom and with exceedingly precipitous banks. About 13 miles back from the mouth of the river the gorge divides, and farther back it subdivides, so that several valleys are formed of diminishing depth as they approach the desert border. These are referred to in Nu 21 14 as the "valleys of the Arnon." The "valley of Zered" (Nu 21 12), which was on the southern border, drops down to the southern end of the Dead Sea, and although not so long or deep as the Arnon, is of the same nature in its lower reaches, very difficult to cross, dividing into two branches, but at a point much nearer the sea. The stream is not so large as the Arnon, but is quite copious, even in summer. These gorges have such precipitous sides that it would be very difficult for an army to cross them, except in their upper courses near the desert where they become shallow. The Israelites passed them in that region, probably along the present Huj road and the line of the Mecca Railway. The tableland is fertile but lacks water. The fountains and streams in the valleys and on the slopes toward the Dead Sea are abundant, but the uplands are almost destitute of flowing water. The inhabitants supply themselves by means of cisterns, many of which are ancient, but many of those used in ancient times are ruined. The population must have been far greater formerly than now. The rainfall is usually sufficient to mature the crops, although the rain falls in winter only. The fertility of the country in ancient times is indicated by the numerous towns and villages known to have existed there, mentioned in Scripture and on the M S, the latter giving some not found elsewhere. The principal of these were: Ar (Nu 21 15); Ataroth, Dibon, Jazer, Nimrah, Nebo (32 3); Beth-peor (Dt 3 29);

The Moabites were of Sem stock and of kin to the Hebrews, as is indicated by their descent from Lot, the nephew of Abraham (Gen 19 30–37), and by their language which is practically the same as the Heb. This is clear from the inscription on the M S, a monument of Mesha, king of Moab, erected about 850 BC, and discovered among the ruins of Dibon in 1868. It contains 34 lines of about 9 words each, written in the old Phoen. and Heb. characters corresponding to the Siloam inscription and those found in Phoenicia, showing that it is a dialect of the Sem tongue prevailing in Pal. The original inhabitants of Moab were the Emim (Dt 2 10), "a people great ..., and tall, as the Anakim." When these were deposed by the Moabites we do not know. The latter are not mentioned in the Am. Tab. and do not appear on the Egyptian monuments before the 14th cent. BC, when they seem to be referred to under the name of Duten, or native Lotan, i.e. Lot (Paton, Syria and Pal); Moab appears in a list of names on a monument of Ramesses III of the XXth Dynasty. The country lay outside the line of march of the Egyptian armies, and this accounts for the silence of its monuments in regard to them.

The chief deity of Moab was Chemosh (חֵמוֹשׁ, Ḫmōš), frequently mentioned in the OT and on the M S, where King Mesha speaks of building a high place in his honor because he was saved by him (Nu 21 11). He represents the oppression of Moab by Omri as the result of the anger of Chemosh, and Mesha made war against Israel by command of Chemosh. He was the national god of Moab, as Molech was of Ammon, and it is pretty certain that he was propitiated by human sacrifices (2 K 3 27). But he was not the only god of Moab, as is clear from the account in Nu 25, where it is also clear that their idolatrous worship was corrupt. They had their Baalim like the nations around, as may be inferred from the place-names compounded with Baal, such as Bamoath-baal, Beth-baal-meon and Baal-peor.

We know scarcely anything of the history of the Moabites after the account of their origin in Gen 19 until the time of the exodus. It would seem, however, that they had suffered from the invasions of the Amorites, who, under their king Sihon, had subjugated the northern part of Moab as far as the Arnon (Nu 21 21–31). This conquest was a result of the movement of the Amorites southward, when they were pressed by the great wave of Hittite invasion that overran Northern Syria at the end of the 15th and the early part of the 14th centa. BC. The Amorites were forced to seek homes in Pal, and it would seem that a portion of them crossed the Jordan and occupied Northern Moab, and here the Israelites found them as they approached the Bedawin of Moab.

Promised Land. They did not at first disturb the Moabites in the S., but passed around on the eastern border (Dt. 2:8,9) and came into conflict with the Amorites in the N. (Deut. 21-26), defeating them and occupying the territory (vs 31-32). But when Balak, son of Zippor, king of Moab, saw what a powerful people was settling on his border, he made alliance with the Midianites against them and called in the aid of Balaam, but as he could not induce the latter to curse them he refrained from attacking the Israelites (Nu 22, 24). The latter, however, suffered disaster from the people of Moab through their intercourse with them (Nu 25).

Some time before the establishment of the kingdom in Israel the Midianites overran Moab, as would appear from the passage in Gen. 36:35, but the conquest was not permanent, for Moab recovered its lost territory and became strong enough to encroach upon Israel across the Jordan. Eglon of Moab oppressed Israel with the aid of Ammon and Amalek (Jgs 3:13-14), but Eglon was assassinated by Ehud, and the Moabite yoke was cast off after 18 years. Saul smote Moab, but did not subdue it (1 S 14:47), for we find David putting his father and mother under the protection of the king of Moab when persecuted by Saul (1 S 22:3.4). But this friendship between David and Moab did not continue. When David became king he made war upon Moab and completely subjugated it (2 S 8:2). On the division of the kingdom between Rehoboam and Jeroboam the latter probably obtained possession of Moab (1 K 12:20), but it revolted and Omri had to reconquer it (M S), and it was tributary to Ahab (2 K 1:1). It revolted again in the reign of Ahaziah (2 K 1:1; 3:5), and Moab and Ammon made war on Jehoshaphat and Mt. Seir and destroyed the latter, but they afterward fell out among themselves and destroyed each other (2 Ch 20). Jehoshaphat and Jehoram together made an expedition into Moab and defeated the Moabites with great slaughter (2 K 3). But Mesha, king of Moab, was not subdued (ver 27), and afterward completely freed his land from the dominion of Israel (M S).

This was probably at the time when Israel and Judah were at war with Hazael of Damascus (2 K 13:20). Bands of Moabites ventured to raid the land of Israel when weakened by the conflict with Hazael (2 K 13:20), but Moab was probably subdued again by Jeroboam II (2 K 14:25), which may be the disaster to Moab recounted in Isa 15. After Mesha we find a king of the name of Salamanu and another called Chemosh-nadab, the latter being subject to Sargon of Assyria. He revolted against Sennacherib, in alliance with other kings of Syria and Pal and Egypt, but was subdued by him, and another king, Mutsuri, was subject to Earsahaddon. These items come to us from the Assyrian monuments.

When Babylon took the place of Assyria in the suzerainty, Moab joined other tribes in urging Judah to revolt, but seems to have come to terms with Nebuchadnezzar before Judas was taken, as we hear nothing of any expedition of that king against her. On the war described in Jh, in which Moab (1:12, etc) plays a part, see JUDITH.

At a later date Moab was overrun by the Nabataean Arabs who ruled in Petra and extended their authority on the east side of Jordan even as far as Damascus (Jos, Ant, XIII, xv, 1,2). The Moabites lost their identity as a nation and were afterward confounded with the Arabs, as we see in the statement of Jos (XIII, xiii, 5), where he says that Alexander (Jannaeus) overcame the Arabsians, such as the Moabites and the Gileadites. Alexander built the famous stronghold of Machaerus in Moab, on a hill overlooking the Dead Sea, which afterward became the scene of the imprisonment and tragic death of John the Baptist (Jos, BJ, VII, vi, 2; Ant, XVIII, v, 2; Mk 6:21-28). It was afterward destroyed by the Romans.

Khir became a fortress of the Crusaders under the name of Krak (Kerak), which held out against the Moslems until the time of Saladin, who captured it in 1188 AD.

MOCHMUR, mok'mur, THE BROOK (אַרְתָּק מַחְמוּר, ha chełmarrhs Hosochmôd). The torrent bed in a valley on which stood Chusi, not far from Ekrebîl (Jth 7 18). The latter may be identified with "Aḅrahèb, E. of Nîbûs. Wady Makhfrîyék runs to the S. of Ṭârebèb, and probably represents the ancient Mochmur.

MOCK, mok, MOCKER, mok'ër, MOCKING, mok'ing (מַחְמָר, makhîmar, מַחְמָרָה, makhîmarâ, מַחְמָרָה מְאָדוֹסְיָה, makhîmarâ mədaôsīyâ), To mock is the "banter, "mock," "deride" (Jgs 16 10.13.15; K 18 27; Job 13 9 bis, RV "deceiveth," "deceive," m "mocketh," "mock"); of lā'āgh, "to stammer" or "hobble in maimery," "to mock" or "scorn" (2 Ch 26 18; 1 Kg 11 3; 21 3; Prov 1 26; 17 5; 30 17; Jer 20 7). Other words are cābâk, "to laugh," etc (Gen 19 14; 21 9; 39 14.17); kālās, "to call out," or "cry after," "to scoff" or "mock at" (2 K 23 22; Ezek 22 5); sēḇōh, "to laugh," "mock" (Job 39 22; Lam 1 7); lēc, "to scorn" (Prov 14 9; sēḇāk, "laughter," "derision" (Job 12 4);施肥, "to treat as a child," "mock" (Mt 2 16; 20 19; 27 29.31.41; Lk 14 29, etc); dā'âhîmâzîd, "to mock," "laug. etc (Acts 2 13; 17 32); mûkârîthâ, "to sneer at," "mock" lit. "to mock the nose" (Gen 6 7; "God is not mocked," "will not let himself be mocked"); [endnotes 19.20.32], "crying," "epipâlād, "laugh" (Job 2 8; 1 Mac 7 34; 2 Mac 7 39; 8 17).

Mocker, hâlôthîm, "deceivers," "mockers" (Job 17 23); lēc (Prov 20 1; Isa 29 22; AV); lēk, "stammering," "mocking" (Ps 35 16; Lk 21 28; sēḇōh (Jer 15 17);施肥, "a mocker," "scoffer," lit. "sporting as children" (Jude ver 18; 2 Pet 3 3).

Mocking is the tr of kālîghâd, "mocking," "derision" (xxxx 23 2); of施肥, "a mocker, "mockery"; 2 Mac 7 7, "mocking-stock," RV "the mocking"; ver MODAB, BOOK OF ELDAD AND. See ELDAD and MODAB, BOOK OF.

MODERATELY, modér-at-li (Gä, ríd-dhahákh): "Moderately" is the AV tr of ríd-dhákh, "righteousness" (Job 25 3), "for he hath given you the former rain moderately," m "according to righteousness," RV "in just measure," m "in [or for] righteousness"). In Phil 4 5 AV, the pseiekt is tr 4e moderation: "Let your moderation be known unto all men. The Lord is at hand," RV "forbearance," "for gentleness," of 2 Cor 10 1. The proper meaning of this word has been the subject of considerable discussion; pseiekt is tr 4e "elemency (Acts 24 4), "gentleness" (of Christ) (2 Cor 10 1); pseiekt is "gentle" (1 Tim 3 3; Tit 3 2; 2 Tim 2 18). Trench says (Synonyma of the NT, 151): "It expresses exactly that moderation which recognizes the impossibility cleaving to formal law, of anticipating and providing for all cases that will emerge and present themselves to it for decision: which, with this, recognizes the decision even without the assertion of legal right, lest they should be pushed into moral wrongs, lest the 'summa jus' should in practice prove the 'summa sunturta,' which therefore pushes not its own rights to the uttermost, but going back in part or in the whole from these theories and ideas the highest of justice. It is thus more truly just than strict justice would have; no Latin word exactly and adequately renders it; elementa seta forth one side of it, accepot another; and perhaps modestia (by which the Vulg ert to its) 2 Cor 10 1) a third; but the word is wanting which should set forth all these excellence reconciles is a single and higher one." Its archetype and pattern, he points out, is found in God, who does not stand upon or assert strict rights in His relations to men.

Lightfoot has "forbearance": "Let your gentle and forbearing spirit be recognized by all men. The judgment is drawing nigh." Hastings prefers "considerateness" or "sweet reasonableness" (HDB, 111, 423) and "forbearance" are two passages which are saying the 'considerateness' of the Bible, whether applied to God or man, is an active virtue. It is the Spirit of the Messiah Himself, who will not break the bruised reed nor quench the smoking flax, and it is the follower who realizes that the Lord is at hand." The want of this "considerateness" too often mars our religious life and spoils its influence.

MODERATION, modér-á-shún (Gá, TR, pseiektód): The word occurs once in AV, Phil 4 5.

MODIN, mód-in (Modán, Moldein, Mado, Mod, Madin, Madsim, and other forms; in the Talm it is called 2נש, madinnim, and 2מג, modinnish [Neubauer, Geographie du Talm, 99]): This place owes its interest to the part it played in the history of the Maccabees. It was the ancestral home of their family (1 Macc 2 17, 70). Hither Mattathias, a priest of the sons of Iarib, retired when he was with a burning heart "the blasphemies that were committed in Judah and in Jerusalem" under the orders of Antiochus Epiphanes. But the king's officer followed him, and by offers of the king's friendship and great rewards sought to secure his conversion. Instead of the indignation of Mattathias, and when a Jew went forward to sacrifice, Mattathias slew him on the altar together with the king's officer. Thus began the patriotic uprising which led to the downfall of the priest's heroic sons, was destined to make illustrious the closing days of the nation's life (1 Macc 2 1 ff; Ant, VI, i, 2; BJ, i, i, 3). Mattathias, his wife and sons were all buried in Modin (1 Macc 2 70; 9 19; 13 25–30). Near Modin Judas pitched his camp, whence issuing by night with the watchword "Victory is God," he and a chosen band of warriors overthrew the army of Antiochus Epiphanes (2 Macc 13 14). In Modin Judas and John, the sons of Simon, slept before the battle in which they defeated Cendebeacus (1 Macc 16 4).

Of the impressive monument erected by Simon over the tombs of his parents and brethren Stanley (Hist of the Jewish Church, 319) gives the following account. It was a square structure surrounded by colonnades of monolithic pillars, of which the front and back were of white polished stone. Seven pyramids were erected by Simon on the summit, for the father and mother and four brothers who now lay there, with the seventh for himself when his time should come. On the faces of the monuments were bas-reliefs, representing the achievements of avarice and sparsity. The latter memorial of their many battles. There were also sculptures of ships—no doubt to indicate that long seashore of the Philist, which they were the first to use for their country's good. A monument at once so Jewish in idea and so powerful to the worthy of the combination of patriotic fervor and high philosophic enlargement of soul, that "scorns" the few heroes so high above their age." Guérin (La Samarre, 11, 401; Galilée, 1, 47) thought he had discovered the remains of this monument at Khirbet el-Gharbûwi near Medîyeh, in 1870. In this, however, he was mistaken, the remains being of Christian origin.

Various identifications have been proposed. Sóba, about 6 miles W. of Jerus, was for a time generally accepted. Robinson (Bible Dictionary, s.v. Lâḏrân) gives this as the identification. There is now a consensus of opinion in favor of el-Medîyeh, a village to the E of Wâdy Muâlik, 13 miles W. of Bethel. It occupies a strong position in the hills 6 miles E of Lydda, thus meeting the condition of Onom which places it near Lydda. The identification was suggested by Dr. Sandrecezi of Jerus in 1869. From el-Medîyeh itself the sea is not visible; but to the S rises a rocky height, er-Râs, which commands a wide view, including the plain and the sea; the distance is 16 miles distant. If the monument of Simon stood on er-Râs, which from the rock cuttings seems not improbable, it would be seen very clearly by overlooking the sea, esp. toward sunset (1 Macc 3 28). About 2 mile W. of el-Medîyeh, known as Kubûr el-Yehâdû, one bearing the name of Shekh el-Gharbûwi, whose name attaches to the ruins. This is the tomb referred to above.

MOETH, mō’eth (Mādāh, Mādāh): Called "son of Sabanus," one of the Levites to whom, with the priest Meremoth, the silver and gold brought by Ezra from Babylon were committed (1 Esd 8 63) as "Noadah" of Ezra 8 33, but there styled "son of Binnulli."

MOLADAH, mol’a-da, mō-lādāh (airie, mō-lādāh; Moladāh, Moladah): A place in the far south (Negeb) of Judah, toward Edom (Josh 15 26), reckoned to Simon (19 2; 1 Ch 4 28). It was repopulated after the captivity ( Neh 11 26). It is generally considered one of the Jorbas of Jos, Ant, XVIII, vi, 2. The site of this latter city has by Robinson and others been identified with the ruins of Tell el-Muâd, some 13 miles to the E of Beersheba and some 7 miles S.W. of Arad. The chief difficulty is the statement of Eusebius and Jerome that Malathia was "by Jattir," i.e. 'Attir; if this is correct the Tell el-Milh is impossible, as it is 10 miles from "Attir, and we have no light at all on the site. See SALT. CITY OF. For Tell el-Milh see PEF, III, 415-16, 3h XXV.

MOLE, mōl (Gr. μύλος, tinemathem, AV "mole," RV "chameleon"; LXX ἀσπάλαξ, ἀσπαλάξ=sπαλάς, spalax, "mole," Vulg talpa, "mole" [Lev 11 30]; [2] ὑβγη, heldeth, EV "weasel"; LXX γαλάς, gālā, "weasel" or "pole-cat"; cf. Arab. ἀγάλ, ἀγαλ, "herbivorous creature." E. LXX ἄσπαλάξ, ἀσπαλάξ, "mole." [3] ἕβαρτορ, ἕβαρτορ, "to dig"; cf. Arab. ẖaf, ḥafar, "to dig," and מָעָה, "mole" or "rat," for מָעָה, מָעָה, from מָעָה, מָעָה, or מָעָה, מָעָה, מָעָה, מָעָה, מָעָה, מָעָה, "to dig." LXX τῶν μακριάς, τῶν μακριάς, "vain, idle, or profane persons" [Isa 20]; (1) Tinemathem is the last of 8 unclean "creeping things" in Lev 11 29-30. The word occurs also in Lev in 18 and Dt 14 16, trv AV "swan," RV "horned owl," viz. "harpCGRects," harpĥerōth, "coot" or "heron." See CHAMELEON. (2) Ὑβγη is the first in the same list. The word occurs nowhere else, and is trv "weasel" in EV, but in comparison with the Arab. ῥαλ, ῥαλ, has led to the suggestion that "mole- rat" would be a better tr. See WAERUS. (3) In Isa 2 20, "In that day shall men cast away their idols . . . to the mole and to the bats," ἕβαρτορ, ἕβαρτορ, variously written as one word or two, is trv "mole" in EV, but has given rise to much conjecture.

The European "mole" Telpa europaea, is extensively distributed in the temperate parts of Europe and Asia, but is absent from Syria and Fal, its place being taken by the mole-rat, Spalax typhlus. The true mole belongs to the Insectivora, and feeds on earth-worms and insect larvae, but in making its tunnels and nests, it incidentally injures gardens and lawns. The mole-rat belongs to the Rodentia, and has teeth of the same general type as those of a rat or squirrel, large, chief-shaped miisors behind which is a large vacant space, no canines, and praemolars and molars with three or four points of contact instead of two, the last root being much larger than the mole, but of the same color, and, like the mole, is blind. It makes tunnels much like those of the mole. It is herbivorous, and has been observed to seize growing plants and draw them down into its hole. In one of its burrows a central chamber has been found filled with entire plants of the hummus or chick-pea, and two side chambers containing pods plucked from the plants in the central chamber. While the mole-rat digs with its powerful and peculiarly shaped front feet, the mole-rat digs with its nose, its feet being normal in shape. See LEZARD.

ALFRED ELY DAY

MOLECH, mōlek, MOLOC, mōlek (נולאיך, ho-molekh, always with the art., except in 1 K 11 7; LXX ὁ Μόλοχ, ὁ Μολόχ, sometimes also Μολοχοῖς, Μολοχῶν, Molochōn, Molochál, Molochl, Vulg Moloch): 30 31; cf Jer 49 1.3; Zeph 1 5, where RV reads "their king"). The use of אֱלֹהִים, אֱלֹהִים, and אֱלֹהִים, אֱלֹהִים, as a tr of the name by the LXX suggests that it may have been originally the name for "king, melek." Molech is obtained from melek by the substitution of the vowel points of Heb bōsheth, signifying "shame." The name was popular, but less frequent, than Molech in the Bible. Am 5 26, RV has removed "your Moloch" and given "your king," but LXX had here trd ("Moloch," and from the LXX it found its way into the Acts (7 43), the only occurrence of the name in the NT.

In the Levitical ordinances delivered to the Israelites by Moses there are stern prohibitions against Moloch-worship (Lev 18 20; 20 2-5). Parallel to these prohibitions, although the Worship in name of the god is not mentioned, OT History are those of the Deuteronomic Code where the abominations of the Canaanites are forbidden, and the burning of their sons and daughters in the fire (to Moloch) is condemned as the climax of their wickedness (Dt 12 31; 18 10-13).

The references to Malcam, and to David's building a temple to Malcam with Ammon, are not supported by the brick kiln (2 S 12 30.31), and are not sufficiently clear to found upon, because of the uncertainty of the readings. Solomon, under the influence of his idolatrous wives, built high places for Chemosh, the abomination of Moab, and for Molech, the abomination of the children of Ammon. See CHEMOSH. Because of this apostasy it was intimated by the prophet Ahijah, that the kingdom would be rent out of the hand of Solomon, and ten tribes given to Jeroboam (1 K 12 1-3). The high places survived to the time of Josiah, who, among his other works of religious reformation, destroyed and defiled them, filling their places with the bones of men (2 K 23 12-14). Molech-worship has evidently received a great impulse from Ahaz, who, like Ahab of Israel, was a supporter of foreign religions (2 K 16 12 ff). He also "made his son pass through the fire, according to the abominations of the nations, whom Jehezekiah had destroyed and defiled them, filling their places with the bones of men (2 K 23 12-14). His grandson Manasseh, so far from following in the footsteps of his father Hezekiah, who had made great reforms in the worship, reared altars for Baal, and besides other abominations which he practised, made his son to pass through the fire. The chief site of this worship, of which Ahaz and Manasseh were the promoters, was Topeth in the Valley of Hinnom, or, as it is also called, the Valley of the Children, or of the Son of Hinnom, lying to the S.W. of Jerusalem (see GIDEON). Topeth is said that "he defiled Topeth... that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech." (2 K 23 10).

Even Josiah's thorough reformation failed to extirpate the Molech-worship, and it revived and continued till the destruction of Jerusalem.

3. The Worship. As we learn from the prophets of the Worship time. From the beginning, the prophets maintained against it a loud and persistent protest. The testimony of Amos (1 5; 5 26) is ambiguous, but most of the ancient VSS for malkān, "their king," in the former passage, read milkām, the national god of Ammon (see Davidson). Isaiah was acquainted with Topeth and its abominations (Isa 30 23; 37 5). Over against his beautiful and lofty description of spiritual religion, Micah sets the exaggerated zeal of those who ask in the spirit of the Molech-worshipper: "Shall I give my first-born for my transgression, the fruit of my body for the sin of my soul?" (Mic 6 6). That Molech-worship had increased in the interval may account for the frequency and the clearness of the references to it in the later Prophets. In Jer we find the popular cult of daughters through the fire prevailing (11:2 9). Molech associated with the building of "the high places of Baal, which are in the Valley of the Son of Hinnom" (32:30; 21:3); 19:5). In his oracle against the children of Ammon, the same prophet, denouncing evil against their land, predicts (almost in the very words of Amos above) that Molech shall go into captivity, his priests and his princes together (49:13). Ezekiel, speaking to the exiles in Babylon, refers to the practice of burning children through the fire to heathen divinities as long established, and he proclaims the wrath of God against it (Ezk 16:20; 20:26.31; 23:37). That this prophet regarded the practice as among the 'statutes that were not good, and ordinances wherein they should not live' (20:23) given by God to His people, by way of deception and judicial punishment, as some hold, is highly improbable and inconsistent with the whole prophetic attitude toward it. Zephaniah, who prophesied to the men who saw the overthrow of the kingdom of Judah, denounced upon the worshippers of false gods (Zeph 1:5). He does not directly charge his countrymen with having forsaken Jeh for Molech, but blames them, because worshipping Him they also swear to Molech, the idol of the Assyr ejected who feared Jeh and served their own gods, or like those of whom Ezekiel elsewhere speaks who, the same day on which they had slain their children to their idols, entered the sanctuary of Jeh to profane it (Ezk 23:39). The captivity of Babylon put an end to Molech-worship, since it weakened the people from all their idolatries. We do not hear of it in the post-exile Prophets, and, in the great historical poem of Isaiah's rebelliousness and God's deliverances (Ps 106), it is only referred to in retrospect (vs 37-38).

When we come to consider the nature of this worship it is remarkable how few details are given regarding it in Scripture. The place where it was practised from the days of Judah to the end of the monarchy is not clearly assigned. Such an altar-pyre for the burning of the sacrificial victims. There is no evidence connecting the worship with the temple in Jerusalem. Ezekiel's view seems to be that the temple is purely a place of sacrifice. The temple was, indeed, the temple is put forth by God as an ideal (Ezk 8). A priesthood is spoken of as attached to the services (Jer 49:3; of Zeph 1:4-5). The victims offered to the divinity were not burnt alive, but were killed as sacrifices, and then presented as burnt offerings. "To pass through the fire" has been taken to mean a justification or purification of the child by fire, not involving death. But the prophets clearly speak of slaughter and sacrifice, and of high places built to burn the children in the fire as burnt offerings (Jer 19:5; Ezek 16:20.21).

The popular conception, moulded for Eng. readers largely by Milton's "Moloch, horrid king" as described in Paradise Lost, Book I, is derived from the accounts given in late LXX and Or, writers, esp. the account which Diodorus Siculus gives in his History of the Carthaginian Krones or Moloch. The image of Moloch was a human figure with a bull's head or, with outstretched arms, ready to receive the children destined for sacrifice. The image of metal was heated red hot by a fire kindled within, and the children by the hot image were rolled off into the fire. In order to drown the cries of the victims, flutes were played, and everyone was heated; and mothers stood by without tears or sobs, to give the impression of the voluntary character of the offering (see Rawlinson's Phoenicia, 113 f. for fuller details).

On the question of the origin of this worship there is great variety of views. Of a non-Semitic origin there is no evidence; and there is no trace of human sacrifices in the old Bab religion. That it prevailed widely among Sem peoples is clear. While Milkom or Molech is peculiarly the national god of the Ammonites, as is Chemosh of the Moabites, the name Moloch or and Extent Molech was recognized among the Phoenicians, the Philis, the Aramaeans, and other Sem peoples, as a name for the divinity they worshipped as a very early time. That it was common among the Canaanites when the Israelites entered the land is evident from the fact that it was among the abominations from which they were to keep themselves free. That it was identical at first with the worship of Jehovah, and the prophets and the best men of the nation ever regarded it as the national worship of Israel, is a modern theory which does not appear to the present writer to have been substantiated. It has been inferred from Abraham's readiness to offer up Isaac at the command of God, from the story of Jephthah and his daughter, and even from the sacrifice of Hiel the Bethelite (1 K 16:34), that human sacrifice to Jeh was an original custom in Israel, and that therefore the God of Israel was no other than Molech, or at all events a deity of similar character. But these incidents are surely too slender a foundation to support such a theory. "The fundamental idea of the heathen rite was the same as that which lay at the foundation of Beit to God's people. "The writer, while presenting to us this story of the offering of Isaac, and by presenting it in this precise form, the writer simply teaches the truth, taught by all the prophets, that to obey is better than sacrifice—in other words that the God worshipped in Abraham's time was a God who did not delight in destroying life, but in saving and sanctifying it" (Robertson, Early Religion of Israel, 254). While there is no ground for identifying Jeh with Moloch, there are good grounds for seeing a community of origin between Moloch and Baal. The name, the worship, and the general characteristics are so similar that it is natural to assign them a common place of origin in Phoenicia. The fact that Moloch-worship reached the climax of its abominable cruelty in the Phoen colonies of which Carthage was the center shows that it had found among that people a soil suited to its peculiar genius.

8. MOLID, mōlid (מוֹליד, mollid): A Judahite (1 Ch 2:29).

9. MOLLIFY, mōl'ft (מִולָב, mōlabhkah, "to be soft"): "To make soft," used in modern Eng. only figuratively, as "His anger was mollified." EV, however, uses the word lit. in its two occurrences: Isa 1:6, "wounds, and bruises: . . . neither bound up, neither mollified with oil"; Wisd 18:12, "mollifying plaster." Neither occurrence of the word is changed by RV.

MONEY, mun'i: Various terms are used for money in the Bible, but the most common are the Heb 003, keçeiph, and Gr áργυριον, áργαρίων, both meaning silver. We find also 002, keçeiph, éstíath, rendered by LXX “lamb,” probably referring to money in a particular form; χαλκός, chalkos, is used for money in Mt 20 10; Mk 6 8; 12 41. It was also a name of a small coin of Agrippa II (Madden, Coins of the Jews); χρυσά, chrusa, “price,” is rendered money in Acts 4 37; 8 18 20; 24 26; κέρμα, kérma, “piece,” i.e. piece of money (Jn 2 15; 5 16); ἄργαρίων, “tribute money” (Mt 17 24 AV, RV “half-shekel”); κόνως, kónos, “censor,” “tribute money” (Mt 21 19).

Gold and silver were the common medium of exchange in Syriac and Pal in the early times of which we have any historical record. The period of mere barter had passed. The connection of the country with the two great civilized centers of antiquity, Egypt and Babylon, had led to the introduction of a currency for the purposes of trade. We have abundant evidence of the use of these metals in the Bib. records, and we know from the monuments that they were used as money before the time of Abraham. The patriarch came back from his visit to Egypt “rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold” (Gen 13 2). There was no system of coinage, but they had these metals cast in a convenient form for use in exchange, such as bars or rings, the latter being a common form and often represented or mentioned on the monuments of Egypt. In Babylonia the more common form seems to have been the former, such as the bar, or wedge, that Achan found in the sack of Jericho (Josh 7 21). This might indicate that the pieces were too large for ordinary use, but we have indications of the use of small portions also (2 K 12 9; Job 42 11). But the pieces were not so accurately divided as to pass for money without weighing, as we see in the case of the transaction between Abraham and the children of Heth for the purchase of the field of Machpelah (Gen 23). This transaction indicates also the common use of silver as currency, for it was “current money with the merchant,” and earlier than this we have mention of the use of silver by Abraham as money: “In that is thy house and he that is bought with thy money” (Gen 17 13).

Jewels of silver and gold were probably made to conform to the shekel weight, so that they might be used for money in case of necessity. Thus Abraham’s servant gave 420 talents of gold for half a shekel weight and bracelets of ten shekels weight (Gen 24 22). The bundles of money carried by the sons of Jacob to Egypt for the purchase of corn (Gen 42 35) were probably silver rings tied together in bundles. The Heb for “silver” (kikkor) signifies something round or circular, suggesting a ring of this weight to be used as money. The ordinary term for money was keçeiph, “silver,” and this word preceded by a numeral always refers to money, either with or without “shekel,” which we are probably to supply when it is not mentioned after the numeral, at least wherever value is involved, as the shekel (shekel) was the standard of value as well as of weight (see WEIGHTS AND MEASURES). Thus the value of the field of Ephron was in shekels, as was also the estimation of offerings (Lev 5 15; 27, passion). Solomon purchased chariots at 600 (shekels) each and horses at 150 (1 K 10 29). Large sums were expressed in talents, which were a multiple of the shekel. Thus Menahem gave Pul 1,000 talents of silver (2 K 15 19), which was made up by the exaction of 50 shekels from each rich man. Hezekiah paid the war indemnity to Sennacherib with 300 talents of silver and 30 of gold (2 K 18 14). The Assyr account gives 800 talents of silver, and the discrepancy may not be an error in the Heb text, as some would explain it, but probably a different kind of talent (see Marden, Coins of the Jews, 4). Solomon’s revenue is stated in talents (1 K 10 14), and the amount (666 of gold) indicates that money was abundant, for this is more than what he obtained from the vassal states and by trade. His partnership with the Phoenicians in commerce brought him large amounts of the precious metals, so that silver was said to have been plentiful in Jerusalem as soon as 1 K 10 17.

Besides the forms of rings and bars, in which the precious metals were cast for commercial use, some other forms were perhaps current. Thus the term 8stah is the long-used word for money, and the LXX tr has “lamb.” It is not expressed in what he obtained from the vassal states and by trade. His partnership with the Phoenicians in commerce brought him large amounts of the precious metals, so that silver was said to have been plentiful in Jerusalem as soon as 1 K 10 17.

Another word joined with silver in monetary use is 6ághóðq (γεωργή), the term being “a piece of silver” in 1 S 2 36. "Ághorath is cognate with the Arab. áfrat, which means "to divide exactly" or "justly," and the noun áfrat means "a portion" or "a measure."

Another word used in a similar way is rác, from rác, “to break in pieces,” hence rác is "a piece" or "fragment of silver" used as money. These terms were in use before the introduction of coined money and continued after coins became common. After the exile we begin to find references to coined money. It was invented in Lydia or perhaps in Aegina. Herodotus assigns the invention to the Lydians (1.94).

Money The earliest Lydian coins were struck by Gyges in the 7th cent. BC. These coins were of electrum and elliptical in form, smooth on the reverse but deeply stamped with incuse impressions on the obverse. They were called staters, but were of two standards; one for coined in the Babylonia and Egypt, the other about 164.4 grains, and the other of 224 grains (see Marden, op. cit.). Later, gold was coined, and, by the time of Croesus, gold and silver. The Persians adopted the Lydian type, and coined both gold and silver daries, the name being derived from Darius Hystaspis (521-485 BC) who is reputed to have introduced the system into his empire. But the stater of Lydia was current there under Cyrus (Madden, op. cit.), and it was perhaps with these that the Jews first became acquainted in Babylon. Ezra states (2 69) that "they [the Jews] gave after their ability into the treasury of the work three-score and one thousand darics [RV] of gold, and five thousand pounds of silver." The term here rendered "daric" is δαρίων, and this word is used in three passages in Neh (7 70–72), and τάξαρκον in 1 Ch 29 7 and Ezr 8 27. Both are of the same origin as the Gr drachma, probably, though some derive both from Darius (a Phoen inscription from the Piraicus tells us that δαρίων corresponds to drachma). At all events they refer to the gold coins which we know as darics. The weight of the daric was 130 grains, though double darics were struck.

Besides the gold daric there was a silver coin circulating in Persia that must have been known to the Jews. This was the σίγλος (σίγλοι), supposed to be referred to in Neh 5 15, where it is τρεῖ (“shekel.” These were the so-called silver darics, of which were equivalent to the gold daric. Besides these Persian coins the Jews must have used others derived from their intercourse with the Phoen cities, which were allowed to strike coins under the suzerainty of the Persians. These coins were of both silver and bronze, the suzerain not permitting them to coin gold. We have abundant examples of these coins and trade must have made them familiar to the Jews.

The issues of Aradus, Sidon and Tyre were esp. noteworthy, and were of various types and sizes suited to the commercial transactions of the Phoenicians. The Tyran traders were established in Jerus as early as the time of Nehemiah (13 16), and their coins date back to that period. Among the finest specimens we have of early coinage are the tetradrachms of Tyre, and the double shekels or stater of Sidon. The latter represent the Pers king, as he rides in his chariot, driven by his charioteer and followed by an attendant. On the reverse is a Phoen galley. The weight of these coins is from 380 to 430 grains, and they are assigned to the 4th and 5th cents. BC. From Tyre we have a tetradrachm which corresponds to the shekel of the Phoen standard of about 220 grains, which represents, on the obverse, the god Melkarth, the Tyrian Hercules, riding on a sea-horse, and, beneath, a dolphin. The reverse bears an owl with the Egyp crook and a flail, symbols of Osiris. The early coins of Aradus bear, on the obverse, the head of Baal or Dagon, and on the reverse a galley, above which is the legend ΜΕΛΕΚ ΑΡΑΔΟΤΩΝ, or ΜΕΛΕΓΟΝ ΑΡΑΔΟΤΩΝ, i.e. "king of Aradus." When Alexander overthrew the Pers empire in 331 BC, a new coinage, on the Attic standard, was introduced, and the silver drachms and tetradrachms struck by him circulated in large numbers, as is attested by the large number of examples still in existence. After his death, these coins, the tetradrachms esp., continued to be struck in the provinces, with his name and type, in his honor. We have examples of these struck at Aradus, Tyre, Sidon, Damascus and Acre, bearing the mint marks of these towns. They bear on the obverse the head of Alexander as Hercules, and, on the reverse, Zeus seated on his throne holding an eagle in the extended right hand and a scepter in the left. The legend is ΒΑΣΙΛΕΩΣ ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΥ, or ΑΛΕΞΑΝΔΡΟΥ, only, with various symbols of the towns or districts where they were struck, together with mint marks.

The successors of Alexander established kingdoms with a coinage of their own, such as the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucids in Syria, and these coins, as well as those of Alexander, circulated among the Jews. The Ptolemies of Egypt controlled Pal for about a century after Alexander, and struck coins, not only in Egypt, but in some of the Phoen towns, esp. at Acre, which was, from that time, known as Ptolemais. Their coins were based upon the Phoen standard. But the Seleucid kings of Syria had the most influence in Phoenicia and Pal, and their monetary issues are very various and widely distributed, bearing the names and types of the kings, and the symbols and mint marks of the different towns where they were struck, and are on the Alexandrine or Attic standard in contrast to those of the Ptolemies. They are both silver and bronze, gold being struck in the capital, Antioch, usually. The coins of Antiochus IV, Epiphanes, are esp. interesting on account of his connection with Jewish affairs. It was he who made the futile attempt to hellenize the Jews, which led to the revolt that resulted, under his successors, in the independence of the country of Syrian control, and the institution of a native coinage in the time of the Maccabees.

The struggle caused by the persecution of Antiochus commenced in 165 BC and continued more than 20 years. Judas, the son of Mattathias, defeated Antiochus, who died in 164, but the war was continued by his successors until dynastic dissensions among them led to treaties with the Jews to gain their support. At last Simon, who espoused the cause of Demetrius II, obtained from him, as a reward, the right to rule Judaea under the title of high priest, with practical independence, 142–143 BC. In 141, Simon VII, his successor, confirmed Simon in his position and added some privileges, and among them the right to coin money (138-139 BC). Both silver and bronze coins exist and are preserved, but some numismatists have recently doubted this, and have assigned them to another Simon in the time of the first revolt of the Jews under the Romans. The coins in question are the shekels and half-shekels with the legend in Heb., shekel yirēdî'el and yrēshālem kdrōshōkhaḥ ("Jerusalem the holy"), bearing dates ranging from the 1st to the 5th year, as well as bronze pieces of the 4th (see illustrations).

The reason for denying the ascription of these coins to Simon the Maccabee is the difficulty in finding room for the years indicated in his reign which closed in 135 BC. He received the commission to coin in 139-138, which would allow only 4 years for his coinage, whereas we have coins of the 5th year. Moreover, no shekels and half-shekels of any of the Maccabees later than Simon have come to light, which is, at least, singular since we should have supposed that all would have been coined then as long as the remained independent, even if they coined in bronze, examples of the latter being quite abundant. The fact also that they bore the title of king, while Simon was high priest only, would seem to have furnished an additional reason for claiming the prerogative of coinage in silver as well as bronze. But this argument is negative only, and such coins may have existed but have not come to light, and there are reasons which seem to the present writer sufficient to assign them to Simon the Maccabee. In the first place, the chronological difficulty is removed if we consider that Simon was practically independent for three or four years before he obtained the explicit commission to coin money. We learn from Jos (1:31, Lev. vi, 7) and from 1 Mac (13:41-42) that in the 170th year of the Seleucid era, that is, 143-142 BC, the Jews began to use the era of Simon in their contracts and public records. Now it would not have been strange if Simon, seeing the anarchy that prevailed in the kingdom of Syria, should have assumed some prerogatives of an independent ruler before they were distinctly granted to him, and among them that of coinage money. If he had commenced in the latter part of 139 BC, he would have been able to strike coins of the 5th year before he died, and this would satisfy the conditions (see Madden’s Jewish Coinage). There is a difficulty quite as great in attributing these coins to Simon of the first revolt under the Romans. That broke out in 66 AD, and was suppressed by the taking of Jerusalem in 70. This would allow a date of the 5th year, but it is hardly supposable that in the terrible distress and anarchy that prevailed in the city during that last year any silver coins would have been struck. There is another fact bearing upon this question which is worthy of notice. The coins of the first revolt bear personal appellations, such as “Eleazar the priest,” and “Simon,” while those assigned to Simon the Maccabee bear no personal designation whatever. This is significant, for it is not likely that Eleazar and Simon would have commenced coining silver shekels and half-shekels with their names inscribed upon them in the 1st year of their reign and then have omitted them on later issues. Another point which has some force is: We find mention, in the NT, of money-changers in connection with the temple, whose business it was to change the current coin, which was Rom or Gr, and bore heathen type and legends, for Jewish coins, which the strict Pharisaic rules then in force required from worshippers paying money into the temple treasury. It is inferred that they could furnish the shekels and half-shekels required for the yearly dues from every adult male (cf. Mt 17:24–27). Now the only shekels and half-shekels bearing Jewish emblems and legends, that at that time, must have been issued by the Maccabean princes, that is, such as we have under discussion. In view of these facts the Maccabean origin of these pieces seems probable.

The shekels under discussion have on one side a cup, or chalice (supposed to represent the pot of manna), with the legend in Heb around the margin, רְנָת הָעַלְפָּם, shekel giyrādî’el, with a letter above the cup indicating the year of the reign. The reverse bears the sprig of a plant (conjectured to be Aaron’s rod) having three buds or fruits, and on the margin the legend, והָעַלְפָּמ הָאָרֶהָה יִשָּׁמֵל, yrēshālem ha-arē’ah, "Jerusalem the holy." The half-shekel has the same type, but the reverse bears the legend, הָעַלְפֶּפָה, בֹּדָד shekel (half-shekel). The letters indicating the year have a ש (shnath, ‘year’) prefix, except for the first. This also omits the מ from kdrōshōhah and the second מ from yrēshālem. The term ‘holy’ for Jerusalem is found in Isa 48:2 and other passages of the 61, and is still preserved in the Arab. ḫudus by which the city is known today in Syria.

Copper, or bronze, half- and quarter-shekels are also attributed to Simon, bearing date of the 4th year. The obverse of the half-shekel has two bundles of thick-leaved branches with a citron between, and on the reverse a palm tree with two baskets filled with fruit. The legend on the obverse is יִשָּׁמֵל תְּלָנָם, shnath ’arba’ haḵĕt, “the fourth year a half," and on the reverse, "li-ghšā'ullath evyōn, "the redemption of Zion." The quarter-shekels has a similar type, except that the obverse lacks the baskets and the reverse has the citron on it, and bears the legend, "ribbā", "quarter," instead of "half." Another type is a cup with a margin of jewels on the obverse and a single bunch of branches with two citrons on the reverse.

The palm is a very common type on the coins of Judaea, and a very appropriate one, since it is grown there. Jericho was called the city of palms. The branches of trees in bundles illustrate the custom of carrying branches at the Feast of Tabernacles and the erection of booths made of branches for use during this feast (see Lev 23:40). The baskets of fruit may refer to the offerings of first-fruits (Dt 28:2). One of the above series of coins published by Madden bears the countermark of an elephant, which was a symbol adopted by the Seleucid kings, and this is an evidence of its early date. But whatever doubts there may be as to the coins of Simon, there can be none as to those of his successor, John Hyrcanus, who reigned 135-106 BC, since they bear his name. They are all of bronze and bear the following legend with a great number of variations, " photoshop，“Johan the high priest and scribe of the Jews.” The reverse has a two-branched cornucopia with a poppy head rising from the center. There is no doubt as to the meaning of the word "Heb her" (ד"ה) as the above. It is commonly rendered "safety," "taking it in common" seems to bear in Hos 6:9, "a company" or "band," here the company of elders representing the people. Judas Aristobulus (106-105 BC) issued similar coins with Heb legends, but with the accession of Alexander Jannaeus (105-78 BC) we find bilingual inscriptions on the coins, Heb and Gr. The obverse bears the words " photoshop, "Johan than the king," and the reverse, " Photoshop ALEXANDPOY, BASILEOS ALEXANDROU," "King Alexander." Most of his coins, however, bear Heb inscriptions only. All are of copper or bronze, like those of Hyrcanus and Aristobulus, and are of the denomination known to us in the NT as "mites," weighing from 25 to 35 grains.

When the Romans took possession of Pal in 63 BC, the independent rule of the Hasmonaeans came to an end, but Pompey confirmed John Hyrcanus as governor of Judaea under the title of high priest. Dissensions between him and other members of his family called for interference several times on the part of the Romans. Hyrcanus was again confirmed by Julius Caesar in 47 and continued in authority until 40. It is uncertain what coins he issued, but whatever they were, they bore the type found on those of Alexander Jannaeus. In 40 BC, the Parthians temporarily overthrew the Roman authority in Syria and Pal, and set Antigonus on the throne of the latter, and he reigned until 37. The coins he issued bore bilingual inscriptions like the bilinguals of Alexander. He calls himself Antigonus in Gr, and Mattathias in Heb, the type being a wreath on the obverse and a double cornucopia on the reverse, though some have it single. They are much heavier coins than the preceding issue. The legends are: obverse, BACIAEΩC ANTIGONOU, BASILEOS ANTIGONOU, "of King Antigonus"; reverse, (נְהוֹדָדָד, maccathiyah ha-kenen gadhol ha-yarēh%mâm), "Mattathias the high priest of the Jews."

The Hasmonaean dynasty ended with Antigonus and that of the Herods followed. Herod the Great was the first to attempt the title of king, and his coins are numerous and bear only Greek legends, and are all of bronze. The earliest have the type of a helmet with cheek pieces on the obverse and the legend: BACIAEΩC ΗΡΩΔΟΥ, BASILEOS ΗΡΩΔΟΥ, and in the field to the left Γ (year 3), and on the right the monogram Φ. The reverse has a Macedonian shield with rays. The coin here illustrated is another type: a rude tripod on the obverse, and a cross within a wreath on the reverse, the legend being the same as given above.

Herod Archelaus, who reigned from 4 BC to 6 AD, issued coins with the title of ethnarch, the only coins of Pal to bear this title. They are all of small size and some of them have the type of a galley, indicating his sovereignty over some of the coast cities, such as Caesarea and Joppa.

The coins of Herod Antipas (4 BC-40 AD) bear the title of tetrarch, many of them being struck at Tiberias, which he founded on the Sea of Galilee and named after the emperor Tiberius. The following is an example: obverse HP, ΤΕΤ(ΗΡΩΔΟΥ ΤΕΤΡΑΧΟΥ), ΗΕΡ. ΤΕΤΕΡΟΣ ΤΕΤΡΑΧΟΥ, with the type of a palm branch; reverse, TIBERIAC, TIBERIAS, within a wreath.

Others have a palm tree entire with the date 38 and 44 AD, which is somewhat rare, but those of Agrippa, 37-44 AD, are numerous, considering the shortness of his reign. The most common type is a small coin ("mite") with an umbrella having a tassel-like border, on the obverse, and three ears of wheat on one stalk on the reverse. The legend reads: Basileos Agrippa, and the date is LIX (year 6). Larger coins of Agrippa bear the head of the emperor (Caligula or Claudius) with the title of Caesar (Augustus) in Gr.

Agrippa II was the last of the Herodian line to strike coins (49-100 AD). They were issued under Nero, whose head they sometimes bear with his name as well as that of Agrippa. They are all of the denomination of the mite (λεπτόν).

In 6 AD, Judaea was made a Rom province and was governed by procurators, and their coins are numerous, being issued during the reigns of Augustus, Titus, Claudius and Nero. They are all small and bear on the obverse the legends: KAI-CAPOC (Caesar), or IOYAI (Julia), or the emperor’s name joined with Caesar. The coins of the Jews struck during the first and second revolts, 66-70 AD, and 132-135 AD, have already been alluded to with the difficulty of distinguishing them, and some have been described. They all have the type common to the purely Jewish issues; the date palm, the vine, bunches of fruit, the laurel or olive wreath, the cup or chalice, the lyre and a temple with columns. Types of animals or men they regarded as forbidden by their law. Most of them are bronze, but some are silver shekels and half-shekels, dated in the 1st, 2d and 3d years, if we assign those of higher date to Simon the Maccabee. Those of the 1st year bear the name of Eleazar the priest, on the obverse, and on the reverse the date “first year of the redemption of Israel,” נוֹמַי אָבָט אֶלֶּה, sh-nath 'abath is-gh'ulath yard’s. Others bear the name of Simon and some that of “Simon N’st Israel” (“Simon Prince of Israel”). The coins of the 2d and 3d years are rare. They have the type of the cup and vine leaf, or temple and lulabh. Those supposed to belong to the second revolt bear the name of Simon without N’st Israel, and are therefore assigned to Simon Bar-Cochba. The example here given has the type of the temple on the obverse with what is thought to be a representation of the “beautiful gate,” between the columns, and a star above. The name Simon is on the margin, the first two letters on the right of the temple and the others on the left. The legend of the reverse is: יִרְדְּנָה יְרֵשַׁלְיָם, יִרְדְּנָה יְרֵשַׁלְיָם (“the deliverance of Jerus”).

Some of the coins struck by the Romans to commemorate their victory over the Jews were struck in Pal and some at Rome, and all bear the head of the Rom emperor on the obverse, but the reverse often exhibits J udaean as a weeping captive woman, seated at the foot of a palm tree or of a Rom standard bearing a trophy. The legend is sometimes Judaean capta and sometimes Judaean victors. The example given has the inscription in Gr: ΙΟΥΔΑΙΟ ΕΛΩΝΧΙΑΣ, ΙΟΥΔΙΑΙΟ ΕΑΛΟΧΙΑΙ, Judaean capta. The

There are coins of Agrippa II (the “king Agrippa” of Acts 25, 26), struck in the reign of Verpasian, with his name and title on the obverse and with a deity on the reverse, holding ears of wheat in the right hand and a cornucopia in the left. The inscription reads:

ETOY K2BA ETOU K2BA
ΑΓΡΙ ΠΙΤΑ ΑΓΡΙ ΠΙΑ

(year 26, King Agrippa) in two lines.

After the revolt of Bar-Cochba and the final subjugation of the Jews by Hadrian, Jesus was made a Rom colony and the name was changed to Aelia Capitolina. A series of coins was struck, having denarii and tetrodrachms, the former being about one-fourth the weight of the latter which were known as staters (Mt 17 27). The piece referred to was the amount of tribute for two persons, and as the amount paid by one was the half-shekel (ver 24), this piece must have been the equivalent of the shekel or tetrodrachm.

MONEY-CHANGERS, chאַנְּנָיִר (kolla'ssion), kollhiasia, from κολλύβος, kollubos, “a small coin,” so “a money-changer,” or “banker” (Mt 21 12; Mk 11 15; “changers” in Jn 2 15; cf ver 14, where κερματισσι, kermaatia, “a dealer in small bits,” or “change,” is also rendered “changers”); cf τραπεζης, trapezites, “one who sits at a table, “a money-changer,” “a banker” or “broker”; one who both exchanges money for a small fee and pays interest on deposits [Mt 25 27, AV “exchangers,” ARV “bankers”]): The profession of moneychanger in Pal was made necessary by the law requiring every male Israelite who had reached the age of 20 years to pay into the treasury of the sanctuary a half-shekel at every numbering of the people, an offering to Jah, not even the poor being exempt. It seems to have become an annual tax, and was to be paid in the regular Jewish half-shekel (Ex 30 11-15). Since the Jews, coming up to the feasts, would need to exchange the various coins in common circulation for this Jewish piece, there were money-changers who exacted a premium for the exchange. This fee was a kollubos (about 31 cents in U.S. money), hence the name kollubistas. The Jews of Christ's day came from many parts of the world, and the business of exchanging foreign coins for various purposes became a lucrative one, the exchangers exacting whatever fee they might. Because of their greed and impiety, Jesus drove them from the courts of the temple.

MONEY, CURRENT. "κόρον, "öber, "passing," Gen 23 16; 2 K 12 4 [Heb 5]: The text and tr in 2 K 12 4 are uncertain and difficult. See RVm. The reference is probably not to a money standard, but to a poll tax which was levied in addition to the free-will offering. Gen 23 16 implies the existence of a standard shekel and also probably the use of the precious metals in stamped bars or ingots of an approximately fixed weight or value, a primitive coinage. CH presupposes these pieces, and records in cuneiform writing discovered in Cappadocia indicate that shekel pieces with a seal stamp were in use in Asia Minor in the time of Hammurabi (Sayce, "Contemporary Review," August, 1907, XCII, 259 ff.). The existence of these pieces did not do away with the custom of weighing money, a practice which obtained in Israel down to the time of the exile (Jer 32 10)

MONTH, mth (מֵשֶׁת, ḫōdēsh, מַתָּה, yerah; μήν, mēn): ḫōdēsh is strictly the "new moon," the appearance of which marked the beginning of the month, commonly indicated by rō'sh ha-ḵōdēsh. Yerah is derived from yārāb, "moon," which comes from the vb. that means "to wander," "to make a circuit," thus the month was lunar, the period of the moon's circuit. The Gr mēn also meant "moon," from the Sanskrit ma, "to measure," the Lat mensis and our "moon" being derived from the same root (see Calendar, Time; Astronomy).

MOON, mōn (מַט), yārēḏ;" meaning obscure —probably "wanderer:" by some given as "pale:" σελήνη, selēnē): The moon was very early worshiped by the nations, largely due to its divinity or the representative of one or more deities. These deities were both masculine and feminine. In Assyria and Babylonia the most common name for the moon-god was Sin or Se. In Babylonia he was also called Aku and Namara. In Egypt the moon was represented as a ram or jackal, feminine and masculine. The chief of these was Thoth the god of knowledge, so called because the moon was the measurer of time. Babylonia has, also, As, the goddess of the moon, as the consort of the sun, whose equivalent as known in Phoenicia as Ashtaroth-karnaim. This personification and worship of the moon among the nations who were neighbors to Pal was but part of an elaborate Nature-worship found among these people. Nor was this worship always separated from Pal by geographical lines. It crept into the thought and customs of the Hebrews and in a sense affected their religious conceptions and ceremonies. They fell into the habit of making direct homage to sun, moon and stars, as is evidenced by Job 31 26; Jer 44 17, and even Isa 3 18 (see CRESCENTS). Moses seems to have forewarned his people against the danger of this form of worship (Dt 4 19).

MORDECAI, mōr'dē-ki, mōr-de-kā'i (מֹרְדְכָי, mor'dhkay; Măr'šēths, Marochoels): An Israel- ite of the tribe of Benjamin, whose fate it has been to occupy a distinguished place in the annals of his people. His great-grandfather, Kish, had been carried to Babylon along with Jeconiah, king of Judah (Est 2 5-6). For the main representation of several deities, all the scenes narrated in Est, in which Mordecai was greatly concerned, took place, the way to Pal had been open to the Israelites; but neither his father, Jair, nor afterward himself chose to return to the ancient heritage. This seems to have been the case also with the rest of his house, as it was with the vast majority of the Israelite people; for his uncle died in Persia leaving his motherless daughter, Hadassah, to the care of Mordecai. Employed in the royal palace at Susa, he attracted the notice of the timely discovery of a plot to assassinate the king, the favorable notice of Xerxes, and in a short time became the grand vizier of the Persian empire. He has been believed by many to have been the author of the Book of Esther. As in the case of known notices of the Feast of Purim, outside of the book just mentioned, that festival is closely associated with his name. It is called "the day of Mordecai" (2 Mac. 15:30). The apocryphal additions to Est expatiate upon his greatness, and are eloquent of the deep impression which his personality and power had made upon the Jewish people.

Lord Arthur Hervey has suggested the identification of Mordecai with Matoa, or Natea, the powerful favorite and minister of Xerxes, who is spoken of by Ctesias, the Gr historian. Few have done more to earn a nation's lasting gratitude than Mordecai, to whom, under God, the Jewish people owe their preservation.

MOREH, mō'reh, HILL OF (ellaneous, mo'ρēē or mo'ρēē, "hill of the teacher"); B. Γαβαθά-θαμάρ, Gebathamâr, A. θοι μομού τοῦ Ἄβαρ, toû bômóv toû Abôr): The Heb. mō'reh is derived from the vb. yârâh, "to teach," "to direct," and indicates one who directs, or gives oracle answers. We might therefore read "hill of the teacher," the height being associated with such a person who had his seat here. The hill is named only in describing the position of the Midianites before Gideon's attack (Jgs 7:1). If the identification of the Wall of Hazor with Ar 'Ain Jalut is correct, Gideon must have occupied the slopes to the E. of Jezreel. The Midianite camp was in the valley of Jezreel (6:33). The Heb text in 7:1, which has probably suffered some corruption, seems to mean that the Midianites lay N. of the position held by Gideon, their lines running from the hill of Moreh in the plain. The hill can hardly have been other than Jebel ed-Duby, often called Little Hermon, which rises boldly from the northern edge of the vale of Jezreel, with Slengeru as a remarkable scene wafting at its foot ("Judges," ICC, 200) would lay the scene in the neighborhood of Shechem, but there is no good reason to doubt the accuracy of the tradition which places it at the eastern end of the plain of Esdraelon.

Both are defined as near to Shechem. The position cannot be identified today. The trees or trees were evidently a place of resort for those who wished to consult a mō'reh. See Moreh, Hill of. To this day in Pal trees are often regarded with a certain religious awe as the habitation of spirits. Isolated terebinths receive much veneration. The present writer has often heard farmers with marvellous rags of all colors attached to them by the peasants as evidence of their homage. See MECONEM.

MORESHETH-GATH, mō'resheth-gath, mō'resheth-gath (פֵּרֶשֶׁת גַּת, mōresheth-gath, "inheritance or possession of Gath"); LXX κλήρονομαία Παθ, kleronomias Gath): A place mentioned only in Mic 1:4. It must have been in the vicinity of Gath as the meaning of the name would indicate, and was the home of the prophet Micah (Mic 1:1; Jer 26:18). It was probably in the vicinity of Mareshah (Mic 1:15). Jeroboam, in his protest to his work on Mount Moriah, places it a little to the E. of Eleutheropolis (Belit Jibrîn), and it would be natural to find it there if the latter place was Gath as some think. Robinson (BR, II, 68) found ruins of a village between one and two miles E. of Belt Jibrîn. It must have been among the foot-hills of Judah between the hill country and the Phili plain on the route from Jerus to Lachish, Gaza and Egypt. Mareshah was certainly in that region, and the prophecy of Micah mentions towns and villages in the Shephelah and the Phili country as though they were familiar to him (see HIGHL and G. A. Smith, "Micah," in his Minor Prophets).

MORIAH, mō'-ri'ah, LAND OF (τὸ Ἄρχων, τὸ ἐργα ἀρχαῖον, τὸ ἐργα ἀρχαῖον; εἰς τὸν τόν τοῦ ἐργα ἀρχαῖον; εἰς τὸν τόν τὸν ἐργαθήν): Abraham was directed by God to take his son Isaac, to go into the land of Moriah, and there to offer him for a burnt offering (Gen 22:2) upon a mountain which God would show him. This land is mentioned only here, and there is little to guide us in trying to identify it. A late writer (2 Ch 3:1) applies the name of Moriah to the mount on which Solomon's Temple was built, possibly associating it with the sacrifice of Isaac. A similar association with this mountain may have been in the mind of the writer of Gen 22 (see ver 14), who, of course, wrote long after the events described (Driver). But in ver 2 no special mountain is indicated.

Abraham journeyed from the land of the Philis, and on the 6th day he saw the place afar off (ver 1). This naturally leads to assume a mountain or mountaintop farther N. than Jerus. The description could hardly apply to Jerus in any case, as it cannot be seen "afar off" by one approaching either from the S. or the W. The Samaritans lay the scene of sacrifice on Mt. Gerizim (q.v.).

Instead of "Moriah" in this passage Pesh reads "Amorites." This suggests a possible emendation of the text, which, if it be accepted, furnishes a more definite idea of the land within which that mem-merable scene was lying at Jersu-"Jachers, Judges," ICC (200) would lay the scene in the neighborhood of Shechem, but there is no good reason to doubt the accuracy of the tradition which places it at the eastern end of the plain of Esdraelon.

MORNING, mō'-rînìng: There are several Heb and Gr words which are rendered "morning," the most common in Heb being יָמָה, bôker, which occurs 150 t. It properly means "the breaking forth of the light," "the dawn," as in Gen 19:27; Jgs 19:8, 25, 27. Another word with the same meaning is יָמָא, shahar (Gen 19:13; Neh 4:21; Isa 66:8). יָמָא, mishkar ("womb of the m.,") Ps 110:3) is a poetical term derived from the same root. See HIND OF THE MORNING. יָמָא, nîghah, יָמָא, mutâghah (Dnl 6:19 [Heb 20]), mean "brightness, mercy, kâbhîm, com- kîm, "to load an animal" (for a journey), and as the nomads are accustomed to do this early in the morning it came to mean early morning (1 S 17:16). See BETIMES.

In the NT κῆπος, ὀρθρος, is properly "dawn," and is used for early morning (Jn 8:2; Acts 5:21), and MORNING WATCH (מָוֶר תּוֹפָה, aš-mō-ārā (Ex 14:24; 1 S 11:11; in Jdh 12:5 for hešābān ḥa-chiḥ; cf. Sir 56:1; 1 Mac 6:30): The last portion of the night (see Watch).}

MORNING, WINGS OF. See Astronomy, I. 4.

MORROW, mōrō, TOMORROW, tōs-mōrō: Two words are used in the OT in this meaning: מֹרֹא, boker, which properly means “dawn,” or “morning,” and מֹרֹא, mōdar, properly the same, but used for the next morning and hence “tomorrow,” like the Ger. morgen. The derivative מֹרֶה, mōrēh, is “the following day,” all the next day, esp. after yom (“day”), but usually coupled with a noun following, as in Lev 23:11, mōrēh ha-shabbāḥ, “day after the Sabbath.” It is also used adverbially for “on the morrow,” as in Gen 19:34.

In the Gr. of the NT we find ἀγωρος, aurion (Mt 6:34, III, 3; commonly used, but ἀγωρον, ketos, also occurs (Acts 25:17 AV, where RV renders more exactly “the next day”); τραφίον, epaurion, is “on the morrow” (Acts 10:9.23.24). H. PORTER

MORROW AFTER THE SABBATH (מֹרֶה), mōrēh, or מֹרֶה רֹתָב, mōrēh rō-tāv, “the morrow,” or “tomorrow,” “the day following” מֹרֶה רֹתָב, mōrēh rō-tāv, “the day after the Sabbath,” i.e., the first day of the week. The first day of the week was designated for the formal offering of the first-fruits in the form of wave-sheaves (Lev 23:11), and of the wave-sheaves 50 days later (Lev 23:16. 17). This recognition of an after-Sabbath during festive periods has its counterpart in the later ecclesiastical practice of celebrating not only Easter Sunday, but also Easter Monday, etc., and undoubtedly was a factor in establishing the custom which transferred the sanctity of the Sabbath to the first day of the week after the resurrection of Our Lord.

MORSEL, mōr-sēl (ἀγωρός, briis): Found only in He 12:16 AV, “For one morsel of meat [RV ‘mess of meat’] sold his birthright,” lit. “for one eating,” i.e. one meal. The Great Bible (Cranmer’s) has “for one meal of meat.”

MORTAL, mōr-tal, MORTALITY, mor-tal’-ti (נְתַנָּה, nēta-na, to nēτān, iō nētān): The meaning is “subject to death” (Rom 6:12; 8:11; 1 Cor 15:53.54; in 2 Cor 5:4 RV has “what is mortal”). In Job 4:17, the Heb word is nētāh, “mortal man.” See IMMORTAL.

MORTAR, mōr-tār (מָהְקִת, māhōkāth [Nu 11:8], Mōkāth, makhtēṣ [Prov 27:22]): A hollowed stone or vessel in which grain or other substance was pounded or beaten with a pestle. The Israelites used a mortar in which to beat the manna in the wilderness (Nu 11:8), and Prov 27:22 declares, “Though thou shouldst braze a fool in a mortar with a pestle . . . yet will not his foolishness depart from him.” It is incomprehensible. Some have supposed an allusion to an oriental mode of punishment by pounding the criminal to death in a mortar, but this is unlikely. In illustration of Prov 27:22 such proverbs are quoted as Though you beat that houseman in a mortar, she will not leave her place also. See also BRAY. For “mortar” (AV “morter”) see BITUMEN. JAMES ORR

MORTACE, mōr-tēs (מֹרָתָא, mōrātā, ‘arabah): To give or be security as a part of bartering, give pledges, become surety. In time of great need for food, "Some also there were that said, We are mortgaging [AV ‘have mortgaged’] our fields," etc (Neh 5:3). See Surety.

MORTIFY, mōr-ti-fi (Rom 8:13 AV and ERV, θανατάω, thanadō, ERVm “make to die,” and Col 3:5, νεκρόω, nekroō, ERVm “make dead”): This sense of mortify is obsolete in modern Eng., and ARV in both places substitutes “put to death,” with great advantage. The context in both passages goes to the heart of St. Paul’s doctrine of the union of the believer with Christ. This union has given the soul a new life, flowing (through the Spirit) from Christ in the heavenly world, so that the remnants of the old corrupt life-principle are now dangerous excrescences. Hence they are to be destroyed, just as a surgeon removes the remnants of a diseased condition after the reestablishment of healthy circulation. The interpreter must guard against weakening St. Paul’s language by some such phrase as “subdue all that is inconsistent with the highest ideals,” for St. Paul views the union with Christ as an intensely real, quasi-physical relation.

MOSEROTH, mō-sē-roth, mōsē’s-roth, -roth (מְשָׁרָת, mā-šērāth, “bond”): A desert camp of the Israelites between Hashmonah and Bene-jaakan (Nu 33:30.31). It is probably the same as Moserah (Dt 10:6), though in that passage the name follows Bene-jaakan. There Aaron died and was buried. See WANDERINGS OF ISRAEL.

LITERATURE
The traditional view of the Jewish church and of the Christian church, that M. was a person and that the narrative with which his life-story is interwoven is real history, is in the main sustained by commentators and critics of all classes.

It is needless to mention the old writers among whom these questions were hardly under discussion. Among the advocates of the current radical criticism may be mentioned Stade and Renan, who minimize the historicity of the Biblical narrative at this point. Renan thinks the narrative “may be very probable.” Kwad, Wellhausen, Robertson Smith, and Driver, while finding many flaws in the story, make much generally of the historicity of the narrative.

The critical analysis of the Pent breaks up the narrative. It is recognized that there are difficulties in the story of M. In what ancient life-story are there not difficulties? If we can conceive of the ancient being obliged to ponder over ever a modern life-story, we can hardly believe that they would be still more “difficulty” with it. But it seems to very many that the critical
It was the time of the Ramesside dynasty, and the king on the throne was Rameses II. Thus the foundling adopted by Pharaoh's daughter would have the family name Mes or Moses. That it would be joined in the Egyptian to the name of the sun-god Ra is practically certain. His name at birth would be Moses. But the Hebrew mind a name must mean something. The usual meaning of this royal name was that the child was "born of" a princess through the intervention of the god Ra. But this child was not "born of the princess," and falling back upon the primary meaning of the word, "drawn out," she said, "because I drew him out of the water" (Ex 2 10). Thus Moses received his name. Pharaoh's daughter may have been the eldest daughter of Rameses II, but more probably was the daughter and eldest child of Seti Merenptah I, and sister of the king on the throne. She would be lineal heir to the crown but debarred by her sex. Instead, she bore the title "Pharaoh's Daughter," and, according to Egyptian custom, retained the right to the crown for herself.

Many curious things, whose value is doubtful, are told of M. by Jos and other ancient writers (Jos, Ant, Mt, ix, 7; xi: C. A. M.: for legends, see Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus, Appendix; for rabbinical and rabbinical traditions are not incredible but lack authentication. Others are absurd. Egyptologists have searched with very little success for some notice of the great Hebrew at the Egyptian court.

But the faith of which the Ep. to the Hebrews speaks (He 11 23-28) was at work. Moses "refused to be called the son of Pharaoh's daughter" (Ex 2 11). A Friend of the People. Whether he did so in word, by definite renunciation, or by his espousal of the cause of the slave against the oppressive policy of Pharaoh is of little importance. In either case he became practically and greatly impoverished his throne rights and probably his civil rights as well. During some intervention to ameliorate the condition of the state slaves, an alteration arose and he slew an Egyptian (Ex 2 11.12). Thus his constructive treason became an overt act. Discovering through the ungrateful reproaches of his own kinsmen (Acts 7 25) that his act was known, he quickly made decision, "choosing rather to share ill treatment with the people of God," casting in his lot with slaves of the empire, rather than to "enjoy the pleasures of sin for a season," amid the riotous living of the young princes at the Egyptian court; "accounting the reproach of Christ" (his humiliation, being accounted a nobody ("Can any good thing come out of Nazareth?")) as "greater riches than the treasures of Egypt" (He 11 25,26; Acts 7 25-28). He thought he was a nobody and do right better than to be a tyrant and rule Egypt.

M. fled, "not fearing the wrath of the king" (He 11 27), not crying before it or submitting to it, but defying it and braving all that it could bring upon him, degradation in Midian from his high position, deprivation of the privileges and comforts of the Egyptian court. He went out a poor wanderer (Ex...
2:15). We are told nothing of the escape and the journey, how he eluded the vigilance of the court guards and the frontier posts. The friend of slaves is strangely safe while within their territory. At last he reached the Sinai province of the empire and hid himself away among its mountain fastnesses (Ex 2:15). The romance of the wild and the shepherders and the grateful father and the future wife is all quite in accord with the simplicity of desert life (Ex 2:16-22). The “Egyptian” saw the rude, selfish herdsmen of the desert imposing upon the helpless shepherd girls, and partly by fortune, partly by man, partly, doubtless, by the authority of the Egyptian appearing in an age when “Egypt” was a word with which to frighten men in all that part of the world, he compelled them to give way. The “Egyptian” was called, thanked, given a home and eventually a wife. There in Midian, while the anguish of Israel continued under the taskmaster’s lash, and the weakening of Israel’s strength by the destruction of the male children went on, with what more or less vigor, we know not. M. was left by Providence to know, and M. S. was found of the Lord. “Instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,” he might be transformed into the wise, well- poised, masterful leader, statesman, legislator, poet, and prophet. God usually prepares His great ones in a contrivance or a scheme about some of the drearier places of earth, farthest away from the busy haunts of men and nearest to the “secret place of the Most High.” David keeping his father’s flocks, Elijah on the mountain slopes of Gilgal, the Baptist in the wilderness of Judea, Jesus in the shop of the Galilean carpenter; so M. a shepherd in the Bedouin country, in the “waste, howling wilderness.”

The commission.—One day Moses led the flock to “the back of the wilderness” (Ex 3:1-12; see BURNING BUSH). M. received his commission, the most appalling commission of all time ever given to a mere man (Ex 3:10)—a commission to a solitary man, and he a refugee—to go back home and deliver his kinsmen from a dreadful slavery at the hand of the most powerful nation on earth. Let not those who halt and stumble over the little difficulties of most ordinary lives think hardly of the faltering of Moses’ faith before such a task (Ex 3:11-15; 4:10-12). In this, all Israel, I Am hath sent me unto you” (Ex 3:14), was the encouragement God gave him. He gave him also Aaron for a spokesman (Ex 4:14-16), the return to the Mount of God as a sign (Ex 3:12), and the rod of power for working wonders (Ex 4:17).

One of the curious necessities into which the critical analysis drives its advocates is the opinion concerning Aaron that “he scarcely seems to have been a Israëtl and almost equal partner of Moses, perhaps not even a priest” (Bennett, HDB, III, 441). Interesting and curious speculations have been instituted concerning the work in which Israel and esp. Pharaoh were to understand this message. “At the request of the eldest brother of Israel, I Am hath sent me unto you” (Ex 3:14), was the encouragement God gave him. He gave him also Aaron for a spokesman (Ex 4:14-16), the return to the Mount of God as a sign (Ex 3:12), and the rod of power for working wonders (Ex 4:17).

With the signs for identification (Ex 4:1-10). M. was ready for his mission. He went down from the “holy ground” to obey the high summons and fulfill the great commission. After the long controversy with his wife, a controversy of stormy ending (Ex 4:24-26), he seems to have left his family to his father-in-law’s care while he went to respond to the call of God (Ex 18:22). He met Aaron, his brother, and together they returned to Egypt to collect the elders of Israel (Ex 4:29-31), who were easily won over to the scheme of emancipa-tion. Was ever a slave people not ready to listen to plans for freedom?

(2) The conquest of Pharaoh.—The next move was the bold request to the king to allow the people to go into the wilderness to hold a feast unto Jehovah (Ex 5:1). How did Moses gain admittance past the jealous guards of an Egyptian court to the presence of the Pharaoh himself? And why was it that former traitorous refugee at once arrested? Egyptology affords a not too distinct answer. Rameses II was dead (Ex 4:19); Merenptah II was on the throne with an insecure tenure, for the times were troublous. Did some “Pharaoh’s daughter” who, had he remained loyal, would have been the Pharaoh? Probably so. Thus he would gain admittance, and thus, too, in the precarious condition of the throne, it might well not be safe to molest him. The original form of the request had to be treated with some slight modification, was continued throughout (Ex 8:27; 10:9), though God promised that the Egyptians should thrust them out altogether when the end should come, and it was so (Ex 11:1, 12:35-39). Yet Pharaoh foisted upon the king the worst duty in the easiest form and thus, also, his obstinacy appears as the greater heinousness. Then came the challenge of Pharaoh in his contemptuous demand, “Who is Jehovah?” (Ex 5:2), and Moses’ prompt acceptance of the challenge, in the beginning of the long series of plagues (see PLAGUES) Pharaoh, having made the issue, was justly required to afford full presentation of it. So Pharaoh’s heart was hardened (Ex 4:21; 7:3-5; 9:12-35; 10:1; 14:8; see PLAGUES) until the vindication of Jehovah was so conducted that the gods of Egypt were shown to be of no avail against Him, but that He was the only God, and until the faith of the people of Israel was confirmed (Ex 14:31).

(3) Institution of the Passover.—It was now time for the next step in revelation (Ex 12:1-16). At the burning bush God had declared His purpose to be a savior, the deliver of Israel. That deliverance was in Egypt, His absolute sovereignty was being established; and now the method of delivery came by Him. That He might not be a destroyer, was to be revealed. M. called the hardened elders (Ex 12:21-28) and instituted the Passover feast. As God always in revelation chooses the known and the familiar—the tree, the bow, circumcision, baptism, and the Supper—by which to convey the unknown, so the Passover was a combination of the household feast with the widespread idea of safety through blood-sacrifice, which, however it may have come into the world, was not new at that time. Some think there is evidence of an old Sem festival at that season which was utilized for the institution of the Passover.

The lamb was chosen and its use was kept up (Ex 12:3-6). On the appointed night it was killed and “roasted with fire” and eaten with bitter herbs (Ex 12:8), while they all stood ready girded, with their shoes on their feet and their staff in hand (Ex 12:11). They ate in safety and in hope, because the blood of the lamb was on the door (Ex 12:23).

That night the firstborn of Egypt were slain. Among the Egyptians “there was not a house where there was not both Egyptians and Israelites” (Ex 12:29). It was the front door of the maid-servant, who sat with her handmill before her, to the palace of the king that “sat on the throne,” and even among the cattle in the pasture.
If the plague was employed as the agency of the angel of Jehovah, as some think, its peculiarities is that it takes the strongest and the best and culminates in one great stunning blow and then immediately subsides (see LEV. viii). Who can tell the horror of it, when the Israelites were thrust out of the terror-stricken land (Ex 129)?

As they went out, they "asked," after the fashion of departing servants in the East, and God gave them favor in the sight of the over-awed Egyptians that they left gifts upon them as a mark of extravagance. Thus "they despoiled the Egyptians" (Ex 1236). "Moreover the man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh's servants, and in the sight of the people" (Ex 115; 1235.36).

(Ex) The exodus went to the land of 500 years, even the selfsame day it came to pass, that all the host of Jehovah went out from the land of Egypt." (Ex 12 41). The great oppressor was Rameses II, and the culmination and the revolution came, most probably, in connection with the building of Pithom and Rameses, as these are the works of Israel mentioned in the Bible narrative (Ex 111). Rameses said that he built Pithom at the "mouth of the east" (Budge, Hist. of Egypt, V, 123). All efforts to substantiate this statement have failed; and in the present, at least, it must be admitted that Israel built Pithom, Rameses built Pithom; there is a synchronism that cannot in the present knowledge of Egypt history even doubted, much less separated.

The true purpose which came to Egypt with the beginning of the reign of Merenptah II was the right and psychological moment for the return of the "son of Pharaoh's daughter" and his access to the royal court. The presence and power of Jehovah vindicated His claim to be the Lord of all the earth, and Merenptah let the children of Israel go.

A little later when Israel turned back from the border of Khar (Pal) into the wilderness and disappeared, and Moses and his people passed over into the sea, they set up the usual boastful tablet claiming as his own many of the victories of his royal ancestors, added a few which he himself could truly boast, and inserted, near the end, an exultation over Israel's discomfiture, accounting himself as having finally won the victory: "Tehenu is devastation. Kheta peace, the Canaan the prisoner of all lands; God the People of Israel is ruined, his posterity is not; Khar is become as the widows of Egypt." The synchronisms of this period are well established and, if they should ever be, other facts of Egypt history shall be obtained to change them. Yet there is no more practical the precise event from which the descent into Egypt should be reckoned, or to fix the date of such, Rameses and Merenptah, and the building of Pithom and of Merenptah II, as did "the date of the exodus and of all the patriarchal matters from the moment when Moses was concerned about the order of events, their perspective and their synchronisms than about any epochal date. For the present we must be content with these chronological uncertainties. Astronomical science may sometimes fix the epochal dates for these events; otherwise there is little likelihood that they will ever be known.

They went out from Succoth (Egypt "Thothu," Budge, History of Egypt, V, 122, 129), carrying the bones of Joseph with them as he had commanded (Ex 13 19; Gen 50 25). The northeast route was the direct way to the promised land, but it was guarded. Pithom itself was built at "the mouth of the East," as a part of the great frontier defences (Budge, op. cit., V, 123). The "wall" on this frontier was well guarded (Ex 14), and attempts might be made to stop them. So they went not "by the way of the land of the Philistines, but the way of the wilderness for the fear of the inhabitants of the earth which were between the Red Sea and the wilderness of Zin, (Ex 13 17). The Lord Himself took the leadership and went ahead of the host of Israel in a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night (Ex 13 21). He led the way of the wilderness of the Red Sea" (Ex 13 18). They pitched before Pi-hahiroth, over against Raal-zephon between Migdol and the sea (Ex 14 2). Not one of these places has been positively identified. But the journeys before and after the crossing, the time, and the configuration of the land and the coast-line of the sea, together with all the necessity imposed by the narrative, are best met by a crossing near the modern town of Suez (Naville, Route of the Exodus; Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus), where Ras Attika comes down to the sea, upon whose heights is a ruined (orEdward tower) as the southern outpost of the eastern line of Egypt defences, which was probably erected.

Word was carried from the frontier to Pharaoh, probably at Tanis, that the Israelites had "fled" (Ex 14 5), had taken the impassioned thrusting out by the frenzied people of Egypt in good faith and had gone never to return. Pharaoh took immediate steps to arrest and bring back the fugitives. The troops at hand (Ex 14 6) and the chariot corps, including 600 "chosen chariots," were sent after once in pursuit. Pharaoh going out in person at least to start the expedition (Ex 14 6.7). The Israelites seemed to be "entangled in the land," and, since "the wilderness [had] shut them in" (Ex 14 8), must easily fall a prey to the Egyptian army. The Israelites did not answer and commanded the pillar of cloud to turn back from its place before the host of Israel and stand between them and the approaching Egyptians, so that while the Egyptians were in the darkness, Israel had the light. The mountain came down on their right, the sea on the left to meet the foot of the mountain in front of them; the Egyptians were hastening on after them and the pillar of cloud and fire was their rearward. M. with the rod of God stood at the head of the camp. Then God wroth. M. stretched out the rod of God over the sea and "Jeh then caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all the night" (Ex 14 16-21). A path way was before them and the sea on the right hand, and on the left was a "wall unto them," and they passed through (Ex 14 21.22). Such heaping up of the waters by the wind is well known and sometimes amounts to 7 or 8 ft. in Lake Erie (Wright, Scientific Confirmations of the OT, 106). No clearer statement could possibly be made of the means used and of the miraculous timing of God's providence with the obedience of the people to His command to M. The host of Egypt passed over on the hard, sandy bottom of the sea. The Egyptians coming up in pursuit, and finding it impossible to tell exactly where the coastline had been on this beach, and where the point of safety would lie when the wind should abate and the tide come in again, impetuously rushed on after the fleeing slaves. In the morning, Jeh looked forth and troubled the Egyptians "and took off their chariot wheels, and they drove them heavily" (Ex 14 24.25). The wind had abated, the tide was returning and the inflation that goes before the tide made the beach like a quagmire. The Egyptians found that they had gone too far and tried to escape (Ex 14 27), but it was too late. The rushing tide caught them (Ex 14 28). When the way had come, "horse and rider" were but the subject of a minstrel's song of triumph (Ex 15 1-19; Ps 106 9-12) which Miriam led with her timbrel (Ex 15 20). The Bible does not say, and there is no reason to believe, that Pharaoh led the Egyptian hosts in person further than at the setting off and for the giving of general directions to the campaign (Ex 15 4). Pharaoh and his host were overthrown in the Red Sea (Ps 136 15). So Napoleon and his host were overthrown at Waterloo, but Napoleon lived to die at St. Helena. And Merenptah lived to cect his boastful inscription concerning the failure of Israel, when turned back from Kadesh-barnea, and their disappearance in the wilderness of Paran. His mummy, identified by the outstanding Professor Grof, lies among the royal mummies in the Cairo Museum. Thus at the Red Sea was wrought the final victory of Jeh over Pharaoh; and the people believed (Ex 14 31).

(5) Special providences.—Now proceeded that long course of special providences, miraculous timing, and multiplying of natural agencies which began with the crossing of the Red Sea and ended only when they "did eat of the fruit of the land" (Josh 5 12). God promised freedom from the diseases of the Egyptians (Ex 16 26) at the bitter waters of Marah, on the condition of obedience. M. was directed to a tree, the wood of which should counteract the alkaline character of the water (Ex 15 23-25). A little later they were at Elim (Wady Gharandel, in present-day geography), where were "twelve springs of water and three score and ten palm trees" (Ex 15 27). The enumeration of the trees signifies nothing but their scarcity, and is understood by everyone who has traveled in that desert and counted, again and again, every little clump of trees that has appeared. The course of the wilderness here is a blotted page to the pen, and come out again at the Red Sea in order to pass around the point of the plateau into the wilderness of Sin. This is the course travel takes now, and it took the same course then (Ex 16 1). Here Israel murmured (Ex 16 2), and every traveler who crosses this blistering, dusty, wearsome, hungry wilderness joins in the murmuring, and wishes, at least a little, that he had stayed in the land of Egypt (Ex 16 3). Provisions brought from Egypt were about exhausted and the land supplied but little. Judging from the complaints of the people about the barrenness of the land, it was not much different then from what it is now (Nu 20 1-6). Now special providential provision began. "At even... the quails came up, and covered the camp," and in the morning, after the dew, the manna was found (Ex 16 4-36; see Manna; Quails).

At Rephidim was the first of the instances when Moses resorted to using water. The rock with the rod of God, and there came forth an abundant supply of water (Ex 17 1-6). There is plenty of water in the wady near this point now. The Amalekites, considering the mass of people following, had probably shut the Israelites off from the springs, so God opened some hidden source in the mountain side. "Then came Amalek, and fought with Israel" (Ex 17 8). Whether the hand which M. lifted up during the battle was his own hand or a symmetrical hand (Ex 17 9-12), thought to have been carried in battle then, as sometimes even yet by the Bedouin, is of no importance. It was in either case a hand stretched up to God in prayer and allegiance, and the battle with Amalek, then as now, fluctuates according as the hand is lifted up or lowered (Ex 17 8-16).

Here Jethro, Moses' father-in-law, met him and brought his wife and children to him (Ex 18 5-6; cf Nu 10 29). A sacrificial feast was held with the distinguished guest (Ex 15 7-12). In the wise counsel of this great despot-priest we see one of the many natural sources of supply for Moses' legal lore and statecraft. A suggestion of Jethro gave rise to one of the wisest and most far-reaching elements in the civil institutions turn a little later, the elaborate framework of civil courts (Ex 18 13-20).

(6) Receiving the Law.—At Sinai M. reached the pinnacle of his career, though perhaps not the pinnacle of his faith. (For a discussion of the location of Sinai, see SINAI; EXODUS.) It is useless to speculate about the nature of the flames in the theophany by fire at Sinai. Some say there was a thunderstorm (HDB); others think a volcanic eruption. The time, the stages of the journey, the description of hiss and thunder at the Red Sea, its admirable adaptability to be the cathedral of Jeh upon earth, and, above all, the collocation of all the events of the narrative along this route to this spot and to no other—all these exercise an overwhelming influence upon one (cf Palmes, The Desert of the Exodus). If they do not conclusively prove, they convincingly persuade, that here the greatest event between Creation and Calvary took place.

Here the people assembled. "And Mount Sinai, the whole of it, smoked," and above appeared the glory of God. Bounds were set about the mountain to keep the people back (Ex 19 12-13). God was upon the mountain: "Under his feet as it were a paved work of a sapphire stone, and as it were the very heaven for cleanness." (Ex 19 10-19; 24 10, 16, 17), "and God spake all these words" (Ex 20 1-17). Back over the summit of the plain between these two mountain ridges in front, the people fled in terror to the place "far off" (Ex 20 18), and somewhere almost at the foot of another mountain the later the tabernacle of grace was set up (Ex 40 17). At this place the affairs of M. mounted up to such a pinnacle of greatness in the religious history of the world as none other among men has attained unto. He gave formal announcement of the perfect law of God as a rule of life, and the redeeming mercy of God as the hope through repentance for a world of sinners that "fall short." Other men have sought God and taught men to seek God, some by the words of the Law and some by the way of imitation, but where else in the history of the world has any one man caught sight of both great truths and given them out?

M. gathered the people together to make the covenant (Ex 24 1-8), and the nobles of Israel ate a covenant meal there before God (Ex 24 11). God called M. again to the mountain with the elders of Israel (Ex 24 12). There M. was with God, fasting 40 days (Ex 34 28). Joshua probably accompanied M. (cf the people God was changed to the builder. We can only learn what the pattern was by studying the tabernacle (see Tabernacle). It was an Egyptian plan (cf Bible Student, January, 1902). While M. was engaged in his study of the things of the tabernacle on the mount, the people grew restless and appealed to Aaron (Ex 32 1). In weakness Aaron yielded to them and made them a golden calf and they said, "These are thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt" (32 2-6; cf Calk: Golden). This was probably, like the later worship at Bethel and Dan, ancient Sem bull-worship and a violation of the second commandment (20 5; cf Bible Student, August, 1902). The judgment of God was swift and terrible (32 7-35), and Levi was made the Divine agent (32 25-29). Here first the "tent of meeting" comes into prominence as the official headquarters of the leader of Israel (33 7-11). Henceforth independent and distinct from the tabernacle, though on account of the similarity of names and ideas. But as the tabernacle, that building, it holds its place and purpose all through the wanderings to the plains of Moab by Jordan (Dt 31 14). M. is given a vision of God to strengthen his own faith (Ex 33 12-23; 34 1-35). On his return from communion with God, he had such glory within that it shone out through his face to the terror of the multitude, an adumbration of that other and more glorious transfiguration at which M. should also appear, and that reflection of it which is sometimes seen in the life of many godly persons (Mt 17 1-13; Mk 9 2-10; Lk 9 28-36).

Rationalistic attempts to account for the phenomena at Sinai have been frequent, but usually along certain lines. The favorite hypothesis is that of volcanic action. Geologists have often used natural agencies in His revelations, and in His miracles, and there is no necessary obstacle to this. But there are two seemingly insuperable difficulties in the way of this naturalistic explanation: one, that since geologic time this has not happened on the region; the other, that volcanic eruptions are not conducive to literary inspiration. It is almost impossible to get a same account from the builders of an eruption, much less has it a tendency to result in the greatest literature, the most perfect code of laws and the profoundest statemanship in the world. The human mind can easily believe that God could so speak from Sinai and direct the preparation of such works of wisdom as the Book of the Covenant. Not many will be able to think that M. could do so during a volcanic eruption at Sinai. For it must be kept in mind that the historical character of the narrative at this point, and the Mosaic authorship of the Book of the Covenant, are generally admitted by those who put forward this naturalistic explanation.

(7) Uncertainties of history.—From this time on to the end of Moses' life, the materials are scant, there are long stretches of silence, and a biographer may well trust the tabernacle. The last 14 years were spent at the foot of the "mountain of law" (Ex 40 17-19), and the world from that day to this has been able to find a mercy-seat at the foot of the mountain of law. Nadab and Abihu presumptuously offered strange fire and were smitten (Lev 10 1-7). The people were numbered (Nu 1 1 ff). The Passover was kept (Nu 9 1-5).

(8) Journey to Canaan resumed.—The journey to Canaan began again (Nu 10 11-13). From this time until near the close of the life of M. the events associated with his name belong for the most part to the story of the wanderings in the wilderness and other subjects, rather than to a biography of M. (cf WANDERINGS; AARON; MIHIM; JOSHUA; CALEB; BRAZEN SERPENT, etc.). The subjects and references are as follows:

The March (Nu 2 10-18; 9 15-23)
The Complaint (Nu 11 1-3)
The Lusting (Nu 14 4-9; 31-36)
The Prophets (Nu 11 16; Num 13 1-16)

Meditanites Punished (Nu 31)

(12) Tribes east of Jordan (Nu 32).

(13) Moses' final acts.—M. was now ready for the final instruction of the people. They were assembled, and a great farewell address was given (Dt 31 10-30). Joshua was set apart for office (Dt 31 1-8), and to the priests was delivered a written copy of this last announcement of the Law now adapted to the progress made during 40 years (Dt 31 9-13; cf 31 24-29). M. then called Joshua into the tabernacle for a final charge (Dt 31 14-28), gave to the assembled elders of the people "the words of this song" (Dt 31 30; 32 1-43) and blessed the people (Dt 33). And then M., who by faith "had triumphed in Egypt, had been the great revelator at Sinai, had turned back to walk with the people of little faith for 40 years, reached the greatest triumph of his faith, when, from the top of Nebo, the towering pinnacle of Pisgah, he lifted up his eyes to the goody land of promise and gave way to Joshua to lead the people of God.

This biography of M. is the binding-thread of the Pent from the beginning of Ex to the end of Dt, without disastrous breaks or disturbing repetitions. There are, indeed, silences, but they occur where nothing great or important in the narrative is to be expected. And there are, in the eyes of some, repetitions, so-called, but they do not seem to be any more real than those of the narrative biography that is only incidental to the main purpose of the writer. No man can break apart this narrative of the books without putting into confusion this life-story; the one cannot be treated as independent of the other; any more than the narrative of the Eng. Commonwealth and the story of Cromwell, or the story of the American Revolution and the career of Washington.

Later references to M. as leader, lawgiver and prophet run all through the Bible: for instance, that be mentioned: Josh 5 30-35; 24 1-5; 1 S 6 6-8; 1 Ch 23 14-17; Ps 77 30; 99 6; 105; 106; Isa 63 11,12; Jer 15 1; Dan 9 11-13; Hos 12 15; Mal 4 4.

The place held by M. in the NT is as unique as in the OT, though far less prominent. Indeed, he holds the same place, though presented in a different light. In the OT he is the type of the Prophet to be raised up "like unto" him. It is the time of types, and M., the type, is most conspicuous. In the NT the Prophet 'like unto Moses' has come. He now stands out the greatest One in human history, while M., the type, fades away in the shadow. It is thus he appears in Christ's remarkable reference to him: "He wrote of me!" (Jn 5 40). The principal thing which M. wrote specifically of Christ is this passage: "Jeh thy God will raise up one from thee a prophet after the midst of thee, of thy brethren, like unto me!" (Dt 18 15,18 f). Again in the Ep. to the He, which is the formal passing over from the types of the OT to the fulfilment in the NT, Jesus is made to stand out as the Moses of the new dispensation (He 12 24-29). Other most important NT references to M. are Mt 17 8; Mk 9 4; Lk 9 30; Jn 1 17,45; 2 14; Rom 5 14; Jude 9; Rev 11 3.

II. Work and Character.—So little is known of the private life of M. that his personal character can scarcely be separated from the part which he bore in public affairs. It is in the work he wrought for Israel and for mankind which fixes his place among the great ones of the earth. The life which we have just sketched as the life of the leader of Israel is also the life of the author, the lawgiver, and the prophet.

It is not within the province of this art. to discuss in full the great critical controversies concerning the authorship of M. which have been summed up against him thus: "It is doubtful whether we can regard M. as an author in the literary sense" (HDB, III, 446; see PENTATEUCH; DEUTERONOMY). It will only be in place here to present a brief statement of the evidence in the case for M. There is no longer any question concerning the literary character of the age in which M. lived. That M. might have written in Persian is not in itself improbable, but did he write, and how much? What evidence bears at these points?

(1) "Moses wrote."—The idea of writing or of writing is found 60 times in the Pent. It is definitely recorded in writing purporting to be by M. 7 times (that M. wrote or was commanded to write (Ex 17:14; 34:27; 39:30; Nu 17:23; Dt 10:4; 31:24) and frequently of others in his times (Dt 6:9; 27:3; 31:19; Jos 8:32). Joshua at the great convocation before the taking of the covenant wrote "these words in the book of the law of God" (Josh 24:26). Thus is declared the existence of such a book but 25 years after the death of M. (cf. Bible Student, 1901, 269-74). It is thus clearly asserted by the Scriptures as a fact that M. in the wilderness a little after the exodus was "writing "books."

(2) Moses' library.—There are many library marks in the Pent, even in those portions which by nearly all, even the most radical, critics are allowed to be probably the writings of M. The Pent as a whole has such library marks all over it. On the one hand this is entirely consistent with the known literary character of the age in which M. lived. One who was "instructed in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" might well have had in his possession Egypt records. And the author of this art. is of that class to whom Professor Clay refers, who believe "that Hebraic (or Amoraic) literature, as well as Aramaic, has a great antiquity prior to the 1st millennium B.C. (Clay, Amura, 32.)

On the other hand, the use of a library to the extent indicated by the abiding marks upon the Pent does not in the least militate against the claim of M. for authorship of the same. The real library marks, aside from the passages which are assigned by the critics to go with them, are far less numerous and narrower in scope than in Gibbon or in Kunitz. The use of a library no more necessarily endangers authorship in the one case than in the other.

(3) The Moses-tradition.—A tradition from the beginning universally held, and for a long time and without inherent absurdity, has very great weight. Such has been the M-tradition of authorship. Since M. is believed to have been such a person living at an age and upon a material as might suitably provide the situation and the occasion for such historical records, so that common sense does not question whether he could have written the Pent, but only whether he did write "the Pent. "Thus, it is a tradition concerning his authorship than to believe that such a tradition arose with nothing so known concerning his ability and circumstances. But such a tradition did arise concerning M. It existed in the time of Josiah. Without it, by no possibility could the people have been persuaded to receive with authority a book purporting to be by him. The question of the truthfulness of the claim of actually finding the Book of the Law altogether aside, there must have been such a national hero as M. known to the people and believed in by them, as well as a confident belief in an age of literature reaching back to his days, else the Book of the Law would not have been received by the people as from M. Archaeology does not supply such actual literary material from the late 8th century B.C. as was known much earlier than the time of Josiah, but the material shows a method of writing and a literary advancement of the people which reaches far back for its origin, and which goes far to justify the tradition in Josiah's day. Over and above all this, there is no archaeological evidence to cast doubt upon that tradition.

(4) The Pent in the Northern Kingdom.—The evidence of the Pent in the Northern Kingdom before the fall of Samaria is very strong—this is entirely aside from the Pent. Although some few insist upon an early date for that book, it is better to omit it altogether from this argument, as the time of its composition is not absolutely known and is probably not very far from the close of the Babylon exile of Judah. But the prophets supply indirect evidence of the Pent in the Northern Kingdom (Hos 10:1; 4:6; 8:1.3; 9:11; 12:9; Am 5:21.22; 8:5; of Green, Higher Criticism and the Pent, 56-58).

(5) Evidence for the Mosaic age.—Beyond the limit to which historical evidence reaches concerning authorship of the Pent, internal evidence for the Mosaic age as the time of its composition carries us back to the very days of M.'s existence, if it be quite supposed that later authors might have known Egyptian words, but because their employment of such marked peculiarities in meaning and history and of such absolute inaccuracy in use in the Pent, that their employment by later authors in such a way is incredible. The list of such words is a long one. Only a few can be mentioned here. For a complete list, the interested reader must consult the "Guide to Ancient Egyptian Words" (see Lieben, PSBA, May, 1898, 202-10; also The Bible Student, 1901, 36-40.)

(6) The obscurity of the doctrine of the resurrection in the Pent. —This obscurity has been urged against the Mosaic authorship of the Pent. Because of peculiar belief concerning the doctrine of the resurrection among the Egyptians, this objection becomes the most formidable of all the objections urged by critics. If the Pent, written by M. when Israel had just come out of Egypt, why does he leave the doctrine of the resurrection in such obscurity? The answer is very simple. The so-called Egyptian doctrine of the resurrection was not a doctrine of resurrection at all, but a doctrine of resurrection. The real resurrection is a doctrine which the Egyptians and all other nations had no knowledge of. The reason M. did not argue this is because he knew that the people had just come out of Egypt would have carried with them, when they arrived, the Mosaic belief in resurrection and the resurrection of Christ. The Pent, therefore, does not refer to anything that is strange and foreign to the mind of the Egyptian people. The obscurity of the doctrine of the resurrection in the Pent, therefore, is explained by the fact that the people just come out of Egypt would have carried with them, when they arrived, the Mosaic belief in resurrection and the resurrection of Christ.

(7) The unity of the Pent.—Unity in the Pent, abstractly considered, cannot be indicative of a particular time for its composition. Manifestly, unity can be given a book at any time. There is indisputably a certain appearance of unity in narrative in the Pent, and when this unity is examined somewhat carefully, it is found to have such peculiarity as is found to the Mosaic writer's work. The making of books which have running through them such a narrative as is contained in the Pent which, esp. from the end of Gen, is entangled and interwoven with dates and routes and topographical notes, the history of experiences, all so accurately given that in large part to this day the route and the places intended can be identified, all this, no matter when the books were written, certainly calls for special familiarity with all the circumstances. And when the all the circumstances add to all this the life of a man without breaks or repetitions adverse to the purpose of a biography, and running through from beginning to end, and not a haphazard, unsymmetrical man such as might result from the piecing together of fragments, but a colossal and symmetrical man, the foremost man of the world until a greater than M. should appear, it demands to be written near the time and place of the events narrated. That a work of fiction, struck off at one time by one hand, might meet all these requirements at a later date, no one can doubt, but a scrap-book, even though made up of facts, cannot do so. In fact, the scraps culled out by the analysis of the Pent do not make a connected life-story at all, but the enactment of the grand and momentous, and turn a biography, which is the binding-thread of the books, into what is little better than nonsense.

The unity of the Law, which also can be well supposed to be the same as the unity of the narrative in certifying the narrative near to the time and place of the events narrated. The discussion of the unity of the Law, which involves nearly the whole critical controversy of the day, would be too much of a digression for an article on M. (see LAW; LEVITICUS; DEUTERONOMY; also Green, Higher Criticism and the Pent; Ott, POT; Wiener, Bib. Sac., 1909-10).

Neither criticism nor archaeology has yet produced the kind or degree of evidence which rational demands for the Mosaic authorship of the Pent. No trace has yet been found either of the broken tablets at Mt. Sinai or of the autograph copy of the Law of the Lord "by the hand of Moses brought out of the house of the Lord in the days of Josiah. Nor are the things likely to be found, nor anything else that will certify authorship like a transcription of the records in the copyright office. Such evidence is not reasonably demanded. The foregoing indications point very strongly to the production of the Pent in the Mosaic age by someone as familiar with the circumstances and as near the heart of the nation as M. was. That here and there a few slight additions may have been made and that, perhaps, a few explanations made by scribes may have slipped into the text from the margin are not unlikely (Nu 12 3; Dt 34), but this does not affect the general claim of authorship.

Pss 90 is also attributed to M., though attempts have been made to discredit this authorship here also (Deitsch, Comm. on the Pes). There are those who perhaps still hold to the Mosaic authorship of the Book of Job. But that view was never more than a speculation.

The character of M. as lawgiver is scarcely separable from that of M. as author, but calls for some separate consideration.

2. The Lawgiver in the Pent legislation has been so well estimated that for any adequate idea of the discussion the reader must consult not only other articles (LAW; BOOK OF THE COVENANT; PENTATEUCH) but special works on this subject. In accord with the reasons presented above for the authorship of the Pent in Mosaic times, the great statesman seems most naturally the author of the laws so interwoven with his life and leadership. M. first gave laws concerning the Passover (Ex 13). At Sinai, after the startling revelation from the summit of the mountain, it is most reasonable that M. should gather the people together to covenant and that M. should give the Mosaic code of laws known as the Book of the Covenant (Ex 24 7). This code contains the Moral Law (Ex 20 1-17) as fundamental, the constitution of the theocracy and of all ethical living. This is followed by a brief code suitable to their present condition and immediate prospects (Ex 20 24-26; 21-23). Considering the expectations of both leader and people that they would immediately proceed to the promised land and take possession, it is quite in order that there should be laws concerning vineyards and olive orchards (Ex 23 11), and harvests (Ex 23 10-16) and the first-fruits (Ex 23 19). Upon the completion of the tabernacle, a priest-code became a necessity. Accordingly, such a code follows with great minuteness of directions. This part of the Law is composed almost entirely of "laws of procedure" intended primarily for the priests, that they might know their own duties and give oral instruction to the people, and probably was never written by the people except in the most general way. When Israel was turned back into the wilderness, these two codes were quite sufficient for the simple life of the wanderings. But Israel developed. The rabble became a nation. Forty years of life undermine the unity of the narrative, and the Book of the Covenant in the moralities of life, the PC in their religious exercises, and the brief statutes of Lev for the simple life of the desert, prepared the people for a more elaborate code as they entered the promised land of a more complex life. Accordingly, in Dt that code was recorded and left for the guidance of the people. That these various codes contain some things not now understood is not at all surprising. It would be surprising if they did not. Would not Orientals of today find some things in Western laws quite incomprehensible without explanation?

That some few items of law may have been added at a later time, as some items of history were added to the narrative, is not at all unreasonable, and does in no way invalidate the claim of M. as the lawgiver, any more than later French legislation has invalidated the Coriscan's claim to the Napoleonic Code.

The essential value of the Mosaic legislation is beyond comparison. Some of the laws of the Pent did to passing problems, have themselves passed away; some of them were definitely abrogated by Christ and others explicitly fulfilled; but the moral, industrial, social, and political, is the warp and woof of the best in the great codes of the world to this day. The morality of the Decalogue is unapproached among collections of moral precepts. Its divinity, like the divinity of the teachings of Jesus, lies not only in what it includes, but also in what it omits. The precepts of Patah-botoh, of Contemplative Spectus, include many things found in the Decalogue; the Decalogue omits many things found among the maxims of these moralists. Thus in what it excludes, as well as in what it includes, the perfection of the Decalogue lies.

(3) It should be emphasized that the laws of M. were codes, not a collection of court decisions known to lawyers as common law, but codes given abstractly, not in view of any particular concrete case, and arranged in systematic order (Wiener, Bib. Sac., 1909-10). This agrees with the archaeological indications of the Mosaic and preceding ages. The CH, given at least 5 centuries before, is one of the most orderly, methodical and logical codes ever constructed (Lyon, JACOS, XXV, 254).

The career and the works and the character of M. culminate in the prophetic office. It was as prophet that M. was essentially leader. It was as prophet that he held the place of highest eminence in the world until a greater than M. came.

3. The Prophet

1. The statesman-prophet framed a government which illustrated the kingdom of God upon earth. The theocracy did not simulate any government of earth, monarchy, republic or socialistic state. It combined the best elements in all of these and set up the most effective checks which have ever been devised against the evils of each.

2. The lawyer-prophet inculcated maxims and laws which set the feet of the people in the way of life, so that, while failing as a law of life in a sinful world, these precepts ever remain as a rule of conduct.

3. The priest-prophet prepared and gave to Israel a ritual of worship which most completely typified the redemptive mercy of God and which is so wonderfully unfolded in the Ep. to the He, as it has been more wonderfully fulfilled in the life and atoning death of Christ.

4. In all the multiform activities of the prophetic career he was a type of Christ, the type of Christ whose work was a "tutor unto Christ."

Like the revelation of God ever transcends the speculations of theologians about God as a sunrise transcends a treatise on the solar spectrum. While the speculations are cold and lifeless, the revelation is vital and glorious. As an analysis of Raphael's painting of the transfiguration belittles its impression upon the beholder, while a sight of the picture exalts that scene in the mind and heart, so the attempts of theologians to analyze God and bring Him within the grasp of the human mind belittle the conception of God, dwarf it to the capacity of the human intellect, while such a vision of Him as M. gives exalts and glorifies Him beyond expression. Thus while theologians of every school from Athanasius to Ritschl come and go, M. goes on forever; while they stand cold on library shelves, he lives warm in the hearts of men.

Such was the Heb leader, lawgiver, prophet, poet; among mere men, "the foremost man of all this world."

MOSES, ASSUMPTION, a-sump'abun, OF. See APOCYPTIC LITERATURE.

MOSES, SONG OF: The name given to the song of triumph sung by Moses and the Israelites after the crossing of the Red Sea and the destruction of the hosts of Pharaoh (Ex 15 1-18). The sublimity of this noble ode is universally admitted. In magnificent strains it celebrates the deliverance just experienced, extolling the attributes of Jch revealed in the triumph (vs 1-12), then anticipates the astonishing effects which would flow from this deliverance in the immediate future and in aftertimes (vs 13-18). There seems no reason to doubt that at least the basis of the song—possibly the whole song—is genuinely Mosaic. In the allusions to the guidance of the people to God's holy habitation, and to the terror of the surrounding peoples and of the Canaanites (vs 13-18), it is thought that traces are manifest of a later revision and expansion. This, however, is by no means a necessary conclusion.

Driver, who in LOT, 8th ed, 30, goes with the critics on this point, wrote more guardedly in the 1st ed (p. 27):

—Probably, however, the greater part of the song is Mosaic, and the modification or expansion is limited to the closing vs: for the general style is antique, and the triumphant tone which pervades it is just such a tone which naturally have been inspired by the event which it celebrates."

The song of Moses is made the model in the Apocalypse of "the song of Moses the servant of God, and the song of the Lamb," which those standing by the sea of glass, who have "come off victorious from the beast, and from his image, and from the number of his name," sing to God's praise, "Great and marvellous are thy works, O Lord God, the Almighty," etc (Rev 16 2-4). The church having experienced a deliverance similar to that experienced by Israel at the Red Sea, but infinitely greater, the old song is recast, and its terms are reframed to express both victories, the lower and the higher, at once.

MOSOLLAMUS, mō-sōl'a-mus:

1) AV "Mosollam" (Μοσολλαμος, Mosollamon), one of the three "assessors" appointed to the two commissioners in the inquiry made about "strange wives" (1 Esd 9 14) = "Meshullam" in Ezr 8 16 (B reads also Ἐσωλαμ/ Μοσουλάμ, in 1 Esd 8 44).

Most High, Most Holy. See God, Names of.

MOT, mōt (κόρφος, kophos): A minute piece of anything dry or light, as straw, chaff, a splinter of wood, that might enter the eye. Used by Jesus in Mt 7 3 ff; Lk 6 41 in contrast with "beam," to rebuke officiousness in correcting small faults of others, while cherishing greater ones of our own.

MOTH, moth (םות, 'asheh; cf Arab. קֶשֶׁת, 'eshet, "worm" [Nas 51 8]; of Arab. מָועַס, sab, "worm," esp. an insect larva in flesh, wood or grain; ἔφα, ...

α, larvae in case constructed out of substances on which it is feeding; β, case cut open by the larva for enlarging it; σ, the perfect insect.
they are generally nocturnal and that their antennae are not club-shaped. Further, the larva in many cases spins a cocoon for the protection of its pupa or chrysalis, which is never the case with butterflies. The Bib. references are to the clothesmoth, i.e. various species of the genus Tinea, tiny insects which lay their eggs in woolen clothes, upon which the larva later feeds. As the larva feeds it makes a cocoon of its silk together with fibers of the cloth on which it is feeding, so that the color of the cocoon depends upon the color of the fabric. The adult is only indirectly harmful, as it is only in the larval stage that it inflicts injury. Therefore in Isa 51:8, "For the moth [תֶּשֶׁ] shall eat them up like a garment, and the worm [שָׂרָ] shall eat them like wool," both words must refer to the larva, the distich demanding such a word as דֵּשֶׁ to balance דֵּשֶ in the first half. The word "moth" occurs in the OT, in Job, Isa, and Hos, always in figurative expressions, typifying either that which is destructive (Job 13 28; Ps 39 11; Isa 50 9; 51 8; Hos 5 12) or that which is frail (Job 4 19; 27 18). See Insects.

ALFRED ELY DAY

MOTHER, muthʾer (Hang. כּ, qem; "mother," "dau," "ancestress"); בָּרָ, בָּרָ: In vain do we look in the Scriptures for traces of the low position which woman occupies in the OT impression has been created by her present position in the East, esp. under Mohammedan rule. Her place as depicted in the Scriptures is a totally different one. Women there moved on the same social plane with men. They often occupy leading public positions (Ex 15 20; Jgs 4 4; 2 K 22 14). The love of offspring was deeply imbedded in the heart of Hb women, and thus motherhood was highly respected. Among the patriarchs women, and esp. mothers, occupy a prominent place. In Rebekah's marriage, her mother seems to have had equal voice with her father and Laban, her brother (Gen 24 28-50.53. 55). Jacob obeyed his father and his mother" (Gen 28 7), and his mother evidently was his chief counselor. The Law places the child under obligation of honoring father and mother alike (Ex 20 12). The child that strikes father or mother or curses father or mother is punished by death (Ex 21 15.17). The "mother" bears rule in the habitually disobedient (Dt 21 18-21).

In one place in the Law, the mother is even placed before the father as the object of filial reverence (Lev 19 3). The Psalmist depicts deepest grief as that of one whose mother for his mother (Ps 35 14). In the entire Book of Prov the duty of reverence, love and obedience of sons to their mothers is unceasingly inculcated. The greatest comfort imaginable is that wherewith a mother comforts her son (Jas 16 13).

And what is true of the OT is equally true of the NT. The same high type of womanhood, the same reverence for one's mother is in evidence in both books. The birth of Christ lifted motherhood to the highest possible plane and idealized it for all time. The last thing Jesus did on the Cross was to bestow his Mother on John "the beloved" as his special inheritance. What woman is today, what she is in particular in her motherhood, she owes wholly to the position in which the Scriptures have placed her. Sometimes the stepmother is spoken of as the real mother (Gen 37 10). Sometimes the grandmother or other female relative is thus spoken of (Gen 15 10; 3 20; 1 K 16 30; 11 45; 2).

Tropically the nation is spoken of as a mother and the people are her children (Isa 50 1; Jēr 50 12; Hos 2 4; 4 5). Large cities also are "mothers"...

2 S 20 19; cf Gal 4 26; 2 Eed 10 7), and Job even depicts the earth as such (Job 1 21).

MOTHER-IN-LAW. See Relationships, Family.

MOTION, mōshʾun: In 2 Eed 6 14, AV "motion" represents the Lat commotio, "commotion," "disturbance" (RV has revised entirely here). In Rom 7 5, "the motions of sins, which were by the law," "motion" is used in the sense of "impulse," and "impulses" would probably give the best tr. But the Gr noun (τὸνομον, παθηκός) is hard to translate exactly, and RV has preferred "passions," as in Gal 5 24. Sanday (ICC) paraphrases "the impressions of sense, suggestive of sin, stimulated into perverse activity by their legal prohibition." See Passion. "Motion" is found also in Wisd 5 11 (AV and RVm) and 7 24 (AV and RV) in a modern sense.

MOUNT OF THE AMALEKITES ("hill-country of the Amalekites" [Jgs 15 15]). The Amalekites are usually connected with the valley (Nu 14 25; Jgs 7 12), but appear from this passage to have had a settlement in the hill country of Ephraim. See Amalekites.

MOUNT OF THE AMORITES ("hill-country of the Amorites" [Dt 7 20.24; cf Nu 13 29; Josh 10 6, etc.]): The region intended is that afterward known as the hill country of Judah and Ephraim, but sometimes "Amorites" is used as a general designation for all the inhabitants of Canaan (Gen 15 16; Josh 24 8.18, etc.). See Amorites.

MOUNT OF THE VALLEY: Zeresh-shahar is said to be situated in or on the "mount of the valley" (רֵץ לָעֵד, רֵץ לָעַד, cf Job 19 18). Cheyne (EB, s.v.) says "i.e. on one of the mountains E. of the Jordan valley (cf ver 27), and not impossibly on that described at length in BJ, VII, vi, 1-3." To the N.W. of this mountain is Wady Ṣūr, wherein there may be a reminiscence of Zeresh-shahar. There is no certainty.

MOUSE, mous, MICE, mīs (מָיָשְׁנָ, akhbb; LXX μῶς, mās, "mouse"); cf Arab. עָקָב, עָקָב, "jerboa," not עָקָב, "akbar," "greater": of also proper noun, מַעָר, עָקָב, "Ashbor" [Gen 36 38]; 1 Ch 1 49; also 2 K 22 12.14; Jer 26 22; 36 12]: The word occurs in the list of unclean creeping things (Lev 11 29), in the account of the golden molten and tumors (AV and RVm "emerald") sent by the Philis (1 S 6 4-18), and in the phrase, "eating swine's flesh, and the abomination, and the

The jerboa or jumping mouse, Arab. yarkāt, is eaten by the Arabs of the Syrian desert, N.E. of Damascus. Possibly allied to 'akkāb is the Arab, 'akbar (generally in pl., 'akkāb), used for the male of the jerboa.

MOUTH, mouth (יווח, yōkh, יָוָךְ, yāḵ, יַוָּךְ, yāḵ; יָוָךְ, yōkh; יָוָךְ, yāḵ; יָוָךְ, yōkh), gårūn [Ps 149:6]; Arab. b̄ulb̄an; t̄ūl b̄alb̄an; 'āl b̄alb̄an; [Dan 3:20]; ēyāma, stōma, 71 t, once īyōs, liyōs, i.e., “word of mouth.” [Acts 16:37]; once I find the vb. 'ārūti (ἐπιστομίζω, “to silence,” “to stop the mouth” [Tit 1:1]).

In addition to frequent references to man and animals, “their food was yet in their mouths” (Ps 76:30).

1. Literal Sense
   - Of the mouth of the ass (Nu 22:25): “Save me from the lion’s mouth” (Ps 22:21).
   - The term is often used in connection with inanimate things: mouth of a saek (Gen 42:27); of the earth (4:11; Nu 36:10); of a well (2 Kgs 2:25; 1 Kgs 18:22,27); of Sheol (Ps 141:7); of the abyss (Jer 48:28); of a furnace (Arab. t̄arī, Dan 3:26); of idols (Ps 115:5; 156:17). (1) The “mouth” denotes language, speech, declaration (םDefs, “tongue,” which see): “By the mouth of the king is by means of,” “on the declaration of” (Lk 1:70; Acts 1:16); “Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be slain at the mouth of witnesses” (Nu 35:30; Dt 17:6; Mt 15:18; He 10:28); “I will give you mouth and wisdom” (Lk 21:15); “fool’s mouth” (Prov 18:7).
   - (2) “Mouth” also denotes “spokesman”: “He shall be to thee a mouth” (Ex 4:16).

Numerous are the idiomatic phrases which have, in part, been introduced into English by means of the language of the Bible. “To put into the mouth,” if said of God, denotes Divine inspiration (Dt 18:18; Mic 3:5). “To have words put into the mouth” means to have instructions given (Dt 31:19; 2 S 14:3; Jer 1:9; Ex 4:11-16). “The fruit of the mouth,” (Prov 18:20) is synonymous with wisdom, the mature utterance of the wise. “To put one’s mouth into the dust” is equivalent with humbling one’s self (Lam 3:29; cf “to lay one’s horn in the dust,” Job 18:15). Silent submission is denoted by “laying the hand upon the mouth” (Jgs 18:19; Job 29:9; 40:4; Mic 7:16); cf to refrain the lips; see Lp. “To open the mouth wide against a person is to accuse him wildly and often wrongfully (Ps 36:21; Isa 57:4), otherwise to open one’s mouth wide,” “to have an enlarged mouth” means to have great confidence and joy in speaking or accepting good things (1 S 21; Ezk 33:22; 2 Cor 6:11; Eph 6:19). “To gape upon one with the mouth” means to threaten a person (Job 16:10). Divine rebuke is expressed by the “rod of God’s mouth” (Isa 11:4), and the Messiah declares “He hath made my mouth like a sharp sword” (Isa 49:2; cf Rev 2:16; 19:15). Great anguish, such as dying with thirst, is expressed by “the dryness of the root of the mouth” (Hab 3:6; Jer 29:10; Ps 137:6; cf 22:15).

H. L. E. LUBERG

MOWING, mowing, MOWN GRASS (גָּש, gāš, "a shearing," "cut grass"): In Ps 72:6 the good king’s rule is said to be “like rain upon the mown grass.” Now start the new growth (cf 2 S 23:4; Hos 6:3). “The king’s mowings” (Am 7:1) were the portion of the spring herbage taken as tribute by the kings of Israel to feed their horses (cf 1 S 8:15ff; 18:5). “After the king’s mowings” would denote the time when everybody else might turn to reap their greenstuff (BTP, II, 109). The term “mower” (יווחה, yōw̄āh, “to dock off,” “shorten”) in Ps 129:7 AV is rendered “reaper” in RV, and in Jas 5:4 RV has “mow” for ἄνδρον, andōn (AV “reap”). See HARVEST; REAPING.

MOZA, mōza (מֹזָה, mōzāh): (1) Son of Caleb and Ephah (1 Ch 2:46).
(2) A descendant of Saul (1 Ch 8:36:7; 9:42:43).

MOZAH, mōzā (מֹזָה, mōzāh); ha-mōzāh: B, Amōq, Amōk, Amōk, A, Amōq, Amōq; A town in the territory of Benjamin named after Miaphel and Chephirah (Josh 18:26). It may be represented by the modern Beth Misheh, the heavy y of the Heb passing into the light y of the Arab, a not unusual change. The name means “place of hard stone.” The village lies to the N. of Kulinahg (possibly Emmaus), about 4 miles N.W. of Jerus.

MUFFLER, muf′ler (ムフラー, mufūra): The name given to an article of woman’s dress in Isra. 19. It describes a veil more elaborate and costly than the ordinary. A cognate word in the sense of “veiled” is applied in the Mish (Shabbath, vi.6) to Jewesses from Arabia. See DRESS.

MULBERRY, māl′ber-i, TREES (מִרְבַּר, mīr̄bār; מִרְבָּר, mār̄bār; מְרָבָּר, mār̄bār), “pear trees” [2 S 6:23]; 1 Ch 14:14; m “balsam-trees”; Ps 84:6, AV “Baca,” m “mulberry trees,” RV “weeping,” m “balsam-trees”): According to Arab. writers the Baca tree is similar to the balsam (Butomodendron opobalsamum), and grows near Mecca; no such tree is, however, known in Pal. The name may, in Heb, have been applied to some species of Acacia (q.v.). The idea of “weeping” implied in the root, both in Heb and Arab., may be explained by the exudation of gum. “The sound of marching in the tops of the mulberry trees” has been explained to refer to the quivering of the leaves of poplars, but there is not much to support this view (see Poplar). The tr “mulberry trees” is, however, even more improbable, as this tree, though very plentiful today, had not been introduced into Pal in OT times.

Mulberry (מַבָּר, māḇār; [1 Mac 6:34]): The Syrians at Bathzecharai “to the end they might provoke the elephants to fight, they showed them the blood of grapes and mulberry.” This reference must be to the deep red juice of the black mulberry (Morus nigra), the tīt šāmī of Pal, a variety cultivated all over the land for its luscious, juicy fruit. See STOMACH. E. W. G. MASTERMAN the mule, which have no understanding," need not be understood as singing out the horse and mule as more in need of guidance than the rest of the brute creation, but rather offering familiar examples to contrast with man who should use his intelligence.

MULCED, mulk’ted (מָעַץ, mu‘äx, “ashash, to be punished,” “fined”): “The simple pass on, and are mulceted” (Prov 22:3 RVm, RV “suffer for,” AV “are punished”).

At the present day mules are used as pack animals and for drawing freight wagons, rarely for riding. One does not often see mules used against the Jews as are convicts or exhaustion in Europe and America. This may be because most of the mares and many of the donkeys are small.

MULTITUDE, mult'i-tud, MIXED, mist. See MINGLED PEOPLE.

MUPPIM, mup'îm (םֵעֲפֵי, muppîm): A son of Benjamin (Gen 46 21), elsewhere called "Sheuppim" (1 Ch 7 12.15; 26 16), "Shephupham" (Nu 26 39), and "Shephuph" (1 Ch 8 5); of separate arts on these names.

MURDER, mûr'dër (מָוֶר, harâgh, "to smite, destroy," "kill," "slay" [Ps 10 8; Hos 13 19]; Gregory, "to dash to pieces," "kill"; phûnos, phônos, "criminal homicide," from phonî, phonitēs, "to kill," "slay"; phûnos, phônos, from *phûn, phênô, has the same meaning in Hebrew, adôphûnos, adelphóktonos, "man-slayer," "murderer," used to designate *Satan (Jn 8 44) and him that hates his brother (1 Jn 3 15); a matricide is designated as χιτταρίδας, metatraîbos; [1 Tim 1 9]; cf adelphóktonos, adelphóktonos, " fratricidal" [Wis 10 3]. The pl. of phûnos, phônos, "murders," occurs in Mt 15 19; Mt 27 21; Gal 5 21 AV; Rev 9 21; cf 2 Macc 4 3.38; 12 6): The Hebrew law recognized the distinction between willful murder and accidental or justifiable homicide (Nu 26 16); but in legal language no verbal distinction is made. Murder was always subject to capital punishment (Lev 24 17; cf Gen 9 6). Even if the criminal sought the protection of the sanctuary, he was to be arrested before the altar, and to be delivered up (Ex 21 17; cf Nu 15 16.18.21.31). The Mish says that a mortal blow intended for another than the victim is punishable with death; but such a provision is not found in the Law. No special mention is made of (a) child murder; (b) suicide, or (c) attempted murder, but the intention of the law is clear with reference to all these cases (Ex 21 15.17; 1 Tim 1 19; Mt 15 4). No punishment is mentioned for attempted suicide (cf 1 5 3.4; 1 K 16 18; Mt 27 5); yet Josays (LJ, III, viii, 5) that suicide was held criminal by the Jews (see also Ex 21 23). An animal known to be vicious must be confined, and if it caused the death of another, the animal was destroyed and the owner held guilty of murder (Ex 21 20.31). The executioner, according to the terms of the Law, was the "revenger of blood"; but the guilt must be previously determined by the Levitical tribunal. Strong protection was given by the requirement that at least two witnesses must concur in any capital question (Nu 35 19–30; Dt 17 6–12; 19 12.17). Under the monarchy the duty of executing justice on a murderer seems to have been assumed to some extent by the sovereign, who also had power to grant pardon (2 S 13 39; 14 7.11; 1 K 2 34). See MURDERS.

MURDERS, mûrdër-érz (Acts 21 38 AV, RV "assassins"): Represents a word only once mentioned in the NT, the Gr word σκαρίας, sêkarías, Lat sicarius from sica, "a small sword," or "daggar." The word describes the hired assassin, of whom there were bands in the pay of agitators in Rome in the last days of the Roman Republic, who employed them to remove surreptitiously their political opponents. In the later days of the Jewish commonwealth, Judaea became infected with the same type of ruffian, and it is natural that the Rom commandant at Jerusalem should declare them by the name so well known in the imperial city. See ASSASSINS.

MURMUR, mûr'mur, MURMURINGS, mûr'mur-ings: The Heb word (שׁוער, šûwr, or שׁוּר, šûr) denotes the semi-articulated mutterings of disfavored persons. It is used in connection with the complaints of the Israelites in the desert against Jeh on the one hand, and against Moses and Aaron on the other hand (Ex 16 7.8; Nu 14 27.36; 16 11; 17 5). In three places (Dt 1 27; Ps 106 25; Isa 29 24), "murmur" translates a Heb word (שַׁק, šâqān) which suggests the malicious whispering of slander.

In the NT "murmur" renders two different words, viz. γέγονεν, gogônen, and ὀμφαυμάτων, emphâumâtôn. The latter word suggests indignation and fault-finding (Mt 14 4 4). The former word (or group of words) usually used in connection with the complainers of the Psalms, and scribes (Mt 20 11; Lk 5 30; 16 2; 19 7). T. LEWIS

MURREN, mûr'en, mûrûn (םִין, deboker): This name is given to a fatal cattle-disease, which was the fifth of the plagues of Egypt (Ex 9 3), and which affected not only the flocks and herds, but also the camels, horses and asses. The record of its onset immediately after the plague of flies makes it probable that it was an epizootic, whose germ was carried by that insect as those of rinderpest or spleenic fever may be. Cattle plagues have in recent years been very destructive in Egypt; many writers have given descriptions of the great devastation wrought by the outbreak in 1842. In this case Wittmann noted that contact with the putrid carcasses caused severe boils, a condition also recorded in Ex as following the murrain. The very extensive spread of rinderpest within the last few years in many districts of Egypt has not yet been completed (Ex 24 21). It is not improbable, however, that the use of antitoxic serum and the most rigid isolation. The word "murrain" is probably a variant of the Old Fr. morine. It is used as an imprecation by Shakespeare and other Elizabethan writers, and is still applied by herdsmen to several forms of epidemic cattle sickness. Among early writers it was used as well for fatal plagues affecting men; thus Lydgate (1494) speaks of the people "slain by that morcyme."

MUSE, mûz, MUSING, mûz'ing: The word occurs twice in the OT, in the sense of "meditate" (Ps 39 3, hághgh; Ps 143 5, sâph); in the NT once (Lk 3 15, dialogizomai, where RV reads "reasoned").

Mushi, mû'shi (多种形式, mushî): Son of Merari (Ex 6 19; Nu 3 20; 1 Ch 6 19 [Heb 4]; 23 21; 24 26). There is found also the patronymic "Mushites" (Nu 3 33; 26 55).

Literature

1. Its Importance.—That the Hebrews were in ancient times, as they are at the present day, devoted to the study and practice of music is obvious to every reader of the OT. The references to it are numerous, and are frequently of such a nature as to emphasize its importance. They occur not only in the Psalter, where we might expect them, but in the Historical Books and the Prophets, in narratives and in declamations of the loftiest meaning and most intense seriousness. And the conclusion drawn from a cursory glance is confirmed by a closer study.

The place held by music in the OT is unique. Besides poetry, it is the only art that seems to have been cultivated to any extent in ancient Israel. Painting is entirely, sculpture almost entirely, ignored. This may have been due to the prohibition contained in the Second Commandment, but the fidelity with which that was obeyed is remarkable.

From the traces of it extant in the OT, we can infer that the vocabulary of musical terms was far from scanty. This is all the more significant when we consider the condensed and pregnant nature of Heb.

“Song” in our EV represents at least half a dozen words in the original.

The events, occasions, and occupations with which music was associated were extremely varied. It accompanied leave-taking with honored guests (Gen 31:27); it attended a signal triumph over the nation’s enemies (Ex 15:20); and welcomed conquerors returning from victory (Jgs 11:34; 15:18:6). It was employed to exercise an evil spirit (1 Ch 16:10), and to soothe the tempest, and excite the inspiration, of a prophet (2 K 3:18).

The words “Destroy not” in the titles of four of the Ps (of Ps 65:8) most probably are the beginning of a vintage-song, and the markedly rhythmic character of Heb music would indicate that it accompanied and lightened many kinds of work requiring combined and uniform exertion. Processions, as e.g. marriages (1 Macc 9:39) and funerals (2 Ch 35:25), were regulated in a similar way. The Ps bearded “Songs of Degrees” as probably the sacred marches sung by the pious as they journeyed to and from the holy festivals at Jerusalem.

It follows from this that the range of emotion expressed by Heb music was anything but limited. In addition to the passages just quoted, we may mention the jeering songs leveled at Job (Job 30:9). But the music that could be used to interpret or accompany the Ps with any degree of fitness must have been capable of expressing a great variety of moods and feelings. Not only the broadly marked antitheses of joy and sorrow, hope and fear, faith and doubt, but every shade and quality of sentiment are found there. It is hardly possible to suppose that the people who originated all that wealth of emotional utterance should have been without a corresponding ability to invent diversified melodies, or should have been content with the bald and colorless recitative usually attributed to them.

This internal evidence is confirmed by other testimony. The Bab tyrants demanded one of the famous songs of Zion from their Jewish captives (Ps 137:3), and among the presents sent by Hezekiah to Sennacherib there were included male and female musicians. In later times Lat writers attest the influence of the East in matters musical. We need only refer to Juvenal iii.62 ff.

By far the most important evidence of the value attached to music by the Hebrews is afforded by the place given to it in Divine service.

5. Place in Divine Service

It is true that nothing is said of it in not perhaps atoned for by the tradition (Wisd 18:9) that at the first paschal celebration “the fathers already led the sacred songs of praise,” but the rest of the history makes ample amends. In later days, at all events, music formed an essential part of the national worship of Jehovah; and elaborate arrangements were made for its correct and impressive performance. These are detailed in 1 Ch. 16. There we are told that the whole body of the temple chorus and orchestra numbered 4,000; that they were trained and conducted, in 24 divisions, by the sons of Asaph, Heman and Jeduthun; and that in each group experts and novices were combined, so that the former preserved the correct tradition, and the latter were trained and fitted to take their place.

This is, no doubt, a description of the arrangements that were carried out in the Second Temple, but it sheds a reflex, if somewhat uncertain, light on those adopted in the First.

We are told by the same authority that every reformation of religion brought with it a reconstruction of the temple chorus and orchestra, and a resumption of their duties. Thus when Hezekiah purged the state and church of the heathenism patronized by Ahaz, he set the Levites in the house of Jeh with cymbals, with psalteries, and with harps" (2 Ch 29 25).

6, 12; cf also 1 Ch 15 19–21). The former has been taken to mean "in the manner of maidens," i.e. soprano; the latter "on the lower octave," i.e. tenor or bass. This is plausible, but it is far from convincing. It is hardly probable that the Hebrews had anticipated our modern division of the scale; and the word sh'minith or "eighth" may refer to the number of the mode, while 'Alamoth is also t4 "with Elamite instruments" (Wellhausen). Of one feature of Heb music we may be tolerably sure:
it was rendered in unison. It was destitute of harmony or counterpoint. For its effect it would depend on contrast in quality of tone, on the participation of a larger or smaller number of singers, on antiphonal singing, so clearly indicated in many of the Pss, and on the coloring imparted by the

The same thing took place under Josiah (2 Ch 34).
After the restoration—at the dedication of the Temple (Ezr 3 10) and of the walls of Jerus (Neh 12 17)—music played a great part. In Nehemiah's time the descendants of the ancient choral gilds drew together, and their maintenance was secured to them out of the public funds in return for their services.

II. Musical Theory.—It is disappointing after all this to have to confess that of the nature of Heb music we have no real knowledge. If

1. Dearth of any system of notation ever existed, Technical it has been entirely lost. Attempts Information have been made to derive one from the accents, and a German organist once wrote a book on the subject. One tune in our hymnals has been borrowed from that source, but it is an accident, if not worse, and the ingenuity of the German organist was quite misdirected. We know nothing of the scales, or tonal system of the Heb, of their intervals or of their method of tuning their instruments. Two terms are supposed by some to refer to pitch, viz. "upon," or "set to 'Alamoth," (Ps 46), and "upon," or "set to the Sh'minith" (Pss

2. Not unimpressive—Music, more than any other of the live arts, is justified of her own children, and a generation that has slowly learned to enjoy Wagner and Strauss should not rashly condemn the music of the East. No doubt the strains that emanated from the orchestra and chorus of the temple stimulated the religious fervor, and satisfied the aesthetic principles of the Hebrews of old, precisely as the rendering of Bach and Handel excites and soothes the Christian of today.

III. Instruments.—The musical instruments employed by the Hebrews included representatives of the three groups: string, wind, and percussion.
The strings comprised the הֶבֶן, kinnor, הַנָּבֶל or הַנָּבֶל, nēhel or nebel; the winds: the שָׁפֶר, šophar, הֶרֶץ, kerem, הַחָצְרָה, hāzērāh, הָלָע, hālē, and בּוּשֵׁה, 'ágābhah; percussion: סָפ, tsoph, מַדְדַגָּיִם, madagāyim, כֵּלַחיָּים, kēlāchāyim, מַדְלֶנִיִּים, madlnīyim, שַׁדִּילְתִים, šādīlātim. Besides these, we have in Dúl: מַטַּרְעוּּת, mṭatarūyat; מַשְׁרַקְתִּיוּת, mšarqātīyot; מַסָּבְבִיָּה, masavбиya; מַסְפַּרְנִיִּים, maspnāyim; פָּנָפַיָּה, panpāyeh. Further, there are Chaldaean forms of kerem and kithāra.

A punishment for sin the sound of the kinnor will cease.

(2) Materials.—We have no exact information as to the materials of which these instruments were made. In 2 S 6 5 AV, mention is made of "instruments made of fir wood" (ERV "cypress"), but the text is probably corrupt, and the reading in 1 Ch 13 8 is preferable. According to 1 K 10 11 f, Hiram's fleet brought from Ophir quantities of "almājāh (2 Ch 2 8; 9 10, "alpīn") wood, from which, among other things, the kinnor and nebel were made. Probably this was red sandal-wood.

Procession of Assyrian Musicians.

(Ros-Relief from Kooyunjik, Brit. Mus.)

(1) When used.—The chief of these instruments were the kinnor and nebel (AV, RV "the harp" and "the psaltery" or "viola"). They were used to accompany vocal music. In 1 S 10 5, Saul meets a band of prophets singing inspired strains to the music of the nebel, "trum," "flute," and kinnor. In the description of the removal of the ark, we are told that songs were sung with kinnorāh, nēhelāh, etc (2 S 6 5). Again, in various passages (1 Ch 16 16; 2 Ch 7 6, etc) we meet with the expression kēlē shēr, i.e. instruments of, or suitable for accompanying song. It is evident that only the flute and strings could render melodies. The music performed on these instruments seems to have been mainly of a joyful nature. It entered into all public and domestic festivities. In Ps 61 2, the kinnor is called "pleasant," and Isa 24 8 speaks of the "joy" of the kinnor. Very striking is the invocation Ps 108 2: the poet in a moment of exhaliration calls upon the two kēlē shēr to echo and share his enthusiasm for Jah. Only once (Isa 16 11) is the kinnor associated with mourning, and Cheyne infers from this passage "that the kinnor was used at mourning ceremonies." But the inference is doubtful; the prophet is merely drawing a comparison between the trembling of the strings of the lyre and the agitation in his own bosom. Again, the Bab captives hang their kinnorāh on the willows in their dejection (Ps 137 2), and the prophets (Isa 54 8; Ezek 26 13) threaten that as Jos (Ant, VIII, iii) includes among articles made by Solomon for the temple nēhelāh and kinnorāh of cedrēm. Whether we understand this to have been the mixed metal so named or amber, the frame of the instrument could not have been constructed of it. It may have been used for ornamentation. We have no trace of metal strings being used by the ancients. The strings of the Heb (mēānim) may have consisted of gut. We read of sheep-gut being employed for the purpose in the Odyssey, xxi. 407. Vegetable fiber was also spun into strings. We need only add that bowed instruments were quite unknown; the strings were plucked with the fingers, or struck with a plectrum.

(a) The kinnor: The OT gives us no clue to the form or nature of the kinnor, except that it was portable, comparatively light, and could be played while it was carried in processions or dances. The earliest authority to which we can refer on the subject is the LXX. While in some of the books kinnor is rendered by kinnāra, or kinnīra—evidently a transliteration—in others it is teb by kēthāra. We cannot discuss here the question of the trustworthiness of the LXX as an authority for Heb antiquities, but considering the conservatism of the East, esp. in matters of ritual, it seems at least hasty to say offhand, as Wellhausen does, that by the date of its production the whole tradition of ancient music had been lost. The tr. at all events, supplies us with an instrument of which the Hebrews could hardly have been ignorant. The kithara, which in its general outlines resembled the lyre, consisted of a rectilinear-shaped sound box from which rose two arms, connected above by a crossbar; the strings ran down from the latter to the sound-box to which, or to a bridge on which, they were attached.

The most ancient copy of a kithara in Egypt was found in a grave of the XIIth Dynasty. It is carried by one of a company of immigrant captive Semites, who holds it close to his breast, striking the strings with a plectrum between his hand, and plucking them with the fingers of the left. The instrument is very primitive; it resembles a schoolboy’s slate with the upper three-fourths of the sound-box cut out of it; but it nevertheless possesses the distinctive characteristics of the kithara. In a grave at Thebes of a somewhat later date, three player-like depicted, one of whom plays a kithara, also primitive in form, but with slenderer arms. Gradually, as time advanced, the simple board-like frame assumed a shape more like that afterward elaborated by the Greeks. Numerous examples have been found in Asia Minor, but from them we derive the sound-box. It may be noted that, in the Assyrian monuments, the kithara is played along with the harp, as the kinnor was with the nebel.

The evidence furnished by Jewish coins must not be overlooked. Those stamped with representations of lyre-shaped instruments have been assigned to 142–135 B.C. (D). On one side we have a kithara-like instrument of 3 or more strings, with a sound-box resembling a kettle. It is true that these coins are not of the form of the instruments shown on them has obviously been modified by Gr taste, but so completely that the Jews would hardly be likely to adopt an essentially foreign object for their coinage.

One objection raised by Wellhausen to the identification of the kithara with the kinnor may be noted. Jos undoubtedly says (4 M. vii. xii) that the kinnor was played with a plectrum, and in I Sam. 18:23 David plays the kinnor "with his hand." But even if this excludes the use of the plectrum in the particular case, it need not be held to disprove the identity of kinnor and kinnura. Both methods may have been in use. In paintings discovered at Herculanum there are several instances of the lyre being played with the hand; and there is no reason for supposing that the Hebrews were restricted to one method of showing their skill, when we know that Greeks and Latins were not.

Since the ancient VSS, then, render kinnor by kithara, and the kithara, though subsequently developed and beautified by the Greeks, was originally a Sem instrument, it is exceedingly probable, as Ries says, that the kithara and the kinnor were the same instrument. The kithara, as a smaller and simpler form of the latter instrument. The stringed instruments on the Jewish coins are later, beautified forms of the kinnor, while the Egyptian modifications represent the intermediate stage.

(b) The nebel. The nebel has been identified with many instruments. The literal meaning of the word, "wine-skin," has suggested that it was the bagpipe. Others have thought that it was the lute. Support for reference to the Egyptian nfr, which denotes a lute-like instrument frequently depicted on the monuments. The derivation of nfr from nfr is, however, now abandoned; and no long-necked instrument has been found depicted in the possession of a Semite. The kisser was favored by Pfeiffer. Its resonance-box is made of wood, and, the upper side, being covered tightly by a skin, closely resembles a drum. From this rise two arms, connected toward the top by a crossbar; and to the latter the strings were attached. The kisser has, however, only 5 strings, as opposed to 12 ascribed by Jos to the nebel, and the sound-box, instead of being above, as stated by the Fathers, is situated below the strings.

The supposition that the nebel was a dulcimer is not without some justification. The dulcimer was well known in the East. An extremely interesting and important bas-relief in the palace at Kouyunjik represents a company of 25 musicians, of whom 11 are instrumentalists and 15 singers. The process is headed by 5 men, 3 carrying harps, one a double flute, and one a dulcimer. Two of the harpists and the dulcimer-player appear to be dancing or skipping. Then follow 6 women; 4 have harps, one a double flute, and one a small drum which is fixed upright at the belt, and is played with the fingers of both hands. Besides the players, we see 15 singers, 9 being children, who clap their hands to mark the rhythm.

One of the women is holding her throat, perhaps to produce the shrill vibrato affected by Pers and Arabian women at the present day. A picture in this picture has been regarded by several Orientalists as the nebel. Wettstein, e.g., says "This instrument can fairly be so designated, if the statement of so many witnesses is correct, that nabbim and psaltery are one and the same thing. For the latter corresponds to the Arab. santr, which is derived from the Heb 'panit'en, a transliteration of the Gr psaltery." And the santr is a kind of dulcimer.

This is not conclusive. The word psaltery was not always restricted to a particular instrument, but sometimes embraced a whole class of stringed instruments. Ovid also regarded the nabbim as a harp, not a dulcimer, when he said (Ars Am. iii.325): "Learn to sweep the pleasant nabbim with both hands." And, lastly, Jos tells us (Ant. vii. xii) that the nebel was played without a plectrum. The tr of nebel by psaltery does not, therefore, shut us up to the conclusion that it was a dulcimer; on the contrary, it rather leads to the belief that it was a harp.

Harpes of various sizes are very numerous on the Egyptian monuments. There is the large and elaborate kind with a well-developed sound-box, the tr nebel also as an instrument, at its base. This could not be the nebel, which, as we have seen, was easily portable. Besides, we have a variety of smaller instruments that, while light and easily carried, would scarcely have been sonorous enough for the work assigned us the nebel in the temple services. Besides, the more we learn of the relations of Egypt and Israel, the more clearly do we perceive how little the latter was influenced by the former. But the evidence of the Fathers, which need not be disregarded in a matter of this kind, is decisive against Egypt harps of every shape and size. These have without exception the sound-box at the base, and Augustine (on Ps 43) says expressly that the psaltery had its sound-box above. This is confirmed by statements of Jerome, Isidore, and others, who contrast two classes of instruments according to the position above or below the sound-box. Jerome, further, likens the nebel to the Gr a.

All the evidence points to the nebel having been the Assyrian harp, of which we have numerous examples in the ruins. We have already referred at length to the bas-relief at Kouyunjik in which it is played by 3 men and 4 women. It is portable, triangular, or, roughly, delta-shaped; it has a sound-box above that slants upward away from the player, and a horizontal bar to which the strings are attached about three-fourths of their length down. The number of the strings on the Assyrian harp ranges from 16 upward, but there may quite well have been fewer in some cases. The dulcimer, however, does not appear in the plate bearings.

(c) Nebel 'asor. In Ps 33 2; 144 9, "the psaltery of ten strings" is given as the rendering of nebel 'asor; while in Ps 92 3 'asor is tr "instrument of ten strings." No doubt, as we have just said above, there were harps of less and greater compass—the mention of the number of strings in two or three instances does not necessarily imply different kinds of harps.

(d) Gittith. The word gittith is found in the titles of Ps 6, 81, 84. It is a fem. adj. derived from Gath, but its meaning is quite uncertain. It has been explained to denote (i) some Gittite instrument; the Ig on Ps 81 gives 'on the kithara which was brought from Gath'; or (ii) a melody or march popular in Gath. The LXX renders that Jubal was the "father of all such as handle the harp and pipe." The Heb word here tr4 "pipe" is 'ughabb. It occurs in 3 other places:

2. Winds  Job 21 12; 30 31; Ps 160 4. In the Heb version of Dn 3 5 it is given as the rendering of *sarr*Mhe, i.e. "bagpipe." Jerome tr4 by organon. The 'ughabb was probably a primitive shepherd's pipe or panpipe, though some take it as a general term for instruments of the flute kind, a meaning that suits all the passages cited.

(2) The haddil.—The haddil is first mentioned in 1 S 10 5, where it is played by members of the band of prophets. It was used (1 K 1 40) at Solomon's accession to the throne; its strains added to the exhalation of convivial parties (Isa 5 12), accompanied worshippers on their joyous march to the sanctuary (Isa 30 29), or, in turn, echoed the feelings of mourners (Jer 48 36). In 1 Macc 3 45, one of the features of the desolation of the temple consisted in the cessation of the sound of the pipe. From this we see that Ewald's assertion that the flute took no part in the music of the temple is incorrect, at least for the Second Temple.

As we should expect from the simplicity of its construction, and the commonness of its material, the flute or pipe was the most ancient and most widely popular of all musical instruments.

Reeds, cane, bone, after ward ivory, were the materials; it was the easiest thing in the world to drill out the center, to pierce a few holes in the end or back, and, for the mouthpiece, to compress the tube at one end. The simple rustic pattern was soon improved upon. Of course, nothing like the modern flute with its complicated mechanism was ever achieved, but, esp. on the Egyptian monuments, a variety of patterns is found. There we see the obliquely held flute, evidently played, like the Arab. nay, by blowing through a very slight parting of the lips against the edge of the orifice of the tube. Besides this, there are double flutes, which, though apparently an advance on the single flute, are very ancient. These double flutes are either of equal or unequal length, and are connected near the mouth by a piece of leather, or enter the frame of the mouthpiece.

Though the flutes of the East and West resembled each other more closely than the strings, it is to the Assyrian monuments that we must turn for the prototypes of the hālīl. The Greeks, as their myths show, regarded Asia Minor as the birthplace of the flute, and no doubt the Hebrews brought it with them from their Assyrian home. In the Kouyunjik bas-relief we see players performing on the double flute. It is apparently furnished with a beaked mouthpiece, like that of the clarinet or flagoonet. We cannot determine whether the Israelites used the flute with a mouthpiece, or one like the nay; and it is futile to guess. It is enough to say that they had opportunities of becoming acquainted with both kinds, and may have adopted both.

(3) ἀλόθ—Ἀλόθ occurs only in the title of Ps 6. The context suggests that it is a musical term, and as we explain ϭχινάθ as a general term for strings, this word may comprehend the wood-winds. RV renders “wind instruments.”

(4) ἁκόκθω.—In Ezk 28:13 AV, RV, νἄγαβὰ is rendered pipes. This tr is supported by Fetis:

the double flute; Ambros: large flutes; and by Jahn: the nay or Arab flute. It is now, however, abandoned, and Jerome’s explanation of ἁκόκθω, means the “setting” of precious stones is generally adopted.

(5) The mashrūkāḥa.—Машрукіта, found in Dn 3:5, etc, is also referred to the wood-winds. The word is derived from šārāk, “to hiss” (cf Isa 5:26, where God hisses to summon the Gentiles).

The LXX translates τύργας, or panpipes, and this is most probably the meaning.

(6) The ἱμπόνγα.—Ἱμπόνγα (in Chald sumponia) is another name for a musical instrument found in Dn(35; etc). It is generally supposed to have been the bagpipe, an instrument that at one time was exceedingly popular, even among highly civilized peoples. Nero is said to have been desirous of renown as a piper.

(7) The shophār keren.—The shophār was a trumpet, curved at the end like a horn (keren), and no doubt originally was a horn. The two words shophār and keren are used synonymously in Josh 6:4-5, where we read shophār ḫa-ḡōḇrām and keren ḫa-ḡōḇrām. With regard to the meaning of ḫa-ḡōḇrām, there is some difference of opinion. RV renders in text “ram’s horn,” in “jubilee.” The former depends on a statement in the Talm that ḫoḡerel is Arab. for “ram’s horn,” but no trace of such a word has been found in Arabic. A suggestion of Pfeiffer’s that ḫoḡerel does not designate the instrument, but the manner of blowing, is advocated by J. Weiss. It gives a good sense in the passages in which ḫoḡerel occurs in connection with shophār or keren. Thus in Josh 6:5, we would tr, “when the priests blow triumph on the horn.”

The shophār was used in early times chiefly, perhaps exclusively, for warlike purposes. It gave the signal “to arms” (Josh 6:41; 1 Sam 13:3; 2 Sam 20:1); warned of the approach of the enemy (Amos 3:6; Ezk 33:6; Jer 4:5; 6:1); was heard throughout a battle (Am 2:2, etc); and sounded the recall (2 Sam 2:28). Afterward it played an important part in connection with religion. It was blown at the proclamation of the Law (Ex 13:15, etc); and at the opening of the Year of Jubilee (Lev 25:9); heralded the approach of the Ark (2 Sam 6:15); hailed a new king (2 Sam 15:10); and is prophetically associated with the Divine judgment and restoration of the chosen people from captivity (Isa 13:5, and often).

(8) The ḫoḡrōth.—We are told (Num 10:26) that Moses was commanded to make two silver trumpets which should serve to summon the people to the door of the tabernacle; give the signal for breaking up the camp; or call to arms. These instruments were the ḫoḡrōth, which differed from the shophār in that they were straight, not curved, were always made of metal, and were only blown by the priests. They are shown on the Arch of Titus and on Jewish coins, and are described by Ios (Ant, III, xii, 6). The latter says: “In length it was not quite a yard. It was composed of a narrow tube somewhat thicker than a flute, widened slightly at the mouth to catch the breath, and ended in the form of a bell, like the common trumpets.”
The principal percussion instrument, the tòph, is represented in EV by "tabret" and "timbrel," two words of different origin. "Tabret" is derived from Arab tambour, the name of a sort of mandolin. "Timbrel" comes from Lat.-Gr. tympanum, through Fr. timbre, a small tambourine. The Arabs of today possess an instrument called the duf, a name that corresponds to the Heb tòph. The duf is a circle of thin wood 11 in. in diameter and 2 in. in depth. Over this is tightly stretched a piece of skin, and in the wood are 5 openings in which thin metal disks are hung loosely; these jingle when the duf is struck by the hand. The tòph probably resembled the duf.

Other drums are shown on the Egyptian and Assyrian monuments. In the Kouyunjik bas-relief the second last performer beats with his hands a small, barrel-like drum fixed at his waist. In the OT the drum is used on festive occasions; it is not mentioned in connection with Divine service. It was generally played by women, and marked the time at dances or processions (Ex 16:20; Jgs 11:34; 1 S 18:6; 1 K 5:4; Ps 150:4). At banquets (Isa 24:8; 30:32; Job 21:12) and at marriages (1 Mac 9:39) it accompanied the kinîdor and nebhel. In solemn processions it was also occasionally played by men.

(2) Mrôllayim, celêltim.—In 1 Ch 15:19 we read that "Heman, Asaph, and Ethan, were appointed, with cymbals of brass to sound aloud." These cymbals are the mrôllayim (in two places celêltim). They were very popular in Egypt. A pair made of copper and silver has been found in a grave in Thebes. They are about 5 in. in diameter and have handles fixed in the center. In the Kouyunjik bas-relief we see cymbals of another pattern. These are conical, and provided with handles.

Cylindrical staves slightly bent at one end were also used in Egypt processions. Villoteau, quoted by J. Weiss, describes a bass-relief in which three musicians are seen of whom one plays the harp, a second the double flute, while a third appears to be marking time by striking two short rods together; this was a method of conducting practised regularly by other ancient nations.

(3) Mâna'ôn—Lastly in 2 S 6:5 we meet with a word that occurs nowhere else, and whose meaning is quite uncertain. AV translates "cornets," RV "castanets," and in "sistras." The mâna'ôn may have been the sistrum, an instrument formed of two thin, longish plates, bent together at the top so as to form an oval frame, and supplied with a handle at the lower end. One or more bars were fixed across this frame, and rings or disks loosely strung on these made a jangling noise when the instrument was shaken. This interpretation is supported by the derivation of the word, the Vulg, and the rabbis.

MUSICAL INSTRUMENTS, mu'zik-al in' strî-o-ments (מִעְזָיָל) שׁיָדְדָה וּשְׁיָדְדֹת; "I got me ... musical instruments, and that of all sorts" (Eccl 2:8). Thus AV and ARV; ERV and ARV "conclude very many." The word occurs only here; the meaning is not certain, but it has nothing to do with music.

MUSICIAN, mu'zik'ian. CHIEF. See ASAPH; MUSIC; PSALMS.

MUSTARD, mu's tard (οιμᾶν, sinâpi) (Mt 13:31; Mk 4:31; Lk 13:19; Mt 17:20; Lk 17:6)). The minuteness of the seed is referred to in all these passages, while in the first three the large size of the herb growing from it is mentioned. In Mt 13:32 it is described as "greater than the herbs, and becometh a tree" (cf Lk 13:19); in Mk 4:32 it "becometh greater than all the herbs, and putteth out great branches." Several varieties of mustard (Arab. khardal) have notably small seed, and under favorable conditions grow in a few months into very tall herbs—10 to 12 ft. The rapid growth of an annual herb to such a height must always be a striking fact. Sinapis nigra, the black mustard, which is cultivated, S. alba, or white mustard, and S. arvensis, or the charlock (all of N.O. Cruciferae), would, any one of them, suit the requirements of the parable; birds readily alight upon their branches to eat the seed (Mt 13:32, etc), not, be it noted, to build their nests, which is nowhere implied.

Among the rabbis a "grain of mustard" was a common expression for anything very minute, which explains Our Lord's phrase, "faith as a grain of mustard seed" (Mt 17:20; Lk 17:6).

The suggestion that the NT references may allude to a tall shrub Saladoada persica, which grows on the southern shores of the Dead Sea, rests solidly upon the fact that this plant is sometimes called abardel by the Arabs, but it has no serious claim to be the sinapis of the Bible.

MUTH-LABBEN, muth-læ'ben (חַלֶּב, muth labben, "death of Ben," or "of the son"; Ps 9, title). See Psalms.

MUTILATION, mű-ti-lā'shen. See Punishments.

MUTTER, mut'er (מָתַר, hâghâh [Isa 8 19; 59 3]): An onomatopoetic word, used of the growling of a lion (Isa 31 4), of the "mourning" of a dove (Isa 38 14), or of the human voice, whether speaking inarticulately (Isa 16 7) or articulately (Ps 37 30, "The mouth of the righteous speaketh of wisdom"); cf Job 27 4; Prov 8 7, etc. Hence it is only the context that can give to hâghâh the meaning "mutter." No such meaning can be gathered from the context of Isa 59 3, and, in fact, the open shamelessness of the sinners seems to be in point. So the verse should be rendered, "Your lips have spoken lies, your tongue uttereth wickedness.

In Isa 8 19 hâghâh describes the tone of voice used by the necromancers in uttering their formulas, "that chrip and that mutter." That this tone was subdued and indistinct is quite probable. See Peck.

MUZZLE, muzl' (חֶסָם, hâsâm; φυσός, phimôdô): According to the Deuteronomic injunction (Dt 25 4), the ox was not to be muzzled while treading the corn, i.e. threshing. The muzzle was a guard placed on the mouth of the ox to prevent them from biting or eating. The threshing ox would have ample opportunity of feeding (cf Hos 10 11). The Deuteronomic injunction is quite in accordance with the humane spirit which inspires it all through. Paul quotes this law in two places (1 Cor 9 9; 1 Tim 5 18) to illustrate his view that the "labourer is worthy of his hire." T. LEWIS

MYNDUS, min'dus (Μύνδος, Mýndos): A city of Asia Minor, situated at the extreme western end of a peninsula jutting into the sea (see Carta). It seems that the city was independent at an early date and that many Jews lived there; for according to 1 Mace 15 23, it was one of the several places to which the Roman senate, in the year 139 BC, sent a letter in their behalf. The place was important only because of the silver mines in its vicinity. The mines were worked from a very early period, even to the Middle Ages, and have therefore given to the place the modern Turkish name, Gumushku, meaning a silver mine.

MYRA, mî'ra (Μυρα, Myra): A city of the ancient country of Lycia about 2½ miles from the coast. Here, according to Acts 27 6, Paul found a corn ship from Alexandria. The city stood upon a hill formed by the openings of two valleys. At an early period Myra was of less importance than was the neighboring city Patara, yet later it became a prominent port for ships from Egypt and Cyprus, and Theodosius 11 made it the capital of the province. It was also famed as the seat of worship of an Asiatic deity whose name is no longer known. St. Nicholas, a bishop and the patron saint of sailors, is said to have been buried in a church on the road between Myra and Andraki, the port. Here an Arab fleet was destroyed in 807. In 898 Haroun al-Rashid, the renowned caliph of Bagdad, took the city, and here Sawwulf landed on his return from Jerus. Demre is the modern name of the ruins of Myra, which are among the most imposing in that part of Asia Minor. The elaborate details of the decoration of the theater are unusually well preserved, and the rock-hewn tombs about the city bear many bas-reliefs and inscriptions of interest. On the road to Andraki the monastery of St. Nicholas may still be seen.

MYRRH, mûr: (1) (מַר or מֶר, mûr; Arab. murr): This substance is mentioned as valuable for its perfume (Ps 45 8; Prov 7 17; Cant 3 6; 4 14), and as one of the constituents of the holy incense (Ex 30 23; see also Cant 4 6; 5 1 13). Mûr is generally identified with the "myrrh" of commerce, the dried gum of a species of balsam (Balsamodendron myrrha). This is a stunted tree growing in Arabia, having a light-gray bark; the gum resin exudes in small tear-like drops which dry to a rich brown or reddish-yellow, brittle substance, with a faint though agreeable smell and a warm, bitter taste. It is still used as medicine (Mt 15 23). On account, however, of the references to "flowing myrrh" (Ex 30 23) and "liquid myrrh" (Cant 5 13), Schweinthurf maintains that mûr was not the dried gum but the liquid balsam of Balsamomendron opobalsamum. See Balsam.

Whichever view is correct, it is probable that the σμαραγδόν, smârângon, of the NT was the same. In Mt 2 11 it is brought by the "Wise men" of the East as an offering to the infant Saviour; in Mt 15 23 it is offered mingled with wine as an anaesthetic to the suffering Redeemer, and in Jn 19 39 a "mixture of myrrh and aloes" is brought by Nicodemus to embalm the sacred body.

(2) (מַר, môt, mûr, akbêt): transliterated "myrph" in Gen 37 25, m "ladanum"; 43 11): The fragrant rain obtained from some species of cistus and called in Arab. lādham, in Lat. ladanum. The cistus or "rock rose" is exceedingly common all over the mountains of Pal (see Botany), the usual varieties being the C. villosus with pink petals, and the C. salviifolius with white petals. No commerce is done now in Pal in this substance as of old (Gen 37:25; 43:11), but it is still gathered from various species of cistus, esp. C. creticus in the Gr Isles, where it is collected by threshing the plants by a kind of flail from which the sticky mass is scraped off with a knife and rolled into small black balls. In Cyprus at the present time the gum is collected from the beards of the goats that browse on these shrubs, as was done in the days of Herodotus (iii.115).

MYRTLE, mûr't-l (Ct, hâdhaq; μυρρίνα, μυρρίνη [Isa 41:19; 55:13; Neh 8:15; Zec 1:8,10]); also as a name in Hadassah in Est 2:7, the Jewish form of Esther (q.v.): The myrtle, Myrtus communis (N.O. Myrtaceae), is a very common indigenous shrub all over Pal. On the bare hillsides it is a low bush, but under favorable conditions of moisture it attains a considerable height (cf Zec 1:8,10). It has dark green, scented leaves, delicate stary white flowers and dark-colored berries, which are eaten. In ancient times it was sacred to As-tarte. It is mentioned as one of the choice plants of the land (Isa 41:19). "Instead of the thorn shall come up the fir-tree; and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle-tree" (Isa 55:13), is one of the prophetic pictures of God's promised blessings. It was one of the trees used in the Feast of Tabernacles (Neh 8:15); "the branches of thick trees" (q.v.) are interpreted in the Psalm (Suk. 3:4; Yer Suk. 3, 53d) as myrtle boughs; also (id) the "thick trees" of Neh 8:15 as "wild myrtle." Myrtle twigs, particularly those of the broad-leaved variety, together with a palm branch and twigs of willow, are still used in the ritual of the Feast of Tabernacles. For many references to myrtle in Jewish writings see Jeu Enc, IX, 137.

MYSIA, mish'-l-a (Mysia, Musia): A country in the northwestern part of Asia Minor, which formed an important part of the Rom province of Asia. Though its boundaries were always vague, it may be said to have extended on the N. to the Sea of Marmora, on the E. to Bithynia and Phrygia, on the S. to Lydia, and on the W. to the Hellespont. According to some authors it included the Troad. Its history is chiefly that of its important cities, of which Assos, Troas, and Adrianopull on the border of Lydia, are mentioned in the NT. When Mysia became a part of the Rom province of Asia...
MYSTERY, mis' tér-i (μυστήριον, mysterion; from μυστήριον, "to initiate," one initiated into the mysteries); "initiate," "to initiate," "to close the lips or the eyes; stem μυς, a sound produced with closed lips; of Lat mutus, "dumb"); Its usual modern meaning (=something in itself obscure or incomprehensible, difficult or impossible to understand) does not con- trary to the fact that they were withheld from the light of healthy publicity.

The religion of the OT has no Mysteries of the above type. The rituals of Israel, both public and private, were open to the whole people, partook, through the representatives the priests. 2. In the OT and the Apoc the mysteries of a kind. The Gr word μυστήριον occurs in the LXX of the OT only in Dan, where it is found several times as the tr of ἦτορ, ṿepe, "a secret," in reference to the king's dream, the meaning of which was revealed to Daniel (2 18.19-27.30.47).

In the Apoc, μυστήριον is still used in the sense of "a secret" (a meaning practically confined to the LXX in the NT). Gr: (a) the secret or divine wisdom; the secret is the wisdom of Israel. The secret is the knowledge of Israel. The Apoc is the knowledge of Israel. 3. In the NT the word occurs 27 or (if we include the doubtful reading in 1 Cor. 2 1) 29 t.; chiefly in Paul (2 Cor. 4 1) and similar places, but also in passages reported by each of the synoptists, 4 t. In Rev. It bears its ancient sense of a revealed secret, not its modern sense of that which cannot be fathomed or comprehended.

3. In the NT the word occurs 27 or (if we include the doubtful reading in 1 Cor. 2 1) 29 t.; chiefly in Paul (2 Cor. 4 1) and similar places, but also in passages reported by each of the synoptists, 4 t. In Rev. It bears its ancient sense of a revealed secret, not its modern sense of that which cannot be fathomed or comprehended. It is a reference to a symbol, allegory, or parable, which conceals its meaning from those who look only at the literal sense, but is the medium of revelation to those who have the key to its interpretation (of the rabbinic use of ἱππαζεῖν, ὀνόματι, and ὧθος, "the hidden or mystic sense"). This meaning appears in Rev 1 20; 17 5 ,7; probably also in Eph 5 32, where meaning, by what the "mystery" is or a symbol to be allegorically interpreted of Christ and His church. It also seems implied in the only passage in which the word is attributed to Our Lord, "unto you is given the mystery of the kingdom of God: but unto them that are without, all things are done in parables" (Mt 13 11; cf Mt 13 11; Lk 8 10). Here parables are spoken of as a veil or symbolic form of utterance which concealed the truth from those without the kingdom, but revealed it to those who had the key to its inner meaning (cf Mt 13 35; Jn 16 19). (2) By far the most common meaning in the NT is that which is so characteristic of Paul, viz. a Divine truth once hidden, but now revealed in the gospel. Rom 16 25 I might almost be taken as an definition of it, "According to my gospel and the preaching of Jesus Christ, according to the revelation of the mystery which hath been kept in silence through times eternal, but now is manifested" (cf Col 1 26; Eph 3 3 f). (a) It should be noted how closely "mystery" is associated with "revelation" (Eph 1 19) as well as with words of similar import, e.g. "to make known" (Eph 1 9; 3 3.5.10; 6 19), "to manifest" (Col 4 3 4; Rom 16 26; 1 Tim 3 16), "mystery" and "revelation" are in fact correlative and almost synonymous. The implication of the word "mystery" is that there are revealed doctrines, in contrast to the wisdom of worldly philosophy (see esp. 1 Cor 2 1-16; cf Mt 11 25); the point of contrast being, not that the latter is comprehensible while the former are obscure, but that the latter is the product of intellectual research, while the former are the result of Divine revelation and are spiritually discerned. (b) From this it follows that Christianity has no secret doctrines, for what was once hidden has now been revealed. But here arises a seeming contradiction. On the one hand, there are passages which seem to imply a doctrine of reserve. The mystery referred to in some only seems to be still concealed from others. The doctrines of Christ and of His Kingdom are hidden from the worldly wise and the prudent (Mt 11 25; 1 Cor 2 6 ff), and from all who are outside the kingdom (Mt 13 11 ff and ), and there are truths withheld even from Christians while in an elementary stage of development (1 Cor 3 1-15). On the other hand, there are many passages in which the truths of revelation are said to be freely and unrestrainedly communicated to all (e.g. Mt 10 27; 28 19; Acts 20 20 27; 2 Cor 3 12 f; Eph 3 9, "all men"; 6 19; Col 1 25; 1 Tim 2 4). The explanation is that the communication is limited, not by any secrecy in the gospel message itself or any reserve on the part of the speaker, but by the receptive capacity of the hearer. In the case of the carnally-minded, moral obtuseness or worldly blindness makes them blind to the light which shines on them (2 Cor 4 3-4). In the ease of the "babe in Christ," the apparent reserve is due merely to the pedagogical principle of adapting the teaching to the progressive receptiveness of the disciple (Jn 16 12). There is no esoteric doctrine or intentional reserve in the NT. The strong language in Mt 13 11-15 is due to the Heb mode of speech by which an actual result is stated as if it were purposive. (c) What, then, is the content of the Christian "mystery"? In the broadest sense it is the whole world-embracing purpose of redemption and the preaching of Jesus Christ (e.g. Rom 16 25; Eph 6 19; Col 2 1 Tim 3 9). In a special sense it is applied to some specific doctrine or aspect of the gospel, such as the doctrine of the Incarnation (1 Tim 3 16), of the indwelling of Christ as the pledge of immortality (Col 1 27), of the temporary unbelief of the Jews to be followed by their final restoration (Rom 11 25), of the transformation of the saints who will live to see the face of the Lord (1 Cor 13). The content is that of the inclusion of the Gentiles in the gospel salvation (Eph 3 3-6). These are the Divine secrets now at last disclosed. In direct antithesis to the Divine mystery is the "mystery of lawlessness" (2 Thess 2 7) culminating in the coming of the Antichrist. He "causes to abound in lawlessness" (2 Thess 2 7), makes secret, only in this case the revelation belongs to the future (ver 8), though the evil forces which are to bring about its consummation are already silently operative. (Besides the references in this paragraph, the word occurs in 1 Cor 4 13; 15 2; 14 2; Rev 10 7). It is interesting to note that the Vulg sometimes renders mustērion by Lat sacramentum, viz. in Eph 1 9; 3 3.9; 6 32; 1 Tim 3 16; Rev 1 20. This rendering in Eph 5 32 led to the ecclesiastical doctrine that marriage is a "sacrament."

The question is now frequently discussed, how far the NT (and esp. Paul) betrays the influence of the heathen mystery-cults. Hatch revives the theory that the use of the word mustērion is dependent on the pagan Mysteries (and in this he is followed by Anrich, who declares that the attempt to trace an allusion to the mysteries in Paul's writings is an unsuccessful; but Lightfoot admits a verbal dependence on the pagan Mysteries (Comm. on Col 1 26). At present there is a strong tendency to attribute to Paul far more dependence on one of these secret societies, and to find in the Mysteries the key to the non-Jewish side of Paulianism. A. Loisy finds affinity to the mystery-religions in Paul's conception of Jesus as a Divine God, holding a place analogous to the deities Mithra, Osiris, and Atar, in the place Paul assigned to the Son of God, to the rite of initiation; and in his transformation of the Lord's Supper into a symbol of mystic participation in the flesh and blood of a celestial being and a guarantee of a share in the blissful Immortality of the risen Saviour. "In its worship as in its belief, Christianity is a re-invention of mystery" (art. in Hibbert Journal, October, 1911). Percy Gardner traces similar analogies to the Mysteries in Paul, though he finds in these analogies, not conscious plagiarisms, but the "parallel working of similar forces" (Rev Gospel Experiences of Paul, op. cit., v. Kirsopp Lake writes, "Christianity has not borrowed from the mystery-religions, because it was always, at least in Europe, a mystery-religion itself" (The Best of Readings, p. 236). On the other hand, Schweitzer wholly denies the hypothesis of the direct influence of the Mysteries on Paul's thought (Geschichte der Paulinischen Forschung). The whole question is sub judice among scholars, and until more evidence is forthcoming from inscriptions, etc., we shall perhaps vainly expect a unanimous verdict. It can hardly be doubted that at least the language of Paul, and perhaps to some extent his thought, is colored by the phraseology current among the cults. Paul had a remarkably sympathetic and receptive mind, by no means closed to influences from the Greek-Roman environment of his day.

Witness his use of illustrations drawn from the athletic festivals, the Greek theater (1 Cor 4 9) and the Roman camp. He must have been constantly exposed to the contamination of the mystic societies of Greek and Roman society and of the Mithra religion; and the chief centers of Paul's activities, e.g. Corinth, Antioch and Ephesus, were headquarters of mystery religions. We are not surprised that he should have borrowed from the vocabulary of the Mysteries, not only the word mustērion, but also, for example, "mystērion, I learned the word" (Heb 12 23, "that he initiated") (Phil 4 19). mystērion, "a secret, hidden, concealed. To be sealed" (Eph 1 13, etc); ἐπιβαλλεται, "Greek, "to be seen" (Eph 1 13, etc); ἥλιος, "perfect, the term applied in the Mysteries to the fully instructed as opposed to novices (1 Cor 2 6-7; Col 1 25, etc) note, however, that the similar use of Greek in Psalms, "eyes-witnesses, 2 Pet 1 16). Further, the secret of Paul's gospel among the Gentiles lay, humanly speaking, in the fact that it teries exercised a great influence on ecclesiastical doctrine and practice, esp. on baptism and the Eucharist (see Hatch, Hibbert Lects, ch x). But in the NT, acts of worship are not as yet regarded as mystic rites. The best we can say is that some NT writers (esp. Paul) make use of expressions and analogies derived from the mystery-religions; but, so far as our present evidence goes, we cannot agree that the pagan cults exercised a central or formative influence on them.

LITERATURE.—There is a large and growing lit. on this subject. Its modern scientific study began with C. A. Lobeck's Apolotheismus (1829). The following recent works may be specially mentioned: Gustav Amich, Das antike Mysterienwesen (1894); G. Wobbern, Religionsgeschichtliche Studien zur Fragc, etc. (1896); E. Hatch, Essays in Bib. Gr (1889) and Hibbert Lects, 1888 (pub. 1890); F. B. Jevons, An Intro to the History of Religion (1890); S. Cer- tham, The Mysteries, Pagan and Christian (1897); H. Reit- genstein, Die hellenistischen Mysterienreligionen (1910); Herzog, The Religious Experience of Paul (1907); R. C. Lake, The Earlier Epp. of Paul (1911); arts. on "Mystery" in The Br, ed 9 (W. M. Ramsey), and ed 11 (L. R. Farnell), EB (A. Jülicher), HDB (A. Stewart), 1-vol HDB (G. G. Findlay), DCG (R. W. Bacon); arts on Apotheosis in Cremer and Grimm-Thayer ST Lexicons; the comms., including J. B. Lightfoot on Col, J. Armitage Robinson on Eph, H. Lietzmann on 1 Cor; 9 arts. in Expository "St. Paul and the Mystery Religions" by Professor H. A. Kennedy (April, 1912, to February, 1913).

N

NAAM, nā'ăm (נָאָם, na'am): A son of Caleb (1 Ch 4 15).

NAAMAH, nā'a-ma (נָאָמָה, na'amah, "pleasant"); Na'am, Na'omah: (1) Daughter of Lamech and Zillah, and sister of Tubal-cain (Gen 4 22; cf Jos, Ant, I, ii, 2). (2) An Ammonitish woman whom Solomon married, and who became the mother of Rehoboam (1 K 14 21; 2 Ch 12 13). According to an addition in LXX following 1 K 12 24, "her name was Naaman, the daughter of Ana [Hanun] son of Na- hash, king of the sons of Ammon" (see Benzinger, Könige, in loc.).

NAAMAH: (1) One of a group of 16 lowland (Shephelah) cities forming part of Judah's inheritance (Josh 16 41). (2) The home of Zophar, one of Job's friends (Job 2 11, etc). See NAAMATHITE.

NAAMAN, nā'a-man (נָאָמָן, na'amən, "pleasantness"); LXX BA, Na'aun, Na'amân; so WH in the NT; TR, Ne'amân: (1) A successful Syrian general, high in the confidence and esteem of the king of Syria, and honored by his fellow-countrymen as their deliverer (2 K 5 1-27). Afflicted with leprosy, he heard from a Hebr slave-maid in his household of the wonder-working powers of an Israelite prophet. Sent by his master with a letter couched in somewhat perverted terms to the king of Israel, he came to Samaria for healing. The king of Israel was filled with suspicion and alarm by the demands of the letter, and rent his clothes; but Elisha the prophet intervened, and sent word to Naaman that he must bathe himself seven times in the Jordan. He at first flared the humiliation and declined the cure; but on the remon- strance of his attendants he yielded and obtained cleansing. At once he returned to Samaria, testi-NAAAMATHITE, nā'a-ma-thit, nā'a-ma-thit, "a dweller in Naaman"; 4 Mē'na'am Bar-λλος, ho Mē'na'amōn basilea): The description of Zophar, one of Job's friends (Job 2 11; 11 1; 20 1, etc). Naamah is too common a place-name to permit of the identification of Zophar's home; LXX renders "king of the Mineans."

NAAMITE, nā'a-mit (נָאָמִית, ha-na'amî, "the Naamite"): A family which traced its descent from Naaman (Nu 26 40). See NAAMAN, (2).

NAARA, nā-ara (נָאָרָה, "a girl"): One of the two wives of Ashshur, father of Toko (1 Ch 4 5).
