On the other hand there is no evidence that there ever was a time when "all they which are in Asia" (AV) turned away from obedience to Paul. Whatever may have been the disloyalty and disobedience of individuals—and this certainly existed; see, e.g., Acts 20:29 f.—yet, certainly the NT does not show that all that were in Asia, the Christian community as a whole, in Ephesus and Miletus and Laodices and Hierapolis and Colossae and other places, repudiated his apostolic authority. If the words "all they which are in Asia" refer to all the Christians from the proconsular province of Asia, who happened to be in Rome at the time of Paul's second imprisonment there, it can easily be understood that they should turn away from him at that testing time. It is impossible to say exactly why they did so; they were friends of the prisoner in the Mamertine, they would be involved in the same imprisonment as had overtaken him, and probably also in the same death penalty.

It is altogether in favor of a reference to Rome, that what is said about Phyleguss and Hermogenes and their turning away from Paul is immediately followed by a reference to Onesiphorus and to his great kindness which he showed, when he sought the apostle out very diligently in Rome. On the whole, therefore, a reference to Rome and to the manner in which these persons, named and unnamed from Asia, had deserted Paul, seems most probable. See PHYLEGUS. JOHN RUTHERFORD

HERMON, hér'mon ( gif7, her'môn; B. 'Ampav, Haermon): The name of the majestic mountain in which the Anti-Lebanon range terminates to the S. (Dt 3:8, etc.). It reaches a height of 9,200 ft. above the sea, and extends some 10 to 20 miles from N. to S. It was called Siryon by the Sidonians (Dt 3:9; cf Ps 29:6), and Senir by the Amorites (Dt 3:9). It is also identified with Sion (Dt 4:48). See SION; SEREN; SION. Sometimes it is called "Mt. Hermon" (Dt 3:8; Josh 11:17; Mic 5:2; etc.); at other times simply "Hermon" (Josh 11:3; Ps 89:12, etc.). Once it is called "Hermons" (gif7, gif7, hermonim). AV mistakenly renders this "the Hermontes" (Ps 42:6). It must be one of the triple summits of the mountain. There are three distinct heads, rising near the middle of the mass, the two higher being toward the E. The eastern declivities are steep and bare; the western slopes are more gradual; and while the upper reaches are barren, the lower are well wooded; and as one descends he passes through fruitful vineyards and orchards, finally entering the rich fields below, in Wady el-Teim. The Aleppo pine, the oak, and the poplar are plentiful. The wolf and the leopard are still to be found on the mountain; and it is the last resort of the brown, or Syrian, bear. Snow lies long on the summits and shoulders of the mountain; and in some of the deeper hollows, esp. to the N., it may be found most of the year.

Mt. Hermon is the source of many blessings to the land over which it so proudly lifts its splendid form. Refreshing breezes blow from its cold heights. Its snows are carried to Damascus and to the towns on the seacoast, where, mingled with the sharab, "drink," they mitigate the heat of the Syrian summer. Great reservoirs in the depths of the mountain, fed by the melting snows, find outlet in the magnificent springs at Hasbeiyeh, Tell el-Kady, and Bamiq, while the dew-clouds of Hermon bring a benediction wherever they are carried (Ps 133:3).

Hermon marked the northern limit of Joshua's victorious campaigns (Josh 13:1, etc.). It was part of the dominion of Og (ver 5), and naturally come under Israelitish influence of the remote and solitary heights must have attracted worshippers from the earliest times; and we cannot doubt that it was a famous sanctuary in far antiquity. Under the highest peak are the ruins of Ksar 'Amr, which may have been an ancient sanctuary of Baal. Qumran speaks of a temple on the summit much frequented by the surrounding peoples; and the remains of many temples of the Rom period have been found on the sides and at the base of the mountain. The sacredness of Hermon may be inferred from the allusion in Ps 69:12 (cf En 6:6; and see also BAAL HERMON).

Some have thought that the scene of the Transfiguration should be sought here; see, however, TRANSFIGURATION, MOUNT OF.

The modern name of Hermon is Jebel eth-Thâlîj, "mount of snow," or Jebel esh-sheikh, "mount of the elder," or "of the chief."

Little Hermon, the name now often applied to the hill between Latrun and Gilboa, possibly the Hill of Moreh, on which is the sanctuary of Neby Daby, has no Bib. authority, and dates only from the Middle Ages.

HERMONITES, hér'mon-ites: In Ps 43:6 AV, where RV reads "Hermonts." See HERMON.

HEROD, her'ud: The name Herod (Herôd, Herōd) is a familiar one in the history of the Jews and of the early Christian church. The name itself signifies "heroic," a name not wholly applicable to the family, which was characterized by craft and knavery rather than by heroism. The forebears of the Herodian family are inseparably connected with the last flickerings of the flame of Judaism, as a national power, before it was forever extinguished in the great Jewish war of rebellion, 70 AD. The history of the Herodian family is not lacking in elements of greatness, but such elements were and in whomsoever found, they were in every case dimmed by the insufferable egotism which disfigured the family, root and branch. Some of the Herodian princes were undeniably talented; but these talents, wrongly used, left no marks for the good of the people of Israel. Of nearly all the kings of the house of Herod it may truly be said that at their death "they went without being deserted," unmissed, unmourned. The entire family history is one of incessant brawls, suspicion, intrigue and shocking immorality. In the baleful and waning light of the rule of the Herodians, Christ lived and died, and under it the foundations of the Christian church were laid.

The Herodians were not of Jewish stock. Herod the Great encouraged the circulation of the legend of the family descent from an illustrious Bab Jew (Ant, XIV, 1, 3), but it has no historic basis. It is true the Idumaens were at the time nominal Jews, since they were subdued by John Hyrcanus in 125 BC, and embodied in the Asmoncean kingdom through an enforced circumcision, but the national antagonism remained (Gen 27:41). The Herodian family sprang from Antipas (d. 78 BC), who was appointed governor of Idumaea by Alexander Jannaeus. His son Antipater, who succeeded him, possessed all the cunning, resourcefulness, and unbridled ambition of his son Herod the Great. He had an open eye for two things—the unconquerable strength of the Roman power and the pitiable weakness of the decadent Asmonean house, and on these two factors he built the house of his hopes. He craftily chose the side of Hyrcanus II in his internecine war with Aristobulus his brother (69 BC), and induced him to seek the aid of the Romans. Together they supported the claims of Pompey and, after the latter’s defeat, they availed themselves of the magnanimity of Caesar to submit to him, after the crushing defeat of Pompey at Pharsalus (48 BC). As a reward, Antipater received the procuratorship of Judaea (47 BC), while his innocent dupe Hyrcanus had to satisfy himself with the high-priesthood. Antipater died by the hand of an assassin (43 BC) and left four sons, Phasael, Herod the Great, Joseph, Pheroras, and a daughter Salome. The second of these sons raised the family to its highest pinnacle of power and in raising the always welcome tribute-money for the Roman government, gained for him additional power at court. His advance became rapid. Antony appointed him “tetrarch” of Judaea in 41 BC, and although he was forced by circumstances temporarily to leave his domain in the hands of the Parthians and of Antigonus, this, in the end, proved a blessing in disguise. In this final spasm of the dying Asmonean house, Antigonus took Judaea by storm, and Phasael, Herod’s oldest brother, fell into his hands. The latter was governor of the city, and foreseeing his fate, he committed suicide by dashing out his brains against the walls of his prison. Antigonus incapacitated his brother Hyrcanus, who was captured at the same time, from ever holding the holy office again by cropping off his ears (Ant, XIV, xiii, 10). Meanwhile, Herod was at Rome, and through the favor of Antony and Augustus he obtained the crown of Judaea in 37 BC. The fond ambition of his heart was now attained, although he had literally to carve out his own empire with the sword. He made quick work of the task, cut his way back into Judaea and took Judaea by storm in 37 BC.

The first act of his reign was the extermination of the Asmonean house, to which Herod himself was related through his marriage with Mariamme, the grandchild of Hyrcanus. Antigonus was slain and with him 45 of his chief adherents. Hyrcanus was recalled from Babylon, to which he had been banished by Antigonus, but the high-priesthood was bestowed on Aristobulus, Herod’s brother-in-law, who, however, soon fell a victim to the suspicion and fear of the king (Ant, XV, iii, 3). These outrages against the purest blood in Judaea turned the love of Mariamme, once cherished for Herod, into a bitter hatred. The Jews, loyal to the dynasty of the Maccabees, accused Herod before the Roman court, but he was summarily acquitted by Antony. Hyrcanus, mutilated and helpless as he was, soon followed Aristobulus in the way of death, 31 BC (Ant, XV, vi, 1). When Antony, who had ever befriended Herod, was conquered by Augustus at Actium (31 BC), Herod quickly turned to the powers that were, and, by subtle flattery and timely support, won the imperial favor. The boundaries of his kingdom were now extended by Rome. And Herod proved equal to the greater task. By a decisive victory over the Arabs, he showed, as he had done in his earlier Galilean government, what manner of man he was, when aroused to action.

Herod had, besides, five other wives (Ant, XVII, i, 3; BJ, i, xvii, 4) and seven other children, who died early, or at least do not figure in history.

glory. Pheroras was nominally his co-regent and, possessed of his father’s cunning, maintained himself to the end, surviving his cruel brother, but he cuts a small figure in the family history. He, as well as his sister Salome, proved an endless source of trouble to Herod by the endless family brawls which they occasioned.

With a different environment and with a different character, Herod the Great might have been worthy of the surname which he now bore only as a tribute of inane flattery. What we know of him, we owe, in the main, to the exhaustive treatment of the subject by Jos in his Antiquities and Jewish War, and from Strabo and Dio Cassius among the classics. We may subsue our little sketch of Herod’s life under the heads of (1) political activity, (2) evidences of talent, and (3) character and domestic life.

1. Political activity.—Antipater had great ambitions for his son. Herod was only a young man when he began his career as governor of Galilee. Jos’ statement, however, that he was only “fifteen years old” (Ant, XIV, ix, 2) is evidently the mistake of some transcriber, because we are told (XVII, viii, 1) that “he continued his life till a very old age.” That was 42 years later, so that Herod at this time must have been at least 25 years old. His activity and success in ridding his dominion of dangerous bands of freebooters, and his still greater success
The Arabsians were wholly crushed, and submitted themselves unconditionally under the power of Herod (Ant, XV, v, 5). Afraid to leave a remain-der of his own dynasty, he sacrificed his own son, Antipater, against his own son by Mariamne, the only human being he ever seems to have loved (28 BC), his mother-in-law Alexandra (Ant, XV, vi, 8), and ultimately, shortly before his death, even his own sons by Mariamne, Alexander and Aristobulus 7 BC (Ant, XVI, xi, 7). In his emulation of the habits and views of life of the Romans, he continually offended and defied his Jewish subjects, by the introduction of Roman sports and heathen temples in his dominion. His ingratitude to all the Jews in regard to their baneful, and slowly a distinct party arose, partly political, partly religious, which called itself the Herodian party, Jews in outward religious forms but Gentiles in their dress and in their whole view of life. They were a bitter offence to the rest of the nation, but were associated with the Pharisees and Sadducees in their opposition to Christ (Mt 22 16; Mk 3 6; 12 13). In vain Herod tried to win over the Jews, by royal charity in time of famine, and by yielding, wherever possible, to their bitter prejudices. They saw in him only a usurper of the throne of David, maintained by the strong arm of the hated Roman oppressor. Innumerable plots were made against his life, but, with almost sublime courage, Herod triumphed (Ant, XV, viii). He robbed his own people that he might give munificent gifts to the Romans; he did not even spare the grave of King David, which was held in almost idolatrous reverence by the people, but rifled it of its treasures (Ant, XV, vii, 1). The last days of Herod were embittered by endless court intrigues and conspiracies, by an almost insanely suspicious on the part of the aged king, and by increasing indications of the restlessness of the nation. Like Augustus himself, Herod was the victim of an incurable and loathsome disease. His temper became more irritable, as the malady made progress, and he made both himself and his court unutterably miserable. The picture drawn by Jos (Ant, XVII) is hideous and tragic in its vividness. In his last will and testament, he remained true to his life-long fawning upon the Roman power (Ant, XVII, vi, 1). So great became his suffering toward the last that he made a fruitless attempt at suicide. But, true to his character, one of the last acts of his life was an order to execute his son Antipater, who had instigated the murder of his half-brothers, Alexander and Aristobulus, and another order to slay, after his death, a number of nobles, who were guilty of a small outbreak at Jesus, whose family were confined in the hippodrome (Ant, XVI, vi, 5). He died in the 37th year of his reign, 34 years after he had captured Jerusalem and slain Antigonus. Jos writes this epitaph: ‘A man he was of great barbarity toward all men equally, and a slave to his passions, but above the consideration of what was right. Yet he was favored by fortune as much as any man ever was, for from a private man he became a king, and though he were encompassed by ten thousand dangers, he got clear of them all and continued his life to a very old age’ (Ant, XVII, viii, 1).

(2) Evidences of talent.—The life of Herod the Great was not a fortuitous chain of favorable accidents. He was unquestionably a man of talent. In a family like that of Antipas and Antipater, talent must necessarily be hereditary, and Herod inherited it more largely than any of his brothers. His whole life exhibits in no small degree statecraft, power of organization, shrewdness. He knew men and he knew how to use them. He enjoyed the friendship of Roman emperors, and had a faculty of convincing the Romans of the righteousness of his cause, in every contingency. In his own dominions he was like Ishmael, his hand against all, and the hand of all against him, and yet he maintained himself in the government for a whole generation. His Galilean gift he employed on the whole generation. His Galilean gift he employed with great determination and great generalship. His Judaean conquest proved the same thing, as did his Arabian war. Herod was a born leader of men. Under a different environment he might have developed into a truly great man, and had his character been coordinate with his gifts, he might have done great things for the Jewish people. But by far the greatest talent of Herod was his singular architectural taste and ability. Here he reminds one of the old Egyptian Pharaohs. Against the laws of Judaism, which he pretended to obey, he built at Jerus a magnificent theater and an amphitheater, of which the ruins remain. The one was within the city, the other outside the walls. Thus he introduced into the artistic sphere of the Jewish life the frivolous spirit of the Greeks and the Romans. To offset this cruel infraction of all the maxims of orthodox Judaism, he tried to placate the nation by rebuilding the temple of Zerubbabel and making it more magnificent than even Solomon's temple had been. This work was accomplished between 19 BC and 11 or 9 BC, although the entire work was not finished till the procuratorship of Albinus, 62-64 AD (Ant, XV, iv, 5, xvi, vii, 1). The temple was so transcendentally beautiful that it ranked among the world's wonders, and Jos does not tire of describing its glories (Bj, V, v). Even Titus sought to spare the building in the final attack on the city (Bj, VI, iv, 5). Besides this, Herod rebuilt and beautified Strato's Tower, which he called after the emperor, Caesar. He spent 12 years in this gigantic work, building a theater and an amphitheater, and above all in achieving the apparently impossible by creating a harbor where there was none before. This was accomplished by constructing a gigantic mole far out into the sea, and so enduring was the work that the remains of it are seen today. The Romans were so appreciative of the work done by Herod that they made Caesarea the capital of the new regime, after the passing away of the Herodian power. Besides this, Herod rebuilt Samaria, to the utter disgust of the Jews, calling it Sebaste. In Jerusalem he built the three great towers, Antonia, Phasaelus and Mariamne, which survived even the catastrophe of the year 70 AD. All over Herod's dominion were found the evidences of this constructive passion. Antipatris was built by him, on the site of the ancient Kapharahaba, as well as the stronghold Phasaelus near Jericho, where he was destined to see so much suffering and ultimately to die. He even reached beyond his own domain to satisfy this building mania at Ascalon, Damascus, Tyre and Sidon, Tripoli, Ptolemais, nay even at Athens and Locasemum. But the universal character of these operations itself occasioned the bitterest hatred against him on the part of the narrow-minded Jews.

(3) Characteristics and domestic life.—The personality of Herod was, in a word, tyrannical. He was possessed of great physical strength. His intellectual powers were far beyond the ordinary; his will was indomitable; he was possessed of great tact, when he saw fit to employ it; in the great crises of his life he was never at a loss what to do; and no one has accused Herod the Great of cowardice. There were in him two distinct individualities, as was the case with Nero. Two powers struggled in him for the mastery, and the lower one at last gained complete control. During the first part of his reign there were evidences of large-heartedness, of great possibilities in the man. But the bitter experiences of his life, the endless whisperings and warnings of his court, the irremediable spirit of the Jews, as well as the consciousness of his own wrongdoing, changed him into a Jewish Nero, a tyrant, who bathed his own house and his own people in blood. The demons of Herod’s life were jealousy of power, and suspicion, its necessary companion.

The unfae incarnation of brute lust, which in turn became the burden of the lives of his children. History tells of few more immoral families than the house of Herod, which by intermarriage of its members so entangled the genealogical tree as to make it a veritable puzzle. As these marriages were nearly all within the line of forbidden consanguinity, under the Jewish law, they still further embittered the people of Israel against the Herodian family.

When Herod came to the throne of Judea, Phasael was dead. Joseph his younger brother had fallen in battle (Ant., Xv, xvi, 10), and only Philetaerus and Salome survived. The first, as we have seen, nominally shared the government with Herod, but was of little consequence and only proved a thorn in the king’s flesh by his endless interference and plotting.

To him were allotted the revenues of the East Jordanic territory. Salome, his sister, was ever neck-deep in the intrigues of the Herodian family, but had the cunning of a fox and succeeded in making Herod believe in her unchangeable loyalty, although the king had killed her son-in-law and her nephew, Aristobulus, his own son. The will of Herod, made shortly before his death, is a convincing proof of his regard for his sister (Ant., XVIII, viii, 1).

Genealogical relations were very unhappy. Of his marriage with Doris and of her son, Antipater, he reaped only misery, the son, as stated above, ultimately falling a victim to his father’s wrath, when the crown, for which he plotted, was practically within his grasp. Herod appears to have been deeply in love with Mariamne, the grandchild of Hyrcanus, in so far as he was capable of such a feeling, but his attitude to the entire Asmonean family and his fixed determination to make an end of it changed whatever love Mariamne had for him into deadly hate, as well as her two sons, full victims to Herod’s insane jealousy of power. Like Nero, however, in a similar situation, Herod felt the keenest remorse after her death.

As his sons grew up, the family tragedy thickened, and the court of Herod became a veritable bed of mutual recriminations, intrigues and catastrophes. The trials and executions of his own conspiring sons were conducted with the acquiescence of the Rom power, for Herod was shrewd enough not to lose his stand, and was particularly pleased when the condition of the Jewish court understood at Rome, that Augustus, after the death of Mariamne’s sons (7 BC), is said to have exclaimed: “I would rather be Herod’s hog than his son.” At the time of his death, the remaining sons were these: Herod, son of Mariamne, Simon’s daughter; Archelaus and Antipas, sons of Malthace, and Herod Philip, son of Cleopatra of Jerus. Alexander and Aristobulus was kind, through the persistent intrigues of Antipater, the eldest son and heir presumptive to the crown, and he himself fell into the grave he had dug for his brothers.

By the final testament of Herod, as ratified by Rome, the kingdom was divided as follows: Archelaus received one-half of the kingdom, with the title of king, really “ethnarch,” governing Judea, Samaria and Idumæa; Antipas was appointed “tetrarch” of Galilee and Perea; Philip, “tetrarch” of Trachonitis, Gaulonitis and Panæas. To Salome, his intriguing sister, he bequeathed Jamnia, Ashdod and Phasaelus, together with 500,000 drachmas of coined silver. All his kindred were liberally provided for in his will, “so as to leave them all in a wealthy condition” (Ant., XVII, viii, 1). In his death he had been better to his family than in his life. He died unmourned and unbeleved by his own people, to pass into history as a name soiled by violence and blood. As the waters of Callirhoe were unable to cleanse his corrupting body, three days were spent in washing away the stains of a tyrant’s name. The only time he is mentioned is in Mt 2 and Lk 1. In Mt he is associated with the wise men of the East, who came to investigate the birth of the “king of the Jews.” Learning their secret, Herod found out from the priests and scribes of the people where the Christ was to be born and ordered the “massacre of the innocents,” with which his name is perhaps more generally associated than with any other act of his life. As Herod died in 4 BC and some time elapsed between the massacre and his death (Mt 2 19), we have here a clue to the approximate fixing of the true date of Christ’s birth. Another, in this same connection, is an eclipse of the moon, the only one mentioned by Jos (Ant., XVII, vi, 4; text and note), which was seen shortly before Herod’s death. This eclipse occurred on March 13, in the year of the Julian Period, 4710, therefore 4 BC.

Herod Antipas was the son of Herod the Great and Malthace, a Samaritan woman. Half Idumæan, half Samaritan, he had therefore not a drop of Jewish blood in his veins, and “Galilee of the Gentiles” seemed a fit dominion for such a prince.

He ruled as “tetrarch” of Galilee (Lk 3 1) from 4 BC till 39 AD. The gospel picture we have of him is far from prepossessing. He is superstitious (Mt 14 11), for he in his cunning (Lk 13 31) and wholly immoral. John the Baptist was brought into his life through an open rebuke of his gross immorality and defiance of the laws of Moses (Lev 18 16), and paid for his courage with his life (Mt 14 10; Ant., XVIII, v, 2).

On the death of his father, although he was younger than his brother Archelaus (Ant., XVII, ix, 4 f.; BJ, II, ii, 3), he contested the will of Herod, who had given to the other the major part of the dominion. Rome, however, sustained the will and assigned to him the “tetrarchy” of Galilee and Perea, as it had been set apart for him by his father. Herod (Ant., XVII, vii, 4) made war with Archelaus and Philip, his half-brother, son of Mariamne, daughter of Simon, he imbibed many of the tastes and graces and far more of the vices of the Romans. His first wife was a daughter of Asa, of the tribe of Judah, but he sent her back to her father at Petra, for the sake of Herodias, the wife of his brother Philip, whom he had met and seduced at Rome. Since the latter was the daughter of Aristobulus, his half-brother, and therefore his niece, and at the same time the wife of another half-brother, the union between her and Antipas was doubly sinful. Aretas repaid this insolence to his daughter by a destructive war (Ad Th Xv 11). He elevated Bithynia to the rank of a city and of course in the place of the deposed queen he set up his own daughter, Eunice over him and wholly dominated his life (Mt 14 3-10). He emulated the example of his father in a mania for erecting buildings and beautifying cities. Thus he built the wall of Sephoris and made the place his capital. He elevated Bethsaida to the rank of a city and of course in the place of the deposed queen he set up his own daughter, Eunice over him and wholly dominated his life (Mt 14 3-10).

Another example of this inherited or cultivated building-mania was the work he did at Betharamphtha, which he called "Julia," after the daughter of Tiberius. He ingeniously proscribed Archelaus, the brother of his subjects was punitively bad (Mt 8 15). If his life was less marked by enormities than his father's, it was only so by reason of its inevitable restrictions. The least glimpse the Gospels afford of him shows him in the final tragedy of the life of Christ. He is then atJerusalem. Pilate in his perplexity had sent the Saviour bound to Herod, and the utter inefficiency and flippancy of the man is revealed in the account the Gospels give us of the incident (Lk 23 12). It was by the courtesy of a Galilean that Herodias prevailed on Herod Antipas to accompany her to Rome to demand a similar favor. The machinations of Agrippa and the accession of Caligula, however, proved his undoing, and he was banished to Lyons in Gaul, where he died in great misery (Ant, XVIII, vii, 2; BJ, II, ix, 6).

Herod Philip was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. At the death of his father he inherited Gaulonitis, Trachonitis and Panas (Ant, XVII, viii, 1). He was apparently utterly unlike the rest of the Herodian family, retiring, dignified, moderate and just. He was also wholly free from the intriguing spirit of his brothers, and it is but fair to suppose that he inherited this totally un-Herodian character and disposition from his mother. He died in the year 34 AD, and his son Antipas (who was three years his junior) succeeded him as his nephew and the son of Aristobulus, together with the tetrarchy of Lyssanias (Ant, XVIII, iv, 6; XIX, v, 1).

Herod Archelaus was the oldest son of Herod the Great by Malthace, the Samaritan. He was a man of violent temper, reminding one a great deal of his father. Educated like all the Herodian princes at Rome, he was the Herodian princes of Rome, he was made heir apparent to his father, the greatest part of the Herodian kingdom fell to his share, with the title of "ethnarch." The will was contested by his brother Antipas before the Roman court. While the matter was being debated by the Roman court, Herod Archelaus incurred the hatred of the Jews by the forcible repercussion of a rebellion, in which some 3,000 people were slain. They therefore opposed his claims at Rome, but Archelaus, in the face of all this opposition, received the Roman support (Ant, XVII, viii, 4). It is very ingeniously suggested that the episode may have been the foundation of the parable of Christ, found in Lk 19 12-27. Archelaus, once invested with the government of Judaea, ruled with a hard hand, so that Judaea and Samaria were both soon in a chronic state of unrest. The two nations, bitterly as they hated each other, became friends in this common cause, in order to complain of the conduct of Archelaus, and this time they were successful. Archelaus was warned by a dream of the coming disaster, whereupon he went at once to Rome to defend himself, but wholly in vain. His government was taken from him, his possessions were all confiscated by the Roman power and he himself was banished to Vienna in Gaul (Ant, XVII, xiii, 2, 3). He, too, displayed some of his father's taste for architecture, in the building of a royal palace in Jericho, named after himself Archelais. He was married first to Mariamne, and after his divorce from her to Glaphyra, who had been the wife of his half-brother Alexander (Ant, XVII, xiii). The only mention made of him in the Gospels is found in Mt 2 22.

6. Herod of Tyre, brought up the line of Agrippa I the Asmonean blood. And it is worthy to note even more that Agrippa preferred against him, however, proved his undoing, and he was banished to Lyons in Gaul, where he died in great misery (Ant, XVIII, vii, 2; BJ, II, ix, 6).

Herod Philip was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem. At the death of his father he inherited Gaulonitis, Trachonitis and Panas (Ant, XVII, viii, 1). He was apparently utterly unlike the rest of the Herodian family, retiring, dignified, moderate and just. He died in the year 34 AD, and his son Antipas (who was three years his junior) succeeded him as his nephew and the son of Aristobulus, together with the tetrarchy of Lyssanias (Ant, XVIII, iv, 6; XIX, v, 1).

Herod Archelaus was the oldest son of Herod the Great by Malthace, the Samaritan. He was a man of violent temper, reminding one a great deal of his father. Educated like all the Herodian princes at Rome, he was made heir apparent to his father, the greatest part of the Herodian kingdom fell to his share, with the title of "ethnarch." The will was contested by his brother Antipas before the Roman court. While the matter was being debated by the Roman court, Herod Archelaus incurred the hatred of the Jews by the forcible repercussion of a rebellion, in which some 3,000 people were slain. They therefore opposed his claims at Rome, but Archelaus, in the face of all this opposition, received the Roman support (Ant, XVII, viii, 4). It is very ingeniously suggested that the episode may have been the foundation of the parable of Christ, found in Lk 19 12-27. Archelaus, once invested with the government of Judaea, ruled with a hard hand, so that Judaea and Samaria were both soon in a chronic state of unrest. The two nations, bitterly as they hated each other, became friends in this common cause, in order to complain of the conduct of Archelaus, and this time they were successful. Archelaus was warned by a dream of the coming disaster, whereupon he went at once to Rome to defend himself, but wholly in vain. His government was taken from him, his possessions were all confiscated by the Roman power and he himself was banished to Vienna in Gaul (Ant, XVII, xiii, 2, 3). He, too, displayed some of his father's taste for architecture, in the building of a royal palace in Jericho, named after himself Archelais. He was married first to Mariamne, and after his divorce from her to Glaphyra, who had been the wife of his half-brother Alexander (Ant, XVII, xiii). The only mention made of him in the Gospels is found in Mt 2 22.

Of Herod, son of Herod the Great and Mariamne, Simon's daughter, we know nothing except that he married Herodias, the daughter of his dead half-brother Aristobulus. He is called Philip in the NT (Mt 20 23), and it was from him that Antipas derived from Herodias away. Herod's history is wholly unknown, as well as that of Herod, the brother of Philip the tetrarch, and the oldest son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra of Jerusalem.

Two members of a Herodian family are named Agrippa. They are of the line of Aristobulus, who through Mariamne, granddaughter of Antipas, of Lyssanias, and the grandson of Herod the Great and Mariamne. Educated at Rome with Claudius (Ant, XVIII, vii, 1), he was possessed of great shrewdness and tact. Returning to Judaea for a little while, he came back to Rome in 37 AD. He hated his uncle Antipas and left no stone unturned to hurt his cause. His mind was far-seeing, and he cultivated, as his grandfather had done, every means that might lead to his own promotion. He, therefore, made fast friends with Caligula, Agrippa's half-brother, and was made king of the tetrarchy of Galilee and Perea. He then crowned himself with the title of king, and his rather outspoken advocacy of the latter's claims led to his imprisonment by Tiberius. This proved the making of his fortune, for Caligula did not forget him, but immediately on his accession to the throne, liberate Agrippa and bestowed on him, who up to that time had been merely a private citizen, the "tetrarchies" of Philip, his uncle, and of Lyssianias, with the title of king, although he did not come into the possession of the latter till two more years had gone by (Ant, XVIII, vi, 10). The foolish ambition of Herod Antipas led to his undoing, and the emperor, who had heeded the accusation of Agrippa against his uncle, bestowed on him the additional territory of Galilee and Perea in 39 AD. Agrippa kept in close touch with the imperial government, and when, on the assassination of Caligula, the imperial crown was offered to the indifferent Claudius, it fell to the lot of Agrippa to lead the latter to accept the proffered honor. This led to further imperial favors and further extension of his territory, Judaea and Samaria being added to his domain, 30 AD. The fondest dreams of Agrippa had now been realized, his father's fate was avenged and the old Herodian power had been restored to its old seat. He ruled with great munificence and was very tactful in his contact with the Jews. With this end in view, several years before, he had moved Caligula to recall the command of erecting an imperial statue in the city of Jerusalem; and when he was forced to take sides in the struggle between Judaism and the nascent Christian sect, he did so in a moment, but assumed the rôle of his bitter persecutor, slaying James the apologist with the sword and harrying the church whenever possible (Acts 12).

He died, in the full flush of his power, of a death, which, in its harrowing details received the fatality of fate (Acts 12 20–23; Ant. XIX, vii, 2). Of the four children he left (Bd. II, xi, 6), three are known to history—Herod Agrippa II, king of Calchis, Bernice of immoral celebrity, who consorted with her own brother, the prince of human and Divine law, and became a byword even among the heathen (Juv. Sat. vi.150–60), and Drusilla, the wife of the Roman governor Felix (Acts 24 24). According to tradition the latter perished in the eruption of Vesuvius in 79 AD, together with her son Agrippa. With Herod Agrippa I, the Herodian power had virtually run its course.

Herod Agrippa II was the son of Herod Agrippa I and Cypros. When his father died in 44 AD he was a youth of only 17 years and consequently too young to govern the country.

7. Herod Agrippa II

The Herodian government sought the place under the care of a procurator. Agrippa had received a royal education in the palace of the emperor himself (Ant. XX, ii, 1). But by his father he had gotten his people, as is proven by his intercession in behalf of the Jews, when they asked to be permitted to have the custody of the official high-priestly robes, till then in the hands of the Romans and used only on stated occasions (Ant. XX, i, 1). On the death of his uncle, Herod of Calchis, Claudius made Agrippa II “tetrarch” of the territory, 48 AD (Bd. II, xii, 1; XIV, v; Ant. XX, v, 2). As Jos tells us, he espoused the cause of the Jews whenever he could (Ant. XX, vi, 2). Four years later (52 AD), Claudius extended the dominion of Agrippa by giving him the old “tetrarchies” of Philip and Lysanias. Even at Calchis they had called him king; now it became his official title (Ant. XX, vii, 1). Still later (55 AD), Nero added some Galilean and Peraean cities to his domain. His whole career indicates the predominating influence of the Asmonean blood, which had shown itself in his father’s career also. If the Herodian taste for architecture reveals itself there and there (Ant. XX, vii, 11; IX, iv), there is a total absence of the cold disdain with which the Herodians in general treated their subjects. The Agrippas are Jews.

Herod Agrippa II figures in the NT in Acts 25 13; 26 32. Paul there calls him “king” and appeals to him as to one knowing the Scriptures. As the brother-in-law of Felix he was a favored guest on this occasion. His relation to Bernice his sister was a scandal among Jews and Gentiles alike (Ant. XX, vii, 3). In the fall of the Jewish nation, Herod Agrippa’s kingdom went down. Knowing the futility of resistance, Agrippa warned the Jews not to rebel against Rome, but in vain (Bd. II, xvi, 2–5; XVII, iv; XVIII, ix, XIX, iii). When the war began he boldly sided with Rome and fought under its banner, getting wounded by a sling-stone in the siege of Gamala (Bd. IV, i, 3). The oration by which he sought to persuade the Jews against the rebellion is a masterpiece of its kind and became historical (Bd. II, xvi). When the inevitable came and the whole Jewish nation fell into the hands of the king of Herod Agrippa II had been destroyed, the Romans remembered his loyalty. With Bernice his sister he removed to Rome, where he became a praetor and died in the year 100 AD, at the age of 70 years, in the beginning of Trajan’s reign.

HERODIANS, hερό′διανοι (Hρσδιανοι, Hερό-δiανοι): A party twice mentioned in the Gospels (Mt 22 16; Mk 12 13; 3 6) as acting with the Pharisees in opposition to Jesus. They were not a religious sect, but, as the name implies, a court or political party, supporters of the dynasty of Herod. Nothing is known of them beyond what the Gospels state. Whatever their political aims, they early perceived that Christ’s pure and spiritual teaching was not in harmony with the kingdom of God and was intolerable to all these, and that Christ’s influence with the people was antagonistic to their interests. Hence, in Galilee, on the occasion of the healing of the man with the withered hand, they readily joined with the more powerful party of the Pharisees in plots to crush Jesus (Mk 3 6); and again, in Jerusalem, in the last week of Christ’s life, they renewed this alliance in the attempt to entrap Jesus on the question of the tribute money (Mt 22 16). The warning of Jesus to His disciples to “beware of the leaven of Herod” (Mk 8 15) may have referred to the insidious spirit of this party.

HERODIAS, hερό′δια (Hρσδια, Hερό-δια): The woman who compassed the death of John the Baptist. According to Antipas’ wife (Mk 6 14 12; Mk 6 14–29; cf also Lk 3 19.20; 9 7–9). According to the Gospel records, Herodias had previously been married to Philip, but had deserted him for his brother Herod the tetrarch. For this Herod was reproved by John (cf Lev 18 16; 20 21), and Herod, therefore, to please Herodias, bound him and cast him into prison. According to Mt 14 5 he would even then have put John to death, but “feared the multitude,” which regarded John as a prophet. But Mk 6 19 relates it was Herodias who esp. desired the death of John, but that she was withstood by Herod whose conscience was not altogether dead. This latter explanation is more in harmony with the sequel. At Herod’s birthday feast, Herodias induced her daughter Salome, whose dancing had so charmed the tetrarch, to as ask her reward the head of John the Baptist on a charger. This was given her and she then brought it to her mother.

Herodias was daughter of Aristobulus, son of Herod the Great, by Mariamne, daughter of Hyrcanus. Her second husband (cf above) was Herod Antipas, tetrarch of Galilee and Peraea (c 4–39 AD), son of Herod the Great by Malthace. Herod Antipas was thus the step-brother of Aristobulus, father of Herodias. Regarding the first husband of Herodias, to whom she bore Salome, some hold that the Gospel accounts are at variance with that of Jos. In Mt 14 3; Mk 6 17; Lk 3 19, he is called Philip the brother of Herod (Ant. XVII, vii). But in Mt 3 and Lk 3 19 the name Philip is omitted by certain important MSS. According to Jos, he was Herod, son of Herod the Great by Mariamne daughter of Simon the high priest, and was thus a step-brother of Herod Antipas (cf Jos. Ant. XVIII, vi, 4). It is suggested in explanation of the discrepancy (1) that Herod, son of Mariamne, bore a second name Philip, or (2) that there is confusion in the Gospels with Herod-Philip, tetrarch of Trachonitis, who was the son of Herod the Great and Cleopatra, and who was in the kingdom of Jewish nation that was known as Herodias (cf also A. B. Bruce, Epitome Gr Test., I, 381; A. C. Headlam, art. “Herodii” in HDB, II, 359, 360). According to Jos (Ant. VIII, vii, 2; XVII, vii, 1) the ambition of Herodias proved the ruin of Herod Antipas. Being jealous of the power of Agrippa her brother, she induced Herod to demand of Caligula the title of king. This was refused through the machinations of Agrippa, and Herod was banished. But the pride of Herodias kept her still faithful to her husband in his misfortune.

HERODION, her-ô'di-on (Hêrodiōn; WH Ἡροδίων): A Roman Christian to whom Paul sent greetings (Rom 16:11). The name seems to imply that he was a freedman of the Herods, or a member of the household of Aristobulus, the grandson of Herod the Great (ver 10). Paul calls him "my kinsman," i.e. "a Jew" (see Junias, 1).

HERON, her'ôn (τὰ θηριά, 'anaplhâ; χαραδρός; Lat Ardea cinerea): Herons are mentioned only in the abomination lists of Lev 11:19 (in "ibis") and Dt 14:18. They are near relatives of crane, stork, ibis and bittern. These birds, blue, white or brown, swarmed in Europe and wintered around Merom, along the Jordan, at the headwaters of the Jabbok and along its marshy bed in the dry season. Herons of Southern Africa that summered in the Holy Land loved to nest on the banks of Merom, and raise their young among the bulrushes, papyrus, reeds and water grasses, although it is their usual habit to build in large trees. The white herons were small, the blue, larger, and the brown, close to the same size. The blue were 3½ ft. in length, and had a 5½ ft. sweep. The beak, neck and legs constituted two-thirds of the length of the body, which is small, lean and bony, taking its appearance of size from its long loosely feathered. Moses no doubt forbade these birds as an article of diet, because they ate fish and in older specimens would be tough, dark and evil-smelling. The very poor of our western and southeastern coast states eat them.

HESED, he'zed, SON OF. See Ben-hesed.

HESHON, hesh'bon (חֶשְוָן, hesḥôn; 'Ereṣhôv; Hesbôn): The royal city of Sihon King of the Amorites, taken and occupied by the Israelites under Moses (Nu 21:25 f., etc.). It lay on the southern border of Gad (Josh 13:26), and was one of the cities fortified by Reuben (Nu 32:37). It is reckoned among the cities of Gad given to the Merarite Levites (Josh 21:39). In later lit. (Isa 15:4; 16:8 f; Jer 48:23-45; 49:3) it is referred to as a city of Moab. It passed again into Jewish hands, and is mentioned by Jos (Ant. XIII, xv, 4) as among their possessions in the country of Moab under Alexander Jannaeus. The city, with its district called Hesebonitis, was also under the jurisdiction of Herod the Great (Ant. XV, vii, 5, where it is described as lying in the Peraea). Onom places it 20 Roman miles from the Jordan. It is represented by the modern Hesbân, a ruined site in the mountains over against Jericho, about 16 miles E. of the Jordan. It stands on the edge of Wady Hesbân in a position of great strength, about 600 ft. above 'Ain Hesbân. The ruins, dating mainly from Roman times, spread over two hills, respectively 2,930 ft. and 2,984 ft. in height. There are remains of a temple overlooked from the W. by those of a castle. There is also a large ruined reservoir; while the spring in the valley forms a succession of pools (Cant 7:4). The city is approached from the valley by a steep path passing through a cutting in the rock, which may have been closed by a gate (Conder, Heth and Moab, 142). On a hill to the W., el-Kurmiyyeh, is a collection of dolmens and stone circles (Musil, Arabia Petraea, I, 383 ff.).

HESMON, hes'mon (חָשְׁמִון, hesh'môn): An unidentified place on the border of Judah toward Edom (Josh 15:27). This may have been the original home of the Hasmoneans.

HETH, hâth (הֶת): The eighth letter of the Heb alphabet; transliterated in this Encyclopaedia as h (guttural h). It came also to be used for the number 8. For name, etc., see Alphabet.

HETH, heth (הֵת, heth): In Gen 23:10 the ancestor of the Hittites. As the various peoples who occupied Canaan were thought to belong to one stock, Gen 10:15 (1 Ch 1:13) makes Heth the (22) son of Canaan. In Gen 23 the "sons of Heth" occupy Hebron, but they were known to have come there from the north. A reference to this seems to be preserved in the order of the names in Gen 10:15,16, where Heth is placed between Sidon and the Jebusites. See Hittites.

HETHLON, heth'lon (חֶתְלוֹן, hethôn; Pesh hetrôn): Name of a place associated with Zedad on the ideal northern boundary of Israel, as given in Ezk 47:15 and 48:1, but at least in Nu 3:8, while the LXX evidently transcribed the text it had. In accordance with the opinion they hold as to the boundary line of Northern Israel, van Kasteren and Buhl seek to identify Hethlon with Atlan on the river Oenomiyeh. Much more in harmony with the line of the other border towns given is its identification with Heilata to the N.E. of Tripoli. The "way of Hethlon" would then coincide with the Eleutherus valley, between Homs and the Mediterranean, through which the railway now runs, and to this identification the LXX seems to give testimony, indicating some path of "desert" from the Band a.

HEWER, hê'ër (חֵיֶר, hôtêh): Applies esp. to a wood-worker or wood-gatherer (of Arab. hattib, "a woodman") (Josh 9:21,23,27; 2 Ch 2:10; Jer 46:22). Gathering wood, like drawing water, was a menial task. Special servants were assigned to the work (Dt 29:11). Joshua set the Gibeonites to hewing wood and drawing water as a punishment for their trickery, whereas it was not for the oath which the Israelites had sworn, the Gibeonites would probably have been killed. See Drawer of Water.
HEZEREKH, hez-e-ki (יהزة, ‘hizkia). See HIZEK.

HEZEKIAH, hez-e-ka (`Hizkiah'), hiṣ’hāyā):
(1) King of Judah. See special art.
(2) A son of Neziah, of the royal family of Judah (1 Chron 3:18, RV “Hizkiah”).
(3) An ancestor of Zephaniah (Zeph 1:1, AV “Hizkiah”).
(4) One of the returned exiles from Babylon (Ezra 2:16; Neh 7:21).

HEZEKIAH (`Hizkiah'), hiṣ’hāyāh, “Jeh has strengthened”; also written `Hizkiah, ḥiṣ’hāyāh, “Jeh has strengthened him”; Ezechias, Hezekia: One of the greatest of the kings of Judah; reigned (according to the most self-consistent chronology) from c 715 to c 680 BC.

On the OT standard of loyalty to Jeh he is eulogized by Jesus Sirach as one of the three kings who alone did not “commit trespass” (Sir 49:4), the other two being David and Josiah. The Chronicler represents him (2 Chron 29:1) as a king who “clavè to Jeh” (2 Kings 18:6) that the Heb mind sums up his royal and personal character.

I. Sources for His Life and Times.—The historical accounts in 2 Kings 18-20:29 are derived in the main from the

1. Scripture source annals, though the latter seems Annals also to have had the Temple archives to draw upon. For “the rest of his acts,” 2 Kings refers to a source then still in existence, but now lost, “the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah” (2 Kings 20:20), and 2 Chronicles to “the vision of Isaiah the prophet the son of Amoz, in the book of the kings of Judah and Israel” (2 Kings 20:20).

In this last-mentioned source (if this is the original of our Book I Kings) there is other information, called out by the course of the history, there is a narrative section (Isa 36-39) recounting the Sennacherib crisis much as do the other histories, but incorporating also a passage of Jaina prophecy (37:22-32) and a “writing of Hezekiah king of Judah” (38:10-20).

Lastly, in Sir 48:17-25, there is a summary of the good and wise deeds of Hezekiah, drawn from the accounts that we already have.

Of these sources the account in 2 Kings is most purely annalistic, originating at a time when religious and political values, in the Heb mind, were inseparable. In 2 Chronicles the religious coloring, esp. in its later developed annalistic, and legal aspects, have of course been decided on. Sirach, with the mind of a man of letters, is concerned mainly with eulogizing H. in his “praise of famous men” (cf Sir 44:60), from the viewpoint of the Heb. However, we have the reflection of the moral and spiritual situation in Jesus, as realized in the fervid prophetic consciousness; and in the prophecy of his younger contemporary Micah, the state of things in the outlying country districts nearest the path of invasion, where both the iniquities of the ruling classes and the horrors of war were felt most keenly. Doubtless also many devotional echoes of these times of stress are deducible from the Psalms, so far as we can fairly identify them.

It is in Hezekiah’s times esp. that the Assyrian inscriptions become illuminating for the history of Israel; for one important thing they furnish certain fixed dates to which the chronology of the OT can be adjusted. Of Sennacherib’s campaign of 701, for instance, no fewer than six accounts are at present known (see G. A. Smith, Jerus, II, 154, n.), the most detailed being the “Taylor Cylinder,” now in the British Museum, which in the main agrees, or at least is not inconsistent, with the Scripture history.

II. Events of His Reign.—From his weak and unprincipled father Ahaz (cf 2 Chron 28:16-20), Hezekiah inherited not only a disorganized realm but a grievous burden of Assyrian dominion and tribute, and the constant peril and suspense of greater encroachments from that arrogant and arbitrary power: the state of things foretold in Isa 7:20; 8:7f. The situation was aggravated by the fact that not only the nation’s weakness but its spiritual propensities had incurred it: the dominant classes were aping the sentiments, fashions and cultus of the East (cf Isa 2:6-8), while the neglected common people were exposed to the corruptions of the state from the wisdom of piety only by his vainglory in revealing the resources of his realm to the envows of Merodach-baladan. In 2 Kings 18:5, the earliest estimate, his special distinction, beyond all other Judaean kings, before or after, was that he “trusted in Jehovah, the God of Israel.”
Hezekiah's opportunity to rise against Assyrian domination seems to have been taken about 704.

How so pious a king came to do it in spite of Isaiah's strenuous warnings, both against opposition to Assyria and alliance with other powers, is not very clear. The present writer ventures to suggest the view that the beginning was forced or perhaps sprung upon him by his princes and nobles. In the year before, Sargon, dying, had left his throne to Sennacherib, and, as at all ancient changes of sovereignty, this was the signal for a general effort for independence on the part of subject provinces. That was also the year of Heze-

kah's deadly illness (2 K 20; Isa 38), when for a time we know not how long he would be incapacitated for active administration of affairs. Not unlikely on his recovery he found his realm committed beyond withdrawal to an alliance with Egypt and perhaps the leadership of a coalition with Philistia, in which case personally he could only make the best of the situation. There was nothing for it but to confirm this coalition by force, which he did in his Phil campaign mentioned in 2 K 18. Meanwhile, in the same general uprising, the Chaldaean Merodach-baladan, who had already been expelled from Babylon after an 11-year reign (721-710), again seized that throne; and in due time envoys from him appeared in Jerusalem, ostensibly to congratulate the king on his recovery from his illness, but really to secure his aid and alliance against Assyria (2 K 20 12-15; Isa 39 1-4). Hezekiah, flattered by such distinguished attention from so distant and powerful a source, by revealing his resources committed what the Chronicler calls the one impious indiscretion of his life (2 Ch 32 31), incurring also Isaiah's reproof and adverse prediction (2 K 20 17 1; Isa 39 6 1). The conflict with Sennacherib was now inevitable; and Hezekiah, by turning the water supply of Jerusalem from the Gihon spring to a pool within the walls and closing it from without, put the capital in readiness to stand a siege. The faith evoked by this wise work, confirmed by the subsequent deliverance, is reflected in Ps 66. This inciting of a hazardous war, however, with its turmoils and treacheries, and the presence of uncouth Arab mercenaries, was little to the king's desire or disposition, seems indicated in Ps 120, which with the other Songs of Degrees (Pss 120-134) may well reflect the religious faith of this period of Hezekiah's life.

The critical moment came in 701, when Sennacherib, who the year before had reconquered Babylon and expelled Merodach-

THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA

The spirit of this unspirited state of things furnishes the best keynote of Hezekiah's reforms in religion, which according to the Chronicler he set about as soon as he came to the throne (2 Ch 29 3). It is the(std. März 1951) who gives the fullest account of these reforms (2 Ch 29-31); naturally, from his priestly point of view and access to ecclesiastical archives. Hezekiah began with the most pressing constructive need, the opening and cleansing of the Temple, which his father Ahaz had closed and deserted (2 Ch 29 24), and went on to the reorganization of its liturgical and choral service. In connection with this work he appointed a Passover observance, which, on a scale and spirit unknown since Solomon (2 Ch 30 26), he designed as a religious reunion of the devout of all Israel, open not only to Jerus and Judah, but to all who would accept his invitation from Samaria, Galilee, and beyond the Jordan (2 Ch 30 5-12 18). The immediate result of the enthusiasm engendered by this Old Home Week was a vigorous popular movement of iconoclasm against the idolatrous high places of the land. That this was not a fanatical impulse to break something, but a touch of real spiritual quickening, seems evidenced by one incident of it: the breaking up of Moses' old brazen serpent and calling it what it had come to mean, w'hekol, "a piece of brass" (2 K 18 4); the movement seems in fact to have had in it the sense, however quaint, that old religious forms had become hurtful and effete superstitions, hindering spirituality. Nor could the movement stop with the old fetish. With it went the demolition of the high places themselves and the breaking down of the pillars (medubba) and falling of the sacred groves ('ashèrâh), main symbols of a debasing nature-cult. This reform, on account of later reactions (see under MANASSEH), has been deemed ineffective; rather, its effects were inward and germinal; nor were they less outwardly than could reasonably be expected, before its meanings were more deepened and centralized.

All this, on the king's part, was his response to the spiritual influence of Isaiah, with whose mind his first great reform was in one. As a devout disciple in the school of prophetic ideas, he earnestly desired to maintain the prophet's insistent attidude of "quietness and confidence" (cf Isa 30 15). The words of Judah. It was, of course, almost negative in its nature, of abstaining from revolt and entangling alliances with foreign powers. This, however, in the stress and suspense of the times, did not preclude a quiet preparation for emergencies; and doubtless the early years of his reign were notable, not only for mild and just administration throughout his realm, but for measures looking to the fortifying and defence of the capital. His work of repairing and extending the walls and of strengthening the citadel (Millo), as mentioned in 2 Ch 32 5, had probably been in progress long before the Assyrian crisis was imminent. Nor was he backward in coming to an understanding with other nations, as to the outlook for revolt against Assyria. He could not learn his lesson of faith all at once, esp. with a factious court pulling the other way. He did not escape the suspicion of Sargon (d. 705), who for his Egypt leanings counted him among the "plot-ers of secession" (cf COT 100); while the increasing prosperity and strength of his realm marked him for a leading role in an eventual uprising. He weathered at least one chance of rebellion, however, in 711, probably through the strenuous exertions of Isaiah (see Isa 20 1 ff).

through the coast lands, he speedily subdued the Phili cities, defeating them and their southern allies (whether these were from Egypt proper or from its extension across the Sinai peninsula and Northern Arabia, Mu'ri, is not quite clear) at Eltekeh; in which campaign, according to his inscription, he took 46 walled towns besides his spoil and deported over 200,000 of their inhabitants. This, which left Jerus a blockaded town (in fact he says of Hezekiah: "Himself I shut up like a bird in a cage" [Jer 32 17-19]), seems referred to in Ps 7 9 (cf. Isa 6 11 f.). Its immediate effect was to bring Hezekiah to terms and extort an enormous tribute (2 K 18 14-16). When later, however, he was treacherous enough to disregard the compact thus implied (perhaps Isa ch 33 refers to this), and demanded the surrender of the city (2 K 18 17-19 7; Isa 36 2-37 7), Hezekiah besought the counsel of Isaiah, who bade him refuse the demand, and predicted that Sennacherib would "hear tidings" and return to his own land; which prediction actually came to pass, and suddenly Hezekiah found himself free. A deliverance so great, and so signalizing the forthputting of faith, could not but produce a momentous revulsion in the nation's mind, like a new spiritual birth in which the whole of the "rebirth" idea, took power in Israel; its immediate effect seems portrayed in Ps 124 and perhaps Ps 126, and its deep significance as the birth of a nation in a day seems summarized long afterward in Isa 66 7-9; cf 37 3; 2 K 19 35.

A second summons to surrender, sent from Libnah by letter (2 K 19 1 ff; Isa 37 8 ff), is treated by the Scripture historians as a later feature of the same campaign; but recent research seems to make it possible, nay probable, that this belonged to another campaign of Sennacherib, when Taharkas of Ethiopia (Tērakāh, 2 K 19 9; Isa 37 9) came to power in Egypt, in 681. If this was so, there is room in Hezekiah's latter years for a decade of peace and prosperity (of Ch 32 22-23.27-30), and in Isaiah's old age for a collection and revision of his so wonderfully vindi cated prophecies. The historians' evident union of the two stories on one narrative line, which this crisis was, makes his task, obscure; but the tone of confirmed confidence and courage seems decidedly higher. The discontinuity of Sennacherib in this case was brought about, not by a rumor of rebellions at home, as in 2 K, but by an actual defeat (2 K 19 35 f.; Isa 36 f.), which event the Scripture writers interpreted as a miracle. The prophetic sign of deliverance (2 K 19 29; Isa 37 30) may be referred to the recovery of the devastated lands from the ravage inflicted by Sennacherib in his first campaign (cf also Ps 126 5 f).

III. His Character.—Our estimate of Hezekiah's character is most consistently made by regarding him as a disciple of Isaiah, who was earnestly minded to carry out his prophetic ideas. As, however, these were to begin with only the initial ideas of a spiritual "remnant," the king's sympathies must needs be identified at heart, not with his imperious nobles and princes, but with a minority of the common people, whose religious faith did not become a recognizable influence in the state until after 701. In the meantime his zeal for purer worship and juster domestic administration, which made him virtually king of the remnant, made him a wise and sagacious prince over the whole realm. Isaiah's gift of prophecy, as it were a Mesianic projection of the saner and clearer-seeing era that his domestic policy adumbrated — a time when king and nobles rule in righteousness, when man can lean on man, when things good and evil are seen as they are and called by their right names. When it came to dealing with the foreign situation, however, esp. according to the I saianic program, his task was exceedingly difficult, as it were a pioneer venture in faith. His effort to maintain an attitude of steadfast trust in Jeh, with the devout quietism which, though bad in itself, looked like a supine passivity, would lead his rest lessly scheming nobles to regard him as a pious weakening; and not improbably they came to deem him almost a negligible quantity, and forced his hand into diplomacy and coalitions that were foreign to his mind. Some such insolent attitude of theirs seems to be portrayed in Isa 28 14-22. This was rendered all the more feasible, perhaps, by the period of incapacitation that must have attended his illness, in the very midst of the nation's critical affairs. Isaiah's words (33 17 ff) may be an allusion at once to his essential kingship, to the abey ance of its manifestation due to his disease, and to the constricted condition into which, meanwhile, the realm had fallen. This exceedingly critical episode of Hezekiah's career does not seem to have had its rights with students of the era. Considering the trials that his patient faith must have had, always at cross-purposes with his nobles (cf Ps 130 6 f); that now by and by became a heartening example to his people; that his illness seemed to augur the very perpetuity of the Davidean dynasty, we have reason for regarding him as well-nigh a martyr to the new spiritual uprise of faith which Isaiah was laboring to bring about. In the Mesianic ideal which, in Isaiah's sublime conception, was rising into personal form, it fell to his lot to adumbrate the first kingly stage, the stage of committal to Jeh's word and will and abiding the event. It was a cardinal element in that composite ideal which the Second Isaiah puts to its ultimate in his portrayal of the servant of Jeh; another element, the element of sacrifice, has yet to be added. Meanwhile, as with the king so with his remnant-realm, the new venture of faith, the new appreciation of spiritual vitality, or, as the prophet calls it, a new heart (cf Isa 66 17 f.; 37 3; 66 7 f, for the stages of it). The event of deliverance, not by men's policies but by Jeh's miraculous hand, was the speedy vindication of such trust (2 K 20 19); the next decade witnessed a confirming and solidifying of spiritual integrity in the remnant which made it a factor to be reckoned with in the trying times that succeeded (see under MANASSEH). The date of Hezekiah's death (probably not long after 890) is not certainly known; nor of the death of his mentor Isaiah (tradition puts this by martyrdom under Manasseh); but if our view of his closing years is correct, the king's death crowned a consistent character of strength and spiritual steadfastness; while the unsurpassable greatness of Isaiah speaks for itself.

IV. Reflection of His Age in Literature.—The sublime and mature utterances of Isaiah alone, falling in this time, are sufficient evidence that in Hezekiah's age, Israel reached its golden literary prime. Among the idealists and thinkers throughout the nation a new spiritual vigor and insight were awaked. Of their fellowship was the king himself, who even in life continued to regard Solomon as patron of piety and letters. The compilation of the later Solomonic section of the Proverbs (Prov 26-29), attributed to the "men of Hezekiah," indicates the value attached to the accumulations of the so-called Wisdom literature; and it is fair to assume that these men of Hezekiah did not stop with compiling, but stamped upon the body of Proverbs as a whole that sense of it as a philosophy of which it is an integral part. But it is impossible to determine just when, or how, this addition came to be included. It is possible that it was added at a later date, perhaps at the time of Manasseh (2 K 21 16), when the Solomonic influence had again been introduced into the court. It may well be, as one of the historians of the monarchical period says, that the kings of Judah, who made such a practice of adding to the sacred books of their ancestors, may have added this one, as an introduction to the next section, which is the History of the Reign of Hezekiah (2 K 23 18-20), a section that is quite different in spirit from the preceding. It is possible that the men of Hezekiah may have added the section as a way of introducing the new philosophy of God's kingdom, which is the subject of the next section.

HEZEKIAH'S SICKNESS. See Dial of Ahaz.

HEZEKIAH, THE MEN OF: A body of men of letters to whom is ascribed the compilation of a supplementary collection of Solomonic proverbs (Prov 25 1). See Proverbs, Book Of, II, 5; Hezekiah, 1, 2.

HEZION, hê'zîön (יהזון, hezôn; LXX B, Ἀθήνα, A, Ἀθηνᾶ, Αθηνᾶ): An ancestor of Ben-hadad, king of Syria (1 K 15 18).

HEZIB, hê'zîb: (1) (יהזיב, hēzib; LXX B, Χεζέβ, Chēzēb, A, Ἡζῆβ, Ἡζήβ): A Levite in the time of David (1 Ch 24 15). (2) (LXX Ἡζίβ, Ἡζῆβ): A chief of the people in the time of Nehemiah (Neh 10 20).

HEZRO, hez'ro, HEZRAI, hez'ra'i, hez'ri (יהזֵר, hezôr; LXX 2 S 23 35; 1 Ch 11 37, but the Kērē of 2 S 23 35 is הָצַר hezray. The ancient VSS almost unanimously support the form Hezra): A Carmelite, i.e. an inhabitant of Carmel. See Carmelite. One of David’s thirty “mighty men.”

HEZRON, hê'zrôn (יהזָרְון, hezôrôn, and הָצַר, hez'ar; LXX Ἀσπόπος, Aspōn): (1) A son of Reuben (Gen 46 9; Ex 6 14), and head of the family of the Hezronites (Nu 26 6). (2) A son of Perez, and grandson of Judah (Gen 46 12; Nu 26 21; 1 Ch 2 5 9 18 21 24 25; 4 1), a direct ancestor of David (Ruth 4 18 f). He appears also in the genealogy of Our Lord (οἶκος, Οἰκός) (Mt 1 3; Lk 3 33).

HEZRONITES, hê'zrôn-its (יהזָרְיִים and הָצַריים, ha-hez'ronî, LXX ᾿Ασπόπωλεῖ, ho Aspōneî): The name of the descendants of Hezron the son of Reuben (Nu 26 6), and of the descendants of Hezron the son of Perez (26 21).

HIDDAL, hid'dâl, hi-dâl (הִידַל, hîddal): Alex. ‘Aḥa‘el, Hahath: One of David’s thirty “mighty men” (2 S 23 30), described as “of the brooks of Gaash.” In the §§ in 1 Ch 11 32 the form of the name is “Hurai” (יהוּרָי, hūray).

HIDDEKEL, hid'dè-kel (הִדֶּקֶל, hiddekel): One of the rivers of Eden (q.v.) (Gen 2 14, RVm “that is, Tigris”; so LXX Tigras, Tigris), said to flow E. to Assyria, usually identified with the Tigris, which rises in Armenia near Lake Van and, after flowing S.E. through 8 degrees of latitude, joins the Euphrates in Babylonia to form the Shatt el’Arab, which runs for 100 miles through a delta which has been formed since the time of Abraham, and now enters the Pers Gulf through 2 branches. About one-third of the distance below its source, and soon after it emerges from the mountains of Kurdistan, the Tigris passes by Mosul, the site of ancient Nineveh, and, lower down at Bagdad, approaches within a few miles of the Euphrates. Here and for many miles below, since the level is lower

HIEL, hi'el (חיאל, ἱείλ; ’Αχιλλ, Achil): A Bethelite who according to 1 K 16:34 rebuilt Jericho, and in fulfillment of a curse pronounced by Joshua (Josh 6:26) sacrificed his two sons. This seems to have been a custom prevalent among primitive peoples, the purpose being to ward off ill luck from the inhabitants, esp. in a case where the destructive fire had involved a man who was resigned to rebuild. Numerous instances are brought to light in the excavations of Gezer (Macalister, Bible Side-Lights from the Mound of Gezer, ch x). At first the very best was claimed as a gift to the deity—e.g., his own sons; then some less valuable member of the community. When civilization prevented human sacrifice, animals were offered instead. The story of Abraham offering Isaac may be a trace of this old custom, the tenor of the story implying that at the time of the writing of the record, the custom was coming to be in disrepute. A similar instance is the offering of his eldest son by the king of Edom to appease the deity and win success in battle (2 K 3:27; cf Mic 6:7). Various conjectures have been made as to the identity of this king. Ewald regarded him as a man of wealth and enterprise (unternehmender reicher Mann); Cheyne following Niebuhr makes it Jehu in disguise, putting 1 K 16:34 after 2 K 10:33; Winckler explains as folklore. HIERAPOLIS, hi'-er-ap'ö-liß (Ἱέραπολις, Hier-ápolis, “sacred city”): As the name implies, Hierapolis was a holy city. It was situated 6 miles from Laodicea and twice that distance from Colossae, on the road from Nardis to Apameia. Though it is history is not well known, it seems to have been of Lydian origin, and once bore the name of Kydra. The Phrygian god Sabazios was worshipped there under the name Ezekhidon, and represented by the symbol of the serpent. Other local deities were Leto and her son Arimenes. Though called the holy city, Hierapolis was peculiarly regarded as the stronghold of Satan, for there was a Plutonium, or a hole reaching far down into the earth, from which smoke issued at times. RV “Why, fewer times are not hidden from the Almighty?” m “Why are the laying laid up by the Almighty?” m as AV with “Why is it?” prefixed; Ps 83:3, “They consulted [RV “consult’it”] against thy hidden ones” (Sanctum); or magpāntum (from gaphan), “hidden things or places” (Ob 2:6, “How are his hidden things sought out?” RV “treasures,” ARV “sought out”); of παλάτ, “to be wonderful,” “difficult” (Dt 30:11, “This commandment . . . is not hidden from thee,” RV “too hard for thee,” m “or wonderful”); or ἰδέας, ἱθαπαν, “to hide one’s self” (Prov 28:12, RV “When the wicked arise, men hide themselves,” m “Heb must be searched for”); of κρυπτός, “hidden,” “secret” (1 Pet 3:4, “the hidden man of the heart”); 1 Cor 4:5, krupton, “the hidden things of darkness” (2 Cor 4:2, “the hidden things of the world”); RV “of Apollo the wise.” (Ps. 36:9, “Ecclesiastes 12:10”); “to make a place” and “to make any word is hidden from him.” (Ps. 37:9, “Ecclesiastes 12:10”); “to make a place” and “to make any word is hidden from him.”

HIERIEH, hi'-er-i'é-el (Ἱερείθη, Hierithel): 1 Ead 9:21. In Exr 8:9 the name is Jehiel.

HIERIELUS, hi'-er-i-lús (Ἰερείλος, Ierielos). See JEREILUS.

HIREMOTH, hi'-er'em'-oth (Ἱερεμόθ, Jeremoth): (1) 1 Ead 9:27 = Jeremoth (Exr 10:26). (2) 1 Ead 9:30 = Jeremoth (Exr 10:29, m “and Ramoth”).

HIRMAS, hi'-úrmäs (Ἱερμᾶς, Hiermas): 1 Ead 9:26, corresponding to Ramiah in Exr 10:25.

HIGGAION, hi'-gá'yôn, hi'-gá'on (חִ֣גְיָ֔ון, higgya'ôn), higgya’ôn: The meaning of this word is uncertain. Two interpretations are possible: the one based on an allied Arab, root gives “a deep vibrating sound,” the other derived from the Gr VSS of Ps 9:16, where we read kiggayón Șelah, takes it to mean an instrumental interlude. See Psalms.

HIGH DAY: Is found in Gen 29:7 as a rendering of the Heb יַבָּ֖ה, yom gādol, lit., “great day.” The Heb means the day at its height, broad daylight, as contrasted with the time for getting the cattle to their sheds for the night (cf Fr. grand jour). In Jn 19:31, "highday" renders μεγάλης

The term "high" is used in the Bible to denote elevated places, both natural and human-made. The word is used in reference to places of worship, altars, and the physical world of mountains and hills.

The Highest, hî'st (חֵם, 'elyon, [C]hî'st, hupesitos): The term "'elyon," used frequently of God and commonly tr. HIGHMINDED, hî'mind-ed: In modern usage denotes elevation of mind in a good sense, but formerly it was used to denote upliftedness in a bad sense, pride, arrogance. It is the tr. of ἑυπελαπρόνεο, "to be highminded," "proud,

"haughty." (Rom 11:20, "Be not highminded, but fear." 1 Tim 6:17, "Charge them that are rich... that they be not highminded"); of tuphô, "to wrap in mist or smoke," "to wrap in conceit, to make proud," etc. (2 Tim 3:4, "Traitors, heady, highminded," RV "puffed up"); of 1 Tim 3:6; 8:4) "No one can be highminded without thinking better of himself, and worse of others, than he ought to think!") HIGH, MOST. See God, Names of.

HIGH PLACE: (1) "High place" is the normal term for bamâh, a word that means simply "elevation" (Jer 26:15; Ezek 36:2, etc.; 1. General of the use in Job 9:5 of the waves of the sea. For the term as a proper noun, see RAMOTH. In AV of Ezek 16:24,25,31-39, "high places" is the tr. of רָמָן, râman (RV "lofty places"); a common word (see RAMAH) of exactly the same meaning, indistinguishable from bamâh in ver 16. In three of these vs of Ezek (24:31-39) râmâh is paralleled by רָבוֹת, râbôh, which again has the same sense ("prominent place" in AV, ERV), and the "vaulted place" of ARV (ERVvm) is in disregard of Heb parallelism. In particular, the high places are places of worship, specifically of idolatrous worship. So the title was transferred from the elevation to the sanctuary on the elevation (1 K 11:7-14:23; of the burning of the "high place" in 2 K 23:15), and so came to be used of any idolatrous shrine, whether constructed on an elevation or not (note how in 2 K 16:4; 2 Ch 28:4 the 'high places' are distinguished from the 'hills').

In Ezek 16:16 a portable structure seems to be in point. (2) The use of elevations for purposes of worship is so widespread as to be almost universal, not idols used in worship). Other necessary features of a high place of the larger size were ample provision of water for lustral purposes, kitchens where the sacrifices could be cooked (normally by boiling), and tables for the sacrificial feasts. Normally, also, the service went on in the open air, but slight shelters were provided frequently for some of the objects. If a regular priest was attached to the high place (not always the case), his dwelling must have been a feature, unless he lived in some nearby village. Huts for those practiseing incubation (sleeping in the sanctuary to obtain revelations through dreams) seem not to have been uncommon. But formal temples were very rare and "houses of the high places" in 1 K 12 31; 13 22; 2 K 17 29-32; 23 19 may refer only to the slighter structures just mentioned (see the comm.). In any case, however, the boundaries of the sanctuary were marked out, generally by a low stone wall, and ablutions and removal of the sandals were necessary before the worshipper could enter.

For the ritual, of course, there was no uniform rule. The gods of the different localities were different, and in Pal a more or less thorough rededication of the high places to Jeh had taken place. So the service might be anything from the orderly worship of Jeh under so thoroughly an accredited leader as Samuel (1 S 9 11-24) to the wildest orgiastic rites. That the worship at many high places was intensively licentious is certain, but it must be emphasized against the statements of many writers that there is no evidence for a specific phallic cult, and that the explorations have revealed no unmistakable phallic emblems. The gruesome cemetery for newly born infants at Gezer is only one of the proofs of the prevalence of child-sacrifice, and the evidence for human sacrifice in other forms is unfortunately only too clear. See Gezer, and illustration on p. 1224.

(1) The opposition to the high places had many motives. When used for the worship of other gods their objectionable character is obvious, but even the worship of Jeh in the high places was intermixed with heathen practices (Hos 4 14, etc). In Am 5 21-24, etc, sacrifice in the high places is denounced because it is regarded as a substitute for righteousness in exactly the same way that sacrifice in the Temple is denounced in Jer 7 21-24. Or, sacrifice in the high places may be denounced under the best of circumstances, because in violation of the law of the one sanctuary (2 Ch 33 17, etc).

(2) In 1 S, sacrifice outside of Jerus is treated as an entirely normal thing, and Samuel presides in one such case (1 S 9 11-24). In 1 K the practice of using high places is treated as legitimate before the construction of the Temple (1 K 3 2-4), but after that it is condemned unequivocally. The primal sin of Northern Israel was the establishment of high places (1 K 12 31-33; 13 2-3 f), and their continuance was a chief cause of the evils that came to pass (2 K 17 10 f), while worship in them was a characteristic of the mongrel throng that repopulated Samaria (2 K 17 32). So Judah sinned in building high places (1 K 14 23), but the editor of K notes with other irregularities that even the pious kings (Asa, 1 K 15 14; Jehoshaphat, 22 43; Jehoash, 2 K 12 3; Amaziah, 14 4; Azariah, 16 4; Jotham, 16 35) did not put them away; i.e. the editor of K has about the point of view of Dt 12 8-11, according to which sacrifice was to be restricted to Jerus until the country should be at peace, but afterward the restriction should be absolute. The practice had been of such long standing that Hezekiah's destruction of the high places (2 K 18 4) could be cited by Rabshakeh as an act of apostasy from Jeh (2 K 18 22; 2 Ch 32 12; Isa 36 7). Under Manasseh they were rebuilt, in connection with other idolatrous practices (2 K 21 3-9). This act determined the final punishment of the nation (vs 10-15), and the general reformation of Josiah (ch 23) came too late. The attitude of the editor of Ch is still more condemning. He explains the sacrifice at Gibeon as justified by the presence of the Tabernacle (1 Ch 16 39; 21 29; 2 Ch 1 3); it states that "fear not the high places" (2 Ch 21 16; of 1 K 19 10.14), and (against K) credits Asa (2 Ch 14 3.5) and Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17 6) with their removal. (This last notice is also in contradiction with 2 Ch 29 35, but 16 17a is probably meant to refer to the Northern Kingdom, despite 17b.) On the other hand, the construction of high places is added to the sins of Jehoram (2 Ch 21 11) and of Ahaz (2 Ch 28 4.5).

(3) Among the prophets, Elijah destroyed the temple or altar of God as a terrible sin (1 K 19 10.14). Amos and Hosea each mention the high places by name only once (Am 7 9; Hos 10 8), but both prophets have only denunciation for the sacrificial practices of the Northern Kingdom. That, however, these sacrifices were offered in the wrong place is not said. Isa has nothing to say about the high places, except in 36 7, while Mic 1 5 equates the sins of Jerus with those of the high places (if the text is right), but promises the continued chastisement of Jerus. In Jer 7 31; 19 6; 32 35; Ezk 6 3.6; 16 16; 20 29; 43 7, idolatry or abominable practices are in point (so probably in Jer 17 3, while Jer 48 35 and Isa 16 12 refer to non-Israelites).

(4) The interpretation of the above data and their historical import depend on the critical position taken as to the general history of Israel's religion. See Religion of Israel; Criticism; Deuteronomy, etc.

HIGH PRIEST. See Priest, High.

HIGH THINGS: The tr of huppelōs, "high," "lofty," "elevated" (Rom 12 16, "Mind not high things, but condescend to men of low estate," AVm be "contented with mean things," RV "Set not your mind on high things, but condescend to [m ("Or be carried away with")] things [m ("them!") that are lowly"); high things are proud things, things regarded by the world as high.

High thing is huppelos, "a high place," "elevation," etc (2 Cor 10 5, "casting down every high thing that is exalted against the knowledge of God," "like a lofty tower or fortress built up proudly by the enemy"). In Jth 10 8; 13 4, huppelos is rendered "exaltation."
HILL, hîlān (םלוא, hîlān); A city in the hill country of Judah, probably W. or S.W. of Hebron, assigned with its suburbs to the Levites (1 Ch 6:58 [Heb 48]). The form of the name in Josh 15:51; 21:18 is HOLON (q.v.).

HILKHA, hil-ka' (יהלוך, hîlḵōḵ), הילקוח, "Jeh is my portion" or "Jeh's portion": The name of 8 individuals in the O.T. or 7, if the person mentioned in Neh 13:21 was the same person who stood with Ezra at the reading of the law (Neh 8:3). The latter appears as Ezrâ in 1 Esd 9:43. Five of this name are clearly associated with the priesthood, and the others are presumably so. The etymology suggests this. Either interpretation of the name expresses the person's claim on Jeh or the parent's recognition of Jeh's claim on him.

1. The person mentioned above (Neh 8:4, etc.).
2. A Levite of the sons of Merari (1 Ch 6:45).
3. Another Levite of Merari, son of Hosah (1 Ch 26:11).

Is he the "porter," i.e., "doorkeeper" of 1 Ch 16:38?
4. Father of the Gemariah whom Zedekiah of Judah sent to Nebuchadnezzar (Jer 29:3).

5. The man in 2 K 18:18ff who is evidently more famous as the father of Eliakim, the major-domo of Hezekiah's palace (Isa 22:20ff; 36:3ff). Probably the father's name is given in this and several cases to distinguish between two persons of otherwise identical name.

6. A priest of Anathoth, father of Jeremiah (Jer 1:1).

7. The son of Shallum, and the best known of the same name (1 Ch 6:13). He is great-grandfather of Ezra through his son Azariah (1 Esd 8:1, cf. 1 Ch 9:11; Neh 11:11). He discovered the lost Book of the Law during the repairing of the Temple (2 K 22:4ff); became chief leader in the ensuing reformation in 621 BC (2 K 23:4; 2 Ch 34:9ff; 35:8). He showed the recovered book to Shaphan the scribe, who, in turn, brought it to the notice of the king. At Josiah's request he led a deputation to Huldah the prophetess to "enquire of the Lord concerning the new situation created by the discovery. The book discovered is usually identified with the Book of Dt. See Deuteronomy.

HENRY WALLACE

HILL, HILL COUNTRY, hîl' kun-tri: The common tr of three Heb words: הילך, gîb'kāh, from root meaning "to be curved," is almost always trd "hill"; it is a peculiarly appropriate designation for the very rounded hills of Pal; it is never used for a range of mountains. Several times it occurs as a place-name, "Gibeah of Judah" (Josh 15:50; 16:13; "Gibeah of Benjamin" or "Sahul" (Jgs 19:12-16); "Gibeah of Phinehas" (Josh 24:33m), etc. (see Gibeah). Many such hills were used for idolatrous rites (1 K 14:23; 9:5; 2 K 17:10; Jer 2:20, etc.).

2. הילך, har, frequently trd in AV "hill," is r in AV usually trd "mountain" (cf Gen 7:19; Josh 15:9; 19:16; and many other references), or "hill-country." Thus we have the "hill-country of the Amorites" (Dt 7:19.20); the "hill-country of Gilead" (Dt 3:12); the "hill-country of Ephraim" (Josh 17:15.16.18; 19:50; 20:7, etc.); the "hill-country of Judah" (Josh 11:21; 20:7; 21:11.12; 2 Ch 7:1.4; etc.); and of [ש הילך, hîlḵōḵ, הילקוח] 1 K 39:65; the "hill-country of Naphtali" (Josh 20:7). For geographical designations see Palestine; Country; Ephraim; Judah, etc.

3. רָצִים, ṣaphēl, is trd by "hill" in 2 K 5:24; Isa 32:14; Mic 4:8, but may possibly mean "tower" or "fort." In other passages the word occurs with the art. as a place-name. See Ophel.

HILL, MOUNT, MOUNTAIN:

(1) The commonest word is הַר, har (also תָּל, tāl, and הִנֶּר, herer), which is rendered "hill," "mount," or "mountain." It occurs several hundreds of times.

In a number of places RV changes "hill" to "mountain," e.g., Gen 7:19, mountains covered by flood: Ex 24:4, Horeb; Josh 13:14, mountain before Beth-horon; Ps 46:13, mountain before Beersheba; 1 K 4:33, "mountains." Heights of the mountains are his also: 121a 1, "I will set up mine eyes upon the mountains." The term "hill" remains in Dt 11:11, "land of hills and valleys": 1 K 20:33, "the hill of Zion." 98 8, "hill sings for joy." "Mount" is changed to "hill-country" in Dt 1:7, "hill-country of the Amorites": Jos 11:15, "hill-country of the Anakites": Dt 3:13, "hill-country of Gilead"; and Gen 31:21, "mountain of Gilead." 1:7, "hill of hills" or "hills" is changed to "hill-country." In Dt 1:7: Josh 9:1, 10:40, 11:16; 17:16; 21:11. In Dt 1:41, ARV changes "hill" to "hill-country," while ERV has "mountain." The reasons for these differences of treatment are not in all cases apparent.

(2) The Gr ἴθος, ἴθρος, is perhaps etymologically akin to הַר, har. It occurs often in the NT, and is usually trd "mount" or "mountain." In three places (Mt 5:14; Lk 4:18; 16:16), AV has "hill," which RV retains, except in Lk 9:37, "they were come down from the mountain" (of the transfiguration). The derivative ἵππος, ἱππόν, "hill-country," occurs in Lk 1:39.65.

(3) The common Heb word for "hill" is רָצִים, ṣaphēl, from root meaning to "be curved," is almost always trd "hill"; it is a peculiarly appropriate designation for the very rounded hills of Pal; it is never used for a range of mountains. Several times it occurs as a place-name, "Gibeah of Judah" (Josh 15:50; 16:13; "Gibeah of Benjamin" or "Sahul" (Jgs 19:12-16); "Gibeah of Phinehas" (Josh 24:33m), etc. (see Gibeah). Many such hills were used for idolatrous rites (1 K 14:23; 9:5; 2 K 17:10; Jer 2:20, etc.).

(4) In 1 K 9:11, AV has "hill" for רָצִים, "ma'alah, root רָצִים, 'alāh, to ascend," cf. Arab. عَلَّم, 'alām, "to be high," and عَلَّم, 'alīm, "high,"
Here and elsewhere RV has "ascendent."" (5) EV has "hill" in Isa 5:1 for רָצִים, herer, "horns"; cf Arab. قَرن, qarn, "horn," which is also used for a mountain peak.

(6) רָצ, târ, is trd "mountain" in Dn 2:35,45, but RVm "rock" in Dn 3:35. (7) Arab. مَعَز, muzzābī (Isa 29:3), is trd in AV "mount," in ERV "fort," in ARV "posted troops"; cf עַל, muzzābī, "garrison" (1 S 14:1, etc.), from root עַל, nāqāb, "to set," cf. Arab. كَسْب, nasab, "to set." (8) Arab. صَبْح, sōbāh, from root סָבָה, सवा, "to raise," is in AV and ERV "mount," AVm "engine of shot," ARV "mount." (9) "mountain," is esp. used with Sinai, כַּנְּסִיָּה, "Jebel târ sī'ah." (10) "mountains" and "hills of Pal are the features of the country, and were much in the thoughts of the Bib. writers. Their general aspect is that of vast expanses of rock. As compared with better-watered regions of the earth, the land is sparsely inhabited. Snow remains throughout the year on Hermon and the two highest peaks of Lebanon, although in the summer it is in great isolated drifts which are not usually visible from below. In Pal proper, there are no snow mountains. Most of the valleys are dry wadis, and the roads often follow these wadis, which are to the traveler veritable ovens. It is when he reaches a commanding height and sees the peaks and ridges stretching away one after the other, with perhaps, through some opening to the W., a gleam of the sea like molten metal, that he becomes aware of the vastness and enduring strength of the mountains. At sunset the rosy lights are succeeded by the cool purple shadows that gradually fade into cold gray, and the traveler is glad of the shelter of his tent. The stars come out, and there is no sound outside the camp, except perhaps the cries of jackals or the barking of some goat-herd’s dog. These mountains are apt to repel the casual traveler by their bareness. They have no great forests on their slopes. Steep and rugged peaks like those of the Alpes are entirely absent. There are no snow peaks or glaciers. There are, it is true, cliffs and crags, but the general outlines are not striking. Nevertheless, these mountains and hills have a great charm for those who have come to know them. To the Bib. writers they are symbols of eternity (Gen 49 26; Dt 33 15; Job 15 7; Hab 3 6). They are strong and steadfast, but too they are the creation of God, and they manifest His power (Ps 18 7; 97 5; Isa 40 14 26; Jer 4 14; Nah 1 5; Hab 3 6). The hills were places of heathen sacrifice (Dt 12 2; 1 K 11 7; 2 K 16 4; 17 10; Ezk 6 13; Hos 4 13), and also of sacrifice to Jeh (Gen 22 2; 31 54; Josh 8 30). Zion is the hill of the Lord (Ps 2 6; 136 21; Isa 8 18; Joel 3 21, Mic 4 2).

Many proper names are associated with the mountains and hills of Abarim, Amalekites, Abarim, Amurites, Ararar, Bashall, Baath-hermon, Bashan, Beshan, Beth-hor, BethUEL, Carmel, Cheshalon, Enath, Ephraim, Eprom, Essau, Gaash, Gareb, Geba, Gerizim, Gilbeah, Gibeon, Gihon, Gash, Gopham, Geshon, Hazael, Hebron, Hermon, Hor, Horab, Jeerin, Judah, Lebanon, Mizar, Moreh, Moriah, Naphtali, Nebo, Olivet, Paran, Perazim, Piasgh, Samaria, Ser, Senir, Sephar, Shepher, Simeon, Siion, Surion, Tabor, Zaimon, Zemaraim, Zion. See also "mountain of the east" (Gen 10 30); "mountains of the leopard" (Cant 4 8); "rocks of the wild goats" (Isa 34 2); "hill of the foreshocks" (Gilbeah-Haaaraloth (Josh 5 3)); "mountains of brass" (Zer 6 1); "hill of God" (Gilbeah of God) (1 K 19 15); "mountains of procession of the congregation" (15 13); see also Mt 4 8; 5 1; 14 23; 15 29; 17 1; 26 16; Lk 8 32; Gal 4 26.

ALFRED ELY DAY

HILLEL, hil’el (חִלֶל, hillel, "he greatly praised"); LXX' ΕΗΛΛ, Elid (Elisi): An inhabitant of Pirathon in the hill country of Ephraim, and father of Abdon, one of the judges of Israel (Jgs 12 13). 1. HIN, hin (חִין, hin): A liquid measure containing 12 logs, equal to about 8 quarts. See Weights and Measures.

HIND, hind. See Deer.

HIND OF THE MORNING, THE: The tr of Azjeleh baah-Shahar (ayyjeleth ha-shahar) in the title of Ps 22, probably the "Hinnom儿女", one of the several known songs which the ps was intended to be sung, which possibly had reference to the early habits of the deer tribe in search of water and food, or to the flight of the hind from the hunters in early dawn; or "morning" may symbolize the deliverance from persecution and sorrow.

"The first rays of the morning sun, by which it announces its appearance before being itself visible, are compared to the fork-like antlers of a stag; and this appearance is called, Ps 24 3, the title, 'The hind of the morning,' because those antler rays preceded the red of dawn, which again forms the transition to sunrise" (Delitzsch, Int. Com. Ps, 2403).

According to Hengstberg, the words indicate the subject-matter of the poem, the character, sufferings, and triumph of the person who is set before us. See Psalms. For an interesting Messianic interpretation see Hood, Christmas Events, the Preacher of Wild Waies, 92 ff. M. O. EVANS

HINGE, hin’ge (חרך, poth): Hinges of Jewish sacred buildings in Scripture are mentioned only in connection with the temple’s inner gates, and which doors swing, and which turned in the sockets of the threshold and the lintel, were cased in gold. The proverb: "As the door turneth upon its hinges, so doth the sluggard upon his bed" (Prov 26 14), describes the ancient mode of ingress and egress into important edifices. In the British Museum there are many examples of stone sockets taken from Bab and Assyrian palaces and temples, engraved with the name and titles of the royal builder; while in the Hauran doors of a single slab of stone with stone pivots are still found in situ. Hinges, as we understand the word, were unknown in the ancient world. See House 1.

HINNOM, hin’om, VALLEY OF (גַּה-הַנִּמּים, ḡ hā-hinnôm, Josh 16 8, 16 16; "south valley of the son of Hinnom") (גַּה-הַנִּמּים, ḡ bhen hinnôm, Josh 16 8, 16 16; 2 Ch 28 3; 33 6; Jer 7 31; 19 26; 32 35; "valley of the children [sons] of Hinnom") (גַּה-הַנִּמּים, ḡ bhe’-hinnôm), 2 K 23 10; or simply "the valley," it. the "hollow" or "cavine" (הַנִּמּים) (2 Ch 26 9; Neh 2 13, 15; 3 13; Jer 31 40, and perhaps, also Jer 23 [the above references are in the Heb text; there are some variations in the LXX]): The meaning of Hinnom is unknown; the expressions ben Hinnom and ben Hinnom would suggest that it is a proper name; in Jer 7 32; 19 6 it is altered by the prophet to "valley of slaughter," and therefore some have thought the original name must have had a pleasing meaning. It was near the walls of Jerusalem, "by the entry of the gate Harsith" (Jer 19 2), the Valley Gate opened into it (Neh 2 13; 3 13). The boundary between Judah and Benja References min ran along it (Josh 16 8; 18 16) and History. It was the scene of idolatrous practices in the days of Ahaz (2 Ch 28 3) and of Manasseh, who "made his children to pass through the fire in the valley of the son of Hinnom" (2 Ch 23 6), but Jos 7 22. In the course of his reforms "de- liled Topheth, which is in the valley of the children ["son"] of Hinnom, that no man might make his son or his daughter to pass through the fire to Molech" (2 K 23 10). It was on account of these evil practices that Jeremiah (7 32; 19 6) announced the change of name. Into this valley dead bodies were probably cast to be consumed by the dogs, as is done in the Wady er-Rabâbi today, and fires were here kept burning to consume the rubbish of the city. Such associations led to the Geo-Hinnom (N T "Gehenna") becoming the "type of Hell" (Milton, Paradise Lost, i, 405). See GEBENNA.

The Valley of Hinnom has been located by different writers in each of the three great valleys of Jerusalem. In favor of the eastern or Kidron valley we have the facts that Eusebius and Jerome (Onom) place "Gehennom" under the eastern wall of Jerusalem and the Moslem geographical
2. Situation writers, Mukaddasi and Nasir-i-Khusru, call the Kidron valley Wady Jahamun. The Jewish writer Kimchi also identifies the Valley of Jehoshaphat (i.e. the Kidron) with Hinnom. These ideas are probably due to the Identification of the eastern valley, on account of its propinquity to the Temple, as the scene of the last judgment—the "Valley of Jehoshaphat" of Joel 3:2—and the consequent transference there of the scene of the punishment of the wicked, Gehenna, after the ancient geographical position of the Valley of Hinnom, had long been lost. In selecting sacred sites, from the 4th Christian cent. onward, no critical topographical acumen has been displayed until quite modern times. There are three amply sufficient arguments against this view: (1) the Kidron valley is always called a nāḥal and not a 'guy' (see Kidron); (2) the 'Gate of the Cai-
Clearly did not lie to the E. of the city; (3) En-regol, which lay at the beginning of the Valley of Hinnom and to its E. (Josh 15:8; 18:16) cannot be the 'Virgin's fount,' the ancient Gihon (2 S 17:17). See Gihon.
Several distinguished modern writers have sought to identify the Tyropoön Valley (el Wād) with Hinnom, but as the Tyropoön was incorporated within the city walls before the days of Manasseh (see Jerusalem), it is practically impossible that it could have been the same as that of which the Hittites, the Chaldaeans, and the Jebusites were children—a ritual which must have occurred beyond the city's limits (2 K 23 10, etc).
The clearest geographical fact is found in Josh 15: 8; 18:16, where we find that the boundary of Judah and Benjamin passed from
3. Wādy er-En-regol 'by the valley of the son of Rabba' Binim'; if the modern Bir Buqab is En-regol, as is certainly most probable, then the Wādy er-Rabbbā', known traditionally as Hinnom, is correctly so called. It is possible that the name extended to the wide open land formed by the junction of the three valleys; indeed, some would place Tophet at this spot, but there is no need to extend the name beyond the actual gorge. The Wādy er-Rabbbā' commences in a shallow, open valley due W. of the Jaffa Gate, in the center of which lies the Birket Manolia; near the Jaffa Gate it turns S. for about 1/4 of a mile, its course being dammed here to form a large pool, the Birket es Sulān. Below this it gradually curves to the E. and rapidly descends between sides of bare rocky scars, much steeper in ancient times. A little before the valley joins the wide Kidron valley lies the traditional site of Akeldama (q.v.).

HIRAIH, hî'ra'h (ἡραῖ, hērā́; LXX Eîpôs, Eîrō̇s); a native of Adullam, and a 'friend' of Judah (Gen 38:12). The LXX and the Vulg both describe him as Judah's 'shepherd.'

HIRAM, hî'ra'm (ἡραῖον, hērā́ion; LXX Xiphôs, Chērôm, but Xâûs, Cheîrôm, in 2 S 5:11; 1 Ch 14:1). There is some confusion regarding the form of this name. In the books of S and R the prevailing form is 'Hiram' (ἡραῖον, hērā́ion); but in 1 K 5:10.18 m (Heb 24:32); 7 40 m "Hirom" (ἡραῖον, hērā́ion) is found. In Ch the form of the word is uniformly "Hiram" (ἡραῖον, hērā́ion).

(1) A king of Tyre who lived on most friendly terms with both David and Solomon. After David had taken the stronghold of Zion, Hiram sent messengers and workmen and materials to build a palace for him at Jerusalem (2 S 5:11; 1 Ch 14:1). Solomon, on his accession to the throne, made a league with Hiram, in consequence of which Hiram furnished the new king of Israel with skilled work- men and with cedar trees and fir trees and algum trees from Lebanon for the building of the Temple. In return Solomon gave annually to Hiram large quantities of wheat and oil (1 K 5:4 [Heb 15:4]; 2 Ch 2:3 [Heb 2:17]). "At the end of twenty years, when Solomon had built the two houses, the house of Jeh and the king's house," Solomon made a present to Hiram of twenty cities in the land of Galilee. Hiram was not at all pleased with these cities and contemptuously called them "Cabul." His displeasure, however, with this gift does not seem to have disturbed the amicable relations that had hitherto existed between the two kings, for subsequently Hiram sent to Solomon 120 talents of gold (1 K 9:10-14). Hiram and Solomon maintained merchant vessels on the Medi-terranean and shared mutually in a profitable trade with foreign ports (1 K 10:22). Hiram's servants, chartered by Solomon, taught the sailors of Solomon the route from Ezion-geber and Etholo to Ophir, whence large stores of gold were brought to King Solomon (1 K 9:26; 2 Ch 8:17f).

Jos (Cæp, I, 17, 18) informs us, on the authority of the historians Dius and Menander, that Hiram was the son of Abiab, that he had a large sum of money, and had married a daughter of Solomon, which was at first between the two nations. Finally, Abde- mon, a man of Tyre, did solve the problems, and proposed others which Solomon was unable to explain; consequently Solomon was obliged to pay back to Hiram a vast sum of money. Jos further states (Ant, VIII, ii, 8) that the correspondence carried on between Solomon and Hiram in regard to the building of the Temple was preserved, not only in the records of the Jews, but also in the public records of Tyre. It is also related by Phoenician historians that Hiram gave his daughter to Solomon in marriage.

(2) The name of a skilful worker in brass and other substances, whom Solomon secured from Hiram king of Tyre to do work on the Temple. His father was a brass-worker of Tyre, and his mother was a woman of the tribe of Naphtali (1 K 7 14), "a woman of the daughters of Dan" (2 Ch 2 14 [Heb 13]; 1 K 7 13 f; 2 Ch 2 13 [Heb 12.15]).

HIRCUS, hér-ku'rus. See HYRCANUS.

HIRE, hír: Two entirely different words are trd "hiring" in the OT:
(1) The most frequent one is רכש, sâkhar, vb. רכש, sâkhar, and verbal adj. רכש, sâkhar. (a) As a vb. it means "to hire" for a wage, either money or something else; in this sense it is used with regard to ordinary laborers (1 S 2 5; 2 Ch 24 12), or mercenary soldiers (2 S 10 6; 2 K 7 6; 1 Ch 19 6; 2 Ch 26 6), or a goldsmith (Isa 46 6), or a band of loose followers (Jgs 9 4), or a false priest (Jer 18 4), or a hireling (Ecclus 11 6), or hostil counsellors (Ezr 4 5), or false prophets (Neh 6 12 f). As a verbal adj. it refers to things (Ex 22 15; Isa 7 20) or men (Lev 19 13; Jer 46 21).
(b) As a noun it denotes the wage in money, or something else, paid to workmen for their services (Gen 30 32 f; 31 8; Dt 24 15; 1 K 5 6; Zec 8 10), or the rent or hire paid for a thing (Ex 25), or a work-beast (Zec 8 10). In Gen 30 16 Leah hires from Rachel the privilege of having Jacob with her again, and her conception and the subsequent birth of a son, she calls her hire or wage from the Lord for the gift of her slave girl to Jacob as a concubine (Gen 30 18).

(2) The other word trd hire is רכש, 'ethdhn, once רכש, 'ethman. It is rather a gift (from root רכז, nathân, "to give") than a wage earned by labor, and is used uniformly in a bad sense. It is the gire made else; hirelings (Gen 30 18), or, reversing the usual custom, made by the harlot nation (Ezk 16 31.41). It was also used metaphorically of the gifts made by Israelites to idols, since this was regarded as spiritual harlotry (Isa 23 17f; Mic 1 7; 3 2, also Ps 147 9).

In the Eng. NT the word occurs once as a vb. and 3 times as a noun, the trd μηρος, μηθαος, and its verbal form. In Mt 20 18 and Jas 5 4 it refers to the hiring of ordinary field laborers for a daily wage. In Lk 10 7 it signifies the stipend which is due the laborer in the spiritual work of the kingdom of God. It is a wage, earned by toil, as of other laborers. The word is very significant here and absolutely negatives the idea, all too prevalent, that money received by the spiritual toiler is a gift. It is rather a wage, the reward of real toil.

William Joseph McGlothlin

HIRELING, hî'rlîng (רכש, sâkhrî): Occurs only 6 t in the OT, and uniformly means a laborer for a wage. In Job 7 1f there is reference to the hireling's anxiety for the close of the day. In Isa 16 14 and 21 16 the length of the years of a hireling is referred to, probably because of the accuracy with which they were determined by the employer and the employee. Malachi (3 5) speaks of the oppression of the hireling in his wages, probably by the smallness of the wage or by in some way defrauding him of part of it.

In the NT the word "hireling" (μησιτος, mîshîthos) occurs only in Jn 10 12 f, where his neglect of the sheep is contrasted unfavorably with the care and courage of the shepherd who owns the sheep, who leads them to pasture and lays down his life for their protection from danger and death.

William Joseph McGlothlin

HIS, his: Used often in AV with reference to a neuter or inanimate thing, or to a lower animal (Gen 1 11, "after his kind"); Lev 1 16, "pluck away his crop"; Acts 12 10, "of his own accord"; 1 Cor 15 38, "his own body"). etc. RV substitutes "it."

1. OT Notices.—The “sons of Heth” are noticed 12 t and the Hittites 48 t in the OT. In 21 cases the name occurs in the enumeration of races, in Syria and Canaan, which are

II. Races
1. Enumerated of races, in Syria and Canaan, which are non-Semitic. In Heb the term “Hittite” is Solomonic, the earliest known occurrence being in the “land of Akkad,” or “highlands” N. of Mesopotamia.

The chronology of the Hittites has been made clear by the notices of contemporary rulers in Babylon, Assyria, and Egypt, and by the names of Hittite scribes, such as Kha, Hatti, and Hittites.

II. History.—The Hittites were known to the Assyrians as Hatti, and to the Egyptians as Hatti, and their history has been very fully recovered from the records of the XVIIIth and XIXth Egyptian Dynasties, from the Am Tab, from Assyrian annals and, quite recently, from copies of letters addressed to Babylonia.

Hittite names are noticed by Winckler in the ruins of Boghaz-keui ("the town of the pass"), the ancient Pterium in Pontus, E. of the river Halys. The earliest known notice of Hittites is Ezra 9:3; Neh 9:8.

The Hittites have been described as a race of great importance to Bible history, because, taken in conjunction with the Am Tab, with the Kasite monuments of Nippur, with the Babylonian and Assyrian chronicles, and with the Egyptian records of the XVIIIth and XIXth Dynasties, which were previously uncertain by nearly a century, but which may now be regarded as settled with a few years. From the Am Tab it is known that Thothmes IV was contemporary with the father of Adad-nirari of Assyria (Berlin no. 30), and Amenophis IV with Bura-burias of Babylon (Brit. Mus. no. 2); while a letter from Hattu-sil, the Hittite contemporary of Rameses II, was addressed to his successor, as well as to his father. These notices serve to show that the approximate dates given by Brugsch for the Pharaohs are more correct than those proposed by Mahler; and the following table will be useful for the understanding of the dynasty—Thothmes III being known to have reigned 54 years, Amenophis III at least 63 years, and Rameses II, 66 years or more. The approximate dates appear to be thus fixed.

The Hittite race having been expelled from the Delta by Aahmes, the founder of the XVIIIth (Theban) Dynasty, after 1700 BC, the great trade route through Pal and Invasions: Syria was later conquered by Thothmes VIII (1) and the conqueror of the Egyptian Dynasty, who set up a monument on the W. bank of the Nile Delta; but see Gray in Expos.

In later times the “land of the Hittites” (Josh 14; Judges 1) was in Syria and near the Euphrates (see TARTIS, HOTT). Though Uriah (to 28) lived in Jerusalem, and Ahimelech (18) was there, the “kings of the Hittites” are mentioned with the “kings of Syria,” and were still powerful a century later (2 K 7:6). Solomon himself married Hittite wives (1 K 10:29), and a few Hittites seem still to have been left in the S. (2 Ch 8:7), even in his time, if not against the Assyrians (Ezr 9:11; Neh 9:8).
The XVIIIth Dynasty was succeeded, about 1400 BC, or a little later, by the XIXth, and Rameses I appears to have been the 5. Egyptian Pharaoh who made the treaty which invasions: Mursilis, brother of Arandas, controlled by the 19th. But the Dynasty accession of Seti I, son of Rameses I, the Syrian tribes prepared to "make a stand in the country of the Harri" against the Egyptian resolution to recover the suzerainty of their country. Seti I claims to have conquered "Kadesh (on the Orontes) in the Land of the Amorites," and it is known that Mutallis, the eldest son of Mursilis, fought against Egypt. According to his younger brother Hattusil, he was a tyrant, who was finally driven out by his subjects and died before the accession of Kadashman-Turgu (about 1355 BC) in Babylon. Hattusil, the contemporary of Rameses II, then seized the throne as "great king of the Hittites" and "king of Kus" ("Cush," Gen 2:13), a term which in the Akkadian language meant "the West." In his 2nd year Rameses II advanced, after the capture of Ashkelon, as far as Beirut, and in his 5th year he advanced on Kadesh where he was opposed by a league of the natives of "the land of the Kheta, the land of Naharain, and of all the Kati" (or inhabitants of Cilicia), among which concedes the "some 30 years" later, in the reign of Amenophis IV, Durratsa of Matiene was murdered, and his kingdom was attacked by the Assyrians; but Subbuliliuma, though not a friend of Durratsa with whom he disputed the suzerainty of North Syria, sent aid to Durratsa's son Mattipiza, whom he placed on his throne, giving him his own daughter as a wife. A little later (about 1440 BC) Aziru the Amorite, who had been subject to Amenophis III, submitted to this same great Hittite ruler, and was soon able to conquer the whole of Phoenicia down to Tyre. All the Egyptian conquests were thus lost in the last part of the reign of Amenophis III, and in that of Amenophis IV. Only Gaza seems to have been retained, and Burra-burias of Babylon, writing to Amenophis IV, speaks of the Canaanite rebellion as beginning in the time of his father Kuri-galzu I (Am Tab, Brit. Mus. no. 2), and of subsequent risings in his own time (Berlin no. 7) which interrupted communication with Egypt. Assur-yuballidh of Assyria (Brit. Mus. no. 9), acting on the same Pharaoh, states also that the relations with Assyria, which dated back even to the time of Assur-nadin-akhi (about 1550 BC), had ceased. About this earlier period Thothmes III records that he received presents from Assyria. The invasion of Egypt thus left the Hittites independent, in North Syria, about the time when —according to OT chronology—Pal was conquered by Joshua. They probably acknowledged Arandas, the successor of Subbuliliuma, as their suzerain.

After 1520 BC, the Hittites were ruled by the Vith Dynasty, which lasted until about 1000 BC. During this period, the Hittites were involved in conflicts with the Egyptians and other neighboring powers, such as the Phoenicians and the Assyrians. The Hittites were also influenced by the Neo-Hittite culture, which emerged in the late 12th and early 11th centuries BC, and continued to flourish until the end of the Hittite Empire.

The Hittites were known for their military prowess and their skill in diplomacy, and they were able to maintain their independence for several centuries despite the rise of the Assyrian Empire in the 9th century BC. However, they were eventually conquered by the Medes in the 7th century BC, and their kingdom was absorbed into the Persian Empire.
Hittite King and Daughter.

The Hittite power began now, however, to decline, in consequence of attacks from the W. by hostile Aryan invaders. In the 5th year of Seti Merenptah II, son of Rameses II, these fair “peoples of the North” raided the Syrian coasts, and advanced even to Belbeis and Helopolis in Egypt in alliance with the Libyans W. of the Delta. They were defeated, and Merenptah appears to have pursued them even to Pa-Kan’anu near Tyre. A text of his 5th year (found by Dr. Flinders Petrie in 1898) speaks of this campaign, and says that while “Israel is spoiled” the “Hittites are quieted”: for Merenptah appears to have been on good terms with them, and allowed corn to be sent in ships “to preserve the life of this people of the Hatti.” Dudhali was succeeded by his son “Arumanta the great king of whom a bilingual seal has been found by Dr. Winckler, in Hittite and cuneiform characters; but the con- federacy of Hittite tribes which had so long resisted Egypt seems to have been broken up by these disasters and by the increasing power of Assyria.

A second invasion by the Aryans occurred in the reign of Rameses III (about 1200 BC) when “agita- tion seized the peoples of the North,” and “no people stood before their arms, beginning with the people of the Hatti, of the Kati, of Carchemish and Aradus.” The invaders, including Danai (or early Greeks), came by land and sea to Egypt, but were again defeated, and Rameses III—the last of the great Pharaohs—pursued them far north, and is even supposed by Brugsch to have conquered Cyprus. Among the cities which he took he names Carchemish, and among his captives were “the miserable king of the Hatti, a living prisoner,” and the “miserable king of the Amorites.”

Half a century later (1150 BC) the Assyrians began to invade Syria, and Assur-ri-isu reached Beirût; for even as early as about 1270 BC Tukulti-Ninip of Assyria had conquered the Kassites, and had set a Sem prince on their throne in Babylonia. Early in his reign (about 1130 BC) Tiglath-pileser I claims to have subdued 42 kings, marching “to the fords of the Euphrates, the land of the Hatti, and the upper sea of the setting sun”—or

8. Assyrian Mediterranean. Soldiers of the Hatti Invasions had seized the cities of Sumastri (probably Samosata), but the Assyrians conquered and made his soldiers swim the Euphrates on skin bags, and so attacked “Carchemish of the land of the Hittites.” The Moschians in Cappadocia were apparently of Hittite race, and were ruled by 5 kings: for 50 years they had exacted tribute in Commagene (Northeastern Syria), and they were defeated, though placing 20,000 men in the field against Tiglath-pileser I. He advanced to Kumani (probably Comana in Cappadocia), and to Arini which was apparently the Hittite capital called Arinas (now Irans), W. of Caesaerea in the same region.

The power of the Hittites was thus broken by Assyria, yet they continued the struggle for more than 4 centuries afterward. After the

9. Invasion defeat of Tiglath-pileser I by Marduk-by Assur-nasir-ashkhi of Babylon (1128–1111 našir-pal BC), there is a gap in Assyrian records, and we next hear of the Hittites in the reign of Assur-našir-pal (883–858 BC); he entered Commagene, and took tribute from “the son of Bahian of the land of the Hatti,” and from “Sangara of Carchemish in the land of the Hatti,” so that it appears that the Hittites no longer acknowledged a single “great king.” They were, however, still rich, judging from the spoil taken at Carche- miah, which included 20 talents of silver, beads, chains, and sword scabbards of gold, 100 talents of copper, 250 talents of iron, and bronze objects from the palace representing sacred bulls, bowls, cups and censers, couches, seats, thrones, dishes, instruments of ivory and 200 slave girls, besides embroidered robes of linen and of black and purple stuffs, gems, elephants’ tusks, chariots and horses. The Assyrs advance continued to ‘Azzak in North Syria, and to the Arin river, in the country of the Hittaii who were no doubt Hittites, where similar spoils are noticed, with 1,000 oxen and 10,000 sheep: the posgatu, or “maces” which the Syrian kings used as scepters, and which are often represented on Hittite monuments, are especially mentioned in this record. Assur-našir-pal reached the Mediterranean at Arvad, and received tribute from “kings of the sea coast” including those of Gebal, Sidon and Tyre. He reaped the corn of the Hittites, and from Mt. Amamus in Syria he took logs of cedar, pine, box and cypress.

His son Shalmaneser II (858–823 BC) also in- vaded Syria in his 1st year, and again mentions Sangara of Carchemish, with Sapalumii of the Hittaii. In Commagene the chief of the Gamguns bore the old Hittite name Mutallis. In 856 BC Shalmaneser II attacked Mer’ash and Rimmon- nirari III to ‘Azzak. He tookepsilon in the Hat- tinaii 3 talents of gold, 100 of silver, 300 of copper, 1,000 bronze vases and 1,000 embroidered robes. He also entered as a wife a daughter of Mutallus and another Syrian princess.

Two years later 120,000 Assyrians raid the same region, but the southward advance was barred by the great Syrian league which came to the aid of Irjulens, king of Hamath, who was not subdued till 840 BC. In 836 BC the people of Tubal, and the Kas of Cappadocia and Cilicia, were again attacked. In 831 BC Qurbani, the actual king of the Hattinaii in Syria, was murdered by his subjects, and an Assyrs tartanu or general was sent to restore order. The rebels under Sapalumii had been conquered with Sangara of Carchemish. Adad-nirari III, grandson of Shalmaneser II, was the next Assyrian conqueror: in 805 BC he attacked 'Azzâz and Arpad, but the resistance of the Syrians was feeble, and presents were sent from Tyre, Sidon, Damascus and Edom. This conqueror states that he subdued "the land of the Hittites, the land of the Amorites, to the limits of the land of Sidon," as well as Damascus, Edom and Philistia.

But the Hittites were not as yet thoroughly subdued, and often revolted. In 738 BC Tiglath-pileser II mentions among his tributaries a chief of the Gagmus bearing and invasions Pîsiris of Carchemish. In 702 BC Sennacherib passed peacefully through the "land of the Hatti" on his way to Sidon: for in 717 BC Sargon had destroyed Carchemish, and had taken many of the Hittites prisoners, sending them away far east and replacing them by Babylonians. Two years later he in the same way took the Hamathites as captives to Assyria. Some of the Hittites may have fled to the S., for in 709 BC Sargon states that the king of Ashdod was deposed by "people of the Hatti plotting rebellion who despised his rule," and who set up Azur instead.

The power of the Hittites was thus entirely broken before Sennacherib's time, but they were not entirely exterminated, for, in 673 BC, Esar-haddon speaks of "twenty-two kings of the Hatti and near the sea." Hittite power still existed in 712 BC (Tarhu-nazi of Meletene) and in 711 BC (Mutallis of Commagene), but after this they disappear. Yet, even in a recently found text of Nebuchadnezzar (after 600 BC), we read that "chiefs of the land of the Hatti, bordering on the Euphrates to the W., where by command of Nergal my lord I had destroyed their rule, were made to bring strong beams from the mountain of Lebanon to my city Babylon." A Hittite population seems to have survived even in Rom times in Cilia and Cappadocia, for (as Dr. Moritzl observed) a king and his son in this region both bore the name Tarkon-dimotos in the time of Augustus, according to Dio Cassius and Tacitus; and this name recalls that of Tarku-timme, the king of Erinhe in Cappadocia, occurring on a monument which shows a head as brought captive before an Assyrian king, while the same name also occurs on the bilingual silver boss which was the head of his scepter, inscribed in Hittite and cuneiform characters.

The power of the Mongol race decayed gradually as that of the Sem Assyrions increased; but even now in Syria the two races remain mingled, and Turkoman nomads still camp even as far S. as the site of Syria Kadesh on the Orontes, while a few tribes of the same stock (which entered Syria in the Middle Ages) still inhabit the plains of Sharon and Esdraelon, just as the southern Hittites dwelt among the Amorites at Jerus and Hebron in the days of Abraham, before they were driven north by Thothmes III.

III. Language.—The questions of race and language in early times, before the early stocks were mixed or decayed, cannot be dissociated, and we have abundant evidence of the racial type and characteristic dress of the Hittites. The late Dr. Birch of the British Museum pointed out the Mongol character of the Hittite type, and his opinion has been very generally adopted. In 1885 Dr. Sayce (The Hittites, 15, 101) calls them "Mongoloid," and says, "They had in fact, according to craniologists, the characteristics of a Mongoloid race." This was also the opinion of Sir W. Flower; and, if the Hittites were Mongols, it would appear probable that they spoke a Mongol dialect. It is also apparent that, in this case, they would be related to the old Mongol population of Chaldæa (the people of Akkad and Sumer or "of the highlands and river valley") from whom the Sem Babylonians derived their earliest civilization.

The Hittite type is represented, not only on their own monuments, but also on those of the XVIIIth and XIXth Egypt Dynasties, including a colored picture of the time of Ramesses III. The type represented has a short head and receding forehead, a prominent and sometimes rather curved nose, a strong jaw and a hairless face. The complexion is yellow, the eyes slightly slanting, the hair of the head black, and gathered into a long pigtail behind. The physiognomy is like that of the Sumerians represented on a bas-relief at Tel-loh (Zirgul) in Chaldæa, and very like that of some of the Kirghiz Mongols of the present time, and of some of the more purely Mongol Turks. The head of Gudea at Zirgul in like manner shows (about 2800 BC) the broad cheek bones and hairless face of the Turkish type; and the language of his texts, in both grammar and vocabulary, is closely similar to pure Turkish speech.

Priest-King and God of Cultivation.

Among Mongol peoples the beard grows only late in life, and among the Akkadians it is rarely represented—excepting in the case of gods and ancient kings. The great bas-relief found by Koldewey at Babylon, and representing a Hittite thunder-god with a long pigtail and (at the back) a Hittite inscription, is bearded, but the pigtailed heads on other Hittite monuments are usually hairless. At Isasili-Kaia—the rock shrine near Pterium—only the supreme god is bearded, and all the other male figures are beardless. At Ibrez, in Lycaonia, the gigantic god who holds corn and grapes in his hands is bearded, and the worshipper who approaches him also has a beard, and his hair is arranged in the distinctive fashion of the Sem Babylonians and Assyrians. This type may represent Sem mixture, for M. Chantre discovered at Kara-eyuk, in Cappadocia, tablets in Sem Bab representing traders’ letters perhaps as old as 2000 BC. The type of the Ibrez figures has been said to resemble that of the Armenian peasantry of today; but, although the Armenians are Aryans of the old Phrygian stock, and their language almost purely Aryan, they have mixed with the Turkish and Sem races, and have been said even to resemble the Jews. Little reliance can be placed, therefore, on comparison with modern mixed types. The Hittite pigtail is very distinctive of a Mongolce race. It was imposed on the Chinese by the Munchus in the 17th cent., but it is unknown among Aryan or Sem peoples, though it seems to be represented on some Akkadian seals, and on a bas-relief picturing the Mongolce Sueans in the 7th cent. BC.

The costume of the Hittites on monuments seems also to indicate Mongolce origin. Kings and priests wear long robes, but warriors (and the gods at Ibrez and Babylon) wear short jerkins, and the Turkish shoe or slipper with a curled-up toe, which, however, is also worn by the Heb tribute bearers from Jehu on the “black obelisk” (about 840 BC) of Shalmaneser II. Hittite gods and warriors are shown wearing a high, conical headdress, just like that which (with addition of the Moslem turban) characterized the Turks at least as late as the 15th cent. The short Jerkin also appears on Akkadian seals and bas-reliefs, and, generally speaking, the Hittites (who were enemies of the Lyceans, Danai and other Aryans to their west) may be held to be very clearly Mongolce in physical type and costume, while the art of their monuments is closely similar to that of the most archaic Akkadian and Bab sculptures of Mesopotamia. It is natural to suppose that they were a branch of the same remarkable race which civilized Chaldaea, but which seems to have had its earliest home in Akkad, or the “highlands” near Ararat and Media, long before the appearance of Aryan tribes either in this region or in Iran. The OT statement that the Hittites were akin to the descendants of Ham in Babylonia, and not to the “fair” or “Aryan” peoples, including Medes, Ionians and other Aryan peoples.

As early as 1866 Chabas remarked that the Hittite names (of which so many have been mentioned above) were clearly not Sem, but this has been generally allowed.

5. Hittite Names Those of the Amorites, on the other hand, are Sem, and the type represented, with brown skin, dark eyes and hair, the line features and beards, agrees (as is generally allowed) in indicating a Sem race. There are now some 60 of these Hittite names known, and they do not suggest any Aryan etymology. They are quite unlike those of the Aryan Medes (such as Baga-datta, etc.) mentioned by the Assyrians, or those of the Vannic kings whose language (as shown by recently published bilinguals in Vannie and Assyrian) seems very clearly to have been Italian. It is also very difficult to place the Sem and modern Turkish at once suggest a linguistic connection which fully agrees with what has been said above of the racial type. The common element Turku, or Turkhan, in Hittite names suggests the Mongol element torkhan, meaning a “tribal chief.” Sili again is an Akkadian word for a “ruler,” and nasi is an element in both Hittite and Kassite names.

It has also been remarked that the vocabulary of the Hittite letters discovered by Chantre at Pterium recalls that of the letter written by Dusratra of Matiome to Amenom of ophes III (Am Tab no. 27, Berlin), and that Dusratra adored the Hittite Epistles god Tesseras. A careful study of the language of this letter shows that, in syntax and vocabulary alike, it must be regarded as Mongolce and as a dialect of the Kassite group. The cases of the noun, for instance, are the same as in Akkadian and in modern Turkish. None of the words and terminations are common to the language of this letter and of those discovered by M. Chantre and attributed to the Hittites whose territory immediately adjoined that of the Medes. The majority of these words occur also in Akkadian.

But in addition to these indications we have a letter in the Am Tab (Berlin no. 10) written by a Hittite prince, in his own tongue and in the cuneiform script. It is from Amarna (and not to, as is often wrongly supposed by Knudtzon) a chief named Tarhun-dara, and is addressed to Amenophis III, whose name stands first. In all the other letters the name of the sender always follows that of the recipient. The general meaning of this letter is clear from the known meanings of the “ideograms” used for many words; and it is also clear that the language is “agglutinative” like the Kassite. The suffixes possessive pronouns follow the pl. termination of the noun as in Akkadian, and prepositions are not used as they are in Sem and Aryan speech; the precative form of the vb. has also been recognized to be the same as used in Akkadian. The pronouns mi, “my,” me, “me,” and ti, “thou,” “thy,” are to be found in many living Mongolce dialects (e.g. the Zygirt and Senjirli).
opens with the usual salutation: “Letter to Amenophis III the great king, king of the land of Egypt [Mizzari-na], from Tar-uhn-dara [Tarhoundara-da], king of the land of Arzapi or Arsaq, thus. To me prosperity. To my nobles, my hosts, my cavalry, to all that is mine in all my lands, may there be prosperity; moreover! may there be prosperity; to thy house, thy wives, thy sons, thy nobles, thy hosts, thy cavalry, to all that is thine in thy lands may there be prosperity.” The letter continues to speak of a daughter of the Pharaoh, and of a sum of gold which is being sent in charge of an envoy named Israppa. It concludes (as in many other instances) with a list of presents, these being sent by “the Hittite prince [Nu Hattu] from the land Igait” (perhaps the same as Ikata), and including, besides the gold, various robes and ten chairs of ebony inlaid with ivory.

As far as it can at present be understood, the language of this letter, which bears no indications of either Sem or Aryan speech, whether in vocabulary or syntax, strongly favors the conclusion that the native Hittite language was a dialect of that spoken by the Akkadians, the Kassites and the Miyanas of Matiee, in the same age.

IV. Religion.—The Hittites like their neighbors adored many gods. Besides Set (or Sutekh), the “great ruler of heaven,” and Istar (Ashthoreth), we also find mentioned (in Hattusil’s treaty) gods and goddesses of “the hills and rivers of the land of the Hatti;” “the great sea, the winds and the clouds.” Tessupas was known to the Babylonians as a name of Rimmon, the god of thunder and rain. On a bilingual seal (in Hittite and cuneiform characters), now in the Ashmolean Museum, we find noticed the goddess Ishara, whose name, among the Kassites, was equivalent to Istar. The Hittite gods are represented—like those of the Assyrians—standing erect on lions. One of them (at Samala in Syria) is lion-headed like Nergal. They also believed in demons, like the Akkadians and others.

Their pantheon was thus also Mongolic, and the suggestion (by Dr. Winckler) that they adored Indian gods (Indra, Varuna), and the

2. Religious Pers Mithra, not only seems improbable, but is also hardly supported by the quotations from Sem texts on which this idea is based. The sphinx is found as a Hittite emblem at Eyuk, N. of Pterium, with the double-headed eagle which again, at Taisili-kana, supports a pair of deities. It also occurs at Tel-loh as an Akkadian emblem, and was adopted by the Seljuk Turks about 1000 AD. At Eyuk we have a representation of a procession bringing goats and rams to an altar. At Hattan-bunar the winged sun is an emblem as in Babylonia. At Mer’an, in Syria, the mother goddess carries her child, while an eagle perches on a harp beside her. At Carchemish the naked Istar is represented with wings. The religious symbolism, like the names of deities, thus suggests a close connection with the emblems and beliefs of the Kassites and Akkadians.
was deciphered by George Smith from a Cypriote-Phoenician bilingual, and appears to give the sounds applying to some 60 signs. These signs are confirmed by the short mention of linguals as yet known, and they appear in Akkadian to similar emblems. We have thus, therefore, the basis of a comparative study, by aid of a known language and script—a method similar to that which enabled Sir H. Rawlinson to recover scientifically the lost cuneiform, or Chaldaic, to decipher Egyptian hieroglyphics. See also ARCHEOLOGY OF ASIA MINOR; RECENT EXPLORATION.

LITERATURE.—The Egyptian notices will be found in Brugsch's A History of Egypt under the Pharaohs, 1870, and the Assy in Schrader's Canoe and Inscriptions of the ORIENT, 1883. For the Translations of the most important texts see the Memoirs of the Deutschen Orient-Gesellschaft, vol. 35, December, 1887. The good work of the present day is detailed in Rawlinson's Tell Amarna Tablets, 2d ed., 1894, and in The Hieroglyphs and Hieratic, 1898. Dr. Sayce has given an account of his researches in a small volume, The Hieroglyphs, 1888, but many discoveries by Sir C. Wilson, Mr. D. G. Hogarth, Sir W. Ramsay, and other explorers have since been published, and are scattered in various periodicals. One of the most important works is H. L. Sayce's turn of mind. Their knowledge of the wilderness and its possible dangers would enable them to be to the Israelites "instead of eyes."

The facts recorded of this man are too meager to enable us to answer all the questions that arise concerning him. A difficulty that remains unsolved is the fact that in Jgs 1 10 and 4 11 he is described as a Kenite, while in Ex 3 1 and 18 1, the father-in-law of Moses is spoken of as "the priest of Midian."—Jesse L. COTTON

HOBAB, hōbāb (חֹבָב, hōḇāḇ), hōḇāḇāh: A place "on the left hand," i.e. to the N. of Damascus, to which Abraham pursued the defeated army of Chedorlaomer (Gen 14 15). It is probably identical with the modern Ḥoba, about 30 miles N.W. of Damascus.

HOBHAYAH, hō-ḥi-ya' (חֹבְּיָה, ḥōḇhāyah), "whom Jehovah hides," i.e. "protects": The head of a priestly family that returned from Babylon with Zerubbabel. Because they could not trace their genealogy, they were not permitted to serve in the priestly office (Neh 7 63 f.). In the K'r of this passage and in the list of Ezra 2 61, this name appears in the form "Habahiah" (חֹבֵיתָה, ḥōḇhāyah). "Obdā" is the form of the word in 1 Esd. 5 38.

HOCK (חֹצ, ʿāḇar, "to root out"): To hamstring, i.e. to render useless by cutting the tendons of the hock (in AV and RV "hough"). In their self-defense they hacked an ox, 6 AV "digged down a wall") (i.e. their destructiveness maiming those which they could not carry off. See also Josh 11 6 9; 2 8 4.

HOD, hod (חֹד, ḥōḏ, "majesty," "splendor"): LXX A, ὅδων, B, ὅδων, ὤδων. One of the sons of Zophiah, a descendant of Asier (1 Ch 7 37).

HODAVIAH, hō-da-ya'ā. See HODAVIAH.
HODAVIAH, hod-a-vi'a (םֹדְאֶוִ֫יַּא), hōdha'wāh, or hōdha'wāḥa, hōdha'wāhāh; LXX Α', Æphiea, Hō-dou̇a
(1) One of the heads of the half-tribe of Manasseh on the E. of the Jordan (1 Ch 5 24).
(2) A Benjamite, the son of Hasseenuah (1 Ch 9 7).

(3) A Levite, who seems to have been the head of an important family in that tribe (2 Chr 20)
In Neh 7 43 the name is Hodevah (םֹדְאֶוִ֫יַּא), hōd-whā, hōdīwāḥ, hōdīwāḥāh, hōdīwāhāḥ, “splendor of Jeh”
A Levite and founder of a Levite family, seventy-four of whom returned from exile with Zerubbabel, 538
BC (Neh 7 43). ARV reads another reading “Hodeiah.”
In Ezr 2 40 he is called Hodevah, of which Hodevah and Hodeiah are slight textual corruptions, and in Ezr 3 9 Judah, a name practically synonymous.

HODEVAH, hō-di'va, hō-di'va (םֹדְאֶוִ֫יַּא), hōdīwāḥ, hōdīwāḥāh, “splendor of Jeh”:
(1) A brother-in-law of Naham (1 Ch 4 19) and possibly for that reason reckoned a member of the tribe of Judah. AV “his wife” is wrong.
(2) One of the Levites who explained to the people the Law as read by Ezra (Neh 8 7) and let their prayers (Neh 9 5). He is doubtless one of the two Levites of this name who sealed the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh 10 13).
(3) One of the chief men of the people who sealed the covenant of Nehemiah (Neh 10 18).

J. GRAY McALLISTER
HOGLAH, hōg la (םֹגֳלָה), hoghlah, “partridge”:
The third of five daughters of Zelophehad of the tribe of Manasseh (Nu 26 33). Z. leaving no male heir, it was made a statute that the inheritance in such cases should pass to the daughters, if such there were, as joint heirs, on condition, however, of marriage within the tribe (Nu 27 1 11; 36 1 12; Josh 17 31).

HOHAM, ho'ham (והָהָם), hōhām, “whom Jeh impels[?]” Ges; An Amorite king of Hebron and one of the five kings of the Amorites who leagued for war on Gibeon because of its treaty of peace with Joshua. The five were defeated in the decisive battle of Beth-horon, shut up in the cave at Mak-edah in which they had taken refuge, and the battle in which they were slain, hanged and cast into the cave (Josh 10 1 27).

HOISE, hoiz: The older form of “hoist” (OE hoist), to raise, to lift, and is the tr of epatriō, “to lift up” they . . . hoisted up the mainsail to the wind” (Acts 27 40). RV “and hoisting up the foresail to the wind”; Wiclif has “let up”; Tindale “hoisted up.”

HOLD, höld: In ARV frequently “stronghold”
(1) The Holiness of God
In Rev 18 2 for AV “eagle” (πουλακέ̄) RV substitutes, as in first clause, “hold,” and in m “prison”

HOLDING, höld'ing: Occurs with various shades of meaning: (1) as the tr of tāmākh, “to acquire,” it has the sense of taking, obtaining (Isa 33 15), RV “that shaketh his hands from taking a bribe,” ERV, as AV, “holding”); (2) of kal, “to hold,” “contain,” having the sense of holding or restraining (Jer 6 11, “I am weary with holding in”); (3) of kratō, “to receive,” “observe,” “maintain” ( Mk 7 3, “holding the tradition of the elders”); 1 Tim 1 19, ἐκόμ., “holding faith and a good conscience”; 3 9 “holding the mystery of the faith in a pure conscience”; (4) holding fast, cleaving to, kratō (Col 2 19, “not holding the head,” RV “holding fast”); of Acts 3 11; Rev 7 1, “holding the four winds of the earth, that no wind should blow”); avĕkham, “to hold over against one's self,” “to hold fast” (Tit 1 9, RV “holding the faithful word”); (5) holding forth, epōchō, “to hold upon, to hold out toward” (Phil 2 16, “holding forth the word of life, so RV); Lightfoot has “holding out” (as offering); others, however, render “holding fast,” preserving in the Christian faith and life—connecting with being “blameless and harmless” in ver 15.

HOLINESS, hō-lin'es (םֹדְאֲוִ֫יַּא, kādōshāh, “holy”, םֹגֳלָה, hōgla, “holiness”): I. In the OT Meaning of the Term
1. The Holiness of God
(1) Absolute holiness and Majesty
(2) Ethical Holiness
2. Holiness of Place, Time and Object
3. Holiness of Men
   (1) Ceremonial
   (2) Ethical and Spiritual
II. In the NT: The Christian Conception
1. Applied to God
2. To Christ
3. To Things
4. To Christians
   (1) As Separated from the World
   (2) As Bound to the Pursuit of an Ethical Ideal
I. In the OT Meaning of the Term. — There has been much discussion as to the original meaning of the Sem root קדשׁ, by which the notion of holiness is expressed in the OT. Some would connect it with an Assy word denoting purity, cleanness; most modern scholars incline to the view that the primary idea is that of setting off or separation. Etymology gives but little aid to the various senses in which the word “holiness” is employed. In primitive Sem usage “holiness” seems to have expressed nothing more than that ceremonial separation of an object from common use which the modern study of savage religions has rendered familiar under the name of taboo (W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites, Lect iv). But within the Bib sphere, with which alone we are immediately concerned, holiness attaches itself first of all, not to visible objects, but to the invisible Jehovah, and to places, seasons, things and human beings only in so far as they are associated with Him. And while the idea of ceremonial holiness runs through the OT, the ethical significance which Christian theology attributes to the term is never wholly absent, and gradually rises in the course of the revelation into more emphatic prominence.

As applied to God the notion of holiness is used in the OT in two distinct senses: (1) First in the more general sense of separation from all that is dyand earthly. It thus notes the holiness of God awfulness of the Creator in His distinction from the creature. In use of the word, “holiness” is little more than an equivalent general term for “Godhead,” and the
adj. “holy” is almost synonymous with “Divine” (cf Dnt 4 8 9 15; 6 11). Jehovah’s “holy arm” (Isa 41 10; Ps 18 1) is His Divine name. When Hannah sings “There is none holy but Jehovah” (1 S 2 2), Holiness

the rest of the verse suggests that she is referring, not to His ethical holiness, but simply to His supernatural being.

(2) But, in the next place, holiness of character in the distinct ethical sense is ascribed to God. The injunction, "Be ye holy; for I am holy" (Lev 11 44; 19 2), plainly implies an ethical conception. Men cannot resemble God in His incomparable attributes. They can reflect His likeness only along the lines of those moral qualities of righteousness and love in which true holiness consists. In the Psalms and Prophets the Divine holiness becomes, above all, an ethical reality convinging men of God and demanding of those who would stand in His presence clean hands and a pure heart (Ps 24 3 f).

From the holiness of God is derived that ceremonial holiness of things which is characteristic of the OT religion. Whatever is consecrated to Him is holy (Lev 19; 25; 22; 26). In and of itself, but anything becomes holy by association with Him. Thus His tabernacle and temple in which His glory is revealed is a holy building (Ex 23 29; 2 Ch 36 5); and all its sacrifices (Ex 29 33), ceremonial materials (30 25; Nu 6 17) and utensils (Ex 8 4). The Sabbath, therefore, is holy because it is the Sabbath of the Lord (Ex 20 8-11). "Holiness, in short, expresses a relation, which consists negatively in separation from common use, and positively in dedication to the service of God" (Skinner, 19, p. 205).

The holiness of men is of two kinds: (1) A ceremonial holiness, corresponding to that of impersonal objects and depending upon their relation to God and (2) moral holiness, consisting in the inward and outward conformity of a person to the ideal of perfection set forth in the Law (Nu 6 20-26). Priests and Levites are holy because they have been "hallowed" or "sanctified" by acts of consecration (Ex 29 1; Lev 8 12; 12; 30). The Nazirite is holy because he has separated himself unto the Lord (Nu 6 5). Above all, Israel, notwithstanding all its sins and shortcomings, is holy, as a nation separated from other nations for Divine purposes and uses (Ex 19 6, etc.; cf. Lev 20 24). (2) But out of this merely ceremonial holiness there emerges a higher holiness that is spiritual in its essence. For unless man was made in the image of God and capable of reflecting the Divine likeness. And as God reveals Himself as ethically holy, He calls man to a holiness resembling His own (Lev 19 2). In the so-called "Law of Holiness," (Heb 7 27-28), God's demand for moral holiness is made clear; and yet the moral contents of the Law are still intermingled with ceremonial elements (17 10 ff; 19 19; 21 1 ff). In psalm and prophesy, however, a purely ethical conception comes to view—the conception of a human holiness which rests upon righteousness and truth (Ps 15 1-4) of the possession of a contrite and humble spirit (Isa 57 15). This corresponds to the knowledge of a God who, being Himself ethically holy, esteemeth justice, mercy and lowly and pitifully more highly than sacrifice (Hos 6 6; Mic 6 6-8).

II. In the NT: The Christian Conception.——

The idea of holiness is expressed here chiefly by the word ἁγιός and its derivatives, which correspond very closely to the words of the K downward group in the LXX. They signify the being of Him who is nearest to God, not only in an intellectual sense, but in every sense. The distinctive feature of the NT idea of holiness is that the external aspect of it has almost entirely disappeared, and the ethical meaning has become supreme. The ceremonial idea still exists in some respects (cf. Gal 4 8-9, 15; 1 Pt 1 14; Rev 18 20), but it is subordinate to the idea of holy character and life as manifested in the life of Christ and His people, which is the universal idea of holiness in the NT. In the NT the term "holy" is seldom applied to God, and except in quotations from the OT (Heb 10 6; 2 Pet 1 3) only in the

1. Applied in Johannine writings (Jn 17 11; Rev 4 8; 6 10). But it is constantly used of the Spirit of God (Mt 1 18; Acts 2.2; Rom 5 5, etc.) who, in contrast with OT usage, becomes specifically the Holy Spirit or Holy Ghost.

In several passages the term is

2. Applied to Christ (Mt 1 24; Acts 3 to Christ; 14; 4 30, etc.), as being the very type of ethical perfection (cf. Heb 7 26).

In keeping with the fact that things are holy in a derivative sense through their relationship to God, the word is used of Jesus (Mt 4 5), of the OT covenants (Lk 1 76), the OT things, Scriptures (Rom 1 2), the Law (Ex. 12), the Mount of Transfiguration (2 Pet 1 18, etc.), but it is esp. in its application to Christians that the idea of holiness meets us in the NT in a sense that is characteristic and distinctive.

3. Applied to Christians "saints" or holy persons, holiness in the high ethical and spiritual meaning of the word is used to denote the appropriate quality of their life and conduct. (1) Notwithstanding the idea of believers, "saints" conveys in the first place the notion of a separation from the world and a consecration to God. Just as Israel under the old covenant was a chosen race, so the Christian church in succeeding to Israel's privileges becomes a holy nation (1 Pet 2 9), and the Christian individual, as one of the elect people, becomes a holy man or woman (Col 3 12). In Paul's usage all baptized persons are "saints," however far they may still be from the saintly character (cf 1 Cor 1 2 14 with 6 1 ff). (2) But though the use of the name does not imply high ethical character as a realized fact, it always assumes it as an ideal and an obligation. It is taken for granted that the Holy Spirit has taken up His abode in the heart of every regenerate person, and that a work of positive sanctification is going on there. The NT leaves no room for the thought of a holiness divorced from those moral qualities which the holy God demands in those whom He has called to be His people. See SANCTIFICATION.

HOLLOW, hol'ō (ὁλός, kapb, kapib, nāḇāḇahh): "Hollow" is the tr of kapb, "hollow" (Gen 32 32, "the hollow of his thigh, the hip-pan or socket, over the sciatic nerve") or ṣēḇā'āṯ, "to be hollow" (Ex 27 8; 38 7; Jer 52 21); of šōā'āl, "hollow" (Isa 40 12, "Who hath measured the waters in the hollow of his hand?" [in handfuls]; cf 1 K 20 10; Ezk 13 19); of mākhtōṣāh, "a mortar," "socket of a loom"; (from a root meaning "to hollow"; 15 19, "God clave [RV the hollow place that is in Lehi]"); of ṣāḇḳā'āḇārōth, prob. from kā'ār, "to sink" (Lev 14 37, "the walls of the house with hollow strakes") or ERV, ARV "hollow streaks," or "hollows"); of ʿāḇōl; and 17 19, the "hollow mountains," RV "hollows of the mountains," or "hollows of kōlōmā (2 Macc 1 19, "hollow place of a pit"), RV "hollow of a well"); of antrôdès (2 5, "a hollow cave," RV "a chamber in the rock"): in "Gr a cavernous chamber").

HOLM-TREE, hôm'trē:
(1) ἑλμός, terebinth (Isa 44 14, AV "cypress"): The name, from the root meaning (of Arab, tarasè) "to be hard," implies some very hard wood. Vulg has ilex, which is lat for holm oak, so named from its holly-like leaves (holên in OE = "holy"); this tr has now been adopted, but it is doubtful.
(2) πῦρος, prinos, Sus ver 58. This is the ilex or holm oak. There is a play on the words prinos and prîsai (lit. "saw") in vs 58 and 59 (see Subanna). The evergreen or holm oak is represented by two species in Pal, Queerus ilex and Q. coccifera. The leaf of both species is somewhat like a small holly leaf, is glossy green and usually spiny. The Q. ilex is insignificant, but Q. coccifera is a magnificent tree growing to a height of 40 ft. or more, and often found in Pal flourishing near sacred spots and not infrequently the object of superstitious veneration.

HOLOFERNES, holô-ô-for'nez (Olophénos, Olóphorônas): According to the Book of Jth, chief captain of Nebuchadnezzar, king of the Assyrians (Jth 2 4), who was commissioned to make war upon the West country (whereas the inhabitants the usual tokens of complete subjugation were. The leader of the expedition of H., who thus became the principal persecutor of the Jews, was to compel men everywhere to worship Nebuchadnezzar. He was slain by Judith, the heroine of the book of that name, during the siege of Bethulia. There is no notice of H. except in the Book of Jth. The termination of the word would seem to indicate a Pers origin for the name. The H. of Shakpare and Rabelais is in no way connected with the heroes of the H. of the Apoc.

HOLON, hôlôn (יִולֶון or יִולֶה, hôleh):
(1) One of the towns in the hill country of Judah (Josh 15 31), assigned to the Levites of Benjamin (15). In 1 Ch. 6 58 (Heb 58), it is HILEN (which see). The site may be the important ruins of Beit 'Alam (see PEF, I, 313, 321, Sh XXI).
(2) Probably once an important town in the "plain", i.e. plateau, of Moab (Jer 48 21); the site is unknown.

HOLYDAY, hôlî-di: This word occurs twice in AV, viz. Ps 42 4, "is multitude that kept [RV "keeping"] holiday day," and Col 2 16. In the latter case it is a rendering of the Gr word ἑορτὴ, heortê, the ordinary term for a religious festival. RV tr "feast day." In the former instance "keeping holyday day" renders ἱεροσυλλογή, hêrosulôghê. The vb. means to "make a pilgrimage," or "keep a religious festival.
Occasionally the idea of merrymaking prevails, as in 30 10 "eating and drinking," and enjoying themselves merrily. The Psalmist (who was perhaps an exiled priest) remembers with poignant regret how he used to lead religious processions on festival occasions.

HOLY GHOST, hôlî gôst: See HOLY SPIRIT.

HOLY OF HOLIES, hôlîz (חֵן חֵן שִׁפַּחַת, hôdheš ha-hôdhashîm, Ex 26 33, 33, ha-Ôhekha, 1 K 16 7, etc; ë φραντι σκηνη, ê prôti skînê, ë prôti skînê, He 9 6 f): The tabernacle consisted of two divisions to which a graduated scale of holiness is attached: "the veil shall separate unto you between the holy place and the most holy" (Ex 26 33). This distinction was never abrogated. In the Ep. to the He these divisions are called the "first" and "second" tabernacles (He 9 6 f). The term "holy place" is not indeed confined to the outer chamber of the sanctuary; in Lev 6 16, it is applied to "the court of the tent of meeting.

But the other is its technical use. In Solomon's temple we have a different usage. The word hêkhal, "temple," is not at first applied, as after, to the whole building, but is the designation specifically of the holy place, in distinction from the abhār, or "oracle" (cf 1 K 6 3.5.16.17.33, etc; so in Exk 41 1.24, etc). The wider usage is later (cf 2 K 11 10.11.13, etc).

The size of the holy place differed at different times. The holy place of the tabernacle was 20 cubits long by 10 broad and 10 high (30x15x15 ft); that of Solomon's the Holy of Holies was increased to ten, 1 K 7 49), and a table breadth—40 by 20 cubits; but it is noted that in height it was the full internal height of the building, while the Herodian temple has the same dimensions of length and breadth, but Jos and Midrōth give largely increased, though differing, numbers for the height (see Temple, Herod's).

The contents of the holy place were from the beginning ordered to be these (Ex 25 23 ff; 30 1–10): the altar of incense, a golden candlestick (in Solomon's temple increased to ten, 1 K 7 49), and a table of shewbread (increased to ten, 2 Ch 4 8). For the construction, position, history and uses of these objects, see Tabernacle; Temple, and arts. under the several headings. This, as shown by Jos and by the sculptures of the Arch of Titus, seem to be the furniture of the holy place till the end.

As the outer division of the sanctuary, into which, as yet, not the people, but only their representatives in the priesthood, were admitted while yet the symbols of the people's consecrated life (light, thanksgiving) were found in it, the holy place may be said to represent the people's relation to God in the earthly life, as the holy of holies represented God's relation to the people in a perfected communion. In the Ep. to the He, the holy place is not largely dwelt on as compared with the court in which the perfect sacrifice was offered, and the holiest of all into which Christ has now entered (Christ passes "through" the tabernacle into the holiest, 9 11). It pertains, however, evidently to the earthly sphere of Christ's manifestation, even as earth is the present scene of the church's fellowship. Through earth, by the way which Christ has opened up, the Holy Spirit "in spirit, finally in fact, comes with Him into the holiest" (He 10 19; cf 8; see Westcott, Hebrews, 233 f).

LITERATURE

The expression Spirit, or Spirit of God, or Holy Spirit, is found in the great majority of the books of the Bible. In the OT the Heb word uniformly employed for the Spirit as referring to God's Spirit is הָנְפָר, הָנְפָר, meaning "breath," "wind" or "breeze..."

The vb. form of the word is הָנְפָר, הָנְפָר, הָנְפָר, "to blow." A kindred vb. is הָנְפָר, הָנְפָר, הָנְפָר, meaning "to breathe," "having breathing room," "to be spacious," etc. The word always used in the NT for the Spirit is the Gr neuter noun πνεῦμα, πνεῦμα, with or without the article, and for Holy Spirit, πνεῦμα ἑαυτοῦ, πνεῦμα ἑαυτοῦ, ἑαυτοῦ. In the NT we find also the expressions, "the Spirit of God," "the Spirit of the Lord," "the Spirit of the Father," "the Spirit of Jesus," "of Christ." The word πνεῦμα in the Gr is from the Heb הָנְפָר, הָנְפָר, הָנְפָר, "to breathe," "to blow." The corresponding word in the Lat is spiritus, meaning "spirit."

I. THE TEACHINGS AS TO THE SPIRIT IN THE OT

1. Meaning of the Word which is "wind," as refers to the ring to Nature, arises the idea of breath in man and thence the breath, wind or breath, of God. We have attempted to trace the meaning the minds of the Bib. writers connected the earlier literal meaning of the word with the Divine Spirit. Nearly all shades of meaning from the lowest to the highest appear in the OT, and it is not difficult to conceive how the original meaning was gradually expanded into the larger and wider. The following are some of the shades of OT usage. From the notion of wind or breath, שׁוּאָה came to signify: (1) the principle of life itself; spirit in this sense indicated the degree of vitality; "My spirit is consumed, my days are extinct" (Job 17 1); also Jgs 15 19; 1 S 30 12); (2) human feelings of various kinds, as anger (Jgs 8 3; Prov 29 11), desire (I sa 26 9), courage (Josh 2 11); (3) intelligence (Ex 35 9; I sa 29 24); (4) the general disposition (Ps 34 18; 51 17; Prov 14 29; 16 18; 29 23).

No doubt the Bib. writers thought of man as made in the image of God (Gen 1 27 f), and it was easy for them to think of God as being like man. It is remarkable that their anthropomorphism did not go farther. They preserve, however, a highly spiritual conception of God as compared with that of surrounding nations. But as the human breath was an invisible part of man, and as it represented his vitality, his life and energy, it was easy to transfer the conception to God in the effort to represent His energetic and transitive action upon man and Nature. The Spirit of God, therefore, as based upon the idea of the שׁוּעַ or breath of man, originally stood for the energy or power of God (I sa 31 3; of A. B. Davidson, Theology of the OT, 117–18), as contrasted with the weakness of the flesh.

We consider next the Spirit of God in relation to God Himself in the OT. Here there are several points to be noted. The first is that there is no indication of belief that the Spirit of God was a material particle or emanation from God. The point of view of Bib. writers is nearly always practical rather than speculative; they did not philosophize about the Divine nature. Nevertheless, they retained a very clear distinction between spirit and flesh or other material forms. Again we observe in the OT both an identification of God and the Spirit of God, and also a clear distinction between them. The identification is seen in Ps 139:7 where the consciousness of the soul is directly ascribed to God; Jer 31:33; Ezek 36:27. In a great number of passages, however, God and the Spirit of God are not thought of as identical, as in Gen 1:2; 6:3; Neh 9:20; Ps 51:11; 104:29f. Of course this does not mean that God and the Spirit are two distinct beings in the thought of OT writers, but only that the Spirit had functions of His own in distinction from God. The Spirit was God in action, particularly when the action was specific, with a view to accomplishing some particular end or purpose of God. The Spirit came upon individuals for special purposes. The Spirit was thus God immanent in man and in the world. As the angel of the Lord, or angel of the Covenant in certain passages, represents both Jeh Himself and one sent by Jeh, so in like manner the Spirit of Jeh was both Jeh within or upon man, and at the same time one sent by Jeh to man. Do the OT teachings indicate that in the view of a writer like Gen 1:26 the Spirit of Jeh was a distinct person in the Divine nature? The passages in Gen 1:26 is scarcely conclusive. The idea and importance of personality were but slowly developed in Israelitish thought. Not until some of the later prophets did it receive great emphasis, and even then scarcely in the fully developed form. The statement of Gen 1:26 may be taken as the pl. of majesty or as referring to the Divine council, and on this account is not conclusive for the Trinitarian view. Indeed, there are OT passages which compel us to understand the complete NT doctrine of the Trinity and the distinct personality of the Spirit in the NT sense. There are, however, numerous OT passages which are in harmony with the Trinitarian conception and prepare the way for it, such as Ps 139:7; Isa 63:10; 48:16; Hag 2:5; Zec 4:6. The Spirit is grieved, vexed, and, in other ways as well, is conceived of personally, but as He is God in action, God exerting power, this was the natural way for the OT writers to think of the Spirit. A suggestion has been raised as to how the Bib. writers were able to hold the conception of the Spirit of God without violence to their monotheism. A suggested reply is that the idea of the Spirit came gradually and indirectly from the conception of angels which was prevalent among some of the surrounding nations (I. F. Wood, The Spirit of God in Bib. Literature, 30). But the best Israelitish thought developed in opposition to, rather than in analogy with, polytheism. A more natural explanation seems to be that their simple anthropomorphism led them to conceive the Spirit of God as the breath of God parallel with the conception of man’s breath as being part of man and yet going forth from him.

We consider next the Spirit of God in external Nature. “And the Spirit of God moved [was brooding or hovering] upon the face of the waters” (Gen 1:2). The figure is that of a brooding or hovering bird over its nest or brood, which护神了 the pre-existence of the world as an organized universe. Again in Ps 104:28-30, God sends forth His Spirit, and visible things are created into being by the Spirit, as they are created; and thou renewest the face of the ground.” In Job 36:13 the beauty of the heavens is ascribed to the Spirit: “By His Spirit the heavens are garnished.” In Isa 32:15 the wilderness becomes a fruitful field as the result of the outpouring of the Spirit. The Bib. writers scarcely took into their thinking the idea of second causes, certainly not in the modern scientific sense. They regarded the phenomena of Nature as the result of God’s direct action through His Spirit. At every point the Bib. writers regard the Spirit as having them from pantheism on the one hand and polytheism on the other.

The Spirit may next be considered in imparting natural powers both physical and intellectual. In Gen 2 7 God originates man’s person al and intellectual life by breathing the Spirit of God into his nostrils “the breath of life.” God in Man

In Nu 15:22 God is “the God of the spirits of all flesh.” In Ex 31:3; 35:31, wisdom for all kinds of workmanship is declared to be the gift of God. So also physical life is due to the presence of the Spirit of God (Job 27:3); and Elihu declares (Job 33:4) that the Spirit of God made him. See also Ezek 37:14 and 39:29. Thus man is regarded by the OT writers, in all the parts of his being, body, mind and spirit, as the direct result of the action of the Spirit of God. In Gen 6:3 the Spirit of God “strewe’d” with or “rules” in or is “humbled” in man in the antediluvian world, is then present in the Spirit’s activity over and above, but within the moral nature of man.

The greater part of the OT passages which refer to the Spirit of God deal with the subject from the point of view of the covenant relations between Jeh and Israel. And the great part of these, in turn, have the greater part of them, these are so numerous that our limits of space forbids an exhaustive presentation. The chief points we may notice.

1. Powers conferred upon judges and warriors.

The children of Israel cried unto Jeh and He raised up a savior for them, Othniel, the son of Kenaz: “And the Spirit of Jeh came upon him, and he judged Israel” (Jgs 3:10). So also Gideon (Jgs 6:34): “The Spirit of Jeh came upon [lit. clothed itself with] Gideon.” In Jgs 11:29 “the spirit of Jeh came upon Jephthah”; and in 13:25 “the Spirit of Jeh began to move” Samson. In 14:6 “the spirit of Jeh came mightily upon him.” In 15:14 we read “the Spirit of Jeh departed from Saul, and an evil spirit from Jeh troubled him.” In all this class of passages, the Spirit imparts special endowments of power without necessary reference to the moral character of the recipient. The end in view is not personal, merely to the agent, but concerns the theocratic kingdom and implies the covenant between God and Israel. In some cases the Spirit exerts physical energy in a more direct way (2 K 2:16; Ezek 2:11; 3:12).

2) Wisdom and skill bestowed for various purposes.

—Intellect is filled with the Spirit of God in wisdom and in understanding to work in gold, and silver and brass, etc, in the building of the tabernacle (Ex 31:2-4; 35:31); and the Spirit of wisdom is given to others in making Aaron’s garments (Ex 32:30). So also bestowed on the builder of the temple (1 K 7:4; 2 Ch 2:14). In these cases there seems to be a combination of the thought of natural talents and skill to which is superadded a special endowment of the Spirit. Pharaoh refers to Joseph as one in whom the Spirit of God is, as fitting him for administration and government (Gen 41:38). Joshua is qualified for leadership by the Spirit (Nu 27:18). In this and in Dt 34:9, Joshua is represented as possessing the Spirit through the laying on of the hands of Moses. This is an interesting contrast to later developments where the laying on of hands in the NT (Acts 8:17; 19:6) is described as a means of imparting the Spirit, with the result that the Spirit is not laid up in the individual but is realized in the church as a whole.

The Spirit was given to the NT church by the laying on of hands in the NT (Acts 8:17; 19:6). This is the case of Balaam, who was given the Spirit by the laying on of hands in the OT (Num 24:21). The laying on of hands was a sign of the Spirit's presence and was a means of imparting the Spirit to the individual. It was also a sign of the Spirit's presence in the church, and it was a sign of the Spirit's power to give gifts and blessings.

The Spirit was given to people in the Old Testament. For example, the Spirit was given to Samuel, who was called to be a prophet (1Sam 10:6). The Spirit was also given to David, who was called to be the king of Israel (2Sam 7:14). The Spirit was given to the prophets, who were called to prophesy (Jer 1:7). The Spirit was also given to the apostles, who were called to be the leaders of the church (Acts 1:8).

The Spirit was also given to the people of Israel in the Old Testament. For example, the Spirit was given to the people of Israel as a sign of their covenant with God (Exod 19:3). The Spirit was also given to the people of Israel as a means of sending them into the promised land (Num 11:17). The Spirit was also given to the people of Israel as a means of enabling them to do great things (Jer 20:11). The Spirit was also given to the people of Israel as a means of empowering them to overcome their enemies (2Kings 15:22).

The Spirit was also given to the people of Israel in the New Testament. For example, the Spirit was given to the people of Israel as a sign of their new covenant with God (Acts 2:38). The Spirit was also given to the people of Israel as a means of enabling them to do great things (Eph 3:20). The Spirit was also given to the people of Israel as a means of empowering them to overcome their enemies (1Cor 12:8). The Spirit was also given to the people of Israel as a means of enabling them to live a holy life (1Pet 1:22).
much difference of opinion. As in the case of the ideal Davídic King which, in the prophet's mind, passes from the lower to the higher and Messianic conception, so, under the form of the Suffering Servant, the "remnant" of Israel becomes the basis for an ideal which transcends in the Messianic sense the original nucleus of the conception derived from the historic events in the history of Israel. The prophet rises in the employment of both conceptions to the thought of the Messiah who is the "anointed" of Jah as endued esp. with the power and wisdom of the Spirit. In Isa 11:1-5 a glowing picture is given of the "shoot out of the stock of Jesse." The Spirit imparts "wisdom and understanding" and endows him with manifold gifts through the exercise of which he shall bring in the kingdom of righteousness and peace. In Isa 42:1 ff, the "servant" is in like manner endowed most richly with the gifts of the Spirit by virtue of which he shall bring forth "justice to the Gentiles." In Isa 61:1 ff occur the notable words cited by Jesus in Lk 4:18, beginning, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me," etc. In these passages the prophet describes elaborately and minutely the Messiah's endowment with a wide range of powers, all of which are traced to the action of God's Spirit.

In the latter history of Israel, when the sufferings of the exile ended heathen, there arose a tendency to idealize a past age as the era of the special blessing of the Spirit, coupled with a very marked optimism as to a future outpouring of the Spirit. In Hag 2:6 reference is made to the Mo-saic period as the age of the Spirit, "when ye came out of Egypt, and my Spirit abode among you." In Is. 44:3 the Spirit is to be poured out on Jacob and his seed; and in Is. 65:19 the age to come is to come to Zion under the domin-ant of Jah, and the Spirit is to abide upon the people. The passage, however, which esp. indicates the transition from OT to NT times is that in Joel 2:28-32 which is cited by Peter in Acts 2:17-21. In this prophecy the bestowal of the Spirit is extended to all classes, is attended by marvelous signs and is accompanied by the gift of salvation. Looking back from the later to the earlier period of OT history, we observe a twofold tendency of teach-ings in the relation. The first is from the outward gift of the Spirit for various uses toward a deepening sense of inner need of the Spirit for moral purity, and consequent emphasis upon the ethical energy of the Spirit. The second tendency is toward a sense of the merely human or theocratic national organization in and of itself to achieve the ends of Jah, along with a sense of the need for the Spirit of God upon the people generally, and a prediction of the universal diffusion of the Spirit.

II. The Spirit in Non-Canonical Jewish Literature.—In the Palestinian and Alexandria literature of the Jews there are comparatively few references to the Spirit of God. The two books in which the teachings as to the Spirit are most explicit and most fully developed are of Alexandrian origin, viz., The Wisdom of Solomon and the writings of Philo.

In the OT Apocrypha and in Jos the references to the Spirit are nearly always merely echoes of a long-past age when the Spirit was active among men. In no par-ticular is the contrast between the canonical and non-canonical literature more striking than in the teaching as to the Spirit of God. Jos has a number of references to the Holy Spirit; but nearly always he is to do with the long-past history of Israel. He refers to 22 books of the OT which are of the utmost reliability. There are "more than 600" of like authen-ticy," because there has been an exact succession of prophets" (Cap. 1, 9). Samuel is described as having a large place in the affairs of the kingdom because he is a prophet (Ant. VI, v. 6). God appears to Solomon in sleep and teaches him wisdom (ib. VIII, 11): Balaam prophesies through the Spirit's power (ib. IV, v. 6); and Moses was granted a prophet that his words might be preserved (ib. IV, viii. 49). In Jos we have then simply a testimony to the inspiration and power of the prophet by the books written by them, in so far as we have in him teach-ings regarding the Spirit of God. Even here the action of the Spirit is usually implied rather than expressed.

In the apocryphal writings the Spirit of God is usually refereed to as acting in the OT history of Israel or in the future Messianic age. In the apocalyptic books, the past age of power, when the Spirit was welded, becomes the ground of the hope of the future kingdom of God, and the seven sealing the books becomes the hope of a future kingdom of glory and power. Enoch says to Methuse-lah: "The word come, and the Spirit is poured out upon me" (En 91). In 49:1-4 the Messiah has the Spirit of wisdom, understanding and might. Enoch is represented as describing, his own translation. "He was carried aloft in the chariots of the Spirit" (En 70 for the word chariot of the Spirit is poured out upon me") (En 91). The Spirit is poured out upon me). Sometimes the action of the Spirit is closely connected with the moral life, although this is rare. "The Spirit of God rests" on the man of turno and loving heart (XII, P. 8). In Simeon 4 it is declared that Joseph was a good man and that the Spirit of God rested on him. There appears at times a lament for the Spirit and proph-ecv (1 Macc 9:27; 14:41). The future is depicted in glowing colors. The Spirit is the "Spirit of might, and Spirit of wisdom and Spirit of understanding" (XII P. 18); and the spirit of holiness shall rest upon the redeemed in Paradise (Levi 15); and in Levi 2 the Spirit of insight is given to men with the Christian in the spiritual world and its salvation follows. Generally speaking, this literature is far below the moral and religious insight. Much of it seems childish, although at times we encounter noble passages. There is lacking in it the implied OT mode which is best described as prophetic, in which the writer feels constrained by a duty to the spirit and to write. The OT literature thus possesses a vitality and power which accounts for the strength of its appeal to our religious consciousness.

We note in the next place a few teachings as to the Spirit of God in Wisd. Here the ethical element in character is a condition of the Spirit's indwelling. "Into a malicious spirit the soul wisdom shall not enter: nor dwell in any unrighteousness" (Wisd 9:17). For the spirit of the Lord filleth the world," and in vs. 9.9 there is a return to the conception of un-righteousness as a hindrance to right speaking. In Wisd 7 the Spirit of Wisdom comes in response to prayer. In 7:22-30 is a very beautiful description of wisdom: "In her is understanding, and holy, one only, manifold, subtil, lively, clear, undefiled, plain, not subject to hurt, loving the thing that is good, quick, which cannot be letted, ready to do good, kind to man, steadfast, sure," etc. "She is the brightness of the everlasting light, the unspected mirror of the power of God, and the image of his goodness," etc. No one can know God's counsel except by the Holy Spirit (19:17). The writer of Wisd speaks of the sense of the omnipresence of the Spirit of God, as seen in 1:7 and in 12:1. In the latter passage we read: "For thine incorruptible spirit is in all things." In Philo we have what is almost wholly wanting in other Jewish literature, viz., analytic and reflective thinking as a result of the dualism of the reason of God. The interest in Philo is primarily in the Spirit in its philosophical, and his teachings on the Spirit possess special interest on this account in contrast with Bib. and other extra-Bib. literature. In his Questions and Solutions, 27, 28, he explains the phenomenon in Gen 8:1: "He brought a breath over the earth and the wind ceased." He argues that water is not diminished by wind, but only agitated and dis-tured. Hence there must be a reference to God's Spirit or breath by which the whole universe obtains security. He has a similar discussion of the point why the word "Spirit" is not used instead of "breath" in Gen in the account of man's creation, and concludes that "to breathe into" here means to "inspire," and that God by His Spirit imparted to man mental and moral life and capacity for Divine things (Allegories, xiii). In several passages Philo discusses prophecy and the prophetic office. One of the most interesting relates to the prophetic office of Moses (Life of Moses, iii ff). He also describes a false prophet who claims to be "inspired and possessed by the Holy Spirit" (On Those Who Offer Sacrifice, xi). In a very notable passage, Philo describes in detail his own subjective experiences under the influence of the Holy Spirit, and his language is that of the intellectual mystic. He says that at times he found himself devoid of impulse or capacity for mental activity, when suddenly by the coming of the Spirit of God, his intellect was rendered very fruitful: "and sometimes when I have come to my work empty I have suddenly become full, ideas being, in an invisible manner, showered upon me and implanted in me from on high; so that through the influence of Divine inspiration I have become greatly knit together, not in the same place in which I was, nor those who were present, nor myself, nor what I was saying, nor what I was writing," etc (Migrations of Abraham, vii).

In Philo, as in the non-canonical literature generally, there is a metaphysical teaching as to the Spirit and His relations to the Godhead. On this point there is no material advance over the OT teaching. The agency of the Holy Spirit in shaping and maintaining the physical universe and as the source of the spiritual capacities in man is recognized in Philo. In Philo, as in Jos, the conception of inspiration as the complete occupation and domination of the prophet's mind by the Spirit of God, even to the extent of suspending the operation of the natural powers, comes clearly into view. This is rather in contrast with, than in conformity to, the OT and NT conception of inspiration, in which the personality of the prophet remains intensely active while under the influence of the Holy Spirit, except possibly in cases of vision and trance.

III. The Holy Spirit in the NT.—In the NT there is unusual symmetry and completeness of teaching as to the work of the Spirit of God in relation to the Messiah and to the Messianic kingdom. The simplest mode of presentation will be to trace the course of the progressive activities of the Spirit, or teachings regarding these activities, as these are presented to us in the NT literature as we now have it, so far as the nature of the subject will permit. This will, of course, disturb to some extent the chronological order in which the NT books were written, since in some cases, as in John's Gospel, a very late book contains early teaching as to the Spirit.

1. The Spirit in Relation to the Person of Christ (I 20), all of which is declared to be in the person of Christ. (A) The fulfillment of the prophecy that a virgin shall bring forth a son whose name shall be called Immanuel (Isa 7 14). In Mt 1 35 the Spirit (pneuma hagion) shall come upon her, and the power of the Most High (μονιματις Υπερσιους) shall overshadow her. Here "Holy Spirit" and "power of the Most High" are expressions meaning the same thing; in the one case emphasizing the Divine source and in the other the holiness of "the holy thing which is begotten" (I 35). In connection with the presentation of the babe in the temple, Simeon is described as one upon whom the Holy Spirit rested, to whom revelation was made through the Spirit (Lk 2 25-28). So also Anna the prophetess speaks concerning the babe, evidently in Luke's thought, under the influence of the Holy Spirit (Lk 2 36 ff).

It is clear from the foregoing that the passages in Mt and Lk need to be set forth, first, the supernatural origin, and secondly, the sinlessness of the babe born of Mary. The act of the Holy Spirit is regarded as creative, although the words employed signify "begotten" or "born" (γενναθης, γενναθηναι, Mt 1 20; and γενναθης, γενναθηναι, Lk 1 35). There is no hint in the stories of the nativity concerning the pretemporal existence of Christ. This doctrine was developed later. Nor is there any suggestion of the immaculate conception or sinlessness of Mary, the mother of Our Lord. Dr. C. A. Briggs has set forth a theory of the sinlessness of Mary somewhat different from the Roman Catholic view, to the effect that the OT prophecies foretell the purification of the Davidic line, and that Mary was begotten in the womb of her father, who thereby became sinless (Incarnation of the Lord, 230-34). This, however, is speculative and without substantial Bib. warrant. The sinlessness of Jesus was not due to the sinlessness of His mother, but to the Divine origin of His human nature, the Spirit of God.

In He 10 5 ff the writer makes reference to the sinless body of Christ as affording a perfect offering for sins. No direct reference is made to the birth of Jesus, but the very nature of God is clearly set forth (He 10 5), though not specifically to the Holy Spirit.

2. The baptism of Jesus.—The NT records give us very little information regarding the growth of Jesus to manhood. In Lk 2 40 ff a picture is given of the boyhood, exceedingly brief, but full of significance. The "child grew, and waxed strong, filled with wisdom [in "becoming full of wisdom"]: and the grace of God was upon him." Then follows the account of the visit to the temple and the circumcision, and all these experiences, the boy is under the influence and guidance of the Spirit. This alone would supply an adequate explanation, although Luke does not expressly name the Spirit as the source of these experiences. The Spirit's action is rather assumed.

Great emphasis, however, is given to the descent of the Spirit upon Jesus at His baptism. Mt 3 16 declares that after His baptism "the heavens were opened unto him, and he saw the Spirit of God descending as a dove, and coming upon him." Mk 1 10 repeats the statement in substantially equivalent terms. Lk 3 22 declares that the Spirit descended in "bodily form, as a dove" (τροφος εις ους πνενθης, σωματικοι ελικοι ην περιεχομενοι). In Jn 3 32-33 the Baptist testifies that he saw the Spirit descending upon Jesus as a dove out of heaven, and that it abide upon Him, and, further, that this descent of the Spirit was the mark by which he was to recognize Jesus as "he that baptizedeth in the Holy Spirit."

We gather from these passages that at the baptism there was a new communication of the Spirit to Jesus in great fullness, as a special anointing for His public ministry. Lk 4:14-16 declares that the dovelike appearance was seen by Jesus as by John, which is scarcely compatible with a subjective experience merely. Of course, the dove here is to be taken as a symbol, and not as an assertion that God's Spirit assumed the form of a dove actually.
Various meanings have been assigned to the symbol. One connects it with the creative power, according to a gentle usage; others with the speculative philosophy of Alexandrian Judaism, according to which the dove symbolized the Divine wisdom or reason. But the most natural explanation connects it with the brooding or hovering of the Spirit in Gen 1:3. In this new spiritual creation of humanity, as in the first physical creation, the Spirit of God is the energy through which the work is carried on. Possibly the dove, as a symbol of peace, complete in itself, may suggest the totality and fulness of the gift of the Spirit to Jesus. At Pentecost, on the contrary, the Spirit is bestowed distributively and partially to at least individuals as such, as suggested by the seven tongues as of fire which "sat upon each one of them" (Acts 2:3). Jn 3:34 emphasizes the fulness of the bestowal upon Jesus: "For he whom God hath sent speaketh the words of God: for he giveth not the Spirit by measure." In the witness of the Baptist the permanence of the anointing of Jesus is declared: "Upon whomsoever thou shalt see the Spirit descending, and abiding" (1:33).

It is probable that the connection of the bestowal of the Spirit with water baptism, as seen later in the Book of Acts, is traceable to the reception of the Spirit at Jesus' own baptism. Baptism in the Spirit did not supersede water baptism.

The gift of the Spirit in fulness to Jesus at His baptism was no doubt His formal and public anointing for His Messianic work (Acts 10:38). The baptism of Jesus could not have the same significance with that of sinful men. For the symbolic cleansing from sin had no meaning for the sinless one. Yet as an act of formal public consecration it was appropriate to the Messiah. It brought to a close His human life and introduced Him to His public Messianic career. The conception of an anointing for public service was a familiar one in the OT writings and applied to the priest (Ex 28:41; 40:13; Lev 4:5.16; 26:22); to kings (1 Kgs 9:18; 10:1; 15:1; 16:33); sometimes to prophets (1 Kgs 19:16; of Isa 61:1; Psa 2:2; 20:6). These anointings were with oil, and the oil came to be regarded as a symbol of the Spirit of God.

The anointing of Jesus with the Holy Spirit qualified Him in two particulars for His Messianic office: (a) it signified the source of His own endowments of power for the endurance of temptation, for teaching, for casting out demons, and healing the sick, for His sufferings and death, for His resurrection and ascension. The question is often raised, why Jesus, the Divine one, should have needed the Holy Spirit for His Messianic vocation. The reply is that His human nature, which was real, required the Spirit's presence. Man, made in God's image, is constituted in dependence upon the Spirit of God. Apart from God's Spirit man fails of his true destiny, simply because our nature is constituted as dependent upon the indwelling Spirit of God for the performance of our true functions. Jesus as human, therefore, required the presence of God's Spirit, for understanding His Divine-human consciousness. (b) The Holy Spirit's coming upon Jesus in fulness also qualified Him to bestow the Holy Spirit upon His disciples. John the Baptist esp. predicts that it is He who shall baptize in the Holy Spirit (Mt 3:11; Mk 1:8; Lk 3:16; see also Jn 1:7). It was esp. true of the king that He was anointed for His office, and the term Messiah (מֶשֶׁךְ, mashšēh), equivalent to the Gr Ἐρυρχός, ho Christēs), meaning the Anointed One, points to this fact.

(3) The temptation of Jesus.—The facts as to the temptations are as follows: In Mt 4:1 we are told that Jesus was led by the Spirit into the wilderness to be tempted of the devil. Mk 1:12 declares in his graphic way that after the baptism "straightway the Spirit driveth [ἐκδηλωθή, ekdhlethē] him forth into the wilderness." Lk 4:1 more fully declares that Jesus was "full of the Holy Spirit," and that He was "led in the Spirit in the wilderness during 40 days." The impression which the narratives of the temptation give is of energetic spiritual conflict. As the Messiah confronted His life task He was subject to the ordinary conditions of other men in an evil world. Not by sheer divinity and acting from without as God, but as human also and a part of the world, He must overcome, so that while He was sinless, it was nevertheless true that the righteousness of Jesus was also an achieved righteousness. The temptations were no doubt such as were peculiar to His Messianic vocation, the misuse of power, the presumption of faith and the appeal of temporal splendor. To these He opposed the restraint of power, the poise of faith and the conception of a kingdom wholly spiritual in its origin, means and ends. Jesus is hurled, as it were, by the Spirit into this terrific conflict with the powers of evil, and His conquest, like the temptations themselves, was not final, but typical and representative; it is true that the temptations of Jesus ended at the close of the forty days. Later in His ministry, He refers to the disciples as those who had been with Him in His temptations (Lk 22:28). The temptations continued throughout His life, and course, the wilderness temptations were the severest test of all, and the victory there contained in principle and by anticipation later victories. Comment has been made upon the absence of reference to the Holy Spirit's influence upon Jesus in the separate experiences, which in the case of others would ordinarily have been traced directly to the Spirit, as in Lk 1:14 ff, etc (cf. art. by James Denney in DCG, I, 732, 734). Is it not true, however, that the point of view of the writers of the Gospels is that Jesus is always under the power of the Spirit? At His baptism, in the temptation, and at the beginning of His public ministry (Lk 4:14) very special stress is placed upon the fact. Hence-forward the Spirit's presence and special acts are accentuated. From time to time, reference is made to the Spirit for special reasons, but the action of the Spirit in and through Jesus is always assumed.

(4) The public ministry of Jesus.—Here we can select only a few points to illustrate a much larger truth. The writers of the Gospels, and esp. Luke, conceived of the entire ministry of Jesus as under the power of the Holy Spirit. After declaring that Jesus was "full of the Holy Spirit" and that He was led by the Spirit in the wilderness forty days in 4:1, He declares, in 4:14, that Jesus "returned in the power of the Spirit into Galilee." This is followed in the next verse by a general summary of His activities: "And he taught in their synagogues, and was glorified of all." Then, as if to complete his teaching as to the relation of the Spirit to Jesus, He narrates the visit to Nazareth and the citation by Jesus in the synagogue there of Isaiah's words beginning, "The Spirit of the Lord is upon me," with the detailed description of His Messianic activity, viz., preaching to the poor, announcement of release to the captives, recovering of sight to the blind, and to proclaim the acceptable year of the Lord (Isa 61:1). Jesus proclaims the fulfilment of this prophecy in Himself (Lk 4:18 ff). Is 42:1-3 is given in connection with the miraculous healing work of Jesus. It is a passage of exquisite beauty and describes the Messiah as a quiet and unobtrusive and tender minister to human needs, possessed of irresistible power and infinite patience. Thus the highest OT ideals as to the operations of the Spirit of God come to realization, esp. in the public ministry of Jesus. The comprehensive terms of the description make it incontestably clear that the New light of the eternal life of Jesus is as directed by the Spirit of God. We need only to read the evangelic records in order to fill in the details.

The miracles of Jesus were wrought through the power of the Holy Spirit. Occasionally He is seized as it were, by a sense of the urgency of work in some such way as to impress beholders with the presence of a strange power working in Him. In one case men think He is beside Himself (Mk 3:21); in another they are impressed with the supernatural goodness of His teaching (Mk 1:22); in another His intense devotion to His task makes Him forget bodily needs (Jn 4:31); again men think He has a demon (Jn 8:48); at one time He is seized with a rapturous joy when the 70 return from their mission (Lk 10:17), and Luke declares that at that hour Jesus rejoiced in the Holy Spirit (Lk 10:21; cf Mt 11:25). This whole passage is a remarkable one, containing elements which point to the Johannine conception of which according to the Spirit is dispensed to discredit it at certain points (Sayings of Jesus, 302). One of the most impressive aspects of this activity of Jesus in the Spirit is its suppressed intensity. Nowhere is there lack of self-control. Nowhere is there evidence of a coldly didactic attitude, on the one hand, or of a loose rein upon the will, on the other. Jesus is always an intensely human Master wrapped in Divine power. The miracles contrast strikingly with the miracles of the apocryphal gospels. In the latter all sorts of capricious deeds of power are ascribed to Jesus as a boy. In our Gospels, on the contrary, no miracle is wrought until after His anointing with the Spirit at Baptism.

A topic of especial interest is that of blasphemy against the Holy Spirit. Jesus cast out demons by the power of God's Spirit. In Mt 12:31; Mk 3:28; Lk 12:10, we have the declaration that blasphemy against the Holy Spirit is unpardonable sin. Mark particularizes the offence of the accusers of Jesus by saying that they said of Jesus, "He hath an unclean spirit." The blasphemy against the Spirit seems to have been not merely rebuffing Him and His work, but doing Him and His work black injury due to various causes. It was rather the sin of ascribing works of Divine mercy and power—works which had all the marks of their origin in the goodness of God—to a diabolic source. The charge was that He cast out devils by reason of the prince of devils. We are not to suppose that the unpardonable nature of the sin against the Holy Spirit was due to anything arbitrary in God's arrangements regarding sin. The moral and spiritual attitude involved in the charge against Jesus was simply a hopeless one. It presupposed a warping or wrenching of the moral nature from the truth in such degree, a deep-seated malignity and insusceptibility to Divine influences so complete, that no moral nucleus remained on which the forgiving love of God might work. See Blasphemy.

(5) Death, resurrection and Pentecostal gift.—It is not possible to give here a complete outline of the activities of Jesus in the Holy Spirit. We shall only give an account of the relations of the Holy Spirit to Him. In He 9:14 it is declared that Christ "through the eternal Spirit offered himself without blemish unto God," and in Rom 1:4, Paul says He was "declared to be the Son of God with power, according to the spirit of holiness, by the resurrection from the dead." (cf also Rom 8:11).

As already noted, John the Baptist gave as a particular designation of Jesus that it was He who should baptize with the Holy Spirit, in contrast with His own baptism in water. In Acts 1:5 it is declared that He gave commandment through the Holy Spirit, and in 1:5 it is predicted by Him that the disciples should "be baptized in the Holy Spirit not many days hence"; and in 1:8 it is declared, "Ye shall receive power, when the Holy Spirit is come upon you."

It is clear from the preceding that in the thought of the NT writers Jesus is completely endowed with the power of the Holy Spirit. It is in large measure the OT view of the Spirit that is here, the operation of the Spirit in and through Jesus is chiefly with a view to His official Messianic work, the charismatic Spirit imparting power rather than the Spirit for holy living. Yet there is a difference between this and the NT representation here. In the OT the agency of the Spirit is made very prominent when mighty works are performed by His power. In the Gospels the view is concentrated less upon the Spirit than upon Jesus Himself, though it is always assumed that He is acting in the power of the Spirit. In the case of Jesus also, the moral quality of His words and deeds is always assumed.

Our next topic in setting forth the NT teaching is the Holy Spirit in relation to the kingdom of God.

2. The endowment of Jesus, the founder of the kingdom. Spirit, with the power of the Holy Spirit, is the communication of the kingdom of God to the agents employed by Providence in the conduct of the affairs of the kingdom. We need, at all points, in considering the subject in the NT to keep in view the OT background and the relations between God and Israel were the presupposition of all the blessings of the OT. In the NT there is not an identical but an analogous point of view. God is continuing His work among men. Indeed in a sense a new work is the fulfillment of the old. The new differs from the old in some very important respects, chiefly indeed in this, that now the national and theocratic life is wholly out of sight. Prophecy no longer deals with political questions. The power of the Spirit no longer anoints kings and judges for their duties. The action of the Spirit upon the cosmos now ceases to receive attention. In short, the kingdom of God is intensely spiritualized, and the relation of the Spirit to the individual or the church is nearly always that which is dealt with.

(1) Synoptic teachings.—We consider briefly the synoptic teachings as to the Holy Spirit in relation to the kingdom of God. The forerunner of Jesus goes before His face in the Spirit and power of Elijah (Lk 1:17). Of Him it had been predicted that He should be filled with the Holy Spirit from His mother's womb (Lk 1:15). The Master expressly predicts that the Holy Spirit will give the needed wisdom when the disciples are delivered up to the people (cf. Mt 10:19; Mk 13:11). In Lk 12:12 it is also declared that "The Holy Spirit shall teach you in that very hour what ye ought to say." Likewise in Mt 10:20, "It is not ye that speak, but the Spirit of your Father that speaketh in you." In Lk 11:13 is a beautiful saying: If we who are evil give good gifts to our children, how much more shall the "heavenly Father give the Holy Spirit to them that ask him." This is a variation from the | passage in Mt (7:11), and illustrates Luke's marked emphasis on the doctrine of the Holy Spirit. In Mt 28:19, the disciples are commanded to baptize in the name of the Father, the Son and the Holy Spirit. This passage has been called in question, but there is not sufficient ground for its rejection. Hitherto there has been almost no hint directly of the personality of the Spirit or the Trinitarian implications in the teaching as to the Spirit. Here, however, we have a very suggestive hint toward a doctrine of the Spirit which attains more complete development later.

(2) In the Gospel of John there is a more elaborate presentation of the office and work of the Holy Spirit, particularly in chs 14-17. Several earlier passages, however, must be noticed. The passage on the new birth in Jn 3:5ff we notice first. The expression, "except one be born of water and the Spirit," seems to contain a reference to baptism along with the action of the Spirit of God directly on the soul. In the light of other NT teachings, however, we are not warranted in ascribing saving effect to baptism alone here. So far as it relates to baptism, is symbolic simply, not actual. The outward act is the fitting symbolic accomplishment of the spiritual regeneration by the Spirit. Symbolism and spiritual fact move on | lines in the Johannine Gospel, and the kingdom is symbolically effected by means of baptism, just as the "new birth" takes place symbolically by the same means.

In Jn 6:51ff we have the very difficult words attributed to Jesus concerning the eating of His flesh and the drinking of His blood. These were greatly distanced by these words, and in 6:63 Jesus insists that "it is the spirit that giveth life; the flesh profiteth nothing." One's view of the meaning of this much-discussed passage will turn largely on his point of view in interpreting it. If he adopts the view that John is reading back into the record much that came later in the history, the inference will probably follow that Jesus is here referring to the Lord's Supper. If on the other hand it is held that John has reported substantially what was said, and to convey an impression of the actual situation, the reference to the Supper will not be inferred. Certainly the language fits the later teaching in the establish-ment-making, although in so far as it accounts for the actual account of the Supper. But Jesus was meeting a very real situation in the carnal spirit of the multitude which followed Him for the loaves and fishes. His deeply mystical words seem to have been intended to accomplish the result which followed, viz., the separation of the true from the false disciples. There is no necessary reference to the Lord's Supper specifically, therefore, in His words. Spiritual meat and drink, not carnal, are the true food and drink. Himself with that food, but only the spiritually susceptible would grasp His meaning. It is difficult to assign any sufficient reason why Jesus should have here referred to the Supper, or why John should have desired to introduce such reference into the story at this stage.

In Jn 7:37ff we have a saying of Jesus and its interpretation by John which accords with the synoptic reference to a future baptism in the Holy Spirit to be bestowed by Jesus: "He that believeth on me, as the scripture hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water," John adds: "But this spake he of the Spirit, which they that believed on him were to receive: for the Spirit was not yet given; because Jesus was not yet glorified." No doubt John's Gospel is largely a reproduction of the facts and teachings of Jesus in the evangelist's own words. This passage indicates, however, that John discriminated between his own constructions of Christ's teachings and the teachings themselves, and warns us against the custom of many exegeses of the NT. In 16:14ff John employed his material with slight regard for careful and correct statement, passing it through his own consciousness in such manner as to leave us his own subjective Gospel, rather than a truly historical record. The ethical implications of such a process on John's part would scarcely harmonize with his general tone and esp. the teachings of his Epp. No doubt John's Gospel contains much meaning which he could not have put into it prior to the coming of the Spirit. But what John seeks to give is the teaching of Jesus and not his own theory of Jesus.

We give next an outline of the teachings in the great chapters from 14 to 17, the farewell discourse of Jesus. In 14:10 Jesus says, "I will pray the Father, and he shall give you another Comforter (παρακλητός, paraclētēs; see PARACLETES). Next Jesus describes this Comforter as one whom the world cannot receive. Disciples know Him because He abides in them. The truth of Christianity is symbolically here, for it is spiritually displayed in so far as it relates to baptism, is symbolic simply, not actual. The outward act is the fitting symbolic accomplishment of the spiritual regeneration by the Spirit. Symbolism and spiritual fact move on | lines in the Johannine Gospel, and the kingdom is symbolically effected by means of baptism, just as the "new birth" takes place symbolically by the same means.

In 15:26 the function of the Spirit is indicated. He is to bring to "remembrance all that I said unto you." In 16:14 this is made even more comprehensive: "He shall bear witness of me," and yet more emphatically in 16:14, "He shall glorify me: for he shall take of mine, and shall declare it unto you." The sphere of the Spirit's activity is the heart of the individual believer and of the church. His chief function is to illumine the teaching and glorify the person of Jesus. In 16:26 is the passage which has been used in support of the doctrine of the procession of the Spirit. Jesus says, "I will send (αποστέλλω, apostellō) future tense, referring to the "Spirit of truth which proceedeth from the Father, whom the Father hath appointed to | bear testimony." The present tense here suggests timeless action and has been taken to indicate an essential relation of the Spirit to God the Father (of Godet, Comment. on John, in loc.). The hazard of such an interpretation lies chiefly in the absence of other confirmatory Scriptures and in the possibility of another and simpler meaning of the word. However, the language is unusual, and the change of tense in the course of the sentence is suggestive. Perhaps it is one of the many instances where we must be content to know the precise import of the language of Scripture.

In 16:7-15 we have a very important passage. Jesus declares to the anxious disciples that it is expedient for Him to go away, because otherwise the Spirit will not come. “He, when he is come, will convict the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment” (16:8). The term τριάν “convict” (θέτον, ἐλέγηκεν) involves a cognitive link along with a moral process. The Spirit who deals in truth, and makes His appeal through the truth, shall convict, shall bring the mind on which He is working into a sense of self-condemnation on account of sin. The word means more than reprove, or refute, or convince. It signifies up to a certain point a moral conquest of the mind: “of sin, because they believe not on me” (16:9). Unbelief is the root sin. The revelation of God in Christ is, broadly speaking, His condemnation of all sin. The Spirit may convict of particular sins, but that will all be shown to consist essentially in the rejection of all that He is and all that He does. i.e. in unbelief. “Of righteousness, because I go to the Father, and ye behold me no more” (16:10). What does this mean? Does Jesus mean that His going to the Father will be the proof of His righteousness? Or does He mean that those who put Him to death, or that going to the Father will be the consummating or crowning act of His righteousness which the Spirit is to carry home to the hearts of men? Or does He mean that these two go hand in hand? His place in convicting men of righteousness? The latter meaning seems implied in the words, “and ye behold me no more.” Probably, however, the meanings are not mutually exclusive. “Of judgment because the Prince of this world hath been judged” (16:11). In His incarnation and death the prince of this world, the usurper, is conquered and cast out. We may sum up the teachings as to the Spirit in these four chapters as follows: He is the Spirit of truth; He guides into all truth; He brings to those who put Him to death, or that going to the Father will be the consummating or crowning act of His righteousness which the Spirit is to carry home to the hearts of men; He glorifies Christ; He speaks not of Himself but of Christ; He, like believers, bears witness to Christ; He enables Christians to do greater works than those of Christ; He convicts the world of sin, of righteousness, and of judgment; He comes because Christ goes away; He is “another Comforter”; He is to abide with disciples forever.

These teachings cover a very wide range of needs. The Holy Spirit is the subject of the entire discourse. In a sense it is the counterpart of the Sermon on the Mount. There the laws of the kingdom are expounded. Here the means of realization of all the ends of that kingdom are presented. The kingdom now becomes the kingdom of the Spirit. The historical revelation of truth in the Old Testament, the Law, is now followed up by the personal, direct, and power of the Holy Spirit. The Spirit of truth comes in fulness. The gospel as history is now to become the gospel as experience. The Messiah as a fact is now to become the Messiah as a life through the Spirit’s action. All the elements of the Spirit’s action are embraced: the charismatic for mighty works; the intellectual for guidance into truth; the moral and spiritual for producing holy lives. This discourse transfers the kingdom in a special, in a real way, to those of the disciples, but the latter are empowered for their tasks by the might of the indwelling and abiding Spirit. The method of the kingdom’s growth and advance is clearly indicated as spiritual, conviction of sin, righteousness and judgment, and obedient and holy lives of Christ’s disciples.

Before passing to the next topic, one remark should be made as to the Trinitarian suggestions of these chapters in Jn. The personality of the Spirit is clearly implied in the passage here. It is true we have no formal teaching on the metaphorical side, no ontology in the strict sense of the word. This fact is made much of by writers who are slow to recognize the personality of the Holy Spirit in the light of the teachings of John and Paul. The NT writers have no difficulty, however, in asserting that the NT writers hold that God is a personal being (see I. F. Woods, The Spirit of God in Bib. Literature, 206, 208). It must be insisted, however, that in the NT, as in the OT, there is little metaphysics, little ontological teaching as to God. His personality is deduced from the same kind of sayings as those relating to the Spirit. From the ontological point of view, therefore, we should also have to reject the personality of God on the basis of the Bib. teachings. The Trinitarian formulations may not be correct at all points, but the NT warrants the Trinitarian doctrine, just as it warrants belief in the personality of God. We are not insisting on the Trinitarian formulations of the OT, but we do insist upon consistency in construing the popular and practical language of Scripture as to the second and third as well as the first Person of the Trinity.

We add a few lines as to John’s teachings in the Epp. and Revelation. In general they are in close harmony with the teachings in his Gospel, and need not require extended treatment. The Spirit imparts another spirit (Jn 26:14), and the same to the confession of Christ (4:2), bears witness to Christ (6:6). It is “in the Spirit” (4:2). The Spirit joins the church in the invitation of the gospel (21 17). (3) The Holy Spirit in the Book of Acts.—The Book of Acts contains the record of the beginning of the Dispensation of the Holy Spirit. There is at the outset the closest connection with the recorded teachings of the Holy Spirit in the Gospel. Particularly does Luke make clear the continuity of his own thought regarding the Spirit in his earlier and later writing. Jesus in the first chapter of Acts gives commandment through the Holy Spirit and presents the conception of power as the result of the baptism in the Holy Spirit which the disciples are soon to receive.

The form of the Spirit’s activities in Acts is chiefly charismatic, that is, the miraculous endowment of disciples with power or wisdom for their work in extending the Messianic kingdom. As yet the work of the Spirit within disciples as the chief sanctifying agency is not fully developed, and is later described with great fulness in Paul’s writings. Some recent writers have overemphasized the contrast between the earlier and the more developed view of the Spirit with regard to the moral life. In Acts the ethical import of the Spirit’s action appears at several points (see Acts 5:9; 7:51; 8:15; 13:9; 15:28). The chief interest in Acts is naturally the Spirit’s agency in foundings the Messianic kingdom, since here is recorded the early history of the expansion of that kingdom. The phenomenon rather than the inner moral aspects of that great movement come chiefly into view. But everywhere the ethical implications are present. Gunkel is no doubt correct in the statement that Paul’s conception of the Spirit as inward and moral and acting in the daily life of the Christian opens the way for the activity of the Spirit as
One or two points require notice before passing from Acts. The impression we get of the Spirit's action here very strongly suggests a Divine purpose moving on the stage of history in a large and comprehensive way. It is evident that the individuals of the Spirit's activity were everywhere conscious of a vast historic movement of which they as individuals were a part. In some passages the existence of purpose in the Spirit's action is clearly recognized, as in the account of Saul at certain points and in the appointment of Saul and Barnabas as missionaries. Divine purpose is indeed implied at all points, and while the particular end in view was not always clear in a given instance, the subjects of Saul's and Barnabas' success were such as to make the apprehension of the matter as to think of their experiences merely as so many extraordinary phenomena caused in a particular way.

We note next the glossolalia, or speaking with tongues, referred to in Acts 2, as represented by the laying on of hands. These instances in which the order of baptism, the laying on of hands, and the gift of the Spirit seem to be a matter of indifference, and a striking indication of the non-sacramenterian character of the teaching of the Book of Acts, and indeed in the NT generally. Certainly no particular efficacy seems to be attached to the laying on of hands or baptism excepting as an indication of spiritual facts. Gunkel, in his excellent work on the Holy Spirit, claims Acts 2 38 as an instance when the Spirit is bestowed during baptism (Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, etc. 7). The words of Peter, however, may refer to a reception of the Spirit subsequent to baptism, although evidently in immediate connection with it. The baptism of the Holy Spirit clearly then was not meant to supplant water baptism. Moreover, in the strict sense the baptism of the Holy Spirit was a historical event or event, completed at the outset when the extension of the kingdom of God, beginning at Pentecost, began to reach out to the gentle world. See Baptism of the Holy Spirit.

In Acts the entire historical movement is represented by Luke as being under the direction of the Spirit. He guides Philip to the Ethiopian and then “catches away” Philip (8 29, 39). He guides Peter at Joppa through the vision and then leads him to Cornelius at Caesarea (10 19 ff; 11 12 f). The Spirit came down to the church at Antioch to separate Saul and Barnabas for missionary work (13 2 ff). He guides the church at Jersu (16 28). He forbids the apostle to go to Asia (16 6 ff). The Spirit enables Agabus to prophesy that Paul will be bound by the Jews at Jersu (21 11; cf also 20 25). The Spirit appointed the elders at Ephesus (20 28).
Spirit constitutes and maintains it (Wood, The Spirit of God in Bib. Literature, 268). In fact a careful study of Paul’s teachings discloses three | living activities of the Holy Spirit, namely, to the first and the third to the Holy Spirit. That is to say, his teachings coalesce, as it were, point by point, in reference to these three subjects. Faith is the human side of the Divine activity carried on by the Holy Spirit. Faith is therefore implied in the Spirit’s action and is the primary response to it in its various forms. But faith is primarily and essentially faith in Jesus Christ. Hence we find in Paul that Christ is represented as doing substantially everything that the Spirit does. Now we are not to see in this any conflicting conceptions as to Christ and the Spirit, but rather Paul’s intense feeling of the unity of the work of Christ and the Spirit. The “law” of the Spirit’s action is the revelation and glorification of Christ. In his Gospel which he comments upon, the Spirit’s function is precisely in these terms. Whether or not John was influenced by Paul in the matter we need not here consider.

(a) We begin with a brief reference to the connection in Paul’s thought also between the Spirit and Jesus. The Holy Spirit is described as the Spirit of God’s Son (Rom 8 14 ff; Gal 4 6), as the Spirit of Christ (Rom 8 9). He who confesses Jesus does so by the Holy Spirit, and “since” must mean that Jesus is the Holy Spirit. The Holy Spirit (1 Cor 12 1) is called a life-giving spirit (15 45); and in 2 Cor 3 17 the statement appears, “Now the Lord is the Spirit.” All of this shows how completely one Paul regarded the work of Christ and the Spirit, not because they were identical in the sense in which Bueschlag has contended, but because their task and aim being identical, there was no sense of discord in Paul’s mind in explaining the “similar.”

(b) The Spirit appears in Paul as in Acts imparting all kinds of charismatic gifts for the ends of the Messianic kingdom. He enumerates a long list of spiritual gifts which cannot receive separate treatment, such as prophecy (1 Thess 5 19 ff); tongues (1 Cor 12 14); wisdom (2 6 ff); knowledge (12 8); power to work miracles (12 9 f); discerning of spirits (12 10); interpretation of tongues (12 10); faith (12 9); boldness in Christ (Eph 3 15); the gifts of the Holy Spirit generally (1 Thess 1 5; 4 8, etc). See SPIRITUAL GIFTS. In addition to the above list, Paul esp. emphasizes the Spirit’s action in revealing to himself and to Christians the mind of God (1 Cor 2 10 12; Eph 3 15). He speaks in words taught by the Spirit (1 Cor 2 13). He preaches in demonstration of the Spirit and of power (1 Cor 2 4; 1 Thess 1 5).

In the above manifestations of the Spirit, as explained Paul’s writings we have presented in very large measure what we have already seen in Acts, but with some additions. In 1 Cor 14 and elsewhere Paul gives a new view as to the charismatic gifts which was greatly needed in view of the tendency to extravagant and intemperate indulgence in emotional excitement, due to the mighty action of God’s Spirit in the Christian church. He insists that all things be done unto edification, that spiritual growth is the true aim of all spiritual endowments. This may be regarded as the connecting link between the earlier and latter NT teaching as to the Holy Spirit, between the charismatic and moral-religious significance of the Spirit. To the latter we now direct attention.

(c) We note the Spirit in the beginnings of the Christian life is represented by Paul as under the power of the Holy Spirit, in its inner moral and religious aspects as well as in its charismatic forms. It is a singular fact that Paul does not anywhere expressly declare that the Holy Spirit originates the Christian life. G. A. Gunkel points out, "Spirit and freedom are always joined in Paul’s writings concerning the Holy Spirit and life. Freedom must needs come of the Spirit's presence because He is superior to all other authorities and powers (Die Wirkungen des heiligen Geistes, etc., 98). See also an excellent passage on the spirit in the church by Dr. James Denney, I, 739.

c) The Holy Spirit in the church. Toward the end of his ministry and in his later group of essays, Paul devoted much thought to the subject of the church, and one of his favorite topics was the church as the body of Christ. The Holy Spirit is represented as animating this body, as communicating to it life, and directing all its affairs. As in the case of the individual believer, so also in the body of believers the Spirit is sovereign in all rules and regulations. By one Spirit all are baptized into one body and made to drink of one Spirit (1 Cor 12:13). All the gifts of the church, charismatic and other, are from the Spirit (12:4–11). All spiritual gifts in the church are for edification (14:12). Prayer is to be in the Spirit (14:15). The church is to preserve the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace (Eph 4:3). Love (Col 1:8); fellowship (Phil 2:1); worship (3:3) are in the Spirit. The church is the habitation of the Spirit (Eph 2:22). The church is an epistle of Christ written by the Spirit (2 Cor 3:3). Thus the whole life of the church falls under the operation of the Holy Spirit.

f) The Spirit also carries on His work in believers in a very personal way. In Rom 8:11 Paul asserts that the present indwelling of believers of the Spirit that raised up Jesus from the dead is the guarantee of the quickening of their mortal bodies by the power of the same Spirit. See also 1 Cor 6:19.

We have thus exhibited Paul’s teachings as to the Holy Spirit in some detail in order to make clear their scope and comprehensiveness. And we have not exhausted the material supplied by his writings. It will be observed that Paul nowhere elaborates a doctrine of the Spirit, as he does in a number of instances his doctrine of the person of Christ. The references to the Spirit are in connection with other subjects usually. This, however, only serves to indicate how very fundamental the work of the Spirit was in Paul’s assumptions as to the Christian life. The Spirit is the Christian life, just as Christ is that life.

The personality of the Spirit appears in Paul as in John. The indwelling Spirit is distinguished from the Son, Father, and Spirit (cf. also Eph 4:4). In many connections the Spirit is distinguished from the Son and Father, and the work of the Spirit is set forth in personal terms. It is true, references are often made to the Holy Spirit by Paul as if the Spirit were an impersonal influence, or at least without clearly personal attributes. This distinguishes his usage as to the Spirit from that as to Christ and God, who are always personal. It is a natural explanation of this fact if we hold that in the case of the impersonal references we have a survival of the current OT conception of the Spirit, while in those which are personal we have the developed conception as found in both Paul and John. Personal attributes are ascribed to the Spirit in so many instances, it would seem unwarranted in us to make the earlier and lower conception determinant of the later and higher.

In Paul’s writings we have the crowning factor in the Bib. doctrine of the Holy Spirit. He gathers under one head all of the OT elements, and adds to them his own distinctive teaching or emphasis. Some of the earlier OT elements are lacking, but all those which came earlier in the NT are found in Paul. The three points which Paul esp. brought into full expression were the nature of edification by means of spiritual gifts, second, the Holy Spirit in the moral life of the believer, and third, the Holy Spirit in the church. Thus Paul enables us to make an important distinction as to the work of the Spirit in the kingdom of God. There the distinction between means and ends, Charismatic gifts of the Spirit were, after all, means to ethical ends. God’s kingdom is moral in its purpose, “righteousness and peace and joy in the Holy Spirit.” Christianity is, according to Paul, inherently and essentially supernatural, permanent and abiding significance is to be found, not in extraordinary phenomena in the form of “mighty works,” “wonders,” “tongues” and other miracles in the ordinary sense, but in the creation of a new moral order in which rules can be fulfilled completely. By one Spirit all are baptized into one body and made to drink of one Spirit (1 Cor 12:13). All the gifts of the church, charismatic and other, are from the Spirit (12:4–11). All spiritual gifts in the church are for edification (14:12). Prayer is to be in the Spirit (14:15). The church is to preserve the unity of the Spirit in the bond of peace (Eph 4:3). Love (Col 1:8); fellowship (Phil 2:1); worship (3:3) are in the Spirit. The church is the habitation of the Spirit (Eph 2:22). The church is an epistle of Christ written by the Spirit (2 Cor 3:3). Thus the whole life of the church falls under the operation of the Holy Spirit.

"home again" means "to their place." In Eccl 12:5, "long home." RV "everlasting home," means "eternal home," and in Jos 19:27 "unto his home" means "unto his own things" (so Jos 1:11). In 2 Cor 5:6 (and RV vs 8), "be at home" is a tr of endēmē, "to be among one's own people," as opposed to ekdēmē, "to be or live abroad.

HOMEBORN, hō'me-bərn (תֶּהֹמֶ֑ר, הָֽאָמֶֽרֶנָּ֑י): A native-born Heb, as contrasted with a foreigner of different blood. The same Heb word is found in Lev 16:29; 18:26 and elsewhere, but is tr differently. Home-born in Jer 2:14 is a tr of the phrase עַמֹּר תַּלְדֵ֛ית, yirḥō bayīth, which means he was a person free-born as contrasted with a slave.

HOMER, hō'mer (תֹּם, hōmer): A dry measure containing about 11 bushels. It was equal to 10 ephah. See Weights and Measures.

HOMICIDE, hom'i-sid (תֹּם, אֹמֵר): Heb has no word for killing or murder; rōphēk is the word for "suffering." The Gr for murder is φόνος, phōnos. Homicide was every conscious violent action against a human being with the immediate result of death. It was always to be punished by death, before considered a crime against the image of God. Killing was definitely forbidden in the 10 commandments (Gen 9:5; Ex 20:13; 21:12; Lev 24:17, 21; Nu 35:16–21;Dt 19:11–13). The penalty of death was not inflicted when the killing was unintentional or unpremeditated (Ex 21:13; Nu 35:25–29; Josh 20:3–6; cf Mish, Makkēth, xi. 5). Cities of Refuge were founded to which the man-slayer could escape from the "avenger of blood." There he had to abide till after the death of the officiating high priest. If he left the city before that event, the avenger who should kill him was free from punishment (Ex 21:13; Nu 35:10–15; 25–28, 32; Dt 19:1–13; Josh 20:2 ff). See Cities of Refuge. Killing a thief who broke in during the night was not accounted murder (Ex 22:2). Unintentional killing of the pregnant woman in a fray was punished according to the lex talionis, i.e., the husband of the woman killed could kill the wife of the man who committed the offence without being punished (Ex 21:21 f). This was not usually carried to its extreme, but gave the husband the right which to fines the offender. If a man failed to build a battlement to his house, and anyone fell over and was killed, blood-guiltiness came upon that man's house (Dt 22:8). He who killed a thief in the daytime was guilty in the same measure (Ex 22:3, 31 of AV). Where a body was found, but the murderer was unknown, the elders of the city nearest to the place where it was found were ordered by a pre-scribed ceremony to declare that they were not guilty of neglecting their duties, and were therefore innocent of the man's blood (Dt 21:1–9). Two witnesses were necessary for a conviction of murder (Nu 35:30). If a slave died under chastisement, the master was to be punished according to the principle that "he that smiteth a man, so that he dieth, shall surely be put to death" (Ex 21:20; cf Ex 21:12). According to the rabbis the master was to be killed by the sword. Since in this passage the phrase "he shall die" is not used, some have supposed that punishment by death is not indicated. If the slave punished by the master died after one or two days, the master was not liable to punishment (Ex 21:21). Because of the words, "for he is his money," the rabbis held that not lawful for slaves to be murdered since times the avenger of blood was himself to be the executioner of the murderer (Nu 35:19,21). According to Sanhedrin 9 1 the murderer was to be beheaded. Nothing is said in the law about suicide.

HONEST, on'est, HONESTY, on'es-ty: The word "honest" in the NT in AV generally represents the adj. καθαρός, kalōs, "good," "excellent," "honorable," and, with the exception of 1K 8:6, "honest" and "good" are changed in RV to the more correct "honorable" (Rom 12:17; 2 Cor 8:21; 13:7; Phil 4:8); in 1 Pet 2:12, into "seemly." In AV "honesty" in He 13:15 is rendered "honorably," and in 1 Thess 4:12 (here euachōmēnōs) is rendered "becoming." In AV "honesty" occurs but once in AV as the tr of σωτήρ, sēmeite (1 Tim 2:2), and in RV is more appropriately rendered "gravity." JAMES ORR

HONEY, hun'i (דבָּחָשׁ, dēḇaḥash; μέλι, méli): One familiar with life in Pal will recognize in dēḇaḥash the Arabic. dībās, which is the usual term for a sweet syrup made by boiling down the juice of grapes, raisins, earob beans, or dates. Dībās is seldom, if ever, used as a name for honey (cf Arab. ʿasād), whereas in the OT dēḇaḥash probably had only that meaning. The honey referred to was in most cases wild honey (Dt 32:13; Jgs 14:8,9; 1S 14:25. 26,29,43). Although the offering of honey with the first- fruits would seem to indicate that the bees were wild, there is reason to think that the honey was of cultivated stock (2Ch 31:5). They were constructed their honeycomb and deposited their honey in holes in the ground (1S 14:25); under rocks or in crevices between the rocks (Dt 32:13; Ps 81:16). They do the same today. When domesticated they are kept in cylindrical beehives which are plastered on the outside with mud. The Syrian bee is an esp. hardy type and a good honey producer. It is carried to Europe and America for breeding purposes.

In OT times, as at present, honey was rare enough to be considered a luxury (Gen 43:11; 1K 14:18). Honey was used in baking sweets (Ex 16:31). It was forbidden to be offered with the meal offering (Lev 2:11), perhaps because it was fermentable, but was presented with the fruit offering (2Ch 21:5). Honey was offered to David’s army (2S 17:29). It was sometimes stored in the fields (Jer 41:8). It was also exchanged as merchandise (Ezk 27:17). In NT times wild honey was an article of food among the lowly (Mt 4:1). It typified sumptuous fare (Cant 5:1; Isa 7:15,22; Ezk 16:13,19). The ordinances of Jeh were “sweeter than honey and the droppings of the honeycomb” (Ps 19:10; 119:103). “Thou didst eat . . . honey” (Ezk 16:13) expressed Jeh’s goodness to Jerusalem. JAMES A. PATCH

HONORABLE, on'er-a-ə'bəl (תָּפָּן, āḇēḇ; ὑπακούον, euachōmēnōs): In the OT “honorable” is for the most part the tr of kāḇēd, properly, “to be heavy,” “weight” (Gen 34:19, RV “honored,” Nu 22:15; 1S 9:6; Isa 3:5, etc); kāḇēd, “weight,” “heaviness,” etc. occurs in Isa 5:15; hāḇēd, “beauty,” “majesty,” “honor” (Ps 111:3, RV “honor”); ἀδῆρ, “to make honorable,” “illus-trious” (Isa 42:21, “magnify the law, and make it honorable”). RV: “honorable” (the teaching great and glorious); ὕδηκτρ, “precious” (Ps 46:4); ἐπάνω ἐπάνω, “lifted up of face” (2K 5:1; Isa 3:3; 9:15); νεανίς ἐπάνω (Job 22:8, RV: “he whose person is accepted”); eušēmōn, lit. “well fashioned,” is tr2 Mk 16 48, AV “honorable,” RV of hold. (note: endozaus in glory, occurs 1 Cor 1 10, RV “glory”; tīmios, “weighty” (He 13 4, RV “hail in honor”); dītīmos, “without weight or honor” (1 Cor 12 23, “less honorable”); entīmos, “in honor” (Lk 14 8), “more honorable.”) RV gives for “honorable” (1 9 6), “held in honor”; for “Ye shall I be glorious” (Isa 49 5), “I am honorable”: “honorable for honesty” (Rom 12 17; 2 Cor 13 13). For “honestly” (He 13 18) AV has “honorably.”

In Apoc we have endozaus trc “honorable” (Tob 12 7; RV “ful: glory”); tīmios (Job 19 21); tīmios (Wisd 8). For “honor,” RV “glorified,” “honor” (39 27, RV “honor”), etc.

HOOD, hōd (יוּדָד), z’niphkuth: The ladies’ “hoods” of Isa 3 23 AV appear as “turbans” RV; and “mitre” of Zec 3 5 is “turban, or diadem” ERV. The word is from the vb. zānaph, “to wrap round.” It connotes a head-covering, not a permanent article of dress. See Dress, 5; HAT.

HOOF, hōf. See CHEW; CLOVEN.

HOOK, hōk: (1) רבע, hakkāh, is rendered “fishhook” in Job 41 1 RV (AV “hook”). RV is correct here and should have used the same tr for the same word in Isa 19 8; Hab 1 15, instead of retaining AV’s “angle.” Similarly in Am 4 2, רבע, ginad, and ב(In, ginad, appear to be synonyms for “fishhook,” although the former may mean the barb of a fisher’s spear. In the NT “fishhook” occurs in Mt 17 27 (ἐκχυστρόν, ἀκήστρον).

(2) The “flesh-hook” (ץניפ], mazlēph, צניפ; milākhāh) of Ex 27 3, etc, was probably a small pitchfork, with two or three tines. (3) The “pruning-hook” (ץניפ), “taxmērōn), used in the culture of the vine (Isa 18 5), was a sickle-shaped knife, small enough to be made from the metal of a spear-point (Isa 2 4; Joel 3 10; Mic 4 3). (4) גו, wāt, is the name given the supports of certain hangings of the tabernacle (Ex 26 26, etc). Their form is entirely obscure. (5) תער, ḫabb, is rendered “hook” in 2 K 19 28 = Isa 37 29; Ezk 29 4; 38 4, and Ezk 19 4-9 RV (AV “chain”). A ḥagg (e.g. 38 22), put in the nose of a tame beast and through which a rope is passed to lead him, is probably meant. (6) ליפש, ṣ’ghmōn, is rendered “hook” in Job 41 2 AV, but should be “a rope of rushes or rush-fiber” in RV, or, simply, “a rush” (on which small fish are strung). (7) ליפש, ṣ’ghā, is “hook” in Job 42 2 RV (“thorn,” perhaps right) and 2 Ch 33 11 RVm (text “chain”), RV “thorns”. On both vs see the comms. (8) יפפ, ṣ’kʾḥal, is “hook” in Ezk 40 43 (RVm “ledges”), but the meaning of this word is completely unknown, and “hook” is a mere guess.

HOOPoe, hōpēs; -pō (יוּפָה), dākhōphath; ṣ’kʾhp, ṣ’kʾhōpate; Lat Upupa epops: One of the peculiar and famous birds of Pal, having a curved bill and beautiful plumage. It is about the size of a thrush. Its back is rich cinnamon color, its head golden buff with a crest of feathers of gold, banded with white and tipped with black, that gradually lengthen as they cover the head until, when folded, they lie in lines of black and white, and, when erect, each feather shows its exquisite marking. Its wings and tail are black banded with white and buff. It nests in holes and hollow trees. At all ages the hoopoe is a “nasty, filthy bird” in its feeding and breeding habits. The nest, being paid no attention by the elders, soon becomes soiled and evil smelling. The bird is mentioned only in the lists of abomination (Lev 11 19; andDt 14 19). The hoopoe is not fit for food even on account of its habits. Quite as strong a one lay in the fact that it was one of the sacred birds of Egypt. There the belief was prevalent that it could detect water and indicate where to dig a well; that it could heal scrofula and cure diseases. Its head was a part of the charms used by witches. The hoopoe was believed to have wonderful medicinal powers and was called the “Doctor Bird” by the Arabs. Because it is almost the size of a hoopoe and somewhat suggestive of it in its golden plumage, the lapwing was used in the early translations of the Bible instead of hoopoe. But when it was remembered that the lapwing is a plow, its flesh and eggs esp. dainty food, that it was eaten everywhere it was known, modern commentators rightly decided that the hoopoe was the bird intended by the Mosaic law. It must be put on record, however, that where no superstition attaches to the hoopoe and where its nestling habits are unknown and its feeding propensities little understood, as it passes in migration it is killed, eaten and considered delicious, esp. by residents of Southern Europe.

Hope Horite, Horin THE INTERNATIONAL STANDARD BIBLE ENCYCLOPAEDIA 1420

7, etc). The varieties of this hope are countless (see Israel, Religion of; Salvation, etc), but the form most perfect and with fundamental significance for the NT itself and the expectation of the faith and the coming appointed God, in person or through His representative (see Messiah), will establish a kingdom of righteousness.

1. The proclamation of this coming kingdom of God was the unifying element in the teaching of Jesus, and the message of His near advent (Mk 1:15, etc), with the certainty of a testimony to it for those who accepted His teaching (Lk 12:32, etc.), is the substance of what is often the strict hope of the NT teaching, though, is delivered in the language of One to whom the realities of the next world and of the future are perfectly familiar; the tone is not that of prediction so much as it is that of the statement of obvious facts. In other words, "hope" to Christ is "certainty," and the word "hope" is never on His lips (Lk 6:34 and Jn 5:45 are naturally not exceptions). For the details see Kingdom of God; Faith; Forgiveness, etc. And however far He may have taught that the kingdom was present in His lifetime, none the less the full consummation of that kingdom, with Himself as Messiah, was fashioned by Him a matter of the future (see Eschatology of the NT; Parousia).

The catalogue of the promises of heaven in the early church was left with an eschatological expectation that was primarily and almost technically the "hope" of the NT—looking for the blessed hope and appearing of the glory of the great God and our Saviour Jesus Christ (Tit 3:6-7); (Jude 3), living hope (1 Pet 1:3-5); and an inheritance incorruptible and undefiled, . . . reserved in heaven for you, who by the power of God are guarded through faith unto a salvation ready to be revealed in the last time" (1 Pet 1:3-5; cf Rom 8:2; 8:20-24; 2 Cor 3:12; Eph 1:18-21; Col 1:5.23.27; Tit 1:2; 3:7; 1 Jn 3:2.3). The foundations of this hope were many: (a) Primarily, of course, the promises of the OT, which were the basis of Christ's teaching. Such are often quoted at length (Acts 2:16, etc), while they underlie countless other passages. These promises are the "anchor of hope" that holds the soul fast (He 6:18-20). In part, then, the earliest Christian expectations coincided with the Jewish, and the deuteronomic Israel" (Jude 3, esp. Eph 2:12, esp and esp. Rom 11:1-25) was a common ground on which Jew and Christian might meet. Still, through the confidence of forgiveness and purification given in the atonement (He 9:14, etc), the Christian felt himself to have an inheritance in Christ (He 7:19), which the Jew could not know. (b) Specifically Christian, however, was the pledge given in the resurrection of Christ. This sealed His Messiahship and proved His lordship (Rom 1:4; 15:18-20; 1 Pet 3:21, etc), so sending forth His followers with the certainty of victory. In addition, Christ's resurrection was felt to be the first step in the general resurrection, and hence a proof that the consummation of all things had begun (1 Cor 15:22; cf Acts 23:6; 24:15; 26:6.7; 1 Thess 4:13-14, etc). (c) But more than all, devotion to Christ produced a religious experience that gave certainty to hope. "Hope putteth not to shame; because the love of God hath been shed abroad in our hearts through the Holy Spirit which was given unto us" (Rom 5:5; cf 8:16.17; 2 Cor 1:22; 5:5; Eph 1:14, etc, and see Holy Spirit). Even visible miracles were wrought by the Spirit that were signs of the end (Acts 2:17) as well of the individual's certainty of partaking in the first resurrection (1 Thess 4:17; Eph 5:5).

3. Yet, certain though the hope might be, it was not yet attained, and the interim was an opportunity to develop faith, "the substance of the things hoped for" (He 11:1). Indeed, hope is simply faith directed toward the future, and no such thing as hope is attainable. It is easy enough to see how the AV felt "confession of our faith" clearer than "confession of our hope" in He 10:23, although the rendition of elpis by "faith" was arbitrary. So in Rom 8:20-24, "hope" is scarcely more than "faith" in this specialized aspect. In particular, in ver 24 we have as the most natural tr (cf Eph 2:5.8). "By hope we were saved" (so AV, ERV, ARV, etc), and only a pedantic insistence on words can find in this any departure from theology (cf the essential outlook on the future of the classic example of "saving faith" in Rom 4:18-22, esp ver 18). Still, the combination is unusual, and the Gr may be rendered equally well "For hope we were saved" ("the hope of the ARV is not so good); i.e. our salvation, in so far as it is past, is but to prepare us for what is to come (cf Eph 4:4; 1 Pet 1:3). But this postponement of the full attainment, through developing faith, gives stedfastness (Rom 8:25; 1 Thes 1:5; 5:8; Acts 6:11), which could be gained in no other way. On the other hand this stedfastness, produced by hope, reacts again on hope and increases it (Rom 4:4; 16:4). And so on. But no attempt is made in the NT to give a catalogue of hope, and, indeed, such lists are inevitably artificial.

4. One passage that deserves special attention is 1 Cor 13:13, "Now abideth faith, hope, love, these three; but the greatest is love." "Abideth" is in contrast to "shall be done away" in v 11, and the "hope" of 9:1-5 is born of the dying Christ is not a part of the Christian's character that the existence of the individual without them was unthinkable, without trying to define what the object of faith and hope would be in the glorified state. If any answer is to be given, it must be found in the doctrine that even in heaven life will not be static but will be unlimited. "The new life in Christ will give the finite soul be able to dispense entirely with faith, while at each stage the growth into the next can be anticipated through hope.

Only Adventist bodies can use all the NT promises literally, and it is the peculiar advantage of the NT to hold the language into modern practical terms is not basically easy. The simplest method is that already well developed in the Fourth Gospel, where the phrase "kingdom of God" is usually replaced by the words "eternal life," i.e. for a temporal relation between this world and the next is substituted a local, so that the accent is laid on the hope that awaits the individual beyond the grave. On the other hand, the cataclysmic imagery of the NT may be interpreted in evolutionary form. God, by sending into the world the supernatural power seen in the Christian church, is working for the race as well as for the individual, and has for His whole creation, as well as for individual souls, a goal in store. The individual has for his support the motives of the early church and, in particular, learns through the cross that even his own sins shall not disappoint him of his hope. But both of the above interpretations are needed if religion is to be the religion that is properly represented by the NT. For a pure individualism that looks beyond the grave for its hope empties the phrase "kingdom of God" of its meaning and tends inevitably to associciem. And, in contrast, the religion of Jesus cannot be reduced to a mere hope of ethical advancement for the present world. A Christianity that loses a transcendent, eschatological hope ceases to be Christianity.

HOPHNI, hof’ni, and PHINEHAS, fin’ë- as (יוֹפֶה, hophnâh, “pugilist” [?]; פִּינְחָשׁ, pin’châsh, prob. “face of brass”): Sons of Eli, priests of the sanctuary at Shiloh. Their character was wicked enough to merit the double designation “sons of Eli” and (AV) “sons of Belial” (RVm “base men,” 1 S 2 12). Their evil practices are described (vs 12–17). Twice is Eli warned concerning them, once by an unknown prophet (1 S 2 27 ff) and again by the lips of the young Samuel (1 S 2 11–18). The curse fell at the consecration of Abiathar (1 S 4 1–18) at which the brothers were slain, the ark was taken and the disaster occurred which caused Eli’s death. Phinehas was father of the posthumous Ichabod, whose name marks the calamity (see Ichabod).

A remnant to the prophecy of warning is seen in the deposition at Aiahath, of the house of Eli, from the priestly office (1 K 2 26–27,35).

HOPHRA, ho’f’ra. See Pharao-hophra.

HOR, hör, MOUNT (הָרָה, hör há-hár; lit. “Hor, the mountain”):

(1) A tradition identifying this mountain with Jebel Nebi Harân may be traced from the time of Jos. Ant., IV, iv, 7 downward. Omom (s.v. Ḫor, Hör) favors this identification. Jebel Nebi Harun, which has been accepted by many travelers and scholars. In HDN, while noting the fact that it has been questioned, Professor H. A. Elwell devotes all the space at his disposal to a description of Jebel Nebi Harûn. It is now recognized, however, that this identification is impossible. Niebuhr (Reise nach Arab., 238), Poocke (Description of the East, 1, 157), Robinson (BR, 1, 188), W. E. Ward (Hist. of Israel, II, 201, n.), and others had pointed out difficulties in the way, but the careful discussion of Dr. H. Clay Trumbull (Kadesh Barnea, 127 ff) finally disposed of the claims of Jebel Nebi Harûn.

From Nubia to Sinai (32 37) we may perhaps infer that Mt. Hor, “in the edge of the land of Edom,” was about a day’s journey from Kadesh. The name “Hor the mountain” suggests a prominent feature of the landscape. Aaron was buried there (Nu 20 28; Dt 32 50). It was therefore not in Mt. Seir (Dt 2 5), of which not even a foot-breath was given to Israel. Jebel Nebi Harûn is certainly a prominent feature of the landscape, towering over the tumbled hills that form the western edges of the Edomite plateau to a height of 4,800 ft. But it is much more than a day’s journey from Kadesh, while it is well within the boundary of Mt. Seir. The king of Arad was alarmed at the march to Mt. Hor. Had Israel marched toward Jebel Nebî Harûn, away to the S.E., it could have caused him no anxiety, as he dwelt in the north. This points to some eminence to the N. or N.E. of Kadesh. A hill meeting sufficiently all these conditions is Jebel Maderah (see Hakal, Mounir), which rises to the N.E. of ‘Ain kadas (Kadesh-barnea).

3. Jebel Maderah

N.W. boundary of the land of Edom, yet not within that boundary. Above the barrenness of the surrounding plain this “large, sickly, isolated, black hill” rises “like a lofty citadel,” “steep-sided” and “quite naked.” Here the solemn transactions described in Nu 20 22 ff could have been carried out lit. “in the sight of all the congregation.” While certainly is impossible, no more likely suggestion has been made.

(2) A mountain named only in Nu 34 7 f as on the N. boundary of the land of Israel. No success has attended the various attempts made to identify this particular height. Some have made it Mt. Hermon (Hull, HDB, s.v.); others Jebel ‘Akkâr, an outstrider on the N.E. of Lebanon (Furzer, ZDPV, VIII, 27), and others the mountain at the “knee of” Nahar el-Kassinâvê (van Kasteren, Rev. Bib., 1885, 30 f). In Ezk 17 14 נֵירָת, na-derekh, of course certainly be amended to נֵירָת, hadhârakh, a proper name, instead of “the way.” Possibly then Mt. Hor should disappear from Nu 34 7 f, and we should read, with slight emendation, “From the great sea ye shall draw a line for you as far as Hadrach, and from Hadrach . . . ” W. Ewing

Horam, ho’ram (הָרַם, hörám, “height”): A king of Gezer defeated by Joshua when he came to the help of Lachish, which Joshua was besieging (Josh 10 33).

Horeb, ho’reb. See Sinai.

Horem, ho’rem (הֵרֶם, hōrēm, “consecrated”): One of the fenced cities in the territory of Naphtali (Josh 19 38), named with Iron and Migdal-e. It may possibly be identified with the modern Hârâkh, which lies on a mound at the S. end of Wâdy el-Aîn, to the W. of Kedes.

Horehsh, ho’resh (הֹרֶשׁ, hōrēsh, 1 S 23 15,18, m only; LXX τὸ τὸ ἡμέραν, en τῇ Καίνα, “in the New”; EV “in the wood” [יוֹרֶשׁ, ba-hōrēshâh], the particle “in” being combined with the article): Hôresh in other passages is tr “forest” (cf 2 Ch 7 4; Isa 17 9; Ezk 31 3) and it is most probably that it should be tr here.

Hor-Haggidgad, hōr-ha-gîd’gâd (הֶרֶה-גִּדְגָד, hōr ha-gîd’ghâd): A desert camp of the Israelites between Beeroth Bene-jakan and Jobthahtah (Nu 33 92 f). In Dt 10 7 it is called Gudgoth. See WANDERING OF ISRAEL.

Horî, ho’î (וֹרִי, hōrî, hōrî, “covey-dweller”):

(1) A Horite descendant of Esaau (Gen 36 22; 1 Ch 1 39).

(2) A Simeonite, father of Shaphat, one of the twelve spies (Nu 13 5).

Horîte, ho’ît, HORîM, ho’îrîm (וֹרֵי, hōrî, לֵי, hōrîm; Χαραάτ, Charratai): Denoted the inhabitants of Mt. Seir before its occupation by the Edomites (Dt 2 12). Seir is accordingly called Horite in Gen 36 20,30, where a list of his descendants is given, who afterward mixed with the invading Edomites. Esau himself married the daughter of the Horite chieftain Anah (Gen 36 25; see ver 2, where “Horite” must be corrected into “Horite”). The “Horites” in their “Mt. Seir” were among the nations defeated by the army of Chedorlaomer in the age of Abraham (Gen 14 6). The Heb Horite, however, is the Khar of the Egypt inscriptions, a name given to the whole of Southern Palestine and Edom as well as to the adjacent sea. In accordance with this we find in the OT also traces of the existence of the Horites in other parts of the country besides Mt. Seir. In Gen 34 2; Josh 9 7, the LXX (Cod. A) more correctly reads “Horite” instead of “Hivite” for the inhabitants of Shechem and Gideon, and Caleb is said to be “the son of Hur, the first-born of Ephratah” or Bethelhem (1 Ch 2 50; 4 4). Hor or Horite has sometimes been explained to mean “covey-dweller”; it more probably, however, denotes the “white” race. The Horites were Semites, and consequently are distinguished in Dt 2:12 from the tall race of Reiphaim.

A. H. SAYCE

HORMAH, hörɔma (אֹרְמָה, hormah): A city first mentioned in connection with the defeat of the Israelites by the Amalekites and the Canaanites, when, after the ten spies who brought an evil report of the land had died of plague, the people persisted, against the will of Moses, in going “up into the place which Jehovah hath promised” (Nu 14:45; Dt 1:44). After the injury done them by the king of Arad, Israel took the city, utterly destroyed it, and called it Hormah, i.e. “accursed” (Nu 21:3). To this event probably the reference is in Jgs 1:17, where Judah and Simeon are credited with the work. In Josh 12:14 it is named between Geder and Arad; in Josh 15:30 between Chesil and Ziklag, among the uttermost cities toward the border of Edom in the S.; and in Josh 19:4 between Bethul and Ziklag (cf 1 Ch 4:30). To it David sent a share of the spoil taken from the Amalekites who had RAIDed Ziklag (1 S 30:30). The Ark was taken far from Kadesh, probably to the N.E. No name resembling Hormah has been recovered in that district. The ancient name was Zephath (Jgs 1:17). It is not unlikely that in popular use this name outlived Hormah; and in some form it may survive to this day. In that case it may be represented by the modern es-Sabaita between el-Khalasa in the N. and ‘An’a Kadi in the S., about 23 miles from the latter (cf ‘Asluj, about 14 miles N. of es-Sabaita), the probability is heightened. Robinson (BR, III, 150) compares the name Zephath with that of Nakk es-Safa, to the N. of Wady el-Fikrah; but that appears to be too far—about 40 miles—from Kadesh. W. Ewing

HORN, hörn (Heb and Aram. תַּחַר, kōras; kēras; for the “ram’s horn” [בַּחַר, yābbēl] of Josh 6 see MUSIC, and for the “inkhorn” of Ezk 9 [זִכְרַנ, ḫeṣēth see separate art.])

1. Kēren and keras represent the Eng. “horn” exactly, whether on the animal (Gen 22:13), or used in metaphorical purposes (Josh 6:5; 1 Ch 28:5); or for containing a liquid (1 S 16:1.3; 1 K 1:39), but in Ezk 27:15 the “horns of ivory” are of course tusk and the “horns” of ebony are small (pointed?) logs. Consequently most of the Usages require no explanation.

2. Both the altar of burnt offering (Ex 27:2; 38:2; cf Ezk 43:15) and the incense altar (Ex 30:2; 37:25.26; cf Rev 9:13) had “horns,” which are explained to be projections “of one piece with” the wooden framework and covered with the brass (or gold) that covered the altar. They formed the most sacred part of the altar and were anointed with the blood of the most solemn sacrifices (only) (Ex 30:10; Lev 4:7.18.25.30.34; 16:18; cf Ezk 43:20), and according to Lev 8:15; 9:9, the first official sacrifices began by anointing them. Consequently cutting off the horns effectually desecrated the altar (Am 3:14), while “sin graven on them” (Jer 17:1) took all efficacy from the sacrifice. On the other hand they offered the highest sanctuary (1 K 1:50.51; 2:28). Of their symbolism nothing whatever is said, and the eventual origin is quite obscure. “Remnants of a bull-cult” and “miniature sacred towers” have been suggested, but are wholly uncertain. A more likely origin is from the custom of dressing in the skins of sacrificed animals (Rs 436). That, however, the “horns” were mere conveniences for binding the sacrificial animals (Ps 118:27, a custom referred to nowhere else in the OT), is most unlikely. See Altar.

(3) The common figurative use of “horn” is taken from the image of battling animals (literal use in Dn 8:7, etc) to denote aggressive strength. So Zeolekiah ben Chenaanah illustrates the predicted defeat of the enemies by pushing with iron horns (1 K 22:11; 2 Ch 18:10), while “horns of the wild- ox” (Dt 33:15; Ps 22:21; 32:10) AV “unicorn” represent the magnitude of power, and in Zec 1:18-21 “horns” stand for power in general. In Hab 3 4 the “horns coming out of his hand” denote the potency of Jeh’s gesture (RV “rays” may be stronger, but is weak). So to “exalt the horn” (1 S 2:1.10; Ps 75:4, etc) is to clothe with strength, and to “cut off the horn” (not to be explained by Am 3 14) is to rob of power (Ps 75:10; Jer 48:25). Hence the “horn of salvation” in 2 S 22:3, Ps 18:2; Lk 1:60 is a means of active defence and not a place of sanctuary as in 1 K 1:50. When, in Dn 7:7-24; 8:3.8.9.20.21; Rev 13:1; 17:3.7.12; 16, many horns are given to the same animal, they figure successive nations or rulers. But the seven horns in Rev 6:6; 12:3 denote the completeness of the malefactors of power. In Rev 13:11, however, the two horns point only to the external imitation of the harmless lamb, the “horns” being mere stubs.

BURLINGTON EASTON

HORNS OF THE ALTAR תַּחַריִנוּת, kār-nāḥ ha-mizbəḥ+h): These projections at the four corners of the altar of burnt offering were of one piece with the altar, and were made of acacia wood overlaid with brass (Ex 27:2, “bronzes”). In Ezekiel’s altar-specifications their position is described as being on a level with the altar hearth (43:15). Fugitives seeking asylum might cling to the horns of the altar, as did Adonijah (1 K 1:50), which is one proof among many that worshippers had at all times access to the neighborhood of the altar. On certain occasions, as at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Ex 29:12), and a sin offering for one of the people of the land (Lev 4:30), the horns were touched with sacrificial blood.

The altar of incense, standing in the outer chamber of the sanctuary, had also four horns, which were covered with gold (Ex 38:23). These were touched with blood in the case of a sin offering for a high priest, or for the whole congregation, if they had sinned unwittingly (Lev 4:7.18). See Altar; Horn.

HORNET, hör’nēt (נְחָלָה, cir’ah; of נְחָלֶת, zorah), “Zorah” [Jgs 13:2, etc]; also of נְחָלֶת, cara’ath, “leprosy” [Lev 13:2, etc]; from root נָחַל, cara’ “to smile”; LXX σφήκα, spēkētā, lit. “weas’y’s nest”). Hornets are mentioned only in Ex 23:32;Dt 7:20;Josh 24:12. All three references are to the miraculous interposition of God in driving out before the IsraeliteS the original inhabitants of the promised land. There has been much speculation as to whether hornets are literally meant. The following seems to throw some light on this question (Ex 23:32;27:28): “Behold, I send an angel before thee, to keep thee by the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared... I will send the hornet before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before thee,” The “terror” of ver 27 may well be considered to be tyrified by the “hornet” of ver 28, the care for the Israelites (ver 20) being thrown into marked contrast with the confusion of their enemies. Cf Isa 7 18, where the fly and the bee symbolize the military forces of Egypt and Assyria: “And it shall come to pass in that day, that Jeh will hiss for the fly that is in the uttermost part of the rivers of Egypt, and for the bee that is in the land of Assyria.”

Hornets and wasps belong to the family Vespidae of the order Hymenoptera. Both belong to the genus Vespa, the hornets being distinguished by their large size. Both hornets and wasps are abundant in Pal (cf Zarah, which may mean “town of hornets”). A large kind is called in Arab. debbâr, which recalls the Heb dêbôrah, “bee.” They sting fiercely, but not unless molested.

HORONAIM, horônâ-im (ךרוֹנָאֵים), hor-ônaya’in; Apôc, Arônêâm; in Jer Orônapa, Orônâ-tam, “the two hollows”: An unidentified place in the S. of Moab. It is named in Jer 48 5.

Isaiah (15 5) and Jeremiah (41 3) speak of the “way to Horonaim,” and Jeremiah (48 5) of the “decent,” or “going down” of Horonaim. Masha (MS) says he was hidden by Chemosh to go “down” and fight against Horonâm. Probably, therefore, it lay on one of the roads leading down from the Moabite plateau, to Arâbâh.

It is mentioned by Jerome as being taken by Alexander Janneaus (Ant. XIII, xv, 4). Hyrumus promised to restore it and the rest to Aretas (XIV, 4). There is no indication that in early times it was ever possessed by Israel.

Buhl (G.A.P. 272 I) thinks it may be represented by a significant ruin near Wady ed-Derâ’a (Wady Kerak).

HORONITE, horônît, horôt-nît (ךרוֹנִית), ha-hôrôni; An appellation of Sanballat (Neh 2 10; 13 28), an inhabitant of Beth-horon (q.v.).

HORRIBLE, hori-lồ (ךרוֹרִיל, sha’dârrâ, sha’dărâ, sha’dârâ;): In Jer 5 30 sha’dârrâ, “vile,” “horrible,” is tr. “horrible,” “a wonderful and horrible thing,” RV “astonishing and horror”; also 23 14; in 16 18; Hos 6 10 it is sha’dârrâ; in Ps 11 6 we have sha’dârrâ “heat,” RV “heating wind.” Ps 40 2 sha’dâ, “noise,” “tumult,” “He brought me up . . . out of a horrible pit,” RV “a pit of tumult” (or destruction). Horribili is the tr. of sdâr, “to shudder,” “to be whirled away,” “in Jer 2 12 of the storm, RV “wind.” It is mentioned by Ezech 32 10; in Ezech 27 35 RV “has horribly afraid” (sa’ar) for “sore afraid.” “Horrible” occurs frequently in Apoc (2 Esd 11 45; 16 28.34; Wisd 3 10; “For horrible [charapela] is the end of the unrighteous generation, RV “grievous,” etc.)

W. L. Walker

HORROR, horô (ךרוֹרֹר), émah, há-brâqáh, pâllâqâh: In Gen 15 12 émah (often rendered “terror”) is trd “terror,” “a horror of great darkness”; pâllâqâh, “trembling,” “horror” (Ps 55 5; Ezek 7 18); zal’âphâh, “glow,” “heat” (Ps 119 53; RV “hot indignation,” “anger,” “horror”); cf Ps 11 6; Lam 6 10. For “trembling” (Job 21 6) and for “fearfulness” (Isa 21 4) RV has “horror.” “Horror” does not occur in the NT, but in 2 Mac 3 17 we have “The man was so compassed with horror” (periklasmoda), RV “shuddering.”

1. Names in several cases is trd “horse” or “war-horse” (Isa 28 28; Ezek 27 14; Joel 2 4 RVm); also in 2 S 1 6, where “the horsemen” of EV is יִשְׂרָאֵל וְאַלְפֵי אַלְפֵי, ba’âle ha-pâ’arshîm, “owners of horses”; cf Arab. qâ’ar, fâris, “horseman,” and َرَكْس, faras, “horse.” (4) The fem. form, gâdâh, occurs in Cant 1 9, and is rendered as follows: LXX הַפְּרָשָׁא, hâ鄱pâs; Vulg., equat. AV “company of horses,” RV “steed.” It is not clear why EV does not have “mare.” (5) The word בְּשֵׂדֶר, abbritim, “strong ones,” is used for horses in Jgs 5 22; Jer 8 16; 47 3; 50 11 (AV “bulls”). In Ps 22 12 the same word is trd “strong bulls” (of Bashan). (6) For רִכְשָׁה (cf Arab. رَكْس, rakad, “to run”), in I K 4 28; Est 8 10.14; Mic 1 13, RV “has swift steeds,” while AV gives “dromedaries” in II K and “mules” in Est. (7) For רִכְשָׁה, kirkôrâth (Isa 66 20), AV and RV have “swift beasts.” ERVm and ARV “dromedaries.”

2. Origin (see also under Horses, Horse). The Heb and Egyptian names for the horse are alike akin to the Assyrians. The Jews may have obtained horses from Egypt (Dt 17 16), but the Canaanites before them had horses (Josh 17 16), and in looking toward the N. E. for the origin of the horse, the philologists are in agreement with zoologists who consider that the plains of Central Asia, and also of Europe, were the original home of the horse. At least the species of wild horse is still found in Central Asia.

3. Uses. The horses of the Bible are almost exclusively war-horses, or at least the property of kings and not of the common people. A double reference to the use of horses in threshing grain is found in Isa 28 28.

Horses are among the properties which the Egyptians gave to Joseph in exchange for grain (Gen 47 17). In Dt 17 16 it is enjoined that the king shall not multiply horses, and in Dt 17 18 that he shall not multiply “heats.” This and other injunctions failed to prevent the Jews from borrowing from the neighboring civilizations their customs, idolatries, and even their horses. So in Ezekiel, Ezech is expressly forbidden to have horses (Ezech 27 35; Est 8 10); for “mules” and “young dromedaries” (Est 7 10). See Camel.

The horse is referred to figuratively chiefly in Zec and Rev. A chariot and horses of fire take Elijah up to heaven (2 K 2 11). In Ps 21 7; 33 17; and 76 6, the great strength of the horse is recalled as a Descriptive reminder of the greater strength of God. In Jas 3 3, the small bridle by which the horse can be managed is compared to the tongue (cf Ps 32 9). In Job 19 25-26, we have a magnificent description of a spirited war-horse.

HORSE GATE. See Jerusalem.

HORSE, RED (ךִמוֹרֵה, *chîmôrêh, hîpîpîs pûrûs): Symbolic of war, bloodshed ("slay one another,"

HORSELEACH, ἱρσ'?lēch (אַלָּכָה, 'alakah; cf Arab. ʿalākah, 'alakah, "ghoul," and ʿalakā, ʿalakah, "leech," from root ʿalak, ʿalik, "to cling"); LXX βραξίλα,  βαξίλα, ("leech"): The word occurs only once, in Prov 30 15, RVm "vampire." In Arab. 'alakah is a leech of any kind, not only a horse-leech. The Arab. 'alakah, which, if it may be noted, is almost identical with the Heb form, is a ghoul (Arab. ghādī), an evil spirit which seeks to injure men and which preys upon the dead. The mythical vampire is similar to the ghoul. In zoology the name "vampire" is applied to a family of bats inhabiting tropical America, some, but not all, of which suck blood. In the passage cited the Arab. Bible has 'alakah, "ghoul." If "leech" is meant, there can be no good reason for specifying "horse-leech." At least six species of leeches are known in Pal and Syria, and doubtless others exist. They are common in streams, pools, and fountains where animals drink. They enter the mouth, attach themselves to the interior of the mouth or pharynx, and are removed only with difficulty. ALFRED ELY DAY

HORSEMAN, ἱρσ'man. See Army.

HORSES OF THE SUN (2 K 23 11): In connection with the sun-worship practised by idolatrous kings in the temple at Jerus (2 K 23 5; cf Ezek 8 16), horses dedicated to the sun, with chariots, had been placed at the entrance of the sacred edifice. These Jeishah, in his great excitement, "took away," and burned the chariots with fire. Horses sacred to the sun were common among oriental peoples (Bochart, Heivroz., 1, 2, 10).

HOSAH, ḫs'as (חָשָׁה, hōshāh): A city on the border of Asher, in the neighborhood of Tyre (Josh 19 29). LXX reads Isaieph, which might suggest identification with Kefr Yassif to the N.E. of Acre. Possibly, however, as Sayce (HCM, 429) and Malone, 2nd ed., 51), suggest, Hosah may represent the Assyrian Usu. Some scholars think that Usu was the Assyrian name for Palaetyrus. If "the fenced city of Tyre" were that on the island, while the city on the mainland lay at Ras el'-Ain, 30 stadia to the S. (Strabo xvi.758), this identification is not improbable.

HOSANNA, ḫô-san'nâ (سيدא, hōsannd): This Gr transliteration of a Heb word occurs 6 t in the Gospels as the cry of the people when Our Lord entered Jerus as the Messiah was represented by Zeo (9 9), and of the "children" when He cleansed the temple (Mt 21 9 bds.15; Mk 11 9 f; Jn 12 13). In Mt 21 9 it is "Hosanna to the son of David!" followed by "Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Hosanna in the highest!" In ver 15 it is also "Hosanna to the Son of David!"; in Mk 11 9 f it is "Hosanna; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord; Blessèd is he that cometh in the name of the Lord." In Jn 12 13 it is "Hosanna; Blessed is he that cometh in the name of the Lord, even the King of Israel." Thus in all the evangelists it is an acclamation or ascription of praise. This has raised the question whether the supposed derivation from Ps 118 25, beginning with ἀνανά ΥΔΗΣ ἀνσ' δν μν, “Save now, pray" (which is followed [ver 26] by ἀναφεροντίς ον πρεσ" in the name of Jeh) is correct. (See Thayer, HDB; Cheyne, EB; Dalman, Words of Jesus.) Various other explanations have been suggested. Thayer remarks, "It is most natural to regard the word Hosanna, as respects its form, as neither syncopated nor contracted, but the shorter Hiphil imperative with the appended enclitic' (hōshānū; cf Ps 85 2; Jer 31 7), for which there is Talmudic warrant. "As respects its force, we must for . . . contextual reasons, assume that it had already lost its primary supplicatory sense and become an ejaculation of joy or shout of welcome. It is said to have been so used in this sense at the joyous Feast of Tabernacles, the 7th day of which came to be called "the Great Hosanna," or "Hosanna Day." But, while the word is certainly an ejaculation of praise and not one of supplication, the idea of salvation need not be excluded. As in Rev 7 10 (of 19 1), we have the acclamation, "Salvation unto God . . . and unto the Lamb," so we might have the cry, "Salvation to the son of David!" and "Hosanna in the Highest," might be the equivalent of "Salvation unto our God!" He who was 'coming in the name of the Lord' was the king who was bringing salvation from God to the people. W. L. WALKER

HOSEA, ἱοσ'ēa: I. The Prophet. 1. Name. 2. Native Place. 3. Date. 4. Personal History (Marriage) (1) Allegorical View (2) Literal View II. The Book. 1. Style and Scope. 2. Historical Background. 3. Contents and Divisions (1) Chs 1-3 (2) Chs 4-14. 4. Testimony to Earlier History. 5. Testimony to Law. 6. Affinity with Deuteronomy LITERATURE I. The Prophet.—The name (עֵוָטִית, ḫāshāh; LXX Ὁσῆ, Ὁσῖς; for other forms vide note in DB), probably meaning "help," seems to have been not uncommon, being derived from the suspicious vb. from which we have the frequently recurring word "salvation." It may be a contraction of a larger form of which the Divine name or its abbreviation formed a part, so as to signify "God is help," or "Help, God." According to Nu 13 8.16 that is the original name of Joshua son of Nun, till Moses gave him the longer name (compounded with the name of Jeh) which he continued to bear (עֵוָטִית, Ὁσῖς), "Jeh is salvation." The last king of the Northern Kingdom was also named Hosea (2 K 15 30), and we find the same name borne by a chief of the tribe of Ephraim under David (1 Ch 27 20) and by a chief under Nehemiah (Neh 10 23). Although it is not directly stated in the book, there can be little doubt that he exercised his ministry in the kingdom of the Ten Tribes. Whereas his references to the Place Judah are of a general kind, Ephraim or Samaria being sometimes mentioned in the same connection or more frequently alone, the situation implied throughout and the whole tone of the addresses agree with what we know of the Northern Kingdom at the time, and his references to places and events in that kingdom are so numerous and minute as to lead to the conclusion that he not only prophesied there, but that he was a native of that part of the country. Gilead, e.g. a district little named in the prophets, is twice mentioned (6, 8; 12, 11) and in such a manner as to suggest that he knew it by personal observation; and that Mirzah accompanied the mission of Hosea to the court of Jeroboam in Gilead (Jgs 17, 10). Then we find Tabor (6, 1), Shechem (6, 9 RV), Gilgal and Bethel (4 15; 9 15; 10 5, 8, 15; 12, 11). Even Lebanon in the distant N., is spoken of with a minuteness of detail, as if it were only familiar to one versed in the topography of the Syrian Anti-Lebanon, familiar with Northern Pal. (14 5–8). In a stricter sense, therefore, than Amos who, though a native of Tekoa, had a prophetic mission to the N., Hosea may be called the prophet of Northern Israel, and his book may be regarded as an early stage in the development of the Gileadite prophetic voice, in the absence of the book of Amos.

All that we are told directly as to the time when Hosea prophesied is the statement in the first verse that the word of the Lord came to him "in the days of Uzziah, Jothan, Ahaz, and Hezekiah, kings of Judah, and in the days of Jeroboam the son of Joash, king of Israel."

It is quite evident that his ministry did not extend over the combined reigns of all these kings; for, if the beginning of the reign of Uzziah is put in direct connection with the beginning of that of Hezekiah, according to the now usually accepted chronology (Kautzsch, Literature of the OT, ET), there is a period of 52 years, and Jeroboam came to his throne a few years before the accession of Uzziah.

To fix the book itself for more precise indications of date, we find that the prophet threatens in God's name that in "a little while" He will "aveng the blood of Jeroboam upon the house of Jehu." Now Jeroboam was the great-grandson of Jehu, and his son Zechariah, who succeeded him, reigned six months, and was the last of the line of Jehu. We may, therefore, place the beginning of Hosea's ministry a short time before the death of Jeroboam which took place 745 BC. As to the other limit, it is to be observed that, though the whole reign of the kingdom of the house of Israel was threatened (1 4), the catastrophe had not occurred when the prophet ceased his ministry. The date of that event is fixed in the year 722 BC, and it is said to have happened in the 6th year of King Hezekiah. This does not give too long a time for Hosea's activity, and it leaves the accuracy of the superscription unchallenged, whoever may have written it. If it is the work of a later editor, it may be that Hosea's ministry ceased before the reign of Hezekiah, though he may have lived on into that king's reign. It should be added, however, that there seems to be no reference to another event which might have been expected to find an echo in the beginning of the kingdom in the reign of Ahaz (735 BC) by Pekah of Israel and Rezin of Damascus against the kingdom of Judah (2 K 16 5; Isa 7 1).

Briefly we may say that, though there is uncertainty as to the dates at the beginning and end of his activity, he began his work before the middle of the 8th cent., and that he saw the rise and fall of several kings. He would thus be a younger contemporary of Amos whose activity seems to have been confined to the reign of Jeroboam.

Hosea is described as the son of Beeri, who is otherwise unknown. Of his personal history we are told either absolutely nothing or else a very great deal, according as we read the first 1 and 3 of his book. In ancient and in modern times, opinions have been divided as to whether in these chapters we have a recital of actual facts, or the presentation of prophetic teaching in the form of a parable or allegory.

1. (1) Allegorical view.—The Jewish interpreters as a rule took the allegorical view, and Jerome, in the early Christian church, no doubt following Origen the great allegorizer, states it at length, and sets it down as the view in the closing words of Hosea's book: "Who is wise, that he may understand these things? prudent, that he may know them?" (14 9).

It is a mystery, he says: for it is a scandal to think of Hosea being commanded to take an unchaste wife and without any reluctance obeying the command. It is a figure, like that of Jeremiah going to the Euphrates (when Jerusalem was closely besiegéd), and seeing a girdle in the bed of the river (Jer 13). So Kaeckel is commanded to reproduce the life of Jeroboam, and to lie 360 days on his side to indicate the years of his iniquity (Ezk 4); and there are other symbolic acts. Jerome then proceeds to show that Hosea's marriage was not the first to Israel, which is the Gomer of ch 1, and then to Judah, the wife in ch 3, and finally to Christ and the church, the representations being types from beginning to end.

Calvin took the same view. Among modern commentators we find holding the allegorical view not only Hengstenberg, Hilvernick and Keil, but also Eichhorn and Kautzsch. Hengstenberg also (Das AT, II, 88 ff) protests against the literal interpretation as impossible, and that on no moral or reverential considerations, but entirely on exegetical grounds. He thinks it enough to say that, when the prophet calls his children "children of whoredom," he indicates quite clearly that he uses the words in a figurative sense; and he explains the allegory as follows: The prophet is the representative of Jehovah; Israel is the wife of Jehu, but faithless to her husband, going after other gods; the children are the Israelites, who are therefore called children of whoredoms because they practise the idolatry of the nation. So they receive names which denote the consequences of their sin. In accordance with the allegory, the children may not be of the prophet (for Israel is God's own) but this is not the main point; the essential thing is the naming of the children as they are named. In the third chapter, according to this interpretation, allegory again appears, to another purpose. Idolatrous Israel is again the unfaithful wife of the prophet as the representative of Jehu. This relation can again be understood only as figurative; for, if the prophet stands for Jehu, the marriage of Israel to the prophet cannot imply infidelity to Jeh. The sense is evident: the marriage still subsists; God does not give His people up, but they are for the present divorced "from bed and board"; it is a prophecy of the time when Jeh will leave the people to their fate, till the day of reconciliation comes.

2. Literal view.—The literal interpretation, adopted by Theodore of Mopsuestia in the ancient church, was followed, after the Reformation, by the chief theologians of the Lutheran church, and has been held, in modern times, by expositors, including Delitzsch, Kurtz, Hofmann, Wellhausen, Cheyne, Robertson Smith, G. A. Smith and others. In this view, as generally held, chs 1 and 3 go together and refer to the same person. The idea is that Hosea married a woman named Gomer, who had the three children here named. Whether it was that she was known to be a worthless woman before the marriage and that the prophet hoped to reclaim her, or that she proved faithless after the marriage, she finally left him and sank deeper and deeper into sin, until, at some future time, the prophet bought her from her paramour and brought her to his own house, keeping her secluded, however, and deprived of all the privileges of a wife. In support of this view it is urged that the details are related in so matter-of-fact a manner that they must be matters of fact. Though the children receive symbolic names (as Isaiah gave such names to his children), the meanings of these are clear and are explained, whereas the wife cannot thus be explained. Then there are details, such as the weaning of one child before the conception of another (1 8) and the precise price paid for the earring wife (3 2), which are not needed to keep up the allegory, and cannot be invested with symbolic meaning by the prophet. What is considered a still stronger argument is relied on by modern advocates of this view, the psychological argument that there is always a proportion between a revelation vouchsafed and the mental state of the person receiving it. Hosea dates the beginning of his vision to the 13th year of the reign of Jere-miah, when he was 30 years old. This was the unfaithfulness of his wife that brought home to him the apostasy of Israel; and, as his heart went after his wayward wife, so the Divine love was stronger than Israel's sin; and thus through his own domestic experience he was prepared to be a prophet to his people.

The great difficulty in the way of accepting the literal interpretation lies, as Reuss has pointed out, in the statement at the beginning, that the prophet was commanded to take a wife of whoresoms and children of whoresoms. And the advocates of the view meet the difficulties in some way like this: The narrative as it stands is manifestly later than the events. On looking back, the prophet describes his wife as she turned out to be, not as she was at the beginning of the history. It is urged with some force that it was necessary to the analogy (even if the story is only a parable) that the wife should have been first of all chaste; for, in Hosea's representation, he stands at the time of his wife's departure. In the wilderness was faithful and fell away only afterward (2 15; 9 10; 11 1). The narrative does not require us to assume that Gomer was an immoral person or that she was the mother of children before her. The children bore the prophetic names, but these names do not reflect upon Gomer but upon Israel. Why, then, is she described as a woman of whoresoms? It is answered that the expression 'baheth z'nanim is a class-descriptive, and is different from 'baheth hammelekh, which is a woman of whom the marriage bond is broken.' (ishehah zonah.) A Jewish interpreter quoted by Aben Ezra says: "Hosea was commanded to take a wife of whoresoms because an honest woman was not to be had. The whole people had gone astray—a woman's path also. Considering her as one of them was a typical example, and the children involved in the common declension (see 4 1 f.)." The comment of Umbreit is worthy of notice: "As the covenant of monogamy with Israel is viewed as a marriage bond, so is the prophetic bond with Israel a marriage, for he is the messenger and mediator. Therefore, if he feels an irresistible impulse to enter into the marriage bond with Israel, he is bound to unite himself with a bride of an unfaithful character. Hosea's whoresom wife Gomer is involved in the universal guilt." (Prak. Comm. über die Propheten, Hamburg, 1844.) It is considered, then, that this view, that Gomer, after her marriage, being in heart addicted to the prevailing idolatry, when we know was often associated with gross immoralitiness (see 4 13), felt the irksomeness of restrained in the prophet's house, left him and sank into open profli-gency, from which (ch 3) the prophet reclaims her so far as to bring her back and keep her secluded in his own house.

Quite recently this view has been advocated by Riedel (Alltscl. Untersuchungen, Leipzig, 1902), who endeavors to enforce it by giving a symbolic meaning to Gomer's name, "baheth-Diolah." The word is the dual (or might be pointed as a pl.) of a word, abbihah, meaning a fruitcake, i.e. raisins or figs pressed together. It is the word used in the story of Hezekiah's illness (2 K 20, 7), and is found in the list of things furnished by Abijah to David (1 K 2, 18). See also S 30 12; 1 Ch 12 40. Another name for the same thing, abbiyah, occurs in the rendering of AY, "a branch of wine," but in RV "cakes of raisins." It seems clear that this word, at least here, denotes fruit-cakes offered to the heathen deities in Jerahmiah's time (Jer 7, 18; 44 17). So Riedel argues that Gomer may have been domesticated from a fruit-cake, according to the Hebrew idiom in such expressions as "daughters of song," etc (Ecc 12 4; Prov 31 2; 2 S 7 10; Gen 37 3, 5). It will be perceived that the literal interpretation as thus stated does not involve the supposition that Hosea became aware of his wife's infidelity before the birth of the second child, as Robertson Smith and G. A. Smith suppose. The names given to the children all refer to the infidelity of the people; and of his remarriage it is the unfaithfulness of his wife that brought home to him the apostasy of Israel; and, as his heart went after his wayward wife, so the Divine love was stronger than Israel's sin; and thus through his own domestic experience he was prepared to be a prophet to his people.

II. The Book—Scarcely any book in the OT is more difficult of exposition than the Book of Hos. This does not seem to be owing to any exceptional defect in the transmitted text, but rather to the peculiarity of the style; and partly also, no doubt, to the fact that the historical situation of the prophet was one of bewildering and sudden change of a violent kind, which seems to reflect itself in the book. The style here is predominantly the man. Whatever view we may take of his personal history, it is evident that at the time of his apostasy he was in a situation in which he is placed. He is controlled by his subject, instead of controlling it. It is his heart that speaks; he is not careful to concentrate his thoughts or to mark his transitions; the sentences fall from him in an uncontrolled flow.

Mournful as Jeremiah, he does not indulge in the pleasure of melancholy as that prophet seems to do. Jeremiah broods over his sorrow, nurses it, and tells us he is weeping. Hosea does not say he is weeping, but we know in his case. Instead of laying out his plaint in measured form, he ejaculates it in short, sharp sentences, as the stabs of his people's sin pierce his heart.

The result is the absence of that rhythmic flow and studied parallelism which are such common features of Heb oratory, and are often so helpful to the expounder. His imagery, while highly poetical, is not elaborated; his figures are not so much carried out as thrown out; nor does he dwell long on the same figure. His sentences are like utterances of an oracle, and he forgets himself in identifying himself with the God in whose name he speaks—a feature which is not without significance in the bearing on the question of his personal history. This standing expression "Thus saith the Lord" ("It is the utterance of Jehovah," RV), so characteristic of the Book of Hosea, is very rarely occurs (only in 2 13 13 21; 11 11) whereas the words that he speaks are the very words of the Lord; and without any formal introduction. Sometimes he passes from speaking in his own name to speaking in the name of Jehovah (see, e.g., 6 4; 13 14; 14 17, etc.). Never was speaker so absorbed in his theme, or more identified with him for whom he speaks. He seems to be only an instrument given to him to repeat, as the scriptor or summary of spoken addresses. They certainly want to a great extent the directness and point which are so marked a feature of prophetic diction, so much so that some (e.g. Reuss and Marti) suppose they are the production of one who had readers and not hearers in view.

But, though the style appears in this abrupt form, there is one clear note on diverse strings sounding through the whole. The theme is twofold: the love of Jehovah, and the indifference of Israel to that love; and it would be hard to say which of the two is more vividly conceived and more forcibly expressed. Among the figures of the tenderest affection, sometimes that of the pitying, solicitous care of the parent (11 1 3 5; 14 3), but more promi-nently as the affection of the husband (chs 1 3), the Divine love is brought in by the simple expression of all indifference and opposition; and, on the other hand, the waywardness, unblushing faithlessness of the loved one is painted in colors so repulsive as almost to shock the moral sense, but giving thereby evidence of the terrible painfulness of the situation on the prophet's mind. Thus early does he take the sacred bond of husband and wife as the type of the Divine eating love—a similitude found elsewhere in prophetic literature, and most fully elaborated by Ezekiel (Ezk 16; cf Jer 3). Hosea is the prophet of love, and not without propriety has been called the St. John of the OT.

For the reasons just stated, it is very difficult to give a systematic analysis of the Book of Hos. It may, however, be helpful to that end to recall the situation of the time as Background furnishing a historical setting for the several sections of the book.

At the commencement of the prophet's ministry, the Northern Kingdom was enjoying the prosperity and running into the excesses consequent on the victories of Jeroboam II. The glaring social corruptions of the times are exhibited and castigated by Amos, as they would most impress a stranger from the S.; but Hosea, a native, as we are led to suppose, of the Northern Kingdom, saw more deeply into the malady, and traced all the crime and vice of the nation to the fundamental evil of idolatry and apostasy from the true God. What he describes under the repulsive figure of whoredom was the rampant worship of the ba'alim, which had practically obscured the recognition of the sole claims to worship of the national Jeh. This worship of the ba'alim is to be distinguished from that of which we treat earlier. Ahah's Tyrian wife Jezebel had introduced the worship of her native country, that of the Sidonian Baal, which amounted to the setting up of a foreign deity; and Elijah's contention that it must be a choice between Jeh and Baal appealed to the sense of patriotism and the sentiment of national existence.

The worship of the ba'alim, however, was an older and more insidious form of idolatry. The worship of the Canaanites, among whom the Israelites found themselves on the occupation of Pal, was a reverence of the gods of Baal generally known by the names of the places where each had his shrine or influence. The generic name of ba'al or "lord" was applied naturally as a common word to each of these, with the addition of the name of place or potency to distinguish them. Thus we have Baal-hamon, Baal-gad, Baal-berith, etc. The insidiousness of this kind of worship is proved by its wide prevalence, esp. among people at a low stage of intelligence, when the untutored mind is brought face to face with the forces of Nature. And the tenacity of the feeling is proved by the prevalence of such worship, even among people whose professed religion condemns idolatry of every kind. The veneration of local shrines among Christians of the East is well known; and Mohammedans make pilgrimages to the tombs of saints who, though not formally worshipped as deities, are believed to have the power to confer such benefits as the Canaanites expected from the ba'alim. The very name ba'al, originally meaning simply lord and master, as in such expressions as "master of a house," or "lord of a wife," or "owner of an ox," would be misleading; for the Israelites could quite innocently call Jeh their ba'al or Lord, as we can they did in the formation of proper names. We can, without much difficulty, conceive what would happen among a people like the Israelite tribes, of no high grade of religious intelligence, and with the prevailing superstitions in their blood, when they found themselves in Pal. From a nomad and pastoral people they became, and had to become, agriculturists; the natives of the land would be their instructors, in many or in most cases the actual labor would be done by them. The Book of Jgs tells us that originally all the tribes of Israelites "did not drive out" the native inhabitants; the northern tribes in particular, where the land was most fertile, tolerated a large native admixture. We are also told (Jgs 2 7) that the people served the Lord all the days of Joshua and of those elders who outlived Joshua; and this hint of a gradual declension no doubt points to what actually took place. For a time they remembered and thought of Jeh as the God who had done for them great things in Egypt and in the wilderness; and then, as time went on, they had to think of Him as the giver of the land in which they found themselves, with all its varied produce. But this was the very thing the Canaanites ascribed to their ba'alim. And so, imperceptibly, by naming places as the natives named them, by observing the customs which the natives followed, and celebrating the festivals of the agricultural year, they were gliding into conformity with the religion of their neighbors; for, in such a state of society, custom is more or less based on religion and passes for religion. Almost before they were aware, they were doing homage to the various ba'alim in celebrating their festival days and offering to them the produce of the ground.

Such was the condition which Hosea describes as an absence of the knowledge of God (4 1) and the consequence cannot be better described than in the words of St. Paul: "As they refused to have God in their knowledge, God gave them up unto a corrupt mind, to do those things which are not fitting" (Rom 1 28). Hosea well tells us in no ambiguous terms how the devotees of the impure worship gave themselves up "to work all uncleanness with greediness" (Eph 4 19; cf Am 2 7 f; Hose 4 14); and how deeply the canker had worked into the body politic and produced the rapid collapse and irretrievable ruin which followed soon after the strong hand of Jeroboam was removed. The 21 years that followed his death in 743 BC saw no fewer than six successive occupants of the throne, and the final disappearance of the ten tribes. Zechariah, his son, had reigned only six months when "Shallum the son of Jabesh conspired against him . . . and slew him, and reigned in his stead" (2 K 15 10). Shallum himself reigned only a month when he was in the same bloody manner removed by Menahem. After a reign of 10 years, according to 2 K 15 17 (although the chronology here is uncertain), he was succeeded by his son Pekahiah (2 K 15 22), and after two years Pekah took him and reigned in his stead (2 K 15 25). This king also was assassinated, and was succeeded by Hoshea (2 K 15 30), the last king of the ten tribes, for the kingdom came to an end in 722 BC. Hosea must have lived during a most marked condition of the troublous times; and we may expect to hear echoes of the events in his book.

(1) Ota 1-3.—We should naturally expect that the order of the chapters would correspond in the main with the progress of events; and

2. Historical 3. Contents thereafter to an earlier period than those that follow. In favor of this is the reference in 1: 2 to the commencement of the prophet's ministry, as also the threatening of the impending extermination of the house of Jehu (1 4), implying that it was still in existence; and finally the hints of the abundance amounting to luxury which marked the prosperous time of Jeroboam's reign.

These three chapters are to be regarded as going together; and, however they may be viewed as reflecting the prophet's personal experience, they leave no room for doubt in regard to the national apostasy that, weighed so heavy on his heart. And this, in effect, is what he says: Just as the wife, espoused to a loving husband, enjoys the protection of home and owns all her provision to her husband, so Israel, chosen by Jeh and brought by Him into a fertile land, has received all she has from
Hosea

The giving of recognition to the b'\text{a}l\text{a}'s for material prosperity was tantamount to a wife's bestowing her affection on another; the accepting of these blessings as bestowed on condition of homage rendered to the b'\text{a}l\text{a}'s was tantamount to the receiving of hire by an abandoned woman.

This being so, the prophet, speaking in God's name, declares: He will do, in a series of a third repeated "therefore" (2:9,14), marking three stages of His discipline. First of all, changing the metaphor to that of a straying heifer, the prophet in God's name declares (vs 6 ff) that He will hedge up His ways with thorns, so as to make it impossible for her to reach her lovers—meaning, no doubt, that whether by drought or blight, or some national misfortune, there would be such a disturbance of the processes of Nature that the usual rites of homage would be suspended.

The people would fail to find the "law of the god of the land" (2 K 17:26). In their perplexity they would betheck themselves, begin to doubt the power of the b'\text{a}l\text{a}'s, and resolve to pay to Jeh the homage which has been given to the local gods. But this is still the same low conception of Jeh that had led them astray. To exchange one god for another simply in the hope of enjoying material prosperity is not the thing He requires.

And then the mastermost second "therefore" (vs 9 ff).

Instead of allowing them to enjoy their corn and wine and oil on the terms of a mere lip allegiance or ritual service, Jeh will take these away, will reduce Israel to her original poverty, causing all the milk of her bosom to cease, and giving garments of mourning for festal attire. Her lovers will no longer own her, her own husband's hand is heavy upon her, and what remains? The third "therefore" (vs 14 ff). Israel, now bereft of all, helpless, homeless, is at last convinced that, as her God could take away all, so it was from Him she had received all: she is shut up to His love and His mercy alone. And here the prophet's thoughts clothe themselves in language referring to the early betrothal period of national life. A new beginning will be made, she will again lead the wilderness life of daily dependence on God, cheerfully and joyfully she will begin a new journey, out of trouble will come, and the hope of another past will be a pain to her. As all the associations of the name b'\text{a}l\text{a}' have been degrading, she shall think of her Lord in a different relation, not as the mere giver of material blessing, but as the husband and deliverer, as the One who gave to each of her children a distinguished from one of many benefactors. In all this Hosea does not make it clear how he expected these changes to be brought about, nor do we detect any references to the political history of the time. He mentions no foreign enemy at this stage, or, at most, hints at war in a vague manner (1:4 ff).

In the second chapter the thing that is emphasized is the heavy hand of God laid on the things through which Israel had been led astray, the paralyzing of Nature's operations, so as to turn her to the God of Nature-worship; but the closing stage of the Divine discipline (ch 3), when Israel, like the wife kept in seclusion, neither enjoying the privileges of the lawful spouse nor able to follow after idols, seems to point to, and certainly was not reached till, the captivity when the people, on a foreign soil, could not exercise their ancestral worship, but yet were finally cured of idolatry.

The references to Judah in these chapters are not to be overlooked. Having said (1:6) that Israel would be utterly destroyed (which seems to point to exile), the prophet adds that Judah would be saved from that fate, though not by warfare means. Farther down (ver 11) he predicts the union of Israel and Judah under one head, and finally in ch 3 it is said that in the latter day the children of Israel would seek the Lord their God and David their king. Many critics suppose that 1 10 f are out of place (though they cannot find a better place for them); and not a few declare that all the references to Judah must be taken as from a later hand, the usual reason for this conclusion being that the words "disturb the connection." In the case of a writer like Hosea, however, whose transitions are so sharp and sudden, we are not safe in speaking of disturbing the connection: what may to us appear abrupt, because we are not expecting it, may have crossed the mind of the original writer; and Hosea, in forecasting the future of his people, can scarcely be debarred from having thought of the whole nation. It was Israel as a whole that was the original bride of Jeh, and surely therefore the united Israel would be the partaker of the final glory. As a matter of fact, Judah was at the time in better case than Israel, and the old promise to the Davidic house (2 S 7:16) was deeply cherished to the end.

(2) Chs 4-14.—If it is admissible to consider chs 1-3 as one related piece (though possibly the written deposits of several addresses) it is quite otherwise with chs 4-14. These are, in a manner, a counterpart of the first three; He requires, when the hand of Jerobeam was relaxed, the kingdom rapidly fell to pieces; a series of military usurpers follows with bewildering rapidity; but who can tell how much political disorder and social diestatement he be behind those brief and gnomic notices of events and So in his stead? So with these chapters. The will of grief, the echo of violence and excess, is heard through all, but it is very difficult to assign each lament, each reproach, each denunciation to the proper occasion that called it forth. The chapters seem like the recital of the confused, hideous dream through which the nation passed till it had awakened by the sharp shock of the Assyrian invasion and the exile that followed. The political condition of the time was one of party strife and national impotence. Sometimes Assyria or Egypt is mentioned alone (5:13; 8:9,13; 9:6; 10:6; 14:3), at other times Assyria and Egypt together (7:1; 13:5, 11; 14:5). The election of Israel is too plainly that the spirit of self-reliance—not to speak of reliance on Jeh—had departed from a race that was worn-eaten with civil wars and rendered selfish and callous by the indulgence of every vice. These foreign powers are also in the view of the prophet destined to be future scourges (see 6:13; 8:9 f; 7:11; 12:1) and we know, from the Book of K and also from the Assyrian monuments, how much the kings of Israel at this time were at the mercy of the great conquering empires of the East. Such passages as speak of Assyria and Egypt in the same breath may point to the rival policies which were in vogue in the Northern Kingdom (as they appeared also somewhat later in Judah) that the root of the Assyrian is to be sought even in the prophet's own times. When the prophet inclines in hope no more mixed with biting fear, he puts into the mouth of repentant Ephraim the words: "Assyria shall not save us; we will not ride upon horses" (14:3), thus alluding to the two foreign powers between which Israel had lost its independence.

It is not possible to give a satisfactory analysis of the chapters under consideration. They are not marked off, as certain sections of other prophetic books are, by headings or refrains, nor are the references to current events sufficiently clear to enable us to assign different parts to different times, nor, in fine, is the matter so distinctly laid out that we can arrange the book under subjects treated. Most expositors accordingly content themselves with indicating the chief topics or lines of thought, and arranging the chapters according to the tone pervading them.

Kell, e.g., would divide all these chapters into three great sections, each forming a kind of prophetical cycle, in which the three great types of repentance, threatening, and promise, are heard in succession. His first section embraces chs 4 to 6, ending with the great

Its (p. 466) return unto Jehu, etc. The second section, 6 to 11, ends with the prophecies of return to the house of David. The third section, chs 11 to 14, ends with Solomon's passage, giving a fourth section, at ch 9, at the end of which there is a break in the MT, and a new subject begins. Accordingly, the section embraces 11 to 9, and Volck, agreeing with Hitzig, assigns it to the reign of Menahem, on the ground of 4:4: "They have set up kings, but not by me," referring to the support given to Menahem by the king of Assyria (2 K 16 10). (5) The fifth section extends from 9 to 11, and is marked by the peculiarity that the prophet's three times refers to the early history of Israel (9 10; 11 1). Identifying Shalman in 10 with Shalmaneser, Volck refers the section to the opening years of the reign of Hosea, against whom (as stated in 2 K 17 3) Shalmaneser came up and Hosea became his servant. (6) Lastly there is a sixth section, ending from 12 to 1, which looks to the future recovery of the people (13 14) and closes with words of gracious promise. This portion also Volck assigns to the reign of Hosea, just as the ruin of Samaria was forecasted in 1, as the despair of any earthly hope. In this way Volck thinks that the statement in the superscription of the Book of Hose is confirmed, and that we have before us, in chronological order if not in precisely their original form, the utterances of the prophet during his ministry. Ewald also was strongly of opinion that the book (in its second part at least) has come down to us substantially in the form in which the prophet himself left it.

The impression one receives from this whole section is one of sadness, for the prevailing tone is one of denunciation and doom. And yet Hosea is not a prophet of despair; and, in fact, he bursts forth into hope just at the point where, humanly speaking, there is no ground of hope. But this hope is produced, not by what he sees in the condition of the people: it is exulting and sustained by his confident faith in the unfailing love of Jeh. And so he ends on the theme on which he began, the love of God prevailing over many circumstances.

Some expositors, however (e.g. Maurer, Hitzig, Delitzsch and Volck), recognizing what they consider as direct references or brief allusions to events outside the history, perceive a chronological order in the chapters. Volck, who has attempted a full analysis on this line (PREP) thinks that chs 4 14 arrange themselves into 6 consecutively sections as follows: (1) ch 4 constitutes a section by itself, determined by the introductory words "Hear the word of Jeh" (4 1), and a similar call at the beginning of ch 5. He assigns this chapter to the reign of Zechahiah, as a description of the low condition to which the nation had fallen, the priests, the people, being involved in the guilt and repaying with interest (ver 6). (2) The second section extends from 5 to 6 8, and is addressed directly to the priests and the royal house, who ought to have been guides but were snares. The prophet in the spirit sees Divine justice breaking breads of sin. (3) The prophecy, which Hitzig referred to the time of Zechiah, and Maurer to the reign of Pekah, is assigned by Volck to one month's reign of Shalum, on the ground of 6 7: "Now shall Shalum and his sons, and the house of them, and the house of Yehu, and the house of Pekah" trumpet to thy mouth." The passage which determines its date is 7:7: "All their kings are fallen," which, agreeing with Hitzig, he thinks could not have been said after the fall of one king, Zechahiah, and so he assigns it to the beginning of the reign of Menahem, who killed Shalum. The next sitting place, giving a fourth section, is at ch 9, at the end of which there is a break in the MT, and a new subject begins. Accordingly, the section embraces 8 1 to 9, and Volck, agreeing with Hitzig, assigns it to the reign of Menahem, on the ground of 4:4: "They have set up kings, but not by me," referring to the support given to Menahem by the king of Assyria (2 K 16 10). (5) The fifth section extends from 9 to 11, and is marked by the peculiarity that the prophet's three times refers to the early history of Israel (9 10; 11 1). (3) The prophecy, which Hitzig referred to the time of Zechahiah, and Maurer to the reign of Pekah, is assigned by Volck to one month's reign of Shalum, on the ground of 6:7: "Now shall Shalum and his sons, and the house of them, and the house of Yehu, and the house of Pekah" devour them. It is by inference from this that Volck puts ch 4 in the preceding reign of Zechahiah. (3) The third section, chs 4-7, is marked off by the new beginning made at ch 8:1: "Set the

This implies that the mass of the people, even in degenerate Israel, were well acquainted with such incidents or episodes as the prophet introduces into his discourses, as well as the links which were necessary to bind them into a connected whole. It is necessary to bear all this in mind in forming an estimate of the historical value of other books. It seems to be taken by many modern writers as certain that those parts of the Pent (JE) which deal with the earlier history were not written till a comparatively short time before Hosea. It is plain, however, that the accounts must be of much earlier date, before they could have become, in an age when books could not have been numerous, the general possession of the national consciousness. Further, the homiletic manner in which Hosea handles these ancient stories makes one suspicious of the modern theory that a number of popular stories were supplied with didactic "frameworks" by later Deuteronomic or other "redactors," and makes it more probable that these accounts were invented with a moral and religious meaning from the beginning. With these considerations in mind, and particularly in view of the use he makes of his references, it is interesting to note the wide range of the prophet's historical survey. If we read with RV or RVm "men" (M) an allusion to the Fall, implying in its connection the view which, as all admit, Hosea held of the religious history of his people as a declension and not an upward evolution. This view is more clearly brought out in the references to the wilderness period of the character of Jacob (12 3-12). Repeatedly he declares that Jeh is the God of Israel "from the land of Egypt" (12 9; 13 4), alludes to the sin of Achan and the valley of Achor (2 15), asserts that God had in time past "spoken unto the prophets" (12 10), "bewed" His people by prophets (6 5), and by a prophet brought His people out of Egypt (12 13). There are also references to incidents nearer to the prophet's time, some of them not very clear (4 4; 6 1; 9 5; 14 2; 13 11), as, for instance, "the Israel" (10 8) refers to the schism of the ten tribes, the prominence given to the Davidic kingship, which, along with the references to Judah, some critics reject on merely subjective grounds, is quite inexplicable (4 15). We do not expect to find in a prophetic writing the same frequency of reference to the law as to the history; for it is the essence of prophecy to appeal to history and to interpret it. Of course, the moral and social aspects of the law are as much the province of the prophet as of the priest; but the ceremonial part of the law, which was under the care of the priests, though it was designed to be the expression of the same ideas that lay at the foundation of prophecy, is mainly touched upon by the prophets when, as was too frequently the case, it ceased to express those ideas and became an offence. The words of the prophets on this subject, when fairly interpreted, are not opposed to law in any of its authorized forms, but only to its abuses; and there are expressions and allusions in Hosea, although he spoke to the Northern Kingdom, where from the time of the schism there had been a wide departure from the Mosaic law, which recognizes its ancient existence and its Divine sanction. The much-debated passage (8 12), "Though I write for him my law in ten thousand precepts" (RV or RVm "I wrote for him the ten thousand things of my law"), on any understanding of the words or with any reasonable emendation of the text (for which see the comm.), points to written law, and that of considerable compass, and seems hardly consistent with the supposition that in the prophet's time the whole of the written law was confined to a few chapters in Ex, the so-called "Book of the Covenant." And the very next verse (8 13), "As for the sacrifices of mine offerings, they sacrifice flesh and eat it; but Jeh accepteth them not," is at once an acknowledgment of the Divine institution of sacrifice, and an illustration of the kind of opposition the prophets entertained to sacrificial service as it was practiced. So when it is said, "I will also cause all her mirth to cease, her feasts, her new moons, and her sabbaths, and all her solemn assemblies" (2 11; cf 9 5), the reference, as the context shows, is to a deprivation of what were national distinctive privileges; and the allusions to transgressions and trespasses against the law (8 1; cf Dt 17 2) point in the same direction. We have a plain reference to the Feast of Tabernacles (12 9): "I will yet again make the tents of Israel to dwell in tents, as in the days of the solemn feast" (cf Lev 23 39-43); and there are phrases which are either in the express language of the law-books or evident allusions to them, as "They are as they that strive with God" (12 11); "As the children of Judah are like them that remove the landmark" (5 10; cf Dt 19 14); "Their sacrifices shall be unto them as the bread of mourners" (9 4; cf Dt 26 14); "[They] the priests] feed on the sin of my people." (8 4; cf Lev 6 9). In verse 4 the prophet combines the fundamental fact in the nation's history and the fundamental principle of the law: "I am Jeh thy God from the land of Egypt; and thou shalt know no god but me" (13 4; cf Ex 20 3). It is, however, with the Book of Dt more than with any other portion of the Pent that the Book of Hos shows affinity; and the resemblances here are so striking, that the critics who hold to the late date of Dt speak of the author of that book as "the spiritual heir of Hosea" (Driver, Comm. on Dt, Intro, xxvii), or of Hosea as "the great spiritual predecessor of the Deuteronomist." Chayye, Jeredel, "the sixth" or "seventh" prophet of Israel" (10 8) refers to the schism of the ten tribes, the prominence given to the Davidic kingship, which, along with the references to Judah, some critics reject on merely subjective grounds, is quite inexplicable (4 15). We do not expect to find in a prophetic writing the same frequency of reference to the law as to the history; for it is the essence of prophecy to appeal to history and to interpret it. Of course, the moral and social aspects of the law are as much the province of the prophet as of the priest; but the ceremonial part of the law, which was under the care of the priests, though it was designed to be the expression of the same ideas that lay at the foundation of prophecy, is mainly touched upon by the prophets when, as was too frequently the case, it ceased to express those ideas and became an offence. The much-debated passage (8 12), "Though I write for him my law in ten thousand precepts" (RV or RVm "I wrote for him the ten thousand things of my law"), on any understanding of the had experience of their apostasy under the very shadow of Sinai, and all his life long to bear with a stiff-necked and rebellious people. Then, again, if these “Deuteronemic” ideas are found so clearly expressed in Hosea, why should it be necessary to postulate a late Deuteronomist going back upon older books, and editing and supplementing them with Deuteronomic matter? If Moses sustained anything like the function which all tradition assigned to him, and, as all confess, he was the instrument of molding the tribes into one people, those addresses contained in the Book of Dt are precisely in the tone which would be adopted by a great leader in taking farewell of the people. And, if he did so, it is quite conceivable that his words would be treasured by the God-fearing men among his followers and successors, in that unbroken line of prophetic men to whose existence both Amos and Hosea appealed, and that they should be found coming to expression at the very dawn of written prophecy.

Hosea was the son of Beeri, the son of Joash, the son of Seilim, the son of Beeri, the son of Assir. He was one of the Twelve, called a prophet in the Expositor’s Bible, and the “prophet of the Twelve” in Eichhorn’s Commentary. The lapidary first of those who were the prophets of the Twelve, and the last, “Ephraim shall say, What have I to do anymore with idols?” (14:8), showing that, in the prophet’s estimation, the idolatrous worship of Jeh, as associated with the golden calves of Dan and Bethel, lay at the root of the nation’s evil.

Over this shrunk and weakened kingdom—corresponding generally with the Samaritan district of the NT—Hosea was placed position was 729, though he may have been appointed a few months earlier.

Tiglath-pileser III died in 727, so that three years’ tribute was probably paid to Nineveh. There was, however, a political party in Samaria, which, ground down by cruel exactions, was for making an alliance with Egypt, hoping that, in the jealousy and antipathies of the two world-powers, it might find some relief or even a measure of independence. Hosea himself a prophet of the north, allows us to see beneath the surface of court life in Samaria, “They call unto Egypt, they go to Assyria” (7:11), and again, “They make a covenant with Assyria, and oil is carried into Egypt” (12:1). This political duplicity from which it was the only way to save his people, probably took its origin during the time of Tiglath-pileser’s death.

Tigril-pileser III died in 727, that event Action either caused or promoted the treasonable action, and the large quantities of oil on the southward road was an object-lesson to be read of all men. On the accession of Shalmanese IV—who is the Shalmaneser of the Bible (2 K 17:3; 18:9)—Hosea would seem to have carried, or sent, the annual tribute for 726 to the treasury at Nineveh (2 K 17:3). The text is not clear as to who was the bearer of this tribute, but from the statement that Shalmaneser came up against him, and Hosea became his servant, it may be presumed that the tribute for the first year after Tiglath-pileser’s death was at first refused, then, when a military demonstration took place, was paid, and obedience promised. In such a case Hosea would have been required to attend at his suzerain’s court and do homage to the sovereign.

This is what probably took place, not without inquiry into the past. Grave suspicions were thus aroused as to the loyalty of Hoseas, and on these being confirmed by the discovery of two pieces of ancient writing which afterwards passed to “So king of Egypt,” and the further withholding of the tribute (2 K 17:4), Hosea was arrested and shut up in prison. Here he disappears from history. Such was the ignominious end of a king of kings, not one of whom had, in all the vicissitudes of two and a quarter centuries, been in harmony with the theocratic spirit, or realized that the true welfare and dignity of the state lay in the unalloyed worship of Jehovah. With Hoshea in his hands, Shalmaneser's troops marched, in the spring or summer of 725, to the completion of Assyria's work in Pal. 7. Battle of Beth-arbel 11th chs on the divinely sanctioned mission of "the Assyrian" and of the ultimate fate that should befall him for his pride and cruelty in carrying out his mission. The campaign was not a bloodless one. At Beth-arbel—at present unidentified—the hostile forces met, with the result that might have been expected. "Shalman spoiled Beth-arbel in the day of battle" (Hos 10:14). The defeated army took refuge behind the walls of Samaria, and the siege began. The city was well placed for purposes of defence, being built on the summit of a lonely hill, which was Omri's reason for moving the capital from Tirzah (1 K 16:24). It was probably during the continuance of the siege that Isaiah wrote his prophecy, "Woe to the crown of pride of the drunkards of Ephraim," etc (Isa 28), in which the hill of Samaria with its coronet of walls is compared to a diadem of flowers worn in a scene of revolting, which should fade and die. Micah's degray on the fall of Samaria (ch 1) has the same topographical note. "I will pour down the stones thereof into the valley, and I will uncover the foundations thereof" (ver 6).

Shalmaneser's reign was of exactly five years, December, 727 to December, 722, and the city fell in the 1st month of his successor's reign. The history of its fall is summarized in Sargon's great Khorsabad inscription in these words, "Samaria I besieged, I captured, 27,290 of her inhabitants I carried away. 50 chariots I collected from their midst. The rest of their property I caused to be taken." Hoshea's character is summed up in the qualified phrase, "He did evil in the sight of the Lord, yet not as the kings of Israel that were before." Hoshea's fall was taken symbolically in the history of the kingdom of Israel, mainly by the idolatry of Bethel the official sanction and prominence which each of his 18 predecessors had done. According to Hos 10:6 the golden calf of Samaria was to be taken to Assyria, to the shame of its erstwhile worshippers.

HOSPITALITY, hos-pi-ta'li-ti, HOST, host (φαλαβία, φιλαξία, "love of strangers," φίλος, φίλος, "guest," φίλος, φίλος, "friend; πανδοχεία, "inkeeper"): When the Nomads civilization of a people has advanced so far that some traveling has become necessary, but not yet so far that traveling by individuals is a usual thing, then hospitality is a virtue indispensable to the life of the people. This stage of culture was that represented in ancient Pal and the stage whose customs are still preserved among the present-day Arabs of the desert. Hospitality is regarded as a right by the traveler, to whom it never occurs to thank his host as if for a favor. And hospitality is granted as a duty by the host, who himself may very soon be dependent on some one else's hospitality. But none the less, both in OT times and today, the granting of that right is surrounded by an etiquette that has made hospitality so highly esteemed. The traveler is made the literal master of the house during his stay; his host will perform for him the most servile offices, and will not even sit in his presence without express request. To the use of the guest is given over all that his host possesses, stopping not even short of the honor of wife or daughter. "'Be we not all,' say the poor nomads, 'guests of Ullah? Has God given unto them, God's guest shall partake with them thereof; if they will not for God render his own, it should not be well with their bondman' (Arabia Deserta, 1, 228). The host is in duty bound to defend his guest against all comers and to lay aside any personal hatred—the murderer of a father is safe as the guest of the son.

An exquisite example of the etiquette of hospitality is found in Gen 18:1-8. The very fact that the three strangers have passed by Abraham's door gives him the privilege of entertaining them. When he sees them approaching he runs to beg the honor of their turning in to him, with oriental courtesy depreciates the feast that he is about to lay before them as a 'morsel of bread,' and stands by them while they eat. Manoah (Jgs 13:16) is equally pressing although more matter-of-fact, while Jehoro (Ex 2:20) sends out that 'the stranger may be brought in. And Job (31:32) repels the very thought that he could let the sojourner be unprovided for. The one case where a breach of hospitality receives praise is that of Jael (Jgs 4:5), perhaps to degenerate hospitality in the conflicts with the Canaanites or (perhaps more plausibly) to literary-critical considerations, according to which in Jgs 6 Sisera is not represented as entering Jael's tent or possibly not as actually tasting the food, a state of things which Jgs 4, written under later circumstances of city life. For contrasting opinions see "Jael" in EB and HDB.

It is well to understand that to secure the right to hospitality it is not necessary, even in modern times, for the guest to eat with his host, still less to eat salt specifically.

Table-Bond Indeed, guests arriving after sunset and departing the next morning not, as a rule, eat all in the tent of the host. It is sufficient to enter the tent, to grasp a tent-pin, or even, under certain circumstances, to invoke the name of a man as host. On the other hand, the bond of hospitality is certainly strengthened by eating with one's host给别人 a hospitality bond created by eating food belonging to him, even by stealth or in an act of theft. Here a quite different set of motives is at work. The idea here is that of kinship arising from participation in a common repast and in the modern Arab, the animal killed for his guest the dhabhlah or "sacrifice" (of HDB, II, 428). This concept finds its rather materialistic expression in the theory that after the processes of digestion are completed (a time estimated as two nights and the included day), the bond lapses if it is not renewed. There seem to be various references in the Bible to some such idea of a "table-bond" (Ps 41:9, e.g.), but hardly in connection directly with hospitality. For a discussion of them see Baas, "Oracle: Sacrifice to the People." In the city, naturally, the exercise of hospitality was more restricted. Where travel was great, doubtless commercial provision for the traveler was made from a very early day (cf Lk 10:34 and see LXX), and at all events free hospitality to all comers would have been unacceptably abused. Lot in Sodom (Gen 19) is the nomad who has preserved his old ideas, although settled in the city, and who thinks nothing of the "milk of human kindness" (ver 8) for his tents. The same is true of the old man of Gibeah of Jgs 19:16 ff. And the sin of Sodom and of Gibeah is not that wanderers cannot find hospitality so much as it is that they are unsafe in the streets at night. Both Lot and "the old man," however, are firm in their duty and willing to sacrifice their daughters for the safety of their guests. (Later ideas as to the position of woman should not be read back into these narratives.) However, when the city-dweller Rahab refuses to surrender the spies (Josh 2), her reason is that the breach of hospitality involved but her fear of Jah (ver 9). When Abraham's slave is in Nahor, and begs a night's lodging for himself and his camels, he accompanies the request with a substantial present, evidently conceived of as pay for the same (Gen 24 22 f). Such also are the modern conditions; of Benzinger-Socin in Baeckere's Palestine, xxxv, observe that "inmates" of private houses "are aware that Franks always pay, and therefore receive them gladly." None the less, in NT times, if not earlier, and even at present, a room was set apart in each village for the use of strangers, whose expenses were borne by the entire community. Most interpreters consider that the kateluma of Lk 2 7 was a room of this sort, but this opinion cannot be regarded as quite certain. But many of the wealthier city-dwellers still strive to attain a reputation for hospitality, a zeal that naturally was found in the ancient world as well.

6. Christ and Hospitality. Indeed, it is assumed that they may even make their own choice of hosts (Mt 10 7). In this case, however, the claims of the travelers to hospitality are accentuated by the fact that they are bearers of good tidings for the people, and it is in view of this latter fact that hospitality to them becomes so great a virtue—the "cup of cold water" becomes so highly meritorious because it is given "in the name of a disciple" (Mt 10 42; cf ver 41, and Mk 9 41). Rejection of hospitality to one of Christ's "least brethren" (almost certainly to be understood as disciples) is equivalent to the rejection of Christ Himself (Mt 25 42; cf ver 35). It is not quite clear whether in Mt 10 14 and Lk, simple refusal of hospitality is the sin in point or refusal to lodge or board.

In the Dispersion, the Jew who was traveling seemed always to be sure of finding entertainment from the Jews resident in whatever city he might happen to be passing through. The fact for the spread of early Christianity is inestimable. To be sure, some of the first missionaries may have been men who were able to bear their own traveling expenses or who were merchants that taught the new religion when on business tours. In the case of soldiers or slaves their opportunity to carry the gospel into new fields came often through the movements of the army or of their masters. And it was by an "infiltration" of this sort, probably, rather than by any specific missionary effort that the church of Rome, at least, was founded. See Romans, Epistle to the. But the ordinary missionary, whether apostle (in any sense of the word) or evangelist, would have been helpless if it had not been that he could count so confidently on the hospitality everywhere. From this fact comes one reason why St. Paul, for instance, could plan tours of such magnitude with such assurance: he knew that he would not have to face any problem of sustenance in a strange city (Rom 16 23).

As the first Christian churches were founded, the exercise of hospitality took on a new aspect, esp. after the breach with the Jews had begun. Not only did the traveling Christian look naturally to his brethren for hospitality, but the individual churches looked to the traveler for fostering the sense of the unity of the church throughout the world. Hospitality became a virtue indispensable to the well-being of the church—one reason for the emphasis laid thereon (Rom 12 13). As the organization of the churches became more perfected, the exercise of hospitality grew to be an official duty of the ministry and a reputation for hospitality was a prerequisite in some cases (1 Tim 3 2; 5 10; Tit 2 3). The exercise of such hospitality must have become burdensome at times (1 Pet 4 9), and as false teachers began to appear in the church a new set of problems was created in discriminating among applicants for hospitality. 2 and 3 Ju reflect some of the difficulties. For the later history of hospitality in the church interesting matter will be found in the Didache, chs xi, xii, Apologetic of Aristides, ch xv, and Lucian's Death of Peregrinus, ch xvi. The church certainly preferred to err by excess of the virtue.

An evaluation of the Bib. directions regarding hospitality for modern times is extremely difficult on account of the utterly changed conditions. Be it said at once, esp., that certain well-meant criticism of modern missions and methods, of organized finance, etc., on the basis of Christ's directions to the Twelve, is a woeful misapplication of Bib. teaching. The hospitality that an apostle could count on in his own day is something that the modern missionary cannot expect and something that it would be arrant folly for him to expect (Weinle, Die chrstliche und die heutige Mission, should be read by everyone desiring to compare modern missions with the apostolic). In general, the basis for hospitality has become merged in the larger field of charitable enterprise of various sorts. The modern problem nearest related to the old virtue is the question of providing for the necessities of the indigent traveler, a distinctly minor problem, although a very real one, in the general field of social problems that the modern church has to study. In so far as the NT exhortations are based on missionary motives there has been again a merging into general appeals for missions. The special virtue has become merged in the larger field of charitable enterprise of various sorts. The "hospitality" of today, by which is meant the entertainment of friends or relatives, hardly comes within the Bib. use of the term as denoting a special virtue.

HOSTAGE, hos'tāj. See WAR.

HOST OF HEAVEN (טומא נָאָּ֣ה, סבְּחאָה həsʃaŋayim): The expression is employed in the OT to denote (1) the stars, frequently as objects of idolatry (Dt 4 19; 17 3; Jer 2 16; 17 16; 23 4 f; Jer 8 2; 19 13; Zeph 1 5), but also as witnesses in their number, order and splendor, to the majesty and providential rule and care of Jah (Isa 34 4; 40 26, "calleth them all by name"; 48 12; Jer 33 22); and (2) the angels (1 K 22 19; 2 Ch 18 18; Neh 9 6; cf Ps 105 21).

1) Star-worship seems to have been an enticement to Israel from the first (Dt 4 19; 17 3; Am 5 26; cf Acts 7 42-43), but attained special prominence in the days of the later kings of Judah. The name of Manasseh is particularly connected with it. This king built altars for "all the host of heaven" in the courts of the temple (2 K 21 3.5). Josiah destroyed these altars, and cleansed the temple from the idolatry by putting down the priests and burning the vessels associated with it (2 K 23 4-5.7).

2) In the other meaning of the expression, the angels are regarded as forming Jeh's "host" or army, and He himself is the leader of them—"Jeh of hosts" (Isa 31:4, etc.)—though this designation has a much wider reference. See ANGELS; ASTROLOGY; LORD OF HOSTS; of Oehlers, Theol of OT, II, 270 ff (ET).

HOUR, our (יוֹם, sha'athâ'ah, יָמָּה, shar'â'; ὥρα, hòra); Hour as a division of the day does not occur in the OT; the term shar'â' (sha'athâ') found in Dn 3:15, 4:33 (Heb 30); 5:5. The Gr hòra is commonly used in the NT in the same way, as "that same hour," "from that hour," etc, but it also occurs as a division of the day as, "the third hour," "the ninth hour," etc. The Hebrews would seem to have become acquainted with this division of time through the Babylonians, but whether before the captivity we are not certain. The mention of the sun dial of Ahaz would seem to indicate some reckoning of time during the monarchy. See TIME.

HOURS OF PRAYER: The Mosaic law did not regulate the offering of prayer, but fully recognized its spontaneous character. In what manner or how far back in Jewish history the sacrificial prayer, mentioned in Lk 1:10, originated no one knows. In the days of Christ it had evidently become an institution. But ages before that, stated hours of prayer were known and religiously observed by all devout Jews. It evidently belonged to the evolutionary process of Jewish worship, in connection with the temple-ritual. Devout Jews, living at Jerusalem, went to the temple to pray (Lk 18:10; Acts 3:1). The pious Jews of the Diaspora opened their windows "toward Jerusalem" and prayed "toward" the place of God's presence (1 K 8:48; Dn 6:10; Ps 5:7). The regular hours of prayer, as we may infer from Ps 55:17 and Dn 6:10, were three in number. The first coincided with the morning sacrifice, at the 3d hour, or around 9 AM therefore (Acts 2:15). The second was at the 6th hour, or at noon, and may have coincided with the thanksgiving for the chief meal of the day, a religious custom apparently universally observed (Mt 15:36; Acts 27:35). The 3d hour of prayer coincided with the evening sacrifice, at the ninth hour (Acts 3:1; 10:30). Thus every day, as belonging to God, was religiously subdivided, and regular seasons of prayer were assigned to the devout believer. Its influence on the development of the religious spirit must have been incalculable, and it undoubtedly is, at least in part, the solution of the riddle of the preservation of the Jewish faith in the cruel centuries of its bitter persecution. Mohammedianism borrowed this feature of worship from the Jews and early Christians, and made it one of the chief pillars of its faith.

LITERATURE

I. Cave-Dwelling.—The earliest permanent habitations of the prehistoric inhabitants of Pal were the natural caves which abounded throughout the country. As the people increased and gathered into communities, these abodes were supplemented by systems of artificial caves which, in some cases, developed into extensive burrowings of many adjoining compartments, having in each system several entrances. These entrances were usually cut through the rock down a few steps, or simply dropped to the floor from the rock surface. The sinking was shallow and the headroom low but sufficient for the undersized troglodytes who were the occupiers. Fig. 1 is the plan of an elaborate system of cave dwellings from Gezer, all adjoining and approached by 9 separate entrances (PEFS, October, 1905).

II. Stone- and Mud-Brick-built Houses.—There are many references to the use of caves as dwellings in the OT. Lot dwelt with his two daughters in a cave (Gen 19:30). Elijah, fleeing from Jezebel, lodged in a cave (1 K 19:9). The natural successor to the cave was the stone-built hut, and just as the loose field-bowlers and the stones, quarried from the caves, served their first and most vital uses in the building of defence walls, so did they later become material for the first hut. Caves, during the rainy season, were faulty dwellings, as at the time when protection was most needed, they were left shut through the surface openings which formed their entrances. The rudest cell built of rough stones in mud and covered with a roof of brushwood and mud was at first sufficient. More elaborate plans of several apartments, entering from what may be called a living-room, followed as a matter of course, and these, huddled together, constituted the homes of the people. Mud-brick buildings (Job 4:19) of similar plan occur, and to protect this friable material from the weather, the walls were sometimes covered with a casing of stone slabs, as at Lachish. (See Blass, A Mound of Many Cities.) Generally speaking, this rude type of building prevailed, although, in some of the larger buildings, square dressed and jointed stones were used. There is little or no sign of improvement until the period of the Hellenistic influence, and even then the improvement was slight, so far as the homes of the common people were concerned. Figs. 2 and 3 are the isometric sketch and plan showing construction of a typical small house from Gezer. The house is protected and ed way. The doors enter into a living-room from which the two very small and primitive private rooms, bedcham-bers, are reached. Builders varied the plan to suit requirements, but in the main, this plan may be taken as typical. When members of a family married, extra accommodation was required. Additions were made as well as could be arranged on the cramped site, and in consequence, plans often became such a meaningless jumble that it is impossible to identify the respective limits of adjoining houses. The forecourt was absorbed and crushed out of existence, so that in many of the plans recovered the arrangement shown in Figs. 2 and 3 is lost. Fig. 4 shows the elevation of the house from the court.

(1) Corner-stone (ἐγγραφή, pinnāh, Isa 28 16; Jer 61 26; λίθος ἀκρογωνίας, lithos akrogonias, 1 Pet 2 6).—In the construction of rude bowlder walls, more esp. on a sloping site, as can be seen today in the highlands of Scotland and Wales, a large projecting bowlder was built into the lower angle-course.

(2) Floor (πάτωμα, kurba).—When houses were built on the rock outcrop, the floor was roughly leveled on the rock surface, but it is more common to find floors of beaten clay similar to the native floor of the present day. Stone slabs were sparingly used, and only appear in the houses of the great.

It is unlikely that wood was much used as a flooring to houses, although Solomon used it for his temple floor (1 K 6 15).

(3) Gutter (מָעוֹן, cinnōr).—The “gutter” in 2 S 5 8 AV is obviously difficult to associate with the gutter of a house, except in so far as it may have a similar meaning to the water duct or “water course” (RV) leading to the private cistern, which formed part of the plan. Remains of open channels for this purpose have been found of rough stones set in clay, sometimes leading through a silt pit into the cistern.

(4) Door (מִזְבָּב, dolath, מָעון, pathāh; טָנָה, thirā).—Doorways were simple, square, entering openings in the wall with a stone or wood lintel (masākhōph, Ex 12 22 23; ‘ayl, 1 K 6 31) and a stone threshold raised slightly above the floor. It is easy to imagine the earliest wooden door as a simple movable boarded cover with back bars, fixed vertically by a movable bar slipped into sockets in the stone jamb. Doorposts (saph, Ezek 41 16) appear to have been in use, but, until locks were introduced, it is difficult to imagine a reason for them. Posts, when introduced, were probably let into the stone

It tied together the return angles and was one of the few bond-stones used in the building. This most necessary support claimed chief importance and as such assumed a figurative meaning frequently used (Isa 28 16; 1 Pet 2 6; see Corner-stone). The importance given to the laying of a sure foundation is further emphasized by the dedication rites in common practice, evidence of which has been found on various sites in Pal (see Excavations of Gezer). The discovery of human remains placed diagonally below the foundations of the returning angle of the house gives proof of the exercise of dedication rites both before and after the conquest. Hiel sacrificed his firstborn to the foundations of Jericho and his youngest son to the gates thereof (1 K 16 34). But this was in a great cause compared with a similar sacrifice to a private dwelling. The latter manifests a respect scarcely borne out by the miserable nature of the houses so dedicated. At the same time, it gives proof of the frequent collapse of structures which the winter rains made inevitable and at which superstition trembled. The fear of pending disaster to the man who failed to make his sacrifice is recorded in Dt 20 5: “What man is there that hath built a new house, and hath not dedicated it? let him go and return to his house, lest he die in the battle.” See illustration, p. 500.

at top and bottom, and, unlike our present door frame, had no head-piece. When no wood was used, the stone jambs of the opening constituted the doorposts. To the present day the post retains its function as commanded in Dt 6:9; 11:20, and in it is fitted a small case containing a parchment on which is written the exhortation to obedience.

6. Hinge (חרב, 1 K 7:50; ציר, Prov 26:14).—Specimens of sill and head sockets of stone have been discovered which suggest the use of the pivot hinge, the elongated swinging stile of the door being let into the sockets at top and bottom. A more advanced form of construction was necessary to this type of door than in the previous instance, and some little skill was required to brace it so that it would hold together. The construction of doors and windows is an interesting question, as it is in these two details that the joinery craft first claimed development. There is no indication, however, of anything of the nature of advancement, and it seems probable that there was none.

6. Lock and key ("lock," man‘ul, Neh 3:3, Hb; Cant 6:8; "key," ma‘âth, Jgs 3:25; fig. Isa 22:22; כְּלֶשׁ, כְּלֶת, Mt 16:19, etc.).—In later Hellenic times a sort of primitive lock and key appeared, similar to the Arab type. See Excavations of Gezer, 1, 197, and illustration in art. Key.

7. Threshold (ףד, saph, 1 K 14:17; Ezek 40:6f; מַפִּילָן, miphlan, 1 S 5:45; Ezek 9:3, etc.).—Next to the corner-stone, the threshold was specially sacred, and in many instances foundation-sacrifices have been found buried under the threshold. In later times, when the Hebrews became weaned of this unholy practice, the rite remained with the substitution of a lamp inclosed between two bowls as a symbol of the life. See Gezer.

8. Hearth (קיר, 1b, Jer 36:22,23, RV “braizer”; קִיר, kiyvr).—The references in the OT and the frequent discovery of hearths make it clear that so much provision for heating had been made. It is unlikely, however, that chimneys were provided. The smoke from the wood or charcoal fuel was allowed to find its way through the door and windows and the many interstices occurring in workmanship of the worst possible description. The “chimney” referred to (Hos 13:3) is a doubtful tr. The “fire in the braizer” (Jer 36:22 RV) which burned before the king of Judah in his “winter house” was probably of charcoal. The modern natives, during the cold season, huddle around and warm their hands at a tiny glow in much the same way as their ancient predecessors. The use of cow and camel dung for baking-oven (larnur) fires appears to have continued from the earliest time to the present day (Ezk 4:15). See also Hearth.

9. Window (חָלָה, thuris, Acts 20:9; 2 Cor 11:33).—It would appear that windows were often simple openings in the wall which were furnished with some method of closing, such as is suggested. in Fig. 5, which, it may be conjectured, was somewhat the same as the primitive door previously mentioned. The window of the ark (hallôn, Gen 8 6), the references in Gen 26 8; Josh 2 15, and the window from which Jezebel looked (2 K 9 30), were presumably of the casement class. Ahaziah fell through a lattice (ebrakkāh) in the same palace, and the same word is used for the “networks” (1 K 7 41) “covering the bowls of the capitals,” and in Cant. 2 9, “through the lattice” (hārakkīm). It would appear, therefore, that some variety of treatment existed, and that the simple window opening with casement and the opening filled in with a lattice or grill were distinct. Windows were small, and, according to the Mish, were kept not less than 6 ft. from floor to sill. The lattice was open, without glass filling, and in this connection there is the interesting figurative reference in Isa 54 12 AV, “windows of agates,” trd in RV “windows of rubies.” Heaven is spoken of as having “windows” (drubbāh) for rain (Gen 7 11; 8 2; 2 K 7 2, etc).

(10) Roofs (gāgh; śtyyn; šileq)—These were flat, and their construction is illustrated in Figs. 2 and 6. Cf. “The beams of our house are cedars, and our rafters are fire” (Cant. 1 17). To get over the difficulty of the larger spans, a common practice was to introduce a main beam (kūrah) carried on the walls and strengthened by one or more intermediate posts let into stone sockets laid on the floor. Smaller timbers as joists (“rafters,” rāḥāt) were spaced out and covered in turn with brushwood; the final covering, being of mud mixed with chopped straw, was beaten and rolled. A tiny stone roller is used here, as modern natively roof, and is used to roll the mud into greater solidity every year on the advent of the first rains. Similar rollers have been found among the ancient remains throughout the country; see Excavations of Gezer, I, 100;
P.E.P.S., Warren’s letters, 46. “They let him down through the tiles [κιπάςos, kàrâmos] with his cloak into the midst before Jesus” (Lk 5 19) refers to the breaking through of a roof similar to this. The roof (“housetop,” gāgh; śāma, ḏōma) was an important part of every house and was subjected to many uses. It was used for worship (2 K 23 12; Jer 19 13; 32 29; Zeph 1 5; Acts 10 9). Absalom spread his tent on the “top of the house” (2 S 16 22). In the Feast of the Tabernacles temporary booths (gukōh) were erected on the house tops. The people, as is their habit today, gathered together on the roof as a common meeting-place on high days and holidays (Jgs 16 27). The existed, and the lack of the remains of stone steps suggests that they were wood steps, probably in the form of ladders.

(2) Palaces and castles (עֶרֶם, בֵּית, הָעֵקֶד; see also הַעֲרָב).—These were the public centers of the city and occupied the part of every city and were more elaborately in plan, raised in all probability to some considerable height.

The Canaanite palace discovered by Macalister at Gezer shows a building of enormously thick walls and small rooms. Restored is the so-called Solomon’s palace at Samaria, revealing a plan of considerable area.

Solomon’s palace is detailed in 1 K 7 (see Temple).

In this class may also be included the megalithic fortresses with the beeve guard towers of an earlier date, described by Dr. Mackenzie (PEF, 1).

Walls were plastered (Lev 14:48), and small fragments of painted (Jer 22:14) plaster discovered from time to time show that some attempt at mural decoration was made, usually in the form of crudely painted line ornament. Walls were recessed here and there into various forms of cupboards (q.v.) at various levels. The smaller cuttings in the wall were probably for lamps, and in the larger and deeper recesses beds may have been kept and cuttings stored. (See also Architecture II, 2.)

III. Other Meanings.—The word has often the sense of "household," and this term is frequently substituted in RV for "house" of AV (e.g. Ex 12:3; 2 K 7:11; 10:5; 16:5; Isa 36:3; 1 Cor 1:11; 1 Tim 5:14); in certain cases for phrases with "house" RV has "at home" (Acts 2:46; 5:42). HOUSE OF GOD: In Gen 28:17-22 is Bethel (q.v.). In Jgs 1 and 2 Ch, Ezr, Neh, Ps, etc. (hāh hā-ḥōlām), a designation of the sanctuary = "house of Jeh" (of the tabernacle, Jgs 18:31; 20:18; AV of the temple, 1 Ch 19:11; 24:2; AV 5:2; Ch 2:14; Ps 42:4; Isa 2:3, etc.) of the 23 temple, Ezr 5:8-10, 19:12; 6:16; Neh 1:11; 11:1; Ch 7:51); spiritual, the NT, the "house of God" (ὁικία Θεοῦ) is the church or community of believers (1 Tim 3:15; Heb 10:21; 1 Pet 4:17; cf 1 Cor 3:9-16; 17:1; 1 Pet 2:5).

HOUSEHOLD, house-hold: Three words are usually found in the Bible where the family is indicated. These three are the Heb word bāyith and the Gr words oikia and oikos. The unit of the national life, from the very beginning, was found in the family. In the old patriarchal days each family was complete within itself, the oldest living sire being the unquestioned head of the whole, possessed of almost arbitrary powers. The house and the household are practically synonymous. God had called Abraham "that he might command his children and household after him" (Gen 18:19). The Passover-lamb was to be eaten by the "household" (Ex 12:3). The "households" of the rebels in the eighth-century Israelian kings (Nu 16:31-33; Dt 11:6). David’s household shares his humiliation (2 S 15:16); the children everywhere in the OT are the bearers of the sins of the fathers. Human life is not a conglomerate of individuals; the family is its center and unit, not different in the NT. The curse and the blessing of the apostles are to abide on a house, according to its attitude (Mt 10:13). A divided house falls ( Mk 3:25). The household believes with the head thereof (Jn 4:53; Acts 16:15-16). Thus the households became the nuclei for the early life of the church (Acts 2:42; 4:32). Of Pisac and Aqula at Rome (Rom 16:5), of Stephanas (1 Cor 16:15), of Onesiphorus (2 Tim 1:16), etc. No wonder that the early church made such an abundance of the family life.

And in the midst of all our modern, rampant individualism, the household is the throbbing heart of the church as well as of the nation.

HOUSEHOLDER, house-hold-der (οἰκοδομήτης, oikodespótēs): The word occurs in Mt 13:27,52; 20:1; 21:33, for the master or owner of a "household," i.e. of servants (doulos). The Gr word emphasizes the authority of the master.

HOUSETOP, house-top. See House.

HOW: Represents various Heb and Gr words, interrogative, interjectional and relative. Different uses refer to: (1) the unlimited, e.g. Gen 44:34, "How shall I go up to my father?" (חָא): Mt 6:28, "how they grow" (πάσα); 1 Cor 10:35, "how are the dead raised?" (2) degree, extent, frequency, "how grias" (Διώκειν, 2 Th 3:13, "how great"); "how much" (οὐκ εἰμὶ, Mt 27:13, "how much"); "how many" (Acts 9:13, hosos); "how much more" (Mt 7:11, πολλοὶ; 1 S 14:30, "aph kî"); "how oft" (Ps 78:40, kammah; Mt 18:21, poioth); "how long" (Job 7:19, kammān, Mt 17:16, ἠγέτου); the reason, wherefore, etc (Mt 18:12, ἱκά 2:49, τί; 4) means—by what means? (Jn 4:3, Vp); (5) cause (Jn 12:34; Acts 2:8; 21:21, πόδῃς); (6) condition, in state, etc (Lk 23:55, ἀπὸ; Acts 15:36, ἐπὶ ἑαυτῷ, τί); "how" is sometimes used to emphasize a statement or explanation (2 S 19:25, "How are the mighty fallen!"); "how" is also used for "that" (Gen 30:20, "eth ἀσθείρ, frequently "how that"), Ex 9:29, "率达到, etc mostly in the NT, ὅταν, Mt 12:3; 15:12; 20:21; Acts 7:25; Rom 7:1, etc., in AV).

RV has "wherefore" for "how" (Gen 38:29, m "how"); has "what" (Jgs 13:12; 1 K 16:6; Job 22:13; 1 Cor 14:20, omits 1 Cor 13:5); has "how" that (1 S 2:4; Gr kai thou).— (1) Rs: Jas 2:24; Rev 2:2; has "that even" for "how that" (He 12:17).—"What is this?" (Lk 19:2): omits "How is it?" (Mt 2:16, different text); "Do ye not yet, for how is it that? (Mk 8:21): have ye not yet (Ps 4:7, μόνον, Gr kai thou) for "how much" (Lk 19:15, different text); omits "how much" (Lk 7:22); "Then how" (Jas 2:24), has "cannot" for "How can he" (1 Jn 4:20); omits "How hast thou" (Jas 2:6, "how is" (Jn 31:41); has "how for the fashion which" (Gen 6:15, for "and" (Ex 18:1), for "what" (Jgs 18:24; 1 S 4:16; 1 Cor 7:16), for "why" (Job 18:28; 31:1; Jer 22:3; Gal 3:14) for "whom" (Jas 2:17), for "for" (Ps 42:4), for "God" (Prov 21:1) for "whereunto" (Mt 14:5); for "by what means" (Lk 5:36; Jn 9:21), for "how greatly" (Phil 1:8), "how that" for "because" (Ex 9:9; 1 Thes 1:3), for "how and how know you to" for "can" (Mt 16:8), "how for by whom" (Am 7:2-5).

"How" in compounds gives us Howbeit (how be it), it is the tr. of ἡδομ, "but," "truly," "yet" (Jgs 18:29); of ἀκάκ, "certainly," etc (Pr 3:8); of ἀφήνες, "moreover," etc (2 S 12:14); of κενά, "so," "thus" (2 Ch 32:31); of ὅμως, "only," "surely," "nevertheless" (1 K 11:13; of ἀλλὰ, "but," etc (Jn 7:27; Acts 485; 1 Cor 8:7), etc.; of ὧδε, "but," etc (Jn 6:23); of mentoi (Jn 7:13 AV); many other instances.

For "howbeit," RV has frequently "but" (2 K 19:13, etc.); "and" (2 Ch 21:20; Mt 5:15), "surely" (ERV) (Joh 30:24), "now" (Jn 11:18), "yet" (2 Cor 11:21), "nay, did" (He 3:16); omits (Mt 17:21, different

HUMILATION, hūmil-i-tā'ahun, OF CHRIST (Acts 8 33; Phil 2 8). See KENOSIS; PERSON OF CHRIST.

HUMILITY, hūmil-i-tā (Ὑμητία, ἀνήσθαι; ταπεινοφροσύνη): (1) The noun occurs in the OT only in Prov 15 33; 18 12; 22 4; but the adj. "humble" appears frequently as the tr of 'āšî, 'āḏâw, 'āḏâh, in Prov 1 9; 9 8; 15 15 (cf. Neh 9 4); "afflicted"; the vb. as the tr of 'āḏâh, "to afflict," "to humble," and of kāḏâw, "to be or become humbled": e.g. (Pro 6 12; Mic 6 8). RV "humble" (Ps 14 7; 12 10) has RV "poor"; Ps 10 17; 34 20; 60 35; 66 5. (2) The adj. "humbleless" (Isa 11; 10 35) "brought low": for "He humblyth himself" (Jer 6 9). "It brought low. m. humbled himself": Ps 10 10. "Boweth down" (tapeinophrosūnēs) is τρείρε, "humbleness" (Col 2 18; 23; 1 Pet 5 6); (3) "humble" (Acts 8 33); for "man of humble body" (Phil 2 21) RV gives "body of our humiliation.

Humility is an essential characteristic of true piety, or of the man who is right with God. Humble men humed in order to bring them to Himself (Mt 8 23, etc.), and it is when men humble themselves before Him that they are accepted (1 K 21 29; 2 Ch 7 14, etc.).

The prayer of Manasseh, mentioned in 13 12 f. 18 f and included in this history, suggests the apocryphal book, "The Prayer of Manasseh," written, probably, in the 1st cent. BC. See Apoc.

HUCKSTER, huk'ster: A retailer of small wares, provisions, or the like; a peddler. "A huckster shall not be acquitted of sin" (Sir 26 29). Neither a merchant nor a huckster is without sin.

HUKKOK, huk'ok (חִוק, חַוק): A town on the border of Naphtali named with Aznoth-tabor (Josh 19 34). It is usually identified with the modern site of the W. of Wady el-'Ammi, to the W. of the N.G. of Sarepta, about 4 miles from the sea. This would fall on the boundary of Zebulun and Naphtali, between Tabor and Hanathoh (Josh 19 14). The identification may be correct; but it seems too far from Tabor.

HUKOK, huk'ok. See HELLKATH.

HUL, hul (וּל, הול): The name of one of the "sons of Aram" in the list of nations descended from Noah, but a people of uncertain identity and location (Gen 10 23; 1 Ch 1 17).

HULDAH, hul'dah ( חוֹלָד, חוֹלָד, "weepful"; Ὅλδα, Ὅλδα): A prophetess who lived in Jerus during the reign of Josiah. She was the wife of Shallum, keeper of the wardrobe, and resided in the "Mishnah" or second part or quarter of Jerus (location unknown). Cheyne says it should read, "She was sitting in the upper part of the gate of the Old City," i.e. in a public central place ready to receive any who wished to inquire of Jeh. He gives no reason for such a change of text. The standing and reputation of Huldah in the city are attested by the fact that she was consulted when the Book of the Law was discovered. The king, high priest, counsellors, etc., appealed to her rather than to Jeremiah, and her word was accepted by all as the word of Jeh (2 K 22 14-20; 2 Ch 34 22-20).

HUMILITAS, hūmil-ī-ā'un, OF CHRIST (Acts 8 33; Phil 2 8). See KENOSIS; PERSON OF CHRIST.

HUMILITY, hūmil-ī-ā (Ὑμητία, ἀνήσθαι; ταπεινοφροσύνη): (1) The noun occurs in the OT only in Prov 15 33; 18 12; 22 4, but the adj. "humble" appears frequently as the tr of 'āšî, 'āḏâw, 'āḏâh, in Prov 1 9; 9 8; 15 15 (cf. Neh 9 4); "afflicted"; the vb. as the tr of 'āḏâh, "to afflict," "to humble," and of kāḏâw, "to be or become humbled": e.g. (Pro 6 12; Mic 6 8). RV "humble" (Ps 14 7; 12 10) has RV "poor"; Ps 10 17; 34 20; 60 35; 66 5. (2) The adj. "humbleless" (Isa 11; 10 35) "brought low": for "He humblyth himself" (Jer 6 9). "It brought low. m. humbled himself": Ps 10 10. "Boweth down" (tapeinophrosūnēs) is τρείρε, "humbleness" (Col 2 18; 23; 1 Pet 5 6); (3) "humble" (Acts 8 33); for "man of humble body" (Phil 2 21) RV gives "body of our humiliation.

Humility is an essential characteristic of true piety, or of the man who is right with God. Humble men humed in order to bring them to Himself (Mt 8 23, etc.), and it is when men humble themselves before Him that they are accepted (1 K 21 29; 2 Ch 7 14, etc.). To "walk humbly with thy God" completes the Divine requirements (Mic 6 8). In Ps 18 35 (2 S 22 30) the quality is ascribed to God Himself, "Thy gentleness for conscience sake" is great. Of "him that hath his seat on high" it is said, "[He] humblyth [shālpēl] himself to behold the things that are in heaven and in the earth" (Ps 113 6). It is in the humble heart that "the high and lofty One" (Isa 57 15; of 66 2). (b) The word tapeinophrosūnēs is not found in classical Gr (Lightfoot); in the NT (with the exception of 1 Pet 5 6) it is Pauline. In so far as Christian writers tapeinos is, with a few exceptions in Plato and Platonic writers, used in a bad or inferior sense—as denoting something evil or unworthy. The prominence it gained in Christian thought indicates the new concept of humility in relation to God, to himself, and to his fellow men, which is due to Christianity. It by no means implies slavishness or servility; nor is it inconsistent with a right estimate of oneself, one's gifts and calling of God, or with proper self-assertion when called for. But the habitual frame of mind or child of God is that of one who feels not only that he owes all his natural gifts, etc, to God, but that he has been the object of undeserved redeeming love, and who regards himself as being not his own, but God's in Christ. He cannot exalt himself, for he knows that he has nothing of himself. The humble mind is thus at the root of all other graces and virtues. Self-exaltation spoils everything. There can be no real love without humility. "Love," said Paul, "vaunteth not itself, is not puffed up" (1 Cor 13 4). As Augustine said, humility is first, second and third in Christianity.

(c) Jesus not only strongly impressed His disciples with the need of humility, but was in Himself its supreme example. He knew Himself as "meek and lowly [tapeinos] in heart" (Mt 11 29). The first of the Beatitudes was to "be poor in spirit" (Mt 5 3), and it was "the meek who should inherit the earth." Humility is the way to true greatness: he who is "humble himself as this little child" should be "the greatest in the kingdom of heaven": "Whosoever shall exalt himself shall be humbled; and whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted" (Mt 18 4; 23 12; Lk

To the humble mind truth is revealed (Mt 11:25; Lk 10:21). Jesus set a touching example of humility in His washing His disciples' feet (Jn 13:1-17).

(d) St. Paul, therefore, makes an earnest appeal to Christians (Phil 2:1-11) that they should cherish and manifest the Spirit of their Lord's humility—"in nothing thinketh any of himself above that which he ought to think: but rather thinketh of himself according to the excellency wherewith God hath endowed him," and addsuce the supreme example of the self-emptying (kénòsis) of Christ: "Have this mind in you, which was also in Christ Jesus, etc." The rendering of ἐγκάτιστος ἐγκατέστησαν (Phil 2:7 AV) by "the humbled himself" has given rise to the designation of the Incarnation as the "Humiliation of Christ."

(c) There is a false humility which Paul warns against, a self-sought, "voluntary humility" (Col 2:18). This is a physiological sensation associated with emptiness of the stomach, and dependent on some state of the mucous membrane; (2) starvation as the effect of want of food, as Ex 16:18; Isa 49:10; (3) to feed the craving for food as Dt 8:3; when under the impression of general scarcity of food as Jer 38:9; Ezk 34:29 it is replaced in RV by "famine." The word is used to express the poverty which follows idleness and sloth (Prov 19:15). The absence of this condition is given as one of the characteristics of the holy of holies (Ezek 40:11-17; 41:1, 3).

HUNGA, húr-gár (םְגַה), rá'ábbak; λυπος, λύμος (sucks.), πνεῦμον, πνεύμα (vb.) (1) the desire for food, hunger (Ps 14:5, 18); (2) a physical sensation, associated with emptiness of the stomach, and dependent on some state of the mucous membrane; (3) starvation as the effect of want of food, as Ex 16:18; Isa 49:10; (3) to feed the craving for food as Dt 8:3; when under the impression of general scarcity of food as Jer 38:9; Ezk 34:29 it is replaced in RV by "famine." The word is used to express the poverty which follows idleness and sloth (Prov 19:15). The absence of this condition is given as one of the characteristics of the holy of holies (Ezek 40:11-17; 41:1, 3).

HUNTAH, húm’tá (םְגַה, humath): An unidentified place mentioned between Apekah and Hebron in the mountain of Judah (Josh 15:54).

HUNDRED, hun’dred (םְגַה, me’ah; ἑκατόν, hecaton). See NUMBER.

HUNTING, hun’ting (כְּנַק, qayyāḏ): The hunting of wild animals for sport, or for the defence of men and flocks, or for food, was common in Western Asia and Egypt, esp. in early times. Some of the Egyptian and Assyrian kings were great hunters in the first sense, for example Amenhotep III (1411-1375 BC), "a lion-hunting and bull-baiting Pharaoh," who boasted of having slain 76 bulls in the course of one expedition, and of having killed in one day or other 102 lions; and the Assyrian conqueror, Tiglath-pileser I (c 1100 BC), who claimed 4 wild bulls, 14 elephants and 920 lions as the trophies of his skill and courage.

The Bib. prototype of these heroes of war and the chase is Nimrod (see 1. Nimrod and His Like or mythico-historical character in the Assyro-Babylonian monuments; but possibly the Gilgamesh of the great epic, who may be the hero represented on seals and reliefs as victorious over the lion (Skinner, "Gen," ICC, 208). We are reminded also of Samson's exploit at Timnah (Jgs 14:5-6), but this, like David's encounter with the lion and the bear (1 S 37:34 f) and Benaiah's struggle with a lion in a pit on a snowy day (2 S 23:20), was an occasional incident and scarcely comes under the category of hunting. There is no evidence that hunting was pursued by the kings of Judah and Israel. Not until the time of Herod the Great, who had a hunting establishment and was a great hunter of boars, stags, and wild asses (Jos, BJ, I, xx, 18), mastering as many as 40 beasts in one day, do we find a ruler of Pal indulging in this pastime.

Hunting, for the other two purposes mentioned above was probably as frequent among the Israelites, even after they had ceased to be nomads, as among their neighbors. We know indeed of only two personal examples, both in the patriarchal period and both outside the direct line of Israelite kings: Isaac (Gen 27:27 f) and Ishmael (Gen 21:20); but there are several references and many figurative allusions to the pursuit and its methods and instruments. Hunting (inclus. of bowing) is mentioned in the Pent in the regulation about personal service of the levites and covering it with dust (Lev 17:13); and there is a typical allusion in the proverb (Prov 12:27): "The slothful man restriseth not that which he took in hunting." The hunting of the lion is assumed in Ezekiel's allegory of the lion that is to devour the shepherds (Ezk 21:9-19; cf Job 10:16; of the antelope or the gazelle (Ezk 14:5; Isa 51:20); of the roe (Prov 6:5); of the partridge in the mountains (1 S 26:20), and of birds in general in many passages. Hunting is probably implied in the statement about the provision of harts, gazelles and roebucks for Solomon's kitchen (I K 4:23), and to some extent in the reference to the den of lions in Babylon (Dn 6:7 ff).

The weapons most frequently employed by hunters seem to have been bows and arrows. Isaac (Gen 27:3) commands Esau to take 3. Methods his bow and quiver and procure him of Hunters venison or game (cf also Isa 7:24; Job 41:28). This method is amply illustrated by the monuments. Ashur-nasir-pal III (885-860 BC) and Darius (c 500 BC), for example, are depicted shooting at lions from the chariot. Use was also made of the sword, the spear, the dart or javelin, the club and the cub (Job 41:26), the application of these weapons to hunting is implied. The larger animals were wounded in a pit. The classical reference is in Ezekiel's allegory, "He was taken in their pit" (shahoth, Ezk 19:48; c Also Is 34:17; Jer 48:45; Ps 35:7, etc.). The details of this mode of capture as practised at the present day, and probably in ancient times, are described by Tristram in his Natural History of the Bible (118 f.). A more elaborate method is described by Maspero in Lectures historiques (285).

To make the pit-capture more effective, nets were also employed: "They spread their net over him" (Ezk 19:8; cf Ps 35:7). When caught, the lion was sometimes placed in a large wooden cage (Ezk 19:9, sughar, the Assyry shigaru; for the word and the thing of SBOT, "Ezk," Eng., 132; Heb, 71). The lion (or any other large animal) was led about by a ring or hook (hah) inserted in the jaws or nose (2 K 19:28=Isa 37:20; Ezk 19:4; 39:4; 38:4). From wild animals the brutal Assyrians transferred the custom to their human captives, as the Israelites were well aware (2 Ch 33:11 RVm, Heb hoph; for monumental illustrations cf SBOT, "Ezk," Eng., 132 f.). Nets were also used for other animals such as the oryx or antelope (Isa 51:20).

The hunting of birds or fowling is so often referred to that it must have been very widely practised (cf Ps 91:3; 124:7; Prov 17:6; 6:5; Ecc 8:12; Am 3:5, etc). The only bird specifically mentioned is the partridge said to be hunted on the mountains (1 S 16:20). The method of hunting is supposed by Tristram (NHB, 225) to be that still prevalent—continual pursuit until the creature is struck down by sticks thrown along the ground—but the interpretation is uncertain. Birds were generally caught by snares or traps. Two passages are peculiarly instructive on this point: Job 18:8–10, where six words are used for such contrivances, represented respectively by "net," "toils," "gin," "snare," "noose," "trap"; and Am 3:5, which is important enough to be cited in full: "Can a bird fall in a snare upon the earth, where no snare is set for him? shall a snare spring up from the ground, and have taken nothing at all?"

The word for "snare" (moketh) probably describes a net laid on the ground, perhaps a circular net like the Egypt bird-trap, represented in the Canaanite R). "Assyry shigaru," shows the method, "usually tsi in RV "snare" (moketh, lit. "fowling instrument") is supposed to refer either to the bait (th, 188) or to the catch connected with it which causes the net to collapse (Siegfried). For a full account of Egypt modes of fowling which probably illustrate animal hunting (chiefly of Wilkinson, Popular Account, 11, 178–83. The two words (moketh and sughar) mentioned above are used figuratively in many OT passages, the former repeatedly of the deadly influence of Canaanite idolatry on Israel, as in Ex 33:23. For if thou serve their gods, it will surely be a snare unto thee" (cf Ex 34:12; Dt 7:16; Josh 23:15). The use of the hawk in trapping, which was tested for Northern Syria by a bas-relief found in 1908 at Salke-Genizi, is not mentioned in the OT, but there may perhaps be an allusion in Am 3:8, "the birds that had their pastime with the fowls of the air". A reference to the use of decoys is found in Is 37:27, "a cage . . . full of birds," but that is a doubtful interpretation, and in the Gr of Sir 11:30, "As a decoy partridge in a cage, so is the heathen who believes, but the Heb text of the latter is less explicit. See FOWLER.

The NT has a few figurative allusions to hunting. The words for "catch" in Mk 12:13 and Lk 11:54 (agreō and theōreō) mean lit. "hunt." 5. Allusions. The vb. "ensnar[e]d" (papigeō) occurs in the NT once in the Gospels (Mt 23:15), and the noun "snare" (paga) is met with in 5 passages (Lk 21:34; Rom 11:19; 1 Tim 3:7; 6:9; 2 Tim 2:26). Another word for "snare" (trichōs), which means lit. "noose" (RVm), is used in 1 Cor 7:35. The word for "things that cause stumbling" and "stumble" (skandalon and skandala) may possibly conceal in some passages an allusion to a hunter's trap or snare, Skandalon is closely allied to skandaliōthron, "the stick in a trap on which the bait is placed," and is used in LXX for mokēth. The abundant use of imagery taken from hunting in the Bible is remarkable, in view of the comparative rarity of literal references.

LITERATURE.—In addition to the works cited in the course of the art., the art. "Hunting" in Smith's Bible Dictionary, is large and small, BB, Jew Enc., and Jacob in German Bible Dictionary. Of the Hebrew names, and Wiener, and in JPS W., William Taylor Smith, is probably the best handbook. HUPHAM, hup'a (הֵפַח, huphām, "coast-inhabitant"): One of Benjamin's sons and head of the Huphamite family (Nu 26:9). See HUPPHIM.

HUPPHIM, hup'ā (הֵפָיו, hupphāh, "protection"): The priest in charge of the 13th course as prescribed under David (1 Ch 24:13).

HUPPHIM, hup'ā (הֵפָיו, hupphām, "coastpeople"): Probably a variant form of Hupham in v. 8. From the only Hebrew mention made of them in Jgs 5:6 (cf Josh 14:6), 1 Ch 7:12), his direct descent is difficult to establish.

HUR, hur (הֵר, hur):

(1) A prominent official in Israel. With Aaron he held up Moses' hands during the battle against the Amalekites (Ex 17:10.12) and assisted him as judicial head of the people during Moses' stay in the mount (Ex 24:14).

(2) Grandfather of Bezaleel, the head artificer in the construction of the Tabernacle (Ex 31:2; 35:30; 36:22; 2 Ch 1:5). He is here assigned to the tribe of Judah, and in 1 Ch is connected with the same by descent through Caleb (2:19.20.50; 4:4). Jos (Ant, IV, ii, 4; v, 1) makes him identical with (1) and the husband of Miriam.

(3) One of the five kings of Midian slaid along with Balaam when Israel avenged the "matter of Peor" upon this people (Nu 31:8; cf vs 12.16). In Josh 13:21 these kings were spoken of as "chiefs [r'm] of Midian" and "princes [pēzār] of Sihon," king of the Amorites.

According to 1 K 4:8 AV, the father of one of Solomon's twelve officers who provided food for the king's household, and whose district was the hill country of Ephraim and used to take the Heb ben, "son of," as part of the proper name; and the same is true in reference to the... names of four others of these officers (cf vs 9.10. 11.13).

(5) Father of Rephaiah, who was one of the builders of the wall under Nehemiah, and ruler of half the district of Jerus (Neh 3 9).

BENJAMIN RENO DOWNER

HURAI, húr'á (הָעָרָי, hû'ráy, "linen-weaver"): One of David’s "mighty men" mentioned in 1 Ch 11 32 as of the brooks of Gaash, i.e. of the land of Jeshua. In the 2 S 23 30, the orthography is Hiddai.

HURAM, húr'ám (הָעָרָם, hû'ram, "noble-born"): (1) Grandson of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 5). (2) King of Tyre in alliance with David and Solomon. So named in 2 Ch 2 3 3112; 8 2; 9 1021, but elsewhere written Hiram (q.v.). (3) The Tyrian artisan who is so named in 2 Ch 2 13; 4 116, but elsewhere called "Hiram."

HURI, húr'í (הָעַרְי, hû'ri, "linen weaver"): One of the immediate descendants of Gad, and father of Abihail, a man of his family (1 Ch 5 14).

HURT, húrt: The term (noun and vb.) represents a large number of Heb words, of which the chief are רע, ra' (vb. רעע, ra'a'), "evil" (Gen 26 29; I S 24 9; Ps 35 4, etc), and רעע or רעע, shebher or shebher (from רעע, shebhar, "a fracture" or "breaking") (Jer 6 14; 8 1121; 10 19; cf Ex 22 10.14). In Gr a principal vb. is ἄπτω, adptō, "to do injustice" (Lk 10 19; Rev 2 11; 63, etc); once the word "hurt" is used in AV (Acts 27 10, story of Paul's shipwreck) for ἡμέρω, hémra, "injury" (thus RV). In RV "hurt" sometimes takes the place of other words in AV, as "sick" (Prov 23 35), "breach" (Isa 30 26), "bruise" (Jer 30 12; Nah 3 19); sometimes, on the other hand, the word in AV is exchanged in RV for "evil" (Josh 24 20), "harm" (Acts 18 10), or, as above, "injury" (Acts 27 10). These references sufficiently show the meaning of the word—harm, bruise, breaking, etc. In Jer (ut supra) the word is used figuratively for moral disease or corruption. JAMES ORR

HUSBAND, huz'band (הusband, ʿāshāh, ārāh, anār): In the Heb household the husband and father was the head and institution of an estate which was regarded as more than a social organism, inasmuch as the family in primitive Sem society had a distinctively religious character and significance. It was through it that the cult of the household and tribal deities was practised and perpetuated. The house-father, by virtue of being the family head, was priest of the household, and as such, responsible for the religious life of the family and the maintenance of the family altar. As priest he offered sacrifices to the family gods, as at first, before the centralisation of worship, he did to Jeh as the tribal or national Deity. We see this reflected in the stories of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, and in the Book of Job. This goes far to explain such ritual acts as we have in Gen 31 53; 22 9, and the exceptional reverence that was paid the patriarchal sepulchers (I S 20 6). Abraham was regarded as being the father of a nation. It was customary, it would seem, to assign a "father" to every known tribe and nation (Gen 10). So the family came to play an important and constructive part in Heb thought and life, forming the base upon which the social structure was built, merging gradually into the wider organism of the clan or tribe, and vitally affecting at last the political and religious life of the nation itself.

The husband from the first had supreme authority over his wife, or wives, and children. In his own domain his rule was well-nigh absolute. The wife, or wives, looked up to him as their lord (Gen 18 12). He was chief (cf Arab. šēkē), and to dishonor him was a crime to be punished by death (Ex 21 15.17). He was permitted to divorce his wife with little reason, and divorces were all too common (Dt 22 13.19.28.29; Isa 50 1; Jer 3 8; 5 8; Mal 2 16, etc). The wife seems to have had no redress if wronged by him. Absolute faithfulness, though required of the wife was apparently not expected or exacted of the husband, so long as he did not violate the rights of another husband.

In general among Eastern people women were lightly esteemed, as in the Japhetic nations they came to be. Plato counted a state "disorganised, "where slaves are disobedient to their masters, and wives are on equality with their husbands."

"Is there a human being," asks Socrates, "with whom you talk less than with your wife?" But from the first, among the Hebrews, the ideal husband trained his household in the way they should go religiously, as well as instructed them in the traditions of the family, the tribe, and the nation (Gen 18 19; Ex 12 26; 13 8; Dt 6 7, etc). It was due to him in part at least, that, in spite of the worst acts and evils incident to polygamy, the Heb household was a nursery of virtue and piety to an unusual degree, and became a genuine anticipation of the ideal realised later in the Christian home (1 Cor 7 2 f; Eph 5 25; 1 Pet 3 7).

Used figuratively of the relation (1) between Jeh and His people (Isa 54 5; Jer 3 14; Hos 2 19 f); (2) between Christ and His church (Mt 9 15; 2 Cor 11 2; Eph 5 25; Rev 19 7; 21 2)

HUSBANDMAN, huz'band-man, HUSBANDRY, huz'band-ri: Husbandman, originally a "householder" or "master of the house," is now limited in its meaning to "farmer" or "tiller of the soil." In this sense it is the correct tr. of the various Heb. words: רועyah רועיה, "hubbah, lit. "man of the soil" (Gen 9 20); רוד, ikkar, lit. "gigger," "a farmer" (2 Ch 26 10; Jer 31 24; 51 23; Am 5 16; Joel 1 11); בִּשְׂדֶה, gbeh, "to dig" (2 K 25 12); בַּשְׂדֶה, yaghabh, "to dig" (Jer 52 16); יָגוּפָר, gippar, "cultivator" (Mt 21 33 f; Jn 16 1; Jas 5 7). See Agriculture.

It is a common practice in Pal and Syria today for a rich man to own lands in many different parts of the country. He sets farmers over these different tracts who, with the helpers, do the plowing, planting, reaping, etc; or he lets out his lands to farmers who pay a yearly rental or a part of the produce to him. The name of the owner of the land is kept by 19th century writers. Many difficulties of the owner with his husbandmen described by Jesus are often repeated today.

Figurative: Jesus said "I am the true vine, and my father is the husbandman" (Jn 15 1). He sows, cultivates, prunes and expects fruits from His church. In the parable of the Householder (Mt 21 33 ff), the abundant harvest will not be forgotten. All the difficulties of the owner with his husbandmen described by Jesus are often repeated today.

HUSBAND'S BROTHER (בָּן הָעָרָי, yābbām, "brother-in-law"; תָּנִום בָּרֵא, epigambrō; Latin levir): He was required (Dt 25 5-10; Mt 22 24) "to perform the duty of a husband's brother" (hubb'mah); that is, if his brother, living with him on the paternal estate, died without male issue, he should take the widow to wife, and "raise up seed unto his brother," the firstborn of the new marriage inheriting the deceased brother's estate. Refusal of the duty was possible, but entailed public ceremonial disgrace and lasting reproach. This provision for a specific case modified the general law which forbade the marriage of a sister-in-law (Lev 18 16. 18). It was a patriarchal custom (Gen 29, Judah and Tamar), and is alluded to in Ruth 1 11-13. A related custom is found in Ruth 4 1, Boaz playing, however, the part, not of levir ("brother-in-law"); but of gô'ël ("redeemer"). It was at least theoretically in force in Our Lord's time (Mt 22 25-26; the question of the Sadducees concerning the resurrection). For the origin and object of this custom see FAMILY, MARRIAGE.

HUSHAI, hû'sha (יוֹשָׁה, ֹוֹשָׁה, "haste"): Mentioned in 1 Ch 4 4 as probably an individual, a Judahite, or a family name; but may possibly be a place.

HUSHAI, hû'shah, hû'shāt (יוֹשָׁח, ֹוֹשֶׁח, יוֹשַׁח, חָוֵש, חַוֵּשׁ, חוֹשָׁח, חוֹשָׁא: An Architect, native of Archi or Erech(?), W. of Bethol on the northern border of Benjamin and southern border of Joseph (Josh 16 2). Hushai was one of David's most faithful and wise counsellors. When David was fleeing from Jerus and Absalom, Hushai met him, having his coat rent and earth on his head. The king persuaded him to return to Jerus, feign submission to Absalom, and try to defeat the counsel of Ahithophel (2 S 16 32). Whatever Absalom decided on, Hushai was to send word to David through two young men, sons of the priests Zakon and Abiathar (15 24-36). Hushai obeyed, and succeeded in persuading Absalom to adopt his counsel rather than that of Ahithophel (2 S 16 16-17 14). He sent word to David of the nature of Ahithophel's counsel, and the king made good his escape that night across the Jordan. The result was the suicide of Ahithophel and the ultimate defeat and death of Absalom.

HUSHAM, hû'sham (ほう, ほう, hû'sham; Gen 36 34; 1 Ch 1 46-46, "alert"): According to the former reference, Husham was one of the kings of Edom, and according to the latter he was "of the land of the Temanites" and (1 Ch 1 35) descended from Esau.

HUSHATHIHE, hû'shath-it (יוֹשֶׁת, ֹוֹשֶׁת, "a dweller in Hushah"): The patronymic given in two forms, but probably of the same man, Sibbecai, one of David's thirty heroes (2 S 21 15; 1 Ch 11 29; 20 4; 27 11), or Mebunnai as named in the passage (2 S 23 27).

HUSHIM, hû'sh'm (ほう, ほう, ほう, ほう, ほう, hû'shim, "hearts"): (1) Family name of the children of Dan (Gen 46 29), but of form "Shuham" in Nu 26 42. (2) The sons of Aher, of the lineage of Benjamin (1 Ch 7 12). (3) One of the wives of Shaharaim, of the family of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 11).

HUSHSHATHIHE, hûsh'shath-it (יוֹשֶׁת, ֹוֹשֶׁת, "a dweller of Hushah"): Same as Hushathite (q.v.), except in recoplicated form (1 Ch 27 11; cf 11 29, Heb pronunciation).

HUSKS, husks (סֶקֶרַת, kerätz, i.e. "little horns," Lk 15 10): These are the pods of the carob tree (RVM), also called the locust tree (Ceratonia silique). This tree flourishes all over Pal, esp. on the western mountain slopes toward the sea; by the Arabs it is called kharābū. It is dioecious, has dense, dark, evergreen foliage, glossy leaves and long, curved pods, like small horns (hence the name). These pods which are from 4 to 9 in. in length, have a less specific case containing a pulpy substance in which the beans are imbedded; this pulp is of a pleasant, sweetish flavor and has a characteristic color, and is much loved by children. The pods are sold in the markets, both as cattle food and for the poor, who extract by boiling them a sweetish substance like molasses. The tradition that the "locusts" of Mt 3 4; Mk 1 6 were carob pods is preserved in the name given to them, "St. John's bread," but it has little to be said for it.

E. W. G. MASTERMAN

HUYEZ, hu'az (Gen 22 21 AV). See Uz.

HUZZABB, hu'zab (ITIZE, ֔וֹזָבָה, only in Nah 2 7 AV and RVm): Its meaning is doubtful. According to Gezerina, it is a vb. Hoph. of yibb'mah ("haste"); but of yibb'tah ("flow," hence to be rendered with preceding v. "The palace is dissolved and made to flow down," Wordworth made it Pual of yize, naq'ab, "fix": "The palace is dissolved, though established," LXX renders with the next word, kē hapōstai ("the foundation [or treasure] is uncovered," AV, RVm and ARV text make it Hoph. of naq'ab, "fix," hence "It is decreed," perhaps more probably, with AV and RV text and ARV, it is a name, or noun with the article (or the corruption of such a word), referring either to the Assyr queen, or personifying Nineveh. No such queen is now known, but Assyriology may throw light. The "name" interpretation accords best with the general trend of the passage, which describes the desolation of a royal palace. BDB calls it "perhaps textual error." The Massoretic vocalization may be at fault.

PHILIP WENDELL CRANNEIL

HYACINTH, hi'synth (בֵּאְסֵנִים, haksinhos): RV uses this word in Rev 9 17 for AV "saffron," with reference, not to stone, but to dark-purple color. In Rev 21 20, where stone is meant, RV tr. "sapphire."

HYADES, hi'-des. See ASTROLOGY, 11, 4.

HYDASPES, hi'-des'pes (Ϝαντος, Hudsapes): A river mentioned in Jth 1 6 in connection with the Euphrates and Tigris, but otherwise unknown. It is possible there may be a confusion with the Hydaspes of India. Some have conjectured an identity with the Choaspe.

HYENA, hi'-ena (יוֹנָה, yôn'hâ; Jer 12 9; LXX ᾿Ιάννα, hûnā [der 12 9; Eclesus 13 15], of Arab. ַךָּב or ַךַּב, dab or dabu, "hyena"); cf לִבְּעַל, lîbâ'l, Zebaim [1 S 13 18; Neh 11 34]; also of לִבְּעַל, lîbâ'l, Zebaim [Gen 36 21 14:20; 1 Ch 1 38]; but not לִבְּעַל, lîbâ'l, Zebaim [Gen 10 19; 14 2, etc.]: EV does not contain the word "hyena," except in Eclesus 13 18, What peace is there between the hyena and the dog? and what peace between the rich man and the poor?" In 1 Cor 2 9, where the Heb has ḥa-ayîy gâbbâth (RV "a speckled bird of prey"), LXX has πτήσις ἡμῶν ἡμᾶς, "a hyena's den," as if from a Heb origin. (Jer 4:3) But yet he had not done so, instead of ḥa-ayîy, "bird." The root gâbbâth may mean "to seize as prey" (cf Arab. seb, "lion" or "rapacious animal"), or "to dip" or "to dye" (cf Arab. zâbagh; "to dye"), hence the two tr of gâbbâth as "hyena" and as "speckled."

The hyena of Pal is the striped hyena (Hyaena striata) which ranges from India to North Africa. The striped, the spotted, and the brown hyenas constitute a distinct family of the order of Carnivora, having certain peculiarities of dentition and having four toes on each foot, instead of four behind and five in front, as in most of the order. The hyena is a nocturnal animal, rarely seen though fairly abundant, powerful but cowardly, a feeder on carrion and addicted to grave-robbing. The last habit in particular has won it the abhorrence of the natives of the countries which it inhabits. In the passage cited in Ecclus, it is to be noted that it is to the hyena that the rich man is compared. The name of the hyena is excellently strong and fitted for crushing bones which have resisted the efforts of dogs and jackals. Its dens are in desolate places and are littered with fragments of skeletons. "Is my heritage unto me as a speckled bird of prey?" (vulg) or by the name of an affluent of Wâdi-ul-Kelt. Either of these, or possibly Wâdi-ul-Kelt itself, may be the valley of Zeboim (valley of hyenas) of 1 S 13 18.

The name of Zebon the Horite (Gen 36 2, etc) is more doubtfully connected with "hyena."}

ALFRED ELY DAY

HYMENAEUS, h-men-ë'as (Yµηµαιος, Hymenaios), so named from Hymen, the god of marriage, 1 Tim 1 20; 2 Tim 2 17. A heretical teacher in Ephesus, an opponent of the apostle Paul, who in the former reference associates him with Alexander (see ALEXANDER), and in the latter, with Philets (see PHILETUS).

It is worthy of notice that in both passages where these persons are mentioned, the name of Hymenaeus occurs first, showing, perhaps, that 1. His he was the leader. In the passage in Career 1 Tim Hymenaeus is included in the list of the two persons who put away faith and a good conscience and who had made shipwreck concerning faith. The apostle adds that he had delivered Hymenaeus and Alexander unto Satan, that they might learn not to blaspheme.

In the passage in 2 Tim, Hymenaeus and Philets are included among those who profess and vain babblings will increase unto more godliness, and whose word "will eat Denial of as doth a gangrene." The apostle the Resurrection declares that Hymenaeus and Philets are of the number of such people as those just described, and he adds that those two persons "concerning the truth have erred, saying that the resurrection is past already, and overthrow the faith of some. Then, for the support of this doctrine, he goes on to say to the Jews upon the foundation of God is, "The Lord knoweth them that are his: and, Let every one that nameth the name of the Lord depart from unrighteousness." The inference intended is, that though Hymenaeus and Philets had named the name of Christ, they did not live in the spirit of discipleship. There is no doubt in regard to the identity of this Hymenaeus with the person of the same name in 1 Tim. Accordingly, the facts mentioned in the two epistles must be placed together, viz, that though he had made a Christian profession by naming the name of Christ, yet he had not done so, instead of

Paul says regarding it makes it evident that it was a form of Gnosticism. This spiritualizing of the resurrection sprung from the idea that the body is an imperfect material substance. This idea immediately led to the conclusion of the essentially evil nature of the human body, and that if man is to rise to his full stature, he must rid himself of the thraldom, not of sin, but of the body. This contempt for the body led to the denial of the resurrection in its literal sense; and all that Christ had taught on the subject was explained only, in an allusional sense, of the resurrection.

Teaching of this kind is described by Paul as having effects similar to the "eating" caused by a gangrene. It is deadly; it overthrows Christian faith.

If not destroyed, it would corrupt the communicants (1 Cor 2 18). There is no literal resurrection of the dead, then, as Paul shows in 1 Cor 15, Christ is not raised: and if the literal resurrection of Christ is false, Christian believers are yet in their sins, and the Christian religion is false.

The way in which the apostle dealt with these teachers, Hymenaeus and his companions, was not merely in the renewed assertion of the truth which they denied, but also by passing sentence upon these teachers—whom I delivered unto Satan, that they might be taught not to blaspheme.” In regard to the meaning of this sentence much difficulty of interpretation exists. Some understand it to mean simple excommunication from the church. But this seems quite inadequate to exhaust the meaning of the words employed by Paul. Others take it to signify the infliction of some bodily suffering or disease. This also is quite insufficient as an explanation. It seems that a person who was delivered unto Satan was cut off from all Christian privileges, he was “put away” from the body of Christian believers, and handed over to “the Satan,” the Evil One in his most distinct personality (1 Cor 2 15, 13, 11). In the cases of Ananias and Sapphira (Acts 5), and of Elymas (Acts 13 11).

It is important that the purpose of this terrible sentence should not be overlooked. The intention of the punishment was distinctly remedial. Both in the case of Hymenaeus and Alexander, and in that of the person dealt with in 1 Cor 6, the intention was the attaining of an ultimate good. In 1 Cor it is “for the destruction of the flesh, that the spirit may be saved in the day of the Lord Jesus.” Similarly, Hymenaeus and Alexander were delivered unto Satan, not for their final perdition, but that they may be taught, through this terrible discipline—for such is the signification of the word which is τρεπεῖν “taught, not to blaspheme. The purpose of this discipline, for they might learn not to blaspheme, shows the dread magnitude of impious, and of railing at Christian truth to which Hymenaeus had gone.

In the history of Hymenaeus and his companions, and in their bold and anti-Christian teaching which had overtopped the falter of the laws, we cannot fail to see the fulfillment of what Paul had said many years previously, in his farewell address to the elders of the church in Ephesus: "I know that after my departing grievous wolves shall enter among you, not sparing the flock: and from among your own selves shall men arise, speaking perverse things to draw away disciples after them." (Acts 20:29 f.) It was in the Ephesian church that Hymenaeus and Alexander had acted. The gangrene-like nature of their teaching has already been described.

JOHN RUTHERFORD

HYMN, him (Ὑμνος, hýmnos): In Col. 3:16; Eph. 5:19 St. Paul bids his readers sing "psalms and hymns and spiritual songs." Gregory of Nyssa (4th cent.) distinguishes these as follows: the Psalms were accompanied by instruments, the hymns were mainly vocal, and the song, ode, was a general term comprehending both. This distinction might suggest that the psalm belonged especially to the public worship of the church, while the hymn was the production, more or less spontaneous, of the individual members. The inference is, however, inconsistent with 1 Cor. 14:26, and it is probable that in the apostolic age, at least, the terms were used indiscriminately. Of Christian psalms or hymns we have examples in the NT. Lk. 1:55; 2:29; 2 Cor. 2:14 contain such hymns in the songs of Mary, Zacharias and Simeon. The Apocalypse is studied with hymns or odes, many of them quite general in character, and probably borrowed or adapted from Jewish books of praise. In the Ep. of Paul, esp. the later ones, fragments of hymns seem to be quoted. Lightfoot detects one in Eph. 5:14, and others readily suggest themselves.

It is probable that the hymn mentioned as having been sung by Jesus and the disciples after the Passover (Mt. 26:30; Mk. 14:26) was the second part of the Hallel, i.e. Ps. 113-116, and the hymns of Paul and Silas were most likely also taken from the Psalter. But the practice of interpolating and altering Jewish non-canonical books, like the Psalter of Solomon and the recently discovered Odes of Solomon, shows that the early Christians adopted for devotional purposes the rich store of sacred poetry possessed by their nation. For the music to which these psalms, etc., were sung, see Music; Song.

HYPOCRISY, hi-pok'ri-si, HYPOCRITE, hip'ô-krí-tē (Ὑπόκριτης, hupokritēs, ὑποκρίτες, ὑποκρίτης, hypocrites); (1) "Hypocrisy" occurs only once in the OT as the tr of hânēph (Isa. 32:6, RV "profaneness"); hânēph, from which it is derived, means properly "to cover," "to hide," or "becloud," hence to pollute, to be polluted or defiled, to make profane, to seduce; as a subst. it is τὸν "hypocrite" (Job 8:13; 13:16; 15:34; 25:5; 27:5; 34:30; 36:18): in all which instances RV has "godless man," "godless men," "godless"; Prov. 11:9, RV "the godless man"; Isa. 9:17, RV "profane"; Isa. 33:14, RV "the godless ones"); it is rendered "hypocritical," in Ps. 55:16; Isa. 10:6, RV "profane".

(2) "Hypocrisy," "hypocrite" are frequent in the NT, chiefly in Christ's discourses in the Gospels. The word hupokrīsis (primarily, "an answering," "response") meant generally, in classical Gr. stage-play, answering, the historical art; hence it came to mean "acting a part in life," etc. We find hupokrīsis in this sense in 2 Macc. 25, RV "dissimulation," and hupokrinomai, "to pretend," "to feign," etc. Ecles. 1:29; 32:15; 33:2, tr. "hypocrite"; 2 Macc.

5 25, "pretending peace," RV "playing the man of peace"; 6 21, RV "to make as if." Hypokritēs (lit. "an actor") is the LXX for hânēph (Job 34:30; 36:13), equivalent to bad, wicked, godless, which is perhaps included in some of Our Lord's uses of the word; e.g. Mt. 23:27 f., "full of hypocrisy and iniquity" (cf. vs. 29 f.; 24:51); but, in general, the meaning is acting a part, false, deceptive and deceived, formally and outwardly religious and good, but inwardly more evil and unrighteous; the hypocrite may come to deceive himself as well as others, but "the hypocrite's hope shall perish" (Job 8:13 AV). On no class did Our Lord pronounce such severe condemnation as on the hypocrites of His day.

"Hypocrisy" (hupokrisis) occurs in Mt. 23:28; Mk. 12:15; Lk. 11:41 (in Gal. 2:13 it is rendered "dissimulation"); "hypocrite" (hupokritēs), Mt. 5:8, 26; 15:7; 23:28; 23:13-15, 25. f. 29; 24:51; Mk. 7:6; Lk. 12:50; 13:16; in Jas. 3:17, anapōkois is "without hypocrisy" as RV. Rom. 12:19 ("unfeigned"). 2 Cor. 6:1; 1 Tim. 1:5; 2 Tim. 1:1; 1 Pet. 1:22.

HYRANUS, hê-rê-kâ'nos (Ὑράνως, Hūrânōs): "Son of Tobias, a man of great dignity," who had a large sum of money deposited in the Temple of Jesus when Heilodorus was sent to confiscate it in 187 BC (2 Macc. 3:11 ff.). Opinions differ as to the identity of this H. with the grandson of Tobias whose birth and history are related at considerable length by Jos. (Ant. XII, iv. 6, ff.), or with another of the same name mentioned in Ant. XIII, viii, 4. See ASMONEANS; MACCABAEANS.

HYSSOP, his'up (Ἱσσόν, ἵσσον; ἱσσόσων, ἱσσόδως, Ex. 12:22; Lev. 14:4-16.49 ff.; Nu. 19:6.18; 1 K. 4:33; Ps. 61:7; Jn. 19:20; He. 9:19): A plant used for ritual cleansing purposes; a humble plant springing out of the wall (1 K. 4:35), the extreme custod of the cedar.
grow everywhere, being found even in the desert. Post thinks of all varieties the \textit{Origanum maris}, a special variety of marjoram which favors terrace walls and rocks, is the most probable.

The proposal (Royle, \textit{Jour. Royal Asiatic Soc.}, VII, 198–213) to identify the caper (\textit{Capparis spinosa}) with hyssop, which has been popularized by the works of Tristram, has not much to recommend it. It is true that the caper is very commonly seen growing out of walls all over Pal (1 K 4 33), but in no other respect it is suitable to the requirements of the Bib. references. The supposed similarity between the Arab, 'asaf ('caper') and the Heb 'ezbh is fanciful; the caper with its stiff, prickly stems and smooth, flat leaves would not furnish a bunch for sprinkling as serviceable as many species of \textit{sa'fr}. It has been specially urged that the hyssop suits the conditions of Jn 19 29, it being maintained that a stem of caper would make a good object on which to raise the "sponge full of vinegar" to the Saviour's face, the equivalent of the "reed" of Mt 27 48; Mk 15 36. For this purpose the flexible, prickly stems of the hyssop would be most unsuitable; indeed, it would be no easy matter to find one of sufficient length. It is necessary to suppose either that a bunch of hyssop accompanied the sponge with the vinegar upon the reed, or, as has been proposed by several writers (for references see art. "Hyssop," EB), that hussbō is a corruption of hussō, "javelin," and that the passage should read "They put a sponge full of vinegar upon a javelin."

He judged Israel 7 years, and when he died he was buried in his native place. The only personal details given about him in the Bib. narrative are that he had 30 sons and a like number of daughters. He sent all of his sons "abroad" for wives and brought husbands from "abroad" for all his daughters. The exact meaning of ha-kūg, "abroad," is mere matter of speculation, but the great social importance of the man and, possibly, alliances among tribes, are suggested in the brief narrative (Jgs 12 8–10). Jewish tradition identifies Ibzan with Boaz of Bethlehem-Judah (Talm, \textit{Babba', Bathra' 91a}).}

\subsection{ICE, is (\textit{isc}, israh): Ice is almost unknown in Pal and Syria except on the highest mountains. At moderate heights of less than 4,000 ft. a little ice may form during the night in winter, but the warm rays of the sun melt it the next day. A great quantity of snow is packed away in caves in the mountains during the winter, and is thus preserved for use in the summer months. The word is found in the Bible in three places where it describes God's power. "Out of whose womb came the ice? And the . . . frost" (Job 38 29): "By the breath of God ice is given" (37 10): "He casteth forth his ice like morsels" (Ps 147 17).}

Ichabod was born after his father's death. His mother gave him this name on her death-bed to indicate that the "glory [had] departed from Israel" (1 S 4 19 ff.). \subsection{ICONIUM, i-kó'ni-um (\textit{Ikonion}, also \textit{Eikonion}, on inscriptions): Iconium was visited by St. Paul on his first and on his second missionary journey (Acts 13 51 ff.; 16 2 ff.), and} if the “South Galatian theory” be correct, probably also on his third journey. His sufferings there are referred to in 2 Tim 3:11.

The topographical position of Iconium is clearly indicated in Acts, and the evidence of Acts has been confirmed by recent research. When Iconium was in Phrygia or in Lycaonia, and in what sense can it be said to have belonged to one ethnic division or the other? The majority of our ancient authorities (Cicero, Strabo, Pline), writing from the point of view of Rom provincial administration, give Iconium to Lycaonia, of which geography makes it the natural capital. But Xenophon, who marched with Cyrus’ expedition through Phrygia into Lycaonia, calls Iconium the last city of Phrygia. The writer of Acts 14:6 makes the same statement when he represents St. Paul and St. Barnabas as fleeing from Iconium to the cities of Lycaonia—implying that the border of Phrygia and Lycaonia passed between Iconium and Lystra, 18 miles to the S. Other ancient authorities who knew the local conditions well speak of Iconium as Phrygian until far into the Roman imperial period. At the neighboring city of Lystra (Acts 14:11), the natives used the “speech of Lycaonia.” Two inscriptions in the Phrygian language found at Iconium in 1910 prove that the Phrygian language was in use there for 2 centuries after St. Paul’s visits, and afford confirmation of the interesting topographical details in Acts (see Jour. Hell. Stud, 1911, 189). In the apostolic period, Iconium was one of the chief cities in the southern part of the Rom province Galatia, and it probably belonged to the “Phrygian region” mentioned in Acts 15:6. The emperor Claudius conferred on it the title Claudionium, which appears on coins of the city and on inscriptions, and was formerly taken as a proof that Claudius raised the city to the rank of a Rom colonia. It was Hadrian who raised the city to colonial rank: this is proved by its new title; Colonia Aelia Hadriana Iconium, and by a recently discovered inscription, which belongs to the reign of Hadrian, and which mentions the first durus, who was appointed in the new colony. Iconium was still a Hellenic city, but with a strong pro-Rom bias (as proved by its title “Claudian”) when St. Paul visited it.

About 295 AD, an enlarged province, Pisidia, was formed, with Antioch as capital, and Iconium as a “sort of secondary metropolis.”

3. Later History

The Byzantine arrangement, familiar to us in the Notitiae Episcopatuum, under which Iconium was the capital of a province Lycaonia, dates from about 372 AD. Iconium, the modern Ikonias, has always been the main trading center of the Lycaonian Plain. Trade attracted Jews to the ancient Phrygio-Hellenic city (Acts 14:1), as it attracts Greeks and Armenians to the modern Turkish town.

St. Paul’s experiences at Iconium form part of the theme of the semi-historical legend of St. Thekla, on which see Professor Ramsay’s Church in the Roman Empire, 380 ff.

IDALASH, id’a-la-sh, yiddishash, “honey-sweet”[?]: A man of Judah, one of the sons of the father of Etam (1 Ch 4:3; LXX “sons of Etam”).

IDDO, id’dō, (1) (יִדְדָּו, יִדְדָה, "to be strong"); “happ,” “happy”[?], Ezr 8:17: The “chief at the place Caaphur,” who provided Ezra with Levites and Nehemiah, the head of the Levitical body of school, said to be one of the Nehemiah or temple slaves, but perhaps an “and” has slipped out, and it should read: “the chief of the Nehemiah.” 1 Esd 8:45.46 has “Loddeus [AV "Saddeous"], the captain who was in the place of the treasury,” kepheth meaning silver. LXX has “in the place of the silver [να ἐστὶν καὶ τὸ χρυσόν, εἰς ἵνα τιμήσην καὶ τοὺς πρεσβύτερους." . . . to his brethren and to the treasurers.”

(2) (יִדְדָּא, yiddā, “beloved,” or “loving,” 1 Ch 27:21): Son of Zechariah, and captain of the half tribe of Manasseh in Gilead, under David.

(6) (יִדְדָה, yiddā, “to be”; Kethibh יִדְדָה, ye’dāl, or יִדְדָו, yiddō, “decked,” “adorned”): Seer (boezh) and prophet (nabhī), the Chronicler’s “source” for the reign of Solomon (2 Ch 9:29): “The visions of Iddo the seer concerning Jeroboam the son of Nebat”; and for the reign of Rehoboam (2 Ch 13:15): “The histories of Iddo יִדְדָה, yiddō the seer, after the manner of [or, “in reckoning”] genealogies” and for the reign of Abijah (2 Ch 13:22): “The commentary [midrash] of the prophet Iddo יִדְדָו, yiddō. He may have been the prophet whom the denounced Jeroboam (1 K 13), who is called by Jos and Jerome Jadon, or Iddo. Jerome makes Iddo and Oded the same.

(7) (יִדְדָה, yiddō, “loving, ” timely,” Zee 1:1): Grandfather (father, according to Ezra) of the prophet Zechariah. See also Zee 1:7; Ezr 6:1; 6:14 יִדְדָה, yiddō). In 1 Esd 6:1, “Adso.”

(8) (יִדְדָה, yiddō, “decked,” “adorned”), Neh 12:4.16: A priest who went up with Zerubbabel (ver 4); one of the priestly clans which went up (ver 16); perhaps same as (7).

IDLE, i’dl, IDLENESS, i’dl-nes: Both words, adj. and noun, render different Heb words (from יִדוּד, “to be lazy,” יִדְדָה, “to relax,” and יִדְדָו, יִדְדָא, “to be quiet”). According to the Yahwistic narrative Pashah’s retort to the complaints of the Israelites was a charge of idleness (Ex 5:8.17). It was a favorite thought of Heb wisdom—practical wisdom of the life—what idleness inevitably led to poverty and want (Prov 19:15; Eccl 10:18). The “virtuous woman” or one who would not eat the “bread of idleness” (Prov 31:27). In Ezek 16:49 for AV “abundance of idleness,” RV “prosperous case.” In the NT ‘idle’ generally renders the Gr word ἀργος, ἀργος, lit. “inactive,” “dull,” “lazy,” ἄργος, ἄργος, “to be quiet.” According to the T. IDOLATRY, i-dol’a-tri, traphthim, “household idols,” “idolatry”; אֱדוֹלָטָה, edolat-
Idolatry

There is ever in the human mind a craving for visible forms to express religious conceptions, and this tendency does not disappear with the acceptance, or even with the constant recognition, of pure spiritual truths (see IMAGES). Idolatry originally meant the worship of idols, or the worship of false gods by means of idols, but came to mean among the OT Hebrews any worship of false gods, whether by images or otherwise, and finally the worship of Jeh through visible symbols (Hos 8:6; 10:5); and ultimately in the NT idolatry came to mean only the giving to any creature or human creation the honor or devotion which belonged to God alone, but the giving to any human desire a precedence over God's will (1 Cor 10:14; Gal 5:20; Col 3:5; 1 Pet 4:3). The neighboring gods of Phoenicia, Canaan, Moab—Baal, Melkart, Astarte, Chesmoh, Moloch, etc.—were particularly attractive to Jews, while the old Sem被称为 worship seriously affected the state religion of the Northern Kingdom (see Golden Calf). As early as the Asyria and Babylonia (8th and 7th cents. BC), various deities from the Tigris and Euphrates had intruded themselves—the worship of Tammuz becoming a little later the most popular and seductive of all (Ezk 18:14)—while the worship of the sun, moon, stars, and the Zodiace became so intensified that this was introduced into the temple itself (2 K 17:16; 21:3–7; 23:12; Jer 19:13; Ezek 8:16; Am 5:26).

The special enticements to idolatry as offered by these various cults were found in their definition of natural forces and their appeal to primitive human desires, esp. the sexual; also through associations produced by intermarriage and through the appeal to patriotism, when the help of some cruel deity was sought in time of war. Baal and Astarte worship, which was especially attractive, was closely associated with fornication and drunkenness (Am 2:7; cf 1 K 14:23, i), and also appealed greatly to magic and soothsaying (e.g. Isa 6:6; 2:2; 8:19).

Sacrifices to the idols were offered by fire (Hos 4:13); libations were poured out (Isa 66:7; Jer 17:18); the first-fruits of the earth and tithes were presented (Hos 2:8); tables of food were set before them (Isa 65:11); the worshippers kissed the idols or threw them their knelt or prostrated themselves (1 K 18:22; Jer 19:3); stretched out their hands in adoration (Isa 44:20); knelt or prostrated themselves before them and sometimes danced about the altar, gashing themselves with knives (1 K 18:26–28; for a fuller summary see Hos 4:14).

Even earlier than the Bab exile the Heb prophets taught that Jeh was not only superior to all other gods, but reigned alone as God, other deities being nonexistent (Lev 19:4; Isa 2:8; 12:20; 19:13; 31:7; 44:9–20). The severe satire of this period proves that the former fear of living demons supposed to inhabit the idols had disappeared. These prophets also taught that the temple, ark and sacrifices were not essential to true spiritual worship (e.g. Jer 3:16; Am 5:21–25). These prophecies produced a strong reaction against the previously popular idol-worship, though later indications of this worship are not infrequent (Ezk 14:1–8; Isa 42:17). The Maccabean epoch placed national heroism plainly on the side of the one God, Jeh; and although Gr and Egyg idols (2 K 18:19) were worshiped in Gaza and Ascalon and other half-heathen communities clear down to the 5th or 6th cent. of the Christian era, yet in orthodox centers like Jerus they were despised and repudiated utterly from the 2d cent. BC onward. See also Golden Calf; Gods; Images; Talmud; Prim.

IDUEL, id’u-el (7Wordos, Idoelos); 1 Esd 8:43, Evm ‘Ariel’ (q.v.), IDUMAEA, id-d’m-A’a, IDUMAEANS, id-d’m-A’-an. See Edom.

IDEDIAS, i’d-e’-das, IDEDIAS, ‘Lyassas, ‘Idedias; One who agreed to put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9:26); called also ‘Jezeias.

IEZER, i’e-zar, IEBERITES, i’e-zar-’tas (‘Yezuz, ‘Iezer, Nu 26:30); Contracted from Abihezer (Josh 17:2, etc) (q.v.).

IGDALIAH, ig-da-l’a (‘Ygal, ‘Ygal, ‘Ygydalayh, ‘Jeh is great’); Ancestor of certain persons who had a ‘chamber’ in the temple in Jeremiah’s time (Jer 35:4).

IGEAI, i’ge-al, i’ge-al (‘Ygal, ‘Ygal, ‘he [i.e. God] redeems’); A remote descendant of Iddo (1 Ch 3:22, RV ‘Igai’).

IGNORANCE, ign’a-rans (‘Ygno, shghaghah; ‘Ynocia, ‘ignoria): ‘Ignorance’ is the tr of shghagh, ‘wandering,’ ‘going astray’ (Lev 4:2, etc; ‘if a soul sin through ignorance,’ RV ‘unwittingly,’ m ‘through error’; 5:15; Nu 16:24 ff; cf 35:11; Josh 20:3 ff; Ecd 5:6; 10:5, ‘an error’). In the Law shghaghah means ‘innocent error,’ such as had to be taken with consideration in judgment (see passages referred to). ‘Ignorance’ is also expressed by the negative lō ‘with ysdha, ‘to know’ (Isa 56:10; 63:16; Ps 73:22); also by bi-briel da’ath, lit. ‘in want of knowledge’ (Dt 19:4; cf 4:12; Josh 20:5, the ‘unawares,’ ‘unwittingly’).

In the NT the word ‘agnoia, ‘absence of knowledge’ (Acts 3:17; 17:30; Eph 4:18; 1 Pet 1:14); ‘agnomos, ‘error’ (He 9:7, RVM ‘Gr ignorances’); ‘agnosia, ‘ignorance’ (1 Pet 2:15), ‘no knowledge’ (1 Cor 15:34 RVM); ‘agnosia, ‘be without knowledge,’ ‘ignorant’ (Rom 1:13; 10:3; 11:25), ‘not knowing’ (Rom 2:4, etc), ‘understood not’ (Mk 9:32, etc), ‘ignorantly’ (Acts 17:23, RV ‘in ignorances’; 1 Tim 1:13); ‘idiot, trd ‘ignorant’ (Acts 4:13), ‘unlearned’ (1 Cor 14:16, RVM ‘him that is without gifts’), ‘unlearned’ and ‘ignorant men’; ‘agnammatos, corresponds to modern ‘illiterate’ (cf Jn 7:15; Acts 26:24); ‘idiotas’ originally denoted ‘the private man’ as distinguished from those with a knowledge of affairs, and took on the idea of contempt and scorn. In Philo it denoted the whole congregation of Israel as distinguished from the priests (De Vita Mosis, III. 29). With Paul (1 Cor 14:16,23:24) it seems to denote ‘plain believers as distinguished from those with special religious gifts.’ In Acts 4:13 it may refer to the want of Jewish learning it certainly it does not mean ignorant in the modern sense.

Paul in Rom 1:18,32 attributes the pre-Christian ILLUSTRIUS, i-lus-trius, THE (θαυμαστός, thumastos): A title of rank and merit attached to the name of Bartaeus, the father of Apame (1 Esd 4 29, AV "the admirable"). Instead of "the illustrious" we should possibly read "colonel" (Acts XI, iii, 5; EB, s.v.). See BARTAEUS; APAME.

ILLRICUM, i-lir'i-kum (Ilium, Illirikon): A province of the Rom Empire, lying E. and N.E. of the Adriatic Sea. In his Ep. to the Rom Paul emphasizes the extent of his missionary activities in the assertion that "from Jerusalem, and round about even unto Illyricum, I have fully preached the gospel of Christ." (16 19). An examination of this statement indicates three assertions: What is the force of the preposition "even unto" (μέχρι, méchri)? What meaning is borne by the word Illyricum? and, At what period of his missionary career did Paul reach the limit he spoke of? In Gr., as in Eng., the preposition "unto" may either be exclusive or inclusive. In other words, Paul may mean that he has preached throughout Macedonia as far as the Illyrian frontier, or his work may involve a journey within Illyricum itself, extending perhaps to Dyrrachium (mod. Durazzo) on the Adriatic seaboard, which, though belonging politically to Macedonia, lay in "Gr. Illyria." But since no word is said of any extension of Paul's travels beyond the confines of Macedonia, and since the phrase, "I have fully preached," precludes a reference to a hurried or cursory tour in Illyricum, we should probably take the word "unto" in its exclusive sense, and understand that Paul claims to have evangelized Macedonia as far as the frontier of Illyricum.

What, then, does the word "Illyricum" denote? It is sometimes used, like the Gr terms Illyris and Illyria, to signify a vast area lying between the Danube on the N. and of "Illyricum" — Macedonia and Thrace on the S., extending from the Adriatic and the Alps to the Black Sea, and inhabited by a number of warlike and semi-civilized tribes known to the Greeks under the general title of Illyrians (Appian, Illyr. 1; Suetonius, Tiberius, 16); it thus comprised the provinces of Illyricum (in the narrower sense), Pannonia and Moesia, which for certain financial and military purposes formed an administrative area, together with a strip of coast land between Dalmatia and Epirus and, at a later date, Dacia. Appian (Illyr. 6) even extends the term to include Raetia and Noricum, but in this he appears to be in error. But Illyricum has also a narrower and more precise meaning, denoting a single Roman province, which varied in extent with the advance of the Roman conquest but was finally organized in 10 AD by the emperor Augustus. At first it bore the name superius Illyricum or simply Illyricum; later it came to be known as Dalmatia (Tac. Annals, iv.5; Jos, BJ, II, xvi; Dio Cassius, xii.36, etc.). In accordance with Paul's habitual usage of such terms, together with the fact that he employs a Gr form which is a transliteration of the Lat Illyricum but does not occur in any other extant Gr writer, and the fact that he is here writing to the church at Rome, we may conclude that in Rom 15 19 Illyricum bears its more restricted meaning.

The Romans waged two Illyrian wars: in 229–228 BC and in 218 BC, but no province was formed until 167, when, after the fall of the Macedonian power, Illyria received its provincial constitution (Livy, xiv.26). At this time it extended from the Drin (mod. Drin) to Dalmatia, which was gradually subjugated by Rom arms. In 59 BC Julius Caesar received as his province Illyricum and Gaul, and later Octavian and his generals, Aemilius Paullus and Statilius Taurus, waged war there with such success that in 27 B.C. the province of Illyricum was conquered. During the reign of Augustus and the Senate, Illyricum was regarded as wholly pacified and was assigned to the latter. Renewed disturbances led, however, to its transfer to the emperor Tiberius. Two years later the province was extended to the Danube, but in 4 B.C. by Pontius Pilate at the close of the 3rd Pannonian War, it was divided into two separate districts, Pannonia and Illyricum (Dalmatia). The latter remained an imperial province, consisting of Illyricum proper pro praetore residing at Salonae (mod. Splitak), and two legions were stationed there, at Dalmatium and at Burunae. One of these was regarded, however, by Vespasian, and thenceforward the province was garrisoned by auxiliary troops. Some circuits (consentes), that of Scardona comprising Liburnia, the northern portion of the province, while those of Sacedon and Naarona made up the district of Dalmatia in the narrower sense. The land was rugged and mountainous, and inhabited by a dozen legions; but slowly, the Romans, however, organized 8 Roman colonies within the province and a considerable number of municipia.

The extension of Paul's preaching to the Illyrian frontier must be assigned to his 3rd missionary journey, i.e., to his 2nd visit to Macedonia. His movements during the 1st Relation to visit (Acts 16 12-17) are too fully recorded to admit of our attributing it to that period, but the account in Acts 20 2 of his second tour is not only very brief, but the words, "when he had gone through in the provinces occupying, according to Romans, the summer and autumn of 56 AD. IMAGE, ɪmˈdʒɪm, ɪˌmɛl, ɪˈkɒm; ikˈənː): Its usage falls under 3 main heads. (1) "Image" as object of idolatrous worship (truly about a dozen words, including ἰμάγεος, ἰμαγεὐόμαι, "molten image") [Dt 9 12, etc]; ἱματίους, ἱματία, "garmented image") [Ex 23 24, etc]; ἰμάτιον, ἰμάτια, "garment"") [Ex 20 4, etc]; ɪˌmɛl, ɪˈkɒm, "image") [2 K 11 18, etc]; ɪˈkɒm, "image") [e.g. Rev 14 9]; (2) of man as made in the image of God; (3) of Christ as the image of God. Here we shall confine ourselves to the last two usages. For "image" in connection with idolatrous practices, see Idolatry; Images; Pillar; Teraphim, etc.

1. MAN AS MADE IN THE DIVINE IMAGE.—To define man's fundamental relation to God, the priestly writer in Gen uses two words: "image" (םב, בים) and "likeness" (_yamlath; once employing both together (Gen 1 26; cf 6 5), but elsewhere one without the other, "image" only in 1 27; 9 6, and "likeness" only in 5 1. The priestly writer alone in the OT uses this expression to describe the nature of man, though the general meaning of the passage Gen 1 26 f is echoed in Ps 8 5-8, and the term itself reappears in Apoc (Sir 17 3; Wisd 2 20) and in the NT (see below).

The idea is important in relation to the Bib. doctrine of man, and has figured prominently in theological discussion. The following are some of the questions that arise:

(a) Is there any distinction to be understood between "image" and "likeness"? Most of the Fathers, and some later theologians, attempt to distinguish between them. (a) a "two-faced" (םב יד) approach, in which "image" is physiological form and "likeness" to his spiritual nature (Justin Martyr; Irenaeus). (b) Others, esp. the Alexandrian Fathers, hold by "image" to mental and moral endowments native to man, and by the "likeness" the Divine perfection man only gradually acquires through free development and moral conflict (Clement of Alexandria and Origen), or which is conferred on man as a gift of grace. (c) This became the basis of the later Roman Catholic distinction between the natural gifts of rationality and freedom (i.e. Augustinian natural endowments of grace which God bestowed on man after He had created him (the likeness = donum supernum); the man was not "created" though in an unenfeoffed state; the latter was lost through sin, but restored by Christ. This distinction, however, was rejected; maintaining that supernatural righteousness was part of the true and ideal nature of man, i.e. "image" = donum supernum, the externality of the externally superseded. Whatever truth these distinct

(2) What then, is to be understood by the Divine image? Various answers have been given.

(a) Some of the Fathers (influenced by Philo) supposed that the "image" here = the Logos (called the "image of the invisible God" in Col 1 15), on the pattern of whom man was created. But to read the Logos doctrine into the creation narrative is to ignore the historic order of doctrinal development. (b) That it connotes physical resemblance to God (see 1, above; so in the main Skinner, ICC, in loc.). It may be admitted that there is a secondary reference to the Divine dignity of the human body, but the "image" is of the matter, inasmuch as God is not represented as having physical form. (c) That it consists of dominion over the creatures (Scenician view; so also Gregory of Nyssa, Chrysostom, etc. This would involve a "two-way" view of the image of God. (d) It is true that such "dominion" is closely associated with the image in Gen 1 26 (cf Ps 8 5-8). But the "image of God" must denote primarily man's relation to his Creator, rather than his relation to the creation. Man's lordship over Nature is not identical with the image, but is an effect of it. (e) It is best to take the term as referring to the whole dignity of man, in virtue of his fundamental affinity to God. It implies the possession by man of a free, self-conscious, rational and moral personality, like unto that of God—a nature capable of distinguishing right and wrong, of choosing the right and rejecting the wrong, and of ascending to the heights of spiritual attainment and communion with God. This is the essential distinction of man from the beast, and his supremacy as the culmination of the creative process.

(3) Does the term imply man's original perfection, lost through sin? The old Protestant divines maintained that the first man was not possessed original righteousness, not only in germ but in developed form, and that this Divine image was destroyed by the Fall. Exegetically considered, this is certainly not taught by the priestly writer, who makes no mention of the Fall, assumes that the image was transmitted from father to son (cf Gen 5 1 with 5 3), and natively speaks of post-divulgin men as created in the image of God (Gen 9 6; cf 1 Cor 11 7; Jas 3 9). Theologically considered, the idea of the perfect holiness of primitive man is based on an abstract conception of God's work in creation, which precludes the idea of development, ignores the progressive method of the Divine government and the essential place of effort and growth in human character. It is more in harmony with modern conceptions (a) to regard man as originally endowed with the power of right choice, rather than with a complete character given from the first; and (b) to think of the Divine image (though seriously affected) as losing the sinful state, as man's inalienable capacity for goodness and truth as his destination. If the Divine image in man is a self-conscious, rational and ethical personality, it cannot be a merely accidental or transitory attribute, but is an essential constituent of his being.
Two features may be distinguished in the NT doctrine of the Divine image in man: (1) man's first-century characteristic (2) his second or new creation in Christ. As to (1), the NT doctrine of the OT is assumed in the NT. Paul makes a special application of it to the question of the relation of husband and wife, which is a relation of subordination on the part of the wife, based on the fact that man alone was created immediately after the Divine image (1 Cor 11:7). Thus Paul, for the special purpose of his argument, confines the meaning of the image to man's lordly authority, so that if he regards this as exhausting its significance would be quite unwarranted. Man's affinity to God is implied, though the term "image" is not used, in Paul's sermon to the Athenians (Acts 17:28 f., man the "offspring of God"). See also Jas 3:9 (it is wrong to curse men, for they are "made after the likeness of God").

(2) More characteristic of the NT is the doctrine of the new creation. (a) The redeemed man is said to be in the image of God (the Father). He is "shewn unto knowledge after the image of him that created him" (Col 3:10), i.e. of God the Creator, not here of Christ or the Logos (as some (cf. Eph 4:24, "after God"). Though there is here an evident reference to Gen 1:26 f., this does not imply that the new creation in Christ is identical with the original creation, but only that the two are analogous. To Paul, the spiritual man in Christ is on a higher level than the natural ("psychical") man as found in Adam (cf. Gen 1:26 f.), in whom the Divine image consisted (as we have seen) in potential goodness, rather than in full perfection. Redemption is infinitely more than the restoration of man's primitive state. (b) The Christian is further said to be gradually transformed into the image of the Son of God. This progressive metamorphosis involves not only moral and spiritual likeness to Christ, but also ultimately the Christian's future glory, including the glorified body, the "passing through a gradual assimilation of mind and character to an ultimate assimilation of mind and character to the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation" (Sanday and Headlam, Rom. 218; see Rom 8:29; 1 Cor 15:49; 2 Cor 3:18; and cf. Phil 3:21; 1 Jn 3:2).

II. Christ the Image of God.—In 3 important passages in EV, the term "image" defines the relation of Christ to God the Father; twice in Paul: "the light of the gospel of the glory of Christ, who is the image of God" (2 Cor 4:4); "who is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation" (Col 1:15); and once in He: "who being the effulgence of his glory, and the very image of his substance" (1:3). These statements, taken in their contexts, register the highest reach of the Christology of the Eph.

In the two Pauline passages, the word used is eikón, which was generally the LXX rendering of σημεῖον (Vulg: image); it is derived from εἰκόν, εἰκόν, εἰκά, εἰκόν, to be like; "resemble," and means that which resembles an object and represents it, as a copy represents the original. In He 1:3 the word used is χαράκτηρ (charakter), which is found here only in the NT, and is tr in Vulg figura, AV "express image," RV "a representation," from χαράκτω (charaktō), "to engrave," and has passed through the following meanings: (1) an engraving instrument (active sense); (2) the engraved stamp or mark on the instrument (passive sense); (3) the mark put on wax or other object; (4) hence, generally, the exact image or expression of any person or thing as corresponding to the original, the distinguishing feature, or traits by which a person or thing is known (hence Eng. words "character." The same word occurs in the same meaning as eikón; but Westcott distinguishes them by saying that the latter "gives a complete representation, under conditions of earth, of that which it figures," while charakter conveys representative traits only (Westcott on He 1:3).

The idea here expressed is closely akin to that of the Logos doctrine in Jn (1:1–18). Like the Logos, the Image in Paul and in He is the Son of God, and is the agent of creation so applied as the medium of revelation. To Christ: "What a word (logos) is to the ear, namely a revelation of what is within, an image is to the eye; and thus in the expression there is only a translation, as it were, of the same fact from one sense to another" (Dorner, System of Ch. D., ET, III, 178). An Image, Christ is the visible representation and manifestation of the invisible God, the objective expression of the Divine nature, the face of God turned as it were toward the world, the exact likeness of the Father in all things except being the Father. Thus we receive "the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ" (2 Cor 4:6). He is the facsimile of God.

Is Christ described as the Image of God in His preincarnate, His incarnate, or else His exalted state? It is best to say that different State Does It Refer? No, if we take the whole trend of NT to the Son, Christ is essentially and, in every state, the Image of God. (a) In He 1:3 the reference seems to be to the eternal, preincarnate Son, who is inherently and essentially the expression of the Divine substance. So Paul deliberately transformed the form of God (οὐ φωτιζόμενος εἰκόνα υπάρχουσαν, en morphē theou huparchōn, Phil 2:6). (b) In Jn 1:18; 12:45; 14:9, though the term image is not used, we have the idea of the historical Jesus as a perfect revelation of the character and glory of God. (c) In the two Pauline passages (2 Cor 4:4; Col 1:15), the reference is probably to the glorified, exalted Christ; not to His preexistent Divine nature, nor to His temporal manifestation, but to His "whole self, in the divine-human, in the heavenly existence" (Meyer). These passages in their cumulative impressions convey the idea that the Image is an inalienable property of His personality, not to be limited to any stage of His existence. Does this involve identity of essence of Father and Son, as in the Homousion formula of the Nicene Creed? Not necessarily, for man bears the image of God, even in logical his sinful state (see I above), a fact which the Arians sought to turn to their advantage. Yet in the light of the context, we must affirm of Christ an absolutely unique kinship with God. In the Col passage, not only are vast cosmic and redemptive functions assigned to Him, but there is said to dwell in Him "all the fulness of the Godhead bodily" (1:19; 2:9).

In He not only is the Son the final revelation of God to men, the upholder of the universe, and the very image of the Divine nature, but also the effulgence άμμοπάσμα) of God's glory, and therefore of one nature, RV "Son of God," AV "the seed of the woman," "the seed of the woman." The superiority of the Son is not thus merely one function of but nature. On the other hand, the figure of the "image" certainly guards against any Sabellian identification of Father and Son, but it suggests that there are modes of the one Person; for we cannot identify the pattern with its copy, nor speak of anyone as an image of himself. And, finally, we must not overlook the affinity of the Logos with man; both are the image of God, though the former in a unique sense. The Logos is at once the prototype of humanity within the Godhead, and the immanent Divine principle within humanity.

Both in Paul and in He we have an echo of the Jewish doctrine of Wisdom, and of Philo's doctrine of the Logos. In the Alexandrine Book of Wisdom, written probably under Stoic influence, Divine Wisdom is pictorially represented as "an effulgence (apausharal) or radiant light, and an unspotted mirror of the working of God, and an image (eikon) of His goodness" (T. 26). Philo repeatedly calls the Logos or Divine world-principle the image (eikon, charakter) of God, and also describes it as an effulgence of God. But this use of current Alexandrian terminology and the superficial resemblance of ideas are no proof of conscious borrowing on the part of the apostles. There is this fundamental distinction, that Philo's Logos is not a self-conscious personality, still less a historical individual, but an abstract idea; whereas in Paul and He, as in John, the Divine archetype is actually realized in a historical person, Jesus Christ, the Son and Revealer of God.

IMAGERY, im'j-rî (יוֹסֵפָה, maskith, "carved figure"): Only in Ezek 12, "every man in his chambers of imagery," i.e. dark chambers on whose walls were pictures in relief portraying all kinds of reptiles and vermin, worshipped by elders of Israel. Some maintain that the cult was of foreign origin, either Egypt (Bithrothai, Comm. on Ezek), or Bab (Redpath, Lost Temples of Bab); others that it was the revival of ancient superstitions of a totemistic kind which had survived in obscure circles in Israel (W. R. Smith, Lectures on the Religion of the Semites, rev. ed. 357). The word here rendered "imagery" is elsewhere in AV the "image" (of stone) (Lev 26 1, RV "figured stone"), "pictures" (Nu 33 52, RV "figured stones"), Prov 25 11, RV "network"); twice it means imagination, conceit, i.e. a mental picture (Ps 78 20; Prov 18 11). "Imagery" becomes ours in Art (88 13 57 AV, isis hortophoros, isis hortophoros, RV "to preserve likeness in his portraiture").

LITERATURE

Images, as used here, are visible representations of supposedly supernatural or divine beings or powers. They may be (1) themselves objects of worship, (2) pictures, emblems or dwelling-places (temple, ark, pillar, priests) of deities worshipped, (3) empowered instruments (amulets, charms, etc.) of objects worshipped, (4) pictures or symbols of deities revered though not worshipped. These images may be shapeless blocks, or symmetrically carved figures, or objects of Nature, such as animals, sun, moon, stars, etc.

These visible objects may sometimes be considered, esp. by the uninstructed, as deities, while by others in the small community they are thought of as instruments or symbolizations of deity. Even when they are thought of as deities, this does not exclude a sense and apprehension of a spiritual godhead, since visible corporeal beings may have invisible souls and spiritual attributes, and even the stars may be thought of as "seats of celestial spirits." An idol is usually considered as either the deity itself or his permanent tenement; a fetish is an object which has been given a magical or divine value either because of its having been the temporary home of the deity, or because it has been formed or handled or otherwise spiritually influenced by such deity. The idol is generally communal, the fetish private; the idol is protective, the fetish is usually not for the common good. (See Jevons, Idea of God in Early Religions, 1910.) Relics and symbolic figures do not become "images" in the objectionable sense until reverence changes to worship. Until comparatively recent times the Hebrews seem to have offered no religious object to "artistic" images, as is proved not only from the description of Solomon's temple, but also from the discoveries of the highly decorated temple of Jah at Syene dating from the 6th century B.C. from ruins of synagogues dating from the pre-Christian and early Christian periods (PEP, January, 1908; Expos, December, 1907; Expos T, January and February, 1908). The Second Commandment was not an attack upon artistry but upon idolaters. Decoration by means of grave images was not anciently condemned, though, as Jos shows, by the time of the Seleucidae all plastic art was regarded with suspicion. The brazen serpent was probably destroyed at Jericho's fall, but it had ceased to be an ancient artistic relic and had become an object of worship (see below). So the destruction of the ark and altar and temple, which for so long a time had been the means of holy worship, became at last, a prophetic hope (Lea 6 7; Jer 3 6; Am 5 25; Hos 6 6; cf Zec 14 20). While the temple was not naturally thought of as an "image," it was as truly so as any Bethel. An idol was the temple in miniature—a dwelling-place of the god. Touchstone of its age was the temple, and any image of the room of the deity or a means by which a false god was worshipped, it became antagonistic to the First and Second Commandments respectively.

The learned author of the art. on "Image Worship" in the EB (11th ed) dispenses too easily of this question when he suggests that Image-worship is "a continuance by adults of their childish games with dolls... Idolatrous cults reappear largely on make-believe."

and naturally accompanies the organic unfold-ment of the human animal in his struggle toward self-expression. This is not therefore acknowledged to be true of religious feeling and instinct (see esp. Rudolf Eucken, Christianity and the New Idealism, 1909, ch 1; I. King, The Development of Religion, 1910); it ought to be counted equally true of religious expression. Neither can the origin of image-worship or even of magical rites be fully explained, as Fraser thinks, by the ordinary laws of association. These associations only become significant because the devoted worshipper already has a body of beliefs similar to that of Babylonia. Generalizations which make him attentive to the associations which seem to him religiously or magically important.
(Jastrow, Aspects of Rel. Belief and Practice in Babylonia and Assyria; cf James H. Leuba, Psychological Origin and Nature of Religion, 1909; Study of Religions, 1911). So animism must be regarded as a philosophy rather than as an original religion, since it is based on an "explanation of phenomena rather than an attitude of mind basically toward the cause of these phenomena" (EB, 11th ed.
art, "Animism," and of Hoffding, Philosophy of Religion, 1906, 138). In whatever ways the various image-worshipping cults arose historically—whether from a primitive demonology or from the apotheosis of natural objects, or from symbolic, or from tal-cults—certainly with effect in any case it had some human need behind it and human nature beneath it. The presence of the image testifies to faith in the supernatural being represented by the image and the wish to keep it close to worship.

The first man was not born with a totem-pole in his list, nor did the earliest historic men possess images. They lacked temples and altars and ephods and idols, as they lacked the fire-stick and potter's wheel. Religion, which showed itself earlier than Tyler and all the older scientific anthropologists supposed. Those earlier investigators were without extended chronological data, and although ingenuity was exercised in systematizing the beliefs and customs of modern savages, it was necessarily impossible to always to determine in this way which were the most primitive cults. Excavations in Babylonia, Egypt and elsewhere have enabled us for the first time to trace with some chronological certainty the religious expressions of earliest historic man. That primitive man was so stupid that he could not tell the difference between men and things, and that therefore totemism or fetishism or a low form of animism was necessarily the first expression of religious thought is a theory which can not longer be held the face of the new and striking knowledge, material and religious, which is now seen to be incorporated in some of the most ancient myths of mankind.
(See e.g. Winckler, Die jungste Kämpfe unter den Sumerern, 1907; Robert Hay, "The relation of the Deities to the Sun, Moon, Stars, and other forces of Nature. Out of these conceptions and the mystery of life—which seems to have affected early mankind even more powerfully than ourselves—Gardiner, The Gods of Egypt, 1923.) The sun appears as divine and the moon as "the bull among the stars," and rough figures of the gods were carved in human or animal form, or these are represented pictorially by diadems or horns or ostrich feathers, as far back as the II! Dynasty, while even earlier than this staves and pillars and heaps of stones are sacred. (See further, HDB, 5th vol, 176 ff; Erman, A Handbook of Egypt Rel.; Steindorf, Rel. of the Ancient Egyptians, 1905.) These rude and unshaped objects do not testify, as was once supposed, to a lower form of religious development than when sculptured images are found. The shapeless fetish, which not long ago was generally accepted as the earliest form of image, really represents a more advanced stage and as such is a sacrifice of religious expression than the worship of a beau-fully or horribly carved image. It has been generally conceded since the days of Robertson Smith that it takes at least as much imagination and reflection to see an object of no religious im-mence as in the carved forms. Rude objects untouched by human hand, even in the most fully developed worships, have been most prized. The earliest images were probably natural objects which, because of their peculiar shape, suggested the thought of either as divine or as made sacred by the touch of deity. Multiplied copies of these objects would naturally be made when worshippers increased or migrations occurred. While images may have been in use in the most early cults, yet the highest development of image-worship has occurred among the most civilized peoples. Both deities and idols are less numerous in the early than in the later days of a religion. This is true in India, Assyria, Phoenicia, and Egypt of bureau and the Semites, whose gods were Schumer the ancient block. These, as the fetish, were probably adored, not for themselves, but for the spirit that was supposed to be in them or to have touched them. Deities and idols are multiplied easily, not only by philological, geographical and social causes, but through inter-tribal and international associations. One thing absolutely proved by recent excavations has been the to which the representations of local deities have been modified by the symbolic art of surrounding nations. Babylonia, for example, was influenced by the Syro-Hittite religious art at least as much as by that of Egypt (William Hayes
Ward, Cylinder Seals and Other Ancient Oriental Seals, 1909; Clay, Assyr. 1910). Even in adjacent localities the same deity varied greatly in its pictorial representation. See Palestine Exploration, and Revue biblique, XIV, 315-48. With the possible exception of one reign in Egypt, during which the sun disc was worshipped without the worshiped excepting the sun disc and himself,
"illegality outside of the Heb kingdom was never made stinate. Theodosius (302 AD) not only placed sacrifices and divination among the capital crimes, but placed a penalty upon anyone who entered a heathen temple.

The dignity of the image in common thought in Bible times may be seen from the fact that man is said to have been made in God's image (Gen 1:26, qal lem; cf 1 S 22 5; Nu 33 92), and Christ is said to be "the image of the invisible God" (eikon elohim of Col 1 15 with Rom 1 23). The study of the sun and stars and idols as being images of the gods, while the Hebrews, though Jeh's temple was imageless, thought of normal humanity as in some true sense possessing a sacred resemblance to Deity, though early Christians taught that only Christ was the Father's "image" in unique and absolute perfection. See IMAGE. The ordinary words for "image" by a slight change came to mean vermin, carrion, false gods, no gods, carcasses, dung, etc. Heathen gods were undoubtedly accounted real beings by the early Hebrews, and the images of these enemies of Jeh were doubtless looked upon as possessing an evil associated (?) power. In the earlier OT era, images, idols, and false gods are synonymous; but as early as the 8th cent. BC Heb prophets begin to reach the lofty conception that heathen gods are non-existent, or at least practically so, when compared with the ever-living Jeh, while the idols are "worthless things" or "non-entities" (Isa 2 8, 18; 10 11; 19 1; 31 7; cf Jer 14 14; Ezek 30 13; note the satiric term "el'lim, as contrasted with the powerful elohim). The many ordinary terms used by the Hebrews for an idol or image mean "copy," simulacrum, "likeness," "representation." These are often, however, so compounded as technically to express a particular form, as "graven" or "carved" image (e.g. Ex 20 4; 2 Ch 33 7) of wood or stone, i.e. one cut into shape by a tool; "molten image" (e.g. Ex 32 4; Lev 19 4), i.e. one cast out of melted metal (standing image) (Lev 26 1 AV, and see below), etc. However, a few of the OT terms and modes of speech of the Egyptian language, such as that of the names of the Egyptian gods and goddesses, are entirely cult technical meaning, or have been given a new interest by new discoveries, and such deserve a more extended notice.

םַפָּרָה, mazacehah: These were upright stone pillars, often mentioned in the OT, sometimes as obelisks (Bible word). They were well dressed (Beil 38 9) and were called "the pillars of righteousness" by the poet (Isa 1 26). The reverence for these stones is closely connected with that found among all Sem peoples for obelisks (Gen 33 20; 35 7), cairns (Gen 28 18; Josh 4 6), and circles (Josh 3 9 20). Rough stone pillars from time immemorial were used in Sem society. The Heb copy this custom, as in Heb. 2 15. They were thought of as primitively as dwelling-places of deity, and the stones and the spots where they stood were therefore accounted sacred. From very early times the mystery of life pressed itself upon human attention, and these stones were viewed as phallic images. These images were at first rough and undifferentiated, but became later well defined as male organs. At Tell Zakariyeh the end of one is sculptured to represent a human face. Some sort of phallic worship still early Sem society, the form of which is determined by the attention paid to the date palm, to the breeding of flocks, to astrology, and to social life. This phallicism did not always represent coarse thought, but sometimes a very profound spiritual conception; of Golden calf, and note Wiedemann's statement in HDB, V 180 that in Egypt the gods Hel, "Taste," and Sa, "Perception," were created from the blood of the sun-god's phallus. These images of fertility and reproduction were naturally connected in Canaan with the worship of the Baals or 'lords' of each locality, upon whose favor as possessors of the land fertility depended. They were also naturally associated with the cult of Astarte, the female counterpart of all the Baals (see Astarte). In the OT the Baalim and Asherim are almost invariably associated together, although the latter were used as symbols dedicated to a particular goddess, while "Baal" was merely a title which could be given to any male Sem deity, and sometimes even to his female associate. The mazacebthah were set up in a high place (q.v.), attracting many of its "elevation, isolation, mystery" (Vincent).

Originally these pillars were not considered as idols, but were naturally erected to Jeh (Gen 28 18; 31 45; 35 14; Ex 24 4), and even Isaiah (19 19) and Hosea (3 4) approve them, though pillars dedicated to idols must of course be destroyed (Ex 23 14; 34 13; Jer 43 13; Ezek 26 11). Only in later times or by very far-sighted law-givers were the mazacebthah erected to Jeh condemned; but after the centralization of the Jeh-worship the pillars were condemned, even when set up in the name of Jeh, and the older places of worship with their indiscriminate rituals and necessary heathen affiliations were also wisely discarded (Lev 26; 1 Pt 16 22); see also Golden images, Astarte.

יאשה, 'asherah: Perhaps a goddess (see Ashtaroth), but as ordinarily used in the OT, a sacred tree or stump of a tree planted in the earth (Dt 16 21) or a pole made of wood and set up near the altar (Jer 6 20; 1 K 16 33; Isa 17 8).

It has been supposed that these were fertility symbols of a goddess Asherah or Ashoreth (Ishun, Baalgame), and they were certainly in primitive thought connected with the tree cult and the sacred groves in the universe honored by the Semites (see esp. W. R. Smith, Religion of the Semites, 159; cf. Stade, Geschichts, 160 H; Fraser, Golden Bough, II, 56 117; John O'Neill, Night of the Gods, II, 37); but the tree of life is clearly connected in texts and pictures with the human organ of generation, and there can be no doubt that there is a phallic meaning in the image of the pole, as well as the mazacebthah described above. See references in HDB under "Ascharah," and of Transactions of the Victoria Institute, XXXIX, 4, p. 287, 62 11 "mazacebthah," and schrifstiches Textbuch zum AT. As these wooden posts from earliest times represented the god of fertility and were connected with the mystery of life, they may have become the signs and symbols in many lands of the local gods and gods-ideals of deity.

Astarte was by far the most popular deity of ancient Ph. See Ashtaroth. The sacred grove or tree grew from the 12th to the 9th cent. BC, as found at Gezer, have large hips, disclosing an exaggerated idea of fecundity. In close connection with the Astarte sanctuaries in Ph were found numberless bodies of little children, none over a week old, undoubtedly representing the sacrifice of the firstborn by these Canaanites (II, 3, Macalister, Excavation of Gezer, 3 vols). These Astarte were erected at the most sacred Heb sanctuaries, as Samaria (2 K 17 12), Bethel (2 K 23 15), and even in the Temple of Jerus (1 K 14 23). The crowning act of King Josiah's reformation was to break down these images and the astrological symbol of Baal was the sun, Astarte is often thought of as the moon-goddess, but her symbol was really Venus. She was, however, sometimes called Queen of Heaven" (Jer 7 18; 44 17; 19; but see ZATW, VI, 123 30).

חֹםָנָם, hamman, AV "images," "idols"; RV "sun-images" (Lev 26 30; 2 Ch 14 5; 34 4; Isa 17 8; 27 9; Ezek 6 4 6). This worship may originally have come from Babylonia, but the reverence of the sun under the name Baal-hamman had long been common in Ashur, Babylon and the Israelites entered the country. These sun-images were probably obelisks or pillars connected with the worship of some local Baal. The chariot and horses of the sun, mentioned (2 K 23 11) as having an honored place at the western entrance of the Jerusalem Temple, represented not a local but a foreign cult. In Bab temples, sacrifices were made to the sun-god, who had a special significance in time of war (Pinches, HDB, IV, 629; see also Chariots of the Sun).

(1) Golden Calf and Jeroboam’s Calves (see Golden Calf).

(2) Brazen Serpent (Nu 21:4-9; 2 K 6:18).

—The serpent, because of its strange, lightning-like power of poison—References on their attack, its power to shed its skin, and to paralyze its prey, has been a universal symbol of evil. Living serpents were kept in Bab temples. So the cobra was the guardian of royalty in Egypt, symbolizing the kingly power of life and death. In mythology, the serpent was not always considered a bad demon, enemy of the Creator, but often appears as the emblem of wisdom, esp., in connection with health-giving and life-giving gods, such as Ea, savior of mankind from the flood, and special “god of the physicians” in Babylon; Thoth, the god of wisdom in Egypt, who healed the eye of Horus and brought Osiris to life again; Apollo, the embodiment of physical perfection, and his son, Asclepius, most famous giver of physical and moral health and cure of disease among the Greeks. Among the Hebrews also a (7000-1000 BC) shows a worshipper before a serpentine serpent raised on a pole (Wm. Hayes Ward).

In Phoen mythology the serpent is also connected with wisdom and long life, and it is found on the oldest Heb seals and on late Jewish talismans (Rev 18:1-3, 8), July, 1908, 382-94; at Gezer, in Ph, a small “brazen serpent” (a cobra) was found in the “cave of oracles,” and in early Christian art Jesus the Lord of Life is often represented standing triumphantly upon the serpent or holding it in his hand. In the Heb narrative found in Nu 21, the serpent evidently appears as a well-known symbol representing the Divine ability to cure disease, being erected before the eyes of the Israelites to encourage faith and stop the plague. It was not a totem, for the totem belongs to a single family and is never set up for the veneration of other families (Ramsay, Cities of St. Paul, 39).

Hezekiah destroyed it because it was receiving idolatrous worship (2 K 18:4), though there is no hint that such worship was ever a part of the official temple cult (Benzinger); if for this had been done, the earlier prophets could hardly have remained silent. The above explanation seems preferable to the one formerly offered that the serpent was merely a copy of the disease-bearer, as the images offered by the Philis were copies of the ulcers that plagued them (1 S 6:4). See further Neushwan.

(3) Teraphim (תָּרָפִים, trāphim).—These are usually considered household gods, but this does not necessarily include the idea that they were images of ancestors, though this is not improbable (Nowack, Hebrew Archaeology, II, 23; HDB, II, 190); that they were images of Jeh is a baseless supposition (see Kautzsch, HDB, V, 643). Sometimes they appear in the house (1 S 19:13-16); sometimes in sanctuaries (Jgs 17:5; 18:14); sometimes as carried by travelers and armies (Gen 31:30; Ezek 21:21). They are never directly spoken of as objects of worship (yet of Gen 31:30), but are mentioned in connection with sorcerers and on special occasions by the king (1 S 2:18; 22:18; 2 S 6:14). The ephod of the high priest was an ornamental waist coat on the front of which was fastened the holy breastplate containing the pectoral of which were the Urim and Thummim (Ex 28:30; 29:5; 39:2-5; Lev 8:28).

There are several passages, however, which have convinced many scholars that another ephod is mentioned which must be an image of Jeh (see Ephod). The chief passages relied upon are Jgs 8:26,27, where Gideon made an ephod with 1,700 shekels of gold and “set” this in Ophrah, where it became an object of worship. So in “Mace” (HDB, V. 641) concludes that this object is preserved behind the ephod, while in various places the will of Jehovah is ascertained, not by putting up the ephod, but “by bringing it near” and “bearing it” (1 S 3:3; 20:7). On the basis of these passages Kautzsch (HDB, V. 641) concludes that this object was “exclusively as an image of Jehovah.” Driver, after an examination of each text, concludes that just in one passage “ephod” is certainly an object of the gold casing of an image, and that therefore it may also be used in other passages (I. T. 1.725). It does not seem quite certain, however, that a circumstantial vestment heavily ornamented with gold might not have been “erected” in a holy place where later it might become an object of worship. If this had been an image, would Hosea have deplored its loss (Hos 3:4), and would he not have used for forbidden in some Bible passage?

The term “mace” meant primarily the garment used to clothe the Divine image, which afterwards, when its name, the image itself, is a guess unassuaged by the Scriptures quoted or. I think, by any archaeological parallel. We conclude that there is no certain evidence that this was an image of Jehovah, though the word was used ritualistically in receiving the oracles of Jehovah (cf. Exod. 13:19; Deut. 1:39; Kittel, Bibl. Wörterbuch zum hebräischen, II, 42; König, Die Hauptprobleme 59–63). See also Idolatry; Calvary, Golden.

IMAGINATION is a mental faculty by which one grasps without the physical senses, or by which one cognizes the nature of things not present to the senses. This is whether a thing is present to the senses or not, is determined by the will. The idea is, “thought” or “imagination”: “whose mind is stayed on thee” (Rv. “or imagination”); and in Ps 103:14 it is “frame” or “shārub, obstinacy, stubbornness” (Dt 31:19; Jer 3:17; 7:24; 9:14; 11:8; 13:10; 16:12; 16:13; 19:27) and in Ps 81:12 it is “lust,” “hardness or imaginations;” 3 of mahāshēbeth, “thought” or “purpose” in AV (Prov 4:18; Lam 3:60:11), once of diənəsənā, “mind,” “understanding” (Lk 1:51); 1 of i-ma'wānā, “reasoning” (2 Cor 10:5); and of dialoγīmos, “reasoning” (Rom 1:21 AV), “reasons” (Rom 1:21). RV gives “stiffness of the neck” in each instance where “shārub” is in AV “imagination” and; in Prov 6:18 AV “reasoning.” RV in Lam 3:60:11 “and reasonings” (Rom 1:21), and “imagination” for “conceit” (Prov 18:11), and for “device” (Lam 3:62).”

"Imagination" is frequent in the A. E., e.g. Ecles 18 15 (dianōsa)" (outshined, "wicked imagination") 40 2 (dialogismos, RV "expectation").

IMAGINE, i-maj'n (יָנַשְׁנָה, yēnash’, יָנְשָנָה, yənəshənā, diənəsənā, meleśa, melešēdo), "combing, "thick" (Job 6:26; Ps 10:2; 21:11 140:2; Hos 7:15; Nah 1:11; Zec 7:10; 8:17); we have also hāshāh in AV and ERV, but not in ARV, "to meditate," "mutter," "speak" (Ps 2:1; 30:12); zōnām, "to devise" (Gen. 20:11, AV); yāḥēdāh, "to gravi," "to break in, upon;" "attack unjustly" (Ps 62:3 AV); meleśāh, "to meditate" (Acts 4:25). IMMACULAE, i-mal-kwē (יִמְלָכָה, i'mal'kāh, i'mal'kōh; AV Simaluce): An Arabian prince to whom his young son Antiochus. Tryphon, who had formerly been on the side of Alexander, persuaded Immacule to set up the young Antiochus (Antiochus VI) against Demetrius, who had incurred the enmity of his men of war (1 Macc 11:39,40). Antiochus confirmed Jonathan in the high-priesthood and appointed him to be one of the king’s friends (ver. 57). In Jos (And, XV, 1) the name is given as Malchus.

IMMACULATE CONCEPTION, i-mak'-lāt kon-sep'shən, THE: The historic designation of the Roman Catholic dogma promulgated by Pope Pius IX on December 8, 1854, in the Papal Bull entitled "Ineffabilis Deus." The term is often incorrectly applied, even by those whose intelligence should make such an error impossible, to the Virgin Birth of Christ (q.v.).

The central affirmation of this proclamation, which was read in St. Peter's in the presence of over two hundred bishops, is expressed in the following words: It is proclaimed "by the authority of Our Lord Jesus Christ and the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul and in our own authority, that the doctrine which holds the blessed Virgin Mary to have been, from the first instant of her conception, by a certain, and grace and privilege of Almighty God, in view of the merits of the Saviour of Mankind, preserved free from all stain of original sin, was revealed by God, and is, therefore, to be firmly and constantly believed by all the faithful" (see Schaff, A History of the Creeds of Christendom, (1879; New York, 1886).)

(1) Drawn from specifically Protestant principles. —Objections to the dogma are mainly two: (a) the claim to authority upon which the proclamation rests. There is every reason to believe that one of the major motives to the entire transaction was the wish, on the part of Pius and his advisers, to make an unmistakable assertion of absolute doctrinal authority by the Roman pontiff. (b) To Protestants and to Catholics in addition to the words “by the authority of Our Lord Jesus Christ and the blessed Apostles Peter and Paul.” (b) The tendency to Mariolatry in the entire movement. As we shall see, the adoration of divine honors to Mary is avoided in the public statement of the dogma and in the defence of it by Roman Catholic writers; but one has but to survey the course of discussion leading up to the publication of 1854, and subsequent to it, to discover a growing tendency to lift Mary out of the realm of human beings and to endow her with Divine attributes and functions. An extended discussion of Mariolatry lies beyond the range of this art. (see Mary): it is only necessary to point out the obvious connections (see Roman Catholic Dictionary and church histories, sub loc.)

(2) Drawn from Roman Catholic principles. —It is far from the truth to suppose that there are no objections to this modern dogma save those which are specifically Protestant. From the viewpoint of the devout Roman Catholic, and for the sake of the prestige of the papacy, this particular dogma seems to have been unfortunately chosen.

(a) It has no basis in Scripture. The only attempt made to provide a Scriptural argument is
by using a vague and unsatisfactory | between Mary and Eve before the Fall, to be found in the writings of certain church Fathers who did not hold the papal dogma but unconsiously provided a slender and most insecure basis for it (see Infra). Most Roman Catholic writers are intelligent enough to admit that the theory of inspired tradition alone can be appealed to in support of the idea. The ordinary and only tenable argument is that the ecclesiastical promulgation and acceptance of the doctrine prove its apostolic origin (see Catholic Dictionary, sub loc.). (6) It weakens the authority of the church. It would almost seem as if the doctrines of ecclesiastical authority and particularly of papal infallibility had, in this unfortunate proclamation, reached a reducito ad absurdum for the comfort of their foes. Notice with care the historical standing of this dogma: (a) The acknowledged absence of all positive evidence for apostolic origin and primitive authority (see Catholic Dictionary ut supra). (b) The abundant positive evidence that the principal Fathers of the early church did not believe in the sinlessness of Mary (see list of names and references given by H. C. Sheldon, History of the Christian Church, sub loc.). (c) The uncertain and equivocal testimony per contra drawn from the early Fathers. Thus, for example, Ephrem Syrus (Carmina, Hymn 27, strophe 8), where he says "Truly it is Thou and Thy mother only who are fair altogether. For in Thee there is no stain and in Thy mother no spot," St. Augustine (De gratia et graato, cap. 42): "Two were made simple, innocent, perfectly like each other, Mary and Eve," etc. To these may be added the words of Irenaeus: "The knot of Eve's disobedience was united by Mary's obedience" (Catholic Dictionary, 429). If this is true, it may reasonably be contended that even if these statements necessarily implied the Immaculate Conception of Mary, which they certainly do not, they would still have to be estimated against the many weighty statements which may be brought forward on the other side. (3) The prolonged controversy over the doctrine. From the earliest time when the idea of Mary's miraculous freedom from sin appears, up to the Old Catholic agreement of 1874, devoutful Roman Catholics have been tested against the addition of this unscriptural dogma to the faith of the church. Bonaventura (Locus Theol., VII, 1) says: "All the saints who have made mention of this matter, with one mouth have asserted that the blessed Virgin never sinned originally." With the statement of the Old Catholic agreement we may safely sum up the ecclesiastical situation, even from the viewpoint of those who hold to the doctrinal validity of tradition. Art. X reads: "We reject the New Rom doctrine of the Immaculate Conception of the Blessed Virgin Mary, as being contrary to the tradition of the first 13 centuries, according to which Christ alone is conceived without sin." (3) Drawn from general considerations of Christian doctrine. The most serious objections to this offensive and gratuitous dogma are not at all specifically Protestant but, rather, broadly Christian. It is necessary at this point to assure ourselves that we understand (as many Protestants evidently do not) just what is meant by the doctrine as a doctrine. According to the accepted Roman Catholic explanation, Mary, at the supposed stage of her conception when the soul was actually infused into the body waiting for it, received the special grace virtually equivalent to the death from all stain of original sin. The point which Protestants need esp. to note is that, according to Roman Catholic ideas, this gracious act of God was performed on the basis of the foreseen merits of Christ's sacrifice. This tones down the offensiveness of the doctrine in that it does not per se imply the equality of Mary with Christ, but rather the contrary, in so far as the grace bestowed upon her was gained by anticipation from Him. Roman Catholic writers naturally emphasize this fact in recommending the doctrine to Protestant minds. None the less the offence remains. The "Immaculate Conception" necessarily implies the "immaculate life," and on the same basis of supernatural grace, else would the special miracle have occurred in vain and the fall of Adam been repeated in Mary. Hence, a full account of the doctrine would be that Mary was completely and miraculously redeemed at her conception and completely and miraculously kept from sin throughout her whole life. Apart from all questions as to the rightful place of Mary in Christian thought, this idea involves utter doctrinal confusion. It means that Mary never became a true human being and never lived a true human life. Redemption by a miraculous process began at conception and carried on throughout the life is an utter impossibility.\footnote{The Holy Spirit does not work imperfectly, and miraculous holiness which is holiness of a purely Divine character, without a free, cooperating human factor, is not human holiness at all. Her dogma teaches Mary out of the human family, reduces her to an image of Christ and makes her life a phantasm. Moreover, the parallels which are adduced in its support are not true parallels at all.} Our Lord's sinlessness was not mechanically guaranteed by His miraculous conception (see Virgin Birth) but was His own achievement through the Holy Spirit granted to Him and personally appropriated. The Hallowing of Children by the Roman Catholic Church is the sanctifying of those "separated from the womb" (Gal 1 15) to God's service, does not imply the miraculous guarantee of artificial sinlessness, but such a gracious influence as enables the subject freely cooperating to obtain victory over sin by controlling principle. Actual sin and need of forgiveness is not praetermitted by such special grace.

We can only say, in conclusion, that every reason, which usually operates in a Christian mind to insure obedience to a belief, has been removed. The possibility of accepting this peculiar dogma which is Scriptureless baseless, historically unjustified and doctrinally unsound.

LITERATURE.—The best simple and reasonably fair-minded discussion of the question is found in the Catholic Dictionary already mentioned. The most searching criticism is found. IMMANUEL, i-man' u-el (Gr. Ἰμμανήλ, immanēl), "immanently.

The name occurs but 3 times, twice in the OT (Isa 7 14; 8 8), and once in the NT (Mt 1 23). It is a Heb word signifying "God is with us." The form "Immanuel" appears in LXX (Ἐμμανουήλ, Emmanaul).

In 735 BC Ahaz was king of Judah. The kingdom of Israel was already tributary to Assyria (2 K 15 19-20). Pekah, king of Israel, a bold and ambitious usurper, rebelled against Ahaz, and formed an Ahaz alliance, the dual object of which was, first, to organize a resistance against Assyria, and second, to force Ahaz to cooperate in their designs against the common tyrant. In the event Ahaz was overthrown, and his son Pekah was set to the throne of Tabeel, a choice of their own, upon the throne of David. To this end they waged war against Judah, advancing as far as Jerus itself, but without complete success (Isa 7 1). Ahaz, a weak king, and now panic-stricken, determined to invoke the aid of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria (2 K 16.7). This he actually did at a later stage in the war (6 9; 15 29). Such a course would involve the loss of national independence and the payment of a heavy tribute. At this period of crisis, Isaiah, gathering his disciples around him (Isa 8 16), is told to deliver a message to the king. Ahaz, though making a show of resistance against the coalition, is in reality neither depending upon the help of Jeh nor upon the courage of his people. Isaiah, in an effort to calm his fears and prevent the fatal alliance with Assyria, offers him a sign. This method is specially characteristic of this prophet. Fearing to commit himself to the policy of Divine dependence, but with a pretense at religious scruples, "Neither will I tempt Jehovah," the king refuses (Isa 7 12). The prophet then chides him bitterly for his lack of faith, which, he says, not only wearies men, but God also (7 13).

He then proceeds to give him a sign from God Himself, the sign of "Immanuel" (7 14). The interpretation of this sign is not clear, even apart from its NT application to Christ. The Heb word "virgin" in EV means, more correctly, "bride," in the sense of "Engaged," therefore, of the person who is about to become a wife, or is still a young woman. Ps 68 25 EV gives "damsels."

Isaiah predicts that a young bride shall conceive and bear a son. The miracle of virgin-conception, therefore, is not implied. The opening of the definite article before "virgin" (ha-'almah) does not of itself indicate that the prophet had any particular young woman in his mind, as the Heb idiom often uses the definite Article indefinitely. The fact that two of the names in Hosea's "Virgins," or of the prophet, Hosea, similar to "Immanuel," is therefore, of the person he desired to be born to the Virgin. The hypothesis of some critics that a woman of the harem of Ahaz became the mother of Hezekiah, and that he was the Immanuel of the prophet's thought is not feasible. Hezekiah was at least 9 years of age when the prophecy was given (2 K 16.2). Immanuel, in the prophetic economy, evidently stands on the same level with Ethan-jashub (7 3) as the embodiment of a great idea, to which Isaiah again appeals in Isa 8 8 (see Isaiah, VII).

The question as to whether the sign given to Ahaz was favorable or not presents many difficulties. But was it a promise of good or a threat of disaster? 3. Was it a judgment? It is evident that the Promise or threat had first intended an omen of deliverance and blessing (7 4,7). Did the king's lack of faith alter the nature of the sign? Ver 9, "If ye will not believe," etc., implies that it might have done so. The omission of ver 16, and esp. the words "whose two kings thou abhorrest," greatly simplifies this theory, as "the land," singular, would more naturally refer to Judah than to Syria and Ephraim. The omission would then become an easily interpreted threat, referring to the overthrow of Judah rather than that of her enemies. Immanuel should eat curdled milk and honey (ver 15), devastation reducing the land from an agricultural to a pastoral one. The obscure nature of the passage as it stands suggests strongly that it has suffered from interpolation. The contrary theory that the sign was a promise and not a prediction of disaster, has much to commend it, though it necessitates greater freedom with the text. The name "Immanuel" implies the faith of the young mother of the child in the early deliverance of her country, and a rebuke to the lack of that quality in Ahaz. It is certain also that Isaiah looked for the destruction of Syria and Ephraim, and that, subsequent to the Assyrian invasion, salvation should come to Judah through the remnant that had been faithful (11 11). The fact that the prophet later gave the name of Maher-shalal-hash-baz to his new-born son, a name of good omen to his country, further strengthens the latter position. The omission of vs 15,17 would make the sign a prophecy of the failure of the coalition. It is plain, whichever theory be accepted, that something must be eliminated from the passage to insure a consistent reading.

The question now presents itself as to what was the relation of Immanuel to the Messianic prophecies. Should the emphasis be laid upon "a virgin," the son, or the name itself? For traditional interpretation the Mes- sianic sign lay in the virgin birth, but the "immanent" uncertainty of implied virginity in the Heb noun makes this interpretation improbable. The identification of the young mother as Zion personified, and of the "son" as the future generation, is suggested by Whitehouse and other scholars. But there is no evidence that the term 'almah was used at that time for personification. The third alternative makes Immanuel a Messiah in the wider use of the term, as anticipated by Isaiah and his contemporaries. There can be little doubt but that there existed in Judah the Messianic hope of a national saviour (2 S 7 12). Isaiah is expecting the arrival of one whose character and work shall entitle him to the great names of 9 6. In his it would dwell all the fulness of God. He was to be "of the stem of Jesse," the bringer of the Golden Age. The house of David is now beset by enemies, and its reigning representative is weak in faith. The prophet therefore announces the imminent coming of the deliverer. If he had intended the virgin-conception of Christ in the distant future, the sign of "Immanuel" would have possessed no immediate significance, nor would it have been an omen to Ahaz. With regard to the Messianic idea, Mic 6 5 ("until the time that she who travaileth hath brought forth") is of importance as indicating the prevalent thought of the time. Recent evidence shows that even in Babylonia and Egypt there existed expectations of a divinely born and wonderful saviour. To this prophecy the prophet probably appealed, his hearers being easily able to appreciate the force of oracular language that is to us obscure. There is much to confirm the view, therefore, that the prophecy is Messianic. The use of the word as it relates to the virgin birth of Christ and the incarnation cannot be dealt with here (see Person of Christ).

5. The Virgin. The LXX (which has parthenos, "virgin") and the Alexandrian Jews interpreted the passage as referring to the virgin birth and the Messianic ministry. This interpretation does not seem to have been sufficiently pronounced collectively, but it has occupied in Christological thought. See Virgin Birth. ARTHUR WALYN EVANS

In hardly any subject is it more necessary to be careful in the definition of terms and clear distinction of ideas, esp. where the Bib. doctrine is concerned, than in this of “immortality.” By “immortality” is not supposed to mean simply the survival of the soul, or spiritual part of man, and Distinction of the fact that death does not end all.

The soul survives. This is commonly what is meant when we speak of “a future life,” “a future state,” “a hereafter.” Not, however, to dwell on the fact that many peoples have no clear conception of an immaterial “soul” in the modern sense (the Egyptians, e.g., distinguished several parts, the Ka, the Ba, etc., which survived death; often the surviving self is simply a ghostly semblance of the earthly self, nourished with food, offerings, etc.), there is the more serious consideration that the state into which the surviving part is supposed to enter at death is anything but a state which can be described as “life,” or worthy to be dignified with the name “immortality.” It is a state peculiar to “death” (see DEATH); in most cases, shadowy, inert, feeble, dependent, joyless, a state to be shunned and abjured, not to be hoped for. If, on the other hand, as in the hope of immortality among the nobler heathen, it is conceived of, as for some, a state of happiness—the clog of the body being shaken off—this yields the idea, which has passed over into那么多 of our modern thinking of an “immortality of the soul,” of an imperishableness of the spiritual part, sometimes supposed to extend backward as well as forward; an inherent indestructibility.

It will be seen as we advance, that the Bib. view is different from all of these. The soul, indeed, survives the body; but this disembodied state is never viewed as one of complete “life.” For the Bib. “immortality” is not merely the survival of the soul, but existing in “Sheol” or “Hades.” This is not, in itself considered, “life” or happiness. The “immortality” the Bible contemplates is an immortality of the whole person—body and soul together. It implies, therefore, deliverance from the state of Sheol. It is not a condition simply of future existence, however prolonged, but a state of blessedness, due to redemption and the possession of the “eternal life” in the soul; it includes resurrection and perfected life in both soul and body. The subject will now be considered more particularly in its different aspects.

I. THE NATURAL BELIEF.

—In some sort the belief in the survival of the spirit or self at death is a practically universal phenomenon. To what is it traceable? A favorite hypothesis with anthropologists is that it is the origin in dreams or visions suggesting the continued existence of the dead (cf. H. Spencer, Eccles. Inst., chs i, xiv).

Before, however, a dream can suggest the survival of the soul, there must be the idea of the soul, and of this there seems a simpler explanation in the consciousness which even the savage possesses of something within him that thinks, feels and wills, in distinction from his bodily organs. At death this thinking, feeling, something immortal, which remains.

What more natural than to suppose that it persists in some other state apart from the body? (Cf Max Müller, Anthrop. Religion, 281.) Dreams, etc., may help this conviction, but need not create it. It is only as we assume such a deeper root for the belief that we can account for its universality and persistence. Even this, however, while an instinctive presumption, can hardly be called a proof of survival after death, and it does not yield an idea of “immortality” in any worthy sense. It is at most, as already said, a ghostly reduplication of the earthly life that is thus far reached.

(1) The soul spiritual.—The more philosophical arguments that are adduced for the soul’s immortality (or survival) are of equal weight. The argument based on the metaphysical essence of the soul (see Plato’s Phaedo) is not in these days felt to be satisfying. On the other hand, it can be maintained against the materialist on irrefragable grounds that the soul, or thinking spirit, in man is immaterial in Nature, and, where this is granted, there is, or can be, no proof that death, or physical dissolution, destroys this conscious spirit. The presumption is powerfully the other way. Cicero of old argued that death need not even be the suspension of its powers (of Tuæc. Disp. 1.20); Butler reasons the matter from analogy (Anal. 1, ch 1); modern scientists like J. S. Mill (Three Essays, 201) and Professor Huxley (Life and Letters, 1, 217 ff; of William James, Ingersoll Lecture) concede that immortality cannot be disproved. The denial one hears from various sides more frequently than formerly is therefore not warranted. Still, not to be able to say that even if the soul survives death, its new state of existence has in it anything desirable.

It was hinted that one use which the Greeks made of the metaphysical argument, was to prove the indestructibility of the soul—its immortality in the sense of having no beginning and no end. This is not the Christian doctrine. The soul has no such inherent indestructibility. It is dependent on God, as everything else is, for its continued existence. Did He withdraw His sustaining power, it would cease to exist. That it does continue to exist is not doubted, but this must be argued on other grounds.

(2) Capacities of human nature.—A much more apprehensible argument for immortality—more strictly, of a future state of existence—is drawn from the rich capacities and possibilities of human nature, for which the earthly life affords so brief and inadequate a sphere of exercise. It is the characteristic of spirit that it has in it an element of infinitude, and aspires to the infinite. The best the world can give can never satisfy it. It has in it the possibility of endless progress, and ever higher satisfaction. It was this consideration which led Leibnitz, with all his theoretical assumption of a world’s immortality a place among his “doctrinal beliefs” (see his Critique of Pure Reason, Bohn’s tr, 590–91), and moved J. S. Mill to speak of it as the only hope which gave adequate scope to the human faculties and feelings, "the loftier aspirations being no longer kept down but exalted to the larger sense of the insignificance of human life by the disheartening feeling of 'not worth while'" (Three Essays, 249). Yet when these arguments are calmly weighed, they amount to no more than a proof that man is constituted for immortality; they do not afford a guarantee that this destiny might not be forfeited, or if they yield such a guarantee for the good, they hardly do so for the wicked. The belief, in their case, must depend on other considerations.

Of the moral argument.—It is, as Kant also felt, when we enter the moral sphere that immortality, or the continued existence of the soul, becomes a practical certainty to the earnest mind. With moral personality is bound up the idea of moral law and moral responsibility; this, in turn, necessitates the thought of the world as a moral system, and of God as moral Ruler. The world, as we know it, is certainly a scene of moral administration—of probation, of discipline, of reward and penalty—but as obviously a scene of incomplete moral administration. The tangled condition of things in this life can satisfy no one's sense of justice. Goodness is left to suffer; wickedness outwardly triumphs. The evil-doer's own conscience proclaims him amenable, and points to future retribution; this is need for a final rectification of what is wrong here. But while a future state seems thus called for, this does not of itself secure eternal existence for the wicked, nor would such existence be "immortality" in the positive sense; it is the mystery of sin, the lamp of reason grows dim. For further light we must look to revelation.

II. The Biblical Doctrine—the OT.—The Biblical view of immortality starts from man's relation to God. Man, as God's creation and image, is fitted for the knowledge of God, for fellowship with God's Man. Him. This implies that man is more than an animal; that he has a life to God which transcends time. In it already lies the pledge of immortality if man is obedient.

Man's nature.—With this corresponds the account given of man's creation and original state. Man is formed of body and soul; body and soul are integral parts of his personality. He was created for life, not for mortality. The warning, "In the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die" (Gen 2 17), implies that if man continued obedient he would live. But this is an immortality of the soul only. It is a life in the body (of Gen 3 22). Its type is such cases as Enoch and Elijah (Gen 5 24; 2 K 2 11; 12; cf Ps 49 15; 73 24).

The frustration of this original destiny of man comes through sin. Sin entails death (see Death). Death in its physical aspect is a separation of soul and body—a breaking up of the unity of man's personality.

In one sense, therefore, it is the destruction of the immortality which was man's original destiny. It does not, however, imply the extinction of the soul. That survives, but not in a state that can be called "life." It passes into Sheol—the sad, gloomy abode of the dead, in which there is no joy, activity, knowledge of the affairs of earth, or (in the view of Nature) remembrance of God, or praise of His goodness (on this subject, and the Heb belief in the future state generally, see Eschatology on OT; Death). This is not "true life"—not "immortality.

It is the part of grace and redemption to restore immortality in the true sense. Had the world been left to develop in sin, no further hope could have come to it. The picture of Sheol would have become ever darker as the idea of retribution grew stronger. Immortality could never become brighter. But God's grace inter­vened: "Deliver him from going down to Sheol; give him life, that he may not see destruction." (Job 33 24). God's mercy breaks in on man's lot. He gives to man His promises; makes His covenant with man; admits man to His fellowship (Gen 3 15; 4 4; 6 24; 8 9; 12 1-3; 16, etc.). In this fellowship the soul was raised again to its true life even on earth. But this held in it also a hope for the future. The promises placed in the forefront as tokens of God's favors were indeed predominatingly temporal—promises for this life—but within these (the kernel within the shell) was the supreme possession of God Himself (Ps 4 6 f; 16 2). This held in it the hope of redemption and the principle of every good.

Deliverance from Sheol.—Here we reach the core of the OT hope of immortality. Such fellowship as the believer had with God could not be lost, even in Sheol; beyond that was deliverance from Sheol. In their highest moments it was this hope that sustained patriarchs, psalmists, prophets, in their outlook on the future. Doubt might cloud a man's consciousness of evil and despair; but it was impossible in moments of strong faith to believe that God would ever really desert them. The eternal God was their dwelling-place; beneath them were everlasting arms (Ps 90 1). The hope of immortality, therefore, was, in principle, the hope not merely of an "immortality of the soul," but likewise of resurrection—of complete deliverance from Sheol. Thus it is clearly in the impassioned outburst of Job (19 25-27; 14 13 f), and in the mouth of Psalms. The hope always clothes itself in the form of complete deliverance from Sheol. Thus in Ps 17 14 f, the wicked have their portion "in this life," but, "As for me, I shall behold thy face in righteousness; I shall be satisfied, when I awake, with thy likeness." (AV "with beholding thy form"); and in Ps 49 14 f, the wicked are "appointed as a flock for Sheol," but "God will redeem my soul from the power of Sheol; for he will receive me." (same as that of Enoch, Gen 5 24; cf Ps 73 24). It will be remembered that when Jesus expounded the declaration, "I am the God of Abraham," etc, it was as a pledge of resurrection (Mt 22 31 f). The idea comes to final expression in the declaration in Dn 12 of a resurrection of the just and unjust (12 2). For further development and illustration see Eschatology of the OT.

Later Jewish thought carried out these ideas of the OT to further issues. A blessed future for the righteous was now accepted, and was definitely connected with the idea of resurrection. The wicked remained in Sheol, now conceived of as a place of retribution. The Gentiles, too, shared this doom. See Eschatology.

III. The Christian Hope.—In full consonance with what is revealed in part in the OT is the hope of immortality discovered in the NT.

1. Immortality: The ring of this joyful hope is heard in every part of the apostolic writings through "Blessed be the God and Father of our Lord Jesus Christ," says Peter, "who according to his great mercy begat us again unto a living hope by the resurrection of Jesus Christ from the dead, unto an inheritance incorruptible, and undefiled, and that fadeth not away, reserved in heaven for you" (1 Pet 1 3 f). Paul declares, "Our Saviour Christ Jesus, who . . . brought life and immortality [incorruption] to light through the gospel" (2 Tim 1:10). In Rom 2:7 he had spoken of those who "by patience and well-doing seek for glory and honor and incorruption, eternal life." This immortality, it is seen, is part of the eternal life bestowed through Jesus on believers. It is guaranteed by Christ's own resurrection and life in glory. The nature of this hope of the gospel may now be further analyzed.

(1) Survival of the soul.—The soul survives the body. A future state for both righteous and wicked is plainly declared by Jesus Himself. "He that believeth on me," He said to Martha, "though he die, ye shall live." And what He said to Martha He believeth on me shall never die" (Jn 11:25 f.). To His disciples He said, "If I go and prepare a place for you, I come again, and will receive you unto myself; that where I am, there ye may be also" (Jn 14:3). Of His words to the penitent thief: "To-day shalt thou be with me in Paradise." (Lk 23:43). The survival of both righteous and wicked is implied in the parable of the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16:19-31). So in many other places (e.g. Mt 22:30 ff.; d. 12:28-34; Acts 2:23-24; 1 Thess 4:14-17), the teaching of the epistle. The doctrine of a future judgment depends on and presupposes this truth (Rom 2:5-11; 2 Cor 5:10, etc.).

(2) Union with Christ in a new world.—Death for the believer, though a result of sin, does not destroy the soul's relation to God and to Christ. The eternal life implanted in the soul in time blossoms in its fruition into the life and blessedness of eternity (Rom 8:10 f.; Phil 1:21; Col 1:27). The soul, in its life, is an immortal image of Christ. It "waits for our adoption, to wit, for the redemption of our body" (Rom 8:23). But its state, though incomplete, is still a happy one. Hades has lost its gloom, and is for it a "Paradise." (Lk 23:43). It dwells in a chamber in the Father's house (Jn 14:2 f.; 17:24). It is to be, even in the unclad state ("absent from the body"), "at home with the Lord" (2 Cor 5:8). It is for it an object of desire to be with Christ in that state after death (Phil 1:21). The pictures in Rev, though highly figurative, indicate a condition of great blessedness (Rev 7:9-17).

(3) The resurrection.—The fulness of the blessedness of immortality implies the resurrection. The ressurection is a cardinal article of Christ's teaching (Mt 22:20-32; Jn 5:25-29; 11:23-26). He Himself is the Lord of life, and life-giver in the resurrection (Jn 6:25.1:26; 11:25, "I am the resurrection, and the life"). The resurrection of believers is secured by His own resurrection. Jesus died; He rose again (see RESURRECTION). His resurrection carries with it the certainty of the resurrection of all His people. This is the great theme of 1 Cor 15. As Christ lives, they shall live also (Jn 14:19). The believers who are alive at His Parousia shall be changed (1 Cor 15:51; 1 Thess 4:17); those who are dead shall be raised first of all (1 Thess 4:16). The resurrection body shall be a body like Christ's own (Phil 3:21)—incorruptible, glorious, powerful, spiritual, immortal (1 Cor 15:42 f.58). This is not to be confused with sameness of material particles (vs 37 f.), yet there is the connection of a vital bond between the old body and the new. This is the hope of the believer, without which his redemption would not be complete.

(4) The wicked also raised.—The wicked also are raised, not, however, to glory, but for judgment (Jn 5:29; Acts 24:15; Rev 20:12-15). The same truth is implied in all passages on the last judgment. Excluded from the blessedness of the resurrection that is described by both Jesus and His apostles as one of uttermost tribulation and anguish (e.g. Mt 25:46; Mk 9:43-50; Rom 2:8 f.).

This is not "immortality" or "life," though the continued existence of the soul is implied in it (see PUNISHMENT, EVERLASTING; HELL, REDEMPTION).

(5) Eternal life.—The condition of the blessed in their state of immortality is one of unseparable felicity of both soul and body forever. There are, indeed, degrees of glory—this is carefully and consistently taught (Mt 25:44 ff.; Lk 19:22 ff.; 1 Cor 3:15-16; 16:14; Phil 3:10-14; 2 Tim 4:7 f; 1 Jn 2:28—but the condition as a whole is one of perfect satisfaction, holiness and blessedness (cf. Mt 13:43; 26:34; Rom 2:6; Eph 2:2 f; 1 Thess 4:16; Rev 22:3 f, etc). The blessedness of this eternal state includes such elements as the following: (1) restoration to God's image and likeness to Christ (1 Cor 15:49; 2 Cor 5:18; Eph 4:22; Col 3:10; 1 Jn 3:2); (2) perfect holiness in the possession of God's Spirit (2 Cor 7:1; Phil 1:6; Rev 21:27; 22:4); (3) the unveiled vision of God's glory (Rev 22:4; cf Ps 17:15); (4) freedom from all sorrow, pain and death (Rev 21:3 f); (5) power of unreserved service (Rev 22:3).

The contrast between the Bible's teaching of immortality and that of heathenism and of the schools will now be obvious. It is not mere

2. Contrast's future existence; not a bare, abstract immortality of the soul; it is the result of redemption. Though it is a result of the resurrection which embraces the whole personality, soul and body; it is not shared by the unholy; it includes the perfection of rational, moral and spiritual blessedness, in an environment suitable to such glorified existence. As such it is the supreme hope in which every believer is called to strive (Phil 3:13 f).

IMMUTABILITY. in-mu'ta-b'l. IMMUTABLE, i-mu'ta-b'l (μορμάδειος, amóthádeis): Occurs in Heb 6:17.18 of the unchangeableness of the Divine counsel. It is the perfection of Jehovah that He changes not in character, will, purpose, aim (Mal 3:6; so of Christ, He 13:8). See FAITHFULNESS; UNCHANGEABLE.

IMNA, i-m'na (יִמָּה, yímná): A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7:35).

IMNAH, i-m'nah (יִמָּה, yímnáh):

1. Eldest son of Asher (Gen 46:17, AV "Jimnah"); Nu 26:44, AV "Jimná"; 1 Ch 7:30).

2. A Levite of Hezekiah's time (2 Ch 31:14).

IMNITES, im'ni'tas (יִמָּה, yímná): Descendants of Imnah (q.v. [1]) (Nu 26:44, AV "Jimmates").

IMPART, im-pârt' (metadíkonta, metadíkonti, "to share");"They... imparted [AV "added"] nothing to me" (Gal 2:6); that is, did not propose any correction or addition to my teaching. "That I may impart unto you some spiritual gift" (Rom 1:11) expresses the apostle's hope that the Rom believers may increase in faith and love through his teaching and influence.

"To impart unto you... our own soul" (1 Thess 2:8) meant to spend their utmost strength and to expose their lives in their service.

IMPEDEMENT, im-ped'i-ment: Found in Mk 7:32, "had an impediment in his speech," as a tr of μεταδίκασα, metadíkasa, comp. of μετά, metá, "toil" and δίκασα, dikas, "speech," i.e. one who speaks with difficulty. In the LXX the word is used as a tr of דָּם, dem, "dumb" (Isa 35:6).

IMPLEAD, im-pled' (Acts 19 38 AV, “Let them implead one another’): “Impled” means “to sue at law,” hence RV “Let them accuse one another.” Court days are kept, let them prosecute the suit in court and not settle matters in riot. ἐγκαλέω, ἐγκαλέων, means “to call in,” “to call to account.”

IMPORTABLE, im-pōr-ta-b'l (δουσβάστατος, doubsástatos): An obsolete word, meaning “unbearable” (Lat. im, “not,” portabilis, “bearable”) found in Pr Man, “Thine angry threatening RV [the anger of thy threatening]” toward sinners is importable”: cf. He 2 14, “laying the heavy burdens and importable”; Chaucer (“Clerk’s Tale”) C.T.), “For it were importable though they wold.”

IMPORTUNITY, im-pōr-tū-n'iti: Occurs only in Lk 11 8, where it is the rendering of ἀνάλεια (WH, ἀνάλεια, anaidela). This Gr word implies an element of impudent insistence rising to the point of shamelessness which the Eng. word “importunity” fails to express, thus weakening the argument of the parable, which is that it is by shameless insistence a favor may be won, even from one unwilling and ungracious, still more surely will God answer the earnest prayer of His people. God’s willingness to give exceeds our ability to ask. The parable teaches by way of contrast, not by parallel.

IMPOSSIBLE, im-pōs'i-ble (vb. ἀδύνατος, adynatō; adj ἀδύνατος, adynatos): “To be impossible” is the tr of adunatos, “to be powerless,” “impossible” (Mt 17 20; Lk 1 37, RV “void of power”); adunatos, “powerless,” etc. is tr impossible (Mt 19 26; Mk 10 27; Lk 18 27; He 6 4 18; 11 6; “impossible” in He 6 4 is in RV transferred to ver 6); anévdktos, “not to be received” or “accepted,” is also tr impossible (Lk 17 1). In several of these passages it is affirmed that “nothing is impossible with God,” but, of course, this means nothing that is consistent with the Divine nature, e.g. (as He 6 18) it is not possible for God to lie. So, when it is said that nothing is impossible to faith, the same limitation applies and also that of the mind or will of God for us. But much more is possible to a strong faith than a weak faith realizes, or even believes.

IMPOTENT, im-pōt'ent (ἀσθένω, asthēnō, ἀσθενός, adnatos): The vb. signifies “to be without strength” and derivatives of it are used in Jn 5 3 7 AV and Acts 4 9 to characterize the paralyzed man at Bethesda and the cripple at the Temple gate. For the same condition of the Lystra lame man the word adunatos is used, which is synonymous. In these cases it is the weakness of disease. In this sense the word is used by Shakespeare (Love’s Labor Lost, V, ii, 864; Hamlet, I, i, 29). The impotent folk referred to in the Epistle of Jeremy (Bar 6 28) were those weak and feeble from age and want of impotence and snail-paced beggary” (Richard III, IV, iii, 53).

IMPUTATION, im-pū-ta'shun: I. MEANING AND USE OF THE TERM II. THE THREEFOLD USE OF THE TERM IN THEOLOGY III. THE SCRIPTURAL BASIS OF THESE DOCTRINES

1. Imputation of Adam’s Sin to His posterity

2. Imputation of the Sins of His People to Christ

3. Imputation of the Righteousness of Christ to His People

LITERATURE

1. Meaning and Use of the Term. The word “imputation,” according to the Scriptural usage, denotes an attributing of something to a person, or a charge of something to a person, or a setting of something to one’s account. This takes place sometimes in a judicial manner, so that the thing imputed becomes a ground of reward or punishment. The word is used in AV a number of times to translate the Heb vb. ḥāshāh and the Gr vb. logizomai. These words, both of which occur frequently in Scripture, and which in a number of instances mean simply “to think,” express the above idea. That this is the case is clear also from the other Eng. words used in AV to translate these Heb and Gr words, as, for example, “to count, to reckon, to esteem.” Thus ḥāshāh is tr in AV by the vb. “to impute” (Lev 7 15; 17 4; 2 S 19 19); by the vb. “to reckon” (2 S 4 3); by “to count” as something (Lev 25 31 EV). The vb. in 1 S 22 15 is ἁκοῦμ, sim. Similarly, logizomai is tr by the vb. “to impute” (Rom 4 6.8.11.22.23.24; 2 Cor 5 19; Jas 2 20) builder (Rom 2 26; 4 3 5); “to account” (Gal 3 6); and by the vb. “to reckon” (Rom 4 4 9.10). In AV the word used to render logizomai is the vb. “to reckon.”

These synonyms of the vb. “to impute” bring out the idea of reckoning or charging to one’s account. It makes no difference, so far as the meaning of imputation is concerned, who it is that imputes, whether man (1 S 22 15) or God (Ps 32 2); it makes no difference what is imputed, whether a good deed for reward (Ps 106 301) or a bad deed for punishment (Lev 17 4); and it makes no difference whether that which is imputed is something which is personally one’s own prior to the imputation, as in the case above cited, where his own good deed was imputed to Phinehas (Ps 106 30 f), or something which is not personally one’s own prior to the imputation, as where Paul asks that a debt not personally his own be charged to him (Philem ver 18). In all these cases the act of imputation is simply the charging of one with something. It denotes just what we mean by our ordinary English verb “to charge.”

It does not change the inward state or character of the person to whom something is imputed. When, for example, we say that we impute bad motives to anyone, we do not mean that we make such a one bad; and just as in Scripture the phrase “to impute iniquity” does not mean to make one personally bad, but simply to lay iniquity to his charge. Hence when God is said “to impute sin” to anyone, the meaning is that God accounts such a one to be a sinner, and consequently guilty and liable to punishment. Similarly, the non-imputation of sin means simply not to lay it to one’s charge as a ground of punishment (Ps 32 2). In the same manner, when God is said “to impute righteousness” to a person, the meaning is that He judicially accounts such a one to be righteous and entitled to all the rewards of a righteous person (Rom 4 6.11).

II. The Threefold Use of the Term in Theology. The three acts of imputation are given special prominence in the Scripture, and are implicated in the Scriptural doctrines of Original Sin, Atonement and Justification, though not usually expressed by the words ḥāshāh and logizomai. Because, however, of its “forensic” or “judicial” meaning, and possibly through its use in the case to translate logizomai in Rom 4 8, the term “imputation” has been used in theology in a threefold sense to denote the judicial acts of God by which the guilt of Adam’s sin is imputed to his posterity; by which the sins of Christ's people are imputed to Him; and by which the righteousness of Christ is imputed to His people. The act of imputation is precisely the same in each case. It is not meant that Adam's sin was personally the sin of his descendants, but that it was treated as their sin, so that they share its guilt and penalty. It is not meant that Christ's people are made personally holy or inwardly righteous by the imputation of His righteousness to them, but that His righteousness is set to their account, so that they are entitled to all the rewards of that perfect righteousness.

These doctrines have had a place in the theology of the Christian church from the earliest Christian centuries, though the doctrine of the imputation of the righteousness of Christ was first fully and clearly stated at the time of and following the Reformation. The first two of these doctrines have been the possession of the entire Christian church, while the third one of them is affirmed by both the Reformed and Lutheran branches of Protestantism.

III. The Scriptural Basis of These Doctrines.

These three doctrines have a basis in the Scripture, and are Scriptural terms of Original Sin, Atonement, and Justification.

The doctrine of the imputation of Adam's sin to his posterity is implied in the account of the Fall in Gen 2 and 3, taken in connection with the subsequent history of the human race as recorded in Gen and in the rest of the OT. Many ancient and modern interpreters regard this Posternity narrative as an allegorical, mythical and symbolical view of the historical form, either of a psychological fact, i.e. of something which takes place in every individual, or of certain general truths concerning sin. By some exegetes, following Kant, it has been held to depict an advance of the race in culture or ethical knowledge (Reuss; against which view of Budde, Clemen); by others it has been regarded as a symbolic representation of certain truths concerning sin (Oehler, Schults); by others it has been regarded as historical (Dittrich). All these are the one which accords with the narrative itself. It is evidently intended as historical by its author, and is so regarded by the NT writers. It is, moreover, introduced to explain, not an advance of the race, but an advance of sin from the first to its manifestation in certain penal evils with sin. It does this by showing how these evils came upon Adam as a punishment for his disobedience, and the subsequent history shows that his posterity were subjected to the same evils. It is true that the threat of punishment to Adam in case of disobedience was made to him alone, and that the penalties threatened are said to have come only upon him and Eve (Gen 3 16–19). Nevertheless, it is clear from the account of the subsequent history of the race that it actually shared in the punishments inflicted upon Adam, and that this was in consequence of his sin. This implies that in Gen 2 16 f are contained the terms of a covenant in which Adam acted as the representative of the race. If, therefore, the race shares in the penalty of Adam's sin, it must also share in his guilt or the judicial obligation to suffer punishment. And this is precisely what the theology of the entire Christian church has meant by saying that the guilt of Adam's sin was imputed to his posterity. This is in accordance with God's method of dealing with men in other recorded instances (Gen 19 15; Ex 20 5; Dt 1 37; 3 26); and the assertion of the principle of personal responsibility by Ezekiel and Jeremiah against an abuse of the principle of representative responsibility implies a recognition of the latter (Ezek 18 24; 33 12; Jer 31 29).

The universality of sin and death is not brought into connection with the Fall of Adam by the other OT writers, but by Paul. In 1 Cor 15 21 f, Paul says that the death of all men has its cause in the man Adam in the same way in which the resurrection from the dead has its cause in the man Christ. The death of all men, accordingly, is not brought about by their personal sins, but has come upon all through the disobedience of Adam. Upon what ground this takes place, Paul states in the passage Rom 5 12–21. He introduces the subject of Adam's relation to the race to illustrate his doctrine of the justification of sinners on the ground of a righteousness which is not personally their own. In order to do this he takes the truth, well known to his readers, that all men are under condemnation on account of Adam's sin. The comparison is between Adam and Christ, and the specific point of the comparison is imputed sin and imputed righteousness. Hence in ver 12 Paul does not mean simply to affirm that as Adam sinned and consequently died, so men sin and die. Nor can he mean to say that just as God established a precedent in Adam's case that death should follow sin, so He acts upon this precedent in the case of all men because all sin, the real ground of the reign of death being the fact that all sin, and the formal ground being this precedent (B. Weiss); nor that men are condemned by the fact that they have sinned (Dillmann). Paul's purpose is to illustrate his doctrine of the way in which men are delivered from sin and death by the way in which they are brought into condemnation. The main thought of the passage is that, just as men are condemned on account of the imputation to them of the guilt of Adam's sin, so they are justified on account of the imputation to them of the righteousness of Christ. Paul says that it was by one man that sin and death entered into the world, viz. Adam, and that the latter ground the former, i.e. that the latter have been the imputation of the guilt of that one man's sin (vs 13,14,15). Hence there is a precise parallel between Adam and Christ. Just as men are condemned on account of Adam's disobedience, so they are justified on account of the obedience of Christ (vs 18,19). The thought of the passage is imputed sin and imputed righteousness as the ground of condemnation and of justification respectively.

That our sins are imputed to Christ is not expressly stated if the race are not regarded as a corporate body. This is, however, the teaching of the NT, and is implied in those passages which affirm that Christ 'bore our sins,' and that our iniquities were laid upon Him by Jeh. To bear iniquity or sin, though it may sometimes mean to bear it away or remove it, is an expression often applied in Scripture to persons charged with guilt and subjected to the punishment of their own sin (Lev 5 17; 7 18; 19 8; 22 9). That the Heb vb. nakan has this also indicated by its being interchanged with the vb. sabbal, which means 'to bear as a burden' and is used to denote the bearing of the punishment of sin (Isa 53 11). In the OT sacrificial system, which according to the NT is typical of the sacrifice of Christ, the imposition of hands on the head of the victim signified the substitution of it for the offender and the transfer of his guilt to it. This idea is brought out clearly in the case of the two goats on the great Day of Atonement (Lev 16). When, therefore, the prophet Is 53 is said to "bear iniquity" (ver 11), or that "the chastisement of our peace was upon him" (ver 5), or that "Jeh hath laid (lit. "caused to fall") on him the iniquity of us all" (ver 6), the idea expressed is that Christ bore the punishment of our sin vicariously, its guilt having been imputed to Him. The thought of the prophecy is, as Delitzsch says, that of vicarious punishment, which implies the idea of the imputation of the guilt of our sins to Christ.

The same idea underlies these expressions when they occur in the NT. When Peter wishes to hold up Christ as an example of patience in suffering, he takes up the thought of Isa, and adduces the fact that Christ "his own self bare our sins in his body upon the tree" (1 Pet 2 24). The context indicates that Peter had the prophecy of Is 53 in mind, so that his meaning is, not that Christ carried our sins even up to the cross, but that in His death on the cross Christ bore the punishment of our sin, its guilt having been imposed vicariously, its guilt having been imputed to Him. The thought of the prophecy is, as Delitzsch says, that of vicarious punishment, which implies the idea of the imputation of the guilt of our sins to Christ.

The same idea underlies these expressions when they occur in the OT. The thought of the prophecy is, as Delitzsch says, that of vicarious punishment, which implies the idea of the imputation of the guilt of our sins to Christ.

This idea is taken up by Paul, who makes explicit the way in which this righteousness comes to sinners, and who puts the idea of imputed righteousness at the basis of his doctrine of Justification. By the righteousness of Christ Paul means Christ's legal status, or the merit acquired by all that He did in satisfying the demands of God's law, including what has been called His active and passive obedience. Notwithstanding the fact that most of the modern expositors of Paul's doctrine have denied that he teaches the imputation of Christ's obedience, this doctrine has a basis in the apostle's teaching. Justification leads to life and final glorification (Rom 6 18; 8 30); and Paul always conveys the obtaining of life as dependent on the fulfilment of the law. If, therefore, Christ secures life for us, it can only be in accordance with this principle. Accordingly, the apostle emphasizes the element of imputation of Christ's righteousness, which places this act of obedience at the basis of the sinner's justification (Rom 5 18). He also represents the obedience of the cross as the culminating point of a life of obedience on Christ's part (Phil 2 8). Moreover, he affirms that from all the demands of the law is secured by the fact that Christ was born under law (Gal 4 4). This cannot be restricted to the fact that Christ was under the curse of the law, for He was born under law and the result of this is that we are free from all of its demands. This doctrine is also implied in the apostle's teaching that Justification is absolutely gracious, taken in connection with the fact that it leads to a complete salvation.

The importance in Paul's thought of the doctrine of the imputation of the righteousness of Christ to the believer can be seen from the fact that the question how righteousness was to be obtained occupied a central place in his religious consciousness, both before and after his conversion. His redemption by the appearance of the risen Christ determined his conception of the true way of obtaining righteousness, since the resurrection of Christ meant for Paul the condemnation of his entire past search for righteousness by works of the law.

That the imputation of the righteousness of Christ to the believer does lie at the basis of Paul's doctrine of Justification can be further seen from the fact that Justification is absolutely free and unmerited so far as the sinner is concerned (Rom 3 24; 6 15; Gal 5 4; Tit 3 7); its object being one who is ungodly (Rom 4 5); so that it is not by works (Rom 3 20; 2 16; 3 11; 5 4; Phil 3 9); and yet that it is not a mere part of sin, but is a strictly "forensic" or judicial judgment, freeing the sinner from all the claims of the law, and granting him the right to eternal life. This last truth is plain because God's retributive righteousness lies at the basis of Paul's doctrine of Justification (Rom 2); is manifested in it (Rom 3 25); because Christ's expiatory work is its ground (Rom 3 25); and because our redemption from the curse of the law rests upon Christ's having borne it for us, and our redemption from the curse of the law depends upon their fulfilment by Christ (Gal 3 13; 4 4). Hence the gracious character of Justification, according to Paul, does not consist in its being merely a gracious pardon without any judicial basis (Ritschl); or in God's acceptance of a subjective righteousness produced by Him in the sinner (Tobc); or in the acceptance of faith instead of a perfect righteousness (Cremer). The gracious character of Justification consists for Paul in the fact that the righteousness on the ground of which God justifies the ungodly is a righteousness which is graciously provided by God, and which Paul contrasts with the righteousness which comes from law works (Phil 3 9). The sinner, therefore, is pardoned and accepted as a righteous person, not on account of anything in himself, but only on account of what Christ has done for him, and which is only the clear demonstration of Christ’s suffering and obedience are imputed to the sinner as the ground of his justification.

This truth is explicitly affirmed by Paul, who speaks of God’s imputing righteousness without works, and of righteousness being imputed (Rom 4 6 11). The idea of the imputation of righteousness here is made clear by the context. The one who is declared righteous is said to be “ungodly” (4 5). Hence he is righteous only by God’s imputation of righteousness to him. This is also clear from the contrast between imputation according to grace and according to debt (4 4). He who seeks righteousness by works would be justified as a reward for his works, in antithesis to which, imputation comes to be the change one with a righteousness which he does not possess. Accordingly, at the basis of justification there is a reckoning to the sinner of an objective righteousness. This same idea is also implied and asserted by Paul in a parallel which he draws between Adam and Christ (Rom 5 15 f). The apostle says that just as men are condemned on account of a sin not their own, so they are justified on account of a righteousness which is not their own. The idea of the imputed sin and imputed righteousness is, is the precise point of the parallelism between condemnation in Adam and justification in Christ. This is also the idea which underlies the apostle’s contrast of the Old and New Covenants (2 Cor 3 9). The New Covenant is described as a “ministry of righteousness,” and contrasted with the Old Covenant which is described as a “ministry of condemnation.” If, therefore, this last expression does not denote a subjective condition of men under the old dispensation, but their relation to God in condemnation, righteousness must denote the opposite of this relation to the law, and must depend on God’s judicial acquittal. The same truth is expressed by Paul more concretely by saying that Christ has “made unto us righteousness” (Rom 3 20). Here the concrete mode of expression is chosen because Paul speaks also of Christ being our sanctification and redemption, so that an expression had to be chosen which would cover all of these ideas. One of the clearest statements concerning this objective righteousness is Phil 3 9. The apostle here affirms that the righteousness which the believer in Christ obtains is directly opposite to his own righteousness. This latter comes from works of the law, whereas the former comes from God and through faith in Christ. It is, therefore, objective to man, comes to him from God, is connected with the work of Christ, and is mediated by faith in Christ. The idea clearly stated in this last passage of a righteousness which is objective to the sinner and which comes to him from God, i.e. the idea of a new legal standing given to the believer by God, explains the meaning, in most cases, of the Pauline phrase “righteousness of God.” This phrase is used by Paul 9 t. Rom 1 17, 3 5 21, 25 f; 10 3 (twice), 4 f. 2 Cor 5 21. It expresses the Divine attribute of righteousness in Rom 3 5 25 f. The customary exegesis was to regard the other instances as denoting the righteousness of a sinner which comes to him from God, in accordance with Phil 3 9. More recently Haering, following Köhling in general, has interpreted all these instances as denoting God’s justifying action. But this interpretation is most strained in 2 Cor 5 21, where we are said to “become the righteousness of God” according to Rom 10 4, where the righteousness of God is identified with the righteousness which comes from faith, this latter being contrasted with man’s own inward righteousness. That a righteousness of man which he receives from God is here referred to, is confirmed by the fact that the reason given for the error of the Jews in seeking a righteousness from law works is the fact that the work of Christ has made an end of this method of obtaining righteousness (Rom 10 4). This righteousness, therefore, is one of which man is the possessor. The phrase, however, cannot mean a righteousness which is valid in God’s sight (Luther), although this thought is elsewhere expressed by Paul (Rom 3 20; Gal 3 11). It means a righteousness which comes from God and of which He is the author. This is not, however, by making man inwardly righteous, since all the above passages show the purely objective character of this righteousness. It is the righteousness of Phil 3 9; the righteousness which God imputes to the believer in Christ. Thus we “become the righteousness of God” in precisely the same sense in which Christ was “made to be sin” (2 Cor 5 21). Since Christ was made sin by having the guilt of our sin imputed to Him so that He bore its penalty, Paul must mean that we “become the righteousness of God” in the same objective sense through the imputation to us of the righteousness of Christ. In the same way, in Rom 10 3, the contrast between God’s righteousness and the Jew’s righteousness by works shows that in each case right standing with God comes from God by imputation. It is this same imputed righteousness which makes the gospel the power of God unto salvation (Rom 1 17), which has been revealed by the law and the prophets, which is received by faith in Christ by whose expiatory death God’s retributive righteousness has been manifested (Rom 3 21, 22, 25, 26), and which is represented by Peter as the object of Christian faith (2 Pet 1 1). It affirms that Abraham believed God and “it was imputed to him for righteousness” (Rom 4 3 AV; Gal 3 6). The old Arminian theologians, and some modern exegetes (H. Cremer) assert that Paul means that Abraham’s faith was accepted by God instead of his righteousness as the meritorious ground of his justification. This, however, cannot be the apostle’s meaning. It is diametrically opposed to the context where Paul introduces the case of Abraham for the very purpose of proving that he was justified without any merit on his part; it is opposed to Paul’s idea of the nature of faith which involves the renunciation of all claim to merit, and is a simple resting on Christ from whom all its saving efficacy is derived; and this interpretation is also contrary to Paul’s doctrine of the absolutely gracious character of Justification. The apostle in these passages wishes to illustrate from the case of Abraham the gracious character of Justification, and quotes the untechnical language of Gen 15 6. His meaning is simply that Abraham was justified as a believer in God, and not as one who sought righteousness by works. See SIN; ATONEMENT; JUSTIFICATION.

INCENSE, in'sens (בְּהֵבָן, kīṭōrāh; in Jer 44 21, בֶּשְׁאֶם, 'ṣētor; in Mal 1 11, בְּשֶׁמ, 'kōtar, "In every place incense shall be offered unto my name"; the word בְּהֵבָן, ṣbhōn, trf "incense" in several passages in Isa and Jer in AV, is properly "frankincense," and is so rendered in RV): The offering of incense, or burning of aromatic substances, is common in the religious ceremonies of nearly all nations (Egyptians, Babylonians, Assurians, Phoenicians, etc), and it is natural to find it holding a prominent place in the tabernacle and temple-worship of Israel. The newer critical theory that incense was a late importation into the religion of Israel, and that the altar of incense described in Ex 30 1 ff is a post-exilian invention, rests on pre-suppositions which are not here admitted, and is in contradiction to the express notices of the altar of incense in 1 K 6 20, 22; 7 48; 9 25; of 2 Ch 4 19 (see discussion of the subject by Delitzsch in Luthardt's Zeitsschrift, 1880, 113 ff). In the de-nunciation of Eli in 1 S 2 27 ff, the burning of incense is mentioned as one of the functions of the priesthood (ver 28). The "smoke" that filled the temple in Isaiah's vision (Isa 6 4) may be presumed to be the smoke of the incense. The word kīṭōrāh itself properly denotes "smoke." For the altar of incense see art. on that subject, and TABERNACLE AND TEMPLE. The incense used in the tabernacle service—called 'sweet incense' (kīṭōrāh ha-gammīm, Ex 26 6, etc)—was compounded according to a definite prescription of the perfumes, stacte, omyra, galbanum and pure frankincense (Ex 30 34 f), and incense not so compounded was rejected as 'strange incense' (kīṭōrāh zara'īm, 30 9). In the offering of incense, burning coals from the altar of burnt offering were borne in a censer and put upon the altar of incense (the "golden altar" before the oracle), then the fragrant incense was sprinkled on the fire (of Lk 1 91). Ample details of the rabbinical rules about incense may be seen in the art. "Incense," in DB. See CENSE.

Figuratively, incense was symbolical of ascending prayer. The multitude were praying while Zacharias offered incense (Lk 1 10, ποιημα, thulmatma), and in Rev 5 8; 8 3 f, the incense in the heavenly temple was connected and even identified (8) with "the prayers of the saints." See IMMORTALITY.

INCENT, in'sest. See CREMES.

INCONTINENCY, in-kon-ti-nen-si (ἀκαρσία, akarsia, "without control"): In 1 Cor 7 5, it evidently refers to lack of control in a particular matter, and signifies unfaithfulness. In Mt 23 25, the Gr word is τράπανες in both AV and ARV by "excess."

INCORRUPTION, in-kör-ru'pshun. See IMMORTALITY.

INCREASE, in'kres (noun), in'kres (vb): Employed in the Eng. Bible both as vb. and as noun, and in both cases to represent a number of different words in the original. As a vb. it is used in the ordinary sense of the term. As a noun it is usually used of plant life, or of the herds and flocks, to denote the fruitage or the offspring; more rarely of money, to denote the interest. As examples of the different terms trf by this word, students who read Gr may compare Dt 7 22; Prov 16 21; Job 10 16 AV; Dl 23; Nu 18 30; Dt 7 13; Ezek 22 12 in the OT, and Jn 3 30; 1 Cor 3 6; Col 2 19; Eph 4 16 in the NT.

IMRah

IMRAH, im'rah (יִמְרָה, yirmah): A descendant of Asher (1 Ch 7 36).

IMRI, im'ri (יִימְרִי, yirmi): (A) A Judahite (1 Ch 9 4). (B) Father of Zaeceur who helped to rebuild the walls of Jerus under Nehemiah (Neh 3 2).

IN: A principal thing to notice about this prep., which in AV represents about 16 Heb and as many Gr words and preps., is, that in hundreds of cases (again, as in "an") it frequently also in the NT and in the LXX where RV the rendering is changed to more exact forms ("to," "unto," "by," "upon," "at," "with," "among," "for," "throughout," etc; cf e.g. Gen 16 10; 17 11; 31 54; 40 7; 49 17; Ex 8 14, 24; Lev 3 17; 4 2, etc). The chief Gr prep. εν, en, is frequently adhered to as "in" in RV where AV has other forms (e.g., "among" with "in" or "of" "in the teachings of John's baptism, Mt 3 11, and; in the tombs" for "among the tombs," Mk 5 3). In 2 Thess 2 2, "shaken in mind" in AV is more correctly rendered in RV 'shaken from [πόδι] your mind.' There are numerous such instructive changes.

IN THE LORD (εν Κυρίῳ, en Kuríō): A favorite Pauline expression, denoting that intimate union and fellowship of the Christian with the Lord Jesus Christ. The basis of all Christian relations and conduct, and the distinctive element in which the Christian life has its specific character. Cf the synonymous Pauline phrases, "in Christ," "in Jesus Christ," "in the Christian church," "in the Christian church," "abiding in Christ." "In the Lord" designates: (1) the motive, quality, or character of a Christian duty or virtue, as based on union with Christ, e.g. "free to be married to whom she will; only in the Lord" (1 Cor 7 39), i.e. provided the marriage be consistent with the Christian life. Cf 1 Cor 15 58; Phil 3 1; 4 12. 4.10; Eph 6 1.10; Col 3 18, etc; (2) the ground of Christian unity, fellowship, and brotherly salutation, e.g. Rom 16 2.5.22; 1 Cor 16 19; Col 4 7; (3) it is often practically synonymous with "Christian" (noun or adj.), "as Christians" or "as a Christian," e.g. "Salute them of the household of Narcissus, that are in the Lord," i.e. that are Christians (Rom 16 14); "I . . . the prisoner of the Lord," i.e. the Christian prisoner (Eph 4 1); of Rom 16 13; 1 Cor 9 1.2; Eph 6 21 ("faithful minister in the Lord"—faithful Christian minister); Col 4 17 (see Grimm-Thayer, Lex. of NT, εν, en, 1, 6). INCANTATION, in-kan-ta'shun. See Magic.

INCARNATION, in-kär-nä'shen. See PERSON OF CHRIST.
INDIA, in’di-a (ินเดีย, हिन्दु; ḥ ʼIssak, हे इस्लाम): The name occurs in canonical Scripture only in Est 1 1; 8 9, of the country which marked the eastern boundary of the territory of Abahserus. The Heb word comes from the name of the Indus, Hound, and denotes, not the peninsula of Hindustan, but the country drained by that great river. This is the meaning also in 1 Est 3 2; Ad Est 3 2; 16 1. Many have thought that this country is intended by Havelah in Gen 21 11 and that the Indus is the Pishon. The drivers of the elephants (1 Mace 6 37) were doubtless natives of this land. The name in 1 Mace 8 9 is certainly an error. India never formed part of the dominions of An- trochos the Great. It may possibly be a clerical error for “Tonia,” as Media is possibly a mistake for Mysia. If the Israelites in early times had no direct trade routes with India, many characteristic Indian products seem to have found their way into Palest- inian markets by way of the Arabian and Syrian trade routes, or by means of the Red Sea fleets (1 K 10 11.15; Est 27 15 ff, etc). Among these may be noted “horns of ivory and ebony,” “cassia and calamus,” alnus (sandalwood), and peacocks. W. EVING

INDIGNITIES, in-dig’ni-tz. See PUNISHMENTS.

INDITE, in-dit’; AV Ps 45 1, “My heart is inditing a good matter”; RV “My heart overfloweth with a goodly matter,” is in harmony with יִצְכֹּל (tzqal), “to bubble up,” of LXX ἐξερευκόμη, εξερέαται, “to pour out,” “Indite” in Eng. is becoming obsolete. It may mean “to dictate,” “to invite,” “to compose.” In the latter meaning it is used in the above passage.

INFANCY, in’fan-si, GOSPEL OF THE. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

INFANT, in’fan, BAPTISM. See BAPTISM.

INFANCITIDE, in’fan-ti-đ. See CRIMES.

INFIDEL, in’fl-d. (ἀπόστατος, ἄπιστος, “unbelieving,” “incredulous”): AV has this word twice: “What part hath he that believeth with an infidel?” (2 Cor 6 15); “If any provide not for his own, . . . it is worse than an infidel” (1 Tim 5 8). In both passages ERV and ARV have “unbelieving” in harmony with numerous other instances of the use of the Gr ἄπιστος. The word nowhere corresponds to the modern conception of an infidel, one who denies the existence of God, or repudiates the Chris- tian faith; but always signifies one who has not be- come a believer in Christ. It was formerly so used in Eng., and some of the older VSS have it in other passages, besides these two. It is not found in the OT, but “infidelity” (incredulity) occurs in 2 Est 74 44 [114]. WILIAM OWEN CARVER INFINITE, in’fant, INFINITUDE, in’fin-uit-đ. The word “infinite” occurs 8 times only in the text of AV (Job 22 5; Ps 147 5; Nah 3 9) 1. Scripture and ones in m (Nah 2 9). In Ps 147 5, “Is understanding infinite,” it represents the Heb יְבָשָׁם, יְבָשָׁם, “no number”; in the other passages the Heb יְבָשָׁם, יְבָשָׁם (Job 22 5, of iniquities) and יְבָשָׁם, יְבָשָׁם (Nah 3 9, of strength of Ethio- pia and Egypt; AVM 2 9, of “apolo.”), meaning “no end.” RV, therefore, renders in Job 22 5, “Neither is there any end to thine iniquities,” and drops the marginal reference in Nah 2 9. Ps 147 5 is thus the only passage in which the term is directly applied to God. It there correctly conveys the idea of absence of all limitation. There is nothing beyond the compass of God’s understand- ing, or, positively, His understanding embraces everything there is to know.

2. Application to God Past, present and future; all things possible and actual; the inmost thoughts and purposes of man, as well as his outward actions, bare to God’s knowledge (He 4 13; see OUTSIDE.

While, however, the term is not found, the truth that God is infinite, not only in His understanding, but in His being and all His perfections, natural and moral, is, on the contrary, as a law, true not only in a relative, yet the ideas for which these terms stand were all of them attributed in their conceptions to God. They did not, e.g. conceive of God as having been born, or as having a beginning, as the Bab and Gr gods had, but thought of Him as the ever-existing One (Ps 90 1.2), and free Creator and Disposer of all that exists. This means that God has self-existence, and for the same reason that He is not bound by His own creation. He must be thought of as raised above all creaturely limits, that is, as infinite.

The anthropomorphisms of the Bible, indeed, are often exceedingly naive, as when Jeh is said to “go down” to see what is being done (Gen 11 5.7; 12 21), or represent His actions (Gen 6 6); but these repre- sentations stand in contexts which show that the authors knew God to be unlimited in time, space, knowledge and power (Gen 6 7; God, Creator of all; 11 8.9; universal Ruler; 18 25, universal Judge; Nu 23 19, in- capable of repentance, etc). Like anthropomorphisms are found in Dt and the Prophets, where it is not doubted that the higher conceptions existed. In this infinity of God is implied His unspeakableness (Job 11 7; Ps 145 3; Rom 11 33); conversely, the latter attribute implies His infinity.

This infinity of God is displayed in all His attributes—in His eternity, omnipresence, omniscience, omnipotence, etc—see the separate arts. As regards the a Perfection proper conception of infinity, one has never the term chiefly to guard against figuring it under too quantitative an aspect. Quantitative boundlessness is the natural symbol we employ to represent infinity, yet reflection will convince us that it is inadequate as applied to a spiritual magnitude. Infinitude in power, e.g. is not an infinite quantity of power, but the potentiality in God of accomplishing without limit everything that is possible to power. It is a perfection, not a quantity. Still more is this appar- ent in moral attributes like love, righteousness, truth, holiness. These attributes are not quanti- ties (a quantity can never be truly infinite), but perfections; the infinity is qualitative, consisting in the absence of all defect or limitation in degree, not in amount.

The recollection of the fact now stated will free the mind from most of the perplexities that have been raised by metaphysical writers as to the abstract possibility of the existence of infinite attributes in God (thus e.g. Mansel); the recon- ciliability of God’s infinity with His Personality, or with the concept of a finite world; the power of the human mind to conceive infinity, etc. How, it is asked, can the idea of infinity get into our finite minds? It might as well be asked how the brain can take in the idea of the sun's distance of some 90 millions of miles from the earth, when the skull that holds the brain is only a few cubic inches in capacity. The idea of a mile is not a mile big, nor is the idea of infinity so large to be thought of by the mind of man. The essence of the power of thought is its capacity for the universal, and it cannot rest till it has apprehended the most universal idea of all—the infinite.

INFIRMITY, in-für-mi’ty (יִפּוּךְ, dāwēh, יִמּוּךְ, ḫōlah, יִמְמָךְ, mahālāh; ἄσθενε, astheneia): This word is used either in the singular or plural (the latter only in the NT) and with somewhat varying significance. (1) As sickness or bodily disease (Jn 5 5; Mt 8 17; Lk 5 13; 8 2; 1 Tim 5 23). In the last instance the affections seem to have been dyspeptic, the discomfort of which might be relieved by alcohol, although the disease would not be cured thereby. It is probable that this condition of body produced a certain slackness in Timothy's work, and Paul, in his letters, cautions against it. In Lk 7 21 RV has "diseases" which is a better rendering of the Gr ἀσθένη, used here, than the AV "infirmities." (2) Imperfections or weaknesses of body (Rom 6 19; 2 Cor 11 30 AV; 12 5.9.10 AV; Gal 4 4 AV). (3) Moral or spiritual weaknesses and defects (Ps 77 10; Rom 8 26; 15 1; He 4 15; 5 2; 7 28). In this sense it is often used by the classic Eng. writers, as in Milton's "the last infirmity of noble minds"; cf. Censor, IV, iii, 86. The infirmity which a man of resolution can keep under by his will (Prov 18 14) may be either moral or physical. In Lk 13 11 the woman's physical infirmity is ascribed to the influence of an evil spirit.

INFLAME, in-flām’, ENFLAME, en-flām’ (יָמַק, dáleḵ): "To inflame" in the meaning "to excite passion" is found in Isa 5 11, "thine wine inflame them." In some AV passages (e.g. Isa 67 5) we find "enflaming" with the same meaning; cf AV Sus ver 8 and Sir 38 10 AV (RV "inflame").

INFLAMMATION, in-flām-mā’shun (יָמַק, ὀλέθζη, ἐρυγός, ῥήγος): Only in Dt 25 22, was considered by Jewish writers as "burning fever," by LXX as a form of ague. Both this and typhoid fever are acute, and probably caused by the same disease of the diseases of Pal. See Fever. In Lev 13 28 AV has "inflammation" as the rendering of čārebheth, which LXX reads ḥarakēth, and for which the proper Eng. equivalent is 'scar,' as in RV.

INFLUENCES, in-flū’’nses-iz (יָמַק, מְדַחַנִית): This word occurs only in Job 38 31 AV, "Canst thou bind the sweet influences of Pleiades?" RV "the cluster of the Pleiades," m "or chain, or sweet influences"; Deitzeili, Dillmann and others render "letters" that which binds the group together; "influences" if correct, would refer to the seasons, which were believed to be regulated, so far, by the Pleiades (q.v.). In Wisd 7 25, it is said of Wisdom that she is "a pure influence (ἀπόρροια, RV "influence") flow'ing from the glory of the Almighty.

So in 1 Ch 5 9 AV, "And eastward he inhabited unto the entering in of the wilderness" (but RV "dwell") and Rev 13 12 AV (but omitted in RV). The rare inhabitress (fem.) is found only in Jer 10 17 m; "the church called the inhabitress of the gardens" (Bishop Richardson).

D. MIALL EDWARDS

INHERITANCE, in-her’-tans (יָמַק, nahālāh, "something inherited," "occupancy," "inheritance," "estates," "portion"): The word is used in its widest application in the OT Scriptures, referring not only to an estate received by a child from its parents, but also to the land received by the children of Israel as a gift from Jehovah. And in the figurative and poetical sense, the expression is applied to the kingdom of God as represented in the consecrated lives of His followers. "In a similar sense, the Psalmist is represented as speaking of the Lord as the inheritance of his people. In addition to the above word, the King James Version trs as inheritance, נאַמַה, mōrdākhāh, "a possession," "heritage" (Dt 33 4; Ezk 33 24); נאַמַה , yrushāhāh, "something occupied," "a patrimony," "possessions" (Jgs 21 17; פִּתְחָה, Ḫelek, "smoothness," "allotment" (Ps 16 5)); קָרָוֹחִים, קָרָוֹחִים, "to inherit" (Mt 5 5, etc.); קָרָוֹחִים, קָרָוֹחִים, "heir" (Mt 21 38, etc.); קָרָוֹחִים, קָרָוֹחִים, "inheritance," "patrimony," "possession"; or קָרָוֹחִים, קָרָוֹחִים, "an acquisition," "portion," "inheritance," from קָרָוֹחֵק, kārōkh, "to assign," "to allot," "to obtain an inheritance" (Mt 21 38; Lk 13 13; Acts 7 20, 32, 26, 18; Gal 3 18; Eph 1 11.14.18; 6 5; Col 1 12; 3 24; He 1 4; 9 15; 11 8; 1 Pet 1 4).

The Pent distinguishes clearly between real and personal property, the fundamental idea regarding the former being the thought that the land is God's, given by Him to His children, the people of Israel, and hence cannot be alienated (Lev 25 23-28). In order that there might not be any respecter of persons in the division, the lot was determined to the specific piece to be owned by each family head (Nu 26 52-56; 33 54). Consequently, any change of circumstances, a homestead was sold, the title could pass only temporarily; for in the year of Jubilee every homestead must again return to the original owner or heir (Lev 25 25-34). Real estate given to the priesthood must be appraised, and could be redeemed by the payment of the appraised valuation, thus preventing the transfer of real property even in this case (Lev 27 14-25). Inheritance was controlled by the following regulations: (1) The firstborn son inherited the double portion of all the father's possessions (Dt 21 15-17); (2) the daughters were entitled to an inheritance, provided there were no sons in the family (Nu 27 8); (3) in case there were no direct heirs, the brothers or more distant kinsmen were recognized (vs 9-11); in no case should an estate pass from one tribe to another. The above points were made the subject of statutory law at the instance of the daughters of Zelophehad, the entire case being clearly set forth in Nu 27 1-36.

INQUIETY, in-ik’wi-ti (יִפּוּךְ, ḥăwôn; ṣawwa, anomia): In the OT of the 11 words trs "iniquity," by far the most common and important is ḥăwôn (about 215 t). Etymologically, it is customary to explain it as meaning lit. "crookedness," "pervereness," i.e., evil regarded as that which is not straight or upright, moral distortion (from תרן, 'trown, "to bend," "make crooked," "pervert").

Driver, however (following Lagarde), maintains that two roots, distinct in Aram., have been confused in Heb, one = "to bend," "pervert" (as above), and the other = "to err," "go astray"; that thatno is derived from the latter, and consequently expresses the idea of error, deviation from the right path, rather than that of perversion (Driver, Notes on Sam. 135 n.). Whichever etymology is adopted, in actual use it has three meanings which almost imperceptibly pass into each other: (1) iniquity, (2) guilt of iniquity, (3) punishment of iniquity. Primarily, it denotes "not an action, but the character of an action" (Oehler), and is distinguished from "sin" (haddoth). Hence we have the expression "the iniquity of my sin" (Ps 32 2). Thus the meaning glides into that of "guilt," which might often take the place of "iniquity" as the tr of יבונ (Gen 15 16; Ex 34 7; Jer 2 22, etc.). From "guilt" it again passes into the meaning of "punishments of guilt" (Budge, Lat. piaculum may denote both guilt and its punishment. The transition is all the easier in Heb because of the Heb sense of the intimate relation of sin and suffering, e.g. Gen 4 13, "My punishment is greater than I can bear"; which is obviously preferred to AVm, RVm "My iniquity is greater than can be forgiven," for Cain is not so much expressing sorrow for his sin, as complaining of the severity of his punishment; of 2 K 7 9 (RV "punishment," RVm "punishment"); Isa 5 18 (where for "iniquity" we might have "punishment of iniquity," as in Lev 26 41,43, etc); Isa 40 2 ("iniquity," RVm "punishment"). The phrase "bear iniquity" is a standing expression for bearing its consequences. of course, of the innermost bearing of the results of his own iniquity (Lev 17 16; 20 17,19; Nu 14 34; Ezk 44 10, etc), but sometimes of one bearing the iniquity of another vicariously, and so taking it away (e.g. Ezk 4 4; 18 19). Of special interest in the latter sense are the sufferings of the Servant of Jehovah, who shall "bear the iniquities" of the people (Isa 53 11; cf ver 6).

Other words frequently tr 4 "iniquity" are: יִתָנ, 'etan, lit. "worthlessness," "vanity," hence "naughtiness," "miscief" (47 t in AV, esp. in the phrase "worker of iniquity," Job 4 8; Ps 5 5; 8 6; Prov 10 29, etc); שַטָנָה, 'atana, lit. "perverse" (Dt 32 4; Job 6 29 AV, etc).

In the NT "iniquity" stands for ἀνομία = prop., "the condition of one without law," "lawlessness" (so trs 1 in 1 Jn 3 4, elsewhere "iniquity," e.g. Mt 7 23, a word which frequently stood for ἀδικία in LXX; and adikia, lit. "unrighteousness" (e.g. Lk 13 27). D. Miall Edwards

INJOIN, in-join'. See ENJOIN.

INJURIOUS, in-jor'-i-us, in-ju'-r-i-us (נֵבְרֹת, hubरות, "insolent"): In former usage, the word was strongly expressive of insult as well as hurtfulness. So in 1 Tim 1 13; in Rom 1 30 the same adj. is tr 4 "insolent." (AV "despightful").

INJURY, in-jur-i, in-jor'-i. See CRIMES.

INK, ink (יָנָק, yānāq, from root meaning "slowly flowing," BDB, 188; מָלָע, mēlāq, "black"): Any fluid substance used with pen or brush to form written characters. In this sense ink is mentioned only in the Heb Bible (Jer 36 2) and 3 t in the Gr NT (2 Cor 11 23; Phil 2 16; Rev 19 13), and it is implied in all references to writing on papyrus or on leather. The inference from the "blotting out" of Ex 33 33 and Nu 5 23 that the Heb ink was a lamp-black and gum, or some other dry ink, is confirmed by the general usage of antiquity, by the later Jewish prejudice against other inks (OTJ, 71 n.) and by a Jewish receipt referring to ink-tablets (Drach, "Notice sur l'encre des Hébreux," Ann. philos. chrét., 42, 45, 353). The question is, however, not being put on a wholly new basis by the study of the Elephantine Jewish documents (Meyer, Papyri fund., 1912, 15, 21), and above all of the Harvard Ostracons from Samaria which give actual specimens of the ink in Pal in the time of Ahab (Harvard Theol. Rev., Jan. 1911, 139-43). It is likely, however, that during the long period of Bible history various inks were used. The official copy of the law in the time of Ptolemy Philadephus was, according to Jos (Ant., XII, ii, 11), written in gold, and the vermilion and red paints and dyes mentioned in Jer 22 14; Ezk 22 14, and Woes 13 14 (mildē kot phakes) were probably used also for writing books or coloring inscribed inscriptions. See literature under Writing; esp. Krauss, Talm. Arch. 6, 148-53; Garthausen, Gr Pal., 1911, 1, 202-17, and his bibliographical references, 245-7.

INK-HORN, ink 'horn (נֶפֶלָן, nefelān, kepheth = κεφθή, BDB, 903): This term "inkhorn" occurs 3 t in Ezk 9 (vs 2.3.11), in the phrase "writer's inkhorn upon his loins" (or "by his side"). The word is more exactly "implement case," or "writing-case" (calamarium atramentarium, theca calamaria, theca librariorum, grapharia). This may have been the Egyptian palette (Budge, Mummy, 350-52) seen so often in the monuments of all periods, or the later form of pen-case with ink-well attached, which is a modified form adapted for ink carried in fluid form. The Egyptian palette was carried characteristically over the shoulder or under the arm, neither of which methods is strictly "upon the loins." The manner of carrying, therefore, was doubtless in the girdle, as in modern oriental usage (Benzinger, Heb Archæol., 185). A good example of the pen-case and inkwell writing-case (given also in Garucci, Daremberg-Saglio, Garthausen, etc) is given from the original in Birt, Die Buchrolle in der Kunst, 220, and is reproduced (a) in this article, together with (b) an Egyptian palette. Whether the form of Ezekiel's case approached the palette or the ink-well type probably depends on the question of whether dry ink or fluid ink was used in Ezekiel's time (see Ink). INN (יוֹרְק, mälon; πανδοχεῖον, pandochrome, κατάλυμα, kataluma): The Heb word mälon means lit. a “night resting-place,” and might be applied to any spot where caravans encamped for the night. In the slightly altered form πανδοχεῖον, the same word is used of a night-watchman’s lodge in a garden (Isa 1:5; 24:20, AV “cottage”). The word in itself does not imply the presence of any building, and in the case of caravans and travelers was doubtless originally, as very often at the present day, only a convenient level bit of ground near some spring, where baggage might be unloaded, animals watered and tethered, and men rest on the bare ground. Nothing in the OT suggests the occupancy of a house in such cases. The nearest approach to such an idea occurs in Jer 41:17, where גֵּרָּד מֹקְחֵֽם is tr “the lodging-place of Chimham,” but the text is very doubtful and probably refers rather to sheepfolds. We cannot say when buildings were first used, but the need of shelter for caravans traveling in winter, and of protection in dangerous times and districts, would lead to their introduction at an early period in the history of trade.

It is noteworthy that all the indisputable designations of “inn” come in with the Gr period. Jos (1 Macc, XV, v, 1; 2 Macc, xxi, 7) speaks of “public inn” under the name of a ἱκατογατι, while in the Aram. Jewish writings we meet with ἀνεσμία, from Lat hospitium, and ἀκογαγα from the Gr zenia; the NT designation pandochrome has passed into the Aram. pandheki and the Arab. funduk. All these are used of public inns, and they all correspond to the modern “khan” or “caravanserai.” These are to be found on the great trade routes all over the East. In their most elaborate form they have almost the strength of a fortress. They consist of a great quadrangle into which admission is gained through a broad, strong gateway. The quadrangle is enclosed on all sides by a 2-story building, the windows in the case of the lower story opening only to the interior. The upper story is reached by stairways, and has a gangway all around, giving access to the practically bare rooms which are at the disposal of travelers.

The interior of the room. There is usually a well of good water in the center of the quadrangle, and as a rule bring own food and often that of their animals (Jgs 19:19) with them. Their Evil Name are no fixed payments, and on departure, the arrangement of haqq el-khan generally means a disagreeable dispute, as the innkeepers are invariably untruthful, dishonest and oppressive. They have ever been regarded as of infamous character. The Rom laws recognize many places of this kind, and the Targum adds: 'Abbōdāh Zārāh, i.e. places them in the lowest scale of degradation. The NT is quite clear in speaking of Rahab the harlot (He 11:31; Jas 2:25). The Tg designates her an “innkeeper,” while Rashkīn tr zāādah as “a seller of kinds of food,” a meaning the word will bear. Kimḥi, however, accepts both meanings. This evil repute of public inns, together with the Sem spirit of hospitality, led the Jews and the early Chrisians also to prefer to recommend the opening of open house for the entertainment of strangers. In the Jewish Morning Prayers, even in our day, such action is linked with great promises, and the NT repeatedly (He 13:2; 1 Pet 4:9; 3 in ver 5) commends hospitality. It is remarkable that both the Talm (Shab 127a) and the NT (He 13:2) quote the same passage (Gen 18:3) in recommending it.

The best-known khan’s in Pal are Khan Jubb-Yusef, N. of the Lake of Galilee, Khan el-Tûbūn under the shadow of Tabor, Khan el-Lubbān (of Jgs 21:19), and Khan Ḥadur, midway between Jerus and Jericho. This last certainly occupies the site of the inn referred to in Lk 10:34, and it is not without interest that we read in Mish, Ybāmōt, of another sick man being left at that same inn. See illustration, p. 64.

The Gr word kataluma, though implying a “loos- ing” for the night, seems rather to be connected with the idea of hosting. The idea of “hostel” is sometimes tr *kataluma, and it appears in Lk 9:22 for lishkāh, AV “parlour.” It is the word used of the “upper room” where the Last Supper was held (Mt 14:14; Lk 22:11, “guest-chamber”), and of the place of reception in Bethphalom where Joseph and Mary failed to find quarters (Lk 2:7). It thus corresponds to the spare or upper room in a private house or in a village, i.e. to the mansṭ adjoining the house of the sheikh, where travelers received hospitality and where no payment was expected, except a trifle to the caretaker. In Jerus such payments were made by leaving behind the earthware vessels that had been used, and the skins of the animals that had been slaughtered (Yoma 12a).

Judging from the word used, and the conditions implied, we are led to believe that Joseph and Mary had at first expected reception in the

5. Birth upper room or mansṭ at the house of Christ the sheikh of Bethphalom, probably a friend and member of the house of David; that in this they were disappointed, and had to content themselves with the next best, the elevated platform alongside the interior of the stable, and on which those having the care of the animals generally slept. It being now the season when they were in the fields (Lk 2:8), the stable would be empty and clean. There then the Lord Jesus was born and laid in the safest and most convenient place, the nearest empty manger alongside of this elevated platform. Humble though the circumstances were, the family were preserved from all the annoyance and evil associated with the life of the khan, and all the demands of delicacy and privacy were duly met.

INNOCENCE, in'ō-sēn, INNOCENCY, in'ō-sen-si, INNOCENT, in'ō-sent ([פִּי], zāhā, [יָד], yād)
II. Analysis of Narrative with Special Reference to Motive. — In estimating the value of such a narrative, apart from the viewpoint of historicity, the first and most important step is to gauge the motive. Why was the story told? This question is not always easy to answer, but in the present instance there is a very simple and effective test at hand. In Mt's infancy section (chs 1 and 2) there are five quotations from the OT which are set into the narrative of events. These five quotations represent the cardinal and outstanding points of interest. The quotations are:

1. Focus of Narrative — points of interest.
2. Corollaries from Above Facts
3. Marks of Historicity

I. Meaning and History of the Term. — The conventional, ecclesiastical name given to the slaughter by Herod I (q.v.) of children two years old and under in Bethlehem and its environs at the time of the birth of Christ (Mt 2:16). The accepted title for this event may be traced through Augustine to Cyprian.

Irenaeus (d. 202 AD) calls these children “martyrs,” and in a very beautiful passage interprets their tragedy as that which ended their brief lives as a gracious, tender “sending before” into His kingdom by the Lord Himself. Cyprian (d. 258 AD) says: “That it might be manifest that they who are slain for Christ’s sake are innocent, innocent infancy was put to death for the Lord’s sake” (Ep. 1). John Augustine (b. 354 AD), following Cyprian, speaks of the children, formally, as “the Innocents” (Comm. on Ps 43:5).

The ecclesiastical treatment of the incident is remarkable because of the exaggeration which was indulged in as to the extent of the massacre and the number of victims. At an early date the Gr church canonized 14,000, and afterward, by a curious misinterpretation of Rev 14:13, the number was increased to 144,000.

According to Milman the liturgy of the Church of England retains a reminiscence of this ancient error in the use of Rev 14 on Holy Innocents’ Day (see History of Christianity, I, 107, n. e). This exaggeration, of which there is no hint in the NT, is worthy of note because the most serious general argument against the historicity of the narrative is drawn from the silence of Jos. As in all probability there could not have been more than twenty children involved (cf Farrar, Life of Christ, I, 45, n.), the incident could not have bulked very largely in the series of horrors perpetrated and planned by Herod in the last months of his life (cf Farrar, The Herods, 144 f.).
return home. Interest in them flags as soon as their brief connection with the movement of the historic Jesus ceases. And the intensely Hebraic character of Mt's Incarnation setting as a whole is indebted to evidence pointing in the same direction (cf. remarks of the writer, Birth and Infancy of Jesus Christ, 70 f.).

It is clear that the story is told to emphasize the wonder-element in connection with the birth of Christ. The facts contradict this. In addition to the primary consideration, the subordinate position, there are others of great value. That the Magi were providentially guided to the feeding of the infant Jesus is demonstrated by the coincidence of the Messiah's birth and the Magi's visit. The striking feature of the story is that the whole belief in his mind he keeps so strictly within the limits of the natural order. In vs. 9 and 10 only is there apparent exception. Of these the statement that he came down to this earth is in itself perfectly in harmony with the idea that the Magi were providentially guided to the feeding of the infant Jesus. The interest of the writer was not in the wonder-element, else, infallibly, he would have developed its outlines and expurgated all ambiguity as to the nature of the occurrence.

We may now glance at the positive evidence for the historicity of the event.

1. The centering of the narrative about the birth of Jesus at Nazareth. This not only brings Lk's Gospel in support of the center, but groups the story around a point of known interest to the first generation of believers. It is interesting to note the parallel evidence in Egypt has independent backing of a sort. There are two existences of two stories, one traced by Origen through Jews of his own day to earlier times, and the other in the Talm, which connect Jesus with Egypt and attempt to account for his miraculous by reference to Egypt magic (see Plummer, "Matthew," Ez. Comm., 11,15).

2. The fact that the story of the Magi is told so objectively and with such personal detachment. Both Jews and early Christians had strong views both as to the divinity and the historicity of Jesus (see Plummer, op. cit., 15), but the author of this Gospel tells the story without emphasis and without comment and from the viewpoint of the Magi. His interest is purely historical and matter-of-fact.

3. That Herod the Great was so far as Herod is concerned the incident is usually discussed with exclusive reference to the savagery involved. By many it is affirmed that we have here a hostile and unfair portrait. This contention could hardly be sustained even if the question turned entirely upon the point of savagery. But there is far more than savagery in the incident. (a) In the first place there is this undeniable element of inherent probability in the story. Practically all of Herod's moral and religious side was devoted to the salvation of his sons, were perpetrated under the sway of one emotion and in obedience to a single motive. They were in practically every instance for the purpose of consolidating or perpetuating his power. He not only destroyed his own immediate family in the half dozen that on occasion drove him to the very limits of ferocity, simply because they were accused of plotting against him. The accusations were largely false, but the suspicion doomed those accused. The murder of the Innocents was another cruel episode of the same sort. The old king was obsessed by the fear of a claimant to his petty throne; the Messianic hope of the Jews was a perpetual secret torment, and the murder of the children, in the attempt to reach the child whose advent threatened him, was at once so original in method and so characteristic in purpose as to be unsurpassed and similitude to the whole narrative. There are also other traits of truth. (b) Herod's prompt discovery of the visit of the Magi and their questions is in harmony with what we know of the old ruler's watchfulness and his elaborate account and propaganda.

(c) Characteristic of this is the story of the king's pretended interest in the quest of the strangers, the solemn conclave of Jewish leaders in his presence, the tendency to uphold the claims of the throne in the rôle of cosmic inquirer, his urgent request for information that he may worship also, followed by his swift anger (note that ἐπεστήσατο, ἐκβολήθη, "was wroth," ver 16, is not used elsewhere in the NT) at being deceived, and the blind but terrible stroke of his questing vengeance.

All these items are so true to the man, to the atmosphere which always surrounded him, and to the historic situation, that we are forced to conclude, either that we have veracious history more or less mixed up with pure fancy, or that we are in the presence of the events described, or the work of an incomparably clever romancer. Louis Matthews Sweet

INORDINATE, in-ör-di-nät, ("ill-regulated," hence "immoderate," "excessive;" Lat. in, "not," ordinatus, "set in order"): Only twice in AV. In each case there is no corresponding adj. in the original, but the word was inserted by the translators as being implied in the noun. It disappears in RSV: Ezk 23 11, "in her inordinate love" (RV "in her doting"); ἐγκαυμάσθη, ἀγάθαβαβα, "lust"; Col 3 5 "inordinate affection" (RV "passion"); τράδω, πθᾶθω, a word which in classical Gr may have either a good or a bad sense (any affection, especially affection of the mind), but in the NT is used only in a bad sense (passion). D. Miall Edwards

INQUIRE, in-kwīr' (ἐρωτάω, ἱκανεῖν, "to ask," "desire"; ὑπονεῖσαι, "to seek"). A form sometimes employed with reference to the practice of divination, as where Saul "inquires of" (or "consults") the witch of Endor as to the issue of the coming battle (1 S 28 6,7) (see DIVINATION).

In Job 19 6, "to inquire" [ἐρωτάω, ἐκβαρεί] after inquiry signifies to bring to light that which was hidden, and Job asks distractedly if God's time is soon short that He is in a hurry to find him guilty and to punish him as if He had only a man's few days to live. To inquire of Jehovah" denotes the consultation of oracle, priest, prophet or Jehovah Himself, as to a certain course of action or as to necessary supplies (Jgs 20 27 AV, "to ask"); 1 K 22 5; 1 S 9 9 [ἐρώτησα, δαραζάω]; 10 22 AV; 2 S 2 1; 6 19,23; Ezk 36 37.

"To inquire" [ἐρωτάω, ἐκβαρεί] in his temple" (palace) means to find out all that constant fellowship or unbroken intercourse with God can teach (Ps 27 4).

Prov 20 25 warns against rashness in making a vow and afterward considering (ἐκβαρεί, "to make inquiry") as to whether it can be fulfilled or how it may be eluded. In the AV, the tr of several Gr words: diáγινωσκό, "to know thoroughly" (Acts 23 15); ἐκβαρεί, ἐκβαρεί, "to seek after" (Acts 19 39); ἐκβαρεί, ἐκβαρεί, "to seek to get together" (Lk 22 23); ἐκβαρεί, ἐκβαρεί, "to search out" (Mt 10 11).

M. O. Evans

INQUESTION, in-kiw-si mañana, "to follow," "diligently inquire," "question," "search" [Dt 19 18; Ps 9 12], ἐπισκόπησα, "to search out," "to strive after," "inquire" [Est 2 23]: The term refers, as indicated by these passages, first of all to a careful and diligent inquiry necessary
The word "inspire" and its derivatives seen to have come into Middle Eng. from the Fr., and have been employed from the first (early in the 14th cent.) in a considerable number of terms of signification, physical and metaphysical, secular and religious. The derivatives have been multiplied and their applications extended during the process of the years, until they have acquired a very wide and varied use. Underlying all their use, however, is the constant implication of an influence from without, producing in its object movements that are essentially, or at least its ordinary powers. The noun "inspiration," although already in use in the 14th cent., seems not to occur in any but a theological sense until late in the 16th cent. This specifically theological sense of all these terms is governed, of course, by their usage in Lat. theology; and this rests ultimately on their employment in the Lat. Bible. In the Vulg. Lat. Bible the vb. "inspire" (Gen 2 7; Wisd 15 11; Ecclus 4 12; 2 Tim 3 16; 2 Pet 1 21) and the noun "inspiration" (2 Sam 22 16; Job 32 8; Ps 18 15; Acts 27 25) both occur 4 or 5 t in somewhat diverse applications. In the development of a theological nomenclature, however, they have acquired (along with other less frequent applications) a technical sense with reference to the Bible. Writers, and the Bible. The Bible. books are called inspired as the Divinely determined products of inspired men; the Bible writers are called inspired as breathed into the Holy Spirit, so that the products of these are made human powers and becomes Divinely authoritative. Inspiration is, therefore, usually defined as a supernatural influence exerted on the sacred writers by the Spirit of God, by virtue of which their writings are given Divine trustworthiness.

Meanwhile, for Eng. speaking men, these terms have virtually ceased to be Bib. terms. They naturally passed from the Lat Vulg into the Eng. VSS made it from (most fully reoces in into the Rheims-Douay: Job 32 8; the Bible Wisd 16 11; Ecclus 4 12; 2 Tim 3 16; 2 Pet 1 21). But in the development of the Eng. Bible they have found everlasting placing. In and in the biblical books the nominal form alone occurs in AV and that only twice: Job 32 8, but there is a spirit in man: and the inspiration of the Almighty giveth him understanding'; and also: 2 Tim 3 16, 'All scripture is given by inspiration of God, and is profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness.' The RV removes the former of these instances, substituting "breath" for "inspiration"; and alters the latter so as to read: 'Every scripture inspired of God is also profitable, for teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction which is in righteousness,' with a marginal alternative in the form of, 'Every scripture is inspired of God and profitable,' etc. The word "inspiration" thus disappears from the Eng. Bible, and the word "inspired" is left in it only once, and then, it let be added, by a distinct and even misleading mistranslation.

For the Gr word in this passage—θεομανος, theoμανοες—very distinctly does not mean "inspired of God." This phrase is rather the rendering of the Lat. divinitus inscripta, restored from the Wydcl ("All Scripture of God inscribed, . . .") and Rheimish ("All Scripture inspired of God is . . .") VSS of the Vulg. does not even mean, as AV t it, "given by inspiration of God," although that rendering (inherited from Tindale: "All Scripture given by inspiration of God . . ." and its successors; of Geneva: "The whole Scripture is given by inspiration of God and is . . . ) has at least to say for itself that it is a somewhat clumsy, perhaps, but not misleading, paraphrase of the Gr term in the theological language of the day. The Gr term has, however, no such equivalent, except perhaps in the "breathe" of the Holy Ghost. The word is later used of a "spiring" or "spiriting." What it says of Scripture is, not that it is "breathed into by God" or is the product of the Divine "inbreathing" into its human authors, but that it is breathed out by God, "God-breathed"—that is, the product of the creative breath of God. In a word, what is declared by this fundamental passage is simply that the Scriptures are a Divine product, without any indication of how God has operated in producing them. No term could have been chosen, however, which would have more emphatically asserted the Divine production of Scripture than that which is here employed. The "breath of God" is in Scripture just the symbol of His almighty power, the bearer of His creative word. "By the word of Jehovah," we read in the significant parallel of Ps 33:6, "were the heavens made, and all the host of them by the breath of his mouth." And it is particularly where the operations of God are energetic that this term (whether דָּמַע, דָּמָא, or דָּמָא, שָׁמַע) is employed: -"the breath of Jehovah" is the irresistible outflow of His power. When Paul declares, then, that "every scripture," or "all scripture," is the product of the Divine breath, "is God-breathed," he asserts with as much energy as he could employ that Scripture is the product of a specifically Divine operation.

In that case, what the apostle asserts is that the Sacred Scriptures, in their every several passage—for it is just their very "passage of Scripture" which makes the distinct "use of God's creative inspiration," of supreme value for all holy purposes. It is to be observed that the apostle does not stop here to tell us either inspiration or translation. He is merely indicating a collection which he calls Sacred Scriptures, or by what precise operations God has produced them. Neither of these subjects entered into the matter he had at the moment in hand. It was the value of the Scriptures, and the source of that value in their Divine origin, which he required at the moment to assert; and these things he asserts, leaving to other occasions any further details which his reader might desire to emphasize. It is also to be observed that the apostle does not tell us here everything for which the Scriptures are profitable, but only what is profitable by their Divine origin. He speaks simply to the point immediately in hand, and reminds Timothy of the value which these Scriptures, 'by virtue of their divine origin, have for the man of God.' Their spiritual, first, that 'every prophecy of scripture . . . occasion here to advert to.' Whatever other qualities may accrue to them from their Divine origin, he leaves to other occasions to speak of.

(2) 2 Pet 1:19-21: What Paul tells us here about the Divine origin of the Scriptures is enforced and extended by a striking passage in 2 Pet (1:19-21). Peter is assuring his readers that what had been made known to them of the power and coming of our Lord Jesus Christ did not rest on "cunningly devised fables." He offers them the testimony of eyewitnesses of Christ's glory. And then he intimates that they have better testimony than even that of eyewitnesses. "We have, however, of the prophecy word" (EV, unhappily, "the word of prophecy"): and this, he says, is "more sure," and therefore should certainly be heeded. He refers, of course, to the Scriptures. Of what other "prophecy word" could he, over against the testimony of the eyewitnesses of Christ's "excellent glory" (AV) say that "we have" it, that is, it is in our hands? And he proceeds at once to speak of it plainly as "Scriptural prophecy." You do well, he says, to pay heed to the prophetic word, because we know this first, that "every prophecy of scripture . . . ."

It admits of more question, however, whether, however, whether by this phrase he means the whole of Scripture, designated according to its character, as prophetic, that is, of Divine origin; or only that portion of Scripture which we discriminate as particularly prophetic, the immediate revelations contained in Scripture. The former is the more likely view, inasmuch as the entirety of Scripture is elsewhere conceived and spoken of as prophetic. In that case, what Peter has to say of this "every prophecy word" or its exact equivalent, it will be observed, in this case of Paul's "every scripture" (2 Tim 3:16)—applies to the whole of Scripture in all its parts. What he says of it is that it does not come "of private interpretation": that is, it is not the result of human investigation into the nature of things, the product of its writers' own thinking. This is as much as to say it is of Divine gift. Accordingly, he proceeds at once to make this plain in a supporting clause which contains both the negative and the positive declaration: "For no prophecy ever came in [was brought] by the will of man, but it was as borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God." 1474

In this singularly precise and pregnant statement there are several things which require to be carefully observed. There is, first of all, the emphatic denial that prophecy—that is to say, on the hypothesis upon which we are working, Scripture—owes its origin to human initiative: "No prophecy ever came by the will of man, but it was as borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God." In this singularly precise and pregnant statement there are several things which require to be carefully observed. There is, first of all, the emphatic denial that prophecy—that is to say, on the hypothesis upon which we are working, Scripture—owes its origin to human initiative: "No prophecy ever came by the will of man, but it was as borne by the Holy Spirit that men spoke from God." In this singularly precise and pregnant statement there are several things which require to be carefully observed. on it, which tells us how it could be that men, in speaking, should speak not from themselves, but from God: it was "as borne"—it is the same word which was rendered "was brought" above, and might possibly be rendered "brought" here—"by the Holy Spirit" that they spoke. Speaking thus under the determining influence of the Holy Spirit, the things they spoke were not from themselves, but from God.

Here is as direct an assertion of the Divine origin of Scripture as that of 2 Tim 3 16. But there is more here than a simple assertion of the Divine origin. We find in this passage something in our understanding of how God has produced the Scriptures. It was through the instrumentality of men who "spoke from him." More specifically, it was through an operation of the Holy Ghost on those men which is described as "hearing" them. The term here used is a very specific one. It is not to be confounded with guiding, or directing, or controlling, or even leading in the full sense of that word. It goes beyond all such terms, in assigning the direct production of the Spirit. We find in it the notion that it is the Holy Spirit who, in giving, is the cause of the speaking. What is "borne" is taken up by the "bearer," and conveyed by the "bearer's" power, not its own, to the "bearer's" goal, not its own. The men who spoke from God are here declared, therefore, to have been "speakers common to the Holy Ghost by His power to the goal of His choosing." The things which they spoke under this operation of the Spirit were therefore His things, not theirs. And that is the reason which is assigned why "the prophetic word is a lamp unto our feet." Through the instrumentality of men, it is, by virtue of the fact that these men spoke "as borne by the Holy Spirit," an immediately Divine word. It will be observed that the proximate stress is laid here, not on the spiritual value of Scripture (though that, too, is seen in the background), but on the Divine trustworthiness of Scripture. Because this is the way every prophecy of Scripture "has been brought," it affords a more sure basis of confidence than even the testimony of human eyewitnesses. Of course, if we do not understand by "the prophetic word," here the entirety of Scripture described, according to its character, as revelation, but only that element in Scripture which we call specifically prophecy, then the argument fails. We contend, however, that these great declarations are made. In any event, however, they are made of the prophetic element in Scripture as written, which was the only form in which the readers of this Ep. possessed it, and which is the thing specifically intended in the phrase "every prophecy of scripture." These great declarations are made, therefore, at least of large tracts of Scripture; and if the entirety of Scripture is intended by the phrase "the prophetic word," they are made of the whole of Scripture.

(3) Jn 10 34 f.: How far the supreme trustworthiness of Scripture, thus asserted, extends may be conveyed to us by a passage in one of Our Lord's discourses recorded by John (Jn 10 34–35). The Jews, offended by Jesus' speaking of Himself God, were in the act to stone Him, when He defended Himself thus: "Is it not written in your law, I said, Ye are gods? If he called them gods, unto whom the word of God came (and the scripture cannot be broken), say ye of him, whom the Father sanctified and consecrated?" and sent unto the word, Thou blasphemest; because I said, I am the Son of God?" It may be thought that this defence is inadequate. It certainly is incomplete: Jesus made Himself God (Jn 10 33) in a far higher sense than in the case of the Father (Jn 1 18). Ye are unto whom the word of God came": He had just declared in unmistakable terms, "I and the Father are one." But it was quite sufficient for the immediate end in view—to repel the technical charge of blasphemy based on His using Himself God: it is not blasphemy to call one God in any sense in which he may fitly receive that designation; and certainly if it is not blasphemy to call such men as those spoken of in the passage of Scripture adduced gods, because of their official functions, it cannot be blasphemy to call Him God whom the Father consecrated and sent into the world. The point for us to note, however, is merely that Jesus' defence takes the form of an appeal to Scripture; and it is important to observe how He makes this appeal. In the first place somewhere the Scriptures are quoted: "Is it not written in your law?" He demands. The passage of Scripture which He adduces is not written in that portion of Scripture which was more specifically called "the law," that is to say, the Pent; nor in any portion of Scripture of formally legal contents. It is written in the Book of Ps; and in a particular psalm which is as far as possible from presenting the external characteristics of legal enactment (Ps 82 6). When Jesus adduces this passage in the "law" of the Pentateuch, He does it, not because it stands in this psalm, but because it is a part of Scripture at large. In other words, He here ascribes legal authority to the entirety of Scripture, in accordance with a conception common among the Jews (Jn 10 34), and finding expression in the NT occasionally, both on the lips of Jesus Himself, and in the writings of the apostles. Thus, on a later occasion (Jn 15 25), Jesus declares that it is written in the "law" of the Jews. "Thus the word of the Lord came unto me in the days of Josiah the king of Judah, that he made a additions from the Ps and from Isa to "the Law" (1 Cor 14 21; Rom 3 19), and can write such a sentence as this (Gal 4 21 f.): "Tell me, ye that desire to be under the law, do you not contradict the word of God? For it is written . . . ." quoting from the narrative of Gen. We have seen that the entirety of Scripture was conceived as "prophecy"; we now see that the entirety of Scripture was also conceived as "law": these three terms, the law, prophecy, Scripture, were indeed, materially, strict synonyms, as our present passage itself advises us, by varying the formula of addition in contiguous verses from "the law" to "scripture." And what is thus implied in the manner in which Scripture is immediately afterward spoken out in the most explicit language, because it forms an essential element in Our Lord's defence. It might have been enough to say simply, "Is it not written in your law?" But Our Lord, determined to drive the appeal to Scripture home, sharpens the point to the utmost by adding with the highest emphasis: "and the scripture cannot be broken." This is the reason why it is worth while to appeal to what is "written in the law," because "the scripture cannot be broken." The word "broken" here is the common one for breaking the law, or the Sabbath, or the like (Jn 5 18; 7 23; Mt 5 19), and the meaning of the declaration is that it is impossible for the Scripture to be annulled, its authority to be withheld, denied. The movement of thought is to the effect that, because it is impossible for the Scripture—the term is perfectly general and witnesses to the unitary character of Scripture (it is all, for the purpose in hand, of a piece)—to be broken, denied, the particular this particular Scripture which is cited must be taken as of irrefragable authority. What we have here is, therefore, the strongest possible assertion of the indefectible authority of Scripture; precisely what is true of Scripture is true of it. Now, what is the particular thing in Scripture, for the confirmation of which the indefectible authority of Scripture is thus invoked? It is one of its most causal clauses—more than that, the very form of its expression in one of its most casual clauses. This means, of course, that in the Saviour’s view the indefectible authority of Scripture attaches to the very form of expression of its most casual clauses. It belongs to Scripture through and through, and to its scriptural minute particulars, that it is of indefectible authority.

It is sometimes suggested, it is true, that Our Lord’s argument here is an argumentum ad hominem, and that His words, therefore, express not His own view of the authority of Scripture, but that of His Jewish opponents. It will scarcely be denied that there is a vein of satire running through Our Lord’s defence: that the Jews so readily allowed that corrupt judges might properly be called “gods,” but could not endure that He whom the Father had consecrated and sent into the world should call Himself Son of God, was a somewhat pungent fact to throw up into such a high light. But the argument from Scripture is not ad hominem but e concesso; Scripture was common ground with Jesus and His opponents. If proof were needed for so obvious a fact, it would be supplied by the circumstance that this is not an isolated but a representative passage. The conception of Scripture thrown up into such clear view here supplies the ground for all the appeal of apostolic authority to every particle of Scripture, to every element in Scripture, to its most incidental clauses as well as to its most fundamental principles, and to the very form of its expression. This attitude toward Scripture as an authoritative document is, if proof were needed, already intimated by their constant designation of it by the name of Scripture, the Scriptures, that is “the Document,” by way of eminence; and by their customary citation of it with the simple formula, “It is written,” the whole which is written in this document admits so little of questioning that its authoritativeateness needed no asserting, but might safely be taken for granted. Both modes of expression belong to the constantly illustrated habits of Our Lord’s speech. The first words He is received as uttering to that manifestation to Israel was an appeal to the unquestionable authority of Scripture; to Satan’s temptations He opposed no other weapon than the final “It is written” (Lk 4 10). Lk 4 44, the last words which He spoke to His disciples before He was received up was a rebuke to them for not understanding that all things “which are written in the law of Moses, and the prophets, and psalms” concerning Him—that is (ver 44) in the entire “Scriptures”—“must needs be” (very emphatic) “fulfilled” (Lk 24 44). “Thus it is written,” says He (ver 46), as rendering all doubt absurd. For, as He had explained earlier upon the same day (Lk 24 25 ff.), it argues only that one is “foolish and slow of heart” if he does not believe “if his faith does not rest securely on, as on a firm foundation” all (without limit of subject-matter here) “that the prophets” (explained in ver 27 as equivalent to “all the scriptures”) “have spoken.”

The necessity of the fulfilment of all that is written in Scripture, which is so strongly asserted in these last instructions to His disciples, is frequently adverted to by Our Lord. He repeatedly explains of occurrences occasionally happening that they point to “pass that the scripture might be fulfilled” (Mt 17 12; cf 12 14; Mk 9 12.13). On the basis of Scriptural declarations, therefore, He announces with confidence that given events will certainly occur: “All ye shall be offended (lit. ‘scandalized’) in me this night: for it is written . . .” (Mt 26 31; Mk 14 27; cf Lk 20 17). Although holding at His command ample means of escape, He bows before on-coming calamities, for, He asks, how otherwise “should come to Him complaint of that thus it must be?” (Mt 26 54). It is not merely the two disciples with whom He talked on the way to Emmaus (Lk 24 25) whom He rebukes for not trusting themselves more perfectly to the teaching of Scripture. “Ye search the scriptures,” He says to the Jews in the classical passage (Jn 6 39), “because ye think that in them ye have eternal life; and these are they which bear witness of me; and ye will not come to me, that ye may have life!” These words surely were spoken more in sorrow than in anger: there is no blame implied either for searching the Scriptures or for thinking that eternal life is to be found in Scripture; approval rather. What the Jews are blamed for is that they read with a veil lying upon their hearts which He would fear take away (2 Cor 3 15 f.). “Ye search the scriptures”—that is right: and “even you” (emphatic) “think to have eternal life in them”—that is right, too. But “it is these very scriptures” (very emphatic) “which are corrupting your souls” (q. e. d. “in a marvel”) “ye will not come to me and have life”—that you may, that is, reach the very end you have so properly in view in searching the Scriptures. Their failure is due, not to the Scriptures but to themselves, who read the Scriptures to such little purpose.

Quite similarly Our Lord often finds occasion to express wonder at the little effect to which Scripture have been read, because He had 5. Christ’s been been looked into too curiously, but Testimony because it had not been looked into That God earnestly enough, with sufficiently Is Author simple and robust trust in its every According to himself, “Have ye read and even this scripture?” He demands, as He adduces Ps 118 to show that the rejection of the Messiah was already intimated in Scripture (Mk 12 10; Mt 21 42 varies the expression to the equivalent: “Did ye never read in the scriptures”) And when the Pharisees had accused Him of having cast out the Hosannas with which the children in the Temple were acclamation Him, and demanding, “Hearkest thou what these are saying?” He met them (Mt 21 16) merely with: “Ye have heard, Out of the mouths of babes and sucklings thou hast perfect praise?” The underlying thought of these passages is spoken out when He intimates that the source of all error in Divine things is just ignorance of the Scriptures: “Ye do err,” He declares to His questioners, on an important occasion, “not knowing the scriptures” (Mt 22 29); or, as it is put, perhaps more forcibly, in interrogative form, in its ? in another Gospel: “Is it not for this cause that ye err, that ye know not the scriptures?” (Mk 12 24).

Clearly, he who rightly knows the Scriptures does not err. The confidence with which Jesus rested on Scripture, in its every declaration, is further illustrated in a passage like Mt 19 4. Certain Pharisees had come to Him with a question on divorce and He met them thus: “Have ye not read, that he who made them from the beginning made them male and female, and said, For this cause shall a man leave his father and mother, and shall cleave to his wife; and the two shall become one flesh?” (see verse 6). He might have joined together, let not man put asunder.” The point to be noted is the explicit reference of Gen 2 24 to God as its author: “He who made them . . . said”; “what therefore God hath joined together.” Yet this passage does not give us a saying of God’s recorded in Scripture, but just the word of Scripture itself, and can be treated as a declaration of God's only on the hypothesis that all Scripture is a declaration of God's. The in Mk (10 5 ff) just as truly, though not as exphcitly, assigns the passage to God as its author, citing it as authoritative law and speaking of its enactment as an act of God's. And it is interesting to observe in passing that Paul, having occasion to quote the same passage (1 Cor 6 16), also explicitly quotes it as a Divine word;

"For, The twain, saith he, shall become one flesh" the "he" here, in accordance with a usage to be noted later, meaning just "God."
Thus clear is it that Jesus' occasional adduction of Scripture as an authoritative document rests on an ascription of it to God as its author. His testimony is that whatever stands written in Scripture is a word of God.

Nor can we evacuate this testimony of its force on the plea that it represents Jesus only in the days of His flesh, when He may be supposed to have reflected merely the opinions of His day and generation. The view of Scripture He announces was, no doubt, the view of His day and generation as well as His own view. But there is no reason to doubt that it was held by Him, not because it was the current view, but because, in His Divine-human knowledge. He knew it to be true; for, even in His humiliation. He is the faithful and true witness.
And in any event we should bear in mind that this was the view of the resurrected as well as of the humiliated Christ. It was after He had suffered and had risen again in the power of His Divine Ufe that He pronounced those foolish and slow of heart who do not believe all that stands written in all the Scriptures (Lk 24 and that He laid down the simple "Thus il is written" as the sufficient ground of confident belief (Lk 24 46). Nor can we explain away Jesus' testimony to the Divine trustworthiness of Scripture by interpreting it as not His own, but that of His followers, placed on His lips in their reports of His words. Not only is it too constant, minute, intimate and in part incidental, and therefore, as it were, hidden, to admit of this interpretation; but it so pervades all our channels of information concerning Jesus' teaching as to make it certain that it comes actually from Him. It belongs not only to the Jesus of our evangelical records but as well to the Jesus of the earlier sources which underlie our evangelical records, as anyone may assure himself by observing the instances in which Jesus adduces the Scriptures as Divinely authoritative that are recorded in more than one of the Gospels (e.g. "It is written," Mt 4 4.7.10 [Lk 4 4.8.10]; Mt 11 10; [Lk 7 27];
Mt 21 13 [Lk 19 46; Mk 11 17]; Mt 26 31 [Mk 14 21]; "the scripture" or "the scriptures," Mt 19 4 [Mk 10 9]; Mt 21 42 [Mk 12 10;
Lk 20 17]; Mt 22 29 [Mk 12 24; Lk 20 37]; Mt 26 56 [Mk 14 49; Lk 24 44]). These passages alone would suffice to make clear to us the testimony of Jesus to Scripture as in all its parts and declarations Divinely authoritative.
The attempt to attribute the testimony of Jesus to His followers has in its favor only the undeniable fact that the testimony of the writers

Jesus' official life begins with this "It is written"

(Lk 24 46 ff), so the apostles solemnly justified the Gospel which they preached, detail after detail, by appeal to the Scriptures, "That Christ died for our sins according to the scriptures" and "That he hath been raised on the third day according to the scriptures" (ICor 15 3.4; cf Acts 8 35; 17 3; 26 22, and also Rom 1 17; 3 4.10; 4 17; 11 26; 14 11;

(Acts 17 2; 18 24.28); and they encouraged themselves to test its truth by the Scriptures (Acts 17 11). The holiness of life they inculcated, they based on Scriptural requirement (1 Pet 1 16), and they commended the royal law of love which they taught by Scriptural sanction (Jas 2 8). Every detail of duty was supported by them by an appeal to Scripture (Acts 23 5; Rom 12 19). The circumstances of their lives and the events occasionally occurring about them are referred to Scripture for their significance (Rom 2 26; 8 36; 9 33; 11 that whatever was written in Scripture must needs be fulfilled (Mt 26 54; Lk 22 37; 24 44), so His followers explained one of the most startling facts which had occurred in their experience by pointing out that "it was needful that the scripture should be fulfilled, which the Holy Spirit spake before by the mouth of David" (Acts 1 16). Here the ground of this constant appeal to Scripture, so that it is enough that a thing "is contained in scripture"

(1 Pet 2 6) for it to be of indefectible authority, Scripture must. needs is plainly enough declared:
be fulfilled, for what is contained in it is the declaration of the Holy Ghost through the human author. What Scripture says, God says; and accordingly we read such remarkable declarations as "For the scripture saith unto Pharaoh, For this very purpose did I raise thee up" (Rom 9 17);
"And the scripture, foreseeing that God would justify the Gentiles by faith, preached the gospel beforehand unto Abraham, .... In thee shall that Scripture cannot speak in vain. They indicate a certain confusion in current speech between "Scripture" and "God," the outgrowth of a deepseated conviction that the word of Scripture is the word of God. It was not "Scripture" that spoke to Pharaoh, or gave his great promise to Abraham, but God. But "Scripture" and "God" lay so close accordingly we meet with forms of speech such as the identification of the two is in the minds of the writers of the NT.

This identification is strikingly observable in certain catenae of quotations, in which there are brought together a number of passages of Scripture closely connected with one another. The first chapter of the God and Ep. to the Heb supplies an example.

7. Identification of Scripture We may begin with ver 5: "For unto which of the angels said he"—the subject being necessarily "God"—at any time, Thou art my Son, this day have I begotten thee."—the citation being from Ps 2 7 and very appropriate in the mouth of God—"and again, I will be to him a Father, and he shall be to me a Son?"—from 2 8 7 14, again a declaration of God's own—"And when he again bringeth in the firstborn into the world he saith, And let all the angels of God worship him"—from Dt 22 43, LXX, or Ps 97 7, in neither of which is God the speaker—"And of the angels he saith, Who maketh his angels winds, and his ministers a flame of fire"—from Ps 104 4, where again God is not the speaker but is spoken of in the third person—"but of the Son he saith, Thy throne, O God, etc,"—from Ps 45 6.7 where again God is not the speaker, but is addressed—"And, Thou hast begotten him, the begotten one, from Ps 25 27, where again God is not the speaker but is addressed—"But of which of the angels hath he said at any time, Sit thou on my right hand?" etc—from Ps 110 1, in which God is the speaker. Here when he brings the passages where passages in which God is not the speaker, but is addressed or spoken of, indiscriminately assigned to God, because they all have it in common that they are words of Scripture, and as words of Scripture, in the immediate sense, are the words of God. The NT, when we have a series of citations the first of which is introduced by "as it is written," and the next two by "again he saith," and "again, and the last by "and again, Isaiah saith," the first being from Ps 18 49; the second from Dt 32 43; the third from Ps 117 1; and the last from Isa 11 10. Only the last (the only one here assigned to the human author) is a word of God in the text of the OT.

This view of the Scriptures as a compact mass of words of God, enables the formation of a designation for them by which their peculiar divine character is, in a sense, expressed. This designation is the sacred oracles, and the oracles of God in Philo, who very commonly refers to Scripture as the sacred oracles and cites its several passages as each an oracle. Sharing, as they do, Philo's conception of the Scriptures as, in all their parts, a word of God, the NT writers naturally also speak of them under this designation. The classical passage is Rom 3 2 (of He 5 12; Acts 7 38). Here Paul begins an enumeration of the advantages which belonged to the chosen people above other nations, and, after declaring these advantages to have been great and numerous, he places first among them all their possession of the Scriptures: "What advantage then hath the Jew? or what is the profit of circumcision? Much every way: first of all, that they were intrusted with the oracles of God." That by "the oracles of God" here are meant just the Holy Scriptures in their entirety, conceived as a direct Divine revelation, and not any portions of them, or elements in them more esp. thought of as resting primarily on the Divine inspiration of words "spoken," attest primarily its indestructible authority; the designation of it as oracles, and the addition of it by the formula, "It says," attest primarily its immediate divinity. Its authority rests on its divinity and its divinity expresses itself in its trustworthy and the NT writers in the use of them declare them to be a God-breathed document, which, because God-breathed, is through and through trustworthy in all its assertions, authoritative in all its declarations, and down to its last particular, the very word of God, His oracles.

nation, Scripture is thought of as the living voice of God speaking in all its parts directly to the reader; and, accordingly, it is cited by some such formula as "it is said," and this mode of citing Scripture duly occurs as an alternative to "it is written" (Lk 4 12; replacing "it is written in Mi; He 3 15; of Rom 4 18). It is due also to this point of view that Scripture is cited, not as what God or the Holy Spirit "said," but what He "says," the present tense emphasizing the living voice of God speaking in Scriptures to the individuals to which the writings are addressed, in the NT, to require stating; for who could be the speaker of the words of Scripture but God only (Rom 15 10; 1 Cor 15 16; 2 Cor 6 16; Gal 3 16; Eph 4 8; 5 14)? The analogies of this pregnant subjectless 'saith' are very widespread. It was with it that the ancient Pythagoreans, Plato, and the mediaeval Aristotelians adduced each their master's teaching; it was with it, in certain circles, the judgments of Hadrian's great jurist Salvius Julianus were cited; African stylists who attempted to refer by oracle to the ancient model. There is a tendency, cropping out occasionally, in the OT, to omit the name of God as superfluous, when He, as the great logical subject always in mind, would be easily understood (of Job 20 23 is the speaking voice of God). So, too, when the NT writers quoted Scripture there was no need to say whose word it was: that lay beyond question in every mind. This usage, accordingly, is a specially striking intimation of the divine and sacred character of the spoken word of the Divinity, and of the origin of the Scriptures, and means that in citing them they were acutely conscious that they were citing immediate words of God. How completely the Scriptures were to them just the word of God may be illustrated by a passage like Gal 6:16: He saith not, And to seeds, as of many; but as of one, And to thine seed, which is Christ. We have seen Our Lord hanging an argument on the very words of Scripture (Jn 10 34); elsewhere this reasoning depends on the particular example of the divinity of the word (Mt 22 33). The word (Mt 22 43) used in Scripture. Here Paul's argument rests similarly on a grammatical form. No doubt it is the grammatical form of the word that God is referred to by speaking to Abraham that is in question. But Paul knew what a grammatical form God employed in speaking to Abraham only as the Scriptures have transmitted it to him; and, as we have seen, in citing the words of God and the words of Scripture He was not accustomed to make any distinction between them. It is probably the Scriptural word as a Scriptural word, therefore, which he has here in mind: though, of course, it is possible that what he here witnesses to is rather the detailed trustworthy transmission of the Scriptural record than its direct divinity if we can separate two things which apparently were not separated in Paul's mind. This much we can at least say without straining, that the designation of Scripture as scripture and its citation by the, as it is written, attest primarily its indestructible authority; the designation of it as oracles and the addition of it by the formula, "It says," attest primarily its immediate divinity. Its authority rests on its divinity and its divinity expresses itself in its trustworthy and the NT writers in the use of them declare them to be a God-breathed document, which, because God-breathed, is through and through trustworthy in all its assertions, authoritative in all its declarations, and down to its last particular, the very word of God, His oracles.
That the Scriptures are throughout a Divine book, created by the Divine energy and speaking in their every part with Divine authority directly to the heart of the readers, is fundamental fact concerning Scripture them which is witnessed by Christ and the sacred writers to whom we owe the NT. But the strength and constancy with which they bear witness to this primary fact do not prevent their recognizing by the side of it that the Scriptures have come into being by the agency of men. It would be a strange coincidence if they recognized a human element in Scripture: they do not parcel Scripture out, assigning portions of it, or elements in it, respectively to God and man. In their view the whole of Scripture in all its parts and in all its elements, down to the least minutiae, in form of expression as well as in substance of teaching, is from God; but the whole of it has been given by God through the instrumentality of men. There is, therefore, in their view, not, indeed, a human element or ingredient in Scripture, and must less human instrumentality, but a human side or aspect to Scripture; and they do not fail to give full recognition to this human side or aspect. In one of the primary passages which has already been before us, their conception is that the Holy Spirit is the “prophecy” (2 Pet 1 21), “ever came by the will of man; but as borne by the Holy Ghost, men spake from God.” Here the whole initiative is assigned to God, and such complete control of the human agent that the product is truly God’s work. The men who speak in this “prophecy of scripture” speak not of themselves or out of themselves, but from “God”: they speak only as they are “borne by the Holy Ghost.” But that is not all. The Holy Spirit is the product of man, but only of man speaking from God and under such a control of the Holy Spirit as that in their speaking they are “borne” by Him. The conception obviously is that the Scriptures have been given by the instrumentality of men; and this conception finds repeated incidental expression throughout the NT.

It is this conception, for example, which is expressed when Our Lord, quoting Ps 110 1, speaks of the Lord speaking “in the Holy Spirit” (Mk 16 26). There is a certain emphasis here on the words being David’s own words, which is due to the requirements of the argument Our Lord was conducting, but which none the less certainly recognizes the human element in their origin. They are David’s own words which we find in Ps 110, therefore; but they are David’s own words, spoken not of his own motion merely, but “in the Holy Spirit,” that is to say—could not better paraphrase it—“as borne by the Holy Spirit.” In other words, they are “God-breathed,” words and therefore authoritative in a sense above what any words of David, not spoken in the Holy Spirit, could possibly be. Generalizing the matter, we may say that the words of Scripture are conceived by Our Lord and the NT writers as the words of their human authors when speaking “in the Holy Spirit,” that is to say, by His initiative and under His controlling direction. The conception finds even more precise expression, perhaps in such a statement as we find—it is Peter who is speaking and it is again a psalm which is cited—in Acts 1 16, “The Holy Spirit spake by the mouth of David.” Here the Holy Spirit is adduced, of course, as the real author of what is said and not of the psalm which is said will be fulfilled); but David’s mouth is expressly designated as the instrument (it is the instrumental preposition that is used) by means of which the Holy Spirit spake the Scripture in question. He does not speak save through David’s mouth. Accordingly, in Acts 4 25, “the Lord that made the heaven and earth,” acting by His Holy Spirit, is declared to have spoken another psalm “through the mouth of . . . David,” His “servant”; and in Mt 13 35 still another psalm is adduced as “spoken through the prophet” (of Mt 2 5). In the very act of energetically asserting the Divine origin of Scripture the human instrumentality through which it is given is constantly recognized. The NT writers have, therefore, no difficulty in assigning Scripture to its human authors, or in discovering in Scripture traits due to its human authorship. They freely quote it by such simple formulae as these: “Moses saith” (Rom 10 19); “Moses said” (Mt 22 24; Mk 7 10; Acts 3 22); “Moses wrote” (Rom 10 5); “Moses wrote” (Mk 12 19; Lk 20 28); “Isaiah ... saith” (Rom 10 20); “Isaiah said” (Jn 12 39); “Isaiah crieth” (Rom 9 27); “Isaiah hath said before” (Rom 9 29); “said Isaiah the prophet” (Jn 1 23); “said Isaiah prophesies” (Mk 7 16); “David saith” (Lk 20 42; Acts 2 25; Rom 11 9); “David said” (Mk 12 36). It is to be noted that when thus Scripture is adduced by the names of its human authors, it is a matter of complete indifference whether the words adduced are comments or portions of whole settings of Scripture, or is merely the word of the prophet, or his emotions, or his thoughts. It makes no difference. As the plainest words of the human authors are assigned to God as their real author, so the most exact words of God, repeated by the NT, are cited by the names of these human writers (Mt 15 7; Mk 7 6; Rom 10 19 20; cf Mk 7 10 from the Decalogue). To say that “Moses” or “David says,” is evidently thus only a way of saying that “Scripture says,” which is the same as to say that “God says.” The material of citing Scripture, accordingly, carry us little beyond merely connecting the name, or perhaps we may say the individuality, of the several writers with the portions of Scripture given through each. How it was given through them is left meanwhile, if not without suggestion, yet without specific explanation. We seem safe only in inferring much: that the gift of Scripture through its human authors took place by a process much more intimate than can be expressed, declare it would, that it took place in a process in which the control of the Holy Spirit was too complete and pervasive to permit the human qualities of the secondary authors in any way to condition the purity of the product as the word of God. The Scriptures, in other words, are conceived by the NT as an agent of the Holy Spirit, as through and through God’s book, in every part expressive of His mind, given through men after a fashion which does no violence to their nature as men, and we, the book also men’s book as well as God’s, in every part expressive of the mind of its human authors.

If we attempt to get behind this broad statement and to obtain a more detailed conception of the activities by which God has given the Scriptures, we are thrown back upon somewhat general representations, supported by the analogy of the modes of God’s operation. It is very desirable that we should free ourselves at the outset from influences arising from the current employment of the term “inspiration” to designate this process. This term is not a Bib. term and its etymological implications are not perfectly accordant with the Bib. conception of the mind of God in giving the Scriptures. The Bib. writers do not conceive of the Scriptures as a human product breathed into by the Divine Spirit, and thus heightened in its qualities or endowed with new qualities; but as a Divine product produced through the instrumentality of men. They do not conceive of these men, by whose instrumentality Scripture is produced, as working upon their own initiative, though energized by God to greater effect and higher achievement, but as moved by the Divine initiative and borne by the irresistible power of the Spirit of God along ways of His choosing to ends of His appointment. The difference between the two conceptions may not appear great when the mind is fixed exclusively upon the nature of the resulting product. But they are differing conceptions, and look at the production of Scripture from distinct points of view—the human and the Divine; and the involved mental attitudes toward the origin of Scripture are very diverse. The terming of this is too firmly fixed, in both theological and popular usage, as the technical designation of the action of God in giving the Scriptures, to be replaced; and we may be thankful that its native implications lie as close as it does. But it may be justly insisted that it shall receive its definition from the representations of Scripture, and not be permitted to impose upon our thought ideas of the origin of Scripture derived exclusively from the nature of its own production. The Scriptural conception of the relationship of the Divine Spirit to the human authors in the production of Scripture is better expressed by the figure of “breathing” than by the figure of “writing”: and since the terming of the action of the Spirit of God in this relation as a breathing, they represent it as a “breathing out” of the Scriptures by the Spirit, and not as a “breathing into” the Scriptures by Him. The difference of a very marked and significant kind. No one can ever endeavor to form for ourselves a clear conception of the precise nature of the Divine action in this 11. General “breathing out” of the Scriptures—Prolegomena of the Origin of the Scriptures to their appointed god of God’s Part the production of a book of Divine trustworthiness and indefectible authority—we become acutely aware of a more deeply lying and more frequent problem, apart from which this one of inspiration, technically so called, cannot be profitably considered. This is the general problem of the origin of the Scriptures and the part of God in all that complex of processes by the interaction of these two, which we call sacred Scriptures, with all their peculiarities, and all their qualities of whatever sort, have been brought into being. For, of course, these books were not produced suddenly, by some miraculous act—hadn’t come out of heaven, as the phrase goes; but, like all other products of time, are the ultimate effect of many processes cooperating through long periods. There is to be considered, for instance, the preparation of the material which forms the subject-matter of these books: in a sacred history, say, for example, to be narrated; or in a religious experience which may serve as a norm for record; or in a logical elaboration of the contents of revelation which may be placed at the service of God’s people; or in the progressive revelation of Divine truth itself, supplying their culminating contents. And there is the preparation of the men to write these books to be considered, a preparation physical, intellectual, spiritual, which must have attended them throughout their whole lives, and, indeed, must have had its basis in the history of their ancestors, and the effect of which was to bring the right men to the right places at the right times, with the right endowments, impulses, acquitments, to write just the books which were designed for them. When “inspiration,” technically so called, is superimposed on lines of preparation like these, it takes on quite a different aspect from that which it bears when it is thought of as an isolated action of the Divine Spirit operating out of all relation to historical processes. Representations are sometimes made as if, when God wished to produce sacred books which carried the message of God, He was reduced to the necessity of going down to earth and painfully scrutinizing the men He found there, seeking anxiously for the one who, on the whole, promised best for His purpose; and then violently forcing the material He wished expressed through him, against his natural bent, and with as little loss from his recalcitrant characteristics as possible. Of course, nothing of the sort took place. If God wished to give His people a series of letters like Paul’s, He prepared a Paul to write them, and the Paul He brought to the task was a Paul who spontaneously would write just such letters.

If we bear this in mind, we shall know what estimate to place upon the common representation to the effect that the human characteristics of the writers must, and in point of Human of fact do, condition and qualify the Qualities: writings produced by them, the implication of which is that the human Preparatory get from man a pure word of God. As light that passes through the colored glass of a cathedral window, we are told, is light from heaven, but is stained by the tints of the glass through which it is passed. And which is stained, which is passed through the mind and soul of a man must come out discolored by the personality through which it is given, and just to that degree ceases to be the pure word of God. But what if this personality has itself been formed by God into precisely the personality it is, for the express purpose of communicating to the world through it the light that floods the cathedral precisely the tone and quality it receives from them? What if the word of God that comes to His people is framed by God into the word of God it is, precisely by means of the qualities of the man formed by Him for His purpose, through which it is given? When we think of God the Lord giving by His Spirit a body of authoritative Scriptures to His people, we must remember that He is the God of providence and of grace as well as of revelation, and so arranged that He holds all the lines of preparation as fully under His direction as He does the specific operation which we call technically, in the narrow sense, by the name of “inspiration.” The production of the Scriptures is, in point of fact, a long process, in the course of which numerous and very varied Divine activities are involved, providential, gracious, miraculous, all of which must be taken into account in any attempt to explain the relation of God to the production of Scripture. When they are all taken into account we can no longer wonder that the resultant Scriptures are constantly spoken of as the pure word of God. We wonder, rather, that an additional operation of God—what we call specifically “inspiration,” in its technical sense—was thought necessary. Consider, for example, how a piece of sacred history—say the Book of Ch, or the great historical work, Gospel and Acts, of Luke—is brought to the writing. There is first of all the preparation the human author must have: God the Lord leads the sequence of occurrences through the development He has designed for them that they may convey their lessons to His people: a “teleological” or “setiological” character is inherent in the course of events. Then He prepares a man, by birth, training, experience, gifts of grace, and, if need be, of revelation, capable of appreciating this historical development and eager to search it out, thrilling in all his being with its lessons and bent upon making them clear and effectually apparent. When, then, by His providence, God sets this man to work on the writing of this history, will there not be spontaneously written by him the history which it was Divinely intended should be written? Or consider how a psalmist would be prepared to put into moving verse a piece of normative religious experience: how he would be born with just the right quality of religious sensibility, of parents through whom he should receive just the right hereditary bent, and from whom he should get precisely the right religious example and training, in circumstances of life in which his religious tendencies should be developed precisely on right lines; how he would be brought through just the right experiences to quicken in him the precise emotions he would be called upon to express, and finally would be placed in precisely the exigencies which would call out their expression. Or consider the providential preparation of a writer of a didactic epistle—by means of which he should be given the intellectual breadth and acuteness, and be trained in handling, and prepared in the situations which would call out precisely the argumentative presentation of Christian truth which was required of him. When we give due place in our thoughts to the universality of the providential government of God to the minuteness and completeness of its way, and to its invisible efficacy, we may be inclined to ask what is needed beyond this mere providential government to secure the production of sacred books which should be in every detail absolutely accordant with the Divinity.

The answer is, Nothing is needed beyond mere providence to secure such books—provided only that it does not lie in the Divine purpose that these books should possess qualities which rise above the powers of men to produce, even under the most complete Divine guidance. For providence is guidance; and guidance can bring one only so far as his own power can carry him. It is impossible for the integral elements to be scaled above man's native power to achieve, something more than guidance, however effective, is necessary. This is the reason for the superinduction, at the end of the long process of the production of the Scriptures, of the addition of the special parts which we call technically "inspiration." By it, the Spirit of God, flowing confluent in with the providentially and graciously determined work of men, spontaneously producing under the Divine directions the writings appointed to them, gives the product a Divine quality unattainable by human powers alone. Thus these books become not merely the word of godly men, but the immediate word of God Himself, speaking directly as such to the minds and hearts of every reader. The true一架 virtue of "inspiration" emerges, thus, as twofold. It gives to the books written under its "bearing"—a quality which is truly superhuman; a trustworthiness, an authority, a searchingness, a profundity, a profitableness which is altogether Divine. And it speaks this Divine word immediately to each reader's heart and conscience; so that he does not require to make his way to God, painfully, perhaps even uncertainly, through the words of His servants, the human instruments in writing the Scriptures, but can listen directly to the Divine word and place hearing immediately in the Scriptural word to him.

That the writers of the NT themselves conceive the Scriptures to have been produced thus by Divine operations extending through the increasing ages and involving a multitude of varied activities, can be made clear by simply attending to the occasional references they make to this or that step in the process. It lies, for example, on the face of their expositions, that they looked upon the Bib. history as teleologically ordered. When, e.g. Rom 16:4; cf Romans 4:23.24;) to the course of the historical events themselves as guided for our benefit: "Now these things happened unto them by way of example"—in a typical fashion, in such a way that, as they occurred, a typical character, or predictive reference impressed itself upon them; that is to say, briefly, the history occurred as it did in order to bear a message to us—"and they were written for our admonition, upon whom the ends of the ages are come" (1 Cor 10:11; cf verse 6). Accordingly, it has become a commonplace of Bib. exposition that "the history of redemption itself is a typically progressive one" (Küper), and is in a manner impregnated with the prophetic element, so as to form a "part of a great plan which stretches from the fall of man to the redemption of all things in glory; and, in so far as it reveals the ultimate plan of God toward man, carries a respect to the future not less than to the present" (P. Fairbairn). It lies equally on the face of the NT allusions to the subject that its writer understood that the preparation of men to become vehicles of God's message to men was not of yesterday, but had its beginnings in the very origin of their being. The call by which Paul, for example, was made an apostle of Jesus Christ, was suddenly willed, but apparently with a predestination; but it is precisely this Paul who reckons this call as only one step in a long process, the beginnings of which antedated his own existence: "But when it was the good pleasure of God, who separated me, even from my mother's womb, and called me through his grace, to reveal his Son in me" (Gal 1:15-16; cf Jer 1:5; Isa 49:1.5). The recognition by the writers of the NT of the experiences of God's grace, which had been vouchsafed to them as an integral element fitting them to be the bearers of His gospel to others, finds such pervasive expression that the only difficulty is to select from the mass the most illustrative passages. Such a statement as Paul gives in the opening verses of 2 Cor is thoroughly in accordance with this: "he who has been afflicted and comforted to the end that he might "be able to comfort them that are in any affliction, through the comfort wherewith" he had himself been "comforted of God." For, he explains, "Whether we be afflicted, it is for your comfort and salvation; or whether we are comforted, it is for your comfort, which worketh in the patient endur-which takes effect at the very point of the writing of Scripture—understanding the term "writing" here as inclusive of all the processes of the actual composition of Scripture, the investigation of documents, the collection of facts, the exegesis of conclusions, and the adaptation of them to ends and the like—with the effect of giving to the resultant Scripture a specifically supernatural character, and constituting it a Divine, as well as human, book. Obviously the mode of operation of this Divine activity governing to this result is conceived, in full accord with the analogy of the Divine operations in other spheres of its activity, in providence and in grace alike, as conform with the human activities operative in the case; as, in a word, the nature of what has come to be known as "immanent action."

It will not escape observation that thus "inspiration" is made a mode of "revelation." We are often exhorted, to be sure, to distinguish sharply between "inspiration" and "revelation"; and the exhortation is "revelation" just when "revelation" is taken in one of its narrower senses, of, say, an external manifestation of God, or of an immediate communication to the soul, to the mind, of the Word. But "inspiration" does not differ from "revelation" in these narrow senses as genus from genus, but as a species of one genus differs from another. That operation of God which we call "inspiration," that is, the operation of the Spirit of God by which He "bears" men in the process of composing Scripture, so that they write, not of themselves, but "from God," is one of the modes in which God makes known to men His being, His will, His operations, His purposes. It is as distinctly a mode of revelation as any mode of revelation can be, and therefore it performs the same office where all revelation performs, that is to say, in the express words of Paul, it makes men wise, and makes them wise unto salvation. All "spiritual" or "supernatural" revelation (which is redemptive in its very idea, and occupies a place as a substantial element in God's redemptive processes) has precisely this for its end; and Scripture, as a mode of the redemptive revelation, finds its particular function just in this: if the "inspiration" by which Scripture is produced renders it trustworthy and authoritative, it renders it trustworthy and authoritative only that it may the better serve to make men wise unto salvation. Scripture is its purpose. It is as distinctly a mode of revelation as any mode of revelation can be, and therefore it performs the same office where all revelation performs, that is to say, in the express words of Paul, it makes men wise, and makes them wise unto salvation. All "spiritual" or "supernatural" revelation (which is redemptive in its very idea, and occupies a place as a substantial element in God's redemptive processes) has precisely this for its end; and Scripture, as a mode of the redemptive revelation, finds its particular function just in this: if the "inspiration" by which Scripture is produced renders it trustworthy and authoritative, it renders it trustworthy and authoritative only that it may the better serve to make men wise unto salvation. Here Scripture is its purpose. It is as distinctly a mode of revelation as any mode of revelation can be, and therefore it performs the same office where all revelation performs, that is to say, in the express words of Paul, it makes men wise, and makes them wise unto salvation.

15. "Inspiration" and "revelation"; and the exhortation is "revelation" just when "revelation" is taken in one of its narrower senses, of, say, an external manifestation of God, or of an immediate communication to the soul, to the mind, of the Word. But "inspiration" does not differ from "revelation" in these narrow senses as genus from genus, but as a species of one genus differs from another. That operation of God which we call "inspiration," that is, the operation of the Spirit of God by which He "bears" men in the process of composing Scripture, so that they write, not of themselves, but "from God," is one of the modes in which God makes known to men His being, His will, His operations, His purposes. 16. Scriptures and Divine-human Book?

The Second Testament of the New Testament is the Christian canon of books, which includes the Old Testament. It is divided into two main parts: the Gospels and the New Testament. The Gospels are the first four books of the New Testament and contain the life, teachings, and ministry of Jesus Christ. The New Testament also contains the letters of Paul and other early Christian writers, which are addressed to various churches and individuals. These books form the foundation of Christian faith and practice, and they are widely studied and interpreted by scholars and believers alike.

17. Scripture as inspired?

"Scripture as inspired" refers to the belief that the Bible is a collection of divinely inspired writings. This belief is central to many Christian denominations and is based on the claim that the authors of the Bible were guided by the Holy Spirit during the process of writing. The concept of inspiration is rooted in the idea that God was actively involved in the creation of the biblical text, ensuring its accuracy and relevance for all time. This belief is expressed in various ways across different Christian traditions, from the simple acknowledgment of the divinity of the Bible to the more complex interpretations that seek to elucidate the nature of divine guidance in the writing process.
matter and form of their teaching (1 Cor 2 13). They, therefore, speak with the utmost assurance of their teaching (Gal 1 7 8); and they issue commands with the completest authority (1 Thess 4 214; 2 Thess 3 6 12), making it, indeed, the test of whether one has the Spirit that he should recognize what they demand as commandments of God (1 Cor 14 37). It would be strange, indeed, if these high claims were made for their oral teaching and commandments exclusively. In point of fact, they are made explicitly also for their written injunctions. It was “this Paul writing,” the recognition of which as commands of the Lord, he makes the test of a Spirit-led man (1 Cor 14 37). It is his “word by this epistle,” obedience to which he makes the condition of Christian communion (2 Thess 3 14). There seems involved in such an attitude toward their own teaching, oral and written, a claim on the part of the NT writers to something very much like the “inspiration” which they attribute to the writers of the OT.

And all doubt is dispelled when we observe the NT writers placing the questions of one another in the same category of “Scripture” with the books of the OT. The same Paul who, in 2 Tim 3 16, declared that “every” or “all” Scripture is “profitable” for “teaching, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness,” had already written in 1 Tim 5 18: “For the scripture saith, Thou shalt not muzzle the ox when he treadeth out the corn. And, The laborer is worthy of his hire.” The first clause here is derived from Dt and the second from the Gospel of Lk, though both are cited as together constituting, or better, forming part of the “Scripture” which Paul adduces as so authoritative as by its mere citation to end all strife. Who shall say that, in the declaration of the later ep. that “all” or “every” Scripture is God-breathed, they make it seem that they now have no right to judge what whatever other new books he classed with the old under the name of Scripture, in the back of his mind, along with those old books which Timothy had had in his hands from infancy? And the same Peter who declared that every “prophecy of scripture” was the product of men who spoke “from God,” being “borne” by the Holy Ghost (2 Pet 1 21), in this same ep. (3 16), places Paul’s Epp. in the category of Scripture along with whatever other books. For that, says he, were these epp., not out of his own wisdom, but “according to the wisdom given to him,” and though there are some things in them hard to be understood, yet it is only “the ignorant and unstedfast” who weigh these texts as passages—as what else could be expected of men who wrote “also the other Scriptures” (obviously the OT is meant)—“unto their own destruction”? Is it possible to say that Peter could not have had these epp. of Paul also lurking somewhere in the back of his mind, along with “the other scriptures,” when he told his readers that every “prophecy of scripture” owes its origin to the prevailing operation of the Holy Ghost? What must be understood in estimating the testimony of the NT writers to the inspiration of Scripture is that “Scripture” stood in their minds as the title of a unitary body of books, throughout the gift of God through His Spirit to His people; but that this body of writings was at the same time understood to be a growing aggregate, so that what is said of it applies to the new books which were being added to it as the Spirit gave them, as fully as to the old books which had come down to them from their hoary past. It is a mere matter of detail to determine precisely what new books were thus included by that principle. They say to us some of them themselves. Those who received them from their hands tell us of others. And when we put the two bodies of testimony together we find that they constitute just our NT. It is no pressure of the witness of the writers of the NT to the inspiration of the Scripture, therefore, to look up as covering the entire body of “Scriptures,” the new books which they were themselves adding to this aggregate, as well as the old books which they had already received as Scripture for themselves. No one can lay claim by just right to the appellation of “Scripture,” as employed in its eminent sense by those writers, can by the same just right lay claim to the “inspiration” which they ascribe to this “Scripture.”

BENJAMIN B. WARFIELD

INSTANT, instant, INSTANTLY, instant-li; Derivate from Lit instare. Found in Eng. with various meanings from the 15th cent. to the present time.

Instant is used once in Isa 29 5 in the sense of immediate time; elsewhere in the sense of urgent, pressing; Lk 23 23, where “were instant” is the AV tr of the vb, ἐκπέμπει, epistle; Rom 12 12, where it is used in the vb, προσκυνεῖν, epistle, of Acts 6 4. In 2 Tim 4 2 it stands for the expressive vb, τιμοῦν, episte, “stand to.”

Instantly (urgently, atedinantly) is the AV rendering of two different Gr. phrases, ἐκπέμπει, epistle, found in Lk 7 4; and ἐκπέμπει τιμοῦν, epistle, in Acts 26 7. In both cases AV renders “earnestly."

INSURRECTION, in-su-rēk’shən: The word in Ps 64 2 AV is changed in RV into “tumult”!; in Ezr 4 19 (vb.) it represents the Aram. נָעָב, nēḇ’āḇ, “to lift up oneself.” In the NT στάσις, stāsis, is rendered “insurrection” in Mk 16 7 AV (where of the vb. “made insurrection”), but in Lk 23 19.25 “insurrection.” RV correctly renders “insurrection” throughout; also in Acts 24 5 “insurrections” for AV “sedition.”

INTEGRITY, in-tēg’ri-tē: The tr of החס, tōm, ״tūm-māh,” the tr of תומ, “sincerity,” “soundness,” “completeness,” rendered also “upright,” “perfection.” Its original sense appears in the phrase וַתְּבִין (1 K 22 34; 2 Ch 18 33), “A certain man drew his bow at a vent,” m “Heb, in his simplicity” (cf 2 S 15 11; “in their simplicity”). It is trd “integrity” (Gen 20 16; 1 K 9 4; Ps 7 14; 26 21; 26 11; 41 12; 78 72; Prov 19 11; 20 7), in all which places it seems to carry the meaning of simplicity, or sincerity of heart and intention, truthfulness, uprightness. In the pl. (תומם) it is an epithet on the breastplate of the high priest (Ex 28 30; Dt 33 8; Ezr 2 63; Neh 7 65), one of the sacred lots, indicating, perhaps, “innocence” or “integrity” (LXX ἀθετεῖα). See עִימָם and תָּהֶם. Another word trd “integrity” is תֹומָמָה, from תֹּמַם, “to be upright,” “perfect,” only in Job 3 9; 27 5; 31 6; Prov 11 3. The word “integrity” does not occur in the NT, but its equivalents may be seen in “sincerity,” “truth,” “the pure heart,” “the single eye,” etc. In the above sense of simplicity of intention it is equivalent to being honest, sincere, upright, and is fundamental to true character.

INTELLIGENCE, in-tel’i-jens (תִּיסְיִר, bōlāh): Occurs only once in AV as the tr of בּוֹלָה, “to discriminate” (frequently trd “to understand”), in Dn 11 30 AV, “[he shall have intelligence with them that forsake the holy covenant,” RV renders “have regard unto them.” “Intelligence” occurs in 2 Mac 3 9 AV, in the sense of information (so RV).

INTEND, in-tend’, INTENT, in-tent’: Early Eng. words derived from Lat and used in AV, sometimes in RV, to translate a number of different expressions of the original.

Intend is sometimes used in Eng. in the literal sense of Lat intendere, “to stretch,” “but in the Eng. Bible it is used only of the direction of the mind toward an object. Sometimes it is used of mere design (μυϊδερ, mēlidēr), Acts 5 33 AV; 20 13; or of desired action (ἐξαναδείκνυμι, thēna dēnūmī), Lk 14 28 AV; again of a fixed purpose (βολομένος, boλoλoμēnōs), Acts 5 12; 22 4; or, finally, of a declared intention (ἐμφανίζω, emphānīzō), Josh 22 33 AV; 2 Ch 23 13 AV.

Intend is used only of purpose, and is the tr sometimes of a conjunction (καθότι, kathōtī), 2 S 17 14; (καθὼς’ an), 2 K 10 19; (ἐκ, hīnā), Eph 3 10; sometimes of an infinitive of purpose, 1 Cor 10 6; or of a preposition with pronoun (ἐξ ὅστις, ἐκ τούτων), Acts 9 21; and sometimes of a sub. (ἐκτῶν, λόγοί), Acts 10 20. This variety of original expressions is rendered in the Eng. by single terms is an interesting illustration of the extent of interpretation embodied in our Eng. Bible.

INTERCESSION, in-tér-sesh’un (גיְדר, nāgāh, “to make intercession”; originally “to strike upon,” or “against”); then in a good sense, “to assail anyone with petitions,” “to urge,” and when on behalf of another, “to intercede” (Ruth 1 16; Jer 7 16; 27 18; Job 21 15; Gen 33 8; Isa 55 12; Jer 36 25). A similar idea is found in bietet, used in the NT “intercession.” The Eng. word is derived from Lat intercedere, “to come between,” which strangely has the somewhat opposed meanings of “obstruct” and “to interpose on behalf of a person,” and finally “to intercede.” The growth of this word in the various languages is highly suggestive. In the Gr NT we find the word in 1 Tim 2 1; 4 5; ἑντοπία, entepochein, is also found in Rom 8 26-34):

III. INTERCESSION OF THE HOLY SPIRIT

The meaning of the word is determined by its use in 1 Tim 2 1, “I exhort, therefore, first of all, that supplications, prayers, intercessions, and giving of thanks, be made for all and men;” where the different kinds of intercession prayers appear to be distinguished.

Considerable discussion has arisen on the exact meaning of these words. Augustine refers them to the liturgy of the Eucharist. This seems to be importing the significance of the various parts of the ceremony as observed at a time much later than the date of the passage in question. “Supplications” and “prayers” refer generally and specific petitions; “intercessions” will then have the meaning of a request concerning others.

Intercession is prayer on behalf of another, and naturally arises from the instinct of the human heart—not merely prompted by affection and interest, but recognizing that God’s relation to man is not merely individual, but social. Religion thus involves man’s relations to his fellow-man, just as in man’s social position intercession with one on behalf of another is a common incident, becoming, in the development of society, the function of appointed officials; as in legal and courtly procedure, so in religion, the spontaneous and affectionate prayer to God on behalf of another grows into the regular and orderly service of a duly appointed priesthood. Intercession is thus to be regarded:

(1) as the spontaneous act of man for his fellow-man; (2) the official act of developed sacrodotalism; (3) the perfecting of the natural movement of humanity, and the typified function of priesthood in the intercession of Christ and the Holy Spirit.

I. Man’s Intercession for His Fellow-Man

Many such prayers are recorded in Scripture. The sacrificial act of Noah may have been partly of this nature, for it is followed by a promise of God on behalf of the earth and all its creatures (Gen 8 20-22). Such also is Abraham’s prayer for Ishmael (Gen 17 18); Abraham’s prayer for Sodom (Gen 18 23-33); Abraham for Abimelech (Gen 20 17). Jacob’s blessing of Joseph’s sons is of the nature of intercession (Gen 48 8-23). His dying blessing of his sons is hardly to be regarded as intercessory; it is, rather, declarative, although in the case of Joseph it approaches intercession. The absence of distinct intercessory prayer from Abra-mam to Moses is to be observed, and shows how intensely personal and individual the religious consciousness was still in its undeveloped quality. In Moses, however, the social element finds a further development, and intercessory prayer for deliverance of the people, through the spirit of the Father of the Faithful. Moses is the creator of the national spirit. He lifts religion from its somewhat selfish character in the patriarchal life to the higher and wider plane of a national and racial fellowship.

The ascensive character of the Divine leading of man is found thus in the development of the intercessory spirit, e.g. Moses' prayer for the removal of plagues (Ex 16 25 f.); for cessions of water at Rephidim (17 4); for victory over Amaleck (17 8–16); prayer for the people after the golden calf (Ex 32 11–14.21–34; 33 12 f.); after the renewal of the tables of stone (34 9); at the setting forth and stopping of the Ark (Nu 10 35 f.); after the burning at building of Mira-plepsy (12 13); after the return of the spies (14 13–19); after the destruction by serpents (Nu 21 7); for direction in the case of the daughters of Zelophehad (27 5); for a successor (27 15); recital of prayer for the people for their entrance into Canaan (Dt 3 23 f.); recital of his prayer for the people after the worship of the golden calf (9 18 ff.); recital of prayers for the rebellious people (Dt 9 25–29); a command to him who pays his third-year tithes to offer prayer for the nation (26 15); Moses final blessing of the tribes (Dt 33).

This extensive series of the intercessory prayers of Moses forms a striking illustration of the growth of religion, represented by the founder of the national life of Israel. It is also the

4. Interces-
sory Prayer in Later History of Israel

In Jgs 6 29 we find the first instance of the intercessory prayer of the people. It was for a good cause, and the people's intercession is a

22 occasion for the national song of Jgs 8 21 ff., and the recognition by the people of Samuel's place (1 S 8 1 f.; see also comparative absence of intercessory prayer from the service-book of Israel, and its collected expressions of spiritual experience, is instructive. We find continued references elsewhere, but the next part of these references are descriptive of their wickedness, or denunciatory of their hostility to the Priest. The Book of Psalms is striking commentary on the ground of Israel’s spiritual life. Intense as it is in its perception of God and His claim on human righteousness, it is one of the highest, if not the highest, in its use of the name of Israel’s intercessors. Thus is found in the experience and expressions of the psions.

In the Wisdom books there is little, if any, reference to intercession. They deal rather with ethical character than moral, and unutilitarian basis. It is noticeable that the only reference to pleading a cause is said by the Lord Himself as against the injustice of man (Prov 22:23): “Jeh will not plead the (the poor’s) cause.” Action on behalf of others does not appear to have been very highly regarded by the current ethics of the Israelite. A kind of negative helpfulness is indicated in Prov 24:28: “Be not a witness against thy neighbor without cause,” and it is significant that the office of advocate was not known among the Jews until they had come under the authority of Rome, when, not knowing the forms of Roman law, they were obliged to secure the aid of a Roman lawyer before the courts. Such practitioners were known as (Clc. 1 Coros a. c. 30); Tertullus (Acts 24:1) was such an advocate.

In the prophetic books the note of intercession reappears. The prophet, though primarily a messenger from God to man, has also something of the character of the intercessor (see Isaiah’s call, Isa 6). Isa 6:1-8 exhibits the intercessory character of Moses and Samuel. The request of Hezekiah for the prayers of Isaiah (Isa 37:4), and the answer of the Lord in the form of the letter penned in ch. 26, recall the constantly recurring sense of Moses’ message to the people. Hezekiah himself is an intercessor (vs 14–21). In Jer 4:10 intercession is mingled with the words of the messenger.

The sin of the people hinders such prayers as were offered on their behalf (Jer 7:16; cf 11:14; 14:11). Intercessory prayers are found in Jer 10:25 ff.; 14:7 ff.19–22. The message of Zephaniah requesting Jeremiah’s help is perhaps an instance of seer-inquiry as much as intercession (Jer 21:1; cf 1 S 9:19). In Jer 42:4, the prophet consents to the request from Johanan to seek the Lord on behalf of the people. The book of Lam is naturally conceived in a more constantly recurring spirit of intercession. In the prophecies of Jeremiah has been the messenger of God to the people. But, after the catastrophe, in whose sorrow he appeals to God for mercy, he turns to the people (Lam 2:20; 5:19). Ezekiel in the same way is rather the seer of visions and the prophet representative of God. Yet at times he appeals to God for the people (Ezk 9:8; 11:13). In Dnl we find the intercession of his three friends sought for in order to secure the revelation of the king’s dream (Dnl 2:17); and Daniel’s prayer for Jesus and her people (Dnl 9:16–19).

In the Minor Prophets intercession rarely appears; even in the graphic pictures of Jonah, though the work itself shows the endee of God’s relation to humanity outside of Israel, the prophet himself exhibits no tenderness and utters no pleas for the city against which he had been sent to prophesy, and receives the implied rebuke from the Lord for his want of sympathy, caring more for the worm than for the vast population of Nineveh, whom the Lord, however, pitied and spared (Jon 4). Even the sublime prayer of Hab 3 has only a suggestion of intercession. Zec 6:13 relieves the general severity of the prophetic message, containing the endearment of a royal priest whose office was partially that of an intercessor, though the picture is darkened by the character of the priesthood and the people, whose services had been selfish, without mercy and compassion (Zec 7:4–7). Now the spirit but for the part held by the gleam of the promise of a royal priest whose office was partially that of an intercessor, though the picture is darkened by the character of the

10. The Priest and offering of the sacrifice even for the Intercession is often mentioned in the context of the national functions, both of the regular and the occasional ceremonies, the priest represented the individual or the community. In Joel 2:17 the priests are distinctly hidden to “weep between the porch and the altar, and let them say, Spare thy people. O Jeh. Mal 1:9 appeals to them for intercession to God, and the graphic scene in 1 Mac 7:33–38 shows the priests interceding on behalf of the people against Nicanor.

In the NT, all prayer necessarily takes a new form from its relation to Our Lord, and in this intercessory prayer shares. At the outset, Christ teaches prayer on behalf of intercession in those “which despitefully use you” (Mt 5:44 AV). How does this change the entire spirit of prayer? We breathe a new atmosphere of the higher revelation of love. The Lord’s Prayer (Mt 6:9–13) is of this character. Its initial word is social, domestic; prayer is the address of the children to the Father. Even though some of the petitions are not original, yet their place in the prayer, and the general tone of the Master’s teaching, exhibit the social and altruistic spirit, not so pervasive of the older dispensation. It is the kingdom petitions, with its essentially intercessory character. The forgiveness of others, which is the measure and plea of our own forgiveness, brings even those who have wronged us upon the same plane as ourselves, and if the plea be genuine, how can we refuse to pray for them? And if for our enemies, then surely for our friends. In Mt 7 11 f., the good things sought of the Father are to be interpreted as among those that if we desire from others we should do to them, and that intercessory prayer cannot be absent. We find the spirit of intercession in the pleas of those who sought Christ’s help for their friends, which He was always so quick to recognize; the centurion for his servant (Mt 8:13); the friends of the paralytic (Mt 9:2–8), where the miracle was wrought on the ground of the friends’ faith. Of a similar character are the requests of the woman for her child and the Lord’s response (Mt 15:28); the man for his lunatic son (17:14–21). There is the suggestion of the intercessory spirit in the law of trespasses, specifically followed by the promise of the answer to the prayer of the two or three, agreed and in fellowship (Mt 18:15–20), with the immediately attached precepts of forgiveness (v 21–35). A remarkable instance of intercession is recorded in Mt 20:20–26, where the mother of Zedelae’s sons makes a request on behalf of her children; the added expression, “worshipping him,” raises the occasion into one of intercessory prayer. Our Lord’s reproof is not to the prayer, but to its unworthiness.

It is needless to review the cases in the other Gospels. But the statement of Mk 6:5 f. that Christ could not perform mighty works because of unbelieving sheds a flood of light upon one of the important conditions of judgment. Herein is contrasted with the healing conditioned by the faith of others than the healed. One of the most distinct examples of intercessory prayer is that of the Lord's intercession for Peter (Lk 22:31 f.), and for those who crucified Him (Lk 23:34). The place of intercession in the work of Christ is seen clearly in Our Lord's intercessory prayer (see INTERCESSION OF CHRIST), where it is commanded by definite precept and promise of acceptance. The promise of the answer to prayer in the name of Christ is very definite (Jn 16:24); Christ's high-priestly prayer is the sublimest height of prayer to God and is intercessory throughout (Jn 17); Jn 16:26 does not, as some have held, deny His intercession for His disciples, though it only throws open the approach to God Himself.

Acts introduces us to the working of the fresh elements which Christ gave to life. Hence the prayers of the church become Christian prayers, involving the wider outlook on others and the world at large which Christianity has bestowed on men. The prayer of the assembled believers upon the name the liberation of the apostles breathes this spirit (Acts 4:23-30). The consecrating prayer of the seven for the Holy Intercessory (Acts 6:6; cf. Acts 1:24). How pathetic is the plea of Stephen for his murderers (Acts 7:60)! How natural is intercession (Acts 2:42) Peter at Joppa (Acts 9:40); the church praying without ceasing for Peter (Acts 12:5). Barnabas and Saul at Antioch (Acts 13:3); Paul and Barnabas praying for the churches (Acts 14:23); the church at Antioch commending Paul and Silas to the grace of God (Acts 15:40); Paul and the elders of Ephesus (Acts 20:36), are all examples, more or less defined, of intercessory prayer.

In the Epp. we may expect to find intercession more distinctly filled with the relation of prayer through Christ. Paul gives us many examples in his Epp.: for the Romans (Rom 1:9); the Spirit's interceding (5:27); Paul's prayer for his race (10:1); his request for prayers (15:30); the help that he found from his friends (2 Cor 1:11): prayer for the Corinthian church (2 Cor 13:7); for the Ephesians (Eph 1:16-20); Eph 2:14-21; see also Eph 6:18; Phil 1:3-11,19; Col 1:9-10; 3:1; Acts 12:2); a definite command that intercession be made for all men and for kings and those in authority (1 Tim 2:2); his prayer for Timothy (2 Tim 1:3); for Philemon (vers 4); and prayer to be by the elders of the church. (Jas 5:14-18: see also He 13:14-21; 1 Jn 5:14,17).

II. Intercession Perfected in Christ's Office and in the Church.—This review of the intercession of the Scriptures prepares us for the development of a specific office of intercession, perfectly realized in Christ. We have seen that the people's request to represent them before God. In a large and generous spirit the leader of Israel intercedes with God for his nation. It was natural that this striking example of intercessory prayer should be followed by other leaders, and that the gradually developed system of religious worship should furnish the conception of the priest, and esp. the high priest, as the intercessor for those who came to the sacrifice. This was particularly the significance of the Day of Atonement, when after offering for himself, the high priest offered the sacrifice for the whole people. This official act, however, does not do away with the intercessory character of prayer as offered by men. We have seen how it runs through the whole history of Israel. But it lives and much more distinctly in the Christian life and apparently in the practice of the Christian assembly itself. Paul continually refers to his own intercessory prayers, and seeks for a similar service on his own behalf from those to whom he writes based upon the natural tendency of the heart filled by love and a deep sympathetic sense of relation to others. Christ's intercessory prayer is the highest example and pattern of this form of prayer. His intercessions for His disciples, for His crucifiers, are recorded, and the sacred record rises to the supreme height in the prayer of Jn 17. In this prayer the following characteristics are to be found: (1) It is based upon the intimate relation of Jesus to the Father. This gives to such a prayer its singular definiteness; may it be, its right. (2) It follows the complete fulfillment of duty. It is not the mere expression of desire, even for others. It is the crown of effort on their behalf. He has revealed God to His disciples. He has given them to God's world. This is the prayer for them (Jn 17:6-7). (3) It recognizes the Divine, unbroken relation to the object of the prayer: "I am no more in the world, and these are in the world, and I come to Thee. Holy Father, keep," etc (ver 11). (4) The supreme end of the prayer is salvation from the evil of the world (ver 15). (5) The wide sweep of the prayer and its chief objects—unity with God, and the presence with Christ, and the indwelling of the Divine love. The prayer is a model for all intercessory prayer. See, further, INTERCESSION OF CHRIST; PRAYERS OF CHRIST; OFFICES OF CHRIST.

III. Intercession of the Holy Spirit.—In connection with the subject of intercession, there arises a most interesting question as to whether the Holy Spirit is not the real intercessor. The text in which the doctrine seems to be taught is that of Rom 8:26 f.; "In like manner the Spirit also helpeth our infirmity: for we know not how to pray as we ought; but the Spirit itself maketh intercession for us with groanings which cannot be uttered; and he that searcheth the hearts knoweth what is the mind of the Spirit, because he maketh intercession for the saints according to the will of God." By far the larger number of expositors have understood by the Spirit, the Holy Spirit. The older commentators, in general, refer to the Holy Spirit. Tholuck, Ewald, Philip Meyer, most of the Amer. theologians and Eng. commentators, as Shedd, Alford, Jewett, Wordsworth, interpret it in the same way. Lange and Olahausen refer it to the human spirit. Undoubtedly the "groanings" have led to the denial of the reference to the Holy Spirit. But the very form of the word "helpeth" indicates cooperation, and this must be of something other than the human spirit itself. The undoubted difficulties of the passage, which are strongly urged by Lange (see Lange's Comm. on Rom 8:26), must be acknowledged. At the same time the statement seems to be very clear and definite. Compiling and looking to the fact that the Holy Spirit is here referred to as dwelling in us, and thus making intercession. The Divine Spirit is said to be a Spirit of supplication (See 12:10). The distinction which is made between the intercession of Christ in heaven in His priestly office and that of the Holy Spirit interceding within the souls of believers, referred to by Shedd (see Comm. on Rom, must be carefully used, for if pressed to its extreme it would lead to the materialization and localization of the Divine nature. Moreover, may not the intercession of Our Lord be regarded as being partially exemplified in that of the Spirit whom He has declared to be His agent and representative? If Christ dwells in believers by His Spirit, His intercession, esp. if subjective in and with their spirits, may properly be described as the intercession of the Holy Ghost.

INTERCESSION OF CHRIST: The general conception of Our Lord's mediatorial office is specially summed up in His intercession in which He appears in His high-priestly office, and also as interceding with the Father on behalf of that humanity whose cause He had espoused.
The function of priesthood as developed under Judaism involved the position of mediation between man and God. The priest 1. Christ’s represented man, and on man’s behalf Intercession approached God; thus he offered sacrifice, interceded and gave to the father of his people whom he represented the benediction and expression of the Divine accept- ance. (For the various forms of these offerings, see special articles.) As in sacrifice, so in the work of Christ, we find the proprietary rights of the officer in the sacrifice. For man, Christ as one with man, and yet in His own personal right, offers Himself (see Rom 5; and of Gal 4 5 with He 2 11). There was also the transfer of guilt and its conditions, typically by laying the hand on the head of the animal, which then bore the sins of the officer and was presented to God by the priest. The acknowledgment of sin and the surrender to God is completely fulfilled in Christ’s offering of Himself, and His death (cf Lev 3 2 6; 16 21; with Jn 2 22). Our Lord’s intercessory quality in the sacrifice of Himself is not only indicated by the imputation of guilt to Him as representing the sinner, but also in the victory of His life over death, which is then given to man in God’s acceptance of His representative and sub- stitute.

In the Epistle to the Hebrews, the intercessory character of Our Lord’s high-priestly office is transferred to the heavenly condition and work of Christ, where the relations of His mission are regarded as being still continued in the heavenly place (see He 9 11-28). This entrance into heaven is once for all, and in the person of the high priest the way is open to the very presence of God. Our Lord, as He Himself as our perfectly sinless and obedient servant, of the Lord was concluded and gathered up into His kingly office (vs 13 14-18). But from another point of view, we ourselves are hidden to enter into the Holiest Place; as if in union with Christ we too become a kingly priesthood (He 10 19-22; and cf 1 Pet 2 9).

It must not be forgotten, however, that this right of entrance into the most holy Place is one that depends entirely upon our vital union with Christ, His relation to us and our relation to Him in this sense He fulfills the second duty of His high-priestly office as intercessor, with the added conception drawn from the legal advocacy of the Roman court. The term Advocate in 1 Jn 2 2 is used in the same sense, saying, “He is called Advocate, because He is the one who is to be comforter.” The word is of familiar use in Greek and Latin for the legal advocate or patronus who appeared on behalf of his client. Thus, in the double sense of priestly and legal representative, Our Lord is our intercessor in Heaven.

Of the modes in which Christ carries out His intercessory office, we can have no knowledge except so far as we may fairly deduce them from the phraseology and suggested ideas of Scripture. As high priest, He may surely be right for us to aid our weak faith by assuring ourselves that Our Lord pleads for us, while at the same time we must be careful not to deprave our thought concerning the glorified Lord by the metaphors and analogies of earthly relationship.

The intercessory work of Christ may thus be represented: He represents man before God in His perfect nature, His exalted office and His completed work. The Scripture word for this is (He 9 24) “to appear before the face of God for us.” This is the office of Our Lord as advocate or parakletos. That this conveys some relation to the aid which one who has broken the law receives from an advocate cannot be overlooked, and we find Christ’s intercession in this aspect brought into connection with the texts which refer to justification and its allied ideas (see Rom 8 34; 1 Jn 2 1). In Prayers of Christ (q.v.), the intercessory character of many of Our Lord’s prayers, and esp. that of Jn 17, is considered. It 2. Christ’s has been impossible for Christian Intercity thought to divest itself of the idea Work from that the heavenly intercession of Christ stand- point of Prayer is of the order of prayer. It is im- possible for us to know; and even if Christ now prays to the Father, it can be in no way analogous to earthly prayers. The thought of some portion of Christen- dom distinctly combined prayer in the heavenly work of the Lord. There is danger in extreme views. Scriptural expressions must not be driven too far, and, on the other hand, they must not be emptied of all their contents. Modern Protestant teaching has, in its protest against a merely physical conception of Our Lord’s state and occupation in heaven, almost subdued reality from His intercessory work. In Lutheran teaching the intercession of Our Lord was said to be “vocal,” “verbal” and “oral.” It has been well remarked that such forms of prayer require flesh and blood, and naturally the teachers of the Reformed churches, for the most part, have con- tented themselves (as for example Hodge, Syst. Theo., II, 593) with the declaration that “the intercession of Christ includes: (1) His appearing before God in our behalf, as the sacrifice for our sins, as our high priest on the ground of whose work we receive the remission of our sins, the gift of the Holy Spirit, and all needed good; (2) defence against the sentence of the law and the charges of Satan, who is the great accuser; (3) His offering Himself as our perfectly sinless and obedient servant, the demands of justice shall be shown to be satisfied, but that His people shall be obedient and faithful; (4) the oblation of the persons of the redeemed, sanctifying their prayers, and all their services, rendering them acceptable to God, through the savour of His own merits.”

Even this expression of the elements which constitute the intercession of the Lord, cautious and spiritual as it is in its application to Christian thought and life, must not be accepted without some criticism from a too complete and materialistic use. With- out care, worship and devout thought may become degraded and fall into the mechanical forms by which Our Lord’s position of intercessor has been little more than a little process, mundane and spectacular or process which goes on in some heavenly place. It must not be forgotten that the metaphorical and symbolic origin of the ideas which constitute Christ’s intercession is always in danger of dominating and materializing the spiritual reality of His intercessional office.

INTEREST, in ter est (יוּמָה, neshekh, נְשֵׁה, mashasha’h; νόμος, lökos): The Heb word neshekh is derived from a root which aid our word “to bite,” thus interest is “something bitten off.” The other word, mashasha’h, means “lending on interest.” The Gr term is from the root tikto, “to produce” or “beget,” hence inter- est is something begotten or produced by money. The Heb words are usually tr2 “usury,” but this meant the same as interest, all interest being reck- oned as usury.

Long before Abraham’s time money had been loaned at a fixed rate of interest in Babylonia and almost certain in Egypt. The CH gives regulations regarding the lending and borrowing of money, the usual interest being 20 per cent. Sometimes it was only 11% and 13%, as shown by contract tab- lets. In one case, if the loan was not paid in two months, 18 per cent interest would be charged.
Corn, dates, onions, etc., were loaned at interest. Thus Moses and Israel would be familiar with commercial loans and interest. In Israel there was no system of credit or commercial loans in Moses' time and after. A poor man borrowed because he was poor. The law of Moses (Ex. 22:25) forbade loaning at interest. There was to be no creditor and no taker of interest among them (Lev. 25:36-37). Dt. permits them to lend on interest to a foreigner (Dt. 23:19.20), but not to a brother Israeli. That this was considered the proper thing in Israel for centuries is seen in Ps 15:5, while Prov. 28:8 implies that it was an unseemly thing, interest being generally exacted and profit made. Ezekiel condemns it as a heinous sin (Ezk 18:13.17) and holds up the ideal of righteousness as not taking interest (22:12). Isa. 24:2 implies that it was a business in that town, the lender and borrower being social types. Jeremiah implies that there was not always the best feeling between lenders and borrowers (16:10). According to Neh. 5:7.10, rich Jews were lending to others and exacting heavy interest. Nehemiah condemns such conduct and forbids the use of interest, citing himself as an example of lending without interest. The lenders restored 1 per cent of that exacted.

In the NT, references to interest occur in the parable of the Pounds (Lk. 19:23) and of the Talents (Mt. 25:27). Here the master expected to put their master's money out at interest, and condemnation followed the failure to do so. Thus the principle of receiving interest is not condemned in the OT, only it was not to be taken from a brother Israeli. In the NT it is diametrically opposed. See also USBY.

INTERMEDDLING, in-tér-med′i-lng, "to mix up [self] with something," "mingle in," "share," "take interest in:" The word occurs only once (Prov. 14:10) in a passage descriptive of "the ultimate solitude of each man's soul at all times." "The heart knoweth its own bitterness." "Nor even the tenderest heart, and next our own. Knows half the reasons why we smile and sigh." (Cf 1 K 8:38.) Something there is in every sorrow which no one else can share. "And a stranger doth not intermeddle with its joy," not necessarily in an interfering or any offensive way, but simply does not share or take any interest in the other's joy. For "intermeddled with:" (Prov. 18:1 AV), RV gives "rageth against" (in "quarrelleth with"). MRS. J. EVANS

INTERPRETATION, in-tér-prē-tā-shun: Is a generic term and may refer to any work of literature. Referred specifically to the sacred:

1. General Scriptures, the science of interpretation of the principles of this science is exegesis. In nearly all cases, interpretation has in mind the thoughts of another, and then, further, these thoughts expressed in another language than that of the interpreter. In this sense it is used in Bib. research. A person has interpreted the thoughts of another when he has in his own mind a correct representation or phra-

2. Special Principles: Just where the line is to be drawn between the human and the Divine factors in the production of the sacred Scriptures materially affects the principles of interpreting these writings (see INSPIRATION). That the human factor was sufficiently potent to shape the form of thought in the Scriptures is evident on all hands. Paul does not write as Peter does, nor John as James; the individuality of the writer of the different books appears not only in the style, choice of words, etc, but in the whole theological conception. There are such things as a Pauline, a Johannine and a Petrine type of Christian thought, although there is only one body of Christian truth underlying all types. In so far as the Bible is exactly like other books, it must be interpreted as were other works of literature. The Scriptures are written in Heb and in Gr, and the principles of forms and of syntax that would apply to the explanation of other works written in these languages and under these circumstances must be applied to the OT and NT also. Again, the Bible is written for men, and its thoughts are those of mankind and not of angels or creatures of a different or higher spiritual or intellectual character; and accordingly there is no specifically Bib. logic, rhetoric, or grammar. The laws of thought and of the interpretation of thought in these matters pertain to the Bible as they do to other writings.

But in regard to the material contents of the Scriptures, matters are different and the principles of interpretation must be different. God is the author of the Scriptures which He has given through human agencies. Hence the contents of the Scriptures, to a great extent, must be far above the ordinary concepts of the human mind. When John declared that "Jesus whom He loved...died...He gave His only begotten Son to redeem it," the interpreter does not do justice to the writer if he finds in the word "God" only the general philosophical conception of the Deity and not that God who is our Father through Christ; for it was the latter thought that was in the mind of the writer when he penned these words. Thus, too, it is a false interpretation to find in "Our Father" anything but this specifically Bib. conception of God, nor is it possible for anybody but a believing Christian to utter this prayer (Mt. 6 9) in the sense which Christ, who taught it to His disciples, intended.

Again, the example of Christ and His disciples in their treatment of the OT teaches the principle that the phrase διηκόνια of a Scriptural passage is to be interpreted as decisive as to its meaning. In the about 400 citations from the OT to its meaning, there is not one in which the mere "It is written" is not regarded as settling its meaning. Whatever may be a Bible student's theory of inspiration, his teachings and the examples of interpretation found in the Scriptures are in perfect harmony in this matter.

These latter facts, too, show that in the interpretation of the Scriptures principles must be applied that are not applicable in the explanation of other books. As God is the author of the Scriptures He may have had, and, as a matter of fact, in certain cases did have in mind more than the human audience whom He spoke did themselves understand. The fact that, in the NT, persons like Aaron and David, institutions like the law, the sacrificial system, the priesthood and the like, are interpreted as typical of persons and things understood by the OT Covenant shows that the true significance, e.g. of the Levitical system, can be found only when studied in the light of the NT fulfillment.

Again, the principle of parallelism, not for illustration of the interpretative purposes, is a rule that can, in the nature of the case, be applied to the interpretation of the Scriptures alone and not elsewhere. As the Scriptures represent one body of truth, though in a kaleidoscopic variety of forms, a statement on a particular subject in one place can be accepted as in harmony with a statement on the same subject elsewhere. In short, in all of these characteristics in which the Scriptures are unlike other literary productions, the principles of the Scriptures must also be unlike those employed in other cases.

Owing chiefly to the dogmatical basis of hermeneutics as a science, there has been a great divergence of views in the history of the church as to the proper methods of interpretation. It is one of the characteristic and instructive features of the NT writers that they absolutely refrain from the allegorical method of interpretation current in those times, particularly in the writings of Philo. Not even Gal 4 22, correctly understood, is an exception, since this, if an allegorical interpretation at all, is an argummentum ad hominem. The sober and grammatical method of interpretation in the NT writers stands out, too, in bold and creditable contrast to that of the early Christian exegetes, even of Origen. Only the Syrian fathers seemed to be an exception to the fantasies of the allegorical methods. The Middle Ages produced nothing new in this sphere; but the Reformation, with its formal principle that the Bible and the Bible alone is the rule of faith and life, made the correct grammatical interpretation of the Scriptures practically a matter of necessity. In modern times, not at all prolific in scientific discussions of hermeneutics principles and practices, the exegetical methods of different interpreters are chiefly controlled by their views as to the origin and character of the Scriptural books, particularly in regard to their inspiration.

INTREAT, in-tret', INTREATY, in-tret'i (EN-TREAT): The two forms are derived from the same vb. In 1611 the spelling was indifferently "entreat" or "entreaty." In editions of 1676 "intreat" is used in the sense of "to beg;" "entreat" in the sense of "deed with." As examples of "intreat" see Ex 8 8, "Intreat the Lord" (דָּאָשׁ); Ruth 1 16, "Intreat me not to leave thee" (דָּאָשׁ); Cor 8 4, "praying us with much intreaty" (ῥαπτός, παρθένεσις). In Gen 26 21 "intreat" is used to indicate the success of a petition. For entreat see Gen 12 16, "He entreated Abraham well"; Acts 27 8, "And Julius courteously entreated Paul" (μετεχθεὶς, φιλοθεμῶν, φιλανθρό- πος χρείανεμοι, lit. "to use in a philanthropic way"); cf also Jas 3 17, where εὐλογητός, εὐπληθής, lit. "easily persuaded," is tr"t easy to be entreated. RV changes all passages of AV where "intreat" is found to "entreat," with the exception of those mentioned below. The meaning of "entreat" is "to ask," "to beseech," "to supplicate": Job 19 17 reads "and my supplication to the children" (תינוקה), AV "though I intreated for the children," RV "I make supplication". Jer 44 11 reads, "I will cause the enemy to make supplication" (היפָּחֵל), instead, AV "I will cause the enemy to entreat" (RvM "I will intercede for thee with the enemy"). 1 Tim 6 1 changes AV "entreat to "exhort." Phil 4 3 renders AV "entreaters, AV "be- seech."

INWARD, in'ward, MAN: A Pauline term, nearly identical with the "hidden man of the heart" (1 Pet 3 4). The Gr. original, ἴδωρ (also ἴδωρος ὁ ἅγιος ἐστήθεν ἄνθρωπος (Rom 7 22) is lexicographically defined "the internal man," i.e. "soul," "conscience.") It is the immaterial part of man—mind, spirit—in distinction from the "outerward man" which "perisheth" (2 Cor 4 16 AV). As the seat of spiritual influences it is the sphere in which the Holy Spirit does His renewing and saving work (Eph 3 16). The term "inward man" cannot be used interchangeably with "the new man," for it may still be "corrupt," and subject to "vanity" and "alienated from the life of God." Briefly stated, it is mind, soul, spirit—God's image in man's higher nature, intellectual, moral, and spiritual.

Dwight M. PRATT

INWARD PART: A symbolic expression in the OT represented by three Heb words: הַיּוֹר, hide, "chamber," hence inmost bowels or breast; יָקוּם, the reins; כּוֹבֶּד, krébb, "middle," "middle," hence heart. Once in the NT (ἐσκεύας, ἐσκέθθη, "from within," Lk 11 39). The viscéra (heart, liver, kidneys) were supposed to be the seat of the mind, feelings, affections: the highest organs of the psyche, "the soul." The term includes the intellect ("wisdom in the inward parts," Job 38:39); the moral nature ("inward part is very wickedness," Ps 5:9); the spiritual ("my law in their inward parts," Jer 17:9). Its adverbial equivalent in Bib. use is "inwardly," INWARD MAN (q.v.) is identical in meaning.

Iob, yôb (יֹבּ, yôb); AV Job): Third son of Issachar (Gen 46:10). | p | passages (N u 26:24; 1 Ch 7 1) the name is Jasheb (יָשֵׁב, yâsheb), which the VSS in Gen also support as the correct form.

Iphdeiah, if'de'ya (יִפְדֶּחַ, yifhd'éyâh; "Jeh reedens"); AV Iphdeiah: A descendant of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 25).

Iphthah, i'fthâ (יִפְתַּח, yifhthâh; AV Jiphthah): An unidentified town in the Shephelah of Judah, named with Libnah, Ether and Ashan (Josh 15 43).

Iphthah-el, i'fthâ-el (יִפְתַּח-אֵל, yifhth'ēl; AV Jiphthah-el): The valley of Iphthah-el lay on the N. border of Zebulun (Josh 19:14). N.W. of the plain of el-Bata'afu stands a steep hill, connected only by a low saddle with the hills on the N. The name Tell Jifât suggests the Jotapata of Jos (BJ, III, vi; vii, i, etc), and the place answers well to his description. It probably corresponds to the ancient Iphthah-iel. In that case the valley is most probably that which begins at Tell Jifât, passes round the S. of Jebel Kaukab, and, as Wady Abellin, opens on the plain of Acre. W. Ewing

IR, ir (יִרְר, "ir"): A descendant of Benjamin (1 Ch 7 12), called Iri in ver 7.

Ira, i'ra (יִרְא, "ira"); Eipes, Eireas): (1) A person referred to in 2 S 20:26 as "priest" (so RV correctly; AV "chief ruler," ARV "chief minister") unto David. The tr. of RV is the only possible one; but, according to the text, Ira was a "Jairite," and thus the tribe of Manasseh (Nu 32:41) and not eligible to the priesthood. On the basis of the Pesh some would correct "Jairite" to 2 S 20:26 into "Jattirite," referring to Jattir, a priestly city within the territory of Judah (Josh 21:10). Others, however, would maintain that "Jairite" is the only correct form and that David's sons were priests, as an indication that in David's time some non-Levites were permitted to serve—in some sense—as priests.

(2) An "Ithrite," or (with a different point of the text) a "Jattirite," one of David's "thirty" (2 S 23:38; 1 Ch 11 40), possibly identical with (1).

(3) Another of David's "thirty," son of Ikkeš of Tekoa (2 S 23:26; 1 Ch 11 28), and a captain of the temple guard (1 Ch 27:9). F. R. Fann

Irád, i rád (יִרָד, ’irâd; LXX Taśâs, Gai'dâd): Grandson of Cain and son of Enoch (Gen 4 18).

Iram, i rám (יִרָם; "irám; LXX variously in Gen): A "chief" of Edom (Gen 36 43; 1 Ch 1 54).

Ir-ha-heres, ir-hâ-hé'res (יִרְ-הָהֵ֫רֶס, "ir-hâ-hé'res; "Ir-ha-heres"): according to the MT, Ag, Theodotion, LXX, AV and RV; according to some Heb MSS, Symmachus, and the Vulg, קָ֫רָה (qârâh), "Ir-ha-hères"); A city of Egypt referred to in Isa 19:18. Jewish quarrels concerning the temple which Onias built in Egypt have most probably been responsible for the altering of the texts of some of the early MSS, and it is not now possible to determine absolutely which have been altered and which accord with the original. This difference in MSS gives rise to different opinions among authorities here to be noted. Most of the discussion of this name arises from this uncertainty and is hence rather profitless. The starting-point of any proper discussion of Ir-ha-hês is that the words are by Isaiah and that they are prophecy, predictive prophecy. They belong to that portion of the prophecies of Isa which by nearly all critics is allowed to the great prophet. Nothing but unfounded speculation or an unwillingness to admit that there is any prophecy in this passage can call in question Isaiah's authorship of these words. Then the sense of the passage in which these words occur imperatively demands that they be accounted predictive prophecy. Isaiah plainly refers to the future, "shall be called"; and makes a definite statement concerning what shall take place in the future (19 18-24). The reality of predictive prophecy may be discussed by those so inclined, but that the intention of the author here was to utter predictive prophecy does not seem to be open to question. For the verification of this prediction by its fulfilment in history we shall inquire concerning: (1) the times intended: "that day"; (2) the "five cities"; (3) "Ir-ha-hês.

The prophet gives a fairly specific description of "that day." It was at least to begin when there shall be five cities in the land of Egypt that speak the language of Canaan, and swear to Jeh of hosts (ver 18), and which accord with the prophecy: (1) "that day"; (2) the "five cities"; (3) "Ir-ha-hês.

The first historical fulfilment of the words is found at the period when Onias built his imitations of the Temple of Jerusalem at the place called by the Greeks Leontopolis (Tell el-äh-hê'theb), and the worship of Cities Jeh was set up at Elephantine, and the Jews a great part of the population there, and at Taḫانâs. While any of these latter three might have contained the "pillar," the "altar" would thus be either at Leontopolis or the other one of the "five cities" which cannot be named with much probability. The great delver of the future would seem to be Alexander. Some think that the conversion of the Egyptians indicated in vs 21:22 is furthered, though still not completed, in the Christian invasion of the 1st cent., and again in the success of modern Christian missions in Egypt. It will be seen that it does not follow from what has been said that Leontopolis was Ir-ha-hês as some seem to think. It is not said by the prophet that the place where the altar was called Ir-ha-hês, even if it were certain that the altar was at Leontopolis. Nevertheless, Leontopolis may be Ir-ha-hês. The problem is not in the first place the identification of the name, but the determination of which one of the "five cities" was destroyed. The expression "shall be called the city of destruction" seems clearly to indicate that Ir-ha-hês is not a name at all, but merely a descriptive appellation of that city which should "be destroyed." It still remains to inquire whether or not there is an independent appellation, or whether, more probably, it bore some relation to the name of that city at the time at which the prophet wrote, a play upon the sound, or the significance of the name or both of these, either through resemblance or contrast. If Gesenius is right, as he seems to be, in the opinion that "in the idiom of Isa Ir-ha-h is explained 'the city that shall be destroyed,'" then the original problem of finding which one of the cities was destroyed seems to be the whole problem. Still, in the highly wrought language of Isaiah and according to the genius of the Hebrew tongue, there is probably a play upon words. It is here that the consideration of the name itself properly comes in and probably guides us rightly. Speculation, by Gesenius, Duhm, Cheyne and others, has proposed various different readings of this name, some of them two or three changes in the text to bring it to its present state. Speculation can always propose readings. On was sometimes called "Heres" and meant "house of the sun," which would be both tr and transfigured into Heb ha-heres and might have tr ("city") prefixed. Naville, through his study of the great Harris papyrus, believed that the old Egypt city which later was called Leontopolis (Tell el-Yehudiyeh) was immediately connected with On and called "House of th3 Sun," also "House of the Sun." Thus this name might be both transfigured and tr into the Heb ha-heres and have tr prefixed. The difference between this expression and "Ir-ha-h" which Isaiah used is only the difference between h and b. So that Ir-ha-h is most probably a corruption of prophecy concerning the disaster that was to overtake one of the "five cities," with a play upon the name of the city, and that city is either On, the later Helopolis, or the ancient sacred city about 4 miles N of On, which Nebuchadnezzar was to build his temple and which later became Leontopolis (Tell el-Yehudiyeh). No more positive identification of Ir-ha-h is yet possible.

IRON, i'orn (يَرْنَ, bāzel, ṣī̂npe, šī̂dēros): It is generally believed that the art of separating iron from its ores and making it into useful form was not known much earlier than 1000 BC, and that the making of brass (bronze) antedates it by many centuries, in spite of the frequent Bib. references where brass and iron occur together. This conjecture is based upon the fact that no specimen of worked iron has been found whose antiquity can be vouched for. The want of such instruments, however, can be attributed to the ease with which iron corrodes. Evidence that iron was used is found, for example, in the hieroglyphs of the tomb of Rameses III, where the blades of some of the weapons are painted blue while others are painted red, a distinction believed to be due to the fact that some were made of iron or steel and some of brass. No satisfactory proof has yet been presented that the marvelous sculpturing on the hard Egyp granite was done with tempered bronze. It seems more likely that steel tools were used. After the discovery of iron, it was evidently a long time in replacing bronze, and this seems probably due to the difficulties in smelting it. An old mountaineer once described to the writer the process of iron smelting as it was carried on in Mt. Lebanon in past centuries. As a boy he had watched his father, who was a smelter, operate one of the last furnaces to be fired. For each firing, many cords of wood, esp. green oak brakely "the city that shall be destroyed," the original problem of finding which one of the cities was destroyed seems to be the whole problem. familiar with the methods of irrigation practised in Pal, Syria and Egypt, the passage, "where thou sowedst thy seed, and wateredst it with thy foot, as a garden of herbs" (Dt 11:10), is easily explained. The water is brought in channels to the gardens, where it is distributed in turn to the different square plots bounded by banks of earth, or along the rows of growing vegetables planted on the sides of the trenches. In stony soil the breach in the canal leading to a particular plot is opened and closed with a hoe. Any obstruction in the trench is similarly removed, while in the soft, loamy soil of the coastal plain or in the Nile valley these operations can be done with the foot, a practice still commonly seen.

The remains of the great irrigation works of the ancient Egyptians and Babylonians leave no doubt as to the extent to which they used water to redeem the deserts. In Pal and Syria there was less need (Dt 10:7; 11:11) for irrigation. Here there is an annual fall of from 30 to 40 in., coming principally during the winter. This is sufficient for the main crops. The summer supply of vegetables, as well as the fruit and mulberry trees, requires irrigation. Hardly a drop of many mountain streams is allowed to reach the sea, but is used to water the gardens of the mountain terraces and plains. This supply is now being supplemented by the introduction of thousands of pumps and oil engines for raising the water of the wells sufficiently to run it through the irrigation canals. Where a spring is small, its supply is gathered into a birken, or cistern, and then drawn off through a large outlet into the trenches, sometimes several days being required to fill the cistern. In Ecc 2:6, Solomon is made to say, "I made me pools of water, to water therefrom the forest." This passage helps to explain the uses of the so-called Pools of Solomon, S. of Jerusalem. In this same district are traces of the ancient terraces which were probably watered from these pools. See Agriculture; Garden. James A. Patch

V. VIEWS OTHER THAN THE HISTORICAL

I. Name.—This name has the double spelling, PTT, yichāb and PTT, yichāb (Isaac, Isak), corresponding to the two forms in which appears the root meaning "to forms and laugh."—a root that runs through nearly Analogues all the Sem languages. In Heb both gāḇak and sāḇak have their cognate nouns, and, signifying, in the simple stem, "to laugh," in the intensive stem, "to jest, play, dance, fondle," and the like. The noun yichār, meaning "fresh oil," from a root ẓāhar ("to be bright, conspicuous"), proves that nouns can be built on precisely the model of yichāb, which would in that case signify "the laughing one," or something similar. Yet Barth (Die Nominalbildung in den semitischen Sprachen, § 154, b and c) maintains that all proper names beginning with yēḏ prefixed to the root are really pure imperfects, i.e. verbal forms with some subject to be understood if not actually present. Hence Isaac would mean "laughs!": either indefinite, "one laughs," or "he laughs," viz. the one understood as the subject. There are some 50 Heb names that have a similar form with no accompanying subject. Of these sometimes the meaning of the root is quite obscure, sometimes it is appropriate to any susceptible subject. Each is a problem by itself; for the interpretation of any one of them there is little help to be gained from a comparison with the others.

What subject, then, is to be understood with this imperfect vb. yichāb? Or is no definite subject to be supplied? (1) 'El, God, may be supplied: "God laughs," such an expression might be understood of the Divine benevolence, or of the fear of the laughter of scorn for His enemies (Ps 2:4), or euphemistically, of the Divine wrath, the "terrible glance," as of Moloch, etc. (so Meyer, Israeliten und ihre Nachbardämme, 255). (2) Some human person: "he laughs." So, for example, he himself, viz. the child who receives the name; or, the father; or, the brother (not the mother, which would require ticāḇā). In the light now of these possibilities we turn to the narratives of Isaac's birth and career and find the following subjects are suggested: (a) Abraham, Gen 17:17; (b) indefinite, "one laughs!" (not "she laughs," see above), Gen 18:12-15; 21:6; (c) brother, Gen 21:9; (d) himself, Gen 26:8. Of these passages the last two show the vb. in the intensive stem in the significations of (c) "mock?" (d) and (d) "dally." We find this same vb. in these senses in Gen 19:14 and 39:14,17, in the stories of Lot and of Joseph, and it is possible that here also in the story of Isaac it has no more connection with the name Isaac than it has there with the names Lot and Joseph. However this may be, there is obviously one interpretation of the name Isaac, which, required in two of the passages, is equally appropriate in them all, viz. the with the indefinite subject, "one laughs." Consideration of the sources to which these passages are respectively assigned by the documentary hypothesis tends only to confirm this result.

II. FAMILY AND KINDRED.—The two things in Isaac's life that are deemed worthy of extensive treatment in the sacred narrative are his birth and his marriage. His significance, in fact, centers in his transmission of what went before him to what came after him. Hence, his position in his father's family, his relation to its greatest treasure, the religious birthright, and his marriage with Rebekah are the subjects that require special notice in this connection.
The birth of Isaac is represented as peculiar in these respects: the age of his parents, the purity of his lineage, the special Divine promises accompanying. What in Abraham's life is signalized by the Divine "call" from his father's house, and what in Jacob's life is brought about by a series of providential dispositions, seems in Isaac's case to become by his birth. His mother, who is not merely of the same stock as Abraham but actually his half-sister, is the legal wife. As her issue Isaac was qualified by the law of inheritance recognized in traditional lands to become his father's heir. But Ishmael, according to those laws, has a similarly valid claim (see Abraham, IV, 2), and it is only by express command that Abraham is led to abandon what was apparently both custom and personal preference — "cast out the bondwoman and her son," and to acquiesce in the arrangement that "Isaac shall thy seed be called."

But the birthright of Isaac was of infinitely more importance than the birthright in the family of Abraham, and this, more than anything else related of him, makes him an attractive figure on the pages of Gen. 19. The raising up of a "seed" to be the bearers of these promises was the prime concern of Isaac's life. Not by inheritance of wealth or of land, but by marriage with one of his own people, in whom as much as in himself should be visibly embodied the separateness of that chosen family of God, was Isaac to pass on to a generation as pure as his own the heritage of the Divine blessing. Rebeckah enters the tent of Isaac as truly the chosen of God as was Abraham himself.

1. Previous relations, a welcome and honored member to Marriage of the patriarchal household. The care and affection shown for the child (which Isaac was the first to receive at the prescribed age of 8 days), the great feast at his weaning, and the disinheretance of Ishmael in his favor, are all of them indications of the unique position that this child held, and prepare the reader to appreciate the depth of feeling involved in the sacrifice of Isaac, the story of which follows thereupon. The age of Isaac at the time of this event is not stated, but the fact that he is able to carry the wood of the offering shows that he had probably attained his full growth. The single question he asks his father and his otherwise unbroken silence combine to exhibit him in a favorable light, as thoughtful, docile and trustful. The Divine interposition to save the lad thus devoted to God constitutes the covenant-promise antithesis, and justifies its explicit renewal on this occasion. From this point onward the biographer of Isaac evidently has his marriage in view, for the two items that preceded the long 24th ch, in which Rebekah's choice and coming are rehearsed, are, first, the brief genealogical paraphrase that informs the reader of the development of Nahor's family just as far as to Rebekah, and second, the ch that tells of Sarah's death and burial — an event clearly associated in the minds of all with the marriage of Isaac (see 24 3.36.f.). Divine interest in the choice of her who should be the mother of the promised seed is evident in every line of the ch that dramatizes the betrothal of Isaac and Rebekah. Their first meeting is described at its close with the tender interest in such a scene natural to every descendant of the pair, and Isaac is seen as a man of a meditative turn (ver 63) and an affectionate heart (ver 67).

The dismissal of the sons of Abraham's concubines to the "East-country" is associated with the statement that Isaac inherited all that Abraham had; yet it has been requested that, besides supplying them Marriage with gifts, Abraham was doing them a further kindness in thus emancipating them from continued subjection to Isaac, the future head of the clan. After Abraham's death we are expressly informed that God "blessed Isaac his son" in fulfilment of previous promise. The section entitled "the biblical [generations] of Isaac" extends from Gen 19 26 to 36 29, in the sense of following his fathers Abraham and Nahor. Isaac's life merges at Beer-lahai-roi (25 11), then at Gerar (26 1 b) and "the valley of Gerar" (26 17), then at Beer-sheba (26 23; 28 10), all localities in the Negeb or "South-country." But after the long narrative of the fortunes of Jacob and his family for many years, we find Isaac at his close living where his father Abraham had lived, at Hebron.

For 20 years Isaac and Rebekah remained childless; it was only upon the entreaty of Isaac that God granted them their wish. Isaac, the son of the promise, was to become his father's heir. The usual signal for migration to Egypt (of Gen 12 10; 42 2); and Isaac also appears to have been on his way thither for the same cause, when, at Gerar, he is forbidden by God to proceed, and occasion is found therein to renew to him the covenant-promise of his inheritance: land, posterity, honor and the Divine presence (26 1–4).

But Isaac had also received from his father traditions of another sort; he too did not hesitate to say to the men of Gerar that his wife was his sister, and that he meant the same thing to save his own life, but without the same justification in fact, as in the case of Abraham's earlier stratagem. Yet even the discovery by the king of Gerar of this duplicity, and the repeated quarrelling with his wife in regard thereto, did not suffice to endanger Isaac's status with the settled inhabitants, for his large household and great resources made him a valuable friend and a dangerous enemy.

The favoritism which Isaac showed for one son and Rebekah for the other culminated in the painful scene when the paternal blessing was given obtained for Jacob, and in the subsequent enforced absence of Jacob from his paternal home. Esau, too, afforded rebuke to his father and mother, and ere long he also withdrew from his father's clan. The subsequent conciliation of the brothers permitted them to unite at length in paying the last honors to Isaac on his decease. Isaac was buried at Hebron where his parents had been buried (Gen 49 31), and where his place of sepulture is still honored.

IV. Biblical References. — There is a great contrast between Abraham and Jacob on the one hand, and Isaac on the other. The bearing of the covenant-promise is more evident in the lit. of the nation that traced to them its descent. To be sure, when the patriarchs as a group are to be named, Isaac takes his place in the stereotyped formula of "Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," or "Israel" (so 25 t. in the OT, 7 t. in the NT).
But apart from this formula Isaac is referred to in the OT only as follows. During the lifetime of Jacob the names of Abraham and Isaac are repeatedly linked in the same way as are all three subsequently: they form for that age the dynasty of the covenant. From then on Isaac, God (or, the Fear; see infra) of Isaac, because Isaac is his own immediate predecessor in this chain of the faithful. Isaac is called the "gift" of God to Abraham, in the farewell address of Joshua, just as Isaac's father promised God's "gifts" to Abraham (Josh 24:3f; cf Koran, Surah 6:84). The "house of Isaac" is used by Amos as a "expression for "Israel," and the "high places of Isaac" for "the sanctuaries of Israel" (Am 7:16,8), in the same way as "Jacob" is often used elsewhere (LXX in ver 18 reads "Jacob"). Other references to Isaac are simply as to his father's son or his children's father.

He fares better in the NT. For, besides the genealogical references, Isaac's significance as the first to receive circumcision on the 8th day is remembered (Acts 7:5); his position as first of the elect seed is set forth (Rom 9:7); his begetting of two sons so unlike in their relation to the promise were Esau and Jacob is remarked (Rom 9:10); the facts of his being heir to the promise of old age, and, though but one, the father of an innumerable progeny, are emphasized in He 11 (vs 9–12), which also discovers the deeper significance of his sacrifice and restoration to his father (vs 17–19; cf Jas 2:21); and in the same context is noticed the faith in God implied in Isaac's blessing of his sons. But Isaac receives more attention than anywhere else in that famous passage in Gal (4:21–31), in which Paul uses Isaac and his mother as allegorical representations justified by faith in the promise of God, and are the free-born heirs of all the spiritual inheritance implied in that promise. Even Isaac's persecution by Ishmael has its counterpart in the attitude of the enemies of Paul's gospel toward him and his doctrines and converts.

V. Views Other than the Historical.—Philo, the chief allegoriser of OT narratives, has little to say of Isaac, whom he calls "the self-instructed nature." But mediating his views were by presenting him as the personification of an ethnic group, "All Israel," writes Weilhame (Prol., 6th ed, 316), "is grouped with the people of old under the name of Isaac (Am 7:10), and the material here is not myth but national, but national, and religious Israel plus Edom had little or no significance in national customs or political events, when compared on the one hand with the prominence of the same Edom plus Moab and Ammon (= Abraham) on the other hand; so likewise the figure of Isaac is colorless and his story brief, as compared with the striking figures of Jacob on the one hand and of Abraham on the other hand, and the circumstantial stories of their lives.

Other scholars will have none of this national view, because they believe Isaac to be the name of an ancient deity, the local name of Baalsheba, Sefor, whom others have followed, proposes to interpret the phrase "the Fear of Isaac" in Gen 31:42,43 as the name of this god used by his worshippers, the Terror Isaac, Isaac the terrible god. the only explicit "vision" Isaiah saw, yet his entire book, from first to last, is, as the title (1:1) suggests, a "vision." His horizon, both political and spiritual, was practically unbounded. In a very true sense, as Delitzsch says, he was "the universal prophet of Israel.

For versatility of expression and brilliancy of imagery Isaiah had no superior, not even a rival. His style marks the climax of Hebrew and metaphors, particularly of flood, storm and sound (1:13; 4:15; 5:18-25; 6:9; 7:15-25; 7:28-30; 8:9-10), prophetic 5

as a whole, is characterized by the characteristic of his entire book. Epigrams and alliteration (6:8; 10:8.9), antithesis and alliteration (1:18; 3:24; 17:10.12), hyperbole and parable (2:7, 5:1-7; 25:23-29), even paranoia, or play upon words (5:7; 7:9), characterize Isaiah's book as the great masterpiece of Hebrew literature. He is also famous for his richness of vocabulary and synonyms. For example, Ezekiel uses 1,555 words; Jeremiah, 1,653; the Psalms 2,170; while Isaiah uses 2,156. Isaiah was also the most prolific prophet in number and diversity of his messages: a poet: he frequently elaborates his messages in rhythmic or poetic style (12:1-6; 25:1-5; 36:1-12; 38:10-20; 42:1-4; 49:1-9; 50:4-9; 52:13-53:12; 60:62; 66:5-24); and in several instances alliteration is in evidence. In Isaiah, for example, in 37:22-29, there is a fine taunting poem on Sennacherib, and in 14:4-23 another on the king of Babylon. As Driver observes, "Isaiah's poetical genius is superb."

5. Traditions concerning His

Martyrdom

Nothing definite or historical is known concerning the prophet's end; the current tradition, however, there was a tradition to the effect that he suffered martyrdom in the course of his work, which occurred under King Manasseh, because of certain incriminating passages in the Book of the Prophets. But the legend is barely possible in that there is an allusion to his martyrdom in He 11:37, which reads, "They were stoned, they were sawn asunder, or killed by the sword, or died of other deaths." In any case Isaiah probably survived the great catastrophe of the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib in 701 B.C. He died in 699 B.C. for in 2 Ch 32:32 it is stated that Isaiah wrote a biography of King Hezekiah. If Isaiah's activity extended over a period of more than 40 years. Dr. G. A. Smith extends it to "more than 50." (Jerusalem: 150; of Whitehouse, "Isaiah," New Cent. Bible, 1:72).

According to the title of his book (1:1), Isaiah prophesied during the reigns of Uzziah, Zedekiah, Ahaz and Hezekiah, kings of Judah.

6. Period

He dates his inaugural vision (6:1) in "the fifth year of the reign of Uzziah," which was approximately 740 B.C. This marks, therefore, the beginning of his prophetic ministry. And we know that he was still active as late as the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib in 701 B.C. Hence the minimum period of his activity was 25 years, as 740 to 701 B.C. A young man Isaiah witnessed the rapid development of Judah into a strong commercial and military state; for under Uzziah Judah attained a degree of prosperity and strength never before enjoyed since the days of Solomon. With his wealth, Judah's population increased, and with it also the size of the army, a port for commerce on the Red Sea, increased inland trade, tribute from the Ammonites, success in war with the Philis and the Arabinians—all these became Judah's during Uzziah's long and prosperous reign of 52 years. But along with power and wealth came also avarice, oppression, religious formalism and corruption. The temple revenues indeed were greatly increased, but religion and life were too commonly, if not altogether material. During the reign of Joatham (740-736 B.C.), who for several years was associated with his father as co-regent, a new power began to appear over the eastern horizon. The Assyrians, with whom Ahah had come in contact at the battle of Karkar in 854 B.C., and to whom Jehu had paid tribute in 842 B.C., began to manifest their characteristic lust of conquest. Tiglath-pileser III, who is called "Pul" in 2 K 15:19 and reigned over Assyria from 745 to 727 B.C., turned his attention westward, and in 735 B.C. reduced Arpad, Calno, Carchemish, Hamath and Damascus. Hence his presence in the West led Pekah, king of North Israel, and Rezin, king of Damascus, to form an alliance in order to resist further encroachment on the part of Assyria. When Ahaz refused to join their confederacy they resolved to dethrone him and set in his stead the son of Tabeel on the throne of David (2 K 16:5; Is 7:6). The struggle which ensued is commonly known as the Syro-Ephraimite war (744 B.C.), one of the great conflicts in Isaiah's Dnerosthetes. Isaiah was bare of life impatiently to manifest Sennacherib's panic sent to Tiglath-pileser for help (2 K 16:7), who of course responded with alacrity. The result was that the great Assyrian warrior sacked Gaza and carried all of Galilee and Gilead into captivity (734 B.C.); and finally took Damascus (732 B.C.). Ahaz was forced to pay dearly for his protection, and Judah was brought very low (2 K 15:29; 16:7-9; 2 Ch 28:19; Is 7:1). The religious as well as the political effect of Ahaz' policy was deplorably baneful. Tiglath-pileser sent to Damascus to join in the celebration of his victories, and while there saw a Syrian altar, a pattern of which he sent to Jerusalem and had a copy set up in the temple in place of the brazen altar of Solomon. Thus Ahaz, with all the influence of a king, introduced idolatry into Jerusalem, even causing his sons to pass through the fire (2 K 16:10-16; 2 Ch 28:3).

Hezekiah succeeded Ahaz, beginning to rule at the age of 25 years and reigning about 272-209 B.C. Isaiah was at least 15 years his senior. The young king inherited from his father a heavy burden. The splendor of Uzziah's and Joatham's reigns was rapidly fading before the ever-menacing and avaricious Assyrians. Possibly also the death of Hezekiah in 699 B.C. for in 2 Ch 32:32 it is stated that Isaiah wrote a biography of King Hezekiah. If Isaiah's activity extended over a period of more than 40 years. Dr. G. A. Smith extends it to "more than 50." (Jerusalem: 150; of Whitehouse, "Isaiah," New Cent. Bible, 1:72). He was a visionary seer, and his prophecies were written in a manner that made them easily understood and remembered. He was a great orator: he might say, "Isaiah's prophecies are products of his oratorical genius."

Isaiah's prophecies are divided into three main sections: the first, comprising chapters 1-35, deals with the world situation and the fall of the nations; the second, chapters 36-66, deals with Judah and Jerusalem; the third, chapters 67-66, deals with the future Messianic kingdom. The first section is the longest and most detailed, and it is clear that the purpose of Isaiah's prophecy was not only to comfort the people of Judah but also to warn them of the impending doom of the nations. The second section is shorter and more concise, and it is evident that the purpose of this section was to encourage the people of Judah to prepare for the coming of the Messiah. The third section is the shortest and most abstract, and it is apparent that the purpose of this section was to describe the glory of the future kingdom of God.
assured death in 714 BC. Being childless, he was seriously concerned for the future of the Davidic dynasty. He resorted to prayer, however, and God graciously extended his life 15 years (2 K 20; Isa 36). His illness occurred during the period of Babylonic independence under Merodach-baladan, an ever-ambitious, irresistible and uncompromising enemy of Assyria, who for 12 years (721–709 BC) maintained independent supremacy over Babylon. Taking advantage of Hezekiah’s wonderful cure, Merodach-baladan seized the opportunity of sending an embassy to Jerusalem to congratulate him on his recovery (712 BC), and at the same time probably sought to form an alliance with Judah to resist Assyrian supremacy (2 K 20 12 ff; Isa 36). Nothing, however, came of the alliance, for the following year Sargon’s army reappeared in Philistia in order to discipline Ashdod for conspiracy with the king of Egypt (711 BC). The greatest crisis was yet to come. Its story is as follows: Judah and her neighbors groaned more and more under the heavy exactions of Assyria. Accordingly, when Sargon was assassinated and Sennacherib came to the throne in 705 BC, rebellion broke out on all sides. Merodach-baladan, who had been expelled by Sargon in 709 BC, again took Babylon and held it for a time, before Sennacherib. Sennacherib, who was encouraged by Egypt and all Philistia, except Padi of Ekron, the puppet-king of Sargon, refused longer to pay Assyrian tribute (2 K 18 7). Meanwhile a strong pro-Egypt party had sprung up in Jerusalem. In view too, of these circumstances, King Hezekiah was panic stricken and hastened to bring rich tribute, stripping even the temple and the palace of their treasures to do so (2 K 18 16–18). But Sennacherib was not satisfied. He overran Judah, capturing, as he tells us in his inscription, 46 walled towns and smaller villages without number, carrying 200,150 of Judah’s population into captivity to Assyria, and demanding as tribute 800 talents of silver and 30 talents of gold, in all over $1,500,000; he also exacted the claims, Hezekiah’s and palace women, seized his male and female singers, and carried away enormous spoil. But the end was not yet. Sennacherib himself, with the bulk of the army, halted in Philistia to reduce Lachish; the king’s own demands and the commander-in-chief, the Rabshakeh, to besiege Jerusalem (2 K 18 17–19 8; Isa 36 2–37 8). As he describes this blockade in his own inscription: “I shut up Hezekiah in Jerusalem like a bird in a cage.” The Rabshakeh, however, failed to capture the city and returned to Sennacherib, who meanwhile had completely conquered Lachish, and was now warring against Libnah. A second expedition against Jerusalem was planned, but hearing that Tirsakah (at that time the commander-in-chief of Sennacherib’s forces) and only afterward “king of Ethiopia”) was approaching, Sennacherib was forced to content himself with sending messengers with a letter to Hezekiah, demanding immediate surrender of the city (2 K 18 9 9; Isa 37 9 9). Hezekiah, however, through Isaiah’s influence held out; and in due time, though Sennacherib disposed of Tirhakah’s army without difficulty, his immense host in some mysterious way—by plague or otherwise—was suddenly smitten and the great army was driven back to Nisibis; possibly because Merodach-baladan had again appeared in Babylonia. Sennacherib never again returned to Pal, so far as we know, during the subsequent 20 years of his reign, though he did make an independent expedition into North Arabia (691–689 BC). This invasion of Judah by Sennacherib in 701 BC was the great political event in Isaiah’s ministry. Had it not been for the prophet’s statesmanship, Judah might have capitulated. As it was, only a small, insignificant city of Lachish, under assault escaped. Isaiah had at this time been preaching 40 years. How much longer he labored is not known.

There are six general divisions of the book: (1) chs 1–12, prophecies concerning Judah and Jerusalem, bearing witness with promises of restoration. (2) chs 13–20, oracles of judgment and salvation. (3) chs 21–23, a plea for the community to confess its sin and seek repentance. (4) chs 24–27, the concluding book: “songs of thanksgiving.” (5) chs 28–33, a cycle of prophetic warnings against alliance with Egypt, culminating in the prophecy concerning Edom and a promise of Israel’s ransom; (6) chs 34–39, history, prophecy and song intermingled; serving both as an appendix to chs 1–35, and as an introduction to chs 40–66; (6) chs 40–66, prophecies of comfort and salvation, and also of the future glory awaiting Israel. By examining in detail these several divisions we can trace better the prophet’s thought. Thus, chs 1–12 unfold Judah’s social sins (chs 1–6), and her political entanglements (chs 7–12); ch 1 is an introduction, in which the prophet strikes the chief notes of his entire book: viz. thoughtlessness (vs 2–9), formalism in worship (vs 10–17), cursed (vs 18–23) and judgment (vs 24–31). Chs 2–4 contain three distinct pictures of Zion: (a) her exaltation (2 3–4), (b) her present idolatry (2 5–4 1), and (c) her eternal vindication (2 13–23). Chs 5–13 contains an arraignment of Judah and Jerusalem, composed of three parts: (a) a parable of Jeh’s vineyard (vs 1–7); (b) a series of six woes pronounced against insatiable greed (vs 8–10), dissipation (vs 11–17), daring defiance against God (vs 18–19), confusion of moral distinctions (vs 20), political self-conceit (vs 21), and misdirected heroism (vs 22–23); and (c) an announcement of imminent judgment. The section 9 8–10 contains an announcement to North Israel of accumulated wrath and impending ruin, with a refrain (9 12.17.21; 10 4). Here, in an artistic poem composed of four strophes, the prophet describes the great calamities which Jeh has sent down upon North Israel but which have gone unheeded: foreign invasion (9 8–12), defeat in battle (9 13–17), anarchy (9 18–21), and impending captivity (10 1–4). Yet Jeh’s judgments have gone unheeded: “For all this his anger is not turned away, but his hand is stretched out still.” Divine discipline has failed; only judgment remains.

In 10 5–34, Assyria is declared to be an instrument of Jeh, the rod of Jeh’s anger. Chs 11–12 predict Israel’s return from exile, including a vision of the Messiah’s reign of ideal peace. For Isaiah’s vision of Israel’s future was far beyond mere exile. To him the downfall of Assyria was the signal for the commencement of a new era in Israel’s history. Assyria has no future, her downfall is fatal; Judah has a future, her calamities are only disciplinary. An Ideal Prince, whose advent all Nature will rejoice, even dumb animals (11 1–10). A second great exodus will take place, for the Lord will set His hand again “the second time” to recover the remnant of His people “from the four corners of the earth” (11 11.12). In that day, “Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim” (11 13). On the contrary, the reunited nation, redeemed and occupying their rightful territory (11 14–16), shall sing a hymn of thanksgiving, proclaiming the salvation of Jeh to all the earth (ch 12).

Chs 13–23 contain oracles of judgment and salvation, for the most part concerning those foreign nations whose fortunes affected Judah and Jerusalem. Though the two parts of each oracle are closely balanced, the foreign oracles are in Jer 46–51 and Ezek 25–32.

Isaiah’s horizon was world-wide. First among the foreign prophecies stands the oracle concerning Babylon (13 1–20), in which he predicts the utter destruction of the city, a dirge or taunt-song over her fallen king (14 4–23). The king alluded to is almost beyond doubt an Assy (not a Bab) monarch of the 5th cent.; the brief prophecy immediately following in 14 24–27 concerning Assyria tacitly confirms this interpretation. Another brief oracle concerning Babylon (21 1–10) describes the city’s fall as imminent. Both oracles stand or fall together as genuine prophecies of Isaiah. Both seem to have been written in Jerus (12 2; 21 9.10). It cannot be said that either is absolutely unrelated in thought and language to Isaiah’s age (14 13; 21 2); each foretells the doom to fall on Babylon (13 19; 21 9) at the hands of Medes (13 17; 21 2); and each describes the Israelites as already in exile—but not necessarily all Israel.

The passage 14 28–32 is an oracle concerning Pharaoh.

Chs 15–16 are ancient oracles against Moab, whose dirigible meter resembles that of chs 13–14. It is composed of two separate prophecies belonging to two different periods in Isaiah’s ministry (16 13.14). The three points of particular interest in the oracle are: (1) the prophet’s tender sympathy for Moab in her affliction (15 5; 16 11). Isaiah minglest his own tears with those of the Moabites. As Delitzsch says, “There is no prophecy in the Book of Isa in which the heart of the prophet is so powerfully moved by what he holds to be a failure of God’s purposes as (2) Moab’s. The prophet’s pathetic appeal for shelter from her foes; particularly the ground on which she urges it, namely, the Messiah’s hope that the Davidic dynasty shall always stand and be able to repulse its foes (16 6). The prophecy is an echo of 9 5–7. (3) The prophecy that a remnant of Moab, though small, shall be saved (16 14). Wareied of prayer to Chemosh in his high places, the prophet predicts that Moab will seek the living God (16 12).

The passage 17 1–11 is an oracle concerning Damascus and North Israel, in which Isaiah predicts the fate of the two allies—Syria and Ephraim—in the Syro-Aphramitic war of 734 BC, with a promise that only a scanty remnant will survive (17 6). In 17 12–14, the prophet boldly announces the complete annihilation of Judah’s unnamed foes—the Assyrians.

Ch 18 describes Ethiopia as in great excitement, sending ambassadors hither and thither—possibly a device all the way led far beyond mere exile. To him the downfall of Assyria was the signal for the commencement of a new era in Israel’s history. Assyria has no future, her downfall is fatal; Judah has a future, her calamities are only disciplinary. An Ideal Prince, whose advent all nature will rejoice, even dumb animals (11 1–10). A second great exodus will take place, for the Lord will set His hand again “the second time” to recover the remnant of His people “from the four corners of the earth” (11 11.12). In that day, “Ephraim shall not envy Judah, and Judah shall not vex Ephraim” (11 13). On the contrary, the reunited nation, redeemed and occupying their rightful territory (11 14–16), shall sing a hymn of thanksgiving, proclaiming the salvation of Jeh to all the earth (ch 12).

Chs 19, which is an oracle concerning Egypt, contains both a threat (vs 1–17) and a promise (vs 18–25), and is one of Isaiah’s most remarkable foreign messages. Egypt is smitten and thereby led to abandon her idols for the worship of Jeh (vs 19–22). Still more remarkable, it is prophesied that in that day Egypt and Assyria will join with Judah in a triple alliance of common worship to Jeh and of blessing to others (vs 23–25). Isaiah’s missionary outlook here is nothing short of wonderful!

Ch 20 describes Sargon’s march against Egypt and Ethiopia, containing a brief symbolic prediction of Assyria’s victory over Egypt and Ethiopia. By donning a captive’s garb for three years, Isaiah attempts to teach, and ethos is that a siege of Ashdod was but a means to an end in Sargon’s plan of campaign, and that it was sheer folly for the Egypt party in Jerusalem, who were ever urging reliance upon Egypt, to look in that direction for help. 21 11.12 is a brief oracle concerning Seir or Edom, “the only gentle utterance in the OT upon Israel’s hereditary foe.” Edom is in great anxiety. The prophet’s answer is disappointing, though its tone is sympathetic. 21 13 ff is a brief oracle concerning Arabia. It contains a sympathetic appeal to the Temanites to give bread and water to the caravans of Dedan, who have been driven by war from their usual route of travel.

Ch 22 is concerning the foreign temperament within the theocracy. It is composed of two parts: (1) an oracle “of the valley of vision,” i.e. Jerus (vs 1–14); and (2) a philippic against Shebna, the comptroller of the palace. Isaiah pauses, as it were, in his series of warnings to foreign nations to rebuke the foreign temper of the frivolous inhabitants of Jerus, and in particularly seeking a high official in the government. The reckless and God-ignoring citizens of the capital are pictured as indulging themselves in hilarious eating and drinking, when the enemy is at that very moment standing before the gates of the city. Shebna, on the other hand, seems to have been an ostentatious foreigner, perhaps a Syrian by birth, quite possibly one of the Egypt party, whose policy was antagonistic to that of Isaiah and the king. Isaiah's prediction of Shemhen's fall was evidently fulfilled (36 3; 37 2). With this in mind, the Assyr.-ian prophet predicts that Tyre shall be laid waste (ver 1), her commercial glory humbled (ver 9), her colonies become independent of her (ver 10), and she herself forgotten for "seventy years" (ver 15); but "after the end of seventy years," her trade will revive, her business prosperity will return, and she will dedi-

chapter, 24-27, is the same as that of 2 2-4 and chs 13-23. Yet the prophet not infrequently throws himself forward into the remote future, oscillating back and forth between his own times and those of Israel's restoration. It is even noteworthy how he sustains himself in a long and continued transportation of himself to the period of Israel's redemption. He even studies to identify himself with the new Israel which will emerge out of the present chaos of political events. His visions predict his redemption carry him in ecstasy far away into the remote future, to a time when the nations' sufferings are all over; so that when he writes down what he saw in vision he describes it as a discipline that is past. When he looks back into the past from the standpoint of the redeemed in the last days, and Jeh纵向longing waited for the manifestation of God's righteousness which has now taken place, while in 27 7-9 he places himself in the midst of the nation's sufferings, in full view of their glorious future, and portrays how Jeh's dealings with them have not been the punishment of wrath, but the discipline of love. This kind of apocalypse, or prophecy, indeed, was to be expected from the very beginning of the group of prophecies, which are introduced with the words, "prophesy." Such a manner of introduction is peculiar to Isaiah, and of itself leads us to expect a message which is unique.

The practical religious value of these prophecies to Isaiah's own age would be very great. In a period of foreign invasion, while but few men were left in the land (24 6.13; 26 13), and Judah's cities were laid waste and desolate (24 10.12; 25 2; 26 5; 27 10), and music and gladness were wanting (24 8), when the nation still clung to their idols (27 9) and the Assyrians' work of destruction was still incomplete, other calamities being sure to follow (24 16), it would certainly be comforting to know that forgiveness was still possible (27 9), that Jeh was still the keeper of His vineyard (27 3.4), that His judgments were to last, but for a little moment (26 20), and that though His people should be scattered, He would soon carefully gather them "one by one" (27 12.13), and that in company with other nations they would feast together on Mt. Zion as Jeh's guests (26 6.10), and that Jeh should henceforth become the center of life and religion to all nations (24 23; 25 6; 27 13). Such faith in Jeh, such exhortations and such songs and confessions of the redeemed, seen in vision, would be a source of rich spiritual comfort to the few surviving units in Jeh's land, and to Judah, and a guiding star to the faithful disciples of the prophet's most inner circle.

concerning Edom and a promise of Israel’s ransom. As in 5 8–28, the prophet indulges in a series of six woes:

(1) Woe to drunken, scoffing politicians (ch 28). This is one of the great chapters of Isaiah’s book. In the opening section (vs 1–6) the prophet points in warning to the proud drunkards of Ephraim whose crown (Samaria) is rapidly fading. He next turns to the scoffing politicians of Jerus, rebuking esp. the hubristic princes who presume in judgment, and the staggering prophets who err in vision (vs 7–22); closing with a more instructive parable from agriculture, teaching that God’s judgments are not arbitrary; that as the husbandman does not plow and harrow his fields the whole year round, so God will not punish His people forever; and as the husbandman does not thresh all kinds of grain with equal severity, no more will God discipline His people beyond their deserts (vs 23–28).

(2) Woe to formalists in religion (29 1–14). Isaiah’s second woe is pronounced upon Ariel, the altar-hearth of God, i.e. Jerus, the sacrificial center of Israel’s worship. David had first inaugurated the true worship of Jeh in Zion. But now Zion’s worship is to some extent transferred to Jerus, and therefore insincere; it is learned by rote (ver 18; of 1 10–15; Mic 6 6–8). Therefore, says Isaiah, Jeh is forced to do an extraordinary work among them, in order to bring them back to a true knowledge of Himself (ver 14).

(3) Woe to those who hide their plans from God (29 15–24). What their plans are, which they are deeming in secret, the prophet does not yet disclose; but he doubtless alludes to their intrigues with the Egyptians, and perhaps to their secret friendship with the Assyrians, to whom they were bound by treaty to pay annual tribute. Isaiah bravely remonstrates with them for supposing that any policy will succeed, which excludes the counsel and wisdom of the Holy One. They are but clay; He is the potter. At this point, though somewhat abruptly, Isaiah turns his face toward the Messianic future. In a very little while, he says, Lebanon, which is now overshadowed by Alexanders, shall become a fruitful field, and the blind and deaf and spiritually weak shall rejoice in the Holy One of Israel.

(4) Woe to the pro-Egypt party (ch 30). Isaiah’s fourth woe is directed against the rebellious political party of parrholists, who advocate making a league with Egypt. They have at length succeeded apparently in winning over the king to their side, and an embassy is already on its way to Egypt, bearing across the desert of the exodus rich treasures with which to purchase the friendship of their former oppressors. Isaiah now condemns what he can no longer prevent. Egypt is a Rahab “sit-still,” i.e. a mythological sea-monster, menacing in men in buxom and aggrandization. When the crisis comes, they will sit still, causing Israel only shame and confusion.

(5) Woe to those who trust in horses and chariots (chs 31–32). Isaiah’s fifth woe is a still more vehement denunciation of those who trust in Egypt’s horses and chariots, and rely upon the Holy One of Israel. Those who do so forget that the Egyptians are but men and their horses flesh, and that mere flesh cannot avail in a conflict with spirit. Eventually Jeh means to deliver Jerus, if the children of Is rael will but turn to that prophet in that day, Assyria will be vanquished. A new era will dawn upon Judah. Society will be regenerated. The renovation will begin at the top. Conscience also will be sharpened, and moral distinctions will no longer be confused (32 1–8). As a result, “The curse of death and all wealth will be replaced by an aristocracy of character.” The careless and indifferent women, too, in that day will no longer menace the social welfare of the state (32 9–14); with the outpouring of Jeh’s spirit an ideal commonwealth will emerge, in which social righteousness, peace, plenty and security will abound (32 15–20).

(6) Woe to the Assyry destroyer (ch 33). Isaiah’s last woe is directed against the treacherous spoiler himself, who has already laid waste the cities of Judah, and is now beginning to lay siege to Jerus (701 BC). The prophet prays, and while he prays, behold! the mighty hosts of the Assyrians are routed and the long-sighed but now triumphant inhabitants of Judas rush out like locusts upon the spoil which the vanishing adversary has been forced to leave behind. The destroyer’s plan to reduce Jerus has come to naught. The whole earth beholds the spectacle of Assyria’s defeat and is filled with awe and amazement at the mighty work of Jeh. Only the righteous may henceforth dwell in Jerus. Their eyes shall behold the Messiah-king in His beauty, reigning no longer like Hezekiah over a limited and restricted territory, but over a land unbounded, whose inhabitants enjoy Jeh’s peace and protection, and are free from all sin, and therefore from all blindness, too and behold, a beautiful picture of the Messianic future, the prophet’s woes find an appropriate conclusion. Isaiah never pronounced a woe without adding a corresponding promise.

In chs 34–35, the prophet utters a fierce cry for justice against “all the nations,” but against Edom in particular. His tone is that of judgment. Edom is guilty of high crimes against Zion (34 8 f), therefore she is doomed to destruction. On the other hand, the scattered tribes of Israel are to be “enlarged” (34 12), and to “obtain gladness and joy, and sorrow and sighing shall flee away” (ch 35).

Chs 36–39 contain history, prophecy and song intermingled. These chapters serve both as an appendix to chs 1–35 and as an introduction to chs 40–66. In them three important historical events are narrated, in which Isaiah was a prominent factor: (1) the double attempt of Sennacherib to obtain possession of Jerus (chs 36–37); (2) Hezekiah’s sickness and recovery (ch 38); (3) the embassy of Merodach-baladan (ch 39). With certain important omissions and insertions these chapters are duplicated almost verbatim in 2 K 18 13—20 19. They supply, above all, the chronological note, “Now it came to pass in the fourth year of king Hezekiah.” Various attempts have been made to solve the mystery of this date; for, if the author is alluding to the siege of 701 BC, difficulty arises, because the first occurrence in this ch of Hezekiah’s “14th” but 26th year, according to the Bib. chronology of his life; or, if with some we date Hezekiah’s accession to the throne of Judah as 720 BC, then the siege of 701 BC occurred, as is evident, in Hezekiah’s 19th year. It is barely possible of course that “the 14th year of king Hezekiah” was the 14th of the “15 years” which were added to his life, but more probably it alludes to the 14th of his reign. On the whole it is better to take the chronological caption for the entire section, with special reference to ch 38, which tells of Hezekiah’s sickness, which actually fell in his 14th year (714 BC), and which, coupled with Sargon’s expected presence at Ashdod, was the great personal and national crisis of the king’s life.

Sennacherib made two attempts in 701 BC to reduce Jerus: one from Lachish with an army headed by the Rabshakeh (36 2–37 8), and another from Libnah with a threat conveyed by messengers (37 9 f). The brief section contained in 2 K 18 14–16 is omitted, but the contents of some 8 of Is 36, because it was not the prophet’s aim at this time to recount the nation’s humiliation.
Isaiah's last "word" concerning Assyria (37 21-35) is one of the prophet's grandest prophecions. It is composed of three parts: (1) a taunt-song, in elegiac rhythm, on the inevitable humiliation of Sennacherib (vs 22-29); (2) a short poem in different rhythm, directed to Hezekiah, in order to encourage his faith (vs 30-32); (3) a definite prediction, in less elevated style, of the sure deliverance of Israel (vs 33-35). Isaiah's prediction was literally fulfilled.

The section 38 9-20 contains Hezekiah's Song of Thanksgiving, in which he celebrates his recovery from some mortal sickness. It is a beautiful funeral praise, and one of the most moving passages in the Bible. Hezekiah was sick in 714 BC. Two years later Merodach-baladan, the veteran arch-enemy of Assyria, having heard of his wonderful recovery, sent letters and a present to congratulate him. Doubtless, also, political motives prompted the recalcitrant Babylonian. But be that as it may, Hezekiah was greatly flattered by the visit of Merodach-baladan's envoys, and, in a moment of weakness, showed them all his royal treasure. This was a fatal blunder, as the sight of his many precious possessions would naturally excite Bab cupiditv to possess Jerus. Isaiah not only solemnly condemned the king's conduct, but he announced with more than ordinary solemnity and energy that all the accumulated resources of Jerus would be carried away to Babylon (39 3-6; cf Mic 4 10).

This final prediction of judgment is the most marvelous of all Isaiah's minatory utterances, because he seems to assume that Jerus was then at the height of its power, but the Babylonians, shall be the instruments of the Divine vengeance in consummating the destruction of Jerus. There is absolutely no reason for doubting that the prophet's words were not more than a prophecy that would be fulfilled. Of course, he predicted that the Babylonians would carry away all the accumulated resources of Jerus (vs 5-6, which follow).

Coming now to chs 40-66, we have prophecies of comfort, salvation, and of the future glory awaiting Israel. These chapters naturally fall into three sections: (1) chs 40-48, announcing deliverance from captivity through Cyrus; (2) chs 49-57, describing the sufferings of the "Servant" of Jehovah, this section ending like the former with the refrain, "There is no peace, saith my God, to the wicked." (56 2); (3) chs 58-66, containing the final abolition of all national distinctions and the future glory of the people of God. Ch 60 is the characteristic chapter of this section, as ch 53 is of the second, and ch 40 of the first.

victories, the conquered nations renouncing their idols, and attracted to Jeh as the Saviour of all mankind (45 22). On any theory of origin, the predictive element in these prophecies is written large.

Chs 46-47 describe further the distinctive work of Cyrus, though Cyrus himself is but once referred to. Particular emphasis is laid on the complete collapse of the Bab religion; the prophet being apparently more concerned with the humiliation of Babylon's idols than with the fall of the city itself. Of course the destruction of the city would imply the defeat of her gods, as also the emancipation of Israel. But here again all is in the future; in fact Jeh's incomparable superiority and unique deity are proven by His power to predict "the end from the beginning" and bring His prediction to pass (46 10 11).

Ch 47 is a dirge over the downfall of the imperial city, strongly resembling the taunt-song over the king of Babylon in 14 4-21.

Ch 48 is a hortatory summary and recapitulation of the argument contained in chs 46-47, the prophet again emphasizing the following points: (1) Jeh's unique power to predict; (2) that salvation is of grace; (3) that Cyrus' advent will be the crowning proof of Jeh's abiding presence among His people; (4) the limitation of Cyrus' ministry; and (5) that even now there is hope, if they will but accept of Jeh's proffered salvation. Alas! that there is no peace or salvation for the godless (48 20-22). Thus ends the first division of Isaiah's remnant prophecy, Israel's deliverance from captivity through Cyrus.

The second section (chs 49-57) deals with the spiritual agent of salvation, Jeh's suffering "Servant. With ch 49 the prophet leaves off attempt ing to further explain the larger ideas contained in the means of prediction, and drops entirely his description of Cyrus' victories and the overthrow of Babylon, in order to set forth in greater detail the character and mission of the suffering "Servant" of Jeh. Already, in chs 46-48, he had alluded several times to this unique and somewhat enigmatical personage, speaking of him both collectively and as an individual (41 8-10; 42 1-9. 18-22; 43 10; 44 1-5. 21-28; 45 4; 46 20-22); but now he defines with greater precision his dual character, his functions, his equipment for his task, his sufferings and humiliation, and also his final exaltation. Altogether in these prophecies he mentions the "Serv ant" three times; but there are also a number of "Servant-Songs" in which the prophet seems to rise above the collective masses of all Israel to at least a personification of the pious within Israel, or better, to a unique Person embodying within himself all that is best in the Israel within Israel. They are the following: (1) 42 1-9, a poem descriptive of the Servant's gentle manner and world-wide mission; (2) 49 1-13, describing the Servant's mission and spiritual success; (3) 50 4-11, the Servant's soliloquy on the cost of his work; and (4) 52 13-53 12, the Serv ant's vicarious suffering and ultimate exaltation. In this last of the four "Servant-Songs" we reach the climax of the prophet's inspired sympathy, the aim of Heb Messianic hope: the only discreet thoughts in the OT revelation are to be found in this section. It is a vindication of the "Servant," so clear and so true, and wrought out with such pathos and potency, that it holds its first place among Messianic predictions. Polycarp called it "the golden portion of the OT." It has been realized in Jesus Christ.

Chs 58-66 describe the future glory of the people of God. Having described in chs 40-48 the temporal agent of Israel's salvation, Cyrus, and in chs 49-57 the spiritual agent of their salvation, the "Servant" of Jeh, the prophet proceeds in this last section to define the conditions on which salvation may be enjoyed. He begins, as before, with a double imperative, "Cry aloud, spare not" (cf 40 1; 49 1).

In ch 58 he discusses true fasting and faithful Sabbath observance.

In ch 59 he beseeches Israel to forsake their sins. It is their sins, he urges, which have hidden Jeh's face and retarded the nation's salvation. In vs 9 ff the prophet identifies himself with the people and leads them in their devotions. Jeh is grieved over Israel's forlorn condition, and, seeing their helplessness, He arms himself like a warrior to interfere judicially (vs 15-19). Israel shall be redeemed. With them as the nucleus of a new nation, Jeh will enter anew into covenant relation, and put His Spirit upon them, which will abide with them henceforth and forever (vs 20-21).

Chs 60-61 describe the future blessedness of Zion. The long-looked-for "light" (of 59 9) begins to dawn: "Arise, shine; for thy light is come, and the glory of Jeh is risen upon thee" (60 1). The prophet pauses at this point to paint a picture of the redeemed community. As in 2 3.4, the Gentiles are seen flocking to Zion, which becomes the mistress of the earth. God will once more build His walls, and her gates are kept open continually without fear of siege. The Gentiles acknowledge that Zion is the spiritual center of the world. Even Israel's oppressors regard her as "the city of Jeh," as "an eternal excellency." In which Jeh sits as its everlasting light (60 10-22).

In ch 61, which Drummond has called "the program of Christianity," the "Servant" of Jeh is again introduced, though anonymously, as the herald of salvation (vs 1-6). Of the prophet's argument (cf 40-41) "Servant" is followed by a promise of the restoration and blessedness of Israel (vs 4-11). Thus the prophecy moves steadily forward toward its goal in Jesus Christ (cf Lk 4 18-21).

In 62 1-63 6 Zion's salvation is described as drawing near. The nations will be spectators of the great event. A new name which will better symbolize her true character shall be given to Zion, namely, Hephzibah, "My delight is in her"; for Jeh shall Neal and prosperity to her (vs 2 3); but on the other hand, Zion's enemies will all be vanquished. In a brief poem of peculiar dramatic beauty (63 1-6), the prophet portrays Jeh's vengeance, as a vengeful, victorious warrior, upon all those who retard Israel's deliverance. Edom in particular is described as Gehenna, "a satiate foe. Hence the prophet represents Jeh's judgment of the nations as taking place on Edom's unhallowed soil. Jeh, whose mighty arm has wrought salvation, returns as victor, having slain all of Israel's foes.

In 63 7-64 12, Jeh's "servants" resort to prayer. They appeal to Jeh as the Begetter and Father of the nations (63 16; 64 8). With this thought of the fatherhood of God imbedded in his language, Isaiah had opened his very first oracle to Judah and Jerusalem (cf 1 2). As the prayer proceeds, the language becomes increasingly tumultuous. The people are thrown into despair because Jeh seems to have abandoned them altogether (63 19). They recognize that the condition of Jeh is desperate. "Our holy and our beautiful house, where our fathers praised thee, is burned with fire; and all our pleasant places are laid waste" (64 11). Such language, however, is the language of fervent prayer and must not be taken with rigid literalness, as 63 18 and 3 8 plainly show.

Finally, in chs 65-66, Jeh answers His people's supplications, distinguishing sharply between His own "servants" and Israel's apostates. Only His chosen "seed" shall be delivered (65 9). Those who have obdurately provoked Jeh by sacrificing in gardens (66 3; 66 17), offering libations to Fortuna and Destiny (66 11), sitting among the graves to obtain oracles from the dead, and, like the Egyptians, eating swine's flesh and broth of abominable things which were supposed to possess magical properties, lodging in vaults or crypts in which heathen mysteries were celebrated (66 4), and at the same time fancying that by celebrating such heathen mysteries they are holier than others and thereby disqualified to discharge the ordinary duties of life (66 5)—such Jeh designs to punish, more than to punish those who have been destroying them utterly with the sword (66 7.12). On the other hand, the "servants" of Jeh shall inherit His holy mountains. They shall rejoice and sing for joy of heart, and bless themselves in the God of Amen, i.e. in the God of Truth (66 9.14.16). Jeh will create new heavens and a new earth, men will live and grow old like the patriarchs; they will possess houses and vineyards and enjoy them; for an era of idyllic peace will be ushered in with the coming of the Messianic age, in which even the nature of wild animals will be changed and the most rapacious of wild animals will live together in harmony (65 17–25). Religion will become spiritual and decentralized, mystic cults will disappear, incredulous scoffers will be silenced. Zion's populace will be comforted and rejoiced (66 1–14). Furthermore, all nations will flock to Zion to behold Jeh's glory, and from one new moon to another, and from one Sabbath to another, all flesh will come up to worship (66 15–23).

It is evident that the Book of Isa closes, practically as it begins, with a polemic against false worship, and the alternate reward of the righteous and punishment of the wicked. The only essential difference between the prophet's earlier and later oracles is this: Isaiah, in his riper years, on the basis of nearly half a century's experience as a preacher, paints a much brighter eschatological picture than was possible in his early ministry. His picture of the Messianic age not only transcends those of his contemporaries in the 8th cent. BC, but he penetrates regions beyond the spiritual horizon of any and all OT seers. Such language as that contained in 66 1.2, in particular, anticipates the great principle stated by Isaiah in Jr 4.4, namely, "God is a Spirit: and they that worship him must worship in spirit and truth." To attempt to date such oracles as these on the basis of internal evidence is an absolute impossibility. Humanly speaking, one age could have produced such revelations quite as easily as another. But no age could have produced them apart from the Divine spirit.

The editorial arrangement of Isaiah's prophecies is very suggestive. In the main they stand in chronological order. That is to say, 8. Isaiah's all the dates mentioned in are strict Prophetic historical sequence; e.g. 6.1, "In the Chronologi- year that king Uzziah died" (740 BC); cally Ar- ranged BC); 7.1, "In the days of Ahaz" (736 ff cally Ar- ranged BC); 14.28, "In the year that king Jahdiah died" (727 BC); 20.1, "In the year that Tartan came unto Ashdod, when Sargon the king of Assyria sent him" (711 BC); 36.1, "In the 14th year of king Hezekiah" (701 BC). These passages are all in strict chronological order. In groups, also, Isaiah's great individual messages are likewise arranged in true historical sequence; thus, chs 1–6 for the most part belong to the last years of Jotham's reign (740–736 BC); chs 7–12, to the reign of Ahaz (736–716 BC); chs 13–23, to the reign of Hezekiah (716–698 BC); chs 20, to the year of Sargon's siege of Ashdod (711 BC); chs 28–32, to the invasion of Judah by Sennacherib (701 BC); while thedistinctively promis-
Or again, if Isaiah the son of Amoz could comfort Judas with promises of protection when the Assyrian (784-768 B.C.) was preparing to sack Jerusalem (8:9-10; 10:24-25), and conceive a beautiful parable of comfort like that contained in 28:23-29; and insert among his warnings and exhortations of the gloomy year 702 BC so many precious promises of a brighter future which was sure to follow Sennacherib's invasion (29:17-24; 30:29-33; 31:8-9), and, in the very midst of the siege of 701 BC, conceive of such marvelous Messianic visions as those in 33:17-24 with which to dispel the dismay of his compatriots, surely to be the work of one who was absolutely convinced of the possibility of seeing the comfort that Jews found in Zion who survived the great catastrophe of 701 BC. The prophet who had done the one was prepared to do the other.

There was one circumstance of the prophet's position after 701 BC which was new, and which is too often overlooked, a circumstance which he could not have employed to anything like the same degree as an argument in enforcing his message prior to the Assyrian's overthrow and the deliverance of Jerusalem. It was this: the fulfillment of former predictions as proof of Jah's deity. From such passages we obtain an idea of the prophet's true historical position (42:9; 44:8; 45:21; 46:10; 48:3).

Of the same authorship were also (6:11-15; 29:8; 30:31; 31:8; 37:7-30), on the basis of which the prophet ventures to predict new and even more astounding things concerning the overthrow of Babylon by Cyrus, and Israel's deliverance through him. As the results of investigation and study show, Isaiah's book is signal full of predictions (7:8.10 ft.; 8:4.8; 9:12.11; 10:26 ft.; 14:24-27; 16:14; 17:9.12-14; 20:4-6; 21:16; 22:19 ft.; 23:15; 38.5), some of which, written down and sealed, were evidently committed by him to his disciples to be used and verified by them in subsequent crises (8:16). Failure to recognize this element in Isaiah's book is fatal to a true interpretation of the prophet's real message.

"For about twenty-five centuries," as A. B. Davidson observes (O'P Prophecy, 1903, 244), "no one dreamt of doubting that Isaiah the son of Amoz was the author of every part of the book that goes under his name; and those who still maintain that the unity of authorship are accustomed to point, with satisfaction, to the uniqueness of the Christian church on the matter, till a few German scholars arose, about a century ago, and called in question the unity of this book. This tradition is unanimous in favor of the unity of the book.

(1) The history of criticism.—The critical disintegration of the book began with Koppe, who in 1780 first doubted the genuineness of ch 66. Nine years later Doederlein suspected the whole of chs 40-66. He was followed by Rosenmuller, who was the first to deny to Isaiah the prophecy against Babylon in 13 1—14 23. Eichhorn, at the beginning of the last century, further eliminated the oracles against Tyre in ch 28, and he, with Gesenius and Ewald, also denied the Isaianic origin of chs 24-27. Gesenius also ascribed to some unknown prophet chs 16 and 16. Rosenmuller then went farther, and pronounced against chs 34 and 35, and not long afterward (1840) Ewald questioned chs 12 and 33. Thus by the middle of the 19th cent., some 37 or 38 chapters were rejected as no part of Isaiah's actual writings. In 1879-80, the celebrated Leipzig professor, Franz Delitzsch, who for years previous had defended the genuineness of the entire book, finally yielded to the modern critical position, and in the new edition of his commentary published in 1889, interpreted chs 40-66, though with considerable hesitation, as coming from the close of the period of Bab exile. About the same time (1888-90), Drs. Driver and G. A. Smith also made Bab exile views in Great Britain. Since 1890, the criticism of Isa has been even more trenchant and microscopic than before. Duhm, Stade, Guthe, Hackmann, Cornill and Marti on the Continent, and Cheyne, Whitehouse, Box, Gatebrook, Kennett, Gray, Fease, and others in Great Britain and America have questioned portions which hitherto were supposed to be genuine.

(2) The disintegration of "Deutero-Isaiah."—Even the unity of chs 40-66, which were supposed to be the work of Isaiah himself, "Deutero-Isaiah," is now given up. What prior to 1890 was supposed to be the unique product of some celebrated but anonymous seer who lived in Babylonia about 550 BC is today commonly divided and subdivided, and in large part distributed among various books from Cyrus to Simon (538-164 BC). At first it was thought sufficient to separate chs 63-66 as a later addition to "Deutero-Isaiah's" prophecies; but more recently it has become the fashion to distinguish between chs 40-66, which have been said to have been written by "Deutero-Isaiah" in Babylonia about 549-538 BC, and chs 56-66, which are now allegedly to have been composed by a "Trito-Isaiah" about 400-445 BC.

(3) Recent titles.—Among the latest to investigate the problem is Professor R. H. Kennett of Cambridge, Eng., who, in his Schweich Lectures (The Composition of the Book of Isa in the Light of Hist and Archaeology, 1910, 84 ff.), sums up the results of investigation as follows: chs 3, 5, 6, 7, 20, and 31, and large portions of chs 1, 2, 4, 8, 9, 10, 14, 17, 22, and 23, may be assigned to Isaiah, the son of Amoz; (b) all of chs 13, 40, and 47, and large portions of chs 14, 21, 41, 43, 45, 46, and 48, may be assigned to the latter part of the 7th cent. (e) portions of chs 15, 36, 37, and 39, and portions of chs 18 and 38, may be assigned to the period between Nebuchadnezzar and Alexander the Great, but cannot be dated precisely; (d) the passages may be assigned to the time of Alexander the Great; (e) all of chs 11, 12, 19, 24-27, 29, 30, 32-35, 42, 49-66, and portions of chs 1, 2, 4, 8, 9, 10, 16, 17, 18, 23, 41, 44, 45, 48 may be assigned to the 2nd cent. BC (167-140 BC).

Professor C. F. Kent, also (Serm. Epis. and Apocryphal Introductions to the Hebrew Bible, 1874), following critical observations on chs 40-66. He says: The prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah are so far from being some of the best for the study of the difficult problems presented by 1sa 40-66. . . . Chs 56-66 were generally read by the Jews as post-Bab exile, but since the 17th cent. and the following chapters there are repeated references to the temple and its services, indicating that it had already been restored. Moreover, these references are not confined to the latter part of the book. . . . The fact, on the one hand, that there are few, if any, allusions to contemporary events in these chapters, and on the other hand, that little or nothing is known of the condition and hopes of the Jews during this period (the closing years of the Bab exile) makes the dating of these prophecies possible, although not certain. Also, the assumption that the author of these chapters lived in the Bab exile is not supported by the disintegration of the prophecies themselves. Possibly their author was one of the few who, like Zerubbabel, had been born in Babylonia and later returned to Pal. He was also dealing with such broad and universal problems that he gives few indications of his geographical and place of abode; but all the evidence that is found points to Jerusalem as the place where he lived and wrote... The prophet's interest and point of view center throughout in Israel, and he shows himself far more familiar with conditions in Pal than in distant Babylonia. Most of his illustrations are drawn from the agricultural life. His vocabulary is also that of a man dwelling in Pal, and in this respect is in marked contrast to the synonyms employed by Ezekiel, the prophet of the Bab exile.

That is to say, two of the most recent investigators of the Book of Isa reach conclusions quite at variance with the opinions advocated in 1890, when Delitzsch so reluctantly allowed that chs 40-
66 may have sprung from the period of Bab exile. Now, it is found that these last 27 chs were written after Isaiah's death, probably in Palestine, rather than in Babylonia as originally claimed, and are no longer considered as primarily to the suffering exiles in captivity as was formerly urged.

(4) The present state of the question.—The present state of the Isa-question is, to say the least, confusing. Those who deny the integrity of the book may be divided into two groups, which we may call moderates and radicals. Among the moderates may be included Drs. Driver, G. A. Smith, Skinner, Kirkpatrick, Koenig, A. B. Davidson, Barnes and Whitehouse. The former, in his criticism of the text, has, it is felt, quite truthfully and logically stated that the following chs and vs are not Isaiah's: 11–16; 12; 13–14 23; 15 1–16 12; 21 1–10; 24–27; 34–35; 36–39; 40–66. That is to say, some 44 chs out of the whole number, 66, were not written by Isaiah; or, approximately 800 out of 1,292 vs are not genuine. Among the radicals are Drs. Cheyne, Duhm, Hackmann, Guthrie, Marti, Kennett and Gray. These all reject approximately 1,030 vs out of the total 1,292, retaining the following only as the genuine product of Isaiah and his age: 1:2–9; 29–31; 2 6–19; 3:15.8.9.17–18; 4 7; 5 1–14.17–29; 6:7–1.22; 9 8–10 9; 10 13.14.27–32; 17:1–14; 18; 20; 22 1–22; 28:1–4.7.22; 29:1–6.9.10.13–15; 30:1–17; 31:1–4. That is, only about 263 vs out of the 1,292 which the Chronicler (1168) used. This is, we believe, a fair statement of the Isa-question as it exists in the hands of divisive critics today.

On the other hand we have those who have defended and who still defend the essential unity of the book. Among whom lived, and that a definite historical situation shall be pointed out for each prophecy. This fundamental postulate, which, on the whole is reasonable and perfectly legitimate if not overworked, underlies all modern criticism of OT prophecy. It is not possible, however, always to trace a mere mark which has been developed from its context. Moreover, the prophets often spoke consciously, not only to their own generation, but also to the generations to come. Isaiah in particular commanded, “Bind thou up the testimony, seal the law among my disciples” (8 16); that is, preserve my teachings for the future. Again in 30 8, he says, “Now go, . . . inscribe it in a book, that it may be for the time to come for ever and ever. And also in 42 23, “Who is there among you that will give ear to this? that will hearken and hear for the time to come?”

Certain false presuppositions often govern critics in their disintegration of the book. Only a few examples need be given by way of illustration: (a) According to some, “the conversion of the heathen” lay quite beyond the horizon of any 8th. cent. prophet; consequently, Isa 2 2–4 and all similar passages which foretell the conversion of those outside the chosen people are to be relegated to an age subsequent to Isaiah. (b) To others, it is the symptom of late date, and therefore this section and all kindred ones must be deleted. (c) To others, the thought of “universal judgment” upon “the whole earth” in 14 26 and elsewhere quite transcends Isaiah’s time. Disagreement on this point still, the apocalyptic character of the chs 24–27 represents a phase of Heb thought which prevailed in Israel only after Ezechiel. (e) Even to those who are considered moderates “the poetic character” of a passage like ch 12, and the references to a “return” from captivity, as it appears to us, are no longer considered as primarily to the suffering exiles in captivity as was formerly urged.

As a last resort, certain critics have appealed to 2 Ch 36.22–23 as external evidence that chs 40–55 existed as a separate collection in the Chronicler’s age. But the evidence obtained from this source is so doubtful that it is well-nigh valueless. For it is not the prediction of Isa concerning Cyrus to which he referred, but the prediction of the Chronicler. This is, we believe, a fair statement of the Isa-question as it exists in the hands of divisive critics today.
through imitation: 1 4; 6 19,24; 10 20; 12 6; 17 7; 20 14; 50 7,12.13; 1 37; 22; also 41 14.16.20; 43 3.14; 46 11; 47 4; 48 17; 49 7; 54 5; 55 5; 60 9.14; elsewhere, only in 2 K 19 22; Ps 71 22; 78 41; 89 18; Jer 50 29; 51 5).

Another unique idea which occurs with considerable repetition in the Book of Isa. is the thought of a “highway” (of 11 16; 35 8; 40 3; 43 8; 49 9; 51 4; 66 3; 1.10.17.18; 42 14; 54 1; 66 7). These, and many others less distinctive, stamp the book with an individuality which it is difficult to account for, if it be broken up into countless fragments and distributed over the centuries.

(b) The literary style: As negative evidence, literary style is not a very safe argument; for, as Professor McCurdy says, “In the case of a writer of Isaiah’s standing, literary style is not a sure criterion of authorship” (History, Prophecy and the Monuments, II, 317 n.). Yet it is certainly remarkable that the clause “for the mouth of Jehovah hath spoken it” should be found 3 times in the Book of Isa.; and nowhere else in the O.T. (of 1 30; 40 5; 58 14). And it is noteworthy that the phrase, “streams of water,” should occur twice in Isa. and nowhere else (cf. 30 25; 44 4 in the Heb.). And very peculiar is the tendency on the prophet’s part to emphatic repetition of 7 7; 8 9; 16 12.13; 40 1; 43 11.25; 48 15; 51 12; 59 19; 62 10). In fact, it is not extravagant to say that Isaiah’s style differs widely from that of every other OT prophet, and is as far removed as possible from that of Ezekiel and the post-exilic prophets (of 13 8; 21 3; 22 17.18; 1.14; 54 1; 66 7).

(c) Historical references: Take, for example, first, the prophet’s constant reference to Judah and Jerusalem, his country and its capital (1 7–9; 3 8; 24 19; 26 2; 40 2.9; 62 4); likewise, to the temple and its sacrifices. In 1 11 it is evident when all was prosperous, the prophet complained that the people were profuse and formal in their ceremonies and sacrifices; in 43 23.24, on the contrary, when the country had been overrun by the Assyrians, the prophet reminded them that they had not brought to Jehovah their burnt offerings, nor honored Him with their sacrifices; while in 66 1–3.20, not only is the existence of the Temple and the observance of the ritual presupposed, but those who were sentenced who place their trust in the material temple, and the outward ceremonies of temple-worship. As for the “exile,” the prophet’s attitude to it is throughout that of both anticipation and realization. Thus in 67 1 the judgment is threatened, not yet inflicted: “The righteous is taken away from the evil to come.” That is to say, the exile is described as still future. On the other hand, in 3 8, “Jerusalem is fallen, and Judah is broken up.” which seems to describe the exile as in the past; yet, as everybody admits, these are the words of Isaiah the 8th cent. In 11 11.12, the prophet says, “The Lord will set his hand again the second time to recover the remnant of his people. . . . from the four corners of the earth. . . .” Still, literally and metaphorically without regard to 8th-cent. conditions, or to Isaiah’s manifest attitude to the exile, leads to confusion. No prophet realized so keenly or described so vividly the destiny of the Hebrews.

e) The predictive element: This is the strongest proof of the unity of the Book of Is. Prediction is the very essence of prophecy (cf.Dt 18 22); Isaiah was predominantly a prophet of the future. With unparalleled suddenness, he repeatedly leaps from despair to hope, from threat to promise, and from the actual to the ideal. With such familiar phrases of “Daybreak” and “Deutero-Isaiah” may with equal justice be said of Isaiah himself: “While in touch with his own age, the great unknown prophet lives in the atmosphere of the past and the future” (R. W. Connop, The Life and Teach., 89). Isaiah spoke to his own age, but he also addressed himself to the ages to follow. His verb tenses are characteristically futures and prophetic perfects. Of his book A. B. Davidson’s words are particularly true: “If any prophetic book be examined . . . it will appear that the ethical and religious teaching is always secondary, and that the essential thing in the book or discourse is the prophet’s outlook into the future” (HDB, art. “Prophecy and Prophets,” IV, 119).

Isaiah was exceptionally given to predicting: thus (a) before the Syro-Ephraimitic war (734 BC), he predicted that within 65 years Ephraim should be broken to pieces (cf. 7 7); and that before the captivity should have knowledge to cry, “My father,” or “My mother,” the rich men of Damascus should be carried away (8 4; and 7 16). These, however, are but two of numerous predictions, as shown above, among his earlier prophecies (cf. 1 27; 2 2–4; 6 13; 10 20–23; 11 6–16; 17 14).

(b) Shortly before the downfall of Samaria in 722 BC, Isaiah predicted that we should be forgotten 70 years, and that after the end of 70 years her merchandise should be holiness to Jehovah 33 (18). (c) In like manner prior to the siege of Ashdod in 711 BC, he proclaimed that within 3 years Moab should be brought into contempt within a year all the glory of Cedar should fall 31 (16).

(d) And not long prior to the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib in 701 BC, he predicted that suddenly, a multitude of Jerusalem’s foes should be as dust (29 8); that yet a very little while and Lebanon should be turned into a fruitful field (29 17); and that Assyria should be dismayed and fall by the sword, but not of men (30 17.31; 31 8). And more, that for decades beyond a year, the careless women of Jerusalem should be troubled 33 (10.16–20); and that the righteous in Zion should see Jehovah a quiet habitation, and return and come with singing (33 17 f.; 36 4.10); but that Sennacherib, on the contrary, should be torn down without shooting an arrow into the city (37 7.26–29; 33–35).

In like manner, also, after the siege of Jerusalem by Sennacherib in 701 BC was over, the prophet seems to have continued to predict; and, in order to the suffering and unbelieving remnant about him the remembrance of Jehovah and the folly of the enemies predictions which he had already made in the earlier years of his ministry, and to the fact that they had been fulfilled. Thus, he says, “Woe to them that would make the beginning, that we may know. . . before the end, that we may say, His right is right” (41 21–23.26); “Behold, the former things are come to pass, and new things do I declare; before they spring forth I will tell you of them” (42 9.25); “Who among them can declare this, and show us former things? (i.e. things to come in the immediate future)? I have declared, and I have saved, and I have showed” (43 9.12); “Who, as I, shall call, and shall declare it? . . . And the things that are coming, and that shall come, shall not be forgotten; neither shall the words thereof be destroyed, . . . Have I not declared unto thee of old, and showed it? . . .” (44 7.8.27.28); “It is I, Jehovah, who calleth thee by thy name.” (cf. even the God of Israel, . . . I have called thee by thy name: I have named thee, thou art called. . .”); “Ask me of the things that are to come, and I shall show thee things unknown; Jehovah, the God of Israel, will show thee things unknown, and things forgotten.” (cf. 44 7; 45 8; 32.13.11.13); “Declaring the end from the beginning, and from things that are not yet done; . . . a ravenous bird from Cyprus from the coasts of Ethiopia shall spread its wings over a far country; yea, I have spoken, I will also bring it, and it shall come . . . have declared the former things from of old, . . . and I showed, and they came to pass . . . have declared, . . . from of old; before I formed thee I knew thee” (46 10.11); “I have declared the former things from of old, . . . and I showed, and they came to pass . . . have declared, . . . from of old; before I formed thee I knew thee” (46 3.5); “I have showed thee new things from this time, even hidden things... Yea, from of old thine ear was not opened... Who among them hath declared these things?... I, even I, have spoken; yea, I have declared from ancient times that which is not; I have shown from and as a future thing that which is not in secret... (48:8–9, 14–16). Such predictions are explicit and emphatic.

(c) Cyrus a subject of prediction: From all the above-mentioned explicit and oft-repeated predictions of the future things to happen, it is obvious, namely, that great emphasis is laid by the prophet on prediction throughout the entire Book of Is. And it must be further allowed that “Cyrus” is represented by the author as predicted, from any point of view. The one issue is the fact, the emphasized fact, that he himself is predicting the coming of Cyrus, or that former predictions concerning Cyrus are now, as the prophet writes, coming to pass before his readers’ eyes! Canoche’s remark upon this point is instructive. He says: “The editor, who doubtless held the last Jewish theory of prophecy, may have inferred from a number of passages, esp. 41:26; 48:3–6.14, that the first appearance of Cyrus had been predicted by an ancient prophet, and observed certain Isianic elements in the phraseology of these chapters. And finding the prophet with Isaiah” (Intro to the Book of Is, 235).

Dr. G. A. Smith likewise allows that Cyrus is the fulfilment of former predictions.

It is quite possible to argue, as some have tried to do, that the prophet is predicting these things as they had already happened. For as part of an argument for the unique divinity of the God of Israel, Cyrus, “alive and irresistible,” and already accredited with success, is pointed out as the unmistakable proof that former prophecies of a deliverance for Israel are already coming to pass. It is not, of course, as a prediction, but as a proof that a prediction is being fulfilled. (HDB, art. “Isaiah,” 493). And further, he says, therefore, that the chief claim, which the 40th makes for the God of Israel is His power to direct the events in accordance to a long-predicted and faithfully followed purpose. This claim starts from the proof that Jeh has long before predicted events now happening or about to happen, with Cyrus as their center. But this is much more than a proof of isolated predictions, though it may imply one. It is a declaration of the unity of history sweeping to the high ends which have been already revealed to Israel—an exposition, in short, of the Omniscience, Consistency, and Faithfulness of the Providence of the one true God! (ib, 496).

It is obvious, therefore, in any case, whether these changes can or can’t be made, that Cyrus is the subject of prediction. It really makes little difference at which end of history one takes his stand, whether in the 8th cent. BC with Isaiah, or in the 6th cent. BC with “Deutero-Isaiah.” Cyrus, to the author of these chs, is the subject of prediction. In other words, whether indeed the author is really predicting Cyrus in advance of all apparent fulfilment, or Cyrus is the fulfilment of some ancient prediction by another, does not alter the fact that Cyrus was the subject of prediction on the part of somebody. Accordingly, as far as the account at the context, the whole question is, which does the prophet emphasize, (a) the fact that he himself is predicting? or, (b) that former predictions by someone else are now before his eyes coming to pass? The truth is, the prophet seems to have the atmosphere opened before him in advance as well as in the present, all of which are equally vivid to his prophetic mind. This is a peculiar characteristic of Isaiah. It is seen in the account he gives of his inaugural vision (ch 6), of which he attaches remarks that it is “like a prediction in the process of being fulfilled.” The same is true of chs 24–27. There the prophet repeatedly projects himself into the future, and speaks from the standpoint of the fulfilment of his predictions. It is clear, too, of chs 40–48. Cyrus, in the present context, the whole emphasis is on the fact that he is predicting, and a little later he describes his predictions as coming to pass. When, accordingly, a decision is made as to when the author predicted Cyrus, it is more natural to suppose that he was doing so long before Cyrus’ actual appearance. This, in fact, is in keeping with the test of true prophecy, that contained in 15:18: “When a prophet speaketh in the name of Jehovah, if the thing follow not, nor come to pass, that is the thing which Jehovah hath not spoken; the prophet hath spoken it presumptuously, thou shalt not be afraid of him.” Besides, there is a similar explicit prediction in the OT, namely, that of King Josiah, who was foretold by name two centuries before he came (1 K 13:2; cf 2 K 23:15–16).

Dr. W. H. Chubb, in the Journal of Bib. Literature and Exegesis, 1911, 79, pleaded for a “ shrimp-locked Cyrus,” because Cyrus figures only in chs 40–48, and is then dismissed. Dr. Thirlte, on the other hand, argues that the name “Cyrus” is a mere appellative, being originally not Kūresh (Cyrus), but hūrēsh (“workman,” “artisan,” “image-breaker”), and that 44:27–28 is a gloss (cf OT Problems, 244–64). But in opposition to these views the present writer prefers to write Cyrus large, and to allow frankly that he is the subject of extraordinary prediction. For the very point of the author’s argument is, that he is predicting events which Jeh alone is capable of foretelling or bringing to pass; in other words, that presence is the proof of Jeh’s deity. Isaiah lived in an age when Jeh’s prophecies were first revealed and验证sentants of the prophets (cf Am 3:7). Political conditions were unsettled and kaleidoscopic, and there was every incentive to predict. That Isaiah actually uttered wonderful predictions is attested, furthermore, both by his statements of the prophetic inspiration and by his reasoning on the utterances of his co-brethren (ch 13) and in his own words, for instance, that the future shall be as the past “in a few years” (Isa 24:8). The chronological arrangement of the poem assigns the Restoration and Cyrus to the future. The perspective of the poet, together with the abrupt change in the poem about ch 60, argues that the future is a remote future. And finally the carefully constructed double climax attaches a significance to the definiteness of the utterance which is most easily accounted for if this future was so remote that a definite disclosure concerning it would be of extraordinary importance.

And he further alleges that “it is impossible, if justice is done to the plain declarations of Scripture, to limit the prophetic horizon of the prophet Isaiah to the pretellie period and that... when the form of the poem is recognized, there is every reason to assign it to a preëxilic prophet, to Isaiah, since the form of the poem is admirably calculated to emphasize the fact that Cyrus and the Restoration belong to a distant future, and to make it clear that it is just because of this fact that the definiteness of the prophecy, the mention of Cyrus by name, is so remarkable and of such unique significance” (Bib. and Theol. Studies, by the members of the Faculty of Princeton Theological Seminary, Centennial vol, 1912, 629–29).

After all, why should men object to prediction on so large a scale? Unless there is definiteness about any given prediction, and unless it transcends ordinary prophecy, there is no special value in it. Should it be objected, however, that prediction of so minute a character is “abhorrent to reason,” the answer is already at hand; it may be abhorrent to reason, but it is a handmaid to faith. For it is but the future, even as prediction has to do with the future; and the OT is preeminently a book which encourages faith. There is really no valid objection to the prediction of Cyrus. For the one outstanding differentiating characteristic of Israel's religion is predictive prophecy. The Hebrews were the only people of antiquity whose "Golden Age" lay in the future rather than in the past. Accordingly, to predict the coming of a Cyrus as the human agent of Israel's salvation is but a conservative interpretation of the picture of the Divine agent, namely, the obedient, Suffering Servant of Jehovah, who would redeem Israel from its sin. Deny to Isaiah the son of Amoz the prediction concerning Cyrus, and it is but logical to go farther and to deny to him the Messianic hope which is usually associated with his name. Deny to Isaiah the son of Amoz the predictions concerning a return from captivity, and the prophecies of his book are robbed of their essential character and their meaning. Enumerate those portions of the Book of Isaiah which unveil the future, and they are reduced to a mere sactimium ex eventu, and their religious value as Divine oracles is largely lost.

ISAIAH, ASCENSION OF. See Apocalyptic Literature.

ISCHAIAH, is'ka, is'ka (יִשׁיאֵל, yish'ael): Daughter of Haran and sister of Milcah the wife of Nahor (Gen 11:29). Tradition identifies her with Sarah, Abram's wife; but without sufficient reason.

ISCARIOT, is'kar-i-ot. See Judas Iscariot.

ISDAEL, is'da-el (יִשׁדֶּאֵל, Isdæl): In I Esd 5 33; called "Giddel" in Ezr 2 56.

ISH (יִשׁ, 'ish): In the following Heb proper names, a prefix meaning "man of," or, collectively, "men of": Ish-bosheth, Ishhod, Ish-tob (but RV correctly "men of Tob"). See also Ishbaal, Ishshan, Iscariot.

ISHBAAL, ish'ba-al. See Ish-bosheth.

ISHBAH, ish'ba (יִשְׁבָּה, yishbâh): A member of the tribe of Judah, father of Eshemoa (1 Ch 4 17).

ISHBAK, ish'bak (יִשְׁבעָך, yishbâch) A name in the list of sons of Abraham by Keturah (Gen 25 2; 1 Ch 1 32). These names probably represent tribes; the tribe of Ishshah has not been certainly identified.

ISHBI-BENOB, ish-bi-benob (ишִׁבְיָ בֵּנֹב, yishbi-venob): One of the four "born to the giant in Gath" who were slain by David and his men (2 S 21 15–22). Ishbi-benob was slain by Abishai, and David's life was saved by the act (vs 16-17).

ISH-BOSHETH, ish-bosheth (יִשְׁבֹּ֫שְֹתֶ, Ish-bosheth, "man of shame"; יִשְׁבֹּ֫שְֹתֶ, Ishshotheh): Called Ish-bosheth (ם inexplicable), "man of Baal" (1 Ch 8 33), and יִשְׁבֹּ֫שְֹתֶ, yishbôth, "man of Jeh"(?), perhaps for יִשְׁבֹּ֫שְֹתֶ, yishbôth (1 S 14 49). Cf. Eshbaal and Ishvi (AV "Ishshu"). We probably have the right meaning of the name in Eshbaal and Ishvi, the words Baal and Jeh being frequently interchanged. The change to Ish-bosheth, "man of shame," in 2 S, where the story of his shameful murder is related, may be better explained as reference to this face of Merobalba, whose name was also used of Merib-baal (for similar reasons), than to find here a suggestion of Baal-worship, but see HPN, 121, where the change is explained as a correction of the scribes, in consequence of prophetic protests. Actually, one of the synonyms of יִשְׁבֹּ֫שְֹתֶ, yishbôth (1 S 14 49) who, when his father and brothers were slain in the battle of Gilboa (1 S 31 1 ff.), was proclaimed king over Israel by Abner, the captain of Saul's host, at Mahanaim (2 S 2 8 ff.). Ishbosheth was 40 years old at this time and reigned over Israel 2 years (2 S 2 10). Judah, however, proclaimed David king. The consequence was war (2 S 2 12 ff.). The house of David prevailed against the house of Saul (2 S 3 1), but the war did not come to a close until Abner, angry on account of the rebuke he suffered from I., for his unlawful intimacy with Rizpah, Saul's concubine, joined David (2 S 3 6 ff.). David's condition to return to him Micah, his wife, before peace could be made, was fulfilled by I. (2 S 3 14 f.), but it was not until after Abner's death that I. seems to have given up hopes of retaining his power (2 S 4 1 f.). The shameful murder of I. by his own captains is recorded in 2 S 4 5 ff. David punished the murderers who had expected reward and buried I. in the grave of Abner at Hebron (2 S 4 12 ff.).

ISHHOD, ish'hood (ישָׁחוֹד, yish'hadh), "man of majesty": A man of the tribe of Manassesh (1 Ch 7 18, AV "Ishhod").
ISHI, ish'î (יִשְׂח, yish'âh, “salutary”):
(1) A Jerahmeelite (1 Ch 2:31); the genealogy may denote his membership by blood, or only by adoption, in the house of Judah.
(2) A Judahite (1 Ch 4:20).
(3) A Simeonite, whose sons led 500 of their tribe against the Amalekites in Mt. Seir (1 Ch 4:42).
(4) One of the chiefs of Manasseh E. of the Jordan (1 Ch 6:24).

ISHI, ish’î, t’shî (יִשְׂח, yish’âh, “my husband”;
LXX ἀνήρ ἱμαρν, ho andor mou): The name symbolic of Jeh’s relation to Israel which Hosea (2:16) declared shall proceed, with “my lord,” has become hateful on account of its associations with the worship of the Baals.

ISHIAH, i-sh’îyâ. See ISSIAH.

ISHJAH, i-sh’îyâ. See ISSIAH.

ISHMA, ish’ma (ישׁמואל, yishma’el), from the root yâsham, “to live;” therefore meaning “desolate”): A brother of Joram and Idash, “the sons of the father of Etam” (1 Ch 4:3). They were brothers of Hazzeleponi.

ISHMAEL, ish’mâ-el (ישׁמואל, yishma’el’), “God heareth,” or “God may,” “shall hear”; Ἰσμαὴλ, Ismael):
(1) The son of Abraham by Hagar, the Egyptian slave of his wife Sarah. The circumstances connected with his birth reveal what seems to us to be a very strange practice. It was customary among ancient peoples to correct the natural defect of barrenness by substituting a slave woman. In our narrative, this is shown to be authorized and brought about by the legitimate wife with the understanding that the offspring of such a union should be regarded as her own: “It may be that I shall obtain children by her,” lit. “that I shall be built by her” (Gen 16:2).

The hopes of Sarah were realized, for Hagar gave birth to a son, and yet the outcome was not fully pleasing to Abraham’s wife; there was one serious drawback. As soon as Hagar “saw that she had conceived,” her behavior toward her mistress underwent a radical change; she was “despised in her eyes.” But for the intervention of the angel of Jehovah, the boy might have been born in Egypt. For, being dealt with hardly (or humbly) by Sarah, the handmaid fled toward that country. On her way she was told by the angel to return to her mistress and submit herself “under her hands.” She obeyed, and the child which was to be “a wild ass among men” was born when his father was 86 years old (Gen 16:7-16).

At the age of 13 years the boy was circumcised (Gen 17:25) in accordance with the Divine command received by Abraham: “Every male among you shall be circumcised” (Gen 17:10). Thus young Ishmael was made a party to the covenant into which God had entered with the lad’s father. The fact that both Abraham and his son were circumcised the same day (Gen 17:26) undoubtedly adds to the importance of Ishmael’s partaking of the holy rite. He was certainly made to understand how much his father loved him and how deep his wishes about his son’s welfare. We may even assume that there was a time when Abraham looked upon Ishmael as the promised seed. His error was made clear to him when God promised him the birth of a son by Sarah. At first this seemed to be a contradiction of the promise of a child of Sarah and herself old and Sarah 90. And yet, how could he disbelieve the word of God? His cherished, though mistaken, belief about Ishmael, his doubts regarding the possibility of Sarah’s motherhood, and the first faint glimmer of the real meaning of God’s promise, all these thoughts found their expression in the fervid wish: “O that Ishmael might live before thee!” (Gen 17:18). Gradually the truth dawned upon the patriarch that God’s thoughts are not the thoughts of men, neither their ways. But we have no reason to believe that this entire change of the mental attitude of Abraham toward Ishmael reacted unfavorably on his future treatment of this son “born of the flesh” (Gen 21:11). If there were troubles in store for the boy likened by the angel of Jehovah to a wild ass, it was, in the main, the youngster’s own fault.

When Isaac was weaned, Ishmael was about 16 years of age. The weaning was made an occasion for great celebration. But it seems that the pleasure of the day was marred by the objectionable behavior of Ishmael.

“And Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian . . . mocking” (Gen 21:9). Her jealous motherly love had quickened her sense of observation and her faculty of reading the character of children. We do not know exactly what the word used in the Heb for “mocking” really means. The LXX and the Vulg render the passage: “When Sarah saw the son of Hagar . . . playing with Isaac,” and St. Paul followed a later tradition. He says: “He was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the Spirit” (Gal 4:29). Lightfoot (in his notes to the Ep. to the Gal) says: “At all events the word seems to mean mocking, jeering.” At any rate, the fact revealed to Sarah that she had objected to the bringing up of the son of promise together with the “mockers,” and so both mother and son were banished from the tents of Abraham.

Now there came a most critical time in the life of young Ishmael. Only some bread and a bottle of water were “put on the shoulder” of Hagar by Abraham when he expelled her with her son. Aimlessly, as it seems, the two walked about in the wilderness of Beersheba. The water was soon spent, and with it went all hope and energy. The boy, being faint with thirst and tired out by his constant walking in the fierce heat of the sun, seemed to be dying. So his mother put him rapidly down in the shade of some shrub. We do not know the opinion of some writers that the narrative of Gen 21:8ff represented Ishmael as a little boy whom his mother had carried about and finally flung in the shade of some shrub. Even if this passage is taken from a different source, it is certainly not in conflict with the rest as to the age of Ishmael.) After this last act of motherly love—what else could she do to help the boy?—she retired to a place at some distance and resignedly expected the death of her son and permanent separation.

For the 2d time in her life, she had a marvelous experience. “God heard the voice of the lad,” and comforted the unhappy mother most wonderfully. Through His angel He renewed His former promise regarding her son, and then He showed her a well of water. The lad’s life was saved and, growing up, he became in time an archer. He lived in the wilderness of Paran and was married by his mother to an Egyptian wife (Gen 21:21).

When Abraham died, his exiled son returned to assist his brother to bury their father (Gen 25:9).

In the same chapter we find the names

4. His of Ishmael’s 12 sons (vs 12ff) and a Children brief report of his death at the age of 137 years (ver 17). According to Gen 25:9, he 28:9 he also had a daughter, Mahalah, whom Isaac took for his wife; in Gen 36:3 her name is given as Basemat.
The character of Ishmael and his descendants (Arabian nomads or Bedouins) is very accurately and vividly depicted.'

5. Descendants

men; his hand shall be against every man, and every man’s hand against him” (Gen 15:12).

These nomads are, indeed, roaming the wilderness "of their independence, quarrelsome and adventurous. We may well think of their progenitors as of a proud, undaunted and rugged son of the desert, the very counterpart of the poor hoy lying half dead from fever and exposure under the shrub in the wilderness of Beersheba.

6. In the NT

The person and the history of Ishmael, the son of Abraham, “born after the flesh,” is of special interest to the student of the NT because of Paul’s use of him, in the Ep. to the Gal., as a type of those Jews who cling to the paternal religion in such a manner as to be unable to distinguish the character of the OT Institutions, and esp., those of the Mosaic law. By doing so they could not be made to see the true meaning of the law, and instead of embracing the grace of God as the only means of fulfilling the law, they taught the contrary doctrine of Christianity and even persecuted its advocates. Like Ishmael, born of Hagar, the handmaid of Abraham, so they had been slave woman; like him, they were Abraham’s sons only “after the flesh,” and their ultimate fate is foreshadowed in the casting out of Hagar and her son. They could not expect to maintain the connection with the true Israel, and in like manner they should not expect their Messiah, they were not to be the leaders of the church or the exponents of its teachings (Gal 4:21—28).

(2) The son of Nathaniah (Jer 40:8—41:18; cf 2 K 25:29—25). It is a dreary story of jealousy and animosity which Jeremiah records in the 40, 41 of his book. After the destruction of Jerusalem and the deportation of the better class of Jewish citizens, it was necessary to provide for some sort of a government in the depopulated country. Public order had to be restored and maintained; crops of the fields were endangered and had to be taken care of. It was thus only common political prudence that dictated to the king of Babylon the setting up of a governor for the remnant of Judah. He chose Gedaliah, the son of Ahikam, for the difficult position. The new officer selected for his place of residence the city of Mizpah, where he was soon joined by Jeremiah. All the captains of the Jewish country forces came to Mizpah with their men, and they made Gedaliah’s residence their headquarters (Jer 40:13). Ishmael the son of Nathaniah, the son of Elishama “of the seed royal” (2 K 25:25) was among their number—all of which must have been rather gratifying to the new governor. But he was destined to be cruelly misunderstood. A traitor was among the captains that had gathered around him. Yet the governor might have prevented his dastardly scheme. Ishmael, the son of Karah, and other loyal captains warned him of the treachery of Ishmael, telling him he was induced by Baalis, the Ammonite king, to assassinate the governor. But the governor’s faith in Ishmael was not to be shaken; he even looked upon Nathaniah’s report as false and calumnious (Jer 40:16). About 2 months after the destruction of Jerusalem Ishmael was ready to strike the mortal blow. With 10 men he came to Mizpah, and there, at a banquet given in his honor, he killed Gedaliah and all the Jews and Chaldaeans that were with him. He succeeded in keeping the matter a secret; for 2 days after the horrible deed, he persuaded a party of 80 pious Jews to enter the city and killed all but 10 of them, throwing their bodies into a pit. These men were coming from the ruins of the Temple with the offerings which they had intended to leave at Jerusalem. Now they had found out, to their great distraction, that the city was laid waste and the Temple destroyed. So they passed by Mizpah, their beards shaven, their clothes rent, and with cuts about their persons (Jer 41:5). We may, indeed, ask indignantly, Why this new atrocity? The answer may be found in the fact that Ishmael did not kill all of the men. He spared 10 of them because they promised him some hidden treasures. This shows his motive. He was a desperate man and just then carrying out a desperate undertaking. He killed those peaceful citizens because of their money, and money he needed to realize his plans. They were those of a traitor to his country, insomuch as he intended to deport the inhabitants of Mizpah to the land of his high confederate, the king of the Ammonites. Among the captives were Jeremiah and the daughters of the Jewish king. But his efforts came to naught. When Johanan and the other captains were told of Ishmael’s unheard-of actions, they immediately pursued the desperate adventurer and overtook him by the “great waters that are in Gibeon.” Unfortunately, they failed to capture Ishmael; for he managed to escape with eight men to the Ammonites. See, further, Gedaliah.

(3) A descendant of Benjamin and the son of Azel (1 Ch 8:38; cf 9:44).

(4) The father of Zebadiah who was “the ruler of the house of Judah, in all the king’s [Jehoshaphat, 2 Ch 19:8] matters” (2 Ch 19:11).

(5) The sons of Ishmael were called “a captain of hundreds,” who lived at the time of Jehoada and Joash (2 Ch 23:1).

One of the sons of Pashhur the priest. He was one of those men who had married foreign women and were compelled to "put away their wives" (Ezr 10:22).

WILLIAM BAUM

Ishmael (יִשְׁמַאֵל, Ismaháli):

(1) AV "Ishmael" (Jth 2:23), the son of Abraham by Hagar.

(2) 1 Esd 9:22 (AV, RV "Ishmael"), corresponding to Ishmael in Ezr 10:22. See preceding art.

Ishmaelites, ishmá-el-líts (יִשְׁמַעְלִיִם, yishma‘eylim): The supposed descendents of Ishmael, the son of Abraham and Hagar, whom Abraham sent away from him after the birth of Isaac (Gen 21:14—21). The sons of Ishmael are given in Gen 25:13—14, they were twelve in number and gave rise to as many tribes, but the term Ishmaelite has a broader signification, as appears from Gen 37:28, 36, where it is identified with Midianite. From Gen 16:12 it may be inferred that it was applied to the Bedowin of the desert region E. of the Jordan generally, for the cedared there assigned to Ishmael, "His hand shall be against every man, and every man’s hand against him," fits the habits of Bedowin in all ages. Such was the character of the Midianites as described in Jgs 7, who are again identified with the Ishmaelites (8:24). These references show that the Ishmaelites were not confined to the descendents of the son of Abraham and Hagar, but refer to the desert tribes in general, like "the children of the east" (Jgs 7:12).

H. PORTER

Ishmahā, ish-mā’ya (ישמָהָ, yismah'ya, "Jeh is hearing"): 1. A man of Gibeon, chief of David’s 30 great warriors, who came to him at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:4, AV “Ismaiah”).

(2) Chief of the armed contingent of the tribe of Zebulun, which served David in the monthly order of the tribes (1 Ch 27:19).

Ishmerai, ish-mē’rī (ישֶׁמְרָי, yishmeray, from shāmār, meaning "to hedge about," i.e. "to guard," and therefore a “guard,” “protector”): A descendant of Benjamin, son of Ephraim, resident of Jerusalem, one of the “heads of fathers’ houses” throughout their generations, chief men (1 Ch 8 18).

ISHOD, Ishod, 1 (םִּהֹד, יִשֶׁרֹד): AV 1 Ch 7 18 for Ishod (q.v.).

ISHPAH, Ishpa (ישֶפָּה, יִשֶׁפַּה, “firm,” “strong”): A man of the tribe of Benjamin, of the house of Jeriah (1 Ch 8 16).

ISHPAN, Ishpan (ישפָּן, יִשֶׁפָּן, lit. “he will hide”): Descendant of Benjamin, son of Shashak, one of the “chief men, heads of fathers’ houses”; lived at Jerusalem (1 Ch 8 22).

ISH-SECHEL, Ish-sekel (ישֶסֶכֶל, 1ish sekel, “man of discretion”): Ezra, at one time in need of ministers for the house of God, sent unto Iddo the chief at the place Caspatha. “And according to the good hand of our God upon us they brought us a man of discretion [1 Ish-sekel], of the sons of Mahli, the son of Levi, the son of Israel” (Est 8 18). This is the only reference to Ish-sechel.

ISH-TOB, Ish-tob (ישֶתֹב, 1ish tov, “the men of Tob”): A place in Pal, probably a small kingdom, large enough, however, to supply at least 12,000 men of valor to the children of Ammon in their struggle against Joab, David’s general (2 S 10 6b). See Ishb.

ISHUAH, Ish-ta, Isuah, Ish-ta (ישֶנֶה, יִשֶׁנה, “he will live”): See Ishuah; Ishyah; Ishvi.

ISHVAY, Ish-va (ישֶנֶה, יִשֶׁנה, “even,” “level”): AV Ishuah and Isuah); Second son of Asher (Gen 46 17; 1 Ch 7 30). As only the families of his brothers Ishvi, etc., are mentioned in Nu 26 44, the supposition is that he left no issue.

ISHVI, Ish-vi (ישֶנֶה, יִשֶׁנה, “equal”): (1) The third son of Asher (Gen 46 17; 1 Ch 7 30), and founder of the family of the Leshvites (Nu 26 44, AV “Jesuites”), AV “Isaï,” “Jesuit,” and “Isaiah.” (2) The name is also found among the sons of Saul (1 S 14 49), AV “Isibai.”

ISLAND, island, ISLE, il (1) “םָא, 1, “island” or “isle”; AV has “coast” or “coast-land” in Isa 20 6; 23 25; RVv has “coast-lands” in Gen 10 5; Isa 11 10; 24 15; 59 18; Jer 25 22; Ezk 39 6; Neh 11 18; Zeph 2 11; RVv has “sea-coast” in Jer 47 4. [2] pl. לִשְׂנֵי, لִשְׂנֵא (13, 22; 34 14, Jer 50 39, [3] פָּלָס, פָּלָס, “small island” [Acts 27 16], [4] פָּלָס, פָּלָס, “island” [Acts 13 6, 28 13; 26 17 9.11; Rev 1 9; 6 14; 14 20]); Except as noted above, “isle” in RV is t4 “island” or “isle.” ARVAD (q.v.), a Phoen island-city N. of Tripoli, Syria, is mentioned in Gen 10 18; 1 Ch 12; Eze 27 24. This and Tyre were the only important islands on the coast, both of them very small. We find references to Kittim or Chittim, Cyprus (Gen 10 4; Nu 24 7; 1 Ch 1 7; Isa 23 12; Jer 2 10; Ezk 27 6; Neh 11 30); to Elisheba, perhaps Carthage (Gen 10 4; 1 Ch 1 7; Ezk 27 7); to “isles of the nations” (Gen 10 5; Zeph 2 11); to “isles of the sea” (Est 10 1; Isa 11 11; 24 15; Ezk 26 18); to “Tarshish and the isles” (Ps 72 10; of Is 66 19); to “isle” (RVv “sea-coast”) of Caphtor (Gen 47 4). Communication with these islands or distant coasts is kept up by the Tyrians (Ezk 27 3 15). The Jews were not a maritime people, and in early times their geographical knowledge was very limited. Of 32 OT passages referring to “island” or “isle,” 25 are in Isa, Jer, and Ezk. In the NT, besides the passages noted above, and Patmos (Rev 1 9), various islands are mentioned by name in connection with the voyages of St. Paul, e.g. Cyprus, Crete, Lesbos, Samos, Samothrace, Chios, Melita, Sicily (Syraeiss, Acts 28 12). “Jacksal” is a perfectly possible tr of ty’re (RVv “wild beasts of the islands,” RVv “wolves,” RVv “howling creatures”). See Coast; Geography; Jackal; Wolf.

ISLES OF THE GENTILES (Gen 10 5): AV “isles [in “coast-lands”] of the nations,” said of the territories of the sons of Japheth. The reference is to the coasts of the Western Mediterranean, with their islands (of “isles of the sea,” Est 10 1; Ezk 26 18, etc.). See Table of Nations.

ISMAACHIAH, isa-ma'-ka' (ישמך, יִשָּנְכָע, “Isma'akah-yah”), “Jeh who sustains”) One of the “overseers under the hand of Conaniah and Shelomith his brother, by the appointment of Hezekiah the king, and Azariah the ruler of the house of God” (2 Ch 31 13).

ISMAEL, is-ma'-el. See ISHEMAEL.

ISMAERUS, isa-la'-rus (ישמאֹרָע, ישמאֹרָע, “Ishmael”): AV “Omaerus” (1 Esd 9 34), corresponding to Amram in Ezr 10 34.

ISMAIYAH, isa-mi'ya. See ISHMAYAH.

ISPAH, is-pa'. See ISHPAH.

Introductory.—The chief and best source from which we can learn who this people was and what was its history is the Bible itself, esp. the OT, which tells us the story of this people from its earliest beginnings.

(1) In the OT.—The origins of Israel are narrated in Gen.; the establishment of the theocracy, in the other books of the Pent.; the entrance into Canaan, in the Book of Josh.; the period preceding the kings, in the Book of Judges; the establishment of the monarchy and its development, in the Books of S, and the opening chapters of the Books of K, which latter report also the division into two kingdoms and the history of these down to their overthrow. The Books of Chronicles, with the books already mentioned, are a survey of the historical development from Adam down to the Babylon captivity, but confine this account to the theocratical center of this history and its sphere. Connected with Ch are the small Books of Esd. and Neh., which probably originally constituted a part of Ch, but which pass over the Exile and begin at once with the story of the Return. Then, too, these two books contain only certain episodes in the history of the Return, which were of importance for the restoration of the Jewish theocracy, so that the story found in them is anything but complete. With the 5th cent. BC the Bib. narrative closes entirely. For the succeeding centuries we have nothing but some scattered data; but for the 2d pre-Christian cent., we have a new source in the Books of the Macc, which give a connected account of the struggles and the rule of the Asmoneans, which reach, however, only from 174 to 135 BC.

The historical value of the OT books is all the greater, as the later the narrator or his sources stand in point of time to the events that are recorded; e.g. the contents of the Books of K have in general greater value as historical sources than what is reported in the Books of Ch, written at a much later period. Yet it is possible that a later chronicler could have made use of old sources which earlier narrators had failed to employ. This is the actual state of affairs in connection with a considerable number of matters reported by the Bib. chroniclers, which supplement the exceedingly meager extracts furnished by the author of the Books of K. Then, further, the books of the prophets possess an extraordinary value as historical sources for the special reason that they furnish illustrations of the historical situation and events from the lips of contemporaries. As an example we can refer to the externally flourishing condition of the kingdom of Judah under King Uzziah, concerning which the Books of K report practically nothing, but of which Ch give details which have been confirmed by the testimony of Isaiah.

(2) Josephus.—A connected account of the history of Israel has been furnished by Flavius Josephus. His work entitled Jewish Antiquities, however, as far as trustworthiness is concerned, is again considerably inferior to the Books of Ch, since the later traditions of the Jews to a still greater extent influenced his account. Only in those cases in which he could make use of foreign older sources, such as the Egyp Manetho or Phoen authors, does he furnish us with valuable material. Then for the last few centuries preceding his age, he fills a certain want. Esp. is he the primary authority for the events which he himself passed through and which he reports in his work on the Jewish Wars, even if he is not free from certain personal prejudices (see Josephus, Flavius). For the customs and usages of the later Jewish times the traditions deposited in the Talmud are also to be considered. Much less than to Jos can any historical value be credited to the Alexandrian Jew, Philo. The foreign authors, e.g. the Gr and the Lat historians, contain data only for the story of the nations surrounding Israel, but not for the early history of Israel itself.

(3) The Monuments.—On the other hand, the early history of Israel has been wonderfully enriched in recent times through the testimonies of the monuments. In Pal itself the finds in historical data and monuments have been, up to the present time, rather meager. Yet the excavations on the sites of ancient Taanach, Megiddo, Jericho, Gezer and Samaria have brought important material to light, and we have reason to look forward to geological and literary finds, which may throw clear light on many points that have remained dark and uncertain. Also in lands round about Pal, important documents (the Moabite Stone, Phoen inscriptions) have already been found. Esp. have the discovery and interpretation of the monuments found in Egypt, Assyria and Babylonia every materially advanced our knowledge of the history of Israel. Not only has the connection of the history of this people with universal history been clarified by these finds, but the history of Israel itself has gained in tangible reality. In some detail matters, traditional ideas have given way to clearer conceptions; e.g. the chronology of the OT, through Assyriological research, has been set on a safer foundation. But all in all, these archaeological discoveries have confirmed the confidence that has been placed in the Bib. historical sources.

It is true that the rules applied to profane history cannot, without modification, be applied to the historical writings of the Hebrews. The

2. Religious Bib. narrators are concerned about Character something more than the preservation of the History facts and events. Just as little is it their purpose to show what is the will of God, or the will of their people or their rulers, as this is done on the memorial tablets of the Egyp, the Assyr, and the Bab kings. Looked at merely from the standpoint of profane history, there are many omissions in the OT historical books that are found objectionable. Sometimes whole periods are passed over or treated very briefly. Then, too, the political pragmatism, the secular connection in the movements of the nations and historical events, are often scarcely mentioned. The standpoint of the writer is the religious. This appears in the fact that this history begins with the creation of the world and reports primitive traditions concerning the origin of mankind and their earliest history in the light of the revelation of the God of Israel, and that it makes this national history a member in the general historical development of mankind. Nor was this first done by the author of the Pent in its present shape. Already the different documentary sources were found combined in the Pent, namely E, J and P, which the Creator of the world had with this people. Also, when they narrate the national vicissitudes of Israel, the writers are concerned chiefly to exhibit clearly the providential guidance of God. They give special prominence to those events in which the hand of God manifests itself, and describe with full detail the lives of those agents of whom Jeh made use in order to guide His people, such as Moses, Samuel, David, Solomon and others. But it is not the glory of these men themselves that the Bible is devoted to describing, but their importance for the spiritual and religious greatness of Israel. Let us note in this connection only the extreme brevity with which the politically successful wars of David are reported in 2 S; and how fragmentary are the records in which the author of the Books of K reports the reigns of the different kings; and how briefly he refers for all the other details of these kings to books that, unfortunately, have been lost for us. But, on the other hand, how full are the details when the Bible gives us its account of the early history of a Samuel or of a David, in which the providential guidance and protection of Jehovah appear in such a tangible form; or when it describes the building of the temple by Solomon, so epoch-making for the religious history of Israel, or the activity of such leading prophets as Elijah and Elisha.

Much less the deeds of man than the deeds of God in the midst of His people constitute the theme of the narrators. These facts explain, too, this sense of impartiality unknown in ancient literatures, with which the weaknesses and the faults of the ancestors and kings of Israel are reported by the Bib. writers, even in the case of their most revered kings, or with which even the most disgraceful deeds of the people are narrated. It cannot indeed be denied that this religious and fundamental characteristic is not found to the same degree in all the books and sources. The oldest narratives concerning Jacob, Joseph, the Judges, the pre-Mosaic kings, and the tribes, were certainly known only to the people of Israel. They rather belonged to a purely Semitic tribe, which had found its way from Northern Arabia into these districts. A striking confirmation of this view is found in a mural picture on the rock-tombs of Balatah near the city of Balatah, which shows foreigners, of whom pictures are here given (from the time of the XIIth Dynasty), called Amu, namely Bedouins from Northern Arabia or from the Sinai peninsula, showing such indisputable Jewish physiognomies as to be indecisively like the Semitic tribes of Israel. They were then the people of the stock of Abraham. The Semitic people, too, the leader of the caravans, Eshba'a (Abishua), has a name formed just like that of Abraham. When, in later times, Moses fled to the country of the Midianites, he doubtless was welcomed by such tribal relatives.

The Israelites at all times laid stress on their ethnographical connection with other nations. They knew that they were intimately related to a group of peoples who have the same name, and who are called their "kinsfolk". They traced their origin still farther back to the tribal founder, Shem. Linguistics and ethnology confirm, in general, the closer connection between the Sem tribes mentioned in Gen 10 and the people of the Sem tribes of the cases of Assur, Aram, and the different Arabian tribes. A narrower group of Semites is called Hebrews. This term is used in Gen in a wider sense of the word than is the case in later times, when it was employed as a synonym for Israel. According to its etymology, the word signifies "those beyond" those who live on the other side of the river or have come over from the other side. The river meant is not the Jordan, but the Euphrates. About the same time that the ancestors of Israel were immigrating into Canaan and Egypt, other tribes also emigrated westward and were called, by the Canaanites and by the Egyptians, 'ibhrin. This term is identical with Habari, found in the Am. Tab., in which complaint is made about the inroads of such tribes. The Israelites cannot have been meant here, but related tribes are. Possibly the Egypt Apria is the same word. The Israelites declared that they were descended from a particular family or tribe. This is the case in the case of the patriarchs. Modern researches have shown how intimately this history was interwoven with that of other nations. Already, between the religious forms of the OT and those of other Sem peoples, there have been found many relations. Religious expressions and forms of worship among the Israelites often show in language and cultus a similarity to those of the ancient Canaanites, the Phoenicians, the Syrians, the Babylonians, and the Egyptians. But it is a mistake to believe that the history and the religion of Israel are mere blemishes of those nations, clung tenaciously to their national life, even when they were surrounded by powerful nations, or were even scattered among these nations, as in the Exile, thus too their religion, at least in some respects, has been able to at times to preserve a very high originality and independence under the influence of the Divine Spirit, who had filled it.

1. Origins of Israel in Pre-Mosaic Times.—The Israelites knew at all times that Canaan was not their original home, but that their original ancestors had immigrated into this land. What was their earlier and earliest home? Tradition states that they immigrated from Haran in the upper Euphrates valley. But it is claimed that they came to Haran from Ur of the Chaldees, i.e. from a city in Southern Babylonia, now called Mugheir. This city of Ur, now well known from Bab inscriptions, was certainly home of the Sem tribes of ancient Assyria, and was certainly inhabited by Sem people. The foreign tribes, of whom pictures are here given (from the time of the XIIth Dynasty), called Amu, namely Bedouins from Northern Arabia or from the Sinai peninsula, show such indisputable Jewish physiognomies as to be decisively Semitic. These tribes, whether Semitic or not, are clearly related to the stock of Abraham. Then, too, the leader of the caravans, Eshba’a (Abishua), has a name formed just like that of Abraham. When, in later times, Moses fled to the country of the Midianites, he doubtless was welcomed by such tribal relatives.

2. Ethnographical and Historical Origins.—The Israelites traced their origin still farther back to the tribal founder, Shem. Linguistics and ethnology confirm, in general, the closer connection between the Sem tribes mentioned in Gen 10 and the people of the Sem tribes. A narrower group of Semites is called Hebrews. This term is used in Gen in a wider sense of the word than is the case in later times, when it was employed as a synonym for Israel. According to its etymology, the word signifies "those beyond" those who live on the other side of the river or have come over from the other side. The river meant is not the Jordan, but the Euphrates. About the same time that the ancestors of Israel were immigrating into Canaan and Egypt, other tribes also emigrated westward and were called, by the Canaanites and by the Egyptians, 'ibhrin. This term is identical with Habari, found in the Am. Tab., in which complaint is made about the inroads of such tribes. The Israelites cannot have been meant here, but related tribes are. Possibly the Egypt Apria is the same word. The Israelites declared that they were descended from a particular family or tribe. This is the case in the case of the patriarchs. Modern researches have shown how intimately this history was interwoven with that of other nations. Already, between the religious forms of the OT and those of other Sem peoples, there have been found many relations. Religious expressions and forms of worship among the Israelites often show in language and cultus a similarity to those of the ancient Canaanites, the Phoenicians, the Syrians, the Babylonians, and the Egyptians. But it is a mistake to believe that the history and the religion of Israel are mere blemishes of those nations, clung tenaciously to their national life, even when they were surrounded by powerful nations, or were even scattered among these nations, as in the Exile, thus too their religion, at least in some respects, has been able to at times to preserve a very high originality and independence under the influence of the Divine Spirit, who had filled it.

3. Patriarchal Origins and History.
into it also serfs and clients (cf. Gen 14:14). These last-named, it is sometimes thought, held the position of ‘sons’, without是真的他的descendants. Possibly the tribe that issued from Abraham through Reu is the tribe mentioned as ‘sons’ of ‘sons’, who were already more numerous than would seem to be the case according to tradition, which takes into consideration the small number of persons. Secondly, we should remember that the Israelite chronology, because of their patriarchal life, had become acclimatised to classify the relations of nations to nations in the scheme of the family. In this way such genealogies of nations as are found in Gen 10 and 11 were the less understood. Hence people had not been placed in the genealogies, without the author himself thinking of individual persons in this connection, who had borne the names, e.g., of Mizraim (Egypt), Cush (Ethiopia), etc., and were actually sons of Ham. The genealogy of the patriarchs is to explain only the closer or more remote relationship or connection to a group of nations. Gen 25:1 if also is a telling example, showing how independently these groups are united. A new wife (Keturah) does not at this place fit into the family history of Abraham. But the writer still wants to make mention of an Arabian group, which was already more distant from the Israelites than did the Ishmaelites. Out of this systematic further development of the living tradition, however, one difficulty arises. It is not in all places easy, indeed not always possible, to draw the line between what is reliable tradition and what is false continuation. But it is a misunderstanding of the historical situation, when the entire history of the patriarchs is to be seen in these clearly defined personalities as Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses, in the particular of the events. The later history of which tribes is said to be embodied in the lives of these men: e.g., the name Abraham cannot have been the personal name of a god, but is found as the name of a person on old Bab tablets (Abu rama). The nomadic tribe was doubtless pronounced ḏḥḥ rām, i.e. ‘My father [God] is exalted’. The same is true of the name Jacob (really Jakob-ε); cf. Jaboa (Jebus), Ismael, and others, which find their analogues in old Arabian names.

(1) Patriarchal conditions—Gen 14.—Further, the conditions of life which are presupposed in the history of the Patriarchs are in perfect agreement with what we learn from the Amarna tablets. While formerly it was maintained that it would have been impossible for a single tribe to force its way into Canaan at that time when the country was thickly populated, it is now known that at that very time when the ancestors of the Israelites entered, similar tribes also found their way into the land, sometimes in a peaceable way, sometimes by force. Egypt for the time being had control of the land, but its supremacy was at no point declared by the ‘ḥbretn’, as did other peoples who forced their way into the country, caused the inhabitants much trouble. Esp. does Gen 14, the only episode in which a piece of universal history finds its way into the story of the tribal ancestors, turn out to be a document of great value, which reflects beautifully the condition of affairs in Asia. Such expeditions for conquest in the direction of the Mediterranean lands were undertaken at an early period by Bab Mursu, Sargon I of Akkad and his son Naram Sin. The latter undertook an expedition to the land of Magan along the exact way of the expedition described in Gen 14, this taking place in the days of Amraphel, i.e. Hammurabi. The fact that the latter was himself under an Elamite is in perfect agreement with the story of the inscriptions, according to which the famous Hammurabi of Babylon had first freed himself from the supremacy of Elam. The fact that Hammurabi, according to the accepted chronology, ruled shortly after the year 2000 BC, is also in agreement with Bib. chronology, which places Abraham in this very time. These expeditions into the country Marnu, as the Babylonians call Syria, had for their purpose chiefly to secure booty and to levy tribute. The Israelites themselves took part in such expeditions is not probable. These were punitive expeditions undertaken with a small force.

This ch 14 of Gen seems to be a translation of an old cuneiform tablet. As a rule the stories of the patriarchal age for a long time were handed down orally, and naturally were modified to a certain extent. Then, too, scholars have long since discovered different sources, out of which the stories have been woven together. This fact explains some irregularities in the story: e.g., the chronicler, when he treated the story of Joseph, often ranges its contents systematically, do not always harmonize with the order of events as reported by the other, and perhaps the Ephrimetic and the second the Judaic version of the story. But he was in the case of the relations of nations to nations in the scheme of the family. In this way such genealogies of nations as are found in Gen 10 and 11 were the less understood. Hence people had not been placed in the genealogies, without the author himself thinking of individual persons in this connection, who had borne the names, e.g., of Mizraim (Egypt), Cush (Ethiopia), etc., and were actually sons of Ham. The genealogy of the patriarchs is to explain only the closer or more remote relationship or connection to a group of nations. Gen 25:1 if also is a telling example, showing how independently these groups are united. A new wife (Keturah) does not at this place fit into the family history of Abraham. But the writer still wants to make mention of an Arabian group, which was already more distant from the Israelites than did the Ishmaelites. Out of this systematic further development of the living tradition, however, one difficulty arises. It is not in all places easy, indeed not always possible, to draw the line between what is reliable tradition and what is false continuation. But it is a misunderstanding of the historical situation, when the entire history of the patriarchs is to be seen in these clearly defined personalities as Abraham, Jacob, Joseph, and Moses, in the particular of the events. The later history of which tribes is said to be embodied in the lives of these men: e.g., the name Abraham cannot have been the personal name of a god, but is found as the name of a person on old Bab tablets (Abu rama). The nomadic tribe was doubtless pronounced ḏḥḥ rām, i.e. ‘My father [God] is exalted’. The same is true of the name Jacob (really Jakob-ε); cf. Jaboa (Jebus), Ismael, and others, which find their analogues in old Arabian names. (2) Ideas of God.—Further, the conception of God as held by these fathers was still of a primitive character, but it contained the elements of the later religious development (see Israell, Religion). (3) Deportment into Egypt.—During a long period of famine the sons of Jacob, the heads of the twelve provinces, which made use of Joseph as an instrument, found refuge in Egypt, in the marshes of which country along the lower Nile Sem tribes had not seldom had their temporary abodes. The land of Egypt is a fertile and long-ordered country. The fertility of the amply watered districts, men, and animals could increase rapidly, and the virile tribe could, in the course of a few centuries, grow into a powerful nation. One portion of the tribes pastured their flocks back and forth on the plains, another built houses for themselves among the Egyptians and engaged in agricultural pursuits and in gardening (Nu 11:5). Egypt arts and trades also found their way among as this people, as also doubtless the art of writing, at least in the case of certain individuals. In this way their sojourn in this country became a fruitful factor in the education of the people. This stay explains in part the fact that the Israelites at all times were more receptive of foreign culture and more capable than their kinsmen, the Edomites, Ammonites, and others in this respect. Moses, like Joseph, had learned all the mysteries of Egyptian wisdom. On the other hand, the sojourn in this old, civilized country was a danger to the religion of the people of Israel. According to the testimony of Josh 24:14; Ezek 20:7ff.; 23:8,9, they adopted many more
II. Nationality under Moses.—It is reported in Ex 18 that a new Pharaoh ascended the throne, who knew nothing of Joseph. This doubtless means that a new dynasty came into power, which adopted a new policy in the treatment of the Sem neighbors. The expulsion of the Hyksos had preceded this, and the opposition to the Semotics had become more acute. The new government developed a strong policy for the expulsion of the Semotics of the N.E. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that the laws of the empire were vigorously enforced in these border districts and that an end was made to the liberties of the uninvited shepherd tribes. This led to constantly increasing measures of severity. In this way the people became more and more unhappy and finally were forced to emigrate.

(1) Chronology.—It is still the current conviction that the Pharaoh of the oppression was Ramses II, a king who was extraordinarily ambitious of building, whose long reign is by Eduard Meyer placed as late as 1310 to 1244 BC. His son Merenptah would then be the Pharaoh of the Exodus. But on this supposition, Bib. chronology ends, for new data have been discovered on the history of the period since then the time of the Judges must be cut down to unduly small proportions, but certain definite data also speak in favor of an earlier date for the Exodus of Israel. Merenptah boasts in an inscription that he subdued the Semotics to the borders of the land of Israel (which name occurs here for the first time on an Egyptian monument). And even the father of Ramses II, namely Seti, mentions Asher among those whom he conquered in Northern Pal, that is, in the district afterward occupied by this tribe. These data justify the view that the Exodus already took place in the time of the XVIIIth Dynasty, a thing in itself probable, since the energetic rulers of this dynasty naturally have inaugurated a new method of treating this province. The oppression of Israel would then, perhaps, be the work of Thothmes III (according to Meyer, 1501-1447 BC), and the Exodus would take place under his successor, Amenophis II. In harmony with this is the claim of the LXX (Deut 1:1) in which we recognize the Israelites (see below), were expelled by King Amenophis.

The length of the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt, according to Gen 15 13 (P), was in round numbers 400 years; more exactly, according to Ex 12 40 f (P), 430 years. But the last-mentioned passage in LXX reads, “the sojourn of the sons of Jacob, when they lived in Egypt and in the land of Canaan.” (The same reading is found in the Sam text, only that the land of Canaan precedes that of Egypt.) Since, according to this source (P), the Patriarchs lived 215 years in Canaan, the sojourn in Egypt would be reduced also 215 years. This is the way in which the synaogogue reckons (cf. Gal 3 17), as also Jos (Am, II, xvi, 2). In favor of this shorter period appeal is made to the genealogical lists, which, however, because they are incomplete, cannot decide the matter. In a longer duration of this sojourn we can appeal, not only to Gen 16 13 (LXX has the same!), but also to the large number of those who left Egypt according to Nu 26 52 (P), even if the number of 600,000 men there mentioned, which would presuppose a nation of about two million souls, is based on a later calculation and gives us an impossible conception of the Exodus.

Gal 3 17 has been preserved concerning the sojourn of the Israelites in Egypt, the history of the Exodus itself, which signifies the birth of Israel as a nation, is fully reported. In this crisis Moses is the prophetic mediator through whom the wonderful deed of God is accomplished. The deeds of God, which were revealed to his prophet, become revelations for the people. Moses himself had no other authority or power than that which was secured for him through his office as the organ of God. He was the human instrument to bring about the synthesis between Israel and Jeh, the God and the gods of Egypt, whose earthly representative Pharaoh is. The plagues which come over Egypt are all fought in the name of the gods of the country, but they occur in such extraordinary strength and rapidity at Moses’ prediction, and even appear at his command, that they convince the people, and finally Pharaoh himself, of the omnipotence of the God of the Israel. In the same way the act of deliverance at the Red Sea can be explained as the cooperation of natural causes, namely wind and tide. But the fact that these elementary forces, just at this critical time, proved so serviceable to the people of Israel, to destructive to their enemies, shows unmistakably the miraculous activity of God. This the Israelites experienced still further on the journey through the desert, when they were entirely dependent on Divine leadership and care. The outcome of these experiences, and at the same time its grandest demonstration, was the conclusion of the covenant at Mt. Sinai. From this time on Jeh was Israel’s God and Israel was the people of Jeh. This God claimed to be the only and absolute ruler over the tribes that were now inwardly united into one nation. From this resulted as a matter of course, that Moses as the recognized organ of this God was not only the authority, who was to decide in all disputes but also the one who created from a new and complete order of legal enactments proceeded. Moses became the lawgiver of Israel.

Even if the history of the origin of the OT covenant is unique in character, it is nevertheless profitable to take note of an analogy to the OT, which is, and which is adapted to make much in Israel’s history clearer. Mohammed also, after he had at the critical point of his career persuaded his followers to migrate from their homes, soon after, in Medina, concluded a covenant, according to which he, as the recognized speaker of Allah, claimed for himself the right to decide in all disputes. He, too, in his capacity as the prophet of God, was consulted as an infallible authority in all questions pertaining to the cultus, the civil and the criminal laws, as also in matters pertaining to politics and to war. And his decisions and judgments, uttered in the name of Allah, were written in the Koran. This Koran, too, became the basis of sacred law. And by causing the Hebrews divided and antagonistic tribes to subject themselves to Allah, Mohammed united these his followers into a religious communion and in this way, too, into a national body. The OT is the prophetic upbuilding of the prophecy of earlier times, but the work of Moses was original in character and truly inspired by God.

The historical character of the exodus out of Egypt cannot be a matter of doubt, though some suspect that the entire nation did not take part in the march through the Red Sea, but that certain tribes had disappeared from the land of Egypt, according to that mysterious portion of the Exodus to the East. We must not forget that the song of victory in Ex 15 does not mention a word about Pharaoh’s being himself destroyed in going through the Sea. It is only the late Ps 136:15 that presupposes this as a certainty. That an entire nation cannot emigrate in a single night cannot be maintained in view of the fact that the inhabitants of the same Wadi-Tumidit, through which Moses led his people, is a matter of course, in view of the official character of these accounts and of their policy of passing over in absolute silence all disagreeable facts. And yet in the popular tradition of the people, which Manetho has handed down, there has been preserved some evidences of this event. It is indeed true that what this author reports about the Hyksos (see above) does not belong here, as this people is not, as Jos thinks, identical with the Israelites. However (Cap. I, xxvi, 5 ff), he narrates a story which may easily be the tradition concerning the exodus of the children of Israel as changed by popular use. King Amonophis, we are told, wanted to see the gods. A seer, who bore the same name, promised that his wish would be gratified under the condition that the consecrated place be cleared of all things that were unclean; and it is said that he accordingly drove 80,000 such persons into the stone quarries E. of the Nile. As the seer was afraid that these measures would be displeasing to the gods and the Sopet rotis (the Egyptian name may be written either as Sopet or Hatu) he appointed, i.e., seer, this story must be regarded as referring to such a non-Egypt nation. Hecateus of Abdera has a report of this matter which is much more like the Bib story, to the effect, namely, that a plague which had broken out in Egypt was checked when the people were angry at the Egyptians because they had neglected the religious cultus; for which reason they expelled all foreigners. A part of these is said to have migrated under the leadership of Moses to Judea and there to have founded the city of Jerus (of Diodorus Siculus xii.3; cf. Hexxvi.1).

(2) Geographical matters.—The Red Sea, through which the Israelites went under the leadership of Moses, is without a doubt the northern extension of the Gulf of Akaba, which is reached farther inland than the present Gulf of Suez; of Edouard Naville, The Store-City of Pihtom and the Route of the Exodus, 1885; and The Route of the Exodus, 1891. This savant is entitled to the credit of having identified the station Sukkoth on the basis of the monuments; it is the modern Tell-Maskhita and identical with Pithom, which was the name of the sanctuary at that place. Later the city was called Heropolis. The route accordingly went through the Sea, and to term it the modern Bitter Sea, N. of Suez. It is a more difficult task to trace the route geographically on the other side of the Sea. For it is a question whether "the Mountain of Jeh," which formed the goal of the journey, is to be located on the Sinai peninsula, or in the land of the Edomites, or even on the western coast of Arabia. A. H. Sayce and others reject the traditional location of Sinai on the peninsula named after this mountain, and declare that the Israelites marched directly eastward toward the Gulf of Akaba. The name of this mountain, emigrated in a single night and for similar reasons (of Sayce, Monuments, 249).

(1) Egyptian version of the Exodus.—The fact that the Egyptian monuments report nothing of this episode, so disastrous to that people, is a matter of course, in view of the official character of these accounts and of their policy of passing over in absolute silence all disagreeable facts. And yet in the popular tradition of the people, which Manetho has handed down, there has been preserved some evidences of this event. It is indeed true that what this author reports about the Hyksos (see above) does not belong here, as this people is not, as Jos thinks, identical with the Israelites. However (Cap. (3) The wilderness sojourn.—The duration of the sojourn in the †desert ‡is everywhere (as in Am 5:25) given as 40 years. In harmony with this is the fact that only a few of those who had come out of Egypt lived to enter Canaan. The greater part of these 40 years the Israelites seem to have spent at Kadesh. At any rate, there was a sanctuary at that place, at which Moses administered justice, while the different tribes probably were scattered over the prairies and 10 others that were unclean; and it is said that he accordingly drove 80,000 such persons into the stone quarries E. of the Nile. As the seer was afraid that these measures would be displeasing to the gods and the Sopet rotis (the Egyptian name may be written either as Sopet or Hatu) he appointed, i.e., seer, this story must be regarded as referring to such a non-Egypt nation. "ISRAEL" STELE IN MUSEUM AT CAIRO
Merom, and then went back and encamped at Gilgal on the Jordan. After this he advanced with his tribe of Ephraim into the heart of the land, while the southern tribes on their part forced their way through the Canaanites. But, while the tribes of the north, on their way from Gilgal to Shechem, were able to say that they had occupied the land, the same cannot be said of the southern tribes. It is true that they occupied the land, but they did so without a struggle.

The occupation of the land was not complete, and there were many districts in which Israel had gained the upper hand, but they generally did not wage the war of oppression that Moses had commanded. But they did not do so, and their religion was also endangered. Together with the sacred “holy places” (bamoth) of the original inhabitants, the altars and the sanctuaries there found also came into possession of the Israelites. Moreover, the tribe of Ephraim was the first to make an alliance, and with which old memories were associated. As a result, it readily occurred that Israel appropriated also symbols and religious ceremonies, and even the Baals and the Ashtoreths themselves, however little this could be united in principle with the service of Jeh. But if the Israelites lost their unique religion, their connection with the kindred tribes and their national independence were soon matters of history. The new religion absorbed the old.

III. Period of the Judges.—In such a period of weakened national and religious life, it could easily happen that Israel would again lose the supremacy that it had won by the sword.

The Canaanites could again bring into their power larger parts of the land. Also energetic and pushing nomadic tribes, such as the Ammonites, the Moabites, or other warlike peoples, such as the Philis, could bring the country under subjection, as actually did occur in the period of the Judges. The Book of Jgs reports a number of such instances of the subjection of Israel, which did not extend over the whole land, and in part occurred in different sections of the country at the same time. Judah and Simeon, the two tribes in the south, as a rule took no part in these contests, and had their own battles to fight; and the same is true of the tribes E. of the Jordan, among whom Northern Manasseh and Ephraim were in closest alliance. After a longer or shorter period of oppression, there followed in each case a revival of the national spirit against such oppression. And in all these cases the popular hero who became the liberator appealed to the religious consciousness that formed a bond of union between the tribes and their common God Jeh. In whatever wild a manner the youthful vigor of the people may have found its expression on these occasions, they are nevertheless conscious of the fact that they are waging a holy war, which accordingly can only end with the victory over the heathen spirit and false worship that had found their way into Israel. The most precious historical monument from these times is the song of Deborah (Jgs 5), which, like a mirror, reflects faithfully the conditions of affairs, and the thoughts of that age.

Jgs 17–21 belong to the beginning of this period. The first of these old stories narrates the emigration of a large portion of the tribe of Dan to the extreme north of the country and the origin of idolatry in that region (verset 17, 18). But the second story, too, both in form and contents, is, at least in part, very old and its historical value is amply protected against the attacks of modern critics by Hos 9 9; 10 9. This story reports a holy war of revenge against the tribe of Benjamin, which was unwilling to render satisfaction for the murder that had been committed at Gibeah in its territory. In the feeling of close solidarity and of high responsibility which appears in connection with the punishment of this crime, we still see the influence of the periods of Moses and Joshua.

First it is narrated of a king of Aram-naharaim that he had oppressed Israel for a period of 8 years (Jgs 3 8). This probably means a king of the Mitanni (Nimrod, periods, 297, 304), who at that time were trying to force their way through Canaan into Egypt. It was Othniah, the Kenazite, belonging to a tribe that was related to Judah, who delivered them. A second liberator was the Benjamite Ehud, who delivered the southernmost portion of the country from the servitude of Eglon, the king of the Moabites, by putting the latter to death (Jgs 3 12 f). On a greater scale was the defeat of Sisera, the king of the Canaanites, in the battle of Kishon (Jgs 4, 5). In the same region the battle of Gideon was fought with the plundering Bedouin swarms of the Midianites, who had repeatedly oppressed Israel (chs 6–8). Ahimelech, an unworthy son of the God-fearing Channah, who, some sixty years before, had established a local kingdom in Shechem, which stood for only a short time and came to a disgraceful end. Little more than the names are known to us of Tola, the tribe of Issachar, and Abimelech, in Gilead (ch 9). The first of them is the liberator of Sisera, who delivered the country from the Ammonites coming from the east (chs 11), with which was also connected a struggle with the jealous Ephraimites (ch 12); and still more fully are the details reported of the personal contests of the Nazirite Samson, belonging to the tribe of Dan, against the Philis making their inroads from the south, and who for many years proved to be the most dangerous enemies of Israel.

All these heroes, of whom so few are not so well known, are called judges, and it is regularly reported how long each of these “judged” Israel. They were not officials in the usual sense of the term, but were liberators of the people, who, at the inspitation of Jeh, gave the signal for a holy war. After the victory they, as men of Jeh, then enjoyed distinction, at least in their own tribes; and in so far as it was through their doing that the people had been freed, they were the highest authorities in political, judicial, and religious questions. They are called judges in conscious contradistinction from the kingly power, which in Israel was recognized as the exclusive prerogative of Jeh, so that Gideon declined it as improper when the people made him their king (Judges 8 22 f). The people recognized no limit on the merit of the war which came over these men and impelled them to arouse their people out of their disgraceful lethargy. For this reason, too, they could afterward be regarded as having paved the way for judicial decisions in harmony with the mind and the Spirit of God, as this had been done already by the prophetess Deborah in the time of oppression. Yet, at least in the case of Samson (notwithstanding Jgs 16:31), it is not probable that he ever was engaged in the administration of justice. It is not even reported of him that he fought at the head of the people, but he carried on his contests with the Philistines in behalf of himself individually, even if, as one supposed, he was a witness for the power of God.

The chronology of the period of the Judges exhibits some peculiar difficulties. If we add together the data that are given in succession in the Book of Jgs, we get from Jgs 3:8 to 31, 410 years altogether. But this number is too large to make it harmonize with the 480 years mentioned in 1 K 6:1. Jewish tradition (e.g. Sêîther 'Olam) accordingly does not include the years of oppression in this sum, but makes them a part of the period of the individual judges. In this way about 111 years are eliminated. But evidently the redactor of the Book of Jgs did not share this view. Modern critics have sought to explain this by detailed two chronological methods, one of which counted on the basis of periods of forty years each, while the other was more exact and contained odd numbers. In this way we can shorten this period as does the Sêîther 'Olam. At any rate, it is justifiable, and is suggested by 10:7, to regard the oppression by the Ammonites (10:8 ff) and the oppression by the Philistines (13:1 ff) as contemporaneous. And other events, too, which in the course of the narrative are related as following each other, may have taken place at the same time or in a somewhat different sequence, as the author used different sources for the different events. But for this very reason his story deserves to be credited as historical. Such characters as Deborah, Jephthah, Ehud, Gideon, Ahimelech and Samuel are described as tangible historical realities. Even if, in the case of the last-mentioned, oral tradition has added decorative details to the figure, yet Samuel cannot possibly be a mere mythological hero of the kind that has been a national hero characteristic of this period, in whom are represented the abundance of physical and mental peculiarities characteristic of the youthful nation, as also their good-natured indifference and carelessness over against their treacherous enemies.

The lack of a central political power made itself felt all the more in the period of the Judges, since, because of the scattered condition of the people in the country that had been so minutely parcelled out, and because of the weakening of the religious enthusiasm of the preceding age, the deeper unity of heart and mind was absent. It is indeed impossible to imagine that at this time there was a total lack of governmental authority. A patriarchal organization had been in force from the beginning. The father of the family was the lawful head of those belonging to him; and a larger clan was again subject to an "elders" who held far-reaching rights in the administration of law, but also with the duty to protect his subordinates, and in case of want to support them. Unfortunately we are nowhere informed how these elders were chosen or whether their office was hereditary. Only a few authorities, such as Isa 3:6, throw a certain light on the subject. This institution of the elders Moses had already found established and had developed farther (Ex 18:13ff). It was retained in all the periods of Israel's history. When the people began to lose their spiritual direction, a number of "elders" bodies of such city elders were established. The tribes, too, had "elders" at their head. But for a united action of the whole nation this arrangement did not suffice; and esp. in the case of war the people of Israel felt that they were at a disadvantage compared with their enemies, who had kings to lead them. For this reason the desire for a king steadily grew in Israel. The dictators of the period of the Judges satisfied their needs only for the time being.

IV. The Kingdom: Israel-Judah.—In the time when the Israelites were oppressed by the Philistines the need of a king was esp. felt. As Samson had come to his death in servitude, the people themselves thus, at the close of this period of glorious achievements, the consciousness of a warlike race, which had only in recent times settled on the western coast of Pal, and from this base was forcing its conquests into the heart of the country.

After the most disastrous defeats, during which even the Ark of the Covenant was lost, there arose for the people, indeed, a father and a deliverer in the person of Samuel, who saved them during the most critical period. When his activity, however, has decayed, the mind of the people cannot be estimated too highly. He was, above all, during peace the faithful watchman of the most sacred possessions of Israel, a prophet such as the people had not seen since the days of Moses; and he doubtless was the first of those colonies of prophetic disciples who were in later times so influential in the development of a theocratic spirit in Israel. He guarded the whole nation also with all his power, by giving to them laws and cultivating piety in the land.

But as Samuel, too, became old and the people concluded for good reasons that his rule would have no worthy successors, their voice could no longer be silenced, and they demanded a king. Samuel tried in vain to persuade the people to desist from their demand, which to him seemed to be an evidence of distrust in the providence of Jeh, but was himself compelled, by inspiration of God, to introduce the new king, whom Jeh pointed out to him. It is indeed maintained by the critics that there are several accounts extant in S concerning the selection of Saul to the kingdom, and that these accounts differ in this, that the one regards the kingdom as a blessing and the other as a curse. The first view, which is said to be the older, is claimed to be found in 1 S 9:1-10:16, and 11; while the second is said to be in 8; 10:17-27; 11 12-14. Whatever may be the facts in regard to these sources, this is beyond any doubt, that Samuel, the last real theocratic leader, established the kingdom. But just as little can the fact be doubted, that he took this step with inner reluctance, since in his eyes this innovation meant the discarding of the ideals of the people to which he himself had remained true during his lifetime. The demand of the people was the outgrowth of worldly motives, but Jeh brought it about, that the "Anointed of Jeh" signified an advance in the history of the kingdom of God.

Saul himself, at first, in a vigorous and efficient manner, solved the immediate problems and overcame the enemies of his people. He began to conceive of his kingdom after the manner of heathen kingdoms and did not employ the spirit of Jeh and His appointed representative. Then there arose an open conflict between him and Samuel; and the fact that the Spirit of God had departed from him appears in his melancholy state of mind, which urged him on to constantly increasing deeds of violence. That under these circumstances God's blessing also departed from him is proved by the collapse of his life's work in his final failures against the Philistines.

In contrast with this, David, his successor, the greatest king that Israel ever had, had a correct conception of this royal office, and even in his most brilliant successes did not forget that he was called to rule only as "the servant of Jehovah" (by which name he, next to Moses, is called oftest in the Bible). As a gifted ruler, he strengthened his kingdom from within, which, considering the heterogeneous character of the people, was not an easy matter, and extended it without by overpowering jealous neighbors. In this way it was he who became the real founder of a powerful kingdom. The conquest of Jerusalem and its selection as the capital city also are an evidence of his political wisdom. It is indeed true that he, too, had his personal failings and that he made many mistakes, which caused him political troubles, even down to his old age. But his humility at all times made him strong enough again to subject himself to the hand of Jehovah; and his humiliation was grounded on the fact that he was made of His spirit toward Jehovah, which shows itself in His Ps. In this way he really came to be a connecting link between God and his people, and upon this foundation the prophets built further, who prophesied a still closer union of the two under David.

While Saul was a Benjamite, David was of the tribe of Judah, and was for a short time the king of this tribe in Hebron, before the other tribes, becoming tired of the misrule of a descendant of Saul, v. W. they chose him as their king. He secured this after established as the center of his new kingdom the city of Jerusalem, which really was situated on the territory that had been assigned to Benjamin; and he also set this city apart as the religious center of the people by transferring the Ark of the Covenant to this place. In this way David, through his wisdom and his popular bravery, succeeded in uniting the tribes more firmly under his supremacy, and esp. did he bring the tribe of Judah, which down to this time had been more for itself, into closer connection with the others. Israel under David became a prominent kingdom. This position of power was, as a matter of fact, distasteful to their neighbors round about. The Philistines tried to destroy the new kingdom but were themselves overwhelmingly defeated and definitely overpowered. But other neighboring people, too, who, notwithstanding the fact that David did not assume an offensive attitude toward them, assumed a hostile attitude toward him, came to feel his superiority. Particularly severe and tedious was the war against the allied Ammonites and Syrians; and although the Edomites, too, regarded this as a favorable time for attacking Israel, this struggle also ended in a complete triumph for David. The petty, surrounding countries became subject to him from the Mediterranean Sea to Hamath (2 Sam. 8:9), and from the territory of the Lebanon, the inhabitants of which assumed a friendly attitude, to the borders of Egypt, which also recognized the new rule.

Solomon, the son of David, developed inwardly the powerful kingdom which he had inherited. To his father he seemed to be the right man for this because of his peaceful character and diplomatic abilities. He justified the hopes placed in him. Out of love to Jehovah he built the temple on Mt. Zion, regulated the affairs of state and the administration of justice, and by commercial treaties with the Phoenicians (King Hiram) brought about great prosperity in the land. He was the "golden" period in Israel. The culture and civilization, too, of the people were materially advanced by Solomon as he widened their horizon and introduced the literature of Proverbs, which had up to this time been more extensively cultivated by the neighboring people (Edom, Arabia, Egypt). He even developed this literature into a higher type. On the other hand, the brilliant reign of Solomon brought serious dangers to the new kingdom. His liberal-mindedness in the treatment of his foreign wives, in permitting them to retain their heathen worship, perhaps because he thought that in the end it was the same Divinity which these women worshipped under a different form, endangered the theocracy with its serious cultus and its strict morality. Through this conduct the king necessarily forfeited the sympathy of the most pious Israelites. At the same time, his love for magnificent structures surpassed the measure which was regarded as correct for the "Anointed of Jehovah." Then, too, his efforts, in themselves justifiable, to establish a more perfect organization of the monarchy, produced a great deal of dissatisfaction. Solomon did not understand, as did his father, how to respect the inherited liberty-loving tendencies of his people, and the burdens of taxation, to which the people were compelled to submit, were deeply felt, most of all by the Ephraimites, who at times had exhibited a jealous spirit, and could not forget their lost hegemony.

So long, indeed, as the wise Solomon and his advisors were at the helm, the various rebellious tendencies could not make themselves felt. But after his death the catastrophe came. His son, Rehoboam, at the Diet in Shechem, at which the princes placed their appeal for an end of taxation before his coronation, showed that he did not at all understand the situation. His domineering attitude brought things to a head, and he must have been glad that at least the tribe of Judah remained faithful to him. The northern tribes chose for their king Jeroboam I, who before this had already taken part in rebellious agitations, as the kingdom had been predicted to him by the prophet Ahijah (1 K 11:2). Israel was torn into two parts.

With this rupture the powerful kingdom established by David had reached its end. In regard to this flourishing period in Israel's history we are, however, not well informed through the sources. Esp. of the History of the Kingdom in 2 Sam. 9-20 and 1 K 2, 3, we have a narrator who must have been a contemporary of the events recorded. Klostermann surmises that this may have been Ahimaaz, the son of Zadok (2 Sam. 15:27); while Duhm, Budde, Sellin and others believe it to have been the priest Abiathar. Less unity is in evidence in the first Book of Kings, containing the history of the youth of David, which evidently was often described. The Books of Ch have only secondary value for the life of David. These books narrate in full detail the story of the preparations made by David for the erection of the temple and of his organization of the Levites. In regard to the reign of Solomon, the Books of K report more fully. Concerning the later kings, they generally give only meager extracts from more complete sources, which excerpts, however, have been shown to be reliable. The interest which the narrator has in telling his story is the high moral value which he ascribes to the fact as to the relation of the different kings to the cultus. Special sources have been used in compiling the detailed stories of the great prophets Elijah and Elisha, which are inserted in the history of the two kingdoms. On the other hand, the Books of Ch pass over entirely all reference to the work of the prophets of the Northern Kingdom, as they ignore the entire history of the Ephraimite kingdom since the interest of these books is centered on the sanctuary in Jerusalem. Also in the J history, the much older Books of K deserve the precedence. Yet we owe to the writer of Ch a number of contributions to this history, esp. where he has made a fuller use of the sources than has been done by the author of the Books of K. The suspicion that everything which Ch contains, beyond what is to be found in K, is unhistorical, has turned out to be groundless. Thus, e.g., it would be impossible to understand the earlier prophecies of Isaiah under Jotham at all, if it did not appear from Ch to what prosperity and influence the people of Judah had by that time again attained. For it is only Ch that give us an account of the flourishing reign of his predecessor Uzziah, who is treated but briefly in K.

The chronology of the earlier portions of the period of the Kings is dependent on the date of the division of the kingdom. This date can be decided on the basis of the chronological order of the Books of K, which do not indeed agree in all particulars, but are to be adjusted by the Assyrian chronology. If we, with Kamp-hausen, Oettli and Kittel, regard the year 937 BC as the year of the division of the kingdom, then Solomon ruled from 977 to 937; David, from 1017 to 977. The length of the reign of Saul is not known, as the text of 1 S 13 1 is defective. It is very probable that we can credit him with about twenty years, according to Jos (1 K, X, viii), i.e., from about 1037-1017. In this case David transferred the seat of government to Jerusalem about the year 1010, and the completion of the erection of the temple of Solomon took place in 966. But this basis date of 937 is not accepted as correct by all scholars. Klostermann places the date of the rupture of the kingdom in the year 978; Koehler, in 973. For later chronological data, Assyrian sources are an important factor. The Assyrians were accustomed to call each year after the name of an official (lunu), and eponym lists are extant for 228 years. In these reference is made to an eclipse of the sun, which astronomically has been settled as having taken place on July 15, 765. We have in this list them the period from 1000 to 775, and it is made possible to determine the exact dates of the different military expeditions of the Assyrian rulers and their conflicts with the kings of Judah and Israel, on the presupposition, however, that the Assyrian inscriptions here used really speak of these kings, which in a number of cases is denied. Valuable help for determining the chronology of this period is the fall of Samaria in the year 722 and the expedition of Sennacherib against Jerusalem in 701, and also the fact that the earliest known distribution of the years between these dates to the individual kings is in places doubtful, as the numbers in the text are possibly corrupt, and in the synchronistic data of the Books of K mistakes may have been made.

V. Period of the Separated Kingdoms.—The two separated kingdoms differed materially. The kingdom of Ephraim was the more of the city of Samaria, which was well adapted for this purpose. The dynasties, too, were only of short duration. It occurred but rarely that one family was able to maintain its supremacy on the throne through the Judahite centuries. The dynastic character remained fixed in this kingdom and became its permanent weakness. On the other hand, the smaller and often overpowered kingdom of Judah, which faithfully adhered to the royal line of David, passed through dangerous crises and had many unworthy rulers. But the legitimate royal house, which had been selected by Jeh, constituted spiritually a firm bond, which kept the people united, as is seen, e.g., by a glance at the addresses of Isaiah, who is thoroughly filled with the conviction of the importance of the house of David, no matter how unworthy the king who happened to rule might appear to him. In a religious respect, also, the arbitrary break with Zedon proved to be fatal for the Northern Kingdom.

Jeroboam.—It is true that faithful prophets of Jeh, such as the Abijah of Shiloh mentioned above, and Shemaiah (1 K 12 22 ff), proclaimed that the faithful division of the kingdom was a Divine judgment, and that Jeroboam was to be the instrument of it. But they soon were compelled to reach the conclusion that Jeroboam did not regard himself as a servant of Jeh, but as a sovereign who, through his own successor and the division of the kingdom, had secured the rule, and hence could arbitrarily decide all matters in reference to the cultus and the sacred sanctuaries of the people. According to his own will, and for political reasons, he established the new national sanctuary on Mount Gerizim. It was in these new sanctuaries that the Assyrans, by their military expeditions, were able to introduce their god, Assur, and the worship of the king, who thus became a god and Parthian symbol, in opposition to the old sanctuaries, too, walked "in the ways of Jeroboam." The independent prophets, however, did not die out, but, rather, prophecy developed its greatest activity in this very Northern Kingdom. As a rule, in its work it stood in opposition to the government, but at times it succeeded in gaining the recognition of the rulers.

Omri.—The earliest times of the divided kingdoms are, from a political point of view, characterized by a series of wars, among which the struggle of the peoples of the Euphrates and the Tigris, namely Assyria and Babylon, still had enough to do with themselves, and did not yet make any inroads into the Mediterranean lands; but, rather, it was the Syrians who first caused a good deal of trouble to the Northern Kingdom. Jerryboam did not succeed in founding a dynasty. Already his son Nadab was eliminated by a usurper, Baasha. The latter’s son, Elah, was murdered, after a reign of two years. It was not, however, his murderer Zimri, or Omri, who strove to secure the kingdom for himself, but Omri who became king (1 K 16), and who also attained to such prominence abroad that the cuneiform inscriptions for a long time after call Israel "the land of Omri." His ability as a ruler was quite remarkable. He took possession of Samaria as the capital city was his work. The inscription on the Mesha stone reports that he also established the sovereignty of Israel vigorously on the east side of the Jordan.

Ahab.—His son Ahab, too, was an energetic and brave ruler, who succeeded in gaining a number of victories over the Syrians, who were now beginning to assume the offensive in a determined manner. Then, too, he was politic enough to win over to his interests the kingdom of Judah, with which his predecessors had lived in almost constant warfare. In this policy he succeeded, because the noble and large-hearted king Jehoshaphat was more receptive to such fraternal relations than was good for him. Ahab's covenants by these means with the kings against Syria brought Jehoshaphat into extreme danger and ended with the death of Ahab.

Ahab's fate was his wife Jezebel, the daughter of the Phoen king Ethbaal (Ichobal, according to Jos, Ant. VIII, xiii, 2 and Cap., I, 18), who had been a priest of Astarte. This intermarriage with a fanatical heathen family brought untold and endless misfortune over all Israel. This bold and scheming woman planned nothing less than the overthrow of the religion of Jehovah, and the substitution for it of the Baal and the Astarte cultus. As a first step she succeeded in having in the king tolerate this religion. The leading temple in the new resident city, Samaria, was dedicated to the Baal cultus, and this intangible lazzicous ethic religion was a great danger to the religion and the morals of the people. Hosts of Baal priests, ecstatic dervishes, traversed the country. Soon the queen undertook to persecute the Assyrian king, Zerubbabel. The men protested against the tolerance of the foreign false religion was interpreted as disobedience on their part to the king. Many faithful prophets were put to death. At this critical period, when the existence of the religion of Jehovah was at stake, the prophet Elijah, the Tishbite, appeared on the stage, and through a bitter struggle reestablished the worship of Jehovah. However, the fateful influence that this woman exerted was thereby not yet destroyed. It extended to Judah also.

Rehoboam.—In the kingdom of Judah, apart from the apostasy of different tribes, which left him only the vigorous tribe of Judah and portions of Benjamin, Dan, Simeon, and Levi, Rehoboam experienced all the disadvantages, namely, the territorial and tribute imposition by King Shishak of Egypt (Egyg Sheshonk, founder of the XXIId Dynasty; 1 K 14 25 f.; cf. 2 Ch 12 2 ff). While under Solomon the relations of Israel to the Egypt court had in the beginning been very friendly, this was changed when a new dynasty came to the throne. After Jeroboam had failed in his first revolutionary project, he had found refuge at the court of Shishak (1 K 11 40). It is possible that Jeroboam made the Egyptian king lustful for the treasures of Jerusalem. The Egyptians did not, as a matter of fact, stop at the Ephraimitic boundaries, but in part also invaded the territory of Jeroboam; but their chief objective was Jerusalem, from which they carried away the treasures that had been gathered by Solomon. On the temple wall of Karnack this Pharaoh has inscribed the story of this victory and booty. From the names of the cities found in this inscription, we learn that this expedition extended as far as Megiddo and Taanach.

Jehu.—Rehoboam was succeeded by his son Abijah, or Abijah, according to Ch (the Abijam of K is hardly correct). He ruled only 3 years. But even during this short reign he was compelled to engage in a severe struggle with Jeroboam (1 K 15 18 f.; cf. 2 Ch 13).

Asa.—In every respect the reign of the God-fearing Asa, who sought to destroy the heathenism that had found its way into the cultus, was more fortunate. He also experienced Jeh's wonderful help when the Cushite Zerah made an incursion into his land (2 Ch 14 8 ff; i.e. probably the Cushite Zerah, cf. 2 K 18 21). This incursion was quelled by King Asa, who, however, did not belong to an Ethiopian dynasty. Possibly he is called an Ethiopian because he came into the country with Nubian troops. Less honorable was his conduct in the conflict with Baasha. When he was sorely pressed by the latter he bought, through the payment of a large tribute, the assistance of the Syrian king, Ben-hadad I, who, up to this time had been an ally of Baasha. This bribing of foreigners to fight against their own country was at first averted, but, when repeated, was rebuked by a bold prophet in the presence of the pious king, but the prophet was compelled to suffer abuse for his open testimony (2 Ch 16 7 ff).

Jehoshaphat.—A much more noble conduct characterized the dealings of Jehoshaphat in relation to the Northern Kingdom. His fault was that he entered too fully into the selfish offers of friendship made by Ahab. The worst step was that, in order to confirm his covenant, he married for his son Ahaziah as wife, Athaliah, the daughter of Ahab. Jehoshaphat was a chivalrous ally, who also joined Ahab's son, Jehoram, in a dangerous war against the Moabites; as this people under their king Moab had made themselves free from Jehoshaphat and his kingdom, and were hostile against them. For the inner affairs of the kingdom his reign was more fortunate. He was a God-fearing and an energetic prince, who did much to elevate the people in a material and a religious way and perfected its political organization. Nor did he fail to secure some noteworthy successes. However, the fact that the warning words of the prophets who rebuked him because of his alliance with the half-heathenish house of Omri were not the fanatical exaggeration of pessimistic seers, appears at once after his death.

Jehoram.—His son Jehoram, after the manner of oriental despots, at once caused his brothers to be put to death, of which doubtless his wife Athaliah was the cause. This woman transplanted the policy of Jezebel to Judah, and was scheming for the downfall of the house of David and its sanctuary. Under Jehoram the power of Judah accordingly began to sink rapidly. Edom became independent. The Philis, the Phoen-Lyvians, and the royal princes, with the exception of Ahaziah, the youngest son of Athaliah, were expelled. When the latter ascended the throne she had the absolute power in her hands.

Jehu.—During this time the judgment over the house of Omri was fast approaching. The avenger came in the person of the impetuous Jehu, who had been anointed king by one of the disciples of Elisha in the camp of Rarnoth in Gilead. According to 1 K 19 16, the order had already been given to Elijah to raise this man to the throne; but the compliance with this command appears to have been delayed. As soon as Jehu became aware that he was entrusted with this mission, he hastened to Jerreld, where Ahaziah, king of Judah, was just paying a visit to Jehoram, and slew them both. With heartless severity he extended this slaughter, not only to all the members of the house of Omri, together with Jezebel, but also to those numerous members of the Davidic royal house who fell into his hands. He likewise destroyed the adherents of Baal, whom he invited to their death in their sanctuary at Samaria. Deserved as this judgment upon the house of Jeroboam was (2 K 10 30), which Jehu, according to his own words, here set out, he did this in an unholy mind and with harshness and ambitious purpose. The puritanical Rechabites had sanctioned his action; but as more and more the true character of Jehu began to reveal itself, he lost the sympathies of the pious, and Hosea announced to his house the vengeance for his bloody crimes at Jezebel (Hos 1:4).

Assyria.—The invasion of the Western part of the Assyrians in the time of Ahab, under king Shalmaneser II, had forced their way as far as Karkar on the Orontes, and they had fought a battle in 854 with the Syrians and their allies, among whom Ahab is also mentioned, with 2,000 chariots and 10,000 soldiers. If this is really Ahab, the king of Israel, which is denied by some, then he, at that time, fought against Assyria in conjunction with the Syrians, who otherwise had been so bitterly attacked by him. The Assyrians boast of this victory, but seem to have won it at a heavy price, as they did not press farther westward. When in 842 Shalmaneser came a second time, Jehu was certainly not among the allies of the Syrians. The Assyrians do not seem, on this occasion, to have been opposed by so powerful a league, and were able to attack the Syrians whom they conquered at Saniru (Hermon, Anti-Lebanon) in a much more determined manner. They laid siege to Damascus and had the interior provinces captured. Their forays, however, were rebuffed by a band of Israelites under the Hauran and Bashan, and they made a desert. In their march of victory they pressed forward as far as the Mediterranean. Phoenicia and other countries brought tribute. Among these nations Shalmaneser II mentioned, with especial mention of Jehu, the son of Omri (II Kgs. 10:32), who was compelled to deliver up gold and silver bars and other valuable possessions. But this expensive homage on the part of Jehu did not help much. Shalmaneser came only once more (839 B.C.), the eastern neighbors of the Assyrians did not appear again for a period of 35 years. All the more vigorously did the Syrians and other neighboring people make onslaughts on Israel. How fearfully they devastated Israel appears from Am 1.

Jehoahaz.—Under his son Jehoahaz the weakness of Israel became still greater. In his helplessness, the Lord finally sent him a deliverer (2 Kgs 11:3 ff). This deliverer was none other than the Assyrian king, Assur-bani-pal III (812–758 B.C.), who, through a military incursion, had secured anew his supremacy over Western Asia, and had besieged the king of Damascus and had forced him to pay an immense tribute. In this way Israel, which had voluntarily rendered subjects, was relieved of its embarrassment by the weakening of Syria.

Jehoshaphat, the son of Jehoahaz, experienced more favorable conditions. He also conquered Amaziah, the king of Judah; and his son, Jehoram II, even succeeded in restoring the old boundaries of the kingdom, as the prophet Jonah had predicted (2 Kgs 11:14 24:1 ff). His reign was the last flourishing period of the kingdom of Ephraim. See, further, Israel, Kingdom of.

Jehoshaphat.—The kingdom of Judah, in the meanwhile, had passed through severe crises. The most severe was caused by that Athaliah, who, after the murder of her son Ahaziah by Jehu, had secured absolute control in Jerusalem, and had abused this power in order to root out the family of David. Only one son of the king, Joash, escaped with his life. He, a boy of one year, was hidden in the temple by a relative, where the high priest Jehoiada, who belonged to the party opposed to the heathen-minded queen, concealed him for a period of 6 years. When Joash was 7 years old, Jehoiada, at a wellequipped timing, proclaimed him king. His elevation to the throne, in connection with which event the terrible Athaliah was put to death, introduced at the same time an energetic reaction against the heathenism of the people and even into Judah, and which the queen had in every way favored.

Joash was predestined to be a theocratic king. And, in reality, in the beginning of his reign of 40 years, he went hand in hand with the priests and the prophet of Jehu. After Jehoiada's death, however, he tolerated idolatrous worship among the princes (2 Ch 24:17 ff), and by doing so came into conflict with the faithful prophet Zechariah, the son of his benefactor Jehoiada, who rebuked him for his wrong, and was even stoned. A just punishment for this guilt was recognized in the misfortune which overtook the king and his country. The Syrian king, Hazael, when he was engaged in an expedition against Gath, also took possession of Jerusalem and made it pay tribute, after having apparently inflicted a severe defeat on the people of Judah, on which occasion many princes fell in the battle and Joash himself was severely wounded. Toward the end of his reign there was also much dissatisfaction among his subjects, and some of his courtiers finally murdered him (2 Kgs 12:21).

Amaziah.—However, his son Amaziah, who now ascended the throne, punished the murderers. The king was successful in war against the Edomites. This made him bold. He ventured to meet Joash, the king of Israel, and the result was that Joash and his army were defeated and captured. The people of Judah suffered the deepest humiliation. A large portion of the walls of Jerusalem was torn down (2 Kgs 14:11 ff). Amaziah did not feel himself safe even in his own capital city, because of the disaster that had befallen him. He fled to Lachish. Here he was murdered. So deep had Judah fallen, while Jeroboam II succeeded in raising his kingdom to an unthought-of power.

Uzziah.—But for Judah a turn for the better soon set in under this son of Azariah in K, the son of Amaziah, who enjoyed a long and prosperous reign.

Prosperous as Israel outwardly appeared to be during the reigns of these two kings, Jeroboam II and Uzziah, the religious and moral conditions of the people were just as little satisfactory. This is the testimony of the Prophets of the prophets Amos and Hosea, as also of Isaiah and Micah, who not much later began their active ministry in Judah. It is indeed true that these were not the first prophets to put into written form some of their prophetic utterances. The prophecies of Obadiah and Joel are by many put at an earlier date, namely Obadiah under Jehoram in Judah, Joel under Jeroboam in Israel, and Joel under Jeroboam in Judah. At any rate, the discourses of the prophets from this time on constitute an important contemporary historical source. They illustrate esp. the spiritual condition of the nation. Through these writings complaints are made concerning the heathen superstitions and the godless cultus of the people, and esp. the corruption in the administration of the laws, oppression of the poor and the helpless by the rich and the powerful, and pride and luxury of all kinds. In all these things the prophets see a terrible apostasy on Israel's part. But also the foreign policy of the different kings, who sought help, now of the one and then of the other of the world-powers (Egypt, Assyria), and tried to buy the favor of these nations, the prophets regarded as adultery with foreign nations and as infidelity toward Jeh. As a punishment they announced, since all other misfortunes sent upon them had been of no avail, an invasion through a conqueror whom Amos and Hosea always indicate shall be Assyria, and also deportations of the people into a heathen land, and an end of the Jewish state. Improvable as these threats may have seemed to the self-satisfied inhabitants of Samaria, they were speedily realized.

Successors of Jeroboam II.—After the death of Jeroboam, the strength of the Northern Kingdom... collapsed. His son Zechariah was able to maintain the throne for only 6 months, and his murderer Shallum only one month. The general Menahem, who put him out of the way, maintained himself as king for 10 years, but only by paying a heavy tribute to the powerful King Tiglath-pileser III, who ruled from 745–727 (cf 2 K 15 19 f).

Pekah.—His son Pekahiah, on the other hand, soon fell by the hands of the murderer Pekah (2 K 15 25), who allied himself with Syria against Judah. The latter, however, invited the Assyrians to come into the country; and these, entering in the year 734 BC, put an end to the reign of this usurper, although he was actually put to death as late as 730 BC.

 Hoshea.—The last king of the Northern Kingdom, Hoshea (730–722 BC), had the Assyrians to thank for his throne; but he did not keep his fidelity as a vassal very long. As soon as Tiglath-pileser was dead, he tried to throw off the Assyrian yoke. But his successor Shalmaneser IV (727–722 BC), who already in the first year of his reign had again subdued the rebellious king Elaloeus of Samaria, soon compelled Hoshea also to submit to his authority. Two years later Hoshea again joined a confederacy of the Phœnician cities against Assyria, in which they even counted on the help of the Egyptian king, who, in the Bible, is called So or Seve (Egypt name is Shabaka). Now the Assyrians lost all patience. They at once came with their armies. Hoshea sought to have voluntarily submitted to the power of the Great King, who then made him a captive. The people, however, continued the struggle. Samaria, the capital city, was besieged, but did not fall until the 3rd year (722 BC) into the hands of the enemy. Shalmaneser, in the meanwhile, had died. Sargon, his successor, the city was indeed not destroyed, but a large portion of the inhabitants, esp. the leaders, were deported and transplanted to Northern Mesopotamia and to Media. Sargon states that the number of deported Israelites was 27,290. Prominent persons from other cities were also doubtless to be included in those deported. On the other hand, the Assy king settled Bab and Syrian prisoners of war in Samaria (721 BC), and in the year 715 BC, Arama, the land of the Syrians, was given to his successor. The city was indeed not destroyed, but a large portion of the inhabitants, esp. the leaders, were deported and transplanted to Northern Mesopotamia and to Media. Sargon states that the number of deported Israelites was 27,290. Prominent persons from other cities were also doubtless to be included in those deported. On the other hand, the Assy king settled Bab and Syrian prisoners of war in Samaria (721 BC), and in the year 715 BC, Arama, the land of the Syrians, was given to his successor. In the year 692 BC, which is a very approximate estimate of the period, the Bab city of Cuthah is several times mentioned, on account of which city the Jews afterward called the Samarians Cuthites. This report also makes mention of the religious syncretism, which of necessity resulted from the mixture of the people. But we must be careful not to place at too small figures the number of Israelites who remained in the country. It is a great exaggeration when it is claimed, as it is by Friedrich Delitzsch, that the great bulk of the inhabitants of the country of Samaria, or even of Galilee, was from this time on Babylonian.

Uziah and Jotham.—The kingdom of Judah, however, outlived the danger from Assyria. As King Uziah later in his life suffered from leprosy, he had Jotham as co-regent during this period. The earliest discourses of Isaiah, which belong to this period (Isa 2–4, 5), show that in Jerusalem the people were at that time still enjoying the fruits and prosperity of a long period of peace. But immediately after the death of Uziah, when the youthful Ahaz began to rule, the onslaught of the allied Syrians and Ephraimites took place under Rezin, or better Rezon, and Pekah. This alliance purposed to put an end to the Davidic reign in Jerusalem, probably for the purpose of making this people, too, a member of the league against the dangerous Assyrians. The good-sized army of Judah seems to have fallen a victim to the superior power of the allies before the situation described in Isa 7 could be realized, in which the siege of the city is described as a triumph of Judah. But it seems also at that time advanced against Judah. Elath, the harbor city on the Red Sea, from which Uzziah, too, as had been done by Solomon long before, sent out trading vessels, at that time came into their power. For 2 K 18 6 probably speaks of Edom and not of Aram (of 2 Ch 38 17). In his anxiety, Ahaz, notwithstanding the advice of Isaiah to the contrary, then appealed to the king of Assyria, and the latter actually put in his appearance in 734 BC and overcame the power of Syria and Ephraim, as we have seen above. However, the intervention of this world-power brought no benefit to Judah. Without this disgraceful appeal to a heathen ruler, Jeh, according to the promise of Isaiah, would have protected Judah, if Ahaz had only believed. And the Assyrians did not prevent the Philistines and the Edomites from falling upon Judah. The Assyrians themselves soon came to be the greatest danger threatening Judah. Ahaz, however, was an unstable character in religion, a mischievous and debauched heathen forms of worship, and even sacrificed his son to the angry sun-god, in order to gain his favor. The tribute that the people had to pay to Assyria was already a heavy burden on this little kingdom.

Hezekiah.—His noble and God-fearing son, Hezekiah (721–696 BC), was also compelled to suffer from the consequences of this misgovernment. The temptation was great to enter into an alliance with his neighbors and the Egyptians, so strong in cavalry, for the purpose of relieving Judah of the burdensome yoke of his Assyrian master. Isaiah warned against such unworthy self-help. At the advice of the ministers of Hezekiah, and because of the trust put in Egypt, the tribute was finally refused to the Assyrians. Hezekiah also sought to establish closer connections with Media and Babylonia, the king of Babylon and the enemy of the Assyrians, when the latter, after a dangerous sickness of the Assyrian king, had sent messengers to Jerus in order to congratulate him on the restoration of his health. This a great calamity, which continued in a state of desolation, so that Esarhaddon (680–666 BC) and Ashurbanipal (667–626 BC) sent new colonists there, which last mentioned sending them from Babylonia, Persia and Media (cf 2 K 18 17). In the year 720 BC, Pekah, king of Samaria, was defeated by Sennacherib, the king of Assyria, in a battle near Megiddo. The place name is mentioned in connection with the Assyrian campaigns under Sennacherib in the year 701 BC.

Sennacherib.—In the year 702 BC Sennacherib, with a powerful army, marched over the Lebanon and subdued the rebellious Phœnician cities, and marched along the seacoast to Philistia. The inhabitants of Ekron had sent their king, Padi, who sympathized with the Assyrians, to Hezekiah. Sennacherib came to punish Ekron and Ascalon. But he was particularly anxious to overpower the kingdom of Judah, which was so strong under his father, and depopulated. Now Hezekiah recognized his danger, and offered to submit to Sennacherib. The latter accepted his submission conditionally on the payment of a burdensome tribute, which Hezekiah delivered faithfully (2 K 19 14–16). Then Sennacherib was no longer satisfied with the tribute alone, but sent troops who were to despoil Jerus. Isaiah, who surely had not sanctioned the falling away from the Assyrian supremacy and had prophesied that the house of Jerahmeel, when Ahaz died or was put away, would suffer a severe punishment, from that moment, when the conqueror had maliciously broken his word, spoke words of comfort and advised against giving up the city, no matter how desperate the situation seemed to be (Isa 37 1 f). The city was then not given up, and Sennacherib, on account of a number of things that occurred, and finally because of a pestycence which broke out in his army, was compelled to retreat. He seems to have taken part in met his death by violent hands. This deliverance of Jerusalem through the miraculous providence of God was the greatest triumph of the prophet Isaiah.

Within his kingdom Hezekiah ruled successfully.

He also purified the cultus from the heathen influences that had forced their way into it, and was a predecessor of Josiah in the abolition of the sacrifices on the high places, which had been corrupted by these influences.

Manasseh.—Unfortunately, his son Manasseh was little worthy of succeeding him. He, in every way, favored the idolatry which all along had been growing secretly. He inaugurated bloody persecutions of the faithful prophets of Jeh. According to a tradition, which it must be confessed is not supported by undoubted testimony, Isaiah also, now an old man, became a victim of these persecutions. Images and altars were openly erected to Baal and Astarte. Even in the temple-house on Mt. Zion, an image of Astarte was standing. As a result, an outburst of fanaticism cut short all usuali found their way among the people. At the same time the terrible service of Moloch, in the valley of Hinnom, demanded the sacrifice of children, and even a son of the king was given over to the deities. In the Book of Isaiah there is a story of a terrible affliction that Manasseh suffered, namely, that an Assyrian general dragged him in chains to Babylonia for having violated his promises to them, but that he was soon released. This is not an accurate version. He seems to have taken part in a rebellion, which the brother of the Assyrian king, who was also vice-king in Babylon, had inaugurated. This sad experience may have forced Manasseh to a certain kind of repentance, at least, so that he distanced from his worst sacrileges. But his son Amon continued the old ways of his father, until after a brief reign he was put to death.

Josiah.—Much more promising was his young son

Josiah, who now, only 8 years old, came to the throne. It is quite possible that, in view of such frequent changes in the disposition of the successors to the throne, his mother may have had great influence on his character. Concerning Josiah, see

2 K 22 1 ff. With increasing clearness and consideration the policy of reform presented itself. Josiah and his successors undertook religious and social reform. A special impetus to this was given by the finding of an old law book in the temple, the publication of which for the first time revealed the fearful apostasy of the times. The finding of this book in the temple, as narrated in 2 K 22 3 ff, took place in connection with the restoration of that building on a larger scale, which at that time had been undertaken. And very probably Édouard

Naville is right in believing, on the basis of Egypt and Babylonian inscriptions, that Josiah was involved in the foundation wall of the building.

Whether this had been done already in the days of Solomon is not determined by this fact. From the orders of Josiah we can conclude that the book which was found was Dt, which lays special stress on the fact that there shall be a central place for the cultus, and also contains such threats as those must have been which frightened Josiah. But under no circumstances was Dt a law book that had first been written at Bethel, where Josiah had not been to Jerus and his helpers. It would rather have been possible that the discovered old law was rewritten in changed form after its discovery and had been adapted to the language of the times. The people were obliged to obey the newly discovered law and were instructed in its sense.

Jeremiah.—The prophet Jeremiah also, who a Daniel 1, near the city of Nippur. From Hiiprere's excavations of this city, it has been learned that this river, or branch of the Euphrates

1. Influence river, is to be found at this place, and of the Exile Chaboras. In the same way, the many conflating tables with Jewish names which have been found at Nippur, suggest that a large Jewish colony lived at that place. Of the fate of these banished Jews for a period of 50 years, we hear almost nothing. But it is possible to learn what their condition was in exile from the Book of Ezekiel and the 2nd part of Isaiah. Nehemiah, a son of Josiah, called Mattaniah, who afterward was called Zedekiah. He governed for twelve years (597-586 BC), and by his life, morally and religiously corrupt, sealed the fate of the house and of the kingdom of David. The better class among the leading and prominent people had been banished. As a result, the courtiers of the king urged him to try once again some treacherous schemes against the Bab rulers and to join Egypt in a conspiracy against them. However, Jeremiah and Ezekiel warned against this policy, Zedekiah nevertheless constantly yielded to his evil advisers and to the warlike patriotic party, who were determined to win back by battle the independence of the small heathen kingdom he had assured the Great King of his loyalty (Jer 52:3), and still in the 4th year of his reign had personally visited in Babylon as a mark of his fidelity (Jer 52:50), he was induced in the 9th year of his reign to make yet another alliance with the Egyptians against the Babylonians and to refuse to render obedience to the latter. Nebuchadnezzar soon came and surrounded the city. At the announcement that an Egyptian army was approaching, the siege was again raised, and it was only when the prophet anathematized him that Zedekiah on his ally failed him. The Babylonians began again to starve out the city. After a siege of 18 months, resistance proved futile. The king tried secretly to break through the circle of besiegers, but in doing so was taken prisoner, was blinded by the Bab king and taken to Babylon. The majority of the prominent men and state officials, who were taken to the encampment of the conqueror in Riblah, were put to death. The conqueror, however, kept together with the temple, were totally destroyed. Nearly all the inhabitants who could be captured after the slaughter were dragged into captivity, and only people of the lower classes were left behind to cultivate the land. Gedaliah, a noble-minded aristocrat, was appointed governor of the city, and took up his residence in Mizpah. At this place it seemed that a new kernel of the people was being gathered. Jeremiah also went there. However, after two months this good beginning came to an end. Gedaliah was slain by Ishmael, the son of Nethaniah, an anti-Chaldean, a fanatical and revengeful descendant of the house of David. The murderer acted in cooperation with certain Ammonites and Aramaeans, who were driven into the temple, and also in cooperation with the king of Ammon. The Jews in later times considered the murder of Gedaliah as an especially great national calamity, and fasted on the anniversary of this crime. And as the people also feared the revenge of the Babylonians, many migrated to Egypt, compelling Jeremiah, now an old man, to accompany them, although he prophesied to them that no good would come of this scheme. They first stayed at the border city Taanach, near Pelusium, and then scattered over Upper and Lower Egypt.

2. Daniel—The inhabitants of Judah, who had been deported by Nebuchadnezzar at different times, were settled by him in Babylonia, e.g. at the river Chebar (Ezk 1:1).
this temple had been spared on one occasion by Cambyses, who was in Egypt from 525 to 521 BC. The answer of Baghai also has been preserved, and he directs that the temple is to be built again and that the megaliths and incense are again to be introduced. The megaliths are thus known to the temple in the letter is made only of the unbloody sacrifices, while in the first letter burnt sacrifices also are named. The sacrifices of animals by the Jews would probably have assuaged too much the anger of the devotees of the divinities which was wounded at Sardis. Up to the present time we knew only of the much later temple of the high priest Onias IV at Leontopolis (160 BC).

1. Career of Cyrus (Cyrus), first made himself free from the supremacy of Media which, after the capture of the city Ecbatana, became a part of his own kingdom (549 BC). At that time Nabonidus was the king in Babylon (555-538 BC), who was not displeased at the collapse of the kingdom of the Medes, but soon learned that the new ruler turned out to a greater danger to himself. Cyrus subjugated, one after the other, the smaller kingdoms in the north. But Nabonidus was too unwarlike to meet Cyrus. He confined himself to sending his son with an army to the northern boundaries of his kingdom. On the other hand, the king of the Lydians, Croesus, who was related by marriage to King Astyages, who had been subdued by Cyrus, began a war with Cyrus, after he had formed an alliance with Egypt and Sparta. In the year 540 BC, he crossed the river Hydros. Cyrus approached from the Tigris, and in doing so already entered Bab territory, conquered Croesus, took his capital city Sardis, and put an end to the kingdom of Lydia. The pious Israelites in captivity, under the tutelage of Deutero-Isaiah, watched these events with the greatest of interest. For the prophet taught them from the beginning to see in this king "the deliverer," who was the instrument of Jeh for the return of the Israelites out of captivity, and who —In the meanwhile there was a new readjustment of political supremacy among the world-powers. Cyrus approached from the Tigris, and in doing so already entered Bab territory, conquered Croesus, took his capital city Sardis, and put an end to the kingdom of Lydia. The pious Israelites in captivity, under the tutelage of Deutero-Isaiah, watched these events with the greatest of interest. For the prophet taught them from the beginning to see in this king "the deliverer," who was the instrument of Jeh for the return of the Israelites out of captivity, and who round about them, esp. from the mixed peoples of Samaria. Samaria was the breeding-place for this hostility against Jerus. The governor at that place, Sanballat, was the head of this hostile league. The Samaritans had already contracted with foreign women, should be dissolved. But this exclusiveness was the outcome of legal conscientiousness, and at this period it was probably necessary for the self-preservation of the people of Jor.

Malachi — the prophet of Malachi, who was almost a contemporary of the two mentioned, it can be seen that the marriages with the foreign women had also brought with them a loosening of even the most sacred family ties (Mal 2 14f.). After an interval of 12 years, Nehemiah again returned to Shushan to the court; and when he later returned to Jerus he was compelled once more to inaugurate a stringent policy against the lawlessness which was violating the sanctity of the temple and of the sacred family ties. Nehemiah, a grandson of Manasseh, a grandson of the high priest, who had married a daughter of Sanballat. This Manasseh, according to Jos (Ant, XI, viii, 2), erected the sanctuary on Mt. Gerizim, and established the priesthood at that place. This is no doubt correct. These accounts of Jos are often combined without cause with the times of Alexander the Great, although they transpired about 110 years earlier.

The history of the Jews in the last decades of the Persian rule is little known. Under Artaxerxes III (Ochus), they were compelled to suffer much, when they took part in a rebellion of the Phoenicians and Cyripians. Many Jews were at that time banished to Hircania on the southern coast of the Caspian Sea. The Pers general, Bagoas, afterwards forced them to leave the temple (Jos, Ant, XI, vii, 1). He undertook to install as high priest, in the place of John (Jochanan), his brother Joshua (Jesus). The latter, however, was slain by the former in the temple. For the first time the high priest appears as more of a political position, something that it never was in the pre-Exilic times, and according to the law was not to be.

VIII. The Jews under Alexander and His Successors. — As the Jews were then tired of the rule of the priests, they were not dissatisfied with the victorious career of Alexander the Great. He appears to have assumed a friendly attitude toward them, even if the story reported by Jos (Ant, XI, viii, 4) is scarcely historical. The successors of Alexander were also, as a rule, tolerant in religious matters. But for political and geographical reasons, Pal suffered severely in these times, as it lay between Syria and Egypt, and was an object of attack both of the leading ruling families in this period, the Ptolemies in Egypt and the Seleucidae in Syria. At the same time Hellenism, which had been so powerfully advanced by Alexander as a factor of civilization and culture, penetrated the land of Israel also. Or culture and language spread soon in Pal and in many places was supreme. The more strict adherents of Judaism recognized in this a danger to the Mosaic order of life and religion, and all the more zealously they now adhered to the traditional ordinances.

These are called imi (Heb. "the proscriptions") or hokhadim (Aramaic, Hodeshadi). 1 Macc 42; 7 13; 2 Macc 14 6). The world-transforming Hellenistic type of thought spread esp. among the aristocrats and the politically prominent, and even found adherents among the priests, while the hokhadim belonged to the less conspicuous ranks of the people.

A struggle for life and death was caused between these two tendencies by the Syrian king, Antiochus IV (Epiphanes), into whose hands the sovereignty of Pal had fallen. He undertook nothing less than to root out the hated Jewish religion. In the year 166 BC he commanded that the temple of Jeh in Jerus should be dedicated to the Olympian Jupiter and forlaid most stringently the observance of the Sabbath and circumcision. A large portion of the people did not resist his oppression, but adapted themselves to this tyrannical heathendom. Others were forced and died as martyrs. In 165 BC a priest, Mattathias, gave the signal for a determined resistance, at the head of which stood his brave brethren, the Hasmoneans, or Maschiyaus. From this time, they undertook the leadership of the faithful. He succeeded in freeing Jerus from the yoke of Persia, and the temple on Mt. Zion. The temple was dedicated anew and was given over to the old cultus. After a number of victorious campaigns, Judah the Hasmonean was taken by the death of a hero in 161 BC. His brother, Jonathan, who took his place at the head of the sect, could not secure the independence of the land rather through deliberate planning than through military power. He assumed, in addition to his sacred office of high-priestly dignity. After his death by violence in 143 BC, he was succeeded by his brother Simon, the latter, of this double honor. The Hasmoneans, however, rapidly became worldly minded and lost the sympathies of the people. The son of a certain Simon of Samaria, John Hyrcanus (135—100 BC), broke entirely with the Pious, and his family, after his death, came to an end in disgraceful struggles for the rule of the land fell into the hands of Herod, a tyrant of Idumaean origin, who was supported by the Romans. From 37 BC he was the recognized king of Judah. See ASMONIAE; MACCABEES.

IX. The Romans. — After the death of Herod (4 BC), the kingdom, according to his last will, was to be divided among his three sons.

1. Division of the Roman Territories. — Archelaus received Judaea; Antipas, of territory Galilæa; Philip, the rest of Syria and other lands in the north. However, Archelaus was soon deposed by the Romans (6 AD), and Judaea was made a part of the province of Syria, but was put under special Roman procurator, who resided in Caesarea. These procurators (the best known was Pontius Pilate, 26—36 AD), had no other object than to plunder the land and the people. In this way the conflict was gradually generated between the people and their oppressors, which ended with the destruction of Jerus by the Romans in 70 AD. As early as the reign of Titus, 70—81 AD, the Romans took Jerusalem, the capital, and destroyed the temple.

2. Destruction of the Romans. — As early as the reign of Titus, 70—81 AD, the Romans took Jerusalem, the capital, and destroyed the temple.

King Agrippa I, who was again ruling the whole territory of Herod, succeeded in adjusting the conflict. His son Agrippa II (135—100 AD) built a much smaller kingdom (40—100 AD). He, too, sought to prevent the people from undertaking a struggle with the Romans, but in vain. By his unscrupulous treatment of the people, the procurator Gessius Florus drove the Jews into an insurrection. The Zealots gained the upper hand. Florus was compelled to leave Jerus (66 AD). Even the good-sized city which Cestius Gallus commanded could not get control of the city, but was completely overpowered by the Jews on its retreat at Bethhoron. Now the entire country rose in rebellion, The Romans, under the leadership of Vespasian, advanced with considerable power and first conquered Galilee, then under Jos (67 AD). In Jerusalem, in the meanwhile, different parties of the Jews were still fighting each other. Titus, the son of Vas- pasian, took the chief command after Vespasian had already conquered the E. Jordan country and the western coast, but had hastened to Rome in order to become emperor. Titus completely surrounded the city a few days before the Passover festival in the year 70. On the northern side the Romans first broke through the first and newest city wall, and later that the southern. The third offered a longer resistance, and at the same time famine wrought havoc in Jerusalem. At last the battle raged about the temple, during which this structure went up in flames. According to the full description by Jos (B.J., VI, iv, 3-6), Titus tried to prevent the destruction of the temple; according to Sulpicius Severus (Chron. II, 20), however, this destruction was just what he wanted. A few fortified places yet maintained themselves after the fall of Jerusalem, e.g. Machaerus in the E. Jordan country, but all held out very long.

Later insurrection of Bar-Cochba.—Once again the natural ambition for independence burst out in the insurrection of Bar-Cochba (132-35 AD). Peering law, esp. Rabbi Akiba, who enkindled this fire, in order to rid the country of the Gentiles. However, notwithstanding some temporary successes, this insurrection was hopeless. Both the city and the country were devastated by the enraged Romans still more fearful, and were depopulated still more than in 70. From that time Jerusalem was lost to the Jews. They lived on without a country of their own, without any political organization, without a sanctuary, in the Diaspora among the nations.

The spiritual and religious life of the Jews during the period preceding the dissolution of the state was determined particularly by the the teaching of Jesus Christ. —The crown of the history of Israel-Judah was the appearance of Jesus Christ. Looked at superficially, it may indeed appear as though His person and His life had but little influence on the development of the national history of Israel. However, more closely viewed, we shall see that this entire history has its goal in Him and finds its realization in Him. After full fruit had developed out of this stock, the latter withered and died. He was to be the bearer of salvation for all mankind.

LITERATURE.—The earliest historian of Israel was the Jew, Flavius Josephus, in the 1st Christian cent. His example was followed by few in the early church, and we mention only the Chronicle of Sulpicius Severus. The Eusebius, the history of his De Civitate Dei. It was only in the 17th cent. that a keen interest was awakened in this subject. Cf. esp. James Usher, Annales Veteris et Novi Testamenti, London, 1605; J. B. Bousset, Discours sur l'histoire universelle, Paris, 1861; Rumpf, Priester, The Old and the New Testament Connected in the History of the Jews and Neighboring Nations, 2 vols., London, 1716; S. Shukford, The Sacred and Profane History of the World Connected, London, 1727, this work treating the subject apologetically against the Deists. Cf also J. Sauvain, Discoveries historiques, Amsterdam, 1720. Cocceius and his school systematized this history on the basis of their theological conviction of a general apocalyptic vision. Frankfort, 1724. More systematic is the work of Vitringa, Hypothese historiae et chronologiae sacrae, Frankfort, 1708. The work of Chemnitz furnished the excellent work of Franz Budde, Historiae Ecclesiae Veteris Testamenti, Jena, 1715. In recent times, the school furnished some good general overviews of the history of Israel, such as CH. F. Reuss, Einleitung in die bibl. Geschichte, 1700. More popular is the work of J. J. Hess. The best Catholic work from this time is J. Jahn's Archæologia, 1802; while the Rationalistic period furnished Lorenz Bauer's Geschichte der hebr. Nation, 1800. In the 19th cent. the rationalistic and the conservative tendencies run parallel, and a new impulse was given to the study of this history by the phenomenal archaeological finds in Egypt and in Assyria and Babylonia. Critical reconstruction of Israel's history characterized the works of Reuss, Graf, Kuenen, Wellhausen. Other works of prominence are the Geschichte des Volkes Gottes, by Ewald; Krebs, Geschichte des alten Bundes (these are: Hidde, Geschichte des Volkes Israel, with critical tendency. The work of August Koechler, Lehre der biblischen Geschicht, 1871, is positive, while Wellhausen's Geschichte Israels is a classic of the advanced school. Other works mentioned here are the histories of Roman, Kuenen, Stade, Winslow, Pieplenbrug, Cornill, Gute, Cheyne, and others. Kittel's Geschichte der Hebräer (1875) is more moderate in tone. For the NT the richest storehouse is Schürer's Geschichte des jüdischen Volkes im Zeitalter Jesu Christi (rev.); Hauser's Neutestamentliche Zeitgeschichte is also good.

FROM THE JEWISH stand-point this history has been treated by S. Friedländer, Geschichte des israelit. Völker; and J. M. Jost, Geschichte der Israeliten; Moritz Raphall, Post-biblical History of the Jews from the Close of the OT till the Destruction of the Second Temple, in the Year 70.

Among English works may be especially mentioned Millman's History of the Jews, Stanley's, Lectures on the History of the Jewish Church, with smaller works by Octley and others. American works on the subject from the critical point of view are a History of the Heb. People, by Kent, and a History of the Jewish People by Kent and Blegen in the "Historical Series for Bible Students," published by Moors, Scribner. Cf also McCurdy and the Monuments, Toy, Judaism and Christianity; H. F. S. OHELI.

LITERATURE

I. THE FIRST PERIOD.—The circumstances leading up to the foundation of the Northern Kingdom of Israel, or the Kingdom of the Ten

1. The Two Tribes, have been detailed under the Kingdoms. When the two kingdoms were viewed in a secular point of view it would be more natural to regard the latter as an offshoot from the former, rather than the converse. But not only is the kingdom of Judah of paramount importance in respect of both religion and literature, but its government also was in the hands of a single dynasty, whereas that of the Northern Kingdom changed hands no less than 8, during the two and a half centuries. Moreover, the Southern Kingdom, by Augustus, was ruled for a time as long as the other.

No sooner had Jerobeam I been elected the first ruler of the newly founded state than he set about managing its affairs with the energy

2. The Ist Dynasty for which he was distinguished (1 K. Dynasty 11-25).

To complete the disruption it has established a sanctuary in opposition to that of Jerus (Hos 8 14), with its own order of priests (2 Ch 11 14; 13 9), and founded two capital cities, Shechem on the W. and Penuel on the E. of the Jordan (1 K. 12 25).

Peace seems to have been maintained between the two kingdoms during the 17 years' reign of Rehobom, but on the accession of his son Abijah war broke out (1 K. 15 6-7; 2 Ch 13 3 ff). Shortly afterward Jerobeam died and was succeeded by his son Nadab, who was a year later assassinated, and the 1st Dynasty came to an end, after an existence of 23 years, being limited, in fact, to a single reign. Omri, the founder of the dynasty, was a Phoenician king who went to the east to fight the Assyrians and was killed in the battle of Karkar (1 K 15: 29). He was succeeded by his son Ahab, who was a warrior and a warrior-king, but whose reign was cut short by his death in battle against the Moabites (1 K 22: 7).

Ben-hadad, the king of Syria, attempted to seize the throne of Israel, but he was defeated by the Israelites at the battle of the Kadesh (1 K 20: 34). The result of the battle was a defeat for Ben-hadad, and the Israelites were able to assert their independence from Syria.

The period of the Syrian Wars was marked by the rise of the Assyrian Empire, which sought to expand its territory at the expense of its neighbors. The Assyrians were a powerful and aggressive people, and they were able to defeat the Hebrews and other peoples in the region.

The Assyrians were known for their military successes, but they were also known for their cruelty and ruthlessness. They were a nation of warriors, and they were not afraid to use violence to achieve their goals.

In the 8th century BC, the Assyrians began to expand their empire, and they were able to conquer the kingdom of Judah and the city of Jerusalem.

The Assyrians were a powerful and aggressive people, and they were able to defeat the Hebrews and other peoples in the region. They were a nation of warriors, and they were not afraid to use violence to achieve their goals.

Even

But the prosperity was superficial.

III. Decline and Fall.—Meantime Pul or Pulu had founded the second Assyrian empire under

Tiglath-pileser III. Before conquering

Babylonia, he broke

the

in the W., and made himself master of the routes leading to the seasports. As

the

power had allowed the expansion

of

Israel under Jeroboam II, so its revival now crushed the independence of the nation forever. Menahem bought stability for his throne

by the

of an immense

silver, or $2,000,000, reckoning the silver talent at $2,000. The money was raised by means of an assessment

50 talents
each upon all the men

famous

wealth. The payment of this tribute is mentioned on the Assyrian monuments, the date being 778.

Menahem reigned 10 years. His son Pekahiah was, soon after his accession, assassinated by one

his own captains, Pekah, son of

with the help of some Gileadites, as king. He formed an alliance with Rezin of Damascenus against Israel, defeating Ahas in two pitched battles, taking numerous captives, and even reaching the walls of Jerus. The result was disastrous to both allies. Ahas called in the aid of the Assyrians. Tiglath-pileser put an end to the kingdom

Damascus, and deported the inhabitants of Northern and Eastern Pal. The kingdom of Israel was reduced to the dimensions of the later province of Samaria. Pekah himself was assassinated by en, who became under the tutelage of the overlord. The depopulated provinces were filled with colonists from the conquered countries of the East. The year is 734.

Hoshea was never an independent king, but the

Assyria. He was foolish enough to withhold the annual tribute, and to turn to Egypt for succor. Meanwhile, the

laid

Samaria, but died during the siege. The city was taken by his successor Sargon, who had seized the throne, toward the end of the year

722.

The Northern Kingdom had lasted 240 years,

fall into three periods of about 80 years each, the middle period being the period of the Syrian wars. It was fully formed when it broke off from the Southern kingdom, its history shows no development or evolution, but is made up of undulations of prosperity and of decline. It was at its between its foundation, and still under Jerobboam II. It was strong under Baasha, Omri and Ahab, but generally weak under the other kings. Every change of dynasty meant a period of anarchy, when the country was at the mercy of every in-vader. The fortunes of Israel depended entirely on those of Assyria. When Assyria was weak, Israel was strong. Given the advance of Assyria, the destruction of Israel was certain. This was necessary and was clearly foreseen by Hosea (9 3, etc). The wonder is that the little state, surrounded by such powerful neighbors, lasted as long as it did. See, further, ISRAEL, HISTORY OF, V.

there are many more. Ewald is best known to En-

2. The Relation of Man to This God

LITERATURE

I. Introduction.—In former times it was the rule to draw out of the OT its religious contents only for dogmatic purposes, without making any distinction between the different books. These writings were all regarded as the documents of the Divine revelation which had been given to this people alone and not to others. At the present time the first inquiry in the study of these books deals historically with the religious development of the Israelites. This religion was not of a strictly uniform nature, but is characterized by a development and a growth, and in the centuries which are covered by the OT books it has passed through many changes. Then, too, in the different periods of this development there were various religious trends among the people and very different degrees in the extent of their religious knowledge. The common people were at times still entangled in crude heathen ideas, while the bearers of a high Divine light ranked vastly above them. And even in those times, when these enlightened teachers secured full recognition, there occurred relapses into lower forms of religion on the part of the masses, esp. because the influence of the nations surrounding Israel at all times made itself felt in the religious life and thoughts of the latter. And even when the correct teachings were accepted by the people, a malformation of the entire religion could readily occur through a petrification of the religious life. It is the business of the science of the history of religion to furnish a correct picture of this development, which in this article can be done only in the form of a sketch.

One of the recent results of the science of the history of religion is the knowledge that the religion of Israel itself, and not merely the corruptions of this religion, stood in a much closer connection with other religions than had in former times been supposed. The wealth of new data from the history of oriental nations lately secured has shown that it is not correct to regard the religion of Israel as an isolated phenomenon, but that considerable light is thrown upon it from analogous facts from surrounding regions. Of especial importance in this respect is the study of Assyr and Bab antiquities, with their rich and illustrative monuments, and, by the side of these, also those of Egypt; and, further, although these are indeed much smaller in number, the inscriptions and monuments of a number of peoples situated much nearer to Israel and ethnologically more closely connected with them, such as the Moabites, Arameans, Arabsians, Canaanites, Phoenicians, and others. For later times, Persia is an esp. important factor.

There have been numerous attempts to connect the religion of Israel and the religions of these nations there existed such close connections that a relationship between them cannot be denied. It is indeed true that these similarities are mostly of a formal nature, but there are those who have come to different conclusions from the Divine Being and of the relation of man to this Being. We find such connecting links in the cultus, in the traditions concerning the creation of the world, concerning the earliest history of mankind, etc.; further, in the conception of what is legally right and of the customs of life; in the ideas concerning death and the world beyond; concerning the souls of men and the supernatural spiritual world, and elsewhere. These analogies and related connections have appeared so pronounced to some scholars, especially Assyriologists, that they are willing to find in the religion of the Israelites and Jews only a reflection of the Bab, or of what they call the "religion of the ancient Orient." But over against this claim, a closer and deeper investigation shows that a higher world of thought and ideals at all times permeates the Israelite religion and gives to it a unique character and a Divine truth, which is lacking in all other religions and which made Israel's religion capable of becoming the basis of that highest Divine revelation which through Christ came forth from it. We will here briefly sketch the progress of the development of this religion, and then formulate a summary of those characteristics which distinguish it from the other religions.

II. Historical Outline.—(1) The traditional view.
   —The sources for this period are meager. Yet what has been reported concerning the religion of the period of the Patriarchs is enough to give us a picture of their conceptions and thoughts. And this picture is more deserving of acceptance than is the representation of the matter by the traditional dogmatists of the church and also that of those modern scholars who are under the influence of a revolutionary idea, and who undertake to prove in the Bib. history of Israel the complete development from the lowest type of fetishism and animism to the heights of ethical monotheism. The views of the old church teachers were not without influence on the doctrine concerning the one true God which had been communicated by God to Adam in its purity and perfection, and by him had been handed through an unbroken chain of true confessors of the faith (Seth, Noah, etc.), down to Abraham. But this view does not find confirmation in the Bib. record. On the contrary, in Josh 24 2.15, it is even expressly stated of the ancestors of Abraham that they had worshipped strange gods in Chaldea. And the ancestors of the people of the land, the Canaanites, and others, do not appear on the stage of history with a teachable creed, but themselves first learn to know gradually, in the school of life, the God whom they serve, after He has made Himself known to them in extraordinary manifestations. Abraham does not yet know that Jehovah does not demand any human sacrifices. Jacob still has the narrow view, that the place where he has slept is the entrance portal to heaven (Gen 28 16.17). Omnipresence and omniscience are not yet attributes which they associate with their idea of the Divinity. They still stand on a simple-minded and primitive stage, as far as their knowledge of the living God is concerned.

(2) The modern view.—Over against this, modern scholars describe pre-Mosaic Israel as yet entirely entangled in Sem heathen ideas, and even regard the religion of the people in general, in the post-Mosaic period down to the 8th cent. BC, as little better than this, since in their opinion the Jehovah-religion had not thoroughly permeated the ranks of the common people, and had practically remained the possession of the men, while the women had continued to cultivate the ancient customs and views. W. R. Smith and Wellhausen have pointed to customs and ideas of the pre-Mosaic Israel. Curtius has gone so far to such in the modern life of oriental tribes, which are claimed to have been the property of the most ancient Sem heathen tribes, and those scholars use these as the key for the ancient Israelitic rites and customs. But even if much light is thrown from these sources on the forms of life and cultus as depicted by the Scriptures, much caution must be exercised in the use made of this material. In the first place, neither these Arabs of the 6th cent. After that time necessary usage can be regarded as "primitive Semites." In the second place, it is a question, even if in the earliest period of Israel such customs are actually found, what they really signified for the tribe of Abraham. We are here not speaking of a prehistoric religion, but of the religion of that tribe that came originally from Ur of the Chaldees, and migrated first by way of Haran to Canaan, and then to Egypt. In this tribe such primitive customs, perhaps, had long been spiritualized. For these Hebrews cannot be regarded as being as uncivilized as the New Zealanders, or the Indians of North America, or those Bedouins who have never left the desert; for they had lived in Babylonia for a long period, even if, while there, they had withdrawn themselves as much as possible from the more cultured life of the cities. The patriarchs were in touch with the civilization of the Babylonians. We do not, indeed, want to lay special stress on the fact that they lived in Ur and in Haran, two cities of the highest antiquity in the world. But the history of the family of Abraham, e.g. his relation to Sarah and Hagar, shows indisputable influence of Bab legal ideas. Probably, too, the traditions concerning the beginnings of history, such as the Creation, the Deluge, and the like, were brought from Babylon to Canaan by the tribe of Abraham.

3. A higher conception of the Deity; "atu, 'el.—But this tribe had come to Babylonia from Northern Arabia. It is a very important fact that the oldest Arabian inscriptions, namely the Minaean and the Sabaean, lead us to conclude that these tribes entertained a relatively high conception of the Deity, as has been shown by Professor Fritz Hommel. The oldest Arabian proper names are not found combined with names of all kinds of gods, but with the simple 'atu, 'el, or God, or with 'il, "my God." Then, too, God is often circumvented by the nouns expressing relationship, such as 'abt, "my father," 'amat, "my mother," and others, which express an intimate relationship between man and his God. Corresponding to these are also the old Sem proper names in Canaan, as also the name Abraham, i.e. 'Abhir, "father of a brother," as well as his successors and others. We accordingly must believe that the ancestors of Abraham immigrated into Babylon with a comparatively highly developed religion and with a uniform conception of God. Here their faith may have been unfavorably influenced, and it is not impossible that the religious disagreement between the patriarch and his neighbors may have been a reason for his migration. Abraham himself is regarded by the Canaanites as a "friend of God," who stands in an intimate relationship with his God, and he is accordingly to be regarded, not merely as a secular, but also as a religious tribal head, an 'Imdan, a prophetic personality.

4. Totemism; animism, etc.—Still less is it correct to ascribe to this tribe the lowest religious stage possible, namely that of fetishism or of totemism (worship of demons or worship of animals) and the like. Some think they find evidences of the worship of animals in Israel. The fact that some Israelitish deities were called "wild cow"(?), others of Rachel ("mother sheep"), is claimed to refer to the fact that these animals were totems of the tribe, i.e. were worshipped as ancestors. But for this claim there is no scintilla of proof. These names of women, esp. in the case of a nomadic tribe, can be explained in a much more simple way. The calves that appear in later times as images of Jeh are just as little a proof for the claim that calves were worshipped by the ancestors of Israel as divinities. We read nothing of such an image before the sojourn in Egypt, and after that time necessary usage can be regarded symbolically. The fact, again, that from the days of Moses, and without a doubt earlier than this, certain animals were not allowed to be eaten, does not justify the conclusion which Professor B. Stade and others have drawn from it, viz. that these animals were in olden times regarded as divine (tabu), and for that reason were not permitted to be eaten, and only afterward were avoided as "unclean." The list of unclean animals in Lev 11 and Dt 14 speaks for an altogether different reason for regarding them as unclean. It is not at all thinkable that these many, and as a rule unclean and low class of animals, were at one time accorded divine honor, while the higher and cleaner class had been excluded from this distinction. We have accordingly no reason for finding animal worship here. On the other hand, it is self-evident, in the case of such an old nomadic tribe, that man stood in a more familiar relationship to his animals, and for this reason the prohibition of the more clean animals was more rigorous than it was afterward the case. This was done only on extraordinary occasions, and it readily was accorded a religious consecration. See also TOTEMISM.

The idea is also emphatically to be rejected, that in the pre-Mosaic period animism prevailed in Israel—the worship of spirits and of demons. It has been tried in vain to show that in the most primitive period of Israel's religion the worship of ancestors occupied a prominent place. As Professor Emil Kautsch has emphasized, the arguments which have been drawn from the mourning customs of the Israelites in favor of this claim (as this is done by F. Schwally, Das Leben nach dem Tode, nach den Vorstellung des alten Israel und des Judentums, Giessen, 1892) are altogether inadequate, as is also the appeal to the marriage with a deceased wife's sister, as though the purpose of the institution was to secure for the deceased who had died without issue somebody who would attend to his physical wants. The argument from the cultus of the Teraphim is quite convincing, but is not more convincing than is actually the case, and that gifts, such as food, oil, and the like, were placed in the tomb of the deceased, as was often done by the Canaanites, yet this would be in the ancient Israelitish religion a matter of subordinate importance, which could readily be explained on the ground of natural feelings. It could never be made to appear plausible that all religions had grown out of such a cultus. If the teraphim are to be regarded as having been originally images of ancestors, which is quite plausible, then they would indeed represent a continuous ancestral cultus, as the people evidently kept these images in their houses in order to attract to themselves blessings, to avert misfortunes and to secure oracles. But these dolls, modeled after the form of human beings, already in the period of the Patriarchs were regarded as a foreign element and in contradiction to the more earnest religious sentiments (cf Gen 31 19; 35 24).

That Israel, like of Israel, like other peoples, did at one time pass through an "animistic" stage of religious development could best be proved, if at all, from their conception of the soul. Among the purification these are esp. necessary which are demanded by the presence of a dead body in the same room with the living, as the living are defiled by the soul. of the deceased in leaving the body (Nu 19:14). Even the uncovered vessels are defiled by his soul-substance (19:15). This, however, is a biological conception, which has nothing to do with the conception of the Deity.

Or are those perhaps right, who think that the primitive Israelites had accepted animism in this sense, that they did not as yet worship any actual divinities, but only a multitude of spirits or demons, be these ghosts of departed human beings or the spirits of Nature, local numina? In favor of this last-mentioned view, appeal is made to this fact, that the favorite places with denbies where very circumscribed spheres of power are very often to be met with, esp. at springs, trees, oases, at which a demon or divinity is regarded as having his abode, who is described as the ba'al or master in this place; as, for instance, or after the Baal-tears of the Israelites and others. Such local spirits would then be the 'elohim, out of which would grow more mighty divinities of whole cities and countries. To these it would be necessary yet to add those spirits which were described as the 'avim of the hardy spars of ancestors, who also could have grown into higher divinities, while the rest of the mass of deities, good and bad, had to content themselves with a lower rank.

As against this, we must above all consider the fact that in ancient Israel the demons played a very subordinate rôle. The contrast in this regard with Babylonia is phenomenal. It is probably the case that at all periods in Israel there existed a belief in unclean spirits, who perhaps lived in the desert (of the יָאָבָשָׁו, אָבָשָׁו, or in the demoniac, and could otherwise, too, do much harm. But they are now described as having much influence on man's life. How few indications of such a view can be found and how little most of these indications prove we can see in the work of H. Duhm, Die bösen Geister im A.T., Tübingen, 1906. After the Bab exile, and still more after the Bab-remnant of the Israelites in Babylon, their imagination was to a much greater degree than before saturated by the faith in spirits. Then the closer study of such Sem הבִּלְוּב teaches us that they were not originally considered in such a narrow sense. They are very often of a solar nature, celestial powers who have their abode at a particular place, and there produce fertility, but in this special function represent a general power of Nature. The same is the case with the Syrian divinities. These are by no means merely the personifications of the small power of a particular tribe, but claim to be absolute beings, which shows that they are regarded as higher divinities which the tribe has appropriated and adapted to its own political ideas. We accordingly have no right to think that such a divinity was to be regarded as really confined to a particular hill, or even to a certain stone or tree where it was worshipped. The rock or stone or tree divinities of the ancient Arabs are celestial powers, who have only taken their abode at these places, even if popular superstition did actually identify them with such stones or trees.

It is therefore a misconception of the actual state of affairs when the conclusion is drawn that stone-worship is meant when Jacob erects a stone monument, the moqebbâd at Bethel, and anoints it with oil, and when this is understood to be a low type of fetishism. Stones are to the present day, for the wandering tribes, the signs by which important localities, esp. sacred places, are designated. The symbolical significance of such stones may be quite different, as also the relation which a divinity is thought to sustain to such a stone monument. For this reason, too, the judgment of the Bible concerning such objects is quite different. Only then, when they are symbols of idolatry, as the hammanim, i.e. representations of the sun-god, ba'al hamman, are they everywhere rejected in the OT.

In the same way a mighty tree, esp. if it is found near a spring of water, is in the Orient, by its very nature, a proof of the life-producing God. Such a tree naturally suggests that it is a place where divine life can be felt. Trees that have been made sacred by manifestations of the divinities or have been consecrated by the memory of a great personality, esp. the oak, the terbolith, the palm, were regarded by the Jews as holy; the divinity was sought. Only in that case, as was indeed common in Canaan, when the unchallenged powers of Nature were here adored, was this custom reprehensible in the eyes of the prophets. The 'asherim, too, are of a decidedly heathen character, as these trunks of trees were symbols of the goddess Asherah. Further, it was a favorite custom to worship the divinities on the high places, for the reason that they were regarded as in or attached to the heavens. Only in the worship of those who were letterized on these bâmôth they were, in later times, so hateful to the prophets.

(5) Conception of God. — In answer to the question, what ideas the patriarchs, the pre-Mosaic leaders of the people of Israel, entertained regarding God, attention must first of all be drawn to the fact that God spoke to some of these personally, be this in one form of manifestation or in another. These men heard the word of God with their own ears, and that, too, in the most important events of their lives. In the case of Abraham, these revelations are fundamental for him and for his people. The prophetic factor, which goes through the entire history of Israel and constitutes the life-principle that fills its religion and causes development, is at the very first beginnings the source whence the knowledge of God is taken. This presupposes a personal God; and, as a matter of fact, a fixed personality is demanded by the character of such a God. His "I" impresses itself upon man with absolute power and demands his service entirely. This "I" constantly remains the same, and everywhere evinces the same power, be this in Haran or in Canaan or in Egypt, and whether it manifests itself to Abraham or to Isaac or to Jacob. This oneness is not formulated as a didactic proposition, but as a living reality: only this God existed for His adherents. These appeals to Him at all times with equal success. The manifestations of this God may be of a different kind at different times. He is even entertained, on one occasion, as a personal guest by His friend Abraham, together with two companions (Gen 18:1 ff.). On another occasion (Gen 15:17) Abraham beholds Him in the symbolical form as a burning and fiery furnace (probably to be regarded as similar to the movable altar discovered by Sellin in Tannach). But these are to be regarded as special favors shown by God. In general it was the rule that God could not be seen without the beholder suffering death. Then, too, the conviction is very old, that what man sees in the case of such theophanies cannot have been God Himself, but that He had manifested Himself through a subordinate agent, an angel (this is particularly the case in the document E in Gen). This angel, however, has no significance in himself, but is only the creature-veil, out of which God Himself speaks in the first person. In the most elementary manner this formal limitation of God appears in Gen 11:5 where the designation coming from heaven in order to look at something on earth; and in 18:21, when He desires to go to Sodom personally, in order to convince Himself that what He has intended to send upon this city is also the right thing. It is indeed possible to find in the first instance some traits of irony, and possibly in the second case the epic details may have added something. However, God is no longer spoken of in such a way as in the Mosaic times. This shows that the document J at this place contains material that is very old. All the more is it to be noted what exalted conceptions of God prevail already in these narratives. He dwells in heaven (11:5; 19:24), something that has without reason been claimed not to have been the idea entertained in the older period. He is the God of the world, who exercises supremacy over all the nations. He rules with justice, checks pride, avenges injustice, and that, too, not only in a summary manner on whole countries, but in such a way that He takes into consideration every individual and saves the one just man out of the midst of the mass of sinners (18:25; 19). In short, He is already the true God, although yet incompletely and primitively grouped in His attributes.

This God, ruling with omnipotent power in Nature and history, has entered into a special relationship with the tribe of Abraham. He has become the Covenant-God of the patriarch, according to the evidence of the old documentary P (Gen 15:18). We accordingly find here already the consciousness that God who rules over the world has entered into a special relationship with one small nation or tribe. This fact appears also in this, that Abram (Gen 14:18) addressed the highest God of the priest-king Melchizedek (Gen 14:20 ff) as his God, as the founder of heaven and of earth, and identifies Him with his own Covenant-God Jehovah.

(6) Cultus.—As far as the cultus is concerned, it can be stated that at this period it was still of a simple, but solemn and dignified character. The people preferred to worship their God at such places where He had manifested Himself, usually on a high place, on which altar an altar had been erected. There were no images of the Divinity extant. As the word מֵיתִיב, "altar," shows, the sacrifices were usually bloody. Human sacrifice had already in the days of Abraham been overcome by the substitution of an animal, although in olden times it had been practiced, perhaps, as the sacrifice of the firstborn; and in later times, too, through the influence of the example of heathen nations, it may have found its way into Israel now and then. Both larger and smaller animals were sacrificial fowls. Thus the phrase "feeding on the sacrifice in connection with God, too, enjoyed the food which served man as his sustenance, although God, in a finer way, experienced as a pleasure only the scent of the sacrifices, as this ascended in the flame and the smoke (Gen 8:21). But the main thing was the blood as the substrate of the soul. The fruits of the field, esp. the first-fruits, were also offered. Of liquid offerings, it is probable that in primitive times water was often brought, as this was often a costly possession; and in Canaan, oil, which the inhabitants of this country employed extensively in their sacrifices (Jgs 9:9, something that is confirmed also by recent excavations); also wine (Jgs 9:13). As the ancient burnt or whole sacrifices (Gen 8:20) gave expression to reverence, thankfulness, the prayer for protection or the granting of certain favors, the people from the very beginning also instituted sacrificial feasts, which gave expression to the covenant with God, the communion with the Covenant-God. In this act the sacrifice was divided between God and those who sacrificed. The latter ate and drank joyously before God after the parts dedicated to Him had been sacrificed, and esp. after the blood had been poured around the altar. The idea that this was the original form of the sacrifice and that gift-sacrifices were introduced only at a later period when agriculture had been introduced is not confirmed by historical evidences. That man felt himself impelled, by bringing to His God gifts of the best things he possessed, to express his gratitude, was too natural not to have been from the beginning a favorite expression of religious feeling. In connection with the sacrifices the name of God was solemnly called upon. J or P tell us that this name came into use only through Moses.

According to P (Gen 17:10 ff), circumcision was already introduced by Abraham in his tribe as the sign of the covenant. There are good reasons why the introduction of this custom is not like that of so many other ceremonies attributed to Moses. The custom was without doubt of an older origin. From whatever source it may have been derived in its earlier ethnological stage, for the Israelite circumcision is an act of purification and of consecration for connection with the congregation of Jehovah. A special priesthood, however, did not yet exist in this period, as the head of the family and of the tribe exercised the priestly functions (cf Gen 35:1 ff), although the peoples inhabiting Canaan at that time had priests (Gen 14:18).

(1) The covenant-idea.—Israel claims that its existence as a nation and its special relation to Jehovah begins with its exodus from Egypt and with the conclusion of the covenant at Mt. Sinai (cf Am 3:2; 9:7). The covenant with Jehovah Abraham, thus it is through whom God delivered His people from bondage and received them into His covenant (see concerning Moses as a prophet and mediator of the covenant, Israel, History). It is a matter of the highest significance for the religion of Israel that the relation of this people to Jehovah was not one which existed by the nature of things, as was the case with the other oriental tribal and national religions, but that it was the outgrowth of a historical event, the act by which God willed Himself to with them. The conception of a covenant, upon which Jehovah entered as a matter of free choice and will, and to which the people voluntarily gave their assent, is not an idea of later date in the religious history of Israel, which grew out of the prophetic thoughts of the 8th and 7th cents. BC, as has been claimed, but is found, as has been made prominent by Professor Fr. Giesebricht (Die Geschichtlichkeit des Sinaiabendes, 1900), already in the oldest accounts of the conclusion of the covenant (E, J), and must be ascribed to the Mosaic age. This includes the fact, too, that this covenant, which unites Jehovah with Israel, could not be of an indissoluble character, but that the covenant was based on certain conditions. The superficial opinion of the people might often cause them to forget this. But the prophets could, in later times, base their proclamations on this fact. Further, the thought is made very prominent that this covenant imposed ethical duties. While the divinities of other nations, Egypt, Bab, Phoen, demanded primarily that their devotees should erect temples in their honor and should bring them an abundance of sacrifices, in Israel the exalted and distinguished people was foremost. The covenant relation to the God of Israel can legitimately be found only where the relation to one's fellow-man is normal and God-pleasing (Decalogue).

(2) The Covenant-God, Jehovah.—The special revelation which Moses received is characterized... by the word Jehovah (Yahweh) as a name for God. This name, according to the well-authenticated report of Ex 6:3 (P), which is supported also by Ex 3:14 in the same time as the fathers. It does not necessarily mean that nothing had been known of this name. Bab prayers often speak of an "unknown god," and in doing this refer to a god with whom those who prayed had not stood in personal relation. The God of the fathers appeared to Moses, but under a name which was not familiar to the fathers nor was recognized by them. In agreement with this is the fact that only from the time of Moses proper names compounded with some abbreviation of Jehovah, such as Jah, Jehovah, are found, but soon after this they became very common. Accordingly, it would be possible that such names were in scattered cases found also before the days of Moses among the tribes of Israel, and it is not impossible that this name was familiar to other nations. The Midianites esp., who lived originally at Mt. Sinai, have been mentioned in this connection, and also the Kenites (Stade, Budde), some scholars appealing for this claim to the influence according to Ex 15, Jethro had on the institutions of Moses. However, the matters mentioned here refer only to legal procedure (cf vs 14 ff). We nowhere hear that Moses took over the Jehovah-worship from this tribe. On the contrary, Jehovah is already known at this time. This worship Jehovah, the God of Moses, and the common sacrificial meal, according to ver 12, did not take place in the presence of Jehovah, but, accompanying it to the guest, in the presence of Elohim. Then we note that the Kenites, who lived among the Israelites, ever had any special prominence in the service of Jehovah, as was the case, e.g., with the Median Magi, who had charge of the priesthood among the Persians, or with the Etruscans among the Romans, who examined the entrails. Yet the Kenites would necessarily have enjoyed special authority in the Jehovah-cultus, if their tribal God had become the national God of Israel. The only thing that can be cited in favor of an Arabian origin of the name of Jehovah is the Arab word-form, רַבִּית, rabith, for רַבִּית, bedeth. On the other hand, a number of facts indicate that Jacob or Jao as a name for Jehovah was common in Syria, Philistia and Babylonia; cf Joram, son of the king of Hamath (2 S 8:10), and Jaubih, the king of this city, who was regarded as a Jehovah. In addition, the Jehovah names Jahve-Ilu and Jahum-Ilu on inscriptions as early as the times of Hammurabi. But his readings are sharply attacked. However, this may be the name God as proclaimed by Moses was not only something new for Israel, but was also announced by him (possibly also with a new pronunciation, Yahweh instead of Yahu) with a new signification. At any rate, the explanation in Ex 3:14 (E), "If Am that I Am," for doubting which we have no valid reasons, indicates a depth in the conception of God which far surpasses the current conceptions of the Syrian and the Bab pantheon. It would, perhaps, be easier to find analogous thoughts in Egypt speculation, which show that the name Jehovah of God is not the idea of speculative priest, but is a popular God who claims to control all public as well as private life.

(3) Monotheism of Moses.—Attempts have been made to deny the monotheistic character of the God, and some have thought that the term "monolatry" would suffice to express this stage in man's knowledge of God, since the existence of other gods was not denied, but rather was presupposed (cf passages like Ex 15:11), and it was only forbidden to worship any god in addition to Jehovah. However, this distinction is fundamental, and separates, in kind, the religion of Moses from that of the surrounding nations. For among these latter, the worship of more than one divine being at the same time was the general rule. The Egyptians, the Canaanites, the Arameans, and the Babylonians are, like those of the Egyptians, beings that spontaneously increase in number. They are divided into male and female groups of two, while in Hcb there is not even a word extant for goddess, and the idea of a female companion-being to Jehovah is an impossibility. Then, too, it is characteristic of the ethnic god that he is multiplied into many b'atim, and does not feel it as a limitation or restriction when some kindred divinity, Jah, Jehovah, is found, but soon after this they became very common. Accordingly, it would be possible that such names were in scattered cases found also before the days of Moses among the tribes of Israel, and it is not impossible that this name was familiar to other nations. The Midianites esp., who lived originally at Mt. Sinai, have been mentioned in this connection, and also the Kenites (Stade, Budde), some scholars appealing for this claim to the influence according to Ex 15, Jethro had on the institutions of Moses. However, the matters mentioned here refer only to legal procedure (cf vs 14 ff). We nowhere hear that Moses took over the Jehovah-worship from this tribe. On the contrary, Jehovah is already known at this time. This worship Jehovah, the God of Moses, and the common sacrificial meal, according to ver 12, did not take place in the presence of Jehovah, but, accompanying it to the guest, in the presence of Elohim. Then we note that the Kenites, who lived among the Israelites, ever had any special prominence in the service of Jehovah, as was the case, e.g., with the Median Magi, who had charge of the priesthood among the Persians, or with the Etruscans among the Romans, who examined the entrails. Yet the Kenites would necessarily have enjoyed special authority in the Jehovah-cultus, if their tribal God had become the national God of Israel. The only thing that can be cited in favor of an Arabian origin of the name of Jehovah is the Arab word-form, רַבִּית, rabith, for רַבִּית, bedeth. On the other hand, a number of facts indicate that Jacob or Jao as a name for Jehovah was common in Syria, Philistia and Babylonia; cf Joram, son of the king of Hamath (2 S 8:10), and Jaubih, the king of this city, who was regarded as a Jehovah. In addition, the Jehovah names Jahve-Ilu and Jahum-Ilu on inscriptions as early as the times of Hammurabi. But his readings are sharply attacked. However, this may be the name God as proclaimed by Moses was not only something new for Israel, but was also announced by him (possibly also with a new pronunciation, Yahweh instead of Yahu) with a new signification. At any rate, the explanation in Ex 3:14 (E), "If Am that I Am," for doubting which we have no valid reasons, indicates a depth in the conception of God which far surpasses the current conceptions of the Syrian and the Bab pantheon. It would, perhaps, be easier to find analogous thoughts in Egypt speculation, which show that the name Jehovah of God is not the idea of speculative priest, but is a popular God who claims to control all public as well as private life.

(4) Impossibility of representing Jehovah by an image. —The 2d principle which the Mosaic Decalogue establishes is this, Jehovah cannot be represented by any image. In this doctrine, too, there is a conscious contrast to the nations round about Israel (in addition to Ex 20:4, cf Dt 5:8; also Ex 24:17). That in the last-mentioned passage only molten images are forbidden, while those hewn of stone or made of wood might be permitted, is an arbitrary claim, which is already refuted by the fact that the Mosaic sanctuary did not contain any image of Jehovah. The Ark of the Covenant was indeed a visible symbol of the presence of God, but it is a kind of throne of Him who sits enthroned invisibly above the cherubim, as has been shown above, and accordingly does not admit of any representation of God by means of an image. This continued to be the case in connection with the central sanctuary, with the exception of such aberrations as are already found in Ex 32 and which are regarded as a violation of the Covenant, also at the time when the sanctuary was stationed at Shiloh. The fact that at certain local cults Jehovah-images were worshipped is to be attributed to the influence of heathen surroundings (cf on this point J. Robertson, loc. cit., 215 ff).

(5) Ethical character of the God of Moses.—A further attribute of the God of Moses, which exists far above the ethnic divinities of the surrounding peoples, is His ethical character. This appears in the fact that His principles inculcate fundamental ethical duties and His agents are chiefly occupied with the administration of legal justice. Moses himself became the lawgiver of Israel. The spirit of this legislation is deeply ethical. Only we must not forget that Moses cannot have originated these ordinances and laws, and created them as something absolutely new, but that he was compelled to build on the basis of the accepted legal customs of the people. But he purified these legal usages, which he found in use among the people, through the infallible guidance of God, protected as much as possible the poor, the weak, and the female sex, as is shown by a comparison with related Bab laws (CH). Then, too, we must not forget that the people were comparatively uneducated, and esp. that a number of crude classes had found a place in theocracy, with priests ordained to directions in theocratical instruction, and elevated the female sex, as is shown by the system, but is entirely the outcome of Mosaic principles. Most embarrassing for our Christian feeling is the hardness of the Mosarites, whose King Mesha, on his famous monument, 3. The Religion of Israel—especially the cruder tendencies, before the 8th Cent. BC are still too pronounced to endure the great trial of faith demanded by the conquest of the land of Canaan. In the same way, the heroic struggles of Joshua, carried on under the directions of Jeh and resulting in the conquest of the country, were followed by a reaction. The zeal for battle weakened; the work of conquest was left unfinished; the people arranged to make themselves a land, and before it had been won, peace was concluded with the inhabitants. This decay of theocratic zeal and the occupation of the land by the side of and among the Canaanites had a direful influence on the Jeh-religion as it had been taught the people by Moses. The people adopted the sanctuaries of the country as their own, instead of rooting them out entirely. They took part in the festivals of their neighbors and adopted their customs of worship, including those that were repulsive. The local Baals, in whose honor harvest and autumn festivals were celebrated as thanksgiving for their having given the products of the earth, were in many places worshipped by the Israelites. The possibility of integrating the name Baal in both a good and bad sense favored the excuse that in doing this the people were honoring Jeh, whom in olden times they also hesitatingly called their Baal, as their Lord and the master of the land and of the people. By this rule all things in Israel, and Jeh had many other organs or agents besides the priests, esp. the prophets, who not rarely, as the representatives of the sovereign God, sharply opposed themselves to the priests. The theocratical principle, however, was limited to its expression in that public and private life, civil and criminal law, military and political matters were all controlled by religious principles.

(7) The Mosaic cultus.—As a matter of course, Moses also arranged the cultus. He created a holy shrine, the tabernacle, which contained the Ark of the Covenant, and in its general arrangements became the model of the sanctuary or temple built in later times. He appointed sacred seasons, in doing which he connected them with previous customary festival days, but he gave sharper directions concerning the Sabbath and gave to the old festival of spring a new historical significance as the Passover. Moses further appointed for this sanctuary a priestly family, and at the same time ordained that the tribe to which this family belonged should assume the guardianship of the sanctuary. The lines separating the rights of the priests and of the Levites have often been changed since his time, but the fundamental distinctions in this respect to Moses, as regards the priests and Levites, are still in existence. Moses has also, as a matter of course, put the sacred rites, the celebrations of the sacrifices, the religious institutions and ceremonies, into forms suitable to that God whom he proclaimed. This does not mean that all the priestly laws, as they are now found recorded in the Pentateuch, were word for word dictated by him. The priests were empowered to pronounce Töráh, i.e. Divine instruction, on this subject, and did this in accordance with the directions received through Moses. Most of these instructions were at first handed down orally, until they were put into written form in a large collection. But in the priestly ordinances, too, there is no lack of traces to show that these date from the period of Moses and must at an early time have been put into written form. (1) Decay of the name Canaan.—Upon the intense religious feeling produced by the exodus from Egypt and the events at Mt. Sinai, there followed a relapse, in connection with which it appears that in this religious feeling of the people there were still too pronounced tendencies to en-
Mosaic ordinances, and at the same time prepared for a new future by the establishment of colonies of prophets and by the constitution of the kingdom. This latter innovation seemed to be at variance with the principles of a strict theocracy. It is the merit of Samuel that he created the theocratic kingdom, by which the anointed of Jehovah himself was to become an important agent in the government of the ages. It is indeed true that the first king, Saul, did not realize this ideal, but his successor, David, appreciated it all the more. And even if David was far from realizing the ideal of a theocratic king, he nevertheless was able to erect a kingdom which prophecy tried to attain, viz., a king who was personally and most intimately connected with Jehovah, and who, as the servant of Jehovah, was to realize entirely in his own person the mission of the people to become the servants of Jehovah, and was thus to furnish the guarantee for the survival of Jehovah and his people. This universalistic character of the literature, which was the very reason that He rules according to ethical principles, also regards the personal and grants him His special protection and requites to him good or evil according to his conduct, divine, which David originated, give evidence of a more intimate association of the individual with his God.

The very oldtest of these psalms, a number of which point to David as their author, are not liturgical congregational songs that were originally individual prayer-songs, which emanated from personal experiences, but were in later times, employed for congregational use. The prejudice, that only in later times such expressions of personal piety could be expected, is refuted by analogies of a more ancient penitential and petitionary prayer of the Babylonians, in which, as a rule, the wants of the individual and not those of the nation constitute the contents. These Babylonian penitential prayers show that among the Babylonians the feeling of guilt as the cause of misfortune was very vivid, and that they regarded repentance and confession as necessary in order to secure the forgiveness of sins. However, the more exalted character of the Israelitish conception of God appears in the case of David, in this respect, since the Babylonian feels his way in an uncertain manner in order to discover what God or goddess he may have offended, and tries to draw out the sympathy of the one divinity over against the wrath of another. But much more can this difference be seen in this, that the heathen singer is concerned only to get rid of the evil or the misfortune that oppresses him. The communion with his god whose favor he seeks to regain is in itself of no value for him. In David’s case the matter is altogether different, as he knows that he is bound to Jehovah by a covenant of love (Ps 15, 2), and his heart delights in this communion, more than it does in all earthly possessions (Ps 4, 8); and this is even more so in the case of the author of Ps 73 25-26. Such words would, for good reasons, be unthinkably in the case of a Bab psalmist.

In the times of those earliest kings of Israel, which, externally, constituted the most flourishing period in their history, unless tradition is entirely at fault, the spiritual world of thought also was enriched by the Wisdom literature of the Proverbs, the earliest examples of which are (4) Wisdom literature since Solomon. — This hokhamed, or hokham, or prophets, was marked by the peculiarity that it ignores the special providential guidance of Israel and their special relation to their God, and concerns itself more to the general revelation of God in Nature and in the history of mankind, but in doing this regards the past and the present, the inner and the outer, the individual and the general, as of equal importance. It was connected with the religious ideas in his own time, and held the belief in the existence of God, and at the same time has the practical purpose of exhorting to a moral and God-pleasing life. The idea that this cosmopolitan tendency is to be attributed to Dr. Influences, and according-ingly betrays a later period as the time of its origin, is to be rejected, as far as Proverbs and Job are concerned. The many passages in Prov that speak of conduct over against the king as representative of the world, or of the many passages in Job, which attribute the knowledge of the universe to the sages, and which are thus significant in this respect, as the Book of Job shows, in which the Israelite author introduces as speakers of this art from this time of the world, and proves it. We can also compare the superscriptions in Prov 31: 1, in which groups of proverbs as collections and in accordance with this, in which the idea is further developed, which the sages of the world produced, his prover-wisdom, or at any rate cultivated it with special favor, is in itself probable, and is confirmed by the fact that the Queen of Sheba (South Arabia) came to Jerusalem in order to listen to his wisdom. But this also presupposes that in her country a similar class of wisdom was cultivated. This was also the case in Egypt in very early antiquity, and in Egypt the law and the canons of the precepts that remind us of the proverbs of Solomon (cf. Transactions of the Third International Congress of the History of Religions, Oxford, 1908, 1, 288 ff; see WISDOM).

(5) The sanctuary on Mt. Zion. — The kingdom of David and of Solomon not only externally marks the highest development of the history of Israel, but intellectually, too, prepared the soil out of which the religious literature of the nation grew, and which was, in its turn, the basis of the nation’s consolation. It was esp. under David a significant matter, that at this time the higher spiritual powers were in harmony with the political. This found its expression in the Divine election of David and his successor, which was confirmed by the covenant of the Ark of the Covenant at Mt. Zion. In the same way, Solomon, by the erection of the Temple, sought to strengthen and suitably equip this central seat. As a matter of course, the sacred shrines throughout the land did not thereby, at once lose their significance, but the direction of the sanctuary in Jerusalem was not at all intended to establish a “royal chapel” for the king, as Wellhausen has termed this structure, but it claimed the inheritance of the tabernacle in Shiloh, and the prophets sanctioned this development of the sanctuary. The advent of the sanctuary in Jerusalem was not at all intended to establish a “royal chapel” for the king, as Wellhausen has termed this structure, but it claimed the inheritance of the tabernacle in Shiloh, and the prophets sanctioned this development of the sanctuary. The centralized tendency of the preceding reigns were thwarted. Jeroboam erected other sacred shrines; esp. did he make Bethel a “king’s sanctuary” (Am 7 13). At the same time he encouraged religious syncretism. It is true that the god-covered images of heifers (by the prophets, in derision, called “calves”!) were intended only to represent the Covenant-God Jehovah. However, this representation in the form of images, an idea which the king no doubt had brought back with him from his sojourn in Egypt, was a temptation to the corrupt religious instincts in the nation, and gave to the Ephraimitic worship an inferior character in comparison with the service in the Temple in Jerusalem, where no images were to be found. But in other respects, the glory of the sanctuary in Jerusalem, the king in the arrangement of the cultus proved to be a potent factor in the Northern Kingdom from the beginning. The opposition of independent prophets was suppressed with all power. Nevertheless, the prophetic agitation against the rehgious spirit, which the kings themselves could not afford to ignore.

This proved to be the case particularly when the dynasty of Omri, who established a new capital city, Samaria, openly favored the introduction of Phoen idolatry. Ahab’s wife, Jezebel, even succeeded in having a magnificent temple erected in the new capital to her native Baal, and in crushing the worship of the latter faithful to Jeh. It now became a question of life and death, so far as the religion of Jeh was concerned. The struggle involved not only certain old heathen customs in the religion of the maesics, dating back to the occupation of Canaan, but it was the case of an invasion of a foreign and heathen creed, with a clearly defined purpose. His volupitous worship was not at all in harmony with the serious character of the Mosaic religion, and it seriously menaced, in a people naturally inclined to sensuality, the rule of the stringent and energetic queen. The treachery and energetic queen was already certain that she had attained her purpose, when an opponent arose in the person of Elijah, who put all her efforts to naught.

(7) Elijah and Elisha.—In his struggle with the priests of Baal, who deported themselves after the manner of modern devishes, we notice particularly the exalted and dignified conception of God in 1 K 18. While in the chapter of the two prophets, the ideas of Elijah is by no means that these gods have in their own territory the same rights as Jeh in Canaan and Israel. Elijah mocks this Baal because he is no God at all (18 21), and the whole worship of the priests convinces him that they are not serving a real and true God, but only the product of their imagination (18 27). This is monothemism, and certainly not of a kind that has only recently been acquired and been first set up by Eli- jah, but that came down from the days of Moses. Elijah proves himself to be a witness and an advocate of the God of Sinai, who has been betrayed in a treacherous manner. The fact that he inflicts a dire and fateful punishment on the idolatrous Baal (19 19-21) shows clearly that not His external and fearful power, but His calm and deep character was felt by Elijah to be the distinguishing mark of his God. His successor, Elisha, after the storm had cleared the horizon of religious truth, in the performance of his prophetic duties was able again to show forth more emphatically the fatherly care and the helpful, healing love of His God.

In general, the political retrogression of the nation and the opposition of those in power, which the prophets and the faithful worshippers of Jeh in later times were compelled to experience often enough, served greatly to intensify and to spiritualize their religion. The unfortunate situation of the present, and the weaknesses and failures in the actual state of theocracy, directed their eyes to the future. The people began to study the wonderful ways of God in dealing with His people, and they began to look to the end of these dealings. A proof of this is found in the comprehensive accounts contained in the old history of the covenant-people as recorded in the Pentateuchal documents E and J, which were composed during this period. Whether these extend beyond and later than the period of Joshua or not, can remain an open question. In any case, there are extant many written ordinances concerning the times of the Judges, and concerning the history of Samuel, David and Solomon, which in part were written down soon after the events they record, and which, because of their phenomenal impartiality, point to an exceptionally high prophetic watchman from which the ways of God with His people were observed.

(1) The writing prophets.—The spiritual development of the deeper Israelitish religion was the business of the prophets. The prophet of the Sinaitic BC, and probably from the middle of the 9th, we have in written form their utterances and discourses. Larger collections of such prophecies were certainly left by Amos and Hosea. These prophets stood entirely on the basis of the revelations which by Moses had been made the foundation of Israel’s religion. But in contrast to the superficial and mistaken idea of the covenant of Jeh entertained by their contemporaries, these prophets make clear the true intentions of this covenant, and at the same time, through their new inspiration, advance the religious knowledge of the people.

(2) Their opposition to the cultus.—This appears particularly in their rejection of the external and unspiritual cultus of their age. Over against the false worship of God, which thinks to satisfy God by the offering of sacrifices, they proclaim the true worship, which consists in keeping all things in the fulfillment of the duties of the law and of love toward their fellow-men. They denounce as a violation of the covenant not only idolatry, the worship of strange gods, and the heathen symbols and customs which, in the course of time, had crept into the service of Jeh, but they declare also that the religion which is based solely on the offering of sacrifices is worthless, since God, who is in no way dependent on any services rendered by men, does not care for such sacrificial, but is concerned about this, that His commands be observed, and that these consist above all things in righteousness, uprightness in the dealings of man with man, and in mercy on the poor, the weak, the defenceless, who cannot secure justice for themselves. (Cf., e.g., 1 S 15 22; Hos 6 6; Isa 1 11 ff; Jer 7 21 ff, and other passages equally pointed. See on this subject, J. Robertson, Early Religion, etc, 440 f.) Such a transfer of the center of religion from the cultus to human righteousness has no parallel either in other Sem and ancient religions. Yet it is not something absolutely new, but is a principle that has developed out of the foundation laid by Moses, while it is in most pronounced contrast to the complex of many strange religious utterances that condemn the unthinking and the un consecrated cultus must not be misunderstood, as though Isaiah, Jeremiah and others had been modern spiritualists, who rejected all external forms of worship. In this case they would have ceased to be members of their own people and children of their own times. What they absolutely reject is only the false trust put in an opus operatum, i.e., a mechanical performance of religious rites, which had been substituted for the real and heartfelt exercise of religion. Then, too, we are not justified in drawing from passages such as Jer 7 22 the conclusion that at this time there did not yet exist in written form a Mosaic sacrificial code. Such a code is found even in the Book of the Covenant, recognized by critics as an older Pent document (Ex 20-23, 34), and the fact that the Sabbath commandment is found in the Decalogue does not prevent Isaiah from writing what he has penned in 13 14. That at this period, therefore, there were extant many written ordinances by Hos 8 12, and the connection shows that the cultistic ordinances are meant. We must accordingly take the prophet’s method of expression into consideration, which delights in absolute contrasts in cases where we would speak relatively. But this is not intended to weaken the boldness of the prophetical thoughts, which purpose to express sharp opposition to the religious ideas current at that time. For, on the contrary, after the prophecies of the great Oriental crisis, the concept of a personal Divine and living God, i.e., He enters into the life of man. His holiness is exaltation above Nature and the most pronounced antagonism to all things unclean, to sin. Sin is severely dealt with by God, esp., as has already been mentioned, there is no word of love and no mercy to one’s neighbor. Because they are saturated with this conviction of the absolute holiness of God, the preexilic prophets proclaim to their people more than anything else the judgment which shall bring with it the dissolution of both kingdoms and the destruction of Samaria and of Jerusalem, together with its temple. First, its destruction is proclaimed to the Northern Kingdom; later on to the Southern. In doing this, these inspired men testify that Jeh is not removed beyond the sea. He will come. He Himself calls the destroyer to come, since all the nations of the world are at His command.

4. Their Messianic promises.—However, the prophets never conclude purely negatively, but they always see on the horizon some rays of hope, which promise to a “remnant” of the people better times. A “day of Jeh” is coming, when He will make His final settlement with the nations, after they have carried out His judgment. His people, namely, the exiles, the people of the destruction of the gentile world, He will establish His rule over the world. This fundamental thought, which appears again and again with constantly increasing clearness, is often the form that a future king out of the house of David, in whom the idea of the “anointed of Jeh” has been perfectly realized, will first establish in Judah-Israel a pure rule of God, and then also gain the supremacy of the world. Some critics have claimed that all of these Messianic and eschatological predictions derive from the post-exilic period. In recent years a reaction against this view has set in, based on the belief that in Egypt and Babylonia also similar expectations are found at an early period. These promises, which are clearly examinable, are found to be so intimately connected with the other prophecies of Isaiah, Hosea, and others, that to separate them would be an act of violence. In their most magnificent character, these pictures of the future are found in Isa., while in Jer. their realization and spiritualization have progressed farther.

5. Reformation.—While the prophets are characterized by higher religious ideas and ideals, the religion of the masses was still strongly honey-combed with the elements of heathendom. Yet there were not totally wanting among the common people those who listened to these prophetic teachers. And esp. in Judaea there were times when, favored by pious kings, this stricter and purer party obtained the upper hand. This was particularly the case under the kings Jehoshaphat, Hezekiah, and Josiah. During the reigns of these kings the cultus was reformed. Hezekiah and Josiah attacked particularly the local sanctuaries and the personal and private sacrifices, and concentrated the sacrificial cultus in Jerus. In doing this they were guided by the faithful priests and prophets and by the ancient Mosaic directions. Josiah, who, more thoroughly than others, fought against the disintegration of the Jeh-strain, found his help in the newly discovered Book of the Law (Deut.) That the sacrifices should be made at one place as we saw, an old Mosaic arrangement. However, Moses had foreseen that local altars would be erected at places where special revelations had been given (Ex. 20:24-25). In this way the numerous altars at Bethel, on Carmel, and elsewhere could claim a certain justification, only they were not entitled to the same rank as the central sanctuary, where the Ark of the Covenant stood. And where the sons of Aaron performed their priestly functions. Dr. demands more stringently that all real sacrificial acts shall be transferred to this central point. This rule Josiah carried out strictly. The suppression of the current sacrifices on the high places, the fall of Northern Kingdom aided in effecting the collapse of such shrines, while the sanctuary in Jerus. because it was delivered from the attack of the Assyrians, won a still greater recognition.

6. Destruction of Jerusalem.—However, immediately after the death of Josiah, the apostasy from Jeh again set in. The people thought that they had been deserted by Him, and they now more than before sought refuge in an appeal to a mixture of gods derived from Babylonia, Egypt, Persia and elsewhere. Ezek 8 and 9 describe this temple which made itself felt even in the temple-house in Jerus. The people were incapable of being made better and were ripe for destruction. The temple, too, which it was thought by many could not be taken, was doomed to be destroyed from its very foundations.

1. Spiritual purification through the Exile.—A mighty change in the religion of Israel was occasioned by the deportation to Babylon and the better educated Jews Babylonian Exile to Babylon and their sojourn there for a period of about 50 years, and by the still longer stay of a large portion of the exiles in this country. The nation was thus cut off from the roots of the native heathendom in Pal and also from the external organization of the theocracy. This brought about a purification and a spiritualization, which proved to be a great benefit for later times, when the political manifestation of their religious life had ceased, and the personal element came more into the foreground. Jeremiah and Ezekiel emphasize, each in his own way, the value of this religious life for the individual. A spiritual communion came into being, or, during the Exile, Ezekiel found its bond of union in the world of Jeh, and which insisted on serving God without a temple and external sacrificial cultus (which, however, was still found among the exiles in Egypt). Separated from their homes, they collected all the more diligently the sacred memories and traditions, to which Ezekiel’s plans for the temple belonged. Their sacred literature, the Torah or Law, the prophetic books, the historical writings, the Ps. and other literature were collected, and in this way preparations were made for the following period.

2. Relations to the gentile world.—The most earnest classes of Jews, at least, absolutely declined to have anything to do with the Bab religion and worship. They saw here the worship of images in its most repulsive and sensual forms, and they also learned its absolute impotency when the haughty Chaldaean empire was overthrown. Deutero-Isaiah (es 40-46) shows that the Israelites now become more conscious than ever of the great value of their own religion, the Nation, and its Creator of heaven and earth over against this variegated Pantheon of changeable gods in forms of wood and metal images. From this time on, the glory of the Creator of the universe and His revelation in the works of Nature were raised and met with a more and more emphatically than ever before. This same prophet, however, proclaims also the new fact of the mission-calling of Israel among the nations of the world. This people, he declares, is to become the instrument of Jeh to make the Gentiles His spiritual subjects. But as this people in its present condition is little fit for this great service, he sees with his prophetic eye a perfect 'Servant of Jeh,' who carries out this mission, a personal, visible 'Servant of Jeh,' who establishes the rule of God upon earth, by becoming, in the first place, for Israel a second Moses and Joshua, but who then, too, wins over the heathen nations by this message. He accordingly takes the place of the prophetic Son of David. However, He is not a personal ruler, but carries out His work through mere spiritual power and in lowliness and weakness. Indeed, His suffering and death become the atonement to wipe out the guilt of His people (Isa 53). We can see in this further development of the deepening and spiritualization of the eschatological hopes how strongly the unaccustomed misfortunes and surroundings of the exiles had influenced them. Notwithstanding all their antagonism to the aberrations of the heathen world, which were made use of against them by the Gentiles there was also some receptivity for the higher truths. The worshippers of Jeh felt themselves more akin to the Persians than to the Babylonians, as the former served without images a god whose name was Jehovah. This was conceived as an eternal divine being. Thought from Persia as are also found in the later literature of Israel, although it is not the case that the idea of Satan was first taken from this source. The doctrine of the resurrected Christ and the demand for the forgiveness also can be gained from OT premises. However, the religion of the Babylonians was not without influence on that of the Jews. It is indeed out of the question that it was only during the Exile that the Jews took over the accounts of Creation and the Deluge and others similar to the Bab, as these are found in Gen 1-11. But the development of the angelology shows the evidences of later Bab and Pers influences. As a rule, dogmatics play a more important role in post-exilic times than ever before, particularly about the beginnings of the Christian era. Magic art, too, entered largely into the faith of later Judaism, and it can be shown that both of these are connected with:

(1) Life under the law. — The people which returned from the Exile was a purified congregation of Jeh, willing to serve Him. They aimed to reestablish the theocracy. They failed in their undertaking, because the Religion of the loss of the political independence of the people, the same importance as formerly, but the religious cultus and the religious life of the people were all the more stringently observed. The post-exilic period was characterized by religious legalism. The people were exceedingly zealous in observing the old ordinances, and tried to find righteousness in the correctness with which the Mosaic law was observed, as this was now deemed by the teachers of the law, the Exekiel, had taken the lead in this particular, and had laid great emphasis on the formal ordinances, although in connection with this he also insisted upon real moral earnestness. But it was an easy matter that in the course of time an external work-righteousness and petrification of true religion should arise. Yet the later prophets, Haggai, Zechariah and Malachi, even if they do ascribe a greater importance to external matters than the preexile prophets did, show that they were the spiritual successors of the prophetic line. They teach a healthy ethical and sanctifying type of practical religion and continue to proclaim the hopes for an expansion and spiritualization of the Kingdom of God. The leaders of these times, Zerubin the apocryphal work known as “Wisd of Solomon,” in which we find a positive defence of wisdom as the principle of revelation over against the Epicurean world-wisdom of Hellenism. In doing this, the book makes use of Platonism and Stoicism and of the dhikmaq, or wisdom of the old Jewish lit., has been Hellenized. Philo goes still farther in adapting Judaism to Gr taste and to humanism. A more liberal conception of inspiration also appears in the reception of contemporaneous literary products into the OT Canon, even of some books which had originally been written in the Gr language. The means observed in adapting national Hebraism to Hellenistic universalism was the allegorical method of interpretation, which Philo practised exquis-itively and which then passed over to the Christian church Fathers of the Alexandrian school. This school constitutes the opposite extreme to the rabbinical, which clung most tenaciously to the letter of the sacred text.

(6) Apocalyptic literature.—A unique phenomenon at the close of the Bib. and in the earliest post-Bib.
period is, finally, the APOCALYTIC LITERATURE (q.v.). Since the days of the Maccabees we find the custom in certain Jewish circles, of using the old prophetic books and adapting them to the events of the times, of drawing up a systematic picture of the future. The authorship of these writings was usually attributed to one of the ancient saints, e.g. to Enoch, or Abraham, or Moses, or Elijah, or Jeremiah, or Baruch, or Ezra, or others. The model of these Apocalypses is the Book of Dn, which, on the basis of older visions, in the times of the oppression by Antiochus Epiphanes, pictures, in grand simplicity, the development of the history of the world down to the final triumph of the Kingdom of God over the kingdoms of the world.

III. Conclusion.—When we consider this whole development, it cannot be denied that the religion of Israel passed through many changes. It grew and purified and spiritualized itself out of its own inherent strength; but it also suffered many relapses, when hindering and corrupting influence gained the upper hand. But it received from without not only degenerating influences, but also what that developed its growth. Its original and native strength also shows itself in this, that without losing its real character it was able to appropriate to itself elements of truth from without and assimilate these.

The specific and unique character of this religion was, by which it was distinguished from all other religions of antiquity, and by reason of which it alone was capable of producing from itself the highest revelation in Christ, it must be answered that its uniqueness lies, most of all, in its conception of God and of Divine things, and of God’s relation to the world. The term “monotheism” but inadequately expresses this peculiarity; for monistic tendencies are found also in other nations, and in Israel monothetic often shows itself in a strongly corrupted form. The advantage of Israel lies in its close contact with the living God. From the beginning of Israel’s history, a strictly personal God gave testimony of Himself to different personalities with a decision which demanded absolute submission; and, in addition, this was a holy God, who elevated mankind above Nature and above themselves, a God who stood in the most absolute contrast to all that was impure and unrighteous. At the same time there was wonderful in His grace and His mercy to the sinner. This direct revelation of God to specially chosen bearers of the Divine truth goes through the entire history of Israel. Through this factor this religion was being constantly purified and unfolded further. The Israelites learned to conceive God in a more spiritual, correct, and universal manner, the more they advanced in experience and culture. But this God did not thereby become a mere abstract being, but retained in himself the personal qualities of so many nations. He always continued to be a living

God who takes an active part in the lives of men. We need notice only those prophets who describe the greatness of God in the grandest way, such as Hosea, Isaiy, and Isaiah, who depict the personal life of God in the boldest way through anthropomorphisms.

In agreement with this, too, we find that this religion demands the personal subjection of men to God. As was the case with all the

2. Relation of religions of antiquity, that of the OT, of Man to

This God a national religion than one of the individual. This brought with it the demand for the external observance of tribal customs in the name of religion. However, the traditional customs and legal ordinances had already been sitted and purified by Moses. And, as a matter of necessity, in a religion of such a pronounced personal character, every individual of the people must become more and more a matter of importance. This idea became deeper and more spiritual in the course of time and developed into a pure love for God. It did not prevent this religion from becoming profoundly accepting of God,

but when the doctrines and the cults were most correctly observed. But the vital kernels found embedded in the revelation of God constantly proved their power of rejuvenation. And at that very time when the world down to the final triumph of the Kingdom of God over the kingdoms of the world.

LITERATURE.—Of the lit. on the religion of Israel we may yet make particular mention of the following:

1. THE LIVING AND

2. ISRAELITE, iš-rə-el-ht. ISRAELITISH, iš-rə-el-itish: Belonging to the tribes of Israel (q.v.).

3. ISSACHAR, iš-sō’kər (יִשָּׂאָר), yissä’ə₁(kəh)'

LXX, Σωτήρ, Ἰσσαχάρ, Tisch. Issachar, so also in the NT, Treg. and WH):

(1) The 9th son of Jacob, the 5th born to him by Leah (Gen 30:17 f). His birth is in this passage connected with the strange story of Reuben and his mandrakes, and the name is apparently conceived as derived from "iš-sākah, "a hired workman." There is a play upon the name in Gen 49 15, "He bowed his shoulder to hard work, and his neck to the taskwork." Wellhausen (Text der Bücher. Sam., 95) thinks that the second element of the name may denote a deity; and Sokar, an Egyptian god, has been suggested. The name in that case would mean "worshipper of Sokar." Practically nothing is preserved of the personal history of this patriarch beyond his share in the common actions of the sons of Jacob. Four sons were born to him before Jacob's family removed to Egypt (Gen 46 13). When his land was divided by lot at Sinai the tribe numbered 54,000 men of war over 20 years of age (Nu 1 29). At the end of the wanderings the numbers had grown to

2. The Tribe David, the Chronicler puts the figures at 87,000 (1 Ch 7 5). See Numbers.

The place of Issachar in the desert-march was with the standard of the tribe of Judah (along with Zebulun) on the E. side of the tabernacle (Nu 2 5), this group forming the van of the host (10 14 f). The rabbis say that this standard was of 3 colors, sardine, topaz and carbuncle, on which were inscribed the names of the 3 tribes, bearing the figure of a lion's whelp (Tg. pseudo. Jon. on Nu 2 3). The domain of the tribe was Nethanel ben Zuar (Nu 1 8, etc). Later this place was held by Igal ben-Joseph, the tribal representative among the spies (Nu 13 7). The prince chosen from Issachar to assist in the division of the land was Palliel ben-Anna (34 20). The position that the Mosaic law assigns to Issachar (3 13) is at the strange ceremony near Shechem was on Mt. Gerizim, "to bless the people" (Dt 27 12).

Sixteen cities of Issachar are mentioned in Josh 19 17 ff, but the only indications of boundaries are the townships of Tirzah in the N. and Jordan in the E.

3. The Tribal Territory Zebulun and Naphtali (19 13 ff); on the W. with Manasseh and possibly Asher (17 10); and on the S. with Manasseh (ver 11). It does not seem to have had any point of contact with the sea. The portion of Issachar, therefore, included the plain of Esdraelon, Tabor, the hill of Moreh, and the slopes E. to the Jordan. The frontier along the S. edge of the plain was held by Manasseh. Tola, a man of Issachar, held Shamir, a stronghold in Mt. Ephraim (Jgs 10 1). To Manasseh was given Beth-shean with her "towns" (Josh 17 11). No reliable line can be drawn for the S. border. The district thus indicated was small; but it embraced some of the most fruitful land in Pal. By the very riches of the soil Issachar was tempted. "He saw a resting-place that it was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and he bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant under taskwork" (Gen 49 15). The "mountain" in Dt 33 19 may possibly be Tabor, on which, most likely, there was an ancient sanctuary and place of pilgrimage. This would certainly be associated with a market, in which Issachar and Zebulun, the adjoining tribes, would be able to enrich themselves by trade with the pilgrims from afar. Issachar took part in the battle with Sisera (Jgs 4 15). To Israel Issachar gave one judge, Tola (Jgs 10 1), and two kings, Baasha and his son (1 K 15 26, etc).

Of the 200 "heads" of the men of Issachar who came to David at Hebron it is said that they were "men that had understanding of the time, to know how to interpret the periods of the sun and moon, the intercalation of months, the dates of solemn feasts, and could interpret the signs of the times. A company from Issachar came to celebrate the Passover when it was restored by Hezekiah (2 Ch 30 18). Issachar has a portion assigned to him in Ezekiel's ideal division of the land (48 25); and he appears also in the list in Rev (7 7).

(2) A Korahite doorkeeper, the 7th son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 8).

ISHSHAH, i.sh'-sh'a (יִשְׁשָּׁה), yishshiyah, "Jeh exerts"; AV Ishiah:

(1) Mentioned among David's heroes, a great-grandson of Tola (1 Ch 7 9).
(2) Mentioned among the men who came to David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12 6; AV "Jesiah").
(3) A member of the priesthood of the house of Rehabiah (1 Ch 24 21; AV "Jesiah").
(4) Another Levitical priest of the house of Uziel (1 Ch 26 20; 24 25).

ISHSHIJAH, ish-sh'-ja (יִשְׁשִּׁיָּה), yishshiyah, "Jeh lends"; AV Ishiah:

A man of the household of Harim, named among those who, at Ezra's command, were induced to put away their "strange wives" (Ezr 10 31). Also called "Ascas" (1 Esd 9 32).

ISSUE, ish'th (םֶשָׁה, ἁναμίκτης; לָיְנָה, מַשָּׂה, מַשָּׂה, Σωτήρ, ιεσπρόσβος, θυγατέρα); When used as a description of a bodily affection the word signifies: (1) A discharge, the consequence of uncleanness and sin (Lev 15 2 ff; Nu 5 2). As such it was one of the judgments which were to afflict the family of Joab (2 S 3 29); (2) a hemorrhage, either natural (Lev 12 7, where the word used is mēgōr, lit. a "fountain"); or the consequence of disease (Mt 9 20; Mk 5 25; Lk 8 43).

ISSUES, ish'tz (םֶשֶׁת, ἄνοδος, πατήρ), lit. "outgoings": (1) Ways of escape (Ps 68 20 AV); (2) free moral choices (Prov 4 23).

ISTALCURUS, i-stal-kur's (Ἰσταλκούρος, La-talko-roos); 1 Esd 5 40, corresponding to Zabbud in Ezr 8 14. In Swete's text the name is istalkalos.

ITALIAN, i-tal'y-an, BAND. See Band.

ITALY, it'a-di (Italikia, Italia): At first confined as a name to the extreme southern part of the Italian peninsula in the region now called Calabria, whence its application was gradually extended. In Gr usage of the 5th cent. BC, the name was applied to the coast as far as Metapontum and Paestum, being synonymous with Oenotria. The Oenotrians are represented as having assumed the name of Italians (Itali) from a legendary ruler Italus (Dionysius, i.12.35; Vergil, Aen. i.533). The extension of Rom authority seems to have given this name an ever-widening application, since it was used to designate their allies generally. As early as the time of Polybius the name Italy was sometimes employed as an appellation for all the country between the two seas (Tyrrenian and Adriatic) and from the foot of the Alps to the Sicilian Straits (Polyb. 3.9.50; 5.27.10; 8.5.23; 9.5.32; 10.1.16; 11.9.5), although Ctesiaspine Gaul was not placed on a footing of complete equality with the peninsula as regards administration until shortly after the death of Julius Caesar. From the time of Augustus the term was used in practically its modern sense (Nissen, Italische Landeskunde, I, 57-57).

The name Italy occurs 31 times in the NT: Acts 18 2, Aquila "lately come from Italy," because of the expulsion of the Jews from Rome under Claudius; Acts 27 4, the decision that Paul be sent to Italy; He 13 24, separation from those of "Italy." The adj. form is found in the appellation, "Italian band" (cohors Italica, Acts 10 1).

The history of ancient Italy, in so far as it falls within the scope of the present work, is treated under Rome (q.v.).

ITCH (אָית), הָיאִז, יָאָס, יִפְקָד, יָפָרָה: Only in Dt 28 27, where it probably refers to the parasitic skin disease of that name which is very common in Pal. It is due to a small mite, Sarcoptes scabiei, which makes burrows in the skin and sometimes causes extensive crusts or scabs, attended with a severe itching. It is very easily communicated from person to person by contact, and can be cured only by destruction of the parasite. This disease disqualified its victims for the priesthood (Lev 21 20).

ITHAMAR, יִתְחַמָּר, יִתְחָמָר, "land" or "island of palms"; Gesenius; or "father of Tamar," הַיָּאָב, being perhaps for הַיָּאָב, "abbey": Cook in EB—though both derivations are uncertain: The 4th son of Aaron (Ex 6 23; 28 1; 1 Ch 6 3), Eleazar being the 3d, Nadab and Abihu the 1st and 2d. While Nadab and Abihu were prematurely cut off for offering strange fire before the Lord (Lev 10 1-2; Nu 3 4; 26 61), and Eleazar was appointed chief of the tribe of Levi (Ex 6 23) and high priest (Ex 38 1), Ithamar was made the treasurer of the offerings for the Tabernacle (Ex 38 21), and superintendent of the Gershonites and Merarites in the service of the Tabernacle (Nu 4 28-33). In the time of Eli the high-priest of that name to be in his family, but how, and whether before Eli's day or first in Eli's person, is not told and need not be conjectured. W. R. Smith in EB (art. "Ell"), on the strength of 1 S 2 27-28, holds that the priesthood was originally in Eli's line; but the words "the house of thy father" do not necessarily mean only the house of Ithamar, but may, and most probably do, refer to Aaron and his descendants, of whom Ithamar was one. Nor does the cutting off of Eli's family from the priesthood and the setting in their place of "a faithful priest," who should do everything according to Jeh's will and walk before Jeh's anointed forever, find its complete fulfilment in the deposition of Abiathar or Ahimelech, his son, and the installation of Zadok in the time of Solomon (1 K 2 28; 1 Ch 26 21; see ZADOK). A descendent of Ithamar, Daniel by name, is mentioned among the exiles who returned from Babylon (Ezr 8 2).

ITHIEL, יִתְחַּיל, יִתְחָל, יִתְחָל, "God is":

(1) A son of Jeshua of the tribe of Benjamin, mentioned among the inhabitants of Jerus in Nehe miah's day (Neh 11 7).

(2) The name is perhaps also found in the oracle of Agur (Prov 30 1). See ITHIEL AND UCAL.

ITHIEL AND UCAL (יִתְחַּיל יִתְכָּל), "'ith'él ve'ukhālı̂l": Names of the two men to whom Agur the son of Jakeh spoke his words (Prov 30 1). The purport of introducing these persons is strange and obscure; the margin proposes therefore, by the use of a different pointing, to read the verse, "The man said, I have wearied myself, O God, I have wearied myself, O God, and am consumed," thus doing away with the proper names; a reading which does not correspond not inaptly with the ten preceding verses. See AGUR; PROVERBS, BOOK OF, II, 6.

ITHLAH, יִתְחָלוֹה, יִתְחָלָה; AV Jethlah: An unidentified town in the territory of Dan, named with Abijalon and Elon (Josh 19 42).

ITHMAH, יִתְחָמֶה, יִתְחָמָה, "priesty": A citizen of the country of the Moabites, David's deadly enemies, yet mentioned as one of the king's heroes (1 Ch 11 46).

ITHNAN, יִתְחָנָן, יִתְחָנָן: A town in the S. of Judah mentioned along with Hazor and Ziph (Josh 18 23), apparently the "Ethan" of Jerome (Onom 118 13). Not identified.

ITHRA, יִתְחָר, יִתְחָר, "abundance":

(1) A descendant of Seir the Horite, son of Dishon (Gen 36 26; 1 Ch 1 41).

(2) One of the sons of Zophah of the tribe of Asher (1 Ch 7 37).

ITHREAM, יִתְחְרָם, יִתְחָרָם, "resi- dence of the people"?): The 6th son born to David at Hebron. His mother's name was Eglah (2 S 3 5; 1 Ch 3 3).

ITHRITE, יִתְחַרִיט, יִתְחַרֵית, "excellence," "preeminence": A family in Israel, whose home was Kirath-jearim (1 Ch 2 53). Among the 87 heroes of David, two are mentioned who belonged to this family, Ira and Gareb (2 S 23 38; 1 Ch 11 40).

ITHTAH-KAZIN, יִתְתָּה-קָזִין, יִתְתָּה-קָזִין, "'ith'āh kāzin": Josh 19 13 AV for Eth-kazin. Ittah is correctly Eth with Hē locale, meaning "toward Eth."

ITTAL, יִתְחָה, יִתְחָה, יִתְחָה, יִתְחָה: (1) A Gittite or native of Eth, one of David's chief captains and most faithful friends during the rebellion of Absalom (2 S 15 11-22; 18 2-4.12). The narrative reveals David's chivalrous and self-sacrificing loyalty on the part of Ittai. He seems to have but recently left his native city and joined David's army through personal attachment to the king. David rapidly promoted him. Hearing of Absalom's rebellion and approach to Jerusalem, he flees with David. The latter remonstrates, urges him to go back and join Absalom, as he is a foreigner and in exile. His interests are in the capital and with the king; there is no reason why he should be a fugitive and perhaps suffer the loss of everything; it would be better for him, with his band of men, to put himself and them at the service of Abalon, the new king. "Mercy and truth be with thee," says David in his midst. David was double, absolutely refuses to go back, but will stand by David until the last. Remonstrance being useless, the monarch orders him across the river, double glad that he had such a doughty warrior and faithful friend by his side. On muster ing his hosts to meet Abalon, David makes Itai a chief captain with the intrepid Joab and Abishal. He doubtless did part in the battle, and is nothing more is said of him it is possible that he fell in the fight. (2) A Benjamite, one of David’s 30 mighty men (2 S 23 29; 1 Ch 11 31, “Itai”).

ĪTURAEA, i-tū′rē-ə (Trōpaula, Iturana). The term occurs only once in Scripture, in the definition of Philip’s territory: “the Ituratae koī Trachonitidos chōrēs, which AV renders: of Iturana and of the region of Trachonitis, and RV: “the region of Iturana and Trachonitis” (Lk 3 1). Sir W. M. Ramsay has given reasons for the belief that this word was certainly never used as a noun by any writer before the time of Eusebius (Ezōpos, 1594, IX, 51 ff, 143 ff, 298 ff). It must be taken as an adjectival, indicating the country occupied by the Ituraeans. The descent of the Ituraeans must probably be traced to Jetur, son of Ishmael (Gen 25 16), whose progeny were clearly numbered among the Arabian nomads. According to the Ituraeans Eupelemus (c 150 BC), quoted by Eusebius (Præp. Evang. IX, 30), they were associated with the Nabataeans, Moabites and Ammonites against whom David warred on the E. of the Jordan. They are often mentioned by Lat writers; their skill in archery seems greatly to have impressed the Romans. They were skilful archers (Caesar, Bell. Afr. 20); a lawless (Strabo, xvi 2 10) and predatory people (Cicero, Philipp. II,112). In the Lat inscriptions Ituran soldiers have Syrian names (IHP, I, ii, 326). They would therefore be the most northerly of the confederates opposed to David (supra), and their country may occasionally be sought in the neighborhood of Mt. Hermon. There is nothing to show when they moved from the desert to this district. Aristeobulus made war against the Ituraeans, compelled many of them to be circumcised, and added a great part of their territory to Judea, 140 BC (Ant, XIII, xi, 3). Dio Cassius calls Lysaniæ “king of the Ituræans” (xlix 32), and from him Zenodorus leased land which included Uthasa and Paneas, 25 BC. The capital of Lysaniæ was Chálca, and he ruled over the land from Damascus to the sea. Jos speaks of Soemus as a tetrarch in Lebanon (Vita, 11); while Tacitus calls him governor of the Ituræans (Ann. xii, 23). The country of Zenodorus, lying between Trachonitis and Galilee, and including Paneas and Uthasa, Augustus bestowed on Herod, 20 BC (Ant, XV, x, 3). In defining the tetrarchy of Philip, Jos names Batanea, Trachonitis and Auranitis, but says nothing of the Ituræans (Ant, XVII, vi, 4; BJ, ii, xxvii). The names and Uthasa and Uthasa must be included, and this may have been Ituran territory (IHP, I, ii, 333). It seems probable, therefore, that the Ituræans dwelt mainly in the mountains, and in the broad valley of Coele-Syria; but they may have also occupied the district to the S.E. of Hermon, the modern Jīdār. It is not possible to define more closely the Ituran country; indeed it is not clear whether St. Luke intended to indicate two separate parts of the dominion of Philip, or used names which to some extent overlapped.

It has been suggested that the name Jētār may be derived from the Heb יֶתָר, yēṭār, and so be equivalent to Ituræa. But the derivation is impossible.

1 K 10 18; 22 39; 2 Ch 9 17; Ps 46 8; Cant 5 14; 7 4; Ezek 27 6 15; Am 3 15; 6 4; [2] ṢNN, shenhabbim; IXX δόντες ὡπάντων, ὠβάντων, ὁδόντα ἐφανθίνων, “elephants’ teeth” (1 K 10 22; 2 Ch 9 21); [3] ἐφαντίνως, ἐφανθίνως, “of ivory” (Rev 18 12); Shēn occurs often, meaning “tooth” of man or beast. In the passages cited it is tr in EV “ivory” (cf “crag,” 1 S 14 4 5; “chill.” Job 39 28 bis; “flesh-book of three teeth,” 1 S 2 13). Shenhabbim is thought to be a contracted form of shen hit ‘ibbim, 1 c 67, the art., and ‘ibbim, pl. of ‘ibbâh or ‘ibbâ; 2 Edf abu, “elephant,” and of Lat ebur, “ivory” (see Liddell and Scott, s.v. ἔβρας). On the other hand, it may be a question whether bim is not a native form connected with the Arab Ŧl, “elephant.” If the word for “elephant” is not contained in shenhabbim, it occurs nowhere in the Heb Bible.

Ivory was probably obtained, as now, mainly from the African elephant. It was rare and expensive. It is mentioned in connection with the magnificence of Solomon (1 K 10 18 23), being brought by the ships of Tarshish (2 Ch 9 21). An “ivory house” of Ahab is mentioned in 1 K 22 39. It is mentioned among the luxuries of Israel in the denunciations of Amos (3 15; 6 4). It occurs in the figurative language of Ps 45 8; Cant 5 14; 7 4. It is used for ornamentation of the ships of the Tyrians (Ezek 27 6), who obtain it with ebony through the men of Dedan (viii 4), which men are among the merchandise of Babylon (Rev 18 12).

We do not learn of the use of elephants in war until a few centuries before the Christian era. In 1 Mac 6 8, there is a reference to the defeat of Antiochus the Great, “having an hundred and twenty elephants” by Scipio Africanus in 190 BC. 1 Mac 1 17 speaks of the invasion of Egypt by Antiochus Epiphanes with an army in which there were elephants. 1 Mac 6 28 47 has a detailed account of a battle between Antiochus Eupator and Judas Maccabaeus at Bethsura (Beth-zur). There were 32 elephants. Upon the “beasts” (ἔθρα, thērâ) there were “strong towers of wood”; “There were also upon every one two and thirty strong men, that fought upon them, beside the Indian that ruled him.”

In Job 40 15, AVhm has for “behemoth,” “the elephant, as some think.” ALFRED ELY DAY

IVORY, TOWER OF (יוֹבֹא וַרְיָה, miqḥād hašōn): In Cant 7 4 the neck of Shulammite is compared in whiteness and stateliness to a (or the) tower of ivory. The def. art. may suggest that the comparison is with some actual tower in or near Jerusalem; but more probably the language is simply a figure.

IVVAH, i′vāh. See IVYAH.
apparently due to a misreading: The name is wanting in the MT and LXX of Isa 36 19.

Ivah was a city apparently conquered by the Assyrians, and is mentioned by them, in the vs quoted, with Hamath and Arpad, Sepharvaim and Hiphtah. It has been assimilated with the Avva of 2 K 17 24 as one of the places whence Sargon brought captives to Samaria, and identified with Hit on the Euphrates, between Anah and Rama-dieh, but this seems improbable, as is also the suggestion that it is Ptolemais, the modern Tmim, between Antioch and Aleppo. Hommel (Expos T. April, 1898, 330) upholds the view that Hena and Ivah, or, as he prefers to read, Avvah, are not places at all, but the names of the two chief gods of Hamath, Arpad and Sepharvaim. This would be consistent with 2 K 18 34; but 19 13: "Where is the king . . . of Sepharvaim, of Hena, and Ivahv?" and 17 31, where the gods of Sepharvaim are stated to be Adrammelech and Atnamelech, raise serious difficulties. In all probability, the identification of Ivah depends upon the correct localization of the twofold Sepharvaim, of which Hena and Ivah may have been the names. The identification of Sepharvaim with the Bab Sip(par)ar is now practically abandoned. See SEPHERVAIM.

IVY, i'vi (κοσσῆς, κισσός): The only mention of the word in all the sacred writings is in 2 Macc 6 7 in connection with the oppression of the Jews by Antiochus Epiphanes: "On the day of the king's birth every month they were brought by bitter constraint to eat of the sacrifices; and when the feast of Bacchus (Dionysus) was kept, the Jews were compelled to go in procession to Dionysus, carrying ivy," this plant (Hedera helix) being sacred to the god Dionysus as the symbol of the culture of the vine (cf Eur. Bacchae, passim). It was of ivy or of pine that the "corruptible crown" of the famous Isthmian games was made (1 Cor 9 25).

IYAR, i'yar'. See IYAR.

IYE-ABARIM, i-yē-əb′a-rim (יוֹדֵי הַעֲבָרִים, יִיֶּהָ הַעֲבָרִים), "the heaps of the Abarim"; AV Iye-abarim; in Nu 51 11 LXX reads B, Ἰσραήλ, Chalget): A place in the journeys of Israel named after Oboth, said to be "in the wilderness which is before Moab, toward the sunrise" (Nu 21 11), "in the border of Moab" (33 44). The inscription given here are not sufficient to guide to any identification, and, so far, nothing has been discovered in the district to help us. Called simply "Iym" (AV "Tim") in Nu 33 45.

IYIM, i'yim (יוֹיֶם, יִיָם, "heaps"—the form of which, יֵמָו, יִיָּם, is the constr.): (1) A short form of the name Iye-abarim (Nu 33 45).

(2) A town in the territory of Judah (Josh 15 29; EV wrongly "Tim"). It lay in the extreme S., "toward the border of Edom." It is not identified.

IYAR, i'yar' (יוֹדֵי, יִיָּד; יֵיָד, יִיָּד): The 2d month of the Jewish year, corresponding to May. It is not mentioned in the Bible. See CALENDAR.

IZEHAR, i'zhē-hār, i'zhē-hār (Nu 3 19 AV). See IZAR.

IZEHAR, i'zhē-hār (יהֶשֶׁר), "the shining one": (1) The father of Korah (Nu 16 1), descended from a Kohathite Levite of this name, whose descendants formed a family, in the tribe of Levi (Ex 6 18; Nu 3 19; 1 Ch 6 18-28). (2) A descendant of Judah, whose mother's name was Helah. ARV gives the name Zohar (1 Ch 4 7).

IZEHARITES, i'zhē-hār-its (יהֶשֶׁר), yishēḥâr): The descendants of Izhar, son of Kohath, and grandson of Levi (Nu 3 19-27). In David's reign some of these were "over the treasures of the house of Jeh" (1 Ch 26 23), others "for the outward business over Israel, for officers and judges" (ib. ver 29).

IZLIAH, i'zhē-la (זֶלְיוֹה, yizlē'āh, "Jeh delivers"); AV JEZLIAH: A son of Elpaal, of the tribe of Benjamin (1 Ch 8 18).

IZRAHIAH, i'zra-hēa' (יהֹיָה, yisrahōēh, "Jeh appears, or shines"): (1) A descendant of Issachar, grandson of Tola, only son of Uzzi (1 Ch 7 3). (2) The leader of the singing at the purification of the people, on the occasion of Nehemiah's restoration; here rendered "Jearahiah" (Neh 12 12).

IZRAHITE, i'zra-hīt (יהֹיָה, yizrahē, "rising, shining"): Shamhuth, the captain of the 5th monthly course (1 Ch 27 8), is called an "Izrahite." The name may be derived from the town or family of Izrah, but more likely is a corruption of the word "Zerahite," descendant of Zerah of Judah.

IZRI, i'zē-ri (יהֹיָה, yereē, "creator", "former"): A man of the sons of Jeduthun, leader of the fourth band of musicians, who served in the sanctuary (1 Ch 25 11). Identical with Zeri (ver 3).

IZZIAH, i'zē-ia (יהֹיָה, yissēyahā, "Jeh unites"); AV Jeziyah: One of the faithful Jews who put away their foreign wives. He belonged to the family of Parosh (Ezr 10 25; 1 Esd 9 26, "Iddias").

JAANAI, ja'a-nāi: See BEEROTH-BENE-JAANAIN.

JAANAIN, ja'a-nāi: AV for JANAI (q.v.).

JAAR, ja'a-ār (יָּרָא, ya'ar, "forest" or "wood"): Is only once taken as a proper name (Ps 132 6 RVm), "We found it in the field of Jaar." It may be a shortened form of the name Kiriah-jezem, where the ark had rested 20 years. See KIRIATH-JEZREH.

JAARE-OREGIM, ja'a-ār-ō'rē-gim, -ōre-gim (יָּרָא-רֶּגֶים, ya'ārē rē'gīm): In 2 S 21 10, given as the name of a Bethelenean father of Ethanah, who is said to have slain Goliath the Gittite (cf
JAARESHIAH, ja'ar-ē-sha'a (יהָרְשַׁיָּה), ya'dresh-yath, meaning unknown: In 1 Ch 8 27, a Benjaminite, son of Jeroham. AV has "Jaareshiah."

JAASAI, ja-a'sil. JAASAU, ja-a'so. See JASSU.

JAAAS, ja-a'sh (בָּש, ya'dasä, meaning uncertain): In 1 Ch 11 47, a Mezobite, one of the "mighty men of the armies," and probably the "Jassiel" of 1 Ch 27 21, "the son of Abner," and a Benjaminite tribal prince of David's. AV "Jasiel."

JAASAI, ja'as-a-sh (בר, ya'daša, meaning uncertain): JAASAU (RVm and Kt'rh, בַּש, ya'daša), and JAASAU (AV): In Ear 10 37, one of those who had married foreign wives. LXX τὰς the consonantal text as a vb, κατ εποίησαν, "and they did." 1 Esd 9 34 has "Elasis."

JAAZANIAH, ja-az-a-nil (גָּזְנִי, ya'dzan-yahu, in 2 K 25 23; Ezek 8 11; גָּזְנִית, ya'dzan-yah, in Jer 36 3; Ezek 11 1, "Jeh hears"): (1) In 2 K 25 23, "son of the Maccathite," and one of the Judaean "captains of the forces" who joined Gedaliah, the puppet governor appointed by Nebuchadrezzar over Judah, at Mizpah. He is the "Jezaniah" of Jer 40 8; 42 1. Though not mentioned by name, he was presumably one of those captains who joined Johanan in his attack on Ishmael after the latter had slain Gedaliah (Jer 41 11-13). He is also the same as Azariah of Jer 43 2, a name read by LXX B in 42 1 also. Jer 43 5 relates how Johanan and his allies, Jaazaniah (= Azariah) among them, left Judah with the remnant, and took up their abode in Egypt. (2) In Jer 35 3, son of Jeremiah (not the prophet), and a chief of the Rechabite clan, from whose "staunch adherence to the precepts of their ancestors" Jeremiah "points a lesson for his own countrymen" (Driver, Jer 215). (3) In Ezek 8 11, son of Shaphan, and one of the seventy men of the elders of Israel whom Ezekiel saw in a vision of Jerusalem offering incense to idols. (4) In Ezek 11 1, son of Azur, and one of the 25 men whom Ezekiel saw in his vision of Jerus, at the E. door of the Lord's house, and against whose iniquity he was commanded to prophesy (11 13-15). JAAZER, ja'a-zèr (גָּזְר, ya'dzer). See JAZER.

JAAZIAH, ja-a-zil (גָּזַי, ya'dziyahu, "Jeh strengthens"): In 1 Ch 24 26 27, a Levite, "son of Merari. But the MT is corrupt. LXX B reads 'Oteb (Οτέβ), which some take to suggest Uziel (cf 27 25); see Curtis, Crit. and Exeget. Comm. on the Books of Ch, 274-75; Kittel, ad loc.

JAIZIEL, ja-a'zi-el (גָּזִי-ל, ya'dzi'el, "God strengthens"): In 1 Ch 16 18, a Levite, one of the musicians appointed to play upon instruments at the time of David. Kittel and Curtis, following LXX 'Oteb (Οτέβ), read "Uziel," the name they adopt for Azriel in ver 20, and for Jeziel in 16 5.

JABAL, ja'bal (גַּבַּל, yabbâl, meaning uncertain): In Gen 4 20, a son of Lamech by Adah. He is called 'the father of those who dwell in tents and who keep sheep.' (Gen 35 22). He is the "king of Bashan," which in Phoen and Heb "means primarily 'ram,' then 'ram's horn' as a musical instrument, and finally joyous music" (in the designation of the year of Jubilee). See also Skinner, Gen, 103, on the supposed connection in meaning with Abel. DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JABBOK, jab'ok (גָּב֖וֹק, yabbôk, "luxuriant river"): A stream in Eastern Pal first named in the history of Jacob, as crossed by the patriarch, "of blue," referring to the clear blue color of the water. It rises near to A'mmân—Rabbâth Ammon—and makes a wide circuit, flowing first to the E., then to the N.W., until it is joined by the stream from Wâdy Jerash, at which point it turns westward, and flows, with many windings, to the Jordan, the confluence being just N. of ed-Dâmîyeh. It drains a wider area than any other stream E. of the Jordan, except the Yarmûk. The bed of the river is in a deep gorge with steep, and in many places precipitous, banks. It is a great defile, cutting the sand of Gilead in two. It is lined along its course by a luxuriant growth of oleander which, in season, lights up the valley with brilliant color. The length of the stream, taking no account of its innumerable windings, is about 90 miles. The mouth of the river has changed its position from time to time. In the lower reaches the vegetation is tropical. The river is fordable at many points, save when in full flood. The particular ford referred to in Gen 32 cannot now be identified. W. EWING

JABESH, ja'bes (גַּבְש, yabhâsh): A short form of JABESH-GILEAD (q.v.).

JABESH-GILEAD, ja'beš-gil'e-ad (גַּבְשֶׁ-גִּלְאָד, yabhâsh gîl'âd; or simply גַּבְש, yabhâsh, "dry"): A city E. of the Jordan, in the deliverance of which from Nahash the Ammonite Saul's military prowess was first displayed (1 S 11 1 f.). At an earlier time the inhabitants failed to share with their brethren in taking vengeance upon Benjamin. This laxity was terribly punished, only 400 virgins being spared alive, who afterward became wives to the Benjaminites (Jgs 21). The gratitude of the inhabitants to Saul was affectingy proved after the disaster to that monarch on Gilboa (1 S 31). David, hearing of their deed, sent an approving message, and sought to win their loyalty to himself (2 S 2 4 ff). Robinson (BR, III, 39) thought it might be represented by a post, about 6 miles from Pella (Fākīl), on the southern bank of Wādy Yābīs. The distance from Pella agrees with the statement of Onom (s.v.). Others (Olyphant, Land of Gilead, 277; Merrill, East of Jordan, 430, etc.) would identify it with the ruins of Meramme, about 3 miles S.E. of Pella, on the N. of Wādy Yābīs. The site remains in doubt; but the ancient name still lingers in that of the valley, the stream from which enters the Jordan fully 9 miles S.E. of Beisīkīn.

Jabez, jabez (יָבֶז), yaḇēz, "sorrow" ([height]):

1. Place: An unidentified town probably in the territory of Judah, occupied by scribes (1 Ch 2 55). For an ingenious reconstruction of the passage see EB, s.v.

2. Person: The head of a family of Judah, noted for his "honorable" character, though "his mother bare him with sorrow" (1 Ch 4 9 10), yaḇēz being interpreted as if it stood for yaḇē'ēh, "he causes pain." The same phrase upon words recurs in his prayer, "that it be not to my sorrow!" His request was granted, "and the sorrow implied by his omission name was averted by prayer" (Dummelow, in loc.).

Jabin, jabin (יָבִין), yāḇīn, "one who is intelligent," "discerning." The word may have been a hereditary royal title among the northern Canaanites. Cf. the familiar usage of parōḵ meleḵ miṣrāyim: (1) "The king of Hazor," the leading city in Northern Pal, who led an alliance against Joshua. He was defeated at the waters of Merom, his city was taken and he was slain (Josh 11 1 9).

(2) "The king of Canaan, that reigned [or had reigned] in Hazor." It is not clear whether he dwelt in Hazor or Harosheth, the home of Sisera, the captain of his host at the time of the story narrated in Jgs. He oppressed Israel in the days preceding the victory of Deborah and Barak. To the Israelites he must have been but a shadowy figure, as he was by his powerful captain, Sisera, for the song makes no mention of him and there is nothing to indicate that he even took part in the battle that freed Israel (Jgs 4 2 7 17 23 24 bis; Ps 83 9 10).

Jabeel, jaḇe'ēl, Jabeel, jaḇe'ēl, yāḇē'ēl, "God is builder"); LXX Λαβης, Labēn, Swete reads Lemēn, Apoc Παβηα, Iamēna, Παβηα, Iamēna:

1. A town on the northern border of the land assigned to Judah, near the western sea, mentioned in connection with Ekron (Josh 15 11). The place is now represented by the modern village of Yebna which stands upon a hill a little to the S. of the Naher Rubin, about 12 or 13 miles S. of Jaffa, on the road from there to Askelon, and about 4 miles from the sea. It had a port, now called Mina Rubin, a short distance S. of the mouth of the river, some remains of which still exist. Its harbor was superior to that of Jaffa (PEFS, 1875, 167 88). Its exact site is not clear, and it is usually identified with the site of Japhi, as it occurs in the passage mentioned, but it appears under the form "Japhi" (יָפִה, yaphi) in 2 Ch 26 6, as is evident from the mention of Gath and Ashdod in connection with it. LXX reads Παβη (Pamēn, Jabēn) where the Heb reads יָפִה (yaphi), "even unto the sea," in Josh 15 40, where Ekron and Ashdod and other cities and villages are mentioned as belonging to Judah's inheritance. Jos (Ant, V, i, 22) assigns it to the tribe of Dan. We have no mention of its being captured by Joshua or occupied by Judah until the reign of Uzziah who captured it and plundered its walls in his war upon the Philis (2 Ch 26 6).

The position of J. was strong and was the scene of many contests, both in the period of the monarchy and that of the Maccabees. It is mentioned frequently in the account of the wars of the latter with the Syrians. It was garrisoned by the Seleucid kings, and served as a base for raiding the territory of Judah. When Judas Maccabaeus defeated Gorgias and the Syrians he pursued them to the plains of J., but did not take the fortress (1 Macc 4 13). Gorgias was there attacked by the Jewish generals Joseph and Azarias, contrary to Judas' orders, who were repulsed with loss (6 56 60; Jos, Ant, XII, viii, 6).

Apollonius occupied it for King Demetrios (1 Mac 10 60); and Cendebeus for Antiochus, and from there harassed the Jews (15 40). Judas burned the port and navy of J. (2 Macc 12 8 9). It was taken by Simon in 142 BC (Jos, Ant, XIII, vi, 7; BJ, I, ii, 2), together with Gazara and Joppa, but was restored to its inhabitants by Ptolemy in 62 BC (Ant, XIV, iv, 4), and was rebuilt by Gabinus in 57 BC (BJ, I, viii, 4). It was restored to the Jews by Augustus in 30 AD. Herod gave it to his sister Salome and she bequeathed it to Julia, the wife of Augustus (Ant, XVIII, 2; BJ, II, ix, 1).

The town and region were prosperous in Roman times, and when Jesus was besieged by Titus the Sanhedrin removed to J., and it afterwards became the seat of a great rabbinical school (Milman, Hist Jews, 1, 411 12), but was suppressed in the persecution under Hadrian. Antonius allowed it to be revived, but it was again suppressed because of hostile language on the part of the rabbis (ib, 451 52). The Crusaders built there the castle of Belin, supposing it to be the site of Gath. It was occupied by the Saracens, and various inscriptions in Arab. of the 13th and 14th cents. have been found there (SWP, II, 441 42).

2. A town of Naphtali mentioned in Josh 19 33, and supposed to be the southern Iemma, S.W. of the sea of Galilee (SWP, I, 365). It is the Kefr Yama of the Talma.

Jachin, jaḵîn (יַחֵיָן), yaḵîn, "to establish":

1. The 4th son of Simeon (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 12). In 1 Ch 4 24 his name is given as "Jarib" (cf AVm, RVm). "Jachin," the patronymic of the family, occurs in Nu 26 12.

2. Head of the 21st course of priests in the time of David (1 Ch 24 17). It is used as a family name in 1 Ch 9 10, and as such also in Neh 11 10, where some of the course are included in the list of those who, having returned from Babylon, willingly accepted the decision of the lot, and abandoned their rural retreats to become citizens and guardians of Jerusalem (vs 1 f).

Jachin, jaḵîn, and Boaz (יַחֵיָן, yaḵîn, "he shall establish"); זַבָּא, ḏô'az, "in it is strength," 1 K 7 15 22; 2 K 25 16 17; 2 Ch 3 15 17; Jer 52 17): These were the names of the two bronze pillars that stood before the temple of Solomon. They were not used in supporting the building; their appearance, therefore, must have been solely due to moral and symbolic reasons. What their true meaning is it not easy to say. The pillars were not altar pillars with hearths at their top, as supposed by W. R. Smith (Religion of the Semites, 191, 468); rather they were "pillars of witness," as was the pillar that witnessed the contract between Jacob and Laban (Gen 31:52). A difficulty arises about the height of the pillars. The writers in K and Jer affirm that the pillars before the porch were 18 cubits high apiece (1 K 7:15; Jer 52:21), while the Chronicler states that they were 55 cubits (2 Ch 3:15). Various methods have been suggested of reconciling this discrepancy, but it is more probable that there is a corruption in the Chronicler's number. On the construction of the pillars and their capitals, see Temple. At the final capture of Jerusalem they were broken up and the metal of which they were composed was sent to Babylon (2 K 25:13. 16). In Ezekiel's ideal temple the two pillars are represented by pillars of wood (40:49).

JACKAL, jak'ol: (1) אֶתֶּבֶן, tannim, "jackals," AV "dragons;" cf לִחְוֹת, fallān, Arab., לַחוֹת, tannān, Arab. לִחְוֹת, tannān, "sea monster" or "monster," ERV "dragon" (Job 7:12 m; Ps 74:13; 142:7; Isa 27:1; 51:9; Jer 51:34), "serpent," (Ex 9:10.12; Dt 32:33; Ps 91:13), AV "whale" (Gen 1:21; Job 12:7); but יָנָן, tannān, "jackals," AV "sea monsters" (Lam 4:3), "jackal's well," AV "dragon well" (Neh 2:13), and tannān, "monster," AV and ERY "dragon" (Ezk 29:3; 32:2).
(2) יִשְׂנֵּה, tīsim, "wolves," AV "wild beasts of the islands;" cf א, t, pl. יִשְׂנֵה, tīsim, "island;" also אֶתֶּבֶן, fallān, "a cry," איה, איו, "to cry," "to howl!" Arab. عَوْى, "toow;" "to bark" (of dogs, wolves, or jackals); אֶבֶן אֶזְרָא, "thee drya", colloquially בָּיְאָב, "jackal."
(3) יִשְׂנֵּה, tīsim, "wild beasts of the desert."
(4) אָוָּה, othim, "doeful creatures."

"Jackals" occurs as a tr of tannim, AV "dragons," in Ps 44:19; 85:4; 89:19; Lanka 12:22; 34:13; 35:7; 43:20; Jer 9:11; 10:22; 14:6; 49:33; 51:37; of the fem. pl. form tannōh in Mal 1:3, and of tannin in Neh 2:13 and Lam 4:3. Tannin is variously referred to a root meaning "to howl," and to a root meaning "to stretch out," trop. "to run swiftly, i.e. with outstretched neck and limb extended" (Ges.). Either derivation would suit "wolf" equally as well as "jackal." The expression in Jer 10:22, "to make the cities of Judah a desolation, a dwelling-place of jackals," seems, however, less appropriate of jackals. The same is true of Isa 34:13; Jer 9:11; 49:33, and 51:37.

The jackal (from Pers shagdāh), Canis aureus, is found about the Mediterranean except in Western Europe. It ranges southward to Abyssinia, and eastward in Southern Asia, to farther India. It is smaller than a large dog, has a moderately bushy tail, and is reddish brown with dark shadings above. It is cowardly and nocturnal. Like the fox, it is destructive to poultry, grapes, and vegetables, but is less fastidious and readily devours the remains of others' feasts. Jackals generally go about in small companies. Their peculiar howl may frequently be heard in the evening and at any time in the night. It begins with a high-pitched, long-drawn-out cry.

This is repeated two or three times, each time in a higher key than before. Finally there are several short, loud, yelping barks. Often when one raises the cry others join in. Jackals are not infrequently confounded with foxes. They breed freely with dogs.

While tannim is the only word tr. "jackal" in EV, the words תִּשְׂנֵּים, tīsim, and אוֹתִים, othim, deserve attention. They, as well as tannim, evidently refer to wild creatures inhabiting desert places, but it is difficult to say for what animal each of the words stands. All four (together with בִּרְוֹד יָאָה, and צְרִים) are found in Isa 13:21,22: "But wild beasts of the desert (tīsim) shall lie there; and their houses shall be full of doeful creatures (othim); and ostriches (bīnūth yā’ānāh) shall dwell there, and wild goats (tsīrim) shall dance there. And wolves (tīsim) shall cry in their castles, and jackals (tannim) in the pleasant palaces."

In AV tīsim (Isa 13:23: 34:14; Jer 50:39) is tr. "wild beasts of the islands" (cf tīsim, "island.") AV has merely the transliteration tīsim, RV "wolves," RVm "howling creatures." Gesenius suggests the jackal, which is certainly a howler. While the wolf has a blood-curling howl, it is much more rarely heard than the jackal.

כָּנָּה (Ps 72:9; 74:14; Isa 13:21; 23:13; 34:14; Jer 50:39), has been considered akin to כָּנָה, "howling" (cf אֶשָּׁמַה, "a dry land" (Ps 63:1), and is tr. in RV as follows: Ps 72:9, "that they dwell in the wilderness;" 74:14, "the people inhabiting the wilderness;" Isa 23:13, "them that dwell in the wilderness." RVm "the beasts of the wilderness;" Isa 34:13, "wild beasts of the desert." There would be some difficulty in referring כָּנָה in Ps 72:9 to beasts rather than men, but that is not the case in Ps 74:14 and Isa 23:13. "Wild cats" have been suggested.

It is not impossible that tannim and tīsim may be different names of the jackals. tīsim, כָּנָה, and tannin occur together also in Isa 34:13,14, and כָּנָּה and tīsim in Jer 50:39. Their similarity in sound may have much to do with their collocation. The recognized word for "wolf," כָּנָה (cf Arab. dhibb), occurs 7 t in the OT. See DRAGON; WOLF; ZOOLOGY.

ALFRED ELY DAY

JACKAL'S WELL (תֶּבֶן), in ha-tannim: LXX has τὴν κάτα, τὸν κάτα, δὶς τὸν κάτα, "fountain of the figs;" AV "dragon well." A well or spring in the valley of Hinnom between the "Gate of the Gai" and the Dung Gate (Neh 2:13). No such source exists in the Wady or Rabbi (see HINNOM) today, although it is very probable that a well sunk to the rock in the lower parts of this valley was of old a certain amount of water trickling down the valley-bottom. G. A. Smith suggests (Jerus, I, ch iv) that this source may have arisen as the result of an earthquake, hence the name "dragon," and have subsequently disappeared; but it is at least as likely that it received its name from the jackals which haunted this valley, as the parish dogs do to this day the dead bodies which were thrown there. See HINNOM; JACKAL.

JACOB, jâ'kûb:

I. NAME

1. Form and Distribution
2. Etymology and Associations

II. Etymology

The connection where Etymology undoubtedly (d) the word was received by the Jews is uncertain. From the Syriac the Arabic word ٨٩٢٩٩٩٩ is derived. The root (a) above. Hence there is no ground to deny that even in the patriarchal period this name (like Jacob) was in current use among the Semites, and that the name Jacob lay ready at hand—a name ready made, as it were, for this child, in view of the peculiar circumstances of its birth; we may say that the parents felt they could escape the use of it. (A parallel case, perhaps, is Gen 38:25-30, Zerah; cf. Zerahiah.) The association of the root in everyday use in Jacob's family to mean "to supplant" led to the fresh realization of its appropriate application to his character when he grew (b) above. This construction does not interfere with the connection between the patriarch Jacob and the "Jacob-els" referred to above (under 1. [b]), should that connection on other grounds appear probable. Such a longer form was perhaps for every "Jacob" an alternative form of his name, and under certain circumstances may have been used by or of even the patriarch Jacob.

1. Name

The variations of the name "Jacob" are in the plural impf. 3rd asc masc. sing. Like some 50 other Heb. names of this same root, it has no subject for the vb. distribution is varied. But there are a number of independent indications that Jacob belongs to that large class of names consisting of 3 words with suffixing (so Divine name or title (in this case [e]) as the subject, from which the common abbreviated form is derived by omitting the middle word (a) in Ish documents of the period of the Patriarchs, there occur such personal names as Jacob-beli, Jacob-apis, Jacob-beliba (the former two abbreviations of the latter), and Aq-bi-hu (cf. Aq-bi-hu, according to Hilprecht a synecdochal form of A-qbi-ili, all of which may be associated with the same root ٨٩٢٩٩٩٩.

Jacob as appears in Jacob (see H. Ranken, Early Bab. Personal Names, 1905, with annotations by Professor Hilprecht as editor, esp. pp. 67, 113, 98 and 4). (b) In the list of places in Pal conquered by the Pharaoh Thutmose III appears a certain J'qôb, which in Egyptian characters represents the Sem letters ٨٩١٩٩٩٩، ٨٩١٩٩٩، and which therefore seems to show that in the earlier half of the 18th cent. BC (so Petrie, Elam) it was a name of a place (not a tribe; see W. M. Müller, Assyrische und Europa, 163 ff) in Central Pal that bore a name in some way connected with "Jacob." Moreover, aPharaoh of the Hyksos period bears a name that looks like ٨٩١٩٩٩٩٩ (so Philistia). (c) In the Jewish tractate Pir'âbabbîh, II.1, we read of a Jew named "Akebêbêh, which is a name composed of the root ٨٩٢٩٩٩٩ and the word "Am" or "man," in common abbreviated form. It should be noted that the personal names ٨٩٢٩٩٩٩٩٩, Aq-bi-hu and Ya'qib-hu (accent on penult) also occur in the OT, the former borne by no less than 4 different persons; also that in the Palmyrene inscriptions we find a name person ٨٩١٩٩٩٩٩, a name in which this same root ٨٩١٩٩٩٩ is preceded by the name of the god 'Atê, just as in 'Akebêbêh is followed by the name 'Atê.

The distribution and distribution of the name, it remains to inquire: What do we know of its etymology other than what were the associations it conveyed to the Heb ear?

2. ETYMOLOGY

The vb. in all its usages is capable of deduction, by simple association of ideas, from the noun "heal." "To heal" might be "to take hold of by the heel," (so probably Hos 12:8; cf Gen 37:26) (6) "to follow with evil intent," "to supplant," or in general "to deceive," (Gen 37:2) (c) "to follow," (Jer 3:4) (d) "to take," (so in the parallel, "to go about with slanders," is interesting because the word so far is akin to the noun "heal," as "supplant" is to "heal"); (e) "to follow with good intent," whether as a slave (of our Eng. "to heel," of a dog) for service, or as a guest (so Ethic.), "to keep guard over," and thus "to restrain," (so Job 37:4) (d) "to take," (so in the parallel, "to take the place of another") (so Arab., and the Heb noun ٨٩١٩٩٩٩, ٨٩١٩٩٩, "consequence," "recompense," whether of reward or punishment?

We are thus given four significations, which most commends itself as the original intent in the use of this vb. to form a proper name? The answer to this question depends upon the degree of strength with which the Divine name was felt to be the subject of the vb. As Jacob—ei., the complete interpretation of the use of the vb. by Baethgen urges (Beitrag zur sem. Religionsgeschichte, 461), "God rewarded" (id.), "God hath given," etc. But we have already seen that centuries before the time when Jacob is said to have been born, this name was shortened by his father Isaac from "Isaac's slave," to "Jacob." But as the name Jacob lay ready at hand—a name ready made, as it were, for this child, in view of the peculiar circumstances of its birth; we may say that the parents felt they could escape the use of it. (A parallel case, perhaps, is Gen 38:25-30, Zerah; cf. Zerahiah.) The association of the root in everyday use in Jacob's family to mean "to supplant" led to the fresh realization of its appropriate application to his character when he grew older. This construction does not interfere with the connection between the patriarch Jacob and the "Jacob-els" referred to above (under 1. [b]), should that connection on other grounds appear probable. Such a longer form was perhaps for every "Jacob" an alternative form of his name, and under certain circumstances may have been used by or of even the patriarch Jacob.

II. PLACE IN THE PATRIARCHAL SUCCESSION.—In the dynasty of the "heirs of the promise," Jacob takes his place, first, as the ancestor of the race of Isaac. In Isaac's life the most significant event was the birth of Isaac and the notification of his blessing. The blessing was doubtless the work of the divine agent, or of Jacob's own father. It was probably the promise of the exportation of the house of Jacob to Egypt, as a kingdom among kings, and the assurance of the divine favor towards his name. It is not, however, the idea which is here to be considered, but the words of the promise, which are given in the book of Genesis, chapter ii. 12, "and Abraham and his household were in Canaan; and Jacob and Esau were natives of Canaan in the second generation, yet had not a drop of Canaanitish blood in their veins. Their birth was delayed till 20 years after the marriage of their parents. Esau's barrenness had certainly the same effect, and probably the same purpose, as that of Sarah: it drove Isaac to Divine aid, demanded of him his assumption of the title of "faith and patience," through which they "inherited the promises" (He 6 12), and made the children of this pair also the evident gift of God's grace, so that Isaac was the better able "by faith" to "bless Jacob and Esau even concerning things to come" (He 11 21). These twin brothers therefore share thus far the same relation to their parents and to what their parents transmit to them. But here the likeness ceases. "Being not yet born, neither having received any thing of Esau, good or bad, that the purpose of God according to election might stand, not of works, but of him that calleth, it was said unto Rebecca, The elder shall serve the younger" (Rom 9 11 12). In the Gen-narrative, without any doctrinal assertions either adduced to explain it, or deduced from it, the fact is nevertheless made clear as it is in Mal or Rom, that Esau is rejected, and Jacob is chosen as a link in the chain of inheritance that receives and transmits the promise.

With Jacob the last person is reached whose own generation, thus sums up in a single individual "the seed" of promise. He becomes the father of 12 sons, who are the progenitors of the tribes of the 12 people "peculiar people." It is for this reason that this people bears his name, and not that of his father Isaac or that of his grandfather Abraham. The "children of Israel," the "house of Jacob," are the totality of the seed of the promise, the children of Isaac. Ishmaelites equally with Israelites boast of descent from Abraham. But the twelve tribes that called themselves "Israel" were all descendants of Jacob, and were the only de scentants of Jacob on the agnate principle of family-constitution.
III. Biography.—The life of a wanderer (Dt 26 5 RV) such as Jacob was, may often be best divided into four geographical periods. Jacob's career falls into the four distinct periods: that of his residence with Isaac in Canaan, that of his residence with Laban in Aram, that of his independent life in Canaan, and that of his migration to Egypt.

Jacob's birth was remarkable in respect of (a) its delay for 20 years as noted above, (b) that condition of his mother which led to the Divine oracle concerning his future greatness, and (c) the unusual phenomenon that gave him his name: "he holds by the heel" (see above, 1, 2). Unlike his twin brother, Jacob seems to have been free from any physical peculiarities; his smoothness (Gen 27 11) is only predicated of him in contrast to Esau's hairiness.

These brothers, as they developed, grew apart in tastes and habits. Jacob, like his father in his quiet manner of life and (for that reason perhaps) his companionship and favor of his mother, found early the opportunity to obtain Esau's sworn renunciation of his right of primogeniture, by taking advantage of his habits, his impulsiveness and his fundamental indifference to the higher things of the spirit (see ch. 25). This was not until long afterward that the companion-scene to this first "supplanting" (27 36) was enacted. Both sons meanwhile are to be thought of simply as members of Isaac's following, during all that period of his successive sojourns in Gera and in the Valley of Gerar and Beersheba (ch 26). Within this period, when the brothers were 40 years of age, occurred Esau's marriage with two Hittite women. Jacob, remembering his own mother's origin, bid his time to find a wife who should be the mother of his children. The question whether she should be brought to him, as Rebekah was to Isaac, or he should go to find her, was settled at last by a family feud that only his absence could heal.

This feud was occasioned by the fraud that Jacob at Rebekah's behest practised upon his father and brother, when these two were minded to nullify the clearly revealed purpose of the oracle (25 23) and the sanctions of a solemn oath (26 33). Isaac's partiality toward his elder son, brought home to him that this was not his mother's wish. The trick was directly planned by the wife, who had learned to be eyes and ears for a husband's failing senses, detected the secret scheme, counter-plotted with as much skill as unscrupulousness, and while she obtained the paternal blessing for her favorite son, fell nevertheless under the painful necessity of choosing between losing him through his brother's revenge or losing him by absence from home. She chose, of course, the latter alternative, and herself brought about Jacob's departure, by pleading to Isaac the necessity for obtaining a wife as Jacob's wife of a sort different from the Canaanitish women that Esau had married. Thus ends the first portion of Jacob's life.

It is no young man that sets out thus to escape a brother's vengeances, and perhaps to find a wife at length among his mother's kindred.

2. To Aram It was long before this that Esau at and back the age of forty had married the Hittite women (cf 26 34 with 27 40). Yet to one who had high-dignate to his father, indulged by his mother, in awe of a brother's physical superiority, and "dwelling in tents, a quiet [domestic] man" (25 27), this journey of 500 or 600 miles, with no one to guide, counsel or defend, was as new an experience as if he had really been the stripping that he is sometimes said to have been. All the chapters in life awaited him: self-determination, love, marriage, fatherhood, domestic provision and administration, adjustment of his relations with men, and above all a personal and independent religious experience.

Of these things, all were to come to him in the 20 years of absence from Canaan, and the last was to come first; for the dream of Jacob at Beth-el was of course but the opening scene in the long drama of God's direct agency with Jacob. Yet it was the self-determinative scene, for God in His latest and fullest manifestation to Jacob was just "the God of Beth-el" (35 7; 48 3; 49 24).

With the arrival at Haran came love at once, though not for 7 years the consummation of that love. Its strength is naively indicated by the writer in two ways: impliedly in the sudden output of physical power at the well-side (29 10), and expressly in the patient years of toll for Rachel's sake, which "seemed unto him but a few days for the love he had to her" (29 20). Jacob is not primarily to be blamed for the polygamy, which brought struggle into his home-life and sowed the seeds of division and jealousy in the nation of the future.

Although his name was not named up in the rivalry of Leah and Rachel—Judah and Joseph—yet it was not Jacob's choice but Laban's fraud that introduced this cause of schism. At the end of his 7 years' labor Jacob received as wife not Rachel but Leah, and he rejoiced that he had purchased Rachel's name: "the younger daughter before the elder was not the custom of the country. This was the first of the "ten times" that Laban "changed the wages" of Jacob (31 7-41). Rachel became Jacob's wife 7 years later, and married him for 7 other years. During these 7 years were born most of the sons and daughters (37 35) that formed the actual family, the nucleus of that large caravan that Jacob took back with him to Canaan. Dinah is the only daughter named; 30 21 is obviously in preparation for the story of ch 34 (see esp. 34 31).

Four sons of Leah were the oldest: Reuben, with the right of primogeniture, Simeon, Levi and Judah. Next came the 4 sons of Bilhah and Zilpah, the daughter personal slaves of Leah (29 30-33). The sons of Rachel and Leah numbered 14 (33 2; 44 19); the two pairs of sons were probably of about the same age (of order in ch 49). Leah's 5th and 6th sons were separated by an interval of uncertain length from her older group. And Joseph, the youngest son born in Haran, was Rachel's first child, equally beloved by his mother, and by his father for her sake (33 2; cf 44 20), as well as because he was the youngest of the eleven (37 3).

Jacob's years of service for his wives were followed by 6 years of service rendered for a stipulated wage. Laban's cunning in limiting the amount of this wage in a variety of ways was matched by Jacob's cunning in devising means to overreach his uncle, so that the penniless wanderer of 20 years before becomes the wealthy proprietor of countless cattle and of the hosts of slaves necessary for their care (32 10). At the same time the apology of Jacob for his conduct during this entire period of residence in Haran is spirited (31 30-42); it is apparently unanswerable by Laban (ver 49); and it is confirmed, both by the evident concurrence of Leah and Rachel (vs 14-16), and by indications in the narrative that the justice (not merely the partiality) of God gave to each party his due recompense: to Jacob the high returns of spiritual, physical, and national advantage; to Laban rebuke and warning (vs 5-13, 24, 29, 42).

The manner of Jacob's departure from Haran was determined by the strained relations between his uncle and himself. His motive in going, however, is represented as being fundamentally the desire to terminate an absence from his father's company that had continued for 20 years (Gen 28: 12).—A desire which in fact presented itself to him in the form of a revelation of God's own purpose and command (31: 3). Unhappily, his clear record was stained by the act of another than himself, who nevertheless, as a member of his family, entailed thus upon him the burden of responsibility. Rachel, like Laban her father, was devoted to the superstition that manifested itself in the keeping and consulting of teraphim, a custom which, whether more nearly practised by the Canaanite or ancestor, worship, was felt to be incompatible with the worship of the one true God. (Note that the "teraphim" of 31: 19, 34: 1 are the same as the "gods" of vs 30: 32 and, apparently, of 25: 4.) This theft furnished Laban with a pretext for pursuit. What he meant to do he probably knew but imperfectly himself. Coercion of some sort he would doubtless have brought to bear upon Jacob and his caravan, had he not recognized in a dream the God whom Jacob worshipped, and heard Him utter a word of warning against the use of violence. Laban failed to find his stolen gods, for his daughter was as crafty and ready-witted as he. The whole adventure ended in a formal reconciliation, with the usual sacrificial and messengers (35: 5–5).

After Laban, Esau. One danger is no sooner escaped than a worse threatens. Yet between them lies the pledge of Divine presence and protection in the vision of God's host at Mahanaim: just as a small portion of God's people were about Jacob in his journey to the fabled land. The detail that popular story-telling loves, but the sober record of a tradition to which the supernatural was matter of fact. Even the longer passage that preserves the occurrence at Penuel is conceived in the same spirit. What the revelation of the host of God had not sufficed to teach this faithless, anxious, scheming patriarch, that God sought to teach him in the night-struggle, with its ineffaceable physical memorial of a human impotence that can compass no more than to cling to Divine omnipotence (32: 22–32). The devices of crafty Jacob to disarm an offended and supposedly implacable brother proved as useless as that bootless wrenching of the night before; Esau's peculiar disposition was not of Jacob's making. But God provided the means by which Jacob could own his safety. The practical wisdom of Jacob dictated his insistence upon bringing to a speedy termination the proposed association with his changeable brother, amid the difficulties of a journey that could not be shared by such divergent social and racial elements as Esau's armed host and Jacob's caravan, without discontent on the one side and disaster on the other. The brothers part, not to meet again until they meet to bury their father at Hebron (34: 29).

Before Jacob's arrival in the S. of Canaan where his father yet lived and where his own youth had been spent, he passed through a period of wandering in Central Pal, somewhat similar to that narrated of his grand-father Abraham. To any such nomad, wandering slowly from Aram toward Egypt, a period of residence in the region of Mt. Ephraim was a natural chapter in his book of travels, (48: 1), recorded for stop, (1) at Succoth, E. of the Jordan near Penuel, (2) at Shechem and (3) at Beth-el.

Nothing worthy of record occurred at Succoth, but the stay at Shechem was eventful. Gen 34, which tells the story of Dinah's seduction and Jacob's angry response, throws as much light upon the relations of Jacob and the Canaanites, as does ch 14 or ch 23 upon Abraham's relations, or ch 26 upon Isaac's relations, with such settled inhabitants of the land. There is a strange blending of moral and immoral elements in Jacob and his family as portrayed in this chapter (31: 9–52). There is a tradition of separateness from the Canaanites bequeathed from Abraham's day (ch 24), together with a growing family consciousness and sense of superiority (31: 7–14, 31). And at the same time there is indifference to their unique moral status among the environs tribes, shown in Dinah's social relations with them (ver 1), in the treachery and cruelty of Simeon and Levi (vs 25–29), and in Jacob's greater concern for the security of his possessions than for the preservation of his good name (ver 30).

It was this concern for the safety of the family and its wealth that achieved the end which dread of social absorption would apparently never have achieved—the termination of a long residence where there was moral danger for all. For a second time Jacob had fairly to be driven to Beth-el. Safety from his foes was again a gift of God (35: 5), and in a renewal of the old forgotten ideals of consecration (vs 2–5) he and all his following move from the painful associations of Shechem to the hallowed associations of Beth-el. Here were renewed the various phases of all God's earlier communications to this patriarch and to his fathers with a name of Israel no ill deserved, is henceforth to find realization in his life; his fathers' God is to be his God; his seed is to inherit the land of promise, and is to be no mean tribe, but a group of peoples with kings to rule over them (35: 7–12). But no wonder that Jacob here raises anew his monument of stone—emblem of the "Stone of Israel" (49: 24)—and stumps forever, by this public act, upon ancient Luz (35: 6), the name of Beth-el which he had privately given it years before (23: 19).

Losses and griefs characterized the family life of the patriarch at this period. The death of his mother's Syrian nurse at Beth-el (35: 5; cf 24: 50) was followed by the death of his beloved wife Rachel at Ephrath (35: 18; 48: 7) in bringing forth the youngest of his 12 sons, Benjamin. At about the same time the eldest of the 12, Reuben, forfeited the honor of his station in the family by an act that showed all too clearly the effect of recent experiences (35: 9–12). The death claimed Jacob's aged father, whose latest years had been robbed of the companionship, not only of this son, but also of the son whom his partiality had all but made a fratricide; at Isaac's grave in Hebron the ill-matched brothers met once more, thenceforth to go their separate ways, both in their personal careers and in their descendants' history (35: 29).

Jacob now is by right of patriarchal custom head of all the family. He too takes up his residence at Hebron (37: 14), and the story of the family fortunes is now pursued under the new title of "the generations of Jacob" (37: 2). True, most of this story revolves about Joseph, the youngest of the family save Benjamin; yet the occurrence of passages like ch 38, devoted exclusively to Judah's affairs, or ch 46: 8–27, the enumeration of Jacob's entire family through its secondary ramifications, or ch 49, the blessing of Jacob on all his sons—all these prove that Jacob, not Joseph, is the true center of the narrative until his death. As long as he lives he is the real head of his house, and not merely a superannuated veteran like Isaac. Not only Joseph, the boy of 17 (37: 2), but also the self-willed elder sons, even a score of years later, control at his bidding (chs 42–45). Joseph's dearest thought, as it is his first thought, is for his aged father (43: 7–27; 44: 19; and esp. 46: 3.9.13.23, and 46: 29).
It is this devotion of Joseph that results in Jacob’s migration to Egypt. What honors there Joseph can show his father he shows him: he presents him to Pharaoh, who for Joseph’s sake receives him with dignity, and assigns him a home and sufficient for himself and all his people as honored guests of the land of Egypt (47:7–12). Yet in Beer-sheba, while en route to Egypt, Jacob had obtained a greater honor than this reception by Pharaoh. He had found there, as ready to respond to his sacrifices as ever to those of his fathers, the God of his father Isaac, and had received the gracious assurance of Divine guidance in this momentous journey, fraught with so vast a significance for the future nation and the world (46:1–4): God Himself would go with him into Egypt and give him, not merely the gratification of once more embracing his long-lost son, but the fulfillment of the covenant-promise (15:13–16) that he and his were not turning their backs upon Canaan forever. Though 130 years of age when he stood before Pharaoh, Jacob felt his days to have been “few” as well as “evil,” in comparison with those of his fathers (47:9). And in fact he had yet 17 years to live in Goshen (47:28).

It is not always that events are passed over without record, save of the growth and prosperity of the family. But at their close came the impartation of the ancestral blessings, with the last will of the dying patriarch. After adopting Joseph’s sons, Manasseh and Ephraim, as his own, preferring the younger to the elder as he himself had once been preferred to Esau, and assigns to Joseph the “double portion” of the first-born—that “preeminence” which he denies to Reuben (48:22; 49:26) by that combination of emotion and glowing imagery of its style and the unsurpassed elevation of its diction, a lyrical fervor of religious sentiment which demands for its author a personality that had passed through just such a course of tuition as Jacob had experienced, the last words of Jacob, in ch. 49, mark a turning-point in the history of the people of God. This is a translation of biography into prophecy. On the assumption that it is genuine, we may confidently aver that the proverbs of the future, those who bear the grace. It’s auditors were its theme. Their descendants were its fulfillment. Neither the one class nor the other could ever let it pass out of memory. It was “by faith,” as we are well reminded, that Joseph “waxed greater in the service of Pharaoh” (He 11:21). For he held to the promises of God, and even in the hour of dissolution looked for the fulfillment of the covenant, according to which Canaan should belong to him and to his seed after him. He therefore set Joseph an example, by “giving commandment concerning his bones,” that they might rest in the burial-place of Abraham and Isaac near Hebron. To the accomplishment of this mission Joseph and all his brethren addressed themselves after their father’s death, and in the 70 days of official mourning. Followed by “a very great company” of the notables of Egypt, including royal officials and representatives of the royal family, this Heb tribe carried up to sepulture in the land of promise the embalmed body of the patriarch from whom henceforth they were to take their tribal name, lamented him according to custom for 7 days, and then returned to their temporary home in Egypt, till their children should at length he called to bear the name of Jacob (He 11:1) and inherit his promises to their father Jacob.

IV. Character and Beliefs.—In the course of this account of Jacob’s career the inward as well as the outward fortunes of the man have somewhat appeared. Yet a more comprehensive view of the kind of man he was will not be superfluous at this point. With what disposition was he endowed—the natural nucleus for acquired characteristics and habits? Through what stages did he pass in the development of his beliefs and his character? In particular, what attitude did he maintain toward the most significant things in his life, the promise of God to his house? And lastly, what resemblances may be traced in Israel the man to Israel the nation, of such sort that the one may be regarded as “typical” of the other? These matters deserve more than a passing notice.

From his father, Jacob inherited that domesticity and affectionate attachment to his home circle which appears in his life from beginning to end. He inherited shrewdness, initiative and resourcefulness from his mother, qualities which she shared apparently with her brother Laban and all his family. The conspicuous ethical faults of Abraham and Isaac alike are want of candor and want of courage. It is not so with Jacob, therefore, to find the same failings in Jacob. Deceit and cowardice are visible again and again in the impartial record of his life. Both spring from unbelief. They belong to the natural man. God’s transformation of Jacob was wrought by that patience and nourishing in him a simple trust in the truth and power of the Divine word. For Jacob was not at any time in his career indifferent to the things of the spirit, the things unseen and belonging to the future. Unlike Esau, he was not blind to the touch of God. Whether through inheritance, or as a fruit of early teaching, he had as the inestimable treasure, the true capital of his spiritual career, a firm conviction of the value of what God had promised, with the warm feeling of religious sentiment which demands for its author a personality that had passed through just such a course of tuition as Jacob had experienced, the last words of Jacob, in ch. 49, mark a turning-point in the history of the people of God. of accepting the Divine will, of realizing the Divine nearness and faithfulness. If there are those admirably graded lessons in the grace of God, that were imparted in the series of Divine appearances to the patriarch, at Beth-el, at Haran, at Peniel, at Beth-el again and at Beersheba. For if the substance of these Divine revelations be compared, it will be found that all are alike in the assurance (1) that God is with him to bless; (2) that the changes of his life are ordained of God and are for his ultimate good; and (3) that he is the heir of the ancestral promises.

It will further be found that they may be arranged in a chronological order, according as one or another of the revelations be viewed as the climax. Thus (1), agreeing with the chronological order, the appearance at Beersheba may well be regarded as the climax of them all. Abraham had gone to Egypt to escape a famine (15 10), but he went without revelation, and returned with bitter experience of his error. Isaac essayed to go to Egypt for the same cause (26 1 f.), and was prevented by revelation. Jacob now goes to Egypt, but he goes with the express approval of the God of his fathers, and with the evident anticipation that the seed of Abraham, the seed of the Deity: of whom He said (35 1), at Beth-el the second time (35 11) and at Beersheba (46 3). But it is never used alone. Like Allah in the Arab. language (=the God), so 'El with the definite article before it serves to designate in Hebraism a particular divinity, not deity in general. Or else 'El without the article is made definite by some genitive phrase that supplies the necessary identification: so in Jacob's case, El-beth-el (35 7; cf 31 13) or El-Elohe-Israel (33 20).

Or, lastly, there is added to 'El some determining suffix, with the form of an adjective, as Shaddai (tr. "Almighty") in 33 11 (cf 43 3). Distinction from this word, 'El, with its archaic or poetic flavor, is the common Heb word for God, Elohim. But while Elohim is used regularly by the narrator of the Jacob-stories in speaking, or in depicting his own attitude to God; while to the monothestic writer is of course the God and his own God, he never puts this word thus absolutely into the mouth of the revealing Deity. Jacob can say, when he awakes from his dream, "This is the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." But he calls the God of the dream, "I am the God [Elohim] of thy father" (28 17 13). At Mahanaim Jacob says, "This is the host of Elohim" (32 2), but at Beersheba God says to Jacob, "I am . . . the God [Elohim] of thy father" (46 3). Such are the distinctions maintained in the use of these words, and all of them used of the same God, yet chosen in each case to fit the circumstances of speaker, hearer and situation. The only passage in the story of Jacob that might appear to be an exception does in fact hasten the proof. At Peniel the angel of God explains the new name of Israel by saying, "Thou hast sinned against God [Elohim] and with men, and hast prevailed." Here the contrast with "men" proves that Elohim without the article is just the right expression, even on the lips of Deity; neither Deity nor humanity has prevailed against Jacob (32 25).

Throughout the entire story of Jacob, therefore, his relations with Jehovah his God, after they were once established (28 13 16), are narrated in terms that emphasize the Divinity of Him who had thus entered into covenant-relationship with him: His Divinity—that is to say, those attributes of Divinity manifested itself in His dealings with Jacob.

From the foregoing, two things appear with respect to Jacob's attitude toward the promise of God. First, with all his faults and failures, toward the Promised Land, and after the reappearance of God in His-divinity manifested itself in His dealings with Jacob.

3. Attitude toward the promise of God concerning things of a value wholly spiritual—future good, moral and spiritual blessings. And second, he was capable of progress in these matters; that is, his reaction to the Divine tuition would appear, if charted, as a series of elevations, separated one from another, to be sure, by low levels and deep declines, yet each one higher than the last, and all taken collectively lifting the whole average up and up. In the last, God has triumphed over sight, the future over present good, a yet unpossessed but Divinely promised Canaan over all the comfort and honors of Egypt, and the aged patriarch lives only to "wait for Jehovah's salvation." (49 18.)

The contrast of Jacob with Esau furnish perhaps the best means of grasping the significance of these two facts for an estimate of Jacob's attitude toward the promise. For in the first place, Esau, who possessed so much that Jacob lacked—directness, manliness, a sort of backbone, that made him superficially more attractive than his brother—Esau shows nowhere any real "sense" for things spiritual. The author of Hebrews has caught the man in the flash of a single word, "prophane" (προφανής, βέβηλος)—of course, in the older, broader, etymological meaning of the term. Esau's desires dwelt in the world of the non-sacred; they did not aspire to the world of nearness to God, where one must "put off from his feet, because the place whereon he stands is holy ground." And in the second place, there is no sign of growth in Esau. What we see him in his father's encampment, that we see him to the end—so far as appears from the story—is a mere remnant, a shadow, the vices of the man who lives for the present—forgiving when strong enough to revenge, condescending when flattered, proud of power and independent of parental control or family tradition—Esau is as impartially depicted by the sacred historian as if the writer had been an Edomite instead of an Israelite: the sketch is evidently true to life, both from its objectivity and from its coherence.

Now what was Jacob was. His fault in connection with the promulgation of God, the family tradition, the ancestral blessing, lay not in despising them, but in seeking them in immoral ways. Good was his aim; but he was ready to "do evil that good might come." He was always tempted to be his own God and to fulfill the promise of his father Isaac and was clearly directed, both by providential leadings and by gracious discourses, to this corresponding purpose: to enlighten Jacob as to the nature of the promise; to assure him that it was his by grace; to awaken personal faith in His Divine Grace; and to supplement his "faith" by that "patience" without which none can "inherit the promises." The faith that accepts was to issue at length in the faith that waits.

A nation was to take its name from Jacob-Israel, and there are some passages of Scripture where it is uncertain whether that name designates the nation or its ancestor. In their respective relations to God and to the world of men and nations, there is a true sense in which the father was a "type" of the children. It is probably only a play of fancy that would discover a parallel in their respective careers, between the successive stages of life in the father's home (Caanaan), life in exile, a return, and a second exile. But it is not fanciful to note the resemblance between Jacob and Joseph, both as a character and that of his descendants. While a few exceptions the qualities mentioned above (IV, 2) would distinguish a Hebrew, its spirit was equally applicable to the nation of Israel. And even that curriculum in which the patriarch learned of God may be viewed as the kernel in which the Hebrew people—after all of them, or even the mass, but the "remnant" who applied himself to his calling as Israel of the prophets, as "servant of Jehovah"—were taught the lessons of faith and patience, of renunciation and consecration, that appear with more or less emphasis on the pages of Isaiah, of Hosea and of Malachi. This is apparently Hosea's point of view in 12 3—4, 12. A word of caution, however, is needed at this point. There are limits to this equation. Even critics who regard Jacob under his title of Israel as merely the eponymous hero, created by legend to be the forefather of the nation (cf. below, VI, 1), must confess that Jacob as Israel is no such neutral creature, dressed only in the colors of his children's racial qualities. There is a large range of contradiction, after all the parallelisms have been traced, that refuses to fit the lines of Hebrew national character, whether in his typical life in the direction of the covenants-inheritance, after the fashion of Malachi's allusion (Mal 1 2), interpreted by Paul (Rom 9 10—13).

V. References Outside of Genesis.—Under his two names this personage Jacob or Israel is more frequently mentioned than any other in the whole of sacred history. Yet in the vast majority of cases the nation descended from him is intended by the name, which in the form of "Jacob" or "Israel" contains not the slightest, and in the form of "children of Jacob" "house of Jacob" "house of Israel" and the like, only the slightest, if any, allusion to the patriarch himself. But there still remain many passages in both Testaments where the Jacob or Israel of Gen is clearly alluded to. There is a considerable group of passages that refer to him as the last of the patriarchal triumvirate—Abraham, Isaac and Jacob: so particularly of Jeh as the "God of the OT Abraham, Isaac and Jacob," and of the covenant-oath at Sinai, when "sworn unto Abraham, Isaac and Jacob." And naturally the nation that is known by his name is frequently called by some phrase, equivalent to the formal בַּנְהֵי יִשְׂרָאֵל, yet through its unusualness lending more significance to the idea of their derivation from his virtues as well as the vices of the man who lives for the present—forgiving when strong enough to revenge, condescending when flattered, proud of power and independent of parental control or family tradition—Esau is as impartially depicted by the sacred historian as if the writer had been an Edomite instead of an Israelite: the sketch is evidently true to life, both from its objectivity and from its coherence.

4. How Far a "Type" of Israel. In their respective relations to God and to the world of men and nations, there is a true sense in which the father was a "type" of the children. It is probably only a play of fancy that would discover a parallel in their respective careers, between the successive stages of life in the father's home (Caanaan), life in exile, a return, and a second exile. But it is not fanciful to note the resemblance between Jacob and Joseph, both as a character and that of his descendants. While a few exceptions the qualities mentioned above (IV, 2) would distinguish a Hebrew, its spirit was equally applicable to the nation of Israel. And even that curriculum in which the patriarch learned of God may be viewed as the kernel in which the Hebrew people—after all of them, or even the mass, but the "remnant" who applied himself to his calling as Israel of the prophets, as "servant of Jehovah"—were taught the lessons of faith and patience, of renunciation and consecration, that appear with more or less emphasis on the pages of Isaiah, of Hosea and of Malachi. This is apparently Hosea's point of view in 12 3—4, 12. A word of caution, however, is needed at this point. There are limits to this equation. Even critics who regard Jacob under his title of Israel as merely the eponymous hero, created by legend to be the forefather of the nation (cf. below, VI, 1), must confess that Jacob as Israel is no such neutral creature, dressed only in the colors of his children's racial qualities. There is a large range of contradiction, after all the parallelisms have been traced, that refuses to fit the lines of Hebrew national character, whether in his typical life in the direction of the covenants-inheritance, after the fashion of Malachi's allusion (Mal 1 2), interpreted by Paul (Rom 9 10—13).
him "our father." Stephen's speech, as Luke reports it, includes in its rapid historical flight a hint or two about Jacob beyond the bare fact of his place in the national narrative. Moved by the famine prevailing in Egypt and Canaan, Jacob twice dispatches his sons to buy grain in Egypt, and the second time Joseph is made known to his brothers, and his race becomes manifest to Pharaoh. At Joseph's behest, Jacob and all the family move to Egypt. There all remain until their death, but the "fathers" (Joseph and his brethren; cf Jerome, Epistola viiii, ed. Migne) are buried in the family possession near Shechem. Here emerges one of those divergencies in the OT tradition that is a notable feature of Stephen's speech, and that have furnished occasion for much speculation upon their origin, value and implications. See comm. on Acts.) Paul's interest in Jacob appears in connection with his discussion of Divine election, where he calls attention to the oracle of Gen 25:23 and to the use already made of the passage by Malachi (1:2f), and reminds his readers that this choice of Jacob and rejection of Esau was made by God before these twin sons of Isaac and Rebecca were born. Finally, the author of Heb, when charting the heroes of faith, focuses his glass for a moment upon Jacob: first, as sharing with Abraham and Isaac the promise of God and the life everlasting (He 11:9); and second, as receiving from Isaac, and at his death transmitting to his grandsons, blessings that had value only for one who worships and believes a God with power over "things to come" (vs 20f). VI. Modern Interpretations of Jacob.—1. Those who see in the patriarchal narratives anything—myth, legend, saga—rather than true biography, there is, of course, a different interpretation of the characters and events portrayed in the familiar Gen-stories, and a different value placed upon the stories themselves. A past from the allegorizing treatment accorded them by the Jew and early Christian writers of like mind (see specimen in Abraham), these views belong to modern criticism. To critics who make Heb history begin with the settlement of Canaan by the nomad Israelites fresh from the desert, even the Mosaic age and the Egypt residence are totally unhistorical—much more so these tales of a pre-Mosaic patriarchal age; yet to admit the broad outlines of a residence of the tribes in Egypt, an exodus of some sort, and a founder of the nation named Moses, are for the moderns much of the same as allowing and fortunes in a remote age, with its nomads wandering in deserts, states and Canaan, and to add in Canaan, its circumstantial acquaintance with the names and relationships of each individual through some 4 long patriarchal generations, and its obvious foreshadowing of so much that the later tribes were on this same soil to act out cent. later. This, we are told, is not history. Whatever else it may be, it is not a reliable account of some memorable events as compel their reality in the memories and through the written records of mankind. The commonest view held, collectively of the entire narrative, specifically of Jacob, is that which sees here the precipitate from a pure solution of the national character and fortunates. Wellhausen, e.g., says (Pro- the Hebrew legend, 310): "The material here Nation is not mythical, but national; there- fore clearer [viz. than in Gen 1:1-11] and in a certain sense historical. To be sure there is no historical knowledge to be gained here about the real general generation, is better drawn than the other two [Abraham and Isaac]." In section IV, 4, above, we observed that, while many of Jacob's personal qualities pre-figured the qualities of the later Heb people, there were some others that did not at all fit this equation. Wellhausen himself remarks this, in regard to the contrast between the patriarchal and the Israelite ancestors they invented for themselves. In his attempt to account for this contrast, he can only urge that a nation condemned to eternal wars could naturally look back upon, as well as forward to, a golden age of peace. (An alternative explana- tion he states, only to reject.) He fails to observe that this plea does not in the least alter the fact—his plea is indeed but, a restatement of the fact—that this phenomenon is absolutely at variance with his hypothesis of how these stories of Jacob and the rest came to be what they are (see Meyer, Die Israeliten und ihre Nachbarstämme, 250ff). This general view, which when carried to its extreme implications (as by Steuernagel, Die Ein- wanderung der israelitischen Stämme in Kanaan, 1901) comes perilously near the reduc- tio ad absurdum that is its own refuta- Demi-God, has been rejected by that whole group of critics, who, following Nöldeke, see in Jacob, as in so many others, an original deity (myth), first abused to the grade of a hero (heroic legend), and at last degraded to the level of a clown (tales of jest or marvel). Adherents of this trend of interpretation differ widely among themselves as to details, but Jacob is generally regarded as a Canaanitish deity, whose local shrine was at Shechem, Beth-el or Peniel, and whose cult was taken over by the Hebrews, their own object of worship being substituted for him, and the outstand- ing feature of his personality being transferred over into a hero that Israel appropriated as their national ancestor, even to the extent of giving him the secondary name of Israel. Stade attempted a combination of this 'mythological' view with the "national" view in the interest of his theory of primitive animism, by making the patriarch a "mythological figure revered as an eponymous hero." This theory, in any form, requires the assumption, which there is nothing to support, that Jacob (or Jacob-el) is a name given by the Canaanites or Egypt to a deity and framed to fit his supposed character. At first, then, it meant "El deceives" or "El recompenses" (so B. Luther, ZATW, 1901, 20f; cf also the same writer, as well as Meyer himself, in the latter's Die Familie, 3, p 246); Luther proposes the monstrosity of a nominal sentence with the tr, "He deceives is 'El. Thus the first element of the name Jacob came to be felt as the name itself ("Jacob is God"), and it was launched upon its course of evolution into the human person- ageon that Gen knows. It suffices to say with regard to all this, that in addition to its being inherently improbable—not to say, unproven—it goes directly in the face of the archaeological evidence adduced under 1, 1, above. The example fact that Jacob-el was a personal name for men, of every- day occurrence in the 24-3d millenniums BC, is quite enough to overthrow this whole hypothesis; for, as Luther himself remarks (op. cit., 65), the above evolution of the name is essential to the "mythical" theory: "when this alteration took place cannot be told; yet it has to be postulated, since otherwise it remains inexplicable, how personal names could arise out of these formations [like Jacob-el]." The inadequacy of the two theories hitherto advanced to account for the facts of Gen being thus evident, Gunkel and others have ex- 3. Character plenitiously rejected them and enunciated of Fiction a theory which is generally called the saga-theory. According to Gunk- nel, "to understand the persons of Gen as nations is by no means a general key to their interpretation”; and, “against the whole assumption that the principal patriarchal figures are originally gods is this fact first and foremost, that the names Jacob and Abraham are shown by the Bab to be customary personal names, and furthermore that the tales about them cannot be understood at all as scenes of original myths.” In place of these discredited views Gunkel (cf also Gressmann, ZATW, 1910, 1 ff) makes of Jacob simply a character in the stories (marvelous, humorous, pathetic and the like) current in ancient Israel, esp. on the lips of the professional story-teller. Whereas much of the material in these stories came to the Hebrews from the Babylonians, Canaanites or Egyptians, Jacob himself is declared to have belonged to the old Heb saga, with its flavor of nomadic desert life and wish-fulfilling. “The sly shepherd Jacob, who fools the hunter Esau; another tale, of the deceit of a father-in-law by his son-in-law, was added to it—the more naturally because both are shepherds; a third cycle, about an old man that loves his youngest son, was transferred to this figure, and that youngest son received the name of Joseph at a time when Jacob was identified with Israel’s assumed ancestor ‘Israel.” Thus our result is, that most important of patriarchs are creations of fiction” (Schriften des AT, Ste Lieferung, 42).

It is so obvious that this new attitude toward the patriarchs lends itself to a more sympathetic criticism of the narrative of Gen, that critics who adopt it are at pains to deny any intention on their part of rehabilitating Jacob et al. as historical figures. “Saga,” we are told, “is not capable of preserving through so many cents a picture of the real character or deeds of its heroes, even supposing that persons bearing these names once actually lived; and we are reminded of the contrast between the Etsel of saga and the Attila of history, the Dietrich of saga and the Theodie of history. But as against this we need to note, first, that the long and involved course of development through which, ex hypothesi, these stories have passed before reaching their final stage (J, 9th cent. BC; Gunkel, op. cit., S. 46) involves a very high antiquity for the core stages, and thus reduces to a narrow strip of time those “so many cents,” that are supposed to separate the actual Jacob from the Jacob of saga (cf JUABHAM, VII, 4); and second, that the presuppositions as to the origin, nature and value of saga with which this school of criticism operates are, for the most part, only an elaborate statement of the undisputed major premise in a syllogism, of which the minor premise is: the Gen-stories are saga. Against this last proposition, however, there lie many weighty considerations, that are by no means counterbalanced by those resemblances of a general sort which any student of comparative literature can easily discern (see also Baethgen, op. cit., 185).

JACOB (יהוֹSusan, יִשְׂרָאֵל; יַעֲקֹב, יַאֲקָב): (1) The patriarch (see preceding art.). (2) The father of Joseph the husband of Mary (Mt. 1:15-16). (3) Patronymic denoting the Israelites (Isa 10:11; Jer 10:1).

JACOB, TESTAMENT OF. See Apocalyptic Literature.

JACOB'S WELL (πηγή τοῦ Ιακώβ, πηγή τοῦ Ἰακώβ): In Jn 4:3 ff we read that Our Lord “left Judea, and departed again into Galilee. And he must needs pass through Samaria. So he cometh to a city of Samaria, called Sychar, near to the parcel of ground that Jacob gave to his son Joseph: and Jacob's well was there.” When Jacob came to Shechem on his return from Paddan-Aram (Heb 33:18f).

1. Position of Well: 1. The “well” as an E. of the city, and bought the land on which he had spread his tent (Gen 33:18f). This is doublets the “portion” (Heb 33:18f) spoken of in Gen 48:22; although there it is said to have been taken with sword and bow from the Amorites. Where the pass of Shechem opens to the E., near the northern edge of the valley, lies the legendary tomb of Joseph. On the other side of the vale, close to the base of Gerizim, is the well universally known as Bir Ya'qub, “the well of Jacob.” The position meets perfectly the requirements of the narrative. The main road from the S. splits a little to the E., one arm leading westward through the pass, the other going more directly to the N. It is probable that these paths follow pretty closely the ancient tracks; and both would be frequented by Jesus’ day. Which of them He took we cannot tell; but, in any case, this well lay in the fork between them, and could be approached with equal ease from either. See Sychar.

In the chapter quoted, it is said that Jacob dug the well (ver 15). The OT says nothing of this. With the copious springs at Ain 'Askot and Balata, one might ask why a well should have been dug here at all. We must remember that in the East, very strict laws have always governed the use of water, esp. when there were large herds to be considered. The purchase of land here may not have secured for Jacob such supplies as he required. There was danger of strife between rival herdsmen. The patriarch, therefore, may have dug the well in the interests of peace, and also to preserve his own independence.

Jew, Samaritan, Moslem and Christian agree in associating this well with the patriarch Jacob.

This creates a strong presumption in favor of the tradition: and there is no good reason to doubt its truth. Standing at the brink of the well, overshadowed by the giant bulk of Gerizim, one feels how naturally it would be spoken of as “this mountain.” For long the well was unprotected, opening among the ruins of a vaulted chamber some feet below the surface of the ground. Major Anderson describes it (Recovery of Jesus, 465) as having “a narrow opening, just wide enough to allow the body of a man to pass through with arms uplifted, and this narrow neck, which is about 4 ft. long, opens into the well itself, which is cylindrically shaped, and about 7 ft. 6 in. in diameter.

4. Description

The mouth and upper part of the well are built of masonry, and the well appears to have been sunk through a mixture of alluvial soil and limestone fragments, till a compact bed of mountain limestone was reached, having horizontal strata which could be easily worked; and the interior of the well presents the appearance of having been lined throughout with rough masonry. The depth was doubtless much greater in ancient times; but much rubbish has fallen into it, and now it is not more than 75 ft. deep. It is fed by no spring, nor is the water conducted to it along the surface, as to a cistern. Its supplies depend entirely upon rainfall and percolation. Possibly, therefore, the water may never have approached the brim. The woman says "the well is deep." Pēgā, "spring," does not, therefore, strictly apply to it, but rather "tank" or "reservoir," or pehōr, the word actually used in vs 11 f. The modern inhabitants of Nōbēśa, highly esteem the "light" water of the well as compared with the "heavy" or "hard" water of the neighboring springs. It usually lasts till about the end of May; then the well is dry till the return of the rains. Its contents, therefore, differ from the "living" water of the perennial spring.

From the narratives of the pilgrims we learn that at different times churches have been built over the well. The Moslems probably demolished the last of the five churches over the well of the Crusaders in 1187. A description of the ruins with drawings, as they were 30 years ago, is given in PEF, II, 174, etc. A stone found in 1881 may have been the original cover of the well. It measures 3 ft. 9 in. x 2 ft. 11 3/4 in. x 1 ft. 6 in. The aperture in the center is 13 in. in diameter; and in its sides are grooves worn by the ropes used in drawing up the water (PEFS, 1881, 212 f).

Some years ago the plot of ground containing the well was purchased by the authorities of the Or church, and it has been surrounded by a wall. A chapel has been built over the well, and a large church is erected beside it.

JACOBUS, ja-kō'bus (Tācōḇōs, Tākōḇōs; B reads Tārōḇōs): In 1 Esd 9 48 = "Akūb" in Neh 8 7, a Levite who helped in the exposition of the law.

JADA, ja'â'dâ (יָדָה, "the knowing one"): Son of Onam and grandson of Jerahmeel by his wife Atarah (1 Ch 2 26-28,32).

JADAH, ja'dâ' (יָדָה יָדָה, Kētābīh; יָדָה, yēḏāy, Kēś AV; but RV IDDO): In Ex 10 43, one of those who had married foreign wives. RV has "Jadai" (= "Edos," 1 Esd 9 35). See IDDO.

JADDAI, ja'dâ, ja'dâ'i. See IDDO; JADDAI.

JADDAU, ja'dō'a, ja'dâ' (יָדָא יָדָא, "known"): (1) One of the "chiefs of the people" who with Nehemiah sealed the covenant, thus signifying their voluntary acceptance of the law and their compliance to submit to its yoke (Neh 10 21 [Heb 22]).

(2) Son of Jonathan or Johanan, and great-grandson of Elijahb, the high priest in Nehemiah's time (Neh 12 11). He is the last of the high priests mentioned in the list of Darius the Peræ, i.e., Darius I; the first, Darius Codomannus, the last king of Persia (336-332 BC), who was overthrown by Alexander the Great. It is doubtless to him that Jos refers in his romance of the account of Alexander's entrance into Jerusalem (Ant, XI, viii, 4, 5; vii, 2, vii, 7). James Chrichton

JADDUS, ja'dûs (B, Tā'ā'ōsos, Tāddōsas; A, Tā'ōsōs, Tāddōsas): AV has "Addus" = Barzillai (Exr 2 41; Neh 7 63). J. was removed from the office of the priesthood because he could not prove his right to it after the return to Jerusalem under Zerubbabel (1 Esd 5 38). He is called Barzillai in the OT, because he married Augia, the daughter of Zorzelus (Barzillai the Gileadite, in the OT). Cf Barzillai.

JADON, ja'dôn (יָדוֹן, yādōn, perhaps "he will judge" or "plead"): One who helped to rebuild the wall of Jerusalem in company with the men of Gibeon and of Mizpah (Neh 3 7). He is called the "Meronomite" and another Meronomite is referred to in 1 Ch 27 30, but there is no mention of a place Meronoth. Jadon is the name given by Jos (Ant, III, viii, 5; ix, 1) to "the man of God" from Judah who confronted Jeroboam as he burned incense at the altar in Bethel, and who was afterward deceived by the lie of the old prophet (1 K 13). Jos may probably have meant Iddo the seer, whose visions concerning Jeroboam (2 Ch 9 29) led to his being identified in Jewish tradition with "the man of God" from Judah. James Chrichton JAEEL, ja'ē-ēl (יָאֵעֵל, "wild or mountain goat," as in Ps 104 18; 2Sa 15, 31): The wife of Heber the Kenite and the slayer of Sisera (Jgs 4 17-22; 5 2-31). Jaël emerges from obscurity by this single deed, and by the kindest construction can hardly be said to have reached an enviable fame. The history of this event is clear. For years Jabin the king of Canaan had oppressed Israel. For twenty years the Israelites had been subject to him, and, in largest measure, the instrument of their subjugation had been Sisera, the king's general, the "man of the iron chariots." Deborah, a prophetess of Israel, by her passion for freedom, had roused the tribes of Israel to do battle against Sisera. They defeated him at "Taanach by the waters of Megiddo," but Sisera sought in flight to save himself. He came to the tents of the wanderers, where the tribe of Heber lived. Here he sought, and was probably invited, to take shelter in the tent of Jaël (4 17-18). There are two accounts of the subsequent events—one a prose narrative (4 19-22), the other a poetic one, found in Deborah's song of triumph (5 21-27). The two accounts are as nearly in agreement as could be expected, considering their difference in form.

It is evident that the tribe of Heber was regarded by both parties to the struggle as being neutral. They were descendants of Jethro, and hence were in no way a part of Israel, but the confidence of the Israelites. Though they had suffered somewhat at the hands of the Canaanites they had made a formal contract of peace with Jabin. Naturally Sisera could turn to the tents of Heber in Edom-naphtali with some confidence. The current laws of hospitality gave an added element of safety. Whether Jaël met Sisera and urged him to enter her tent and rest (4 18), or only invited him after his appeal for refuge, the fact remains that he was her guest, was protected by the sacred sheltering of her home, and protected by the laws of hospitality. She gave him milk to drink, a mallet for covering, and apparently acquiesced in his request that she should stand guard at the tent and deny his presence to any pursuers. When sleep came to the weary fugitive, she took a wicker pole, took a hammer in hand, and went softly unto him, and amote the pin into his temples" (ver 21), and having murdered him, goes forth to meet Barak the Israelitish general and claims the credit for her deed. Some critics suggest that Sisera was not asleep when murdered, and thus try to convert Jael's treachery into strategy. But to kill your guest while he is drinking the milk of hospitality is little less culpable than to murder him while asleep. There is no evidence that Sisera offered Jael any insult or violence, and but little probability that she acted under any spiritual or Divine suggestion. It is really impossible to justify Jael's act, though it is not impossible to understand it or properly to appreciate Deborah's approval of the act as found in 5 24. The motive of Jael may have been a mixed one. She may have been a sympathizer with Israel and with the religion of Israel. But the narrative scarcely warrants the interpretation that she felt herself as one called to render "stern justice on an enemy of God" (Expositor's Bible). Jael was unquestionably prudential. Sisera was in flight and Barak in pursuit. Probably her situation was very way with Barak, but certainly reflection would show her that it would not be wisdom to permit Barak to find Sisera in her tent. She knew, too, that death would be Sisera's portion should he be captured—therefore she would kill him, and thus cement a friendship with the conqueror.

As to Deborah's praise of Jael (5 24), there is no call to think that in her hour of triumph she was either capable of or intending to appraise the moral quality of Jael's deed. Her heart's enemy was dead and that at the hand of a woman. The woman who would kill Sisera must be the friend of Israel. Deborah had no question of the propriety of meting out death to a defeated persecutor. Her times were not such as to raise this question. The method of his death mattered little to her, for all the laws of peace were abrogated in the times of war. Therefore Jael was blessed among women by all who loved Israel. Whether Deborah thought her also to be worthy of the blessing of God we may not tell. At any rate there is no need for us to try to justify the treachery of Jael in order to explain the words of Deborah.

JAH, jâ. See God, Names of.

JAHATH, jâ'hath (גת, yâhath, perhaps for נת, yâheth, נתת, yâhâthâh, "he [God] will snatch up"): (1) Son of Reiah, son of Shobal, a descendant of Judah, and father of Ahumai and Lahad, the families of the Zorathites (1 Ch 4 2).
(2) A frequent name for a descendant of Levi: (a) Son of Libni, son of Gershon, the eldest son of Levi (1 Ch 6 20 43 [Heb 6 5 28], where "son of Libni" is omitted).
(b) Son of Shimel, son of Gershon (1 Ch 23 10).
(c) One of the "sons" of Shelomoth, a descendant of Libni, son of Kohath, the second son of Levi (1 Ch 24 22).
(d) A descendant of Merari, the third son of Levi, and an overseer in the repairing of the temple in the reign of Josiah (2 Ch 34 12). JAMES C. CRICHTON JAHAZ, jâ'hâz (גָאָז, yâhâz, Isa 16 4; Jer 48 34, הָאָז, yâhâzâh, or יָהָז, yâhâzâh, Nu 21 23; Dt 2 32; Jos 13 18; 21 36, AV "Jahazah"); Jgs 11 20; Jer 48 21; 1 Ch 6 78, "Jahazah"): This is the place where in a great battle Israel overwhelmed Sihon king of the Amorites, and then took possession of all his territory (Nu 21 23, 33). It is named along with Beth-Hea-al-men and Kedemoth (Josh 13 18), with Kedemoth (21 37) pointing to a position in the S.E. of the Amorite territory. It was given to Reuben by Moses, and was one of the cities in the portion of that tribe assigned to the Merarite Levites. Mesha (Ms, ll. 18 ff) says that the king of Israel dwelt in Jahaz when at war with him. Mesha drove him out, and the city passed into the hands of Moab. It is referred to as a city of Moab in Isa 16 4; Jer 48 21, 48. Cheyne thinks that either Jahaz or Kedemoth must be represented today by the important ruins of Umm er-Rasâs, about 2 1/2 hours N. of Dibon toward the desert (EB, s.v.). No certain identification is possible.

JAHAZIAH, jâ-hâ-zi'a: AV for Jahzeiah (q.v.).

JAHAZIEL, jâ-hâ'zî-ĕl (יֶהְזִיאֵל, yâhâzi'âl, "God sees"): (1) In 1 Ch 12 4 (Heb ver 5), one of David's recruits at Ziklag, a Benjamite or maybe a Judean.
(2) In 1 Ch 16 6, one of two priests appointed by David to sound trumpets before the ark on its journey to Jerusalem. 1 XX B, A, reads "Azziel".
(3) In 1 Ch 23 19; 24 23, a Levite, "son" of Hebron, a Kohathite. Kittel, following LXX, reads "Uziel".
(4) In 2 Ch 20 14, an Asaphite, son of Zechariah. He encouraged King Jehoshaphat of Judah and his subjects to fight against the Moabite and Ammonite invaders.

(5) In Ezr 8 5, an ancestor of one of the families of the Restoration. Read probably "the sons of Zattu, Sheconiah the son of J." following 1 Esd 23 (= Jezeulus). DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JAHDAI, jâ'dâ'i, jâ'dî (יהדai, yâhdayy, "Jeh leads" [?]; Baer reads יִהְדַּי, yêhaday): In 1 Ch 2 47, where six sons of J. are mentioned. "The name has been taken as that of another wife or concubine of Caleb; more probably Jahdai is a descendant of Caleb, whose name, in the original connection, has fallen from the text!" (Curtis, Ch. 96).

JAHIEL, jâ'di-ĕl (יהיֵל, yâhî'âl, "God gives joy"): In 1 Ch 25 24, head of a Manassite family.

JAHDO, jâ'dô (יהד, yâhô, meaning uncertain; Kittel suggests יִהְדָּה, yêhaday = Jahdai): In 1 Ch 6 14, a Gileadite.

JAHHEEL, jâ'hî-ĕl (יהָהֵל, yâhî'âl, "wait for God!"): In Gen 46 14; Nu 26 26, a "son" (i.e. clan) of Zebulun.

JAHHEELITES, jâ'hî-ĕl-îtes, THE (יהָהליטֵים, yâhîlîtîm, coll. with art.): In Nu 26 26, the descendants of the clan of Jahel.

JAHMAL, jâ'mâl, jâ'mî (יהמָל, yâmâl, "Sorek" perhaps יָהְמָל, yâmâlâh, "may Jeh protect!"): In 1 Ch 7 2, head of a clan of Issachar.

JAHWEH, yâ'weh. See God, Names of.

JAHZAH, jâ'za. See Jahaz.

JAHZEEL, jâ'zê-ĕl (יהזֶאֵל, yâhze'âl, "God divides", "apportions"): In Gen 46 24; Nu 26 48; and 23 MSS in 1 Ch 7 13; and JAHZIEL (יהזֶיֵל, yâhze'âl, same meaning as above): 1 Ch 7 13, a "son" (clan) of Naphtali.
JAHZEELITES, ja'se-él-its, THE (יַשֵּׁלֶת, ha-yanah'-éth, coll. with art.): In Nu 26 48, descendants of the clan of Jahzeel.

JAHZIAH, ja'zé-ya, ja'zé-ya (יהזיה, yahzéyah, "Jehovah's possession"), "Jehovah's place"): In Ezr 10 15, son of Tikvah, and a contemporary of Ezra. It is disputed whether he and Jonathan opposed or supported Ezra in the matter of prosecuting those who had married foreign wives—Ezeldias, 1 Ezs 9 14, or Ezzias. See JONATHAN, 9.

Two translations of the Heb phrase (יהזיה, yahzé'ya), are given: (1) "stood over this matter," i.e. supported Ezra: so AV ("were employed in this matter"), and so LXX, 1 Ezs 9 14, RVm. This is supported by ver 4. Let now our princes be appointed for all the assembly, where the same phrase is found. (2) RV "stood up against this matter," so BDB, Gesenius, Bertheau, Stade. Both translations can be supported by is in Heb. The context is better suited by the former rendering.

DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS
JAHZERAH, ja'zé-ra, ja'zé-ra (יהצרה, yahzé-ra'ah, meaning unknown): In 1 Ch 9 12, an ancestor of Masseai and apparently ="Ahazi" of Nch 11 13.

JAHZIEL, ja'zé-el. See JAHZEEL.

JAILOR, jai'ler. See PRISON.

JAI'R, jai'ér. (1) Jair (יהייר, ya'ér, "he enlightens" or "one giving light"): (a) Son, i.e. descendant of Manasseh (Nu 32 41; Dt 3 14); Jos 13 30; Jgs 1 2 21). According to 1 Ch 2 21 I he was the son of Segub, son of Horon, a descendant of Judah, who married the daughter of Machir, son of Manasseh. He was thus descended both from Judah and Manasseh. At the time of the conquest he distinguished himself by taking the town-villages Havvuth-Jair (q.v.). The accounts of his exploit are difficult to harmonize (see ICC on above passages). Some would identify him with the Jair of Jgs 10 3, holding that Manasseh's settlement in Northern Gilead and Bashan took place, not before Israel's passage of the Jordan, but after the settlement of the tribe on the W. For a criticism of this view see GHHL, 577, n.

(b) One of the judges. He is said to have had 30 sons, who rode on 30 ass colts, and who had as many cities, known as Havvuth-Jair (Jgs 10 34). One tradition identifies (a) and (b). Others reconcile the two narratives by interpreting the word "son" in a non-literal sense.

(c) The father of Mordecai (Est 2 5). In the Apoc (Ad Est 11 2) his name is given as "Jairus" (יָאָרַע, Iairus), Iairus"

(2) Jair (K'r ר'י, ya'ér, "he arouses"; Kh- thinh ר'י, ya'ér; a different name from [1] above): The father of Elhanan, the giant-slayer (1 Ch 20 5). In the (parallel passage (2 S 21 19) his name is given as "Jaare-oregim," but the text should be corrected to Jair, "oregim" (מִשְׁפָּחל) having crept in from the line below through a copyist's error.

JAIRITE, ja'ér-it (יהירת, ya'er-it, "of Jair"): In 2 S 20 26, Ira the Jairite is "chief minister unto David." He was a descendant of Jair who was a Manassite (Nu 32 41, etc) and whose territory was in Gilead. LXX Luc and Syr suggest רבי, yattir, "Jattirite," i.e. a native of Jattir mentioned in 1 S 30 27 as one of the towns friendly to David when he was in Ziklag. It is not improbable that a native of Jattir would be given such a post by David. See Ira, and of 2 S 25 38.

JAI'RUS, ja'i-rus, ja'i-rus (יָאֶרְוּס, Idoros: 1 Ezs 5 31; Ad Est 11 2). See AHIRU; JAIR.

JAI'RUS, ja'i-rus, ja'i-rus (יָאֶרְוָס, Idoros): A ruler in a synagogue near Capernaum whose only daughter, aged about 12 years, was raised from the dead by Jesus (Mt 9 18 26; Mk 5 22 43; Lk 8 41 56). The accounts of the miracle are substantially the same, but vary in detail. According to Mk and Lk the arrival of Jairus in Capernaum fell immediately after the return of Jesus from Gadara, but according to Mt the sequence of events was that Jesus had returned to Capernaum, had called Matthew, had joined the feast of the publicans, and had just finished His discourse on fasting when Jairus came to Him. Mt and Mk both testify to the great faith of Jairus, who besought of Jesus that He should but lay His hand upon the maid and she should live. According to Mt she was already dead when Jairus came to Capernaum; according to Mk she was on the point of death; but all agree as to her death before the arrival of Jesus and His followers at her abode. Mt implies that Jesus alone was present at the actual raising; Mk and Lk state that Peter, James, John and the parents were also there. The healing of the woman with the issue of blood by Jesus on the way is given by all.

JAKAN, ja'kan (גָּאָן, ya'dân). See JAKAN.

JAKEH, ja'ke (גָּאֶה, ya'eh, perhaps from Arab. root meaning "carefully religious"; נָאֶה, n'eh, as if from נָאֶה, n'eh): The father of Agur, the author of the sayings recorded in Prov 30 1. Nothing is known of either Jakeh or Agur. The immediate connection in the Heb text of ha-massah, "the pasture" or "burden" (AV "even the prophecy," RV "the oracle") with נָאֶה, n'eh, "oracle," (AV "spake," RV "saith") is quite exceptional, while the ver is unintelligible and the text, as the LXX shows, is evidently corrupt. The best emendation is that which changes ha-massah, "the prophecy," into ha-massah; "the Massaite," or into mimmassah, "of Massa (RVm), Massa being the name of the country of an Ishmaelite tribe (of Gen 25 14, 1 Ch 1 30; Prov 31 1 RVm). See AGUR.

JAKIM, ja'kim (גַּקֵימ, ya'kim, "he [God] lifteth up"); cf ELIAKIM:

(1) A Benjamite, a son of Shimei (1 Ch 8 19). Either a priest, the head of the 12th of the 24 courses into which the priests were divided (1 Ch 24 12).

JALAM, ja'lam (גַּלֹם, ya'lam, according to BDB following LXX 'Igalom, Iglom, in Gen, from יָלֹם, ya'lam, meaning "to conceal"; according to Gunkel, Gen 1, 390, from יָלֹם, ya'lam, "mountain-goat"); see HPN, 90, n. 5; AV Jaalam): In Gen 36 5 14 18; 1 Ch 1 35, a son of Esau, mentioned as the 2d son by Oholibamah; probably an Edomite clan.

JALON, ja'lôn (גַּלון, ya'lon, meaning unknown): In 1 Ch 4 17, a son of Ezrah, a Judahite.

JAMBRES, ja'mbres. See JANNES AND JAM-BRER.

JAMBRI, ja'mbri (אִ֫בִּר, Iabibir, hoi huios Jambrii; 1 Mace 9 36 41): The sons of Jambri are said to have come out of Medeba (originally Med`ba), a city of the Moabites, and subsequently a possession of the Amorites, and to have carried off John, the brother of Jonathan, who pretended Judas Macabeaeus as leader of the Jews. The James

Israeleites got possession of the place and assigned it to the tribe of Reuben. No mention is made elsewhere of the Jambri. In Jos (Ant, XIII, 1, 2), they are called "sons of Amaranus."

JAMES, Ἰάκωβος (Iâkobos, Iâdchô): English form of Jacob, and the name of several men noted:

1. The Son of Zebedee, one of the Twelve Apostles (ἀπὸ τοῦ Ζεβεδαίου, ὁ τῶν Ζεβεδαίων):

I. In NT.—To the Synoptists alone are we indebted for any account of this James. He was the son of Zebdeee and the brother of John (Mt 4:21; Mk 1:19; Lk 5:10). The Synoptists generally place the name of James before that of John, and allude to the latter as "the brother of James." It is inferred that James was the elder of the two brothers. His name was probably Salome, the sister of the mother of Jesus (cf Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40; Jn 19:25), but this is disputed by some (cf Brethren of the Lost). J. was a fisherman by trade, and worked along with his father and his brother (Mk 1:17). These are partners in Simon (5:10), and this is also implied in Mk (1:19). As they owned several boats and employed hired servants (Lk 5:11; Mk 1:20), the establishment they possessed must have been considerable. The call to J. to follow Christ (Mt 4:18-22; Mk 1:16-20; Lk 5:1-11) was given by Jesus as He was walking by the sea of Galilee (Mt 4:18). There He saw "James the son of Zebedee," and Jesus called His name, and also that of his brother, in the boat with Zebedee their father, mending their nets; and called them. And they straightway left the boat and their father, and followed Him (Mt 4:21-22). The account of Lk varies in part from that of Mk, and contains the additional detail of the miraculous draught of fishes, at which J. and John also were amazed. This version of Lk is regarded by some as an amalgamation of the earlier accounts with Jn 21:1-8.

As the above incident took place after the imprisonment of John the Baptist, when Jesus had departed into Galilee (Mt 4:12; Mk 14), and as there is no mention of J. among those who received the preaching of the Baptist, it is improbable that he was called by the Baptist at this time. The call recorded by Jn (Jn 21:30) is probably that while Peter and Andrew made the pilgrimage to Bethany, J. and the other partners remained in Galilee to carry on the business of their trade. The accounts of the departure of Peter and Andrew, the inquiries of J. must have been eager concerning what they had seen and heard. His mind and imagination became filled with their glowing accounts of the "new-born" Lamb of God (Jn 1:30) and of the preaching of John the Baptist, until he inwardly dedicated his life to Jesus and only awaited an opportunity to declare his allegiance openly. By this is the apparently abrupt nature of the call, as recorded by the Synoptists, to be explained.

2. First Call of James (Mt 4:18).—"James the son of Zebedee." This name of Jesus is given to his brother, and that of James and John are used in the earlier accounts with Jn 21:1-8.

3.Probation and Ordination (Jn 21:30).—It is probable that while Peter and Andrew made the pilgrimage to Bethany, J. and the other partners remained in Galilee to carry on the business of their trade. The accounts of the departure of Peter and Andrew, the inquiries of J. must have been eager concerning what they had seen and heard. His mind and imagination became filled with their glowing accounts of the "new-born" Lamb of God (Jn 1:30) and of the preaching of John the Baptist, until he inwardly dedicated his life to Jesus and only awaited an opportunity to declare his allegiance openly. By this is the apparently abrupt nature of the call, as recorded by the Synoptists, to be explained.

From this time onward he occupied a prominent place among the apostles, and, along with Peter and John, became the special confidant of Jesus. These three alone of the Twelve Apostles were present at the raising of Jairus' daughter ( Mk 5:37; Lk 8:51), at the Transfiguration (Mt 17:1-8; Mk 9:2-8; Lk 9:28-36), and at the Agony in the Garden of Gethsemane (Mt 26:36-46; Mk 14:27-31). Shortly after the Transfiguration, when Jesus, having "eisdeinos" set his face to go to Jerusalem (Lk 9:51), was passing through Samaria, the ire of J. and John was kindled by the ill reception accorded to Him by the populace (Lk 9:53). They therefore asked of Jesus, "Lord, wilt thou that we bid fire to come down from heaven, and consume them?" (Lk 9:54). "But he turned, and rebuked them" (ver 55). It was probably this hot-headed impetuosity and fanaticism that won for them the surname "Boanerges, which is, Sons of thunder," bestowed on them by the Twelve (Mk 3:17). Yet upon this last occasion, there was some excuse for their action. The impression left by the Transfiguration was still deep upon them, and they felt strongly that their Lord, whom they had lately beheld "in his glory," with "countenance altered," and "glistening raiment," should be subjected to such indignities by the Samaritans. Upon the occasion of Jesus' last journey to Jerus (Mk 10:32), the two brothers gave expression to this presumptuous impetuosity in a more selfish manner (Mt 10:40). They were seeking on their intimacy with Jesus, they made the request of Him, "Grant unto us that we may sit, one on thy right hand, and one on thy left hand, in thy glory" (Mk 10:37). In the account of Mt 20:20-28, the words are put in the mouth of their mother. The request drew forth the rebuke of Jesus (Mk 10:38), and moved the ten with indignation (Mk 10:40); but by the words of their Lord peace was again restored (Mk 10:41-45).

After the arrival of James in Jerusalem, when He "sat on the mount of Olives over against the temple," J. was one of the four who put the question to Him concerning the last things (Mk 13:3). He was also present when the risen Jesus appeared for the 3rd time in Jerusalem, and was one of the 11 who were present when He said to His disciples, "Go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature. . . . He shall be Lord both of Jews and of Gentiles" (Acts 1:8).

J. was the first martyr among the apostles, being slain by King Herod Agrippa I about 44 AD, shortly before Herod's own death.

5. Death (Acts 12:2).—The account says nothing concerning his death. This point is left to be filled in by the legend of him as the patron saint of Spain. The legend of his martyrdom there, of his death in Judea, of the trans-
James is generally identified with James the Little or the Less, the brother of Joses and son of Mary (Mt 27:56; Mk 15:40). In Jn 19:25 this Mary is called the wife of Cleophas (AV) or Clopas (RV), who is thus in turn identified with Alpheus. There is evidence in apocryphal lit. of a Simon, a son of Clopas, who was also one of the disciples (cf. Nathanael). If this be the same Simon Zelotes, why it he and James (i.e. being brothers) were coupled together in the apostolic lists of Lk and Acts. Some have applied the phrase “his mother’s sister” in Jn 19:25 to Mary the wife of Clopas, instead of to a separate person, and have thus attempted to identify James the son of Alpheus with James the brother of Our Lord. For a further discussion of the problem, see Buretm of the Lord.

(3) James, “the Lord’s brother” (ο δεσδέφος τοῦ Κριου του Κυριου). I. NT References.—This James is mentioned by name only twice in the Gospels, i.e. when, on the visit of Jesus to Nazareth, the countrymen of Our Lord referred in contemptuous terms to His earthly kindred, in order to disparage His preaching (Mt 13:55; Mk 6:3). As J was one of “His brethren,” he was probably among the group of Christ’s relatives who sought to interview Him during His tour through Galilee with the Twelve (Mk 1:28). By the same reasoning he accompanied Jesus on His journey to Capernaum (Jn 2:12), and joined in attempting to persuade Him to depart from Galilee for Judaea on the eve of the Feast of Tabernacles (Jn 7:3). At this feast J. was present (7:10), but was at this time a non-believer in Jesus (cf. 7 5, “Even his brethren did not believe on him”).

Yet the seeds of conversion were being sown within him, for, after the crucifixion, he remained in Jesus with his mother and brethren, and formed one of that earliest band of believers (Acts 1:14). While there, he probably took part in the election of Matthias to the vacant apostleship (Acts 1:25). J. was one of the earliest witnesses to the resurrection, for, after the risen Lord had manifested Himself to the five hundred, “he was seen of James” (1 Cor 15:7 AV). By this his growing belief and prayerful expectancy received confirmation, and it was then that he received the name of “James, the Lord’s brother” (Gal 1:19), was still in Jesus, and had an interview there for the first time with Paul, when the latter returned from his 3 years’ sojourn in Damascus to visit Cephas, or Peter (Gal 1:18; cf Acts 22:15). Hence, according to the genealogy he has the same name as J. was coupled with that of Peter. Thus, when Peter escaped from prison (about 44 AD), he gave instructions to those in the house of John Mark that they should immediately inform “James and the brethren” of the matter of his escape (Acts 12:17). By the time of the Jerus convention, i.e. about 51 AD (cf Gal 2 1), J. had reached the position of first overseer in the church (cf Acts 16 13). Previous to this date, during Paul’s ministry at Antioch, he had dispatched one of his men thither to further the mission, and the teaching of these had caused dissension among the newly converted Christians and their leaders (Acts 16 1.2; Gal 2 12). The conduct of Peter, over whom J. seems to have had considerable influence, was the principal matter of contention (cf Gal 2 11-12). However, at the Jerus convention the dispute was amicably settled, and the pillars of the church, J., John and Cephas, gave to Paul and Barnabas the right hand of fellowship (Gal 2 9). The speech of J. on this occasion (Acts 15:12-20), his sympathy with the religious needs of the gentile world (ver 17), his desire that formalism should raise no barrier to their moral and spiritual advancement (vs 19.20.28-29), and his large-hearted tributes to the beloved Barnabas and Paul (ver 25) show that J. was a leader in whom the church was blessed, a leader who loved peace more than faction, the spirit more than the law, and who perceived that religious communities with different forms of observance might still live and work in common allegiance to Christ. One more (58 AD), J. was head of the council at Jerus when Paul made report of his labors, this time of his 3d missionary journey (Acts 21 17 ff). At this meeting Paul was admonished for exceeding his authority, as he had received at the first council, in that he had endeavored to persuade the converted Jews also to neglect circumcision (Acts 21 21), and was commanded to join in the vow of purification (Acts 21:22-26). There is no Scriptural account of the death of J. From 1 Cor 9:5 it has been inferred that he was married. This is, however, only a conjecture, as the passage refers to those who “lead about a sister, a wife” (AV), while, so far as we know, J. remained throughout his life in Jerus.

This J. has been regarded as the author of the Ep. of Jas, “a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ”; cf James, Epistle of. Also, for details concerning his relationship to Christ, cf Buretm of the Lord.

II. References in Apocryphal Literature.—J. figures in one of the miracles in the apocryphal account of “the Gospel of the Infancy, by Thomas the Israelite philosopher,” being cured of a snake-bite by the infant Jesus (cf Hennock, Handbuch zu den neutestamentlichen Apokryphen, 78). According to the Gospel of the Hebrews (cf ib, 11-21), J. had also partaken of the cup of the Lord, and refused to eat till he had seen the risen Lord. Christ acknowledged this tribute by appearing to him. In the Acts of Peter (cf Budge, Continuations of the Apocryphal Acts, 11, 475), it is stated that “three days after the ascension of Our Lord into heaven, James, whom our Lord called his brother in the flesh, consecrated the Offering and we all drew nigh to partake thereof; and when ten days had passed after the ascension of our Lord, we all assembled in the holy fortress of Zion, and we stood up to say the priestly prayer. Then we made supplication unto God and besought Him with humility, and James also entreated Him concerning the descent of the Holy Ghost upon the Offering.” (J. The Preaching of St. James the Just (cf Budge, 11, 78-81), tells of the appointment of J. the brother of the Lord to the office of his preaching, healing of the sick and casting out of devils there. This is confirmed by the evidence of Eusebius (Ecclesiast., viii, 11), who reports that the martyrdom of St. James the Just (cf Budge, 11, 82-89), J. was there. It is stated that J., “the Lord’s brother,” was martyred to death, by his preaching. Pibiasa from her husband Ananus, the governor of Jerus. Ananus therefore named the Jews against J. and they hurled him from off the pinnacle of the temple. Hegesippus, quoted by Eusebius (H.E. 11, 22), and Jos (Ant. x. x. 1), testify to the general truth of this. It is said by Hegesippus that James was martyred about 62 or 63 AD.

Besides the ep. which bears his name, J. was also the reputed author of the Protevangelium Jacobi, a work which originated in the 2d cent. and received later additions (cf. Henn, N.A., 47-63; also Joseph, Husband of Mary).

LITERATURE
1. Characteristics of the Epistle.—The Ep. of Jas is the most Jewish writing in the NT. The Gospel characterizes the Jews for the Jews. The Ep. to the He is addressed explicitly to them. The Apocalypse is full of the spirit of the OT. The Ep. of Jude is Jewish too. Yet all of these books have more Jewish characteristics than this ep. which, more than any but one written in the NT, is Jewish. The whole epistle might find its place just as properly in the (Canos of the OT) as in that of the NT, as far as the substance of doctrine and contents is concerned. That could not be said of any other book in the NT. There is no mention of the incarnation or of the resurrection, the two fundamental facts of the Christian faith. The word “God” does not occur in the ep. The word “Messiah” is not used in the ep. There is no suggestion that the Messiah has appeared and no presentation of the possibility of redemption through Him. The teaching throughout is that of a lofty morality which aims at the fulfillment of the requirements of the Mosaic law. It is not strange therefore that Spitta and others have thought that we have in the Ep. of Jas a treatise written by an unconverted Jew which has been adapted to Christian use by the interpolation of the two phrases containing the name of Christ and the names of the apostles. Spitta thinks that this can be the only explanation of the fact that we have here an ep. practically ignoring the life and work of Jesus and every distinctively Christian doctrine, and without a trace of any of the great controversies in the early Christian church or any of the specific features of its propaganda. This judgment is a superficial one, and rests upon superficial indications rather than any appreciation of the underlying spirit and principles of the book. The spirit of Christ is here, and there is no need to label it. The principles of this ep. are the principles of the Sermon on the Mount. There are more is to that Sermon in this ep. than can be found anywhere else in the NT in the same space. The ep. represents the idealization of Jewish legalism under the transforming influence of the Christian motive and life. It is not a theological discussion. It is an ethical appeal. It has to do with the outward life for the most part, and the life it pictures is that of a Jew informed with the spirit of Christ. The spirit is invisible in the ep. as in the individual man. It is the body which appears and the outward life with which that body has to do. The body of the ep. is Jewish, and the outward life to which it exhorts is that of a Jew informed with the spirit of Christ. The Jews familiar with the OT would read this ep. and find its language and tone that to which they were accustomed in their sacred books. Jas is evidently written by a Jew for Jews. It is Jewish in character throughout. This is apparent in the following particulars: (1) The ep. is addressed to the 12 tribes which are of the Dispersion (1 1). The Jews were scattered abroad through the ancient world. From Babylon to Rome, wherever any community of them might be gathered for commercial or social purposes, these exhortations could be carried and read. Probably the ep. was circulated mostly in Syria and Asia Minor, but it may have gone out to the ends of the earth. And there in the ghettos of the Rom Empire, groups of the Jewish exiles would gather and listen while one of their number read this letter from home. All of its terms and its allusions would recall familiar home scenes. (2) Their meeting-place is called “your synagogue” (2 2). (3) Abraham is mentioned as “our father” (2 21). (4) God is given the OT name, “the Lord of Sabaoth” (5 4). (5) The law is not to be spoken against nor judged, but reverently and loyally obeyed. It is a royal law to which every loyal Jew will be subject. It is a law of liberty, to be fully obeyed (2 15-16; 4 11). (6) The sins of the flesh are not inveighed against in the ep., but those sins to which the Jews were more conspicuously liable, such as the love of money and the distinction which money may bring (2 2-4), worldliness and pride (4 6-7), impatience and impatience of being (5 7-11), and other sins of the temper and tongue (3 1-12; 4 11.12). (7) The illustrations of faithfulness and patience and prayer are found in OT characters, in Abraham (2 21), Rahab (2 25), Job (6 11), and Elijah (6 17.18). The whole atmosphere of the ep. is Jewish.

The writer of this ep. speaks as one having authority. He is not on his defence, as Paul so often is. There is no trace of apology in his presentation of the truth. His position is the most solemnly recognized and unquestioned. He is as sure of his standing with his readers as he is of the absoluteness of his message.

No OT lawyer or prophet was more certain that he spoke the word of the Lord. He has the vehemence of Elijah and the assured meekness of Moses. He has been called “the Amos of the NT.” and there are paragraphs which recall the very expressions used by Amos and which are full of the same fiery eloquence and prophetic fervor. Both fill their writing with metaphors drawn from the sea and the sky, from natural objects and domestic experiences, and they are both men who have been tried and to be in sympathy with simplicity and poverty. Both inveigh against the luxury and the cruelty of the rich, and both abhor the pretentiousness of his which are substituted for individual righteousness. Malachi was not the last of the OT prophets. The Baptist was not the last prophet of the Old Dispensation. The writer of this ep. stands at the end of that prophetic line, and he is greater than John the Baptist or any who have preceded him because he stands within the borders of the kingdom of Christ. He speaks with authority as a messenger of God. He belongs to the goodly fellowship of the prophets and of the apostles. He has the authority of both. There are 84 imperatives in the 108 verses of this ep.

The ep. is interested in conduct more than in creed. It has very little formulated theology, less than any other ep. in the NT; but the same principles are present throughout. It begins and it closes with exhortation to patience and prayer. It preaches a gospel of good works, based upon love to God and love to man. It demands liberty, equality, fraternity for all. It enjoins humility and justice and peace. It preaches singlehood of purpose and simplicity of soul. It requires obedience to the law, control of the passions, and control of the tongue. Its ideal is to be found in a good life, characterized by the meekness of wisdom. The writer of the ep. is a bishop of the epistle of the ancient prophets, but the lessons that he teaches are taken, for the most part, from the Wisdom lit. of the OT and the Apoc. His direct quotations are from the Pentateuch and the Book of Prov; but it has been estimated that there are 10 allusions to the Book of Prov, 8 to the Book of Job, 5 to the Book of Woes and 5 to the Book of Ecclesiastes. This wisdom lit. furnishes the staple of his meditation and the substance of his teaching. He has little or nothing to say about the great doctrines of the Christian church.

He has much to say about the wisdom that cometh down from above. It is pure, peaceful, gentle, easy to be entreated, full of mercy and good fruits, without partiality, without hypocrisy (Jas 1:17-18). The whole ep. shows that the author had stored his mind with this rich treasure of the ancient wisdom, and his material, which often makes his ep. both bold and new. The form is largely that of the Wisdom lit. of the Jews. It has more parallels with Jesus the son of Sirach than with any writing of the earlier books.

The substance of its exhortation, however, is to be found in the Synoptics and more particularly in the Sermon on the Mount. Its wisdom is the wisdom of Jesus the son of Joseph, who is the Christ.

These are the three outstanding characteristics of this ep. In form and on the surface it is the most Jewish and least Christian of the writings in the NT, yet the simple Christian morality, faithful in its observance of all the ritual regulations of the Jewish faith. Hegesippus tells us that he was holy from his mother's womb. He drank no wine nor strong drink. He ate no flesh. He alone was permitted to enter with the priests into the holy place, and he was found there frequently upon his knees begging forgiveness for the people, and his knees became hard like those of a camel in consequence of his constantly bending them in his worship of God and asking forgiveness for the people (Euseb., HE, II, 23). He was called the James the Just. All had confidence in his sincerity and integrity, and many were persuaded by him to believe in the Christ. This Jovianus, as Christianity is latent and not apparent. Yet it is the moral authority that speaks to us in the ep. in the NT, unique to those of the apostle John. Jesus had occupied a position of undisputed primacy in the Christian church. This primacy John must have found when he wrote his ep. It is noteworthy that the writer of this ep. assumed a position of like authority with that of John. John was the apostle of love, Paul, of faith, and Peter of hope. This writer is the apostle of good works, the author of wisdom which manifests itself in peace and purity, mercy and morality, and in obedience to the royal law, the law of liberty. In its union of Jewish form, authoritative tone, and insistence, upon practical morality, the ep. is unique among the NT books.

II. Author of the Epistle.—The address of the ep. states that the writer is "James, a servant of God and of the Lord Jesus Christ" (1:1). The tradition of the church has identified this James with the brother of Our Lord. Clement of Alexandria says that Peter and James and John, who were the three apostles most honored of the Lord, chose James, the Lord's brother, to be the bishop of Jerusalem after the Lord's ascension (Euseb., HE, II, 1). This tradition agrees well with all the notices of James in the NT books. After the death of James the brother of John, Peter was thrown into prison, and having been miraculously released, he asked that the news be sent to James and to the brethren. This James is in evidence in authority in the church at this time. In the apostolic conference held at Jerusalem, after Peter and Paul and Barnabas had spoken, this same James sums up the whole discussion, and his decision is adopted by the assembly and formulated in a letter which has some very striking [as in its phrasingology to this ep. (Acts 15:6-29). When Paul came to Jerusalem for the last time he reported his work to James and all the elders present with him (Acts 21:18). In the ep. to the Gal Paul says that at the time of one of his visits to Jerusalem he saw none of the apostles save Peter and James and the Lord's brother (Gal 1:18). At another visit he received the right hand of fellowship from James and Cephas and John (Gal 2:9). At a later time certain who came from James to Antioch led Peter into backsliding from his former position of tolerance of the Gentiles as equals in the Christian church (Gal 2:12).

All of these references would lead us to suppose that James held a position of supreme authority in the mother-church at Jerusalem, the oldest church of Christendom. He presides in the assemblies of the church. He speaks the final and authoritative word. Peter and Paul defer to him. Paul mentions his name before that of Peter and John. When he was excited to this leadership we do not know, but all indications seem to point to the fact that at a very early period James was the recognized executive authority in the church at Jerusalem. This was the church of Pentecost and the church of the apostles. All Jews looked to Jesus as the chief seat of their worship and the central authority of their religion. All Christian Jews would look to Jesus as the primitive source of their religion and faith, and the head of the church at Jerusalem would be recognized by them as their chief authority. The authoritative tone of this ep. comports well with this position of primacy ascribed to James.

All tradition agrees in describing James as a Hebrew of the Hellenists, a man of great piety, of vast knowledge, and morality, faithful in his observance of all the ritual regulations of the Jewish faith. James, as a scribe of the Law, is well equipped to judge of the numerous and subtle questions, which had been raised about the law. James was a man of authority and of great wisdom, of whom enough has been said. If the wise and good advice, which is given here, be intended to be a commentary on the Law, we may be justified in concluding that the author was a Hebrew, a more rigid adherence to the Law, and a more ardent love of the Jewish religion. But if the advice is also to be understood as a commentary upon the Christian religion, and a regulation of the conduct of Christians, we may as well conclude that the author was a Christian, a man of great ability and wisdom. He is not the author of the Epistle of Jude, but he was in the line of Jude. His advice is, however, of a more practical character than that of Jude. He argues all the positions for which he contends. He is not the same man as the James of the Epistle of Jude; but he was a member of the same family. He was likely the son of one of the apostles, and the brother of James the Lord's brother. James 1:1 is the address of the epistle of James. The epistle is signed James 1:1, but it is not possible to determine to whom it was written, whether to the church at Jerusalem, to the church of Antioch, or to some other church.

I. Its Plausibility.

Plausibility. There is usually no good reason for misunderstanding anything James says. He puts his truth plainly, and the words he uses have no hidden or mystical meanings. His thought is transparent as his life. It is somewhat surprising to find that the Gr. of the Ep. of Jas is better than that of the other NT writers, with the single exception of the author of the Ep. to the Hebrews. Of course this may be due to the fact that James had the same amanuensis who was a Gr scholar, or that his own MS was revised by such a man; but, although unexpected, it is not impossible that James himself may have been capable of writing such Gr as this.

It is not the good Gr of the classics, and it is not the poor and provincial Gr of Paul. There is no literary form than in the uncooked periods of the gentlest apostle, and the vocabulary would seem to indicate an acquaintance with the literary Gr. 11:29-31, and the conversational Gr. "Galilee was studded with Gr towns, and it was certainly in this Gr region that James learned to gain a knowledge of Gr. ... We may reasonably suppose that our author would not have scoured the Gr classics to avail himself of the opinions of such men as... It is present, not so much to master the Gr language, and learn something of Gr philosophy. This would be natural, even if we think of James as impelled only by a desire to gain wisdom and knowledge for himself; but if we think of him also as the principal teacher of the Jewish believers, many of whom were Hellenists, instructed in the wisdom of Alexandria, then the epistle as a whole (1:12) would be, "he would be a student of Gr in order that he might be a more effective instructor to his own people" (Mayor, The Ep. of James, p. 25). The Gr of the ep. is the study to which Or of one who was not a native to it, but who had familiarized himself with its literature. James could have done so and the ep. may be proof that he did.

James is never content to talk in abstractions. He always sets a picture before his own eyes and those of his readers. He has the 3. Its Vividness of sustained interest. He is not diluting things in general but things in particular. He is an artist and believes in concrete realities. At the same time he has a touch of poetry in him, and a fine sense of the analogies running through all Nature and all life. The doubling vision like the two sides (1:6). The rich man fades away in his goings, even as the beauty of the flower falls and perishes (1:11). The synagogues scene with its distinction between the rich and the poor before us with the clear-out impressiveness of a cameo (2:1-4). The Pecksniffian philanthropist, who seems to think that men can be fed not by bread alone but by the words that proceed magnificently from his mouth, is pilloried here (2:15,16). The sword that is set on fire of hell is put in the full blaze of its world of iniquity, and the damage it does is shown to be like that of a forest fire (3:1-12). The picture of the wisdom that comes from above with its sevenfold excellences of purity, peaceableness, gentleness, mercy, fruitfulness, impartiality, sincerity, is worthy to hang in the gallery of the world's masterpieces (3:17). The vaunting tradesmen, whose lives are like vanishing vapor, stand there before the eye conducted in the later (3:18). The rich, whose luxuries he describes even while he denounces their cruelties and prophesies their coming day of slaughter, are the rich who walk the streets of his own city (5:1-6). His short sentences go like shots straight to the mark. We feel the impact and the impress of them. There is an energy behind them and a reality in them that makes them live in our thought. His abrupt questions are like the quick interrogations of a cross-examining lawyer (3:5-11, 12, 13). His parentheticals have the intensity of the accumulated and compressed wisdom of the ages. They are irreducible minimums. They are memorable sayings, treasured in the speech of the world ever since his day.

Sometimes James adds sentence to sentence with the repetition of some leading word or phrase (1:1-6,19-24; 3:2-8). It is the painful style of one who is not altogether at home with the language which he has chosen as the vehicle of his thought. It is the method by which a dislocation could be consumed indissolubly. Nothing but the vividness of the imagery and the intensity of the thought saves James from fatal monotony in the use of this device.

James has a keen eye for illustrations. He is not blind to the beauties and wonders of Nature. He sees what is happening on every hand, and he is quick to catch any homiletical suggestion it may hold. Does he stand by the seashore? The surge of St. James, 1:4. The surging and tossing reminds him of the man who is unstable in all his ways, because he has no anchorage of faith, and his convictions are like driftwood on a sea of doubt (1:6). Then he notices that the great ships are turned about by a small rudder (2:1). But the tongue is a small member but it accomplishes great things (3:4,5). Does he walk under the sunlight and rejoice in it as the source of so many good and perfect gifts? He sees in it an image of the goodness of God that is never eclipsed and never exhausted, unvarying for evermore (1:17). He uses the natural phenomena in which he lives to make his meaning plain at every turn: the flower of the field that passes away (10:11), the forest fire that sweeps the mountain side and like a living torch lights up the whole land (3:5), the leaves and salt springs (1:11), the fig trees and the olive trees and the vines (3:12), the seed-sowing and the fruit-bearing (3:18), the morning mist immediately lost to view (4:14), the early and the latter rain for which the husbandman waiteth patiently (6:7).

There is more of the appreciation of Nature in this one short ep. of James than in all the ep. of Paul put together. Human life was more interesting to Paul than natural scenery. However, James is interested in human life just as profoundly as Paul. He is constantly endowing inanimate things with living qualities. He represents sin as a harlot, conceiving and bringing forth death (1:15). The word of truth has a like power and conceives and brings forth those who live to God's praise (1:15). Pleasures are like gay hosts of enemies in a tournament, who deck themselves bravely and ride forth with singing and laughter, but whose mission is to wage war and to kill (4:1,2). The laborers may all be dumb in the day of the time of the Lord (5:1), but dependence and their fear, but their wages, fraudulently withheld, have a tongue, and cry out to high heaven for vengeance (5:4). What is friendship with the world? It is adultery, James says (4:4). The rust of unjust riches testifies against them (4:7). They have accumulated them, and then turns upon them and eats their flesh like fire (5:3). James observed the man who glanced at himself in the mirror in the morning, and saw that his face was not clean, and who went inward and washed it for that whole day, and he found in him an illustration of the one who heard the word and did not do it (1:22-24). The ep. is full of these rhetorical figures, and they prove that James was something of a poet at heart, even as Jesus was. He writes in prose, but there is a marked rhythm in all of his speech. He has an ear for harmony as he has an eye for beauty everywhere.

The Pauline epistles begin with salutations and close with benedictions. They are filled with autobiographical touches and personal mentions. None of these things appear here. The ep. begins and ends with the one person. It has an address, but no thanksgiving. There are no personal messages and no indications of any intimate personal relationship between the author and his readers. They are his "beloved brethren." He knows their needs and their sins, but he may never have seen their faces or visited their homes. The ep. is more like a prophet's appeal to a nation than a personal letter.

Both the substance of the teaching and the method of its presentation remind us of the discourses of Jesus. James says less about the Master than any other writer in the NT, but his speech is more like that of the Master than the speech of any one of them. There are at least ten parallels to the Sermon on the Mount in this short ep., and for almost everything that James has to say we can recall some statement of Jesus which might have suggested it. When the parallels fail at any point, we are inclined to suspect that James may be repeating some unrecorded utterance of Our Lord. He seems absolutely faithful to his memory of his brother's teaching. He is the exponent of Jesus in all his unrecorded and persuasion.

Did the Master shock His disciples' faith by the, loftiness of the Christian ideal He set before them in His great sermon, "Ye therefore shall be perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect” (Mt 5:48)? James sets the same high standard in the very forefront of his ep.: “Let patience have its perfect work, that ye may be perfect and entire, lacking in nothing” (1:4). Did the Master say, “Ask, and it shall be given you” (Mt 7:11)? James says, “If any of you lacketh wisdom, let him ask of God ... and it shall be given him” (1:5). Did the Master add a condition to His sweeping promise to prayer and say, “Whosoever ... shall not doubt in his heart, but shall believe that what he saith, he shall come to pass, he shall have whatsoever he asketh” (Mt 16:23)? James hastens to add the same condition, “Let him ask in faith, nothing doubting: for he that doubteth is like the surge of the sea driven by the wind and tossed” (1:6). Did the Master close the great sermon with His parable of the Wise Man and the Foolish Man, saying, “Every one that heareth these words of mine, and doeth them, shall be likened unto a wise man. And every one that heareth these words of mine, and doeth not them, shall be likened unto a foolish man” (Mt 7:26)? James is much concerned about wisdom, and therefore he exhorts his readers, “Be ye doers of the word, and not hearers only, defiling your own selves” (1:22). Had the Master declared, “If ye know these things, blessed are ye if ye do them” (Jn 13:17)? James echoes the thought when he says, “A doer that worketh, this man shall be blessed in his doing” (1:25). Did the Master say to the disciples, “Blessed are ye poor: for theirs is the kingdom of God” (Lk 6:20)? James has the same sympathy with the poor, and he says, “Hearken, my beloved brethren; did not God choose them that are poor as to the world to be rich in faith, and heirs of the kingdom which he promised to them that love him?” (2:5). Did the Master inveigh against the rich, as he says, “Woe unto you, ye rich! for ye have received your consolation. Woe unto you, ye that are full now! for ye shall hunger. Woe unto you, ye that laugh now! for ye shall mourn and weep” (Lk 6:24-25)? James bursts forth into the same inverte and prophetizes the same sad reversal of fortune, “Come now, ye rich, weep and howl for your miseries that are coming upon you” (5:1). “Cleanse your hands, ye sinners; and purify your hearts, ye doubleminded. Be offended with your iniquities; and turn away from them; turn to mourning, and your joy to heaviness” (4:9). Had Jesus said, “Judge not, that ye be not judged” (Mt 7:1)? James repeats the exhortation, “Speak not one against another, brethren. He that speaketh against his brother, and judgeth his brother, speaketh against the law; ... but who art thou that judgest thy neighbor?” (4:11,12). Had Jesus said, “Whosoever shall humble himself shall be exalted” (Mt 23:12)? We find the very words in James, “Humble yourselves in the sight of the Lord, and he shall exalt you” (4:10). Had Jesus said, “I say unto you, Swear not at all; neither by the heaven, for it is the throne of God; nor by the earth, for it is the footstool of his feet. ... But let your speech be, Yes, yes; Nay, nay; and whatsoever is more than these is of the evil one” (Mt 5:34-37)? Here in James we come upon the exact: “But above all things, my brethren, swear not, neither by the heaven, nor by the earth, nor by any other oath; but let your yes be yes, and your nay, nay: for whatsoever is more than these is the evil one!” (Mt 5:34-37). We remember how the Master began the Sermon on the Mount with the declaration that even those who murdered and were persecuted and reviled and reproached were blessed, in spite of all their sufferings, because they were blessed as their Master was, “Blessed are the peacemakers; for they shall be called the children of God” (Mt 5:9). James begins his ep. with the same paradoxical putting of the Christian faith, “Count it all joy, my brethren, when ye fall into manifold trials” (1:2 ARV). We remember how Jesus proceeded in His sermon to set forth the spiritual significance and the assured permanence of the law; and we notice that James treats the law with the same respect and puts upon it the same high value. He calls it “the perfect law” (1:25), “the royal law” (2:8), the “law of liberty” (2:12). James is always willing to forgive others in order that we ourselves may be forgiven; and we know where James got his authority for saying, “Judgment is without mercy to him that hath showed no mercy” (2:13). In the parable of the sower, James amplifies the trees and corrupt trees being known by their fruits, “Do men gather grapes of thorns, or figs of thistles?” (Mt 7:16-20). Then in the Ep. of Jas we find a like question, “Can a fig tree, my brethren, yield olives, or a vine figs?” (3:12). We remember that the Master said, “Know ye that he is nigh, even at the doors” (Mt 24:33). We are not surprised to find the statement here in James, “Behold, the judge standeth before the doors” (5:9). These reminiscences of the Master have been quoted to us on every page. It may be that there are many more of them than we are able to identify. Their number is sufficiently large, however, to show us that James is steeped in the truths taught by Jesus, and that they have so often stirred his soul that their phraseology constantly reminds us of Him.

IV. Date of the Epistle.—There are those who think that the Ep. of Jas is the oldest ep. in the NT. Among those who favor an earlier date are Mayer, Plummer, Alford, Starry, Renan, Weiss, Zahn, Beyschlag, Neander, Schneckenburger, Thiersch, and Dods.

The reasons assigned for this conclusion are: (1) the general Judaic tone of the ep., which seems to antedate the admission of the Gentiles into the church; but since the ep. is addressed only to Jews, why should the Gentiles be mentioned in its text? and (2) the fact that Paul and Peter are supposed to have quoted from Jas in their writing; but this reading of quotation in the ep. is so involved that it has been ably argued that the quotation has been the other way about.

Others think that the ep. was written toward the close of James’s life. Among these are Kern, Wiesinger, Schmidt, Brückner, Wordsworth, and Farrar.

These argue (1) that the ep. gives evidence of a considerable lapse of time in the history of the church, sufficient to allow of the composition of Jas by James as one of the Twelve in a later position; (2) that Pentecost and the establishment of distinctions among the brethren; but any of the sins mentioned in the ep. could have been observed among the Jews in any decade of its history. (2) James has a position of established authority, and those to whom he writes are not recent converts, but long standing; but the position of James may have been established from a very early date, and in an encyclical of this sort we could not expect any indication of shorter or longer membership in the church. Doubtless some of those addressed were recent converts, while others may have been members for many years. (3) There are references to persecutions and trials which fit the later rather than the earlier date; but all that is said on this subject might be suitable in any period of the presidency of James at Jerusalem. (4) There is no indication of a long and ap- pointing delay in the Second Coming of the Lord in the repeated exhortation to patience, but the same is no more than the other hand James says, “The coming of the Lord is at hand,” and “The judge standeth before the doors” (5:9). The same passage is cited in the belief that the immediate appearance of the Lord was expected, as in the earliest period of the church, and in proof that there had been a disappointment of this earlier belief and that it had been succeeded by a feeling that there was need of patience in waiting for the coming so long delayed.

It seems clear to us that there are no decisive proofs in favor of any definite date for the ep. It must have been written before the martyrdom of James in the year 63 AD, and at some time during his presidency over the church at Jerusalem; but there is nothing to warrant us in coming to any more definite conclusion than that Davidson, Hilgenfeld, Baur, Zeller, Haushaupt, von Soden, Jülicher, Har-
James, Ep. of Jamin

nack, Bacon and others date the ep. variously in the post-Pauline period, 69-70 to 140-50 AD. The arguments for any of these dates fall far short of proof. James is said to be the author of the first of the so-called Catholic Epis. But it is to be observed that it is disputed; at least, not many of the ancients have mentioned it, as is the case likewise with the ep. that bears the name of Jude, which is also referred to by Eusebius the 2d cent. Nevertheless, we know that these also, with the rest, have been read publicly in most churches” (HE, II, 23). Eusebius himself, however, quotes Jas 4:11 as Scripture and Jas 5:13 as spoken by the holy apostle. Personally he does not seem disposed to question the genuineness of the ep. There are is in phraseology which make it possible that the ep. is quoted in Clement of Rome in the 1st cent., and in Ignatius, Polycarp, Justin Martyr, the Ep. to the Diognetus, Irenaeus, and Hermas in the 2d cent. It is omitted in the canonical list of the Muratorian Fragment and was not included in the Old Lat. version. Orig. seems to be the first writer to quote the ep. explicitly as Scripture and to assert that it was written by James the Lord. It appears in the Fesh version and seems to have been generally recognized in the East. Cyril of Jerusalem, Gregory of Nazianzus, Epiphanius of Edessa, Dalmus of Alexandria, received it as canonical. The writer must accept Carthage 301 AD finally settled its status for the Western church, and from that date in both the East and the West its canonicity was unquestioned until the time of the Reformation.

Erasmus and Cajetan revived the old doubts concerning it. Luther thought it contradicted Paul and therefore banished it to the appendix of his Bible. “James,” he says, “has aimed to refute those who relied on faith without works, and is too weak for his task in mind, understanding, and words, mutilates the Scriptures, and thus directly contradicts Paul and all Scriptures, seeking to accomplish by enforcing the law what the apostles successfully effect by love. Therefore I will not place his Ep. in my Bible among the proper leading books, Colos. 4:14, Eph. 6:23, 2d cent. It was a downright strawy ep., as compared with such as those to the Rom and to the Gal, and it had no real evangelical character. This judgment of Luther is a very hasty and regrettable one. The modern church has refused to accept it, and it is generally conceded now that Paul and James are in perfect agreement with each other, though their presentation of the same truth from opposite points of view brings them into apparent contradiction. Paul says, ‘By grace have ye been saved through faith’ (Eph 2:8-9). ‘We reckon therefore that a man is justified by faith apart from the works of the law’ (Rom 3:24). James says, ‘Faith, if it have not works, is dead in itself’ (2:17). ‘Ye see that by works a man is justified, and not only by faith’ (2:24). With these passages before him Luther said, ‘Many have toiled to reconcile Paul with James. . . but to no purpose, for they are contrary, Faith justifies; Faith does not justify; I will not reconcile these prop. and if he succeeds he may call me a fool’ (Colloquia, II, 202).

It would be difficult to prove Luther a fool if Paul and James were using these words, faith, works, and glory, in the same sense, or else if each were writing with full consciousness of what the other had written. They both use Abraham for an example, James of justification by works, and Paul of justification by faith. How can that be possible? The faith meant by James is the faith of a dead orthodoxy, a forced assent to the dogmas of the church which does not result in any practical righteousness in life, such as a faith as the demons have when they believe in the being of God and simply tremble before Him. The faith meant by Paul is intellectual and moral and spiritual, affects the whole man, and leads him into conscious and vital union and communion with God. It is not the faith of demons; it is the faith that redeems. Again, the works meant by Paul are the works of a professed legalism, the severe mundane impulsion or from a feeling of duty, the works done in obedience to a law which is a taskmaster, the works of a slave and not of a son. These dead works, he declares, can never give life. The works meant by James are the works of a believer, the fruit of the faith and love born in every believer’s heart and manifest in every believer’s life. The possession of faith will insure this evidence in his daily conduct and conversation; and without this evidence the mere profession of faith will not save him. The justification meant by Paul is the initial justification of the Christian life. No doing of meritorious deeds will make a man worthy of salvation. He comes into the kingdom, not on the basis of merit but on the basis of grace, of the throne of God. He cannot buy his way in by good works; he cannot earn his way by faith. It is the gift of God’s free grace. The justification meant by James is the justification of any after-moment in the Christian life, and the final justification before the judgment throne. Good works are inevitable in the Christian life. There can be no assurance of salvation without them.

Paul is looking at the root; James is looking at the fruit. Paul is talking about the beginning of the Christian life; James is talking about its continuance and consummation. With Paul, the works he renounces precede faith and are dead works. With James, the faith he denounces is apart from works and is a dead faith.

Paul believes in the works of godliness just as much as James does. Paul says that God will render to every man according to his works: to them that by patience in well-doing seek for glory and honor and incorruption, eternal life: but unto them that are factious, and obey not the truth, but obey unrighteousness, shall be wrath and indignation, tribulation and anguish, upon every soul of man that worketh evil, of the Jew first, and also of the Gr; but glory and honor and peace to every man that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Gr” (Rom 2 6-10). This is the final justification discussed by James, and it is put as clearly a judgment by works with Paul as with him.

On the other hand James believes in saving faith as well as Paul. He begins with the statement that the proving of our faith works patience and purification, because of the burning desire of the prayer of faith will bring the coveted wisdom (1 6). He describes the Christian profession as a holding “the faith of our Lord Jesus Christ, the Lord of glory” (2 1). He says that the poor as to the world are rich in faith, and therefore heirs to the kingdom (2 5). He quotes the passage from Gen, “Abraham believed God, and it was reckoned unto him for righteousness” (2 5), and he explicitly asserts that Abraham’s “faith wrought with his works, and by works was faith made perfect” (2 22). The faith mentioned in all these passages is the faith of the professing Christian; it is not the faith which the non-exercising in aspiring salvation. James and Paul are declaring that faith, which must go hand in hand in the Christian life, and that in the Christian’s experience both faith without works is dead and works without faith are dead works. They both believe in faith working through love as that which alone will avail in Christ Jesus (Gal 5 6). Fundamentally they agree. Superficially they seem to contradict each other. That is because they are talking about different things and using the same terms with different meanings for those terms in mind.

VI. The Message of the Epistle to Our Times.—

There are those who talk holiness and are hypocrites; those who make profession of perfect love and yet cannot live peaceably with their brethren; those who are full of pious phraseology but fall in practical philanthropy. This ep. was written for them. It may not give them much comfort, but it ought to give them much profit. The mystery that constitutes itself with pious frames and phrases and comes short in actual service and devoted service will find its antidote here. The antinomianism that professes great confidence in free grace, but does not recognize the necessity for conformity of life, needs to ponder the practical wisdom of this ep. The quietists who are satisfied to sit and sing themselves away to everlasting bliss ought to read this ep. until they catch its bugle note of inspiration to present activity and continuous good deeds. All who are long on theory and short on practice ought to keep themselves in the spirit of James; and since there are such people in every community and in every age, the message of the ep. will never grow old.

The old sociological problems are to the front today. The old problems were social reformers, and James is most like them in the NT. Much literature of the age says that he is applicable to present-day conditions. He lays down the right principles of practical philanthropy, and the proper relationships between master and man, and between man and man. If the teachings of this ep. were put into practice throughout the church it would mean the revitalization of Christianity. It would prove that the Christian religion was practical and workable, and it would go far to establish the final brotherhood of man in the service of God.

The life of Our Lord is the most important life in the history of the race. It will always be a subject of the deepest interest and study. Character of Jesus is one of the most enduring of all knowledge; they might add to our store of information concerning the Christ. We suggest that there is a field here to which conscientious attention has not been sufficiently directed. James was the brother of the Lord. His ep. tells us much about himself. On the supposition that he did not exhort others to be what he would not furnish them an example in being, we read in this ep. his own character writ large. He was like his brother in so many things. As we study the life and character of James we come to know more about the life and character of Jesus.

Jesus and James had the same mother. From her they had their inheritance. They reproposed their mother’s characteristics they were alike. They had the same home training. As far as the father in that home could succeed in putting the impress of his own personality upon the boys, they would be alike. It is inconceivable in the context that Joseph is said in the Gospel to have been “a just man” (Mt 1 19 AV), and that James came to be known through all the early church as James the Just, and that in his ep. he gives this title to his brother, Jesus, when he says of the unjust rich of James, “he condemned and killed the just” (6 4 AV). Joseph was just, and James was just, and Jesus was just. The brothers were alike, and they were like the father in this respect. The two brothers seem to think alike and talk alike to a most remarkable degree.

They represent the same home surroundings and human environment, the same religious training and inherited characteristics. Surely, then, all that we learn concerning James will help us to better understand Jesus.

They are alike in their poetical insight and their practical wisdom. They are both fond of figurative speech, and it seems always natural and unforced. The discourses of Jesus are filled with birds and flowers and winds and clouds and all the sights and sounds of rural life in Pal. The writings of James abound in reference to the field flowers and the meadows, grass and the meek, fountains and the burning wind and the early and the latter rain. They are alike in their emotional attitude and spiritual alertness. They have much in common in the material equipment of their thought. James was well versed in the apoe aorist that Jesus was just as familiar with these books as he? James seems to have acquired a comparative mastery of the Gr language and to have had some acquaintance with the Gr philosophy. Would not Jesus have been as well furnished in these lines as James was?

What was the character of James? All tradition testifies to his personal purity and persistent devotion, commanding the reverence and the respect of all who knew him. As we trace the various elements of his character manifesting themselves in his ep., and his exhortations in this ep., we find rising before us the image of Jesus as well as the image of the Lord, a single-minded man, stedfast in faith and patient in trials. He is slow to wrath, but very quick to protect any sins of speech and hypocrisy. He is full of humility, ready to champion the cause of the oppressed and the poor, and he loves wisdom, and he believes in prayer and practice it in reference to both temporal and spiritual good. He believes in the absolute necessity in the church of brotherly love. He is opposed to anything that will establish any distinctions between brethren in their place of worship. He believes in practical philanthropy. He believes that the right sort of religion will lead a man to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world. A pure religion in his estimation will mean a pure man. He believes that we ought to practise all that we preach.

As we study these characteristics and opinions of the younger brother, does not the image of his and our Elder Brother grow ever clearer before our eyes?

JAMES, PROTEVANGELIUM, pro- teen-jél’ i-un, OF. See APOCRYPHAL GOSPELS.

Jamin, ja’mín ( render, “right hand”): (1) In Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 12; 1 Ch 4 24, a “son” (Dan) of Simeon.
(2) In 1 Ch 2 27, a Judahite, “son” of Ram and grandson of Jerahmeel.

(3) In Neh 8 7, a Levite (?), one of those who “caused the people to understand” the Torah when Ezra enforced it “in Iadunus” in 1 Esd 9 48.

JAMNITES, jâm'ni-ts (יוֹנָה, ha-yanim, coll. with art.): In Nu 26 12, descendants of Jamin (J above).

JAMLECH, jâm'lék (יוֹנָה, yamâlîkh, “may he [God] cause to reign”: A “prince” or chief of the tribe of Simeon (1 Ch 4 24). If ver 41 refers to the preceding list, he lived in the time of Hezekiah.

JAMNIA, jâm'ni-a. See JABNEEL.

JAMNITIC, jm-nî-tîk (יוֹנָה, metâkolosia, materiaology, “vain discourse,” “babbling”): This word is not found in AV; once only in AV (1 Tim 1 6). ARV has “vain talking,” instead of “vain jangling,” and evidently means proud, self-conceited talking against what God has revealed and against God Himself.

JANIM, jânîm (יוֹנָה, yânîm; AV Janum): A place in the Hebron uplands named with Eshan and Beth-tappuah (Josh 15 55); unidentified.

JANNAI, jân'î-î (יוֹנָה, Iannâth, Tisch., Tre., WÌ; †Tavô, Iannô, Tâb; AV Janna): An ancestor of Jesus in Lk’s genealogy, the 5th before Joseph, the husband of Mary (Lk 3 24).

JANES, jân'ês, AND JAMBRES, jm-brês (יוֹנָה, Iannês kal Iâmbôss, Iannês kal Iambôres, 2 Tim 3 8): These are the names of two magicians in ancient Egypt, who withstood Moses and Aaron. “Then Pharaoh also called for the wise men and the sorcerers: and they also, the magicians of Egypt, did in like manner with their enchantments.” Jannes and Jambres were evidently two of the persons referred to in this passage. It should be observed that the word tr † here “magicians” occurs also in Gen 41 8 in connection with Pharaoh’s dreams: Pharaoh “sent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof.” RVm reads for “magicians,” “or sacred scribes.” The Heb word is hârûmûnûm, and means sacred scribes who were skilled in the sacred writing, that is in the hieroglyphics: they were a variety of Egypt priests. J. and J. were doubtless members of one or other of the various classes spoken of in the passages in Ex and Gen, the midrashim, the sorcerers, and the magicians or sacred scribes.

Japheth, jâ-fêth (יוֹנָה, yepheth; יָפְחֵ, yapheth; Iâphô, Iâpheth): This name, in Gen 9 27, seems to be explained by the phrase Ibyt “may God make wide [yapheth, ARV mologie of ‘enlarge’] for Japheth,” where yapheth Japheth and Japheth are represented by the same consonants, but with different vowel-points. The root of yapheth is yâphâh, “to make wide.” This etymology, however, is not universally accepted, as the word-play is so obvious, and the association of Japheth with Shem (“dark”) and Ham (“black”) suggests a name on similar lines —either gentile, or descriptive of race. Japheth has therefore been explained as meaning “fair,” from yâphâh, the non-Semitic and non-Hamitic races known to the Jews being all more or less whiteskinned. The Tg of Onkelos agrees with the EV, but that of Jonathan has yâpheth, “God shall beauty Japheth,” as though from yâphâh.

The immediate descendants of J. were seven in number, and are represented by the nations designated Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, Tiras; or, according to some, by the descendants of the Armenians, Lydians, Medes, Greeks, Tigranes, and Moscheans, the last, Tiras, remaining still obscure. The sons

There are many curious Jewish traditions regarding J. and J. These traditions, which are found in the Tg and elsewhere, are full of contradictions and impossibilities.

3. Traditions. They are to the effect that J. and J. were sons of Balsam, the soothsayer of Pethor. Notwithstanding this impossibility the date of J. and J., they were said to have withstood Moses 40 years previously at the court of Pharaoh, to whom they had so impressed a dread of that king, as to foretell the birth of Moses and cause the oppression of the Israelites. They are also said to have become proselytes, and it is added that they left Egypt at the Exodus, among the mixed multitude. They are reported to have instigated Aaron to make the golden calf. The traditions of their death are also given in a varying fashion. They were sometimes said to have been slain in a battle against the Medes, and others to have been put to death after the making of the golden calf, or during the slaughter connected with the name of Phinehas.

According to Origen (Comm. on Mt 27 8) there was an apocryphal book—not yet rediscovered—called “The Book of J. and J.”

4. Origen’s statement is that in 2 Tim Statement 3 8 Paul is quoting from that book.

In the Targumic lit. “Jambres occurs as a vari- ant reading instead of ‘Jambres.’” It is thought that Jambres is derived from an Aram. root, meaning “to oppose,” the partic- iple of which would be Mambres. The meaning of either “who opposes” Jannesis perhaps a corruption of Joannes or Johannes (John).
of Gomer (Ashkenaz, Riphat and Togarmah) were all settled in the West Asian tract; while the sons of Javan (Elamish, Tarshish, Kittim and Dodanim or Rodanim) occupied the Mediterranean coast and the adjacent islands.

In Gen 9 27, as in other passages, Japheth occupies the 3d place in the enumeration of the sons of Noah, but he is really regarded as the 2d son, Ham being the youngest. In the genealogical table, however (Gen 10 1 ff), the descendants of Japheth and Noah are given first, and those of Shem last, to set forth their qualities at greater length. Though this would seem to indicate that the fair races were the least known to the Jews, it implies that the latter were well disposed toward them, for Japheth was (ultimately) to dwell in the tents of Shem, and therefore to take part in Shem's spiritual privileges.

It seems unlikely that the Greek giant-hero, Iapetus, father of Prometheus, who was regarded by the Greeks as the father of the human race, had any connection with the Heb and Iapetos Japheth. The original of the Heb record probably belongs to a date too early to admit borrowing from the Gr, and if the name had been borrowed by the Greeks from the Hebrews, a nearer form might be expected. See SHEM; HAM; TABLE OF NATIONS.

JAPHETH, ja'feth (Τάδας, Ιαπεθῆ): A region mentioned only in Jth 2 25, where no particulars are given which may lead to identification. Holofernes "came unto the borders of Japheth, which were toward the south, over against Arabia."

JAPHIA, ja-f'ia, ja-f'i-a (גּאפִּיה, יָפֵחָה), perhaps "tall," or Arab.; Ἰάφης, Ἰαφήθη: (1) King of Lachish, one of the 5 "kings of the Amorites" who allied themselves together in an expedition against Gibeon on account of its treaty with the Israelites (Josh 10 4-5). After their discomfiture by Joshua in the battle of Beth-horon (ver 10), "one of the most important in the history of the world" (Stanley), they fled and hid themselves in the cave at Makkedah (ver 16). As Joshua passed, he was informed of this, but, unwilling to delay his pursuit of the fugitives, he ordered great stones to be rolled unto the mouth of the cave leaving a guard in charge (vs 17 f). On the completion of his victory, Joshua returned to Makkedah and commanded the Israelites to bring forth the imprisoned kings, and summoned the chiefs of his army to plant their feet upon their necks. Then he put them to death; and after he had hung their bodies on 5 trees, he ordered the Israelites in the evening to take them down and cast them into the cave (vs 22-27).

(2) (LXX Ἰαφης, Ἰαφιθῆς, Ἰαφετ, Ἴαφης) Japheth: One of the sons of David who were born to him at Jerusalem (2 S 5 15; 1 Ch 3 7; 16 6). JAMES Crichton

JAPHIAH, ja-f'ia, ja-f'i-a (גּאפִּיה, יָפֵחָה): A town on the southern boundary of Zebulun named with Chiloh-tabor and Daberath (Josh 19 12). It is represented by the modern Yāfā, about 1½ miles S.W. of Nazareth, near the foot of the hills. It was one of the places fortified by Jos (Vita, 45; BJ, II, xx, 6).

JAPHLET, ja-f'let (גּאפִלֶת), yaphlet, "he escapes" [?]" : In 1 Ch 7 32,33, a "son of" Heber, an Asherite.

JAPHLETH, ja-f'leth, ja-f'lē-th: AV in Josh 16 3, where Heb is גּאפִלֶת, ha-yaphleth, "the Japhlethites," RV, a clan said to border on the territory of Joseph, but not mentioned elsewhere.

JAPHO, ja-f'ō: AV and AVM in Josh 19 46 for Joppa (q.v.).

JAR, jār. See BARREL.

JARAH, ja'raḥ (תֵּרָה, yārāh, "honey-comb" [?]): A descendant of King Saul (1 Ch 9 42); but LXX B, A, have "Ιασά, Ταδα = תֵּרָה, yā'raḥ, a name found in LXX of 1 Ch 8 36, where MT has וְּרָה, yē'orah, Jehoadah. Some Heb MSS have yā'raḥ in 9 42, and it should probably be accepted as the correct reading there, for yā'raḥ = Jehoadah yā'raḥ, linguistically; cf Jonathan and Jehonathan, etc.

JAREB, ja-reb, ja-reb (גּאֶרֶב, yā'reb, "let him contend"; LXX Ἰαρεῖς, Jarwmos): Is mentioned twice in Hos (5 13; 10 6) as an Assyrian king who received tribute from Israel, of the We do not know, however, of an Assyrian Name king of that name, or of such a place as is indicated by "the king of Jareb" (5 13 AVM). Sayce (HCM 417) thinks Jareb possibly be the earlier name of Sargon who took Samaria in 722 BC, as the passages in which it appears seem to relate to the last struggles of the Northern Kingdom. This conjecture he bases on the probability that the specific name Monon in IV, following the example of other usurpers of the Assyrian throne before him, assumed the name of Sargon. Those who hold that Hosea's prophecies are probably not later than 734 BC reject this view.

If we take the text in 5 titl stand (yārēḇ yāręḇ), Jareb cannot be regarded as the name of a person, owing to the absence of the King, "king," which is of the Word always inserted in such a case. It is probably an epithet, nickname given to the Assyrian, as is suggested by RVM ("a king that should contend") and AVm ("the king that should plead"), being derived from the yāḇ, "to strive." The rendering would then be "King Combat," "King Contentious," indicating Assyria's general hostility to Israel and the futility of applying for help to that quarter against the will of Jehovah. Some suggest that for mēlek yārub we should read mēlek rāḇ, (being the old nominative termination), or melek rāḇ, "Great King," a title prefixed to names applied to Assyrian monarchs. Others, following the LXX, would read melek rāḇ, "High King.

The historical reference, if it be to any recorded incident, may be to the attempt of Menahem, king of Israel in 738 BC, to gain over the Assyrians by a large subsidy to Puli, who assumed the name of Tiglath-pileser (2 K 15 19). In this case, as both Ephraim and Judah are mentioned in the prophet, we have to suppose that Ephraim made application on behalf of both kingdoms. If "Judah" be inserted before "sent" to complete the parallel, then the clause would be interpreted of Ahaz, king of Judah, who offered a heavy bribe to Tiglath-pileser to help him to withstand the combined attack of Rezin of Syria and Pekah of Israel (2 K 15 7 f). But perhaps there may be no particular allusions in the two clauses of the apodosis, but only a reference to a general tendency on the part of both kingdoms to seek Assyrian aid. Cheyne would make a violent change in the verse. He would substitute "Israel" for "Judah" as warranted by Hos 12 2, insert "Israel" before "sent," and change asheker, "Assyria," Views into miṣyār, the North Arabian land of Mugri, "refuge." The references to which many passages in the OT, and for melek yārub, he would read melek 'ārāḇ, "king of Arabia." For other views see ICC. JAMES Crichton JARED, jā'red (מִבְּרְדָה, yereth, "descent"); a usual form, דָּרֶד, yēreth, in Gen 5 15; 1 Ch 1 2, hence EV "Jared" for "Jered"; [1aḇêl, Iarêd]: In Gen 5 15-20; 1 Ch 1 2; Lk 3 37, son of Mahalaleel and sister of Enoch. AV has "Jered" in 1 Ch 1 2.

The name is leashed by Vulc. to denote a degeneration of the human race, the first five generations being righteous, their successors not, except Enoch and Noah. The name has been identified with that of Idrâd (מִבְּרְדָה, īrôḏ), Gen 4 18. See Skinner, Gen, 117, 129, 131.

JARESIAH, jar-ē-se'a: AV for JARASHEBAH (q.v.).

JARHA, jār'ha (גָּרְחָ, yārâ'h), meaning unknown: An Egyptian slave of Sheshan, about El's time (of HPN, 235), who married his master's daughter, and became the founder of a house of the Jereshmedites (1 Ch 2 94 ff).

JARIB, jār'îb (גָּרְבֵּ, yārîb, "he contents, or takes [our] part, or conducts [our case]"); (1) In 1 Ch 4 24, a "son" (clan) of Simeon = "Jachin" of Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15; Nu 26 12. (2) In Ezr 3 16, one of the "chief men" for whom Ezra sent, and dispatched by him to Casiphia to fetch ministers for God's house = "Joribah" (1 Esd 8 44).

(3) In Ezr 10 18, a priest who had married a foreign wife = "Joribah" (1 Esd 9 10).

JARMUTH, jār'moth (גָּרְמָות, lārāmōth): 1 Esd 9 28; called "Jerometh" in Ezr 10 27.

JARMUTH, jār'muth (גָּרְמָה, yārâmāh); (1) A city of the Canaanites in the Shephelah (Josh 15 35) of Judah whose "king," Piram, joined the league of the "five kings" against Joshua (Josh 10 2-5), was defeated at Gibeon and slain at Makelath (ver. 23). One of the 31 "kings" defeated in Joshua's campaign (Josh 11 11). In Josh 16 35 it is mentioned in conjunction with Adullam, Socoh and Azekah, and in Neh 11 29 with Zorah, Jarakoth and Adullam. Cheyne (ED) suggests that the "Maroth" of Mic 1 12 may be a copyist's error for Jarmuth. In Onom (OS 132 31; 266 35) mention is made of a לֹאֶדְמוֹן, loṣermohām, or Jermuhām, 10 Rom miles N.E. of Éleutheropolis (Beit Jibrin). The site of this once important place is Khirbat el-Yarmuk, a ruin, with many old wells and cisterns, on the top of a hill 1,465 ft. above sea-level. It is nearly 2 miles N.W. of Beit Natîf, from which it is visible, and 83 miles, as measured on map, N.N.E. of Beit Jibrin. Cf PEF, III, 129, Sh XVII.

(2) A city of Issachar belonging to the "children of Gershon, of the families of the Levites" (Josh 21 29); in the duplicate list in 1 Ch 6 73 we have Ramoth, while in the LXX version of Josh 21 29 we have, in different YSS, Rhemmoth or Rhamoth. In Josh 19 21 "Remeth" occurs (in Heb) in the lists of cities of Issachar; in the LXX Rhêmmas or Rhamāth. The name was probably "Remeth" or "Rameth," but the place has never been identified with any certainty. See RAMOTH.

JAROAH, ja-rō'a (גָּרְאָ, yārōḇ, meaning unknown): A Gadite chief (1 Ch 5 14). But the text is doubtful; see Curtis, Ch, 124.

JASELAUS, jas-e'lus (גָּרְלֹס, lāroısūs; B. Aṣdotēs; V. Jassel, jaṣtē-el [1 Esd 9 30]): Called "Sheel" in Ezr 10 29.

JASHER, jā'shahr, jash'ar: BOOK OF (גָּשַּהְר, yēgāḇ ha-ŷāsār): AV Book of Jasher, m "the book of the upright"): The title of an ancient Heb national song-book (lit. "book of the righteous one") from which two quotations are made in the OT: (1) Josh 10 12-14, the command of Joshua to the sun and moon, "Sun, stand thou still upon Gibeon... Moon, recoil on Jachin..." (see BETH-HORON; LXX in this place omits the reference to Jashar); and (2) 2 S 1 18 ff., "the song of the bow," or lament of David over Saul and Jonathan. (3) Some conjecture a third extract in 1 K 5 2. "Then spake Jonathan, Jeheb hath said that he would dwell in the thick darkness." The words of Jeh are quoted by LXX in ver 53 as "written in the book of the song" (en bibliō tēs òdēs), and it is pointed out that the words "the song" (in Heb שָׂדִי, ha-šār) might easily be a corruption of שָׂדִי, ha-šārāh. A similar confusion ("song" or "righteous") may explain the fact that the Psalms of Job has for a title "the book of prayers or hymns." The book evidently was a well-known one, and may have been a gradual collection of religious and national songs. It is conjectured that it may have included the Song of Deborah (Josh 5), and older pieces now found in the Pent (e.g. Gen 4 23 24; 9 25-27; 27 27-29); this, however, is uncertain. On the curious theories and speculations of the rabbis and others about the book (that it was the Book of the Law, of God, etc), with the fantastic and reconstructive theory of Dr. Donaldson in his Jas, see the full art. in HDB.

JASHEN, jā'shen, jash'en (גָּשֶׁן, yāshēn, "asked") [cf.]: Seemingly the father of some of David's thirty valiant men (2 S 23 32). The MT reads "Eliahba the Shaalbonite, the sons of Jashen, Jonathan, Shamshah the Hararite, ..."). 1 Ch 11 33 f. has "Eliahba the Shaalbonite, the sons of Hasem the Gizonite, Jonathan the son of Shagee the Hararite..." It is clear that "sons of" are a dittography of the last three consorants of the previous word. LXX, Luc in 2 1 and Ch 1 has ὡς Ἵλλον, ho Ĥul, the "Gumite," for the "Gizonite," perhaps correctly (cf. Gen 46 24; Nu 26 48 for "Guni," "Gumite"). So 2 S 23 32 may be corrected thus: "Eliahba the Shaalbonite, Jashen the Gumite, Jonathan the son of Shamash the Hararite." Jashen thus becomes one of the thirty = "Hashem" of 1 Ch 11 34.

JASHER, jā'shēr, jash'ēr: BOOK OF: AV for JASHAR (q.v.), and see BETH-HORON, BATTLE OF.

JASHEBEAM, ja-shē'be-am (גָּשֶׁבָה, yāshēbāh), probably "people will return": see discussion of names compounded with ב, "am, in HPN, 41-59): Jashebeam is mentioned in three passages (1 Ch 11 11; 13 6 [Heb 7]; 27 2 f.), but opinions vary as to the number of persons referred to. In 1 Ch 11 11 he is called "the son of a Haunchmite" (reference unknown) and "the chief of the three" ("three," the best reading; RV "thirty"); AV, RVm "captains"), mighty men of David. He is said to have slain 300 (800 in 2 S 23 8) at one time, i.e. one after another.

The gēḇōḇī, or heroes, numbered 600 and were divided into bands of 200 each and subdivided into small bands of 20 each, with a captain for each company large and small. Jashebeam had command of one of the three bands of 300 (see Ewald, III, 140; Stanley, HTS, II, 78). From the indefiniteness of the description, "three of the thirty chief," he was regarded as one of the three mighty men who broke through the ranks of the Phil's, and brought water from the well of Bethlehem to David on the hill of Adullam (1 Ch 11 15-17), and the fact that "the thirty" have not yet been mentioned would seem to show this story is not in its proper place. But "Jashebeam," here (1 Ch 11 11) is probably an error for "Ishbabeal," the reading of many of the MSS of the OT.

In the ] passage (2 S 23 8) he is called "Jasheb- bassheboth, a Tahechomite," This verse, however,
JASON, jas'oun (Τάρων, Ἰάσδον): A Gr name assumed by Jews who bore the Heb name Joshua. This name is mentioned twice in the NT. (See also preceding article.)

(1) Jason was the host of St. Paul during his stay in Thessalonica, and, during the uproar organized by the Jews, who were moved to jealousy by the success of Paul and Silas, he and several other 'brethren' were severely handled by the mob. When the mob failed to find Paul and Silas, they dragged Jason and "certain brethren" before the magistrates, accusing Jason of treason in receiving into his house those who said "There is another king, one Jesus." The magistrates, being troubled, took security from them, and let them go.

There are various explanations of the purpose of this security. By this expression it is most probably meant that a sum of money was deposited with the magistrates, and that the Christian community of the Jews made themselves responsible that no attempt should be made against the supremacy of Rome, and that peace should be maintained in Thessalonica itself. (Conybeare and Howson, St. Paul. Ramsay (St. Paul the Traveller) thinks that the security was given to prevent Paul from returning to Thessalonica and that St. Paul refers to this in 1 Thess 2 18.

The immediate departure of Paul and Silas seems to show the security was given that the strangers would leave the city and remain absent (Acts 17 5–9).

(2) Jason is one of the companions of St. Paul who unite with him in sending greetings to the Rom Christians (Rom 16 21). He is probably the same person as (1). Paul calls him a kinsman, which means a Jew (cf Rom 9 3; 16 11, 21).

JASPER, ja'sp'er, JASPIS, ja'spis. See STONES, PRECIOUS.

JASUBUS, ja'-shub-us (Ἰάσουβος, Ἰάσωβος): An Israelite who in the time of Ezra had to put away his foreign wife (1 Esd 9 30), called "Jashub" in Ear 10 29.

JATAH, ja'tal (1 Esd 5 28). See ATAR.

JATHAN, ja'than (Ládôn, Iathôn; N, Nathôn): For "Jonasathas" in AV, which is the Lat form for the Heb "Jonathan." Jonathan was brother of Amanias and "son of that great Sammaías" (Tob 5 13).

JATHBATH, jath'beth. See JOTHATHAAN.

JATHNIEL, jath'ni-ıel (יהוניאל), yathan'ıel, "God lives"): Fourth "son" of Meshelemiah, a Korahite (1 Ch 26 2).

JATTIR, jat'ér (גַּטִיר, yattîr, and דְּגָי, yattîr): A town in the hill country of Judah, mentioned in conjunction with Shamir and Sooch (Josh 15 48); one of the cities given to the "children of Aaron the priest" (Josh 21 14; 1 Ch 6 57). David after his victory over the Amalekites sent a present of the spoil from Ziklag "to them that were in Jattir" (1 S 30 27).

It is now Khîrbet 'Attîr, an important ruin, in the extreme S. of the hill country, 5 miles S.E. of edh Dhartyeh and 20 miles S.E. of Beit Jibrin. This must be confused with the "very large city of Judah" which is mentioned in Onom (119:27; 133:3; 134:24, etc.) as 20 miles S.E. of Eleutheropolis (i.e. Beit Jibrin). The site is full of caves. See PEF, III, 408, Sh XXV.

JAVAN, jë-van (טיון), yevion, meaning unknown:
(1) In Gen 10:24 = 1 Chr 1:57 (LXX Διωντα, Diwda); Isa 66:19; Ezek 12:13 (LXX Εἴδολα, Hiddás, Greece); Dtel 8:21 m.; 10:20; 11:2; Zec 9:13; Joel 3:6 (Heb 4:6) (LXX of ἐιδολαι, hoii Hellenes, i.e. "Greeks"); son of Japheth, and "father" of Elisah, Tareshiah, Kittim, and Rodarim, i.e. Rhodes (incorrectly "Dodanim" in Gen 10:4). Javan is the Gr Ιαον, or Ιαον, Ιαον, and in Gen and 1 Ch = the Ionian Greeks of Asia Minor, probably here = Cyprus. The reference in Ezek 12:13 (from which that in Isa 66:19 is copied) is the country personified. In Joel the pl. Δύον, yevionim, is found. In Dnl the name is extended to the Greeks generally. Corroboration of the name is found in Assy (KB II, 43). The Pers Yauna occurs in the same dual role, but from the tiwm of Aesh. Persa, 176, 562 (Skinner, Gen. 198). In Ezek the word is said to be yevion (n)a; in the Am. Tab Wiyana is mentioned as being in the land of Tyre. See HDB, II, 552b.

(2) Place (Ezek 12:19) name wanting in LXX.

JAVELIN, jav’lin, jav’-e-lin. See Armor; Arms.

JAW, jo (גָּבֹה), gbô, "cheek (bone)," "jaw (bone)"); JAWBONE, jô’dôn, JAW TEETH; In Job 4:21, RVR reads "pierce his jaw through with a hook" for AV "bore his jaw through with a thorn" (see Hook; Leviathan). Ps 22:15, "My tongue cleaveth to my jaws [malkôr]," is descriptive of the effect of a fever or physical torture, a dryness and a horrible clamminess.

Malkôr or Malkôrign is an ancient dual form meaning the two jaws, and, metaphorically, malkôr indicates that which is caught between the jaws, booty, prey, including captives (Nu 31:11-26; 32:19).

Figurative:
(1) Of the power of the wicked, with a reference to Divine restraint and discipline: "I brake the jaws [Heb "great teeth"] of the unrighteous" (Job 29:17; Prov 30:14); cf Ps 56:6, "Break out the great teeth [malkôr, "jaws teeth"] of the young lions, O Jeh."

Let the wicked be despised, or evil let them be divided, and let them be put into mischief. LXX reads "God shall break," etc. (cf Edmund Prys’s Metrical Parallel of the Ps, in loc.) "A bridle . . . in the jaws of the people" (Isa 20:28; cf 2 K 19:28) is descriptive of the ultimate check of the Assyry power at Jerusalem, "as when a bridle or lasso is thrown upon the jaws of a wild animal when they wish to catch and tame him." (G. A. Smith, Isa, 1, 235). Cf Ezek 29:4 (concerning Pharaoh); 36:4 (concerning Gog), in which "will put hooks in [into] thy jaws." (2) Of human labor and toils, with a reference to the Divine gentleness: "I was to them as they that lift up the yoke on their jaws" (Hos 11:4), or "take the yoke off their jaws," as the humane driver eased the yoke with his hands or lifted it forward and placed it on the neck to the jaws; or it may perhaps refer to the removal of the yoke in the evening, when work is over.

JAZER, jaz’er (גזר or גזר), yazer; LXX Ιαζερ, Ιαζεθ in A; Ιαζήθ in B; JASTHY; In some cases, e.g. Nu 21:32, AV reads "Jazer." This was a city of the Amorites of the Jordan taken, along with its towns, by Moses, and occupied by the tribe of Gad (Nu 21:32; 32:35). The country was very fertile, and its spacious pasture-lands attracted the flockmasters of Gad (32:1), the southern border of whose territory it marked (Josh 13:25). It was assigned to the Merarite Levites (Josh 21:39; 1 Chr 6:81).

The place was reached by Joab when taking the census (2 S 24:5). In the 40th year of King David mighty men of valor were found here to whom he intrusted the oversight in Reuben and Gad "for every matter pertaining to God, and for the affairs of the king" (1 Chr 26:31). The fruitfulness of the country is alluded to in Isa 16:8; Jer 46:32. Note: "Sea of Jazer" (Job 41) verse has arisen through accidental repetition of yam, "sea," from the preceding clause.) The city was taken from the Ammonites by Judas Maccabaeus, and burned (1 Macc 5:75; Ant, XII, viii, 1).

JAZIZ, jaz’iz (גזר), yazô, meaning uncertain: The Hagrite who was over David’s flocks (1 Ch 27:30 [Heb 31]).

JEALOUSY, jel’us-i (.pickle), kín’âh; ἱλικος, zelous): Doubtless, the root idea of both the Gr and the Heb tr = "jealousy" is "warmth," "heat." Both are used in a good and a bad sense—to represent right and wrong passion.

When jealousy is attributed to God, the word is used in a good sense. The language is, of course, anthropomorphical; and it is based upon the feeling in a husband of exclusive right in his wife. God is conceived as having wedded Israel to Himself, and as claiming, therefore, exclusive devotion. Disloyalty on the part of Israel is represented as adultery, and as provoking God to jealousy. See, e.g., Dt 32:20; 1 K 14:22; Ps 78:58; Ezek 8:3; 16:38:42; 23:25; 36:5; 38:19.

When jealousy is attributed to men, the sense is sometimes good, and sometimes bad. In the good sense, it refers to an ardent concern for God’s honor. See, e.g., Nu 25:11 (cf 1 K 19:10; 2 K 20:16); 2 Cor 11:2, "who will put in [into] thy jaws." In the bad sense, it is found in Acts 7:9; Rom 13:13; 1 Cor 3:3; 2 Cor 12:20; Jas 3:14:16. The "law of jealousy" is given in Nu 5:11-31. It provided that, when a man suspected his wife of conjugal infidelity, an offering should be brought to the priest, and the question of her guilt or innocence should be subjected to a test there carefully. The test was intended to be an appeal to God to decide the question at issue. See ABSERV.; SACRIFICE.

JEALOUSY, IMAGE OF. See Images.

JEALOUSY, WATER OF. See Adultery, (2).

JEARIM, ji’ah’rim, jê’-är’im, MOUNT (עֶרֶם, har-gé’ärâm): A mountain by the side of which passed the border of Judah (Josh 15:10). It is mentioned here only, and is identical with CASSALON (q.v.).

JEATHERAI, jê-thér’-â (RV), JEURATAI, jê’-äth’r-â (AV) (עֶרֶם, yé’-áthrây, meaning unknown): A descendant of Gershom, "son" of Levi (1 Chr 6:21 [Heb 6]), and probably an ancestor of Asaph (so commentators); in vs 39–43 the corresponding name is "Ethni." The difference in the Heb words is not great.

JEBERACHIAH, je-ber-ə-khə-ə (יִבְרֶךְ הַיָּהָ, "Jeh blesses"); The father of the Zech-ariah whom Isaiah (8:2) took as a witness of his prophecy against Syria and Ephraim (c. 734 BC).

JEBUS, jɛ-bu's (יֵבָע, ybhūs; יִבְוֹס, 'Ibō'so, Ibe'oda): In Jgs 19:10.11, "Jebus (the same is Jerus"); 1 Ch 11:4.5, "Jerus (the same is Jebus"). It was once thought that this was the first name of Jerus, as indeed might be suggested by the Bib, references, but it is now known from the Am Tab that Uru-

JEBUSITE, jɛ-bu'sit (יֵבָע הַיָּה הַיָּה ה יֵבָע ה יֵבָע ה יֵבָע ה יֵבָע ה יֵבָע ה יֵבָע H, ybhūs-hāy-hāy, ha-ybhūs-hāy): "Jebus-") is an old name for Jerus (Jgs 19:10.11; 1 Ch 4:5 2 S 5 6–9, "the same is Jerus"); see preceding article). "Jebusit" (lit. "Jebusite") is also used as a name for the city in AV (Josh 16:18.28, c 15:8; RV correctly renders "Jebusite" (see JEBUSALM). "Jebusites" for the people (in AV Gen 16:21; Ex 3:8.17, etc), does not occur in Heb in the pl.; hence in RV is always rendered in the sing., "Jebusite"). The "Jebusite" is said in Gen 10:16; 1 Ch 1:14 to be the 3d son of Canaan, i.e. of the country of Canaan. Elsewhere he represents the Canaanites as a separate people.

JEDAIAH, je-de'ə'yə, je-de'-ə (יֶדֶתֹאיה, y'de-tə'yə; "Jeh knows"): (a) A priest in Jerus (1 Ch 9:10; 24:7).

The original name of Jerus was Bab, Uru-Salim, "the city of the face," shortened into Salem in Gen 14:18 and in the inscriptions of the Egyptian kings Ramses II and Ramses III. In the Am Tab (1400 BC) Jerus is still known as Urusalim, and its king is a Hittite name, implying that it was at the time in the possession of the Hittites. His enemies, however, were closing around him, and one of the tablets shows that the city was eventually captured and its king slain. These enemies would seem to have been the Jebusites, since it is after this period that the name "Jebus" makes its appearance for the first time in the OT (Jgs 19:10.11).

The Jebusite king at the time of the conquest was Adoni-zedek, who met his death at Beth-horon (Josh 10:1 f; in ver 3 the word "Amorite" is used in its bibl sense to denote the inhabitants of Canaan generally). The Jebusites were a mountain tribe (Nu 13:29; Josh 11:3). Their capital "Jebus" was taken by the men of Judah and burned with fire (Jgs 1:8), but they regained possession of, and held, the fortress till the time of David (2 S 6:6 ff).

When Jerus was taken by David, the lives and property of its Jebusite inhabitants were spared, and they continued to inhabit the temple- hill, David and his followers settling in the new City of David on Mt. Zion (15:8.63; 1 Ch 1:21; 19:11). And as Araunah is called "king" (2 S 24:23), we may conclude that their last ruler also had been allowed to live. His name is non- Sem, and the various spellings of it (cf 1 Ch 21:15, "Ornan") indicate that the Heb writers had some difficulty in pronouncing it. The Jebusites seem ultimately to have blended with the Israelitish population.

JEDDIKHIAH, jɛ-də-khəh, jɛ-də-khəh (יֶדֶדְיָה, y'de-də'həh, "Jeh has been able"); The mother of King Uzziah (Azariah) of Judah. RV has "Jeholiah" in 2 K and so AV in 2 Ch.

JECHONIAS, jɛ-kə-nə'as (יֶהוֹכִינָס, Iechohantas, AV; Gr form of "Jechoniah," RV): (1) The altered form of Jehoiachin (Ad Est 11; Bar 1:39; Mt 1:11.12). The last but one of the kings of Judah.

(2) The son of Zedas (1 Esd 8:92), called "Shecaniah" in Ezr 10:2.

JECOLIAH, jɛ-kə-lə-hə (יֵכְו לִיה, y'kə-lə'hə): 2 K 15:2; 2 Ch 36:3 AV; see JECHELIAH; JECOLIAH.

JECONIAH, jɛ-kə-ni'ə (יֶהוֹכִינָה, Iechonias, AV): See JEHOACHIN.

JECONIAS, jɛ-kə-nə's (יֶהוֹכִינָס, Iechohantas): (1) One of the chalites who made great gifts of sheep and calves at the Passover of Josiah (1 Esd 1:9); called "Conaniah" in 2 Ch 36:9.

(2) One reading makes Jeconias (not Joachaz) son of Josiah in 1 Esd 1:34.

JEDAIHIAH, je-de'ə'yə, je-de'-ə (יֶדֶתֹאיה, y'de-tə'yə; "Jeh knows"): (a) A priest in Jerus (1 Ch 9:10; 24:7).

(b) Ezr 2:26 = Neh 7:39, where "children of Jedaihia" are mentioned = "Jeddiu" in 1 Esd 5:24.

(c) J. is among the "priests and the Levites" that returned with Zerubbabel (Neh 11:10; 12:6.19). (d) Another priest of the same name (Neh 12:71).

(e) One of the exile whom Zechariah was commanded to send with silver and gold to Jerus. LXX does not take the word as a proper name (Zec 6:10.14)

(2) (יַעְוַדְיָה, y'də'dyhəh, "Jeh throws"?) (a) Father of a Simeon prince (1 Ch 4:37). (b) One of the repairers of the wall of Jerus (Neh 3:10).

JEDDAH, je-də'ə (יֶדֶדָא, Yədə'dāh, "Jeh does not know"): Called Jedaih (q.v. 1, [b]) in canonical books (1 Esd 5:24).

JEDDIKHIAH, jɛ-də-khəh (יֶדֶדְיָה, y'de-də'həh, "God makes known"?): (1) A "son" of Benjamin or probably of Zebulun (1 Ch 7:6.10.11). See Curtis, Ch. 145–49, who suggests emending the name to יַעְוַדְיָה, y'də'dyhəl, Jahleel, in agreement with Gen 46:24.

(2) One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11:45), probably = the Manasseh who deserted to David at Ziklag (1 Ch 12:20 [Heb 21]).

(3) A Korahite doorkeeper in David's reign (1 Ch 26:2).

JEDDIKHIAH, jɛ-də-khəh (יֶדֶדְיָה, y'de-də'həh, "be-loved"); Mother of King Josiah of Judah, daughter of Adaihiah of Bozkath (2 K 22:1).
JEDIDIAH, jed-i-d' th (יְדִיָּה, yēdīyā, “the beloved of Jeh”): The name conferred by God through Nathan upon Solomon at his birth (2 S 12 25).

JEDUTHUN, jē-dūth'un. See ASAPEL.

JEELI, jē-ē'lī (יְעֵלִי, Ye'elī): Called “Jaalah” in Ex 2 56 and “Jala” in Neh 7 88 (1 Esd 5 33).

JEELUS, jē-ē'lūs (יְעֵלוּס, Ye'elūs; RV IEZER): The name of a clan of Gilead (Nu 26 30), but read יָאשָר, ya-as'har, i.e. “of Abiezer” (cf Josh 17 2). See ABIEZER.

JEZERITES, jē-ē'zar-its. See ABIEZER.

JEGAR-SAHAR-DUTHA, jē-gār-sā-hā-dū′tha, (ירגארסֶהדרותה, yē-gār-sā'hā-dū' thā; LXX Bovdēs μαχαθρητέων, Boudēs marturēlōn, “the mouth of witnesses”): The name given by the Aramaean, Laban, to the “carn of witness,” called by Jacob Galere (q.v.) (Gen 31 47). The rest of the second part of this name appears again in Job 16 19, where יָשָׁהְהוּ, sāḥāhū, should be rendered with RV, “he that voucheth for me,” i.e. “my witness.”

JEHALLEL, jē-hal-lēl (רַעְלָל, yē-hal-lēl), jē-ha-lēl (רְעָל, yē-ha-lēl; AV) (םְרָל, yē-hā- rāl; RV), “he shall praise God”:
1. A Judahite (1 Ch 4 16).
2. A Levite, a descendant of Merari (2 Ch 29 12).

JEHOBIAH, jē-hō-ē'yā, jē-de-ya (יְהוֹבִיאָה, yē-hō-bi'ā), “may Jeh give joy!”:
1. A Levite, head of the family of Shubael (1 Ch 24 20).
2. An officer of David “over the assay” (1 Ch 27 30).

JEHEZKEL, jē-hez'kēl (יהֶזְכֵל; RV) , JEHEZKEL, jē-hez'kēl (יְהֶזֶקֶל, yē-hez'kēl; “God strengthens”):
1. A priest of David’s time (1 Ch 24 16).
2. Jehezekel in 1 K 3 4 Am, for Ezekiel (q.v.).

JEHIAH, jē-hi'ā (יהִיָּה, yē-hi'āh, “may Jeh live!”): Keeper of the ark where Oded (1 Ch 15 24), but in verse 18 the name is יִהְיָה, yē-hī'āh, IIEZIR (q.v.).

JEHIEL, jē-hi'ēl (יְהִיֵּל, yē-hī'ēl), “may God five!”:
1. A Levite, one of the musicians appointed to play upon instruments at the bringing up of the ark by David (1 Ch 15 18 20; 16 5): Jehiel, jē-hi'ē-lī (יִהְיֵלִי, yē-hī'ē-lī): A patronymic of this name (1 Ch 26 21 22), but Curtis (Ch, 286-87) reads “Jehiel [ver 21] and his brethren Zetham and Joel” (ver 22); cf 23 8, where the three seem to be brothers. See above.
2. A Gershonite, head of a Levitical house (1 Ch 23 8; 29 8).
3. Son of a Hachmonite; he was “the king’s [David’s] sons,” i.e. their tutor (1 Ch 27 32).
4. A son of King Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 21 2).
5. In 2 Ch 29 14 AV, where KR is יְהִיֵּל, yē-hī'ēl, RV “Jehiel,” a Hermonite Levite who took part in cleansing the temple in Hezekiah’s reign.

(6) An overseer in Hezekiah’s reign (2 Ch 31 13).
(7) One of the three “rulers” of the temple in Hezekiah’s reign (2 Ch 35 8).
(8) Father of Obadiah, a returned exile (Ezr 8 9) = “Jezreelus” of 1 Esd 3 35.
(9) Father of Shecaniah (Ezr 10 2) = “Jezreelus” of 1 Esd 8 92. He was a “son” of Elam, and so probably the same as “Jehiel” in Ezr 10 28, one of those who had married foreign wives = “Jezreelus” of 1 Esd 9 27.
(10) A “son” of Harim, and one of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 21) = “Hrieel” of 1 Esd 9 21.
(11) AV in 1 Ch 9 35 = JIEZEL (q.v. [2]).
(12) AV in 1 Ch 21 14 = JIEZEL (q.v. [3]).

JEHIZKIAH, jē-hiz-kī'a (יְהִזְקִיָּה, yē-hiz'kīyāh, “Jeh strengthens”): One of the Ephraimite chieftains of (2 Ch 28 12) who with Obed are said to have opposed the enslavement of the Judahites, taken captive by Pekah in his war against Ahaz (2 734 BC).

JEHOADDAD, jē-hō-ā'dā (RV), JEHOADDAH, jē-hō'-ā-da (אִדָּא, yē-hō'-ādā, “Jeh has deposited” or “numbered”): A descendant of King Saul (1 Ch 8 30), called “Haddad” in 1 Ch 9 43, where LXX has ולאד, ladā = יָדָה, yādā. See JARAH.

JEHOADDAN, jē-hō-ad'ān (יָדָה, yē-hō-adān, meaning unknown): In 2 Ch 25 1, and Kēv, AV in 2 K 14 2, where Kēthub and RV are “Jehoddin” (יָדוֹד, yē-hō'dōdā), the mother of King Azaiah of Judah.

JEHOADDIN, jē-hō-ād'īn. See JEHOADDAN.

JEHOAHAZ, jē-hō-ā-hāz, jē-hō'-ā-hāz (יְהוֹהַח, yē-hō'-āhāz, “Jeh has grasped”): “Lōégās, Tōōchēs; 2 K 13 1-9):
1. (Son of Jehu, and 11th king of Israel. He is stated to have reigned 17 years.

Jos was already aware (Ant, IX, viii, 9) of the chronological difficulty involved in the cross-references in vs 1 and 10, the former of which states that Jehoahaz began to reign in the 23rd year of Jehoash of Judah, and reigned 17 years; while the latter gives him a successor in Jehoash’s 37th year, or 14 years later.

Jos alters the figure of ver 1 to 21; and, to meet the same difficulty, the LXX changes 37 to 39 in ver 10. The difficulty may be met by supposing that Jehoahaz was associated with his father Jehu for several years in the government of the country before the death of the latter, and that these years were counted as a part of his reign. This view has in its favor the fact that Jehu was an old man when he died, and may have been incapacitated for the full discharge of administrative duties before the end of his reign. The accession of Jehoahaz as sole ruler may be dated about 825 BC.

When Jehoahaz came to the throne, he found a discouraged and humiliated people. The territory beyond Jordan, embracing 2/3 tribes, or one-fourth of the whole kingdom, was lost in warfare with the Syrian king, Hazael (2 K 10 22 33).

A heavy annual subsidy was still payable to Assyria, as by his father Jehu. The neighboring kingdom of Judah was still unfriendly to any member of the house of Jehu. Eliahu the prophet, though then in the zenith of his influence, does not seem to have done anything toward the stability of Jehu’s throne.

Specially did Israel suffer during this reign from the continuance of the hostility of Damascus (2 K 12 17 3 4 22). Hazael had been selected, 2. Low Condition of the Kingdom A heavy annual subsidy was still payable to Assyria, as by his father Jehu. The neighboring kingdom of Judah was still unfriendly to any member of the house of Jehu. Eliahu the prophet, though then in the zenith of his influence, does not seem to have done anything toward the stability of Jehu’s throne.

Specially did Israel suffer during this reign from the continuance of the hostility of Damascus (2 K 12 17 3 4 22). Hazael had been selected, greatly related. The great conqueror, Shalmaneser II, had died, and his son Samsi-Rammann IV had to meet a revolt within the empire, and was busy preparing again Babylon and Media during the 12 years of his reign (824–812 BC). During these years, the kingdoms of the seaboard of the Mediterranean were unmolested. They coincide with the years of Jehoahaz, and explain the freedom which Hazael had to harass the dominions of that king.

Particulars of the several campaigns in which the troops of Damascus harassed Israel are not given. The life of Elisha extended through the 3 reigns of Jehoram (12 years), Jehu (28 years) and Jehoahaz (12 or 13 years). It is therefore probable that in the memoirs of his life in 2 K 4–6, now one and now another king of Israel should figure, and that some of the episodes there recorded belong to the reign of Jehoahaz.

There are evidences that the chronological order is not observed in the narrative of Elisha, e.g. Gehazi appears in waiting on the king of Israel in 8 nearest the account of his infancy in 5:27. The terrible siege of Samaria in ch 7 is generally referred to the reign of Jehoram, and no atmosphere is so suitable to it as that of the reign of Jehoahaz. In one of the later years of his life, which governmental authority or school of thought is also implied is recorded in 13: 7 where Jehoram is said to have made them the like the dust in threshing; and the statistics there given of Jehoahaz, would correspond with the states of things that Jehoahaz implies. In this case the Ben-hadad of 2 K 6 64 would be the son of Hazael (15: 24).

Jehoahaz, like his father, maintained the calf-worship in Bethel and Dan, and revived also the cult of the Asherah, a form of Canaanitish idolatry introduced by Ahab.

1. His Idolatry (1 K 16 33). It centered round a sacred tree or pole, and was probably connected with phallic worship (cf 1 K 15 13, where Maacah, mother of Asa, is said to have made an abominable image for an Asherah in Jerusalem).

The close of this dark reign, however, is brightened by a partial reform. In his distress, we are told, "Jehoahaz besought Jeh, and Jeh heard him" (2 K 13 4).

2. Partial Reform If the siege of Samaria in ch 6 belongs to his reign, we might connect this with his wearing "both upon his head and upon his flesh" (ver 30)—an act of humiliation only accidentally discovered by the rending of his garments. Ver 5 goes on to say that "Jeh gave Israel a saviour, so that they went out from under the hand of the Syrians" (cf 1 K 15 29). The question of the deliverance was under whom the deliverance began (13 25), or to Jeroboam II, of whom it is declared that by the Syrians was "saved" (14 27). Others take it to refer to Ramman-nirari III, king of Assyria, whose conquest of Damascus made possible the victories of these kings. See Jehoahaz.

3. Jehoiakim and the Punic War (2 K 23 30–35). The story of his reign is told in 2 K 23 30–35, and in a brief account in 2 Ch 36 1–3. The historian of 2 K characterizes his reign as evil; 2 Ch passes no verdict upon him. On the death of his father in battle, which threw the realm into conflict with the sacred city of Jerusalem (cf 2 K 22 14 with 23 36; 1 Ch 3 15 makes him the fourth son of Josiah), was raised to the throne by "the people of the land," the same who had secured the accession to his father; see under Josiah. Perhaps, also, the scrupulous desire of the Levites to maintain the purity of the temple, which his father had carried out so well, they saw in him a better hope for its integrity than in his elder brother Jehoiakim (Eliakim), whose tyrannical tendencies may already have been too apparent. The prophets, it is said, had set store by him, if we may judge by the sympathetic mentions of him in Jer 22 11 and Ezek 19 3.4. His career was too short, however, to make any marked impression on the history of Judah.

Jehoahaz's ill-advised meddling with the designs of Pharaoh-nechoh (see under Josiah) had on him, in fact, the ill effect of plunging Judah again into the vortex of oriental politics, from which it had long been comparatively free. The Egypt king immediately concluded that so presumptuous a state must not be left in his rear unpunished. Arrived at Riblah on his Mesopotamian expedition, he put Jehoahaz in bonds, and later carried him prisoner to Egypt, where he died; raised his brother Je- hoiakim to the throne as a vassal king; and imposed on the realm a fine of a hundred talents of silver and a talent of gold. So the fortunes of the Judean state, so soon after Josiah's good reign, began their melancholy change for the worse.

3. In 2 Ch 21 17; 22 23 = Ahaziah, king of Judah (q.v.) (2 K 8 25 ff; 2 Ch 22 1 ff.).

Jehoash, jeh'-o-ahsh, the uncontracted form of Josiah (צֵיוֹאָשׁ, yə'ō'-āsh; צֵיוָאָשׁ, yē'-ō-āsh, "Jeh has bestowed"); c.f. Syr. يَا-سُيُوَّد, Is 11 22; 12 1 19; 2 Ch 24 1, etc.; Ιωάννα, Iōánna: (1) The 9th king of Judah; son of Ahaziah and Zibiah, a woman of Beersheba (2 K 11 12–12; 2 Ch 22 10–24 27). Jehoash was 7 years old at his accession, and reigned 40 years (cf 2 K 11 12). His possessions may be placed in 852 BC. Some include in the years of his reign the 6 years of Athaliah's usurpation.

When, on Athaliah's usurpation of the throne, she massacred the royal family, her son, who had been concealed in the house of Jehoiada, which adjoined the temple, hence is said to have been "hid in the house of Jeh"—a perfectly legitimate use of the phrase according to the idioms of the time.

During these formative years of J's early life, he was under the moral and spiritual influence of Jehoiada—a man of lofty character and devout spirit. At the end of 6 years, a counter-revolution was planned and carried out on a Sabbath, at one of the great festivals. The accounts of this revolution in K and Ch supplement each other, but though the Levitical interest of the Chronicler is apparent in the details to which he gives prominence, the narratives do not necessarily collide, as has often been represented. The event was prepared for by the young king being privately exhibited to the 5 captains of the "executioners" (RV "Carites") and "runners" (2 K 11 14; 2 Ch 23 1). These entered into covenant with Jehoiada, and, by his direction, summoned the Levites from Judah (2 Ch 23 2), and made the necessary arrangements for guarding the palace and the person of the king. In these dispositions both the royal body-guard and the Levites seem to have had their parts.

J. next appears standing on a platform in front of the temple, the law of the testimony in his hand and the crown upon his head. Amid acclamations, he is anointed king. Athaliah, rushing on the scene with upraised sword, is driven forth and slain. A new covenant is made between Jeh and the king and people, and, at the conclusion of the ceremony, a great procession is formed, and the king is conducted with honor to the royal house (2 K 11 19; 2 Ch 23 20). Thus auspiciously did the new reign begin.
Grown to manhood (cf. the age of his son Amaziah, 2 K 14:25), J. married two wives, and by them had sons and daughters (2 Ch 24:3).

3. Repair His great concern at this period, however, was the repair of the temple. The King and the High Priests had removed the sacred furniture of the sanctuary, and had appropriated and dispersed it among themselves (2 K 12:10; 2 Ch 24:7). To meet the expense of its restoration, the king gave orders that all monies coming into the temple, whether dues or voluntary offerings, should be appropriated for this purpose (2 K 12:4), and from the account in Ch would seem to have contemplated a revival of the half-shekel tax appointed by Moses for the construction of the tabernacle (2 Ch 24:5; cf. Ex 30:11–16; 38:25). To enforce this impost would have involved a new census, and the memory of the judgments which attended David's former attempt of this kind may well have had a deterrent effect on Jehoida and the priesthood. "The Levites hastened it not," it is declared (2 Ch 24:5).

Time passed, and in the 23rd year of the king's reign (his 30th year), it was found that the breaches of the house of God had still been repaired.

4. A New A new plan was adopted. It was expedient to erect a chest with a hole bored in its lid should be set up on the right side of the altar in the temple-court, under the care of two persons, one the King's scribe, the other an officer of the high priest, and that the people should be invited to bring voluntarily their half-shekel tax or other offerings, and put it in this box (2 K 12:9; 2 Ch 24:8.9). Gifts from worshippers were received by priests at the gate, and brought to the box. The expedient proved brilliantly successful. The people cheerfully responded, large sums were contributed, the money was honestly expended, and the temple was thoroughly renovated. There remained even a surplus, with which gold and silver vessels were made, or replaced, for the use of the temple. Jehoida's long and useful life seems to have taken a new turn in view his wisdom and success.

With the death of this good man, it soon became evident that the strongest pillar of the state was removed. It is recorded that "J. did what was right in the eyes of Jeh all his days wherein Jehoida the High Priest instructed him" (2 K 12:2), but after Jehoida had been honorably interred in the sepulchres of the kings (2 Ch 24:16), a sad declension became manifest. The princes of Judah came to J. and expressed their wish for greater freedom in worship than had been permitted them by the aged priest. With weak complaisance, the king "hearkened unto them" (ver 17). Soon idols and Asherahs began to be set up in Jerusalem and the other cities of Judah. Unnamed prophets raised their protests in vain. The high priest Zechariah, a worthy son of Jehoida, testified in his place that as the nation had forsaken Jeh, he also would forsake it, and that disaster would follow (ver 20). Wroth with the rebels, the king gave orders that Zechariah should be stoned, with stones in the temple-court (ver 21). This was done, and the act of sacrilege, murder, and ingratitude was perpetuated to which Jerusalem seems to refer in Mt 23:35; Lk 11:51 ("son of Barachiiah" in the former passage, probably a gloss through confusion with the prophet Zechariah).

The high priest's dying words, "Jeh look upon it, and require it," soon found an answer. Within a year of Zechariah's death, the armies of Haszel, the Syrian king, were ravaging and laying waste Judah. The city of Gath fell, and a battle, the place of which is not given, placed Jerus at the mercy of the foe (2 K 12:17; 2 Ch 24:23.24). To save the capital from the indignity of foreign occupation, J., then in dire calamities and sickness, collected all the gold and all the gold of the palace, and sent them to Hazael (2 K 12:17.18). This failure of his policy, in both church and state, excited such popular feeling against J., that a conspiracy was formed to assassinate him. His physical sufferings won him no sympathy, and two of his own officers slew him, while asleep, in the fortress of Millo, where he was paying a visit (ver 20). He was buried in the city of David, but not in the royal sepulchres, as Jehoahaz had been (2 Ch 24:25).

J. is mentioned as the father of Amaziah (2 K 14:1; 2 Ch 25:25). His contemporaries in Israel were Jehoahaz (2 K 13:1) and Jehosh - (2 K 13:10).

(2) The son of Jehoahaz, and 12th king of Israel (2 K 13:10–25; 14:8–16; 2 Ch 25:17–24). Jehoshaphat reigned for 16 years. His accession and reign were almost simultaneous changes in the political condition of Syria—Amaziah succeeding to the throne of Judah in the 2d year of J., and Ramman-nirari III coming to the throne of Assyria in 811 BC—which had important effects on the history of Israel in this reign.

During the three previous reigns, for half a century, Elisha had been the prophet of Jeh. He was now aged and on his deathbed.

2. Elisha Hearing of his illness, the young king came to Dothan, where the prophet was, and had a touching interview with him. His affectionate exclamation, "My father, my father, the chariots of Israel and the horsemen thereof" (2 K 13:14; cf 2:12), casts a pleasing light upon his character. On his lips the words had another meaning than they bore when used by Elisha himself at Elijah's translation. Then they referred to the "appearance" which parted Elisha from his master; now they referred to the great service rendered by the prophet to the kingdom. Not only had Elisha repeatedly saved the armies of Israel from the ambushes prepared for them by the Syrians (2 K 6:8–23), but he had given assurance of the relief of the capital when it was at its worst extremity (5:15–19). The prophet's presence was indeed in place of chariots and horse. The truth was anew demonstrated by the promise which the dying prophet now made to him. Directing J. in the symbolic action of the shooting of certain arrows, he predicted three victories over the Syrians—the first at Aphek, now Fik, on the E. of the Lake of Galilee—and more would have been granted, had the faith of the king risen to the opportunity then afforded him (6 15–19).

An interesting light is thrown by the annals of Assyria on the circumstances which may have made these victories of J. possible. Ramman-nirari III, who succeeded to the throne in 811 BC, made an expedition against Damascus, Edon and Philistia, in his account of which he says: "Tesht up the king of Syria in his chief city, Damascus. . . . He clapped my feet, and gave himself up. . . . His countless wealth and goods I seized . . . He was broken during the remainder of this ruler's reign of 27 years, it may be understood how J. should be able to recover, as it is stated he did, the cities which Ben-hadad had taken from his father Jehoahaz (2 K 13:23). Schrader and others see in this Assyrian the "saviour" of Israel alluded to in thing is told at the end of the Book of Jer (62:31-34). Neither for this reign nor for the succeeding is there the usual reference to state annals; these seem to have been discontinued after Jehoiakin. In Jer 22:24-30 there is a final pronouncement of the king, not so much upon the man as upon his inevitable fate, and a prediction that no descendant of his shall ever have prosperous rule in Judah.

Of the brief reign of J. there is little to tell. It was rather a historic landmark than a reign; but his year, 597 BC, is important as the 2. His date of the first deportation of Jewish Captives to Babylon (unless we except the company of hostages carried away in Jehoiakin's 5th [4th] year, 11, 1-7). His coming to the throne was just at or near the time when Nebuchadnezzar's servants were besieging Jerusalem; and when the Chaldean king's arrival in person to superintend the siege made apparent the futility of resistance, J. surrendered to him, with all the royal household and the court. He was carried prisoner to Babylon, and with him ten thousand captives, comprising all the better and scarcer element of the people from prince to craftsman, leaving only the poorer sort to constitute the body of the nation under his successor Zedekiah. With the prisoners were carried away also the most valuable treasures of the temple and the royal palace.

Ever since Isaiah fostered the birth and education of a spiritually-minded remnant, for him the vital hope of Israel, the growth and influence MANASSEH, as in its fiber of song and prose. It is as if a sober sanity of reflection were curing the people of their empty idolatries. The feeling is well expressed in such a passage as Hab 2:15-20. Hitherto, however, the power of this spiritual Israel has been latent, or at best mangled and pervasive among the various occupations and interests of the people. The surrender of Jehoiachin brings about a segmentation of Israel on an unheard-of principle: not the high and low in wealth or social position, but the weight and worth of all the other side, who are marked for deportation, and the refuse element of all classes on the other, who are left at home. With which element of this strange shifting Jeremiah's prophetic hopes are identified appears in his parable of the Good and Bad Fig Trees, which he predicts spiritual integrity and upbuilding to the captives, and to the home-staying remainder, shame and calamity. Later on, he writes to the exiles in Babylon, advising them to make themselves at home and be good citizens (Jer 29:1-10). As for the hapless king, "this man Coniah," who is to be their captive chief in a strange land, Jeremiah speaks of him in a strain in which the stern sense of Jeh's inexorable purpose is mingled with tender sympathy as he predicts that this man shall never have a descendant on David's throne (Jer 22:24-30). It is as if he said, All as Jeh has ordained, but—the pity of it!

In the first year of Nebuchadnezzar's successor, perhaps by testamentary edict of Nebuchadnezzar himself, a strange thing occurred. 4. Thirty—J., who seems to have been a kind of seven Years hostage prisoner for his people, was Later released from prison, honored above all the kings, and thenceforth to the end of his life had his portion at the royal table (2 K 25:27-30; Jer 52:31-34). This act of clemency may have been due to some such good influence at court as is described in the Book of Dan; but also it was a tribute to the good conduct of that letter element of the people of which he was hostage and representative. It was the last event of Judæan royalty; and suggestive for a glimpse it seems to afford of a people whom the Second Isaiah could address as redeemed and forgiven, and of a king taken from durance and judgment (of Isa 53 8), whose career makes strangely vivid the things that are said of the mysterious "Servant of Jehovah." John Franklin Gugen JEHOIADA, jē-hoi'-a-da (חָוָיָדָה, yôhôyâ'dâh), "Jeh is the Jehoiada not John 18; K J Ch 2 "they (Josh palace. tion to above revolt and if the revolt took place at the close of the Sabbath, and that the doublisioned guard was kept by J. even after the usual-sized one had come to take their place. It should be added that Wellhausen proposed to read הָבַּתָּה (v. "sabbath, "army") (cf Isa 13 22), and in ver 19 the words "and all the people of the land" are held to be an addition.

(b) The 2d narrative (vs 13–15a) begins suddenly. Presumably its earlier part was identical with the earlier part of the 1st narrative, unless ver 6 was a part originally of this 2d account. Athaliah hears the noise of the people (ver 13, where "the guard" is a gloss and so to be omitted), and comes to the temple, where she witnesses the revolt and cries, "Treason! treason!" J. orders her to be put forth (omit "between the ranks" in ver 15), so that she should not be slain in the temple, and she is murdered at one of the gates of the temple. J. changed the following LXX of 2 Ch 23 15, οἶδαν (the first sentence wrongly: it should be "So they laid hands on her"). J. then makes the king and the people enter into a solemn covenant to be Jeh's people, and the result is the designation of the temple and the altar of Mattan, its priest (vs 17b). This 2d narrative gives a religious significance to the revolt, but it is incomplete. The other narrative presents a very natural sequence of events, for it was absolutely necessary for J. to secure the allegiance of the royal foreign body-guard.

(c) The account in 2 Ch 23 1–21, though following that of 2 K in the main, differs from it considerably. The guardian who succeeds in the place of Jehoash and for which she would have made preparations, no doubt, Ch makes it a wholly religious movement, while 2 K gives two points of view. The value of the Chronicler's account depends largely on one's estimate of the Books of Ch and one's views as to the development of the Jewish priestly system. A. Van Hoonacker, Le sacre des lévites dans la loi et dans l'histoire des Hébreux, 93–100, defends the account in 2 Ch.

The part which J. played in the restoration of the temple buildings is described in 2 K 11 21–12 16 (Heb 12 1–17) | 2 Ch 24 1–14. Here

2. Jehoiada again the narratives of 2 K and 2 Ch differ to a large extent.

Restoration—(i) According to Leviticus 22 K (i) the priests of the Temple are commanded by Jehoash to devote the dues or free-will offerings of the people to repairing the breaches in the temple. They fail to do so, and (ii) J. is summoned by the king and rebuked. Then (iii) a new regulation is put into force: the offerings, except the guilt offerings and sin offerings, are no longer to be given to the priests, but to be put into a chest provided in the temple for the purpose. (iv) The money got in this way is devoted to repairing the temple, but (v) none of it is used to provide temple vessels.

(b) Ch, on the other hand, (i) relates that the priests and Levites are commanded to go through Judah to collect the necessary money. They "fastened it" (vs 2). Then (ii) J. is not only to the king for this disobedience, and (iii) a chest is put outside the temple to receive the tax commanded by Moses. (iv) This the people pay willingly, and the temple is repaired. There is such a surplus that (v) there is money left over, and J. gives it as "a testimony" in ver 12, and in ver 19 the words "and all the people of the land" are held to be an addition.

narrative, although Van Hoonacker (op. cit., 101-14) defends the former.

1. According to 2 Ch 24 15, J. lived to be 130 years old, and was buried among the kings—a unique distinction.

(3) AV in Neh 3 6=Joiada (q.v.).

(4) There is a Joiada, the priest mentioned in Jehoahaz, 26, in whose stead Zephaniah was declared priest by Shemaiah in a letter.

Giesbrecht takes him to be the same priest of Athaliah’s time (see [2] above), but Duhm says that now he is a different person. In any case, Zephaniah could not have been the direct successor of the well-known Jehoiada, and so the reference can scarcely be to him if it is to have any meaningful bearing.

JEHOIAKIM, jē-hō'-ā-kīm (ךְֹֹֹֹ, יָהוַּּדְמַּ), y’hōyā’ām, “Jeh will establish”; ’Ibāsīyâ, ’Ibākēm): The name given him by Pharaoh-nechoh, who raised him to the throne as vassal king in place of his brother Jehoahaz, is changed from Eliakim (ךְֶֶֶֹ, תָּלְדַּשְּא), “God will establish”). The change compounds the name, after the royal Judaean custom, with that of Jeh; it may also imply that Necho claims Jeh’s authorization for his act, as in a similar way Senacherib had claimed it for his invasion of Judah (2 K 18 35). He represented the conquests of which Jehoahaz was hasty, and used to yoke the nation. This is the first time we hear of Nechoh at all. He represented the conquests of which Jehoahaz was hasty, and used to yoke the nation.

1. Sources for His Life and Time.—The circumstances of his accession and raising of the indemnity to Pharaoh-nechoh, followed by a brief account of his reign, are narrated in 2 K 23 34—24 6. The naming of the source of the “rest of his acts” (24 5) is the last reference we have to “the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah.” The account in 2 Ch 36 5-8, though briefer still, mentions Nebuchadnezzar’s looting of the temple at some uncertain date in his reign. Neither account has any good to say of J.; to the writer of 2 K, however, his ill fortunes are due to Jeh’s retributive justice for the sins of Manasseh, while to the Chronicler the sum of his acts, apparently connected with the desecration of the sanctuary, is characterized as “the abominations which he did.” For “the rest of his acts” we are referred, also for the last time, to the “book of the kings of Israel and Judah.”

2. The King’s Character. As to policy, he was an unprincipled opportunist: vainly he sought to whet the appetites of those to whom he owed his throne, until Nechoh himself was defeated; enforced vassal to Nebuchadnezzar for 3 years along with the other petty kings of Western Asia; then rebelling against the latter as soon as he thought he could make anything of it. As to responsibility of administration, he had simply the temper of a despotic self-indulgent Oriental. He raised the immense fine that Nechoh imposed upon him by a direct taxation, which he farmed out to unscrupulous officials. He indulged in extravagance, erecting costly royal buildings, employing for the purpose enforced and unpaid labor (2 K 22 13-17); while all just interests of his oppressed subjects went wholly unregarded. As to religion, he let matters go on as they had been under Manasseh, probably introducing also the still more strange and heathenish rites from Egypt and the East of which we see the effects in Ezk 8 5-17. And meanwhile the reformed temple-worship which Josiah had introduced seems to have become a more formal and perfunctory matter, to which, if we may judge by his conspicuous absence from fast and festal occasions (e.g. Jer 26 36), the king paid no attention. His impious act of cutting up and burning Jeremiah’s roll (36 23), as also his vindictive pursuit and murder of Uriah for prophesying in the spirit of Jeremiah (26 20-23), reveal his antipathy to any word that does not prophesy “smooth things” (of Isa 30 10), and in fact a downright perversity to the name and will of Jeh.

With the onset of the Chaldaean power, prophecy, as represented in the great works of Isaiah and Jeremiah, reached a crisis which only time and the consistent sense of its larger issues could enable it to weather. Isaiah himself, who had stood for the inviolability of Zion, and the miraculous deliverance and triumphant upheld his sublime faith. But with Jeremiah, conditions had changed. The idea thus engendered, that the temple was bound to stand and with it Jerus, an idea confirmed by Josiah's centralizing reforms, had been a superstition (cf Jer 26:6). And Jeremiah had reached the conviction that it, with its strange rites and glaring shows, must go: that nothing short of a clear sweep of the old religious fortunes could inaugurate the invariable uprightness of the nation. This conviction seems to many like an inconsistency—to set prophecy against itself. And the Chaldaean appeared on the scene, his counsel of subjugation and prediction of conquest would seem a double inconsistency: not only a traversing of a tested prophecy, but the latter purpose, in the situation, that he had to encounter; and for it he gave his tender feelings, his liberty, his life. It is in this reign of J. that, for the sake of Jehovah's word and purpose, he is engulfed in a deep tragedy of his career. And in this he must be virtuous. Nebuchadnezzar is described with him in a holy path; but his vision is not so clear; he must weather disheartening doubts, and cherish the faith of the righteous (2:4), and wait until the vision of J.'s secret purpose clears (2:2-3). If the prophets themselves are thus having such an equivocal crisis, so can we imagine how far is the plight of J.'s "remnant," who are dependent on propitious faith and courage to guide them through the depths. The humble nucleus of the true Israel, which is some day to be the nation's redeeming element, is undergoing a stern seasoning.

After Syria fell into Nebuchadnezzar's power, he seems to have established his headquarters for some years at Riblah; and after J. attempted to revolt from his authority, he sent against him guerilla bands from the neighboring nations, and detachments from his Chaldaean garrisons, who harassed him with raids and depredations. In 2 Ch 36:6,7, it is related that Nebuchadnezzar carried some of the vessels of the temple to Babylon and bound the king in fetters to carry him also to Babylon, the latter purpose apparently not carried out. This was in J.'s 4th year. In Dn 1 1.2, though ascribed to Jehoiakim's 3rd year, this same event is related as the result of a siege of Jerusalem. It is ambiguously intimated also that the king was deported; and cabling "the seed royal and of the nobles" who were of the company were Daniel and his three companions (Dn 1:3). The manner of J.'s death is obscure. It is merely said (2 K 24:6) that he "slept with his fathers"; but Jer (Ant, X, vi, 3), perhaps assuming that Jeremiah's prediction (Jer 29:19) was fulfilled, states that Nebuchadnezzar slew him and cast his body outside the walls unburied.

JOHN FRANKLIN GENUNG

JEHOARIB, jē-hō'ā-rib (יְהֹאָרִיב), jēhōyaribh, "Jeh pleads" or "contends": A priest in Jerus (1 Ch 9:10); the name occurs again in 1 Ch 24:7 as the name of a family among the 24 courses of priests of the family of Joiarib (יְהוֹאָרְיָב, yēhōyaribh, same meaning as above). Neh 12:6, the head of which is Mattanai in Neh 12:19. In Neh 11:10 we should probably read "Jehadiah and Joiarib" for "Jehadiah the son of Joiarib" (cf 1 Ch 9:10). Jehoarib = Joiarib in 1 Mac 2:1.

JEHONADAB, jē-hōnā-dāb (יְהוֹנָדָב), jēhōnaddāb, either "Jeh is noble" or "liberal," or "Jeh has impelled": = Jonadab (יְהוֹנָדָב), yōnaddāb, same meaning.

Jonadab in Heb of 2 S 13:5; but Jonadab in EV, and in Heb and EV of 13:3.32.35; son of Shimeah, King David's brother. He was friendly with Amnon his cousin, and is said to be a "very shrewd [RV 'subtle'] man." He planned to get Tamar to wait upon Amnon. Two years after, when Absalom had murdered Amnon, and David had heard that all the king's sons were assassinated, J. assured him that only Amnon was killed; and his reassuring tone is justified (ver 35); possibly he knew of Absalom's intentions. LXX, Luc. has "Jonadab in 13:3 ft; and in 2 S 21 21 11 Ch 20 7, there is mentioned a son of Shimei (="Shime- en," 1 Ch 20 7 = "Shimmaḥ," 1 S 16 9), whose name is Jonathan. See Jonathan, (4).

(2) Jehonadab in 2 K 10 15.23; in Heb of Jer 35 8.14.16.18 = Jonadab in Jer 35 6.10.19, and EV of 35 6.10.19. The "Son of Joekiel the Kenite clan (1 Ch 2 55). J. is described in 2 K 10 as an ally of Jehu in the abolition of Baal-worship in Samaria. Jehu met him after slaying the son of Ahab (10 15); the second part of the verse should probably be "told". And he greeted him and said to him, 'Is thy heart upright [with me]? as my heart is with thee? And Jehonadab answered, Yes. Then spake Jehu [so LXX], If so, give me thy hand.' In Jer 35 (where EV has Jonadab throughout), he is called the father of the priests, who, together with him, took from them their ordinances for their nomadic life and abstention from wine. See Rechab, Re- chabites. DAVID FRANCIS ROBERTS

JEHONATHAN, jē-hōnā-thān (יְהוֹנָתָן, yōnāthan), "Jeh has given": The name is the same as Jonathan: the Heb has the two forms for the same person sometimes; sometimes only one is found. See Jonathan. The form "Jehonathan" occurs as follows in EV:

(1) A Levite who took part in teaching the Torah in the cities of Judah under Jehoshaphat (2 Ch 17 8 EV and Heb).

(2) Head of the priestly family of Shemaiah (Neh 13 18 EV and Heb).

(3) AV and Heb in 2 Ch 27 25; see Jonathan, (7).

JEHORAM, jē-hōrām, written also in the abridged form, JORAM (יְהוֹרָם, yōrām), yōāram, "Jeh is high": RV retains "Joram" for Heb yōhōram in 2 K 9 15-24:

(1) Ninth king of Israel (2 K 1 17 9-28), son of Ahab and Jezebel, successor to his brother Ahaziah, who died young (2 K 1 26), and was succeeded by his son Jehoram. He reigned 853 BC, and reigned 5 years (2 K 3 1 8 16).

The statement in 2 K 1 17. "the second year of J. Ahaziah," follows a system of chronology common to the Lucianic group of MSS, in which the 1st year of Jehoshaphat falls in the 11th year of Omri: the 24th year of Jehoshaphat in the 1st year of Ahaziah: and the 1st year of Jehoram in the 3rd year of Jehoram. The double chronology (2 K 1 17 and 2 K 3 1) is due to the intention of the compiler of the EV to refer all the acts of Elisha to the reign of Jehoram, thus dislocating the order of events in that reign. Elisha, however, survived the reign of Jehoram many years, and it is possible some of the events are to be referred to subsequent reigns.

It is difficult to estimate the religious character of J. Apparently the fierce fanaticism of Jezebel and the boldness of Ahab reappear in the son in the form of duplicity and superstition. The attempt of Jezebel to substitute Baal for Jeh had failed. The people were on the side of Jeh. Otherwise Jehu could not have carried out his bloody reform. All the worshippers of Baal in the land could be gathered into one temple of Baal (2 K 10 18 ff). Evidently J. feared the people. Accordingly he posed as a reformer by putting away the pillar of Baal (2 K 3 2), while secretly he worshipped Baal (3 13c). Nevertheless, when he got into straits, he expected to receive the help of J. (3 13b). He had not learned that a dual nature is as impossible as a union of Baal and Jeh.

Immediately upon his accession, J. came into conflict with the Ammonites. Moab (2 K 3 4). The account of the affiict is of special interest because of the supplementary information concerning Moab furnished by the Moabite Stone. There is a reference to Moab (ll 1-8) that Moab became tributary to Israel in the days of Rehoboam, and remained so for forty years, but that it rebelled in the days of Ahab. This probably brings us to the statement in 2 K 3 4 ff that Moab "rendered unto the king of Israel the wool of a hundred thousand lambs, and of a hundred thousand rams; and that "when Ahab was dead, ... the king of Moab rebelled against the king of Israel, and the Moabites gathered together by the M S, possibly took place before the events of 2 K 3-4 ff. Accordingly, J. resolved to recover the allegiance of the Moabites. He called to his aid the ally of his father, Jehoshaphat, king of Judah, and the latter's vassal, the king of Edom. J. was entertained at Jerus (Jos, Ant, IX, iii, 1). The allies marched against Moab by the longer route, around the southern end of the Dead Sea, indicating that Moab was fortified against attack from the W., and that Israel was weak in the East Jordan country. After the allies had been miraculously delivered from perishing for lack of water, they devastated the land and sacked the cities, and finally they succeeded in shutting up Mesha in Kir-hareseth. Driven to despair, Mesha offered his eldest son upon the wall as a burnt offering to Chemosh. This seems to have caused the tide to turn, for "there was great wrath against Israel," and the allies returned to their own land, apparently having failed to secure a lasting advantage.

Assuming that 2 K 4-8 belong to the reign of J., it appears that the Syrians made frequent incursions into the land of Israel, perhaps more in the nature of plundering robber bands than invasions by a regular army. Finally, however, Ben-hadad, in person invaded the country and besieged Samaria. The inhabitants were reduced to horrible straits by famine, when the oppressors took sudden flight and Israel was saved. In the years 847-845 B.C. Jehoram of Damascus invaded Syria. It is probable that during this period J. recovered Ramoth-gilead, which had fallen to Syria under Ahab. Hazael succeeded Ben-hadad as ruler of Syria, and his first act, after having murdered his predecessor, was to regain Ramoth-gilead. In the defence of the city, J., who was assisted by his nephew, Ahaziah, was wounded, and returned to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds. J. left the army at Ramoth-gilead under the command of Jehoshaphat, J. having returned to the host. While J. was at Jezreel, Elisha sent a prophet to anoint Jeho into Judah. Jehu had been a witness of the dramatic scene when Elijah hurled the curse of God upon Jehoram, son of Ahab. Ahaziah, brother of J., suspected treachery, and, in company with Ahaziah, he rode out to meet Jehu. On his question, "Is it peace, Jehu?" he received a brutal reply that "no longer left him in doubt as to the intention of the conspirator. As J. returned to Bethesda he carried J. with him in the back so that the arrow pierced his heart. His dead body was thrown into the plat of ground that had belonged to Naboth. (2) King of Judah, son of Jehoshaphat (2 K 8 16-24; 2 Ch 21 1-20), he began to rule about 849 and reigned 8 years. With reference to the chronological difficulty introduced by 2 K 17, see (1) above.

In the beginning of the reigns of Ahab and Jehoshaphat, an attempt was made to end the old feud between Israel and Judah. At the suggestion of Ahab, the two kingdoms, for the first time, joined forces against the common foe from the N., the Syrians. To seal the alliance, Athaliah, daughter of Jehoram and Ahab, was married to J., son of Jehoshaphat. Thus Jehoram was brother-in-law to (1) above. No doubt this was considered as a master stroke of conciliatory policy by the parties interested. However, it proved disastrous for Judah. Beyond a doubt, the unknowledge of Jehoshaphat included the Baalizing of Judah as well as of Israel. This marriage was a step in that direction.

A man shall leave his father and his mother, and shall cleave unto his wife. J. did so. "He walked in the ways of the kings of Israel, as did the house of Ahab" (2 K 8 18).

2. His Marriage with Syria. According to 2 Ch 21 11.13, J. not only accepted the religion of Athaliah, but he became a persecutor, compelling the inhabitants of Jerus and of the land to become apostates. Because of his gross idolatry and his wickedness, he is said (2 Ch 21 12 ff) to have received a denunciatory letter from the prophet Elijah. This led to a chronicler otherwise never mentions Elijah. Oettli is of the opinion that one should either read "Elisha" for "Elijah," or else consider the letter to have been written as the exception of a later writer, who felt that Elijah must have taken note of the wickedness of J. and his wife, Athaliah, daughter of Ahab. In the latter event, the letter might be called a haggadic Midrash.

4. His Character. A man's character is indicated from his character. Baalism had in it the elements of tyranny and civic unrighteousness. In keeping with his religion, and in true oriental fashion, J. began his reign by murdering all his brothers, and other princes of the land, to whom Jehoshaphat had given valuable gifts and responsible positions. The only event belonging to his reign recorded in K is the revolt of Edom. Edom was subdued by David, and, probably with the exception of a temporary revolt under Solomon (1 K 15 14 ff), it had remained subject to the united kingdom or to Judah until the revolt under J. The text is somewhat obscure, but it altogether that the expedition of J. against Edom ended in failure. In the account we are told that at the same time Libnah revolted.

Perhaps the revolt of Libnah should be taken in connection with the invasion of the Philistia and of the Arabians, mentioned in 2 Ch 21. 6. The Raid of Libnah was located on the south into Judah western border of Judah. Since it was a border city, it is possible that the compiler of K considered it as belonging to Philistia. In the account in Ch. J. is represented as having lost all his possessions and all his family, save Jehoahaz, the youngest of his sons, when the town was sacked and the palace plundered by the invading forces of Philistia and Arabians. This account appears to be based upon reliable sources.

In his last days, he was afflicted with a frightful disease in the bowels. His death was unregretted, and his burial without honor. Contr. the revolt, however, 2 K 8 24 with 2 Ch 21 19-20. Ahaziah, also called Jehoahaz, his younger son, then became king in his stead.

Jehoshaphat, jeh-o-sha'fat (יְהוֹשָׁפָט), yhō-shāphāt, "Jehud judges"): The 4 th king of Judah, son of Asa. His mother was Abigail, the daughter of Shilhi, of whom nothing further is known. He was 35 years of age at his accession, and reigned 25 years, c 873–849 BC. The history of his reign is contained in 1 K 22 41–50 and in 2 Ch 17 1–22. The narrative in 1 K 22 1–35a and in 2 K 3 4 ff belongs to the history of the Northern Kingdom. The absence from K of the details contained in 2 Ch affords no presumption against their truth. Neither do high numbers, embellished statements, and the coloring of the writer's own age destructive of the perspective.

The reign of J. appears to have been one of unusual religious activity. It was, however, characterized not so much by striking religious measures as it was by the religious spirit that pervaded every act of the king, who sought the favor of Jeh in every detail of his life (2 Ch 17 3 4).

1. His Religious Policy

He evidently felt that a nation's character is determined by its religion. Accordingly, he made it his duty to purify the national worship. The "sodomites," i.e. those who practised immorality in the worship of Jeh in the temple precincts, were banished from the land (1 K 22 46). The Asherim were taken out of Judah (2 Ch 17 6; 19 3), and "the people from Beer-sheba to the hill-country of Ephraim were brought back unto Jeh, the God of their fathers" (19 4). Because of his zeal for Jeh, J. is rewarded with power and "riches and honor in abundance" (17 5).

Believing that religion and morals, the foundation and bulwarks of civilization, suffer from ignorance, J. introduced a system of public instruction for the whole land (2 Ch 17 6 ff). He appointed a commission of princes, Levites and priests, to go from city to city to instruct the people. Their instruction was to be based on the one true foundation of sound morals and healthy religious life, "the book of the law of Jeh." (17 7–9).

Next in importance to J.'s system of public instruction, was his provision for the better administration of justice. He appointed judges to preside over courts of common pleas, which he established in all the fortified cities of Judah. In addition to these local courts, two courts of appeal, an ecclesiastical and a civil court, were established at Jerusalem to be presided over by priests, Levites, and leading nobles as judges. At the head of the ecclesiastical court was the high priest, and a layman, "the ruler of the house of Judah," headed the civil court of appeal (2 Ch 19 4–11). The insistence that a judge was to be in character like J., with whom there is "no iniquity among the people of respect of persons, nor taking of bribes" (19 7), is worthy of note.

According to 2 Ch 17 2, J. began his reign with defensive measures against Israel. Furthermore, he built castles and cities of store in the land of Judah, "and he had many works," probably military supplies, "in the cities of Judah" (17 15). He appears to have had a large standing army, including cavalry (1 Military K 22 4; 2 Ch 17 14 ff). However, the numbers in 2 Ch 17 14 ff seem to be impossibly high.

Godliness and security at home were followed by respect among and peace abroad. The fact that the Philis and the Arabians brought tribute (17 11), and that Edom had no king (1 K 22 47), but a deputy instead, who possibly was appointed by J., would indicate that he held the suzerainty over the nations and tribes bordering Judah on the S. and W. Holding the suzerainty over the weaker nations, and being allied with the stronger, J. secured the peace for the greater part of his reign (1 Ch 17 10) that fostered the internal development of the kingdom.

In contrast to the former kings of Judah, J. saw greater benefit in an alliance with Israel than in civil war. Accordingly, the old feud between the two kingdoms (1 K 14 Alliance 30; 15 6) was dropped, and J. made with Ahab peace with Israel (22 44). The political union was cemented by the marriage of Jehoram, son of J., to Jezebel, daughter of Ahab and Jezebel. Shortly after the marriage, J. joined Ahab in a campaign against Syria (2 Ch 18 1–3). In view of the subordinate position that J. seems to take in the campaign (1 K 22 43), and in view of the military assistance rendered to Jehoram (2 K 3 4 ff), Jehud seems to have become a dependency of Israel. Nevertheless, the union may have contributed to the welfare and prosperity of Judah, and it may have enabled J. to hold the suzerainty over the neighboring nations. However, the final outcome of the alliance with the house of Omri was disastrous for Judah. The introduction into Judah of Baalism more than counterbalanced any political and material advantage gained, and in the succeeding reigns it indirectly led to the almost total extinction of the royal family of Judah (11 1 ff).

In spite of the denunciation of the prophet Jehu for his expedition with Ahab, thus "helping" the wicked" (2 Ch 19 3), J. maintained a similar alliance with Jehoram of Israel Alliance with (2 K 3 4 ff). On the invitation of Je- Jehoram to join him in an expedition against Moab, J. was ready with the same set speech of acceptance as in the case of Ahab (2 K 3 7; of 1 K 22 4). For the details of the expedition see Jehoram, (1).

The Chronicler has given us a very remarkable account of a victory gained by J. over the Moabites and Ammonites. No doubt he made use of a current historical Midr. Many over the find the historical basis of the Midr in the events recorded in 2 K 3 4 ff. And Am- However, the localities are different, and monites and there a defeat is recorded, while in this case we have a victory. The story in outline bears the stamp of probability. 1 K 22 45 seems to suggest wars of J. that are not mentioned in K. The tribes mentioned in the account are represented as trying to make permanent settlement in Judah (2 Ch 20 11). In their advance through the S. of Judah, they were doubtless harassed by the shepherd population of the country. J., according to his custom, sought the help of Jeh. The invading forces fell to quarreling among themselves (2 Ch 20 23), and destroyed each other. The spoil was great because the invaders had brought all their goods with them, expecting to remain in the land.
The destruction of J.'s fleet is recorded in 1 K 22 48.49 and in 2 Ch 20 35–37. However, the two accounts are quite different.

9. Destruction of J.'s fleet. According to K. J. built ships of Tarshish to sail to Ophir for gold, but the fleet of Jehoshaphat's vessels were wrecked at Ezion-geber.

Fleet Thereupon Ahaziah offered to assist J. with seamen, but J. refused to enter into the alliance. According to Ch the alliance had been formed, and together they built ships at Ezion-geber, which were destroyed because J. had made an alliance with the wicked king of Israel. In view of J.'s other alliances, the Chronicler may be in the right. Ch, however, misunderstood the term "ships of Tarshish."

J. died at the age of 60. Jos says (Ant. IX, iii, 2) that he was buried in a magnificent manner, for he had imitated the actions of David. The kingdom was left to Jehoram, who inaugurated the beginning of his reign by causing the massacre of his brethren.

JEHOASHAPHAT, VALLEY OF (גֵּיהָשׁוֹפָּחָת), 'emek yehoshaphat; the latter word means "Jeh judgeth," and 'emek, "wide," "open valley"; LXX hé kóildás Iosaphat): The name is used in Joel 3 2.12 of the scene of Judgment: "Let the nations bestir themselves, and come up to the valley of Jehoshaphat; for there will I sit to judge all the nations round about" (ver 12). "The valley of decision" (or "sharp judgment") is another name the prophet gives to this spot (ver 14). Some have identified it with the valley ('emek) of Berakah (q.v.) of 2 Ch 20 26, where King Jehoshaphat obtained a great victory, but this is improbable.

Since the 4th cent. AD the Kidron (q.v.) valley has been named the Valley of J. The tradition is now strongest among the Moslems who point out the exact scene of the Judgment; the Bridge As Sard, dividing heaven and hell, is to stretch across this valley from the Haram area to the Mount of Olives. It is, however, the ambition of every pious Jew to be buried on the slopes of this valley, to be at hand at the resurrection. This, too, was an ordinary place for Jewish graves in prehistoric times (2 K 23 6, etc.) The valley today, esp. that part adjacent to the temple, is crowded with Moslem and Jewish graves. A worthless tradition indicates the tomb of Jehoshaphat himself close to the so-called "Pillar of Absalom." See King's Vale. There is not the slightest reason for believing that this is the spot referred to by Joel—indeed he may have spoken of an ideal spot only. The valley of the Kidron is a nábāl ("ravine"), not an 'emek ("broad valley"). It is impossible not to suspect that there is some connection between the name Jehoshaphat and the name of a village near the head of this valley.—Sháphat; perhaps at one time it was Wády Sháphat, which name would readily suggest the traditional one. See Gehenna.

JEHOSHEBA, jé-hosh'ē-ba, jé-hó-shé-ba (גֵּיהוֹשֶׁבָּה, y'hoshéba', "Jeh is deliverance"); Called "Jehoshabeath" in 2 Ch 22 11; daughter of Jehoram king of Judah, possibly by a wife other than Athaliah (2 K 11 2). According to 2 Ch 22 11, she was the wife of Jehoiada, the priest. She hid Jehoash, the young son of King Ahaziah, and so saved his life from Queen Athaliah.

JEHOASHUA, jé-hosh'ū-a (גֵּיהוֹשֻׁוָה, y'hoshu'a", "Jeh is deliverance," or "is opulence"); The usual Heb form of the name "Joshua"; it occurs in AV of Nu 13 16 (ARV "Hoshea"); and in some editions of AV in 1 Ch 7 27, where others have the form "Jehoshuah" (being wrongly added at the end). See Joshua, son of Nun.

JEHOVAH, jé-hó'va, je-hó'va. See God, Names of, II, 5.

JEHOVAH-JIREH, jé-hó'vah-ji're (גֵּיהוֹוָה יִירֶה, yahweh yir'eh, "Jeh he seeth"); The name given by Abraham to the place where he had sacrificed a ram provided by God, instead of his son Isaac (Gen 22 14). The meaning plainly is that the Lord sees and provides for the necessities of His servants. There is an allusion to ver 8 where Abraham says, “God will provide himself [RVm "will see for himself"] the lamb for a burnt offering.” The verse (4 AV) goes on to connect the incident with the popular proverb, “In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen” (RV “provided”). RVm suggests “he shall be seen.” “The mount of Jehovah” in other places denotes the temple hill at Jerusalem (Psc 24 8; Isa 2 3, etc). Various changes of the punctuation very different readings have been suggested. According to Swete’s text: “And A. called the name of that place [the ‘Lord saw’ (acfr)] in order that they may say today: ‘In the mountain [the] Lord was seen’” (acfr). LXIX reads, “In the mountain Jehovah seen,” or “will see.” If there is merely a verbal connection between the clauses we should most naturally read, “In the mount of Jehovah one is seen” (appears), i.e. men, people, appear—the reference being to the custom of visiting the temple at pilgrimages (Dive, HDB, s.v.). But if the connection of the proverb with the name “Jehovah-jireh” depends on the double sense of the word ‘see’ then the best explanation may be, Jehovah sees the needs of those who come to worship before Him on Zion, and there is “seen,” i.e. reveals Himself to them by answering their prayers and supplying their wants. His “seeing,” in other words, takes practical effect in a “being seen” (ibid).

JEHOVAH-NISSI, j-nis’i (גְּהֹוָּה נִיְּגִּי, yahweh nigei), “Jeh is my banner”: So Moses named the altar which he reared to signalize the defeat of the Amalekites by Israel under Joshua, at Rephidim (Ex 17 15). LXIX translates it “the Lord my refuge,” deriving nigei from נִיָּגָה, niga, “to flce.” ’The Onkelos reads, Moses built an altar and worshipped on it before Jehovah, who had wrought for him miracles” (יְהוֹה נִיָּגָה). The suggestion is that the people should rally round God as an army gathers round its standard. He is who leads them to victory.

JEHOVAH, SERVANT OF. See SERVANT OF JEHOVAH.

JEHOVAH-SHALOM, j-shal’om (גְּהֹוָּה שָלֹם, yahweh shalom), “Jehovah is peace”: This was the name given by Gideon to the altar he built at Ophrah, in allusion to the word spoken to him by the Lord, “Peace be unto thee” (Jgs 6 24). It is equivalent to “Jeh is well disposed.”

JEHOVAH-SHAMMAH, j-sham’ah (גְּהֹוָּה שַמָּמָה, yahweh shammah), “Jehovah is there”: The name to be given to the new Jerusalem, restored and glorified, as seen in the vision of Ezek (48 35 m; cf Rev 21 3). Jehovah returns to the temple of which He had forsaken, and from that time forward the fact of supreme importance is that He is there, dwelling in the midst of His people.

JEHOVAH-TSIDKENU (CIDKENU), j-tsid’ke-’nu (גְּהֹוָּה צִדְקֵנּוּ, yahweh tsidkenu), “Jeh [is] our righteousness”: The symbolic name given (1) to the king who is to reign over the restored Israel (Jer 23 6); (2) to the state or capital (33 16).

JEHOZABAD, j-hoz’a-bad (גְּהֹזָּבָד, yhózâ-báth, “Jeh has bestowed”): (1) A servant of King Jehoash of Judah. According to 2 K 12 21 (22), he was a son of Shomer, but 2 Ch 24 26 makes him “son of Shimrich the Moabiess.” (2) A Korahite doorkeeper, son of Obed-edom (1 Ch 26 4). (3) A Benjamite, one of King Jehoshaphat’s warriors (2 Ch 17 18).

JEHOZADAK, jé-hoz’a-dak (גְּהֹזָּדָּק, yhózâdâdkh, “Jeh is righteous”): Priest at the time of the captivity under Nebuchadnezzar (1 Ch 6 14 15 (Heb 5 40 41)). He was the father of Joshua (Jehushal) the priest (Hag 1 13 14; 2 2 4; Zec 6 11). AV has Josedek in Hag and Zec. Same as “Jozadak” (גְּזֹּדָּק, yózódâkhi, same meaning) in Ex 3 2 8; 5 2; 10 18; Neh 12 26; and = “Josedek” (AV “Josudce”) of 1 Esd 5 48 56; 6 2; 9 19; Sir 49 12.

JEHU, jé’hi (יְהוֹה, yhô), meaning uncertain, perhaps “Jeh is he”; 1 K 19 16 17; 2 K 9 10; Elos, Eloa: Son of Jehoshaphat, and descendant of Nimshi, hence commonly called “the son of Nimshi.” 10th king of Israel, had put to death, and IVth Dynasty, Jehu reigned for 28 years. His accession may be reckoned at c 752 BC (some date a few years later).

Jehu’s Tribute—from Obelisk of Shalmaneser.

A soldier of fortune, J. appears first as an officer in the body-guard of Ahab. To himself we owe the information that he was present 1. Officer at the judicial murder of Naboth, and of Ahab that Naboth’s sons were put to death with his father (2 K 9 26). He was in attendance when Ahab drove from Samaria to inspect his new possession in Jezreel, and was witness of the dramatic encounter at the vineyard between the king and the prophet Elijah (cf 1 K 21 16 ff). Years after, J. reminded Bidkar, his captain (lit. “thirdsman,” in chariot), of the doom they had heard pronounced upon Ahab and his house (2 K 9 25 ff). It was in fulfillment of this doom that J. at that time ordered the body of the slain Jehoram to be thrown into the inclosure which had once been Naboth’s (ver 26). Ahab’s temporary repentance averted the punishment from himself for a few years (1 K 21 27-29), but the blow fell at the battle of Ramoth-gilead, and J. would not be unmindful of the prophet’s words as he beheld the dogs licking Ahab’s blood as they washed his chariot “by the pool of Samaria” (22 38). A different fate awaited Ahab’s two sons. The elder, Ahaziah, died, after a short reign, from the effects of an accident (2 K 1). He 2. Jehoram was succeeded by his brother Jehoram, at Ramoth— who toward the close of his reign of gilead and 12 years (2 K 3 1) determined on an Jezreel attempt to recover Ramoth-gilead, where his father had been fatally stricken, from Hazael, of Syria. Ramoth-gilead was taken (2 K 9 14), but in the attack the Israelish king was severely wounded, and was taken to Jezreel to be healed of his wounds (ver 15). A city meanwhile was left in charge of J. and his fellow-captains. At Jezreel he was visited by Ahaziah, of Judah, who had taken part with him in the war (3 23 29; 9 16). The time was now ripe for the execution of the predicted vengeance on the house of Ahab, and to Elisha the prophet, the successor of Elijah, it fell to take the decisive step which precipitated the crisis. Hazael and J. had already been named to Elijah as the persons who were to execute the Divine judgment, the one as king of Syria, the other as king of Israel (1 K 19 15-17). Elijah was doubtless aware of this commission, which it was now his part, as respected J., to fulfill. A message was hastily dispatched to Ramoth-gilead, with instructions to seek out J., take him apart, anoint him king of Israel in Jeh's name, and charge him with the task of utterly destroying the house of Ahab in punishment for the righteous blood shed by Ahab and Jezebel. The messenger was then to return, this was done, and J., the sacred oil poured on his head, found himself alone with this appalling trust committed to him (2 K 9 1-10).

Events now moved rapidly. J.'s companions were naturally eager to know what had happened, and on learning that J. had become king, "He had smitten his men with a rod," he" anointed them, and J.'s trumpeters proclaimed, J. is king (1 K 11-12). One was not permitted to leave the city to carry forth tidings, and J. himself, with characteristic impetuosity, set out, with a small body of horsemen, in his chariot to Jezreel. Bidkar was there as charioteer (9 25). As the rearers of the great chariot were with the city, a watchman reported their advance, and messengers were sent to inquire as to their errand. These were ordered to fall into the rear. This conduct awakened suspicion, and Jehoram and Ahaziah— who was still with his invalidated kinsman—ordered their chariots, and proceeded in person to meet J. The companies met at the ill-omened field of Naboth, and there the first stroke of vengeance fell. The anxious query, "Is it peace?" was answered by a storm of denounced wrath from J., and on Jehoram turning to flee, an arrow from J.'s powerful bow shot him through the heart, and he sank dead in his chariot. Ahaziah likewise was pursued, and smitten "at the ascent of Gur, which is by Ibleam." He died at Megiddo, and was taken to Jezreel for burial in the sanctuary of the kings (9 11-28). A somewhat variant account of Ahaziah's death is given in 2 Ch 22 9. It is possible that J. came to Megiddo or its neighborhood, and had to do with his death.

The slaughter of Jehoram was at once followed by that of the chiefinstigator of all the crimes for which the house of Ahab suffered—the queen mother Jezebel. Hot from the pursuit of Jezreel, Jezebel, now an aged woman, but still defiant, had painted and attired herself, and, looking from her window, met him as he drove into the palace court, with the insulting question, "Is it peace, thou Zimri, thy master's murderer?" (cf 1 K 18 9-12). J.'s answer was an appeal for aid from those within. Two or three eunuchs of the palace gave signs of their concurrence. These, at J.'s bidding, threw Jezebel down into the courtyard, where, lying in her blood, she was trodden under foot by the chariot horses. When, a little later, her remains were sought for burial, she was found to have been almost wholly devoured by the dogs—a lurid commentary on Elijah's earlier threatening, which was now recalled (2 K 9 30-37). J. was an intrusted minister of judgment, but the pitiless zeal, needless cruelty, and, afterward, deceit, with which he executed his mission, withdrew our sympathy from him, as it did that of a later prophet (Hos 1 4).

The next acts of J. reveal yet more clearly his thoroughness of purpose and promptitude of action, while they afford fresh exhibitions of his ruthless and unscrupulousness of spirit. Samaria was the capital of the kingdom, and headquarters of Ahaziah of J. that he had removed, at least temporarily, an obelisk of Baal, which his father had set up (2 K 3: 2-10 26). The city was still held for the house of Ahab, and

6. Slaughter of the Baal-worship Adventurers. J. continued, in the large sense of male descendants—resided in it (10 1-6). J. here adopted a bold and astute policy. He sent letters to Samaria challenging those in authority to set up one of their master's sons as king, and fight for the city and the kingdom. The governors knew well that they could make no effective resistance to J., and at once humbly tendered their submission. J., in a second message, bade them prove their sincerity by delivering to him the heads of the 70 princes of Ahab's house in baskets. This they did, by their act irrevocably committing themselves to J.'s cause (ver 9). The ghastly relics were piled up in two heaps at the gate of Jezreel—a horrible object-lesson to any stars lost. The heads of these princes were given over to the hands of J., and he placed them in the court of the temple (all, of course, with great ceremony).

Apart from the faultlessness in the agent's motive, the deeds now recounted fell within the letter of J.'s commission, and were within signs of the great works of blood that follow. J. had killed Ahaziah, king of Judah. Now, on his way of Ahaziah's to Samaria, he met a company of 42 persons, described as "brethren of Ahaziah"—evidently blood-relation degrees, as Ahaziah's own brethren had been earlier slain by the Syrians (2 Ch 21 17; 22 1)—and, on learning who they were, and the respect of their kindred to Jezreel, gave orders that they be slain on the spot, and their bodies ignominiously carried to the pit (or "cistern") of the sheep-house, where he had discovered them. It was a cruel excess for which no sufficient justification can be pleaded (2 K 10 12-14). Still less can the craft and violence be condoned by which, when he reached Samaria, J. evinced his "zeal for Jeh" (ver 16) in the extirpation of the worshippers of Baal. J. had secured on his side the support of a nobleman—Jehoram the son of Jehu of the family of Bani and his entrance into Samaria was signaled by further slaying of all adherents of Ahab. Then, doubtless to the amazement of many, J. proclaimed himself an enthusiastic follower of Baal. A great festival was organized, to which all persons—worshippers, and priests of Baal were invited from every part of Israel. J. himself took the leading part in the sacrifice (ver 25). Vestments were distributed to distinguish the true worshippers of Baal from others. Then when all were safely gathered into "the house of Baal," the gates were closed, and 80 soldiers were sent in to massacre the whole deluded company in cold blood. None escaped. The temple of Baal was broken up. Thus, indeed, "J. destroyed Baal out of Israel" (ver 33) at a frightful cost of falsehood and treacherous dealing!

The history of J. in the Bible is chiefly the history of his revolution as now narrated. His reign itself is summed up in more or less effects, crowded with the attacks made by Hazael, with Hazael of Syria, on the trans-Jordanic territories of Israel (10 32-33). These districts were overrun, and remained lost to Israel in the reign of J.'s great-grandson, Jeroboam II (2 K 14 23).

It is in another direction, viz., to the annals of Assyria, we have to look for further information we possess on the reign of J. In these annals, fortunately, some interesting notices are preserved. In 854 BC was fought the great battle of Karkar (a place between Aleppo and Hamath), when Shalmaneser II, king of Assyria, defeated a powerful combination formed against him (Damascus, Hamath, Philistia, Ammon, etc.). An arms treaty with the Medes is mentioned (Ashurbanipal's New Year's Cylinder, Sargon's "Constitutions," and the two are said to point to a foreign origin.

Jehudi, jē-hū'di (1 Ch 4 18 AV). See Hā-jeHudiiah.

Jehuel, jē-hū'ēl (K'thīb בָּנַי, yāhādēl; but K'ro בָּנַי, yāhādl, i.e. "Jehiel" AV, in 2 Ch 29 14): A Levite; see Jehiel, (5).

Jehush, jē-hūsh (1 Ch 8 39). See Jēsh, (3).

Jē'el, jē-'ēl (יֵעֵל, yē'ēl, meaning unknown): (1) A Reubenite (1 Ch 5 7).

(2) In 1 Ch 8 29, added in AV from 9 35, where K'thīb is "Jeuel," an ancestor of King Saul; AV "Jehiel." (3) One of David's mighty men (1 Ch 11 44).

AV is "Jehiel"; K'thīb is "Jediel." (4) A Levite, keeper of the ark with Obed-edom (1 Ch 15 18 21; 16 5; 2 Ch 20 14), called "Je-hiah" in 1 Ch 16 24.

(5) A Levite (1 Ch 16 5) = "Jaaziel" of 1 Ch 16 15 (q.v.). (6) A scribe under King Uzziah (2 Ch 26 11).

(7) A chief of the Levites, present at King Josiah's great Passover feast (2 Ch 35 9).

(8) One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10 43) = "Juel" in 1 Esd 9 35. (9) AV in 2 Ch 29 14; see Jehiel, (5). (10) AV in Ezra 18 13; see Jēhu, (3).

Jēka'zeń, jē-kā'-zēn (גֶּקְעֹנ, gēkō'ān, "God gathereth"); Neh 11 25. See Kābzeel.

Jēka'ăm, jē-kā'-əm (גֶּקָעֹמ, gēkō'ām, probably "may kinsman establish"); Head of a Levitical house (1 Ch 23 19; 24 23).

The meaning of the name depends upon that of לְעַמ (lam) in compound names; see HPN, 46, 51 ff.

Jēkāmi'ah, jē-kā'-mə-ā (גֶּקָעָמִי, gēkō'amī, "may Jeh establishe"): (1) A Judahite, son of Shallum (1 Ch 2 41).

(2) A son of King Jehoniah (Jehoiachin); in AV "Jecamiah" (1 Ch 3 18).

Jēkuthiel, jē-kū'-thi-ēl (גֶּקְעֹתי-יל, gēkō'tī'ēl, meaning doubtful): A Judahite (1 Ch 4 18). The meaning may be "preservation of God," or perhaps the same as יָקָע (yēkāthāl, "Joktheel," the name of a place in Josh 16 38; 2 K 14 7.

Jēmi'māh, jē-mī'-mə (גֶּמִימָה, gēmīmāh, perhaps a diminutive meaning "little dove"): The first daughter of Job (42 13), born after his restoration from affliction.

Jēmē'naan, jēmē'-nān (עֵמְנָאָן, Emēnān): A city on the coast of Pal; mentioned among those affected by the expedition of Holofernes ( Judges 2 28; 3 1 ff.). The name is used for Judael, generally called "Jamnia" by the Gr writers.

Jēmuel, jē-ˈmē-əl (גֶּמְיוּל, gēmī'əl, meaning unknown): A son of Simeon (Gen 46 10; Ex 6 15) = "Nemuel" in Nu 26 12; 1 Ch 4 24.

Syr version has "Jemuel" in the 4 passages, but Gray (HPN, 307, n. 6) thinks "Jemuel" is more probably a correction in Geon than "Nemuel" in Nu.

Egypt, jēp'ard, JēPARDy, jēp'ar-di: The Eng. word referred originally to a game where the chances were even (from OfR. jeu parti); transferred thence to designate any great risk. In the NT, represented by the Gr. kindethel (Lk 8:23; 1 Cor 15:30). In the OT (Jgs 5:18) for a Hittite chief, possibly pronounced by the Israelites as “Jeh.” The chief name thus translated is of small value upon their lives (Vulg. “offered their souls to death”); for elliptical expression, “went with their lives,” in 2 S 23:17 m.

JEPHTHAH, jef'tha (תִּפְתַּח, yiphṭah, “opened,” or “opener,” probably signifying “Jeh will open”; †يفתא, Iefthade; used as the name of a place, as in Josh 16:43; 19:14; of a man, Jgs 10:6—12:7): Ninth judge of the Israelites. His antecedents are obscure. In the story of his rise, Gilead was probably intended to be the actual name of his father, his mother was a harlot. He was driven from home on account of his illegitimacy, and went to the land of Tob in Eastern Syria (Jgs 11:23). Here he and his followers lived the life of freebooters. The Israelites beyond the Jordan being in danger of an invasion by the Ammonites, J. was invited by the elders of Gilead to be their leader (11:6). Remembering how they had expelled him from their territory and his heritage, J. demanded of them that in the event of success with the Ammonites, he was to be continued as leader. This condition being accepted he returned to Gilead (11:7—11). The account of the diplomacy used by J. to prevent the Ammonites from invading Gilead is a interpolation, and is thought by many interpreters to be a compilation from Nu 20—21. It is of great interest, however, not only because of the fairness of the argument used (11:12-28), but also by virtue of the fact that it contains a history of the journey of the Israelites from Lower Egypt to the banks of the Jordan. This history is distinguished from that of the Pentiphery chiefly by the things omitted. If diplomacy was tried, it failed to dissuade the Ammonites from seeking to invade Israel. J. prepared for battle, but before taking the field paused at Mizpeh of Gilead, and registered a vow that if he were successful in battle, he would offer as a burnt offering to Jeh whatsoever should first come from his doors to greet him (11:29—31). The battle is fought. J. is the victor, and now his vow returns to him with anguish and sorrow. Returning to his home, the first to greet him is his daughter and only child. The father’s sorrow and the courage of the daughter are the bright lights on this sombre crucifixion of God and the nature of sacrifice. That the sacrifice was made seems certain from the narrative, although some critics choose to substitute for the actual death of the maiden the setting the girl apart for a life of perpetual virginity. The Israelitish laws concerning sacrifices and the language used in 11:39 are the chief arguments for the latter interpretation. The entire narrative, however, will hardly bear this construction (11:34—40). J. was judge in Israel for 6 years, but appears only once more in the Scripture narrative. The men of Ephraim, offended because they had had no share in the victory over the Ammonites, made war upon Gilead, but were put to rout by the forces under J. (12:1—6).

JEPHUNNEH, jef'oon'e (יַפְחֻנֶה, yiph'ahuneh, meaning uncertain):

1. A son of Caleb (Nu 13:6; 14:6,90, etc.). According to Nu 13:6, he was of the tribe of Judah; according to Josh 14:16, a Kenizzite; the Kenizzites were incorporated in Judah (cf. 1 Ch 4:13—15).
2. A son of Jether, an Asherite (1 Ch 7:38).

JERAH, je'ra (יִרְעָה, yerah): A son of Joktan (Gen 10:26; 1 Ch 1:20). No district Jerah has been discovered. However, Yurâhk in Yemen and Yara'h in Hijaz are places named by the Arab. geographers. The fact that the word in Heb means “moon” has led to the following suggestions: the Banâ' Hîdal (“sun placed over the little moon”); the small value upon their lives (Vulg. “offered their souls to death”); for elliptical expression, “went with their lives,” in 2 S 23:17 m.

JERAHMEEL, jera-mel' (יַרְחַמֶל, yera'mel’; “may God have compassion!”):

1. In 1 Ch 2 9.25.26.27.33.42, he is described as the son of Hezron, the son of Perez, the son of Judah by Tamar his daughter-in-law (Gen 38). In 1 S 27:10 is mentioned the negheb of the Jerahmeelites, jera-mel'el-t's (יוּרְחַמֶלְלֵת, a collective noun), RV “the South of the Jerahmeelites.” The latter is a tribal name in use probably before the proper name, above; their cities are mentioned in 1 S 30:20. Cheyne has radical views on J. See BB, s.v.; also T. Witton Davies in Review of Theology and Philosophy, III, 689—708 (May, 1908); and Cheyne's replies in Hibbert Journal, VII, 132—51 (October, 1908), and Decline and Fall of the Kingdom of Judah.
2. A Merarite Levite, son of Kish (1 Ch 24:29).
3. “The king’s son,” RV and AVm (Jer 36:26). RVm, AV “have of son of Hammelech,” taking the word יארְחָמֶל as a proper name. He was “probably a royal prince, one who had a king among his ancestors but not necessarily son of the ruling king; so 36:6; 1 K 22:50; esp. Zeph 1:8 written at a time when the reigning king, Josiah, could not have had a grown-up son” (Driver, Jer, 224, n.e.). J. was with two others commanded by Jehoiakim to arrest Jeremiah and Baruch.

JERECHU, je-re'ku, AV Jerechus, je-re'kus (1 E d 5 22). See JERICHO.

JERED, je'red (יִרְעֶד, yeredh, “descent”): A Judahite, father of Gedor (1 Ch 4:18). See also JARED.

JEREMAI, je-re'mi, je-rem'ai (יִרְמַי, yirmay), meaning unknown): One of those who had married foreign wives (Ezr 10:33). See JEREMIAS (1 E d 9 34).

JEREMIAH, je-rem'ia (יוֹרְמִיהָ, yirm'yah, or [b] shorter form, יִרְמִיָה, yirm'yah), both differently explained as “Jeh establishes [so Gesenius suggests, “appoints”]” (A. B. Davidson in HDB, II, 5906), and “Jeh loosenth [the womb];” see BDB): The form (b) is used of Jeremiah the prophet only in Jer 27:1; 28:5—6.10.11.12.16.19; 39:1; 1 Esr 1:1; Dn 9:2, while the other is found 116:1 in Jer 25. In 1 E d 1 28:32.47.57; 2 Esd 2:18, EV has “Jeremia,” so AV in 2 Mac 2.1.57; Mt 2:17; 27:9; in Mt 16:14, AV has “Jeremias,” but RV in 2 Mac and Mt has “Jeremiah.”

1. The prophet. See special article. Of the following, (2), (3), and (4) have form (a) above; the others the form (b).
2. Father of Hanumal (Hamital), the mother of King Jehoahaz and King Jehoakim (2 K 23:31; 24:18; Jer 62:1).
3. A Rechabite (Jer 36:3).
4. In 1 Ch 12:13 (Heb 14), a Gadite.
5. In 1 Ch 12:10 (Heb 11), a Gadite.
6. In 1 Ch 12:4 (Heb 6), a Benjaminite (?) or Judaeans. (4), (5), and (6) all joined David at Ziklag.

The name of one of the greatest prophets of Israel. The Heb יְרֵמֱיָהוּ, yirmēyahu, abbreviated to יְרָמָי, yiramai, signifies either “Jeh hurle” or “Jeh finds,” LXX and person reads Ἰερομαίος, Ieromaios, and the Vulg Jeremia. As this name also occurs not infrequently, the prophet is called “the son of Hilkiah” (I 1), who is, however, not the high priest mentioned in 2 K 22 and 23, as it is merely stated that he was “of the priests who were in Anathoth” (A and B). In Anathoth, now Andata, a small village 1½ hours N.E. of Jerusalem, lived a class of priests who belonged to a side line, not to the line of Zadok (cf 1 K 2 26).

J. was called by the Lord to the office of a prophet while still a youth (I 2) about 20 years of age, in the 13th year of King Josiah (1 2; 25 3), in the year 627 BC, and was active in the life of Jeremiah in this capacity from this time on to the destruction of Jerusalem, 586 BC, under kings Josiah, Jehoash, Jehoahaz, Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah. Even after the fall of the capital city he prophesied in Egypt at least for several years, so that his work extended over a period of about 50 years in all. At first he probably lived in Anathoth, and put in his appearance publicly in Jerusalem only on the occasion of the great festivals; later he lived in Jerusalem, and was there during the terrible times of the siege and the destruction of the city.

Although King Josiah was God-fearing and willing to serve Jehovah, and soon inaugurated his reformation according to the law of Jehovah (in the 18th year of his reign), yet J., at the time when he was called to the prophetic office, was not left in doubt about the fact that the catastrophe of the judgment of God over the city would soon come (1 11 ff); and when, after a few years, the Book of the Law was found in the temple (2 K 22 and 23), J. preached “the words of this covenant” to the people in the town and throughout the land (11 1-8; 17 19-27), and exhorted to obedience to the Divine command; but in doing this then and afterward he became the object of much hostility, esp. in his native city, Anathoth. Even his own brethren or near relatives entered into a conspiracy against him by declaring that he was a dangerous fanatic (12 6). However, the condition of J. under this pious king was the most happy in his career, and he lamented the latter’s untimely death in sad lyrics, which the author of Chb was able to use (2 Ch 36 25), but which have not come down to our times.

Much more unfavorable was the prophet’s condition after the death of Josiah. Jehoash-Shallum, who ruled only 3 months, received the announcement from J. (22 10 ff), Jehoashiah (609-598 BC) in turn favored the heathen worship, and oppressed the people through his love of luxury and by the erection of grand structures (Jer 22 13 ff). In addition, his policies were treacherous. He conspired with Egypt against his superior, Nebuchadnezzar. Epoch-making was his most notable exploit. It was he who murdered Gedaliah, the Chaldean governor whom Jehovah had sent to substitute for the former. Of all the Chaldeans, the Chaldeans gained the upper hand in Hither Asia, as J. had predicted (46 1-12). Under Jehoiakim J. delivered his great temple discourse (7-9; 10 17-25). The priests for this reason determined to have the prophet put to death (ch 26). However, influential elders interceded for him, and the princes yet showed some justice. He was, however, abused by the authorities at the appeal of the priests (ch 20). According to 36 1 ff, he was no longer permitted to enter the place of the temple. For this reason the Lord commanded him to collect his prophecies in a book-roll, and to have them read to the people by his faithful pupil Baruch (ch 36; of ch 45). The book fell into the hands of the king, who burned it. However, J. dictated the book a second time to Baruch, together with new additions.

Jehoiachin or Coniah (22 4 ff), the son of Jehoiakim, after a reign of 3 months, was taken into captivity to Babylon by Nebuchadnezzar, together with a large number of his nobles and the best part of the people (Jer 24 1; 29 2), as the prophet had predicted (22 20-30). But conditions did not improve under Zedekiah (597-586 BC). This king was overthrown, and the city was destroyed; the temple had been; but all the more hostile were the princes and the leaders, who were now in command after the better class of these had been deported to Babylon. They continually planned rebellion against Babylon, while J. was compelled to oppose this and to arouse the patriotism of his country.

Finally, the Bab army came in order to punish the faithless vassal who had again entered into an alliance with Egypt. J. earnestly advised submission, but the king was too firmly resolved to follow this, not only as against his nobles. A long siege resulted, which caused the direst sufferings in the life of J. The commander threw him into a vile prison, charging him with being a traitor (37 11 ff). The king, who consulted him secretly, released him from prison, and put him into the “court of the guard” (37 17 ff), where he could move around freely, and could again prophesy. Now that the judgment had come, he could again speak to the people (chs 32, 33). Also chs 30 and 31, probably, were spoken about this time. But as he continued to preach submission to the people, those in authority cast him into a slimy cistern, from which the pity of a co-worker, Johanan, delivered him (39 15-18). He again returned to the court of the guard, where he remained until Jerus was taken.

After the capture of the city, J. was treated with great consideration by the Babylonians, who knew that he had spoken in favor of their government (39 11 ff; 40 1 ff). They gave him the choice of going to Babylon or of remaining in his native land. He decided for the latter, and went to the governor Gedaliah, at Mizpah, a man worthy of all confidence. But when this man, after a short time, was murdered by conspirators, the Jews who had been left in Pal, becoming alarmed and fearing the vengeance of the Chaldeans, determined to emigrate to Egypt. J. advised against this most earnestly, and threatened the vengeance of Jehovah, if the people should insist upon their undertaking (42 1 ff). But they insisted and even compelled the aged prophet to go with them (43 1 ff). Their first goal was Tahpanhes (Daphne), a town in Lower Egypt. At this place they still continued to preach the word of God, and to announce the latest of his preserved discourses in 43 8-13, as also the sermon in ch 44, delivered at a somewhat later time but yet before 570 BC. At that time J. must have been from 70 to 80 years old. He

(7) Head of a Manassite family (1 Ch 5 24).

(8) A priest who sealed the covenant with Nebuchadnezzar in the 13th year of his reign (22 10), probably the same as he of 12 24, who took part in the procession at the dedication of the walls of Jerus.

(9) A priest who went to Jerus with Zerubbabel from exile and became head of a priestly family of that name (Neh 12 1).

David Francis Roberts
probably died soon after this in Egypt. The church Fathers report that he was stoned to death at Daphne by the Jews (Jerome, *Ado. Jovin., ii, 37; Tertullian, Contra Gnost., viii: Psuedepigraph., De P. Rabbae 26).

The Book of Jer gives us not only a fuller account of the life and career of its author than do the books of the other prophets, but we also find Personal learn more about his own inner and Character personal life and feelings than we do of Jeremiah of Isaiah or any other prophet. From this source we learn that he was, by nature, gentle and tender in his feelings, and sympathetic. A decided contrast to this is found in the hard and unmerciful judgment which it was his mission to announce. God made him strong and firm and immovable like iron for his mission (1 18; 15 20). This contrast between his naturally warm personal feelings and his strict Divine mission not rarely appears in the history of utterances and actions. However, when he rejoiced over God spoke to him (15 16); but soon these words of God were to his heart a source of pain and of suffering (15 17 ff). He would have preferred not to utter them; and then they burned in his breast as a fire (20 7 ff; 22 9). He personally stood in need of love, and yet was not permitted to marry (16 1 f). He was compelled to forego the pleasures of youth (15 17). He loved his people as nobody else, and yet was always compelled to prophesy evil for it, and be the servant of his nation. This often caused him to despair. The enmity to which he fell a victim, on account of his declaration of nothing but the truth, he deeply felt; see his complaints (9 1 ff; 12 5 ff; 15 10; 17 14–15; 18 23, and often). In this sad antagonism between his heart and the commands of the Lord, he would perhaps wish that God had not spoken to him; he even cursed the day of his birth (15 10; 20 14–18; cf Job 3 1 ff). Such complaints distinguish him from that which the Lord through His Spirit communicated to the prophet. God rebukes him for these complaints, and demands of him to repent and to trust and obey Him (15 19). This discipline makes him the all the more uncontrollable. Even his enemies began to denounce the message of his exhortations (11 20 ff; 15 15; 17 18; 18 21–23) originated in part in his passionate and deep nature, and show how great is the difference between him and that perfect Sufferer, who prayed even for his deadly enemies. But J. was nevertheless a type of that Suffering Saviour, more than any of the OT saints. He, as a priest, prayed for his people, until God forbade him to do so (7 16; 11 14; 14 11; 18 20). He was compelled more than all others to suffer the reproaches as belonging to God, which fell on his people. The people themselves also felt that he meant well to them. A proof of this is seen in the fact that the rebellious people, who always did the contrary of what he had commanded them, forced him, the unwelcome prophet of God, to go along with them because they felt that he was their good genius.

What J. was to preach was the judgment upon Judah. As the reason for this judgment J. everywhere mentioned the apostasy from Deh Pehem, to Babylon, which was practised on bemoth, or the “high places” by of Jeremiah Judah, as this had been done by Israel. Many heathenish abuses had found their way into the life of the people. Outespoken heathenism had been introduced by such men as King Manasseh, even the sacrifice of children to the honor of Baal-Molech in the valley of Hinnom (7 31; 19 5; 32 35), and the worship of “the queen of heaven” (7 18; 44 10). It is true that the reformation of Josiah swept away the worst of these abominations. But an inner return to Jehovah did not result from this reformation. For the reason that the improvement had been made on the surface and outward, and was done to please the king, J. charges up to his people all their previous sins, and the guilt of the present generation was yet added to this (16 11 f). Together with religious insincerity went the moral corruption of the people, such as dishonesty, injustice, oppression of the helpless, slander, and the like. Compare the accusations found in 5 1 ff. 7 26 ff; 6 7 13; 7 5 1 9; 9 2 5 8; 17 9 ff; 21 12; 22 13 ff; 25 10; 29 23, etc. Esp. to the spiritual leaders, the priests and prophets, are these things charged up.

The judgment which is to come in the near future, as a punishment for the sins of the people, is from the outset declared to be the conquest of the country through an enemy from abroad. In this way the heated caldron with the face from the N., in the vision containing the full tale of the Calamity of the N. (1 10), was to be understood. This power in the N. is not named until the 4th year of Jehoiakim (ch 25), where Nebuchadnezzar is definitely designated as the conqueror. It is often thought, that, in the earlier years, J. was merely speaking of the Scythians when he spoke of the enemies from the N., esp. in chs 4–6. The Scythians (according to Herodotus 1 103 ff) had, probably a few years before J.'s call to the prophetical office, taken possession of Media, then marched through Asia Minor, and even forced their way as far as Egypt. They crossed through Canna, passing by on their march from E. to W., near Beth-shean (Scythopolis). The ravages of this fierce people probably influenced the language used by J. in his prophecies (cf 11 11 ff; 15 15 ff; 6 3 ff 22 ff). But it is unthinkable that J. expected nothing more than a plundering and a booty-seeking expedition of the Scythian nomad hordes. Chariots, such as are described in 3 13, the Scythians did not possess. Moreover, it cannot be forgotten that J. from the outset speaks of a deportation of his people to this foreign land (3 18; 5 19), while an exile of Israel in the country of the Scythians was out of the question. At all events from the 4th year of J.'s mission, he foresees the Chaldaeans as the enemy who, according to his former announcement, would come from the N. It is possible that it was only in the course of time that he reached a clear conviction as to what nation was meant by the revelation from God. But, upon further reflection, he must have felt almost certain on this subject, esp. as Isaiah (59 6), Micah (4 10), and, soon after these, Habakkuk had named Babylon as the power that was to carry out the judgment upon Israel. Other prophets, too, regard the Babylonians as belonging to the foreign nations (cf Zec 6 8), because they always came from the N., and because they were the legal successors of the Assyrians.

In contrast to optimistic prophets, who had hoped to remedy matters in Israel (6 14), J. from the beginning predicted the destruction of the city and of the sanctuary, as also the end of the Jewish nation and the exile of the people through these enemies from abroad. According to 25 11; 29 10, the Bab supremacy (not exactly the empire) was to last for 70 years; and after this, deliverance should come. Promises to this effect are found only now and then in the earlier years of the prophet (3 14 ff; 12 14 ff; 16 14 f). However, during the time of the siege and afterward, such predictions are more frequent (cf 23 1 ff; 24 6 f; 47 2-7; and in the "Book of Comfort," chs 30-33).

What characterizes this prophet is the spiritual import given to his religious character; the external theocracy he delivers up to destruction, because its forms were not animated by God-fearing sentiments. External circumcision is of no value without inner purity of heart. The external temple will be destroyed, because it has become the hiding-place of sinners. External sacrifices have no value, because those who offer them are lacking in spirituality, and this is displeasing to God. The law is abused and misinterpreted (8 8); the words of the prophets as a rule do not apply to other forms of worship than the forms of the Council is eventually to make way for a glorious presence of the Lord. The law is to be written in the hearts of men (31 31 ff). The glories of the Messianic times the prophet does not describe in detail, but their spiritual character he repeatedly describes in the words "Jehu our righteousness," (23 6; 33 16). However, we must not overestimate the idealism of J. He believed in a realistic restoration of the theocracy to a form, just as the other prophets (of chs 31, 32, 38-40).

As far as the form of his prophetic utterances is concerned, J. is of a poetical nature; but he was not only a poet. He often speaks in the meter of an elegy; but he is not bound by this, and readily passes over to other forms at times into prose speech, when the contents of his discourses require it. The somewhat monotonous and elegiac tone, which is in harmony with his sad message to the people, gives way to more lively and varied forms of expression, when the prophet speaks of other and foreign nations. In doing this he often makes use of the utterances of earlier prophets.

The first composition of the book is reported in 36 1 ff. In the 4th year of Jehoiakim, at the command of Jeh, he dictated all of the prophecies he had spoken down to this time to his pupil Baruch, who wrote them on a roll. After the destruction of this book-rol by the king, he would not be stopped from reproducing the contents again and making additions to it (36 32). In this we have the origin of the present book of Jer. This book, however, not only received further additions, but had been modified. The contents of the book had originally been arranged chronologically, and these reached only down to the 4th year of King Jehoiakim, we find in the book, as it is now, as early as 21 1 ff; 23 1 ff; 25 1 ff, discourses from the times of Jeremiah. However, the 2d edition (36 28) contained, no doubt, ch 25, with these discourses directed against the heathen nations extant at that time. The lack of order, from a chronological point of view, in the present book, is attributable also to the fact that historical accounts appendices concerning the career of J. were added to the book in later times, e.g. chs 26, 35, 36 and others; and in these additions are also found older discourses of the prophet. Beginning with ch 37, the story of the prophet during the siege of Jerusalem and the destruction of the city is reported, and in connection with this are his words and discourses belonging to this period.

It is a question whether these pieces, which are more narrative in character and of a contemporary, probably Baruch, who was the prophet when the first part of the book, at one time constituted a book by themselves, out of which they were later taken and incorporated in the book of the prophet, or whether they were inserted by Baruch, or by the editor of the first part of the book, it may be urged that they are not always found at their proper places chronologically; e.g. ch 26 is a part of the temple discourse in chs 7-9. This book of Baruch," which is claimed by some critics to have existed as a separate book beside that of Jer, would not furnish a connected biography, and does not seem to have a religious purpose. It contains introductions to certain words and speeches of the prophet and statements of what the consequences of these had been. Thus it is more probable that Baruch, at a later time, made supplementary additions to the original book, which the prophet had dictated without any personal data. But in this work the prophet himself may have cooperated. At places, perhaps, the dictation of the prophet ends in a narrative of Baruch (19 14-20 6), or vice versa, when the Ark of the Covenant is eventually to make way for a gloriously presence of the Lord. The law is to be written in the hearts of men (31 31 ff). The glories of the Messianic times the prophet does not describe in detail, but their spiritual character he repeatedly describes in the words "Jehu our righteousness," (23 6; 33 16). However, we must not overestimate the idealism of J. He believed in a realistic restoration of the theocracy to a form, just as the other prophets (of chs 31, 32, 38-40).

As far as the form of his prophetic utterances is concerned, J. is of a poetical nature; but he was not only a poet. He often speaks in the meter of an elegy; but he is not bound by this, and readily passes over to other forms at times into prose speech, when the contents of his discourses require it. The somewhat monotonous and elegiac tone, which is in harmony with his sad message to the people, gives way to more lively and varied forms of expression, when the prophet speaks of other and foreign nations. In doing this he often makes use of the utterances of earlier prophets.

The first composition of the book is reported in 36 1 ff. In the 4th year of Jehoiakim, at the command of Jeh, he dictated all of the prophecies he had spoken down to this time to his pupil Baruch, who wrote them on a roll. After the destruction of this book-roll by the king, he would not be stopped from reproducing the contents again and making additions to it (36 32). In this we have the origin of the present book of Jer. This book, however, not only received further additions, but had been modified. The contents of the book had originally been arranged chronologically, and these reached only down to the 4th year of King Jehoiakim, we find in the book, as it is now, as early as 21 1 ff; 23 1 ff; 25 1 ff, discourses from the times of Jeremiah. However, this "Book...
A special problem is furnished by the relation of the text of Jer to the Alexandrian version of the Seventy (LXX). Not only does the Heb form of the text differ from the Gr materially, much more than this is the case in other books of the OT, but the arrangement, too, is quite different. The overruling consideration here is the formula of the heathen nations (chs 46-51) is in the LXX found in the middle of ch 48, at least, in an altogether different order (vss. 49 35-54; 50; 51; 47 1-7; 49 7-22; 49 1-5, 28-33: 52-3; 48). In addition, the readings throughout the book in many cases are divergent, the text in the LXX being in general shorter and more compact. The Heb text has about 2,700 Heb words less than the authentic Heb text, and is thus about one-eighth shorter. As far as the insertion of the addresses against the heathen nations in ch 29 is concerned, the Gr order is certainly not more original than the Heb. It rather casts a shadow on the whole. But the final chapter of the Heb text is in general shorter and more compact. The Heb text has about 2,700 Heb words less than the authentic Heb text, and is thus about one-eighth shorter.

JEREMIAH, jer-e-mi'-ahs (Iērēmias, Jeremias). (1) Named among the sons of Bani as one of those who had married foreign wives (1 Esdr 9 34). In Ezr 10 33 we find, “Jeremiah” among the sons of Hashum. In 1 Esdr it should come in 9 33 after Manasses.

(2) See Jeremiah (general art.).

JEREMIEL, jer-e-miel'-iel (Lat Hieremiel, al. Jeremiel, “El hurlis” or “El appoints”). AV and RV in 2 Esdr 4 36 for AV “Uriel.” He is here called the “archangel” who answers the question raised by the souls of the righteous dead. He is perhaps identical with Remiel of Apoc Bar or Remiel of Eti Enoch.

JEREMOH, jer-e-moth (עדרים, Jeremoth), and [בּדרים, Yeredim, ירמדוד], תּרמָדָה, yermadoth, meaning unknown). Of the following (1) has form (b), (5) form (c), the rest (a).

(1) In 1 Ch 7 8 (AV “Jeremoth”), and
(2) In 1 Ch 8 14, Benjamite. Cf Jeremia (2).
(3) In 1 Ch 13 23, and (4) in 1 Ch 25 22—“Jeremoth,” 24 30; heads of Levitical houses.

(5) A Naphtalite, one of David’s tribal princes (1 Ch 27 19); AV “Jerimoth.”

(6) (7) 8 Men who had married foreign wives. In Ezr 10 28 (=“Hieremoth,” 1 Esdr 9 27); ver 27 (av “Hieremoth,” 1 Esdr 9 29); and ver 29 (=“Hieremoth,” 1 Esdr 9 30); the Kt of the last is וָרְמָדָה, vuradoth, “and Ramoth”; so RVm, AV.

LITERATURE

In MSS BA the title is simply “An Epistle of Jeremy.” But in B, etc., there is a superscription introducing the letter: “Cord of a letter

1. Name Which Jeremiah sent to the captives about to be led to Babylon by [Pesh adds Nebuchadnezzar] the king of the Babylonians, to make known to them what had been commanded him by God.” What follows is a statistical exposition of the folly of idolatry, and not a letter. The idea of introducing this as a letter from Jeremiah was probably suggested by Jer 29 1 ff.

The early Gr Fathers regarded the whole favorably disposed toward this tract, reckoning it to be a part of the Canon. It is therefore included in the list of canonical books of Origen, Ephraem, Cyril of Alexandria, Athanasius, and was so authoritatively recognized by the Council of Laodicea (360 AD).

In most Gr MSS of the LXX (BA Codex, March, Chalc, in the Syr Hex.), it follows Lam as an independent piece, closing the supposed writings of Jeremiah. In the best-known of the known printed edd of the LXX (Tischendorf, Swete, etc.), the order is Jer, Bar, Lam, Ep. Jer. In Fritzsche, L. 6, and the AV and RV text, Ep. Jer stands before Bar. But in Lat MSS, including those of the Vulg. It is appended to Bar. of which it forms ch 30, though it really has nothing to do with it. In the more ancient rec., it is appended to Bar, with Protestant edd (BY, etc.) of the Apoc, a more intelligible arrangement, as Jer and Lam do not occur in the Apoc, and the Bib. Baruch was Jeremiah’s amanuensis.

In the so-called letter (see 1, above) the author shows the absurdity and wickedness of heathen worship. The Jews, for their sins, will be removed to Babylon, where they will remain 7 generations. In that land they will be tempted to worship the gods of the people. The writer’s aim is ostensibly to warn them beforehand by showing how helpless and useless the idols worshipped are, and how immoral as well as silly the rites of the Bab religion are. For similar polemics against idolatry, see Isa 44 9-19 (which in its earnestness resembles the Ep. Jer closely); Jer 10 3-9; Ps 115 4-8; 135 15-18; Wis 13 10-19; 15 13-17.

That the Ep. Jer was composed in Gr is the opinion of practically all scholars. There are no marks of translation; the Gr is on the whole good, and abounds in such rhetorical terms as characterized the Gr of Northern Egypt about the beginning of our era. There is no trace of a Heb original, though Origen has been mistakenly understood to say there was one in his day (see Schürer, GJV, III, 467 f.). Romanist writers defend a Heb original, and point to some Hebraisms (ver 44 and the use of the fut. for the past), but these can be matched in admittedly Hellenistic Gr writings.

The writer was almost certainly a resident in Alexandria toward the close of the last cent. BC. The title of the book, the references to Egypt religion (ver 19, where the Feast of Lights at Sais—Herod. ii.62— is Aim referred to), and the allusion to the Ep. Jer in 2 Mace 2 2, denied by Schürer, etc., make the above conclusion very probable. The author had in mind the dangers to the religion of his fellow-countrymen presented by the fascinating forms of idolatry existing at Alexandria. Certainly Jeremiah is not the author, for the book was written in Gr and never formed part of the Gr Canon. Besides, the treatment is far below the level of the genuine writings of that prophet.

JERIHON, je-rî-hô-nô (יִרְיחֹּם, yîrîḥ×ôm, "founded of Jeh"),: In 1 Ch 12 v; 24 v 23—"Jerijah" (יִרְיָ֫ה, yîrîyâh), 26 31, head of a Levitical house: called chief of the Hebronites in 24 23 (cf ver 30).

JERIBAI, je-rî-hâ (יִרְיָ֫י, yîrîyâ, mean uncertain): One of David's mighty men of the armies (1 Ch 11 46): one of the names not found in the list in 2 S 23 24-29a.

JERICHO, je-rî-kô (the word occurs in two forms).

In the Peut, in 2 K 5 5 and in Ezr, Neh, Ch it is written יֵרֵיחוֹ, yereẖô; יריחו, yereẖô, elsewhere: In 1 K 16 31 the final letter is h, instead of t, וּוּ. The termination וּוּ is thought to preserve the peculiarities of the old Can. dialect. In the LXX we have the indeclinable form, Ἰεριχώ, Iereẖô (Swete has the form Iereẖô as well), both with and without the fem. art.; in the NT Ἰεριχώ, Iereẖô, once with the fem. art. The Arabic is Ḥerâkh. According to Josh 3 12 20, the spot was opposite Neb, while in 34 3 it is called a city of palm trees. It was surrounded with a wall (Josh 2 15), and provided with a gate which was closed at night (2 5), and was ruled over by a king. When captured, vessels of brass and iron, large quantities of silver and gold, and "a goodly Babylonish garment" were found in it (7 21). It was on the western side of the Jordan, not far from the camp of Israel at Shittim, before crossing the river (2 1). The city was on the "plain" (4 13), but so close to "the mountain" on the W. (probably the cliffs of Quarantia, the traditional scene of Christ's temptation) that it was within easy reach of the spies, protected by Rahab. It was in the lot of Benjamin (18 21), the border of which ascended to the "slope [side] of J. on the N." (18 12). Authorities are generally agreed in locating the ancient city at Tel es-Sultân, a mile and a half N.W. of modern J. Here there is a mound 1,200 ft. long and 50 ft. in height supporting 4 smaller mounds, the highest of which is 90 ft. above the base of the main mound.

The geological situation (see Jordan valley) sheds great light upon the capture of the city by Joshua (Josh 6). If the city was built as we suppose it to have been, upon the unconsolidated sedimentary deposits which accumulated to a great depth in the Jordan valley during the enlargement of the Dead Sea, which took place in Pleistocene (or glacial) times, the sudden falling of the walls becomes easily credible to anyone who believes in the personality of God and in His ability to know the future or to direct at His will the secondary causes with which man has to deal in Nature. The narrative does not state that the blowing of the trumpets by the Israelites themselves effected the falling of the walls. It was simply said that at a specified juncture on the 7th day the city would fall, and that they actually fell at that juncture. The miracle may, therefore, be regarded as either that of prophecy, in which the Creator foretold to a people the course of things to Joshua, secured the function of Divine and human activities which constitutes a true miracle, or we may regard the event as a result of the strategic position which brought down the walls to be the result of direct Divine action, such as is asserted by man who believes in the unique interposition of God at a particular time and place. The phenomena are just such as occurred in the earthquake of San Francisco in 1906, where, according to the report of the scientific commission appointed by the state, "the most violent destruction of buildings was on the made ground. This ground seems to have behaved during the earthquake very much in the same way as jelly in a bowl, or as semi-liquid sand. The walls would fall, and the houses would tumble down, while at a considerable depth, the destruction was slight. The floor, "underwent a considerable depth by loose or slightly coherent geological formations."

20 miles from the rift, was the most severely shaken town in the state and suffered the greatest disaster relatively to its population and extent (Report, 13 and 16). Thus an earthquake, such as is easily provided for along the margin of this great Jordan dead sea plain, would produce exactly the phenomena here described, and its occurrence at the time and place foretold to Joshua constitutes it a miracle of the first magnitude.

Notwithstanding the curse pronounced in Josh 6 26 AV, prophesying that whosoever should rebuild the city "he shall lay the foundations thereof in his firstborn," it was rebuilt (1 K 16 34) by Hiel the Bethelite in the days of Ahab. The curse was literally fulfilled. Still David's successors are said to have "tarryed at Jericho" in his day (2 S 10 5; 1 Ch 19 5). In Elisha's time (2 K 2 5) there was a school of prophets there, while several other references to the city occur in the 6 books of the Apoc (2 Ch 23 t 15, where it is called "the city of the pines trees"; 2 K 25 5; Jer 35 5; Ezr 2 34; Neh 3 2; 7 36; 1 Macc 9 50). Jos describes it and the fertile plain surrounding it, in glowing terms. In the time of Christ, it was an important place yielding a large revenue to the royal family. But the city which Herod rebuilt was on a higher elevation, at the base of the western mountain, probably at Beth Jurb, where there are the ruins of a small fort. Jericho was the place of rendezvous for Galilean pilgrims desiring to avoid Samaria, both in coming and in departing from Jerus, and it has been visited at all times by thousands of pilgrims, who go down from Jerus to bathe in the Jordan. The road leading from Jerus to Jericho is still infested by robbers who hide in the rocky caverns adjoining it, and appear without warning from the tributary gorges of the wadies which dissect the mountain wall. At the present time Jericho and the region about is occupied only by a few hundred miserable inhabitants, deteriorated by the torrid climate which prevails at the low level about the head of the Dead Sea. But the present barrenness of the region is largely due to the destruction of the aqueducts which formerly distributed over the plain the waters brought down through the wadies which descend from the mountains of Judaea. The ruins of many of these are silent witnesses of the cause of its decay. Twelve aqueducts at various levels formerly branched from the Wady Kelt, irrigating the plain both N. and S. The remains of Roman mosaics are found in these. In the Middle Ages they were so repaired that an abundance and variety of crops were raised, including wheat, barley, millet, figs, grapes and sugar cane. See further Palestine (Recent Exploration). He is not mentioned (2 S 3 2-5; 1 Ch 3 1-3; 14 7) among the sons of David’s wives, so Curtis (Ch, 360) think of that he was either the son of a concubine, or possibly the name is a corruption of “Ithishem” (יִהַשְּרֶה), yithrah’am, 1 Ch 3 3).

(6) A Levite overseer in Hezekiah’s time (2 Ch 31 13).

JERIOH, jer-i-oth, jer-i-oth (יְרִיאֹת), [tent-]curtains: In 1 Ch 2 18, where MT is corrupt, Kittel in his comm. and in Bib. Heb reads “Caleb begat [children] of Azubah his wife, Jerioth.” Wellhausen (De Gent, et Fam. Jud., 33) reads, “Caleb begat [children] of Azubah his wife, the daughter of Jerioth.” According to EV, Caleb had two wives, but the context does not bear this out. J. Michaelis regarded J. as another name for Azubah. See Curtis, Comm. on Ch, 92.

JEROBOAM, jer-o-bo’âm (יְרֵיהוֹבָאָם), yithrah’äm: LXX Ἰηρόβαος, Hierobamos, usually assumed to have been derived from ירֹה and בָּא, and signifying “the people contend,” or “he pleads the people’s cause”. The name was borne by two kings of Israel.

(1) Jeroboam I, son of Nebat, an Ephraimite, and of Sheerah, a widow (1 K 11 26-40; 12 1-20). He was the first king of Israel after the disruption of the kingdom, and he reigned 22 years (937-915 BC). The history of J. is contained in 1 K 11 26-40; 12 1-40; 2 Ch 1 10 1-11 4; 11 14-16; 12 15; 13 3-20, and in an insertion in the LXX after 1 K 12 24 (o-r). This insertion covers about the same ground as the MT, and the LXX elsewhere, with some additions and variations. The fact that it calls J.’s mother a porath (harlot), and his wife the Egyptian princess Aserah (1 K 11 33), that J. was unfaithful by the death of his son before he has done any wrong; that the episode with the prophet’s mantle does not occur until the meeting at Shechem; that J. is not proclaimed king at all—all this proves the passage is misplaced. No doubt it is a fragment of some historical work, which, after the manner of the later Midr, has combined history and tradition, making rather free use of the historical kernel.

J., as a highly gifted and valorous young Ephraimite, comes to the notice of Solomon early in his reign (1 K 11 29; cf 15 24-25).

2. His Rise Having noticed his ability, the king and Revolt made him overseer of the fortifications and public work at Jerus, and placed him over the levies from the house of Joseph. The fact that the latter term for the whole of the ten tribes (cf Am 5 6; 6 6; Ob ver 18) indicates the importance of the position, which, however, he used to plot against the king. No doubt he had the support of the people in his designs. Prejudices of long standing (2 S 19 40 f; 20 f) were augmented when Israelish interests were made subservient to Judah and to the king, while enforced labor and burdensome taxation filled the people’s hearts with bitterness and jealousy. J. the son of a widow (16) did the first to feel the galling oppression and to give voice to the suffering of the people. In addition, he had the approval of the prophet Ahijah of the old sanctuary of Shiloh, who, by tearing his new mantle into twelve pieces and giving ten of them to J., informed him that he was to become king of the ten tribes. J. says (1 K 12 21-22) that J. was elevated by the words of the prophet, “and being a young man of warm temper, and ambitious of greatness, he could not be quiet,” but tried to get the government into his hands at once. For the time being, however, J. fled to Egypt where he was received and kindly treated by Shishak, the successor to the father-in-law of Solomon.

The genial and imposing personality of Solomon had been able to stem the tide of discontent excited by his oppressive regime, which at his death burst all restraints. Nevertheless, the northern tribes, at a popular assembly held at Shechem, solemnly promised to serve Rehoobam, the son of Solomon, who had already been proclaimed king at Jerus, on condition that he would lighten the burdens that so unjustly rested upon them. Instead of receiving the magna charta which they expected, the king, in a spirit of despotism, gave them a rough answer, and J. says “the people were struck by his words, as it were, by an iron hammer” (1 K 12 9). But despotism lost the day. The rough answer of the king was met by the Marseillaise of the people:...

...What portion have we in David? Neither have we inheritance in the son of Jesse: To your tents, O Israel: Now see to thine own house, David!” (1 K 12 16).

Seeing the turn affairs had taken, but still unwilling to make any concessions, Rehoobam sent Adoram, who had been over the levy for many years (1 K 4 5; 12 18), and who no doubt had quelled dissatisfaction before, to force the people to submission, possibly by the violent methods he had threatened to employ (1 K 12 14). But the attempt failed. The aged Adoram was stoned to death, while Rehoobam was obliged to flee ignominiously back to Jerus, king only of Judah (1 K 12 20). Thus the great work of David for a united kingdom was shattered by inferior, who put personal ambitions above great ideals.

As soon as J. heard that Solomon was dead, he returned from his forced exile in Egypt and took (of his residence in his native town, Zeredah, in the hill country of Ephrhem) the northern tribes, having rejected the house of David, now turned to the leader, and perhaps instigator of the revolution. Jeroboam was sent for and raised to the throne by the choice of the popular assembly. Divinely set apart for his task, and having the approval of the people, J. nevertheless failed to rise to the greatness of his opportunities, and his kingdom degenerated into a mere military monarchy, never stronger than the ruler who chanced to occupy the throne. In trying to avoid the Scylla that threatened its freedom and faith (1 K 11 33), the nation steered into the Charybdis of revolution and anarchy in which it finally perished.

Immediately upon his accession, J. fortified Shechem, the largest city in Central Israel, and made it his capital. Later he fortified

5. Political Events

(1) 1 K 14 17, Tirzah was the capital during the latter part of his reign. About J.’s external relations very little is known beyond the fact that there was war between him and Rehoobam constantly (1 K 14 30). In 2 Ch 12 2-20 we read of an ignominious alliance with Abijah of Judah. When Shishak invaded Judah (1 K 14 25 f), he did not spare Israel, as appears from his inscription on the temple at Karnak, where a list of the towns captured by him is given. These belong to Northern Israel as well as to Judah, showing that Shishak exacted tribute there, even if he used violence only in Judah. The fact that J. successfully managed a revolution but failed to establish a dynasty shows that his strength lay in the power of his personality more than in the soundness of his policy.

Despite the success of the revolution politically, J. dwelt in the卤o surrounding the temple and its ritual a danger which threatened the permanency of his kingdom. He justifiedly drew a warning in favor of the house of David, should the people make repeated religious pilgrimages to Jerusalem after the first passion of the rebellion had spent itself. He therefore resolved to establish national sanctuaries in Israel. Accordingly, he fixed on Bethel, which from time immemorial was one of the chief sanctuaries of the land (Gen 28:19; 35:1; Hos 12:4), and Dan, also a holy place since the conquest, as the chief centers of worship for Israel. J. now made "two calves of gold" as symbols of the strength and creative power of Jehu, and set them up in the sanctuaries at Bethel and Dan, where altars and other sacred objects already existed. It appears that many of the Hebrews went in the later period to Bethel to its image-worship (2 Ch 11:13 f). Accordingly, it found its necessity to institute a new, non-Levitical priesthood (1 K 13:33). A new and popular festival on the model of the feasts at Jerusalem was also established. J.'s policy might have been considered as a clever political move, had it not contained the dangerous appeal to the lower instincts of the masses, that led them into the immoralities of heathenism and hastened the destruction of the nation. J. sacrificed the higher interests of religion to politics. This was the "sin of Jeroboam the son of Nebat, wherewith he made Israel to sin" (1 K 12:30; 16:26).

It may be that many of the prophets sanctified J.'s religious policy. Whatever the attitude of the majority may have been, there was opposition to the image-worship. The prophetic movement in Jeroboam's day was by pure chance inaugurated at Bethel."A man of God out of Judah" appeared at Bethel and publicly denounced the import of his message was that the altar should be destroyed and the temple burned. The prophet warned the people to bring down the altar and the temple of David. The altar was saved from the wrath of the king only by a miracle. "The altar also was rent, and the ashes poured out from the altar." This narrative of 1 K 13 is usually considered to belong to a later time, but whatever the date of compilation, the general historicity of the account is little affected by it.

(2) The prophet Ahijah.—At a later date, when J. had realized his ambition, but not the ideal which the prophet had set before him, Ahijah predicted the consequences of his evil policy. J.'s eldest son had fallen sick. He thought of Ahijah, now old and blind, and sent the queen in disguise to learn the issue of the sickness. The prophet bade her to announce to J. that the house of J. should be extirpated root and branch; that the people whom he had seduced to idolatry should be uprooted from the land and transported beyond the river; and, severest of all, that her son should die. J. died in the 22d year of his reign, having "bequeathed to posterity the reputation of an apostate and a succession of endless revolutions."

S. K. MOSTMAN

(2) Jeroboam II (2 K 14:25-29), son of Joash and 13th king of Israel; 4th sovereign of the dynasty of Jehu. He reigned 41 years. His accession may be placed c 798 BC (some date lower).

J. came into power on the crest of the wave of prosperity that followed the crushing of the supremacy of Damascus by his great victory at Aphek, followed by others, Joash had regained the territory lost to Israel in the reigns of Jehu and Jehoaz (2 K 13:25). This satisfied Joash, or his death prevented further hostilities. J., however, then a young man, resolved on a war of retaliation against Damascus, and on further conquests. The condition of the eastern world favored his projects, for Assyria was at the time engaged, under Shalmaneser III and Assurban, in a life-and-death struggle with Armenia. Syria being weakened, J. determined on a bold attempt to conquer and annex the whole kingdom of which Damascus was the capital. The steps of the campaign by which this was accomplished are unknown to us. The result only is recorded, that not only the intermediate territory fell into J.'s hands, but that Damascus itself was captured (2 K 14:28). Hamath was taken, and thus were restored the eastern boundaries of the kingdom, as they were in the days of Solomon (1 K 10:28). The time of J. is marked by the prophecy of the prophet of the time of "the entrance of Hamath" (Josh 13:5), a narrow pass leading into the valley of the Lebanon's, had been the accepted northern boundary of the promised land. This involved the subjection of Moab and Ammon, probably already tributaries of Damascus.

J.'s long reign of over 40 years gave time for the collected tribute of this greatly increased territory to flow into the coffers of Samaria, and J. could have the exactions ruthlessly enforced. The prophet Amos, a contemporary of J., in his later years, dwells on the cruelties inflicted on the trans-Jordanic tribes by Hazael, who "threw the Gilead with threshing instruments of iron" (Am 1:3). All this would be remembered now, and wealth to which the Northern Kingdom had been accustomed flowed into its treasuries. The bowls of unburned brick in which the citizens had lived were replaced by "houses of ivory" (Am 5:11). The ivory house which Ahab built in Samaria (1 K 22:39; decorations only are meant) was imitated, and there were many "great houses" (Am 3:15). The sovereign had both a political and a religious policy, which with the growth of the palace a banquet scene within one of these palatial abodes is likeable in its portraiture. The guests stretched themselves upon the silken cushions of the couches, eating the flesh of lambs and stall-fed calves, drinking wine from huge bowls, singing idle songs to the sound of viols, themselves perfumed and anointed with oil (Am 6:4-6). Meanwhile, they were not grieved for the affliction of Joseph, and cared nothing for the wrong-doing of which the country was full. Side by side with this luxury, the poor of the land were in the utmost distress. A case in which a man was sold into slavery for the price of a pair of shoes seems to have come to the prophet's knowledge, and is twice referred to by him (Am 2:6; 8:6). With all this, and as part of the social organization, religion of a kind flourished. Ritual took the place of righteousness; and in a memorable passage, Amos denounces the substitution of the one for the other (Am 3:13). From the banqueting hall worship took place in the sanctuaries of the golden calves, where the votaries prostrated themselves before the altar clothed in garments taken in cruel pledge, and drank sacrificial wine bought with the money of those who were JERUZEALEM, je-roō'el, je-ro'ool (יהי), "founded by El"); Jahaziel prophesied that King Jehoshaphat should meet the hordes of Moabites and Ammonites, after they had come up by the "ascent of Ziz," "at the end of the valley [i.e. wady]", before the wilderness of Jeruel" (2 Ch 20:16). The particular part of the wilderness intended, is unknown. Cheyne (EB) thinks this may be an error for the Jezreel of Judah, mentioned in Josh 18:56, etc. See JEZEREEL.

have יִרְשָׁדּוּלִים, yərəshaləyim, a form which occurs on the Jewish coins of the Revolt and also in Jewish literature; it is commonly used by modern Talmudic Jews. The form was treated in the ending -əlim or -ayim is interpreted as some facing a dual, the one having the upper and lower Jerus, but such forms occur in other names as indicating special solemnity; such a pronunciation is both local and late.

In the LXX we have Ἱεροσολύμα (Ἱεροσολύμα), constantly used in the earliest and the common Hebrew pronunciation, the initial letter being probably unaspirated; soon, however, we meet with Ἱεροσολύμα (Ἱεροσολύμα)—with the aspirate—the common form in Jos. and Ἱεροσολύμα (Ἱεροσολύμα) elsewhere in Mac. (Books II-IV), and in Strabo. This last form has been carried over into the Lat writers, Cicer, Flinty, Tacitus and Suetonius. It was replaced in official use for some centuries by Hadrian’s Ἀκλία Κατολίνα, which occurs as late as Jerome, but it again comes into common use in the documents of the Crusades, while Solyma occurs at various periods as a poetic abbreviation.

In the NT we have Ἱεροσολύμα (Ἱεροσολύμα), particularly in the writings of St. Luke and St. Paul, Justin and Ῥά (Ἱεροσολύμα, Ῥά Χερουσαλήμ) elsewhere. The AV of 1611 has Jerusalem in the OT and Hierusalem in the NT. The form Jerusalem first occurs in Greek writings of the 12th cent.

With regard to the meaning of the original name there is no concurrence of opinion. The oldest known form, Uru-sa-li-mu, has been considered by many to mean either the “City of Peace” or the “City of [the] goblet” Salém, but other interpreters, considering the name as of Heb origin, interpret it as the “possess of peace” or “foundation of peace.” It is one of the ironies of history that a city which in all its long history has seen so little peace and for whose possession much of blood has been shed should have such a possible meaning for its name.

Other names for the city occur. For the name Jebus see Jere. In Is. 29 1, occurs the name בֵּית מֵלֶךְ, betel, probably “the hearth of God.” and in 1 26 the “city of righteousness.” In Ps. 72 16; Jer. 32 24 f; Ezek 7 23, we have the term הָרָה, hārā, “the city” in contrast to “the land.” A whole group of names is connected with the idea of the sanctity of the site: ἱρά καὶ ἱδανής, the “holy city” occurs in Isa. 48 2; 52 1; Neh 11 1, and yərəshaləyim ha-ḥādōšah, “Jerusalem the holy” is inscribed on Simon’s coins. In Mt. 4 5; 27 53 we have הֵרְאָה פֶּלֶת, hisaḥa pēlē, the “holy city,” and in Phil. Ἰεροσολύμα, Hieropolis, with the same meaning.

In Arab, the common name is بِئْطِلِمَة, bībatilma, “the holy house,” or el Maqādha, “the holy,” or the common name, used by the Moslems everywhere today, el Kuds, a shortened form of el Kūdāsh Shérif, “the holy sanctuary.”

Non-Moslems usually use the Arab form Yerusalem.

II. Geology, Climate and Springs.—The geology of the site and environs of Jerusalem is comparatively simple, when studied in connection with that of the land as a whole (see Geology of Palestine). The outstanding feature is that the rocks consist entirely of various forms of limestone, with strata containing flints; there are no primary rocks, no sandstone (such as comes to the surface on the E. of the Jordan) and no volcanic rocks. The limestone formations are in regular strata dipping toward the S.E., with an angle of about 10°.

On the high hills overlooking Jerus on the E., S.E., and S.W. there still remain strata of considerable thickness of those chalky limestones of the post-Tertiary period which crown so many hilltops of Pal, and once covered the whole land. On the "Mount of Olives," for example, occurs a layer of conglomerate limestone known as Nabi 'Omar "firestone," and another thicker deposit, known as Ka'alkul, of which two distinct strata can be distinguished. In these layers, esp. the latter, occur pockets containing marl or haur, and in both there are beds of flint.

Over the central city's site all this has been denuded long ages ago. Here we have three layers of limestone of varying density very distinctly distinguished by all the native builders and masons:

1. Mizzeh helu, lit. "sweet mizzeh," a hard, reddish-grey layer capable of polish, and reaching in places to a depth of 70 ft. or more. The "holy rock" in the temple-area belongs to this layer, and much of the ancient building stone was of this nature.

2. Below this is the Melekh or "royal" layer, which, though not very thick—35 ft. or so—has been of great importance in the history of the city. This rock is peculiar in that when first exposed to the air it is often so soft that it can be cut with a knife, but under the influence of the atmosphere it hardens to make a stone of considerable durability, useful for ordinary buildings. The great importance of this layer, however, lies in the fact that in it have been excavated the hundreds of caverns, cisterns, Oases and aqueducts which honeycomb the city's site.

3. Under the Melekh is a Cenomanian limestone of great durability, known as Mizzeh Yehudeh, or "Jewish mizzeh." It is a highly valued building stone, though hard to work. Geologically it is distinguished from Mizzeh helu by its containing ammonites. Characteristically it is a yellowish-grey stone, sometimes slightly reddish. A variety of a distinctly reddish appearance, known as Mizzeh ahmar, or "red mizzeh," is used as ornamental stone for columns, tombstones, etc; it takes a high polish and is sometimes locally known as "marble."

This deep layer, which underlies the whole city, comes to the surface in the Kidron valley; all the monumental sites of Jerus underlies it. It contains the Virgin's Fount. The water over the site and environs of Jerus percolates with ease the upper layer, but is conducted to the surface by this hard layer; the comparatively superficial source of the water of this spring accounts for the poorness of its quality.

The broad features of the climate of Jerus have probably remained the same throughout history, although there is plenty of evidence that there have been cycles of greater and lesser abundance of rain. The almost countless cisterns belonging to all ages upon the site and the long and complicated conduits for bringing water from a distance, testify that over the greater part of history the rainfall must have been, as at present, only seasonal.

As a whole, the climate of Jerus may be considered healthy. The common diseases should be largely preventable—under all civilized conditions. The great menace, even in the malaria which so prevalent is to a large extent an importation from the low-lying country, and could be stopped at once, were sufficient means taken for destroying the carriers of infection, the abundant Anopheles mosquitoes. On account of its altitude and its exposed position, almost upon the watershed, wind, rain and cold are all more excessive than in the maritime plains or the Jordan valley. Although the winter's cold is severely felt, on account of its coldness with the days of heaviest rainfall (of Ez 10 9), and also because of the dwellings and clothes of the inhabitants being suited for enduring heat more than cold, the actual lowest cold recorded is only 25°, and frost occurs only on perhaps a dozen nights in an average year.

During the rainless summer months the mean temperature rises steadily until August, when it reaches 73.6°, but the days of greatest heat, with temperature over 100°, in the shade at times, occur commonly in September. In midsummer the cool northwest breezes, which generally blow during the afternoons and early night, do much to make life healthy. The most unpleasant days occur in May and from the middle of September until the end of October, when the dry southeast winds—the sirocco—blow hot and stifling from over the deserts, carrying with them at times fine dust sufficient in quantity to produce a marked haze in the atmosphere. At such times all vegetation droops, and most human beings, esp. residents not brought up under such conditions, suffer less from depression and physical discomfort; malarial, "sandfly," and other fevers are apt to be peculiarly prevalent. "At that time shall it be said . . . to Jerus, A hot wind from the bare heights in the wilderness toward the daughter of my people, not to winnow, nor to cleanse" (Jer 4 11).

During the late summer—except at spells of sirocco—heavy "dews" occur at night, and at the end of September or beginning of October "former" rains fall—not uncommonly in tropical downpours accompanied by thunder. After this there is frequently a dry spell of several weeks, and then the winter's rain falls in December, January and February. In some seasons an abundant rainfall in March gives peculiar satisfaction to the inhabitants by filling up the cisterns late in the season and by producing an abundant harvest. The average rainfall is about 20 in., the maximum recorded in the city being 42.56 in. in the position of the site, and the minimum being 12.5 in. in 1896–97. An abundant rainfall is not only important for storage, for replenishment of the springs and for the crops, but as the city's sewage largely accumulates in the very primitive drains, it requires a considerable force of water to remove it. Snow falls heavily in some seasons, causing considerable destruction to the badly built roofs and to the trees; in the winter of 1910–11 a fall of 9 in. occurred.

There is only one actual spring in the Jerus area, and even to this some authorities would deny the name of true spring on account of the comparatively shallow source of its origin; this is the inner spring, called by the Europeans Christian 'Ain Satti Miriam (the "spring of the Lady Mary"), and by the Muslims generally called "The Virgin's Fount." All the archaeological evidence points to this as the original source of attraction of earliest occupants of the site; in the OT this spring is known as Girih (q.v.). The water rises in the actual bottom, though apparently west side, of the Kidron valley some 300 yds. due S.W. from the city. The approach to the spring is down two flights of steps, an upper of 16 leading to a small-level platform, covered by a modern arch, and a lower, narrower flight of 14 steps, which ends at the mouth of a small cave. The water has its source in long a cleft (perhaps 16 ft. long) running E. and
W. in the rocky bed of the Kidron valley, now many feet below the present surface. The western or higher end of the channel at the entry entrance of the cave, but most of the water rushes forth from the lower and wider part which lies underneath the steps. When the water is scanty, the women of Siloam creep down into the cavity under the steps and fill their water-skins there; at such times no water at all finds its way into the cave. At the far end of the cave is the opening of that system of ancient tunnel-aqueducts which is described in VI, below. This spring is "intermittent," the water rising rapidly and gushing forth with considerable force several times in the rainy season, and only once or twice in the dry. This "intermittent" condition of springs is not uncommon in Pal, and is explained by the accumulation of the underground water in certain cavities or cracks in the rock, which together make up a reservoir which empties itself by syphon action. Where the accumulated water reaches the bend of the syphon, the overflow commences and continues to run until the reservoir is emptied. Such a phenomenon is naturally attributed to an underground agency by the ignorant—in this case, among the modern fellahin, to a dragon—and natives, specially Jews, visit the source, even today, at times of its overflow, for healing. Whether this intermittent condition of the fountain is, in ancient times, it is not possible to say, but, as Jerome (Comm. in Esa. 86) speaks of it, it was probably present in NT times, and if so we have a strong argument for finding here the "Pool of Bethesda." See BERSEBAY.

In ancient times all the water flowed down the open, rocky valley, but at an early period a wall was constructed to bank up the water and convert the source into a pool. Without such an arrangement no one could find its way into the cave and the tunnels. The tunnels, described below (VI), were constructed for the purpose (1) of reaching the water source from within the city walls, and (2) of preventing the enemies of the Jews from getting at the water through the spring (2 Chron. 24). The water of this source, though used for all purposes by the people of Siloam, is brackish to the taste, and contains a considerable percentage of sewage; it is quite unfit for drinking. This condition is doubtless due to the waste distribution of sewage, both intentionally (for irrigation of the gardens, for example) and unintentionally (through seepage, etc.), over the soil. The water then flows into the rocks from which the water flows. In earlier times the water was certainly purer, and it is probable, too, that the fountain was more copious, as new hundreds of cisterns imprison the waters which once found their way through the soil to the deep sources of the spring.

The waters of the Virgin’s Fount find their way through the Siloam tunnel and out at Ain Silaôn (the "spring" of Siloam), into the Pool of Siloam, and from this source descend into the Kidron valley to water the numerous vegetable gardens belonging to the village of Siloam (see SILOAM).

The second source of water in Jerusalem is the deep well known as Btr Egêb, "Job’s well," which is situated a little below the point where the Kidron valley and Hinnom meet. In all probability it derives its modern name from a legend in the Korân (Sura 36.60–41) which narrates that God commanded Abraham to erect a wall around the spring miraculously burst up. The well, which had been quite lost sight of, was rediscovered by the Crusaders in 1184 A.D., and was then cleaned out. It is 125 ft. deep. The supply of water in this well is quite measurable, although there is no better of that of the "Virgin’s Fount"; after several days of heavy rain the water overflows underground and bursts out a few yards lower down the valley as a little stream. It continues to run for a few days after a heavy fall of rain is over, and, in those latter days, is a district of attraction to the native residents of Jerusalem, who pour forth from the city to enjoy the rare sight of running water. Somewhere in the neighborhood of Btr Egêb must have lain 'En-Rogel, but if that were once an actual spring, its source is now buried under the great mound of rubbish accumulated here (see EN-ROGEL).

Nearly 600 yds. S. of Btr Egêb lies a small gravelly basin where, when the Btr Egêb overflows, a small spring called An el Lezath (the "spring of the almond") bursts forth. It is not a true spring, but is due to some of the water of Job’s well which finds its way along an ancient rock-cut aqueduct on the west side of the Wady en Når, bursting up here.

The only other possible site of a spring in the Jerusalem area is the Hamman esh Shefed, "the bath of healing." This is an underground rock-basin in the Tyropeon valley, within the city walls, in which water collects by percolation through the debris of the city. Though once a reservoir with probably rock-cut channels conducting water to it, it is now a deep well with arches erected over it at various periods, as the rubbish of the city gradually accumulated through the centuries. There is no evidence whatever of there being any natural fountain, and the water is used only as sewage, though used in a neighboring Turkish bath.

G. A. Smith thinks that the Jackal’s Well (q.v.) mentioned by Nehemiah (3, 13), which must have been situated in the Wady of Arnon, may possibly have had a temporary spring arising there for a few years in consequence of an earthquake, but it is extremely likely that any well sunk then would tap water flowing along the bed of the valley. There is no "spring," "pool," or "well" there today.

III. The Natural Site.—Modern Jerusalem occupies a situation defined geographically as 31°46’45’’ N. lat., by 35°13’25’’ E. long. It lies in the midst of a bare and rocky plateau, the environs being one of the most stony districts in the shipping parts of Pal, with shallow, grey or reddish soil and many outcrops of bare limestone. Like all the hills slopes with a southeasterly aspect, it is so thoroughly exposed to the full blaze of the summer sun that in its natural condition the site would have to be considerably watered, a result of diligent cultivation and frequent watering, a considerable growth of trees and shrubs has been produced in the rapidly extending suburbs. The only fruit tree which reaches perfection around Jerusalem is the olive.

The site of Jerusalem is shut in by a rough triangle of higher mountain ridges: to the W. runs the main ridge, or water parting, of Judaea, which here makes a sweep to the westward, from this ridge a spur runs S.E. and E., culminating due E. of the city in the Mount of Olives (q.v.), nearly 2,700 ft. above sea-level and about 300 ft. above the mean level of the ancient city. Another spur, known as Jebel Dib al Tur, 2,560 ft. high, runs E. from the plateau of el Buke’a and lies S.W. of the city; it is the traditional "Hill of Evil Counsel." The city site is thus dominated on all sides by these higher ranges: the mountains [that are round about] are: (1) Ps. 128.5, where Ps. 128.5, where on the one hand the ancient city was hidden, at any considerable distance, from any direction except the S.E., it is only through this open gap toward the desert and the mountains of Moab that any wide sweep of horizon is possible; (2) the wide nearness and distant mountain wall—often of exquisite loveliness in the light of the setting sun—must all through the ages have been the most familiar and the
The most potent of scenic influences to the inhabitants of Jerusalem. Within the enfolding hills the city’s proper site is demarcated by two main valleys. That on the W. and S.W. commences in a hollow occupied by the Moslem cemetery around the pool Birket Mamilla. The valley runs due E. toward the modern Jaffa Gate, and there bends S., being known in this upper part of its course as the Wady el-Mab. In this southern course it is traversed by a great dam, along which the modern Bethlehem road runs, which converts a large area of the valley bed into a great pool, the Birket es-Sulûm. Below this the valley—under the name of Wady er-Râbûbi—bends E.S.E., then E., and finally S.E. again, until near Bîr Egyûth it joins the western valley to form the Wady en-Nâr, 670 ft. below its origin. This valley has been very generally identified as the Valley of Hinnom (see HINNOM).

2. The Valleys

The eastern valley takes a wider sweep. Commencing high up in the plateau to the N. of the city, near the great water-parting, it descends as a wide and open valley in a southerly direction until, where it is crossed by the Great North Road, being here known as Wady el-Jâs (the “Valley of the Walnuts”), it turns more directly E. It gradually curves to the S., and as it runs E. of the city walls, it receives the name of Wady Sûtî Miriam (the “Valley of the Lady Mary”). Below the S.E. corner of the temple-area, near the traditional “Tomb of Absalom,” the valley rapidly deepens and takes a direction slightly to the W. of S. It passes the “Virgin’s Point,” and a quarter of a mile lower it is joined by el Wâd from the N., and a little farther on by the Wady er Râbûbî from the W. South of Bîr Egyûth, the valley formed by their union is continued under the name of Wady en Nâr to the Dead Sea. This western valley is that commonly known as the Brook Kidron, or, more shortly, the “Brook” (wâlûb), as it is run by Moslems, but named from the 5th cent. onward by Christians the Valley of Jehoshaphat (q.v.). The rocky tongue of land inclosed between these deep ravines, an area, roughly speaking, a little over one mile long by half a mile wide, is further subdivided into a number of distinct hills by some shallower valleys. The most prominent of these—indeed the only one noticeable to the superficial observer today—is the great central valley known to modern times by the single name el Wâd, “the valley.” Upon this slight depression of the ground a little N. of the modern “Damascus Gate,” and after entering the city at this gate it rapidly deepens—a fact largely disguised today by the great accumulation of rubbish in its course. It traverses the city with the Haram to its east, and the Christian and Moslem quarters on rapidly rising ground to its west. Its course is observed near the Bâb es-Sûlûm, where it is crossed by an ancient causeway, but farther W. in the valley Eyyûb, narrowing the valley of S. Haram (near the “wailing place” and “Robinson’s arch”) on the E., and steep cliffs crossed by houses of the Jewish quarter on the W. It leaves the city at the “Dung Gate,” and passes with an open curve to the E., until it reaches the Pool of Siloam, below which it merges in the Wady Sûtî Miriam. This is the course of the main valley, but a branch of great importance in the ancient topography of the city starts some 50 yds. to the W. of the modern Jaffa Gate and runs down the eastern part generally known to travelers as “David’s Street,” and thus easterly, along the Tartâ bâb es-Sûlûm, until it merges in the main valley. The main valley is usually considered to be the Tyropocon, or “Cheesemongers’ Valley” of Jos., but modern writers have attempted to confine the name esp. to this western arm of it.

Another interior valley, which is known rather by the rock contours, than by surface observations, being largely filled up today, cuts diagonally across the N.E. corner of the modern city. It has no modern name, though it is sometimes called “St. Anne’s Valley.” It rises in the plateau near “Herod’s Gate,” known as es Sahra, and entering the city about 100 yds. to the E. of that gate, runs S.S.E., and leaves the city between the N.E. angle of the Haram and the Golden Gate, joining the Kidron valley farther S.E. The Birket Israeli runs across the width of this valley, which had far more influence in determining the ancient topography of the city than has been popularly recognized. There is an artificially made valley between the Haram and the buildings to its north, and there is thought by many to be a valley between the S.E. hill, commonly called “Ophéa” and the temple. Such, then, are the valleys, great and small, by which the historic hills on which the city stood are defined. All of them, particularly in their southern parts, were considerably deeper in ancient times, and in places the accumulated debris is 80 ft. or more. All of them were originally torrent beds, dry except immediately after heavy rain. The only perennial outflow of water is the scanty and intermittent stream which overflows from the Pool of Siloam, and is used to irrigate the gardens in the Wady Sûtî Miriam.

The E. and W. valleys isolate a roughly quadrilateral tongue of land running from N.W.W. to S.S.E., and tilted so as to face S.E. Here Jerusalem, S.S.W., and S.W., and E. of them, ran, with the Haram, and the commencement of the Kidron valley to the E. Within the city walls it rises as high as 2,561 ft. near the northwestern corner. It is divided by the west branch of the Tyropocon valley into two parts: a northern part—the western hill—on which is situated today the Church of the Holy Sepulchre and the greater part of the “Christian quarter” of the city, and a southern hill—the southwestern—which is connected with the northwestern hill by but a narrow saddle—50 yds. wide—calls the Jaffa Gate. This hill sustains the so-called "Tower of David," the baracks and the Armenian quarter within the walls, and the Conoculum and adjacent buildings outside the walls. This hill is from 2,500 to 2,350 ft. high along its summit, but drops rapidly on its southwestern, southern and southeastern sides. In its central part it falls much more gently toward the eastern hill across the now largely filled valley el Wadi.

The eastern ridge may be reckoned as beginning at the rocky hill el Edhemiyeh—popularly known as Gordon's Calvary—but the wide trench made here by quarrying somewhat obscures this fact. The ridge may for convenience be regarded as presenting the same trends as the central or central-eastern, and southeastern summits. The northeastern hill within the modern wall supports the Moslem quarter, and rises in places to a height of over 2,500 ft.; it narrows to a mere neck near the "Tecer Homo" arch, where it is joined to the baracks, on the site of the ancient Antonia. Under the present surface it is here separated from the temple summit by a deep rocky trench.

The central, or central-eastern, summit is that of Sakhra, the sacred temple rock, which is 2,404 ft. high. This is the highest point from which the ground rapidly falls E., W., and S., but the natural contours of the adjacent ground are much obscured by the great substructures which have been made to sustain the temple platform.

The sloping, southeastern, hill, S. of the templearea appears today, at any rate, to have a steady fall of from 2,350 ft. just S. of the Haram southern wall to a little over 2,100 ft. near the Pool of Siloam. It is a narrow neck of 150 yds., but its chief feature, its natural strength, is today greatly obscured on account of the rubbish which slopes down its sides and largely fills up its surrounding valleys. In earlier times, at least three of its sides were protected by deep valleys, and probably on quite two-thirds of its entire surface by natural rocky scars. According to Professor Guthe, this hill is divided from the higher ground to the N. by a depression 12 ft. deep and 50–50 yds. wide, but this has not been confirmed by other observers. The city covering so hilly a site as this must ever have consisted, as it does today, of houses terraced on steep slopes with stairways for streets.

IV. General Topography of Jerusalem.—From the foregoing descript. of the "natural site," it will be seen that we have to deal with 5 natural subdivisions or hills, two on the western and three on the eastern ridges.

In discussing the topography it is useful to commence with the description of the summit, where we give to these 6 areas the same common in his day (BJ, V, iv, 1, 2). He says: "The city was built upon two hills Josephus which are opposite to one another and have a valley to divide them asunder. . . . Now the Valley of the Cheesemongers, as it was called, and was that which distinguished the hill of the upper city from that of the lower, extended as far as Siloam" (ib, V, iv, 1). Here we get the first prominent physical feature, the bissection of the city into two main hills. Further on, however, in the same passage—one, it must be admitted, of some obscurity—Jos distinguishes 5 distinct regions:

1. The Upper City or Upper Market Place: (The hill) which sustains the upper city is much higher and in length more direct. Accordingly, it was called the citadel (σπαρών, phoritron) of King David. . . . but it is us called the Upper Market Place." This is without dispute the southwestern hill.

2. Akra and Lower City: "The other hill, which was called Akra, and sustains the lower city, is double-curved" (αψιδαι, amphi kurtos). The description can apply only to the semicircular shape of the southeastern hill, as viewed from the "upper city." These names, "Akra" and "Lower City," are, with reservations, therefore, to be applied to the southeastern hill.

3. The Temple Hill: Josephus' description here is curious, on account of its indefiniteness, but there can be no question as to which hill he intends. He writes: "Over against this is a third hill, but naturally lower than the Akra and parted formerly from the other by a flat valley. However, in those times when the Hasmonaean reigned, they did away with this valley, wishing to connect the city with the temple: and cutting down the summit of the Akra, they made it lower, so that the temple might be visible over it." Comparison with other passages shows that this "third hill" is the central-eastern— the Temple Hill.

4. Betzhetha: "It was Agrippa who encompassed the parts added to the old city with this wall (i.e. the third wall) which had been all naked before; for as the city grew more populous, it gradually crept beyond its old limits, and those parts of it that stood northward of the Temple, and seemed a hill to the city, made it considerably larger, and occasioned that hill which is in number the fourth, and is called 'Bezetha,' to be inhabited also. It lies over against the tower Antonia, but is divided from it by a deep valley, which was dug on purpose. This new-built part of the city was called 'Bezetha' in our language, which, if interpreted in the Gr. language, may be called the 'New City.'"

5. The Northern Quarter of the City: From the account of the walls given by Jos, it is evident that the northern part of his "first wall" ran along the northern edge of the southwestern hill; the second wall inclosed the inhabited part of the northwestern hill. This wall or rampart took its beginning from the gate which they called Gennath in the first wall, and inclosing the northern quarter only reached to the Antonia. This area is not described as a separate hill, as the inhabited area, except on the S., was defined by natural valleys, and besides covering the northwestern hill, must have extended into the Tyropeon valley. Here then we have Josephus' names for these five districts: (1) "the two mountains Hill, or "Upper City" and "Upper Market Place"; also the 2. Summary Phoritron, or "fortress of David." Of Names From the 4th cent. AD, this hill has. Of the Five also been known as "Zion," and on it Hills Jos, the so-called "Tower of David," built on the foundations of two of Herod's great towers.

2. Summary Phoritron, or "fortress of David." Of Names From the 4th cent. AD, this hill has. Of the Five also been known as "Zion," and on it Hills Jos, the so-called "Tower of David," built on the foundations of two of Herod's great towers.

6. The Northern Hill: "Bezetha" or "New City," even now somewhat sparsely inhabited area, has no name in Bib. literature.

3. The Northern Quarter of the City: From the account of the walls given by Jos, it is evident that the northern part of his "first wall" ran along the northern edge of the southwestern hill; the second wall inclosed the inhabited part of the northwestern hill. This wall or rampart took its beginning from the gate which they called Gennath in the first wall, and inclosing the northern quarter only reached to the Antonia. This area is not described as a separate hill, as the inhabited area, except on the S., was defined by natural valleys, and besides covering the northwestern hill, must have extended into the Tyropeon valley. Here then we have Josephus' names for these five districts: (1) "the two mountains Hill, or "Upper City" and "Upper Market Place"; also the 2. Summary Phoritron, or "fortress of David." Of Names From the 4th cent. AD, this hill has. Of the Five also been known as "Zion," and on it Hills Jos, the so-called "Tower of David," built on the foundations of two of Herod's great towers.

5. Northeastern Hill: "Bezetha" or "New City," even now somewhat sparsely inhabited area, has no name in Bib. literature.

4. Central-eastern Hill: The "third hill" of Jos, clearly the site of the Temple which, as Jos says (BJ, V, v), "was built upon a strong hill." In earlier times it was the “threshing-floor of Araunah the Jebusite.” On the question whether it has any claims to be the Moriah of Gen 22:2, as it is called in 1 Ch. 16:39, see MORIATH. The temple hill is also in many of the Heb writings called ZION, on which point see ZION.

(5) Southeastern Hill: This Jos calls “Akra” and “Lower City,” but while on the one hand these names require some elucidation, there are other names which have at one period or another come to be applied to this hill, viz. “City of David,” “ZION” and “Ophel.” These names for this hill we shall now deal with in order.

In spite of the very definite description of Jos, there has been considerable difference of opinion regarding the situation of the “Akra.”

3. The Akra

Various parts of the northwestern, the northeastern, the southeastern hills, and even the central-eastern itself, have been suggested by earlier authorities, but instead of considering the various arguments, now largely out of date, for other proposed sites, it will be better to deal with the positive arguments for the southeastern hill. Jos states that in his day the term “Akra” was applied to the southeastern hill, but in references to the earlier history it is clear that the Akra was not a whole hill, but a definite fortress (ἀκρα, ἀκρων = “fortress”).

(1) It was situated on the site, or on part of the site, which was considered in the days of the Maccabees to have been the “City of David.” Antiochus Epiphanes (168 BC), after destroying Jerus., fortified the city of David with a great and strong wall, with strong towers and it became unto them an Akra (1 Mac 3:33-36). The formidable fortress—known henceforth as the “Akra”—became a constant menace to the Jews, until at length, in 142 BC, it was captured by Simon, who not only razed the whole fortress, but, according to Jos (Ant, XIII, vi, 7; BJ, V, iv, 1), actually cut down the hill on which it stood. He says that “they all, labouring zealously, demolished the hill, and ceasing not from the work night and day for three whole years, brought it to a level and even slope, so that the Temple became the highest of all after the Akra and the hill upon which it was built had been removed” (Ant, XIII, vi, 7). The fact that at the time of Jos this hill was evidently lower than the temple hill is in itself sufficient argument against an Akra which would place the Temple on the northwestern or southeastern hills. (2) The Akra was close to the temple (1 Mac 13:52), and from its walls the garrison could actually overlook it (1 Mac 14:36). Before the hill was cut down it obscured the temple site (6b). (3) It is identified by Jos as forming part, at least, of the lower city, which (see below) bordered upon the temple (cf BJ, I, i, 4; V, iv, 1; vi, 1). (4) The LXX identifies the Akra with Millo (2 S 5:9; 1 K 9 13-24; 2 Ch 32:5).

Allowing that the original Akra of the Syrians was on the southeastern hill, it is still a matter of some difficulty to determine whereabouts it stood, e.g., as if the statements of Jos are correct, the natural configuration of the ground has been greatly altered. The most prominent point upon the southeastern hill, in the neighborhood of Gihon, appears to have been occupied by the Jebusite fortress of Zion (q.v.), but the site of the Akra can hardly be identical with this, for this became the “City of David” and here were the venerated tombs of David and the Judean kings, which must have been destroyed if this hill was, as Jos states, cut down. On this and other grounds we must look for a site farther north. Sir Charles Watson (PEPS, 1906, 1907) has produced strong topographical and literary arguments for placing it where the al Aksa mosque is today; other writers are more inclined to put it farther south, somewhere in the neighborhood of the massive tower discovered by Warde on the “threshing-floor.” If the account of Jos, written two centuries after the events, is to be taken as literal, then Watson’s view is the more probable. Jos, as we have seen, identified the Akra of his day with the Lower City. This latter is not a name occurring in the Bible, as will be shown, the OT name for Lower City this part was “City of David.” That by Lower City Jos means the southeastern hill is shown by many facts. It is actually the lowest part of the city, as compared with the “Upper City,” Temple Hill and the Bezetha; it is, as Jos describes, separated from the Upper City by a deep valley—the Tyropoön; this southeastern hill is “double-curved,” as Jos describes, and lastly several passages in his writings show that the Lower City was associated with the Temple on the one end and the Pool of Siloam at the other (cf Ant, XIV, xvi, 2; BJ, II, xvii, 5; IV, ix, 12; VI, vi, 3; vii, 2).

In the wider sense the “Lower City” must have included, not only the section of the city covering the southeastern hill up to the ridge, but parts of other hills, where were the palaces (BJ, V, vi, 1; VI, vi, 3), and the homes of the well-to-do, but also that in the valley of the Tyropoön from Siloam up to the Council House, which was near the northern “first wall” (cf BJ, V, iv, 2), a part doubtless inhabited by the poorest.

It is clear (2 S 5:7; 1 Ch 11:5) that the citadel “Zion” of the Jebusites became the “City of David,” or as G. A. Smith calls it, “David’s hill,” after it was reoccupied by David and his people. The arguments for placing Zion “ZION” on the southeastern hill are given elsewhere (see ZION), but a few acts relevant esp. to the “City of David” may be mentioned here: the capture of the Jebusite city by means of the gutter (2 S 5:8), which is most reasonably explained as “Warren’s Shaft!” (VII); the references to David’s halt on his flight (2 S 15:23), and his sending Solomon to Gihon to be crowned (1 K 1:33), and the common expression “up,” used in describing the transference of the Ark from the City of David to the Temple Hill (1 K 8:1; 2 Ch 5:2; cf 1 K 9:24), are all consistent with this view. More convincing are the references to Hezekiah’s aqueduct which brought the water “on the west side of the city of David” (2 Ch 32:30); the mention of the City of David as adjacent to the Pool of Shelah (or Siloam; cf Is 8:6), and the “king’s garden” in Neh 3:15, and the position of the Fountain Gate in this passage and Neh 12:37; and the statement that Manasseb built “an outer wall to the City of David, on the west side of Gihon” in the nahal, i.e. the Kidron valley (2 Ch 33:14).

The name appears to have had a wider significance as the city grew. Originally “City of David” was only the name of the Jebusite fort, but later it became equivalent to the whole southeastern hill. In the same way, Akra was originally the name of the Syrian fort, but the name became extended to the whole southeastern hill. Jos speaks of the “City of David” and “Akra” as synonymous, and applies to both the name “Lower City.” For the names Ophel and Opheles see OPHEL.

V. Excavations and Antiquities.—During the last hundred years excursions to Jerusalem have been made by a large number of engineers and archaeologists and have furnished an enormous mass of observations for the understanding of the condition of ancient Jerusalem. Some of the most important are as follows:

In 1883 Meiser, Bonomi, Catherwood and Arundale made a first thorough survey of the Haram (temple-area), a work which was the foundation of all subsequent maps for over a hundred years.

In 1838, and again in 1839, the famous American traveler and writer Dr. E. L. Wilson, published an account of his explorations in southern Palestine. In 1846-48 he was employed by Lieutenant-Colonel A. W. B. Durand, of the Ordnance Survey Department of Great Britain, to superintend the survey of Jerusalem, with a view to furnishing the city with a satisfactory water-supply, and to provide for the safety of the sanctuary.

In 1877-78 Captain (later Lieutenant-General Sir) Charles Warren, R.E., carried out a series of most exciting and original excavations all over the south of the Holy Land, and of Tentative excavations and observations in the same area. In 1876 he was employed by the British Ordnance Survey of Great Britain, and of the Holy Land.

In 1882 the Palestine Exploration Fund was constituted, for the purpose of investigating the topography of the land, and natural history of the Holy Land.

In 1885 Mr. Harry Maudslay, taking advantage of the occasion of the rebuilding of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre, made a careful examination of the remarkable rock cuttings which are now incorporated in the buildings, and made considerable excavations, the results being described in the April (1886) number of ZDPV. In 1881 Professor Guthe made a series of important observations on the topography of Jerusalem, and his results are published in ZDPV, 1883.

M. Clermont-Ganneau, who was resident in Jerusalem in the French consular service, made many, from 1886 onward, a large number of excavations and observations on the archaeology of Jerusalem, and of the surrounding countryside, the results of which were published by the PEF. Another name honored in connection with the careful study of the topography of Jerusalem is that of Rev. S. J. Morse, the late American consul at Jerusalem.

In 1897-98 the Palestine Exploration Fund conducted an elaborate series of excavations with a view to determining the position of the ancient southern walls under the direction of Mr. Budge. The records of the work of these excavations are published in ZDPV, and the results of the work are now embodied in a topographical map of the city.

Bliss and Dickie, the authors of the Archæology of Jerusalem, have published a number of other works on the subject, including a monograph on the ancient walls of the city, and a number of smaller works on various aspects of the archaeology of Jerusalem.

Following upon these excavations a number of private investigations have been made by the Augustinians in Jerusalem, and a number of excavations in the neighborhood of the city have been carried on by the PEF, and the results of these investigations have been published in ZDPV.

In 1899-1901 a party of Englishmen, under Captain the Hon. Maj. R. M. Bowley, made a number of explorations with very elaborate tunnels upon the hill of Ophel, immediately above the Virgin's Tomb. In the course of their work, they cleared out the whole of Siloam; they opened up some new passages, they reconstructed the Siloam Pool, and discovered a number of ancient tombs, one of which was the tomb of the Virgin Mary, and another of which was the tomb of the Virgin's Brother, St. James the Less, which was discovered in 1899.

tremites of the southern wall, thus determined by the temple-platform and legionary camp, respectively, was probably that area followed by the southern wall of Herod's city Aelia.

Of the 8 existing city gates, on the west side there is but one, Bāb el Khadd (the "Gate of Hebron"), commonly known to travelers as the Jaffa Gate. It is probably the site of several earlier gates. On the N. there are 3 gates, Bāb Abūl Ḥamīd (named after the sultan who made it) or the "New Gate"; Bāb el ʿAmād ("Gate of the Columns"), now commonly called the "Damascus Gate"; but more ancienly known as "St. Stephen's Gate," and clearly, from the existing remains, the site of an earlier gateway; and, still farther east, the Bāb es Sābīrah ("Gate of the Plain"), or "Herod's Gate.

3. The Existing Gates are 3 gates, Bāb Abūl Ḥamīd (named after the sultan who made it) or the "New Gate"; Bāb el ʿAmād ("Gate of the Columns"), now commonly called the "Damascus Gate"; but more ancienly known as "St. Stephen's Gate," and clearly, from the existing remains, the site of an earlier gateway; and, still farther east, the Bāb es Sābīrah ("Gate of the Plain"), or "Herod's Gate.

On the east side the only open gate is the Bāb el ʿAtib ("Gate of the Tribes"), commonly called by native Christians, Bāb Sītū Mirīm ("Gate of the Lady Mary"), but in European guide-books called "St. Stephen's Gate." A little farther S., near the northeastern corner of the Haram is the great walled-up Byzantine Gate, known as Bāb ed ʿDahīrīyeh ("Gate of the Conqueror"), but to Europeans as the "Golden Gate." This structure has been variously ascribed to Justinian and Herachus, but there are massive blocks which belong to a much earlier structure, and early Christian tradition places the "Beautiful Gate" of the Temple here. In the southern wall are two city gates; one, insignificant and mean, occupies the center of el Wād and is known as Bāb el Mughāribeh ("Gate of the Moor"), and to Europeans as the "Dung Gate"; the other, which is on the crown of the western hill, traditional Zion, is the important Bāb Nebī Daouud ("Gate of the Prophet David"), or the "Zion Gate."

All three gates assumed their present form at the time of the reconstruction of the walls by Suleiman the Magnificent, but the more important ones occupy the sites of earlier gates. Their names have varied very much even since the times of the Crusaders. The multiplicity of names for these various gates—they all have two or three today—and their frequent changes are worth noticing in connection with the fact that in the OT history some of the gates appear to have had two or more names.

the Heb history of the city. The sanctity of the Holy Sepulchre has caused the city life to center itself more and more around that sanctuary, thereby greatly confusing the ancient topography for many centuries.

(1) Warren's excavations revealed: (a) a massive masonry wall 46 ft. E. of the Golden Gate, which closed curved toward the W. at its northern end, following the ancient wall of the city in pre-Herodian times.

4. Buried in the southeastern hill is a rock-cut burial vault, the exact nature of which cannot be determined, but which is said to be the sepulcher of the Queen of Sheba.

Moeran cemetery outside the eastern wall of the Haram precludes the possibility of any more excavations in this neighborhood. (b) More important remains in the southeastern hill, commonly known as "Ophel." Here commencing at the southeastern angle of the Haram, Warren uncovered a wall 14½ ft. thick running S. for 90 ft. and then S.W. along the edge of the hill for 700 ft. This wall, which shows at least two periods of construction, abuts on the sanctuary wall with a straight point. Along its course were found 4 small towers with a projection of 6 ft. and a face from 22 to 28 ft. broad, and a great corner tower projecting 41½ ft. from the wall and with a face 50 ft. broad. The face of this great tower consists of stones one to two ft. high and 2 to 3 ft. long, it is crowned by a rock-cut stairway; upon this massive foundation must have stood a great tower at what was in ancient times the southeastern corner of the city. From this point a scarp facing westward was traced for 100 ft. northward toward the modern southwestern angle of the walls, while a rock scarp, in places 40 ft. high on the outer or southern side and at least 14 ft. on the inner face, was followed for 250 ft. eastward until it reached another great rock projection with a face of 43 ft. Although no stones were found in situ, it is evident that such great rock cuttings must have supported a wall and tower of extraordinary strength, and hundreds of massive squared stones belonging to this wall are now incorporated in neighboring buildings.

The excaovations revealed in the city area about 435-450 AD (see IX, 55), and also in the 14th century. Bliss considers it probable that this is the wall built in 1239 by Frederick II, and it is certainly that depicted in the map of Marino Sanuto (1521 AD). Although the masonry remains comparatively fine, there were some reasons for thinking that at a much earlier date a wall took a similar direction along the edge of the southwestern hill; and it is an attractive theory, though unsupported by any very definite archaeological evidence, that the wall of Solomon took also this general line. The wall running S.E. from the tower, along the edge of the gorge of Hinnom, is historically of much greater importance. Bliss's investigations showed that here were remains belonging to several periods, covering altogether considerably over a millennium. The upper line of wall was of fine masonry, with stones 1 ft. by 3 ft. in size, beautifully jointed and finely dressed; in some places this wall was founded upon the remains of the lower wall, in others a layer of debris intervened. It is impossible that this upper wall can be pre-Rom, and Bliss ascribes it to the Empress Eudoxia (see IX, 55). The lower wall rested upon the rock and showed at least 3 periods of construction. In the earliest the stones had broad margins and were carefully jointed, without mortar. This may have been the work of Solomon or one of the early kings of Judah. The later remains are evidently of the nature of repairs, and include the work of the Judaeans, kings of Nehemiah, and of all the wall-repairers, down to the destruction in 70 AD. At somewhat irregular intervals along the wall were towers of very similar projection and breadth to those found on Warren's wall on the southern hill. These wall foundations were traced—except for an interval where they passed under a Jewish cemetery—all the way to the mouth of the Tyropoeon valley. The upper wall disappeared (the stones having been all removed for later buildings) before the Jewish cemetery was reached. During most periods, if not indeed in all, the wall was carried across the mouth of the Tyropoeon valley upon a great dam of which the massive foundations still exist under the southern hill. The wall foundations were traced—except for an interval where they passed under a Jewish cemetery—all the way to the mouth of the Tyropoeon valley. The upper wall disappeared (the stones having been all removed for later buildings) before the Jewish cemetery was reached.

5. The Great Dam of the Tyropoeon the Birket el Hamra (see SILOAM). This ancient dam evidently once supported a pool in the mouth of the Tyropoeon, and it showed evident signs of both battering and of repairs. Although it is clear that during the greater part of Jewish history, before and after the captivity, the southern wall of Jerusalem crossed upon this dam, there were remains of walls found which tended to show that at one period, at any rate, the wall circled round the two Siloam pools, leaving them outside the fortifications.

In the stretch of wall from "Maudslay's Scarp" to the Tyropoeon valley remains of 2 city gates were found, and doubtful indications of another. The character of the masonry tended to show that the gate belonged to the upper wall, which is apparently entirely of the Christian era. If this is so, this cannot be the "Gate of the Gaii" of Neh 3:12, although the earlier gate may have occupied this site. Bliss suggests as a probable position for this gate an interval between the two contiguous towers IV and V, a little farther to the W. of the gate was a small pool 10 ft. 10 in. wide, marked only by the cuttings in the rock for the door sockets. It lay a little to the W. of the city gate next to be described, and both from its position and its insignificance, it does not appear to have been an entrance to the city; it may, as Bliss suggests, have had some comparatively later use.

The second great city gateway was found some 200 ft. S. of the Birket el Hamra, close to the southeastern angle of the ancient wall. The existing remains are bonded into walls of the earlier period, but the three superimposed door sills, with their sockets—to be seen uncovered today in situ—mark three distinct periods of long duration. The gate gave access to the great main street running down the Tyropoeon, underneath which ran a great rock-cut drain, which probably traveled to the middle valley of the city. During the last two periods of the gate's use, a tower was erected—at the exact southeastern angle—to protect the entrance. The earliest remains here probably belong to the Jewish kings, and it is very probable that we have here the "Gate calleth by Neh 3:12 the "Dung Gate." Bliss considered that it might be the "Fountain Gate" (Neh 3:15), which, however, was probably more to the E., although Bliss could find no remains of it surviving. The repairs and alterations here have been extensive, so that its disappearance is in no way surprising. The Fountain Gate is almost certainly identical with the "Gate between the Two Walls," through which Zebedee and his men of war fled (2 K 5:5; Jer. 39:4; 52:7).

The most definite account of the old walls is that of Jos (BJ, V, iv, 1, 2), and though it referred primarily to the existing walls of his day, is a convenient point for commencing the historical survey. He describes the walls three walls. The first wall "began on the N., at the tower called Hippicus, and extended as far as the Xistus, and then running across the street at the Cyrenian gate, to the eastern cloister of the temple." On the course of this section of the wall there is no dispute. The tower Hippicus was close to the present Jaffa Gate, and the wall ran from here almost due W. to the temple-area along the southern edge of the western arm of the Tyropoeon (see III, 2, above). It is probable that the Haret ed Dawâyeh, a street running nearly parallel with the neighboring "David Street," but high up above the Siloam and the lower parts of this wall. It must have crossed the main Tyropoeon near the Tarīk bāb es Sila‘il, and joined the western cloisters close to where the Mekhenneth, the present "Council House," is situated.

Jos traces the southern course of the first wall thus: "It began at the same place [i.e. Hippicus], and extended through a place called Bethaso to the gate of the Essenes; and after that it went southward, having its bending above the fountain Siloam, when it also bends again toward the E. at Solomon's Pool, and reaches as far as a certain place which they called 'Ophlas,' where it was joined to the eastern cloister of the temple." Although the main course of this wall was followed with pick and shovel, several points are still uncertain. Bethaso is not known, but must have been close to the southwestern angle, which, as we have seen, was situated where "Bishop Gobat's School" is today. It is very probably identical with the "Tower of the Furnaces" of Neh 3:11, while the "Gate of the Essenes" must have been near, if not identical with, the "Gate of the Gaii" of ver 13. The description of Jos certainly seems to imply that the mouth of the Siloam aqueduct ("fountain of Siloam") and the pools were both outside the wall, as can be seen from these indications in the underground remains that this was the case at one period. Solomon's Pool is very probably represented by the modern Birket el Hamra. It is clear that the wall from here to the southeastern angle of the templeplate followed the edge of the southeastern hill, and coincided farther north with the old wall excavated by Warren. As will be shown below, this first wall was the main fortification of the city from the time of the kings of Judah onward. In the time of Jos, this first wall had 60 towers.

From it the probable Second view in and the wall with cavated and unknown Tower no wall. with no wall below), described by Josephus. The "Second Wall" was probably added in the days of the Hasmonean rulers; the "Third Wall" was commenced by Herod Agrippa I and hurriedly finished shortly before the siege by Titus.

The Second Wall of Jos "took its beginning from that gate which they called 'Gennath,' which belonged to the first wall: it only encompassed the northern quarter of the city and reached as far as the tower Antonia" (ib). In no part of Jerusalem topography has there been more disagreement than upon this wall, both as regards its curve and as regards its date of origin. Unfortunately, we have no idea at all where the "Gate Gennath" was. The Tower Antonia we know. The line must have passed in a curved or zigzag direction from some unknown point on the first wall, i.e. between the Jaffa Gate and the Haram to the Antonia. A considerable number of authorities in the past and a few careful students today would identify the general course of this wall with that of the modern northern wall. The greatest objections to this view are that no really satisfactory alternative course has been laid down for the third wall (see below), and that it must have run far N. of the Antonia, a course which does not seem to agree with the description of Jos, which states that the wall "went up" to the Antonia. On the other hand, no certain remains of any city wall within the present north wall have ever been found; fragments have been reported by various observers (e.g. the piece referred to as forming the eastern wall of the so-called "Pool of Hezekiah"; see VII, ii, below), but in an area so frequently desolated and rebuilt upon—where the demand for squared stones must always have been great—it is probable that the traces, if surviving at all, are very scanty. This is the case with the south wall excavated by Bliss (see VI), and that neighborhood has for many centuries been unbuilt upon. It is quite probable that the area included within the second wall may have been quite small, merely the buildings which clustered along the sides of the Tyropoeon. The 40 towers may have been small and built close together, because the position was, from the military aspect, weak. It must be remembered that it was the unsatisfactory state of the second wall which necessitated a third wall. There is no absolute reason why it may not have excluded the greater part of the northwestern hill—and with it the site of the Church of the Holy Sepulchre—but there is no proof that it did. The date of the second wall is unknown (see below).

This third wall, which was commenced after the time of Christ by Herod Agrippa I, is described in more detail by Jos. It was begun 10. Third upon an elaborate plan, but was not Wall finished in its original design because Agrippa feared Claudius Caesar, lest he should suspect that so strong a wall was built in order to make some innovation in public affairs" (BJ, V, iv, 2). It, however, at the time of the siege, was of a breadth of over 18 ft., and a height of 40 ft., and had 90 massive towers. Jos describes it as beginning at the tower Hippicus (near the Jaffa Gate), "where it reached as far as the north quarter of the city, and the tower Psephinus. This mighty tower, 155 ft. high, was at the northwestern corner and overlooked the whole city. From it, according to Jos (BJ, V, vi, 3), there was a view of Arabia (Mosh) at sunrise, and also of "the utmost limits of the Heb possessions at the Sea westward." From this corner the wall turned eastward until it came over against the monument of Helene of Adiabene, a statement, however, which must be read in connection with another passage (Ant, XX, iv, 3), where it says that this tomb "was distant no more than 3 furlongs from the city of Jerus." The wall then "extended to a very great length" and passed by the sepulchral caverns of the kings—which may well be the so-called "Solomon's Quarries," and it then bent at the "Tower of the Corner," at a monument which is called the Monument of the Fuller (not identified), and joined to the old wall at the Kidron valley.

The commonly accepted theory is that a great part of this line of wall is that pursued by the modern north wall, and that the site of the Tyropoeon is the foundation of it, that marks the site of Psephinus. The Damascus Gate is certainly on the line of some earlier gate. The "Tower of the Corner" was probably about where the modern Herod's Gate is, or a little more to the E., and the course of the wall was from here very probably along the southern edge of the "St. Anne's Valley," joining on to the N.E. corner of the Haram a little S. of the present St. Stephen's Gate. This course of the wall fits in well with the description of Jos. If the so-called "Tombe of the Kings" are really those of Queen Helena of Adiabene and her family, then the distance given as 3 furlongs is not as far out as the distance to the modern wall; the distance is actually 3½ furlongs.

Others, following the learned Dr. Robinson, find it impossible to believe that the total circuit of the walls was so small, and would carry the third wall considerably farther north, making the general line of the modern north wall coincide with the second wall of Jos. The supporters of this view point to the description of the extensive view from Psephinus and contend that this presupposed a site on still higher ground, e.g. where the present Russian buildings now are. They also claim that the statement that the wall came "over against" the monument of Queen Helena certainly should not be considered much nearer that monument than the present walls. Dr. Robinson and others who have followed him... have pointed to various fragments which they claim to have been pieces of the missing wall. The present writer, after very many years' residence in Jerusalem, watching the buildings which in the last 25 years have sprung up over the area across which this line of wall is claimed to have run, has never seen a trace of wall foundations or of bases which was in the very least convincing; while on the other hand this area now being rapidly covered by the modern suburb of Jerusalem presents almost everywhere below the surface virgin rock. There is no evidence of any more buildings than occasional scattered Rom villas, with mosaic floors. The present writer has rather unwillingly come to the opinion that the city walls were never farther north than the line they follow today. With respect to the objection raised that there could not have been room enough between the two walls for the "Camp of the Assyrians," where Titus pitched his camp (BJ, V, vii, 3), any probable line for the second wall would leave a mean of 1,000 ft. between the two walls, and in several directions considerably more. The probable position of the "Camp of the Assyrians" would, according to this view, be in the high ground (the northwestern hill) now occupied by the Christian quarter of the modern city. The question of what the population of Jerusalem was at this period is discussed in IX, 49, below. For the other great buildings of the city at this period, see also IX, 43-44, below.

Taking then the walls of Jerusalem as described by Jos, we may work backward and see how the walls ran in earlier periods. The third wall

11. Date of does not concern us any more, as it Second Wall was built after the Crucifixion. With respect to the second wall, there is a great deal of difference of opinion, regarding its origin. Some consider, like Sir Charles Watson, that it does not go back earlier than the monarch. The evidence is inconclusive, but the most probable view seems to be that the "first wall," as described by Jos, was the only circuit of wall from the kings of Judah down to the 2d cent. BC, and perhaps later.

The most complete Scriptural description we have of the walls and gates of Jerusalem is that given by Nehemiah. His account is valuable, not only as a record of what he did, but of what had been the state of the walls before the exile. It is perfectly clear that considerable traces of the old walls and gates remained, and that his one endeavor was to restore what had been before—even though it produced a city enclosure much larger than necessary at his time. The relevant passages are Neh 2:13-19, the account of his night ride; 3:1-32, the description of the rebuilding; and 12:31-39, the routes of the two processes at the dedication.

In the first account we learn that Nehemiah went out by night to the Valley Gate (q.v.), or Gate of the Gai, a gate (that is, opening)

13. Valley Gate into the Gai Hinnom, and probably at or near the gate discovered by Bliss in what is now part of the Anglo-German cemetery he passed to the Dung Gate, and from here viewed the walls of the city. This, with considerable assurance, may be located at the ruined foundations of a gate discovered by Bliss in the southeastern corner of the city. The line of wall clearly followed the south edge of the southwestern hill from the Anglo-German cemetery to this point. He then proceeded to the Fountain Gate, the site of which has not been recovered, but, as there must have been water running out here (as today) from the mouth of the Siloam tunnel, is very appropriately named here. Near by was the King's Pool (q.v.), probably the pool of Siloam—buried—which is today represented by the Birket el Hamra. Here Nehemiah apparently thought of turning into the city, "but there was no place for the beast that was under me to pass" (2:14), so he went up by the Nahal Kidron to the hills from there, and then retraced his steps to the Valley Gate. There is another possibility, and that is that the King's Pool was the pool (which certainly existed) at Gihon, in which case the Fountain Gate may also have been in that neighborhood.

All the archaeological evidence is in favor of the wall having crossed the mouth of the Tyropoeon by the great dam at this time, and the propinquity of this structure to the Fountain Gate is seen in Neh 3:15, where we read that Shallum built the Fountain Gate "and covered it, and set up the doors thereof . . . and the bars thereof, and the wall of the pool of Shalah [see Siloam] by the King's Garden [q.v.], even unto the stairs that go down from the city of David." All these localities were close together at the mouth of el Wad.

Passing from here we can follow the circuit of the city from the accounts of the rebuilding of the walls in Neh 3:15f. The wall from here was carried "over against the ascent of David," which we know to have stood in the original "City of David" above Gihon, past "the pool that was made," and "the house of the Gibbôrim" (mighty men)—both unknown sites. It is clear that the wall is being carried along the edge of the southeastern hill toward the temple. We read of two angles in the wall—both needed by the geographical conditions—the high priest's house, of "the tower that standeth out" (supposed to have been unearthed by Warren), and the wall of the Orphel (q.v.).
There is also mention of a Water Gate in this position, which, just where one would expect a road to lead from the temple-area down.

16. Water to Gihon. From the great number of companies engaged in building, it may be inferred that all along this stretch of wall from the Tyropoeon to the temple, the destruction of the walls had been specially great.

Proceeding N., we come to the Horse Gate. This was close to the entry to the king's house (2 K 11 16; 2 Ch 23 15; Jer 31 17).

17. Horse Gate 40. The expression, "above" Gate, or Horse Gate, may imply that the gate itself may have been uninjured; it may have been kind of rock-cut passage or tunnel. It cannot have been far from the present southeastern angle of the city. Thence "repaired, the priests, every one over against his own house"—the houses of these people being to the E. of the temple. Then comes the Gate of HAMMIPHAK (q.v.), the ascent (or "upper chamber," m) of the corner, and finally the Sheep Gate (q.v.) which was repaired by the goldsmiths and merchants. This last gate was the point from which the circuit of the repairs was traced. The references, Neh 3 1 31; 12 39, clearly show that it was at the eastern extremity of the north wall.

The details of the gates and buildings in the north wall as described by Nehemiah, are difficult, and certainty is impossible; this side must always necessarily have been the weak side for defence because it was protected by no, or only by a very little, natural valley. As has been said, we cannot be certain whether Nehemiah is describing a wall which on its western two-thirds corresponded with the first or the second wall of Jos. Taking the first theory as probable, we may plan it as follows: W. of the Sheep Gate two towers are mentioned (Neh 3 1; 12 39). Of these Hananel (q.v.) was more easterly than Hammear (q.v.), and, too, it would appear from Zec 14 10 to have been the most northerly point of the city. Probably then two towers occupied the important hill where afterward stood the fortress Baris and, later, the Antonia. At the Hammersha tower the wall would descend into the Tyropoeon to join the eastern extremity of the first wall where in the time of Jos stood the Council House (BJ, V, iv, 2).

It is generally considered that the Fish Gate (q.v.) (Neh 3 3; 12 39; Zeph 1 10; 2 Ch 33 14) stood across the Tyropoeon in much the same way as the modern Gate Damascus Gate does now, only considerably farther S. It was probably so called because here the men of Tyre sold their fish (Neh 13 16). It is very probably identical with the "Middle Gate" of Jer 39 3. With this region are associated the Mishneh (q.v.) or "second quarter" (Zeph 1 10 m) and the Makkesh (q.v.) or "mortar" (Zeph 1 11).

The next gate westward, after apparently a considerable interval, is the EV "Old Gate" (q.v.), but is more correctly the "Gate of the old . . .": what the word thus qualified is, is doubtful. Neh 3 6 m suggests "old city" or "old wall," whereas Mitchell (Wall of Jerusalem according to the Book of Neh) proposes "old pool," taking the word in question to be the so-called "Pool of Hezekiah." According to the view here accepted, that the account of Neh refers only to the first wall, the expression "old wall" would be peculiarly suitable, and must have been some part of that first wall which went back probably to the time of Solomon. The western wall to the extent of 400 cubits had been rebuilt after its destruction by Jehoash, king of Israel (see IX, 12, below), and Manasseh had repaired all the wall from Gihon round N. and then W. to the Fish Gate. This gate has also been identified with the Sha'ar ha-Pinnah, or "Corner Gate," of 2 K 14 13; 2 Ch 26 23; Jer 31 38; Zec 14 10, and with the Sha'ar ha-Rishon, or "First Gate," of Zec 14 10, which is identified as the same as the Corner Gate; indeed m'shān ("first") is probably a textual error for yashōn ("old"). If this is so, this "Gate of the Old" or "Corner Gate" must have stood near the northwestern corner of the city, somewhere near the present Jaffa Gate.

The next gate mentioned is the Gate of Ephraim (Neh 12 39), which, according to 2 K 14 13; 2 Ch 25 23, was 400 cubits or 600 ft.

21. Gate of from the Corner Gate. This must Ephraim have been somewhere on the western wall; it is scarcely possible to believe, as some writers would suggest, that there could have been no single gate between the Corner Gate near the northwestern corner and the Valley Gate on the southern wall.

The "Broad Wall" appears to correspond to the southern stretch of the western wall.

22. Tower as far as the "Tower of the Furnaces" of the or ovens, which was probably the Furnaces extremely important corner tower now incorporated in "Bishop Gobat's School." This circuit of the walls satisfies fairly well all the conditions; the difficulties are chiefly on the N. and W. It is a problem how the Gate of Ephraim comes to be omitted in the account of the repairs, but G. A. Smith suggests that it may be indicated by the expression, "thrones of the governor beyond the river" (Neh 3 7). See, however, Mitchell (loc. cit.). If the theory be accepted that the second wall already existed, the Corner Gate and the Fish Gate will have to be placed farther north.

!Probable Course of Solomon's Wall.
In Zec 14 10 the breadth of the city is indicated, where the prophet writes, "She shall be lifted up, and shall dwell in her place, from Benjamin's gate unto the place of the first gate, unto the corner gate."

The Upper Gate of the Temple (2 K 15 35; 2 Ch 27 3; cf 2 Ch 23 20; Ezk 9 2) is probably another name for the same gate. It must be remembered the gates were, as excavations have shown us, reduced to a minimum in fortified sites: they were sources of weakness.

The general outline of the walls and gates thus followed is in the main that existing from Nehemiah back until the early Judaean monarchy, and possibly to Solomon.

Of the various destructions and repairs which occurred during the time of the monarchy, a sufficient account is given in IX below, on the history. Solomon was probably the first to inclose the northwestern Walls hill within the walls, and to him usually is ascribed all the northern and western stretch of the "First Wall"; whether his wall ran down to the mouth of the Tyropoan, or only skirted the summit of the northwestern hill is uncertain, but the latter view is probable. David was protected by the powerful fortifications of the Jebusites, which probably inclosed only the southeastern hill; he added to the defences the fortress Millo (q.v.). It is quite possible that the original Jebusite city had but one gate, on the N. (2 S 15 2), but the city must have overflowed its narrow limits during David's reign and have needed an extended and powerful defence, such as Solomon made, to secure the capital. For the varied history and situation of the walls in the post-Bib. period, see IX ("History"), below.

VII. Antiquarian Remains Connected with the Water-Supply.—In a city like Jerusalem, where the problem of a water-supply must always have been one of the greatest, it is only natural that some of the most ancient and important works should have centered round it. The three sources of supply have been (1) springs, (2) cisterns, (3) aqueducts.

(1) The natural springs have been described in II, 3; but connected with them, and esp. with the city's greatest and most venerated source, the Gihon, there are certain antiquarian remains of great interest.

(a) The "Virgin's Fount," ancient Gihon, arises, as has been described (II, 3), in a rocky cleft in the Kidron valley bottom; under natural conditions the water would run along the valley bed, now deeply buried under debris of the ancient city, and doubtless when the earliest settlers made their dwellings in the caves (which have been excavated) on the sides of the valley near the spring, they and their flocks lived on the banks of a stream of running water in a sequestered valley among waterless hills. From, however, a comparatively early period—at the least 2000 BC—efforts were made to retain some of the water, and a solid stone dam was built which converted the sources into a pool of considerable depth. Either then, or somewhat later, excavations were made in the cliffs overhanging the pool, whereby some at least of these waters were conducted, by means of a tunnel, into the heart of the southeastern hill "Ophel," so that the source could be reached from within the city walls. There are today two systems of tunnels which are usually classed as one under the name of the "Siloam aqueduct," but the two systems are probably many centuries apart in age. The older tunnel begins in a cave near the source and then runs westward for a distance of 67 ft.; at the inner end of the tunnel there is a perpendicular shaft which ascends for over 40 ft. and opens into a lofty rock-cut passage which runs, with a slight lateral curve, toward the N., in the direction of the surface. The upper end has been partially destroyed, and the roof, which had fallen in, was long ago partially restored by a masonry arch. At this part of the passage the floor is...
abruptly interrupted across its whole width by a deep chasm which Warren partially excavated, but which Parker has since conclusively shown to end blindly. It is clear that this great gallery, which is 8 to 9 ft. wide, and in places as high or higher, was constructed (as he believed) to facilitate the passage of water from the reservoir (by means of a tunnel) which was to be built above the city (see GAZA). The only conjecture of this is now afforded by the passage of the modern aqueduct (1500 BC) at Gezer (q.v.), which commenced in a rock-cut pit 26 ft. deep and descended with steps to a depth of 94 ft. 6 in. below the level of the rock surface; the sloping passage was 23 ft. high and 13 ft. broad. This passage, which could be dated with certainty as before 1500 BC, and almost certainly as early as 2000 BC, was cut out with flint knives and apparently was made entirely to reach a great underground source of water. The discovery of this Gezer well-passage has thrown a flood of light upon the "Warren's Shaft" in Jerusalem, which would appear to have been made for an exactly similar purpose. The chasm mentioned before may have been an effort to reach the source from a higher point, or it may have been made, or later adapted, to prevent ingress by means of the system of tunnels into the city. This passage is in all probability the "watercourse" (Ch 2 Sam 15: 2) of 2 S 5 8 up which, apparently, Joab and his men (1 Ch 11: 6) secretly made their way; they must have waded through the water at the source, ascended the perpendicular shaft (a feat performed in 1910 by some British officers without any assistance from ladders), and then made their way into the heart of the city along the great tunnel. Judging by the similar Gezer water tunnel, this great work may not only have existed in David's time, but may have been constructed as much as 1,000 years before.

3. Warren's Shaft, or Siloam tunnel

The true Siloam tunnel is a considerably later work. It branches off from the older aqueduct at a point 67 ft. from the entrance, and after running an exceedingly winding course of 1,882 ft. it empties itself into the Pool of Siloam (total length 1,749 ft.). The whole canal is rock cut; it is 2 to 3 ft. wide, and varies in height from 16 ft. at the south end to 4 ft. 6 in. at the lowest point, near the middle. The extent of this tunnel has recently been greatly changed through Captain Parker's party having cleared out the accumulated silt of centuries; before this, parts of the channel could be traversed only with the greatest difficulty and discomfort. The primitive nature of this construction is shown by the many false passages made, and also by the extensive cuttings which greatly add to its length. This latter may also be partly due to the workmen following lines of soft strata. M. Clermont-Ganneau and others have thought that one or more of the great cuttings may have been made deliberately to avoid the tombs of the kings of Judah. The method of construction of the tunnel is narrated in the Siloam Inscription (see SITOAM). It was begun simultaneously from each end, and the two parties met in the middle. It is a remarkable thing that there is a difference of level of only one foot at each end; but the lofty height of the southern end is probably due to a lowering of the floor here after the junction was effected. It is practically certain that this great work is that referred to in 2 K 20: 20: "Now the rest of the acts of Hezekiah, and all his might, and how he made the pool, and the conduit, and brought water into the city, are they not written in the book of the chronicles of the kings of Judah? And in 2 Ch 32: 30: "This same Hezekiah also stopped the upper spring of the waters of Gihon, and brought them straight down on the west side of the city of David." In addition to these two conduits, which have a direct Scriptural interest, there are remains of at least two other aqueducts which take their origin at the Virgin's Fountain—one a channel deeply cut in rock along one of the sides of the Kidron valley, found by Captain Parker, and the other a built channel, lined with very good cement, which takes its rise at a lower level than any of the other conduits close to the before-mentioned rocky gulf, from which the water rises, and runs in a very winding direction along the western side of the Kidron. This the present writer has described in PEFS, 1902. One of these, perhaps more probably the former, may be the conduit which is referred to as Shiloah (shiloh), or "conducted" (Isa 8: 6), before the construction of Hezekiah's work (see shiloah).

4. Hezekiah's "Siloam" Aqueduct

This the present writer has described in PEFS, 1902. One of these, perhaps more probably the former, may be the conduit which is referred to as Shiloah (shiloh), or "conducted" (Isa 8: 6), before the construction of Hezekiah's work (see shiloah).

6. Br Eyyubh

Eyyubh has a depth of 125 ft.; the water collects at the bottom in a large rock-hewn chamber, and it is clear that it has been deepened at some period, because at the depth of 113 ft. there is a collecting chamber which is now replaced by the deeper one. Various rock-cut passages or staircases were found by Warren in the neighborhood of this well.

2. The cisterns and tanks.—Every ancient site in the hill country of Pal is riddled with cisterns for the storage of rain water. In Jerusalem there are many hundred of these, the cisterns of the Kings of Judah, the wall of ice in the Palace of Herod, the "bottles" of the Virgin's Fountain, and the "Astral" reservoir. Some of these cisterns are large enough to hold a considerable amount of water. They are generally cut into the rock or built of stone, and are often supported by arches or columns. The water is obtained by means of a siphon or pipe, and is generally stored in a cistern or tank, which is usually located near the entrance to the cistern. The water is then distributed by means of a network of pipes and channels, and is used for domestic purposes. Some of these cisterns are quite large, and are capable of holding a considerable amount of water. They are generally cut into the rock or built of stone, and are often supported by arches or columns. The water is then distributed by means of a network of pipes and channels, and is used for domestic purposes.
For more public purposes large cisterns were made in the Haram, or temple-area. Some 3 dozen are known and planned; the largest is calculated to contain 3,000,000 gallons. Such structures were made large for the religious ritual, but, as we shall see, they have been supplied by other sources than the rainfall. In many parts of the city open tanks have been constructed, such a tank being known in Arab. as a birket, or, followed by a vowel, birket. With most of these there is considerable doubt as to their date of construction, but probably none of them, in their present form at any rate, antedates the Rom period.

Within the city walls the largest reservoir is the Birket Isrâ'âl which extends from the northeastern angle of the Haram westward for 360 ft. It is 125 ft. wide and was originally 80 ft. deep, but has in recent years been largely filled up by the city’s refuse. The eastern and western ends of this pool are partially rock-cut and partly masonry, the masonry of the former being a great dam 45 ft. thick, the lower part of which is continuous with the ancient eastern wall of the temple-area. The sides of the pool are entirely masonry because the reservoir is built across the width of the valley referred to before (III, 2) as “St. Anne’s Valley.” Other parts of this valley are filled with débris to the depth of 100 ft. The original bottom of the reservoir is covered with a layer of about 19 in, of very hard concrete and cement. There was a great conduit at the eastern end of the pool built of massive stones, and connected with the pool by a perforated stone with three round holes 6 in. in diameter. The position of this outlet shows that all water over a depth of 22 ft. must have flowed away. Some authorities consider this pool to have been preëxile. By early Christian pilgrims it was identified as the “Sheep Pool” of Jn 5: 2, and at a later period, until quite recent times, it was supposed to have been the Pool of Bethesda.

9. Pool of Bethesda
The discovery, a few years ago, of the long-lost Piscina in the neighborhood of the ‘Church of St. Anne,’ which was without doubt the Pool of Bethesda of the 5th cent., AD, has caused this identification to be abandoned. See Bethesda.

To the W. of the Birket Isrâ'âl are the “twin pools” which extend under the roadway in the neighborhood of the “Ecces Homo” arch. The western one is 165 ft. by 20 ft. and the eastern 127 ft. by 20 ft. M. Clermont-Ganneau considers them to be identical with the Pool Struthius of Jos (BJ, V, xi, 4), but others, considering that they are actually made in the fosse of the Antonia, gives them a later date of origin. In connection with these pools a great aqueduct was discovered in 1871, 2-3 ft. wide and in places 12 ft. high, running from the neighborhood of the Damascene Gate and destroyed farther north —and from the pools another aqueduct runs in the direction of the Haram.

On the northwestern hill, between the Jaffa Gate and the Church of the Sepulchre there is a large open reservoir, known to the modern inhabitants of the city as Birket Hamâmân el Bâtrak, “the Pool of the Patriarch’s Bath.” It is 240 ft. long (N. to S.), 144 ft. broad and 19-24 ft. deep. If the present lining of the bottom is cracked and practically useless. The eastern wall of this pool is particularly massive, and forms the base of the remarkably level street Haret en Nasara, or “Christian Street”; it is a not improbable theory that this is actually a fragment of the long-sought “seventh” wall of Jerusalem. The wall, it is said, to have once extended 60 ft. farther north, may have been constructed originally as part of the fosse. On the other hand, this pool appears to be the Amygdalon Pool, or “Pool of the Tower” (יהודיה הרובע, birket ha-migdâl), mentioned by Jos (BJ, V, xi, 4), which was one of the activities of the 10th. cent. B.C. and this seems inconsistent with the previous theory, as the events described seem to imply that the second wall ran outside the pool. The popular traveler’s name, “Pool of Hezekiah,” given to this reservoir is due to the theory, now quite discarded, that there is the pool referred to in 2 K 20: 20. “Hezekiah the king, and the conduit, and brought water into the city.” Other earlier topographers have identified it as the “upper pool” of Isa. 7 3; 36 2. The Birket Hamâmân el Bâtrak is supplied with water from the Birket Mimâl, about 3/4 mile to the W. This large pool, 293 ft. long by 12. Birket 193 ft. broad and 19½ ft. deep, lies in the midst of a large Moslem cemetery at the head of the Wady Mâs, the first beginning of the Wady er Rabûbi (Himmon). The aqueduct which connects the two pools springs from the eastern end of the Birket Mimâl, runs a somewhat winding course and enters the city near the Jaffa Gate. The aqueduct is in bad repair, and the water it carries, chiefly from the rain, is filthy. In the Middle Ages it was supposed that this was the “Upper Pool of Gihon” (see Gihon), but this and likewise the “highway of the Fuller’s Field” (q.v.) are now located elsewhere. Wilson and others have suggested that it is the “Serpent’s Pool” of Jos (BJ, V, iii, 2). Titus levelled “all the places from Scoopus to Herod’s monument which adjoin the pool called that of the Serpent.” Like many such identifications, there is not very much to be said for or against it; it is likely that the pool existed at the time of the siege. It is likely that this is the Beth Menem of the Talb Bab, Erubähn 51 b; Sanhedrin 24 a; Brê'shith Rabbe 51. The Birket es Suzuki is a large pool—or, more strictly speaking, inclosure—555 ft. N. and S. by 220 ft. E. and W. It is bounded on the W. and N. by a great curve of the Birket es Suzuki low-level aqueduct as it passes along and then across the Wady er Rabûbi. The southern side consists of a massive dam across the valley over which the Bethesda runs. The name may signify either the “great” pool or be connected with the fact that it was re-constructed in the 16th cent. by the sultan Suliman ibn Selim, as is recorded on an inscription upon a wayside fountain upon the southern wall of the pool, which is registered in the cartulary of the Holy Sepulchre as the Lacus Germani, after the name of a knight of Germanus, who built or renovated the pool in 1176 AD. Probably a great part of the pool is a catchment area, and the true reservoir is the rock-cut birkeh at the southern end, which has recently been cleaned out. It is extremely difficult to believe that under any conditions any large proportion of the whole area could ever have been filled. Today the reservoir at the lower end holds, after the rainy season, some 10 or 12 ft. of very dirty water, chiefly the street drainage of the Jaffa road, while the upper two-thirds of the inclosure is used as a cattle market on Fridays. The water is now used for sprinkling the dusty roads in dry seasons.

The Pool of Siloam, hand to hand, is the Birket el Hamra are described under Siloam (q.v.).

There are other tanks of considerable size in and around the city, e.g. the Birket Sittî Miriam, near “St. Stephen’s Gate,” an uncedented pool in the Wady Jôs, connected with which there is a rock-cleft aqueduct which is there stated, but it has not of sufficient historical importance to merit description here.
(3) The conduits bringing water to the city from a distance are called the "high-level" and "low-level" aqueducts respectively, because they reached the city at different levels, conveyed water from three great pools in the Wady 'Arràb, 7 miles S. of Jerusalem. They are usually called "Solomon's pools," in reference perhaps partly to Eccl 4:6: "I made me pools of water, to water therefrom the forest where trees were reared," but as any mighty work in Pal is apt to be referred to the wise king of Israel, much stress cannot be laid on the name. These three storage reservoirs are constructed across the breadth of the valley, the lowest and largest being 582 ft. long by 177 ft. broad and, at the lowest end, 50 ft. deep. Although the overflow waters of 'Ain es Salih, commonly known as the "sealed fountain" (of Cant. 4:12), reach the pools, the chief function was probably to collect the flood waters from the winter rains, and the water was passed from tank to tank after purification. There are in all four springs above the southern slopes of the site of Jerusalem to the Haram. The total length of this aqueduct is nearly 12 miles, but at a later date the supply was increased by the construction of a long extension of the conduit for a further 28 miles to Wady 'Arràb on the road to Hebron, another 5 miles directly S. of the pools. Here, too, there is a reservoir, the Birket el 'Arràb, for the collection of the flood-water, and also several small springs, which are conducted in a number of underground rock-cut channels to the aqueduct. The total length of the low-level aqueduct is about 10 miles, and it falls in level from Birket el 'Arràb (2,645 ft. above sea-level) at its far end to Kds., the termination in the Haram (2,410 ft. above sea-level), is 235 ft.

The high-level aqueduct commences in a remarkable chain of wells connected with a tunnel, about 4 furlongs long, in the Wady Bihr, "the Valley of Wells." Upward of 50 Level wells along the valley bottom supply Aqueduct each its quotient; the water therefrom, passed through a pool where the solid matter settled, and traversed a tunnel 700 ft. long into the 'Arràb valley. Here, where its level was 150 ft. above that of the low-level aqueduct, the conduit received the waters of the "sealed fountain," and finally "delivered" them at a level of about 20 ft. above that of the Jaffa Gate (Wilson). The most remarkable feature of this conduit is the inverted syphon of perforated limestone blocks, forming a stone tube 15 in. in diameter, which carried the water across the valley near Rachel's Tomb. On a number of these blocks, Lat inscriptions with the names of centurions of the time of Severus (195 AD) have been found, and this has led many to fix a date to this great work. So good construction of an authority as Wilson, however, considers that these inscriptions may refer to repairs, and that the work is more probably Herodian. Unless the accounts of Jos (BJ, V, iv, 4; II, xvii, 8) are exaggerated, Herod must have had some means of bringing abundant running water into the city at the level obtained by this conduit. The late Dr. Schick even suggested a date as early as Hyrcanus (135-125 BC). With regard to the low-level Aqueduct, we have two definite data. First Jos (Ant., XVIII, iii, 2) states that Pontius Pilate "undertook to bring a current of water to Jerusalem, and did it with the sacred money, and derived the origin of the stream from the distance of 200 furlongs" (over 22 miles; in BJ, II, ix, 4 he is said to have brought the water "from 400 furlongs")—probably a copyist's error. But these references must either be to restorations or to the extension from Wady 'Arràb to Wady 'Arràb (28 miles), for the low-level aqueduct from the pools to Jerusalem is certainly the same construction as the aqueduct from these pools to the "Frank Mountain," the Herodium, and that, according to the definite statements of Jos (Ant., XV, ix, 4; BJ, I, xxi, 10), was made by Herod the Great. On the whole the usual view is that the high-level aqueduct was the work of Severus, the low-level that of Herod, with an extension southward by Pontius Pilate.

Jerusalem still benefits somewhat from the low-level aqueduct which is in repair as far as Bethlehem, though all that reaches the city comes only through a solitary 4-in. pipe. The high-level aqueduct is hopelessly destroyed and can be traced only in places; the wells of Wady Bihr are choked and useless, and the long winding aqueduct to Wady 'Arràb is quite broken.

VIII. Tombs, Antiquarian Remains, and Ecclesiastical Sites.—Needless to say all the known ancient tombs in the Jerusalem area have been riddled of their contents long ago. The so-called Tombs of the Kings in the Wady el Joz are actually the monument of Queen Helena of Adiabene, a convert to Judaism (c. 48 AD). Jos (Ant., XX, iv, 3) states that her bones, along with those of members of her family, were buried "at the pyramids," which were 3 in number and distant from Jerusalem 3 furlongs. A Heb inscription upon a sarcophagus found here by De Saulcy ran: "Queen Sarah," possibly the Jewish name of Queen Helena. On the western side of the Wady el Mts (the higher part of Hinnom), is a very interesting Gr Tomb. These are commonly known as "Herod's Tombs" (although Herod the Great was buried on the Herodium), and, according to Schick, one of the sarcophagi may have belonged to Mariamne, Herod's wife. A more probable theory is that this is the tomb of the high priest Ananias (BD, V, xii, 2).

On the eastern side of the Kidron, near the southeastern angle of the Haram, are 3 conspicuous tombs. The most northerly, Tantur Far'on, generally called "Absalom's Tomb," is a Gr-Jewish tomb of the Hasmonian period, and, according to Conder, possibly the tomb of Alexander Janneaus (HDB, art. "Jerusalem"). S. of this is the traditional "Grotto of St. James," which we know by a square Heb inscription over the pillars to be the family tomb of certain members of the priestly family (1 Ch 24 15), of the Beni Hariz. It may belong to the century before Christ.

The adjoining traditional tomb of Zachariah is a monolithic monument cut out of the living rock, 16 ft. sq. and 30 ft. high. It has square pilasters at the corners, Ionic pillars between, and a pyramidal top. Its origin is unknown; its traditional name is due to Our Lord's word in Mt 25 35; Lk 11 51 (see ZACHARIAS).

A little farther down the valley of the Kidron, at the commencement of the village of Siloam, is another rock-cut tomb, the so-called "Egyptian Egypt Tomb, or according to some, "the tomb of Solomon's Egypt wife." It is a monolith 18 ft. sq. and 11 ft. high, and the interior has at one time been used as a chapel. It is now Russian property. It probably belongs to much the same period as the three before-mentioned tombs, and, like them, shows strong Egyptian influence.

The so-called "Tombs of the Judges" belong to the Roman period, as do the scores of similar excavations in the same valley. The "Tombs of the Prophets" on the western slopes of the Mount of Olives are now considered to belong to the 4th or 5th Christian century.

Near the spot where Jeremiah's Grotto, to the W. and N.W., is a great number of tombs, mostly Christian. The more northerly members of the group are now included in the property of the Dominicans attached to the Church of St. Stephen, but one, the southernmost, has attracted a great deal of attention because it was supposed by the late General Gordon to be the tomb of Christ. In its condition when found it was without doubt, like its Garden Tomb neighbors, a Christian tomb of about the 5th cent., and it was full of skeletons. Whether it may originally have been a Jewish tomb is unproved; it certainly could not have been recognized as a site of any sanctity until General Gordon promulgated his theory (see PEF, 1892, 120-24; see also Golgotha).

The Jews greatly venerate a tomb on the eastern side of the Wady el Joz, not far S. of the great North Road; they consider it to be the tomb of Simon the Just, but it is "Simon the Just" in all probability not a Jewish tomb.

Only passing mention can here be made of certain remains of interest connected with the exterior walls of the Haram. The foundation walls of the temple-platform are built of magnificent blocks of smooth, drafted masonry with an average height of 33 ft. One line, known as the "master course," runs for 600 ft. westward from the southeastern angle, with blocks 7 ft. high. Near the southeastern angle at the foundation itself, certain of the blocks were found by the Palestine Exploration Fund engineers to be marked with Phoen character, which it was supposed by many at the time of their discovery indicated their Solomon origin. It is now gen-eraly held that these “masons’ marks” may just as well have been used in the time of Herod the Great, and on other grounds it is held that all this magnificent masonry is due to the vast reconstruction of the Temple which this great monarch initiated (see Temple). In the western wall of the Haram, between the southwestern corner and the “Jewish wailing place,” lies “Robinson’s Arch.” It is the spring of an arch 50 ft. wide, projecting from the temple-wall; the bridge arising from it had a span of 50 ft., and the pier on the farther side was discovered by Warren. Under the bridge ran a contemporary paved Rom street, and beneath the unbroken pavement was found, lying inside a rock aqueduct, a voussoir of an older bridge. This bridge connected the temple-inclosure with the upper city in the days of the Hasmonae kings. It was broken down in 63 BC by the Jews in anticipation of the attack of Pompey (1st, XIV, iv, 2; BJ, I, vii, 2), but was rebuilt by Herod in 19 BC (BJ, VI, viii, 1; vi, 2), and finally destroyed in 70 AD.

Nearly 600 ft. farther N., along this western temple-wall is Wilson’s Arch, which lies under the surface within the causeway which crosses the Tyraspon to the Bab es Sidshek of the Haram; although not itself very ancient there are here, deeper down, arches belonging to the Herodian causeway which here approached the temple-platform.

With regard to the common ecclesiastical sites visited by pious pilgrims little need be said here.

8. Ecclesiastical Sites

The congeries of churches that is included under that name of Church of the Holy Sepulchre includes a great many minor sites of the服务体系 of the Passion which have no serious claims.

Besides the Holy Sepulchre itself—which, apart from its situation, cannot be proved or disproved, as it has actually been destroyed—the only important site is that of Mount Calvary. All that can be said is that if the Sepulchre is genuine, then the site may be also; it is today the hollowed-out shell of a rocky knoll incised in marble and other stones and riddled with chapels. See Golgotha.

The cenacleum, close to the Moslem “Tomb of David” (a site which has no serious claims), has been upheld by Professor S holday (Sacred Sites of the Gospels) as one which has a very strong tradition in its favor.

The most important evidence is that of Epiphanios, who states that when Hadrian visited Jerusalem in 130, one of the few buildings left standing was “the little Church of Calvary, on which the disciples, returning after the Ascension of the Saviour from Olivet, had gone up to the Upper room, for there it had been built, that is to say in the quarter of Zion.” In connection with this spot there has been pointed out from early Christian times the site of the House of Caiaphas and the site of the death of the Virgin Mary—the Dormitio Sanctae Virginis. It is in consequence of this latter tradition that the German Roman Catholics have now erected here their magnificent new church of the Dormition. A rival line of traditions locates the tomb of the Virgin in the Kidron valley near Gethsemane, where there is a remarkable underground chapel belonging to the Greeks.

IX. History.—Pre-Israelitic period.—The beginnings of Jerusalem are long before recorded history: at various points in the neighborhood, e.g. at el Bukeia to the S.W., and at the northern extremity of the Mount of Olives to the N.E., were very large settlements of Paleolithic man, long before the days of the dawn of history, as is proved by the quantities of celts scattered over the surface. It is certain that the city’s site itself was occupied many centuries before David, and it is a traditional view that the city called Salem (q.v.) (Gen 14 18), over which Melchizedek was king, was identical with Jerusalem.

The first certain reference to this city is about 1450 BC, when the name Ur-ur-salem occurs in several letters belonging to the Amarna correspondence. The place here referred to is Amarna, and it is clear that this man was “king,” or governor of the city, as the representative of Pharaoh of Egypt. In this correspondence Abu Khiba represents himself as hard pressed to uphold the rights of his suzerain against the hostile forces which threaten to overwhelm him. Incidentally we may gather that the place was then a fortified city, guarded partly by mercenary Egypt troops, and there are reasons for thinking that the then ruler of Egypt, Amenhotep IV, had made it a sanctuary of his god Aten—the sun-disc. Some territory, possibly extending as far west as Ajalon, seems to have been under the jurisdiction of the governor. Professor Sayce has stated that Abu Khiba was probably a Hittite chief, but this is doubtful. The correspondence closes abruptly, leaving us in uncertainty with regard to the fate of the writer, but we know that the domination of Egypt over Pal.

At the time of Joshua’s invasion of Canaan, Adoni-zedek (q.v.) is mentioned (Josh 10 1–27) as king of Jerusalem, he united with the kings of Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Gibeon to fight against the Gibeonites who had made peace with Joshua; the 5 kings were defeated and, being captured in hiding at the cave Makkedah, were all slain. Another king, Adoni-Bezek (q.v.) (whom some identify with Adoni-zedek), was defeated by Judah after the death of Joshua, and after being mutilated was brought to Jerusalem and died there (Jgs 1 1–7), after which it is recorded (ver 8) that Judah “fought against Jerusalem, and took it, and set the city on fire.” But it is clear that the city remained in the hands of the “Jebusites” for some years more (Jgs 1 21; 19 11), although it was theoretically reckoned on the southern border of Benjamin (Josh 15 8; 18 16, 28). David, after he had reigned 7 years at Hebron, determined to make Jerusalem his capital and, about 1000 BC, captured the city.

Up to this event it is probable that Jerus was like other contemporary fortified cities, a comparatively small place encircled with powerful walls, with but one or perhaps two gates; it is very generally admitted that this city occupied the ridge to the S. of the temple long incorrectly called "Ophel," and that its walls stood upon steep rocky scars above the Kidron valley on the one side, and the Tyropoeon on the other. We have every reason to believe that the great system of tunnels, known as "Warren's Shaft" (see VII, 3, above) existed all through this period.

The account of the capture of Jerus by David is obscure, but it seems a probable explanation of a difficult passage (2 S 5 6-9) if we conclude that the Jebusites, relying upon the extraordinary strength of their position, challenged David: "Thou shalt not come in hither, but the blind and the lame shall turn thee away" (ver 6 m), and that David directed his followers to go up the "watercourse" and smite the "lame and the blind"—a term he in his turn applies mockingly to the Jebusites. "And Joab the son of Zeruiah went up first, and was made chief" (1 Ch 11 6). It seems at least probable that David's men captured the city through a surprise attack up the great tunnels (see VII, 3, above). David having captured the stronghold "Zion," renamed it the "City of David" and took up his residence there; he added to the strength of the fortifications "round about from the Millo [q.v.] and onward", with the assistance of Phoen workmen supplied by Hiram, king of Tyre, he built himself a "house of cedar" (2 S 5 11; cf 7 2). The ark of Jeh was brought from the house of Obed-edom and lodged in a tent (2 S 6 17) in the "city of David" (of 1 K 8 1). The threshing-floor of Araunah (2 S 24 18), or Orn an (1 Ch 21 15), the Jebusite, was later purchased as the future site of the temple.

The Jerus which David captured was small and compact, but there are indications that during his reign it must have increased considerably by the growth of suburbs outside the Jebusite walls. The population must have increased from several sources. The influx of David's followers doubtless caused many of the older inhabitants to be crowded out of the walled area. There appear to have been a large garrison of (2 S 15 18; 20 7), many officials and priests and their families (2 S 9 16- 18; 20 5-6; 23 26; 20 5-6; and the wives of David's own family and their relatives (2 S 5 13-16; 14 24-28; 1 K 1 52, etc.). It is impossible to suppose that all these were crowded into so narrow an area, while the incidental mention that Absalom lived two whole years in Jerus without seeing the king's face implies burial (2 S 14 24. 28). The new dwellings could probably extend northward toward the site of the future temple and northwestward into and up the Tyropoeon valley along the great north road. It is improbable that they could have occupied much of the western hill. With the accession of Solomon, the increased magnificence of the court, the foreign wives and their establishments, the new officials and the great number of work people brought to the city for Solomon's great buildings must necessarily have enormously swelled the resident population, while the recorded buildings of the city, the temple, the king's house, the House of the Daughter of Pharaoh, the House of the Forest of Lebanon, the Throne Hall and the Pillared Hall (1 K 7 1-8) must have altered the whole aspect of the site. In consequence of these new buildings, the sanctuary together with the houses of the common folk, a new wall for the city was necessary, and we have a statement twice made that Solomon built "the wall of Jerus round about" (1 K 3 1; 9 15); it is also recorded that he built Millo (9 15-24; 11 27), and that "he repaired the breach of the city of David his father" (11 27). The question of the Millo is discussed elsewhere (see Millo); the "breach" referred to may have been the connecting wall needed to include the Millo within the complete circle of fortifications, or else some part of Solomon's fortification which his death had left incomplete.

As regards the "Wall of Jerus" which Solomon built, it is practically certain that it was, on the N. and W., that described by Jos as the First Wall (see VI, 7 above). The mon's City Wall vast rock-cut scars at the southwestern corner testify to the strength of the building. Whether the whole of the southwestern hill was included is a matter of doubt. Inasmuch as there are indications at Bliss's tower (see VI, 4 4) of an ancient wall running north-easterly, and in the southern part of the southwestern hill, it would appear highly probable that Solomon's wall followed that line; in this case this wall must have crossed the Tyropoeon at somewhat the line of the existing southern wall, and then have run southeasterly to join the western wall of the old city of the Jebusites. The temple and palace buildings were all inclosed in a wall of finished masonry which made it a fortified place by itself—as it appears to have been through Heb history—and these walls, where external to the rest of the city, formed part of the whole circle of fortification.

Although Solomon built so magnificent a house for Jeh, he erected in the neighborhood shrines to other local gods (1 K 11 7-8), a lapse ascribed largely to the influence of his foreign wives and consequent foreign alliances.

The disruption of the kingdom must have been a severe blow to Jerus, which was left the capital, no longer of a united state, but of a petty tribe. The resources which were at the command of the new king were insufficient to complete the building up of the city; as soon as Jeroboam's avowed policy, while the long state of war which existed between the two peoples—a state lasting 60 years (1 K 14: 20; 16: 6-16; 22: 44)—must have been very injurious to the growth of commerce and the arts of peace.

In the 5th year of Rehoboam (928), Shishak (Sheshonk) king of Egypt came up against Jerusalem (1 K 14: 25 ff) and took the fenced cities of Judah (2 Ch 12: 4 AV). It has been commonly supposed that he besieged and captured Jerusalem itself, but there is no account of the destruction of fortifications and as the name of this city has not been deciphered upon the Egyptian records of this campaign, it is as consistent as is consistent with the Scriptural references, that Shishak was bought off with “the treasures of the house of Jehush and the treasures of the king’s house” and “all the shields of gold which Solomon had made” (1 K 14: 28).

It is clear that by the reign of Jehoshaphat the city had again largely recovered its importance (cf 1 K 22), but in his son Jehoram’s reign (849-842 BC) Judah was invaded and the royal house was pillaged by Aram of Damascus and was wounded in his chariot near Beth-horon and expiring at Bethel he was carried to Jerusalem and there buried (2 K 9: 27-28). Jerus was now the scene of the dramatic events which center round the usurpation and death of Queen Athaliah (2 K 11: 16; 2 Ch 23: 15) and the coronation and reforms of her grandson Joash (2 K 12: 1-16; 2 Ch 24: 1-14). After the death of the good priest Jehoiada, it is recorded (2 Ch 24: 15 ff) that the king was led astray by the princes of Judah and forsook the house of Jeh, as a consequence of which the Syrians under Hazael came against Judah and slew the princes and spoiled the land, Joash giving him much treachery from both palace and temple (2 K 12: 17-18; 2 Ch 24: 23). Finally Joash was assassinated (2 K 12: 20-31; 2 Ch 24: 25) “at the house of Millo, on the way that goeth down to Silla.”

During the reign of Amaziah (787-770 BC), the murdered king’s son, a victory over Edom appears to have so alarmed the king that he wantonly challenged Jehoash of Israel to battle (2 K 14: 8). The two armies met at Beth-shemesh, and Jehu was defeated and “fled every man to his tent.” Jerus was unable to offer any resistance to the victors, and Jehoash “brake down the wall of Jerus from the gate of Ephaum unto the corner gate, 400 cubits” and then returned to Samaria, loaded with plunder and hostages (ver 14).

Fifteen years later, Amaziah was assassinated at Lachish whither he had fled from a conspiracy; nevertheless they brought his body upon horses, and he was buried in Jerus.

Doubltless it was a reminiscence of the humiliation which his father had undergone which made Uzziah (Azariah) strengthen his position.

13. Uzziah’s iron. He subdued the Philis and the Refortification of Arabs in Gér, and put the Ammonites to tribute (2 Ch 26: 7-8). He built towers in Jerusalem at the corner gate, and at the valley gate, and at the turnings (LXX) of the walls, and fortified them” (ver 9).

14. Hazael’s alliance with kings of Syria and Israel (2 K 16 Assyria 5:6); but Hazael, feeling the weakness of his little kingdom, bought with silver and gold from the house of Jeh the alliance of Tiglath-pileser, king of Assyria. He met the king at Damascus and paid him a compliment by having an altar similar to his made for his own ritual in the temple (vs 10-12). His reign is darkened by a record of heathen practices, and specially by his making “his sons pass through the fire” as a human sacrifice in, apparently, the Valley of Hinom (1 K 16: 3-4; cf 2 Ch 28: 3).

15. Hezekiah (737-699 BC), his son, succeeded to the kingdom at a time of surpassing danger. Samaria, and with it the last of Israel’s kingdoms, had fallen. Assyria had with diiih’s great cullt been bought off, the people were largely apostate, yet Jerus was never so great a nation of the time to trouble the foes of Israel (Isa 7: 4 f; 8: 10-15; 20: 4). Early in his reign, the uprising of the Chaldaean Merodach-baladan against Assyria relieved Judah of her greatest danger, and Hezekiah entered into friendly relations with his new king of Babylon, showing his messengers all his treasures (Isa 39: 1-2). At this time or soon after, Hezekiah appears to have undertaken great works in fitting his capital for the troublous times which lay before him. He sealed the waters of Gilbon and brought them within the city to prevent the kings of Assyria from getting access to them (2 K 20: 20; 2 Ch 32: 30). See Siloam.

It is certain, if their tunnel was to be of any use, the southwestern hill must have been enclos ed, and it is at least highly probable that in the account (2 Ch 32: 5), he “built up all the wall that was broken down, and built towers thereon [m], and the other wall without,” the last phrase may refer to the stretch of wall along the edge of the southwestern hill to Siloam. On the other hand, if that was the work of Solomon, “the other wall” may have been the great buttressed dam, with a wall across it which closed the mouth of the Tyropoen, which was an essential part of his scheme of preventing a besieging army from getting access to water. He also strengthened Millo (q.v.), on the southeastern hill. Secure in these fortifications, which made Jerus one of the strongest walled cities in Western Asia, Hezekiah, assisted, as we may learn from Sennacherib’s descriptions, by Arab mercenaries, was able to buy off the great Assyrian king and to keep his city inviolate (2 K 18: 13-16). A second threatened attack on the city appears to be referred to in 2 K 19: 9-37.

16. Hezekiah under siege. He removed the high places, and brake the pillars, and cut down the Asherah: and he brake in pieces the brazen serpent that Moses had made and . . . called it Nehushtan: . . . a pillar, (i.e., a pillar of brass). . . . Manasseh succeeded his father when but 12, and reigned 55 years (688-643) in Jerus (2 K 21: 1). He was tributary to Esarhaddon.
and Ashurbanipal, as we know from their inscriptions; in one of the latter's he is referred to as king "of the city of Judah." The king of Assyria who, it is said (2 Ch 33 11; cf. Ant, X, iii, 2), carried Manasseh in chains to Babylon, was probably Ashurbanipal. How thoroughly the country was penetrated by Assyrian influence is witnessed by the two cuneiform tablets recently found at Gezer belonging to this Assyrian monarch's reign (PEFS, 1905, 206, etc.).

The same influence, extending to the religious sphere, is seen in the record (2 K 21 5) that Manasseh "built altars for all the host of heaven in the two courts of the house of Jeh." There are other references to the idolatrous practices introduced by this king (cf. Jer 7 18; 2 K 23 5; 11.12, etc.). He also filled Jerusalem with the innocent blood of martyrs faithful to Jeh (2 K 21 16; cf Jer 19 4). Probably during this long reign of external peace the population of the city much increased, particularly by the influx of foreigners from less isolated regions. Of this king's improvements to the fortifications of Jerusalem we have the statement (2 Ch 33 14), "He built an outer wall, to the city of David, on the west side of Gihon in the valley, even to the entrance at the fish gate." This must have been a new or rebuilt wall for the whole eastern side of the city. He also compassed about the Ophel (q.v.) and raised it to a very great height.

Manasseh was the first of the Judaic kings to be buried away from the royal tombs. He was buried (as was his son Amon) "in the garden of his own house, in the garden of Uzza." This may be the tomb referred to (Ezk 33 12) as being near the temple precincts.

In the reign of Josiah was found the "Book of the Law," and the king in consequence instituted radical reforms (2 K 22 2, 3). Kidron smoked with the burning of the Asherah and of the vessels of Baal, and Religions Topheth in the Valley of Hinnom was destroyed. At length after a reign of 31 years (2 K 22 30), Josiah, in endeavoring to intercept Pharaoh-nechoh from combining with the king of Babylon, was defeated and slain at Megido and was buried "in his own sepulchre" in Jerusalem—in the same grave where his father and grandfather were buried. Jehoahaz, after a reign of but 3 months, was carried captive (2 K 23 34) by Nechoh to Egypt, where he died—and apparently was buried among strangers (Jer 22 10-12). His brother Eliakim, renamed Jehoiakim, succeeded. In the 41st year of his reign, Egypt was defeated at Carchemish by the Babylonians, and as a consequence Jehoiakim had to change from subjection to Egypt to that of Babylon (1 K 23 35 ff.). During this time Jeremiah was active preying in streets and courts of Jerusalem (5 1, etc.) the approaching ruin of the city, messages which were received with contempt and anger by the king and court (Jer 36 23). In consequence of his revolt against Babylon, bands of Chaldaeans, Syrians, Moabites and Ammonites came against him (2 K 24 2), and his death was ignominious (2 K 24 6; Jer 22 18,19).

His son Jehoiachin, who succeeded him, went out with all his household and surrendered to the approaching Nebuchadnezzar (597), and was carried to Babylon where he passed more than 37 years (2 K 25 27-30). Jerusalem was despoiled of all its treasures and all its important inhabitants. The king of Babylon's nominee, Zedekiah, after 11 years rebelled against him, and consequently Jerusalem was besieged for a year and a half until "famine was sore in the city." On the 9th of Ab all the men of war "fled by night by the way of the gate between two walls, which was by the king's garden," i.e. near the mouth of the Tyropoön, and the king "went by the way of the Arabah," but was overtaken and captured "in the plains of Jericho." A terrible punishment followed his faithlessness to Babylon (2 K 25 1-7). The city and the temple were despoiled and burnt; the walls of Jerusalem were broken down, and none but the poorest of the land "be to vinedressers and husbandmen were left behind (2 K 26 8 f.; 2 Ch 36 17 f.). It is probable that the ark was removed also at this time.

With the destruction of their city, the hopes of the best elements in Judah turned with longing to the thought of her restoration. It is possible that some of the remnant left in the land may have kept up some First Return semblance of the worship of Jeh at the temple-site. At length, however, Cyrus the Persian became master of the Bab empire, among many acts of a similar nature for the shrines of Assyry and Bab gods, he gave permission to Jews to return to rebuild the house of Jeh (Ezr 1 1 f.). Over 40,000 (Ezr 1, 2) under Sheshbak, prince of Judah (Ezr 1 8,11), governor of a province, returned, bringing with them the sacred vessels of the temple. The daily sacrifices were renewed and the feasts and fasts restored (3 3-7), and later the foundations of the restored temple were laid (5 16). The building was undertaken in consequence of the opposition of the people of the land and the Samaritans, the building was not completed until 20 years later (6 15).

The graphic description of the rebuilding of the walls of Jerusalem in 445 by Nehemiah gives us the fullest account we have of these fortifications at any ancient period. It is clear that Nehemiah set himself to restore the walls, as far as possible, in their ancient condition. The work was done hurriedly and under conditions of danger, half the workers being armed with swords, spears and bows to protect the others, and every workman was a soldier (Neh 4 13-16; 21). The rebuilding therefore was carried on by the Jews who had been left at all had not much of the material lain to hand in the piles of ruined masonry. Doubless the haste and limited resources resulted in a wall far weaker than that Nebuchadnezzar destroyed 142 years previously, but it followed the same outline and had the same general structure.

For the next 100 years we have scarcely any historical knowledge of Judah. A glimpse is afforded by the papyri of Elephantine, where we hear of an Ashinah community; and Governor in Upper Egypt petitioning Bagobi, the governor of Judaea, for permission to rebuild their own temple to Jeh in Egypt; incidentally they mention that they had already sent an unsuccessful petition to Johanan the high priest and his colleagues in Judah. In another document we gather that this petition to the Persian governor was granted. These documents must date about 411-407 BC. Later, probably about 390, we have somewhat ambiguous references to the destruction of Jerusalem and the capture of the Persians by Jews in the time of Artaxerxes (III) Ochus (358-337 BC).

With the battle of Issus and Alexander's Palestinian campaign (c 332 BC), we are upon super historical ground, though the details of the account (Ant, XI, viii, 4) of Alexander's visit to Jerusalem itself are considered of doubtful authenticity. After his death (323 BC), Ptolemy I divided his empire among his sons, and a part of it went to his brother, the Seleucid Antiochus. Each became in turn its suzerain, and indeed at one time the tribute appears to have been divided between them (Ant, XII, iv, 1).

In 321 Ptolemy Soter invaded Pal, and, it is said (Ant, XII, i, 1), captured Jerusalem by a ruse, entering the city on the Sabbath as if anxious to visit the temple. Whether or not this is true, he carried into captivity many of his Jewish prisoners to Egypt and settled them there. In the struggles between the contending monarchies, although Pal suffered, the capital itself, on account of its isolated position, remained undisturbed, under the suzerainty of Egypt. In 217 BC, Ptolemy IV Philopator, after his victory over Antiochus III at Raphia, visited the temple at Jerusalem and offered sacrifices; he is reported (3 Mac 1) to have entered the "Holy of Holies." The comparative prosperity of the city during the Ptolemaic period is witnessed to by Hecataeus of Abdera, who is quoted by Jos; he even puts the population of the city at 120,000, which is probably an exaggeration.

In length in 198, Antiochus III the Great having conquered Coele-Syria in the epoch-making battle at Banias, the Jews of their own accord went over to him and supplied him with provisions necessary for his victorious army. Antiochus himself assisted him in besieging the Egyptian garrison in the Akra (q.v.) (Ant, XII, iii, 3). Jos produces letters in which Antiochus records his gratification at the reception given him by the Jews and grants various privileges (ib.). We have an account of the prosperity of the city about this time (190-180 BC) by Jesus ben Sira in the Book of Eccles; it is a city of crowded life and manifold activities. He refers in glowing terms to the great high priest, Simon ben Onias (226-199 BC), who (Eccles 50 i-4) had repaired and fortified the temple and strengthened the walls against a siege. The letter of Aristobulus, dated probably at the close of this great man's life (c 200 BC), gives a similar picture. The city was surrounded by walls, 8 miles in circumference, and had 40 stations. The very considerable prosperity and religious liberty which the Jews had enjoyed under the Egyptians were soon menaced under the new ruler; the taxes were increased, and very soon fidelity to the tenets of Judaism came to be regarded as treachery to the Seleucid rule. Under Antiochus Epiphanes the Hellenization of the nation grew apace (2 Mac 4 9-12; Ant, XII, v, 1); at the request of the Hellenizing party a "place of Epiphanes" was erected in Jerusalem (1 Mac 1 14; 2 Mac 4 71). The Gymnasium was built and was soon thronged by young priests; the Gr hat—the ples定—became the fashionable headress in Jerus. The Hellenistic party, which was composed of the aristocracy, was so loud in its professed devotion to the king's wishes that it is not to be wondered at that Antiochus, who, on a visit to the city, had been received with rapturous greetings, became enthroned in it as the god of the city. The actual open rupture began when tidings reached Antiochus, after a victorious though politically barren campaign against his enemies in Egypt, that his brother had risen in his behalf on the throne of Ptolemy. Jason, the renegade high priest, who had been hiding across the Jordan, had, on the false report of the death of Antiochus, suddenly returned and proclaimed himself king of the city. On this the Akra remained to Syria, and this was crowned with Menelaus and those of his followers who had escaped the sword of Jason. Antiochus lost no time; he hastened (170 BC) against Jerusalem with a great army, captured the city, massacred the people and despoiled the temple (1 Mac 1 20-24; Ant, XII, v, 3). Two years later Antiochus, balked by Rome in Egypt (Polyb. xix, 27; Livy xlv, 12), appears to have determined that in Jerusalem, at any rate, he would carry through among the Jews the religious reformation he had inaugurated in Egypt. He sent his chief collector of tribute (1 Mac 1 29), who attacked the city with strong force and, by means of of 168 BC, stratagem, entered it (ver 30). After he had despoiled it, he set it on fire and pulled down both dwellings and walls. He massacred the men, and many of the women and children he sold as slaves (1 Mac 1 31-35; 2 Mac 5 24). He sacrificed swine (or at least a sow) upon the holy altar, and caused the high priest to be slain. (Ant, XII, v, 4.) In everything he favored, in conjunction with the strong Hellenizing party, to organize Jerusalem as a Gr city, and to secure his position he built a strong wall, and a great tower for the Akra, and, having furnished it well with armor and victuals, he left his son, Antiochus IV Epiphanes (q.v.), there. But the Syrians had overreached themselves this time, and the reaction against persecution and attempted religious suppression produced the great uprising of the Maccabeans.

The defeat and retirement of the Syrian commander Lysias, followed by the death of Antiochus Epiphanes, led to an entire reversal of policy on the part of the Council of the Syriac party. The boy-king, Antiochus V, a general and Rebellions amnesty was granted, with leave to restore the temple-worship in its ancestral forms. The following year (165 BC) Judas Maccabeus found "the sanctuary desolate, and the altar profaned, the gates burned up, and shrubs growing in the courts of the temple; the priests' chambers pulled down" (1 Mac 4 38). He at once saw to the reconstruction of the altar and restored the temple-services, an event celebrated ever after as the "Feast of the Dedication" or Hanukkah (1 Mac 4 52-59; 2 Mac 10 11-11; Ant, XII, vii, 7; cf Jn 10 22). Judas also "built up the Temple of Mt. Zion," i.e. the temple-hill, making it a fortress with "high walls and strong towers round about," and set a garrison in it (1 Mac 4 41-61). The Hellenizing party suffered in the reaction, and the Syrian garrison in the Akra, Syria's one hold on Judaea, was soon invested, but after the defeat of Judas Maccabaeus in 163 BC the Syrian armies in the open, he could not and Capture exped this garrison. In 163 BC a great of the City Syrian army, with a camel corps and many elephants, came to the relief of the hard-pressed garrison. Lysias, accompanied by the boy-king, he poor Antiochus, who had arrived in his behalf on the throne of Judah, and destroyed the fortifications (1 Mac 6 34).
62. But even in this desolate state Judas and his followers were saved. A certain pretender, Philip, raised a rebellion in a distant part of the empire, and Lysias was obliged to patch up a truce with the nationalist Jews more favorable to Judas than before his defeat; the garrison in the Akra remained, however, to remind the Jews that they were not independent. In 161 BC another Syrian general, Nicanor, was sent against Judas, but he was at first won over to friendship and when, later, at the instigation of the Hellenistic party, he was compelled to attack Judas, he did so with haste, raised levies and was defeated at Adasa, a little N. of Jerusalem. Judas was, however, not long suffered to celebrate his triumph. A month later Baccidus appeared before Jerusalem, and in April, 161, Judas was slain in battle with him at Berea. The Roman garrison was 37 BC.

35. His Death (161 BC) was garrisoned by Syrians; nevertheless, by 152, Jonathan, Judas' brother, who was residing at Michmas, was virtual ruler of the land, and by astute negotiation between Demetrius and Alexander, the rival claimants to the throne of Antioch, Jonathan gained more than any of his family had ever done. He was appointed high priest and strategos, or deputy for the king, in Judaea. He repaired the city and restored the temple-fortress with squared stones (1 Mac 10.10–11). He made the walls higher and built up a great part of the eastern wall which had been destroyed and 'repaired that which was called Haphenatha' (1 Mac 12.36–37; Ant. XIII, v, ii); he also made a great mound between the Akra and the city to isolate the Syrian garrison (ib.).

36. Jonathan's Restoration (134 BC) Simon, who succeeded Jonathan, finally captured the Akra in 139, and, according to Jos (Ant., XIII, vi, 7), not only destroyed it, but partially leveled the very hill on which it stood (see, however, 1 Mac 14.30–37). John Hyrcanus I, 5 years later (134 BC), was besieged in Jerusalem by Antiochus Sidetes (134 BC) in the 4th year of his reign; during the siege the Syrian king rased 100 towers each 3 stories high against the northern wall. Possibly these may subsequent have been used for the foundations of the second wall. Antiochus was finally bought off by the giving of hostages and by heavy tribute, which Hyrcanus is said to have obtained by opening the sepulcher of the kings, 'Nevertheless the king broke down the fortifications that encompassed the city' (Ant., XIII, vii, 2–4).

During the more prosperous days of the Hasmonean rulers, several important buildings were erected. In the first place there was a great vane on the western (southwestern) hill overlooking the temple (Ant., XX, viii, 11), and connected with it at one time by means of a bridge across the Tyropoeon, and on the northern side of the temple citadel—which may (see VIII, 7 above) have been the successor of one here in pre-Cotton times—known as the Baris; this, later on, Herod enlarged into the Antonia (Ant., XV, xi, 4; BJ, V, v, 8).

In consequence of the quarrel of the later Hasmonean princes, further troubles fell upon the city. In 65 BC, Hyrcanus II, under the Roman intervention of Syllabus, who overcame his brother (Ant., XIV, ii, 1–5). Ten years later (63 BC) Pompey, having been met by the ambassadors of both parties, bearing presents, as well as of the Pharisees, came himself to compose the quarrel of the rival factions, and, being shut out of the city, took it by storm. He entered the "Holy of Holies," but left the temple treasures in the city unharmed. The walls of the city were subsequently demolished; Hyrcanus II was reinstated as high priest, but Aristobulus was carried off to Rome, and the city surrendered as a tributary to the Roman Empire (Ant., XIV, iv, 1–4; BJ, I, vii, 1–7). The Syrian proconsul, M. Lucinius Crassus, going upon his expedition against the Parthians in 55 BC, carried off from the temple the money which Pompey had left (Ant., XIV, vii, 1). The following year (67 BC) the temple had lain in ruins for 10 years had been gaining power as a self-appointed adviser to the weak Hyrcanus, was made a Roman citizen and appointed procurator in return for very meagre services which he had undertaken to render to Julius Caesar.

37. Surrender of Jerusalem to Antiochus Sidetes (134 BC) was besieged in Jerusalem by Antiochus Sidetes in the 4th year of his reign; during the siege the Syrian king razed 100 towers each 3 stories high against the northern wall. Possibly these may subsequent have been used for the foundations of the second wall. Antiochus was finally bought off by the giving of hostages and by heavy tribute, which Hyrcanus is said to have obtained by opening the sepulcher of the kings, 'Nevertheless the king broke down the fortifications that encompassed the city' (Ant., XIII, vii, 2–4).

40. Pompey's Storm of the Jerusalem Temple (52–50 BC) was taken by storm and the Parthians in 55 BC, carried off from the temple the money which Pompey had left (Ant., XIV, vii, 1). The following year (67 BC) the temple had lain in ruins for 10 years had been gaining power as a self-appointed adviser to the weak Hyrcanus, was made a Roman citizen and appointed procurator in return for very meagre services which he had undertaken to render to Julius Caesar.

41. Julius Caesar appointed procurator in return for very meagre services which he had undertaken to render to Julius Caesar.

42. Parthian and Barzapharnes captured and plundered Jerusalem (Ant., XIV, xiv, 3, 4) and reestablished Antigonus (BJ, i, xiii, 13). Herod, removed his tribe to Massada and, having been appointed king of Judaea by Antony, returned, after various adventures, in 37 BC. Assisted by Sosibius, the Roman proconsul, he took Jerusalem after a 5 months' siege by the promise of liberal reward he restrained the soldiers from sacking the city (Ant., XIV, xvi, 2–3).

During the reign of this great monarch Jerusalem assumed a magnificence surpassing that of all other ages.

43. Reign of Herod the Great (37–4 BC) rebuilt the fortress to the N. of the temple—the ancient Baris—on a great scale with 4 towers, the western one renamed it the Antonia in honor of his patron. He celebrated games in a new theater, and constructed a hippodrome (BJ, II, iii, 1) or amphitheater (Ant., XV, viii, 1). He must necessarily have strengthened and repaired the walls, but such work was done by the 4 great towers which he erected, Hippicus, Phasael and Mariamne, near the present Jaffa—a fortified tower, and the lofty octagonal tower, Psephinus, farther to the N.W. The development of Herod's plans for the reconstruction of the temple was commenced in 19 BC, but they were not completed till 64 AD (Jn 2:20; Mt 21:1.2; Lk 21:5.6). The sanctuary itself was built by 1,980 specially trained priests within a space of 18 months (11–10 BC). The conception was magnificent, and resulted in a mass of buildings of size and beauty far surpassing anything that had stood there before. Practically nothing of the older structures and some of the earlier modifications of the temple-enclosure now surviving in connection with the Haram belong to this period. In 4 BC—the year of the Nativity—occurred the disturbances following upon the destruction of the Golden Eagle which Herod had erected over the great gate of the temple, and shortly afterward Herod died, having previously shut up many of the leading Jews in the hippodrome with orders that they should be slain when he passed away (BJ, I, xxxii, 6). The accession of Archelaus was signalized by Passover riots which ended in the death of 3,000, an after-result of the affair of the Golden Eagle.

45. Herod

Archelaus, by mismanagement and greed, raised the city about his ears, and the next Passover was celebrated by a massacre, street fighting and open robbery. Varus, the governor of Syria, who had hastened to the help of his subordinate, suppressed the rebellion with ruthless severity and crucified 2,000 Jews. Archelaus returned shortly afterward as ethnarch, an office which he retained until his exile in 6 AD. During the procuratorship of Coponius (6–10 AD) another Passover riot occurred in consequence of the aggravating conduct of some Samaritans.

During the procuratorship of Pontius Pilate (29–37 AD) there were several disturbances, culminating in a riot consequent upon his taking some of the "corban" or sacred offerings of the temple for the construction of an aqueduct (Ant, XVIII, iii, 2)—probably part at least of the "low-level aqueduct" (see VII, 15, above). Herod Agrippa I inclosed the suburbs, which had grown up N. of the second wall and of the temple, by what Jos calls the "Third Wall" (see V, above).

His son, King Agrippa, built—about 56 AD—a large addition to the old Hasmonean palace, from which he could overlook the temple area. This act was a cause of offence to the Jews who built a wall on the western boundary of the Inner Court to shut off his view. In the quarrel which ensued the Jews were successful in gaining the support of Nero (Ant, XX, viii, 11). In 64 AD the long rebuilding of the temple-courts, which had been begun in 19 BC, was concluded. The 18,000 workmen thrown out of employment appear to have been given "unemployed work" in "paving the city with white stone" (Ant, XX, ix, 6–7).

Finally the long-smouldering discontent of the Jews against the Romans burst forth into open rebellion under the incompetent Gessius Florus, 66 AD (Ant, XX, xi, 1). Palaces and public buildings were fired by the enraged multitude, and after but two days' siege, the Antonia itself was captured, set on fire and its garrison slain (BJ, II, xvii, 6–7). Cestius Gallus, hastening from Syria, was soon engaged in a siege of the city. The third wall was captured and the suburb BEZETHA (q.v.) burnt, but, when about to renew the attack on the second wall, Gallus appears to have been seized with panic, and his partial withdrawal developed into an inglorious retreat in which he was pursued by the Jews down the pass to the Beth-horons as far as Antipatris (BJ, II, xix).

This victory cost the Jews dearly in the long run, as it led to the campaign of Vespasian and the eventual crushing of all their national hopes. Vespasian commenced the conquest in the north, and advanced by slow and certain steps. Being recalled to Rome as emperor in the midst of Titus (70 AD) was soon engaged in a siege of the city. The third wall was captured and the suburb BEZETHA (q.v.) burnt, but, when about to renew the attack on the second wall, Gallus appears to have been seized with panic, and his partial withdrawal developed into an inglorious retreat in which he was pursued by the Jews down the pass to the Beth-horons as far as Antipatris (BJ, II, xix).

49. The City Be-

None of the many calamities which had happened to the city are to be compared with this terrible siege. In none had the city been so magnificent, its fortifications so powerful, its population so crowded. It was Passover time, but, in addition to the crowds assembled for this event, vast numbers had hurried there, flying from the advancing Roman army. The loss of life was enormous; refugees to Titus gave 600,000 as the number dead (BJ, V, xiii, 7), but this seems incredible. The total population today within the walls cannot be more than 20,000, and the total population of modern Jerus, which covers a far greater area than that of those days, cannot at the most liberal estimate exceed 80,000. Three times this, or, a quarter of a million, seems incredible, and many would place the numbers at far less.

The siege commenced on the 14th of Nisan, 70 AD, and ended on the 8th of Elul, a total of 134 days. The enemy were divided into two internal factions. Simon held the upper and lower cities; John of Gischala, the temple and "Ophel"; the Idumaeans, introduced by the Zealots, fought only for themselves, until they relieved the city of their terrors. Yet another party, too weak to make its counsels felt, was for peace with Rome, a policy which, if taken in time, would have found in Titus a spirit of reason and mercy. The miseries of the siege and the destruction of life and property were at least as much the work of the Jews themselves as of their conquerors. On the 15th day of the siege the third wall (Agrippa's), which had been but hastily finished upon the approach of the Romans, was captured; the second wall was finally taken on the 24th day; on the 72d day the Antonia fell, and 12 days later the daily sacrifice ceased. On the 105th day—the ominous 9th of Ab—the temple and the lower temple area were burnt, and the last day found the whole city in flames. Only the destruction of the three great towers of Herod, Hip-city picus, Pharasz and Marianne, with the western walls, were spared to protect the camp of the Xth Legion to guard the site, and "in order to demonstrate to posterity what kind of city it was and how well fortified"; the rest of the city was dug up to its foundations (BJ, VII, i, 1).

60 years after its capture silence reigns over Jerus. We know that the site continued to be garrisoned, but it was not to any extent rebuilt. In 130 AD it was visited by Hychs, who found but few buildings standing. Two years later (152–53 AD) occurred the last great rebellion of the Jews in the form of Bar-Cochba ("son of a star"), who was encouraged by the suppression of this last effort for freedom by Julius Severus. The remaining traces of Judaism were stamped out, and it is even said (Talmud, T. Jerusalem, 7a) that the very site of the temple was ploughed up by T.
Rufus. An altar of Jupiter was placed upon the temple-site, and Jews were excluded from Jerusalem on pain of death.

53. Hadrian Builds the Second Temple

Hadrian rebuilt the city, giving it the name Capitolina. Some have supposed that it was probably determined by the southern slope of the hill, and that the site of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was transferred. At all events, it is certain that the temple walls were abandoned, and that the site of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus was transferred. The temple was built on the site of the temple of Jupiter, which was destroyed by the Romans.

54. Constantinople Builds the Church of the Holy Sepulchre

Constantine, the emperor, built the Church of the Holy Sepulchre on the site of the temple of Jupiter. The church was built on the site of the temple of Jupiter, which was destroyed by the Romans.

55. The Church of the Holy Sepulchre

The church was built on the site of the temple of Jupiter, which was destroyed by the Romans.

56. Justinian Rebuilds the Walls of Jerusalem

The emperor Justinian, who was perhaps the greatest of the Christian emperors, rebuilt the walls of Jerusalem. The walls were rebuilt on the site of the temple of Jupiter, which was destroyed by the Romans.

57. The City of Jerusalem

In 1620, the city of Jerusalem was conquered by the Persians. The city was destroyed, and the walls were knocked down.

58. The Seljuk Turks and Their Cruelties

The Seljuk Turks, under the leadership of the sultan, conquered the city in 1382. They were followed by the Mongols, who conquered the city in 1240.
tion, and are worthy represented by several handsome buildings, e.g. the Protestant "Church of the Redeemer," built on the site and on the ground plan of a fine church belonging to the Knights of St. John, the new (Roman Catholic) Church of the Dormition on "Mount Zion," with an adjoining Benedictine convent, a very handsome Roman Catholic hospice outside the Damascus Gate, the Kaiserin Augusta Victoria Sanatorium on the Mount of Olives, the Bulgarian Church, and the "Bottom of the city, a large general hospital and a leper hospital, a consulate and two large schools. In influence, both secular and religious, the Germans have rapidly gained ground in the last 2 decades. British influence has much diminished, relatively. The British Ophthalmic Hospital, belonging to the "Order of the Knights of St. John," the Eng. Mission Hospital, belonging to the London Jewish Society, the Bishop's School and Eng. College connected with the Church Missionary Society. 3 Anglican churches, of which the handsome St. George's Collegiate Church adjoins the residence of the Anglican Bishop, and a few small schools comprise the extent of public buildings connected with British societies. France and the Roman Catholic church are worthy represented by the Dominican monastery and seminary connected with the handsome church of St. Stephen—rebuilt on the plan of an old Christian church—by the Batisbon (Jesuit) Schools, the Hospital of St. Louis, the hospice and Church of St. Augustine, and the monastery and seminary of the "white fathers" or Frères de la mission algérienne, whose headquarters center round the beautifully restored Church of St. Anne. Not far from here are the convent and school of the Sœurs de Sion, at the Ecce Homo Church. Also inside the walls near the New Gate is the residence of the Lat Patriarch—a cardinal of the Church of Rome—with a church, the school of the Frères de la doctrine chrétienne, and the schools, hospital and convent of the Franciscans, who are recognized among their confreres as the "parish priests" in the city, having been established there longer than the numerous other orders.

All the various nationalities are under their respective consuls and enjoy extra-territorial rights. Besides the Turkish post-office, which is very insufficiently managed, the Austrians, Germans, French, Russians, and Italians all have post-offices open to all, with special "Levant" stamps. The American mail is delivered at the American post-office. There are four chief banks, French, German, Ottoman, and Anglo-Pale (Jewish). As may be supposed, on account of the demand for land for Jewish settlements or for Christian schools or convents, the price of such property has increased rapidly and considerably in recent years all owners of land—and Moslems have not been slow to copy the foreigners—have been token to inclosing their property with high and unpleasing walls, greatly spoiling both the walls around the city and the prospects from many points of view. The increased development of carriage traffic has led to considerable dust in the dry season, and mud in winter, as the roads are very soft limestones. The Jerusalem-Jaffa Railway (a Fr. company), 54 miles long, which was opened in 1892, has steadily increased its traffic year by year, and is now a considerable revenue, there is no public water-supply, and no public sewers for the new Jewish settlement. In the Rami, by choice of a town with ill-constructed mediaeval sewer, which opens just below the Jewish settlement in the Kidron and runs down the Wady en N自然界, is one of the most unhealthy of all, and the trans and electric lights for the streets, are all much-talked of improvements. There are numerous hotels, besides extensive accommodations in the religious hos-pices, and no less than 15 hospitals and asylums.

LITERATURE.—This is enormous, but of very unequal value and much of it out of date. For all purposes the best book of reference is Jesus from the Earliest Times to AD 70, 2 vols., by Principal G. A. Smith. It contains references to all the lit. It is impossible for the present writer adequately to express its indebtedness, and no attempt at acknowledgment in detail has been made in this art. In supplement of the above, Jerus. by Dr. Selah Morrill, and Jerus in Bible Times, by Professor Lewis H. Passan, will be found useful. The latter is a condensed account, esp. valuable for its illustrations and its copious references. Of the arts in the recent Bible Dictionaries, that by Conder in HDB is perhaps the most valuable. Of guide-books, Besekker's Guide to Pal and Syria (1911), by Sochin and Benzinger, and Barnabe Meitmann's (R.C.) New Guide to the Holy Land (1900), will be found useful; also Hanauer's Walks about Jerus. have come into being. The picture is drawn from a twofold view: (1) the new Jerusalem is a restoration of Paradise (21:6, 22:1.14); it is also the ideal of the theocracy realized (21:3.12.14.22). The latter viewpoint explains the peculiar representation that the city descends "out of heaven from God" (21:2.10), which characterizes it, as, on one hand, a product of God's supernatural workmanship, and as, on the other hand, the culmination of the historic process of redemption. In other NT passages, where the theocratic point of view is less prominent, the antitypical Jerusalem appears as having its seat in heaven instead of as, here coming down from heaven to earth (cf Gal 4:26; Heb 11:10; 12:22). See also Revelation of John.

Jerusha, jē-rōo’sha (יְרוּשַׁא, yērōshā), "taken possession of," i.e. "married": In 2 K 15:33 = "Jerushah" (יְרֵוְשָּׁא, yēreshā-sha, same meaning) of 2 Ch 27:1, the mother of King Josiah of Judah. Zadok was her father's name; he may be the priest of 1 Ch 6:12 (Heb 5:35).

Jeshaiah, jē-shā’-ya, jē-shā’-a (יְשָׁיָע, yēshā’-yā), a Levite ancestor of Shelemoth, one of David's treasurers (1 Ch 26:25).

Jesharaiav (יְשָׁרָיָא, yēshā’rikā), a descendant of Elam; he went with Ezra from Babylon to Jerusalem (Ezr 8:7) = "Jesira" (RV), "Josias" (AV), 1 Esd 8:33.

Jeshua (יְשָׁוָע, yēshā’u), a Levite of the sons of Merari and a contemporary of Ezra (Ezr 8:19) = "Osnias" of 1 Esd 8:48.

Jeshua, jē-shā’-a, jē-shā’- a (יְשָׁוָע, yēshā’u), Jeh is deliverance or opulence: (1) AV "Jeshua," head of the 9th course of priests, possibly of "the house of Jeshua" (1 Ch 26:11; Ezr 2:26; Neh 7:30).

(2) A Levite of Hesekiah's time (2 Ch 31:15).

(3) Son of Jozadak = Joshua the high priest (Ezr 2:2; 3:28; 4:3; 4:5; 5:2; 10:18; Neh 7:7; 12:17.10.26); see Joshua (4) = "Jesus" (1 Esd 5:48 and Sir 49:12).

(4) A man of Pahath-moab, some of whose descendants returned from Babylon to Jerusalem with Zerubbabel (Ezr 2:6; Neh 7:11) = "Jesus" (1 Esd 5:8).

(5) Head of a Levitical house which had oversight of the workmen in the temple (Ezr 4:20; 3:9; Neh 7:43). He is mentioned again in Neh 8:7 as taking part in explaining the Torah to the people, in 9:1 (cf 12:8) as leading in the worship, and in 10:9 (Heb 10) as sealing the covenant; this J. is called son of Azaniah (Neh 10:9). To these references should be added probably Neh 24, where commentators read, "Jeshua, Binnui, Kadmiel" for "Jeshua the son of Kadmiel." Perhaps Jozabad (Ezr 8:33) is a 'son' of the same Jeshua; cf Ezr 8:33 = 1 Esd 8:63, where AV is "Jesus," RV "Jesus." He is the same as Jessua (AV), Jesus (RV) (1 Esd 5:26).

(6) Father of Ezer, a repairer of the wall (Neh 3:19).

(7) Joshua, son of Nun (Neh 8:17) (q.v.).

Jeshua, jē-shā’-a, jē-shā’- a (יְשָׁוָע, yēshā’u), a place occupied by the children of Judah after their return from captivity (Neh 11:26), evidently, from the places named with it, in the extreme S. of Judah. It may correspond with the Shema of Josh 15:26, and possibly to the Sheba of 19 2. The site may be Khirbet Sâ‘wèh, a ruin on a prominent hill, Tell es Sâ‘wèh, 12 miles E.N.E. of Beersheba. The hill is surrounded by a wall of large blocks of stone. PEF, III, 400-10, 5h XXV.

JESURUN, jē-shù′rûn, jē-shû′rûn (גֶּשֶׁר, “upright one”), Dt 32 15; 33 5; Isa. 44 2): LXX τρίτον “the beloved one” (ὕπατος, ἐγαπόμενος, the perf. part. passive of ἀγαπάω), and in LXX “David, dux populi.” Vulg. has διστατίσσω in 32 15, elsewhere rectissimus; Ac. Symm., Theod., have “upright.” For the form, Duhm compares נַעַלְתָם, Zebulun. (1) The name used to be explained as a diminutive form, a pet name, and some, e.g. Cornill, Schulte (OT Theol., ET, 11, 29, n.12) still explain it so, “the righteous little people.” But there is no evidence that the ending -שׂ had a diminutive force. (2) Most moderns take it as a poetical or ideal title of Israel, derived from נַעַל, yəshāh, “upright;” it is held to contain a tacit reference to the word Israel (יִשְׂרָאֵל, yisra‘ēl), of which the first three consonants are almost the same as those of “Jeshurun;” in Nu 23 10 the term “the righteous one” (יִשְׂרָאֵל, yisra‘ēl) is supposed to contain a similar reference. Most commentators compare also to the Book of Jashar,” and it has been held that “Jashar” is synonymous by a name by which Israel is called. See JASHAR.

Following Bacher (ZATW, 1885, 101 ff), commentators hold that in Isa this new name, a coinage due to the author of Second Isaiah and adopted in Dt, stands in contrast to Jacob, “the supplanter,” as his name was explained by the Hebrews of Hos 12 2-4. Israel is here given a new name, “the upright, pious one,” and with the new name goes a new chance in life, to live up to its meaning. Driver (Dt, 361) says that in Dt 32 15 “where the context is of declension from its ideal [it is] applied reprooffully. ‘Nomen Rrecti pro Israele ponens, ironica eos perstringit qui rectitudine defeecerant’ (Calv.). Elsewhere it is used as a title of honor.” AV has “Jesurun” in Isa 44 25.

JESIAH, jē-si′a (1 Ch 23 20 AV). See ISHIAH.

JESIAS, jē-i′as (Iézias, Iesias; AV JOSIAH [1 Esd 8 38]): Corresponding to Jeshiah, son of Athaliah (Ezk 8 7).

JESIMIEL, jē-sîm′i-el (יִשְׁמִיאֵל, yishmî‘ēl, “God establishes”): A prince of Simeon (1 Ch 4 36).

JESSE, jēs′ē (יְסֵי, yēsēyāh, meaning doubtful; according to Gesenius it = "wealthy;" Olshausen, Gram., §§ 277 f, conjectures יׇשֶּי, yěshēyāh, "Jeh exis;" Wellhausen [1 S 14 49] explains it as יְסֵי, yēsēyāh, "b'ghtshay [see ANISHIAH]; Jershiai, Jershiai, Ruth 4 17 22; 1 S 16 17; 17 28; 25 10; 1 S 20 1; 23 1; 1 K 12 16; 1 Ch 10 14; 12 18; Ps 22 50; Isa 11 10 [—Rom 15 12]; Mt 1 5:6; Acts 13 22): Son of Obed, grandson of Boaz, and father of King David. The grouping of the references to J. in 1 S is buttressed up with that of the groups of the whole narrative of David and Saul. See SAMUEL, BOOKS OF. There seem to be three main veins in the narrative, so far as J. is concerned.

(1) In 1 S 16 1-13, where J. is called the Bethlehemite. Samuel is sent to seek among J.’s sons a successor to Saul.

Both Samuel and J. fail to discern at first Jehel’s choice, Samuel thinking that he would be the eldest son (ver 6), while J. had not thought it worth while to call the youngest to the feast (ver 11).

(2) In 1 S 16 14-23, Saul is mentally disturbed, and is advised to get a harpist. David “the son of J. the Bethlehemite” is recommended by a courtier, and Saul sends to J. for David.

“And J. took ten leavens [so emend and translate, and not as RV, ‘an ass laden with bread’] in a bottle of wine, and a kid, and sent them” to Saul as a present with David, who becomes a courtier of Saul’s with his father’s consent.

(b) The next mention of J. is in three contemporaneous references by Saul to David as “the son of J.,” in 20 27.30.31, part of the quarrel-scene between Saul and Jonathan. (But it is not quite certain if ch 20 belongs to the same source as 16 14-23.)

In answer to the first reference, Jonathan calls his friend “David,” and Saul repeats the phrase “the son of J.,” abusing Jonathan personally (ver 30, where the meaning is uncertain). The reference to David as “the son of J.” here and in the following verse is contemptuous, not because of any reproach that might attach itself to J., but, as Budd remarks, because “an upstart is always contemptuously referred to under his father’s name” in courts and society. History repeats itself.

(c) Further references of a like kind are in the passage, 22 6-23, vis. in vs 7.8.13 by Saul, and repeated by Doeg in ver 9.

(d) The final one of this group is in 25 10, where Nahal sarcastically asks “Who is David? and who is the son of J.?”

(3) The parts of 17-18 5 which are omitted by LXX B, i.e. 17 12-13, 45-6.55-18 6. Here J. is mentioned as “an Ephrathite of Bethlehem-judah” (ver 12, not “that” “Ephrathite, which is a grammatically impossible tr of the MT), Ephrath or Ephrathah being another name for Bethlehem, or rather for the district. He is further said to have eight sons (ver 12), of whom the three eldest had followed Saul to the war (ver 13).

J. sends David, the shepherd, to his brothers with provisions (ver 17). Afterward David, on being brought to Saul and asked who he is, answers, “I am the son of thy servant J. the Bethlehemite” (ver 58). J. is also described (ver 12) as being “in the days of Saul an old man, advanced in years” (so emend and translate, not as RV, ‘stricken in years among men’). The mention of his having 8 sons in ver 12 is not in agreement with 1 Ch 2 13-15, which gives only 7 sons with 2 sisters, but where 8yrs gives 8, adding, from 27 18. Elimi which MT has there probably by corruption (Calv., Ch. 89).

1 S 14 10 should be τρίτον “J. and his seven sons to pass before Samuel” (not as RV, “three of J.’s sons”) as a wrong inference from 16 10; (c) the names of the 3 eldest in 16 10, 14; (d) ver 14; 12 he then changes 16 and reads 12; (12) “Now D. was the son of an Ephrathite of Bethlehem-Judah, whose name was J., who was .... (years) old at the time of Saul. (15) And the 3 eldest sons of J. had marched with Saul to the war, (14) and David was the youngest. (15) and David had remained to feed his father’s sheep at Bethlehem. (16) Now the Philis came,” etc.

According to all these narratives in 1 S, whether all 3 are entirely independent of one another or not, J. had lived in Bethelm, probably outside of the town wall, like Boaz (see BOAZ) his grandfather (Ruth 4 17). In 22 34 David intrusts his father and mother to the care of the king of Moab, but from 20 29 some have inferred that J. was dead (although most critics assign 22 3 at any rate to the same stratum as ch 20).

Jonathan tells Saul that David wanted to attend a family sacrificial feast at Bethlehem (20 29). MT reads, "and he, my brother, has commanded me," i.e. "the members of the clan, as we have read further on in the verse," "Let me go away," no other verb, and see my brethren." As J.'s daughters, see ARIELAH, NAAMAH.

(4) Of the other references to J., the most noteworthy is that in 11 1: “There shall come forth a shoot out of the stock of Jesse, and a branch out of his roots shall bear fruit," i.e. out of Jesse's roots (cf. Rev 5:5).

"Why J. and not David?" asks Duhm; and he answers, "Because the Messiah will be a second David, rather than a descendant of David." Marti explains it to mean that he will be, not from David, but from a collateral line of descent. Duhm's explanation suggests a parallelism between David and Christ, of whom the former may be treated as a type similar to Aaron and Melchizedek in He. Saul might pour contempt upon "the son of J.," but Isaiah has given J. here a name above all Heb names, and thus does Providence mock "society." See also Root of Jesse.

JESTING, jest'ing: Used from Tindale down as the tr of ερπανα, eutrapelia (Eph 5:4). Aristotle uses the original in his Ethics iv.14 as an equivalent of quick-witted, from its root meaning "something easily turned," adding that, since the majority of people love excessive jesting, the word is apt to be degraded. This is the case here, where it clearly has a flavor of the coarse or licentious.

Jesus Christ: The Founder of the Christian religion; the promised Messiah and Saviour of the world; the Lord and Head of the Christian church.

1. The Names.—(1) "Jesus" (Iēsus) is the Gr equivalent of the Heb "Joshua" (יוֹשָׁבָה, yōshāḇaḥ), meaning "Jehovah is salvation." It stands therefore in the LXX and Apoc for "Joshua," and in Acts 7 45 and He 4 8 likewise represents the OT Joshua; hence in RV is in these passages rendered "Joshua." In Mt 1 21 the name is commanded by the angel to be given to the son of Mary, "for it is he that shall save his people from their sins" (see below on "Nativity"). It is the personal name of the Lord in the Gospels and the Acts, but generally in the Epistles appears in combination with "Christ" or other appellative (alone in Rom 3 26; 4 24; 1 Cor 12 3; 2 Cor 11 4; Phil 2 10; 1 Thess 4 14; He 7 22; 10 19, etc.).

(2) "Christ" (Christos) is the Gr equivalent of the Heb "Messiah" (מֶשֶׁה, mēšīaḥ), cf in the NT in Jn 1 41; 4 26, "Messiah.

2. Christ meaning "anointed" (see Messiah). It designates Jesus as the fulfiller of the Messianic hopes of the OT and of the Jewish people. It will be seen below that Jesus Himself made this claim. After the resurrection it became the current title for Jesus in the apostolic church. Most frequently in the Epistles He is called "Jesus Christ," sometimes "Christ Jesus" (Rom 8 1.2.39; 1 Cor 1 1-20; 4 15; Eph 1 1; Phil 1 1; Col 1 1-28 AV; 1 Thess 2 14, etc.), often "Christ" alone (Rom 1 16 AV; 5 6.8; 6 4.8.9; 8 10, etc.). In this case "Christ" has acquired the force of a proper name. Very frequently the term is associated with "Lord" (kuriōs) — "the [or 'our'] Lord Jesus Christ" (Acts 11 17; 16 11 AV; 15 31 AV; 20 21; 28 31; Rom 1 7; 5 1.11; 13 14; 1 Cor 16 23, etc).

II. Order of Treatment.—In studying, as it is proposed to do in this art., the earthly history of Jesus and His place in the faith of the apostolic church, it will be convenient to pursue the following order:

First, as introductory to the whole study, certain questions relating to the sources of our knowledge of Jesus, and to the preparation for, and circumstances of, His historical appearance, invite careful attention (Part I).

Next, still as preliminary to the proper narrative of the life of Jesus, it is desirable to consider certain problems arising out of the presentation of that life in the Gospels with which modern thought is more specially concerned, as determining the attitude in which the narratives are approached. Such are the problems of the miracles, the Messiahship, the sinless character and supernatural claims of Jesus (Part II).

The way is then open for treatment in order of the actual events of Christ's life and ministry, so far as recorded. These fall into many stages, from His nativity and baptism till His death, resurrection and ascension (Part III).

A final division will deal with Jesus as the exalted Lord in the aspects in which He is presented in the teaching of the Epistles and remaining writings of the NT (Part IV).

PART I. INTRODUCTORY

I. The Sources.—The principal, and practically the only sources for our knowledge of Jesus Christ are the four Canonical Gospels—distinction being made in these between the first three (Synoptic) Gospels, and the Gospel of John. Nothing, either in the few notices of Christ in non-Christian authors, or in the references in the other books of the NT, or in later Christian lit., adds to the information which the Gospels already supply. The so-called apocryphal Gospels are worthless as historical documents (see s.v.); the few additional sayings of Christ (cf Acts 20 35) found in outside writings are of doubtful genuineness (cf a collection of these in Westcott's Intro to the Study of the Gospels, Appendix C; see also Louth). It marks the excess to which skepticism has gone that writers are found in recent years who deny the very existence of Jesus Christ (Kalt¬hoff, Das Christus-Problem, and Die Entstehung des Christenthums; Jensen, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, ET, 313 ff; Jensen is reviewed in the writer's The Resurrection of Jesus, ch 18). The extravagance of such skepticism is its sufficient refutation.

Of notices outside the Christian circles the following may be referred to.

(1) Josephus.—There is the famous passage of Ant. xi, 3, 3 commencing, "Now there was about this time, Jesus, a wise man, if it be lawful to call him a man," etc. It is not unlikely that Jos had some reference to Jesus, but most agree that the passage in question, if not entirely spurious, has been the subject of Christian interpolation (on the lit. and different views, see Schürer, Jewish People in the Time of Christ, Div II, vol II, 143 ff; in support of interpolation, Edersheim on "Josephus," in Dict. of. Christ. Biog).

(2) Tacitus.—The Rom historian, Tacitus, in a well-known passage relating to the persecution of Nero (Ann. xv.44), tells how the Christians, already "a great multitude" (ingens multitudo), derived their name "from one Christus, who was executed in the reign of Tiberius by the procurator of Judaea, Pontius Pilate.

(3) Suetonius also, in his account of Claudius, speaks of the Jews as expelled from Rome for the raising of tumults at the instigation of one "Christus" (impius Christo), plainly a mistake for "Christus." The incident is doubtless that referred to in Acts 18 2.

The four Gospels, then, with their rich contents, remain as our primary sources for the knowledge of the earthly life of Jesus.

4. The Synoptics.—It may be taken that the result of the best criticism is that the first three Gospels (Mt, Mk, Lk) all fall well within the apostolic age (cf Harnack, Allchr. Lit., Pref; see Gospels). The favorite theory at present of the relations of these Gospels is that Mk is an independent Gospel, resting on the teaching of Peter; that Mt and Lk have as sources the Gospel of Mk and a collection of discourses, probably attributable to the apostle Matthew (now commonly called Q); and that Lk has a third, well-authenticated source (Lk 1 1-4) peculiar to himself. The present writer is disposed to allow more independence to the evangelists in the embodying of a tradition common to all; in any case, the sources named are of unquestionable authority, and furnish a strong guaranty for the reliability of the narratives. The supreme guaranty of their trustworthiness, however, is found in the narratives themselves; for when in (or any) age could imagine a figure so unique and perfect as that of Jesus, or invent the incomparable sayings and parables that proceeded from His lips? Much of Christ's teaching is high as heaven above the minds of men still.
The Fourth Gospel.—The Fourth Gospel stands apart from the Synoptics in dealing mainly with another set of incidents (the Jerusalem ministry), and discourses of a more private and intimate kind than those belonging to the Galilean teaching. Its sin, too, is evident—to show that Jesus is "the Son of God," and its style and mode of conception are very different from those of the Synoptic Gospels. Its contents touch their narratives in only a few points (as in Jn 6 4-21). Where they do, the resemblance is manifest. It is obvious that the reminiscences which the Gospel contains have been long brooded over by the apostle, and that a certain interpretative element blends with his narration of incidents and discourses. This, however, does not warrant us in throwing doubt, with so many, on the genuineness of the Gospel, for which the external evidence is exceptionally strong (cf Sanday, The Criticism of the Fourth Gospel; Drummond, Character and Authorship of the Fourth Gospel; and see John, Gospel of). The Gospel is accepted here as a genuine record of the sayings and doings of Jesus which it narrates.

II. The Preparation.—In the Gospels and throughout the NT Jesus appears as the goal of OT revelation, and the point to which it was worked up (cf Lk 3:4-18, and a similar tendency in Jn). 1. Both the gentle and he came, Paul says, in "the fulness of time" (Gal 4 4). It has often been shown how, politically, intellectually, morally, everything in the Graeco-Roman world was ready such a new religion as Jesus brought into it (cf Baur's History of the Church in the First Three Centuries, ET, ch i). The preparation in Israel is seen alike in God's revelations to, and dealings with, the chosen people in the patriarchal, Mosaic, monarchical and prophetic periods, and in the development of Jewish mind in the centuries immediately before Christ. As special lines in the OT preparation may be noted the ideas of the Messianic king, a ruler of David's house, whose reign would be righteous, perpetual, universal (cf Is 11 1-9 7; 33 12, Jer 33 15-18; Ps 2 1-10, etc); of a Righteous Sufferer (Ps 22, etc), whose sufferings are in Is 53 declared to have an expiatory and redeeming character; and of a Messiah who upholds "the whole earth, and embraces all peoples" (cf Is 60; Ps 87; Dn 2 44; 7 27, etc). The kingdom, at the same time, is now conceived of under a more spiritual aspect. Its chief blessings are forgiveness and righteousness.

The age succeeding the return from exile witnessed a manifold preparation for the advent of Christ. Here may be observed the decentralization of the Jewish religious ideals through the rise of synagogue preparation worship and the widespread dispersion of the race; the contact with Hellenic culture (as in Philo); but esp. the marked sharpening of Messianic expectations. Some of these were of a crude apocalyptic character (see Apocalyptic Literature; Eschatology of the OT); many were political and revolutionary; but some were of a purer and more spiritual kind (cf Lk 2 25-38). To these purer elements Jesus attached Himself in His preaching of the kingdom and of Himself as its Lord. Even in the gentile world, it is told, there was an expectation of a great One who about this time would come from Judaea (Tac. Hist. v 13; Strabo, Geog. vi 3 5, etc). 2. The political persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes, the Maccabean revolts made up of faction, intrigue, wars, murders, massacres, of growing degeneracy of rulers and nation, of repeated sackings of Jerusalem and terrible slaughters—thus Herod, the Idumean, misnamed "the Great," ascended the throne by favor of the Romans (37 BC), must be read in the books relating to the period (Ewald, History of Israel, V Vol. II, The Jews in the Time of Their Captivity, Div I, Vol I; Stanley, Jewish Church, III, etc.). Rome's power, first invited by Judas Maccabaeus (161 BC), was finally established by Pompey's capture of Jerusalem (63 BC). Herod's way to the throne was tracked by crime and bloodshed, and murder of those most nearly related to him marked every step in his advance. His taste for splendid buildings—palaces, temple (Mt 24 1; Jn 20), fortresses, cities (Sebaste, Caesarea, etc)—and lavish magnificence of his royal estate and administration, could not conceal the hideousness of his crafty, unscrupulous selfishness, his cold-blooded cruelty, his tyrannous oppression of his subjects. "Better be Herod's hog than his son," was the comment of Augustus, when he heard of the dying king's unnatural doings.

III. The Outward Situation.—Of all lands Pal was the most fitted to be the scene of the culminating revelation of God's grace in the person and work of Jesus Christ, as before it was fitted to be the abode of the people chosen to receive and preserve the revelations that prepared the way for that final manifestation. At once central and secluded—at the junction of the three great continents of the Old World, Asia, Africa and Europe—the highway of nations in war and commerce—touching mighty powers on every hand, Egypt, Syria, Assyria, kingdoms of Asia Minor, as formerly more ancient empires, Hittite and Babylonian, now in direct contact with Greece and Rome, yet singularly isolated by desert, Jordan, and Great Sea, from ready entrance of foreign influences, Pal has a place of its own in the history of revelation, which only a Divine wisdom can have given it (cf Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, Part II, ch ii; G. A. Smith, History of the Holy Land, Book I, chs i, ii; Lange, Life of Christ, I, 246 f.). Its divisions.—Pal, in the Roman period, was divided into four well-defined provinces or districts—Judaea, with Jerusalem as its center, in the S, the stronghold of Jewish conservatism; Samaria, in the middle, separated from Assyrian times by mixed peoples; Galilee (62 K 24 23-34), preponderatingly heathen in origin, yet now professing the Jewish religion, claiming Jewish descent (cf Jn 4 12), possessing a copy of the law (the temple, built by Manasseh, c 496 BC, was destroyed by John Hyrcanus, 106 BC); Galilee—"Galilee of the Gentiles" (Mt 4 15; cf Isa 9 1) —in the N, the chief scene of Christ's ministry, more cosmopolitan and more hospitable in spirit, through a large infusion of gentile population and contact with traders, etc.; of varied nationalities: these in Western Pal, while on the E, "beyond Jordan," was Perea, divided up into Perea proper, Batabne, Gaulonitis, Ituraea, Trachonitis, Decapolis, etc (cf Mt 4 25; 19 1; Mk 1). The tension of a conflict between Jews and Samaritans was intense (Jn 4 9). The language of the people throughout was Aramaic (q.v.), but a knowledge of the Gr tongue was widely diffused, especially in the N, where intercourse with Gr-speaking peoples was habitual (the NT writings are in Gr). Jesus doubtless used the native dialect in His ordinary teaching, but it is highly probable that He also knew Gr, and was acquainted with OT Scriptures in that language (the LXX). In this He may have seen behind, and used it in His preaching (of Roberts, Discourses on the Gospels). The miserable story of the vicissitudes of the Jewish people in the cent. succeeding the great persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes and the Maccabean revolts made up of faction, intrigue, wars, murders, massacres, of growing degeneracy of rulers and nation, of repeated sackings of Jerusalem and terrible slaughters—thus Herod, the Idumean, misnamed "the Great," ascended the throne by favor of the Romans (37 BC), must be read in the books relating to the period (Ewald, History of Israel, V; Milman, History of Jesus; Schürer, History of the Jews in the Time of Their Captivity, Div I, Vol I; Stanley, Jewish Church, III, etc). Rome's power, first invited by Judas Maccabaeus (161 BC), was finally established by Pompey's capture of Jerusalem (63 BC). Herod's way to the throne was tracked by crime and bloodshed, and murder of those most nearly related to him marked every step in his advance. His taste for splendid buildings—palaces, temple (Mt 24 1; Jn 20), fortresses, cities (Sebaste, Caesarea, etc)—and lavish magnificence of his royal estate and administration, could not conceal the hideousness of his crafty, unscrupulous selfishness, his cold-blooded cruelty, his tyrannous oppression of his subjects. "Better be Herod's hog than his son," was the comment of Augustus, when he heard of the dying king's unnatural doings.
Changes in territory.—At the time of Christ's birth, the whole of Galilee was united under Herod's rule, but on Herod's death, after a long reign of 37 (or, counting from his actual accession, 34) years, his dominions were, in accordance with his will, divided into three parts. The first, under Archelaus, a few towns excepted, fell to his son Archelaus (Mt 22), with the title of "etnarch"; Galilee and Perea were given to Herod Antipas, another son, with the title of "tetarch" (Mt 14; Lk 3 1.19; 23 7; Acts 13 1). Herod Philip, first son, received Ituraea, Trachonitis, and other parts of the northern trans-Jordanic territory, likewise as "tetarch" (Lk 3 1; cf Mt 14 3; Mk 6 17). A few years later, the tyranny of Archelaus provoked an appeal of his subjects to Augustus, and Archelaus, assuming to Rome his title (4 AD). Thereafter Judaea, with Samaria, was governed by a Roman procurator, under the oversight of the prefect of Syria.

In the religious situation the chief fact of interest is the place occupied and prominent part played by the religious sects—the Pharisees, the Sadducees, and (though unmentioned in the Gospels, these had an important influence on Jewish life) the Essenes (assumed to be connected with the sect of the Essenes, a religious movement in the history of the church) the Essenes.

The result and characteristics of these sects can here only be alluded to (see special arts.).

(1) The scribes.—From the days of Ezra zealous attention had been given to the study of the law, and an order of men had arisen—the "scribes"—whose special business it was to guard, develop and expound the law. Through their labors, scrupulous observance of the law, and, with it, of the innumerable regulations intended to preserve the law, and apply it in detail to conduct (the so-called "tradition of the elders," Mt 15 2 ff), became the ideal of righteousness. The sects first appear in the Maccabean age. The Maccabean conflict reveals the existence of a party known as the "Assyrians" (Heb ἀσσυρίας), or "pious" ones, opposed to the calf Hellenizing tendencies of the times, and staunch observers of the law. These in the beginning gave brave support to Judas Maccabaeus, and doubtless then embraced the best elements of the nation.

(2) The Pharisees.—From them, by a process of deterioration too natural in such cases, developed the party of legalists known in the Gospels as the "Pharisees" ("separated"), on which Christ's sternest criticism is directed. The Pharisaic traditions and believed in neither resurrection, angel nor spirit (Acts 23 8). Usually the Pharisees are found combining with these to destroy Jesus (Mt 26 3-5.57).

(3) The Sadducees.—Alongside of the Pharisees were the "Sadducees" (probably from "Zadok")—rather a political and aristocratic clique than a religious sect, into whose possession the honors of the high-priesthood and other influential offices had passed. They are first met with by name under John Hyrcanus (135-106 BC). The Sadducees received only the law of Moses, interpreted it in a literal, secularist spirit, rejected the Pharisaic traditions and believed in neither resurrection, angel nor spirit. Usually they are found combining with these to destroy Jesus (Mt 26 3-5.57).

(4) The Essenes.—The third party, the "Essenes," differed from both (some derive also from the As- sidaeans) in living in fraternities apart from the general community, chiefly in the desert of Engedi, on the N.W. shore of the Dead Sea, though some were found also in villages and towns; in rejecting animal sacrifices, etc., sending only gifts of incense to the temple; in practising celibacy and community of goods; in the wearing of white garments; in certain customs (as great reverence for Abraham and Samuel) and extravagant of oriental influence. They forbade slavery, war, oaths, were given to occult studies, had secret doctrines and books, etc. As remarked, they do not appear in the Gospel, but on account of certain resemblances it may have sought to establish a connection between them and John the Baptist and Jesus. In reality, however, nothing could be more opposed than Essenism to the essential ideas and spirit of Christ's teaching (cf Schürer, as above, Div II, Vol II, 188 ff; Kuenen, Hibbert Lects on National Religion in Universal Religions, 199-208; Lightfoot, Colossians, 114-79).

IV. The Chronology.—The leading chronological questions connected with the life of Jesus are discussed in detail elsewhere (Cuvon or Talm. NT; Quirinius, etc.); here it is sufficient to indicate the general scheme of dating adopted in the present art., and some of the grounds on which it is preferred.

The chief questions relate to the dates of the birth and baptism of Jesus, the duration of the ministry and the date of the crucifixion.

Thus challenged by some (Caspari, Bosanquet, Conder, etc., put it as late as 1 BC) the usual date for the death of Herod the Great, 4 BC, may be assumed as correct (for grounds of this dating, see Schürer, op. cit, Div I, Vol I, 406-67). The birth of Jesus was before, and apparently not very long before, this event (Mt 2). It may therefore be established that probability in the latter part of the previous year (5 BC), the ordinary dating of the commencement of the Christian era being thus, as is generally recognized, four years too late. There is no certainty as to the month or day of the birth. The Christmas date, December 25, is first met with in the W. in the 4th cent. (the eastern date was January 6), and was then possibly borrowed from a pagan festival. December, in the winter season, seems unlikely, as unsuitable for the purpose. The date, 2 BC, is preferred by Andrews, Conder. A more probable date is a couple of months earlier. The synchronism with Quirinius (Lk 2 2) is considered in connection with the fact stretching back to Quirinius' visit of 8 BC, suggested by Ramsay, Mackinlay and others, on the grounds of the assumed Roman census, astronomical phenomena, etc, appear to leave too long an interval before the death of Herod, and conflict with other data (Lk 3 1 (see below).

John is said by Luke to have begun to preach and baptize "in the fifteenth year of Tiberius" (Lk 3 1), and Jesus "was about thirty years of age" (ver 23) when He was baptized. Baptized by John, and entered on His ministry. If the 15th year of Tiberius is dated, as seems most likely, from his association with Augustus as colleague in the government, 785 AUC, or 12 AD (Tac. Ann. i.3; Suet. on Augustus, 97), and if Jesus may be supposed to have been baptized about 6 months after John commenced his work, these data combine in bringing us to the year 780 AUC, or 27 AD, as the year of Our Lord's baptism, in agreement with our former conclusion as to the date of His birth in 5 BC. To place the baptism of Jesus at 30 or 31 years of age at His baptism—an unwarrantable extension of the "about"—in accord with this is the statement in Jn 2 20 that the temple had been 46 years in building (it began in 20-19 BC) at the time of Christ's first Passover; therefore in

Jesus Christ

780 AUC, or 27 AD (cf Schürer, op. cit., Div I, Vol I, 410).

The determination of the precise duration of Our Lord's ministry involves more doubtful elements. 3. Length which would, with some of the early of Ministry Fathers, compass the whole ministry into little over a single year (Browne, Hort, etc)—a view which involves without authority the rejection of the mention of the Passover in Jn 6—there remains the choice between a two years' and a three years' ministry. Both had three years' ministry becomes necessary. It is claimed, however, that in this case the "feast" would almost certainly have been named. It still does not follow, even if a minor feast—say Purim—is intended, that we are shut up to a two years' ministry. Mr. Turner certainly goes beyond his evidence in asserting that "while two years must, not more than two years can, be allowed for the interval from Jn 2 13.23 to Jn 11 55." The two years' scheme, as involves, will be seen on consideration of details, a serious over-estimating and arbitrary transposing of material which has no bearing on the need of longer time. We shall assume that the ministry lasted for three years, reserving reasons till the narrative is examined.

On the hypothesis now accepted, the crucifixion of Jesus took place at the Passover of 30 AD. On the two years' scheme it would fall a year earlier. On both sides it is Christ's agreement that it occurred on the Friday Death of the week of the Passover, but it is a disputed whether the Friday was the 14th or the 15th day of the month. The Gospel of John is pleaded for the former date, the Synoptics for the latter. The question will be considered in connection with the time of the Resurrection. Meanwhile it is to be observed that the 15th of the correct date, there seems reason to believe that the 16th of Nisan fell on a Friday in the year just named, 783 AUC, or 30 AD. We accept this pro-visionally as the date of the crucifixion.

PART II. THE PROBLEMS OF THE LIFE OF JESUS

1. The Miracles.—Everyone is aware that the absence of miracle in the Gospels is a chief ground of the rejection of its history by the representatives of the "modern" school. It is not questioned that it is a supernatural person whose picture is presented in the Gospels. There is no real difference between the Synoptics and John in this respect. "Even the oldest Gospel," writes Bousset, "is written from the standpoint of faith; already for Mark, Jesus is not only the Messiah of the Jewish people, but the miraculous eternal Son of God, whose glory shone in the world!" (Was wissen wir von Jesus? p. 45, 57.) But in interpreting the "modern" spirit, declares that no account embracing supernatural events can be accepted as historical. "The main characteristic of this modern mode of thinking," he says, "rests upon the determination to try to explain everything that takes place in the world by natural causes, or—to express it in another form—it rests on the determined assertion of universal laws to which all phenomena, natural and spiritual, are subject" (What Is Religion? ET, 283).

With such an assumption it is clear that the Gospels are condemned before they are read. Not only is Jesus there a supernatural person, but He is presented as supernatural in nature in character, in works, in the Gospels as a supernatural person, and He performs miracles; He has a supernatural birth, and a supernatural resurrection. All this is swept away. It may be allowed that He had remarkable gifts of healing, but these are in the class of "faith cures" (thus Harnack), and not truly supernatural. When one seeks the justification for this self-confident dogmatism, it is difficult to discover it, except on the ground of a pantheistic or monistic theory of the universe which excludes the personal God of Christianity. If God is the Author and Sustainer of the natural system, which He rules for moral ends, it is impossible to see why, for high ends of revelation and redemption, a supernatural economy should not be engraved on the natural, achieving ends which could not otherwise be achieved. This does not of course touch the question of evidence for any particular miracle, which must be judged of from its connection with the person of the worker, and the character of the apostle witnesses. The well-meant effort to explain all miracles through the "action of uncles" is, as what Dr. Sanday calls "making both ends meet" (Life of Christ in Recent Research, 302)—breaks down in the presence of such miracles as the instantaneous cleansing of the leper, the restoration of sight to the blind, the raising of the dead, acts which solely imply an exercise of creative power. In such a life as Christ's, transcendence of the ordinary powers of Nature is surely to be looked for.

II. The Messiahship.—A difficulty has been found in the fact that in all the Gospels Jesus knew Himselves to be the Messiah at least from 1. Reserve the time of His baptism, yet did not, of Jesus even to His disciples, unreservedly acknowledge Him to be the Messiah. Peter's great confession at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16.13 ft). On this seeming secrecy the bold hypothesis has been built that Jesus in reality never made the claim to Messiahship, and that, so far as the present writer has been able to ascertain, contrary to Mk (the original Gospel) are unhistorical (Wrede; cf. on this and other theories, Schweitzer, The Quest of the Historical Jesus, ET; Sunday, The Life of Jesus in Recent Research). So extreme an opinion is rejected by most; but modern critics vie with each other in the freedom with which they treat the testimony of the evangelists on this subject. Baldensperger, e.g., supposes that Jesus did not attain full certainty on His Messiahship till near the time of Peter's confession, and arbitrarily transposes the earlier sections in which the title "Son of Man" occurs till after that event (Das Selbstbewusstsein Jesu, 2d ed, 246). Bousset thinks that Jesus adopted the Messianic role as the only one open to Him, but bore it as a "burden" (cf. his Jesus). Schweitzer connects it with apocalyptic ideas of a wildly fantastic character (op. cit., ch xix).

There is, however, no need for supposing that Peter's confession marks the first dawn of this knowledge in the mind of Jesus.

2. A Rather was it the exalted expression Growing of a faith already present, which had Revelation long been maturing. The baptism and temptation, with the use of the title "Son of Man," the tone of authority, His teaching, His miracles, and many special incidents, show, as dearly as do the discourses in John, that Jesus was from the beginning fully conscious of His vocation, and His title sprang, not from any doubt in His own mind as to His right to it, but from His desire to avoid false associations till the true nature of His Messiahship should be revealed. The Messiahship was in process of self-revelation throughout to those who had eyes to see it (cf Jn 6 66-71). What it involved will be seen later.

III. Kingdom and Apocalypse. — Connected with the Messiahship is the idea of the "Kingdom of God" or of Heaven," which forms modern times would interpret in a purely eschatological sense, in the light of Jewish apocalyptic conceptions of the present or future Kingdom. (Johannes Weiss, Schweitzer, etc.) The kingdom is not a thing of the present, but wholly a thing of the future, to be introduced by convulsions of Nature and the Parousia of the Son of Man. The language of the Lord's Prayer, "Thy kingdom come," is quoted in support of this contention, but the next petition should guard against so violent an inference: "Thy will be done," Jesus teaches His disciples to pray, "as in heaven, so on earth" (Mt 6 10). The kingdom is the reign of God in human hearts and lives. This world is as well as it will not be wrong to define it as consisting essentially in the supremacy of God's will in human hearts and human affairs, and in every department of these affairs. As Jesus describes the kingdom, it has, in the plain meaning of His words, a present being on earth, though its perfection is in eternity. The parables in Mt 13 and elsewhere exhibit it as founded by the sowing of the word of truth (Sower), as a mingling of good and evil elements (Tares), as growth from small beginnings (Mustard Seed), as gradually leavening humanity (Leaven), as of priceless value (Treasure; Pearl; cf Mt 6 33), as terminating in a judgment (Tares, Dragnet); as perfected in the world to come (Mt 13 43). It was a kingdom spiritual in nature (Lk 17 20-21), universal in range (Mt 8 11; 21 43, etc), developing from a principle of life (Mt 4 26-29), and issuing in victory over all opposition (Mt 21 44).

It is difficult to pronounce on the extent to which Jesus was acquainted with current apocalyptic beliefs, or allowed these to color the imagery of parts of His teachings. These beliefs certainly did not furnish the substance of His teaching, and it may be doubted whether they more than superficially affected even its form. Jewish apocalyptic knew nothing of a death and resurrection of the Messiah and of His return in glory to bring in an everlasting kingdom. What Jesus taught on these subjects sprang from His own Messianic consciousness, with the certainty He had of His triumph over death and His exaltation to the right hand of God. It was in OT prophecy, not in late Jewish apocalyptic, that His thoughts of the future triumph of His kingdom were grounded, and from the vivid imagery of the prophets He borrowed most of the clothing of these thoughts. Isa 55, e.g., predicts not only the rejection and death of the Servant of Jehovah (vs 7-9, 12), but the prolongation of His days and His victorious reign (vs 10-12). Dnl, not the Book of En, is the source of the title, "Son of Man," and of the imagery of coming on the clouds of heaven (Dnl 7 13). The ideas of resurrection, etc., have the ground of the OT (see Ezek.).

With the extravgant, unspiritual forms into which these conceptions were thrown in the Jewish apocalyptic books His teaching had nothing in common. The new apocalyptic school represented by Schweitzer reduces the history of Jesus to folly, fanaticism and horror in the use of the title, and hopes the Messiahship should be revealed. The Messiahship was in process of self-revelation throughout to those who had eyes to see it (cf Jn 6 66-71). What it involved will be seen later.

IV. The Character and Claims. — Where the Gospels present us in Jesus with the image of a flawless character — in the words of the writer to the Hebrews, "holy, guileless, without spot or flaw, separated from sinners" (He 4:14) — modern criticism is driven by an inexorable necessity to deprive Jesus of His sinlessness, and to impute to Him the error, frailty, and moral infirmity that belong to the human. Schweitzer's portrayal of Christ's moral perfection. To do so would be to admit a miracle in humanity, and we have heard that miracle is by the highest rational necessity excluded. This, however, is precisely the point on which Schweitzer's hypothesis falls. He has not only failed to examine in isolation the mode of presentation most obviously broken down. The ideal of perfect holiness in the Gospels, which has fascinated the conscience of Christendom for 18 cen., and attests itself anew to every candid reader, is not thus lightly to be got rid of. Schweitzer has explained away the invention of a church gathered out (without the help of the ideal) promiseously from Jews and Gentiles. It was not the church of all such a church — that created Christ, but Christ that created the church (see Schweitzer, especially 7 26). The Gospels must be read in pieces before this image of a perfect holiness can be effaced from them.

1. The sinlessness assured. — The sinlessness of Jesus is a datum in the Gospels. Over against a sinful world He stands as a Saviour who is Himself without sin. His is the one life in humanity in which is presented a perfect knowledge and unbroken fellowship with the Father, undeviating obedience to His will, unwavering devotion under the severest strain of temptation and suffering to the highest ideal of goodness. The ethical ideal was never raised to so absolute a height. He is the Son of God, and the miracle is that, high as it is in its unsullied purity, the character of Jesus corresponds with it, and realizes it. Word and life for one in history perfectly agree. Jesus, with the keenest sensitiveness and most searching of His enemies, is conscious of no sin in Himself, confesses no sin, disclaims the presence of it, speaks and acts continually on the assumption that He is without it. Those who knew Him best declared Him to be without sin (1 Pet 2 22; 1 Jn 3 5; cf 2 Cor 5 21). The Gospels must be read in pieces before this image of a perfect holiness can be effaced from them.

(1) What this implies. — How is this phenomenon of a sinless personality in Jesus to be explained? It is itself a miracle, and can only be made credible by a creative miracle in Christ's origin. It may be argued that a Virgin Birth does not of itself secure sinlessness, but it will hardly be disputed that at least a sinless personality implies miracle in its production. It is precisely because of this that the modern spirit feels bound to reject it. In the Gospels it is not the Virgin Birth by itself which is invoked to explain Christ's sinlessness, but the supernatural conception by the Holy Spirit (Lk 1 35). It is because of His miraculous birth that is a virgin one. No explanation of the supernatural element in Christ's Personality is more rational or credible (see below on "Nativity").
If Jesus from the first was conscious of Himself as without sin, and if, as the converse of this, He knew Himself as standing in an unbroken filial fellowship with the Father, His special vocation and mission, the kingdom of God to which He was sent, and which was the mission of His life, the task He undertook, and that for which He was crowned with thorns and crucified, was for His people, and the things that He knew He knew for them, and from and for them. Here is the true germ of His Messianic consciousness, from which everything subsequently is unfolded. He stood in a rapport with the Father which opened His spirit to a full, and accurate, appreciation of the Father's will regarding Himself, His mission, the kingdom He came to found, His sufferings as the means of salvation to the world, the glory that awaited Him when His earthly work was done. In the light of this revelation He read the OT Scriptures and saw His course there made plain. When the hour had come He went to John for baptism, and His brief, eventful ministry, which should end in the cross, began. This is the reading of events which introduces consciousness and purpose into the life of Jesus, and it is this we mean to follow in the sketch now to be given.

PART III. COURSE OF THE EARTHY LIFE OF JESUS

The wonderful story of the life of the world's Redeemer which we are now to endeavor to trace falls naturally into several divisions:

1. Divisions
   A. From the Nativity to the Baptism and Temptation

To avoid misconception, it is important to remember, that, rich as are the narratives of the Gospels, materials do not exist for a complete biography or "Life" of Jesus. There is a gap, broken only by a single incident, from His infancy till His 30th year; there are cycles of events out of myriads left unrecorded (Jn 21 25); there are sayings, parables, and numerous character sketches without particular occasion; there are general summaries of periods of activity comprised in a few verses. The evangelists, too, present their materials each from his own standpoint—Matthew from the theocratic, Mark from that of Christ's practical activity, Luke from the universalistic and human-sympathetic, John from the Divine. In reproducing the history respect must be had to this focusing from distinct points of view.

A. FROM THE NATIVITY TO THE BAPTISM AND TEMPTATION

1. The Nativity.—OT prophecy expired with the promise on its lips, "Behold, I send my messenger, and he shall prepare the way before me. And the voice of one crying in the wilderness, Prepare the way of the Lord, make his paths straight." (Mt 3 1, cf Is 40 3; Jn 1 23, 28, 35); and the messenger of the covenant, whom ye desire, behold, he cometh, saith Jebovah of hosts. (Mal 3 1). In the years immediately before Christ's birth the air was tremulous with the sense of impending great events. The fortunes of the Jewish people were at their lowest ebb. Pharisic formalism, Sadducean unbelief, fanatical Zealotry, Herodian syphismantism, Roman oppression, were fated to have crushed out the last sparks of spiritual religion. Yet in numerous quiet circles in Judaea, and even in remote Galilee, little godly bands still nourished their souls on the promises looking for the consolation of Israel! and the redemption of Jerusalem." (Lk 2 25, 38). Glimpses of these are vouchsafed in Zacharias and Elisabeth, in Simeon, in Anna, in Joseph and Mary (Lk 1, 2; Mt 1 18 ff). It was in hearts in these circles that the stirrings of the prophetic spirit began to make themselves felt anew, preparing for the Advent (cf Lk 2 27, 36).

In the last days of Herod—perhaps in the year 748 of Rome, or 6 BC—the aged priest Zacharias, of the course of Abijah (1 Ch 24 10), 2. Birth of the Baptist was ministering in the temple at the altar of incense at the hour of evening prayer. Scholars have reckoned, if on somewhat precarious grounds, that the ministry of the order to which Zacharias belonged fell in this year in the month of April or in early October (of Andrews, Life of Our Lord). Now a wonderful thing happened. Zacharias and his wife Elisabeth, noted for their blameless piety, were up to this time childless. On this evening an angel appeared at the side of the altar of incense, announced to Zacharias that a son should be born to them, in whom should be realized the prediction of Malachi of one coming in the spirit and power of Elijah to prepare the way of the Lord (cf Mal 4 5); his name was to be called John. Zacharias hesitated to believe, and was stricken with dumbness till the promise should be fulfilled. It happened as the angel had foretold, and at the circumcision and naming of his son his tongue was again loosened. Zacharias, filled with the Spirit, poured forth his soul in a hymn of praise—the Benedictus (Lk 1 5 25, 57, 80; cf John the Baptist).

Meanwhile yet stranger things were happening in the little village of Nazareth, in Galilee (now en Najira). There resided a young maiden of purest character, named Mary, betrothed to a carpenter of the village (cf Mt 13 55), called Joseph, results (Lk 1: who, although in so humble a station, 26 56; Mt was of the lineage of David (cf Is 11 18 25 1). Mary, most probably, was likewise of Davidic descent (Lk 1 32; on the genealogies, see below). The fables relating to the parentage and birth of Mary and her early life, found in the Apocryphal Gospels may safely be discarded. To this maiden, three months before the birth of the Baptist, the same angel visitant (Gabriel) appeared, hailing her as "highly favored" of God, and announcing to her the birth of the Son of the Holy Spirit, she should become the mother of the Saviour. The words "Blessed art thou among women," in AV of ver 28 are omitted by RV, though found below (ver 42) in Elisabeth's salutation. They give, in any case, no support to Mariolatry, stating simply the fact that Mary was more honored than any other woman of the race in being chosen to be the mother of the Lord.

(I) The amazing message. —The announcement itself was of the most amazing import. Mary herself was staggered at the thought that, as a virgin, she should become a mother (ver 34). Still more surprising were the statements made as to the Son she was to bear. Conceived of the Holy Spirit (Lk 1 35; Mt 1 18). He would be great, and would be called "the Son of the Most High" (Lk 1 32) —"the Son of God" (ver 35); there would be given to Him the throne of His father David, and His reign would be eternal (vs 32 33; cf Is 9 6 7). He would be "holy" from the womb (Lk 1 15); His name was to be called Jesus (ver 31; cf Mt 1 21), denoting Him as Saviour. The holiness of Jesus is here put in connection with His miraculous conception, and surely rightly. In no case in the history of mankind has nature generation issued in a being who is sinless, not to say superhuman. The fact that Jesus, even in His human nature, was supernaturally begotten—was “Son of God”—does not exclude the higher and eternal Sonship according to the Divine nature (Jn 1 18). The inauguration of such a Divine Person, Paul and John depict, implied a miracle in human origin. On the whole message being declared to her, Mary accepted what was told her in meek humility (Lk 1 38).

(2) The visit to Elisabeth.—With the announcement to herself, there was given to Mary an indication of what had befallen her kinswoman Elisabeth, and Mary's first act, on recovering from her astonishment, was to go in haste to the home of Elisabeth in the hill country of Judaea (vs 39 ff). Very naturally she was not at that stage of sympathy in speaking to Joseph of what had occurred, but waited in quietness and faith till God should reveal in His own way what He had done. The meeting of the two holy women was the occasion of a new outburst of gratitude toward God. Nothing in the Gospel, says Josephus, happened to be left out of the story of Elisabeth's visit which might not be considered a matter of unshakable satisfaction (Josephus, Jewish War, 2:1).

(3) Joseph's perplexity.—Here a new trial awaited her. Mary's condition of motherhood could not long be concealed, and when Joseph first became aware of it, the shock to a man so just (Mt 1 19) would be terrible in its severity. The disappearance of Joseph from the later gospel history suggests that he was a good deal older than his betrothed, and it is possible that, while strict, upright and conscientious, his disposition was not at that stage of sympathy so as to be called a case required. It is going too far to say with Lange, “He encountered the modest, but unabashable firm Virgin with decided doubt; the first Ebionite”; but so long as he had no support beyond Mary's word, his mind was in a state of agonized perplexity. His first thought was to give Mary a private “bill of divorce” to avoid scandal (ver 19). Happily, his doubts were soon set at rest by a Divine intimation, and he hesitated no longer, but took Mary to be His bride (Lk 1:26).

4. The Birth at Bethlehem.—Matthew gives no indication of where the events narrated in his first chapter took place, first mentioning Nazareth on the occasion of the return of the holy family from Egypt (2:23). In 2:1 he transports us to Bethlehem as the city of Christ's birth. It is left to Luke to give an account of the circumstances which brought Joseph and Mary to Bethlehem—thus fulfilling prophecy (Mic 5 2; Mt 2 6; Lk 2:1-7)—at this critical hour, and to record the lowly manner of Christ's birth there.

(1) The census of Quirinius.—The emperor Augustus had given orders for a general enrolment throughout the empire (the fact of periodic enrolments in the empire is well established by Professor W. M. Ramsay in his Was Christ Born at Bethlehem?, and this is stated to have been given effect in Judaea when Quirinius was governor of Syria (Lk 2 12). The difficulties connected with the enrolment or census here mentioned are discussed in the art. Quirinius. It is known that Quirinius did conduct a census in Judaea in 6 AD (cf Acts 5 37), but the census at Mary's birth is distinguished from this by Luke as “the first enrolment.” The difficulty was largely removed when it was ascertained, as it has been to the satisfaction of most scholars, that Quirinius was twice governor of Syria—first, the Herod's death, 4-1 B.C. and again in 6-11 AD. The probability is that the census was begun under Varus, the immediate predecessor of Quirinius—or even earlier under Saturninus—but was delayed in its application to Judaea, under Herod's jurisdiction, and completed by Quirinius, with whose name it is officially connected. That the enrolment was made by each one going to his own city (ver 3) is explained by the fact that the census was not made according to the Roman method, but according to earlier customs of the Jewish people, in accordance with Jewish usages (cf Ramsay).

(2) Jesus born.—It must be left undecided whether the journey of Mary to Bethlehem with Joseph was required for any purpose of registration or simply out of her unwillingness to be separated from Joseph in so trying a situation. To Bethlehem, in any case, possibly by Divine monition, she came, and there, in the ancestral city of David, in circumstances the lowest conceivable, brought a most marvelous child. In unadorned language—very different from the embellishments of apocryphal story—Luke narrates how, when the travelers arrived, no room was found for them in the “inn”—the ordinary housing for travelers, a house for swaddling clothes, a square enclosure, with an open court for cattle, and a raised recess round the walls for shelter of visitors—and how, when her babe was born, Mary wrapped Him in swaddling clothes, and laid Him in a manger. The weary pair, according to Luke, been crowded out of, and not merely within, the inn, there is every probability that the birth took place, not, as some suppose, in the courtyard of the inn, but, as the oldest tradition asserts (Justin Martyr, Dial, with Trypho, ver 34), in one of the houses of the neighborhood, used for similar purposes of lodgment and housing of cattle. High authorities look favorably on the “cave of the nativity” still shown, with its inscription, Hic de virgine Maria Jesus Christus natus est, as marking the sacred spot. It, with the incredibly mean surroundings was “the only begotten of the Father” ushered into the world He came to redeem. How true the apostle's word that He “emptied” Himself (Phil 2 7)! A problem lies in the very circumstances of His birth, of such unparalleled nature to care for such a One, which only the thought of a voluntary humiliation for saving ends can solve.

Born, however, though Jesus was, in a low condition, the Father did not leave Him totally without witness to His Sonship. There were the shepherds watching their flocks by night in the fields near Bethlehem the first disclosure was made. The season, one would infer, could hardly have been winter, though it is stated that there is frequently an interval of dry weather in Judaea at that time, in the middle of December and the middle of February, when such a keeping of flocks would be possible (Andrews). The angel world is not far removed from us, and as angels announced the birth of Christ, so, when He was born, they were among men (cf. the adoration of the Magi), and the shepherds (cf. Luke 2). The angels of God made the night vocal with their songs. First, an angel appearing in the midst of the Divine glory—the “Shekinah”—announced to the sorely alarmed shepherds the birth of a “Saviour who was Christ the Lord” at Bethlehem; then a whole chorus of the heavenly host broke in with the refrain, “Glory to God in the highest, and on earth peace among men in whom He is well pleased” (lit. “men of good pleasure”—since, the Christmas hymn of the tinkling shepherd cranes, Lk 2:14). The shepherds, guided as to how to recognize the babe (ver. 12), went once, and found it to be even as they had been told. Thence they hastened to spread abroad the tidings—the first believers, the first worshippers, the first preachers (vs 15-20). Mary cherished the sayings in the stillness of her heart.

(2) The circumcision and presentation in the temple. Jewish law required that on the 8th day the male child should be circumcised, and on the same day He received His name (cf. Lk 1:58-59). In Jesus, though entirely pure, underwent the rite which denoted the putting off of fleshly sin (Col 2:11), and become bound, as a true Israelite, to render obedience to every Divine commandment. The name “Jesus” was given Him by the priest, (Lk 2:21) when the ceremony of presentation in the temple at Jerusalem, when Mary had to offer for her purifying (Lev 12; Mary’s was the humbler offering of the poor, “a pair of turtle-doves, or two young pigeons” Lev 12:8; and when the first-born son had to be redeemed with 5 shekels of the sanctuary (Nu 18:15-16; about $3.60). The observance was an additional token that Christ—personally sinless—did not shrink from full identification with our race in the responsibilities of its sinful condition. Ere it was completed, however, the ceremony was lifted to a Diviner level, and a new attestation was given of the divinity of Christ. Mary, by the action and inspired utterances of the holy Simeon, and the aged prophetess Anna, to Simeon, a righteous and devout man, “looking for the consolation of Israel,” it had been revealed that he should not die till he had seen the Lord’s Christ, and, led by the Spirit into the temple at the very time when Jesus was being presented in Him the One for whom he had waited, and, taking Him in his arms, gave utterance to the beautiful words of the Nunc Dimittis—“Now lettest thou thy servant depart, Lord,” etc (Lk 2:25-32). He told also how this child was set for the falling and rising of many in Israel, and how, through Him, a sword should pierce through Mary’s own soul (vs 34-35). Entering at the same hour, the prophetess Anna—now in extreme old age (over 100); a constant frequenter of the temple, ver 37—conspired his words, and spoke of Him to all who, like herself, looked “for the redemption of Jerusalem.”

(3) Visit of the Magi.—It seems to have been after the presentation in the temple that the incident took place recorded by Matthew of the visit of the Magi. The Magi, a learned class belonging originally to Chaldaea or Persia (see Magi), had, in course of time, greatly degenerated (cf. Simon Magus, Acts 8:9), but those who now came to seek Christ from the distant East were of a noble race. They appeared in Jesus’ infancy saying, “Where is He that is born King of the Jews?” and declaring that they had seen His star in the East, and had come to worship Him (Mt 2:2). Observers of the nightly sky, any significant appearance in the heavens would at once attract their attention. Many (Kepler, Ideler, etc.; cf. Ramsay, op. cit., 215 ff) are disposed to connect this “star” with a remarkable conjunction—or series of conjunctions—of planets in 7-6 BC, in which case it is possible that two years may have elapsed (cf. Josephus, Antiquities, 2, 300; cf. Tertullian, De Pass. Dom. 7.7; vs 7.16) from their observation of the sign. On the other hand, the fact of the star reappearing and seeming to stand over a house in Bethlehem (ver 9) rather points to a distinct phenomenon (cf. Betlehem,听话, St.). The inquiry of the Magi at once awakened Herod’s alarm; accordingly, having ascertained from the scribes that the Christ should be born at Bethlehem (Mic 5:2), he summoned the Magi, questioned them as to when exactly the star appeared, then sent them to Bethlehem to search out the young child, hypocritically pretending that he also wished to worship Him (Mt 2:8). Herod had faith enough to believe the Scriptures, yet was foolish enough to think that he could thwart God’s purpose. Guided by the star, which now appeared, the wise men came to Bethlehem, offered their gifts, and afterward, warned by God, returned by another road, without reporting to Herod. It is a striking picture—Herod the king, and Christ the King; Christ a power even in His humblest, inspiring terror, attracting homage! The faith of these sages, unrepelled by the lowly surroundings of the child they had discovered, worshipping, and laying at His feet their gold, frankincense and myrrh, is a splendid antithesis of Herod’s enmity. On the 40th day God became the one among the wisest as well as the humblest of our race. Herod, finding himself, as he thought, befooled by the Magi, avenged himself by ordering a massacre of all the male children of two years old, and under, in Bethlehem and its neighborhood (ver 16). This slaughter, if not recorded elsewhere (cf., however, Macrobius, quoted by Ramsay, op. cit., 219), is entirely in keeping with the cruelty of Herod’s disposition. Meanwhile, Joseph and Mary had been withdrawn from the scene, and connected the performance of the Bethlehem mothers with Rachael’s weeping, Jer 31:15). The safety of Mary and her threatened child was provided for by a Divine warning to retire for a time to Egypt (mark the recurring expression, “the young child and his mother” Egypt and return to Israel).—the young child leading the way, vs 14-20 (21), whither, accordingly, Nazareth (Mt 2:15-16) was their return (vs 23). Herod’s death brought permission to return, but as Archelaus, Herod’s son (the worst of them), reigned in Judaea in his father’s stead (not king, but “archon”), Joseph was directed to withdraw to Galilee, because it concerned him about that he and Mary, with the babe, found themselves again in Nazareth, where Luke anew takes up the story (2:39), the thread of which had been broken by the incidents in Mt. Matthew sees in the return from Egypt a refuling of the experiences of Israel (Hos 11:1), and in the settling in Nazareth a connection with the OT prophecies of Christ’s lowly estate (Isa 11:1, nēger, “branch” Zec 3:8; 6:12, etc).

The objections to the credibility of the narratives of the Virgin Birth have already partly been adverted to. (See further the arts. on Mary; Virgin Birth, etc.)

7. Questions. The Virgin Birth and Occasions. (1) The Virgin Birth. The narratives in Mt and Lk are attested by al MSS and SS genuine parts of their respective Gospels, and as contained in the earliest MSS and Lk is generally recognized as resting on an Aram. basis, which, from its dictum and the primitive character of its conceptions, belongs to the earliest age. While in Luke’s narrative everything is presented from the standpoint of St. Paul, in Mt. it is Joseph who is regarded as the virgin mother is the source of information in the one case, and Joseph himself in the other. The narratives are complementary, not competitive. Mt and Lk do not contain narratives of the Virgin Birth. cannot be wondered at, when it is remembered that Mark's Gospel begins of purpose with the Baptism of John, and that the Fourth Gospel aims at setting forth the circumstances of the earthly nativity. "The Word became flesh" (Jn 1:14)—everything in that. Neither can one object to that Paul does not in his letters or public preaching base upon so essentially private a fact as the infancy of Christ. Yet in this respect, when a man probably still lived. With the exception of the narrowest sect of the Jewish Ebionites and some of the gnostic sects, the Virgin Birth was universally accepted in the early church.

The genealogies (Mt 1:1–17; Lk 3:38–89).—Difficulty is felt with the genealogies in Mt and Lk (one derivation one explanation). It is interesting to trace the descent of Jesus from David and Abraham (Lk from Adam), yet entirely apart in the pedigree after David art. Genealogies of the Old Testament. A favorite view is that Mt exhibits the legal, Lk the natural descent of Jesus. There is plausibility in the supposition that though, in form, a genealogy of Joseph, Lk's is really the genealogy of Mary. It was not customary, it is true, to make out pedigrees of females, but here the case was clearly exceptional, and the passing of Joseph to the temple of a marriage in Law. Viewed in the light of the Incarnation, the list to be made out in his name. Celsus, in the 2d cent., appears thus to have understood it when he derides the notion that through so lowly a woman as the carpenter's wife, Jesus should trace His lineage up to the God of glory. The objection, of course, proceeds on the same assumption. Of art. on "Genealogies" in Kitto, 11.

II. The Years of Silence—the Twelfth Year. With the exception of one fragment of incident, that of the visit to Jerusalem and the Temple in His 12th year—the Canonized Human Deeds of Jesus made from the return to Nazareth (Lk 2:40–52) till His baptism by John. This long period, during which the Apocryphal Gospels crowd with silly fables (see Apocryphal Gospels), the inspired records leave to be regarded as what it was—a period of quiet development of mind and body, of outward uneventfulness, of silent preparation in the midst of the Nazareth surroundings. Jesus "grew, and waxed strong, filled with wisdom; and the grace of God was upon him . . . advanced in wisdom and stature, and in favor with God and men" (Lk 2:40, 52).

The inspiration was a true acceptance of humanity, with all its sinless limitations of growth and development. Not a hint is offered of that omniscience or omnipotence which theology has not infrequently imputed to Jesus even as child, but the schooldays was probably that of the ordinary village child (He could read, Lk 4:17 ff, and, Jn 8:6–8); He wrought at the carpenter's bench (cf Mk 6:3; Justin Martyr, following tradition, speaks of Him as making ploughs and yokes, Dial. 88). His gentle, loving, and gracious character endeared Him to all who knew Him (Lk 2:52). No stain of sin clouded His vision of Divine things. His after-history shows that His mind was nourished on the Scriptures; nor, as He pondered psalms and prophets, could His soul remain unvisited by presentsment, growing to convictions, that He was the One in whom their predictions were destined to be realized.

Every year, according to the custom of the Jews, Joseph and Mary went, with their friends and neighbors, in companies, to Jerusalem to the Passover. When Jesus was 12 years old, it would seem that, for the first time, He was permitted to accompany them. It would be to Him a strange and thrilling experience. Everything He saw—the hallowed sites, the metey crowd, the service of the temple, the very shocks His moral consciousness would receive from contact with those in the wilderness—His feeling of His own unique relation to the Father. Everything was for the time suspended and merged into His thought in this higher one. It was His Father's city whose streets He trod; His Father's house He visited for prayer; His Father's ordinances the crowds were assembled to observe; His Father's name, too, they were dishonoring by their formalism and hypocrisy. It is this exalted mood of the boy Jesus which explains the scene that follows—the only one rescued from oblivion in this child's growth and development.

When the time came for the busy caravan to return to Nazareth, Jesus, acting, doubtless, from highest impulse, "tarried behind" (ver 43). In the large company His absence was not at first missed, but when, at the halting-place, it became known that He was not with them, His mother and Joseph returned in deep distress to Jerusalem. Three days elapsed before they found Him in the place where naturally they should have looked first—His Father's house. There, in one of the halls or chambers where the rabbis were wont to teach, they discovered Him seated "in the midst," at the feet of the men of learning, hearing them discourse, asking questions, as pupils were permitted to do, and giving answers which awakened astonishment by their penetration and wisdom (ver 46, 47). Those who heard Him may well have thought that before them was one of the great rabbis of the future! Mary, much surprised, asked in remonstrance, "Son, why hast thou dealt thus with us?" evoking from Jesus the memorable reply, "How is it that you sought me? knew ye not that I must be in my Father's house?" or "about my Father's business?" (Av 48, 49). Here was the revelation of a self-consciousness that Mary might have been prepared for in Jesus, but perhaps, in the common intercourse of life, was tending to lose sight of. The lesson was not unneeded. Yet, once it had been given, Jesus went back with Joseph and Mary to Nazareth, and "was subject unto them, and Mary did not forget the teaching of the incident (ver 51).

III. The Forerunner and the Baptism.—Time passed, and when Jesus was nearing His 30th year, Judaea was agitated by the message of a stern preacher of righteousness who had appeared in the wilderness by the Jordan, proclaiming the imminent approach of the kingdom of heaven, summoning to repentance, and baptizing those who confessed their sins. Tiberius had succeeded Augustus on the imperial throne; Judaea, with Samaria, was now a Roman province, under the procurator Pontius Pilate. John the Baptist was divided between the tetrarch Herod (Galilee) and Philip (the eastern parts). The Baptist thus appeared at the time when the land had lost the last vestige of self-government, was politically divided, and was in great ecclesiastical confusion. Nurtured in the deserts (Lk 4:80), John's very appearance was a protest against the luxury and self-seeking of the age. He had been a Nazarene from his birth; he fed on the simplest products of nature—locusts and wild honey; his coarse garb of camel's hair and leathern girdle was a return to the dress of Elijah (2 K 1:8), in whose spirit and power he appeared (Lk 1:17; see John the Baptist).

The coming Christ.—John's preaching of the kingdom was unlike that of any of the revolutionaries of his age. It was a kingdom which could be built not only through moral preparation. It availed nothing for the Jew simply that he was a son of Abraham. The Messiah was at hand. He (John) was but a voice crying in the wilderness to prepare the way for that Greater than himself. The work of the Christ would be one of judgment and of mercy. He would lay by the axe at the root of the tree—would winnow the chaff from the wheat—yet would baptize with the Holy Spirit (Mt 3 10-12; Lk 3 15-17). Those who professed acceptance of his message, with its condition of repentance, John baptized with water at the Jordan or in its neighborhood (cf Mt 3 6; Jn 1 29, 33).

John’s startling words made a profound impression. All classes from every part of the land, including Pharisees and Sadducees

(Mt 3 7), came to his baptism. John was not deceived. He saw how little change of heart underlay it all. The indeed,

Christ whose coming it was his to herald. John, up to this time, does not seem to have personally known Jesus (cf Jn 1 31). He must, however, have heard of Him; he had, besides, received a sign by which the Messiah should be recognized (Jn 1 33); and now, when Jesus presented Himself, Divinely pure in aspect, asking baptism at his hands, the conviction was instantaneous thinly flashed on his mind, that this was He. But how should be, a sinful man, baptize this Holy One? “If I have need to be baptized, are you going to baptize me?” (Mt 3 14). The question is one which forces itself upon ourselves—How should Jesus seek or receive a “baptism of repentance”? Jesus Himself puts it off the ground of meekness, “Suffer me to fulfi all righteousness” (ver 15). The Head was content to enter by the same gateway as the members to His specific vocation in the service of the kingdom. In submitting to the baptism, He formally identified Himself with the expectation of the kingdom and with its ethical demands; separated Himself from the evil of His nation, doubtless with confession of its sins; and, devoted Himself to His life-task in bringing in the Messianic salvation. The significance of the rite as marking His consecration to, and entrance upon, His Messianic career, is seen in what follows. As He ascended from the water, while still “praying” (Lk 3 21), the heavens were opened, the Spirit of God descended like a dove upon Him, and there was a voice from on high declared: “This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased” (Mt 3 16.17). It is needless to inquire whether anyone besides John (cf Jn 1 36) and Jesus (Mt 3 16; Mk 1 10) received this visitation, or received these words; for others, the vision was primarily intended. To Christ’s consecration of Himself to His calling, there was now added the spiritual equipment necessary for the doing of His work. He went forward with the seal of the Father’s acknowledgment upon Him.

IV. The Temptation.—On the narrative of the baptism in the first three Gospels there follows at once the account of the temptation of Jesus in the wilderness. The psychological naturalness of the incident is generally acknowledged. The baptism of Jesus was a crisis in His experience. He had been ploughed by the Spirit for His work; the heavens had been opened to Him; and His mind was agitated by new thoughts and emotions; He was conscious of the possession of new powers. There was need for a period of retirement, of still reflection, of coming to a complete understanding with Himself as to the meaning of the task to which He had been committed, the manner in which He should employ, the attitude He should take up toward popular hopes and expectations. He would wish to be alone. The Spirit of God led Him (Mt 4 1; Mk 1 12; Lk 4 1) whither His own spirit also impelled. It is with a touch of similar motive that Buddhist legend makes Buddha to be tempted by the evil spirit Mara after he has attained enlightenment.

The scene of the temptation was the wilderness of Judea. Jesus was there 40 days, during which, it is told, He neither ate nor drank.

2. Nature

(cf the fasts of Moses and Elijah, of the Ex 34 18; 34 28; Dt 9 18; 1 K 19 8) Temptation 8). Mk adds, “He was with the wild beasts” (ver 15). The period was probably one of intense self-concentration. During the whole of it He endured temptations of Satan (Mt 4 1; Mk 1 13); but the special assaults came at the end (Mt 4 2 ff; Lk 4 2 ff). We assume here a real tempter and real temptations—the question of diabolic agency being considered after. This, however, does not settle the form of the temptations. The struggle was probably an inward one. It can hardly be supposed that Jesus was literally transported by the devil to a pinnacle of the temple, then to a high mountain, then, presumably, back again to the wilderness. The narrative must have come from Jesus Himself, and embodies an ideal or parabolic element. “The history of the temptation,” Lange says, “Jesus afterwards communicated to His disciples in the form of a real narrative, clothed in symbolic language” (Comm. on Mt, 83, ET).

The stages of the temptation were three—in each in its own way a trial of the spirit of obedience.

(1) The first temptation was to distrust. Jesus, after His long fast was an hungry. He had become conscious also of super-

3. Stages natural powers. The point on which of the temptation laid hold was His Temptation sense of hunger—the most overwhelming of appetites. “If thou art the Son of God, command that these stones become bread.” The design was to excite distrustful and rebellious thoughts, and lead Jesus to use the powers entrusted to Him in an unlawful way, for private and selfish ends. The temptation was promptly met by a quotation from Scripture: “Man shall not live by bread alone,” etc (Mt 4 4; Lk 4 4; cf of Dt 8 3). If Jesus was in this position, it was His Father who had brought Him there for purposes of temptation. “If man hath not bread, how can he be sustained on bread; a life, found in depending on God’s word, and obeying it at whatever cost.

(2) The second temptation (in Lk the third) was to presumption. Jesus is borne in spirit (cf Ezk 40 1,2) to this dizzy elevation He is invited to cast Himself down, relying on the Divine promise: “He shall give His angels charge over thee,” etc (cf Ps 91 11,12). In this way an easy demonstration of His Messiahship would be given to the crowds below. The temptation was to overstep those bounds of humility and dependence which were imposed on Him as Son; to play with signs and wonders in His work as Messiah. But again the tempter is foiled by the word: “Thou shalt not make trial of (try experiments with, propose tests, put to the proof) the Lord thy God” (Mt 4 7; Lk 4 12; cf of Dt 6 16). (3) The third temptation (Lk’s second) was to worldly sovereignty, gained by some small concession to Satan. From some lofty elevation—no place on a geographical map—the kingdoms of the world and the glory of them are flashed before Christ’s mind, and all are offered to Him on condition of one little act of homage to the tempter. It was the temptation to choose the easier path, certain of a path leading to falsehood, and Jesus definitely repelled it by the saying: “Thou shalt worship the Lord thy God, and Him only shalt thou serve” (Mt 4 10; Lk 4 8). Jesus had chosen His path. The Father’s way of the cross would be adhered to.

tion typify the whole round of Satanic assault on man through body, mind, and spirit (Lk 4:13; cf 1 Jn 2:16), and the spirit of Messiah temptation. Jesus was constantly being tempted (a) to spare Himself; (b) to gratify the Jewish sign-seekers; (c) to gain power by sacrifice of the right. In principle the victory was gained over all at the commencement. His way was henceforth clear.

B. THE EARLY JUDEAN MINISTRY

I. THE TESTIMONIES OF THE BAPTIST.—While the Synoptics pass immediately from the temptation of Jesus to the ministry in Galilee after the imprisonment of the Baptist (Mt Synoptics 4: 12; Mk 1:14-15; Lk 4:14), the Fourth Gospel furnishes the account, full of interest, of the earlier ministry of Jesus in Judea while the Baptist was still at liberty.

The Baptist had announced Christ’s coming; had baptized Him when He appeared; it was now his privilege to testify to Him as having come. (Jn 1:4-5, 18-19.)

2. Threefold Term: John’s Work—John’s work was assumed proportions which made it impossible for the ecclesiastical authorities any longer to ignore him (Lk 1:7-17; the deputation consisting of priests and Levites was accordingly sent to John, where he was baptizing at Bethany beyond Jordan, to put him categorically questions. John’s work was to identify the Baptist, test him, and give the answer. He was not the Christ, not Elijah, not the prophet. His answer grows plainer every time, “I am not the Christ”; “I am not”; “No,” Who was he then? The answer was emphatic. He was but a “voice” (cf Is 40:3)—a preparer of the way of the Lord. In their midst already stood One—not necessarily in the crowd at that moment—with whose greatness his was not to be compared (vs 26-27). John utterly effaces himself before Christ.

The day after the interview with the Jewish deputation, John saw Jesus coming to him—probably fresh from the temptation—and bore a second and wonderful testimony to His Messiahship. Identifying Jesus with the Baptist’s prophecies, and stating the ground of His knowledge in the sign God had given him (vs 29-34), he said, “Behold, the Lamb of God, that taketh away the sin of the world.” (ver 29). The words are rich in suggestion regarding the character of Jesus, and the nature, universality and efficacy of His work (cf 1 Jn 3:5). The “Lamb” may point specifically to the description of the vicariously Suffering Servant of Jehovah in Is 53.11. The third testimony was borne again on the morrow, when John was standing with two of his disciples (one Andrew, ver 40, the other doubtless the evangelist himself). Pointing to Jesus, the Baptist repeated his former words, “Behold, the Lamb of God.” While the words are the same, the design was different. In the Disciple Testimony, Christ and the Duty of the same, the design was different. In the Disciple first “behold” the idea is the recognition of Christ; in the second there is a calling to follow Jesus. On this hint the disciples immediately acted (ver 37). It is next to be seen how this earliest “following” of Jesus grew.

II. THE FIRST DISCIPLES.—John’s narrative shows that Jesus gathered His disciples, less by a series of interviews, than by His daily ministry. The history confutes the idea that it was first toward the close of His ministry that Jesus became known to His disciples as the Messiah. In John’s account of the Baptist it was the Christ that the Baptist introduced Jesus; it was the Christ that the disciples accepted and confessed Him (vs 41-45, 49).

The first of the group were Andrew and John—the unnamed disciple of ver 40. These followed Jesus in consequence of their Master’s testimony. It was, however, the few and John—bears—converse they had with Jesus. (Jn 1:35-40) (vs 3-40) —the 10th hour, i.e. 10 AM—is one of the small traits that mark St. John.

John and Andrew had no sooner found Christ for themselves ("We have found the Messiah," ver 41) than they hastened to tell others of their discovery. Andrew at once went to Simon, his brother, and Discipleship brought him Jesus (John 1:35-40). John sought Nathanael (ver 45)."Christ’s" Personal unerring eye read at once the quality of the Testimony of the man whom Andrew introduced (vs 41-42) to Him. "Thou art Simon "Rock" or "Stone" (ver 42)." Mt 16.18, therefore, is not the original bestowal of this name, but the confirmation of it. The name is the equivalent of "Peter" (Pétreos), and was given to Simon, not with any official connotation, but because of the strength and clearness of his convictions. His general steadfastness is not disproved by His one unhappy failure. (Was it thus the apostle acquired the name "Peter"?)

The fourth disciple, Philip, was called by Jesus Himself, when He went to depart for Galilee (ver 43). This may have had a double reason:

1) Philip—on Philip (like the foregoing, he also the Result was from Bethsaida of Galilee, ver 44), of Scriptural but that which chiefly decided him was the correspondence of what he found (vs 43-44) in Jesus with the prophetic testimonies (ver 45).

Philip sought Nathanael (of Cana of Galilee, 21)—the same probably as Bartholomew the Apostle—and told him he had found of whom Moses in the law and the prophets had written (ver 45). Nathanael doubted, on the ground that the Messiah was not likely to have His origin in an obscure place like Nazareth (ver 46; cf 7:52). Philip’s wise answer was, "Come and see": and when Nathanael came, the Lord met him with a word which speedily rid him of his hesitations. First, Jesus attested His seeker’s sincerity ("Behold, an Israelite indeed," etc, ver 47); then, on Nathanael expressing surprise, revealed to him His knowledge of a recent secret act of meditation or devotion ("when thou wast under the fig tree," ver 48). The sign was sufficient to convince Nathanael that he was in the presence of a superhuman, nay a Divine, Person. The Christ—"Son of God . . . . King of Israel" (ver 49). Jesus met his faith with further self-disclosure. Nathan anael had believed on comparatively slight evidence; he would see greater things: heavens opened, and the angels of God ascending and descending upon the Son of Man (ver 51). The allusion is to Jacob's dream (Gen 28:10-12), a Scripture which had possibly been the theme of Philip's, which done in his privacy. Jesus puts Himself in place of that mystic ladder as the medium of reopened communication between heaven and earth.

The name "Son of Man"—a favorite designation of Jesus for Himself—appears here for the first time in the Gospel. John disputed whether it was a current Messianic title (see Son of Man), and had this force on the lips of Jesus Himself, denoting Him as the possessor of a true humanity, and as standing in a representative relation to mankind universally. It is probably borrowed from the Apocalypse, which has a similar title (Revelations 1:13).

2. "Son of Man" and "Son of God"

Apocalyptic Literature. The higher title, "Son of God," given to Jesus by Nathanael, could not, of course, as yet carry with it the transcendental associations of John's Prologue (1:14-18), but it evidently conveyed an idea of superhuman dignity and unique relation to God, such as the better class of minds would seem to have attributed to the Messiah (cf John 5:18, 10:33; cf. Acts 7:66).

III. The First Events.—An interval of a few weeks is occupied by a visit of Jesus to Cana of Galilee (John 2:1-11) and a brief sojourn in Capernaum (vers 12); after which Jesus returned to Jerus.

1. The First Galilee (ver 11). The marriage was a miracle—doubtless that of some relative of the (Jn 2:1-11) family, and the presence of Jesus at the feast, with His mother, brethren and disciples (as Joseph no more appears, it may be concluded that he was dead), is significant as showing that His religion is not one of antagonism to natural relations. The marriage festivities lasted seven days, and toward the close the wine provided for the guests gave out. Mary interpreted with an indistinct suggestion that Jesus might supply the want. Christ's reply, lit. "Woman, what is that to thee and to me?" (ver 4), is not intended to convey the least tinge of reproof (cf Westcott, in loc.), but intimates that Mary's actions were haphazard and to be guided by a rule other than hers (cf Luke 2:51). This, however, as Mary saw (ver 5), did not preclude an answer to her desire. Six waterpots of stone stood near, and Jesus ordered these to be filled with water (the quantity was large; about 50 gallons); when the water was drawn off it was found changed into a nobler element—a wine purer and better than could have been obtained from any natural vintage. The ruler of the feast, in ignorance of its origin, expressed surprise at its quality (ver 10). Theileia—"a sign" (ver 11)—and may be contrasted with the first miracle of Moses—turning the water into blood (Ex 7:20). It points to the contrast between the old dispensation and the new, and to the work of Christ as a transforming, curing and glorifying of the natural, through Divine grace and power.

After a brief stay at Capernaum (ver 12), Jesus went up to Jerus to keep the Passover. There it was His design formally to manifest Himself. Other "signs" He had at the feast, leading many to believe on Him—not, however, with a deep or enduring faith (vers 23-25)—but the special act by which He signalized His appearance was His public cleansing of the temple from the irreligious trafficking with which it had come to be associated.

A like incident is related by the Synoptists at the close of Christ's ministry (Matthew 21:12-18; Mark 11:15-18; Luke 19:44-46), and it is a question whether the act was actually repeated, or whether the event does not constitute the special act of the early ministry, simply record it out of its chronological order. In any case, the act was a fitting inauguration of the Lord's work. A regular sacrificial market was held in the outer court of the temple. Here the animals needed for sacrifice could be purchased, foreign money exchanged, and the doves, which were the offerings of the poor, be obtained. It was a busy, tumultuous, noisy and unholy scene, and the "zeal" of Jesus burned within Him—had doubtless often done so before—as He witnessed it. Arming Himself with a scourgery of cords, less as a weapon of defence, than as a symbol of authority, He descended with resistless energy upon the wrangling throng, drove out the dealers and the cattle, overthrew the tables of the money-changers, and commanded the doves to be taken away. Let them not profane His Father's house (John 2:14-16). No one seems to have opposed. All felt that a prophet was among them. He resisted the overpowering authority with which He spoke and acted. By and by, when their courage revived, they asked Him for a "sign" in evidence of His right to do such things. Jesus gave them no sign such as this demanded, but uttered an enigmatic word, and left them to reflect on it, "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (ver 19). The authenticity of the saying is sufficiently vouched for by the perverted use made of it at Christ's trial (Matthew 26:61). It is a word based on the foresight which Christ had that the conflict now commencing was to end in His rejection and death. "The true way to destroy the Temple, in the eyes of Jesus, was to slay the Messiah.... If it is in the person of the Messiah that the Temple is laid in ruins, it is in His person it shall be raised again" (Godet).

The disciples, after the resurrection, saw the meaning of the word (John 2:22).

As a sequel to these stirring events Jesus had a nocturnal interview with the publican Nicodemus—a Pharisee, a ruler of the Jews, a "teacher of Israel" (ver 10), apparently no noble: longer young (ver 4). His coming by night, according to Jesus' saying (John 3:1-39); but the interesting thing is that he did come, showing that he had been really impressed by Christ's words and works. One recognizes in him a man of candor and uprightness of spirit, yet without adequate apprehensions of Christ. Himself, and of the nature of Christ's kingdom. Jesus was prepared to acknowledge as a Divinely commissioned teacher—one whose mission was accredited by miracle (ver 2). He was interested in the kingdom, but, as a morally living man, had no doubt of his fitness to enter into it. Jesus had but to teach and He would understand.

1. The new birth. Jesus in His reply laid His finger at once on the defective point in His visitor's relation to Himself and His kingdom: "Except one be born anew, he cannot see the kingdom of God" (ver 3); "Except one be born of water and the Spirit, he cannot enter into the kingdom of God" (ver 5). Nicodemus was staggered at this demand for a spiritual new birth, but Jesus declared that proselytes were baptized on being received into the Jewish church, and their baptism was called a "new birth." Nicodemus would therefore be familiar with the expression, but could not see that it had any applicability to himself. Jesus teaches him, on the other hand, that he also needs a new birth, and this, not through water only, but through the Spirit. The change was mysterious, yet plainly wrought in secret to convince those who did not understand these "earthly things"—the evidence of which lay all around him—how should he understand "heavenly things," the things pertaining to salvation?

(2) "Heavenly things."—These "heavenly things" Jesus now proceeds to unfold to Nicodemus: "As Moses lifted up the serpent, so will it be with the Son of Man; he will be lifted up, that whoever believes in him may have life in his name" (Jn 3:14-15). The "lifting up" is a prophecy of the cross (cf. 12:32-34). The brazen serpent is the symbol of sin conquered and destroyed by the death of Christ. What follows in 3:16-21 is probably the evangelist's expansion of this theme—God's love of the sorrows of man (ver. 16). God's purpose not the world's condemnation, but its salvation (vs 17, 18) the self-judgment of sin (vs 19 ff).

Retiring from Jerusalem, Jesus commenced a ministry in Judaea (ver. 22). It lasted apparently about 6 months. The earlier Gospels pass over it. This is accounted for by the fact that the ministry in Judaea was still preparatory. Jesus had publicly asserted His Messianic authority. A little space is now allowed to test the result.

Meanwhile Jesus descends again to the work of preparing His people for the preparatory. His ministry was now a stage hardly distinguishable from John's. He summons to the baptism of repentance. His disciples, not Himself, administer the rite (3:23; 4:2) hence the sort of rivalry that sprang up between His baptism and that of the forerunner (3:22-26). John was baptizing at the time at Aenon, on the western side of the Jordan; Jesus somewhere in the neighborhood. Soon the greater teacher began to eclipse the less. "All men came to Him" (ver. 26). John's reply foretold the next step. John, baptizing in the Jordan, said, "I am not the Christ. I lay the nature of things that Jesus must increase; I must decrease (vs 27-30)."

Explanatory words follow (vs 31-36). I. IV. Journey to Galilee—the Woman of Samaria. Toward the close of this discourse the Baptist appears to have been cast into prison for his faithfulness in reproving Herod Antipas for taking his brother Philip's wife (cf Jn 3:24; Mt 14:3). Just at the time of the departure to Galilee in Jn 4 with that narrated in Mt 3:13, though some think the imprisonment of the Baptist did not take place till later. The motive which Jn gives was the hostility of the Pharisees, but it was the imprisonment of the Baptist which led Jesus to commence, at the time He did, an independent ministry. The direct road to Galilee lay through Samaria; hence the memorable encounter with the woman at that place.

Jesus being wearied, paused to rest Himself at Jacob's well, near a town called Sychar, now 'Askar. It was about the sixth hour—or 6 o'clock in the evening. The time of year is determined by ver 35 to be December, though there is no reason for not taking this literally). It suits the evening hour that the woman of Samaria came out to draw water. (Some, on a different reckoning, take the hour to be noon.) Therefore as occurring at an interval of only 3 or 4 months after the return. This seems impossible in view of the crowding of events. Perhaps a plot of time—opening incidents, stay in Capernaum (Mt 4:11), three circuits in "all Galilee" (Mt 4:23-25); Lk 8:1-4; Mt 9:38-39; Mt 6:12, Lester E. Sumption, "Sermon on Mount: Gadara"; and the dislocations it necessitates, e.g., the sudden appearance of the Roman centurion's servant (about Passover time) must be placed after the feeding of the multitude etc. It is simpler to adhere to the three years' scheme.

A division of the Galilean ministry may only be made into two periods—one preceding, the other succooling the Mission of the Twelve in Mt 10 11. One reason for this division is that after the Mission of the Twelve the book of Luke is the same as in the first three evangelists till the final departure from Galilee.

First Period—From the Beginning of the Ministry in Galilee till the Mission of the Twelve

1. Opening Incidents.—From sympathetic Samaria (Jn 4 39), Jesus journeyed to unsympathetic Galilee, and first to Cana, where His first miracle had been wrought. The reports of His miracles had of late made Him a household word (Jn 4:43-54 45), and it was mainly His reputation as a miracle-worker which led a nobleman—a courtier or officer at Herod’s court—to seek Him at Cana on behalf of his son, who was near to death. Jesus rebuked the sign-seeking spirit (ver 48), but, on the fervent appeal being repeated, He bade the nobleman go his way: his son lived. The man’s prayer had been, ‘Come down’; but he had faith to receive the word of Jesus (ver 50), and on his way home received tidings of his son’s recovery. The nobleman, with his whole household, was won for Jesus (ver 53). This is noted as the second of Christ’s Galilean miracles (ver 54).

A very different reception awaited Him at Nazareth, ‘His own country,’ to which He went next for a time. He could scarcely take the incident recorded in Lk 4 16-30 to be the same as that Visit to in Mt 13 54-58, though Matthew’s narrative of the Nazareth (Mt 4:13; Lk 4:16-30) is founded on His entering the synagogue, as was His wont, the reputed He had won led to His being asked to read. The Scripture He selected (or which came in the order of the day) was Isa 61 1 ff. (the fact that Jesus was able to read from the synagouge-coll is interesting as bearing on His knowledge of Heb.), and from this He proceeded to amaze His hearers by declaring that this Scripture was now fulfilled in their ears (ver 21). The ‘words of grace’ He uttered are not given, but it can be understood that, following the prophet’s guidance, He would hold Himself forth as the predicted ‘Servant of Jehovah,’ sent to bring salvation to the poor, the bound, the broken-hearted, and for this purpose endowed with the fulness of the Spirit. The idea that the passage in Isa is that of the year of jubilee, when debts were canceled, inheritances restored, and slaves set free, and Jesus told them He had come to inaugurate that ‘acceptable year of the Lord.’ At first He was listened with admiration, then, as the magnitude of the claims He was making became apparent to His audience, a very different spirit took possession of them. ‘Who was this that spoke thus?’ ‘Was it not Joseph’s son’ (ver 22). They were disappointed, too, that Jesus showed no disposition to gratify them by working before them any of the miracles of which they had heard so much (ver 23). Jesus saw the gathering storm, but met it resolutely. He told His hearers He had not expected any better reception, and in reply to their reproach that He had wrought miracles elsewhere, but had wrought none among them, quoted examples of prophets who had done the same thing (Elijah, Elisha, vs 24-28). This completed the exasperation of the Nazarenes, who, springing forward, dragged Him to the brow of the hill on which their city was built, and would have thrown Him down, had something in the aspect of Jesus not restrained them. With one of those looks we read of occasionally in the Gospels, He seemed to have overawed His townsmen, and, passing through the midst of them, left the place (vs 28-30).

After leaving Nazareth Jesus made His way to Capernaum (probably Tell Hum), which thereafter seems to have been His headquarters. He “dwelt” there (Mt 4 13). It is called in Mt 9 1, “His own city.” Before teaching in Capernaum itself, however, He appears to have opened His ministry by evangelizing along the shores of Lake Galilee (Mt 4:17-22; Mk 1:16-22; Lk 5:1-11). His first step in gathering His chosen disciples more closely around Him. Hitherto, though attached to His person and cause, the pairs of fisher brothers, Simon and Andrew, James and John—these last the “sons of Zebedee”—had not been in constant attendance upon Him. Since the return from Jesus, they had gone back to their ordinary avocations. The four were “partners” (Lk 5 10). They had “hired servants” (Mk 1 20); therefore were moderately well off. The time had now come when they were to leave “all,” and follow Jesus entirely.

Luke alone records the striking miracle which led to the call. Jesus had been teaching the multitude from a boat borrowed from Simon, and a) The Draught of Fishes (Lk 5:1-10) and b) “Fishers of Men” (Mk 1:16-20; Lk 5:1-9). The miracle gave Jesus opportunity for the word He wished to speak. It is here that Mt and Mk agree in the story, and both tell that Jesus had been brought to shore when first, to gratify the fishermen and to take fishers of men. At once all was left—boats, nets, friends—and they followed Him. Their experience taught them to have large expectations from Christ.

Jesus is now found in Capernaum. An early Sabbath—perhaps the first of Its kind in the city—was marked by notable events.

4. At Capernaum (Mt 4:13; Lk 4:31) The Sabbath found Jesus as usual teaching the people in the synagogue—now as teacher. The manner of His teaching they had especially noticed: “He taught them as having authority, and not as the scribes” (Mk 1 22). The scribes gave forth nothing of their own. They but repeated the dicta of the great authors of the past. It was a surprise to the people to find in Jesus One whose wisdom, like waters from a clear fountain, came fresh and sparkling from His own lips. The authority also with which Jesus spoke commanded attention. He sought support in the opinion of no others, but gave forth His statements with firmness, decision, dignity and emphasis.

While Jesus was teaching an extraordinary incident occurred. A man in the assembly, described as possessed by “an unclean spirit” (Mk 1 23; Lk 4 33), broke forth in crees, addressing Jesus by name (“Jesus, thou Nazarene”), speaking of Him as the Holy One of God,” and asking “What have we to do with thee? Art thou come to destroy us?” The diseased consciousness of the sufferer bore a truer testimony to Christ’s dignity, holiness and power than most of those present could... have given, and instinctively, but truly, construed His coming as meaning destruction to the empire of the demons. At Christ’s word, after a terrible passage from the naked evil, but, however, the man escaped unhurt (Lk 4:35), the demon was cast out. More than ever the people were “amazed” at the word which had such power (Mk 1:27).

Demon-possession—its reality.—This is the place to say a word on this terrible form of malady—demonpossession—not as often in the Gospels. Was it a reality? or a hallucination? Did Jesus believe in it?
Was He influenced by the Gospels, and not answer the last question in the affirmative. Was Jesus, then, mighty hard to believe. If there is one subject on which Jesus might be expected to have clear vision—on which we might trust His insight—it was His relation to the spiritual world with which He stood in so close rapport. Was He likely then to be mistaken when He spoke so clearly from the quantities, of its hidden forces of evil? There is in itself no improbability—rather analogy suggests the highest probability—of realms of spiritual existence outside our sensitive ken. That evil should enter this spiritual world, and that human life should be deeply implicated with that evil—that its forces should have a mind and will organizing and directing them—are not beliefs to be dismissed with scorn. The presence of such beliefs in the time of Christ is commonly attributed to Baal, Pers or other foreign cults. It may be questioned, however, whether the main cause was not something far more real—an actual and permitted “hour and the power of the darkness” (Lk 1:33) in the world of evil, discovering itself in manifestations in the bodies and souls of men, that could be a supernatual cause (see Demonic Possession). (The present writer discusses the subject in an art. in the Sunday School Times for June 4, 1910. It is difficult to say that the instance in the Gospels have no modern parallels. See a striking paper in Good News, May 6, 1910, cf. Dr. Norman MacLeod, Enquired for 1867, on “The English Demonic.”) It should be noted that all diseases are not, as is sometimes affirmed, the only demonic influence. The distinction between other diseases and demonic possession is clearly maintained in this Sunday’s lesson (Lk 8:1; 1:11, etc.). Insanity, epilepsy, blindness, dumbness, etc., were frequent accompaniments of possession, but they are not identified with it.

Jesus, on leaving the synagogue, entered the house of Peter. In Mk it is called “the house of Simon Andrew” (Lk 4:36, Peter), 15; Mk 1:29—“a great fever,” as Luke the physician calls it. Taking her by the hand, Jesus rebuked the fever, which instantaneously left her. The miracle, indeed, was a double one. Not only was she stayed, but her strength was at once restored. “She rose up and ministered unto them” (Lk 4:39).

II. From First Galilean Circuit till Choice of the Apostles.—The chronological order in this section is to be sought in Mk and Lk;

1. The First Circuit (Mk 1:14-20), preparatory for the preaching of Christ.

a) The Opening of Christ’s Ministry
(Mt 4:17; Mk 1:14) The eventful

Sabbath evening in Capernaum, Jesus
Lk 4:42—took steps for a systematic visitation of the towns and villages of Galilee.

b) The Task He Set Before Himself was prayer (Mk 1:35; many instances show that Christ’s life was steeped in prayer). His disciples followed Him, and reported that the multitudes sought Him. Jesus intimated to them His intention of passing to the other side in the morning. It was a work like any methodically conducted (cf Mk 6:4; “went round about the villages,” lit. “in a circle”). Galilee at this time was extraordinarily populous (cf Jos, EJ, III, ii, 2), and the time occupied by the circuit must have been considerable. Mk’s condensed picture (4:25-26) shows that Christ’s activities during this circuit was incredibly great. He stirred the province to its depths. His preaching and miracles drew enormous crowds after Him. This tide of popularity afterward turned, but much of the seed sown may have produced fruit at a later day.

The one incident recorded which seems to have belonged to this tour was a sufficiently typical one. While Jesus was in a certain city
b) Cure of a man “full of leprosy” (Lk 5:12) the Lepers came and threw him down there (Mt 8:4-2; Lk 5:12) did not even ask Jesus to heal him, entrusted to the care of the leper, who was the very essence of His importance. Jesus, moved by his earnestness, touched him, and the man was made whole on the spot. The leper was enjoined to keep silence—Jesus did not wish to pass for a mere miracle-worker and made the man show himself to the priests and offer the appointed sacrifices (note Christ’s respect for the legal institutions). The leper failed to keep Christ’s charge, and published his cure abroad, no doubt much to his own spiritual detriment, and also to the hindrance of Christ’s work (Mk 1:45).

His circuit ended, Jesus returned to Capernaum (Mk 2:1; lit. “after days”). Here again His fame at once drew multitudes to see and hear Him. Among them were new persons of more unfriendly spirit.

Incidents Pharisees and doctors, learning of the new rabbi, had come out of “every village of Galilee and Judaea and Jerusalem” (Lk 5:17), to hear and judge of Him for themselves.
The chief incidents of this visit are the two now to be noted.

In a chamber crowded till there was no standing room, even round the door, Jesus wrought the cure upon the paralytic man. The scene
b) Cure of a man was a dramatic one. From Christ’s the words “son,” lit. “child” (Mk 2:5) of the paraly-ic (Mt 9:2) we infer that the paralytic was young, but his disableness seems to have been

by the easy manner with the doorways blocked, to get the man brought to Jesus, but his four bearers (ver 3) were not easily daunted. They climbed the flat roof, and, removing part of the covering above where Jesus was, let down the man into the midst. Jesus, pleased with the inventivity and perseverance of their faith, responded to their wish. But, first, that the spiritual and temporal might be set in their right relations, and the attitude of His hearers be tested, He spoke the higher words: “Son, thy sins are forgiven” (ver 5).

At once the temper of the scribes was revealed. Here was manifest evasion. Anyone could say, “Thy sins are forgiven.” Worse, it was blaspheous, for “who can forgive sins but one, even God?” (ver 7). Unconsciously they were conceding to Christ the Divine dignity He claimed. Jesus perceives at once the thoughts of the cavilers, and proceeds to expose their malice. Accepting their own test, He proves His right to say, "Thy sins are forgiven," by now saying to the palsied man, "Take up thy bed and walk" (vs. 9.11). At once the man arose, took his bed, and went forth whole. The multitude were "amazed" and "glorified God" (ver. 12).

The call of Matthew apparently took place shortly after the cure of the paralytic man. The feast was possibly later (cf. the conclusion of the Feast of Mt 9:18), but the call and the feast Matthew are best taken together, as they are (Mt 9:9–13; Mk 2:1) in all three narratives.

b) Call and narrative (Mk 2:13–17). The feast of Alpheus by Mark. By occupation he was a "publican" (Lk 5:27), collector of custom-dues in Capernaum, an important center of traffic. There is no reason to suppose that Matthew was not a man of thorough uprightness, though naturally the class to which he belonged was held in great odium by the Jews. Passing the place of toll on His way to or from the lake-side, Jesus called Matthew to follow Him. The publican must by this have overheard His word, and could not but keenly feel His grace in calling one whom men despised. Without an instant’s delay, he left all, and followed Jesus. From publican, Matthew became apostle, then evangelist.

Then for the feast of the joy of his heart, Matthew made a feast for Jesus. To this feast he invited many of his own class—"publicans and sinners" (Mt 9:10). Scribes and Pharisees were loud in their remonstrances to the disciples at what seemed to them an outrage on all propriety. Nor could their hearts understand the breadth of grace. Christ’s reply was conclusive: "They that are whole have no need of a physician, but they that are sick," etc. (Mk 2:17, etc.).

(3) Fasting and joy.—Another line of objection was encountered from disciples of the Baptist. They, like the Pharisees, "fasted of" (Mt 9:14), and they took exception to the unconstrained way in which Jesus and His disciples entered into social life. Jesus defends His disciples by adopting a manner of His own (Mk 2:29). "I will show you another more excellent (ver. 20). A deeper answer follows. The spirit of His Gospel is a free, spontaneous, joyful spirit, and cannot be confined within the old forms. To attempt to confine His religion within the outworn forms of Judaism would be like putting a patch of undressed cloth on an old garment, or pouring new wine into old wineskins. The garment would be rent; the wineskins would burst (ver. 21.22)."
The new spirit must make forms of its own.

At this point is probably to be introduced the visit to Jerus to attend "a feast," or, according to another reading, "the feast" of the Jews, recorded in Jn 6. The feast may, if the article is admitted, have been the Passover (April), though in Feast that case one would expect it to be named; it may have been Purim (March), only this is not a feast Jesus might be thought eager to attend; it may even have been Pentecost (June). In either case it would succeed the Sabbath controversies to be mentioned later. Fortunately, the determination of the actual feast has little bearing on the teaching of the chapter.

Bethesda ("house of mercy") was the name given to a pool, fed by an intermittent spring, possessing healing properties, which was situated
c) The Healing at i.e. near the temple, on the E. Porches Bethesda were erected to accommodate the invalids who desired to make trial of the waters (the mention of the angel, ver 4, with part of ver 3, is a later gloss, and is justly omitted in RV). On one of these porches lay an impotent man. His infirmity was of long standing—38 years. But his heart sick, for he had no friend, when the waters were troubled, to put him into the pool. Others invariably got down before him. Jesus took pity on this man. He asked him if he would be made whole; then by a word of power healed him. The cure was instantaneous (vs. 9.9). It was the Sabbath day, and as the man, at Christ’s command, took up his bed to go, he was challenged as doing that which was unlawful. The healed man, however, rightly perceived that He who was able to work so great a cure had authority to say what should and should not be done on the Sabbath. Meeting the man after in the temple, Jesus bade him "sin no more"—a hint, perhaps, that his previous infirmity was of his own evil. Jesus Himself was now challenged by the authorities for breaking the Sabbath. Their strait, artificial rules would not permit even of Jesus as the "Son of Man," and "a notorious assertion of His Divine dignity. He first justified Himself by the example of His Father, who works continually in the upholding and government of the universe (ver. 17)—the Sabbath is a day from earthy labors, for Divine, heavenly labor (Westcott, when he increased the offence by its suggestion of "equality" with the Father, so that His life was threatened (ver 18). He spoke yet more explicitly of His unique relationship to the Father, and of the Divine prerogatives it conferred upon Him. The Jews were right: if Jesus were not a Divine Person, the claims He made would be blasphemous. Not only was He admitted to intimacy with the Divine counsel (vs. 20.21; cf. Mk 11.27), but to Him, He averred, and speaking of the given of life (vs. 21.26), of judgment (vs. 22.27), of resurrection—spiritual resurrection now (vs. 24.25), resurrection at the last day (vs. 28.29). It was the Father’s will that the Son should be honored even as Himself (ver. 23).

These stupendous claims are not made without adequate attestation. Jesus cites a threefold witness: (1) the witness of the Baptist, whose testimony they had been all along to understand. (2) The Threefold witness, willing for a time to receive (vs. 32–35); (3) the witness of the Father, who by witnessing to Himself (vs. 36–38); (3) the witness of the Scripture, for these, if read with spiritual discernment, would have led to Him (vs. 39.42–47). Moses, whom they trusted, would condemn them. Their rejection of Jesus was due, not to want of light, but to the state of the heart: "I know you, that ye have not the love of God in yourselves" (ver 42); "How can ye believe," etc. (ver 44).

Shortly after His return to Galilee, if the order of events has been rightly apprehended, Jesus became involved in new disputes with the Pharisees about Sabbath-keeping. Partly in the interest of the charges brought against Him at the feast in Judaea. Christ’s conduct, and the principles involved in His replies, throw valuable light on the Sabbath institution.
Jesus Christ

The first dispute was occasioned by the action of the disciples in plucking ears of grain and rubbing them in their hands as they passed through the cornfields on a Sabbath. (The note of time "second-first" in Lk 6:1 AV, is omitted in RV. In any case the ripened grain points to a Sabbath, 1 S 21:6; the priests' service on the Sabbath—"One greater than the temple" was there, Mt 12:6), in illustration of the truth that necessity overrides positive enactment; next, falls back on the broad principle of the design of the Sabbath as made for man—for his highest physical, mental, moral and spiritual well-being: "The sabbath was made for man," etc (Mk 2:27). The claims of mercy are paramount. The end is not to be sacrificed to the means. The Son of Man, therefore, asserts lordship over the Sabbath (ver 26).

The second collision took place on "another sabbath" (Lk 6:6) in the synagogue. There was present a man with a withered hand.

b) The Man with the Withered Hand (Mt 12:10-14; Mk 3:1-6; Lk 6:6-11) was healed on the Sabbath day (vs 11,12), then, bidding the man stand forth, retorted the question on themselves, "Is it lawful to do a work of healing on the sabbath day?" (Mt 12:10). Jesus met the question by an appeal to their own practice in permitting the rescue of a sheep that had fallen into a pit on the Sabbath.

c) Withdrawal to the Sea (Mt:12:15-21; Mk 3:7-9) of His disciples, to escape the Pharisees who were seeking a way to entangle Him in some unanswerable question.

The work of Jesus was growing on His hands, and friends and enemies were rapidly taking sides. The time accordingly had come for selecting and attaching to His person a definite number of followers—not simply disciples—who might be prepared to carry on His work after His departure.

5. The Choosing of the Twelve (Mt: 10; Mk 3:14; Lk: 10:1; Acts 1:13) was made in the early morning, on the Mount of Beatitudes, after a night spent wholly in prayer. (Lk 6:12). “Apostle” means “one sent.” On the special function of the apostle it is sufficient to say here that those thus set apart were chosen for the special end of being Christ’s witnesses and accredited ambassadors to the world.

a) The Apostolic testimony to what Christ had been, said and done— to the facts of His life, death and resurrection (cf Acts 1:22: 23:22-32; 3:15; 10:39; 1 Cor 16:3-15, etc), but, further, as instructed by Him, and endowed with His Spirit (cf Lk 24:49; Jn 14:16.17.26, etc), of being the depositaries of His truth, sharers of His authority (cf Mt 10:1; Mk 13:15), messengers of His gospel (cf 2 Cor 5:18-21), and His instruments in laying broad and strong the foundations of His church (cf Eph 2:20; 3:5). So responsible a calling was never, before or after, given to mortal men.

Four lists of the apostles are given—in Mt, Mk, Lk, and Acts (1:13, omitting Judas). The names are given alike in all, except that "Judas, the son (or brother) of James" is omitted in Mk 6:16; Acts 1:13 is called by Mt "Lebbæus," and by Mk "Thaddæus." The latter names are cognate in meaning, and all denote the same person. "Bartholomew" (son of Tolmas) is probably the Nathanael of John (cf Lk 10:2; Jn 21:2). The epithet "Cananaean" (Mt 10:4; Mk 3:18) marks "Simon" as then or previously a member of the party of the Zealots (Lk 6:15). In all the lists Peter, through his gifts of leadership, stands first; Judas Iscariot, the betrayer, is last. There is a tendency to arrangement in pairs: Peter and Andrew; James and John; Philip and Bartholomew; Thomas and Matthew; lastly, James, the son of Alphaeus; Judas, son or brother of James, Simon the Zealot and Judas Iscariot. There are pairs of brothers (three, if "brother" be read with Judas), and at least one pair of friends (Philip and Nathanael).

All the apostles were men from the humbler ranks, yet not illiterate, and mostly comfortably circumstanced. All were Galileans, except Cephas, the betrayer, whose name "Iscariot," i.e. "man of Keroth," marks him as a Judaean. Of some of the apostles we know a good deal; of others very little; yet we are warranted in speaking of them all, Judas excepted, as men of honest minds, and sincere piety. The band held within it a number of men of strongly contrasted types of character. Allusion need only be made to the impetuous Peter, the calculating Judas, the matter-of-fact Philip, the cautious Thomas, the zealous Simon, the conservative Matthew, the administrative Judas. The last-named—Iscariot—is the dark problem of the apostolate. We have express testimony that Jesus knew him from the beginning (Jn 6:64). Yet He chose him. The character of Judas, when Jesus received him, was doubtful, undeveloped. He could not himself suspect the dark possibilities that slept in him. His association with the apostles, in His absence, was for the good. His peculiar gift was, for the time, of service. In choosing him, Jesus must be viewed as acting for, and under the direction of, the Father (Jn 5:16; 17:12). See special arts. on the several apostles.

III. From the Sermon on the Mount till the Parables of the Kingdom—a Second Circuit. The choice of the apostles inaugurates a new period of Christ’s activity. Its first Circuit was the Sermon on the Mount. The most precious fruit was the delivery to the apostles of the message and parables. In the Sermon on the Mount the hill is identified by Sinai and Mount of the Law, and the parables of the kingdom are delivered. The hill is identified by Sinai and Mount of the Law, and the parables of the kingdom are delivered.
of the higher horns, exactly suits the conditions of the narrative. The sick being healed, Jesus seated Himself a little higher up, He discipled near and addressed the assembly (cf. Mt 7:28-29). The season of the year is shown by the mention of the "lilies" to be the summer.

Its scope.—His words were weighty. His aim was at the outset to set forth in terms that were unmistakable the principles, the laws and dispositions of His kingdom; to expound its righteousness, both positively, and in contrast with Pharisaic formalism and hypocrisy. Only the leading points are indicated here (see BEATTITUDES; SERMON ON MOUNT; ETERN; MATTHEW JESUS as is His wont, groups material part of which is found in other connections in Lk, but it is well to study the whole in the well-ordered form in which it appears in the First Gospel.

In marked contrast with the lawgiving of Sinai, Christ's first words are those of blessing. Posing at once to the dispositions of the heart,

e) The Blessings (Mt 5:9-11; Lk 6:20-26)

He shows on what inner conditions the blessings of the kingdom depend. His blessings pertain to spirit, mourning; meekness, hunger and thirst after righteousness, etc. reverse all the world's standards of judgment on such matters.

In the possession of these graces consists true godliness and character; through them the heirs of the kingdom become the salt of the earth, the light of the world. The obligation rests on them to let their light shine (cf Mk 4:21-23; Lk 8:16; 11:33).

Jesus defines His relation to the old law—not a Destroyer, but a Fulfiller—and proceeds to exhibit the nature of the true righteousness in contrast to Pharisaic literalism and formalism. Through adherence to the latter they killed the spirit of the law. With an absolute authority—"But it say unto you"—Jesus leads everything back from the outward letter to the state of the heart. Illustrations are taken from murder, adultery, swearing, retaliation, hatred of enemies, and a spiritual expansion is given to every precept. The sinful thought or desire holds in it the essence of transgression. The world's standards are again reversed in the demands for non-resistance to injuries, love of enemies and requital of good for evil.

Pursuing the contrast between the true righteousness and that of the scribes and Pharisees, Jesus next draws attention to motive in religion. The Pharisees are simple in having regard only to the letter of the law, but in acting in morals and religion from a false motive.

False Motive (Mt 6:1; Lk 11:1-8)

He had furnished the antidote to their literalism; He now assails their ostentation and hypocrisy. Illustrations are taken from almsgiving, prayer and fasting, and in connection with prayer the Lord's Prayer is given as a model (Lk introduces this in another context, 11:2-4).

The true motive in religious acts is to please God; the same motive should guide us in the choice of what is to be our supreme good.

d) The True Good and Care (Mt 6:1-18; Lk 11:9-12; 22-34; 23-34)

Earthly treasure is not to be put above heavenly. The kingdom of God and righteousness are to be first in mind. The eye is to be single. The true cure for worldly anxiety is then found in trust of the heavenly Father. His children are more to God than angels are to Him. The absence of God in nature is so conspicuously manifest.

Seeking first the kingdom they have a pledge—no higher conceivable—that all else they need will be granted along with it (this section on trust, again, Lk places of Mt 6:33).

Jesus finally proceeds to speak of the relation of the disciple to the evil of the world. That evil has been considered in its hostile attitude to the disciple (Mt 5:38 ff); the question is now as to the disciple's free relations toward it. Jesus indicates the duties of the disciple's bearing himself wisely toward evil—with charity, with caution, with prayer, in the spirit of ever doing as one would be done by and of being on his guard against it. The temptation is great to follow the worldly crowd, to be misled by false teachers, to put profession for practice. Against these perils the disciple is energetically warned. True religion will ever be known by its fruits. The discourse closes with the powerful similitude of the wise and foolish builders. Again, as on an earlier occasion, Christ's auditors were astonished at His teaching, and at the authority with which He spoke (Mt 7:28-29).

A series of remarkable incidents are next to be noticed.

1. The Healing of the Centurion's Servant (Mt 8:1, 5, 13; Lk 7:1-10)

It had been a day of manifold incidents, and exhausting labors for Jesus. A walk of perhaps 7 miles brought Him back to Capernaum, the crowds accompanying, and the second great miracle to which He hears a new appeal for help than His love replies, "I will come and heal him." The suppliant was a Roman centurion—one who had endeared himself to the Jews (Lk 7:5)—and the request was for the healing of a favorite servant, paralyzed and tortured with pain. First, a deputation sought Christ's good offices, then, when Jesus was on the way, a second message came, awakening even Christ's astonishment by the magnitude of its faith.

The centurion felt he was not worthy that Jesus should come under his roof, but let Jesus speak the word only, and his servant would be healed. "I have not found so great faith," Jesus said, "no, not in Israel." The word was spoken, and, on the return of the messengers, the servant was found healed.

The exciting events of this day gathered so great a crowd round the house where Jesus was as left Him no leisure even to eat, and His friends, made anxious for His health, Widow of Nain's Son (Mt 9:11-17)

It was probably to escape from this local excitement that Jesus, "soon afterwards," is found at the little town of Nain, a few miles S.E. of Nazareth.

A great multitude still followed Him. Here, as He entered the city, occurred the most wonderful of the works He had yet wrought. A young man—the only son of a widowed mother—was being carried out for burial. Jesus, in compassion, stopped the mournful procession, and, in the calm certainty of His word being obeyed, bade the young man arise. On the instant life returned, and Jesus gave the son back to his mother. The amazement of the people was tenfold intensified. They felt that the old days had come back: that God had visited His people.

It was apparently during the journey or circuit which embraced this visit to Nain, and as the result of the fame of the works emanating from His town (cf. the allusion to the dead being raised in Christ's reply to John), that the embassy was sent from the Baptist in prison to ask of Jesus whether He was indeed He who should come, or would they look for another. It was a strange question c) Embassy on the lips of the forerunner, but is of John's Disciples—probably to be interpreted as the expressing of a lingering doubt that Christ and His Generation (Mt 11:2-30; Lk 7:19-35) had not turned out as He expected. It was the peaceful, merciful character of Christ's work which stumped John. The gloom of his prison wrought with his disappointment, and he sent this message for the satisfaction of himself and his disciples.

(1) Christ's answer to John.—If doubt there was, Jesus treated it tenderly. He did not answer directly, but bade the two disciples who had been sent to go back and tell John the things they had seen and heard—the blind receiving their sight, the lame walking, the deaf cured, the dead raised, the Gospel preached. Little doubt the Messiah had come when works like these—the very works predicted by the prophets (Isa 35:5,6)—were being done. Blessed were those few who did not forsake Him. The fact of stumbling in Him, Jesus, however, did more. By his embassy John had put himself in a somewhat false position before the multitude. But Jesus would not have His faithful follower misunderstood. His was no fickle, fickle nature. He was not a prophet and more than a prophet; yea, a man than whom a greater had not lived. Yet, even as the new dispensation was higher than the old, one "little" in the kingdom of heaven—one sharing Christ's human, self-denying disposition—was greater even than John (Mt 11:11).

(2) A perverse people—Christ's grace. —The implied contrast between Himself and John led Jesus fur-to denounce the perverse spirit of His own generation. The Pharisees and lawyers (Lk 7:30) had rejected John; they were as little pleased with Him. Their behavior was like children objecting to one game because it was merry, and to another because it was sad. The flood of outward popularity did not deceive Jesus. The cities in which His greatest works were wrought—Corazain, Bethsaida, Capernaum—remained impenetrant at heart. The heavier would be their judgment; worse even than that on Tyre and Sidon, or on Sodom itself. Over against the unbelieving Jew-erty and declares His grace (Mt 11:25-30). All authority was His; He alone knew and could reveal the Father (no claims in Jn are higher). Let the heavy laden come to Him, and He would give them rest (parts of these passages appear in another connexion in Lk 10:12-21).

Yet another beautiful incident connected with this journey is preserved by Lk—the anointing of Jesus in Simon's house by a woman who was a sinner. In Nain or some other city visited by Him, Jesus was not a right-thinking man, much less a prophet, or He would have rebuked this misbehavior from such a person. Jesus met the thought of Simon's heart by speaking to him the parable of the Two Debtors (vs 41,42). Of two men who had been freely forgiven, one 500, the other the 50 shillings, which would love his creditor most? Simon gave the obvious answer, and thus that loving, forgiving, tender side of Jesus and the woman's passionate love was immediately pointed out. Her greater love was due to the greater forgiveness; though, had Simon only seen it, he perhaps needed forgiveness even more than she. Her faith saved her and she was dismissed in peace. But again the question arose, Jesus, no doubt, wrought numerous miracles on demoniacs (cf. Mary Magdalene, etc.). He is said to have cast 7 demons—perhaps a cure

b) Cure of a demon by a form of speech to indicate the Demoniac—severity of the possession). The demo-
Discourse of Blasphemy—of Blasphemy—

(Lk 8:1-4) Revisited (Lk 8:1-4). The circuit was an extensive one—went through cities and villages (lit. "according to city and village") preaches. During this journey Jesus was attended by the Twelve, and by devoted women (Mary Magdalene, Joanna, wife of Herod's steward, and others) who ministered to Him of their substance (vs 2,3). At the close of this circuit Jesus returned to Capernaum.

3. Second Galilean Circuit—Events at Capernaum (Lk 8:1-4). Luke introduces here (Lk 8:1-4) a second Galilean circuit of Jesus, after the return from which a new series of exciting incidents took place at Ca-

Jesus, no doubt, wrought numerous miracles on demoniacs (cf. Mary Magdalene, etc.). He is said to have cast 7 demons—perhaps a cure of a demon by a form of speech to indicate the severity of the possession). The demoniac discourse of Blasphemy—of Blasphemy—the prince of demons (see s.v.). A quite similar incident is narrated in Mt 9:32-34; and Lk 9:32-34; and Lk gives the discourse that follows in a later connection (11:14ff). The accusation may well have been repeated more than once. Jesus, in reply, points out first, the absurdity of supposing Satan to be engaged in warring against his own kingdom (Mt 18:25ff; here was plainly a stronger than Satan); then utters the momentous word about blaspheming against the Holy Spirit. All other blasphemies—even that against the name of man (Mt 12:32)—may be forgiven, for they may proceed from ignorance and misconception; but deliberate, perverse rejection of the light, and attributing to Satan what was manifestly of God, was a sin which, when matured—and the Pharisees came perilously near committing it—admitted of no forgiveness, either in this world or the next, for the very capacity for truth in the soul was by such sin destroyed. Mk has the strong phrase, "is guilty of an eternal sin" (3:29).

Pertinent words follow as to the root of good and evil in character (Mt 12:33-37). See BLASPHEMY.

The sign of Jonah.—Out of this discourse arose the usual Jewish demand for a "sign" (Mt 12:38; cf Lk 11:29-32), which Jesus met by declaring that no sign would be given but the sign of the prophet Jonah—an allusion to His future resurrection. He reiterates His warning to the people of His generation for their rejection of greater light than had been enjoyed by the Ninevites and the Queen of Sheba.

Two incidents, not dissimilar in character, interrupted this discourse—one the cry of a woman in the audience (if the time be the same, Lk 11:27, 28), "Blessed is the womb that bare thee," etc.
to which Jesus replied, "Ye rather, blessed are they that hear the word of God, and keep it"; the other, a message that His mother and brethren

On the same day on which the preceding disc-courses were observed, Jesus was preaching the multitudes, passed to the shore, and entering a and in his right mind." Yet, with fatal short-sightedness, they besought Jesus to depart from their borders. The man was sent home to declare to his friends the great things the Lord had done to him.

Repelled by the Gerasenes, Jesus received a warm welcome on His return to Capernaum on the western shore (Mt 8:21). It was probably at this point that the Shew, the Counsel of parts, gave the feast formerly referred to.

3. Jairus' Daughter Raised — It was in connection with this feast, Woman Matthew himself informs us (9:18), with Issue of blood (Mt 9:19-26); His little daughter, about 12 years old (Lk 8:42), was at the point of death; indeed, while Jesus was coming, she died. The ruler's faith, though real, was not equal to the centurion's, who believed that Jesus could heal without being present. Jesus came, and having expelled the professional mourners, in sacred privacy, only the father and mother, with Peter, James, and John being permitted to enter the death-chamber, raised the girl to life. It is the second miracle on record of the raising from the dead.

On the way to the ruler's house occurred another wonder—a miracle within a miracle. A poor woman, who had a specially distressing one, alike as regards the nature of her malady, the length of its continuance, and the fruitlessness of her application to the physicians to it up to Jesus, confident that if she could but touch the border of His garment, she would be healed. The woman was ignorant; her faith was blended with superstition; but Jesus, reading the heart, gave her the benefit she desired. It was His will, however, that, for her own good, the woman thus cured should not obtain the blessing by stealth. He therefore brought her to open confession, and cheered her by His commendatory word.

At this point begins apparently a new evangelistic tour (Mt 9:35; Mk 6:6), extending methodically to "all the cities and villages." To it 4. Incidents belong in the narratives the healing of two blind men (of the case of Bart' in Circuit (Mt 9:27-33; 13:53-58; a demoniac who was dumb—Incidents belong in the narratives the healing of two blind men (of the case of Bart' in Circuit (Mt 9:27-33; 13:53-58; a demoniac who was dumb—a similar case to that in Mt 12:22; and a second rejection at Nazareth (Mt, Mk). The incident is similar to that in Lk 4:16-30, and shows, if the events are different, that the people's hearts were unchanged. Of this circuit Mt gives an affecting summary (9:35-38), emphasizing the Lord's compassion, and His yearning for more laborers to reap the abundant harvest.

Partly with a view to the needs of the rapidly growing work and the training of the apostles, and partly as a witness to Israel (Mt 10:6, 23), Jesus deemed it expedient to send the Twelve on an independent Fourth—Dis-mission. The discourse in Mt attached course of to this event seems, as frequently, to be a compilation. Parts of it are

5. The Twelve Sent

Jesus (Mt 10:6, 23) sent them to an independent mission. The discourse in Mt attached course of to this event seems, as frequently, to be a compilation. Parts of it are

- 10:6; given by Luke in connection with the 7-13; Lk 9: mission of the Seventy (Lk 10:1 ff; 1-6; of Lk the directions were doubtless similar 10:2-24; both cases); parallel 12:2-12, (Lk 12:2-12; 21:12-17, etc; of Mk etc) 13:9-13.

The Twelve were sent out two by two. Their work was to be a copy of the Master's — to preach the gospel and heal all manner of sickness. They were to go forth free from all encumbrances—no money, no scrip, no changes of raiment, no staff (save that in their hand, Mk 6:8), sandals only on their feet, etc. a) The Commission for support on those to whom they preached. They were for the present to confine their ministry to Israel. The saying in Mt 10:23, "Ye shall not have gone through the cities of Israel, till the Son of man be come," apparently has reference to the judgment on the nation, not to the final coming (cf 16:28).

The mission of the Twelve was the first step of Christianity as an aggressive force in society. Jesus was permitted to have the whole future that was to come and out of it. He warns His apostles of the whole future that was to come and out of it. He warns His apostles

Warnings—faithfully of the dangers that awaited them; exhorts them to prudence and circumspection ("wise as serpents," etc); holds out to them Divine promises for consolation; directs them when persecuted in one place to flee to another; points out to them from His own case that such persecutions were only to be expected. He assures them of a coming day of revelation; bids them at once fear and trust God; impresses on them the duty of courage in confession; inculcates in them supreme love to Himself. That love would be tested in the dearest relations. In itself peace, the gospel would be the innocent occasion of strife, enmity and persecution. The Master warned His disciples that though Christ's disciples will not fail of their reward.

When Christ had ended His discourse He proceeded with His own evangelistic work, leaving the disciples to inaugurate theirs (Mt 11:1).

Second Period—After the Mission of the Twelve till the Departure from Galilee

I. From the Death of the Baptist to the Discourse on Bread of Life. Shortly before the events now to be narrated, John the Baptist had been fouly murdered in his prison by Herod Antipas at the instigation of Herodias, whose unlawful marriage and Herod's with Herod had unscrupulously condemned. Jos gives as the place of 14:1-12; the Baptist's imprisonment the fortress of Mashaerus, near the Dead Sea (Ant, XVIII, v 2); or John may have died 7:5-9; cf late; the eulogies of the people would ere this have killed John, but was restrained by fear of the people (Mt 14:5). The hate of Herodias, however, did not slumber. Her relentless will contrasts with the vacillation of Herod, as Ladey Macbeth in Shakespear contrasts with Macbeth. A birthday feast gave her the opening she sought for. Her daughter Salome, pleasing Herod by her dancing, obtained from him a promise on oath to give her whatever she asked. Prompted by Herodias, she boldly demanded John the Baptist's head. The weak king was shocked, but, for his oath's sake, granted her what she craved. The story tells how the Baptist's disciples reverently buried the remains of their master, and went and told Jesus. Herod's conscience did not let him rest. When rumors reached him of a wonderful teacher and miracle-worker in Galilee, he leaped at once to the conclusion that it was John risen from the dead. Herod cannot have heard much of Jesus before. An evil conscience makes men curious among men. The Baptist's fate, and of Herod's fears, and now proposed to His disciples a retirement to a desert place across the lake, near Bethsaida (on the topography, cf. Stanley, op. cit., 375, 381). As it proved, however, the multitudes had had the place before them (Mk 6:33).

2. The Feeding of the Five Thousand (Mt 14:13-21; Mk 6:30-44; Lk 9:10-17; Jn 6:1-14). The purpose of rest was frustrated, but Jesus did not complain. He pitied the shepherds less state of the people, and went out to teach and heal them.

The day wore on, and the disciples suggested that the fasting multitude should disperse, and seek victuals in the nearest towns and villages. This Jesus, who had already fed Philip by asking how the people should be fed (Jn 6:5), would not permit. With the scanty provision at command—5 loaves and 2 fishes—He fed the whole multitude. By His blessing the food was multiplied till all were satisfied, and 12 baskets of fragments, carefully collected, remained over. It was a stupendous act of creative power, no rationalizing of which can reduce it to natural dimensions.

The enthusiasm created by this miracle was intense (Jn 6:14). Mt and Mk relate (Lk here fails for a time out of the Synopsis) that Jesus hurriedly constrained His disciples to enter into their boat and recross the lake—though a storm was gathering—while He Himself remained by the mountain alone in prayer. Jn gives the key to this action in the statement that the people were about to take Him by force and make Him a king (ver 15). Three hours after dark found them helpless still in the midst of the lake, "distressed in rowing" (Mk 6:48), deeply anxious because Jesus was not, as on a former occasion, with them. At last, at the darkest hour of their extremity, Jesus was seen approaching in a way unlooked-for—walking on the water. Every new experience of Jesus was a surprise to the disciples. They were at first terrified, thinking they saw a spirit, but straightforward the well-known voice was heard, "Be of good cheer; it is I; be not afraid." In the rebond of his feelings the impulsive Peter asked Jesus to permit him to come to Him on the water (Mt). Jesus said, "Come," and for the first moment or two Peter did walk on the water; then, as he realized his unwonted situation, his faith failed, and he began to sink. Jesus saved him, caught him, and assisted him back into the boat. Once again the sea was calm, and the disciples found themselves safely at land. To their adoring minds the miracle of the loaves was eclipsed by this new marvel (Mk 6:50).

On the return to Gennesaret the sick from all quarters were brought to Jesus—the commencement apparent of a new, more general ministry of healing (Mk 6:56). Meanwhile—here we depend on Mt—the people on the other side of the lake, when they found that Jesus was gone, took boats hastily, and came over to Capernaum. They found Jesus apparently in the synagogue (ver 59). In reply to their query, "Rabbi, when didst thou hither?" Jesus first rebuked the motive which led them to follow Him—not because they had seen in His miracles "signs" of greater blessings, but because they had eaten of the loaves (ver 56)—then spoke to them His great discourse on the bread from heaven. "Work," He said, "for the food which abideth unto eternal life, which the Son of man shall give unto you" (ver 27). When asked to authentify His claims by a sign from heaven like the manna, He replied that the manna also (given not by Moses but by God) was but typical bread, and surprised them by declaring that He Himself was the true bread of life from heaven (vs 35-51). The bread was Christ's flesh, His transfiguration, and His defilement. His flesh and blood must be eaten and drunk (a spiritual appropriation through faith, ver 63), if men were to have eternal life. Jesus of set purpose had put His doctrine in a strong, testing manner. The time had come when His hearers must make their choice between a spiritual acceptance of Him and a break with Him altogether. What He had said strongly offended them, both on account of the claims implied (ver 42), and on account of the doctrine taught, which, they were plainly told, they could not receive. He might have spared them of their carnalitv of heart (vs 43.44.61-64). Many, therefore, went back and walked no more with Him (vs 60.61.66); but their detection only evoked from the chosen Twelve a yet more confident confession of their faith. "Would ye also go away?"

Peter's first confession.—Peter, as usual, spoke for the rest: "Lord, to whom shall we go? . . . We have believed and know that thou art the Holy One of God" (ver 60). Here, and not first at Caesarea Philippi (Mt 16:16), is Peter's brave confession of His Master's Messiaship. Twelve thus confessed Him, but even of this select circle Jesus was compelled to say, "One of you [Judas] is a devil" (Jn 6:70.71).

II. From Disputes with the Pharisees till the Transfiguration.—The discourse in Capernaum seems to mark a turning-point in the Lord's ministry in Galilee. Soon after we find Him ceasing from public teaching, and devoting Himself to the instruction of His disciples (Mt 15:21; Mk 7:24, etc.). Meanwhile, that Christ's work in Galilee was attracting the attention of the central authorities, is shown by the fact that scribes and Pharisees came up to Him and tried to entice Him to a public act of defilement (Mk 7:1-23).

1. Jesus and the Pharisees.—Jesus was specially blamed for allowing His disciples to eat bread with "common," purity (Mt 15:1-20; Mk 7:1-23) i.e. unwashed hands. Here was a point on which the Pharisees laid great stress (Mk 7:3.4). Ceremonial abolutions (washing "diligently," etc.) were binding on the person and things) formed a large part of their religion. These washings were part of the "oral tradition" said to have been delivered to Moses, and transmitted by a succession of elders. Jesus set aside all these ceremonial distinctions as unimportant. In Mk 7:6 He even questioned regarding it, He drew a sharp distinction between God's commandment in the Scriptures and man's tradition, and accused the Pharisees (in St. Trophimus) of "Corban" (q.v.), in support, vs 10-12) of making "void" the former through the latter. This led to the wider question of wherein real defilement consisted. Christ's rational position here is that it did not consist in anything outward, as in meats, but consisted in what came from within the man: as Jesus explained afterward, in the outcome of his heart or moral life: "Out of the heart of men evil thoughts proceed," etc (vs 20-23). Christ's saying was in effect the abrogation of the old ceremonial distinctions, as Mk notes: "making all meats clean" (ver 19). The Pharisees, naturally, were deeply offended at His sayings, but Jesus was unmoved. Every plant not of the Father's planting must be rooted up (ver 13).

From this point Jesus appears, in order to escape notice, to have made journeys privately from place to place. His first retreat was to the borders, or neighborhood, of Tyre and Sidon. From Mt 7:31 it is to be inferred that He entered the heathen territory. He could not, however, be hid (Mt 7:24). It was not long ere, in the house into which He had entered, there reached Him the story of a woman who had cast herself to Him, a Greek (or Gentile, Greek-speaking), but Syrophoenician by race. 2. Retirement to Tyre and Sidon—the Her "little daughter" was grievously afflicted with an evil spirit. Flinging her woman herself at His feet, and addressing (Mt 15:21—28; Mk 7:24—28; Lk 17:17-19; Jn 4:25—26; Acts 7:26) "Son of David," she besought Him (Mt 28:9; Mk 9:24; Lk 17:17) His mercy for her child. At first (Mt 21—28) Jesus seemed—yet only seemed—to repel her, speaking of Himself as sent only to the lost sheep of Israel, and of the unmeasurableness of giving the children's bread to the dogs (the Gr softens the expression, "the little dogs"). With a beautiful urgency which won for her the boon she sought, the woman seized on the word as an argument in her favor. "Even the dogs under the table eat of children's crumbs." The child at Jesus' word was restored. Christ's second retreat was to Decapolis—the district of the ten cities—E of the Jordan. Here also He was soon discovered, and were brought to Him, whom He cured (Mt 15:30). Later, He fed the crowds. 3. At Decapo- lis—New Miracles (Mt 15:29—20). The charge to those present not to blaspheme the dead was disregarded. Jesus desired no cheap popularity. The next miracle closely resembles the feeding of the Five Thousand at Bethsaida, but the place and numbers are different; 4,000 instead of 5,000; 7 loaves and a few fishes, instead of 5 loaves and 2 fishes; 7 baskets of fragments instead of 12 (Mark's term denotes a larger basket). There is no mention for doubting the distinctness of the incidents (cf Mt 16:9-10; Mk 8:19-20). Returning to the plain of Gennesaret (Magdala, Mt 15:39 AV; parts of Dalmanutha, Mk 8:1), Jesus soon found Himself assailed by His old adversaries. Pharisees and Sadducees were now united. They came "trying" Jesus, and asking from Him a "sign from heaven"—some mode of speech by signs to the (Mt 16:1—12; Mk 8:27—28). The levirate to Bethsaida. On the way He warned His disciples against the leaven of the spirit they had just encountered. The disciples misunder- stood, thinking that Jesus referred to their forographic way that they had only one loaf. The levirate Christ referred to, in fact, represented three spirits: (1) the Pharisaic leaven—formalism and hypocrisy; (2) the Sadducean leaven—rationalistic skepticism; (3) the Herodic leaven (Mk 6:15) spiritual expediency and temporizing. Arrived at Bethsaida, a miracle was wrought on a blind man resembling in some of its features the cure of the deaf man at Decapolis. In both cases Jesus took the patients apart; in both there was strict injunction not to noise the cure abroad. Another peculiarity was the gradual- ness of the cure. It is probable that the man had not been blind from his birth, else he could hardly have recognized men or trees at the first opening. It needed that Jesus should lay His hands on Him before He saw all things clearly. The next retirement of Jesus with His disciples was to the neighborhood of Caesarea Philippi, near the source of the Jordan. This was 5. At Caesarea—the northernmost point of His journey- rea of Philippiings. Here, “on the geographical —The Great frontier between Judaism and heathen—Confession ism (Ladd), Our Lord put the—First An—momentous question which called forth nouncement Peter's historical confession. of Passion (1) The voices of the age and the exter- nal—truth.—The question put to the (Mt 16:13—20).—The answer given by the (Mt 16:28).—The charge to those present not to blaspheme the (Mt 16:9-10; Mk 8:27—28; Lk 9:18—21) 'Son of man,' as already said, was the familiar name given by Jesus to Himself, to which a Messianic significance might or might not be attached, according to the prepos- sessions of His hearers. First the age of the world was recited to Jesus: "Some say John the Baptist; some, Elijah," etc. Next, in answer to the further question: "But who say ye that I am?" there rang out from Peter, in the name of all, the unchanging truth: "Thou art the Christ, the Son of the living God." In clearness, boldness, decision, Peter's faith had attained a height not reached before. The confession embodies two truths: (1) the Divinity, (2) the Messiahship, of the Son of man. Jesus did honor to the confession of His apostle. Not flesh and blood, but the Father, had revealed the truth to him. Here at length was "rock" on which He could build a church. Reverting to Peter's original name, Simon, Simon, Peter declared, with a play on the name "Peter" (petros, "rock," "piece of rock") He had before given him (Jn 14:2), that on this "rock" (petra), He would build His church, and the gates of Hades (hostile evil powers) would not prevail against it (Mt 16:18). The proper reason reared an unwarrantable structure of pretensions on this passage in supposing the "rock" to be Peter personally and his successors in the see of Rome (none such existed; Peter was not bishop of Rome). It is not Peter the individual, but Peter the confessing apostle—Peter as representative of all —that Christ names "rock"; that which constituted him a foundation was the truth he had confessed (cf Eph 2:20)—This is the first NT mention of a "church" (ekklasia, Christian church), therefore, is founded (1) on the truth of Christ's Divine Sonship; (2) on the truth of His Messiah- ship, or of His being the anointed prophet, priest and king of the new age. A society of believers confessing these truths is a church; no society which denies these truths deserves the name. To this confessing community Jesus, still addressing Peter as representing the apostolate (cf Mt 18:18), gives authority to bind and loose—to admit and to exclude. Jesus, it is noted, bade His disciples tell no man of these things (Mt 16:20; Mk 8:30; Lk 9:21). (2) The cross and the discipline.—The confession of Peter prepared the way for an advance in Christ's teaching. From that time, Matthew notes, Jesus began to speak plainly of the approaching suffer- ings and death (Mt 16:21). These are in all three solemn announcements of the Passion (Mt 16 21–23; 17 22–23; 20 17–19 //). Jesus foresaw, and clearly foretold, what would befall Him at Jesus. He would be killed by the authorities, but on the third day would rise again. On the first announcement, following His confession, Peter took it upon him to expostulate with Jesus: “Be it far from thee, Lord,” etc (Mt 16 22), an action which brought upon him the stern rebuke of Jesus: “Get thee behind me, Satan,” etc (ver 23). The Rock-man, in his fall to the maxims of a worldly expediency, is now identified with Satan, the tempter. This principle, that duty is only to be done the way it is, not the way it seems to be, is not only repudiated for Himself, but bids His disciples repudiate it also. The disciple, Jesus says, must be prepared to deny himself, and take up his cross. The cross is the symbol of anything distressing or painful to bear. There is a saving of life which is a losing of it, and what shall a man be profited if he gain the whole world, and forfeit his (true, higher) life? As, however, Jesus had spoken, not only of dying, but of rising again, so now He encourages His disciples by anticipating His future coming in glory to render to every man according to His deeds. That final coming might be distant (cf Mt 24 36); but (so it seems most natural to interpret the saying 16 28;) there were those living who would see the nearer pledge of that, in Christ’s coming in the triumphs and successes of His kingdom (of Mk 9 1; Lk 9 27; Mt 26 64).

About eight days after the announcement of His passion by Jesus, took place the glorious event of the Transfiguration. Jesus had spoken of His future glory, and here was a Transfiguration of it. In strange contrast the procession of this event is the scene of glory on the summit of the mountain the Saul of Saul to the beloved of Moses. Jesus had ascended the mountain with Peter, James and John, for prayer. It was while He was praying, the wondrous change happened. For once the very spirit of the Beloved was with Him, and the Holy Ghost was begotten from the Father (Jn 1 14) was permitted to burst forth, sussing His person and garments, and changing them into a dazzling brightness. His face did shine as the sun; His raiment became white as light (“as snow,” AV, Mk.). Heavenly visitants, recognized from their converse as Moses and Elijah, appeared with Him and spoke of His decease (Lk). A voice from an enveloping cloud attested: “This is my beloved Son, in whom I am well pleased.” Little wonder the disciples were afraid, or that Peter in his confusion should stammer out: “It is good for us to be here: if thou wilt, I will make here three tabernacles [booths].” This, however, was not permitted. Earth is not heaven. Glimpses of heavenly glory are given, not to view from duty on earth, but to prepare for the trials connected therewith. The spectacle that met the eyes of Jesus and the chosen three as they descended was distressing in the extreme. A man had brought to Jesus a son to be healed. The child was dumb. The disciples were not able to help the man of law and order, and a poor sufferer and dumb—to the disciples to see if they could cast out the evil spirit that possessed him, but they were not able. Their failure, as Jesus showed, was a failure of faith. They could not afford a handle to the gain-sayers, who were not slow to take advantage of it (Mk 9 14). The man’s appeal was now to Jesus, “If thou canst do anything,” etc (ver 22). The reply of Jesus shifted the “canst,” to the right moment and way (ver 23). Such little faith as the man had revolved under Christ’s word: “I believe; help thou mine unbelief.” The multitude pressing around, there was no call for further delay. With one energetic word Jesus expelled the unclean spirit (ver 25). The first effect of Christ’s approach had been to induce a violent paroxysm (ver 20); now the spirit terribly convulsed the frame it was compelled to relinquish. Jesus, taking the boy’s hand, raised him up, and he was found well. The lesson drawn to the disciples was, the personal absence of faith (Mt 17 19 20) and power of prayer (Mk 9 28 29).

III. From Private Journey through Galilee till Return from the Feast of Tabernacles.—Soon after the last-mentioned events Jesus passed privately through Galilee (Mk 9 30), returning later to Capernaum.

1. Galilee and Capernaum

During the Galilean journey Jesus made to His disciples His 2d announcement of His approaching sufferings and death, accompanied as before by the assurance of His resurrection. The disciples still could not take in the meaning of His words, though what He said made them “exceeding sorry” (Mt 17 23). The announcement of His passion (Mk 8 31–33; Mt 16 21–23; Mk 9 30–33; Lk 9 22–36; 23; 44 46) was marked by an incident which raised the question of Christ’s relation to the temple institutions. The collectors of the temple asked of Peter: “What shall your Master give for the half-shekel?” (Gr didrachma, or double drachm, worth about 32 cents or 1s. 4d.). The origin of this tax was in the half-shekel of atonement-money for the temple. The Collectors of the temple (Ex 30 11–16), which, though a special Tax was made, was the basis of later assessment (2 Ch 24 4–10; in Nehemiah’s time the amount was one-third of a shekel, Neh 10 32), and its object was the upkeep of the temple worship (Schütter). The usual time of payment was March, but Jesus had probably been absent and the inquiry was made not for some months later. Peter, hasty as usual, probably reasoning from Christ’s ordinary respect for temple ordinances, answered at once that He did pay. “He had paid no more, however, than He had said that Jesus might have something to say on it, if formally challenged. Occasion therefore was taken by Jesus gently to reprove Peter. Peter had but recently acknowledged Jesus to be the Son of God. Do kings of the earth take tribute of their sons? The half-shekel was suitable to the subject-relations, but not to the relation of a son. Nevertheless, last occasion of stumbling being given, Jesus could well waive this right, as, in His humbled condition, He had waived so many more. Peter was ordered to cast his hook into the sea, and Jesus foretold that the fish he would bring up would have in its mouth the necessary coin (Gr stater, about 64 cents or 2s. 6d.). The tax was paid, yet in such a way as to show that the payment of it was an act of condescension of the king’s Son. On the way to Capernaum a dispute had arisen among the disciples as to who should be greatest in the Messianic kingdom. It was John who said: “Behold, we saw a certain man casting out devils in thy name, and we forbad him, because he was not following us.” (Mk 9 40). It was not, however, John who obtained the pre-eminence, but James and John, who cast themselves on the Son of Man’s breast as a king, to demonstrate their spirit of ambitious rivalry, and to inculcate much-needed lessons on greatness and kindred matters.
(1) Greatness in humility.—First, by the example of a little child, Jesus teaches that humility is the root-disposition of His kingdom. It alone admits to the kingdom, and conducts to honor in it. He is greater than the number of His own; most (Mt 18:4), and is the servant of all (Mt 9:35). He warns against slighting the “little ones,” or causing them to stumble, and uses language of terrible severity against those guilty of this sin.

(2) Tolerance.—The mention of receiving little ones in Christ’s name led John to remark that he had seen one casting out demons in Christ’s name, and had forbidden him, because he was not of their company. “Forbid him not,” Jesus said, “for there is no man who shall do a mighty work in my name, and he shall have nothing of me. For he that is not against us is for us” (Mt 9:39.40).

(3) The erring brother.—The subject of offences leads to the question of sins committed by one Christian brother against another. Here Christ inculcates kindness and forbearance; only if private representations and the good offices of brethren fail, is the matter to be brought before the church; if the brother repents he is to be unstonen forgivens (“seventy times seven.”) Mt 18:21-16. If the church is compelled to interpose, its decisions are valid, under condition, however, of prayer and Christ’s presence, vs 18-20.

(4) Parable of the Unmerciful Servant.—To enforce the burden of forgiveness, Jesus asks the parable of the Unmerciful Servant (Mt 18:23-35). Himself forgiven much, this servant refuses to forgive his fellow a much smaller debt. His lord visits him with severest punishment. Only as we forgive others can we look for forgiven s.

The Gospel of Jn leaves a blank of many months between chs 6 and 7, covered only by the statement, “After these things, Jesus walked in Galilee” (7:1). In this year of His ministry Jesus went neither to the Feast of Tabernacles the feast of the Passover nor to Pentecost.

—Dis—

The Feast of Tabernacles was now at hand (October). To this Jesus went up, and Jn preserves for us a full record of 21:1. His appearance, discourses and doings there.

The brethren of Jesus, still unpersuaded of His claims (ver 5), had urged Jesus to go up with them to the feast. “Go up,” in their sense, included a purifying and self- examination. Jesus replied that His time for this had not yet come. Afterward He went up quietly, and in the midst of the feast appeared in the temple as a teacher. Of the comments made about Jesus at the feast before His arrival vividly reflect the divided state of opinion regarding Him. “He is a good man,” thought some. “Not so,” said others. “But He leadeth the multitude astray.” Jesus was justly in the best of company. Whence came the saving of all, Nicaea (ver 57). A Divine being could put forth such a claim as that. The Jews objected that they had only His witness to Himself. Jesus replied that no other could bear adequate witness of Him, for He alone knew Whence He came and Whither He went. The Father also had borne witness of Him (ver 18). This discourse, delivered in the “treasury” of the temple (ver 20), was soon followed by another, no man yet daring to touch Him. This time Jesus warns the Jews of the fate their unbelief would entail upon them: “Ye shall die in your sins” (ver 24). Addressing Himself next specially to the Jews who believed in Him, He urged them to continuance in His word as the condition of true freedom. Refutation is crowned by the suggestion that the Jews, Abraham’s seed, were not free. Jesus made clear that the real bondage was that of sin; only the Son could make spiritually free (vs 34-36). Descent from Abraham meant nothing, if the spirit was of the devil (vs 39-41). A new conflict was provoked by the saying, “If a man keep my word, he shall never see death” (ver 51). Did Jesus make Himself greater than Abraham? The controversy that ensued resulted in the sublime utterance, “Before Abraham was born, I am” (ver 58). The Jews could have stoned Him, but Jesus eluded them, and departed.

The Feast of Tabernacles was past, but Jesus was still in Jera. Passing by on a Sabbath (ver 14), He saw a blind man, a beggar (ver 8), well known to have been blind from his birth. The narrative of the cure and examination of this blind man is adduced by Paley as bearing in its inimitable circumstantiality every mark of personal knowledge on the part of the historian. The man was cured in strange but symbolic fashion by the anointing of his eyes with clay (ch 9). The Cure of the Blind Man (thereby apparently sealing them more firmly), then washing in the Pool of Siloam, became an object of immediate interest, and every effort was made by the Pharisees to shake his testimony as to the miracle that had been wrought. The man, however, held to his story, and his parents could only corroborate the fact that their son had been born blind, and now saw. The Pharisees themselves were divided, some reasoning that Jesus could not be of God because He had broken the Sabbath—the old charge; others, Nicodemus-like, standing on the fact that a man who was a sinner could not do such signs (vs 15.16). The healed man applied the logic of common-sense: ‘If this man were not from God, he could do nothing’ (ver 33). The Pharisees, impatient to deny the wonder, could only cast him out of the synagogue. Jesus found him, and brought him to full confession of faith in Himself (vs 33–38).

Yet another address of Jesus is on record arising out of this incident. In continuation of His reply to the question of the Pharisees (9, 40), c) The Good Shepherd (10:1–21) is gathered at night into an inclosure surrounded by a wall or palisade. This is the ‘fold’ which is under the care of a porter, who opens the door, and a ‘shepherd’ in the morning. As contrasted with the legitimate shepherds, the false shepherds ‘enter not by the door,’ but climb over some other way. The allusion is to priests, scribes, Pharisees and generally to all, in any age, who claim an authority within the church unsanctioned by God (Godet). Jesus now gathers up the truth in its relation to Himself as the Supreme Shepherd. From His fundamental relation to the church, He is not only the Shepherd, but the Door (vs 7–14). To those who enter by Him there is given security, liberty, provision (ver 9). In his capacity as Shepherd Christ is preeminently all that a faithful shepherd ought to be. The highest proof of His love is that, as the Good Shepherd, He laid down His life for His own (vs 14–17). This laying down of His life is not an accident, but is His free, voluntary act (vs 17.18). Again there was division among the Jews because of these remarkable sayings (vs 19–21).

Chronological note.—Though John does not mention the fact, there is little doubt that, after this visit to Jerus, Jesus returned to Galileel, and at no long interval from His return, took His final departure southward. The chronology of this closing period in Galilee is somewhat uncertain. Some would place the visit to the Feast of Tabernacles before the withdrawal to Caesarea Philiippipp, or even earlier (of Andrews, Life of Our Lord, etc); but the order adopted above appears preferable.

D. LAST JOURNEY TO JERUSALEM—JESUS IN Perea

An interval of two months elapses between vs 21 and 22 in Jn 10—from the Feast of Tabernacles (October) till the Feast of the Dedication (December). This period witnessed the final withdrawal of Jesus from Galilee. Probably while yet in Galileel He sent forth the seventy disciples to proclaim His way in the cities to which He should come (Lk 10 1). Repulsed on the borders of Samaria (Lk 9 51–53), He passed over into Perea ("beyond Jordan"), where He exercised a considerable ministry. The addresses of His entry into Jerusalem belongs in great part to Luke, who seems to have had a rich special source relating to it (9 51–19 27).

The discourses in Lk embrace many passages and sections found in other connections in Mt, and it is difficult, often, to determine their proper chronological place, if, as doubtless sometimes happened, portions were not repeated.

I. From Leaving Galileel till the Feast of the Dedication.—Conscious that He went to suffer and die, Jesus suddenly set His face to go to Jerusalem. The route was first by Samaria—a place of opportunity to approach the sinner (Lk 9: 51–55). The emissaries of His messianic intention to return to Jerus (ver 53). James and John wished to imitate Elijah in calling down fire from heaven on the rejecters, but Jesus rebuked them for their thought (RV omits the reference to Elijah, and subsequent clauses, vs 55, 66).

In the present connection Luke inserts the incidents of the three aspirants formerly considered (9 57–62; cf p. 1645). It was suggested that the second and third cases of the Seventy (Lk 10:1–20) taken by Jesus in the sending out of 70 disciples, who should go before Him, two by two, to announce His coming in the cities and villages, and to visit the unconverted. The passage indicates how large a following Jesus had now acquired. (Some see a symbolical meaning in the number 70, but it is difficult to show what it is.) The directions given to the messengers are similar to those formerly given to the Twelve (9 1–5; cf Mt 10); a passage also found in Mt in a different connection (11 21–24) is incorporated in this discourse, or had originally its place in it (vs 13–15).

In this mission Jesus no longer made any secret of His Messianic character. The messengers were to proclaim that the kingdom of God was come near to them in connection with His impending visit (ver 9). The mission implies that a definite route was marked out by Jesus for Himself (of 13 22), but this would be subject to modification according to the reception of His emissaries (vs 10.11.16). The circuit need not have occupied a long time with so many engaged in it. The results show that it aroused strong interest. Later the disciples repeatedly asked Him of this victory over the demons (ver 17). Jesus bade them rejoice rather that their names were written in heaven (ver 20). Again a passage is inserted (vs 21.22) found earlier in Mt (11 25–27; cf also vs 23.24, with Mt 13 16–17).

Jesus had now passed "beyond the Jordan," i.e. into Perea, and vast crowds waited on His teaching (of Mt 19 1 f; Mk 10 1; Lk 12 1). 3. The Lawyer’s Question—Jesus Parable of Good Samaritan (Lk 10:25–37)

At one place a lawyer put what he meant to be a testing question, "What shall I do to inherit eternal life?" Jesus referred him to the great commandments of love to God and one’s neighbor, eliciting the further query, "And who is my neighbor?" In reply Jesus spoke to him the immortal parable of the Good Samaritan, and asked who proved neighbor to him who fell among the robbers. The lawyer could give but one answer, "He that showed mercy on him." "Go," said Jesus, "and do thou likewise."

The incident of Martha and Mary, which Luke inserts here (vs 38–42), comes in better later, when Jesus was nearer Bethany.

At this place Luke brings together a variety of discourses, warnings and exhortations, great parts of which have already been noticed in earlier contexts. It does not follow that Lk has not, in many cases, preserved the original connection. This is probably the case with the Lord's Prayer (11 1-4), and with portions of what Mt includes in the Sermon on the Mt (e.g. 22:29-34; 5:21-26; 7:21-23).

1. Discourses, Parables, and Miracles = Mt 23 23-36; 12 2-12 = Mt 10 26-33; 12 42-48 = Mt 24 45-51; 13 18-21, parallels of Mt 28 1-7; and in other discourses (e.g. 11 42-52; 14 21-23).

Of matter original to Lk in these chs may be noted such passages as that on the Friend at Midnight (11 5-8), the incident of the man who wished Jesus to bid his brother divide his inheritance with him, to whom Jesus spoke the parable of the Rich Fool (12 13-21), the parable of the Barren Fig Tree, called forth by the disposition to regard certain Gallileans whom Jesus had slain in a tumult at the temple, and eighteen on whom the tower of Siloam had fallen, as sinners above others (13 1-9: “Nay,” said Jesus, “but, except ye repent, ye shall all likewise perish”), and most of the teaching in ch 14, referred to by parables.

In ch 18, we have the mention of a Pharisee inviting Jesus to dine, and of his astonishment at the Lord's neglect of the customary ablutions before eating. Ver 53 gives a glimpse of the fury to which the scribes and Pharisees were aroused by the teachings and denunciations. They “began to press upon him vehemently . . . laying wait for him, to catch something out of his mouth.” In 13 31 ff it is told how the Pharisees sought to frighten Jesus from the district by telling him that Herod would fain kill Him. Jesus bade them tell that “fox” that His work would go on uninterrupted in the brief space that remained (“day” used etymologically) till He was “perfected” (ver 32). The woe on Jesus (vs 34-38) is given by Mt in the discourse in ch 23.

Of the miracles in this section, the casting out of the demon that was dumb (11 14 ff) is evidently the incident oldest. It is already noted in Mt 12 22 ff. Two other miracles are connected with the old accusation of Sabbath breaking. One was the healing in a synagogue on the Sabbath day, a woman bowed down for 18 years with “a spirit of infirmity” (13 10-17); the other was the cure on the Sabbath of a man afflicted with dropcy at a feast in the house of a ruler of the Pharisees to which Jesus had been invited (14 1-6). The motive of the Pharisee’s invita-

1. Parables cast a deep spell over Jesus. He did not repel them, as the Pharisees did, but ate and drank with them. Publicans and sinners gathered to His teaching, and He associated with them. The murmuring was great: “This man receiveth sinners, and eateth with them.” The defence of Jesus was in parables, and the Pharisees’ reproach may be thanked for three of the most beautiful parables Jesus ever spoke—the Lost Sheep (cf Mt 18 12-14), the Lost Piece of Silver, and the Prodigal Son (ch 15). Why does the shepherd rejoice more over the one lost sheep brought back than over the ninety-nine that have not gone astray? Why does the woman rejoice more over the recovery of a coin than over all the coins safe in her keeping? Why does the father rejoice more over the prodigal son come back.
in rags and penitence from the far country than over the credit, but a stern brother that had never left the home? The unattractiveness of the ‘exhortory’ character of the rich man’s heart. There is joy in heaven over one sinner that repenteth more than over ninety-nine just persons that need no repentance (ver. 7).

Two other parables, interpolated by discourses (in part again met with in other connections, of 16 13 with Mt 6 24; ver 16 with Mt 11 12; ver 18 with Mt 5 32; 19 9, etc), were spoken at this time—that of the Unjust Steward (10 1-9) and that of the Rich Man and Lazarus (vs 19-31).

2. Parables of the Unjust Steward and the Rich Man and Lazarus (Lk 16)

The dishonest steward, about to be dismissed, utilized his opportunities still dishonestly, to make friends of his master’s creditors; let the ‘children of light’ better his example by righteously using mammon to make friends for themselves, who shall receive them into everlasting habitations. The rich man, pampered in luxury, let the afflicted Lazarus starve at his gate. At death—in Hades—the positions are reversed: the rich man is in torment, stripped of all he had enjoyed; the poor man is at rest in Abraham’s bosom, compensated for all he suffered. It is character, not outward estate, that determines destiny. The unmerciful are damned (Lk 17).

Even a sinner from one world will not save men, if they hear not Moses and the prophets (ver 31).

In this connection Lk (17 1-10) places exhortations to the disciples on occasions of stumbling, forgiveness, the power of the One whom ‘We are unprofitable servants’, some of which are found elsewhere (cf Mt 18 6.7.15.21, etc).

While Jesus was in the trans-Jordanic Bethabara, or Bethany, or in its neighborhood, a message came to Him from the house of Martha and Mary in the Judean Bethany (on the Mount of Olives, about 2 miles E. from Jesus), that His friend Lazarus (‘he whom thou lovest’) was sick.

3. The Summons to Bethany—Raising of Lazarus

For He abode still two days where He was (Jn 11 6). As the sequel showed, this was only for the end of a yet more wonderful manifestation of His power and love, to the glory of God. Meanwhile He was busy with His disciples and other classes, and His fame was going ahead of Him. He performed miracles, and had the reception of His ministry as the Son of God; but His power and His glory were not yet manifested. When Jesus announced His intention of going into Judaea, the disciples sought hard to dissuade Him (ver 8); but Jesus was not moved by the fears they suggested. He reached Bethany (a distance of between 20 and 30 miles) on the fourth day after the burial of Lazarus (ver 17), and was met on the outskirts by Martha, and afterward by Mary, both plunged in deepest sorrow. Both breathed the same plaint: ‘Lord, if thou hadst been here, my brother had not died’ (vs 21.32).

To Martha Jesus gave the pledge, ‘Thy brother shall rise again,’ strengthening the faith she already had expressed in Him (ver 22) by announcing Himself as ‘the resurrection, and the life’ (vs 25.26); at Mary’s words He bade be taken to the tomb. Here, it is recorded, ‘Jesus wept’ (ver 35), the only other instance of His weeping in the Gospels being as He looked on lost Jesus (Lk 19 41). The proof of love was manifest, but some, as usual, suggested blame that this miracle-worker had not prevented His friend’s death (ver 37).

Arrived at the rock-tomb, Jesus, still groaning in Himself, caused the stone at its mouth to be removed, and, after prayer, spoke with a loud voice, ‘Lazarus, come forth!’ (ver 40). This, the judge, who had been dead came forth bound with his grave-clothes. He was released and restored to his sisters.

Even this mighty deed did not alter the mind of the Pharisees, who held a council, and decided, on the advice of Caiphas (ver 50), that for the safety of the nation it was necessary to get Jesus out of the way.

The circumstances of this beautiful narrative speaks irresistibly for its historical truth, and the objections raised by critical writers center really in their aversion to the miraculous as such.

III. From the Retirement to Ephraim till the Arrival at Bethany.—The hostility of the ruling classes was now so pronounced that, in the few weeks that remained till Jesus should go up to the Passover, He seemed to be driven to take refuge in private at a city called Ephraim (situation uncertain). That He was in secrecy during this period is implied in the statement (ver 57) that if anyone knew where He was, he was to inform the chief priests and Pharisees. The retirement would be for Jesus a period of preparation for the ordeal before Resumed, Him, as the wilderness had been for the commencement of His ministry.

On His leaving this retreat to resume His advance to Jerusalem the narratives again become rich in incident and teaching.

It is not easy to define the route which brought Jesus again to the border line between Samaria and Judaea, and where Jesus was parted from His disciples. As this region, He was met by ten lepers, who besought Him for a cure. Jesus bade them go, and showed themselves to the priests, and on the way they were healed, except one. He, a Samaritan, returned to give thanks and glorify God. Gratitude appeared in the unlikely quarter.

At some point in this journey the Pharisees sought to entrap Jesus on the question of divorce. Was it lawful to divorce a woman for every cause? (Mt 19 3). Jesus in reply admitted the permission to divorce given by Moses (Mk 10 3-8), but declared that this was for the hardness of their hearts, and went back to the original institution of marriage in which the two so joined were declared to be ‘one flesh.” Only one cause is admissible as a ground of separation and remarriage (Mt 19 9-10, 12; Mk 10 1-12). Mk has not even the exception, which is probably, however, implied. Comments follow to the disciples in Mt on the subject of continence (vs 10-12). See Divorce.

Another question asked by the Pharisees of Jesus was as to when the kingdom of God should come. The expectation excited by His own ministry and claims was that it was near; when should it appear? Rebounding their worldly ideas, Jesus warned them that the kingdom did not come “with observation”—was not “a Lo, there! Lo, here!”; it was “within” them, or “in their midst,” though they did not perceive it. In the last decisive coming of the Son of Man there would be no doubiety as to His presence (vs 24.25). He adds exhortations as to the suddenness of His coming, and the separations that would ensue (vs 20-37), which Mt gives as part of the great discourse on the Last Things in ch. 24.

In close connection with the foregoing, as furnishing the ground for the certainty that this day of the Son of Man would come, Jesus spoke the parable of the Unjust Judge. He exhorted His people to the claims of right, yet yielded to the widow’s importunity, and granted her justice against her adversary. How much more surely will the righteous, long-suffering...
God avenge His own elect, who cry unto Him day and night (vs 7.8)? Yet men, in that supreme hour, will almost have lost faith in His coming (ver 8).

A series of sayings and incidents at this time throw light upon the spirit of the kingdom.

5. The Spirit of the Kingdom

a) Parable of Pharisee and Publican (Lk 18:9-14)

A similar lesson is inculcated in the beautiful incident of the blessing of the babes. The disciples rebuked the mothers for bringing their children to be blessed; but this, according to St Luke, Jesus approved, "Even the little children are for the kingdom of heaven's sake." (Matthew 19:14)

b) Blessing of the Young Ruler (Mt 19:13-15; Mk 10:12-15; Lk 18:18-19)

This amiable, blameless young man ("Jesus looking upon him loved him," Mk 10 21) knelt, and addressing Jesus as "Good Teacher," asked what good deed he must do to inherit eternal life. Jesus first declined the term "good," in the conventional sense of what he might do to inherit eternal life. He would have called him "Blessed are the poor in spirit, for theirs is the kingdom of heaven." (Matthew 5:3)

Jesus told him to sell all he had and follow Him. The young man was unwilling to part with his possessions, and after expressing surprise at what was required, he went away sorrowing, for he was unwilling to give up the comforts of his life. This is not only the most touching incident in the Gospels, but a parable of supreme value.

6. Third Announcement to the disciples, so hard to be persuaded that the kingdom was not immediately to be set up in glory, of His approaching sufferings and death, followed by resurrection. The disciples had been "amazed and indignant" (Mt) after the statement of St James and John regarding the honor of the kingdom. (Matthew 16:21-23)

a) The Curse of Bartimaeus (Mt 20:19-28; Mk 10:45-52; Lk 18:38-43)

Bartimaeus, the blind beggar of Jericho, came to Jesus, crying, "Have mercy on me, Lord, Jesus of Nazareth." (Luke 18:38)

b) The Parable of the Laborers in the Vineyard (Mt 20:1-16; Mk 10:1-15; Lk 20:1-8)

The laborers were hired at different wages, yet all at the end received the same wage. The murmurings at the laborers generated by the grace at work in the vineyard, who had worked longest betrayed a jealously of spirit which may explain why they were not more highly rewarded. In strictness, the kingdom is a gift of grace, for the sum total of its blessings one and the same to all.

8. Jesus at Jericho

Held two notable incidents marked His progress.

a) The Call of Zacchaeus (Lk 19:1-10)

Jesus entered Jericho, and as He went along, Zacchaeus, the chief collector of the city, was a wealthy man. Seeing Jesus coming, he ran to meet Him, and climbed a sycamore tree to see Jesus as He passed. To his amazement, and that of the crowd, Jesus stopped

b) The Hospitable Feast (Lk 14:15-24)

As the guests of the feast were the "rich and honorable" of the city, he was asked to be his guest. He was not only welcome, but he was asked to be the guest of honor. Thus, it was that Jesus came to the city of Jericho, where He was asked to be the guest of honor and was so received.
on His way, and called Zacchaeus by name to hasten to come down, for that day He must abide at his house. Zacchaeus joyfully received Him, and, moved to a complete change in his views of duty, declared his purpose of giving half his goods to the poor, and of repaying the rest, which he might have taken by false accusation. It was a revolution in that wretched soul, wrought by love. "Today," Jesus testified, "is salvation come to this house. . . . For the Son of man came to seek and to save that which was lost."

The expectations of the multitude that the kingdom of God should immediately come, made Jesus to speak the parable of the Pounds, forewarning them that the consummation of the days they looked for might be delayed than they thought, and impressing on them the need of loyalty, faithfulness and diligence, if that day when it came, was not to prove disastrous to them. The nobleman went into a "far country" to receive a kingdom, and his ten servants were to trade with as many pounds (each = 100 drachmas) in his absence. On his return the faithful servants were rewarded in proportion to their diligence; the faithless one lost what he had; the rebellious citizens were destroyed. Thus Jesus fore-shadowed the coming of Jesus as the servant of the Father, and His followers as His servants who were plotting against Him, and checked hopes that disregarded the moral conditions of honor in His kingdom.

Arrival at Bethany.—From Jericho Jesus moved on to Bethany, where He abode with Lazarus and his sisters. To His halt here before His public entrance into Jerusalem the next events belong.

B. THE PASSION WEEK—BETRAYAL, TRIAL AND CRUCIFIXION

We reach now the closing week and last solemn events of the earthly life of Jesus. The importance attached to this part of their narratives is seen by the space the evangelists devote to it. Of the Gospels, Mt. and Mk. fully one-third is devoted to the events of the Passion Week and their sequel in the resurrection; Luke has several chapters; John gives half his Gospel to the same period. It is obvious that in the minds of the evangelists the crucifixion of Jesus is the pivot of their whole narrative—the dénouement to which everything tends from the first.

1. The Events Preceding the Last Supper.—The arrival in Bethany is placed after "He took leave of the Passover over" (Lk 21:31). Assuming that the public entry into Jerusalem took place on the Sunday, and that the 14th of Nisan fell on the following Thursday, this would lead to the conclusion that the arrival being placed on the Friday or Saturday preceding, according to the mode of reckoning, it is in the highest degree unlikely that Jesus would journey from Jericho on the Jewish Sabbath; hence He may be supposed to have arrived on the Friday evening. The supper at which the anointing by Mary took place would have been the Saturday (Sabbath) evening. Mt and Mk connect it with events two days before the Passover (Mt 26:2; Mk 14:11), parenthetically, in a way which leaves the other order open.

This beautiful deed occurred at a supper given in honor of Jesus at the house of one Simon, a leper (Mt and Mk)—probably cured by Jesus—at which Martha, Mary and Lazarus were guests. Martha aided Mary in anointing Jesus at serving (Jn 12:2). In the course of the meal, or at its close, Mary brought a costly box of ointment (valued by Judas at "300 shillings," about $650, or at of ARVm on Jn 6:7), and with the perfume anointed the head (Mt, Mk) and feet (Jn) of Jesus, wiping His feet with her hair (Mt and Mk, though not mentioning the "feet," speak of the "body" of Jesus). Indignation, instigated by Judas (Jn), was at once awakened at what was deemed wanton waste. How much better had the money been given to the poor! Jesus vindicated Mary in her loving act—a prophetic anointing for His burial—and declared that wherever His gospel went, it would be spoken of for a memorial of her. It is the hearts from which such acts come, that are the true friends of the poor. The chief priests were only the further exasperated at what was happening, and at the interest shown in Lazarus, and plotted to put Lazarus also to death (Jn 12:10).

2. The Anointing at Bethany.—Another account of the anointing at Bethany is given in Mk 14:6-9. This is a longer narrative, and is the more faithful, inasmuch as it includes the saying of Jesus on the evening of the last Passover, "He that receiveth you receiveth Me; and he that receiveth Me receiveth Him that sent Me." The expression, "even Joseph," may have been dropped in Mk. Mt contains no account of the anointing at Bethany.

3. The Entry into Jerusalem.—The Mount of Olives had to be crossed by the way from Bethany to Jerusalem. The disciples were to be sent to the adjacent villages—probably Bethphage (this seems to have been also a name of a district)—where an ass and its colt would be found tied. These they were to bring to Jesus, assuring them of the permission of the owners. Garments were to be borrowed over the colt, and Jesus seated Himself on it. In this humble fashion (Mt and Jn note, in fulfillment of prophecy, Zec 9:9), He proceeded to Jerusalem, bearing palm branches, who had already come out to meet Him (Jn). Throng accompanying Him, going before and after; these, spreading their garments, and strewing branches in the way, hailed Him with hosannas, "Son of David, King of Israel," who came in the name of the Lord. Very different were the feelings in the breasts of the Pharisees. "Behold," they said, "how ye prevail nothing: lo, the world is gone after him" (Jn 12:19). They doubt Jesus' divine mission, but that if they were silent, the very stones would cry out (Lk 19:40).

Jesus weeping over Jerusalem—return to Bethany.—One incident in this progress to Jerusalem is related only by Lk (19:41-44). As a bent in the road Jesus became suddenly visible, Jesus paused and wept over the city, so blind to its day of visitation, and so near to its awful doom. Not His own sufferings, but the thought of Jerusalem's guilt and woes, filled Him with anguish. On reaching Jericho, Mark's testimony is explicit that He did no more than enter the temple, and 'look round on all things' (11:11). Then eventide having come, He returned to Bethany with the Twelve.

The morning before the Passover Jesus found Jesus and His disciples again on their way to the city. Possibly the early hours had been spent by Jesus in solitary prayer, and, as they went, it is recorded that "he hungered." Tree—A fig tree from which, from its foliage, Second fruit might have been expected, stood invitingly by the wayside, but when Jesus approached it, it was found to have nothing but leaves—a striking symbol of the outerly religious, but spiritually barren Jewish community.

4. Cursing of the Fig Tree—Cleansing of Temple

21:12-22; Mk 11:11-22; Lk 19:45-48

Tree—A fig tree from which, from its foliage, Second fruit might have been expected, stood invitingly by the wayside, but when Jesus approached it, it was found to have nothing but leaves—a striking symbol of the outerly religious, but spiritually barren Jewish community.

And in this sense Jesus used it in pronouncing on it the word of doom, "No man eat fruit from thee henceforward for ever" (Mk). Next morning (Tuesday), as the disciples passed, the tree was found withered from the roots. Mt combines the events of the cursing and the withering, placing both on the second day, but Mk more accurately distinguishes them. Jesus used the surprise of the disciples as the occasion of a lesson in the omnipotence of faith, with added counsels of prayer.

Were there two cleancisings?—Pursuing His journey on the first morning, Jesus reached the temple, and there, as His first act, is stated by Mt and Mk to have cleansed the temple of the traders. It is a difficult question whether this is a second cleansing, or the same act as that recorded by John at the beginning of his ministry (Jn 2:13-17) and here narrated out of its chronological order. The acts are at least quite similar in character and significance. In favor of a second cleansing is the anger of the priests and scribes (Mt 21:13), and the decision of the next day for His authority.

On other incidents are recorded of this visit to the temple, except the healing of certain blind and lame, and the praises of the children, "Hosanna to the son of David"—an echo of the previous day's proceedings (Mt 21:14-16). In the evening He went back to Bethany.

Far different is it with the third day of these visits of Jesus to the temple—the Tuesday of the Passion Week. This is crowded with parables, discourses, incidents, so numerous, that the mind in seeking to grasp how one short day could embrace them all. It was the last day of the appearance of Jesus in the temple (Mt 21:36), and marks His final break with the authorities of the nation, on whom His words of denunciation (Mt 23) fell with overwhelming force. The thread of the day's proceedings may thus be briefly traced.

On His first appearance in the temple on the Tuesday morning Jesus was met by a demand from the chief priests, scribes and elders (representatives of the Sanhedrin), for the authority by which He acted as He did. Jesus met them by a counter-Parable question, "The baptism of John, was it from heaven, or from men?" The 23–22:14; dilemma was obvious. If John was Mk 11:27 Divinely accredited, why did they not accept his testimony to Jesus? Yet —12:19; Lk 20:1-18 they feared to say his mission was of men, for John was universally esteemed a prophet. They could therefore only lamely reply: "We cannot tell:" (AV). Matters had now come to an issue, and Jesus, reverting to the method of the previous day, set forth plainly their sin and its results to themselves and others.

The Two Sons—the Wicked Husbandmen—the Marriage of the King's Son. The parables spoken on this occasion: that they were but a few, one might say "I go not," but afterward repented and went, the other who said, "I, go Sir," but went not—pointing the moral that the publicans and harlots went into the kingdom of God before the self-righteous leaders who rejected the preaching of John (Mt 21:28–32); that of the Wicked Husbandmen, who slew the servants, and finally the son, sent to them, and were at length themselves destroyed, the vineyard being given to others—a prophecy of the transferring of the kingdom to the Gentiles (Mt, Mk, Lk); and that of the Marriage of the King's Son (Mt 22 2–14), akin to that of the Great Supper in Lk 14:16–24 in its gathering in of the outcasts to take the place of those who had been hidden, but distinguished from it by the feature of the wedding garment, the lack of which meant being thrust into the outer darkness. The Pharisees easily perceived that these parables were spoken of them (Mt 21:45; Mk 12:12; Lk 20:19), and were correspondingly enraged, yet dared not touch Jesus for fear of the people.

The attempt was next made on the part of the Pharisees, Herodians and Sadducees—now joined in a common cause—to ensnare Jesus by captious and compromising questions. These attempts He rebuked with a wisdom and dignity which foiled His adversaries, while He showed a ready appreciation of a candid spirit when it presented itself, and turned the point against His opponents by putting a question on the Davidic sonship of the Messiah. b) Ensnaring Questions—the Resurrection—The Great Commandment. First things, etc the Pharisees with the Herodians sought (Mt 22:1–46; Mk 12:14) to entrap Him by raising the question of the lawfulness of tribute to Caesar. 13–37; Lk 20:19–44 bearing Caesar's image and superscription, Jesus obtained from them a recognition of their acceptance of Caesar's authority, and bade them render Caesar's things to Caesar, and God's to God. The Son of man with the puzzle of the wife who had seven husbands, leading up to denial of the resurrection; but Jesus met them by showing that marriage relations have no place in the resurrection life, and by pointing to the implication of a future life in God's word to Moses, "I am the God of Abraham," etc. God "is not the God of the dead, but of the living," a fact which carried with it all the weight of resurrection, as needed for the completion of the personal life. The candid scribe who came last with His question as to which commandment was first of all, had a different reception. Jesus met Him kindly, satisfied him with His answer, and pronounced him "not far from the kingdom of God" (Mk 12:34).

(2) David's Son and Lord. Jesus had silenced, but Jesus now put to them His own question. If David in Ps 110 could say "Jeh saith unto my lord, Sit thou on my right hand," etc, how was this reconcilable with the Christ being David's son? The question was to bring the implication of the oracle as spoken by David, or one of his house, of the Messiah, and was intended to suggest the higher nature of Christ as one with God in a Divine sovereignty. David's son was also David's Lord.

At this point, in audience of the multitudes and of His disciples in the temple, Jesus delivered that tremendous indictment of the scribes and Pharisees, with denunciations of woes upon them for their hypocrisy and iniquity, bearing on them the curses of the old covenant. He begins by saying, "Ye have taken away the plowshare out of the handful, let them also go down to the slaughter." (Mt 23:14) and adds of the scribes and Pharisees: "These hypocrites make broad their phylacteries, and increase the breadth of their prayer-essential, in the temple, and were at length themselves destroyed, the vineyard being given to others—a prophecy of the transferring of the kingdom to the Gentiles (Mt, Mk, Lk); and that of the Marriage of the King's Son (Mt 22:2–14), akin to that of the Great Supper in Lk 14:16–24 in its gathering in of the outcasts to take the place of those who had been hidden, but distinguished from it by the feature of the wedding garment, the lack of which meant being thrust into the outer darkness. The Pharisees easily perceived that these parables were spoken of them (Mt 21:45; Mk 12:12; Lk 20:19), and were correspondingly enraged, yet dared not touch Jesus for fear of the people. The attempt was next made on the part of the Pharisees, Herodians and Sadducees—now joined in a common cause—to ensnare Jesus by captious and compromising questions. These attempts He rebuked with a wisdom and dignity which foiled His adversaries, while He showed a ready appreciation of a candid spirit when it presented itself, and turned the point against His opponents by putting a question on the Davidic sonship of the Messiah.
course found earlier, cf Lk 11:39-52. All seems to have been gathered up afresh in this final accusation. It can be imagined that the anger of the Pharisees was fierce at such words, yet they did not venture on at to being it out.

Before finally leaving the temple, Jesus seems to have passed from the outer court into the women's court, and there to have sat down near the receptacles provided for the gifts of the worshippers. Many who were wealthy cast of their gold and silver into the treasury, but the eye of Jesus singled out one poor widow, creeping up, cast in two mites (Gr lepē̂s, the smallest of coins), which were but a farthing. It was little, but it was her all, and Jesus immortalized her poor offering by declaring that, out of her want, she had given more than the wealthiest there. Gifts were measured in His sight by the willingness that prompted them, and by the sacrifice they entailed.

It is perhaps to this crowded day, though some place it earlier in the week (on Sunday or Monday), that the incident should be referred of the death would be best to strengthen the words of Jesus, as related in Jn 12:20 ff. Who these Greeks were, or whence they came, is unknown, but they were evidently proselytes to the Jewish faith, and men of some note. The meeting was made through Philip of Bethsaida, and Philip and Andrew conveyed it to Jesus. It is not said whether their wish was granted, but we can hardly doubt that it was. Jesus evidently saw in the incident a prelude of that glory that should accrue to Himself through all men being drawn to Him (vs 23-32). But His saw as clearly that this "glorifying" could only be through His death (vs 24-25), and He universalized it into a law of His kingdom that, as a grain of wheat must fall into the earth and die if it is to be multiplied, so only through sacrifice can any life be made truly fruitful (vs 24-25). The thought of death, however, always brought trouble to the soul of Jesus (ver 27), and a voice from the Father was given to comfort Him. The multitude thought it thundered, and failed to apprehend the meaning of the voice, or His own words about being "lifted up" (vs 29-34).

Jesus had now bidden farewell to the temple. As He was going out, His disciples—or one of them (Mt 26:5)—called His attention to the magnificence of the buildings of the temple, eliciting from Him the startling reply that not one stone should be left (Mt 24; Mk upon another that should not be thrown 13; Lk 21: down. Later in the evening, when seated on the Mount of Olives on their return journey, in view of the temple, Andrew, James and John (Mk) asked Him privately when these things should be, and what would be the signs of their fulfillment. In Mt the question is thought more politely. "When shall these things be, and what shall be the sign of thy coming (parousia), and of the end of the world?" (or "consummation of the age"). It is in answer to these complex questions that Jesus spoke His great discourse on the destruction of Jerusalem and its final coming, some of the strands in which it is difficult now to disentangle. In the extended report in Mt 24 certain passages appear which are given elsewhere by Luke (cf Lk 17 20-37). It may tend to clearness if a distinction be made of the nearer event of the destruction of Jerusalem—also in its way a coming of the Son of Man—and the more remote event of the final parousia. The former, to which vs 15-28 more specially belong, seems referred to by the "these things" in ver 34, which, it is declared, shall be fulfilled in that generation. Of the final parousia, on the other hand, it is declared in ver 36 that "of that day and hour knoweth no one, not even the angels of heaven, neither the Son, but the Father only" (cf Mk 13:32). The difficulty of the phrase "immediately" of ver 29 is relieved by recalling the absence of perspective and grouping of future events in all apocalyptic prophecy—the consummation ever rising as the background of the immediate experience which is its prelude. The discourse then divides itself into a general part (vs 4-14), delineating the character of the entire period till the consummation (false Christs and prophets, wars, tribulations, apostasies, preaching of the gospel to all nations, etc); a special part relating to the impending destruction of the city, with appropriate warnings (vs 15-28); and a closing part (vs 29-51) relating mainly to the final parousia, but not without reference to preceding events in the extension of Christ's kingdom, and ingathering of His elect (vs 30-31). Warning is given of the suddenness of the coming of the Son of Man, and the need of being prepared for it (vs 37-51). The whole is a massive prophecy, resting on Christ's consciousness that His death would be the great event of the world's history, but the opening up of the way to His final glorification and triumph.

To this great discourse on the solemnities of the end, Jesus, still addressing His disciples, added three memorable parables (and g) Parables warning (Mt 26)—the first, that of the Ten Virgins, picturing, under the Virgins, a figure of virgins who went to meet the Bridegroom with insufficient provision and of last Judgment, showing how the last division will be made according as discipleship is evinced by loving deeds done to those in need on earth—such deeds being owned by Christ, the King as done to Himself. Love is thus declared to be the ultimate law in Christ's kingdom (cf 1 Cor 13); the loveless spirit is reproached. "These shall go away into eternal punishment: but the righteous into eternal life" (ver 46).

Lk 21:37-38 might suggest that Jesus taught in the temple every day till the Thursday of the Passover; if, however, the denunciation took place, as nearly all agree, on Tuesday, an exception must be made of the Wednesday, which Jesus probably spent in retirement in Bethany in preparation of spirit for His last great conflict (others arrange differently, and put some of the preceding events in this day). The summary in Jn 12:26-33 connects that of the Pharisees with Isaiah's vision (6:10), and with the prophecy of the rejected Servant (53:1).

The plot for the destruction of Jesus was meanwhile maturing. Two days before the Passover (Tuesday evening), Jesus forewarned the disciples of His approaching be-

7. An Atmosphere of tral and crucifixion (Mt 26:2); and Plotting—probably at that very hour a secret meeting of the chief priests and elders of the people was being held in the court of the house of Caiphas (Mt 26), to consult as to the means of putting Him to death. Their resolve was that it should not be done on the feast day, lest there should be a tumult; the appearance of Judas, who since the anointing had seemingly mediated this step, speedily changed their plans. For the pultry sum of 30 pieces of silver (abekels of the sanctuary, less than £20 or £4; the price of a slave, Ex 21 32; cf Zec 11 12), the recreant disciple, perhaps persuading himself that he was really forcing Jesus to an exercise of His Messianic power, agreed to betray His Lord. The presentment of infidelity to the traitor now only waited his opportunity to carry out his project.

II. From the Last Supper till the Cross. — A question of admitted difficulty arises in the comparison of the Synop- tic and Jn. details of the Last Supper and of the crucifixion. The Synoptics seem clearly to place the Last Supper on the 13th, and the crucifixion on the 14th, when the Passover had not yet been eaten (13 28; 19 14). Many, on this ground, affirm an irreconcilable discrepancy between Jn and the Synoptics, some (e.g. Meyer, Farrar, less decisively, Sanday) preferring Jn; others (Stegen, Baur, Schmiedel, et al. making the fact), discredit Jn. By those who accept both accounts, various speculations are proposed: ite. its opinion (early church writers; many moderns, as Goeck, Westcott, Farrar) is that Jesus, in view of His death, anticipated the Passover and, ate His paschal meal with His disciples on the evening of the 13th; others, in protest, “Lord, Lorraine, Andrew, D. Smith), adhering to the Synoptics, here shared, that the apparent discrepancy is accounted for by a somewhat loose usage of terms in Jn. Details of the discussion must be sought in the works on the subject. A preparatory view is best given by Westcott, Intro to the Study of the Gospels, 339 ff; and in Farnace, Life of Christ, Evron. X. A good statement of that for the Synoptics may be seen in Andrews, Life of Our Lord; cf Tholuck, Comm. on Js, on 13 1; Luthardt, Comm. on Mt, ch 18 28; D. Smith, Days of His Flesh, App. II. The language of the Synoptists (“the first day of unleavened bread, when that sacrifice was passed,” Mk 14 12) leaves no doubt that they intended to identify the Last Supper with the regular Jewish Passover. It is hardly conceivable that the reference could be mistaken on so vital a point of the apostolic tradition. This also explains the view of the church of Austria Minor, where John himself latterly resided. On the other hand, the phrase to “eat the passover” in Jn 13 28 may very well in John’s usage, refer to participation in the special sacrifices which formed a chief feature of the proceedings on the 15th. The allusion in Jn 13:1 I need mean no more than that, the Passover now impending, Jesus, loving His disciples to the end, gave them a special meal during the period that ended with the evening of the 14th of Nisan. The “preparation of the passover” in Jn 19 14.31 most naturally indicates another meal, another type of the Sabbath, the Passover week, alluded to also by the Synoptists (Mt 27 62; Mk 15 42; Lk 23 54). The objections based on the literary regulations about the Sabbath are, in fact, convincingly met by Tholuck (see also Andrews). We accept, then, our Lord ate the Passover with His disciples at the usual time—the evening of the 14th of Nisan (i.e. the beginning of the 15th).

In the scene in the upper chamber, at the observance of the Last Supper, we enter the holy of holies of this part of the Lord’s history. It was performed with great solemnity in token of the near departure of the Second Person of the Trinity. The setting apart of the Lord’s Supper, the act of consecration, the washing of the feet, symbolized the act of humiliation before the poor, the fascinating grace, the rôle of the Master that rises up. It is a direct parallel to the services of the high priest, the Nazarite, and the members of the Levitical order. The Lord Himself, who is about to be forsaken, assumes the rôle of a priest, an offering, for the redemption of His people.

2. The Last Supper (Mt; Mk 14:12–26; Lk 22:7–30; Jn 13:21–30) On the “first day of unleavened bread”—the Thursday, 14th of Nisan of the Hebrew calendar—the peculiar significance of the Passover meal. Jesus bade two of His disciples (Lk names Peter and John) make the necessary preparations for the observance of the Passover. This included the sacrifice of the lamb at the temple, the securing of a guest-chamber. Jesus bade the disciples follow a man whom they would meet bearing a pitcher, and at the house where he resided, then the house, doublets a disciple, at once gave them “a large upper room furnished and ready” (Mk); there they made ready.

Evening being come, Jesus and the Twelve assembled, and took their places for the meal. We gather from Jn 13 23 that John reclined next to Jesus (on the right), and the sequel shows that Judas and Peter were near on the other side. It was probably this arrangement that gave rise to the unseemly strife for prece- dence among the disciples narrated in Mk 14 9–10. The account of the Dis- ciples’ feet than once had occasion to do (cf Mk 9 33–37); then (for here may be inserted the beautiful incident in Jn 13 1 ff), Jesus, rising from the table, He gave them an amazing illustration of His own precept, “He that is chief [let him become] as he that doth serve. . . . I am in the midst of you as he that serveth” (Lk 22 26,27), in divesting Himself of His garments, girding Himself with a towel, and per- forming the act of a servant in washing His disciples’ feet. Peter’s exclamation must have expressed the feelings of all: “Lord, dost thou wash my feet?”

The act of the Divine Master was a wonderful lesson in humility, but Jesus used it also as a parable of something higher. “If I wash thee not [i.e. if thou art not cleansed by the receiving of my word and spirit, which this washing symbolizes], thou hast no part with me”; then on Peter’s further impulsive protest, “Not so, Lord; I will not wash the feet of him that is a sinner,” Jesus, seizing His napkin at the table, He bade them imitate the example He had just given them.

Is it I? — An ominous word had accompanied the reply to Peter, “Ye are not all clean” (Jn 13 10,11). As the supper proceeded, the question, “Is this made plain, Judas, who had already sold his Master, was at the table with the rest. He had permitted Jesus to wash his feet, and remained un- moved by that surpassing act of condescending love. Jesus was “troubled in spirit,” and now openly declared, “One of you shall betray me” (the Gr word means lit. “deliver up”): cf Lk 22 4, and RVm throughout). It was an astounding announcement to the disciples, and from one and another came the deep protest, “Who is it?” “Jn. Jesus answered that it was one of those dipping his hand with Him in the dish (Mk), and spoke of the woe that would overtake the betrayer (“Good were it for that man if he had not been born”). But, at a sign from Peter, asked, “Who is it?” (Jn. Jesus said, but to John only, to mark his treachery by the words, “Is it I, Rabbi?” and Jesus replied, though still not aloud, “Thou hast said” (Mk); then, as Satanic passion stirred the breast of Judas, He added, “What thou doest, do quickly” (Jn). Judas at once rose and went out — into the night (13 30). The disciples, not comprehending his abrupt departure, though on some occasion had been given him for the feast or for the work. Jesus was relieved by his departure and spoke of the glory coming to Himself and to His Father, and of love as the mark of true discipleship (13 31–35). The form of the observance of the Passover by the Jews are given elsewhere (see Passover). Luke alone of the NT writers speaks of 2 cups (22 17.20); in Jewish practice 4 cups were used. The “Western” text of the Lord’s Supper 13 omits the cup, from which some (of Sanday, BD) infer deliberately, but this is not necessary. Lk’s lat cup (ver 17) may be that with which the paschal supper opened; the 2d cup—that mentioned by all the writers—was probably the 3d Jewish cup, known as “the cup of blessing" (cf 1 Cor 10:16). Some, however, as Meyer, make it the 4th cup. It is implied in Mt, Mk, Jn, that by this time Judas had gone. Left then, was His final, the essential, the paschal meal being complete, Jn proceeded, by taking and distributing bread and wine, associating them with His body and blood, soon to be offered in death upon the cross, to institute that sacred rite in which, through all ages since (though its simplicity has often been sadly obscured) His love and sacrifice have been commemorated by His church. There are variations of phrase in the different accounts, but in the essentials of the sacramental institution there is entire agreement. Taking bread, after thanks to the character of a real institution, and gave it to the disciples with the words, "This is my body": the cup, in like manner, after thanksgiving, He gave them with the words, "This is my blood of the covenant [in Lk and Paul, "the new covenant in my blood"] which is poured out for many" (Mt add, "unto remission of sins"). Lk and Paul add what is implied in the others: "This do in remembrance of me" (Lk 22:19; 1 Cor 11:24). Nothing could more plainly designate the bread and wine as holy symbols of His body and blood, offered as death for man's redemption, and sealing in His blood a new covenant with God; nor, so long as the rite is observed in its Divine simplicity, as Jesus instituted it, will it be possible to expunge from His death the character of a real institution. The touching words Jesus intimated that He would no more drink of the fruit of the vine till He drank it new with them in their Father's Kingdom (on the doctrinal aspects, see EUCHARIST; SACRAMENT; LORD'S SUPPER). The Supper was over, and parting was imminent, but Jesus did not leave the holy chamber till He had poured out His inmost heart in those tender, consolatory, profoundly spiritual Discourses, addresses which the beloved disciple has preserved for us in the 14th, 15th, and 16th chs of His Gospel, followed by the wonderful closing intercessory prayer of ch 17. He was leaving them, but their hearts needed not be troubled, for they would see Him again (14:18; 16:16 ff), and if, ere long, He would part with them again in visible form, it was only outwardly He would be separated from them, for He would send them the Holy Spirit, the Paraclete, who would lead His body and blood into all truth, and bring all things to their remembrance that He had said to them (14:16.17; 15:26; 16:7–14). If He went away, it was to prepare a place for them, and He would come again to receive them to Himself in His Father's house (14:1–3); let them meanwhile show their love to Him by keeping His commandments (14:15.23.24). In the Spirit He Himself and the Father would dwell in the souls that loved Him (14:21–23). The intimacy of their union with Him would be like that of branches in the vine; only by abiding in Him could they bring forth fruit (15:1 ff). They would have tribulations (15:18 ff; 16:1.2), but as His dying bequest He left them His own peace (14:27); that would sustain their hearts in all trial (16:33). With many such promises did He comfort them in view of the terrible ordeal through which they were soon to pass; then, addressing His Father, He prayed for their holy keeping, and their final admission to His glory (17:9–24.5). These solemn discourses finished, Jesus and His disciples sang a hymn (the "Hallel") and departed to go to the Mount of Olives. Comparing the evangelists, one would infer that the conversation in which Jesus foretold the denial of Peter at least commenced before they left it (Lk 22:31; Jn 13:31). Jn connects it, probably through relation of subject, with the exposure of Judas, 13:36–38; but it seems to have continued on the way (Mt, Mk). Jesus had spoken of their being "offended" in His exaltation of spirit, Peter declared that though all should be offended in Him, He would never be offended. Jesus, who had already warned Peter that Satan sought to have him, that he might sift him as wheat (Lk 22:31); but, "I made supplication for thee," etc, now told him that before the cock should crow, he would thrice deny Him. Peter stoutly maintained that he would die rather than be guilty of so base an act, did he or the others (Mt 26:33; Mk 14:29) know themselves! The enigmatic words in Lk 22:36 about taking scrip and sword point metaphorically to the need, in the times that were coming upon them, of every lawful means of provision and self-defense; the succeeding words show that "sword" is not intended to be taken literally (ver 38).

Descending to the valley, Jesus and His disciples, crossing the brook Kidron ("of the cedars"), entered the "garden" (Jn, known as Gethsemane ("oil-press")) at the foot of Mount of Olives. Here took the Betrayal place the agony, which is the proper beginning of the Passion, the arrest of Jesus, and the arrest and trial of those who had betrayed Him. That night concerning Him should have fulfills (Lk 22:37: "your hour, and the power of darkness," ver 53), it was inevitable that mind and spirit should concentrate on the awful body in the Garden of Gethsemane, and mental suffering that way. The Garden Him. It was not the thought of physical suffering alone—from that also the pure and sensitive humanity of Jesus shrank with natural horror—but death to Him, the Holy One and Prince of Life, had an incomprehensible hateful swell over humanity, due to the judgment of God on sin, and now descending upon Him through the workings of the vileness of human passions in the religious heads of His nation. What anguish to such an One, filled with love, and desiring to comfort them, in the darkness and desert, to a malefactor's cross—alone, yet not alone, for the Father was with Him! Jn 16:32). The burden on His spirit when He reached Gethsemane was already, as the language shows, all but unendurable—"amaz'd," "sore troubled," "My soul is exceeding sorrowful even unto death" (Mk). There, bidding the other disciples wait, He took with Him Peter, James, and John, and withdrew into the recesses of the garden. Leave there a little behind, He sank on the ground in solitary "agony" (Lk), and with strong crying and tears" (He 5:7), poured out His soul in earnest supplication to His Father. "Let this cup pass away from me"—it could not be, but the revulsion of His nature was expressed—"howbeit not what I will, but what thou wilt." The passage in Lk 22:44), "His sweat became as it were great drops of blood," etc, though omitted in certain MSS, doubtless preserves a genuine tris. Returning to the three, He found them asleep with sleep: even the support of their wakeful sympathy was denied Him! "Watch and pray," He gently admonished them, "that ye enter not into temptation. A second and third time the same thing happened—wrestling with God on their knees, till, with Divine strengthening (Lk 22:41), victory was attained, and calm restored.
"Sleep on now," He said to His disciples (the crisis is past; your help can avail no more): "Arise, let us be going" (the future has to be faced; the betrayer is at hand. See the remarkable sermon of F. W. Robertson, II, sermon 22).

The crisis had indeed arrived. Through the darkness, even as Jesus spoke, He saw the light from lamps, revealing a b) Betrayal mingled company of armed men—by Judas—Rom soldiers, temple officers (Jn), Jesus others—sent by the chief priests, traitors, and elders, to apprehend Jesus. Their guide was Judas. It had been found impracticable to lay hands on Jesus in public, but Judas knew this retreat (Jn 18 2), and had arranged, by an act of dastardly treachery, to enable them to effect the capture in privacy. The sign was to be a kiss. With the expectation of friendship, only possible to one into whose heart the devil had truly entered (Lk 22 3; Jn 13 27), Judas advanced, and hailing Jesus as "Master," effusively kissed Him (Mt 26 45; Mk 14 45m). He had asked, "Betrayest thou the Son of man with a kiss?" (Lk); now He said, "Friend, do that for which thou art come" (Mt). The soldiers essayed to take Jesus, but on their first approach, driven back as by a supernatural power, fell to the ground (Jn). A proof thus given of the voluntariness of His surrender (of Mt 26 53: "Thinkest thou that I cannot beseech my Father," etc), Jesus, remarking only on the iniquity of secret violence when every day they had opportunity to take Him in the temple, submitted to be seized and bound. At this point, Peter, with characteristic impetuosity, remembering, perhaps, his pledge to die, if need be, with Jesus, drew a sword, and cut off the right ear of the high priest's servant (Jn gives the name). Having heard His deed justified by what Jesus had earlier said about "swordsmen" (Lk 22 38,38), he was speedily undeceived by Jesus' rebuke (Mt 26 52; Jn 18 11), and by His healing of the ear (Lk; the last miracle of Jesus before His death). How little this flicker of impulsive boldness meant is shown by the general panic that immediately followed. "All the disciples," it is related, "left him, and fled" (Mt, Mk). Mk tells of a young man who had come upon the scene in a linen cloth as he fled the house, now seen as an act of the disciples to save Jesus. He may be the "young man" of Jn 18 27, who fled without his naked body, and who fled, leaving the cloth behind (14 51.52). Not improbably the young man was Mark himself.

It would be about midnight when Jesus was arrested, and He was at once hurried to the house of Caiaphas, the high priest, where in expectation of the capture, a company of chief priests, scribes and elders—members of the Sanhedrin—were already assembled. Here the first instance in the trial of Jesus took place.

The legal and constitutional questions connected with the trial of Jesus are considered in the art. on JESUS CHRIST, ABRAHAM; see also Dr. Taylor Jones, The Trial of Jesus Christ; on the powers of the Sanhedrin, see SANEDRIN, and of Caiaphas, JESUS CHRIST, PEOPLE, etc., II, pp. 163 ff. There seems little doubt that, while certain questions of a technical nature were involved, the trial was illegal in nearly every particular. The arrest itself was arbitrary, as not founded on any formal accusation (the Sanhedrin, however, seems to have arrogated to itself powers of this kind; cf Acts 4 1ff); but also of definite purpose, seeking not testimony, interrogation of accused, haste in condemnation, were unquestionably in flagrant violation of the established law, and had in both cases. It is to be remembered that the death of Jesus had already been foreseen by the heads of the Sanhedrin, so that the trial was wholly a means to a foregone conclusion. On the historical side, certain difficulties arise. Jn seems to record the first conviction of Jesus take place before Annas, father-in-law to Caiaphas (on Annas, see below; though deposed 15 years before, he retained, in reality, all the dignity and influence of the high-priesthood; cf Lk 3 2; Acts 4 6); after which He is sent to Caiaphas (Jn 18 13.14.19–24). The narratives in Lk vs 19–23 are regarded as a preliminary interrogatory by Annas till matters were prepared for the arraignment before Caiaphas; or (2) ver 24 is taken over by Matt as hear, in the sense of "had sent," as in AV), and the interrogation is included in the trial by Caiaphas (Jn 18 19–23). Annas and Caiaphas may be presumed from the account of Peter's denials to have occupied the same official residence; else Annas would not have been in readiness for the trial. The frequently occurring term "chief priests" denotes the high priests, with those who had formerly held this rank, and members of their families (cf Schürer, op. cit., 203 ff). They formed, with the scribes, the most important element in the Sanhedrin.

First Jesus was led before Annas, then by him, after a brief interview, was transferred, still bound, to Caiaphas. Annas had been deposed, as above noticed, much earlier Annas and Caiaphas— and through his sons and relations, as the Unjust long as he lived exercised much of the authority of high priest. Like all those holding this high office, he and Caiaphas were Sadducees. Annas—if he is the questioner in Jn 18 19–23—asked Jesus concerning His disciples and His teaching. Such examination was unlawful, the duty of the accuser, in Jewish law, being to produce witnesses; properly, therefore, Jesus referred him to His public teaching in the temple, and bade him ask those who heard Him there. An officer standing next Jesus with his hand for so speaking: Indignity which Jesus endured with meek remonstrance (vs 22.23).

1) An illegal session. Meanwhile a company of the Sanhedrin had assembled (23 sufficed for a quorum), and Jesus was brought before this tribunal, which was presided over by Annas. A hurried search had been made for witnesses (this, like the night session, was illegal), but even the suborned testimony thus obtained ("false witnesses") was found useless for the purpose of establishing, constructively or directly, a charge of blasphemy against Jesus. At length two witnesses were produced who gave a garbled version of the early saying of Jesus (Jn 2 19) about destroying the temple and rebuilding it in three days. To speak against the temple might be construed as a blasphemy against God (cf Mt 23 16.21; Acts 6 13.14), but here too the witnesses broke down through lack of agreement. In all cases, however, must Jesus be condemned: the unprecedented course therefore was taken of seeking a conviction from the accuser himself, who accused Himself. Rising from his seat, the high priest adjured Jesus by the living God to tell them whether He was the Christ, the Son of God (in Mk, "Son of the Blessed"). In using this title, Caiaphas had evidently in view, as in Jn 5 18; 10 33, a claim to equality with God. The supreme moment had come, and Jesus did not falter in His reply: "Thou hast said." Then, identifying Himself with the Son of Man in Daniel's vision (7 13.14), He solemnly added, "Henceforth from this resurrection on ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven." It was enough. Without even the pretense of inquiry into the truth or falsehood of the claim, the high priest rent his garments, exclaiming, "The hath spoken blasphemy," and by assent of all Jesus was adjudged worthy of death. Abuse and insult followed. The members of the Sanhedrin were permitted to spit on the condemned One, smite Him, blindfold and mock Him, saying, "Prophecy into us, thou Christ: who is he that smiteth thee?" Then, with further blows, He was led away (Mt 26 68).

2) A morning confirmation. To give color of judicial sanction to these tumultuous and wholly irregular night proceedings, a more formal meeting of the Sanhedrin was convened as soon as day had dawned (Mt 27:1; Mk 15:1; Lk 22:66-71). Probably the irregularities were held to be excused by the urgency of the occasion and the solemnities of the feast. Jesus was again brought forward; new questions were put which He declined to answer. Possibly a new appeal of His Messiahship was made (more probably Luke includes in this scene, the only one he records, some of the particulars of the earlier proceedings). The judgment of the past night was confirmed.

While this great moral tragedy of the trial and condemnation of Jesus was in process, a lesser, but still awful, tragedy in the history of a soul was being enacted in the court of the threefold denial of his Master by the apostle Peter. Peter, who had followed “afar off” (Lk), had gained access to the court through an unnamed disciple, whom it is easy to identify with John (Jn 18:15). As he stood warming himself at a fire which had been kindled, the maid who had admitted them (Jn), gazing attentively at Peter, said boldly, “Thou also wast with Jesus the Galilean” (Mt 26:69). Unnerved, and affrighted by his surroundings, Peter took the readiest mode of escape in denial. “I know him not.”

His heart must have sunk within him as he framed the words, and the crowing of a cock at the moment (Mk—perhaps an hour after midnight), reminding him of his Master’s warning, deepened his discomfiture. Guiltily he withdrew to the porch, only a little after to be accosted by another (the maid had spoken to her neighbors, Mk), with the same charge. More afraid than ever, he declared again, “I know not this man,” and, seeing he was not believed, strengthened the denial with an oath. Yet a third time, an hour later, a bystander (or several, Mk), this time founding on his Galilean speech, pronounced, “Of a truth thou art one of them.” Peter, to clear himself, cursed and swore, snow-disclaiming knowledge of his Lord. To this depth had the boastful apostle fallen—as low, it might seem, as Judas! But there was a difference. As Peter spoke the cock again crowed—the cockcrow which gives its form to three of the narratives (Mk alone ignores the doubling). At the same instant, either from within, or as He was being led forth, Jesus turned and looked on His erring disciple. That look—so full of pity, sorrow, reproach—could never be forgotten! Its impression remained, “Petri heartf felt repentance its counterpart in the remorse of Judas, which, bitter as it also was, cannot receive the nobler name. First, c) Remorse Judas sought to return the 30 shekels and Suicide paid him as the price of blood (“I betrayed innocent blood”); then, when callously rebuffed by the priests and elders, he flung down the accursed money in the sanctuary, and went and hanged himself. Mt and Acts seem to follow slightly divergent traditions to his end and the purchase of the potter’s field. The underlying facts probably are that the priests applied the money, which they could not put into the treasury (Ml), to the purchase of the field, where, either before or after the purchase, Judas deceived himself (Jn 18:15). His actions (falling and bursting asunder), assigning it as a place to bury strangers in. His connection with Judas is attested by its name, “Akeldama,” “the field of blood.”

The Jews might condemn, but they had no power to pronounce sentence of death (Jn 18:31). This power had been taken from them by the Romans, and was now vested in the Rom governor. The procurator of Judaea was Pontius Pilate, a man hated by the Jews for his ruthless tyranny (see Pilate), yet, as the Gospels show him, not without a sense of right, but vacillating and weak-willed in face of mob clamor, and risk to his own interests. His residence in Jerusalem (“Praetorium,” ERV “palace”) was a matter of some controversy (Mt 27:2-11;—G. A. Smith, etc., on the tesselated pavement (Jn 19:13) in the semicircular front of which was placed the tribunal (bêmma) from which judgments were delivered. It was to this place the events took place when it was “early” (Jn 18:28), probably between 6 and 7 AM (of 19:14, Rom computation).

Jesus was taken within the Praetorium, but His accusers were too scrupulous about defilement at the Passover festival (Jn 18:28) to enter the building. Pilate therefore came out to hear their accusation. a) Attitude of the Accusers They would fain have had an endorse their condemnation without further inquiry, but this he would not do. They would not have it that it was a simple question of their law, yet had to justify their demand for a death sentence (ver 31). They alleged that Jesus was a revolutionary character of Christ’s teaching, His forbidding to pay tribute to Caesar (a false charge), His claim to be a king (Lk 23:2). to all which charges Jesus answered not a word (Mk 15:5). At a later stage, after Pilate, who knew very well that no mere sedition against the Rom power had called forth all this passion (witness the choice of Barabbas), had repeatedly declared that he found no crime in Jesus (Mk 15:14; Lk 23:4.14.22; Jn 18:38; 19:4). his pronouncement, it was .laid bare: “We have a law, and by that law he ought to die, because he made himself the Son of God” (Jn 19:7). When it was seen how this declaration made Pilate only the more unwilling to yield to their rage, return was made to the political motive, now in the form of personal threat: “If thou release this man, thou art not Caesar’s friend” (ver 12). This was Pilate’s weak point, and the Jews knew it. The clamoim grew louder, “Cru-cify him! crucify him!” Pilate, appalled by the idea of the degradation could no go farther than in the cry, “We have no king but Caesar” (ver 15).

Pilate was from the first impressed with the imno-cence of Jesus, and was sincerely anxious, as his action showed, to save the terrible and ignominious death His.Pilate by his act of grace. His was the noblest of the Roman emperors, he was the monarch of the Roman world; he was not, like earthly kings, supported by violence; he was founded on the truth, and gathered its subjects from those that received the truth (Jn 18:36.37). The indifference to the name of truth which the jaded mind of Pilate confessed (“What is truth?”) could not hide from him the nobility of the soul of the Holy One who stood before him. He declared publicly, “I find no fault in this man,” and thereafter sought means of saving Him, at least of shifting the responsibility of His condemnation from himself to others.

(1) Jesus sent to Herod.—Hearing in the clamor round the judgment seat that Jesus was a Galilean, and remembering that Herod Antipas, who had judged him in Galilee, asked Pilate, when he had first expounded to send Jesus to Herod, to be examined by him (Lk 23:6–11). This act of courtesy had the effect of making Herod and Pilate, who had been at enmity, again friends (ver 12); otherwise it failed of its object. Herod was pleased enough to see one he had so often heard about—even thought in his flippancy that a miracle might be done by him—but when Jesus, in presence of “that fox” (Lk 13:32), refused to open his mouth in answer to the accusations levelled against him by Herod, his soldiers turned the matter into jest, by clothing Jesus in gorgeous apparel, and sending him back as a mock-king to Pilate.

(2) “Not this man, but Barabbas.”—Pilate's next thought was to release Jesus in pursuance of a Jewish custom of setting free a prisoner at the feast, and to this end, having again protested that no fault had been found in him, offered the people the choice between Jesus and a notorious robber and murderer called Barabbas. Jesus, then, was bound. Just then, as he sat on the judgment seat, a message from his wife regarding a dream she had ( "Have thou nothing to do with that righteous man," Mt 27:19) must strongly have influenced his superstitious mind. Pilate may have supposed that the attitude of his wife would prefer a murderer to one so good and pure; but, instigated by the priests, they perpetrated even this infamy, shouting for the release of Barabbas and the crucifixion of Jesus.

Pilate:—"Pilate's face now began to reveal itself. He proposed to "chastise" (scourge) Jesus—why "chastise," if he was innocent?—then release him. But this compromise, as was to be anticipated, only whetted the eagerness for blood, and the cries grew ever louder, "Crucify him, Crucify him!" Pilate, however, as if yielding to the storm, did deliver Jesus to be scourged (scourging—a fearful infliction—preceded crucifixion), the cruelty being aggravated by the maltreatment of the soldiers, who, outstripping former mockeries, put on his head a crown of thorns, arrayed him in a purple robe, and raised blows upon his bleeding face and form. It seems to have been a design of Pilate to awake pity, since again he brought Jesus forth, and then ejected him, new with attestation of his innocence, presented him to the people in the words, "Behold, the man!" (Jn 19:5). How hideous the mockery, at once to declare of such an one, "I find no ground to execute him to the cross... thus shamefully abused! No pity dwelt in these hearts, however, and the shouts became still angrier, "Crucify him."

(4) A last appeal—Pilate yields.—The words of the leadess, "He made himself the Son of God," spoken as a reason for putting Jesus to death (Jn 19:7), struck a new fear into the heart of Pilate. It led him again to enter the Praetorium, and inquire of this strange prisoner, unlike any he had ever seen, "Who is this man?" Jesus asked, "I know thee not," asked Pilate, "that I have power to release thee, and have power to crucify thee?" Jesus answered only that he, Pilate, had no power over him at all save what was given him of God; the greater therefore was the crime of those who had subjected him to this abuse of Divinely given power. Again Pilate went out and sought to release Jesus, but was met by the fierce cries that foreboded complaint to Caesar (Jn 19:12). A tumult seemed imminent, and Pilate succumbed. Here probably (though not necessarily) he had the washing of his hands by Pilate—a vain declaring of his responsibility—recorded in Mt 27:24, and the awful answer of the people, "His blood be on us, and on our children" (ver 25). Pilate now ascends the judgment seat, and, fully conscious of the iniquity of his procedure, proceeds to the cross. The trial over, Jesus is led again into the Praetorium, where the cruel mockery of the soldiers is resumed in intensified form. The Holy One, throned, crowned, clad in purple, a reed thrust into his hand, is placed at the mercy of the whole band of soldiers, who bow the knee in ridicule before Him ("Hail, King of the Jews"), spit upon him in contempt, smite him on the head with the reed (Mt, Mk). Then, stripped of the robe, his own garments are put on him, and the crown of thorns is fixed on his brow.

In all this hideous scene of cruelty, injustice, and undeserved suffering, the conspicuous feature in the bearing of Jesus is the absolute calmness, dignity and meekness with which he endures the highest wrongs and temptations. He undertakes no vengeance; but he has in view the vindication of his Father's name, the carrying out of his Father's will, and the revelation of his Father's love, patience, and compassion. He has no aim, as his words and actions show, other than to make known the Father’s love, patience, and compassion. He knows the Father’s will, and the revelation of his Father’s love, patience, and compassion. He has no aim, as his words and actions show, other than to make known the Father’s will, and the revealed nature of the Father, that all who hear may know the truth, believe in God, and have eternal life (Jn 14:6). The love of God so displayed in Jesus's death for man’s sins—so compassionate, just, and forgiving—means for us the forgiveness of sin, the assurance of eternal life, and the hope of heaven.

III. The Crucifixion and Burial.—Crucifixion was the form of punishment reserved for the Romans for slaves, foreigners, and the vilest criminals, and could not be inflicted on a Roman citizen. With its prolonged and excruciating torture, it was one of the most agonizing and ignominious death-penalties. The victim, while being strapped to the cross, was subjected to a variety of torture and mockery, including whipping, being spat on, etc. This cruel punishment was designed to inflict the heaviest physical exhaustion, mental strain, agony of scourging, suffering from wounds and blows, of that terrible night and morning, with unbroken fortitude and unembittered spirit. Not a word of complaint passes from him; He makes no reply to accusations; when reviled, He reviles not again; He takes all with submission, as part of the cup the Father has given Him to drink. It is a spectacle to move the stoniest heart. Well to remember that it is the world’s sin, in which all share, that mingled the bitter draught!

1. The Crucifixion

(Mt 27:31—56; Mk 15:21–41; Lk 23:26–49; Jn 19:16–37)

"In the end, it was a sight of Golgotha, the 'place of a skull' (in Lk ‘Calvary,’ the Latinized form), is quite uncertain. It may have been a slant mound resembling a skull (thus Meyer, Luthardt, Godet, etc), but this is not known. It is only plain that it was outside the wall, in the immediate vicinity of the city (see note below on sepulcher). The time of the crucifixion was about 9 AM (Mk 15:25). The day (Friday) was the Sabbath of the Passover week (Mt, Mk, Lk; cf Jn 19:14.31). It was part of the torment of the victim of this horrible sentence that he had to bear his own cross (according to some only the pathibulum, or transverse beam) to the place of execution. As Jesus, staggering, possibly fainting, under this burden, passed out of the gate, a stranger coming from the country, Simon, a man of Cyrene, was laid hold of, and compelled to carry the cross (such an one would not be permitted to do so), to Jerusalem and the temple. Simon, however, was not wholly unipitted. In the crowd following him were some women of Jesus, who bewailed and lamented him. The Lord, turning, bade these weep, not for Him, but for themselves and for their children. "If they do these things in the green tree, what shall be done in the dry?" (Lk 23:27–31).

When Jesus was crucified, the crucifixion at once took place under the care of a centurion and a quaternion of soldiers. With ruthless blows, hands and feet were nailed to the wood, then the cross was reared—two perpendicular part may, as some think, have first been placed in position. As to emphasise, from Pilate's point of view, the irony of the proceedings, two robbers were crucified with Jesus, on right and left, an undisguised fulfilment of prophecy (Isa 53:12). It was doubtless when being raised upon the cross that Jesus uttered the touching prayer—His 1st word on the cross (its genuineness need not be questioned, though some ancient MSS omit)—"Father, forgive them; for they know not what they do" (Lk). Above His head, according to custom, was placed a tablet with His accusation, written in three languages, Heb, Gr and Lat. The chief priests took offence at the form, "This is the King of the Jews," and wished it changed to "He said, Lord, King," etc., but Pilate curtly dismissed their complaint: "What I have written I have written" (Jn). Whether Jesus still wore the crown of thorns is doubtful. The garments of the Crucified were divided among the soldiers, but for His inner garment, woven without seam, they cast lots (cf Ps 22:18). A draught of wine mingled with an opiate (gall or myrrh), intended to dull the senses, was offered, but refused.

The triumph of Christ's enemies now seemed complete, and their gloe was correspondingly unrestrained. Their victim's helplessness was to them a disproof of His claims. Railing, and wagging their heads, they taunted Him, "If thou art the Son of God, come down from the cross!" "He saved others; himself he cannot save." At first the robbers who were crucified with Him (possibly only one) joined in this reproach, but ere long there was a change. The breast of one of the malefactors opened to the impression of the holiness and meekness of Jesus, and faith took the place of scorn. He rebuked his neighbor for reviling One who had "done nothing against me, address: "Jesus, remember me when thou comest in thy kingdom." The reply of Jesus—His 2d word on the cross—surpassed what even the penitent in these strange circumstances could have anticipated, "Today shalt thou be with me in Paradise" (Lk). A not less touching incident followed—perhaps preceded—this rescue of a soul in its last extremity. Standing near the cross was a group of holy women, one of them the mother of Jesus Himself (Jn 19:25). Mary the mother of Jesus, Mary's sister, Mary the wife of Cleopas—identity the two latter—Mary Magdalene. Mary, whose anguish of spirit may be imagined, was supported by the disciple John. Beholding them—His 3d word from the cross—Jesus tenderly commended His mother to the care of John; to Mary, "Woman, behold, thy son"; to John, "Behold, thy mother." From that time Mary dwelt with John.

Three hours passed, and at noon mocking was hushed in presence of a startling natural change. The sky, and a deep darkness, lasting for 3 hours, settled over the land. The darkness was preternatural in its time and occasion, whatever natural agencies may have been concerned in it. The earthquake a little later (Mt) would be due to the same causes. It was as if Nature veiled itself, and shuddered at the enormity of the crime which was being perpetrated. But the outer gloom was only the symbol of a yet more awful darkness that, toward the close period, overspread the whole of this world. d) The Great Darkness—of Jesus Himself. Who shall fathom the cry of the depths of agony that lay in that awful cry—the 4th from the cross—that burst loudly from the lips of Jesus, "Eli, Eli, lamad sabachthani?" —"My God, My God, why hast thou forsaken me?" (or, "Why didst thou forsake me?")—words borrowed from Ps 22:1! It was before remarked that death was not a natural event to Jesus, but ever had in it to His mind its significance as a judgment of God on sin. Here it was not simply death that He experienced in his most cruel form, but death bereft of the sensible comforts of the Father's presence. What explanation of that mystery can be found which does not take into account with Isa 53 (cf Jn 1:29) His character as Sin-Bearer, even as the unbroken trivial with which in His loneliness He clings to God ("My God") may be felt to have in it the element of atonement? On this, however, the present is not the place to dwell.

The end was now very near. The victim of crucifixion sometimes, on his deathbed, spoke of his days; but the unexampled strain of body and mind which Jesus had undergone since the preceding day brought with it an earlier termination to His sufferings. Light was returned with it; peace; and in the consciousness that all things were now finished (Jn 19:28), Jesus spoke again—the 5th word—"I thirst" (Jn). A sponge filled with vinegar was raised on a reed to His lips, while some who had heard His earlier words ("Eli, Eli," etc), and thought He called for Elijah, said, "Let us see whether Elijah cometh to save him" (Mt). With a last effort, Jesus cried aloud—"It" and memorable word—"It is finished," then, in a final utterance—the 7th—"commended His spirit to God: "Father into thy hands I commend my spirit" (Lk). Following on this word, bowing His head, He surrendered Himself to death. It will be seen that of the 7 words spoken from the cross, 3 are preserved by Lk alone (1st, 2d, 7th), 3 by Jn alone (3d, 5th, 6th), while the 4th cry ("Eli, Eli," etc) occurs only in the first 2 evangelists (Mt and Mk, however, speak of Jesus "crying with a loud voice" at the close).

Jesus had died; the malefactors still lived. It was now 3 o'clock in the afternoon, and it was desirable that the bodies should not remain upon the cross in the approaching Sabbath. Permission was therefore obtained from Pilate for the soldiers Earthquake to break the legs of the crucified (crulpfragium), and so hasten death. When it was discovered that Jesus was already dead, a soldier, possibly to make sure, pierced His side with a spear, and John, who was present, notices as a special fact that "there came out blood and water" (19:34). Whether this means, as Stroud and others have contended, that Jesus literally died of rupture of the heart, or what other physiological explanation may be given of the phenomenon, to which the apostle elsewhere attaches a symbolical significance (1 Jn 5:6), need not here be discussed (see Brown). This, however, was not the only startling and symbolically significant fact attending the death of Jesus. A great darkness had precluded the death; now, at the hour of His expiry, the veil of the temple (i.e. of the inner shrine) was rent from top to bottom—surely a sign that the way into the holiest of all was now opened for mankind.
(He 9:8.12)—and a great earthquake shook the city and rent the rocks. Mt connects with this the statement that the tombs thus opened “many, the graves of the saints . . . were raised; and coming forth out of the tombs after his resurrection they entered into the holy city and appeared unto many” (27:52ff). There is nothing in itself improbable, though none of the other evangelists mention it, in such an early demonstration being given of what the Lord’s death and resurrection meant for believers. In other ways the power of the cross was revealed. A dying robber had been won to repentance; now the centurion who commanded the soldiers was brought to the avowal, “Truly this was the Son of God” (Mt, Mk; in Lk, “a righteous man”). The mood of the crowd, too, was changed since the morning; they “returned, smiting their breasts” (Lk 23:48). “Afar off,” speechless with wonder, stood the women who had followed Jesus from Galilee, with other friends and disciples. The evangelists name Mary Magdalene, Mary, the mother of James and Joses, Salome (Mk) and Joanna, the wife of Chuza, Herod’s steward (Lk).

Jesus had conquered hearts on His cross; now His death reveals friends from the wealthier classes, hitherto kept back by fear (Jn 19:38), who charge themselves with His honorable burial. One was Joseph which of Arimathea, a just man, “looking for the kingdom of God, of whom the Holy Spirit foretold” (Jn 19:38). In fact it is recorded that, through a member of the Sanhedrin, he was not consented to their counsel and deed (Lk); the other was Nicodemus, he who came to Jesus by night (Jn 3:1-2; 19:39), mentioned again only in Jn (50-52), who, also as a member of the Sanhedrin, puts a word in for Jesus.

Joseph of Arimathea takes the lead. “Having dared,” as Mk says (16:43, Gr), he begged the body of Jesus from Pilate, and having obtained it, bought linen cloth wherein to wrap it, and reverently buried it in a new rock-tomb of his own (Mt, Mk), “where never man had yet lain” (Lk). Jn furnishes the further particulars that the tomb was in the vicinity, not far from where Jesus was crucified (11:31, 41-42). He tells also of the munificence of Nicodemus, who brought as much as 100 pounds (about 75 lbs. avoirdupois) of spices—“a mixture of myrrh and aloes” (ver 39), with which to embalm the body of Jesus. This thought of as an “arming” is rather, the spices formed a powder strewn between the folds of the linen bandages (cf Luthardt, Comm. on Jn 19:40). The body, thus prepared, was then placed in the tomb, and a great stone rolled to the entrance. The burial was of necessity a very hurried one, which the holy women who witnessed it—Mary Magdalene and Mary the mother of Joses are specially mentioned (Mt, Mk)—purposed to supplement by an anointing when the Sabbath was past (cf Lk 23:56).

Though Jesus was dead, the chief priests and Pharisees were far from easy in their minds about Him. Mysterious words of Had been quoted about His building of the temple in three days; possibly Judas had told something about His sayings regarding His death and rising again on the 3d day; in any case, His body was in the hands of His disciples, and they might reasonably suppose that He had risen. With this plea they went to Pilate, and asked from him a watch of soldiers to guard the tomb. To make assurance doubly sure, they sealed the tomb with the official seal. The result of their efforts was only, under Providence, to provide new evidence of the reality of the resurrection.

The uncertainty attaching to the site of Golgotha attaches also to the site of Joseph’s rock-tomb. Opinion is about equally divided in favor of, and against, the traditional site, where the Church of the Sepulchre now stands. A principal ground of uncertainty is whether that site originally lay within the second wall of the city of Jerusalem (cf. Stanley, Sinai and Pal. 457 ff.; G. A. Smith, Jesus, II, 576; a good conspectus of the different opinions, with the authorities, is given in Andrews, Part VII).

P. THE RESURRECTION AND ASCENSION

The resurrection of Jesus, with its completion in the ascension, setting the seal of the Father’s acceptance on His finished work on earth, The Resurrection and marking the decisive change from His state of humiliation to that of Fundamental Fact sense the corner stone of Christianity (cf. 1 Cor 15:14, 17). It was on the preaching of Christ crucified and risen that the Christian church was founded (e.g. Acts 2:32-39; 1 Cor 15:3-4). Professor Harnack would distinguish between the “Easter faith” (that Jesus lives with God) and “the Easter message,” but the church never had any Easter faith apart from the Easter message. The conception of the resurrection is therefore a first task to which unbelief addresses itself. The modern spirit rules it out a priori as miraculous. The historical fact is denied, and innumerable theories (imposture, theories of swoon, of hallucination, mythical theories, spiritualistic theories, etc) are invented to explain the belief. None of these theories can stand calm examination (see the writer’s work, The Resurrection of Jesus). The objections are but small dust of the balance compared with the strength of the evidence for the fact. From the standpoint of faith, the resurrection of Jesus is the most credible of events.

If Jesus was indeed such an One as the gospel history declares Him to be, it was impossible that death could hold Him (Acts 2:24). The resurrection, in turn, confirms His claim to be the Son of God (Rom 1:4).

With the narratives of the resurrection are here included, as inseparably connected, those of the appearances of the Lord after His resurrection and ascension and Galilee. The accounts will show that while the body of Jesus was a true body, identical with that which suffered on the Cross (it could be touched, ver 25); it was also attested, it escaped the restrictions of a mortal being, its life was not the life of the animal (Lk 20:21; 1 Cor 15:3-8) bodily, on a new phase of existence, in which at some least of the ordinary limitations of body were transcended. Its condition in the interval between the resurrection and the ascension was an intermediate one—no longer simply natural, yet not fully entered into the state of glorification. “I am not yet ascended . . . I ascend” (Jn 20:17); in these two parts of the one saying the mystery of the resurrection body is comprised.

The main facts in the resurrection narratives stand out clearly. “According to all the Gospels,” the arch-skeptical Strauss concedes, “the Easter ‘story’ is a true story, and the resurrection morning at the tomb appears to be a historical fact.” The morning—The Open Tomb—was restored to life at daybreak on Sunday (New Life of Jesus, I, 397, ET).

Discrepancies are alleged in detail as to the time, names and number of the women, number of angels, etc.; but most of these vanish on careful examination. The Synoptics group their material, while Jn gives a more detailed account of particular events.
(1) The angel and the keepers.—No eye beheld the actual resurrection, which took place in the early morning, while it was still dark. Mk records that there was "no man in the place where the Lord lay," and sat upon it. Before his dazzling aspect the keepers became as dead men, and afterward fled. The chief priests bribed them to conceal the facts, and say the body had been stolen (Mt 28:4-11:15).

(2) Visit of the women.—The first intimation of the resurrection to the disciples was the discovery of the empty tomb by the women who had come at early dawn (Mt 28:1; Mk 16:2; Lk 24:1; Jn 20:1), with spices, prepared to anoint the body of Jesus (Mk 16:1; cf Lk 23:56). Apparently ignorant of the guard, the women were concerned on their way as to who should roll away the stone from the door of the tomb (Mk 16:3), and were much surprised to find the stone rolled away, and the tomb open. There is no need for supposing that the women mentioned all came together. It is much more probable that they came in different groups or companies—perhaps Mary Magdalene and another Mary, or Mary Salome, first (Mt, Mk; cf of the "we" of Jn 20:2); then Joanna and other members of the Galilean band (Lk).

(3) The angelic message.—As the women stood, peeping in, and talking about the tomb, they received a vision of angels (Mt and Mk speak only of one angel; Lk and Jn mention two; all allude to the dazzling brightness), who announced to them that Jesus had risen ("He is not here; for he is risen;—he is not in the place where the Lord lay"), and bade them tell His disciples that He went before them to Galilee, where they should see Him (Mt, Mk; Lk, who does not record the Galilean appearances, omits this part, and recalls the words spoken by Jesus in Galilee, concerning His death and resurrection; cf Mt 16:21). The women departed with "trembling and astonishment" (Mk), yet "with great joy" (Mt). Here the original Mk breaks off (ver 8), the remaining vs being an appendix. But it is granted that Mk must originally have contained an account of the report to the disciples, and of an appearance of Jesus in Galilee.

The narrative in Jn enlarges in important respects those of the Synoptics. From it we learn that Mary Magdalene (at any rate, but one at least is implied in the "we" of Mk 16:2), concluding from the empty tomb that the body of Jesus had been removed, at once ran to carry the news to Peter and John ("They have taken away the Lord out of the tomb, and we know not where they have laid him"). These apostles lost no time in hastening to the spot. John, who arrived first, saw the linen cloths lying, while Peter, entering, beheld also the napkin for the head rolled up in a place by itself. After John likewise had entered ("He saw, and believed"), they returned to their home. Meanwhile Mary had come back disconsolate to the tomb, where, looking in, she, like the other women, had a vision of two angels. It was then that Jesus addressed her, "Why weepest thou?" At first she thought it was the gardener, but on Jesus tenderly naming her, "Mary," she recognized who it was, and the other exclamation, "Rabbi!" ("Teacher"), would have clasped Him, but He forbade: "Touch me not," etc (ver 17, Mk "Take not hold on me"), i.e. "Do not wait, but hasten to tell my disciples that I am risen, and ascend to my Father" (the assumption-life had already begun, altering earlier relations).

Report to the disciples—incresility.—The appearance of Jesus to the other women (Mt 28:9.10) is referred to below. It is probable that, on the way back, Mary Magdalene rejoined her sisters, and that the errand to the disciples—or such as could be found—was undertaken together. Their report was received with incredulity (Lk 24:11; cf Mk 16:11). The visit of Peter referred to in Lk 24:12 is doublets that recorded more precisely in Jn.

Ten appearances of Jesus altogether after His resurrection are recorded, or are referred to; of these five were on the day of resurrection. They are the following:

b) Other Easter-Day appearances

(1) The first is the appearance to Mary Magdalene above described.

(2) The second is an appearance to (Emmaus, the women as they returned from Jerusalem, tomb, recorded in Mt 28:9.10. Jesus met them, saying, "All hail," and as they took hold of His feet and worshipped Him, He renewed the commission they had received for the disciples. Some regard this as only a generalization of the appearance to Mary Magdalene, but it seems distinct from Mk.

(3) An appearance to Peter, attested by both Lk (24:34) and Paul (1 Cor 15:5). This must have been early in the day, probably soon after Peter's visit to the tomb. No particulars are given of this interview, but an and an angel came to the risen Lord to His repentant apostle. The news of it occasioned much excitement among the disciples (Lk 24:34).

(4) The fourth was an appearance to two disciples on their way from Jesus to Emmaus—a village about two hours distant (Mt 28:12-35; Mk 16:12.13). They were conversing on the sad events of the last few days, and on the strange tidings of the women's vision of angels, when Jesus overtook them, and entered into conversation with them. At first they did not recognize Him—a token, as in Mary's case, of change in His appearance—though their hearts burned within them as He opened to them the Scriptures about Christ's sufferings and glory. As the day was closing, Jesus abode with them to the evening meal; then, as He blessed and brake the bread, "Their eyes were opened, and they knew him; and he vanished out of their sight" (Lk 24:30.31). They hastily rose, and returned to the company of disciples at Jerusalem. According to Mk 16:13, their testimony, like that of the women, was not at first believed.

(5) The fifth appearance was that to the "eleven," with others, in the evening—an appearance recorded by Luke (24:36.50), and John (20:19-23), and alluded to by Paul (1 Cor 15:5). The disciples from Emmaus had just come in, and found the company thronging with excitement at the news that the Lord had appeared to Simon (Lk). The doors were closed for fear of them, who supposed they had appeared in their midst with the salutation, "Peace be unto you" (Lk, Jn; doubt is unnecessarily cast on Lk 24:36.40, by their absence from some Western texts). The disciples were affrighted; they thought they had seen a spirit (Lk); "disbelieved for joy" (Lk 24:41). To remove their fears, Jesus showed them His hands and His feet (in Jn, His side), and ate before them (Lk). He then breathed on them, saying, "Receive ye the Holy Spirit," and removed the commission formerly given to repent and retain sins (Jn; cf Mt 18:17.18). The breathing was anticipatory of the later affusion of the Spirit at Pentecost (cf Jn 7:39; Acts 2); the authority delegated depends for its validity on the possession of that Spirit, and its exercise according to the mind of Christ (cf e.g. 1 Cor 5:3). The incident strikingly illustrates at once the reality of Christ’s risen body, and the changed conditions under which that body now existed.

Eight days after this first appearance—i.e. the next Sunday evening—a second appearance of Jesus to the apostles took place in the same chamber and in the same way as the first (cf. Jn 20:19). The peculiar feature of this second meeting was the removal of the doubt of Thomas, who, it is related, had not been present at the Eleven’s meeting, and who, according to the Gospel of Thomas, devoted (cf Jn 11:16), but of naturally questioning temperament (14:5), refused to believe on the mere report of others that the Lord had risen, and demanded indubitable sensible evidence for himself. Jesus, at the second appearance, after sauration, gave the doubting apostle the evidence he asked: “Reach hither thy finger, and see my hands;” etc. (Jn 20:27), though, as the event proved, the sign was not needed. The faith and love of the erstwhile doubter to earliest one of all the apostles is recorded for at least an admiring profession: “My Lord and my God.” It was well; but Jesus reminded him that the highest faith is not that which walks on the evidence of “sensuous” that have not seen, and yet have believed” (ver 29).

The scene now shifts for the time to Galilee. Jesus had decided to meet with His disciples in Galilee (Mt 26:32; Mk 16:7; cf Acts 1:9, 11). The apostles, however, to this Galilean meeting—that recorded in Mt 28:16–20, probably to identified with the appearance “to above five hundred brethren at once,” mentioned by Paul (1 Cor 15:6)—there is another appearance of Jesus to seven disciples at the Lake of Galilee, of which the story is preserved in Jn 21:1-23.

(1) At the Sea of Tiberias—the draught of fishes—Peter’s restoration.—The chapter which narrates this appearance after sauration is before the Twelve’s meeting (Sea of Tiberias) is a supplement to the Gospel, but is so evidently Johannine in character that it may safely be accepted as from the pen of the beloved disciple (thus Lightfoot, Meyer, Gedt, Alford, etc.). The appearance is recorded in Jn’s account, and the word “appearances” (ver 14), i.e. the third to the apostles collectively, and in Jn’s record seven disciples are stated to have been present, of whom five are named—Peter, Thomas, Nathanael (probably to be identified with Bartholomew), James, John, and Zebedee. The disciples had spent the night in fishing without result. In the morning Jesus—yet unrecognized—appeared on the beach, and bade them cast down their net on the right side of the boat. The draught of fishes which they took revealed to John the presence of the Master. “It is the Lord,” he said to Peter, who at once flung himself into the lake to go to Jesus. On landing, the disciples found a fire of coals, with fish placed on it, and bread; and Jesus Himself, after more fish had been brought, distributed the food, and, it seems implied, Himself shared in the meal. Still a certain awe—another indication of a mysterious change in Christ’s appearance—restrained the disciples from asking openly, “Who art thou?” (ver 12). It was not long, however (“when they had broken their fast”), before Jesus sufficiently disclosed Himself in the touching episode of the restoration of Peter (the three-fold question, “Loest thou me?” answering to the death, not by Peter’s heartfelt, “Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee,” with the words of reinstatement, “Feed my lambs,” “Feed my sheep”).

In another way, Jesus foretold that Peter would have the opportunity of taking back his denial in the death by which he should glorify God (vs 18-19; tradition says he was crucified head-downward). Curious inquiries were set aside, and attention recalled to duty, “Follow thou me” (ver 22).

(2) On the mountain—the Great Commission—baptism.—Though only the eleven apostles are named in Matthew’s account (Mt 10:1-40), there was an “appointment” for a definite time and place (“the mountain”), and in the terms which the message was given to the “disciples,” suggests a collective gathering such as is implied in Paul’s above mentioned “five hundred brethren” occasion. The company being assembled, Jesus appeared; still, at first, with that element of mystery in His appearance, which led some to doubt (ver 17). Such doubt would speedily vanish when the Lord, announcing Himself as clothed with all authority in heaven and earth, gave to the apostles the supreme commission to “make disciples of all the nations” (vs 18-20; cf Mk 16:15, “Go ye into all the world,” etc). Discipleship was to be shown by baptism “into the name of the Father and of the Son and of the Holy Spirit” (one name, not threefold), and was to be followed by instruction in Christ’s commands. Behind the commission, world-wide in its scope, and binding on every age, stands the word of never-failing encouragement, “Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world.” Doubts of the genuineness of these august utterances go as a rule with doubt of the resurrection itself.

It will be noticed that the Lord’s Supper and Baptism are the only sacraments instituted by Jesus in His Church.

Paul records, as subsequent to the above, an appearance of Jesus to James, known as “the Lord’s brother” (1 Cor 15:7; cf Gal 1:19). No particulars are given of an appearance of Jesus to James, which may have occurred either in Galilee or Jerusalem. James, so far as known, was not a believer in Jesus before the crucifixion (cf Jn 7:3); after the ascension he and the Galilean Jesus (Acts 1:14), and he became afterward a chief “pillar” of the church at Jerusalem (Gal 1:19; 2:9). This appearance may have marked the turning-point.

The final appearance of Jesus to the apostles (1 Cor 15:7) is that which Luke in the closing verses of his Gospel (44-53), and in Acts 1:3–12, brings into direct relation with the ascension. In the Gospel the evidence recorded with the company of the disciples (Acts 1:14), and he became afterward a chief “pillar” of the church at Jerusalem (Gal 1:19; 2:9). This appearance may have marked the turning-point.

The last meeting of Jesus with His apostles was mainly occupied with the Lord’s exposition of the prophetic Scriptures (Lk 24:44–46), with renewed commands to preach repentance and remission of sins in His name (beginning from Jerusalem” (ver 47-48; cf Acts 1:8), and with the injunction to tarry in Jerusalem till the Spirit should be given (ver 49; cf Acts 1:5). Then He led them forth to Olivet, “over against Bethany,” and, while blessing them, “was carried up into heaven” (vs 50-51; cf Acts 1:10).

Jesus had declared, “I ascend unto my Father” (Jn 20:17), and Luke in Acts 1 narrates the circumstances of that departure. Jesus might simply have vanished: from the three-fold question, “Loest thou me?” answering to the death, not by Peter’s heartfelt, “Yea, Lord; thou knowest that I love thee,” with the words of reinstatement, “Feed my lambs,” “Feed my sheep.” In another way, Jesus foretold that Peter would have the opportunity of taking back his denial in the death by which he should glorify God (vs 18-19; tradition

2. The Ascension (Lk 24:50–51; Acts 1:6–14; cf Mk 16:19)
Then the scene insensibly changes to Olivet, where the ascension is located (Acts 1 12). The disciples inquire regarding the restoration of the kingdom to Israel (even yet their minds are held back in these temporal conceptions), but Jesus tells them that it is not for them to know the times and seasons, which the Father had set within His own authority (ver 7). Far more important was it for them to know that within the next days they should receive power from the Holy Spirit to be witnesses for Him to the uttermost part of the earth (ver 8). Even as He spake, He was taken up, and a cloud received Him out of their sight (ver 9). Then, as the apostles stood gazing upward, two heavenly messengers appeared, who comforted them with the assurance that in like manner as they had seen Jesus ascend into heaven, so also would He come again. For that return the church still prays and waits (cf Rev 22 20). See, further, ASCENSION.

Retracing their steps to Jerusalem, the apostles joined the larger company of disciples in the "upper room" where their meetings seem to have been habitually held, and there, with one accord, to the number of about 120 (Acts 1 15), they all continued steadfastly in prayer till "the promise of the Father" (Luke 24 48; Acts 1 4) was, at Pentecost, bestowed upon them.

PART IV. EPILOGUE: THE APOSTOLIC TEACHING

The earthly life of Jesus is finished. With His resurrection and ascension a new age begins. Yet the work of Christ continues. As Luke 1. After the expressively phrases it in Acts 1 1 2. Ascension the Gospels are but the records of "all that Jesus began both to do and to teach," until the day in which He was received up." It is beyond the scope of this art. to trace the succeeding developments of Christ's activity through His church and by His Spirit; in order, however, to bring the subject to a proper close, it is necessary to glance, even if briefly, at the light thrown back by the Spirit's teachings, after the ascension, on the significance of the earthly life itself, and at the enlargement of the apostles' conceptions about Christ, consequent on this, as seen in the Epistles and the Apocalypse.

It was the promise of Jesus that, after His departure, the Spirit would be given to His disciples, to teach them all things, and bring to their remembrance all that He had spoken or done. (John 16 15). It was not the Spirit a new revelation they were to receive, but illumination and guidance of their minds into the meaning of what they had received already (John 16 13 15). This promise of the Spirit was fulfilled at Pentecost (Acts 2) Only a few personal manifestations of Jesus (Acts 7 55 56; 22 17 18; 23 11) are recorded after that event—the two chief being the appearance to Paul on the way to Damascus (1 Cor 15 8; cf Acts 9 3 8, etc) and the appearance in vision to John at Patmos (Rev 1 10). The rest was internal revelation (cf Gal 1 12 16; Eph 1 17; 3 3 5). The immense advance in enlargement and clearness of view aided, no doubt, by Christ's parting instructions (Lk 24 44 48; Acts 1 2) is already apparent in Peter's discourses at Pentecost; but it is not to be supposed that much room was not left for after-growth in knowledge, and deepened insight into the connection of truths. Peter, e.g., had to be instructed as to the admission of the Gentiles (Acts 10 11), the apostles mentioned much of the relations of the law (cf Acts 15; 21 20 ff; Gal 2, etc); Paul received revelations vastly widening the doctrinal horizon; both John and Paul show progressive apprehension in the truth about Christ.

It is therefore a question of much interest how the apostolic conceptions thus gained stand related to the picture of Jesus we have been forming in the Gospels. It is the conceptions of the Gospels (the "historical" discourses and sayings) which, through the next day that the two pictures do not correspond. The transcendental Christ of Paul and John has little in common, it is affirmed, with the Man of Nazareth of the Synoptic Gospels. Theories of the "origins of Christianity" (the "apostolic movement" cf Plücker, Weisszäcker, Bousset, Wernle, etc) such speculations ignore the first conditions of the problem in not accepting the self-testimony of Jesus as to who He was, and the ends of His mission into the world. When Jesus is taken at His own valuation, and the great fact of His resurrection is admitted, the alleged contradictions between the "Jesus of history" and the "Christ of faith" largely disappear.

It is forgotten how great a change in the center of gravity in the conception of Christ's person and work was necessarily involved in the facts of Christ's death, resurrection and Lordship. The life is not finished yet. Its influence breathes in every page, e.g. of Paul's epistles. But the weakness, the limitations, the self-suppression—what Paul in Phil 2 7 calls the "emptying"—of that earthly life have now been left behind. The rejected and crucified One, who has now been vindicated, exalted, has entered into His glory. This is the burden of Peter's first address at Pentecost: "God hath made him both Lord and Christ, this Jesus whom ye crucified" (Acts 2 36). Could anything look quite the same after that? The change is seen in the growing substitution of the name "Christ" for "Jesus" (see at beginning of art.), and in the habitual speaking of Jesus as "Lord".

With belief in the lordship of Jesus went necessarily an enlarged conception of the significance of His person. The elements were all there in what the disciples had seen and known of Jesus while on earth. There is not such a thing as historical Godhead. In this is already contained in substance everything taught about Jesus in the epistles: His preexistence (the Lord's own words had suggested this, Jn 8 58; 17 5, etc); His share in Divine attributes (eternity, etc), in Divine works (creation, etc, 1 Cor 8 6; Col 1 16 17; He 1 2; Rev 1 5; 3 14, etc), in Divine worship (Phil 2 9 11; Rev 5 11 12, etc), in Divine names and titles (He 1 8, etc). It is an extension of the same conception when Jesus is represented as the end of creation—the "Head" in whom all things are finally to be summed up (Eph 1 10; cf He 2 6 9). These high views of the person of Christ in the Epistles are everywhere assumed to be the possession of the readers. Jesus had furnished His disciples with the means of understanding His death as a necessity of His Messianic vocation, endured for the salvation of the world; but it was the resurrection and exaltation which shed light on the utmost meaning of this also. Jesus died, but He was for sins. He was a propitiation for the sin of the world (Rom 3 20;

This subject is of special interest, not only on account of its inherent importance, but more particularly on account of its immediately preceding, and leading directly up to what is the greatest tragedy in human history, the crucifixion of Our Lord. It has also the added interest of being the only proceeding on record in which the two great legal systems of antiquity, the Jewish and the Roman, which have most largely influenced modern legislation and jurisprudence, each played a most important part.

The coexistence of these two systems in Judaea, and their joint action in bringing about the tremendous results in question, were made possible by the Jewish and Roman client law, institutions and usages, in so far as they were compatible with Roman sovereignty and supremacy. Not only not, but, in a large degree, they permitted these laws to be administered by the officials of the subject peoples. This overshadowed all—indeed, the latter was the law which but was permitted only so long as it was not abused. It might be withdrawn at any time, and the instances in which this was done were by no means rare.

Of the matters considered in this article, the arrest of Jesus and the proceedings before Annas, Caiphas and the Sanhedrin took place professedly under Jewish law; the proceedings before Pilate and the reference to Herod, under Rom law.

It is very difficult to construct from the materials in the four Gospels a satisfactory continuous record of the arrest, and of what may be called the twofold trial of Jesus. The Gospels were written from different subject viewpoints, and for different purposes, each of the writers selecting such particulars as seemed to him to be of special importance for the particular object he had in view. Their reports are all very brief, and the proper chronological order of the various events recorded in different Gospels is in many cases, largely a matter of conjecture. The difficulty is increased by the great irregularities and the tumultuous character of the proceedings; by our imperfect knowledge of the topography of Jerusalem at this time (29 AD); also by the fact that the reports are given mainly in popular, and not in technical language; and when the latter form is used, the technical terms have had to be transcribed into Greek, either from the Heb or from the Lat.

JAMES ORR
For instance, opinions are divided as to where Pilate resided when in Jerusalem, whether in the magnificent palace occupied by Herod Antipas during the Passover, or in the castle of Antonia; as to where was the palace occupied by Herod the Great, or in the castle of Caiaphas; and whether Anas or Caiaphas occupied the palace during the Passover week. The examination of Jesus, recorded by John, was before Anas or Caiaphas, and no one knows the particular matter. It is very satisfactory, however, to know that, although it is sometimes difficult to see the best way of harmonizing the different accounts, yet there is nothing irreconcilable or contradictory in them, and that there is no material point in matters of this kind. The argument is the same throughout the whole of this article, which is seriously affected by any of these debatable matters.

For a clear historical statement of the events of the concluding day in the life of Our Lord before His crucifixion, see the article on Jesus' Death. The present article will endeavor to consider the matters relating to His arrest and trial from a legal and constitutional point of view.

1. The Arrest. — During the last year of the ministry of Jesus, the hostility of the Jews to Him had greatly increased, and some six months before they finally succeeded in accomplishing their purpose, they had definitely resolved to make away with Him. At the Feast of Tabernacles they sent officers (the temple-guards) to take Him while He was teaching in the temple (Jn 7:32); but these, after listening to His words, returned without having made the attempt, giving as a reason that "never was man so spoken" (ver 46).

After His raising of Lazarus, their determination to kill Him was greatly intensified. A special meeting of the council was held to consider the matter. There Caiaphas, the high priest, strongly advocated such a step on national grounds, and on the ground of expediency, quoting in support of his advice, in a cold-blooded and cynical manner, the Jewish adage that it was expedient that one man should die for the people, and that the whole nation perish not. Their plans to this end were frustrated, for the time being, by Jesus withdrawing Himself to the border of the wilderness, where He remained with His disciples (Jn 11:47-54).

On His return to Bethany and Jerusalem, six days before the Passover, they were deterred from carrying out their design on account of His manifest popularity, as evidenced by His triumphal entry into Jerusalem on the first day of the Passover week (Palm Sunday), and by the crowds who thronged around Him, and listened to His teachings in the temple, and who enjoyed the divisions which Pharsees, Sadducees and Herodians, as successively sought to entangle Him in His talk.

Two days before the Passover, at a council meeting held in the palace of Caiaphas, they planned to accomplish their purpose by subtlety, but "not during the feast, lest a tumult arise among the people" (Mt 26:3-5; Mk 14:1-10). While they were in this state of perplexity, to their great relief Judas came to them and agreed to betray His Master for money (Mt 26:14-16; Mk 14:10,11).

This time they determined not to rely solely upon their own temple-guards or officers to execute their warrant or order of arrest, fearing that these officials, being Jews, might again be fascinated by the strange influence which Jesus exercised over His countrymen, or that His followers might offer resistance. They therefore applied to Pilate, the Roman procurator (governor), for the assistance of a band of Roman soldiers. He granted them a cohort (Gr. sqvph, 400 to 600 men) from the legion then quartered in the castle of Antonia, which adjoined and overlooked the temple-area. The final arrangements as to these would probably be completed while Judas was at the supper room. It has been suggested that the whole cohort would not go, but only a selection from them. However, it is said that Judas "received the band [cohort] of soldiers" (Jn 18:3), and that they were under the command of a chief captain (Gr. chiliarh, Lat. tribune, ver 12). If there had not been more than one, they would not have been under the command of a captain, but the chief officer would have been a centurion. The amazing popularity of Jesus, as shown by His triumphal entry into the city, may have led the authorities to make such ample provision against any possible attempt at rescue.

The Garden of Gethsemane, in which Judas knew that Jesus would be found that night, was well known to him (Jn 18:2); and he also knew the time he would be likely to find his Master there. Thither at the proper hour he led the band of soldiers, the temple officers and others, and also some of the chief priests and elders themselves; the whole being described as "a great multitude with swords and staves" (Mt 26:47). Although the Easter full moon would bring them, they also carried "lanterns and torches" (Jn 18:3), in order to make certain that Jesus should not escape or fail to be recognized in the deep shade of the olive trees in the garden.

On their arrival at the garden, Jesus came forward to meet them, and the traitor Judas gave them the appointed signal by kissing Him. As the order or warrant was a Jewish one, the temple officers would probably be in front, the soldiers supporting them as reserves. On Jesus announcing to the leaders that He was the one they sought, what the chief priests had feared actually occurred. There was something in the words or bearing of Jesus which awed them, and they were panic-stricken, went backward, and fell to the ground. On their rallying, the impetuous Peter drew his sword, and cut off the ear of one of them, Malchus, the servant of the high priest (Jn 18:10).

On this evidence of resistance the Roman captain and soldiers came forward, and with the assistance of the Jewish officers bound Jesus. Under the Jewish law this was not lawful before condemnation, but they were permitted to do so in exceptional cases where resistance was either offered or apprehended.

Even in this trying hour the concern of Jesus was more for others than for Himself, as witness His miracle in healing the ear of Malchus, and His request that His disciples should not resist liberty (Jn 18:8). Notwithstanding His efforts, His followers were panic-stricken, probably on account of the vigorous action of the officers and soldiers after the assault by Peter, "and they all left him and fled" (Mk 14:50).

It is worthy of note that Jesus had no word of blame or censure for the Roman officers or soldiers who were only doing their sworn duty in supporting the civil authorities; but His pungent words of rebuke were for their approach for not having attempted His arrest while He was teaching openly in the temple were reserved for "the chief priests, and captains of the temple, and elders" (Lk 22:52), who had shown their inordinate zeal and hostility by taking the unusual, and for those who were to sit as judges on the case, the improper and illegal course of accompanying the officers, and themselves taking part in the arrest.

The whole body departed with their prisoner for the city. From the first three Gospels we might infer that they went directly to the palace of Caiaphas, the high priest.

3. Taken to the palace of Caiaphas, the high priest.
Why they did so we are not informed, the only statement made being that he was delivered to Caiaphas (ver 13). He had been the high priest from 7 AD to 15 AD, when he was deposed by Valerius Gratus, the Roman procurator. He was still the most influential member of the Sanhedrin, and, being of an aggressive disposition, made no objections as to the trial. It was he who had given the instructions as to the arrest, and that they thought it their duty to report first to him.

Annas, however, sent Jesus bound to Caiaphas (ver 24). Having delivered over their prisoner, the Roman soldiers would proceed to their quarters in the castle, the temple officials retaining Jesus in their charge.

Meanwhile, the members of the Sanhedrin were assembling at the palace of the high priest, and the preliminary steps toward the first or Jewish trial were being taken.

II. The Jewish Trial. — It is the just boast of those countries whose jurisprudence has had its origin in the common law of England, that their Jewish Law system of criminal law is founded upon the Jewish Law the humane maxims that everyone is presumed to be innocent until he is proved to be guilty, and that no one is bound to criminate himself. But the Jewish law went even farther in the safeguards which it placed around an accused person. In the first place, it was prescribed that one witness shall not be sufficient to convict man of even a minor offence. “One witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin, in any sin that he sinneth; at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall a matter be established” (Dt 19 15).

These principles of the Mosaic law were elaborated and extended in the system which grew up after the return from Babylon. It was begun by the men of the Great Synagogue, and was afterward completed by the Sanhedrin. Up to the time of Our Lord, and for the first two centuries of the Christian era, their rules remained largely in an oral or unwritten form, until they were compiled or codified in the Mish by Rabbi Judah and his associates and successors in the early part of the 2d cent. It is generally conceded by both Jewish and Christian writers that the main provisions, wherein found for the protection of accused persons, had been long incorporated in the oral law and were recognized as a part of it in the time of Jesus.

The provisions relating to criminal trials, and esp. to those in which the offence was punishable by death, were very stringent. They were all framed in the interest of the accused. Among these were the following: The trial must be begun by day, and if not completed at night must be adjourned and resumed by day; the quorum of Judges in capital cases was 23, that being the quorum of the Grand Council; a verdict required only a majority of one, might be rendered on the same day as the trial was completed; any other verdict could only be rendered on a subsequent day and required a majority of at least two; no prisoner could be convicted on his own evidence; it was the duty of a judge to see that the interests of the accused were fully protected.

The modern practice of an information or complaint and a preliminary investigation before a magistrate was wholly unknown to the Jewish law and foreign to its general practice of the witnesses in open court, was in reality the beginning of a Jewish trial, and the crime for which the accused was tried, and the sole charge he had to meet, was that which was disclosed by the evidence of the witnesses.

Let us see how far the foregoing principles and rules were followed and observed in the proceedings before the high priest in the present instance. The first step taken in the Trial of Jesus by the high priest, which is recorded only in Jn 18 19-23. Opinions differ as to whether this examination was conducted by Annas at his residence before he sent Jesus to Caiaphas (ver 24), or by the latter after Jesus had been delivered up to him.

Caiaphas was actually the high priest at the time, and had been for some years. Annas had been deposed from the office about 14 years previously by the Roman procurators, but had held the high-priestly title (cf Mt 26 3). Many of the Jews did not concede the right of the procurator to depose him, and looked upon him as still the rightful high priest, and at this time the vice-president of the Sanhedrin. The trial in which he took part was conducted by John in this passage are based largely upon two different renderings of Jn 18 24. In AV the verse reads, "Now Annas had sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest," a reading based upon the TR which implies that Jesus had been sent to Caiaphas before the examination. On the other hand, RV, following the Gr text adopted by Nestle and others, reads, "Annas therefore sent him bound unto Caiaphas the high priest." (Jn 18 19).

However, it is not material which of these two leading members of the Sanhedrin conducted the examination. The same may also be said as to the controversy regarding the residence of Annas at the time, whether it was in some part of the official palace of the high priest or elsewhere. The important matters are the fact, the time, and the manner of the examination by one or other of these leading members of the council, not the precise place where, or the particular person by whom, it was conducted.

The high priest (whether Annas or Caiaphas) proceeded to interrogate Jesus concerning His disciples and His teaching (Jn 18 20-24). 5. The Preliminary Examination — Such a proceeding formed no part of a regular Jewish trial, and was, moreover, not taken in good faith; but had, with a view to entrapping Jesus into arguments that might be used against Him at the approaching trial before the council. It appears to have been in the nature of a private examination, conducted probably while the members of the council were assembling. The dignified and appropriate answer of Jesus pointedly brought before the judges the irrevelance of the charge, and was a reminder that His trial should begin with the examination of the witnesses: “I spake openly to the world; I ever taught in the synagogue, and in the temple, whether the Jews always resort; and in secret have I said nothing. Why askest thou me? Ask them which heard me, what I have said unto them: behold, they know what I said” (vs 20-21 AV). The reply to this was a blow from one of the officers, an outrageous proceeding which appears to have damaged the reputation of the judge, and it was left to Jesus Himself to make the appropriate protest.

The next proceeding was the trial before the council in the palace of Caiaphas, attended at least by the procurator of Judea. This was an illegal meeting, since a capital trial, as we have seen, could not either be begun or proceeded with at night. Some of the chief priests and elders, as previously stated, had been guilty of the highly improper act for judges, of taking part in and directing the arrest of Jesus. Now, "the chief priests and the whole council" spent the time intervening between the arrest and the commencement of the trial in something even worse: they "sought false witness against Jesus, that they might put him to death" (Mt 26 59). This, no doubt, only means that they then collected their false witnesses and instructed them as to the testimony they should give. For weeks, ever since the raising of Lazarus, they had been preparing for this trial, as we read: "So from that day forth they took counsel that they might put him to death" (Jn 11 53).

Caiaphas, as high priest and president of the Sanhedrin, presided at the meeting of the council. The oath administered to witnesses in a Jewish court was an extremely solemn invocation, and it makes one shudder to think of the high priest pronouncing these words to perjured witnesses, known by him to have been procured by the judges before him in the manner stated.

But even this did not avail. Although "many bare false witness against him," yet on account of their having been imperfectly tutored by their instructors, or for other cause, their witnesses "agreed not together" (Mk 14:56), and even these prejudiced and partial judges could not find the concurring testimony of two witnesses required by their law (Dt 19:15).

The nearest approach to the necessary concurrence came at last from two witnesses, who gave a distorted report of a figurative and enigmatic statement made by Jesus in the temple during His early ministry: "Destroy this temple, and in three days I will raise it up" (Jn 2:19). The explanation is given: "He spake of the temple of his body" (ver 21).

The testimony of the two witnesses is reported with but slight variations in the two first Gospels as follows: "This man said, I am able to destroy the temple of God, and to build it in three days" (Mt 21:46) and "We heard him say, I will destroy this temple that is made with hands, and in three days I will build another made without hands" (Mk 12:40). Whether these slightly different statements represent the discrepancies in their testimony, or on account of some other variations or contradictions, the judges reluctantly decided that "not even so did their witness agree together" (ver 59).

Caiphas, having exhausted his list of witnesses, and seeing that the prosecution on which he had set his heart in danger of breaking down for the lack of legal evidence, adopted a blustering tone, and said to Jesus, "Answerest thou nothing? what is it which these witness against thee? But Jesus held his peace" (Mt 26:62,63), relying on the fact that the prosecution had utterly failed on account of the lack of agreement of two witnesses on any of the charges. As a final and desperate resort, Caiphas had recourse to a bold strategem: to draw from Jesus an admission or confession on which he might base a condemnation, similar to the attempt which failed at the preliminary examination; but this time fortifying his appeal by a solemn adjuration in the name of the Son of God. He said to Jesus: "I adjure thee by the living God, that thou tell us whether thou art the Christ, the Son of God. Jesus saith unto him, Thou hast said: nevertheless I say unto you, Henceforth ye shall see the Son of man sitting at the right hand of Power, and coming on the clouds of heaven" (vs 63,64). Caiphas, although knowing that under the law Jesus could not be convicted on His own answers or admissions, thereupon in a tragic manner "rent his garments, saying, He hath spoken blasphemy; what further need have we of witnesses? behold, now ye have heard the blasphemy: what think ye? They answered and said, He is worthy of death" (vs 63,66).

The night session then broke up to meet again after daybreak in order to ratify the decision just come to, and to give a semblance of legality to the trial and verdict. The closing scene was one of disorder, in which they spat in their prisoner's face and buffet him (vs 67,68; Lk 22:65-67): "witnesses."

The following morning, "as soon as it was day," the council reassembled in the same place, and Jesus was led into their presence (Lk 22:66). There were probably a number of the council present who had not attended the night session. For the benefit of these, and perhaps to give an appearance of legality to the proceeding, the high priest began the trial anew, but not with the examination of witnesses which had proved such a failure at the night session. He proceeded at once to ask the same questions as had finally brought out from Jesus the night before the answer which he had declared to be blasphemy, and upon which the council had "condemned him to be worthy of death" (Mk 14:64). The question was mentioned in all the Gospels, the details of the examination are related by Luke alone. When asked whether He was the Christ, He replied, "If I tell you, ye will not believe; and if I ask you, ye will not answer. But from henceforth shall the Son of no man be set at the right hand of the power of God" (Lk 22:67-69). This answer not being sufficient to found a verdict of blasphemy upon, they all cried out, "Art thou then the Son of God?" To this He gave an affirmative answer, "Ye say that I am. And they said, What further need have we of witness? for we ourselves have heard from his own mouth" (vs 70,71).

It will be observed that neither at the night nor at the morning session was there any sentence pronounced upon Jesus by the high priest.

10. Powers There was on each occasion only what of the San- of the San- ishredin would be equivalent to a verdict of the San- hedin guilty found by a jury under our criminal law, but no sentence passed upon the prisoner by the presiding judge. When Judaea lost the last vestige of its independence and became a Roman province (AD 6), the Sanhedrin ceased to have the right to inflict capital punishment or to administer the law of life and death. This jurisdiction was thenceforth transferred to the Roman procurator. The Sanhedrin submitted very reluctantly to this curtailment of its powers. A few years later it exercised it illegally and in a very riotous manner in the case of Stephen (Acts 7:58). Annas, however, of all men, had good reason not to violate this law, as his having done so during the absence of the procurator was the cause of his being deposed from the office of high priest by Valerius Gratus (15 AD).

The proceedings may have been taken before the high priest in the hope that Pilate might be induced to accept the verdict of the Sanhedrin as conclusive, but that Jesus had the Deity. The council then passed on to the procurator. If so, the trial was not concluded but was carried over into the office of high priest by Caiaphas (15 AD).

which blasphemy was under the Jewish law. Even if there had been jurisdiction, it would have been irregular, as the judges had rendered themselves incompetent to try the case, having been guilty of the violation of the law that required judges to be unprejudiced and impartial, and carefully to guard the interests of the accused. Even the letter of the law had been violated in a number of important respects. Among these may be mentioned: (1) some of the judges taking part in the arrest are not named; (2) the examination before the trial and the attempt to obtain admissions; (3) endeavors of the judges to procure the testimony of false witnesses; (4) commencing and continuing the trial at night; (5) examining and adjourning the accused in order to extort admissions from him; (5) rendering a verdict of guilty at the close of the night session, without allowing a day to intervene; (7) holding the morning session on a feast day, and rendering a verdict at its close; and (8) rendering both verdicts without any legal evidence.

III. The Roman Trial.—Early on the morning of Friday of the Passover week, as we have already seen, "the chief priests with the elders and scribes of both ethnic and the whole council (Mk), in the palace of the high priest; and after the examination of Jesus and their verdict that He was guilty of blasphemy, they took counsel against Him "to put him to death" (Mt), this being, in their judgment, the proper punishment for the offence of which they had pronounced Him guilty.

For the reasons already mentioned, they came to the conclusion that it would be necessary to invoke the aid of the Rom power in carrying out this sentence. They therefore bound Jesus, and led Him away and delivered Him up to Pilate, who at this time probably occupied, while in Jesus, the magnificent palace built by Herod the Great. Jesus was taken into the judgment hall of the palace or Praetorium; His accusers, unwilling to defile themselves by entering into a heathen house and thereby rendering themselves unfit to eat the Passover, remained outside upon the marble pavement.

The proceedings thus begun were conducted under a system entirely different from that which we have thus far been considering, both in its nature and its administration. The Jewish law was a part of the religion, and in its growth and development was administered in important cases by a large body of trained men, who were obliged to follow strictly a well-defined procedure. The Roman law, on the other hand, had its origin and growth under the stern and manly virtues and the love of justice which characterized republican Rome, and it still jealously guarded the rights and privileges of Roman citizens, even in a conquered province. Striking illustrations of this truth are to be found in the life of St. Paul (see Acts 18 35-39; 22 24-29; 25 10-12.). The lives and fortunes of the natives in an imperial province like Judea may be said to have been almost completely at the mercy of the Rom procurator or governor, who was responsible to his imperial master alone, and not even to the Senate. Pilate therefore was well within the mark when, at a later stage of the trial, being irritated at Jesus remaining silent when questioned by him, he petulantly exclaimed: "Speakest thou not unto me? knowest thou not that I have power to release thee?" (Jn 19 10). While, however, the procurator was not compelled in such cases to adhere strictly to the prescribed procedure, there was at the same time a wide discretion, he was not allowed to violate or depart from the established principles of the law.

On this occasion, Pilate, respecting the scruples of the chief priests about entering the palace, went outside of their request, apparently leaving Jesus in the Praetorium. He asked them the usual formal question, put at the opening of a Rom trial: "What accusation bring ye against this man? They answered and said unto him, If he were not an evil-doer, we should not have delivered him up unto thee." Pilate could see at once that this was a mere attempt to evade the direct question he had asked, and was not such an accusation as disclosed any offence known to the Rom law. Affecting to treat it with the greatest care and sincerity, he asked the accused, in the direction of the law, he said, "Take him yourselves, and judge him according to your law. The Jews said unto him, It is not lawful for us to put any man to death" (ver 31).

Perceiving that Pilate would not gratify their desire to have Jesus condemned on the verdict which they had rendered, or for an offense against their own law only, the Accusation "they began to accuse him, saying, We found this man persuading our nation, and forbidding to give tribute to Caesar, and saying that he himself is Christ a king." (Lk 23 2). This was an accusation containing three charges, much like a modern indictment containing three counts. Pilate appears to have been satisfied that there was nothing in the first two of these charges; but the third was too serious to be ignored, esp. as it was a direct charge of majestas or treason, the greatest crime known to the Rom law, and as to which the reigning emperor, Tiberius, and his then favorite, Sejanus, were particularly sensitive and jealous. The charges in this case were merely oral, but it would appear to have been in the discretion of the procurator to receive them in this form in the case of one who was not a Rom citizen.

The accusers having been heard, Pilate returned to the Praetorium to examine Jesus regarding the last and serious accusation. The Four Gospels give in the same words the explanation, Defence and thereupon to him by Pilate, "Art thou the King of the Jews?" The Acquittal first three record only the final affirmative answer, "Thou sayest," which if it stood alone might have been taken as a plea of guilty; but John gives the interview which explains the matter fully. He tells us that Jesus did not answer the question directly, but asked Pilate, "Sayest thou this of thyself, or did others tell it thee concerning me?" (Jn 18 34) (apparently not having been outside, when the charges were made). On being told that it came from the chief priests, He went on to explain that His kingdom was not of this world, but was a spiritual kingdom. Being again asked if He was a king, He replied in effect, that He was a king in that sense, and that His subjects were those who were of the truth and heard His voice (vs 35-37). Pilate, being satisfied with His explanation, "went out again unto the Jews, and apparently having taken Jesus with him, he mounted his judgment seat or movable tribunal, which had been placed upon the tessellated pavement, and pronounced his verdict, "I find in him no fault at all" (ver 38 AV, RV 'I find no crime in him').

According to the Rom law, this verdict of acquittal should have ended the trial and at once enrolled the discharge of Jesus; but instead it brought two fresh Accusations which Jesus made no reply. Pilate hesitated, and hearing a charge that Jesus had begun His treasuruable teaching in Galilee, the thought occurred to him that he might escape from his dilemma by sending Jesus for trial to Herod Antipas, the tetrarch of...
Galilee, who was then in Jesus for the feast, which he accordingly did (Lk 23:7).

Herod had long been desirous to see Jesus—"...he answered him nothing." The chief priests and scribes, who had followed him from the Praetorium to the Maccabean palace, which Herod was then occupying, "stood, vehemently accusing" Jesus (vs 8-10). "That fox," however, as Jesus had called him (Lk 13:32), was too astute to intermeddle in a trial for treason, which was a dangerous proceeding, and possibly he was aware that Pilate had already acquitted Him; in which case a retrial by him would be illegal. He and his soldiers, probably irritated at the refusal of Jesus to give him any answer, mocked Him, and arraying Him in a gorgeous robe, no doubt in ridicule of His claim to be a king, sent Him back to Pilate. This reference to Herod in reality formed no effective part of the trial of Jesus, as Herod declined the jurisdiction, although Pilate sought to make use of it in his subsequent discussion with the chief priests. The only result was that Herod was flattered by the courtesy of Pilate, the eminity between them ceased, and they were made friends (Lk 23:11.12.15).

On their return, Pilate resumed his place on the judgment seat outside. What followed, however, properly formed no part of the legal trial, as it was a mere travesty upon law, as well as upon justice. Pilate resolved to make another attempt to secure the consent of the Jews to the release of Jesus. To this end he summoned not only the chief priests and the rulers, but the people as well (Lk 23:13), and after mentioning the failure to prove any of the charges made against Jesus, he reminded them of the custom of releasing at the feast a prisoner selected by them, and offering as a compromise to chastise or scourge Jesus before releasing Him. At this point Pilate's anxiety to release Jesus was still further increased by the message he received from his wife concerning her disturbing dream about Jesus and warning him to have "nothing to do with that righteous man" (Mt 27:19). Meanwhile, the chief priests and elders were busily engaged in canvassing the multitude to ask for the release of Barabbas, the notorious robber, and destroy Jesus (ver 20). When Pilate urged them to release Jesus, they cried out all together, "Away with this man, and release unto us Barabbas"; and upon a further appeal on behalf of Jesus they cried, "Crucify, crucify him." A third attempt on his part met with no better result (Lk 23:18-23).

The Fourth Gospel alone records a final attempt on the part of Pilate to save Jesus. He scourged Him, it has been suggested, with a view to satisfying their desire for His punishment, and afterward appealing to their pity. He allowed his soldiers to repeat what they had seen done at Herod's palace, and place a crown of thorns upon His head, array Him in a purple robe, and render mock homage to Him as king of the Jews. Pilate went out to the Jews with Jesus thus arrayed and bleeding. Again declaring that he found no fault in Him, he presented Him, saying, "Behold, the man!" This was met by the former cry, "Crucify him, crucify him." Pilate replied, "Take him yourselves . . . I find no crime in him." The Jews referred him to their ruler. He declared that he had made Himself the Son of God. This alarmed Pilate's superstitious fears, who by this time appears to have wholly lost control of himself. He took Jesus into the palace and said to Him, "Whence art thou? But Jesus gave him no answer." Irritated at His silence, Pilate reminded him of his absolute power over Him. The mysterious answer of Jesus as to the source of power still further alarmed him, and he made new efforts to secure His discharge (Jn 19:1-9).

The Jews were well aware that Pilate was arbitrary and cruel, but they had also found that he was very sensitive as to anything that might injuriously affect his official position or his standing with his masters to threats, the emperor. As a last resort they shouted to him, "If thou release this man, thou art not Caesar's friend: every one that maketh himself a king speakest against Caesar" (ver 12). The prospect of a charge of his aiding and abetting such a crime as treason, in addition to the other charges that a guilty conscience told him might be brought against him, proved too much for the vacillating procurator. He brought Jesus out, and sat down again upon the judgment seat placed upon the pavement. He made one more appeal, "Shall I crucify your King?" The chief priests gave the hypocritical answer, "We have no king but Caesar" (ver 15). Pilate finally succumbed to their threats and clamor; but took his revenge by placing upon the cross the superscription that was so galling to them, "The King of the Jews."

Then occurred the closing scene of the tragedy, recorded only in the First Gospel, when Pilate washed his hands before the multitude (a Jewish custom), saying to them, "I wash not the guilt of this Hands [of Jesus] righteous man; see ye to it." The reply was that dreadful imprecation, "His blood be on us, and on our children" (Mt 27 24-25).

Pilate resumes his place upon the judgment seat, the fatal sentence at last falls from his lips, and Jesus is delivered up to be crucified.

12. The Sentence

Now, how far were these proceedings in accordance with the Roman law under which they purported to have been taken and conducted? Was orderly, Pilate, as procurator, was the proper officer to try the charges brought against Jesus.

13. Review

In the next place he acted quite properly in declining to entertain a charge which disclosed no offence known to the Roman law, or to pass a sentence based on the verdict of the Sanhedrin for an alleged violation of the Jewish law. He appears to have acted in accordance with the law, and indeed in a judicial and praiseworthy manner in the trial and disposition of the threefold indictment for treason (unless it be a fact that Jesus was not present when these accusations were brought against Him outside the Praetorium, which would be merely an irregularity, as they were made known to Him later inside). Pilate's initial mistake, which led to all the others, was in not discharging Jesus at once, when he had pronounced the verdict of acquittal.

All the subsequent proceedings were contrary to both the letter and the spirit of the law. Although Pilate took his place in such a manner that the seat, his acts, properly speaking, were not those of a judge, and had no legal force or value; but were rather the futile attempts of a weak and vacillating politician to appease an angry mob thirsting for the blood of an innocent countryman. The carrying out of a sentence imposed in such a cause and under such conditions, may not inaptly be described as a judicial murder.

   It is not easy to determine the relation of J. to Reuel and Hobab. If we identify J. with Reuel as Ex 18 1b (and VS 18, V. II. 3), we must connect “Moses’ father-in-law” in Nu 10 30 and Ex 18 with “Reuel” (AV “Raguel”), and make Hobab the brother-in-law of Moses. But while it is possible that Jethro may be in the wider sense of a wife’s relative, it is the word “brother” (Heb “brother”) in the AVm. If we substitute, as Ewald suggests (II, II. 25, “Jethro son of Reuel”, Ex 2 18 (and of the name “Jethro” is given), we would then identify J. with Hobab, the son of Reuel in Nu 10 29, taking “Moseh” “father-in-law” to refer back to Hobab. Against this identification, however, it is stated that J. went away from his own country (Nu 10 32), but any effort on the part of Moses to detain him (Ex 18 27), whereas Hobah, though at first refused to remain with the Israelites, seems to have yielded to the pleadings of Moses to become their guide to Canaan (Nu 10 29–32; Jgs 11 16, where Kittel reads “Hobab the Kenite”): 4 11. It may be noted that while the father-in-law of Moses is spoken of as a Midianite “in Ex, he is called” AVm.

   When Moses fled from Egypt he found refuge in Midian, where he received a hearty welcome into the household of J. on account of the courtly kindness he had shown the priests’ 7 daughters in helping them to water their father’s flocks, and that friendship resulted in J. giving Moses his daughter, Zipporah, to wife (Ex 4 25–21). After Moses had been for about 40 years in the service of his father-in-law, the angel of the Lord appeared to him as he was keeping the flock at Horeb, commanding him to return to Egypt and deliver his enslaved brethren out of the hands of Pharaoh (3 1 ff). With J.’s consent Moses left Midian to carry out the Divine commission (4 18).

   When tidings reached Midian of “all that God done for Moses, and for Israel” in delivering them from Egypt bondage, J. with a natural pride in the achievements of his relative set out to visit Moses at Jethro in the Wilderness (Ex 18 1–12). On learning of his father-in-law’s arrival at the “mount of God,” Moses went out to meet him, and after a cordial exchange of greetings they retired to Moses’ tent, where a pleasant interview took place between them. We are told of the interest J. felt in all the particulars of the great deliverance, how he “rejoiced for all the goodness which Jeth had done to Israel,” and how the conviction was wrought within him that Jeth was “greater than all gods; yea, in the thing wherein they dealt proudly against them” (ver 11). In this condition so expressed there is evidently a reference to the element by which they feared the gods, though in their high-handed pursuit they would be able to bring back Israel into bondage, but by which they were themselves overthrown.

   It is worth noting that in the religious service in which J. and Moses after their return from Egypt as priest, offered a burnt offering, and Aaron with all the elders of Israel partook of the sacrificial feast, prominence was given to J. over Aaron, and thus a priesthood was recognized beyond the limits of Israel.

   This visit of J. to Moses had important consequences for the future government of Israel (Ex 18 21–27). The priest of Midian became concerned about his son-in-law when he saw him occupied from morning to night in deciding the disputes that had arisen among the people. The labor this entailed, J. said, was far too heavy a burden for one man to bear. Moses himself, would soon be worn out, and the people, too, would become weary and dissatisfied, owing to the inability of one judge to overtake all the cases that were brought before him. J., therefore, urged Moses to make use of the talents of others and adopt a plan of gradual promotion of judges who would dispose of all cases of minor importance, leaving only the most difficult for him to settle by a direct appeal to the will of God. Moses, recognizing the wisdom of his father-in-law’s advice, readily acted upon his suggestion and appointed 12 or 24 judicial men, and made these heads over the people, rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens. Thereafter, J. returned to his own country.

The story of J. reveals him as a man of singular attractiveness and strength, in whom a kind, considerate disposition, a deeply religious spirit, and a wise judgment all met in happy combination. And this anointed priest of Midian made Israel and nations his devout admirers when he taught the distinction between the legislative and the judicial function, and the importance of securing that all law be the expression of the Divine will, and that its application be entrusted only to men of ability, piety, integrity, and truth (Ex 18:21).

In the OT the word occurs a few times in the sing. (Est 2:5; 3:4, etc; Jer 34:9; Zec 8:23); very frequently in the pl. in Ezr and Neh, Est, and in Jer and the prophets. The adj. in the OT applies only to the “Jews’ language” or speech (2 K 18:26:28; Neh 13:24; Isa 36:11:13). “Jews” (always pl. in familiar terms for Israelites in the Gospels (esp. in Jn), Acts, Eph., etc.): “Jewess” occurs in 1 Ch 6:18; Acts 16:1; 24:24. In Tit 1:14 a warning is given against “Jewish fables” (in Gr. the adj. is found also in Gal 2:14). The “Jews’ religion” (Ioudatămos) is referred to in Gal 1:13:14. JEWEL, je'ool (יִזְבּל), yowzul, an ornament of gold, silver or of precious stones in the form of armlet, bracelet, anklet, nose-ornament, etc. Oriental dress yields itself freely to such adornment, and many words are employed in the OT to describe them heads over the people, rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens. Thereafter, J. returned to his own country.

The story of J. reveals him as a man of singular attractiveness and strength, in whom a kind, considerate disposition, a deeply religious spirit, and a wise judgment all met in happy combination. And this anointed priest of Midian made Israel and nations his devout admirers when he taught the distinction between the legislative and the judicial function, and the importance of securing that all law be the expression of the Divine will, and that its application be entrusted only to men of ability, piety, integrity, and truth (Ex 18:21).

JEZUB, je'uz (יהוזב), yow'sug, “he counsels”: the eponym of a Benjamite family (1 Ch 8:10).

JEW, jō, jōo; JEWESS, JEWISH, jō'ish, jōo'ish (יִשָּה, yow'daḥ, pl. יִשָּה, yow'dhaḥim; LXXd Tet., LXXd Tet.; adj. f. יִשָּה, yow'daḥith; LXXd Tet., LXXd Tet.): “Jew” denotes originally an inhabitant of Judah (2 K 16:6 tends to the two tribes of the Southern Kingdom), but later the meaning was extended to embrace all descendants of Abraham. the unfavourable verdict of the Heb historians? That verdict is based on the results and effects of the marriage, on the life and character of J, and in the life of two main incidents demand attention. This is not described in 1 K 18 4, "when J cut off the prophets of Jeh"; and this shows the history of the time to be incompletely related. In 1 K 18 4 we are further told that "As for Jeh's prophets not at her table" (KJV).

Prophets (commentators regard the reference to "400 prophets of the Asherah" as an addition). In 1 K 19 1 Ahab tells J. of the slaughter of the prophets of Baal by Elijah, and then J. (19 2) sends a messenger to Elijah to threaten his life. This leads to the prophet's flight, an object which J. had in view, perhaps, for she would hardly dare to murder Elijah himself. 2 K 9 7 regards the massacre of Ahab's family as a punishment for the persecution of the prophet by J.

Ahab expresses a desire to possess the vineyard neighboring upon his palace in Jezreel, owned by Naboth, who refuses to part with it. The royal family is offered either its value or a better vineyard in exchange. Ahab accepts the exchange, and then, upon finding that he has purchased it at the cost of his melancholy feelings, asks him sarcastically if he is not king, suggesting that as king his wishes should be immediately granted by his subjects. She therefore, upon plots to murder Naboth. The vineyard, J. sends letters sealed in Ahab's name to the elders of Naboth's town, who have them changed to p一张 and Hameke Naboth "at the head of the people" (R.V), a phrase taken by some to mean that he is arranged, while it is explained by others as meaning that Naboth is to be given the chief place. Two witnesses—a sufficient number for that purpose—are to be brought to accuse Naboth of blasphemy and treason. That is done, and Naboth is found guilty, and stoned to death. The prophecy is confirmed, and Ahab, falling to the king (vs 1), feels that he needs his body (ver 19). But in vs 30–23 this prophecy is made, concerning Ahab but against Jezebel, and ver 25 attributes the sins of Ahab to her influence over him.

The prophecy is fulfilled in 2 K 9 30–37. Ahab and Jezebar had succeeded their father Ahab; the one reigned for 2 years (1 K 22 41), the other 12 years (2 K 3 1). Jehu heads a revolt against the house of Ahab, and the two days following Jehu by Joash (49) had "painted her eyes, and attired her head," and sees Jehu coming. She greets him sarcastically as his master's murderer. According to MT, Jehu asks, "Who is on my side? who?" but the text is emended by Klostermann, following LXX in "who is on your side? Who shouldst thou find familiar with me?" i.e. thou art but a murderer's wife. She is killed along with the horses that drew the chariot (reading "thou trid" for "be trid""): 23 33. When search is afterward made for her remains, they are found cached in the vault, which was the prophecy fulfilled. (Some commts hold that Naboth's vineyard and Ahab's garden, and Naboth a Jezreelite, of the words; which was in "Jezreel"; of LXX I 21 I am wanting in LXX, which has "And Naboth had a vineyard by the threshing-floor of Ahab king of Samaria." But of 1 K 18 45; 23: 2 K 8 29: 9 10.15.30.36.) See Ahab; JER.

The character of J. is seen in that of her daughter, Athalith of Judah (2 K 11); there is no doubt that J. was a powerful person.

3. Jezabel's ality. She brought the worship of Character the Phoen Baal and Astarte with her into Heb life, and indirectly introduced it into Judah as well as into the Northern Kingdom. In judging her connection with this propagation, we should bear in mind that she is not a queen of the 20th cent.; she must be judged in company with other queens famous in history. Her religious activity and zeal might profitably be compared with that of Mary, queen of Scots. It must also be remembered that the introduction of any religious change is often resented when it comes from a foreign queen, and is apt to be misunderstood, e.g. the attitude of Greece to the proposal of Queen Olga to have an authorized edition of the Bible in modern Gr.

On the other hand, although much may be said that would be favorable to J. from the religious standpoint, the balance is heavy against her when we remember her successful plot against Naboth. It is not perhaps blameworthy in her that she held the religion of her land, although the natural things would have been to follow that of her adopted land (cf. Ruth 1 16 f). The superiority of Jeh-worship was not as clear then as it is to us today. It may also be held that Baal-worship was not unknown in Heb life (cf Jgs 6 25 f.), that Baal of Canaan had become incorporated with Jeh of Sinai, and that there were pagan elements in the worship of the latter. But against all this it must be clear that the Baal whom J. attempted to introduce was the Phoen Baal, pure and simple; he was another god, or rather in him was presented an idea of God very different from Jeh. And further, "in Phoenicia, where wealth and luxury had been enjoyed on a scale unknown to either Israel or the Canaanites of the interior, there was a refinement, if one may so speak, and at the same time a prodigality of vicious indulgences, connected with the worship of Baal and Astarte to which Israel had hitherto been a stranger. . . . It was like a cancer eating into the vitals and heart sickness resulting in total decay (Isa 1 6). In Israel, moral deterioration meant political as well as spiritual death. The veil of the nation lay in fertility to Jeh alone, and in His pure worship" (H.P.M., §218).

The verdict of the historian is now substantiated. J. is an example—an extreme one no doubt—of the bad influence of a highly developed civilization forcing itself upon all its sins upon a community less highly civilized, but possessed of a nobler moral and religious capacity. She has parallels both in family and in national life. For a parallel to Elijah's attitude toward J. of the words of Carlyle about Knox in On Heroes and Hero Worship, IV. cap. the section, "We blame Knox for his intolerance," etc.

In Rev 2 20, we read of Jezabel, "the woman Jezabel, who calleth herself a prophetess"; not "thy wife" (i.e. the wife of the bishop) R.Vm, but as Moffat (Expos Gr Test.) aptly renders, "that Jezabel of a woman alleging herself a prophetess." Some members of the church at Thyatira "under the sway of an infatuated woman refused to separate from the local guilds where moral interests, though not ostensibly defied, were often seriously compromised. Her lax principles or tendencies made for a connection with foreign and compromising associations which evidently exerted a dangerous influence upon some weaker Christians in the city." Her followers "prided themselves upon their enlightened liberalism (ver 24)." Moffat rejects both the view of Schirer (Theol. Abhand- lungen, 39 f.), that is to be identified with the Chaldean Sibyl at Thyatira, and also that of Selwyn making her the wife of the local acharist. "It was not the culte but the trait of guilds that formed the problem at Thyatira." See also Zahn, Intro to the NT, § 73, n. 7; Ahab; Baal; Elijah.

JEZRAHIAH, jez-rah-ÁH. See ZRHAHIAH.

JEZREEL, jez'rél-Ál, jez'rél (נְצַרְיָא לָע, y'zî'el), “God soweth”:
1. A city on the border of the territory of Issachar (Josh 19 18). It is named with Zebulun and Shunem (modern Iskâli and Sûlam). It remained loyal to the house of Saul, and is mentioned as part of the kingdom over which Abner set Ish-bosheth (2 S 2 9). From Jezreel came the tidings of Saul and Jonathan's death on Gilboa, which brought disaster to Mephibosheth (2 S 4 4). The city played no important part in the history till the time of Ahab. Attracted, doubtless, by the fine position and natural charms of the place, he made it one of his royal residences, building here a palace (1 K 21 1). This was evidently on the eastern wall, which was the gate by which Jehu entered and was succeeded by the quarters of Queen Jezebel (2 K 9 30 f). The royal favor naturally enhanced the dignity of the city, and “elders” and “nobles” of Jezreel are mentioned (1 K 21 8, etc.). Under the influence of Jezebel, an institution for the worship of Baal was founded here, from which, probably, the men were drawn who figured in the memorable contest with Elijah on Carmel (2 K 10 11). “The tower in Jezreel” was part of the defences of the city. It commanded a view of the approach up the valley from Beth-shan—the way followed by the hordes of the E., who, from time immemorial, came westward for the rich pasture of the plain (2 K 9 17). It was necessary also to keep constant watch, as the district E. of the Jordan was always more unsettled than that on the W.; and danger thence might appear at any moment. The garden of Naboth seems to have lain to the E. of the city (2 K 9 21), near the royal domain, to which Ahab desired to add it as a garden of herbs (1 K 21 6 f). See NABOTH. This was the scene of the tragic meetings between Elijah and Ahab (1 K 21 17 f), and between Jehu and Joram and Ahaziah (2 K 9 21). Joram had returned to Jezreel from Ramoth-gilead to be healed of his wounds (9 15). The highway the dogs devoured Jezebel's body (vs 31 f). Naboth had been stoned to death outside the city (1 K 21 13). Jos lays the scene by the fountain of Jezreel, and here, he says, the dogs licked the blood washed from the chariot of Ahab (Am. VIII, xv. 6). This accords with 1 K 21 19; but 22 38 points to the pool at Samaria. The site of Jezreel must be sought in a position where a tower would command a view of the road coming up the valley from Beth-shan. It has long been the custom to identify it with the modern village, Ezrin, on the northwestern spur of Gilboa. This meets the above condition; and it also agrees with the indications in Ophom as lying between the Lake Lizzia (Lejzrâ) and Sycamore (Beisân). Recently, however, Professor A. K. S. Macalister made a series of excavations here, and failed to find any remains of ancient Israelite occupation. This casts doubt upon the identification, and further excavation is necessary before a certain conclusion can be reached. For the “fountain which is in Jezreel,” see HADDON, WELL OR.
(2) An unidentified town in the uplands of Judah (Josh 15 59), the home of Ahioam (1 S 17 3, etc.)

JEZREEL, VALE OF. See ESDRAELON, PLAIN OF.

JEZREELITE, jez'rél-it, jez'rél-it (נְצַרְיָא לָע, ha-y'zî'rlth): Applied to Naboth, a native of Jezreel (1 K 21 1, etc).

JEZREELITES, jez-rél-Ál-es, jez'rél-it-es (נְצַרְיָא לָע, y'zî'rlth, “of Jezreel,” fem.): Applied to Ahinoam, one of David's first two wives, a native of Jezreel in Judah (1 S 27 3; 30 5; 2 S 2 2; 3 2; 1 Ch 3 1).

JEZRIELUS, jez-ri'el-us (Tôpêelos, tserêlos; AV Hierieles; 1 Esd 9 27): Corresponding to “Jehiel” in Ezr 10 26.

JBSAM, jib'sam. See ISBAM.

JIDLAPH, jîd'laf (יִדֹּלָפ, yôdôlaph, perhaps “he weeps”): A “son” of Nahor (Gen 22 22).

JIMNA, JIMNAH, jim'NA (יוֹמְנָה, yimnâh, perhaps “good fortune!”): A “son” of Asher (Gen 35 17, AV “Jimnah”), whereas RV has IMNAN (q.v.).

JIMNITES, jim'nîts, THE (same as “Jimna,” only collective with the def. art.; Nu 26 44, AV “Jimna”), whereas RV has “Imnites”: Descendants of Jimna or Jina.

JIPHTAH, jîp'th (יִפְטָה, yôphtha). See JIPHTAH.

JIPHTHAHEL, jîp'thâ-Ál, el. See JIPHTHAHEL.

JOAB, jô'ab (יוֹבָא, yô'âb), “Jeh is father”:
1. Taâd, Idôb (יִדָּב, yôdôb).
(a) Son of Zeruiah, David's sister. He was “captain of the host” (cf 2 S 19 13) under David.
(b) Joab is first introduced in the narrative of the war with Abner, who supported the claims of Ish-bosheth to the throne against those
1. Joab of David (2 S 3 8—3 11). The two and Abner armies met, and on Abner's suggestion a tournament took place between 12 men from each side; a general engagement follows, and in this J.'s army is victorious. Asahel, J.'s brother, is killed in his pursuit of Abner, but the latter's army is sorely pressed, and he appeals to J. for a cessation of hostilities. J. calls a halt, but declares that he would not cease had Abner not made his plea.
(b) 2 S 3 12—29. Abner visits David at Hebron, and makes an alliance with David. He then leaves the town, apparently under royal protection. J. is absent at the time, but returns immediately after Abner's departure, and exostulates with David for not avenging Asahel's death, and at the same time attributes a bad motive to Abner's visit. He sends a message, no doubt in the form of a royal command, for Abner to return; the chief does so, is taken aside “into the midst of the gate” (or as LXX and commentators read, “into the side of the gate,” 3 27), and slain there by J. David proclaims his own innocence in the matter, commands J. as well as the people to mourn publicly for the dead hero (3 31), composes a lament for Abner, and pronounces a curse upon J. and his descendants (ver 30 is regarded as an editorial note, and commentators change ver 39).
(a) 2 S 10 1—14; 1 Ch 19 15—17. David sends ambassadors with his good wishes to Hanun on his ascending the throne of the Ammonites; these are ill-treated, and war follows, David's troops being commanded by J. On finding himself placed between the Ammonites on the one hand, and their Syrian allies on the other, he divides his army, and himself leads one division against the Syrians, leaving Abishai, his brother, to fight the Ammonites; the defeat of the Syrians is followed by the rout of the Ammonites.

(2) 2 S 10 15–19; 1 Ch 19 16–19 describes a second war between Hadarezer and David. J. is not mentioned here.

(c) 2 S 11 1 narrates the resumption of the war against the Ammonites; J. is in command, and the town of Rabbah is besieged. Here occurs the account of David's sin with Bathsheba, omitted by Ch. David sends J. to send Uriah, his husband, to Jerus, and when he refuses to break the soldier's vow (11 6–13), J. is to procure Uriah's death in the siege, and the general then sends news of it to David (11 14–27). After capturing the 'watercity' of Rabbah, J. takes the capital of Ammon, and Abdon, the captive, and leads the triumphs (12 26–29).

(a) The next scene depicts J. attempting and succeeding in his attempt to get Absalom restored to royal favor. He has noticed that the people's heart is 'vested in Abishai and Absalom' (14 1), and so arranges for "a wise woman" of Tekoa to bring a supposed complaint of her own before the king, and then rebuke him for his treatment of Absalom. The plan succeeds. David sees J. is in the right, and gives him permission to bring Absalom to Jerus. But the rebel has to remain in his own house, and is not allowed to see his father (14 1–24).

(b) Absalom attempts to secure J.'s intercession for his captive father, but his failure is due to his father's confidence. J. turns a deaf ear to the request until his field is put on fire by Absalom's command. He then sees Absalom, and gets David to receive his prodigal son back to the royal home (14 25–33).

(c) Absalom revolts, and makes Amasa, another nephew of David, general instead of J. (17 24 f). David flees to Mahanaim, followed by Absalom. J. is given a third of the army, the other divisions being led by Abishai and Joab. He is made sure that Absalom has been caught in a tree (or thickets), and expostulates with the informer for not having killed him. Although he is reminded of David's tender plea that Absalom be kindly dealt with, he dispatches J. to the rebel, with the blood of Absalom for a general halt of the army. When David gives vent to his feelings of grief, he is sternly rebuked by J., and the rebuke has its effect (17–19 8c).

2 S 19 8b–15. On David's return to Jerus, Amasa is made captain of the host instead of J. (19 13). Then Sheba revolts, Amasa dies by David to take the field (20 6). The Syr VS reads: "J." for "Abishai" in this verse, and some commentators follow it, but LXX supports MT. J. seems to have accompanied Abishai; and when Amasa meets them at Gibeon, J., on pretense of kissing his rival, kills him. He then assumes command by Amasa's men, and arranges with a woman of Abelbeth-maccaac to deliver to him Sheba's head. The revolt is then at an end.

J. subsequently opposed David's suggestion of a census, but eventually carried it out (2 S 24 1–9; 1 Ch 21 1–6), yet 1 Ch 21 6 and 27 6. J.'s 24 relate that he did not carry it out fully. He was one of Adonijah's supporters in his claim to the throne (1 K 1 7, 19, 41). For this he had to pay the penalty with his life, being slain at the altar in the "tent of Jeh" (1 K 2 28–34) by Benaiah, who acted upon Solomon's orders. His murder became his successor as head of the army. 1 K 2 5 makes David advise Solomon not to forget that J. slew Abner and Amasa, and 1 K 11 1–4 contains a reference to the deed of his name in Edom. 1 Ch 11 6 makes him win his spurs first at the capture of Jerus, but

2 S 2, 3 are previous in time to this event (cf 2 S 5 6–10), and 1 Ch 11 8 makes him repair the city, while 1 K 26 28 refers to a dedication of armor by him.

In summing up J.'s character, we must remember the stirring times in which he lived. That he was a most able general, there is no doubt.

6. Joab's He was, however, very jealous of his Character position, and this accounts for Amasa's murder, if not partially for that of Abner too: if he were afraid that Abner would support him, that fear may be held to be justified, for Amasa, who had not been too loyal to David did take J.'s place for a time. But blood revenge for Abner's death was perhaps the chief cause. Yet even when judged in the light of those rough times, and in the light of eastern life, the murder of Abner was a foul, treacherous deed (see Trumbull, Studies in Oriental Social Life, 129–31).

J. opposed the census probably because it was an innovation. His rebuke of David's great grief over Absalom's death can only be characterized as just; he is the stern warrior who, after being once merciful and forgiving, will not again spare a deceitful rebel; and yet David shows how a father's conduct toward J. is not regulated by stern justice. J.'s unwavering loyalty to David leads one to believe that no disloyalty was meant by his support of Adonijah, who was really the rightful heir to the throne. But their plans were foreseen by those of the harem, and J. had to pay the price with his life.

Taken as a whole, his life, as depicted in the very reliable narrative of 2 S and 1 K, may be said to be characteristic of the times that as that of David himself, with a truly Homeric ring about it. He was a great man, great in military prowess and also in personal revenge, in his loyalty to the king as well as in his stern rebuke of his royal master. He was the greatest of David's generals, and the latter's success and glory owed much to this noblest of that noble trio whom Jeruzael lived.

JOAKIM, jô-a'kim (יוֹאָכִים, יָוֹאכִים; AV Joasim):
(1) Jehoiakim, king of Judah and Jerus (1 Eed 1:15; Bar 1:5).
(2) Jehoiachin, son of (1) (1 Eed 1:43).
(3) Son of Jehuia (1 Eed 5:5), called by mistake son of Zerubbabel; in Neh 12:10.26 his name occurs as in 1 Eed, among the priests and Levites who returned to Jerus with Zerubbabel.
(4) High priest of Jerus in the time of Baruch (Bar 1:7).
(5) High priest in Jerus in the days of Judith who, along with “the ancients of the children of Israel,” welcomed the heroine back to the city after the death of Holofernes (Jdt 4). He cannot be identified with any of the high priests in the lists given in 1 Ch or in Jos, Ant. x, viii, 6. The word means “the Lord hath set up.” It is probably symbolical, and tends with other names occurring in the narrative to establish the supposition that the book was a work of imagination composed to support the faith of the Jews in times of stress and difficulty.

(6) The husband of Susanna (Sus vi 1 ff), perhaps here also a symbolic name. J. HUTCHISON

JOANAN, jô-an’nan (יוֹאָן, יואן; ‘Ioan'; ‘Ioanna, ‘Ioannya; AV Joanna):
(1) A grandson of Zerubbabel in the genealogy of Jesus according to St. Luke (3:27).
(2) The son of Eliasib (1 Eed 9:1 AV, RV “Jonas”).

JOANNA, jô-an’a (יוֹאָנה, יואנה, or ‘Ioanâ, ‘Ioânnâ; AV Johannes):
The wife of Chas; Herod’s steward. She was one of the “women who had been healed of evil spirits and infirmities” which “ministered unto him [AV, i.e. Jesus, or “them” RV, i.e. Jesus and His disciples of their substance,” on the occasion of Jesus’ tour through Galilee (Lk 8:23).
Along with other women she accompanied Jesus on his last journey from Galilee to Jerus, and was present when His body was laid in the sepulcher (Lk 23:55). She was thus among those who prepared spices and ointments, who found the grave empty, and who “told these things unto the apostles” (Lk 23:56—24:10).

JOANNES, jô-an’es, jô-an’ez (יוֹאָנֶה, יואנֶה; AV Johannes):
(1) Son of Acatan (1 Eed 8:38), called also “Johannes” in 23:8 ff.
(2) Son of Behai (1 Eed 9:29), called “Jehochanan” in Ezr 10:28.

JOARIB, jô-ar’ib (יוֹאָרִיב, יואריב; AV Jarib): Ancestor of Mattathias (1 Mace 14:29), given as “Joarib” in AV of 1 Mace 2:1; he was chief of the first of the 24 courses of priests in the reign of David. Varieties of the name are Jarib, Joarib, and Jehoiarib (1 Ch 24:7).

JOASH, jô’as (יוֹאָשׁ, yô’ash, “Jeh has strength” or “Jeh has bestowed”; AV, Iôâsh):
Gideon declares (6:15) that the family of the Abiezer in Manasseh, words similar to those of Saul (1 S 9:21), and not to be taken too literally. J. would be a man of standing and wealth, for Gideon was able to command 10 servants to destroy the altar and the Asherah (Jgs 6:27:34), and also to summon the whole clan to follow him. Further, the altar that J. had that was used by the community (6:28), so that he would be the priest, not only of his own family qdî paterfamilias, but also of the community in virtue of his position as chief. When Gideon destroyed the altar and the Asherah or sacred pillar by it, J. refused to deliver his son to death, declaring that Baal, if he was a god, should avenge himself (cf Elijah in 1 K 18).
(2) Called “the king’s son” (1 K 22:26; 2 Ch 18:25; cf Jer 36:26; 36:6), or, less probably, “the son of Hammolech,” RV; perhaps a son of Ahab. Micaiah the prophet was handed over to his custody and that of Amon by Ahab.
(3) A Judahite, descendant of Shelah (1 Ch 4:22).
(4) A Benjamite recruit of David at Ziklag.
Commentators read here, “J. the son of Shemaiah [or Jehoshamai], the Gibeathite” (1 Ch 12:3).
(5) In 2 K 11:2, etc, = Joash, king of Judah.
(6) In 2 K 13:9, etc = Jehoash, king of Northern Israel.

JOATHAM, jô-a-thâm (יוֹעַתָם, יְוֹאָתָם; AV for RV “Jotham” (Mt 1:9)). See Jotham (the king).

JOB, jôb (јוֹב, יְיוֹב, meaning of name doubtful; some conjecturing “object of enmity,” others “he who turns,” etc, to God; both uncertain guesses; ‘Iqôb): The titular hero of the Book of Job, represented as a wealthy and pious landholder who lived in patriarchal times, or at least conditions, in the land of Uz, on the borders of Idumaea. Outside of the Book of Job he is mentioned by Ezekiel (Ezk 14:20) as one of 3 great personages whose representative righteousness would presumably avail, if that of any individuals could, to redeem the nation; the other two being Noah, an ancient patriarch, and Daniel, a contemporary of the prophet. It is difficult to determine whether J. was an actual personage or not. If known through legend, it must have been on account of some such experience as is narrated in the book, an experience unique enough to have become a potent household story; still, the power and influence of it is due to the mastery of vivid and pictorial projection of the story. It was the J. of literature, rather than the J. of legend, who lived in the hearts of men; a character so commanding that, albeit fictitious, it could be referred to as real, just as we refer to Hamlet or Othello. It is not the way of Heb writers, however, to evolve literary heroes from pure imagination; they crave an authentic basis of fact. It is probable that such a basis, in its essential outlines, existed under the story of Job. It is not necessary to suppose, however, that the legend or the name was known to Israel from ancient times. Job is introduced (Job 1:1) as if he had not been known before. The writer, who throughout the book shows a wide acquaintance with the world, doubtless found the legend somewhere, and drew its meanings together for an undying message to his and all times.

ently among Scripture books it bears the matured literary stamp; both in style and structure it is a work, not only of spiritual edification, but of difined literary art. This may best be realized, perhaps, by taking it, as from the outset, if it purports to be, as a continuously maintained story, with the consistent elements of plot, character scheme, and narrative movement which we naturally associate with a work of the narrator's art.

The story of the Book of Job is laid in the far-off patriarchal age, such a time as we find elsewhere represented only in the Book of Gen;
1. Setting of the Story

A time long before the Israelitish state, with its religious, social and political

The scene is in the free open country, among mountains, wadies, pasture-lands, and rural towns, where the relations of man and man are more elemental and primitive, and where the things of God are more intimately apprehended than in the complex affairs of city and state. It is easy to see, therefore, how such gains by such a choice of setting. The patriarchal conditions, wherein the family is the social and communal unit, enable him to portray worship and conduct in their primal elements; religious rites of the simplest nature, with the unchallenged priest and intercessor (cf I 4:5; 42 8), and without the austere exactions of sanctuary or temple; to represent God, as in the old folk-stories, as communicating with men in audible voice and in tempest; and to give the patriarch or sheikh a function of counsel and succor in the community analogous to that of the later wise man or sage (cf ch 29). The place outside the bounds of Pal enables him to give an international or rather intercommunal tissue to his thought, as befits the character of the wisdom with which he is dealing, a strain of truth which Israel could and did share with neighboring nations. This is made further evidence by the fact that in the discourses of the book, the designation of God is not Jehovah (with one exception, 12:9), but Elohim or Eloah or Shaddai, appellatives rather than names, common to the Sem people. The whole archaic scene serves to detach the story from complex conditions of civilization, and enables the writer to deal with the inherent and intrinsical elements of manhood.

All the characters of the story, J. included, are from non-Palestinian regions. The chief spokesman of the friends, Eliphaz, who is character from Teman, is perhaps intended to represent a type of the standard and orthodox wisdom of the day; Teman, and Edom in general being famed for wisdom (Jer 49:7; Ob vs 8.9). The characters of the friends, while representing several a remarkable uniformity of tenet, are quite aptly individualized: Eliphaz as a venerable and devout sage who, with his eminent penetrateness of insight, combines a yearning compassion; Bildad more as a scholar versed in the derived lore of tradition; and Zophar more impetuous and dogmatic, with the dogmatist's vein of intolerance. In Elihu, the young Aramaean who speaks after the others, the writer seems endeavoring to portray a young man's possessiveness and the awkwardness of conviction, and with it a self-convict that quite outruns his quip. The Satan of the Prologue, who makes the wager with Jehovah, is masterfully individualized, not as the malignant tempter and enemy of mankind, but as a spirit composing, impudent skeptic, who can appreciate no motive beyond self-advantage. Even the wife of J., with her peremptory disposition to make his affliction a personal issue with God, is not without an authentic touch of the elemental feminine. But high above them all is the character of J. himself, with all its stormy alternations of mood, range of assertion and remonstrance and growth of new conviction, remains absolutely consistent with itself. Nor can we leave unmentioned what is perhaps the hardest achievement of all, the sublime venture of giving the very words of God, in such a way that He speaks no word out of character nor measures His thought according to the standards of man.

The Prologue, chs 1 and 2, a few verses at the beginning of ch 3 (ve 1-8a), and the Epilogue (42 7-17) are written in narrative prose. The rest of the book contains the short sentences introducing the speakers is in poetry: a poetical tissue conforming to the type of the later mishah (see under Proverbs), which in continuous series of couplets, is admirably adapted alike to imaginative sublimity and impassioned address. Beginning with J.'s curse of his day (ch 3), J. and his three friends answer each other back and forth in three rounds of speeches. To complete the subject, which is for reasons which the subject makes apparent, Zophar, the third friend, fails to join in time. After the friends are thus put to silence, J. speaks three times in succession (chs 26—31), and then "the words of J. are ended. At this point, for the first time, the speaker, Eliphaz, hitherto unmentioned, is introduced and speaks four times, when he answers J. at an approaching whirlwind (37, 44). J. speaks from the whirlwind, two speeches, each of which J. answers briefly (40 3-5; 42 1-6), or rather, he does not answer. Such, which we may now marize in Prologue (chs 1, 2), Body of Discussion (3-42), and Epilogue (42 7-17), is the literary framework of the book. The substance of the book is in a way dramatic; it cannot, however, be called so truly a drama as a kind of formless debate; its movement is too rigid for dramatic action, and it lacks besides the give-and-take of dialogue. In a hint of the dramatic, I would venture to call it "The Epic of the Inner Life," epic not so much in the technical sense, as in its effect. He is a work of fundamental significance may be compared to the story underlying the Prometheus Bound of Aeschylus. It will not be too much of either of these forms as designating the Book of Job; either term has to be accommodated almost out of recognition, because the Hebrew literary forms were not conceived according to the Gr categories from which our terms come. "Drama" and "dramatic" are derived. A great advantage on our appreciation of its form, I think, is imposed by those who regard it as a mixture of forms. It is too generally divided between narrative and didactic debate. To the Heb mind it was all a continuous narrative, in which the plot was a kind of frame. The cycle of visualized action, had nevertheless the movement and value which is in this light, rather than in the didactic, that we may most profitably regard it.

III. The Course of the Story. — To divide the story of J. into 42 parts, according to the 42 numbered chapters, is in the last degree arbitrary. Nothing comes of it except convenience in reading for those who wish to take their Job in little detached bits. The chapter division was no part of the original, and a very insignificant step in the later apprehension of the original. To divide according to the speeches of the interlocutors is better; it helps us realize how the conflict of views brings the various phases of the thought to expression; but this too, with its tempting three-times-three, turns out to be merely a framework; it corresponds only imperfectly with the true inwardsness of the story's movement; it is rather a scheme than a continuity. We are to bear in mind that this Book of Job is fundamentally the inner experience of one man, as he rises from the depths of spiritual gloom and doubt to a majestic table-land of new insight and faith; the other characters are but ancillary, helps and foils which are subordinate and relative. Hence, mindful of this inwardsness of Job's experience, I have ventured to trace the story in 5 main stages, naming them according to the landing-stage attained in each.

The story begins (1 1-5) with a brief description of J. as he was before his trial began; the elements of his life, outer and inner, on which is to be raised the question of motive. A prosperous landholder of the land of U, distinguished far and wide as the greatest (1:1). A blessing and a curse (1:5). To J.'s of the East, his inner character corresponds: to all appearance nothing lacking, a man "perfect and upright, and one that feared God, and turned away from evil." The typical Heb blessings of life were his to the full: wealth, honor, health, family. He is evidently set before us as the perfect example of the validity of the established Wisdom-tenet, that righteousness and Wisdom are identical (see under Proverbs, The Book), and this is manifest in its visible rewards. This period of his life J. describes afterward by retrospect as his "autumn days," when the friendship or intimacy (ad, g'dh) of God was over his tent (see 29 4, and the whole ch). Nor are we left without a glimpse into his heart: his constant attitude of worship, and his tender solicitude lest, in their enjoyment of the pleasures of life, his sons may have been disloyal to God (4-5). It is easy to see that not J. alone, but Wisdom as embodied in J., is postulated here for its supreme test.

Nor is the test delayed, or its ground ambiguous when it comes. Satan proposes it. Two scenes are given (1 6-12; 2 1-6) from the court of God, wherever that is; for although they are overheard by the reader, not seen, and of course neither J. nor any inhabitant of earth is aware of them. In these scenes the sons of God, the spirits who rejoiced over creation (38 7), are come together to render report, and Satan, uninvited, enters among them. He is a questioning spirit, unanchored to any allegiance, who roams through the earth, prying and criticizing. There is nothing, it would seem, in which he cannot find some flaw or discount. To J.'s question if he has considered J., the man perfect and upright, he makes no denial of the fact, but raises the issue of motive: "Doth J. fear God for nought?" and urges that J.'s integrity is after all only a transparent bargain, a paying investment with only reward in view. It is virtually an arrangement of power and status, of earthly relation. The essential human character: of God's order in connecting righteousness so intimately with gain; and of the essential human character, virtually denying that there is such a thing as disinterested, intrinsic human virtue. The answer perhaps does not the perfect embodiment of human virtue, is its designated victim. Satan proposes a wager, to the issue of which Jch commits Himself. The trial of J. is carried out in two stages: first against his property and family, with the stipulation that it is not to touch him; and then, this failing to detach him from his allegiance, against his person in sore disease, with the stipulation that his life is to be spared. Jeh acknowledges that for once He is consenting to an injustice (2 3), and Satan, liar that he is, uses instrumentalities that men have ascribed to God alone: the first time, tempest and lightning (as well as murderous foray), the second time, the black leprosy, a fell disease, loathsome and deadly, which in men's minds means the very stroke of God. The evil is as absolute as was the reward; a complete reversal of the order in which men's wisdom had come to trust. But in the immediate result, Jeh's in faith in His noblest creature is vindicated. Urged by his wife in his extremity to "curse God and die," J. remains true to his allegiance; and in his staunch utterance, "Jeh gave, and Jeh hath taken away; blessed be the name of Jeh," J., as the writer puts it, "sinned not, nor attributed to unrevealing [m'p, t'phlkh, lit. "tastless"]
1. The Veiled Impeachment

Imply that J.'s Turbulence of Mind precedes him from similar revelations, andJeopards his soul (5:12); advises him to commit his case to God, with the implication, however, that it is a case needing correction rather than justification, and that the result in view is a more passionate and detailed portrayal of his wrong, Bildad, following, abandoning the indirect impeachment and attributes the children's death to their sin (8:4), saying also that if J. were pure and upright he might supplicate and regain God's favor (8:6). He then goes on to draw a lesson from the traditional Wisdom lore, to the effect that sure destruction awaits the wicked and sure felicity the righteous (11:11-22). On J.'s following this with his most positive arraignment of God's order and claim for light, Zophar replies with impetuous heat, averring that J.'s punishment is less than he deserves (11:6), and reproving him for his presumption in trying to find the secret of God (11:7-12). All three of the friends, with increasing emphasis, end their admonitions in much the same way; promising J.'s reinstatement in God's favor, but always with the veiled implication that he must own to iniquity and treat as a sinner.

To the general maxims of Wisdom urged against him, with what vehemence and vehemence (of 13:2), J.'s objection is not that they are

2. Wisdom untrue, but that they are insipid.

Insipid, (6:7); they have lost their application to the case. Yet it is pain to him to think that the words of the Holy One should fail; he longs to die rather than deny them (6:9,10). One poignant element of his sorrow is that the intuitive sense (dāšīyāq; see under Fauvoralis, Tan 'Book of') is driven away from him; see 6:15. He raises the insinuating way in which the friends beg the question of his guilt; loan for forthright and sincere words (6:25). It is this quality of their speech, in fact, which adds the bitterness to his cup; his friends, on whom he had counted for support, are deceitful like a dried-up brook (6:15-20); he feels, in his sick sensibility, that they are not sympathizing with him but using him for their cold, calculating purposes (6:27). Thus is introduced one of the most potent motives of friendship; much will come of it when from the fallible friendships of earth he conquers his way by faith to a friendship in the unseen (6:19; 19:27).

With the sense that the old theories have become stale and pointless, though his discourses of the evil things is undulled by sin (6:30), J. arrives at an extremely poignant realization of the hardness and crookedness of the world-order, the result both of what the friends are saying and of what he has always held in common with them. It is the view that is forced upon him by the sense that he is unjustly dealt with by a God who renders no reasons, who on the score of justice vouchsafes to man neither insight nor recourse, and whose severity is out of all proportion to man's sense of worth (7:17) or right (9:17) or claim as a creature of His hand (10:8-14). Ch 9, which contains J.'s direct address to this arbitrary Being, is one of the most tremendous, not to say audacious conceptions in literature; in which a mortal on the threshold of death takes upon himself to read God a lesson in godliness. In this part of the story J. reaches his ultimatum of protest; a protest amusingly sincere, but not when we realize that it is made in the interest of the Godlike.

The great lack which J. feels in his arraignment of God is the lack of mediation between Creator and creature, the Oppressor and His victim. is no umpire between them, who may lay his hand upon both, so that the wronged one might have a voice in the matter (9 32-35). The
4. No Mediation in Sight to remove God's afflicting hand, and to prevent God's terror from unmanning His victim (see 13 20-22, as compared with the passage just cited), are the great need to restore normal and reciprocal relations with Him whose demand of righteousness is so inexorable. This umpire or advocate idea, thus propounded negatively, will grow to a sublime positive conviction in the next stage of J.'s spiritual progress (16 19; 19 25-27).
4. The Inqviring, to the Theirs, what Detect- and a recur need pared for Mediation this.
and mendous which they false does favor him in the 19; 13-17), but returning to his reluctant negative, from the analogy of drying waters (14 11) and the slow wearing down of mountains (14 18.19). As yet he can treat the idea only as a fancy; not yet a hope or a grounded confidence.

and the conviction comes by a nobler way than fancy, by the way of his personal sense of the just and Godlike order. The friends in their second round of speeches have begun to use the grandeur of the human being as the base for the great problem, and to aim at the most far momentous matter. Discarding these for the present as an academic exercise composed in cold blood (18 4.5), and evincing a heart hid from understanding (17 4), he goes on to recount the most bitter terms he has yet used the flagrancy of his wrong as something that calls out for expiation like the blood of Cain (16 18), and breaks out with the conviction that his witness and voucher who will hear his prayer for mediation is on high (16 19-21). Then after Bildad in a spiteful retort has matched his complaint with a description of the calamities of the wicked (an augmented echo of Eliphaz), and his has pathetically explained the treachery of earthly friends (13.14.21-22) and mounts, as it were, at a bound to the sublime ultimatum of his faith in an utterance which he would fain see engraved on the rock forever (19 23-29).

"I know that my Redeemer liveth," he exclaims; lit. my Go'el ("p25, g044b), or next of kin, the person whose business in the old life idea was to maintain the rights of an innocent wronged one and avenge his blood. He does not recede from the idea that his wrong is from God (cf 19 6.21); but over his dust stands his next of kin, and as the result of this one's intercession J.'s, in his own integral person, shall see God no more a stranger. So confident is he that he solemnly warns the friends who have falsely impeached him that it is they, not he, who are in peril (19 28.29; cf 13 10.11).
That in this conviction of a living Redeemer J.'s faith has reached firm and final ground is evident from the fact that he does not recur to his old doubts at all. They are settled, and settled right. But now, leaving them, he can attend to the things as the friends have been brought to Zophar, the third speaker, following, presses to vehement extreme their iterated portrayal of the wicked man's terrific woes; it seems the design of the writer to make them outdo themselves in the transformation of their thesis. As Zophar ceases, and J. has thus, as it were, drawn all their fire, J. refutes them squarely, as we shall presently see. Meanwhile, in the course of his extended refutation, the friends begin a third round of speeches. Eliphaz, the Friends whose already taken alarm at the climax and sub- tenancy of J.'s words, as those of a degraded and ruinous to devotion (15 4-6), now in the interests of his orthodoxy brings in his bill of particulars. It is the kind of theoretical cant that has had large prevalence in dogmatic religion, but in J.'s case atrociously false. He accuses J. of the most heartless cruelties and frauds (22.5-11), and demands that J. should indulge in secret wickedness when God was not looking (22 12-14); to this it is that he attributes the spiritual darkness with which J. is encompassed.
Then in a beautiful exhortation—beautiful when we forget its unreal condition (22 29)—he ends by holding open to J. the way of the secret face. This is the last word of the friends that has any weight. Bildad follows J.'s next speech indeed very briefly (ch 25), giving a last feeble echo of their doctrine of total depravity; a reply which
J. ridicules and carries on in a kind of parody (ch 26). Zophar does not speak a third time at all. He has nothing to say. And this silence of his is the writer's way of making the friends' theory subside into impotence. The idea that J. has a defensible cause or sees farther than they is wholly lost on the friends; to them he is simply a wicked man tormented by the consciousness of guilt, and they attribute the tumult of his thoughts to a wrath, or vexation, which blinds and imperils his soul (cf 5 2; 18 4). That is not the cause of his dismay at all, nor is it merely that his personal fate is inscrutable (cf 23 17 m). He is confounded rather, even to horror, because the probable facts of the world-order prove the utter falsity of all that they allege. Leaving his case, the righteous man's, out of the account, he sees the wicked just as prosperous, just as secure, just as honored in life and death, as the righteous (21 5 15 29 35). The friends ought to see so plain a fact as well as he (31 29). To all outward appearance there is absolutely no diversity of fate between righteous and wicked (21 25 26). The friends' cut-and-dried Wisdom and their doctrine about God's purpose (cf 13 7 8) have landed them in a lie; the truth is that God has left His times mysterious to men (34 1). They may as well own to the full the baffling fact of the impunity of wickedness; the whole of ch 31, with its allusions to the same theme and its overwhelming calmness of tone, is an act of Wisdom, with its rigid law of reward and punishment, has failed to penetrate the secret. A hard regime of justice, work and wages, conduct and desert, does not sound the deep truth of God's dealings, either with righteous or wicked. Truth then, shall Wisdom go, or shall it rise to a higher level of outlook and insight? In some such dim inquiry as this, it would seem, J. goes on from where his friends sit silenced to figure some possible solution of things as they are. He begins with himself and his self-righteously held integrity, sealing his utterance by the solemn oath (37 2 6), and so solemnly do avowing all part or sympathy with the wicked (37 7; cf 21 16). He has already found a meaning in his own searching experience; he is being tried for a sublime assay, in which all that is permanent and precious in him shall come out as gold (33 10). But if the trial of man's integrity and the value of his; it may hold for all. What then of the wicked? In a passage which some have deemed the lost third speech of Zophar (37 8 23), and which, indeed, recounts what all the friends have seen (37 12), he sets forth the case of the wicked in its true light. The gist of it is that the wicked have not the joy of God (37 10), or the peace of a permanent hope. It is in much the same tone as the friends' diatribes, but with a distinct advance from outward disaster toward tendency and futility. The ore is not being purged for a noble assay; and this will work their woe. Then finally, in the celebrated ch 28, comes up the summary of wisdom itself. That remains, after all this testing of motive, a thing intact and elemental; and man's part in it is just what J.'s life has been, to fear God and shun evil (28 28).

As the crowning pronouncement on things as they are, J. in his final and longest speech, describes in his own words the contrasted life of Job and his friends. The typical life of a suffering man, youthin and pain, and the way in which this is brought to bear. The life of the typical friend, the friend who would be a friend and comforter, and the way in which this is brought to bear.

4. Job. From his "autumn days" when the Reads His friendship of God was over his tent Indictment and he was a counselor and benefactor among men (ch 29), through this contrasted time of his wretchedness and curse-betraying disease, when the most degraded disgrace him (ch 30), until now as he draws conscience near the grave, he recounts in solemn review the principles and virtues that have guided his conduct—a noble summary of the highest Heb ideals of character (ch 31). This he calls, in his indictment which his Adversary has written; and like a prince, bearing it upon his shoulder and binding it to him like a crown, he is ready to take it with him beyond the bourn to the presence of his Judge.

With this tremendous proposal, sanctified and fashioned by a final curse if it prove false, the words of the J. are ended.

The friends are silenced, not enlightened. They have clung to their hard thesis to the stubborn end; postulating enough overt crime on J.'s part to kill him (22 5 9), and clinching their hypothesis with their theory of innate depravity (4 18 19; 16 14 15; 26 4 6) and spiritual hebetude (5 2; 15 26 27; 22 10 11); but toward J.'s higher level of honest integrity and exploring faith they have not advanced one inch; and here they lie, fossilised dogmatists, fixed and inveterate in their oedum theologum—a far cry from the friendship that came from afar to condole and console. J., His doctrine, his lofty conceptions of religious integrity, has held on his way in sturdy consistency (cf 17 9), and stood his ground before the enigma of things as they are. Both parties have said their say; the story is evidently ready for its dénouement. Taken up, with its rigid law of reward and punishment, has failed to penetrate the secret. A hard régime of justice, work and wages, conduct and desert, does not sound the deep truth of God's dealings, either with righteous or wicked. Truth then, shall Wisdom go, or shall it rise to a higher level of outlook and insight? In some such dim inquiry as this, it would seem, J. goes on from where his friends sit silenced to figure some possible solution of things as they are. He begins with himself and his stedfastly held integrity, sealing his utterance by the solemn oath (37 2 6), and so solemnly do avowing all part or sympathy with the wicked (37 7; cf 21 16). He has already found a meaning in his own searching experience; he is being tried for a sublime assay, in which all that is permanent and precious in him shall come out as gold (33 10). But if the trial of man's integrity and the value of his; it may hold for all. What then of the wicked? In a passage which some have deemed the lost third speech of Zophar (37 8 23), and which, indeed, recounts what all the friends have seen (37 12), he sets forth the case of the wicked in its true light. The gist of it is that the wicked have not the joy of God (37 10), or the peace of a permanent hope. It is in much the same tone as the friends' diatribes, but with a distinct advance from outward disaster toward tendency and futility. The ore is not being purged for a noble assay; and this will work their woe. Then finally, in the celebrated ch 28, comes up the summary of wisdom itself. That remains, after all this testing of motive, a thing intact and elemental; and man's part in it is just what J.'s life has been, to fear God and shun evil (28 28).

As the crowning pronouncement on things as they are, J. in his final and longest speech, describes in his own words the contrasted life of a suffering man, youthin and pain, and the way in which this is brought to bear. The life of the typical friend, the friend who would be a friend and comforter, and the way in which this is brought to bear.

For this determining pronouncement the writer has chosen to have both parties definitely represented, apparently at their best. So, instead of proceeding at once to the Self-consti-tuted Interpreter summons from the whirlwind, he introduces here a new character, Elihu, a young man, who, with growing impatience to the fruitless discussion, and now must set both parties right or burst (32 19). It is like the infusion of young blood into a thought (too arrogant in its antiquity of 8 8 10; 16 10 18; 19 11), that is, of passion. This character of Elihu is conceived in a spirit of satire, not without a dash of grim humor. His self-confidence, not to say conceit, is strongly accentuated (32 11 23); he assumes the umpire function for which J. has pleaded (33 6 7; cf 9 33 35; 13 20 22); and is sure he represents the perfect in knowledge (36 2 4; 37 16). He speaks four times, addressing himself alternately to J. and the friends. His words, though designedly diffuse, are not without wisdom and beauty; he makes less of J.'s deep-seated iniquity than do the friends, but blames him for speaking in the wicked man's idiom (34 7 9 36 37), and warns him against inclining more to iniquity than submission (36 21); but his positive contribution to the discussion is the view he holds of the chastening influence of dreams and visions (33 14 18; cf 7 13 15), and of the pains of disease (33 19 28), esp. if the sufferer has an angel [messenger] interpreter to reveal its meaning, such a one, he has impressed upon himself to be. As he proceeds in his speech, his words indicate that a storm is rising; and so long as it is distant he employs it to descend on the wondrous of God in Nature, wonders which to him mean little more than arbitrary marvels of power; but as it approaches near, and shows exceptional phenomena as of a theophany, his words become incoherent, and he breaks off with an abrupt attack to disclaim his pretensions. Such is the effect, with him, of the near presence of God. It overpowers, paralyzes, stops the presumptuous current of life.

The writer of the book has not committed the literary fatuity of describing the whirlwind, except as Eliphaz has seen it on coming, first with concept of knowledge, then with wild access of terror—a description in which his essentially vapid personality is reflected. For the readers the sign of the thing that is wind is in the Voice. Voice it incloses, the thing it says. And here the writer has undertaken the most tremendous task ever attempted by the human imagination: to make the Almighty speak, and speak in character. And one faculty at least he has escaped; he has not made God bandy arguments with men, or piece together the shifting premises of logic. The whole of the two discourses from the whirlwind is descriptive; a recounting of observable phenomena of created nature from the great elemental things, earth and sea and light and star and storm, to the varied wonders of animal nature—all things in which the questing mind of man may share, laying hold in his degree on its meaning or mystery. Thus, as a poetic literary personation, it fails at no point of the Godlike. It begins with the dismission of Eliphaz: "Who is this that darkeneth counsel by words without knowledge?" (38:2). Then J. is hidden gird up his loins like a strong man, and listen and answer. The fact that J. alone, of all the company, can stand as it were, to terms with God is premonitory of the outcome. Of the two Divine discourses, the first (chs. 38, 39) emphasizes more especially the unsearchable wisdom of creation; and the lesson it brings home to J. is that a being who is great enough—or presumptuous enough—to criticize and censure is great enough to resolve his own criticism (40:2). To this, of course, J. has no answer; he has presented his plea, which he neither adds to nor takes back (40:3-5). Resuming, then, the Voice in the second discourse (40:6—41:34) goes on to describe two great beasts, as it were, elemental monsters of Nature: Behemoth—probably the hippopotamus—vast in resisting and overcoming power, yet aware of its inferiority and its presence and pain. To the other Leviathan—a wonder of beautiful adaptedness to its function in Nature, yet utterly malignant, unsubdueable, untamable. And the lesson brought home to J. by this strange distribution of creative power is that he, who has called in question God's right to work as He does, had better undertake to lower human pride and "tread down the wicked where they stand" (40:12), thus demonstrating his ability to save himself and manage mankind. For, as it were, J. thought J.'s trenchancy of demand is utterly melted away into contrition and penitence (42:1-6); but one inspiring effect is his, the thing indeed which he has persistently sought (cf. 33:9); God is no more a hearsey, such as the friends have defended and his Wisdom has speculated about; his eye sees Him here on earth, and in his still unremoved affliction, no stranger, but a wise and communable Friend, just as his confidant faith had pictured him, in some embodied sphere beyond the sphere of the parties in the story have met the august theophany, and it has wrought its effect on them according to the spirit of the man. The self-constituted interpreter, Eliphaz, finally stands as suddenly as he swelled up and exhibited himself. The man of integrity, J., has reached the beatific goal of his quest. What now of the friends who came from far to confirm their wisdom, and if he would return from iniquity and acquaint himself with God (23:30); J. is now the mediator, though he has held consistently to the terms they reproposed. And the Divine verdict on them is: "Ye have not spoken of me the way my servant J. hath spoken. These are the words of the Being who acknowledged that in permitting this whole trial He was 'swallowing Job up causelessly' (2:3). J.'s honest and immensely revelatory words, anger, remonstrance, bold arraignment of God's way and all, were 'the thing that is right.' There is no more tremendous Divine pronouncement in all Scripture than this.

Here certain myopic students of the Book of Job think the story should end. It offends them, apparently, to see Satan's work undone. The author, at least his final author, evidently did not think so: in the description of the theophany, one of the strangest kindnesses that prevailed in his age he knew better what he was about. It is not my business to cut the book to a modern pattern, but to note what is there. J. is restored to health, to double his former wealth, to family and home; and his old age. These were what the friends predicted for him on condition of his owning to guilt and calling injustice desert; but in no word of his has he intimated that worldly reinstatement was his wish or his object, the contrary rather. And what he sought he obtained, in richer measure than he sought; obtained it still in suffering, and on earth, "in the place where all may see" (cf. 34:26 m.). It is no discount to the value of this, nor on the other hand is it an essential addition, to express it not only in spiritual terms, but in terms current among men. And one fundamental thing this restored situation shows, or at least takes for granted, namely, that the quarral has not been with Wisdom, or its sanctions, but only with its encroaching false motive. Deepened, not invaded, its Newtonian law that it is well with the righteous, ill with the wicked, remains intact, an external sanction to live by, in spite of temporal exceptions. A spiritual principle of great significance, too, seems to be indicated, as it were, sputively, in the words, "And Jeh turned the captivity of J., when he prayed for his friends." He had stood on his integrity demanding his right, and became a self-asserting penitent; out of dust and ashes he prayed for others; so God, and became again such a power in health and wealth as he had been in his "autumn days."

IV. The Problem and the Purpose.—If the foregoing section has rightly shown the main thrust and interest of the Book of Job

1. Beyond its problem and its purpose. The sublime self-portrayal of a man who held fast his integrity, his God, and darkness tells its own story and teaches its own lesson, beyond the power of didactic propositions or deductions to compass. The Book is not a sermon but a vital, throbbing uprise of the human spirit. It is warm, wild, sudden. What is the inner life with its hopes, its doubts, its convictions, its supreme assurance; to impose on this any tether of didacticism is to chill its spirit and make it dog matic and academic. The reading of its purpose which mainly holds the field today is expressed in the question, 'Why does God afflict the righteous?' and the book is used, like the book of Job in the old dispensation, as a justificaton of God's ways with man. Well, the friends of J. do their best to make their interpretation a theodicy, even outraging palpable fact to do it; they monopolize the didactic element of the poem, but the book is a poem. God does not afflict the righteous but the wicked, and that J. is a flagrant case in point who adds rebellion to his sin (cf. 34-37). J. does not know why God afflicts the righteous; he only knows that it is a grievous fact, which to him seems utterly un-Godlike, but J. knows, undoubtedly, but He does not tell. Yet all the while an answer to the question is shaping itself in personality, in intrinsic manhood, in the sturdy truth and loyalty of J.'s spirit. So, going beyond the didactic teth, we may say that in a deeper sense God is justified after all; if such a result of desperate trial is possible in man, it is worth all the rigor of the experiment. But it is as truly an anthropodicy (excuse the word!) as a theodicy: it puts the essential fact on a plane where Satan can prove by his lying sneers of self-interest, or the friends' poisoning of the wells by their theory of natural depravity. It comes back all to the story of J.: he lives the answer to the problem, his personality is the teaching.

We can best judge of the critical attacks that have been made on the structure and coherence of the Book of Job. The book has suffered its full share of negative didactic integration at the hands of the critics; mostly subjective it seems to me, arising from a too restricted view of its problem and purpose, or from lack of that long patient induction which will not be content until it sees all the elements of its creative idea in its proper order and proportion. To limit the purpose to the issue of a debated theodicy, is to put some parts in precarious tenure; accordingly, there are those to whom the Epilogue seems a superficiality, the Prologue an afterthought, ch. 28 a fugitive poem put in to fill up—not to go on to still more radical excisions. On the score of regularity of structure, too, this limitation of design has had equally grave results. Eliphaz has perhaps sense. God is judged after all; if such a result of desperate trial is possible in man, it is worth all the rigor of the experiment. But it is as truly an anthropodicy (excuse the word!) as a theodicy: it puts the essential fact on a plane where Satan can prove by his lying sneers of self-interest, or the friends' poisoning of the wells by their theory of natural depravity. It comes back all to the story of J.: he lives the answer to the problem, his personality is the teaching.

2. What Comes of Limiting the Purpose

3. The Book of God or Not for? is set on the track of import of it. To give that question a Godlike purpose and not a Satanic answer, to prove in the person of J. that man has in him to make his life an unbroken loyalty to the Divine, a purpose large enough to include many subsidiary purposes. But behind this appears, on the part of the author, a purpose which relates his story intimately to the intellectual tendencies of his day. The poems of Job, e.g., the Proverbs, a searching exegesis of the status to which the wisdom philosophy of his time had arrived. That philosophy was a nobly founded theory of life; J. himself had been and continued (cf. 28-29) thoroughly at one with it. Soundly identified with righteousness, wisdom, wisdom defined the elements of right and wrong living, and had in no uncertain terms fixed its sanctions of reward and penalty. But from a warm, pulsating life it had become an orthodoxy. Its rigid world view was: the righteous, bound for the sure rewards of life; the wicked, bound for sure failure and destruction. It brooked no real exception to this austere law of being. But two grave evils were invading its system: one was its hard blindness to facts, or, what is as bad, its determination at all hazards to explain them away. From the psalms of the period (cf. e.g. Ps. 37, 49, 73) we can see how the evident happiness and prosperity of the wicked was troubling doubt in Job's mind. The other was that J.'s teaching philosophy of life was becoming too cold-blooded and calculable a thing, a virtual feeder of self-interest. The doubt lay very near whether conduct so sanctioned was a thing intrinsic and sincere or a thing bought and sold. This equivocal state of things could not long endure. Sooner or later Satan's question of motive must stave it to the heart; and we may be sure that to the author of the book the impulse to ask the question was not all Satanic. The interests of true wisdom, an on a plane of personality, a4. Theodicy and Intrinsic Man

In other words, the problem is more deeply concerned with man's intrinsic nature than with God's mysterious dealings. When God created man in His own image, did He endow him most fundamentally with the spirit of commercialism, or with the spirit of un bought loyalty to the Godlike? And when created man was made fallible and mortal, did that mean an unescapable inherent depravity, or was the potency of noblest manhood still left at the center of his being, further, Zophar would bring no help to him out. I need not go into further detail. The foundation is something, I hope, to justify my conviction that the book has a homogeneous design and structure just as it is. Whatever its vicissitudes since the first draft was made, it may turn out after all that the last edition is the best.

We are not left in the dark as to the large purpose of the Book of Job, if we will follow its own indications consistently. Satan's question at the beginning, 'Doth Job fear God for nought?' sets us on the track of import of it. To give that question a Godlike purpose and not a Satanic answer, to prove in the person of J. that man has in him to make his life an unbroken loyalty to the Divine, a purpose large enough to include many subsidiary purposes. But behind this appears, on the part of the author, a purpose which relates his story intimately to the intellectual tendencies of his day. 5. Considerations of Age and Setting.—The questions who was the personal author of the Book of Job, and what was its age, are at 1. Shadowy Contacts with History.—I wrote my Epic of the Inner Life, must go for what it is worth. It seems to me much better to regard a story so homogeneous and interrelated as in the main the composition of one mind than to distribute it, as some critics do, among various authors, supplementers to its stories and theories. The identification of an identifiable contact with political or ecclesiastical history that its composition has been ascribed to many periods, from the time of Abraham to late in post-exilic times. The fact that its scene is laid in the patriarchal past and in a land outside of Pal indicates the ad in religious and contemporary events and conditions; such contact with these as exist, therefore, must be read between the lines. The book does not hold with full consistency to patriarchal conditions. Job's friends appeal with the complemency of wisdom-prospered men to an ancient tenure of the land (16: 10); and yet, as Job explains, their landholding class in removing landmarks and oppressing the poor (24: 2-12) connotes the prevalence of such outrages as were denounced by Isaiah and Micah before the Assyrian crisis. Such evils would not decrease under the new imperial order. As FabriciusKraeling, this might well be portrayed in reminiscence by an exile writer. On the top of this consideration may be cited the most definite reference to a historical event that the book contains: the passage 12: 17-25, which vividly describes, by an eye-witness ("Lo, mine eye hath seen all this," 13: 1), a wholesale deportation and humiliation of eminent persons, just like that told of Jehoiachin and his court, in 2 K 24: 18-15. To my mind this is illuminative for the age of the book. It seems to have been written by one who saw the Chaldean deportation of 587 BC. May I be suffered to carry the suggestion a step farther? It will be remembered that the chief personage of that deportation was a state prisoner in Babylon, at the end of which time he was "taken from durance and judgment" (cf Isa 53: 14) and lived thenceforth honored with kings (2 K 25: 27-30 = Jer 52: 31-34). I take him to have been the original of the individualized Servant of Jehovah described and describing himself in Second Isa. In one of his self-descriptions he says that Jehovah has given him "the tongue of them that are taught" (Isa 50: 4); in another that Jehovah has made his "mouth like a sharp sword" and himself "a polished shaft" (Isa 49: 2). What he seeks or woos in his unceasing course unfruitful; but it is certain that in some cultural way he was a hidden power for good to his people. What if this Book of Job were a prison-made book, like Pilgrim's Progress and Don Quixote, but as much greater as the experience that underlay it was more momentous? I do not see but this suggestion is as probable as any that have been made; and some expressions of the book become thereby very striking, as, for instance, the reference to prisoners (3: 18-19), to the event, or ringing in memory of the release (7: 2), the genuine sense of being despised, the several references to Job as "my servant Job" or "my servant Job" (1: 8; 2: 3; 42: 7, 8), the description of his restoration as a turned captivity, and his successful intercession for the friends (42: 10 = Isa 53: 12). I would merely suggest the idea, however, not press it.

If the Book of Job is a product of the time of Jehovah's imprisonment, it is in worthy and congenial literary company. Isaiah, fostering the faith of a new-born spiritual "remnant," had gathered the elements of that sublime vision (Isa 1: 1) of Israel's mission among the nations which a later hand was even now, four generations after, working to supplement and finish. In a prophecy (Isa 40-66) which, as all recognize, constitutes the closest parallel in inspired idea to our book, Seers, priests and sages, have been busied themselves with the literary treasures of the past; drawing out of dusty archives and putting into popular idiom the ancient laws and counsels of Moses (De; see under JOSUAI); collecting and adapting the old Davidic psalms and composing new ones, as Hezekiah's reorganization of the worship required. Essekil was at Tel-Abib planning for the reconstruction of the temple, and his brother Huldah, by the use of the name "Abi" and "Abijam," veiling a cryptic reference (Ezk 14: 20). The affilations of the Book of Job, however, were more specifically with the literary and long before the "men of Hezekiah" (Prov 25: 1) had gathered their aftermarriage. The book contains the themes which had been the educational pabulum of the people (see under PROVERBS, BOOK OF). It was with this spirit of this diffused instruction, now the most popular vein of literature, that the Book of Job concerned himself. And the manner in which the maxims were coordinated in an anthology, and an introduction to the collection had been composed, extolling Wisdom as the guide and savor of life. To a spiritually-minded thinker with the Job genius for religion the motivation of Wisdom's teaching must have come. With its values should be apprehended also its unguided points and tendencies. It was exposed to the one-sided drift of all popular literature; only the revision and deeper insight were the literary order of the day. Wisdom was furnished with the older literature for purification and maturing; and there was not wanting an experience, the basis of an almost unbelievable report (cf Is 33: 1) to give a touch of dignity to Job's personal story of suffering and integrity.

In the amazing sureness and vigor of its message the Book of Job stands out unique and alone; but it is by no means without its lesser 3. Parallels parallels in faith and doubt, above and Echoes which it rises like a thunderous cataract have its retinue of foothills. Mention has been made above of a number of Ps (e.g. 37, 49, 73) which with different degrees of assurance witness to the struggle of faith with the problem of the rampant and successful wicked. Ps 49, one of the psalms of the sons of Korah, is esp. noteworthy, because it expressly employs the popular meshal, that is, the Wisdom vehicle, to convey a corrective lesson about unblest riches, drawing a conclusion not unlike that of Job 27: 8-23, though on a different basis. Not less noteworthy also is the note of suffering and its mysteriousness which pervades many of the ps, esp. of Asaph and Heman. Ps 88 and 102 might both have been composed with special reference to Hezekiah's sickness and set beside his sagas (Isa 38: 8-20); but also they are so fully in the tone of J's complaint, esp. 88, that Professor Godet, not unplausibly, conjectures that the Book of Job was written by its author Heman. Hezekiah's deadly sickness itself (Isa 38), which rises out of his leprous nature, banishing him from the house of God, and which was miraculously healed—an experience regarding which Hezekiah's own writing (Isa 38: 10-20) is strikingly in the key of Job's complaint—furnishes the nearest parallel to, or adumbration of, Job's affliction; but also in the accounts of the Servant of Jehovah there are hints of a similar stroke of God's judgment (cf Isa 52: 14; 53: 3). The passage Job 17: 18 has been called "a bitter parody" of Ps 8: 4; it may be so, but the conditions are in utter contrast, and nothing can be concluded as to which is original and which echo. As to expression, the most remarkable parallel to Job, perhaps, is the passage Jer 20: 14-18, in which, like Job, the prophet of Jeremiah curses the day of his birth; and, as Job would naturally be remembered by all readers as one of the most characteristic features of the book; and in like manner the curse in Jer may have stood out in the memory of his disciples, of whom the writer of Job may have been one, or adumbration of a similar literary situation. Essekil's naming of Job along with Noah and Daniel (Ezk 14: 20), as a type of atoning righteousness, is doubly remarkable if the writer of Job was a contemporary; he may have taken the name from his kinsman Job; and there may have underlain it a double meaning, known to an inner circle, referring cryptically to one whose real name might be impolitic to pronounce. Whenever written, the outline and meaning of J's momentous experience must have won apodically to a permanent place in the universal Hebrew memory; so that centuries afterward St. James could write to the twelve tribes scattered abroad (6: 11), "Ye have heard of the patience of Job, and have seen the end of the Lord."

JOEL, jô‘el (יֹאֵל, yô‘ēl), perhaps “homing”: (1) Son of Joktan (Gen 10:9; 1 Ch 1:23). See Table of Nations.

(2) An Edomite king (Gen 36:33:4; 1 Ch 1:44:5).

(3) King of Madon (Josh 11:1).

(4) 1 Ch 8:9; and (5) 1 Ch 6:18, Benjamites.

The name is confused with that of Job in LXX of Job 42:17.

JOCHEBED, jô’kè-bèd (יֹכֵ֣בֶד, yô‘kehbedh, “Jeh is glory”): Daughter of Levi, wife of Amram and mother of Moses (Ex 6:20; Nu 26:59). According to Ex 6:20, she was a sister of Kohath, Amram’s father.

JOD, jod (יוֹד, yodh), the tenth letter of the Heb alphabet. See Alphabet; Jot; Yodh.

JODA, jô’dâ (WH, יֹ֫וֺדָא, yô’dâ; TR, Ἰούδα, Iouda).

(1) A Levite, whose sons were “over the works of the Lord,” corresponding to Suddas (1 Esd 5:26), Hoadaviah (Est 2:40), Judah (Est 3:9), Hodevah (Neh 7:43).

(2) An ancestor of Jesus in Lk’s genealogy (Lk 3:26, AV “Juda”).

JOED, jô’ed (יוֹדֵע, yô‘ēd, “Jeh is witness”): A “son” of Benjamin (Neh 11:7), wanting in 1 Ch 9:7.

JOEL, jô’ēl (יוֹאֵל, yô‘ēl), popularly interpreted as “Jeh is God” but see HYP, 153; BDB, 222a: (1) The firstborn of Samuel (1 S 8:2; 1 Ch 6:33 [Heb 18], and supplied in RV of 1 Ch 6:28, correctly).

(2) A Simeon prince (1 Ch 4:35).

(3) A Reubenite chief (1 Ch 5:48).

(4) A Gadite chief, perhaps the same as (3) (1 Ch 5:12). He might be the chief of “a family or clan whose members might be reckoned as belonging to either or both of the tribes” (Curtis, 122).

(5) A Levite ancestor of Samuel (1 Ch 6:36 [Heb 21], called “Shaul” in ver 24 [Heb 9]).

(6) A chief of Issachar (1 Ch 7:3).

(7) One of David’s mighty men (1 Ch 11:38), brother of Nathan. 2 S 25:36 has “Igad son of Nathan,” and LXX B has “son” in 1 Ch, reading which Curtis adopts. See Igad.

(8) A Levite (1 Ch 16:7.11.17), probably the J. of 1 Ch 23:8 and 26:22.

(9) David’s tribal chief over half of Manasseh (1 Ch 27:20).

(10) A Levite of Hesekiiah’s time (2 Ch 29:12).

(11) One of those who had married foreign wives (Est 10:43) = “Joel” of 1 Esd 9:35.

(12) A Benjamite “overseer” in Jerus (Neh 11:9).

(13) Iowh, Ioth, the prophet (Joel 1:1; Acts 2:16). See following article.

LITERATURE.

I. The Prophet.—The Book of Joel stands second in the collection of the Twelve Prophets in the Heb Canon. The name (יוֹאֵל, yô‘ēl), meaning “Jeh is God,” seems to have been common, as we find a dozen other persons bearing it at various periods of the Bib. history. Beyond the fact that he was the son of Pethuel, there is no intimation in the book as to his native place, date, or personal history; nor is he mentioned in any other part of the OT; so that any information on these points must be matter of inference, and the consideration of them must follow some examination of the book itself.

II. The Book.—This takes largely the form of addresses, the occasion and scope of which have to be gathered from the contents. There is no narrative, properly so called, except at one place (2:18), “Then was Jehovah for his land,” etc., and even then the narrative form is not continued. Yet, though the earlier portions at least may be the transcript of actual addresses in which the speaker had his audience before him, this would not apply to the later portions, in which also the direct address is still maintained (e.g. 3:11, “Haste ye, and come, all ye nations round about”). This form of direct address is, indeed, characteristic of the style throughout. There is also said to be an indication of its literary character, that “the style of Joel is bright and flowing,” his “imagery and language are clear” (Driver, LOT); “his book is a description, clear, well arranged, and carried out with taste and vivacity, of the present distresses and of the ideal future. Joel may be reckoned among the classics of Heb lit. The need of a commentary for details, as is the case with Amos and Hosea, is here hardly felt” (Reuss, Das AT).

The book in the original consists of 4 chapters, which, however, are in our VS reduced to 3, by making the portion which constitutes 2 Outline ch 3 in the Heb the concluding portion of Contents (vs 28–32) of ch 2. The book begins in gloom, and its close is bright. Up to 2:18 there is some great trouble or a succession of troubles culminating at 2:28–32 (ch 3 in Heb). And the concluding portion, ch 3 (ch 4 in Heb), in which the prophet projects his view into futurity, begins with judgment but ends with final blessedness. There is a progression in the thought, rising from the solid, sorely smitten earth to a region ethereal, and the stages of advance are marked by sudden, sharp calls (1:2.14; 3:9), or by the blasts of the trumpet which prelude the shifting scenes (2:1.15).

Ch 1 begins with an address, sharp and peremptory, in which the oldest inhabitant is appealed to whether such a calamity as the present has ever been experienced, and all are called to take note so that the record of it may be handed down to remotest posterity. The land has suffered from a succession of disasters, the greatest that could befall an agricultural country, drought and locusts. The two are in fact inextricably connected, and the features of both are mixed up in the description of their effects. The extent of the disaster is vividly depicted by the singling out of the classes on whom the calamity has fallen, the drinkers of wine, the priests, the vine-dressers, the husbandmen; and, toward the close of the chapter, the lower animals are pathetically introduced as making their mute appeal to heaven for success (ver 18–20). Specially to be noted is the manner in which the priests are introduced (ver 9), and with them is associated the climax of the affliction. The prophet had just said “no land” (ver 6), “my vine” and “my fig-tree” (ver 7); and, though many modern expositors take the pronoun as referring to the nation or people, it would appear more appropriate, since the people is objectively addressed, to regard the prophet as identifying himself with the God in whose name he is speaking. And then the transition to ver 8 becomes intelligible, in which certainly the land is personified as a female: “Lament like a virgin girded with sackcloth for the husband of her youth.” The underlying idea seems to be the conception of the land as Jeh’s and of Jeh as the bal’ lord,” or husband of people and land. This is the idea so much in evidence in the Book of Hos, and so much perverted by the people whom he addressed, who ascribed their corn and wine and oil to the Can. ba’as. The idea in its purer form is found in the 1st Beluah,” “married land” (Isa 62 4,5). If it was with this that was in J.’s mind, the mention of the priests coming to be recipients of the land were Jeh’s gifts, and the acknowledgment of His lordship was made by offerings of the produce laid on His altar. But if nothing was given, nothing could be offered, the ‘cutting off’ of the meal and drink offerings was the marking of the land’s destitution of the land. Hence the pathetic long- ing (2 14) that at least so much may be left as to assure the famished land that the supreme calamity, the loss of God, has not fallen. Thus the visitation is set in a religious light; the graphic description is more than a poetic picture. It is the Lord’s land that is wasted; hence the summons (1 14) to “cry unto Jeh,” and in the vs that follow the supplication by man and beast for deliverance.

Ch 2 up to ver 17 seems to go over the same ground as ch 1, and it has also two parts | respectively to two parts of that chapter: 2 1–11 is || to 2 12–13, and 2 12–17 to 1 13–20. The former part in both cases is chiefly descriptive of the calamity, while the latter part is more hortatory. Yet there is an advantage for, whereas in 2 12–13 the land is fixed on the devastation, in 2 1–11 it is the devast- ator, the loudest, that is particularly described; also, in 2 12–17 the tone is more intensely religious: “Reed thy heart, and not thy garments” (ver 13). This it is to be noted that it is at this phase of that portion that we get the first reference to external nations: “Give not thy heritage to re- proach, that the nations should use a byword against them: wherefore should they say among the peoples, Where is their God?” (ver 17). If the view given above of 1 6–8 be correct, this is merely an expan- sion of the germinal idea there involved. And so it becomes a pivot on which the succeeding portion turns: “Then was Jeh jealous for his land, and had pity on his people.” In point of fact, as the Heb student will perceive, all the vs from ver 15 may be read, with a change of the points, as simple, perfect, with the exception of the vs for “weep” and “as,” in ver 17, which might be descriptive imperfects. But no doubt the imperative forms are to be read, expressing as they do more graphically the doing of the thing prescribed. And, this sharp turn having been made, it will be noticed how the dis- course proceeds on a higher gradient, forming a counterpart to the preceding context. Step by step, in inverse order, we pass the former points, beginning with the last the “reproach among the nations” (ver 19; cf ver 7), passing to the destruction of the great army (ver 20; cf 1 11), then touching upon the various kinds of vegetation affected (vs 21–24; cf 1 12,10, etc), and ending with the reversal of the fourfold devastation with which the prophet began (ver 25; cf 1 4). So that what at the outset was announced as a calamity unprecedented and unparalleled, now becomes a deliv- erance as enduring as God’s presence with His people is forever blessed.

Up to this point there has been an observable sequence and connection, so that, while the prophet has steadily progressed upward, we can look down from the point reached and see the whole course that has been traversed. But now in 2 28–32 (ch 3 in Heb) he passes another line come to pass afterward.” And yet no doubt there was a connection of thought in his mind, of which we obtain suggestions in the new features of the death of the land, in that, “is the sound of abundance of rain” (1 K 18 41) in this pouring out of the land upon all flesh; in the sons and daughters, old men and young, servants and handmaids, we seem to recognize the representative gathering of 1 15 f., those engaged in the priestly function of supplication here endorsed with praise, “and the dominion of priests, and a holy nation” (Ex 19 6), all the Lord’s people become prophets (Nu 11 29). Again we see the sky overcast and sun and moon darkened before the great and terrible day of the Lord, as if the prophet had said: There shall be greater things than these; a new era is coming in which God’s hand will be laid more heavily upon the world, and His people will be quickened to a clearer vision of His working. The “day of Jeh” was yet to come in to actualize the possibility suggested, and there will be a more effective deliverance than from drought and dearth; but then as now there will be found safety in Mt. Zion and Jerusalem. This, however, implies some danger with which Jeh had been threatened: a “remnant” or an “escaped” portion involves a disaster or crisis out of which new life comes. And so the prophet goes on in ch 3 (ch 4 in Heb), still speaking of “those days” and “that time,” to tell us of the greater deliverance from the greater trouble to which he has been alluding. There is nothing in the ante- cedent chapters to indicate what “that time” and “those days” are, or what the prophet means by bringing again the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem. These are questions of interpretation. In the meantime, we may note the general features of the scene now set before us. A great assize is to be held in the valley of Jehoshaphat, in which “all nations” there assembled by Divine summons will be judged for offences against God’s people and heritage (vs 1–8). And again, just as in chs 1, 2 the prophet exhibited the plague of locusts in two pictures, so here in vs 9–21 the picture of the great assize is transformed into a bloody picture in the same valley, not of locusts, but of slaughter, with a treading of the wine-press. There is a confused multitude in “the valley of decision”; sun and moon are darkened, and the stars withdraw their shining; the “day of Jeh” has finally come; and, when the din is silenced and clear light again falls upon the scene, all is peace and prosperity, the last of the enemies destroyed, and the Lord dwelleth in Zion.

(1) Literal.—Thus the book forms a fairly intelligible and connected whole when we read in the literal sense of the language. That is to say: a time of confusion connected with an unprecedented visitation of locusts gives rise to the recognition of the Divine hand and to earnest supplication that the threatened ruin of people and property may be averted. The language of the calamity is interpreted as a mark of restored Divine favor and an assurance of God’s unfailing care for His people. But these great doings of Nature’s God suggest yet greater deeds of Israel’s God of a more spiritual kind, the destroying, for instance, like rain and showers, of Divine blessing, so that the whole community would be set on a higher level of spiritual apprehension. And thus the prophet is led on to speak of the “last things.” Judah and Jerusalem, highly distinguished and significantly protected, are bound up with a world-wide purpose. Israel, in a word, cannot be conceived apart from non-Israel. And as non-Israel had in the past been an opposing power, in the great “day of Jehovah,” wrong should be at last righted, the nations judged, and Israel and Israel’s God exalted. No doubt this is figurative and without difficulties. We may not be able to detect the mead of transitions, or to say how much of the purport of the latter part was in the prophet’s mind when he was engaged on the former part. And the description of the locust is so highly poetical that there is a temptation to see in it a reference to a great international event.

(2) Allegorical.—These considerations, combined with the undue eschatological strain of the closing part of the book, and with the fact that early commentators (and they had followers in modern times) have turned the book into an allegorical interpretation of the whole Book of Joel, as pointing forward to future history. Thus, in Jerome’s time, the 4 names of the locust in 1:4 were supposed to designate (1) Egyptians and Babylonians, (2) Medes and Persians, (3) the Macedonians and Antiochus Eupator, and (4) Romans. But, apart from the consideration that the analogy of prophecy would lead us to look for some actual situation or occurrence of life to illustrate the descriptive language of Joel, the conception, coming from the N.E. or, coming from the E., might strike the country at a point to the N. of Pal and take advantage of the wind which destroys crops. Again, the locust (2:20) would be a northeasterly wind, driving the forepart into the Dead Sea and the hinder part into the Mediterranean Channel. Although the Book of Joel has been assigned by different authorities to very various dates, ranging over 4 or 5 cents.; but, as will appear in the sequel, it comes to be a question whether the book is very early or very late, in fact, whether J. is perhaps the very earliest or the very last among the last of the writing prophets. This diversity of opinion is due to the fact that there are no direct indications of date in the book itself, and that such indirect indications as it affords are held to be capable of explanation on the one view or the other. It will be noticed also that, to add to the uncertainty, many of the arguments adduced are of a negative kind, i.e., that the prophet of whom, if not mention or refer to, and the argument from silence is notoriously precarious. It will, therefore, be convenient to specify the indications available, and to note the arguments drawn from them in support of the respective views.

(1) Place in the Canon.—An argument for a very early date is based upon the place of the book in the collection of the “twelve” minor prophets.

It stands, in the Heb. Bible, between Hos and Am., who are usually spoken of as the earliest “writing prophets.” It is true that, in the LXX, the order is different, viz. Hos, Am., Mic, Joel, Ob,Jon; which may indicate that as early as the arrangement of the Canon of the Prophets there was uncertainty as to the place of Joel, Ob, and Jon, which contain no direct indication of date. But there has evidently been a regard to some chronological order, the books being arranged according to the names, and the intervals between the periods cannot be without significance that Joel has found a place so high up in the collection. The 3 inadmissibly post-Israelite books stand together at the end. If Joel is late, it must be as late as the latest of them, and the possibility of a great deal of later addition has been the greater likelihood of its date being known to the collectors. It would be a very hazardous assumption that preitical theory was not read or copied from the time of their first composition till the time they were gathered into a Canon. And, if these books were copied, surely the people who copied them took some interest in preserving the knowledge of their origin and authorship.

In this connection, attention is directed to the resemblances to the Book of Am before which Joel stands. These are regarded by Reuss as favoring the early date. That large and beautiful passage with which the Book of Am opens dwells upon the thought that the threatenings, which had formerly been uttered against the nations, are about to receive their fulfilment, and that Jehovah could not take back His word. Now it is just such a threatening that fills the last part of the Book of Joel. Indeed Amos begins his book with the very phrase in which J. opens his closing address, “Hear ye the word of Jehovah, you children of Jacob; and let my prayer be heard.” Joel, however, in unmistakable speech, rather than J. in the plural, says: “He that is, Jehovah, has put a mark between the children of Jacob and all the nations upon the day of Jehovah the God of hosts.” (Am 1:2; Joel 4:16). At the end of Am the happy fertility of Canaan is described in similar terms to those in Joel (Am 9:13; Joel 1:16). Reuss, moreover, draws attention to the remarkable expression found in Joel, and also in modified terms, in two Prophets of the Assyrian period: “Beat your plow-shares into swords, and your pruning-hooks into spears,” says J. (2:10), whereas we have the cycle in Isa 2:4 and 3:1-4, and in the LXX of 2 Cor 6:7, “Ye have taken their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning-hooks.” Ex. 9:23, “I will send a rain of blood, and a fire out of the sky, and a scorching wind.” Also, the prophet says: “Hinder the rain . . . . when there were yet three months to the harvest,” and smitten them with blasting and mildew and the palmer worm (Am 4:7-9); and all this is the more striking because J. represents the distress of his day as unprecedented in magnitude.

To all this, advocates of the late date reply that we cannot determine the date of a book by its place in the Canon; for that the collectors were guided by other considerations. As to the resemblance to Am, it may have been on the strength of these very resemblances that the Book of Joel, bearing no date in itself, was placed beside that of Am. Moreover, it is maintained, as we shall see presently, that J. has resemblances to Am, but never confidedly of late date, proving that he was acquainted with writings of a very late time.

(2) Language and style.—Another argument for an early date is based upon the purity of the language and style of the book. The book is written in what may be described as classical Heb, and shows no trace of decadence of language. It is no doubt true that the Hebrew style is the man; as is strikingly illustrated in the very different styles of Amos and Hosea, who were practically contemporaneous; so that arguments of this kind are precarious. Still, it is to be noted, that though there is nothing archaic in the style of Joel, neither is there anything archaic in the style of Amos. Without the exclusion of Joel, we have our earliest example of written prophecy.

The advocates of the very late date reply that the style of J. is too good to be archaic; and that his admittedly classic style is to be explained by the supposition that, living at a late date, he was a diligent student of earlier prophetic lit., and molded his style upon the classical.

(3) Quotations.—Here, therefore, must be mentioned an argument much relied upon by the advocates of a very late date. It is said that there are so many resemblances in thought and expression to the O.T. books that it is probable that so many writers posterior to the early date claimed for Joel should have quoted from this little book or expanded thoughts contained in it. A very elaborate comparison of J. with late writers has been made by Holzinger in ZATW, 1889, 89-131; his line of argument, while early writers might doubtless have written as the poet in the Renaissance imitating older models, the resemblances to others known to be late, such as Jer, Ezk, II Isa, Pss, Neh, Ch, etc., cannot be so explained if Joel is taken to be early. The principal passages in question are given in the Cambridge Bible for Schools and Colleges, “Book of Joel,” by Professor Driver, who also takes the view that Joel is late.

The list is perhaps, so formidable as its length would imply. Both writers confess that from several of the passages no conclusion of any value can be drawn, and that there is always a difficulty in determining priority when similarities in diction and arrangement are ascribed to two different writers, as if they might have been commonplaces of the prophetic lit.; and, if it was possible for a very late writer to quote from so many antecedent writings, it was as possible and much easier for a number of late writers to go back to the very earliest prophetical esp. if their words were memorable and germinal. We have heard of the man who objected to Shakespeare because he was full of quotations; and there is perhaps not a line of Gray’s “Elegy” that has not been quoted somewhere, while some of his lines have become household words. But the strongest objection to this argument is this: if Joel had the minute acquaintance with antecedent writers and followed them so closely as is implied, he not only varies from them in essential particulars, but falls below them, as we shall see, in his anticipations of the future.

(4) Situation.—We have now to look at features of a more concrete and tangible character, which promise to give more positive results. It is mainly with the situation and immediate outlook of the prophet are not only consistent with the late date but preclude any prexilian date altogether. The elements of the argument are these: Whereas all the prophets before the downfall of Samaria (722 BC), and even Jeremiah and Ezekiel, mention the Northern Kingdom, it is not once named or referred to in Joel; for the occurrence of the name “Israel” in 2: 27; 3: 2-16 cannot support this sense. Judah and Jerusalem fill our prophet’s actual horizon (2: 1-2; 3: 6.16 f. 20); no king is mentioned or implied, but the elders with the priests seem to be the prominent and ruling class. Further, the temple and its worship are central (1: 14; 2: 15 f) and so important that the cutting off of the meal offering and drink offering is tantamount to national ruin (1: 9; 13.16; 2: 14). Again, there is no mention of the prevailing sins of prexilian times, the high places with their corrupt worship, or indeed of any specific sin for which the people were to be punished. At the same time, while fasting and mourning on sackcloth seem to have a special virtue. All the circumstances, it is held, conform exactly to the time of the post-exilian temple and to no other time. The Northern Kingdom was no more, there was no king in Jerusalem, or, if there were, of the line of Solomon, the center of prestige of national life, its ritual the pledge and guarantee of God’s presence and favor; the period of legalism had set in. It is confidently averred that at no period prior to the régime inaugurated by Ezra and Nehemiah was there such a conjunction of circumstances.

(a) Political: In reply, it is urged in favor of the early date that there was a period in prexilian times when such a situation existed, viz. the early years of the reign of Joash, when that prince was still an infant; for Jehoiada the priest actually took practical power as regent after the death of Athaliah, 836 BC (2 K 11 1-17). This would sufficiently account for the absence of mention of a king in the book. At such a time the priesthood must have yielded a prominence to which the ritual would have overshadowed the palace in importance. The omission of the Northern Kingdom may be accounted for by the fact that at that time the two kingdoms were on friendly terms; for the two royal houses were connected by marriage, and the kingdoms were in alliance (2 K 3 6 ff; 8 28 ff). Or the omission may have no more significance than the fact that J. was concerned with an immediate and near present distress and had no occasion to mention the Northern Kingdom. To draw conclusions from such silence, it may be observed that throughout the first 5 chapters of Isa, larger in bulk than the whole Book of Joel, only Judah and Jerusalem are mentioned, and, even if it should be doubted whether at any time, either before or after the exile, such a condition prevailed. The post-exilian prophets certainly knew of sins in their time, sins, too, which restrained the rain and blasted the wine and oil and corn (Hag 1 11). For all that J. says on the subject, the condition of things implicit is as consistent with the time of Jehoiada as with that of Nehemiah. And what shall we say of Isaiah’s positive description of the condition of Jerusalem before his time: “the faithful city, whose right is that was full of justicive righteousness lodged in her” (Isa 1 21)? When was this uttered?

“I will restore thy judges as at the first, and thy counsellors as at the beginning: afterward thou shalt be called the city of righteousness, a faithful city.” Higher praise could scarcely be bestowed, and there is nothing in the Book of Joel to imply that he assumed so much.

(c) Ritualistic: Too much has been made of the references to ritual, as if they necessarily implied a post-exilian date. It is not legitimate here to assume that the idea of centralization of worship originated in Josiah’s days, and that the priestly legislation is post-exilian. The mention of “old men” or “elders” is no such indication. Wellhausen himself maintains that the expression everywhere in Joel means nothing other than old men; and, even if it had an official connotation, the official elders are an old tribal institution in Israel. It may be noted here again that in the first 5 chapters of Isa elders also are mentioned, and more indubitably in an official sense, although this is not so in the book of Joel; and even if it had an official connotation, the official elders are an old tribal institution in Israel. noted by the phrases in the legal codes, and was evidently on the footing of such observances as are common and instinctive at all times and among all persons (Gen 20:18; 1 Sam 27:6; 2 Sam 1:12; Judg 3:3). The prohibition of lying on one's own blood 'Tehin' has not enjoyed to lie all night in sackcloth (1 Sam 13:13). Or what, prescription in any code requires young and old, bridegroom and bride, to press together into the temple (2 Sam 17)? And why should not any or all of these things have been in the face of a sudden emergency threatening the ruin of an agricultural people? Moreover, J., so far from ascribing virtue to these outward marks of humiliation in a legalistic spirit, immediately after mentioning them says: "Render your hearts, and not your garments, and turn unto Jeh your God" (2 K 13).

The only ritual references are to the meal offering and the drink offering (8:13; 2 K 14), and these were not characteristically post-exilian. Indeed, they may be regarded as primitive forms of offering, the produce of the ground without which, among an agricultural people, we can hardly imagine a system of offerings to exist. They are both ancient. Amos regards the meal offering as well known (5:22. 25). The meal offering of Amos: and citations of speaking of its absence ( Isa 1:13). And though the noun for drink offering is not mentioned in the older prophets, Hosea knows the related vb. and the act of pouring out wine to the Lord ( Hos 9:4), and it is clear either that the people who performed the act and had no name for the offering itself. Moreover, in an undisputed passage (2 K 13:13.15), both offerings are mentioned in the time of Ahas. As for the contention that our prophet regards the offerings of this period as not important that the cessation of them would be fatal, if our interpretation of 8:13 above be correct, the earlier date would be much more appropriate. It was not because the offering threatened to cease, but because the thing offered threatened to be cut off, that J., was so perturbed. The popular view as to the relation of Jeh to His land was ancient, and had a foundation of truth; and in fact Hosea's teaching would fitly follow and complete that of Joel. Finally it is to be said that J.'s fine forecast of the outpouring of the Spirit, and of the universal extension of prophetic activity is as far removed as possible from the "legalistic" tendency that set in after the exile. And if the argument from silence is of any force, then evidently a very important thing that in a book of post-exilian times, there should be no mention of prince or governor, or even of high priest.

(5) Foreign nations mentioned or omitted.—Allusions to foreign nations, or the absence of allusion, would obviously promise to afford indications of the time of the prophet; and yet here also the allusions have been added in support of either of the divergent dates. The facts here are as follows: In the first two chapters, when the Lord speaks of the "northern" army (2:20), which some refer to the Assyrians, while others explain it of a northern army in late or apocalyptic time. In ch. 3, however, when the prophet is speaking of "those days" and "that time" in the future, when the Lord shall bring back the captivity of Judah and Jerus., there is to be a gathering of "all nations" in the valley of Jehoshaphat (3:11); and later on "all the nations" are summoned to appear in the same valley for judgment. (Ob 1:14) It is clear that the word "all" is used in a wider sense than in the earlier chapters; and the "regions of Philistia" are specially reproved (ver 4) because they have carried into their temples the sacred treasures, and have sold the children of Judah and Jerus unto the "sons of the Grecians" (ver 6); in recompense for which their sons and daughters are to be sold into the hand of the children of Judah, that they may remain there for a time or far off (ver 8). Finally, at the close (vs 19f), "Egypt shall be a desolation, and Edom shall be a desolate wilderness, for the violence done to the children of Judah, because they have shed innocent blood in their land in their midst."

It is acknowledged, that on either hypothesis, there are difficulties in accounting for the presence or absence of names of foreign nations in this presentation. Those who advocate the late date point with confidence to the silence as to the kingdom of the ten tribes, or to the kingdom of Damascus, which, on their hypothesis, had passed away, and the equally significant silence as to Assyria, which had long ago been superseded by the Bab and Pers empires of the East. As to the mention of Tyre and Sidon and the coasts of Philistia (3:4-6), Driver says: "The particular occasion referred to by J. must remain uncertain: but the Phoenicians continued to act as slave-dealers long after the age of the prophetic J. (see Jastrow's "Jeh," J. of the east," better a later time, when Syrian slaves were in request in Greece" (Cambridge Bible, "Joel," 17). The same writer says on 3:19: "There is so little that is specific in what is said in this verse with reference to the Phoenicians, that it may be probably named (at a time when the Assyrians and Chaldaeans had alike ceased to be formidable to Judah) as typical examples of countries hostile to the Jews." It is pointed out, moreover, that the events of the Edom war was particularly manifest at a late period when Jerus was destroyed by the Chaldaeans, and that this was remembered and resented long afterward (Ob vs 10-16; Ezek 25:12 ff; 35; Ps 137:7).

On the hypothesis of the early date, it is urged that there was no occasion to refer to the Northern Kingdom. If it was friendly, the inclusive name of Israel for the whole people was sufficient to denote this, and that it was not hostile in the early days of Joash has already been pointed out. As to Damascus, it was not till the last years of the reign of Joash that Hazael showed hostility to Jerus (2 K 13:17); and danger from Assyria had not yet emerged, and appears only faintly in the reign (3:11; is 1:14). It is probable that history records how, in the reign of Jehoram, the grandfather of Joash, "Edom revolted from under the hand of Judah, and made a king over themselves" (2 K 6:20; 2 Ch 21:5), and the historian adds that the revolt continued "unto this day." It may well have been that in such a revolt the resident Judaeans in the land of Edom suffered the violence referred to in 3:19. Moreover, the Chronicler mentions that, in the same reign, "Jeh and Philistia carried up against Judah, and" (1 K 14:29) the Philistines and the Arabians that are beside the Ethiopians: and they came up against Judah, and brake into it, and carried away all the substance that was found in the king's house, and his sons also, and his wives," etc (2 Ch 21:16 f). This might be what is referred to in 3:4-6. If the royal family were carried away there would most probably be a deportation of other prisoners, who, taken by the seaborde Philis, would, through the great maritime power of the day, be sold in Egypt. And here it is pointed out that Joash singles out the very nations mentioned by J.: Philis, Tyre and Sidon and Edom, and reproaches them with offences such as J. specifies (Am 1:6-12). And then, it is added, if the book is an late one, Nehemiah, why is nothing said of Samaritans, Moabites, Ammonites, who showed such marked hostility in his days (Neh...)}
2 19; 4 7; 6 1)? For Ezekiel also, from whom it is supposed J. derived his reference to the Edomites, mentioned Edomites and Ammonites as hostile to Israel (Ezk 25 1–11). And why is not a word said of the Babylonians, at whose hands Israel had suffered so much? So strongly, indeed, are these objections felt by Reuss, that he declares that, should the view of the late origin come to be finally accepted as the more probable, he would decide for a date after the Pers domination, i.e. subsequent to 322 BC. For, he says, the names of peoples introduced at the end of the book, Phoenicians, Egyptians, Philis, Edomites, must surely in some way have had an actual significance for the author, who cannot out of caprice have passed over Syrians, Assyrians, Chaldaeans, and Persians. Accordingly, if we are to have nothing to do with the pre-Assyr period, we must come down to the late Selucid and Ptolemaean dynasties whose hostile collisions with Judaea were certainly involved in severe trouble. But then, how are we to account for the position of Joel so high up in the collection of prophetical writers? For, on this supposition, we should expect his book to be placed in the third division of the Canon.

(6) Some notable expressions.—There remain to be noticed some significant expressions which have a bearing on the question of date and, at first sight, seem to indicate a late origin. And yet there is a difficulty. For there is no doubt that our familiarity with the details of the great downfall of the Jewish state leads us to think of the destruction of Jerusalem when we read of the captivity or scattering of the people.

There is, however, a saying in the Talm that a greater distress makes a lesser one forgotten; and the question is whether there may not have been national experiences at an earlier time to which such expressions might be applicable; or, in other words, how early such phrases were coined and became current.

Joel: "Bring back the captivity". There is, first of all, uncertainty as to the origin of the phrase "bring back the captivity." Some connect the word "captivity" (יוֹרֵעַ, šĕbh'ūth, יֹרֵעַ, šĕbh'ūth) with the vb. "to take captive" (יוֹרֵעُ, šŏbhab), while others make it the cognate noun of the vb. "to return" (יוֹרֵע, šōbhab), with which it stands connected in the phrase "bring back the captivity of Judah and Jerusalem" (3 1). In the former case the reference would be to the return of captives taken in war, or the return of exiles from captivity, and that view has led to the tr in our VS. On the latter view, the expression would mean the restoration of prosperity, of which use we have an unquestioned example in the passage: "Jehovah shall bring back the captivity of Job" (Job 42 10). We can conceive either of the views to have been the original, and either to be quite early. A main feature of early warfare was the carrying away of prisoners, and the return of such captives was equivalent to a restoration of prosperity. Or again, the relief from any illness or trouble might be expressed by saying that there was a restoration, as e.g. in Scotland a sick person is said to have "got the turn." As to the significance of the phrase in Joel, J. is probably to be deemed the "captivity of Joel" (3 1). In the time of Hezekiah, the ambassadors of Sennacherib delivered their taunting message, which is described as reproaching the living God (2 K 19 4). It was the method of ancient warfare, as is seen in the boasting of Goliath; for it is the same word that is used in that narrative, though rendered in our VS "defy" (1 S 17 10.25f. 36). And, if we read between the lines of the historical books, we shall see how common was this habit of "defying" or "reproaching," and how sensitive the people were to it (e.g. 1 K 20 21.5.f.13. 28). All this is anterior to the earliest possible date of J., and proves that, at an early time, there was a consciousness in Israel that the fortunes of the people were bound up with the honor of the national God. It is noted out by the author of the early part of the book, for when he is concerned with the drought and locust, that J. uses this expression.

(7) "Strangers passing through": Toward the close of the book it is predicted that, in the time of final glory, strangers shall no longer go in and out of Jerusalem (3 17). This again would certainly be applicable to a late time, after the land had suffered... many hostile invasions. Yet it can well be understood how a prophet at a very early period, thinking of the glorification of Zion, should imagine a state in which no "stranger" or foreigner should have a footing on the sacred soil, and Israel should dwell in solitary and preeminent exclusiveness. If so, it was of a more primitive kind than the late date would suggest, esp. if we postulate a prophet who had deeply studied earlier prophets, to whom Jerusalem was the religious metropolis of the world, and Zion the place to which all the nations of the earth would come (Isa 11:11; Mal 4:5). So far as it bears upon the date of Joel the question is: How does his usage compare with those of the other prophets? We find that he uses the expression twice in connection with the visitation (Eccl 1:33-34; and Lam 3:38-39) and the outpouring of the Spirit (2:31), and once again near the close of the book (3:14). Now, in regard to the earliest occurrences, it will be perceived that J is on a lower plane than succeeding prophets. He anticipates the day of the Lord with a heavy visitation upon material nature, precisely as the simple Oriental of the present day, on the occurrence of an eclipse, or at a visitation of locusts or pestilence, begins to talk of the end of the world. And, as a sort of poetical drama, in the mind of the prophetic writer the horizon wider, at the close of the book, is to be remarked that the highest point attained is the conception of the day of the Lord as the deliverance of Zion. At this point J is not a hint of that day being a time of testing and sifting of Israel itself, as in Amos and elsewhere (Am 5:18-20; Isa 2:12). In fact, so far is he from going beyond the other prophets in his conception, that we may say J leaves the matter at the point where Amos takes it up.

In view of all these perplexing questions, Professor Ad. Merx has written a most suggestive book, Die Propheten des Jeremias und die Ausleger von den antiken Zeiten (1879), a work devoted to the question of the typologies of the prophetic book. In a very able exposition of the passage, he endeavored to show that there is an underlying typology in the Book of Joel, and that it is a sequel to the Book of Ezekiel, as extending down to the Second Temple. In the succeeding chapters, he attempts to show that Joel is a sequel to the Book of Ezekiel, as extending down to the Second Temple. kield and Jeremiah, he has nothing to say of the inclusion of Gideon in the destruction of Israel, but contemplates the final destruction of all Israel's enemies. If he is a contemporary of Malachi or later, he is less legalistic than that prophet; and whereas in Mal we see the beginning of the fading away of prophecy, J. looks for the time when the Spirit shall be poured out on all flesh, and the sobs and daughters shall prophesy (2:28).
