AN

OLD TESTAMENT COMMENTARY

FOR

ENGLISH READERS.
AN OLD TESTAMENT COMMENTARY FOR ENGLISH READERS.

BY VARIOUS WRITERS.

EDITED BY CHARLES JOHN ELLEICOTT, D.D.

LORD BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

VOL. I.

"WHATSOEVER THINGS WERE WRITTEN AFORETIME WERE WRITTEN FOR OUR LEARNING, THAT THROUGH PATIENCE AND THROUGH COMFORT OF THE SCRIPTURES WE MIGHT HAVE HOPE."

CASSELL, PETTER, GALPIN & CO.

LONDON, PARIS & NEW YORK.

[ALL RIGHTS RESERVED.]

1882.
Genesis.

BY

THE VERY REV. R. PAYNE SMITH, D.D., Dean of Canterbury.

Exodus.

BY

THE REV. GEORGE RAWLINSON, M.A., Canon of Canterbury Cathedral, and Camden Professor of Ancient History in the University of Oxford.

Leviticus.

BY

THE REV. C. D. GINSBURG, LL.D.

Numbers.

BY

THE REV. C. J. ELLIOTT, M.A.,
Hon. Canon of Christ Church.
CONTENTS

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Section</th>
<th>Page</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Preface</td>
<td>vii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>General Introduction</td>
<td>xiii</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Introduction to the Pentateuch</td>
<td>xxv</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Introduction to Genesis</td>
<td>3</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Genesis</td>
<td>11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Excursus on Notes to Genesis</td>
<td>176</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Introduction to Exodus</td>
<td>187</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Exodus</td>
<td>192</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Additional Notes to Exodus</td>
<td>334</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Introduction to Leviticus</td>
<td>341</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Leviticus</td>
<td>343</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Introduction to Numbers</td>
<td>475</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Numbers</td>
<td>485</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
PREFACE.

The present Commentary on the Old Testament, of which the First Volume is now placed before the reader, is based on the same principles, and designed for the same class of readers, as the companion Commentary on the New Testament.

In the Preface to that Work, the general aims and objects of the Commentary were set forth with some fulness. It was stated that the Commentary was designed for that large and increasing class of cultivated English readers who, believing the Holy Scriptures not only to contain God's Word, but to be God's Word, do earnestly desire to realise that Word, and to be assisted in applying it to their own spiritual needs, and to the general circumstances and context of daily life around them.

It was further stated that its object was also to meet some of the deep needs of the present time, especially of that large, and—as we fear it must again be said—increasing class of readers, who are conscious that chilling doubts have crept into the soul, and that modern criticism has seemed to them to make it doubtful whether Scripture is what it claims to be; not merely a truthful record of God's dealings with man, but a power to make man wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus. For these, and for such as these, it was stated that much that would be put forward in the Notes, and especially the manner in which it would be put forward, would be found especially helpful. Difficulties would be fairly met; removed where they could be removed; left, simply and frankly, where it did not appear that God had yet vouchsafed to us the means of doing more than modifying them, or reducing their gravity and magnitude.

These were the two great objects of the Commentary on the New Testament—to bring home to the believing the life and power of God's Word, and to set forth the truth of that Word to those whose belief had become shaken or impaired. And these are the two great objects of the present Commentary; but, as the very nature of the subject-matter will necessitate, in somewhat altered aspects and proportions. First, for this obvious reason, that while we unhesitatingly maintain with Origen* that the whole of the Sacred Scriptures make up one perfectly adjusted "instrument of God," we nevertheless recognise with that great teacher that the perfect harmony of the blessed instrument is due to the accordant diversity of the sounds. Though the Old Testament and the New Testament are the Word of the same Spirit, though their general end and object are one, yet, as Hooker† clearly points out, there is this momentous difference, that the Old Testament did make wise by teaching salvation through Christ that should come, the New Testament by teaching that Christ the Saviour is come. Secondly, because the difficulties connected with the Old Testament are much more serious than those connected with the New Testament, and must, by the nature of the case, occupy more of the special attention of the interpreter.

The main difficulties connected with the Old Testament may briefly be summed up as scientific,

---

* Origen, Comment. in Matt. v. 9 (Fragm.), Vol. III., p. 241 (ed. Delarue).
† Hooker, Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity, Book I., chap. xiv. 4.
historical, and moral—all of which, in their turn, are constantly presenting themselves to the interpreter, and, at the very least, demand of him something more than mere passing notice and recognition.

The scientific difficulties mostly connect themselves with the narrative of the emergence of the world and of the totality of things around us, and with the place which man holds in the order and system of nature of which we have more immediate cognisance. The origination of the human race, its antiquity, its dispersions, and its developments, are all subjects which are forced upon the attention of the candid interpreter, and which must be dealt with, even in the necessarily circumscribed limits of a commentary, with distinctness and candour. The day for the so-called reconciliations of Scripture and Science, or, in other words, for wide assumptions as to the statements of Scripture, and shallow and superficial answers to inferences drawn from real or supposed discoveries, has now passed away. The interpreter is now remanded to the simple and holy words into which tradition, or imperfect knowledge, may have imported a meaning which they never were intended to bear. He is reminded, ere he attempts either defence or reconciliation, that his duty is to set forth in clearness and truth that and that only which, by the ordinary principles of human thought and of human language, the words on which he is meditating really express; and when he has done this, he is bidden to remember that it is also his duty not to recognise as truths of science what as yet are no more than working hypotheses, nor to invest with the high character of established theories, brilliant generalisations which are still regarded by eminent men of science as, at best, only partially verified. The duty of the faithful interpreter is to set forth the apparent meaning of that which lies before him with all candour, breadth, and simplicity; to be severely truthful, and to wait. The disclosures of science are as yet only partial and fragmentary. Their drift and tendency, however, indisputably lead us to this conviction, that, with fuller knowledge, much that at present prevents our fully realising the harmony between the revelation of God in the book of Nature, and the revelation of God in His own inspired Word, will entirely pass away. We must, then, often be content to wait. He that has sent the dream will, in His own good time, send the interpretation thereof.

We do not disguise that there are difficulties; we do not deny that there are subjects, such, for instance, as the antiquity of the human race, in regard of which our first impressions derived from Scripture do not appear to be coincident with some of the results of modern discovery. These things we deny not. But this, on the other hand, we assert with unchanging confidence, that by very far the greater portion of the so-called opposition between Religion and Science is due to bias, preconception, and literalism, on one side, and, on the other side, to an elevation, often studiously antagonistic, of plausible hypothesis into the higher domain of universally received and established theory.

Scarce less in magnitude and importance are the numerous historical difficulties which present themselves in the inspired narrative, whether as connected with supposed discrepancies with generally accepted secular history, or as presented by what are claimed to be ascertained facts as to the early origination of the human race, or as ipso facto forced upon the modern reader by the inherent improbabilities of the story. This last-mentioned class of difficulties is, it need hardly be said, always connected with the miraculous portions of the narrative, and more especially with the presence of miracles when appearing in what would seem to be ordinary human history. In the earlier books of Scripture, this form of difficulty is not felt to be so trying to the faith. In the youth of the world many things seem admissible, which at a later period seem startling and incongruous. The presence of the supernatural may be felt to be partially explicable in the case of the one portion of the narrative, but inexplicable in the case of the other. The age of the miraculous is assumed to have passed away, and its startling recurrence in the ordinary stream of human history, in the narratives of wars, or the annals of established kingdoms, often raises uneasy feelings in the minds of really earnest and religious readers—feelings which, at a time such as the present, may be entertained far more widely than we may, at first sight, be disposed to admit.

Difficulties such as these must, it is plain, often traverse the path of an interpreter; and it will be found by the readers of this Commentary that they have been neither evaded nor ignored. In regard of the first two forms of historical difficulty, it may be observed that the remarkable additions to the records of ancient history that have been disclosed within the present generation, and the still more remarkable documents that relate to what may not improperly be called a pre-historic period, will be found to have been used soberly and critically, wheresoever their testimony might be judged to be available. It will be found also that they are of the highest evidential importance. Not only do they supply the interpreter with hitherto undiscovered demonstrations of the faithfulness and truth of the inspired record, where it might otherwise have seemed most open to criticism, but even suggest inferences as to the early migrations and settlements of the great human family, which are shadowed forth in the brief and mainly genealogical notices of the opening chapters of Holy Scripture. Just as true science, apart from mere speculative inferences or unverified hypotheses, has of late been permitted, in many striking discoveries, to bear its testimony to the Divine truth of the earliest pages of the world's history, so has recent archaeology been enabled to throw a light upon the pages that follow it. Nay, even in regard to the grave difficulty connected with the presence of the supernatural and miraculous in the current of what might be deemed ordinary national history, even in this respect recent historical research has indirectly ministered light and reassurance. It has shown that in numerous details the holy narrative is now proved to be in strict accordance with independent secular history; and in showing this, it suggests the important consideration that if Scriptural statements are thus to be relied on in one portion of the narrative, there is at least a presumption of a very high order that they deserve to be believed and relied upon in the other. And the more so, when it is borne in mind that the narrative of Holy Scripture is the record of the providential government of the world rather than of the events and issues of merely human history. These combined considerations will go far, in any candid mind, to alleviate the doubts that may have arisen from the presence of the miraculous, where experience might have seemed to suggest that it was due only to the misconceptions or credulity of the writer.

The moral difficulties connected with the details of many events that come before us in the Old Testament are not lightly to be passed over. They can, however, only properly be dealt with in connection with the whole narrative of which they form a part. Still, this may be said generally, that while, on the one hand, each portion of the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament presents to us, faithfully and truthfully, the morality and civilisation of the age to which that portion refers, there is, on the other hand, plainly to be traced a Divine working by which the standard is persistently raised both in the individual and in the nation. The preparatio evangelica was continuous and progressive; the passage from the days of comparative ignorance to those in which the blessed teaching of the Sermon on the Mount was proclaimed in the ears of men, was by steady gradation and providential advance. There was no period in which, whether in regard of spoken word or entailed consequence, God left Himself without a witness: but the testimony of each witness became fuller and clearer as the centuries rolled onward; and as the time drew nigh when the mystery of salvation was to be fully disclosed to the children of men, the light shone forth clearer and clearer even unto the perfect day.

This broad consideration, which will be illustrated in numerous instances in the Notes of the present volume, and of those that will follow it, will be found to go far to remove the greater part of the moral difficulties of the Old Testament. Individual cases, in which there may seem to have been a positive Divine command to do that which, on the principles of the New Testament, must be condemned and forbidden, will still remain, and must be dealt with in their proper places, and with all the circumstances of their true historical connection. Even, however, in regard of these, this general remark may rightly be made, that the command and the contemporary moral estimate of the act commanded can never be dissociated by any equitable thinker, and that the recognition of this simple fact will certainly modify, if it does not completely remove, some of the greater difficulties connected with the subject.*
PREFACE.

Such are the three main classes of difficulties which from time to time present themselves to the earnest student of the Old Testament. They differ in many important particulars from the difficulties connected with the New Testament, and are, we fear, seriously felt by many who accept without any conscious hesitation the broader outlines of Christianity. Thus felt, and thus admitted into the general current of thought, they contribute to that silent and often unconscious depreciation of the Divine authority of the Old Testament, which is certainly disclosing itself in our own times, even among those who might claim to be considered religiously-minded readers and thinkers. To such as these—and their number, it is to be feared, is yearly increasing—this Commentary will be found to supply a help that is sorely needed, and that is likely, by the very manner in which that help is offered, to exercise a permanently good effect on those who may seek for it. As in the Commentary on the New Testament, difficulties are fairly met. Where a full answer to the questions that may arise can distinctly be given, it is given; where only such reasonable considerations can be urged as qualify the force of objections, and suggest, though they may not as yet completely supply, the true explanation, there the limited state of our present knowledge, and so of our power of wholly removing the difficulty, is placed clearly before the reader; where, as in the case of numerical statements and other and similar details, starting objections at once present themselves, there the possibility, and even likelihood, of transcriptional errors is pointed out, and the statement left as it has come down to us—still needing elucidation, but, as the whole aspect of recent discovery warrants us in believing, in due time fully to receive it.

But here, as was done in the case of the Commentary on the New Testament, it is proper to state with all distinctness, that though the truth is so dear to the writers of this Commentary that they have never allowed themselves to set forth explanations in which they themselves have not the fullest confidence, no one is, for one moment, to expect to find any traces of unfixed or vacillating opinions as to the true nature and authority of this portion of God's Holy Word. As was said in the Preface to the Commentary on the New Testament, so may it be said with equal force here, that each member of our present company knows on Whom and in What he has trusted, and is persuaded, with all that deep conviction which the study of this blessed Book ever bears to the humble and reverent, that heavenly truth is present in every part and portion, even though he himself may not be able to set it forth in all its brightness. This, it is plainly avowed, is the presumption and prejudicium under which the work of the interpreter has been done throughout this Commentary. That presumption, however, has never interfered with the most exact discharge of the duty of the faithful interpreter; nay—for truth will bear any investigation—it has even encouraged and enhanced it.

But it is far indeed from the sole aim of this Commentary to remove or attenuate the difficulties that are to be found in the Old Testament. No; as in the Notes on the New Testament, so here, it has been the main object of the writers to bring the blessed teaching of the Sacred Volume home to the heart and soul of the reader; to show how He that was to come is the guiding light, the quickening principle, the mystic secret of the long ages of preparation; how history typified, and rite foreshadowed, and prophesy foretold; how, in a word, salvation is the orient light under which all the mysteries of the Old Dispensation become clear and intelligible.

* See Mozley, Lectures on the Old Testament, Lect. X., p. 236 seq.

Especially is it our hope that some momentous truths in relation to the Old Testament will be found to have been brought out with fresh force and perspicuity, and that not so much by isolated notes or special disquisitions, as by the whole tone and tenor of the Commentary. There was never a time when this was more needed. It is not now merely by outward fees that the Divine authority of the Old Testament is impugned and its teaching invalidated; Christians are now being taught by Christians to regard the history of the Old Testament as no more than the strange annals of an ancient people, that have no more instruction for us than the histories of the nations among whom they dwelt. Nay, more, the very moral scope and bearing of that Law, from which it has been said that "one jot or tittle shall in no wise pass away till all things be accomplished," is boldly called in question in the very precincts of Christian controversy. It is well, then, that the simple and earnest reader should have within reach a Commentary professedly plain, popular, and uncontroversial, which by the very tenor of its interpretation, and the reverent candour of its discussion, should assist in maintaining in the foreground those broad truths relative to the Old Dispensation which it is the especial care of modern criticism to keep out of sight and to ignore. We allude more particularly to these three great truths: First, that the history of the Old Testament is not merely the history of an ancient nation, but the history of a nation that was, as it were, the church of humanity, and in which and through which dawned the true future and true hope of mankind; secondly, that the Divine government of that nation, and the law to which it was to be subordinated, are to be estimated, not by the isolated consideration of individual facts or commands, but by the scope, purpose, and final issues of that law and that government which history incontrovertibly discloses; and lastly, and almost inferentially, that the revelation which God vouchsafed to His chosen people, and partially, through them, to the widespread nations of the earth, was progressive and gradual, and that the Old Testament is the record of the long preparation of mankind for that for which every true heart in every age had dimly longed for—redemption and salvation through Jesus Christ.

These three great truths, the first of which was felt, especially in the later days, by the very Jews themselves,* will be presented to the reader in constantly recurring aspects and with every variety of illustration. Though but seldom definitely formulated, though felt rather than enunciated, they will, nevertheless, be found to form the sort of spiritual warp and woof of the Commentary, and to give life and continuity to the interpretation. They will be seen to be what they are—not principles previously agreed upon, not personal preconceptions persistently maintained, but great and fundamental truths, which the inspired Word itself discloses, and which become patent through the medium of faithful and appreciative interpretation.

Such is our Commentary. It now only remains necessary to make a very few comments on those details of the responsible work which may seem to require it.

In regard of the learned and able body of men who have, to the great advantage of the student, consented to take part in this Commentary, the same general remark may be made that was made in the Preface to the Commentary on the New Testament, viz., that each writer is responsible for his own notes and his own interpretation. It has been the care of the Editor to help each writer, so far as he had power to do so, to set forth his interpretation with clearness and precision. No attempt has been made, where similar ground has been passed over by two independent writers, to bring about any conventional uniformity of comment or interpretation. The tenour and context of each passage—and it is rare indeed that the tenour and context of two passages are exactly alike—have been regarded as those elements which each writer must be considered utterly free to use as conditioning the details of interpretation. The result may be, here and there, some trivial differences in the subordinate features of the interpretation, yet only such differences as help to bring out what may ultimately be regarded as the closest approximation to the true facts of the case. In many passages it is from this sort of concordia discors that the real meaning is most clearly ascertained. In these and all similar details it has been the especial care of the Editor so to place himself in the same point of view with each writer, as to supply most effectively assistance where it might seem to be needed, and, in offering suggestions or proposing alterations, to do so with a due regard to the position deliberately taken up by the writer. Reconsideration has, from time to time, been suggested; but where such reconsideration has seemed to the writer to confirm him in his original view, there that view has never been interfered with.

* See Note on Leviticus, chap. xx. 26.

As in the case of the New Testament, an Introduction has been prefixed to each portion, in which the general tenour of the inspired writing, and those details which might help to set it forth most clearly to the reader, are specified with as much fulness as the nature of this Commentary will permit. Where, also, the subject-matter has seemed to require it, an Excursus has been appended to the Notes for the purpose of helping the more critical reader, and supplying a detail that could not be given elsewhere consistently with the general character of the Work. It has never been forgotten that this Commentary is popular in its general aspect, and designed for the English reader rather than for the professed scholar. Modern controversies, therefore, and the subtler criticisms to which portions of Holy Scripture, especially the prophetical portions, have recently been subjected, are treated broadly and generally, and more with reference to the results arrived at than to the procedure by which those results were obtained. Detailed investigations of hyper-critical objections, or elaborate confutations of theories which common sense or common honesty seems to predispose us at once to repudiate, would obviously be out of place in this Commentary. Nothing, however, has been kept back from the reader. All opposing statements that seem to be of any weight whatever are candidly set forth, and plainly answered whenever and wheresoever the material for a conclusive answer has been found to exist. That difficulties will in part still remain may be frankly conceded; but even in regard of them this remark may certainly be made—that it is the plain tendency of modern historical discovery to attenuate or remove them.

The broad purpose and the structure of the Notes remain the same as in the Commentary on the New Testament. Exegetical details, linguistic discussions, and the refutations of competing interpretations, are, for the most part, if not entirely, avoided; while, on the other hand, all those more general considerations which seem likely to bring home the sacred words more closely to the heart of the reader, are set forth with as much fulness as our limits will allow. Scripture faithfully interpreted is the best evidence for the truth of Scripture, and on that defence no anxious soul has ever rested in vain.

We now (for I well know that my dear brethren and associates would desire to be joined with me in this closing paragraph) humbly commit this work to Almighty God, praying earnestly and devoutly that it may be permitted to set forth the truth of the living Oracles of God, and may minister to the deeper adoration of Him who spake through patriarchs and prophets, the Holy and Eternal Spirit, to whom, with the Father and the Son, be all glory for evermore.

C. J. GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.
GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

I. The Problem to be Solved.—It is not altogether an easy task to write an introduction to the Old Testament as a whole which shall not trench on the province of those who have to deal with the several books of which it is composed. Questions as to the date and authorship of those books must obviously be reserved for a later and fuller discussion, or be answered only provisionally. What is now proposed accordingly is to deal with the volume which we know by that name, as containing all that has come down to us from the time of Moses to that of Malachi (or, perhaps, later), of the literature of the Israelites; to trace the growth of that literature in the several stages of its expansion; to note the process by which, after the return of the Jews from Babylon, the work of gathering up the fragments that remained ended, to use a suggestive phrase, in the "survival of the fittest," and to point out the gradual growth and crystallisation of the idea that the books so collected, the library thus formed, had an authoritative completeness, which was not to be impaired either by addition or diminution, and formed, in the language of a later time, the Canon* of the Holy Scriptures. That inquiry being completed, with the subsidiary points which present themselves for discussion as to the order, titles, and classification of the books, there will remain the further question how it came to pass that other books, known as those of the Apocrypha, or as deuterocanonical, came to be added to the list, and to meet with a wide, though not an universal, acceptance. Lastly, there will come the inquiry as to the influence of the new revelation which we connect with the name of Christ upon the thoughts and language of mankind in relation to the books that were the authoritative documents of the old revelation. A short notice of the versions in which for long centuries they were chiefly studied, and of the materials which were at hand when the desire to go back to the original sources of knowledge prompted scholars and theologians to study the sacred books of Israel in the Hebrew which was the speech of Israel's noblest days, and lastly of the several attempts which have been made to reproduce them in our English speech, will complete our survey of the subject.

II. The Literature of the Patriarchal Age.—Whether there were any written records in the earliest age of that people, in the period commonly known as the patriarchal, is a question on which we cannot speak with certainty. We have no Hebrew inscriptions of that period, and the Moabite Stone, with its records of the reign of Mesha, a contemporary of Abah, is, perhaps, the earliest record in any cognate alphabet. Egypt, however, had, at that time, its hieroglyphics, and Assyria its cuneiform characters. Coming as Abraham did from Ur of the Chaldees, and sojourning in Egypt, as the honoured chieftain of a tribe, he may well have appropriated some elements of the culture with which he came in contact. The purchase of the cave of Machpelah (Gen. xxiii. 17—20) implies a documentary contract, and the record of the conveyance bears a strong resemblance to the agreements of like nature which we find in the old inscriptions of Nineveh, and the Hittite capital, Carchemish (Records of the Past, i. 157; ix. 91; xi. 99). The commerce of the Midianites (Gen. xxxvii. 23) would scarcely have been carried on without written accounts. If the name of Kirjath Sepher (City of Scribes, or Book-city—Josh. xv. 15, 16; Judges i. 11, 12) could be traced so far back it would prove that there was a class of scribes, or a city already famous for its library. The episode of the invasion of the cities of the plain by the four kings of the East (Gen. xiv.) has the character of an extract from some older chronicle. The "book of the generations of Adam" (Gen. v.) and other like genealogical documents, tribal, national, or ethnological (Gen. x., xi. 10—32; xxii. 20—24; xxv. 1—4; xxxvi.), indicate a like origin. The Book of Job is, perhaps, too doubtful in its date to furnish conclusive evidence, but if not pre-Mosaic it, at least, represents fairly the culture and the thought of a patriarchal age, outside the direct influences of Mosaic institutions, and there the wish of the sufferer that his words might be "printed in a book" (Job xix. 23); that his adversary had "written a book," i.e., that his accuser had formulated an indictment (Job xxxii. 35), shows the use of writing in judicial proceedings. On the whole, then, it seems probable that when Jacob and his descendants settled in the land of Goshen they had with them at least the elements of a literature, including annals, genealogies, and traditions of tribal history, together with fragments of ancient poems, like the song of Lamach (Gen. iv. 23, 24) and the blessing of Jacob (Gen. xlix.). The Book of Genesis was probably composed largely out of the documents that were thus preserved.

III. Literature of Israel at the Time of the Exodus.—At the time of the exodus from Egypt there can be little doubt that Israel had its historiographers and its poets, as well as its framers and transcribers of laws. Without entering into disputed questions as to the authorship or editorship of books, it can scarcely admit of doubt that the song of Moses, in Exod. xv., has the ring of a hymn of victory written at the time; that at least the first section of the Law (Exod. xx.—xxiii.) dates from the earliest dawn of Israel's history; that the genealogies and marching orders of Num. i., ii., x., and xxvi., and the record of the offerings of the several tribes in Num. vii. and viii., and of the encampments of the wandering in Num. xxxiii., are contemporary records. Incidental notices indicate the process by which these records were made, and there is no reason to suppose that they are the out-growth of a later age. After the defeat of the

* The word means primarily, it may be noted, a reed or measuring rod, and thus passes into the figurative sense of a standard or rule. So we have the canons of art, of ethics, and of grammar. The canons passed by Councils were rules for worship or action. The canons (canonis) of cathedral or collegiate churches were men bound by a fixed rule of life. This word is first applied to Scripture by Amphibouochus (A.D. 320) and Jerome. Canonical books are those admitted into the Canon, as the rule or standard of Truth.
Amalekites, Moses is commanded to "write it for a memorial in the book" (Heb.), which was to contain the mighty acts of the Lord (Exod. xvii. 14). After the first instalment of legislation, he wrote all the words of the Law in the sanctuary, and had a blank space in which additions might be made from time to time as occasion might require. In addition to these traces of records, partly historical and partly legislative, we have extracts from other books now lost, which indicate the existence of a wider literature, the well-digging song of Num. xxi. 17, 18, the hymn of victory over the Amorites, commemorating their early victories over Moab (Num. xxi. 27, 28), both probably taken from the "Book of the Wars of the Lord" (Num. xxii. 14), which seems to have been the lyric record of the achievements which the historians narrated in prose. On the whole, then, there would seem to be ample grounds for believing that on their entry into the land of Canaan the Israelites brought with them, not indeed the whole Pentateuch in its present form, but many documents that are now incorporated with it, and which served as a nucleus for the work of future compilers.

IV. Hebrew Literature under the Judges.

The period that followed the settlement of the Israelites in Canaan was not favourable to the growth of what we call literature. A population half-pastoral and half-agricultural, with few cities of any size, and struggling for existence under repeated invasions, had not the leisure out of which literary culture grows. In the list of conquered kings, however (Josh. xii.), and in the record of the division of the lands, which forms, as it were, the Doomsday Book of Israel (Josh. xiii.—xxi.), we have documents that bear every trace of contemporary origin, and show that the work of the annalist had not ceased. The Book of the Wars of the Lord apparently found a successor in a collection of heroic legends (presumably in the same book, just or upright), from which extracts are given in Josh. x. 13 and 2 Sam. 1. 18, and may have been the unrecognised source of many of the more poetical elements of history that now appear in the Pentateuch. The mention of those who "handled the pen of the writer" in the song of Deborah (Judges v. 14) might suggest at first, like the name of Kirjath-Sepher, the thought of a recognised class of scribes, but scholars are agreed that the words should be translated as "those that wield the rod of the ruler;" and it is obvious that, except as registering the muster-rolls or chronicling achievements, such a class could have found no place in Deborah's song of triumph. That song itself, with the stamp of originality and contemporaneity impressed on every line, shows that among the women of Israel the gendemen that had shown its self-far are agreed part taken by female singers in triumphal processions (Judges xvi. 94; 1 Sam. xviii. 7) and in funeral lamentations (2 Sam. i. 24; Jer. xxii. 18), each of which called for words appropriate to the occasion, naturally tended to the development of this form of culture, and in the song of Hannah (1 Sam. ii. 1—10) we may probably trace its influence, intermingled with that of the higher inspiration of the moment.

V. The Schools of the Prophets.—With the institution of the schools of the prophets traditionally ascribed to Samuel, the culture of Israel advanced as by leaps and strides. They were to its civilisation, if not to its religion, what to the ancient history, what the Orphic brotherhoods and the Homeric dithyrambs of Greece—what universities and cathedrals and monasteries were to that of mediaeval Europe. Their work of worship, uniting as it did both song and music, developed into the Book of Psalms which we retain, and into the lost art of Hebrew music of which the titles to the psalms (e.g., Neginoth, Nichloth, Sheminith, Gittith, Muthlabben, &c.) present so many traces. The language of unmediated praise in which their work apparently began, though even then not without a certain order (1 Sam. x. 5; xix. 20), passed before long first into the more deliberate work of the reporter, and afterwards into that of a man who sits down to compose a hymn. A like process, we cannot doubt, went on with the preaching which formed another part of the prophet's work. In the earlier days the prophet comes and goes and speaks his message, and leaves but the scantiest records, as probably in the record of the work of the "angel" (better "messenger") of the Lord in Judges ii. 1; v. 23; and in the words of Jehovah, which must have come from some human lips, in x. 11. In the second stage, in that of the schools of the prophets, he utters, as throughout the history of Samuel, Elijah, and Elisha, what he has to say in the presence of his disciples, and they take down his words, but the prophet himself is a preacher rather than a writer. In the third the prophet is himself the author, either writing with his own hand (Isa. viii. 1) or employing still the help of an amanuensis (Jer. xxxvi. 1—4). In this way we may trace to the schools of the prophets, as to a fountain-head, a large portion of the Psalms and of the prophetic books of the Old Testament. It was natural under the conditions in which they lived that their influence should spread to the hereditary caste of the tribe of Levi, who had been set apart for the ministrations of worship. The founder of the prophetic schools, himself a Levite, formed a link between the two, and from the days of Heman, Assaph, and Jeduthun (1 Chron. vi. 33; xv. 16—22. 41; xxv. 1—3) under David, to those of the sons of Korah under Jehoshaphat and Hezekiah (2 Chron. xx. 19), the Levites appear to have furnished their full complement of men of ability, and of their number is described in one memorable passage as belonging to the functions of a prophet (1 Chron. xxv. 3). The fact that David himself had been trained in those schools—that from earliest youth (1 Sam. xvi. 17—23) to extreme old age (2 Sam. xxiii. 1—7) his life was illumined with the stars at once of prophecy and of verse, made his advent to the throne the golden time of Hebrew literature. The king was known not only as the conquering and the ruler, but as the "sweet psalmist of Israel," and every form of composition found in him at once a master and a patron. The consciousness of national life which was thus developed, found expression, as it has always done, in the analogues stages of the growth of other nations, in the form of history. Men felt that they had at once a future and a past. One man felt besides all that was new about him, to which he may be added another to record the events in which he and his fathers had actually been sharers. There were the formal official annals, the Books of the "Chronicles," the work, probably, for the most part of the priests, and therefore dwelling largely on the organisation of the Temple, and the changes made during periods of religious reformation under the kings of Judah and Israel. And besides these we have traces of a copious literature.
GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

Chiefly the work of prophets, and therefore viewing the history of the people from the prophet's standpoint of faith in a righteous order working through the history of the nation, such as has been described above, in the books of Nathan the prophet and Gad the seer (1 Chron. xxix. 29); the book of the Acts of Solomon (1 Kings xi. 41); the prophecy of Ahijah the Shilonite (2 Chron. ix. 29); the visions of Iddo the seer (ibid.); the prophecy of Jonah, not found in the book that bears his name (2 Kings xiv. 23); the book of Shemariah the prophet (2 Chron. xii. 15); of Iddo the seer, concerning genealogies (ibid.), and a third book by the same writer (2 Chron. xiii. 22); the book of Jehu the son of Hanani (2 Chron. xx. 34); the acts of Uzziah and Hezekiah, by Isaiah, the son of Amoz (2 Chron. xxvi. 22; xxvii. 32); and the lamentations of Jeremiah for Josiah (2 Chron. xxxv. 23).

Working side by side with each other, and taking each a wider range than the mere register of events which was the work of the "recorder" of the king's court (2 Sam. viii. 16; Isaiah xxxvi. 22), the priests and the prophets, the same man often uniting both characters, laid the foundations of the historical literature of Israel, as the monks did of the history of medieval Europe. In addition to their work as preaching the word of Jehovah they left their impress on the music and psalmody of the people, on its battle-songs and laments, and delighted to trace out the sequence of events in the history of the people as indicating the conditions of true greatness and the fulfilment, more or less complete, of the laws of a righteous government.

VI. The Wisdom-literature of Israel.—The accession of Solomon opened yet another region of culture. The world of nature—from the cedar of Lebanon to the hyssop on the wall (1 Kings iv. 33), the apes and peacocks from the far East, the gold and precious stones from Ophir, the tin that came from Tarshish (Spain)—presented objects for a natural, almost for a scientific, curiosity, which led to registering phenomena, and inquiring into their causes. Contact with nations of other races and creeds, a wider experience of the chances and changes of human life, led to the growth of an ethical wisdom which, after the manner of the East, embodied itself in the form of proverbial maxims. Here also we have traces of a far wider literature than that which now remains with us. But a comparatively small portion of the "three thousand" proverbs of Solomon survives in the book which bears that title (1 Kings iv. 33), that book including also (1) a collection of maxims that was made in the reign of Hezekiah (Prov. xxv.—xxvii.), and proverbs, apparently from the wisdom of other countries, that bear the names of Agur and of Lemuel (Prov. xxx. 1; xxxi. 1). To this period and these influences we may probably assign also, if not the authorship, yet the appearance in the literature of Israel of the grand drama which we know as the Book of Job, dealing with the problem of man's life and the moral government of God from another standpoint than that of the Mosaic Law, and the poem, also dramatic in form, and portraying, at least in its outer framework, the working of human love and its triumph over many obstacles, which we know as the Song of Solomon.†

VII. The Law Forgotten.—So far the literature that thus grew up was in harmony with the faith in Israel, but its wider and more cosmopolitan character tended to a greater laxity; and it would seem that in course of time there came to be a natural conflict between the new literature and the old, as there was between the worship of Jehovah, as the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob; and that of Moloch and Chemosh, of Baal and Ashtarto, which formed one of the perks of this wider culture, and to which kings like Solomon, Ahaz, and Manasseh gave a wrongful preference. The case of the Book of the Law of the Lord, in whatever form it then existed, fell into comparative oblivion. The reformation under Jehoshaphat brought it again into a temporary prominence (2 Chron. xvii. 9), and it is natural to assume that a devout king like Hezekiah cultivating as he did both the psalmody and the sapiential literature which were identified with the faith of Israel (Prov. xxv. 1), and guided by a teacher like Isaiah, would not be neglectful of the older book (or books) which was the groundwork of both. The long reign of Manasseh, however, did its work alike of destruction and suppression; and when the Book of the Law of the Lord was discovered in some secret recess in the Temple during the progress of Josiah's reformation (2 Kings xxii. 8; 2 Chron. xxxiv. 14), it burst upon the people, with its warnings and its woes, with the startling terrors of an unknown portent. What that book was, is one of the problems which must be reserved for discussion in its proper place in the course of this Commentary. It may have been the whole Pentateuch as we now have it, or, as the prominence given to its prophecies of evil might indicate, the Book of Deuteronomy, as the work of Moses, or, as the hider criticism of our time has suggested, the work of a contemporary who, confident that he was reproducing the mind of Moses, that the spirit of the lawgiver was speaking through him, did not hesitate to assume his character and speak as in his name, as at a later date, certainly in the Book of Wisdom, and possibly also in Ecclesiastes, the teachers of wisdom spoke with no fraudulent animus in the name of Solomon.

VIII. The Literature of the Northern Kingdom.—It lies in the nature of the case that we have fuller materials for tracing the history of Hebrew literature in the kingdom of Judah than in that of Israel. The culture of the northern kingdom was of a lower type. The apostasy of Jeroboam alienated from the outset the priests and Levites, who supplied the chief materials of a lamenters' class, and the "lowest of the people" (1 Kings xii. 31), who were made priests of the high places, and of the calves of Bethel and of Dan, were not likely to supply its place. But here also, it must be remembered, there were official historiographers attached to the royal court, schools of the prophets which, under the guidance of Elijah and Elisha, maintained the worship of Jehovah as hymn-writers and as preachers, writers of songs for the courts of princes and of nobles of a far other character than that of the songs of Zion (Amos vi. 5; viii. 10), probably even a literature as profligate and as sceptical as that of the European Renaissance (Hosea viii. 12; ix. 9, 10). The conquest of the kingdom of Israel by the Assyrians, the events which we sum up, as the captivity of the Ten Tribes, swept off alike the good and the evil elements of that literature. If, as in the case of some of the Psalms (probably, e.g., Ps. lxxx.) and the writings of prophets like Hosea and Amos, whose lives and work were east in the northern kingdom, some of it has survived, it was probably because the remnant of Ephraim that was left refuge in † Ecclesiastes, though purporting to be the work of Solomon, belongs, in the judgment of most recent critics, to a later date, and is therefore not mentioned in the text as belonging to the Rabbinic literature.

GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

Judah (2 Chron. xxx. 18) at a time when Hezekiah was carefully gathering up (as we have seen in the case of the Book of Proverbs) all fragments that remained of the older and nobler literature of the people, that nothing might be lost.

IX. The Babylonian Exile.—The capture of Jerusalem by the Chaldeans under Nebuchadnezzar must have wrought a like destruction in Judah or Jerusalem. The royal library of Jerusalem, of which we possibly find a trace as suggesting the 'symbolism of the house of wisdom with its "seven pillars" ' (comp. Prov. ix. 1), must have perished in the flames, as that of Alexandria, at a later period, did under Omar, and with it much that would have thrown light on the history and religion of Israel has passed away, never to be recovered. All, however, was not lost. The most precious books were, as in all ages, not those that were only on the shelves of a public library, but those that were treasured up by individual men as the guides and counsellors of their life. The priests, Levites, prophets, and psalmists of Israel, carried with them into Babylon the books which they held most sacred. They were known to have with them the "songs of Zion" (Ps. cxlvii. 3), and were expected to sing them at the bidding of their conquerors. A priest-prophet, like Ezekiel, may well have had with him the Book of the Law to which he appeals (Ezek. v. 6; xx. 11), the documents which served as the basis of his ideal realisation of the Holy Land, of Jerusalem, and of the Temple (Ezek. xi.—xlvii.,). A scribe like Baruch, over and above his work as committing to writing the prophecies of his master Jeremiah (Jer. xxxvi. 32), was not likely to be unmindful of the books which, like Deuteronomy and some of the earlier prophets, formed the basis of that master's teaching. A prince like Daniel, "skillful in all wisdom, and cunning in knowledge, and understanding science" (Dan. i. 4), must, in the nature of the case, have been trained in the books in which the wisdom of his people was cushioned (Dan. vi. 5; ix. 13). To the influence of these three men at the beginning of the captivity it was, we may believe, due that the Jewish exiles did not shrink into a degraded and unlettered caste, that they preserved what they could of the sacred books of their fathers, now more precious to them than ever. Under their training or, at least, with the memory of their work ever before his eyes, grew up the man whose relation to those books is absolutely unique.

X. The Work of Ezra.—Round the name of Ezra there has gathered much that is obviously legendary and fantastic; but the traditions, wild as they are, are such as cluster round the memory of a great man, and indicate the character of his work. To him, according to these legends, it was given to dictate, as by a special inspiration, all the sacred books that had been destroyed by fire and perished from the memories of men (2 Esdr. xiv. 21, 44; Iren. adx. Hær. iii. 21, 2; Tertull. de Cult. Faæm. i. 3). He had, besides, dictated to an esoteric circle of disciples seventy other books of a mystic and apocalyptic character (2 Esdr. xiv. 46). He was the president of the Great Synagogue, which included every notable name of the period, and to which the traditions of later rabbis assigned the whole work of the restoration of religion at Jerusalem, the institution of synagogues, the settlement by authority of something like a canon of books that were to be accounted sacred (art. Synagogue, Great, in Smith's Dict. of Bible). In the more authentic records his work is naturally confined within narrower limits, but it lies in the same direction. He brings the people together on his return to Jerusalem, and has the Book of the Law read to them publicly (Neh. viii. 1—5), and appoints interpreters to expound its meaning (Neh. viii. 8) and cause the hearers "to understand the reading." It is an open question whether their work was confined to reading from the older Hebrew into the later Aramaic, which became the vulgar tongue of the Jews, or extended to a paraphrase of the text, such as afterwards took shape in the books known as Targums (interpretations or paraphrases). In any case the work of Ezra, as the restorer of the religion of Israel, must have been one of immense importance. To him, with scarcely a shadow of a doubt, we owe the preservation of the books which we now have as the anthology of a wide literature, the Reliquiae Sacrae of the older days of Israel, probably the completion out of many documents of the Books of Kings and Chronicles, one from the prophetic, the other from the priestly standpoint: one dealing generally with the history of both Israel and Judah, as the record of the Divine government of the people; the other more fully with that of Judah only.

XI. Completion of the Old Testament Canon.—As yet, however, we do not find, except in relation to the Book of the Law, the idea of a closed Canon, to which no addition could rightfully be made. Not to speak of the writings which belong to Ezra's own period, and in some of which he probably took part as compiler, editor, or writer, the Books of Ezra and Nehemiah, the prophecies of Haggai and Zechariah, the psalm of the Babylonian exiles (Ps. cxlvii.), the Books of Kings and Chronicles, we have, of later date, the history of Esther and the prophecy of Malachi. In the judgment of many scholars, the Book of Daniel belongs wholly or in part to the time of the Maccabees, and some of the Psalms are ascribed by not a few critics to the same period. The authorship of Ecclesiastes has been brought by some critics as low as the reign of Ptolemy Philopator, by others even to that of Herod the Great. In regard to the last-named book there are traces of a dispute among the rabbis whether it was or was not to be admitted among the sacred books (see Ecclesiastes in the Cambridge School Bible, p. 27), and the same holds good (the difficulty in each case arising out of the contents of the book) of the Song of Solomon. The discussion ended, however, in the recognition of their claims, and at the time when the history of the New Testament opens it may fairly be assumed that, for the Jews of Palestine at least, the books of the Old Testament were as we now have them,* and were known as being emphatically the Scriptures (Matt. xxi. 42; xxii. 29; Luke xxiv. 27, 32), the holy writings (2 Tim. iii. 15). They were divided popularly into the Law and the Prophets (Matt. xi. 15; xxii. 40; Acts xviii. 15), or more fully into the Law, the Prophets, and the Psalms (Luke xxiv. 44). Traces of a like classification are found in the preface to the apocryphal Book of Ecclesiasticus, where we read more vaguely of the "law, the prophets and the other books." Upon these the rabbis, first of Jerusalem and afterwards of Tiberias and Babylon, concentrated their labours, which bore fruit in the Targumim and Midrashim;

---

* So Josephus (c. Apion, 1, 9) enumerates (1) the five books of Moses, (2) the thirteen Prophets, in which the Minor Prophets are reckoned as a single book, and the historical books treated as apocryphal, and (3) four books containing traditions of life. The last group would seem to imply the non-recognition of one of the Hagiographa, probably Ecclesiastes, or the Song of Solomon. A list framed according to our present Canon would give five such books.
the first being of the nature of simple paraphrases, intermingled, as regards those of the later books of the Old Testament, with much legendary matter; and the Midrashim, or commentaries, which collect the often discordant expositions that had been given orally by the rabbis. The writings thus revered served as the basis of Jewish education, and were read in the synagogues of Palestine (Acts xvi. 21). Under these the Christ, as man, increased in wisdom and knowledge. These were the ultimate standard of appeal for Apostles and evangelists. The argument of St. Paul in 2 Cor. iii. 14, and of the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews (chap. viii. 13; ix. 15), fixed, for Christians at least, on the books thus collected the title of the Old Covenant, the Old Testament, as distinguished from the New.

XII. Jewish Classification of the Old Testament Books.—At a later date, probably in the ninth century after Christ, from the serices of the Masora (= Tradition — i.e., the text as it had been handed down) or revised text of the sacred books, the sacred books received a new and more complete classification, which is retained in all existing copies, written or printed, of the Hebrew text, as follows:—

(1) The Torah, or Law, including the books of the Pentateuch, the title of each being taken from its opening words —

(a) Breshith ("In the beginning") = Genesis.
(b) Velle Sh'moth ("Now these are the names") = Exodus.
(c) Vayikra ("And he called") = Leviticus.
(d) B'Midbar ("In the wilderness") = Numbers.
(e) D'varim ("The words") = Deuteronomy.

(2) The Prophets, subdivided thus:—

(a) Elder
   (i) Joshua.
   (ii) Judges.
   (1) and (2) Samuel.
   (1) and (2) Kings.
(b) Later.
   (i) Isaiah.
   (ii) Jeremiah.
   (iii) Ezekiel.
(c) Lesser. The twelve Minor Prophets.

(3) The K'thufim ("Writings"), subdivided as follows:—

(a) Psalms,* Proverbs.
    Job.
    Ruth.
    Lamentations.
    Ecclesiastes.
    Esther.
    Song of Songs.
    Daniel.
    Ezra.
    Nehemiah.
    1 and 2 Chronicles.

In part the principle of this classification is natural enough, but it presents some peculiarities. (1) The fact that five books so dissimilar in character were grouped together under the title of Megillot finds a possible explanation in the survival of some doubts, such as we have seen in the case of Ecclesiastes and the Song of Songs, as to their full Canonical authority; perhaps also in the reverence for the mystical meaning of the number five, shown also in the arrangement of the Pentateuch and the Psalms.* (2) The position of Daniel, as separated from the other prophets, may possibly have had a like origin, the doubt in this case being strengthened for the later rabbis by the use made by Christians of its Messianic predictions.

XIII. The Work of the Masoretic Scribes.—In addition to this work of classification, the Masoretic scribes (1) carefully revised the text, copying what they found in MSS. of authority, even where they judged it faulty, under the title of the "K'thib", or text to be written, while they wrote in the margin what seemed to them a preferable reading as the "Q'r", or text to be uttered, when the passage was read aloud. (2) They introduced an elaborate system of subdivisions: (a) the Pentateuch was divided into 54 Parashioth, or sections, the number being chosen so as to divide a lesson for synagogue use on each Sabbath of the Jewish intercalary year; this division had probably been in use from the time when the Torah was first publicly read in the synagogues (Acts xvi. 21); (b) the prophets in like manner were divided into the same number of sections, known in this case as Hopharoth; (c) throughout the whole of the Hebrew Canons there ran a more minute division into Pesukim, or verses, for convenience of reference in writing or preaching. These were reproduced in the edition of the Latin Vulgate, printed by Stephens in 1555, were adopted by the translators of the Geneva Bible in 1560, and afterwards appeared in the Bishops' Bible of 1568, and the Authorised version of 1611. The division into Parashioth and Hopharoth, being adapted entirely for synagogue use (Acts xii. 15), has naturally never gained acceptance in the Christian Church, and for many centuries the Law and the Prophets were written without any subdivision, till circ. A.D. 1240, when Cardinal Hugh de St. Cler divided each book into sections of convenient length which, combined, as above stated, with the Hebrew Pesukim, gave us our familiar chapter and verse arrangement. It may be added that the first Hebrew Bible was printed at Soncino in a.d. 1477, just in time to serve as the basis first of Latin, Frankish, and afterwards, in varying degrees, of the successive English versions. It is true of the Church and people of England that they have received the books of the Old Testament from the fountain-head of what became known in the Reformation controversies by the almost technical term of "Hebrew verity." The careful revision of the text between the sixth and the ninth centuries after Christ by the Masoretic scribes, and the scrupulous exactness of most Jewish copyists, have minimised the chances of variation in the text, and the result of the collation of MSS. of the Old Testament presents in this respect a marked contrast to that of a like process in dealing with the MSS. of the New.

XIV. The LXX. Version of the Old Testament.—We must not forget, however, that for many

* The liturgical use of the Megillot as read, each book being read as a whole, on appointed days, may have helped to determine the arrangement. The order was as follows:—(1) The Song of Solomon on the eighth day of the Feast of the Passover, (2) Ruth on the second day of Pentecost, (3) Lamentations on the ninth day of the month Abib, (4) Ecclesiastes on the third day of the Feast of Tabernacles, (5) Esther on the Feast of Purim. (Delitzsch on Isaiah, p. 3. Eng. translation.)
ceuties the influence of the Old Testament in the Christian Church was chiefly exercised through the medium of two versions, each of which calls for a brief notice. And (1) there is the Greek version, commonly known as the Septuagint, and referred to more briefly as the LXX. The name has its origin in a narrative more or less legendary which has come down to us bearing the name of Aristaeus, who writes as an Alexander, Jew.* Pathym Philadelphi, King of Egypt (b.C. 277), it was said, wished to enrich his library with a translation of the religious books of the Jews, who formed an important section of the population of his kingdom. With this view he wrote to the high priest of the Temple at Jerusalem requesting him to send competent translators. Seventy-two scribes of repute, six from each of the twelve tribes, were accordingly despatched. They were received by the king on their arrival at Alexandria with every mark of honour, and separate chambers were assigned to them, in which each, apart from the others and with no communication with them, was to execute his task. They worked for seventy-two days, and when they met to compare the results of their labours it was found, according to a later form of the legend preserved by Irenæus (iii. 24), but not in the narrative of Aristaeus, that they had all agreed verbatim et literation in the same version. The result was ascribed to the guidance of an immediate inspiration, and the book was accordingly received as having a Divine authority equal to that of the original. Over and above the introduction into this story of a supernatural element working contrary to the analogy of God’s general method in revealing His will and wisdom to mankind, there are obviously many elements of improbability. It is not certain that the Hebrew Canon of Scripture was at this time definitely settled. The narrative has a suspicious likeness to the legend already referred to, that Ezra had, from memory, or by inspiration, reproduced the whole of that Canon in its completeness. The volume now known includes many writings which are not in that Canon, and some of which are confessedly of later date. The authority of the version was never acknowledged by the Jews of Palestine. To them this translation of the sacred books into the language of the heathen seemed an act of sacrilege, a sin as great as the worship of the golden calf. They appointed a day of fasting and humiliation to be annually for this profanation, as they did for the destruction and desecration of the Temple. (Walton’s Paradigm, May 27.) Passing from legendary history to the safer region of reasonable conjecture, what probably occurred was this. The Jews, who had settled in Alexandria in great numbers, and who occupied, as they did afterwards at Rome, a distinct quarter of the city, learnt to speak and think in Greek. They lost their familiarity with the ancient Hebrew, and with the Aramaic of the Targums. They wanted to read their sacred books both privately and in their synagogues in what was now their own language. The action of Ezra and his successors in paraphrasing or translating those books seemed to give a sanction to the principle of translation. The five books of the Law, soon coming to be regarded as a single yet five-fold volume, and therefore known as the Pentateuch, were, as being read in the synagogues every Sabbath, the first to be translated, and were followed in the course of the Prophets in the wider sense in which that name was employed in the Hebrew classification. The K’libim, now known to the Alexandrian Jews by the Greek equivalent of Hagiographa, or Holy Writings, were, as far as we can judge, the last to come under the translator’s hands. It is probable enough that copies of the translation were placed in the royal library at Alexandria, and this served as a starting-point for the legend of Aristaeus. The want which was thus met at Alexandria was felt wherever the Jews, known as Hellenists or Greek-speaking Jews, were settled. In the third century, in Asia, Greece, or Italy. Even in Palestine itself Greek was freely spoken, and there were many synagogues at Jerusalem, as we see in Acts vi. 9, consisting entirely of these Hellenists. The natural result was that there also the LXX. version found acceptance with all but the more bigoted and prejudiced rabbis, who, as we have seen, anathematized it. Its texts were freely quoted, we cannot doubt, in the disputes between St. Stephen and his opponents in those Hellenistic synagogues (Acts vi. 9). Even St. Paul, though a Hebrew of the Hebrews, habitually used and quoted it. It served as the groundwork of religious education of Jewish children like Timotheus (2 Tim. iii. 15), who were growing up in heathen cities. It may have been familiar even to our Lord and to His Galilean disciples.

It would be out of place to enter here into any detailed discussion of the merits of the LXX. version as a translation. It is not without the defects which attach in greater or less measure to all human workmanship. Sometimes, after the manner of the Targum, it gives a paraphrase instead of a translation, toning down strong expressions, and removing difficulties. Sometimes it mistakes the meaning of the Hebrew, or appears to have been based upon a different text from that which the Masoretic scribes have handed down to us. Sometimes, notably in the history of Jeroboam, and in some chapters of Daniel, as in Bel and the Dragon, and the History of Susannah and the Elders, and in some of the headings of the Psalms, it inserts what is not now found in the Hebrew text. In the case of Jeremiah the whole arrangement of chapters differs from that of the Hebrew. What is yet more noteworthy, it treats the Hebrew Canon as one which was not yet closed, and includes in the same volume, and with no note of inferiority, books which are not found in it, and which are represented by what we now know as the Apocrypha;* and, these books being intermingled with the others, the order of the books is different from that of the Hebrews.

XV. The Apocrypha.—The Alexandrian Jews, it is clear, looked on the Hebrew books as a Bibliotheca Sacra, a library of the sacred literature of their nation, and did not hesitate, as occasion offered, to place, as it were, on the shelves of that library what seemed to them precious, either as recording the dealings of God and with His people, as in 1 Esdras, Tobit, Judith, 1 and 2 Maccabees, or the utterances of the wise of heart, whether pseudonymous, like the Wisdom of Solomon, or compilations with the name of the editor, like the Wisdom of the Son of Sirach (Ecclesiasticus), or devotional fragments like the Prayer of Manasseh, which is found in some, though not in all, MSS. of the LXX. It is, of course, open to question how far they were right in exercising this freedom at

* The word, which primarily means “hidden” or “secret,” was broadly applied in the first instance to books that claimed, like those alluded to in 2 Esdr. xiv. 44, a mysterious and esoteric character. When these came to be looked on as of questionable authority, the word was used, with a touch of sarcasm, as equivalent to “spurious.” Another and less natural exclamation is that the name was given to books to which it was applied not, like the Canonical books, read publicly in the church, but privately and in secret.
all; how far they were wise in the use they made of it. The fact that they inserted all the books of the Hebrew Canon is, at all events, valuable as a testimony to the authority of the older Scriptures, and they can claim, as those of the Apocryphal books cannot, the consensus alike of the Hebrew and Hellenistic Jews. It might have been well, indeed, to have acknowledged their higher prerogative by placing them, as Protestant churches have done, in a separate group, as standing in this respect on a lower level. On the other hand, we owe to this action of the LXX. translators the preservation of whatever was most valuable in the literature of Judaism between the close of the Old Testament and the beginning of the New, and are thus able to trace the continuous education that was preparing the way for the higher revelation which was made known to men in Christ.

XVI. The Apocrypha in the Eastern Church.—The absence of any earlier MSS. of the LXX. than those of the fourth or fifth century makes it difficult to say when the complete collection thus formed appeared as a single volume. The fact that Josephus (though, as a Greek writer, he must have been familiar with the Greek version of the sacred books, and largely uses some of the additions, as in the history of the Maccabean period) adheres, as stated above, to the Hebrew Canon when he gives a list of them, shows that he, of Palestinian birth, at once a priest and a Pharisee, did not admit the claims of the later books to stand on the same level as the earlier. The writers of the New Testament, as was also natural from their education and training, write in much the same way, never quoting the books that we know as the Apocrypha, as authoritative, or honouring them with the title of Scripture; while yet, as is shown by a comparison of the Epistle to the Hebrews with the Wisdom of Solomon, they borrow largely from their phraseology, or allude, as the writer of that epistle does, to facts recorded in their history (Heb. xi. 35), or cite, as St. James seems to do, some of their utterances of wisdom. (See St. James in the Cambridge School Bible, pp. 32, 33.) If, as many critics, from Luther onwards, have thought, Apollos was the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, it was perhaps natural that he should use the books of the Alexandrian Canon more freely than the other writings of the New Testament. It lies on the surface, however, that the New Testament writers, while recognising the supreme authority of the books of the Hebrew Canon, do not shrink from using freely books that were neither in that Canon nor the Alexandrian, and refer, e.g., to some lost version of the history of the Exodus, which contained the names of James and Jambres (2 Tim. iii. 8), to some legendary record of the dispute between Michael the archangel and Satan after the death of Moses (Jude, verse 9), and to a prophecy ascribed to Enoch (Jude verse 14) found in the book that bears his name, and which, after having been hidden and forgotten for centuries, was found by the traveller Bruce in an Ethiopian version, and has since been translated by Archbishop Laurence in 1838, and edited by various hands.

The history of the Christian Church follows mainly on the same lines. Its writers used freely all the books that belonged to the sacred literature of the Jews, whether Hebrew or Hellenistic. As the earliest MSS. of the LXX. version, such as the Sinaitic, the Vatican, and the Alexandrian, show, they recognised, as adapted for the worship of the Church, for its lessons and its sermons, the Alexandrian Canon with all its numerous additions. The Greek Church, as was natural, has continued to use it, as its only text of the Scriptures of the Old Testament. On the other hand, the more critical writers who studied Scripture in the light of history, recognised, tacitly or expressly, the difference between the Hebrew Canon and the additions. Justin Martyr (in this instance we trace the influence of his birth and training in Palestine) never quotes the latter. Melito of Sardis (cire. A.D. 160) omits them altogether, with the exception of the Wisdom of Solomon, in his catalogue of the Old Testament writings. It may be noted also that he omits the names of Nehemiah and Esther. Probably they were included under the general name of Esdras. Origen in like manner confines his list to the twenty-two books of the Hebrew Canon. The Council of Laodicea (A.D. 383), possibly under the influence of the tradition which originated with Melito, excluded all the Apocryphal books except the Epistle to Baruch, which seems to have been regarded as an integral part of the Book of Jeremiah.

XVII. The Apocrypha in the Western Church.—The history of the Latin Church runs, to a great extent, parallel with that of the Greek, in its relation to the Old Testament Canon. The early Latin Fathers, Tertullian and Cyprian, quote the Apocryphal books freely as Scripture. Augustine follows them in his general use of the books, gives a list which includes the additions, but, possibly under the influence of his great contemporary Jerome, draws a line of distinction between them and those of the Hebrew Canon, confining the adjective "Canonical" to the latter, and speaking of the others as "received by the Church, though not by the Jews," as on a lower level than "the Law, and Psalms, and the Prophets, to which the Lord bore His witness" (De Doct. Christ. ii. 8, 13). The Old Latin version, however, as made, not from the Hebrew, but from the Greek, reproduced the same books, and in the same order as we find them in the LXX.

XVIII. The Vulgate Version of the Old Testament.—With the appearance of Jerome on the scene, we find a marked difference of thought and language, though not of action. With the natural instincts of a scholar he determined to translate from the original, and not from a Greek version of it. He settled in Palestine for the completion of his great work, and learnt Hebrew from Jewish teachers. He found that their Canon was not the same as that with which he was familiar, that the books which it contained were characterised by a higher and more venerable antiquity, and had been cited, as the others had not been cited, by the writers of the New Testament, and by Christ Himself. He had the courage, accordingly, to run counter to the prevailing traditions of the Western Church, and drew a hard and fast line between the two groups of books, as standing on a different footing, and applicable to different uses. The Hebrew books alone were Canonical, the others were only "eclesiastical." The one might be used to establish a doctrine, the others (in language with which the sixth Article of the Church of England has made as familiar) were to be read only "for example of life and instruction of manners." (Prolog. Galat. Dialog. in Libros) Solomonis.) In practice, however, Jerome was content to follow on the old lines, and the Vulgate included the same books as the older version had done, and in the same order. One book, indeed, now known as the 1 Esdras of our Apocrypha, and the Prayer of Manasses, of all the Apocryphal books, was excluded by the Council of Trent from the list of Canonical books, and these have consequently disappeared from most editions of the Latin version of the Old Testament printed for the use and under the sanction of the Roman Church.*
GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

In regard to the other books of the Alexandrian Canon, however, the Council of Trent (Sess. iv.), in its antagonism to the rising criticism of the period, accepted the action rather than the teaching of Jerome, and, in stronger language than had ever been used before, declared that they were to be received with the same reverence and honour as the other Canonical books, and pronounced its anathema on all who should teach otherwise. The Reformed Churches, as might be expected, took the other line. Luther placed them in a group by themselves, and for the first time affixed to them the title of Apocrypha. The English version followed in the line of Luther, and adopted his nomenclature. In one remarkable instance, indeed, we trace a feeling of hesitation showing itself in a somewhat curious blunder. In the prefixed to Cranmer's Bible the books had been described as Apocrypha, and the usual explanation of that term had followed. In correcting the proofs, apparently, the thought had occurred to the editor that it would be better to use a more respectful title, and the word was altered, and so, when the volume was published, the reader was informed that the books “were called Hagiographa” (⇒ Holy Writings, the title commonly given to the K[ethubim of the Hebrew Canon), “because they were read not publicly, but, as it were, in secret.” That blunder, however, was not repeated, and the word Apocrypha retained its place in the printed versions of the Old Testament. In 1542, the sixth of what were then the forty-two Articles of the Church of England, deliberately adopted, in the words that have been already quoted, the distinction which Jerome had been the first to draw; and without using the term Apocrypha (its reticence in this respect is noteworthy), spoke of them as “the other books,” which were not Canonical, and therefore were not to be used “to establish any doctrine.” Practically, however, the Church of England, by appointing lessons to be read from some of the books, both in the older and, in a more limited measure, in the more recent lectionary, has treated the books in question with more honour than any other Reformed Church; and with some of her leading divines—e.g., Cosin—the term “deutero-canonical” has commended itself as more accurately describing their character than the more familiar Apocrypha.

XIX. English Versions of the Old Testament.—The history of the English translations of the Old Testament may, for our present purpose, be very briefly told. In Wycliffe's version the Old Testament was assigned to his friend and disciple Nicholas de Hereford, but the work was apparently interrupted, probably by a citation to appear before Archibishop Arundel, in A.D. 1382, and ends abruptly in the middle of the Epistle of Baruch. It was completed and revised by Richard Purvey in A.D. 1588, and was incorporated into a Latin Vulgate of marked inferiority. Jerome speaks of it with undisguised contempt. It is rarely found in MSS. of the Latin Vulgate. It, with the 1 Esdras of our Apocrypha, and the Prayer of Manasses, of all the Apocryphal books, was excluded by the Council of Trent from the list of Canonical books, and these have consequently disappeared from most editions of the Latin version of the Old Testament printed for the use and under the sanction of the Roman Church. In regard to the other books of the Alexandrian Canon, however, the Council of Trent (Sess. iv.), in its antagonism to the rising criticism of the period, accepted the action rather than the teaching of Jerome, and, in stronger language than had ever been used before, declared that they were to be received with the same reverence and honour as the other Canonical books, and pronounced its anathema on all who should teach otherwise. The Reformed Churches, as might be expected, took the other line. Luther placed them in a group by themselves, and for the first time affixed to them the title of Apocrypha. The English version followed in the line of Luther, and adopted his nomenclature. In one remarkable instance, indeed, we trace a feeling of hesitation showing itself in a somewhat curious blunder. In the prefixed to Cranmer's Bible the books had been described as Apocrypha, and the usual explanation of that term had followed. In correcting the proofs, apparently, the thought had occurred to the editor that it would be better to use a more respectful title, and the word was altered, and so, when the volume was published, the reader was informed that the books “were called Hagiographa” (⇒ Holy Writings, the title commonly given to the K[ethubim of the Hebrew Canon), “because they were read not publicly, but, as it were, in secret.” That blunder, however, was not repeated, and the word Apocrypha retained its place in the printed versions of the Old Testament. In 1542, the sixth of what were then the forty-two Articles of the Church of England, deliberately adopted, in the words that have been already quoted, the distinction which Jerome had been the first to draw; and without using the term Apocrypha (its reticence in this respect is noteworthy), spoke of them as “the other books,” which were not Canonical, and therefore were not to be used “to establish any doctrine.” Practically, however, the Church of England, by appointing lessons to be read from some of the books, both in the older and, in a more limited measure, in the more recent lectionary, has treated the books in question with more honour than any other Reformed Church; and with some of her leading divines—e.g., Cosin—the term “deutero-canonical” has commended itself as more accurately describing their character than the more familiar Apocrypha.

* In the classification of the Tridentine list of books, 1 Esdras = Ezra of the Authorised version, 2 Esdras = Nehemiah, while 3 and 4 Esdras answer to the 1 and 2 Esdras of the English Apocrypha.
GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

Baruch is placed with the Canonical books after Lamentations. Of the rest, he says that "they are placed apart," as "not held in the same rank" as the other Scriptures; but this is only because there are "dark sayings" in them, which seem to differ from the "open Scripture." He has no wish that they "should be despised or little set by." "Patience and study would show that the two were agreed."

Coverdale's version was first printed, probably at Zurich, in 1535; other editions appeared in 1537, 1539, 1550, 1553. The plural form "Biblia" appears in the title-page; possibly, however, in its later use as a singular feminine. There are no notes, no chapter-headings, no division into verses. The letters A, B, C, D, in the margin, as in the early editions of the Greek and Latin authors, are the only helps for finding places. Marginal references point to parallel passages. The Old Testament, especially in Genesis, has the attraction of wood-cuts. Each book has a table of contents prefixed to it.

In the year 1537 a large folio Bible appeared, as edited and dedicated to the king by Thomas Matthew. No one of that name appears at all prominently in the religious history of the period, and this suggests the inference that the name was pseudonymous, adopted as a veil to conceal the real translator. There is abundant evidence, internal and external, identifying this translator with John Rogers, the proto-martyr of the Marian persecution, and a friend and disciple of Tyndale. As far as the Old Testament is concerned, it seems to have been based, but with an independent study of the Hebrew, upon the previous versions of Tyndale (so far as that extended) and Coverdale. Signs of a more advanced knowledge are found in the explanations given of technical words connected with the Psalms, Neginoth, Shiggal, Shimith, &c. Ps. ii. is printed as a dialogue. The names of the Hebrew letters are prefixed to the verses in the acrostic chapters of Lamentations. Reference is made to the Chaldee paraphrase (Job vi.), to Rabbi Abraham (Job xix.), to Kimchi (Ps. iii.). After being printed abroad as far as the end of Isaiah it was taken up as a business speculation by Grafton and Whitchurch, the king's printers, and patronised by Cranmer and Cromwell. Through their influence, and probably through the fact that Rogers' name was kept in the background, it obtained, in spite of notes which were as strongly Protestant as any of Tyndale's, the king's sanction, and a copy of it was ordered to be placed in every church at the cost of the incumbent and the parishioners. It was accordingly the first Authorised version.

Taverner's version (1539), based upon "the labours of others," whom, however, he does not name, was probably undertaken in deference to the wishes of the more moderate Reformers, who were alarmed at the veneration of some of Rogers' notes, and yet wished for a more accurate version, and one more definitely based upon the original, than Coverdale's. It left no marked impress on the theology or literature of the time, and its chief interest lies perhaps in the fact that, along with the English versions of the Bible, it was the work of a layman.

In the same year as Taverner's, and coming from the same press, appeared an English version of the Bible, in a more stately folio, printed after a more costly fashion, bearing a higher name than any previous edition. The title-page is an elaborate engraving, the spirit and power of which indicate the hand of Holbein. The King, seated on his throne, is giving the Verbum Dei to the bishops and doctors, and they distribute it to the people, while bishops, doctors, and people are all joining incries of Viva Rex. It declares the book to be "truly translated after the verity of the Hebrew and Greek texts," by "divers learned men, expert in the foressaid tongues." A preface, in an edition of 1540, with the initials T.C., implies the archbishop's sanction. In a later edition (Nov. 1540) his name appears on the title-page, and the names of his coadjutors are given, Cuthbert (Tonstal), Bishop of Durham, and Nicholas (Heath), Bishop of Rochester. In the translation of the Old Testament there is, as the title-page might lead us to expect, a greater display of Hebrew than in any previous version. The books from the Pentateuch have their Hebrew names given, Bresheith ("in the beginning") for Genesis, Velt ' Sh'moth ("And the names") for Exodus, and so on. 1 and 2 Chronicles, in like manner, appear as Dibre Ha'amim ("Words of days"). The strange mistake caused by the substitution of Hagiographa for Apocrypha, for which this version is memorable, has been already noticed. The sanction given to the book, and the absence of any notes (though a marginal hand [*9] indicated an intention to supply them some day), naturally gave it a greater popularity than had been acquired by any previous version. In 1541 it appears as "authorised," to be "used and frequented" in every church in the kingdom. It was the Authorised version of the English Church till 1568, the interval of Mary's reign excepted. From it were taken most, if not all, the portions of Scripture in the Prayer Book, of 1549 and 1552. The Psalms as a whole, the quotations from Scripture in the Homilies, the sentences in the Communion Service, and some phrases elsewhere, still preserve the remembrance of it.

Cranmer's version, however, did not satisfy the more zealous Reformers. Its size made it too costly. There were no explanatory or dogmatic notes. It followed Coverdale too closely, and failed, therefore, in spite of the profession of the title-page, to represent the Hebrew of the Old Testament, or the Greek of the New. The English refugees at Geneva accordingly—among them Whittingham, Goodman, Pullain, Sampson, and Coverdale himself—undertook the task of making a new translation of the whole Bible. They entered on what they called their "great and wonderful work" with much cheer and occupation. It occupied them during the next two years. The New Testament was printed at Geneva in 1557; the whole Bible in 1560. Of all the versions prior to that of 1611 the Geneva gained the most general acceptance. Not less than eighty editions were printed between 1558 and 1611, and it kept its ground for some time even against the Authorised version. The causes of this popularity are not far to seek. The volume was, in all its editions, cheaper and more portable—a small quarto, or octavo, instead of the large folio of Cranmer's "Great Bible." It was the first version that laid aside the obsolescent black-letter, and appeared, though not in all the editions, in Roman type. It was the first which, following the Hebrew example, recognised the division into verses, so dear to preachers and to students. It was accompanied, in most of the earlier sale, by a Bible Dictionary of considerable merit. The notes were often really helpful in dealing with the difficulties of Scripture, and were looked upon as spiritual and evangelical. It was, accordingly, the version specially adopted by the great Puritan party through the whole reign of Elizabeth and far into that of James. In regard to the Old Testament it may be assumed to reproduce the exact form of Hebrew names, such as Ishak (Isaac), Jacob, and the like. The English edition, published by Barker, became popularly known as the
GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

"Breaches" Bible, from its use of that word instead of "aprons" in Gen. iii. 7. Archbishop Parker, though he had supported an application from the publisher of the Geneva Bible for a license to reprint in 1600, was not satisfied, and contemplated, as he stated at the time, "one other special Bible for the churches, to be set forth as convenient time and leisure should permit." In the mean time, he said, "if it would not be difficult, it rather do good, to have diversity of translations and readings" (Strype's Life of Parker, iii. 6). With the help, accordingly, of eight bishops, with some deans and professors, Cranmer's Bible, which was avowedly taken as the basis, was carefully revised, and the book appeared in a magnificent folio in 1568. It was adorned by portraits of Elizabeth and the Earl of Leicester, with a map of Palestine, with not a few wood engravings, with an elaborate set of genealogical tables, prepared by Speed the antiquary, under the direction of Hugh Broughton, the greatest Hebrew scholar of the century. It adopted the verse division of the Geneva Bible. Alone of all the versions it classified the books, both of the Old and New Testaments, under the headings of legal, historical, sapiential, and prophetic. Like the Geneva, it aimed at a more accurate representation of the Hebrew of Old Testament names, as, e.g., in Heva (Eve), Isiahac, Urjiah. The bulk and cost of the Bishops' Bible tended to confine its use to the churches, in all of which it was ordered to be used. It never entered into anything like a practical competition with the Geneva version.

Of the Douay version of the Old Testament, published in 1609, by Roman Catholic scholars, as the complement of the Rheims New Testament of 1582, there is not need to say much. It was based on the Vulgate, not on the Hebrew. The style was disfigured by pedantic Latinisms, and strange "ink-horn" phrases. It left no mark on the thought and language of the English people.

The history of the Authorised version of 1611 presents, in one respect, a striking contrast to the history of those which had preceded it. They had an average duration of about ten years each, and each then gave way to its successor. It has commanded the reverence and admiration of all English-speaking nations for more than two centuries and a half. Till within the last ten years no attempt even has been made at a revision. It must be admitted that it had just claims to this reverence. If it did not bear the impress of the genius of a single mind, as Tyndale's did, it was, to balance that defect, the outcome of the labours of scholars far more numerous and better qualified than had ever been joined together before for a like purpose. The list of the forty-seven members of the revising company included well-nigh every man of scholarly mark in England. Andrews, Stravia, Overal, Mead, and Barlow represented the "higher" party in the Church; Reynolds, Chaderton, and Livley that of the Puritans. Culture and scholarship unconnected with party were represented by Sir Henry Savile and John Boys. It was, perhaps, wise on the part of the revisers, with a view to the general acceptance of their work, that they confined themselves to the task of translating, and avoided the risk and responsibility of interpreting. Had they given notes after the manner of the Geneva Bible, they would certainly have offended one school of thought in their own generation, and might have laid a stumbling-block in the way of those that were to come. In that case we might have had the tremendous evil of a whole body of exegesis reflecting the Calvinism of the Synod of Dort, the absolutism of James I., the high-flying prelacy of Bancroft. As it was, they left the work of the interpreter free and unfettered for all time to come.*

In that part of their work with which we are now more immediately concerned, the version of the Old Testament, the translators of 1611 were relatively more successful than in dealing with the New. The Hebrew scholarship of the time stood on a higher footing than the Greek, and the reverence which men felt for what was known in their controversies with Rome as the "Hebrew verity" made them look to the original text as the basis of their work, caring little for the LXX, or the Vulgate. Making allowance for the inherent difficulties of their work, they succeeded in a marvellous degree in reproducing the loftiness and grandeur of the prophets and psalmists of Israel, and through that success have curdled the thoughts and language of the theological, and even of the non-theological, literature of England. They did not, however, claim priority for their work, and those who would urge that claim now on their behalf, as a bar to further revision, are unfaithful at once to their teaching and their example. It cannot be questioned that their work, excellent as it was, is yet capable of improvement. The labours of Genest, and Forst, and Ewald have given us better lexicons and grammars than those of the seventeenth century. The literature of England, and yet more of Germany, presents a vast mine of exegetical apparatus, which cannot be without an influence for good upon the work of revision. The company of revisers to whom the Old Testament has been committed represent a higher average of Semitic scholarship than that of 1611. The comparative solemnity of variations in the New text, the comparative simpli-
GENERAL INTRODUCTION.

utterances of a single mind, reflecting its various moods and phases, like the Koran, or than the proverbial maxims which represent the teaching of Confucius, or the mystic legends which make up the sacred books of Buddhism. It represents, to say the least, the life—political, religious, and literary—of a people of singular gifts, and it has sustained the life of that people through the long succession of centuries. It embodies their strivings after wisdom, their aspirations after the Eternal, their belief in a Divine order asserting itself among the disorders of mankind. It has formed the basis of a religion wider than its own, and through Christendom has perverted the thoughts and feelings of the most civilised portion of mankind. It has left its impress upon their laws, their polity, their creeds. Were it nothing more than this, it would deserve and would repay the study of any thoughtful student of the religious history of mankind. But for us it is something more, much more, than this. It has its highest outcome in the life, the teaching, the character of Christ, and of those He sent to be His apostles and evangelists. That life and character were, humanaely speaking, fashioned under its influence; they fulfilled all its dim foreshadowings and inextinguishable hopes, stamped it with the supreme sanction of His authority as a Divine revelation of the will and mind of God. It was not, indeed, a full revelation, for God "had provided some better thing for us" (Heb. xi. 40), and He who had "in sundry times and divers manners" spoken in times past to the fathers (Heb. i. 1), spake in the last days to us through the Son; but it was taken by that Son Himself as the norm and standard of His teaching (Matt. v. 17), as prophetic of His work. He testified that Law and Prophets and Psalms spake of Him (Luke xxiv. 27; John v. 39, 46), that they bore their witness to His Divine Sonship, that they prophesied, sometimes distinctly, sometimes in parables and dark sayings, of His sufferings and death and resurrection. Its sayings sustained Him in His conflict with evil (Matt. iv. 1—10; Luke iv. 1—12), in His endurance of shame and obloquy and pain (Matt. xxvii. 54; Luke xxiii. 37). Its brightest visions of a Divine kingdom of peace and purity and blessedness were, He taught men, (Luke iv. 21), realised in the kingdom which He founded, in the company of believers in Him, which, as the Son of God, was founded upon the Eternal Rock. And the witness which He thus bore was carried on by His Apostles. They taught men to find new and deeper meanings in the types of Jewish ritual, in the aspirations of psalmists, in the visions of prophets (Epistle to the Hebrews, passim). For them the Holy Scriptures of the Old Testament were "able to make men wise unto salvation through faith which is in Christ Jesus, and, being inspired of God," were "profitable for doctrine, for reproof, for correction, for instruction in righteousness" (2 Tim. iii. 16, 17). They taught that prophecy "came not of old time" (or indeed at any time) "by the will of man, but that holy men of God spake as they were borne on by the Holy Spirit" (2 Pet. i. 21).

"Inspired of God." That thought has, we know, been fruitful in many controversies. On the one hand, there have been theories of inspiration which have minimised or excluded the human element; which have made prophets, lawgivers, apostles, evangelists, only the machines through which the Divine Spirit uttered His own words; and have seen, accordingly, in every statement of fact as regards history or nature, an oracle of God not to be questioned or debated; in the title even of every book, that which was a bar to any inquiry into its authorship or date. On a priori grounds it has been argued that a revelation from God must, in the nature of the case, include all the subordinate accessories that cluster round it, that it was not worth giving at all unless it were infallible in everything. That mechanical theory of inspiration has, it is believed, but little to recommend it, except that it meets the craving of men for an infallible authority; and that craving, as we know, goes farther, and leads to a demand for an infallible interpreter of the infallible book. The a priori assumption goes beyond the limits of what is in itself reasonable and right. We are in no sort judges, as Bishop Butler has taught us (assuming that God willed to impart to mankind a knowledge of Himself), of the methods and the forms, the measures and degrees in which that knowledge would be imparted (Analog., ii. 6). And the theory is, to say the least, at variance with the impression made on us by the books themselves. They bear, as strongly as the books of any other literature, the stamp of individual character. They indicate, in not a few cases, the labours of compilation and editing which brought them into their present form. They reflect the thoughts and feelings of the times in which they were severally written. They are from first to last intensely national in their character.

What has been called, in contrast with this hypothesis, the theory of a dynamic inspiration, presents it, it is believed, a more satisfactory solution of the problem, one more in harmony with reason, with analogy, with the facts of the case, with the teaching of the Bible itself. The term requires, it may be, a few words of explanation. What is meant is this, that the writers of the Old and New Testaments were not mere machines, but men of like passions with ourselves; each with his own thoughts, temperament, character; each under a training that developed the gifts which he thus possessed by nature, or acquired by education and experience; but that there was, mingling with and perpetuating all that was essentially his own, a Power above himself, quickening all that was true and good in him to a higher life, so guiding him that he did the work to which he was called faithfully and well, making known to men what he was commissioned to declare as to the mind of God and His dealings with mankind, in such form and in such measure as men were able to receive it. On this view of the case, criticism may enter on its work free and unfettered; may rightly study the "manifold," the "very variest" wisdom of God (Eph. iii. 10) working through all diversities of human gifts and character; may learn, in the temper of a reverential courage, to distinguish between the accidental and the essential, the letter and the spirit, the temporal and the eternal. As the teaching of the New Testament corrects and completes what was partial and imperfect in the Old, even in relation to what was its highest subject-matter, so the student of science and history may enter on his work without fear, not surprised or startled if he finds in the records of the Old Testament not a scientific account of the origin of the universe and the history of mankind, but broad and general statements, to be recognised hereafter in their right relation to the perfect Truth, which is mighty and will prevail.

E. H. PLUMPTRE.

* See especially Westcott's Introduction to the Study of the Gospels: Introduction.
INTRODUCTION TO THE PENTATEUCH.

The Pentateuch derives its name from a word in the Greek language as spoken at Alexandria, signifying "the five-fold book," and with this agrees the fact that the breaking of it up into five parts was apparently the work of the Alexandrian translators. The titles of these parts at the present day are all taken from their version, the LXX, while in the Hebrew itself there is no trace of any such arrangement, and though the division has been accepted for the sake of convenience, the names of the several books are simply the opening words. Thus Genesis is called Bereshith, that is, In the beginning; Exodus, Eleh Sh'moth, These are the names; Leviticus, Wayikra, And he called; Numbers, Bemidbar, In the wilderness; and Deuteronomy, Eleh Haddevarim. These are the words. Everywhere in the Bible it is spoken of as a whole, of which the name occurs once only before the Captivity, in 2 Kings xxii. 8, where it is called "the book of the Torah," or Law. Naturally, after the return from Babylon, when the state had to be reconstituted, and the kingly office was virtually abolished to make way for a more exact observance of the Mosaic institutions, a more frequent reference is made to it, and we find it fully described as "the book of the Torah of Moses, which Jehovah had commanded to Israel" (Neh. viii. 1), and as "the book of the Torah of Jehovah" in 2 Chron. xvi. 9.

At that period we have full evidence that the Pentateuch was accepted by Ezra and the Jews returning from Babylon as the fundamental law of the children of Israel, and that its influence was so paramount that the members of the royal family laid no claim to the throne of David. Jewish tradition also asserts that Ezra and the men of the Great Synagogue settled the texts both of it and of their other Scriptures, and, to use a modern phrase, re-edited them, adding many remarks to elucidate the meaning, which in our days would be placed as foot-notes at the bottom, but which were incorporated into the body of the work. Were such a thing possible, nothing could be more interesting than for us to possess the original text of the Pentateuch. Even as it is, the vocabulary is to some extent different from that of later books, and there still remain numerous traces of archaic grammatical forms and inflexions different from those of later times, even though the Masorites have done much to obliterate them. But when we find that the autograph copies of the Apostolic Epistles, which existed in Tertullian's days (Tert. de Præscrip. xlvi.), have long passed away, we must be content with the Old Testament as we find it, though the hope is held out to us of the discovery of copies anterior to the Masoretic Recension. Even as it is, we have no reason to suppose that it has ever been falsified, or that it was treated by Ezra with anything but the most reverent respect; and the Samaritan Pentateuch and the LXX. version prove to demonstration that we at this day have the Pentateuch just as it was several centuries before the advent of Christ.

Confessedly, then, in the days of Ezra, the Pentateuch was regarded as the work of Moses, and as given by the command of Jehovah. (See Neh. viii. 1-8.) We find, also, that the reading of it, with the interpretation into the Aramaic tongue, occupied a whole week (ibid. 18). But the assertion that it was "the Torah of Moses" may be interpreted in two ways. It may mean that Moses was the virtual author, the various laws having been enacted or even written by him, though the collection and arrangement of the book was left to others; or it may mean that he was also the actual composer of the work, and that at his death he left the Pentateuch, not in a loose and scattered condition, but such, in the main, as we now have it.

It is incumbent upon us, therefore, first of all to examine the evidence of the book itself, and we find towards the end of it a most important passage. In Deut. xxxi. 21-26 we read that "when Moses had made an end of writing the words of this Torah in a book until they were finished," he commanded the Levites to "take this book of the Torah and put it by the side of the Ark of the Covenant." Now these words show that Moses did not leave his laws unarranged, but himself collected them. There is previously allusion made to the practice of Moses to keep written accounts of memorable events, as in Exod. xvii. 14, where in the Hebrew we are told not of "a book," but of "the book," the official record of Israel's doings. In a similar manner, in Exod. xxxiv. 27, Num. xxviii. 2, we find the assertion that the more important events which took place in the wilderness were recorded in writing by the commandment of Jehovah. But the evidence of the present passage is much more express, for it speaks of Moses completing the writing of the Torah. It no longer, however, speaks of the book, but of a book, as if from the official narratives and other sources Moses had compiled and digested into one volume both the history of Israel's selection to be God's people, and also the laws by which they were to be governed. This book is also referred to in Deut. xvii. 18. The autograph copy of Moses was to be laid up "by the side of the Ark" (Deut. xxxi. 26); but "the priests, the Levites" were also to have a copy for their use, and of this again a copy was to be made for the king's guidance. The meaning of the words in Deut. xxxi. seems plainly to be that the actual writing by the hand of Moses ceased at the end of chap. xxx. Following it, we have in the other four chapters a history of his last days, and especially of the appointment of Joshua to be his successor. There are also preserved in them the song of Moses," and "the blessing wherewith he blessed the children of Israel" before his death. These two compositions would probably be on separate rolls, and may have been for many years the companions and occupation from time to time of Moses in the wilderness. It would only be after their solemn delivery at the close of his life that they would be reverently added to the Torah, together with the account of the prophet's last actions, and of his death. The person who was charged to do this was, according to the tradition of the Syriac Church, Moses' successor, Joshua, for to their copies of the Pentateuch this Note is always attached, that it was "written by Moses that adorned by Joshua, and taken by his minister." Moses may even have often employed him as his scribe, as well as Jeremiah employed Baruch, and as St. Paul constantly used the hands of others. But the testimony of the book itself is full and complete as to the authorship of Moses, and we may add in passing that we know of no one except Moses who could have written a psalm so sublime as that in chap. xxxii. The author of it stands on a level as high as that of David and Isaiah, and such writers are not produced every day, and are each too strong and masterly for any one but themselves to have written their compositions.
INTRODUCTION TO THE PENTATEUCH.

It does not, of course, follow that we have the Pentateuch just in every minute particular as it left the hands of Moses and Joshua, and we must therefore examine the limitations of such changes. It seems, then, to have been the case that additions were made to certain documents to complete them. Thus, for instance, I have shown the probability of the two genealogies contained in Gen. xxxvi. 31—43 having been added in later times. And nothing was more natural; for the Pentateuch was a great document, and the title-deed of the nation's possession of Palestine; and the records contained in it would from time to time be completed and brought down to later times by proper authority. With regard to the work of Ezra, we can well understand that after so great a calamity as the destruction of Jerusalem and the burning of the Temple, one of the most pressing needs of the nation would be a correct copy of their Law. Fortunately there had been an interval of eleven years between the carrying away of Jewish captives by Nebuchadnezzar and the fall of Zedekiah, and during this period there had been a thriving community of exiles growing up at Babylon, to whose piety the prophet Jeremiah makes frequent reference. One of their first cares would be to supply themselves with copies of their Law, but many of these would be made haggardly, and Ezra, in his anxiety to make the people understand their Torah (Neh. vii. 1—8), would also certainly endeavour to give them a text as correct as possible. In this work he was assisted, according to Jewish tradition, by three prophets, Haggai, Zechariah, and Malachi, by the prince Zerubbabel, the high priest Jeshua, the son of Jozedek, and others, to the number in all of twelve. A full account of this tradition is given by Buxtort, in his Tiberias, chap. x., with the authorities in proof of it. It was accepted by St. Jerome, and is too reasonable in itself, and too distinctly confirmed by the passages in Nehemiah referred to above, to be lightly disregarded. Excepting, however, the addition of notes by Ezra and the men of the Great Synagogue, and the completion of documents, we can find no trace of change or alteration in the text as written by Moses.

It has been thought, however, that the book referred to in Deut. xvii. 18, xxxi. 24, 25, is not the book of Deuteronomy only. In the LXX. version that words in chap. xvii. 18 rendered "a copy of this law" are translated "this Deuteronomy." Jerome also, no mean authority, in the Vulgate renders them "a Deuteronomy of this law." We may, however, dismiss this passage, because it is quite possible that the priests may have had an abstract of the law for their guidance, which contained only the ritual and legal portions of the Pentateuch; and that the king was to make a copy of this for his instruction and direction in giving judgment in cases brought before his tribunal. But neither here, nor still less in the thirty-first chapter, can I see any probability of this book being that of Deuteronomy. For the Deuteronomey consists of three addresses delivered by Moses to the people at the very end of their forty years' wanderings in the wilderness. There had probably been a sojourn of many years in Kadesh (Num. xx. 1), during which, while the headquarters of each tribe were with Moses, the mass of the people was wandering in search of pasture for their flocks in the wildernesses of Paran and Zin. At the end of this sojourn Moses made preparations for the conquest of Palestine; but it was probably during this lengthened period of repose that he digested into one book the patriarchal documents which he had brought with him from Egypt (for the exodus was made in so orderly a manner, and with such careful preparation, though hurried at last, that even Joseph's bones were not forgotten), and so the written record of the events of which he had been the centre. Probably there, too, he wrote these addresses, or at least arranged the subjects of them; but when he "made an end of writing the words of this law in a book until they were finished," the reference would naturally be, not to the three addresses, which, after they had been delivered, would, of course, be added to the words of the law, but to the whole history. And this is confirmed by the fact already referred to, that there are no traces in the Bible itself of the division into five parts made by the translators of the LXX. And granting, as we do, that in Deuteronomy the popular side of the Mosaic ordinances is exhibited, and their more kindly and social aspect made prominent, as was natural when, in his last addresses, the prophet was commending them to the hearty acceptance of a stiff-necked and wilful people, yet there is no proof that Deuteronomy ever was regarded as the Torah itself; and the supposition that it is meant by "the Book of the Torah" in 2 Kings xxii. 8, and not the whole Pentateuch, is based upon no other foundation than the fact that Jeremiah does especially refer to Deuteronomy; and it is a convenient matter for the critics to find some one to whom the whole work assigned the Deuteronomey.

We find, then, the assertion in the Pentateuch of the Mosaic authorship, and upon this point we must remember that the forger of writings did not begin until books were marketable commodities, and men made money by their sale. Literary forgeries are comparatively modern things, and the art was first practised on a large scale by the Jews in Egypt. In the Bible it is most rare to find any account given either of the writer of a book, or of the circumstances under which it was composed. Nor is it easy to find a time when the forgery could have been made; for after the settlement of the nation in Palestine its civilisation declined. When it left Egypt its chiefs were men who had profited necessarily by the flourishing state of literature there. Not a year passes without fresh proofs being brought to light of the deliberate forger of that "book of the Egyptians," in which Stephen tells us that Moses was learned (Acts vii. 22). But there is no reason for supposing that the Israelite chiefs were dependent upon the Egyptians for a knowledge of the art of writing. Not only had Abraham been brought up at a place where writing was in daily use, but it was no unknown matter in Palestine. The Phoenicians not only introduced their alphabet into Greece, but were the inventors of parchment prepared from the skins both of sheep and goats (Herod. v. 58). The introduction of writing material of any kind compared with the old tablets of clay—must have been done for popularising literary arts, and even more so must the use of papyrus in Egypt. It was not so much the discovery of printing, as of paper, which brought the darkness of medieval times to a close. As long as the material was so expensive as parchment, copying by hand was not more costly than printing would have been; for it is the multiplication of copies, by means of our possession of an inexpensive material, that makes the printing of books so cheap. But parchment was a great improvement upon the materials previously in use, and the method of preparing it would not have been invented unless there had been a demand for a convenient writing material. Accordingly, in the Egyptian monuments, the Hittites, who were the leading people of Palestine, are repeatedly mentioned both as scribes and as authors; and it is interesting to find that the document referred to in Gen. xxiii. 17, and which has all the exactness of a written contract, was a covenant between Abraham and the chiefs of this very nation.

We suppose, however, that no one now, after the flood of light thrown upon ancient Chaldea and Egypt, and still more recently upon the nation of the Hittites, doubts the fact that Moses and all high-born Israelites were well acquainted with the art of writing; or even that the Semitic race was in advance of most other nations in this respect. As the words for 'ak and 'book (sepher, comp. the name of the Hittite town, Kirjath-Sepher, Introduct. to Genesis, p. 9) are common to almost all the Semitic dialects, we need feel no difficulty in accepting the statement of Herodotus, that it was a Semitic people who invented a writing material capable of being made into books, and also the simple contrivances for inscribing characters upon it. But their verb "to write," like those in Greek and Latin, means to cut in, or dig, and belongs to the elder age, when the materials for writing were either of clay or plaster (still used in Dent. xxvii. 2), or tablets of wood or metal (Is. viii. 1, where the word rendered roll is a metal plate); or the smoothed surface of rocks (Job xix. 26). But after the conquest of Palestine the Israelites seem to have gradually declined in all the arts of civilisation. Deborah, indeed, appears as an educated woman; and we find that the priests had preserved at Shiloh writing and other remains of more polished days. But when we read, in the song of Deborah, of Zebulon producing men who "handle the pen of the writer" (Judges v. 14), most persons are aware that the words really mean "the sceptre or baton of the masters" of the army. Generally the book of Judges describes the Israelites as hardly bested, and constantly fighting for their very existence; and it was not till the days of Samuel, the great restorer of Israel, that we find the civilisation of the nation reviving, and Samuel himself writing "the manner of the kingdom in a book, and laying it up before Jehovah" (1 Sam. x. 25).

Samuel, a man of extraordinary ability, and trained from his early infancy in the tabernacle of Shiloh, undoubtedly could have written the Pentateuch as far as acquaintance with the arts of writing and literary composition go. We will suppose even that the documents brought by Moses out of Egypt, and the memorials written by his hand in the wilderness, were all stored up at Shiloh, and therefore, that he possessed that knowledge of Egypt which is so marked an element of the Pentateuch; but if so, what object could Samuel have had in falsifying those documents, and in asserting that Moses himself had made them into a book? The knowledge of Egypt and of the Semitic wilderness manifested in the Pentateuch is abundant and precise. If, for the people of Egypt, we find that almost every one of them is founded upon natural occurrences there, utterly unknown in Palestine; and that the Divine intervention consisted in the intensifying of their force, and in their rapid sequence. But Samuel could have had no personal knowledge of these Egyptian phenomena, nor are the many Egyptian customs taken from the Pentateuch, exact parallels to which are to be found in books like Brugsch's History of Egypt and Wilkinson's Manners and Customs of the Ancient Egyptians. Even in the hands of practised forgers there are sure to be numerous unintentional proofs of the want of personal knowledge, of the misuse of knowledge obtained second-hand, and of the obtrusion of ideas taken from the state of things among which the forger was living. The more the Pentateuch is searched by hostile critics, and supposed examples of this ignorance brought forth and examined, the more clear becomes the proof that the writer had a thorough acquaintance both with Egypt and with the wilderness of Sinai. And so exact and intimate is this knowledge, that we look in vain elsewhere for a person or an age when it would have been possible, without records written in Egypt, to have composed this book.

If, however, Samuel found Mosaic documents in the tabernacle at Shiloh, and rescued them, and subsequently compiled them into a volume, then we have in the Pentateuch substantially the work of Moses; but we fail altogether in finding a reason why this great and good man should deliberately represent his own work as that of another. For though the restorer of Israel, he nowhere appears as the restorer of the Mosaic institutions. On the contrary, there are occasions in which, as in the offering of sacrifices, he does not conform to the Mosaic Law. On no occasion do we find him endeavouring to restore a central place of worship, such as was contemplated by Moses, and had existed at Shiloh. On the contrary, the ark was left by him at Kirjath-jearim for twenty years; and it was first Saul, and then David, who restored it as something of national importance. There are proofs of the existence of the Mosaic Law and institutions in the time of Samuel, but they are never obtruded upon our notice, and must be searched for. The great work of Samuel was the foundation of the schools of the prophets. The need of them was forced upon his attention by the decay of the nation in all literary arts, but even here he did not build upon the old lines. It was not as one of the tribe of Levi whom he chose for his purposes; on the contrary, the doors of entry to his schools stood open to all. Nor was it at a central sanctuary that he gathered the flower of the nation round him to instruct them in the learning which he had been taught at Shiloh. Nor do we find in the Pentateuch any preparations for Samuel's work, or allusion to it. It was distinctly an addition to the Mosaic institutions, and was forced upon Samuel by the lapse of the nation into barbarism.

At the return from Babylon there was an attempt made to keep exactly to the Mosaic lines, but never before. For what we have said of Samuel holds good of the times of the kings. Thrice never was, until the return from exile, any age in which the Law of Moses commanded the universal assent of the people. In the times of the Judges the anarchy and distress of the nation were too great; and subsequently the kings may have regarded the Mosaic Law as a matter to be has been expended upon these versions, which, from the absence of ancient Hebrew manuscripts, are our most important means for verifying the text of the Old Testament Scriptures.
INTRODUCTION TO THE PENTATEUCH.

Still, some things are certain. For, first, these Samaritan manuscripts are written in the same characters as those used by the Jews before the Babylonian exile. Even in the present use of their old alphabet (Ketib) was never altered. For the inscriptions upon the Maccabean coins are still in the Samaritan character, though the Babylonian square writing may have superseded it for ordinary purposes. In the Talmud (Tract. Sanhedrin xxi. b) it is said, that "whereas the Torah was originally given to Israel in the Hebrew writing, and the holy language, in the days of Ezra the Israelites changed it into the Assyrian writing and the Aramaic language." As the words Hebrew writing might be equivocal, the Rabbi goes on to explain it by a term which signifies that found in these Samaritan copies of the Law. But, besides this change of the characters, we notice that the authorship also of the Chaldee Targum is referred to Ezra. But both assertions must be taken in a very limited sense. The Chaldee paraphrase undoubtedly grew out of the custom prescribed by Ezra, in translating the Torah, that is, the Pentateuch, into the Aramaic language, that the people might understand the sense (Neh. viii. 8). But centuries passed away before it was committed to writing under the name of "the Targum of Onkelos." All, nevertheless, that Onkelos did was to give in written form the books, which had long been handed down by tradition; and one reason which probably moved him to it was, that, although the schools, like those of Tiberias, there was an exact knowledge of the text, yet that elsewhere variations were growing up. Just, then, as the Aramaic paraphrase was the work of centuries, though it began in the customs of Ezra, so it was but slowly that the new writing took the place of the old, and the use of the sacred characters was probably long retained in the copying of the Scriptures, even though the more easy method of writing was growing into common use. So, in the Syrian Church, the Estrangelo character was still employed, both for the Scriptures and ritual books, long after simpler alphabets were in other matters universally prevalent.

The fact, therefore, that the Samaritan Pentateuch is written in the old characters does not settle its date. The Samaritans may have obtained it from Ezra, or even at some later period; but nothing is more probable than that copies of the Pentateuch remained in Israel after the deportation by Shalmaneser of the ten tribes. The schools of the prophets had been, from the days of Elijah, particularly strong there, and we have seen that Hosea knew the Pentateuch well, and that most of the Levitical institutions were observed by the kings of the house of Jehu, as was to be expected, considering that they had been placed upon the throne by Elijah's influence. Hence manuscripts of these manuscripts were subsequently made, the works would be sure to regard Ezra's text as the most correct and authoritative, and its readings would prevail wherever Samaritan prejudices were not interfered with. But, passing these probabilities by, we have also to take into consideration the fact that the Samaritans could no more understand the book which they gave complete

† Mr. Petermann is now publishing, at Berlin, an edition of the Samaritan Pentateuch; and the Rev. J. W. Nutt has edited, from a Bodleian MS., some fragments of a Samaritan Targum, with an interesting introduction treating upon Samaritan history and literature.

‡ Ancient examples of these may be seen in the Moabite stone, the Siloam inscription (A.D. 700), and other facsimiles, in the oriental series of the Palaeographical Society.

While no book is read and studied as the Bible, yet not one tithe of the care and labour devoted to the text of the New Testament allegiance, than could the Jews, and that they too had their paraphrase. There is much obscurity as to the history of this version, because copies—of even fragments of it—though multiplying, are still extremely rare; but Gesenius places its date about the middle of the first century B.C. The Targum of Onkelos was apparently not committed to writing until a century later; for up to that time there are numerous variations in the citations made from it in the Talmud. Such was sure to be the case as long as the preservation of it was entrusted to the memory, and there existed opposing schools of interpretation; but all such diversities would die out as soon as the Targum was committed to writing, according to the tradition of the leading school. But what we are anxious to point out is, that in both cases the things themselves are far older than the date when they took written form.

It is exceedingly probable that the Samaritan paraphrase, as long as it was a matter of tradition, would be more or less influenced by the Chaldee Targum, as being the translation of the greater authority. Such, in fact, we find to have been the case. But granting this, there still remain facts of which there can be no reasonable doubt. We cannot doubt but that "the book of the Torah of Moses" (Neh. viii. 1), was the authoritative rule of faith and practice, both in Samaria and Jerusalem, on the return from Babylon, nor that its language, nevertheless, was unintelligible to the mass of the people, and that the custom grew up in Judea of translating it to them, and that this translation gradually became fixed and settled, and finally was committed to writing as the Targum of Onkelos. As this Targum includes the whole Pentateuch, and nothing besides, it also seems plain that the Torah of Moses was the whole Pentateuch, and not some portion of it. Equally, too, the Samaritans acknowledged the Pentateuch as their one sacred book, rejecting the other scriptures; and, moreover, they adhered to the use of the old characters common to all the Jews before the exile. As they too could not understand the old language, they likewise had an Aramaic version for common use, agreeing to a considerable extent with that of Onkelos. But, surely, neither Jew nor Samaritan would have accepted a book as their rule of faith, and as the national law in civil matters also, unless it had held that same position in previous time. It was the strictness of the Mosaic Law which made the Samaritans a race of peasants. The Nehemiah drive away from Jerusalem men of high rank, including a grandson of the high priest Eliashib (Neh. xiii. 25). Some have even supposed that it was this person, called by Josephus (Antiq. xi. 7, 8), "Manasseh, the brother of the high priest," who carried the Pentateuch to Samaria, and that his father-in-law, Sanballat, made him there high priest of the temple on Mount Gerizim. But no attempt was made to excise from the Pentateuch, or even to soften down, its severe enactments; nor neither would he have carried it with him into banishment, nor would the Samaritans have accepted from men who treated them as an inferior and mongred race, a book which, while attaching to them this disgrace, yet claimed their obedience, unless the claims of that book to be Israel's law were indefensible. But if so, we really need not proceed back at once to the date of the divided kingdom. Jeroboam, as was but natural, did his best to weaken the hold of the Mosaic Law upon his subjects; but his method was not the abrogation of it, but the substitution at Bethel and Dan of centres corresponding to Jerusalem, and his calves were imitations of the cherubim in the tabernacle. The placing of the ark at Jerusalem had been the work of David, and probably was regarded with hostility by the powerful tribe of Ephraim, as being an act injurious to that supremacy which they had ever claimed, and of which the placing of the ark at Shiloh had been a symbol. Politically, therefore, they would approve of having national centres of worship, and Benjamin, as a holy place, was naturally the first of these centres dwelt upon. Jeroboam, therefore, more than twenty miles from it, was chosen with consummate statesmanship as the site for the rival sanctuary. But so strong was the hold of the Mosaic Law in its exactness upon the people, that not only the Levites, who were displaced by the throwing open of the priesthood to all alike, but all the best of the people withdrew gradually from the northern kingdom and settled in Judah. These facts are indeed given in the Chronicles (2 Chron. xi. 13—17), which were compiled from old documents after the return from exile, but they account for the subsequent strength of Judah; nor is there any doubt but that the numerous authorities there referred to were records kept by the old prophets, and that the history in the books of Chronicles was copied from them. And thus we find no period between the return from exile and the division of the kingdom, when such an act as the supposed forgery of the Pentateuch could have been committed. For at the one period we find Jew and Samaritan agreeing in receiving it as the book of Divine Law, to which their obedience was due; and at the other we find Jeroboam constrained to set up an imitation of its central worship, but the people divided in their views, some accepting his institutions, but the more religious portion even abandoning their property that they might go where the Law of Moses was more faithfully kept. Even those who kept the annals of the kings, and who were far less influenced by respect for the Levitical law than the writer of the Books of Chronicles, branded Jeroboam as the man who made Israel to sin, because for worldly policy he violated the religious ordinances of the nation. Though willing to break away from their allegiance to David and his house, large numbers were unwilling to break away from what was far older than David, namely, the Mosaic Law. Between the days of Jeroboam and those of Ezra there never was a time when the rival kingdoms would have agreed to accept as their national law anything that had not been handed down to them by such as their fathers in the Law. Consequently, there was just no real possibility of this agreement after a rival temple had been set up on Mount Gerizim.

If, nevertheless, the Pentateuch be a forgery, the earlier chapters in Genesis could have been forged only after or during the exile at Babylon. It is true, indeed, that the Chaldean legends of Creation, of the Flood, of the Tower of Babel, &c., have come to us from Assyria, but they were current certainly in Babylonia as well. The whole imagery, the tree of life, the cherubim, the sword of flame which turned every way, the site of Paradise, the fashion of the ark, all this and much beside is Chaldaic to the uttermost; but who could believe that out of legends so grossly polytheistic as those lately brought to light any one could frame a history so elevated in its pure monotheism, so grand in its conception, as the Mosaic history? and there was just no real possibility of this agreement after a rival temple had been set up on Mount Gerizim.

Scene after scene is presented to us of which we find the exact representations existing to this day on ancient monuments. How could a larger at Babylon have known of them? So precise is this knowledge that it would horses mentioned in the history of Joseph, and in Jacob's blessing, but not enumerated among the gifts bestowed by Pharaoh on Abraham. This is just one of the points in which a forger would fail; he would certainly have enumerated horses among the presents made to Abraham, whereas really they were introduced into Egypt in the interval between Abraham's visit and Joseph's betrayal by his brethren. We find, too, the author of Genesis equally accurate in his description of the life of an Arab sheik; and, finally, he takes the chosen race down to Egypt, and is just as exact in his knowledge of daily life there. We have referred before to the plagues of Egypt, and to the natural phenomena which underlie them; and with each advance in our knowledge of Egyptian manners and literature the more complete is the confirmation given to the exactness of the picture of Egyptian life. But soon the scene is changed. The exodus takes place, and again there is the same accuracy as regards the desert. Professor Palmer, with exceptional advantages for the examination of the question, comes to the conclusion that "whether we look at the results obtained in physical geography alone, or take into consideration the mass of facts which the traditions and nomenclature disclose, we are bound to admit that the investigation of the Sinai expedition do materially confirm and elucidate the history of the exodus" (Palmer, The Desert of the Exodus, i. p. 279). And again, "In the case of Sinai, physical facts accord with the inspired account" (ibid.). He concludes also his second volume by saying that he has "purposely abstained from discussing any of the objections brought against the truth of the narrative of the exodus, because he believes that geographical facts form the best answer to them all" (p. 530).
INTRODUCTION TO THE PENTATEUCH

Falsehood is sure to be detected by the growth of knowledge, and a forged document will sooner or later have the veil stripped away from it, and stand forth in its hideous baseness. No cleverness can prevent this. It may impose upon people for a time, but when a critical examination is made, a hundred proofs are brought to light, showing the date, the country, and the purpose of the forger. Nor would the detection be less certain if the Pentateuch was, as others suggest, a curious medley of many different ages, and of works by many hands. As it is, the Bible stands ever upon surer ground as knowledge grows. Thus, the survey of the desert of the exodus, undertaken by the Ormance Survey Department, and the scientific examination of Palestine so thoroughly carried out under the auspices of the committee of the Palestine Exploration Fund, have proved that the geography of these two regions not only agrees with the Biblical account, but enables us clearly to understand narratives which before were full of difficulty. When the minutest criticism of Scripture began, the critics heaped together so large a number of spurious objections, and had so many plausible reasons for putting everything where they did not find it, and for breaking up and distributing among a host of people † who had never been heard of, what had come down to us as one work, that believers were alarmed, and began to fear that the Bible would be torn from them, and that faith would come to be a belief in that which their reason told them was untrue. Undoubtedly we have had to part with some popular interpretations of the Scripture, but these were no more part of Scripture than the popular theology of Rome which rests the papal claims upon an interpretation of Matt. xvi. 18, or purgatory upon 1 Cor. iii. 13—15. But the examination of this mass of objections, and the large and rapid growth of knowledge, have both tended to place the Bible upon a more sure foundation. As we know more of the history and geography, and also of the literature, of the countries in which the scenes of the Bible are laid, we are ever receiving fresh confirmation of its truth; and as the outward and material form of the Book in which God has enshrined His truth daily receives fresh confirmation, we can with more undoubted faith rest our hearts upon those spiritual verities which are revealed therein for the salvation of our souls.

In conclusion, the Pentateuch covers so vast a space of ground, takes us to so many dissimilar countries, and sets before us the habits and manners of so many different races of men, that we know of no man who could have written it except Moses, and of no period in Jewish history when it could have been penned except when Egypt and the wilderness were fresh in the writer's mind. It is not worth arguing whether Joshua might not have compiled it from records left by Moses, because not only is this contradicted by the testimony of all future times, but it makes Joshua deliberately tell a falsehood in saying that Moses was the author (Deut. xxxi. 24), without the slightest purpose or object to be gained by it. The book would stand on equally sure footing if, as some think, these words refer only to Deuteronomy, and the rest was arranged and compiled by Joshua and Eleazar. But I can see little proof of this, though probably the two names would cause transcribers to be made. And as for Genesis, it seems to be entirely the work of Moses; for we have there knowledge indeed beyond the range of his natural faculties, and which tradition would not have handed down correctly, but for the possession of which he satisfactorily accounts; for, excepting the first narrative of creation, he describes all the rest as tradition, genealogical documents, which he did not compose, but from which, using mainly, as seems certain, their very words, he compiled the history so necessary for his purpose, of the choice of the family of Abraham to be God's peculiar people: and necessary also for the integrity of Holy Scripture; because without the Book of Genesis we should know nothing what was the end and object for which the Israelites were made into a nation, nor what was the blessing which God through them was preparing to bestow upon mankind.

Now these documents, Moses, as the ruler of the nation, would of course have had in his charge. He had, too, at Kadesh abundant leisure for the work. No man besides was so thoroughly acquainted with the sense of Israel's high and unique calling. He had the liturgical ability and skill, the revelation to him of the name 1 AM as that of Israel's covenant God accounts for the importance attached to the name in Genesis, and the discrimination in its use. And, finally, his position as the leader of a discontented people, whom he had brought out of Egypt to brave hardships in the wilderness, required of him the proof that he was accomplishing the original purpose for which Abraham had been called away from Ur, and his race made into a great nation. And if Moses wrote Genesis he would not stop there, but would naturally proceed to digest into a connected narrative the other records of the great events of which he had been the eye-witness, in order that the nation which he had formed might be impressed with the sense of its nearness to Jehovah, and of the work it had to do for him.
INTRODUCTION TO THE PENTATEUCH.

These are broad and solid considerations, which far outweigh all the difficulties which critics have brought forward upon the other side. In a book so old there must be difficulties, and we cannot tell what have been its fortunes during the vast period of its existence. We know that God's providence has not miraculously interposed to preserve for us an absolutely certain text of the New Testament. At this very idea the controversy is raging as to whether that text is to be settled by the authority of two or three of the great uncial manuscripts, or whether we are to abide substantially by that of Erasmus, founded upon what was the received text of subsequent times. So, too, may scribes have made errors and mistakes in copying a book so vastly more ancient, but none of material importance.

For, as regards the Old Testament, we may claim, on the authority of the LXX., combined with the Targum of Onkelos and the Samaritan Pentateuch and Targum, that we have the Pentateuch such as it was in Ezra's days. But before this time we have probabilities only, and such slight proof as arises from the omission of the passages in which the Law is referred to with the words of the Pentateuch itself. There is no reason for supposing that there was ever any wilful falsification of the national law; but it has passed through many a trying time, and we do not know how manuscripts were treated in those old days, nor how many of the illustrative notes which we ascribe to Ezra may really have been added long before.

But thus the discovery of the "book of the law" in the Temple acquires fresh interest. We read that the effect upon the mind of king Josiah of the reading of the demunciations contained therein was so great that he rent his clothes, and sent a solemn embassy to inquire of Jehovah. Now it has been well pointed out * that this is an argument against there existing a very considerable knowledge of the Pentateuch in those days. Manasseh, in his violent and persecuting reign, had probably destroyed as many copies of it as he could find; and had suppressed the schools of the prophets. Still even so, many would survive who knew the Pentateuch by heart. Probably one important part of the instruction given in these schools was the committal to the memory, if not of the whole, yet of large parts of the Pentateuch; and the teachers would learn it in its entirety. The priests would similarly be, to a considerable extent, acquainted with it, though their methods of sacrifice may have been mainly learnt by practice. Now Josiah was but eight years old when he restored the worship of Jehovah, and as his father, Amon, had "served idols" like Manasseh (2 Kings xxi. 21), but was so unpopular that his own servants slew him, the king's acts at first must have been chiefly the result of the counsels of the pious men who had gathered round him, and who were now the dominant party because of the re-action against Amon. It is probable, therefore, that not very much was done until the king was older, and in his eighteenth year threw the whole energy of his noble character into the work of reformation. It was about this time that the copy of the Torah was found in the Temple, and though Josiah had doubtless heard portions of it recited before, yet now for the first time the whole was before him, and he listened with awe to the threatenings against the nation in case it lipt into captivity, as we have seen he did, and the threat was fulfilled. These threatenings are indeed contained in Deuteronomy, but we have no authority for dividing this portion from the rest. It was probably the whole Torah that was found, and we cannot wonder at the excitement caused by the discovery when we remember that the reign of Manasseh lasted fifty-five years, and that he was a bitter enemy of the religion of Jehovah. Under such a monarch, at a time when books were very rare, it must have been only very old people, who belonged to Hezekiah's days, and a few secretly trained by them, that would still have the Pentateuch written in their memories.

* See article Pentateuch in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible.

Now if, as there is reason for supposing, this was the autograph copy of Moses that had been laid up beside the ark, we have every probability for the conclusion that the copies of the Law possessed by the exiles at Babylon had a text founded on the original manuscript. Most other copies had perished, and though this was doubtless reverently stored up again in the Temple near the ark, we can see by the writings of Jeremiah that he had diligently studied it, and he would take care that those in captivity, over whose welfare he watched so carefully, would also have transcripts of this great treasure. And thus this narrative gives us the assurance that the Pentateuch has come down to us in an authentic form. No doubt this particular copy perished when the Temple was burnt by Nebuchadnezzar, but not until it had done its work. Nor would other manuscripts be wanting; for as the schools of the prophets arose again from their ruins, many an old copy of the Pentateuch would be brought forth from its hiding-place. There may have been insertions here and there which Ezra regarded as authorised additions, because placed there by prophetical hands. But we have no reason to suppose that these were of any great extent or importance; and certainly this copy found by Josiah is our security that we have the work of Israel's lawgiver much as it left his hands. The idea broached by some that Jeremiah forged the book, and that it was therefore Deuteronomy only, is disproved by the character of the man, and by the local knowledge which is so remarkable in Deuteronomy as in the rest of the Pentateuch.

There are numerous other considerations which all confirm the foregoing conclusions, but to which we can only briefly refer. Such points are the numerous divergences between the blessing of Jacob and that of Moses. The one belongs exactly to the age of the Patriarch, gives vent to his feelings at the misconduct of his sons, magnifies Judah as the future head of the nation, and yet shows no knowledge of the time when, under David, this prediction was fulfilled. In the blessing of Moses, Levi stands well nigh foremost in the abundance of his happiness, while Simeon, who had been classed with him by Jacob, absolutely disappears. Moreover, Ephraim holds the place which was actually his until the days of David; and the relative importance of the tribes is different from that of the sons of Jacob in their father's eyes. Authentic documents are sure to have these divergences, and if these two are genuine, they were separated by many centuries. If fabricated, such divergences would be avoided.

We find also that the family of the lawgiver ends in obscurity, while that of the brother holds an office of great and lasting power. The headship of the tribe of Levi is bestowed by Moses upon Amon and his sons, and not upon his own children. His own tribe, too, is represented as lying under Jacob's curse. This is changed into a blessing but the Levites remain destitute of all political importance; they have no tribal government, and are even left dependent upon the goodwill and religious feeling of their countrymen. As the result, Jeroboam's change of policy drives them away from ten of the tribes in poverty and humiliation. Now this dispersion of the Levites throughout the tribes, and the refusal to them of a share of the conquered territory in Palestine, is absolutely unintelligible upon any other supposition than that they had more than an equivalent in their religious privileges. But these privileges pre-suppose the Levitical law, and represent it as firmly established in the hearts of the people at the time of the conquest of Canaan. Levi would not have abandoned his tribal independence and his share of the conquered lands unless the Israelites had looked upon the Mosaic institutions as the law that was to be permanently in force throughout their territory.

Arguments such as this might be greatly multiplied; but I will only add that the silence of the Pentateuch is as remarkable as its knowledge of the manners and peculiarities, and the physical geography of the many regions it describes to us. There is, indeed, here said to be an exception. For in the book of Deuteronomy the probability is clearly set forth that the Israelites would not be content with that somewhat loose organisation of independent tribes which Moses arranged for them, but would demand a king. But they had seen Egypt governed by a king; there were kings in all the countries round. Moses himself had been king virtually (Deut. xxxii. 5), and Balaam had described Israel's greatness by representing his king as greater than the monarch of what was then the mighty race of the Amalekites (Numb. xxiv. 7). Moses, surrounded by nations ruled by kings, must have often reflected upon the problem of the national government. He deliberately preferred a more free form, but it was impossible for him to put from him the thought of the likelihood that the nation would wish for and demand a form of government which, while it gave up some domestic advantages, was all important in war. The miserable state of things under the Judges actually arose from the want of a strong central rule (Judges xxi. 25), and would have been avoided if Joshua had been made king, or probably if Gideon had not, out of regard to the Mosaic principles, declined the offered crown (Judges viii. 23). But, excepting this foreboding of the longing for a king, the Pentateuch has no allusion to subsequent events or institutions. Even prophecy, which in time became, with the priesthood and the king, the third power in the state, has no allusions made to it. It existed. Moses was himself a prophet; the seventy elders received the gift (Numb. xi. 16, 25), but only on one special occasion* as the proof of their appointment. Of it, such as it became after the time of Samuel, there is no single word; and generally the Pentateuch is true to its own time, and contains no indications, casual or otherwise, of any later age.

Granting, then, that there are difficulties in the text, as was to be expected in a work written more than three thousand years ago, and difficulties in criticism and interpretation, yet the conclusion seems sure, that we have in the Pentateuch the work of Moses, and that we have it substantially as it left his hands.

* The words rendered, "they did not cease," really mean that they did not continue to prophesy.
THE FIRST BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED GENESIS.
INTRODUCTION
TO
THE FIRST BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

GENESIS.

The Book of Genesis is a record of the highest interest, not only as being probably the oldest writing in the world, but also because it is the foundation upon which the whole Bible is built. As well the Jewish as the Christian religions have their roots in this book, and there is even no doctrine of Christianity, however advanced, which is not to be found, at least in outline, therein. Written in the very fancy of the human race, made subject, as are all the Scriptures, to the external conditions of their times, bearing upon its very surface proofs that the art of writing was in its infancy, and the science of arithmetic scarcely advanced beyond its first principles, it nevertheless contains the germ of every future truth of revelation, while, in accordance with the law which regulates the growth and development of the written Word, it never goes beyond the limits which were afterwards to be reached. No portion of Genesis has to be omitted as inconsistent with the truth which was subsequently to be revealed. Necessarily, the truths it teaches are imperfect and incomplete, for this is the rule of all the Old Testament Scriptures (Heb. i. 1); but they are the proper preparation for the brightening light that was to illuminate the world.

This consistency of Holy Scripture with itself is made the more remarkable by the fact that in Genesis we have records of an age far anterior to the exodus from Egypt. Though the hand be the hand of Moses, the documents upon which the narrative is founded, and which are incorporated in it, date from primordial times. Upon them Moses based the Law, and subsequently the prophets built upon the Pentateuch the marvellous preparation for Christ. But though given thus "by diverse portions and in diverse manners," through a vast period of time, and under every possible variety of culture and outward circumstance, the Bible is a book which from first to last is at unison with itself. It grows, proceeds onward, develops, but always in the same plane. It is no national anthology, full of abrupt transitions and violent contrasts, with the writings of one age at variance with those of another, and with subsequent generations ashamed of and destroying what went before. Rather like some mighty oak it has grown slowly through long centuries, but with no decaying limbs, no branches which have had to be lopped away. Christianity has developed, also, Starting from a far higher level, and amid a riper culture, it too has expanded its creed; but all those developments which are more than the arrangement and consistent expression of its first teaching are rejected by the most enlightened portions of Christendom as corruptions at variance with the truth.

Judaism also has had its development in the Talmud, but the development is inferior to the starting-point, and is marred by a curious admixture of perversity. From Genesis to Malachi there is in Holy Scripture a steady and homogeneous growth, advancing upwards to a stage so high as to be a fit preparation for the full sunshine of the Gospel; and in the Book of Genesis we find the earliest stages of this work founded upon pre-Mosaic documents. We read there of the forming of a being in the image of God, of the fall of that being, of the promise given of restoration, and of the first steps taken towards the fulfilment of that promise; and not only is the foundation thus laid for future revelation, but many a pregnant hint is given of the course which that revelation would follow. But though thus preserving for us records of vast antiquity, the Book of Genesis is arranged upon a definite plan. Having set man before us as the goal of creation, but nevertheless as incapable of serving God aright and of saving himself by his natural powers, and thereby attaining to the end and purpose for which he was made, it next lays the foundation for the plan of supernatural religion by the promise made to Eve in the very hour of her punishment, of a Deliverer who should arise from her seed. Thenceforward the fulfilment of this promise is steadily kept in view; and while much valuable subsidiary knowledge is bestowed upon us, yet so directly does Moses advance onward to his purpose, that by the end of Genesis we have the family chosen to be the depositories of revelation located in an extensive and fertile region, wherein they were to multiply into a nation. So essential is the Book of Genesis to the Bible, that without it Holy Scripture would be scarcely intelligible; with this introduction all is orderly and follows in due course.

As regards its contents, it consists of an account of creation given in chaps. i.—ii. 3, and, as we have shown in Excursus D, of ten histories, called in the Hebrew Toldoth, or genealogies, written each in its own style, and with a distinct local colouring, but with evident marks of arrangement for a settled purpose. To account for these differences of style numerous theories have been devised, one of which especially has exercised the ingenuity of a large number of writers, among whom the best known in this country is Bishop Colenso. Discarding, or not observing, that the book itself asserts that it consists of eleven parts, the beginning of each of which is carefully noted, these commentators have attempted to divide Genesis into portions according to the prevalence in them severally of the names of Elohim and Jehovah. With this theory they also combined attempts to settle the dates of the Elohist and the Jehovist, generally bringing them down to a late period, and endeavouring to find in Holy Scripture some person or persons who might be credited with what was virtually a forgery.

This theory has been often met and refuted on its own ground; but this is an age of a most rapid increase of knowledge, and the exhausted libraries of ancient Chaldea and Egypt have at last exhibited to our wondering eyes records parallel to those which we find in the opening book of Holy Scripture. Orthodox commentators, like Vitringa, had indeed long regarded it as probable that Moses had certain records of the times referred to in the patriarchal ages which he incorporated into his history" (Bishop Browne, Speaker's Commentary, p. 2); but there were so many difficulties in the way of believing that even the art of writing was known in those ancient days, that thoughtful men spoke diffidently on a subject so obscure. Often was the lament uttered that we had no contemporaneous literature that would remove some of the darkness which enwrapped man's early history. But the light has now come. Written on tablets and cylinders of clay, and therefore virtually indestructible, there lay beneath the mounds that mark where populous cities once occupied the Assyrian plains, the libraries of famous kings, in which are found not only translations of ancient Accadian works, but written records of a king of Ur, which are said by Mr. Sayce to be about three thousand years anterior to the Christian era (Chaldean Account of Genesis, ed. Sayce, p. 24). We now know that writing was in such common use at Ur when Abraham dwelt there, that all the common transactions of business were inscribed on tablets, and numerous specimens of written contracts, contemporaneous with or anterior to the days of Abraham, may now be found among the Assyrian curiosities in our libraries. It has thus become highly probable that Abraham, when leaving that great and cultured mart of commerce, Ur of the Chaldees, would carry his library with him. He left Ur for religious reasons. Its religion had degenerated into idolatry, and we find in the Chaldean accounts of creation and of the flood a polytheism utterly abominable. Now, whence did Terah and Abraham obtain the better knowledge which made them hate idolatry, and abandon their homes at Ur because of its growing prevalence there? What answer more probable than that it was in these records, which teach so nobly and impressively the unity and omnipotence of the Creator? At what date the Semitic family of Eber crossed the Tigris and migrated to Ur we do not know, but they found there in the Accadians not a Semitic but an Elamite race. Probably they tried to teach them the great truth that God is but one, in pronouncing that Abraham wandered farther into idolatry, so would they hate and persecute an alien family who rejected their many gods; and as the result Terah and his sons and clan withdrew. But their departure was voluntary (chap. xi. 31), and they took with them their wealth, and doubtless also the tablets on which was inscribed the knowledge which had made them stand firm amidst the corruption which encompassed them around, and which was the real cause of their emigration.

The Chaldaic records extend to the end of chap. xi. 26, though much light is also thrown by our enlarged knowledge of Chaldean history upon the invasion of Palestine by Chedorlaomer (chap. xiv.). From chap. xi. 27 to chap. xxxvii. 1, the surroundings of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are those of Arabian sheikhs. From chap. xxxvii. 2 to the end the colouring is in the main Egyptian, and in all three sections it is not only the general aspect that is thus Chaldaic, Arabian, or Egyptian; but even the minuter points are true to the time and place. And the result of our increased knowledge is that numerous difficulties are now cleared away. They used to be difficulties only because of our ignorance, but it seemed to give a remark to the people if the truth were known. Nay, it only answers.—We have no sufficient knowledge, and must be content to wait, resting our faith meanwhile upon those parts of revelation where contemporaneous knowledge has been vouchsafed. Nay, even the believer has often been restless and discontented because questions have been asked which were not easy to answer; or, what is worse, because well-meaning defenders of the faith have given answers evidently insufficient, and savouring more of the controversialist than of the seeker after truth. Even now our increased knowledge has not removed all difficulties, nor is it to be expected that there ever will be a time when our faith will have no trial to undergo. But in this trial, it is an aid to our faith if we find that increased knowledge lessens our difficulties; and, as a matter of fact, nothing so profits by each fresh discovery as the Bible. If Galileo cleared away many a mistaken gloss put upon Scripture to make it accord with the Ptolemaic solar system, so have the astronomers and geologists of the present day enabled us at last to see something of the grandeur and majesty of the Biblical account of creation. And our increased knowledge of the country where Abraham and his clan so long sojourned, and of the land where his descendants grew into a nation, is like sunshine illuminating a region where before we had only twilight and shadow. We shall gain a better idea of the nature of the book, as well as of the difficulties with which it abounds, as also of the light cast upon them by our increased knowledge, if we pass, at least, the two first portions of which it consists somewhat fully in review before our eyes, concluding with some general remarks. The first narrative is the history of creation, as told in chaps. i.—iii. 3. It consists of eight parts, of which the first, after affirming that God is the Creator of all things, and consequently that matter is not eternal, describes the first stage of creation as a void and formless waste. Chaos is a Greek notion, arising out of their theory that matter was uncreated and eternal. Now no language can convey a notion of a state of existence destitute of all shape, order, and arrangement; it is sketched with words and ideas as the popular imagination invests the depth without bounds, veiled in darkness, but in which the Spirit of God is hovering over the waters to quicken them with life. Without moisture life on our planet cannot exist; but we must not put any commonplace interpretation upon these abysmal waters. They were still void, empty, formless; but the words show that God had called into being in this dark abyss the matter out of which the universe was to be shaped, and that His power was present there to mould and quicken it. Upon this noble preface, which amibiulates most of the dogmas of heathenism, of Greek philosophy, and of pseudo-Christian heresy, follow the six creative days, and the day of holy rest.

In the division of our Bible into chapters, with a carefulness only equalled by that pernicious unhappy reform called the division of Isaiah out of the end and the beginning of two incongruous prophesies, the seventh day's rest is separated from the account of the six working days, and thus the very purpose of the narrative is concealed. Slowly and gradually we see in it the earth passing through successive stages, until it becomes the abode of a being made in the image of God. Mechanical laws are first of all imposed upon created matter, and as gravitation draws the particles together, the friction produces electricity, and with it light and heat. In union next with chemical laws, they sort and arrange the materials of this our earth, and break it up into land and sea. On the third day, the creative energy for the second time manifests itself, and ethereality is called into being. In God's time, day there was apparently a long pause, during which the atmosphere was purified by means of vegetation, till the sun and moon shone upon the hardening surface, and made it capable of bearing more advanced types of plants, quickly followed on the fifth day by the lower forms of animal life. Finally, when the work of the sixth day was far advanced, and the mammalia had been called into existence, the Creator takes solemn counsel, and by special intervention man is created to be the ruler and governor of all that had been made. From the first he is set forth as a religious being, made in God's likeness; and on the seventh day God rests, to hallow for man his weekly rest. We are now living in this seventh day of God, and it will go on until the advent of the day of the Lord. During this day of rest, the creative energy pauses, and no being higher than man is called into existence. We know not how long it may continue, nor what may follow it; but we know that God's days are not as our days. The record is not a geological treatise, but a hymn of praise to God, magnifying His mighty works, indicating man's high relation to Him, and hallowing the weekly Sabbath, which is man's day of rest, just as the whole period of time which has followed upon the creation of man unto the present time is God's day of rest. In it He creates a new being, fashioning nothing higher than man, but He still protects and maintains all created things: for in the work of providence and grace God resteth not. (See John v. 17.)

Other minor purposes are, indeed, kept in view. The teaching that God made the sun and moon, and that they are placed under servitude for man's use, coupled with the scarcely grammatical insertion of the words "the stars also," in verse 16, reading like a marginal note thrust into the text, all this had plainly for its object the prevention of the idolatrous veneration of the heavenly luminaries. And it succeeded. Everywhere else the sun and moon and planets were worshipped with Divine honours. Even we Christians call the names of the days of the week after them. The Jew, better taught by this first chapter of Genesis, never fell into this error. To him the heavens declared God's glory, and the firmament displayed His handiwork (Ps. xix. 1).

So in verse 21 there is a protest against the worship of the crocodile, the animal especially meant by the word translated whales. Now here we have one of the many indications of the hand of Moses. If it was this record which kept Eber and his race free from the debasing superstition of star-worship, and which made Terah and his family quit their home at Ur of the Chaldees, so by the insertion of these words Moses protected the Israelites from the animal worship so prevalent in Egypt. Equally they needed protection from the attractions of star-worship (Amos v. 25, 26); and found it where the patriarchs had found it of old.

And the history of creation is, however, never expressly called a document, as are the other ten portions of the book, and it may have been entirely revealed to Moses. Such was long my own opinion, but there are two considerations which seem to tend in a contrary direction.

For first, this narrative seems essentially the groundwork for the faith of the patriarchs. Not necessarily in the form in which we now have it, and which was given it by the hand of Moses, but in some form. And as it must have been inspired, if it was to be the foundation for man's faith, we may well believe that Moses, being guided by the same Divine inspiration, would not make any other changes in it than such as would render it more acceptable to his contemporaries. If, then, the patriarchs possessed this narrative, mainly such as it now is, they had a document of so great weight and authority as would account for their rejection of idolatry and their persistence in the belief of one sole Deity. For it is not, like the Oriental cosmogonies, a speculative attempt to solve the great difficulty of creation, namely, how a Being perfect and infinite, "with whom can be no variation" (James i. 17), changed from the passive state of not willing the existence of the universe, to the active state of willing it; and how, with almighty power and boundless goodness, He called into being a world imperfect, and marred by sorrow and sin. It is no subtle device of thinking that we find, but absolute knowledge given with authority, and of which the one purpose is to show that man from the first stood in a near relation to God, was made for converse with Him, and must set apart a portion of his time for His Creator's service. Such a narrative stands outside the physical sciences, in which man is to attain to knowledge by his own exertions. But whenever truth is reached, either in physics or in metaphysics, we could not believe a book to be inspired which was incapable of being shown to be in accordance with truth. In every age the Bible speaks to men according to their knowledge, and our increased knowledge of astronomy and geology has shown that there are profound verities in the Biblical account of Creation, concerning which even the ablest commentators without this knowledge spake with stammering lips and unintelligent tongue.

As then such absolute knowledge could have been given only by inspiration (see Job xxxviii. 4), it would be a document, whenever bestowed, that must from the first have been highly prized and religiously preserved. And if it was essential to the faith of the patriarchs it would be bestowed upon them, and probably, from early times, was a treasure in the family of Shem. Even long before the Flood, Enoch was a prophet who attained to a remarkable nearness to God, and foretold a day of judgment (Jude 14, 15). There were also other inspired men through whom God spake, and whose words would probably be recorded, and their teaching, carefully preserved, would account for the purity of the religious belief of the Semitic family as a whole, and especially for that of the race of Eber. God has made it the law of His working that He ever employs secondary causes, and the chastened monotheism of Abraham's faith must have had something to produce it. Subsequently he was himself the recipient of revelations, but these were wafted to him because he was fit for them. If he possessed this narrative of creation, his pure creed, his noble character, his trustful abandonment of his home, all become intelligible. And living in a highly-civilised, though heathen, community, and in an age when the commonest transactions of life were inscribed on tablets and cylinders of clay, there is no difficulty in believing that Abraham had carefully written, and that it was preserved until the days of Moses. And Moses, instinct with prophetic power, has placed it upon the forefront of revelation, and being himself a prophet, would record it in such a form as would make it fit for the permanent use, first, of the Jewish, and then of the Christian Church.

But had we only these considerations they would not go beyond the bound of a moderate probability. We have, in the second place, to examine the bearing upon revelation of the Babylonian Legend of the Creation. Now the actual tablets deciphered by Mr. Smith are of a comparatively late date, being of the time of Assurbanipal, a contemporary of Manasseh, the son of Hezekiah, in the seventh century before Christ; but the narrative is the Assyrian form of a far older legend.* It is grossly and even childishly polytheistic, describes the creation of the gods, and gives divine honours to the heaven, the earth, and the sea, as the three supreme deities; but in other parts there is so close a resemblance to much in the record in Genesis, that we cannot doubt that they stand in some relation to one another. The library of Assurbanipal consisted either of tablets robbed from other libraries, or of translations made from older and mainly from Assyrian works: and as our acquaintance becomes greater with the vast materials brought from Assyria, but unfortunately existing in a very fragmentary state, other Creation-tablets will probably be found, giving us the legend in many forms. What we already possess makes us aware that an account of Creation in remarkable agreement with that in Genesis existed in Assyria, but with all its sobriety and its pure monothelion gone. The legend is as corrupt as it could well be. But whence came it? We can hardly doubt that the land whence the Assyrians obtained it was Ur of the Chaldees, Abraham's cradle-like home. He had probably inherited the document, and with loving zeal tried to teach it to the Elamites in Ur, that they might know that their star-worship was the worship of the creature instead of the Creator: and it was this probably which exposed him to persecution, and so God called him away, to preserve the pure faith for future times. But if the revelation be no older than the time of Moses, and was given to him in the wilderness of Sinai when writing the Pentateuch, it would be difficult to account for the possession by the Chaldees of so much of the inspired narrative. And the same holds good of the Chaldean Legenda of the Flood, of the Tower of Babel, and of other narratives in Genesis.

To one of these we must next briefly call attention. The narrative of the invasion of Palestine by Chedorlaomer has called forth much satirical comment on the part of critics. What could be the core of a story which described a king of Elam, a sort of Switzerland lying south and east of Assyria and Persia, as carrying his arms through a region so difficult as that which lay to the north of Babylonia, and onward to the shores of the Mediterranean Sea? Moreover, this mountaineer is represented as having among his vassals a king of Sinjar, so that Babylon must have been subject to him. But we have now ancient documents deciphered for us which show that about the time of Abraham the kings of Elam were the paramount power in Asia, and that the plain of Babylonia was parcelled out among numerous towns, whose petty kings were subject to them. According to the Assyrian records the Elamite supremacy lasted for several centuries, and was not finally overthrown until B.C. 1270; and about Abraham’s time one of their kings named Khudar-Mabuk actually claimed the title of “Lord of Phcenicia,” or Palestine (see chaps. 12, 13). Mr. Gardiner points out the most complete corroboration of the Biblical narrative. The names which, though still their language is all explained by what we now know of the language of this ancient people; and we probably have in Gen. xiv, a contemporary record, carefully preserved from Abraham’s times. As the title “Lord of Phcenicia” attests the victories of Khudar-Mabuk, we conclude that he it was who imposed upon the cities of the plain the tribute which Khudar-Lagomar endeavoured to enforce.

But leaving these Assyrian legends, let us revert to the contents of the Biblical narratives of Creation. And here it would altogether exceed our limits if we attempted to show the agreement of the record in Genesis with the proved facts of science.* It must suffice to state briefly a few salient points.

First, then, the creative words in the opening record of Genesis are laws. God speaks, and not only is it done, but the law is immutably settled for all future time. The law given on the first day apparently was that grand universal law of gravitation, giving rise, as the result of the closer cohesion of matter, to electrical and chemical forces, whence spring most of the phenomena of existence. The law given on the second day was not a new departure of creative energy, but simply marks a point reached by the law given on the first. Accepting the nebular hypothesis as the only theory which satisfactorily accounts for the phenomena of Creation, there was a vast period of time during which the condensation of matter produced mainly heat and light, and only at last would our planet be so far advanced as for there to be an open “expansk around it, and solids and fluids beginning to cohere within this ring. On the third day a farther stage is reached. The sirota formed by gravitational break are partly by chemical and partly by mechanical forces, and dry land appears. This is followed by a new creative act, calling vegetable life into existence, and giving it its laws. For the higher forms of vegetation were not reached until man appeared on the earth, when “God planted a garden, and made not only fruit trees, but also all the nobler vegetation, described as “trees of the field” (Gen. ii. 9), and doubtless beyond the four corner of the ground (chap. ii. 8, 9). After the pause of the fourth day animal life is created, extending through two Divine days, until man finally appears. As on the fourth day so on the seventh, there is no new creative energy displayed, but the laws previously given move on in their mighty power. And they are immutable, because they are the ever-present will of the immutable God.

There are then but three acts of creative power, of which the first is the calling of matter into existence, as recorded in verse 1. Matter is next made subject to laws by which it is so arranged and combined as to form an orderly world, in opposition to the waste and empty abyss through which it was at first dispersed. The next creative act is the bestowment of vegetable life, narrated in verse 11. The third and final act is the bestowment of animal life, recorded in verse 20. To this we would add the creation of the human race, and of the spiritual nature of man.

* Every copy of what we will term the Genesis Legends yet found is connected, with one exception, during the reign of Assurbanipal, from c. 670; but it is stated and acknowledged on all hands that most of these tablets are not the originals, but the critics are content thus (Sayce, Gen., p. 118. This king’s library consisted of not less than 10,000 inscribed tablets (ibid., 119.

* Mr. Kirke, in his interesting work, Moses and Geology, shows that the fifteen creative events recorded by Moses correspond to the three main divisions of geological time. He also shows that the chances against their being so arranged almost defy the power of numbers to express.

6
All the rest is but arrangement; but in these four acts we attain to results which the force of mechanical or chemical laws could not produce. When science thought it was argued that light might have come to our earth from an aerolite, scientific men thereby confessed that there was nothing upon this our globe to account for it. But as the materials of aerolites are much the same as those of the earth, and as they are in fact parts of our solar system, we must go outside them, and when we find it, it is to be found, and where Moses placed it, in God.

But if thus the cosmogony in the Book of Genesis sets before us a gradual advance in creation, giving us its successive stages, and its immutable laws, and marking the introduction from time to time into the abyss of new forces, and especially of life, are we to accept evolution as the best exposition of the manner in which God wrought? I answer that the theologian has nothing to do with such questions. The unwise disputes between science and theology almost always arise from scientific men crying aloud that some new theory just hatched is a disproof of the supernatural, and from theologians debating each new theory on the ground of scriptural exposition. It is but just to the author of the theory of evolution to say that he never made this mistake. Really, every scientific hypothesis must be proved or disproved on its own ground alone, but when the few survivors of the very many theories which scientific men suggest have attained to the rank of scientific verities, then at last the necessity arises of comparing them with Holy Scripture; for we could not believe it to be the Word of God if it contradicted the book of nature, which also comes from Him. God is truth, and His Word must be true.

Now evolution is very far from having attained to the rank of a scientific verity; it is at most an interesting and ingenious theory. But should it ever win higher rank, the second account of creation is in its favour. While in the first Elohim appears in all the grandeur of the Divine majesty, creating, first, matter by a word, and then life, and finally the rational soul; in the second He appears as the Divine artificer. All is slow and gradual. He forms man, builds up the woman, plant a garden, makes trees to grow. The two accounts undoubtedly are meant to supplement one another, and it is remarkable that while the second compresses the whole of creation into one day, it nevertheless represents it as a patient and lengthy process; and when Adam was placed in the terrestrial paradise vegetable life had reached the fruit tree, and animal life had advanced to cattle—animals, that is, fit for domestication. And we have another mark of duration of time in the fact that the waters had not only formed channels for themselves, but that these had become so fixed and settled that two of the rivers of Eden exist and bear the same names at the present day.

Unfortunately for its temperate discussion, evolution is now enveloped by many of its partisans in the ugly pallide of materialism, and for this there is in the Bible no place. What, therefore, I do is to leave all the processes of creation to those who make the material universe the object of their intelligent study, I object to their crossing beyond their proper limits, which they do in arguing that our enlarged knowledge of matter and its laws militates with a belief in a governing and law-giving mind: for material science can penetrate no farther than to the phenomena of nature. It is the province of the Book of Genesis to say that was the work of an All-wise and All-mighty intelligence, and that the Infinite Mind, which we reverently call God, even called matter into being, and gave it those laws which scientific men study so wisely. I am content to believe everything which they prove in their own domain; but when they make assumptions in regions where they are but trespassers, it is mere waste of time to dispute with them. But I cannot say this without at the same time acknowledging the immense obligation under which theologians lie to the masters of the sciences of astronomy and geology; for they have enlarged our ideas of what they prove in their own domain.

Leaving, therefore, the theory of evolution to be proved or disproved on scientific grounds, we must next observe that much light is thrown upon the Biblical account of creation by our increased knowledge of the literature of Babylonia. We have seen that the form of the narrative and the arrangement of the work of creation into six days had for one main object the hallowing of the seventh day's rest. We are now aware that the division of time into weeks of seven days, and the weekly day of rest, is of extreme antiquity. Aecadian tablets of very early date show that the Sabbath was strictly observed in times anterior to those of Abraham. The Babylonian story of the flood gives to the number seven as marked an importance as is assigned to it in the narrative in Genesis; and, however, this striking difference. In the Aecadian tablets the seven days of the week are connected with the sun, the moon, and the five planets which were all then known. Our own days of the week, as mentioned before, bear testimony to the general prevalence of this idolatry of the heavenly bodies. So, also, the Babylonian narrative of the flood is intensely polytheistic. In the Book of Genesis we have the purest monothelism, without a trace of even the most ancient and most seductive forms of heathenism.

In the second narrative, chaps. ii. 4—iv. 26, creation appears only as a subsidiary part of the history. For following the rule usual in the toledoth, it is the description of that which follows upon the name given in the title. The toledoth of Adam is the history of his descendants up to the flood; that of Terah is the history of Abraham; that of Jacob is the story of Joseph. So the toledoth of creation is the narrative of the lives of Adam and Eve until their posterity was divided into the two lines of Seth and Cain. Naturally, therefore, creation appears as the work of a single day, though the stages recorded are all slowly reached, and have reference to the care taken by God of our first parents. If the mist period is referred to, when the ball of the earth was so hot as to drive off the waters in the form of vapour to the far side of the expanse, this is in contrast with the cool garden, shaded by forest trees, planted with choice kinds of fruit, and watered by rivers running in settled channels. Precious products of the earth are also mentioned, gold and pearls, and precious stones, because such things adorn civilised life. Beasts and birds, too, are thereby placed upon them. But even in Paradise Adam is not represented as being possessed of high metaphysical powers; on the contrary, he is described as in a very rudimentary state, and with his intellect undeveloped. He does not even know the difference between right and wrong, one of the very first things a child learns, though a child generally learns it in much the same way as Adam did, by doing something wrong and incurring punishment. But neither is he without use of reason, for he studies the animals, and names them after their peculiar gifts. or ways. He holds, too, a simple communion with God, who walks with him in the garden; and thus, again, man appears from the very first as a religious being, capable of and actually having intercourse with the Deity.

But amongst numerous points of surpassing interest in this second narrative, one of the most remarkable is the name given to the Deity. In the first narrative God is Elohim, a term expressive of universal might. Elohim is God in His omnipotence. In the second narrative it is Jehovah-Elohim. Now the name Jehovah holds a mysterious place in Revelation. It is, if we may reverently so speak, the personal name of God. It is no general title drawn from His attributes, but something individual, representing God, first as a person, and secondly as holding personal relations to man. The Israelites correctly expressed this when they said to Joshua, "Jehovah is our God" (Josh. xxi. 18). It was no abstraction which they worshipped, but a definite being, who stood to them in a fixed and definite relation.

But though the meaning is clear, the history of the name is full of difficulties. For in Exod. vi. 2, 3, while revealing Himself to Moses as Jehovah, God says that He manifested Himself to the patriarchs as El Shaddai, "but by my name Jehovah was I not known to them." Now this is startling when we find in Genesis, not only the origin of the name carefully recorded, and a note given of the time when it first was ascribed to Deity (chap. iv. 26), but even its general occurrence joined, nevertheless, with the utmost discrimination in its use. Even if the names El-Shaddai, El-Olam, El-Elion, are those most prominent in the history of Abraham, yet it was Jehovah who first called him from Ur (chap. xii. 1); and when after the Elamite invasion a covenant was made between God and Abraham, not only did God say, "I am Jehovah," but Abraham also addressed Him as Adonai Jehovah (chap. xv. 7, 8), wrongly rendered in our version "Lord God."

Strangely enough, the only name compounded with Jehovah, which occurs before the time of Moses, is that of Jocbeed ("Jehovah is glory"), his own mother (Exod. vi. 20). There may, of course, have been others, for the names of very few persons have been preserved. But the existence of even this one name shows that the title Jehovah was in use, and was highly honoured, and perhaps even that it was becoming more common. But the difficulty is apparent rather than real, and disappears upon an examination of the right meaning of the words in Exod. vi. 3. For if we turn to our Bibles, and examine the manner in which the word "name" is employed there, we shall find, as has been pointed out in innumerable places by commentators, that in Hebrew the name stands for the thing. What is really intended by the passage in Exodus is that the peculiar use of the name Jehovah, which had long been in process of formation, was now fully established; and whereas the Deity had hitherto been El-Shaddai, the Mighty One, henceforth, as their covenant-God, He was to be addressed as Jehovah. It had always been a title round which loving memories clustered, and which had been used with a deep sense of its importance. God had now brought out the meaning of the name in a way in which it had never been interpreted before. Eve had used it of her child, calling him, "He shall be Jehovah (Ex. iv. 1); but she had been bitterly disappointed. God now applies it to Himself; for when asked by Moses what was the special epithet by which he was to proclaim Him to the Israelites in Egypt, He answered, "I shall be that I shall be" (Exod. iii. 14). It was a name pointing onward to a future manifestation of Himself, and mysteriously indicating that the fulfillment of the promise in chap. iii. 15 would be by an incarnation of Deity. Jehovah is the third person of that which God spoke as first person. Henceforward it was to be the peculiar title of the Deity in His covenant relation with Israel, because in it were mysteriously summed up all those Messianic hopes which the prophets were to unfold. Israel's covenant-God was one "who would become" the Immanuel, God manifest in the flesh.

The words, then, in Exod. vi. 2, 3, indicate that a great culmination had been reached. The Elohim of their fathers (Exod. iii. 13), who had been worshipped under various titles, but who had chiefly been known as the Omnipotent, is henceforward to have a special title, indicative of a close relation between Him and His people. They were at length a nation, and were to have, in a few years, a country of their own; and instead of the general monotheism of the patriarchs, they were to worship still one God, but under a title that set forth, not some special attribute, but that He would manifest Himself more clearly and fully to them in time to come. It is the theocratic name, and could reasonably be given only when the theocracy was to be constituted. And thus the care and discrimination so clearly shown in Genesis in the use of the names Jehovah and Elohim is explained, and is a strong argument for the Mosaic authorship. Had we a mere jumble of extracts from a Jehovah and an Elohim, in such exactness would have been possible; for it would have been a mere matter of chance which name was employed. As it is they often appear in close juxtaposition, but each correctly used. And in this second narrative of creation, the reason for the unusual title Jehovah-Elohim is plain. God is no longer the Omnipotent, calling matter and life into existence, and giving them laws which cannot be broken; He is a loving being, arranging and providing for man's good and happiness, taking care of the most perfect of His creatures, and revealing Himself to him as his Friend. Even more important is it to notice that in this narrative the foundation is laid for the Gospel, and that the special office of Jehovah, and the reason of the name, are indicated in chap. iii. 15. And they are given in relation to all mankind; for this is a distinguishing point of the Book of Genesis, and one that indicates most plainly that its origin was prior to the giving of the Law, that while it prepares for the theocracy, it ever represents God as the God of all the world. There is none of that exclusiveness of view which grew up subsequently in the Jewish Church: the very noblest form which is presented to us is that of Melchizedek, the king-priest of a Gentile town, and who on that account is the fit type of Christ, in whom once again the bonds of union with God's Church became as wide as the world.

The remaining tetarach have, I trust, sufficiently considered in the notes. I would only, in conclusion, warn the reader against expecting that all difficulties can be cleared away. If our view be true, that Moses had before him ancient written documents, some of which had even been carried by the family of Elber to the rich and civilised city of Ur, while others, like the tetarach of the patriarchs, were recorded in their tents, then we possess in Genesis the oldest and most venerable literature in the world. There is no reason for supposing that the patriarchs could not write. Abraham came from a place where writing flourished; nor were the Canaanites an uncivilized people. It was they who carried letters to Greece, and we still use in the main their alphabet. Nor are there wanting indications of this in their history; for the town Debir, to the west of Hebron, was called Kirjath-Sepher—i.e., Book-town—by the Canaanites (Josh. xv. 15); and Kirjath-Sannah (Bird. 49), a word hard to interpret, but which many explain as meaning here some material for writing was prepared there. But independently of this, Abraham would not readily lose an art well known to him; his son and grandson were both men of domestic habits; and before Jacob's death the Israelites were settled in learned Egypt.
GENESIS.

Many of the difficulties that have been felt in the narrative refer to numbers and matters of chronology. Now God did not bestow upon men a perfect system of numeration, but left it to them to discover it for themselves. And neither Hebrews, Greeks, nor Romans did discover it; but the Arabs, comparatively a few centuries ago, invented for us that simple but accurate method which we now employ. The Hebrews at the present day express numbers by letters. Thus Aleph is put for one, Beth for two, Yod for ten, Koph for one hundred, and the highest number they can thus indicate is four hundred; but they have four hundred they can only add letters together, or try to make them express higher numerals by dots. But we do not know when this system began, nor even when their alphabet attained to its full complement of twenty-two letters. In what way numbers were previously indicated is an entire mystery, and probably the earlier genealogies of mankind were of the nature of a memoria technica, and had to be explained by oral teaching. Moreover, the great object of these lists of names was not chronology but genealogy. To this the patriarchs attached the highest value, and their justification lies in the genealogy of our Lord. From the call of Abraham it is possible to construct a chronology that cannot be far wrong, difficult as it may be to make 1 Kings vi. 1 accord with Acts xiii. 20. Previously to that date all is uncertain, and while in a religious point of view we have everything that we want, it is as impossible to construct a scientific chronology of the world from the records in Genesis, as it is to construct from those same records a scientific geology or astronomy. The Bible refuses to be put to purposes for which it was never intended.

Of numerous interesting points which remain, I will notice but one, namely, the morality of the book of Genesis. And here we must start with the acknowledged principle that there is progress throughout the Bible, and that as the light of revelation was gradually given, so with it was there a growth in morality. The least in the kingdom of heaven is in this respect greater than John the Baptist, just as he in his moral level was higher than all who had gone before (Matt. xi. 11). If then we look for a morality in the Book of Genesis as pure as that of the Gospel, we shall look in vain; and in doing so must reject our Lord's contrast in the Sermon on the Mount between His teaching and that of the great and good of old times. Yet the morality of the Book of Genesis is absolutely high, and is also such as would lead on to higher stages. Note how from the first the idea of the family, which is the root and centre of the patriarchal life, Polygamy, that great curse of the Oriental home, is from the first discomteenance. In the earthly paradise we have but one loving pair, and the woman is described as the man's counterpart (chap. ii. 18), and so as his equal. The law of marriage is given in terms so stringent and binding (chap. ii. 24) that our Lord could add nothing to them, though He draws out their force (Matt. xix. 5, 6). When polygamy appears it is in a Caineite family, marked by arrogance and cruelty. If Abraham takes to him a concubine, it is at his wife's suggestion, and for the purpose of having offspring, and not for lust. Isaac, though long without offspring, remains faithful to his barren wife. And, subsequently, when Jacob marries two sisters, though his conduct falls far below the level of Christian morality, yet he regarded Rachel as his lawful wife unjustly witheld from him; and while he had little love for Leah, and took greatly to heart the fraud practised upon him, and to which she had lent herself, yet he did not cast her away, but took care of her, treated her with honour, and finally, it would seem, reciprocated her affection. And so as regards the handmaids, while the picture is even offensive to Christian feeling, we again notice that the dominant idea was that of off-spring, and that it was the act of the wives at a time when each considered herself barren, and had for its purpose the increase of their family. There is nothing in it of a low and sensual character, and its suppression was regarded as abnormal; for Jacob's sons return again to the practice of monogamy. In all the pride and power of viceroyalty, Joseph is content with one wife.

As regards slavery, Abraham receives gifts of slaves from Pharaoh (chap. xii. 16), in addition to those which he had brought with him from Haran, and has so large a household as to be able to take him for the battle with Chedorlaomer three hundred and eighteen trained servants born in his own house (chap. xiv. 14). Apparently, too, there was even a trade in slaves (chap. xvii. 27). Such was also the case when the New Testament was written, and the apostles were content to provide for the kind treatment of the slave, while enunciating principles which naturally led to the stern disapproval of it in course of time, though its suppression was long delayed by human greed. Now in the Book of Genesis we find nothing like the preadical slavery which has disgraced modern times. The slave, whether "born in the house or bought with money," was to share in all the religious privileges of his master. The express command was given that he should be circumcised, and admitted into covenant with his master's God (chap. xxi. 13). Undoubtedly a large mass of the Israelite nation was sprung from those who had thus formed the families of the patriarchs; and we can imagine nothing that would more alleviate the lot of the "servant," would increase his own self-respect, and insure his kindly treatment, than the feeling that he thus worshipped the same God as his master, and was bound up with him in the same religious brotherhood. We do not even see him as finding at that not his nephew Lot, but a home-born slave was next in authority to Abraham over his tribe, and his prospective heir if he had no son (chap. xx. 2, 3). Nor does it surprise us that Sheshan, a highborn descendant of Hezron, should give his daughter in marriage to a slave (1 Chron. ii. 55); nor that his slave, Zilah, should have been the representative of the house of Israel until David called Melech-bosheth, the son of Jonathan, out of obscurity, and restored him to his rank (2 Sam. ix. 2, &c.).

In the denial of their wives both Abraham and Isaac fail as regards truthfulness. It is undoubtedly the case that wherever men occupy a position of danger, they are too apt to have recourse habitually to artifice to insure their safety. In the East to this day it is well-nigh the universal rule to give false answers, not merely to escape from peril, but even simply to conform to the supposed wishes of the questioner. We may well suppose that the few men of the Semitic race, surrounded by an overwhelming number of Elamites and aliens at Ur, and in the plains of Babylonia, were exposed to this temptation; and probably truthfulness in the face of danger and death is a heroic virtue which we have learned from Christian martyrs. But while we thus find the patriarchs deficient in this high quality, the two narratives condemn their want of faith. In both cases their ruse involves them in danger and difficulty.
They are reproved by heathen mouths, and learn that truthfulness would have been their wisest policy.

Finally, the sacrifice of Isaac by his father has often been condemned in unmeasured terms. We have here, they say, the father of the faithful tempted to commit a crime, which every dictate of a pure conscience would have condemned. Human sacrifice is the blackest outcome of fanaticism and morbid superstition, and no supposed revelation would justify a deed opposed to the laws of natural religion, and absolutely wrong in itself. A command requiring the commission of a crime ought in all cases, without exception, to be disobeyed. But, first of all, the supposed effect of a justification of human sacrifice never has resulted from the patriarch's example. No Jew ever derived from it the conclusion that there might be circumstances under which a father might offer his child to God. The conclusion which they deduced from the occurrence was "that God would provide" the great sacrifice (chap. xxii. 14, see Notes). How can an act be immoral from which no immoral consequences have resulted, and which has ever been so interpreted as to condemn the very practice which these crities supposed that it favoured? But in sober truth, there are far higher considerations involved in this history.
The Bible must and always will be the object of constant attack from those who stand outside it, but what may we ask, has been the view of Abraham's conduct inside the Church? We may safely say that there, by Jew of old, and Christian now, it has ever been regarded as the crowning act of Abraham's life. To it we believe that our Lord referred when He said, "Your father Abraham rejoiced to see my day; and he saw it, and was glad" (John viii. 56). For there the whole mystery of God's redeeming love was set forth, and while only the great facts were recorded as a parable, for men to muse over until the interpretation came, we may conclude from our Lord's words that to Abraham was revealed the interpretation of the solemn mystery in which he had taken part. We have repeatedly pointed out that in the Book of Genesis we have the germ of every future doctrine of revelation. This would not be true if we had not in this narrative the anticipation of the teaching that "God so loved the world that He gave His only begotten Son, that whatsoever believeth in Him should not perish, but have everlasting life" (John iii. 16).
THE FIRST BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED

GENESIS.

CHAPTER I.—(1) In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth. (2) And the earth was without form, and void; and darkness was upon the face of the deep. And the Spirit of God moved upon the face of the waters.

The heaven and the earth.—The normal phrase in the Bible for the universe (Deut. xxxii. 1; Ps. cxlviii. 13; Isa. i. 2). To the Hebrew this consisted of our one planet and the atmosphere surrounding it, in which he beheld the sun, moon, and stars. But it is one of the more than human qualities of the language of the Holy Scriptures that, while written by men whose knowledge was in accordance with their times, it does not contradict the increased knowledge of later times. Contemporaneous with the creation of the earth was the calling into existence, not merely perhaps of our solar system, but of that sidereal universe of which we form so small a part; but naturally in the Bible our attention is confined to that which chiefly concerns ourselves.

And the earth.—The conjunction "and" negatives the well-meant attempt to harmonise geology and Scripture by taking verse 1 as a mere heading; the two verses go together, and form a general summary of creation, which is afterwards divided into its several stages.

Was is not the copula, but the substantive verb existed, and expresses duration of time. After creation, the earth existed as a shapeless and empty waste.

Without form, and void.—Literally, boho and boho, which words are both substantives, and signify vastness and emptiness. The similarity of their forms, joined with the harshness of their sound, made them pass almost into a proverb for everything that was dreary and desolate (Isa. xxxiv. 11; Jer. iv. 23). It expresses here the state of primaeval matter immediately after creation, when as yet there was no cohesion between the separate particles.

Darkness.—As light is the result either of the condensation of matter or of vibrations caused by chemical action, this exactly agrees with the previous representation of the chaos out of which the earth was to be shaped. It existed at present only as an incoherent waste of emptiness.

The deep.—Tehom. This word, from a root signifying confusion or disturbance, is poetically applied to the ocean, as in Ps. xlii. 7, from the restless motion of its waves, but is used here to describe the chaos as a surging mass of shapeless matter. In the Babylonian legend, Tiamat, the Hebrew tehom, is represented as overcome by Marduk, who out of the primaeval turmoil brings order and beauty (Sacye, Chaldean Genesis, pp. 59, 109, 113).

The Spirit of God.—Heb., a wind of God, i.e., a mighty wind, as rendered by the Targum and most Jewish interpreters. (See Note on chap. xxii. 6.) So the wind of Jehovah makes the grass wither (Isa. xi. 7); and so God makes the winds His messengers (Ps. civ. 4). The argument that no wind at present existed because the atmo-
And God said, Let there be light; and there was light. (4) And God saw the light, that it was good; and God divided the light from the darkness. (5)

And God called the light Day, and the darkness he called Night. And the evening and the morning were the first day.

The Creative Days.

Voice and sound there could be none, nor was there any person to whom God addressed this word of power. The phrase, then, is metaphorical, and means that God created for the universe a law; and ten times we find the command similarly given. The beauty and sublimity of the language here used has often been noticed: God makes no preparation, He employs no means, needs no secondary agency. He speaks, and it is done. His word alone contains all things necessary for the fulfilment of His will. So in the cognate languages the word Ewil, ruler, is literally speaker. The Suprme One speaks: with the rest, to hear is to obey. God, then, by speaking, gives to nature a universal and enduring law. His commands are not temporary, but eternal; and whatever secondary causes were called into existence when the Elohim, by a word, created light, those same causes produce it now, and will produce it until God recalls His word. We have, then, here nature's first universal law. What is it?

Let there be light; and there was light—The sublimity of the original is lost in our language by the cumbrous multiplication of particles. The Hebrew is Thi or weighi or. Light is not itself a substance, but is a condition or state of matter; and this primary light was probably electric, arising from the condensation and friction of the elements as they began to arrange themselves in order. And this, again, was due to what is commonly called the law of gravitation, or of the attraction of matter. If on the first day electricity and magnetism were generated, and the laws given which create and control them, we have in them the two most powerful and active energies of the present and of all time—or possibly two forms of one and the same busy and restless force. And the law thus given was that of gravitation, of which light was the immediate result.

And God saw—This contemplation indicates, first, lapse of time; and next, that the judgment pronounced was the verdict of the Divine reason.

That it was good.—As light was a necessary result of motion in the world-mass, so was it indispensable for all that was to follow, incapable as neither vegetable nor animal life can exist without it. But the repeated approval by the Deity of each part and portion of this material universe (comp. Ps. civ. 31) also condemns all Manichean theories, and asserts that this world is a noble home for man, and life a blessing, in spite of its solemn responsibilities.

God called the light Day . . . Night.—Before this distinction of night and day was possible there must have been outside the earth, not as yet the sun, but a bright phosphorescent mass, such as now crowns that luminary; and, secondly, the earth must have begun to revolve upon its axis. Consequent upon this would be, not merely alternate periods of light and darkness, but also of heat and cold, from which would result important effects upon the formation of the earth's crust. Moreover, in this giving "day" and "night" names, God ordained language, and that vocal sounds should be the symbols of things. This law already looks forward to the existence of man, the one being on earth who calls things by their names.
The Firmament.

And God said, "Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters.

And God made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmament from the waters which were above the firmament: and it was so.

The Second Day.

And the evening and the morning were the second day.

And God made the firmament...
And God said, "Let the waters under the heaven be gathered together unto one place, and let the dry land appear: and it was so. (10) And God called the dry land Earth; and the gathering together of the waters called he Seas: and God saw that it was good.

(11) And God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, the herb yielding seed, and the fruit tree yielding fruit after his kind, whose seed is in itself, upon the earth: and it was so. (12) And the earth brought forth grass, and herb yielding seed after his kind, and the tree yielding fruit, whose seed was in itself, after his kind: and God saw that it was good. (13) And the evening and the morning were the third day.

imponderable ether. The work of the second day is not described as being good, though the LXX. add this usual formula. Probably, however, the work of the second and third days is regarded as one. In both there was a separation of waters; but it was only when the open expanse reached the earth's surface, and reduced its temperature, that water could exist in any other form than that of vapour. But no sooner did it exist in a fluid form than the pressure of the atmosphere would make it seek the lowest level. The cooling, moreover, of the earth's surface would produce cracks and fissures, into which the waters would descend, and when these processes were well advanced, then at the end of the third day " God saw that it was good."

(9) Let the waters... be gathered together.—The verb, as Gesenius shows, refers rather to the condensation of water, which, as we have seen, was impossible till the surface of the earth was made cool by the radiation of heat into the open expanse around it. Unto one place.—The ocean bed. We must add the vast depth of the ocean to the height of the mountains before we can rightly estimate the intensity of the forces at work on the third day. Vast, too, as the surface of the ocean may appear compared with the dry land, it is evidently only just sufficient to supply the rain necessary for vegetation. Were it less, either the laws of evaporation must be altered, with painful and injurious effects, or much of the earth's surface would be barren.

Let the dry land appear.—Simple as this might appear, it required special provision on the part of the Creator; for otherwise the various materials of the earth would have arranged themselves in concentric strata, according to their density, and upon them the water would have reposed evenly, and above it the air. But geologists tell us that these strata have been broken up and disturbed from below by volcanic agencies, while the surface has been furrowed and worn by the denuding power of water. This was the third day's work. By the cooling of the crust of the earth the vast mass of waters, which now covers two-thirds of its surface, and which hitherto had existed only as vapour, began to condense, and pour down upon the earth as rain. Meanwhile the earth parted with its internal heat but slowly, and thus, while its crust grew stiff, there was within it a mass of molten fluid. As this would be acted upon by the gravity of the sun and moon, in just the same way as the ocean is now, this inner tidal wave would rupture the thin crust above, generally in lines trending from north-east to south-west. Hence mountain ranges and deep sea beds, modified by many changes since, but all having the same final object of providing dry land for man's abode.

Let the earth bring forth grass.—This is the second creative act. The first was the calling of matter into existence, which, by the operation of mechanical and chemical laws, imposed upon it by the Creator, was arranged and digested into a cosmos, that is, an orderly and harmonious whole. These laws are now and ever in perpetual activity, but no secondary or derivèd agency can either add one atom to the world-mass or diminish aught from it. The second creative act was the introduction of life, first vegetable, and then animal; and for this nothing less than an Almighty power would suffice. Three stages of it are enumerated. The first is deshe, not "grass," but a mere greenness, without visible seed or stalk, such as to this day may be seen upon the surface of rocks, and which, when examined by the microscope, is found to consist of a growth of plants of a minute and mean type. But all endogenous plants belong to this class, and are but the development of this primary greenness. Far higher in the scale are the seed-bearing plants which follow, among which the most important are the cerealia; while in the third class, vegetation reaches its highest development in the tree with woody stem, and the seed enclosed in an edible covering. Geologists inform us that cryptogamous plants, which were the higher forms of the first class, prevailed almost exclusively till the end of the carbonaceous period; but even independently of this evidence we could scarcely suppose that fruit-trees came into existence before the sun shone upon the earth; while the cerealia are found only in surface deposits in connection with vestiges of man. Vegetation, therefore, did not reach its perfection until the sixth day, when animals were created which needed these seeds and fruits for their food. But so far from there being anything in fact creating a record to require us to believe that the development of vegetation was not gradual, it is absolutely described as being so; and with that first streak of green God gave also the law of vegetation, and under His fostering hand all in due time came to pass which that first bestowal of vegetable life contained. It is the constant rule of Holy Scripture to include in a narrative the ultimate as well as the immediate results of an act; and moreover, in the record of these creative days we are told what on each day was new, while the continuance of all that preceded is understood. The dry land called into existence on the third day was not dry enough to be the abode of terrestrial animals till the sixth day, and not till then would it bear such vegetation as requires a dry soil; and the evidence of geology shows that the atmosphere, created on the second day, was not sufficiently free from carbonic acid and other vapours to be fit for animals to breathe, until long ages of rank vegetation had changed these gases into coal. When, then, on the third day, "God said, Let the earth bring forth grass... herb yielding seed... tree." He gave the perfect command, but the complete fulfilment of that command would be gradual, as the state of the earth and the necessities of the living creatures brought forth upon it required. For in God's work
And God said, Let there be lights in the firmament of the heaven to divide the day from the night; and let them be for signs, and for seasons, and for days, and years: (15) and let them be for lights in the firmament of the heaven to give light upon the earth: and it was so. (16) And God made two great lights; the greater light to rule the day, and the lesser light to rule the night: he made the stars also. (17) And there is always a fitness, and nothing with Him is hurried or premature.

Let there be lights (luminaries) in the firmament (or expanse) of the heaven.—In Hebrew the word for light is or, and for luminary, aw-or, a light-bearer. The light was created on the first day, and its concentration into great centres must at once have commenced; but the great luminaries did not appear in the open sky until the fourth day. With this begins the second triad of the creative days. Up to this time there had been arrangement chiefly; heat and water had had their periods of excessive activity, but with the introduction of vegetation there came also the promise of things higher and nobler than mechanical laws. Now, this fourth day seems to mark two things: first, the surface of the earth has become so cool as to need heat given it from without; and secondly, there was now a long pause in creation. No new law in it is promulgated, no new factor introduced; only the atmosphere grows clearer, the earth more dry; vegetation does its part in absorbing gases; and day by day the sun shines with more unclouded brilliancy, followed by the mild radiance of the moon, and finally, by the faint gleamings of the stars. But besides this, as the condensation of luminous matter into the sun was the last act in the shaping of our solar system, it is quite possible that during this long fourth day the sun finally assumed as nearly as possible its present dimensions and form. No doubt it is still changing and slowly drawing nearer to that period with which God’s day of rest being over, the knowledge of this our creation will sound, and the sun, with its attendant planets, and among them our earth, become what God shall then will. But during this seventh day, in which we are now living, God works only in maintaining laws already given, and no outburst either of creative or of destructive energy can take place.

Let them be for signs—i.e., marks, means of knowing. This may be taken as qualifying what follows, and would then mean, Let them be means for distinguishing seasons, days, and years; but more probably it refers to the signs of the zodiac, which amenably played so important a part, not merely in astronomy, but in matters of daily life.

Seasons.—Not spring, summer, and the like, but regularly recurring periods, like the three great festivals of the Jews. In old time men depended, both in agriculture, navigation, and daily life, upon their own observation of the setting and rising of the constellations. This work is now done for us by others, and put into a convenient form in almanacks; but equally now as of old, days, years, and seasons depend upon the motion of the heavenly orbs.

To give light.—This was to be henceforward the permanent arrangement for the bestowal of that which is an essential condition for all life, vegetable and animal. As day and night began on the first day, it is evident that very soon there was a concentrating mass of light and heat outside the earth, and as the expanse grew clear its effects must have become more powerful. There was daylight, then, long before the fourth day; but it was only then that the sun and moon became fully formed and constituted as they are at present, and shone regularly and clearly in the bright sky.

He made the stars also.—The Hebrew is, God made two great lights . . . to rule the night; and also the stars. Though the word “also” carries back the stars” to the verb “made,” yet its repetition in our version makes it seem as if the meaning was that God now created the stars; whereas the real sense is that the stars were to rule the night equally with the moon. But besides this, there was no place where the stars—by which the planets are chiefly meant—could be so well mentioned as here. Two of them, Venus and Mercury, were formed somewhere between the first and the fourth day; and absolutely it was not till this day that our solar system, consisting of a central sun and the planets, with their attendant satellites, was complete. To introduce the idea of the fixed stars is unreasonable, for it is the planets which, by becoming in their turns morning and evening stars, rule the night; though the fixed stars indicate the seasons of the year. The true meaning, then, is that at the end of the fourth day the distribution of land and water, the state of the atmosphere, the alternation of day and night, of seasons and years, and the astronomical relations of the sun, moon, and planets (with the stars) to the earth were all settled and fixed, much as they are at present. And to this geology bears witness. Existing causes amply suffice to account for all changes that have taken place on our globe since the day when animal life first appeared upon the earth.

Let the waters . . . in the open firmament.—The days of the second creative triad correspond to those of the first. Light was created on the first day, and on the fourth it was gathered into light-bearers; on the second day air and water were called into being, and on the fifth day they were peopled with life; lastly, on the third day the dry land appeared, and on the sixth day it became the home of animals and man.

Bring forth abundantly the moving creature that hath life.—Literally, let the waters swarm a swarm of living soul. But the word soul properly signifies “breath,” and thus, after the long pause of the fourth day, during which vegetation was advancing under the ripening effects of solar heat, we now hasten onward to another creative act, by which God called into being creatures which live by breathing.

As vegetation began with a green tinge upon the rocks, so doubtless animal life began in the most firmament of heaven. (21) And God created great whales, and every living creature that moveth, which the waters brought forth abundantly, after their kind, and every winged fowl after his kind: and God saw that it was good. (22) And God blessed them, saying, Be fruitful, and multiply, and fill the waters in the seas, and let fowl multiply rudimentary manner, and advanced through animals, and insects up to fish and reptiles. The main point noticed in the text as to the living things produced on this day is their fecundity. They are all those creatures which multiply in masses. It does not, however, follow that the highest forms of fish and reptiles were created before the lowest form of land animal was created. All that we are taught is that the Infusoria and Ovipara preceded the Mammalia. As the most perfect trees may not have been produced till the Garden of Eden was planted, so the peacock may not have spread his grand plumes till the time was approaching when there would have been human eyes capable of admiring his beauty.

And fowl that may fly.—Heh, and let fowl, or winged creatures, fly above the earth. It does not say that they were formed out of the water (comp. chap. ii. 19). Nor is it confined to birds, but includes all creatures that can wing their way in the air.

In the open firmament.—Literally, upon the face of the expanse of heaven—that is, in front of it, upon the lower surface of the atmosphere near to the earth.

(23) God created great whales.—Whales, strictly speaking, are mammals, and belong to the creation of the sixth day. But tanai, the word used here, means any long creature, and is used of serpents in Exod. vii. 9, 10 (where, however, it may mean a crocodile), and in Dent. xxxii. 33; of the crocodile in Ps. lxiv. 13, Isa. li. 9, Ezek. xxix. 3; and of sea monsters generally in Job vii. 12. It thus appropriately marks the great Saurian age. The use, too, of the verb bārã, “be created,” is no argument against its meaning to produce out of nothing, because it belongs not to these monsters, which may have been “evolved,” but to the whole verse, which describes the introduction of animal life; and this is one of the special creative acts which physical science acknowledges to be outside its domain.

After their kind.—This suggests the belief that the various genera and species of birds, fishes, and insects were from the beginning distinct, and will continue so, even if there be some amount of free play in the improvement and development of existing species.

(22) Be fruitful, and multiply.—This blessing shows that the earth was replenished with animal life from a limited number of precurators, and probably from a small number of centres, both for the flora and for the fauna.

(23) The fifth day.—Upon the work of the first four days geology is virtually silent, and the theories respecting the physical formation of the world belong to other sciences. But as regards the fifth day, its testimony is ample. In the lowest strata of rocks, such as the Cambrian and Silurian, we find marine animals, mollusca, and trilobites; higher up in the Devonian rocks we find fish; in the Carbonaceous period we find reptiles; and above these, in the Permian, these mighty saurians, described in our version as great whales. Traces of birds, even in these highest strata, if existent at all, are rare, but indubitably occur in the Triassic series. We thus learn that this fifth day covers a vast space of time, and, in accordance with what has been urged before as regards vegetation, it is probable that the introduction of the various genera and species was gradual. God does nothing in haste, and our conceptions of His marvellous working are made more clear and worthy of His greatness by the evidence which geology affords.

(24) Let the earth bring forth.—Neither this, nor the corresponding phrase in verse 20, necessarily imply spontaneous generation, though such is its literal meaning. It need mean no more than that land animals, produced on the dry ground, were now to follow upon these produced in the waters. However produced, we believe that the sole active power was the creative will of God, but of His modus operandi we knew nothing.

On this sixth creative day there are four words of power. By the first, the higher animals are summoned into being; by the second, man; the third provides for the continuance and increase of the beings which God had created; the fourth assigns the vegetable world both to man and animals as food.

The creation of man is thus made a distinct act; for though created on the sixth day, because he is a land animal, yet it is in the latter part of the day, and after a pause of contemplation and counsel. The reason for this, we venture to affirm, is that in man’s creation we have a far greater advance in the work of the Almighty than at any previous stage. For up to this time all has been land, and the highest point reached was instinct; we have now freedom, reason, intellect, speech. The evolutionist may give us many an interesting theory about the upgrowth of man’s physical nature, but the introduction of this moral and mental freedom places as wide a chasm in his way as the first introduction of vegetable, and then of animal life.

The living creature, or rather, the creature that lives by breathing, is divided into three classes. The first is “belamah,” cattle: literally, the dumb brute, but especially used of the larger ruminants, which were soon domesticated, and became man’s speechless servants. Next comes the “crawling thing,” or rather, moving thing, from a verb translated moveth in verse 21. It probably signifies the whole multitude of small animals, and not reptiles particularly. For strictly the word refers rather to their number than to their means of locomotion, and means a swarm. The third class is the “beast of the earth,” the wild animals that roam over a large extent of country, including the carnivora. But as a vegetable diet is expressly assigned in verse 20 the earth after his kind: and God saw that it was good. (20) And God said, "Let us make man in our image, after our likeness: and let them have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over the cattle, and over all the earth, and over every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth." (22) So God created man in his own image, in the image of God created he him; male and female created he them. (23) And God blessed them, and God said unto them, 'Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth, and subdue it: and have dominion over the fish of the sea, and over the fowl of the air, and over every living thing that moveth upon the earth." (24) And God said, Behold, I have given you every herb bearing seed, which is upon the face of all the earth, and every tree, in which is the fruit attempt to give it a meaning; and the addâmah, or "flooded ground," of which we shall soon hear so much, evidently had its name from Adam.

In our image, after our likeness.—The human body is after God's image only as being the means whereby man attains to dominion: for dominion is God's attribute, inasmuch as He is sole Lord. Man's body, therefore, as that of one who rules, is erect, and endowed with speech, that he may give the word of command. The soul is first, in God's image. This, as suggesting an external likeness, may refer to man's reason, free-will, self-consciousness, and so on. But it is, secondly, in God's likeness, which implies something closer and more inward. It refers to man's moral powers, and especially to his capacity of attaining unto holiness. Now man has lost neither of these two. (Comp. chap. ix. 6; 1 Cor. ix. 7, James iii. 9.) Both were weakened and defiled by the fall, but were still retained in a greater or less degree. In the man Christ Jesus both were perfect; and fallen man, when new-created in Christ, attains actually to that perfection which was his only potentiably at his first creation, and to which Adam never did attain.

Let them have dominion.—The plural there shows that we have to do not with Adam and Eve, but with the human race generally. This, too, agrees with the whole bearing of the first chapter, which deals in a large general way with genera and species, and not with individuals. This is important as an additional proof that God's likeness and image belong to the whole species man, and could not therefore have been lost by the fall, as St. Augustine supposed.

Created.—This significant verb is three repeated with reference to man. It indicates, first, that man has that in him which was not a development or evolution, but something new. He is, in fact, the most perfect work of the creative energy, and differs from the animals not only in degree, but in kind, though possessing, in common with them, an organised body. And next, it indicates the rejoicing of the Deity at the completion of His purpose.

Every herb bearing seed . . . every tree.—Of the three classes of plants enumerated in verse 11, the two most perfect kinds are given to man for his food; while in verse 30 the birds and animals have not merely the cryptogamous plants of the first class, but every green herb granted to them for their sustenance. We are not to suppose that they did not eat seeds and fruits, but that the fundamental supply for the maintenance of animal life was the blade and leaf, and that of human life the perfected seed and ripe fruit. Man is thus from the first pointed out as of a higher organisation than the animal; and the fact that his food is such as requires preparation and cooking has been the basis, not merely of most of the refinements of life, but of a tree yielding seed; to you it shall be for meat. (30) And to every beast of the earth, and to every fowl of the air, and to every thing that creepeth upon the earth, wherein there is life, I have given every green herb for meat: and it was so.

(31) And God saw every thing that he had made, and, behold, it was very good. And the evening and the morning were the sixth day.

CHAPTER II.—(3) Thus the heavens and the earth were finished, and all the host of them. (5) And on the seventh day God ended his work which he had made; and he rested on the seventh day from all his work which he had made. (3) And God blessed the seventh day, and sanctified it: because that in it he had rested from all his work which God created and made.

(4) These are the generations of the Latin appellations. Here every idolatrous tendency is guarded against, and the Sabbath is the institution of the One Almighty God.

The host of them.—The word translated host does not refer to military arrangement, but to numbers gathered in crowds. This crowded throng of heaven sometimes means the angels, as in 1 Kings xxii. 19; often the stars. Here it is the host both of heaven and earth, and signifies the multitudes of living creatures which people the land, and seas, and air.

(2) God ended his work.—Not all work (see John v. 17; and Note in loc.), but the special work of creation. The laws given in these six days still continue their activity; they are still maintained, and there may even be with them progress and development. There is also something special on this seventh day; for in it the work of redemption was willed by the Father, wrought by the Son, and applied by the Holy Ghost. But there is no creative activity, as when vegetable or animal life began, or when a free agent first walked erect upon a world given him to subdue.

The substitution, in the LXX. and Syriac, of the sixth for the seventh day, as that on which God ended His work, was probably made in order to avoid even the appearance of Elohim having put the finishing touches to creation on the Sabbath.

(3) Sanctified it.—That is, separated it from ordinary uses, and hallowed it. Legal observance of the Sabbath did not begin till the days of Moses (Exod. xxxi. 13, xxxii. 17); but this blessing and sanctification were given prior to any covenant with man, and by Elohim, the God of nature, and not Jehovah, the God of grace. The weekly rest, therefore, is universal, permanent, and independent of the Mosaic law.

Which God created and made.—Literally, created to make. God created the world in order to make and form and fashion it. There is a work of completion which follows upon creation, and this may still be going on, and be perfected only when there is a new heaven and a new earth.

The Generations of the Heavens and of the Earth (chap. ii. 4—iv. 26).

After the hymn of creation the rest of the Book of Genesis is divided into ten sections of very unequal length, called tithdith, translated by the LXX. the Book of Genesis, or generation, whence the title given by St. Matthew to his Gospel. (See note on chap. v. 1.) This title, however, does not mean a genealogical list of a person's ancestors, but the register of his posterity. As applied to the heavens and the earth, it signifies the history of what followed upon their creation.

(4) When they were created.—Heb., in, or upon, their creation.
The Manner of Creation

GENESIS, II.

In the day.—Viewed in its several stages, and with reference to the weekly rest, there were six days of creation, which are here described as one day, because they were but divisions in one continuous act.

The Lord God.—Jehovah-Elohim. (See Excerpts at the end of this book.)

And every plant...—The Authorised Version follows the LXX. In so translating this as to make it simply mean that God created vegetation. The more correct rendering is, “There was no shrub of the field (no wild shrub) as yet on the earth, and no herb of the field had as yet sprung up.” The purpose of the writer is to prepare for the planting of the paradise, though geology teaches us the literal truth of his words. When the earth was so hot that water existed only in the form of vapour, there could be no vegetation. Rain began on the second day; on the third the vapours were so largely condensed as for the waters to form seas; and on the same day vegetation began to clothe the cool, dry surface of the ground. To understand these opening words, we must bear in mind that the object of the narrative is not now the formation of the world, but man’s relation to Jehovah, and thus the long stages of creation appear but as one day’s work.

(6) A mist.—This mist, as we learn from Job xxxvi. 27, where the same word is translated vapour, is the measure and material of the rain, and thus there was already preparation for the Divine method of watering the earth, and making it capable of producing food for man. But, as we gather from chap. i., vast periods of indefinite length intervened between the first rain and the creation of man; and in each of them numerous series of animals were introduced, adapted each to the geologic condition of its time. All this now is rapidly passed over, and three points only lightly touched; namely, first, the earth saturated with vapour, and unfit for man; secondly, the vapour condensing into rain, and the earth growing fit for man; thirdly, man.

And the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground.—Literally, formed the man (adam) dust from the ground. In this section the prominent idea is not that of producing out of nothing, but of forming, that is, shaping and moulding. So in verse 19 Jehovah forms the animals, and in verse 8 He plants a garden. As Elohim is almighty power, so Jehovah is wisdom and skill, and His works are full of contrivance and design. As regards man’s body, Jehovah forms it dust from the ground: the addimah, or fruitful arable soil, called from Adam, for whose use it was specially fitted, and by whom it was first tilled. But the main intention of the words is to point out man’s fleebleness. He is made not from the rocks, nor from ores of metal, but from the light, shifting particles of the surface, blown about by every wind. Yet, frail as is man’s body, God—breathed into his nostrils the breath of life.—The life came not as the result of man’s bodily organisation, nor as derived by evolution from any other animal, but as a gift direct from God.

And man became a living soul.—The word translated “soul” contains no idea of a spiritual existence. For in chap. i. 20, “creature that hath life,” and in verse 24, “the living creature,” are literally, living soul. Really, the word refers to the natural life of animals and men, maintained by breathing, or in some way extracting oxygen from the atmospheric air. And whatever superiority over other animals may be possessed by man comes from the manner in which this living breath was bestowed upon him, and not from his being “a living soul;” for that is common to all alike.

The whole of this second narrative is pre-eminently anthropomorphic. In the previous history Elohim commands, and it is done. Here He forms, and builds and plants, and breathes into His work, and is the companion and friend of the creature He has made. It thus sets before us the love and tenderness of Jehovah, who provides for man a home, fashions for him a wife to be his partner and helper, rejoices in his intellect, and brings the lower world to him to see what he will call them, and even after the fall provides the poor outliers with clothing. It is a picture fitted for the infancy of mankind, and speaking the language of primal simplicity. But its lesson is for all times. For it proclaims the love of God to man, his special pre-eminence in the scale of being, and that Elohim, the Almighty Creator, is Jehovah-Elohim, the friend and counsellor of the creature whom He has endowed with reason and free-will.

(8) The Lord God planted a garden.—The order followed in the text, namely, man first and the garden afterwards, is not that of chronology, but of precedence. In verse 15 we find that the garden was ready as soon as man needed a home. It was a separate plot of ground, fenced off from the rest of Eden, and planted with trees and herbs that were of choicer kinds, more fit for food, and more beautiful in foliage and blossom, than elsewhere. The word Paradise, usually applied to it, is a Persian name for an enclosed park, such as the kings of Persia used for hunting.

Eastward in Eden.—This does not mean in the eastern portion of Eden, but that Eden itself was to the east of the regions known to the Israelites. The name “Eden,” that is, pleasure-ground, occurs elsewhere, but for regions not identical with that in which the paradise was situated (2 Kings v. 12; Isa. xxxvii. 12, 14, 16; Ezek. xxvii. 23; Amos i. 5). Of its site no certain conclusions have been established, and probably the flood so altered the conformation of the ground as to make the identification of the four rivers impossible. But there can be no doubt that an eastern district of Asia is meant, and that the details at the time the narrative was written were sufficient to indicate with sufficient clearness where and what the region was. The rendering of several eastward in Eden; and there put he the man whom he had formed. (9) And out of the ground made the Lord God to grow every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food; the tree of life also in the midst of the garden, and the tree of knowledge of good and evil. (10) And a river went out of Eden to water the garden; and from thence it was parted, and became into four heads. (11) The name of the first is Pison: that is it which compasseth the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold; (12) and the gold of that land is good: there is bdellium and the onyx stone. (13) And the name of the second river is Gihon: the same is it that compasseth the whole land of Ethiopia.

versions in the beginning instead of eastward is untenable.

(9) Every tree that is pleasant to the sight, and good for food.—It has often been noticed that while the ancients do not seem to have had much taste for the beauty of the landscape, they greatly admired large and umbrageous trees. This feeling seems like a reminiscence of the joy of our first parents when they found themselves in a happy garden, surrounded by trees, the beauty of which is even more commended than the fact placed second, that they supplied wholesome and nourishing food. Two trees of the garden had marvellous qualities; for “the tree of life” had the power of so renewing man’s physical energies that his body, though formed of the dust of the ground, and therefore naturally mortal, would, by its continual use, live on for ever. The other, “the tree of knowledge of good and evil,” must have acquired this name after the fall. As long as Adam and Eve were in their original innocence they had no knowledge of evil, nor could any mere mental development bestow it upon them. They must either feel it in themselves, or see it in others, before they could know it. We conclude, then, that this was the tree to which God’s command, that they should not eat of it (comp. chap. iii. 3), was attached; and only by the breach of that command would man attain to this higher knowledge, with all the solemn responsibilities attached to it. Besides this, each tree had a symbolic meaning, and especially the tree of life (Rev. ii. 7, xxii. 2). The Chaldean legends have preserved the memory of this latter tree, and depict it as the Aselepios acid a, whence the soma juice is prepared.

(10) A river went out of Eden.—Out of the large region of which the garden formed a part. The tenses, too, are present, as if the main features of the country remained unchanged; “a river goeth forth from Eden, and falleth outside of it, and becometh four main streams.” The idea is that of a stream rising in Eden, and flowing through the Paradise, and at some distance outside of it, divided into four great rivers. This has made many suppose that the site of Paradise was in the Persian Gulf, in a region now submerged; and the Babylonian legends actually place it there, at Eridu, at the junction of the Tigris and Euphrates. The two other rivers they supposed to have been the Indus and the Nile, represented by the two coasts of the Persian Gulf. Sir H. Rawlinson suggests the Babylonian province of Gan-duniyas, where four rivers may be found; but in neither case could the ark have floated against the current of the flood up to the highlands of Armenia. We must add that many authors of note have regarded the whole as symbolical, among whom is the famous Syriac writer, Bar-Herahæus, who regards it as a description of the human body.

Neither derivation has much authority for it in the Hebrew language, and we must wait for the true explanation till the eunuch’s inscriptions have been more thoroughly examined. As two of the four rivers of Paradise rise in Armenia, so we must probably seek the other two there; but the conjectures of commentators have thus far suggested no probable identification of this stream.

Compasseth.—This word, without strictly meaning to go round, gives the idea of a devious course (comp. Is. Sam. vii. 16; Cant. iii. 3), as if the river had now reached a breadth and depth more suitable to the region.

Havilah may mean sandy land (Delitsch), or circuit region. There seems to have been more than one country of this name; but the most probable is that in South-Western Arabia, afterwards colonised by the franks (chap. x. 29), which this river skirted rather than traversed. But we know of no such river, rising in Armenia or elsewhere, which answers to this description. Besides gold of great purity, pronounced emphatically “good,” this land produced “bdellium,” a scented gum, to which manna is compared (Num. xi. 7), though the meaning even there is uncertain.

Instead of bedolach, bdellium, the Syriac reads berulch, that is, the same word in the plural, but with d instead of r. These two letters being very similar, not merely in the square Hebrew alphabet now in use, but in the original Samaritan characters, are constantly interchanged in manuscripts; and as berulch means pearls, the sense agrees better with the other productions of Havilah, gold and onyx stones. As bedolach is a quadrilateral, while Hebrew words have only three root letters, we must look to the Accadian language for its true signification, if this be really the right reading.

The onyx stone.—Though there is considerable authority for this translation, yet probably the LXX., supported by most ancient authorities, are right; regarded regarding this gem as the beryl of a light green colour (leek-stone, LXX.). The root signifies something pale, while the onyx has its name from its markings resembling those of the human nail.

(11, 12) The name of the first is Pison.—The full-flowing (Gesenius), or “free-streaming” (Furst).
And the name of the third river is Hiddekel; that is it which goeth toward the east of Assyria. And the fourth river is Euphrates.

And the Lord God took the man, and put him into the garden of Eden to dress it and to keep it. And the Lord God commanded the man, saying, Of every tree of the garden thou mayest freely eat; but of the tree of the knowledge of good and evil, thou shalt not eat of it: for in the day that thou eatest thereof thou shalt surely die.

Of the "Hiddekel" and "Euphrates" there is no doubt: the former is the Tigris, or Tigres, which is a mere Græcoising of its Oriental name, Daglath in Arabic, and Deklath in Syriac, and in the Targum of Onkelos. The word Hiddekel is startling as being a quadriliteral, but the Samaritan Codex reads the Dekel, that is, it has the article instead of the Hebrew Kheth. Mr. Sayce repeats the mere error reading Hiddekel, and says (Chald. Gen., p. 84) that Hid is the Accadian name for river. Dekel, Tigris, is said to mean an arrow. The Samaritan reading is probably right.

Euphrates.—No description is given of this as being the largest and best known of Asiatic rivers. Hence, probably, the Pison and Gihon were but small streams. Euphrates is the Greek manner of pronouncing the Hebrew Pharath, the first syllable being simply a help in sounding the double consonant. In Accadian it is called Purvat, and means "the curving water," being so named from its shape.

And the Lord God took the man (the adam), and put him into the garden of Eden. —The narrative now reverts to verse 8, but the word translated put is not the same in both places. Here it literally means He made him rest; that is, He gave it to him as his permanent and settled dwelling.

to dress it and to keep it.—The first word literally means to work it; for though a paradise, yet the garden had to be tilled and planted. Seeds must be sown and the cultivated plots kept in order; but all this really added to Adam's happiness, because the adamah, as yet uncursed, responded willingly to the husbandman's care. The other word, "to keep it," implies, however, some difficulty and danger. Though no unpropitious weather, nor blight nor mildow, spoiled the crop, yet apparently it had to be guarded against the incursion of wild animals and birds, and protected even against the violence of winds and the burning heat of the sun.

The Lord God commanded.—Probation is the law of man's moral condition now, and it began in Paradise, only the conditions there were different. (See Ecclesiastes at end of this book.)

In the day. —Used, as in verse 4, for an indefinitely long period. But just as on the third day God gave the whole law of vegetation, though trees as the highest development of that law may not have been reached until after the appearance of animal life on the earth, so the law of man's mortal life came into existence with the eating of the forbidden fruit. Contemporaneously with that act, man passed from the paradisical state, with the possibility of living for ever, into the mortal state, with the certainty sooner or later of dying. It was a new condition and constitution of things which then commenced, and to which not Adam only, but also his posterity was subject. And thus this command resembles the words of Elohim in the first chapter. By them the fundamental laws of the material universe were given and established for all time, and the word of Jehovah-Elohim equally here was a law, not for the day only on which Adam broke the command, but for all men everywhere as long as the world shall last.

It is not good . . . —In these words we have the Divine appointment of marriage, and also the declaration that the female is subsequent in order of production to the male, and formed from him. In chaps. i. 27, v. 2, the creation of male and female is represented as having been simultaneous. She is described as "a help meet for him;" Heb., a help as his front, his reflected image, or, as the Syriac translates it, a helper similar to him. The happiness of marriage is based, not upon the woman being just the same thing as the man, but upon her being one in whom he sees his image and counterpart.

Out of the ground. —The adamah; thus the physical constitutions of the animals are the same as those of the body of man. Much curious speculation has arisen from the mistaken idea that the order here is chronological, and that the animals were created subsequently to man, and that it was only upon their failing one and all to supply Adam's need of a companion that woman was called into being. The real point of the narrative is the insight it gives us into Adam's intellectual condition, his study of the animal creation, and the nature of the employment in which he spent his time. Then finally, at the end of verse 20, after numerous animals had passed before him, comes the assertion, with cumulative force, that woman alone is a meet companion for man.

And Adam gave names. —Throughout this chapter Adam is but once mentioned as a proper name; and the regular phrase in the Hebrew is the adam, that is, the man, except in the last clause of this verse. In verse 23 there is a different word for man, namely, ish. We must not confuse this giving of names to the domestic animals, nor are we to suppose a long procession of beasts and birds passing before the man, and receiving each its title. Rather, it sets him before us as a keen observer of nature; and as he pursues his occupations in the garden, new animals and birds from time to time come under his notice, and these he studies, and observes their ways and habits, and so at length gives them appellations. Most of these titles
(21) And the Lord God caused a deep sleep to fall upon Adam, and he slept: and he took one of his ribs, and closed up the flesh instead thereof; (22) and the rib, which the Lord God had taken from man, Heh, he built up into a woman. She formed as requiring both time and care on the heavily artificer's part. Thus woman is no casual or hasty production of nature, but is the finished result of labour and skill. Finally, she is brought with special honour to the man as the Creator's last and most perfect work. Every step and stage in this description is intended for the embellishment of marriage. Woman is not made from the adanah, but from the adamah. She is something that he once had, but has lost; and while for Adam there is simply the closing of the cavity caused by her withdrawal, she is moulded and re-fashioned, and built up into man's counterpart. She brings back more than the man parted with, and the Creator Himself leads her by the hand to her husband. The anthropomorphically laconic of these early chapters is part of that condescension to human weakness which makes it the rule everywhere for inspiration to use popular language. He who made heaven and earth by the fiat of His will must not be understood as having literally moulded the side taken from Adam as a sculptor would the plastic clay; nor did He assume human form that He might place her at man's side. Much of this may indeed have been represented to Adam's mind in the trance into which he had fallen; but the whole narrative has a nobler meaning, and the practical result of its teaching was that neither woman nor marriage ever sank into that utter degradation among the Jews which elsewhere aided so greatly in corrupting morals and men.

(23) This is now.—Literally, this stroke, or beat of the foot in keeping time. It means, therefore, this time, or colloquially, at last. Adam had long studied the natural world, and while, with their confidence as yet unmarred by human frailty, he called them "Adam's daughters," he still lacked the one sister companion who might make the man whole, or help him. The "perfect woman," or what the translators, doubtless from Homer, call "man's counter part," neither in feeling and sense—his flesh—but in his solid qualities. In several of the Semitic dialects bone is used for self. Thus, in the Jerusalem Lecionary (ed. Miniscclchi, Verona, 1861) we read: "I will manifesto my bone unto him." (John xiv. 21), that is, myself; and again, "I have power to lay it down of my bone." (John x. 18), that is, of myself. So, too, in Hebrew, "In the selfsame day" is "in the bone of this day." (chap. vii. 13). Thus bone of my bones means "my very own self," while flesh of my flesh adds the more tender and gentle qualities.

She shall be called Woman (Isahab), because she was taken out of Man (Isb).—Adam, who knew that he was an Ish (see Exceivus at end of this book), called the woman a "female Ish." The words of our Version, man and woman (perhaps woubman), represent with sufficient accuracy the relation of the words in the original.

(24) Therefore shall a man leave...—These are evidently the words of the narrator. Adam names this new product of creative power, as he had named others, but he knew nothing about young men leaving their father's house for the wife's sake. Moreover, in Matt. xix. 5, our Lord quotes these words as spoken by God, and the simplest interpretation of this declaration is that the inspired narrator was moved by the Spirit of God to give this solemn sanction to marriage, founded upon Adam's words. The great and primary object of this part of the narrative is to set forth marriage as a Divine ordinance. The narrator describes Adam's want, pictures him as examining all animal life, and studying the habits of all creatures so carefully as to be able to give them names, but as returning from his search unsatisfied. At last one is solemnly brought to him who is just as solemnly called man out of him, his feminizing self, and pronounces her to be his very bone and flesh. Upon this, "He who at the beginning made and shall cleave unto his wife: and they shall be one flesh. (20) And they were both naked, the man and his wife, and were not ashamed.

CHAPTER III. — (1) Now the serpent was more subtle than any beast of the field which the Lord God had made. and he said unto the woman, Yea, hath God said, Ye shall not eat of every tree of the garden? (2) And the woman said unto the serpent, We may eat of the fruit of the trees of the garden: (3) but of the fruit of the tree which is in them male and female " pronounced the Divine marriage law that man and wife are one flesh.

THE TEMPTATION AND FALL.

(23) They were both naked.—This is the description of perfect childlike innocence, and belongs naturally to beings who as yet know neither good nor evil. It is not, however, the conclusion of the marriage section, where it would be indecency, but the introduction to the account of the temptation, where it prepares the way for man’s easy fall. Moreover, there is a play upon words in the two verses. Man is aron = naked; the serpent is aron = crafty. Thus in guileless simplicity our first parents fell in with the tempting serpent, who, in obvious contrast with their untried innocence, is described as being of especial subtlety.

III.

(1) Now the serpent.—Literally, And. The Hebrew language, however, is very poor in particles, and the intended contrast would be made plainer by rendering "Now they were both naked (aronitun) . . . but the serpent was subtle (aron), more than every beast of the field." This quality of the serpent was in itself innocent and even admirable, and accordingly the LXX. translate prudent; but it was made use of by the tempter to deceive Eve; for, it has been remarked, she would not be surprised on finding herself spoken to by so sagacious a creature. If this be so, it follows that Eve must have dwelt in Paradise long enough to have learnt something of the habits of the animals around her, though she had never studied them so earnestly as Adam, not having felt that want of a companion which had made even his state of happiness so dull.

And he said unto the woman.—The leading point of the narrative is that the temptation came upon man from without, and through the woman. Such questions, therefore, as whether it was a real serpent or Satan under a serpent-like form, whether it spoke with a real voice, and whether the narrative describes a literal occurrence or is allegorical, are better left unanswered. God has given us the account of man’s temptation and fall, and the entry of sin into the world, in this actual form; and the more reverent course is to draw from the narrative the lessons it was evidently intended to teach us, and not enter upon too curious speculations. We are dealing with records of a vast and hoar antiquity, given to man when he was in a state of great simplicity, and with his intellect only partly developed, and we cannot expect to find them as easy to understand as the pages of modern history.

Yea, hath God said . . .? —There is a tone of surprise in these words, as if the tempter could not bring himself to believe that such a command had been given. Can it really be true, he asks, that Elohim has subjected His creature to such prohibition? How unworthy and wrong of Him! Neither the serpent nor the woman use the title — common throughout this section — of Jehovah—Elohim, a sure sign that there was a thoughtful purpose in giving this appellation to the Deity. It is the impersonal God of creation to whom the tempter refers, and the woman follows his guidance, forgetting that it was Jehovah, the loving personal Being in covenant with them, who had really given them the command.

(5) Ye shall be as gods.—Rather, as God, as Elohim himself, in the particular quality of knowing good and evil. It was a high bait which the tempter offered; and Eve, who at first had answered rightly, and who as yet knew nothing of falsehood, dallied with the temptation, and was lost. But we must not conclude too severely upon her conduct. It was no mean desire which led her astray; she longed for more knowledge and greater perfection; she wished even to rise above the level of her nature; but the means she used were in violation of God’s command, and so she fell. And, as usual, the tempter kept the promise to the ear. Eve knew good and evil, but only by feeling evil within herself. It was by moral degradation, and not by intellectual insight, that her ambitious wish was fulfilled.

(8) And when the woman saw . . . she took.——Heb., And the woman saw . . . and she took, &c. In this, the original form of the narrative, we see the progress of the temptation detailed in a far more lively manner than in our version. With awakened desire the woman gazes upon the tree. The fruit appears inviting to the eye, and possibly was really good for food. The whole aspect of the tree was beautiful; and, besides, there was the promise held out to her that it possessed the mysterious faculty of developing her intellectual powers. To this combined influence of her senses without and her ambition within she was unable to offer that resistance which would have been possible only by a living faith in the spoken word of God. She eats, therefore, and gives to her husband — so called here for the first time — and he eats with her. The demeanour of Adam throughout is extraordinary. It is the woman who is tempted — not as though Adam was not present, as Milton supposes, for she has not to seek him — but he shares with her at once the gathered fruit. Rather, she is pictured to us as more quick and observant, more open to impressions, more curious and full of longings than the man, whose passive behaviour is as striking as the woman's eagerness and excitability.

(7) The eyes of them both were opened.—This consciousness of guilt came upon them as soon as they had broken God's commandment by eating of the forbidden fruit; and it is evident from the narrative that they ate together; for otherwise Eve would have been guilty of leading Adam into sin after her understanding had been enlightened to perceive the consequences of her act. But manifestly her deed was not without his cognizance and approval, and he had shared, in his own way, her ambition of attaining to the Godlike. But how miserably was this proud desire disappointed! Their increased knowledge brought only shame. Their minds were awakened and enlarged, but the price they paid for it was their innocence and peace.

They sewed fig leaves together.—There is no reason for supposing that the leaves were those of the pisang (Musa paradisiaca), which grow ten feet long. Everywhere else the word signifies the common fig-tree (Ficus carica), one of the earliest plants subjected to man's use. More remarkable is the word sewed. The Syriac translator felt the difficulty of supposing Eve acquainted with the art of needlework, and renders it, "they stuck leaves together." But the word certainly implies something more elaborate than this. Probably some time elapsed between their sin and its punishment; and thus there was not merely that first hasty covering of themselves which has made commentators look about for a leaf large enough to encircle their bodies, but respite sufficient to allow of something more careful and ingenious; and Eve may have used her first advance in intellect for the adornment of her person. During this delay they would have time for reflection, and begin to understand the nature of the change that had taken place in their condition.

Aprons.—More correctly, girdles.

(8) And they heard the voice of the Lord God walking in the garden.—The matter-of-fact school of commentators understand by this that there was a thunderstorm, and the guilty pair hearing for the first time the uproar of nature, hid themselves in terror, and interpreted the mighty peals as meaning their condemnation. Really it is in admirable keeping with the whole narrative; and Jehovah appears here as the owner of the Paradise, and as taking in it His daily exercise; for the verb is in the reflexive conjugation, and means "walking for pleasure." The time is "the cool (literally, the wind) of the day," the hour in a hot climate when the evening breeze sets in, and men, rising from their noontide slumber, go forth for labour or recreation. In this description the primary lesson is that hitherto man had lived in close communion with God. His intellect was undeveloped; his mental powers still slumbered; but nevertheless there was a deep spiritual sympathy between him and his Maker. It is the nobler side of Adam's relationship to God before the fall.

Hid themselves from the presence of the Lord God.—This does not imply a visible appearance, for the whole narrative is anthropomorphic. The Fathers, however, saw in these descriptions the proof of a previous incarnation of the Divine Son (see Note on chap. xii. 7). Next, we find in their conduct an attempt to escape from the further result of sin. The first result was shame, from which man endeavoured to free himself by covering his person; the second was fear, and this man would cure by departing still farther from God. But the voice of Jehovah reaches him, and with rebuke and punishment gives also healing and hope.

(11) Who told thee that thou wast naked?—Adam had given as his excuse that which was really the consequence of his sin; but by this question God awakens his conscience, and makes him feel that what he had described as a want or imperfection was really the result of his own act. And as long as a man feels sorrow only for the results of his actions there is no repentance, and no wish to return to the Divine presence. God, therefore, in order to win Adam back to better thoughts, carries his mind from the effect to the sin that had caused it.

(12, 13) She gave me.—There is again in Adam the same passiveness which we noticed on verse 6. He has little sense of responsibility, and no feeling that he had a duty towards Eve, and ought to have watched over her, and helped her when tempted. It is a mistake to suppose that he wished to shift the blame, first upon Eve, and then upon God, who had given her to him; rather, he recapitulates the history, as if, in his view, it was a matter of course that he should act as he had done (see on verse 20), and as if he had no sense that there was any blame whatever attaching to any one. His conscience still seems utterly unmoved. Far nobler is the woman's answer. She acknowledges that she had been led astray, and, under the influence of the serpent's deceit, had broken God's commandment.

(14, 15) Unto the serpent.—As the serpent had tempted our first parents purposely and consciously in seed; it shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt bruise his heel.

(16) Unto the woman he said, I will greatly multiply thy sorrow and thy con-must wage a stern battle, and attain to victory only by effort and suffering—In this struggle man is finally to prevail, but not unscathed. And his triumph is to be made not by mere human strength, but by the coming of One who is the Woman's Seed; and round this promise Deliverer of the rest of Scripture groups itself.
Leave out these words, and all the inspired teaching which follows would be an ever-widening river without a fountain-head. But necessarily with the fall came the promise of restoration. Grace is no after-thought, but cuts the world side by side with sin. Upon this foundations the rest of Holy Scripture is built, till revelation at last reaches its corner-stone in Christ.
The outward form of the narrative affords endless subjects for curious discussion; its inner meaning and true object being to lay the broad basis of all future revealed truth.

He regards the reading of the Vulgate and some of the Fathers, ipse conteret, she shall bruise, not only is the pronom masculine in the Hebrew, but also the verb. This too is the case in the Syriac, in which language also verbs have genders. Most probably a critical edition of the Vulgate would restore even there ipse conteret, she shall bruise.

Like a large proportion of the words used in Genesis, the verb is rare, being found only twice elsewhere in Scripture. In Job ix. 17 the meaning seems plainly to be to break, but in Ps. xxxix. 11, where, however, the reading is uncertain, the sense required is to cover or veil, though Dr. Kay translates overewell. Some versions in this place translate it observe; and the Vulgate gives two renderings, namely, She shall bruise thy head, and thou shalt lie in ambush for (his her) heel (gender not marked—calculo ejus). The translation of the Authorized Version may be depended upon as correct, in spite of its not being altogether applicable to the attack of a natural serpent upon a wayfarer's heel.

(16) Unto the woman he said.—The woman is not cursed as the serpent was, but punished as next in guilt; and the retribution is twofold. First, God greatly multiplies her sorrow and her conception, that is, her sorrow generally, but especially in connexion with pregnancy, when with anguish and peril of life she wins the joy of bringing a man into the world. But also thy desire shall be to thy husband.
In the sin she had been the prime actor, and the man had yielded her too ready an obedience. Henceforward she was to live in subjection to him; yet not unhappily, because her inferiority was to be tempered by a natural longing for the married state and by love towards her husband. Among the blessings that the punishment was made very bitter by the degradation to which woman was reduced; among the Jews the wife, though she never sank so low, was nevertheless purchased of her father, was liable to divorce at the husband's will, and was treated as in all respects his inferior. In the whole penalty, as St. Paul teaches, has been abrogated (Gal. iii. 28), and the Christian woman is no more inferior to the man than the Gentile to the Jew, or the bondman to the free.

(17, 18) Unto Adam (without the article, and therefore a proper name) he said.—Lange thoughtfully thou hast hearkened unto the voice of thy wife, and hast eaten of the tree, of which I commanded thee, saying, Thou shalt not eat of it; cursed is the ground for thy sake; in sorrow shalt thou eat of it all the days of thy life; (15) thorns also and thistles shall it bring forth to thee; and thou shalt eat the herbs of the field; (19) in the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread, till thou return unto the ground; for out of it wast thou taken:

for dust thou art, and unto dust shalt thou return. (20) And Adam called his wife's name Eve; because she was the mother of all living. (21) Unto Adam also and to his wife did the Lord God make coats of skins, and clothed them. (22) And the Lord God said, Behold, the man is as one of us, to know good and evil: and now, lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the woman's punishment consists in the multiplication of her "sorrow and conception," she becomes thereby only more precious to man; and while "her desire is to her husband," Adam turns from his own punishment to look upon her with more tender love. He has no word for her of reproach, and we thus see that the common interpretation of verse 12 is more than doubtful. Adam throws no blame either on Eve or on his Maker, because he does not feel himself to blame. He rather means, "How could I err in following so noble, and in whom I recognise Thy best and choicest gift?" And with this agrees verse 6, where Adam partakes of the fruit without hesitation or thought of resistance. And so here he turns to her and calls her Chavvah, his life, his compensation for his loss, and the antidote for the sentence of death.

(21) Coats of skins.—Animals, therefore, were killed even in Paradise; nor is it certain that man's diet was until the flood entirely vegetarian (see Note on chap. i. 29). Until sin entered the world no sacrifices could have been offered; and if, therefore, these were the skins of animals offered in sacrifice, as many suppose, Adam must in some way, immediately after the fall, have been taught that without shedding of blood is no remission of sin, but that God will accept a vicarious sacrifice. This is perhaps the most tenable view; and if, with Knobel, we see in this arrival at the idea of sacrifice a rapid development in Adam of thought and intellect, yet it may not have been entirely spontaneous, but the effect of divinely-inspired convictions rising up within his soul. It shows also that the innocence of our first parents was gone. In his happy state Adam had studied the animals, and tamed them and made them his friends; now a sense of guilt urges him to inflict upon them pain and suffering and death. But in the first sacrifice was laid the foundation of the whole Mosaical dispensation, as in verse 15 that of the Gospel. Moreover, from sacrificial worship there was alleviation for man's bodily wants, and he went forth equipped with raiment suited for the harder lot that awaited him outside the garden; and, better far, there was peace for his soul, and the thought—even if still but faint and dim—of the possibility for him of an atonement.

(23) As one of us.—See Note on chap. i. 26. By the fall man had sunk morally, but grown mentally. He had asserted his indepencence, and exercised the right of choosing for himself, and had attained to a knowledge without which his endowment of free-will would have remained in abeyance. There is something painful and humiliating in the idea of Chrysostom and other Fathers that the Deity was speaking ironically, or even with insult (Augustine). All these qualities which constitute man's likeness to God—free-will, self-dependence, the exercise of reason and of choice—had tree of life, and eat, and live forever: (23) therefore the Lord God sent him forth from the garden of Eden, to till the ground from whence he was taken. (24) So he drove out the man; and he placed at the east of the garden of Eden Cherubims, and a flaming sword which turned every way, to keep the way of the tree of life.

CHAPTER IV.—(1) And Adam knew Eve his wife; and she conceived, and bare Cain, and said, I have gotten a man nature so great as to have vastly diminished the curse of labour, and made their lives easy and luxurious.

I have gotten a man from the Lord.—Rather, who is Jehovah. It is inconceivable that eth should have here a different meaning from that which it has in chap. i. 1. It there gives emphasis to the object of the verb: “God created eth the heaven and eth the earth,” that is, even the heaven and even the earth. So also here, “I have gotten a man eth Jehovah,” even Jehovah. The objection that this implies too advanced a knowledge of Messianic ideas is unfounded. It is we who read backward, and put our ideas into the words of the narrative. These words were intended to lead on to those ideas, but they were at present only as the germ, or as the filament in the acorn which contains the oak-tree. If there is one thing certain, it is that religious knowledge was given gradually, and that the significance of the name Jehovah was revealed by slow degrees. (See on verse 23.) Eve attached no notion of divinity to the name; still less did she foresee that by the superstitution of the Jews the title Lord would be substituted for it. We distinctly know that Jehovah was not even the patriarchal name of the Deity (Exod. vi. 3), and still less could it have been God's title in Paradise. But Eve had received the promise that her seed should crush the head of her enemy, and to this promise her words referred, and the title in her mouth meant probably no more than “the coming One.” Apparently, too, it was out of Eve's words that this most significant title of the covenant God arose. (See Exeversus on names Elohim and Jehovah-Elohim, at end of this book.)

Further, Eve calls Cain “a man.” Heb, יָאָד a being. (See on chap. ii. 23.) As Cain was the first infant, no word as yet existed for child. But in calling him “a being, even the future one,” a lower sense, often attached to these words, is not to be altogether excluded. It has been said that Eve, in the birth of this child, saw the remedy for death. Death might slay the individual, but the existence of the race was secured. Her words therefore might be paraphrased: ‘I have gained a man, who is the pledge of future existence.’ Mankind is thus that which shall exist. Now, it is one of the properties of Holy Scripture that words spoken in a lower and ordinary sense are often prophetic: so that even supposing that Eve meant no more than this, it would not exclude the higher interpretation. It is evident, however, from the fact of these words having been so treasured up, that they were regarded by Adam and his posterity as having no commonplace meaning; and this interpretation has a suspiciously modern look about it. Finally, in Christ alone man does exist and endure. He is the perfect man—man's highest level; so that even thus there would be a presage of immortality for man in the saying, “I have gained a man, even he that shall become.” Grant that it was then but an indefinite yearning: it was one, nevertheless, which all future inspiration was to make distinct and clear; and now, under the guidance of the Spirit, it has become the especial title of the Second Person in the Holy Trinity.

IV.

The Founding of the Family, and Commencement of the Non-Paradisiacal Life.

(1) She . . . bare Cain, and said . . . —In this chapter we have the history of the founding of the family of Cain, a race godless and wanton, but who, nevertheless, far outstripped the descendants of Seth in the arts of civilisation. To tillage and a pastoral life they added metallurgy and music; and the knowledge not only of copper and its uses, but even of iron (verse 22), must have given them a command over the resources of from the Lord. (2) And she again bare his brother Abel. And Abel was a keeper of sheep, but Cain was a tiller of the ground.

(3) And in process of time it came to pass, that Cain brought of the fruit of the ground an offering unto the Lord. (1) And Abel, he also brought of the firstlings of his flock and of the fat thereof. And the Lord had respect unto Abel and to his offering: (5) but unto Cain and to his offering he had no respect. And Cain was very wroth, and his countenance fell. (6) And the Lord said unto Cain, Why art thou wroth? and why is thy countenance fallen? (7) If thou doest well, shalt thou not be accepted? and if thou doest not... well, sin lieth at the door. And 1 unto thee shall be his desire, and thou shalt rule over him.

(9) And Cain talked with Abel his brother: and it came to pass, when they were in the field, that Cain rose up against Abel his brother, and slew him.

And the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? And he said, I know not: Am I my brother's keeper?

(10) And he said, What hast thou done? the voice of thy brother's 2blood crieth unto me from the ground. (11) And now art thou cursed despondent mood, in which thou goest about with downcast look, thou shalt lift up thy head, and have peace and good temper beaming in thine eyes as the result of a quiet conscience." The second half of the verse is capable of two meanings. First: "If thou dost not well, sin lieth (creepeth) as a beast of prey at the door, and its desire is to thee, to make thee its victim; but thou shalt rule over it, and overcome the temptation." The objection to this is: that while sin is feminine, the verb and pronouns are masculine. There are, indeed, numerous instances of a verb masculine with a noun feminine, but the pronouns are fatal, though most Jewish interpreters adopt this feeble explanation. The other interpretation is: "If thou dost not well, sin lieth (creepeth) as a beast of prey at the door, and its desire is to thee, and thou shalt rule over it. At present thou art vexed and envious because thy younger brother is rich and prosperous, while thy tillage yields thee but scanty returns. Do well, and the Divine blessing will rest on thee, and thou wilt recover thy rights of primogeniture, and thy brother will look up to thee in loving obedience." (Coup, the loving subjection of the wife in chap. iii. 16.)

We have in this verse proof of a struggle in Cain's conscience. Abel was evidently outstripping him in wealth; his flocks were multiplying, and possibly his younger brothers were attaching themselves to him in greater numbers than to Cain. Moreover, there was a more marked moral growth in him, and his virtue and piety were more attractive than Cain's barker disposition. This had led to envy and malice on the part of Cain, increased, doubtless, by the favour of God shown to Abel's sacrifice; but he seems to have resisted these evil feelings. Jehovah would not have remonstrated thus kindly with him had he been altogether reprovable. Possibly, too, for a time he prevailed over his evil tempers. It is a gratuitous assumption that the murder followed immediately upon the sacrifice. The words of the Almithy rather show that repentance was still possible, and that Cain might still recover the Divine favour, and thereby regain that pre-eminence which was his by right of primogeniture, but which he felt that he was rapidly losing by Abel's prosperity and more loving ways.

(9) And Cain talked with Abel his brother. — Heb. And Cain said unto Abel his brother. To this word some think Pentateuch, the LXX., the Syriac, and the Vulg, add, "Let us go out into the field;" but neither the Targum of Onkelos nor any Hebrew MS. or authority, except the Jerusalem Targum, give this addition any support. The authority of the versions is, however, very great: first, because Hebrew MSS. are all comparatively modern; and secondly, because all at present known represent only the Recension of the Masorites. Sooner or later some manuscript may be found which will enable scholars to form a critical judgment upon those places where the versions represent a different text. If we could, with the Authorised Version, translate "Cain talked with Abel," this would imply that Cain triumphed for a time over his angry feelings, and resumed friendly intercourse with his brother. But such a rendering is impossible, as also is one that has been suggested, "Cain told it unto Abel his brother:" that is, told all that had passed between him and Jehovah. Either, therefore, we must accept the addition of the versions, or regard the passage as at present beyond our powers.

It came to pass, when they were in the field. — The open, uncultivated land, where Abel's flocks would find pasture. We cannot suppose that this murder was premeditated. Cain did not even know what a human death was. But, as Philpsoon remarks, there was a perpetual struggle between the husbandman who cultivated fixed plots of ground and the wandering shepherds whose flocks were too prone to stray upon the tilled fields. Possibly Abel's flocks had trespassed on Cain's land, and when he went to remonstrate, his envy was stirred at the sight of his brother's affluence. A quarrel ensued, and Cain, in that fierce anger, to fits of which he was liable (verse 5), tried to enforce his mastery by blows, and before he well knew what he was doing, he had shed his brother's blood, and stood in terror before the first human corpse.

(10) And the Lord said unto Cain, Where is Abel thy brother? — It is the beauty of these early narratives that the dealings of the Deity with mankind are all clothed in an anthropomorphous form, for the reasons of which see Note on chap. ii. 7. It seems, then, that Cain at first went away, scarcely conscious of the greatness of his crime. He had asserted his rights, had suppressed the usurpation of his privileges by the younger son, and if he had used force it was his brother's fault for resisting him. So Jacob afterwards won the birthright by subtlety, and would have paid the same fearful penalty but for timely flight, and rich presents afterwards. But Cain could not quiet his conscience; remorse tracked his footsteps; and when in the househgold Abel came not, and the question was asked, Where is Abel? the voice of God repeated it in his own heart, Where is Abel, thy brother? — brother still, and offspring of the same womb, even if too prosperous. But the strong-willed man resists. What has he to do with Abel? Is he his brother's keeper?"

(11) Thy brother's blood crieth unto me. — The sight he has seen of death cleaves to him, and grows into a terror; and from above the voice of Jehovah tells him that the blood he has shed calls aloud for vengeance. Thus with the first shedding of human blood that ominous thought sprang up, divinely bestowed, that the earth will grant no peace to the wretch who has stained her fair face with the life stream of man. But "the blood of Jesus speaketh better things than that of Abel" (Heb. xii. 24). The voice of one cried for justice and retribution: the other for reconciliation and peace.

(11, 12) And now (because of thy crime) art thou cursed from the earth. — Heb., from the addamath, or from the earth, which hath opened her mouth to receive thy brother's blood from thy hand; [12] when thou tillest the ground, it shall not henceforth yield unto thee her strength; a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth.

And Cain said unto the Lord, [13] 'My punishment is greater than I can bear. Behold, thou hast driven me out this day from the face of the earth; and from thy face shall I be hid; and I shall be a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth; and it shall come to pass, that every one that findeth me shall slay me.'

And the Lord said unto him, Therefore whosoever slayeth Cain, vengeance shall be taken on him sevenfold. And the Lord set a mark upon Cain, lest any finding him should kill him.

And Cain went out from the presence of the Lord, and dwelt in the land of Nod, on the east of Eden. [15] And Cain knew his wife; and she conceived, and bare Enoch: and he builded a city,

Cain was the first human being on whom a curse was inflicted, and it was to rise up from the ground, the portion of the earth won and subdued by man, to punish him. He had polluted man's habitation, and now, when he tilled the soil, it would resist him as an enemy, by refusing "to yield unto him her strength." He had been an unsuccessful man before, and outstripped in the race of life by the younger son; for the future his struggle with the conditions of life will be still harder. The reason for this follows: "a fugitive and a vagabond shalt thou be in the earth." Restless and unhappy, haunted by the remembrance of his crime, he shall become a wanderer, not merely in the adāmāh, his native soil, but in the earth. Poverty must necessarily be the lot of one thus roaming, not in search of a better lot, but under the compulsion of an evil conscience. Finally, however, we find that Cain's feelings grew more calm, and being comforted by the presence of a wife and children, "he builded a city," and had at last a home.

[13,14] My punishment (or my iniquity) is greater than I can bear.—Literally, than can be borne, or "forgiven." It is in accordance with the manner of the Hebrew language to have only one word for an act and its result. Thus work and wages are expressed by the same word in Isa. xvi. 11. The full meaning, therefore, is, "My sin is past forgiveness, and its result is an intolerable punishment." This latter idea seems foremost in Cain's mind, and is dwelt upon in verse 14. He there complains that he is driven, not "from the face of the earth," which was impossible, but from the adāmāh, his dear native soil, banished from which, he must go into the silence and solitude of an earth unknown and untraced. And next, "from thy face shall I be hid." Naturally, Cain had no idea of an omnipresent God, and away from the adāmāh he supposed that it would be impossible to enjoy the Divine favour and protection. Without this there would be no safety for him anywhere, so that he must move about perpetually, and "every one that findeth me shall slay me." In the adāmāh Jehovah would protect him; away from it, men, unseen by Jehovah, might do as they liked. But who were these men? Some commentators answer, Adam's other sons, especially those who had attached themselves to Abel. Others say that Adam's creation was not identical with that of chap. i. 27, but was that of the highest type of the human race, and had been preceded by the production of inferior races, of whose existence there are widespread proofs. But others, with more probability, think that Cain's was a vain apprehension. How could he know that Adam and his family were the sole inhabitants of the earth? Naturally he expected to find farther on what he had left behind; a man and woman with stalwart sons: and that these, regarding him as an interloper to rob them, and seeing in his ways proof of guilt, would at once attack and slay him.

[15] The Lord said unto him, Therefore.—Most of the versions have Not so, which requires only a slight and probable change of the Hebrew text.

Seventh.—Cain's punishment was severe, because his crime was the result of bad and violent passions, but his life was not taken because the act was not premeditated. Murder was more than he had meant. But as any one killing him would mean murder, the vengeance would be sevenfold: that is, complete, seven being the number of perfection. Others, however, consider that Cain's life was under a religious safeguard, seven being the sacred number of creation. In this we have the germ of the merciful law which set cities of refuge apart for the involuntary manslaughter.

The Lord set a mark upon Cain.—This rendering suggests an utterly false idea. Cain was not branded nor marked in any way. What the Hebrew says is, "And Jehovah set a mark that is, appointed, "unto Cain a sign, that no one finding him should slay him." In a similar manner God appointed the rainbow as a sign unto Noah that mankind should never again be destroyed by a flood. Probably the sign here was also some natural phenomenon, the regular recurrence of which would assure Cain of his security, and so pacify his excited feelings.

[16] Cain went out from the presence of the Lord.—See Note on chap. iii. 8. Adam and his family probably worshipped with their faces towards the Paradise, and Cain, on migrating from the whole land of Eden, regarded himself as beyond the range of the vision of God. (See Note on verse 14.)

The land of Nod.—i.e., of wandering. Knobel supposes it was China, but this is too remote. Read without vowels, the word becomes India. All that is certain is that Cain emigrated into Eastern Asia, and as none of Noah's descendants, in the table of nations in chap. x., are described as having travelled eastward, many with Philippon and Knobel regard the Mongol race as the offspring of Cain.

Cain and his descendants.

[17] Cain knew his wife.—As Jehovah had told Eve that He would "greatly multiply her conception" (chap. iii. 16), we cannot doubt but that a numerous offspring had grown up in the 130 years that intervened between the birth of Cain and that of Seth, the substitute for Abel. As a rule, only the eldest son is mentioned in the genealogies, and Abel's birth is chronicled chiefly because of his tragic end, leading to the enactment of the merciful law which followed, and to the Sundering of the human race. One of Adam's daughters and called the name of the city, after the name of his son, Enoch. (18) And unto Enoch was born Irad: and Irad begat Mehujael: and Mehujael begat Methusael: and Methusael begat Lamech. (19) And Lamech took unto him two wives: the name of the one was Adah, and the name of the other Zillah. (20) And Adah bare Jabal: he was the father of such as dwell in tents, and of such as have cattle. (21) And his brother's name was Jubal: he was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ. (22) And Zillah, she also bare Tubal-cain, an 'instructor of every artificer in rejoicing in the weapons invented by his son, is the very opposite of the Sethite Lamech, who calls his son Noah, quiet, rest. (18-22) Lamech took unto him two wives.—Whether polygamy began with Lamech is uncertain, but it is in keeping with the insolent character of the man. The names of his wives bear testimony to the existence, even at this early date, of considerable refinement; for I can scarcely believe that we need go to the Assyrian dialect for the meaning of two words for which Hebrew suffices. They are explained in Assyrian as being elhatu, “darkness,” and tilatun, “the shades of night.” In Hebrew Adah means ornament, especially that which is for the decoration of the person; while Zillah means shadow, which agrees very closely with the Assyrian explanation. Both have distinguished children. Jabal, Adah’s eldest son, took to a nomadic life, whence his name, which means wanderer, and was looked up to by the nomad tribes as their founder. The difference between their mode of life and that of Abel was that they perpetually changed their habitation, while he remained in the neighbourhood of Adam’s dwelling. The younger, “Jabal,” that is, the music-player, “was the father of all such as handle the harp and organ.” Of these instruments, the kinnor, always translated “harp” in our version, was certainly a stringed instrument, a guitar or lyre. The other, in Hebrew ‘agog, is mentioned only in Job. xxi. 12, xxx. 31; Ps. cx. 4. It was a small wind instrument, a reed or pipe.

The son of Zillah attained to higher distinction. He is the first “sharpenet (or hammerer) of every instrument of copper and iron.” Copper is constantly found cropping up in a comparatively pure state upon the surface of the ground, and was the first metal made use of by man. It is comparatively soft, and is easily beaten to an edge; but it was long before men learned the art of mixing with it an alloy of tin, and so producing the far harder substance, bronze. The alloy to which we give the name of brass was absolutely unknown to the ancients. The discovery of iron marks a far greater advance in metallurgy, as the ore has to be smelted, and the implement produced is more precious. The Greeks in the time of Homer seem to have known it only as a rarity imported from the north; and Rawlinson (Aene, Monarchies, i. 167) mentions that in Mesopotamia, while silver was the metal current in traffic, iron was so rare as to be regarded as something very precious. The name of this hero is “Tubal-cain.” In Ezek. xxvii. 13, Tubal brings copper to the mart of Tyre, and in Persian the word means copper. Cain is a distinct name from that of Adam’s firstborn, and means, in most Semitic languages, smith; thus Tubal-cain probably signifies copper-smith.

The sister of Tubal-cain was Naamah.—The same as Naomi (Ruth i. 2), and meaning beauty, loveliness. As women are not mentioned in the genealogies, and as no history follows of this personage, her name must be given as an indication that a great advance had been made, not only in the arts, but also...
GENESIS, V.

Birth of Seth.

Seth: For God, said she, hath appointed me another seed instead of Abel, whom Cain slew.

(23) And to Seth, to him also there was born a son; and he called his name Enos: then began men to call upon the name of the Lord.

CHAPTER V. (1) This is the book of the generations of Adam.

In the day that God created man, in the likeness of God made he him;

(2) male and female created he them;

He called his name Enos.—Heb., Enoch, that is, man. We thus find language growing. Up to this time there had been two names for man: Adam, which also in Assyrian,—another Semitic dialect,—has the same meaning, as Sir H. Rawlinson has shown: and Ish, a being. (See on chap. ii. 23.) We have now Enosh, which, according to Fürst and others, signifies mortal; but of this there is no proof. Most probably it is the generic word for man, and is used as such in the Aramaic dialects. Thus in Syriac and Chaldee our Lord is styled bar-enosh, the son of man: not the son of a metal, but the son of man absolutely.

Then began men (Heb., then it was begun) to call upon the name of the Lord (Jehovah).—That is, the notion of Divinity began now to be attached to this name, and even in their worship men called upon God as Jehovah. Eve, as we have seen, attached no such idea to it; and when, in chap. iv. 3, we read that Cain and Abel brought an offering to Jehovah, these are the words of the narrator, who in the story of the fall had expressly styled the Deity Jehovah-Elohim, that is, Jehovah-God, or more exactly, the coming God, in order to show that Elohim and Jehovah are one. Two hundred and thirty-five years had elapsed between the birth of Cain and that of Enos, and men had learned a truer appreciation of the promise given to their primal mother; in chap. iii. 15, than she herself had when she supposed that her first child was to win back for her the Paradise. Probably they had no exact doctrinal views about His person and nature; it was the office of prophecy "by divers portions" to give these (Heb. i. 1). But they had been taught that "He who should be" was Divine, and to be worshipped. It is the hopeless error of commentators to suppose that Eve, and Enos, and others, knew all that is now known, and all that the inspired narrator knew. They thus do violence to the plainest language of Holy Scripture, and involve its interpretation in utter confusion. Read without these preconceived notions, the sense is plain: that the name Jehovah had now become a title of the Deity, whereas previously no such sacredness had been attached to it. It was long afterwards, in the days of Moses, that it became the personal name of the covenant God of the Jews.

Patriarchal Genealogy from Adam to Noah.

(1) This is the book of the generations of Adam.—See on chap. ii. 4, and Ezechias on the Books of Generations.

In the likeness of God.—Man is now a fallen being, but these words are repeated to show that the and blessed them, and called their name Adam, in the day when they were created.

(3) And Adam lived an hundred and thirty years, and begat a son in his own likeness, after his image; and called his name Seth: (4) and the days of Adam after he had begotten Seth were eight hundred years: and he begat sons and daughters: (5) and all the days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years: and he died.

(4) And Seth lived an hundred and five years, and begat 1 Enos: (7) and Seth lived after he begat Enos eight hundred and seven years, and begat sons and daughters: (6) and all the days of Seth were nine hundred and twelve years: and he died.

(5) The days that Adam lived were nine hundred and thirty years.—The numbers in the Bible are involved in great difficulty, owing to the Hebrew method of numeration being to attach numerical values to letters, and add them together; and as the words thus formed are unmeaning, they easily become corrupted. Hence there is a great discrepancy in the numbers as specified by the three main authorities, the Hebrew text making the length of time from the expulsion from Paradise to the flood 1656 years, the Samaritan text only 1307, and the LXX. 2262, while in almost all cases they agree in the duration of the lives of the several patriarchs. There is, however, an appearance of untrustworthiness about the calculations in the LXX., while the Samaritan transcript must rank as of almost equal authority with the Hebrew text itself. St. Jerome, however, says that the best Samaritan MSS, in his days agreed with the Hebrew, but none such have come down to us.

Not only is there no doubt that the Bible represents human life as vastly prolonged before the flood, while afterwards it grew rapidly briefer, but it teaches ns that in the Messianic age life is to be prolonged again, so that a century shall be the duration of childhood, and a grown man’s ordinary age shall be as the age of a tree (Isa. lxv. 20, 22). On the other hand, we may accept the assertion of physiologists that such as man is now, a period of from 120 to 150 years is the utmost possible duration of human life, and that no strength of constitution, nor temperance, nor vegetable diet could add many years to this limit. Hence many have supposed that in the early Biblical genealogies races or dynasties were meant, or that at a time when there were only engraved cylinders or marks scratched on stones or impressed on bricks as modes of writing, a few names only were selected, each one of whom, by the length of years assigned to him, represented an indefinitely protracted period. In proof that there was something artificial in these genealogies, they point to the fact that the Toldoth of Adam are arranged in ten generations, and that the same number of generations composes the Toldoth of Shem (chap. xi. 10—26); while in our Lord’s genealogy names are confessionally omitted in order to produce three series, each of fourteen names. It is also undeniable that in Hebrew genealogies it was the rule to omit names. Thus the genealogy of Moses contains only four individuals: Levi, Kohath, Amram, Moses (1 Chron. vi. 1—3); while for the same period there are eleven descents given in the genealogy of Jehoshua (Ibid. vii. 23—27). All this is sufficient to convince every thoughtful person that we must not use these genealogies for chronological purposes. They were not drawn up with any such intention, but to trace the line of primogeniture, and show whose was the birthright. But the longevity of the antediluvian race does not depend upon these genealogies alone, but is part of the very substance of the narrative. It has too the evidence in its favour of all ancient tradition; but it is one of the mysteries of the Bible. We learn, however, from chap. vi. 3 that it did not prove a blessing, and we possibly are to understand that a change took place at the time of the flood in man’s physical constitution, by which the duration of his life was gradually limited to 120 years.

We ought to add that modern scholarship has proved the identity of the names of the numbers up to ten in the three great families of human speech. Above ten they have nothing in common. It seems, therefore, to follow that primaeval man before the confusion of tongues had no power of expressing large numbers. Hence in these lists the generations are limited to ten, and hence too the need of caution in dealing with the mystery which underlies the protracted duration of the lives of the patriarchs.

(9) Enos lived ninety years.—This proves that the years could not have been mere revolutions of the moon, as some have supposed. So Cainan was only all the days of Mahalaleel were eight hundred ninety and five years: and he died.

(18) And Jared lived an hundred sixty and two years, and he begat Enoch:
(19) and Jared lived after he begat Enoch eight hundred years, and begat sons and daughters: (20) and all the days of Jared were nine hundred sixty and two years: and he died.

(21) And Enoch lived sixty and five years, and begat 1 Methuselah: (22) and Enoch walked with God after he begat Methuselah three hundred years, and begat sons and daughters: (23) and all the days of Enoch were three hundred sixty and five years: (24) and 1 Enoch walked with God: and he was not; for God took him.

(25) And Methuselah lived an hundred eighty and seven years, and begat seventy years of age at the birth of his son, and Mahalaleel sixty-five. In the LXX. no patriarch has a son until he is at least 162 years of age, so that the supposition there would be more tenable.

(19) Jared.—Heb., Yered. This name is supposed to mean the descent, especially of water. Hence many have endeavoured to show that he is the Indian water-god Varuna; but competent modern commentators regard all such Aryan expositions as exploded. Mr. Sayce tells us that the word in Assyrian means servant (Chald. Gen. 311), but this is not quite satisfactory. Until, however, this very ancient Semitic dialect is thoroughly explored, we are scarcely in a position to speak with certainty as to these old names.

Further, he was 162 years of age when he begat Enoch. It is probable from this that Enoch was not the eldest son, but that the birthright became his because of his special excellencies. It is also to be observed that Enoch holds the seventh place from Adam, seven being the number of perfection: that he attains to the highest rank among the patriarchs; and that he passes over into immortality without death.

(22) Enoch walked with God.—This is translated in the LXX., "Enoch pleased God," whence comes the "testimony" quoted in Heb. xi. 5. Really it gives the cause of which the Greek phrase is the effect: for it denotes a steady continuance in well-doing, and a life spent in the immediate presence of and in constant communion with God. (See Note on chap. iv. 18.)

God took him.—Instead of the mournful refrain and he died, coming like a surprise at the end of each of these protracted lives, we have here an early removal into another world, suggesting already that long life was not the highest form of blessing; and this removal is without pain, decay, or death into the immediate presence of God. Thus one of Adam's posterity after the fall succeeded in doing, though, doubtless, not without special help and blessing from the Almighty, that wherein Adam in Paradise had failed. We learn, too, from Jude 14, 15, that Enoch's was a removal from prevailing evil to happiness secured. Already, probably, the intermarriages between the Canities and Shethites had begun, and with it the corruption of mankind. Philipp. son, while regarding the phrase "God took him" as a euphemism for an early death, yet finds in it an indication of there being another life besides this one upon earth. We may further add that Enoch's translation took place about the middle of the antediluvian period, and that his age was 365, the number of the days of the year. As, however, the Hebrew year consisted of only 354 days, and the Chaldean of 360, the conclusion that Enoch was a solar deity has no solid foundation to rest upon. But see Note on chap. viii. 14.

(26) He called his name Noah.—This is the first recorded instance, since the days of Eve, of a child being named at his birth, and in both cases the name ended in disappointment. Noah brought no rest, but in his days came the flood to punish human sin. We have already noticed that this longing of Lamech for comfort is in strong contrast with the arrogance of his namesake of the race of Cain. (Comp. chap. iv. 18.)

This same shall comfort us...of our hands.—These words form a couplet in the Hebrew, and rhyme like the Arabic couplets in the Koran.

The ground (adamah) which the Lord hath cursed.—It is usual to style this section Elohistic, because it so evidently takes up the narrative at chap. ii. 3. Yet, first, the writer distinctly refers to chap. iii. 17, where it is Jehovah-Elohim who cursed the ground; and next he uses the name Jehovah as equivalent to God, according to what we are told in chap. iv. 26. Here, then, as in several other places, the idea that Genesis can be arranged in two portions, distinguished as Elohistic or Jehovahistic, according to the name of God employed in them, entirely breaks down. It is remarkable, also, that the word for "toil" in Lamech's distich is the same as that rendered sorrow in chap. iii. 16, 17, and that it occurs only in these three places.

(32) Noah was five hundred years old.—No reason is given why Noah had no son until he had attained to so ripe an age, nor, in fact, does it follow that he might not have had other sons, though unworthy of sharing his deliverance. It is remarkable also that neither of the three sons who were with him in the ark had offspring until after the flood. (See chap. xi. 10.)
From them have sprung the three great lines into which the human family is divided. Shem means name; that is, fame, glory; and he, as the owner of the birthright, was the progenitor of our Lord. Ham, the dark-coloured, was the ancestor of the Egyptian, Cushites, and other black races of Arabia and Africa. Japheth, the widener, but according to others the fair, though the youngest son, was the ancestor of most of the races of Europe, as well as of the chief nations of Asia.

VI.

(1) When men (the Adam) began to multiply.
—The multiplication of the race of Adam was probably comparatively slow, because of the great age to which each patriarch attained before his first-born was brought into the world: though, as the name given is not necessarily that of the eldest, but of the son who enjoyed the birthright, it does not follow that in every case the one named was absolutely the eldest son. There may have been other substitutions besides that of Seth for Cain; and Noah, born when his father was 182 years of age, seems a case in point. He was selected to be the restorer of mankind because of his piety, and may have had many brothers and sisters older than himself. Each patriarch, however, begat "sons and daughters," and as we find Cain building a city, he must have seen, at all events, the possibility of a considerable population settling round him. It was probably, as we saw above, about the time of Enoch, that the corruption of the family of Adam began to become general.

(2) The sons of God . . . . —The literal translation of this verse is, And the sons of the Elohim saw the daughters of the adam that they were good (beautiful); and they took to them wives whomsoever they chose. Of the sons of the Elohim there are three principal interpretations: the first, that of the Targums and the chief Jewish expositors, that they were the nobles, and men of high rank; the second, that they were angels. St. Jude, verse 6, and St. Peter, 2 Ep., ii. 4, seem to favour this interpretation, possibly as being the translation of the LXX, according to several MSS. But even if this be their meaning, which is very uncertain, they use it only as an illustration; and a higher authority says that the angels neither marry nor are given in marriage. The third, and most generally accepted interpretation in modern times, is that the sons of the Elohim were the Sethites, and that when they married for mere lust of beauty, universal corruption soon ensued. But no modern commentator has shown how such marriages could produce "mighty men . . . men of renown;" or how strong warriors could be the result of the inter-marriage of pious men with women of an inferior race, such as the Cainites are assumed to have been.

The Jewish interpreters, who well understood the uses of their own language, are right in the main point that the phrase "sons of the Elohim" conveys no idea of moral goodness or piety. Elohim constantly means mighty ones (Exod. xv. 11, marg.). (Comp. th. xii. 12, marg. xxii. 6, xxii. 8, 9, where it is translated judge; th. 25, 1 Sam. ii. 25, where also it is translated judge.) In Job i. 6 the "sons of Elohim" are the nobles, the idea being that of a king who at his durbar gathers his princes round him; and, not necessarily to multiply examples, the "sons of the Elam," the other form of the plural, is rightly translated mighty ones in Ps. xxix. 1.

Who, then, are these "mighty ones?" Before answering this question, let me call attention to the plain teaching of the narrative as to what is meant by the "daughters of men." It says: "When the adam began to multiply, and daughters were born unto them, the sons of the Elohim saw the daughters of the Adam, and took them wives," &c. But according to every right rule of interpretation, the "daughters of the adam" in verse 1 must be the same as the "daughters of the adam" in verse 2, whom the sons of the Elohim married. Now, it seems undeniable that the adam here spoken of were the Sethites. The phrase occurs in the history of Noah, just after giving his descent from Adam; Cain is absolutely passed over, even in the account of the birth of Seth, who is described as Adam's firstborn, such as legally he was. The corruption described is that of the Sethites; for the Cainites have already been depicted as violent and lustful, and their history has been brought to an end. Moreover, in verse 3, "the adam with whom God will not always strive" is certainly the family of Seth, who, though the chosen people and possessors of the birthright, are nevertheless described as falling into evil ways; and their utter corruption finally is the result of the deprivation of their women by a race superior to themselves in muscular vigour and warlike prowess.

Where, then, shall we find these men? Certainly among the descendants of Cain. In chap. iv. 17-21, we find Cain described as the founder of civil institutions and social life: the name he gives to his son testifies to his determination that his race shall be trained men. They advance rapidly in the arts, become rich, refined, luxurious, but also martial and arrogant. The picture terminates in a boastful hero parading himself before his admiring wives, displaying to them his weapons, and vaunting himself in a poem of no mean merit as ten times superior to their forefather Cain. His namesake in the race of Seth also indites a poem; but it is a groan over their hard toil, and the difficulty with which, by incessant labour, they earned their daily bread. To the simple "daughters of the adam," these men, enriched by the possession of implements of metal, playing sweet music on harp and pipe, and rendered invincible by the deadly weapons they had forged, must have seemed indeed as very "sons of the Elohim." The Sethites could not have taken the Cainite women according to their fancy in the way described, protected as they were by armed men; but the whole phrase, "whomsoever they would," recks of that arrogancy and wantonness of which the polygamist Lamech had set so notable an example. And so, not by the women corrupting nobler natures, but by these strong men setting according to their lust, the race with the birthright sank to the Cainite level, and God had no longer a people on earth worthy of His choice.

(3) And the Lord said. —As the Sethites are now always strive with man; for that he also is flesh: yet his days shall be an hundred and twenty years. (b) There were giants in the earth in those days; and also after that, when the sons of God came in unto the daughters of men, and they bare children to them, the same became mighty men which were of old, men of renown. (c) And God saw that the wickedness of man was great in the earth, and that every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. (d) And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. (e) And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them. (f) But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord.

The Days of the Giants.

GENESIS, VI.

The Wickedness of Men.

1. every imagination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil continually. (g) And it repented the Lord that he had made man on the earth, and it grieved him at his heart. (h) And the Lord said, I will destroy man whom I have created from the face of the earth; both man, and beast, and the creeping thing, and the fowls of the air; for it repenteth me that I have made them. (i) But Noah found grace in the eyes of the Lord.

the fallen race, it is their covenant Jehovah who determines to reduce the extreme duration of human life to that which, under the most favourable sanitary influences, might still be its normal length.

My spirit shall not always strive with man. —The meaning of this much-contested clause is really settled by the main purpose and context of the verse, which is the Divine determination to shorten human life. Whether, then, God's spirit be the animating breath spoken of in chaps. ii. 7, vii. 22, whereby human life is to be cut off among the spiritual part of man, his conscience and moral sense—God's best gift to him—in opposition to his flesh, the struggle henceforward is not to be indefinitely prolonged. In the first case, the struggle spoken of is that between the elements of life and death in the body; in the second, it refers to the moral probation to which man is subject. The versions generally take the former meaning, and translate "shall not dwell," or "abide"; but there is much in favour of the rendering "shall strive," though the verb more exactly means to rule, preside over, sit as judge. Literally, then, it signifies that the Divine gift of life shall not rule in man "for ever," that is, for a period so protracted as was antediluvian life. (Comp. Deut. xv. 17, &c.)

With man.—Heb. with the adam: spoken with special reference to the Sethites.

For that he also is flesh.—So all the versions; but many commentators, to avoid an Aramaism which does not occur again till the later Psalms, translate, "in their erring he is (they are) flesh." But no reason for shortening human life can be found in this commonplace assertion; and if Abraham brought these records with him from Ur, we have an explanation of the acknowledged fact that Aramæans do occur in the earlier portions of the Bible. Man, then, is "also" flesh, that is, his body is of the same nature as those of the animals, and in spite of his noble gifts and precedence, he must submit to a life of the same moderate duration as that allotted them.

Giants.—Heb., Nephilim, mentioned again in Num. xiii. 33, and apparently a race of great physical strength and stature. Nothing is more probable than that, at a time when men lived for centuries, human vigour should also show itself in producing not merely individuals, but a race of more than ordinary height. They were apparently of the Canaan stock, and the text carefully distinguishes them from the offspring of the mixed marriages. The usual derivation of the name is from a root signifying to fall; but Lenormant (Origines de l'Histoire, p. 344) prefers pâli, which means "to be wonderful," and compares the Assyrian naph, "unique in size," often found in the cuneiform inscriptions as the designation of an ogre.

The same became mighty men.—Heb., They were the mighty men that were of old, men of name. "Gibborim," mighty men (see chap. x. 8), has nothing to do with stature, but means heroes, warriors. It is also generally used in a good sense. The children of these mixed marriages were a race of brave fighting men, who by their martial deeds won for themselves reputation.

And God saw.—Really, And Jehovah saw.

Imagination.—More exactly, form, shape. Thus every idea or embodied thought, which presented itself to the mind through the working of the heart—that is, the whole inner nature of man—was only evil continually—Heb., all the day, from morning to night, without reproof of conscience or fear of the Divine justice. A more forcible picture of complete depravity could scarcely be drawn; and this corruption of man's inner nature is ascribed to the overthrow of moral and social restraints.

And it repented the Lord.—If we begin with the omniscience and omnipotence of God as our postulates, everything upon earth must be predestined and inmutable fore-ordained. If we start with man's free will, everything will depend upon human choice and action. Both these sides must be true, though our mental powers are too limited to combine them. In Holy Scripture the latter view is kept more prominently in the forefront, because upon it depends human responsibility. Thus here, the overwhelming of mankind by a flood, and the subsequent abbreviation of life, is set before our eyes as painful to the Deity, and contrary to His goodwill towards men, but as necessitated by the extreme depravity of even the chosen Sethite race.

I will destroy.—Heb., delete, rub out.

From the face of the earth.—Heb., the adamah, the tiled ground which man had subdued and cultivated.

Both man, and beast.—Heb., from man unto cattle, unto creeping thing, and unto fowl of the air. The animal world was to share in this destruction, because its fate is bound up with that of man (Rom. viii. 19-22); but the idea of the total destruction of all animals by the flood, so far from being contained in the text, is contradicted by it, as it only says that it is to reach to them. Wild beasts are not mentioned in this enumeration, probably because the domestic cattle would be the chief sufferers.

Creeping thing.—Not necessarily reptiles. (See Note on chap. i. 24.)

But Noah found grace.—This is the first place where grace is mentioned in the Bible, and with these words ends the Túdhlith Adam. It has traced man from his creation until his wickedness was so great that the Divine justice demanded his punishment. But it concludes with words of hope. Jehovah's purpose was not extermination, but regeneration; and with Noah a higher and better order of things was to begin.
These are the generations of Noah:

Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations.—“Just” is, literally, righteous, one whose actions were sufficiently upright to exempt him from the punishment inflicted upon the rest of mankind. “Perfect” means sound, healthy, and conveys no idea of sinlessness. It answers to the Latin integer, whence our word integrity, and not to perfectus. Generations (doroth) is not the same word as at the beginning of the verse (tolidheth), but simply means his contemporaries. And this he was because—Noah walked with God.—See Note on chap. v. 22.

The earth.—This is the larger word, and it occurs no less than six times in these three verses, thus indicating a more widespread calamity than if adamah only had been used, as in verse 7. But the earth that was corrupt before God was not the whole material globe, but that part which man, notably the gibborim of verse 4, had filled with violence.” Whithersoever man’s violence had spread, there his home and all his works, his built cities, his tilled land, his cattle and stores, must be entirely swept away. An absolutely new beginning was to be made by Noah, such as Adam had to undertake when he was expelled from Paradise. The reason of this necessity is next given.

All flesh had corrupted its way upon the earth.—These material things were inappraisable alike of moral good or evil, but man had made them the instruments of working his carnal will, and because of the associations connected with them they must be effaced, or rubbed out. (See Note on verse 7.)

The end of all flesh is come before me.—A metaphor taken from the customs of earthly kings. Before an order is executed the decree is presented to the sovereign, that it may finally be examined, and if approved, receive the sign manual, upon which it becomes law. I will destroy them.—Not the verb used in verse 7, but that translated had corrupted in verse 12. It means “to bring to ruin, devastate.”

With the earth.—Rather, even the earth: eth, as in chap. iv. 1. The meaning is, “I will bring them to naught, even the whole present constitution of earthly things.”

Make thee an ark.—Tehah, a word so archaic that scholars neither know its derivation, nor even to what language it belongs. It is certain, however, that it was an oblong box, not capable of sailing, but intended merely to float. In the Chaldean account of the deluge, the language everywhere is that of a

The Generations of Noah (chs. vi. 9, ix. 28).

Noah was a just man and perfect in his generations.—“Just” is, literally, righteous, one whose actions were sufficiently upright to exempt him from the punishment inflicted upon the rest of mankind. “Perfect” means sound, healthy, and conveys no idea of sinlessness. It answers to the Latin integer, whence our word integrity, and not to perfectus. Generations (doroth) is not the same word as at the beginning of the verse (tolidheth), but simply means his contemporaries. And this he was because—Noah walked with God.—See Note on chap. v. 22.

The earth.—This is the larger word, and it occurs no less than six times in these three verses, thus indicating a more widespread calamity than if adamah only had been used, as in verse 7. But the earth that was corrupt before God was not the whole material globe, but that part which man, notably the gibborim of verse 4, had filled with violence.” Whithersoever man’s violence had spread, there his home and all his works, his built cities, his tilled land, his cattle and stores, must be entirely swept away. An absolutely new beginning was to be made by Noah, such as Adam had to undertake when he was expelled from Paradise. The reason of this necessity is next given.

All flesh had corrupted its way upon the earth.—These material things were inappraisable alike of moral good or evil, but man had made them the instruments of working his carnal will, and because of the associations connected with them they must be effaced, or rubbed out. (See Note on verse 7.)

The end of all flesh is come before me.—A metaphor taken from the customs of earthly kings. Before an order is executed the decree is presented to the sovereign, that it may finally be examined, and if approved, receive the sign manual, upon which it becomes law. I will destroy them.—Not the verb used in verse 7, but that translated had corrupted in verse 12. It means “to bring to ruin, devastate.”

With the earth.—Rather, even the earth: eth, as in chap. iv. 1. The meaning is, “I will bring them to naught, even the whole present constitution of earthly things.”

Make thee an ark.—Tehah, a word so archaic that scholars neither know its derivation, nor even to what language it belongs. It is certain, however, that it was an oblong box, not capable of sailing, but intended merely to float. In the Chaldean account of the deluge, the language everywhere is that of a

them; and, behold, I will destroy them with the earth. (10) Make thee an ark of gopher wood; 3 rooms shalt thou make in the ark, and shalt pitch it within and without with pitch. (11) And this is the fashion which thou shalt make it of: The length of the ark shall be three hundred cubits, the breadth of it fifty cubits, and the height of it thirty cubits. (12) A window shalt thou make to the ark, and in a cubit shalt thou finish it above; and the door of the ark shalt thou set in the side thereof; with lower, second, and third stories shalt thou make it. (17) And, behold, I, even I, do bring a flood of waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh, wherein is the breath of life, from under heaven; and every thing that is in the earth shall die. (19) But with thee will I establish my covenant; and thou shalt come into the ark, thou, and thy sons, and thy wife, and thy sons' wives with thee. (19) And of every living thing of all flesh, two of every sort shalt thou bring into the ark, to keep them alive with thee; they shall be male and female. (20) Of fowls after their kind, and of cattle after their kind, of every creeping thing of the earth after his kind, two of every sort shall come unto thee, to keep them alive. (21) And take thou unto thee of all food that is eaten, and thou shalt gather it to thee; and it shall be for food for thee, and for them. (22) a Thus did Noah; according to all that God commanded him, so did he.

...
The Earth to be

GENESIS, VI. destroyed by a Flood.

the gender) from beneath, working upwards till the last cubit, which is not to be finished, but left open for ventilation and light.

The door, on which also much stress is laid in the Chaldean account as being essential for the protection of the inmates (p. 251), was to be at the side, and probably extended throughout the three storeys, two-thirds of which, however, might be closed as soon as the lower storeys had received their freightage of provisions. Besides this door, there must also have been apertures to admit of cleaning the cells in which the animals were confined and removing their litter, but of such lower arrangements no mention is made.

It is not necessary to suppose that Noah and his three sons built this vast vessel with their own hands. He was probably a powerful chieflain, and many of the Sethites may have given him aid. Implements of iron had been invented by the Canities, and on the inter-marriage of the two lines would be brought into general use. It is difficult, however, to understand how four men could feed, clean, and give water to a very large collection of animals for so many months. Without scrupulous attention to such matters, a murrain would have broken out, and as only two or many species were taken into the ark, the loss of any one of these animals would have been equivalent to the destruction of the race. The narrative, however, implies that the health of man and beast throughout the twelve months was perfect; and probably the number of the animals received into the ark was less than is commonly supposed.

(17) A flood.—Mabbal, another archaic word. It is used only of the deluge, except in Ps. xxix. 10, where, however, there is an evident allusion to the flood of Noah.

Every thing that is in the earth shall die.—That this by no means involves the theory of a universal deluge has been shown with admirable cogency by Professor Tayler Lewis in "Lange's Commentary." His view is that the writer described with perfect truthfulness that of which he was either an eye-witness, or of which he had received the knowledge by tradition; or lastly, that he recorded in his own language the impressions divinely inspired in his mind by God. "We have no right," he adds, "to force upon him, and upon the scene so vividly described, our modern notions or our modern knowledge of the earth, with its Alps and Himalayás, its round figure, its extent and diversities, so much beyond any knowledge he could have possessed, or any conception he could have formed." The excurss is too long even for condensation, but we may add, first, that the idea of unnecessary miracle is contrary both to the wisdom of the Almighty, and to what we actually find in the Bible with respect to the exercise of supernatural power; and, secondly, that the narrative itself repeatedly negatives the theory that the flood extended to any great distance beyond the regions then occupied by man. Moreover, it is in exact accordance with the use of words in Holy Scripture that the large term, the earth, is limited to the earth as known to Noah and his contemporaries. We shall also discover in what follows reason for believing that the account originally came from one who was an eye-witness; and the extreme antiquity of the language is a proof that it was committed to writing at a time long anterior to the age of Moses.

(19) My covenant.—There had been no covenant with Adam or with the Sethites, but in the higher state of things which began with Noah, man was to hold a more exactly defined relation to God; and though they had begun to attach the notion of Deity to the name Jehovah in the days of Enos (chap. iv. 26), yet it was not till the time of Moses that it became the distinct title of God in covenant with man. Of this relation a necessary result was revelation, as in no other way could there be a communication between the two contracting parties. Hence the Bible is called "The Old and New Covenant," or "The Old and New Testament." the Greek term being of wider meaning than either word with us, and signifying either an agreement between the living or the document by which a testator disposes of his property after his death (Heb. ix. 16, 17). The title of covenant is more applicable to the Scriptures of the prior dispensation, which contain a series of such relations, all preparing for the last and best and most perfect, which was a Testament ratified in the blood of Christ.

(19-23) Of every living thing of all flesh, two .—The vast size of the ark and the wide terms used of the animals to be collected into it, make it evident that Noah was to save not merely his domestic cattle, but many wild species of beasts, birds, and creeping things. But the terms are conditioned by the usual rules for the interpretation of the language of Holy Scripture, and by the internal necessities of the event itself. Thus the animals in the ark could not have been more in number than four men and four women could attend to. Next, the terms exclude the carnivora (see also Note on chap. i. 5). Not only was there no supply of animals taken on board to feed them, but half-tamed as they would have been by a year's sojourn in the ark, they would have remained in Noah's neighbourhood, and very soon have destroyed all the cattle which had been saved, especially as far and wide no other living creatures would have existed for their food. But if miracles are to be invoked to obviate these and similar difficulties, not only would it have been easier to save Noah and the denizens of the ark by one display of supernatural CHAPTER VII.—(1) And the Lord said unto Noah, Come thou and all thy house into the ark; for thee have I seen righteous before me in this generation. (2) Of every clean beast thou shalt take to thee by sevens, the male and his female: and of beasts that are not clean by two, the male and his female. (3) Of fowls also of the air by sevens, the male and the female; to keep seed alive upon the face of all the earth. (4) For yet seven days, and I will cause it to rain upon the earth forty days and forty nights; and every living substance that I have made will I destroy from off the face of the earth.

VII.

(1) Come thou.—The task of building the ark is over, and after a week, to be spent in collecting animals and birds, Noah is to take up his abode in it. Many commentators suppose that 120 years were spent in the work; but this view arises from an untenable interpretation of chap. vi, 3, which really fixes the future duration of human life.

(2) Of every clean beast—Heb. of all clean cattle—thou shalt take to thee by sevens—Heb., seven seven.—This probably does not mean seven pairs of each, though many commentators so interpret it, but seven of each kind. If, however, seven pairs be the right interpretation, but few species could have been included, as to attend properly to so large a number of animals would have been beyond the power of Noah and his sons. But which were the clean beasts? There can be no reference here to the Levitical law, which had respect to human food; nor to animals tamed and untamed, as all alike are called cattle; but probably the clean cattle were such as from the days of Adam and Abel had been offered in sacrifice. Thus provision was made for Noah’s sacrifice on his egress from the ark, and also for his possession of a small herd of such animals as would be most useful to him amid the desolation which must have existed for a long time after the flood. Of clean beasts would therefore be oxen, sheep, goats; the unclean, camels, horses, asses, and such other animals as stood in some relation to man. Of birds, the dove would especially be clean.

It has been pointed out that these more full and specific orders are given in the name of Jehovah, whereas most of the narrative of the flood is Elohist, and hence it has been assumed that some Jehovist narrator added to and completed the earlier narrative. These additions would be chap. vii, 1–6; the last clause of verse 16, Noah’s sacrifice in chap. viii, 20–22, and the cursing of Canaan in chap. ix, 18–27. Now, it is remarkable that the sacrifice is as integral a portion of the Chaldean Genesis as the sending forth of the birds (Chaldean Genesis, p. 286), and is thus inebitably older than the time of Moses. Still, there is nothing improbable in Moses having two records of the flood before him, and while the division of Genesis into Elohist and Jehovistic portions usually breaks down, there is a primâ facie appearance of the combination of two narratives in the present history, or, at least, in this one section (chap. vii, 1–6).

(4) Forty days.—Henceforward forty became the sacred number of trial and patience, and, besides the obvious places in the Old Testament, it was the duration both of our Lord’s fast in the wilderness and of His sojourn on earth after the Resurrection.

Every living substance.—The word “living” is found neither in the Hebræan nor in the ancient versions, and limits the sense unnecessarily. The word is rare, being found only twice, namely, here, in verse 23, and in Deut. xi, 6. It means whatever stands erect. Thus God “destroys”—Heb., blots out (see on chap. vii, 7)—not man and beast only, but the whole existing state of things—“from the face of the earth”—Heb., the adînâmah, the cultivated and inhabited ground. This section is much more limited in the extent which it gives to the flood, not including reptiles, or rather, small animals, among those saved in the ark, and confining the overflow of the waters to the inhabited region.

(6) Noah was six hundred years old.—It follows that Shem was about one hundred years of age (comp. chap. v, 32), and his two brothers younger; but all were married, though apparently without children. (Comp. chap. xi, 10.)

(8) Beasts.—Heb., of the clean cattle and of the cattle that was not clean. In the Chaldean Genesis, Xisuthrus takes also wild animals, seeds of all kinds of plants, gold and silver, male and female slaves, the “sons of the best,” and the “sons of the people” (pp. 280–283). There it is a whole tribe, with their chief, who are saved—here one family only.

(10) After seven days.—Said, in Jewish tradition, to have been the seven days of mourning for Methuselah, who died in the year of the flood.

(11) In the second month.—That is, of the civil year, which commenced in Tisri, at the autumnal life, in the second month, the seventeenth day of the month, the same day were all the fountains of the great deep broken up, and the windows of heaven were opened. (12) And the rain was upon the earth forty days and forty nights. (13) In the selfsame day entered Noah, and Shem, and Ham, and Japheth, the sons of Noah, and Noah's wife, and the three wives of his sons with them, into the ark; (14) they, and every beast after his kind, and all the cattle after their kind, and every creeping thing that creepeth upon the earth after his kind, and every fowl after his kind, every bird of every sort. (15) And they went in unto Noah into the ark, two and two of all flesh, wherein is the breath of life. (16) And they that went in, went in male and female of all flesh, as God had commanded him: and the Lord shut him in.
(17) And the flood was forty days upon the earth; and the waters increased, and bare up the ark, and it was lift up above the earth. (18) And the waters prevailed, and were increased greatly upon the earth; and the ark went upon the face of the waters. (19) And the waters prevailed exceedingly upon the earth; and all the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered.
(20) Fifteen cubits upward did the waters prevail; and the mountains were covered.

The Great Flood.

equinox. The flood thus began towards the end of October, and lasted till the spring. The ecclesiastical year began in Abib, or April; but it was instituted in remembrance of the deliverance from Egypt (Exod. xii.
2, xxii. 15), and can have no place here. The year was evidently the lunar year of 360 days, for the waters prevailed for 150 days (chap. vii. 24), and then abate for 150 days (chap. viii. 3). Now, as the end of the first period of 150 days is described in chap. vii. 4 as the seventeenth day of the seventh month, whereas the flood began on the seventeenth of the second month, it is plain that the 150 days form five months of thirty days each. But see farther proof on chap. viii. 14.
The fountains of the great deep broken up (Heb., cloven), and the windows (lattices) of heaven were opened.—This is usually taken by commentators as a description of extraordinary torrents of rain, related in language in accordance with the popular ideas of the time and of the narrator himself.
The rains poured down as though the flood-gates which usually shut in the upper waters were thrown open, while from the abysses of the earth the subterranean ocean burst its way upwards. But the words at least suggest the idea of a great cosmic catastrophe, by which some vast body of water was set loose. Without some such natural convection it is very difficult to understand how the ark, a vessel incapable of sailing, could have gone against the current up to the water-shed of Ararat. As the annual evaporation of the earth is also a comparatively fixed quantity, the concentrated downpour of it for forty days and nights would scarcely have produced a flood so vast as the deluge of Noah evidently was. It is thus probable that there was, besides the rains, some vast displacement of water which helped in producing these terrific effects.

We shall have occasion subsequently to notice the exactness of the dates (chap. viii. 14). Tradition might for a short time hand them down correctly, but they must soon have been committed to writing, or confusion would inevitably have crept in.

In the selfsame day.—Heb., in the bone of this day. (See Note on chap. ii. 23.)
(14) Every beast.—Heb., every living thing (as in chap. vii. 1), but probably we are to supply "of the field," and thus it would mean the wild animals.
The cattle.—Behemah. (See Note on chap. i. 24.)

Creeping thing.—Not specially reptiles, but all small animals (see ibid.). The last clause literally is, every fowl after its kind, every bird, every wing;
whence some understand it as meaning three kinds of winged beings: birds generally, next singing-birds, and lastly, bats, insects, and other such creatures. It more probably means "birds of all sorts."

The Lord (Jehovah) shut him in.—The assigning to Jehovah of this act of personal care for Noah is very remarkable. In the Chaldean Genesis (p. 283), the Deity commands Xisuthrus to shut himself in.

The waters increased . . .—The swelling of the flood is told with great power in these verses, but every stage and detail has reference to the ark, as if the author of the narrative was one of those on board.
First, the "waters increased," and raised up the ark till it floated. Next, "they became strong and increased exceedingly"—the word rendered "prevailed" really signifying the setting in of mighty currents (see on chap. viii. 1), as the waters sought the lower ground—and at this stage the ark began to move. Finally, they "became strong exceedingly, exceedingly," rushing along with ever-increasing force, and carrying the ark high above every hill in its course. Of these it is said—
All the high hills, that were under the whole heaven, were covered.—Interpreting this by the English Version, many regard it as a proof of the deluge having been universal. But omitting the well-known fact that in the Bible the word "all" means much less than with us, we must also remember that the Hebrew language has a very small vocabulary, and "the whole heaven" means simply the whole sky. We with our composite language borrow a word for it from the Greek, and say "the whole horizon," that is, the whole heaven, bounded by the line of the spectator's vision.
So then here. Far and wide, in every direction, to the utmost reach of the beholder's gaze, no mountain was in sight. All was a surging waste of flood. But there is no idea here of the mountains of Auvergne, with the ashes of old-world volcanoes still reposing upon their craters, extinct from a time probably long before the creation even of man. The mountains were those of the Noachian world, as limited as the Roman world of Luke ii. 1, or even more so.

Fifteen cubits upward.—This apparently was the draught of the ark, computed after it had settled
In the region of Ararat. Fifteen cubits would be about twenty-two feet, and as the ark floated onward without interruption until it finally grounded, there must have been this depth of water even on the highest summit in its course. Continuous rains for forty days and nights would scarcely produce so vast a mass of water, unless we suppose that the addamah was some low-lying spot of ground whither the waters from many regions flowed together; but this is negatived by the ark having travelled into Armenia. In England the whole average mean rainfall in a year is not more than twenty-eight or thirty inches in depth. If we suppose this amount to have fallen in every twenty-four hours, the total quantity would be about 100 feet. Such a wind would denude the mountains of all soil, uproot all trees, sweep away all buildings, dig out new courses for the rivers, completely alter the whole surface of the ground, and cover the lower lands with débris. Wherever there was any obstacle in their way, the waters would deepen in volume, and quickly burst a passage through it. But as they would be seeking the lower grounds during the whole forty days, it is difficult to understand how they could cover any of the heights to the depth of twenty-two feet, unless there were some cosmic convulsion (see Note on verse 11), by which the waters from the equator were carried towards the poles, and in this way there would be no difficulty in the ark being carried against the current of the Tigris and Euphrates up to the high lands of Armenia.

(23) Every living substance. Every thing that stood erect. (See Note on verse 4.)

Upon the face of the ground. The addamah, the portion subdued to his use by the adam, man.

(21) Prevailed. Heb., were strong, as in verse 18. The rains lasted forty days; for one hundred and ten more days they still bore up the ark, and then it grounded. But though still mighty, they had by this time "abated" (see chap. viii. 3); inasmuch as, instead of covering the hills to the depth of nearly four fathoms, the ark now had touched dry land. Again, then, the narrative seems to give the personal experiences of some one in the ark.

VIII.

(1) God. Elohim. On the Jehovahistic theory, one would have expected Jehovah here. (See Excursus.) Every living thing. See Note on chap. vii. 14.

The waters asswaged. Heb., became still. It is plain from this that the "strength" of the waters, described in chap. vii. 24, has reference to the violent currents, which still existed up to the end of the one hundred and fiftieth day, after which they ceased.

A wind (comp. the creative wind in chap. i. 2) began to blow as soon as the rains ceased, or even before, as must necessarily have been the case with so vast a disturbance of the atmosphere; but its special purpose of assuaging the waters only began when the downpour was over. This wind would affect the course of the ark, but scarcely so strongly as the currents of the water.

The waters returned from off the earth. This backward motion of the waters also seems to indicate that a vast wave from the sea had swept over the land, in addition to the forty days of rain.

Were abated. Heb., decreased. Those in the ark would notice the changing current, and would know, by their being aground, that the flood was diminishing. But it was not till the first day of the tenth month that the tops of the mountains were seen. This slow abatement of the waters and their stillness, described in verse 1, makes it probable that the ark had grounded on some land-locked spot.

(4) The seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month. As the months had each thirty days (see Note on verse 14), this makes exactly 150 days (see chap. vii. 11). The seventh civil month would be Abib; and the Speaker's Commentary notices the following remark, "Sufficient weather." On the 17th day of Abib the ark rested on Mount Ararat; on the 17th day of Abib the Israelites passed over the Red Sea; on the 17th day of Abib, Christ, our Lord, rose again from the dead.

Ararat. If in chap. xi. 2 the Authorised Version is right in saying that the descendants of Noah travelled "from the east" to Shinar, this could not be the Ararat of Armenia. Moreover, we are told that the word in Assyrian means "highland," and thus may signify any hilly country. In the Chaldean Genesis the ark rests upon Ninis, a region to the east of Assyria, the highest peak of which, now named Elwend, is called in the cuneiform texts "the mountain of the world" (Chaldean Genesis, p. 307). The rendering, however, "from the east," is by no means certain, and many translate "eastward," and even the Authorised Version renders the word east, that is, eastward, in chap. xii. 11. In 2 Kings xix. 37 "Ararat" is translated Armenia; but it is more correctly described in Jer. lii. 27 as a country near Minni, that is, near Armenia. There are in this region two mountains of great altitude, the Aghri-Dagh and the Kara-Dagh, the highest of which is the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, upon the mountains of Ararat. (5) And the waters decreased continually until the tenth month; in the tenth month, on the first day of the month, were the tops of the mountains seen.

(6) And it came to pass at the end of forty days, that Noah opened the window of the ark which he had made: (7) and he sent forth a raven, which went forth to and fro, until the waters were dried up from off the earth. (8) Also he sent forth a dove from him, to see if the waters were abated from off the face of the ground; (9) but the dove found no rest for the sole of her foot, and she returned unto him into the ark, for the waters were on the face of the whole earth: then he put forth his hand, and took her, and 3 pulled her in unto him into the ark. (10) And he stayed yet other seven days; and again he sent forth the dove out of the ark; (11) and the dove came in to him in the evening; and, lo, in her mouth was an olive leaf pluckt off: so Noah knew that the waters were abated from off the earth. (12) And he stayed yet other seven days; and sent forth the dove; which returned, not again unto him any more.

(13) And it came to pass in the six hundredth and first year, in the first month, the first day of the month, the waters were dried up from off the earth: and Noah removed the covering of the ark, was exactly one month after the day on which Noah, for the third time, sent out the dove (verse 12):—

The flood commenced in the second month, called Marchesvan, on day 17.
The waters prevailed during 150 days = 5 months, unto month 7, day 17.
Mountain-tops seen on month 10, day 1, i.e., after . . . . 73 days.
Noah sends out raven at end of 40 "
Dove three times sent out, at intervals of 7 days . . . . = 21 "
134 "

But from the seventeenth day of the seventh month to the first day of the first month of the following year, there are:

Of the seventh month . . . . 13 days.
Five months of 30 days each . = 150 "
First day of new year . . . . 1 "
164 "

It was thus very slowly that the earth returned to its normal state. The intervals of seven days between the sending forth of the birds proved that the division of time into weeks was fully established, and also suggests that religious observances were connected with it.

The covering of the ark.—The word is elsewhere used of the covering of skins for the Tabernacle (Exod. xxvi. 14; Num. iv. 25), and it has probably a similar meaning here. To have removed the solid framework of the roof would have been a very laborious task, and still more so to have broken up the roof itself. But as the asphalt employed for filling up the interstices between the beams in the bulk of the ark would have been difficult to manage for the roof, it was apparently protected from the rain by a covering, probably of skins sewn together.

No one can read the narrative without noticing that Noah is not only described as shut up within the ark, but as having very slight means of observing what was going on around. Had there been a deck, Noah would have known exactly the state of the flood, whereas, peeping only through the skylight, he seems to have been able to see but little, possibly because his sight was obstructed by the overhanging eaves of the roof. Thus the freshly-plucked olive-leaf was like a revelation to him. But these skins were taken off, there were numerous apertures through which he could obtain an uninterrupted view, and he "looked, and behold, the face of the adiaphon was dry."
And the Lord smelled a sweet savour; and the Lord said in his heart, I will not again curse the ground any more for man's sake; for the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth; neither will I again smite any more every thing living, as I have done. (22) 2 While the earth remaineth, seedtime and harvest, and cold and heat, and summer and winter, and day and night shall not cease.

CHAPTER IX.—(1) And God blessed

chap. vii. 2). With Noah's burnt offerings we must not connect any of the later Levitical ideas. Apparently it was a simple thank-offering, the dominant thought of which was that of the hallowing man's future life by commencing it with worship. It thus contained within it the precept that a better state of things had now begun. Subsequently the thank-offering became a feast, at which the offerer and his family partook of the victim as Jehovah's guests; and as God during this sacrifice gave Noah permission to eat flesh (chap. ix. 3), it is probable that such was the case now, and that the eating of flesh was inaugurated in this solemn way. We have, however, previously seen reason to believe that the flesh of animals had occasionally been eaten before, though not as an ordinary article of diet.

(21) A sweet savour.—Heb., a smell of satisfaction. The idea is not so much that the sacrifice gave God pleasure as that it caused Him to regard man with complacency. The anger at sin which had caused the flood was now over, and there was peace between heaven and earth.

Said in his heart.—Heb., to his heart: that is, Jehovah determined with himself, came to the settled purpose. (Comp. chap. xvii. 17.)

For the imagination of man's heart is evil from his youth.—See chap. vi. 5. There seems at first sight to be an inconsistency between the two passages, and the Jehovah is accused of here contradicting the Elohist. For in the former place man's inborn sinfulness is described as an aggravation of his offence, while here it is used as a reason for mercy. But it is a characteristic of the Bible that it states the two sides of every principle with abrupt simplicity, and most heroes have arisen from seizing upon one side only, and omitting the other from view. Man is one whose every imagination of the heart is only evil continually. (Comp, Matt. xv. 19.) In the antediluvian world, with death indefinitely postponed, these imaginations had been unrestrained, and had therefore led to habitual and inveterate sin; and so justice at last had smitten it. But when man strives against them, and sin is the result of infirmity, then mercy heals and grace strengthens the penitent. When man, therefore, began his renewed life by hallowing it with religion, God saw therein the pledge of a struggle on his part after holiness, and the proof that the world would never again become totally corrupt. In this changed state of things human weakness was a reason only for mercy, and God gave the promise that so long as the world shall last, so total a destruction of man and his works upon it shall never again take place by the same agency.

Noah and his sons, and said unto them, 2 Be fruitful, and multiply, and replenish the earth. (23) And the fear of you and the dread of you shall be upon every beast of the earth, and upon every fowl of the air, upon all that moveth upon the earth, and upon all the fishes of the sea; into your hand are they delivered. (24) Every moving thing that liveth shall be meat for you; even as the green herb have I given you all things. (1) But flesh with the life thereof, which is the blood thereof,
The Covenant with Noah.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Verse</th>
<th>Reference</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1.10</td>
<td>Gen. 8:10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.11</td>
<td>Gen. 8:11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.12</td>
<td>Gen. 8:12</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

The Bow in the Cloud.

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Verse</th>
<th>Reference</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1.10</td>
<td>Gen. 8:10</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.11</td>
<td>Gen. 8:11</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1.12</td>
<td>Gen. 8:12</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

(9) Your blood of your lives. —This verse should be translated: “And surely your blood, which is for your souls, will I require (i.e., avenge); from every beast will I require it, and from man: even from a man’s brother will I require the soul of man,” as from Cain. “Your blood, which is for your souls,” means that it is the means for the maintenance of the animal life within them. As it is, then, the support of man’s life, an animal which sheds it becomes guilty, and must be slain; and still more must those animals be destroyed which prey upon man. Thus there is a command given for the extermination of the carnivora at the time when the more peaceful animals had just been saved. The last clause literally is ... at the hand of man, at the hand of one that is his brother, will I require the soul of man. This has nothing to do with the avenger of blood. The near kinsman is here the murderer, not the commandment requires that even such an one should not be spared.

(10) By man ... —This penalty of life for life is not to be left to natural law, but man himself, in such a manner and under such safeguards as the civil law in each country shall order, is to execute the Divine command. And thus protected from violence, both of man and beast, and with all such terrible crimes forbidden as had polluted Adam’s beginning, Noah in peace and security is to commence afresh man’s great work upon earth.

(11) I, behold, I establish my covenant ... The covenant between God and man is thus solemnly introduced as Elohim’s personal act. No covenant is mentioned as existing between Elohim and the antediluvian world; but distinctly now there is a step onward in all respects, and man, in the renovated earth after the flood, is brought nearer to God by being admitted into covenant with Him. And not only is man included in the covenant, but, first, those animals which had been with Noah in the ark; and, secondly, those which had not been admitted there. For the words of verse 10 are: “From all that go out of the ark unto every beast of the earth” (the larger world).

To such straits are those reduced who hold to the theory of a universal deluge, that Kalisch argues that it means the fish, as if fishes would be destroyed by a second flood any more than they were by the first. Plainly, the words imply the existence of a larger world-sphere than that in connection with Noah, and give the assurance that not only those now providentially preserved, but the animals everywhere, shall never again be in danger of a similar extinction.

(12) This is the token of the covenant.—The word rendered “token” really means sign, and is a term that has met with very unfortunate treatment in our Version, especially in the New Testament, where—as, for instance, in St. John’s Gospel—it is too frequently translated miracle. Its meaning will be best seen by examining some of the places where it occurs: e.g., Gen. xvii. 11; Exod. iii. 12; xii. 13, xiii. 16; Num. xxvii. 10; Judg. ii. 12; Job xxi. 29; Ps. lxxv. 8, lxxxvi. 17, cxxxv. 9; Is. xli. 25. In the majority of these places the sign, or token, is some natural occurrence, but in its higher meaning it is a proof or indication of God’s immediate working. On proper occasions, therefore, it will be supernatural, because the proof of God’s direct agency will most fittingly be some act such as God alone can accomplish. More frequently it is something natural. Thus the sign to the shepherds of the birth of a Saviour, who was “the anointed Jehovah” (Luke ii. 11), was their finding in a manger a babe wrapped in swaddling clothes, a thing of the most simple and ordinary kind. We may dismiss, then, all such curious speculations as that no rain fell before the flood, or that some condition was wanting necessary for producing this glorious symbol. What Noah needed was a guarantee and a memorial which, as often as rain occurred, would bring back to his thoughts the Divine promise; and such a memorial was best taken from the natural accompaniments of rain.

We may further notice with Maimonides that the words are not, as in our version, “I do set,” but my bow I have set in the cloud: that is, the bow which God set in the cloud on that day of creation in which He

45
This is the token of the covenant, which I have established between me and all flesh that is upon the earth.

(19) And the sons of Noah, that went forth of the ark, were Shem, and Ham, and Japheth: and Ham is the father of Canaan. (20) These are the three sons of Noah: and of them was the whole earth overspread.

(20) And Noah began to be an husbandman, and he planted a vineyard: (21) and he drank of the wine, and was drunken; and he was uncovered within his tent.

(22) And Ham, the father of Canaan, saw the nakedness of his father, and told his two brethren without. (23) And Shem and Japheth took a garment, and laid it upon both their shoulders, and went backward, and covered the nakedness of their father; and their faces were backward, and they saw not their father's nakedness. (24) And Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what his younger son had done unto him. (25) And he said, Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren.

imposed upon air and water those laws which produce this phenomenon, is now to become the sign of a solemn compact made with man by God, whereby He gives man the assurance that neither himself nor his works shall ever again be swept away by a flood. But a covenant is a contract between two parties; and what, we may ask, was the undertaking on man's part? The Talmud enumerates several of the chief moral laws, which it supposes that Noah was now bound to observe. More truly it was a covenant of grace, just as that in chap. vi. 18 was one simply of mercy. What then might have been granted simply as a promise on God's part is made into a covenant, not merely for man's greater assurance, but also to indicate that it was irrevocable. Promises are revocable, and their fulfilment may depend upon man's co-agency; a covenant is irrevocable, and under no circumstances will the earth again be destroyed by water.

The rainbow appears in the Chaldean Genesis, but in a heathenish manner—

"From afar the great goddess Ishtar at her approach Lifted up the mighty arches (i.e., the rainbow) which Ana had created as his glory.

The crystal of those gods before me (i.e., the rainbow) never may I forget."—Chald. Gen. p. 287.

(18) Ham is the father of Canaan.—Though human life had thus begun again upon a firmer footing, yet evil and discord were soon to reappear, though in a milder form. In brother sheds a brother's blood, but in the next generation sin breaks forth afresh, and the human family is disunited thereby, the descendants of Canaan taking the place of the Cainites—without, indeed, their striking gifts, but nevertheless as a race foremost in trade and commerce. After enumerating the three sons of Noah, we are told: "Of them was the whole earth overspread," that is,

(20, 21) Noah began to be a husbandman.—Rather, Noah, being a husbandman (Hb., a man of the adowim), began to plant a vineyard. Noah had always been a husbandman: it was the cultivation of the vine, still abundant in Armenia, that was new. Sorely aware, perhaps, of the intoxicating qualities of the juice which he had allowed to ferment, he drank to excess, and became the first example of the shameful effects of intemperance.

(21) He was uncovered is, literally, he uncovered himself. It was no accident, but a wilful breach of modesty.

(22) Ham ... saw ... and told.—The sin lay not in seeing, which might be unintentional, but in telling, especially if his purpose was to ridicule his father. His brothers, with filial piety, "take a garment," the loose outer robe or cloak enveloping the whole body, and with reverent delicacy walk backwards, and lay it upon their father's person.

(24) Noah ... know what his younger son had done unto him.—Heb., his son, the little one. This can only mean his youngest son. So it is applied to Benjamin in chaps. xlii. 34, xliii. 29, and to David in 1 Sam. xvi. 11, where the words literally are, "there remaineth yet the little one." Now Ham was not the youngest son, but Japheth; and it is not Ham who is cursed, but Canaan. So far from Ham being accursed, his descendants were building mighty cities, such as Egyptian Thebes, Nineveh, and Babylon, were rearing palaces, digging canals, organising governments, and founding empires at a time when the descendants of Japheth were wandering over Europe with no better weapons than implements of flint and bone. The application of the curse to Ham seems to have been suggested to commentators by the degradation of the African race in modern times, and especially by the prevalence of negro slavery: but anciently the converse was the case, and for centuries the Egyptians, a Hamite race, made the Israelites serve them.

We must not extend, therefore, to Ham the curse pronounced upon Canaan. But what had Canaan done to deserve it? As the son, the little one, was not Ham, so certainly it was not Japheth, but probably it was Canaan. He was the youngest son of Ham, and in Hebrew "son" is identical with "grandson." (Gen. xvi. 5, xxi. 5), and so he might be described as Noah's youngest son, being the youngest member of his family. Origen quotes a tradition that Canaan was the first who saw Noah's exposure, and that he told it to his father. Aben Ezra says that Canaan had done worse than mock, though the Scripture does not in words reveal his crime. With some such surmise we must be content; and the meaning seems to be, "Noah awoke from his wine, and knew what (Canaan) his youngest son (or grandson) had done unto him; and it was a deed so shameful that he said, 'Cursed be Canaan.'"

(25) Cursed be Canaan.—The prophecy of Noah takes the form of a poem, like Leanech's boast in chap. iv. In it Ham is passed over in silence, as though his unfilial conduct, recorded in verse 22, made him unworthy of a blessing, while it was not so wicked as to bring on him a curse. The whole weight of Noah's displeasure falls on Canaan, whose degraded position among the nations is thrice insisted upon.

A servant of servants. That is, the most abject of slaves. This was fulfilled in the conquest of Blessed be the Lord God of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant, and enlarge important servant note be this and is but his shall dwell in the tents of Shem; and Canaan shall be his servant.
And Noah lived after the flood three hundred and fifty years; (20) and all the days of Noah were nine hundred and fifty years: and he died.

CHAPTER X. — (1) Now these are the generations of the sons of Noah, Shem, Ham, and Japheth: and unto them were sons born after the flood.

Canaan by Joshua, but the race had nevertheless a great future before it. The Hittites were one of the foremost nations of antiquity, and the Sidonians, Tyrians, and Phoenicians were such famous traders, that Canaanite is in our version translated merchant, without even a note in the margin (e.g., Prov. xxxi. 24). But the whole race was enslaved by one of the most terrible and degrading forms of idolatry, and as Shem’s blessing is religious, so possibly is Canaan’s curse. Lenormant (Manual of Ancient History of the East, ii. 219) says of their religion, “No other people ever rivalled them in the mixture of bloodshed and debauchery with which they thought to honour the Deity.” He also quotes Creuzer, who says, “The Canaanite religion silenced all the best feelings of human nature, degraded men’s minds by a superstition alternately degraded and profane, and we may seek in vain for any influence for good it could have exercised on the nation.”

(20) Blessed be Jehovah.—The greatness of Shem’s blessing is shown by its taking the form of a hymn of praise to Jehovah, the personal God; and the patriarch’s fervent outburst of thanksgiving was a presage of the hallelujahs that were to arise unto God from all mankind for the birth of that son of Shem in whom all nations were to be blessed. The following words should be translated, And let Canaan be their servant, the servant both of Shem and Japheth. (See margin.)

(22) God shall enlarge Japheth.—First, the Deity is here Elohim, following upon Jehovah in the preceding verse, and that with extraordinary exactness. Jehovah has never been the special name of the Deity which is glorified by the race of Japheth, though doubtless it is the Greek Zeus and the Latin Jove. But it soon became the proper title of God in covenant with the race of Shem. It is plainly impossible to divide this most ancient poem into Elohist and Jehovistic sections, and the theory, however plausible occasionally, fails in a crucial place like this. Next, there is a play upon the name of Japheth, or rather, Yepheth; our translators having made the same mistake as in changing Hebel into Abel. The Hebrew is Yapheth Elohim Yepheth, “God enlarge the enlarger” (not “God shall enlarge”). While, then, it is the special blessing of Shem that through him the voice of thanksgiving is to ascend to Jehovah, the God of grace; it is Elohim, the God of nature and of the universe, who gives to Japheth wide extension and the most numerous posterity. If the most ancient civilization and the earliest empires in Asia, and on the Tigris were Hittite, the great world-powers of history, the Chaldean, the Medo-Persian, the Greek and Roman, the Hindoo, were all of Japhetic origin, as are also the modern rulers of mankind.

He shall dwell in the tents of Shem. — (Rather, let him dwell). In one sense Shem now dwells in the tents of Japheth: for the Jews, the noblest representatives of Shem, dwell dispersed in Aryan countries; and except in the Arabian peninsula, once Cushite, the Shunites have no home of their own. But the religious privileges of their race now belong to the family of Japheth. Carried by Jewish missionaries, like St. Paul, throughout the Roman world, they have become the property of the leading members of the Aryan race; and thus Japheth takes possession of the tents which by right of primogeniture belonged to Shem. For “to dwell in the tents of Shem” is not so much to share them as to own them; and if the Jews retain some degree of faith, it has lost with them all expansive power; while the right interpretation of their Scriptures, and as well the maintenance as the propagation of the religion of their Messiah, are now in the hands of the descendants of Japheth. Yet Shem does not lose all pre-eminence; for again we read—

Canaan shall be his servant (rather, their).—If Shem lose the foremost place of primogeniture, he is still a brother, and Canaan but a slave.

(22) All the days of Noah.—While Noah attained to the same age as the antediluvian patriarchs, 950 years, human life was fast diminishing. The whole life-time of Shem was 600 years; that of Peleg, a few generations afterwards, only 239. After him only one man, Terah, is described as living more than 200 years, and of his age there is great doubt. (See Note on chap. xi. 32.) Thus before Shem’s death the age of man was rapidly shortening, and things were settling down to that condition in which they are set before us in profane literature.

X.

THE ETHNOLOGICAL TABLE (chaps. x. 1—xi. 9).

These are the generations (the ‘olath) of the sons of Noah.—The importance of this “table of the nations” can scarcely be over-estimated; and while numerous exceptions were taken only a few years ago to many of its details, the vast increase of human knowledge in recent times has proved not merely its general credibility, but the truth of such startling facts as the possession by the race of Ham not only of the Arabian peninsula, but of the country on the Tigris and Euphrates. Its position is very remarkable. It stands at the end of grand traditional records of the mighty past, but belongs to a period long subsequent, giving us a picture of the division of the world at a time when nations and kingdoms had become settled, and their boundaries fixed; and it couples this with the confusion of tongues, difference of language being the great factor in this breaking up of the human race.

Now, it is important to remember that it is not a genealogical table. It concerns peoples, and not individuals, and no names are mentioned which were not represented by political organisations. Generally even the names are not those of men, but of tribes or nations. We must also bear in mind that it works backwards, and not forwards. Taking the nations at some particular time, it groups them together, and classifies them according to the line to which they belonged.

As regards the order, it begins with Japheth, the
The sons of Japheth; Gomer, and Magog, and Madai, and Javan, and Tubal, and Meshech, and Tiras. (3) And the sons of Gomer; Ashkenaz, and Riphath, and Togarmah. (4) And the sons of Javan; Elishah, and Tarshish, Kittim, youngest son—for never was there a translation more opposed to the undeviating rule of such sentences than that of our version in chap. x. 21. "Shem . . . the brother of Japheth the elder," instead of "Shem, the elder brother of Japheth." But Japheth is here placed first because so little was known of the nations sprung from him. It gives, moreover, the mere first division into main lines, and then, in spite of the grand future that awaited his descendants, it dismisses them in brief haste to their homes on the Black and Mediterranean seas. It next takes Ham. Now, Ham was to the family of Noah what Cain was to that of Adam: first in all worldly accomplishments, last in all the gifts of piety. Setting upon the Nile, the Tigris, and Euphrates, his progeny raised up mighty cities, while the Japhetitites were wandering in barbarous hordes over Europe, and the Shemites were pasturing their cattle upon the chalkdowns of Syria; whence, nevertheless, they soon came to battle with the Hamites for the possession of Mesopotamia. Of the Hamites, it brings the history down to the time of their settlement in Canaan, but as it mentions Sodom and Gomorrah as still standing, the document must be prior to the time of the destruction of those cities, eighteen centuries and more before Christ; while, as it describes the Canaanites as even then in possession of Palestine, and as formed into tribes in much the same way as just before the time of Moses, it is evident that a much longer period must have elapsed between the flood and the birth of Abraham than is supposed in the ordinary chronology put in the margin of our Bibles. As the line of Shem was to be traced in subsequent "Tol'doth," it is not carried down so far as that of Ham, but stops at a great dividing line, at which the family breaks up into the race of Joktan and that of Peleg. To the former it ascribes thirteen nations, while the race of Peleg is left for future histories. The names of the Joktanite tribes also indicate the lapse of a lengthened period of time, as they abound in Arabic peculiarities.

(1) Shem, Ham, and Japheth.—This is the undeviating arrangement of the three brothers. (See Note on chaps. ix. 24, x. 21.)

(2) The sons of Japheth.—Of these, seven main divisions are enumerated, some of which are subsequently sub-divided; they are—

1. Gomer, whose name reappears in the Cimmerians. Their original settlement was between Magog and Madai, that is, between the Scythians and the Medes. After remaining some time on the Caspian and Black Seas, on which latter they have left their name in the Crimea, a powerful branch of them struck across the centre of Russia, and, skirting the Baltic, became the Cimbri of Denmark (whence the name of the Chersonesus Cimbrica, given to Jutland), the Cynury of Wales, &c. Generally they are the race to which the name is given of Celts.

2. Magog. The Scythians, who once possessed the country north and south of the Caucasus. The Russians are their modern representatives, being descended from the Sarmatians, a Scythie race, with a small admixture of Median blood.

3. Madai. The Medes, who dwelt to the south and south-west of the Caspian. Meda, in the Accadian language, means land, and it was in the Median territory that Kharsak-Kurra, "the mountain of the East," was situated, on which the Accadians believed the ark have rested, whence possibly Media took its name, being "the land" above all others (Chald. Gen., p. 196).

4. Javan, that is, Ionia, the land of the Greeks.

5. Tubal. The Tibareni, on the south-east of the Black Sea.

7. Tiras. According to Josephus and the Targum, the Thracians. Other races have been suggested, but this is probably right; and as the Getae, the ancestors of the Goths, were Thracians, this would make the Scandinavian race the modern representatives of Tiras.

In this enumeration the race of Japheth is described as occupying Asia Minor, Armenia, the countries to the west as far as the Caspian Sea, and thence northward to the shores of the Black Sea. Subsequently it spread along the northern shores of the Mediterranean and over all Europe. But though unnoticed by the writer, its extension was equally remarkable towards the east. Parthia, Bactria, the Punjab, India, are equally Japhethite with Germany, Greece, and Rome; and in Sanscrit literature the Aryan first showed that genius, which, omitting the greatest of all books, the Semitic Bible, has made this race the foremost writers in the world.

(3) Gomer has three main divisions:—

1. Ashkenaz, a region in the neighbourhood of Armenia (Jer. li. 27), whence, following the course of Japhethite migration, the race seems to have wandered into Germany. The derivations are all most uncertain; but the Jews call the Germans Ashkenazites, and are probably right.

2. Riphat, in I Chron. i. 6, is called Diphath (see Dodaniam, below). Riphat is probably right, and the inhabitants of the Riphean Mountains (the Carpathians?) are the people meant. They were Celts.

(4) Javan has four main divisions:—

1. Elishah, a maritime people of Greece. Traces of the name occur in Aeolis and in Eliss, a district of the Peloponnesus. Some boldly identify with Hellas. The island of Elishah are mentioned in Ezek. xxvii. 6.

2. Tarshish. At so early a period this could scarcely be Tartessus, but is more probably the Tyreni, or Tyrrenhi, a race once powerful in Italy, Corsica, Sar-dinia, and finally in Spain. Probably Tarshissus, at the mouth of the Guadalquiver, in Spain, was founded by them, and took from them its name. At this time they were apparently a small tribe of the Javanites; but while Elishah followed the sea-coast and colonised Greece, Tarshish took a course so far inland to the north of the Danube that it did not reach the sea until it had come to the northern districts of Italy.

3. Kittim. A plural, like Madai. The Kittim were a maritime race, who colonised Cyprus, the chief city of which was Kittium, and probably other islands and coast-distincts of the Mediterranean. There was a Kittim also in Macedonia; and Alexander is called King of the Kittim in I Macc. i. 1.

4. Dodaniam. Another plural. The right reading is probably Rodamia, as in many MSS. in I Chron. i. 7, and in the LXX., and the Samaritan here. R and D are so constantly interchanged in proper names, owing to the similarity of their shape, that no depen-and Dedanim. (5) By these were the isles of the Gentiles divided in their lands; every one after his tongue, after their families, in their nations.

(6) a And the sons of Ham; Cush, and Mizraim, and Phut, and Canaan. (7) And the sons of Cush; Seba, and Havilah, and Sabtah, and Raamah, and Sabdence can be placed upon the reading. The Rodanim would be the Rhodians.

(5) Isles of the Gentiles.—The word rendered "isles" means any maritime region. As there were no Gentiles at this time, the phrase should be translated "the coast-lands of the nations."

(6) Ham.—Many derive this word from a Hebrew root, and explain it as signifying hot, sunburnt, and so swarthy. Japheth they connect with a word signifying to be fair; and so Ham is the progenitor of dark races, Japheth of those of a fair complexion, while the olive-coloured spring from Shem. More probably it is Chemet, the old name of Egypt, "the land of Ham" (Ps. lxviii. 51), called by Plutarch Chemia, and was taken from the black colour of the soil.

The Hamites are grouped in four principal divisions:

1. Cush. Aethiopia, but not that of Africa, but of Asia. The home of the Cushites was on the Tigris and Euphrates, where Nimrod raised them to great power. Then they spread into the southern peninsula of Arabia, and crossing the Red Sea at a later date, colonised Nubia and Abyssinia. In the Bible Cush is watered by the Gihon (Gen. ii. 13); and Zipporah, the wife of Moses, and daughter of a priest of Midian, is in Num. xii. 1 called a Cushite. Their high rank in old time is marked by the place held by them in the Iliad of Homer.

2. Mizraim. Egypt. In form the word is a dual, and may point to the division of the country into Upper and Lower Egypt. If we choose to interpret a Hamite word by a Hebrew root, it may signify the narrowed land, but it is safer to leave these words till increased knowledge shall enable us to decide with some security upon their meaning. For the ancient name of Mizraim see verse 6, and for its extent see verse 14. From the study of the skulls and bodies of a large number of mummies Brugsch-Bey in his recent history has come to the conclusion that the ancient Egyptians did not belong to any African race, but to the great Caucasian family, "but not of the Pelasgic or Semitic branches, but of a third, Cushite." He adds that the cradle of the Egyptian nation must be sought in Central Asia.

(7) Sons of Cush.—Of Cush there are five sub-divisions, of which one is again parted into two. These are—

1. Seba.—The name at this time of an Arabian tribe, which subsequently migrated into Africa, and settled in Merci, which, according to Josephus, still bore in his days this appellation. They also left their name on the eastern side of the Red Sea, not far to the north of the Straits of Bab-el-Mandeb.

2. Havilah, upon the river Pison (chap. ii. 11), was undoubtedly a region of Arabia, situated probably upon the Persian Gulf. Havilah is again mentioned in verse 29.

3. Sabtah.—Probably Hadramaut, in Arabia Felix. (See Note on verse 26.)

4. Raamah, on the Persian Gulf, was divided into Dedan upon the south-west and Sheba in the centre, while Havilah lay upon the north-west side. Of these, Sheba subsequently rose to fame as the kingdom of the Himyarite Arabs.

5. Sabtechah.—Apparently still more to the south of Dedan, but placed by some on the eastern side of the gulf.

Thus, then, at the time when this table was written the southern half of Arabia was Cushite, and a swarthy race of men is still found there, especially in Yemen and Hadramaut, far darker than the light brown Arabs. Migrating from place to place along the sea-shore, the passage of the Cushites into Nubia and Abyssinia was easy. But their chief home was, at this period, in Mesopotamia, and the cuneiform inscriptions have now revealed their long struggle there with men of the race of Shem.

(8) Cush begat Nimrod.—This does not mean that Nimrod was the son of Cush, but only that Cush was his ancestor. In the days of Nimrod population had become numerous, and whereas each tribe and family had hitherto lived in independence, subject only to the authority of the natural head, he was able, by his personal vigour, to reduce several tribes to obedience, to prevail upon them to build and inhabit cities, and to consolidate them into one body politic.

He began to be a mighty one.—Heb. gibbor = warrior. (See Note on chap. vi. 4.) The LXX. translate giant, whence in fable Nimrod is identified with the Orion of the Greeks, in Hebrew Chesil, and in Arabic Jabbar; but this identification is entirely fanciful, as is probably the idea that he is the Isdubar of the Chaldean legends (Chald. Genesis, p. 321). Following the unscrupulous method of explaining Hamite names by Hebrew roots, commentators interpret Nimrod as meaning rebel; but the Biblical narrative speaks rather in his commendation, and the foolish traditions which blacken his reputation date only from the time of Josephus. Mr. Sayce connects his name with the Accadian town Amarda (Chald. Gen., p. 191).

(9) He was a mighty hunter.—When men were still leading a pastoral life, and were but poorly armed, the war with wild beasts was a most important and dangerous occupation. Probably from single combats with fierce animals, Nimrod, now recognised as a public benefactor, was led to organise hunts upon a large scale, and so, like Romulus, became the chief of a band of the most spirited and vigorous shepherds. With their aid, he next undertook the more serious duty of introducing order and rule among men who had hitherto lived in scattered groups without control, and without the means of suppressing feuds and of punishing deeds of violence.

Before the Lord.—A strong superlative. (Comp. chap. iii. 13.)

(10) The beginning of his kingdom.—Nimrod's empire began with the cities enumerated in this verse, and thence extended into Assyria, as is mentioned in and Erech, and Accad, and Calneh, in the land of Shinar. (11) Out of that land went forth Asshur, and built Nineveh, and the city Rehoboth, and Calah, verse 11. First, then, he established his sovereignty in the land of Shinar, that is, in Babylonia, the lower portion of Mesopotamia, as distinguished from Assyria, the upper portion. It is called Semir in the cuneiform inscriptions. In Micah v. 6 Babylonia is called the land of Nimrod. His cities there were four.

Babel.—That is, Bab-il, the gate of God, the literal translation in Assyrian of its previous Accadian name, Ca-dimirra (Chall. Gen., p. 192). It was ravaged by Kudur-nakhunte, king of Elam, in the year B.C. 2250, according to an inscription of Assurbanipal (n.c. 670). It lies about thirty leagues to the south-east of Babylon, and is now called Warka. From the numerous mounds and remains of cotta discovered there, it is supposed to have been the early burial-place of the Assyrian kings. (See also Rawlinson's Ancient Monarchies, i. pp. 18, 156.)

Accad.—This name, which was meaningless fifty years ago, is now a household word in the mouth of Assyriologists; for in deciphering the cuneiform literature it was found that many of the works, especially in the library of Sargon, were translations from an extinct language; and as these were deciphered it gradually became evident that before any inhabitants of the Semitic stock had entered Chaldea it had been peopled by the Accadians, a black race, who had been the builders of its cities, the inventors of the cuneiform system of writing, and the founders of the culture and civilization afterwards borrowed by the Semites. (Chall. Gen., p. 19.) This Sargon, who was king of Agane, in Babylonia, about n.c. 1900, is of course a different person from the Ninevite Sargon mentioned in Isa. xx. 1, who also was the founder of a noble library about B.C. 721; and as the Accadian language was already in his days passing away, this earlier or Babylonian Sargon caused translations to be made, especially of those works in which the Accadians had recorded their astronomical and astrological observations, and placed them in his library at Agane. Previously also Semitic translations of Accadian works had been made for the library of Erech, one of the earliest seats of Semitic power (Ibid, p. 21). Mr. Sayce places the conquest of Shinar by the Semites at some period two or three thousand years before the Christian era, and of the founding of these cities and the empire of the Accadians goes back to a still more remote date, especially as the struggle between them and their conquerors was a very prolonged one (Ibid, p. 20).

Calneh.—The Calno of Isa. x. 9, where the LXX. read, 'Have I not taken the region above Babylon and Khalaun, where the tower was built?' It was thus opposite Babylon, and the site of the tower of Babel (see Chall. Gen., p. 75, and Note on chap. xi. 9). The other place suggested, Ctesiphon, is not in Shinar, but in Assyria.

(11, 12) Out of that land went forth Asshur.—So the LXX., Syrie, and Vulg.; but the Targum and most modern authorities rightly translate, "Out of that land he went forth into Assyria." We have here nothing to do with Asshur the son of Shem (see verse 22), but are occupied with Nimrod and the Hamites, who, after firmly establishing themselves in Babylonia, subsequently extended their influence northward. This is confirmed by the cuneiform inscriptions, which prove that the southern portion of Mesopotamia was the chief seat of the Accadians, while in Assyria they came at an early date into collision with the Semites, who drove them back, and ultimately subjugated them everywhere. It is not necessary to suppose that this spread of Hamite civilisation northward was the work of Nimrod personally; if done by his successors, it would, in Biblical language, be ascribed to its prime mover.

The Assyrian cities were—

1. Nineveh.—So happily situated on the Tigris that it outstripped the more ancient Babylon, and for centuries even held it in subjection.

2. The city Rehoboth.—Translated by some Rehothoth-ir, but with more probability by others, the suburbs of the city; that is, of Nineveh, thus denoting already the greatness of that town.

3. Calah.—A city rebuilt by Assur-natir-pal, the father of Shalmaneser, and interesting as one of the places where the Assyrian kings established libraries (Chall. Gen., p. 26). The ruins are still called Ninimrod.

4. Rosen.—The spring-head. Of this town nothing certain is known. Canon Rawlinson places it at Selamiah (Ank. Mon., i. 204), a large village half-way between Nineveh and Calah. As the vast ruins scattered throughout Mesopotamia are those of Assyrian buildings, Rosen, though a great city, in Hamite times, might easily pass into oblivion, if never rebuilt by the conquerors.

(13, 14) With Mizraim are connected seven inferior African races, the names of which are given in the plural, namely:

1. The Ludim.—There were two races of this name: one Semitic, descended from Lud, the son of Shem (verse 22), and mentioned in Isa. xvi. 19; the other Hamite, and subject to the Pharaohs (Jer. xvi. 9; Ezek. xxx. 5). They seem to have inhabited the Nile valley, but their exact position is unknown.

2. The Anamim.—Knobel gives some reasons for supposing this race to have inhabited the Delta.

3. The Lehabim.—Probably the same as the Labim of 2 Chron. xii. 3, xvi. 5; Dan. xi. 43; Nahum iii. 9. Their home was on the north side of the Delta.

4. The Naaphtalim.—Knobel explains these as the people of Phthah, the deity worshipped at Memphis. If so, they were the true Egyptians, as Egypt is Kahun, the land of Phthah, or more correctly, according to Canon Cook, Ai-Capht. (See Note on Caphtorim.)

5. The Pathrusim.—People of Pathros, or Upper Egypt. According to Canon Cook, Pa-t-ers means the land of the south.

6. The Cushim.—Probably the people of Cassiotes, a mountainous district to the east of Pelusium.

7. The Philistim.—The word Philistine means emigrant, and is translated alien, foreigner, by the LXX.
GENESIS, X.

of Canaan.

Pathrusim, and Casluhim, (out of whom came Philistim,) and Caphtorim. (25) And Canaan begat 1 Sidon his firstborn, and Heth, (10) and the Jebusite, and the Amorite, and the Girgasite, (27) and the Hivite, and the Arkite, and the Sinite, (19) and the Arvadite, and the Zemarite, and the Hamathite: and afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad. (19) And the border of

We are here told that they came into Palestine as colonists from the Casluhim; but in Jer. xlvi. 4, Amos ix. 7, they are described as a colony from Caphtor. Probably the first Philistite settlers in Gerar (Gen. xxvi. 1), and in the towns conquered by Judah (Judges i. 18), were Cashlehanis; but afterwards, at the time when they struggled with Israel for empire, in the days of Samson, Eli, and Saul, there had been a second and larger immigration from Crete. As they seem to have spoken a Semitic tongue, they had apparently adopted the language of the Canaanites among whom they had settled, and especially of the Avim (Deut. ii. 23). The objection to their being Egyptians is that of circumcision, has but little weight. The Israelites all but discontinued it (Josh. v. 5), and colonists escaped from the dominion of the priests might gladly dispense with such a custom. There is also much reason for believing that the institution of circumcision in Egypt was of a date subsequent to this emigration.

8. The Caphtorim are generally connected with Crete, but Egyptologers derive the name from Kaph-Phirah, “the land of Phirah.” According to this, the Caphtorim, like the Naphtuhim, would have been true Egyptians, and the Delta, with Memphis, for their capital, would have been their original home. The need of expansion, joined to the seafaring habits learnt on the shores of the Delta, may easily have led them to colonise Crete, while others of the race were going as settlers into Palestine. It is worth notice that while Cyprus and Rhodes are given to the sons of Javan (verse 4), no mention is there made of Crete.

It is plain from this survey that Mizraim at this time was not of very great extent, these seven tribes being confined to the lands closely bordering on the Delta and the upper part of the Nile valley. There is nothing to indicate that the great city of Thebes had as yet come into existence.

(15-16) Canaan.—The meaning of this name is uncertain, as, most probably, it is a Hamitic word: if derived from a Semitic root, it may mean the lowland. Though the Canaanites spoke a Semitic tongue at the time when we find them in Palestine, yet the assertion of the Bible that they were Hamites is confirmed by the testimony of profane writers, who say that their original home was on the Indian Ocean. They had probably been driven thence by the pressure of Semitic races, with whose language they had thus already become familiar; and when, farther, they found a Semitic people thinly spread over Palestine, they may, while absorbing them, have been confirmed in the use of their tongue. So, subsequently, Abraham gave up Syrinx for Hebrew; and though these are kindred dialects, yet they are often remote enough from one another (see Gen. xxx. 47). On the other hand, the whole character of the Canaanite religion and thought was Hamitic, and while they were active in commercial pursuits, and in culture far in advance of the Greeks, to whom they gave their alphabet, they were intensely sensuous in their worship and voluptuaries in their manners. They are divided into eleven tribes, namely:—

1. Sidon.—This is remarkable as being the only town mentioned in the account either of Mizraim or of Canaan. All the rest are apparently the names of tribes still wandering about; and thus we gain a clearer idea both of the antiquity of this early record, and also of the great advance made by Nimrod in founding so many cities. Sidon, situated on the sea-shore, about thirty miles north of Tyre, became thus early a settled community and the seat of social life, because of its advantages for fishing (whence its name is derived), and also for commerce.

2. Heth.—The Kheta, or Hitittes, a powerful race, whose language and monuments have recently become the object of earnest study. They seem subsequently to have possessed not only Syria, but a large portion of Asia Minor. (See Note on chap. xxii. 3. 5.)

3. The Jebusite.—This race held the territory afterwards occupied by Benjamin, and retained Jerusalem until the time of David (2 Sam. v. 6—9. See Note on chap. xiv. 18.)

4. The Amorite.—Or rather, Emorite, that is, mountaineer. Next to the Kheta, or Hitittes, they were the most powerful race in Palestine, holding the hill country of Judea, where they had five kings (Josh. x. 5), and a large district on the eastern side of the Jordan (2 Sam. ix. 10).

5. The Girgasite.—Mentioned in Josh. xiv. 11, but otherwise unknown.

6. The Hivite.—At Sichem (chap. xxiv. 2), at Gibeon (Josh. ix. 7), and near Hermon and Lebanon (Josh. xi. 3; Judges iii. 3).

7. The Arkite.—Also in Lebanon.

8. The Sinite.—A small tribe in the same neighbourhood.

9. The Arvadite.—A more important people, inhabiting the island of Arados.

10. The Zemarite.—An obscure people, inhabiting Samaria, in Phoenicia.

11. The Hamathite whose city, Hamath, was the capital of Northern Syria. It was situated on the river Orontes, and though called Epiphania by the Macedonians, still retains its ancient name. The Kheta subsequently gained the supremacy at Hamath, and had their capital in the immediate neighbourhood.

Afterward were the families of the Canaanites spread abroad.—This may mean either that they spread inwards, or may refer to the numerous colonies of the Tyrians on the Mediterranean. While in Babylonia the Hamites are described as black, this branch was called Phoenicians, from their ruddy colour, in contrast with the olive-coloured Semitic stock. As they came by sea from the Indian Ocean, their earliest settlement was on the coast, and thus Sidon is called “the first-born” of Ham. Thence they advanced into the interior, and though few in number, absorbed by their superior culture the inhabitants of Palestine. It is probably this expansion inwards which is here referred to.

(19, 20) The border . . .—The boundaries given are Sidon in the north, Gerar and Gaza in the south and south-west, and thence to the Dead Sea. The only Lasha known is a place famous for its hot springs on GENESIS, X.

The Descendants

the Canaanites was from Sidon, as thou comest to Gerar, unto 1 Gaza; as thou goest, unto Sodom, and Gomorrah, and Admah, and Zeboim, even unto Lasha. (20) These are the sons of Ham, after their families, after their tongues, in their countries, and in their nations.

(21) Unto Shem also, the father of all the children of Eber, the brother of Japheth the elder, even to him were children born.

(22) The children of Shem; Elam, and Asshur, and Arphaxad, and Lud, and Aram. (23) And the children of Aram; Uz, and Hul, and Gether, and Mash.

the east of the Red Sea. Though the Phenicians may have occupied this town on their way to Palestine, it could not have been one of their boundaries, so that it is probably some place destroyed in the convulsion which overthrew the cities of the plain. We must notice also that while Sidon is given as the northern limit, both Aradus and Hamath were considerably above it. It is probable, therefore, that both the Aravite and the Hamathite were still wandering tribes without settlements when this table was drawn up.

(21–23) Shem . . . the brother of Japheth the elder.—Really, the elder brother of Japheth. Though the rules of Hebrew grammar will admit of no other rendering, it is remarkable that both the Syriac and the Vulg. make the same mistake as our own version. In designating Shem as “the father of all the children of Eber,” attention is called to the fact that the descendants of Peleg, his elder son, are omitted from this table, and reserved for the Toldoth Shem. (See chap. xi. 10.)

The nations descended from Shem were:

1. Elam.—According to Mr. Sayce (Chald. Gen., p. 196), “the primitive inhabitants of Elam were a race closely allied to the Accadians, and spread over the whole range of country which stretched from the southern shores of the Caspian Gulf.” But just as the Semitic Asshur expelled a Hamite race from Assyria, so another branch of this conquering family occupied Elamis. It is now called Chazistan, and was the most easterly of the countries occupied by the Semites. But see Excursus to chap. xiv. on the conquests of the Elamite Choridaromer.

2. Asshur.—This Semitic stock seems to have been the first to settle on the Tigris, as the Hamites were the first to settle on the Euphrates. Finally, as we have seen (verse 11), they conquered the whole country.

3. Arphaxad.—Heb., Arpachshad. We may dismiss the idea that he was connected with the region called Arrapachitis, for this correctly is Aryanakhat, “the land next the Aryans.” Really he appears as the ancestor of Eber and the Joktanite Arabs.

4. Lud.—Probably the Lydians, who, after various wanderings, settled in Asia Minor.

5. Aram.—As Asshur means plain, so Aram means highland. It was originally the name of the Lebanon ranges, and thus Damascos is called Aram in 2 Sam. viii. 5. Subsequently the race so extended itself as to possess Mesopotamia, a lowland country, but called, as early as Gen. xxiv. 10, “Aram of the two rivers.” The greatness of Aram will be best seen by examining those places in our version where Syria and Syriac are spoken of, and which, in the Hebrew, are really Aram.

To the Aramaean stock belonged also four outlying dependencies—(1) Uz, the land of Job, a district in the northern part of Arabia Deserta; (2) Hul and (3) Gether, regions of which nothing is known; and (4) Mash, a desert region on the western side of the Euphrates (Chald. Gen., p. 276).

(24) Arphaxad begat Salah.—Heb., Sheelah. The rest of the chapter is devoted to giving an account of the settlements of the Joktanite Arabs, who formed only one, apparently, of the races sprung from Arphaxad. as in this table the Hebrews are omitted, although Eber’s birth is given with the view of showing that the right of primogeniture belonged not to Joktan, but to Eber. The name Arphaxad, as we have seen (verse 22), at present defies all explanation. For the rest, see the Toldoth Shem, chap. xi. 10–25.

(25) Peleg: for in his days was the earth divided.—This may refer to the breaking up of the race of Shem into separate nations, which several occupied a distinct region; and so, while Joktan took Arabia, and in course of time expelled the Hamites from that country, Asshur, Aram, and Peleg occupied the regions on the north and north-west. But as Peleg, according to the Toldoth Shem, was born only 101 years after the flood, Noah’s family could scarcely have multiplied in so short a time as to many as 500 people; and Mr. Cyril Graham considers that the name refers to “the first cutting of some of those canals which are found in such numbers between the Tigris and the Euphrates.” This is made more probable by the fact that Peleg in Hebrew means water-courses.

(26–31) Joktan.—The little one, as being a younger son. Of the thirteen divisions of his family, few are of any importance, though several of the names are curious from their connection with the Arabic language. The Joktanite country was Arabia Felix, or Yemen, and as the people led a pastoral life without founding cities, the traces of their tribal names are insignificant. Those worth noting are Almodad, because it has the full form of the article, retained as Al in Arabic, but shortened in Hebrew into Ha. Hazarath, “the court of death,” so called because of the unhealthiness of its climate, is now Hadramaut. Abinad means “the father of Maal.” While in Hebrew and Syriac men took the name of their father, in Arabic they often take the name of a son, with Abu or Abi (“father of”) prefixed. Sheba, the region afterwards famous for its commerce and its wealth of spices and precious stones. A Sheba also occurs among the sons of Shem, after their families, after their tongues, in their lands, after their nations.

(32) These are the families of the sons of Noah, after their generations, in their nations: and by these were the nations divided in the earth after the flood.

CHAPTER XI.—(1) And the whole earth was of one language, and of one speech.

race of Ham (see verse 7). Ophir: the name, probably, at first of a district of Oman in Arabia, but afterwards given to some port in India or Ceylon, from some fancied similarity. Havilah: some commentators consider that this is the same district as that previously occupied by the Cushites (verse 7); others argue that the two Havilahs are distinct, and that this is the region called Jawf el-Ain, in Northern Yemen. It is, however, certain that the Hamites possessed this country prior to its being occupied by the Joktanites.

(32) After their generations.—Heb., according to their Toldoth. This makes it probable that each family preserved in some way an historical record of its descent; and as this table is called the Toldoth of the Sons of Noah, it was probably formed by a comparison of numerous Toldoth, each showing the descent of various members of the three great families into which the sons of Noah were divided.

—XI.

(1) The whole earth.—That is, all mankind. After giving the connection of the various races of the then known world, consisting of Armenia, the regions watered by the Tigris and Euphrates, the Arabian peninsula, the Nile valley, with the districts closely bordering on the Delta, Palestine, the Levant, and the islands of Cyprus, Rhodes, and Crete; with Loud on his journey to Asia Minor, and the Japhethites breaking their way into Europe through the country between the Caspian and the Black Sea: after this, we go back to the reason of this dispersion, which is found in the confusion of tongues.

Of one language, and of one speech.—Literally, of one lip, and of words one: that is, both the pronunciation and the vocabulary were identical. As regards this primitive language, whereas but a few years ago the differences between the Sanscrit and the Semitic tongues were regarded as irreconcilable, recent inquiries tend to show that both have a common basis.

(2) As they journeyed.—The word literally refers to the pulling up of the tent-pins, and sets the human family before us as a band of nomads, wandering from place to place, and shifting their tents as their cattle needed fresh pasture.

From the east.—So all the versions. Mount Ararat was to the north-west of Shinar, and while so lofty a mountain would not have been the spot where the ark rested, yet neither could any portion of Armenia or of the Carduchian mountains be described as to the east of Babylonia. The Chaldean legends make the ark rest on Mount Nizir, or Elwend, on the east of Assyria; and though Ararat may possibly signify Argevorta, "Holy Land," yet the transference of the name from Elwend to Armenia is not easily explicable. Moreover, the Bible elsewhere seems to point to Armenia as the cradle of the human race. Most modern commentators, therefore, translate eastward, and such certainly is the meaning of the word in chap. xiii. 11, where also the versions, excepting our own, render from the east.

Land of Shinar.—See on chap. x. 10. The whole of Chaldæa is a level plain, and the soil immensely rich, as it is an alluvial deposit, which still goes on forming at the head of the Persian Gulf, at the rate of a mile in a period estimated at from seventy to thirty years (Rawlinson, Anc. Mon., i. 4). A strip of land 130 miles in breadth has been added to the country, by the deposit of the earth washed down by the Tigris and Euphrates, since the time when Ur of the Chaldees was a great port. (3) Let us make brick, and burn them throughly.—Heb., for a burning. Bricks in the East usually are simply dried in the sun, and this produces a sufficiently durable building material. It marks a great progress in the arts of civilisation that these nomads had learned that clay when burnt becomes insoluble; and their buildings with "slime," or native pitch, for cement would be virtually indestructible. In fact, Mr. Layard says that at Birs-Nimroud it was scarcely possible to detach the bricks one from another, as the cement by which they were united was most tenacious (Nineveh and Babylon, p. 499).

(4) A tower, whose top may reach unto heaven.—The Hebrew is far less hyperbolical; namely, whose head (or top) is in the heavens, or skies, like the walls of the Canaanite cities (Deut. i. 25). The object of the builders was two-fold: first, they desired some central beacon which might guide them in their return from their wanderings; and secondly, they had a distinctly ambitious object, for by remaining as one nation they would be able to reduce to obedience all the tribes now perpetually wandering away from them, and so would "make them a name." We may, indeed, dismiss the silly stories of Josephus about their defiance of God and Nimrod's impious purpose of escaping a second deluge, for which purpose they desired a higher building; but to the Bible story Nimrod's efforts at a later
And the Lord came down to see the city and the tower, which the children of men built. And the Lord said, Behold, the people is one, and they have all one language; and this they begin to do: and now nothing will be restrained from them, which they have imagined to do. Go to, let us go down, and there confound their language, that they may not understand one another's speech.

So the Lord scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth: and they left off to build the city. Therefore is the name of it called Babel; because the Lord did there confound the language of all the earth: and from thence did the Lord scatter them abroad upon the face of all the earth.

date were successful (chap. x. 10—12); and when we remember the blood-stained course of some of his cities, we may well doubt whether, with all its present advantages, this centralisation really promotes human happiness.

The Lord came down.—The narrative is given in that simple anthropological manner usual in the Book of Genesis, which so clearly sets before us God's loving care of man, and here and in chap. xviii. 21 the equity of Divine justice. For Jehovah is described as a mighty king, who, hearing in His upper and heavenly dwelling of man's ambitious determination to go and inspect the work in person, that having been done, he may deal with the offenders justly. He views, therefore, "the city and the tower;" for the city was as important a portion of their purpose as the tower, or even more so. The tower, which, no doubt, was to be the citadel and protection of the city, was for the latter's sake to give the people a sense of strength and security. Having then inspected the tower and the city nestling round it, the Deity affirms that this centralisation is injurious to man's best interests, and must be counteracted by an opposite principle, namely, the tendency of mankind to make constant changes in language, and thereby to break up into different communities, kept permanently apart by the use of different tongues. At present "it is one people, and there is one lip to all of them, and this is what they begin to do. "And already there are (though some of them) universal empire, and if thus the spread of mankind be hindered, and its division into numerous nations, each contributing its share to the progress and welfare of the world, be stopped, man will remain a poor debased creature, and will fail utterly in accomplishing the purpose for which he was placed upon earth. "Go to," therefore, He says, in irony of their twice repeated phrase, "we will go down, and make their speech unintelligible to one another." Now, though there is no assertion of a miracle here, yet we may well believe that there was an extraordinary quickening of a natural law which existed from the first. This, however, is but a secondary question, and the main fact is the statement that the Divine means for countering man's ambitious and ever-recurring dream of universal sovereignty is the law of diversity of speech. In ancient times there was little to counteract this tendency, and each city and petty district had its own dialect, and looked with animosity upon its neighbours who differed from it in pronunciation, if not in vocabulary. In the present day there are counteracting influences; and great communities, by the use of the same Bible and the possession of the same classical literature, may long continue to speak the same language. In days also when communication is so easy, not only do men travel much, but newspapers and serials published at the centre are dispersed to the most distant portions of the world. In old time it was not so, and probably Isaiah would not have been easily understood thirty miles from Jerusalem, nor Dostoyevskia half a league from Athens. Without books or literature, a little band of families wandering about with their cattle, with no communication with other tribes, would quickly modify both the grammar and the pronunciation of their language; and when, after a year or two, they revisited the tower, they would feel like foreigners in the new city, and quickly depart with the determination never to return. And to this day diversity of language is a powerful factor in keeping nations apart, or in preventing portions of the same kingdom from agreeing heartily together. And thus at Babel the first attempt to bind the human family into one whole came to an ignominious end.

The Lord (Jehovah) scattered them abroad from thence upon the face of all the earth; and they left off to build the city. The tendency of men, as the result of a growing diversity of language, was to separate, each tribe holding intercourse only with those who spoke their own dialect; and so the Divine purpose of occupying the world was carried into effect, while the project of this ambitious knot of men to hold mankind together was frustrated, and the building of their tower ceased.

Therefore is the name of it called Babel. —Babel is, in Aramaic, Bab-el, the gate of God, and in Assyrian, Bab-ili (chap. x. 10). It is strange that any one should have derived the word from Bab-bel, the gate of Bel, for there is no trace that the second b was ever doubled; moreover, Bel is for Baal; and though we Westerners omit the strong guttural, because we cannot pronounce it, the Orientals would preserve it. El is the regular Semitic word for God—in Assyrian, Ilî; in Arabic, Inel; in Syriac, Aboh. So far from diminishing, this increases the force of the Scriptural derision. Man calls his projected city Babel, the gate—that is, the court—of God; God calls it Babbîle; for in all languages indistinct and confused speech is represented by the action of the lips in producing the sound of b. The exact Hebrew word for this was babal—to the Greek verb, bombaino; the Latin, babnito; and a man who stammered was called balbus. The town, then, keeps its first name, but with a confusion ranging at any rate to it, just as Nabal (1 Sam. xxv. 25) may really have had his name from the nabo, or harp, but from the day that his wife gave it a contemptuous meaning Nabal has signified only folly.

The Babylonian legends are in remarkable agreement with the Hebrew narrative. They represent the building of the tower as impious, and as a sort of Titanical attempt to scale the heavens. This means that the work was one of vast importance, for it was something in the human mind which attaches the idea of impiety to all stupendous undertakings, and the popular feeling is. always one of rejoicing at their failure. The gods therefore destroy at night what the builders had wrought by day; and finally, Bel, “the father of the gods,” confounds their languages. It is remarkable that the very word used here is belud (or perhaps beldah), and thus the meaning of “confusion” would attach to the word equally in the Assyrian as in the Hebrew language (Chaldean Gen., p. 166).

One question remains: Was the tower of Babel the temple of Bel destroyed by Xerxes, and which was situated in the centre of Babylon? or was it the tower of Borsippa, the site of which was in one of the suburbs, about two miles to the south? This tower was the observatory of the Chaldean astronomers, and its name, according to Oppert, means “the tower of languages.” We incline to the belief that this ruin, now called the Birs-Nimrud, was the original tower, and that the temple of Bel was a later construction, belonging to the palmy times of the Chaldean monarchy. An account of it will be found in Sayce, Chaldean Gen., pp. 163, 170, and in Rawlinson, Anc. Mon., i. 12, 21, &c.

The Toldoth Shem.

(10—26) These are the generations of Shem. Here also, as in chap. v., there is a very considerable divergence between the statements of the Hebrew, the Samaritan, and the Septuagint texts. According to the Hebrew, the total number of years from Shem to the birth of Abram was 290, according to the Samaritan, 1,040, and according to the LXX., 1,270. These larger totals are obtained by adding, as a rule, one hundred years to the age of each patriarch before the birth of his eldest son, and the LXX. also insert Caunan between Arphaxad and Salah. The virtual agreement of two authorities, coming from such different quarters as the Samaritan transcript and the LXX. version is remarkable, but scholars have long acknowledged that these genealogies were never intended for chronological purposes, and that so to employ them leads only to error.

Like the genealogy of Seth, in chap. v., the Toldoth Shem also consists of ten generations, and thus forms, according to Hebrew ideas respecting the number ten, a perfect representation of the race. With the exception of Arphaxad (for whom see chap. x. 22), the names in this genealogy are all Hebrew words, and are full of meaning. Thus—

Salah means mission, the sending out of men in colonies to occupy new lands.

Eber is the passage, marking the migration of the head-quarters of the race, and the crossing of some great obstacle in its way, most probably the river Tigris. With this would begin the long struggle between the Semitic and Hamitic races in Mesopotamia.

Peleg, division, may be a memorial of the separation of the Joktanite Arabs from the main stem, but see Note on Chap. x. 25. Through him the rights of primogeniture passed to the Hebrews.

Reu, friendship, seems to indicate a closer drawing together of the rest after the departure of Joktan and his clan, which probably had been preceded by disensions.

Serug, intertwining, may denote that this friendship between the various races into which the family of Shem was by this time divided was cemented by inter-marriage.

Nahor, panting, earnest struggle, indicates, most probably, the commencement of that seeking after a closer communion with God which made his descendants withdraw from contact with the rest and form a separate community, distinguished by its firm hold of the doctrine of the unity of the Godhead. From the words of Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 2) it is plain, not only that idolatry was generally practised among the descendants of Shem, but that even Nahor and Terah were not free from its influence. Yet, probably, the monotheism of Abraham was preceded by an effort to return to the purer doctrine of their ancestors in Nahor’s time, and the gods which they still worshipped were the teraphim, regarded both by Laban and Rachel (chap. xxxi. 30, 34) as a kind of inferior household genius, which brought good luck to the family.

Terah, wondrous, indicates the commencement of that separation from the rest caused by religious differences, which ended in the migration of Abram into Canaan.

In Abram, high-father, we have a prophetic name, indicative of the high purpose for which the father of the faithful was chosen. There is a difficulty about the date of his birth. We read that “Terah lived seventy Now these are the generations of Terah: Terah begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran; and Haran died before his father Terah in the land of his nativity, in Ur of the Chaldees. (29) And Abram and Nahor took them wives: the name of Abram's wife was Sarai; and the name of Nahor's wife, Milcah, the daughter of Haran, the father of Milcah, and the father of

The Generations

(27) Now these are the generations of Terah: Terah begat Abram, Nahor, and Haran; and in verse 32 that the days of Terah were two hundred and five years. But St. Stephen says that Terah died in Haran before Abram's migration (Acts vii. 4), and in chap. xii. 4 we are told that Abram was seventy-five years of age when he departed from that country. Either, therefore, Terah was a hundred and thirty years old when Abram was born—and Abram was a younger, and not the older son—or the Samaritan text is right in making the total age of Terah a hundred and forty-five years. The latter is probably the true solution: first, because Nahor died at the age of a hundred and forty-eight, and it is not probable that Terah so long outlived him; for human life, as we have seen, was progressively shortening after the flood: and secondly, because Abram, in chap. xvii. 17, speaks of it as almost an impossibility for a man to have a son when he is a hundred years old. Had he been born when his father was a hundred and thirty, he could scarcely have spoken in this way.

The Toldoth Terah.

(27) Now these are the generations.—This Toldoth, which extends to chap. xxi. 11, is one of the most interesting in the Book of Genesis, as it gives us the history of the patriarch Abraham, in whom God was pleased to lay the foundation of the intermediate dispensation and of the Jewish Church, by whose institutions and psalms and prophets the light of true religion was to be maintained, and the way prepared for the coming of Christ. But though Abraham is the central figure, yet the narrative is called the Toldoth Terah, just as the history of Joseph is called the Toldoth Jacob (chap. xxxvii. 2). The explanation of this is, not that we have in it the history of Lot, and of Moab and Ammon, which are mere subsidiary matters; but that it connects Abraham with the past, and shows that, through Terah and the Toldoth which ended in him, he was the representative of Shem.

Terah begat Abram.—Commentators, in their endeavour to make St. Stephen's assertion in Acts vii. 4 agree with the numbers of the Hebrew text, have supposed that Abram was not the eldest son, and that the first place was given him because of his spiritual pre-eminence. But this is contrary to the rules of the Hebrew language, and the failure of the attempt to deprive Shem of his birthright by a mistranslation of chap. x. 21 confirms Abram's claim to the same prerogative.

(28) Haran died before his father.—Heb., in the presence of his father. This is the first recorded instance of a premature death caused by natural decay. In Ur of the Chaldees.—Ur-Casdim. A flood of light has been thrown upon this town by the translation of the cuneiform inscriptions, and we may regard it as certain that Ur is now represented by the mounds of the city of Mugheir. When first we read of this city, it was inhabited by a population of Accadians, a Turanian race, sprang probably from an early offshoot of the family of Japheth; but in course of time it was conquered by men of the Semitic family, who from thence overran the whole of Shinar, or Babylonia, and expelled from it the descendants of Cush. Mr. Sayce (Chald. Gen., p. 20) puts this conquest at some very uncertain date, two or three thousand years before Christ; but the establishment of a powerful monarchy under a king named Lig-Bagas, and the consolidation under his sway of several petty kingdoms, into which Chaldea had been previously split up, he places with some confidence at 3,000 years before the Christian era (ibid., p. 24). Now, there are in our museums inscribed bricks and engraved cylinders actually from the library of Lig-Bagas, and we learn that the Accadian literature is still older; for many of the works found at Agarû are translations from it: and thus all those difficulties as to the antiquity of the art of syllabic writing which used to exist when men had nothing better to judge by than Egyptian picture-writing have passed away. Abraham migrated from a town which was then a famous seat of learning, and where even the ordinary transactions of life were recorded on tablets of terra-cotta. Very probably, therefore, he carried with him bricks and cylinders inscribed with these ancient records. We are no longer, therefore, surprised at the striking similarity between the narratives in the Book of Genesis prior to the migration of Abraham and those preserved in the cuneiform inscriptions. But the believer in inspiration cannot fail to be struck also at their dissimilarity. The cuneiform inscriptions are polytheistic, acknowledging twelve superior gods, and of gods inferior a countless multitude. The Semitic race is accused of adding to these a number of goddesses, chief among whom were Beltis, the wife of Bel, and Istar, the planet Venus. Of all this there is no trace in the Biblical records; nor is there in the whole Chaldean literature anything so grand and Divine as the thoughts expressed in the opening words of Genesis: "In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." As Ur is an Accadian word, we must reject all Semitic interpretations of its meaning; we must further add that Mr. Rawlinson gives reasons for believing that its early importance was due to its being a great maritime emporium (Ann. Mon., i. 27). It was, we read, a walled town, and the great port for the commerce of the Persian Gulf, while round it lay a marvellously rich country, said to be the original home of the wheal-plant, and famous for its dates and other fruits. Its being called Ur-Casdim, "Ur of the Chaldees," shows that they had already won it from the Accadians when Terah dwelt there. Its subsequent name, Mugheir, probably means "mother of bitumen"—that is, producer of it.

(29) Iscah.—Not the same as Sarai, for we learn in chap. xx. 12 that she was Abraham's half-sister—that is, a daughter of Terah by another wife. Nor was she Lot's wife, as Ewald supposed, for she was his full sister. Marriages between near relatives seem to have been allowed at this time, and were perhaps even common for religious reasons (see chaps. xiv. 3, 4, xxvii. 1, 2), but not marriages between those actually by the same mother. Thus Abraham takes his half-sister to wife, and Nahor his niece. Iscah, like Naamah (chap. iv. 22), was probably eminence in her time, but for reasons not recorded.
Isch. 30. But Sarai was barren; she had no child. 31 And Terah took Abram his son, and Lot the son of Haran his son's son, and Sarai his daughter in law, his son Abram's wife; and they went forth with them from Ur of the Chaldees, to go into the land of Canaan; and they came unto Haran, and dwelt there. 32 And the days of Terah were two hundred and five years: and Terah died in Haran.

(33) They went forth with them.—This may possibly mean that they went forth in one body; but the phrase is strange, and the Samaritan, followed by the LXX, and Vulgate, by a slight transposition of the letters reads, “And he (Terah) brought them forth.”

Haran.—The Charran of Acts vii. 4, that is, Carrhae in North-west Mesopotamia, about twenty geographical miles south-east of Edessa. The name must not be confounded with that of Haran, the father of Lot, as really it is in the Heb. Kharan, and was so called in Accadian times, in which language the word means “road,” being, according to Mr. Sayce, the key of the highway from the east to the west. It was both a very early and a very late outpost of Chaldean power. (Tomkins’ Studies on Times of Abraham, 55ff.)

Terah’s migration was partly perhaps a movement of a tribe of the Semites northwards (see Note on verse 29), made restless by the Elamites, who about this time overran Western Asia; but chiefly it had a religious motive: for Ur was the especial seat of the worship of the moon-god, Sin; and though Terah had not attained to the purity of Abraham’s faith, yet neither was he altogether an idolater. But why did they intend “to go into the land of Canaan?” As Abram subsequently continued this migration in simple dependence upon God’s guidance (chap. xii. 1), it was probably the Divine rather than the human purpose that is here expressed. Still, there may have been some tradition in the family, or knowledge handed down from patriarchal times, which made them look upon Canaan as their land of hope; and the expedition of Amraphel, king of Shinar, and others against the south of Palestine, recorded in chap. xiv. 1—16, and confirmed by our large present knowledge of these popular movements, shows that we must not assume that, far removed from one another as were Babylonia and Canaan, therefore they were lands mutually unknown. We gather also that the Divine summons came to Abram in Ur (see chap. xv. 7; Nch. ix. 7; Acts vii. 2), but we learn in chap. xii. 1 that his final destination was not then definitely told him.

(32) The days of Terah.—See note on verse 26. According to the Samaritan text, Abram left Haran in the same year as that in which Terah died. Nahor had probably joined Terah about this time, as we find him subsequently settled in Haran (chap. xxiv. 10); and moreover, Abram is expressly commanded to leave “his kindred and his father’s house,” whereas all those who are mentioned by name as going with Terah shared in Abram’s subsequent migration. (See verse 31.)

CHAPTER XII.—(1) Now the Lord had said unto Abram, Get thee out of thy country, and from thy kindred, and from thy father’s house, unto a land that I will show thee: (2) and I will make of thee a great nation, and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing: (3) and I will bless them that bless thee, and curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.

Heb., And Jehovah said unto Abram. There is no new beginning; but having briefly sketched the family from which Abram sprang, and indicated that he had inherited from them the right of primogeniture, the narrative next proceeds to the primary purpose of the Toldoth Terah, which is to show how in Abram Jehovah prepared for the fulfilment, through Israel, of the protevangelium contained in the promise made to Eve at the fall (chap. iii. 15). The rendering “had said” was doubtless adopted because of St. Stephen’s words (Acts vii. 2); but it is the manner of the Biblical narrative to revert to the original starting point.

Thy country.—A proof that Abram and his father were no new settlers at Ur, but that the race of Shem had at this time long held sway there, as is now known to have been the case.

Thy kindred.—This rendering is supported by chap. xiii. 7; but it more probably means thy birthplace. It is the word translated “nativity” in chap. xi. 28, where its meaning is settled by the prefixed “land,” and the sense is probably the same here. If so, the command certainly came to Abram at Ur, though most of the versions suppose that it happened at Haran.

A land that I will show thee.—In chap. xi. 31 it is expressly said that the land was Canaan, but possibly this knowledge was concealed from the patriarch himself for a time, and neither he nor Terah knew on leaving Ur what their final destination would be.

Thou shalt be a blessing.—More correctly, Be thou a blessing. The promises made to Abram are partly personal and partly universal, embracing the whole world. In return for all that he abandons he is to become the founder of a powerful nation, who will honour his name, and teach the inheritors of their spiritual privileges to share in their veneration for him. But in the command to “be” or become a blessing,” we reach a higher level, and it is the glory of Abram’s faith that it was not selfish, and in return for his consenting to lead the life of a stranger, he was to be the means of procuring religious privileges, not only for his own descendants, but also “for all families of the earth” (Heb., of the ground—the addinah). Not for the earth as the material universe, but solely in its connection with man. Wherever man makes his home upon it, there, through Abram, spiritual blessings will be offered him.

I will bless . . .—These words indicate relations mysteriously close between Jehovah and Abram, whereby the friends and enemies of the one become so equally to the other. But in the second clause our version has not noticed an essential difference between the verbs used. They occur together again in Exod. xxiii. 28, and are there more correctly rendered by “revile” and “curse.” The one word signifies to treat lightly and contemptuously, the other to pronounce a curse, usually in a judicial manner. We might, therefore, translate, “I will curse—pass a sentence of re-
(4) So Abram departed, as the Lord had spoken unto him; and Lot went with him: and Abram was seventy and five years old when he departed out of Haran. (5) And Abram took Sarai his wife, and Lot his brother’s son, and all their substance that they had gathered, jection upon—him that speaketh lightly of, or revileth thee.

In thee shall all families of the earth be blessed.—Some authorities translate, “shall bless themselves;” but there is a different conjugation to express this meaning, and no reason exists for forcing it upon the text. Henceforward Abram and the nation sprung from him were to be the intermediaries between God and mankind, and accordingly revelation was virtually confined to them. But though the knowledge of God’s will was to be given through them, it was for the benefit of all the families of every race and kindred distributed throughout the habitable world, the adānāth (Rom. iii. 29. x. 12. &c.).

(6) Abram . . . departed out of Haran.—The command given him in Ur may have been repeated in Haran; but more probably Abram had remained there only on account of Terah. At his death (see note on chap. xi. 26) he resumed his migration northward.

(7) Their substance that they had gathered.—Not cattle only, but wealth of every kind. As we have no data about the migration of Terah, except that it was after the death of Haran, and that Haran left children, we cannot tell how long the family rested at their first halting place, but it was probably a period of several years; and as Abram was “very rich in silver and in gold,” he had apparently engaged there in trade, and thus possibly knew the course which the caravans took.

The souls that they had gotten.—Heb., had made. Onkelos and the Jewish interpreters explain this of proselytes, and persons whom they had converted to the faith in one God. Such might probably be in Abram’s company; but the most part were his dependents and slaves (comp. chap. xiv. 14.), though the word “slave” suggests a very different relation to us than that which existed between Abram and his household. Their descendants were most certainly incorporated into the Israelitish nation, and we have direct testimony that Abram gave them careful religious training (chap. xviii. 19). Thus the Jewish traditions record a fact, and by acknowledging Abram’s household as proselytes admit their claim to incorporation with the race.

Into the land of Canaan they came.—Slowly and leisurely as the cattle with their young and the women and children could travel, Abram would take his way along the 300 miles which separated him from Canaan. The ford by which he crossed the Euphrates was probably that at Jerablus, the ancient Carchemish, as the route this way is both more direct and more fertile than either that which leads to the ferry of Bir or that by Thapsacus. The difficulty of passing so great a river with so much substance, and people, and cattle would give fresh importance to his title of “the Hebrew,” the possessor over, already his by right of descent from Eber, so named from the passage of the Tigris. More correctly, these names are “Eber and Ebrew, and have nothing in common with “Heber the Kenite” (Judg. iv. 11). From Carchemish Abram’s route would lie to the south-west, by Tadmor and Damascus; and Josephus (Antiq., i. 7) has preserved the legend that “Abram came with an army from the country beyond Babylon, and conquered Damascus, and reigned there for a short time, after which he migrated into the land of Canaan.”

In Eliezer of Damascus we have a reminiscence of Abram’s halt there (chap. xv. 2). But it could not have been long, for Mr. Malan (Philosophy or Truth, pp. 98—143) has conclusively shown by the dates in Holy Scripture that only about a year elapsed between Abram’s departure from Harran and his settlement in Canaan.

(8) The place of Sichem.—Heb., Shechem. This word signifies “shoulder,” and was the name of the ridge uniting Mounts Ebal and Gerizim, the summits of which are about two miles apart. As the name is thus taken from the natural conformation of the ground, it may be very ancient. The modern name of the place is Nablus, a contraction of Flavia Neapolis, a title given it in honour of Vespasian. Mr. Conder (Two Letters in Palestine, i. 61) describes the valley as an oasis of remarkable beauty and luxuriance, but set, like Damascus, in a desert, and girt around by strong and barren mountains.

The plain of Moreh.—Heb., the oak of Moreh. It was here that Jacob buried the strange gods brought by his household from Haran (chap. xxxiv. 4), and here, too, Joshua set up the stone of testimony (Josh. xxiv. 26; Judges ix. 6) but as in Deut. xi. 30 the oaks (wrongly translated in most places in our version “plains”) are described in the plural, it is probable that the word is to be taken as a collective for an oak grove. Such shady spots were favourite places for the tents of the wandering patriarchs. A famous terebinth, called after Abram’s name, long existed at Mamre, and under it, in the time of Vespasian, the captive Jews were sold for slaves. It disappeared about A.D. 330, and no tree now marks the site of Abram’s grove. The Hebrew word, however, for terebinth is elāh, while that used here is elōn. It was probably the quercus pseudosococifera (see Tristram, Nat. Hist. of Bible, p. 369). This tree often grows to a vast size.

Moreh.—Literally, teacher (Isa. ix. 15). Probably in this cool grove some religious personage had given instruction to the people. In Judges vii. 1 we find a place called the “teacher’s hill,” and it is thus possible that among a people so religious as the race of Shem, men from time to time arose revered by the people as teachers of holiness. Such an one was Melchisedech.

The Canaanite was then in the land.—This is no sign of post-Mosaic authorship, nor a later interpolation, as if the meaning were that the Canaanite was there at that time, but is so no longer. What really is meant is that Abram on his arrival found the country no longer in the hands of the old Semitic stock, but occupied by the Canaanites, who seem to have gained the ascendency, not so much by conquest as by gradual and peaceful means. We gather from the Egyptian records that this had taken place not very long before Abram’s time. In the early inscriptions we read only of the Asiti and Amnu, both apparently Semitic races, the latter name being derived from the Heb. amu, “people.” Sub-was then in the land. (7) And the Lord appeared unto Abram, and said, “Unto thy seed will I give this land: and there builded he an altar unto the Lord, who appeared unto him.

(8) And he removed from thence unto a mountain on the east of Beth-el, and pitched his tent, having Beth-el on the west, and Hai on the east: and there he builded an altar unto the Lord, and called upon the name of the Lord.

SEQUENTLY we find frequent mention of the Amorit and the Kheta—that is, the Amorites and Hittites, evidently in Abram's time the two most powerful races of Canaan. (See Tomkins' Studies, 527.) For their previous wanderings, see on chap. x. 15—19.

(9) The Lord appeared unto Abram.—This is the first time that any appearance of the Deity is mentioned. Always previously the communications between God and man had been direct, without the intervention of any visible medium. Thus, God commanded Adam (chap. ii. 16); Adam and Eve heard His voice (chap. iii. 8), and He called them (ib. 9); He said unto Cain (chap. iv. 6—9); unto Noah (chaps. vi. 13, vii. 1), and spoke unto him (chaps. viii. 15, ix. 8); but henceforward we read repeatedly of a Divine appearance, and this visible manifestation is subsequently connected with the phrase "an angel of Jehovah" (see chaps. xvi. 7, xxxii. 11, &c.), and less frequently "an angel of God" (chap. xxi. 17; Judges vi. 20, xii. 9). Upon the question whether this was a created angel, or whether it was an anticipation of the incarnation of Christ, see Exeasen on "Angel of Jehovah" at end of this book.

There builded he an altar unto the Lord.—By so doing he took possession of the land for Jehovah, and consecrated it to Him. The altar would, further, be a place of public worship and of sacrifice. In a similar spirit Noah had taken possession of the renovated earth (chap. viii. 20).

(10) He removed.—Broke up his encampment. No special reason for this need be sought; it was the usual condition of the nomad life, and Abram's wealth in cattle would make frequent changes necessary. His first long halt was in the hill country between Beth-el and Hai, or rather Ai, as in Josh. vii. 1—3. The numerous almond-trees, whence the former town took its early name of Luz, the remains of aqueducts and other works for irrigation, and the strength of the town of Ai in Joshua's days bear witness to the ancient fertility of the district, though said now to be uninviting. Here, too, Abram made open profession of his faith, and worshipped with his household at an altar dedicated to Jehovah.

(11) Toward the south.—The Negeb, or dry land, so called because the soil being a soft white chalk, the rains sink through it, and even in the valleys run below the surface of the ground. Though treeless, it is still rihly of the district, though said now to be uninviting. Crowded, Tent Work, ii. 87.

Abram's Visit to Egypt.

(10) There was a famine in the land.—This famine must have happened within a few years after Abram reached Canaan; for he was seventy-five years of age on leaving Haran, and as Ishmael, his son by an Egyptian slave-woman, was thirteen years old when Abram was ninety-nine, only about eight years are left for the events recorded in chaps. xii.—xvi. As rain falls in Palestine only at two periods of the year, the failure of either of these seasons would be immediately felt, especially in a dry region like the Negeb, and at a time when, with no means of bringing food from a distance, men had to depend upon the annual products of the land. As Egypt is watered by the overflowing of the Nile, caused by the heavy rains which fall in Abyssinia, it probably had not suffered from what was a mere local failure in South Palestine; and Abram, already far on his way to Egypt, was forced by the necessity of providing fodder for his cattle to run the risk of proceeding thither. In Canaan he had found a thinly scattered Canaanite population, for whom probably he would have been a match in war; in Egypt he would find a powerful empire, and would be at the mercy of its rulers. It is a proof of Abram's faith that in this necessity he neither retraced his steps (Heb. xi. 15), nor sought a new home. For he went to Egypt with no intention of settling, but only "to sojourn there," to remain there for a brief period, after which with returning rains he would go back to Canaan.

(11—13) Thou art a fair woman.—For the word yepath, rendered "fair," see on chap. ix. 27. Though its general meaning is beautiful, yet there can be no doubt that the light colour of Sarai's complexion was that which would chiefly commend her to the Egyptians; for she was now past sixty, and though vigorous enough to bear a son at ninety, yet that was by the special favour of God. As she lived to the age of 127 (chap. xxxvi. 1), she was now about middle age, and evidently had retained much of her early beauty; and this, added to the difference of tint, would make her still attractive to the swarthy descendants of Ham, especially as they were not a handsome race, but had flat foreheads, high cheek-bones, large mouths, and thick lips. Twenty years later we find Abram still haunted by fears of the effects of her personal appearance (chap. xx. 2), even when living among a better-featured race. From chap. xx. 13 it appears that on leaving Haran Abram and Sarai had agreed upon adopting this expedient, which seems to us so strangely contrary to the faith which the patriarch was at that time displaying. He abandons his birthplace at the Divine command, and starts upon a weary journey expressly to protect his own life, he makes an arrangement which involves the possible sacrifice of the chastity of his wife; and twice, but for God's interference, this painful result would actually have happened. Perhaps Abram may have depended upon Sarai's cleverness to help herself out of the difficulty; but such a mixture of faith and weakness, of trust in God in abandoning so much and trust in worldly policy for preservation in a foresee shall see thee, that they shall say, This is his wife: and they will kill me, but they will save thee alive.

(13) Say, I pray thee, thou art my sister: that it may be well with me for thy sake; and my soul shall live because of thee.

(14) And it came to pass, that, when Abram was come into Egypt, the Egyptians beheld the woman that she was very fair.

(15) The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and commended her before Pharaoh: and the woman was taken into Pharaoh’s house.

(16) And he entreated Abram well for her sake: and he had sheep, and oxen, and he asses, and menservants, and maidservants, and she asses, and camels.

(17) And the Loam ploughed Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sarai Abram’s wife.

(18) And Pharaoh called Abram, and said, What is this that thou hast done unto me? why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife?

(19) Why saidst thou, She is my sister? so I might have taken her to me to wife: now therefore behold thy wife, take her, and go thy way.

And it came to pass, that when Abram was come into Egypt, the Egyptians beheld the woman that she was very fair.

The princes also of Pharaoh saw her, and commended her before Pharaoh: and the woman was taken into Pharaoh’s house.

And he entreated Abram well for her sake: and he had sheep, and oxen, and he asses, and menservants, and maidservants, and she asses, and camels.

And the Loam ploughed Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sarai Abram’s wife.

And Pharaoh called Abram, and said, What is this that thou hast done unto me? why didst thou not tell me that she was thy wife?

Why saidst thou, She is my sister? so I might have taken her to me to wife: now therefore behold thy wife, take her, and go thy way.

The reason for his opinion, in opposition to that of M. Chabas, that the Pharaoh in whose days Abram visited Egypt was an early king of the twelfth dynasty, some time anterior to the usurpation of the Hyksos.

He entreated Abram well.—Heb., did good to Abram. It was usual to give the relatives a sum of money when taking a daughter or sister to wife. The presents here show that Pharaoh had already believed that he was acting lawfully, while the largeness of them proves that Sarai, in spite of her years, was looked upon as a valuable acquisition. Among the presents are "asses." The charge on this account brought against the author of "inaccuracy," as if asses were not known at this time in Egypt, is disproved by the occurrence of representations of this animal on the tombs of Beni Hassan; we have proof even that they were numerous as far back as when the Pyramids of Gizeh were built.

The horse is not mentioned, and the earliest representation of one is in the war-chariot of Ahmes, the first Pharaoh of the eighteenth dynasty, who expelled the Hyksos. Male and female slaves are, curiously enough, introduced between "he asses" and "she asses." As she-asses were especially valuable, perhaps these and the camels were looked upon as the monarch’s choicest gifts.

Camels are not represented on the monuments, and are said not to thrive well in Egypt; but the Semitic hordes who were peopling the Delta would certainly bring camels with them. Many, too, of the Egyptian monarques—as, for instance, those of the twelfth dynasty—held rule over a great part of the Sinaic peninsula, and must have known the value of the camel for transporting heavy burdens in the desert, and its usefulness to a nomad sheik like Abram. (See chap. xxiv. 10.)

So I might have taken her to me to wife.

The Hebrew is, and I took her to me to wife: that is, I took her with the intention of making her my wife.

During the interval before the marriage Pharaoh and his household were visited with such marked troubles that he became alarmed, and possibly Sarai then revealed to him her true relationship to Abram. We find in Esth. ii. 12 that in the case of maidservants there was a probation of twelve months duration before the marriage took place, and Sarai was probably saved by some such formality. The conduct of Pharaoh is upright and dignified; nor ought we to disbelieve his assurance that he had acted upon the supposition that Sarai might lawfully be his. The silence of Abram seems to indicate his consciousness that Pharaoh had acted more rightly than himself, and yet his repetition of the offence (chap. xx.) shows that he did not feel much self-reproach at what he had done; nor, possibly, ought we to judge Pharaoh commanded his men concerning him: and they sent him away, and his wife, and all that he had.

CHAPTER XIII. — (1) And Abram went up out of Egypt, he, and his wife, and all that he had, and Lot with him, into the south. (2) And Abram was very rich in cattle, in silver, and in gold. (3) And he went on his journeys from the south even to Beth-el, unto the place where his tent had been at the beginning, between Beth-el and Hai; (4) unto the place of the altar, which he had made there at the first: and there Abram called on the name of the Lord.

(5) And Lot also, which went with Abram, had flocks, and herds, and tents. (6) And the land was not able to bear them, that they might dwell together:

his conduct from the high standpoint of Christian morality. When, however, commentators speak of it as Abram's fall, they forget that he arranged this matter with Sarai at the very time when he was quieting Haran (chap. xx. 19).

XIII. ABRAM'S RETURN FROM EGYPT AND HIS SEPARATION FROM LOT.

(1-) He went on his journeys.—Or, according to his stations, which the Vulgate very reasonably translates, "by the same route by which he had come." This route was first into the south, the Negeb, which is virtually a proper name, and thence to the spot between Beth-el and Ai mentioned in chap. xii. 8.

At the first does not mean that this was the first altar erected by Abram, but that he built it on his first arrival there. His first altar was at Shechem. As regards his wealth, while his cattle had been greatly increased in Egypt, he had probably brought the silver and gold with him from Mesopotamia. Gold, however, was plentiful at that time in Egypt, but silver rare.

(5, 6) Lot.—He, too, had possibly received presents in Egypt, for we find him rivalling his uncle in wealth; and the "tents" show that he had numerous followers, and, like Abram, was the chief of a powerful clan. The repetition that "the land was not able to bear them," and that "they could not dwell together," implies that the difficulty had long been felt before it led to an open rupture.

(7) The Perizzite.—We find mention in the Bible both of Perazites, translated villages, in 1 Sam. vi. 18, Esth. ix. 19; and of Perizzites, who are sometimes opposed to the Canaanites, as here and in chap. xxxiv. 30, and sometimes described as one of the tribes settled in Palestine (Exod. ii. 8, 17; Josh. xvii. 15; Judges iii. 5). They are not mentioned among the races descended from Canaan, and probably were the earlier inhabitants of the country, who, being a pastoral people, possessed of no towns, were not able to make head against the Hamite settlers, but maintained themselves in the open country. Perazite and Perizzite are probably the same word, and both signify lowlander, for their substance was great, so that they could not dwell together. (7) And there was a strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle: and the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land. (8) And Abram said unto Lot, Let there be no strife between the herdmen of Abram's cattle and the herdmen of Lot's cattle: and the Canaanite and the Perizzite dwelled then in the land.

(9) Lot Parts from Him.

(9) Is not the whole land before thee? separate thyself, I pray thee, between me and thee, and between my herdmen and thy herdmen; for we be brethren. (10) Is there not a part of this land, which God hath given us? part thee to the right, and I will go to the left. (11) Lot lifted up his eyes, and beheld all the plain of Jordan, that it was well watered every where, before the Lorn destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah, even as the garden of the Lord, like the though finally they were driven to the mountains (Josh. xi. 3). As the Canaanites devoted their main strength to a maritime life and trade, they would not attempt to extirpate these natives, but would content with driving them into the interior. As thus some districts would be occupied by the dominant Canaanites, and others by these aborigines, two such large clans as those of Abram and Lot would find it difficult to discover unoccupied land enough to provide pasture for their cattle. The land must have been very thinly peopled for it to have been possible for them to do this, even when they had arranged to dwell apart.

(10) Lot there be no strife.—It is evident that Lot was beginning to take part with his herdmen, and regard himself as an injured man. But Abram meets him with the utmost generosity, acknowledges that their growth in wealth rendered a separation necessary, and gives him his choice. And Lot accepts it. Instead of feeling that it was due to his uncle's age and rank to yield to him the preference, he greedily accepts the offer, selects the region that seemed to offer the greatest earthly advantages, but finds in the long run that it has perils which far outweigh its promises of wealth and pleasure.

(11) The plain of Jordan.—This word, Cecar, literally means the circuit, or, as it is translated in St. Matt. iii. 5, "the region round about Jordan." and, according to Mr. Conder (Ten Work, ii. p. 14), is the proper name of the Jordan valley, and especially of the plain of Jericho. It is now called the Chor, or depression, and is one of the most remarkable districts in the world, being a deep crack or fissure, with chalk rocks upon the western and sandstone on the eastern side, over which lies limestone, geologically of the age of our greensand formation. It is thus what is technically called a mineral fault, the formations on the two sides having been displaced by some tremendous convulsion of nature. Most of the valley lies below the level of the Mediterranean, the Sea of Galilee being, by Mr. Conder's observations, about 682 feet below it, and the Dead Sea no less than 1,292 feet. As the watershed to the south rises to a level of 200 feet above the Mediterranean, all egress for the waters is thereby cut off, and there are numerous proofs that at some distant period the whole land of Egypt, as thou comest unto Zoar. (11) Then Lot chose him all the plain of Jordan; and Lot journeyed east: and they separated themselves one from the other. (12) Abram dwelled in the land of Canaan, and Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain, and pitched his tent toward Sodom. (13) But the men of Sodom were wicked and sinners before the Lord exceedingly.

61

(14) And the Lord said unto Abram, after that Lot was separated from him, Lift up now thine eyes, and look from the place where thou art northward, and southward, and eastward, and westward: (15) For all the land which thou seest, *to thee will I give it, and to thy seed for ever. (16) And I will make thy seed as the dust of the earth: so that if a man can number the dust of the earth, then shall thy seed also be numbered. (17) Arise, walk through the land in the length of it and in the breadth of it; for I will give it unto thee.

(18) Then Abram removed his tent, and came and dwelt in the plain of Mamre, which is in Hebron, and built there an altar unto the Lord.

(19) Lot journeyed east.—This is the word translated “eastward” in chap. ii. 8, and “from the east” in chap. xi. 2. Here it can only mean towards the east.

(20) Lot dwelled in the cities of the plain.—Heb., of the Cicerar. Not as yet within their walls, but in their neighborhood, and evidently with a longing “toward Sodom,” where, in chap. xix., we find him sitting in the gate as a citizen, and with his tent changed to a house. While, then, Abram continued to lead a hardy life as a strangey upon the braeiling hills, Lot sighed for the less self-denying habits of the city; and probably, when he had descended into the Ghor, the encraving climate, which so developed the sensual vices of the people as to make them “sinners before Jehovah” (see on chap. x. 9), disposed Lot also to quit his tent, and yield himself to a luxurious and easy manner of living.

(21) The Lord said unto Abram.—The departure of Lot was certainly a great grief to Abram; for he lost thereby the companionship of the relative who had shared his abandonment of his country, and whom, probably, in his childless state, he had regarded as his heir. Jehovah, therefore, consoles him by a more definite promise of the possession of the whole land of which he had so generously given Lot the choice, and by the assurance that his own seed should be numerous as the dust of the earth. We may also feel sure that as Lot was deteriorating, so Abram was drawing nearer to God, and walking more closely with Him; and hence the fuller assurance of the Divine blessing.

(22) Walk through the land.—Repeated change of scene is not merely one of the pleasures of the nomad life, but also a necessity: for the uplands, covered with rich herbage in the spring, are usually burnt up in summer, and in the winter are exposed to driving winds and rain-storms. In these journeyings Abram is now to have the tranquil pleasure of feeling that his seed will inherit each beautiful spot that he visits, and that he is taking possession of it, and hallowing it for them.

(23) The plain of Mamre.—(Heb., oaks of Mamre. See on chap. xii. 6). Mamre was an Amorite, then living, and as he was confederate with Abram, it was apparently with the consent of the Amorites, and by virtue of the treaty entered into with them, that Abram made this oak-grove one of his permanent stations.

Hebron.—That is, alliance. Hebron was perhaps so called from the confederacy formed between Abram and the Amorites, and was apparently the name not only of a city, but of a district, as the oaks of Mamre are described as being “in Hebron.” For its other name, Kirjath-arba, see note on chap. xxiii. 2.
CHAPTER XIV.—(1) And it came to pass in the days of Amraphel king of Shinar, Arioch king of Ellasar, Chedorlaomer king of Elam, and Tidal king of nations; (2) that these made war with Bera king of Sodom, and with Birsha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, and Shembezer king of Zeboim, and the king of Bela, which is Zoar. (3) All these were joined together in the vale of Siddim, which is the salt sea. (4) Twelve years they served Chedorlaomer, and in the thirteenth year they rebelled. (5) And in the fourteenth year came Chedorlaomer, and the kings that were with him, and smote the Rephaims in Ashteroth Karnaim, and the Zuzims in Ham, and the Emims in Shaveh.

Invasion of the Jordan Valley by Chedorlaomer, King of Elam.

(1) It came to pass.—Connected with the settlement of Lot in the Jordan valley is one of the most remarkable episodes in the whole of the Bible, derived either from Canaanite records, or, as Mr. Sayce thinks (Chald. Genesis, p. 72), from those of Babylon. The latter view is made the more probable by the fact that Amraphel, though but a subject king, is placed first; and in the way in which the patriarch is described in it, as "Abraham the Hebrew," seems certainly to suggest that we have to do here with a narrative of foreign origin.

Its incorporation with the history admirably sets forth the consequences of Lot's choice in the troubles, and even ruin, which overtook him, the bravery and power of Abram, and his generosity to the rescued kings. It is also most interesting, as showing Abraham's relation to the Amorites, among whom he lived, and the existence in Palestine of a Semitic population, who still worshipped "the most high God," and over whom one of the noblest figures in the Old Testament was king. The narrative is Jehovistic, for Abram calls God Jehovah El Elyon, but is, nevertheless, of such ancient date as to forbid the acceptance of the theory which regards the occurrence of the name Jehovah as a proof of later authorship. Upon Elam and the conquests and route of Chedorlaomer, see Excursus at end of this book.

Amraphel.—An Accadian name, which Lenormant has found on Babylonian cylinders, and which he explains as meaning "the circle of the year."

Shinar.—See on chap. x. 16.

Arioch.—i.e., Erdik, which in Accadian means "servant of the moon-god." He was king of Ellasar, i.e., Al-Lursa, the city of Larsa, now called Sennacher. It is situated on the left bank of the Euphrates, in Lower Babylonia, and has contributed some very ancient tablets to the collection in the British Museum. The name occurs again in Dan. ii. 14.

Tidal.—More correctly in the LXX., Thargal, that is, Tur-gal, the great son (Sayce). In the Syriac he is called "Thargal, king of the Géba," the latter being a mistake, through reading Gélim for Géba. This word does not mean "nations," but is a proper name, spelt Gutium in the inscriptions, "by which the Accadians designated the whole tract of country which extended from the Tigris to the eastern borders of Media, including the district afterwards known as Assyria" (Chald. Gen., p. 197).

(2) Bera, king of Sodom.—The failure of the attempt to explain the names of these five kings, and of the cities over which they ruled (with one or two exceptions), by the help of the Hebrew language makes it probable that the inhabitants of the Ciccar were either Canaanites who had come from the sea-coast, or men of some Hamite stock who had colonised this region from the east. The latter is the more probable view, as they do not seem to have had much affinity either with the Amorites or with the Jebsaites, their neighbours.

(3) All these were joined together.—Were united in a confederacy, and so formed a pentapolis, or group of five allied towns, like the Philistine league with its five lords (1 Sam. vi. 16–18). The vale of Siddim.—Mr. Conder (Text-work, ii. 16) says that the name Siddim is still given by the Arabs to the cliffs or banks of marl which run along the southern edge of the plain of Jericho; and with this agrees Aben-Ezra's explanation, who derives the word from the Hebrew sid, chalk. Mr. Conder searched throughout the Ciccar for traces of the ruined cities, but in vain; and "the gradual rise of the level of the plain, caused by the constant washing down of the soft marl from the western hills, would effectually," he thinks, "cover over any such ruins." He found, however, copious springs of water upon the north-western side of the lake, and considers that the five cities were in their neighbourhood.

Which is the salt sea.—From these words commentators have rashly concluded that the vale of Sodom was swallowed up by the Dead Sea; but not only is no such convulsion of nature mentioned in chap. xix., but Abram is described as seeing the Ciccar-land not submerged, but smoking like a furnace (verse 28). Probably "the vale of Siddim" was the name of the whole district in which these sids, or bluffs, are situated, and which extend round all the northern shores of the lake. Mr. Conder, after tracing the lines of former beaches, which show that the Dead Sea has long been shrinking in extent, tells us (Text-work, ii. 48) that geologists hold that it had reached its present condition long before the days of Abram. It still, indeed, covered a much larger space, for the rains at that time were far more copious in Palestine than at present; but it no longer extended over the whole Arabah, as, by the evidence of these beaches, was once the case.

(4) They served.—That is, paid a yearly tribute, that they might be exempt from Chedorlaomer's marauding expeditions (see 2 Kings xviii. 7). There must, therefore, have been envoys going from time to time to and fro from the Jordan valley to Shinar.

(5) The Rephaims.—Described as an Amorite tribe (Amos ii. 9) of great stature, settled in Bashan, where Moses conquered them (Josh. xiii. 12). We find them also on the other side of Jordan, in Mount Ephraim (Josh. xvi. 15), on the western side of Jerusalem (Josh. xv. 8, xvii. 16; 2 Sam. v. 18, 22), and even among the Philistines (2 Sam. xxi. 16, 18). In many of these places the word is wrongly translated giants. From this wide dispersion of them we may safely conclude that they belonged to the earlier settlers in the land, Kiriathaim, (6) and the Horites in their mount Seir, unto 1 El-paraan, which is by the wilderness. (7) And they returned, and came to En-mishpat, which is Kadesh, and smote all the country of the Amalekites, and also the Amorites, that dwelt in Hazazon-tamar.

(8) And there went out the king of Sodom, and the king of Gomorrah, and the king of Admah, and the king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela (the same is Zoar;) and they joined battle with them in the vale of Siddim; (9) with Chedorlaomer the king of Elam, and with Tidal king of nations, and Amraphel king of Shinar, and Arioch king of Ellasar; four kings with five. (10) And the vale of Siddim was full of slime pits; and the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fled, and fell there; and they that remained fled to the mountain. (11) And they took all the goods of Sodom and Gomorrah, and all their victuals, and went their way. (12) And they took Lot, Abram’s brother’s son, who dwelt in Sodom, and his goods, and departed.

(13) And there came one that had escaped, and told Abram the Hebrew; for he dwelt in the plain of Mamre the Amorite, brother of Eshcol, and brother of Aner: and these were confederate with Abram. (14) And when Abram heard that his brother was taken captive, he armed his 3trained servants, born in his own house, three hundred and eighteen, and pursued them unto and that only their rulers, like Og (Josh. ix. 10), were Amorites.

Ashdoroth Karnaim.—The two-horned Astartes, the Phoenician Venus, identified by the Rephaim with the moon. Her worship had, no doubt, been introduced by the Amorites. This city was the capital of Og (Deut. i. 4), and is called Be-Eshthera, “the house of Astarte,” in Josh. xxii. 37. Its remains have been found at Tell-Ashether, in the Hauran, about two leagues from the ancient Edrei.

The Zuzims.—Called in Deut. ii. 20 Zamzummim, where they are identified with the Rephaim, of which stock they were an inferior branch. Their capital, Ham, has been identified with Hametit, about six miles to the east of the lower part of the Dead Sea (Tristram, Land of Moab, p. 117).

The Emims.—Of these also we read in Deut. ii. 10, 11: “The Emim ... also were accounted Rephaim, as the Anakim.”

In Shaveh Kiriathaim.—More probably, in the plain of Kiriathaim. This city, given to the tribe of Reuben (Num. xxxii. 37), was, upon the decay of the Israelites upon the east of Jordan, re-occupied by the Moabites (Jer. xlviii. 1), who had taken it from the Emim.

(6) The Horites.—Cave-men, the aboriginal inhabitants of Mount Seir, subsequently conquered by the Edomites (Deut. ii. 12, 22). The miserable condition of these earth-men is described in Job. xxx. 3—8.

El-paraan.—This forest of oaks (or terebinths) was on the edge of the great wilderness, and reached to within three days’ journey of Sinai (Num. x. 12, 33).

(7) They returned.—More correctly, they turned, as they did not go back by the same route, but wheeled towards the north-west.

En-mishpat.—The fountain of justice, because at this spring the ancient inhabitants of the country used to meet to settle their disputes. It was also called Kadesh, probably the ‘Ain Qadis described by Professor Palmer. It was a great stronghold, and both a sanctuary and a seat of government. It has been visited lately by Mr. Trumbull, for whose account see Palestine Exploration Fund, Quarterly Statement, July, 1881, pp. 208—212.

The Amalekites.—Saul had to pursue these wandering hordes into the recesses of Paran (1 Sam. xvi. 7), but they were evidently now in possession of the Negeb of Judah.

Hazazon-tamar, the filling of the palm, is certainly the same as Engedi (2 Chron. xx. 2). For descriptions of this wonderful spot, see dear to Solomon (Cant. i. 14), see Conder, Tent-work, ii. 135; Tristram, Land of Israel, 251; and for its strategical importance, Tristram, Land of Moab, 25.

(8) They joined battle with them.—Heb., they set themselves in array against them. As the five kings left their cities to do battle with the invaders in the vale of Siddim, “it is plain, as was said in verse 3, that the vale embraces a far wider extent of country than merely the site of the five cities.

(10) The vale of Siddim was full of slime pits.—That is, of holes whose bitumen had been excavated. Layers of this natural asphalt, well known both to the Greeks and Romans as pitch, pitch, still exist on the western side of the Dead Sea; and the places whence it had been dug out, and which are often very deep, formed dangerous impediments in the way of the defeated side.

(13) One that had escaped.—Heb., the escaped; not any one in particular, but the fugitives generally. As Sodom lay at the north-western end of the Dead Sea, the region where Abram was dwelling would be their natural place of refuge.

Abram the Hebrew.—That is, the immigrant (from beyond the Euphrates), but also his patriomy from Eber, who in like manner had crossed the Tigris. It was, no doubt, the usual title of Abram among the Canaanites, and has been preserved from the original document, whence also probably was taken the exact description of Lot in verse 12.

The plain of Mamre . . . these were confederate with Abram.—Heb., the oak of Mamre (see chap. xiii. 18), and lords, or owners of a covenant. Abram had not occupied Mamre without the consent of the dominant Amorites, and probably there was also a league for mutual defence between him and them.

(14) Abram . . . armed.—Heb., lef forth, or literally, let them loose, let them pour forth, the verb indicating both their number and also their haste. The word for poured comes from the same root as the name Enoch, for which see note on chap. iv. 17. As Abram’s cattle would often be exposed to danger from GENESIS, XIV.

The Greeting of Melchizedek.

And he divided himself against them, he and his servants, by night, and smote them, and pursued them unto Hobah, which is on the left hand of Damascus. And he brought back all the goods, and also brought again his brother Lot, and his goods, and the women also, and the people. And the king of Sodom went out to meet him after his return from the slaughter of Chedorlaomer, and of the kings that were with him, at the valley of Shaveh, which is the king’s dale. And Melchizedek king of Salem brought forth bread and wine; and he was the priest of the most high God.

The valley of Shaveh.—That is, the valley of the plain (see on verse 5). It was the place where Abiram erected his pillar (2 Sam. xviii. 18), and lay on the northern side of Jerusalem, probably where the Kidron valley widens out. Its other name, “the king’s dale,” may have been given to this meeting of the kings of Salem and Sodom with the victorious Abram; but Onkelos, with far greater probability, considers that it was so called because upon this level ground the kings of Judah in subsequent times assembled and exercised their forces.

Melchizedek king of Salem.—There is a Salem near Scythopolis in the tribe of Ephraim, near to which John baptised (John iii. 23, where it is called Salim), and Jerome mentions that some local ruins there were said to be the remains of Melchizedek’s palace. But such traditions are of little value, and we may feel certain that the place was really Jerusalem (Ps. lxxvi. 2); for it lay on Abram’s route homeward, and was within a reasonable distance of Sodom, which, as we have seen, lay in the Cisear of Jericho, at the northern end of the Dead Sea. Salem is a common name for towns in Palestine (Conder, Tent-work, i, 91), and the village in Ephraim is too remote to have been the place of meeting.

In Melchizedek we have a type of Christ (Ps. ex. 4; Heb. v. 6,10, vii. 1-21), and so venerable is his character and aspect that Jewish tradition identified him with the patriarch Shem, thus reconciling also to themselves his superiority over their forefather Abraham. But this idea is contradicted by Heb. vii. 3. He was more probably the king of some Semitic race who still occupied Salem, but from whom it was at a subsequent period wrested by the Jebusites, who called it Jerusalem, after the name of their ancestor (Judges xix. 10, 11). Up to David’s days it seems to have still had a titular king (2 Sam. xxiv. 23), and upon his conquest of it its old name reappears, but with a prefix, and henceforward it was known as Jerusalem, that is (probably), the possession of Salem.

The typical value of Melchizedek’s priesthood lies not merely in his being “king of righteousness and king of peace,” but even more in his priesthood being universal, limited by no external ordinances, and attached to no particular race or people. Moreover, he is a king-priest (Ps. ex.), and by taking precedence of Abram, and blessing him, and receiving of him tithes, he became the representative of a higher priesthood than any that could spring from Abram’s loins.

Bread and wine.—The representatives of food of all kinds, both liquid and solid. Though the primary object of this offering was the refreshing of the bodies of Abram’s men, and of the prisoners wearied with their long march to and fro, yet we cannot but recognise in it a foreshowing of the bestowal by Christ, the antitype, upon His Church of the spiritual food of His most blessed Body and Blood.

Priest of the most high God.—Heb, of El ‛elyon. The mention of the term priest (used here for the first time) shows that some sort of sacrificial worship existed at Salem. Sacrifice had, however, been practised before; for Abel had acted as a priest when offering his firstlings, and Abram at the various altars which he built. Apparently, however, Melchizedek had been set apart for the priesthood in some more definite way. ‘Elyon means “the supreme God,” and though the two words are so similar in English, they are altogether unlike in Hebrew. In Ps. vii. 17 the epithet ‛elyon is applied to Jehovah. With that precision in the use of the names of Deity which we have so often noticed before, Melchizedek is described as a priest of El ’elyon, the Supreme Ruler of the universe; but Abram swears by Jehovah El ’elyon, thus claiming that Jehovah was that Supreme Deity whom Melchizedek served, though without the special knowledge of Him which the patriarch possessed.

Possessor.—Literally, creator, or framer. It is a poetical word, as are also those for “delivered” and “enemies.” The form of the blessing, moreover, is poetical, as it is arranged in parallel clauses.

He gave him tithes.—Abram thus consecrated the war by a thank-offering to God, Who had GENESIS, XV.

(21) And the king of Sodom said unto Abram, Give me the 1 persons, and take the goods to thyself. (22) And Abram said to the king of Sodom, I have lift up mine hand unto the Lord, the most high God, the possessor of heaven and earth, (23) that I will not take from a thread even to a shoelatchet, and that I will not take any thing that is thine, lest thou shouldest say, I have made Abram rich: (24) save only that which the young men have eaten, and the portion of the men which went with me, Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre; let them take their portion.

CHAPTER XV. — (1) After these things the word of the Lord came unto Abram in a vision, saying, Fear not, Abram: I am thy shield and thy exceeding great reward. (2) And Abram said, Lord God, what wilt thou give me, seeing I go childless, and the steward of my house is this Eliezer of Damascus? (3) And Abram said, Behold, to me thou hast given no seed: and, lo, one born in my house is mine heir. (4) And, behold, the word of the Lord came unto him, saying, This shall not be thine heir; but he that shall come forth out of thine own bowels shall be thine heir. (5) And he brought him forth abroad, and said, Look now toward heaven, and tell the stars, if thou be able to number them: and he said unto him, ² So shall

(1) Hebrew, souls.
(2) Hebrew, Eliezer.
(3) Ps. 16. 3.
(4) Rom. 4. 18.
(5) Heb., Elam.

God's Covenant

CHAPTER XV.

(1) After these things — After the war with Chedorlaomer.

The word of the Lord came (Heb., was) unto Abram. — This phrase, used so constantly afterwards to signify revelation, occurs here for the first time. The revelation on this occasion is made by night (verse 5), not however in a dream, but in a trance, in which the senses of Abram were closed to all earthly impressions and he became passive in the hands of the Almighty. Up to this time Abram had received only general promises of offspring; and of the land being the possession of his seed; but years were passing by, and the fulfillment of his hopes remained distant as ever. By the war with the Elamite king he had also made for himself powerful enemies; and though the immediate result was fortunate, yet many Canaanite nations may have witnessed with displeasure so remarkable an exhibition of the power and energy of an "immigrant." And thus the time had come when the patriarch needed and obtained more formal assurances, first, of the bestowment upon him of offspring (verses 1—5); and, secondly, of the future possession of Palestine (verses 18—21).

Lord God. — Not Jehovah Elohim, but Lord Jehovah, "Lord" being the ordinary title of respect. Usually Jehovah takes the vowels of 'donai, "lord," but as the two words occur here together, it takes the vowels of Elohim, whence the translation in our version, in obedience to a superstition of the Jews (chap. iv. 1). What wilt thou give me? — There is a slight tone of complaint in these words. Jehovah promised Abram a "reward great exceedingly." He answers that no reward can really be great so long as he has no heir.

I go childless. — Either, I am going to my grave childless (Ps. xxxix. 13), or better, I continue to be, pass my days, in childlessness.

The steward of my house. — Heb., the ben-meshek of my house. Ben-meshek is generally explained as meaning "the son of possession," that is, the possessor, owner of my house when I die. Other authorities derive meshek from a verb signifying "to run about," as if it was Eliezer's business to go to and fro in execution of Abram's orders. The term is rare, and has evidently been chosen for the play of words upon Damascus = Damascus. Perhaps this may also explain the last words, which literally are, he is Damascus Eliezer. Grammatically it should have been, "he is the Damascus Eliezer," but this would have spoiled the sonship between ben-meshek (probably pronounced benmeshek) and Damascus.

One born in my house. — This is a mistake. Those born in Abram's house were his servants (chap. xiv. 14). The Hebrew is, the son of my house, my house-bred, not born of me, but the chief of the house next to myself, and its representative. Eliezer was probably born at Damascus.

He brought him forth. — There is no reason for regarding this as a poetical description of a merely mental emotion. With his senses dormant, but alive to every spiritual impression, Abram feels himself led forth from the tent into the open space around, and is there commanded to count the stars. As a matter of fact, the stars visible to the naked eye are not very numerous, but they have ever been a received metaphor for an infinite multitude, probably because, as men gaze, they perpetually see the faint radiance of more and more distant constellations. Thus they cannot be counted, and Abram’s seed was to be countless, because of the vastness of its number.

(6) He believed in the Lord (in Jehovah) . . .—We have here the germ of the doctrine of free justification. Abram was both a holy man and one who proved his faith by his works; but nevertheless the inspired narrator inserts this reflection, not after the history of the offering of Isaac, but in the account of this vision, where all that Abram did was to believe, and for that belief’s sake was accounted righteous before God. For the definite conclusions deduced from this verse by St. Paul see Rom. iv. The quotation there is from the LXX., and gives the general sense, but the correct rendering of the Hebrew is that given in our version.

(7) Lord God . . . Heb., Lord Jehovah, as in verse 2. Whereby shall I know that I shall inherit it?—Jehovah had required Abram to leave his home in Ur of the Chaldees on a general promise of future endowment with the land of Canaan. Abram now asks this question, not from want of faith, but from a desire for a more direct confirmation of the promise and fuller knowledge of the details. What Abram, therefore, receives is an exact and circumstantial prophecy, made in the form of a solemn covenant.

(8) Take me an heifer . . .—This form of making a covenant was probably that usual in Babylonia, and thus Abram received the assurance of his inheritance by means of a ceremonial with which he was familiar. But in most ancient languages men are said to cut or strike a covenant, because the most solemn formula involved either the cutting of victims in two, or striking them dead, as was the Roman manner. The severing of the bodies was not, as some suppose, to represent the two parties; but, as explained in Jer. xxxiv. 18—20, it set forth the penalty of perjury, and was usually accompanied by the imprecation upon the covenant-breaker of a destruction as complete as that which had befallen the slaughtered animals. There is no mention in this place of a sacrifice, although the animals are those subsequently set apart for sacrifice by the Levitical law. The heifer, she-goat, and ram at three years old would each have attained its full maturity; but there may be a further symbolic meaning in there being three animals each three years old.

Laid each piece . . .—More exactly, and laid each half over against the other. The birds were not divided; but as there were two, Abram probably placed one on one side and one on the other.

(9) And when the fowls . . .—Heb., And the birds of prey came down upon the carcases, and Abram scared them away. Had there been a sacrifice the fire would have kept the vultures from approaching; but the bodies lay exposed, and Abram therefore kept guard over them, lest the purpose of the ceremonial should be frustrated by any want of respect shown to the outward symbols.

When the sun was going down.—The time described was the evening following the night on which he had received the assurance that his seed should be countless as the stars. He had then, in his trance, also asked for some security that Canaan should be the heritage of his posterity, and in answer had received the command to arrange, upon a large scale, the ceremonial of a solemn treaty-making. The morning had been spent in the performance of the command, and afterwards he had watched, probably for several hours, by the side of the divided bodies, uncertain what would happen, but occupied in driving away the vultures, which gathered from all quarters round the abundant feast. At sunset the revelation came to him, not in a waking trance, as on the previous night, but in “a deep sleep,” and with those accompaniments of terror so powerfully described in Job iv. 12—16, and which the created man, when brought near to the manifest presence of the Creator (Dan. x. 8).

Lo, an horror of great darkness fell upon him.—Heb., lo, a terror, even great darkness, falling upon him. The terror was not mental so much as bodily, caused by a deep gloom settling round him, such as would be the effect of an eclipse of the setting sun, and shutting all mortal things away from his view.

Four hundred years.—The exact duration of the sojourn in Egypt was 430 years (Exod. xii. 40, 41), and with this agrees the genealogy of Jeshua (1 Chron. v. 32—37).

(10) That nation.—Had it been expressly revealed that the country that would afflict them was Egypt, the patriarchs might have been unwilling to go thither; but the reference to the plagues in the denunciation of judgment, and to the spelling of the Egyptians in the promise that they should “come out with great substance” (Exod. xii. 30), gave detail sufficient for future guidance, and for their assurance in time to come that the promise had been fulfilled.

(11) Thou shalt go to thy fathers in peace.—Abram’s ancestors had died in Babylonia, but the though shalt go to thy fathers in peace; thou shalt be buried in a good old age.
(16) But in the fourth generation they shall come hither again: for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet full.
(17) And it came to pass, that, when the sun went down, and it was dark, behold, a smoking furnace, and a burning lamp that passed between those pieces.
(18) In the same day the Lord made a covenant with Abram, saying, "Unto thee will I give thy seed even all these countries, and I will make of thee a great nation; and I will bless thee, and make thy name great; and thou shalt be a blessing.
And I will bless them that bless thee, and Curse him that curseth thee: and in thee shall all the families of the earth be blessed."

CHAPTER XVI. — (1) Now Sarai Abram’s wife bare him no children: and

Num. xxxiv. 5; Josh. xv. 4; Isa. xxvii. 12 (where alone an attempt is made at accuracy by translating stream), the Hebrew has, the torrent of Egypt, that is, a stream full after the rains, but dry during the rest of the year. For a description of these torrent-beds see Isa. lvii. 5, 6; where in verse 5 the word is translated valleys, and in verse 6 stream. The word used here signifies a river that flows constantly; and Abram’s prosperity are to be found a kingdom conterminous with the Nile and the Euphrates, that is, with Egypt and Babylonia. If these bounds are large and vague, we must also remember that they are limited by the names of the ten nations which follow. Between the Nile and the Euphrates, the territories of these ten tribes is alone definitely bestowed upon Abram.

The Kenites.—An Arab race, found both among the Amalekites in the south (i Sam. xv. 6) and among the tribes of Naphtali and Zebulon in the north (Judges iv. 11), and even in Midian, as Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, is called a Kenite (Judges i. 16). Balaam speaks of them as being a powerful nation (Num. xxiv. 21), and this wide dispersion of them into feebile remnants seems to show that they were a race of early settlers in Canaan, who, like the Rephaim, had been overpowered and scattered by subsequent immigrants. They were uniformly friendly to Israel.

The Kenizzites.—The chief fact of importance connected with this race is that Caleb was a Kenite (Num. xxvii. 12). Apparently with his clan he joined the Israelites at the Exodus, and was numbered with the tribe of Judah. Kenizite and Kenizite are two ways of spelling the same Hebrew word, the former being right.

The Kadmonites.—This may mean either an eastern or an ancient people, of whom we know nothing.

For the Perizzites see chap. xiii. 7; for the Rephaim, chap. xiv. 5; and for the rest, chap. x. 15—18.

XVI.

The Son of the Bondwoman.

(1) Now Sarai. —The history of Abram is given in a succession of brief narratives, written possibly by the patriarch himself; and though papyrus was known at Ur (Trans. Soc. Bib. Arch., i. 343, ii. 490), yet the absence of any convenient writing material for ordinary use would oblige men in those ancient days to content themselves with short inscriptions, like those tablets of clay brought from Ur, many of which now in the British Museum are said to be considerably older than the time of Abram. The narrator would naturally make but few alterations in such precious documents, and hence a certain amount of recapitulation, like that which we find in the Books of Samuel, where she had an handmaid, an Egyptian, whose name was Hagar. (2) And Sarai said unto Abram, Behold now, the Lord hath restrained me from bearing: I pray thee, go in unto my maid; it may be that I may 1 obtain children by her. And Abram hearkened to the voice of Sarai. (3) And Sarai Abram’s wife took Hagar her maid the Egyptian, after Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan, and gave her to her husband Abram to be his wife. (4) And he went in unto Hagar, and she conceived: and when she saw that she had conceived, again we have not a narrative from one pen, but the arrangement of materials already ancient. As, however, the Divine object was the revealing to mankind of the way by which God would raise up man from the fall, the narrator would be guided by inspiration in his choice of materials, and in the omission of such things as did not fall in with this purpose; and the evident reverence with which he deals with these records is a warrant to us of their genuineness. Such additions as the remark that the “Valley of Shaveh” was many centuries later called “the King’s Dale” (chap. xiv. 17; 2 Sam. xviii. 18) are generally acknowledged to have been the work of Ezra and the men of the Great Synagogue, after the return from the exile.
Sarai gives Hagar to Abram

Hagar.—As this word apparently comes from the Arabic verb to flee, it cannot have been her original name, unless we suppose that she really was an Arab fugitive who had taken refuge in Egypt. More probably she was an Egyptian woman who had escaped to Abram when he was in the Negeb, and had then received this appellation, which virtually means run-away.

(2) That I may obtain children by her.—Heb., that I may be built by her. The words, ben—a son, both (originally both)—a daughter, benith (bothith) = a house, and benith—to build, all belong to the same root in Hebrew, the idea being that the children build the house, and give a man the pledge of continuance. Until late times the tent was the habitation, while the house was the family (chap. vii. 1). Thus the phrase “to build a man a sure house” meant, to give him lasting prosperity (1 Sam. ii. 33). Hence, too, the close connection between building and the bestowal of children in Ps. cxviii. As then the children of a woman bestowed by her mistress upon the husband were regarded as belonging to the wife (chap. xxx. 3), Sarah, despairing of bearing a son herself, as she was now seventy-five, and had been ten years in Canaan, concluded that her heir was to be born of a substitute.

As regards the morality of the act, we find that marriage with one wife was the original law (chap. ii. 24), and that when polygamy was introduced it was coupled by the inspired narrator with violence and licence (chap. iv. 19). Monogamy was the rule, as we see in the households of Noah, Terah, Isaac, and others; but many, like Esau and Jacob, allowed themselves a greater latitude. To so doing, their conduct falls below the level of Christian morality, but every one’s actions are strongly influenced by the general views of the people among whom he lives; and in Abram’s case it must be said in his defence that, with so much depending on his having offspring, he took no steps to obtain another wife, but remained content with the barren Sarai. When he did take Hagar it was at his wife’s request, and for a reason which seemed to them adequate, and even religious. Rachel subsequently did the same for a much lower motive. The consent of the wife was in such cases all-important; and so in India, in ancient times, it was necessary to make a second marriage valid (see Wilson’s Hindu Theatre, i. 179).

(3) Abram had dwelt ten years in the land of Canaan.—He was now, therefore, eighty-five years of age (see verse 16 and chap. xii. 4), and this long delay had not only tried his faith, but brought him and Sarai to the conclusion that the promised seed was to be obtained by other means.

(4) Her mistress was despised.—Hagar, we are told in verse 3, was to be, not Abram’s concubine, but his wife. She was to be Sarai’s representative, and though now she would hold the highest place in the household next to Sarai, because of this relation to Abram, yet she would continue to be Sarai’s maid. But no sooner had she conceived, than, proud of her superiority over her mistress, she wished to overthrow this arrangement, and, at all events, acted as if she was Abram’s wife absolutely, and thrust Sarai aside.

(5) My wrong be upon thee.—That is, May the wrong done to me be avenged upon thee. Sarai’s act had been one of self-denial for Abram’s sake, and now that it has led to her being treated insolently she makes Abram answerable for it.

(6) Sarai dealt hardly with her.—The verb is translated afflicted in Exod. i. 11 and Isa. lx. 14; its more exact meaning is, Sarai humbled her, that is, reduced her to her original condition. It was quite right that as Hagar had abused her elevation, Abram should make her yield to Sarai all due respect and submission; but in making her resume her old position as a slave, Sarai was possibly dealing unkindly with her (but see verse 9). In running away Hagar not only showed the untamable love of freedom which Ishmael inherited from her, but apparently was repeating the act from which she had her name.

(7) The angel of the Lord.—Heb., of Jehovah. (See Excursus at end of Book.)

In the way to Shur.—Hagar evidently fled by the usual route leading from Hebron past Beer-sheba to Egypt. The wilderness was that of Paran, in which Kadesh was situated. The fountain by which Hagar was sitting was on the road to Shur, which is a desert on the eastern side of Egypt, forming the boundary of the territory of the Ishmaelites (chap. xxv. 18) and of the Amalekites (1 Sam. xv. 7, xxvii. 8), and reached Shur. (8) And he said, Hagar, Sarai's maid, whence camest thou? and whither wilt thou go? And she said, I flee from the face of my mistress Sarai. (9) And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Return to thy mistress, and submit thyself under her hands. (10) And the angel of the Lord said unto her, Behold, thou art with child, and shalt bear a son, and shalt call his name Ishmael; because the Lord hath heard thy affliction. (12) And he will be a wild man; his hand will be against every man, and every man's hand against him; and he shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren. (13) And she called the name of the Lord that spake unto her, Thou God seest me: for she said, Have I also here looked after him that seeth me? (14) Wherefore the well was called Beer-lahai-roi; behold, it is between Kadesh and Bered. (15) And Hagar bare Abrām a son: and Abrām called his son's name, which Hagar bare, Ishmael. (16) And Abrām was fourscore and six years old, when Hagar bare Ishmael to Abrām.

CHAPTER XVII. — (1) And when Abrām was ninety years old and nine, the Lord appeared to Abrām, and said unto him, I am the Almighty God; walk before me, and be thou perfect.

He shall dwell in the presence of all his brethren.—That is, he shall maintain his independence, and his descendants shall continue to exist as a free race in the presence of the other Abrahamite nations. Many commentators, however, consider that the more exact rendering is, he shall dwell to the east of all his brethren. This is certainly the meaning of the word in chap. xxv. 6, but does not suit equally well there in verse 18.

(19) Thou God seest me.—Heb., Thou art El Roi, that is, a God of seeing. Not as Onkelos paraphrases it, "Thou art a God that sees all things," but "Thou art a God that permits Himself to be seen." For so Hagar proceeds herself to explain the name, Do not I still see after seeing? With all the love of an Oriental for dark sayings, Hagar plays upon the word "roi," but her meaning is plain: "Do I not see, and therefore am alive, and not even blinded, nor bereft of sense and reason, though I have seen God."

(14) Beer-lahai-roi.—That is, Well of the living-seeing (of God), the well where God has been seen, and the beholder still lives. It became afterwards a favourite dwelling-place of Isaac (chap. xxv. 11), and was probably, therefore, surrounded by pastures, but its site has not been identified. For Kadesh see chap. xiv. 7. Bered is absolutely unknown.

XVII.

CONFIRMATION OF THE COVENANT BY THE SACRAMENT OF CIRCUMCISION.

(1) Abrām was ninety years old and nine.—Thirteen years, therefore, had passed by since the birth of Ishmael, who doubtless during this time had grown very dear to the childless old man, as we gather from the wish expressed in verse 18.

I am the Almighty God.—Heb., El shaddai. The word is Arabic, but there is no doubt that it means strong so as to overpower. Besides its use in Genesis we find it employed as the name of Deity by Balaam (Num. xxiv. 4, 16); by Naomi (Ruth i. 20); and in the Book of Job, where it occurs thirty-one times. We may thus regard it as "one of the more general world-wide titles of the Most High." (Speaker's Commentary). In Exod. vi. 3 it is said, with evident reference to this place, that El shaddai was the name of God revealed by the Israelites soon after crossing the Red Sea (Exod. xv. 22; Num. xxxiii. 8). It is now called Jaffa.

(6) Whence camest thou?—It is noteworthy that in these Divine communications God's knowledge of all the circumstances is not presumed, but the person visited is led on to tell them. This adds very much to the freshness and poetry of the narrative. Here, however, in the address, Hagar, Sarai's maid, the angel, at least, shows that he is aware who she is, and also reminds her of what she had forgotten, that in bestowing her upon Abrām Sarai did not cease to be her mistress.

(9) Submit thyself.—Heb., humble thyself. It is the verb translated dealt hardly in verse 6. The angel therefore commands her to take the position which Sarai was forcing upon her; and by so doing proves to us that there had been no personal maltreatment. Commentators have taken this notion, not from the Hebrew, but from the English Version.

(10) I will multiply thy seed.—We have here the purpose of the Divine manifestation. Abrām's son must not be mixed up with and lost among the debased population of Egypt, but must be the father of a free people; and Hagar will now submit to her lot as a slave, that she may secure liberty for her offspring.

(11) Ishmael.—That is, God heareth. Like Samuel, Ishmael received his name from the events of his mother's life, and not from anything in his own. There was, however, no rule in this matter, and the naming of children in the Book of Genesis is very diversified.

(12) He will be a wild man.—Heb., he will be a wild-ass man. The wild ass of the Arabian deserts is a very noble creature, and is one of the animals selected in the Book of Job as especially exemplifying the greatness of God (Job xxxix. 5—8). Its characteristics are great speed, love of solitude, and an untamable fondness of liberty. It is thus the very type of the Bedaween Arabs, whose delight it is to rove at will over the desert, and who despise the ease and luxury of a settled life.

His hand will be against every man ...—The Bedawi can be bound by no treaties, submit to no law, and count plunder as legitimate gain. Nevertheless—
(2) And I will make my covenant between me and thee, and will multiply thee exceedingly. (3) And Abram fell on his face: and God talked with him, saying, (4) As for me, behold, my covenant is with thee, and thou shalt be a father of many nations. (5) Neither shall thy name any more be called Abram, but thy name shall be Abraham; a father of many nations. (6) And I will make thee exceeding fruitful, and I will make nations of thee, and kings shall come out of thee. (7) And I will establish my covenant between me and thee and thy seed after thee in their generations. (8) This is my covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee. (9) And I will give unto thee, and to thy seed after thee, the land wherein thou art a stranger, all the land of Canaan, for an everlasting possession; and I will be their God.

(9) And God said unto Abraham, Thou shalt keep my covenant therefore, thou, and thy seed after thee; every man child among you shall be circumcised. (10) And ye shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin; and it shall be a token of the everlasting covenant, to be a God unto thee, and to thy seed after thee.
Covenant betwixt me and you. (12) And he that is eight days old shall be circumcised among you, every man child in your generations, he that is born in the house, or bought with money of any stranger, which is not of thy seed. (13) He that is born in thy house, and he that is bought with thy money, must needs be circumcised: and my covenant shall be in your flesh for an everlasting covenant. (14) And the uncircumcised man child whose flesh of his foreskin is not circumcised, that soul shall be cut off from his people; he hath broken my covenant.

1 Heb. a son of eight days.
2 Heb. she shall become nations.

And God said unto Abraham, As for Sarai thy wife, thou shalt not call her name Sarai, but Sarah shall her name be. (15) And I will bless her, and give thee a son also of her: yea, I will bless her, and she shall be a mother of nations; kings of people shall be of her. (16) Then Abraham fell upon his face, and laughed, and said in his heart, Shall a child be born unto him that is an hundred years old? and shall Sarah, except at the door of the tabernacle (Ibid., xvii. 4), and the eating of blood (Ibid., 9, 14), are to be thus dealt with, while blasphemy and murder are to be punished with death (Ibid., xxiv. 16, 17). Now it became very common to kill clean beasts in all parts of the land, and the eating of blood, though regarded with horror (1 Sam. xiv. 32—34), apparently had no penalty attached to it. The Jewish commentators seem to err only in being too special, and in defining the method in which God would punish. The punishment really seems to have been that of excommunication or outlawry, to which other penalties might have been attached by custom: but the main point was that one uncircumcised (as subsequently one who violated the principles of the Mosaic law) forfeited his privileges as a member of the Jewish nation, could claim no protection from the elders for life and property, and could not take his place at the gate of the city.

Sarai.—Probably properly, an adjective of the same form as shaddai, verse 1; while Sarah means princess. The change of name shows that she was admitted to the covenant. (Comp. verse 10.)

A son of her. —This is the first place where it was definitely promised that Abram’s heir should be Sarah’s own son. This must be remembered in estimating the conduct of Abram and Sarah in the matter of Hagar. They had long waited, and hoped, before taking measures of their own for the fulfilment of the promise. The rest of the verse should be translated, “she shall become (grow into) nations: kings of peoples shall become of her, that is, “shall spring from her.”

Abraham laughed. —The Jewish interpreters regard Abraham’s laugh as one of joy, and Sarah’s (chap. xviii. 12) as one of unbelief. We may, however, well doubt whether there really was this difference between them; but our Lord confirms the view that joy was uppermost in Abraham’s heart (John viii. 56). Still with belief there was surprise, and the feeling that what was promised was so strange as to be well-nigh incredible. One who was ready to sacrifice his only son at God’s word (Heb. xi. 19) would not be staggered by this strangeness, and yet the thought of Sarah’s bearing a child at the age of ninety might easily present itself to his mind in a ludicrous aspect. As for Sarah, there is no proof that at the time she laughed she knew or even suspected that the three travellers were more than men. She overheard their conversation, and laughed, imagining perhaps that they did not know how old she was. Really, the idea brought out by the duplicity laughter is that Isaac’s birth was contrary to nature.
that is ninety years old, bear 2 Israel. And Abraham said unto God, O that Ishmael might live before thee! (19) And God said, "Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son indeed; and thou shalt call his name Isaac, and I will establish my covenant with him for an everlasting covenant, and with his seed after him. (20) And as for Ishmael, I have heard thee: Behold, I have blessed him, and will make him fruitful, and will multiply him exceedingly; 5 twelve princes shall he beget, and I will make him a great nation. (21) But my covenant will I establish with Isaac, which Sarah shall bear unto thee at this set time in the next year. (22) And he left off talking with him, and God went up from Abraham.

(23) And Abraham took Ishmael his son, and all that were born in his house, and all that were bought with his money, every male among the men of Abraham's house; and circumcised the flesh of their foreskin in the selfsame day, as God had said unto him. (24) And Abraham was ninety years old and nine, when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin. (25) And Ishmael his son was thirteen years old, when he was circumcised in the flesh of his foreskin. (26) In the selfsame day was Abraham circumcised, and Ishmael his son. (27) And all the men of his house, born in the house, and bought with money of the stranger, were circumcised with him.

CHAPTER XVIII. — (1) And the Lord appeared unto him in the plains of Mamre; and he sat in the tent door in the heat of the day; (2) and he lifted up his eyes and looked, and, lo, three men stood by him: and when he saw them, he ran to meet them from the tent door, and bowed himself toward the ground, (3) and said, My Lord, if now I have found favour in thy sight, pass

O that Ishmael . . . — For thirty years Ishmael had been the "son of the house" (chap. xv. 3), and regarded probably as the true heir. Mingled then with Abraham's joy there was also the pain, natural to a father, of knowing that this transference of the promise to Sarah's child meant the deposition and disappointment of one who for so long had held the post of honour. Stoicism would have repressed this upright and natural feeling, but God hears and accepts the father's prayers; and while the birthright and religious pre-eminence is justly given to the son of the freewoman, there is a large earthly blessing for the handmaid's son.

Indeed. — In the Hebrew this word comes first, and is intended to remove all doubt or desire for any other turn of affairs. It should be rendered, "And God said, For a certainty Sarah thy wife shall bear thee a son."

Thou shalt call his name Isaac. — That is, he laughs. The name was to be a perpetual memorial that Isaac's birth was naturally such an impossibility as to excite ridicule.

Ishmael . . . was thirteen years old. — Hence the Mohammedans defer circumcision to the thirteenth year.

In the selfsame day. — Heb., In the bone of this day, and so in verse 23 (see chap. ii. 23). In the circumcision of the household together with Abraham and his son we see that no impassable interval separated the Hebrew slave from his master, but that he was to share all the national and religious privileges of the freeman.

XVIII.

Visit of Angels to Abraham at Mamre; and Overthrow of Sodom.

(1) And the Lord (Jehovah) appeared unto him. — No new section could begin in this way, but evidently this is a continuation of the narrative of the circumcision. We thus find a Jehovah section coupled in the closest way with one which is Elohistic (comp. chap.

xvii. 22, 23); and even here it is Elohist who for Abraham's sake delivers Lot (chap. xix. 29). Far more important, however, is it to notice that this familiar intercourse, and clear revelation of Jehovah to Abraham, follows upon his closer relation to God by virtue of the sacrament of circumcision. Jewish tradition adds that this visit was made to Abraham on the third day after the rite had been performed, and was for the purpose of healing him from the painful consequences of it. It was on this account, as they think, that Abraham was resting at home, instead of being with his herds in the field.

The plains (Heb., the oaks) of Mamre. — (See chaps. xii. 18, xiv. 13.)

The tent door. — Heb., the opening of the tent, formed by looping back one of the curtains.

The heat of the day. — The time of noon, when Orientals rest from labour (comp. chap. iii. 5). As the air in the tent would be sultry, Abraham sits in the shade on the outside. So in verse 8 the meal is spread under a tree.

Three men. — Jewish commentators explain the number by saying that, as no angel might execute more than one commission at a time, one of the three came to heal Abraham, the second to bear the message to Sarah, and the third to destroy Sodom. More correctly, one was "the angel of Jehovah," who came as the manifestation of Deity to Abraham, and the other two were his companions, commissioned by him afterwards to execute judgment on the cities of the plain. The number three pointed also to the Trinity of Persons in the Godhead, and is therefore read by our Church as one of the lessons for Trinity Sunday. But we must be careful not to use it as a proof of this doctrine, lest the inference should be drawn of a personal appearance of the Father and of the Holy Ghost, which would savour of heretical impurity.

My lord. — Heb., 'donai, a term of simple respect, just as the bowing towards the earth is exactly what an not away, I pray thee, from thy servant: (1) let a little water, I pray you, be fetched, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree: (2) and I will fetch a morsel of bread, and (3) comfort ye your hearts; after that ye shall pass on: for therefore (4) are ye come to your servant. And they said, So do, as thou hast said.

(6) And Abraham hastened into the tent unto Sarah, and said, (5) Make ready quickly three measures of fine meal, knead it, and make cakes upon the hearth. (7) And Abraham ran unto the herd, and fetched a calf tender and good, and gave it unto a young man; and he hasted to dress it. (8) And he took butter, and milk, and the calf which he had dressed, and set it before them; and he stood by them under the tree, and they did eat.

(9) And they said unto him, Where is Sarah thy wife? And he said, Behold, in the tent. (10) And he said, I will certainly return unto thee according to the time of life; and, lo, (6) Sarah thy wife shall have Arab sheik would do now to a passing travelled. Abraham's conduct is marked by all that stately courtesy usual among Orientals. He calls himself their slave; regards it as a favour that they should partake of his hospitality; speaks slightly of the repast prepared as a mere morsel of bread; and treats it as a providential act that they had come into his neighbourhood. It was only afterwards that he knew that he was entertaining angels unawares (Heb. xiii. 2). While, moreover, he addresses the chief traveller first, as courtesy required, he immediately afterwards changes to the plural, lest he should seem wanting in hospitable welcome to his companions.

(1) Wash your feet.—This is the first necessity of Oriental hospitality (Judges xix. 21), not merely because the feet, protected only by sandals, are soiled by the dirt of the roads, but because it cools the whole body, and allays the feverishness caused by the heat of travelling. Thus refreshed they are "to rest," Heb., to lay themselves down, in the shade.

(5) Comfort ye your hearts.—Heb., strengthen ye, the original meaning of comfort, a word formed from the Latin fortis = strong, brave. The heart in Hebrew is the sum total of all the powers, mental and bodily, of the whole man.

After that ye shall pass on.—Coming at noon, the travellers after rest and refreshment would continue their journey. It is quite plain that Abraham still regarded them as passing wayfarers.

Therefore . . . —Abraham thus suggests that his tent was pitched near to the route on purpose that he might exercise that hospitality which was and continues to be the sacred duty of an Arab sheik.

(9) Three measures.—Heb. three seels, the seel being a little more than a peck. It is still usual on the arrival of a stranger to make this hasty preparation for his entertainment, the ordinary meal even of a wealthy sheik consisting of flour and some camels' milk boiled together. Cakes such as those here described, baked amid the embers on the hot hearth-stone, are considered a delicacy (1 Kings xix. 6). Flesh is seldom eaten: but if a traveller arrives, sweet milk and rice are added to the meal, and if he be a person of distinction a lamb or kid is killed. Abraham's calf, "tender and good," shows that he regarded his visitors as persons of more than ordinary high rank; and the quantity of food cooked seems to show that the three travellers had numerous attendants. The calf would be cut into small portions, and a meal like this, we are told, got ready in a very short time.

(12) Sarah laughed.—See Note on chap. xvii. 17. The laughter of both husband and wife brings into prominence the inconceivable character of the fact. Sarah's conduct has been very unjustly condemned. Though Abraham may have begun to guess that his visitors were more than men, she probably had no such suspicions. Sitting inside the tent, and catching their words only occasionally, listening perhaps, now only because she heard her own name mentioned, when she hears them talk of her having a child she naturally laughs, thinking possibly that they did not know how old she was.

After I am waxed old.—The Hebrew word is stronger and more lively. It means "to be worn out like an old garment."

(14) Is anything too hard for the Lord?—Hcb., Is anything too wonderful for Jehovah? At last it is made evident that the travellers are messengers from God; but, until this declaration, there could have been, at most, only a dim feeling that the visitation was more than human. Though the angel does not claim for himself divinity, yet the narrator prefixes to his words, And Jehovah said. In some inelegant way there was an identity between Jehovah and the angel.

(15) Sarah denied.—With strange inconsistency Sarah knows that the speaker is Divine, and that He perceived the thoughts that passed "within herself" in the retirement of the tent, and yet denied; but it was the inconsistency of fright. Struck with terror at the thought that she had ridiculed the promise of Jehovah, she offers no excuse, but takes refuge, as frightened people are apt to do, in falsehood. Gently reproved, the result was the building-up of her faith, just as Mary’s doubt was removed and her faith perfected by the angel’s words (St. Luke i. 34—37).

(16) The men looked toward Sodom.—This visitation of God combined mercy and love for Abraham, and through him for all mankind, with the punishment of men whose wickedness was so universal that there were none left among them to bear witness for God, and labour for a better state of things. There is a strange mingling of the human and the Divine in the narrative. Even after the fuller manifestation of themselves they are still called men, and Abraham continues to discharge the ordinary duties of hospitality by accompanying them as their guide. Their route would lie to the south-east, over the hill-country of Judah, and tradition represents Abraham as having gone with them as far as the village of Caphar-Baraucha, whence it is possible through a deep ravine to see the Dead Sea.

I hide from Abraham that thing which I do; (18) seeing that Abraham shall surely become a great and mighty nation, and all the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him? (19) For I know him, that he will command his children and his household after him, and they shall keep the way of the Lord, to do justice and judgment; that the Lord may bring upon Abraham that which he hath spoken of him.

(20) And the Lord said, Because the cry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very grievous; (21) I will go down now, and see whether they have done altogether according to the cry of it, which is come unto me; and if not, I will know. (22) And the men turned their faces from thence, and went toward Sodom: but Abraham stood yet before the Lord.

(19) For I know him, that he will.—This translation has most of the Versions in its favour, and means that Abraham’s good conduct earns for him the Divine condescension. But the Hebrew is, For I have known him in order that he may command his sons, &c. It gives God foreknowledge of the purpose for which He had called Abraham as the reason for thus revealing to him the method of the Divine justice. And this purpose was, that from Abraham should spring a nation whose institutions were to be fraught with Divine truth, whose prophets were to be the means of revealing God’s will to man, and of whom, as concerning the flesh, the Messiah should come. What more fitting than that one appointed to fill so noble a calling should also be raised to the rank of a prophet, and be permitted to share in the Divine counsels? This rendering closely agrees with what is said in verse 18 about Abraham growing into a mighty nation; and it was the unique and high purpose for which this nation was to be called into being which brought Abraham into so close a relation to Jehovah.

(21) I will go down.—God examines before He punishes (see Note on chap. xi. 5) with the same care and personal inspection as the most conscientious earthly judge.

Altogether.—Some take this word, not as an adverb, but as a noun (comp. Is. x. 23), and translate "I will see whether they have done according to the cry of it; (in which case there shall be for them) utter destruction." But the ellipse is harsh; and inquiry, the knowing and not the punishing, is the prominent thought in the words of Jehovah. Hence too the last clause, "I will know." The two angels go to Sodom to give the people a final trial. If they meet with upright treatment, then God will know that there are limits to the wickedness of its inhabitants, and it will be spared.

(22) Abraham stood yet before the Lord (before Jehovah).—The two angels went on their way in form as men, towards Sodom, but the one who was a manifestation of Jehovah (verses 13, 17) remained behind.
Abraham drew near, and said, Wilt thou also destroy the righteous with the wicked? (24) Peradventure there be fifty righteous within the city: wilt thou also destroy and not spare the place for the fifty righteous that are therein? (25) That be far from thee to do after this manner, to slay the righteous with the wicked: and that the righteous should be as the wicked, that be far from thee: Shall not the Judge of all the earth do right? (25) And the Lord said, If I find in Sodom fifty righteous within the city, then will I spare all the place for their sakes. (27) And Abraham answered and said, Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord, which am but dust and ashes: (28) Peradventure there shall lack five of the fifty righteous: wilt thou destroy all the city for lack of five? And he said, If I find there forty and five, I will not destroy it. (29) And he spake unto him yet again, and said, Peradventure there shall be forty found there. And he said, I will not do it for forty's sake. (30) And he said unto him, Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak: Peradventure there shall thirty be found there. And he said, I will not do it, if I find thirty there. (31) And he said, Behold now, I have taken upon me to speak unto the Lord: Peradventure there shall be twenty found there. And he said, I will not destroy it for twenty's sake. (32) And he said, Oh let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak yet but this once: Peradventure ten shall be found there. And he said I will not destroy it for ten's sake.

And the Lord went his way, as soon as he had left communing with Abraham: and Abraham returned unto his place.

CHAPTER XIX.—(1) And there came two angels to Sodom at even; and Lot sat in the gate of Sodom: and Lot seeing them rose up to meet them; and he bowed himself with his face toward the ground; (2) and he said, Behold now, my lords, turn in, I pray you, into your servant's house, and tarry all night, and wash your feet, and ye shall rise up early, and go on your ways. And they said, Nay; but we will abide in the street all night. (3) And he pressed them upon them greatly; and they turned in Jehovah's dominion, and that there was mercy for it as well as for the covenant people. Such, in future times, was also the lesson of the Book of Jonah.

XIX.

(1) And there came two angels.—Heb., And the two angels came. It is a continuation of the preceding narrative, and takes up the history from chap. xviii. 22.

Lot sat in the gate of Sodom.—He had therefore become a citizen of Sodom, probably after the deliverance from the Elamite invasion, when, as a relative of Abraham, he would be treated with great honour. This personal respect had made him close his eyes to the sinfulness of the people, and he had consented to live inside the town, and even to let its citizens marry his daughters. Meanwhile all intercourse between him and Abraham apparently had ceased, and he had lost all share in the covenant of circumcision.

(2) In the street.—That is, the broad open space of the city. (Comp. Judges xix. 15, 20.) In a warm climate there is little hardship in passing the night in the open air; and as at this early date there were no caravanserais, travellers had to lodge in this way unless they found some hospitable entertainer.

(3) He pressed upon them greatly.—This he did as knowing the licentiousness of the people; but the angels do not readily accept his hospitality, as they had done that of Abraham, because his character had deteriorated.

Unleavened bread.—Heb., This cake, like those now eaten by the Jews at the Passover. They took little time in preparation, for which reason we find them also used by the witch of Endor (1 Sam. xxviii. 24).
unto him, and entered into his house; and he made them a feast, and did bake unleavened bread, and they did eat.

(4) But before they lay down, the men of the city, even the men of Sodom, compassed the house round, both old and young, all the people from every quarter: and they called unto Lot, and said unto him, Where are the men which came in to thee this night? bring them out unto us, that we may know them. And Lot went out at the door unto them, and shut the door after him, and said, I pray you, brethren, do not so wickedly. Behold now, I have two daughters which have not known man; let me, I pray you, bring them out unto you, and do ye to them as is good in your eyes: only unto these men do nothing; for therefore came they under the shadow of my roof. And they said, Stand back. And they said again, This one fellow came in to sojourn, and he will needs be a judge: now will we deal worse with thee, than with them. And they pressed sore upon the man, even Lot, and came near to break the door. And Lot put forth his hand, and pulled Lot into the house to them, and shut to the door. And they smote the men that were at the door of the house with blindness, both small and great: so that they were wearied themselves to find the door.

(12) And the men said unto Lot, Hast thou here any besides? son in law, and thy sons, and thy daughters, and whatsoever hast in the city, bring them out of this place: (13) For we will destroy this place, because the cry of them is waxen great before the face of the Lord; and the Lord hath sent us to destroy it. And Lot went out, and spake unto his sons in law, which married his daughters, and said, Up, get you out of this place: for the Lord will destroy rights of citizenship were most jealously guarded, and the position of a sojourner made very bitter.

He will needs be a judge.—Heb. is ever acting as a judge. This suggests that Lot had previously reproved the men of Sodom, and agrees with 2 Pet. ii. 8.

(11) Blindness.—This word occurs elsewhere only in 2 Kings vi. 18, and in both cases it is plain that actual blindness is not meant. Had the men here been struck with blindness they would not have wearied themselves with trying to find the door, but would either have gone away in terror at the visitation, or, if too hardened for that, would have groped about till they found it. So, if the Syrian army had been made actually blind, they would have surrendered themselves; nor would it have been practicable to guide an army of blind men on so long a march as that from Dothan to Samaria. In both cases the men were under the impression that anything had happened to them. The people of Sodom thought they saw the door; the Syrians supposed that the locality was one well known to them, and only when the confusion was removed did they become conscious that they were at Samaria. The word means a disturbance of vision caused by the eye not being in its proper connection with the brain. And so the men of Sodom ever seemed just upon the point of reaching the door, and pressed on, and strove and quarrelled, but always failed, they knew not how, but as they always supposed by one another's fault. It is a strange picture of men given over to unbelief and sin, and who seeing see not, because they reject the true light.

(14) Which married his daughters.—Heb., the brakings of his daughters—a present participle, for which reason Ewald, Tuch, and others translate "who were to marry his daughters." The traditional view is that given in our Version, and is confirmed by verse 15, where the words—"thy two daughters which are here," Heb., which are found—certainly suggest the idea that Lot had other daughters, besides the two which escaped with him.
GENESIS, XIX.

Destruction of Sodom.

As one that mocked.—Heb., as one that was laughing, or joking, and so not in earnest.

(15) When the morning arose.—Lot had thus the night for making his preparations, but part of this he spent in his visits to his sons-in-law.

Consumed.—Heb., swept away; and so in verse 17. See chap. xviii. 23, 24, where it is rendered “destroy.”

(16) And while he lingered.—Heb., and he lingered. Lot still clung to his wealth, and could not make up his mind to leave it, and so at length the angels took him by the hand and compelled him to quit the doomed city.

The Lord being merciful unto him.—Heb., in Jehovah’s pity for him. (Comp. Isa. lix. 9.)

Abroad.—Heb., outside—that is, of the city.

Look not behind thee.—This was not merely to prevent delay, but also showed that God demanded of them a total abandonment in heart and will of the condemned cities, and hence the severity with which the violation of the command was visited.

Plain.—The Ciecar or circle of Jordan. So also in verses 25, 28, 29; see Note on chap. xiii. 10.

Lest some evil.—Heb., lest the evil, lest the threatened calamity overtake me and I die.

I have accepted thee.—Heb., I have lifted up thy face. (See Note on chap. iv. 6, 7.)

Zoar.—This town is identified by Dr. Tristram (vol. iv. p. 338) with Zizara, at the northern end of the Dead Sea. It is described as lying upon the borders of the Moabite territory, in Isa. xv. 5; Jer. xlviii. 34. Eusebius says that a Roman garrison was posted there, but he probably accepted the current tradition which placed the five cities at the southern extremity of the lake.

The sun was risen.—As Lot started at dawn, he had thus had about an hour for his flight.

The Lord (Jehovah) rained . . . from the Lord (from Jehovah).—Many commentators, following the Council of Sirmium, see in this repetition of the name of Jehovah an indication of the Holy Trinity, as though God the Son rained down fire from God the Father. More correctly Calvin takes it as an emphatic reiteration of Its being Jehovah’s act. Jehovah had mysteriously manifested Himself upon earth by the visit of the three angels to Abraham, but His activity on earth is one with His willing in heaven.

Brimstone and fire.—Though God used natural agencies in the destruction of the Ciecar cities, yet what was in itself a catastrophe of nature became miraculous by the circumstances which surrounded it. It was thus made the means not merely of executing the Divine justice, of strengthening Abraham’s faith, and of warning Lot, but also of giving moral and religious instruction throughout all time. Seen by its light, events of history, for which sufficient secondary causes may be discovered, are nevertheless shown to be direct manifestations of the Divine justice, and to have moral causes as their real basis. We lose the benefit of the teaching of the Bible if we suppose that the events recorded there were different in kind from those which take place now. A certain limited number of events were so; but of most it is simply the curtain that is drawn back, and we see God’s presence no longer veiled, as with us, but openly revealed. As for the catastrophic itself, it was not a mere thunderstorm which set the earth, saturated with naphtha, on fire; but, in a region where earthquakes are still common, there was apparently an outburst of volcanic violence, casting forth blazing bitumen and brimstone. This falling down upon the houses, and upon the soil charged with combustible matter, caused a conflagration so sudden and widespread that few or none could escape. Sulphur and nitre are still found as natural products on the shores of the Dead Sea.

Overthrew.—This does not mean undermined, and the agent in the destruction was fire and not water.

Ove—The plain (Heb., the Ciecar) still existed, and when Abraham saw it, it was wrapped in smoke.

(24) His wife looked back from behind him.—In Oriental countries it is still the rule for the wife to from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt.

(27) And Abraham got up early in the morning to the place where he stood before the Lord: (28) and he looked toward Sodom and Gomorrah, and toward all the land of the plain, and beheld, and, lo, the smoke of the country went up as the smoke of a furnace.

(29) And it came to pass, when God destroyed the cities of the plain, that God remembered Abraham, and sent Lot out of the midst of the overthrow, when he overthrew the cities in which Lot dwelt. (30) And Lot went up out of Zoar, and dwelt in the mountain, and his two daughters with him; for he feared to dwell in Zoar: and he dwelt in a cave, he and his two daughters. (31) And the firstborn said unto the younger, Our father is old, and there is not a man in the earth to come in unto us after the manner of all the earth: (32) come, let us make our father drink wine, and we will lie with him, that we may preserve seed of our father. (33) And they made their father drink wine that night; and the firstborn went in, and lay with her father; and he perceived not when she lay down, nor when she arose. (34) And it came to pass on the morrow, that the firstborn said unto the younger, Behold, I lay yesternight with my father: let us make him drink wine this night also; and go thou in, and lie with him, that we may preserve seed of our father. (35) And they made their father drink wine that night also; and the younger arose, and lay with him; and he perceived not when she lay down, nor when she arose. (36) Thus were both the daughters of Lot with child by their father. (37) And the firstborn bare a son, and called his name Moab; the same is the father of the Moabites unto this day. (38) And the younger, she also bare a son, and called his name Ben-ammi: the same is the father of the children of Ammon unto this day.

walk behind her husband. As regards the method of her transformation, some think that she was stifled by sulphureous vapours, and her body subsequently encrusted with salt. More probably, the earthquake heaped up a mighty mass of the rock-salt, which lies in solid strata round the Dead Sea, and Lot’s wife was entangled in the convulsion and perished, leaving the hill of salt, in which she was encased, as her memorial. Salt cones are not uncommon in this neighbourhood, and the American Expedition found one, about forty feet high, near Usdum (Lynch, Report, pp. 183 et seq.). Entombed in this salt pillar, she became a “monument of an unbelieving soul” (Wisdom x. 7).

(28) Abraham got up early in the morning. This was necessary, because he had to walk some miles before he reached “the place where he stood before Jehovah” on the previous evening; and probably the mighty forces which overthrew the cities had been some hours at work when he reached the head of the ravine through which the terrible scene became visible. Naturally his anxiety to know the result of his intercession, and the fate of his brother’s son, would urge him to be on foot at the early dawn.

(29) Lo, the smoke of the country (really, land) went up as the smoke of a furnace. — The substitution of the word country for land is confusing. It was the land of the Ciecar, just mentioned, which was in flame. As Abraham could see the Ciecar, it must have been at the northern end of the Dead Sea (see Note on chap. xviii. 16); and as a violent conflagration was raging throughout it, the site of the cities could not have been submerged (see Note on chap. xiv. 3). The violence of the fire is indicated by the last word, which is not the ordinary word for a furnace, but means a kiln, such as that used for burning chalk into lime, or for melting ores of metal.

(30) He feared to dwell in Zoar. — Though this little place had been granted him for an asylum, yet, terrified at the sight of the smoking valley, and remembering that he had been originally commanded to go to the mountains, he summons up his courage and proceeds thither. The limestone regions of Palestine are full of caverns; and the patriarch, whose wealth had been so great that he and Abraham could not dwell together, is now content to seek in one of these caverns a miserable home.

(31) The firstborn said unto the Younger. — Several modern commentators see in this recital a mark of Jewish hatred towards the Moabites and Ammonites, and an attempt to brand their origin with shame. Really we find in Deut. iv. 9—19, no trace of the existence of this hostility, but, on the contrary, the relationship of these two nations to Israel is used as a ground for kindly feelings; and in the story of Ruth the Moabitess, and the friendship which existed between the king of Moab and David, we have proof that such feelings existed.

(32) That we may preserve seed of our father. — This was a very strong feeling in ancient times, and affords the sole excuse for the revolting conduct of these women. The utter degradation of Lot and his family is the most painful part of his story, which thus ends in his intense shame.

(35) Moab. . . Ben-ammi. — Both these names suggest an incestuous origin, but the latter in a less repulsive way. “Son of my people” means one born of intercourse with her own kin and family. It is a striking proof of the vigour of the race of Terah, that from this lone cavern, and after the loss of all the wealth possessed by Lot, these two children were able to reduce to obedience the aborigines dwelling on the eastern shore of the Dead Sea, and establish petty kingdoms there. Both Moabites and Ammonites have finally merged in the Arabs.
CHAPTER XX.—(1) And Abraham journeyed from thence toward the south country, and dwelled between Kadesh and Shur, and sojourned in Gerar.

(2) And Abraham said of Sarah his wife, She is my sister: and Abimelech king of Gerar sent, and took Sarah.

(3) But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night, and said to him, Behold, thou art but a dead man, for the woman which thou hast taken; for she is my sister. (4) But Abimelech had not come near her: and he said, Lord, wilt thou slay also a righteous nation?

(5) Said he not unto me, She is my sister? and she, even she herself said, He is my brother: in the integrity of my heart and innocency of my hands have I done this. (6) And God said unto him in a dream, Yea, I know that thou didst this in the integrity of thy heart; for I also withheld thee from Abraham's Denial of His Wife at Gerar.

(1) Abraham journeyed from thence.—That is, from Mamre, where he had so long halted, and which seems to have continued to be one of his homes. As he had been commanded to traverse the whole land (chap. xiii. 17, 18), we need seek no reasons for his removal. It was the rule of his life to move from place to place, both on account of his cattle, and also because by so doing he was taking possession of the country. There were, nevertheless, certain places which were his head-quarters, such as Bethel, Mamre, and Beer-sheba.

The south country.—It is a proper name, the Negeb; see Note on chap. xii. 9. For Kadesh, see chap. xvi. 14; for Shur, ibid. 7; and for Gerar, chap. x. 19.

(2) She is my sister.—Twenty years before, Abraham had acted in the same way in Egypt, and Pharaoh had rebuked him, but sent him away with large presents. We learn from this chapter, verse 13, that the false representation which twice brought them into trouble was habitual with the two; nor does Abraham ever seem conscious that he was acting in it wrongfully. To us it seems cowardly, in one who had so many men trained to battle, thus to expose his wife to danger; and to have recourse to deceit, at the very time when such abundant revelations were being made to him, also shows an apparent want of faith in God. But Holy Scripture neither represents its heroes as perfect, nor does it raise them disproportionately above the level of their own times. Its distinguishing feature rather is that it ever insists upon a perpetual progress upwards, and urges men onward to be better and holier than those that went before. Abraham was not on the same high spiritual level as a Christian ought to be who has the perfect example of Christ as his pattern, and the gift of the Holy Ghost for his aid; and the fact that God rescued him and Sarah from all danger in Egypt may have seemed to him a warrant that in future difficulties he would have the same Divine protection. Human conduct is ever strangely chequered, but we have a wholesome lesson in the fact, that it was Abraham's politic device which twice entangled him in actual danger.

Abimelech (called in chap. xxvi. 1, king of the Philistines, where see Note) . . . took Sarah.—She was now ninety years of age, and naturally her beauty must have faded. Some, however, think that with the promise of a son her youth had been renewed, while others suppose that the purpose uppermost in the mind of Abimelech was political, and that what he really desired was an alliance with the powerful sheik who had entered his territories.

(3) God (Elohim) came . . .—From the use of this title of the Deity it has been said that this narrative is an Elohist form of the Jehovistic narrative in chap. xii. 10—20. But we have seen that even in the History of the Fall, where the writer in so remarkable a manner styles the Deity Jehovah-Elohim, he nevertheless restricts Eve and the serpent in their conversation to the name Elohim. With the same care in the application of the names, it is necessarily, Elohim who appears to a heathen king; and had the title Jehovah been used it would have been a violation of the narrator's rule. Moreover, the sole reason for calling that narrative Jehovistic is that in chap. xii. If it is Jehovah who plagues Pharaoh for Sarah's sake. But equally here, verse 18, it is Jehovah who protects Sarah from Abimelech; in both cases it being the covenant-God, who saves his people from injury.

Thou art but a dead man.—Hcb., thou diest, or art dying. Abimelech was already suffering from the malady spoken of in verse 17, when Elohim appeared to him and warned him that death would be the result of perseverance in retaining Sarah. It was this malady which was the cause of the abstention spoken of in verses 4 and 6.

(4) A righteous nation.—Knobel has pointed out that there is an allusion here to the fate of Sodom. Though the malady was confined to Abimelech and his household, yet he sees destruction threatening his whole people, who, with the inhabitants of the cities, were righteous. There is indirect proof of the truth of Abimelech's assertion in the fact that death (see verse 3) is acquiesced in as the fitting punishment for adultery.

(5) In the integrity of my heart . . .—Not only does Abimelech assert this, but Elohim (see verse 6) admits the plea. And yet this Philistine king indulges in polygamy, and claims the right of taking the female relatives of any one passing through his territory to add them to his harem. But the words mean no more than that he was not consciously violating any of his own rules of morality, and thus illustrate the Gospel principle that men will be punished not by an absolute decree, but equitably, according to their knowledge (Luke xii. 47, 48). Abimelech was doing wrong, and was suffering punishment, but the punishment was remedial, and for his advancement in right-knowing and right-doing. It is thus by means of revelation that men have attained to a proper understanding of the moral law. Though often called "the law of Nature," yet Nature does not give it, but only acknowledges it when given. The inner light is but a faint and inconstant glimmering, but Christ is the true light; for only by Him does the law of Nature become a clear rule for human guidance (John i. 9; Rom. ii. 14, 15; Matt. vi. 23).
sinning against me: therefore suffered I thee not to touch her. (7) Now therefore restore the man his wife; for he is a prophet, and he shall pray for thee, and thou shalt live: and if thou restore her not, know thou that thou shalt surely die, thou, and all that are thine.

(8) Therefore Abimelech rose early in the morning, and called all his servants, and told all, these things in their ears: and the men were sore afraid. (9) Then Abimelech called Abraham, and said unto him, What hast thou done unto us? and what have I offended thee, that thou hast brought on me and on my kingdom a great sin? thou hast done deeds unto me that ought not to be done. (10) And Abimelech said unto Abraham, What sawest thou, that thou hast done this thing? (11) And Abraham said, Because I thought, Surely the fear of God is not in this place; and they will slay me for my wife's sake. (12) And yet indeed she is my sister; she is the daughter of my father, but not the daughter of my mother; and she became my wife. (13) And it came to pass, when God caused me to wander from my father's house, that I said unto her, This is thy kindness which thou shalt show unto me; at every place whither we shall come, 'say of me, He is my brother.' (14) And Abimelech took sheep, and Abimelech Reproves Sarah.

CHAPTER XXI.—(1) And the Lord visited Sarah as he had said, and the Lord did unto Sarah 1 as he had spoken. (2) For Sarah 2 conceived, and bare Abraham a son in his old age, at the set time of which God had spoken to him. (3) And Abraham called the name of his son that was born unto him, whom Sarah bare to him, Isaac. (4) And Abraham circumcised his son Isaac being eight days old, 3 as God had commanded him. (5) And Abraham was an hundred years old, when his son Isaac was born unto him. (6) And Sarah said, God hath made me to laugh, so that all that hear will laugh with me. (7) And she said, Who would have said unto

BIRTH OF ISAAC, AND REJECTION OF ISHMAEL.

(1) And the Lord (Jehovah) visited Sarah as he had said.—See chap. xvi. 19, where it is Elohim who gives the promise. So here in verse 2 the name Elohim is interchanged with Jehovah.

(3) Abraham called the name of his son.—Attention has been called to the fact that we have here two things contrary to subsequent usage: for, first, the father names the child, and not the mother; and, secondly, he names him at his birth, instead of waiting until his circumcision. It might be enough to answer that the child was really named by God (chap. xvii. 19), and that Abraham only acknowledges that the son born was the promised Isaac; but really, as we have seen before, there was as yet no settled rule as to either of these points.

Isaac.—This name not only recorded the fact of the laughter of the father (chap. xvii. 17) and of the mother (chap. xviii. 12), but was a standing memorial that Isaac’s birth was contrary to nature, and one of which the promise was provocative of ridicule in the sight even of his parents.

(6, 7) God hath made me to laugh.—Sarah’s laugh was one of mingled emotions. Joy was uppermost in her mind, but women do not laugh for joy at the birth of a child. Doubtless she called to mind the feelings with which she listened to the announcement of her bearing a son, a feeling which she then regarded as mere passing wayfarers (chap. xviii. 12), but whom she had now long known to be the messengers of God. And still the event seemed to her marvellous and astonishing, so that “all that hear,” she said, “will laugh with me”—Heb., for me, or over me—not “will ridicule me,” but will be merry at the thought of an old woman of ninety having a son. Deeper feelings would come afterwards, and the acknowledgment that that which was contrary to nature was wrought by Him whom nature must obey; but surprise is uppermost in the little poem in which Sarah gives utterance to her first feelings:—

Who would have said unto Abraham
Sarah suckleth sons?
For I have borne a son to his old age.
Abraham, that Sarah should have given children suck? for I have born him a son in his old age.

(9) And the child grew, and was weaned: and Abraham made a great feast the same day that Isaac was weaned. (9) And Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, which she had born unto Abraham, mocking.

(10) Wherefore she said unto Abraham, "Cast out this bondwoman and her son:
for the son of this bondwoman shall not be heir with my son, even with Isaac.

(11) And the thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight because of his son.

(12) And God said unto Abraham, Let it not be grievous in thy sight because of the lad, and because of thy bondwoman;
in all that Sarah hath said unto thee, hearken unto her voice; for in Isaac shall thy seed be called. (13) And also of the son of the bondwoman will I make a nation, because he is thy seed.

(14) And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and took bread, and a bottle of water, and gave it unto Hagar, putting it on her shoulder, and the child, and sent her away: and she departed, and wandered in the wilderness of Beer-sheba. (15) And the water was spent in the bottle, and she cast the child under one of the shrubs. (16) And

(8) The child grew, and was weaned.—According to tradition, Isaac was two years old when weaned.
Three years is the age mentioned in 2 Chron. xxxi. 16, 2 Macc. vii. 27; and Samuel was old enough at his weaning to be left at the tabernacle with Eli (1 Sam. i.
24). In Persia and India it is still the custom to celebrate the weaning of a child by an entertainment.

(9) Mocking.—The verb used here is the same as that rendered to laugh in verse 6, but in an intensive conjugation. What exactly Ishmael was doing is not said, but we may dismiss all those interpretations which charge him with abominable wickedness, for had he been guilty of any such criminal conduct, the sending him away would not have been so " very grievous in Abraham's sight " (verse 11). On the other hand, we may feel sure that Sarah was not without good reason for her conduct; for St. Paul bears witness that Ishmael persecuted Isaac (Gal. iv. 29). The LXX. and Vulg. translate playing, sporting, and Gesenius thinks that he was "dancing gracefully; " but if this were all, Sarah's jealousy would have been most unjust. When, however, we consider that Ishmael had been for fourteen years the heir, and that he now fell back into an inferior position, we cannot be surprised if at this banquet in his rival's honour he gave way to spiteful feelings, and by word and gesture derided and ridiculed him.
Ishmael too had probably never regarded Sarah with much affection since her forced return, and now that her son was disinherited, her bitterness would grow more intense. These jealousies are the inevitable results of polygamy; and wherever it exists, the future life is wasted wretched by the intrigues of the women for their children.

(10) Bondwoman.—Heb., ammah. This word is rightly translated handmaid in Gal. iv. 22, &c., Revised Version. It is rendered maid in Gen. xxx. 3, and in the plural, maidservants, in chap. xxv. 17, where, as we have seen, it means Abimelech's inferior wives. So also in 1 Sam. xxv. 41, Abigail professes her willingness to descend from the position of an ammah to that of a maidservant in David's honour. The rendering "bond-woman" unduly depresses Hagar's condition, and with it that of the Jewish Church in the allegory contained in Gal. iv. 24-31.

(11) The thing was very grievous in Abraham's sight.—Heb., the word (or matter) was even exceedingly in Abraham's eyes. It was not merely cuteful to him because of his natural affection for Ishmael (chap. xvii. 18), but he also thought the proposal unjust.

(12) In Isaac shall thy seed be called.—Heb., in Isaac there shall be called to thee a seed; that is, the seed that shall especially be accounted thine, and which, as such, shall inherit the promises, will be that sprung from Isaac.

(13) The son of the bondwoman.—Heb., of the handmaid. Hagar is never acknowledged as Abraham's wife, though her child, as Abraham's son, receives a noble promise for the father's sake.

(14) And the child.—Ishmael was now sixteen or seventeen years of age, but the word yeled used in this place has no reference to age, and in chap. iv. 23 is even translated " young man. " It literally signifies one born, and is applied in chap. xlii. 22 to Joseph, when he was about Ishmael's age. So the "children who mocked Elisha " (2 Kings ii. 23) were doubtless grown young men. In verse 18, Ishmael is called "a lad; " shortly afterwards he was able to maintain himself and Hagar with his bow (verse 20), and his mother took a wife for him from Egypt (verse 21). The narrative, therefore, does not represent Ishmael as a small child, and the idea has probably arisen from the supposition that Abraham placed Ishmael, as well as the supply of food, on Hagar's shoulder.

She departed, and wandered.—Her dismissal had come upon Hagar suddenly, and so she had no plan or purpose, but went hither and thither till the water in the skin was spent.

The wilderness of Beer-sheba.—As yet this region had no name (see verse 31). It lay about twenty Roman miles or more below Hebron, and was the most southerly part of Palestine, while beyond it lay the vast desert of Edom, of which the wilderness of Beer-sheba formed a part. Gerar, which place Abraham had now evidently left, was situated upon the western side of Beer-sheba, but at no great distance from it. (See chaps. xxi. 22, xxvi. 26.)

(15) She cast the child under one of the shrubs.—The act was one of despair. Ishmael, though seventeen years of age, had not yet come to his strength, and at a time when human life was so prolonged that forty was the usual age for marriage, was probably not as capable of bearing fatigue as a young man nearly grown up would be in our days. He thus became exhausted, and apparently fainted; and his mother, after trying in vain to support him, cast him down into an anguish, and abandoned herself to her grief.

(16) Let me not see the death of the child.—
The whole story is most touching. Day after day the she went, and sat her down over against him a good way off, as it were a bow-shot: for she said, Let me not see the death of the child. And she sat over against him, and lift up her voice, and wept. (17) And God heard the voice of the lad; and the angel of God called to Hagar out of heaven, and said unto her, What aileth thee, Hagar? fear not; for God hath heard the voice of the lad where he is. (18) Arise, lift up the lad, and hold him in thine hand; for I will make him a great nation. (19) And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water; and she went, and filled the bottle with water, and gave the lad drink. (20) And God was with the lad; and he grew, and dwelt in the wilderness, mother, with her child, had wandered in the wilderness, using the water in the skin sparingly, ever hoping to come to some spring, but with too little knowledge of the locality to guide her steps wisely. At last she was spent, and the young life withers first, and the mother knows that soon they both must die. They had made their last effort, and with that hopelessness which travellers have so often described as stealing over the lost wanderer in the desert, they yield themselves to their doom. The boy is entirely passive; but not so the mother. A softer nature would have remained with him to soothe him, but the agony of the wild Egyptian will grant her no rest. She casts his fainting body almost angrily under a shrub, and withdraws to a bow-shot distance, because she cannot bear to see him die. She there gives way not to tears only, but to unreserved outcries of grief. But it is not her loud lamentation, but the mute prayer of Ishmael that is heard, and an angel of God comes to her relief.

(20) He grew.—Literally, become great, that is, grew to manhood.

And dwelt in the wilderness.—He sought no refuge in Egypt, where so large a Semitic population was gathering, nor in any Canaanite town, but took to the wandering life in the desert, such as is still usual with the Arabs.

An archer.—Heb, a shooter of bowshots. Another explanation, from a verb signifying to multiply, or be great, is not tenable.

(21) A wife out of the land of Egypt.—However natural this might be on Hagar's part, it would nevertheless strengthen the heathen element in Ishmael and his descendants. We find, nevertheless, that he was subsequently on friendly terms with Isaac (chap. xxv. 9; xxviii. 8, 9). For Paran, see chap. xiv. 6.

Abimelech's Covenant with Abraham.

(22) Abimelech and Phichol.—Abimelech, that is Father-King, was the title not only of the king of Gerar, but of the kings of the Philistines generally (chap. xxvi. 1; 1 Sam. xxi. 10, marg.; Ps. xxxiv., tit.). In like manner Phichol, month of all, seems to have been the official designation of the prime minister, and commander-in-chief. This visit of the king and his vizier appears to have taken place some considerable time after the beginning of the sojourn of Abraham at Gerar; for the friendly feelings which then existed had evidently given way to a coolness, occasioned by the quarrels between their heralds. In this narrative, Abraham appears as achieftain powerful enough for a king to wish to make an alliance with him; and thus his abandonment of Sarah, and his receiving of presents in compensation for the wrong done her, seems the more unworthy of him. Abimelech, on the other hand, acts generally as of old, and shows no signs of ill-will at the growing power of one whose expectation was that his race would possess the whole land.

(23) Nor with my son, nor with my son's son.—The words are not those commonly used for son and grandson, but a Hebrew phrase signifying my kith and kin. They might be translated, 'nor with mine offspring nor mine offspring.' The words occur again in the same proverbial way in Job xviii. 10; Isa. xiv. 22.
servants had violently taken away. (29) And Abimelech said, I wot not who hath done this thing: neither didst thou tell me, neither yet heard I of it, but to day. (27) And Abraham took sheep and oxen, and gave them unto Abimelech; and both of them made a covenant.

(28) And Abraham set seven ewe lambs of the flock by themselves. (29) And Abimelech said unto Abraham, What mean these seven ewe lambs which thou hast set by themselves? (30) And he said, For these seven ewe lambs shalt thou take of my hand, that they may be a witness unto me, that I have digged this well. (31) Wherefore he called that place 1 Beer-sheba; because there they sware both of them. (32) Thus they made a covenant at Beer-sheba: then Abimelech rose up, and Phichol the chief captain of his host, and they returned into the land of the Philistines.

(33) And Abraham planted a 2 grove in Beer-sheba, and called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God. (34) And Abraham sojourned in the Philistines' land many days.

CHAPTER XXII.—(1) And it came to pass after these things, that "God

1 That is, the well of the oath.
2 Or, tree.

N.C. cit. 1902.
Heb. II. 17.

(29) I wot not.—This explains the reason of Abimelech's visit. The king's herdsmen had robbed Abraham of a well, a species of property jealously defended in the East because of its great value, and Abraham in some way had made his displeasure felt. Abimelech, ever friendly towards Abraham, by whose nobleness of character he had been greatly impressed, comes to learn the cause of the coolness, and to enter into a more close and lasting alliance with the patriarch. With Oriental indirectness, he makes no complaint, and speaks only of his wish for continued friendship, but by his allusion to his past kindness hints that this had not been received as it ought. Abraham fully understands his real meaning, and tells him what had happened; whereupon the matter is set right, and Abraham requites his previous generosity with gifts of cattle.

(29) Seven ewe lambs.—The word in Hebrew for swearing is a passive verb, literally signifying "to be sevened," that is, done or confirmed by seven. In this ancient narrative we see a covenant actually thus made binding. Seven ewe lambs are picked out and placed by themselves, and by accepting these Abimelech bound himself to acknowledge and respect Abraham's title to the well. Apparently this manner of ratifying an oath was unknown to the Philistines, as Abimelech asks, "What mean these seven ewe lambs?" but it is equally possible that this question was dictated by the rules of Oriental courtesy. When Abraham had picked out the lambs, it became Abimelech's duty to ask what was the purpose of the act, which was then explained, and as soon as the lambs were accepted, the ratification was complete.

(31) Beer-sheba.—That is, the well of seven, but with a covert allusion to the seven lambs having been used for the ratification of an oath. Robinson found the exact site in the Wady-es-Seba, with its name still preserved as Bir-es-Seba. There are there two wells of solid construction, the larger twelve and a half feet in diameter; the other, situated about 200 yards to the south, much smaller, being only five feet in diameter. Both are lined with solid masonry, and reach down to never-failing springs in the rock. Around are stone troughs for watering the cattle, and the parapet of the larger well is worn into deep indentations, by the ropes used in drawing the water (Finn, Byways in Palestine, 1, 190).

(33) And Abraham planted a grove in Beer-sheba.—Heb., a tamarisk tree. Under a noble tree of this kind, which grows to a great size in hot countries, Saul held his court at Gibeah, and under another his bones were laid at Jabez (1 Sam. xxii. 6, xxxi. 13).

And called there on the name of the Lord, the everlasting God.—Heb., on the name of Jehovah, El 'olam (comp. chap. iv. 26). In chap. xiv. 22, Abraham claimed for Jehovah that he was El 'elyon, the supreme God; and in chap. xvii. 1, Jehovah reveals Himself as El shaddai, the almighty God; and now Abraham claims for Him the attribute of eternity. As he advanced in holiness, Abraham also grew in knowledge of the manifold nature of the Deity, and we also more clearly understand why the Hebrews called God, not El, but Elohim. In the plural appellation all the Divine attributes were combined. El might be 'elyon, or shaddai, or 'olam; Elohim was all in one.

(34) In the Philistines' land.—In verse 32 Abimelech on returning to Gerar is said to have gone back "into the land of the Philistines." But Beer-sheba also in a general way belonged to his dominions, and Abraham dwelt there in peace by reason of the treaty which existed between him and the Philistine king.
 Genesis, XXII.

俊 Brasen is Tempted

1 And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him. (4) Then on the third day Abraham lifted up his eyes, and saw the place

(3) And Abraham rose up early in the morning, and saddled his ass, and took two of his young men with him, and Isaac his son, and clave the wood for the burnt offering, and rose up, and went unto the place of which God had told him. (4) Then on the third day Abraham lifted up his eyes, and saw the place

peace it brought only a deeper condemnation upon his soul. Had Abraham been moved only by an internal and subjective impulse, his conduct would have deserved and met with similar condemnation. But when, upon examination, he became convinced that the command came from outside himself, and from the same God with whom on former occasions he had so often held converse, then the antecedents of his own life required of him obedience. But even when satisfied of this, there was, secondly, the trial of his faith. A command which he had tested, not only subjectively by prayer, but objectively by comparison with the manner of previous revelations, bade him with his own hand destroy the son in whom "his seed was to be called." His love for his child, his previous faith in the promise, the religious value and worth of Isaac as the appointed means for the blessing of all mankind—this, and more besides, stood arrayed against the command. But Abraham, in spite of all, obeyed, and in proportion to the greatness of the trial was the greatness of the reward. Up to this time his faith had been proved by patience and endurance, but now he was hidden himself to destroy the fruit of so many years of patient waiting (Heb. xi. 17—19), and, assured that the command came from God, he wavered not. Thus by trial was his own faith made perfect, and for Isaac too there was blessing. Mockly, as beffited the type of Christ, he submitted to his father's will, and the life restored to him was henceforth dedicated to God. But there was a higher purpose in the command than the spiritual good of these two saints. The sacrifice had for its object the instruction of the whole Church of God. If the act had possessed no typical value, it would have been difficult for us to reconcile to our consciences a command which might have seemed, indirectly at least, to have authorised human sacrifices. But there was in it the setting forth of the mystery of the Father giving the Son to die for the sins of the world; and therein lies both the value and the justification of Abraham's conduct and of the Divine command.

(2) Take now.—Now is not an adverb of time, but an interjection of entreaty, usually coupled with requests, and intended to soften them. It thus makes the words more an exhortation than a command.

Thine only son Isaac.—The words in the original are more emphatic, being, "Take, I pray thee, thy son, thine only son, whom thou lovest, even Isaac." If childlessness was so unendurable in old time to Abraham (chap. xv. 2), what would it be now, after so many years of enjoyment of a son, and after giving up Ishmael for his sake (chap. xvii. 18)?

The land of Moriah.—Moriah may either mean Jah is teacher (see Note on chap. xii. 6), or Jah is provider. The first is supported by Isa. ii. 3, where the verb is rendered will teach; but the second agrees best with verses 8, 14. If this be the meaning, the name would be derived from this event, and would signify the place where "Jehovah will Himself provide the sacrifi-
I and the lad will... come again to you.—In these words Abraham gives utterance to the hope ascribed to him in Heb. xi. 19. The belief in the resurrection of the body was no new thing with Abraham, as it was part of the creed both of Chaldea and Egypt (Tomkin’s, Studies, p. 127).

9. God will provide himself a lamb.—Heb. the lamb. We learn from Heb. xi. 17-19, that Abraham expected that he was to consume the sacrifice, but that Isaac would be restored to him from the dead, and the promise that his seed was to be born of him so fulfilled. The bestowal of Isaac had been so extraordinary, that Abraham would not feel staggered at what otherwise would have seemed incredible. Apparently, therefore, he meant Isaac by the lamb, thus showing that it was not he who chose the victim, but God. The few words that passed between father and son, the notice by the latter that amid such careful preparation no victim had been provided, the father’s answer that that matter was left to God, the resurrection faith of the one, and the trusting submission of the other, as “they went both of them together,” form a picture full not merely of interest, but even of tragic pathos.

(5) Abraham... bound Isaac.—Jewish commentators agree that this was done with Isaac’s consent, nor could it well have been otherwise. Thus his youthful faith was tried equally with that of his father, his future life sanctified, and himself emboldened by being made a type of Christ (1 Pet. ii. 23).

(11) The angel of the Lord.—Up to this point, the narrative had been Elohist, but it is the angel of Jehovah who intercedes to stop the sacrifice (see on chap. xvi. 7-10).

(12) Behold.—By a slight change in the shape of a consonant, many ancient authorities read one ram instead of a ram behind (“him” is not in the Hebrew). This correction is almost certain, as nowhere else is the word translated behind used as an adverb of place. The ram was probably that with four horns, still common in the East.

A burnt offering in the stead of his son.—We have here the fact of substitution, and the doctrine of a vicarious sacrifice. The ram took Isaac’s place, and by its actual death completed the typical representation in order, and bound Isaac his son, and laid him on the altar upon the wood.

(10) And Abraham stretched forth his hand, and took the knife to slay his son.

(11) And the angel of the Lord called unto him out of heaven, and said, Abraham, Abraham: and he said, Here am I. (12) And he said, Lay not thine hand upon the lad, neither do thou any thing unto him: for now I know that thou fearest God, seeing thou hast not withheld thy son, thine only son from me.

(13) And Abraham lifted up his eyes, and looked, and beheld behind him a ram caught in a thicket by his horns: and Abraham went and took the ram, and offered him up for a burnt offering in the stead of his son.

(14) And Abraham called the name of that place Jehovah-jireh: as it is said of the Saviour’s death on Calvary. In The Speaker’s Commentary it has been well shown, that there is no difficulty in this representation being composed of two parts, so that what was wanting in Isaac should be supplied by the ram. And while it would have been most painful for Isaac to have actually died by his father’s hand, the doctrine of the possibility of a vicarious sacrifice would have been even less clearly taught thereby. He therefore rises again to life from the altar, and the ram dies in his stead, and by the two combined the whole mystery is set forth of God giving His Son to die for mankind, and of life springing from His death. Compare the mystery of the two birds, Lev. xiv. 4; and the two goats, ibid. xvi. 8.

(41) Jehovah-jireh.—That is, Jehovah will provide. In verse 8, Abraham had said “Elolhim-jireh,” God will provide. He now uses Jehovah as the equivalent of Elohim. It is added that hence arose a proverb, “In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen,” or rather, “In the mount of Jehovah it shall be provided.” The verb literally means to see, or, to see to a thing, and the sense of the proverb plainly is that in man’s necessity God will Himself see to it, and provide due help and deliverance. The Samaritan, Syrian, and Vulgate, have a better reading, namely, “In the mount Jehovah will provide.” This makes no change in the consonants, which alone are authoritative, but only in the vowels, which were added since the Christian era, and represent the tradition of the Jewish school of Tiberias. The LXX., without changing the vowels, translate, “In the mount Jehovah shall be seen,” which would be a prophecy of the O Emmanuel of the ancient Syriac. The other two renderings, besides their general proverbial sense, point onward to the providing upon this very spot of the sacrifice that was to take away the sins of the world (comp. Isa. lxxi. 5).

But when and how did this grow into a proverb? and who added this note? It may have been inserted by Moses when he arranged these marvellous documents: less probably by Ezra and the men of the Great Synagogue, when they collected and revised the several books of Holy Scripture after the exile. In either case, the proverb is a national testimony to the genuineness of the record, and proves that the
to this day, In the mount of the Lord it shall be seen.

19 And the angel of the Lord called unto Abraham out of heaven the second time, (19) and said, By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord, for because thou hast done this thing, and hast not withheld thy son, thine only son: (17) that in blessing I will bless thee, and in multiplying I will multiply thy seed as the stars of the heaven, and as the sand which is upon the sea shore; and thy seed shall possess the gate of his enemies; (18) and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; because thou hast obeyed my voice.

10 So Abraham returned unto his young men, and they rose up and went together to Beer-sheba; and Abraham dwelt at Beer-sheba.

facts narrated in it were so impressed upon the memory of Abraham’s descendants, as to shape their thoughts and language.

16 By myself have I sworn, saith the Lord (Jehovah).—This solemn interposition of an oath (Heb. vi. 17), of which the present is the sole instance in Holy Scripture, plainly indicates that this trial of Abraham’s faith was of no common kind, and that its typical teaching is of no ordinary value. Abraham might have appealed to God’s own attributes, and said, Far be it from thee, Lord, to command a human sacrifice, and bid a father slay his son. He might have pleaded the promises bound up with Isaac’s life. But no, as soon as he is convinced that the command comes from God, he obeys, and, against hope, still believes that the promises will all be fulfilled in the sacrificed Isaac. He is thus the highest and most perfect example of faith, and by his offering of his son the Church received the assurance that the Son of God incarnate in the flesh would upon that very mountain offer the sacrifice Divinely necessary for the pardon of man’s sins.

The blessing now given to Abraham differs from those that precede it in three particulars. First, it is no longer a promise, but a solemn compact ratified by an oath. Next, it assures Abraham’s seed of victory, whereby the spiritual Israel is certified of the ultimate triumph of the Gospel. Lastly, it transfers to Abraham’s offspring the promise of being the means of blessedness to all mankind.

 Nahor’s Posternity.

(20) Thy brother Nahor.—Dwelling so far apart news would seldom reach Abraham of those whom he had left at Haran. But besides the domestic interest, the knowledge thus conveyed to him was the cause probably of Abraham’s determination to seek a wife for his son from among his own kindred. It has been noticed that Nahor has twelve sons, eight by his lawful wife, and four by his concubine. So Jacob has twelve sons, eight by two lawful wives and four by two concubines. Lastly, Ishmael has twelve sons. These coincidences are curious, but afford no ground for the assertion that therefore these narratives are mythical. For coincidences quite as strange are to be found in every history, and in daily life.

(21) Huz his firstborn, and Buz his brother, and Kemuel the father of Aram, (22) and Chedesh, and Hazo, and Pildash, and Jidlaph, and Bethuel. (23) And Bethuel begat Rebekah: these eight Milcah did bear to Nahor, Abraham’s brother. (24) And his concubine, whose name was Reumah, she bare also Tebah, and Gaham, and Thahash, and Maachah.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(1) And Sarah was an hundred and seven and twenty years old: these were the years of the life of Sarah. (2) And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the same is Hebron in

The Promise Renewed.

GENESIS, XXIII. The Generations of Nahor.

(20) And it came to pass after these things, that it was told Abraham, saying, Behold, Milcah, she hath also born children unto thy brother Nahor; (21) Huz his firstborn, and Buz his brother, and Kemuel the father of Aram, (22) and Chedesh, and Hazo, and Pildash, and Jidlaph, and Bethuel. (23) And Bethuel begat Rebekah: these eight Milcah did bear to Nahor, Abraham's brother. (24) And his concubine, whose name was Reumah, she bare also Tebah, and Gaham, and Thahash, and Maachah.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(1) And Sarah was an hundred and seven and twenty years old: these were the years of the life of Sarah. (2) And Sarah died in Kirjath-arba; the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan: and Abraham came to mourn for Sarah, and to weep for her.

(5) And Abraham stood up from before his dead, and spake unto the sons of Heth, saying, (6) I am a stranger and a sojourner with you: give me a possession of a buryingplace with you, that I may bury my dead out of my sight.

(5) And the children of Heth answered Abraham, saying unto him, (6) Hear us, my lord: thou art a mighty prince among us: in the choice of our sepulchres bury thy dead; none of us shall withhold from thee his sepulchre, but that thou mayest bury thy dead.

And Abraham stood up, and bowed himself to the people of the land, even to the children of Heth. (b) And he communed with them, saying, If it be your mind that I should bury my dead out of my sight; hear me, and intreat for me to Ephron the son of Zohar, (9) that he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which he hath, which is in the end of his field; for as much money as it is worth he shall give it me for a possession of a buryingplace amongst you.

(10) And Ephron dwelt among the children of Heth: and Ephron the Hittite answered Abraham in the audience of the children of Heth, even of all that went in at the gate of his city, saying, (11) Nay, my lord, hear me:

Abraham came to mourn.—At this period Abraham was in quiet possession of several head-quarters, and apparently he had restored the old title, but were expelled by Caleb (Josh. xv. 14), who took it as his possession, and seems to have given its name to a grandchild, as a memorial of his victory (1 Chr. ii. 42). It is still an important town, with a population of 17,000 Moslems and about 600 Jews.

Abraham stood up from before his dead.—His first care on arriving at Hebron had been to prostrate himself in Sarah's tent, and give utterance to his grief. Only after this he rises to prepare for her burial.

The sons of Heth.—Up to this time we have read only of Amorites, Mamre and his brothers, at Hebron. It now appears that it was the property of the Hittites, a race who, while the Israelites sojourned in Egypt, became so powerful as to contend for empire with the Egyptians themselves. Their capital was Emesa in Northern Syria, and their history is now being made known to us not only by means of Egyptian records, but also of inscriptions in their own language (See Note on chap. x. 15).

A possession of a buryingplace.—While strangers might pasture their cattle upon the open downs, yet the consent of the natives seems to have been necessary before Abraham could occupy any spot permanently (chap. xv. 13; xx. 15). He now wanted even more, and for the actual appropriation of any portion of the soil a public compact and purchase was required, which must be ratified not merely by the seller, but by the consent of all the tribe, convened in full assembly at the gate of the city. Thus, in spite of his power and wealth, Abraham, as regards his legal position towards the inhabitants, was but a stranger and sojourner (Heb. xi. 9), and could secure a resting-place for his dead only by their consent.

6) "cedars of God" (Ps. lxxx. 10). So also "a sleep of Jehovah" for a deep sleep (1 Sam. xxvi. 12).

The field give I thee.—Only the cave had been mentioned, but for its quiet possession the land...
The field give I thee, and the cave that is therein, I give it thee; in the presence of the sons of my people give I it thee: bury thy dead.

And Abraham bowed down himself before the people of the land.

And he spake unto Ephron in the audience of the people of the land, saying, But if thou wilt give it, I pray thee, hear me: I will give thee money for the field; take it of me, and I will bury my dead there.

And Ephron answered Abraham, saying unto him, My lord, hearken unto me: the land is worth four hundred shekels of silver; what is that betwixt me and thee? bury therefore thy dead.

And Abraham hearkened unto Ephron; and Abraham weighed to Ephron the silver, which he had named in the audience of the sons of Abrah, four hundred shekels of silver, current money with the merchant. And the field of Ephron, which was in Machpe-elah, which was before Mamre, the field, and the cave which was therein, and all the trees that were in the field, that were in all the borders round about, were made sure unto Abraham for a possession in the presence of the children of Heth, before all that went in at the gate of his city.

And after this, Abraham buried Sarah his wife in the cave of the field of Machpe-elah before Mamre: the same is Hebron in the land of Canaan.

And the field, and the cave that is therein, were made sure unto Abraham for a possession of a burying-place by the sons of Heth.

CHAPTER XXIV.—(1) And Abraham was old, and 1 well stricken in age; and the Lord had blessed Abraham in all things. (2) And Abraham said unto his

For Benjamin of Tudela, who visited it nearly seven centuries ago, says that the old Hebron was on the heights, but had been abandoned, and that the new city lay in the valley.

The field, and the cave ...—It is interesting to compare this document, so legally exact and full, with the numerous tablets of term-cotta now in our museums, and which record with equal exactness the daily business transactions of the people of Ur-Chadim, whence Abraham had migrated.

Were made sure unto Abraham.—For the difficulties connected with St. Stephen's apparent confusion of this transaction with that recorded in chap. xxxiii. 19, see Note on Acts vii. 16.

XXIV.

MARRIAGE OF ISAAC AND REBEKAH.

(1) Abraham was old.—As Isaac was thirty-seven years of age when Sarah died (chap. xxiii. 1), and forty at his marriage (chap. xxv. 20), Abraham, who was a centenarian at Isaac's birth, would now be nearly 140. As he lived to be 175 (chap. xxv. 7), he survived Isaac's marriage thirty-five years, and lived to see Esau and Jacob nearly grown up.

(2) Unto his eldest servant of his house.—Heb., his servant, the e'der of his house. It is the name of an office; and though one holding so confidential a post would be a man of ripe years, yet it is not probable that Abraham would send one who was not still vigorous on so distant a journey. Eliezer of Damascus had held a similar office fifty-five years previously (chap. xv. 2), but this was probably a younger man.

Put ... thy hand under my thigh.—As Jacob requires that Joseph should swear to him in the same manner (chap. xlvii. 29), this form of oath was evidently regarded as a very solemn one. The meaning of it has been much discussed, but we find the thigh in chap. xlvii. 26, Exod. i. 5—in both which places it is eldest servant of his house, that ruled over all that he had. 2 Put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh: 3 and I will make thee swear by the Lord, the God of heaven, and the God of the earth, that thou shalt not take a wife unto my son of the daughters of the Canaanites, among whom I dwell: 4 but thou shalt go unto my country, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son Isaac. 5 And the servant said unto him, Peradventure the woman will not be willing to follow me unto this land: must I needs bring thy son again unto the land from whence thou camest? 6 And Abraham said unto him, Beware thou that thou bring not my son thither again. 7 The Lord God of heaven, which took me from my father's house, and from the land of my kindred, rendered loving-used as the source of posterity. Probably, therefore, as Tuch argues, it is an euhemeristic manner of describing the circumcision member, which was to be touched by the hand placed beneath the thigh; and thus the oath was really by the holy covenant between Abraham and God, of which circumcision was the symbol. 8 Beware thou that thou bring not my son thither again. The betrothal of Isaac and Rebekah is told with the utmost exactness of detail, because it contained two principles of primary importance to Abraham's posterity: the first, that they were not to allow themselves to be merged among the Canaanites, but remain a distinct people; for this intermarriage with women of their own race was only a means to an end, and not a binding law, to be observed for its own sake. And secondly, that under no circumstances might they return to Mesopotamia, but must cling devotedly to the land of which God had promised them the possession. We learn from verse 8 that this second point was regarded by Abraham as even more important than the first; and with reason. For the race might remain distinct even if Isaac took a woman of Palestine to wife, though there would be the risk of religious deterioration; but if they returned to Padan-aram they were certain to be absorbed, and could look for no higher lot than that attained by Laban's descendants. 9 Land of my kindred.-Rather, of my nativity; and so in verse 4. (See Note on chap. xii. 1.) It is a different word from that rightly translated kindred in verse 38. Jewish interpreters say that by his father's house and by his nativity in verse 4, Abraham meant Charan; but by his birthplace he meant Ur of the Chaldees. If, therefore, the servant failed in obtaining a wife at Charan, he was to continue his journey to Ur, where Abraham, doubtless, had many relatives. 10 And the servant.—Why did not Isaac go himself in search of a wife? We must not conclude from his inactivity that the matter had not his full concurrence; but he was the heir, and according to Oriental manners it was fitting that the choice should be left to a trusty deputy. What is peculiar in the narrative is the distance to which the servant was sent, and the limitation of his choice to a particular family; but both these peculiarities arose from the religious considerations involved. Jacob subsequently went in person on a similar errand, but we must remember that Rebekah was also seeking for him a place of safety. But for this, and had he been the sole heir, she would probably have sent an embassy to her brother's house to ask for him a wife. 11 For all the goods of his master were in his hand.—Rather, with every good thing of his master in his hand. It was necessary not only that the servant should take with him such a convoy as would ensure his safety and that of the bride on their return, but also such rich presents as would adequately represent Abraham's wealth and power. 12 Mesopotamia.—Heb., Aram-Naharah: that is, "Aram of the two rivers." Aram means highland, but it became the title of the whole Syrian race; and here Aram-Naharah means that part of Syria which lies between the Tigris and Euphrates. It was a mountainless region, except towards the north. For Padan-aram, see Note on chap. xxv. 20. 13 The city of Nahor.—This was Charan (chap. xxvii. 43). Nahor had probably migrated thither from Ur when Terah was growing old, that he might occupy the pastures which Abraham was about to abandon. 14 He made his camels to kneel down.—Camels rest kneeling, but the servant did not unfade them till he knew that God had heard his prayer. (See verse 32.) By a well of water.—The well was the property of the whole city, and might be used only at a fixed hour; and the servant therefore waits till the women came to draw. This duty of fetching water is not peculiar to Oriental women, but to this day in most parts of Europe, wherever the supply comes from a public source, women may be seen thus occupied. Rebekah carried her pitcher upon her shoulder; in the south of France the Basques women, like the ancient Egyptians, carry it on their heads, and the habit of
And he said, O Lord God of my master Abraham, I pray thee, send me good speed this day, and shew kindness unto my master Abraham. Behold, I stand here by the well of water; and the daughters of the men of the city come out to draw water: and let it come to pass, that the damsels to whom I shall say, Let down thy pitcher, I pray thee, that I may drink; and she shall say, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink also: let the same be she that thou hast appointed for thy servant Isaac; and thereby shall I know that thou hast shewed kindness unto my master.

And it came to pass, before he had done speaking, that, behold, Rebekah came out, who was born to Bethuel, son of Milcah, the wife of Nahor, Abraham's brother, with her pitcher upon her shoulder. And the damsel was very fair to look upon, a virgin, neither had any thus balancing it gives them a peculiarly erect and graceful carriage.

O Lord God . . . —Heb., Jehovah, God of my lord Abraham. The word translated "master" throughout this chapter is 'abráháh, the ordinary word for lord, and it is also rendered in verse 18. As a circumcised member of Abraham's household, the servant prays to Jehovah, Abraham's God; and though in verse 5 he had suggested a difficulty, apparently it was from no want of faith, but that he might know whether under any circumstances Isaac might return to Aram-Naharaim. He now leaves the success of his mission to Jehovah; and while he would use his own discernment in choosing the troop of advancing maidens one whose comeliness gave promise of goodness of heart, the fulfilment of the appointed signal which was to mark God's approval would also show that she was no churlish woman, but one active, generous, and kind.

Send me good speed this day.—Heb., cause it to meet me this day. I stand.—This word here, and in verse 43, is not the same as that used in verse 30, but one that means I post myself, or I take my station. Thereby.—Rather, by her: by her giving the appointed sign I shall know that thou hast shewed kindness to my lord.

The damsel.—This word (Heb., נָּשָׁה) is of the common gender in the Pentateuch, except in Dent. xxii. 19, where it has the feminine termination. It is used of Abraham's young men in chaps. xiv. 24, xviii. 7, &c., but no less than twenty-two times of women. In the rest of the Bible the gender is always marked, and even here it is read in the feminine in the Jewish synagogues. We have herein another of the many linguistic proofs of the extreme antiquity of the Pentateuch, and it is the more interesting because found in a Jehovistic section. The same word is used again in verses 16 and 28. (See Note on chap. xiii. 8.)

She went down to the well.—The water, therefore, was reached by a flight of steps, the usual man known her: and she went down to the well, and filled her pitcher, and came up. And the servant ran to meet her, and said, Let me, I pray thee, drink a little water of thy pitcher. And she said, Drink, my lord: and she hasted, and let down her pitcher upon her hand, and gave him drink. And when she had done giving him drink, she said, I will draw water for thy camels also, until they have done drinking. And she hasted, and emptied her pitcher into the trough, and ran again unto the well to draw water, and drew for all his camels. And the man wondering at her held his peace, to wit whether the Lord had made his journey prosperous or not.

And it came to pass, as the camels had done drinking, that the man took a golden earring of half a shekel weight, and two bracelets for her hands of ten shekels weight of gold; and said,
Whose daughter art thou? tell me, I pray thee: is there room in thy father's house for us to lodge in? (21) And she said unto him, I am the daughter of Bethuel the son of Milcah, which she bare unto Nahor. (22) She said moreover unto him, We have both straw and provender enough, and room to lodge in. (23) And the man bowed down his head, and worshipped the Lord. (24) And he said, Blessed be the Lord God of my master Abraham, who hath not left destitute my master of his mercy and his truth: I being in the way, the Lord led me to the house of my master's brethren. (25) And the damsel ran, and told them of her mother's house these things. (26) And Rebekah had a brother, and his name was Laban: and Laban ran out unto the man, unto the well. (27) And it came to pass, when he saw the earring and bracelets upon his sister's hands, and when he heard the words of Rebekah his sister, saying, Thus spake the man unto me; that he came unto the man; and, behold, he stood by the camels at the well. (28) And he said, Come in, thou blessed of the Lord; wherefore standest thou without? for I have prepared the house, and room for the camels. (29) And the man came into the house: and he ungirded his camels, and gave straw and provender for the camels, and water to wash his feet, and the men's feet that were with him. (30) And there was set meat before him to eat: but he said, I will not eat, until I have told mine errand. And he said, Speak on. (31) And he said, I am Abraham's servant. (32) And the Lord hath blessed my master greatly; and he is become great: and he hath given him flocks, and herds, and silver, and gold, and menservants, and maidservants, and camels, and asses. (33) And Sarah my master's wife bare a son to my master when she was old: and unto him hath he given all that he hath. (34) And my master made increased by the sight of his sister's golden ornaments. More remarkable is it that Laban addresses the servant as "blessed of Jehovah," for we learn in Josh. xxiv. 2 that the monotheism of Nahor and his family was by no means pure. Still, neither were they idolaters, and the "other gods" whom they served were probably teraphim, as certainly were the gods of Laban mentioned in chap xxi. 30. Even to the last these household gods seem to have retained a hold upon the affections of the nation (Hos. iii. 4); and probably most unenlightened minds, even when their religion is in the main true, have nevertheless a tendency to add on to it some superstitions, especially in the way of fashioning for themselves some lower mediator. (35) I will not eat, until I have told mine errand.—Two points in Oriental manners are here brought into view: the first, that hospitality, so necessary in a country where there are no inns, was, and still is, a religion to the Bedouin; the second, that consequently he will concede anything rather than have his hospitality refused. Aware of this feeling, Abraham's servant will not partake of Laban's bread and salt until he has told his request. After he had become Laban's guest, Laban would have been free to do as he liked; but he must now grant what is asked, or the stranger would decline to enter his dwelling.

Mr. Fraser (Historical Description of Afghanistan, chap. xi. p. 434: Edinburgh, 1834) and Ferrier (L'Afghanistan, chap. xi. p. 119: ed. 1842) mention a remarkable custom connected with Afghan hospitality which admirably illustrates the behaviour of Abraham's servant. It is called menaeciti, from two words signifying I am come in. Any one who has a favour to ask goes to the tent or house of the person from whom he expects it, but refuses to sit on his carpet or partake of his food until he has granted the required boon. And custom makes it a point of honour to concede it, if it be in the power of the person thus appealed to. me swear, saying, Thou shalt not take a wife to my son of the daughters of the Canaanites, in whose land I dwell: but thou shalt go unto my father’s house, and to my kindred, and take a wife unto my son. And I said unto my master, Peradventure the woman will not follow me. And he said unto me, The Lord, before whom I walk, will send his angel with thee, and prosper thy way; and thou shalt take a wife for my son of my kindred, and of my father’s house: then shalt thou be clear from this my oath, when thou comest to my kindred; and if they give not thee one, thou shalt be clear from my oath. And I came this day unto the well, and said, O Lord God of my master Abraham, if now thou do prosper my way which I go: behold, I stand by the well of water; and it shall come to pass, that when the virgin cometh forth to draw water, and I say to her, Give me, I pray thee, a little water of thy pitcher to drink; and she say to me, Both drink thou, and I will also draw for thy camels: let the same be the woman whom the Lord hath appointed out for my master’s son. And before I had done speaking in mine heart, behold, Rebekah came forth with her pitcher on her shoulder; and she went down unto the well, and drew water: and I said unto her, Let me drink, I pray thee. And she made haste, and let down her pitcher from her shoulder, and said, Drink, and I will give thy camels drink also: so I drank, and she made the camels drink also. And I asked her, and said, Whose daughter art thou? And she said, The daughter of Bethuel, Nahor’s son, whom Milcah bare unto him: and I put the earring upon her face, and the bracelets upon her hands. And I bowed down my head, and worshipped the Lord, and blessed the Lord God of my master Abraham, which had led me in the right way to take my master’s brother’s daughter unto his son. And now if ye will deal kindly and truly with my master, tell me: and if not, tell me; that I may turn to the right hand, or to the left.

Then Laban and Bethuel answered and said, The thing proceedeth from the Lord: we cannot speak unto thee bad or good. Behold, Rebekah is before thee, take her, and go, and let her be thy master’s son’s wife, as the Lord hath spoken. And it came to pass, that, when Abraham’s servant heard their words, he worshipped the Lord, bowing himself to the earth. And the servant brought forth 1jewels of silver, and jewels of gold, and raiment, and gave them to Rebekah: he gave also to her brother and to her mother precious things. And they did eat and drink, he and the men that were with him, and tarried all night; and they rose up in the morn-

(50) Laban and Bethuel.—See Note on verse 28. Even when thus tardily mentioned, the father is placed after the brother; and of this we need look for no further explanation than that by polygamy the father was estranged from his own children, while each separate family held very closely together. Thus when Dinah was wronged, it was two of her mother’s sons, Simeon and Levi, who avenged her (chap. xxxiv. 13—25); and so it was Absalom who avenged Tamar (2 Sam. xiii. 22). Still, Bethuel’s consent was finally necessary; but as soon as it was given all active arrangements were left to the mother and Laban (verses 53—55), and Bethuel is mentioned no more.

(53) Jewels of silver, and jewels of gold.—Heb., vessels. In ancient times a wife had to be bought (chap. xxxiv. 12), and the presents given were not mere ornaments and jewellery, but articles of substantial use and value. Quickly indeed in a country of such ceremonial politeness the purchase took a more honourable form, but Orientals do not let their courtesy interfere with their interests, and the relatives would take care that the freewill offerings did not fall below the usual standard. These went partly to the bride, and partly to her relatives: and as they are described here as going exclusively to the brother and mother, Jewish tradition has invented the story that Bethuel was ill at the time, and died on the day of the servant’s arrival. But the manner in which Isaac speaks of him in chap. xxviii. 2 does not allow us to suppose that he was either dead at the time of her departure, or that he was a person of no ability or importance. Possibly, therefore, polygamy had led to the custom of the purchase-presents going to the mother’s tent.
ing, and he said, "Send me away unto my master." (55) And her brother and her mother said, Let the damsel abide with us a few days, at the least ten; after that she shall go. (56) And he said unto them, Hinder me not, seeing the Lord hath prospered my way; send me away that I may go to my master. (57) And they said, We will call the damsel, and enquire at her mouth. (58) And they called Rebekah, and said unto her, Wilt thou go with this man? And she said, I will go. (59) And they sent away Rebekah their sister, and her nurse, and Abraham's servant, and his men. (60) And they blessed Rebekah, and said unto her, Thou art our sister, be thou the mother of thousands of millions, and let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate them.

(61) And Rebekah arose, and her damsels, and they rode upon the camels, and followed the man: and the servant took

Rebekah, and went his way. (62) And Isaac came from the way of the well Lahai-roi; for he dwelt in the south country. (63) And Isaac went out to meditate in the field at the eventide: and he lifted up his eyes, and saw, and beheld, the camels were coming. (64) And Rebekah lifted up her eyes, and when she saw Isaac, she lighted off the camel. (65) For she had said unto the servant, What man is this that walketh in the field to meet us? And the servant had said, It is my master; therefore she took a vail, and covered herself. (66) And the servant told Isaac all things that he had done. (67) And Isaac brought her into his mother Sarah's tent, and took Rebekah, and she became his wife; and he loved her: and Isaac was comforted after his mother's death.

CHAPTER XXV. — (1) Then again Abraham took a wife, and her name was was from the period of the year. As Isaac was at the station most remote from Charan, Rebekah would have visited all his houses before arriving at Beer-lahai-roi.

(63) To meditate.—Many Jewish commentators translate to pray, and derive one of the three Jewish forms of prayer from this act of Isaac. But though the verb is rare, the substantive is used in Ps. civ. 34 of religious meditation; and this sense well agrees with the whole character of the calm, peaceful Isaac, already marked out as the type of the Lamb dumb before His slayers (chap. xxii. 7).

(64) She lighted off.—Heb. felt: descended hastily from her camel. It is still the custom in the East for an inferior when meeting a superior to dismount, and advance on foot. Rebekah, therefore, would have been thought bold and disrespectful had she not acknowledged the superiority of her lord. Besides beauty, they have already seen in her kindness of heart, activity, and courageous submission to the guidance of Providence; we now see her modesty and courtesy towards her husband.

(65) She took a vail, and covered herself.—Brides are usually taken to the bridegroom enveloped in a vail, which covers the whole body, and is far larger than that ordinarily worn. At the present time the bride's vail is usually red, the ordinary vail blue or white. By wrapping herself in this vail Rebekah notified that she was the bride. After marriage it was seldom worn at this early period, and so both the Egyptians and Abraham's tent.

XXV.

Abraham's Marriage with Keturah.

(1) Then again Abraham took a wife.—This rendering implies that Abraham's marriage with Keturah did not take place until after Sarah's death; but this, though probable, is far from certain, as the Hebrew simply says, And Abraham added

Abraham's tent. — So Leah and Rachel had each her own tent (chap. xxxi. 33; but see on verse 28).
Keturah. (2) And "she bare him Zimran, and Jokshan, and Medan, and Midian, and Ishbak, and Shuah." (3) And Jokshan begat Sheba, and Dedan. And the sons of Dedan were Assurim, and Letushim, and Leumim. (4) And the sons of Midian; Ephah, and Epher, and Hanoch, and Abidaah, and Eldaah. All these were the children of Keturah.

(5) And Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac. (6) But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away and took a wife. This statement is altogether indefinite; but as Abraham was 137 years of age at Sarah's death, and lived to be 175, it is quite possible that he left solitary by Isaac's marriage, he took Keturah to wife, and had by her six sons. The sole objection is his own statement, in chap. xvii. 17, that it was a thing beyond nature for a man a hundred years old to have a son; how much more improbable, then, must it have become after forty more years had passed by! The argument on the other side, which would infer that the marriage took place in Sarah's lifetime, from the fact that the birth of grandchildren is mentioned in verses 3 and 4, has little weight, as their names might have been subsequently added to bring down the genealogy to a later date.

Jewish commentators cut the knot by identifying Keturah with Hagar, who in the meanwhile had, as they say, set an example of matronly virtue in the manner in which she had devoted herself to the bringing up of Ishmael. But in verse 6 there is an evident allusion to both Hagar and Keturah in the mention of Abraham's "concubines" in the plural; and in 1 Chron. i. 32 the children of Keturah are distinguished from Hagar's son, Ishmael. To this we must add that as Ishmael was fourteen years old when Isaac was born, he would be now about fifty-four years of age, and his mother has passed the period of life when she could bear six sons.

The position, moreover, of Keturah was entirely distinct from that of Hagar. The latter was Sarah's representative; and her son, if Sarah had remained barren, would have been the heir. Keturah was a secondary wife, whose children from the first held an inferior position in the household. So Bilhah and Zilpah became the substitutes of Rachel and Leah, and therefore their children ranked side by side with Reuben and Joseph, though not altogether on the same level. They were patriarchs, and the progenitors of tribes, even if the tribes sprung from them held a lower rank.

(2) Zimran.—The home of Keturah's descendants is placed by Josephus and Jerome in Arabia-Felix; but the supposed traces of their names are untrustworthy.

Midian is the one son of Keturah who had a great future before him, for his race became famous traders (chap. xxxvii. 28); and as they are called Medanites there in the Hebrew, in verse 36, it is probable that Medan and Midian coalesced into one tribe. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, belonged to them (Exod. ii. 15, 16), and, enriched by commerce, they became so powerful as to be dangerous neighbours to the Israelites. (Judges vi., vii., viii.)

(3) Jokshan begat Sheba, and Dedan. And the sons of Dedan were Assurim, and Letushim, and Leumim. (4) And the sons of Midian; Ephah, and Epher, and Hanoch, and Abidaah, and Eldaah. All these were the children of Keturah. (5) And Abraham gave all that he had unto Isaac. (6) But unto the sons of the concubines, which Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and sent them away and took a wife. This statement is altogether indefinite; but as Abraham was 137 years of age at Sarah's death, and lived to be 175, it is quite possible that he left solitary by Isaac's marriage, he took Keturah to wife, and had by her six sons. The sole objection is his own statement, in chap. xvii. 17, that it was a thing beyond nature for a man a hundred years old to have a son; how much more improbable, then, must it have become after forty more years had passed by! The argument on the other side, which would infer that the marriage took place in Sarah's lifetime, from the fact that the birth of grandchildren is mentioned in verses 3 and 4, has little weight, as their names might have been subsequently added to bring down the genealogy to a later date.

Jewish commentators cut the knot by identifying Keturah with Hagar, who in the meanwhile had, as they say, set an example of matronly virtue in the manner in which she had devoted herself to the bringing up of Ishmael. But in verse 6 there is an evident allusion to both Hagar and Keturah in the mention of Abraham's "concubines" in the plural; and in 1 Chron. i. 32 the children of Keturah are distinguished from Hagar's son, Ishmael. To this we must add that as Ishmael was fourteen years old when Isaac was born, he would be now about fifty-four years of age, and his mother has passed the period of life when she could bear six sons.

The position, moreover, of Keturah was entirely distinct from that of Hagar. The latter was Sarah's representative; and her son, if Sarah had remained barren, would have been the heir. Keturah was a secondary wife, whose children from the first held an inferior position in the household. So Bilhah and Zilpah became the substitutes of Rachel and Leah, and therefore their children ranked side by side with Reuben and Joseph, though not altogether on the same level. They were patriarchs, and the progenitors of tribes, even if the tribes sprung from them held a lower rank.

(2) Zimran.—The home of Keturah's descendants is placed by Josephus and Jerome in Arabia-Felix; but the supposed traces of their names are untrustworthy.

Midian is the one son of Keturah who had a great future before him, for his race became famous traders (chap. xxxvii. 28); and as they are called Medanites there in the Hebrew, in verse 36, it is probable that Medan and Midian coalesced into one tribe. Jethro, the father-in-law of Moses, belonged to them (Exod. ii. 15, 16), and, enriched by commerce, they became so powerful as to be dangerous neighbours to the Israelites. (Judges vi., vii., viii.)

Shuah.—From him perhaps descended Beldad the Shuhite, Job's friend (Job. ii. 11). The name in the Hebrew is different from that also rendered "Shuah" in chap. xxxviii. 2.

(3) Jokshan begat Sheba, and Dedan.—But Sheba and Dedan are also described as the sons of Raamah, the son of Cush (chap. x. 7). We have here proof that these genealogies are to a certain extent geographical, and that whereas these districts at first were peopled by a Hamitic race, they were subsequently conquered by men of the Semitic stock, who claimed Abraham for their ancestor. Most probably, therefore, we ought not to regard Sheba and Dedan as the names here of men. As men they were the sons of Raamah, but when the sons of Jokshan wrested these two countries from the family of Cush, they called them sons of their progenitor, because the dominant portion of the population had sprung from him. They appear as countries in Jer. vi. 20, xlix. 8; Ezek. xxv. 13, xvii. 15, 22, xxxviii. 13, &c.

Assurim, and Letushim, and Leumim.—These are certainly not the names of men, but of the three tribes into which the Dedanites were divided.

(9) The east country.—By this is meant Arabia and Southern Mesopotamia, where, by their superior vigour and organisation, the descendants of Abraham were able to establish their supremacy over the natives. Burckhardt tells us that the Bedaween still follow Abraham's practice. When their children are grown up, they give each of the younger sons his share of their goods (Luke xv. 12), whereupon they move to a distance, and leave the eldest brother in quiet possession of the home.

(7) An hundred threescore and fifteen years.—As Abraham was seventy-five years of age when he left Haran (chap. xii. 4), his sojourn in Canaan lasted just a century, one quarter of which was spent in the long trial of his faith before Isaac was granted to him. As, however, Esau and Jacob were born when Isaac was sixty years of age (chap. xxv. 26), they would be fifteen at Abraham's death, and probably had often seen their grandfather, and received his blessing.

Abraham . . . was gathered to his people. Upon the belief in a future life implied in these words, see Note on chap. xv. 15, and comp. Heb. xi. 16.

(9) His sons Isaac and Ishmael.—Isaac was now seventy-five years of age, and Ishmael eighty-nine, and the two old men, with their comity long over, met as friends at their father's burial. While Keturah's sons were apparently sent far away into Arabia, Ishmael at Paran (chap. xxi. 21) would be at no very great was Abraham buried, and Sarah his wife. (11) And it came to pass after the death of Abraham, that God blessed his son Isaac; and Isaac dwelt by the well Lahai-roi.

(12) Now these are the generations of Ishmael, Abraham's son, whom Hagar the Egyptian, Sarah's handmaid, bare unto Abraham: (13) and these are the names of the sons of Ishmael, by their names, according to their generations: the firstborn of Ishmael, Nebajoth; and Kedar, and Adbeel, and Mibsam, (14) and Mishma, and Dunah, and Massa, (15) Hadar, and Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah: (16) these are the sons of Ishmael, and these are their names, by their towns, and by their castles; twelve princes according to their nations. (17) And these are the years of the life of Ishmael, an hundred and thirty and seven years: and he gave up the ghost and died; and was gathered unto his people. (18) And they dwelt from Havilah unto Shur, that is before Egypt, as thou goest toward Assyria: and he died in the presence of all his brethren.

dar, and Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah: (16) these are the sons of Ish-

The Toldoth Ishmael.

(12) These are the generations of Ishmael. — Following the usual rule of this book, Ishmael is not dismissed from the Divine presence without a short record of his history, after which he falls into the background, and the historian proceeds with his main subject, which is the preparation for the forming of that race and nation of whom, according to the flesh, Christ came. These brief notices, moreover, of personages not in the direct line of Christ's ancestry have their value in God's great purpose that the Jewish Messiah should be the Redeemer of the Gentiles also (Rom. x. 12); and consequently from the first their history was not alien from God's counsels.

(13-15) The sons of Ishmael. — Of the Arabian tribes sprung from Ishmael we read of Nebajoth and Kedar in Isa. lx. 7 as pastoral tribes, rich in flocks. Dunah is deemed worthy of a special prophecy (Isa. xxi. 11); while the people of Tema are described there in verse 14 as generous and hospitable, and in Job vi. 10 they appear as active traders. (See also Jer. xxv. 25.) Jetur, Naphish, and other Hagarite tribes, were conquered by Reuben and his allies (1 Chron. x. 19), and Jetur became the Iture of Luke iii. 1. For the occasional references made to these and other sons of Ishmael in classical writers, the reader may consult Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, or similar works. The abode of the twelve tribes sprung from Ishmael was the northern part of Arabia, whence gradually they extended their influence, and apparently soon absorbed the dispossessed (chap. x. 26—30), themselves a kindred Semitic race. These genealogies would be inexplicable if we did not remember that successive waves of people occupied these lands, and that while the old names remained, the dominant race was new. So the rapid growth of individuals into tribes (as of Midian, chap. xxv. 2) was the result of races of higher civilization and greater energy subduing feeble and less highly-developed tribes. Hence in verse 16 the sons of Ishmael are called "princes." We gather from this that Ishmael had gathered round him a body of men of the Semitic race, of whom large numbers were constantly on the move towards Egypt (chap. xii. 15), and by their aid had established his rule in Paran, and handed it on to his sons.

(16) By their towns, and by their castles. — Towns and castles in the wilderness of Paran there were none, but we know for certain that the first of these words signified an unwalled village. (See Lev. xxv. 31, where it is exactly described; also Ps. x. 8: Isa. xlii. 11.) It was, however, a settled and permanent place of dwelling. The other word rendered here castle, but used as the equivalent of tent in Ps. lxxiii. 25, is really a cluster of tents, the encampment of a tribe, and movable. It occurs in Num. xxxi. 10; I Chron. vi. 54; Ezek. xxv. 4. As is well known, the Arabs are divided into two classes—the dwellers in tents, who are ever moving from station to station, within certain limits, nevertheless, which they seldom pass over; and the agricultural class, who have fixed habitations, are looked upon as inferiors, and probably are the remains of a conquered race. To this day they pay a sort of rent, or black-mail, to the nobler Arabs. We find, then, this distinction already existing when this Toldoth was drawn up; the agricultural Arabs dwelling in unwalled villages, while the nomad tribes pitched now here, and now there, their clusters of black camels'-hair tents. And thus we have in these words proof that Ishmael and his subjects were not all upon the same level; for while he, his sons, and his noblest retainers would dwell in tents, the inhabitants of the villages would be men of inferior origin, compelled to submit themselves to him.

(15) Havilah was far to the south, on the Persian Gulf. (See chap. x. 29.)

Shur. — This was their western limit towards Egypt. (See chap. xvi. 7.) In 1 Sam. xv. 7 this same region is assigned to the Amalekites.

As thou goest toward Assyria. — This does not mean that Shur was on the route toward Assyria, but gives the eastern limit of the country inhabited by the descendants of Ishmael.

He died. — But the Hebrew is, he fell—that is, his lot fell; he settled there.

In the presence of. — This means to the east of all his brethren. Just as Assyria was regarded as lying to the north of Palestine, because on starting the traveller journeyed in that direction, so Arabia was considered to be on the east, for a similar reason. (But see Note on chap. xvi. 12.)
And these are the generations of Isaac, Abraham's son: Abraham begat Isaac; (20) and Isaac was forty years old when he took Rebekah to wife, the daughter of Bethuel the Syrian of Padan-aram, the sister to Laban the Syrian.

And Isaac intreated the Lord for his wife, because she was barren: and the Lord was intreated of him, and Rebekah his wife conceived. (21) And the children struggled together within her; and she said, If it be so, why am I thus? And she went to enquire of the Lord.

Two nations are in thy womb, and two manner of people shall be separated from thy bowels; And the one people shall be stronger than the other people; and the elder shall serve the younger.

And when her days were fulfilled, behold, there were twins in her womb. (22) And the first came out

The Töldôth Isaac (chaps. xxv. 19—xxxv. 29).

The Birth of Isaac's Sons.

Abraham begat Isaac. — The Töldôth in its original form gave probably a complete genealogy of Isaac, tracing up his descent to Shem, and showing thereby that the right of primogeniture belonged to him; but the inspired historian uses only so much of this as is necessary for tracing the development of the Divine plan of the children of Abraham.

The Syrian. — Really, the Aramaean, or descendant of Aram. (See chap. x. 22, 23.) The name of the district also correctly is "Paddan-Aram," and so far from being identical with Aram-Naharaim, in chap. xxiv. 10, it is distinctly the designation of the region immediately in the neighbourhood of Charran. The assertion of Genesis that it meant "Mesopotamia, with the desert to the west of the Euphrates, in opposition to the mountainous district towards the Mediterranean," is devoid of proof. (See Chwolson, Die Seabier, i. p. 304.) In Syria, the language of Charran, padana means a ploagh (I Sam. xiii. 20), or a yoke of oxen (Ibid. xi. 7); and this also suggests that it was the cultivated district close to the town. In Hosea xii. 12 it is said that "Jacob fled to the field of Aram;" but this is a very general description of the country in which he found refuge, and affords no basis for the assertion that Padan-aram was the level region. Finally, the assertion that it is an ancient name used by the Jehovah is an assertion only. It is the name of a special district, and the knowledge of it was the result of Jacob's long-continued stay there. Chwolson says that traces of the name still remain in Faddan and Tel Faddan, two places close to Charran, mentioned by Yacut, the Arabian geographer, who flourished in the thirteenth century.

Isaac intreated the Lord. — This barrenness lasted twenty years (verse 26), and must have greatly troubled Isaac; but it would also compel him to dwell much in thought upon the purpose for which he had been given to Abraham, and afterwards rescued from death upon the mount Jehovah-Jireh. And when offspring came, in answer to his earnest pleading of the promise, the delay would serve to impress upon both parents the religious significance of their existence as a separate race and family, and the necessity of training their children worthily. The derivation of the verb to intreat, from a noun signifying incense, is uncertain, but rendered probable by the natural connection of the idea of the ascending fragrance, and that of the prayer mounting heavenward (Rev. v. 8, viii. 4).

The children struggled together. — Two dissimilar races sprang from Abraham, but from mothers totally unlike; so, too, from the peaceful Isaac and she said, If it be so, why am I thus? And she went to enquire of the Lord. (23) And the Lord said unto her,

The second line shows that even in their earliest childhood her sons would be unlike in character and unfriendly in disposition; upon this follows their development into hostile nations, and the prediction that the son who started with the advantages of the birthright, the stronger physical nature, and superior strength in men and arms (chap. xxiii. 6), would, nevertheless, finally hold the inferior position. There can be no doubt that the secondary cause of the vaster development of Jacob was his being placed by Joseph in the fruitful Delta, where the Israelites were constantly joined by a stream of Semitic immigrants, whose movement towards Egypt is a perfectly authenticated fact of the history of those times. (See chap. xii. 15.)

Red. — Heb. adomim, a secondary reason for the name Edom. (See verse 90.)

All over like an hairy garment. — Heb, all of him—that is, completely—like a garment of hair; words rendered "a rough garment" in Zech. xiii. 4, where it red, all over like an hairy garment; and they called his name Esau. (29) And after that came his brother out, and his hand took hold on Esau's heel; and his name was called Jacob; and Isaac was three-score years old when she bare them.

(27) And the boys grew: and Esau was a cunning hunter, a man of the field; and Jacob was a plain man, dwelling in tents. (28) And Isaac loved Esau, because he did eat of his venison; but Rebekah loved Jacob.

(29) And Jacob sod pottage: and Esau came from the field, and he was faint:

is used of the jacket of sheepskin worn by the prophets. It appears, therefore, that Esau's body was entirely covered with red down, which developed in time into hair as coarse as that of a kid (chap. xxvii. 16), and betokened a strong and vigorous, but sensual nature.

Esau.—The Jewish commentators form this name from the verb to make, and render it well-made; but the usual explanation is hairy, from a word now extinct only in Arabic.

(29) His hand took hold on Esau's heel.—Usually there is a considerable interval—an hour or more—between the birth of twins; but here Jacob appeared without delay, following immediately upon his brother. This is expressed by the metaphorical phrase that his hand had hold on Esau's heel—that is, there was absolutely no interval between them. Though very rare, yet similar cases have been chronicled from time to time.

His name was called Jacob.—The name signifies one who follows at another's heels. It was Esau who first put upon it a bad meaning (chap. xxvii. 36), and this bad sense has been riveted to it by Jacob's own unworthy conduct. It is constantly so used even in the Bible. Thus in Hosen xii. 3—a passage quoted in defence of a literal explanation of the metaphor in this verse by those who are acquainted only with the English Version—the Hebrew has, he Jacobed, literally, heeled—that is, overreached, got the better by cunning of—his brother in the womb. This is the very meaning put upon the name by Esau, and in Jer. ix. 4 and elsewhere; but it is not well rendered by our word append, which contains a different metaphor, the planta being the sole of the foot; whereas to be at a person's heel is to be his determined pursuer, and one who on overtaking throws him down.

Development of the Characters of Esau and Jacob. Esau Sells his Birthright.

(27) The boys grew.—With advancing years came also the formation of their characters. Esau became a skilful hunter, a "man of the field": not a husbandman, but one who roamed over the open uncultivated wilderness (see chap. iv. 8) in search of game; but "Jacob was a plain man." This is a most inadequate rendering of a word translated perfect in Job i. 1; S; Ps. xxxvii. 37, &c., though this rendering is as much too strong as that in this verse is too weak. On chap. vi. 9, we have shown that the word conveys no idea of perfection or blamelessness, but only of general integrity. Both the word there and in chap. xvii. 1, and the slightly different form of it used here, should in all places be translated upright.

Dwelling in tents.—Esau equally had a tent for his abode, but Jacob stayed at home, following domestic occupations, and busied about the flocks and cattle. Hence he was the mother's darling, while Isaac preferred his more enterprising son. Thus the struggle between the twins led also to a divergence of feeling on the part of the parents. Throughout his history Jacob maintains this character, and appears as a man whose interests and happiness were centred in his home.

(28) Because he did eat of his venison.—Literally, because the venison—that is, the produce of Esau's hunting—was in his mouth; in our phrase, was to his taste—was what he liked. The diet of an Arab sheik is very simple (see Note on chap. xviii. 6); and Isaac, a man wanting in physical vigour and adventurousness—as is usually the case with the children of people far advanced in years—both admired the energy which Esau had inherited from Rebekah, and relished the fruits of it.

(29, 30) Jacob sod pottage.—The diverse occupations of the two youths led, in course of time, to an act fatal to Esau's character and well-being. Coming home one day weary and fainting with hunger, he found Jacob preparing a pottage of lentils. No sooner did the savoury food present itself to his thoughts than he cried out in haste, "Let me swallow, I pray, of the red, this red!" The verb expresses extreme eagerness, and he adds no noun whatever, but points to the steaming dish. And Jacob, seeing his brother's greediness and ravenous hunger, refuses to give him food until he has parted with the high and sacred prerogative which made him the inheritor of the Divine promise.

Therefore was his name called Edom.—Esau may have been called Edom, that is, Rufus, the red one, before, but after this act it ceased to be a mere allusive by-name, and became his ordinary appellation.

(30) He did eat and drink, and rose up, and went his way.—These words graphically describe Esau's complete indifference to the spiritual privileges of which he had demeaned himself. There is no regret, no sad feeling that he had prolonged his life at too high a cost. And if Jacob is cunning, and mean in the advantage he took of his brother, still he valued these privileges, and in the sequel he had his reward and his punishment. He was confirmed in the possession of the birthright, and became the progenitor of the chosen race, and of the Messiah; but henceforward his life was full of danger and difficulty. He CHAPTER XXVI.—(4) And there was a famine in the land, beside the first famine that was in the days of Abraham. And Isaac went unto Abimelech king of the Philistines unto Gerar.

(5) And the Lord appeared unto him, and said, Go not down into Egypt; dwell in the land which I shall tell thee of: (6) sojourn in this land, and I will be with thee, and will bless thee; for unto thee, and unto thy seed, I will give all these countries, and I will perform the oath which I sware unto Abraham thy father; (7) and I will make thy seed to multiply as the stars of heaven, and will give unto thy seed all these countries; and in thy seed shall all the nations of the earth be blessed; (8) because that Abraham obeyed my voice, and kept my charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws.

(8) And Isaac dwelt in Gerar: (9) and the men of the place asked him of his wife; and he said, She is my sister: for he feared to say, She is my wife; lest, said he, the men of the place should kill me for Rebekah; because she was fair to look upon. (10) And it came to pass, when he had been there a long time, that Abimelech king of the Philistines looked out at a window, and saw, and, behold, Isaac was sporting with Rebekah his wife. (11) And Abimelech called Isaac, and said, Behold, of a surety she is thy wife: and how saidst thou, She is my sister? And Isaac said unto him, Because I said, Lest I die for her. (12) And Abimelech said, What is this thou hast done unto us? one of the people might lightly have lien with thy wife, and thou shouldst have brought guiltiness upon us. (13) And Abimelech charged all his people, saying, He that toucheth this man or his wife shall surely be put to death.

(14) Then Isaac dwelt in that land, and had to flee from his brother’s enmity, and was perpetually the victim of fraud and the most cruel deceit. But gradually his character ripened for good. He ceased to be a scheming, worldly-minded Jacob, and became an Israel, and in his pious old age we see a man full of trust and faith in God, unworldly and unselfish, and animated by tender and loving feeling. Purified from his early infirmities, and with all his better nature strengthened and sanctified by sorrow, he shows himself worthy of his second name, and becomes "a prince with God."

XXVI.

ADVENTURES OF ISAAC AT GERAR.

(1) Isaac went . . . unto Gerar.—Following the stream of Semitic migration (chap. xii. 15), Isaac had originally purposed going to Egypt, but is commanded by God to abide in the land, and upon so doing he receives the assurance that he will be confirmed in the inheritance of the promises made to his father. Isaac was now dwelling at the well Laahai-Roi, and though the exact site of this place is unknown, yet it lay too far to the south for Isaac to have gone to Gerar on his direct way to Egypt. That the Lord appeared unto him.—Only once besides does Jehovah manifest himself to Isaac (verse 2b), and sixty years had now passed since the revelations recorded in chap. xxiii. Excepting to Abraham, it was only at rare and distant intervals that God spake to the patriarchs. The greater part of their lives was spent under the control of the same ordinary Providence as that which governs our actions now; but on special occasions God was pleased to confirm their faith in Him in a way not necessary now that we have had made known to us the whole counsel of God.

(3) These countries.—On the archaic form of the pronoun these, see Note on chap. xix. 8. The countries are enumerated in chap. xv. 19—21. For the "oath," see chap. xxii. 16; and for the metaphor, "as the stars," see chap. xv. 5.

(7) He said, She is my sister.—We have already seen that Abraham at Gerar showed no consciousness of having done wrong in denying his wife (chap. xx. 2), and we now find Isaac imitating his example with even less reason for his conduct. The circumstances are, however, different. It is the people who inquire about Isaac’s relation to Rebekah, and though she was "fair to look upon," yet no annoyance followed upon his denial of her. The king after a "long time" detects their intimacy; but there are no presents, and no marks of respect to Rebekah, and no friendship. It is only after long quarrels, during which Isaac is obliged to withdraw to a long distance from Gerar, that finally peace is made between them.

(8) Abimelech.—Upon this title of the Philistine monarchs see Note on chap. xxi. 22. As eighty years had elapsed since Abraham’s sojourn in Gerar, it is highly improbable that the same king was still reigning; but both king and people maintain on this occasion the good character previously deserved. The Philistines, however, at this period, were a feeble colony of strangers, and were kept in restraint by a sense of their weakness. They had received a vast accession of strength from abroad before they became formidable enemies of the Israelites at the end of the period of the Judges. (See chap. x. 14.)

(12) Isaac sowed in that land.—When Abraham planted a tamarisk-tree at Beer-sheba (chap. xxx. 33) it showed that he regarded the place as a permanent residence, which it was worth his while to adorn, and to provide for its increasing pleasantness. Isaac and Jacob took a still further step in advance towards a settled life when they began to cultivate plots of ground. At first, however, Isaac did no more than the Bedaween do at present; for they often sow a piece of land, wait till the crop is ripe, and then-re sophisticating habits. Permanently to till the soil is with them a mark of inferiority (chap. xxx. 16). But the tendency, both with Abraham and Isaac, had long been to remain in the region about Beer-sheba. Isaac had been driven thence by the famine, by which he had probably lost much of his cattle, and many even of his people. Apparently he was even so weakened thereby as to be no match for the Philistines of Gerar. His large harvest rescued him for his losses, and made him once more a prosperous man; and in due time Beer-sheba was again his home, and with settled habits agriculture was sure to begin.

An hundredfold.—The Heb. is, a hundred measures, but the word is unknown elsewhere, and the LXX. and Syriac read, a hundred of barley, measures being understood, as in Ruth iii. 15. Herodotus (Book i. 193) mentions two—and even three—hundredfold as possible in Babylonia; but our Lord seems to give one hundredfold as the extreme measure of productiveness in Palestine (Matt. xii. 8). Such a return, like Isaac’s, would be rare and extraordinary.

Great store of servants.—Marg. husbandry. In Job i. 3 the word is rendered household in the text, and husbandry again in the margin. Literally it means making employment, and answers to our word business. But if in a man’s life there is much activity and plenty to do, there must be people to do it, and profits made whereby to maintain them. And thus the translation, “great store of servants,” gives the sense; but we see besides that Isaac kept them all actively employed.

The wells.—In the East the digger of a well is regarded as a public benefactor; but the Philistines stopped those that Abraham had digged, probably because they regarded his possession of them, through confirmed by the covenant between him and Abimelech (chap. xx. 32), as an intrusion upon their rights as the people of the country. Envious, too, at the rapid increase of an alien’s wealth, they determined to drive Isaac away; and for this no expedient would be more effectual than the preventing him from procuring water for his cattle. Following upon this came an express command of the king to depart, which Isaac obeyed; for he had sought refuge there because of the famine, and had no right to continue at Gerar, if the people refused their hospitality.

The valley of Gerar.—The word nukal, rendered “valley,” means a narrow defile through which a summer torrent flows. In the bed of these streams water can generally be found by digging, and Isaac hoped that he was far enough from the city for the enemy to cease. But he was mistaken, though he seems for a short period to have been left in peace.

Isaac dug again the wells. —This activity of Isaac called forth anew the opposition of the Philistines. His first well was in the wady of Gerar, and was the more valuable because it was not the mere remains of the water of the torrent, but was fed by a spring, as we learn from its being called “a well of living water.” But though Isaac had a right to these wells by reason of the old covenant between his father and the king, yet when his claim was resisted he abandoned the well, but in token of displeasure called it Eshek, contention. When compelled to resign his next well he called it by a harsher name—Sitnah, enmity; for their opposition was developing into bitter persecution. And now, wearied with the strife, he withdrew far away, and the Philistines, having gained their end, followed him no farther. In quiet, therefore, he again dug a well, and called it Rehoboth, wide open spaces. It has been identified with one in the wady Ruhabeh, now stopped up, but originally twelve feet in diameter and ended with beams and lintels. It is to the south of Beer-sheba, at a distance of 83 leagues, and about forty miles away from Gerar.

He went up from thence to Beer-sheba.—This was a very serious act on Isaac’s part. He leaves the solitudes where he had found a refuge from the enmity of the Philistines, and returns to a place scarcely five leagues distant from their city. Should the old enmity revive, it may now take the form of actual war. And next, he does not go back to the well Lahan-Roi, where he had so long resided, but to Covenant made between

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Genesis, XXVI.</th>
<th>Abimelech and Isaac.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
</table>

...sent thee away in peace: thou art now the blessed of the Lord. (30) And he made them a feast, and they did eat and drink. (31) And they rose up betimes in the morning, and swore one to another: and Isaac sent them away, and they departed from him in peace.

(32) And it came to pass the same day, that Isaac's servants came, and told him concerning the well which they had digged, and said unto him, We have found water. (33) And he called it Shebah: therefore the name of the city is Beer-sheba unto this day.

(34) And Esau was forty years old when he took to wife Judith the daughter of Beer-sheba, his father's favourite home. It was a claim on his part to the rights and inheritance of Abraham, and the claim was admitted. The same night Jehovah appeared to him, bids him put away his fears, and renews to him the promises which were his by the right of his birth.

My servant Abraham.—A title of high honour and significance, given to Moses repeatedly, to Joshua (Josh. xxiv. 29), to Israel (Isa. xli. 8), and to the Messias (Isa. lii. 13). It means God's prime minister and vicegerent.

He built an altar.—In returning to Beer-sheba, Isaac had apparently faced the dangers of his position, through confidence in the promises made to his father, with whom he identified himself by taking up his abode at his home. And no sooner are the promises confirmed to him than he restores the public worship of God in the very place where Abraham had established it (chap. xxi. 33).

Digged a well.—The word is not that previously used in the chapter, but one that signifies the re-opening of the well which Abraham had dug, but which had become stopped by violence or neglect.

Abimelech went to him.—The return of Isaac to Beer-sheba was a matter of serious importance also to Abimelech. The Philistines were themselves an alien race, and an alliance between Isaac and Ishmael, and others of the Semitic stock, might end in their expulsion from the country. Abraham had also been confederate with the Amorites (chap. xiv. 13), and on friendly terms with the Hitites (chap. xxiii. 6), the two most powerful races of Canaan, and they might be ready to aid his son. When, then, Isaac thus retraced his steps, Abimelech, uncertain of Isaac's purpose, determined to offer peace and friendship, and to propose the renewal of the old covenant which had existed between Abraham and the people of Gerar.

Ahuzzath.—This is one of several points peculiar to this narrative; but it is uncertain whether it be a proper name, or whether, with the Targum and Jerome, we are to understand by it a company, that is, an escort of friends. If it be a proper name, the rendering should be, Ahuzzath, his friend, that is, his confidant and privy councillor.

Phichol.—See Note on chap. xxi. 22.

Wherefore come ye to me?—Isaac's return had brought matters to a crisis, and the king must now decide whether there was to be peace or war.

Let there be now an oath.—The word literally signifies a curse. Each side uttered an imprecation, with the prayer that it might fall upon himself if he broke the terms of the covenant.

Let us make a covenant.—Heb. cut. (See Note on chap. xv. 10, 18; where also see the explanation of the use of the word curse.)

The Lord was with thee . . . blessed of the Lord.—This use of the word "Lord," that is, Jehovah, is very remarkable. In chap. xxi. 22, 23 Abimelech uses the term Elohim, God, in accordance with the careful discrimination in the use of the names of the Deity often previously referred to. By the long residence, first of Abraham and then of Isaac, in their territory, the Philistines would indeed have become better acquainted with the religion of the patriarchs; but as Jehovah was not their special title for the Deity (Exod. vi. 3), we must conclude, with Rosenmuller, that it was Moses who wrote Jehovah in the place of the word actually employed by Abimelech. We gather, however, that the king did not use any generic or heathen names of the Deity, but that whereby the patriarchs worshipped their covenant God, and his so doing was probably intended as an act of homage to Him.

We have found water.—As there are two wells at Beer-sheba, it is uncertain whether this was Abraham's well, re-opened by Isaac (see verse 25), or a new one.

Therefore the name of the city is Beer-sheba unto this day.—There was no city at this time at Beer-sheba, but one is mentioned at the conquest of Canaan by Joshua (Josh. xv. 25). This note, as is the ease generally with those which speak of a thing existing "unto this day," was added by Ezra and the men of the Great Synagogue, after the return from Babylon (comp. chap. xxi. 14); and its meaning is that, whereas Abraham's name had been forgotten while the place lay desolate, this remarkable coincidence of the water being again found, just when the covenant had been confirmed by the customary sevenfold sacrifice, so impressed the minds of the people that the title of Beer-sheba never again passed into oblivion.

Esau's Marriage with Canaanitish Women.

(34) Esau was forty years old.—He was therefore of exactly the same age as Isaac was when, sixty years before, he married Rebekah. But by thus intermarrying with idolaters Esau violated the great principle laid down by Abraham (chap. xxiv. 3), forfeited thereby his birthright, and, as such marriages were illegal, is even CHAPTER XXVII. — (1) And it came to pass, that when Isaac was old, and his eyes were dim, so that he could not see, he called Esau his eldest son, and said unto him, My son: and he said unto him, Behold, here am I. (2) And he said, Behold now, I am old, I know not the day of my death: (3) now therefore take, I pray thee, thy weapons, thy quiver and thy bow, and go out to the field, and take me some venison; (4) and

For Jacob, it must be said that he sought no earthly good. It was not the elder brother's share of the father's wealth that he wanted. All that was Isaac's he resigned to Esau, and went away to push his fortunes elsewhere. Even when he returned with the substance he had gotten in Paddan-aram, he was no match for Esau (chap. xxxiii. 1), though Isaac was still living. While, too, Esau violated the family law laid down by Abraham, Jacob conformed to it. By marrying Canaanitish women, Esau forfeited by his own act the birthright which previously he had sold; for his children, being illegitimate (Heb. xii. 16), could not inherit the promise. What was utterly wrong in Rebekah's and Jacob's conduct was that they used unseemly artifices to do that which should have been left to God; and Isaac was equally wrong in trying to make void and annul the clear intimation of prophecy (chap. xxv. 23).

ISAAC WAS OLD.—Isaac was now 117 years of age, but he lived to be 190 (chap. xxxv. 25). (See Exensors on Chronology of Jacob's Life at end of this book.) He had thus sixty-three more years to live, but not only him (verse 21), but Esau also expected his speedy decease (verse 41). Probably, therefore, his failing eyesight was the result of some acute disorder, which so enfeebled his general health that he had grown de dependent, and thought his death near. But evidently he recovered, and attained to a good old age. It seems, however, that though the lives of the patriarchs were so long extended, yet that their bodily vigour slowly decayed through the latter portion of their days. Jacob when but 130 speaks of himself as a grey-haired old man, already upon the brink of the grave (chaps. xiii. 38, xlvii. 9). Moreover, the term old is used in a very general sense in the Old Testament, and thus Samuel is described as old in 1 Sam. viii. 1, when we should have spoken of him as at most middle-aged.

(5) Thy quiver.—This word does not occur elsewhere, and is rendered in the Targum and Syriac a sword. As it is derived from a root signifying to hang, it probably means, like our word hanger, a sort of knife; but all that we can say for certain is that it was some sort of hunting implement.

Take me some venison.—The Heb. is hunt me a hunting. "Venison," the Latin venatio, means anything taken by hunting.

(6) Savoury meat.—On the rare occasions on which an Arab sheik tastes flesh, it is flavoured with almonds, pistachio nuts, and raisins. It would thus not be easy for Isaac to distinguish the taste of the flesh of a kid from that of an antelope. As the Arabs always spare their own flocks and herds, the capture of a wild animal gives them the greater pleasure, and a feast thus provided seemed to the patriarch a proper occasion for the solemn decision which son should inherit the promises made to Abraham.

That my soul may bless thee.—We gather from the solemn blessing given to his sons by Jacob (chap. xlix.) that this was a prophetic act, by which make me savoury meat, such as I love, and bring it to me, that I may eat; that my soul may bless thee before I die.

(5) And Rebekah heard when Isaac spake to Esau his son. And Esau went to the field to hunt for venison, and to bring it. (6) And Rebekah spake unto Jacob her son, saying, Behold, I heard thy father speak unto Esau thy brother, saying, (7) Bring me venison, and make me savoury meat, that I may eat, and bless thee before the Lord before my death. (8) Now therefore, my son, obey my voice according to that which I command thee. (9) Go now to the flock, and fetch me from thence two good kids of the goats; and I will make them savoury meat for thy father, such as he loveth: (10) and thou shalt bring it to thy father, that he may eat, and that he may bless thee before his death.

(11) And Jacob said to Rebekah his mother, Behold, Esau my brother is a hairy man, and I am a smooth man: 1

the patriarchs, under the influence of the Spirit, and in expectation of death, decided to which son should belong the birthright. Jacob when dying bestowed it on Judah (verses 8—12). But here Isaac resisted the Spirit; for the clear warning had been given that “the elder should serve the younger” (chap. xxv. 23). Isaac may have been moved to this act by indignation at the manner in which Esan had been induced to sell the birthright, and in annulling that sale he would have been within his rights; but he was not justified in disregarding the voice of prophecy, nor in his indifference to Esan’s violation of the Abrahamic law in marrying heathen women. And thus he becomes the victim of craft and treachery, while Jacob is led on to a deed which was the cause of endless grief to him and Rebekah, and has stained his character for ever. But had Jacob possessed the same high standard of honour as distinguished David afterwards, he would equally have received the blessing, but without the sin of deception practised upon his own father.

(5) Rebekah heard.—She was possibly present when Isaac gave the order, and he may even have wished her to know his determination to give the blessing to his favourite son. But the words filled her with dismay. She had, no doubt, treasured the prophecy of Jacob’s ultimate superiority, and now it seemed as if the father would reverse it. Had her faith been pure and exalted, she would have known that God would fulfil His word without her help; but all alike act from unworthy motives, and all have their meed of punishment. But here the fault began with Isaac, and Rebekah probably considered that she was preventing a grievous wrong.

(7) Before the Lord (Jehovah).—Rebekah has been accused of inserting words which Isaac had not used; but it is unreasonable to suppose that more is recorded of Isaac’s address to his son than the main sense. Still, these words had a meaning to Jacob which they did not bear to Esau. The latter cared for his father’s blessing, partly from natural affection, but chiefly because of the temporal benefits connected with it. To Jacob its value consisted in the covenant between Jehovah and the family of Abraham.

(9) Two good kids.—These would be about equal to one antelope or animal of the larger game. After Isaac had eaten of the flesh, so solemn an occasion would doubtless be marked by a feast for those at least, in the foremost tents, if not for all the household and followers of Isaac.

(13) Upon me be thy curse.—No curse followed upon their conduct; but, on the contrary, Isaac acknowledged the substantial justice of the act of Rebekah and her son, and confirmed Jacob in the possession of the blessing (verse 33). It seems strange, nevertheless, that neither of them had any scruples at the immorality of the deed, but apparently thought that as the end was right they were justified in using falsehood and treachery.

(15) Goodly raiment.—It has been supposed that the elder son held a sort of priestly office in the household, and as Isaac’s sight was growing dim, that Esan ministered for him at sacrifices. Evidently the clothing was something special, and such as was peculiar to Esan: for ordinary raiment, however handsome, would not have been kept in the mother’s tent, but in that of Esan or of one of his wives.

(16) The skins of the kids.—In hot countries the coats of animals are far less thick and coarse than in cold climates, and some species of Oriental goats are famous for their soft, silky wool. But in those cases in which men have their bodies covered with hair, it is by no means of a delicate texture. In Cant. iv. i Solomon’s hair is compared to that of a flock of goats.

(19) Arise . . . sit and eat.—The Hebrews at this time, and for centuries, sat at their meals (1 Sam. xx. 25). It was from the Romans that they learned to recline at table, as we find was their custom in the Gospels. It is a mistake, moreover, to suppose that Isaac was a bedridden old man, for Jacob bids him
bested me: arise, I pray thee, sit and eat of my venison, that thy soul may bless me." (29) And Isaac said unto his son, How is it that thou hast found it so quickly, my son? And he said, Because the Lord thy God brought it to me. (30) And Isaac said unto Jacob, Come near, I pray thee, that I may feel thee, my son, whether thou be my very son Esau or not. (31) And Jacob went near unto Isaac his father; and he felt him, and said, The voice is Jacob's voice, but the hands are the hands of Esau. (32) And he discerned him not, because his hands were hairy, as his brother Esau's hands: so he blessed him. (33) And he said, Art thou my very son Esau? And he said, I am. (34) And he said, Bring it near to me, and I will eat of my son's venison, that my soul may bless thee. And he brought it near to him, and he did eat: and he brought him wine, and he drank. (35) And his father Isaac said unto him, Come near now, and kiss me, my son. (36) And he came near, and kissed him: arise and set himself. Nor does he help him, though his sight was weak. It is only when commanded to draw near that he lets his father touch him. (31) Because the Lord thy God brought it to me.—Jacob does not keep up his acting well here, for it was not in accordance with Esau's character to see anything providential in his success in hunting. This may have helped to arouse Isaac's suspicions, who immediately proceeds to examine him. (32) Come near . . . that I may feel thee.—Besides the answer, in a style very different from Esau's way of thinking, Isaac was surprised at the short delay in bringing the savoury meat; for the game had to be sought at a distance away from the cattle-pastures. Though, too, the voices of the twins had a certain degree of similarity, yet they would also have their peculiarities, and Isaac detected the difference. But the artifice of the kid-skins fitted, no doubt, cleverly to Jacob's hands and neck saved him from detection; for after Isaac had passed his hands over him, his doubt entirely vanished. (33) Come near now, and kiss me, my son.—This was the solemn preparation for the giving of the blessing. Isaac's suspicions had now quite passed away. He had eaten and drank, and the time had now come for the decision which son was to inherit the promise. (34) As the smell of a field.—From the abundance of aromatic plants, the pastures of Palestine are peculiarly fragrant; but Isaac, deceived by the scent of Esau's own garments, intended probably to contrast the pure sweetness of one whose life was spent in the open field with the less pleasant odour which Jacob would bring with him from the cattle-shed. (35) Therefore God give thee.—Heb., And the Elohim give thee. Here, as not unfrequently is the case, the name Elohim follows immediately upon that of Jehovah. As the blessings of dew and fertile land are the gifts of the God of nature, the use of the title Elohim is in accordance with the general rule. The fatness of the earth.—Heb., the fatnesses: that is, the fat places. In the countries where Esau and Jacob were to have their homes, the land varies from districts of extraordinary fertility to regions of barren rock and sterile sand. It was these rich fields which Isaac's blessing conveyed to Jacob. Wine.—Not the word used in verse 25, but tiroth, the unfermented juice of the grape. It thus goes properly with corn, both being the natural produce of the field. (36) Let people serve thee.—Heb., peoples. Up to this point the blessing had been general, but now Isaac bestows the birthright, carrying with it widespread dominion, precedence over all other members of the family, and special blessedness. The phrases "thy brethren" and "thy mother's sons" include all nations sprung from Abraham, and all possible offshoots from Isaac's own descendants. Cursed . . . and blessed.—This is a special portion of the blessing given to Abraham (chap. xii., 3); but Isaac stops short with this, and does not bestow the greater privilege that "in him should all families of the earth be blessed" (chaps. xii., 3, xxii., 18, xxvi., 4). The reason for this may be that it was a blessing which God must grant, and not man: or he may have had misgivings that it was more than Esau was worthy to receive; or, finally, his whole counsel being wrong, he could see and value only the earthly and lower prerogatives of the birthright. Subsequently he bestows the Abrahamic blessing upon Jacob in general terms (chap. xxviii., 4); but this, its highest privilege, is confirmed to Jacob by Jehovah Himself (ibid., verse 14). (37) He also had made.—Heb., he also made. Esau returned just as Jacob was leaving Isaac's presence. There would still be some considerable delay before the captured game was made into savoury meat.
The Treachery

GENESIS, XXVII.

of Jacob and Rebekah.

make me savoury meat, such as I love, and bring it to me, that I may eat; that my soul may bless thee before I die.

(5) And Rebekah heard when Isaac spake to Esau his son. And Esau went to the field to hunt for venison, and to bring it. (6) And Rebekah spake unto Jacob her son, saying, Behold, I heard thy father speak unto Esau thy brother, saying, (7) Bring me venison, and make me savoury meat, that I may eat, and bless thee before the Lord before my death. (8) Now therefore, my son, obey my voice according to that which I command thee. (9) Go now to the flock, and fetch me of thence two good kids of the goats; and I will make them savoury meat for thy father, such as he loveth: (10) and thou shalt bring it to thy father, that he may eat, and that he may bless thee before his death.

(11) And Jacob said to Rebekah his mother, Behold, Esau my brother is a hairy man, and I am a smooth man:

the patriarchs, under the influence of the Spirit, and in expectation of death, decided to which son should belong the birthright. Jacob when dying bestowed it on Judah (verses 8—12). But here Isaac resisted the Spirit; for the clear warning had been given that "the elder should serve the younger" (chap. xxv. 23). Isaac may have been moved to this act by indignation at the manner in which Esau had been induced to sell the birthright, and in annulling that sale he would have been within his rights; but he was not justified in disregarding the voice of prophecy, nor in his indifference to Esau's violation of the Abrahamic law in marrying heathen women. And thus he becomes the victim of craft and treachery, while Jacob is led on to a deed which was the cause of endless grief to him and Rebekah, and has stained his character for ever. But had Jacob possessed the same high standard of honour as distinguished David afterwards, he would equally have received the blessing, but without the sin of deception practised upon his own father.

(6) Rebekah heard. — She was possibly present when Isaac gave the order, and he may even have wished her to know his determination to give the blessing to his favourite son. But the words filled her with dismay. She had, no doubt, treasured the prophecy of Jacob's ultimate superiority, and now it seemed as if the father would reverse it. Had her faith been pure and exalted, she would have known that God would fulfill His word without her help; but all alike act from unworthy motives, and all have their need of punishment. But here the fault began with Isaac, and Rebekah probably considered that she was preventing a grievous wrong.

(7) Before the Lord (Jehovah). — Rebekah has been accused of inserting words which Isaac had not used; but it is unreasonable to suppose that more is recorded of Isaac's address to his son than the main sense. Still, these words had a meaning to Jacob which they did not bear to Esau. The latter cared for his father's blessing, partly from natural affection, but chiefly because of the temporal benefits connected with it. To Jacob its value consisted in the covenant between Jehovah and the family of Abraham.

(9) Two good kids. — These would be about equal to one antelope or animal of the larger game. After Isaac had eaten of the flesh, so solemn an occasion would doubtless be marked by a feast for those at least, in the foremost tents, if not for all the household and followers of Isaac.

(13) Upon me be thy curse. — No curse followed upon their conduct; but, on the contrary, Isaac acknowledged the substantial justice of the act of Rebekah and her son, and confirmed Jacob in the possession of the blessing (verse 33). It seems strange, nevertheless, that neither of them had any scruples at the immorality of the deed, but apparently thought that as the end was right they were justified in using falsehood and treachery.

(15) Goodly raiment. — It has been supposed that the elder son held a sort of priestly office in the household, and as Isaac's sight was growing dim, that Esau ministered for him at sacrifices. Evidently the clothing was something special, and such as was peculiar to Esau; for ordinary raiment, however handsome, would not have been kept in the mother's tent, but in that of Esau or of one of his wives.

(16) The skins of the kids. — In hot countries the coats of animals are far less thick and coarse than in cold climates, and some species of Oriental goats are famous for their soft, silky wool. But in those cases in which men have their bodies covered with hair, it is by no means of a delicate texture. In Cant. iv. 1 Solomon's hair is compared to that of a flock of goats.

(19) Arise . . . sit and eat. — The Hebrews at this time, and for centuries, sat at their meals (1 Sam. xx. 25). It was from the Romans that they learned to recline at table, as we find was their custom in the Gospels. It is a mistake, moreover, to suppose that Isaac was a bedridden old man, for Jacob bids him and he smelled the smell of his raiment, and blessed him, and said,

See, the smell of my son is as the smell of a field which the Lord hath blessed: (29) Therefore God give thee of the dew of heaven, and the fatness of the earth, and plenty of corn and wine:

(29) let people serve thee, and nations bow down to thee: be lord over thy brethren, and let thy mother's sons bow down to thee: cursed be every one that curseth thee, and blessed be he that blesseth thee.

(30) And it came to pass, as soon as Isaac had made an end of blessing Jacob, and Jacob was yet scarce gone out from the presence of Isaac his father, that Esau his brother came in from his hunting. (31) And he also had made savoury meat, and brought it unto his father, and said unto his father, Let my father arise, and eat of his son's venison, that thy soul may bless me. (32) And Isaac his father said unto him, Who art thou? And he said, I am thy are the gifts of the God of nature, the use of the title Elohim is in accordance with the general rule.

The fatness of the earth.—Heb., the fatnesses; that is, the fat places. In the countries where Essau and Jacob were to have their homes, the land varies from districts of extraordinary fertility to regions of barren rock and sterile sand. It was these rich fields which Isaac's blessing conveyed to Jacob.

Wine.—Not the word used in verse 25, but tirosh, the unfermented juice of the grape. It thus goes properly with corn, both being the natural produce of the field.

Let people serve thee.—Heb., peoples. Up to this point the blessing had been general, but now Isaac bestows the birthright, carrying with it widespread dominion, precedence over all other members of the family, and special blessedness. The phrases "thy brethren" and "thy mother's sons" include all nations sprung from Abraham, and all possible offshoots from Isaac's own descendants.

Cursed . . . and blessed.—This is a special portion of the blessing given to Abraham (chap. xii. 3); but Isaac stops short with this, and does not bestow the greater privilege that "in him should all families of the earth be blessed" (chaps. xii. 3, xiii. 18, xxvi. 4). The reason for this may be that it was a blessing which God must grant, and not man; or he may have had misgivings that it was more than Essau was worthy to receive; or, finally, his whole conduct being wrong, he could see and value only the earthly and lower prerogatives of the birthright. Subsequently he bestows the Abrahamic blessing upon Jacob in general terms (chap. xxviii. 4); but this, its highest privilege, is confirmed to Jacob by Jehovah Himself (ibid., verse 14).

(31) He also had made.—Heb., he also made. Esau returned just as Jacob was leaving Isaac's presence. There would still be some considerable delay before the captured game was made into savoury meat. unto Laban, son of Bethuel the Syrian, the brother of Rebekah, Jacob's and Esan's mother.
(6) When Esau saw that Isaac had blessed Jacob, and sent him away to Padi-an-aram, to take him a wife from there; and that as he blessed him he gave him a charge, saying, Thou shalt not take a wife of the daughters of Canaan; (7) and that Jacob obeyed his father and his mother, and was gone to Padi-an-aram; (8) and Esau seeing that the daughters of Canaan 1 pleased not Isaac his father; (9) then went Esau unto Ishmael, and took unto the wives which he had Mahalath the daughter of Ishmael Abraham's son, the sister of Nebajoth, to be his wife.
(10) And Jacob went out from Beersheba, and went toward Haran. (11) And he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and lay down in that place to sleep. (12) And he dreamed, and beheld a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached to heaven: and beheld the angels of ance with the Oriental manner of writing, which, moreover, is very careful in impressing all matters of family relation on the mind. (Comp. chap. xxv. 12.)

It is worthy of notice that as Jacob has now been conformed in the possession of the birthright by the father as well as by the mother, his name is placed first.

ESAU MARRIES A DAUGHTER OF ISHMAEL.
(6) When Esau.—The solemn transfer of the birthright to Jacob, and Isaac's complete assent thereto, must have been the cause of no little grief to Esau, and evidently it made him feel that he had greatly contributed to this result by his own illegitimate marriages. When, then, he sees Jacobs sent away to obtain a wife, in accordance with the rule established by Abraham, he determines also to conform to it, and marries a daughter of Ishmael. She is called Bashumath in chap xxxvi. 3, and described in both places as "the sister of Nebajoth," in order to show that as Nebajoth "the firstborn" (chap. xxv. 13) was undoubtedly the son of Ishmael by his first wife, "whom Hagar took for him out of the land of Egypt " (chap.
xxx. 21), so also Mahalath shared in this precedence, and was not the daughter of any of Ishmael's subsequent wives, or of a concubine.

JACOB'S DREAM.
(10) And Jacob.—Though this history is called the Toldoth Isaac, yet it is really the history of Jacob, just as the Toldoth Torah was the history of Abraham, and the Toldoth Jacob, beginning at chap. xxxvii. 2, is the history of Joseph. Up to this time all had been preparation, but now at length Jacob is confirmed in the possession of the birthright, and made the heir of the Abrahamic blessing; and henceforward his fortunes solely occupy the inspired narrator, though Isaac had still sixty-three years to live. (See Note on chap. xi. 27.)
(11) He lighted upon a certain place.—Heb., he lighted upon the place. The article probably signifies that it was the place appointed for the revelation, though lighted upon by Jacob by chance. As it lay twelve miles north of Jerusalem, in the mountains of Ephraim, Jacob had already been at least four days on the route (see Note on chap. xxii. 4); and though we are not to suppose that Isaac would send away the son who was heir of the blessing without a few trusty servants (nor does the expression in chap. xxxii. 10 require it), yet Jacob would none the less feel the solemnity of the journey, and the difficulties which surrounded him.
Well may he have asked whether El Shaddai would confirm him in the possession of that which he had defiled by fraud and cunning. And thus, meditating much and praying much, he had in those four days drawn near to God, and is at last accepted. The interest in Jacob's life lies in the gradual improvement and progress of his character. Religion was always a reality with him; but at first it was of a low type, and marked by duplicity and earthly scioning. His schemes succeed, but bring with them sorrow and trial; and trial purifies him, and gradually he advances into a region of selfless and holy piety. Though to the last he was a mau sagious, and full of expedients, yet the nobler part of his character finally had the supremacy.

He took of the stones . . . .—Heb., he took one of the stones of the place, and put it as his bolder.

And Jacob went out from Beersheba, and went toward Haran.
(10) And Jacob went out from Beersheba, and went toward Haran. (11) And
he lighted upon a certain place, and tarried there all night, because the sun was set; and he took of the stones of that place, and put them for his pillows, and
lay down in that place to sleep. (12) And
he dreamed, and beheld a ladder set up on the earth, and the top of it reached
to heaven: and beheld the angels of

(12) Behold a ladder . . . .—Isaac had confirmed Jacob in the possession of the blessing before he started on his long journey, but it was necessary that he should also have the Divine ratification of his appointment; for the chief privilege was the covenant with God previously confirmed to Isaac, his father (chap. xvii. 19—21). Day after day, then, he travels forward, auxions and oppressed, feeling as he went farther from his home the responsibilities attendant upon that birthright which he had coveted so eagerly. His lot was now a repetition of that of Abraham; but he had travelled from Haran with a noble following, and by express command. Jacob had at most but a few attendants, and no voice from God had ever as yet reached him. But faith in Him was growing strong, and the Divine ratification to him of the Abrahamic covenant was at length vouchsafed. In his sleep he sees a ladder, or staircase, rising from the ground at his side, and reaching up to heaven. It tells him that heaven and earth are united, and that there is a way from one to the other. Upon these stairs "messengers of Elohim are ascending and descending," carrying up to God men's prayers, and the tale of their wants and sorrows, of their faith and hope and trust; and bringing down to them help and comfort and blessing. At the head of the ladder Jehovah himself stands. The word is that God's Promise to Jacob.

GENESIS, XXVIII.

The House of God.

God ascending and descending on it. (13) And, behold, the Lord stood above it, and said, I am the Lord God of Abraham thy father, and the God of Isaac: the land wherein thou liest, to thee will I give it, and to thy seed; (14) and thy seed shall be as the dust of the earth, and thou shalt spread abroad to the west, and to the east, and to the north, and to the south: and in thee and in thy seed shall all the families of the earth be blessed. (15) And, behold, I am with thee, and will keep thee in all places whither thou goest, and will bring thee again into this land; for I will not leave thee, until I have done that which I have spoken to thee of.

(16) And Jacob awaked out of his sleep, and he said, Surely the Lord is in this place; and I knew it not. (17) And he was afraid, and said, How dreadful is this place! this is none other but the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven.

(18) And Jacob rose up early in the morning, and took the stone that he had put for his pillows, and set it up for a pillar, and poured oil upon the top of it. (19) And he called the name of that place Beth-el: but the name of that city was called Luz at the first. (20) And Jacob vowed a vow, saying, If God will be with me, and will keep me in this way that I go, and will give me bread to eat, and raiment to put on, (21) so that I come again to my father's house in peace; then shall the Lord be my God:

(22) and this stone, which I have set for a

used in chap. xxiv. 13, and signifies that the Deity was not there accidentally, but that He holds there His permanent station. Finally, Jehovah from His heavenly post confirms to Jacob all the promises made from the time when Abraham left Ur of the Chaldees, and assures him of His constant presence and protection.

It has been pointed out that each of the three stages in the dream has emphasis given to it by the word behol; and that this rises to a climax at the third repetition, when the covenant God is seen stationed at the head of this pathway between earth and heaven. But besides this, the value of Jacob in Jehovah's sight arises now from his being the appointed ancestor of the Messiah, in whom all the families of the earth were to be blessed (verse 14). Christ, too, is the Way symbolised by this ladder (John xiv. 6), and the bridge of union between the material and the spiritual world (1 Tim. ii. 5). Our Lord, accordingly, Himself claims that "the angels of God ascend and descend upon Him" (John i. 51).

Surely the Lord (Jehovah) is in this place.

—Jacob was not unaware of the omnipresence of the Deity; what astonished him was that Jehovah should thus reveal Himself far away from the shrines where He was worshipped. Rebekah had gone to one of these to inquire of Jehovah (chap. xxv. 22), and probably to a shrine in the very neighbourhood of the place where Jacob was sleeping (chap. xii. 8). But first Abraham, and then Isaac, had for so long made Beer-sheba their home, that Jacob probably knew little about the sanctity of the spot, and felt himself far away from all the religious associations of his youth, and from that "presence of Jehovah" which in antiquity times had also been supposed to be confined to certain localities (chap. iv. 11). But one great object of the dream was to show that Jehovah watches over the whole earth, and that messengers to and fro come from Him and return unto Him.

How dreadful. The manifestation of God must always inspire awe and dread, but not fear: for where He reveals Himself, there is "the gate of heaven"—the appointed entrance for prayer now, and for admission to the glorified life hereafter.

Jacob . . . took the stone . . . and set it up for a pillar. In so doing, Jacob's object was to mark the spot where so important a communication had been made to him. But besides its use as a memorial, it would enable him to identify the place upon his return, and pay there his vows. And as oil was the symbol of the dedication of a thing to holy use, he pours oil upon the top of it.

Beth-el . . . Luz.—In Josh. xvi. 1, 2, we find that Luz and Beth-el were distinct places, though near one another; and with this agrees the present passage. For plainly, Jacob and his attendants did not go inside the city, but slept on the open ground; and as they would carry their provisions with them, they would need no supplies from its Canaanite inhabitants. Probably at the time of Joshua's conquest Beth-el was rather a holy place than a town, and when Ephraim seized upon Luz and put the people to the sword (Judges i. 25-26), the victors transferred the name of Bethel to it. Thus the spot where Jacob slept would not be the town of Bethel, but some place a mile or two away from it.

Then shall the Lord (Jehovah) be my God. This is a false translation, and gives a wrong sense. Jacob, in his vow, which implies no doubt on his part, but is his acceptance of the terms of the covenant, says: If Elohim will be with me, and will protect me on this journey that I go, and will give me bread to eat and clothing to wear, and if I come again in peace to my father's house, and Jehovah will be my Elohim, then this stone which I have set up as a pillar shall be Beth-Elohim; and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely pay thee tithes." Verses 20 and 21 are a recapitulation of the mercies of which he was to be the recipient, while in verse 22 Jacob states what shall be his vow of gratitude.

But what was a Beth-Elohim? It has been supposed that it was a sort of cromlech, set up to be itself an object of adoration. Attention has also been called to the Baithyla, or stones "possessed of a soul," which the Phenicians are said by Ensebis (Paep. Eroog. i. 10) to have worshipped; and it has been thought, with some probability, that the word is a corrupt form of the Hebrew Beth-Elohim. These Baithyla, however, were meteoric stones, and their sanctity arose from their having fallen from heaven. Stones, moreover, set up at first simply as memorials may in time have been worshipped, and hence the pro-pillar, shall be God's house: and of all that thou shalt give me I will surely give the tenth unto thee.

CHAPTER XXIX.—(1) Then Jacob went on his journey, and came into the land of the 2 people of the east. (2) And he looked, and behold a well in the field, and, lo, there were three flocks of sheep lying by it; for out of that well they watered the flocks: and a great stone was upon the well's mouth. (3) And thither were all the flocks gathered: and they rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the sheep, and put the stone again upon the well's mouth in his place. (4) And Jacob said unto them, My brethren, whence be ye? And they said, Of Haran are we. (5) And he said unto them, Know ye Laban the son of Nahor? And they said, We know him. (6) And he said unto them, Is he well? And they said, He is well: and, behold, Rachel his daughter cometh with the sheep. (7) And he said, Lo, it is yet high day, neither is it time that the cattle should be gathered together: water ye the sheep, and go and feed them. (8) And they said, We cannot, until all the flocks be gathered together, and till they roll the stone from the well's mouth; then we water the sheep. (9) And while he yet spake with them, Rachel came with her father's sheep: for she kept them. (10) And it came to pass, when Jacob saw Rachel the daughter of Laban his mother's brother, and the sheep of Laban his mother's brother, that Jacob went near, and rolled the stone from the well's mouth, and watered the flock of Laban his mother's brother. (11) And Jacob kissed Rachel, and lifted up his voice, and wept. (12) And Jacob told Rachel that he was her father's brother, and that he was Rebekah's son; and she ran and told her father. (13) And it came to pass, when Laban heard the tidings of Jacob his sister's son, that he ran to meet him, and embraced him, and kissed him, and brought him to his house. And he told Laban all these things. (14) And Laban said to him, Surely thou art my bone and my flesh. And he abode with him the space of a month.

(15) And Laban said unto Jacob, Because thou art my brother, shouldest thou therefore serve me for nought? tell me, what shall thy wages be? (16) And Laban had two daughters: the name of the elder was Leah, and the name of the younger was Rachel. (17) Leah was tender-eyed; but Rachel was beautiful and well favoured. (18) And Jacob loved Rachel; and said, I will serve thee seven years for Rachel thy younger daughter.

(19) And Laban said, It is better that I give her to thee, than that I should give her to another man: abide with me. (20) And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had to her.

(21) And Jacob said unto Laban, Give me my wife, for my days are fulfilled, that I may go in unto her. (22) And Laban gathered together all the men of the place, and made a feast. (23) And it kisses her. Then, overcome with joy at this happy termination of his long journey, and at finding himself among relatives, he can restrain his feelings no longer, but bursts into tears. In this outburst of emotion we see the commencement of his lifelong affection for the beautiful child whom he thus opportunity met.

(12) Her father's brother.—Really his nephew; but terms of relationship are used in a very indefinite way in Hebrew. (Comp. verses 5, 15, chap. xiii. 8, &c.)

(13) Laban...ran to meet him, and embraced him.—Rachel told her father, because it was a matter simply of the hospitable reception of a relative, and not such news as Rebekah had run to tell those of her mother's house. And to Laban the tidings must have been most welcome, as he called to mind how, seventy-seven years ago, he had seen his dear sister depart to marry the son of the distant sheik. It seems strange, however, that the daughters of this old man should be so young. Either they must have been the children of a wife of his old age, or his granddaughters, but regarded as his own because their father was dead. As Laban's sons are not mentioned till chap. xxxi. 1, probably on account of their youth, the former is the more probable explanation.

(14) The space of a month.—Heb., a month of days, that is, a full month.

(15) What shall thy wages be?—As Jacob had given upon his arrival a full account of himself (verse 13), Laban probably expected the very answer he received; nevertheless, the proposal was fair and upright. Doubtless he had seen during Jacob's stay of a month, that his services would be very valuable.

(17) Leah was tender-eyed.—Leah, whose name signifies languor, weariness, had dull bleared eyes. Probably she suffered, as so many do in that hot sandy region, from some form of ophthalmia. Rachel (Heb., the eye) was, on the contrary, "beautiful and well favoured" (Heb., beautiful in form and beautiful in look). Leah's bleared eyes would be regarded in the East as a great defect, just as bright eyes were much admired. (See 1 Sam. xvi. 12, where David is described as fair of eyes.) Yet it was not Rachel, with her fair face and well-proportioned figure, and her husband's lasting love, that was the mother of the progenitor of the Messiah, but the weary-eyed Leah.

(15) I will serve thee seven years for Rachel thy younger daughter.—Heb., thy daughter, the little one, just as Leah, in verse 16, is called the great one. (See Note on chap. ix. 24.) So in chap. xlv. 29, the phrase "the little one" simply means the youngest. Wives had to be purchased in the East (chap. xxv. 53), and as Jacob had brought no rich presents, such as Abraham had sent when seeking a wife for his son, he had only his personal services to offer. As the sale was usually veiled in true Oriental fashion under the specious form of freewill gifts, we shall find that both Leah and Rachel are offended at being thus openly bartered by Laban.

(19) It is better that I give her to thee.—It is still the custom among the Arabs to prefer a relative as the husband of a daughter, and on giving a moderate dowry the elder cousins can claim the elder daughters in marriage, and the younger the younger. Thus Jacob, as the second son, had a claim upon Rachel. The Rabbins even say that Leah's eyes were weak from weeping, because Esau had not come to marry her. This absurd idea bears witness, nevertheless, to the custom of the intermarriage of cousins being an established rule, and gives a reason for Laban's acceptance of Jacob as the husband of his younger child. As Jacob offered seven years' service for Rachel, and gave a second seven years' service for her after he had been tricked into taking Leah, we may conclude that the length of time was not unreasonable.

They seemed unto him but a few days.—Jacob was at least fifty-seven years of age, but the late marriages hitherto of the patriarchs show that they only slowly arrived at manhood. We need not be surprised, then, at the warmth of his affection, nor was it a passing emotion, but lasted all his life through. This, however, is the last of these late marriages; for Jacob's sons married when young.

(23) He took Leah his daughter.—As the bride is taken to the bridegroom's house closely veiled (see Note on chap. xxiv. 65), and as probably there was some similarity in voice and form between the two sisters, this deception was quite easy. But Leah must came to pass in the evening, that he took Leah his daughter, and brought her to him; and he went in unto her. (24) And Laban gave unto his daughter Leah Zilpah his maid for an handmaid. (25) And it came to pass, that in the morning, behold, it was Leah: and he said to Laban, What is this thou hast done unto me? did not I serve with thee for Rachel? wherefore then hast thou beguiled me? (26) And Laban said, It must not be so done in our country, to give the younger before the firstborn. (27) Fulfil her week, and we will give thee this also for the service which thou shalt serve with me yet seven other years. (28) And Jacob did so, and fulfilled her week: and he gave him Rachel his daughter to wife also. (29) And Laban gave to Rachel his daughter Bilhah his handmaid to be her maid. (30) And he went in also unto Rachel, and he loved also Rachel more than Leah, and served with him yet seven other years.

(31) And when the Lord saw that Leah was hated, he opened her womb: but Rachel was barren. (32) And Leah conceived, and bare a son, and she called his name Reuben: for she said, Surely the Lord hath looked upon my affliction; now therefore my husband will love me. (33) And she conceived again, and bare a son; and said, Because the Lord hath heard that I was hated, he hath therefore given me this son also: and she called his name Simeon. (34) And she conceived again, and bare a son; and said, Now this time will my husband be joined unto me, because I have borne him three sons: therefore was his name called Levi. (35) And she conceived again, and bare a son: and have been a party to the fraud, and therefore Jacob's dislike of her was not altogether without reason.

(24) Laban gave unto his daughter Leah Zilpah . . .—Bethuel had given Rebecah not only Deborah her nurse, but also damsels (chap. xxiv. 61); but then she had been obtained by presents of unusual costliness. Still, Laban does not seem to have acted very liberally by his daughters, and they resented his treatment of them (chap. xxxi. 15).

(25) It must not be so done in our country.—Heb., It is not so done in our place, to give, &c. We have seen that it is still customary for the elder cousin to take the elder daughter, and the younger the younger. But Laban affirms that if the elder daughter be not claimed, it was the rule in Haran for her to take precedence over her sisters. In India the practice is such as Laban describes, but we have no proof of the existence of any such custom among the Bedaween. Apparently Leah loved Jacob (chap. xxx. 15), and Laban wanted a continuance of his service, and so this unscrupulous plot was arranged between them upon a pretext which, if not false, was yet overstrained. Jacob plainly had no idea of such a custom, and would not have given seven years' service for Leah.

(27) Fulfil her week.—The marriage festival seems to have lasted a week, as was the custom in later times (Judges xiv. 12), and to have forsaken Leah during this period would have been to offer her an insult which her brothers must have avenged. Appeased, therefore, by the promise of Rachel as soon as the seven days are over, Jacob, rather than quarrel with the whole family, submits to the wrong. The Hebrew is remarkable, "Fulfil the week of this, and we will give to thee also the this for the service." But in Hebrew this . . . this means the one and the other (chap. xxxi. 38, 41), and it is a mistake to suppose that the language will allow the first this to be understood of any one but Leah, and the second this of any one but Rachel.

(30) He gave him Rachel . . . to wife also.—After the monogamy of Abraham, and the stricter monogamy of Isaac, how came Jacob to marry two wives? Abravanel says that as Esau ought to have married Leah, and Jacob Rachel, he acted only as his brother's substitute in taking the elder, and was still free to marry the younger sister, who was his by custom. He thinks also that Jacob, recalling the promise of a seed numerous as the dust (chap. xxviii. 14), and seeing how near the family had been to total extinction in the days of his father and grandfather, desired to place it on a more secure basis. More probably, even after Leah had been forced upon him, Jacob regarded Rachel as his own, and as polygamy was not actually forbidden, considered that he was only acting justly by her and himself in marrying her. He had seen Esau blamed, not for marrying two wives, but for taking Hittites; and his love for Rachel would make him need but little argument. The other alternative, namely, to have divorced Leah, would have been worse, and happily divorce was not a practice as yet introduced.

BIRTH OF JACOB'S ELEVEN SONS, AND HIS DAUGHTER.

(31) Leah was hated.—We must not soften this down too much; for plainly Leah was not the object of love at all. It was her fruitfulness which gave her value in her husband's eyes, and when this ceased, Jacob utterly neglected her (chap. xxx. 15).

(32-35) She called his name Reuben.—There is something very touching in the history of these four births. When the first child is born, Leah joyfully calls him "Reuben," that is, See, a son! and fondly hopes that now she is a mother her husband will love her. And the mention of her "affliction" shows that, while she loved Jacob tenderly, he was to her more than unloving. Her second son she calls "Simeon," that is, having, and, disappointed in her first hope, regards the child as a gift of Jehovah to compensate her for the lack of the affection for which she so longed. Her third son she calls "Levi," that is, joined, still hoping that as in her tent alone there were children to play around the father, he would be more united to her. But her hope remains unfulfilled. And when her fourth son is born, she calls him "Judah," that is, praise. Throughout, in the midst of her melancholy, there is a tone of fervent piety, and that not merely to God, but to the covenant Jehovah. And now slowly she parts with her hope of she said, Now will I praise the Lord; therefore she called his name *Judah; and left bearing.

CHAPTER XXX.—(1) And when Rachel saw that she bare Jacob no children, Rachel envied her sister; and said unto Jacob, Give me children, or else I die. (2) And Jacob’s anger was kindled against Rachel: and he said, Am I in God’s stead, who hath withheld from thee the fruit of the womb? (3) And she said, Behold my maid Bilhah, go in unto her; and she shall bear upon my knees, that I may also have children by her. (4) And she gave him Bilhah her handmaid to wife; and Jacob went in unto her. (5) And Bilhah conceived, and bare Jacob a son. (6) And Rachel said, God hath judged me, and hath also heard my voice, and hath given me a son: therefore she called his name Dan. (7) And Bilhah Rachel’s maid conceived again, and bare Jacob a second son. (8) And Rachel said, With great wrestlings have I wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed: and she called his name *Naphtali. (9) And when Leah saw that she had left bearing, she took Zilpah her maid, and gave her Jacob to wife. (10) And Zilpah Leah’s maid bare Jacob a son. (11) And Leah said, A troop cometh: and she called his name Gad. (12) And Zilpah Leah’s maid bare Jacob a second son. (13) And Leah said, Happy am I, for the daughters will call me blessed: and she called his name *Asher.

(1) Give me children, or else I die.—There is an Oriental proverb that a childless person is as good as dead; and this was probably Rachel’s meaning; and not that she should die of vexation. Great as was the affliction to a Hebrew woman of being barren (1 Sam. i. 10), yet there is a painful petulance and peevishness about Rachel’s words, in strong contrast with Hannah’s patient suffering. But she was very young, and a spoiled wife; though with qualities which riveted Jacob’s love to her all life through.

(2) Behold my maid Bilhah.—Rachel had little excuse for this action: for there was no religious hope involved, as when Sarah gave Hagar to Abraham (chap. xvi. 2), but solely vexation at her own barrenness, and envy of her sister. All that can be said in her defence is, that the custom existed, and, perhaps, because it was distasteful to the wife, was looked upon as meritorious (verse 18).

She shall bear upon my knees.—So in chap. 1. 23, it is said, in the Hebrew, that “the children of Maearih were born upon Joseph’s knees,” not borne, as in our margin. It appears that there was a custom of placing the new-born child upon the knees, first of the father, who, by accepting it, acknowledged the infant as his own; and secondly, upon those of the mother. In this case, as Bilhah’s children were regarded as legally born of Rachel, they would be placed upon Rachel’s knees. Probably, too, the children of Maearih, by being placed upon Joseph’s knees, were in some way adopted by him.

That I may also have children by her.—Heb. be built by her. (See Note on chap. xvi. 2.)

(3) God hath judged me.—Rachel has no misgivings as to the rectitude of her conduct, and by the name she gives the child, she affirms that God had also given a decision in her favour; for “Dan” means judging. While, too, Leah had spoken of Jehovah, Rachel speaks of Elohim, not merely because she could not expect a child of Bilhah to be the ancestor of the Messiah, but because she was herself half an idolater (chap. xxxi. 19). When, however, she has a child of her own, she, too, taught by long trial, speaks of Jehovah (verse 24).

(4) With great wrestlings.—Heb. wrestlings of God, but the Authorised Version undoubtedly gives the right sense. (See Note on chap. xxiii. 6.) By wrestling, some commentators understand prayer, but the connection of the two ideas of wrestling and prayer is taken from chap. xxxii. 24, where an entirely different verb is used. Rachel’s was a discreditable victory, won by making use of a bad custom, and it consisted in weaning her husband still more completely from the unloved Leah. Now that Bilhah and children were added to the attractiveness of her tent, her sister, she, too, will be thought of more.

(5) Leah ... took Zilpah.—By ceasing to bear, Leah had lost her one hold upon her husband’s affection, and to regain it she follows Rachel’s example. The struggle of these two women for the husband gives us a strange picture of manners and morals, but must not be judged by our standard. Leah herself regards the bestowal of her handmaid upon Jacob as a deserving act of self-sacrifice (verse 18). The names, moreover, which she gives to Zilpah’s children show that the happier frame of mind to which she had attained when she called her fourth son “Judah,” praise, remained unbroken. On the birth of the first, she says, “With good luck!” and calls his name “Gad.” that is, luck. The Jews read, in their synagogue, Luck cometh, whence the rendering of the Authorised Version, “A troop cometh;” but there is no justification for the change. With regard to the meaning of the word “Gad,” all the Versions read it “perpetuity, good fortune.” Nor is the Samaritan, as has been alleged, an exception; for though the worthless Latin translation of it has “a troop cometh,” the Samaritan itself has with good luck. In Isa. lxv. 11 we find Gad used as the name of an idol. Zilpah’s other son is called Asher, that is, happy, in Latin Felix, and Leah says, “With my happiness,” using just the same turn of speech as before. The first child came bringing her good luck; the second brought her happiness.
(14) And Reuben went in the days of wheat harvest, and found mandrakes in the field, and brought them unto his mother Leah. Then Rachel said to Leah, Give me, I pray thee, of thy son’s mandrakes. (15) And she said unto her, Is it a small matter that thou hast taken my husband? and wouldest thou take away my son’s mandrakes also? And Rachel said, Therefore he shall lie with thee to night for thy son’s mandrakes. (16) And Jacob came out of the field in the evening, and Leah went out to meet him, and said, Thou must come in unto me; for surely I have hired thee with my son’s mandrakes. And he lay with her that night. (17) And God hearkened unto Leah, and she conceived, and bare Jacob the fifth son. (18) And Leah said, God hath given me my hire, because I have given my maiden to my husband: and she called his name 1Issachar. (19) And Leah conceived again, and bare Jacob the sixth son. (20) And Leah said, God hath ended me with a good dowry; now will my husband dwell with me, because I have born him six sons: and she called his name 2Zebulun. (21) And afterwards she bare a daughter, and called her name 3Dinah.

(22) And God remembered Rachel, and God hearkened to her, and opened her which had been followed by years of neglect of herself. As, too, it is said that “God hearkened unto Leah,” we may feel sure that she had prayed for God’s blessing upon her re-union with her husband; for Calvin’s objection that prayer would scarcely accompany such odious courses has little weight. Leah and Rachel were uneducated and untrained country women, whose sole anxiety was to have offspring. Leah was the most religious and best disciplined of the two; and the shamo really was that she should have been forced thus to buy her husband’s attentions.

(29) Zebulun.—Leah is more than usually obscure in the reasons she gives for this name; for she plays upon two words, which probably both belonged to the Mesopotamian patois: and as this was a Syriac dialect, we must look to that language for their explanation. The first is zebad; and here there is no difficulty. It means such presents as a father gives his daughter upon her marriage, over and above those enumerated in the marriage contract. Of the second, zabal, there is no trace. Nor do the Syro-Arabic lexicons acknowledge in the word “Zebulun” such a sense as that of dwelling, given it in our margin. Bar-Ali explains it as meaning “salvation of the night,” or “a good dawn,” and Bar-Badal, “a dovery of the night,” both deriving it from zebal, a dowry, and lam, to pass the night. The derivation is wrong as far as concerns lam; for the word Zebulun is formed simply from zebad, the final d of which is changed into l for mere reasons of euphony. The Versions take the word zabal as meaning, “to be with,” Vulg.; “to choose,” LXX.; “to cleave to,” Syriac. It occurs nowhere else, but the substantive zebul is not uncommon, and means dwelling, station.

As a woman’s value in the East rises with each son, Leah now hoped for more love from her husband. Nor does she seem to have been disappointed.

(21) Dinah.—That is, judgment. (See Note on verse 6.) The birth of Dinah is chronicled because it led to Simeon and Levi forfeiting the birthright. Jacob had other daughters (chaps. xxxvii. 35, xxxvii. 7), but the birth of a girl is regarded in the East as a misfortune; no feast is made, and no congratutations offered to the parents.

(22-24) God remembered Rachel.—Rachel’s long barrenness had probably humbled and disciplined her; and, cured of her former petulance, she trusts no longer to “love-apples,” but looks to God for the great blessing of children. He hearkens to her prayer, and womb. (23) And she conceived, and bare a son; and said, God hath taken away my reproach: (21) and she called his name Joseph; and said, The Lord shall add to me another son.

114

(25) And it came to pass, when Rachel had born Joseph, that Jacob said unto Laban, Send me away, that I may go unto mine own place, and to my country. (26) Give me my wives and my children, for whom I have served thee, and let me go: for thou knowest my service which I have done thee.

(27) And Laban said unto him, I pray thee, if I have found favour in thine eyes, barry: for I have learned by experience that the Lord hath blessed me for thy sake. (28) And he said, Appoint me thy wages, and I will give it.

(29) And he said unto him, Thou knowest how I have served thee, and how thy cattle was with me. (30) For it was little which thou hadst before I came, and it is now increased unto a multitude; and the Lord hath blessed me since my coming: and now when shall I provide for mine own house also?

(31) And he said, What shall I give thee? And Jacob said, Thou shalt not give me any thing: if thou wilt do this thing for me, I will again feed and keep thy flock. (32) I will pass through all thy flock to day, removing from thence all the speckled and spotted cattle, and all the brown cattle among the sheep, and the spotted and speckled among the goats: and of such shall be my hire. (33) So shall my righteousness answer for me in time to come, when it shall come for my hire before thy face: every one that is not speckled and spotted among the goats, and brown among the sheep, that shall be counted stolen with me.

(34) And Laban said, Behold, I would it might be according to thy word. (35) And he removed that day the he remembers her. (Comp. 1 Sam. i. 19.) In calling his name Joseph, there is again a play upon two words, for it may be formed from the verb used in verse 23, and would then mean he takes away; or it may signify he adds, which is the meaning made prominent by Rachel. And God did add to her another son, but the boon cost her her life. As Joseph was born six or seven years before Jacob left Padan-aram, Rachel had been barren for twenty-six years. We must add that in her joy at Joseph's birth there is no trace of the ungenerous triumph over Leah so marked in her rejoicing at the birth of the sons of Bilhah; and in her trust that Jehovah would add to her another son, she evidently had in mind the covenant promises, which a son of her own womb might now inherit. As a matter of fact, the long struggle for supremacy lay between the houses of Joseph and Judah; and Judah finally prevailed.

JACOB SERVES LABAN SIX YEARS FOR WAGES.

(25) Jacob said unto Laban, Send me away.—After Jacob had served Laban fourteen years for his two daughters, he continued with him for twenty years without any settled hire, receiving merely maintenance for himself and family. During most of this time he would be too embarrassed with pregnant wives and young children to wish to take so long a journey. (See “Excerpts on Chronology of Jacob's Life.”) In these thirty-four years of service there would be time for the visit increase of Laban’s wealth referred to in verse 30. But at length Joseph is born, and as his other sons were most of thirty years gone to marriage then as Rachel was fit for the journey Jacob desired to return to his father, if for no other reason, yet because now it was time to provide for his children, and at Isaac's death he was joint heir of his property.

(27) I have learned by experience.—Heb., I have divined. The verb means, to speak between the teeth; to mutter magical formulae. Others wrongly suppose that it signifies to live by omens taken from serpents; and some imagine that Laban had consulted his teraphim. Words of this sort lose, at a very early date, their special significations, and all that Laban means is—"I fancy," "I conjecture." His answer is, however, most Oriental. It is curtly and complimentary, but utterly inconclusive. "If now I have found favour in thine eyes, I have a feeling that God hath blessed me for thy sake," It, of course, suggests that he would be glad if Jacob would remain with him. In verse 28 Laban comes to the point, but probably this was reached by many circuitous windings.

(30) It was little.—The Rabbis see proof of this in Laban's sheep being kept by a young girl like Rachel (chap. xxix. 9). It is now increased.—Heb., broken forth, spread itself abroad with irresistible might. (Comp. Exod. i. 12.)

Since my coming.—Heb., at my foot. This answers to "before I came" (Heb., before me) in the first clause. "It was little that thou hadst before me, and it hath broken forth into a multitude, and God hath blessed thee behind me." Wherever I have gone, prosperously has followed in my footsteps.

The speckled and spotted cattle (sheep).—In the East sheep are generally white, and goats black or brown. Jacob, therefore, proposes that all such shall belong to Laban, but that the parti-coloured should be his hire. By “speckled” are meant those sheep and goats that had small spots upon their coats, and by "spotted," those that had large patches of another colour. Besides these, Jacob is to have all "brown cattle," that is, sheep, for the word "cattle" is usually now confined to kine, which were not the case 200 years ago. This translation is taken from Rashi, but the word usually signifies black. "Ring-streaked," that is, having the colours in stripes. This is never the case with sheep, but goats often have their coats thus distinctly marked.

And he removed.—The question has been asked whether it was Jacob or Laban who made the goats that were ringstraked and spotted, and all the she goats that were speckled and spotted, and every one that had some white in it, and all the brown among the sheep, and gave them into the hand of his sons. And he set three days’ journey betwixt himself and Jacob; and Jacob fed the rest of Laban’s flocks.

And Jacob took him rods of green poplar, and of the hazel and chesnut tree; and piled white strakes in them, and made the white appear which was in the rods. And he set the rods which he had piled before the flocks in the gutters in the watering troughs when the flocks came to drink, that they should conceive when they came to drink. And the flocks conceived before the rods, and brought forth cattle ringstraked, speckled, and spotted.

And Jacob did separate the lambs, and set the faces of the flocks toward the ringstraked, and all the brown in the flock of Laban; and he put his own flocks by themselves, and put them not unto Laban’s cattle. And it came to pass, whencesover the stronger cattle did conceive, that Jacob laid the rods before the eyes of the cattle in the gutters, whereby he became rich.

division, and whether Jacob was to have all such sheep and goats as were parti-coloured already, or such only as should be born afterwards. The authors of the Authorised Version evidently thought that Laban himself removed all speckled sheep and goats, and kept them; but the Hebrew is by no means so much in favour of this view as their own translation. Thus, in verse 32 they insert “of such” in italics; the Hebrew distinctly says, And it shall be my hire: that is, every one speckled or spotted shall be mine, the singular number being used throughout. Next, in verse 33 they translate, in time to come: according to this, if the parti-coloured sheep and goats at any time produced white or black lambs, as they generally would, such would revert to Laban; the Hebrew says, My righteousness shall answer for me to-morrow. Jacob was to make the selection at once, but the next day Laban was to look over all those put aside, and if he found among them any white sheep, or black or brown goats, he was to regard them as stolen—that is, not merely might he take them back, but require the usual fine or compensation.

And gave them into the hand of his sons.—It has been assumed that these were Laban’s sons, on the ground that Jacob’s sons were not old enough to undertake the charge; but as Reuben was twenty-six, this was not a case. Jacob’s flocks would have fared badly if they had been entrusted to Laban’s sons, nor could he, six years later, have escaped, had his property been in their keeping, without Laban being immediately aware of it.

He set three days’ journey betwixt himself and Jacob.—This means that Laban required that there should be an interval of between thirty and forty miles between “himself” that is, his flocks, and those of Jacob. His wealth in sheep and goats must have been enormous to require so large a separate feeding-ground; and this we learn from verse 30 had been the result of Jacob’s care. The words “and Jacob fed,” &c., are added to correct the natural supposition that he would at least give some part of his time and care to his own flocks, whereas it was his personal duty to attend only to those of Laban. The verse, nevertheless, is awkward, and the Syriac has probably preserved the right-reading: “And he set three days’ journey between himself and Laban: and Jacob fed the flock of Laban that was left.” The Samaritan and LXX read, “between them and Jacob.”

And Jacob took him rods.—Jacob’s plan was to place before the ewes and she-goats at breeding time objects of a speckled colour, and as he put them at their watering-place, where everything was familiar to them, they would, with the usual curiosity of these animals, gaze upon them intently, with the result, physically certain to follow, that many of them would bear speckled young.

Poplar.—Really, the storax-tree (styrax officinalis). “This,” says Canon Tristram, “is a very beautiful perfumed shrub, which grows abundantly on the lower hills of Palestine.” The word occurs elsewhere only in Hos. iv. 13, and the idea that it was the poplar arises from the name signifying white; but this epithet is even more deserved by the storax, which in March is covered with a sheet of white blossom, and is the predominant shrub through the dells of Carmel and Galilee” (Natural History of the Bible, pp. 385, 396).

Hazel.—Hob., huz (chap. xxviii. 19), the almond-tree (amygdalus communis). Dr. Tristram (Natural History of the Bible, p. 358) says that he never observed the true hazel wild in Southern or Central Palestine, nor was it likely to occur in Mesopotamia. The almond is one of the most common trees in Palestine.

Chesnut tree.—Heb., armon, the plane-tree (platanus orientalis). “We never,” says Dr. Tristram (p. 345), “saw the chesnut in Palestine, excepting planted in orchards in Lebanon; while the plane-tree, though local, is frequent by the sides of streams and in plains.” The tree is mentioned again in Ezek. xxxi. 8.

In the gutters. . . . Heb., in the troughs at the watering-places. So virtually all the versions; and see Exod. ii. 16, where the word rendered here “gutters” is rightly translated troughs. The idea that there were gutters through which to pour the water into the troughs is utterly modern, but all travellers describe the fixed troughs put for the convenience of the cattle round the wells.

Jacob . . . . set the faces of the flocks toward. . . . As the speckled lambs and kids would for some time remain with Laban’s flocks, this may perhaps mean that, when driving them to water, Jacob placed all the striped kids and dark lambs together, that, by being in a mass, they might work upon the imagination of the ewes and she-goats. Finally, after these had conceived he drove the parti-coloured young away to his own flocks.

The stronger cattle . . . . when the cattle were feeble. —The words for “strong” and “feeble” are literally bound and covered, so that evidently we have technical terms, which Onkelos and the Syriac that they might conceive among the rods. (2) But when the cattle were feeble, he put them not in; so the feeble were Laban's, and the stronger Jacob's. (3) And the man increased exceedingly, and had much cattle, and maid-servants, and menservants, and camels, and asses.

CHAPTER XXXI.—(4) And he heard the words of Laban's sons, saying, Jacob hath taken away all that was our father's; and of that which was our father's hath he gotten all this glory. (5) And Jacob beheld the countenance of Laban, and, behold, it was not toward him as before.

Explain of the females at the two breeding seasons. The ewes in the spring, after the cold season, are bound, firmly knit together, and the lambs strong and healthy. The other word, covered, seems to mean seeking concealment, hiding away (Job, xxiii. 9); and therefore faint, its meaning in Pss. lxi. 2, eii. title (Authorised Version, overwhelmed), and Isa. lvi. 16 (Authorised Version, fail). The autumn-born lambs are of no great value, and Jacob left them to the course of nature.

The man increased exceedingly.—Heb., broke forth, as in verse 30. Wool, as the chief material for clothing, is a very valuable commodity in the East, and by the sale of it Jacob would obtain means for the purchase of male and female servants and camels. The latter were especially valuable for purposes of commerce, in which Jacob evidently was actively engaged, and whence probably came his chief gains.

XXXI.

JACOB'S FLIGHT.—THE PURSUIT OF HIM BY LABAN, AND THEIR RECONCILIATION.

(1) Laban's sons,—No mention hitherto had been made of Laban having any other children than Leah and Rachel. If his sons were by the same wife, they would be men about fifty-five or sixty years of age. In saying that Jacob had taken "all that was their father's" they were guilty of exaggeration; for Laban was still rich, and probably, upon the whole, was a gainer by the presence of one so highly gifted as Jacob. Their word "glory" suggests that, enriched by cattle and commerce, Jacob had now become a person of great importance in the eyes of the people of Haran.

(2) The Lord said unto Jacob,—This is probably the revelation more exactly described in verses 10-13, as given to Jacob in a dream. It is there ascribed to Elohim, but here to Jehovah. The narrator's purpose in this, probably, is to show that while Jacob regarded the providence that watched over him as the act of Elohim, it was really in His character of Jehovah, the covenant-God, that He thus guarded him. (See Note on chap. xxvi. 29.)

Thy birthplace.—Heb., thy birthplace, as in chaps. xii. 1, xxiv. 4, 7, &c.

(3) Jacob sent and called Rachel and Leah .—Rachel is placed first, as the chief wife. The field was probably the pasture where Laban's flocks fed, as they were specially under Jacob's charge; and there, in the open ground, the three would run no risk of having their conversation overheard. Jacob's speech to his wives consists of three parts: first, he tells them of the change in Laban's manner towards him, and his consequent fear of violence; he next justifies his own conduct towards their father, and accuses him of repeated injustice; finally, he announces to them that he had received the Divine command to return to Canaan. As regards the second point, Jacob had undoubtedly used stratagems to increase his wages, and of this his wives must have been well aware. On the other hand, we learn that Laban had openly violated the terms of the bargain; and, whereas all the parti-coloured kids and lambs were to belong to Jacob, no sooner did they increase beyond expectation, than Laban, first, would give him only the speckled, the most common kind, and, finally, only the ring-straked, which were the most rare. Of course Jacob would keep all the sheep and goats which he had once made over to the charge of his sons; it would be the additions to them from Laban's flocks which were thus diminished.

As regards the vision, it has been thought that Jacob has compressed two occurrences into one narrative; but for insufficient reasons. It was at the breeding-time (verse 10) that Jacob saw the vision, with its two-fold lesson: the first, that the multiplication of his wages had been God's gift, and not the result of his own artifices; the second, that this bestowal of wealth was to enable him to return to Canaan. His wives heartily concurred in his purpose, but it was not till the time of sheep-shearing came (verse 19) that he effected his escape. But there is no difficulty in this delay. How large the household of Jacob had become we learn from the greatness of the present he selected for Esau (chap. xxxii. 13—15), and it could not be removed without preparation. The servants and camels must be gathered in from their trading expeditions, tents must be got ready, and camels' furniture and other requisites obtained; finally, they could not start until the ewes were fit for their journey, and only at a time of year when there would be herbage for the cattle on the march. We find that when they reached the Jabbok, Jacob's flocks and herds were "giving suck" (chap. xxxiii. 13 in the Heb.), but it is not easy to calculate the interval between this and the time when they commenced their journey. (5) Ten times.—That is, a good many times.
thus, The ringstraked shall be thy hire; then bare all the cattle ringstraked.
(9) Thus God hath taken away the cattle of your father, and given them to me.
(10) And it came to pass at the time that the cattle conceived, that I lifted up mine eyes, and saw in a dream, and, behold, the 1rams which leaped upon the cattle were ringstraked, speckled, and grisled. (11) And the angel of God spake unto me in a dream, saying, Jacob: And I said, Here am I. (12) And he said, Lift up now thine eyes, and see, all the rams which leap upon the cattle are ringstraked, speckled, and grisled: for I have seen all that Laban doeth unto thee. (13) I am the God of Beth-el, where thou anointedst the pillar, and where thou vowedst a vow unto me; now arise, get thee out from this land, and return unto the land of thy kindred.
(14) And Rachel and Leah answered

Jacob Departeth Secretly

GENESIS, XXXI.

and said unto him, Is there yet any portion or inheritance for us in our father's house? (15) Are we not counted of him strangers? for he hath sold us, and hath quite devoured also our money. (16) For all the riches which God hath taken from our father, that is our's, and our children's: now then, whatsoever God hath said unto thee, do.
(17) Then Jacob rose up, and set his sons and his wives upon camels; (18) and he carried away all his cattle, and all his goods which he had gotten, the cattle of his getting, which he had gotten in Padan-aram, for to go to Isaac his father in the land of Canaan.
(19) And Laban went to shear his sheep: and Rachel had stolen the 2images that were her father's. (20) And Jacob stole away 3unawares to Laban the Syrian, in that he told him not that he fled. (21) So he fled with all that he had; and he rose up, and passed over the river,

(10) Rams.—Heb., he-goats. The Authorised Version has made the alteration, because the word rendered "cattle" is really sheep (and so in verses 8, 12, &c.): but, like our word flock, it also included goats.
(11) Grisled.—That is, covered with spots like hail-stones, the word "grisled" being derived from the French grêle, hail. Others derive the word from gris, grisaille, grey.
(12) I am the God of Beth-el.—The angel of Elohim (verse 11) was the speaker, but the words were those of God (1 Thess. ii. 13; Heb. i. 1). With this verse compare chap. xxviii. 13.
(13) Jacob rose up.—This was the final result of Jacob's deliberation with his wives, but it did not take place till the time of sheep-shearing. Jacob must have prepared his plans very carefully to be able to leave none of his wealth behind; but he would be greatly helped in this by the fact that his own head-quarters were thirty or forty miles distant from Haran (chap. xxx. 36).
(19) Laban went to shear his sheep.—The sheep-shearing was a joyous time, when the hard toil of the shearsers was relieved by feasting (1 Sam. xxv. 8). Laban's flocks, apparently, were also at some distance from Haran, and his sons and men-servants would all be with him, busily occupied in the work. Apparently, too, Laban's wealth was not seriously diminished, though it had not of late increased; and his repeated change of the hire proves that he was quite able to take care of himself. But why was not Jacob present, as he had chief charge of Laban's flocks? Possibly, he was expected there, and was missed; but, more probably, as the result of the growing estrangement between them, caused by the too rapid increase of Jacob's riches, Laban and his sons had gradually taken the management of their flocks into their own hands.

Images.—Heb., terophim, called Laban's gods in verse 30, and we find that their worship continued throughout the Old Testament history. Michah sets up teraphim, as well as a molten and a graven image, and an ephod (Judges xviii. 17). Though in 1 Sam. xxv. 23, where the Authorised Version has idolatry, teraphim are spoken of in strong terms of condemnation, yet Michah possessed them, and placed them in David's bed. We gather from this that they had a head shaped like that of a man, but, probably, a dwarf trunk, as she seems to have put more than one in the bed to represent David's body (1 Sam. xix. 13). So, too, here Rachel hides them under the camel's furniture (verse 34), which proves that they in this case, of were of no great size. In the history of the thorough reformation carried out by King Josiah we find the mention of teraphim among the things put away (2 Kings xxiii. 24). We learn, nevertheless, from Zeich. x. 2, that they were still used for divination; and from Hos. iii. 4 that both pillars and teraphim had long been objects of ordinary superstition among the ten tribes. As Nebuchadnezzar divines by them (Ezek. xxi. 21) they were possibly of Chaldean origin, and, probably, were not so much worshipped as used for consultation. Women seem to have been most given to their service, and probably regarded them as charms, and told fortunes by them; and here Rachel stole them upon the supposition that they would bring prosperity to her and her husband.

Jacob stole away unawares.—Hen., stole the heart. But the heart was regarded by the Hebrews as the seat of the intellect, and so to steal a man's understanding, like the similar phrase in Greek, means to elude his observation.
(21) The river.—The Euphrates.
and set his face toward the mount Gilead.

(22) And it was told Laban on the third day that Jacob was fled. (23) And he took his brethren with him, and pursued after him seven days' journey; and they overtook him in the mount Gilead. (24) And God came to Laban the Syrian in a dream by night, and said unto him, Take heed that thou speak not to Jacob 'either good or bad.' (25) Then Laban overtook Jacob. Now Jacob had pitched his tent in the mount; and Laban with his brethren pitched in the mount of Gilead.

(26) And Laban said to Jacob, What hast thou done, that thou hast stolen away unawares to me, and carried away my daughters, as captives taken with the sword? (27) Wherefore didst thou flee away secretly, and steal away from me; and didst not tell me, that I might have sent thee away with mirth, and with songs, with tabret, and with harp? (28) And hast not suffered me to kiss my sons and my daughters? thou hast now done foolishly in so doing. (29) It is in the power of my hand to do you hurt: but the God of thy father spake unto me yesternight, saying, Take heed that thou speak not to Jacob either good or bad. (30) And now, though thou wouldst needs be gone, because thou sore longedst after thy father's house, yet wherefore hast thou stolen my gods? (31) And Jacob answered and said to Laban, Because I was afraid: for I said, Peradventure thou wouldst take by force thy daughters from me. (32) With whomsoever thou findest thy gods, let him not live: before our Mount Gilead.—Gilead, the region of rock, was the mountainous frontier between the Aramean and Canaanite races. The form of the word is so remote from ordinary Hebrew that we have in it, probably, a very old appellation of this region; and Jacob apparently plays upon it in his name Gilead (verse 47).

(25) His brethren.—As Jacob, who had no relatives with him except his sons, applies this term in verse 46 to his followers, it is, probably, an honourable way of describing retainers, who were freemen and of a higher class than non-servants.

Seven days' journey.—The route chosen by Jacob was apparently the more easterly one, past Tadmor, and through the Hauran, leaving Damascus to the west. The hill, which subsequently was called Mount Gilead, lay to the south of the Jabok; but a Mahanaim, reached some days after the meeting with Laban, is to the north of that river, the word Gilead was evidently applied to the whole of the region of chalk cliffs on the east of the Jordan. This is made certain by the fact that Laban overtook Jacob in seven days. But as the distance from Haran to the most northerly part of this country (afterwards assigned to the half-tribe of Manasseh) was fully three hundred miles, it would require hard riding on the part of Laban and his brethren to enable them to overtake Jacob, even on the borders of this region. There is no difficulty about Jacob's movements. His flocks were pastured at so remote a distance from Haran that it would be easy for him to send them in detachments to the ford of the Ephrathah, distant about sixty or seventy miles; he would make all the arrangements with his four elder sons and trusty servants, and, probably, even see them across the ford himself, and would return to Haran to fetch his wives and younger children only when all was well advanced. Finally, when Laban goes to a distance, in another direction, for his sheep-shearing, Jacob "sets his sons and his wives upon camels," and follows with the utmost speed. They would have remained quietly at Haran to the last, to avoid suspicion, and, excepting Leah's four elder sons, the rest would have been too young to be of much use. When Jacob, with his wives, overtook the cattle, they would, probably, not travel more than ten or twelve miles a day; but three days passed before Laban learned what had taken place, and a couple of days at least must have been spent in returning to Haran and preparing for the pursuit. Thus Jacob had reached Canaanite ground—a matter of very considerable importance—before his father-in-law overtook him.

(24) Either good or bad.—Heb., from good to good: a proverbial expression, rightly translated in the Authorised Version, but conveying the idea of a more absolute prohibition than the phrase used in chap. xxiv. 50.

(26-30) Laban said . . .—Laban reproaches Jacob, first, for carrying away his daughters secretly, which was an affront to them (verse 26) and an injury to his own feelings (verse 28); secondly, he tells him that he should have punished him but for the Divine warning; lastly, he accuses him of stealing his teraphim.

Captives . . .—Heb., captives of the sword, women carried off in war as spoil.

(28) My sons.—That is, my grandsons.

(29) It is in the power of my hand.—This is the rendering here of all the versions, and is confirmed by Deut. xxviii. 32; Neh. v. 5; Micah ii. 1; but Keil and Knobel wish to translate, "My hand is for God." This comes to the same thing in an impious way, as the sense would be, "My hand is an El, a god, for me," and enables me to do what I will.

The speech of Laban is half true and half false. He would have wished not to part with Jacob at all, but to have recovered from him as much as he could of his property. But if he was to go, he would have liked outward appearances maintained: and, probably, he had an affection for his daughters and their children, though not so strong as to counterbalance his selfishness. His character, like that of all men, is a mixture of good and evil.

(31, 32) Jacob answered.—Jacob gives the true reason for his flight; after which, imbroglio at the charge of theft, he returns, in his anger, as rash an answer about the teraphim as Joseph's brethren subsequently did about the stolen cup (chap. xlv. 9).

Let him not live.—The Rabbins regard this as a prophecy, fulfilled in Rachel's premature death. Its Dispute between Jacob and Laban.

GENESIS, XXXI. A Covenant between them.

brethren discern thou what is thine with me, and take it to thee. For Jacob knew not that Rachel had stolen them.

(33) And Laban went into Jacob's tent, and into Leah's tent, and into the two maidservants' tents; but he found them not. Then went he out of Leah's tent, and entered into Rachel's tent. (34) Now Rachel had taken the images, and put them in the camel's furniture, and sat upon them. And Laban searched all the tent, but found them not. (35) And she said to her father, Let it not displease my lord that I cannot rise up before thee; for the custom of women is upon me. And he searched, but found not the images.

(36) And Jacob was wroth, and chode with Laban; and Jacob answered and said to Laban, What is my trespass? What is my sin, that thou hast so hotly pursued after me? (37) Whereas thou hast searched all my stuff, what hast thou found of all thy household stuff? set it here before my brethren and thy brethren, that they may judge betwixt us both. (38) This twenty years have I been with thee; thy ewes and thy sheep have not cast young, and the rams of thy flock have I not eaten. (39) That which was torn of beasts I brought not unto thee; I bare the loss of it; of my hand didst thou require it, whether stolen by day, or stolen by night. (40) Thus I was; in the day the drought consumed me, and the frost by night; and my sleep departed from mine eyes. (41) Thus have I been twenty years in thy house; I served thee fourteen years for thy two daughters, and six years for thy cattle: and thou hast changed my wages ten times. (42) Except the God of my father, the God of Abraham, and the fear of Isaac, had been with me, surely thou hadst sent me away now empty. God hath seen mine affliction and the labour of my hands, and rebuked thee yesternight.

(43) And Laban answered and said unto Jacob, These daughters are my daughters, and these children are my children, and these cattle are my cattle, and all that thou seest is mine: and what can I do this day unto these my daughters, or unto their children which they have born? (44) Now therefore come thou, let us make a covenant, I and thou; and let it be for a witness between me and thee.

(45) And Jacob took a stone, and set it up for a pillar. (46) And Jacob said unto his brethren, Gather stones; and they took stones, and made an heap: and they did eat there upon the heap.

(47) And Laban called it Jegar-sahadutha: but Jacob called it Galeed.

(48) And Laban said, This heap is a more simple meaning is, I yield him up to thee even to be put to death.

The camel's furniture.—That is, the camel's saddle. It is now made of wicker-work, and is protected by curtains and a canopy. Probably Rachel's was far simpler; and as the teraphim seem to have had heads shaped like those of a man, and dwarf bodies, they would easily be crammed under it.

(30) Jacob was wroth. Naturally he regarded the accusation against the teraphim as a mere device for searching his goods, and when nothing was found gave free vent to his indignation. (40) The frost by night. From September to May the nights in the East are usually cold, and the change from great heat by day to a freezing temperature as soon as the sun sets is very trying to health.

(41) Thus have I been...—Heb. This for me twenty years in thy house, but taken in connection with the preceding this, in verse 38, the meaning is: During the one twenty years that I was with thee, thy ewes, &c., upon which follows: During the other twenty years that were for me in thy house, I served thee, &c. (See Note on chap. xxix. 27, and Ex cursus on the Chronology of Jacob's Life.)

(42) The fear of Isaac. That is, the object of Isaac's worship. The reason given by the Jewish Commentators for this remarkable way of describing the Deity whom Isaac served is that, as his father was still alive, Jacob would have been wanting in reverence, if he had spoken of God as "Isaac's God," even though Jehovah had condescended so to call Himself (chap. xxvi. 13).

(43) Laban answered...—Laban does not attempt any reply to Jacob's angry invectives, but answers affectionately. Why should he wish to injure Jacob, and send him away empty? All that he had was still Laban's in the best of senses; for were not Rachel and Leah his daughters? And were not their children his grandsons? How was it possible that he could wish to rob them? He proposes, therefore, that they should make a covenant, by which Jacob should bind himself to deal kindly with his daughters, and to take no other wife; while he promises for himself that he would do Jacob no wrong. Jacob therefore sets up a large stone, as a pillar and memorial; and Laban subsequently does the same; while, probably between the two hills on which they had severally encamped (verse 25), they collect a large mass of other stones, on which they feast together, in token of friendship (chap. xxvi. 30).

(44) Jegar-sahadutha. These are two Syriac words of the same meaning as Gal'-eed. Heap of Witness. A Syriac (or Aramaic) dialect was most probably the ordinary language of the people in Mesopotamia, but it witness between me and thee this day. Therefore was the name of it called Galeed; (40) and Mizpah; for he said, The Lord watch between me and thee, when we are absent one from another. (50) If thou shalt afflict my daughters, or if thou shalt take other wives beside my daughters, no man is with us; see, God is witness between me and thee. (51) And Laban said to Jacob, Behold this heap, and behold this pillar, which I have cast between me and thee; (52) this heap be witness, and this pillar be witness, that I will not pass over this heap to thee, and that thou shalt not pass over this heap and this pillar unto me, for harm. (53) The God of Abraham, and the God of Nahor, the God of their father, judge betwixt us. And Jacob swore by the fear of his father Isaac.

(51) Then Jacob offered sacrifice upon the mount, and called his brethren to eat bread: and they did eat bread, and tarried all night in the mount. (55) And early in the morning Laban rose up, and kissed his sons and his daughters, and blessed them: and Laban departed, and returned unto his place.

CHAPTER XXXII. — (1) And Jacob went on his way, and the angels of God met him. (2) And when Jacob saw them, he said, This is God's host: and he called the name of that place Mahanaim.

(3) And Jacob sent messengers before him to Esau his brother unto the land of Seir, the country of Edom. (4) And he commanded them, saying, Thus shall ye speak unto my lord Esau; Thy servant Jacob saith thus, I have sojourned with Laban; and stayed there until now: (5) and I have oxen, about a week's journey southward, he has a vision of "angels of God."

Angels of God.—Numberless conjectures have been hazarded as to who were these "messengers of Elohim," and how they were seen by Jacob. Some, taking the word in its lower sense, think they were prophets; others, that it was a caravan, which gave Jacob timely information about Esau's presence in Seir; others, that it was a body of men sent by Rebekah to aid Jacob in repelling Esau. More probably, as Jacob on his road to Padan-aram had been assured of God's watchful care of him by the vision of the angels ascending and descending the stairs, so now also in a dream he sees the angels encamped on each side of him, to assure him of protection against his brother.

(5) Mahanaim.—That is, the two camps, his own and that of the angels; or, possibly, two camps of angels, one on either side of him. Mahanaim was in the tribe of Gad, and became an important town. (See 2 Sam. ii. 8, xvii. 24; 1 Kings iv. 14.)

Jacob's Reconciliation with Esau. (Chap. xxxii. 3—xxxiii. 16.)

(1) Jacob sent messengers.—As Jacob travelled homewards to Hebron the news somehow reached him that Esau, at the head of a large body of retainers, was engaged in an expedition against the Horites. These, as we have seen on chap. xiv. 6, were a miserable race of cave-men, utterly unable to cope with Esau and his trained servants. We learn from chap. xxxvi. 6 that Esau's home was still at Isaac at Hebron, and probably this was a mere marching expedition, like that against the people of Gath, which a century later cost Ephraim the lives of so many of his sons (1 Chron. vii. 21); but it revealed to Esau the weakness of the inhabitants, and also that the land was admirably adapted for his favourite pursuit of hunting. He seems also to have taken a Horite wife (chap. xxxvi. 5), and being thus connected with the country, upon Isaac's death he willingly removed into it, and it then became "the country." Heb. the field of Edom. Its other name, Seir, i.e. rough, hairy, shows that it was then covered with forests, and the term field that it and asses, flocks, and menservants, and maidservants: and I have sent to tell my lord, that I may find grace in thy sight.

(6) And the messengers returned to Jacob, saying, We came to thy brother Esau, and also he cometh to meet thee, and four hundred men with him.

(7) Then Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed: and he divided the people that was with him, and the flocks, and herds, and the camels, into two bands; (8) and said, If Esau come to the one company, and smite it, then the other company which is left shall escape.

(9) And Jacob said, O God of my father Abraham, and God of my father Isaac, the Lord which saidst unto me, Return unto thy country, and to thy kindred, and I will deal well with thee: (10) I am not worthy of the least of all the mercies, was an unquiet region. It was entirely in the spirit of the adventurous Esau to make this expedition, and on his father's death to prefer this wild land to the peaceful pastures at Hebron, where he was surrounded by powerful tribes of Amorites and Hittites. The land of Seir was a hundred miles distant from Mahamaim, but Esau apparently had been moving up through what were afterwards the countries of Moab and Ammon, and was probably, when Jacob sent his messengers, at no very great distance. At all events, Jacob remained at Mahamaim till his brother was near, when he crossed the brook Jabob, and went to meet him.

(7) Jacob was greatly afraid.—Jacob's message to his brother had been very humble, for he calls Esau his lord, and himself a servant. He hopes also to "find grace in his sight," and by enumerating his wealth shows that he is not afraid to need claim even a share of Isaac's property. But Esau had given no answer, being probably undecided as to the manner in which he would receive his brother. The "four hundred men with him" formed probably only a part of the little army with which he had invaded the Horite territory. Some would be left with the spoil which he had gathered, but he took so many with him as to place Jacob completely in his power. And Jacob's extreme distress, in spite of the Divine encouragement repeatedly given him, shows that his faith was very feeble; but it was real, and therefore he sought refuge from his terror in prayer.

(9) Jacob said.—Jacob's prayer, the first recorded in the Bible, is remarkable for combining great earnestness with simplicity. After addressing God as the Elohim of his fathers, he draws closer to Him as the Jehovah who had personally commanded him to return to his birthplace (chap. xxxi. 13). And next, while acknowledging his own unworthiness, he shows that already he had been the recipient of the Divine favour, and prays earnestly for deliverance, using the touching words "and smite me, mother upon children." His mind does not rest upon his own death, but upon the terrible picture of the mother, trying with all a mother's love to protect her offspring, and slain upon their bodies. In Hosea x. 14 this is spoken of as the most cruel and pitiable of the miseries of war. But finally he feels that this sad end is impossible; for he has God's promise that his seed shall be numerous as the sand of the sea. In prayer to man it may be ungenerous to remind another of promises made and favours expected, but with God each first act of grace and mercy is the pledge of continued favour.

(13) And he lodged there that same night; and took of that which came to his hand a present for Esau his brother; (14) two hundred she goats, and twenty he goats, two hundred ewes, and twenty rams, (15) thirty milch camels with their colts, forty kine, and ten bulls, twenty she asses, and ten foals. (16) And he delivered them into the hand of his servants, every drove by themselves; and said unto his servants, Pass over before me, and put a space betwixt drove and drove. (17) And he commanded the foremost, saying, When Esau my brother meeteth thee, and asketh thee, saying, Whose art thou? and whither goest thou? and whose are these before thee? (18) Then thou shalt say, They be thy servant Jacob's; it is a present sent unto my lord Esau: and, behold, also he is behind us. (19) And so commanded he the second, and the third, and all that followed the droves, saying, On this manner shall ye speak unto Esau, when ye find him. (20) And say ye moreover, Behold, thy servant Jacob is behind us. For he said, I will appease him with the present that goeth before me, and afterward I will see his face; peradventure he will accept of me.

(21) So went the present over before him: and himself lodged that night in the company. (22) And he rose up that night, and took his two wives, and his two womenservants, and his eleven sons, and passed over the ford Jabbok. (23) And he took them, and sent them over the brook, and sent over that he had. (24) And Jacob was left alone; and there wrestled a man with him until the breaking of the day. (25) And when he saw that he prevailed not against him, he touched the hollow of his thigh; and the hollow of Jacob's thigh was out of joint, as he wrestled with him. (26) And he said, Let me go, for the day breaketh.

Thence wrestled.—This verb, abak, occurs only here, and without doubt it was chosen because of its resemblance to the name Jabbok. Its probable derivation is from a word signifying dust, because wrestlers were quickly involved in a cloud of dust, or because, as was the custom in Greece, they rubbed their bodies with it.

A man.—Such he seemed to be to Jacob; but Hosea (chap. xii. 4) calls him an angel; and, in verse 30, Jacob recognizes him in a manifestation of the Deity, as Hagar had done before, when an angel appeared to her (chap. xiii. 2). There is no warrant for regarding the angel as an incarnation of Deity, any more than in the case of Manoah (Judges xiii. 22); but it was a manifestation of God mediating by His messenger, and was one of the many signs indicative of a more complete manifestation by the coming of the Word in the flesh. The opposite idea of many modern commentators, that the narrative is an allegory, is contradicted by the attendant circumstances, especially by the change of Jacob's name, and his subsequent lameness, to which national testimony was borne by the customs of the Jews.

The ford Jabbok.—Heb., the ford of the Jabbok. This river, now called the Wady Zebed or Blue Torrent, formed afterwards the boundary between the tribes of Manassah and Gad. It flows through a deep ravine, with so rapid a current as to make the crossing of it a matter of difficulty. Dr. Tristram (Land of Israel, p. 558) says that the water reached his horse's girths when he rode through the ford.

The brook.—Really, the ravine or valley; Arab., wady. Jacob, whose administrative powers were of a very high character, sees his wives, children, and cattle not only through the ford, but across the valley on to the high ground beyond. Staying himself to the very last, he is left alone on the south side of the torrent, but still in the ravine, across which the rest had taken their way. The definite proof that Jacob remained on the south side lies in the fact that Peniel belonged to the tribe of Gad; but, besides, this there could be no reason why he should rescross the rapid river when once he had gone through it, and probably the idea has arisen from taking the word brook in verse 23 in too narrow a sense. Really it is the word translated valley in chap. xxvi. 17, but is used only of such valleys or ravines as have been formed by the action of a mountain torrent. When Jacob had seen his wives and herds safe on the top of the southern ridge, the deep valley would be the very place for this solitary struggle. This ravine, we are told, has a width of from four to six miles.
And he said, "I will not let thee go except thou bless me." (22) And he said unto him, "What is thy name?" And he said, "Jacob." (23) And he said, "Thy name shall be called no more Jacob, but Israel: for as a prince hast thou power with God and with men, and hast prevailed." (24) And Jacob asked him, and said, "Tell me, I pray thee, thy name." And he said, "Wherefore is it that thou dost ask after my name? And he blessed him there." (25) And Jacob called the name of the place "Peniel," for I have seen God face to face, and my life is preserved.

And as he passed over Peniel the sun rose upon him, and he halted upon his thigh. (26) Therefore the children of Israel call not of the sinew which shrank, which is upon the hollow of the thigh, unto this day: because he touched the hollow of Jacob's thigh in the sinew that shrank.

CHAPTER XXXIII.—(1) And Jacob lifted up his eyes, and looked, and beheld, Esau came, and with him four hundred men. And he divided the children unto Leah, and unto Rachel, and unto the two handmaids. (2) And he put the handmaids and their children foremost, and Leah and her children after, and Rachel and Joseph hindermost. (3) And he passed over before them, and bowed himself to the ground seven times, until he came near to his brother. (4) And Esau ran to meet him, and embraced him, and fell on his neck, and kissed him; and they wept. (5) And he lifted up his eyes, and saw the women and the children; and said, "Who are those with thee? And he said, "The children which God hath graciously given thy servant." (6) Then the handmaids came near, they and their children, and they bowed themselves. (7) And Leah also with her children came near, and bowed themselves; and after came Joseph near and Rachel, and they bowed themselves.

Except thou bless me.—The vanquished must yield the spoil to the victor; and Jacob, who had gradually become aware that the being who was wrestling with him was something more than man, asked of him, as his ransom, a blessing. (22) Israel.—That is, a prince of God, or, one powerful with God. (See Note on chap. xvii. 15.) Esau had given a bad meaning to the name of Jacob, nor had it been undeserved. But a change has now come over Jacob's character, and he is henceforth no longer the crafty schemer who was ever plotting for his own advantage, but one humble and penitent, who can trust himself and all he has in God's hands. The last words signify, for thou art a prince with God and men; or possibly, for thou hast struggled with God and men.

Wherefore . . . In much the same manner the angel refuses to tell Manoah his name (Judges xiii. 18). Probably, however, in the blessing which followed there was a clear proof that Jacob's opponent was a Divine personage.

Peniel.—Elsewhere Peniel, and so probably it should be read here. It means, "the face of God." For the rest of the verse see Note on chap. xvi. 13.

As he passed over Peniel.—Rather, as he passed Peniel. It was the place where he had wrestled, and as soon as the angel left him he proceeded onwards to rejoin his wives. It appears, from what is here said, that it was not till he tried to walk that he found out that he was lame. As his sinews grew cool, the injury to his hip-joint showed itself.

The sinew which shrank.—This translation has much authority in its favour, as the LXX. render the sinew that became numb, and the Vulgate the sinew that withered. More probably, however, it is the proper name for the large tendon which takes its origin from the spinal cord, and extends down the thigh unto the ankle. Technically it is called nervus ischiadicus, and by the Greeks was named tendo Achillis, because it reaches to the heel. Jewish commentators notice that this was the second special ordinance imposed upon the race of Abraham, circumcision having been enjoined upon them by God, while this grew out of an historical event in the life of their progenitor, to the reality of which it bears remarkable testimony.

He passed over before them.—While providing some small chance of escape for his wives and children, arranged according to their rank, Jacob manfully went first and placed himself entirely in Esau's power. He endeavoured, nevertheless, by his sevenfold obeisance in acknowledgment of Esau's superiority, to propitiate him; for the cause of the quarrel had been Jacob's usurpation of Esau's right of precedence as the first born. This bowing in the East is made by bending the body forward with the arms crossed, and the right hand held over the heart.

Esau ran to meet him.—Whatever may have been Esau's intention when he started, no sooner does he see his brother than the old times of their childhood return to his heart, and he is overcome with love; nor does he ever seem afterwards to have wavered in his fraternal affection. We have had a proof before (in chap. xxvii. 38) of Esau being a man of warm feelings, and similarly now he is again overmastered by his loving impulses. It is curious that the Hebrew word for "he kissed him" has had what are called extraordinary vowels attached to it, and the Masoretes are supposed to signify thereby that Esau's kiss was not a sign of genuine love. For such an ill-natured supposition there is no warrant whatsoever.

Who are those with thee?—Heb., to thee, that is, Who are these belonging to thee? Esau noticed that they were Jacob's family, and asked for fuller information concerning them.
Reconciliation between Jacob and Esau.

And he said, 1 What meanest thou by all this drouthe which I met? And he said, These are to find grace in the sight of my lord. 2 And Esau said, I have enough, my brother; 2 keep that thou hast unto thyself. 3 And Jacob said, Nay, I pray thee, if now I have found grace in thy sight, therefore receive my present at my hand: for therefore I have seen thy face, as though I had seen the face of God, and thou wast pleased with me. 4 Take, I pray thee, my brother, this gift, which is brought to thee; because God hath dealt graciously with me. 5 And he said, Let us take our journey, and let us go, and I will go before thee. 6 And he said, What meanest thou by all this drouthe? 7 Heb., What is all this band to thee? 8 From the time of Jacob's coming to Mahanaim, the word mahaneh, "camp," is used in a very remarkable way. It is the word translated bands in chap. xxxii. 7, and company in verses 8, 21. It is the proper word for an encampment of pastoral people with their flocks, and might be used not unnaturally of the five droves: for they would remain Esau of the cattle driven in at evening to the place where they were to pass the night. 9 And for therefore I have seen thy face. —The latter half of the verse would more correctly be translated, insomuch as I have seen thy face as one seeth the face of Elohim, and thou hast received me graciously. To the Hebrew the thought of God was not terrifying, and so the vision of God's face was the sight of something good and glorious. There is much of Oriental hyperbole in comparing the sight of Esau to the beholding of the face of Deity; but it clearly conveyed the idea that Esau was using his power as generously and lovingly as is the wont of God; and God was so much nearer to the Hebrew in those simple days than he is to men now that science has revealed to them the immensity of His attributes, that there was no irreverence in the comparison. The behaviour of Esan is very generous. He wished to spare his brother so large a present, and therefore leads the conversation to it, knowing, of course, what was the meaning of the five herds, as their drivers had delivered to him Jacob's message. To have refused it, however, would have been a mark of hostility, especially as Jacob represented it as the gift of an inferior for the purpose of obtaining the favour of one from whom he had feared the conduct of his brother. He too was rich, and Jacob should keep what was his own. But Jacob still urges its acceptance as the proof of goodwill, magnifies the value of Esan's favour, and declares that by God's goodness he has still abundance, even after giving his brother so princely a present. It is called a "blessing" because it was considered lucky to receive a gift, and of all good-luck God was the giver. (Comp. 1 Sam. xxv. 27, xxv. 26.)

(13) Flocks and herds with young. —Heb., that give suck. Thompson (Land and Book, p. 205) infers from this that it was now winter, and thinks that this is confirmed by Jacob making folds for his cattle at Szech. If so, more than six months would have elapsed since Jacob's flight from Haran; but the conclusion is uncertain, and Jacob probably halted at Szech because of his lameness.

(14) According as the cattle. —Rather, according to the pace —Heb., foot —of the cattle that is before me, and according to the pace of the children. Joseph was only six or seven years old; and Leah's two younger sons, and probably Zilpah's, were too tender to endure much fatigue.

Unto Seir. —This implies a purpose of visiting Esan in his new acquisition, not carried out probably because Esan did not as yet settle there, but returned to Hebron to his father.

Jacob's Settlement in Canaan. —Dinah's Wrong, and the Fierce Vengeance of Simeon and Levi (chap. xxxiii. 17. —xxxiv.).

(17) Szech. —That is, booths. There are two claimants for identification with Jacob's Szech, of which the one is in the tribe of Gad, on the east of the Jordan, in the corner formed by that river and the Jabbok; the other is the place still called Sakti, on the west of the Jordan, but as it lies ten miles to the north of the junction of the Jordan and Jabbok, it is not likely that Jacob would go so far out of his way. Jacob . . . built him an house, and made . . . booths for his cattle. —This is something quite unusual, as the cattle in Palestine remain in the open air all the year round, and the fact that the place retained the name of the booths shows that it was noticed as remarkable. But the fact, coupled with the right translation of verse 18, is a strong but undesigned testimony to the truth of the account. Jacob and Laban were pursued by Laban, and suffered much from anxiety and the labour attendant upon the hurried removal of so large a household. Delivered from danger in the rear, he has to face a greater danger in front, and passes many days and nights in terror. At last Esan is close at hand, and having done all that man could do, he stays behind to recover himself, and prepare for the dreaded meeting next day. But instead of a few calm restful hours he has to wrestle fiercely all night, and when at sunrise he moves forward he finds that he has sprained his hip. He gets through the interview with Esan with much feeling, agitated alternately by fear, and and built him an alliance, and made booths for his cattle; therefore the name of the place is called Succoth.

(19) And Jacob came to Shalem, a city of Caanaan, which is in the land of Shechem, where he had found his brother; and pitched his tent before the city. (20) And he bought a parcel of a city, where he had spread his tent, at the hand of the children of Hamor, Shechem’s father, for a hundred pieces of silver.

CHAPTER XXXIV.—(1) And Dinah the daughter of Leah, who was born to Jacob in Padan-aram, brought into the land of Canaan, (2) and when Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, prince of the country, saw her, he took her, and lay with her; and defiled her. (3) And his soul clave unto Dinah the daughter of Jacob, and he loved her more than all his children and his sisters.

(4) And his father Jacob said unto him, Why, my son? said he, why hast thou done this, saying, I will take for myself a wife of the daughters of the place? (5) As though thou shouldest get wives of the daughters of the place; of the daughters of the place thou mayest choose thee wives. (6) But the man dwelt with the daughter of his father-in-law; and he dwelt with her. (7) And Jacob, seeing that she was pleasant to his eyes, (8) said unto the man, Give me thy daughter to wife, seeing thou hast dealt kindly with me, for thou hast shewed me kindness in giving me thine daughter to wife, and shewing kindness unto me: give me also this thy daughter to wife. (9) And the man gave Jacob his daughter for wife. (10) And Jacob gave to the man all that he had gotten in Padan-aram, for sheep, and oxen, and servants, and maidservants, and she asses, and camels. (11) And Jacob came unto the land of his fathers to the land of Canaan. (12) And his wife Leah also conceived, and bare Jacob a son, (13) And she called his name Naphtali: for she said, I have borne my sorrow with me. (14) And Leah conceived again, and bare Jacob a son, (15) And she called his name Zebulun: for she said, God hath made me to dwell together with my sorrows. (16) And Leah conceived again, and bare Jacob a son, (17) And she called his name Issachar: for she said, God hath made me happy, and had given me sons. (18) And Leah conceived again, and bare Jacob a son, (19) And she called his name Joseph; and said, The Lord shall add to me more sons.
of Jacob, and he loved the damsel, and spake kindly unto the damsel. (5) And Shechem spake unto his father Hamor, saying, Get me this damsel to wife. (6) And Jacob heard that he had defiled Dinah his daughter: now his sons were with his cattle in the field; and Jacob held his peace until they were come. (7) And Hamor the father of Shechem went out unto Jacob to commune with him. (8) And the sons of Jacob came out of the field when they heard it: and the men were grieved, and they were very wroth, because he had wrought folly in Israel by lying with Jacob's daughter; which thing ought not to be done. (9) And Hamor communed with them, saying, The soul of my son Shechem longeth for your daughter: I pray you give her him to wife. (10) And make ye marriages with us, and give your daughters unto us, and take our daughters unto you. (11) And ye shall dwell with us: and the land shall be before you; dwell and trade ye therein, and get you possessions therein. (12) And Shechem said unto his father and unto his brethren, Let me find grace in your eyes, and what ye shall say unto me I will give. (13) Ask me never so much dowry and gift, and I will give according as ye shall say unto me: but give me the damsel to wife.

(14) And the sons of Jacob answered Shechem and Hamor his father deceitfully, and said, because he had defiled Dinah their sister: (15) and they said unto them, We cannot do this thing, to give our sister to one that is uncircumcised; for that were a reproach unto us: (16) but in this will we consent unto you: If ye will be as we be, that every male of you be circumcised; (17) then will we give our daughters unto you, and we will take your daughters to us, and we will dwell with you, and we will become one people. (18) But if ye will not hearken unto us, to be circumcised; then will we take our daughter, and we will be gone. (19) And their words pleased Hamor, and Shechem Hamor's son. (20) And the young man deferred not to do the thing, because he had delight in Jacob's daughter: and he was more honourable than all the house of his father. (21) And Hamor and Shechem his son came unto the gate of their city, and communed with the men of their city, saying, (22) These men are peaceable with us; therefore let them dwell in the land, and trade therein; for the land, behold, it is large show that Jacob was a new comer: for he proposes that the people should "let them dwell in the land," and therefore consent to the condition required by them that the Hivites should be circumcised. It would have been absurd thus to speak if Jacob had already dwelt there eight years with no apparent intention of going away.

(5) Jacob heard.—As Dinah did not return home (verse 20), her father probably learned her dishonour from the maidservants who had gone out with her. But "he held his peace," chiefly from his usual caution, as being no match for the Hivites, but partly because Leah's sons had the right to be the upholders of their sister's honour.

(7) He had wrought folly in Israel.—The great anger of Jacob's sons agrees as completely with the general harshness of their characters as the silence of the father with his habitual thoughtfulness; but it was aroused by a great wrong. The use, however, of the term Israel to signify the family of Jacob as distinguished from his person belongs to the age of Moses, and is one of the proofs of the arrangement of these records having been his work. In selecting them, and weaving them together into one history, he would add whatever was necessary, and in the latter half of this verse we apparently have one such addition.

(10) Ye shall dwell with us.—Hamor proposes that Jacob's family shall abandon their nomad life, and settle among the Hivites, and trade with them, and get possessions, not merely of cattle and movable goods, but of immovable property. He wished the two clans to coalesce into one community.

(12) Dowry and gift.—The word rendered dowry (mohar) is the price paid to the parents and relatives of the bride, though taking the form of a present. The gift (matthan) was the present made by the bridgroom to the bride herself. Besides this, her relatives were expected to give her presents, and with some tribes of Arabs it is usual even to make over to her the dowry.

(14) And said ... and they said.—These are two different verbs in the Hebrew, and should be translated and spake (because he had defiled Dinah their sister), and said. The intermediate words are parenthetical, and there is no reason for translating spake by plotted, laid a snare, as Gesenius and others have done.

(18) Their words pleased Hamor.—We gather from this that circumcision was a rite not only well known, but regarded as something honourable; for otherwise they would not so readily have submitted to a thing so painful.

(21) Let us take their daughters ...—In a young community, such as this of the Hivites at Shechem appears to have been, the addition of a large number of women was a valuable increase of their strength, and one that brought the promise also of future extension. Jacob's men were also chiefly of the Semitic stock, and therefore possessed of high physical and mental endowments; and as they were rich in cattle

1 Hebrew Jokhanan.
GENESIS, XXXV. Jacob’s Wrath against his Sons. enough for them; let us take their daughters to us for wives, and let us give them our daughters. (22) Only here-in will the men consent unto us for to dwell with us, to be one people, if every male among us be circumcised, as they are circumcised. (23) Shall not their cattle and their substance and every beast of their’s be our’s? only let us consent unto them, and they will dwell with us. (24) And unto Hamor and unto Shechem his son hearkened all that went out of the gate of his city; and every male was circumcised, all that went out of the gate of his city.

(25) And it came to pass on the third day, when they were sore, that two of the sons of Jacob, Simeon and Levi, Dinah’s brethren, took each man his sword, and came upon the city boldly, and slew all the males. (26) And they slew Hamor and Shechem his son with the edge of the sword, and took Dinah out of Shechem’s house, and went out. (27) The sons of Jacob came upon the

and other wealth, their incorporation with the people of Shechem would raise it to a high rank among the petty states of Canaan. There was much plausibility, therefore, in Hamor’s proposal and arguments.

(25) Simeon and Levi, Dinah’s brethren.—As born of the same mother, they, with Reuben and Judah, were especially bound to espouse their sister’s cause, but the method they took was cruel in the extreme. And it seems that these two were the leaders in the plot, having probably excluded Reuben from it, as a man of feeble character and opposed to bloodshed (chap. xxxvii. 22); and Judah, as one too honourable to take part in so nefarious a transaction. Long afterwards Jacob speaks of it in terms of the strongest reprobation (chap. xlix. 5–7). In executing their cruel deed, they would command the services of the more active and fierce portion of Jacob’s servants; but they must have been not boys, but men of ripe manhood, before they could have had influence or power enough for so terrible an exploit.

(27) The sons of Jacob.—After slaying Hamor and Shechem, the two brothers “took Dinah and went out.” It was after this that Jacob’s sons generally—though not without exceptions, for several of them were still very young—joined in seizing the spoil.

(28) Their little ones.—Heb., their tof. (See Note on chap. xvii. 13.) How erroneous is the translation “little ones” may be seen from Num. xxxi. 17, 18, which in the Heb. is, “Now, therefore, kill every male in the tof . . . and all the tof of women that are unmarried.” It would be monstrous to suppose that boys were to be put to death, and men escape, nor would little girls be likely to be married. In 2 Chron. xxxi. 18 the tof is distinguished both from the sons and daughters; and so also in chap. xx. 13, where we read “their tof and their children. The LXX. have altered the order here, but otherwise translate correctly their persons, that is, their property in men - servants and maid-slain, and spoiled the city, because they had defiled their sister. (28) They took their sheep, and their oxen, and their asses, and that which was in the city, and that which was in the field, (29) and all their wealth, and all their little ones, and their wives took they captive, and spoiled even all that was in the house.

(29) And Jacob said to Simeon and Levi, Ye have troubled me to make me to stink among the inhabitants of the land, among the Canaanites and the Perizites: and I being few in number, they shall gather themselves together against me, and slay me; and I shall be destroyed, I and my house. (30) And they said, Should he deal with our sister as with an harlot?

CHAPTER XXXV.—(1) And God said unto Jacob, Arise, go up to Beth-el, and dwell there: and make there an altar unto God, that appeared unto thee when thou fleddest from the face of servants, as opposed to their cattle and their wealth in goods. In chap. 1. 8 the LXX. translate clau, and in verse 21 household. The slaves thus seized would form the most valuable part probably of the spoil.

(29) Ye have troubled me.—Jacob’s timidity led him to think first of the danger that would result from the conduct of his sons, and only afterwards of the cruelty and treacherousness of their deed. He commented upon this on his dying bed in words of fitting reprobation, but his reply now is singularly weak, and the retrospect of his sons just. If the danger were all, this could have no weight when a shameful wrong had been done; but in avenging this wrong they had committed a crime of a deeper dye

XXXV. Jacob returns to Beth-el and Hebron. —Death of Isaac.

(1) Arise, go up to Beth-el. —The position of Jacob at Shechem had become dangerous; for though the first result of the high-handed proceeding of Simeon and Levi was to strike the natives with terror (verse 5), yet reprisals might follow if they had time to learn the comparatively small number of Jacob’s followers. It was necessary, therefore, to remove; but besides this, Bethel was the goal of the patriarch’s journeyings. He had made a solemn vow there on his journey to Padan-aram, and though forty-two years had elapsed, it had not been forgotten (see chap. xxxi. 13); and the Divine command to go thither was the outward authorisation of what his own conscience dictated. On this account we cannot believe that he had remained long at Shechem. Nouns are singularly leisurely in their movements. There is nothing of the rush and hurry of city life in their doings or purposes. They are capable of a great effort occasionally, but then relapse into their usual slowness. And so, when Jacob found good pasture and Esau thy brother. (2) Then Jacob said unto his household, and to all that were with him, Put away the strange gods that are among you, and be clean, and change your garments: (3) and let us arise, and go up to Beth-el; and I will make there an altar unto God, who answered me in the day of my distress, and was with me in the way which I went. (4) And they gave unto Jacob all the strange gods which were in their hand, and all their earrings which were in their ears; and Jacob hid them under the oak which was by Shechem. (5) And they journeyed: and the terror of God was upon the cities that were round about them, and they did not pursue after the sons of Jacob.

(6) So Jacob came to Luz, which is in the land of Canaan, that is, Beth-el, he and all the people that were with him. (7) And he built there an altar, and called the place 1 El-beth-el: because there God appeared unto him, when he fled from the face of his brother.

(8) But Deborah Rebeckah's nurse died, and she was buried beneath Beth-el under an oak: and the name of it was called 2 Allon-bachuth. (9) And God appeared unto Jacob again, when he came out of Pudan-aram, and blessed him. (10) And God said unto him, Thy name is Jacob: thy name shall not be called any more Jacob, but Israel shall be thy name: and he called plenty of room for his cattle at Shechem, he remained there for awhile; but he did not abandon his purpose of going first to Beth-el, and finally to Hebron.

(3) Strange gods. — Besides Rachel's teraphim, many, probably, of the persons acquired by Jacob at Haran were idolaters, and had brought their gods with them. Besides these, the numerous men and women who formed the "tafs" of the Shechemites were certainly worshippers of false deities. The object, then, of this reformation was not merely to raise Jacob's own family to a higher spiritual state, but also to initiate the many heathen belonging to their households into the true religion. Outward rites of purification and changes of garment were to accompany the religious teaching given, because of their symbolical value; and we can well believe that much deep and earnest religious feeling would be evoked by the solemnities which accompanied this drawing near of the whole tribe to God. This reformation is also interesting as being the first of a long series of such acts constantly recurring in the history of Israel; and especially it is parallel to the sanctification of the people at Sinai. There, also, there was the initiation not merely of the linical Israel, but also of the mixed multitude, into the true religion — for Jacob's family had then grown into a nation; and there, also, symbolical washings were enjoined (Exod. xix. 10—14). These subsequently were still practised under the Law, and grew into the baptism by which we are now admitted into the Church of Christ.

(5) Who answered me. — The narrative of Jacob's life, and the detail of God's providential care of him, would doubtless affect strongly the minds of his followers, and make them ready to abandon their idols, "and worship the God that was Israel's God" (chap. xxxiii. 20).

(6) Earrings. — Earrings seem to have been worn not so much for ornament as for superstitious purposes, being regarded as talismans or amulets. Hence it was from their earrings that Aaron made the golden calf (Exod. xxx. 2—4).

The oak. — Not Abraham's oak-grove (chap. xvi. 6), referred to probably in Judges ix. 6, 37—the Hebrew word in these three places being elon—but that under which Joshua set up his pillar of witness (Josh. xxiv. 26), the tree being in both these places called othik, or oth, a terebinth.

(3) The terror. — Heb., a terror of God, that is, a very great terror (see chaps. xxiii. 6, xxx. 5). But to the deeply religious mind of the Hebrew everything that was great and wonderful was the result of the direct working of the Deity. (But see Note on chap. xlviii. 22.)

(7) El-beth-el. — That is, the God of the house of God; the God into whose house he had been admitted, and seen there the wonders of His providence.

God appeared. — The verb here, contrary to rule, is plural (see Note on chap. xx. 14), but the Samaritan Pentateuch has the singular. No argument can be drawn either way from the version, as the word for God is singular in them all, and the verb necessarily singular also. In no other language but Hebrew is the name of God plural, but joined with verbs and adjectives in the singular.

Deborah. — As she was at Hebron with Rebeckah when Jacob journeyed to Haran, he must have somehow gone thither before this, have seen his father, and told him of his fortunes. Apparently Rebeckah was then dead, and Jacob brought back Deborah with him. (See Note on chap. xxxiii. 13.) How dear she was to him is shown by their calling the tree under which she was buried the oak of weeping. This oak was "beneath Beth-el," that is, in the valley below it. Deborah must have died at a great age, for she gave Rebeckah sack, and must therefore have been grown up at her birth. Now Jacob, when he returned from Padan-aram, was ninety-seven years of age; and as he was born twenty years after his mother's marriage—if we allow the shortest possible space for the interval spent at Succoth and Shechem—Deborah must have been nearly one hundred and sixty years of age. This again confirms the conclusion that Dinah's dishonour occurred very soon after the arrival of Jacob at Shechem.

(8) When he came out of Padan-aram. — The word "out" is not in the Hebrew, which says, on his coming from—that is, on his arrival at Beth-el from Padan-aram. The insertion of the word "out" leads to a confusion with the revelation recorded in chap. xxxi. 3. At Beth-el Jacob, when going forth, had seen the dream which assured him of Divine protection; at Beth-el, on his return, God renews the covenant, confirms to him the name of Israel, and transfers to him the promises of a numerous seed and of the possession of the land. It was the ratification to him of the inheritance of all the hopes and assurances given to Abraham.

GENESIS, XXXV.

God Appears to him.

(11) God Almighty.—Heb., El-shaddai, the name by which God had entered into the covenant with Abraham (chap. xvii. 1). A company.—Heb., a congregation of nations. (See chap. xxviii. 3, where it is “a congregation,” or church, “of peoples.”)

(13) God went up from him.—This formula, used before in chaps. xxvi. 22, xviii. 33, shows that this manifestation of God’s presence was more solemn than any of those previous occasions upon which the Deity had revealed Himself to Jacob. It was, in fact, the acknowledgment of the patriarch as the heir of the Abrahamic covenant.

(14) Jacob set up a pillar.—In doing this Jacob was imitating his previous action when God manifested Himself to him in his journey to Haran, chap. xxviii. 18. This consecration of it by pouring on it oil, and offering to God a drink-offering, was in itself natural and right. But as these memorial pillars were subsequently worshipped, they were expressly forbidden by the Mosaic law. They correctly rendered “pillar” in this place being translated standing image in Lev. xxvi. 1, and image in Deut. xvi. 22.

(15) Jacob called . . .—See chap. xxviii. 19. The name had, of course, remained unknown and unused, as what then passed had been confined to Jacob’s own inward consciousness. He now teaches the name to his family, explains the reason why he first gave it, and requires them to enshrine it. But with so grand a beginning the town was debased to unholy uses, and from being Beth-el, the house of God, it became Bethaven, the house of iniquity (Hos. x. 5).

(16) But a little way.—Heb., and there was still a “chabrah” of land to come to Ephrath. This word occurs four times in the Old Testament; here, in chap. xviii. 7, in 2 Kings v. 19, and in Amos ix. 9, where it is used in the sense of a siege. Many of the Rabbins, therefore, translate “in the spring-time,” because the earth is then riddled by the plough like a sieve; and the Targum and Vulgate adopt this rendering. The real meaning of the word is lost, but probably it was a measure of distance; and the Jewish interpreters generally think that it meant a mile, because Rachel’s traditional tomb was about that distance from Bethlehem.

and there was but a little way to come to Ephrath: and Rachel travailed, and she had hard labour. (12) And it came to pass, when she was in hard labour, that the midwife said unto her, Fear not; thou shalt have this son also. (18) And it came to pass, as her soul was in departing, (for she died) that she called his name Ben-oni: but his father called him Benjamin. (20) And Jacob set a pillar upon her grave: that is the pillar of Rachel’s grave unto this day. (21) And Israel journeyed, and spread his tent beyond the tower of Edar. (22) And it came to pass, when Israel

Ephrath (the fruitful) and Beth-lehem (the house of bread) have virtually the same meaning, but the latter name would be given to the town only when its pastures had given place to arable lands, where corn was sown for bread.

(22) Ben-oni . . . Benjamin.—Rachel, in her dying moments, names her child the son of my sorrow: for though his has a double meaning, and is translated strength in chap. xlix. 3, yet, doubtless, her feeling was that the life of her offspring was purchased by her own pain and death. Jacob’s name, “son of the right hand,” was probably given not merely that the child might bear no ill-omened title, but to mark his sense of the value and preciousness of his last born son. Abravanel well remarks that earthly happiness is never perfect, and that the receiving of Divine revelations made no difference to Jacob’s earthly lot. God had just solemnly appeared to him, and he is on his last journey, within two days’ easy march of Hebron, when he loses the wife whom he so loved. For more than forty years he had been an exile from his home; he was now close to it, but may never welcome there the one for whom he had so deep and lasting an affection.

(23) That is the pillar of Rachel’s grave unto this day.—This is a later addition, but whether inserted by Moses or Ezra we cannot tell. Its site was known in the days of Samuel (1 Sam. x. 2); and as the pillar would be a mass of unwrought stone, with which the natives would have no object in interfering, its identification upon the conquest of Canaan would not be difficult.

(24) The tower of Edar.—Heb., Eder. Micaeh (chap. iv. 8) calls it “the hill of the daughter of Zion;” but the word used often means a beacon-hill, a hill on which a tower for observation is erected, wrongly translated in the Authorized Version a stronghold. The tower may, therefore, have been a few miles south of Jerusalem; and as the word “beyond” includes the idea of up to, as far as, the meaning is that Jacob now occupied this region permanently with his cattle. Until Esaun, with his possessions, withdrew to Seir, there would be no room for Jacob and his flocks and herds at Hebron, but he would at Eder be so near his father as to be able often to visit him. And thus his exile was now over, and he was at last at home.

(25) Reuben.—Again another grief for Jacob to mar his return home, and this time it arises from the dwelt in that land, that Reuben went and lay with Bilhah his father’s concubine; and Israel heard it. Now the sons of Jacob were twelve:

(23) The sons of Leah; Reuben, Jacob’s first-born, and Simeon, and Levi, and Judah, and Issachar, and Zebulun; (24) The sons of Rachel; Joseph, and Benjamin; (25) and the sons of Bilhah, Rachel’s handmaid; Dan, and Naphtali; (26) and the sons of Zilpah, Leah’s handmaid; Gad, and Asher: these are the sons of Jacob, which were born to him in Padan-aram.

The Sons of Leah.

GENESIS, XXXVI.

The Death of Isaac.

(27) And Jacob came unto Isaac his father unto Mamre, unto the city of Arbah, which is Hebron, where Abraham and Isaac sojourned. (28) And the days of Isaac were an hundred and four-score years. (29) And Isaac gave up the ghost, and died, and was gathered unto his people, being old and full of days: and his sons Esau and Jacob buried him.

CHAPTER XXXVI.—(1) Now these are the generations of Esau, who is sin of his first-born, who thereby forfeits the birthright. It was the thought of these miseries, following upon his long years of exile, which made Jacob speak so sorrowfully of his experience of life before Pharaoh (chap. xlvi. 9).

And Israel heard it. — The Masora notes that some words have here fallen out of the text, which the LXX. fill up by adding: “And it was evil in his sight.”

In Padan-aram. — The words are to be taken only generally, as Benjamin was born in Canaan.

(27) The city of Arbah, which is Hebron. — Better rendered Kirjath-arba in chap. xxiii. 2, where see Note.

(28) The days of Isaac were an hundred and four-score years. — As Isaac was sixty when his sons were born, Jacob was one hundred and twenty years of age at his father’s death, and one hundred and thirty when he appeared before Pharaoh (chap. xlvi. 9). Now, as Joseph was seventeen when sold into Egypt (chap. xxxvii. 2), and thirty when raised to power (chap. xii. 46), and as the seven years of plenty and two of the years of famine had passed before Jacob went down into Egypt, it follows that the cruel deed, whereby he was robbed of his favourite child, was committed about twelve years before the death of Isaac.

(29) Esau and Jacob buried him. — Esau, who apparently still dwelt at Hebron until his father’s death, takes here the precedence as his natural right. But having in previous expeditions learnt the physical advantages of the land of Seir, and the powerlessness of the Horites to resist him, he gives up Hebron to his brother, and migrates with his large wealth to that country.

XXXVI.

The Toldoth Esau.

(1) The generations of Esau. — This toldoth, consisting of chaps. xxxvi. — xxxvii. 1, is very remarkable, if it were only for the difficulties with which it abounds, and which have too often been aggravated by the determination of commentators to make Holy Scripture tend to their pre-conceived ideas as to what it ought to be, instead of dutifully accepting it as it is. It begins with an enumeration of Esau’s wives, in which the names are different from those given in chaps. xvi. 34, xviii. 9. Next we have the genealogy of Esau, upon the same principle as that whereby the toldoth Ishmael was inserted immediately after the history of Abram’s descent (chap. xii. 12—15): but this is followed, in verses 20—30, by a genealogy of the Horite inhabitants of Mount Seir. Among these Esau dwelt as the predominant power, but nevertheless on friendly terms, for a reason which we shall see hereafter. We next have a list of kings who are said to have reigned in Edom “before there reigned any king over the children of Israel.” This is not a prophetic portion of the Bible, but a dry genealogical table, and the attempts made to evade the plain meaning of the words, namely, that at the time when this list of kings was written there were kings in Israel, are painful to read, and can have no other effect than to harden sceptics in unbelief. Of these Edomite kings, it is remarkable that they do not succeed one another by hereditary succession, nor have they the same capital, but seem to belong to a time of anarchy, like that which existed in Israel under the Judges. During this period the Edomites and Horites were fused together, chiefly by conquest (Deut. ii. 12, 22), but partly also by the gradual dying out of the inferior race, just as the red man is fading away in North America, and the Maori in New Zealand. Finally, we have a list of the eleven dukes of Edom, “after their places.” As these dukes represented tribes or clans, this catalogue is geographical, and as such it is described in verse 43, and was intended to give the political arrangement of the land at the later date when this addition was made, and when considerable changes had taken place since the time of the first settlement.

These last two documents, forming verses 31—43, were probably added at the time when the Books of Samuel were composed; but as we find the list of the kings given also in 1 Chron. i. 43—50, and at that date great activity existed in completing the canon of Holy Scripture, some suppose that the lists in both places are by the same hand. It is entirely wrong to describe them as interpolations; for it was the rule to add to and complete genealogies; and besides there existed in the Jewish Church a living authority in the prophets who had the right and power to make necessary additions to the Divine record. It is to the “schools of the prophets” that we owe, under God’s providence, the existence of most of the Old Testament Scriptures, and the preservation of all of them; and they did not preserve them for the sake of the authors, but for the sake of what was written. And there is nothing derogatory to the authority or inspiration of Holy Scripture in believing that the prophets were from time to time moved by the Spirit to add to what had been written. The contents of the Old Testament bear witness everywhere to the scrupulous fidelity with which men guarded in the prophetic schools the sacred deposit entrusted to their care; but it is equally certain that we find notes inserted from time to time, as in chap. xxxv. 29, Edom. (2) Esau took his wives of the daughters of Canaan; Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite, and Abilhamah the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite; (3) and Bashemath Ishmael's daughter, sister of Nebajoth. (4) And (5) Adah bare to Esau Eliphaz; and Bashemath bare Reuel; (6) and Aholibamah bare Jeush, and Jaalam, and Korah: these are the sons of Esau, which were born unto him in the land of Canaan.

(6) And Esau took his wives, and his sons, and his daughters, and all the persons of his house, and his cattle, and all his beasts, and all his substance, which he had got in the land of Canaan; and went into the country from the face of his brother Jacob. (7) For their riches were more than that they might

No one can doubt but that the remark that the pillar standing on Rachel's grave "unto this day" was the same stone which Jacob had set up, was inserted at a later date, and apparently after the conquest of Canaan. So in chap. xiv. 17 we have a note inserted subsequently to the establishment of the kingly office. Why should there be any difficulty in believing that these two lists of kings and dukes, added to complete a genealogy, belonged also to a time when there were kings in Israel? It is probable, however, that the list of kings given here is of an earlier date than that in the first chapter of Chronicles, for Hadad (more correctly, in Chronicles, Hadad) seems to have been living when this document was composed, and hence the full information about his wife, In Chronicles (chap i. 51) there is added "Hadad died also." And if he really were alive when this catalogue was written, he had by that time been dead for centuries; for its date would then be one comparatively early.

(2) Adah the daughter of Elon the Hittite.—In chap. xxvi. 34, she is called "Bashemath the daughter of Elon the Hittite," and is placed second. Here she is everywhere placed first. We do not often elsewhere find women possessed of two names, but it has not been sufficiently borne in mind that she was a Hittite, and her own name in her own language neither Adah nor Bashemath. As Adah means ornament, and Bashemath sweet-scented, both may possibly have been terms of endearment, arising from modifications of her Hittite name.

Aholibamah the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon the Hivite.—She is supposed to answer to Judith the daughter of "Beeri the Hittite," in chap. xxvi. 31. But in verses 24, 25, we find her genealogy given again, and Zibeon, the father of Anah, the father of Aholibaham, is there described as a Horite. Now, as Hittie (Hivite) and Hori (Horite) differ in Hebrew only in the length of the top of the middle letter, and as mistakes in the transcription of Biblical names are of constant occurrence, it seems certain that Aholibamah was a Hivite, and therefore, entirely distinct from Judith. Judith, the first wife, apparently had no children, and hence avarice was the temptation to Esau to marry some one besides. Hence, too, Adah comes in her proper order, as being the first wife who had sons; and Eliphaz as the son of the first wife who had children, has the right of primogeniture. Hence, too, Aholibamah in the genealogy is always placed third. She was the fourth and last wife taken, and her children are placed after those of Bashemath. And this was a matter of far too great importance in a genealogy for there to be any mistake made in it. And now we see the reason for giving the genealogy of the Horites, and also why Esan took the Horite land for a possession. In some expedition into the country of Seir, Esan had married the daughter of one of the dukes there, and through her had acquired a right to ducal rank. Through her family, moreover, he had friendly relations with one portion at least of the Horite people. Our knowledge of the princely Hittites has of late been too largely increased for us to be able to connect a Horite race with them, and Rebekah distinctly calls Judith and Adah-Bashemath daughters of Heth. Excepting the Semites, no race in Palestine stands so high as the Hittites, and no race so low as the Horites. But their rulers were probably of a higher breed, and Esan’s invasions of their country, his final settlement there, and the introduction of the genealogy of "Seir the Horite," together with Aholibamah’s place as the last of Esan’s wives, all are facts which strongly confirm the supposition of his having contracted a Horite marriage during Jacob’s absence in Padan-aram.

The meaning of the Horites is not a deduction merely from their having dwelt in caves, for the country is so admirably adapted to this mode of living that it still exists there; but they are omitted from the table of nations in chap. x., and seem generally to have been a feeble aboriginal race.

(3) Bashemath Ishmael’s daughter, sister of Nebajoth.—The Samaritan text reads Mahalath here, and in verses 4, 10, 17, as in chap. xxviii. 9. There can be little doubt that Mahalath is the right reading, but the versions, nevertheless, agree with the Masoretic Hebrew text, so that the error must have been of very ancient date. As Mahalath was of a Semitic stock, she would have her own Semitic name, and there would be no double translation of it, as in the case of the daughter of Esan.

(4) In the land of Canaan.—We find Esan with a band of armed men in Seir on Jacob’s return from Padan-aram, but he still had his home at Hebron with his father until Isaac’s death, twenty-two years afterwards. Evidently he had taken Aholibamah home thither, and she had borne him three sons. After Isaac’s death the land of Seir had so great attractions for him that he migrated thither with his share of Isaac’s wealth, and left Hebron to Jacob, who now moved down thither from the town of Eder, and took possession of the homestead of his fathers. And thus the inheritance of the birthright came finally to Jacob by Esan’s own act, and would doubtless have so come to him; only his father’s blessing and the transference to him of the Abrahamic promises would have been given him, not at the time of Isaac’s temporary illness, but on his deathbed.

(5) Into the country from the face.—Heb., into a land away from the face, &c.

(7) The land wherein they were strangers.—The large growth of their wealth made the separation of Esan and Jacob as inevitable as had been that of Abraham and Lot. It is a usual incident in the life of nomads, and a tribe can multiply only to the extent of dwell together; and the land wherein they were strangers could not bear them because of their cattle. (8) Thus dwelt Esau in mount Seir: Esau is Edom.

(9) And these are the generations of Esau the father of Edom in mount Seir: (10) these are the names of Esau’s sons; Eliphaz the son of Adah, the wife of Esau, Reuel the son of Basemathe the wife of Esau. (11) And the sons of Eliphaz were Teman, Omar, Zepho, and Gatam, and Kenaz. (12) And Timna was concubine to Eliphaz Esau’s son; and she bare to Eliphaz Amalek; these were the sons of Adah Esau’s wife. (13) And these are the sons of Reuel; Nahath, and Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah; these were the sons of Basemathe Esau’s wife. (14) And these were the sons of Ahobilamah, the daughter of Anah the daughter of Zibeon, Esau’s wife: and she bare to Esau Jeush, and Jadaal, and Korah.

the equabilities of their district to support them. When this is reached, one portion of the tribe must seek a new home. This necessity was in the present case aggravated by Esau and Jacob being only sojourners in Canaan, surrounded by tribes who claimed to be owners of the soil; and this may have helped in determining Esau’s choice: for in right of Ahobilamah, he was in his country a duke. Maimonides also observes, that though Esau had gone on hunting expeditions to Seir, and even possibly for plunder, yet that he was not sufficiently powerful to take possession of the country until by Isaac’s death the number of his retainers was largely multiplied.

(9) Mount Seir.—The land of Edom extends from the southern extremity of the Dead Sea to the Gulf of Elath, and consists of a chain of mountains running parallel to the Akaba, or continuation of the deep depression through which the Jordan flows till it loses itself in the Dead Sea. The hills are of limestone, with masses here and there of basalt; and though large portions are so covered with stones as to be barren, the rest is moderately fertile, not indeed in corn, but in figs, pomegranates, and other fruits. The climate is pleasant, the heat in summer being moderated by cool winds, but the winters are cold. The border of it was distant only some fifty or sixty miles from Hebron, so that Esau’s transference of himself and his retainer was an easy matter. (Comp. Note on chap. xxvii. 39.)

(10) The father of the Edomites.—Hab., the father of Edom. He was himself the man Edom, but the word here means the country of which he was the colonizer.

(11) Amalek.—We have already read of the “field of the Amalekite” in chap. xiv. 7. As Balaam describes Amalek as “the beginning of nations” (so the Heb. Num. xxiv. 20), for we gather from Amos vi. 1 that the phrase used by Balaam implied precedence and nobility.

It was, moreover, one of the most widely spread races of antiquity, occupying the whole country from Shur, on the borders of Egypt, to Havilah, in Arabia Felix. But probably there was a fusion of some of the Horites with the Amalekites, just as the Kenezites, under Caleb, were fused into the tribe of Judah. For in 1 Chron. iv. 42, 43, we find the Simeonites invading Mount Seir, and smiting Amalekites there. Of these Amalekites in Seir, Amalek, the grandson of Esau, was probably the founder: for in verse 16 he is called a duke, and therefore one district of the country would belong to his descendants, in the same manner as each son of Jacob had a territory called after his name. In this district the chiefs would be Semites of the race of Esau; the mass of the people a blended race of Horites and Amalekites. There is no difficulty in the absence of their names from chap. x. Though Balaam magnified them, they were regarded by Israel, not as a nation, but as a hateful horde of plunderers.

Dukes.—Duke is the Latin word dux, a leader, but the Hebrew word alaph signifies a tribal prince. It is derived from elaph, a thousand, used in much the same way as the word hundred with us for a division of the country. Probably it was one large enough to have in it a thousand grown men, whereas a hundred in Saxon times was a district in which there were a hundred households. For this use of it, see Mich v. 2. Each alaph, therefore, would be the prince of one of these districts, assigned to him as the possession of himself and his seed.

(16) Duke Korah.—The Samaritan Pentateuch rightly omits this name. He was a son of the Horite wife, Ahobilamah.

(17) Duke Jeush . . .—Ahobilamah’s three sons are dukes, but only the grandsons of the other wives. The reason of this probably is that she belonged to the dominant family of Seir, and her sons took the command of districts and tribes of the Horite people in her right.

(18) The sons of Seir the Horite.—This genealogy is given partly because it contains that of Ahobilamah, (21) and Dishon, and Ezer, and Dishan: these are the dukes of the Horites, the children of Seir in the land of Edom.
(22) And the children of Lotan were Hori and Hemam; and Lotan’s sister was Timna. (23) And the children of Shobal were these; Alvan, and Manahath, and Ebal, Shephoa, and Onam. (24) And these are the children of Zibeon; both Ajah, and Anah: this was that Anah that found the mules in the wilderness, as he fed the asses of Zibeon his father. (25) And the children of Anah were these; Dishon, and Aholibamah the daughter of Anah. (26) And these are the children of Dishon; Hemdan, and Eshban, and Itir, and Cheran. (27) The children of Ezer are these; Bilhan, and Zaavan, and Akan. (28) The children of Dishan are these; Uz, and Aran. (29) These are the dukes that came of Seir: duke Lotan, duke Shobal, duke Zibeon, duke Anah, (30) duke Dishon, duke Ezer, duke Dishan: these are the dukes that came of Hor, among their dukes in the land of Seir.
(31) And these are the kings that reigned in the land of Edom, before there reigned any king over the children of Israel. (32) And Bela the son of Beor reigned in Edom: and the name of his city was Dinhabah. (33) And Bela died, and Jobab the son of Zerah of Bozrah reigned in his stead. (34) And Jobab died, and Husham of the land of Temani reigned in his stead. (35) And Husham died, and Hadad the son of Bedad, who smote Midian in the field of Moab, reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Avith. (36) And Hadad died, and Samlah of Masrekah reigned in his stead. (37) And Samlah died, and Saul of Rehoboth by the river reigned in his stead. (38) And Saul died, and Baal-hanan the son of Achbor reigned in his stead. (39) And Baal-hanan the son of Achbor died, and Hadar reigned in his stead: and the name of his city was Pau; and his wife’s name was Mehetabel, the daughter of Matred, the daughter of Mezahab.
(40) And these are the names of the dukes that came of Esau, according to their families, after their places, by their names; duke Timnah, duke Alvah, duke Jetheth, (41) duke Aholi-Joseph’s Coat.

Feeding the flock with his brethren; and the lad was with the sons of Bilhah, and with the sons of Zilpah, his father’s wives: and Joseph brought unto his father their evil report. (3) Now Israel loved Joseph more than all his children, because he was the son of his old age: and he made him a coat of many colours. (4) And when his brethren saw that their father loved him more than all his brethren, they hated him, and could not speak peaceably unto him.

And the lad was with the sons of Bilhah, and with the sons of Zilpah.—Heb., And he was laid with the sons of Bilhah, &c. The probable meaning of this is, that as the youngest son it was his duty to wait upon his brothers, just as David had to look after the sheep, while his brothers went to the festival; and was also sent to the camp to attend to them (1 Sam. xvi. 11, xvii. 17, 18). The sons of Jacob were dispersed in detachments over the large extent of country occupied by Jacob’s cattle, and Joseph probably after his mother’s death, when he was about nine years old, would be brought up in the tent of Bilhah, his mother’s handmaid. He would naturally, therefore, go with her sons, with whom were also the sons of the other handmaid. They do not seem to have taken any special part in Joseph’s sale.

Joseph brought unto his father their evil report.—Heb., Joseph brought an evil report of them unto their father.

(3) He was the son of his old age.—Joseph was ninety-one when Joseph was born; but at Benjamin’s birth he was eight or nine years older; and according to the common belief that Jacob was only twenty years in Padan-aram, the four sons of the handmaids must have been about Joseph’s age; and Leah’s last two sons even younger. But the epithet is intelligible if Jacob had waited twenty-seven years after his marriage with Rachel, before Joseph was born. There would then be a considerable interval between him and the other sons; and though Rachel had a second son some years afterwards, yet Joseph would continue to be the son long looked for, whose birth had given him so great happiness; whereas his joy at Benjamin’s coming was bought at the terrible price of the mother’s death.

A coat of many colours.—Two explanations are given of this phrase; the first, that it was a long garment with sleeves or fringes; the other, that it was composed of patchwork of various colours. The latter is the more probable interpretation; for from the tomb at Beni-Hassan we learn that such dresses were worn in Palestine, as a train of captive Jebusites is represented upon it clad in rich robes, the patterns of which seem to have been produced by sewing together small pieces of different colours. So also in India beautiful dresses are made by sewing together strips of crimson, purple, and other colours. (Roberts’ Oriental Illustrations, p. 43.) Some have thought that Jacob by this Joseph's Dreams.

(5) And Joseph dreamed a dream, and he told it his brethren: and they hated him yet the more. (6) And he said unto them, Hear, I pray you, this dream which I have dreamed: (7) for, behold, we were binding sheaves in the field, and, lo, my sheaf arose, and also stood upright; and, behold, your sheaves stood round about, and made obeisance to my sheaf. (8) And his brethren said to him, Shalt thou indeed reign over us? or shalt thou indeed have dominion over us? And they hated him yet the more for his dreams, and for his words. (9) And he dreamed yet another dream, and told it his brethren, and said, Behold, I have dreamed a dream more; and, behold, the sun and the moon and the eleven stars made obeisance to me.

(10) And he told it to his father, and to his brethren: and his father rebuked him, and said unto him, What is this dream that thou hast dreamt? Shall dress marked out Joseph as the future head of the family, in the place of Reuben, supposing it to indicate the priestly office borne by the firstborn; but this is doubtful, and it was Judah to whom Jacob gave the right of primogeniture.

(9) Joseph dreamed a dream.—Though dreams as a rule do but arise from the mind being weared with overmuch business (Eccles. v. 3), or other trivial causes; yet as being from time to time used by God for providential purposes, they are occasionally described as a lower kind of prophecy (Num. xi. 6—8; Deut. xiii. 1; 1 Sam. xviii. 15). In the life of Joseph they form the turning point in his history, and it is to be noticed that while revelations were frequently made to Jacob, we have henceforward no record of any such direct communication from God to man until the time of Moses. The utmost granted to Joseph was to dream dreams; and after this the children of Israel in Egypt were left entirely to natural laws and influences. (Comp. Note on chap. xxvi. 2.)

(7) Stood upright.—Hence, took its station. It is the verb used in chap. xxiv. 13, where see Note. It implies that the sheaf took the position of chief. We gather from this dream that Jacob practised agriculture, not occasionally, as had been the case with Isaac (chap. xxvi. 12), but regularly, as seems to have been usual also at Haran (chap. xxx. 14).

(8) His father rebuked him.—In making the sun and moon bow down before him, Joseph's dream seemed to violate the respect due to parents. As Jacob probably regarded his son's dreams as the result of his letting his fancy dwell upon ideas of self-exaltation, he rightly rebuked him; while, nevertheless, "observing his saying" (Comp. Luke ii. 51.)

Thy mother.—Rachel was certainly dead, as Joseph had at this time eleven brethren. Nor did Leah ever how down before him; for she died at Hebron (chap. xxxix. 31). The enumeration of "sun, moon, and stars," means Jacob, his wives, and his children, that is, the whole family, elders and juniors, were to make obeisance to Joseph. It is a general phrase, like that in chap. xxxv. 26, and is not to be too literally interpreted. But as the handmaids were both of them younger than either Rachel or Leah, they may have gone down with Jacob into Egypt; and probably Bithah had done a mother's part by Joseph after Rachel's death.

(12) Shechem.—Jacob's sons seem to have retained Shechem, by right of their high-handed proceedings related in chap. xxxiv. 27—29. By seizing the "tafs" of the Shechemites, Simeon and Levi must have added large numbers of grown men to the roll of their retainers; and after accustoming them to their service, they would have become powerful enough to resist any attacks of the natives. (See chap. xxxiv. 29, and Note on chap. xvii. 13). But it gives us a great idea of Jacob's wealth and power, that while dwelling a little to the north of Hebron, he should send part of his cattle so far away as to Shechem, a distance of sixty miles.

(14) Whether it be well with thy brethren.—Jacob might well fear lest the natives should form a confederacy against his sons, and take vengeance upon them for their cruelty. They were too fierce to themselves to have any such alarm, but Jacob was of a far more timid disposition.

The vale of Hebron.—The flocks and herds which formed the portion of Jacob's cattle which pastured nearest home, occupied the country immediately to the north of Hebron as far as the tower of Eder; but he would no doubt pitch his own tent as near as possible to that of his father.

(17) Dothan.—This town was twelve miles north of Shechem, and is famous as being the place where Elisha struck the Syrian army with blindness (2 Kings vi. 13—23). It is situated in a small but fertile valley, and for I heard them say, Let us go to Dothan. And Joseph went after his brethren, and found them in Dothan.
(19) And when they saw him afar off, even before he came near unto them,
they conspired against him to slay him.
(20) And they said one to another,
Behold, this dreamer cometh.
(21) Come now therefore, and let us slay him, and cast him into some pit, and we will say, Some evil beast hath devoured him: and we shall see what will become of his dreams. (22) And Reuben heard it, and he delivered him out of their hands; and said, Let us not kill him.
(22) And Reuben said unto them, Shed no blood, but cast him into this pit that is in the wilderness, and lay no hand upon him; that he might rid him out of their hands, to deliver him to his father again.
(23) And it came to pass, when Joseph was come unto his brethren, that they striped Joseph out of his coat, his coat of many colours that was on him;
(24) and they took him, and cast him into a pit: and the pit was empty, there was no water in it. (25) And they sat down to eat bread: and they lifted up their eyes and looked, and beheld, a company of Ishmeelites came from Gilead with their camels bearing spicery and balm and myrrh, going to carry it down to Egypt. (26) And Judah said unto his brethren, What profit is it if we slay our brother, and conceal his Jacob's sons, having exhausted the produce of the larger plain round Shechem, had moved northward thither. Not having found them at Shechem, Joseph did not know where to go, but wandered about "in the field"—the open downs—till he met some one who could give him information. Had he been a practised hunter, like Esau, he would have followed them by the tracks of the cattle.

This dreamer.—Heb., this lord of dreams, a phrase expressive of contempt.

Into some pit.—Heb., into one of the pits, that is, cisterns dug to catch and preserve the rain water.
In summer they are dry, and a man thrown into one of them would have very little chance of escape, as they are not only deep, but narrow at the top. The Jewish interpreters accuse Simeon of being the prime mover in the plot, and say that this was the reason why Joseph cast him into prison (chap. xlii. 24).

Into this pit that is in the wilderness.—
Reuben apparently pointed to some cistern in the desolate region which girds the little valley of Dothan around. We learn from chap. xlii. 21 that Joseph begged hard for mercy, and to be spared so painful a death, but that his brothers would not hear.

Though never represented in the Scriptures as a type of Christ, yet the whole of the Old Testament is so full of events and histories, which reappear in the Gospel narrative, that the Fathers have never hesitated in regarding Joseph, the innocent delivered to death, but raised thence to glory, as especially typifying to us our Lord. Pascal (Pensées, ii. 9, 2) sums up the points of resemblance—in his father's love for him, his being sent to see after the peace of his brethren, their conspiring against him, his being sold for twenty pieces of silver, his rising from his humiliation to be the lord and saviour of those who had wronged him, and with them the saviour also of the world. As too, he was in prison with two malefactors, so was our Lord crucified between two thieves; and as one of these was saved and one left to his condemnation, so Joseph gave deliverance to the chief butler, but to the chief baker punishment.
It would be easy to point out other resemblances, but, leaving these, it is important also to notice that Joseph's history is likewise a vindication of God's providential dealings with men. He is innocent, and pure in life, but wronged again and again; yet every wrong was but a step in the pathway of his exaltation. And like the histories of all great lives, Joseph's adventures do not begin and end in himself. Upon him depended a great future. Noble minds care little for personal suffering, if from their pain springs amelioration for the world. Now Joseph's descent into Egypt was not only for the good and preservation of the people there, but was also an essential condition for the formation of the Jewish Church. In Egypt alone could Israel have multiplied into a nation fit to be the deposi-taries of God's law, and to grow into a church of prophets.

A company of Ishmeelites.—Dothan was situated on the great caravan line by which the products of India and Western Asia were brought to Egypt. As the eastern side of Canaan is covered by the great Arabian desert, the caravans had to travel in a north-western direction until having forced the En-phrates, they could strike across from Tadmor to Gilead.
The route thence led them over the Jordan at Beisân, and so southward to Egypt. For "Ishmeelites," we have "Midianites," Heb., Medyanim, in verse 28, and Meda-nites, Heb., Medanim, in verse 36: but the Targum and the Syriac, instead of Ishmeelites, read Arabs.
Midian was a son of Abraham by Keturah, and Ishmael was his son by Hagar. But probably these merchants were descended from neither by blood, but belonged to some branch of the Canaanites, who were the great traders of ancient times, and which Ishmael and Midian had compelled to submit to their sway. (But see Note on chap. xxv. 2.) The Jewish interpreters are reduced to great straits in reconciling these names, and even assert that Joseph was sold three times. Really Ishmeelites, Midianites, and Medanites are all one and the same; if we regard them as bearing the names only politically.
It is remarkable that the Egyptians never took part in the carrying trade. Even the navigation of the Red Sea they left to the Phoenicians, Israelis, and Syrians, though Psammetichus, Pharaoh-Necho, and Apries tried to induce the Egyptians to take to maritime pursuits.
Their products were corn, stuffs of byssus and other materials, and carpets; but the exportation of these goods they left to foreign traders.

Spicery, and balm, and myrrh.—The first was probably gum tragacanth, though some think that it was tamar, the gum of the styrax tree (see chap. xxx. 37).
He is Sold to Ishmeelites.

Genesis, XXXVII. Jacob’s Grief for his Son.

blood? (27) Come, and let us sell him to the Ishmeelites, and let not our hand be upon him; for he is our brother and our flesh. And his brethren were content. (28) Then there passed by Midianites merchantmen; and they drew and lifted up Joseph out of the pit, and sold Joseph to the Ishmeelites for twenty pieces of silver; and they brought Joseph into Egypt.

(29) And Reuben returned unto the pit; and, behold, Joseph was not in the pit; and he rent his clothes. (30) And he returned unto his brethren, and said, The child is not; and I, whither shall I go?

(31) And they took Joseph’s coat, and killed a kid of the goats, and dipped the coat in the blood; (32) and they sent the coat of many colours, and they brought it to their father; and said, This have we found: know now whether it be thy son’s coat or no. (33) And he knew it, and said, It is my son’s coat; an evil beast hath devoured him; Joseph is without doubt rent in pieces. (34) And Jacob rent his clothes, and put sackcloth upon his loins, and mourned for his son many days. (35) And all his sons and all his daughters rose up to comfort him; but he refused to be comforted; and he said, For I will go down into the grave unto my son mourning. Thus his father wept for him.

(36) And the Midianites sold him into Egypt unto Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh’s, and a captain of the guard.

“Balm,” that is, balsam, was probably the resin of the balsamodendron Gileadense, a tree which grows abundantly in Gilead, and of which the gum was greatly in use for healing wounds. Myrrh was certainly ladanum, the gum of the cistus rose (cistus creticus). As all these were products of Palestine valued in Egypt, Jacob included them in his present to the governor there (chap. xxxiii. 11).

Two pieces of silver. — Twenty shekels of silver were computed, in Lev. xxvii. 5, as the average worth of a male slave under twenty. It would be about £2 10s. of our money, but silver was of far greater value than it is now.

Reuben returned. — Evidently he was not present when Joseph was sold to the Midianites. This has been made into a difficulty, but really it confirms the truth of the narrative. For the difficulty arises solely from the supposition that Joseph’s brethren immediately after casting him into the pit “sat down to eat bread,” an act well described as most cold-blooded. But they were not actually guilty of it; for what the narrative says is that they were having their evening meal when the caravan came in sight. Reuben, between the casting of Joseph into the pit and the evening meal, had apparently gone a long round to fetch in the more distant cattle, and probably had remained away as long as possible, in order to feel sure that his brethren would on his return be at their dinner. He hoped thus to be able to go alone to the cistern, and rescue Joseph, and send him away home before the rest could interfere. Thus rightly understood, it is a proof of the trustworthiness of the history.

A kid of the goats. — Heb., a full grown he-goat. Maimonides thinks that the reason why he-goats were so often used as sin-offerings under the Levitical law was to remind the Israelites of this great sin committed by their patriarchs.

They brought it. — Heb., they caused it to go, that is, sent it by the hand of a messenger. They were unwilling to see the first burst of their father’s agonies.

And said. — These were the words that were to be spoken by the messenger who was charged to bear the coat to Jacob.

Many days. — Jacob mourned for Joseph not merely during the usual period, but so long as to move even the hearts of those who had wronged him. For not only his daughters, but “all his sons rose up to comfort him.” Probably he had several daughters by Leah and the two handmaidens, Dinah alone having been mentioned by name, because two of her brothers forfeited the birthright by the cruelty with which they avenged her wrong. We learn how long and intense Jacob’s sorrow was from chap. xlv. 26—28. His daughters are mentioned also in chap. xlv. 7.

Into the grave. — Heb., Shel, which, like Hades in Greek, means the place of departed spirits. Jacob supposed that Joseph had been devoured by wild beasts, and as he was not buried, the father could not have “gone down into the grave unto his son.” (Comp. Note on chap. xxv. 15.)

Midianites. — Heb., Medamites. (See Note on verse 25.)

Potiphar. — Three chief interpretations are given of this name. The first explains it by two Coptic words, according to which it would signify “father of the king.” This would make it an official name equivalent to prime minister or vizier. Gesenius considers it to be the same name as Potipherah (chap. xlii. 50), and explains it as meaning “consecrated to Ra,” that is, the sun-god. Thirdly, Canon Cook, in the “Excursus on Egyptian Words,” at the end of Vol. I. of The Speaker’s Commentary, argues with much cogency, that it means “father of the palace.” This again would be an official name.

An officer. — Though this word literally in Hebrew signifies an eunuch, yet, either, as seems probable from other places, it had come to mean any officer of the palace, or Potiphar was chief of the eunuchs, and therefore is himself numbered among them.

Captain of the guard. — Heb., chief of the slaughterers, by which the LXX. understand the slaughterers of animals for food, and translate “chief cook.” The other versions understand it by the commander of the king’s body-guard, whose business it would be to execute condemned criminals. A comparison with 2 Kings xxv. 8, where the same title is given to Nebuzaradan, proves that this interpretation is correct.
CHAPTER XXXVIII. — (1) And it came to pass at that time, that Judah went down from his brethren, and turned in to a certain Adullamite, whose name was Hirah. (2) And Judah saw there a daughter of a certain Canaanite, whose name was Shulam; and he took her, and went in unto her. (3) And she conceived, and bare a son; and he called his name Er. (4) And she conceived again, and bare a son; and she called his name Onan. (5) And she yet again conceived, and bare a son; and called his name Shelah; and he was at Chezib, when she bare him.

(6) And Judah took a wife for Er his firstborn, whose name was Tamar.

XXXVIII.

FAMILY HISTORY OF JUDAH.

This episode is no interruption of the narrative, for, as we have seen, the Toldoth Jacob is the history generally of Jacob's posterity, and especially of the next great event in their development into a nation, namely the descent into Egypt. Two main reasons may be assigned therefore for giving this history of Judah's life; the first, that it shows the great risk of utter contamination incurred by the patriarchs in living among the Canaanites; the second, and more important, that Judah was invested by his father with the rights of primogeniture, and therefore that this history belongs to the genealogy of the Messiah.

(1) At that time. — This does not mean at the time of Joseph's sale; for as there was only an interval of twenty-two years between that event and the descent into Egypt, this period is scarcely long enough for the events recorded in this chapter. According to the usual chronology, Judah, Leah's fourth son, would not have been more than eight years old when he left Padan-aram, and only one year at most older than Joseph, the son of Jacob's old age. But the more true chronology which we have followed, gives time for him to have been Joseph's soner by twenty years, and the events recorded here probably began soon after his father's arrival at the tower of Eder.

Adullamite. — The town of Adullam, near which was David's famous cave, has been clearly identified by Lient. Conder ( Tent-work, ii. 158). It lay in the great valley of Elah, which formed the highway from Hebron to the country of the Philistines, some two or three miles south of Shochoh, and fifteen or sixteen miles west by north from Hebron. Judah "went down" thither, not as Abencrra and others have supposed, because it was to the south, but because it was towards the sea, and the road is an actual descent from the hill country of Judah into the Shephelah, or lowland, in which Adullam was situated. The sons of Jacob often, probably, with a few retainers, made expeditions in search of pastures for their cattle; and, Hirah, apparently, had shown Judah hospitality on some such journey, and finally a friendship had grown up between them. "Turned in to," however, literally means pitched (his tent) close by; and the friendship between Judah and Hirah, thus accidentally formed, seems to have ended in Hirah taking the charge of Judah's cattle.

(2) Canaanite. — This is rendered in the Targum merchant, and so the Authorised Version translates Canaanite in Prov. xxxi. 24. In favour of this view is the fact, that the marriage of Simeon with a Canaanith woman is regarded as an act so exceptional, as to be worth recording (chap. xvi. 10). But we may well doubt whether, at so early an age, the terms Canaanite and merchant had become synonymous. "Shulam" was the name of the woman's father, as appears plainly in the Hebrew. (See also verse 12.)

(3) Chezib. — Mr. Conder has found traces of this place at Ain Kesbeh, near Beit Nettif, a little to the north of Adullam (Handbook, p. 408). In Maccab. i. 14, 15, it is called Achiab, and is there also placed near Adullam.

(4) Go in unto thy brother's wife. — We learn from this that the law of the Levirate, by which the brother of the deceased husband was required to marry the widow, was of far more ancient date than the law of Moses. Its object, first of all, was to prevent the extinction of any line of descent, a matter of great importance in those geological days; and, secondly, it was an obstacle to the accumulation of landed property in few hands, as the son first born after the Levirate marriage inherited the property of his deceased uncle, while the second son was the representative of the real father. A similar custom existed in parts of India, Persia, &c., and prevails now among the Mongols. The Mosaic Law did not institute, but regulated the custom, confining such marriages to cases where the deceased brother had died without children, and permitting the brother to refuse to marry the widow, under a penalty, nevertheless, of disgrace. Onan, by refusing to take Tamar, may have been actuated by the selfish motive of obtaining for himself the rights of primogeniture, which would otherwise have gone to his eldest son, as the heir of his uncle 'Er.

(5) For he said, lest he also die. — It is evident from this that Judah, for reasons which, in verse 26, he acknowledged to be insufficient, wished to evade the duty of giving a third son to Tamar. It does not follow that he blamed her for their deaths; for the loss of two sons in succession might well frighten him. Philippson says that it became the rule, that if a woman lost two husbands, the third brother was not bound to marry her, and she was even called melanne 'Er.
brethren did. And Tamar went and dwelt in her father's house. (12) And in process of time the daughter of Shuaah Judah's wife died; and Judah was comforted, and went up unto his sheepshearers to Timnath, he and his friend Hirah the Adullamite. (13) And it was told Tamar, saying, Behold thy father in law goeth to Timnath to shear his sheep. (14) And she put her widow's garments off from her, and covered herself with a vail, and wrapped herself, and sat in an open place, which is by the way to Timnath; for she saw that Shelah was grown, and she was not given unto him to wife. (15) When Judah saw her, he thought her to be an harlot; because she had covered her face. (16) And he turned unto her by the way, and said, Go to, I pray thee, let me come in unto thee; (for he knew not that she was his daughter in law). And she said, What wilt thou give me, that thou mayest come in unto me? (17) And he said, I will send thee a kid from the flock. And she said, Wilt thou give me a pledge, till thou send it? (18) And he said, What pledge shall I give thee? And she said, Thy signet, and thy bracelets, and thy staff that is in thine hand. And he gave it her, and came in unto her, and she conceived by him. (19) And she arose, and went away, and laid by her vail from her, and put on the garments of her widowhood. (20) And Judah sent the kid by the hand of his friend the Adullamite, to receive his pledge from the woman's hand: but he found her not. (21) Then he asked the men of that place, saying, Where is the harlot, that was openly by the way side? And they said, There was no harlot in this place. (22) And he returned to Judah, and said, I cannot find her; and also the men of the place said, that there was no harlot in this place. (23) And Judah said, Let her take it to her, lest we be shamed: behold, I sent this kid, and thou hast not found her.

the murderer. (But see St. Matth. xxii. 25, 26, where no such custom is acknowledged.)

(12) Timnath.—There were two places of this name (Josh. xv. 57, 57). One was a little to the west of Bethlem, the other upon the Philistines' border, beyond Bethashaneth. As it lay, however, only about seven miles beyond Adullam, and as the flocks were Judah's private property (verse 13), and under the charge of Hirah, this remoter place, now called Tibeheh, is probably the Timnath meant, as at Bethlehem the pastures were occupied by his father. (See also verse 14.)

For the sheepshearing, see chap. xxxi. 19. Instead of his friend Hirah, the LXX. and Vulg. render his shepherd Hirah. They would require no change in the consonants, but only in the vowels. Most of the other authorities agree with the Authorised Version; but even so, there was most probably some partnership between Judah and Hirah in these flocks, and they would be under Hirah's charge whenever Judah was absent, tending the flocks of his father.

(14) In an open place.—Heb., in the gate of Enaim. Enaim means "the two fountains," and we learn from verse 21 that it was the town where Tamar's father dwelt, and where Tamar was living with him in her widowhood. In the exploration of Palestine, Enaim has been identified with a place called Allin, Anin, or Anain, three miles east of Tibeheh, and situated upon an ancient road coming from Adullam. This makes the conclusion come to for other reasons certain, that the Timnath on the Philistines' border was the town meant.

(15) Because she had covered her face.—The Jewish commentators all agree that this was not the custom of harlots; and as Judah, in verse 21, calls her kedeshah, one consecrated, he probably thought that she was a woman performing the vow required of every female votary of the Phoenician Venus (Astarte), once in her lifetime (Herod. i. 199). Hence the hire was a kid to be sacrificed to the goddess. As for Tamar, her object was to assert her claim to the inheritance of Er. Lange considers that the wickedness of Er had caused him, equally with Onan, to neglect her, and that consequently there was no real incest. This is made probable by her immediate conception.

(16) Thy bracelets.—Heb., thy cord. The art of engraving was probably not advanced enough among these nomads to permit them to engrave gems small enough to wear in a ring. Judah evidently supposed his signet round his neck by a cord; and this custom still exists among the Arabs, of whom some wear signet rings, while others hang them round their necks.

Probably each man of distinction had his emblem, and in chap. lxxi. Jacob seems to refer to them. Thus Judah's emblem was a lion, Zebulun's a ship, Issachar's an ass, &c.

(17) Thy staff.—The staff in ancient times was elaborately adorned. Herodotus (i. 195) describes the staves carried by the Babylonians, as having on them carvings of fruit, or of some flower or bird; and Homer perpetually makes mention of the "sceptres," that is, walking-sticks, of the kings, as carved so magnificently as to be worthy of being ascribed to Hephaestus, and handed down as emblems of authority from father to son. (See Iliad, ii. 101—107.) It is from these staves that the sceptres of kings, and the batons of field-marshal, &c., are derived.

(21) Where is the harlot...?—Heb., Where is the kedeshah (see verse 15) that was at Enaim by the wayside? "Enaim (the two fountains) by the wayside," seems to have been the full name of the village. (See verse 14.)

(22) Lest we be shamed.—Maimonides asserts that Judah had committed no breach of the Law, the utmost therein commanded being that no Jewish woman should become a kedeshah (Deut. xxiii. 17). But Judah evidently regards what he had done as shameful, and Tamar’s Twin Sons.

GENESIS, XXXIX.

Joseph with Potiphar.

29) And it came to pass about three months after, that it was told Judah, saying, Tamar thy daughter in law hath played the harlot; and also, behold, she is with child by whoredom. And Judah said, Bring her forth, and let her be burnt. (30) When she was brought forth, she sent to her father in law, saying, By the man, whose these are, am I with child: and she said, Discern, I pray thee, whose are these, the signet, and bracelets, and staff. (30) And Judah acknowledged them, and said, She hath been more righteous than I; because that I gave her not to Shelah my son. And he knew her again no more.

(27) And it came to pass in the time of her travail, that, behold, twins were in her womb. (28) And it came to pass, when she travailed, that the one put out his hand: and the midwife took and bound upon his hand a scarlet thread, saying, This came out first. (29) And it came to pass, as he drew back his hand, that, behold, his brother came out: and she said, How hast thou broken forth? this breach be upon thee: therefore his name was called Pharez. (30) And afterward came out his brother, that had the scarlet thread upon his hand: and his name was called Zerah.

CHAPTER XXXIX.—(1) And Joseph was brought down to Egypt; and Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, captain of the guard, an Egyptian, bought him of the hands of the Ishmeelites, which had brought him down thither. (2) And the Lord was with Joseph, and he was a prosperous man; and he was in the house of his master the Egyptian. (3) And his master saw that the Lord was with him, and that the Lord made all that he did to prosper in his hand. (4) And Joseph found grace in his sight, and he served him: and he made him having his friend’s testimony, if needful, to prove that he had performed what he promised, he bears with the loss of his signet and staff, rather than let the people know that he had been guilty of an act which they would condemn.

(24) Let her be burnt.—As being by law the wife of Shelah, Tamar was condemned by Judah in right of his position, as head of the family, to the punishment usual for adultery. In subsequent times, this penalty was limited to one who had married mother and daughter (Lev. xix. 19); or to the daughter of a priest guilty of unchastity (ibid. xx. 9). On this account, the Jewish expositors argue that Tamar belonged to a priestly family, and some even think that she was descended from Mecheideck.

(25, 26) She sent...—The Talmud praises Tamar for so acting, as to bring no public disgrace upon Judah; and he acknowledges that he was most to blame, because the cave of her crime was his own failure to act justly by her.

(39) Zarah.—Heb., the rising, especially of the sun. There is in the name an allusion to the red streak placed upon the child’s hand.

XXXIX.

Joseph’s Fortunes in the House of Potiphar.

(1) Potiphar...bought him.—Having given the genealogy of Judah’s house, which, owing to the sins of Reuben, Simeon, and Levi, was now to be the Messianic line, and invested with the inheritance of the Abrahamic promises, the history reverts to Joseph, because it was through him that Israel was to be transplanted into Egypt. His life there is divided into two main portions, during the first of which, for thirteen years, he was a slave; while during the second, for seventy years, he was governor over all the land of Egypt. In his former capacity he is falsely accused by his mistress, and cast into prison. But this unjust treatment was the necessary pathway to his elevation, because it was in the prison that he interpreted the dreams of Pharaoh’s two officers, and so, in the king’s emergency, was summoned upon the testimony of the chief butler, to appear before him.

(2) The Lord.—Heb., Jehovah. In the history of Joseph there is the greatest possible precision in the use of the divine names. Wherever, as here, the writer speaks in his own person, he uses the name Jehovah, which is a strong argument for the Mosaic authorship of this narrative, as while the whole colour of this Toldoth is strongly Egyptian, the word Jehovah was not specifically the name, in the family of Abraham, for God in covenant with man until the time of the Exodus (Exod. vi. 3). Once Jacob uses it in the blessing of Dan (chap. xlix. 18), in an ejaculation marked by deep religious feeling, but the passage referred to in Exodus does not mean that the patriarchs did not use the name of Jehovah at all, but that it was a name with no particular fulness of meaning. Excepting this one place, the name of the Deity everywhere is either El or Elohim, with the article prefixed only on special occasions (see Notes on chaps. xiv. 8, xvi. 3). Very probably Joseph had left memorials of his life behind him, in which naturally he used only the general term God. In framing these into a history, the writer carefully shows that it was the covenant Jehovah who guarded and kept His innocent worshipper.

Prosperous.—Heb., coming to prosper. Joseph brought a blessing with him to his master’s house. (See verse 3, where the same word is translated made to prosper.)

In the house.—Slaves generally were bought for the hard work of the field, but Potiphar assigned to Joseph the lighter home service, because perhaps of his youth and comeliness.

(4) He served him.—Rather, he ministered to him (Num. iii, 6), as the word is used not so much of work as of office. So in chap. xli. 4, it is used of the attendance of Joseph upon the chief butler and baker in prison. His office is explained more exactly in the next overseer over his house, and all that he had he put into his hand. (5) And it came to pass from the time that he had made him overseer in his house, and over all that he had, that the Lord blessed the Egyptian’s house for Joseph’s sake; and the blessing of the Lord was upon all that he had in the house, and in the field. (6) And he left all that he had in Joseph’s hand; and he knew not ought he had, save the bread which he did eat. And Joseph was a goodly person, and well favoured.

(7) And it came to pass after these things, that his master’s wife cast her eyes upon Joseph; and she said, Lie with me. (8) But he refused, and said unto his master’s wife, Behold, my master wotteth not what is with me in the house, and he hath committed all that he hath to my hand; (9) there is none greater in this house than I; neither hath he kept back any thing from me but thee, because thou art his wife; how then can I do this great wickedness, and sin against God?

(10) And it came to pass, as she spake to Joseph day by day, that he heartened not unto her, to lie by her, or to be with her.

(11) And it came to pass about this time, that Joseph went into the house to do his business; and there was none of the men of the house there within. (12) And she caught him by his garment, saying, Lie with me: and he left his garment in her hand, and fled, and got him out. (13) And it came to pass, when she saw that he had left his garment in her hand, and was fled forth, (14) that she called unto the men of her house, and spake unto them, saying, See, he hath brought in an Hebrew unto us to mock us; he came in unto me to lie with me, and I cried with a loud voice:

(15) and it came to pass, when he heard that I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled, and got him out. (16) And she laid up his garment by her, until his lord came home. (17) And she spake unto him according to these words, saying, The Hebrew servant, which thou hast brought unto us, came in unto me to mock me. (18) And it came to pass, as I lifted up my voice and cried, that he left his garment with me, and fled out.

(19) And it came to pass, when his master heard the words of his wife, which she spake unto him, saying, After this manner did thy servant to me; that his wrath was kindled. (20) And Joseph’s master took him, and put him into the prison, a place where the king’s prisoners were bound: and he was there in the prison.

(21) But the Lord was with Joseph, and shewed him mercy, and gave him favour in the sight of the keeper of the prison. (22) And the keeper of the prison verse, where we read that “he made him overseer,” or his deputy. In the Egyptian monuments we often find an overseer with writing materials keeping an account of all expenditure and of the labour done.

(6) Save the bread . . .—Aben Ezra connects this with the first clause in the verse, and says that Potiphar did not leave his food in Joseph’s hand, because as an Egyptian he could not eat victuals prepared by a Hebrew. (See chap. xliii. 32.) But in any case the meaning would be, that Potiphar did not care to know about anything except the food prepared for his own use.

A goodly person and well favoured.—These are the words used of Rachel in chap. xxix. 17, where see Note.

(7) His master’s wife.—Egyptian women did not live in seclusion, nor did they go veiled. (See chap. xii. 13; Rawlinson, Hist. Ancient Egypt, i. 552.) The story of an innocent youth calumniated by an unchaste woman whom he has repulsed, became a favourite subject with classical authors, as in the myths of Bellerophon and Anteia, Hippolytus and Phaedra, and others. The Egyptians had a favourite popular romance of this kind, called “The Two Brothers,” in which the wife of the elder brother Anpu behaves towards Bala, the younger, in exactly the same way as Potiphar’s wife towards Joseph. See Records of the Past, ii. 139—152.

(11) To do his business.—That is, to attend to his ordinary duties as steward. The absence of all men from the house is explained by the supposition that it was a festival; but as she called to them (verse 14) it seems as if they were engaged in their several departments close by.

(14) He hath brought in.—The wife ascribes it as a fault to Potiphar, that, by buying a foreign slave, he had exposed her to insult. And so in verse 17.

(20) Prison.—Heb., soter. This word occurs in the Bible only in this and the next chapter, but in the Talmud it is used for a walled prison. It is supposed to mean a round or arched tower. As the king’s prisoners were confined there, it was a portion of Potiphar’s official residence, as he was captain of the royal bodyguard (see chap. x. 3); but we learn that it had its own keeper, though Potiphar was the chief in command (chap. x. 4). The Jewish commentators consider that Potiphar did not really believe the accusation, or he would certainly have put Joseph to death. We learn, however, from Ps. cv. 18, that his treatment in the prison at first was very severe; but as Potiphar, in chap. xii. 4, is said to have entrusted Joseph with the committed to Joseph's hand all the prisoners that were in the prison; and whatsoever they did there, he was the doer of it. (23) The keeper of the prison looked not to any thing that was under his hand; because the Lord was with him, and that which he did, the Lord made it to prosper.

CHAPTER XL.—(1) And it came to pass after these things, that the butler of the king of Egypt and his baker had offended their lord the king of Egypt. (2) And Pharaoh was wroth against two of his officers, against the chief of the butlers, and against the chief of the bakers. (3) And he put them in ward in the house of the captain of the guard, into the prison, the place where Joseph was bound. (4) And the captain of the guard charged Joseph with them, and he served them; and they continued a season in ward. (5) And they dreamed a dream both of them, each man his dream in one night, charge of the chief butler and baker, he must soon have been convinced of his innocence.

XL

JOSEPH INTERPRETS THE DREAMS OF THE CHIEF BUTLER AND BAKER.

(1) Butler.—Heb., one who gives to drink, cup-bearer. As we learn in verse 11 that it was grape-wine which he gave the king to drink, this chapter has been the main dependence of the new critics for their proof that the Book of Genesis was not written by Moses. For Herod. (ii. 77) says, "The Egyptians make use of wine prepared from barley, because there are no vineyards in their country." As Herodotus was thirteen centuries later than the time of Joseph, they argue not only that the vine could not have been introduced into Egypt at so early a date, but that the records of Joseph's life could not have been put together by any one acquainted with Egypt, in spite of their exact knowledge in all other respects of Egyptian customs. But when we turn to Herodotus himself, we find the most complete refutation of the previous statement. For, in Book ii. 37, speaking of the liberal treatment of the priests, he says, that they had an allowance of "grape-wine." Again, in Chap. 39, he tells us that it was the custom to pour wine on a victim about to be sacrificed. To one used to the extensive vineyards of Greece and Asia Minor, the comparative scarcity of the vine, and the use of another ordinary drink in its place, would be striking; but that he was guilty of gross exaggeration in his statement is proved by evidence far more trustworthy than his own writings. For, on the tombs at Beni-Hassan, which are anterior to the time of Joseph, on those at Thebes, and on the Pyramids, are representations of vine-grown in every way, except that usual in Italy, festooned on trees; there is every process of the vintage, grapes in baskets, men tramp-

each man according to the interpretation of his dream, the butler and the baker of the king of Egypt, which were bound in the prison. (6) And Joseph came in unto them in the morning, and looked upon them, and, behold, they were sad. (7) And he asked Pharaoh's officers that were with him in the ward of his lord's house, saying, Wherefore look ye so sadly to day? (8) And they said unto him, We have dreamed a dream, and there is no interpreter of it. And Joseph said unto them, Do not interpretations belong to God? tell me them, I pray you. (9) And the chief butler told his dream to Joseph, and said to him, In my dream, behold, a vine was before me; (10) and in the vine were three branches: and it was as though it budded, and her blossoms shot forth; and the clusters thereof brought forth ripe grapes: (11) and Pharaoh's cup was in my hand: and I took the grapes, and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup, and I gave the cup ling them in vats, various forms of presses for squeezing out the juice, jars for storing it, and various processes, even of the fermentation, noticed. Numerous engravings of the sculptures and paintings on these ancient monuments may be seen in Wilkinson's Egypt; and most abundant evidence of the culture of the vine in ancient Egypt has been collected, and an account of the vines grown there given in Malan's Philosophy or Truth, pp. 31—39. It neither is nor ever was a great wine-producing country, but the vine existed from one end of the country to the other, as it does at this day.

Baker.—Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, ii. 33, 39, gives proof from the monuments, that they had carried the art of making confectionery to very great perfection.

(3, 4) In the house of the captain of the guard. That is, of Potiphar. As he is said to have charged Joseph with the care of these two high officials, he must, ere this, have become aware of his innocence. But as the wife in ancient times in Egypt was endowed with all the husband's property, and was a formidable person, as we learn from many of the records now being translated and published, Potiphar may not have wished to offend her.

He served them.—Used only of light service. (See Note on chap. xxxii. 4.)

(8) There is no interpreter.—In Egypt it was the business of men trained for the purpose, called in chap. xiii. 8, magicians and wise men, to interpret dreams, and to such the butler and baker could have no access from their prison. But Joseph denies that art and training can really avail, and claims that the interpretation belongs to God.

(11) And pressed them.—Plutarch, Is. et Osir. § 6, says that before the time of Psammetichus the Egyptians did not drink wine, nor make libations of it to the gods. This statement has been abundantly disproved, and probably arose from the writer supposing that the into Pharaoh's hand. (12) And Joseph said unto him, This is the interpretation of it: The three branches are three days: (13) Yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thine head, and restore thee unto thy place: and thou shalt deliver Pharaoh's cup into his hand, after the former manner when thou wast his butler. (14) But I think on me when it shall be well with thee, and shew kindness, I pray thee, unto me, and make mention of me unto Pharaoh, and bring me out of this house. (15) For indeed I was stolen away out of the land of the Hebrews: and here also have I done nothing that they should put me into the dungeon.

When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was good, he said unto Joseph, I also was in my dream, and, behold, I had three white baskets on my head: (17) and in the uppermost basket there was of all manner of bakesmeats for Pharaoh; and the birds did eat them out of the basket upon my head. (18) And Joseph answered and said, This is the interpretation thereof: The three baskets are three days: (19) Yet within three days shall Pharaoh lift up thy head from off thee, and shall hang thee on a tree; and the birds shall eat thy flesh from off thee.

And it came to pass the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday, that he made a feast unto all his servants: and he lifted up the head of the chief butler and of the chief baker among his servants. (21) And he restored the chief butler unto his butlership again; and he gave the cup into Pharaoh's hand: (22) but he hanged the chief baker: as Joseph had interpreted to them. (23) Yet did not the chief butler remember Joseph, but forgot him.

CHAPTER XLI.—(1) And it came to pass at the end of two full years, that Pharaoh dreamed:

custom of, possibly, one district was the universal rule. Nevertheless, the king's drink here does not seem to have been fermented wine, but a sort of sherbet made of fresh grape-juice and water. It is a pleasant beverage, still much used in the East, but sometimes the grape-juice is left till fermentation has just begun, when it acquires a pleasant briskness, and is less cloying.

Into Pharaoh's hand.—Heb. I placed the cup upon Pharaoh's palm. The word is used in chap. xxiii. 25 of the hollow of Jacob's thigh (see Note there). Here it means the hollow produced by bending the fingers inwards. Now the Hebrews always spoke of placing the cup in a person's hand (Ezek. xxiii. 31, and see Ps. lxv. 8; Jer. li. 7; and even here Joseph, though probably speaking the Egyptian language, nevertheless used the Hebrew idiom, saying, thou wilt give Pharaoh's cup into his hand. It is the Egyptian cup-bearer, who, using the idiom of his own country, speaks of placing the cup upon Pharaoh's palm, the reason being that Egyptian cups had no stems, but were flat bowls or saucers, held in the very way the cup-bearer describes.

I was stolen.—Joseph here speaks only generally, as his purpose was to arouse the sympathy of the Egyptian by making him know that he was free born, and reduced to slavery by fraud. It would have done harm rather than good to have said that his sale was owing to family feuds; and, moreover, noble-minded men do not willingly reveal that which is to the discredit of their relatives.

Land of the Hebrews.—Jacob and his race had settled possessions in Canaan at Hebron, Shechem, Beer-sheba, &c. The term Hebrew, moreover, was an old one; for in the ancient record of the invasion of Palestine by Chedorlaomer, we saw that Abram was described as "the Hebrew" (chap. xiv. 13). But Joseph did not mean that the land of Canaan belonged to them, but that he was stolen from the settlements of these "immigrants," and from the land wherein they sojourned.

Three white baskets.—Rashi explains the phrase of baskets of wicker-work, but most commentators agree in rendering it "baskets of white bread." The "bakesmeats" were all preparations of pastry and confectionery, as throughout the Bible meat does not mean flesh, but food. (Comp. Luke xxiv. 41; John xxi. 5.)

On my head.—The Egyptian men carried burdens on their heads; the women on their shoulders (Herod. it. 35).

Bakesmeats.—Heb. All sorts of work for Pharaoh the work of a baker.

Shall Pharaoh lift up thy head from off thee.—In verse 13 the lifting up of the butler's head meant his elevation to his former rank. Here there is the significant addition "from off thee," implying that he would be beheaded, and his body publicly exposed to ignominy.

He lifted up the head.—From its use in this verse some have supposed that the phrase must mean "to put them on their trial," or "take account of them" (whence the margin reckon). More probably the words are used to point out the exact fulfilment of Joseph's interpretation of their dreams.

XLI.

JOSEPH INTERPRETS PHARAOH'S DREAMS; HE IS MADE GOVERNOR OF EGYPT, AND MARRIES THERE.

(1) Pharaoh dreamed.—After two years spent in the prison, the time has now come for Joseph's elevation to power; and it is to be noticed that this was not brought about by those arts by which men usually attain to greatness, such as statesmanship, or military skill; nor was it by accident, but according to the Biblical rule, by the direct intervention of Providence.
stood by the river. (2) And, behold, there came up out of the river seven well favoured kine and fatfleshed; and they fed in a meadow. (3) And, behold, seven other kine came up after them out of the river, ill favoured and leanfleshed; and stood by the other kine upon the brink of the river. (4) And the ill favoured and leanfleshed kine did eat up the seven well favoured and fat kine. So Pharaoh awoke. (5) And he slept and dreamed the second time: and, behold, seven ears of corn came up upon one stalk, rank and good. (6) And, behold, seven thin ears and blasted with the east wind sprung up after them. (7) And the seven thin ears devoured the seven rank and full ears. And Pharaoh awoke, and, behold, it was a dream.

(8) And it came to pass in the morning that his spirit was troubled; and he sent and called for all the magicians of Egypt, and all the wise men thereof: and Pharaoh told them his dream; but there was none that could interpret them unto Pharaoh.

(9) Then spake the chief butler unto Pharaoh, saying, I do remember my faults this day: (10) Pharaoh was wroth with his servants, and put me in ward in the captain of the guard's house, both me and the chief baker; (11) and we dreamed a dream in one night, I and he; we dreamed each man according to the interpretation of his dream. (12) And there was there with us a young man, an Hebrew, servant to the captain of the guard; and we told him, and he interpreted to us our dreams; to each man according to his dream he did interpret. (13) And it came to pass, as he interpreted to us, so it was; me he restored unto mine office, and him he hanged.

(14) Then Pharaoh sent and called Joseph, and they 2 brought him hastily

Just as centuries afterwards, Daniel rose to high office at Babylon by God making known to him the dream of Nebuchadnezzar; so here, the transplantation of Israel into Egypt is brought about by the revelation to Joseph of "what was to be hereafter."

The river.—Heb. Yoor, the Egyptian word for "great river." It is the usual name in the Bible for the Nile, but is used for the Tigris in Dan. xii. 5, 6, and for any large river in Job xxviii. 10. The Pharaoh in whose reign Joseph became governor of Egypt, is generally supposed to have been Apophis, the most famous of the shepherd kings. But Caanon, Cook, in his Essay, On the bearings of Egyptian History upon the Pentateuch, after carefully reviewing the whole subject, decides in favour of King Amenemau III., the greatest monarch of the noble twelfth dynasty, and the last king of all Egypt.

Kine.—The cow was regarded by the Egyptians as the symbol of the earth, and of agriculture; and naturally both the kine and the ears of wheat rose out of the river, because as no rain falls in Egypt, its fertility entirely depends upon the overflow of the Nile. The cows sacred to Isis were seven in number, and in a copy of the Ritual of the Dead, Mr. Malan (p. 192) found a picture of the seven sacred cows with the divine bull.

In a meadow.—Heb. in the marsh-grass. The word occurs only in this chapter and in Job viii. 11, where it is translated flag. It is the name of the rank herbage which grows luxuriantly along the banks of the Nile; or, as some think, of one special kind of marsh-grass, called by botanists Cyperus esculentus.

Seven ears ... upon one stalk.—The wheat cultivated in Egypt is called triticum compositum, because it produces several ears upon the same stalk. The statement of Herodotus (ii. 36), that the Egyptians regarded it as disgraceful to feed upon wheat or barley, is disproved by the paintings in the temples, especially in the district of Thebes, which show that it was the main crop there, and its cultivation held in high honour.

Maspero, Hist. Anciennne, p. 9, says, "In spite of Herodotus, the usual food of the people was wheat and other cereals, which the soil of Egypt produces in abundance."

East wind.—In Palestine the prevalent winds are those which blow from the west or east, and the latter, coming across arid deserts, is injurious to vegetation. In Egypt the winds generally are from the north or south, but the south-east wind, called Chamsin, blowing from the deserts of Arabia, has even more disastrous effects upon plants than the east wind in Palestine, and from the sand dust with which it is laden is baleful also to human life. As there are no words in Hebrew for any except the four principal winds, this south-eastern wind may be meant; or as kaledim, east wind, became the usual name of every wind that burned up vegetation, the term may be employed in a general sense.

Magicians.—The word used here probably means the "sacred scribes," who were skilled in writing and reading hieroglyphics. But in ancient times the possession of real knowledge was generally accompanied by a claim to an occult and mysterious acquaintance with the secrets of the gods and of nature. And as the people regarded the knowledge which such scribes really possessed as more than human, the claim was easily maintained, or, rather, grew naturally out of the super-stition of the multitude. So, too, the "wise men" were men educated and trained, but probably the profession of magic, of divination, and astrology was that which gained for them wealth and honour, and not the possession of whatever real science existed at that time in Egypt. We find, subsequently, even Joseph claiming the power of divination.

There was none that could interpret. . .—Probably many of the wise men made the attempt, but in such an imperfect manner as not to be able to satisfy Pharaoh's mind, or else the excitement of his spirit.

He shewed himself.—Herodotus (ii. 36) mentions that the Egyptians suffered their hair and beards out of the dungeon: and he shaved himself, and changed his raiment, and came in unto Pharaoh. (16) And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I have dreamed a dream, and there is none that can interpret it; and I have heard say of thee, that thou canst understand a dream to interpret it. (17) And Joseph answered Pharaoh, saying, It is not in me: God shall give Pharaoh an answer of peace. (18) And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, In my dream, behold, I stood upon the bank of the river: (19) and, behold, there came up out of the river seven kine, fat-fleshed and well favoured; and they fed in a meadow: (20) and, behold, seven other kine came up after them, poor and very ill favoured and leanfleshed, such as I never saw in all the land of Egypt for badness: (21) and the lean and the ill favoured kine did eat up the first seven fat kine: (22) and when they had eaten them up, it could not be known that they had eaten them; but they were still ill favoured, as at the beginning. So I awoke. (23) And I saw in my dream, and, behold, seven ears came up in one stalk, full and good: (24) and, behold, seven ears, three withered, thin, and blasted with the east wind, sprung up after them: (25) and the thin ears devoured the seven good ears: and I told this unto the magicians; but there was none that could declare it to me. (26) And Joseph said unto Pharaoh, The dream of Pharaoh is one: God hath shewed Pharaoh what he is about to do. (27) The seven good kine are seven years; and the seven good ears are seven years: the dream is one. (28) And the seven thin and ill favoured kine that came up after them are seven years; and the seven empty ears blasted with the east wind shall be seven years of famine. (29) This is the thing which I have spoken unto Pharaoh: What God is about to do he shall do. (30) Behold, there come seven years of great plenty throughout all the land of Egypt: and God will cause these years of plenty to be remembered against the seven years of famine; and all the plenty shall be forgotten in the land of Egypt; and the famine shall consume the land; and the plenty shall not be known in the land by reason of that famine following: for it shall be very grievous. (31) And for that the dream was doubled unto Pharaoh twice; it is because the thing is established by God, and God will shortly bring it to pass. (32) Now therefore let Pharaoh look out a man discreet and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt. (33) Let Pharaoh do this, and let him appoint officers over the land, and take up the fifth part of the land of Egypt in the seven plenteous years. (34) And let them gather all the food of those good years that come, and lay up corn under the hand of Pharaoh, and let them keep food in the cities. (35) And that food shall be for store to the land against the seven years of famine, which shall be in the land of Egypt; that the land perish not through the famine. (36) And the thing was good in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of all to grow only when in mourning; whereas in Palestine the beard was regarded as a manly ornament. On Egyptian monuments only captives and men of low condition are represented with beards. In the prison, therefore, Joseph would leave his beard untrimmed, but when summoned into the king’s presence, he would shave it off. Abravanel notices that for each suffering of Joseph there was an exact recompense. It was for dreams that his brethren hated him, and by help of dreams he was exalted in Egypt. They stripped him of his many-coloured coat; the Egyptians clothed him in byssus. They cast him into a pit, and from the pit of the prison he was drawn forth by Pharaoh. They sold him into slavery; in Egypt he was made lord. (19) In a meadow.—Heb., in the marsh-grass, as in verse 2. (20) Poor and very ill-favoured and lean-fleshed.—Pharaoh, in his recital, describes his dreams at greater length than is the case in the narrative. (verses 2-7), and also mentions the impressions made upon his imagination by what he had seen, as, for instance, that he had never beheld such lean cattle, and that they were as wretched in look after eating up the fat kine as before. There is also a slight difference in his description of the kine. In verse 3 they are called “evil in appearance, and lean of flesh;” but the words here are “lean, and evil in shape, and thin of flesh.”

(21) Withered.—This word occurs only in this place. Its meaning is stony, that is, the grains were shrivelled and hard like bits of grit.

(22) Take up the fifth part of the land.—Heb., let him fifth the land, that is, exact a fifth part of the produce. It has been supposed that it had been usual in Egypt to pay to the king a tithe of the crop, and the doubling of the impost would not press very heavily on the people in these years of extraordinary abundance. As the reason of the enactment would be made known, it would also induce all careful people to store up a portion of their own superabundance for future need.
Joseph made ruler over all the Land of Egypt.

GENESIS, XLII.

his servants. (29) And Pharaoh said unto his servants, Can we find such a one as this is, a man in whom the Spirit of God is? (30) And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Forasmuch as God hath shewed thee all this, there is none so discreet and wise as thou art; (40) *thou shalt be over my house, and according unto thy word shall all my people be ruled: only in the throne will I be greater than thou. (41) And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, See, I have set thee over all the land of Egypt. (42) And Pharaoh took off his ring from his hand, and put it upon Joseph's hand, and arrayed him in vestures of fine linen, and put a gold chain about his neck; (43) and he made him to ride in the second chariot which he had; and they cried before him, *Bowthou, and he made him ruler over all the land of Egypt. (44) And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, I am Pharaoh, and without thee shall no man lift up his hand or foot in all the land of Egypt. (45) And Pharaoh called Joseph's name Zaphnath-paaneah; and he gave him to wife Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah, *priest of On. And Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt.

(46) And Joseph was thirty years old

Subsequently, a fifth of the produce was fixed by Joseph permanently as the king's revenue. In whom the Spirit of God is,—Joseph from the first declared that he neither claimed for himself, nor possessed any art of divination, but that Elohim would answer (that which would be for) the peace of Pharaoh (verse 16). And not only does Pharaoh now recognize the truth of Joseph's words, but sees also in him the instrument by which Elohim had spoken. But besides the interpretation of the dreams, Joseph had given the king wise and prudent advice, and he justly felt that one so gifted by God, and so intelligent in counsel, was the person best fitted to carry Egypt through the years of trouble in store for her.

(40) Over my house.—The chief over the palace was in ancient times next in power to the sovereign, and under the Frankish kings the "major domi," or mayor of the palace, first usurped the whole royal power, and finally Pepin, the son of Charles Martel, took the name of king as well as the reality.

According unto thy word shall all my people be ruled.—The general sense is easy, namely that all the people of Egypt should obey Joseph's orders, but the translation of the phrase is difficult. The ordinary meaning of the verb is to kiss, and the translation would then be And on thy mouth shall all my people kiss, that is, they shall do thee homage (1 Sam. x. 1; Ps. ii. 12). The versions seem to have taken this sense, though they translate very loosely "shall obey thee;" or "shall receive judgment at thy mouth;" or "shall be governed by thee." As however in 1 Chron. xii. 2; 2 Chron. xvii. 17; Ps. lxxviii. 9, the verb is used of bearing arms, Aben-Ezra translates "shall arm themselves," and supposes that Joseph was made commander-in-chief. Others, again, form the verb used here from the same root as that on which would give moshkel in chap. xvi. 2 the meaning of running about, and translates at thy mouth, that is, according to thy command, shall all my people busy themselves. The first is the most natural and probable rendering.

In the throne.—Heb. as to the throne, in all that concerns my royal rank, dignity, and rights.

(43) His ring.—Heb. his signet ring. As decrees become laws when stamped with the royal signet, it was naturally the symbol of authority: and so with us, at the formation of a ministry the great seal is formally delivered into the hands of the highest legal personage in the realm, who is thus invested with power.

Vesture of fine linen.—The word used here is Egyptian, shesh, and signifies a kind of flax from which linen of great fineness and whiteness was made. Much of the dress of the Levitical priests was to be made of this flax, called in Hebrew byssus (Exod. xxxix. 28, &c.). In the East it is usual on all occasions of showing the royal favour, to give changes of raiment: but there is here the further significant, that as this fine white linen was the special dress of the king and the priests, the bestowal of it indicated Joseph's admission into the ruling classes of Egypt. Probably, as he married a priest's daughter, he was himself also previously enrolled among the ranks of the priesthood.

A gold chain.—This also appears upon the monuments as one of the royal insignia. Ancient necklaces of such exquisite workmanship have been discovered in Egypt, that patterns copied from them are common now at the chief jewellers.

(45) In the second chariot.—The object of this procession was to display Joseph to the people as their new governor. The Pharaoh, probably, took the chief part in this parade, riding in the first chariot of state.

Bow the knee.—Heb. abrech. Canon Cook explains this as meaning rejoice, be happy. It is in the imperative singular, and is addressed by the people to Joseph; for it is said "they cried before him," that is, the multitude, and not a herald. Naturally, therefore, it is in the singular, as the cœtus rex of the Middle Ages, or vice le roi now. The similarity of sound with habrech, bow the knee, is a mere chance, and as this word also is singular, it must be addressed to Joseph, and not to the people.

(45) Zaphnath-paaneah.—This word also is Egyptian, and, fortunately, there is no Hebrew word of similar sound to suggest a false meaning. Canon Cook shows that it means "food of life," or "food of the living." The LXX. have Panthom-phanean, which Jerome, on the authority of the Jews in Egypt, translates "saviour of the world." By "the world," would be meant the living, as in Canon Cook's explanation, which, in the sense of "he who feeds the world," or "the living," is the best exposition yet given. There is no authority for the supposition that the name means "reveler of secrets."

Asenath.—An Egyptian word signifying the "favourite of Neith," the Egyptian Minerva.

Potipherah.—See Note on chap. xxxix. 1.

On.—This is also an Egyptian word, signifying the sun, whence in Hebrew the name of this city was Beth-shemesh, house of the sun; in Greek, Heliopolis; and in Latin, Oupidum Solis. It was famous for its temple of Ra, the sun, destroyed at an early period by the when he stood before Pharaoh king of Egypt. And Joseph went out from the presence of Pharaoh, and went throughout all the land of Egypt.

47 And in the seven plenteous years the earth brought forth by handfuls.

48 And he gathered up all the food of the seven years, which were in the land of Egypt, and laid up the food in the cities: the food of the field, which was round about every city, laid he up in the same.

49 And Joseph gathered corn as the sand of the sea, very much, until he left numbering; for it was without number.

50 And unto Joseph were born two sons before the years of famine came, which Asenath the daughter of Potipherah priest of On bare unto him.

51 And Joseph called the name of the firstborn Manasseh: For God, said he, hath made my forget all my toil, and all my father’s house.

52 And the name of the second called he Ephraim: For God hath caused me to be fruitful in the land of my affliction.

53 And the seven years of plenteousness, that was in the land of Egypt, were ended.

54 And the seven years of dearth began to come, according as Joseph had said: and the dearth was in all lands; but in all the land of Egypt there was bread.

55 And when all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried to Pharaoh for bread: and Pharaoh said unto all the Egyptians, Go unto Joseph; what he saith to you, do.

56 And the famine was over all the face of the earth: And Joseph opened all the storehouses, and sold unto the Egyptians; and the famine waxed sore in the land of Egypt.

57 And all Persians, but still remarkable for its ruins, among which is an obelisk covered with hieroglyphics of extreme antiquity. Several of the obelisks now at Rome were brought by the emperor Caligula from this spot. It is situated about six miles north-east of Cairo.

A difficulty has been felt by some in a Hebrew shepherd being thus described as marrying the daughter of a priest of the sun; and also that Joseph, a worshipper of the One God, should ally himself with an idolater. But the elevation of a slave to high rank is not an uncommon occurrence in the East, especially as he might be of as good birth and education as his owner; slaves being obtained either by kidnapping, or by war. And a slave so raised to power, would not be likely to oppose his benefactor, nor would even a high priest refuse a daughter to the king’s favourite, especially if, as appears to have been the case, he had first been raised to the priesthood. Joseph too, would rightly regard the whole matter as providential, and though he might not know for what exact purpose, as regards his race, he was thus exalted, there was noble work for him to do in saving Egypt from perishing by famine. The narrative throughout represents him as remaining true to the religion of his family (chap. xlii. 18; xliii. 29; xlv. 5, 7, 8, 9; xlvi. 9; 1. 19, 20, 24), but probably, on public occasions he would be required to attend at the religious solemnities of the Egyptian gods. We must remember, however, that their worship had not degenerated as yet into the miserable idolatry of later times, and that the Egyptian creed contained much primeval truth, though in a corrupted form. Pharaoh himself, in verses 38, 39, speaks as one that acknowledged a supreme God, and Joseph throughout freely used to him the name of Elohim. As for Asenath, no doubt Joseph would teach her higher views of the Deity, and make her acquainted with the religious hopes and destinies of the Abrahamic race.

The possibility, however, of a foreigner attaining to high rank in Egypt, is demonstrated by the story of Sæuha, translated in Records of the Past, vol. vi., pp. 131—150. It belongs to the reign of Ameinæma I., a king of the twelfth dynasty, and represents Sæuha as entering Egypt in the dress of a herb-seller, but in time he marries there the eldest daughter of a local king, has a large landed estate given him, “which abounded in wines more than in water;” and, finally, is sent for by King Amenemhe, and raised to such high rank, as to be clad in “garments of kingsly attire,” and on his going to the royal palace “the king’s children attend him, proceeding even unto the great gates.” This curious evidence, which is even a little older than the time of Joseph, proves that there is nothing unusual or improbable in his exaltation.

58 All the food.—Probably besides the fifth paid as tax to the king, and out of which all the current expenses of the realm would have to be provided, Joseph bought corn largely during these years when it was at its cheapest.

59 Manasseh.—That is, causing to forget. Joseph has been blamed for forgetting “his father’s house,” but the phrase means that now that he was married and had a child, he ceased to suffer from home sickness, and became contented with his lot. He need no longer for the open downs of Canaan as he had done in the prison; but his love for his father was as warm as ever.

60 Ephraim.—That is, fruitfulness. The dual ending probably intensifies the meaning.

61 The dearth.—As the Nile at this early period was not assisted and regulated in its overflow by dams and canals, famines were much more common in Egypt than when subsequently the kings had done so much to provide against this danger. As, too, this dearth was “in all lands” in Arabia, Palestine, Ethiopia, &c., there was evidently a long period of excessive drought. Still Egypt is always liable to famine, and Bar-Herahns (Chronicon, p. 260) gives terrible details of the sufferings of Egypt in the year of the Hejra 402, when so great was the loss of life, that whereas in the city of Tanis (Zean) 300,000 men paid poll-tax in the previous year, there remained in it less than a hundred souls at the end of the dearth.

One argument adduced by Canen Cook, Excursions on the Bearings of Egyptian History on the Pentateuch, p. 451, for placing the descent of the Israelites into Egypt in the reign of Ameinæma III., is that it countries came into Egypt to Joseph for to buy corn; because that the famine was so sore in all lands.

CHAPTER XLIII. — (4) Now when Jacob saw that there was corn in Egypt, Jacob said unto his sons, Why do ye look one upon another? (5) And he said, Behold, I have heard that there is corn in Egypt; get you down thither, and buy for us from thence; that we may live, and not die. (6) And Joseph's ten brethren went down to buy corn in Egypt. (7) But Benjamin, Joseph's brother, Jacob sent not with his brethren; for he said, Lest peradventure mischief befall him.

was this monarch who “first established a complete system of dykes, canals, locks, and reservoirs, by which the inundations of the Nile were henceforth regulated.” The artificial lake of Moeris was also made by his orders, and other works of extraordinary vastness. Now not only would such works be suggested by a dearth of unusually long continuance, but the measures taken by Joseph during the seven years of famine would place the whole resources of the country at the Pharaoh's disposal.

First Visit of Joseph's Brethren to Egypt.

(1) When Jacob saw.—That is, learned, understood, that there was corn in Egypt. As we have seen (chap. xxxvii. 25), there was a large caravan trade between Palestine and Egypt, and the report would gradually get abroad that food might be purchased there.

Why do ye look . . .—In the second rainy season not only would the flocks and herds begin to languish, but the numerous retainers of Jacob and his sons would also become encumbered from insufficient nourishment, and begin to die of low fever and those other diseases which follow in the train of famine. Jacob's words, therefore, mean, Why are you irresolute, and uncertain what to do? And then he encourages them to take this journey as a possible means of providing for the wants of their households.

(2) Joseph's ten brethren.—Either their cattle and households had been already greatly reduced by the mortality caused by the famine, or each patriarch must have taken a number of servants with him, if the corn carried home was to be sufficient for any real use. We learn, however, that they still possessed flocks and herds when they went down into Egypt (chap. xlvii. 1), and also households of servants (chap. xlvii. 5, where see Note). Joseph, moreover, besides the wagons and their contents, sends twenty loads of provisions for the use of his father by the way (chap. xlv. 21—23), showing thereby that there were very many months to feed. Probably, therefore, there was some small amount of rain in Palestine, though not enough for the support of crops of corn. There would be, however, supplies of milk and flesh, but not much more.

(3) Joseph's brethren came and bowed down themselves before him.—Throughout the land of Egypt Joseph would sell by deputy, and only give general directions; but the arrival of so large a party as Joseph's ten brethren, each probably with several attendants, would be reported to the governor in person, as certainly was the case with Abraham when he went into Egypt (chap. xii. 14, 15). Such visits would happen only occasionally, and the arrival of foreigners was always a matter looked upon with suspicion, especially upon the Arabian frontier.

(4) Joseph . . . spake roughly unto them.—Joseph has been accused of harshness in his treatment of his brethren, and still more so of his father in forcing him to send away Benjamin. The latter was, no doubt, the result of his great longing to see his only brother, and he may not have known how dear he was to Jacob, or have reflected upon the pain which his father would feel in parting with him. Still it was but a temporary separation, to prepare for a happy reunion. As regards his half-brethren, Joseph was obliged to prove them, and he did nothing to them which they did not richly deserve. From the first he probably wished to have his father and Benjamin to dwell with him, and share his good fortune; but if his brethren were still the emaciated and heartless wretches which they had shown themselves to have been in their conduct to him twenty years before, we may well suppose that he would justly have left them to their fate. Possibly his first emotion towards them was one of indignation, but it melted away, when, even in but one of them, he saw proof that they were not entirely destitute of better feeling (see verses 22, 24).

(5) Joseph know.—As this is twice repeated, some suppose that Joseph (in verse 7) had only a suspicion, from their dress and appearance, that these Canaanites were his brethren; but that when they spake the Hebrew tongue (comp. verse 23), every doubt was removed. They would not recognize him, as he used the Egyptian language, was clad in a white linen dress, and being but seventeen when sold, had during the twenty years of separation changed in appearance much more than they had.

(6) Ye are spies.—This is the suspicion under which every traveller labours in the East; but in those days the whole Semitic race was especially looked upon in Egypt with distrust, and, as we saw in chap. xii. 15, them, Ye are spies; to see the nakedness of the land ye are come. (10) And they said unto him, Nay, my lord, but to buy food are thy servants come. (11) We are all one man’s sons; we are true men, thy servants are no spies. (12) And he said unto them, Nay, but to see the nakedness of the land ye are come. (13) And they said, Thy servants are twelve brethren, the sons of one man in the land of Canaan; and, behold, the youngest is this day with our father, and one is not. (14) And Joseph said unto them, That is it that I spake unto you, saying, Ye are spies: (15) hereby ye shall be proved; By the life of Pharaoh ye shall not go forth hence, except your youngest brother come hither. (16) Send one of you, and let him fetch your brother, and ye shall be kept in prison, that your words may be proved, whether there be any truth in you: or else by the life of Pharaoh surely ye are spies. (17) And he put them all together into ward three days. (18) And Joseph said unto them the third day, This do, and live; for I fear God: (19) if ye be true men, let one of your brethren be bound in the house of your prison: go ye, carry corn for the famine of your houses: (20) but bring your youngest brother unto me; so shall your words be verified, and ye shall not die. And they did so. (21) And they said one to another, We are verily guilty concerning our brother, in that we saw the anguish of his soul, when he besought us, and we would not hear; therefore is this distress come upon us. (22) And Reuben answered them, saying, 1 Spake I not unto you, saying, Do not sin against the child; and ye would not hear? therefore, behold, also his blood is required. (23) And they knew not that Joseph understood them; for he spake unto them by an interpreter. (24) And he turned himself about from them, and wept: and rea chain of fortresses had been built to protect the land from their incursions. Such an arrival, therefore, as that of Joseph’s brethren would be a matter of state, worthy of the attention of the highest officials; and probably they had themselves come prepared to be assailed with the accusation of having political objects in view in their visit. The nakedness of the land.—That is, its defenceless condition, from the want of fortresses and garrisons. Egypt was chiefly assailable on the side of Palestine, and was often at war with the Hittites there. So also the Hyksos, who subdued Egypt, were Semites from Palestine, and thus there was reason for looking closely at visitors from that quarter. (11) We are all one man’s sons.—Joseph’s brethren had probably expected this accusation, and their answer, as Abravanel points out, is a sound one: for no man would send his whole family on so dangerous an errand. And thus they press their family relations as a proof of their being true, that is, honest, just men, with no evil designs; and Joseph, who was glad in this way to obtain intelligence of his father and Benjamin, finally, after persisting in the accusation until he had learned all he wished to know, accepts their argument as valid. (12) That is it.—Joseph persists in his charge, because of the information which he gained, he also wished to get Benjamin into his power, that he might have him with him. As for his brethren, he had probably as yet no settled purpose, but naturally he would feel great indignation at the treatment he had experienced at their hands, and might not be unwilling to give them some degree of punishment. (13) By the life of Pharaoh.—It was common in ancient times to swear by the king’s life (see 1 Sam. xvii. 55; 2 Sam. xiv. 19), and even by the life of Jehovah (ibid. xv. 21; 2 Kings ii. 2, 4, 6). It is only in the stricter morality of the Gospel that such oaths are forbidden (Matt. v. 33–37).

(17) I fear God (Elohim).—By the use of the name Elohim they would understand that he worshipped the same God as they did. For though he may himself have used the Egyptian word for the supreme Deity, yet doubtless he would take care that the interpreter used the word Elohim. (18) Bring your youngest brother.—Besides his desire to be re-united to his brother, Joseph reasonably felt that the possession of Benjamin would be the best means of inducing his father also to come to him. While substituting a much milder proposal for his former one, that nine should remain in prison, and the tenth go to fetch Benjamin, Joseph nevertheless takes care to make his brethren feel that he was in earnest. (20) We are verily guilty.—They had evidently expected that whatever suspicions might be aroused by their first appearance, all such ideas would disappear upon their explanation of themselves and their purpose. Instead of this they are thrown into prison, abandoned to their reflections for three days, and dismissed only upon the condition of their leaving one brother as a hostage for their coming again accompanied by Benjamin: and as they knew no reason for this, it would fill their minds with fear. But though they were now suffering unjustly, it brought back to their mind their former sin; and the fact that it was so fresh in their memories is a sign of the reality of their repentance. (21) His blood.—Evidently they thought that Joseph was dead, so that the accusation brought against them of falsehood for saying in verse 13 “one is not” is groundless. Moreover, Jacob uses the same words of Simeon (chap. xlii. 36), meaning by it only that he was lost to him. (22) He turned. . . and wept.—There was no bitterness in Joseph’s heart, and at their first word of regret he melted. But lest he should lose Benjamin he over-came his feelings, and commanded that Simeon should be bound, choosing him, probably, as the one chiefly turned to them again, and communed with them, and took from them Simeon, and bound him before their eyes.

(25) Then Joseph commanded to fill their sacks with corn, and to restore every man's money into his sack, and to give them provision for the way: and thus did he unto them. (26) And they filled their vessels with the corn, and departed thence. (27) And as one of them opened his sack to give his ass provender in the inn, he espied his money; and, for behold, it was in his sack's mouth. (28) And he said unto his brethren, My money is restored; and lo, it is even in my sack: and their heart failed them, and they were afraid, saying one to another, What is this that God hath done unto us?

(29) And they came unto Jacob their father unto the land of Canaan, and told him all that befell unto them; saying, (30) The man, who is the lord of the land, spake roughly to us, and took the world used in verse 25 signifies everything into which corn could be put: and the word at the end of this verse is the travelling-bag, which each of the patriarchs carried behind him on his riding ass. Their men would go on foot at the side of the beasts of burden laden with the corn.

It is said hero that one only found his money at the lodging-place, and that the rest did not find their money until they emptied their sacks on reaching home. The sacks mentioned here (in verse 35) were the same as the travelling-bags, for they are expressly so called in chap. xliii. 21, 22, 23. In chap. xliii. 21, however, they tell Joseph's steward that they all found their money in the mouth of their sacks on opening them at the lodging-place. This was not strictly accurate, but it would have been wearisome and useless to enter into such details. Two things it was necessary to show: the first, that all had found their money; the second, that they had gone too far on their journey homewards to be able to return and give the money back. Probably what is said in chap. xliii. 21 was literally true only of one, and he found his money because it had been put in last, and was therefore at the mouth of the wallet. In all the other sacks it had been put in first, under the corn, and so they did not find it until "they had emptied their sacks."

(30) 21. The heart failed them.—This verse is far more poetical in the Hebrew, where, literally it is And their heart went forth, and they trembled each to his brother. Their courage left them, and they stood looking at one another in terror.

(31) Leave one of your brethren.—While acknowledging that the lord of Egypt had spoken "hard things" with them, they do not mention that Simeon was left in bonds, nor even the harsher part of the treatment which they had met with, lest Jacob should be afraid to send Benjamin on their next visit.

(32) All these things are against me.—Heb., are upon me, are burdens which I have to bear.
not, and ye will take Benjamin away: all these things are against me. (37) And Reuben spake unto his father, saying, Slay my two sons, if I bring him not to thee: deliver him into my hand, and I will bring him to thee again. (38) And he said, My son shall not go down with you; for his brother is dead, and he is left alone: if mischief befall him by the way in which ye go, then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.

CHAPTER XLIII.—(1) And the famine was sore in the land. (2) And it came to pass, when they had eaten up the corn which they had brought out of Egypt, their father said unto them, Go again, buy us a little food. (3) And Judah spake unto him, saying, The man 1 did solemnly protest unto us, saying, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you. (4) If thou wilt send our brother with us, we will go down and buy thee food: (5) but if thou wilt not send him, we will not go down: for the man said unto us, Ye shall not see my face, except your brother be with you.

(6) And Israel said, Wherefore dealt ye so ill with me, as to tell the man whether ye had yet a brother? (7) And they said, The man 2 asked us straitly of our state, and of our kindred, saying, Is your father yet alive? have ye another brother? and we told him according to the 3 tenor of these words: 4 could we certainly know that he would say, Bring your brother down?

(8) And Judah said unto Israel his father, Send the lad with me, and we will arise and go; that we may live, and not die, both we, and thou, and also our little ones. (9) I will be surety for him; of my hand shalt thou require him: 6 if I bring him not unto thee, and set him before thee, then let me bear the blame for ever: (10) for except we had lingered, surely now we had returned 5 this second time.

(11) And their father Israel said unto

---

(37) Slay my two sons.—Reuben does not suppose that Jacob would really put his grandchild to death, but simply means to offer his father a strong assurance that Benjamin would run no danger. He regarded the risk as so slight that he was willing to stake the lives of two of his children, perhaps all he then had, upon Benjamin’s safe return. To take such a proposal as meant literally is irrational. But it was but feeble talk, in agreement with the general weakness of Reuben’s character.

(38) Then shall ye bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave.—Heb. to Sheol (See Note on chap. xxxvii. 35). Jacob, both here and in chap. xlvii. 9, speaks as one on whom sorrow had pressed very heavily. Always of a timid and affectionate disposition, he looks onward now without hope, and sees in the future only dangers and ill-fortune. Probably by this time he had lost Leah as well as Rachel, but the blow that had struck him utterly down had evidently been the loss of Joseph, in whom Rachel had still seemed to live on for him. And therefore now he chung the more warmly to Benjamin, and it is plain that the father’s deep sorrow for the loss of the beloved son had softened the hearts of his brethren. They have no grudge against Benjamin because he has taken Joseph’s place, but rather seem to share in their father’s feelings, and their hearts were in accordance with what Judah says in chap. xlv. 18–34, that any personal suffering would be cheerfully borne by them, rather than to have to undergo the sight of the repetition of such grief as they previously had themselves inflicted.

XLIIL

THE SECOND VISIT TO EGYPT.

(7) The man asked us straitly.—In chap. xlii. 13 they appear rather as volunteering a statement of their family relations than as having it wrung from them by cross-examination. But really this history must be taken as explaining and supplementing the former. Accused of being spies, they would naturally give an account of themselves, and Joseph, anxious to know about his father and brother, would certainly put numerous questions to them concerning their home and family. And they would answer them fully and frankly, little suspecting who was the questioner, and what was his real reason for exacting Benjamin’s presence in proof of their trustworthiness.

Of our state and of our kindred.—Heb., concerning ourselves and our birthplace (see chaps. xii. 1, xxiv. 4, 7, xxxi. 8), that is, our home. Questions about ourselves would be such as these given: Is your father yet alive? Have ye a brother? And besides these, Joseph would interrogate them closely concerning the place whence they came, and the state of things there.

(9) The lad.—Benjamin was now between twenty and thirty years of age. The term “lad” in Judah’s mouth is one of affection, but even in itself it suits very well to a youth of this age. Rebekah (in chap. xxiv. 16) is called in the Hebrew a lad (see Note there), and so is Shechem in chap. xxxiv. 19. The assertion, therefore, that Benjamin is here represented as a mere boy, is disproved by the use of the word in the Hebrew.

Our little ones.—Heb., our “tufs,” that is, our households. (See Note on chap. xxxiv. 29.)

(10) Then let me bear the blame for ever.—This is much more warmly and therefore more persuasive than Reuben’s talk about pledging the lives of his children. For it was real, nor would it be a slight matter to stand in his father’s presence all the rest of his life as one guilty of a grievous crime.

(11) The best fruits.—Heb., the song, that is, whatever in the land is most celebrated in song.

In your vessels.—The word used in chap. xlii. 25, where see Note. Concerning this present two remarks must be made: the first, that it proves that though there was not rain enough in Palestine to bring the corn to perfection, yet that there was some small supply, sufficient to maintain a certain amount of vegetation; and but for this Jacob could not have kept his cattle alive (chap. xlvii. 1). And next, the smallness of the present does not so much show that Jacob had very simple ideas respecting the greatness of the king of Egypt, as that there was a scarcity even of these fruits. Probably the trade in them had ceased, and therefore even a moderate quantity would be welcome. For the words rendered balm, spices, and myrrh (really balsam, gum-tragacanth and ladanum), see Note on chap. xxxvii. 25.

Honey.—As both the honey made by bees and date honey were common in Egypt, many suppose that this was grape-honey, prepared by boiling down the juice of ripe grapes to a third of its original quantity. Hebron is famous for its preparation, and even in modern times three hundred camel loads used to be exported thence annually into Egypt. Diluted with water it forms a very grateful drink, and it is also largely eaten with bread, as we eat butter.

Nuts.—That is, pistachio nuts, the fruit of the pistacia vera. As the tree delights in dry, rocky situations, it will not grow in Egypt. It has an oily kernel, both palatable in itself and also much used for making savory meats. These and the almonds, which also do not grow well in Egypt, would be acceptable gifts.

(12) Double money.—So Rashi; but others render it literally, second money, that is, a second sum of money. This agrees with the phrase “other money” in verse 22.

(13) God Almighty.—Heb., El Shaddai, the name by which Abraham’s covenant (chap. xvii. 1) was renewed to Jacob (chap. xxxv. 11). If I be bereaved . . . An expression of pious resignation, united with heartfelt anguish. The inserted words of my children lessen the pathos of the patriarch’s ejaculations, which literally is “and I, if I am bereaved, I am bereaved.”

(16) Slay.—The charge of inaccuracy brought against the narrator, upon the supposition that the higher classes in Egypt, especially the priests, did not eat flesh, has been abundantly disproved, as the representations of feasts belonging to this period show that an abundance of animal food was consumed. Animals, moreover, sacred in one district were freely eaten in another. Generally, the priests might eat the flesh of oxen and geese, but not mutton, pork, or fish. (Rawlinson’s Egypt, i. 438.)

(19) At the door of the house.—Alarmed at a thing so unexpected as being taken to the house of the governor, they can see nothing but danger, and will not enter until they receive the assurance of safety from the officer “who was over Joseph’s house.” (See Note on verse 25.)

(21) The inn.—The lodging-place. (See Note on chap. xlii. 27.)

Our sacks.—Heb., our travelling or forage boys. It is the word used at the end of chap. xlii. 27. So immediately afterwards the silver was found “in the mouth of the travelling-bag.” And so again in verses 22 and 23. This is accurate, as the silver was placed in the private bag of each one, and not in the corn sacks; but as we have seen in chap. xlii. 27, 35, only one of them found his money at the lodging-place. This, however, was a matter of no importance, while it was necessary to show that they were a full day’s journey on the route homewards before the mistake was discovered.

(23) Your God.—Either Joseph had instanced his steward what to say, or he had trained his household generally in the truths of his religion. (See Note on chap. xlii. 18.) The word for “treasure” means hidden treasure, or as we call it a “windfall.”

153
of your father, hath given you treasure in your sacks: I had your money. And he brought Simeon out unto them.

(24) And the man brought the men into Joseph's house, and gave them water, and they washed their feet; and he gave their asses provender. (25) And they made ready the present against Joseph came at noon: for they heard that they should eat bread there.

(26) And when Joseph came home, they brought him the present which was in their hand into the house, and bowed themselves to him to the earth. (27) And he asked them of their welfare, and said, Is your father well, the old man of whom ye spake? Is he yet alive? (28) And they answered, Thy servant our father is in good health, he is yet alive. And they bowed down their heads, and made obeisance. (29) And he lifted up his eyes, and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, Is this your younger brother, of whom ye spake unto me? And he said, God be gracious unto thee, my son. (30) And Joseph made haste; for his bowels did yearn upon his brother: and he sought where to weep; and he entered into his chamber.

By bringing out Simeon he would remove their worst fears, and so at last they consent to go in.

(25) For they heard . . . —As Joseph in verse 16 gives his orders in the Egyptian language, his brethren would not understand why they were taken to the governor's palace; but probably the steward now tells them that they were to feast with the governor, in order to allay their fears, as the rights of hospitality were too sacred to permit of perjury to a guest.

(26) They bowed down.—This was the literal fulfillment of the first dream concerning the eleven sheaves making obeisance. As their business in Egypt was to buy corn, there was a fitness also in their being represented as sheaves.

(27) Is this your younger brother?—Rather, your youngest brother. Joseph's question was one of surprise. Can this young man, now nearly thirty, be the little Benjamin, who was but a child of eight or nine when last I saw him?

(28) He washed his face.—This was done to remove all traces of his tears.

(29) By himself . . . by themselves.—These easter distinctions were common in ancient times, and still exist in India. Joseph probably had his food served separately because of his high rank; but the word "abomination" shows that eating with foreigners was shunned by the Egyptians for religious considerations. Herodotus (ii. 41) says that the Greeks were equally the objects of their dislike, and that the use even of a Greek knife would render food, otherwise clean, polluted in the eyes of the Egyptians.

(30) They sat.—The Egyptians are always represented on the monuments as sitting at their meals.

Heb., your money came to me. ch. 18. 1 & 21. 22.

Heb., peace.

Heb., Is there room to your father? Heb., they drank largely.

Heb., him that was over his house.

For the Hebrew custom see Noto on chap. xxvii. 19. The brethren, on finding themselves placed according to their age, must have supposed that Joseph possessed powers of divination, especially as the giving of due precedence was and is looked upon in the East as a matter of high importance.

(34) Messes.—A portion of food from that prepared for the chief is regarded in the East as a mark both of honour and friendship, and the largeness of Benjamin's mess marked him out as the especial object of Joseph's regard. The words literally are, "And the portion of Benjamin was great above the portions of all of them five hands," that is, five times. It has been supposed that Joseph intended to try his brethren by this preference, and see if they were still envious. More probably it was dictated simply by his love.

They drank and were merry with him.—Heb., They drank and were drunken with him. The verb is that used of Noah in chap. ix. 21, but probably the rendering in Haggai i. 6, "and were filled with drink," would give the right meaning. They lost all fear and suspicion, and gave themselves up to enjoyment.

CHAPTER XLIV.—(1) And he commanded & the steward of his house, saying, Fill the men's sacks with food, as much as they can carry, and put every man's money in his sack's mouth. (2) And put my cup, the silver cup, in the sack's mouth of the youngest, and his corn money. And he did according to the word that Joseph had spoken.

They drank and were merry with him.—Heb., They drank and were drunken with him. The verb is that used of Noah in chap. ix. 21, but probably the rendering in Haggai i. 6, "and were filled with drink," would give the right meaning. They lost all fear and suspicion, and gave themselves up to enjoyment.

The Cup is placed in Benjamin's riding-bag.

(2) Put my cup . . .—Rather bowl, as it signifies a large round vessel from which the wine was poured into the drinking cups. Joseph's purpose apparently was to detain no one but Benjamin, and it was only when Judah spoke so very nobly, and pointed out that Jacob's heart would be broken with grief if he lost the one remaining son of Rachel, made more dear
As soon as the morning was light, the men were sent away, they and their asses. And when they were gone out of the city, and not yet far off, Joseph said unto his steward, Up, follow after the men; and when thou dost overtake them, say unto them, Wherefore have ye rewarded evil for good? Is not this it in which my lord dranketh, and whereby indeed he divineth? ye have done evil in so doing. And he overtook them, and he spake unto them these same words. And they said unto him, Wherefore saith my lord these words? God forbid that thy servants should do according to this thing; behold, the money, which we found in our sacks' mouths, we brought again unto thee out of the land of Canaan: how then shall we steal out of thy lord's house silver or gold? With whomsoever of thy servants it be found, both let him die, and we also will be my lord's bondmen. And he said, Now also let it be according unto your words: he with whom it is found shall be my servant; and ye shall be blameless. Then they speedily took down every man his sack to the ground, and opened every man his sack. And he searched, and began at the eldest, and left at the youngest; and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack.

Then they rent their clothes, and laded every man his ass, and returned to the city. And Judah and his brethren came to Joseph's house; for he was yet there: and they fell before him on the ground. And Joseph said unto them, What deed is this that ye have done? wot ye not that such a man as I can certainly divine? And Judah said, What shall we say unto my lord? what shall we speak? or how shall we clear ourselves? God hath found out the iniquity of thy servants: behold, we are my lord's servants, both we, and he also with whom the cup is found. And he said, God forbid that I should do so: but the man in whose hand the cup is found, he shall be my servant; and as for you, get you up in peace unto your father.

Then Judah came near unto him, and said, Oh, my lord, let thy servant, I pray thee, speak a word in my lord's ear, to him by his brother's fate, that he determined to give a home to them all. He naturally supposed that his father had long since ceased to grieve for himself, and probably even hoped to prevail upon him subsequently to join him in Egypt. But when Judah offered himself for slavery rather than that his father should suffer the grief of seeing them return without Benjamin, Joseph understood that Jacob's anguish would be great beyond endurance, and he also became aware that his brethren were no longer as heartless as they had shown themselves of old. Whereby he divineth.—Cup divination was common in Egypt in ancient times, and was a kind of clairvoyance, the bowl being partly filled with water, and the eye of the diviner fixed upon some one point in it till, warned with gazing, a state of half stupor was induced, during which the mind, freed from the control of reason, acted in a manner parallel to its operation in dreams. The same effect can be produced by gazing intently on a globe of glass, and other such things. In verse 15, Joseph asserts that he practised this art, and innocently. Though used now generally for imposture, there is in clairvoyance a real physical basis, which would be inexplicable in an unscientific age; and the genuine piety and goodness of Joseph would not raise him above the reach of the superstitions of his time.

God forbid.—Heb., far be it from me to do so. Joseph passes over the money found in their sacks, and which he had intended as a gift to help them in the remaining years of famine, but expresses his determination to keep Benjamin as a slave. Had they been as hardhearted as when they sold him into slavery, they would readily have gone away, leaving their brother to his fate. But they had changed, and therefore they earnestly exert themselves for his deliverance, though they must have felt it to be an almost hopeless task. They would feel sure of Benjamin's innocence, but they would also remember that the previous day Joseph had shown him the utmost honour; and this would be a proof to them that for some reason or other the Egyptian governor had taken a fancy to him, and determined to have him in his service; and that therefore he had contrived this wicked scheme.

Then Judah came near.—The power of Judah's speech lies in the facts themselves, which gain in pathos from being simply told; but the ending is grand because of the speaker's magnanimity. He offers to give up all that a man holds dearest in order that ears, and let not thine anger burn against thy servant: for thou art even as Pharaoh. (19) My lord asked his servants, saying, Have ye a father, or a brother? (20) And we said unto my lord, We have a father, an old man, and a child of his old age, a little one; and his brother is dead, and he alone is left of his mother, and his father loveth him. (21) And thou saidst unto thy servants, Bring him down unto me, that I may set mine eyes upon him. (22) And we said unto my lord, The lad cannot leave his father: for if he should leave his father, his father would die. (23) And thou saidst unto thy servants, Except your youngest brother come down with you, ye shall see my face no more. (24) And it came to pass when we came up unto thy servant my father, we told him the words of my lord. (25) And our father said, Go again, and buy us a little food. (26) And we said, We cannot go down: if our youngest brother be with us, then will we go down: for we may not see the man's face, except our youngest brother be with us. (27) And thy servant my father said unto us, Ye know that my wife bare me two sons: (28) and the one went out from me, and I said, Surely he is torn in pieces; and I saw him not since: (29) and if ye take this also from me, and mischief befall him, ye shall bring down my gray hairs with sorrow to the grave. (30) Now therefore when I come to thy servant my father, and the lad be not with us; seeing that his life is bound up in the lad's life; (31) it shall come to pass, when he seeth that the lad is not with us, that he will die: and thy servants shall bring down the gray hairs of thy servant our father with sorrow to the grave. (32) For thy servant became surety for the lad unto my father, saying, If I bring him not unto thee, then I shall bear the blame to my father for ever. (33) Now therefore, I pray thee, let thy servant abide instead of the lad a bondman to my lord; and let the lad go up with his brethren. (34) For how shall I go up to my father, and the lad be not with me? lest peradventure I see the evil that shall come on my father.

CHAPTER XLV.—(1) Then Joseph could not refrain himself before all them that stood by him; and he cried, Cause every man to go out from me. And there stood no man with him, while Joseph made himself known unto his brethren. (2) And he wept aloud; and the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard. (3) And Joseph said unto his brethren, I am Joseph; doth my father yet live? And his brethren could not answer him; for they were troubled at his presence. (4) And Joseph said unto his brethren, Come near to me, I pray you. And they his father may be spared a grief too heavy to bear. There is, however, very considerable skill in the manner in which Judah shows that it was at Joseph's repeated urgency that they had brought Benjamin with them, while omitting all mention of the fact that they had been falsely charged by him with being spies.

(28) The one went out...—The mention of the disappearance of the one son, which Jacob could account for only by supposing him to be dead, is made in order to give the reason for the intense love of the father to the son still remaining. The allusion also to his mother would move Joseph's feelings, though of this Judah would not be aware.

(29) To the grave.—Heb., to Sheol. (See Note on chap. xxxvii. 35.)

(32-34) Thy servant became surety.—Judah first gives the reason why he was especially bound to see to Benjamin's welfare, but he adds to it the more affecting argument that he could not bear to look upon his father's anguish. And with these moving words he ends his appeal, which to Joseph's mind had carried the conviction, first, that to separate Benjamin, even for a time from Jacob, would be an act of extreme unkindness; and secondly, that his brethren were deserving not only of pardon, but of love.

JOSEPH IS RECONCILED TO HIS BRETHREN, AND ENCOURAGES THEM AND HIS FATHER TO MAKE EGYPT THEIR HOME.

(1) Joseph could not refrain himself.—The picture which Judah had drawn of his father's love for Benjamin, the thought that by separating them he might have made his father die of grief, and the sight of his brethren, and especially of Judah offering to endure a life of slavery in order that Benjamin might go free, overpowered Joseph's feelings, and he commanded all his attendants to quit the apartment in order that there might be no restraint upon himself or his brethren when he made known to them that he was the brother whom they had so cruelly years ago condemned to be a slave.

(2) And the Egyptians and the house of Pharaoh heard.—Not the sound of Joseph's weeping, but the news that his brethren had come, as in verse 16.

(4) I am Joseph your brother.—There is much force in the assurance that he was still their brother. For they stood speechless in terrified surprise at finding Joseph reveals Himself

GENESIS, XLV.

to his Brethren.

1 Heb. was good in the eyes of Pharaoh.
2 Heb. to put for you a remnant.
3 Heb. neither let there be anger in your eyes.

hast: (11) And there will I nourish thee; for yet there are five years of famine; lest thou, and thy household, and all that thou hast, come to poverty. (12) And, behold, your eyes see, and the eyes of my brother Benjamin, that it is my mouth that speaketh unto you. (13) And ye shall tell my father of all my glory in Egypt, and of all that ye have seen; and ye shall haste and bring down my father hither.

(14) And he fell upon his brother Benjamin's neck, and wept; and Benjamin wept upon his neck. (15) Moreover he kissed all his brethren, and wept upon them: and after that his brethren talked with him.

(16) And the fame thereof was heard in Pharaoh's house, saying, Joseph's brethren are come: and it pleased Pharaoh well, and his servants. (17) And Pharaoh said unto Joseph, Say unto thy brethren, This do ye; take ye beasts, and go, get you unto the land of Canaan; (18) and take your father and that the hated dreamer, upon the anguish of whose soul they had looked unwavish, was now the ruler of a mighty empire. But with magnanimous gentleness he bids them neither to grieve nor be angry with themselves; for behind their acts there had been a watchful Providence guiding all things for good.

(7) To preserve you a posterity in the earth. —Heb. To put for you a remnant in the land, that is, to preserve a remainder for you, as the word is translated in 2 Sam. xiv. 7. During the seven years' famine many races probably dwindled away, and the Hebrews, as mere sojourners in Canaan, would have been in danger of total extinction.

(8) A great deliverance. —That is, by a signal interference on your behalf. But the word rendered "deliverance," more exactly signifies that which escapes (see 2 Kings xix. 31, where, as here, it is joined with the word remnant, and verse 30, where it is itself rendered remnant). The two nouns really signify the same thing: but whereas in the first clause the words seem to forebode that only few would escape, in the second there is the assurance of their surviving in such numbers as to be able to grow into a great nation.

(9) But God. —Heb. but the God. The article is rarely found with Elohim in the history of Joseph, but wherever it is added it is a sign of deep feeling on the speaker's part. (Comp. chap. xviii. 15.) It was the Elohim, who had been the object of the worship of their race, that had now interposed to save them.

A father. —This was a not uncommon title of the chief minister or vizier of Oriental kings.

(10) The land of Goshen. —This land, also called "the land of Rameses" (chap. xlvii. 11), probably from the city "Raamses," which the Israelites were compelled to build there (Exod. i. 11), was situated on the eastern bank of the Nile, and apparently commencing a little to the north of Memphis extended to the Mediterranean, and to the borders of the Philistines' land (Exod. xxxiii. 17). In Ps. lxxxvii. 12, 43, it is called the "field of Zoan," or Tanis. It probably was an unsettled district, but rich in pastures, and belonged in a very loose way to Egypt. In the LXX. it is called "Gesium of Arabia," to which country both Herodotus and Strabo reckoned all the district on the east of the Nile towards the Isthmus of Suez as belonging. And here the Israelites were constantly joined by large numbers of Semitic immigrants, who were enrolled in their "tafs," and swelled the rapidly increasing number of their dependants. For, as we have seen before, not merely the lineal descendants of Abraham were circumcised, but all his household and his slaves; and being thus admitted into the covenant became members of the Jewish church and nation (chap. xvii. 23).

(11) Thy household. —As the famine had lasted only two years, and as Jacob had preserved his flocks and herds, so probably he had lost few or none of the large number of men-servants and women-servants who belonged to him. He would thus go down to Egypt as head of a large tribe, who would be called Israelites after him, just as the Ishmaelites, to whom Joseph was sold (chap. xxxvii. 25), bore Ishmael's name, not because they were lineally descended from him, but because he had made them subject to his authority and that of his race. In verse 15 Joseph speaks of "their household," showing that each of the patriarchs had now his own body of dependants, besides the still larger clan which belonged to Jacob.

(16) It pleased Pharaoh... —It was of great importance, as regards the future position of the Israelites in Egypt, that they should go thither, not as men who had forced themselves on the country, but as invited guests. Hence the information that
Your households, and come unto me; and I will give you the good of the land of Egypt, and ye shall eat the fat of the land. (19) Now thou art commanded, this do ye; take you wagons out of the land of Egypt for your little ones, and for your wives, and bring your father, and come. (20) Also take not your stuff; for the good of all the land of Egypt is your's.

21 And the children of Israel did so: and Joseph gave them wagons, according to the 2 commandment of Pharaoh, and gave them provision for the way. (22) To all of them he gave each man changes of raiment; and to Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of silver, and five changes of raiment. (23) And to his father he sent after this manner: ten asses laden with the good things of Egypt, and ten she asses laden with corn and bread and meat for his father by the way. (24) So he sent his brethren away, and they departed; and he said unto them, See that ye fall not out by the way.

25 And they went up out of Egypt, and came into the land of Canaan unto Jacob their father, (25) and told him, saying, Joseph is yet alive, and he is governor over all the land of Egypt. And Jacob's heart fainted, for he believed them not. (27) And they told him all the words of Joseph, which he had said unto them; and when he saw the wagons which Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob their father revived: (28) and Israel said, It is enough; Joseph my son is yet alive: I will go and see him before I die.

CHAPTER XLVI. — (1) And Israel took his journey with all that he had, and came to Beer-sheba, and offered sacrifices unto the God of his father Isaac. (2) And God spake unto Israel in the visions of the night, and said, Jacob, Jacob. And he said, Here am I.

Emigration of Israel and his sons into Egypt.

(1) Israel came to Beer-sheba.—Though Jacob, in the first tumult of his joy, had determined upon hastening to Egypt, yet many second thoughts must have made him hesitate. He would call up to mind the boding prophecy in chap. xv, 13, that the descendants of Abraham were to be reduced to slavery, and suffer affliction in a foreign land for four hundred years. It might even be a sin, involving the loss of the Abrahamic covenant, to quit the land of Canaan, which Abraham had expressly forbidden Isaac to abandon (chap. xxiv. 8). Isaac, too, when going into Egypt, had been commanded to remain in Palestine (chap. xxvi. 2). Jacob therefore determines solemnly to consult God before finally taking so important a step, and no place could be more suitable than Beer.
(3) And he said, I am God, the God of thy father: fear not to go down into Egypt; for I will there make of thee a great nation: (4) I will go down with thee into Egypt; and I will also surely bring thee up again: and Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes. (5) And Jacob rose up from Beer-sheba: and the sons of Israel carried Jacob their father, and their little ones, and their wives, in the wagons which Pharaoh had sent to carry him. (6) And they took their cattle, and their goods, which they had gotten in the land of Canaan, and came into Egypt. (7) Jacob, and all his seed with him: (8) his sons, and his sheba, as both Abraham and Isaac had built altars there for Jehovah's worship (chap. xxi. 33, xxvi. 25), and, moreover, it lay upon the route from Hebron to Egypt.

(9) I am God, the God of thy father.—Heb. I am the El, the Elohim of thy father. This is the last revelation given to Jacob, nor is any other supernatural event recorded until the vision of the burning bush (Exod. iii. 4). It is brief, clear, and decisive, and every clause is weighty. Jacob is to migrate into Egypt, his race is to grow there into a nation, so that the stay there would be long; God's presence and blessing will accompany and remain with them, and finally will bring them back to the promised land. For himself, too, there is the promise that Joseph will tend his sick bed and be with him at his death.

(10) Joseph shall put his hand upon thine eyes.—Both among the Jews and Greeks it was the duty of those nearest in blood to close the eyes of a deceased relative. The promise conveyed the assurance that Jacob would die peacefully, surrounded by his friends. For the fulfilment see chap. 1. 1.

(11) Their goods.—These are not the vessels spoken of contemptuously by Pharaoh (chap. xlv. 20), but their personal property, of which they would naturally have much which they would not be willing to leave behind. Abraham had brought large wealth with him from Haran (chap. xii. 5), some of which may have even come from Ur-CHasdim, and much had been gathered since. The patriarchs would leave their household stuff behind, but all valuables, and the records of their house, and their telloth, they would carefully carry with them.

They came into Egypt.—For a full account of the scene depicted on the tomb of Khnum-hotep at Beni-hassan, and which at one time was identified with the arrival of the sons of Jacob, see Tomkins, Times of Abraham, 110—114.

(12) His daughters.—See Note on chap. xxxvii. 35.

Genaological Table of the Israelites.

(8) These are the names of the children of Israel which came into Egypt.—This document, consisting of verses 8—27, is one that would be of the highest importance to the Israelites, when taking possession of Canaan, being as it were their title-deed to the land. Accordingly we find that it is drawn up in a legal manner, representing as sons some who were really grandsons, but who took as heads of families the place usually held by sons. We next find that it represents them as all born in Canaan, not in a natural sense, but as the rightful heirs of the country. Technically every head of a family was born in Canaan, and thus the danger was obviated of an objection to the possession of this rank being accorded to one born in Egypt. As a matter of fact Pharez (verso 12) was an infant when taken down into Egypt. (See chap. xxxviii. 29, and Exeirass on Chronology of Jacob's life.) It is difficult enough to find time sufficient for his birth in the interval between the return from Pada-Aram, and the descent into Egypt; for the birth of his two sons, Hezron and Hamul, there is no space whatsoever. In verse 21 Benjamin has ten sons assigned him, but he was at most about thirty years of age when he went into Egypt, and some of these sons are expressly said elsewhere to have been his grandsons. Commentators have indeed endeavoured to show that Benjamin might have been a few years older, but they do this by upsetting their own conclusions previously arrived at; and there is no process which so legitimately produces scepticism as the re-statement by commentators of the facts so marshallled on each occasion as to suit the apparent exigencies of the passage before them, but in a manner irreconcilable with previous difficulties.

The genealogical table of the twelve patriarchs is three given in Holy Scripture: here, in Num. xxvi., and in 1 Chron. i.—viii. See also Exod. vi. 14—16, where only Reuben, Simeon, and Levi are given.

(9) Reuben has four sons: Hanoch, Phallu, Hezron, Carmit. In these the genealogies all agree.

(10) Simeon has six sons, namely—

Ohad, Ohad, Shall. Num. xxv. 12. 16, 1 Chron. iv. 24.

(11) Levi has three sons: Gershon, Kohath, and Merari.

(12) Judah has five sons, of whom Er and Onan die prematurely. The names of the other three are Sheelah, Onan died in the land of Canaan. And the sons of Pharez were Hezron and Hamul. (13) "And the sons of Issachar; Tola, and Phuvah, and Job, and Shimron. (14) "And the sons of Zebulun; Sered, and Elon, and Jahleeel. (15) These be the sons of Leah, which she bare unto Jacob in Padan-aram, with his daughter Dinah: all the souls of his sons and his daughters were thirty and three. (16) "And the sons of Gad; Ziphion, and Haggi, Shuni, and Ezbon, Eli, and Arodi, and Areli. (17) "And the sons of Asher; Jimmah, and Ishuah, and Isui, and Beriah, and Serah their sister: and the sons of Beriah; Heber, and Malchiel. (18) "These are the sons of Zilpah, whom Laban gave to Leah his daughter, and these she bare unto Jacob, even sixteen souls. (19) "The sons of Rachel Jacob's wife; Joseph, and Benjamin. (20) "And unto Joseph in the land of Egypt were born Manasseh and Ephraim, which Asenath the daughter of Poti-pherah priest of On bare unto him. (21) "And the sons of Benjamin were Belah, and Becher, and Ashbel, Gera, and Naaman, Ehi, and Rosh, Muppim, and Huppim, and Ard. (22) "These are the sons of Rachel, which were born to Jacob: all the souls were fourteen. (23) "And the sons of Dan; Hushim. (24) "And the sons of Naphtali; Jahzeel, and Guni, and Jezer, and Shillem. (25) These are the sons of Bilhah, which Laban gave unto Rachel.

Pharez, and Zarah (spelt correctly Zerah in Num. xxvi. 20; 1 Chron. ii. 4). So also the right spelling is Pherez, and not Pharex. In 1 Chron. iv. 1 Judah has five sons: Pharez, Hezron, Carmi, Hur, and Shobal, and Shelah is also mentioned there in verse 21, but see Note there. (16) "Issachar has four sons: Num. xxvi. 23, 24. 1 Chron. vii. 1. Tola, Tola, Tola. Phuvah, Phuvah, Phuvah. Job, Jashub, Jashub. Shimron, Shimron, Shimron.

No genealogy of the tribe of Zebulun is given in the Book of Chronicles. (17) All the souls . . . were thirty and three.—That is, six sons, twenty-three grandsons, two great-grandsons, Dinah, and Jacob himself. The other daughters and granddaughters are omitted. (18) Gad, the eldest of the sons of Zilpah, has seven sons:

In 1 Chron. v. 11—15 only the registration of the Gadites is given in the time of King Jotham. (19) Asher has four sons:

The sister is everywhere Serah, though called Serah here, and Sarah in Numbers. The three documents all agree in the names of Heber and Malchiel, sons of Beriah. (20) Sixteen souls.—That is, Gad and his seven sons, Asher and his four sons, the two grandsons and Serach.
his daughter, and she bare these unto Jacob: all the souls were seven. (26) All the souls that came with Jacob into Egypt, which came out of his loins, besides Jacob's sons' wives, all the souls were three score and six; (27) and the sons of Joseph, which were born him in Egypt, were two souls: all the souls of the house of Jacob, which came into Egypt, were three score and ten. (28) And he sent Judah before him unto Joseph, to direct his face unto Goshen; and they came into the land of Goshen. (29) And Joseph made ready his chariot, and went up to meet Israel his father, to Goshen, and presented himself unto him; and he fell on his neck, and wept on his neck a good while. (30) And Israel said unto Joseph, CHAPTER XLVII.—(1) Then Joseph came and told Pharaoh, and said, My father and my brethren, and their flocks, and their herds, and all that they have, are come out of the land of Canaan; and, behold, they are in the land of Goshen. (2) And he took some of his brethren, even five men, and presented them unto Pharaoh. (3) And Pharaoh said unto his brethren, What is your occupation? And they said unto Pharaoh, Thy servants are shepherds, both we, and also our fathers. (4) They said moreover unto Pharaoh, For to sojourn in the land are we come; for thy servants have no pasture for their flocks; for the famine is sore in the land of Canaan: now therefore, we pray thee, let thy servants dwell in the land of Goshen.

(5) And Pharaoh spake unto Joseph, saying, Thy father and thy brethren are come unto thee: (6) the land of Egypt is before thee; in the best of the land make thy father and brethren to dwell; in the land of Goshen let them dwell: and if thou knowest any men of activity among them, then make them rulers over my cattle.

(7) And Joseph brought in Jacob his father, and set him before Pharaoh: and Jacob blessed Pharaoh. (8) And Pharaoh said unto Jacob, How old art thou? (9) And Jacob said unto Pharaoh, The days of the years of my pilgrimage are an hundred and thirty years; few and evil have the days of the years of my life been, and have not attained unto the days of the years of the life of my fathers in the days of their pilgrimage. (10) And Jacob blessed Pharaoh, and went out from before Pharaoh.

(11) And Joseph placed his father and his brethren, and gave them a possession which each one presented to the king prayed for the prolongation of his life. Pharaoh probably bowed before Jacob as a saintly personage, and received a formal benediction.

My pilgrimage.—Heb., my sojournings; and so at end of verse. The idea of a pilgrimage is a modern one. Even in 1 Peter ii. 11 "pilgrim" means in the Greek a stranger who has settled in a country of which he is not a native. So, too, here Jacob was not a pilgrim, for he was no traveller bound for religious motives to some distant shrine, but he was a sojourner, because Canaan was not the native land of his race.

Few and evil.—Evil certainly; for from the time when he deceived his father, Jacob's life had been one of great anxiety and care, in addition to his many sorrows. If he had gained wealth in Haran, it had been by great industry and personal toil, aggravated by Laban's injustice. On his return, there was the double terror of Laban's pursuit behind and Esau's menacing attitude in front. He had then long lain ill at Succoth, waiting till time healed his sprained hip. His entry into the promised land had been made miserable by his daughter's dishonour and the fierce conduct of his sons. And when his home was in sight, he had lost his beloved Rachel; and finally, been compelled to remain at a distance from his father, because Esau was there chief and paramount. His father dies, and Esau goes away; but the ten years between Isaac's death and the descent into Egypt had been years of mourning for Jacob's loss. All these troubles had fallen upon him, and made his days evil; but they were few only in comparison with those of his father and grandfather. In Pharaoh's eyes Jacob had lived beyond the usual span of human existence; but to himself he seemed prematurely old. His end came after seventeen years of peaceful decay spent under Joseph's loving care.

The land of Ramses.—See Note on chap. xlv. 10. Though the LXX. take "land of Ramses" as equivalent to Goshen, it was more probably some special sion in the land of Egypt, in the best of the land, in the land of Rameses, as Pharaoh had commanded. (12) And Joseph nourished his father, and his brethren, and all his father’s household, with bread, 1 according to their families. (13) And there was no bread in all the land; for the famine was very sore, so that the land of Egypt and all the land of Canaan fainted by reason of the famine. (14) And Joseph gathered up all the money that was found in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, for the corn which they bought: and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh’s house. (15) And when money failed in the land of Egypt, and in the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came unto Joseph, and said, Give us bread: for why should we die in thy presence? for the money faileth. (16) And Joseph said, Give your cattle; and I will give you for your cattle, if money fail. (17) And they brought their cattle unto Joseph: and Joseph gave them bread in exchange for horses, and for the flocks, and for the cattle of the herds, and for the asses: and he fed them with bread for all their cattle for that year.

(19) When that year was ended, they came unto him the second year, and said unto him, We will not hide it from my lord, how that our money is spent; my lord also hath our herds of cattle; there is not ought left in the sight of my lord, but our bodies, and our lands: (20) wherefore shall we die before thine eyes, both we and our land? buy us and our land for bread, and we and our land will be servants unto Pharaoh: and give us seed, that we may live, and not die, that the land be not desolate. (21) And Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh; for the Egyptians sold every man his field, because the famine prevailed over them: so the land became Pharaoh’s. (22) And as for the district of it, for, as we have seen, Goshen was a territory of vast extent. Rameses (Exod. i. 11) is the same word, though the Masorites have given it different vowels; but whether such a town actually existed, or whether when built it took its name from the district, we cannot tell. If there were such a place, it would at this period be a poor village, consisting of a few shepherds’ huts; but long afterwards, in the days of King Rameses II., it was the centre of a rich, fertile, and beautiful land, described as the abode of plenty, where all alike, rich and poor, lived in peace and plenty.——Canon Cook, Excursion on Egyptian Words, p. 487. It deserves therefore its description as “the best of the land.”

(13) According to their families.——Heb, according to the “tafl.” This, as we have seen above, means according to the clan or body of dependants possessed by each one. Dan, with his one child, would have been starved to death if the allowance for himself and his household had depended upon the number of his “little ones,” which is the usual translation of this word in the Authorised Version. (See margin.)

Joseph’s Policy in Egypt.

(19) Give your cattle.——As the people were in want of food, and their land incapable of cultivation as long as the Nile ceased to overflow, this was a merciful arrangement, by which the owners were delivered from a burden, and also a portion of the cattle saved for the time when they would be needed again for agricultural purposes. As the charge of so many cattle in time of dearth would be a very serious matter (1 Kings xviii. 5, 6), we now see the reason why Pharaoh wished the abest of Joseph’s brethren to be employed in the task; and probably while there was no food for them in the Nile Valley, there would still be grass in the alluvial soil of the delta, which men used to move about with cattle would be able to find.

(17) Horses . . . flocks . . . herds . . . asses.——The mention of horses is a most important fact in settling the much-debated question as to the dynasty under which Joseph became governor of Egypt. When Abrahm went there, horses do not seem as yet to have been known (see Note on chap. xii. 16), but oxen and asses were common, and the former indigenous in the country (Maspero, Histoire Ancienne, pp. 11, 12). The horse was introduced by the Hyksos, according to Lenormant, Les Prem. Civilisations, i., 306 ff.; Rawlinson, Egypt, i., 74; and the first representation of one is drawing the war-chariot of the king who expelled them. The “flocks” are expressly said in the Hebrew to be sheep. This, too, is important; for while goats were indigenous in Egypt, sheep do not appear in the most ancient monuments, though they were introduced at an earlier date than horses.

(21) The second year.——Not the second year of the famine, but the year following that in which they had given up their cattle.

(22) So the land became Pharaoh’s.——Joseph has been accused of reducing a free people to slavery by his policy. Undoubtedly he did vastly increase the royal power; but from what we read of the vassalage under which the Egyptians lived to a multitude of petty sovereigns, and also to their wives, their priests, and their embalmers, an increase in the power of the king, so as to make it predominant, would be to their advantage. The statement made here that the land in Egypt belonged entirely to the king is confirmed by Herodotus and other Greek authorities. The same is the ease in India at this day; only, instead of the rent being a fifth part of the produce, it is in India a fixed annual sum, which is settled at comparatively distant intervals. In Barmah the agriculturists hold their land directly from the Crown.

(21) He removed them to cities.——Joseph’s object in this measure was most merciful. As the corn was stored up in the cities, the people would be people, he removed them to cities from one end of the borders of Egypt even to the other end thereof. (25) Only the land of the priests bought he not; for the priests had a portion assigned them of Pharaoh, and did eat their portion which Pharaoh gave them: wherefore they sold not their lands. (26) Then Joseph said unto the people, Behold, I have bought you this day and your land for Pharaoh: lo, here is seed for you, and ye shall sow the land. (27) And it shall come to pass in the increase, that ye shall give the fifth part unto Pharaoh, and four parts shall be your own, for seed of the field, and for your food, and for them of your households, and for food for your little ones. (28) And they said, Thou hast saved our lives: let us find grace in the sight of our lord, and we will be Pharaoh's servants. (29) And Joseph made it a law over the land of Egypt unto this day, that Pharaoh should have the fifth part; except the land of the priests only, which became not Pharaoh's.

(30) And Israel dwelt in the land of Egypt, in the country of Goshen; and they had possessions therein, and grew, and multiplied exceedingly. (31) And Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years: so the whole age of Jacob was an hundred forty and seven years. (32) And the time drew nigh that Israel must die: and he called his son Joseph, and said unto him, If now I have found grace in thy sight, 4put, I pray thee, thy hand under my thigh, and deal kindly and truly with me; bury me not, I pray thee, in Egypt: (33) but I will lie with my fathers, and thou shalt carry me out of Egypt, and bury me in their burying-place. And he said, I will do as thou hast said. (34) And he said, Swear unto me. And he swore unto him, and set him upon his seat, and he bowed his head upon his seat to kiss him.

Israel in Egypt.

(35) The time drew nigh that Israel must die—For seventeen years Jacob lived in Egypt, and saw the growing prosperity of his race under the fostering hand of Joseph. Placed at the entrance of Egypt, on the side of Arabia and Palestine, the clans of his sons would daily grow in number by the addition of Semitic immigrants, by whose aid they would make the vast and fertile region assigned them, and which had previously had but a scanty population, a well-cultivated and thriving land. But at last Jacob feels his end approaching; though apparently he was not as yet in immediate danger of death. But there was a wish over which he had long pondered; and desiring to have his mind set at rest, he sends for Joseph, and makes him promise that he will bury him in the cave at Machpelah. We find him again charging all his sons to grant him this request (chap. xxxii. 29—32); nor need we seek for any remote reason for it. Jacob's whole nature was a loving one, and strongly influenced by home and domestic feelings; and at Machpelah his nearest relatives were buried. In the next chapter he dwells upon Rachel's death, and his burial of her apart from the rest at Ephrath; and this seems to have increased his grief at her loss. At Machpelah, Abraham, whom he had known as a boy, his beloved father and mother, and Leah, who had evidently at last won his affections, all lay; and there, naturally, he too wished to lie among his own.

Put... thy hand under my thigh.—See Note on chap. xxiv. 2.

(36) Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head.—The LXX., followed by the Epistle to the Hebrews (chap. xi. 21) and the Syriac, read, “on the top of his staff.” The word in the Hebrew, without vowels, may mean either bed or staff, and as we have mentioned above (chap. xxii. 14), the points indicating the vowels were added in later times, and while valuable as representing a very ancient tradition, are neverthe-unto him. And Israel bowed himself upon the bed's head.

CHAPTER XLVIII. (1) And it came to pass after these things, that one told Joseph, Behold, thy father is sick: and he took with him his two sons, Manasseh and Ephraim. (2) And one told Jacob, and said, Behold, thy son Joseph cometh unto thee: and Israel strengthened himself, and sat upon the bed. (3) And Jacob said unto Joseph, God Almighty appeared unto me at Luz in the land of Canaan, and blessed me, (4) and said unto me, Behold, I will make thee fruitful, and multiply thee, and I will make thee the head of thousands of people. And he said, Swear to me. And he said, I swear to thee as the Lord liveth, which did Shunammith's daughter unto him. (5) And Jacob put his right hand upon the head of Joseph, and the left hand upon the head of the younger, Ephraim. (6) And he blessed Joseph, and said unto him, Joseph, Joseph, my son: be like a God among the heavens above. (7) And I will make thee greater than thy brethren, and set my servant upon thy right hand; in the land of my children shall he reign, and will make thee a multitude of people; and will give this land to thy seed after thee for an everlasting possession. (8) And now thy two sons, Ephraim and Manasseh, which were born unto thee in the land of Egypt before I came unto thee into Egypt, are mine; as Reuben and Simeon, they shall be mine. (9) And thy issue, which thou begettest after them, shall be thine, and shall be called after the name of their brethren in their inheritance. (10) And as for me, when I came from Padan, "Rachel died by me in the land of Canaan in the way, when yet there was but a little way to come unto Ephrath: and I buried her there in Luz. —This use of the old name shows how very slowly the new titles of places, derived from incidents in the history of a people, as distinguished from native and original appellations. In a similar manner, in the recent exploration of Palestine, it has been found that the high-sounding titles given by the Seleucidæ and Romans to towns have never been adopted by the peasantry, who still call them by their old names. (4) A multitude of people. —In chap. xxxvi. 11 the words are "a congregation (or church) of nations;" here "a congregation (same word) of peoples." (See Note there.) (5) As Reuben and Simeon, they shall be mine. —That is, Ephraim shall be regarded as my firstborn, and Manasseh as my second son. This was undoubtedly the case: for though "Judah prevailed above his brethren, and of him came the prince (and of him the Messiah), yet the birthright was Joseph's; (1 Chron. v. 2). The legal right of the firstborn was a double share of the father's goods. This was bestowed upon Joseph in giving him two tribes, and to the other sons but one. It was in a spiritual sense, and with reference to the promise that all mankind should be blessed in Joseph's seed, that the birthright was Judah's. As Joseph was the son of the chief and best-beloved wife, he had a sort of claim to the birthright; but in agreement with the law afterwards specially enacted (Deut. xxi. 15—17), Jacob acknowledges that the right had belonged to Reuben, but excludes him from the possession of it as the penalty of his great and terrible sin. Simeon and Levi are next passed over, because of their cruelty, and so Judah takes Reuben's place. (9) Thy issue, which thou begettest after them. —We gather from chap. l. 23 that Joseph probably had no other sons. But if such were born to him, they were not to count as heads of tribes, but he regarded as the children of Ephraim and Manasseh, and take rank only as heads of families. (7) Rachel died by me. —Heb., died upon me, or, as we should say, "died in my arms." The mention of Rachel is to account for an act so authoritative as the bestowal of the double portion of the firstborn upon Joseph. Jacob grounded the justification of his act, not upon her being the chief wife, but upon her untimely death, which prevented her having other sons. Even now Leah, if we count Levi, had six tribes, each lambsmaid two, and Rachel three. The same is Beth-lehem. —A note added subsequently, when the place was famous as the birthplace of Jacob.
the way of Ephrath; the same is Beth-lehem.
(8) And Israel beheld Joseph's sons, and said, Who are these? (9) And Joseph said unto his father, They are my sons, whom God hath given me in this place. And he said, Bring them, I pray thee, unto me, and I will bless them. (10) Now the eyes of Israel were dim for age, so that he could not see. And he brought them near unto him; and he kissed them, and embraced them. (11) And Israel said unto Joseph, I had not thought to see thee face to face: and, lo, God hath shewed me also thy seed.
(12) And Joseph brought them out from between his knees, and he bowed himself with his face to the earth. (13) And Joseph took them both, Ephraim in his right hand toward Israel's left hand, and Manasseh in his left hand toward Israel's right hand, and brought them near unto him. (14) And Israel stretched out his right hand, and laid it upon Ephraim's head, who was the younger, and his left hand upon Manasseh's head, guiding his hands wittingly; for Manasseh was the firstborn.
(15) And he blessed Joseph, and said, God, before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac did walk, the God which fed me all my life long unto this day, the Angel which redeemed me from all evil, bless the lads; and let my name be named on them, and the name of my fathers Abraham and Isaac; and let them grow into a multitude in the midst of the earth.
(16) And when Joseph saw that his father laid his right hand upon the head of Ephraim, it displeased him: and he held up his father's hand, to remove it from Ephraim's head unto Manasseh's head. (17) And Joseph said unto his father, Not so, my father: for this is the firstborn; put thy right hand upon his head. (18) And his father refused, and said, I know it, my son, I know it: he also shall become a people, and he also shall be great: but truly his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his seed shall become a multitude of multitudes, and shall fill the face of the earth. (19) And Joseph said unto his father, The Lord shall shew his mercy: I pray thee, show thyself gracious to the house of Jacob, and to the house of Israel: and loke, we pray thee, I beseech thee, upon Ephraim and upon Manasseh. (20) And he bowed his head, and put his face to the earth. (21) And Jacob took his hands, and blessed Joseph, and said unto the firstborn, My son, why hast thou done so?

of David. It would not be called Beth-lehem until corn was cultivated there.
(9) Who are these?—This question is asked as the solemn turning of the discourse to the young men who were now to be invested with the patriarchal rank. They were at this time about eighteen or twenty years of age.
(12) He bowed himself.—The Samaritan, Syriac, and LXX. Versions regard the Hebrew verb as a contradicted plural, and many modern commentators adopt this view. It would thus be Manasseh and Ephraim who stood before Jacob with faces bent towards the ground. The pronoun, however, is in favour of the verb being singular, and the sense it gives is equally satisfactory.
(14) Guiding his hands wittingly.—The LXX., Syriac, and Vulg. translate, "placing his hands crosswise;" but the Targum of Onkelos favours the translation of our version. There is some amount of philological support for the rendering of the three chief versions; but it must mainly rest upon their own authority, which is, however, very great.
(15, 16) He blessed Joseph, and said.—In Jacob's blessing there is a threefold appellation of the Deity, and a threefold blessing given to Joseph's sons. God is, first, the Elohim before whom his fathers had walked. Next Him is the Elohim who, as a shepherd, had watched over Jacob all his life long. But, thirdly, He is that Divine Presence which had been, and still was, Jacob's "goel," redeeming and rescuing him from all evil. The blessing is first general, the verb "bless" being singular, which, following the threefold repetition of God's name in the plural, is rightly used by Luther as a proof of a Trinity in Unity in the Godhead. Secondly, Ephraim and Manasseh are to bear the names, and be the representatives of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Lastly, they are to grow into a multitude with extraordinary rapidity, the word used signifying that they were to increase with a prolificness as great as that of fishes. The word "goel" is here used for the first time. It subsequently became the term for the nearest blood relative, whose duty it was to avenge a murder; but it is here used in its wider sense of a Saviour and a Deliverer. (Comp. Exod. vi. 6; Isa. lix. 20, &c.) The angel who wrestled with Jacob cannot accurately be described as having appeared to him in the character of a deliverer (chap. xxxii. 24—30). He appeared as an adversary; and Jacob learned in the struggle, by overcoming him, that he had power with God and man, and would prevail over all the difficulties and foes that still stood in his way. Moreover, the verb is present, "the angel that redeemed me from all evil." Jacob recognised a Divine Presence which constantly guarded him, and which was ever his Redeemer and Saviour.
(19) His younger brother shall be greater.—In the final numbering of the tribes on the plains of Moab, the tribe of Manasseh had 52,700 souls, and that of Ephraim only 32,500 (Num. xxvi. 34, 37). It was the division of the tribe of Manasseh into two portions which made it politically insignificant, while Ephraim obtained a commanding position in the land of Canaan; and as Joshua was an Ephraimit, it naturally held the rank of foremost tribe during his days, and claimed it always afterwards. For Joshua, after the conquest of Canaan, must have held a position similar to that of General Washington after the independence of the United States had been secured, and all Israel would regard him as their ruler and chief. The influence also of the tribe would be strengthened by the ark being placed in one of its towns.
nations. (29) And he blessed them that day, saying, In thee shall Israel bless, saying; God make thee as Ephraim and as Manasseh: and he set Ephraim before Manasseh. (30) And Israel said unto Joseph, Behold, I die: but God shall be with you, and bring you again unto the land of your fathers. (31) Moreover I have given to thee one portion above thy brethren, which I took out of the hand of the Amorite with my sword and with my bow.

CHAPTER XLIX.—(1) And Jacob called unto his sons, and said, Gather yourselves together, that I may tell you that which shall befall you in the last days. (2) Gather yourselves together, and hear, ye sons of Jacob; and hearken unto Israel your father.

(29) In thee shall Israel bless.—In conformity with these words, the Israelites to this day use Jacob's formula in blessing their children.

(30) One portion.—Heb., one Shechem. In favour of this being the town of Shechem is the fact that it did belong to Jacob (chap. xxxvii. 12, where see Note): also that Joseph's emblazoned body was deposited there (see Josh. xxiv. 32, where the land is said to have been bought for a hundred kesitas); and, lastly, the testimony of John iv. 5, where a parcel of ground at Sychar, close to Shechem, is identified with the ground given by Jacob to Joseph. On the other hand, one Shechem is an unnatural way of describing a town. Shechem also means, as we have seen (chap. xii. 6), the shoulder, and Abul-walid, in his Lexicon, quoting this place, says that both the Hebrews and Arabs gave this name to any elevated strip of ground. This is confirmed by Num. xxxiv. 11, &c., though the word actually used, chataf, is different. Probably, therefore, there was a play upon words in calling this plot of hill-ground Shechem, and not chataf, but made with the intention of showing that the town of Shechem was the portion really signified. But what is meant by “Jacob having taken it out of the hand of the Amorite by his sword and his bow”? Shechem was strictly a town of the Hivites, but as they were but a feeble tribe, the term Amorite may be used to give greater glory to the exploit. In chap. xv. 16, the Amorites, literally mountaineers, are described as owners of the whole country, and probably it was a term loosely applied to all the inhabitants of the uplands, though occasionally used with a more definite meaning (chap. xv. 21). As Jacob so strongly condemns the conduct of Simeon and Levi (chap. xix. 5—7), he can scarcely refer to their exploit, and therefore commentators generally suppose that he used the words prophetically, meaning, “which my descendants will, centuries hence, conquer for themselves with their swords and bows.” But this is to take the words of the Holy Scripture in a non-natural sense. Jacob was the owner of a strip of this “shoulder-land” in a way in which he was not the owner of any other portion of land in Canaan, except the cave of Machpelah; and we find him sending his cattle to pasture there when he was himself dwelling far away (chap. xxxvii. 12). And it is quite possible that, after the inhuman treatment of the Hivites at Shechem, the Amorites did gather themselves together to avenge the wrong, but were deterred by the threatening position taken up by Jacob, or even repulsed in an attack. The latter supposition would best harmonise with the fact that “a mighty terror fell upon all the cities round about” (chap. xxxv. 5), and also with the exultant spirit in which Jacob, a pre-eminently peaceful and timid man, here alludes to the one military exploit of his life.
upon the north fell by lot; south of Asher was the half-tribe of Manasseh; and south of this was Dan.
(Comp. Judges v. 17.) Zebulun was an inland tribe, and did not "dwell at the haven of the sea." It is unnecessary to continue this examination, but generally we may affirm that the sole argument for Jacob's happiness having been written in historic times is the position given to Judah. Everything besides negative this view; and we may reasonably ascribe the high rank of Judah to the fact that after the setting aside of Reuben, Simeon and Levi, he became the firstborn.

In the last days.—Heb., in the after part of days. The phrase is often opposed to "the beginning of days," and is constantly used of the times of the Messiah. Here these "after days" apparently commence with the conquest of Canaan, but look onward to the advent of Christ.

The beginning of my strength.—In chap.
xxxv. 18, the word oni means "my sorrow," and it is so translated here by the Vulg., Aquila, and Symmachus.
But in this verse Jacob magnifies the prerogatives of the firstborn, and our version is undoubtedly right in deriving oni from a different and not uncommon word signifying strength. It occurs in Deut. xxi. 17;
Job xli. 16; Pss. lxviii. 51, ev. 36, &c.

The excellency . . .—We must here supply,"And therefore to thee as the firstborn belonged," first, the excellency of dignity, that is, the priesthood; and secondly, the excellency of power, that is, the kingly office. As a matter of history no king, judge, or prophet is recorded as having sprung from the tribe of Reuben.

(4) Unstable.—This translation is shown to be right by the use of the word in Judges ix. 4; Zephi.
ii. 4, in both which places it is translated light. Out of this sense of lightness and frivolity naturally arose the meaning which the word has in Syriac of wantonness. In Arabic it means boastful, another side of cencibleness. With this sense the comparison with water well agrees; for it is its nature to seek a dull level, and while yielding to every impression to retain none. The other meaning given to it by many able critics is "bolting over like water," a description of the unrestrained violence of Reuben's passions.

Thou shalt not excel.—That is, thou shalt not have that excellency which was thine by right of birth.

(5) Simeon and Levi are brethren.—That is, they are alike in character and disposition. Despising the feeble Reuben, they seem to have been close friends and allies, and probably tried to exercise a tyranny over their younger brethren, Judah being the only one near them in age.

Their habitations.—This translation is universally abandoned, but there is much difference of opinion as to the real meaning of the word. The most probable explanation is that given by Jerome and Rashi, who render it swords. Apparently it is the Greek word μαχαίρα, a knife; and as neither the Hebrews nor the Canaanites were metallurgists, such articles were imported by merchants from Ionia. Long before the days of Jacob, caravans of traders traversed the whole country, and the goods which they brought would carry with them their own foreign names. The sentence, therefore, should be translated, "weapons of violence are their knives." The other meaning given by some competent critics, namely, compacts, if the word could be formed at all from the supposed root, would mean marriage contracts, and this gives no intellegible sense.

(6) Their secret.—The word σιώδ used here is literally the little carpet, or cushion, upon which an Oriental sits. Consequently, for two persons to sit upon the same carpet marks a high degree of friendsip and familiarity. It would therefore be more exactly translated alliance, or intimacy.

Unto their assembly, mine honour, be not thou united.—For assembly (Heb. congregation), see chaps. xxviii. 3, xxxv. 11. It means here their union, or confederacy. In the first clause Jacob bids his soul, his true self, not to enter their alliance; here, after the manner of the parallelism of Hebrew poetry, he intensifies the meaning. For by mine honour, he signifies all that gave him dignity and worth in the sight of God and man. And this nobleness would be degraded and lost by union with men bandied together for evil.

In their self-will they digged down a wall.
—Self-will is worse than anger, and signifies that arrogant temper which leads on to wanton cruelty.
The last words mean, they houghed on ox. The Vulg.
and Syriac took it as our version does, and understood it of making a breach in the walls of Shechem; but they had a different reading, sur, whereas the word in the Hebrew is shor, an ox, and it is so rendered by the LXX. The ox was in old times the symbol of majesty, and thus bulls are put for princes in Pss.
xxii. 12, lvii. 30. Thus then, the meaning is, "In their anger at the wrong done to their sister they slew Hamor, prince of Shechem, with his people; and from wanton cruelty, without any just cause for indignation, they hamsmgmed the noblest of their brethren, not killing Joseph outright, but disabling him by selling him into slavery, that he might there perish."

(7) Cursed . . .—Jacob condemns Simeon and Levi, not because they were angry, but because they vented their anger in a perfidious and violent manner.
The next sentence literally is, And their rage for it was hard. The indignation at Joseph's dreams, told them by him innocently, led them to an act harsh and inhuman (see chap. xlii. 21).

I will divide them . . .—This prediction was equally fulfilled in the fact that neither of the tribes

1. Heb., do not thou excel.
2. ch. 30. 22; 1 Chr. 4. 1.
3. Or, may couch be gone.
4. Or, their swords are weapons of violence.
5. Or, houghed oxen.
of Simeon and Levi possessed any political importance in Israel. The brothers had banded together to oppose their kindred; their descendants were powerless. But in every other respect the fulfillment was utterly diverse. In the wilderness the Simeonites dwelt from 59,300 to 22,200 men (Num. i. 23, xxvi. 14); and after the conquest of Canaan, were so feeble as to have only fifteen towns assigned them, scattered about in the territory of Judah. And there they melted away, being either absorbed into the tribe among whom they dwelt, or withdrawing to wander as nomads in the wilderness of Paran. In Levi's case the curse was changed into a blessing by the faithfulness of the tribe on a very trying occasion (Exod. xxxii. 26—28); and we learn from it the great lesson that the Divine rewards and punishments, even when specified in prophecy, are nevertheless conditional upon human conduct. Of this diversity of fulfilment there is not the slightest indication in Jacob's blessing, while in that of Moses the lot of Levi is described in terms of the highest praise, and that of Simeon is passed over in inglorious silence.

(8) Judah, thou art the whom thy brethren shall praise: thy hand shall be in the neck of thine enemies; thy father's children shall bow down before thee.

(9) Judah is a lion's whelp: from the prey, my son, thou art gone up: he stooped down, he crouched as a lion, and as an old lion; who shall rouse him up?

(10) The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between his feet, until Shiloh come; and unto him shall the gathering of the people be.

Nor a lawgiver from between his feet.—Most modern critics translate ruler's staff, but "lawgiver" has the support of all the ancient versions, the Targums paraphrasing it by scribe, and the Syriac in a similar way by expounder—i.e., of the law. "Ruler's staff has the parallelism in its favour, but the ancient versions must not be lightly disregarded, and, besides, everywhere else the word means law-giver (see Deut. xxxiii. 21; Judges v. 14; Isa. xxxiii. 22). "From between his feet," means, "from among his descendants." The Targum of Onkelos renders, "from his children's children.

Until Shiloh come.—Many modern critics translate, "until he come to Shiloh," but this is to be rejected, first, as being contrary to all the ancient versions; and, secondly, as turning sense into nonsense. The town of Shiloh was in the tribe of Ephraim, and we know of no way in which Judah ever went thither. The ark was for a time at Shiloh, but the place lost all importance and sank into utter obscurity after its destruction by the Philistines, long before Judah took the leading part in the commonwealth of Israel.

Shiloh.—There are several interpretations of this word, depending upon different ways of spelling it. First, Jerome, in the Vulg., translates it, "He who shall be sent." He read, therefore, Shalchith, which differs from the reading in the Hebrew text by omitting the yod, and putting the guttural ס for ה (Heb., ס) as the final letter. We have, secondly, Shiloh, the reading of the present Hebrew text. This would mean, Peaceful, or Peace-maker, and agrees with the title given to the Messiah by Isaiah (chap. ix. 6). But, thirdly, all the versions excepting the Vulg., read Sheloh. Thus, the LXX. has, "He for whom it is laid up" (or, according to other MSS., "the things laid up for him"). With the former reading, Aquila and Symmachus agree; with the latter, Theodotion, Ephphanias, and others, showing that Sheloh was the reading in the manuscripts of the Nativity of our Lord. The Samaritan transcript of the Hebrew text into Samaritan letters reads Sheloh, and the translation into Aramaic treats the word as a proper name, and renders, "Until Sheloh come." Onkelos boldly paraphrases, "Until Messiah come, whose is the kingdom;" and, finally, the Syriac has, "Until he come, whose it is." There is thus overwhelming evidence in favour of the reading Sheloh; and to this we may add that Sheloh is the reading even of several Hebrew MSS. We may, in fact, sum up the evidence by saying that the reading Sheloh, even in the Hebrew text, has only modern authority in its favour, and that all ancient authorities are in favour of Sheloh: for even Jerome omits the yod, though he changes the aspirate at the end into a gutural.

Sheloh literally means, Whose it is, and is an Aramaic form, such as that in chap. vi. 3, where we have observed that these Aramamians are a proof either of extreme antiquity, or of a very late date. We find another in Judges v. 7, in the song of Deborah, confessedly a very ancient composition; and the form is [11] Binding his foal unto the vine, and his ass’s colt unto the choice vine; he washed his garments in wine, and his clothes in the blood of grapes; [12] his eyes shall be red with wine, and his teeth white with milk.

[13] Zebulun shall dwell at the haven of the sea; and he shall be for an haven of ships; and his border shall be unto Zidon.

[14] Issachar is a strong ass couching down between two burdens: [15] and he saw that rest was good, and the land that it was pleasant; and bowed his shoulder to bear, and became a servant unto tribute.
GENESIS, XLIX.

(16) Dan shall judge his people, as one of the tribes of Israel. (17) Dan shall be a serpent in the way, an adder in the path, that biteth the horse heels, so that his rider shall fall backward. (18) I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord.

(19) Gad, a troop shall overcome him: but he shall overcome at the last.

(20) Out of Asher his bread shall be fat, and he shall yield royal dainties.

(16, 17) Dan.—In passing on to the sons of the handmaids it was necessary to assure them of an independent rank among their brethren. The four tribes descended from them did always hold an inferior position, but Jacob by his words to Dan prevented their ever becoming subject states. Playing, then, upon the name Dan (a judge), he says that he shall judge his people as a distinct and separate tribe, possessed of all those rights of royalties, independence which this rank implied. It seems also that Dan’s symbol was a serpent, and from this Jacob prophesies that though too weak a tribe to take the foremost place in war, yet that Dan should not be without military importance; and this was especially the case in the days of Samson. The word rendered adder is more exactly the arrow-snake, which lies in wait in the “path,” a narrow track, and springs upon its prey as it passes. A horse bitten in this way would rear and throw its rider, who would then be in the power of his assailant.

(19) I have waited for thy salvation, O Lord (Jehovah).—Among the many explanations hazarded of this ejaculation the most probable is that given in the Speaker’s Commentary, that the thought of the serpent wounding its prey in the heel carried the mind of the patriarch back to the fall of man, and the promise made to Eve. And thus it is a profession of faith, naturally called out by this chain of ideas, in the advent in due time of the promised Deliverer, and of which the accomplishment had become hinted in thought with the name of Jehovah.

(20) Gad.—The word Gad, as we have seen (chap. xxx. 11), means good fortune, but Jacob connects it with the root gidh, “to gather in troops.” Thus, then, “A troop” or “throng of plunderers shall throng upon him, but he shall throng upon their heel.” Setting upon the east of the Jordan he shall be exposed to many a sudden incursion of plunderers, but, though ever unready, he shall gather his forces and repel them, and follow with avenging energy upon their rear.

(20) Asher.—The territory of this tribe, extending along the coast from Mount Carmel to Lebanon, was very productive. Zebulun, the trading tribe, could reach the sea only through their possessions.

(21) Naphtali is a hind let loose: he giveth goodly words.

(22) Joseph is a fruitful bough, even a fruitful bough by a well; whose branches run over the wall; (23) the archers have sorely grieved him, and shot at him, and hated him: (24) but his bow abode in strength, and the arms of his hands were made strong by the hands of the mighty God of Jacob; (from thence is"

(22-26) Joseph.—The blessing of Joseph is, in many particulars, the most remarkable of them all. Jacob throughout it seems struggling with himself, and anxious to bestow more than was in his power. Joseph was his dearest son, the child of his chief and most beloved wife; he was, too, the saviour of Israel’s family, and the actual ruler of Egypt; and his father had even bestowed upon him the portion of the first-born in giving him two tribes, and to the rest but one. Nevertheless, he cannot bestow upon him the sovereignty. In clear terms he had described Judah as the lion, whose lordly strength should give Israel victory and dominion, and the sceptre must remain his until He whose right it is to rule should come. And thus Jacob magnifies again and again, but in obscure terms, his blessing upon Joseph, which, when analyzed, amounts simply to excessive fruitfulness, with no Messianic or spiritual prefiguration. Beginning with this, Jacob next dwells upon Joseph’s trials, and upon the manliness with which he had borne and overcome them; and then magnifies the blessedness of the earthly lot of his race, won for them by the personal worth of Joseph, with a description of which Jacob ends his words.

(22) A fruitful bough.—Literally the words are, “Son of a fruitful tree is Joseph; son of a fruitful tree by a fountain: the daughters spread over the wall.” That is, Joseph is like a fruitful tree planted near a fountain of living water, and of which the branches, or suckers, springing from it overtop the wall built round the spring for its protection. This fruitfulness of Joseph was shown by the vast number of his descendants.

(23) The archers.—Naturally Jacob next describes the sorrows of Joseph’s youth, but in poetical terms, so as not to wound the feelings of his brethren, or rouse up thoughts of vengeance in Joseph’s own mind. Thus he compares him to a warrior, too mighty for his enemies to close with in open conflict, but whom they harass from a distance. “Hated him” would be better translated, laid snares for him, were guilty of treachery and deceit.

(24) His bow abode in strength.—The word for strength is highly poetical. It means that which goes on for ever, like the flowing streams or the eternal hills. In spite of all the machinations of his enemies, the bow of Joseph remained constant and enduring in its might.

W ere made strong.—The Hebrew word is difficult, but more probably means, were pliant, supple, such as the arms of an archer ought to be.

From thence is the shepherd, the stone of Israel.—The Jewish commentators understand “from the shepherd, the stone of Israel:)

(28) Even by the God of thy father, who shall help thee; and by the Almighty, who shall bless thee with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that lieth under, blessings of the breasts, and of the womb: (29) the blessings of thy father have prevailed above the blessings of my progenitors unto the utmost bound of the everlasting hills: they shall be on the head of Joseph, and on the crown of the head of him that was separate from his brethren.

(27) Benjamin shall ravin as a wolf: in the morning he shall devour the prey, and at night he shall divide the spoil.

(29) All these are the twelve tribes of Israel: and this is it that their father spake unto them, and blessed them; every one according to his blessing he blessed them. (29) And he charged them, and said unto them, I am to be gathered unto my people: *bury me with my fathers in the field of Ephron the Hittite, (30) in the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which is before Mamre, in the land of Canaan, which Abraham bought with the field of Ephron the Hittite for a possession of a buryingplace. (31) There they buried Abraham and Sarah his wife; there they buried Isaac and Rebekah his wife; and there I buried Leah. (32) The purchase of the field and of the cave that is therein was from the children of Heth.

(33) And when Jacob had made an end of commanding his sons, he gathered up his feet into the bed, and yielded up the ghost, and was gathered unto his people.

thence" of Joseph, who had become the ruler and protector of Israel. But "from thence" answers in the parallelism to "from the hands of." Fully it would be, from thence where dwells the Shepherd, &c., that is,—Joseph's triumph came from God, who is the Shepherd (or Ruler) and the Rock of Israel.

(23) Even by the God of thy father.—In the Hebrew this follows directly upon the preceding clause: "from the Shepherd, the Stone of Israel; from the God of thy father, who shall help thee; and from the Almighty, &c."

Blessings of heaven above are the rains and dew; those of "the deep" beneath are lakes, rivers, and springs; and those of "the breasts and womb" mean an abundant offspring both of men and cattle. (For the opposite case see Hosea ix. 14.)

(30) The blessings of thy father.—As the passage now stands, it means that the blessings which Jacob bestows upon Joseph are greater than those which he had himself received from his ancestors, Abraham and Isaac. This was scarcely the case, as the chief spiritual blessing was bestowed upon Judah, while for Joseph there was only earthly prosperity. For this reason most modern commentators adopt the reading of the Samaritan Targum and the LXX., "The blessings of thy father are mightier than the blessings of the ancient mountains, than the desire (or beauty) of the everlasting hills." Not only is the parallelism of the poetry thus preserved, but the rendering is easy and natural, while the other translation is full of difficulties, especially as to the words, "my progenitors," and "the utmost bound." The sense thus given to them cannot be obtained by any ordinary philological process.

Him that was separate from his brethren.

—This scarcely gives the force of the verb, which means, set apart, consecrated. Hence the Vulg. renders "Nazara," the Hebrew word being near. The Syriac and Samaritan Targum translate, "him that is the crown of his brethren;" and the LXX., "him who was the leader of his brethren." Many see in this an allusion to the sovereignty over the ten tribes being finally attained to by Ephraim, but probably the meaning is that Joseph was the noblest and highest in rank among Jacob's children.

(25) Benjamin.—With this description of their ancestor agrees the character of his race, which was the most spirited and warlike of all the tribes of Israel.

It would be interesting to compare the notices of the several tribes in the subsequent history with Jacob's blessing of his progenitors, and with that also given by Moses. The fathers, moreover, found in the words of the patriarch faint foreshadowings of the spiritual truths of Christianity. But such discussions exceed the limits of a commentary, and it has seemed best to give only the primary explanation of Jacob's words, in accordance, as far as possible, with the standpoint of the patriarch himself.

(28) These are the twelve tribes.—As we have seen in the case of Dan, Jacob had the further object of forming his descendants into twelve separate communities, which were, like the States in America, each to be independent, and have its own tribal government. From this position Levi naturally was excluded, when selected for the priesthood, and room was thus made for the bestowal of two of these communities upon the descendants of Joseph. Only in case of war they were to combine under the chieftainship of Judah.

In the Book of Judges, however, we find the tribes as separate in matters of war as of peace, and by the time of Saul the need of a closer union had been felt, and tribal independence had been found to lead only to anarchy.

(30) He gathered up his feet into the bed.—This seems to indicate that the events recorded in chaps. xlviii. and xlix. all took place at the same time. In chap. xlviii. 2 we read that Jacob strengthened himself for this great final effort, seating himself upon the bed and placing his feet upon the ground. (See verse 12.) And now that all was over, wearied with what must have sorely exercised both his feelings and his physical powers, he gathered himself together upon the bed, and probably soon afterwards peaceably passed away to his eternal rest.
CHAPTER L. — (1) And Joseph fell upon his father's face, and wept upon him, and kissed him. (2) And Joseph commanded his servants the physicians to embalm his father: and the physicians embalmed Israel. (3) And forty days were fulfilled for him; so are fulfilled the days of those which are embalmed: and the Egyptians mourned for him three score and ten days. (4) And when the days of his mourning were past, Joseph spake unto the house of Pharaoh, saying, If now I have found grace in your eyes, speak, I pray you, in the ears of Pharaoh, saying, (5) a My father made me swear, saying, Lo, I die: in my grave which I have digged for me in the land of Canaan, there shalt thou bury me. Now therefore let me go up, I pray thee, and bury my father, and I will come again. (6) And Pharaoh said, Go up, and bury thy father, according as he made thee swear.

(7) And Joseph went up to bury his father: and with him went up all the servants of Pharaoh, the elders of his house, and all the elders of the land of Egypt, (8) and all the house of Joseph, and his brethren, and his father's house: only their little ones, and their flocks, and their herds, they left in the land of Goshen. (9) And there went up with him both chariots and horsemen: and it was a very great company. (10) And they came to the threshing-floor of Atad, which is beyond Jordan, and there they mourned with a great and very sore lamentation: and he made a mourning

(1) Joseph spake unto the house of Pharaoh. — It may seem at first sight strange that Joseph should make his request through mediators, but probably no one in the attire of mourning might enter the royal presence. (Comp. Esth. iv. 2.) The dress of a mourner was squalid, his beard unshorn, his hair in disorder, and while these outward signs of grief were maintained, he was also expected to confine himself to his own house.

(9) A very great company. — Heb., comp., the word following immediately upon the mention of the chariots and horsemen which went as the escort of the elders. These were the chief officers of Pharaoh's household, and also of the districts into which Egypt was divided, of which each had its separate governor. Of the Israhelites only the men of rank, Jacob's own sons, and the officers of his house took part in the funeral procession, while their little ones—Heb., their "lips," translated here in the LXX. their clans, and signifying the great body of their dependents—remained with their cattle in the land of Goshen.

(10) Threshing floor of Atad. — Atad means "a thorn-bush," the rhamna palurus of Linnaeus, translated "bramble" in Judges i. 14. As agriculture was only beginning to be practised in Canaan, this threshing-floor would be common property, situated in some place easy of access, and probably a village would grow up near it.

Beyond Jordan. — It is disputed whether this means on the east or on the west of the Jordan. It is certain that the route taken by Joseph lay to the east of the Dead Sea; for Goren-Atad is placed by Jerome at Beth-Hoglah, which lay between the Jordan and Jericho, and Joseph could have gone thither only by travelling through the territories of Moab and Ammon. This may seem a long detour, but, as may be seen in the Excursus on the Expedition of Chedorlaomer, the route through the wilderness of Judah was very difficult; and though the western shore of the Dead Sea was practicable as far as Engedi, it was necessary there to ascend a mountain-path so steep that a few Amorites might have guarded it against any number of invaders; and probably it was absolutely impracticable for chariots. It would have been easy, however, to reach Hebron through the Philistine country; but it is re. for his father seven days. (11) And when the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, saw the mourning in the floor of Atad, they said, This is a grievous mourning to the Egyptians: wherefore the name of it was called Abel-mizraim, which is beyond Jordan. (12) And his sons did unto him according as he commanded them: (13) for "his sons carried him into the land of Canaan, and buried him in the cave of the field of Machpelah, which Abraham bought with the field for a possession of a buryingplace of Ephron the Hittite, before Mamre. (14) And Joseph returned into Egypt, he, and his brethren, and all that went up with him to bury his father, after he had buried his father. (15) And when Joseph's brethren saw that their father was dead, they said, Joseph will peradventure hate us, and will certainly requite us all the evil which we did unto him. (16) And they sent a messenger unto Joseph, saying, Thy father did command before he died, saying, (17) So shall ye say unto Joseph, Forgive, I pray thee now, the trespass of thy brethren, and their sin; for they did unto thee evil: and now, we pray thee, forgive the trespass of the servants of the God of thy father. And Joseph wept when they spake unto him. (18) And his brethren also went and fell down before his face; and they said, Behold, we be thy servants. (19) And Joseph said unto them, Fear not: for am I in the place of God? (20) But as for you, ye thought evil against me; but God meant it unto good, to bring to pass, as it is this day, to save much people alive. (21) Now therefore fear ye not: I will nourish you, and your little ones. And he comforted them, and spake kindly unto them. (22) And Joseph dwelt in Egypt, he, and his father's house: and Joseph lived an hundred and ten years. (23) And Joseph saw Ephraim's children of the markable that we find hostilities going on between the descendants of Joseph and the Philistines (1 Chron. vii. 21); and if wars were of common occurrence between the Semitic clans in Goshen and the Philistines, Joseph would not expose his father's remains to the danger of an attack. Possibly they may even have refused their consent, and hence the attack upon them by Ephraim's sons. On the other hand, the sons of Esau would show great respect to the body of their uncle.—(Jewish tradition makes even the sons of Ishmael and of Keturah take part in the mourning)—and moreover they had not yet attained to any great power; and we gather from Esau's march through the lands on the west of the Dead Sea (chap. xxxii. 6) that the natives there were too few and feeble to resist the chariots and horsemen which formed the escort. While therefore "beyond Jordan" would naturally mean "on the east of Jordan," it may here express the fact that Joseph had just crossed the Jordan when the lamentation was made. The only other tenable explanation is that Goren-Atad was really on the eastern bank of the Jordan, and that though Beth-Hoglah was the nearest village, the two were not identical. It would be natural to make the solemn seven days' mourning, either when just about to enter the Canaanite territory or at the tomb. (11) Abel-mizraim. — There is here an example of that play upon words that is always dear to Orientals. The word for "mourning" is ibel, while abel means a meadow, and is often found prefixed to the names of towns. When the Versions were made no vowel points were as yet affixed to the Hebrew consonants, and they all read Ebel-mizraim, the mourning of Egypt. The Hebrew text alone, as at present pointed, has Abel-mizraim, the meadow of Egypt. (12) Joseph will peradventure. — Heb., What if Joseph should hate us, &c. They had not seen any change in his treatment of him, but if it were the case third generation: the children also of Machir the son of Manasseh were brought up upon Joseph's knees.

(24) And Joseph said unto his brethren, I die: and God will surely visit you, and bring you out of this land unto the land which he sware to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. (25) And Joseph took an oath of the children of Israel, saying, God will surely visit you, and ye shall carry up my bones from hence. (26) So Joseph died, being an hundred and ten years old: and they embalmed him, and he was put in a coffin in Egypt.

(24) God will . . . bring you out of this land. —This is, first, a proof of Joseph's faith, commended in Heb. xi. 22; and, secondly, it is a preparation for the next book (Exodus). Joseph's faith thus unites the two books together.

(26) A coffin. —The word means a case or chest of wood. The mummy-cases were generally of sycamore-wood. As it would not be possible for the Israelites, now that their great protector was no more, to go with a military escort to Hebron to bury him, Joseph orders that his embalmed body should be placed in some part of Goshen, whence it would be easy to remove it when the time of deliverance had arrived. And his wish was fulfilled; for "Moses took the bones of Joseph with him" (Exod. xiii. 19), and Joshua buried them in Shechem, in the piece of ground which Jacob had given to him (Josh. xxiv. 32).
EXCURSUS ON NOTES TO GENESIS.

EXCURSUS A: UPON THE PROBATION OF ADAM (Chap. ii. 16).

The great object for which the world is constituted such as we actually find it to be is evidently the trial and probation of man’s moral nature. We cannot wonder, therefore, at finding Adam subject to a probation; and even if he had remained innocent we have no right to suppose that his posterity would always have withstood temptation, or that the world would not finally have become such in the main as it is now. But the manner of Adam’s probation was different. In Paradise he had unlimited freedom, except in one small particular, and no promptings of his own nature urged him to take delight in disobedience and sin. But if thus he was free from passion, on the other hand his conscience was undeveloped, even if it could be said to exist at all in one who did not know the difference between good and evil. He was devoid, too, of experience, and his reason must have been in a state as rudimentary as his conscience. For as there was no struggle between passion and conscience, man had not then learned to choose between opposing ends and purposes, as he has now. Nevertheless, Adam was an intellectual being. He must have had a deep knowledge of natural history; for doubtless he called the animals after their natures. In verse 23 he calls his wife Ishah, and himself Ish. Now, this name signifies a being, and in so calling himself Adam seems to claim for man that he is the one creature upon earth conscious of his own existence. And when Eve appears he simply adds a feminine termination to the name, recognising her thereby as the female counterpart of himself; but in so doing he shows a mastery of language, and the power of inflicting words according to the rules of grammar. There is proof, also, in the fall of even increased insight into the nature of things; for in the name Eve, life, Adam plainly recognised in his difference of sex the Divinely-appointed means for the maintenance of human life upon earth. But man now, to balance the corruption of his nature, has, in addition to intellect, the help of conscience, of increased knowledge and experience of the effects of sin, and of largely-developed reason. Devoid of such assistance, a difficult probation, such as is the lot of mankind now, would apparently have been beyond the power of Adam to sustain; whereas, had he not been tempted from without, he might easily, with his passions as yet unstirred, and most of his intellectual gifts still dormant, have endured the simple trial to which he was subjected. But temptation from without was permitted, and Adam fell.

It would be easy to lose ourselves in reasoning upon the possibilities involved in Adam’s trial; but there are points upon which there can be no doubt. First, if probation is the normal law of our condition now, it would be just as right and equitable to make Adam subject to a probation. And alike for Adam then and for men now, probation seems to be a necessary condition of the existence of beings endowed with free will. Secondly, the fall was not all loss; St. Paul affirms this with reference to the gift of a Saviour (Rom. v. 17—19). And besides this, higher qualities are called into existence now than were possible in the case of one who had no experimental knowledge of evil. We may even say that in giving this command Jehovah was appealing to qualities still dormant in Adam; and this exercise of the Divine attribute of foreknowledge makes us sure that the Divine purpose was to develop these qualities: not necessarily, however, by the fall, for they would have been to some extent exercised by resisting temptation. Thirdly, Adam, had he remained innocent, could nevertheless have attained to no higher happiness than such as was possible for a being in a rudimentary and passionless state of existence. He would have attained to the perfection of innocence, of pure physical enjoyment, and of even large scientific knowledge; but his moral nature would have developed very slowly, and its profounder depths would have remained un stirred. He would have been a happy grown-up child, not a proved and perfected man. The sufferings of this fallen world are intense (Rom. viii. 22), but the product in those who use their probation aright, is probably higher than any product of Paradise could have been. The holiness attained to by Enoch, the seventh from Adam, was of a different and higher kind than the most perfect innocence of a being who had been called to make no earnest struggle; for it was as the gold tried in the fire (1 Pet. i. 7).

EXCURSUS B: ON THE NAMES ELOHIM AND JEHOVAH-ELOHIM.

Throughout the first account of creation (Gen. i. 1—ii. 3) the Deity is simply called Elohim. This word is strictly a plural of Eloh, which is used as the name of God only in poetry, or in late books like those of Nehemiah and Daniel. It is there an Aramaism, God in Syriac being Alho, in Chaldee Eloh, and in Arabic Allahu—all of which are merely dialectic varieties of the Hebrew Eloah, and are used constantly in the singular number. In poetry Eloah is sometimes employed with great emphasis, as, for instance, in Ps. xlviii. 31: "Who is Eloah except Jehovah?" But while thus the sister dialects used the singular both in poetry and prose, the Hebrews used the plural Elohim as the ordinary name of God, the difference being that to the one God was simply power, strength (the root-meaning of Eloah); to the other He was the union of all powers, the Almighty. The plural thus intensified the idea of the majesty and greatness of God; but besides this, it was the germ of the doctrine of a plurality of persons in the Divine unity.

In the second narrative (chaps. ii. 4—iii. 24), which is an account of the fall of man, with only such intro duetory matter regarding creation as was necessary for making the history complete, the Deity is styled Jehovah-Elohim. The spelling of the word Jehovah is debatable, as only the consonants (J, h, v, h) are certain, the vowels being those of the word Adonai (Lord) substituted for it by the Jews when reading it in the synagogue, the first vowel being a mere apology for a sound, and pronounced a or o, according to the nature of the consonant to which it is attached. It is generally represented now by a light breathing, thus—Y'holah, 'donai. As regards the spelling, Ewald, Gesenius, and others argue for Yahveh; Furst for Yehuveh, or Yehovah; and Stier, Meyer, &c., for Jehovah. The former has the analogy of several other proper names in its favour; the second the authority of Exod. iii. 14; the last, those numerous names like Y-hoshaphat, where the word is written Yeho. At the end of proper names the form it takes is Yahu, whence also Yah. We ought also to notice that the first consonant is really y; but two or three centuries ago j seems to have had the sound which we give to y now, as is still the case in German.

But this is not a matter of mere pronunciation; there is a difference of meaning as well. "Yahveh signifies "He who shall be, or shall become," "what Jehovah may signify I do not know. We must further notice that the name is undoubtedly earlier than the time of Moses. At the date of the Exodus the v of the verb had been changed into y. Thus, in Exod. iii. 14, the name of God is Elie', "I shall become," not Elveh. Had the name, therefore, come into existence in the days of Moses, it would have been Yahreh, Yehveh, or Yehovah, not Yahveh, &c.

The next fact is that the union of these two names—Jehovah-Elohim—is very unusual. In this short narrative it occurs twenty times, in the rest of the Pentateuch only once (Exod. ix. 30); in the whole remainder of the Bible about nine times. Once, moreover, in Ps. i. 1, there is the reversed form, Elohim-Jehovah. There must, therefore, be some reason why in this narrative this peculiar junction of the two names is so prominently coming.

The usual answer is that in this section God appears in covenant with man, whereas in chap. i.—iii. 3 He was the Creator, the God of nature and not of grace, having, indeed, a closer relation to man, as being the most perfect of His creatures (chap. i. 26), but a relation different only in degree and not in kind. This is true, but insufficient; nor does it explain how Jehovah became the covenant name of God, and Elohim His generic title. Whatever be the right answer, we must expect to find it in the narrative itself. The facts are so remarkable, and the connection of the name Jehovah with this section so intimate, that if Holy Scripture is to command the assent of our reason we must expect to find the explanation of such peculiarities in the section wherein they occur.

What, then, do we find? We find this. The first section gives us the history of man's formation, with the solemn verdict that he was very good. Nature without man was simply good; with man, creation had reached its goal. In this, the succeeding section, man ceases to be very good. He is represented in it as the object of His Maker's special care, and, above all, as one put under law. Inferior creatures work by instinct, that is, purposely brings into operation, and in subjection to rules and forces which control them. Man, as a free agent, attains a higher rank. He is put under law, with the power of obeying or disobeying it. God, who is the infinitely high and self-contained, works also by law, but it comes from within, from the perfections of His own nature, and not from without, as must be the case with an imperfect being like man, whose duty is to strive after that which is better and more perfect. Add that, even in the first section, man was described as created "in God's image, after His likeness." But as the image is essentially created in it, God would be the author of confusion—so is it to man's. But as this likeness is a gift conferred upon him, and not inherent, the law must come with the gift, from outside, and not from himself; and it can come only from God. Thus, then, man was necessarily, by the terms of his creation, made subject to law, and without it there could have been no progress upward. But he broke the law, and fell. Was he, then, to remain for ever a fallen being, hiding himself away from His Maker, and with the bonds of duty and love, which creweened bound him to His Creator, broken irremediably? No. God is love; and the purpose of this narrative is not so much to give us the history of man's fall as to show that a means of restoration had been appointed. Scarcely has the breach been made before One steps in to fill it. The breach had been made by a single act on his part, but the first parents in the simplicity of their innocence; but in the very hour of their condemnation they are promised an avenger, who, after a struggle, shall crush the head of their enemy (chap. iii. 15).

Now this name, Y-h-v-h, in its simplest form Yehveh, means "He shall be," or "shall become." With the substitution of y for v, according to a change which had taken place generally in the Hebrew language, this is the actual spelling which we find in Exod. iii. 14; namely, Elie', "Jehovah," "I shall be that I shall be." Now, in the New Testament we find that the received name for the Messiah was "the coming One" (Matt. xxii. 9, xxiii. 39; Mark xi. 9; Luke vii. 19, 20, xii. 35, 39; John i. 15, 27, iii. 31, vi. 14, xi. 27, xii. 13; Acts xix. 4; Heb. x. 37); and in the Revelation of St. John the name of the Triune God is, "He who is and who was, and the coming One" (chaps. i. 4, 18, xlvii. 17). But St. Paul tells us of the notable change in the language of the early Christians. Their solemn formula was Maranatha, "Our Lord is come" (1 Cor. xvi. 22). The Deliverer was no longer future, no longer "He who shall become," nor "He who shall be what He shall be." It is not now an indefinite hope: no longer the sighing of the creature waiting for the manifestation of Him who shall crush the head of his enmity. The faint ray of light which dwained in Gen. iii. 15 has become the risen Sun of Righteousness; the Jehovah of the Old Testament has become the Jesus of the New, of whom the Church joyfully explains. "We praise Thee as God: we acknowledge Thee to be Jehovah."

But whence arose this name Jehovah? Distinctly from the words of Eve, so miserably disappointed in their primary application: "I have gotten me a man, Jehovah," or Yehveh (chap. i. 25). She, as a fallen creature, did not know the meaning of the words she uttered, but she had believed the promise, and for her faith's sake the spirit of prophecy rested upon her, and she gave him on whom her hopes were fixed the title which was to grow and swell onward till all inspired truth gathered round it and into it; and at length Elohim, the Almighty, set it to His son, and bequeathing "I shall be that I shall be" (Exod. iii. 14). Eve's word is simply the third person of the verb of which Elie', which is the first, and the correct translation of her speech is, "I have gotten a man, even he that shall EXCURSUS C: ON THE DURATION OF THE PARADISICAL STATE OF INNOCENCE.

The Bereshit Rabba argues that Adam and Eve remained in their original state of innocence for six hours only. Others have supposed that the events recorded in chaps. ii. 4—iii. 24 took place in the course of twenty-four hours, and suppose that this is proved by what is said in chap. ii. 4, that the earth and heavens, with Adam and the garden, were all made in one day, before the end of which they suppose he fell. This view, like that which in chap. i. interprets each creative day of a similar period, really amounts to this: that the narrative of Holy Scripture is to be forced to bend to an arbitrary meaning put upon a single word, and drawn not from its meaning in Hebrew, but from its ordinary use in English. More correctly, we might venture to say that the use of the word "day" in chap. ii. 4 was to Divine warning against so wilful a method of exposition.

Read intelligently, the progress of time is carefully marked. In verse 6 the earth is watered by a mist: in paradise there are mighty rivers. Now, mist would not produce rivers; and if there were mist in the morning, and rain in the afternoon, a long period of time would still be necessary before the falling rains would form for themselves definite channels. A vast space must have elapsed between the mist period and that in which the Tigris and Euphrates rolled along their mighty floods.

And with this the narrative agrees. All is slow and gradual. God does not summon the Garden of Eden into existence by a sudden command, but He "planted it," and "out of the ground He made to grow" such trees as were most remarkable for beauty, and whose fruit was most suitable for human food. In some favoured spot, in soil fertile and fit for their development, God, by a special providence, caused such plants to germinate as would best supply the needs of a creature so feeble as man, until, by the aid of his reason, he has invented those aids and helps which the animals possess in their own bodily organisation. The creation of full-grown trees belongs to the region of magic. A book which gravely recorded such an act would justly be relegated to the Apocrypha; for the God of revelation works by law, and with such long ages of preparation that human eagerness is often tempted to cry, "How long?" and to pray that God would hasten His work.

And next, as regards Adam. Placed in a garden, two of the rivers of which—the Tigris and the Euphrates—seem to show that the earth at his creation had already settled down into nearly its present shape, he is commanded "to dress and keep it." The inspired narrator would scarcely have spoken in this way if Adam's continuance in the garden had been but a few hours or days. We find him living there so long that his solitude became wearisome to him, and the Creator at length affirms that it is not good for him to be alone. Meanwhile, Adam is himself searching for a partner, and in the hope of finding one, he studies all the animals around him, observes their ways, gives them names, discovers many valuable qualities in them, makes several of them useful to him, but still finds none among them that answers to his wants. But when we read that "Adam gave names to all cattle, and to the fowls of the air, and to every beast of the field," we cannot but see that this careful study of the creatures round him must have continued through a long period before it could have resulted in their being thus generally classified and named in Adam's mind. At length Eve is brought, and his words express the lively pleasure of one who, after repeated disappointments, had at length found that of which he was in search. "This," he says, "this time is bone of my bone."

How long Adam and Eve enjoyed their simple happiness after their marriage is left untold; but this naming of the animals at least suggests that some time elapsed before the fall. Though Adam had observed their habits, yet he would scarcely have given many of them names before he had a rational companion with whom to hold discourse. For some, indeed, he would have found names when trying to call them to him, but only for such as seemed fit for domestication. The rest he would pass by till there was some one to whom to describe them. Thus Eve seems to have known something of the sagacity of the serpent. She, too, as well as Adam, recognised the voice of Jehovah walking in the garden (ch. iii. 8); and the girdles spoken of in verse 7 seem also to indicate, by their elaboration, that the guilty pair remained in Paradise some time after the fall. The indications of time are, however, less numerous and definite after the creation of Eve than before; but certainly Adam was for some considerable period a denizen of Paradise, and probably there was a longer time than is generally supposed spent in innocence by him and his wife, and also some delay between the fall and their expulsion from their happy home.

EXCURSUS D. ON THE BOOKS OF GENERATIONS.

The most cursory reader must be struck by the manner in which this phrase frequently occurs in the Book of Genesis, and never again till the beginning of St. Matthew’s Gospel. After the magnificent and Divine opening of chaps. 1.—ii. 3, the rest of the book is a series of “generations” in each of which are peculiarities of diction and style, but also plain marks of a master-hand, which has moulded them into a continuous narrative. These generations, or toldoth, are ten in number, namely:

Chap. vi. 1—xv, 32, the toldoth of heaven and earth.

-— vi. 1—vii. 8, Adam.
-— vii. 9—xii. 9, Noah.
-— xii. 10—xiii. 2, the sons of Noah.
-— xiii. 10—xv. 26, Shem.
-— xvi. 1—xvii. 27, Terah.
-— xvii. 12—xix. 18, Ishmael.
-— xvii. 19—xxiv. 23, Isaac.
-— xxvi. 1—xxxvi. 12, Jacob.

Now, first, modern discoveries have shown that there is no difficulty, as some have supposed, in believing that the patriarchs could read and write. Ur of the Chaldees, whence Terah emigrated, proved to have been a famous seat of learning, and Mr. Sayce (Chald. Gen., p. 24) says that the earliest inscriptions of any importance which we now possess belong to the time of a king of Ur, supposed to have lived three thousand years before the Christian era. These inscriptions, he adds, consist of texts on bricks and on signet cylinders, and some of these latter may be, he thinks, of even greater antiquity. Even the daily transactions of business were in Abram’s time perpetuated with the utmost punctuality and decorum by means of those contracts, and sale, and even loan tablets of terra cotta which are still existing; and it is now known that in Chaldea among the Accadians, as in Egypt, papyrus was used as a writing material as well as clay, and more rarely, stone (Tonikins, Studies on the Times of Abraham, p. 43). So far from losing, the Book of Genesis gains infinitely in value and importance, if not on its divine, yet on its human side, if we find reason for believing that we may have in it the contents of bricks and cylinders carried by Abraham from Ur to Haran first, and thence to Canaan.

Next, the only reverent way of interpreting Holy Scripture is, not to make it bend to human theories, but to make every verse bend to what it says of itself. Here, then, it represents the Book of Genesis as composed out of documents already existing. We have no right to assume that these documents were less inspired because pre-Mosaic. Enoch, Noah, Abraham are all represented as men very near unto God. Others, such as Shem, Jacob, Joseph, were scarcely less so; and there are peculiarities in the toldoth of Jacob which suggested that a narrative written by Joseph was at least the basis of that historical portion of Genesis. Now the work of one inspired pen, surely it would have proceeded onward with steady purpose, and, as is the invariable rule of Holy Scripture, the writer would have preserved his own style and individuality throughout. As it is, the narrative which begins at chap. ii. 4 is as diverse from the history of creation as it could possibly be; and apparently that history (chap. i. 1—ii. 3), which is not a toldoth, was given in order to guard against the errors which might easily have arisen from misunderstanding the account given in the second narrative. Now, the history of creation must have been directly inspired. We cannot, indeed, tell how the knowledge it contains was communicated, whether by a series of visions in a trance or by ideas impressed upon the writer’s mind; but obviously it was intended to represent creation as developed in an orderly progression by the promulgation of Divine laws, following at successive intervals, one upon another, and culminating in the Sabbath of Elohim. In the second narrative creation is but a secondary subject, and is described simply in contrast with the Garden of Eden.

But the author of the Book of Genesis—and we know of no one whose claims stand on such strong grounds as those of Moses—also shows his individuality, and arranges his materials on a settled plan. Divinely inspired, as we believe, he would nevertheless make no unnecessary change or alteration in the documents before him; may, he does not even care for verbal accuracy (witness chap. xxxviii. 9, compared with chap. xxxvi. 3). In the Chaldean Genesis we have a document far older than the time of Moses: and in the account of the flood, in the sending out of the raven and dove from the ark, in the sacrifice offered by Noah, and the choice of the rainbow as a sign of reconciliation, there is much that is common to the inspired and uninspired narratives. But the perusal and comparison of the two is most instructive, and leaves the mind impressed with the infinite superiority of the Bible narrative.

The writer’s plan was this. After giving an account of creation, in which man appears as God’s master work, and then of the Paradise, in which man is shown to be the especial object of Jehovah’s love, henceforward his one purpose is man’s restoration, and the selection successively of Seth, Shem, Abraham, and Jacob as the persons through whom the promise of a Deliverer was to be fulfilled. He does not actually exclude all such portions of the patriarchal records as had no direct bearing upon his subject, but after a passing notice omits the mention of them for the future. Thus in the second narrative he gives the temptation, the fall, its outcome in Cain’s sin, and then a brief history of Cain’s family, with particulars of their advance in the arts of civilisation, in refinement, in luxury, and pride; and then he drops them for ever. We know nothing more about the Cainites, but henceforward the narrative is occupied with Seth and his posterity.
GENESIS.

The same rule is followed again and again; and thus, while the Book of Genesis is full of most interesting information about the ancient world, we nevertheless feel that its one main purpose was to show that the redemption of mankind by the bestowal of a Saviour was no after-thought, but the very starting point of God's revealed message of love to His fallen creatures.

EXCURSUS II: UPON ELAM AND THE CONQUESTS AND ROUTE OF CHEDORLAOMER (Chap. xiv.).

Of Elam we lately knew nothing more than that it was a country called after a son of Shem, and this narrative, containing an account of a conquest of Canaan by Elamites, was a puzzle to thoughtful Biblical readers, and a mark for the decision of such critics as imagine that everything of which a clear explanation cannot be given must necessarily be unhistorical. Within the last few years our knowledge has so grown that the narrative fits exactly into its place, although neither the name of Chedorlaomer nor the history itself has been found in the cuneiform texts.

The country of Elam itself is a vast highland on the eastern side of the Tigris, with broad plains lying between mountains which sometimes attain an elevation of eight or ten thousand feet. It is easily defensible, rich, and well watered, and its inhabitants were dreaded neighbours of the Babylonians, upon whose fertile plains they constantly poured down in sudden inroads, and returned to their hills laden with booty. It was from Elam that the Accadians descended and conquered Babylonia, and we thus gather that its earlier inhabitants were Turanians, sprung from Japheth. The names of the towns in that part of the country of which Susa is the capital still bear witness to the supremacy there of this race, while the names of the rest of the Elamite towns are said by M. Oppert (Records of the Past, i. 5) to be Semitic. Elamite Semites appear also among the Assyrian sculptures, where "their keen and refined features are set off to great advantage by the blunt outline and thick protruding lips, which have been identified with the Kissians, or Cossceans, of classic authors, the Kasiti of the monuments, the sons of Cush of the Bible" (Rawlinson's Anc. Mon., ii. 500). Thus in Elam, as on the Tigris and Euphrates, we find the families of the three sons of Noah distinct in language and race, and dwelling near one another, and coming in successive waves of population to struggle for the possession of the land.

The first great event recorded concerning Elam is found in the Annals of Assur-bani-pal, son of Esarraden, king of Assyria. He asserts that he conquered Elam, and took the city of Susa in B.C. 645, and that he then brought back an image of Nana which Kudur Nahhatu had carried away from Babylonia 1,635 years before; that is, in B.C. 2250. As Nana and Nahhatu seem to be names of the same goddess, while Kudur means "servant," we thus find this Elamite king calling himself, perhaps from this exploit, "the servant of Nahhatu."" La'mar, or Lagomar, is the name of another Elamite god, and thus Chedorlaomer means "servant of Lagomar."

Nearer to the time of Abram we find an Elamite king named Kudur-Mabuk, who claims the title of addu Marta, that is, lord of Phoenicia, showing that he too, like Chedorlaomer, had conquered Syria. His son was named Eriaku, and being associated with his father in the government, received Larsa as his capital. The names Eriaku and Larsa are the same as those of Arioch and of Elassar, and this further suggests the idea that Kudur-lagomar and Kudur-Mabuk may have been the same person. Canon Rawlinson gives the probable date of Kudur-Mabuk's reign as about B.C. 2100, Mr. Sayce about a century later, and M. Lenormant somewhere about the epoch of Abraham (Temkin's Studies, p. 159).

Now the Elamite king, fourteen years before, had subdued the Jordan valley (verse 5), and as this second expedition was prior to Abram's taking Hagar to wife, which happened in the tenth year after his migration to Palestine (see chap. xvi. 3), it follows that Abram and Terah were still at Kharran when Chedorlaomer passed through it, as he must have done, on his march. Himself a Turanian, he would look with ill-will on powerful Semitic chiefs such as were Abraham and Lot, and his visit may have had something to do in urging them on their further route as soon as Terah's death set them free. We see also that, besides the caravan road, there was a war track to Canaan, and thus, with troubles from Elamite invasions at home to urge him on, Abram was not following the great current of population in going to Palestine first, and thence onward to Egypt. So many took this route and remained in Egypt that, under the name of the Hyksos, they took possession first of the Delta, and then of Egypt generally. And in this stream of human migration there was one whose going and purpose was Divine.

For twelve years Chedorlaomer's tribute was regularly paid, but in the thirteenth year the five kings who possessed the wealthiest portion of the Jordan valley rebelled. A twelvemonth is spent in gathering Elam's forces; but in the next spring, attended by three subject monarchs, the king starts on his march to punish the revolters. On his arrival at Damascus, probably by the same route which Abram had followed, we find him taking a wide circuit, so as to sweep the whole country and fall upon the rebels last, and from the side where they least expected an attack. For, moving southwards through Bashan, he smites the Rephaim and other tribes along the plateau on the east of Jordan, until he reaches the wild mountains inhabited by the cave-dwelling Herites, and which extend from the Dead Sea to the gulf of Akaba. The most southerly spot reached by him was El-Paran, the oak-forest of Paran, situated on the edge of the great desert of El-Th. Turning hence to the north and north-west, he smites on his way the Amalekites, whose wandering tribes occupied this vast desert, and thus reaches the Dead Sea, along the western shore of which he marches till he reaches Hazazon-Tamar, better known as En-gedi. This ravine is, as Dr. Tristram has shown, of the utmost strategical importance. For it is easy to march along the shore of the lake as far as this point, while inland the route lies across a rough and almost waterless wilderness. But north of En-gedi the shore-line is impracticable even for footmen. We gather that the Amorites held the pass, but were not reinforced by their countrymen, and probably were surprised—for a handful of men could defend the zigzag path which mounts up the side of the precipice to a height of 1,800 feet. At the head of this ravine Chedorlaomer was less than twenty miles distant from Abram at Maure, but with a difficult country between; and, moreover, his object was to smite and plunder the rich cities of the plain. As he had now traversed two-thirds of the length of the Dead Sea, it again becomes manifest that Sodom and the other cities were at its northern end. In the vale of Siddim the battle is fought, and the five kings, entangled among the bitumen pits, are defeated with so great slaughter that a remnant only escapes. Fleeing, not to the mountains of Moab, as commentators assume, but to those of Judea, they carry the news to Abram, telling him that, with other captives, Lot and his goods are carried away. He draws out at once 318 men, all trained to arms, and all born in his house, and therefore of sure fidelity, as those bought or lately acquired would not be, and, reinforced by bodies of Amorites under EXCURSUS F: ON THE Angel, [HEB., "MESSERER OF JEHOVAH"] (Chap. xvi).
GENESIS.

In these and any similar cases the utmost that we can venture to affirm is that they had seen God representatively by the appearance to them of His angel; by whom also "Jehovah spake to Hagar." Upon this latter point there is a valuable note of Bar-Hebraeus in his Scholia on Acts vii. 30, "He that was visible was an angel: He that spake was God." Nor is there any difficulty in the fact that in verse 10 the angel says to Hagar, "I will multiply thy seed." For it is the rule in Holy Scripture to ascribe to the agent the deeds which he executes by God's commission. Thus Ezekiel speaks of himself destroying Jerusalem (Ezek. xiii. 3), the sense being that rightly put in our margin—that "he prophesied that the city should be destroyed." Sent by Jehovah to execute His will, angel and prophet alike are described as themselves the doers of the task assigned to them. This rule should be remembered in the exposition of chap. xix., where the two angels speak of themselves as destroying Sodom.

In the case, however, of the "three men who stood by" Abraham at Maure, there is a very close identification of one of the angels with Jehovah. In the first verse we read that Jehovah appeared unto Abraham." This might well be by the mission of the angel, but after a golden change to the singular number in verse 10, the speaker is both henceforth called Jehovah, and speaks as not only himself the doer and judge, but as if rested with him to save or destroy at his own will. There is also a marked distinction between him and the two angels who visit Lot, and who describe themselves as sent by Jehovah (chap. xix. 15), though even here, in verses 17-22, there is an approximation to a higher personification. In the case of the angel who visits Gideon there is again an apparent identification between him and Jehovah (Judges vi. 14, 16-23); nevertheless, Gideon still calls him an angel of Jehovah in verse 22, and he is called an angel of Elohim in verse 20.

In this case, and in that of the angel who appeared to Manoah, they refuse to partake of food, whereas the angels who were little prepared to Abraham at the site of the food prepared for them. They are also called men, and behave in a very human manner, whereas the angels who appeared to Gideon and Manoah both display supernatural powers, and "do wondrously." Nevertheless, nowhere else is there so close an identification between the angel and Jehovah as in this appearance at Maure, and in the history of the intercession for Sodom both the angel and Abraham speak as if Jehovah was there present in person.

In the case of the revelation to Abraham after the sacrifice of Isaac, the "angel of Jehovah" calls to him from heaven, and we have no account of any appearance in human form.

If, however, we turn to other passages of Holy Scripture the explanation seems plain. In the passage of God's ancient people through the wilderness, an angel was especially entrusted with their guidance and protection. He is called "the angel of Elohim," and his symbol was the pillar of fire and of the cloud (Exod. xiv. 19). Once, however, he appears in human form to Joshua, and claims the office of captain of Jehovah's host (Josh. v. 13—15). In the full description of him in Exod. xxxii. 20—25, we read in verse 21 "my Name is in him." Now this angel is called in Isa. lxxxiii. 9 "the angel of God's presence," literally, of His Face; and in this there is an evident allusion to Exod. xxxiii. 14, 15, where Moses says, "If Thy Face go not, carry us not up hence;" and Jehovah says, "My Face shall go, that I may give thee rest." It seems, therefore, that under the Old Covenant, while generally it was created angels who were the medium of communication between God and man, yet that there was one kind of manifestation of Deity so high as that God's Name was in him, and God's Face shown by him. As all revelation was by God the Son (John i. 18) we may fearlessly connect this angel with our blessed Lord, called "the angel of the covenant" in Mal. iii. 1; but it would be rash and presumptuous to attempt to define the exact nature of these appearances.

The union of matter and spirit in any way is beyond our powers of understanding; how much more when that Spirit is God! But this we may reverently say, that these personal manifestations were an anticipation in the Old Testament of that which is the cardinal doctrine in the New, that God is present in the daily life of man, and appeared in fashion as a man. The saints of old knew of their Redeemer at first only as "the woman's seed:" they learned next to unite the thought of Him with the name Jehovah; and, finally, they knew that Jehovah was also God. So was the broad foundation laid for the prophetic teaching that He was Emmanuel, in one person God and Man; and for the feeling so necessary for all true personal piety that God vouchsafes His presence on earth. He who now walks in the midst of the golden candlesticks (Rev. i. 13) from time to time manifested His Face visibly to the saints of the Church of old. And not only was the father of the faithful thus visited, but even a runaway handmaid was neither disregarded, nor deemed unworthy of heavenly care. We might lose ourselves in profitless speculations as to the manner of events so mysterious, but the practical lesson is plain, that though "the heaven and the heaven of heavens cannot contain God, yet He deigns to dwell upon earth" (1 Kings viii. 27), and that His presence now vouchsafed by the spiritual indwelling of the Holy Ghost, is as efficacious for guidance, help, and comfort as were these visible manifestations in early times, when there was not as yet that full knowledge of God and of His ways, which has been given us in His Holy Word.

EXCURSUS G: UPON THE CHRONOLOGY OF JACOB'S LIFE (Chap. xxvii.)

The elaborate calculations of Lightfoot, and most Jewish and Christian commentators, intended to show that when Jacob set out upon his journey to Haran, he and Esau were each about 77 years of age, and Isaac their father about 137, though based apparently upon the letter of Scripture, are so contrary to its facts that evidently there must be some error in them. Fortunately there are several dates which are open to no doubt, and if we start with these, it may prove not impossible to arrive at more trustworthy conclusions.

When then, Jacob went down into Egypt, he was 130 years of age (chap. xlvi. 9), and as Joseph when he "stood before Pharaoh" was 30 (chap. xii. 46), and as his first years of power were the seven years of plenty, and there had been already two years of famine when he made himself known to his brethren, he was plainly about 40 years of age when his father joined him. Now he was a lad of 17 when sold into Egypt (xxxvi. 2), and as he was born before the contract to serve Laban for the speckled cattle (xxx. 25), which lasted for six years (xxx. 41), he was about 7 when Jacob returned to Canaan. It follows, therefore, that Jacob was 91 when Joseph was born. Now the usual calculations allow only twenty years for Jacob's sojourn in Padan-aram, of which the first seven were spent in service before Leah and Rachel were given him in marriage. If, from the twenty, we subtract these seven years and the seven years of Joseph's age, there remain only six years for the birth of Leah's six sons and the interval of her barrenness; and undeniable the narrative would be guilty of very remarkable exaggeration in its account of Rachel's childlessness, and Rachel herself of excess impatience, considering that at the end of six years she gave birth herself to a son, and in the interval had given her maid Bilhah to Jacob, who had by her two sons; and as the birth of these was the occasion to Rachel of very unseemly exultation over her sister (xxx. 6, 8), her conduct can only be accounted for by the fact that Leah had already a numerous offspring when Rachel gave Bilhah to her husband.

The case of Leah is still plainer. She bears four sons, after which she "left bearing" (xxx. 35), and this barrenness continued so long that she gave Zilpah as her substitute to Jacob, who bore him two sons, Gad and Asher. Now neither Rachel nor Leah would have resorted to this expedient until they utterly despaired of having children themselves; and Leah herself describes it as an act of great self-sacrifice (xxx. 18). Zilpah's sons both seem to have been born in this period of Leah's barrenness; for we find that Jacob had entirely deserted Leah, and it was only at Rachel's request that he visited her again. Zilpah had taken Leah's place plainly because she had no expectation of having more offspring, and from chap. xxx. 15 it is evident that Jacob shared in this view, and had long ceased to pay any visits to Leah's tent. Moreover, this interval lasted so long that Reuben was old enough to be allowed to ramble in the field—that is, the uncultivated pasture land where the flocks fed; and he had sufficient self-control to bring the mandrake-herbs which he had found home to his mother. According to the usual calculations, he was between three and four years old at this time: for it is necessary to arrange for the births of Issachar and Zebulun within the six years. He is therefore described as carried by the reapers to the wheatfield, and somewhere there he finds the man-drakes; but the wheat harvest is mentioned only to fix the time, and Reuben had evidently gone a long ramble to places not often visited. For it is plain that the mandrakes were rarities, and that their discovery was unusual; and this would not have been the case had they been found near the tents, nor is it likely that a young child would have been the discoverer. On the other hand, if Reuben were an active young man, nothing was more probable than for him to wander away into distant quarters, looking, perhaps, for game; and the kind heart which made him bring the berries to his mother is in agreement with the hearty affection which made him determine to save the life even of the hated Joseph (xxxvii. 21, 22, 29, 30). "Unstable" he was, with no great qualities, but not destitute of generosity or of sympathy; and to Leah her sons must have been her one comfort under her many trials, and no doubt she treated them lovingly. Now if we put all these things together—the birth of Leah's four sons; Rachel's jealousy at her sister's fruitfulness, and her gift of Bilhah to her husband; Leah's interval of barrenness, and her gift of Zilpah to take her place; the complete estrangement of Jacob from Leah, upon the supposition that she would never again conceive; and the fact that she had to purchase of Rachel the visit of Jacob to her tent, which was followed by the birth of two more sons,—if we bear all this in mind, few persons could probably be found capable of believing that so much could have taken place in six years. If we add the further consideration that Hebrew women suckled their children for two or more years (note on xxii. 8), the supposition that Leah had four sons in four years becomes very unlikely. The patriarchal women are described as the reverse of fruitful. Even Leah, the one exception, has only seven children; and where any patriarch has a large family, he obtained it by having more than one wife.

After the six sons, Dinah was born, for so it is distinctly said in verse 21. But even if we interpedate Dinah among the sons, so far from making the difficulty less, we only land ourselves in an impossibility: for we have now to cram seven births, and a period of barrenness into six years. We must, then, accept what Holy Scripture says as a literal fact—that she was born after Zelophehad. Now if we bear in mind that Jacob was seven years in Padan-aram, that Dinah was Leah's seventh child, and that her mother had another child, we can explain that, if Jacob's sojourn at Padan-aram lasted only twenty years, Dinah could not have been more than two or three years old when Jacob returned to Canaan. Now in the ten years which elapsed between Jacob's return, bringing with him Joseph, seven years old, and the sale of Joseph to the Midianites, at the age of seventeen, Jacob dwelt first at Shechem (xxxii. 13), then at Beersheba (xxxv. 1), and finally near Hebron (xxxvii. 14). But not only is Dinah marriageable at Shechem, but her brothers, Simeon and Levi, about whose age there can be no doubt, as they were Leah's second and third sons,—these lads, then, aged one eleven and an other, on their arrival at Shechem, are so precociously powerful as to take "each one his sword, and come upon the city, and shay all the males" (xxxiv. 25). Jacob is not informed about these events, nor does he dare only to expostulate with these boys; and they, acting upon the usual law, that where there are several wives, the women look not to the father, but to those of their mother's tent, for protection, give him a fiery answer. Really we find in verse 13 that the sons of Jacob were grown men, who took the management of the matter into their own hands.

If, too, Jacob was seventy-seven when he went to Haran, then, as his mother was barren for twenty years, and Laban was a young man when he made the arrangements for his sister Rebekah's marriage, Laban must by this time have been nearly 120. Yet evidently all his children are very young. The difficulty is not, indeed, removed by subtracting twenty years; but it is lessened.

Moreover, as Joseph was born seven years before Jacob left Padan-aram, and Reuben in the eighth year of his sojourn there, he would be Joseph's senior by only five years. Yet Reuben calls him a "child" (xxxvii. 30), and all the rest treat him as one far younger than themselves, though really he was of much the same age as Issachar and Zebulon, and Zilpah's two sons, Gad and Asher. Judah, Leah's fourth son, would at most be only four years older than Joseph, yet he seems to have had a flock of his own at Timnah (xxxviii. 12), marries, and has three sons. The first, Er, grows up, and Judah takes for him a wife; but he was wicked, and died a premature death. Tamar is then given in marriage to the second son, and he also dies prematurely; whereupon Judah sends Tamar back to her father's house, with a promise that when Sheelah, his third son, is grown up, she shall be given her as a husband. While she is dwelling in her father's house, Judah's wife dies, and there were the days of mourning; and as Tamar had long waited in vain, she has recourse, when Judah was comforted after the loss of his wife, to an abominable artifice, and bears twin sons to her father-in-law. Now there were at most twenty-three years between the sale of Joseph and the going down of Jacob's family into Egypt, and if it was really the case that Judah was only twenty-one at Joseph's sale, all these events could not have happened within so short a period. The phrase "at that time," at the beginning of chap. xxxviii., by no means implies that the marriage of Judah with Shilah's daughter was contemporaneous with the sale of Joseph. It is quite indefinite, and intended to show that the episode about Judah and his family happened about the same general period; but really it could not have taken place many years previously, for, as we have seen, only ten years elapsed between Jacob's return and the cruel treatment of Joseph by his brethren. Judah's marriage, then, must have happened soon after the return to Canaan, when, nevertheless, according to these calculations, he was a boy only eleven years of age.

It is quite plain, therefore, that Jacob's sojourn in Padan-aram lasted more than twenty years. What, then, is the explanation? It was long ago given by Dr. Kennicott, and, as stated in the Speaker's Commentary, Bishop Horsley considered that the reasons he gave for his conclusions were unanswerable. All depends upon the translation of verses 38 and 41 of chap. xxxi., and in the Authorised Version the two periods of twenty years are made to be identical, the second statement being taken as a mere amplification of the first. But if we turn to the Hebrew, it clearly distinguishes the two periods. In verse 38 it is literally: "This twenty years I was with thee; thy ewes, and thy she goats, did not cast their young," &c.; and really the verse 41, instead of being a repetition of this, adds: "Yet evidently so I am thy servant four years for thy two daughters, and six years for thy sheep." But in Hebrew the phrase this . . . this, means the one and the other, or, in our language, this and that. (See Note on chap. xxx. 27.) Thus, then, there were two periods of service, each about twenty years in duration, of which one was for settled wages, and the other for no stipulated hire. They would not necessarily be continuous, and Dr. Kennicott arranges them as follows:—First, Jacob served Laban fourteen years for his two daughters; next, there was a long period of twenty years, during which he took care of Laban’s flocks, receiving from them maintenance for himself and family, but acquiring no separate wealth; finally, after Joseph’s birth, Jacob rebelled at this treatment, and determined to go back to his father, but was prevailed upon to remain, on the promise of receiving for himself all the speckled sheep and goats.

This explanation is confirmed by the curious phrase in verse 41: “This (second) twenty years was for me in thy house.” The other twenty years were for Laban’s sole good, and made him a wealthy man; but the fourteen years for the two maidens, and the six for the cattle, were, Jacob says, “for me.” They were mine, spent in attaining to the fulfilment of my own purposes.

In the Speaker’s Commentary, the following table is given as a probable arrangement of the chief events in Jacob’s life:—

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Years of Jacob’s life</th>
<th></th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>0</td>
<td>Jacob and Esau born.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>40</td>
<td>Esau marries two Hittite wives, chap. xxvi. 34.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>57</td>
<td>Jacob goes to Padan-Aram, Isaac being 117.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>58</td>
<td>Esau marries a daughter of Ishmael, chap. xxviii. 9.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>63</td>
<td>Ishmael dies, aged 137, chap. xxv. 17.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>64</td>
<td>Jacob marries Leah and Rachel, chap. xxxix. 20, 21, 27, 28.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>71</td>
<td>Dan and Naphtali born of Bilhah.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>72</td>
<td>Beginning of fourteen years’ service.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>71</td>
<td>Gad and Asher born of Zilpah.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>71</td>
<td>Issachar and Zebulun born of Leah.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>91</td>
<td>Dinah born.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>92</td>
<td>Agreement made, chap. xxx. 25—34.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>103</td>
<td>Joseph, at seventeen, is carried to Egypt, chap. xxxvii. 2.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>110</td>
<td>Isaac dies, aged 180, chap. xxxx. 28.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>121</td>
<td>Joseph, aged 30, governor of Egypt.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>130</td>
<td>Jacob goes down to Egypt, chap. xlvi. 1.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>147</td>
<td>Jacob dies, chap. xlvii. 28.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

In this table there are only two dates to which I should venture to take exception. First, it is not probable that Dan and Naphtali were born during the seven years which followed upon Jacob’s marriages. Rachel would resort to an expedient so painful to a wife only in despair at her own barrenness, and in envy of her sister’s fruitfulness. The giving of Bilhah must have taken place during the twenty years of unpaid service. Next, Benjamin could scarcely have been born in the very year following the return from Padan-aram; for after the interview with Esau, Jacob goes to Succoth, and thence to Shechem, where he buys a plot of ground. We learn, nevertheless, that Jacob, when Dinah was wronged, had not been there long, from what Hamor and Shechem said to the citizens (chap. xxxiv. 21, 22). From Shechem, Jacob next goes to Beth-ol, and “dwells there” (xxxv. 1), but after some little stay, moves southward, towards the home of his father; and it was near Bethlehem that Benjamin was born. Most certainly Jacob would keep steadily in view his return to Isaac; but the events between the flight from Haran and Rachel’s death at Bethlehem, are too many to be crowded into a year. On the other hand, Rachel’s age warns us that Benjamin’s birth could not have happened long after her arrival in Canaan. If, then, we place it in the hundredth year of Jacob’s life, and the thirty-fourth of his marriage, two things follow—the first, that Rachel was very young at her marriage, and a mere child when Jacob first met her; the second, that Jacob must have spent about twenty years with Isaac at Hebron before the latter’s death.
THE SECOND BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED EXODUS.
INTRODUCTION TO THE SECOND BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED
EXODUS.

I. Title.—The Hebrews knew the five books of the Pentateuch by their initial word or words, Berôèith, Ve-rôèeh shemôth, Vay-gîbêra, &c.; but as this kind of nomenclature was unknown to the Greeks, the Alexandrian translators had to devise new titles, which should be intelligible to those for whom their translation was made. Following a method which was at once natural and familiar to the Hellenic world by its very early application to the Iliad of Homer,1 they named the several parts of the work from their contents, and gave to the second book, very happily, the title it still bears of "Exodos," "departure," "going," or "setting forth," since a main subject of the narrative is the "outgoing" of the Israelites from Egypt. Jerome, in his translation of the Bible, preserved the word, merely Latinising it into "Exodus"; and the acceptance of his version by the Western Church has led to the general adoption of the name used by him among the nations of Western Europe.

II. Contents, Design, and General Plan of the Book.—Although the outgoing of the Israelites from Egypt is one of the principal matters treated of in the Book of Exodus, yet it was not the sole, nor even the main, purpose of the writer to give an account of that remarkable passage of history. His purpose was a wider and grander one. It embraced a space of time anterior to even the first preparations for departure, and another subsequent to the completion of the journey and escape. It was therefore rather than historic. It was to "give an account of the first stage in the fulfillment of the promises made by God to the patriarchs, with reference to the growth of the children of Israel,"2 by tracing their development from a family into a tribe, and from a tribe into a nation. Genesis left Israel in Egypt a family or "house" (Gen. i. 22); Exodus leaves them a nation of above two millions of souls, organised under chiefs (Exod. xviii. 21—24), with a settled form of worship, a priesthood, a code of laws, and a judicature. It finds them still a family (chap. i. 1—6); it leaves them the people of God (chap. xxxii. 13). By the entrance of "the glory of the Lord" into the tabernacle (chap. xl. 34) the theocracy is completed—God locally dwells with His people as their Ruler, Director, and Guide. The nation receives its Head, and becomes "a kingdom" (chap. xix. 6). It is still nomadic—it has no settled country—but it is an organised whole.

In tracing the steps of this change, the author of the book pursues the ordinary historical and chronological method. Having recapitulated (from Gen. xlvii.) the family of Jacob, and mentioned the death of Joseph (chap. i. 1—6), he sketches rapidly the condition of the descendants of Jacob during the period which intervened between Joseph's decease and the birth of Moses, dwelling especially on the rapid increase of the Israelites (verses 7, 12, 20), and relating incidentally the steps in the "affliction" to which they were subjected by the Egyptians, according to God's prophecy to Abraham (Gen. xv. 13). From this he passes to the birth, providential escape, and bringing up of Moses, their pre-destined deliverer, and to the circumstances which compelled him to quit Egypt, and become an exile in the land of Midian. The call and mission of Moses are next related, together with the circumstances of his return from Midian to Egypt, the consent of Jethro to his departure (chap. iv. 18), the circumcision of Eliezer (ib. 24—26), the meeting with Aaron (ib. 27, 28), and the acceptance of Moses for their leader by the people (ib. 29—31). The account of Moses' first application to Pharaoh follows, and its result—the increase of the people's burdens, with their consequent despair, and the despondency of Moses (chaps. v., vi. 1—13). After a genealogical parenthesis (chap. vi. 14—27), the narrative of the struggle between Moses and Pharaoh is resumed, and carried on through five chapters (chaps. vii.—xi.), which contain the account of all the "plagues of Egypt," except the last, and exhibit in a strong light the tergiversation and final obduracy of Pharaoh. The crisis now approaches, and in preparation for it the Passover is instituted, with full directions for its continued observance (chap. xii. 1—28). The blow then falls—the firstborn are slain—and the Israelites are not only allowed to depart, but are sent out of Egypt "in haste" (chap. xii. 33), laden with presents from those who wished to expedite their departure (ib. 35, 36). The account of the "Exodus" itself is then given, and the journey traced from Rameses, by way of Succoth and Etham, to Pi-hahiroth, on the western shore of the Red Sea (chaps. xvi. 37—xvii. 4). Upon this follows an account of the pursuit made by Pharaoh of the miraculous passage of the sea by the host of Israel, and the destruction in the returning waters of the entire Egyptian chariot and cavalry force (chap. xiv. 5—31). This portion of the narrative is appropriately concluded by the song of triumph sung by Moses and Miriam (chap. xv. 1—21).

Israel being now in safety, the account of their journey is resumed. Their line of march is traced through the wilderness of Shur to Marah (chap. xv. 22—26); from Marah to Elim (ib. 27); thence through the wilderness of Sin to Rephidim (chap. xvii. 1); and from Rephidim to Sinai (chap. xix. 42). On the march occurs the murmuring and miracle at Marah (chap. xv. 23—25); the giving of the quails and of manna (chap. xvi. 1—36); the great battle with the Amalekites at 1 See Herod, ii. 163; and compare Heyne, Excurs. ad Hom. Hntl. xxiv. § 5, p. 787.

EXODUS.

Rephidim (chap. xxi. 8–13); and the visit of Jethro to Moses, with his advice, and the consequent organisation of the people (chap. xviii. 1–27).

The scene of the rest of Exodus is Sinai and the plain at its northern base. In chap. xix. the author describes the preparatory stages for the giving of the fundamental law, which is then explicitly stated in four chapters (chaps. xx. xxi. xxii.), and consists of the Decalogue (chap. xx. 1–17) and the "Book of the Covenant" (chaps. xx. 22–xxii.). In chap. xxiv., he tells of the acceptance of the covenant by Israel (verses 3–8), and of the first ascent of Moses into the mount (verses 9–18). After this, seven chapters (chaps. xxv. xxvi. xxvii.) relate the directions given to Moses by God with respect to the mode in which He would be worshipped, and the "house" which He would have constructed for Him. In chap. xxxii., Israel's apostasy is related, together with its immediate punishment; and in chap. xxxiii., we have an account of the steps taken by Moses to obtain from God a renewal of the forfeited covenant. In chap. xxxiv., the writer relates the circumstances of Moses' second ascent into the mount, and declares the terms upon which the covenant was renewed. The construction of the various parts of the tabernacle and of the priestly garments is then given in five chapters (chaps. xxxv. xxxvi. xxxvii. xxxviii.), and the work concludes with an account in one chapter (chap. xl.) of the setting up of the tabernacle, and the entrance of the "Glory of God" into it.

III. Divisions.—Primarily, the work divides itself into two portions:—I. An historical narrative of the fortunes of Israel from the death of Joseph to the arrival of the nation in front of Sinai (chaps. i. – xix.). 2. A didactic portion, containing all the most essential points of the Law and of the worship (chaps. xx. – xl.). This didactic portion is, however, historical in its setting, and is intermixed with some purely historical sections, as especially chap. xxiv. and chaps. xxxii. xxxiii.

Part I. may be sub-divided as follows:—

Section. Chap.
1. i. The oppression of Israel in Egypt.
2. ii. The birth, escape from death, and bringing up of Moses. His first attempt to deliver his people, and flight to Midian.
3. iii. iv. The call and mission of Moses, and his return to Egypt.
4. v. vi. The first interview between Moses and Pharaoh, with its result—the increase of the people's burthens, their despair, and the despondency of Moses.
5. vi. 14— The genealogy of Moses and Aaron.
27. vii. viii. The efforts made by Moses, under Divine guidance, to overcome the obstinacy of Pharaoh. The first nine "plagues of Egypt."
7. xii. 1— The institution of the Passover.
23.
8. xii. 29 The tenth plague, and its consequences.
9. xii. 37 The departure from Egypt, and the journey to Pi-halibroth.

Part II. contains the following sub-divisions:

Section. Chap.
1. xx. 1— Delivery of the Decalogue.
21.
2. xx. 22 Words of the "Book of the Covenant."
3. xxiv. Acceptance of the covenant, and ascent of Moses into the mount.
4. xxxv. Instructions given to Moses with respect to the structure of the tabernacle, and the consecration and attire of the priests.
5. xxxvii. — Infraction of the covenant by the Israelites, and renewal of it through the intercession of Moses.
7. xl. Erection of the tabernacle, and entrance of the "Glory of God" into it.

IV. Date of the Composition.—The antiquity of the Book of Exodus is evidenced by the simplicity of its constructions, and the occurrence in it of a certain number of extremely archaic forms. Its composition by an eye-witness of most of the events which it relates is indicated by the vividness with which they are portrayed, and the details and unnecessary minutiae into which the writer enters. The descriptions of the effect of the hail upon the Egyptian standing crops (chap. ix. 31, 32), of the character and appearance of the manna (chap. xvi. 14–31), and of the descent of Jehovah upon Mount Sinai (chaps. xix. 16–19, xx. 18) all have the appearance of being by an eye-witness. Who but an eye-witness would note the exact number of the wells at Elim, and of the palm-trees that grew about them (chap. xvi. 27)? Or was the fact that the first tables of stone were "written on the one side, and on the other" (chap. xxxiv. 15)? Or the circumstance that Moses and Joshua heard the sound of the idol feast in honour of the golden calf before they got sight of it (ibid. 17–19)? What Israelite of later times would have presumed to fix the exact date of the setting forth from Elim as the "fifteenth day of the second month after their departing out of the land of Egypt" (chap. xvi. 1)? Or to state that Miriam and the Israelite women accompanied their song of triumph "with timbrels" (chap. xvi. 20)? Or to give the precise position of Pi-halibroth as "between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon" (chap. xvi. 2)? Who but an eye-witness would have noticed that the locusts were taken away by "a strong west wind," or would have ventured to state that "there remained not one beast in all the coasts of Egypt" (chap. x. 19)? Little graphic touches strongly indicative of the eye-witness are such as the following:—"Zipporah cut off the foreskin of her son, and cast it at his feet" (chap. iv. 25). "Aaron met Moses in the mount of God, and kissed
EXODUS.

Him" (ibid. 27). The officers of the Israelites "met Moses and Aaron, who stood in the way, as they came forth from Pharaoh" (chap. v. 20). "The frogs died out of the houses, out of the villages, and out of the fields; and they gathered them together in heaps" (chap. vii. 13, 14). "The Lord sent thunder and hail, and the fire ran along upon the ground" (chap. ix. 23). The locusts covered the face of the earth, so that the land was darkness" (chap. x. 15). "Darkness over the land of Egypt, even darkness which may be felt" (ib. 21). "And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he and all his servants, and all the Egyptians; and there was a great cry in Egypt" (chap. xii. 30). "The people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading troughs being bound up in their clothes upon their shoulders" (ib. 34). "The Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all that night" (chap. xiv. 21). "Thus the Lord saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians; and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea shore" (ib. 30). The Egyptians "sank into the bottom as a stone; they sank as lead in the mighty waters" (chap. xv. 10). "The quails came up and covered the camp; and in the morning the dew lay round about the host" (chap. xvi. 13). "They did mete the manna with an omer" (ib. 13). "When the sun waxed hot, the manna melted" (ib. 21). "Moses went out to meet his father-in-law, and did obeisance, and kissed him" (chap. xviii. 7). "The whole mount (Sinai) quake greatly" (chap. xix. 18). "All the people answered with one voice, and said: All the words which the Lord hath said we will do" (chap. xxiv. 3). The subject need not be further pursued. It is evident that the style of narration is exactly that of an eye-witness, and we must either suppose intentional fraud, or the composition of Exodus by one of those who quitted Egypt at this time under the circumstances narrated. The date of the final completion of the work will therefore be, at the latest, some twenty or thirty years after the entrance into Canaan.

V. Author.—If the Book of Exodus be granted to have been written by a contemporary—an Israelite present at the greater part of the scenes recorded in it—the question of its exact author becomes one of mere literary curiosity. The credibility of the Biblical history is established, as even Strauss admits, if it can be shown that it was written by eye-witnesses. And the author of Exodus can have been no ordinary Israelite, no uneducated person, no mere member of the rank and file; he must have been among the foremost of his nation, highly gifted, possessed of rare culture, a man of mark, one of the chief leaders. It would not detract from the value of the work as an historical record if it could be shown to have been written by Aaron or Hur, by Joshua or Caleb; but the interest is increased, no doubt, if it can justly be regarded as the work of Moses.

What ground, then, is there for this belief, which, notwithstanding all that has been urged against it, is still the prevalent one? In the first place, there is the mimimastic tradition. "The Book of the Law" is ascribed to Moses by Joshua,2 by the author of Kings,3 by the author of Chronicles,4 by Ezra,5 by Nehemiah,6 by Malachi,7 by our blessed Lord,8 by St. John the Baptist,9 by Philip the Apostle,10 by St. Peter,11 by St. Paul repeatedly, and by all the Jewish Targums, Rabbis, and commentators generally. A work which there is every reason to regard as the same is assigned to him by Hierocles of Abdera, by Manetho, by Eusebius, by Nicodemos of Damascens, by Juvenal, and by Longinus. There is no counter-tradition. No writer of antiquity, of either great or small authority, has ever suggested any other author of Exodus, or (if we take the word author in its wider sense) of the Pentateuch, but Moses.

Secondly, there is a large mass of internal evidence pointing to the Mosaic authorship of Exodus. Not only was the author familiar with Egypt, but he had a large acquaintance with the Egyptian language, laws, art, and literature. The number of Egyptian words and phrases which occur in Exodus is considerable.12 The Mosaic legislation has Egyptian features. The ornamentation of the tabernacle, and the fabrics used for curtains and for garments, betray an acquaintance with the resources and methods of Egyptian industrial skill. Acquaintance with Egyptian literature is shown in the more elevated parts of the work, especially in the "Song of Moses." As there is no reason to believe that any other Israelite of the time had enjoyed the advantage of being bred up in the Egyptian learning, and familiarised with the highest specimens of Egyptian artistic and literary genius, it is unlikely that any other member of the community could have produced Exodus. But Moses was fully competent for the task. Moses, brought up at the court, as the son of a princess, "learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians" (Acts vii. 22)—or, at any rate, in all that was not of a recondite character—familiar with artists and literary men, accustomed to the splendour and magnificence of the Pharaonic palaces and temples, might naturally have at once the literary skill, the legislative ability, and power of artistic conception which the work displays.

Further, many of the little turns noticed in the preceding section, and others similar to them, which betray the hand of an eye-witness, are of such a nature that the eye-witness could only be Moses. Who but Moses could know that before he "slew the Egyptian" he "looked this way and that" (chap. ii. 12)? Who but Moses could remember that "he flung himself into the sand" (ib.)? Who but Moses could know that he "turned aside to see the great sight of the burning bush" (chap. iii. 3)? That he "hid before" the serpent into which his rod was turned (chap. iv. 3), or that when he quitted Midian, he set his wife and child upon an ass (ib. 20), or that Zipporah cut off her son's foreskin "with a stone" (ib. 25), or that when she had cut it off, she cast it at Moses' feet (ib. 26)? Who but Moses could tell us that at Marah "he cried unto the Lord, and the Lord showed him a tree" (chap. xv. 25), or that at Rephidim his "hands were heavy" (chap. xviii. 12), or the exact reasons for which he gave his two sons their names (chap. xviii. 3, 4), or that when he came down from the mount he "wist not that his face shone" (chap. xxxiv. 29), or that when he saw the glory of God, he "bowed his head toward the earth, and worshipped" (ib. 8)? Not only the actions of Moses, but his thoughts and feelings, the very words of his prayers breathed inwardly to God (chaps. xxxii. 31, 32, xxxiii. 12—16, &c.), are declared to us with openness, simplicity, and an unmistakable stamp of truth. Who but Moses could dare to lay bare to us the secret thoughts of Moses, to expose to us the very recesses of his heart? 13

EXODUS.

Again, a strong argument for the Mosaic authorship may be drawn from the natural manner in which Moses used and spoken of. Whereas to the Hebrew nation—who owed him so much—Moses had always been the first and greatest of men, the writer of Exodus is unconscious of his possessing any personal greatness at all. The points in the personality of Moses which have impressed him the most, and on which he lays the greatest stress, are his deficiencies in natural gifts, and his numerous imperfections of temper and character. Dash and impetuous, beginning his public life with a crime (chap. ii. 12), and following up his crime with an assumption of authority that was unwise (ib. 13), he next shows a timid spirit, when he finds that his crime is known (ib. 14, 15), and betaking himself to exile, relinquishes all national effort. Called by God, and entrusted with the mission of delivering Israel, he holds back, hesitates, plucks his personal defects, until he angers God, and loses half his leadership (chap. iv. 1—14). Unsuccessful in his first application to Pharaoh, he utters a remonstrance which verges on irreverence (chap. v. 22, 23). Encouraged by fresh promises, and hidden to make a second application, he responds by a fresh disparagement of his natural powers (chap. vi. 12). When at last he makes up his mind to carry out his struggle with Pharaoh to the bitter end, he shows, no doubt, courage and confidence in God; but still he is never praised: no single word is uttered in commendation of his moral qualities; once only is he said to have been “very great in the sight of Pharaoh’s servants and of the people” (chap. xi. 3). It has been urged that he would not have spoken of himself in this tone—and it is just possible that the words are a later addition to his work—that still they contain no praise; they do but note a fact, and a fact of importance to the narrative, since it accounts for the gifts lavished upon Israel at their departure. In the later portion of Exodus, it is absence of all words of praise rather than any record of faults that we note; nothing calls forth from the writer a single sentence of approval; even when the order is made to be blotted out of God’s book for the sake of half a people (chap. xxxi. 32), the same reticence is observed: no comment follows; there is no apparent recognition that the offer was anything but a small matter. Nor is any notice taken of the courage, faith, and wisdom exhibited by Moses in the performance of his mission from the time of his second appearance before Pharaoh (chap. vii. 19). Contrast with this silence what later writers say of him, as the son of Sirach (Ecclus. xiv. 1—5), the author of the Epistle to the Hebrews (chap. xi. 24—28; comp. chap. iii. 5), and the completer of Deuteronomy (chap. xxxiv. 10—12). It will be sufficient to quote the last-named passage to show what his countrymen generally thought of their deliverer. “And there arose not a prophet since in Israel like unto Moses, whom the Lord knew face to face, in all the signs and the wonders, which the Lord sent him to do in the land of Egypt to Pharaoh and to his servants.” 5 The humble estimate formed of the deliverer, and the general reticence, are quite intelligible, and in harmony with the rest of the Scripture, if the author was Moses. They are wholly unintelligible on any other hypothesis.

VI. Credibility.—Strass observed, as has already been stated (see above, § v.), that “it would, most unquestionably, by an argument of decisive weight in favour of the credibility of the Biblical history, would it indeed be shown that it was written by eyewitnesses.” 11 And again, “Moses, being the leader of the Israelites on their departure from Egypt, would undoubtedly give a faithful history of the occurrences, unless” (which no one supposes) “he intended to deceive.” 12 These admissions show that the credibility of Exodus is involved in the Mosaic authorship, and is proved if that be proved, as we conceive that it is. Still, as all men are not logically-minded, the following remarks on the credibility of the narrative itself, whoever was the writer, may not be superfluous.

The narrative contains an account of Egypt, touching in numerous points its history, geography, productions, climatic peculiarities, manners and customs, &c., with much definiteness and exactness. A writer who ventures on such minuteness, unless a contemporary, and familiar with the scene which he describes, is liable to trip at every turn, and is certain to be caught tripping if subjected to a close scrutiny by those who, with all the aids of modern historical research, have made the country and the period their special study. But the more closely Exodus is scrutinised by learned Egyptologists, the more triumphantly does it emerge from the ordeal; and it is not too much to say that, for the future, no sceptical critic is likely to repeat the attack of Von Bohlen, which called forth so crushing a reply from Heugenberg. 3 The narrative of Exodus, though at present it receives no direct confirmation from the Egyptian monuments, is indirectly confirmed on so many and such minute points, that its historical character must be admitted, unless we tax the writer with conscious imposture. He is familiar with the Egypt of the early Ramessean period, and must have known the circumstances of the departure of Israel. If he has misrepresented them, he must have done so intentionally, and have sought to give his fiction an air of reality by observing, in all his details, the utmost truthfulness and accuracy. Though the general narrative is unconfirmed by the Egyptian monuments, which would not be likely to notice an inglorious episode in Egyptian history, yet it receives a certain amount of confirmation from an Egyptian writer of repute, as well as from several of the classical historians. Manetho, an Egyptian priest who wrote his “History of Egypt” in the time of the first Ptolemy (c. 323—233), declared that, in the reign of an Amenophis, who was the son of a Ramessus, and the father of a Sethos, a man named Moses led out of Egypt a colony of unclean persons, and conducted them to Syria.” 4 He too, of Abdera, who lived about the same time, told a similar story, adding that the colony consisted of foreigners, and settled in Judaea. 5 Artapanus, a librarian, Eupolemus, a history, Tabucinus, Tachis, and others gave accounts which were not very different. It was generally accepted as historic truth in the ancient world, that the nation known as Jews or Israelites had at one time dwelt in Egypt, had quitted that country under circumstances of hostility, and had passed through the desert to Palestine. Most writers agreed that the leader of the migration had been Moses. Some maintained that both Moses and Aaron, i.e., Aaron, 6 The passage of the Red Sea was admitted by the Egyptians themselves, who only differed

1 Leben Jesu, i. 13, p. 55, F. T.
2 Deut. i. 19, p. 58, F. T.
3 See the important work of this writer, entitled Egypt and Moses, published in 1816, and translated into English for Clark’s Theological Library in 1818. Some additions have been made by the proof furnished by Heugenberg of the following, work of the present writer—Historical Illustrations of the Old and New Testaments, p. 91.
6 Jerr. Commentari in Eppos. Justin. (xxxiv. 2), as to the question whether it had been miraculous or not. While the priests of Memphis maintained that Moses had merely taken advantage of a low tide to lead the Israelites across, those of Heliopolis, more honest or better informed, freely declared that, "in the Egyptian king, at the head of a large force, pursuing after the Jews because they were crying away with them the gold which they had borne of the Egyptians, the voice of God commanded Moses to smite the sea with his rod, and divide it. Moses, therefore, when he was thus admonished, touched the water with his rod, and so the sea parted assunder, and the host marched through on dry ground." 1 The march by way of Mount Sinai is witnessed to by one classical writer, 2 and there is a general agreement that the laws which marked off the Jews from all other nations were given them by Moses.
EXODUS.

At the present day, the credibility of Exodus is assailed on two principal grounds:—1. The miraculous character of a large portion of the narrative. 2. The exaggeration, which is thought to be apparent, in the numbers. A school of foreign critics denies the possibility of a miracle; and among ourselves there are many who accept the view of Ruine, that it is more probable that the witnesses to miracles should have been deceived, than that the miracles should have happened. It is impossible, within the limits of an "Introduction," to discuss these large questions. Every Christian, every believer in the Apostles' Creed, must accept miracles. And when the Resurrection and Ascension of our Lord are once accepted, any other minor miracles cease to be felt as difficulties. In the present case, it is observable,—(1) that the miracles were needed; (2) that they were peculiarly suitable and appropriate to the circumstances; and (3) that they were of such a nature that it was impossible for eye-witnesses to be deceived with regard to them. Moses especially, whom we have shown to have been almost certainly the writer of Exodus, could not have been deceived as to the miracles. He must have known whether he performed them or not. Even if the writer be a companion of Moses (Joshua or Caleb), and not Moses himself, deception is inconceivable. Either the plagues of Egypt happened, or they did not. Either the Red Sea was divided, or it was not. Either the pillar of fire and of the cloud guided the movements of the host for forty years, or there was no such thing. Either there was manna each morning round about the camp, or there was none. The facts were too plain, too simple, too obvious to sense for there to be any doubt about them. The record is either a true account, or a tissue of lies. We cannot imagine the writer an eye-witness, and reject the main features of his tale, without looking on him as an impudent impostor. No "enthusiasm," no "poetic temperament," could account for such a record, if the Exodus was accomplished without miracles. The writer either related the truth, or was guilty of gross dishonesty. With respect to the numerical difficulties, it is to be borne in mind, in the first place, that numbers are peculiarly liable to corruption in ancient works, from the fact that they were not fully expressed, but written in a sort of cipher. 3 It is quite possible that the numbers in our present copies of Exodus are in excess, and express the ideas of a reviser, such as Ezra, rather than those of the original author. The males of full age who quitted Egypt may have been 100,000, or 60,000, instead of 100,000, and the migration one of 400,000 or 290,000 souls, instead of two millions. But, on the whole, judicious criticism inclines to uphold the numbers of the existing text. Alarm would not have been felt by the Egyptian kings until the people had greatly multiplied, and become formidable from a military point of view. Up to the time when the fully-grown men numbered some hundreds of thousands. For the population of Egypt was probably from seven to eight millions, 4 and the military class, at a far less flourishing time than that of the Exodus, was reckoned at above 400,000. 5 Nor could Cannan well have been conquered by an emigrant body which did not amount to some millions, since the country was well peopled at the time, and its occupants were brave and warlike. The difficulty of subsistence for two millions of persons in the desert is entirely met by the continuous miracle of the manna, and that of sufficient pasture for their numerous flocks and herds, by the far greater fertility of the Sinaitic peninsula in ancient than in modern times, of which abundant indications have been observed by recent travellers. 6 Ewald, Kalisch, Kurtz, and Keil accept the numbers of the present text, and believe the migration has been successfully accomplished by a body of about two millions of persons.

VII. Condition of the Text.—The condition of the text of Exodus is extremely good. Variant readings of any importance are few, and passages which require emendation almost non-existent. There are one or two short sentences 8 which may be interpolations by some hand, perhaps Joshua's, and there is one long insertion (chap. vi. 14—27) which seems not to be from the pen of Moses, but which he may have sanctioned. Some critics, grounding themselves upon the LXX. or Samaritan Version, or both, maintain that a considerable number of passages have fallen out of the text, which were originally part of it; 9 but the predominant voice of scholars pronounces the passages in question to be unauthorised additions, foisted into the work by the Greek or the Samaritan translators. Even the supposed transposition of the passage concerning the altar of incense from chap. xxvi. to chap. xxx., the place where it stands in the Hebrew copies, which at first sight seems highly probable, is condemned by the spirit of the rule. Proclivi lectio praestat ardui, and is rejected by all recent commentators. Thus Exodus would seem to have come down to us almost in the condition in which it was left by Moses, who was regarded with so much veneration by succeeding prophets, that the greatest care was taken to hand down his works unaltered.

---

1 From Hist. Gr., Vol. III., pp. 223, 224.
2 Justin, l.c.c.
4 See Exod. i. 9, 10.
5 Diod. Sic. i. 31; Joseph., Bell. Jud. ii. 6.
6 Diod. ii. 16—24.
7 See Our Work in Palestine (chap. xiii., p. 579). The writer says:—"Objections have been made, based on the present barrenness of the peninsula, to the narrative of the exodus. They vanish before the results of the survey. The barrenness of the peninsula is due to the climate; in former times it was more richly wooded; the wadi's were protected by walls stretching across, which served as dams to resist the force of the rushing waters; the mountains were terraced, and clothed with gardens and groves." 8 Spec. especially the second clause of verse 3 in chap. xi.
9 The most important of these passages are chap. i. 11, where the LXX. add, "On" to "Pithom and Raamses"; and v. 40, in the LXX., insert, in the narrative of the exodus, the "Egypt"; and the Samaritan, adopting this change, adds further, "and their fathers" after "the children of Israel." Other places, where comparatively unimportant additions occur, are chap. vii., between verses 18 and 19; viii., between 19 and 20; ix., between 5 and 6; and between 19 and 20; x., between 5 and 6; x., between 2 and 1; and xx., between 18 and 19.

191
THE SECOND BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED
EXODUS.

1. CHAPTER I.—Now these are the names of the children of Israel, which came into Egypt; every man and his household came with Jacob. (2) Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, (3) Issachar, Zebulun, and Benjamin, (4) Dan, and Naphtali, Gad, and Asher. (5) And all the souls that came out of the loins of Jacob were 77 seventy souls: for Joseph was in Egypt already.

The Multiplication of the Israelites in Egypt, and Their Oppression by a New King.

(1) Now these are the names.—The divisions between the "books" of the Pentateuch are not arbitrary. Genesis ends naturally and Exodus begins at the point where the history of the individuals who founded the Israelite nation ceases and that of the nation itself is entered on. That history commences properly with verse 7. Verses 1—6 form the connecting link between the two books, and would not have been needed unless Exodus had been introduced as a distinct work, since they are little more than a recapitulation of what had been already stated and stated more fully in Genesis. Compare verses 1—5 with Gen. xli. 8—27, and verse 6 with Gen. i. 26.

1. Every man and his household.—"A household," in the language of the East, includes not only children and grand-children, but retainers also—"servants born in the house."—Like those of Abraham (Gen. xiv. 14). The number of each "household" may thus have been very considerable.

(2) Reuben . . .—The sons of the legitimate wives are placed first, then those of the concubines. Leah has precedence over Rachel; Bilhah over Zilpah. The children of each wife and concubine are given in order of seniority. The omission of Joseph from the list is explained in the last clause of verse 5.

(3) All the souls . . . were seventy souls. Comp. Gen. xli. 8—27. The number is made up as follows:—Jacob himself, 1; his sons, 12; his daughter, Dinah, 1; his grandsons, 51; his grand-daughter Serah, 1; his great-grandsons, 4—Total, 70. His daughters, except Dinah, and his sons’ daughters, except Serah, spoken of in Gen. xli. 7, are not included. If his female descendants were, at the time of his descent into Egypt, as numerous as the males, the entire number of those who "came out of his loins" must have been 132. To form a calculation of the number of persons who entered Egypt with him, we must add the wives of his sons and grandsons, and the husbands of his daughters and granddaughters. A further liberal allowance must be also made for retainers. (See the comment on verse 1.) It is not perhaps surprising that Kurtz, taking all these classes into account, should calculate that those who entered Egypt with Jacob amounted to "several thousands." (History of the Old Covenant, vol. ii. p. 149, E.T.)

(4) And Joseph died, and all his brethren, and all that generation. (5) And the children of Israel were fruitful, and increased abundantly, and multiplied, and waxed exceeding mighty; and the land was filled with them.

(6) Now there arose up a new king over Egypt, which knew not Joseph. (7) And he said unto his people, Behold, the people of the children of Israel are more and mightier than we: (10) Come on, let us deal wisely with them; lest they multiply, and it come to pass, that, when there falleth out any war, they join also unto our enemies, and fight against us, and so get them up out of the land. (11) Therefore they did set over them taskmasters to afflict them with their burdens. And they built for Pharaoh treasure cities, Pithom and Raamses. (12) But the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew. And they were grieved because of the children of Israel. (13) And the Egyptians made the children of Israel to serve with rigour: (14) and they made their lives bitter with hard bondage, in mortar, and in brick, and in all antithetical to "the people of the children of Israel," and simply marks that those whom he addressed were of his own nation. No doubt they were his nobles, or, at any rate, his courtiers.

192

More and mightier than we.—Heb., great and mighty in comparison with us. The more to impress his councillors, and gain their consent to his designs, the king exaggerates. Ancient Egypt must have had a population of seven or eight millions, which would imply nearly two millions of adult males, whereas the adult male Israelites, near a century later, were no more than six hundred thousand (chap. xii. 37). Wicked men do not scruple at misrepresentation when they have an end to gain.

They deal wisely.—Instead of open force, the king proposes stratagem. He thinks that he has hit upon a wise scheme—a clever plan—by which the numbers of the Israelites will be kept down, and they will cease to be formidable. The nature of the plan appears in verse 11.

When there falleth out any war.—The Egyptians were in general an aggressive people—a terror to their neighbours, and seldom the object of attack. But about the beginning of the nineteenth dynasty a change took place. "A great nation grew up beyond the frontier on the north-east to an importance and power which began to endanger the Egyptian supremacy in Western Asia" (Brugsch, History of Egypt, vol. i. p. 2). War threatened them from this quarter, and the impending danger was felt to be great.

They join also.—Rather, they too join. It was not likely that the Hebrews would have any real sympathy with the attacking nation, whether Arabs, Philistines, Syrians, or Hittites; but they might regard an invasion as affording them a good opportunity of striking a blow for freedom, and, therefore, attack the Egyptians simultaneously with their other foes. The Egyptians themselves would perhaps suppose a closer connection between them and the other Eastern races than really existed.

Got them up out of the land.—The Pharaohs of the nineteenth dynasty were excessively jealous of the withdrawal from Egypt of any of their subjects, and endeavoured both to hinder and to recover them. Emigration was encouraged, emigration sternly checked. The loss of the entire nation of the Hebrews could not be contemplated without extreme alarm.

(10) Task-masters.—Heb., chiefs of tributes. The Egyptian system of forced labour, which it was now resolved to extend to the Israelites, involved the appointment of two sets of officers—a lower class, who personally overlooked the labourers, and forced them to perform their tasks, and a higher class of superintendents, who directed the distribution of the labour, and assigned to all the tasks which they were to execute. The "task-masters" of the present passage are these high officials.

To afflict them.—This was the object of the whole proceeding. It was hoped that severe labour under the lash would produce so much suffering that the number of the Israelites would be thinned, and their multiplication stopped. Humanly speaking, the scheme was a "wise" one,—i.e., one likely to be successful.

They built for Pharaoh treasure-cities. By "treasure-cities" we are to understand "magnitudes"—i.e., strongholds, where munitions of war could be laid up for use in case of an invasion. (In 1 Kings ix. 19, and 2 Chron. viii. 4, the same expression is translated "cities of store.") The Pharaohs of the nineteenth dynasty gave great attention to the guarding of the north-eastern frontier in this way.

Pithom.—This city is reasonably identified with the "Pattumus" of Herodotus (i. 158), which was in Lower Egypt, not far from Bubastis (Tel Basta). It is mentioned in the inscriptions of the nineteenth dynasty under the name of Pi-Tum (Brugsch, History of Egypt, vol. ii. p. 125). It was, as the name implies, a city of the sun-god, and was probably not very far from Heliopolis, the main seat of the sun-god's worship.

Raamses.—Pi-Rames, the city of Ramses, was the ordinary seat of the Court during the earlier part of the nineteenth dynasty. It appears to have been a new name for Tanis, or for a suburb of Tanis, which overshadowed the old city. Ramses II. claims to have built the greater part of it; but it was probably commenced by his father, Seti, who made the defence of the north-eastern frontier one of his main cares. The name must be considered as a more variant rendering of the Egyptian Ramessu or Rames. The site is marked by the mounds at Sam.

(12) The more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and grew.—This result was not natural. It can only be ascribed to God's superintending Providence, whereby "the fierceness of man" was made to "turn to his praise." Naturally, severely and constant labour exhausts a nation, and causes its numbers to diminish.

They were grieved.—This is scarcely strong enough. Translate, "They were sore distressed.

(13) With rigour.—Forced labour in Egypt was of a very severe character. Those condemned to it worked from morning to night under the rod of a task-master, which was freely applied to their legs or backs, if they rested their weary limbs for a moment. (See Records of the Past, vol. viii. p. 149; Chaubes, Mélanges Egyptologiques, vol. ii. p. 121.) The heat of the sun was great; the burdens which the labourers had to carry were heavy, and the toil was incessant. Death often resulted from the excessive work. According to Herodotus, a single monarch, Neco, destroyèd in this way 120,000 of his subjects (Herod. ii. 158).

(14) In mortar and in brick.—It has been questioned whether the Egyptians used brick as a material manner of service in the field: all their service, wherein they made them serve, was with rigour.

(18) And the king of Egypt spake to the Hebrew midwives, of which the name of the one was Shiphrah, and the name of the other Puah: (16) and he said, When ye do the office of a midwife to the Hebrew women, and see them upon the stools; if it be a son, then ye shall kill him: but if it be a daughter, then she shall live. (19) But the midwives feared God, and did not as the king of Egypt commanded them, but saved the men children alive.

EXODUS, I.

The Command disobeyed.

for building. No doubt temples, palaces, and pyramids were ordinarily of stone; but the employment of brick for walls, fortresses, and houses, especially in the Delta, is well attested. (See the Quarterly Statement of the Palestine Exploration Fund for July, 1880, pp. 137, 139, 143, &c.) Pyramids, too, were sometimes of brick (Herod. ii. 130). The manufacture of bricks by foreigners, employed (like the Israelites) as public slaves, is represented by the kings upon their monuments.

All manner of service in the field.—Josephus speaks of their being employed to dig canals (Ant. Jud. ii. 9, § 1), and there is a trace in Deut. xi. 10 of other labours connected with irrigation having been devolved on them. Such labours, under the hot sun of Egypt, are exhausting and dangerous to health.

And all their service . . . was with rigour. Rather, besides all their other service, which they made serve with rigour.

(18) The Hebrew midwives.—Or the midwives of the Hebrew women (τὰς Ἰσραήλ τὰς Ἰσραήλ, LXX.). The Hebrew construction admits of either rendering. In favour of the midwives being Egyptians is the consideration that the Pharaoh would scarcely have expected Hebrew women to help him in the extermination of the Hebrew race (Kalisch); against it is the Semitic character of the names—Shiphrah, beautiful, and Puah, one who cries out—and also the likelihood that a numerous and peculiar people, like the Hebrews, would have accomplices of their own race.

(19) Upon the stools. Literally, upon the two stones. It has been suggested that a seat corresponding to the modern kursee chilidah is meant. This is a "chair of a peculiar form," upon which in modern Egypt the woman is seated during parturition. (See Lane, Modern Egyptians, vol. iii. p. 142.) But it does not appear that this seat is composed of "two stones;" nor is there any distinct evidence of its employment at the time of child-birth in ancient Egypt. The enumeration of Hirsch—banim for dominium, is very tempting. This will give the sense, "When ye look upon the children.

(17) The midwives feared God. The midwives, whether Hebrews or Egyptians, believed in a God who would punish wrongdoing, and therefore resolved not to obey the Pharaoh.

(19) The Hebrew women are not as the Egyptian women. This was probably true; but it was not the whole truth. Though the midwives had the courage to disobey the king, they had not "the courage of their convictions," and were afraid to confess their real motive. So they took refuge in a half truth, and pretended that what really occurred in some cases only was a general occurrence. It is a fact, that in the East parturition is often so short a process that the attendance of a midwife is dispensed with.

(20) Therefore God dealt well with the midwives. Heb., and God dealt well, &c. The reason is stated in verse 21. It was not because they equivocated and deceived the king, but because they feared God sufficiently to disobey the king, and run the risk of discovery. If they had been discovered, their life would have paid the forfeit.

(22) He made them houses. God rewarded those who had showed tenderness to young children, by giving them children of their own, who grew up, and became in their turn fathers and mothers of families. There is no indication that the "houses" spoken of were Hebrew ones.

(23) Every son that is born. The LXX. add "to the Hebrews," but without any necessity, since the context shows that only Hebrew children are meant. Ye shall cast into the river. Infanticide, so shocking to Christians, has prevailed widely at different times and places, and been regarded as a trivial matter. In Sparta, the State decided which children should live and which should die. At Athens a law of Solon left the decision to the mothers. At Rome, the rule was that infants were made away with, unless the father interposed, and declared it to be his wish that a particular child should be brought up. The Syrians offered unwelcome children in sacrifice to Moloch; the CARTHAGINIANS to Melkarth. In China infanticide is said to be a common practice at the present day. Heathen nations do not generally regard human life as sacred. On the contrary, they hold that considerations of expediency justify the sweeping away of any life that inconveniences the State. Hence infanticide is introduced by Plato into his model republic (Rep. v. 9). Almost all ancient nations viewed the massacre of prisoners taken in war as allowable. The Spartan crypteia was a system of licensed murder. The condemnation to death of all male Hebrew children by Pharaoh is thus in no respect improbable. On the other hand, the mode of the death presents difficulties. For, first, the Nile was viewed as a god; and to fill it with corpses would, one might have supposed, have been regarded as a pollution. Secondly, the Nile water was the only water drunk; and sanitary considerations might thus have been expected to have pre-people, saying, Every son that is born ye shall cast into the river, and every daughter ye shall save alive.

CHAPTER II.—(1) And there went a man of the house of Levi, and took to wife a daughter of Levi. (2) And the woman conceived, and bare a son; and when she saw him that he was a goodly child, she hid him three months. (3) And when she could not longer hide him, she took for him an ark of bulrushes, and daubed it with slime and with pitch, and put the child therein; and she laid it in the flags by the river's brink. (4) And his sister stood afar off, to wit what would be done to him. (5) And the daughter of Pharaoh came down to wash herself at the river; and her maidens walked along by the river's side; and when she saw the ark among the flags, she sent her maid to fetch it. (6) And when she had opened it, she saw the child: and, behold, the babe wept. And she had compassion on him, and said, This is one of the Hebrews' children.

vented the edict. Perhaps, however, the children were viewed as offerings to the Nile, or to Savak, the crocodile-headed god, of whom each crocodile was an emblem. At any rate, as the Nile swarmed with crocodiles throughout its whole course, the bodies were tolerably sure to be devoured before they became patents.

II. THE BIRTH, EDUCATION, AND EARLY LIFE OF MOSES.

(1) There went.—Comp. Gen. xxxv. 22; Hosea i. 3. The expression is idiomatic, and has no special force.

A man of the house of Levi.—Note the extreme simplicity of this announcement; and compare it with the elaborate legends wherewith Oriental religions commonly surrounded the birth of those who were considered their founders, as Thoth, Zoroaster, Orphans. Even the name of the man is here omitted as unimportant. It is difficult to conceive any one but Moses making such an omission.

A daughter of Levi—i.e., a woman of the same tribe as himself, a descendent of Levi—not a daughter in the literal sense, which the chronology makes impossible.

(3) When she saw him that he was a goodly child.—St. Stephen says, that Moses was "comely before God"—κατά τούς γόνις (Acts vii. 28). Thagus Pom- pucius spoke of him as recommended by the beauty of his personal appearance (op. Justin, Hist. Philipp. xxxvi. 2). His infantine "goodliness" intensified the desire of his mother to save his life, but must not be regarded as the main cause of her anxiety.

She hid him three months.—As long as she could hope to conceal him effectually. It must be remembered that Egyptians were mixed up with Israelites in Goshen, and that each Hebrew household would be subjected to espionage from the time of the issue of the edict.

(4) An ark of bulrushes.—Literally, a chest of the papyrus plant. The words used are both of Egyptian origin. Tob, tebu, or tebat, is a "box" or chest in Egyptian, and is well Hebraised by tebah, or, as it is here vocalised, dyebah. The papyrus plant was in Egyptian kaam, as in modern Coptic, whence probably the Hebrew gimel. It was a material frequently used by the Egyptians for boats and even larger vessels (Isa. xviii. 2; Theophrast. Hist. Plant. iv. 8, § 4; Plin. ii. 11, xi. 11).

Slime and pitch. By "slime" seems to be meant bitumen, or mineral pitch, as in Gen. xi. 3; by "pitch" (zaphath), the ordinary vegetable pitch of commerce. Mineral pitch, though not a product of Egypt, was imported into the country from Mesopotamia, and was largely used for embalming (Brugsch, History of Egypt, vol. i. p. 361).

In the flags.—A rank aquatic vegetation abounds on the Lower Nile, and in all the back-waters and marshy tracts connected with it. Jochebed placed her child "in the flags," that the ark might not float away down the river, and so be lost to her sight. The word used for "flags"—σφίκη—seems to be a Hebraised form of τυφί, a common Egyptian word, having this sense.

(5) His sister. Presumably Miriam, the only sister of Moses mentioned elsewhere (chap. xv. 20, 21; Num. xxvi. 59). To have taken the part which is assigned her in this chapter, she must have been a girl of some fourteen or fifteen years of age, and possessed of much quickness and intelligence.

The daughter of Pharaoh came down to wash herself.—This would be quite in accordance with Egyptian ideas. Women were allowed great liberty in Egypt, and moved about much as they pleased. Cleanliness was especially regarded; and the Nile water was considered healthy and fruitifying (Strab. xv. p. 685). The princess would, of course, seek a part of the river which was reserved for females. Probably Jochebed knew where she was accustomed to bathe.

Her maidens.—As a princess, she was, of course, accompanied by a number of female attendants (μετάρρημα). Even ordinary Egyptian ladies seem to have been attended at the bath by four or five such persons. One of them was, however, more especially her waiting-woman (ημαν), and to her the princess addressed herself.

When she had opened it.—The princess opened the ark herself, perhaps suspecting what was inside, perhaps out of mere curiosity.

The babe (rather, the boy) wept. Through hunger, or cold, or perhaps general discomfort. An ark of bulrushes could not have been a very pleasant cradle.

She had compassion on him. The babe's tears moved her to pity; and her pity prompted her to save it. She must have shown some sign of her intention—perhaps by taking the child from the ark and fondling it—before Miriam could have ventured to make her suggestion. (See the next verse.)

This is one of the Hebrews' children. The circumstances spoke for themselves. No mother would have exposed such a "goodly child" (verse 2) to so sad a death but one with whom it was a necessity.
dren. (7) Then said his sister to Pharaoh's daughter, Shall I go and call to thee a nurse of the Hebrew women, that she may nurse the child for thee? (8) And Pharaoh's daughter said to her, Go. And the maid went and called the child's mother. (9) And Pharaoh's daughter said unto her, Take this child away, and nurse it for me, and I will give thee thy wages. And the woman took the child, and nursed it. (10) And the child grew, and she brought him unto Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son. And she called his name Moses: and she said, Because I drew him out of the water.

(11) And it came to pass in those days, when Moses was grown, that he went out unto his brethren, and looked on their burdens: and he spied an Egyptian smiting an Hebrew, one of his brethren. (12) And he looked this way and that way, and when he saw that there was no man, he slew the Egyptian.
and hid him in the sand. (13) And when he went out the second day, behold, two men of the Hebrews strove together; and he said to him that did the wrong, Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow? (14) And he said, Who made thee a prince and a judge over us? intendest thou to kill me, as thou killest the Egyptian? And Moses feared, and said, Surely this thing is known. (15) Now when Pharaoh heard this thing, he sought to slay Moses. But Moses fled from the face of Pharaoh, and dwelt in the land of Midian; and he sat down by a well. (16) Now the 2 priest of Midian had seven daughters: and they came and drew water, and filled the troughs to water their father’s flock. (17) And the shepherds came and drove them away: but Moses stood up and helped them, and watered their flock. (18) And when they came to Reuel their father, he said, How is it that ye are come so soon to day? (19) And they said, An Egyptian delivered us out of the hand of the shepherds, and also drew water enough for us, and watered the flock. (20) And he said unto his daughters, And where is he? why is it that ye have left the man? call him, that he it out of his power to do anything towards alleviating the sufferings of his brethren for forty years.

Hid him in the sand.—To the east of the Delta the sand creeps up close to the cultivated grounds. There are even patches of it within the Delta itself. Moses naturally remembered that he dug the grave “in the sand.” Any other writer would probably have said “in the ground.”

(13) The second day—i.e., the next day.

Him that did the wrong.—Heb., the wicked one. Our version follows the LXX.

Wherefore smitest thou thy fellow?—Comp. Acts vii. 26, where the words of Moses are reported somewhat differently. “Sirs, ye are brethren: why do ye wrong one to another?” In either case there was no offensive assumption of authority. But the wrong-doer took offence, nevertheless.

(14) Who made thee a prince and a judge over us?—As the reputed son of a princess, Moses would be in some sort a “prince.” But no one had given him jurisdiction over the Hebrews. He had not really interfered as one who claimed authority, but as any man of position and education naturally interferes to stop a quarrel.

Intendest thou to kill me?—Here is the sting of the rejoinder: here was the assumption of authority—not in the interposition of to-day, but in the blow of yesterday. That fatal error hid Moses open to attack, and deprived him of the influence as a peacemaker which he might otherwise have exercised over his countrymen.

Surely this thing is known.—We are not told how the “thing” came to be known. “Murder will out,” says the English proverb. Perhaps, though Moses thought himself unnoticed, some Egyptian had seen the deed. Perhaps the man whom he had avenged had told the tale.

(15) When Pharaoh heard . . . he sought to slay Moses.—Naturally. The administration of justice was one of the chief duties of the royal office; and the crime committed by Moses was one to be punished by death. There was nothing to reduce it from murder to manslaughter. And the motives which extenuate it in the eyes of moderns—patriotic zeal and hatred of oppression—would not have commanded the sympathies of a Pharaoh.

Moses fled.—Or, had fled. Moses would fly as soon as he found his act was known. He fled “at the saying” of the lamanite (Acts vii. 20). When Pharaoh sought for him, he was gone.

Dwelt in the land of Midian—i.e., “Was led to make Midian his home,” under circumstances about to be related. The Midian of this book seems to be the south-eastern portion of the Sinaitic peninsula, not the opposite Arabian coast, where were the main settlements of the nation.

Sat down by a well.—Rather, the well. There must have been one principal well in these parts, copious, and so generally resorted to. Moses fixed his temporary abode in its neighbourhood.

(16) The priest of Midian.—Reuel may have been both “priest” and “prince,” like Melchizedek (Gen. xiv. 18); but there is no reason to doubt that he is here called “priest.” In chap. xviii. 12, Jethro is represented as exercising priestly functions. The Midianites, descendants of Abraham by Keturah, worshipped the true God, and seem to have been at this time a religious people. The name Reuel, or Raguel, means “friend of God.” Jethro’s sacrifices were “for God,” and Aaron and the elders eat bread with him “before God.”

They came and drew water.—Comp. Gen. xxix. 9. According to Oriental ideas, there is nothing derogatory in the daughters of a chief so acting.

The shepherds came.—Those of the neighbourhood. The rule of the desert is that those who come to a well take their turns in the use of the water in the order of their arrival. But these rude shepherds declined to wait for their turn. It appears later on, by the question of Reuel, “How is it that ye are come so soon to-day?” that this rude and unfair conduct of the shepherds was habitual.

Moses stood up and helped them.—Moses is again the champion of the oppressed, but has learnt wisdom by the past, and uses no unnecessary violence. His air and manner intimidated the wrong-doers, and they allowed the maidens’ sheep to be watered first.

(17) An Egyptian.—So they concluded from his dress and appearance, perhaps even from his speech. It would be natural for them to make the mistake, and for Moses to remember it. Any other author would probably have said, “a man,” or “a stranger.”

And also drew water enough.—The shepherds had consumed some of the maidens’ water before Moses’s interference, so that he had to draw more for them. —another “little trait,” which speaks for the Mosaic authorship.

(18) That he may eat bread.—Arab hospitality was offended that the stranger had not been invited into the tent to partake of the evening meal. The feeling of the modern Bedouin would be the same.

197
may eat bread. (21) And Moses was content to dwell with the man; and he gave Moses Zipporah his daughter. (22) And she bare him a son, and he called his name Gershom: for he said, I have been a stranger in a strange land.

(23) It came to pass in process of time, that the king of Egypt died: and the children of Israel sighed by reason of the bondage, and they cried, and their cry came up unto God by reason of the bondage. (24) And God heard their groaning; and God remembered his covenant with Abraham, with Isaac, and with Jacob. (25) And God looked upon the children of Israel, and God said, I have heard them.

CHAPTER III.—(1) Now Moses kept the flock of Jethro his father in law, the priest of Midian: and he led the flock to the backside of the desert, and came to the mountain of God, even to Horeb. (2) And the angel of the Lord appeared unto him in a flaming fire out of the midst of a bush: and he looked, and, behold, the bush burned with fire, and the bush was not consumed. (3) And Moses said, I will now turn aside, and see this great sight, why the bush is not burnt. (4) And when the Lord saw that he turned aside to see, God called unto him out of the midst of the bush, and said, Moses, Moses. And he said, Here am I. (5) And he said, Draw not nigh

(21) Moses was content to dwell with the man.—Reuel must have been so pleased with the manner and appearance of Moses that he invited him to take service with him—perhaps to share his tent. Moses consented, and in course of time took to wife Zipporah, one of Reuel’s daughters. Marriage with the Midianites was allowed, even under the Law. It has been conjectured that Reuel might have communicated to Moses traditions or even documents concerning their common ancestor, Abraham, and his family. But there is nothing to indicate the use of letters at this early date by the Midianites.

(22) Gershom.—Almost certainly from ger, “a stranger,” and shem, “there.” So Jerome, who translates it advena ibi. (Comp. Josephus and the LXX., who write the name Gerem.)

(23) In process of time.—Heb., in those many days. As Moses was now eighty years old (chap. vii. 7), and only forty when he quitted Egypt, the Pharaoh from whom he fled must have reigned above forty years. Between the commencement of the eighteenth and the close of the nineteenth dynasty, two kings only seem to have reigned so long as this—Thothmes III. and Rameses II. Our choice of the Pharaoh from whom Moses fled thus lies between these two.

The children of Israel sighed.—Or, “groaned.” They had perhaps expected that a new king would initiate a new policy, or, at any rate, signalise his accession by a remission of burdens. But the new monarch did neither.

Their cry came up unto God.—“Exceeding bitter cries” always find their way to the ears of God. The existing oppression was such that Israel cried to God as they had never cried before, and so moved Him to have compassion on them. The miraculous action, begun in chap. iii., is the result of the cries and groans here mentioned.

III.

(1) Moses kept the flock.—The natural occupation of one who had thrown in his lot with the Midianites.

Jethro, his father-in-law.—Rather, his relation by marriage. The word is one of very wide use, corresponding with the Latin affinis. It is even applied to a husband, as in chap. iv. 25. The supposition that it means “father-in-law” has led to the identification of Jethro with Reuel, which is very unlikely. He was more probably Reuel’s son, and Moses’s brother-in-law. His father having died, he succeeded to his father’s position, and was at once priest and sheikh of the tribe.

To the backside of the desert.—Heb., behind the desert—i.e., to the fertile tract which lay behind the sandy plain stretching from the Sinaitic range to the shore of the Katalitic gulf.

The mountain of God—i.e., Sinai. See chap. xviii. 5; xix. 2–23, &c.

Even Horeb.—Rather, towards Horeb, or Horeb way. Horeb seems to have been the name of the entire mountain region; Sinai of the group or mass known now as Jebel Musa.

The angel of the Lord.—Heb., an angel of Jehovah. In verse 4 the angel is called both “Jehovah” and “Elohim,” whence it is concluded, with reason, that it was the Second Person of the Trinity who appeared to Moses.

Out of the midst of a bush.—Literally, out of the midst of the acacia. As the seneh, or acacia, is very common in the Sinaitic region, we can scarcely suppose that a special tree, growing alone, is intended. Probably the article is one of reference, and the meaning is, “the bush of which you have all heard.” (Comp. John iii. 24.)

(3) I will now turn aside.—A minute touch, indicating that Moses is the writer. He remembers that the bush did not grow on the track which he was pursuing, but lay off it, and that he had to “turn aside,” in order to make his inspection.

This great sight.—The phenomenon was strange and unusual—worthy of note, whatever might be the cause.

(4) When the Lord saw... God called.—Heb., When Jehovah saw, Elohim called. The German theory of two authors of Exodus, one Jehovahistic and the other Elohistic, is completely refuted by this passage; for it is impossible to ascribe one clause of a sentence to one author, and the next to another. If originally the same term had been used in both places, a reviser would not have altered one without altering both.

Moses, Moses.—Comp. Gen. xxvi. 11; 1 Sam. iii. 10; and Acts ix. 4. The repetition marks extreme urgency.

(5) Put off thy shoes.—Rather, thy sandals. It is doubtful whether shoes were known at this early hither; it put off thy shoes from off thy feet, for the place whereon thou standest is holy ground. (6) Moreover he said, I am the God of thy father, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob. And Moses hid his face; for he was afraid to look upon God.

(7) And the Lord said, I have surely seen the affliction of my people which are in Egypt, and have heard their cry by reason of their taskmasters; for I know their sorrows; (8) and I am come down to deliver them out of the hand of the Egyptians, and to bring them up out of that land unto a good land and a large, unto a land flowing with milk and honey; unto the place of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites. (9) Now therefore, behold, the cry of the children of Israel is come unto me: and I have also seen the oppression wherewith the Egyptians oppress them. (10) Come now therefore, and I will send thee unto Pharaoh, that thou mayest bring forth my people the children of Israel out of Egypt.

(11) And Moses said unto God, Who am I, that I should go unto Pharaoh, and that I should bring forth the children of Israel out of Egypt? (12) And he said, Certainly I will be with thee; and this shall be a token unto thee, that I have sent thee: When thou hast brought forth the people out of Egypt, ye shall serve God upon this mountain.

A good land and a large.—The land promised to Abraham (Gen. xv, 13) well deserves this description. Besides Philistia, and Palestine on both sides of the Jordan, it included almost the whole of Syria from Galilee on the south, to Ammon, Taurus, and the Enpiirates on the north and north-east. This tract of country is 450 miles long, and from sixty to a hundred and twenty miles broad. Its area is not much less than 50,000 square miles. Although some parts are unproductive, it is, on the whole, a region of great fertility, quite capable of forming the seat of a powerful empire.

A land flowing with milk and honey.—This expression, here used for the first time, was already, it is probable, a proverbial one, denoting generally, richness and fertility. (See Num. xiii. 27.)

The Canaanites . . . .—See the comment on Gen. (chap. x. 15—17; chap. xiii. 7.)

(13) Who am I, that I should go?—The men most fit for great missions are apt to deem themselves unfit. When God called Jeremiah to be a prophet, his reply was, “O Lord God! Behold, I cannot speak, for I am a child” (Jer. i. 6). St. Ambrose fought hard to escape being made Archbishop of Milan. Augustine was both to undertake the mission to England. Anselm was with difficulty persuaded to accept the headship of our Church in the evil days of Rufus. The first impression of a fit man selected for a high post generally is, “Who am I?” In Moses’s case, though there were some manifest grounds of fitness—e.g., his Egyptian training and learning, his familiarity with the court, his knowledge of both nations and both languages—yet, on the other hand, there were certain very marked (apparent) disqualifications. Forty years of exile, and of a shepherd’s life had at once unfit him for dealing with a court, and made him a stranger to his brethren. Want of eloquence seemed to be a fatal defect in one who must work mainly by persuasion. Even his age (eighty) might well have seemed to him unsuitable.

(12) Certainly I will be with thee. — Heb., since I will be with thee. An answer addressed not to the thing said, but to the thing meant. Moses meant to urge that he was unfit for the mission. God’s reply is, “Not unfit, since I will be with thee.” I will supply all thy defects, make good all thy shortcomings. “My strength is made perfect in weakness.”
(13) And Moses said unto God, Behold, when I come unto the children of Israel, and shall say unto them, The God of your fathers hath sent me unto you; and they shall say to me, What is his name? what shall I say unto them?

(14) And God said unto Moses, I AM THAT I AM: and he said, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, I AM hath sent me unto you.

(15) And God said moreover unto Moses, Thus shalt thou say unto the children of Israel, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath sent me unto you: this is my name for ever, and this is my memorial unto all generations.

(16) Go, and gather the elders of Israel together, and say unto them, The Lord God of your fathers, the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob, appeared unto me, saying, I have surely visited you, and seen that which is done to you in Egypt: (17) and I have said, I will bring you up out of the affliction of Egypt unto the land of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Perizzites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, unto a land flowing with milk and honey. (18) And they shall hearken to thy voice: and thou shalt come, thou and the elders of Israel, unto the king of Egypt, and ye shall say unto him, The Lord God of the Hebrews hath met with us: and now let us go, we beseech thee, three days' journey into the wilderness, that we may sacrifice to the Lord our God.

This shall be a token unto thee.—It is in accordance with the Divine economy to give men "tokens," which are future, and appeal to faith only. (Comp. 1 Sam. ii. 94; 2 Kings xix. 27.)

(13) What is his name?—In Egypt, and wherever polytheism prevailed, every god had, as a matter of course, a name. Among the Israelites hitherto God had been known only by titles, as El or Elohim, "the Lofty One;" Shaddai, "the Powerful;" Jehovah, "the Existent." These titles were used with some perception of their meaning; no one of them had as yet passed into a proper name. Moses, imagining that the people might have become so far Egyptianised as to be no longer content with this state of things, asks God by what name he shall speak of Him to them. Who shall he say has appeared to him?

(14) I AM THAT I AM.—It is generally assumed that this is given to Moses as the full name of God. But perhaps it is rather a deep and mysterious statement of His nature. "I am that which I am." My nature, i.e., cannot be declared in words, cannot be conceived by human thought. There is no place in such a context that my whole ineradicable nature is implied in my existence. I exist, as nothing else does—necessarily, eternally, really. If I am to give myself a name expressive of my nature, so far as language can be, let me be called "I AM.

Tell them I AM hath sent me unto you.—I AM, assumed as a name, implies (1) an existence different from all other existence. "I am, and there is none beside me" (Isa. xl. 6); (2) an existence out of time, with which time has nothing to do (John viii. 58); (3), an existence that is real, all other being shadowy; (4) an independent and unconditioned existence, from which all other is derived, and on which it is dependent.

(15) The Lord God of your fathers.—Heb., Jehovah, God of your fathers. The "I AM" of the preceding verse (‘ochah) is modified here into Jhwh, or Jehovah, by a substitution of the third person for the first. The meaning of the name remains the same.

This is my name for ever.—Jehovah is the predominant name of God throughout the rest of the Old Testament. (On the meaning of the name see N. on Gen. ii. 4.) Rended by the LXX. κόπας, ["Lord,"] the name appears under that form everywhere throughout the Authorised Version printed in capitals. It does not occur in the New Testament, since "Lord" takes its place. An equivalent of the name occurs, however, frequently in the Revelation of St. John, where God appears as "He which is, and which was, and which is to come" (Rev. i. 4, 8, iv. 8, xi. 17, xvi. 5). Necessary, self-sustained, independent, eternal existence, must always be of his essence.

My memorial—i.e., the designation by which I shall be remembered.

(16) The elders of Israel.—Not so much the old men generally, as the rulers—those who bore authority over the rest—men of considerable age, no doubt, for the most part. Rosenmüller reasonably concludes from this direction that the Hebrews, even during the oppression, enjoyed some kind of internal organisation and native government (Schol. in Exod. p. 58).

I have surely visited.—Heb., Visiting, I have visited. (Comp. Gen. i. 24.)

(17) I have said.—See verse 8. Perhaps there is also a reference to the promise made to Abraham (Gen. xv. 14).

The affliction of Egypt.—Comp. Gen. xv. 13; Exod. i. 11, 12; iii. 7.

(18) They shall hearken.—The pronoun "they" refers to "the elders" of verse 16. For the fulfilment of the promise, see chap. iv. 29—31. The elders appear to have been persuaded easily, and at once.

Thou and the elders.—We are not told in chap. v. that the elders did present themselves before Pharaoh; but it is possible that they may have done so. Or Moses and Aaron, who spoke in their name, and by their authority, may have been regarded as sufficiently representing them.

The Lord God of the Hebrews hath met with us.—Heb., Jehovah, the God of the Hebrews. Pharaoh would readily comprehend this statement. He would quite understand that the Hebrews, being of a different race from the Egyptians, had a God of their own, and that this God would from time to time give intimations to them of His will. Such intimations were supposed to be given to the Egyptian kings occasionally by their gods.

Three days' journey.—The necessity for withdrawing to so great a distance arose from that remarkable peculiarity in the Egyptian religion, the worship of animals. Cows, or at any rate, white cows, were sacred throughout the whole of Egypt, and to kill them was regarded as a crime of the deepest dye. Sheep were sacred to the inhabitants of one nome or canton, goats to those of another (Herod. ii. 42). Unless the Hebrews retired to a place where there were no Egyptians, they would be unable to perform their sacred rites without danger of disturbance, and even bloodshed. (See below, chap. viii. 26.)

The wilderness.—"The wilderness" to those who dwelt in Goshen was the broad sandy and rocky tract which intervened between Egypt and Palestine—the modern El-Tch—a desert reckoned on three days' journey across (Herod. iii. 5). It is "a vast limestone plateau of irregular surface, projecting wedge-fashion into the peninsula of Sinai, just as Sinai itself projects into the Red Sea. It terminates in a long cliff or escarpment, steep and abrupt on the south-western side, gradually falling away towards the south-east."—(Our Work in Palestine, p. 275.)

That we may sacrifice.—It is idle to speculate whether, if Pharaoh had granted the request, the Israelites would have returned to Egypt after sacrificing. God knew that he would not grant it.

I am sure.—Heb. Had known, which is more suitable, since it is God who speaks, and to Him the future is known with as absolute a certainty as the past.

No, not by a mighty hand.—Rather, not even under a mighty hand (ie quidem valde manu consti-gabae, Rosemuller). Pharaoh, even when chastised by My mighty hand, will not voluntarily permit of your departure (see chap. xiv. 1—23).

I will stretch out my hand.—Hands are stretched out to help and save. God promises more here than He had promised before (verse 12). He shows how He will "be with." Moses. He will lend him miraculous aid, performing in his behalf "all his wonders," and with them "smiting the Egyptians."

Every woman shall borrow.—Rather, shall ask (sinšrē, LXX.; postulant, Valg.). That there was really much of "borrowing," appears from chap. xii. 33—36, where we find that the "jewels" were not asked for until the very moment of departure, when the Israelites were being "thrust forth," and the people were urgent on them to be gone, certainly neither expecting nor wishing to see them again. Asking for presents is a common practice in the East, and persons who were quitting their homes to set out on a long journey through a strange country would have abundant excuse, if any had been needed, for soliciting aid from their rich neighbours.

Of her neighbour.—Egyptians were mingled with the Israelites in Goshen, as we see by chap. ii. 3.

Upon your own.—The Egyptian men of the Rameside period wore gold and silver ornaments almost as freely as the women. Their ornaments included armlets, bracelets, anklets, and collars.

Ye shall spoil, i.e., It shall be as if ye had conquered the Egyptians, and spoiled them. Compare the promise made to Abraham (Gen. xv. 14); and for the fulfilment, see below (chap. xii. 35, 36).

IV.

(1) Behold.—Some render the word here used by "perhaps" (LXX., Aben-Ezra, Saadia, &c.); but it does not appear to have anywhere this meaning. Moses meant to express a positive conviction that he would not be listened to. His faith was weak.

They will say, The Lord hath not appeared.—It is very probable that the people would have said this if Moses had not had any credentials to produce. It is even possible that they did say it. There had been no appearance of Jehovah to any one for above four hundred years, and they might well think that the age of miracles was past. Miracles cluster around certain crises in God's dealings with man, ceasing altogether between one crisis and another. They were suspended for about 500 years between the time of Daniel and the appearance of the angel to Zacharias.

A rod.—Most commentators regard the "rod" of Moses as his shepherd's crook, and this is certainly possible; but the etymology of the word employed seems rather to point to an ordinary staff, or walking-stick. Egyptians of rank usually carried long bâtons; and one suggestion is, that the rod of Moses was "that which he had been accustomed to carry as the son of Pharaoh's daughter." But even if this was still in his possession after forty years of exile, he is not likely to have taken it with him when he went as a-shepherd. Probably the "rod" was a common staff, such as a shepherd of eighty years old might need for a support.

A serpent.—The word here used (nakhash) is a generic one for a snake of any kind, and tells us nothing as to the species. A different word (tannin) is before it. (4) And the Lord said unto Moses, Put forth thine hand, and take it by the tail. And he put forth his hand, and caught it, and it became a rod in his hand: (5) that they may believe that the Lord God of their fathers, the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob, hath appeared unto thee.

(6) And the Lord said furthermore unto him, Put now thine hand into thy bosom: And he put his hand into his bosom: and when he took it out, behold, his hand was leprous as snow. (7) And he said, Put thine hand into thy bosom again: And he put his hand into his bosom again; and plucked it out of his bosom, and, behold, it was turned again as his other flesh. (8) And it shall come to pass, if they will not believe thee, neither hearken to the voice of the first sign, that they will believe the voice of the latter sign. (9) And it shall come to pass, if they will not believe also these two signs, neither hearken unto thy voice, that thou shalt take of the water of the river, and pour it upon the dry land: and the water which thou takest out of the river shall become blood upon the dry land.

(10) And Moses said unto the Lord, O my Lord, I am not eloquent, neither heretofore, nor since thou hast spoken unto thy servant: but I am slow of speech, and of a slow tongue.

(11) And the Lord said unto him, Who hath made man's mouth? or who used in chap. vii. 10, while nakhash recurs in chap. vii. 15. Tannin is, like nakhash, a generic term. And Moses fled from before it.—It was natural for Moses to remember his alarm, and record it. Any later writer would have passed over so small a circumstance. (See the Introduction, p. 3.)

(4) Take it by the tail.—Those who venture to handle poisonous snakes, like the modern Egyptians and the inhabitants of the coast of Barbary, generally take hold of them by the neck, in which case they are unable to bite. To test the faith and courage of Moses, the command is given him to lay hold of this serpent “by the tail.”

He put forth his hand.—Faith triumphed over instinct. Moses had “fled” from the snake when first he saw it (verse 3). Now he is daring enough to stoop down, put his hand on the creature’s tail, and so lift it up.

It became a rod.—Its real nature returned to it. Once more it was, not a stiffened serpent, but an actual staff, or walking-stick.

(5) That they may believe . . .—These are God’s words to Moses, in continuation of those which form the first portion of the preceding verse. The clause describing the action of Moses in verse 4 is parenthetic. The words give Divine sanction to the view, so strangely combatted of late, that the power of working miracles is given to men, primarily and mainly, for its evidential value, to accrue them as God’s messengers. Without the gift of miracles neither would Moses have persuaded the Israelites, nor would the Apostles have converted the world.

(6) His hand was leprous as snow.—The worst form of leprosy was called by the Greeks aktēn, “the white disease.” When it is fully developed, the whole skin appears glossy white, and every hair is “white like wool” (Celsus, De Re Medica, v. 23, § 12). This form is said to be absolutely incurable. It was probably from the fact of Moses exhibiting a leprous hand that the Egyptians called the Israelites “the lepers,” as related by Manetho (ap. Joseph. contra Ap. i. 26), Chereimon (ibid., l. 32), and others.

(8) The voice of the first sign.—Not “the voice of Moses witnessed to by the first sign” (Rosenmuller), but the voice, which the sign itself might be regarded as uttering. (Comp. Ps. cv. 27, where Moses and Aaron are said to have proclaimed the words of God’s signs.) A miracle speaketh men.

They will believe, i.e., most of them. Accustomed to the tricks of the serpent charmers (see chap. vii. 11 and comment ad loc.), the Israelites might be unmoved by the sight of the first miracle. They were then to be shown the second, which would be much more astonishing to them, having no parallel in their experience. This would persuade the greater number. As some, however, might still doubt, a third sign was provided. God is patient with all reasonable doubt.

(9) Shall become blood.—The verb is repeated in the Hebrew, which intensifies the assertion. The English equivalent of the phrase used would be, “shall assuredly become.” The signs were, no doubt, selected primarily for facility of exhibition; but they may also have been intended to be significant. The change of a rod into a serpent showed that a feasible implement might become a power to chastise and to destroy. That of a healthy into a leprous hand, and the reverse, indicated that Moses’ mission was both to punish and to save; while the change of water into blood suggested—albeit vaguely—the conversion of that peace and prosperity, which Egypt was enjoying, into calamity, suffering, and bloodshed.

(10) I am not eloquent.—Heb. No man of words am I. Moses, still reluctant, raises a new objection. He is not gifted with facility of speech. Words do not come ready to him; perhaps, when they come, he has a difficulty in uttering them. According to a Jewish tradition, he was unable to pronounce the labials, b, f, m, p, v. According to his own expressions at the end of the verse, he was “heavy” or “slow of speech,” and “heavy” or “slow of tongue.”

Neither hast thou spoken.—Heb, neither yesterday, nor the day before. It is a Hebrew idiom to make these words cover past time generally. (See below, chap. v. 7, 8, 14; and comp. Gen. xxxi. 2, 5, and 2 Sam. iii. 17.)

Nor since thou hast spoken.—Converse with God had not cured his defect of utterance, whatever it was. He remained “slow of speech and slow of tongue”—unready, i.e., and hesitant.

Who maketh.—Rather, hath made, maketh the dumb, or deaf, or the seeing, or the blind; have not I the Lord? (12) Now therefore go, and I will be with thy mouth, and teach thee what thou shalt say.

(13) And he said, O my Lord, send, I pray thee, by the hand of him whom thou wilt send.

(14) And the anger of the Lord was kindled against Moses, and he said, Is not Aaron the Levite thy brother? I know that he can speak well. And also, behold, he cometh forth to meet thee: and when he seeth thee, he will be glad in his heart. (15) And thou shalt speak unto him, and put words in his mouth: and I will be with thy mouth, and with his mouth, and will teach you what ye shall do. (16) And he shall be thy spokesman unto the people: and he shall be, even he shall be to thee instead of a mouth, and thou shalt be to him instead of God. (17) And thou shalt take this rod in thine hand, wherewith thou shalt do signs.

(18) And Moses went and returned to Jethro his father in law, and said unto him, Let me go, I pray thee, and return unto my brethren which are in Egypt, and see whether they be yet alive. And Jethro said to Moses, Go in peace.

(19) And the Lord said unto Moses in Midian, Go, return into Egypt: for all the men are dead which sought thy face.
life. (20) And Moses took his wife and his sons, and set them upon an ass, and he returned to the land of Egypt; and Moses took the rod of God in his hand. (21) And the Lord said unto Moses, When thou goest to return into Egypt, see that thou do all those wonders before Pharaoh, which I have put in thine hand: but I will harden his heart, that he shall not let the people go. (22) And thou shalt say unto Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord, Israel is my son, even my firstborn: (23) and I say unto thee, Let my son go, that he may serve me: and if thou refuse to let him go, behold, I will slay thy son, even thy firstborn. (24) And it came to pass by the way in the inn, that the Lord met him, and sought to kill him. (25) Then Zipporah took a sharp stone, and cut off the foreskin of her son, and cast it at his feet, and said, Surely a bloody husband art thou to me. (26) So he let him go: then she said, A bloody husband thou art, because of the circumcision.

All the men which sought thy life.—Not only the Pharaoh (chap. ii. 23), but the kindred of the murdered man, and the officials empowered by the Pharaoh to arrest Moses. As forty years had elapsed since the homicide, this is readily conceivable. (22) His sons.—Only one had been mentioned previously, viz., Gershom (chap. ii. 22), unless we accept the Vulgate addition to that place. But another had been recently born to him. Set them upon an ass.—Heb. upon the ass, i.e., either "upon his ass," or, according to some, "upon asses." The singular of a substantive with the article is sometimes used for the genus (Gen. xvi. 11). He returned.—Rather, set out to return (ἐπὶ τῆς πορείας, LXX.).

The Lord God.—An emphatic phrase. God's endowment of the rod with miraculous power had made it "the rod of God." It was the instrument by means of which most of the plagues and the other miracles were wrought (chap. vii. 20; viii. 6, 17; ix. 23; x. 13; xiv. 16; xvii. 5; Num. xx. 9; &c.). (21) All those wonders.—Not the "three signs" of chap. iii. 3—9, but the "portents" or "wonders" which were to be done before Pharaoh, and which had been alluded to in chap. iii. 20. These were, in the counsel of God, already put into Moses' hand, though their exact nature was as yet unknown to Moses himself.

I will harden his heart.—The hardening of Pharaoh's heart has been the subject of much controversy. It is ascribed to God in this place, and again in chap. vii. 3; ix. 12; x. 20, 27; xiv. 4, 8; to Pharaoh in chap. viii. 15, 32; and ix. 34; to the action of the heart itself in chap. vii. 13, 22; ix. 7 and 35. It is conceivable that these may be simply three forms of speech, and that the actual operation was one and the same in every case. Or, three different modes of operation may be meant. It is in favour of the latter view, that each term has a period during which it is predominant. In the narrative of what happened, the action of the heart is itself predominant in the first period; that of Pharaoh on his heart in the second; that of God in the third. We may suppose that, at first, Pharaoh's nature was simply not impressed, and that then his heart is said to have "hardened itself" or "remained hard;" that after a while, he began to be impressed; but by an effort of his will controlled himself, and determined that he would not yield: thus "hardening his own heart;" finally, that after he had done this twice (chap. viii. 15, 32), God stepped in and "smote him with a spirit of blindness and infatuation," as a judgment upon him (chap. ix. 13), thus, finally, "hardening" him (comp. Rom. ix. 18). This divine action was repeated on three subsequent occasions (chap. x. 20, 27; xiv. 8). Pharaoh's time of probation being past, and God using him as a mere means of showing forth His glory. There is nothing in this contrary to the general teaching of the Scriptures, or to the Divine Perfection.

Israel is my son.—Compare Hosca xi. 1. This tender relation, now first revealed, is not a mere metaphor, meaning "as dear to me as a son," but a reality. The Israel of God enjoys the sonship of adoption by being taken into the True Son, and made one with Him (Rom. viii. 14—17).

My first-born.—Admitted to sonship in the Messiah before the other nations of the earth. (23) I will slay thy son, even thy first-born.—The threat was not made until immediately before the tenth plague (chap. xi. 5). It is not recorded in the words which Moses is here directed to use; but the speech of Moses in chap. xi. is no doubt much abbreviated.

In the inn.—There would not be any "inn," as we understand the word, in the Sinaitic peninsula. Probably there would not even be a caravanserai. Nothing more is meant by μαιλον than a recognised resting-place.

The Lord met him.—The LXX. have ἀγέλος Ἀπολλος, "an angel of the Lord," and so the Targum of Onkelos and the Arabic versions. But the existing Hebrew text is probably correct. God met Moses, i.e., visited him with a sharp attack of illness, which threatened to be fatal. Both he and his wife seem at once to have concluded that the visitation was a punishment, on account of their having neglected to circumcise their new-born son. Perhaps Moses had an intimation from God to that effect.

A sharp stone.—On the use of stone knives by the Egyptian paraschistae see Herod. ii. 86. They were regarded as more pure than metal knives. From Josh. v. ii. it would seem that stone knives were in the early ages commonly employed for circumcision by the Israelites.

At his feet.—Moses' feet, undoubtedly. The action was petulant and reproachful. Zipporah regarded the bloody rites of her husband's religion as cruel and barbarous, and cast the foreskin of her son at his feet, as though he were a Moehc requiring a bloody offering.

A bloody husband.—Heb., a husband of bloods. A husband, i.e., who causes the blood of his children to be shed unnecessarily for some unintelligible reason. (26) So he let him go.—God let Moses go, i.e., allowed him to recover—accepted Zipporah's act as sufficient, albeit tardy, reparation, and spared the life of her husband.
(27) And the Lord said to Aaron, Go into the wilderness to meet Moses. And he went, and met him in the mount of God, and kissed him. (28) And Moses told Aaron all the words of the Lord who had sent him, and all the signs which he had commanded him. (29) And Moses and Aaron went and gathered together all the elders of the children of Israel: (30) and Aaron spake all the words which the Lord had spoken unto Moses, and did the signs in the sight of the people. (31) And the people believed: and when they heard that the Lord had visited the children of Israel, and that he had looked upon their affliction, then they bowed their heads and worshipped.

CHAPTER V.—(1) And afterward Moses and Aaron went in, and told Pharaoh, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Let my people go, that they may hold a feast unto me in the wilderness. (2) And Pharaoh said, Who is the Lord, that I should obey his voice to let Israel go? I know not the Lord, neither will I let Israel go. (3) And they said, "The God Worshipped.—Some think that Moses was the object of the worship; but it is better to regard it as offered to "the Lord," who had "visited" them.

V. FIRST APPLICATION OF MOSES TO PHARAOH, AND INCREASE OF THE OPPRESSION.

(1) Went in.—I heb., went—i.e., left their usual residence, and approached the Court, which, according to the Psalms (Ps. lxxvii. 12, 43), was held at Zion (i.e., Taxis). This was the ordinary residence of Rameses II. and his son Menepthah.

Thus saith the Lord God of Israel.—Heb., Thus has said Jehovah, God of Israel. The Pharaohs claimed to hold direct communications with the Egyptian deities, and could not deny the possibility of the Hebrew leaders holding communications with their God. Menepthah himself—"the probable "Pharaoh of the Exodus"—gave out that he had received a warning from Pthah in the fifth year of his reign (Brugsch, History of Egypt, vol. ii. p. 119; 1st ed.).

That they may hold a feast unto me.—God's entire purpose is not at once revealed to Pharaoh. He is tried with a moderate demand, which he might well have granted. By refusing it he showed himself harsh, unkind, and insensible, so tempting God to lay upon him a greater burden.

In the wilderness—i.e., beyond the frontier, or, at any rate, beyond inhabited Egypt—that the Egyptians might not be driven to fury by seeing animals sacrificed which they regarded as sacred. (See chap. viii. 29, and the comment ad loc.)

(2) Who is the Lord?—Heb., Who is Jehovah? If Jehovah was a name, the use of which had been laid aside, as would seem to have been the case by the later chapters of Genesis, and which was revived by the scene at the burning bush, Pharaoh may very probably not have heard of it.

That I should obey his voice.—The king means to say, that, whoever Jehovah is, He can have no authority over him, as He is not one of his gods. The Egyptians were accustomed to the idea of local gods, and quite expected every nation to have a deity or several deities of its own; but they regarded the power of each as circumscribed, certainly not extending beyond the race or nation to which the god belonged.

The God of the Hebrews.—Moses accepts Pharaoh's view, and does not insist on the authority of Jehovah over Egyptians, but makes an appeal ad misericordiam. He has, at any rate, authority over of the Hebrews hath met with us: let us go, we pray thee, three days journey into the desert, and sacrifice unto the Lord our God; lest he fall upon us with pestilence, or with the sword. (1) And the king of Egypt said unto them, Wherefore do ye, Moses and Aaron, let the people from their works? get you unto your burdens. (5) And Pharaoh said, Behold, the people of the land now are many, and ye make them rest from their burdens. (6) And Pharaoh commanded the same day the taskmasters of the people, and their officers, saying, (7) Ye shall no more give the people straw to make brick, as heretofore: let them go and gather straw for themselves. (8) And the tale of the bricks, which they did make heretofore, ye shall lay upon.

Hebrews; and, having made a requirement, He will be angered if they neglect it. Will not Pharaoh allow them to escape His anger?

With the sword.—Egypt was very open to invasion on its eastern frontier; and the brunt of an invasion in this quarter would fall upon the Hebrews. In the time of the nineteenth dynasty, Hititite incursions were especially feared.

(5) And Pharaoh said.—Moses and Aaron having retired, re infect, Pharaoh turns to the officers of his court and reproaches them with allowing the Hebrews to be idle. They have time to hold meetings (chap. iv. 3), and listen to inflammatory harangues, and dispute leaders to make very inconvenient proposals—why are they not kept closer to their tasks? Some change of system is requisite.

Make them rest.—Rather, “let them rest.”

(6) Taskmasters and officers.—Three grades of officials are mentioned as employed in superintending the forced labours of the Hebrews—(1) “lords of service” (sarey nassim), in chap. i. 11; (2) “taskmasters” (nogshim), here and in verses 10, 13, 14; and (3) “officers” —literally, scribes (shoshirim), here and in verses 11–21. The “lords of service” were probably a small body who exercised a general superintendence, and determined the works in which the Hebrews should be employed. They were, no doubt, native Egyptians. The nogshim, or “taskmasters,” were their subordinates—Egyptians like themselves—comparatively numerous, and serving as intermediaries between the “lords” and the “officers.” These last were Hebrews, and engaged mainly in keeping the tale of the bricks, and seeing that the proper number was reached. Such an organisation is consonant with all that we know of the Egyptian garrison system, which was bureau- cratic and complex, involving in every department the employment of several grades of officials.

(7) Straw to make brick.—The use of crude brick was general in Egypt for dwelling-houses, tombs, and ordinary buildings, the walls of towns, fortresses, and the sacred enclosures of temples, and for all purposes where stone was not required, which last was nearly confined to temples, mausoleums, and reservoirs (Wilkinson, in Rawlinson’s Herodotes, vol. ii. p. 213).

These crude bricks were always made of the mud of the Nile, mixed with chopped straw, which served to bind them together (Rosellini, Monumenti Civiili, vol. ii. p. 252).

Let them go and gather straw.—It has been estimated that this requirement would “more than double” the people’s toils (Can. Cook). They would have to disperse themselves over the harvest fields, often lying at a considerable distance from the brick-fields, to detach the straw from the soil, gather it into bundles, and convey it to the scene of their ordinary labours. Having done this they were then required to complete the ordinary “tale.”

(9) Let them not regard vain words.—Or, false words. The reference is to the promises of deliverance wherewith Moses and Aaron had raised the people’s hopes (chap. iv. 30). Pharaoh supposed these to be “vain words,” as Sennacherib did those spoken by Hezekiah (2 Kings xviii. 20).

(12) Stubble instead of straw.—Heb. stubble for the straw. Reaping in Egypt was effected by cutting off the ears only from the stalks, and thus a very tall stubble was left in the fields. This appears not to have been valued by the cultivators, and whoever wished was allowed to collect it. After collecting it, and bringing it to the brick-fields in bundles, they would have to chop it small before it would be fit for use.

The taskmasters hasted them.—The Egyptian monuments show us foreign labourers engaged in brick-making under Egyptian overseers, or “taskmasters,” who are armed with sticks, and “haste” the labourers whenever they cease work for the purpose of resting themselves. The overseers are represented as continually saying to the workpeople, “Work without faintness.” (See Wilkinson, in Rawlinson’s Herodotes, vol. ii. p. 214).

As when there was straw.—Heb., as when there was the straw—i.e., as when the straw was furnished to you.

(14) The officers . . . were beaten.—This is the usual practice in the East. When any requisition is made on a town or a village, or any body of persons, the procuring of it is left to the “head men,” who are alone children of Israel, which Pharaoh's taskmasters had set over them, were beaten, and demanded, Wherefore have ye not fulfilled your task in making brick both yesterday and to day, as heretofore?
The Officers' Remonstrance.

EXODUS, VI.

Moses Complains to God.

(15) Then the officers of the children of Israel came and cried unto Pharaoh, saying, Wherefore dealest thou thus with thy servants? (16) There is no straw given unto thy servants, and they say to us, Make brick; and behold, thy servants are beaten; but the fault is in thine own people. (17) But he said, Ye are idle, ye are idle; therefore ye say, Let us go and do sacrifice to the Lord. (18) Go therefore now, and work; for there shall no straw be given you, yet shall ye deliver the tale of bricks. (19) And the officers of the children of Israel did see that they were in evil case, after it was said, Ye shall not minish ought from your bricks of your daily task.

In the eyes.—Mixed metaphors occur in all languages, and may generally be accounted for by the literal meaning of some familiar expression having come to be forgotten. In Heb., hippâqîâh, "in the face of," and beqyéqîyâh, "in the eyes of," were mere prepositions, having the force of "before," "with," "in regard to."

A sword...to slay us.—This was not, perhaps, mere Oriental hyperbole. The officers may have feared that their inability to enforce the Pharaoh's impracticable demands would ultimately lead to their execution.

(20) And they met Moses and Aaron, who stood in the way, as they came forth from Pharaoh: (21) And they said unto them, The Lord look upon you, and judge; because ye have made our savour to be abhorred in the eyes of Pharaoh, and in the eyes of his servants, to put a sword in their hand to slay us. (22) And Moses returned unto the Lord, and said, Lord, wherefore hast thou so evil entreated this people? why is it that thou hast sent me? (23) For since I came to Pharaoh to speak in thy name, he hath done evil to this people; neither hath thou delivered thy people at all.

CHAPTER VI.—(1) Then the Lord said unto Moses, Now shalt thou see what I will do to Pharaoh: for with a strong hand shall he let them go, and with a strong hand shall he drive them out of his land. (2) And God spake unto Moses, and said unto him, I am

God's Renewal and Enlargement of His Promises.

(1) Now shalt thou see.—Moses' complaint was that God delayed, and "was slack in concerning His promise." Hitherto He had not "delivered His people at all." The answer, "Now shalt thou see," is an assurance that there will be no more delay; the work is just about to begin, and Moses will behold it. He will then cease to desire delay.

With a strong hand shall he let them go.—Rather, through a strong hand: i.e., through the compulsion which my strong hand will exert on him.
the Lord: (3) and I appeared unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob, by the name of God Almighty, but by my name JEHOVAH was I not known to them. (4) And I have also established my covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land of their pilgrimage, wherein they were strangers. (5) And I have also heard the groaning of the children of Israel, whom the Egyptians keep in bondage; and I have remembered my covenant. (6) Wherefore say unto the children of Israel, I am the Lord, and I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians, and I will rid you out of their bondage, and I will redeem you with a stretched out arm, and with great judgments: (7) and I will take you to me for a people, and I will be to you a God: and ye shall know that I am the Lord your God, which bringeth you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians. (8) And I will bring you in unto the land, concerning the which I did sware to give it to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob; and I will give it you for an heritage: I am the Lord.

(And Moses spake so unto the chil-

Drive them.—Comp. chap. xii. 31—33.
(2) I appeared ... by the name of God Almighty.—This name, “El Shaddai,” is first found in the revelation made of Himself by God to Abraham (Gen. xvii. 1). It is used by Isaac (Gen. xxviii. 3), and repeated in the revelation made to Jacob (Gen. xxxv. 11). Its primary idea is, no doubt, that of “overpowering strength.” (See the comment on Gen. xvii. 1.) The primary idea of “Jehovah” is, on the contrary, that of absolute, eternal, unconditioned, independent existence. Both names were probably of a great antiquity, and widely spread among Semitic races; but, at different times and in different places, special stress was laid on the one or on the other. To the early patriarchs God revealed Himself as “El Shaddai,” because He desired to impress upon them His ability to fulfill the promises which He had made to them; to Moses and Israel generally, at the date of the Exodus, He insisted on His name Jehovah, because they were in the closest contact with polytheism, and had themselves, in many cases, fallen into polytheism (Josh. xxv. 14), against which this Name was a standing protest, since “the Existing” must mean “the Self-Existing,” and so “the Only Existing.” (See Deut. iv. 39: “Jehovah, he is God in heaven above, and upon the earth beneath: there is none else.”)

By my name Jehovah was I not known to them.—Rather, was I not made manifest to them. The antiquity of the name itself appears (1) from its derivation, which is from the obsoletė hāvah, a form already in the time of Moses superseded by hayah; (2) from its occurrence in some of the ancient documents inserted by Moses into the Book of Genesis, e.g. chap. ii. 4; Ex. iv. xl. 1—9, &c.; (3) from its employment by Abraham as an element in a name (Gen. xxi. 14). But though the name was ancient, and known to the patriarchs, its full meaning was not known to them, and so God was not manifested to them by it.

(8) My covenant.—See Gen. xv. 18—21, xvi. 7, 8, xxi. 3, 4, xxxv. 12, &c.

The land of Canaan.—Canaan proper was the tract between Sidon and Gaza (Gen. x. 19), which is now counted as "Palestine," but the region promised to Abraham, and included in a larger sense of the word "Canaan," was very much more extensive, reaching as it did from the Nile to the Euphrates (Gen. xv. 18). This vast territory was actually possessed by Israel under David and Solomon (1 Kings iv. 21—24).

The land of their pilgrimage, wherein they were strangers.—Heb., The land of their sojournings, wherein they sojourned. (Comp. Gen. xvii. 8, xxiii. 4, xxviii. 4.) Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were occupants of Canaan merely by sufferance; they were allowed to dwell in it because it was not half peopled; but the ownership was recognised as belonging to the Canaanite nations, Hittites and others (Gen. xx. 15, xxiii. 3—20, &c.).

(3) I will redeem you.—The idea of God purchasing, or redeeming, Israel is here brought forward for the first time. Later on we learn that the redemption was accomplished in a twofold way—(1) by the long series of wonders, culminating in the tenth plague, whereby they were taken out of Pharaoh’s hand, and ceased to be his slaves, becoming instead the servants of God; and (2) by being led through the Red Sea, and thus delivered, one and all, from impending death, and so purchased anew. (See chap. xv. 13—16.) The delivery from Pharaoh typified our deliverance from the power of Satan; the bringing forth from Egypt our deliverance from the power of sin.

With a stretched out arm.—See the comment on chap. iii. 20.

With great judgments.—That the “wonders” to be performed would also be “judgments” is here first declared plainly, though previously hinted at (chap. iii. 20, iv. 23). In Genesis God had said that he would "judge" the nation which should afflict Israel (Gen. xv. 14), but not that he would do so miraculously.

(7) I will take you to me for a people.—Comp. chap. xix. 5, 6; Deut. v. 6. The selection of Israel as a "peculiar people" did not involve the abandonment of all other nations, as we see by the instances of Balaam, Ruth, Job, Nebuchadnezzar, Darius the Mede, Cyrus, and others. God always continued to "govern all the nations upon the earth" (Ps. lxvii. 4); and "in every nation those that feared him and worked righteousness" were accepted with him (Acts x. 35). The centurion of the Gospels (Matt. viii. 5—13, Luke vii. 2—10) and Cornelius in the Acts (Acts x. 1—33) carry the same principle into Gospel times.

I will be to you a God.—See Gen. xvi. 8.

(8) I will give it you for an heritage: I am the Lord.—Heb., I will give it to you for an heritage, I Jehovah. The whole is one sentence, and implies that, as being Immutable and Eternal, He would assuredly give it them.

(9) They hearkened not.—The second message was received in quite a different spirit from the first.

208
Then "the people believed, and bowed their knees and worshipped" (chap. iv. 31). Now they could not even be induced to listen. But there is nothing strange in this. The reason is obvious. The first announcement of coming deliverance elicited them with a hope to which they had been long strangers. Their spirits sprang to the message, and readily accepted it. But now they had been chilled by disappointment. The only result of their leader's interferences hitherto had been to increase their misery (chap. iv. 7–23). They had therefore lost heart, and could trust him no longer.

Anguish of spirit.—Heb. shortness of breath. (Comp. Job xxi. 4.) The expression points to extreme lassitude and depression.

The Second Message to Pharaoh.

(11) Speak unto Pharaoh.—The second message was an advance upon the first. The first asked only for permission to enter the wilderness, much of which was within the limits of Egypt; the second was a demand that the Israelites should be allowed "to go out of the land." Such is the way of Providence generally. If we refuse a light cross, a heavier cross is laid on us. If we will not close with the Sybil on the first occasion, she offers us a worse bargain on the second.

(12) How then shall Pharaoh hear me?—This time the objection comes from Moses. His double rejection, by Pharaoh (chap. v. 1–4) and by Israel (chap. vi. 9), had thrown him back into utter despondency. All that difference and distrust of himself which he had shrunk in his earlier communications with Jehovah (chaps. iii. 11, iv. 1, 10, 13) revived, and he despairs of success in his mission. Was it of any use his making a second appeal to the foreign monarch when he had failed with his own countrymen?

Uncircumcised lips.—Rosenmuller argues from this expression that Moses was "tongue-tied;" but it is not clear that more is meant here than in chap. iv. 10, where Moses says that he is "slow of speech and of a slow tongue." He had some difficulty of utterance; but whether or not it was a physical impediment remains uncertain. "Uncircumcised" is used, according to the Hebrew idiom, for any imperfection which interferes with efficiency. An "uncircumcised ear" is explained in Jer. vi. 21, to be an ear that "cannot hearen;" and an "uncircumcised heart" (Lev. xxvi. 41) is a heart that fails to understand.

The Lord . . . gave them a charge.—The reluctance and opposition of Moses led to an express "charge" being laid upon himself and Aaron, the details of which are given in chap. vii. 1–9. Verse 1 of chap. vii. probably followed originally on verse 12 of this chapter. When the genealogy was inserted at this point, the present verse, which summarises chap. vii. 1–9, was added, as also verses 28–30 at the end of the chapter.

The Family of Moses.

(14) These be the heads of their fathers' houses.—Genealogies have always had a special interest for the Semitic races. They occupy quite as prominent a position in Arabian as in Jewish history. The descent of a man who aspired to be a leader would be a subject of curiosity, with a Semitic people, to all those who submitted themselves to his guidance; and Moses naturally inserts his at the point where, fully accepting the post of leader, he came forward and commenced his struggle with Pharaoh for the emancipation of his nation. A "father's house" is a family. (See Num. i. 2, 18.)

(15) Reuben . . . Simeon.—It fixes the position of the family of Levi in the house of Jacob to commence the genealogy with a mention of the two elder brothers. As, however, the writer is really concerned only with the Levites, the families of Reuben and Simeon are dismissed with the briefest possible notice. Nothing new is recorded of them. (See Gen. xlii. 9, 10.)

Gershon, Kohath, and Merari were all born before Levi went into Egypt (Gen. xlii. 3, 11, 27), which was when he was about forty or fifty years of age. It is not unlikely that they were at that time all grown up. If Levi lived to be "an hundred thirty and seven years old," he would probably before he died have seen his descendants of the fifth generation. Attempts have been made to show that the present genealogy is complete, and that Moses was Levi's great-grandson. But in Joshua's case there were ten generations (at least) between him and Jacob (1 Chron. iv. 23–27); so that three generations only between Jacob and Moses are scarcely possible. The Israelites were in the habit of constructing their genealogies by omitting some of the links, as we see plainly in the genealogy of Ezra (Ezra vii. 1–5) and in St. Matthew's genealogy of our Lord (Matt. i. 8). In this present genealogy four or five (perhaps more) names are probably omitted between Amram, the son of Kohath, and Amram, the father of...
Levi were an hundred thirty and seven years. (17) The sons of Gershon; Libni, and Shimi, according to their families. (18) And the sons of Kohath; Amram, and Izhar, and Hebron, and Uzziel: and the years of the life of Kohath were an hundred thirty and three years. (19) And the sons of Merari; Mahali and Mushli: these are the families of Levi according to their generations. (20) And Amram took him Jochebed his father's sister to wife; and she bare him Aaron and Moses: and the years of the life of Amram were an hundred and thirty and seven years. (21) And the sons of Izhar; Korah, and Nepheg, and Zithri. (22) And the sons of Uzziel; Mishael, and Elzaphan, and Zithri. (23) And Aaron took him Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab, sister of Naashon, to wife; and she bare him Nadab, and Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. (24) And the sons of Korah; Assir, and Elkanah, and Abi-

Moses, as will appear if we model the genealogy of Moses upon that of Joshua.

| Jacob |
|---|---|---|---|
| Levi | Joseph | |
| Kohath | Ephraim | |
| Amram | Beriah | |
| | Rephah | |
| | | Telah |
| | | Tahath |
| | | Laadan |
| | | Ammiud |
| | Eliashama | |
| Amram | Nun | |
| Moses | Joshua | |

(17) The sons of Gershon.—From this point the genealogy is no longer a recapitulation, but an original historical document of first-rate importance, which is confirmed by Numbers (Num. iii. 18—33) and Chronicles (1 Chron. vi. 17—19). It is remarkable that Gershon had but two sons, Kohath but four, and Merari but two. Yet the Levites in the year after the Exodus numbered 22,300 males (Num. iii. 22, 28, 34). This increase could only have taken place, at the rate indicated, in the course of some ten or eleven generations.

(20) Amram took him Jochebed his father's sister to wife.—Marriages with aunts and nieces were not unlawful before the giving of the Law. They were common throughout the East, and at Sparta (Herod. vi. 71, vii. 239).

The years of the life of Amram.—The long lives of Levi, Kohath, and Amram, the father of Moses, are not recorded for any chronological purpose, but to show that the blessing of God rested in an especial way on the house of Levi, even before it became the priestly tribe. Life in Egypt at the time not unfrequently reached 120 years; but the 137 of Levi, the 133 of Kohath, and the 137 of Amram, the father of Moses, would, even in Egypt, have been abnormal.

(23) Elisheba, daughter of Amminadab, sister of Naashon.—Amminadab and Naashon were among the ancestors of David (Ruth iv. 19, 29; 1 Chron. H. 10—15), and their names are consequently found in the genealogies of our Lord (Matt. i. 4; Luke iii. 32, 33). Naashon was "prince of Judah" at the time of the Exodus (Num. i. 7, 16).

The sons of Korah did not partake in his sin, and therefore "died not" (Num. xxvi. 11), but became the heads of important families.

(28) According to their families.—The genealogy proper here ends. But the author appears to it an emphatic statement that the Moses and Aaron mentioned in it (verses 20, 23) are the very Moses and Aaron who delivered God's message to Pharaoh (verses 26, 27).

(29) Their armies.—This expression is here used of the Israelites for the first time. It seems to refer to that organisation, of a quasi-military character, which was given to the people by the order of Moses during the long struggle with Pharaoh, and which enabled them at last to quit Egypt, not a disorderly mob, but "harnessed," or "in military array" (chap. xiii. 18). The expression is repeated in chaps. vii. 4 and xii. 17, 51.

The second message to Pharaoh (resumed).

(29—30) These verses are most closely connected with chap. vii. They are a recapitulation of main points in chap. vi., rendered necessary by the long parenthesis (verses 14—27), and serve to unite chap. vii. with the previous narrative. They contain no new information.
God's Charge to Moses.

EXODUS, VII.

CHAPTER VII.—(1) And the LORD said unto Moses, See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh: and Aaron thy brother shall be thy prophet. (2) Thou shalt speak all that I command thee: and Aaron thy brother shall speak unto Pharaoh, that he send the children of Israel out of his land. (3) And I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and multiply my signs and my wonders in the land of Egypt. (4) But Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you, that I may lay my hand upon Egypt, and bring forth mine armies, and my people the children of Israel, out of the land of Egypt by great judgments. (5) And the Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD, when I stretch forth my hand upon Egypt, and bring out the children of Israel from among them.

VII.

(1) See, I have made thee a god to Pharaoh.—This is God's answer to the objection of Moses that his lips were uncircumcised (chap. vi. 12), and probably followed it immediately. The force of it would seem to be: "Thou art not called on to speak, but to act. In action thou wilt be to Pharaoh as a god: powerful, wonder-working, irresistible; it is Aaron who will have to speak to him, and he is eloquent." (chap. iv. 14.)

Thy prophet.—Or spokesmen—the declarer of thy mind, which is the primary sense of "prophet."

(3) I will harden Pharaoh's heart.—See the comment on chap. iv. 21.

My signs and my wonders.—"Signs" (šîḇôth) were miracles done as credentials, to prove a mission (chap. iv. 8, 9, 30). "Wonders" (niphôth) were miracles generally: niphôth, also translated "wonders" (chap. iii. 20), were miracles, wrought in the way of punishment. These last are called also šôphôthim, "judgments." (See verse 4.)

(4) Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you, that I may lay.—Heb., "Pharaoh will not hearken unto you, and I will lay." No relation of effect and cause is here asserted as existing between the two clauses, which are co-ordinate.

Mine armies, and my people. Rather, my armies, my people. The two expressions are in apposition—the second exegetical of the first.

Great judgments.—See the comment on chap. vi. 6.

(5) The Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord.—Heb., "that I am Jehovah; i.e., that I answer to my name—that I am the only really existing God, their so-called gods being "vapour, smoke, nothingness." No doubt this was one of the main lessons intended to be taught by the whole series of miraculous events connected with the Exodus. Egypt was the greatest monarchy in the whole world. She was now at the height of her glory. Among existing polytheisms, hers was the most famous; and her gods must have seemed, not only to herself, but to all the surrounding nations, the most powerful. To discredit them was to throw discredit upon polytheism generally, and to exalt the name of Jehovah above that of all the deities of the nations. (Comp. chap. xiv. 11—16.)

Moses and Aaron did as the Lord commanded them.—The reluctance and resistance of Moses from this time ceased. He subdued his own will to God's, and gained the praise of being "faithful as a servant in all his house." (Heb. iii. 5.) Aaron's obedience continued until Sinai was reached, but there failed before the frenzy of the people (chap. xxxii. 1—6).

Moses was fourscore years old.—Compare Deut. xxxiv. 7; Acts vii. 23, 30. The air of Egypt, and, probably, still more that of the desert, was favourable to longevity; and the Egyptian monuments show many cases of officials actively employed after they were a hundred years old.

(6) Show a miracle for you.—Pharaoh had perhaps heard of the miracles wrought by Aaron before the people of Israel (chap. iv. 30), and was curious to be an eye-witness of one, as was Herod Antipas (Luke xxxiii. 8). Or he may have thought that if Moses and Aaron "shewed a miracle," his own magicians would be able to show greater ones, and he would thus dismiss the brothers as charlatans and impostors. He certainly did not intend to be influenced by any miracle which they might show, or to accept it as evidence that their message to him was a command from God.

Thy rod.—The rod is now called Aaron's, because Moses had entrusted him with it. (Comp. verse 19, and chap. viii. 5, 16, 17.)

A serpent.—Or, a snake. The word is not the same as that used in chap. iv. 5, but appears to be a synonym.

(11) The magicians of Egypt.—These persons are called indifferently khabânim, "wise men," nēḵashêphîmm, "matterers of charms," and kharûmmîm, "scribes," perhaps "writers of charms." Magic was very widely practised in Egypt, and consisted mainly in the composition and employment of charms, which were believed to exert a powerful effect, both over men and over the brute creation. A large part of the "Ritual of the Dead" consists of charms, which were to be uttered by the soul in Hades, in order to enable it EXODUS, VII.

The First Plague.

(13) For they cast down every man his rod, and they became serpents: but Aaron's rod swallowed up their rods. (14) And he hardened Pharaoh's heart, that he hearkened not unto them; as the Lord had said.

(14) And the Lord said unto Moses, Pharaoh's heart is hardened, he refuseth to let the people go. (15) Get thee unto Pharaoh in the morning; lo, he goeth out unto the water; and thou shalt stand by the river's brink against him come; and the rod which was turned to a serpent shalt thou take in thine hand. (16) And thou shalt say unto him, The Lord God of the Hebrews hath sent me unto thee, saying, Let my people go, that they may serve me in the wood or stone attached to houses (verse 19)—is to be "turned to blood:" i.e., not merely turned of a red colour, either by admixture of earthy matter or of Infusoria, but made to have all the qualities and appearance of blood, so as to become offensive, horrible, loathsome (verse 18). The judgment strikes the Egyptians two several blows. (1) It involves an insult to their religion, and brings it into disrepute, since the Nile-god, Hapi, was a main object of worship, closely connected with Osiris, and even with Ammon, celebrated in hymns with the most extravagant titles of honour (Records of the Past, vol. iv, pp. 108–110), and a frequent object of public adoration in festivals. (2) It is a great physical affliction. They are accustomed to use the Nile water for drinking, for ablutions, for the washing of their clothes, and for culinary purposes; they have great difficulty in procuring any other; they delight in the Nile water, regard it as the best in the world, are in the habit of drinking deep draughts of it continually. This is all put a stop to. They suffer from thirst, from enforced uncleanness, from the horror of blood all about them, even in their cisterns. Again, their fish are killed. Fish was one of their principal foods, perhaps the main food of the common people; and the river was the chief source whence the fish supply was obtained, for even the Lake Moeris was an off-shoot from the river (Herod. ii. 149). Their fish supply is stopped. The punishment is retaliatory: for as they had made the Nile the means of destroying Hebrew infants (chap. i. 22), so that Hebrew parents had loathed to drink of it, as though stained with the blood of their children, so is it now made by means of blood undrinkable for themselves. The plague lasts seven days (verse 25), a longer time than any other; and if not so destructive as the latter ones, was perhaps of all the most nauseous and disgusting.

(13) He goeth out unto the water.—Perhaps to bathe, like the princess who saved Moses (chap. ii. 5), perhaps to inaugurate some festival in the river's honour. Of these the Egyptian calendar contained several.

The river's brink.—Heb., the lip of the river. (Comp. chap. ii. 3.)

(16) The Lord God of the Hebrews.—Heb., Jehovah, the God of the Hebrews. On the first application made to him by Moses and Aaron, Pharaoh had professed not to know who Jehovah was (chap. v. 2). To prevent his again doing so, Moses is ordered to give both name and title.

Hath sent me.—Rather, sent me.

Let my people go.—Comp. chap. v. 1. The reference is to Moses' first appearance before Pharaoh, and the message then delivered.

Thou wouldst not hear.—Rather, thou hast not heard: i.e., thou hast not obeyed.
wilderness: and, behold, hitherto thou wouldest not hear. (17) Thus saith the Lord, In this thou shalt know that I am the Lord: behold, I will smite with the rod that is in mine hand upon the waters which are in the river, and they shall be turned to blood. (18) And the fish that is in the river shall die, and the river shall stink; and the Egyptians shall lothe to drink of the water of the river.

(19) And the Lord spake unto Moses, Say unto Aaron, Take thy rod, and stretch out thine hand upon the waters of Egypt, upon their streams, upon their rivers, and upon their ponds, and upon all their pools of water, that they may become blood; and that there may be blood throughout all the land of Egypt, both in vessels of wood, and in vessels of stone. (20) And Moses and Aaron did so, as the Lord commanded; and he lifted up the rod, and smote the waters that were in the river, in the sight of Pharaoh, and in the sight of his servants; and all the waters that were in the river were turned to blood. (21) And the fish that was in the river died; and the river stank, and the Egyptians could not drink of the water of the river; and there was blood throughout all the land of Egypt. (22) And the magicians of Egypt did so with their enchantments: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, neither did he hearken unto them; as the Lord had said. (23) And Pharaoh turned and went into his house, neither did he set his heart to this also. (24) And all the Egyptians dug round about the river for water to drink; for they could not drink of the water of the river. (25) And seven days were fulfilled, after that the Lord had smitten the river.
EXODUS, VIII.

The Second Plague.

The Plague of Frogs.

CHAPTER VIII.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, Go unto Pharaoh, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord, Let my people go, that they may serve me. (2) And if thou refuse to let them go, behold, I will smite all thy borders with frogs: (3) and the river shall bring forth frogs abundantly, which shall go up and come into thine house, and into thy bedchamber, and upon thy bed, and into the house of thy servants, and upon thy people, and into thine ovens, and into thy kneading-troughs: (4) and the frogs shall come up both on thee, and upon thy people, and upon all thy servants. (5) And the Lord spake unto Moses, Say unto Aaron, Stretch forth thine hand with thy rod over the streams, over the rivers, and over the ponds, and cause frogs to come up upon the land of Egypt. (6) And Aaron stretched out his hand over the waters of Egypt; and the frogs came up, and covered the land of Egypt.

(24) All the Egyptians dug round about the river.—Wells may be sunk in any part of the alluvium, and will always yield water, which is, however, brackish and unpalatable. This water is, no doubt, derived by percolation from the river; but the percolation is a slow process, and blood would scarcely percolate far. The water obtained was probably in the ground before the miracle took place, and was not made subject to it.

(25) And seven days were fulfilled.—These words seem to mark the duration of the first plague, which was the longer because Pharaoh made no submission at all in consequence of it. Obtaining sufficient water for his own purposes (see the comment on verse 23), he thought little of its continuance.

VIII.

The Second Plague.

(1—4) It is generally allowed that the second plague was one of frogs. All the ancient versions agree in the interpretation; and the only rival rendering—“crocodiles”—is too absurd to be argued against. We may take it, therefore, as certain that the second infliction upon Egypt was an innumerable multitude of frogs, which came up out of the river, and infested the cities, the houses, the sleeping apartments, the beds, the ovens, and the kneading-troughs. There was no escaping them. They entered the royal palace no less than the peasant’s cottage; they penetrated to the inner chambers; they leaped upon the couches and beds; they polluted the lacing utensils, and defiled the water and the food. Here, again, the infliction was double.

(1) Frogs were sacred animals to the Egyptians, who regarded them as symbols of procreative power, and associated them especially with the goddess Heka (a wife of Kneph, or Num), whom they represented as frog-headed. Sacred animals might not be intentionally killed, and even their involuntary slaughter was not unfrequently punished with death. To be plagued with a multitude of reptiles which might not be put to death, yet on which it was scarcely possible not to tread, and which, whenever a door was opened were crushed, was a severe trial to the religious feelings of the people, and tended to bring the religion itself into contempt. (2) The visitation was horrible to the senses—nauseous, disgusting. The frogs were hideous to the eye, grating to the ear, repulsive to the touch. Their constant presence everywhere rendered them a continual torment. If other later plagues were more injurious, the plague of frogs was perhaps of all the most loathsome. We read without surprise in Eustathius (Comment in Hom. II., p. 35) that the people of Peconia and Dardania on one occasion, were so plagued by a multitude of frogs, which filled the houses and the streets, infected the water, invaded the cooking utensils, and made all the food unpalatable, that after a time, being unable to bear the pest any longer, they “fled from that region altogether.”

(1) Let my people go.—The usual demand, which it was determined to reiterate until Pharaoh yielded. (See chaps. v. 1, vi. 16, viii. 20, ix. 1–13, x. 3.)

(2) With frogs.—The particular species intended is thought to be the modern dophka (Rana Mosaica), which is a large kind, resembling our toad, which crawls more than it leaps, and croaks perpetually.

(3) The river shall bring forth frogs.—The frogs do not now come up directly out of the river, but rather out of the ponds and marshes which are left by the inundation. (See verse 5.) These, however, may be viewed as detached portions of the river. Frogs in Egypt are, even at the present day, an occasional annoyance and inconvenience.

Thy bedchamber ... thy bed.—No nation of antiquity set such a value on cleanliness as the Egyptians. Priests were required to dress entirely in linen, and to wash their entire bodies in cold water twice every day and twice every night (Herod. ii. 37). With other classes ablutions were frequent, and the utmost care was taken to avoid contact with whatever was uncleanly. It is difficult to conceive a greater annoyance to an Egyptian than frogs in the bedchamber and on the bed.

Ovens.—Or, baking-pans—earthenware vessels commonly heated by having a fire lighted inside them, and the dough attached by pressure after the fire had been withdrawn.

Kneading troughs.—Comp. below, chap. xii. 34, which fixes the sense; and for representations of both kneading-troughs and ovens, see Rosellini, Monumenti Civili, pls. 84, 85.

(6) The frogs came up.—Hebrew, the frog. The term designates the species.
Pharaoh makes Submission.

EXODUS, VIII.

And the magicians did so:—It cannot be concluded from this that the magicians had the power of creating frogs. All that the writer means to express is, that they seemed to Pharaoh and to the Court to do on a small scale what Moses and Aaron had done on the largest possible scale. The means which they employed was probably sleight-of-hand. It has been well observed that they would have shown their own power and the power of their gods far more satisfactorily had they succeeded in taking the frogs away.

Pharaoh called for Moses. This was the first sign of yielding. Pharaoh had borne the infliction of the water turned to blood without dimpling, probably because individually he had suffered but little from it. (See the comment on chap. vii. 23.) But he suffered from the frogs as much as any one else (verses 3, 4); and the personal inconvenience drove him to make a concession. As far as words could go, the concession was complete: (1) He acknowledged the power of Jehovah ("Intreat the Lord, that He may take away, &c."); (2) he acknowledged the power of righteous men’s prayers; (3) he made an absolute unreserved promise to “let the people go.”

And Moses said . . . Glory over me. This phrase seems equivalent to—"I submit to thy will," "I am content to do thy bidding." It was probably an ordinary expression of courtesy in Egypt on the part of an inferior to a superior; but it was not a Hebrew idiom, and so does not occur elsewhere.

When shall I intreat?—Rather, as in the margin, against whom? or for whom?—i.e., what date shall I fix in my prayer to God as that at which the plague shall be removed? And so, in the next verse, for "to-morrow" translate against to-morrow. It seems strange that Pharaoh did not say, "To-day, this very instant;" but perhaps he thought even Jehovah could not do so great a thing at once.

That thou mayest know.—Comp. chap. vii. 5, 17. Moses is not content that Pharaoh should simply acknowledge Jehovah as he had done (verse 8), but wishes him to be convinced that no other god can compare with Him.

The frogs died.—God, who knew the heart of Pharaoh, and its insincerity, or at any rate its changefulness, took the plague of frogs away in a manner that made its removal almost as bad as its continuance. The frogs did not return into the river; neither were they devoured by flocks of cranes or ibises. They simply died—died where they were—in thousands and tens of thousands, so that they had to be "gathered upon heaps." "And the land stank." In the great plague of frogs mentioned by Eustathius (see the comment on verses 1—4) it was the stench of the frogs after they were dead which caused the people to quit their country.

When Pharaoh saw that there was re- spite. —Hebrew, a breathing space. He hardened his heart.—Hitherto Pharaoh’s nature had not been impression; his heart had remained dull, callous, hard. Now an impression had been made (verse 8), and he must have yielded, if he had not called in his own will to efface it. Herein was his great guilt. (See the comment on chap. iv. 21.)

The Third Plague.

It is disputed whether this plague was one of lice or of mosquitoes. Josephus and the Jewish commentators generally take the former view, while the latter is supported by the LXX. and Vulgate, by the authorities of Philo, Artapanus, Origen, and St. Augustine in ancient, and by those of Rosenmüller, Michaelis, Edmann, Gesenius, Keil, and Kalischer in modern times. The word used (κιννῦ, or κόκω), and is reasonably regarded as formed by onomatopoeia, from the sharp tingling sound given out by the insect when on the wing. The trouble caused to the Egyptians of the Delta by mosquitoes is noticed by Herodotus (v. 95), while moderns, as Forskal (Descript. Anim. p. 85), declare that they amount to an absolute pest at certain seasons. They are most troublesome towards October, and are said to attack not only the exposed parts of the skin, but especially the ears, the nostrils, and the eyes, where they do great damage. Some have thought that mosquitoes do not molest cattle (verse 17); but Kalischer says, "They molest, especially by day, not cattle but sheep, by flying into their eyes and nostrils, driving them to madness—

* In Egyptian the word for "mosquito" is Khnummas (Paracelsus, Dict. Hierogl. p. 1100).
may become lice throughout all the land of Egypt. (17) And they did so; for Aaron stretched out his hand with his rod, and smote the dust of the earth, and it became lice in man, and in beast; all the dust of the land became lice throughout all the land of Egypt. (18) And the magicians did so with their enchantments to bring forth lice, but they could not: so there were lice upon man, and upon beast. (19) Then the magicians said unto Pharaoh, This is the finger of God: and Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and he hearkened not unto them; as the Lord had said. (20) And the Lord said unto Moses, and fury, and sometimes even torturing them to death.”

It is to be noticed that the third plague, whatever it was, came without warning. It was God's judgment on Pharaoh for hardening his heart and breaking his promise (verse 15); and he was not given the option of avoiding it by submission to God's will.

(19) Smite the dust of the land.—Dust prevails in Egypt to an extent that is highly inconvenient. “We travelled to Asnith,” says one writer, “through clouds of dust, raised by a high wind, which intercepted our view as much as if we had been travelling in a fog.” “There is one great source of discomfort,” says another, “arising from the dryness of the atmosphere, namely, an excessive quantity of dust.” When “all the dust of the land became mosquitoes” (verse 17), the plague must indeed have been great.

(20) The magicians did so—i.e., tried to do so— took moist earth, and dried it, and pulverised it, and tried the effect of their magic charms upon it, but failed to produce mosquitoes, as Aaron had done. Mosquitoes were things too delicate to be caught, and manipulated, and produced at a given moment by sleight-of-hand. The magicians tried to produce a counterfeit of the miracle, but could not. Then they excused themselves to their master with the words, “This is the finger of a God.”

(21) The finger of God.—Rather, of a god. The magicians meant to say, “This is beyond the power of man: it is supernatural; some god must be helping Moses and Aaron.” They did not mean to profess a belief in One God.

Pharaoh's heart was hardened.—The mosquitoes did not impress Pharaoh as the frogs had done (verses 8–15). His heart remained hard. He had no need to harden it by an act of his will. Probably the visitation affected him but little, since he would possess mosquito curtains, and could inhabit the loftier parts of his palace, which would be above the height where the mosquito ascends (Herod. ii. 95).

The Fourth Plague.

(20, 21) There is, again, a doubt as to the nature of the fourth plague. In the original it is called the plague of "the arôb," which is used throughout in the singular number. The LXX. translate ḥa'arôb by "the dog-fly" (αἱ κυνόμυα). The Jewish commentators connect the word with the root 'ereb or 'arab, and suppose it to designate either a mixed multitude of all kinds of wild beasts (Josephus and Jonathan), or a mixture of all sorts of insects (Aquila e.). Moderns generally agree with the LXX. that a definite species of animal—probably an insect—is meant, but doubt about the particular creature. The dog-fly, it is said (Musca canina), is not a pest in houses, as the 'arôb was (verses 21, 24), nor does it do any damage to the land (verse 24). It is therefore suggested that the plague was really one of the kakerlaque, a kind of beetle, which is injurious both to the persons of men, to the furniture and fittings of houses, and to the crops in the fields. It is in favour of the kakerlaque that, like all beetles, it was sacred, and might not be destroyed, being emblematic of the sun-god, Ra, especially in his form of Khepra, or "the creator." Egyptians were obliged to submit to such a plague without attempting to diminish it, and would naturally view the infliction as a sign that the sun-god was angry with them. They would also suffer grievously in person, for the kakerlaque "inflicts very painful bites with its jaws" (Kalisch); and they would begin for the first time to suffer in their property, which neither the frogs nor the mosquitoes had damaged. The plague was thus—if one of the kakerlaque—an advance on previous plagues, and if less disgusting than some others, was far more injurious.

(22) Early in the morning.—Comp. chap. vii. 15; and on the early habits of an Egyptian king, see Herod. ii. 172.

He cometh forth to the water.—It is conjectured that this was on the occasion of the great autumn festival, when, after the retirement of the Nile within its banks, and the scattering of the grain upon the fresh deposit of mud, the first blades of corn began to appear. It is not improbable that Khepra, "the creator," was then especially worshipped.

(22) Swarms of flies.—Heb., 'arôb. Comp. "the frog" (verse 13), and "the mosquito" (ha'kinim) in verse 17. On the species intended, see the comment on verses 20, 21.

(22) I will sever in that day the land of Goshen.—This was a new feature, and one calculated to make a deep impression both on king and people. The "land of Goshen" can only have been some portion of the Eastern Delta, a tract in nowise different from the rest of Egypt—low, flat, well-watered, fertile. Nature had put no severance between it and the regions where the Egyptians dwelt; so the severance to be made would be a manifest miracle.
The Fourth Plague, and its Removal.

EXODUS, VIII.

21. And I will put a division between my people and thy people: tomorrow shall this sign be. (22) And the Lord did so; and there came a grievous swarm of flies into the house of Pharaoh, and into his servants' houses, and into all the land of Egypt: the land was corrupted by reason of the swarm of flies.

23. And Pharaoh called for Moses and Aaron, and said, Go ye, sacrifice to your God in the land. (24) And Moses said, It is not meet so to do; for we shall sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians to the Lord our God: lo, shall we sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians before their eyes, and will they not stone us? (25) We will go three days' journey into the wilderness, and sacrifice to the Lord our God, as he shall command us. (26) And Pharaoh said, I will let you go, that ye may sacrifice to the Lord your God in the wilderness; only ye shall not go very far away: intreat for me. (27) And Moses said, Behold, I go out from thee, and I will intreat the Lord that the swarms of flies may depart from Pharaoh, from his servants, and from his people, to morrow: but let not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more in not letting the people go to sacrifice to the Lord.

28. And Moses went out from Pharaoh, and intreated the Lord. (29) And the Lord did according to the word of Moses; and he removed the swarms of flies from Pharaoh, from his servants, and from his people; there remained

21. The land was corrupted.—Rather, as in the margin, destroyed. Kalisch observes, "These insects" — i.e., the kakerlaque (Blatta Orientalia), "really fill the land, and molest men and beasts; they consume all sorts of materials, devastate the country, and are in so far more detestable than the grats, as they destroy also the property of the Egyptians." (30) Pharaoh called for Moses.—Pharaoh suffered from the kakerlaque equally with his subjects, or rather, more than his subjects. It was "upon him," inflicting its painful bites (verse 21); it was "upon his palaces" (verse 21), destroying his rich and magnificent furniture; it was upon his hands, ravaging and devastating them (verse 24). He therefore gave way before this plague almost at once, and without waiting for any remonstrance on the part of the magicians or others, "called for Moses.

In the land.—Pretending to grant the request made of him, Pharaoh mars all by this little clause. A three days' journey into the wilderness had been demanded from the first (chap. v. 3), and no less could be accepted. (31) It is not meet so to do.—Pressed to remain in the land, and sacrifice, Moses deemed it right to explain to the king why this was impossible. The Israelites would have to sacrifice the abomination of the Egyptians" — i.e., animals of which the Egyptians abominated the killing; and if they did this in the presence of Egyptians, a riot would be certain to break out — perhaps a civil war would ensue. The animal-worship of the Egyptians is a certain, and generally recognised, fact. It seemed to the Greeks and Romans the most striking characteristic of the Egyptian religion. (See Herod. ii. 65—76; Diod. Sic. i. 82—84; Cic. De Nat. Deor. i. 36; &c.) The sacred animals of the Hebrews—sheep, goats, and cattle — were all of them sacred animals, either to the Egyptians generally, or to the inhabitants of certain districts. A Theban could not endure the sacrifice of a sheep, nor a Menidesian that of a goat (Herod. ii. 42). White cows and heifers — perhaps cows and heifers generally — were sacred to Isis-Athor. Any bull-calf might be an Apis; and it could not be known whether he was Apis or not till the priests had examined him (Herod. iii. 28). The extent to which the Egyptians carried their rage when a sacred animal was killed in their presence is illustrated by many facts in history. On one occasion a Roman ambassador, who had accidentally killed a cat, was torn to pieces by the populace (Diod. Sic. i. 83). On another, war broke out between the Oxyrhynites and the Cynopolites, because the latter had eaten one of the fish considered sacred by the former (Pharaet. De Isid. et Ostir. § 44). The fear of Moses was thus not at all groundless.

22. Will they not stone us?—This is the first mention of "stoning" in Scripture or elsewhere. It was not a legalised Egyptian punishment; but probably it was everywhere one of the earliest, as it would be one of the simplest, modes of wreaking popular vengeance. Aeschylus mentions it (Sept. e. Th. 153), also Herodotus (v. 38). It was known in ancient Persia (Ctes. Fr. 50).

23. As he shall command us.—Comp. chap. x. 26: "We know not with what we must serve the Lord, until we come thither."

24. And Moses said, Behold . . . I will entreat the Lord.—Moses accepted Pharaoh's second promise, and took no special exception to its condition — "only ye shall not go very far away." He had distinctly stated his own demand, which was "for a three days' journey into the wilderness" (chaps. v. 3. viii. 27). It was for Pharaoh to settle with himself whether he considered that distance "very far" or not. As he made no clear objection to the distance, Moses was bound to suppose that he allowed it.

25. Let not Pharaoh deal deceitfully any more.—God's servants must reprove even kings when they openly break the moral law (1 Sam. xiii. 13. xv. 20—23; 2 Sam. xii. 7—12; 1 Kings xxi. 20—22; Matt. xiv. 4, &c.). Pharaoh had promised unconditionally to let the people go if the frogs were removed (verse 8), and had then flagrantly broken his word. Moses was right to rebuke his "deceit."
not one. \(\text{(33)}\) And Pharaoh hardened his heart at this time also, neither would he let the people go.

CHAPTER IX.—\(\text{(1)}\) Then the Lord said unto Moses, Go in unto Pharaoh, and tell him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, Let my people go, that they may serve me. \(\text{(2)}\) For if thou refuse to let them go, and wilt hold them still, \(\text{(3)}\) behold, the hand of the Lord is upon thy cattle which is in the field, upon the horses, upon the asses, upon the camels, upon the oxen, and upon the sheep: there shall be a very grievous murrain. \(\text{(4)}\) And the Lord shall sever between the cattle of Israel and the cattle of Egypt: and there shall nothing die of all that is the children’s of Israel. \(\text{(5)}\) And the Lord appointed a set time, saying, To morrow the Lord shall do this thing in the land. \(\text{(6)}\) And the Lord did that thing on the morrow, and all the cattle of Egypt died: but of the cattle of the children of Israel died not one. \(\text{(7)}\) And Pharaoh sent, and, behold, there was not one of the cattle of the Israelites dead. And the heart of Pharaoh was hardened, and he did not let the people go.

\(\text{(8)}\) And the Lord said unto Moses and unto Aaron, Take to you handfuls of ashes of the furnace, and let Moses sprinkle it toward the heaven in the fourth plague, and then probably continued without intermission, though it is not always mentioned.

\(\text{(9)}\) The Lord appointed a set time.—As murrain is not uncommon in Egypt, especially in the Delta, and the coming affliction might therefore be ascribed by the Egyptians to natural causes, God took care to mark its miraculous character \(\text{(1)}\) by appointing a time; \(\text{(2)}\) by omitting the cattle of Israel; \(\text{(3)}\) by making the disease fatal to all the cattle of the Egyptians that were left in the field.

To morrow.—The delay allowed any Egyptians who believed Moses to save their cattle by housing them.

\(\text{(10)}\) Pharaoh sent.—The Pharaoh evidently did not believe it possible that there should be such a widespread destruction of the Egyptian cattle without the Hebrew cattle suffering at all. He therefore sent persons to inquire and report on the facts. These persons found the announcement of Moses fulfilled to the letter. This was the more surprising, as Goshen consisted mainly of the low flat tract bordering on the Menzaleh marshes.

The heart of Pharaoh was hardened.—Even the exact correspondence of the result with the announcement did not soften the heart of the King. It remained dull and unimpressed—literally, “heavy” \((\text{kôbêt})\). Loss of property would not much distress an absolute monarch, who could easily exact the value of what he had lost from his subjects.

THE SIXTH PLAGUE.

\(\text{(8—10)}\) Here, again, there is little question of what the plague was. Doubts may be entertained as to its exact character, and its proper medical designation, but all agree, and cannot but agree, that it was a visitation of the bodies of men with a severe cutaneous disorder, accompanied by pustules or ulcers. It was not announced beforehand to the Egyptians, nor were they allowed the opportunity of escaping it. Like the third plague, it was altogether of the nature of a judgment; and the judgment was a severe one. Now, for the first time, was acute suffering inflicted on the persons of men; now, for the first time, was it shown how Jehovah could smite with a terrible disease; and if with a disease, why not with death? No doubt those stricken suffered unequally; but with some the affliction may have resembled the final affliction of Job, when he was sight of Pharaoh. (9) And it shall become small dust in all the land of Egypt, and shall be a boil breaking forth with boils upon man, and upon beast, throughout all the land of Egypt. (10) And they took ashes of the furnace, and stood before Pharaoh; and Moses sprinkled it up toward heaven; and it became a boil breaking forth with boils upon man, and upon beast. (11) And the magicians could not stand before Moses because of the boils; for the boil was upon the magicians, and upon all the Egyptians. (12) And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh, and he hearkened not unto them; as the Lord had spoken unto Moses. (13) And the Lord said unto Moses, Rise up early in the morning, and stand before Pharaoh, and say unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, Let my people go, that they may serve me. (14) For I will at this time send all my plagues upon thine heart, and upon thy servants, and upon thy people; that thou mayest know that there is none like God that is in Israel. (15) And now fetch a stone out of the river.” (verse 15). (16) And Moses took a stone out of the river, and smote the rock twice; and there came water in great abundance, the river. (17) And the people drank. (18) And he called the name of the place Massah, and Marah, because they cried out to the Lord: and he showed them manna, and gave them manna according to their eating; and there was manna for a light diet. (19) And it came to pass, when Aaron spake to all the children of Israel, that they looked towards the desert, and saw the glory of the Lord, and the火焰 before the tabernacle. (20) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (21) Speak unto the children of Israel, that they go up out of the land of Egypt. (22) And all the congregation of the children of Israel, when they heard that they should go up out of the land of Egypt, put on their harness.” (verse 12). (13-19) The plagues fall into triads, or groups of three. This is the first plague of the third group, and presents to us several new features. (1) It is ushered in with an unusually long and exceedingly awful message (verses 13-19), in which Pharaoh is warned that God is now about to "send all His plagues upon his heart," and that he has been raised up simply that God may show forth His power in his person. (2) It is the first plague that attacks human life; and this it does upon a large scale: all those exposed to it perish (verse 19). (3) It is more destructive than any previous plague to property. It not only slays cattle like the murrain, but destroys plants and trees (verse 24), and ruins half the harvest (verse 31). (4) It is accompanied with terrible demonstrations—"mighty thunderings," huge hailstones, rain, and fire that "runs along upon the ground" (verse 23). (5) It is made to test the degree of faith to which the Egyptians have attained, by means of a revelation of the way whereby it may be escaped (verse 20). Though the plagues do not form a regularly ascending series, each transcending the last, yet there is a certain progress observable. The earlier ones cause annoyance rather than injury; those which follow cause loss of property; then God's hand is laid on men's persons, so as to hurt, but not to kill; lastly, life itself is attacked. The seventh plague was peculiarly astonishing and alarming to the Egyptians, because hail and thunder, even rain, were rare phenomena in their country; and a thunderstorm accompanied by such features as characterised this one was absolutely unknown. The hailstones must have been of an enormous size and weight to kill men and cattle. The "fire into-}
The Seventh Plague.

EXODUS, IX.

The Seventh Plague.

The words admit of this translation, but the context will not allow it. Translate—And now I might have stretched out mine hand, and smitten both thee and thy people with pestilence; and thou shalt be cut off from the earth.

And in very deed for this cause have I raised thee up.—Rather, but truly on this account have I made thee stand—i.e., kept thee alive, not for thy deserts, not even in pity, but only "for to show in thee My power." Thou hast provoked Me so that long since thou wouldst have been "cut off from the earth," only that My glory will be the more shown forth by thy continuance in life, and by the further plagues and punishments whereto thou wilt be subjected.

That my name may be declared.—Comp. chaps. xiv. 17, xv. 14—16, &c.

Such as hath not been in Egypt since the foundation thereof.—Rain, and even hail, are not unknown at the present day in Lower Egypt, though they are comparatively speaking, rare phenomena. Thunderstorms are especially uncommon, and when they occur are for the most part mild and harmless. A thunderstorm which killed a man in Thevenot's time (Voyages, vol. i., p. 344) was regarded as most extraordinary, and "spread universal consternation." There is hail from time to time between November and March; but it very seldom does any considerable damage.

Gather thy cattle.—The peculiar circumstances of Egypt, where the whole country was overflowed by the Nile during some months of each year, caused the provision of shelter for cattle to be abnormally great. Every year, at the time of the inundation, all the cattle had to be "gathered" into sheds and cattle-yards in the immediate vicinity of the villages and towns, which were protected from the inundation by high mounds. Thus it would have been easy to house all the cattle that remained to the Egyptians after the murrain, if the warning here given had been attended to generally.

The fire ran along the ground.—Heb., fire walked earthwards. Kalisch and Knobel understand by this mere ordinary lightning, but Aben-Ezra, Canon Cook, and others think that the phenomenon was such as our Version well expresses. There is no doubt that the electric fluid occasionally takes a form which has something of permanency, continuing several seconds, or even minutes, either stationary or with a slow motion. Appearance of this kind have been called "fire-balls," and indicate an excessive electrical disturbance, involving great peril to life and property. If the expression "fire walked earthwards" does not imply anything of this kind, yet the peculiar phrase of verse 24 would seem to do so.

Fire mingled with the hail.—Heb., a fire insolding itself in the midst of the hail. (Comp. Ezek. i. 4; and see the comment on verse 23.)

The hail . . . brake every tree of the field.—What is meant is, not that the hail "brake the mightiest trees to fragments" (Millington, Plagues of Egypt, p. 135), but that it broke off the small boughs EXODUS, X.

The Seventh Plague Removed.

Goshen, where the children of Israel were, was there no hail. (27) And Pharaoh sent, and called for Moses and Aaron, and said unto them, I have sinned this time: the Lord is righteous, and my people are wicked. (28) Intreat the Lord (for it is enough) that there be no more mighty thunderings and hail; and I will let you go, and ye shall stay no longer. (29) And Moses said unto him, As soon as I am gone out of the city, I will spread abroad my hands unto the Lord; and the thunder shall cease, neither shall there be any more hail; that thou mayest know how that the earth is the Lord’s. (30) But as for thee and thy servants, I know that ye will not yet fear the Lord God.

(31) And the flax and the barley was and twigs, so damaging the trees and, if they were fruit-trees, destroying the prospect of fruit.

(32) Pharaoh sent.—It is evident that the Pharaoh was more impressed by this plague than by any preceding one. This may have been partly because it caused destruction of human life, partly on account of its extraordinary and awful character. It must be borne in mind that the storm was still continuing, and gave no sign of coming to a natural end (verses 29, 33).

I have sinned this time:—i.e., This time I confess that I have sinned in resisting Jehovah; I do not any more maintain that I have acted right.

The Lord is righteous.—Heb., Jehovah is the Just One—a form of speech implying that Jehovah, and He alone, was just.

Wicked.—Heb., the sinners. “I and my people” stand in contrast with God and His people. Previously Pharaoh had denounced the Israelites as idolers and hypocrites (chap. v. 8, 17); now he admits that it is only he and his people that are to blame. The confession is satisfactory, except in so far as it divides between Pharaoh and the Egyptians the blame which was almost wholly his.

(33) That thou mayest know how that the earth is the Lord’s.—Comp. verse 15. It was the general belief of the Egyptians, as of most ancient nations, that each country had its own god or gods. Pharaoh had already admitted Jehovah’s power (chap. vii. 8), and now regarded Him as the God of the Hebrews (chap. vii. 25). God desired to have it generally acknowledged that He was the God of the whole earth.

(34) The flax and the barley was smitten. Flax was grown largely in Egypt, since linen garments were very generally worn by the people, and were the necessary attire of the priests (Herod. ii. 37). Mummies also were swathed in linen bandages (Herod. ii. 86); and soldiers wore linen corselets (Herod. ii. 182, iii. 47). Barley was grown as food for horses, as an element in the manufacture of beer, and as a material for an inferior kind of bread. The flax is “boiled” —i.e., forms its seed- vessel—towards the end of January or beginning of February, and the barley comes into ear about the same time. These facts fix the date of this plague, and help to fix the dates both of the earlier and the later ones.

(35) The wheat and the rye.—“Rye,” or ryo, is a wrong translation. It is a grain which has never been grown in Egypt. The only three kinds of grain cultivated were wheat, barley, and the holcus sorghum, or doara. There is no doubt that this last is intended by the Hebrew kassemeth, which is a word derived from the Egyptian. The wheat is a full month later than the barley in Egypt, and does not come into ear till March. The holcus sorghum may be grown at any time, except during the inundation. If sown with the wheat, it would ripen about the same period.

They were not grown up.—Heb., they were late, or dark. The ear was undeveloped, and lay hid in the low tufts that grew like grass.

(36) Moses went out of the city and spread abroad his hands.—Moses did not fear the storm. Though it still raged, he quitted the shelter of the city, and went out into the midst of it, and spread out his hands to God, when lo! at once the rain, and hail, and thunder ceased at his bidding, and soon “there was a great calm.” As Millington observes—“Moses knew that he was safe, though all around might be destroyed; the very hairs of his head were all numbered, not one of them could perish. Standing there under the tempestuous canopy of heaven, bared-headed, in the attitude of prayer, he spread abroad his hands unto the Lord, and the thunder and hail ceased, and the rain was not poured upon the earth” (Plagues of Egypt, p. 135).

(37) Pharaoh . . . sinned yet more, and hardened his heart.—As Pharaoh had never been so much moved previously, so it now required a greater effort of his will to “harden his heart” than it had ever done before; and thus he now “sinned yet more” than he had as yet sinned. It seems strange that the mercy of God should still have allowed him one other chance (chap. x. 3—6).

X.

The Eighth Plague.

(1—4) The eighth plague, like the third and fourth, was one where insect life was called in to serve God’s purposes, and chastise the presumption of His enemies. The nature of the visitation is uncontested and incon-
I have hardened his heart, and the heart of his servants, that I might shew these my signs before him: (2) and that thou mayest tell in the ears of thy son, and of thy son's son, what things I have wrought in Egypt, and my signs which I have done among them; that ye may know how that I am the Lord.

(3) And Moses and Aaron came in unto Pharaoh, and said unto him, Thus saith the Lord God of the Hebrews, How long wilt thou refuse to humble thyself before me? let my people go, that they may serve me. (4) Else, if thou refuse to let my people go, behold, to morrow I will bring the locusts into thy coast:

That thou mayest tell—Those who experience God's mercies are bound to hand on the memory of what He has done for them to future generations. Natural gratitude would prompt such action. But, lest the duty should be neglected, the Israelites had it at this time constantly enjoined upon them (chaps. xii. 26, 27, xiii. 14, 15; Deut. xxxii. 7; Josh. iv. 6, 8.).

To morrow will I bring the locusts into thy coast.—Locusts, as already observed, are not indigenous to Egypt, but only occasional visitants. Consequently they always enter the country from some other, as Nubia, Abyssinia, Syrya, or Arabia. On the quarter from which the present plague came, see the comment on verse 13.

They shall cover the face of the earth, that one cannot be able to see the earth.—This is the case almost invariably with all the severer visitations of locusts. "The plain was covered with them," says Denon (Travels, p. 258), speaking of Egypt. "The ground is covered with them for several leagues," declares Volney (Travels, vol. i., p. 255. "Over an area of 1,600 or 1,800 square miles," observes Barrow, "the whole surface might literally be said to be covered with them." The Hebrew name, which means "multitudinous," is thus very appropriate.

They shall eat the residue of that which is escaped. ... every tree. —Comp. chap. ix. 32. The description by Joel has never been surpassed. "A fire devoureth before them, and behind them a flame burneth: the land is as the garden of Eden before them, and behind them a desolate wilderness; yea, and nothing shall escape them" (Joel ii. 3). Comp. Volney (i., p.c.): "When their swarms appear, everything green vanishes instantaneously from the fields, as if a curtain were rolled up; the trees and plants stand leafless, and nothing is seen but naked boughs and stalks." Very graphic is Joel again in respect of this last feature: "He hath laid my vine waste, and barked my fig-tree; he hath made it clean bare, and cast it away; the branches thereof are made white" (Joel i. 7). Nor is it only shrubs, but even trees, that suffer. "They are particularly injurious to the palm-trees," says Burkhardt; "these they strip of every leaf and green particle, the trees remaining like skeletons, with bare branches."

They shall fill thy houses.—"They shall run to and fro in the city," says the prophet Joel; "they shall run upon the wall, they shall climb up upon the houses; they shall enter in at the windows, like a thief." Modern travellers bear abundant witness to the same effect; as Burkhardt: "They overwhelm the province of Nodij sometimes to such a degree that, having fathers have seen, since the day that they were upon the earth unto this day. And he turned himself, and went out from Pharaoh.

(7) And Pharaoh's servants said unto him, How long shall this man be a snare unto us? let the men go, that they may serve the LORD their God: knowest thou not yet that Egypt is destroyed? (8) And Moses and Aaron were brought again unto Pharaoh: and he said unto them, Go, serve the LORD your God: but let that shall they go? (9) And Moses said, We will go with our young and with our old, with our sons and with our daughters, with our flocks and with our herds will we go; for we must hold a feast unto the LORD.

(10) And he said unto them, Let the LORD be so with you, as I destroyed the harvest, they penetrate by thousands into the private dwellings, and devour whatsoever they can find, even the leather of the water vessels” (Notes, vol. ii., p. 90). And Merier: “They entered the innmost recesses of the houses, were found in every corner, stuck to our clothes, and infected our food” (Second Journey, p. 100). Kalisch is quite correct when he says: “Sometimes they penetrate into the houses; they fly into the mouths of the inmates; they throw themselves on the food; they gnaw leather, and even wood” (Commentary, p. 123).

Which neither thy fathers, nor thy fathers' fathers have seen.—Only one notice of locusts has been found in the native records.

He turned himself, and went out.—It seems to be meant that Moses did not on this occasion wait to see what effect his menace would have on Pharaoh. He “knew that Pharaoh would not yet fear the Lord” (chap. ix. 30).

(7) Let the men go.—Though the heart of Pharaoh remained hard, the plagues had a certain effect on the minds of the Egyptians. First, the magicians were impressed, and said, “This is the finger of God” (chap. viii. 19). Then a certain number of the people “feared the word of the Lord, and made their servants and their cattle flee into the houses” (chap. ix. 20). Now the very officers of the Court, those who were in the closest contact with the king, believed that the words of Moses would come true, and counselled the king to yield, and “let the men go.” It has been supposed that they meant “the men only” (Knobel, Cook); but this is pure conjecture. The word used, which is not that of verse 11, would cover women and children. The officers of the Court—rich landowners mostly—would dread impending ruin if the wheat and doara crops were destroyed, and would intend to counsel entire submission.

(8) Moses and Aaron were brought again unto Pharaoh.—Moses and Aaron had uttered their threat, and had straightforward left his presence. The courtiers brought them again to Pharaoh.” The courtiers, no doubt, supposed that the king would yield; and the king was prepared to yield to a certain extent. But he had conceived of a compromise in his own mind, and this he hoped to impose upon Moses; hence his insidious question—

Who are they that shall go?—Pharaoh had not hitherto raised this question. He had known well enough that the demand extended to all the people (chap. viii. 8); but now he pretends that there had been an ambiguity, and requires that it shall be cleared up. Moses gives him an answer (verse 9) which takes away all further pretence of doubt.

(9) With our sons and with our daughters... for we must hold a feast.—It was customary in Egypt for children to join in festivals (Herod. ii. 60).

With our flocks and with our herds.—The family of Jacob brought numerous flocks and herds into Egypt (Gen. xlii. 1). These had, no doubt, increased, notwithstanding the oppression, and at the time of the Exodus must have been very numerous. The requirement to “take a lamb for an house” (chap. xii. 2) on the institution of the Passover involved the killing, on a single day, of 200,000 lambs. Even after this the flocks and herds which went out with them (chap. xii. 38) were “very much cattle.”

Little ones.—Heb., hagigebarim—i.e., the full-grown males.

That ye did desire.—There was no ground for this reproach. Moses and Aaron had always demanded the release of the entire nation (“let my people go!”) and nations are composed of women and children as much and as essentially as they are of adult males.

(10) An east wind.—The LXX, translated by νότος, “a south wind,” probably because locusts most commonly enter Egypt from the south, being bred in Nubia or Abyssinia; but the Hebrew (ra'akh-kadinn) is undoubtedly an east wind; and modern travellers tell us that this is a quarter from which locusts arrive in Egypt occasionally (Devon, Voyages en Egypte, p. 286). In such cases they are bred in Northern Arabia.

(11) The locusts went up over all the land of Egypt.—It is not, perhaps, certain that this is intended literally, since universal expressions are cou-EXODUS, X. — Pharaoh's Heart Hardened.

I pray thee, my soul only this once, and in¬ trate the Lord your God, that he may take away from me this death only.
(18) And he went out from Pharaoh, and intreated the Lord. (19) And the Lord turned a mighty strong west wind, which took away the locusts, and cast them into the Red sea; there remained not one locust in all the coasts of Egypt.
(20) But the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go.
(21) And the Lord said unto Moses,
Stretch out thine hand toward heaven, that there may be darkness over the

2 Heb., fastened.

extreme urgency. The visitation of the locusts was felt as far more severe than any previous one. It entirely destroyed all the remaining harvest, both of grain and fruit, and must have produced a terrible famine, had it not been for the Egyptian institution of granaries (Gen. xii. 35, 48, &c.).
I have sinned... — Comp. chap. ix. 27. This con¬ fession is an improvement upon the former one: (1) as acknowledging a double fault—"against the Lord and against you." (2) as free from any attempt to put the blame, either wholly or in part, upon others.
It was probably sincere at the time; but the feeling from which it sprang was short-lived.
(17) This death. — Comp. verse 7. The entire destruction of the harvest threatened death to large numbers of the poorer class of persons.
(19) The Lord turned a mighty strong west wind... — As locusts come, so they commonly go, with a wind. They cannot fly far without one. It often happens that a wind blows them into the sea.
Pallas says, speaking of Crimean locusts in the year 1799:—'Great numbers of them were carried [from the Crimes] by northerly winds into the sea, where they perished, and were afterwards washed on shore in heaps" (Travels, vol. ii., p. 424).

The Red sea. — Heb., the sea of weeds, or of rushes.
The Red Sea probably acquired this name among the Hebrews from the fact that in the time of its north-western recess communicated with a marshy tract, extending as far as the Bitter Lakes, and abound¬ ing in aquatic plants of a luxuriant growth. (Comp.
chap. ii. 3, where the same term designates the water-plants of the Nile.)

There remained not one locust... — Niebuhr says of locusts in Arabia:—'Souvent il en reste beaucoup apres le depart general" (Description de l'Arabie, p. 153). But, on the other hand, there are times when the whole swarm takes its departure at once. "A wind from the south-west," says Morier, "which had brought them, so completely drove them forwards that not a vestige of them was to be seen two hours afterwards" (Second Journey, p. 98).
(20) The Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart.—
Comp. above, chap. ix. 12.

THE NINTH PLAGUE.

(21–23) The ninth plague, like the third and sixth, was sent without any previous warning. It consisted in a "thick darkness," which may have been brought about by means of the KhanaSin, or "Wind of the land of Egypt, even darkness which may be felt. (22) And Moses stretched forth his hand toward heaven; and there was a thick darkness in all the land of Egypt three days: (23) they saw not one another, neither rose any from his place for three days: "and all the children of Israel had light in their dwellings."

(24) And Pharaoh called unto Moses, and said, Go ye, serve the Lord; only let your flocks and your herds be stayed: let your little ones also go with you. (25) And Moses said, Thou must give us also sacrifices and burnt offerings, that we may sacrifice unto the Lord our God. (26) Our cattle also shall go with us; there shall not an hoof be left behind; for thereof must we take to serve the Lord our God; and we know not what we must serve the Lord, until we come thither.

(27) But the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he would not let them go. (28) And Pharaoh said unto him, Get thee from me, take heed to thyself, see my face no more; for in that day thou seekest my face thou shalt die. (29) And Moses said, Thou hast spoken well, I will see thy face again no more.

All the children of Israel had light in their dwellings.—The visitation, whatever it was, did not extend to the land of Goshen. (Comp. chaps. viii. 22—24. iv. 4—7, 26.)

(31) Darkness which may be felt.—Heb., one shall grope darkness. The Authorised Version seems to give the true meaning, which is found also in the LXX. and the Vulg. The idea is an exaggeration of that instinctive feeling which makes us speak of "thick darkness." The general voice of mankind confirms the use of the phrase.

(32) They saw not one another.—Heb., man did not see his brother. The darkness was absolute, equal to that of the darkest night.

Neither rose any from his place.—Comp. chap. xvi. 29. No one quitted his house. Mr. Millington imagines that they all sat "shut to their seats" (Pilgrimages of Egypt, p. 150), but this savours of over-literalism. It is not necessary to suppose that they had no artificial light, or that they ceased to move from chamber to chamber. What the writer intends to note is that all business and all intercourse with neighbours was suspended. No one quitted the house in which he was when the darkness began.
CHAPTER XI.—(1) And the Lord said unto Moses, Yet will I bring one plague more upon Pharaoh, and upon Egypt; afterwards he will let you go hence: when he shall let you go, he shall surely thrust you out hence altogether. (2) Speak now in the ears of the people, and let every man borrow of his neighbour, and every woman of her neighbour, “jewels of silver, and jewels of gold.” (3) And the Lord gave the people favour in the sight of the Egyptians.

tians. Moreover the man Moses was very great in the land of Egypt, in the sight of Pharaoh’s servants, and in the sight of the people.

(4) And Moses said, Thus saith the Lord, “About midnight will I go out into the midst of Egypt: (2) and all the firstborn in the land of Egypt shall die, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sitteth upon his throne, even unto the firstborn of the maidservant that is behind the mill; and all the firstborn of (chap. x. 29). It is the last interview—the last interchange of speech. Moses had to deliver himself of a message. Hardened as his heart is, Pharaoh is yet to be allowed “a place for repentance.” God announces to him, by the mouth of Moses, the coming destruction of the firstborn—emphasizes the terrible nature of the impending calamity by the announcement that through all Egypt there would be “a great cry”—contrasts with their despair the absolute immunity of the Israelites—and finally warns the Pharaoh that he and his people will shortly urge the departure which they now refuse to permit. If Pharaoh had even now relented, it was not too late—the great blows might have been escaped, the death of the firstborn and the destruction of the armed force in the Red Sea. But he had “hardened himself,” and then “been hardened,” until, practically, the time for relenting was gone by. He remained obdurate, and “would not let the children of Israel go out of his land” (verse 10).

About midnight.—The particular night was not specified; and the torment of suspension was thus added to the pain of an intermittent fear. But the dreadful visitation was to come at the dreaddest hour of the twenty-four—midnight. Thus much was placed beyond doubt.

(5) All the firstborn . . . shall die.—The Heb. word translated firstborn is applied only to males; and thus the announcement was that in every family the eldest son should be put off. In Egypt as in many other countries, the law of primogeniture prevailed—the eldest son was the hope, stay, and support of the household, his father’s companion, his mother’s joy, the object of his brothers’ and sisters’ reverence. The firstborn of the Pharaoh bore the title of erpa suten sa, or “hereditary crown prince,” and succeeded his father, unless he died or was formally set aside during his father’s lifetime. Among the nobles, estates were inherited, and sometimes titles descended to the firstborn. No greater affliction can be conceived, short of the general destruction of the people, than the sudden death in every family of him round whom the highest interests and fondest hopes clustered.

The maidservant that is behind the mill marks the lowest grade in the social scale, as the thing that sits upon his throne marks the highest. All alike were to suffer. In every family there was to be one dead (chap. xii. 30).

All the firstborn of beasts.—The aggravation of the calamity by its extension to beasts is very remarkable, and is probably to be connected with the Egyptian animal-worship. At all times there were in Egypt four animals regarded as actual incarnations of deity, and the objects of profound veneration. Three of these were bulls, while one was a white cow. It is beasts. (6) And there shall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt, such as there was none like it, nor shall be like it any more. (7) But against any of the children of Israel shall not a dog move his tongue, against man or beast: that ye may know how that the Lord doth put a difference between the Egyptians and Israel. (8) And all these thy servants shall come down unto me, and bow down themselves unto me, saying, Get thee out, and all the people thereof that follow thee: and after that I will go out. And he went out from Pharaoh in a great anger.

(9) And the Lord said unto Moses, Pharaoh shall not hearken unto you; that my wonders may be multiplied in the land of Egypt. (10) And Moses and Aaron did all these wonders before Pharaoh; and the Lord hardened Pharaoh's heart, so that he would not let the children of Israel go out of his land.

CHAPTER XII.—(1) And the Lord spoke unto Moses and Aaron in the land of Egypt, saying, (2) This month shall be unto you the beginning of months: it shall be the first month of the year to you. (3) Speak ye unto all the congregation of Israel, saying, In the tenth day of this month they shall take to them every man a not unlikely that all were required to be “firstborns,” in which case the whole of Egypt would have been plunged into a religious mourning on account of their deaths, in addition to the domestic mourning that must have prevailed in each house. The deaths of other sacred animals, and of many pet animals in houses, would have increased the general consternation.

(6) There shall be a great cry.—The shrill cries uttered by mourners in the East are well known to travellers. Mr. Stuart Poole heard those of the Egyptian women at Cairo, in the great choral of 1848, at a distance of two miles [Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible, vol. ii., p. 888]. Herodotus, describing the lamentations of the Persian soldiers at the funeral of Masistias, says that “all Boeotia resounded with their clamours” [ix. 24]. The Egyptian monuments represent mourners as tearing their hair, putting dust upon their heads, and beating their breasts (Wilkinson, in Rawlinson’s Herodotus, vol. ii., p. 138).

(7) Shall not a dog move his tongue.—Compare Josh. x. 21. The expression is evidently proverbial.

(8) All those thy servants—i.e., the high officers of the Court who were standing about Pharaoh. These grandees would come to Moses when the blow fell, and prostrate themselves before him as if he were their king, and beseech him to take his departure with all his nation. The details are given more fully and more graphically in this place than in the subsequent narrative (chap. xii. 31).

In a great anger.—Heb., in heat of anger: i.e., burning with indignation. Moses had not shown this in his speech, which had been calm and dignified; but he hero records what he had felt. For once his acquired meekness failed, and the hot natural temper of his youth blazed up. His life had been threatened—he had been ignominiously dismissed—he had been deprived of his right of audience for the future (chap. x. 28). Under such circumstances, he “did well to be angry.”

(9-10) And the Lord said . . .—The series of the nine wonders wrought by Moses and Aaron is terminated by this short summary, of which the main points are—(1) God had said (chap. iv. 21) that the miracles would fail to move Pharaoh; (2) He had assigned as the reason for this failure His own will that the wonders should be multiplied (chap. vii. 3); (3) the miracles had now been wrought; (4) Pharaoh had not been moved by them; (5) God had hardened his heart, as a judgment upon him, after he had first himself hardened it. The result had been a series of manifestations calculated to impress the Israelites with a sense of God’s protecting care, the Egyptians and the neighbouring nations with a sense of His power to punish.

XII.

INSTITUTION OF THE PASSOVER.

(1) In the land of Egypt.—This section (verses 1—28) has the appearance of having been written independently of the previous narrative—earlier, probably, and as a part of the Law rather than of the history. It throws together instructions on the subject of the Passover which must have been given at different times (comp. verses 3, 12, 17), some before the tenth of Abib, some on the day preceding the departure from Egypt, some on the day following. As far as verse 20 it is wholly legal, and would suit Levites as well as Exodus. From verse 20 it has a more historical character, since it relates the action taken by Moses.

(2) The beginning of months.—Hitherto the Hebrews had commenced the year with Tisri, at or near the autumnal equinox. (See chap. xxii. 16.) In thus doing, they followed neither the Egyptian nor the Babylonian custom. The Egyptians began the year in June, with the first rise of the Nile; the Babylonians in Nisanu, at the vernal equinox. It was this month which was now made, by God’s command, the first month of the Hebrew year; but as yet it had not the name Nisan; it was called Abib (chap. xii. 4), the month of “greenness.” Henceforth the Hebrews had two years, a civil and a sacred one (Joseph., Ant. Jud., i. 3, § 3). The civil year began with Tisri, in the autumn, at the close of the harvest; the sacred year began with Abib (called afterwards Nisan), six months earlier. It followed that the first civil was the seventh sacred month, and vice versa.

(3) In the tenth day.—It is evident that this direction must have been given before the tenth day had arrived, probably some days before. The object of the direction was to allow ample time for the careful inspection of the animal, so that its entire freedom from house: (4) and if the household be too little for the lamb, let him and his neighbour next unto his house take it according to the number of the souls; every man according to his eating shall make your count for the lamb. (5) Your lamb shall be without blemish, a male of the first year: ye shall take it out from the sheep, or from the goats: (6) and ye shall keep it up until the fourteenth day of the same month: and the whole assembly of the congregation of Israel shall kill it in the evening. (7) And they shall take of the blood, and strike it on the two side posts and on the upper door post of the houses, wherein they shall eat it. (8) And they shall eat the flesh in that night, roast with fire, and unleavened bread: and with bitter herbs they shall eat it.

all blemish might be ascertained. The animal was not to be killed till four days later (verse 6).

A lamb.—The word used (seh) is a vague one, applied equally to sheep and goats, of any age and of either sex. Sex and age were fixed subsequently (verse 5), but the other ambiguity remained; and it is curious that practically only lambs seem to have been ever offered. The requirement indicates a social condition in which there was no extreme poverty. All Israelites are supposed either to possess a lamb or to be able to purchase one.

According to the house of their fathers.—Rather, for the house of their fathers: i.e., for their family.

(4) If the household be too little for the lamb.—There would be cases where the family would not be large enough to consume an entire lamb at a sitting. Where this was so, men were to club with their neighbors, either two small families joining together, or a large family drafting off some of its members to bring up the numbers of a small one. According to Josephus (Bell. Jud., vi. 9, § 3), ten was the least number regarded as sufficient, while twenty was not considered too many.

Every man according to his eating shall make your count for the lamb.—Rather, shall ye count. In determining the number for any given Paschal meal, ye shall “count men according to their eating,” admitting more or fewer, as they are likely to consume less or more.

(5) Without blemish.—Natural piety teaches that we must not “offer the blind, the lame, or the sick for sacrifice” (Mal. i. 8). We must give to God of our best. The Law emphasized this teaching, and here, on the first occasion when a sacrifice was formally appointed, required it to be absolutely without blemish of any kind. Afterwards the requirement was made general (Lev. xxii. 19—25). It was peculiarly fitting that the Paschal offering should be without defect of any kind, as especially typifying “the Lamb of God,” who is “holy, harmless, undefiled”—a “lamb without spot.”

A male.—Males were reckoned superior to females, and were especially appropriate here, since the victim represented the firstborn male in each house.

Of the first year—i.e., not above a year old. As children are most innocent when young, so even animals were thought to be.

(6) Ye shall keep it up.—Heb., ye shall have it in custody: separate it, i.e., from the flock, and keep it in or near your house for four days. During this time it could be carefully and thoroughly inspected. (Comp. verse 3.)

The whole assembly of the congregation ... shall kill it.—Every head of a family belonging to the “congregation” was to make the necessary arrange-
(9) Eat not of it raw, nor sodden at all with water, but roast with fire; his head with his legs, and with the purtenance thereof. (10) And ye shall let nothing of it remain until the morning; and that which remaineth of it until the morning ye shall burn with fire. (11) And thus shall ye eat it; with your loins girded, your shoes on your feet, and your staff in your hand; and ye shall eat it in haste: it is the Lord’s passover.

(12) For I will pass through the land of Egypt this night, and will smite all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, both man and beast; and against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment: I am the Lord. (13) And the blood shall be to you for a token upon the houses where ye are: and when I see the blood, I will pass over you, and the plague shall not be upon you to destroy you, when I smite the land of Egypt.

(14) And this day shall be unto you for a memorial; and ye shall keep it a feast to the Lord throughout your generations; ye shall keep it a feast by an ordinance for ever. (15) Seven days shall ye eat unleavened bread; even the first day ye shall put away leaven out of your houses: for whosoever eateth leavened bread from the first day until

of the holy feast, where the Lamb of God is our food. At any rate, they were a protest against that animalism which turns a sacred banquet into a means of gratifying the appetite (1 Cor. xi. 20—22).

(9) His head with his legs . . . — The lamb was to be roasted whole; "not a bone of it was to be broken" (verse 46). Justin Martyr says that it was prepared for roasting by means of two wooden spits, one perpendicular and the other transverse, which extended it on a sort of cross, and made it aptly typify the Crucified One.

The purtenance thereof. — Heb., its inside. The entrails were taken out, carefully cleansed, and then replaced.

(10) Ye shall let nothing of it remain. — That there might be neither profanation nor superstitions use of what was left. (Comp. the requirement of the Church of England with respect to the Eucharistic elements.)

That which remaineth — i.e., the bones and such particles of flesh as necessarily adhered to them. These were to be at once totally consumed by fire. Thus only could they be, as it were, annihilated, and so secured from profanation.

(11) Thus shall ye eat it. — The injunctions which follow are not repeated in any later part of the Law, and were not generally regarded as binding at any Passover after the first. They all had reference to the impending departure of the Israelites, who were to eat the Passover prepared as for a journey. The long robe (bepad), usually allowed to flow loosely around the person, was to be gathered together, and fastened about the loins with a girdle; sandals, not commonly worn inside the house, were to be put on the feet, and a walking-stick was to be held in one hand. The meal was to be eaten "in haste," as liable to be interrupted at any moment by a summons to quit Egypt and set out for Canaan. Some such attitude befits Christians at all times, since they know not when the summons may come to them requiring them to quit the Egypt of this world and start for the heavenly country.

It is the Lord’s passover. — The word "passover" (pesahh) is here used for the first time. It is supposed by some to be of Egyptian origin, and to signify primarily "a spreading out of wings, so as to protect." But the meaning "pass over" is still regarded by many of the best Hebraists as the primary and most proper sense, and the word itself as Semitic. It occurs in the geographic name Taphsach (Thapsacus), borne by the place where it was usual to cross, or "pass over," the Euphrates.

(12) For I will pass through. — Rather, go through, since the word used is entirely unconnected with pesahh.

Against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgment. — The translation "gods" is far preferable to that of "princes," given in the margin. The death of all the firstborn beasts would have been felt by the Egyptians as a heavy judgment upon their gods. Some of their sacred animals were regarded as actual incarnations of deity; and if any of these perished, as is likely, the threat would have been executed to the letter. But even apart from this, as cows, sheep, goats, cats, dogs, jackals, crocodiles, hippopotami, apes, ibises, frogs, &c., were sacred, either throughout Egypt or in parts of it, a general destruction of all firstborn animals would have been felt as a blow dealt to the gods almost equally.

I am the Lord. — Heb., I, Jehovah. The construction is, "I, Jehovah, will execute judgment."

(13) The blood shall be to you for a token. — Rather, the blood shall be a token for you: i.e., it shall be a token to Me on your behalf. (See the comment on verse 7, and compare verse 23.)

(14) Ye shall keep it a feast . . . by an ordinance for ever. — The Passover is continued in the Eucharist (1 Cor. v. 7, 8); and the Easter celebration, which the Church makes binding on all her members, exactly corresponds in time to the Paschal ceremony, and takes its place. In this way the Passover may be regarded as still continuing under Christianity, and as intended to continue, "even to the end of the world."

(15) Seven days. — The division of time into periods of seven days each was unknown to the more ancient Egyptians, but is thought to have existed in Babylonia as early as B.C. 2000. That it was recognised in the family of Abraham appears from Gen. xxix. 27. According to some, God established the division by an express command to our first parents in Paradise that they should keep the seventh day holy (see Gen. ii. 3); but this is greatly questioned by others, who regard Gen. ii. 3 as anticipatory, and think the Sabbath was not instituted until the giving of the manna (Exod. xvi. 23). However this may have been, it is generally allowed that the Israelites had not observed the seventh day in Egypt, where, indeed, they were held to labour continually, and that the Sabbath as an actual observance dates from the Exodus. The injunction here given, if it belongs to the seventh day, that soul shall be cut off from Israel. (16) And in the first day there shall be an holy convocation, and in the seventh day there shall be an holy convocation to you; no manner of work shall be done in them, save that which every man must eat, that only may be done of you. (17) And ye shall observe the feast of unleavened bread; for in this selfsame day have I brought your armies out of the land of Egypt: therefore shall ye observe this day in your generations by an ordinance for ever. (18) In the first month, on the fourteenth day of the month at even, ye shall eat unleavened bread, until the one and twentieth day of the month at even. (19) Seven days shall there be no leaven found in your houses: for whosoever eateth that which is leavened, even that soul shall be cut off from the congregation of Israel, whether he be a stranger, or born in the land. (20) Ye shall eat nothing leavened; in all your habitations shall ye eat unleavened bread.

(21) Then Moses called for all the elders of Israel, and said unto them, Draw out and take ye a lamb according to your families, and kill the passover. (22) And ye shall take a bunch of hyssop, and dip it in the blood that is in the bason, and strike the lintel and the two side posts with the blood that is in the bason; and none of you shall go out at the door of his house until the morning. (22) For the Lord will pass through to smite the Egyptians; and when he seeth the blood upon the lintel, and on the two side posts, the Lord will pass over the door, and will not suffer the destroyer to come in unto your houses to smite you. (24) And ye shall observe this thing for an ordinance to thee and to thy sons for ever.
(25) And it shall come to pass, when ye be come to the land which the Lord will give you, according as he hath promised, that ye shall keep this service. (26) And it shall come to pass, when your children shall say unto you, What mean ye by this service? (27) That ye shall say, It is the sacrifice of the Lord’s passover, who passed over the houses of the children of Israel in Egypt, when he smote the Egyptians, and delivered our houses.
And the people bowed the head and worshipped.
(28) And the children of Israel went away, and did as the Lord had commanded Moses and Aaron, so did they.
(29) And it came to pass, that at midnight the Lord smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, from the firstborn of Pharaoh that sat on his throne unto the firstborn of the captive that was in the dungeon; and all the firstborn of cattle. (30) And Pharaoh rose up in the night, he, and all his servants, and all have been necessary to put the blood on the lintel and doors-posts also.

None of you shall go out.—Moses seems to have given this command by his own authority, without any positive Divine direction. He understood that the atoning blood was the sole protection from the destroying angel, and that outside the portal sprinkled with it was no safety.

(23) The destroyer.—The “plague” of verse 13 is called here “the destroyer” (“σκληρεως, LXX.”), as again in Heb. xii. 28. Jehovah seems to have employed an angel, or “angels” (Ps. lxxix. 48) as His agents to effect the actual slaying of the firstborn. (Comp.
2 Sam. xxiv. 16; 1 Chron. xxi. 15; 2 Kings xix. 35.)
There is no struggle or opposition (as Bishop Lowth and Redesleb think) between Jehovah and “the destroyer,” who is simply His minister (Heb. i. 14), bidder to enter some houses and to “pass over” others.
(24) This thing.—Not the sprinkling of the blood, which was never repeated after the first occasion, but the sacrifice of the lamb, commanded in verse 21.
(25) It is the sacrifice of the Lord’s passover.
—Heb. This is a passover-sacrifice to Jehovah. The emphatic word is “Passover;” and it was the meaning of this term which was especially to be explained. The explanation would involve an historical account of the circumstances of the institution, such as would be apt to call forth feelings of gratitude and devotion.

The Tenth Plague.

(29, 30) The nature of the tenth plague is indubitable, but as to the exact agency which was employed there may be different views. In every family in which the firstborn child had been a male, that child was stricken with death. Pharaoh’s firstborn son—the ephah suten son—the heir to his throne, was taken; and so in all other families. Nobles, priests, tradesmen, artisans, peasants, fishermen—all alike suffered. In the hyperbole language of the narrator, “there was not a house where there was not one dead.” And the deaths took place “at midnight,” in the weirdest hour, at the most silent time, in the deepest darkness. So it had been prophesied (chap. xi. 4); but the particular night had not been announced. As several days had elapsed since the announcement, the Egyptians may have been swept in fancied security. Suddenly the calamity fell upon them, and “there was a great cry.” Death did not the Egyptians; and there was a great cry in Egypt; for there was not a house where there was not one dead.

231

(31) And he called for Moses and Aaron by night, and said, Rise up, and get you forth from among my people, both ye and the children of Israel; and go, serve the Lord, as ye have said. (32) Also take your flocks and your herds, as ye have said, and be gone; and bless me also. (33) And the Egyptians were urgent upon the people, that they might send them out of the land in haste; for they said, We be all dead men. (34) And the people shocked religious fanaticism might well produce a cry "such as there was none like it, neither shall be like it any more" (chap. xi. 6).

Not a house where there was not one dead.

—This cannot have been literally true. In half the families a daughter would have "opened the womb;" in others, the firstborn son would have been absent, or dead previously. To judge Scripture fairly, we must make allowance for the hyperbole of Oriental thought and expression, which causes the substitution of universal terms for general ones, and the absence of qualifying clauses. The meaning is that in the great majority of houses there was one dead. This may well have been so, if we include the dependants and the animals. Pet animals—dogs, cats, gazelles, and monkeys—abounded in Egyptian homes.

THE DISMISAL OF THE ISRAELITES.

(31) He called for Moses and Aaron.—This does not mean that Pharaoh summoned them to his presence, but only that he sent a message to them. (See above, chap. xi. 8.) The messengers were undoubtedly chief officials; they "bowed themselves down" before Moses, who was now recognised as "very great" (chap. xi. 3), and delivered their master's message, which granted in express terms all that Moses had ever demanded. Pharaoh's spirit was, for the time, thoroughly broken.

(32) And bless me also.—Here Pharaoh's humiliation reaches its extreme point. He is reduced by the terrible calamity of the last plague not only to grant all the demands made of him freely, and without restriction, but to crave the favour of a blessing from those whom he had despised, rebuked (chap. v. 4), thwarted, and finally driven from his presence under the threat of death (chap. x. 28). Those with whom were the issues of life and death must, he felt, have the power to bless or curse effectually.

(33) The Egyptians were urgent.—Not only Pharaoh, but the Egyptian nation generally was anxious for the immediate departure of the Israelites, and expedited it in every way. This must greatly have facilitated their all setting forth at once. It also accounts for the readiness of the Egyptians to part with their "jewels" and "reaiment" (verse 35).

(34) Kneadingtoughs.—Light, portable wooden bowls, such as are now used by the Arabs.

(35) They borrowed.—See the comment on chap. iii. 22.

(36) They lent.—Rather, "they gave." It is that the Egyptians neither expected nor wished the Israelites to return.
hundred thousand on foot that were men, beside children. They went forth out of Egypt, for it was not leavened: because they were thrust out of Egypt, and could not tarry, neither had they prepared for themselves any victual.

Now the sojourning of the children of Israel, who dwelt in Egypt, was four hundred and thirty years. And it came to pass at the end of the four hundred and thirty years, even the selfsame day it came to pass, that all the hosts of the Lord went out from the land of Egypt. It is a night to be much observed unto the Lord for bringing them out from the land of Egypt: this is that night of the Lord to be observed of all the children of Israel in their generations.

And the Lord said unto Moses and Aaron, This is the ordinance of the passover: There shall no stranger eat thereof: but every man's servant that is bought for money, when thou hast circumcised him, then shall he eat thereof. A foreigner and an hired servant shall not the Lord go out from the land of Egypt.

Further Passover Ordinances.

Was four hundred and thirty years. Comp. the prophecy:—“Thy seed shall be a stranger in a land that is not theirs [Egypt, not Canaan], and shall serve them; and they shall afflict them four hundred years: and also that nation whom they shall serve will I judge” (Gen. xv. 13, 14). The genealogy of Joshua (1 Chron. xii. 22–27), which places him in the eleventh generation from Jacob, accords well with this term of years. The other genealogies are more or less abbreviated.

The selfsame day . . . 41 All started, i.e., on one and the same day—the fifteenth of the month Abib. Some would start during the night, some in the morning, others at different periods of the day. They had different distances to traverse in order to reach the appointed halt, Succoth. Further Directions respecting the Passover.

This is the ordinance. These directions, together with those which follow with respect to the sanctification of the firstborn (chap. xiii. 1–16), seem to have been given to Moses at Succoth, and were consequently recorded at this point of the narrative. They comprise three principal points:—(1) The exclusion of all uncircumcised persons from the Passover (verse 43); (2) the admission of all full proverbs (verses 48, 49); and (3) the injunction that no bone of the lamb should be broken (verse 46).

No stranger. Comp. verse 48 for limitations. If a stranger wished to join, and would accept circumcision for himself and the males of his family, he might partake in the rite.

Every man's servant. Slaves born in the house were required to be circumcised on the eighth day, like Israelites (Gen. xvii. 13). Bought slaves were allowed their choice. It is noticeable that the circumcised slave was to be admitted to full religious equality with his master.

An hired servant. It is assumed that the hired servant will be a foreigner; otherwise, of course, he would participate.
CHAPTER XIII.—(1) And the Lord

NEITHER SHALL YE BREAK A BONE THEREOF.—In the case of all other victims, the limbs were to be separated from the body. Here the victim was to be roasted whole, and to remain whole, as a symbol of unity, and a type of Him through whom men are brought into unity with each other and with God. (See John xix. 33—36.)

(51) This last verse of the chapter would more appropriately commence chap. xiii., with which it is to be united. Translate—"And it came to pass, on the selfsame day that the Lord brought the children of Israel out of the land of Egypt by their armies, that the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, And Moses said unto the people, Remember this day, in which ye came out from Egypt, out of the house of bondage; for by strength of hand the Lord brought you out from this place: there shall no leavened bread be eaten. This day came ye out in the month Abib, and it shall be when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites, and the Hittites, and the Amorites, and the Hivites, and the Jebusites, which he sware unto thy fathers to give thee, a land flowing with milk and honey, that thou shalt keep this service in this month. Seven days thou shalt eat unleavened bread, and in the seventh day shall be a feast to the Lord. Unleavened bread shall be eaten seven days; and there shall no leavened bread

CHAPTER XIII.—(1) And the Lord

Sanctification of the Firstborn, and Law of Redemption

(2) Sanctify unto me all the firstborn.—It was a reasonable demand that the existing firstborn of Israel, spared by God when the Egyptian firstborn were destroyed, should be regarded thenceforth as His, and set apart for His service. The extension of the demand to existing beasts was also reasonable, since they too had been spared. God's further requirement, that henceforth all the firstborn should also be His, was intended to perpetuate the memory of the recent deliverance, and to help to fix it in the mind of the nation. The substitution of a redemption in the case of unclean beasts was necessitated by the circumstances of the case, since they could not be sacrificed; and the redemption of the firstborn sons naturally followed when the Levitical priesthood was established, and their services were no longer necessary. (See Num. iii. 40—51, xviii. 16.) The Jews still observe the ordinance, so far as the children are concerned, and redeem the son which has "opened the womb" on the thirtieth day after the birth.

Remember this day.—Remembrance was secured in four ways:—(1) By the month being made to commence the ecclesiastical year; (2) by the institution of the Passover; (3) by the seven days of unleavened bread; and (4) by the redemption, and the inquiries it would necessitate (verses 14, 15).

The month Abib.—Abib means "green ears of corn," or "greenness;" and the month of Abib was that in which the wheat came into ear, and the earth generally renewed its verdure. It was a "vague," or shifting month, since it properly began with the day of the full moon that followed next after the vernal equinox. It retained its name until the Babylonian capitivity, when the Babylonian name Nisân superseded the original one (Neh. ii. 1; Esther iii. 7).

The Canaanites, and the Hittites...—The full number of the Canaanitish nations was seven, five of which are here enumerated. The other two were the Perizzites and the Girgasites, which seem to have been the least important. The most important were the Canaanites, Hittites, and Amorites; and these are consequently almost always placed first. At the time of the Exodus, and for many centuries afterwards, the actually most powerful nation would seem to have been that of the Hittites. (See Josh. i. 4; 1 Kings x. 29; 2 Kings vii. 6; and compare the Egyptian and Assyrian remains passim.)

A land flowing with milk and honey.—See Note on chap. iii. 8. Thou shalt keep this service.—Kalisch concludes from this verse, and from chap. xii. 25, that there was no obligation upon the Israelites to keep the Passover until they obtained possession of Canaan. He holds that two Passovers only were celebrated before that event—one by Moses in the wilderness of Sinai (Num. ix. 1—5), and the other by Joshua at Gilgal, in the plains of Jericho (Josh. v. 10, 11).

A feast to the Lord.—Comp. chap. xii. 16, where a "holy convocation" is ordered for the seventh be seen with thee, neither shall there be leaveen seen with thee in all thy quarters. (9) And thou shalt shew thy son in that day, saying, This is done because of that which the Lord did unto me when I came forth out of Egypt. (10) And it shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes, that the Lord's law may be in thy mouth: for with a strong hand hath the Lord brought thee out of Egypt. (11) Thou shalt therefore keep this ordinance in his season from year to year.
(12) And it shall be when the Lord shall bring thee into the land of the Canaanites, as he sware unto thee and to thy fathers, and shall give it thee, (12) that thou shalt set apart unto the Lord all that openeth the matrix, and every firstling that cometh of a beast which thou hast; the males shall be the Lord's.

(13) And every firstling of an ass thou shalt redeem with a 3 lamb; and if thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break his neck: and all the firstborn of man among thy children shalt thou redeem.
(14) And it shall be when thy son asketh thee 3 in time to come, saying, What is this? that thou shalt say unto him, By strength of hand the Lord brought us out from Egypt, from the house of bondage: (15) and it came to pass, when Pharaoh would hardly let us go, that the Lord slew all the firstborn in the land of Egypt, both the firstborn of man, and the firstborn of beast: therefore I sacrifice to the Lord all that openeth the matrix, being males; but all the firstborn of my children I redeem. (16) And it shall be for a token upon thine hand, and for frontlets between thine eyes: for by strength of hand the Lord brought us forth out of Egypt.

The Jews regard this day—the twenty-first of Abib—as the anniversary of the passage of the Red Sea. (16) It shall be for a sign unto thee upon thine hand, and for a memorial between thine eyes.—The practice of wearing tephillin, or "phy-llateries," is referred by the Jews themselves to the time of the Exodus, and regarded by them as resting on the present passage, together with Deut. vi. 8 and xi. 18. These phylacteries consist of small strips of parchment, on which are written certain passages from the Law—viz., Exod. xiii. 2—10; Deut. vi. 4—9; and Deut.
ix. 13—21—and which are then folded tight, placed in small boxes, and attached by bands to the left wrist and the forehead at the hours of prayer. It is well known that a similar custom prevailed in Egypt (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, vol. iii., p. 364); and this has been made an objection to the Mosaic institution of phy-llateries, since Moses, it has been thought, would not have encouraged an Egyptian superstition. But the adoption of Egyptian customs, purged from their superstition, is quite in the spirit of the Mosaic institutions, and in no way reprehensible. If the Israelites were addicted to wearing amulets, like the Egyptians, it would have been a wise proviso to substitute for the magic charms of sorcerers the solemn words of the Law, and in this way to turn a current superstition to a good account. The Law was thereby honoured, and the special passages selected would come to be generally known to those who wore them, and to be "in their mouth" and "in their heart" (Deut. xi. 18). [Dean Plumptre notices, in his Commentary on the Temptation (St. Matt.), that our Blessed Lord used against the adversary quotations from the Scriptures forming these tephillin.] (11) The land of the Canaanites.—Either their superior importance or their genealogical position
(Gen. x. 15) caused the term "Canaanites" to be used exclusively of all the Palestinian nations. The land is always "the land of Canaan" (Gen. xi. 9, xii. 5, xxii. 2, &c.).

(12) Thou shalt set apart—i.e., separate off from the rest of the flock or herd, that it might not be mixed up with those which were not "sanctified."
(13) Every firstling of an ass.—It is observable that nothing is said of the Israelites possessing horses.
Horses were well known in Egypt at the time, but were kept only by the kings and the great men. The Hebrews had not been in a position ever to have possessed any. Asses, on the contrary, were exceedingly common, and formed the ordinary beasts of burden in the country. In default of camels, which they seem not to have owned, the Israelites must have carried their tents and other baggage on asses.

Thou shalt redeem.—Since the ass was unclean,
In Egypt he is said to have been "Typhonian;" and Set, the Evil Principle, is represented with long ears, which may be those of an ass. Asses dropt towards the upper extremity. The redeeming of an ass with a lamb (or kid) was favourable to the owner, since the ass colt must have been of considerably more value.

If thou wilt not redeem it, then thou shalt break his neck.—There will always be in every nation those who grudge to make any offering to God, and who will seek to evade every requisition for a gift.
To check such niggarliness, the present law was made.
It would be effectual without requiring to be put in force.

All the firstborn of man among thy children shall thou redeem.—This was declared in anticipation of the arrangement afterwards to be made, whereby the tribe of Levi was taken in lieu of the firstborn for the service of the sanctuary (Num. iii. 40—45), and an obligation was imposed on Israelites of other tribes to "redeem" their sons by a payment of five shekels for each to the priests (Num. xviii. 15, 16).

(16) It shall be for a token.—See the comment on verse 9. The "frontlets" (topaphēth) of this passage, and of Deut. vi. 8, were called tephillin in Chaldee, both words signifying properly "bands" or "circlets." The injunctions on the subject which are here given might undoubtedly be explained as meta-EXODUS, XIII.

from Succoth to Etham.

And it came to pass, when Pharaoh had let the people go, that God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near; for God said, Lest peradventure the people repent when they see war, and they return to Egypt: (12) but God led the people about, through the way of the wilderness of the Red sea: and the children of Israel went up 1harnessed out of the land of Egypt.

The Direction of the March.

(13) God led them not through the way of the land of the Philistines.—In verses 17—19 the writer interposes some parenthetic remarks, which are not a continuation of the narrative interrupted (chap. xii. 42), but rather reflections that occur to him. The starting point of the journey being Tanis or Rameses, in the Eastern Delta, not far from the sea, he sees that the shortest, and apparently the easiest, route for the Israelites to have pursued would have been that which led along the coast, from Tanis to Pelusium, thence to Rhinocolora, and from Rhinocolora to Gaza, Ascalon, and Ashdod, the chief towns of the Philistines. The distance along this line was not more than about 200 miles, and might have been accomplished in a fortnight. He anticipates an inquiry, Why did they not pursue this route? The reply is, that such was not the will of God; and the reason why it was not His will is further given—"The people would probably have repented when they saw war, and would have returned to Egypt." It is implied that the Philistines were already a strong and warlike people, which they may well have been, though not mentioned in the contemporary Egyptian monuments. The Egyptians mention by name very few of the nations of Syria, and the few names which they put on record can seldom be identified.

Although that was near.—Rather, because that was not near, because it was near, lead them that way, but another.

When they see war.—If the Philistines are to be regarded as identical with the "Purusata" of the Egyptian remains, they must be viewed as one of the most warlike of the people of the time. Even leaving aside this identification—which is very uncertain—we must view them as one of the most important of the tribes inhabiting the lower Syrian region. In Joshua's time they already possessed their five strong fortresses—Gaza, Ascalon, Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron (Josh. xiii. 3); and during the period of the Judges they raised themselves to the leading position in the Palestinian region. Palestine derives its name from them, and would not have obtained the name unless they had been a very remarkable race. We can well understand that the Israelites after four centuries of slavery would have been an ill match for the Philistines, and that, if defeated or intimidated, they might have felt that no course was open to them but a return to Egypt.

But God led the people about—Or, led the people a circuit—took them, not by the direct route, through Pelusium, past Lake Serbônis, to Rhinocolora and Gaza, but led them by the most circuitous route possible—the way of the Red Sea and the wilderness of Sinai to the Transjordanic region, the land of the Amorites, and so across Jordan to Canaan proper. The passage seems to dispose altogether of Dr. Brugsch's theory, that the "Red Sea" of the writer of Exodus was the Lake Serbônis, and that it was not until after this lake was passed that their journey was deflected to the south.

The children of Israel went up harnessed out of the land of Egypt.—It is generally agreed that this is a wrong translation. Very few of the Israelites can have possessed suits of armour until after the passage of the Red Sea, when they may have stripped the bodies of the slain Egyptians. Nor has the word used ever the force of "harnessed." It might mean "with their loins girded," but such an exposition would deprive the statement made of any force. Loins were always girded in preparation for a journey, and there would be no need to mention the fact. The best explanation is, that the word here means "organised," "in military order" (Saadia, Gesenius, Lee, Knobel, Cook). It was clearly necessary, to prevent confusion, that a military order should have been adopted, and there are not wanting indications that during the year of contention with Pharaoh such an organisation was introduced and proceeded with. (See chaps. iv. 29, 31, vi. 26, xiii. 3, 21, 51.) It must have been brought to a high pitch of perfection for the Exodus to have taken place, as it seems to have done, without serious confusion or entanglement.

Moses took the bones of Joseph.—Joseph's body had been embalmed according to the Egyptian fashion (Gen. l. 26). He had ordered it to be conveyed to Canaan when the Israelites went there (Gen. l. 25).

The Journey Resumed.

They took their journey from Succoth, and encamped in Etham.—The exact positions of both Succoth and Etham are uncertain, and can only be conjectured; but they probably lay to the southwest of Tanis, between that city and the Bitter Lakes. Succoth may have been at or near Tel Dafneh, about fifteen miles from Tanis, and Etham near the modern Ismailia, on the verge of the desert. Dr. Brugsch's identification of Etham with the Egyptian Khentam is highly improbable, since the Hebrew aleph never replaces the Egyptian kh, which is a very strong guttural. Etham would mean the house of Tom, and point to a temple of the Sun-god, who was specially worshipped in the Eastern Delta, at Heliopolis, Faiyum, and elsewhere.

The Lord went before them.—In verses 17, 18, the writer has declared that "God led the people;" he now explains how. From Succoth certainly, probably from Rameses, He moved in front of the host in the form of a pillar, which had the appearance of smoke light; to go by day and night: (22) he took not away the pillar of the cloud by day, nor the pillar of fire by night, from before the people.

CHAPTER XIV.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Speak unto the children of Israel, that they turn and encamp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, over against Baal-zephon: before it shall ye encamp by the sea. (3) For Pharaoh will say of the children of Israel, They are entangled in the land, the wilderness hath shut them by day and of fire by night. The Israelites marched, it is implied, some part of each day and some part of each night, which would be in accordance with modern practice, and is an arrangement introduced to get the march accomplished before the sun attains its full power. The pillar was at once a signal and a guide. When it moved, the people moved; when it stopped, they encamped (chap. xl. 36-38); where it went, they followed. It bore some resemblance to the fire and smoke signals which generals used when at the head of their armies (Lepsius, Denkmaler, vol. ii., pl. 150, 2; Poppy, Anamoe, 1; Q. Curt. Vit. Alex, v. 2, &c.), and indicated that God had constituted Himself the generalissimo of the host; but it was altogether of a miraculous and abnormal character.

To go by day and night.—The night journeys of the people are mentioned again in Num. ix. 21. (25) He took not away.—Comp. chap. xl. 38; Num. ix. 16, x. 31. The cloud probably disappeared at Abel-shittim (Num. xxxii. 49).

XIV.

THE PURSUIT BY PHARAOH AND THE PASSAGE OF THE RED SEA.

(3) Speak unto the children of Israel, that they turn.—The march of the Israelites had been hitherto almost due south-east. They had reached the edge of the desert (chap. xiii. 20), near the head of the Bitter Lakes. If this direction had been maintained, their next day's march would have taken them out of Egypt into the "wilderness of Etham"—a desolate tract, in which there was no water, and probably scarcely any herbage. The Bitter Lakes would have been upon their right hand, and, so far as the Egyptians were concerned, they would have been in safety. But at this point an express command was given them to "turn," Kalsche, Rosenmüller, and others understand this as a command to "return," or "retrace their steps;" but this is clearly not what was intended, since their march was to bring them to "the sea," which they had not reached previously. The question arises, What sea? Brugsch suggests the Mediterranean; but it is against this that the Mediterranean has not yet been mentioned in Exodus, and that, when mentioned, it is not as "the sea," but as "the sea of the Philistines" (chap. xiii. 31). "The sea" of this verse can scarcely be different from "the Red Sea" of chap. xii. 18, the only sea previously mentioned by the writer. To reach this sea it was necessary that they should deflect their course to the right, from south-east to south, so keeping within the limits of Egypt, and placing the Bitter Lakes on their left hand.

Pi-hahiroth ... Migdol ... Baal-zephon.—These places cannot be identified. They were Egyptian towns or villages of no importance, near the head of the Gulf of Suez, situated on its western shores. The names nearest to Pi-hahiroth in Egyptian geography are Pehir and Pehuret. Migdol would, in Egyptian, be Makhtal; and there was an Egyptian town of that name near Pelusium, which, however, cannot be intended in this place. Baal-zephon was probably a Semitic settlement, which had received its name from some worshippers of the god Baal. Eastern Egypt contained many such settlements. The accumulation of names indicates an accurate acquaintance with Egyptian topography, such as no Israelite but one who had accompanied the expedition is likely to have possessed.

(5) Entangled in the land.—Literally, confused, perplexed. (Comp. Esther iii. 15.) Pharaoh, seeing that the Israelites had placed the Bitter Lakes on their left, and were marching southward, in a direction which would soon put the Red Sea on one side of them and a desert region—that about the Jebel Atakah—on the other, thought that they must be quite ignorant of the geography, and have, as it were, "lost their way." He observed, moreover, that "the wilderness had shut them in." The desert tract between the Nile Valley and the Red Sea lay upon their left and in their front: they would soon be unable to proceed, and would not know which way to turn.

(6) The heart of Pharaoh and of his servants was turned against the people.—No doubt the change began as soon as Israel commenced its march. The emigration left Eastern Egypt a solitude, suspended all the royal works that were in progress, threw the whole course of commerce and business into disorder. Beforehand, neither the king nor the people had understood what the loss of six hundred thousand labourers—some of them highly skilled—would be. When Israel was gone they realised it; consequently both king and people regretted what they had done.

(6) He made ready his chariot.—Egyptian monarchs of the Ramesido period almost always led their armies out to battle, and when they did so, uniformly rode with a single attendant, who acted as charioteer in a two-horse chariot. "Made ready" means, of course, ordered to be made ready.

(7) Six hundred chosen chariots.—The chariot force was that on which the Egyptians chiefly relied for victory from the beginning of the eighteenth hundred chosen chariots, and all the chariots of Egypt, and captains over every one of them. (8) And the Lord hardened the heart of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and he pursued after the children of Israel: and the children of Israel went out with an high hand. (9) But the Egyptians pursued after them, all the horses and chariots of Pharaoh, and his horsemen, and his army, and overtook them encamping by the sea, beside Pi-hahiroth, before Baal-zephon.

(10) And when Pharaoh drew nigh, the children of Israel lifted up their eyes, and, behold, the Egyptians marched after them; and they were sore afraid: and the children of Israel cried out unto the Lord. (11) And they said unto Moses, Because there were no graves in Egypt, hast thou taken us away to die in the wilderness? wherefore hast thou dealt thus with us, to carry us forth out of Egypt?

(12) Is not this the word that we did tell thee in Egypt, saying, Let us alone, that we may serve the Egyptians? For it had been better for us to serve the Egyptians, than that we should die in the wilderness.

dynasty. Diodorus Siculus assigns to his Sesostris (probably Rameses II.) a force of 27,000 chariots; but this is, no doubt, an exaggeration. The largest number of chariots brought together on any one occasion that is sufficiently attested, is believed by the present writer to be 3,940, which were collected by various confederates against an Assyrian king (Ancient Monarchies, vol. ii., p. 103, Note). In 1 Sam. xiii. 5, 30,000 chariots are mentioned, no doubt by some numerical error. A force of 2,500 is said by Rameses II. to have been brought against him in his great Hittite campaign (Records of the Past, vol. ii., pp. 69, 71). Sheshonk I. (Shishak) invaded Judaea with 1,200 (2 Chron. xii. 3). The "six hundred chosen chariots" of the present passage are thus quite within the limits of probability. Most likely they constituted a division of the royal guard, and were thus always at the king’s disposal.

And all the chariots of Egypt.—The word "all" must not be pressed. The writer means "all that were available—that could be readily summoned." These could only be the chariots of Lower Egypt—those stationed at Memphis, Heliopolis, Bubastis, Pi-thom, Schemnutes perhaps, and Pelusium. They would probably amount to several hundreds.

Captains over every one of them.—Rather, over the whole of them. These "captains" are again mentioned in chap. xv. 4. The word in the original—a derivative from the numeral three—is supposed to have meant, primarily, "persons occupying the third rank below the king."

(8) The children of Israel went out.—Rather, were going out.

With an high hand—i.e., confidently, boldly, perhaps somewhat proudly, as having brought the Egyptians to entreat them to take their departure (chap. xii. 33).

(9) All the horses and chariots of Pharaoh.—Hch., all the chariot-horses of Pharaoh.

And his horsemen.—It is questioned whether "horsemen" are really intended here, and suggested that the word used may apply to the "riders" in the chariots. But it certainly means "horsemen" in the later books of Scripture, and, indeed, is the only Hebrew word having exactly that signification. Though the Egyptians do not represent cavalry in any of their battle pieces, yet there is abundant testimony that they employed them. Diodorus Siculus gives his Sesostris 21,000 cavalry to 27,000 chariots (Book i. 54, § 4). Shishak invaded Judaea with 60,000 (2 Chron. xii. 3). Herodotus makes Amasses lead an army on horseback Moses Encourages Israel.

EXODUS, XIV.

The Sea Made to Go back.

(13) And Moses said unto the people, Fear ye not, stand still, and see the salvation of the Lord, which he will shew to you to day: For the Egyptians whom ye have seen to day, ye shall see them again no more for ever. (14) The Lord shall fight for you, and ye shall hold your peace.

(15) And the Lord said unto Moses, Wherefore criest thou unto me? speak unto the children of Israel, that they go forward: (16) but lift thou up thy rod, and stretch out thine hand over the sea, and divide it; and the children of Israel shall go on dry ground through the midst of the sea. (17)And I, behold, I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians, and they shall follow them: and I will get me honour upon Pharaoh, upon all his host, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen. (18) And the Egyptians shall know that I am the Lord, when I have gotten me honour upon Pharaoh, upon his chariots, and upon his horsemen.

(19) And the angel of God, which went before the camp of Israel, removed and went behind them; and the pillar of the cloud went from before their face, and stood behind them: (20) and it came between the camp of the Egyptians and the camp of Israel; and it was a cloud and darkness to them, but it gave light by night to these: so that the one came not near the other all the night.

(21) And Moses stretched out his hand over the sea; and the Lord caused the sea to go back by a strong east wind all that night, and made the sea dry land, and the waters were divided. (22) And the children of Israel went into the midst of the sea upon the dry ground: and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left. (23) And the Egyptians pursued, and went in after them to the midst of the sea, even all Pharaoh's horses, his chariots, and his horsemen. (24) And it came to pass, that in the morning watch the Lord looked unto the host of the Egyptians through the pillar of fire and of the cloud, and troubled the host of the Egyptians, (25) and took off their chariot wheels, 1 that they drew them heavily: so that the Egyptians said, Let us flee from the face of Israel; for the Lord fighteth for them against the Egyptians. (26) And the Lord said unto Moses, Stretch out thine hand over the sea, that the waters may come again upon the Egyptians, upon their chariots, and upon their horsemen. (27) And Moses stretched forth his hand over the sea, and the sea returned to his strength when the morning appeared; and the Egyptians fled against it; and the Lord overthrew the Egyptians in the midst of the sea. (28) And the waters returned, and covered the chariots, and the horsemen, and all the host of Pharaoh that came into the sea after them; thereupon, the Bitter Lakes upon the left. Poetical writers, as was natural, used language still more highly metaphorical (Ps. lxviii. 13; chap. xv. 8), and spoke of the waters as “standing on an heap.” Hence, some moderns have gone so far as to maintain that on this occasion the water “gave up its nature, formed with its waves a strong wall, and instead of streaming like a fluid, concealed into a hard substance” (Kalischer). But this is to turn poetry into prose, and ensnare oneself to a narrow literalism.

... (Continued with the rest of the text)
The Passage through the Waters.

EXODUS, XIV. The Destruction of the Egyptians.

(23–26) The Egyptians pursued.—All the Israelites having entered the bed of the sea, the pillar of the cloud, it would seem, withdrew after them, and the Egyptians, who, if they could not see, could at any rate hear the sound of the departure, began to advance, following on the track of the fugitives. What they thought concerning the miracle, or what they expected, it is difficult to say. They can scarcely have entered on the bed of the sea without knowing it. Probably they assumed that, as the bed had somehow become dry, it would continue dry long enough for their chariots and horsemen to get across. The distance may not have been so much as a mile, which they may have expected to accomplish in ten minutes; but when once they were entered, their troubles began. “The Lord looked unto the host of the Egyptians through the pillar . . . and troubled the host of the Egyptians” (verse 24). By some terrible manifestation of His presence and of His anger, proceeding from the pillar of the cloud in their front, God threw the Egyptian troops into consternation and confusion. A panic terror seized them. Some probably stopped, some fled; but there were others who persevered. Then followed a second difficulty. The progress of the chariots was obstructed. According to the present reading of the Hebrew text, the wheels parted from the axles, which would naturally bring the vehicles to a stand. According to the LXX. and a reading found in the Samaritan Pentateuch, the wheels “became entangled,” as they would if they sank up to the axles in the soft ooze. Hereby the advance was rendered slow and difficult. “They drew them heavily.” To the Egyptians the obstruction seemed more than could be accounted for by natural causes, and they became convinced that Jehovah was fighting for Israel and against them (verse 25). Hereupon they turned and fled. But the flight was even harder than the advance. A confused mass of horses and chariots filled the channel—they impeded each other—could make no progress—could scarcely move. Then came the final catastrophe. At God's command, Moses once more stretched his hand over the sea, and the waters returned on either side—a north-west wind brought back those of the Bitter Lakes (chap. xiv. 10), the flood tide those of the Red Sea—and the whole of the force that had entered on the sea-bed in pursuit of the Israelites was destroyed.

(27–28) All Pharaoh's horses, his chariots, and his horsemen.—The chariot and cavalry force alone entered the sea, not the infantry. (Comp. verse 28 and chap. xv. 1.) The point is of importance as connected with the question whether the Pharaoh himself perished. If all his force entered, he could not well have stayed behind; if only a portion, he might have elected to remain with the others. Menephtah, the probable Pharaoh of the Exodus, was apt to consult his own safety. (Records of the Past, vol. iv., pp. 44, 45.)

(24) In the morning watch.—Between 2 a.m. and 6.

(29) And the Lord said.—Or, The Lord had said. Probably the command was given as soon as the Israelites were safe across. It would take some hours for the north-west wind to bring back the waters of the Bitter Lakes.

(29) When the morning appeared.—This would be about five o'clock. The light showed the Egyptians their danger. The white-crested waves were seen advancing on either side, and threatening to fill up the channel. The Egyptians had to race against them; but in vain. Their chariot wheels clogged, themselves and their horses encumbered with heavy armour, they made but slow way over the soft and slimy ground; and while they were still far from shore, the floods were upon them, and overwhelmed them. In this way God “overthrew the Egyptians in the midst of the sea.”

(29) The chariots, and the horsemen, and all the host . . .—This translation is misleading. The Heb. runs thus: “The chariots and the horsemen (who were) all the host of Pharaoh that came into the sea.” It is implied that his footmen did not enter the sea.

There remained not so much as one of them.—The armour of an Egyptian warrior would make it impossible for him to escape by swimming from such a catastrophe. All who were caught by the tide would certainly be drowned. The question whether the Pharaoh was drowned or no cannot be ruled by the expression here used, nor by any parallel one in the Psalms (Pss. lxviii. 53, v. 11); it depends on more general considerations. In the first place, is it likely remained not so much as ‘one of them. (29) But the children of Israel walked upon dry land in the midst of the sea; and the waters were a wall unto them on their right hand, and on their left. (30) Thus the Lord saved Israel that day out of the hand of the Egyptians; and Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea shore. (31) And Israel saw that if the Pharaoh had been killed there would have been no explicit mention of it? Would the point have remained one open to question? Secondly, if the Pharaoh had been killed, would the Egyptian annals have retained no trace of it? Must we not have had some account of a great king cut off in the flower of his age, after a reign of two, or at the most three, years? (Comp. chap. ii. 23, iv. 19, &c.) But Memphithah, to whom all the indications point, reigned at least eight years. The latter part of his reign was inglorious, and he left the empire a prey to pretenders; but he was not suddenly cut off after reigning a year or two. Thirdly, was an Egyptian king sure to lead an attack, and place himself in the position of most peril? This has been asserted, and it is so far true, that most Egyptian kings, according to the records which they have left of themselves, seduced. But it happens that Memphithah records it of himself that on one great occasion, at any rate, he kept himself out of danger. His country was invaded by a vast army of Libyans and others from the north-west in the fifth year of his reign; the assailants menaced his chief cities, and the peril was great. Memphithah collected all his forces to meet the danger, but declined to lead them out in person, pretending that one of the Egyptian gods, Pitthah, had forbidden him to quit Memphis (Brugsch, History of Egypt, vol. ii., p. 119). It is thus quite probable that he would remain with the reserve of footmen when the chariots and horsemen entered the bed of the sea. (32) Israel saw the Egyptians dead upon the sea shore.—On one who saw this sight it would be likely to make a great impression; to after generations it was nothing, since it had no further consequences. That it is recorded indicates the pen of an eyewitness. (33) Israel saw that great work.—The destruction of the Pharaoh's chariot force and cavalry in the Red Sea secured the retreat of Israel, and saved them from any further molestation at the hands of the Egyptians. The spirit of the nation was effectually broken for the time; and it was not till after several reigns and an interval of anarchy, that there was a revival. The king himself probably despaired of effecting anything against a foe that was supernaturally protected; and the army, having lost the flower of the chariot force, on which it mainly depended for success, desired no further contest. The Israelites, as will be seen further on, in their rapid march to Sinai avoided the Egyptian settlements, and having once reached the Sinaitic region, they were beyond the dominion of Egypt, and for forty years quite out of the path of Egyptian conquest. The episode in the life of the nation begun by the descent of Jacob into Egypt now terminated, and a fresh beginning was made. In the open air of the desert, cut off from all other races, admitted to close communion with Jehovah, the people entered upon that new and higher existence which culminated in the teaching of the prophets, in the noble struggles of Ezra and Nehemiah, and in the memorable stand on behalf of religious truth and national independence which was made by the Maccabees.

240

CHAPTER XV. — (1) Then sang Moses and the children of Israel this song unto the Lord, and spoke, saying, I will sing unto the Lord, for he hath

THE SONG OF MOSES.

(1) Then sang Moses and the children of Israel.—With his usual modesty, Moses does not say that he composed the magnificent ode which follows; but it is scarcely conceivable that it can have had any other author. It bears a close resemblance to the Egyptian religious poetry, with which Moses—and probably no other Israelite of the time—would have been familiar from his early training; and it breathes the elevated tone of religious sentiment that was scarcely shared with Moses by any contemporary. The prophetic statements in the latter verses of the hymn have led some to assign to it a date later than Joshua; but the vagueness of these statements stands in a remarkable contrast with the definiteness and graphic power of the descriptive portion, and points to the time of Moses for the composition. The poet's genius shown in the composition is, no doubt, very considerable; but the statement that it transcends all later Hebrew poetry would not have been made by any critic whose judgment was not biased by his theories. The ode is distinguished from later similar compositions by greater simplicity in the language, and greater freedom in the rhythmical arrangement. There is the usual "parallelism of clauses," with three varieties of "anthithetic, synthetic, and synonymous," but the regular cadence is interrupted with unusual frequency by triplet stanzas, and the parallelism is less exact than that of later times.

The ode divides itself into two portions (verses 1—12 and verses 13—18): the first retrospective, the second prospective. Part II. has no sub-divisions; but Part I. consists of three, or perhaps we should say, of four, portions. First comes the burden, or refrain (verse 1), which was repeated at the close of each sub-division by Miriam and her choir of women (verse 21). Then we have the first stanza, or strophe, reaching from verse 2 to verse 5. Next we have stanza or strophe 2, extending from verse 6 to verse 10. After this, stanza or strophe 3, comprising verses 11 and 12. These shorter, and as it were tentative, efforts are followed by the grand burst of prophetic song which constitutes Part II., and extends from verse 13 to verse 18, terminating with the sublime utterance, beyond which no thought of man can go, "The Lord shall reign for ever and ever." I will sing.—It may convey to the ordinary reader some idea of the rhythm of the ode to transcribe into Roman characters and accentuate this opening passage, which is as follows:—

Ashirah layovah ki gdth gath.
Sas v'rokebo ramah bayam.
triumphed gloriously: the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea.

(2) The Lord is my strength and song, and he is become my salvation: he is my God, and I will prepare him an habitation; my father's God, and I will exalt him. (3) The Lord is a man of war: the Lord is his name. (4) Pharaoh's chariots and his host he cast into the sea: his chosen captains also are drowned in the Red sea. (5) The depths have covered them: they sank into the bottom as a stone. (6) Thy right hand, O Lord, is become glorious in power: thy right hand, O Lord, hath dashed in pieces the enemy. (7) And in the greatness of thine excellency thou hast overthrown them that rose up against thee: thou sentest forth thy wrath, which consumed them as stubble. (8) And with the blast of thy nostrils the waters were gathered together, the floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed in the heart of the sea. (9) The enemy said, I will pursue, I will overtake, I will divide the spoil; my

He hath triumphed gloriously.—Heb., he hath glorified himself gloriously (ἔκθετος εὐφαγάστα, LXX.). The main idea implied in the verb γαίη is exaltation.

(2) The Lord is my strength and song.—Heb., My strength and song is Jehovah. The contracted form of Jehovah, Jah, is here used for the first time; but its existence in the current speech has already been indicated by the name Moriah, which occurs in Gen. xxi. 1. It is here used on account of the rhythm.

He is become my salvation.—Heb., he has been to me for salvation: i.e., he has saved me out of the hand of Pharaoh. The beauty and force of the passage causes Isaiah to adopt it into one of his most glorious poems, the "joyful thanksgiving of the faithful for the mercies of God," contained in his twelfth chapter. (See verse 2.)

I will prepare him an habitation.—So Okeles and Aben-Ezra; but Jarchi, the Targums of Jerusalem and Jonathan, the LXX., and Vulg., with most moderns, translate, "I will glorify him." It is a strong objection to the rendering of the Authorized Version that Moses is not likely to have had the idea of preparing God a habitation until the revelation of God's will on the subject was made to him on Sinai (chaps. xxi. —xxvii.). The law of parallelism also requires such a meaning as "glorify" to correspond with the "exalt" of the next clause.

My father's God.—"Father" here, by a common Hebrew idiom, stands for "forefathers" generally. (Comp. Note on chap. iii. 6.)

(3) The Lord is a man of war.—The directness and boldness of the anthropomorphism is markedly archaic, and is wisely retained by our translators. How turgid and yet weak are the Samaritan, "mighty in battle," and the LXX., "crusher of wars," in comparison!

The Lord is his name. In the very name, Jehovah, is implied all might, all power, and so necessarily the strength to prevail in battle. The name, meaning "the Existent," implies that nothing else has any real existence independently of Him; and if no existence, then necessarily no strength.

(4) His chosen captains.—Comp. chap. xiv. 7, where the same word is used.

Are drowned.—Rather, were drowned.

The depths have covered them.—Rather, covered them. The first stanza, or strophe, here terminates—the first historical review is completed. In it attention is concentration on the one great fact of the deliverance by the destruction of the Egyptians in the Red Sea. At the close it is probable that Miriam, with her chorus of wondrous, took up the refrain of verse 1, and slightly modifying it, sang, as recorded in verse 21, "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath glorified himself gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

6—10 The second stanza, or strophe, expands the subject-matter of the first. It begins, like the first, with some general expressions, setting forth the glory and power of Jehovah (verses 6, 7), as shown in the recent catastrophe. From this it proceeds to the catastrophe itself, which it describes in considerable detail, noting (1) the sudden rise of the wind (verse 8); (2) the gathering together of the waters into separate masses (ibid.); (3) the boastful and vindictive temper of the Egyptians (ibid.); (4) the rise of a second wind (verse 9); (5) the consequent return of the waters; and (6) the submerging of the host by them. The second stanza is considerably longer than the first, consisting of twelve, whereas the first consists of only seven, lines.

(6) Thy right hand.—Here is a second anthropomorphism, following naturally on the first, and occurring in the later Scriptures frequently, though now used for the first time.

Hath dashed in pieces.—Rather, dashes in pieces. The verb is in the future, but is a future of continuance.

(7) Thou hast overthrown . . .—Heb., thou overthrewest them that rise up against thee; thou sentest forth thy wrath; it consumeth them like stubble.

(8) The blast of thy nostrils.—The "east wind" of chap. xiv. 21. (Comp. Ps. xviii. 15.) As a physical effect, the gathering together of the waters, is ascribed to the "blast," as we must understand a physical cause. Otherwise, God's wrath might be meant, as in Job iv. 9. The floods stood upright as an heap, and the depths were congealed.—The literalism which, taking its stand on these phrases, maintains that the water "gave up its nature (Kalisch) indicates an inability to distinguish poetry from prose, and fact from imagery. As well might it be held that the east wind was actually the breath of God's nostrils. (See the Note on chap. xiv. 22.)

(9) The enemy said.—Pharaoh's soldiers were as anxious as their master to come to blows. (See above, verse 7.) They hoped to acquire the rich spoil which the Israelites had carried off from Egypt in the shape of gold and silver ornaments and goodly apparel (chap. xii. 35, 36), as well as their flocks and herds (ibid. verse 33).

My lust.—Heb., my soul. The particular passion to be gratified was cupidity, or desire of riches.
lust shall be satisfied upon them; I will draw my sword, my hand shall destroy them. (10) Thou didst blow with thy wind, the sea covered them: they sank as lead in the mighty waters. (11) Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods? who is like thee, glorious in holiness, fearful in praises, doing wond-

EXODUS, XV.

lers? (12) Thou stretchedst out thy right hand, the earth swallowed them. (13) Thou in thy mercy hast led forth the people which thou hast redeemed: thou hast guided them in thy strength unto thy holy habitation. (14) The people shall hear, and be afraid: sorrow shall take hold on the inhabitants of

Destroy them.—So the Vulg., Unkelos, Rosenmüller, Klokoč, Kalisch, and others. The meaning "re-passess," given in the margin, rests upon the rendering of the LXX., which is ἀπορρέον, but is otherwise unsupported.

(10) Thou didst blow with thy wind.—A new fact, additional to the narrative in chap. xiv., but in complete harmony with it. As a strong east (south-east) wind had driven the waters of the Bitter Lakes to the north-westward, so (it would seem) their return was aided and hastened by a wind from the opposite direction, which caused the sea to "cover the Egyptians.

They sank as lead.—Compare verse 5. To an eye-witness, it would seem, the sudden submersion and disappearance of each warrior, as the waters closed around him, was peculiarly impressive. Each seemed to be swallowed up at once, without a struggle. This would be a natural result of the heavy armour worn by the picked warriors.

In the mighty waters.—With these words the second stanza, or strophe, closes. Miriam and her maidens, it is probable, again interposed with the magnificent refrain, "Sing ye to the Lord, for he hath glorified himself gloriously; the horse and his rider hath he thrown into the sea."

(11, 12) Stanza 3 is a short one, entering into no details—simply summing up the entire result in two sentences: one, parallel to verses 2, 3 and 6, 7, setting forth the glory of God, as shown in the occurrences; the other emphasising the great fact of the occasion, and stating it in the briefest possible terms: "Thou stretchedst out thy right hand; the earth swallowed them." This second clause is parallel to verses 4, 5 and 8—10. It concentrates into four words the gist of those two passages.

(11) Who is like unto thee... among the gods?—This is undoubtedly the true meaning. It had been a main object of the entire series of miraculous visitations to show that Jehovah was "exalted far above all other gods." (See chaps. vii. 5, xiv. 4, 18.) Moses now emphasises the contrast by adding three points on which Jehovah is unapproachable—holiness, awfulness, and miraculous power. God is (1) "glorious in holiness," exalted in this respect far, far above all other beings; (2) "fearful in praises"—the proper object of the profoundest awe, even to those who approach Him with praise and thanksgiving; and (3) one who "doeth wonders," who both through nature, and on occasions overruling nature, accomplishes the most astonishing results, causing all men to marvel at His Almighty power. The gods of the heathen were, in fact, either nonexistent or evil spirits. So far as they were the former, they could come into no comparison at all with Jehovah; so far as they were the latter, they fell infinitely short of Him in every respect. Of holiness they possessed no remnant; in awfulness they were immeasurably inferior; in the ability to work wonders they did not deserve to be mentioned in the same breath. "Among the gods," as the Psalmist says, "there is none like unto thee, O Lord; there is none that can do as thou dost" (Ps. lxxxvi. 8).

(12) The earth swallowed them.—The sea, which actually "swallowed them," was a part of the earth. Literalism might argue that the statement contravened former ones (verses 4, 5, 10); but the fact is otherwise. If we only allow our common sense fair play, and permit sacred writers the same latitude as profane ones, we shall find wonderfully few discrepancies, or even difficulties, in the Biblical nar-
Palestine. (15) Then the dukes of Edom shall be amazed; the mighty men of Moab, trembling shall take hold upon them; all the inhabitants of Canaan shall melt away. (16) Fear and dread shall fall upon them; by the greatness of thine arm they shall be as still as a stone; till thy people pass over, O Lord, till the people pass over, which thou hast purchased. (17) Thou shalt bring them in, and plant them in the mountain of thine inheritance, in the place, O Lord, which thou hast made for thee to dwell in, in the Sanctuary, O Lord, which thy hands have established. (18) The Lord shall reign for ever and ever.

(19) For the horse of Pharaoh went in with his chariots and with his horsemen into the sea, and the Lord brought again the waters of the sea upon them; but the children of Israel went on dry land in the midst of the sea.

(20) And Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a timbrel in her hand; and all the women went out after an historical comment, showing the occasion on which the poem was composed. When the records of Moses were collected—either by himself, towards the close of his life, or by Joshua—the addition was kept, although it had become unnecessary for the original purpose. As it stands, it emphasizes the great fact of Israel's final deliverance—the nucleus around which Exodus gathers itself.

(20) Miriam the prophetess. —In Miriam we have the first of that long series of religious women presented to us in Holy Scripture who are not merely pious and God-fearing, but exercise a quasi-ministerial office. Examples of other "prophetesses" will be found in Judges iv. 4; 2 Kings xxii. 14; Isa. viii. 3; Luke ii. 36. In the early Christian Church there was an order of "daconesses" (Rom. vi. 1; Apost. Const., vi. 17). The office of "prophetess" seems to have been permitted to women in Egypt, though that of "priestess" was, until Tolemaic times, forbidden them.

The sister of Aaron. —She is called "sister of Aaron," rather than of Moses, because Aaron was the head of the family (chaps. vi. 20, vii. 7). There is no reasonable doubt that she was the sister who kept watch on Moses when he was in the ark of bulrushes (chap. ii. 3–8). On her later history, see Num. xii. 1–15. The prophet Micah regarded her as having had a part in the work of Israel's deliverance (Micah vi. 4).

Timbrels and with dances. —By "timbrels" are meant tambours, or tambourines, favourite instruments in Egypt, and usually played by women there (Wilkinson: Ancient Egyptians, vol. i. p. 93). The combination of music with song in religious worship, here for the first time brought before us, became the fixed rule of the Tabernacle service from the time of David (2 Sam. vi. 15; 1 Chron. xxiii. 5, xxv. 1–6), and was adopted into the Temple service from its first establishment (2 Chron. v. 12). Sanctified under the new covenant by the general praise of psalmody, and by the representations given in the Apocalypse of the Church triumphant in heaven (Rev. v. 8, xiv. 2, 3), it has always maintained itself in the Christian Church, and still holds its ground firmly. Dancing, on the contrary, though adopted into religious worship by many nations, sanctioned by the present passage, by the example of David (2 Sam. vi. 16), and by expressions in the Psalms (cxliv. 3, cl. 4), has never found an entrance into Christian ceremonial, unless among a few fanatic sects. The reason of this is to be found in the abuses which, through human infirmity, became by degrees connected with the practice, causing it to become unfit for a religious purpose. In the primitive times, however, solemn
EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.

EXODUS, XV.

The Journey to Elim.

The waters of Marah.
CHAPTER XVI.—(1) And they took their journey from Elim, and all the congregation of the children of Israel came unto the wilderness of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai, on the fifteenth day of the second month after their departing out of the land of Egypt. (2) And the whole congregation of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness: (3) and the children of Israel said unto them, Would to God we had died by the hand of the Lord in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the flesh pots, and when we did eat bread to the full; for ye have brought us forth into this wilderness, to kill this whole assembly with hunger.

(4) Then said the Lord unto Moses, Behold, I will rain bread from heaven for you; and the people shall go out and gather 1 a certain rate every day,

Palestine, p. 68)—specimens of the palm-tree growing under difficulties. The exact number of “twelve wells,” which is mentioned in the text, cannot now be traced with any distinctness; but there is a perennial brook which supports the vegetation through the whole of the year, and in the winter-time there is a large stream which flows down to the sea through the wady. — (Niebuhr: Description de l’Arabie, p. 347.)

They encamped there.—The head-quarters of the camp were at Elim (Wady Gharundel); probably the mass of the people filled all the neighbouring wadys, as those of Useit, Ethal, and Tayibeh, or Shuweikah, which are all fertile, and have good pasturage.

XVI.

THE JOURNEY FROM ELIM.—THE MANNA GIVEN.

(1) They took their journey from Elim.—The stay at Elim was probably for some days. “Sin” was reached exactly one month after the departure from Egypt, yet there had been only five camping-places between Sin and Rameses, and one journey of three days through a wilderness (chap. xv. 22). Long rests are thus clearly indicated, and probably occurred at Ayun Musa, at Marah, and at Elim. The places named were the head-quarters of the camp on each occasion, but the entire host must have always covered a vast tract, and the flocks and herds must have been driven into all the neighbouring valleys where there was pasture. Wadys Useit, Ethal, and Tayibeh are likely to have been occupied at the same time with Wady Gharundel.

All the congregation came unto the wilderness of Sin.—“All the congregation” could only be united in certain favourable positions, where there happened to be a large open space. Such an open space is offered by the tract now called El Markha, which extends from north to south a distance of twenty miles, and is from three to four miles wide in its more northern half. To reach this tract, the Israelites must have descended by Wady Useit or Wady Tayibeh to the coast near Ras Abu Zenimeh, and have then continued along the coast until they crossed the twenty-ninth parallel. This line of march is indicated in Num. xxxiii. 10, 11, where we are told that “they removed from Elim, and encamped by the Red Sea; and they removed from the Red Sea, and encamped in the wilderness of Sin.”

(2) The whole congregation murmured.—This is the third “murmuring.” The first was at Pi-lahuneth, on the appearance of the feast of the Passover (chap. xiv. 11, 12); the second was at Marah, when the water proved undrinkable (chap. xv. 24); the third, in the wilderness of Sin, was brought about by no special occurrence—unless it were the exhaustion of the supplies of grain which had been brought out of Egypt—but seems to have resulted from a general dissatisfaction with the conditions of life in the wilderness, and with the prospects which lay before them.

(3) Would to God we had died.—Heb., Would that we had died. There is no mention of “God.”

By the hand of the Lord.—There is, perhaps, an allusion to the last of the plagues, “Would that we had not been spared, but had been smitten, as the Egyptians were! A sudden death would have been far better than a long and lingering one.” (Comp. Lam. iv. 9.)

When we did eat bread to the full.—The Israelites had been well fed in Egypt. They had been nourished upon flesh, fish, bread, and abundant vegetables, especially cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, and garlic (Num. xi. 5). It was the habit of the Egyptians to feed well those whom they employed in forced labours (Herod, ii. 125), just as slave-owners commonly do their slaves. The remembrance of the past abundance intensified the pain felt at the present want.

To kill this whole assembly with hunger.—It is difficult to imagine that there could have been as yet any real danger of starvation. The cattle may have suffered considerably in the passage through the wilderness of Shur, but the bulk of it survived (chap. xvii. 3), and there were lambs enough for the whole nation to observe a Passover a few months later at Sinai (Num. xiv. 1—5). But it may well be that a considerable number of the Israelites had no cattle; others may have lost what they had, or have consumed them. Want may have stare some in the face, and the nation generally may have come to see that the prospect before them was a dismal one. Even supposing that the desert was anciently four or five times as productive as it is now, it could not possibly have afforded sufficient pasturage to maintain such flocks and herds as would have been requisite to support on their milk and flesh a population of two millions. It may have been brought home to the people that their flocks and herds were rapidly diminishing, and they may have realised the danger that impended of ultimate starvation after the cattle was all gone.

(4) I will rain bread from heaven for you.—This first announcement at once suggests that the supply is to be supernatural. “Bread from heaven” was not simply “food out of the air” (Rosenmüller), but a celestial, that is, a Divine supply of their daily needs.

A certain rate every day.—Heb., a day’s meal each day—sufficient, that is, for the wants of himself and family for a day.

That I may prove them.—Human life is a probation; God proveth all, also most whom He takes to Himself for His “peculiar people,” and the trial is often by means of positive precepts, which are especially that I may prove them, whether they will walk in my law, or no. (5) And it shall come to pass, that on the sixth day they shall prepare that which they bring in; and it shall be twice as much as they gather daily.

And Moses and Aaron said unto all the children of Israel, At even, then ye shall know that the Lord hath brought you out from the land of Egypt;
(7) and in the morning, then ye shall see the glory of the Lord; for that he heareth your murmurings against the Lord: and what are we? that ye murmur against us? (8) And Moses said,
"This shall be, when the Lord shall give you in the evening flesh to eat, and in the morning bread to the full; for that the Lord heareth your murmurings which ye murmur against him: and what are we? your murmurings are not against us, but against the Lord.

calculated to test the presence or absence of a spirit of humble and unquestioning obedience. Our first parents were tested by a positive precept in Paradise; the family of Abraham were tested by a positive precept—circumcision on the eighth day; the Israelites were tested, both in the wilderness and afterwards throughout their career as a nation, by a number of positive precepts, whereof this concerning the manna was one.
Christians are tested by positive precepts with respect to common worship, prayer, and sacraments—the object being in all cases to see whether men "will walk in God's law or no." Men are very apt to prefer their own inventions to the simple rule of following at once the letter and the spirit of God's commandments.

(5) On the sixth day—i.e., the sixth day after the first giving of the manna (Kalisch). Although in Babylonia, from a time certainly earlier than the Exodus, a Sabbath was observed on the seventh, fourteenth,
twenty-first, and twenty-eighth day of each month (Sayce: Records of the Past, vol. vii., pp. 157—167), yet we have no evidence that the year was divided into weeks, much less that the several days of the week were known as the first, second, third, fourth, &c. In Egypt, the week of seven days was at this time unknown.

They shall prepare.—On the method of preparation see Num. xi. 8.

It shall be twice as much.—Some suppose this to be a command—"Ye shall gather twice as much;"
but it is more natural to take it as an announcement of a fact—"You will find that what you have gathered turns out to be twice as much." (So Kurz, Kalisch, and Knobel.) A miraculous doubling of the quantity seems to be intended. (Comp. verse 22.)

(6) At even, then ye shall know . . .—The allusion is to the quails, which came up "at even," and covered the camp. (See verses 12, 13.)

(7) And in the morning, then ye shall see the glory of the Lord.—The reference here is to the manna, which "in the morning lay round about the host." (verse 15), not to the "appearance" of verse 10, which preceded the coming of the quails, and was not as far as we are told—"in the morning." The "glory of God" was strikingly revealed in a gift which was not transient, but secured permanently the subsistence of the people so long as it might be necessary for them to continue in the wilderness. (Comp. the paral-lelism of verses 8 and 12.)

(8) The glory of the Lord appeared in the cloud.—The Hebrew, as at present pointed, has "in a cloud," but there can be no reasonable doubt that the "pillar of the cloud" is meant. It was before this that they had been required to appear (verse 9), and from this almost certainly that some bright radiance was now made to stream forth. The object was at once to rebuke their murmurings, and to uphold the authority of Moses and Aaron.

(9) At even the quails came up.—The common quail (Tetrao coturnix) is very abundant in the East, and regularly migrates from Syria and Arabia in the autumn of the year for the purpose of wintering in Central Africa, whence it returns in immense masses in the spring (Schubert: Reise, vol. ii., p. 361). Exhausted after a long flight over the Red Sea, the flocks drop to the ground as soon as they reach the coast, and it is then easy either to take the birds with the hand or to kill them with sticks. Diodorus says that "the inhabitants of Arabia Petraea were wont to prepare long nets, and spread them near the coast for many furlongs, by which means they caught a great quantity of quails, which were in the habit of coming in from the sea." (i. 60).
The flesh of the quail is regarded as a delicacy throughout the East, though if too many are eaten it is said to be unwholesome.

The dew lay.—Literally, there was a lying of
dew. A heavy fall seems to be meant.

(11) Was gone up—i.e., was drawn up by the heat of the sun.

A small round thing, as small as the hoar frost.—What the manna was has been much disputed.
There are two natural substances, quite distinct, with which it has been compared, and by some persons identified. One is a deposit from the air, which falls
The Manna is Given.

EXODUS, XVI.

Rules for Gathering it.

a small round thing, as small as the hour frost on the ground. (13) And when the children of Israel saw it, they said one to another, 1 It is manna: for they vist not what it was. And Moses said unto them, "This is the bread which the Lord hath given you to eat. (16) This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded, Gather of it every man ac-ording to his eating, an omer for every man, according to the number of your persons; take ye every man for them which are in his tents. (17) And the children of Israel did so, and gathered, some more, some less. (18) And when indifferently on trees, stones, grass, &c., and is generally thick and sticky, like honey, but under certain circumstances is 'concreted into small granular masses.' This has been described by Aristotle (Hist. An. v. 22), Pliny (H. N. xi. 12), Avicenna (p. 212), Aelian (Hist. An. xv. 7), Shaw, Forskal, and others. It has been called ἄμμος, or "air-honey" (Athen. Deipn. xi. p. 500). It is collected by the Arabs, and eaten with their unleavened cakes as a condiment. It so far resembles the manna that it comes with the dew, is spread upon the ground generally, and melts when the sun's rays attain a certain power (Edmann; Misc. Collect., vol. iv. p. 7). But it is never found in large quantities; it does not fall for more than two months in the year; and it is wholly unfit to serve as man's principal food, being more like honey than anything else. The other substance is a gum which exudes from certain trees at certain seasons of the year, in consequence of the punctures made in their leaves by a small insect, the Cocceus manippurus.

It has been described at length by C. Niebuhr in his Description de L'Arabie (pp. 128, 129); by Rauwolf (Travels, vol. i. p. 94); Gmelin (Travels through Russia to Persia, Part III., p. 28), and others. It is comparatively a dry substance, is readily shaken from the leaves, and consists of small yellowish-white grains, which are hard, and have been compared to carriander seed by moderns (Rauwolf, etc.). The name "manna" attaches in the East to this latter substance, which is employed both as a condiment, like the "air-honey," and also as a laxative. The special points in which it differs from the manna of Scripture are its concretion to certain trees or bushes, its comparative permanency, for it "accumulates on the leaves" (Niebuhr, p. 129), and its unfitness for food. It has also, like the "air-honey," only a short season—the months of July and August.

The manna of Scripture in certain respects resembles the one, and in certain other respects the other of these substances, but in its most important characteristics resembles neither, and is altogether sui generis. For
(1) it was adapted to be men's principal nourishment, and served the Israelites as such for forty years; (2) it was supplied in quantities far exceeding anything that is recorded of the natural substances compared with it; (3) it continued through the whole of the year; (4) for forty years it fell regularly for six nights following; and ceased upon the seventh night; (5) it "bred worms" if kept to a second day, when gathered on five days out of the six, but when gathered on the sixth day continued good throughout the seventh, and bred no worms. The manna of Scripture must therefore be regarded as a miraculous substance, created ad hoc, and not as a natural product. It pleased the Creator, however, to proceed on the lines of Nature, so to speak, and to assimilate His new to certain of His old creations.

(15) It is manna.—This is certainly a wrong transliteration. The words of the original, man hu, must either be rendered, as in the LXX. and the Vulg., "What is this?"; or, as by Kimchi, Knobel, Gesenius, Kurtz, and others, "This is a gift." It is against the former rendering that man does not mean "what" in Hebrew, but only in Chaldee, and that "what is this" would be a very strange name to give to a substance. Against the latter it may be said that neither is man found elsewhere in Hebrew in the sense of "a gift;" but it has that sense in Arabic; and in Hebrew מanna is "to give."

This is the bread—i.e., the promised bread. (See verse 4.)

(16) Every man according to his eating.—
Comp. chap. xii. 4. Each man was to gather according to his immediate need and that of his family. No one was to seek to accumulate a store.

An omer.—About three pints English.

For every man.—Literally, for every head. As families would average four members, each man would have to gather, on an average, six quarts. If even 500,000 men gathered this amount, the daily supply must have been 30,000 bushels.

His tents.—Heb., his tent.

(19) When they did mete it with an omer.—
Each Israelite gathered what he supposed would be about an omer for each member of his family.
Some naturally made an over, some an under estimate;
but whatever the quantity collected, when it came to be measured in the camp, the result was always the same —there was found to be just an omer for each. This result can only have been miraculous.

(19) Let no man leave of it.—Moses must have been divinely instructed to issue this command. It was doubtless given in order that the Israelites might realise their absolute dependence upon God for food from day to day, and might so be habituated to complete trust and confidence in Him.

(20) It bred worms.—On the Sabbath it bred no worms (verse 24), so that we must view the result spoken of as a punishment for disobedience, not as produced naturally. Neither of the natural mannas is subject to any very rapid decomposition.

(22) On the sixth day they gathered twice as much.—See the third Note on verse 5.
sixth day they gathered twice as much bread, two ounces for one man: and all the rulers of the congregation came and told Moses. (23) And he said unto them, This is that which the Lord hath said, To morrow is the rest of the holy sabbath unto the Lord: bake that which ye will bake to day, and seethe that ye will seethe; and that which remaineth over lay up for you to be kept until the morning. (24) And they laid it up till the morning, as Moses bade: and it did not stink, neither was there any worm therein. (25) And Moses said, Eat that to day; for to day is a sabbath unto the Lord: to day ye shall not find it in the field. (26) Six days ye shall gather it; but on the seventh day, which is the sabbath, in it there shall be none. (27) And it came to pass, that there went out some of the people on the seventh day for to gather, and they found none. (28) And the Lord said unto Moses, How long refuse ye to keep my commandments and my laws? (29) See, for that the Lord hath given you the sabbath, therefore he giveth you on the sixth day the bread of two days; abide ye every man in his place, let no man go out of his place on the seventh day. (30) So the people rested on the seventh day. (31) And the house of Israel called the name thereof Manna: and it was like coriander seed, white; and the taste of it was like wafers made with honey. (32) And Moses said, This is the thing which the Lord commandeth, Fill an omer of it to be kept for your generations; that they may see the bread wherewith I have fed you in the wilderness any rate—since they would have gathered had they found anything to gather. Thus they provoked God a second time; yet was He “so merciful, that He destroyed them not,” but “turned His anger away, and did not stir up all His wrath” (Ps. lxxxvii. 38). Apparently He made allowance for the ordinance being a new one, to which they were not yet accustomed. (33) Manna.—Rather, man. (See Note on verse 15.) "Manna" is a Greek form, first used by the LXX. translator of Numbers (chap. xi. 6, 7, 9). It was like coriander seed.—The appearance of the manna is compared above to bear’s froth (verse 14); here, and in Num. xi. 7, to coriander seed. The former account describes its look as it lay on the ground, the latter its appearance after it was collected and brought in. The coriander seed is “a small round grain, of a whitish or yellowish grey.” In Numbers it is further said that the colour was that of beadlimum, which is a whitish resin. The taste of it was like wafers made with honey.—In Numbers the taste is compared to that of fresh oil (Num. xi. 8). The wafers or cakes used by the Egyptians, Greeks, and other ancient nations as offerings, were clearly composed of unleavened flour, oil, and honey. According to a Jewish tradition, which finds a place in the Book of Wisdom (chap. xvi. 20, 21), the taste of the manna varied according to the wish of the eater, and “tempered itself to every man’s liking.” (32—35) And Moses said . . . Fill an omer.—This narrative, which must belong to a later date than any other part of Exodus, since it assumes that the Tabernacle is set up (verse 34), seems to have been placed here on account of its subject-matter. The ness, when I brought you forth from the land of Egypt. (33) And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a pot, and put an omer full of manna therein, and lay it up before the Lord, to be kept for your generations. (34) As the Lord commanded Moses, so Aaron laid it up before the Testimony, to be kept. (35) And the children of Israel did eat manna forty years, until they came to a land inhabited; they did eat manna, until they came unto the borders of the land of Canaan. (36) Now an omer is the tenth part of an ephah.

CHAPTER XVII.—(1) And all the writer wishes to conclude the history of the manna, and has two further points to note concerning it: (1) the preservation of an omer of it as a perpetual memorial (verses 32—34); and (2) the fact of its continuance until the Israelites reached the borders of Canaan. The passage is probably an addition to the original "Book," but contains nothing that may not have been written by Moses.

(33) Lay it up before the Lord.—Comp. verse 33, where Aaron is said to have "laid it up before the Testimony," i.e., the Two Tables. According to the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews, the Ark of the Covenant contained three things only—the tables, the pot of manna, and Aaron's rod that budded (Heb. ix. 4). The deposit of the manna in so sacred a place may be accounted for by its typifying "the true bread from heaven" (John vi. 32).

(35) The children of Israel did eat manna forty years.—Moses may have added this verse to the present chapter shortly before his death, when the manna had continued for thirty-nine years and nine months. He does not say that it had ceased to be given. We know that in fact it did not cease till the Jordan was crossed by the Israelites under Joshua, and Canaan was actually reached (Josh. v. 10—12).

(36) Now an omer.—The "omer" and the "ephah" were both of them Egyptian measures. One—the latter—continued in use among the Hebrews, at any rate, until the captivity (Ezek. xlv., xlvi.); the other—the omer—fell out of use very early. Hence this parenthetic verse, which is exegetical of the word "omer," and may have been added by the completer of Deuteronomy, or by some later editor—perhaps Ezra.

XVII.

THE MURMURING AT REPHIDIM AND THE FIGHT WITH AMALEK.

(1) The children of Israel journeyed from the wilderness of Sin.—The route by which Rephidim was reached is very uncertain. From El Markha there are three modes of reaching the Wady Feiran, where Rephidim is placed by most critics. One route (the shortest) is from the northern part of El Markha by Wady Shellal and Wady Magharah, where there was an important Egyptian settlement. This the Israelites would probably have avoided. Another, from the central part of El Markha, leads through the Wady Seh Sidreh to Magharah, and would, therefore, have been equally inconvenient. The third is circuitous, but has the advantage of being very open, and therefore suitable for a vast host. It passes through the whole of El Markha, and then, skirting the mountain, enters Wady Feiran at its south-western extremity. The probability seems on the whole to be that the Israelites pursued this last route.

After their journeys.—We find from Num. xxxii. 12, 13, that Rephidim was reached from the wilderness of Sin by three journeys—from Sin to Dophkah, from Dophkah to Alush, and from Alush to Rephidim. The distance by the route which we have supposed the Israelites to have taken is about fifty miles.

Rephidim means rests, or resting-places, and is an appropriate name for the central part of the Wady Feiran—the most fertile spot in the whole peninsula, where there is usually abundant water, rich vegetation, and numerous palm-trees. (Lepsius, Tour from Thebes to Sinai, pp. 21, 37; Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, pp. 40, 41.) According to Dean Stanley, "the oldest known tradition of the peninsula" identifies Rephidim with Paran—the seat of an early bishopric—undeniably the same word with Feiran.

There was no water.—Though Feiran is usually watered by a common stream, there have been occasions when the brook has been dried up. Graul found it dry in March, 1858. (Stanley, p. 40, Note 3.)

(2) The people did chide.—Water is scanty along the route by which we have supposed Rephidim to have been reached. Such a supply as the people may have brought with them from Elim would have been exhausted. They would have looked forward to Rephidim both for their immediate necessity and for replenishing their water-skins. They would be suffering both from thirst and disappointment. The needs of their children and their cattle (verse 3) would be an aggravation of their pain. They would see no hope in the future. Under the circumstances we cannot be surprised at their "chiding." Nothing but a very lively faith, or an utter resignation to the will of God, could have made a people patient and submissive in such an extremity.

Give us water.—It was not faith that spoke in these words, but wrath. They had no belief that Moses could give them water, and "were almost ready to stone him" (verse 3).

(3) To kill us.—This was no exaggeration. Thirst kills as surely as hunger, and more quickly. Whole armies have died of it. (Herod. ii. 26.) Ships' crews
And Moses cried unto the Lord, saying, What shall I do unto this people? they be almost ready to stone me. And the Lord said unto Moses, Go on before the people, and take with thee of the elders of Israel; and thy rod, wherewith thou smittest the river, take in thine hand, and go. Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink. And Moses did so in the sight of the elders of Israel.

And he called the name of the place Massah, and Meribah, because of the chiding of the children of Israel, and because they tempted the Lord, saying, Is the Lord among us, or not?

Then came Amalek, and fought with Israel in Rephidim. And Moses said unto Joshua, Choose us out men, and go out, fight with Amalek: to morrow I will stand on the top of the hill with the rod of God in mine hand.

So Joshua did as Moses had said to do.

1. And water brought out of the rock, EXODUS, XVII. Israel Attacked by Amalek.

2. And Moses cried unto the Lord, saying, What shall I do unto this people? they be almost ready to stone me.

3. And the Lord said unto Moses, Go on before the people, and take with thee of the elders of Israel; and thy rod, wherewith thou smittest the river, take in thine hand, and go. Behold, I will stand before thee there upon the rock in Horeb; and thou shalt smite the rock, and there shall come water out of it, that the people may drink. And Moses did so in the sight of the elders of Israel.

4. Then came Amalek, and fought with Israel in Rephidim. And Moses said unto Joshua, Choose us out men, and go out, fight with Amalek: to morrow I will stand on the top of the hill with the rod of God in mine hand.

5. So Joshua did as Moses had said to do.
Moses Hands held up. EXODUS, XVII. Amalek Discomfited.

him, and fought with Amalek: and Moses, Aaron, and Hur went up to the top of the hill. (11) And it came to pass, when Moses held up his hand, that Israel prevailed: and when he let down his hand, Amalek prevailed. (12) But Moses' hands were heavy; and they took a stone, and put it under him, and he sat thereon; and Aaron and Hur stayed up his hands, the one on the one side, and the other on the other side; and his hands were steady until the going down of the sun. (13) And Joshua discomfited Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword. (14) And the Lord said unto Moses, Write this for a memorial in a book, and rehearse it in the ears of Joshua: for I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven. (15) And Moses built an altar, and called the name of it Jehovah-nissi: (16) for he said, Because the Lord hath sworn that the Lord will have war with Amalek from generation to generation.

Aaron was eighty-three; Hur, the grandfather of Bezaleel (chap. xxxi, 2), the architect of the Tabernacle, can scarcely have been less. Unfit for battle themselves, they felt it was by prayer and intercession that they could best help forward a good result, and so withdrew themselves from the actual conflict to a place where they could command it. Hur.—According to Jewish tradition (Joseph., Ant. Jud., iii, 2, § 4) Hur was the husband of Miriam, and so the brother-in-law of Moses and Aaron. He was a descendant of Judah through Pharez and Hezron. (1 Chron. ii, 3—20) Moses left him joint regent with Aaron when he ascended up into Sinai (chap. xxiv, 14).

(13) When Moses held up his hand...Israel prevailed, &c.—In order to teach the lesson of the value of intercessory prayer, God made the fortunes of the fight to vary according as Moses “held up his hand,” or allowed it to sink down. It is not probable that the Israelites were directly affected by the bodily movements of Moses, or indeed could discern them, but Moses, Aaron, and Hur were strung by the fact that the fluctuations in the battle coincided with the motions of Moses hands.

(12) Moses' hands were heavy.—Moses writes with a clear remembrance of his feelings at the time. His hands, long stretched to heaven, grew weary, “heavy,” feeble; he could no longer raise them up, much less stretch them out, by his own muscular energy. They sank down, and dropped by his sides. If the battle was not to be lost, it was necessary to find some remedy. Apparently, Aaron and Hur betook themselves of an effective remedy, none being suggested by Moses.

They took a stone.—Partly to give him a certain amount of rest, but, perhaps, mainly to enable them the better to sustain his hands. The fact is one of those “little” ones, which none but one engaged in the transactions would have been likely to have been acquainted with. (See "Introduction," § v.)

Aaron and Hur stayed up his hands.—Left to himself, Moses had become exhausted both mentally and bodily, and when his hands dropped, had ceased to pray. Sustained physically by his two companions, his mind recovered itself, and was able to renew its applications and continue them. The result was the victory.

(14) Write this for a memorial in a book.—Heb., "in the book." That "books" existed long prior to Moses is implied in his quotation of them (Gen. v. 1; Num. xxi, 14), and has of late years been abundantly proved by the discoveries made of Egyptian papyruses dating from a time long anterior to the Jewish lawgiver. The expression used in the present place, if it may be trusted, *"the book," is remarkable, and seems to imply that a book already existed at the date of the engagement, in which God's dealings with His people were entered from time to time. (See Introduction to Speaker's Commentary, vol. i., p. 1.) This book was probably the germ of the existing Pentateuch, which was composed in many portions, and at intervals, as occasion arose.

I will utterly put out the remembrance of Amalek.—The extermination of Amalek, here prophesied, was afterwards laid as a positive command upon the Israelites (Deut. xxv, 19), and was accomplished in part by Saul and David (1 Sam. xiv. 48, xv. 7, xvii. 8, xxx. 17; 2 Sam. viii. 12), but finally and completely in the reign of Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv. 43). Amalek's sin was, that after all the signs and wonders which had shown the Israelites to be God's peculiar people, he braved God's displeasure by attacking them (Deut. xxv. 18). To this audacity and contempt of Jehovah's power he added a cruel pitilessness, when he fell upon the rear of an almost unarmored host, at a time when they were "faint and weary.

(15) Moses built an altar.—Primarily, no doubt, to sacrifice thank-offerings upon it, as an acknowledgment of the Divine mercy in giving Israel the victory. But secondarily as a memorial—a monument to commemorate Israel's triumph.

And called the name of it Jehovah-nissi.—Jachob had named an altar "El-Elohe-Israel" (Gen. xxxiii. 20); but otherwise we do not find altars given special names. When an altar was built as a memorial, the purpose would be helped by a name, which would tend to keep the event commemorated in remembrance. Jehovah-nissi—"the Lord is my banner"—would tell to all who heard the word that here there had been a struggle, and that a people which worshipped Jehovah had been victorious. It is not clear that there is any reference to "the rod of God" (verse 9) as in any sense the "banner," under which Israel had fought. The banner is Jehovah Himself, under whose protection Israel had fought and conquered.

(16) Because the Lord hath sworn that the Lord will have war with Amalek.—Heb., because (his) hand is against the throne of Jehovah, (there shall be) war to Jehovah with Amalek, &c. The Hebrew can scarcely be said to be "obscure." It gives plainly enough the sense which our translators have placed in the margin. Amalek, by attacking Israel, had lifted up his hand against the throne of God, therefore would God war against him from generation to generation.

* Baspper, "in a book," and bassper, "in the book," differ only in the pointing, which, resting solely on tradition, cannot be entirely depended on. The LXX. omit the article.
CHAPTER XVIII. — (1) When Jethro, the priest of Midian, Moses' father in law, heard of all that God had done for Moses, and for Israel his people, and that the Lord had brought Israel out of Egypt; (2) then Jethro, Moses' father in law, took Zipporah, Moses' wife, after he had sent her back, (3) and her two sons; of which the name of the one was Gershom; for he said, I have been an alien in a strange land: (4) and the name of the other was Eliezer; for the God of my father, said he, was mine help, and delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh: (5) and Jethro, Moses' father in law, came with his sons and his wife unto Moses into the wilderness, where he encamped at the mount of God: (6) and he said unto Moses, I thy father in law Jethro am come unto thee, and thy wife, and her two sons with her. (7) And Moses went out to meet his father in law, and did obeisance, and kissed him; and they asked each other of their welfare; and they came into the tent.

(8) And Moses told his father in law all that the Lord had done unto Pharaoh and to the Egyptians for Israel's sake, and all the travail that had come upon them by the way, and how the Lord delivered them. (9) And Jethro rejoiced for all the goodness which the Lord had done to Israel, whom he had delivered out of the hand of the Egyptians. (10) And Jethro said, Blessed be the Lord, who hath delivered you out of the hand of the Egyptians, and out of God's — may be here used, in a broad sense, of the entire Sinaitic mountain-region, as "wilderness" is just before used in the broad sense of the infertile region between Egypt and Palestine. Or the movement described in chap. xix. 1, 2 may have taken place before Jethro's arrival, though not related until after it. Wo must bear in mind that Exodus was probably composed in detached portions, and arranged afterwards. The present chapter has every appearance of being one such detached portion.

(11) Moses went out . . . and did obeisance. — Oriental etiquette required the going forth to meet an honoured guest (Gen. xviii. 2, xix. 1, &c.). The obeisance was wholly voluntary, and marks the humility of Moses, who, now that he was the prince of his nation, might well have required Jethro to bow down to him. And kissed him. — Kissing is a common form of salutation in the East, even between persons who are in no way related. Herodotus says of the Persians: "When they meet each other in the streets, you may know if the persons meeting are of equal rank by the following token: if they are, instead of speaking they kiss each other on the lips. In the case where one is a little inferior to the other, the kiss is given on the cheek." (Book i. 134.) (Comp. 2 Sam. xv. 5, xix. 39, xx. 9; Matt. xxvi. 48, 49; Acts xx. 37, &c.; and for the continuance of the custom to the present day, see the collection of instances given in the article "Kiss," in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. ii. p. 46.)

They asked each other of their welfare. — Heb., wished peace to each other — exchanged, that is, the customary salutation, "Peace be with you." (11) Jethro said, Blessed be the Lord. — Heb., Jehovah. The Midianites, descendants of Abraham by Keturah, acknowledged the true God, and the Israelites could rightfully join with them in acts of worship. But it is scarcely likely that they knew God among themselves as "Jehovah." Jethro, however, understanding Moses to speak of the supreme God under that designation, adopted it from him.
blessed His name, and expressed his conviction that Jehovah was exalted above all other gods. The pure monotheism of later times scarcely existed as yet. The gods of the nations were supposed to be spiritual beings, really existent, and possessed of considerable power, though very far from omnipotent. (See Deut. xxxii. 13, 17.)

(12) For in the thing ...—Heb., even in the matter in which they dealt strongly against them. Jehovah's superior power had been shown especially in the matter in which the Egyptians had dealt most strongly—viz., in pursuing the Israelites with an army when they had given them leave to depart, and attempting to re-capture or destroy them.

(13) Jethro ... took a burnt offering and sacrifices for God.—Jethro had brought sacrifices with him, and now offered them in token of his thankfulness for God's mercies towards himself and towards his kinsmen. He occupied a position similar to that of Melchizedek (Gen. xiv. 18), holding a priesthood of the most primitive character, probably as patriarch of his tribe, its head by right of primogeniture. As Abraham acknowledged rightly the priesthood of Melchizedek (Gen. xiv. 18; Heb. vii. 2-9), so Moses and Aaron rightly acknowledged that of Jethro. They markedly indicated their acceptance of his priestly character by participation in the sacrificial meal, which, as a matter of course, followed his sacrifice. They "ate bread with Moses' father in law" (or rather, brother-in-law) "before God."

(14) On the morrow.—The day following Jethro's arrival.

Moses sat to judge the people.—The office of prince, or ruler, was in early times regarded as including within it that of judge. Rulers in these ages were sometimes even called "judges," as were those of Israel from Joshua to Samuel, and those of Carthage at a later date (suffetes). Ability to judge was thought to mark out a person as qualified for the kingly office (Herod. i. 57). Moses, it would seem, had, from the time that he became chief of his nation, undertaken the hearing of all complaints and the decision of all causes. He held court days from time to time, when the host was stationary, and judged all the cases that were brought before him. No causes were decided on any one else. Either it had not occurred to him that the duty might be discharged by deputy, or he had seen reasons against the adoption of such an arrangement. Perhaps he had thought his countrymen unfit as yet for the difficult task. At any rate, he had acted as sole judge, and had, no doubt, to discharge the duty pretty frequently. Knowing that there was much business on hand, he did not allow the visit of his near connection to interfere with his usual habits, but held his court just as if Jethro had not been there.

The people stood by Moses from the morning unto the evening.—So great was the number of causes, or so difficult were they of decision, that Moses was occupied the whole day in deciding them. Following the usual Oriental practice, he began early in the morning, and found himself compelled to continue until nightfall. It is not clear whether his "sessions" were always of this length, or whether on this occasion the ordinary time was exceeded. Some have suggested that the division of the Amalekite spoil would naturally have led to disputes, and so to complaints.

(15) Why sittest thou thyself alone?—The emphatic word is "alone." Why dost thou not, Jethro means, devolve a part of the duty upon others?

(16) Moses assigns two reasons for his conduct. (1) The people want decisions which they can feel to have Divine sanction—they "come to him to enquire of God"—and the ruling of inferior judges would not be regarded by them as equally authoritative. (2) He does not simply judge—i.e., decide the particular question brought before him; but he takes the opportunity to educate and instruct the people in delivering his judgments—he "makes them know the statutes of God and His laws"—he expounds principles and teaches morality. Both reasons were clearly of great weight, and constituted strong arguments in favour of his practice.

The thing that thou dost is not good.—Weighty as the arguments were, they failed to convince Jethro. He brought forward counter-arguments. By continuing to act as lighthouse, Moses would, in the first place, exhaust his own strength, and, secondly, exhaust the patience of the people. His practice was unadvisable, both on his own account and on theirs. To keep suitors waiting all day, and perhaps finally dismiss them without their turn having come, was not fair upon them.

God shall be with thee.—Rather, may God be with thee. May He give thee wisdom to direct thy course aright.
EXODUS, XVIII.

Moses follows it.

Jethro’s Advice to Moses.

my voice, I will give thee counsel, and God shall be with thee: Be thou for the people to God-ward, that thou mayest bring the causes unto God: and thou shalt teach them ordinances and laws, and shalt show them the way wherein they must walk, and the work that they must do. Moreover thou shalt provide out of all the people able men, such as fear God, men of truth, hating covetousness; and place such over them, to be rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens: and let them judge the people at all seasons: and it shall be, that every great matter they shall bring unto thee, but every small matter they shall judge: so shall it be easier for thyself, and they shall bear the burden with thee. If thou shalt do this thing, and God command thee so, then thou shalt be able to endure, and all this people shall also go to their place in peace.

So Moses hearkened to the voice of his father in law, and did all that he had said. And Moses chose able men out of all Israel, and made them heads over the people, rulers of thousands, rulers of hundreds, rulers of fifties, and rulers of tens. And they judged the people at all seasons: the hard causes they brought unto Moses, but every small matter they judged themselves. And Moses let his father in law depart; and he went his way into his own land.

Be thou for the people to God-ward.—Be the person, i.e., to bring before God whatever needs to be brought before Him. Continue both to act as representative of the people towards God, and as representative of God towards the people. Take all difficult causes to Him, and pronounce to the people His decision upon them. Be also the expounder to the people of God’s laws and ordinances; be their moral instructor, and the guide of their individual actions (verses 20). All this is quite compatible with the change which I am about to recommend to thee.

Provide out of all the people able men.—This was the gist of Jethro’s advice. It seems somewhat surprising that it should have been needed. In Egypt, as in all other settled governments, while the king was the fountain of justice, it was customary for him to delegate the duty of hearing causes to officials of different ranks, who decided in this or that class of complaints. In Arabia a similar practice no doubt prevailed. Jethro himself had his subordinates, the head men of the various clans or families, who discharged judicial functions in “small matters,” and thereby greatly lightened the burden which would otherwise have rested upon his shoulders. His advice to Moses was simply that he should adopt this generally established system—one which belongs to a very early period in the history of nations.

Jethro’s definition of “able men”—men, i.e., fitted to exercise the judicial office—is interesting. He requires them to be (1) God-fearing, (2) truthful, and (3) men of integrity. The second and third requirements would approve themselves to men of all times and countries. The first would generally be deemed superfluous. But it really lies at the root of all excellence of character, and is the point of greatest importance.

Rulers of thousands, and rulers of hundreds...—An organisation of the entire people on a decimal system is implied in the arrangement suggested. Such an organisation may not improbably have existed at the time in connection with the march and the encamping. (See the Comment on chap. xiii. 18.) Jethro thought that it might be utilised for judicial purposes. One man out of ten might be competent to judge in “small matters.” If either party were dissatisfied, there might be an appeal to the “ruler of fifty”—from him to the “ruler of an hundred,” and then to the “ruler of a thousand.” In all ordinary disputes this would suffice, and the contest would not require to be carried further.

At all seasons.—Not on occasional court days, as had been the custom of Moses, but day by day continually.

Every great matter they shall bring unto thee.—It must have been left to the judges themselves to decide what were “great” and what were “small matters.” Under ordinary circumstances, courts would be inclined to extend their jurisdiction, and take enlarged views of their competency; but the difficulties of desert life were such as to counteract this inclination, and induce men to contract rather than widen, their responsibilities. When the wilderness life was ended, the judicial system of Jethro came to an end also, and a system at once simpler and more elastic was adopted.

If thou shalt do this thing, and God command thee so.—A reference of the entire matter to God, before any final decision was made, is plainly indicated. Moses must have already had some mode of consulting God on any point which required to be settled, and obtaining an answer. Was it by the “Urim and Thummim”? Thou shalt be able to endure.—Comp. verse 18, where the inability of Moses to endure, unless he made some change, was strongly asserted.

And all this people shall also go to their place in peace.—The people, i.e., will go on their way to Canaan peacefully and contentedly, without suffering the inconvenience to which they are now subject.

Moses hearkened.—The appointment of judges, according to Jethro’s advice, was not made until after the giving of the Law and the setting up of the Tabernacle. (See Deut. i. 9-15.) In our particular Moses departed from the counsel given to him. Instead of directly choosing the “able men” himself, he left the selection to the people (Deut. i. 13), and contented himself with investing the men chosen with their authority. Comp. the course taken by the apostolic college with respect to the first deacons (Acts vi. 3-6).

Moses let his father in law depart.—Heb., Moses dismissed his connection. The supposed identity of Hobab (Num. x. 29; Jud. iv. 11) with Jethro seems more probable.
Arrival at Sinai.

EXODUS, XIX.

God's Message by Moses.

CHAPTER XIX.—(1) In the third month, when the children of Israel were gone forth out of the land of Egypt, the same day came they into the wilderness of Sinai. (2) For they were departed from Rephidim, and were come to the desert of Sinai, and had pitched in the wilderness; and there Israel camped before the mount. (3) And *Moses went up unto God, and the Lord called unto him out of the mountain, saying, Thus shalt thou say to the house of Jacob, and tell the children of Israel; (4) *Ye have seen what I did unto the Egyptians, and how I bare you on eagles' wings, and brought you unto myself. (5) Now therefore, if ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant, then ye shall be a peculiar treasure unto me above all people: for all the earth is mine: (6) and ye shall be unto me a kingdom of priests, and an holy nation. These are the words which thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel.

(7) And Moses came and called for the elders of the people, and laid before preceeded by this statement, for Hobab clearly remained with Moses till the close of the stay at Sinai, and Moses, instead of "dismissing" him, was most unwilling that he should depart.

XIX.

The Manifestation of God to the People on Mount Sinai.

(3) They were departed from Rephidim.—If Rephidim was where we have placed it, in the Wady Feiran, the march to "the wilderness of Sinai" (Er Rahah) must have been by the Wady Solaf, or the Wady esh Sheikh, or possibly by both. The distance by Wady Solaf is about eighteen, by Wady esh Sheikh about twenty-five miles. The wilderness of Sinai, now generally identified with Er Rahah, is a plain two miles long by half a mile wide, "enlosed between two precipitous mountain ranges of black and yellow granite, and having at its end the prodigious mountain block of Ras Sufaatche" (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 74). It is nearly flat, and covered at present with stunted tamarisk bushes. "No spot in the whole peninsula is so well supplied with water" (Our Work in Palestine, p. 268).

Israel camped before the mount.—On the capacity of the plain Er Rahah to receive the entire multitude, see Stanley (Sinai and Palestine, p. 42), and comp. the comment on chap. xii. 37—41. The Ras Sufaatche is visible from every part of the plain.

(3) Moses went up unto God—i.e., ascended Sinai, where he expected that God would speak with him.

The Lord called unto him out of the mountain.—While he was still on his way, as it would seem, so that he was spared the toil of the ascent. God meets us half-way when we "arise and go" to Him.

(4) I bare you on eagles' wings.—Comp. Deut. xxxii. 11, "As an eagle stirreth up her nest, fluttereth over her young, spreadeth abroad her wings, taketh them, beareth them upon her wings." When its young are first fledged, the eagle is said to assist them in their flight by flying beneath them, so that they may settle upon its wings or back, if necessary. God means that He has bestowed upon His people the same tender and powerful care, has borne them up mightily when they might have fallen, supported their first flight as fledglings, and so saved them from disaster.

Brought you unto myself.—Not so much "brought you to my presence here on Sinai," as "brought you out of Egypt and its corrupting influences (Josh. xxiv. 14), and led you back to my pure worship and true religion." That is spoken of as accomplished, whereof God had begun the accomplishment.

(3) A peculiar treasure.—The Hebrew séqullath is from a root, found in Chaldee, signifying "to earn," or "acquire," and means primarily some valuable possession, which the owner has got by his own exertions. (Comp. 1 Chron. xxix. 3, where the English Version translates it by "mine own proper good"). God views the Israelites as made His own by the long series of mighty works done for their deliverance, whereby He is sometimes said to have "redeemed" (chap. vi. 6, xv. 13), or "purchased" them (chap. xv. 16). The word séqullath is here used for the first time. Later it becomes an epithet used of Israel. (See Deut. vi. 6, xiv. 2, xvi. 18; Ps. cxxxiv. 4; Mal. iii. 17; and comp. also Titus ii. 14; 1 Pet. ii. 9.)

Above all people: for all the earth is mine. —While claiming a peculiar right in Israel, God does not mean to separate Himself from the other nations, to cease to care for them, or give them up to their own devices. He is always "the Most High over all the earth" (Ps. lxxxiii. 13), "a light to lighten the Gentiles," one who "judges the people righteously, and governs all the nations upon earth" (Ps. lxvii. 4). Israel's prerogative does not rob them of their birthright. He is the favoured son; but they, too, "are, all of them, children of the Most High" (Ps. lxxxix. 6).

(6) A kingdom of priests.—All of them both "kings and priests unto God"—kings as lords over themselves, equals one to another, owing allegiance to God only—priests, as entitled to draw near to God in prayer without an intermediary, to bring Him their offerings, pay Him their vows, and hold communion with Him in heart and soul. The same privileges are declared by St. Peter (1 Pet. ii. 9) and St. John (Rev. i. 6) to belong to all Christians, who in this respect, as in so many others, are now "the Israel of God" (Gal. vi. 16).

An holy nation.—It is not the duty of personal, but the privilege of official, holiness that is here intended. Each Israelite was to be as near to God, as fully entitled to approach Him, as the priests of other nations either were or thought themselves. Personal holiness was the natural and fitting outcome from this official holiness; but it is not here spoken of. God has, however, previously required it of Israel by the words "If ye will obey my voice indeed, and keep my covenant" (verse 5).

(7) Moses . . . . called for the elders.—The "elders" formed the usual channel of communication between Moses and the people, reporting his words to them, and theirs to him. (See chap. iv. 29, xii. 21, xvii. 5, 6, xviii. 2, xxiv. 14, &c.) On their position and authority, see Note on chap. iii. 10.
their faces all these words which the Lord commanded him. (8) And "all the people answered together, and said, All that the Lord hath spoken we will do.
And Moses returned the words of the people unto the Lord. (9) And the Lord said unto Moses, Lo, I come unto thee in a thick cloud, that the people may hear when I speak with thee, and believe thee for ever. And Moses told the words of the people unto the Lord.

Before their faces.—This translation is a curious piece of literalism. Liphèry, in the time of Moses, was a mere preposition, signifying "before."
(8) All the people answered together.—There was no hesitation, no diversity of opinion, no self-distrust.
In view of the great privileges offered to them, all were willing, nay, eager, to promise for themselves that "they would obey God's voice indeed, and keep his covenant.
In the glow and warmth of their feelings the difficulty of perfect obedience did not occur to them.
Moses returned the words—i.e., "took them back," "reported them." (9) And the Lord said . . . .—The first step in the great event of the formation of a covenant between God and Israel was completed by the people's acceptance of God's offer. The second step was now to be taken. The terms of the covenant must be declared, and it pleased God to declare them, or, at any rate, the most important and fundamental of them, in the hearing of the people. He therefore makes the announcement of His approaching manifestation of Himself, and proceeds to give directions connected with it to Moses.

Lo, I come unto thee in a thick cloud.—
Heb., in the denseness of a cloud. Though God is light—nay, because He is light, clouds and darkness are round about Him (Ps. lvii. 2). Even when He reveals Himself, He still "dwells in the thick darkness" (2 Chron. vi. 1). It is absolutely necessary that He should be closely veiled when He draws near to men, for otherwise they could not endure for a moment
"the brightness of His presence." (See chap. xl. 35; 2 Chron. vi. 14, v. 2.) If even the light that remained on Moses' face after converse with God required him thereafter ordinarily to wear a veil before the people (chap. xxxiv. 33—35), how much more needful must it be that God should cover His face when He descends to converse with men! In the present case, it would have seemed to have been "the pillar of the cloud" that had guided Israel, which served Him for a covering, and out of which He spake to Moses and the people.

That the people may hear . . . and believe thee for ever.—God's purpose in man-festing Himself to the people was twofold: (1) To impress them with the awful sense of His presence, and through them, their descendants; (2) to make them more ready to submit to Moses, and "believe him for ever." On the whole, it must be said that the purpose was accomplished. God has remained to the Israelites, for more than three millennia, an awful power, real, personal, tremendous. The Law of Moses, under whatever false interpretations, has remained the guide of their life. Though the living Moses was often resisted and contemned, the dead Moses has been reverenced and obeyed from his death to the present time. His laws are still accepted and professedly obeyed by the entire Jewish community.

Go unto the people, and sanctify them.—
The approaching manifestation required, above all things, that the people should be "sanctified." Sanctification is twofold: outward and inward. The real essential preparation for approach to God is inward sanctification; but no external command can secure this. Moses was therefore instructed to issue directions for outward purification; and it was left to the spiritual insight of the people to perceive and recognise that such purity symbolised and required internal purification as its counterpart. The external purification was to consist in three things—(1) Ablution, or washing of the person; (2) washing of clothes; and (3) abstention from sexual intercourse (verse 15).

Let them wash their clothes.—The Levitical law required the washing of clothes on many occasions (Lev. xi. 25, 28, 40, xii. 6, 34, 58, xiv. 8, 9, 47, xv. 22, &c.) in connection with purification. The same idea prevailed in Egypt (Herod. ii. 37), in Greece (Hom.
Od. iv. 1. 759), and in Rome (Dollinger, Jew and Gentile, vol. ii., p. 82). It is a natural extension of the idea that ablation of the person cleanses, not from physical only, but from moral defilement.

Against the third day.—There is no special "significance" in this mention of "the third day." The important point is, that the purification was to continue through two entire days—one day not being sufficient.
This taught the lesson that man's defilement is, in the sight of God, very great.

The Lord will come down in the sight of all the people.—See the comment on verse 9.

Thou shalt set bounds.—Here was another formal and mechanical direction, having for its object to deepen and intensify the lesson of God's unapproachable majesty and holiness. Moses was required to "set bounds to the people," i.e., to make a substantial fence between the camp and the base of Sinai, which should prevent both animals and men from coming in contact with the mountain. Modern travellers generally observe how abruptly the rocky precipice of Ras Safach rises from the plain in front of it, so that in many places it is quite possible to stand on the plain and yet touch the mountain. The idea that a line of natural mounds now to be seen near the base of Sinai represents the "bounds" of Moses (Stanley, Sinai and *Palestine,
p. 43) is unsatisfactory, since the "bounds" of Moses were most certainly artificial ones. It is, however, possible that his "bounds" may have followed the line of the natural barrier.

That ye go not up into the mount.—Unless it had been forbidden, there might have seemed to be no reason why pious Israelites might not have ascended the height, to draw near to God in prayer. It is a soever toucheth the mount shall be surely put to death: (13) there shall not an hand touch it, but he shall surely be stoned, or shot through; whether it be beast or man, it shall not live: when the trumpet soundeth long, they shall come up to the mount.

(14) And Moses went down from the mount unto the people, and sanctified the people; and they washed their clothes." (15) And he said unto the people, Be ready against the third day: come not at your wives.

(10) And it came to pass on the third day in the morning, that there were thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud upon the mount, and the voice of the trumpet exceeding loud; so that all the people that was in the camp trembled.

(17) And Moses brought forth the people out of the camp to meet with God; and they stood at the nether part of the mount.

(18) And "mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke, because the Lord descended upon it in fire: and the smoke thereof ascended as the smoke of a furnace, and the whole mount quaked greatly. (19) And when the voice of the trumpet sounded long, and waxed louder and louder, Moses spake, and God answered him by a voice.

(20) And the Lord came down upon mount Sinai, on the top of the mount: and the Lord called Moses up praiseworthy feeling which breathes in the words.

"Nearer, my God, to thee;" but the nation was not fit for close approach.

(13) There shall not an hand touch it.—This translation gives an entirely wrong sense. The meaning is, beyond all doubt, "There shall not a hand touch him," i.e., the transgressor. To stop him and seize him, another person must have transgressed the bounds, and so have repeated the act which was forbidden. This course was to be avoided, and punishment was to be inflicted on the transgressor by stoning him, or transfixing him with arrows, from within the barrier.

Whether it be beast or man.—Though beasts are innocent of wrong-doing, and are thus no proper objects of punishment, yet the law of God requires their slaughter in certain cases—e.g. (1) when they are dangerous (chap. xxi. 29); (2) when they have become polluted ( Lev. xx. 15); (3) When their owner's sin is appropriately punished through their loss (chap. xiii. 13). In the present case, it could only be through the culpable carelessness of an owner that a beast could get inside the barrier.

When the trumpet soundeth long.—Comp. verse 19.

They shall come up to the mount.—Rather, into the mount. The expression used is identical with that of the preceding verse, and there rendered "go up into the mount." Thus the act forbidden in verse 12 is allowed in verse 13; it is not, however, allowed to the same persons. The word "they" (ḥāmah) in this present place is emphatic, and refers to certain privileged persons, as Moses and Aaron (verse 24), not to the people generally.

(15) Come not at your wives.—Comp. 1 Sam. xxi. 4, 5; 1 Cor. vii. 5. It was the general sentiment of antiquity that a ceremonial uncleanness attached even to the chastest sexual connection. (Herod. i. 189, ii. 64; Hesiod. Op. et D., ll. 733—4; Tibull. Carm. ii. 1, ll. 11, 12; Porphyry, De Abstinentia, iv. 7.) The Levitical law took the same view ( Lev. xv. 18), as did the Indian law (Menu, v. 63), the Persian (Zendraesta, quoted by Bähr, Symbolik, vol. ii., p. 406), and the Mahometan (Koran, iv. 5).

(16—20) Thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud.—Compare with this description of Deut. (iv. 11, 12), which is fuller in some respects:—"Ye came near and stood under the mountain; and the mountain burned with fire unto the midst of heaven, with darkness, clouds, and thick darkness. And the Lord spake unto you out of the fire: ye heard the voice of the words, but saw no similitude; only ye heard a voice." The phenomena accumulated to impress the people seem to have been loud thunder, fierce flashes of lightning, a fire that streamed up from the mountain to the middle of the sky, dense volumes of smoke producing an awful and weird darkness, a trembling of the mountain as by a continuous earthquake, a sound like the blare of a trumpet loud and prolonged, and then finally a clear penetrating voice. So awful a manifestation has never been made at any other place or time, nor will be until the consummation of all things. To regard it as a mere "storm of thunder and lightning," or as "an earthquake with volcanic eruptions," is to miss altogether the meaning of the author, and to empty his narrative of all its natural significance.

The voice of the trumpet.—Heb., a voice of a trumpet. The trumpet's blast is the signal of a herald calling attention to a proclamation about to be made. At the last day the coming of Christ is to be announced by the "trump of God" (1 Thess. iv. 16). In the Apocalypse angels are often represented as sounding with trumpets (Rev. vii. 7, 8, 10, 12, ix. 1, 14, &c.) when some great event is about to occur.

(17) Out of the camp.—An open space must have intervened between the camp and the "bounds." Into this Moses led the representatives of the people, so bringing them as near to God as was permitted.

At the nether part of the mount.—In the plain directly in front of the Ras Sufsafeh, and almost under it.

Mount Sinai was altogether on a smoke.—Heb., smoked, all of it. Some understand by this, "dense clouds, having the appearance of smoke." But if "the mountain burned with fire," as asserted (Deut. iv. 11), the smoke would be real.

The whole mount quaked greatly.—Comp. Ps. lxviii. 8, "The earth shook, the heavens also dropped at the presence of God: even Sinai itself was moved at the presence of God." The expression is more suitable to an earthquake than to the vibration sometimes produced by very violent thunder.

(20) On the top of the mount.—On the summit of the Ras Sufsafeh, not on the Jebel Musa, which is out of sight from the plain of Er Rahah.
EXODUS, XX.

not to Break through.

God’s Warning to the People against a too near Approach.

(21—25) Warning was given, as soon as God announced His intention of descending upon Sinai, that the people must not approach too near. “Bounds” were set, and the people required to keep within them. Actual contact with the mountain was forbidden under penalty of death (verse 12). It is evident from verse 23 that the command to “set bounds” had been obeyed, and a fence erected which it would have required some force to “break through”; nor can there be any doubt that Moses had promulgated the directions, which he had received from God, forbidding any approach to the mountain, and threatening death to those who should “touch” it. Yet still it is evident from this concluding paragraph of the chapter (verses 21—25) that the first warning was insufficient. An intention to “break through, to gaze,” must have been entertained by many. To this intention the existing priesthood, whatever it was, were parties (verse 22). It always grates upon men’s feelings to be told that they are less holy than others; and we can easily understand that those who had hitherto acted as priests to the nation would resent their exclusion from “holy ground” to which the sons of Amram were about to be admitted. Even of the people there may have been many who participated in the feeling, and thought that Moses and Aaron were “taking too much upon them, seeing that the whole congregation” was holy. Hence, a further very stringent command was requisite, and Moses, having reached the summit, was sent down again from the top to the bottom in order to enjoin upon priests and people alike, in the most solemn possible way, the necessity of their observing the bounds set.

(21) Lost they break through—i.e., force their way through the barrier which Moses had erected.

To gaze, and many of them perish.—Some might have perished by the execution of the orders given in verse 13. But the allusion is perhaps rather to such a heaven-sent plague as destroyed the men of Beth-shemesh to the number of 50,070 (1 Sam. vi. 19).

(22) The priests.—This has been called an anachronism, since the Levitical priesthood was not as yet instituted. But the Israelites, like all other ancient tribes or races, must have had priests long ere this, appointed upon one principle or another. It is a reasonable conjecture that hitherto the heads of families had exercised priestly functions.

Break forth—i.e., punish in some open and manifest way. Compare the “breach” upon Uzzah (2 Sam. vi. 8).

The people cannot come up.—Moses probably means that they cannot do so unwittingly; he does not contemplate the ease of an intentional trespass.

CHAPTER XX.—(1) And God spake all these words, saying,

XX.

The Ten Commandments.

(1) God spake.—It is distinctly stated in Deuteronomy that the Ten Commandments were spoken to “all the assembly of Israel,” by God, “out of the midst of the fire, of the cloud, and of the thick darkness, with a great voice” (Deut. v. 22). It was not till after their delivery that the people entered to be spared further communications of so awful a character. How the sounds were produced is a mystery unexplained, and on which it is idle to speculate. Jehovah alone appears as the speaker in the Old Testament; in the New, we hear of the instrumentality of angels (Acts vii. 53; Gal. iii. 19; Heb. ii. 2).

All those words.—In Scripture the phrase used to designate the Ten Commandments is “the Ten Words” (chap. xxxiv. 28; Deut. iv. 13, x. 4). It has been universally recognised, both by the Jewish and Christian Churches, that they occupy an unique position among the utterances which constitute God’s revelation to man. Alone uttered publicly by God in the ears of the people, alone inscribed on stone—by the finger of God Himself, alone, of all commands, deposited in the penetralie of worship—the Ark—they formed the germ and basis, the very pith and kernel of the covenant which God, through Moses, made with man, and which was to continue for above thirteen hundred years the exposition of His will to the human race. They enunciate a morality infinitely above that of all the then existing nations of the earth—nay, above that of the wisest of mankind to whom revelation was unknown. There is no compendium of morality in Confucianism, in Buddhism, in the religion of Zoroaster, or of Egypt, or of Greece or Rome, which can be put in competition with the Decalogue. Broad exceedingly (Ps. cxix. 96), yetsearching and minute in its requirements; embracing the whole range of human duty, yet never vague or indeterminate; systematic, yet free from the hardness and narrowness commonly attaching to systems; the Decalogue has maintained and will always maintain itself, if not as an absolutely complete summary of human duty, yet as a summary
EXODUS, XX.

Ten Commandments.

(2) I am the Lord thy God, which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of bondage.

(5) Thou shalt have no other gods before me.

(4) Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image, or any likeness of any thing that is in heaven above, which has never been superseded. When our Lord was asked what a man must do to inherit eternal life, He replied by a reference to the Decalogue: "Thou knowest the commandments" (Mark x. 19). When the Church would impress on her children their complete duty both to God and man, she requires them to be taught the "Ten Words." When adult Christians are to be reminded, before coming to Holy Communion, of the necessity of self-examination and repentance, the same summary is read to them. It is an extraordinary testimony to the excellence of the compendium that, originating in Judaism, it has been maintained unchanged in a religious system so different from Judaism as Christianity.

(5) I am the Lord thy God.—The binding nature of commands upon the conscience depends upon the authority of the person who issues them. That there might be no dispute as to what the authority was in the use of the Decalogue, God prefixed the commands themselves by this distinct statement. By whomesoever they were communicated (see the first Note on verse 1), they were the commands of Jehovah Himself.

Which have brought thee out of the land of Egypt.—Thus exhibiting at once Almighty power and the tenderest compassion and care. God desires the obedience which springs from love, not fear.

(5) Thou shalt have no other gods before me.—Heb., There shall be to thee no other god before me. The result is the same, whether we translate Elohim by "god" or "gods," but the singular verb shows that the plural form of the name is a mere plural of dignity.

Before me—literally, before my face—means strictly, "side by side with me," i.e., "in addition to me." God does not suppose that the Israelites, after all that He had done for them, would discard Him, and substitute other gods in His place, but fears the syncretism which would unite His worship with that of other deities. All polytheismos were syncretic, and readily enlarged their pantheons, since, when once the principle of unity is departed from, whether the plurality be a little greater or a little less cannot much signify. The Egyptian religion seems to have adopted Ammon at a comparatively late period from Arabia; it took Bar, or Baal, Ata, or Anatis, Astarte, or Asarte, Resalpa, or Reseph, &c., from Syria, and it admitted Tota from Ethiopia. Israel, in after-times, fell into the same error, and, without intending to apostatise from Jehovah, added on the worship of Baal, Ashoreth, Moloch, Chemosh, Rehumph, &c. It is this form of polytheism against which the first commandment is directed. It asserts the sole claim of Jehovah to our religious regards.

(4) Thou shalt not make unto thee any graven image.—The two main clauses of the second commandment are to be read together, so as to form one sentence: "Thou shalt not make to thee any graven image, &c., so as to worship it." (See the explanation of Josephus, Ant. Jud., iii. 5, § 5; O θείεροι, λόγοι καλέζει μετάθεσιν εἴσοδός τοῦ ζωή παράγειν.) It was not until the days of Hebrew decline and degeneracy that a narrow literalism pressed the words into an absolute prohibition of the arts of painting and sculpture (Philo, De Oraearius, § 29). Moses himself sanctioned the cherubim forms above the mercy-seat, the brazen serpent, and the lilies and pomegranates of the golden candlestick. Solomon had lions on the steps of his throne, oxen under his "molten sea," and palm-trees, flowers, and cherubim on the walls of the Temple, "within and without" (1 Kings vi. 29). What the second commandment forbade was the worship of God under a material form. It asserted the spirituality of Jehovah. While in the rest of the ancient world there was scarcely a single nation or tribe which did not "mako to itself" images of the gods, and regard the images themselves with superstitious veneration, in Judaism alone was this seductive practice disallowed. The Jews would have no likeness made of Him, no representation that might cloud the conception of His entire separation from matter. His purely spiritual essence.

In heaven above . . . in the water under the earth.—Comp. Gen. i. 1—7. The triple division is regarded as embracing the whole material universe. In the Egyptian idolatry images of all three kinds were included.

(5) Nor serve them.—The idolatry of the ancient world was, practically, not a mere worship of celestial beings through material representations of them, but an actual culture of the images themselves, which were regarded as possessed of miraculous powers. "I myself," says Arnobius, "not so very long ago, worshipped gods just taken out of the furnace, fresh from the anvil of the smith, ivory, paintings, stamps of trees swathed in bandages. and if I happened to cast my eyes on a polished stone smeared with olive oil, I made reverence to it, as if a power were present therein, and addressed myself in supplication for blessings to the senseless block" (Advers. Gentes, i. 29). "People pray," says Seneca, "to the images of the gods, implored on bended knees, sit or stand long days before them, throw them money, and sacrifice beasts to them, so treating them with deep respect" (Ap. Lac. t. ii. 2).

A jealous God.—Not in the sense in which He was regarded as "jealous" by some of the Greeks, who supposed that success or eminence of any kind provoked Him (Herod. iii. 40, 125), but jealous of His own honour, one who will not see "His glory given to another" (Isa. xlii. 8, xlviii. 11), or allow rivals to dispute His sole and absolute sovereignty. (Comp. chap. xxxiv. 14; Deut. iv. 24, v. 9, vi. 15; Josh. xxiv. 19.)

Visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children.—It is a fact that, under God's natural government of the world, the iniquity of fathers is visited upon their children. Diseases caused by vicious courses are transmitted. The parents' extravagance leaves their children beggars. To be the son of a felon is to be heavily handicapped in the race of life. That third and fourth generation of them that hate me; (6) and showing mercy unto thousands of them that love me, and keep my commandments.

(7) a Thou shalt not take the name of the Lord thy God in vain; for the Lord will not hold him guiltless that taketh his name in vain.

(8) Remember the sabbath day, to keep it holy. (9) Six days shalt thou labour, and do all thy work; (10) but the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy

The Lord will not hold him guiltless.—Punishment will assuredly overtake the perjured man, if not in this life, then in another. Jehovah will vindicate His own honour.

(9) Remember the sabbath day.—It is pertinent to remark that this command is introduced differently from any other by the word "remember." But we cannot, therefore, conclude that the Sabbath was a primitive institution, which the Israelites were bound to have held in perpetual remembrance, since the reference may be merely to the injunction recently given in connection with the gathering of the manna (chap. xvi. 25). The Sabbath had certainly been at that time solemnly instituted, if no earlier. (See Note on chap. xvi. 25.) To keep it holy.—It had been already noted that the rest of the Sabbath was to be a "holy rest" (chap. xvi. 25); but it is not quite clear what was intended by this. For the most part, the Law insists on abstinence from labour as the main element of Sabbath observance (chaps. xvi. 23—30, xx. 9—11, xxiii. 12, xxiv. 2, xxxi. 3, 23; Deut. v. 12—15, &c.); and it can scarcely be said to prescribe anything positive with respect to the religious employment of the day. That the morning and evening sacrifice were to be doubled might indeed suggest to a religiously-minded Israelite that his own religious exercises and devotions should also be augmented; but the Law made no such requirement. His attendance at the morning and evening sacrifice was not required nor expected. No provision was made for his receiving religious teaching on the day; no special offerings were required from him upon it. The day became one of "languid bodily ease, relaxation, and luxury" to the bulk of the later Jews (Augustin. Eparr. in Ps. xcii.); but probably there were always some whom natural piety taught that, in the absence of their ordinary employments, it was intended they should devote themselves to prayer and communion with God—to meditation on "high and holy themes," such as His mercies in past time, His character, attributes, revelations of Himself, government of the world, dealings with men and nations. Thus only could the day be really "kept holy," with a positive, and not a mere negative, holiness.

(9) Six days shalt thou labour.—The form is certainly imperative; and it has been held that the fourth commandment is "not limited to a mere enactment respecting one day, but prescribes the due distribution of a week, and enforces the six days' work as much as the seventh day's rest." (Garden in Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, vol. iii., p. 1068.) But the work on the six days is really rather assumed as what will be than required as what must be; and the intention of the clause is prohibitory rather than mandatory—" then shall not work more than six days out of the seven.”

(10) But the seventh day is the sabbath of the Lord thy God.—It tech. But the seventh day (shall be) a sabbath to the Lord thy God—i.e., it shall be a day of holy rest from things worldly, and of devotion to things heavenly. (See Note 2 on verse 8.)
In it thou shalt not do any work.—This negative aspect of the Sabbath is further emphasised by particular prohibitions:—(1) The prohibition against gathering the manna on the Sabbath (chap. xvi. 23); (2) the prohibition against lighting a fire (chap. xxv. 3); (3) against gathering sticks (Num. xv. 35). Some exceptions were allowed, as the work of the Priests and Levites in the Temple on the Sabbath, attendance on and care of the sick, rescue of a beast that was in peril of its life, &c. (See Matt. xii. 5, 11.) But the tendency was to press the negative aspect to an extreme, and to ignore the positive one. By the time of the Maccabees it had come to be considered unlawful to defend oneself against the attack of an enemy on the Sabbath (1 Macc. iii. 32—33, vi. 1); and, though this extravagant view did not maintain its ground, yet at the time of our Lord’s ministry a rigour of observance was in vogue upon other points which exceeded the limits of reasonable exegesis. Our Lord’s practice was pointedly directed against the overstrained theory of Sabbath observance which was current in His day, and was clearly intended to vindicate for His disciples a liberty which ecclesiastical authority was disposed to deny them. There are parts of Christianity in which, even at the present day, a similar spirit prevails, and a similar vindication is needed.

Nor thy son, nor thy daughter.—The whole family was to partake in the Sabbatical rest. Labour was to cease, not to be devolved by the stronger on weaker members.

Thy manservant, nor thy maidservant.—The rest was to extend also to the domestics, who specially required it, since the heavier labours of the household had to be performed by them.

Thy cattle.—Labour can scarcely be exacted from cattle without man being also called upon to work. God, however, “careth for cattle,” even for their own sakes, and wills that the Sabbath rest be extended to them. “His mercy is over all His works,” and embraces the dumb unreasoning animals no less than His human creatures. (Comp. Gen. viii. 1, ix. 9—11; Exod. ix. 19; Deut. xxvi. 4; Jonah iv. 11.)

(11) For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth.—Comp. Gen. ii. 2, 3, and Exod. xxxi. 17. It is not improbable that the work of creation was made to occupy six days because one day in seven is the appropriate proportion of rest to labour for such a being as man. God might have created all things on one day had He so pleased; but, having the institution of the Sabbath in view, He profigured it by spreading His work over six days, and then resting on the seventh. His law of the Sabbath established a conformity between the method of His own working and that of His reasonable creatures, and taught men to look on work, not as an aimless, indefinite, incessant, weary round, but as leading on to an end, a rest, a fruition, a time for looking back, and seeing the result and rejoicing in it. Each Sabbath is such a time, and is a type and foretaste of that eternal “sabbatising” in another world which “remaineth for the people of God” (Heb. iv. 9). The secondary object of the institution of the Sabbath, assigned in Dent. v. 15, is in no way incompatible with this primary one. The thought of God’s works in creation might well be associated in the mind of an Israelite with the thought of His “wondrous works” in Egypt, and the recollection of the blessed peace and rest in which creation resulted, with the memory of the glad time of repose and refreshment which superseded upon the weary task-work of the Egyptian bondage.

(12) Honour thy father and thy mother.—It is not a matter of much importance how we divide the commandments; nor is it historically certain how they were originally distributed between the two tables. But, practically, the view that the fifth commandment begins the second table, which lays down our duty towards our neighbours, is to be preferred for its convenience, though it trenches upon symmetrical arrangement. Of all our duties to our fellow-men, the first and most fundamental is our duty towards our parents, which lies at the root of all our social relations, and is the first of which we naturally become conscious. Honour, reverence, and obedience are due to parents from the position in which they stand to their children:—(1) As, in a certain sense, the authors of their being; (2) as their shelterers and nourishers; (3) as their protectors and educators, from whom they derive the foundation of their moral training and the first elements of their knowledge. Even among savages the obligations of children towards their parents are felt and acknowledged to a greater or a less extent; and there has never been a civilised community of whose moral code they have not formed an important part. In Egypt the duty of filial piety was strictly inculcated from a very early date (Lenormant, Histoire Ancienne, vol. i., pp. 312, 345), and a bad son forfeited the prospect of happiness in another life (Bislot., pp. 510, 511). Confucianism bases all morality upon the parental and filial relation, and requires the most complete subjection, even of the grown-up son, to his father and mother. Greek ethics taught that the relation of children to their parents was parallel to that of men to God (Aristot. Eth. Nic. viii. 12, § 5); and Rome made the absolute authority of the father the basis of its entire State system. The Divine legislation of Sinai is in full accord, here as elsewhere, with the voice of reason and conscience, affirming broadly the principles of parental authority and filial submission, but leaving the mode in which the principles should be carried out to the discretion of individuals or communities.

That thy days may be long upon the land.—The fifth commandment (as all allow) is “the first commandment with promise” (Eph. vi. 2); but the promise may be understood in two quite different senses. (1) It may be taken as guaranteeing national permanence to the people among whom filial respect
Ten Commandments

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Command</th>
<th>Scripture Reference</th>
<th>Commentary</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1. Thou shalt not kill.</td>
<td>Matt. 5:17</td>
<td>The giving of life is sanctified by the blood of Christ, making murder (Mal. ii. 14—16) a sin.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>2. Thou shalt not commit adultery.</td>
<td>Matt. 5:27</td>
<td>No respect of persons or sexes is a feature of the New Testament.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>3. Thou shalt not steal.</td>
<td>Matt. 17:2</td>
<td>The eighth commandment forbids this wrong, and requires us to respect the property of others no less than their person and their domestic peace and honour.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>4. Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour.</td>
<td>Rom. 12:19</td>
<td>&quot;Who steals my purse, steals trash, but he who filches from me my good name, Robes me of that which not enriches him, Yet leaves me poor indeed.&quot;</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

And obedience is generally practised; or (2) it may be understood in the simpler and more literal sense of a pledge that obdient children shall, as a general rule, receive for their reward the blessing of long life. In favour of the former view have been urged the facts of Roman and Chinese permanence, together with the probability that Israel forfeited its possession of Canaan in consequence of persisting in the breach of this commandment. In favour of the latter may be adduced the application of the text by St. Paul (Eph. vi. 3), which is purely personal and not ethnic; and the exegesis of the Son of Sirach (Wisd. iii. 6), which is similar. It is also worthy of note that an Egyptian sage, who wrote long before Moses, declared it as the result of his experience that obedient sons did attain to a good old age in Egypt, and laid down the principle broadly, that "the son who attends to the words of his father will grow old in consequence" (Lenormant, Histoire Ancienne, vol. i., p. 342). (13) Thou shalt not kill. —From the peculiar duties owed by children to their parents, the Divine legislator went on to lay down these general duties which men owe to their fellow-men. And of these the first is that of respecting their life. The security of life is the primary object of government; and it has been well said that men originally coalesced into States with a view to self-preservation (Arist. Pol. i. 1). All written codes forbid murder; and in communities which are not written down these unwritten laws coalesced into States with a view to self-preservation. When God "set a mark upon Cain" (Gen. iv. 15), He marked thereby His abhorrence of the murderer. The "seven precepts of Noah" included one which distinctly forbade the taking of human life (Gen. ix. 6). In all countries and among all peoples, a natural instinct or an unwritten tradition placed murder among the worst of crimes, and made its penalty death. The Mosaic legislation on the point was differentiated from others principally by the care it took to distinguish between actual murder, manslaughter (chap. xxii. 13), death by misadventure (Num. xxxv. 23), and justifiable homicide (chap. xxii. 2). Before, however, it made these distinctions, the great principle of the sanctity of human life required to be broadly laid down; and so the law was given in the widest possible terms—"Thou shalt not kill." Exceptions were reserved till later. (14) Thou shalt not commit adultery. —Next to the duty of respecting a man's life is placed that of respecting his domestic peace and honour. Adultery is an invasion of the household, a destruction of the bond which unites the family, a dissolution of that contract which is the main basis of social order. It was forbidden by all civilised communities, and in uncivilised ones frequently punished with death. The Mosaic enactments on the subject are peculiarly chivalric in the absolute equality on which they place the man and the woman. Adulterers are as hateful as adulteresses, and are as surely to be put to death (Lev. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22—24, &c.). The man who acts treacherously against "the wife of his covenant" is as great a sinner as the woman who breaks the marriage bond (Mal. ii. 14—16). There is "no respect of persons" and no respect of sexes with God. (15) Thou shalt not steal. —Our third duty towards our neighbour is to respect his right to his property. The framers of Utopias, both ancient and modern, have imagined communities in which private property should not exist. But such a condition of things has never yet been realised in practice. In the laws of all known States private property has been recognised, and social order has been, in a great measure, based upon it. Here, again, law has but embodied natural instinct. The savage who hammers out a flint knife by repeated blows with a pebble, labouring long, and undergoing pain in the process, feels that the implement which he has made is his own, and that his right to it is indisputable. If he is deprived of it by force or fraud, he is wronged. The eighth commandment forbids this wrong, and requires us to respect the property of others no less than their person and their domestic peace and honour. (16) Thou shalt not bear false witness against thy neighbour. —Our fourth duty to our neighbour is not to injure his character. Our great poet has said—"Who steals my purse, steals trash, But he who filches from me my good name, Robes me of that which not enriches him, Yet leaves me poor indeed." Thus indicating the fact that calumny may injure a man more than robbery. False witness is, of course, worst when given in a court of justice; and this offence has generally been made punishable by law. It was peculiar to the Hebrew legislation that it not only forbade and punished (Deut. xix. 16—20) false testimony of this extreme kind, but denounced also the far commoner, yet scarcely less injurious, practice of spreading untrue reports about others, thus injuring them in men's esteem. The ninth commandment is broad enough in its terms to cover both forms of the sin, though pointing especially to the form which is of the more heinous character. Lest its wider bearing should be overlooked, the Divine legislator added later a distinct prohibition of calumny in the words, "Thou shalt not raise a false report" (chap. xxiii. 1). (17) Thou shalt not covet. —This command seems to have been added in order to teach the general principle that the Law of God is concerned, not with acts and words only, but with the thoughts of the heart. Rightly understood, the seventh and eighth commandments contain the tenth, which strikes at covetousness and lustful desire. (Comp. Matt. v. 27, 28.) But ancient moralists did not usually recognise this; thought, unless carried out into acts, was regarded as "free;" no responsibility was considered to attach to it, and consequently no one felt it needful to control his thoughts or regulate them. It was therefore of importance that the Divine Law should distinctly assert a control over men's thoughts and feelings, since they are the source of all that is evil in word and act; and true godliness consists in bringing "every thought into captivity to Christ" (2 Cor. x. 5).
(18) And "all the people saw the thunderings, and the lightnings, and the noise of the trumpet, and the mountain smoking: and when the people saw it, they removed, and stood afar off. (19) And they said unto Moses, 'Speak thou with us, and we will hear: but let not God speak with us, lest we die. (20) And Moses said unto the people, Fear not:
for God is come to prove you, and that his fear may be before your faces, that ye sin not.
(21) And the people stood afar off, and Moses drew near unto the thick darkness where God was.
(22) And the Lord said unto Moses,
Thus thou shalt say unto the children of Israel, Ye have seen that I have talked with you from heaven. (23) Ye shall not make with me gods of silver, neither

At the People's Request, Moses Becomes Their Intermediary.

(18—21) The delivery of the Ten Commandments by a voice manifestly superhuman impressed the people with an awful fear. They felt the near contact with God to be more than they could bear. Even Moses was so deeply moved that he exclaimed, "I exceedingly fear and quake" (Heb. xii. 21). The people were still more afraid, and felt compelled to withdraw to a distance, borne away by the sound of the terrible voice. From Deuteronomy we learn that they retired within their tents (Deut. v. 30), having first sent a deputation to Moses, with a request that he would thenceforth act as their intermediary. It pleased God to assent to this proposal; and the remainder of the Law was communicated by God to Moses, and by Moses to the Israelites.
(19) And all the people saw the thunderings
—i.e., perceived them. On the true character of the Sinaic manifestation, see Note on chap. xix. 16—20.
They removed.—Moses had brought the representatives of the people as near to Sinai as possible—close to the foot of the great precipice of Ras Sufsafah (chap. xix. 17). The wide plain of Er-Rahah allowed of a removal to a considerable distance.
(20) Speak thou with us.—Comp. Deut. v. 24—27, where the words of the people are reported at greater length:—"Behold, the Lord our God hath showed us his glory and his greatness, and we have heard his voice out of the midst of the fire: we have seen this day that God doeth talk with man, and he liveth. Now therefore why should we die? for this great fire will consume us:
if we hear the voice of the Lord our God any more, then we shall die. For who is there of all flesh, that hath heard the voice of the living God speaking out of the midst of the fire, as we have, and lived? Go then near, and hear all that the Lord our God shall say:
and speak thou unto us all that the Lord our God shall speak unto thee; and we will hear it, and do it."}

Moses said unto the people, Fear not.—
God approved the people's proposal, and directed that they should withdraw to their tents. (Deut. v. 28—30).
Moses then drew near to Him, and entered into "the thick darkness where God was" (verse 21). It is worthy of notice that the same manifestation which repelled the people attracted Moses.

The Book of the Covenant.

(22—26) In the remainder of chap. xx., and in the three chapters which follow, we have a series of laws delivered by God to Moses, immediately after the delivery of the Decalogue, which constituted the second stage of the revelation, and stood midway between the first great enunciation of abstract principles in the Ten Commandments and the ultimate minute and complicated elaboration of rules to meet all cases which fills the three Books of Leviticus, Numbers, and Deuteronomy. This intermediate revelation appears to have been at once committed to writing, and in its written shape was known as "the Book of the Covenant" (chap. xxiv. 7), and regarded with special veneration.
"The Book of the Covenant" is wanting in system and arrangement, but is not wholly unsystematic. It commences with some laws concerning the worship of God (chap. xx. 22—26) proceeds from the Divine to the human, and treats in its second section (chap. xxi. 1—32) of "the rights of persons," then concerns itself with "the rights of property" (chap. xxi. 33 to xxii. 15), and, finally, winds up with "miscellaneous laws" (chap. xxii.
16 to xxiii. 19), partly on things Divine, partly on things human—the things Divine being reserved to the last, so that the end of the legislation is in close harmony with the beginning. Altogether, the enactments contained in the short space of three chapters are some seventy; and the "Book of the Covenant" is thus no mere tentative sketch; but a very wonderful condensation of the essence of all the more important matters which Moses afterwards put forth by Divine inspiration in the long space of nearly forty years.

Laws concerning Religion.

(23) Ye have seen that I have talked with you from heaven.—It was important to identify the giver of the Book of the Covenant with the deliverer of the Ten Commandments, and accordingly this was done in the opening words of the Book.
(24) Ye shall not make with me gods of silver.—The expression "make with me" is unusual, but does not seem to have any peculiar force. Gods of silver and gods of gold are specially forbidden, because it was to idolatry of this kind that the Israelites were specially inclined. The golden calf is no isolated pheno-nomenon. Molten images of gods, generally of silver, sometimes of gold, were objects of worship to Israel
throughout the ages which preceded the Captivity.
Jeroboam set up molten images at Dan and Bethel (1 Kings xiv. 2; 2 Kings xvii. 16). Baal was worshipped under the semblance of a molten image (2 Chron. xviii. 2) as were probably Ashdodoth, Chenosh, and Moloch. The animal worship of the Egyptians had no attractions for the Hebrews; they did not offer to images of stone or marble, like the Assyrians or the Greeks; much less was it their habit to "how down to stocks," like so many of the heathen nations around them. The "molten image" generally completed by a certain amount of graving, was the form of idol which had most charms for them, and the more precious the material the more satisfied were they to worship it.
(Comp. Isa. xxx. 22, xlix. 17; Jer. x. 14; Hosea xiii.
2, &c.). Occasionally indeed they overlaid wood or stone with plates of gold or silver, to produce an idol shall ye make unto you gods of gold.

(2) An altar of earth thou shalt make unto me, and shalt make thereon thy burnt offerings, and thy peace offerings, thy sheep, and thine oxen: in all places where I record my name I will come unto thee, and I will bless thee.

(3) And if thou wilt make me an altar of stone, thou shalt not build it of hewn stone: for if thou lift up thy hand upon it, thou hast polluted it.

(4) Neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar, that thy nakedness be not discovered thereon.

(Hab. x. 19): but such images were at once less common and held in less account.

(21) An altar of earth thou shalt make unto me. —The earliest altars were, naturally, either of earth, or of unhewn stones, gathered together into a heap, since these could be constructed with little labour, and without tools. But, as civilization advanced, more elaborate structures took the place of the primitive ones. It became usual to erect altars of hewn stone, adorned with carvings more or less rich, among which might often be introduced human and animal forms. We must understand the command here given, and that of verse 25, as intended to forbid structures of this latter kind, which, if allowed, might lead on to idolatry.

Thy burnt offerings and thy peace offerings. —Sacrifice began soon after Paradise was quitted (Gen. iv. 3, 4), and shortly became a universal practice. Noah offered sacrifice on leaving the ark (Gen. viii. 20); and in the family of Abraham the rite was an established one (Gen. xii. 7, xv. 3, xxii. 7, xxvi. 25, xxxi. 51, &c.). Egyptians, Assyrians, Babylonians, Persians, Phoenicians, Greeks, Romans, Scythians, Celts, Germans, all equally regarded sacrifice as a main element of their religion; and if the Hebrews had not offered actual sacrifices during their oppression in Egypt, they had, at any rate, maintained the wish to offer them, and it was (primarily) for the purpose of sacrificing that they had quitted Egypt. The legislation assumes that they are acquainted with the difference between "burnt offerings" and "peace offerings," and desires of offering both kinds.

(22) If thou wilt make me an altar of stone. —Among civilized nations altars were almost always of stone, which superseded earth, as more durable. God does not absolutely prohibit the employment of stone altars by the Israelites, who are found to use them upon certain occasions (Josh. viii. 31; 1 Kings xviii. 32). He is content to forbid the shaping of the stones by an implement, that so they may not give rise to idolatry. (See Note on verse 24.)

Thou hast polluted it. —Nature is God's handiwork, and, therefore, pure and holy. Man, by contact with it, imparts to it of his impurity. The altar, whereby sin was to be expiated, required to be free from all taint of human corruption. For the construction of the altar afterwards sanctioned, see the comment on chap. xxvii. 1.

(23) Neither shalt thou go up by steps unto mine altar. —When the dress of the priests had been so arranged that no exposure of the person was possible (ch. xxvii. 42, 43), this precept became unnecessary.

Thus it would seem that Solomon's altar had steps. (Compare 2 Chr. iv. 1 with Ezek. xxxii. 17.)

XXI.

Laws concerning the Rights of Persons.

(1) Those are the judgments. — "The laws" (Knobel, "the rights") (Keil), "the rules which shall guide judicial decisions" (Pool). The paraphrase alone gives the full meaning.

(2) If thou buy an Hebrew servant. — Ancient society was founded upon slavery. "The ultimate elements of the household," says Aristotle, "are the master and his slave, the husband and his wife, the father and his children" (Pol. i. 2, § 1). In any consideration of the rights of persons, those of the slave class naturally presented themselves first of all, since they were the most liable to infraction. Slaves might be either natives or foreigners. A Hebrew could become a slave — (1) through crime (chap. xxii. 3); (2) through indebtedness (Lev. xxv. 39); (3) through his father's right to sell him (Neh. v. 5). Foreign slaves might be either prisoners taken in war, or persons bought of their owners (Lev. xxv. 45). The rights of Hebrew slaves are here specially considered.

Six years shall he serve. — The Hebrew was not to be retained in slavery for a longer space than six years. If a jubilee year occurred before the end of the six years, then he regained his freedom earlier (Lev. xxv. 39—41); but in no case could he be retained more than six years in the slave condition, except by his own consent, formally given (verse 5). This law was an enormous advance upon anything previously known in the slave legislation of the most civilised country, and stumps the Mosaic code at once as sympathising with the slave, and bent on ameliorating his lot. It has been thought strange by some that slavery was not now abrogated; but even Christianity, fifteen hundred years later, did not venture on so complete a social revolution.

(3) His wife shall go out with him. — The privilege of the married Hebrew slave was to attach also to his wife, if he was married when he became a slave. It further, no doubt, attached to his children.

(4) If his master have given him a wife. — If, however, the Hebrew slave, being previously unmarried, had been allowed by his master to take to wife one of his female slaves, then, when the husband claimed his freedom the wife could not claim hers. Both she and her children remained in the slave condition.
And if the servant be made to serve six years; and shall not go out freely;

(5) then shall he serve another six years: and at the end of those years he shall go out free.

And if he be ... one which by his master's favour he had been allowed to create. For such cases such provision was necessary. It was made by the law here formulated (verses 5, 6), which allowed the Hebrew slave, if he liked, to forfeit all claim to freedom, and take upon him permanently the condition of a bondsman.

(9) Who hath betrothed her to himself, then shall he let her be redeemed: to sell her unto a strange nation he shall have no power, seeing he hath dealt deceitfully with her. (9) And if he have betrothed her unto his son, he shall deal with her after the manner of daughters. (10) If he take him another wife; her food, her raiment, and her duty of marriage, shall he not diminish. (11) And if he do not these three unto her, then shall she go out free without money, (12) "He that smiteth a man, so that he made over by him to his son, she was to enjoy all the rights of a daughter (verse 9). If the purchaser declined to act in either of these two ways, he was compelled to take one of two other courses. Either he must get another Hebrew to discharge his obligation of marriage (verse 8), or he must return the maid intact to her father, without making any demand for the restitution of the purchase-money (verse 11). These provisions afforded a considerable protection to the slave—especially, who might otherwise have been liable to grievous wrong and oppression.

(9) Who hath betrothed her to himself—The reading is to be preferred which gives the opposite sense—"who hath not betrothed her;" and the meaning is, "If the man, after purchasing the woman to be his wife, finds that he does not like her, and refuses to go through the ceremony of betrothal." When shall he let her be redeemed—Heb., let him cause her to be redeemed: i.e., let him provide some one to take his place, and carry out his contract, only taking care that the substitute be a Hebrew, and not one of a "strange nation," since her father did not intend to have her wed a foreigner.

(10) If he take him another wife—Polygamy is viewed as lawful in this passage, as elsewhere generally in the Mosaic Law, which did not venture to forbid, though to some extent discouraging it. The legislator was forced to allow many things to the Hebrews, "for the hardness of their hearts" (Matt. xix. 8).

Her duty of marriage—Rather, her right of cohabitation.

(11) These three... and if he marry her to his son; or (12) transfer her, on the terms on which he received her, to another Hebrew.

(13) These three... of these three things: (1) Espouse her himself; (2) marry her to his son; or (3) transfer her, on the terms on which he received her, to another Hebrew.

(12—14) He that smiteth a man, so that he murderer was even to be torn from God's altar, if he took refuge there.

(13) If a man lie not in wait, but God deliver him into his hand.—If, that is, without malice aforethought, a man happen upon his enemy, God's providence bringing the two into contact without man's contrivance, and the result is that one slay the other, then the law of the refuge or asylum shall come in. A place is to be provided whither the man-slayer may flee, and where he may be safe, at any rate until the cause is inquired into. Hitherto, throughout the East, it had been regarded as the duty of the next of kin to avenge homicide of whatever kind, and blood had been exacted for blood, however sudden, however provoked, however excusable had been the homicide. No right of asylum, so far as we know, had ever been established before. The Sinaitic legislation for the first time introduced the "city of refuge," between the "avenger of blood" and his victim. It was for the elders of the city to see that the privilege was not abused. Where the case was doubtful, the man-slayer had to be remitted for trial to the elders of his own town (Num. xxxv. 22—25); where the elders considered his claim made out, he was entitled to protection.

(14) If a man compro presumptuously.—Rather, if a man come maliciously, or with premeditation. (Vulg. de intentione.)

Thou shalt take him from mine altar.—Comp. 1 Kings ii. 29—34. In most parts of the ancient world a sacrifice was felt to be putting criminals to death when once they had taken sanctuary, and those who did so were regarded as accused (Herod. v. 71; Thucyd. i. 126; Plut. Vit. Sol., § 12). The Mosaic Law regarded this sacrifice as a superstition, and refused to sanction it.

(15—17) And he that smiteth his father . . .—With homicide are confounded some other offences, regarded as of a heinous character, and made punishable by death; viz. (1), striking a parent; (2) kidnapping; and (3) cursing a parent. The immediate sequence of these crimes upon murder, and their punishment by the same penalty, marks strongly God's abhorrence of them. The parent is viewed as God's representative, and to smite him is to offer God an insult in his person. To curse him implies, if possible, a greater want of reverence; and, since curses can only be effectual as appeals to God, it is an attempt to enlist God on our side against His representative. Kidnapping is a crime against the person only a very little short of murder, since it is to deprive a man of that which gives life its chief value—liberty. Many a man would prefer death to slavery; and to almost all the passing into the slave condition would be a calamity of the most terrible kind, involving life-long misery. Its suddenness and unexpectedness, when the result of kidnapping, would augment its grievousness, and render it the most crushing of all misfortunes. Joseph's history shows us how easy it was to sell a free man as a slave, and obtain his immediate removal into a distant country (Gen. xxxvii. 25—28). The Egyptian annals tell us of bloody wars carried on for kidnapping purposes (Lenormant, Histoire Ancienne, vol. i., pp. 423, 424). In the classical times and countries, the slaves offered for sale in the markets had usually been obtained in this way. The stringent law of the Mosaic code (verse 16) was greatly needed to check an atrocious crime very widely committed.

(18, 19) Severe assault, endangering life, but not actually taking it, is placed under the same head with homicide, as approaching to it, but is not to be punished in the same way. If death ensues in such a case, the crime is, of course, murder or manslaughter, according to the attendant circumstances; but if death does not ensue, it is aggravated assault only. In such cases punishment could not be inflicted by retaliation—the usual penalty under the Mosaic Law (verses 24, 25)—without a risk of killing the man, which would have been an excessive punishment. The law therefore imposed a fine, which was to be fixed at such an amount as would at once compensate the sufferer for the loss of his time (verse 19), and defray the cost of his cure.

(20) With a stone, or with his fist.—Comp. the difference made under the English law between wounding with a sharp or a blunt instrument.

(21) If he rise again, and walk abroad upon his staff.—The charge of murder was not to be kept hanging over a man indefinitely. If the injured person recovered sufficiently to leave his bed, and get about by the help of a stick, the injured was to pay his fine and be quit of his offence, whatever might happen afterwards.

(22) And if a man smite his servant, or his maid, with a rod, and he die under his hand; he shall be surely punished.
(22) And if a man smite the eye of his servant, or the eye of his maid, that it perish; he shall let him go free for his eye’s sake.

(27) And if he smite out his manservant’s tooth, or his maidservant’s tooth; he shall let him go free for his tooth’s sake.

(26) And notwithstanding, if he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished: for he is his money.

(23) If men strive, and hurt a woman with child, so that her fruit depart from her, and yet no mischief follow: he shall be surely punished, according as the woman’s husband lay upon him; and he shall pay as the judges determine.

(24) And if any mischief follow, then thou shalt give life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot, burning for burning, wound for wound, stripe for stripe.

The law took cognizance. Later on it appears that even assaults on slaves, if they reached a certain intensity, were unlawful, and involved the slave’s compulsory emancipation (verses 26, 27).

With a rod.—The usual instrument of punishment. It would follow, as a matter of course, that if a more dangerous implement was used the master was punished with equal, or greater, severity.

(21) If he continue a day or two, he shall not be punished.—Comp. the proviso with respect to freemen (verse 19). The notion is, that unless the death follows speedily it must be presumed not to have been intended; and this might be especially presumed in the case of a man killing his slave, since thereby he inflicted on himself a pecuniary loss.

(22—23) A personal injury peculiar to women—a hurt producing miscarriage—is here considered. The miscarriage might cost the woman her life, in which case the man who caused it was to suffer death (verse 23); or it might have no further ill result than the loss of the child. In this latter case the penalty was to be a fine, assessed by the husband with the consent of the judge (verse 22). The death penalty, where the woman died, is clearly excessive, and probably belongs to the pre-Mosaic legislation, which required “life for life” in every case.

(22) If men strive, and hurt a woman with child.—It is assumed that this hurt would probably take place through the interference of a pregnant wife in some strife wherein her husband was engaged. It would almost certainly be accidental.

And yet no mischief follow—i.e., no further mischief—nothing beyond the loss of the child.

(25) Life for life, eye for eye.—It is a reasonable conjecture that the law of retaliation was much older than Moses, and accepted by him as tolerable rather than revised as right. The law itself was very widely spread. Traces of it are found in India, in Egypt, among the Greeks, and in the laws of the Twelve Tables. Aristotle says that the Pythagoreans approved it, and that it was believed to be the rule by which Rhadamnus administered justice in the other world. There is, primd facie, a semblance of exact rectitude and equality about it which captivates rude minds, and continues to captivate generally in an early condition of society. Theoretically, retaliation is the exactest and strictest justice; but in practical difficulties arise. How is the force of a blow to be measured? How are exactly similar burns and wounds to be inflicted? Is eye to be given for eye when the injurer is a one-eyed man? And, again, is it expedient for law to multiply the number of mutilated citizens in a community? Considerations of these kinds cause the rule to be discarded as soon as civilisation reaches a certain point, and tend generally to the substitution of a money compensation, to be paid to the injured party by the injurer. The present passage sanctioned the law of retaliation in principle, but authorised its enforcement in a single case only. In a later part of the Mosaic code the application was made universal (Lev. xxiv. 17—21; Dent. xix. 21).

(26, 27) The eye...tooth.—An exception to the law of retaliation is here made. If the injurer is a free man and the injured person a slave, the marked social inequality of the parties would make exact retaliation an injustice. Is the slave, then, to be left without protection? By no means. As the legislation had already protected his life (verse 20), so it now protects him from permanent damage to his person. The master who inflicts any such permanent damage—from the least to the greatest—loses all property in his slave, and is bound at once to emancipate him. The loss of an eye is viewed as the greatest permanent injury to the person; the loss of a tooth as the least.

(28—33) Injuries to the person might arise either from man or from animals. Protection from both was needed. The law given to Noah (Gen. ix. 5) had already laid it down that whenever a beast killed a man his life was to be forfeit. This law was now re-enacted, but with a further and very important proviso. If the animal had an owner, and the owner had reason to know that it was dangerous, then not only the beast, but the owner also was to be held guilty. He was to be liable to a process for murder (verse 29); but, with the consent of the aggrieved family, might pay a sum of money as compensation instead (verse 30). In the case of a slave, the sum was fixed at what was regarded as the standard price of a slave (Lev. xxv. 44—46, xxvii. 3), viz., thirty silver shekels.

(29) The ox shall be surely stoned—i.e., he shall die the death of a murderer.

His flesh shall not be eaten.—An ox killed by stoning would not be bled in the usual way, and would be “unclean” food for Hebrews. According to the Rabbis, the flesh might not even be disposed of to the Gentiles, but had to be buried. If this were so, the object must have been to mark strongly that whatever creature took human life was accursed.

(30) His owner also shall be put to death.—It seems clear that under this law the representatives
Hath not kept him in, but that he hath killed a man or a woman; the ox shall be stoned, and his owner also shall be put to death. (26) If there be laid on him a sum of money, then shall he give for the ransom of his life whatsoever is laid upon him. (27) Whether he have gored a son, or have gored a daughter, according to this judgment shall it be done unto him. (28) If the ox shall push a manservant or a maidservant; he shall give unto their master thirty shekels of silver, and the ox shall be stoned.

(29) And if a man shall open a pit, or if a man shall dig a pit, and not set a shewer thereof, and an ox or an ass fall therein; (30) the owner of the pit shall make it good, and give money unto the owner of them; and the dead beast shall be his. (31) And if one man's ox hurt another's, of the slain person might have exacted life for life; but probably they would in almost all cases have been ready to accept a compensation.

Whatsoever is laid upon him.—Primarily, by the aggrieved relatives; but in the case of an exorbitant demand there was, no doubt, an appeal to the judges, who would then fix the amount.

Laws Concerning the Rights of Property.

The legislation slides from rights of persons to rights of property easily and without effort, by passing from the injuries which cattle cause to those which they suffer. They are injured (1) by the culpable laches of persons leaving their pits uncovered; (2) by hurts which one man's cattle inflict upon another's. Both kinds of loss have to be made good.

If a man shall open a pit.—Rather, uncover a well. The wells in the East commonly have covers, which are removed when water is drawn, and then replaced. If a man neglected to replace a cover, he was rightly answerable for any damage that might ensue. The case was the same if he dug a new well, and neglected to cover it over.

The dead beast shall be his.—Having paid the full value of the live animal, the owner of the well was entitled to make what he could by the carcase.

If one man's ox hurt another's.—Where no blame attached to the owner, the loss was to be equally shared. Where the dangerous character of the animal was, or ought to have been, known, the man whose ox was killed received its full value.

XXII.

(1-4) Theft is here treated of with great brevity, only three kinds being distinguished—(1) Housebreaking; (2) stealing without conversion of the property; (3) stealing with conversion. The main principle of punishment laid down is the exaction from the offender of double (verse 4). When, however, there has been conversion of the property, the penalty is heavier, the return of four-fold in the case of a sheep, of five-fold in that of an ox (verse 1). Incidentally it is enacted that the burglar may be resisted by force (verse 2), and that to kill him shall be justifiable homicide; and further, it is laid down that a thief unable to make the legal restitution shall become a slave in order to pay his debt (verse 3).

If a man shall steal an ox, or a sheep.—The flocks and herds of the Israelites constituted their principal property, and hence cattle-stealing is taken as the representative of theft in general.

And kill it, or sell it.—Plainly showing persistence and determination.

Five oxen . . . four sheep.—The principle of the variation is not clear. Perhaps the theft of an ox was regarded as involving more audacity, and so more guilt, in the thief.

If a thief be found breaking up.—Rather, breaking in: i.e., making forcible entry into a dwelling-house. Most codes agree with the Mosaic in allowing the inmates of the house to resist such an attempt if made at night, and to shed the blood of the burglar, if necessary. He may be considered as having dissolved the "social compact," and converted himself from a fellow-citizen into a public enemy. A murderous intent on his part may be suspected.

If the sun be risen upon him.—In the daytime, no violence is to be feared. The housebreaker seeks to avoid observation, and decamps if discovered. Moreover, assistance is readily obtainable, and thus there is no need of resorting to extreme measures. The English law makes exactly the same distinction as the Mosaic.

For he should make full restitution.—Heb., restoring, he shall restore. It is not quite clear whether he is to restore double; but so most commentators understand the passage.

If he have nothing.—Rather, if he have not enough. If he cannot make the full restitution of the preceding verse, then "he shall be sold for his theft." He shall become the slave for the term of six years of the man whom he has robbed, and in that way pay his debt.

If the theft be certainly found in his hand.—If he had not converted it, consumed it, or, if it were an animal, killed it, then, instead of the four-it be ox, or ass, or sheep; he shall restore double.

(5) If a man shall cause a field or vineyard to be eaten, and shall put in his beast, and shall feed in another man's field; of the best of his own field, and of the best of his own vineyard, shall he make restitution.

(6) If fire break out, and catch in thorns, so that the stacks of corn, or the standing corn, or the field, be consumed therewith; he that kindled the fire shall surely make restitution.

(7) If a man shall deliver unto his neighbour money or stuff to keep, and it be stolen out of the man's house; if the thief be found, let him pay double. (8) If the thief be not found, then the master of the house shall be brought unto the fold or five-fold restitution of verse 1, a restoration of double was to suffice.

(5) If a man shall cause a field . . . to be eaten.—On theft follows trespass, another injury to property. Two kinds of trespass alone are mentioned; but from these the principles to be followed in punishing trespass generally can be sufficiently made out. Accidental injury, such as that caused by fire extending from one man's field into another's, was to be simply compensated up to the amount of damage done; but voluntary injury, such as followed on the turning of beasts into a neighbour's ground, was to be more than compensated. The amount of produce destroyed was to be exactly calculated, and then the injurer was to make good the full amount of his neighbour's loss out of the best of his own produce.

(6) If fire break out, and catch in thorns.—In the East, as elsewhere—e.g., Italy (Virg. Ægyst., i. 84) and England—it is customary at certain seasons to burn the weeds and other refuse of a farm, which is collected for the purpose into heaps, and then set on fire. Such fires may spread, especially in the dry East, if care be not taken, and cause extensive damage to the crops, or even the corn-heaps of a neighbour. The loss in such cases was to fall on the man who lit the fire.

(7—12) Property deposited in the hands of another for safe keeping might be so easily embezzled by the trustee, or lost through his negligence, that some special laws were needed for its protection. Conversely the trustee required to be safe-guarded against incurring loss if the property intrusted to his care suffered damage or disappeared without fault of his. The Mosaic legislation provided for both cases. On the one hand, it required the trustee to exercise proper care, and made him answerable for the loss if a thing intrusted to him was stolen and the thief not found. Embezzlement it punished by requiring the trustee guilty of it to “pay double.” On the other hand, in doubtful cases it allowed the trustee to clear himself by an oath (verse 10), and in clear cases to give proof that the loss had happened through unavoidable accident (verse 12).

(7) If a man shall deliver unto his neighbour money or stuff to keep.—The practice of making deposits of this kind was widespread among ancient communities, where there were no professional bankers or keepers of warehouses. The Greeks called such a deposit παραμαρθήμα. It was usually made in money, or at any rate in the precious metals. A refusal to restore the thing deposited was very rare, since a special nemesis was considered to punish such conduct (Herod. vii. 86). However, at Athens it was found necessary to have a peculiar form of action for the recovery of deposits (παραμαρθήμα δίκαιον).

(8) To see whether he have put his hand.—Kalisch translates, to swear that he has not put his hand, and so the LXX. (ει δεχθηται ουδεξερείται μαμεμαν).

(9) For all manner of trespass.—Rather, in every case of fraud. The context limits the expression to cases of fraud, or alleged fraud, in connection with a deposit.

For ox, for ass, for sheep.—The deposit of animals is unknown in classical antiquity, but might well be the custom of a people whose wealth consisted in flocks and herds. In the wilderness small proprietors might have been glad to intrust their few animals to the herdsmen who guarded the flocks and herds of their wealthier neighbours.

Which another challengeth to be his.—The case is supposed of the trustee saying a thing is lost which the depositor declares he can identify, and show to be still in his (the trustee's) possession.

The cause of both parties shall come before the judges.—This seems to mean that the challenge was to be made at the challenger's risk. If he proved his point to the satisfaction of the judges, he was to recover double; if he failed, he was to forfeit double of what he had claimed.

(10) And it die, or be hurt, or driven away.—The animal might “die” naturally, or “be hurt” by a wild beast or a fall down the rocks, or “be driven away” by the marauding tribes of the desert. Both parties might be agreed on the fact of its disappearance; the dispute would be as to the mode of the disappearance. Here the trustee might bring proof, if he could (verse 13); if not, he might clear himself by an “oath of the Lord” (verse 11).

(12) If it be stolen from him, he shall make restitution.—It seems to have been considered that the owner thereof. (13) If it be torn in pieces, then let him bring it for witness, and he shall not make good that which was torn.

(14) And if a man borrow ought of his neighbour, and it be hurt, or die, the owner thereof being not with it, he shall surely make it good. (15) But if the owner thereof be with it, he shall not make it good: if it be an hired thing, it came for his hire.

(16) And if a man entice a maid that is not betrothed, and lie with her, he shall surely endow her to be his wife. (17) If her father utterly refuse to give her unto him, he shall pay money according to the dowry of virgins.

(18) Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live. (19) Whosoever lieth with a beast shall surely be put to death.

(20) He that sacrificeth unto any god, save unto the Lord only, he shall be utterly destroyed.

(21) Thou shalt neither vex a stranger, nor oppress him: for ye were strangers in the land of Egypt.

MISCELLANEOUS LAWS.

(16-31) The remainder of the chapter contains laws which it is impossible to bring under any general head, or heads, and which can, therefore, only be regarded as miscellaneous. Moses may have recorded them in the order in which they were delivered to him; or have committed them to writing as they afterwards occurred to his memory.

(16) If a man entice a maid.—The seduction of a maiden is regarded more seriously in primitive than in more advanced communities. The father looked to receive a handsome sum (73ρα) from the man to whom he consented to betroth his virgin daughter; and required compensation if his daughter's eligibility as a wife was diminished. If the seducer were a person to whom he felt it a degradation to marry his daughter, he might exact from him such a sum as would be likely to induce another to wed her; if he was one whom he could accept as a son-in-law, he might compel him to re-establish his daughter's status by marriage. It might be well if modern societies would imitate the Mosaic code on this point by some similar proviso.

He shall surely endow her—i.e., pay the customary sum to the father. See Deut. xxii. 29, where the sum is fixed at fifty shekels of silver.

(17) He shall pay money according to the dowry of virgins.—It is not stated what the amount was to be in this case; but probably it was more than in the other.

(18) Thou shalt not suffer a witch to live.—The word translated "witch" in this passage is the feminine singular of that rendered by "sorcerers" in chap. vii. 11, and means "a matter of charms." The use of the feminine form can only be accounted for by supposing that, practically, witchcraft was at the time mainly professed by females. Whether "witches" had actual help from evil spirits, or only professed to work magical effects by their aid, the sin against God was the same. Jehovah was denounced, and a power other than His invoked and upheld. Witchcraft was as much rebellion against God as idolatry or blasphemy, and deserved the same punishment.

(19) The sin here denounced was common among the Canaanitish nations (Lev. xviii. 24), and not unknown in Egypt (Herod. ii. 46). It was therefore necessary that God's abhorrence of it should be distinctly declared to Israel.

(20) He that sacrificeth.—Sacrifice in this place represents worship generally, being its most essential act. Elsewhere the death-penalty is affixed to any acknowledgment of false gods (Deut. xiii. 1-14).

Shall be utterly destroyed.—Heb. Shall be devoted, i.e., devoted to destruction.

(21-24) The juxtaposition of laws against oppression with three crimes of the deepest dye seems intended to indicate that oppression is among the sins which are most hateful in God's sight. The lawgiver, however, does not say that it is to be punished capitaly, nor, indeed, does he affix to it any legal penalty. Instead of so doing, he declares that God Himself will punish it "with the sword" (verse 24). Three classes of persons particularly liable to be oppressed are selected for mention—(1) Strangers, i.e., foreigners; (2) widows; and (3) orphans. Strangers have seldom been protected by any legislation, unless, indeed, they formed a class of permanent residents, like the Metoei at Athens. The law of civilised communities has generally afforded some protection to the orphan and the widow, particularly in respect of rights of property. The protection given is, however, very generally insufficient; and it is of the highest importance that it should be supplemented by an assured belief that, beyond all legal penalties there lies the Divine sentence of wrath and punishment, certain to fall upon every one who, careless of law and right, makes the stranger, the widow, or the orphan to suffer wrong at his hands.

(21) For ye were strangers.—Ye should, therefore, sympathise with "strangers," not "vex them," not
"Odessus," ix. 22. Ye shall not afflict any widow, or fatherless child. (22) If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me, I will surely hear their cry; (23) and my wrath shall wax hot, and I will kill you with the sword; and your wives shall be widows, and your children fatherless.

If thou lend money to any of my people that is poor by thee, thou shalt not be to him as an usurer, neither shalt thou lay upon him usury. (25) If thou at all take thy neighbour's raiment to pledge, thou shalt deliver it unto him by that the sun goeth down: (27) For that is his covering only, it is his raiment for his skin: wherein shall he sleep? and it shall come to pass, when he crieth unto me, that I will hear; for I am gracious.

Thou shalt not revile the gods, nor curse the ruler of thy people. (28) Thou shalt not delay to offer the first of thy ripe fruits, and of thy 3 liquors: the firstborn of thy sons shalt thou give unto me. (30) Likewise shalt thou do with thine oxen, and with thy sheep: seven days it shall be with his dam; on the eighth day shalt give it me.

And ye shall be holy men unto me:

"Oppress them," but "love them as yourselves" (Lev. xix. 34). The condition of foreigners in Israel is shown to have been more than tolerable by the examples of the Kenites (Judg. i. 16; iv. 11); of Aramah the Jebusite (2 Sam. xxiv. 18-24); of Uriah the Hittite (2 Sam. xxi. 39); Zelch the Ammonite (2 Sam. xxii. 37), and others.

If thou afflict them in any wise, and they cry at all unto me.—Rather, If thou afflict them sore, and they cry earnestly unto me. On the transgression of the laws against oppression by the later Israelites, see Jer. v. 28; vii. 6; xxii. 3, 17; Zech. vii. 20; Mal. iii. 5; Matt. xxiii. 14, &c. The sword of the Babylonians and the sword of the Romans avenged the sufferers, according to the prophecy of verse 24.

The Mosaic law of borrowing and lending was strange and peculiar. It was absolutely forbidden to exact any interest from those borrowers who were Israelites. The wording of the present passage, and of some others (Lev. xxv. 35; Deut. xxv. 7), construed strictly, prohibits interest only on loans to the poor; but, as in a primitive state of society only the poor wish to borrow, the qualifying expression lost its force, and to exact any interest of any Israelite was regarded as wrong. (See Ps. xv. 5; Prov. xxviii. 8; Neh. v. 7, 11; Ezek. xviii. 13; xxii. 12.) And some prohibitions, as Deut. xxiii. 19, were expressed in the most general terms. On the other hand, the lending of money upon interest to foreigners was distinctly allowed (Deut. xxiii. 20), and no limit placed upon the amount of interest that might be taken.

Usurer. . . usury.—The Hebrew nishkeh and mishkeh have no sense of "excess" attached to them. They mean simply "interest," and "the man who lends upon interest."

Thy neighbour's raiment.—The simlah, or salmah, here translated "garment," was the large flowing outer raiment, elsewhere called beged, which was commonly of woolen, and corresponded to the abia of the modern Arabs. It was a warm wrapper, and has sometimes been compared to a Scotch plaid. The poor Israelite did not much want it by day; but needed it as a blanket by night—a practice known to many modern tribes of Arabs. The present passage forbids the retention of this garment as a pledge during the night, and seems to imply a continuous practice of pledging the simlah by day, and being allowed to enjoy the use of it, nevertheless, as a nocturnal covering.

Thou shalt not revile the gods.—The LXX. and Vulgate give the passage this sense; and so it was understood, or at any rate expounded, by Philo (De Vit. Mos. iii. 29) and Josephus (Ant. Jud. iv. 8, § 10), who boasted that the Jews abstained from reviling the gods of the nations. But the practice of the most pious Israelites in the best times was different (1 Kings xviii. 27; Ps. cxv. 4-8, cxxxv. 15-18; Isa. xli. 29, xlv. 9-20; Jer. x. 15, &c.). The gods of the heathen were uniformly, and with the utmost scorn, "reviled." It has been suggested that the true meaning of elohein in this place is "judges" (Rosennmuller, Zunz, Herxheimer); but to have that sense, the word requires the article. It is best, therefore, to translate by " God," as is done by De Wette, Knobel, Keil, Kalisch, Canon Cook, &c., and to understand the entire passage as intended to connect the sin of cursing a ruler with that of reviling God, the ruler being regarded as God's representative.

The first of thy ripe fruits.—Heb. of thy fulness. "Firstfruits" were the spontaneous tribute of natural piety among almost all nations. They were called by the Greeks ἕρμος, by the Romans primitiae. Abel's offering (Gen. iv. 4) was one of the "firstlings of his flock," and Cain's probably one of firstfruits. In the present passage it is assumed that firstfruits are due, and the stress is laid upon offering them promptly, without "delay." Delay would show a grudging spirit.

Of thy liquors.—As wine and oil. (Compare Neh. x. 17, 39.)

The firstborn of thy sons.—See the Note on chap. xiii. 2; and on the means of redeeming firstborn sons, see chap. xiii. 13, and Num. xvii. 15, 16.

Thine oxen.—Rather, thy beeves. The word used is applied to horned cattle of either sex.

Seven days it shall be with his dam.—Compare Lev. xxii. 27. The main object of forbidding sacrifice before the eighth day would appear to have been regard for the health and comfort of the mother, which needed the relief obtained by sucking its offspring. There may also have underlain the prohibition some reference to birth as an impure process. Compare the circumcision of the male child on the eighth day.

Ye shall be holy men unto me.—Compare chap. xix. 6. The holiness really desired was holiness of heart and spirit. Outward ordinances could not effect this; but, to keep the thought perpetually before men's minds, a network of external obligations was EXODUS, XXIII.

 Miscellaneous Laws.

 CHAPTER XXIII. — (1) Thou shalt not raise a false report: put not thine hand with the wicked to be an unrighteous witness. (2) Thou shalt not follow a multitude to do evil; neither shalt thou speak in a cause to decline after many to wrest judgment; (3) neither shalt thou countenance a poor man in his cause.

 Justice must hold her scales even, and be proof equally against a paltry fear of the rich and a weak compassion for the indigent. The cause alone is to be considered, not the Lev. xix. (Comp. Deut. xvi. 20.)

 (4) Thou shalt not raise the judgment of thy poor in his cause. (5) Keep thee far from a false matter; and the innocent and righteous slay thou not: for I will not justify the wicked. (6) And thou shalt take no gift: for the blindeth administration of justice was one of the crying evils which provoked God's judgments against His people, and led, in the first instance, to the Babylonian captivity, and afterwards to the Roman conquest.

(9) Thou shalt not oppress a stranger. — See Note on chap. xxii. 21. The repetition of the law indicates the strong inclination of the Hebrew people to ill-use strangers, and the anxiety of the legislator to check their inclination.

Ceremonial Laws.

(10, 11) Six years ... the seventh year. — The Sabbatical year which is here commanded was an institution wholly unknown to any nation but the Hebrews. It is most extraordinary that any legislator should have been able to induce a people to accept such a law. Prima facie, it seemed, by forbidding productive industry during one year in seven, to diminish the wealth of the nation by one-seventh. But it is questionable whether, under a primitive agricultural system, when rotation of crops was unknown, the lying of the land fallow during one year in seven would not have been an economical system. There was no prohibition on labour other than in cultivation. The clearing away of weeds and thorns and stones was allowed, and may have been practised. After an early harvest of the self-sown crop, the greater part of the year may have been spent in this kind of industry. Still the enactment was no doubt unpopular: it checked the regular course of agriculture, and seemed to rob landowners of one-seventh of their natural gains. Accordingly, we find that it was very irregularly observed. Between the Exodus and the Captivity it had apparently been neglected seventy times (2 Chron. xxxvi. 21), or more often than it had been kept. After the Captivity, however, the observance became regular, and classical writers notice the custom as one existing in their day (Tacit. Hist. v. 4). Julius Caesar permitted it, and excused the Jews from paying tribute in the seventh year on its account (Josephus, Ant. Jud. xiv. 10, § 6). The object of the law was threefold: (1) to test obedience; (2) to give an advantage to the poor and needy, to whom the crop of the seventh year belonged (verse 11); and (3) to allow an opportunity, once in seven years, for prolonged communion with God and increased religious observances. (See Deut. xxxi. 10—13.)

(11) That the poor of thy people may eat. — For fuller particulars see Lev. xix. 1—7. The owner was to have no larger part of the seventh year's produce than any one else. He was to take his share with the hirthing, the stranger, and even the cattle, which, during this year, were to browse where they pleased.

Thy vineyard ... thy olive-yard. — These would bear a full average produce, and the boon to the poor man would in these respects have been very considerable. Corn, wine, and oil were the staple commodities of Palestine (Deut. viii. 8; 2 Kings xvii. 32, &c.).

(12) The law of the weekly Sabbath is here repeated in conjunction with that of the Sabbatical year, to mark the intimate connection between the two, which were parts of one and the same system — a system which culminated in the Jubilee year (Lev. xxv. 8—13). Nothing is added to the requirements of the fourth commandment, but the merciful intention of the Sabbath day is more fully brought out — it is to be kept in order that the cattle may rest, and the slave and stranger may be refreshed.

(13) Be circumspect. — Rather, take heed. The verb used is a very common one.

Make no mention of the name of other gods. — The Jewish commentators understand swearing by the name of other gods to be the thing here forbidden, and so the Vulg. “per monum exteriorum deorum non jurabitis.” But the words used reach far beyond this. Contempt for the ”gods of the nations” was to be shown by ignoring their very names. They were not to be spoken of, unless by preachers in the way of warning, or by historians when the facts of history could not be otherwise set forth. Moses himself mentions Baal (Num. xxii. 41), Beal-peor (ib. xxv. 3, 5), Chemosh (ib. xxi. 29), and Moloch (Levit. xx. 2—5, xxiii. 21).

(14—17) The first great festival — the Passover festival — had been already instituted (chaps. xii. 3—20, xiii. 3—10). It pleased the Divine Legislator at this time to add to that festival two others, and to make all three equally obligatory. There is some reason to suppose that, in germ, the “feast of harvest” and the “feast of ingathering” already existed. All nations, from the earliest time to which history reaches back, had festival-seasons of a religious character; and no seasons are more suitable for such festivities than the conclusion of the grain-harvest, and the final completion of the entire harvest of the year. At any rate, whatever the previous practice, these three festival-seasons were now laid down as essential parts of the Law, and continued — supplemented by two others — the national festivals so long as Israel was a nation. In other countries such seasons were more common. Herodotus says that the Egyptians had six great yearly festival-times (ii. 58); and in Greece and Rome there was never a month without some notable religious festivity. Such institutions exerted a political as well as a religious influence, and helped towards national unity. This was more especially the case when, as in the present instance, they were expressly made gatherings of the whole nation to a single unto me in the year. (15) "Thou shalt keep the feast of unleavened bread: (thou shalt eat unleavened bread seven days, as I commanded thee, in the time appointed of the month Abib; for in it thou camest out from Egypt; "and none shall appear before me empty:) (16) and the feast of harvest, the firstfruits of thy labours, which thou hast sown in the field: and the feast of ingathering, which is in the end of the year, when thou hast gathered in thy labours out of the field. (17) Three times in the year all thy males shall appear before the Lord God.

(18) Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leavened bread; neither shall the fat of my sacrifice remain until the morning.

(19) The first of the firstfruits of thy land thou shalt bring into the house of the Lord thy God.

"Thou shalt not see the a kid in his mother’s milk.

(20) "Behold, I send an Angel before the centre. What the great Greek panegyrics, Olympic, Pythian, &c., were to Hellas, that the three great annual gatherings to the place where God had fixed His name were to Israel—a means of drawing closer the national bond, and counteracting those separatist tendencies which a nation split into tribes almost necessarily developed.

(15) The feast of unleavened bread.—See the Notes on chap. xix. 12—20.

In the time appointed of the month Abib.—From the 14th day of the month Abib (or Nisan) to the 21st day. (See chaps. xii. 18, xiii. 4—7.)

None shall appear before me empty.—Viewed religiously, the festivals were annual national thanksgivings for mercies received, both natural and miraculous—the first for the commencement of harvest and the deliverance out of Egypt; the second for the completion of the grain-harvest and the passage of the Red Sea; the third for the final gathering in of the fruits and the many mercies of the wilderness. At such seasons we must not "appear before God empty," we must give Him not only "the salves of our lips," but some substantial acknowledgment of His goodness towards us. The law here laid down with respect to the first feast is afterwards extended to the other two (Deut. xvi. 16).

(18) The feast of harvest.—It was calculated that the grain-harvest would be completed fifty days after it had begun. On this fiftieth day (Pentecost) the second festival was to commence by the offering of two loaves made of the new wheat just gathered in. On the other offerings commanded, see Levit. xxiii. 18—20. The Law limited the feast to a single day—the "day of Pentecost"—but in practice it was early extended to two days, in order to cover a possible miscalculation as to the exact time.

The feast of ingathering.—Elsewhere commonly called "the feast of tabernacles" (Levit. xxiii. 34; Deut. xvi. 13, 16; xxx. 10; 2 Chron. viii. 13; Ezra iii. 4; Zech. xiv. 16—19, &c.). Like the feast of unleavened bread, this lasted for a week. It corresponded to a certain extent with modern "harvest-homes," but was more prolonged and of a more distinctly religious character. The time fixed for it was the week commencing with the fifteenth and terminating with the twenty-first of the month Tisri, corresponding to our October. The vintage and the olive-harvest had by that time been completed, and thanks were given for God’s bounties through the whole year. At the same time the sojourn in the wilderness was commemorated; and as a memorial of that time those who attended the feast dwelt during its continuance in booths made of branches of trees. (See Levit. xxiii. 40; Neh. viii. 14—17.)

(17) Three times in the year.—The terms of this verse, as compared with verse 14, limit the observance of the three festivals to the males, but add the important requirement of personal attendance at a given place. By "all thy males" we must understand all of full age and not incapacitated by infirmity or illness.

(18) Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leavened bread.—Some regard this prohibition as extending to all sacrifices; but the majority of commentators limit it to the sacrifice of the Paschal lamb, which was the only sacrifice as yet expressly instituted by Jehovah. According to modern Jewish notions, leavened bread is permissible at the other festivals; at Pentecost it was commanded (Levit. xxiii. 17).

The fat of my sacrifice.—Rather (as in the Margin), the fat of my feast. The fat of the Paschal lamb was burnt on the altar with incense the same evening. Thus the whole lamb was consumed before the morning. As the Paschal lamb is "my fat" (cf. Exod. xxix. 39), so the Passover is "my feast."

(19) The first of the firstfruits—i.e., the very first that ripened. There was a natural tenacity to "delay" the offering (chap. xxii. 29) until a considerable part of the harvest had been got in. True gratitude makes a return for benefits received as soon as it can. "Bis dat qui cito dat."

The house of the Lord.—Comp. chap. xiv. 26 and Deut. xxii. 18. It is known to Moses that the "place which God will choose to put his name there" is to be a "holy" or "temple."

Thou shalt not see the a kid.—A fanciful exegesis connects the four precepts of verses 18 and 19 with the three feasts—the two of verse 18 with the Paschal festival, that concerning firstfruits in verse 19 with the feast of ingathering, and this concerning kids with the feast of tabernacles. To support this theory it is suggested that the command has reference to a superstitions practice customary at the close of the harvest—a kid being then boiled in its mother’s milk with magic rites, and the milk used to sprinkle plantations, fields, and gardens, in order to render them more productive the next year. But Deut. xiv. 21, which attaches the precept to a list of unclean meats, is sufficient to show that the kid spoken of was boiled to be eaten. The best explanation of the passage is that of Bochart (Hierosol. pt. I., bk. ii., chap. 52), that there was a sort of cruelty in making the milk of the mother, intended for the kid’s sustenance, the means of its destruction.

The Promises of God to Israel, if the Covenant is kept.

(20—31) The Book of the Covenant terminates, very appropriately, with a series of promises. God is "the rewarder of them that diligently seek him." He chooses Thee, to keep thee in the way, and to bring thee into the place which I have prepared. (22) Beware of him, and obey his voice, provoke him not; for he will not pardon your transgressions: for my name is in him. (22) But if thou shalt indeed obey his voice, and do all that I speak; then I will be an enemy unto thine enemies, and an adversary unto thine adversaries. (23) For mine Angel shall go before thee, and bring thee in unto the Amorites, and the Hittites, and the Perizzites, and the Canaanites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites: and I will cut them off. (24) Thou shalt not bow down to their gods, nor serve them, nor do after their works: (25) but thou shalt utterly overthrow them, and quite break down their images. (26) And ye shall serve the Lord your God, and he shall bless thy bread, and thy water; and I will take sickness away from the midst of thee. (27) There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren, in thy land: the number of thy days I will fulfil. (28) I will send my fear before thee, and will destroy all the people to whom thou shalt come, and I will make all thine enemies turn their backs unto thee. (29) And I will send hornets before thee, which shall drive out the Hivite, the Canaanite, and the Hittite, from before

Thou shalt... quite break down their images.—Conquerors generally preserved the idols of the conquered nations as trophies of victory; to do so was forbidden to the Israelites. Idolatry had such a powerful and subtle attraction for them, that there was danger of their being seduced into it unless the entire apparatus of the idol-worship were destroyed and made away with. Hence the present injunctions, and others similar to them. (Comp. chap. xxxiv. 13; Deut. vii. 5; &c.)

He shall bless thy bread, and thy water.—i.e., all the food, whether meat or drink, on which they subsisted. It is God's blessing which makes food healthful to us.

Take sickness away.—Half the sicknesses from which men suffer are directly caused by sin, and would disappear if men led godly, righteous, and sober lives. Others, as plague and pestilence, are scourges sent by God to punish those who have offended Him. If Israel had walked in God's ways, He would have preserved them from sicknesses of all kinds by a miraculous interposition. (Comp. Deut. vii. 15.)

There shall nothing cast their young, nor be barren.—Abominations, unfruitful births, and barrenness, when they occurred under any amount, were always reckoned in the ancient world among the signs of God's disfavour, and special expiatory rites were devised for checking them. Conversely, when such misfortunes fell short of the ordinary average, God's favour was presumed. The promises here made confirm man's instinctive feeling.

The number of thy days I will fulfil.—Comp. chap. xxv. 12. Long life is always regarded in Scripture as a blessing. (Comp. Pss. iv. 23, xc. 10; Job v. 26, xlii. 16, 17; 1 Kings iii. 11; Is. lxv. 20; Eph. vi. 3, &c.)

I will send hornets.—Heb., the hornet. Comp. Josh. xxiv. 12, where "the hornet" is said to have been sent. No doubt hornets might be so numerous as to become an intolerable plague, and induce a nation to quit its country and seek another (see Becht., Hierocoe, iv. 13). But as we have no historical account of the kind in connection with the Canaanite races, the expression here used is scarcely to be taken literally. Probably the Egyptians are the hornets intended. It was they who, under Rameses III., broke the power of the Hittites and other nations of Palestine, while the Israelites were sojourners in the wilderness. Possibly the term was chosen in reference to the EXODUS, XXIV.

CHAPTER XXIV.—

(1) And he said unto Moses, Come up unto the Lord, thou, and Aaron, Nadab, and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel; and worship ye afar off. (2) And Moses alone shall come near the Lord: but they shall not come nigh; neither shall the people go up with him. (3) And Moses came and told the people all the words of the Lord, and all the judgments; and all the people answered with one voice, and said, “All the words which the Lord hath said will we do. (4) And Moses wrote all the words of the Lord, and rose up early in the morning, and built an altar under the hill, and twelve pillars, according to the

XXIV.

The Ratification of the Covenant.

(1) And he said.—We should have expected “And God said,” or “And Jehovah said.” The omission of the nominative is probably to be accounted for by the insertion into Exodus at this point of “the Book of the Covenant,” which was originally a distinct document. Verse 1 of chap. xxiv, probably followed originally on verse 21 of chap. xx. The sequence of the words was then as follows: “And Moses drew near unto the thick darkness where God was. And he said unto Moses,” &c.

Come up.—The ascent of Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and the seventy elders seems to have been commanded in order to give greater solemnity to the ratification of the covenant between God and Israel, which is the main subject of this section. Moses received instructions on the subject before descending, and no doubt was divinely guided in the steps which he took previously to ascending with them.

Nadab, and Abihu.—Aaron’s two elder sons. (See chap. vi. 23.)

Seventy of the elders.—These are not the “judges” of chap. xviii. 21–26, who were not yet appointed (see Note on chap. xvi. 24, 25), but rather the heads of tribes and families who had exercised authority over the Israelites in Egypt, and through whom Moses had always communicated with the people. (See chap.s. iii. 6, iv. 20, xii. 21, xvi. 5, 6.)

(5) Moses . . . told the people all the words of the Lord.—Moses gave them an outline of the legislation which he subsequently committed to writing (verse 4) and formed into “the Book of the Covenant” (verse 7). Its general purport and main heads were communicated, but probably not all its details. Otherwise it would scarcely have been necessary to read the contents of the book to them. The people willingly gave in their adhesion, feeling the laws to be “holy, just, and good,” and not yet knowing how difficult they would find it to render a perfect obedience.

(1) Moses wrote.—Comp. chap. xvi. 14. The familiarity of Moses with writing is throughout presumed in the Pentateuch. One “learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians” under the nineteenth Hieroglyphic sign for “king” in Egypt, which was the figure of a bee or wasp. The author of the Book of Wisdom seems, however, to have understood the expression literally (Wisd. xii. 8, 9).

The beast of the field.—Comp. 2 Kings xvii. 25, 26, where we find that this result followed the deportation of the Samaritans by the Assyrians.

Thy bounds.—Those whose highest notion of prophecy identifies it with advanced human foresight naturally object to Moses having foretold the vast extent of empire which did not take place till the days of David and Solomon. It is impossible, however, to understand this passage in any other way than as an assignment to Israel of the entire tract between the Desert, or “Wilderness of the Wanderings,” and the Euphrates on the one hand, the Mediterranean and the Red Sea on the other. “The River” (ḥam-nahar) has no other meaning in the Pentateuch than “the Euphrates.” And this was exactly the extent to which the dominions of Israel reached under Solomon, as we see from the description in Kings and Chronicles (1 Kings iv. 21, 24; 2 Chron. ix. 26). It had, according to Moses (Gen. xv. 18), been already indicated with tolerable precision in the original promise made to Abraham.

Thou shalt make no covenant with them—i.e., no treaty of peace; no arrangement by which one part of the land shall be thine and another theirs. (Comp. chap. xxxiv. 12.)

Nor with their gods.—It was customary at the time for treaties between nations to contain an acknowledgment by each of the other’s gods. (See the treaty between Baalbec II. and the Hittites in the Records of the Past, vol. iv., pp. 27–32.) Thus a treaty with a nation was a sort of treaty with its gods.

They shall not dwell in thy land.—Individuals might remain if they became proselytes, as Urijah the Hittite, Aranah the Jebusite, &c.; and the Gibeonites remained en masse, but in a servile condition. What was forbidden was the co-existence of friendly but independent heathen communities with Israel within the limits of Canaan. This would have been a perpetual “snare” to the Israelites, and would have continually led them into idolatry; as we find that it did during the period of the early Judges. (See Judges i. 27–36; n. 11–13; iii. 5–7.)
twenty tribes of Israel. (5) And he sent young men of the children of Israel, which offered burnt offerings, and sacrificed peace offerings of oxen unto the Lord. (6) And Moses took half of the blood, and put it in basons; and half of the blood he sprinkled on the altar. (7) And he took the book of the covenant, and read in the audience of the people: and they said, All that the Lord hath said will we do, and be obedient.

Israel's 1; Thus the them The here which be He Lucian. covenant— Pomp. 74, I signalise extraordinary be the He (Lev. 20, 17). the altar, it acceptance obedience. In Half the people. Peace mercies the presence was made over to the covenant, they were employed in making the altar a place of expiatory victims—by sprinkling the altar with their blood, which was regarded as being a token of their repentance and willingness to be guided by the laws they had been given (Lev. vii. 18, 20). The sprinkling of the blood and the lighting of the fire were the special sacrificial acts reserved to the priest (Lev. i, 5, 7, 11, 13). At this time, before the Levitical priesthood had been instituted, the sprinkling of the blood would seem to have been the sole act reserved. Young men were employed to slay the animals as best qualified by their strength to deal with them.

Burnt offerings peace offerings. Burnt offerings were at once expiatory and signs of self-dedication. Peace offerings were indications of man's gratitude for mercies received. Both were now offered together, to mark (1) Israel's thankfulness for being taken into covenant, and (2) Israel's determination to consecrate itself wholly to the service of God. (6) Put it in basons. Reserving it for the purpose stated in verse 8.

Half of the blood he sprinkled on the altar. This was the most essential part of every sacrifice—the act by which the victim, the representative of the offerer, was made over and delivered up to God. Usually all the blood was thus devoted; here there was need of some for another purpose.

The book of the covenant i.e., the book which he had written overnight, the collection of laws and promises which we have in chaps. xx. 22—xxii. 33.

In the audience of the people. Heb, in the ears of the people.

And they said. Having heard the ipsissima verba spoken by God to Moses, they repeated their previous acceptance (see verse 3), adding a general promise of obedience.

And Moses took the blood, and sprinkled it . . . Half of the blood had been sprinkled upon the altar, which symbolised Jehovah; the other half was now sprinkled upon the people, or rather upon their representatives—the elders and others who stood nearest to Moses. Thus the two parties to the covenant, sprinkled with the blood of the same sacrifices, were brought into sacramental union. Rites somewhat similar, involving blood communion, were common throughout the East in connection with covenants (Hom. ii. iii. 298, xix. 252; Herod. i. 74, iii. 8, lv. 70; Xen. Anab. ii. 2, § 9; Lucian. Tozer. 37; Pomp. Mel. ii. 1; Tac. Ann. xii. 47, &c.), and were regarded as adding to their force and sacredness.

On the people. It has been suggested (Abar-barnel) that the blood was really sprinkled on the twelve pillars which represented the people; but the words used scarcely seem to admit of such an interpretation. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews understood the passage as declaring that the people were sprinkled (Heb. ix. 19). (7) Then we went up. According to the ordinary ideas of the time, the ratification of the covenant was now complete, and nothing more was needed. It pleased God, however, to terminate the whole transaction by a closing scene of extraordinary grandeur, beauty, and spiritual significance. A sacrifice implied a sacrificial meal (chap. xviii. 12). Moses understood that God, by summoning Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy of the elders into the mount (verse 1), had intended the sacrificial meal to be held there; and accordingly, as soon as he had sprinkled the people, ascended Sinai with the persons summoned, and had the feast prepared. A sacrificial meal was always regarded as a religious act—an act done "before God" (chap. xviii. 13), involving communion with Him. God willed now to signalise this sacrificial feast above all others by making His presence not only felt but seen. As Moses, Aaron with his two sons and the elders were admitted to the sight of God in the feast (verse 11), a vision of marvellous splendour broke upon them. "They saw the God of Israel" (verse 10). God showed Himself to them—not, as before, amid thunders and lightnings, and a thick cloud, and fire, and smoke, and earthquake (chap. xix. 16, 18), but in His loveliness (Cant. v. 16) and His beauty, standing on a cloud, a cloud of glory, light as the blue of heaven. They "saw God," and were neither hurt nor even terrified; they could, while seeing Him, still eat and drink—they felt themselves like guests at His board, as if He were banqueting with them. So was impressed upon them the mild and sweet relation into which they were brought towards God by covenant—a covenant made, and not yet infringed. The gentle, lovely, attractive side of God's character was shown to them, instead of the awful and alarming one; and they were taught to look forward to a final state of bliss, in which God's covenanted servants would dwell in His presence continually.

They saw the God of Israel. Probably, in human form, as Isaiah saw Him (Isa. vi. 1—5), and Ezekiel (Ezek. i. 26), and even Nehuchadnezzar (Dan. iii. 25). It is not of this appearance that Moses Moses Ordered to Ascend into EXODUS, XXIV.

Sinai a Second Time.

in his clearness. (11) And upon the nobles of the children of Israel he laid not his hand; also they saw God, and did eat and drink.

(12) And the Lord said unto Moses, Come up to me into the mount, and be there; and I will give thee tables of stone, and a law, and commandments which I have written; that thou mayest say: "Ye saw no similitude." (Deut. iv. 20). The appearance which they saw had "foot."

A paved work of a sapphire stone. — Heb., a work of the clearness of sapphire. The "sapphire" (naphat) of the Pentateuch is probably lapid lazuli.

The body of honon — i.e., "the very heaven," or "the heaven itself."

(11) The nobles. — The word used is an unusual one, but seems to designate the "elders" of verses 1 and 9. It implies nobility of birth.

No laid not his hand — i.e., He in owise hurt or injured them. The belief was general that a man could not see God and live (Gen. xxxii. 30; Exod. xxxii. 20; Judg. vi. 22, 23, &c.). In one sense it was true — "No man hath seen the Father." But the Son could reveal Himself under the Old Dispensation, as under the New, and not even cause terror by His presence. (See the last clause of the verse.)

Also they saw God. — Rather, they both saw God, and also did eat and drink. It is intended to express in the clearest way that the two facts were concurrent. As they feasted on the sacrificial meal, the vision of God was made manifest to them. It is impossible to doubt that we have here a precious forecast of the Christian's highest privilege — the realisation of the presence of God in the sacred feast of the Holy Communion.

The Second Ascent of Moses into Mount Sinai.

(12-18) The great work still remained to be done. A series of laws had been laid down for the nation and accepted with unanimity (verses 3, 7). But "quid proximzt leges sine moribus!" It was necessary for the sustentation of the religious life of the people that a sacred polity should be instituted, a form of worship set up, and regulations established with regard to all the externals of religion — holy persons, holy places, rites, ceremonies, vestments, incense, consecration. Moses was directed to ascend into the mount, and hold prolonged communion with God, in order that he might learn the mind of God with respect to all these things. His prolonged stay for "forty days and forty nights" (verse 18) was necessary to give him a full and complete knowledge of all the details so elaborately set forth in chaps. xxv. — xxx., and again in chaps. xxxv. — xl, which thenceforth constituted the essentials of the external worship of Israel, whereby the minds and habits of the people were moulded and impressed in a far more efficacious way than could ever have been done by a mere set of abstract propositions, appealing only to the intellect. "Saneus irritat animum demissa per aurem, Quam quae sunt oculis subjicta fidelibus." The Decalogue and the Book of the Covenant had no doubt a considerable share in forming the character of the Hebrew nation; but a larger share must be assigned to the ritual and ceremonial which Moses was now instructed to set up, and which forms the main subject of the remainder of the Book.

(12) Come up to me into the mount, and be there. — After the sacrificial meal, the seventy-four persons engaged in it had descended into the plain of Er-Ralah, and possibly spent some time there, before a second summons came to Moses. This time he was directed to ascend accompanied only by his minister, Joshua (verse 13), and was warned that his stay was to be a prolonged one in the words, "And be there."

And I will give thee tables of stone. — It is remarkable that these are not expressly said, either here or in chap. xxxi. 18, to have contained the ten commandments. The fact, however, is distinctly stated in Deut. v. 22; and with respect to the second tables, the same is affirmed in chap. xxxiv. 25. The fiction of a double decalogue is thus precluded.

Moses rose up, and his minister Joshua. — The close connection of Joshua with Moses is here, for the first time, indicated. His employment as a general against Amaleck (chap. xvii. 9—13) might have simply marked his military capacity; but from this point in the history it becomes apparent that he was Moses' most trusted friend and assistant in all matters where there was need of confidential relations between the leader and his subordinates, and thus that he was to be his successor (see chaps. xxxii. 17, xxxiii. 11; Num. xiii. 8, 16, xxvi. 18—23; Deut. xxxiv. 9), since no other person stood in any such close association.

Moses went up into the mount of God. — Ascended, i.e., to the highest point of the mountain, whereof mention has been previously made; not, probably, to the Jebel Musa, but to the highest summit of the Ras Safsafeh, upon which the cloud rested.

He said unto the elders. — Moses understood that his stay in the mount was about to be a prolonged one (see verse 12). He therefore prudently determined to make arrangements for the government and direction of the people during his absence. Aaron his brother, and Hur, the father of Bezaleel, perhaps his brother-in-law, seemed to him the fittest persons to exercise authority over the people during his absence; and accordingly he named them as the persons to whom application was to be made under any circumstances of difficulty.

Here. — In the plain below the mountain. The injunction was that the camp should not be moved until Moses came down; however long he might be detained by the Divine colloquy.

A cloud covered the mount. — Heb., the cloud — i.e., the cloud which had accompanied them from Suezoth (chap. xiii. 21—23).
CHAPTER XXV.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring me an offering: (3) of every man that giveth it willingly with his heart ye shall take my offering. (4) And this is the offering which ye shall take of them; gold, and silver, and brass, (5) and blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats’ hair, (6) and rams’ skins dyed red, and badgers’ skins, and shittim wood, in another way (claps. xxx. 12—16, xxxviii. 25—28) The brass, or rather bronze, for brass seems to have been unknown at this time, was small in amount (chap. xxxviii. 29), and of no great value. It would have constituted no serious drain on the resources of the people.

(4) And blue, and purple, and scarlet.—The colours intended are probably a dark blue produced from indigo, which was the only blue known to the Egyptians, a purplish crimson derived from the murex ilicis, or cochinile insect of the holm oak, which was largely employed in antiquity, though now superseded by the brighter tint obtained from the coccus cacti of Mexico. Linen yarn of the three colours mentioned seems to have been what the people were asked to furnish (chaps. xxxv. 25, xxxix. 1).

Fine linen.—I.e., white thread spun from flax, which is found to be the material of almost all the Egyptian dresses, mummy cloths, and other undyed fabrics. It is of a yellowish white, soft, and wonderfully fine and delicate. (See Wilkinson in Rawlinson’s Herodotus, vol. ii., p. 233).

Goats’ hair.—The covering of an Arab tent is to this day almost always of goats’ hair. An excellent fabric is woven from the soft inner hair of the Syrian goat, and a coarse one from the outer coat of the animal. Yarn of goats’-hair was to be offered, that from it might be produced the first of the three outer coverings of the Tabernacle (chap. xxv. 7—14).

(9) Rams’ skins dyed red.—North Africa has always been celebrated for the production of the best possible leather. Herodotus describes the manufacture of his own times (Hist. iv. 199). Even at the present day, we find our best books in Morocco. Brilliant colours always were, and still are, affected by the North African races, and their “red skins” have been famous in all ages. It is probable that the Israelites had brought with them many skins of this kind out of Egypt.

Badgers’ skins.—The badger is not a native of North Africa, nor of the Arabian desert; and the translators of the Hebrew text use the word “badger” as a very improbable conjecture. In Arabic, tabkhash or dukkhash is the name of a marine animal resembling the seal; or, perhaps it should rather be said, is applied with some vagueness to a number of sea-animals, as seals, dugongs, dolphins, sharks, and dog-fish. The skins here spoken of are probably those of some one or more of these animals. They formed the outer covering of the Tabernacle (chap. xxvi. 14).

Shittim wood.—The shittah (plural, shittim) was a species of Acacia, now generally admitted.
It was certainly not the palm; and there are no trees in the Sinaitic region from which boards could be cut (see chap. xxvi. 1) except the palm and the acenta. The Sinaitic acenta (A. segment) is a "guarded and thorny tree, somewhat like a solitary lathorn in its habit and manner of growth, but much larger" (Tristram). At present it does not, in the Sinaitic region, grow to such a size as would admit of planks, ten cubits long by one and a half wide, being cut from it (chap. xxvii. 8). According to Cook (Chap. Hist. of the Bible, p. 392), it attains such a size in Palestine, and therefore may formerly have done so in Arabia. The wood is "hard and close-grained, of an orange colour with a darker heart, well adapted for cabinet work."

Oil for the light.—It is assumed that the "sanctuary," which is to be built (verse 8), will need to be lighted. Oil therefore is to be provided for the lighting. Later on (chap. xxviii. 20) it is laid down that the oil must be "pure olive oil beaten."

Spices for anointing oil.—Rather, for the anointing oil. Here, again, there is an assumption that anointing oil will be needed, and that spices will be a necessary ingredient in such oil. We find afterwards that the Tabernacle itself, all its vessels, and the priests appointed to serve in it, had to be consecrated by anointing (chaps. xxix. 7, 36, xxx. 26—30). The particular spices to be mixed with the "anointing oil" are enumerated in chap. xxx. 23, 24.

And for sweet incense.—Rather, for the sweet incense—the incense, i.e., which would have to be burnt. (See chap. xxx. 1—5; and for the composition of the incense, chap. xxx. 34.)

Onyx stones.—The Hebrew shopham is rendered here by "sard" (LXX.), "sardonyx" (Vulg. and Josephus), and "beryl" (Rosemüller and others). In Job xxviii. 16, the same word is rendered by the LXX. "onyx." There is thus considerable doubt what stone is meant. Only three such stones seem to have been requested as offerings, one for the high priest's breast-plate (chap. xxviii. 20), and two for the shoulderpieces of the ephod (chap. xxviii. 9—12).

Stones to be set in the ephod and in the breastplate.—Heb., stones of insertion for the ephod and for the breast-plate. The stones of the ephod were two only, both probably either onyx or sardonyx; those of the breast-plate were twelve in number, all different (chap. xxviii. 17—20).

The Ark and its Contents.

Let them make me a sanctuary.—The enumeration of the gifts (verses 3—7) has been subordinated to this. Hitherto Israel had had no place of worship, no structure dedicated to God. God now brings this state of things to an end, by requiring them to "make him a sanctuary." In Egypt they had seen structures of vast size and extraordinary magnificence erected in every city for the worship of the Egyptian gods. They are now to have their own pattern of all the instruments thereof, even so shall ye make it.

And they shall make an ark of shittim wood: two cubits and a half shall be the length thereof, and a cubit and a half the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof. And thou shalt overlay it with pure structure, their "holiest place," their "house of God." As, however, they are still in a nomadic condition, without fixed abode, continually shifting their quarters, a building, in the ordinary sense of the word, would have been unsuitable. They must soon have quitted it or have foregone their hopes of Palestine. God therefore devised for them a structure in harmony with their condition—a tent-temple—"modelled on the ordinary form of the better Oriental tents, but of the best materials and of an unusual size, yet portable. It is this structure, with its contents and its adjuncts, which forms the main subject of the rest of the book of Exodus, and which is now minutely and elaborately described in six consecutive chapters (chaps. xxv.—xxx.).

The Ark may dwell among them.—Compare chaps. xxxix. 42—46; xl. 34—38. Though God "dwelleth not in temples made with hands" (Acts vii. 48), is not confined to them, cannot be comprehended within them, yet still he pleases Him to manifest Himself especially in such abodes. He may be well said to "dwell there" in a peculiar manner. His dwelling with Israel was not purely spiritual. From time to time He manifested Himself sensibly in the Holy of Holies, where He dwelt continually, and might be consulted by the temporal ruler of the nation.

The Ark.—It has been maintained that God showed to Moses (1) a material structure, furnished with material objects, as the model which he was to follow in making the Tabernacle and its appurtenances; (2) a pictorial representation of the whole; (3) a series of visions in which the forms were represented to the eye of the mind. The entire analogy of the Divine dealings is in favour of the last-mentioned view.

The Ark.

They shall make an ark. — Arôn, the word here rendered "ark," is an entirely different word from that previously so translated in Gen. vi. 14; Exod. ii. 3, which is lôhéh. Arôn is properly a chest or coffer of small dimensions, used to contain money or other valuables (2 Kings xii. 9, 10; 2 Chron. xxv. 8—11, &c.). In one place it is applied to a mummy-case (Gen. i. 26). Here it designates a wooden chest three feet nine inches long, two feet three inches broad, and two feet three inches deep. The primary object of the ark was to contain the two tables of stone, written with the finger of God, which Moses was to receive before he came down from the mount. (See chap. xxiv. 12, and comp. chap. xx. 18.) Sacred coffers were important parts of the furniture of temples in Egypt. They usually contained the image or emblem of some deity, and were constructed so as to be readily carried in processions.

Thou shalt overlay it with pure gold.—It is possible, but scarcely probable, that gilding is intended. Gilding was well known in Egypt long before the time of Moses, and may have been within the artistic powers of some of the Hebrews. But it is a gold, within and without shalt thou overlay it, and shalt make upon it a crown of gold round about. (12) And thou shalt cast four rings of gold for it, and put them in the four corners thereof; and two rings shall be in the one side of it, and two rings in the other side of it. (13) And thou shalt make staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold. (14) And thou shalt put the staves into the rings by the sides of the ark, that the ark may be borne with them. (15) The staves shall be in the rings of the ark:

process requiring much apparatus, and less likely to have been practised in the desert than the far simpler one of overlaying with gold plates. Gold plates would also have been regarded as more suitable, because more valuable. It is the Jewish tradition that gold plates were employed.

A crown of gold—i.e., a rim or border of gold, carried round the edge of the chest at the top. The object was probably to keep the kapporeth, or mercy-seat, in place.

(12) Four rings of gold.—Though the ark was not to be carried in procession, like Egyptian arks, yet it would have to be carried when the Israelites resumed their journeyings. The four rings were made to receive the two "staves" or poles by which the ark was to be borne at such times on the shoulders of the priests (verses 13, 14).

In the four corners thereof.—Literally, at the four feet thereof. The rings were to be affixed, not at the four upper corners of the chest, but at the four bottom corners, in order that the ark, when carried on men's shoulders, might be elevated above them, and so be in no danger of coming in contact with the bearers' persons. The arrangement might seem to endanger the equilibrium of the ark when carried; but as Kalisch observes, "the smallness of the dimensions of the ark rendered its safe transportation, even with the rings at its feet, not impossible."

(15) The staves . . . shall not be taken from it.—The staves were to remain always in the rings, whether the ark was in motion or at rest, that there might never at any time be a necessity for touching the ark itself, or even the rings. He who touched the ark imperilled his life. (See 2 Sam. vi. 6, 7.)

(19) Two cherubims.—"Cherubims," or rather cherubim, had been known previously in one connection only—they had been the guardians of Eden when Adam and Eve were driven forth from it (Gen. iii. 24). It is generally allowed that in that passage, as in most others where the word occurs, living beings, angels of God, are intended. But not all angels are cherubim. The cherubim constitute a select class, very near to God, very powerful, very resolute, highly fitted to act as guards. It is probably with this special reference that the cherubine figures were selected to be placed upon the mercy-seat—they guarded the precious deposit of the two tables, towards which they looked (verse 20). The question as to the exact form of the figures is not very important; but it is one which has been discussed with great ingenuity and at great length. Some hold that the proper figure of a cherub is that of a bull or ox, and think that the cherubim of the tabernacle were winged bulls, not unlike the Assyrian. Others regard them as figures still more composite, like the Egyptian sphinxes or the chimneys of the Greeks. But the predominant opinion seems to be that they were simply human figures with the addition of a pair of wings. (So Kalisch, Keil, Bishop Harold Browne, Canon Cook, and others.) In this case they would bear a considerable resemblance to the figures of Ma, or Truth, so often seen inside Egyptian arks, sheltering with their wings the scarabaeus or some other emblem of deity.

Of beaten work—i.e., not cast, but brought into shape by the hammer. In the Egyptian language kareb was "to hammer," whence, according to some, the word "cherub."

In the two ends.—Literally, from the two ends—rising, that is, from either end of the mercy-seat. (19) Of the mercy seat shall ye make the cherubims.—The meaning seems to be that the cherubim were not to be detached images, made separately, and then fastened to the mercy-seat, but to be formed out of the same mass of gold with the mercy-seat, and so to be part and parcel of it.
the cherubims on the two ends thereof. (20) And the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high, covering the mercy seat with their wings, and their faces shall look one to another; toward the mercy seat shall the faces of the cherubims be. (21) And thou shalt put the mercy seat above upon the ark; and in the ark thou shalt put the testimony that I shall give thee. (22) And there I will meet with thee, and I will commune with thee from above the mercy seat, from a between the two cherubims which are upon the ark of the testimony, of all things which I will give thee in commandment unto the children of Israel. (23) Thou shalt also make a table of shittim wood: two cubits shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof. (24) And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, and make thereto a crown of gold round about. (25) And thou shalt make unto it a border of an hand breadth round about, and thou shalt make a golden crown to the border thereof round about. (26) And thou shalt make for it four rings of gold, and put the rings in the four corners that are on the four feet thereof. (27) Over against the border shall the rings be for places of the staves to bear the table. (28) And thou shalt make the staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold, that the table may be borne with them. (29) And thou shalt make the dishes thereof, and spoons thereof, and covers thereof, and bowls thereof, to cover the vessels, and have them. (30) And the cherubims shall stretch forth their wings on high.—The two wings of both cherubs were to be elevated and advanced so as to overshadow the mercy seat, and, as it were, protect it. In the Egyptian figures of Ma, one wing only has this position, the other being depressed and falling behind the figure.

Towards the mercy seat.—Bent downwards, i.e., as though gazing on the mercy seat. (Compare chap. xxxvii. 9.)

(22) There will I meet with thee.—The place of the Shechinah, or visible manifestation of God's presence, was to be between the two cherubim over the mercy seat. There God would meet His people, "to speak there unto them" (chap. xxix. 42), either literally, as when He answered inquiries of the high priest by Urim and Thummim, or spiritually, as when He accepted incense, and the blood of offerings, and prayers, offered to Him by the people through their appointed representatives, the priests. It was for the purpose of thus "meeting" His people that the entire tabernacle was designed, and hence its ordinary name was "the Tent of Meeting," unhappily rendered in the Authorised Version by the "tabernacle of the congregation." (See Note on chap. xxvii. 21.)

The Table of Shewbread.

(22-30) Thou shalt also make a table.—The ark and mercy seat, which covered it, constituted the entire furniture of the inner sanctuary, or " Holy of Holies " (chap. xl. 20, 21). When this had been shown to Moses the next thing to be done was to set before him the furniture of the outer sanctuary, or holy place. This consisted of three articles—(1) The table of shewbread, described in the present passage; (2) the golden candlestick, described in verses 21—20; and (3) the altar of incense, described in chap. xxx. 1—10. The " table of shewbread " was a receptacle for the twelve loaves, which were to be " set continually before the Lord " (Lev. xxiv. 8) as a thank-offering on the part of His people—a perpetual acknowledgment of His perpetual protection and favour. It was to be just large enough to contain the twelve loaves, set in two rows, being a yard long, and a foot and a-half broad. The vessels belonging to the table (verse 29) were not placed on it.

(23) Of shittim wood.—See the last Note on verse 5. No other wood was to be employed, either for the sanctuary itself, or for its furniture.

(24) Thou shalt overlay it .—Like the ark (verse 21), and the altar of incense (chap. xxx. 3), the table was to be overlaid with plates of gold. It was a species of altar, on which lay offerings to God, and, being close to the Divine Presence, required to be made of the best materials.

A crown of gold round about.—Rather, a border, or edging of gold, something to prevent what was placed on the table from readily falling off.

(25) A border of a hand-breadth.—Rather, a band, or framing. The representation of the table of shewbread on the Arch of Titus at Rome gives the best idea of this "band" or framing. It was a flat bar about midway between the top of the table and its feet, connecting the four legs together, and so keeping them in place. Its "golden crown," or "edging," can have been only for ornament.

(26) Four rings.—Compare verse 12. The table, like the ark, would have to be carried from place to place. Though it was less sacred than the ark, still provision was made for carrying it by means of staves and rings.

The four corners that are on the four feet.—Rather, that are at the four feet. Not the top corners of the table, i.e., but the bottom corners. The table, like the ark, was, when carried, to be elevated above the shoulders of the bearers. So we see it borne on the Arch of Titus.

(27) Over against the border shall the rings bo.—Rather, opposite the band, or framing. The meaning is not very clear. If the framing had been at the bottom of the legs, we might have understood that the rings were attached to the table places where the "framing" was inserted into the legs. But the "framing" appears to have been halfway up the legs (see Note on verse 25), while the rings were at the bottom. They could therefore have only been "opposite the framing" in a loose and vague sense.

For places of the staves.—Rather, for places for staves.

(28) The dishes thereof . . .—The "dishes" of the shewbread table were probably large bowls in which unto almonds, with their knobs and their flowers. (33) And there shall be a knob under two branches of the same, and a knob under two branches of the same, and a knob under two branches of the same, according to the six branches that proceed out of the candlestick. (39) Their knobs and their branches shall be of the same: all it shall be one beaten work of pure gold. (37) And thou shalt make the seven lamps thereof: and they shall 1 light the lamps thereof, that they may give light over against 2 it. (39) And the tongs thereof, and the snuffdishes thereof, shall be of pure gold. (39) Of a talent of pure gold shall he make it, with all these vessels. (40) And he look that thou make them after their pattern, 3 which was shewed thee in the mount.

unto almonds, with their knobs and their flowers. (33) And there shall be a knob under two branches of the same, and a knob under two branches of the same, and a knob under two branches of the same, according to the six branches that proceed out of the candlestick. (39) Their knobs and their branches shall be of the same: all it shall be one beaten work of pure gold. (37) And thou shalt make the seven lamps thereof: and they shall 1 light the lamps thereof, that they may give light over against 2 it. (39) And the tongs thereof, and the snuffdishes thereof, shall be of pure gold. (39) Of a talent of pure gold shall he make it, with all these vessels. (40) And he look that thou make them after their pattern, 3 which was shewed thee in the mount.
CHAPTER XXVI.—(1) Moreover thou shalt make the tabernacle with ten curtains of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet: with cherubim 1 of cunning work shalt thou make them. (2) The length of one curtain shall be eight and twenty cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: and every one of the curtains shall have one measure. (3) The five curtains shall be coupled together one to another: and other five curtains shall be coupled one to another. (4) And thou shalt make loops of blue upon the edge of the one curtain from the selvedge in the coupling; and likewise shalt thou make in the uttermost edge of another curtain, in the coupling of the second. (5) Fifty loops shalt thou make in the one curtain, and fifty loops shalt thou make in the edge of the curtain that is in the coupling of the second; that the loops may take hold one of another. (6) And thou shalt make fifty tachers of gold, and couple the curtains together with the tachers: and it shall be one tabernacle.

XXVI. THE TABERNACLE.
(1—37) The sacred tent which was to form the “House of God,” or temple, for Israel during the continuance of the people in the wilderness, and which in point of fact served them for a national sanctuary until the construction of the first temple by Solomon, is described in this chapter with a minuteness which leaves little to be desired. It is called ham-mishkin, “the dwelling,” and ha-’ohel, “the tent” (verse 36)—the former from its purpose, as being the place where God “dwelt” in a peculiar manner (chap. xxv. 22); the latter from its shape and general construction, which resembled those of other tents of the period. The necessary foundation was a framework of wood. This consisted of five “pillars,” or tent-poles, in front (verse 37), graduated in height to suit the slope of the roof, and doubtless five similar ones at the back, though these are not mentioned. A ridge-pole must have connected the two central tent-poles, and over this ridge-pole the covering of the tent, which was of goats’ hair (verse 7), was no slant strained in the ordinary way by means of cords and “pins,” or tent-pegS (chap. xxv. 18). Thus an oblong square space was roofed over, which seems to have been sixty feet long by thirty broad. Within this “tent” (’ohel) was placed the “dwelling” (mishkin). The “dwelling” was a space forty-five feet long by fifteen broad, enclosed on three sides by walls of boards (verses 15—25), and opening in front into a sort of porch formed by the projection of the “tent” beyond the “dwelling.” Towards the open air this porch was closed, wholly or partially, by a curtain (verse 36). The “dwelling” was roofed over by another “curtain,” or “hanging,” of bright colours and rich materials (verses 1—6). It was divided into two portions, called respectively “the Holy Place,” and “the Holy of Holies”—the former towards the porch, the latter away from it. These two places were separated by a “wall” hung upon four pillars (verses 31, 32). Their relative size is uncertain; but it may be suspected that the Holy of Holies was the smaller of the two, and conjectured that the proportion was as one to two. The Holy of Holies being a square of fifteen feet, and the Holy Place an oblong, thirty feet long by fifteen. The whole structure was placed within an area called “the Court of the Tabernacle,” which is described in the next chapter.

1. THE FINE LINEN COVERING.
(1) The tabernacle.—Literally, the dwelling (see chap. xxv. 9, where mishkin first occurs). It is a derivative from shèkan, translated by “dwell” in the preceding verse.

Ton curtains.—The same word (yéřāh) is used for the constituent parts of the covering, and for the entire covering, or, at any rate, for each of the two halves into which it was divided (verses 4, 5). In the first use, it corresponds to what we should call “a breadth.”

Fine twined linen—i.e., linen thread formed by twisting several distinct strands together. Egyptian thread was ordinarily of this character.

Blue, and purple, and scarlet.—See the Notes on chap. xxv. 4.

Cherubim of cunning work.—Rather, cherubim, the work of a cunning weaver. Ma’aseh kholshim and ma’aseh robim (verse 36) seem to be contrasted one with the other, the former signifying work where the patterning was inwoven, the latter where it was embroidered with the needle. The inwaving of patterns or figures was well understood in Egypt (Herod. iii. 47; Plin. H. N., viii. 48).

(2) The length . . . eight and twenty cubits.—Mr. Fergusson has shown that to cover over a space twenty cubits wide with a roof, the two sides of which should meet at a right angle, a tent-cloth almost exactly twenty-eight cubits long would be required.

(3) The five curtains.—It is anomalous that the article should be used here. Probably it has crept in from “the curtains” of the preceding verse. The meaning is that five “breadths” should be sewn together to form one curtain, and five other “breadths” to form another, and then that the two curtains so formed should be joined into one by means of “loops” and “tachers.” The object of making two curtains instead of one was clearly portability. The entire covering would have been too heavy and too bulky to be conveniently carried in one piece.

(4) From the selvedge in the coupling.—Rather, at the coupling. The selvedge, i.e., nearest to the place where the two curtains were to be coupled together.

(5) That the loops may take hold one of another.—Rather, correspond one to another. They were not to “take hold,” but to be attached by golden links.

(6) Tachos, or clasps. These might be split-rings, or links like modern sleeve-links.

And it shall be one tabernacle.—Rather, and (so) the tabernacle shall be one. The division of the curtain which formed the roof into two portions tended to make a division in the tabernacle itself. To prevent this, the two curtains were to be so looped together as EXODUS, XXVI.

(1) And thou shalt make curtains of goats' hair to be covering upon the tabernacle. (2) The length of one curtain shall be thirty cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits, and the eleventh curtain shall be of one measure. (3) And thou shalt couple five curtains by themselves, and shall double the sixth curtain in the forefront of the tabernacle. (4) And a cubit on the other side of that, a curtain. (5) And a cubit on the other side of that, a curtain. (6) And then shall make curtains of goats' hair to be covering upon the tabernacle. (7) And thou shalt make curtains of goats' hair to be covering upon the tabernacle.
EXODUS, XXVI. The Vail and its Pillars.

one board for his two tenons, and two sockets under another board for his two tenons. (29) And for the second side of the tabernacle on the north side there shall be twenty boards: (31) and their forty sockets of silver; two sockets under one board, and two sockets under another board. (32) And for the sides of the tabernacle westward thou shalt make six boards. (33) And two boards shalt thou make for the corners of the tabernacle in the two sides. (34) And they shall be coupled together beneath, and they shall be coupled together above the head of it unto one ring: thus shall it be for them both; they shall be for the two corners. (35) And they shall be eight boards, and their sockets of silver, sixteen sockets; two sockets under one board, and two sockets under another board. (36) And thou shalt make bars of shittim wood; five for the boards of the one side of the tabernacle, (37) and five bars for the boards of the other side of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the side of the tabernacle, for the two sides westward. (38) And the middle bar in the midst of the boards shall reach from end to end. (39) And thou shalt overlay the boards with gold, and make their rings of gold for places for the bars; and thou shalt overlay the bars with gold. (40) And thou shalt rear up the tabernacle according to the fashion thereof which was shewed thee in the mount. (41) And thou shalt make a vail of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen of cunning work: with cherubims shall it be made; (42) and thou shalt hang it upon four pillars of shittim wood overlaid with gold: their hooks shall be of gold, upon the four sockets of silver. (43) And thou shalt hang up the vail under the taches, that thou mayest bring in thither within the vail the ark of the testimony: and the vail shall divide minute—even tediously minute—the description, there would necessarily have been a multitude of particulars, not to be described in words, where Moses would have to be guided by the pattern that he had seen.

5. The Vail, and the Position which it was to Occupy. (44) Thou shalt make a vail. It was of the essence of the mishkan that it should have an outer and an inner sanctuary, a place for the daily ministrations of the priests, and an adytum or penetrable of extreme holiness, in which was to be the Divine Presence, and into which the high priest alone was to be privileged to enter, and he but once in the year. (See chap. xxx. 10; Lev. xvi. 2—34; Heb. ix. 7.) The separation between these two chambers was to be made by a vail of the same materials and workmanship as the inner covering of the mishkan (verse 1). (45) Four pillars. These seem to have been true pillars or columns, and not tent-poles. They were probably of equal height, and equally spaced, and were perhaps connected at the top by a cornice or beam. Together with the vail they formed a screen, which shut off the “Holy of Holies” from the outer chamber. They were, doubtless, of the same height as the boards, i.e., fifteen feet (verse 16).

Their hooks. Each pillar was to have a hook near the top, where the vail was to be attached. Upon the four sockets. Heb., upon four sockets. Each pillar was to have its “socket”, into which it was to be inserted, and which was itself probably to be sunk into the ground.

(46) Thou shalt hang up the vail under the taches. The “taches” meant are the links whereby the two portions of the inner covering were connected together (verse 6). If “under the taches” means directly under them, we must regard the mishkan as divided into two chambers of equal size. It is possible, however, that “under” may be used with some vague-unto you between the holy place and the most holy. (34) And thou shalt put the mercy seat upon the ark of the testimony in the most holy place. (35) And thou shalt set the table without the vail, and the candlestick over against the table on the side of the tabernacle toward the south: and thou shalt put the table on the north side.

(36) And thou shalt make an hanging for the door of the tent, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, wrought with needlework. (37) And thou shalt make for the hanging five pillars of ness, and that the "Holy of Holies" may in the tabernacle, as well as in the Temple, have been only half the size of the outer chamber.

That thou mayest bring in.—Heb, and thou shalt bring in.

6. The Position of the Furniture.

(34, 35) The sole furniture of the most holy place, or "Holy of Holies," was to be the ark, with its covering of the mercy-seat. In the "Holy Place," without the vail, were to be the "table of showbread" against the north wall, and the "golden candlestick" opposite to it, against the south wall. Intermediate between them, but advanced nearer the vail, was to be the "golden altar of incense" (chaps. xxx. 6, xl. 26), which, however, is not here mentioned.

7. The Hanging for the Door.

(36, 37) It is essential in the East to shut out light and heat, whence tents have always doors. These are usually made of a piece of cloth, which is raised for a man to enter, and falls behind him. But for a tent of the size described, which seems to have been above twenty-two feet high in the centre, something more was required. The "hanging" spoken of appears to have been a beautifully embroidered curtain, which could be either drawn up or let down, and which was attached by golden "hooks" to five pillars plated with gold, thus dividing the entrance into four equal spaces.

(37) Five pillars.—The odd number is surprising, especially compared with the "four pillars" of the interior (verse 22), until we remember that a tent such as that described must have a pillar, or tent-pole, in the middle of its gable-end, and an equal number of supports on either side. It is, in fact, this fifth pillar which, together with the use of the word "ohel," gives to the tent theory of Mr. Ferguson, now generally adopted, its solid basis.

Their hooks.—The hooks from which the hanging was to be suspended. (Comp. verse 22.)

Sockets of brass.—Rather, "of bronze." (See Note on chap. xxx. 3.)

XXVII.

THE ALTAR OF BURNT OFFERING.

(1) Thou shalt make an altar.—Heb, the altar. It is assumed that a sanctuary must have an altar, worship without sacrifice being unknown. (See chaps. v. 1—3, viii. 25—28, xii. 27, xvii. 12, xx. 24—26, &c.)

Of shittim wood.—This direction seems at first sight to conflict with those given in chap. xx. 24, 25, where altars were required to be either of earth or of unhewn stone. But the explanation of the Jewish commentators is probably correct, that what was here directed to be made was rather an "altar-case" than an altar, and that the true altar was the earth with which, at each halt in the wilderness, the "case" of shittim wood covered with bronze was filled. (So Jarchi, Kalisch, and others.)

Foursquare.—Ancient altars were either rectangular or circular, the square and the circle being regarded as perfect figures. A triangular altar was discovered by Mr. Layard in Mesopotamia, but even this had a circular top. In Hebrew architecture and furniture curved lines were for the most part avoided, probably as presenting greater difficulties than straight ones.

The height thereof . . . three cubits.—A greater height would have made it difficult to arrange the victims upon the altar. Otherwise the notion of perfection in form would probably have led to the altar being a cube.

(6) The horns of it.—It is not true to say, as Kalisch does, that "the altars of almost all ancient nations were frequently provided with horns." On the contrary, horns were, so far as is known, peculiar to Israelite altars. Originally, they would seem to have been mere ornaments at the four upper corners, but ultimately they came to be regarded as essential to an altar, and the virtue of the altar was thought to lie especially in them. The victims were bound to them (Ps. cxviii. 27); criminals clung to them (1 Kings i. 50, ii. 28); and the blood of sin offerings was smeared upon them for purposes of expiation (chap. xxix. 12; Lev. viii. 15, ix. 9, &c.).

His horns shall be of the same—i.e., of one piece with the rest of the altar, not separate portions attached by nails or soldering. (Comp. chap. xxx. 19.)

Thou shalt overlay it with brass—i.e., with bronze. All the woodwork of the tabernacle was overlaid with one metal or another. Here a metallic coating was especially necessary, to prevent the wood from being burned.

(3) His pans to receive his ashes.—Scuttle, in which the ashes were placed for removal from the sanctuary, are intended. The word translated "to receive his ashes" is a rare one, and implies a mixture with the ashes of unburnt fat.

His shovels.—A right rendering. The "shovels" would be used in clearing away the ashes from off the altar.
his shovels, and his basins, and his fleshhooks, and his firepans: all the vessels thereof thou shalt make of brass. (4) And thou shalt make for it a grate of network of brass; and upon the net shalt thou make four brazen rings in the four corners thereof. (5) And thou shalt put it under the compass of the altar beneath, that the net may be even to the midst of the altar. (6) And thou shalt make staves for the altar, staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with brass. (7) And the staves shall be put into the rings, and the staves shall be upon the two sides of the altar, to bear it. (8) Hollow with boards shalt thou make it: as it was shewed thee in the mount, so shall they make it.

His basons.—Basins were needed to receive the blood of the victims (chap. xxiv. 6), which was cast from basins upon the foot of the altar.

His fleshhooks.—Implements with three prongs, used for arranging the pieces of the victim upon the altar. The priests' servants sometimes applied them to a different purpose (1 Sam. ii. 13).

His firepans.—The word here used is elsewhere translated either “smeltings,” or “cookers.” Probably vessels employed in carrying embers from the brazen altar to the altar of incense (Levit. xvi. 12) are intended.

(4) A grate of network.—Rather, a grating of network: The position of the grating is doubtful. According to one view, it reached from the middle of the altar to its base, and protected the sides of the altar from the feet of the minising priests. According to another, it surrounded the upper part of the altar, and was intended to catch any portions of the victims that accidentally fell off. There are no sufficient data to enable us to determine between these views.

Upon the net shalt thou make four brazen rings.—The brazen altar, like the ark and the table of shewbread, was to be carried by the priests when the Israelites changed their camping-ground. It therefore required “rings,” like them (chap. xxx. 12, 26). These were, in the case of the altar, to be attached to the network, which must have been of a very solid and substantial character.

(5) Under the compass of the altar beneath.—The position of the network depends upon this expression. Was “the compass of the altar” its circumference at the top, or was it a bolt or step encircling the altar half-way up? The low height of the altar—four feet six inches—would seem to make a “step” unnecessary; but the altar may undoubtedly have been surrounded by a “belt” for ornament.

(6) Staves for the altar.—See Note 2 on verse 4.

(8) Hollow with boards.—Compare the second Note on verse 1.

The Court of the Tabernacle.

(9—18) Almost every ancient temple stood within a sacred enclosure, which isolated it from the common working world, and rendered its religions character more distinctly apparent. Such enclosures were partiularly affected by the Egyptians, and were usually oblong squares, surrounded by walls, with, for the most part, a single entrance. An open space of this kind, always desirable, was absolutely necessary where the sanctuary itself was covered in, since it would have been intolerable to kill and burn victims in a confined and covered space. The altar which has been described (verses 1—5) was necessarily placed outside the tabernacle, and formed the chief furniture of the court, for which directions are now given.

(9) For the south side southward.—Rather, for the south side upon the right. (See Note on chap. xxvi. 18.)

Hangings.—The word used is now and rare. It is rendered σκίνα, “sails,” by the LXX., and seems to designate a coarse sail-cloth, woven with interstices, through which what went on inside the court might be seen. The court, it must be remembered, was open to all Israelites (Levit. i. 3, &c.).

Of fine twined linen.—Made of linen thread, i.e., each thread having several strands; not “fine linen” in the modern sense.

(10) And the twenty pillars thereof . . .—Heb., and its pillars, twenty (in number), and their bases, also twenty (shall be) of bronze. Kalisch says that the pillars of the court were “of wood, not plated with metal” (Comment., p. 371): but the present passage, and also chap. xxxviii. 10, rightly translated, contradicts this view.

The hooks of the pillars.—Comp. chap. xxvi. 37. As the pillars were for the support of the “hangings,” they required “hooks,” whereof the “hangings” might be attached.

Their fillets.—Rather, their connecting-rods. The pillars of the court were to be united by rods, which would help to support the “hangings.”

(11, 12) The north side . . . This side of the court was to be in exact correspondence with the south. The western side was to be of only half the length (fifty cubits), and required therefore only half the number of pillars and sockets.

(13) On the east side eastward.—Rather, in front, towards the east. Both the tabernacle and the Temple faced to the east, which was regarded as “the front of the world” by the Orientals generally. The fifty cubits. (14) The hangings of one side of the gate shall be fifteen cubits: their pillars three, and their sockets three. (15) And on the other side shall be hangings fifteen cubits: their pillars three, and their sockets three. (16) And for the gate of the court shall be an hanging of twenty cubits, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, wrought with needlework: and their pillars shall be four, and their sockets four. (17) All the pillars round about the court shall be filleted with silver; their hooks shall be of silver, and their sockets of brass. (18) The length of the court shall be an hundred cubits, and the breadth fifty every where, and the height five cubits of fine twined linen, and their sockets of brass. (19) All the vessels of the tabernacle in all the service thereof, and all the pins thereof, and all the pins of the court, shall be of brass.

(20) And thou shalt command the children of Israel, that they bring thee pure olive oil beaten for the light, to cause the lamp to burn always. (21) In the tabernacle of the congregation without the vail, which is before the testimony, Aaron and his sons shall order it from evening to morning before the LORD; it shall be a statute for ever unto their generations on the behalf of the children of Israel.

The Court of the Tabernacle.

EXODUS, XXVII. The Oil for the Light.

The Oil for the Lamp.

(29) Thou shalt command the children of Israel that they bring thee pure olive oil—This instruction had been already given (chap. xxvi. 6), only not with such particularity. "Oil" had been required, but not "pure olive oil beaten." By this is meant the best possible olive oil—that which was obtained by "beating," or pounding in a mortar; which was free from various impurities that belonged to the oil crushed out, after the ordinary fashion, in a mill.

To cause the lamp to burn always—i.e., every night without intermission. Josephus says that three lights were kept burning both night and day (Ant. Jed., iii. 7, § 7); but there is nothing in Scripture to confirm this. The tabernacle would have received sufficient light during the daytime through the entrance curtain, which was of linen (chap. xxvi. 36), not to mention that the curtain may, when necessary, have been looped up. The lighting of the lamps every evening is distinctly asserted in chap. xxx. 8; their extinction in the morning appears from 1 Sam. iii. 3.

(22) In the tabernacle of the congregation.—Heb., in the tent of meeting—i.e., the place where God met the earthly ruler of His people. (See chap. xxv. 22.)

Before the testimony—i.e., in front of the Ark which contained the "Testimony," or "Two Tables." (See Note on chap. xxvi. 34.)

Aaron and his sons.—The priestly character of Aaron and his descendants, laid down in the next chapter, is here anticipated.

From evening to morning.—See the second Note on verse 20.
CHAPTER XXVIII. — (1) And take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him, from among the children of Israel, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office, even Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron's sons. (2) And thou shalt make holy garments for Aaron thy brother for glory and for beauty. (3) And thou shall speak unto all that are wise hearted, whom I have filled with the spirit of wisdom, that they may make Aaron's garments to consecrate him, that he may minister unto me in the priest's office. (4) And these are the garments which they shall make; a breastplate, and an ephod, and a robe, and a broidered coat, a mitre, and a girdle: and they

For glory and for beauty.—These words have great force. God would have His priests richly, as well as decently, apparelled, for two objects—(1) For glory —to glorify them—to give them an exalted position in the eyes of the nation, to cause them to be respected, and their office to be highly regarded; (2) for beauty —to make the worship of the sanctuary more beautiful than it would otherwise have been, to establish a harmony between the richly-adorned tabernacle and those who ministered in it; to give to the service of the sanctuary the highest artistic, as well as the highest spiritual, perfection. The relation of art to religion is a subject on which volumes have been written, and which cannot be discussed here, but God's regard for "beauty" is here brought prominently before us, and no honest exegesis can ignore the pagan fact that when God was pleased to give directions for His worship upon earth, they were made subservient, not only to utility and convenience, but to beauty. Beauty, it would seem, is not a thing despised by the Creator of the universe.

(3) Thou shalt speak unto all that are wise hearted.—By "all that are wise hearted" we must understand all that had the special knowledge which would enable them to give effectual aid in the production of such garments as were about to be commanded. The Hebrews regarded the heart as the seat of knowledge, with perhaps neither more nor less scientific acumen than underlies our own current modes of speech whereby the heart is made the seat of the affections.

Whom I have filled with the spirit of wisdom.—Few passages in the Bible are more antagonistic than this to the general current of modern thought. God speaks of Himself as having infused His Spirit into the hearts of men, in order to enable them to produce satisfactory priestly garments. Moderns suppose such things to be quite beneath the notice of the Creator of the universe. But it has to be remembered, on the other hand, (1) that God is the fountain whence all knowledge is derived; (2) that He alone knows what is beneath Him and what is not beneath Him; and (3) that 'dress' is not a wholly insignificant matter, or so much would not have been said in Scripture about it (Gen. iii. 21, xxvii. 3, xli. 42; Lev. vii. 7—9, xvi. 4: Num. xxv. 35, &c.). Garments intended "for glory and for beauty" (verse 2) required artistic power in those who were to make them; and artistic power, like all other intellectual excellence, is the gift of God.

To consecrate him.—Investiture in the holy garments was a part of the ceremony of consecration. (See Lev. vii. 7—9 and 13.)

(4) These are the garments.—The garments peculiar to the high priest are taken first, and described with great elaboration in thirty-six verses (4—30). The most conspicuous was the breastplate, described in verses 13—30, and here mentioned first of all. Next

XXVIII.

The Designation of Aaron and his Sons for the Priestly Office, with Directions for their Ministerial Apparel.

(1) Take thou unto thee Aaron thy brother. —Heb., make to draw near to thee Aaron thy brother. Hitherto the position of Moses had been absolutely unique. He had been, from the time that Egypt was quitted, the one and only intermediary between God and the people—the one and only priest of the nation. Now this was to be changed. Perhaps in consequence of his original reluctance and want of faith (chaps. iii. 11, iv. 10—13), perhaps on account of Aaron's elder birth (chap. vii. 7), it pleased God to commit the office of ministering to Him in the tabernacle, not to Moses and his descendants, but to Aaron and those sprung from his loins. In this way Aaron and his sons were "drawn near" to Moses in respect of rank, position, and dignity.

That he may minister to me in the priest's office.—Or, "that he may be priest to me." The actual investiture of Aaron with the priestly office did not take place until some time after the tabernacle was completed. It is related in Lev. viii.; and his first priestly acts are recorded in the following chapter (Lev. ix. 8—22).

Nadab and Abihu.—On Nadab and Abihu, the two eldest sons of Aaron, see chaps. vi. 23, and xxiv. 1.

Eleazar and Ithamar. —The priestly office was, in fact, continued in the families of these two. Eleazar became the high priest at the death of Aaron (Num. xx. 28), and was succeeded by his son Phinehas, whom we find high priest in the time of Joshua (Josh. xxii. 13) and afterwards (Judges xx. 28). At a later date, but under what circumstances is unknown, the high priesthood passed to the line of Ithamar, to which Eli belonged.

Holy garments.—Though holiness is, strictly speaking, a personal quality, yet all nations have felt it right to regard as "holy," in a certain modified sense, all those material objects which are connected with religion and employed in the worship of God. Hence we hear, both in Scripture and elsewhere, of "holy places," "holy vessels," "holy books," "holy garments." These last are required especially for the ministrants in holy places, who need to be marked out by some evident signs from the body of the worshippers. In Egypt the ministering priests in temples always wore peculiar dresses; and probably there was no nation in the time of Moses which, if it possessed a class of priests, did not distinguish them by some special costume, at any rate when they were officiating. The natural instinct which thus exhibited itself, received Divine sanction by the communications which were made to Moses in Sinai, whereby special dresses were appointed both for the high priest and for the ordinary priests.
shall make holy garments for Aaron thy brother, and his sons, that he may minister unto me in the priest’s office. (5) And they shall take gold, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen. (6) And they shall make the ephod of gold, of blue, and of purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen, (7) It shall have the two shoulderpieces thereof joined at the two edges thereof; and so it shall be joined together. (8) And the curious girdle of the ephod, which is upon it, shall be of the same, according to the work thereof;

EXODUS, XXVIII.

The Two Stones of the Ephod.

even of gold, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen. (8) And thou shalt take two onyx stones, and grave on them the names of the children of Israel: (9) six of their names on one stone, and the other six names of the rest on the other stone, according to their birth. (10) With the work of an engraver in stone, like the engravings of a signet, shalt thou engrave the two stones with the names of the children of Israel: thou shalt make them to be set inouches of gold. (11) And thou shalt put the two stones upon the shoulders of the ephod to this came the peculiar vestment called the “ephod,” a sort of jerkin or waistcoat, upon which the breastplate was worn (described in verses 6–12). Under the ephod was the long robe of blue, called “the robe of the ephod,” which may be considered as the main garment, which is described in verses 31–35. Upon his head the high priest wore a “mitre” or turban (described in verses 36–38); and inside his “robe” he wore a linen skirt or tunic, secured by a girdle (verse 39). Underneath the tunic he wore a linen drawers (verses 42, 43). Nothing is said as to any covering for his feet; but it is probable that they were protected by sandals. (5) They shall take gold, and blue.—Heb., the gold and the blue, &c.—i.e., they (the wise-hearted men of verse 3) shall receive (from Moses) the necessary gold, blue, &c., for the construction of the vestments. It is to be noted that the materials are the same as those employed for the vail and curtains of the sanctuary (chap. xxvi. 1, 31, 36), but with the further addition of gold and precious stones (verses 9, 17–21).

1. THE EPHOD.

(6–12) The ephod was, as already observed (Note on verse 4), a sort of jerkin or waistcoat. It was made in two pieces, a front piece and a back piece, which were joined together at the shoulders, apparently by a seam (verse 7). The pieces descended to the waist; and there one or other of them was expanded into a band, called “the curious girdle of the ephod,” which being passed round the waist and fastened, kept both front and back pieces in place (verse 8). On either shoulder was an onyx stone set in gold (verses 9–11), and engraved with the names of six of the tribes.

(6) With cunning work.—On this phrase, see Note on chap. xxvi. 1.

(7) The two shoulderpieces thereof.—Rather, two shoulder pieces.

(8) The curious girdle.—The word khešeb, which is thus translated, means properly “device,” “ornamental work,” and has not in itself the sense of “belt” or “girdle.” Still, there is no reason to doubt that the khešeb of the ephod was in fact a girdle, as Josephus calls it (Ant. Jud., iii. 7, § 4), though named from the peculiar skill displayed in its patterning. Josephus says it was “a girdle dyed of many hues, with gold interwoven in it.”

Shall be of the same.—Note on verse 2, and woven continuously with the front or back piece.

(9) Two onyx stones.—The shōhām of the Hebrews has been regarded by some as the emerald, by others as the beryl; but it is probably either the stone usually called the onyx, or that variety which is known as the sardonyx—a stone of three layers—black, white, and red. (See Joseph., Ant. Jud., iii. 7, § 5.) Emeralds could not have been cut by any process known at the time. Onyx and sardonyx were used from a very early period, as stones for signets, both in Egypt and elsewhere.

And grave on them; the names of the children of Israel.—That gem-engraving was practised from a remote antiquity both in Egypt and in Babylonia appears from the remains found in those countries. The signet cylinders of Chaldaean kings are regarded by the best Assyriologists as going back, at least, to B.C. 2,000. The signets of Egyptian monarchs reach, at any rate, to the twelfth dynasty, which is perhaps nearly as early. The hardest kinds of stone—diamond, ruby, emerald, sapphire, topaz—defied the art of the time; but stones of the second class—sard, carnelian, onyx, beryl, jasper, lapis lazuli—readily yielded to the engraver’s tools. There is no difficulty in supposing that among the Israelites were to be found persons who had been engaged in Egyptian workshops during the servitude, and were acquainted with Egyptian art in all its principal departments. The “names” to be engraved were doubtless the “tribe” names, as explained by Josephus.

(10) The other six names of the rest.—Heb., the remaining six names. Either Levi was omitted, or Joseph’s name took the place of Ephraim’s and Manasseh’s.

According to their birth,—i.e., in the order of their seniority.

(11) The engravings of a signet.—Compare Note 2 on verse 9. Signets had been already mentioned in Gen. xxxviii. 18, 25, xii. 42. Those of Egypt were for the most part rings, with cylindrical beads turning upon an axis. Those of Babylonia were cylinders, which were commonly worn by a string round the wrist. The engraving of the Babylonian cylinders is frequently of a very fine quality.

Thou shalt make them to be set inouches of gold.—The setting intended seems to have been a sort of open or filigree work, such as is very common in Egyptian ornaments of the third to the fifth dynasty—more properly “nouche”—is derived from the old French “nousche,” a buckle or clasp (see Skeat’s Etymol. Dict., § 5).

(12) For stones of memorial unto the children of Israel.—Rather, for the children of Israel. The intention was that the stones should be “stones of memorial” to God, on behalf of Israel; should remind...
God that the high priest represented all the tribes, and pleaded before Him on their behalf, and in their name. The tribes were represented doubly in the costume of the high priest, by the onyx stones and by the stones of the breastplate.

2. The Breastplate.

(13-30) The space devoted to the "breastplate" is indicative of its high importance. It was the most costly, most magnificent, and most conspicuous of the high priest's garments, while at the same time it was the most mysterious. Externally it was a blazon of gold and jewels; internally it held those strange and precious objects known as "the Urim and the Thummim" (verse 30), by means of which the Divine will was made known to the high priest, and through him to the people. The basis of the garment was a linen fabric of similar materials and workmanship with the ephod (verse 15), square in shape, about nine inches each way, and "doubled," so as to form internally a bag or pocket. Upon this linen groundwork were fastened twelve "stones," or jewels, set in an open-work of gold, and arranged in four rows, three in each (verses 17-21). These stones covered probably the greater portion of the external surface of the breastplate. To its two upper corners were attached two rings of gold, which were made fast by means of gold chains to buttons ("ouches") on the upper part of the ephod; and to its two lower corners were attached similar rings, which were fastened by a loop to rings of the same material on the lower part of the ephod (verses 13, 14, 22-25).

(13) Oouches of gold.—"Buttons" or "rosettes" of similar open-work to that which formed the setting of the onyx stones upon the shoulders of the ephod (verse 11). These "buttons" must have been sown on to the ephod.

(14) Chains ... at the ends.—Rather, chains of equal length, or, perhaps, of wretched work.

Of wretched work.—Heb., after the manner of a rope. Such chains are often seen round the necks of Persian officials in the Persepolitan sculptures, and appear also to have been used by the grandees of Egypt. They were composed of a number of gold wires twisted together. The chains spoken of in this place are the same as those mentioned in verses 22-25. Their object was to attach the two upper corners of the breastplate to the upper part of the ephod.

(15) The breastplate of judgment.—The word khasheh does not really signify "breastplate," but "ornament." It was the main ornament of the priestly attire. It was called "the ornament of judgment" on account of its containing the Urim and Thummim, whereby God's "judgmenots" were made known to His people. (See Note on verse 30.)

With cunning work.—Rather, of the work of the receiver. (Comp. chaps. xxvi. 1, 31, xxviii. 6.)

(16) Foursquare it shall be.—On the idea of perfection connected with the square, see Note on chap. xxvii. 1. But for this, twelve gems would probably have been arranged in the shape of an oblong.

Doubled.—Symmachus translates khesokhe by ἀκτών, "a receptacle," or "bag," and if the Urim and the Thummim, being material objects, were to be "put in" it (verse 30), such a construction would seem to have been absolutely necessary. Hence the "doubling," which would not have been needed merely for strength, since linen corsets, stout enough to resist the blow of a sword, were among the manufactures of Egypt, and could no doubt have been produced by the Hebrews.

A span.—The "span" was reckoned at half a cubit, or about nine inches.

(17-19) Set in it settings of stones ... There is always considerable difficulty in identifying ancient with modern gems, the etymologies of the words being frequently uncertain, the names (where they have survived) having sometimes changed their meaning, and the opinions of early commentators, who might seem to speak with some authority, being discrepant. In the present case, scarcely one of the twelve stones can be said to be determined with certainty. 1. The odem, identified by the LXX. and the Vulg. with the "sard," has been regarded as the ruby, the carbuncle, and the carnelian. Etymologically the word means "red," or "the red stone." The ruby is certainly wrong, since ancient engravers could not cut it. Either "sard" or "carnelian" is probably intended, both being common in Egypt. 2. The pitchah is certainly not the topaz, which could not more be cut than the ruby. If the word is derived, as supposed, from a root meaning "pale," the chrysotile, which resembles a pale topaz, but is far softer, may be meant. 3. The bdrethath is rendered smaragdus, "emerald," by the LXX. and Vulg.; but neither could the emerald be cut by the ancient engravers. The word means "brightly flashing," which tells us next to nothing. "Beryl" and "a kind of cornum" have been suggested; but neither is particularly sparkling. 4. The nophhech, translated ἄσπραζ by the LXX. and Josephus, may well be the "carbuncle," as is now generally supposed. It cannot, any more than the òdem, be the ruby. 5. The sappir oue might have supposed by its name to be certainly the "sapphire;" but this, again, is a gem which ancient engravers could not cut. I would seem that here we have one of the cases where the name has been transferred from one stone to another. The modern "lapis lazuli" being the gem which was called "sapphire" by the ancients. 6. The yahaltom is certainly not the "diamond," which is the hardest of all gems. The LXX. and Vulg. translate by "jasper" (نسب, jaspis); but this seems really to have been the twelfth stone. Other renderings are mere conjectures, and the yahaltom must be regarded as unknown. 7. The sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this shall be the first row. (18) And the second row shall be an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond. (19) And the third row a ligure, an agate, and an amethyst. (20) And the fourth row a beryl, and an onyx, and a jasper: they shall be set in gold in their inclosings. (21) And the stones shall be with the names of the children of Israel, twelve, according to their names, like the engravings of a signet; every one with his name shall they be according to the twelve tribes. (22) And thou shalt make upon the breastplate chains at the ends of wreathen work of pure gold. (23) And thou shalt make upon the breastplate two rings of gold, and shalt put the two rings on the two ends of the breastplate. (24) And thou shalt put the two wreathe chains of gold in the two rings which are on the ends of the breastplate. (25) And the other two ends of the two wreathe chains thou shalt fasten in the two ouches, and put them on the shoulder-pieces of the ephod before it. (26) And thou shalt make two rings of gold, and thou shalt put them upon the two ends of the breastplate in the border thereof, which is in the side of the ephod inward. (27) And two other rings of gold thou shalt make, and shalt put them on the two sides of the ephod underneath, toward the forefront thereof, over against the other coupling thereof, above the curious girdle of the ephod. (28) And they shall bind the breastplate by the rings thereof unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue, that it may be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breastplate be not loosed from the ephod. (29) And Aaron shall bear the names of

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>1st Row of Gems</th>
<th>2nd Row of Gems</th>
<th>3rd Row of Gems</th>
<th>4th Row of Gems</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Óxën, (the Sard)</td>
<td>Ímëk (the Carbuncle)</td>
<td>Íshäm (uncertain)</td>
<td>Íshäm (uncertain)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Óxën, (the Sard)</td>
<td>Ímëk (the Carbuncle)</td>
<td>Íshäm (uncertain)</td>
<td>Íshäm (uncertain)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Óxën, (the Sard)</td>
<td>Ímëk (the Carbuncle)</td>
<td>Íshäm (uncertain)</td>
<td>Íshäm (uncertain)</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Óxën, (the Sard)</td>
<td>Ímëk (the Carbuncle)</td>
<td>Íshäm (uncertain)</td>
<td>Íshäm (uncertain)</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

1 Or, ruby.
2 Heb., filings.

They shall be set in gold in their inclosings.—Or, in their settings. Every gem was to be enclosed in its own setting of gold.

The stones shall be with the names of the children of Israel.—Rather, the stones shall be according to the names, &c.—twelve, neither more nor fewer.

Every one with his name . . .—Rather, each stone, according to its name (i.e., the name engraved upon it), shall be (or, stand) for one of the twelve tribes.

Chains at the ends.—Rather, chains of equal length; or, chains of wreathe work. (See Note on verse 14.)

Of wreathe work.—Heb., after the manner of ropes.

Two rings on the two ends—i.e., on the two upper corners of the breastplate. The chains were to be passed through the two rings, which they were then to bind with the "ouches" of the ephod. (See verses 13, 14.)

Thou shalt make two rings—i.e., two other rings. These were to be put on the two lower corners of the breastplate, "in the border thereof," or at its extreme edge.

Two gold rings were also to be sewn on to the ephod, low down and in front, so as just to appear above the "curious girdle of the ephod," and the lower rings of the breastplate were to be laced to these rings by a "lace of blue." The breastplate was thus securely attached to the ephod, and showed above the "curious girdle" without covering it.

Aaron shall bear the names . . . upon his heart.—Comp. verse 12. The high priest was to be wholly identified with the people; to be one with them in affection no less than in action; to bear their names on his shoulders, as supporting them and wresting for them, while he also bore their names on his heart, as loving them and feeling for them. Thus he was continually to present before God a two-fold "memorial" of His people, and to make a sort of double appeal, on the one hand, to God's power, and, on the other hand, to His mercy and loving-kindness.
The Urim and Thummim.

EXODUS, XXVIII.

The Rofe of the Ephod.

the children of Israel in the breastplate of judgment upon his heart, when he goeth in unto the holy place, for a memorial before the Lord continually. (30) And thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urim and the Thummim; and they shall be upon Aaron's heart, when he goeth in before the Lord: and Aaron shall bear the judgment of the children of Israel upon his heart before the Lord continually. (31) And thou shalt make the robe of the ephod all of blue. (32) And there shall be an hole in the top of it, in the midst thereof: it shall have a binding of woven work round about the hole of it, as it were the hole of an habergeon, that it be not rent. (33) And beneath upon the hem of it thou shalt make pomegranates, and of purple, and of scarlet, round about the hem thereof; and bells of gold between them round about: (34) a golden bell and a pomegranate, a golden bell and a pomegranate, upon the hem of the robe round about. (35) And it shall be upon Aaron to minister: and his sound shall be heard when he goeth in unto the holy place before the Lord, and when he cometh out, that he die not.

(30) Thou shalt put in the breastplate of judgment the Urim and the Thummim.—Comp. Levit. viii. 8. The expression used is identical with that employed in chap. xxv. 15, 21 with respect to putting the Two Tables into the Ark of the Covenant, and can scarcely have any other meaning than the literal placing of one thing inside another. It has been already shown (see Note on verse 16) that the breastplate was a bag, and so capable of being used as a receptacle. The words "Urim and Thummim" mean literally, "lights and perfections" or, if the plural be one of dignity, "light and perfection" (Aquila and Symmachus translate by φωτισμοὺς καὶ τελείώματα; the LXX., by δίαφωτα καὶ άλληλα; the Vulg. by doctrina et veritatis). The question arises, what do these two words, as here used, designate? Do they designate material objects; if so, what objects? In favour of their designating material objects are (1) the expressions, "thou shalt put in the breastplate the Urim and the Thummim," "they shall be upon Aaron's heart," "he put in the breastplate the Urim and the Thummim" (Levit. viii. 8); (2) the fact that the words are accompanied by the article, on this, the first mention of them, as if they were familiar objects, well known at the time to the people generally; and (3) the explanations of Philo and Josephus, which, while they differ in all other respects, agree in this, that material objects are intended. The two sides of the breastplate, says Philo (De Monarch., ii. 5). But these were not "put in" the breastplate after it was complete, as implied in chap. xxviii. 30; Levit. viii. 8. The twelve jewels, says Josephus; but the present passage, taken in conjunction with verses 17—21, distinguishes the Urim and Thummim from them. Some small objects which the bag of the breastplate could hold, and with which the people had long been familiar, can alone answer the requirements of the case. Most modern critics are thus far agreed; but when the further question is asked, what were these objects? the greatest difference appears. Diamonds, cut and uncut; slips of metal, marked with "yes" and "no"; lots, of some kind or other; and small images, like the teraphim (Gen. xxxi. 19), are among the suggestions. A very slight examination by which these various views are supported is sufficient to show that certainty on the subject is unattainable. Probability, however, seems on the whole to be in favour of a connection between divination by teraphim and consultation of God by Urim and Thummim (Judges xvii. 5; xviii. 14, 17, 20; Hosea iii. 4), whence it is reasonable to conclude that the Urim and Thummim were small images, by which God had been consulted in the past, and by which Moses was now authorized to state that He would be consulted in the future. How the consultation was made, and the decision given, is a question still more obscure than that which has been just considered, and one which seems to the present writer to admit of no solution. The reader who is curious upon the point may be referred to Dean Plumptre's article on "Urim and Thummim," in Dr. W. Smith's Dictionary of the Bible, where the views propounded are ingenious, if not altogether satisfactory.

3. The Rofe of the Ephod.

(31—35) The "robe of the ephod" was a frock or tunic, reaching from the neck to below the knees. It was put on over the head, for which a hole was left (verse 32). Josephus says that it had no sleeves; and it would seem that the upper portion, above the waist, was wholly, or almost wholly, concealed by the ephod and breastplate; but the lower portion, from the waist downwards, formed the outer dress of the high priest, and was conspicuous. The plain blue contrasted well with the variegated ephod and the sparkling breastplate. The robe had no ornament excepting round the bottom, where it was fringed with alternate bells and pomegranates. The pomegranates were a decoration, and nothing more; but the bells served a purpose, which is explained in verse 35.

(36) As it were the hole of a habergeon.—Linen corselets, or "habergeons," were common in Egypt, and were shaped as is here indicated. The word used for "habergeon," takdahra, is thought to be Egyptian.

(37) Pomegranates.—The pomegranate was a favourite ornament in Assyria, but not in Egypt. It appears from Josh. vii. 21 that the fabrics of Babylon were carried by the merchants into Syria at a date not much later than this, whence we may conclude that they circulated also in Arabia and Egypt.

Bells of gold.—The bell is also more Assyrian than Egyptian. Its use as an article of priestly costume has no direct parallel, nor are bells known to have been employed in the religious services of any ancient nation. The statement that Persian kings wore bells rests upon no sufficient authority. We seem to have here the introduction of an entirely new religious usage.

(38) And his sound shall be heard.—Rather, that its sound may be heard. The great object of the
The Mitre and its Plate.

EXODUS, XXVIII. The Linen Tunic and Girdle.

(36) And thou shalt make a plate "of pure gold, and grave upon it, like the engravings of a signet, HOLINESS TO THE LORD. (37) And thou shalt put it on a blue lace, that it may be upon the mitre; upon the forehead of the mitre it shall be. (38) And it shall be upon Aaron's forehead, that Aaron may bear the iniquity of the holy things, which the children of Israel shall hallow in all their holy gifts; and it shall be always upon his forehead, that they may be accepted before the Lorn.

(39) And thou shalt embroider the coat of fine linen, and thou shalt make the mitre of fine linen, and then shalt make the girdle of needlework.

(40) And for Aaron's sons thou shalt make coats, and thou shalt make for them girdles, and bonnets shalt thou

It shall be always upon his forehead— that is to say, during his ministrations.

5. THE INNER TUNIC OR "COAT." (39) The garments hitherto described have been the outer garments. To these are now added the inner ones, of which there was but little to be said. They consisted of linen drawers (verses 42, 43), a linen tunic or shirt, woven in a peculiar way, and, to confine the tunic, a girdle, which was to be of many colours (chap. xxxix. 29), and ornamented with embroidery.

The coat.—"Coat" is an unfortunate translation. The kelômeth (comp. Gr. χειρων) was a long white linen tunic or shirt, having tight-fitting sleeves, and reaching nearly to the feet. The sleeves must certainly have shown, as they were the only covering of the priest's arms; and the lower part of the tunic probably showed below the "robe of the ephod."

6. THE INNER GIRDLE.

It appears from chap. xxxix. 29 that the girdle was to be "of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet," like the ephod (verse 6). It was not, however, to be woven of these colours, but to have them worked into it with the needle. As it was worn immediately above the tunic, reaching nearly to the feet, it was considered, perhaps, the more fitting to regard it as a part of the undergarment, the outer part being devoted to the extreme beauty of the priestly dress.

7. THE MINISTERIAL ATTIRE OF THE PRIESTS.

(40) For Aaron's sons thou shalt make coats— i.e., linen tunics like that of the high priest already described (see the last Note on verse 36), but not woven in any peculiar fashion.

Girdles.—Perhaps similar to the inner girdle of the high priest, but nowhere described particularly.

Bonnets.—Rather, caps. Plain, close-fitting caps, like those so commonly worn in Egypt, seem to be intended. The word used, ἄκραν, is derived from ἁγμία, "a cap" or "capitate."

For glory and for beauty.—It is certainly remarkable that so plain a dress as that of the ordinary priests—a white tunic, a girdle, which may or may not have been embroidered, and a plain white close-fitting cap—should be regarded as sufficing for "glory and for beauty." White robes, however, are in Scripture constantly represented as eminently glorious (Dan. vii. 9; Mark iii. 3; John xx. 12; Acts i. 10; Rev. iv. 4, vi. 11, vii. 9—15, xv. 6, &c.).

296
make for them, for glory and for beauty.

(10) And thou shalt put them upon Aaron thy brother, and his sons with him; and shalt anoint them, and consecrate them, and sanctify them, that they may minister unto me in the priest’s office.

(42) And thou shalt make them linen breeches to cover their nakedness; from the loins even unto the thighs they shall reach; and they shall be upon Aaron, and upon his sons, when they come in unto the tabernacle of the congregation, or when they come near unto the altar to minister in the holy place; that they bear not iniquity, and die: it shall be a statute for ever unto him and his seed after him.

CHAPTER XXIX.—(1) And this is the thing that thou shalt do unto them to hallow them, to minister unto me in the priest’s office: take one young bullock, and two rams without blemish, and unleavened bread, and cakes unleavened tempered with oil, and wafers unleavened anointed with oil: of wheaten flour shalt thou make them.

(3) And thou shalt put them into one basket, and bring them in the basket, with the bullock and the two rams.

(1) And Aaron and his sons thou shalt bring unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and shalt wash them with water.

(5) And thou shalt take the garments, and put upon Aaron the coat, and the

(11) Thou shalt put them upon Aaron and his sons. — Moses was by these words commanded to take the part in the consecration of Aaron and his sons which he is related to have taken in Lev. viii. 3–30.

And shalt anoint them.—See the comment on chap. xxvii. 7–9.

(42) Thou shalt make them linen breeches. —Rather, linen drawers. Drawers reaching from the waist to a little above the knee were the sole garment of many in Egypt, a necessary garment of all. Their object was as here stated.

The tabernacle of the congregation. —Heb., the tent of meeting.

The holy place seems to be here the court of the tabernacle, within which the altar was to be set up (chap. xl. 6, 29).

That they bear not iniquity, and die. —The death penalty is threatened against the sin of ministering without the garments needed for decency, as against the sin of neglecting to wear the robe of the ephod (verse 35). In both cases a Divine vengeance, rather than a legal punishment, is probably intended.

XXIX.

The Form of Consecration for the Priests.

(1) This is the thing that thou shalt do unto them to hallow them. —The consecration of the priests had been commanded in the preceding chapter (chap. xxviii. 31). The method of it is now laid down. It consists of five things:—(1) Ablution (verse 4); (2) Investiture (verses 5–9); (3) Chrism, or anointing (verse 7); (4) Sacerfice (verses 10–23); and (5) Filling the hand (verse 24). All of these were symbolical acts, typical of things spiritual—ablation, of the putting away of impurity; investiture, of being clothed with holiness;unction, of the giving of Divine grace, &c.; the entire consecration forming an acted parable, very suggestive and full of instruction to such as understood its meaning.

Take one young bullock. —The first thing to be done was to prepare the victims which would be needed, and to have them ready against the time when they would be required for sacrifice.

Without blemish. —Heb., perfect. (See Note 1 on chap. xiii. 5.)

Unleavened broad. —Unleavened bread seems to have been required as purer than leavened, since fermentation was viewed as a species of corruption.

Cakes tempered with oil. —Rather, cakes that have had oil poured over them. A tolerably thick cake is intended.

Wafers. —These were cakes, or biscuits, extremely thin and unsubsistent, as is implied by the etymology of the term used. Oil is commonly eaten with cakes of both kinds by the Orientals.

(4) Aaron and his sons thou shalt bring unto the door. —The place of the laver, not yet mentioned, but designed in God’s counsels, was between the brazen altar and the Tabernacle (chap. xxviii. 18), and consequently near the door of the latter. Rabbinical tradition says that it was not placed exactly opposite the door, but a little towards the south side of the court.

And shalt wash them. —This is the first mention in Scripture of a religious ablution. Water is so natural a symbol of purity, and ablution so apt a representative of the purging from sin, that we can feel surprise neither at the widespread use of the symbolism in religions of very different characters, nor at its adoption into the system at this time imposed by Divine Providence upon the Hebrews. As it was to maintain its place even in the Divinely-appointed ceremonial of Christianity, it must have been a fortiori suitable for the earlier and less spiritual dispensation. The widespread employment of it in other religions—e. g., in Egypt (Herod. ii. 37); in Persia (Zeuxippe, viii. p. 271, Spiegel’s translation); in Greece (Dollinger, Jew and Gentile, vol. i., p. 220); in Italy (Dict. of Greek and Rom. Antiqu., p. 719), and elsewhere—was no argument against its adoption into the Mosaic ceremonial, since the Divine legislation of Sinai was not intended to annul or supersede natural religion, but only to improve and expand it.

(5) Thou shalt take the garments—i.e., those described in the preceding chapter.

The coat—i.e., the linen tunic (chap. xxviii. 30). As the inner garment, this had to be put on first. Comp. Lev. viii. 7–9, where the investiture is more fully described, and is seen to have comprised nine sets:—(1) The putting on of the tunic; (2) The girding of the tunic with the under-girdle; (3) The putting on of the robe of the ephod; (4) The putting on of the ephod; (5) Girding with the curious girdle of the robe of the ephod, and the ephod, and the breastplate, and gird him with the curious girdle of the ephod; (6) and thou shalt put the mitre upon his head, and put the holy crown upon the mitre. (7) Then shalt thou take the anointing oil, and pour it upon his head, and anoint him. (8) And thou shalt bring his sons, and put coats upon them. (9) And thou shalt gird them with girdles, Aaron and his sons, and put the bonnets on them: and the priest's office shall be their's for a perpetual statute: and thou shalt consecrate Aaron and his sons. (10) And thou shalt cause a bullock to be brought before the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the bullock. (11) And thou shalt kill the bullock before the Lord, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. (12) And thou shalt take of the blood of the bullock, and put it upon the horns of the altar with thy finger, and pour all the blood beside the bottom of the altar. (13) And thou shalt take all the fat that covereth the inwards, and the caul that is above the liver, and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, and burn them upon the altar. (14) But the flesh of the bullock, and his skin, and his dung, shalt thou burn with fire without the camp: it is a sin offering. (15) Thou shalt also take one ram; and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the bullock. —By this symbolic action, which was commanded in the case of every sin offering (Lev. iv. 4, 15, 24, 29, 33, xvi. 21, &c.), the offerer identified himself with the animal, and transferred to it the guilt of his own sins and imperfections. The animal thereby became accursed, and its death paid the penalty due to the sins laid upon it, and set free those who had committed them. Similarly, Christ, our sin offering, was "made a curse for us" (Gal. iii. 13).

(12) Thou shalt take of the blood . . . and put it upon the horns of the altar. —It has been already noticed that the virtue of the altar was considered to reside especially in its horns; hence fugitives elung to them (1 Kings i. 50, ii. 28). In all sin offerings it was required (1) That some of the victim's blood should be smeared upon the altar's horns; and (2) That the remainder should be poured at its base (Lev. iv. 7, 18, 30, 34).

(13) Thou shalt take all the fat that covereth the inwards. —Whole burnt offerings were, comparatively speaking, of rare occurrence in the ancient world. Usually, parts only of the victims were consumed by fire upon the altar; the greater portion was either eaten by the priests and the worshipers, or burnt elsewhere than on the altar. Among the parts regarded as most fitting to be consumed on the altar, the fat always held a high place. This is to be accounted for either by its being considered a delicacy, or by the readiness with which it caught fire and kindled into a clear bright blaze. The caul that is above the liver—i.e., the membrane which covers the upper portion of the liver, sometimes called "the little omentum."

(14) The flesh . . . shalt thou burn . . . without the camp.—Comp. Lev. iv. 11, 12, 21; Heb. xiii. 11—13. This was the general rule with sin offerings. The whole animal was reckoned too impure for any portion of it to be suitable for human food.

His dung.—That which the intestines contained at the time of death.

(15) One ram.—Heb., the one ram: i.e., one of the two rams already mentioned in verse 1.
upon the head of the ram. (16) And thou shalt slay the ram, and thou shalt take his blood, and sprinkle it round about upon the altar. (17) And thou shalt cut the ram in pieces, and wash the inwards of him, and his legs, and put them unto his pieces, and 1 unto his head. (18) And thou shalt burn the whole ram upon the altar: it is a burnt offering unto the Lord: it is a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the Lord. (19) And thou shalt take the other ram; and Aaron and his sons shall put their hands upon the head of the ram. (20) Then shalt thou kill the ram, and take of his blood, and put it upon the tip of the right ear of Aaron, and upon the tip of the right ear of his sons, and upon the thumb of their right hand, and upon the great toe of their right foot, and sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about. (21) And thou shalt take of the blood that is upon the altar, and of the anointing oil, and sprinkle it upon Aaron, and upon his garments, and upon his sons, and upon the garments of his sons with him: and he shall be hallowed, and his garments, and his sons, and his sons' garments with him. (22) Also thou shalt take of the ram the fat and the rump, and the fat that covereth the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, and the right shoulder; for it is a ram of consecration: (23) and one loaf of bread, and one cake of oil bread, and one wafer out of the basket of the unleavened bread (Speaker's Commentary, vol. i. pt. 2. p. 535), "by far the most peculiar part of the whole ceremony." Consecrated to God by the act of sacrifice, its blood was used, together with the holy oil, for the consecration of Aaron and his sons (verses 20, 21); whilst at the same time its most sacred parts were placed on their hands by Moses, that with them they might perform their first sacerdotal act, and so be inaugurated into their office (verses 22-24). This last was not only the crowning act of the ceremony, but also its most essential feature—the act which imparted to Aaron and his sons the priestly character.

(29) Take of his blood. —The blood was regarded as the life (Gen. ix. 4). The life consecrated to God and accepted by Him was given back by Him to His ministers, that it might consecrate them wholly to His service, and so fit them for it. Placed upon the tip of the right ear, it reminded them that their ears were to be ever open and attentive to the whispers of the Divine voice; placed on the thumb of the right hand, it taught that they should take in hand nothing but what was sanctified; placed upon the great toe of the right foot, it was a warning that they were to walk therefore in the paths of holiness.

(31) Take of the blood ... and of the anointing oil. —The twofold offering, with blood and with oil, denoted the necessity of a twofold holiness—that of justification by the anointing blood of Christ, and that of sanctification by the outpouring of the Holy Spirit. The anointing which is here spoken of seems to have been the only anointing received by the sons of Aaron. (See Lev. viii. 30.)

(22) Thou shalt take of the ram the fat ... —These were the portions commonly burnt upon the altar in the case of peace offerings. (See Lev. iii. 9-11.) By "the rump" is meant the breast fat tail which characterises Oriental sheep, and which is said to weigh from six to twenty pounds. (Fellowes, Asia Minor, p. 10. Comp. Herod. iii. 113; Leo African. i. p. 293a.)

The caul above the liver. —See Note 2 on verse 13.

The basket ... that is before the Lord. —Comp. verse 3. The objects mentioned formed the "meat offering," which always accompanied a peace offering.

299
The Method of Filling the Hand.  EXODUS, XXIX.  The Feast upon the Sacrifice.

that is before the Lord: (24) and thou shalt put all in the hands of Aaron, and in the hands of his sons; and shalt wave them for a wave offering before the Lord. (25) And thou shalt receive them of their hands, and burn them upon the altar for a burnt offering, for a sweet savour before the Lord: it is an offering made by fire unto the Lord. (25) And thou shalt take the breast of the ram of Aaron’s consecration, and wave it for a wave offering before the Lord: and it shall be thy part. (27) And thou shalt sanctify the breast of the wave offering, and the shoulder of the heave offering, which is waved, and which is heaved up, of the ram of the consecration, even of that which is for Aaron, and of that which is for his sons: (28) and it shall be Aaron’s and his sons’ by a statute for ever from the children of Israel: for it is an heave offering: and it shall be an heave offering from the children of Israel of the sacrifice of their peace offerings, even their heave offering unto the Lord.

(24) Thou shalt put all in the hands of Aaron, and in the hands of his sons.—Rather, on the hands. Having placed the offerings on the hands of his brother and his brother’s sons, Moses was to put his own hands beneath theirs, and to make a waving motion towards the four quarters of the sky, thus presenting the offerings to the ubiquitous God. Aaron and his sons thus performed their first priestly act, as passive instruments in Moses’ hands, by his muscular energy. Their priestly character was by these means made complete. (On “wave offerings,” see Note upon Lev. vii. 30.)

(25) Thou shalt receive them . . . and burn them.—On communing his priestly functions to his brother and his brother’s sons, Moses was not immediately to lay them aside; but, as he had begun the consecration ceremony, so he was to complete it. (Comp. verses 31—37, and Lev. viii. 23—36.)

(26) Thou shalt take the breast.—It was the general law that in “wave offerings” the breast should be the officiating priest’s (Lev. vii. 29—31); hence, on this occasion, it was assigned to Moses.

The Law of the Wave and Heave Offerings, and of the Consecration Garments.

(27, 28) The wave offering.—For the future, in every case of offerings made at a consecration, both the breast and the right shoulder (Lev. vii. 32) were to be given to the officiating priest, who was to “wave” the one and “heave” the other before the Lord. “Heaving” was a single movement, an uplifting of the thing heaved; “waving” was a repeated movement, a swaying of the thing waved backwards and forwards horizontally. Both were modes of presenting the thing to God.

(29) The holy garments of Aaron shall be his sons’ after him.—That Eleazar was consecrated in his father’s, holy garments we learn from Num. xx. 28; but nothing is recorded as to the investiture of later high priests. Still, it is reasonable to suppose that the injunctions here given were carried out so long as the garments worn by Aaron held together.

To be anointed therein.—The anointing of each successive high priest is here commanded by implication. Jewish tradition affirms the practice to have been in conformity.

The Feast upon the Consecration Offerings.

(31—34) The writer having digressed in verse 27 from his main subject (the consecration of Aaron and his sons) to the consideration of certain permanent laws which arose out of the occasion, returns to his main subject at this point, and records the directions which he received with respect to the feast that followed, as a matter of course, on the consecration sacrifice. The parts of the victim neither consumed on the altar nor assigned to the officiating priest, were to be boiled at the door of the Tabernacle (Lev. viii. 31), and there consumed by Aaron and his sons, together with the leaf of unleavened bread, the oiled cake, and the wafer, which still remained in the “basket of consecrations” (Lev. viii. 31) mentioned in verses 3 and 23. No “stranger”—i.e., no layman—was to join with them in the feast (verse 33); and, if they were unable to consume the whole, what remained was to be burnt. (Comp. the injunctions with respect to the paschal lamb, given in chap. xii. 19, xxiii. 13.) Christian ritualism draws from these injunctions the propriety of an entire consumption of the elements on each occasion of the celebration of the Eucharist.

The Sevenfold Repetition of the Consecration Ceremonial.

(35) Seven days shalt thou consecrate them.—The number seven possessed an ideal completeness, resting on the prismatic facts of creation (Gen. i. 11). It is the number almost exclusively used under the old
Aaron, and to his sons, according to all things which I have commanded thee: seven days shalt thou consecrate them. And thou shalt offer every day a bullock for a sin offering for atonement: and thou shalt cleanse the altar, when thou hast made an atonement for it, and thou shalt anoint it, to sanctify it. Seven days thou shalt make an atonement for the altar, and sanctify it; and it shall be an altar most holy: whatsoever toucheth the altar shall be holy.

Now this is that which thou shalt offer upon the altar; two lambs of the first year day by day continually. The one lamb thou shalt offer in the morning; and the other lamb thou shalt offer at even: and with the one lamb a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oil; and the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink offering. And the other lamb thou shalt offer at even, and shalt do thereto according to the meat offering of the morning, and according to the drink offering thereof, for a sweet savour, an offering made by fire unto the Lord. This shall be a continual burnt offering throughout your generations at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the Lord; where I will meet you, to speak there unto thee. And there I will meet with the children of Israel, and the tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory. And I will sanctify the tabernacle of the congregation, and the coventant, when acts are to attain their result by repetition. (See Lev. iv. 6, 17, vii. 11, xv. 7, xvi. 14; Num. xix. 4; Josh vi. 4; 1 Kings xviii. 43; 2 Kings v. 10; Ps. cxxi. 16; &c.) Here we are to understand a sevenfold repetition of the entire ceremonial of consecration. (See Lev. viii. 33, 34.)

Thou shalt cleanse the altar, when thou hast made an atonement for it. Rather, by making an atonement for it. The atonement was made by sprinkling the blood of the bullock upon the horns of the altar (verse 12, compared with Lev. viii. 15). And thou shalt anoint it. Comp. Lev. viii. 11, where we find that the altar was anointed by having the holy oil sprinkled upon it seven times. It is not quite clear at what period in the ceremonial this was done.

An altar most holy. Heb., an altar, holiness of holinesses. Whatever toucheth the altar shall be holy. Rather, must be holy; nothing which is not holy must touch it. The future has the force of an imperative, as in the Ten Commandments.

THE LAW OF THE DAILY SACRIFICE, AND THE PROMISE OF GOD'S PRESENCE.

The consecration of the altar, which took place during the consecration of the priests, was to be followed immediately by the establishment of the daily sacrifice. Two lambs were to be offered every day, one in the morning, the other “between the evenings” (verse 30); partly in expiation of the daily sins of the nation, but mainly as a sign that the nation daily renewed its self-dedication to Jehovah, and offered itself afresh to be “a reasonable, holy, and lively sacrifice” to Him. Meat and drink offerings were to accompany the burnt sacrifice—signs of the gratitude due to God for His perpetual mercies, and acknowledgments of His protecting care and lovingkindness. At the same time incense was to be burnt upon the golden altar before the veil, as a figure of the perpetual prayer that it behoved the nation to send up to the Throne of Grace for a continuance of the Divine favour. (See chap. xxx. 7, 8.)

Two lambs of the first year. See Note on chap. xii. 5. The LXX. insert ἀλέους, “without blemish,” but this general requirement (Lev. xxii. 22, 24, 25), relaxed only in the case of free-will offerings (Lev. xxii. 23), does not need to be perpetually repeated. At even. Heb., between the two evenings. (On the meaning of the phrase, see Note 2 on chap. xii. 6.)

A tenth soul. Heb., a tenth. A tenth of what measure is not said, but we may presume an ephah to be intended. The tenth part of an ephah was an omer (chap. xvi. 36). The omer is reckoned at rather less than half a gallon.

An hin. The hin was, like the omer and the ephah, an Egyptian measure. It is estimated at about three-quarters of a gallon.

Beaten oil. See Note 1 on chap. xxvii. 20.

The meat offering ... the drink offering. A “handful” of each meat offering was thrown upon the altar and burnt (Lev. ii. 2); the remainder belonged to the priests (Lev. ii. 3). Scripture says nothing of the disposal of the drink offering. According to Josephus (Ant. Jud. iii. 9, § 4), it was poured out in libation upon the altar. According to others, a portion only was thus disposed of, while the rest was the priests’. The latter view seems the more probable.

The tabernacle of the congregation. Rather, the tent of meeting.

Where I will meet you. This passage determines the meaning of the expression, “tent of meeting.” It was not the place where the congregation met together, for the congregation were forbidden to enter it, but the place where God met His people through their mediator and representative, the high priest, who could there commune with God and obtain replies from Him on all practical matters that were of national importance. (See chap. xxx. 22 and Note ad loc.) The fact that all communication was to be through the high priest is indicated by the change of person: “Where I will meet you, to speak there unto thee.”

The tabernacle shall be sanctified by my glory. See chap. xl. 31, 35; and comp. Lev. ix. 24; 1 Kings viii. 10, 11; 2 Chron. v. 13, 14, vii. 2.

I will sanctify also both Aaron and his sons. Something beyond the formal consecration seems to be intended. God will continually sanctify the Levitical priesthood by the presence of His Holy altar: I will sanctify also both Aaron and his sons, to minister to me in the priest's office. (45) And I will dwell among the children of Israel, and will be their God. (46) And they shall know that I am the Lord their God, that brought them forth out of the land of Egypt, that I may dwell among them: I am the Lord their God.

CHAPTER XXX.—(1) And thou shalt make an altar to burn incense upon: of shittim wood thou shalt make it. (2) A cubit shall be the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof; four-square shall it be: and two cubits shall be the height thereof: the horns thereof shall be of the same. (3) And thou shalt overlay it with pure gold, the top thereof, and the sides thereof round about, and the horns thereof; and thou shalt make unto it a crown of gold round about. (4) And two golden rings shalt thou make to it under the crown of it, by the two sides of it shalt thou make it; and they shall be for places for the staves to bear it withal. (5) And thou shalt make the staves of shittim wood, and overlay them with gold. (6) And thou shalt put it before the vail that is by the ark of the testimony, before the mercy seat

The Promise of God's Presence.

EXODUS, XXX.

The Altar of Incense.

Spirit with them, in their ministerial acts, and even in their daily walk, if they will seek to serve Him. (44) I will dwell among the children of Israel. — It must not be supposed that the fulfillment of this promise was effected by the mere presence of the Shechinah within the Tabernacle. It pledged God to a perpetual supervision, care, and tender protection of His people, such as we find actually exercised in the history of the nation. (46) They shall know . . . — i.e., My after care of them will prove me the same loving and all-powerful God whose help effected their deliverance from the bondage of Egypt.

XXX.

The Altar of Incense.

(1) Thou shalt make an altar to burn incense upon.—Why the directions concerning the altar of incense were delayed until this place, instead of being given when the rest of the furniture of the holy place was described (chap. xxvii.), it is impossible to say. But there is certainly no reason to suspect a dislocation of the text. The mode in which Aaron is spoken of in verses 7—10 implies a previous mention of his consecration to the high priesthood.

That incense would be among the offerings which God would require to be offered to Him had appeared already in chap. xxv. 6. Its preciousness, its fragrance, and its seeming to mount in cloud after cloud to heaven, gave it a natural place in the symbolism of worship, and led to its employment in the religious rites of a variety of nations. Egyptian priests continually appear on the monuments with censers in their hands, in which presumably incense is being offered, and the inscriptions mention that it was imported from Arabia, and used largely in the festivals of Ammon (Records of the Past, vol. i, pp. 14—19). Herodotus tells us that the Babylonians consumed annually a thousand talents' weight of it at the feast of Belus (i. 183). The employment of it by the Greeks and Romans in their sacrifices is well known. Here again, as so often in the Mosaic dispensation, God sanctioned in His worship an innocent rite, which natural reason had pointed out to man as fitting and appropriate, not regarding its employment in false religions as degrading it from adoption into the true.

Of shittim wood shalt thou make it.—Of the same main material as "the brazen altar" (chap. xxvii. 1), but covered differently.

(2) Foursquare shall it be.—Of the same shape with "the brazen altar" (chap. xxvii. 1), but much smaller—two cubits high instead of three, and a cubit square at top instead of five cubits. This small space was ample for the burning of so precious a material, which could only be offered in small quantities.

The horns thereof.—Comp. chap. xxvii. 2, and Note 1, ad loc.

Shall be of the same — i.e., of one piece with the altar, not made separately, and then attached to it.

(3) Thou shalt overlay it with pure gold.—Next to the Ark of the Covenant the most holy article of furniture contained either in the sanctuary or in its court was the altar of incense. It symbolised prayer in its general use (Ps. cxli. 2; Luke i. 10), and it symbolised expiation in the purpose whereof it was to be applied on certain occasions, as when the high priest had sinned in his official capacity (Lev. iv. 3—12), or when the whole congregation had sinned through inadvertence (ib. verses 13—21). It was, therefore, "most holy to the Lord." Hence, its materials were to be the same with those of the ark of the covenant, and its place was to be directly opposite the ark, near to it, but on the outer side of the vail (chap. xl. 5).

A crown of gold round about.—Comp. what is said of the table of shewbread (chap. xxv. 24). In both cases a raised rim or edging is meant, which would prevent what was on the top from falling off.

(4) Two golden rings.—The golden altar was so much smaller and lighter than the brazen one that two rings only were required for carrying it, instead of the "four rings" needed by the brazen altar (chap. xxvii. 4).

By the two corners thereof.—Rather, on the two sides thereof. The word used means, literally, "sbs," and is explained in the clause which follows.

(6) Before the vail.—The ark was behind the vail (chaps. xxvi. 33, xl. 3), the altar of incense directly in front of it, nearer to the vail than either the golden candlestick or the table of shewbread. Hence the writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews speaks of it as belonging, in a certain sense, to the Holy of Holies (Heb. ix. 4; see Kay, in Speaker's Commentary). The "vail that is by the ark of the testimony" is distinguished here from the vail, or curtain, at the entrance to the holy place.

Before the mercy seat.—The altar bore a close relation to the mercy seat. It was the instrument by that is over the testimony, where I will meet with thee. (7) And Aaron shall burn thereon 1 sweet incense every morning: when he dresseth the lamps, he shall burn incense upon it. (8) And when Aaron 2 3 lighteth the lamps 4 at even, he shall burn incense upon it, a perpetual incense before the LORD throughout your generations. (9) Ye shall offer no strange incense thereon, nor burnt sacrifice, nor meat offering; neither shall ye pour drink offering thereon. (10) And Aaron shall make an atonement upon the horns of it once in a year with the blood of the sin offering of atonements: once in the year shall he make atonement upon it throughout which the “mercy” there enjoined was made available to the penitent sinner.
The Altar of Incense.

EXODUS, XXX. The Ransom of Souls.

Where I will meet with thee.—Comp. chaps. xxv. 22, xxix. 42, 43. (7) Aaron shall burn thereon 1 sweet incense (Heb., incense of spices) every morning.—On the composition of the incense, see verses 34, 35. That the offering of incense regularly accompanied both the morning and evening sacrifice appears from Ps. cxli. 2; Luke i. 10. That it was symbolical of prayer may be gathered both from those passages and also from Rev. vi. 8, viii. 3, 4.

When he dresseth the lamps.—Comp. chap. xxvii. 21.

(9) Ye shall offer no strange incense.—By “strange incense” is meant any that was composed differently from that of which the composition is laid down in verses 34, 35.

Nor burnt sacrifice, nor meat offering; neither ... drink offering.—All these were to be offered on the brazen altar, not on the altar of incense, which was in no way suited for them.

(10) Aaron shall make an atonement upon the horns of it once in a year.—This passage seems to determine the sense of Lev. xvi. 18, where some have supposed that “the altar that is before the Lord” is the brazen altar. Once in the year, on the great day of atonement, the high priest, after entering within the vail and sprinkling the blood of the offerings upon the mercy seat (Lev. xvi. 14, 15), was to “go out unto the altar that was before the Lord, and put of the blood of the bullock, and of the blood of the goat, upon the horns of the altar round about, and sprinkle the blood upon it with his finger seven times,” and so “cleanse it, and hallow it,” and “make an atonement for it” (ib. verses 18, 19).

The Ransom of Souls.

(12) When thou takest the sum of the children of Israel.—A formal enrolment and registration seems to be intended. Hitherto, nothing but a rough estimate of the number had been attempted (chap. xii. 37); now that a covenant had been made with God, an exact account of those who were within the covenant was needed. Moses, apparently, was contemplating such an exact enumeration when the command contained in this text was given him. It would be natural for one trained in Egyptian habits to desire such exact statistical knowledge. (For the minuteness and fulness of the Egyptian statistics of the time, see Records of the Past, vol. ii., pp. 19–28; vol. iv. pp. 46, 47; vol. vi. pp. 35–69, &c.)

Then shall they give every man a ransom for his soul.—On being formally enrolled among the people of God, it would be brought home to every man how unworthy he was of such favour, how necessary it was that atonement should in some way or other be made for him. God therefore appointed a way—the same way for all—in order to teach strongly that all souls were of equal value in His sight, and that unworthiness, whatever its degree, required the same expiation.

There shall be no plague among them.—If a man did not feel his need of “ransom,” and gladly pay the small sum at which the ransom was fixed, he would show himself so proud and presumptuous that he might well provoke a Divine “plague,” or punishment.

(13) Half a shekel.—When shekels came to be coined, they were round pieces of silver, about the circumference of a shilling, but considerably thicker, and worth about 2s. 7d. of our money. Their average weight was about 220 grains Troy. In Moses’s time coins were unknown, and a half-shekel was a small lump of silver, un stamped, weighing probably about 110 grains. The ransom of a soul was doubtless made thus light in order that the payment might not be felt practically as a burthen by any.

After the shekel of the sanctuary.—Without a standard laid up somewhere, weights and measures will always fluctuate largely. Even with a standard, they will practically vary considerably. The “shekel of the sanctuary” probably designates a standard weight kept carefully by the priests with the vessels of the sanctuary. All offerings were to be estimated by this shekel (Lev. xxvii. 25).

A shekel is twenty gerahs.—Rather, the shekel, i.e., the shekel of the sanctuary is of this weight. A “gerah” was, literally, a bean, probably the bean of the carob or locust tree (Ceratonia siliqua), but became the name of a weight, just as our own “grain” did. It must have equaled about eleven grains Troy.

(14) From twenty years old and above.—A Hebrew was not reckoned full grown till twenty. At twenty the liability to military service began (Num. i. 3; old and above, shall give an offering unto the Lord. (15) The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less than half a shekel, when they give an offering unto the Lord, to make an atonement for your souls. (16) And thou shalt take the atonement money of the children of Israel, and shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; that it may be a memorial unto the children of Israel before the Lord, to make an atonement for your souls.

(17) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (18) Thou shalt also make a laver of brass, and his foot also of brass, to wash withal: and thou shalt put it between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar, and thou shalt put water therein. (19) For Aaron and his sons shall wash their hands and their feet thereat: (20) when they go into the tabernacle of the congregation, they shall wash with water, that they die not; or when they come near to the altar to minister, to burn offering made by fire unto the Lord; (21) so they shall wash their hands and their feet, that they die not: and it shall be a statute for ever to them, even to him and to his seed throughout their generations.

Moreover the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (22) Take thou also unto thee principal spices, of pure myrrh five hundred shekels, and of sweet cinnamon half so much, even two hundred and

2 Chron. xxv. 5). At twenty the Levites commenced their service in the sanctuary (1 Chron. xxiii. 24—27; 2 Chron xxxii. 17; Ezr iii. 8).

The rich shall not give more, and the poor shall not give less.—See Note 2 on verse 12.

Thou shalt appoint it for the service of the tabernacle.—It appears, by chap. xxviii. 27, 28, that the silver collected by this tax, which amounted to above a hundred talents, was employed for making the sockets which supported the boards of the tabernacle (chap. xxvi. 19—25), and those of the pillars of the veil (ib. verse 32), together with the hooks for the pillars of the court, their capitals, and connecting rods. Thus, so long as the tabernacle stood, the precious metal paid as ransom remained in the sight of the people, and was a continual “memorial,” or reminder, to them of the position into which they were brought by covenant with God.

The Brazen Laver.

(18) Thou shalt also make a laver of brass. — Rather, of bronze. (See Note on chap. xxv. 3.) Water was required for the ablutions of the priests (verses 19—21), for the washing of certain parts of the victim, (chap. xxix. 27; Lev. i. 9, 13. &c.), and probably for the cleansing of the altar itself and the ground whereon it stood from blood stains and other defilements.

His foot. — The laver was probably in the shape of a large urn or vase, supported upon a comparatively slender stem, which rose from a pedestal. Vases of this kind are represented in the Assyrian bas-reliefs. (See Ancient Monarchies, vol. i., p. 481.)

Thou shalt put it between the tabernacle of the congregation and the altar. — It was essential that the laver should be near the altar, since on every occasion of their ministering at the altar the priests had to wash at it (verse 20). It was also essential that it should be near the entrance into the tabernacle, since they had likewise to wash before they entered into the holy place. Jewish tradition says that its place was between the entrance and the brazen altar, not, however, exactly between them, but a little to the south.

(19) Aaron and his sons shall wash their hands and their feet. — Washing the hands symbolised purity in act; washing the feet, holiness in all their walk and conversation.

(20) That they die not. — Comp. chap. xxviii. 35, 43. It is not altogether easy to see why the death-penalty was threatened against neglect of certain ceremonial observances, and not of others. Ablution, however, was so easy, and probably so long-established a practice, that to omit it would imply intentional disrespect to God.

(21) A statute for ever. — Comp. chap. xxvii. 21; xxviii. 43; xxxix. 9. The external act was to continue so long as the dispensation lasted; the internal purity, which it symbolised, would be required of those who entered the Divine Presence for ever. (See Heb. xii. 14.)

The Composition of the Holy Oil.

(22) Principal spices. — The East is productive of a great variety of spices; but of these some few have always been regarded with especial favour. Herodotus (iii. 107—112) mentions five "principal spices" as furnished by Arabia to other countries, whereof at least appear to be identical with those here spoken of.

Pure myrrh. — Heb., myrrh of freedom. The shrub which produces myrrh is the balanodendron myrrha. The spice is obtained from it in two ways. The sap, which is purest and best exudes from it naturally (Theophrast. De Odoribus, § 29; Plin., ii. N., xii. 35), and is here called "myrrh of freedom," or "freely flowing myrrh." The other and inferior form is obtained from incisions made in the bark. Myrrh was very largely used in ancient times. The Egyptians employed it as an ingredient in their best method of embalming (Herod. ii. 86), and also burnt it in some of their sacrifices (28, 40). In Persia it was highly esteemed as an odour (Athen. Deipn. xii. p. 514A); the Greeks used it in unguents, and as incense; Roman courtiers scented their hair with it (Hor. Od., iii. 14, i. 22); the later Jews applied it as an antiseptic to corposes (John xix. 39). This is the first mention of myrrh (Heb., mōr) in the Bible, the word translated "myrrh" in Gen. xxxvii. 25 and xlii. 11 being ld, which is properly, not myrrh, but balsamum.

Sweet cinnamon. — While myrrh was one of the commonest of spices in the ancient world, cinnamon was one of the rarest. It is the produce of the cinnamomum, or cinnamomum zeylanicum, a tree allied to the laurel, which now grows only in Ceylon, Borneo, Sumatra, China, Cochín China, and in India on the fifty shekels, and of sweet calamus two hundred and fifty shekels, (23) and of cassia five hundred shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary, and of oil olive an hin; (25) and thou shalt make it an oil of holy ointment, an ointment compound after the art of the apothecary; it shall be an holy anointing oil. (26) And thou shalt anoint the tabernacle of the congregation therewith, and the ark of the testimony, (27) and the table and all his vessels, and the candlestick and his vessels, and the altar of incense, (28) and the altar of burnt offering with all his vessels, and the laver and his foot. (29) And thou shalt sanctify them, that they may be most holy; whatsoever toucheth them shall be holy.

EXODUS, XXX. The Sweet Incense.

-coast of Malabar. According to Herodotus (iii. 111) and Strabo (xvi. p. 535), it grew anciently in Arabia; but this is doubted, and the Arabians are believed to have imported it from India or Ceylon, and passed it on to the Phoenicians, who conveyed it to Egypt and Greece. The present passage of Scripture is the first in which it is mentioned, and in the rest of the Old Testament it obtains notice only twice (Prov. vii. 16; Cant. iv. 14). The word used, which is kinnemon, makes it tolerably certain that the true cinnamon is meant.

Sweet calamus.—There are several distinct kinds of aromatic reed in the East. One sort, according to Pliny (H. N. xii. 22), grew in Syria, near Mount Lebanon; others were found in India and Arabia. It is quite uncertain what particular species is intended, either here or in the other passages of Scripture where "sweet cane" is spoken of. (See Cant. iv. 14; Isa. xiii. 24; Jer. vi. 20; Ezek. xxvii. 17.)

(23) Cassia.—In the original, kiddoth, not keitzodh, which is the exact equivalent of the Greek and Latin cassia. According to the best Hebrew authorities, however, cassia is intended by both words, which are derived from roots signifying "to split," or "to peel off." Cassia is the inner bark of a tree called by botanists cinnaemonum cassia, which is a native of India, Java, and the Malay peninsula. It has nearly the same flavour as cinnamon, but is more pungent, and of a coarser texture. The word kiddoth occurs in Scripture only here and in Ezek. xxvii. 19.

An hin.—See Note on chap. xxix. 40.

(25) After the art of the apothecary.—Skill was to be called in. The spices were not to be poured and mingled haphazard, but were to be united in due proportion; the art of the apothecary was to be used in effecting the composition. Jewish tradition says that its essence was first extracted from each of the spices, and then the oil mingled with the essences.

(26) Thou shalt anoint the tabernacle.—The tabernacle and its contents were to be first consecrated, then the priests. In the tabernacle itself, the consecration was to begin with the ark of the testimony in the Holy of Holies, then to proceed to the Holy place, where the table of shewbread with its "vessels," the golden candlestick, and the altar of incense were to be anointed; and finally to pass the vail to the outer court, where the holy oil was to be sprinkled upon the brazen altar, and upon the laver, to sanctify them. (See verses 20—29; and comp. Lev. viii. 10, 11.)

(29) Thou shalt anoint Aaron. — Comp. chap. xxix. 7; Lev. viii. 12.

And his sons.—See chap. xxix. 21.

That they may minister unto me.—As Aaron and his sons were set apart to minister until the holy oil had been poured on them, so Christian priests can be no otherwise fitted to discharge their office than by their receiving that effluence of the Holy Spirit which the holy oil typified. (29) Upon man's flesh shall it not be poured — i.e., it shall not be in ordinary use as an unguent—a mere "man," who is not a priest, shall not apply it to his private use. It shall be reserved altogether for holy purposes.

Neither shall ye make any other like it, after the composition of it—i.e., after the recipe given in verses 23—25. The ingredients might be used in ungents separately—they might even be so used when united in some different proportions from those laid down for the "holy ointment"—but in the proportions fixed for the holy oil they must have no secular employment.

The composition of the holy incense.

(26) Take unto thee sweet spices.—Rather, Take unto thee spices. The word translated "spices" has no epithet. Incense, as commonly used in the ancient world, was not a composition, but some single spice, most frequently frankincense. That, however, employed by the Hebrews was always a compound. According to Josephus (Bell. Jud. v. 5, § 5), the incense burnt in the later temple contained thirteen ingredients.

Stacte is probably the gum storax, which is the produce of the styrax officinalis, a tree common in Syria and Palestine. It burns readily, and emits much smoke (Herod. iii. 107).

Onycha is thought to be the "claw" or operculum of the magna odoratus, or blatta Byzantina, a sort of shell-fish common in the Red Sea. This "claw" produces, when burnt, a strong odour.

Galbanum is a gum well known to modern chemists. It may be procured from various plants, as the opoponax, the galbanum Persicum, and others. When shall there be a like weight: (35) and thou shalt make it a perfume, a confection after the art of the apothecary, tempered together, pure and holy: (36) and thou shalt beat some of it very small, and put of it before the testimony in the tabernacle of the congregation, where I will meet with thee: it shall be unto you most holy. (37) And as for the perfume which thou shalt make, ye shall not make to yourselves according to the composition thereof: it shall be unto thee holy for the Lord.

(38) Whosoever shall make like unto that, to smell thereto, shall even be cut off from his people.

CHAPTER XXXI.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) See, I have called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah: (3) and I have filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge, and in artisanship. From among the thousands of artificers who had accompanied him out of Egypt. But God saw fit to mark the importance of the work by taking the direct appointment of the persons to be employed upon Himself. He knew what was in man. He knew to whom he had given the highest artistic power, and who at the same time that they possessed it would work in the most religious spirit. He accordingly named two persons, Bezaleel and Aholiab, as those to whom the superintendence of the whole business should be given. Bezaleel was to be leader and chief. Aholiab assistant. Bezaleel’s task was to be general. Aholiab’s, apparently, special (chap. xxxviii, 23). Both, however, were to receive the special assistance of God’s Holy Spirit for the due execution of their respective tasks (verses 3, 6), and both, as chosen instruments of God, and faithful workers in His service, had their names equally commemorated in His Holy Book, and were thus upheld as examples to future ages.

(2) I have called by name.—It is a high honour to be called of God by name. He thus calls only those whom He appoints to some great work, as Moses (chaps. iii. 4, xxiii. 12), Samuel (1 Sam. iii. 10), and Cyrus (Isa. xiv. 3, 4).

Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur.—Hur, the grandfather of Bezaleel, is generally supposed to be identical with the Hur who supported Moses’s hands (chap. xvii. 12), and was left joint regent with Aaron when Moses went up into Mount Sinai (chap. xxiv. 14). There is, however, no evidence of this beyond the identity of the name.

Of the tribe of Judah.—Descended from Judah through Pharez, Hezron, and Caleb (1 Chron. ii. 5, 18–20).

(4) I have filled him with the spirit of God . . . to devise cunning works.—Every good gift and every perfect gift (intellectual power no less than others) is from above, and cometh down from the Father of lights” (James i. 17). Artistic ability is a Divine gift, a very precious gift, best employed in God’s direct service, and always to be employed in subordination to His will, as an improving, elevating, and refining—not as a corrupting—influence.

In wisdom, and in understanding, and in knowledge.—By “wisdom” is probably meant the power to invent and originate artistic forms; by “understanding,” the ability to appreciate artistic suggestions received from others; by “knowledge,” acquaintance with the methods and processes of art. Bezaleel was to possess all these gifts.

In all manner of workmanship.—He was also to possess that wonderful dexterity of hand on which the power of artistic execution mainly depends.
all manner of workmanship, (9) to devise cunning works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, (3) and in cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of timber, to work in all manner of workmanship. (6) And I, behold, I have given with him Aholiah, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan: and in the hearts of all that are wise hearted I have put wisdom, that they may make all that I have commanded thee; (7) the tabernacle of the congregation, and the ark of the testimony, and the mercy seat that is thereupon, and all the furniture of the tabernacle, (9) and the table and his furniture, and the pure candlestick with all his furniture, and the altar of incense, (9) and the altar of burnt offering with all his furniture, and the laver and his foot, (10) and the cloths of service, and the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and the garments of his sons, to minister in the priest’s office, (11) and the anointing oil, and sweet incense for the holy place: according to all that I have commanded thee shall they do.

(12) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (13) Speak thou also unto the children of Israel, saying, Verily my sabbaths ye shall keep: for it is a sign

The cloths of service.—Modern critics generally suppose the state robes of the high priest to be meant (Keil, Knobel, De Wette, Kalisch, Cook); but the Rabbinical interpreters understand the cloths in which the ark and other vessels of the sanctuary were wrapped when the camp was moved from place to place (see Num. xix. 6—13). These, like the cloths here spoken of (chap. xxxix. 1), were to be of blue, and purple, and scarlet; and it would be natural to distinguish them from the “holy garments,” as is done both here and also in chaps. xxx. 10, and xxxix. 1. 41. They had, however, not been previously mentioned in the directions. Perhaps the true explanation is, that under the words “cloths of service” (bigdey serad, or biydeh haōs) are included both the garments of Aaron and also those of his sons, the two later clauses of the verse being exegetical of the first clause. In that case, we should translate: The robes of service, both the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and also the garments of his sons. Chap. xxxix. 41 is decidedly favourable to this interpretation.

The Law of the Sabbath Declared anew under a Penal Sanction.

(12—17) The worship of the tabernacle was so closely connected with Sabbatical observance (Lev. xix. 30), that no surprise can be felt at a recurrence to the subject in the present place. It was not only that there might be a danger of zealous men breaking the Sabbatical rest in their eagerness to hasten forward the work of construction now required of them. The re-enactment of the Law might serve to check this tendency if it existed; but clearly the present passage is not specially directed to so narrow an object. It is altogether general in its aim and teaching. It re-enacts the law of the Sabbath (1) under a new sanction; and (2) with new light in its intention and value. Hitherto the Sabbath had been, in the main, a positive enactment intended to test obedience (chap. xvi. 4); now it was elevated into a sacred sign between God and His people (verse 13). Having become such a sign, it required to be guarded by a new sanction, and this was done by assigning the death-penalty to any infraction of the law of Sabbath observance (verses 14, 15).

(13) It is a sign between me and you.—Circumcision had been given as a covenant sign to Abraham and his descendants (Gen. xvii. 9—13); but its adoption by many of the heathen nations had rendered it no longer a distinguishing mark by which God’s people between me and you throughout your generations; that ye may know that I am the Lord that doth sanctify you. (14) Ye shall keep the sabbath therefore; for it is holy unto you: every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death: for whosoever doeth any work therein, that soul shall be cut off from among his people. (15) Six days may work be done; but in the seventh is the sabbath of rest, 1 holy to the Lord: whosoever doeth any work in the sabbath day, he shall surely be put to death. (16) Wherefore the children of Israel shall keep the sabbath, to observe the sabbath throughout their generations, for a perpetual covenant. (17) It is a sign be-could be certainly known from others. Thus a new "sign" was needed. The observance of one day in seven as a day of holy rest became henceforth the distinguishing sign, and proved effectual. It was not likely to be adopted, and in point of fact was not adopted, by any of the heathen. We find it in the latest time of the Jewish nation still regarded as the special mark and badge of a Jew (Juv. Sat. vi. 159, xiv. 96; Mart. Epig. iv. 4, 1. 7, &c.).

(14) Every one that defileth it shall surely be put to death.—This is a new enactment, and must be regarded in conjunction with the new dignity attached to Sabbath observance by its having become the special covenant sign between God and His people. The Sabbath-breaker now threw himself out of covenant with God, and not only so, but did what in him lay to throw the whole people out of covenant. His guilt was therefore great, and the assignment to it of the death penalty is in no way surprising; rather, it is in accordance with the general spirit of the code (see chap. xx. 16, 17, 29, xxii. 18—20, &c.). When the occasion arose, there was no hesitation in carrying the law out (Num. xv. 32—35).

Cut off.—Or, separated, set apart from. His act at once est him out from the number of God's people, made him an outlaw, ipso facto excommunicated him.

(15) Six days.—Comp. chap. xx. 9.

The sabbath of rest.—Rather, a sabbath of rest, or a complete rest. The repetition (sabbath sabbathôn) gives an idea of completeness.

(17) For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth.—Whatever other grounds there were for Sabbath observance, this idea always lay at its root. Man was through it to be made like unto his Maker—to have from time to time a rest from his labours, as God had had (Gen. ii. 2, 3)—and thereby to realise the blessedness of that final rest which he may be sure "remained for the people of God."

The Two Tables Given.

(18) The termination and crown of the entire conference which Moses had held with God on Mount Sinai for forty days and forty nights (chap. xxiv. 18) was the committing to his hands of the two tables of testimony which had been promised before the ascents into the mount was made (ib. verse 12), and which were pre-supposed in the entire arrangement of the sanctuary. The Court pre-supposed the tabernacle; the outer chamber of the tabernacle, or holy place, was a mere vestibule to the inner chamber, or holy of holies; the inner chamber was a receptacle for the ark; and the ark was a chest or coffer constructed to contain the Two Tables. The entire design having been laid down, it was a first step towards the carrying out of the design to put into the hands of Moses that treasure with a view to which all the directions concerning the tabernacle had been given.

Two tables of testimony.—Rather, the two tables. The treasure which had been glanced at in chap. xxv. 21, and distinctly promised in chap. xxiv. 12.

Written with the finger of God.—Comp. chap. xxiv. 12, where God speaks of "commandments which He has written." We must understand that the tables were inscribed by some supernatural process, and not by any human hand. The exact nature of the supernatural process is not revealed to us.

XXXII.

The Idolatry of the Golden Calf.

(i) When the people saw that Moses delayed to come down.—After seven chapters of directions, which belong to the Mosaic or Levitical Law, the writer here resumes his historical narrative. Leaving Moses still in the mount, he returns to the plain at its base in order to relate the events which had there occurred during Moses' absence. It has been suggested that chap. xxxi. was originally followed by chap. xxxv., and that chaps. xxxii.—xxxv. form a "distinct composition," which was subsequently inserted at this point (Cook). But this supposition is improbable. Chap. xxxv. does not cohere with chap. xxxi. Passing from one to other, we should be sensible of a gap which required filling up. Neither does chap. xxxii. commence like an independent narrative. It rests on the fact of the long delay of Moses in Sinai, which requires chaps. xxxv.—xxxvii. to explain it; and its mention of "the people," and "the mount," without further designation, implies reference to something that has gone before. Chaps. xxxii.—xxxv. occur really in their natural, their proper, and, no doubt, in their original place.

The people gathered themselves together unto Aaron.—Moses, before his departure, had left up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him. (2) And Aaron said unto them, Break off the golden earrings, which are in the ears of your wives, of your sons, and of your daughters, and bring them unto me. (3) And all the people brake off the golden earrings which were in their ears, and brought them unto Aaron. (4) And he received them at their hand, and fashioned it with a graving tool, after he had made it a molten calf; and they said, These be thy gods, O Israel, which brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. (5) And when Aaron saw it, he built an altar before it; and Aaron made. "All the people," with one accord, surrendered their earrings. Some measure is hereby afforded of the intensity of the feeling which was moving the people and urging them to substitute an idolatrous worship for the abstract and purely spiritual religion which had reigned supreme since their departure from Egypt.

And he received them at their hand, and fashioned it with a graving tool.—Rather, and he received it (i.e., the gold) at their hand, and bound it in a bag. So Gesenius, Rosenmüller, Först, Knoehl, Kurtz, Maurer, Scrader, Cook, &c. "Fashioned it with a graving tool" is a possible rendering of the Hebrew words, but will not suit here, since the next clause tells us that the image was a molten one, and if it had been intended to say that the image was first molten and then finished with a graving tool, the order of the two clauses would have been inverted. A similar phrase to that here used has the sense of "bound in a bag" in 2 Kings v. 23.

After he had made it a molten calf.—This is a quite impossible rendering. The original gives "and," not after." The action of this clause must either be simultaneous with that of the last or subsequent.

Translate, and made it into a molten calf.

A molten calf.—It has been usual to regard the selection of the "calf" form for the image as due to Egyptian influences. But the Egyptian calf-worship, or, rather, bull-worship, was not a worship of images, but of living animals. A sacred bull, called Apis, was worshipped at Memphis, and another, called Mnevis, at Heliopolis, both being regarded as actual incarnate deities. Had Egypt been the original source of the idea, it would have been natural to select a living bull, which might have "gone before" the people literally. The "molten calf," which had no very exact counterpart in Egypt, perhaps points back to an older idolatry, such as is glanced at in Josh. xxiv. 14, where the Israelites are warned to "put away the gods which their fathers served on the other side of the flood," i.e., of the Egyptians. Certainly the bull form was more distinctive of the Babylonian and Assyrian than of the Egyptian worship, and it may be suspected that the emigrants from Chaldea had clung through all their wanderings to the mystic symbolism which had been elaborated in that primeval land, and which they would contrast favourably with the coarse animal worship of Egypt. In Chaldea, the bull, generally winged and human-headed, represented the combination of wisdom, strength, and omnipresence, which characterises divinity; and this combination might well have seemed to carnal minds no unapt symbol of Jehovah.

These be thy gods.—Rather, This is thy god.

(5) Aaron . . . built an altar before it.—Having once yielded to the popular cry, Aaron was carried on from one compliance to another. He ceased the mouth to be made for the idol, and the gold to be melted and run into it; and now he constructed, perhaps with his own hands, an altar of rough stones or turf (chap. xx. 24, 25), and placed it directly in front of the made proclamation, and said, To morrow is a feast to the Lord. And they rose up early on the morrow, and offered burnt offerings, and brought peace offerings; and the people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play.

(7) And the Lord said unto Moses, Go, get thee down; for thy people, whom thou hast brought out of the land of Egypt, have corrupted themselves: they have turned aside quickly out of the way which I commanded them; and they have made them a molten calf, and have worshiped it, and have sacrificed thereunto, and said, These be thy gods, O Israel, which have brought thee up out of the land of Egypt. (8) And the Lord said unto Moses, I have seen this people, and, behold, it is a stiffnecked people: now therefore let me alone, that my wrath may wax hot against them, and that I may consume them: and I will make of thee a great nation.

(9) e And Moses besought the Lord his God, and said, Lord, why doth thy wrath wax hot against thy people, which thou hast brought forth out of the land of Egypt with great power, and with a mighty hand? Wherefore should the Egyptians speak, and say, For mischief did he bring them out, to slay them in the mountains, and to consume them from the face of the earth? Turn from thy fierce wrath, and repent of this evil against thy people. (10) Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, thy servants, to whom thou swarest by thine own self, and saidst unto them, I will multiply thy seed as the stars of heaven, and all this land that I have image, thus encouraging the offering of sacrifice to it. Perhaps he flattered himself that by heading the movement he could control it, and hinder it from becoming downright apostacy from Jehovah. In his view no doubt the calf was an emblem of Jehovah, and the worship paid it was the worship of Jehovah. Hence the festival which he proclaimed was to be "a feast to Jehovah." But how little the ends he was to guide events, or to hinder the worst evils of idolatry from speedily manifesting themselves, appears from verses 6 and 25.

(9) They rose up early.—Impatient to begin the new worship, the people rose with the dawn, and brought offerings, and offered sacrifice. Whether Aaron took part in these acts—which constituted the actual worship of the idol—is left doubtful.

Burnt offerings, and peace offerings.—Sacrifices of both kinds were pre-Mosaical, not first originated by the Law, though deriving confirmation from it. Offerings of both kinds are noticed in Gen. iv. 3, 4; Exod. xviii. 12.

The people sat down to eat and to drink, and rose up to play.—A feast always followed a sacrifice (see chaps. xviii. 12, xxiv. 5, 11). In feasting therefore upon what they had offered, the Israelites did no wrong; but probably they indulged themselves in a license of feasting unsuited to a religious act, though common enough in the idol-festivals of the heathen. They "fed without fear" (Jude 12), transgressed the bounds of moderation, and turned what should have been a religious rite into an orgy. Then, having gratified their appetites and stimulated their passions, they ceased to eat and drink, and "rose up to play." The "play" included dancing of an indecent kind (verses 19, 25), and would probably have terminated, as the heathen orgies too often did, in the grossest sensuality, had not the descent of Moses from Sinai, and his appearance on the scene, put a stop to the unhallowed doings.

God's Offer to Moses.

(7) The Lord said unto Moses, Go, get thee down.—Moses was, of course, wholly ignorant of all that had occurred in the camp. The thick cloud which covered the top of Sinai had prevented his seeing what occurred in the plain below (chap. xxiv. 18). The phrase, "Go, get thee down," is emphatic, and implies urgency.

Thy people.—"Thine," not any longer "mine," since they have broken the covenant that united us; yet still "thine," however much they sin. The tie of blood-relationship cannot be broken.

Have corrupted themselves.—The form of the verb used (shikheh) is active. We must supply "their way," or some similar phrase, after it. (Comp. Gen. vi. 12: "All flesh had corrupted his way upon the earth.")

(9) These be thy gods.—Rather, This is thy god, as in verse 4.

(9) It is a stiff-necked people.—This phrase, afterwards so common (ehaps. xxx. 3, 5, xxxiv. 5; Deut. ix. 6, 13, x. 16; 2 Chron. xxx. 8, xxxvi. 13; Ps. lxxv. 5; Jer. xvii. 23; Acts vii. 51), occurs here for the first time. It is generally explained as "obstinate," but rather means "perversive," the metaphor being taken from the horse that stiffens his neck against the pull of the rein, and will not be guided by the rider. The LXX. omit the verse, for no intelligible reason.

(10) Let me alone.—This was not a command to abstain from depreciation, but rather an intimation that depreciation might have power to change God's purpose. Moses was tried by an offer which would have exalted him at the expense of the people. He was allowed to see that he might either sacrifice the people and obtain his own aggrandisement, or deny himself and save them. That he chose the better part redounds to his underlying glory.

I will make of thee a great nation—i.e., I will put thee in the place of Abraham, make thee the father of the faithful, destroy all existing Israelites but thee and thine, and proceed de novo to raise up a "great nation" out of thy loins.

Moses' Reply, and God's "Repentance."

01-19 Moses has three arguments: (1) God has done so much for His people, that surely He will not now make all of none effect (verse 11); (2) their destruction will give a triumph to the Egyptians (verse 12); (3) it will nullify the promises made to Abraham.
spoken of will I give unto your seed, and they shall inherit it for ever. (14) And the Lord repented of the evil which he thought to do unto his people. (15) And Moses turned, and went down from the mount, and the two tables of the testimony were in his hand; the tables were written on both their sides; on the one side and on the other were they written. (16) And the tables were the work of God, and the writing was the writing of God, graven upon the tables. (17) And when Joshua heard the noise of the people as they shouted, he said unto Moses, There is a noise of war in the camp. (18) And he said, It is not the voice of them that shout for mastery, neither is it the voice of them that cry for being overcome; but the noise of them that sing do I hear. (19) And it came to pass, as soon as he came nigh unto the camp, that he saw the calf, and the dancing: and Moses' anger waxed hot, and he cast the tables out of his hands, and brake them beneath the mount. (20) And he took the calf which they had made, and burnt it in the fire, and ground it to powder, and strawed it upon the water, and made the children of Israel drink of it.

The descent of Moses from Sinai, and the suppression of the idolatry.

The tables were written on both their sides. Babylonian tablets and Assyrian monoliths have usually writing on both sides, Egyptian monoliths rarely. It has been calculated that the 172 words of the Decalogue could easily have been inscribed in letters of a fair size on the four surfaces indicated, if the tablets were 27 inches long by 18 inches broad, and that two tablets of this size could readily have been conveyed in a man's two hands (Keil).

The tables were the work of God. Rosenmuller supposes this to mean merely that the size and shape of the stones was prescribed to Moses by God; but the natural meaning of the words is that God Himself fashioned them. This was not the case with the second tables (chap. xxxiv. 1, 4).

The writing was the writing of God. See Note 3 on chap. xxxvi. 18.

When Joshua heard.—Joshua's presence with Moses in the mount has not been indicated since chap. xxiv. 13. But it would seem that when Moses was summoned up into the cloud (chap. xxiv. 16) his faithful 'minister' remained where he was, waiting for his master. He may have found shelter in some "eleft of the rock;" and the manna may have fallen about him, and sufficed for his sustenance during the forty days and nights of his master's absence.

The noise of the people as they shouted.—"Shouting" was a feature of idolatrous rites (1 Kings xviii. 28; Acts xix. 34; Herod. ii. 60, &c.), and was in part a cause, in part a result, of the physical excitement which prevailed during such orgies. Joshua, unsuspecting of the real nature of the shouting, supposed, naturally enough, that the camp was attacked by an enemy, and that the noise was "a noise of war." But Moses, forewarned of the actual state of affairs (verses 7, 8), had probably a shrewd suspicion of the real nature of the sound. He contented himself, however, with negating his minister's conjecture. (19) Shout . . . cry . . . sing.—The Hebrew word is the same in all three clauses. Translate: It is not the voice of them that cry for victory, nor is it the voice of them that cry for defeat; the voice of them that cry do I hear. Moses sense of hearing conveys to him no positive result. We must remember that the camp was still distant, and that the sound was conveyed circuitously, since the descent from the Ras Siisafeh is by a side valley, from which the sight of the plain is shut out (Stanley, Sinai and Palestine, p. 44).

And the dancing.—Comp. xxv. 17. In righteous indignation, but perhaps with some revival of the hot temper which had led him astray in his younger days (chap. ii. 12).

He took the calf.—To suppress the idolatry, the first step was to destroy the idol. Moses, who must have rallied to his side at once a certain number of the people, laid hold of the calf, and ordered its immediate destruction. He had it submitted to the action of fire, whereby its form was destroyed, and the material, as it would seem, calcined. This calcined material he reduced to a fine powder by rubbing or pounding, and then had the powder sprinkled on the surface of the stream which supplied the camp with water, that so the people might seem, at any rate, to swallow their own sin. Compare the action of Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 6, 12). No doubt, the process of destruction took some time. It is not meant that it;
(21) And Moses said unto Aaron, What did this people unto thee, that thou hast brought so great a sin upon them?
(22) And Aaron said, Let not the anger of my lord wax hot: thou knowest the people, that they are set on mischief.
(23) For they said unto me, Make us gods, which shall go before us: for as for this Moses, the man that brought us up out of the land of Egypt, we wot not what is become of him. (24) And I said unto them, Whosoever hath any gold, let them break it off. So they gave it me: then I cast it into the fire, and there came out this calf.
(25) And when Moses saw that the people were naked; (for Aaron had made them naked unto their shame among their enemies:) (26) Then Moses stood in the gate of the camp, and said, Who is on the Lord's side? let him come unto me. And all the sons of Levi gathered themselves together unto him. (27) And he said unto them, Thus saith the Lord God of Israel, Put every man his sword by his side, and go in and out from gate to gate throughout the camp, and slay every man his brother, and every man his companion, and every man his neighbour. (28) And the children of Levi did according to the word of Moses: and there fell of the people that day about three thousand men. (29) And Moses had said, Consecrate yourselves to day to the Lord, even every man upon his son, and upon his brother; that he may bestow upon you a blessing this day. (30) And it came to pass on the morrow, that Moses said unto the people, Ye have sinned a great sin: and now I will go up unto the Lord; peradventure I shall make an atonement for your sin. (31) And Moses returned unto the Lord, and said, Oh, this people have sinned a great sin, and have made them gods of gold. (32) Yet now, if thou wilt forgive their sin--; and if not, blot me, I pray thee, out of thy book which thou hast written. (33) And the Lord said unto Moses, Whosoever hath sinned against me, him will I blot out of my book. (34) Therefore now go, lead the people unto the place of which I have spoken unto thee: behold, mine Angel shall go before thee: nevertheless in the day when I visit I will visit their sin upon them. (35) And the Lord plagued the people, because they made the calf, which Aaron made.

CHAPTER XXXIII. — (1) And the Lord said unto Moses, Depart, and go

The Humiliation of the People at the Threat of God's Withdrawal.

(1-6) If God consented at all to renew His covenant with the people, after they had so flagrantly broken it, the terms on which He would renew it were, in strict justice, purely optional. In the "Book of the Covenant" He had promised to go up with them by an Angel, in whom was His Name (chap. xxiii. 20—23); i.e., by His Son, the Second Person in the Holy Trinity. He now, to mark His displeasure, withdrew this promise, and substituted for the Divine presence that of a mere angel. "I will send an angel before thee" (verse 2); "I will not go up in the midst of thee" (verse 3). Dully the people felt the importance of the change, the vast difference between the angelic and the Divine, and "mourned" their loss (verse 4): mourned with some touch of real godly sorrow, and, as was the custom of the Orientals in mourning (Tertull., Heal. ii. 3, 47; Herodian. iv. 2, &c.), "put off their ornaments."
God will not Go with the People.

EXODUS, XXXIII.

The People Mourn.

Exodus, an or Jebusite I For vrithoiit A from and Isaac, Israel 3, was exodus, being The time mourning lest During the time I xxxji the nations angel These had here it of us it of X. When glanced it the presence, it was the presence, it was the presence, and for Him destroy them; and but for His amazing compassion and forbearance, the result here glanced at would assuredly have followed.

(4) When the people heard these evil tidings, they mourned: and no man did put on him his ornaments. (5) For the Lord had said unto Moses, Say unto the children of Israel, Ye are a stiff-necked people: I will come up into the midst of thee in a moment, and consume thee; therefore now put off thy ornaments from thee, that I may know what to do unto thee. (6) And the children of Israel stripped themselves of their ornaments by the mount Horeb.

(7) And Moses took the tabernacle, and pitched it without the camp, afar off from the camp, and called it the anklets. The Assyrians wore armlets, bracelets, and ear-rings. To strip himself of his ornaments was a great act of self-denial on the part of an Oriental; but it was done commonly in the case of mourning on account of a family bereavement, and sometimes in the case of national misfortunes. (See Note on verses 1—6.) (8) For the Lord had said unto Moses—Rather, And the Lord said unto Moses. The message did not precede the repentance of the people, but followed it.

I will come up into the midst of thee in a moment, and consume thee.—Rather, were I to go up in the midst of thee, even for a moment (a brief space), I should consume thee. The people learnt by this the reason of God's proposed withdrawal. It was in mercy, that they might not be consumed, as there was danger of their being unless they repented and turned to God.

Put off thy ornaments.—Rather, leave off thy ornaments, i.e., put them aside altogether; show thy penitence by giving up the use of them; then shall I know what to do with thee; then shall I be able to deal with thee in a way which otherwise were impossible.

(6) And the children of Israel stripped themselves of their ornaments—i.e., left off their ornaments, ceased to wear them altogether.

By the mount Horeb.—Rather, from mount Horeb, i.e., from the time of their first discarding them in Horeb (= Sinai).

Moses Establishes a Temporary Tabernacle.

(7—11) Moses, having experienced the blessedness of solitary communion with God during the forty days spent on Sinai, felt now, as he had never felt before, the want of a "house of God," whither he might retire for prayer and meditation, secure of being undisturbed. Months would necessarily elapse before the Tabernacle could be constructed according to the pattern which he had seen in the mount. During this interval he determined to make use of one of the existing tents as a "house of prayer," severing it from the others, and giving it the name "Tent of Meeting," which was afterwards appropriated to the Tabernacle. It would seem that he selected his own tent for the purpose—probably because it was the best that the camp afforded—and contented himself with another. God designed to approve his design, and descended in the cloudy pillar on the tent each time that Moses entered it.

(7) Moses took the tabernacle.—Rather, Moses took his tent. The Hebrew article, like the Greek, has Tabernacle of the congregation. And it came to pass, that every one which sought the Lord went out unto the tabernacle of the congregation, which was without the camp. (8) And it came to pass, when Moses went out unto the tabernacle, that all the people rose up, and stood every man at his tent door, and looked after Moses, until he was gone into the tabernacle.

(9) And it came to pass, as Moses entered into the tabernacle, the cloudy pillar descended, and stood at the door of the tabernacle, and the Lord talked with Moses. (10) And all the people saw the cloudy pillar stand at the tabernacle door; and all the people rose up and worshiped, every man in his tent door.

(11) And the Lord spake unto Moses face to face, as a man speaketh unto his friend. And he turned again into the camp: but his servant Joshua, the son of Nun, a young man, departed not out of the tabernacle.

(12) And Moses said unto the Lord, See, thou sayest unto me, Bring up this people: and thou hast not let me know whom thou wilt send with me. Yet thou hast said, I know thee by name, and thou hast also found grace in my sight. (13) Now therefore, I pray thee, if I have found grace in thy sight, shew me now thy way, that I may know thee, that I may find grace in thy sight: and consider that this nation is thy people. (14) And he said, My presence shall go with thee, and I will give thee rest.

(15) And he said unto him, If thy presence go not with me, carry us not up hence. (16) For wherein shall it be known here that I and thy people have found grace in thy sight? is it not in, that thou goest with us? so shall we be separated, I and thy people, from all

Moses Obtains a Renewal of God's Promise to Go Up with the People.

(12) Thou hast not let me know whom thou wilt send.—Moses finds the promises of chaps. xxxii., xxxiii., 2 ambiguous. What is meant by “minos angel” and “an angel”? Is it the “Angel” of chap. xxxii., 20—23, or no? If not, who is it?

I know thee by name.—God had shown this knowledge when He called on Moses out of the burning bush (chap. iii., 4), and again, probably, when He “called unto him out of the midst of the cloud” (chap. xxiv., 16); but the exact phrase had not been used previously. It implies a very high degree of Divine favour. God “knows by name” only those whom He greatly regards.

(15) Show me now thy way.—Thy intention. Let me know if Thou really intendest to withdraw Thyself from us, and put a created being in Thy place or name.

Consider that this nation is thy people.—Moses glances back at God's words recorded in chap. xxxii., 7, and reminds God that the Israelites are not merely his (Moses') people, but also, in a higher sense, God's people. As such, God had acknowledged them (chaps. iii., 7, 10, v. 1, vi. 7, vii. 4, &c.).

My presence shall go with thee.—There is no “with thee” in the original, and consequently the phrase is ambiguous. Moses could not tell whether it was a personal promise to himself, or a renewal of the old engagement to go with the people. He consethe people that are upon the face of the earth.

(17) And the Lord said unto Moses, I will do this thing also that thou hast spoken: for thou hast found grace in my sight, and I know thee by name. (18) And he said, I beseech thee, shew me thy glory. (19) And he said, I will make all my goodness pass before thee, and I will proclaim the name of the Lord before thee; and will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and will shew mercy on whom I will shew mercy. (20) And he said, Thou canst not see my face: for there shall no man see me, and live. (21) And the Lord said, Behold, there is a place by me, and thou shalt stand upon a rock: (22) and it shall come to pass, while my glory passeth by, that I will put thee in a cliff of the rock, and will cover thee with my hand while I pass by: (23) and I will take away mine hand, and thou shalt see my back parts: but my face shall not be seen.

CHAPTER XXXIV. — (1) And the Lord said unto Moses, 6 Hew thee two tables of stone like unto the first: and I will write upon these tables the words

Moses' Request to See God's Glory, and God's Reply to it.

(18—23) Not till he had received full assurance of the people's restoration to favour did Moses prefer any request for himself. Then, however, he made use of the privilege granted him to speak with God, "as a man speaketh unto his friend," in order to obtain a blessing for which his spiritual nature craved, and than which he could conceive nothing more desirable. "Shew me," he said, "I beseech thee, thy glory." All that he had yet seen of God was insufficient—only raised his desire, only sharpened his appetite to see more. He craved for that "beatific vision" which is the final reward of them that are perfected in another world. God could not grant his request in full, for it is impossible so long as we are in the flesh that we should look on God and live. "No man hath seen God at any time" (John i. 18). But He granted all that could be granted. He made "all his goodness pass before" Moses; He gave him a fresh revelation of His name (chap. xxxiv. 6, 7); and He even let him see some actual portion of His "glory"—as much as mortal man could possibly behold—more than any son of man had ever beheld before: more, probably, than any other son of man will ever behold until the consummation of all things (verses 22, 23).

(21) There is a place by me.—A place on the summit of Sinai, where God had been manifesting Himself, is clearly intended; but it is impossible to fix the place with any certainty. Speculations like those of Dr. Robinson (Biblical Researches, Vol. i., p. 153) are of little value.

(22) And will cover thee with my hand.—Kalisch observes with justice that the mysteriousness of this obscure section "attains its highest climax in the three last verses" (verses 21—23). Human language is, by its very nature, unfit for the expression of sublime spiritual truths, and necessarily clothes them in a materialistic garment which is alien to their ethereal nature. All that we can legitimately gather from this verse and the next is that Moses was directed to a certain retired position, where God miraculously both protected him and shrouded him, while a manifestation of His glory passed by of a transcendent character, and that Moses was allowed to see, not the full manifestation, but the sort of after-glow which it left behind, which was as much as human nature could endure.

XXXIV.

Preparations for a Renewal of the Covenant.

(1—4) Before the covenant could be formally re-established, before Israel could be replaced in the position forfeited by the idolatry of the golden calf, it was necessary that the conditions on which God consented to establish His covenant with them should be set forth afresh. Moses had asked for the return of God's favour, but had said nothing of these conditions. It is God who insists on them. "How these two tables." The moral law must be delivered afresh—delivered in its completeness—exactly as at the first (verse 1), and even the ceremonial law must be re-imposed in its main items (verses 12—26), or no return to favour is possible. Hence Moses is summoned once more to the top of Sinai, where the Law is to be delivered afresh to him, and is ordered to bring with him tables of stone like the former ones, to receive their written contents from God's hand.

(1) Hew thee two tables.—Something is always lost by sin, even when it is forgiven. The first tables were "the work of God" (chap. xxiii. 16), the second were hewn by the hand of Moses.

Of stone.—Literally, of stones—hewn, i.e., out of two separate stones, which could not be said of the first tables, since none knew how God had fashioned them.
that were in the first tables, which thou brakest. (3) And be ready in the morning, and come up in the morning unto mount Sinai, and present thyself there to me in the top of the mount. (3) And no man shall come up with thee, neither let any man be seen throughout all the mount; neither let the flocks nor herds feed before that mount.

(4) And he hewed two tables of stone like unto the first; and Moses rose up early in the morning, and went up unto mount Sinai, as the Lord had commanded, and took in his hand the two tables of stone. (5) And the Lord descended in the cloud, and stood with him there, and proclaimed the name of the Lord. (6) And the Lord passed by before him, and proclaimed, The Lord, The Lord God, merciful and gracious, longsuffering, and abounding in goodness and truth, (7) keeping mercy for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, and that will by no means clear the guilty; (8) visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children, and upon the children's children, unto the third and to the fourth generation. (9) And Moses made haste, and bowed his head toward the earth, and worshipped.

And he said, If now I have found grace in thy sight, O Lord, let my Lord, I pray

I will write. — It is quite clear, though some have maintained the contrary, that the second tables, equally with the first, were inscribed "with the finger of God." (Comp. Deut. iv. 13, x. 2, 4.) It is also quite clear that exactly the same words were written on each.

Upon these tables. — Heb., upon the tables.

(2) Be ready in the morning. — It was necessary to allow an interval for the hewing of the stones.

In the top of the mount. — I.e., in the same place as before. (Comp. chaps. xix. 20, xxiv. 12, 18.)

No man shall come up with thee. — These stringent commands were new. On the previous occasion, Aaron, Hur, and the elders had ascended the mount part of the way (chap. xxiv. 9—11); and Joshua had accompanied his master almost to the summit (chap. xxiv. 13), and had apparently remained in some part of the mountain during the whole time of Moses' stay (chap. xxxi. 17). Now Moses was to be quite alone, and no one was to be seen in any part of the mount. The stringency of the new orders must be connected with the promised relation to Moses of God's glory (chap. xxxiii. 21—23).

Moses allowed to see God's Glory.

(5—8) The present ascent of Moses to the top of Sinai had two objects: — (1) The repair of the loss occasioned by his breaking the first tables; and (2) the accomplishment of the promise made to him that under certain restrictions he should "see God's glory." Combined with this promise were two minor ones — that God would make His "goodness" pass before him, and that He would reveal to him afresh His name. The revelation of the name is recorded in verses 6, 7, the manifestation of the glory in verse 5. How Moses was enabled to see God's goodness pass before him is not stated. (Comp. Note on chap. xxxiii. 19.)

(5) The Lord descended in the cloud. — When Moses ceased to commune with God, the cloud removed from the door of the " Tent of Meeting," and, as it would seem, disappeared. On Moses reaching the summit of Sinai it once more became visible, "descended" on the spot where Moses was, "and stood with him there."

And proclaimed the name of the Lord. — Comp. chap. xxxiii. 19; and for the terms of the proclamation see verses 6 and 7.

(6) The Lord passed by before him. — In this brief phrase we have the entire historical narrative of the manifestation to Moses of God's glory. For details we must refer to the terms of the promise (chap. xxxiii. 21—23), which are also characterised by brevity, but still add something to the bare statements of the present passage. Moses was, no doubt, hidden and protected by God's hand in a "shift of the rock" while God's glory passed by. He was only allowed to look out from his hiding-place after the glory had passed, when he saw the remains of it — the "back parts;" even this was, however, so brilliant a vision that it left a permanent light upon his countenance, which he was fain ordinarily to conceal from the people by means of a veil (verses 29—33).

The Lord, The Lord God. — The new "name" of God is not a "name," as we understand the expression; it is rather a description of His nature by means of a series of epithets. At the bush He had revealed His eternal, self-existent character; in the descent on Sinai (chap. xix. 16—19, xx. 18—21) He had shown His terribleness; now, in the act of pardoning His people and taking them once more into favour, He made known His attribute of mercy. The more to impress this feature of His character on Israel, He accumulated epithet on epithet, calling Himself Rakham, "the tender or pitiful one;" Khananam, "the kind or gracious one," who bestows His benefits out of mere favour; Erchappayim, "the long-suffering one;" Rob khesed, "the great in mercy;" Notsar khesed, "the keeper of mercy;" and Nissan, "the forgiver of iniquity." Still, to prevent the fatal misconception that He is a Being of pure and mere benevolence (Butler, Analogy, Part I., chap. ii., p. 41), He added, to complete the description, a reference to His justice. He "will by no means clear the guilty" (comp. Nahum i. 3), and will "visit iniquity to the third and fourth generation." (Comp. chap. xx. 5.)

Moses made haste, and bowed his head. — As the Divine glory passed before him, Moses bowed his head in adoration, worshipping God, and not daring to look until the glory had gone by. It is thus seen that with his ardent desire to look into the things of God he combined the highest and deepest reverence.

The Covenant renewed, and the Decalogue a Second Time given.

(9) If now I have found grace in thy sight. — Rather, Since now, &c. The evidences of God's favour towards him — which Moses had now experienced, emboldened him to prefer fresh requests on behalf EXODUS, XXXIV.

Covenant with Israel.

God Renews his

EXODUS, XXXIV.

Covenant with Israel.

thee, go among us; for it is a stiffnecked people; and pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us for thine inheritance.

(10) And he said, Behold, * I make a covenant: before all thy people I will do marvels, such as have not been done in all the earth, nor in any nation: and all the people among which thou art shall see the work of the Lord; for it is a terrible thing that I will do with thee. (11) Observe thou that which I command thee this day: behold, I drive out before thee the Amorite, and the Canaanite, and the Hittite, and the Perizzite, and the Hivite, and the Jebusite. (12) * Take heed to thyself, lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land whither thou goest, lest it be for a snare in the midst of thee: (13) but ye shall destroy their altars, break their images, and cut down their groves: (14) for thou shalt worship no other God: for the Lord, whose name is Jealous, is a * jealous God: (15) lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, and they go a whoring after their gods, and do sacrifice unto their gods, and one call thee, and thou eat of his sacrifice; (16) and thou take of + their daughters unto thy sons, and their daughters go a whoring after their gods, and make thy sons go a whoring after their gods.

of the people. God has promised to go up in the midst of them; will He not also promise to forgive their iniquity and sin if they offend Him in the way, and permanently to attach them to Himself by making them “ His inheritance?” God does not directly answer these prayers, but indirectly accepts them by renewing His covenant with Israel (verses 10, 27).

(19) I make a covenant—i.e., “I lay down afarsh the terms of the covenant which I am content to make with Israel. I will go with them, and drive out the nations before them (verse 11), and work miracles on their behalf (verse 10), and enlarge their borders (verse 24), and prevent their enemies from desiring their land at the festival seasons (verse 24); they, on the part, must ‘observe that which I command them this day.’” The “command” given included the moral law, as laid down in the Ten Commandments (verse 28), and a summary of the chief points contained in the “Book of the Covenant,” which must be regarded as a re-publication and re-authorisation of that book.

Marvels, such as have not been done in all the earth—e.g., the drying up of Jordan (Josh. iii. 16, 17), the falling down of the walls of Jericho (Josh. vi. 20), the destruction of the army of the five kings by hailstones (Josh. x. 11), and the like.

A terrible thing.—Comp. Deut. x. 21; Ps. evi. 22, cxlv. 6. God is “terrible” to the enemies of His People.

(1) The Amorite, and the Canaanite . . .

—The same six nations are particularised in chap. iii. 8, 17, in chap. xxi. 23, and also in chap. xxiii. 2. In Deut. vii. 1, and Josh. iii. 10, xxiv. 11, the Ger- gashites are added, and the number of the nations made seven.

(12-16) This passage may be compared with chap. xxiii. 24, 25, 32, 33. It repeats, with some enlargements, the enactments there made, and traces in detail the evil consequences which would follow from a neglect of the enactments.

(13) A snare.—Comp. chap. xxiii. 33; and for the nature of the snare, see verses 15, 16 of the present chapter.

(15, 16) Lest thou make a covenant with the inhabitants.—If a covenant were made with the idolatrous nations of Canaan, and they were allowed to dwell in the land together with the Israelites (chap. xxiii. 33), the danger would be, in the first place, that Thou shalt make thee no molten gods.

The feast of a unleavened bread shalt thou keep. Seven days shalt thou eat unleavened bread, as I commanded thee, in the time of the month Abib: for in the month Abib thou camest out from Egypt.

All that openeth the matrix is mine; and every firstling among thy cattle, whether ox or sheep, that is male, shall be the Lord's; but if thou redeem him, then shalt thou break his neck. All the firstborn of thy house shalt thou redeem. And none shall appear before me empty.

Six days shalt thou work, but on the seventh day thou shalt rest: in earing time and in harvest thou shalt rest.

And thou shalt observe the feast of weeks, of the firstfruits of wheat harvest, and the feast of ingathering at the year's end.

Thrice in the year shall all your men children appear before the Lord, God, the God of Israel. For I will cast out the nations before thee, and enlarge thy borders: neither shall any man desire thy land, when thou shalt go up to appear before the Lord thy God thrice in the year.

 Thou shalt not offer the blood of my sacrifice with leaven; neither shall the sacrifice of the feast of the passover be left unto the morning.
The Second Tables Given.

EXODUS, XXXIV.

Moses' Face Shines.

The first of the firstfruits of thy land thou shalt bring unto the house of the Lord thy God.

Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother’s milk.

And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words; for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel.

And he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments.

And it came to pass, when Moses came down from mount Sinai with the two tables of testimony in Moses’ hand, when he came down from the mount, that Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone while he talked with him.

And when Aaron and all the children of Israel saw Moses, behold, the skin of his face shone; and they were afraid to come nigh him.

And Moses called unto them; and Aaron and all the rulers of the congregation returned unto him: and Moses talked with them.

And afterward all the children of Israel came nigh: and he gave them in commandment all that the Lord had spoken with him in mount Sinai.

And till Moses had done speaking with them, he put a vail on his face.

But when Moses went in before the Lord to speak with

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>The Second Tables Given</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Exodus, XXXIV.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Ex. 20:18; Deut. 4:12.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>And the Lord said unto Moses, Write thou these words; for after the tenor of these words I have made a covenant with thee and with Israel.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Ex. 20:19; Deut. 9:9.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>And he was there with the Lord forty days and forty nights; he did neither eat bread, nor drink water. And he wrote upon the tables the words of the covenant, the ten commandments.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Ex. 34:1.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>And it came to pass, when Moses came down from mount Sinai with the two tables of testimony in Moses’ hand, when he came down from the mount, that Moses wist not that the skin of his face shone while he talked with him.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Deut. 10:4.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>And when Aaron and all the children of Israel saw Moses, behold, the skin of his face shone; and they were afraid to come nigh him.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Ex. 34:28.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>And Moses called unto them; and Aaron and all the rulers of the congregation returned unto him: and Moses talked with them.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Deut. 10:32.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>And afterward all the children of Israel came nigh: and he gave them in commandment all that the Lord had spoken with him in mount Sinai.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Ex. 34:29.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>And till Moses had done speaking with them, he put a vail on his face.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Ex. 34:30.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>But when Moses went in before the Lord to speak with</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>
EXODUS, XXXV.  The People Invited to Offer.

CHAPTER XXXV.—(1) And Moses gathered all the congregation of the children of Israel together, and said unto them, These are the words which the Lord hath commanded, that ye should do them. (2) Six days shall work be done, but on the seventh day there shall be to you an holy day, a sabbath of rest to the Lord: whosoever doth work therein shall be put to death. (3) Ye shall kindle no fire throughout your habitations upon the sabbath day.

(1) And Moses spake unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, saying, This is the thing which the Lord commanded, saying, (3) Take ye from done speaking with them, he put a vail on his face." The vail became part of his ordinary costume, and was worn excepting upon occasions of two kinds: (1) When Moses was alone with God, either in the temporary "tent of meeting" or in the permanent Tabernacle, he ceased to wear the vail, and spoke with God face to face; (2) when he had a message to the people from God, and spoke to them as God's representative, he authenticated his message by veiling himself, and allowing the glory of his face to be seen. Otherwise, in his ordinary dealings with the people he went about veiled.

XXV.

Iteration of the Law Concerning the Sabbath.

(1-3) Moses, being about to require the people to engage in the work, first, of constructing the materials for the Tabernacle, and then of rearing the Tabernacle itself, prefaced his requirements by a renewed promulgation of the law of the Sabbath, with additional particularity, and with a new sanction. The necessity of such a re-promulgation was indicated to him in the last injunctions received before his first descent from Sinai (chap. xxxii. 12-17), and in acting as he now did, he must be viewed as carrying out those injunctions. The words here put on record are probably not the whole that he said to the people on the subject, but only some main points of his speech. He can scarcely have omitted to tell them that the Sabbath was to be henceforth a "sign" between God and His people (chap. xxxii. 17).

(1) Those are the words.—Verse 2 is, in the main, a repetition of chap. xxxii. 15, but verse 3 is new, or, at any rate, only contained by implication in any previous legislation. Kindling fire was in early times a hard piece of manual work, being effected by the friction of two pieces of dry wood.

The People Invited to Offer the Materials of the Tabernacle, and to Assist in the Work.

(4-9) And Moses spake.—This passage is the sequence and counterpart of chap. xxi. 1-7, and follows exactly the same order in the enumeration of the required offerings. Both passages equally declare the three gift now of an acceptable offering to be a "willing heart" (chaps. xxii. 2, xxxv. 5).

(10-15) And every wise hearted among you.—The first appeal is to all; all may contribute something towards the materials of the sacred structure. But the second appeal is to some only. The "wise-hearted" alone can take part in the actual construction, and "make all that the Lord hath commanded." On the expression "wise-hearted," see Note on chap. xxviii. 3. It includes skill of various kinds and degrees, even that of poor women, who "did spin with their hands, and brought that which they had spun, both of blue, and of purple, and of scarlet, and of fine linen" (verse 25). In enumerating the things to be constructed, Moses follows, not the order of the revelations made to him, but what may be called the natural order: first, the Tabernacle as a whole; then its various parts (verse 11); after this, its contents—those of the Holy of Holies (verse 12), of the Holy Place (verses 13-15), and of the Court (verses 16-18); finally, the dress to be worn by those who conducted the services (verse 19). On the Tabernacle and its parts, see chap. xxxi. 1-57; on the Ark, the staves, and the mercy-seat, chap. xxxv. 10-15; on the "veil of the covering," chap. xxxi. 31; on the table and the candle-doors at the entering in of the tabernacle, (20) the altar of burnt offering, with his brasure grate, his staves, and all his vessels, the laver and his foot, (21) the hangings of the court, his pillars, and their sockets, and the hanging for the door of the court, (22) the pins of the tabernacle, and the pins of the court, and their cords, (23) the cloths of service, to do service in the holy place, the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and the garments of his sons, to minister in the priest's office.
The Responses of the People EXODUS, XXXV.

(24) And all the congregation of the children of Israel departed from the presence of Moses. (25) And they came, every one whose heart stirred him up, and every one whom his spirit made willing, and they brought the Lord's offering to the work of the tabernacle of the congregation, and for all his service, and for the holy garments. (26) And they came, both men and women, as stick, chap. xxi. 23—30; on the incese altar, chap. xxx. 1—10; on the anointing oil, chap. xxxi. 23—25; on the sweet incense, chap. xxxiv. 34, 35; on the hanging for the door, chap. xxvi. 36; on the altar of burnt offering, chap. xxvii. 1—8; on the laver and its foot, chap. xxxv. 17—21; on the hangings of the Court, its pillars, sockets, pins, &c., chap. xxviii. 9—19; and on "the cloths of service," chap. xxviii. 2—12. (On the true meaning of the expression, "cloths of service," see Note on chap. xxxi. 10.)

The Zeal of the People in Offering and Assisting in the Work.

(27) They came, every one whose heart stirred him up. — All classes came, men and women "(verse 22), rich and poor, "rulers" (verse 27), and those whose only skill was to "spin with their hands" (verse 25). And the great majority gave freely — to the utmost of their power. Still it is implied, both here and in verses 22, 29, that there were some whose hearts did not stir them up. Enough and to spare, was, however, contributed, and at last the people had to be "restrained from bringing" (chap. xxxv. 8).

The Lord's offering — i.e., "their offering to Jehovah."

(28) Both men and women . . . brought bracelets . . . . — It is not quite certain what the personal ornaments here mentioned are. The LXX, renders σφραγίζειν, και ἑντάξει, καὶ διστατούν, καὶ ἑμπᾶλομα, καὶ περιπέτεια, "signets, and earrings, and rings, and chains, and armlets," substituting five terms for four. Rosenmuller thinks the κυκλή was a "nose ring," others make it a "brooch" or "buckle." The last word of the four, κυκλή, cannot possibly mean "tablets." It comes from a root signifying "rounded," and designates probably a bead necklace, such as was often worn by the Egyptians. On the use of personal ornaments by the Hebrew men, as well as women, see Note on chap. xxxii. 2.

Jewels of gold.—Literally, articles of gold.

And every man that offered, offered an offering of gold. — By repeating the word "offered," our translators have spoiled the sense. Moses is enumerating those who came. There came those who offered bracelets, earrings, rings, &c.; there came also those who offered any (other) offering of gold to the Lord.

(29) Red skins of rams. — Rather, rams' skins dyed red, as the same words are translated in chaps. xxv. 5, xxxv. 7.

Badgers' skins. — See Note 2 on chap. xxv. 5.

(30) An offering of silver. — Silver had been enumerated among the offerings which would be accepted (chaps. xxv. 3, xxxv. 5), and it was therefore brought: but it is difficult to say what was done with it. All the silver actually employed in the sanctuary came from the half-shekels paid when the people were numbered. (See chap. xxviii. 25—28.) Perhaps the silver free-will offerings were returned to the donors.

(31) All the women that were wise-hearted — i.e., "all who had sufficient skill." Spinning was probably a very general accomplishment of the Hebrew women. It was effected in early times by means of a wheel and spindle, with or without a distaff. The only materials used for the fabrics of the sanctuary appear to have been flax and goats' hair. The flax was dyed before it was spun into thread, as sometimes by the Greeks (Hom. Od. iv. 133).

Of fine linen. — Rather, of white. Most of the Egyptian linen is of a yellowish white, being made from flax imperfectly bleached.

(32) All the women whose heart stirred them up in wisdom spun goats' hair. — It would seem to have been more difficult to produce a thread from goats' hair than from flax. Only the most skilful undertook the more difficult task.

(33) The rulers brought onyx stones, and stones to be set. — The "rulers" here intended are probably the "princes of the tribes" of Israel (Num. i. 16, ii. 3, 5, &c.). The twelve stones required for the many as were willing hearted, and brought bracelets, and earrings, and rings, and tablets, all jewels of gold; and every man that offered an offering of gold unto the Lord. (34) And every man, with whom was found blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine linen, and goats' hair, and red skins of rams, and badgers' skins, brought them.

(35) Every one that did offer an offering of silver and brass brought the Lord's offering: and every man, with whom was found shittim wood for any work of the service, brought it. (36) And all the women whose heart stirred them up in wisdom spun goats' hair. (37) And the rulers brought onyx stones, and stones to be set, for the ephod, and for the breastplate;
The breastplate would naturally be contributed by the twelve chiefs of the tribes whose names they were to bear (chap. xxviii. 21). The two onyx stones for the ephod (chap. xxviii. 9–12), may have been the further gift of two of the number, who happened to possess stones of the large size needed.

And Moses said unto the children of Israel, See, the Lord hath called by name Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah; and he hath filled him with the spirit of God, in wisdom, in understanding, and in knowledge, and in all manner of workmanship; and to devise curious works, to work in gold, and in silver, and in brass, and in the cutting of stones, to set them, and in carving of wood, to make any manner of cunning work. And he hath put in his heart that he may teach, both he, and Aholiab, the son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. Then hath he filled with wisdom of heart, to work all manner of work, of the engraver, and of the cunning workman, and of the embroiderer, in blue, and in purple, in scarlet, and in fine linen, and of the weaver, even of them that do any work, and of those that devise cunning work.

CHAPTER XXXVI. — (1) Then wrought Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wise hearted man, in whom the Lord put wisdom and understanding to know how to work all manner of work for the service of the sanctuary, according to all that the Lord had commanded.

(2) And Moses called Bezaleel and Aholiab, and every wise hearted man, in whose heart the Lord had put wisdom, even every one whose heart stirred him up to come unto the work to do it: and they received of Moses all the offering, which the children of Israel had brought for the work of the service of the sanctuary, to make it withal.

THE WORK COMMENCED AND THE LIBERALITY OF THE PEOPLE RESTRAINED.

(1) This verse is introductory to the entire section, which may be viewed as extending from the present point to the close of chap. xxxix. It states, in brief, that Bezaleel and Aholiab, with the skilled workmen at their disposal, proceeded to the accomplishment of the work which Moses had committed to them, and effected it "according to all that the Lord had commanded," i.e., according to the instructions given to Moses in Mount Sinai, and recorded in chaps. xxv.—xxxv. The entire section is little more than a repetition of those chapters, differing from them merely in recording as done that which had in them been ordered to be done. The minute exactness of the repetition is very remarkable, and seems intended to teach the important lesson, that acceptable obedience consists in a complete and exact observance of God's commandments in all respects down to the minutest point.

Moses called Bezaleel—that is, Moses summoned Bezaleel, Aholiab, and their chief assistants, into his presence, and committed to them the offerings which he had received from the people (verse 3)—the gold, the silver, the bronze, the shittim wood, the thread, the goats' hair, the rams' skins, the seals' skins, the precious stones, the oil, the spices, &c. "They received of Moses all the offering" that had been hitherto brought. (3) They brought yet unto him free offerings.—The liberality of the people continued. After the work was taken in hand, and making progress, they kept still bringing in fresh offerings morning after morning, until the workmen found that they had more than enough. Compare the liberality shown when...
And they brought yet unto him free offerings every morning.

(4) And all the wise men, that wrought all the work of the sanctuary, came every man from his work which they made; (5) and they spake unto Moses, saying, The people bring much more than enough for the service of the work, which the Lord commanded to make. (6) And Moses gave commandment, and they caused it to be proclaimed throughout the camp, saying, Let neither man nor woman make any more work for the offering of the sanctuary. So the people were restrained from bringing. (7) For the stuff they had was sufficient for all the work to make it, and too much.

(6) And every wise hearted man among them that wrought the work of the tabernacle, made ten curtains of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet: with cherubims of cunning work made he them. (8) The length of one curtain was twenty and eight cubits, and the breadth of one curtain four cubits: the curtains were all of one size. (9) And he coupled the five curtains one unto another: and the other five curtains he coupled one unto another. (10) And he made loops of blue on the edge of one curtain from the selvedge in the coupling: likewise he made in the uttermost side of another curtain, in the coupling of the second. (12) Fifty loops made he in one curtain, and fifty loops made he in the edge of the curtain which was in the coupling of the second: the loops held one curtain to another. (13) And he made fifty taches of gold, and coupled the curtains one unto another with the taches: so it became one tabernacle.

David was collecting materials for the Temple (1 Chron. xxix. 6—9); and, again, when Zerubbabel was about to rear up the second Temple on the return from the Captivity (Ezra ii. 68—70; Neh. vii. 70—72).

(6) So the people were restrained from giving.—Moses felt it necessary to interfere, and forbid further offerings. By the expression, "Let neither man nor woman make any more work, it would seem that the superfluous offerings were chiefly such things as were produced by labour—thread, goats' hair, and the like. (See chap. xxxv, 25, 26.) The humblest class of contributors would thus appear to have shown itself the most zealous. When will Christian liberality be so excessive as to require to be "restrained."?

The Construction of the Tabernacle.

(8—13) This passage follows exactly chap. xxvi. 1—6, the tenses of the verbs alone being changed. It relates the construction of the inner covering.

(14—18) The construction of the outer covering of goats' hair follows, and is expressed in terms nearly identical with those used in chap. xxvi. 7—11. Verse 14 is better rendered than that to which it corresponds in the previous passage (verse 7). There are two omissions of short clauses for the sake of brevity.

(19) This verse corresponds exactly to chap. xxvi. 14, and relates the construction of the two outer coverings.

(20—34) After the construction of the roof, that of the walls is described, the order of chap. xxvi. being gather at the head thereof, to one ring: thus he did to both of them in both the corners. (30) And there were eight boards; and their sockets were sixteen sockets of silver, 1 under every board two sockets. (31) And he made bars of shittim wood; five for the boards of the one side of the tabernacle, (32) and five bars for the boards of the other side of the tabernacle, and five bars for the boards of the tabernacle for the sides westward. (33) And he made the middle bar to shoot through the boards from the one end to the other. (34) And he overlaid the boards with gold, and made their rings of gold to be places for the bars, and overlaid the bars with gold. (35) And he made a vail of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen; with cherubims made he it of cunning work. (36) And he made thereunto four pillars of shittim wood, and overlaid them with gold: their hooks were of gold; and he cast for them four sockets of silver. (37) And he made an hanging for the tabernacle door of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen; 2 of needlework; (38) and the five pillars of it with their hooks; and he overlaid their chapiters and their fillets with gold: but their five sockets were of brass.

CHAPTER XXXVII.—(1) And Bezaleel 3 made the ark of shittim wood: two cubits and a half was the length of it, and a cubit and a half the breadth of it, and a cubit and a half the height of it: (2) and he overlaid it with pure gold within and without, and made a crown of gold to it round about. (3) And he cast for it four rings of gold, to be set by the four corners of it; even two rings upon the one side of it, and two rings upon the other side of it. (4) And he made staves of shittim wood, and overlaid them with gold. (5) And he put the staves into the rings by the sides of the ark, to bear the ark. (6) And he made the mercy seat of pure gold: two cubits and a half was the length thereof, and one cubit and a half the breadth thereof. (7) And he made two cherubims of gold, beaten out of one piece made he them, on the two ends of the mercy seat: (8) one cherub on the end on this side, and another cherub on the other end on that side: out of the mercy seat made he the cherubims on the two ends thereof. (9) And the cherubims spread out their wings on high, and covered with their wings over the mercy seat, with their faces one to another; even to the mercy seatward were the faces of the cherubims. (10) And he made the table of shittim wood: two cubits was the length thereof, and a cubit the breadth thereof, and a cubit and a half the height thereof: (11) and he overlaid it with pure gold, and made thereunto a crown of gold round about. (12) Also he made thereunto a border of an handbreadth round about; and made a crown of gold for Either God had given no order on this point, or Moses had omitted to record it.

XXXVII.

(1—24) This passage corresponds with verses 10—39 of chap. xxvi., and contains an account of the construction of the holy furniture: (1) That of the Holy of Holies; viz., the ark (verses 1—5), the mercy-seat (verses 6—9); (2) that of the Holy Place, viz., the table of shewbread (verses 10—16) and the golden candlestick (verses 17—24).

Verses 1—5 correspond to verses 10—14 of chap. xxv.

" 6—9 " " 17—20 " "
" 10—16 " " 21—29 " "
" 17—24 " " 31—39 " "

(3) Bezaleel made.—Ahohab had no part in the construction of the furniture of the Tabernacle, but only in the coverings, the veil, the curtains, and the priests’ dresses. (See chap. xxxviii. 23.)

(7) Beaten out of one piece.—Rather, of beaten work, as the word is translated in chap. xxvi. 18.
the border thereof round about. (13) And he cast for it four rings of gold, and put the rings upon the four corners that were in the four feet thereof. (14) Over against the border were the rings, the places for the staves to bear the table. (15) And he made the staves of shittim wood, and overlaid them with gold, to bear the table. (16) And he made the vessels which were upon the table, his a dishes, and his spoons, and his bowls, and his covers 5 to cover withal, of pure gold.

(17) And he made the 6 candlestick of pure gold: of beaten work made he the candlestick; his shaft, and his branch, his bowls, his knops, and his flowers, were of the same: (18) and six branches going out of the sides thereof; three branches of the candlestick out of the one side thereof, and three branches of the candlestick out of the other side thereof: (19) three bowls made after the fashion of almonds in one branch, a knob and a flower; and three bowls made like almonds in another branch, a knob and a flower: so throughout the six branches going out of the candlestick. (20) And in the candlestick were four bowls made like almonds, his knobs, and his flowers: (21) and a knob under two branches of the same, and a knob under two branches of the same, and a knob under two branches of the same, according to the six branches going out of it. (22) Their knobs and their branches were of the same: all of it was one beaten work of pure gold. (23) And he made his seven lamps, and his snuffers, and his snuffdishes, of pure gold. (24) Of a talent of pure gold made he it, and all the vessels thereof.

(25) And he made the incense altar of shittim wood: the length of it was a cubit, and the breadth of it a cubit; it was foursquare; and two cubits was the height of it; the horns thereof were of the same. (26) And he overlaid it with pure gold, both the top of it, and the sides thereof round about, and the horns of it: also he made unto it a crown of gold round about. (27) And he made two rings of gold for it under the crown thereof, by the two corners of it, upon the two sides thereof, to be places for the staves to bear it withal. (28) And he made the staves of shittim wood, and overlaid them with gold.

(29) And he made 4 the holy anointing oil, and the pure incense of sweet spices, according to the work of the apothecary.

CHAPTER XXXVIII.—(1) And he made the altar of burnt offering of shittim wood: five cubits was the length thereof, and five cubits the breadth thereof; it was foursquare; and three cubits the height thereof. (2) And he made the horns thereof on the four corners of it; the horns thereof were of the same: and he overlaid it with brass. (3) And he made all the vessels of the altar, the pots, and the shovels, and the basins, and the fleshhooks, and the firepans: all the vessels thereof made he of brass. (4) And he made for the altar a brassen grate of network under the compass thereof beneath unto the midst of it. (5) And he cast four rings

(16) Which were upon the table.—Or, which belonged to the table (τὰ ὑπὸ τῆς τραπεζῆς—LXX.).

(19) Another branch.—A right translation—an improvement on "the other branch" of chap. xxv. 33. The meaning is that there was the same style of ornamentation in all the branches.

(25—26) And he made . . .—The order of the instructions given on Mount Sinai is here departed from. In them the directions for the altar of incense were separated off from those concerning the table of shewbread and the golden candlestick. Here the construction of the three pieces of furniture belonging to the Holy Place is given consecutively. The present passage corresponds with verses 1—5 of chap. xxxv., with which it is in the closest agreement.

(26) In this verse we have the composition by Bezaleel of the holy oil and the incense, described in chap. xxx. 22—25 and 34, 35, related with the utmost brevity.
for the four ends of the grate of brass, to be places for the staves. (6) And he made the staves of shittim wood, and overlaid them with brass. (7) And he put the staves into the rings on the sides of the altar, to bear it withal; he made the altar hollow with boards. (8) And he made the laver of brass, and the foot of it of brass, of the 1 lookingglasses of the women 2 assembling, which assembled at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. (9) And he made the court: on the south side southward the hangings of the court were of fine twined linen, an hundred cubits: (10) Their pillars were twenty, and their brason sockets twenty; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets were of silver. (11) And for the north side the hangings were an hundred cubits, their pillars were twenty, and their sockets of brass twenty; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver. (12) And for the west side were hangings of fifty cubits, their pillars ten, and their sockets ten; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver. (13) And for the east side eastward fifty cubits. (14) The hangings of the one side of the gate were fifteen cubits; their pillars three, and their sockets three. (15) And for the other side of the court gate, on this hand and that hand, were hangings of fifteen cubits; their pillars three, and their sockets three. (16) All the hangings of the court round about were of fine twined linen. (17) And the sockets for the pillars were of brass; the hooks of the pillars and their fillets of silver; and the overlaying of their chapiters of silver; and all the pillars of the court were filleted with silver. (18) And the hanging for the gate of the court was needlework, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen: and twenty cubits was the length, and the height in the breadth was five cubits, answerable to the hangings of the court. (19) And their pillars were four, and their sockets of brass four; their hooks of silver, and the overlaying of their chapiters and their fillets of silver. (20) And all the pins of the tabernacle, and of the court round about, wereof brass. (21) This is the sum of the tabernacle, even of the tabernacle of testimony, as it was counted, according to the commandment of Moses, for the service of the Levites, by the hand of Ithamar, son to Aaron the priest. (22) And Bezaleel the son of Uri, the son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah, made all that the Lord commanded Moses. (23) And with him was Aholab, son of Ahisamuch, of placed for removal from the sanctuary. (See Note 1 on chap. xxvii. 3.)

(8) He made the laver of brass.—Comp. chap. xxx. 18—21, where the laver is commanded, and the uses whereof it was to be applied are laid down. By “brass” we must understand “bronze” in this place, as in others.

Of the lookingglasses.—Rather, mirrors. The mirrors used in ancient times were not of glass, but of burnished metal. Bronze was the metal ordinarily employed for the purpose, and was in common use in Egypt, where mirrors were bronze plates, round or oval, with a handle, like our fire-screen. The Etruscan women employed similar articles in their toilets, and had them often delicately chased with engravings.

Of the women assembling.—It would seem that these women—the women went to frequent the “tent of meeting” which Moses had recently set up (chap. xxxviii. 7), and to flock thither in troops—offered voluntarily for the service of God the mirrors, which were among the most highly prized of their possessions. Moses, to mark his approval of their devotion, formed their offerings into the most honourable of all the brazen vessels, and recorded the fact to the women’s credit.

(9—20) The construction of the court follows upon that of the furniture which it contained. The passage runs parallel with chap. xxvii. 9—19.

(17) The overlaying of their chapiters of silver.—Just as in chap. xxxvi. 38, we are informed that Moses, travelling beyond the letter of his instructions, overlaid the capitals of the pillars at the door of the Tabernacle itself with gold, so now we find that, without any express orders, he overlaid those at the door of the court with silver. In each case he was probably following his remembrance of the pattern seen in the mount (chap. xxv. 9, 40).

The SUM of the Gold, Silver, and Bronze EMPLOYED in the TABERNACLE.

(21) This is the sum.—Kalahsch translates, “These are the accounts”; Canon Cook, “This is the reckoning.” The expression recurs in Numb. xxvi. 63.

The tabernacle of testimony—i.e., the dwelling which was to contain God’s “testimony “ against sin—the Ten Commandments.

For the service of the Levites.—Rather, a service of the Levites: i.e., a service which they rendered “by the hand,” or through the instrumentality of Ithamar. Ithamar was the youngest of the sons of Aaron (chap. vi. 23).

(22) Aholab ... an engraver.—This is a mistranslation. Kharâsh means a worker in any material whatsoever. It should be rendered artificer, as it is in 1 Chron. xix. 5; 2 Chron. xxiv. 11.

A cunning workman.—Literally, a deviseur; but the root is used especially of the devising of textile the tribe of Dan, an engraver, and a cunning workman, and an embroiderer in blue, and in purple, and in scarlet, and fine linen.

(24) All the gold that was occupied for the work in all the work of the holy place, even the gold of the offering, was ten talents, and seven hundred and thirty shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary.

(25) And the silver of them that were numbered of the congregation was an talent and three hundred shekels, after the
shekel of the sanctuary:

(26) a bekah for every man, that is, half shekel, after the shekel of the sanctuary, for every one that went to be numbered, from twenty years old and upward, for six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty men. (27) And of the hundred talents of silver were cast the sockets of the sanctuary, and the sockets of the vail; an hundred talents of the hundred talents, a talent for a socket.

(28) And of the thousand seven hundred seventy and five shekels he made hooks for the pillars, and overlaid their chapters, and filleted them.

(29) And the brass of the offering was seventy talents, and two thousand and four hundred shekels. (30) And therewith he made the sockets to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the brazen altar, and the brazen

From twenty years old and upward.—See Note on chap. xxx. 14.

Six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty.—The identity of this number with that which is given in Numb. i. 46, as arrived at “in the second year, on the first day of the second month” (Numb. i. 1), is best explained by regarding both passages as having reference to the same transaction. The taking of the census occupied several months, during which the money was gradually collected, the sockets, &c., made, and the Tabernacle set up. The registration was deferred, and took place on a single day, when Moses and Aaron went round the tribes, received the results from their hands, and entered them in a book. It appears from Numb. i.
47 that the Levites were not counted in the sum total, no atonement money being taken from them.
(See Birks’ Exodus of Israel, pp. 118—120.)

The sockets of the sanctuary.—On these, see chap. xxvi. 19, 21, 25. They consisted of forty for each side, and sixteen for the western end—total, ninety-six.

The sockets of the vail.—On these, see chap.
xxvi. 32. They were four in number, and supported the four pillars on which the vail was hung. Thus the total number of the silver sockets was, as the text expresses, one hundred.

Hooks for the pillars.—The pillars of the court had hooks of silver to which the hangings were attached (chaps. xxvii. 10, 17, xxxviii. 10—12).

Their chapiters.—Comp. vers. 17 and 19.

The brass of the offering—i.e., the bronze which the people had offered in consequence of the invitation addressed to them by Moses (chap. xxx. 5, 24).

Seventy talents.—No great quantity was needed, since bronze was only required for the later, for the altar of burnt offering and its vessels, for the sockets of the Tabernacle gate, for those of the court, and for the “pins,” or pegs, both of the court and the Tabernacle.

The sockets to the door of the tabernacle.—See chap. xxvii. 37.

The brazen altar . . . the brazen grate.—
Comp. chap. xxvii. 2—6.

The vessels of the altar.—See chaps. xxvii. 3, xxxviii. 3.

fabrics. (See chaps. xxvi. 1, 31, xxvii. 6, 15, xxviii. 3, 35, xxxix. 3, &c.)

All the gold that was occupied for the work.—Rather, that was made use of for the work.

The gold of the offering, was twenty and nine talents.—The gold talent is estimated by Poole as — 10,000 shekels, and the gold shekel as worth about £1 2s. of our money. In this case the gold employed in the Tabernacle would have been worth nearly £320,000. Some, however, reduce the estimate to £275,000 (Cook), and others to £132,000 (Theins).
In any case the amount was remarkable, and indicated at once the liberal spirit which animated the people and the general feeling that a lavish expenditure was required by the occasion. There is no difficulty in supposing that the Israelites possessed at the time gold to the (highest) value estimated, since they had carried with them out of Egypt, besides their ancestral wealth, a vast amount of gold and silver ornaments, freely given to them by the Egyptians (chaps. iii. 22, xii. 35, 36).

The silver . . . was an hundred talents.
—The silver talent contained 3,000 shekels, as all allow, and as appears from the present passage. If the “shekel of the sanctuary” weighed, as is generally supposed, about 220 grains troy, the value of the silver contributed would have been £40,000, or a little under. It was contributed by “them that were numbered of the congregation,” each of whom paid a bekah, or half a shekel. (See above, chap. xxx. 12—16.)

A bekah for every man.—The word “bekah” means simply a half, but appears to have been restricted in its use to the half-shekel. (Comp. Gen. xxiv. 22.) The exegetical clause, “half a shekel,” is probably a later addition to the text, inserted to clear the sense.

For every one that went to be numbered.—
It is remarkable that the principle of compulsory payment towards the fabric of the sanctuary should have received a sanction at the very time when the greatest stress was laid upon the greater acceptableness of voluntary offerings. (See chaps. xxv. 2, xxv. 5, 21—23.) Whatever may be thought of the expediency of levying church-rates, they are clearly defensible in principle, both from the standpoint of the Old Testament and of the New (Matt. xvii. 24—27).
grate for it, and all the vessels of the altar, (31) and the sockets of the court round about, and the sockets of the court gate, and all the pins of the tabernacle, and all the pins of the court round about.

CHAPTER XXXIX.—(1) And of the blue, and purple, and scarlet, they made cloths of service, to do service in the holy place, and made the holy garments for Aaron; as the Lord commanded Moses. (2) And he made the ephod of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen. (3) And they did beat the gold into thin plates, and cut it into wires, to work it in the blue, and in the purple, and in the scarlet, and in the fine linen, with cunning work. (4) They made shoulderpieces for it, to couple it together: by the two edges was it coupled together. (5) And the curious girdle of his ephod, that was upon it, was of the same, according to the work thereof; of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen; as the Lord commanded Moses.

(6) And they wrought onyx stones inclosed inouches of gold, graven, as signets are graven, with the names of the children of Israel. (7) And he put them on the shoulders of the ephod, that they should be stones for a memorial to the children of Israel; as the Lord commanded Moses.

(8) And he made the breastplate of cunning work, like the work of the ephod; of gold, blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine twined linen. (9) It was foursquare; they made the breastplate double: a span was the length thereof, and a span the breadth thereof, being doubled. (10) And they set in it four rows of stones: the first row was a sardius, a topaz, and a carbuncle: this was the first row. (11) And the second row, an emerald, a sapphire, and a diamond. (12) And the third row, a figure, an agate, and an amethyst. (13) And the fourth row, a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper: they were inclosed inouches of gold in their inclosings. (14) And the stones were according to the names of the children of Israel, twelve, according to their names, like the engravings of a signet, every one with his name, according to the twelve tribes. (15) And they made upon the breastplate chains at the ends, of wreathen work of pure gold. (16) And they made twoouches ofgold, and two gold rings; and put the two rings in the two ends of the breastplate. (17) And they put the two wreathen chains of gold in the two rings on the ends of the breastplate. (18) And the two ends of the two wreathen chains they fastened in the twoouches, and put them on the shoulderpieces of the ephod, before it. (19) And they made two rings of gold, and put them on the two ends of the breastplate, upon the border of it, which was on the side of the ephod inward. (20) And they made two other golden rings, and put them on the two sides of the ephod underneath, toward the forepart of it, over against the other coupling thereof, above the curious girdle of the ephod. (21) And they did bind the breastplate by his rings unto the rings of the ephod with a lace of blue, that it might be above the curious girdle of the ephod, and that the breast-

(31) The sockets of the court.—See chap. xxvii. 10—12, 15—18. The pins of the tabernacle.—Comp. chap. xxvii. 19, xxxviii. 20; and see Note on the former passage. The pins of the court.—See chap. xxvii. 19.

XXXIX.

The Making of the Holy Garments.

(1—31) This section corresponds to chap. xxxviii. 5—40, but does not follow exactly the same order. Verses 2—7 correspond to verses 5—12 of chap. xxxviii.; verses 8—21 to verses 13—25; verses 22—26 to verses 31—33; but after this a dislocation occurs. Verses 27—29 correspond to verses 29—31 of chap. xxxviii., and verses 30, 31 to verses 36—38. It is not clear why any change was made. The order observed in chap. xxviii. seems preferable.

(1) Cloths of service.—See Note on chap. xxxi. 10.
(3) They did beat the gold into thin plates and cut it into wires.—This very primitive method of forming gold thread is nowhere else mentioned. It implies a ruder state of the art of metallurgy than we should have expected.
To work it in the blue.—The blue, the purple, the scarlet, and the white linen thread were woven into a patterned fabric. The gold was inserted afterwards in the way of embroidery. A similar practice prevailed in Egypt (Wilkinson, Ancient Egyptians, vol. iii., p. 128).
(7) Stones for a memorial.—See Note on chap. xxviii. 12.
EXODUS, XXXIX. its Presentation to Moses.

The Completion of the Work, and its Presentation to Moses.

It is probable that the various parts of the work were presented to Moses for inspection as they were completed, that if they did not satisfy him, they might be altered and amended at once. Moses alone had seen “the pattern in the mount,” and Moses alone could say if the work came up to the required standard. We are not told that anything was rejected; and it is quite possible that all the portions of the work were satisfactorily rendered at their first essay by the several workmen; for the workmen, it must be remembered, besides receiving instructions from Moses, were divinely assisted in the production of their several works (chap. xxxvi. 42).

(24) Pomegranates of blue... and twined linen.—Rather, of blue, and purple, and scarlet, twisted together. (Comp. chap. xxviii. 33.)

(25) Bells of pure gold.—On the object of the bells, see Note on chap. xxviii. 32.

(27) They made coats.—Rather, tunics or shirts. See Note on chap. xxviii. 40.

(28) A mitre... and goodly bonnets.—The “mitre,” or rather “tarban,” was for Aaron, the “goodly bonnets,” or rather “caps,” for his sons. (See the Notes on chap. xxviii. 36-40.)

(29) Linen breeches.—Rather, linen drawers. These were to be made both for Aaron and for his sons. (See chap. xxviii. 42, 43.)

(30) A girdle.—The girdle was for Aaron. It is described much more fully here than in the “instructions,” where it is called simply a “girdle of needlework” (chap. xxviii. 39).

(31) The plate of the holy crown.—See Note on chap. xxix. 6.

The Presentation of the Work to Moses, and his Approval of it.

Plate might not be loosened from the ephod as the Lord commanded Moses. (22) And he made the robe of the ephod of woven work, all of blue. (23) And there was an hole in the midst of the robe, as the hole of an habergeon, with a band round about the hole, that it should not rend. (24) And they made upon the hems of the robe pomegranates of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and twined linen. (25) And they made a bell of pure gold, and put the bells between the pomegranates upon the hem of the robe, round about between the pomegranates; (26) a bell and a pomegranate, a bell and a pomegranate, round about the hem of the robe to minister unto; as the Lord commanded Moses. (27) And they made coats of fine linen of woven work for Aaron, and for his sons, (28) and a mitre of fine linen, and goodly bonnets of fine linen, and 4 linen breeches of fine twined linen, (29) and a girdle of fine twined linen, and blue, and purple, and scarlet, of needlework; as the Lord commanded Moses. (30) And they made the plate of the holy crown of pure gold, and wrote upon it a writing, like to the engravings of a signet; e HOLLINESS TO THE LORD. (31) And they tied unto it a lace of blue, to fasten it on high upon the mitre; as the Lord commanded Moses. (32) Thus was all the work of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation finished: and the children of Israel did according to all that the Lord commanded Moses, so did they. (33) And they brought the tabernacle unto Moses, the tent, and all his furniture, his taches, his boards, his bars, and his pillars, and his sockets, (34) and the covering of rams’ skins dyed red, and the covering of badgers’ skins, and the vail of the covering, (35) the ark of the testimony, and the staves thereof, and the mercy seat, (36) the table, and all the vessels thereof, and the shew-bread, (37) the pure candlestick, with the lamps thereof, even with the lamps to be set in order, and all the vessels thereof, and the oil for light, (38) and the golden altar, and the anointing oil, and the sweet incense, and the hanging for the tabernacle door, (39) the brazen altar, and his grate of brass, his staves, and all his vessels, the laver and his foot, (40) the hangings of the court, his pillars, and his sockets, and the hanging for the court gate, his cords, and his pins, and all the vessels of the service of the tabernacle, for the tent of the congregation, (41) the cloths of service to do service in the holy place, and the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and his sons’ garments, to minister in the priest’s office. (42) According to all that the Lord commanded Moses, so the children of Israel made all the work. (43) And Moses did look upon all the work, and, behold, they had done it as the Lord had commanded, even so had they done it: and Moses blessed them.

CHAPTER XL.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) On the first day of the first month shall thou set up the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation. (3) And thou shalt put therein the ark of the testimony, and cover the ark with the vail. (4) And thou shalt bring in the table, and set in order the things that are to be set in order upon it; and thou shalt bring in the candlestick, and light the lamps thereof. (5) And thou shalt set the altar of gold for the incense before the ark of the testimony, and put the hanging of the door to the tabernacle. (6) And thou shalt set the altar of the burnt offering before the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation. (7) And thou shalt set the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar, and shalt put water therein. (8) And thou shalt set up the court round about, and hang up the hanging at the court gate. (9) And thou shalt take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle, and all that is therein, and shalt

In the candlestick, and light the lamps thereof. (5) And thou shalt set the altar of gold for the incense before the ark of the testimony, and put the hanging of the door to the tabernacle. (6) And thou shalt set the altar of the burnt offering before the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation. (7) And thou shalt set the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar, and shalt put water therein. (8) And thou shalt set up the court round about, and hang up the hanging at the court gate. (9) And thou shalt take the anointing oil, and anoint the tabernacle, and all that is therein, and shalt EXODUS, XL.

The Tabernacle is Uproared.

hallow it, and all the vessels thereof; and it shall be holy. [10] And thou shalt anoint the altar of the burnt offering, and all his vessels, and sanctify the altar; and it shall be an altar most holy. [11] And thou shalt anoint the laver and his foot, and sanctify it. [12] And thou shalt bring Aaron and his sons unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and wash them with water. [13] And thou shalt put upon Aaron the holy garments, and anoint him, and sanctify him; that he may minister unto me in the priest’s office. [14] And thou shalt bring his sons, and clothe them with coats: [15] and thou shalt anoint them, as thou didst anoint their father, that they may minister unto me in the priest’s office; for their anointing shall surely be an everlasting priesthood throughout their generations.

[12] Thou shalt bring Aaron and his sons, and put all his garments on him, and anoint him, and consecrate him: —See Note on chap. xxix. 4. Ablution, investiture, and anointing had all of them been previously appointed to be parts of the consecration service (chap. xxix. 4, 5, 7, &c.).

[14] Thou shalt bring his sons, and clothe them with coats.—Rather, with tunics. (Comp. chap. xxix. 8.)

[15] Thou shalt anoint them, as thou didst anoint their father.—By the narrative of Lev. viii., it would seem that Aaron’s sons were not anointed in the same way as himself. He had the oil poured over his head (Lev. viii. 12; Ps. cxxxii. 2). They were merely sprinkled with a mixture of oil and blood (Lev. viii. 30). The difference implied a lower degree of official holiness.

Their anointing shall surely be an everlasting priesthood.—The Jewish commentators maintain that the one anointing of the sons of Aaron sufficed for all time, and was not repeated in the case of any subsequent priests, who became fully possessed of the sacerdotal office without it. Each high priest was, on the contrary, inducted into his office by anointing, whence the high priest came to be spoken of as “the anointed priest” (Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16, xxi. 13, &c.).

[10] Thus did Moses.—This verse states generally the fact that Moses carried out the entire series of instructions given him in verses 2—15, but tells us nothing as to the time at which he carried them out. The passage which follows (verses 17—33) fixes the performance of the first set of instructions (verses 2—8) to “the first day of the second year.” The narrative of Lev. viii. shows that the remainder (verses 9—15) were not put into execution till later.

The Uproaring of the Tabernacle.

[17] On the first day of the month... the tabernacle was reared up.—The Tabernacle was so constructed as to be capable of being rapidly both put together and taken to pieces. The erection of the framework, and the stretching upon it of the fine linen and goats’ hair coverings, must have been the main difficulty. But the family of Abraham had been familiar with tent life from the time of its quitting Ur of the Chaldees to the descent into Egypt, and its location in Egypt on the borders of the desert, in close neighborhood to various nomadic races, had kept up its familiarity with tents, their structure, and the most approved methods of pitching and striking them. Thus it is not surprising that the first erection was completed in less than a day.

[15] Moses... fastened his sockets.—The stability of the Tabernacle must have depended almost entirely upon the sockets. These were of some considerable weight (chap. xxxviii. 27), but they cannot by their mere weight have sustained the fabric in an upright position. It is reasonable to suppose that they were let into the ground to a depth of some feet. The erection necessarily commenced with this operation.

[20] He spread abroad the tent over the tabernacle.—Erected, i.e., the wooden framework, with the covering of goats’ hair, which formed the outer tent (ochel), and so roofed in the Tabernacle ( mishkan).

[21] He spread abroad the tent over the tabernacle... above upon it.—The covering ( mishkah) is the outer protection of rams’ skins and seals’ skins. (See chap. xxvi. 14.)

[22] He spread abroad the tent over the tabernacle... above upon it.—The covering ( mishkah) is the outer protection of rams’ skins and seals’ skins. (See chap. xxvi. 14.)

[23] The vail of the covering.—See Note on chap. xxxix. 34, and comp. above, verse 3.
EXODUS, XL.

And he put the table in the tent of the congregation, upon the side of the tabernacle northward, without the vail. (20) And he set the bread in order upon it before the Lord; as the Lord had commanded Moses. (21) And he put the candlestick in the tent of the congregation, over against the table, on the side of the tabernacle southward. (22) And he lighted the lamps before the Lord; as the Lord commanded Moses. (23) And he put the golden altar in the tent of the congregation before the vail; (24) and he burnt sweet incense thereon; as the Lord commanded Moses. (25) And he set up the hanging at the door of the tabernacle. (26) And he put the altar of burnt offering by the door of the tabernacle of the tent of the congregation, and offered upon it the burnt offering and the meat offering; as the Lord commanded Moses. (27) And he set the laver between the tent of the congregation and the altar, and put water there, to wash withal.

Put the table . . . upon the side of the tabernacle northward.—On the right hand to one facing towards the vail. Moses may have known the right position from the pattern which was shewed him in the mount (chap. xxv. 40).

He set the bread in order upon it.—Arranged, i.e., the twelve leaves in two rows, as was afterwards commanded to be done (Lev. xxiv. 6).

He put the candlestick . . . over against the table.—Directly opposite to it, on the left hand, as one faced the vail. The light would thus be thrown on the table of showbread. (See chap. xxv. 37.)

He lighted the lamps.—When the proper time came, i.e., at even. (Comp. chap. xxx. 8; Lev. xxiv. 3.)

He put the golden altar . . . before the vail.—In front of the Ark, the mercy-seat, and the place assigned to the Shechinah (chap. xxv. 22), but separated from them by the vail. (Comp. chap. xxx. 6.)

He burnt sweet incense thereon.—At even, when he lighted the lamps, he also, according to the instructions given him (chap. xxx. 8) burnt incense.

The hanging at the door.—See above, verse 5, and comp. chap. xxvi. 36.

He put the altar of burnt offering by the door of the tabernacle.—On the altar of burnt offering, see chaps. xxvii. 1–8, xxxviii. 1–7. Some preposition has fallen out before the word “door.” Our translators suppose an omission of “of,” “at,” but it is more probable that heiphase, which occurs in verse 6, is the word omitted. The altar was not “at the door,” but “before” or “in front of the door.”

And offered upon it the burnt offering and the meat offering.—Offered upon it, i.e., the first evening sacrifice—a lamb for a burnt offering, together with the prescribed meat offering. (See chap. xxix. 40.)

And Moses and Aaron and his sons washed their hands and their feet thereat: (32) when they went into the tent of the congregation, and when they came near unto the altar, they washed; as the Lord commanded Moses. (33) And he reared up the court round about the tabernacle and the altar, and set up the hanging of the court gate. So Moses finished the work.

Then a cloud covered the tent of the congregation, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. (35) And Moses was not able to enter into the tent of the congregation, because the cloud abode thereon, and the glory of the Lord filled the tabernacle. (36) And when the cloud was taken up from over the tabernacle, the children of Israel went onward in all their journeys. (37) but if the cloud were not taken up, then they journeyed not till the day that it was taken up. (38) For the cloud of the Lord was upon the tabernacle by day, and fire was on it by night, in the sight of all the house of Israel, throughout all their journeys.

The Descent of the Glory of God upon the Tabernacle.

Then a cloud.—Heb., the cloud, i.e., the same cloud that had accompanied the host and directed their journeys from Succoth (chap. xiii. 20–22).

Covered the tent.—The cloud rested on the tent outside; the “glory of God”—some ineffably brilliant appearance—entered inside, and “filled” the entire dwelling. It pleased God thus to manifest His intention of making good His promise to go with the people in person (chap. xxxiii. 17).

Moses was not able to enter into the tent.—Apparently, Moses, seeing the cloud descend, as it had been wont to do upon the temporary “tent of meeting” (chap. xxxiii. 9), endeavoured to re-enter the Tabernacle which he had quitted, but was unable; the “glory,” forbade approach. (Comp. the effect of the “glory,” when it descended on Solomon’s Temple, 1 Kings vii. 11; 2 Chron. v. 14, vii. 2.)

The cloud was henceforth, in a peculiar way, attached to the Tabernacle. As a cloud it rested upon it by day; as a pillar of fire by night. Only in one case was it removed, viz., when it was the Divine will that Israel should march. (See Num. ix. 15–22.)
EXCURSUS A: ON EGYPTIAN HISTORY, AS CONNECTED WITH THE BOOK OF EXODUS.

The question of the exact time in Egyptian history to which the circumstances related in the Book of Exodus belong is one rather of secular interest than of importance for Biblical exegesis. Vital to the Jewish nation as was the struggle in which Moses engaged with the Pharaoh of the time, to Egypt and its people the matter was one of comparatively slight moment—an episode in the history of the sons of Mizraim which might well have left no trace in their annals. Subject races, held as bondmen by the monarchs, were common in the country; and the loss of one such race would not have made any great difference in the general prosperity of Egypt; nor would the destruction of such a chariot and cavalry force as appears to have perished in the Red Sea have seriously crippled the Egyptian military power. The phenomena of the plagues—aggravations of ordinary Egyptian scourges—would not necessarily have attracted the attention of any writers, while they would, no doubt, have been studiously concealed by the historiographers of the kings. As M. Chabas observes—"Des événements de ce genre n’ont pas dû être inscrits sur les monuments publics, où l’on n’aurait trouvé que des succès et des gloires." No one, therefore, has the right to require of the Biblical apologist that he should confirm the historical narrative of Exodus by producing references to it in the Egyptian records. The events themselves may never have been put on record in Egypt, or, if recorded, the record of them may have been lost. It is not, perhaps, generally known what large lacunae there are in the Egyptian annals, nor how scanty are the memorials even of the best known times. The argument a silentio, always weak, has absolutely no value in a case where the materials on which the history is based are at once so limited and so fragmentary.

Still, an interest will always attach to the connection of sacred history with profane, and speculation will always be rife as to the identity of Pharaohs mentioned in the Bible with monarchs known to us from the Egyptian remains. Readers will naturally expect the writer of such a comment as the present to have some view, more or less distinct, as to the period in Egyptian history where to the events recorded in Exodus belong, and may fairly claim to have such view put before them for their consideration.

Egyptian history divides itself into three main periods, which are generally distinguished as the times of the Old, the Middle, and the New Empires. The "Old Empire" was certainly anterior to Abraham, and probably lasted from about B.C. 2500 to B.C. 1900. The Middle Empire was the result of a conquest of Egypt by Asiatic invaders, and is known as the period of the Hyksos, or "Shepherd Kings." Its duration, in the opinion of the present writer, did not exceed two hundred years (n.c. 1900—1700). The New Empire was established by a revolt of the native Egyptians against the Hyksos (about B.C. 1700), and is reckoned to have lasted from that time to the Persian conquest under Cambyses (B.C. 527).

It is generally allowed that the exodus belongs to the time of the New Empire.† All the characteristics of the period, as set forth in the Biblical narrative, are so thoroughly Egyptian, that we cannot imagine Egypt at the time crushed under the iron yoke of a hated race of foreigners, and a smouldering spirit of discontent everywhere pervading the masses, and ready to burst out into insurrection. If the "Middle Empire" is thus eliminated, and our choice shown to lie between the Old Empire and the New, we cannot hesitate to prefer the latter. Under the Old Empire Egypt had no chariot force; ‡ and there is every reason to believe that the horse itself was unknown in the country.§ Chronological considerations, moreover, make it impossible to throw the exodus back to a time anterior to B.C. 1900. The result is that modern critics universally, or all but universally, assign the exodus to the time of the New Empire, and that what remains to be determined is, under which dynasty, and after that, under which king, the great migration took place.

The synchronism of the twenty-second dynasty of Manetho with Solomon, which must be regarded as sufficiently established by the identity of the name Shishak with Sheshonk, and the record of Sheshonk I’s expedition against Palestine engraved on the walls of the Temple of Karnak,|| determines the time of the exodus to the earlier portion of the New Empire, and may even be said to leave us a choice between two dynasties only—the first and second of the new régime (Manetho’s eighteenth and nineteenth). The twenty-first dynasty, which did not hold the throne for more than a hundred and thirty years, is manifestly excluded, since its commencement could not be anterior to the judgeship of Samuel; while the space assigned to the twentieth, which is at the utmost a hundred and eighty years, is certainly not more than sufficient for the time of the other judges. Hence it is now regarded by almost all commentators and critical historians as certain that the exodus took place under one or other of the two great dynasties which stand at the head of the New Empire lists, and are the most important in the whole range of Egyptian history.

In favour of the eighteenth dynasty, it is urged that the interval of time between the death of Solomon and

---

† See the writer’s History of Egypt, vol. ii., p. 17; and compare Canon Cook’s Essay in the Speaker’s Commentary, vol. i., p. 487, who enlarges the time to "between two and three centuries."
EXODUS.

Of these facts there is one—the building of Raamses—which points strongly to the nineteenth dynasty as occupying the throne. The name Raamses first appears in the dynastic lists at this time, and it may be true that the name, or one like it, was previously known in Egypt, and had even been borne by a prince, yet, until it had been borne by a king it was not likely to become the name of a town.† Moreover, it is exactly at this period of Egyptian history that we first hear of a city called Pi-Raamses, "the city of Raamses," and the kings are found to be engaged in the construction of it. They employ in its construction forced labour and demobilize the inhabitants Aperus, which is a fair Egyptian equivalent of the word Hebrew.‡ Further, Raamses is their capital, and is a sort of suburb of Tanis, which agrees well with the statement of the Psalmist that the miracles of Moses were wrought "in the field of Zaan."§ There is no other period in Egyptian history when Tanis was the capital, excepting under the Middle Empire, under which the exodus would scarcely now be placed by any one.

The existence at the time of a formidable enemy, which the Hebrews might have been expected to join, suits also the early portion of the nineteenth dynasty. It was just then that, as Dr. Brugsch says, "a great nation grew up beyond the frontier on the north-east to an importance and power which began to endanger the Egyptian supremacy in Western Asia."|| The Hittite power was a real peril to Egypt during the reigns of Ramses I, Seti I, and Ramses II, the first three kings of the dynasty, who were engaged in constant wars against these formidable neighbours. They were induced under the circumstances greatly to strengthen their north-eastern frontier by means of walls and fortresses, and evidently feared invasion from this quarter. Invasion came in the time of Ramses III, though not from the Hittites, but from a people who had temporarily subjected them. As the Israelites were Asiatics, who had immigrated into Egypt from Syria, it might easily be supposed that they would readily join a Syrian invader. No such fears or perils beset the Egypt of the eighteenth dynasty, when the country was at the height of its military glory, and accustomed to carry its arms deep into Asia.

The long reign of the Pharaoh from whom Moses fled, which cannot have been much less than forty years, may have been considerably more, than forty years. §§

The 480 years of this passage date from the fourth year of Solomon. Add 30, the remaining years of his life, and the result is 310 years.

See Clinton, Past and Present, vol. i., p. 312, where the sum of the years between the Exodus and the fourth year of Solomon is estimated at a minimum of 660, and a maximum of 600.

† Mariette makes it B.C. 1733; Brugsch, B.C. 1720; Birch, n.c. 1690; Stuart Poole, n.c. 1523; Wilkinson, n.c. 1530.

He assigns to it 1380 years; Mariette, 211; Bunsen, 221; Wilkinson, 196 years.

‡ Twelfth year (Judges v. 3, xvi. 21; 1 Sam. vii. 2); forty years (Judges xii. 11; vi. 31, viii. 22, 23, xi. 1; 1 Sam. iv. 18); eighty years (Judges xiii. 30); three hundred years (Judges xi. 26).

§ See the writer's "Additional Note" on the passage in the Book of Samuel and Speaker's Commentary, vol. i., pp. 54, 56. Hales says on the passage, "The period of 480 years is a forgery, foisted into the text." (Commentary, vol. ii., p. 287.)

†† See the writer's "Additional Note" on the passage in the Book of Samuel and Speaker's Commentary, vol. i., pp. 54, 56. Hales says on the passage, "The period of 480 years is a forgery, foisted into the text." (Commentary, vol. ii., p. 287.)

‡‡ Canon Cook in Speaker's Commentary, vol. i., pp. 155—165.

§§ The 480 years of this passage date from the fourth year of Solomon. Add 30, the remaining years of his life, and the result is 310 years.

The writer is at his return from Midian (Exod. vii. 7), which must have followed closely the death of the Pharaoh from whom he fled soon after he was grown up (Exod. xvi. 3). He must have returned to Egypt at the time of his flight (Aets vi. 23); but from Exodus alone we cannot suppose him younger.

* Aham, the first king of the eighteenth dynasty, is said to have had a son called Raamses (Cook in the Speaker's Commentary, vol. i., p. 134). It is stated to have given a town the name of a mere subject. Pi-Raamses, probably begun by Seti I, was named after Aham, whose son he had associated.

† See Chabas, Recherches pour servir à l'histoire de l'Egypte, pp. 112, 113. M. Chabas regards Aperus as the exact Egyptian translation of the Hebrew Abu (Hebrew). It is objected that there is no reason for the change of name, and that the proper transcript would have been Abu (Cook in Speaker's Commentary, vol. i., p. 406). The name Abu in Egypt must have been very near, or Pi-Raamses would not have become Bubastis, Pi-Hevar Busiris, and the like.

Confirmation is given to the view, that the events related in Exodus belong to the nineteenth dynasty, by the statement of George the Synelius that the synchronism of Joseph, with Apepi, the last Shepherd King, was “universally admitted.”* In this case the “new king who knew not Joseph” † could not be Aahmes, the founder of the eighteenth dynasty, who immediately succeeded Apepi, and with whom Joseph must have lived in part contemporary, but must rather have been the founder of the next dynasty, the nineteenth—either Rameses I., or Seti I., his son and successor. Four hundred and thirty years after, Apis will bring us to the nineteenth dynasty at any rate, if not even to the twentieth, since no one now assigns to the eighteenth dynasty more than three hundred, or to the nineteenth more than a hundred and sixty years.

Again, the distorted account of the exodus which was given by Maenucho,§ inaccurate as it may be in its details, presumes undoubtedly the Egyptian tradition, which placed the events in the reign of an Amenophis, who was the son of a Ramesses (Rameses) and the father of a Sethos. No other king in the Egyptian lists answers to these particulars except Manetho, who was the son and successor of Rameses II., and the father of Seti II., or Seti-Meneptah. The name Meneptah is, indeed, inaccurately represented by Amenophis, which is the true Greek equivalent of Amunhotep; but Manetho himself probably called the king Amenemhet,|| which Josephus turned into Amenophis.

Altogether, the arguments in favour of the nineteenth dynasty being that which held the throne at the time of the events recorded in Exodus seem to preponderate considerably over those which can be adduced in favour of the eighteenth. The eighteenth was too powerful and warlike to have feared invasion, or to have regarded Israel as a danger. It built no “store-cities.” It was unacquainted with the name Rameses. It did not hold its court at Tanis. It contained neither king nor prince of the name of Sethos (Setti). The nineteenth was differently situated. It combined the various particulars to which the eighteenth was a stranger. Moreover, it terminated in such a time of weakness as might have been expected to follow the calamities recorded in Exodus, while the eighteenth was glorious to its very close connexion with Egypt and her greatness.

On the whole, it would seem to be most probable that the Israelites, having come into Egypt in the reign of Apophis (Apepi), the last Shepherd King, who was a thoroughly Egyptianised Asiatic, remained there as peaceable subjects under the great and warlike eighteenth dynasty for some three hundred years, gradually, as the memory of Joseph’s benefits faded, suffering more and more oppression, but multiplying in spite of it, till at length a change of dynasty occurred, and with it a change of policy in respect of them. Moderate ill-usage was succeeded by the harshest possible treatment; their “lives were made bitter with hard bondage.”* The “new king who knew not Joseph” (Exod. i. 8) is perhaps, in the mind of the writer, rather Sethos I., than Rameses I., who reigned but a year and four months.† Sethos, threatened on his north-eastern frontier by the Hittites, and fearing lest the Hebrews should join them, devised the plans ascribed to the “new king” in Exod. i.—set them to build “store-cities, Pithom and Raamses,” the latter namely probable after his son;‡ when this had no effect, sought to check their increase by means of the midwives; and finally required that all their male offspring should be thrown into the Nile. There is nothing in the character of Seti I., as represented upon his monuments, to render these severities improbable. He was a good son and a good father, but an implacable enemy and a harsh ruler. His treatment of prisoners taken in war was cruel beyond the wont of his time, his campaigns were sanguinary, and his temper fierce and resentful.§

If Moses was born under Seti I., and bred up by his daughter, the king under whom he found himself when he grew to manhood, and from whom he fled to the land of Midian,|| must have been Rameses II. Seti associated his son Rameses when he was about twelve years of age, and shortly afterwards he practically transferred to him the reins of power. Rameses II. claims to have held the throne for at least sixty-seven years, and was assigned sixty-six by Manetho. His reign is the longest of all the Egyptian reigns, except that of Ptolemy. He was a king likely to have continued the “hard bondage” of the Israelites, for he was the most indefatigable of builders, and effected the greater number of his constructions by the instrumentality of forced labour. Lenormant says that “during his reign thousands of captives must have died under the rod of the taskmaster, or have fallen victims to over-work or privations of every description,” and that “in all his monuments there was not, so to speak, a single stone which had not cost a human life.”|| It was the sight of oppression such as this which provoked the indignation of Moses, and led to the rash act which caused him to quit Egypt and fly to Midian.

So long as Rameses II. lived, the exile felt that he could not return. It must have been weary waiting for the space of forty years or more, while the great Sethos made his marks on his canal || and erected his numerous buildings. The weariness of prolonged exile shows itself in the name given by Moses to his eldest son: “He called his name Gershom: for he said, I have been a stranger in a strange land” (Exod. ii. 22, xviii. 3). At length, “in process of time”—after a reign which exceeded sixty-six years—“the king of Egypt died” (Exod. ii. 23); and Moses, divinely informed of the fact (Exod. iii. 19), returned to Egypt to his brethren.

If Seti I. be the king who commenced the oppression, and Rameses II. the monarch from whom Moses fled, the Pharaoh whom he found seated on the throne upon his return must have been Meneptah. The character of this king, as depicted in the Egyptian monuments, bears a considerable resemblance to that of the adver-

---

* Synell, Chronograph, p. 62n. There are no grounds for limiting the statement, as is done by Bunsen, to “all Christian chronographers” (Egypt’s Past, vol. ii., p. 129; or, as is done by Canon Cook, to “Josephus and those who drew their information from him” (Speaker’s Commentary, vol. i., p. 417).

† See Exod. xii. 40. The authority of the Hebrew text far outweighs that of the LXX. and Samaritan Versions, which, moreover, are discordant.

§ See Synell, Chronograph., pp. 72n and 73n.

 Chabas, Les Pasteurs en Egypte, p. 51.

---

* Exod. i. 14.

† Joseph. contr. Ap. i. 15.

‡ See Exod. i. 8: “Now a new king over Egypt arose, who knew not Joseph.” The phrase naturally points to the founder of a new dynasty.

§ See Exod. ii. 16. The authority of the Hebrew text far outweighs that of the LXX. and Samaritan Versions, which, moreover, are discordant.

|| See Synell, Chronograph., pp. 72n and 73n.

 Chabas, Les Pasteurs en Egypte, p. 51.
sary of Moses. He was proud, vain-glorying, disinclined to expose his own person in war, yet ready enough to send his soldiers into positions of peril. The cruelties that he sanctioned in his Libyan war are worthy of the monarch who, when a subject people complained of their burdens, met the complaint by making their burdens heavier. He appears in Egyptian history as the weak successor of two great and powerful monarchs; but he has one military success, due not to himself, but to his generals, after which his reign is inglorious, and closes in disaster. §

Meneptah held the throne for eight years. During the first four of these his annals are almost a blank. If the Biblical numbers are taken as exact, it is into this space that the plagues and the exodus must fall. If, on the contrary, we regard the Biblical periods of forty years as intended to be inexact, we may conjecture (1) that Moses returned to Egypt in Meneptah’s second or third year; (2) and (2) that there was some further delay before he made his demands. In that case the great war of Meneptah with the Libyans and their allies, which belongs to his fifth year, may have been over before the troubles with Israel began. Moses may have come forward shortly after its close to deliver the message with which he was charged; and the struggle between him and Meneptah may have fallen into the latter’s fifth and sixth years. Meneptah, like his father, commonly held his court at Tanis. It would be there, “in the field of Zaan,” that Moses and Aaron confronted him and wrought their “wonders.” The struggle, the departure, the pursuit, the disaster in the Red Sea, may belong to the king’s sixth year; and two years afterwards he may have succeeded to revolutionary movements consequent upon the losses which he suffered in the Red Sea catastrophe. His reign certainly ended amid clouds and darkness, and was followed by a period of civil disturbance, terminating in bloodshed and anarchy.

The troubles of this period, described in the “Great Harris Papyrus,” together with the remarkable success of Rameses III, second monarch of the twentieth dynasty, would fall into the period passed by Israel in the “Wilderness. In the “Wandering,” and would thus naturally obtain no direct mention in the sacred narrative. Rameses may, however, have been the “hornet” which God sent before Israel to break the power of the Canaanites and Hittites (Exod. xxvii. 28), and render the conquest of Palestine more easy. § He seems certainly to have made at least one great expedition into Asia, and to have reduced under his sway the whole tract between “the river of Egypt” and the Euphrates. § Had the Israelites been in possession of Palestine at the time, he must have come into contact with them, and have seriously interfered with their independence. As it was, his Syrian wars, by weakening the Canaanite nations, paved the way for the victories of Joshua and the Israelite occupation of the “Land of Promise.”

The depressed state of Egypt between the death of Rameses III. and the accession of the first Shoshonoi accounts for the absence of all mention of the Egyptians from the Books of Joshua, Judges, and Samuel. If the exodus had taken place under the eighteenth dynasty, and the Syrian wars of Seti I, Rameses II, and Rameses III. had belonged to the period of the Judges (as in that ease they must), it is inconceivable that neither should the Hebrew records of the time have contained any notice of the Egyptians nor the Egyptian records of the Hebrews.

EXCURSUS B: ON THE EDUCATION OF MOSES (chap. ii. 10).

Moses would be educated like the sons of princesses generally, not like those of priests, or of persons destined for the literary life. St. Stephen, when he says that Moses was “learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians,” does not (probably) mean more than this. The question then is, In what did the education of princes and young nobles at the time of the exodus consist?

It would consist, in the first place, of orthography and grammar. Moses would be taught to speak the Egyptian language, and to write it, correctly. He would probably not be taught the hieroglyphic character, the knowledge of which was reserved to the priests, but would be familiarised with the ordinary cursivo writing—the hieratic, as it was called in later times—which was the common character for books, and even for official documents, in his day. Care would be taken to instruct him in the graces of style, so far as they were understood at the time; and he would be especially practised in epistolary correspondence, which was regarded as one of the most necessary of all gentlemanlike accomplishments. Whether his attention would be turned to poetry, might perhaps be doubtful, but he would certainly be taught a clear and perspicuous prose style, such as was required for official reports and other communications between members of the governing class.

The next branch of his education would be arithmetic and geometry. The Egyptians had made considerable progress in the former, and their calculations ran up to billions. In the latter they are said to have been exact and minute, but not to have pushed their investigations very far. It was sufficient for a youth of the upper classes to be able to keep correct accounts; and a speculative knowledge of the intricacies of numbers, or of geometrical problems, scarcely formed a part of the established curriculum. He would be further instructed in morality, and in the Egyptian views on the subjects of the Divine

---

* See the Records of the Past, vol. viii., p. 61; and compare Chabas, Recherches, pp. 9–26.
* Meneptah does not seem to have reigned more than eight years, or two after the exodus. Amon-mes reigned, perhaps, five years: Seti II., two; Siptah, seven; Sethenekhi, two or three; and Rameses III. employed, perhaps, twenty or twenty years in his warlike expeditions. This space of time is amply covered by the “forty years” of the wanderings.
* This is the Note on chap. ii. 16.
* So Cano Cook, Speaker’s Commentary, vol. i., pp. 141, 453.
* The poetry of Moses, his “songs” (Exod. xv. 1–18; Deut. xxxiii. 1–19, his “blessing” (Deut. xxxiii.), and his “prayer” (Ps. xxv.), indicate an actual study of Egyptian poetry, whether it was a part of his education or not.
Nature, of the relations subsisting between God and man, of a future life, and of a judgment to come. Egyptian morality was, for the most part, correct so far as it went, and was expressed in terse gnomic phrases, resembling those of the Proverbs of Solomon. The points especially inculcated were obedience to parents and to authorities generally, courtesy to inferiors, and kindness to the poor and the afflicted. The mysteries of religion were the exclusive property of the priests; but life beyond the grave, judgment, reward and punishment, probably metempsychosis, were generally inculcated; and the mystic volume, known as the "Ritual of the Dead," must have been pressed on the attention of all the educated.

EXODUS.

It is not to be supposed that one brought up as the son of a princess would attain to the scientific knowledge possessed by Egyptian professionals of different kinds. Moses would not be an astronomer, nor an engineer, nor a physician, nor a theologian, nor even an historian; but would have that general acquaintance with such subjects which belongs to those who have enjoyed a good general education in a highly civilised community. He would also, no doubt, have a knowledge of the main principles of Egyptian jurisprudence. But here, again, his knowledge would be general, not close or intimate; and it would be a mistake to expect, in the Mosaical legislation, reproductions, to any extent, or adaptations, of the Egyptian judicial system.
THE THIRD BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED LEVITICUS.
INTRODUCTION

TO LEVITICUS.

I. Name and Signification.—The name Leviticus, by which the third book is called, is taken from the Greek Version (LXX) of the Old Testament. It properly denotes the Levitical book, or the volume treating on Levitical matters. In Hebrew it is called "the Book Vayikra," or simply "Vayikra," from the word with which it commences, and which denotes and he called. It is by this name that the Book is always quoted in Jewish writings. In the Hebrew manuscripts of the Old Testament, Leviticus is not only always a book by itself marked off from the rest both at the beginning and at the end by the space of four vacant lines, but like the other four books of the Pentateuch it begins a new column, whilst the other books of the Old Testament, though having the same vacant space to separate them from each other, do not begin at the top of a new column.

II. Division.—In accordance with the practice which obtained from time immemorial, the Book is divided, both in the most ancient MSS, and in the earliest printed editions of the Hebrew Scriptures, into the following ten sections:—

(1) chaps. i. 1—v. 26.
(2) vi. 1—viii. 30.
(3) ix. 1—xiv. 47.
(4) xii. 1—xiii. 59.
(5) xiv. 1—xv. 33.
(6) xvi. 1—xviii. 30.
(7) xix. 1—xx. 27.
(8) xxi. 1—xxiv. 23.
(9) xxv. 1—xxvi. 2.
(10) xxvi. 3—xxvii. 34.

These are ten of the fifty-four sections into which the whole Pentateuch is divided in order to furnish a lesson for each Sabbath of those years which, according to Jewish chronology, have fifty-four Sabbaths, so that the whole Law of Moses should be read through once every year. This division and the reading through of the Law in the manner here indicated are observed by the Jews to this day, and it is to these weekly lessons, in conjunction with portions from the Prophets, that reference is made in the New Testament (Acts xiii. 15, &c.). Besides this division, which is designed for the weekly lessons, the Book of Leviticus is also divided into twenty-three larger sections, which correspond more nearly to our modern chapters, and which are as follows:—

(1) chaps. i. 1—iii. 17.
(2) iv. 1—vi. 11.
(3) vi. 12—vii. 38.
(4) vii. 1—x. 7.
(5) x. 8—20.
(6) xi. 1—47.
(7) xii. 1—xiii. 28.
(8) xiii. 29—50.
(9) chaps. xiv. 1—32.
(10) xiv. 33—57.
(11) xv. 1—24.
(12) xvi. 25—xvi. 34.
(13) xvii. 1—16.
(14) xviii. 1—30.
(15) xix. 1—23.
(16) xix. 24—xx. 27.
(17) xx. 1—xxii. 16.
(18) xxii. 17—xxiii. 14.
(19) xxiii. 15—xxiv. 13.
(20) xxv. 1—30.
(21) xxv. 31—xxvi. 2.
(22) xxvii. 3—16.
(23) xxviii. 19—31.

These sections are called Secterim, and are indicated in all the correct manuscripts of the Hebrew Scriptures.*

There is a third division, or rather subdivision, of this Book, which consists of 98 smaller sections or paragraphs, 52 of which are open sections and 46 closed sections. These minor sections are so minutely indicated by a vacant space, either at the beginning or end of the line, and are so sacredly guarded that a manuscript of the Pentateuch in which one of the open sections has, by mistake, been made into a closed section, or vice versa, is ritually illegal.†

III. Design and Contents.—The design of the Book has been aptly described as "the spiritual statute-book of Israel as the congregation of God." By the laws therein enacted, God designed to train Israel as His peculiar people, to keep them from defilements, and to sanctify them for holy fellowship with their covenant Jehovah, who has deigned to erect His sanctuary in their midst. To effect this purpose enactments are in the first place laid down to regulate the access of the Israelites to the Divine Being, as follows: The sacrifices which obtained from time immemorial are more minutely defined and systematised (chaps. i. 1—vii. 38); the priesthood whose duty it is to offer up these sacrifices are consecrated and installed (chaps. viii. 1—x. 20); the uncleanness of animals (chap. xi. 1—47), and the impurities of men (chaps. xii. 1—xv. 33), which cause defilement and debar access to God, are described; and, finally, the Day of Atonement is instituted, which is to expire at the end of every year the neglect of any of the above-named regulations (chap. xvi. 1—34), thus appropriately concluding the enactments which are designed to fit God's people for fellowship with Him. This group of laws is followed by sundry enactments which have for their object the holiness of the people in their

† For a complete list of these sections see Ginsburg, The Massorah, Vol. ii., Letter Po, § 467, p. 482.
every-day life, in their domestic relations, and in their intercourse with one another (chaps. xvii. 1—xx. 27); the holiness of the priesthood, and their purity in their sacred ministrations (chaps. xx. 1—xxii. 33); the sanctification of the festivals (chaps. xxiii. 1—xxiv. 12) and of the whole land (chaps. xxv. 1—xxvi. 2); with directions about collateral questions arising from this part of legislation. The logical sequence of these different regulations, however, is not always apparent.

IV. Authorship.—As I do not believe that the Book of Leviticus, in its present form, was written by Moses, and as it is against the plan of this commentary to enter at this place into a discussion on this question, which has nothing whatever to do with the inspiration of the Book, I thought that I should best serve the student of Holy Writ by showing him how the laws here enacted were administered during the second Temple. I have therefore endeavoured to depict the Temple service in the time of Christ as conducted according to the laws laid down in the Book before us.

V. Literature.—The most important aids are (1) the Septuagint, an English translation of which has been published by Bagster. (2) The two Chaldee versions of the Pentateuch, one under the name of Onkelos, and the other under the name of Jonathan b. Uzziel, both of which have been translated into English, but not altogether satisfactorily, by Etheridge (Longman, 1865). The latter of the two is especially important, since, though in its present form it is a late compilation, it embodies the ancient development of the Mosaic Law as administered during the second Temple. (3) The Midrach Rabboth, which is a traditional explanation of the Mosaic Law, containing many expositions which obtained in the time of Christ. A German translation of this work by Dr. Wünsche is now being published in parts at Leipzig. Modern commentaries are too well known to require description.
THE THIRD BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED LEVITICUS.

CHAPTER I.—(1) And the Lord called unto Moses, and spake unto him out of the tabernacle of the congregation, saying,

(2) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, If any man of you bring an offering unto the Lord, ye shall bring your offering of the cattle, even of the herd, and of the flock.

The name Leviticus, that is, the Levitical book, as this portion of the Pentateuch is called in our Bibles, is taken from the Greek (LXX.) Version of the Old Testament, where it is so called because it treats of the sacrificial ordinances and the services performed by the Levites.

(1) And the Lord called . . . and spake.—Rather, And he called unto Moses, and the Lord spake; i.e. (See chap. viii. 15.) At the end of the previous book we are told that when the tent of meeting was completed, the Lord showed His approbation of it by covering the outside of the edifice with a heaven-sent cloud, and by filling the inside with His glory (Exod. xl. 34—38). He therefore, who had filled the sanctuary with his glory now "called unto Moses," thus indicating by "And he called," which are one word in the original, the intimate connection between the two books. The ancient Jewish synagogue already pointed out the fact that this unusual phrase, "And he called unto Moses," is used as an introductory formula on the three different occasions when the Lord made a special communication to this great law-giver. Thus when the Lord first communicated to Moses that He was about to deliver the Israelites from Egypt, "He called unto him" from the burning bush (Exod. iii. 1). When the Lord was about to give to Moses the Ten Commandments for the people of Israel, "He called unto him" from the top of Sinai (Exod. xix. 3, 20) ; and now when the Lord is about to give to His chosen people, through His servant Moses, the laws by which their Divine worship is to be regulated, "He called unto him" from the tent of meeting (Lev. i. 1).

(2) Speak unto the children of Israel.—The directions for the different sacrifices specified in chaps. i. 2; iii. 17, are not in the first instance communicated to the priests who should teach them to the people, but are directly addressed to the people themselves.

Ye shall bring your offering . . .—Or, from the cattle ye shall bring your offering, from the oxen and from the flock, that is, if the offering be of quadrupeds in contradistinction to the "fowl" mentioned in verse 14, they are to be of oxen and small cattle (tsón), i.e. sheep and goats.

(3) If his offering be a burnt sacrifice.—Having stated what is meant by animals, the directions now treat upon the different kinds of the offerings themselves. First in order comes the burnt offering, which is divided into burnt offering from the oxen (verses 3—9), and burnt offering from the flock (verses 10—13). The ox takes precedence because it is the more costly and more important sacrifice. It had to be without disease or blemish of any kind. To offer a defective sacrifice was an insult and a deception. Hence the exclamation of the prophet, "cursed be the deceiver which hath in his flock a male and yoweth and sacrificeth unto the Lord a corrupt thing" (i.e., an animal with a blemish), Mal. i. 14. The offerer is to bring the animal to the entrance of the tent of meeting, as it should be rendered, that is, to the front of the Tabernacle where the brazen altar stood (Exod. xl. 6).

Of his own voluntary will.—The whole passage is better rendered, at the entrance of the tent of meeting shall he offer it, that he may be accepted before the Lord. (Comp. Exod. xxviii. 38; Lev. xix. 5, xxii. 12, 20, 29; xxiii. 11.) This meaning is unmistakably set forth in Lev. xxii. 19, 20, 21, where it is explicitly declared, "ye shall offer for your acceptance a male without blemish of the oxen, of the sheep or of the goats, whatsoever hath a blemish that ye shall not offer, for it shall not be acceptable for you." It is to be remarked that the phrase "for your acceptance," or "acceptable for you," is only used in connection with burnt offerings and peace offerings, but never with sin offerings.

(4) And he shall put his hand upon the head of the burnt offering; and it shall be accepted for him to make Atonement for him.—That is, his offer will be acceptable before the Lord, when the offerer thus complies with the prescribed sacrificial regulations. (Comp. verse 3.)

To make atonement for him.—As the imposition of hands, confession, repentance, and prayer accompanied this sacrifice, and, moreover, as these acts secure for the offerer acceptance with God, hence expiatory virtue is here and elsewhere ascribed to this burnt offering (chaps. xiv. 20; xvii. 24; Micah vi. 6; Job i. 5; xlii. 8), which belongs more especially to sin and trespass offerings (Lev. iv. 20, 26, 31, 35; v. 16, 18; vi. 7, &c.).

And he shall kill the bullock.—The sacrificer himself slaughtered the victim on the north side of the altar, by cutting its throat, while a priest or an assistant held a bowl under the neck to receive the blood.

Before the Lord.—That is, before the door of the tent of meeting (comp. verse 11). The two phrases constantly interchange in the directions about the sacrifices. (Comp. chaps. iii. 2, 8, 12; iv. 4, 15, 24; vi. 15, &c.)

The priests, Aaron's sons.—Better, the sons of Aaron, the priests, as the Authorized Version renders this phrase in Numb. x. 8. Besides the passage in Joshua xxii. 19, this phrase only occurs six times, once in Numbers, where it is properly rendered, and five times in this book, where it is translated three times "the priests Aaron's sons" (chap. i. 5, 8, 11), and twice "Aaron's sons the priests" (chap. ii. 2; iii. 2). (See chap. xxi. 1.)

And sprinkle.—Better, throw the blood. The priestly functions, which began with the catching of the blood in the bowl, are now to continue also in this instance. The priest threw the blood upon the walls of the altar in two portions. He first stepped to the north-eastern corner, and from that corner diffused the blood on the northern and eastern walls; he then placed himself at the south-western corner, whence he diffused the second portion of the blood on the south and western walls. The rest of the blood he poured out at the southern side of the altar, which was furnished with two holes; these holes communicated with a drain which conducted the blood into the Kidron.

By the door of the tabernacle.—Better, at the entrance of the tent of meeting. (See verse 3.)

And he shall flay.—After the priest threw the blood on the walls of the altar, the sacrificer himself had to skin and cut up the sacrifice into its natural limbs (comp. verse 12; chap. viii. 20; Exod. xxix. 17), as head, breast, legs, &c., and not mangle it. The skin was the perquisite of the officiating priest (Lev. viii.).

And the sons of Aaron.—The priests are to put the fire upon the altar, because they offered the sacrifice upon the altar. This applies to the first burnt offering which was offered upon the newly-erected altar, since afterwards the fire was always burning, and was never allowed to go out (Lev. vi. 13).

And lay the wood.—No other fuel but wood was allowed for the altar, and no one was allowed to bring it from his own house, but it had to be the wood of the congregation. (Comp. Neh. x. 34, xii. 51.) It had to be the best kind; worm-eaten wood or timber from pulled-down buildings was not allowed.

Shall lay the parts.—Better, shall lay the pieces in order, as in verse 12. The word here rendered by parts is the same which is more properly translated pieces in verse 6. Here again the priests are not to lay the pieces upon the altar anyhow, but are to arrange them systematically. In consequence of the order expressed in this verse, the rule obtained during the second Temple that the parts of the victim should as much as possible be arranged in the same order which they occupied in the animal when alive.

But his inwards.—Before, however, the cut-up victim was thus arranged to be burnt, the stomach, the bowels, and the feet had to be thoroughly cleansed. In the time of the second Temple, the washing had to be repeated three times before the ablation was deemed complete.

And the priest shall burn.—The word here used is not the one generally used to denote consuming by fire, but it originally signifies to make a flame or vapour by incense. It is used in connection with all sacrifices (chaps. ii. 9; iii. 11; iv. 10, 19; vi. 8; vii. 5, &c.) and the idea intended to be conveyed thereby is, that man upon earth fittingly brought his gift to God in heaven, by causing the odour emitted from the burning sacrifice to ascend in a sweet-smelling savour to heaven.

Of the flocks.—Bullocks of course could only be offered by the wealthy. Hence the law now provides for those who could not afford a costly a sacrifice. They are to bring a lamb of the first year, which was the ordinary burnt offering in the time of Christ, and not a goat. The directions given with regard to the burnt offering from bullocks, equally apply to the burnt offering from the flock (verses 10—13). They are therefore not repeated.

On the side of the altar northward.—As the place for the refuse was on the east side (see verse 16), as the laver stood on the west side, and as the ascent to the altar was on the south side, the north side was the most convenient for slaughtering the victims. This also applies to the sin and trespass offerings (chaps. iv. 24, 29, 33; vi. 25; vii. 2; xiv. 13, &c.).
I.

The priest shall lay the fat on the altar; (13) and he shall wash the inwards and the legs with water; and the priest shall bring it all, and burn it upon the altar: it is a burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

And if the burnt sacrifice for his offering to the Lord be of fowls, then he shall bring his offering of turtledoves, or of young pigeons. (15) And the priest shall bring it unto the altar, and wring off his head, and burn it on the altar; and the blood thereof shall be wrung out at the side of the altar; (16) and he shall pluck away his crop with his hand; and shall take thereof 2

II.

Leviiticus, II.

CHAPTER II.—And when any will offer a meat offering unto the Lord, his offering shall be of fine flour; and he shall pour oil upon it, and put frankincense thereon; (17) and he shall bring it to Aaron’s sons the priests: and he shall take thereout his handful of the flour of the meal offering, and cast it beside the altar on the east part, by the place of the ashes: (18) and he shall cleave it with the wings thereof, but shall not divide it asunder: and the priest shall burn it upon the altar, upon the wood that is upon the fire: it is a burnt sacrifice, an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.
Memorial.—So called because it was designed to bring the worshipper into the grateful remembrance of God, and to remind him, as it were, of His promise to accept the service of His people rendered to Him in accordance with His command. Hence the declaration of the Psalmist, “the Lord remember all thine offerings, and accept thy burnt sacrifice” (Ps. xx. 4), and of the angel to Cornelius, “thy prayers and thy alms are come up for a memorial before God” (Acts x. 4).

And the remnant.—With the exception of the memorial or the handful of flour and oil, and of all the frankincense, this meat offering belonged to the priests, who divided it among them, and by whom alone it was to be consumed in the court of the sanctuary.

A thing most holy.—The offerings consisted of two classes, less holy and most holy. The thank offerings (Lev. xxii. 20; Num. vi. 20), the firstborn of clean sacrificed animals (Num. xviii. 17), the firstfruits of oil, wine, and corn, and the paschal sacrifice, belonged to the less holy, and might be eaten entirely or partially in any clean place within the holy city by the officiating priests and their families (Lev. x. 12—14). The incense offering, the show-bread (Exod. xxx. 26; Lev. xxiv. 9), the sin and trespass offerings (Lev. vi. 25—28; vii. 1, 6; xiv. 13, &c.), and the meat offerings here described, belonged to the most holy class. They could only be eaten in the court of the sanctuary by the priests alone.

A meat offering baked in the oven.—The second kind of meat offering consisted of preparations baked with oil in the oven, or in the pan, or cooked in a pot (verses 4—10). The oven is probably the portable pot, open at the top, about three feet high and liable to be broken (Lev. xi. 35), which is still used in the East for making bread and cakes. After the vessel is thoroughly heated, the dough, which is made into large, thin, oval cakes resembling pancakes or Scotch oat-cakes, is dexterously thrown against the sides, the aperture above is covered, and the bread is completely baked in a few minutes. Though the bread when first taken out is soft, and can be rolled up like paper, it hardens and becomes crisp when it is kept.

And thou shalt bring the meat offering that is made of these things unto the Lord; and when it is presented unto the priest, he shall bring it unto the altar. (9) And the priest shall take from the meat offering a memorial thereof, and shall burn it upon the altar: it is an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord. (10) And that which is left of the meat offering shall be Aaron's and his sons': it is a thing most holy of the offerings of the Lord made by fire.

(11) No meat offering, which ye shall bring unto the Lord, shall be made with leaven: for ye shall burn no leaven, nor any honey, in any offering of the Lord made by fire.

(12) As for the offering of the firstfruits, ye shall offer them unto the Lord: but they shall not be burnt on the altar for a sweet savour.
(13) And every oblation of thy meat offering "shall thou season with salt; neither shalt thou suffer the salt of the covenant of thy God to be lacking from thy meat offering; with all thine offerings thou shalt offer salt.

(14) And if thou offer a meat offering of thy firstfruits unto the Lord, thou shalt offer for the meat offering of thy firstfruits green ears of corn dried by the fire, even corn beaten out of full ears. (15) And thou shalt put oil upon it, and lay frankincense thereon: it is a meat offering. (16) And the priest shall burn the memorial of it, part of the beaten corn thereof, and part of the oil thereof, with all the frankincense thereof: it is an offering made by fire unto the Lord.

CHAPTER III.—(1) And if his oblation be a sacrifice of peace offering, if he offer it of the herd; whether it be a male or female, he shall offer it without blemish before the Lord. (2) And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, and kill it at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron's sons the priests shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar round about. (3) And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the peace offering an offering made by fire unto the Lord; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards, (4) and the two kidneys, and the fat that is on them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away. (5) And Aaron's sons shall burn it on the altar upon the burnt sacrifice, which is upon the wood that is on the fire: it is an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

(6) And if his offering for a sacrifice of peace offering unto the Lord be of the LEVITICUS, IV.

The Peace Offering of a Lamb or Goat.

flock; male or female, he shall offer it without blemish. (7) If he offer a lamb for his offering, then shall he offer it before the Lord. (8) And he shall lay his hand upon the head of his offering, and kill it before the tabernacle of the congregation: and Aaron's sons shall sprinkle the blood thereof round about upon the altar. (9) And he shall offer of the sacrifice of the peace offering an offering made by fire unto the Lord; the fat thereof, and the whole rump, it shall he take off hard by the backbone; and the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards, (10) and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away. (11) And the priest shall burn it upon the altar: it is the food of the offering made by fire unto the Lord.

(12) And if his offering be a goat, then he shall offer it before the Lord. (13) And he shall lay his hand upon the head of it, and kill it before the tabernacle of the congregation: and the sons of Aaron shall sprinkle the blood thereof upon the altar round about. (14) And he shall offer thereof his offering, even an offering made by fire unto the Lord; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards, (15) and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall be take away. (16) And the priest shall burn them upon the altar: it is the food of the offering made by fire for a sweet savour: "all the fat is the Lord's."

(17) It shall be a perpetual statute for your generations throughout all your dwellings, that ye eat neither fat nor blood.

CHAPTER IV.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a soul shall sin through ignorance against any of the commandments of the Lord concerning things which ought not to be done, and shall do against any of them:

(7) A lamb.—Better, a sheep, as it is rendered in Lev. i. 10; vii. 23; xxii. 19, 27, &c., since the word denotes a full-grown sheep.

(8) Before the tabernacle of the congregation.—Better, before the tent of meeting. (See verse 2.)

(9) The whole rump.—Better, the whole fat tail (so also Exod. xxxix. 22; Lev. vii. 3; viii. 25; ix. 19). The sheep of Syria and Palestine were, and still are, the broad-tailed species, the broad part often weighing fifteen pounds and upwards. In young animals, the substance of the tail, which consists of marrow and fat, tastes like marrow, and it is used by the Arabs for cooking instead of butter. It is often so large that it trails on the ground, and to save the animal from the pain occasioned by dragging it on the ground, a small wheeled truck is attached to it, on which it draws it along. It is only the tail of sheep which is here included among the fat parts that are to be offered upon the altar. It is, however, not regarded as the ordinary fat of other quadrupeds (Lev. ix. 19), and hence, according to Jewish tradition, is not included in the prohibition of verse 3.

(10) And the two kidneys.—The ritual enjoined in these two verses is the same as in verses 4 and 5.

(11) The food, or bread, that is, which the fire upon the altar was to consume for God, or the sacrifice. Hence that which was burnt unto God was called His bread (Num. xxviii. 2; Ezek. xliv. 7), and the priests who burnt it are described as offering "the bread of their God" (Lev. xxi. 6, 8, 17).

(12—15) And if his offering be a goat.—The directions about the goat as a peace offering are the same as those about an ox. No mention of male or female is here made, because this point is already stated in verse 6. Unlike the burnt offering (Lev. i. 10), the goat is here separated from the sheep because of the difference in the oblation, arising from the broad tail of the sheep, which does not exist in the goat.

(16) Shall burn them.—That is, the fat pieces which have thus been specified (see chap. iv. 35), because they constitute the bread of Jehovah; they are to ascend in a sweet-smelling savour to heaven. (See chap. i. 9."

All the fat is the Lord's.—This part of the verse is intimately connected with the following verse. As the fat belongs to the Lord, it is therefore enacted as a perpetual statute that it must never be eaten.

(17) A perpetual statute for your generations throughout all your dwellings.—Better, a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings; so the Authorised Version in the only three other passages in which it occurs. (Comp. Lev. xxiii. 14, 21, where it is inverted; and 31.) That is, the law not to eat fat of beees, sheep, or goats, is to be binding upon the Israelites throughout all their future generations, and is applicable to any place wherever they may dwell. As the full legislative formula only occurs four times in the Pentateuch, and is restricted to this book, it is important to render it uniformly in all the four passages. For the import of this statute see chap. vii. 25—25.

IV.

(2) If a soul shall sin.—It will be seen that whilst the three previous kinds of offerings, viz., the burnt offering (chap. i. 1—17), the meat offering (chap. ii. 1—16), and the peace offering (chap. iii. 1—17), are spoken of as familiarly known and practised among the Israelites before the giving of the Law, the sin offering and the trespass offering are here introduced as a new injunction. We have here no more the voluntary formula, "If any man of you bring," &c.
LEVITICUS, IV.

of Ignorance.

(3) If the priest that is anointed do sin according to the sin of the people; then let him bring for his sin, which he hath sinned, a young bullock without blemish unto the LORD for a sin offering. (4) And he shall bring the bullock unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation before the LORD; and shall lay his hand

Upon the bullock's head, and kill the bullock before the LORD. (5) And the priest that is anointed shall take of the bullock’s blood, and bring it to the tabernacle of the congregation: (6) and the priest shall dip his finger in the blood, and sprinkle of the blood seven times before the LORD, before the vail of the

Through ignorance.—He did it inadvertently, and at the time of its committal did not know that it was a transgression; but recognised it as a sin after he did it. (Comp. verses 13, 22, 27; chap. v. 18; chap. xxii. 14.) According to the practice which obtained during the second Temple, the sin here spoken of, for which the sin offering was brought, was (1) a sin committed through ignorance, or involuntarily, as opposed to a sin committed with a set purpose (comp. Numb. xv. 30); (2) a sin against a negative command; (3) a sin consisted in acts, not in words or thoughts, as is deduced from the expression “and shall do against any of them;” and (4) of acts of such a nature, that if committed intentionally they would subject the sinner to the awful punishment of excision. (See Numb. xv. 29, 30.)

(3) The priest that is anointed.—To illustrate this law, the conduct of the high priest is adduced as the first instance, to show when and how this exacted functionary is to bring the sin offering in question. By this the Levitical law indicates that even the chief of the priesthood was but a frail being like the rest of the people, and was exposed to the same infirmities as the laity, thus precluding the assumption of spiritual superiority. Hence the remark of the Apostle, “the law made those high priests who had infirmity, and who needed daily to offer up sacrifices, first for their own sins, and then for the people’s; but our high priest, Christ Jesus, was holy, harmless, undefiled, and separate from sinners, and made higher than the heavens” (Heb. vi. 27, 28). The phrase “the priest that is anointed” for “the high priest” is restricted to this book, where it occurs four times (Lev. iv. 3, 5, 16; vi. 15 in Heb.; 22 in the English). “The great priest,” or high priest, is the appellation used in the other portions of the Pentateuch (Lev. xxi. 10; Numb. xxxv. 25, 28), and in Joshua (chap. xx. 6); whilst in the later books of the Old Testament this functionary is called chief priest (2 Kings xv. 18; 2 Chron. xix. 11; xxiv. 11; xxxi. 20; xxx. 10; Ezra vii. 5). He is called “the anointed priest,” because, like Aaron, he alone was anointed when he succeeded to the high office, whilst the ordinary priests were simply consecrated. Their anointing descended with them to all futurity by virtue of being the descendants of Aaron. (See chap. viii. 12.)

According to the sin of the people.—That is, he having in ignorance committed the same sin as the common weeper, which he is as liable thereto. From the phrase “against any commandments of the Lord” in the preceding verse, as well as from chaps. x. 6; xxi. 10-15, it is evident that the sin of ignorance here alluded to does not refer to the inadvertent neglect of his official duty, which involves upon the high priest as the spiritual head of the people, but to any offence whatsoever ignorantly committed. According to the marginal reading, to make the people guilty, or more literally, to the guilt of the people, which is equally admissible, the meaning of the passage is, that he by committing a sin causes the people to transgress, insomuch as his example is followed by them; or that, in virtue of the intimate connection which subsisted between the representative of the nation and the people, the sin of the one was the sin of the other. (Comp. chap. x. 6; 1 Chron. xxiv.)

A young bullock.—Literally, a steer, the son of a bull. The sacrificial rules which obtained at the time of Christ minutely defined the respective ages of the bullock: the steer, the son of a bull, and the calf. The bullock or ox which was brought as a sacrifice had to be three years old: “the steer the son of a bull” rendered in the passage before us, and in the Authorized Version generally, by “a young bullock” (Exod. xxix. 1; Lev. iv. 14; xvi. 6; xxiii. 8, &c.), had to be two years old; whilst the calf had to be of the first year.

(4) Unto the door of the Tabernacle of the Congregation.—Better, unto the entrance of the tent of meeting. (See chap. i. 3.) The regulations about the bringing of the sin offering up to the sprinkling of the blood are the same as those about the other sacrifices.

(5) And bring it.—That is, after the high priest had received the blood into the bowl (see chap. i. 5), he is to bring it out of the court where the victim was slain into the tent of meeting.

(6) And the priest shall dip his finger.—The different treatment of the blood is here to be noticed. Whilst in the case of the other sacrifices the priest threw the blood upon the walls of the altar of burnt offering (see chap. i. 5), in the sin offering before us the high priest is first of all to dip his finger seven times in the blood, and sprinkle it before the Lord. The finger, according to the rules which obtained during the second Temple, was that of the right hand, as the blood was always taken and sprinkled with the right hand. Seven, being a complete number, is used for the perfect finishing of a work. Hence the seven days of creation (Gen. ii. 3); seven branches were in the golden candlestick (Exod. xxv. 37; xxvii. 23); seven times the blood was sprinkled on the day of atonement (Lev. xvi. 14); seven times was the oil sprinkled upon the altar when it was consecrated (Lev. viii. 11); seven days were required for consecrating the priests (Lev. viii. 35); seven days were necessary for purifying the defiled (Lev. xii. 2; Numb. xix. 19); seven times Naaman washed in the Jordan (2 Kings v. 10, 14); seven days Jericho was besieged, and seven priests with seven trumpets blew when the walls fell down (Josh. vi.); the lamb had seven horns and seven eyes, which are the seven spirits of God (Rev. v. 6); seven seals are on God’s book (Rev. i. 5).&c., &c.

Before the Lord.—As the Lord was enthroned on the mercy-seat between the cherubim (Exod. xxx. 22) in the holy of holies, the phrase “before the Lord” is used for the place in front of the holy of holies, LEVITICUS, IV.

for the Priest, sanctuary. (7) And the priest shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar of sweet incense before the Lord, which is in the tabernacle of the congregation; and shall pour all the blood of the bullock at the bottom of the altar of the burnt offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. (8) And he shall take off from it all the fat of the bullock for the sin offering; the fat that covereth the inwards, and all the fat that is upon the inwards, (9) and the two kidneys, and the fat that is upon them, which is by the flanks, and the caul above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away, (10) as it was taken off from the bullock of the sacrifice of peace offerings: and the priest shall burn them upon the altar of the burnt offering. (11) And the skin of the bullock, and all his flesh, with his head, and with his legs, and his inwards, and his dung, (12) even the whole bullock shall he carry forth 1 without the camp unto a clean place, where the ashes are poured out, and 2 burn him on the wood with fire: 3 where the ashes are poured out shall he be burnt.

(13) And if the whole congregation of Israel sin through ignorance, 4 and the

where the altar of incense, the shewbread, and the golden candlestick stood (Exod. xxvii. 21; xxviii. 35; xxx. 8; xxxiv. 34, &c.), and towards which the blood was sprinkled.

Before the vail of the sanctuary.—This phrase is simply explanatory of the former phrase. As the vail separated the holy of holies, where the shekinah dwelt, from the holy place, the words are simply used as another expression for “before the Lord.” This clause has, however, been variously interpreted from time immemorial. As before is not in the original, but is supplied in the translation, some have maintained that the vail itself was sprinkled; whilst others, who, with the Authorised Version, regard the whole phrase to mean “before the vail,” declare that the blood was sprinkled on the floor of the sanctuary in front of the vail.

And the priest shall put. That is, the high priest. With the finger thus dipped into it, he is to put some of the blood on each of the four horns of the golden altar on which the incense was offered. This process, too, was peculiar to the sacrifice of the sin offering. The altar was placed in the holy place before the vail which separated off the holy of holies (Exod. xxx. 1—6). According to the practice which obtained in the time of Christ, the priest began by putting the blood first on the north-east horn, then on the north-west, then on the south-west, and, lastly, on the south-east horn. He dipped his finger in the blood of the bowl at the sprinkling of each horn, and wiped his finger on the edge of the bowl between the separate sprinklings, as the blood which remained on his finger from one horn was not deemed fit to be put on the other.

And shall pour all the blood.—That is, all the remaining blood. The bulk of the blood which remained, after expending the small quantity on the horns of the incense altar inside the sanctuary, the priest poured out at the bottom of the altar of burnt offering, which stood outside the holy place. At the time of the second Temple, there were at the south-west horn of this altar two holes, like two nostrils, through which the blood ran into a drain conveying it into the brook of Kedron.

(8) And he shall take off from it all the fat.—That is, the best or choicest part. (See chap. iii. 3.) At the time of Christ the sin offering was cut open, the fat and inwards were taken out, put into a vessel, salted, stewed on the fire, and burnt upon the altar as a sweet savour unto the Lord.

(9) And the two kidneys.—The regulations prescribed in these two verses are the same as those in connection with the peace offering in chap. iii. 4, 5.

(11) And the skin of the bullock.—Unlike other burnt offerings, the skins of which were taken off, and became the perquisite of the priests (chap. vii. 8), this sin offering was not flayed at all, but was cut to pieces with its skin.

(12) Even the whole bullock shall he carry forth.—This does not mean that the high priest himself had to carry the whole bullock all that distance, but in accordance with the idiom so common in Hebrew, where the singular is used for the plural, or the indefinite or impersonal form, denotes that those who assisted in doing the rough work of the altar shall carry the victim. Hence the ancient Greek Version (LXX.) and the Samaritan rightly render it by “and they shall carry,” in the plural: i.e., the whole bullock shall be carried forth. In verse 24 of this very chapter the Authorised Version properly translates the same idiom into “in the place where they kill the burnt offering,” though the verb, as in the verse before us, is in the singular. (See also verse 14.)

Without the camp.—During the time of the second Temple there were three places for burning; one place was in the court of the sanctuary, where they burnt the sacrifices which were unfit and rejected; the second place was in the mountain of the house called Birah, where were buried those sacrifices which met with an accident after they had been carried out of the court; and the third place was without Jerusalem, called the place of ashes. It is this place to which the Apostle refers when he says, “for the bodies of those beasts whose blood is brought into the holy place by the high priest as an offering for sin are burned without the camp.” Wherefore Jesus also, that he might sanctify the people through his own blood, suffered without the gate” (Heb. xii. 11, 12).

And burn him on the wood with fire.—Whilst special wood was required for the burning of those victims which were consumed in the court of the sanctuary (see chap. i. 7), the sacrifices which were taken outside the city could be burnt with any wood, or even straw or stubble. All that was insisted on was that it should be burned with fire, as the text before us has it, but not with cinder, coals, or lime.

(13) And if the whole congregation.—As the whole Church, in its corporate body, is no more exempt from human frailty than its highest spiritual chief, the law now prescribes the sin offering for the congrega-350 thing be hid from the eyes of the assembly, and they have done somewhat against any of the commandments of the Lord concerning things which should not be done, and are guilty; \(^{14}\) when the sin, which they have sinned against it, is known, then the congregation shall offer a young bullock for the sin, and bring him before the tabernacle of the congregation. \(^{15}\) And the elders of the congregation shall lay their hands upon the head of the bullock before the Lord; and the bullock shall be killed before the Lord. \(^{16}\) And the priest that is anointed shall bring of the bullock’s blood to the tabernacle of the congregation: \(^{17}\) and the priest shall dip his finger in some of the blood, and sprinkle it seven times before the Lord, even before the vail. \(^{18}\) And he shall put some of the blood upon the horns of the altar which is before the Lord, that is in the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall pour out all the blood at the bottom of the altar of the burnt offering, which is at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. \(^{19}\) And he shall take all his fat from him, and burn it upon the altar. \(^{20}\) And he shall do with the bullock as he did with the bullock for a sin offering, so shall he do with this: and the priest shall make an atonement for them, and it shall be forgiven them. \(^{21}\) And he shall carry forth the bullock without the camp, and burn him as he burned the first bullock: it is a sin offering for the congregation.

\(^{22}\) When a ruler hath sinned, and done somewhat through ignorance against any of the commandments of the Lord his God concerning things which should also were far too many to do it, since they were seventy in number, it was ordained during the second Temple that three of their members should lay their hands upon the sacrifice. Besides this sin offering there was only one other congregational offering upon which there was this laying of hands: i.e., the scape-goat (Lev. xvi. 21).

\(^{16}-25\) The rest of the regulations are exactly the same as those prescribed in the sin offering for the high priest himself in verses 5–12.

\(^{22}\) When a ruler hath sinned.—The third instance adduced is that of a ruler sinning inadvertently (verses 22–26). As the word here translated “ruler” is used for a king (1 Kings xi. 34; Ezek. xxxiv. 24, xlvii. 2), the head of a tribe (Num. i. 4—16) or of the division of a tribe (Num. xxxiv. 18), opinions differ as to the exact position of the personage here meant. Now, in comparing the phrase used with regard to the sin of ignorance in the case of the high priest, the congregation, and any one of the people, it will be seen that in all the three instances it is simply described as a sin “against any commandments of the Lord” (comp. verses 2, 13, 27), whereas in the case of the ruler, we have the exceptional phrase, “against any of the commandments of the Lord his God.” Hence the interpretation obtained during the second Temple that the addition of the phrase his God, which shows a peculiar relationship to his God, denotes here one over whom God alone is exalted—the sovereign who is only responsible to his God.

And is guilty.—Rather, and acknowledges his guilt, as the Authorised Version rightly translates it in Hos. v. 15. (Comp. also Zech. xi. 5.) This sense is not only required by the dis-junctive particle or, with which the next verse begins, but by the fact that the declaration in the present rendering, “When men sin they are guilty,” is a truism. The sinner is guilty whether he sins inadvertently or inadvertently. The case here supposed is that the prince had himself come to the knowledge that what he had done was a sin, and had acknowledged it as such.
Sin Offering for the Ruler.

LEVITICUS, IV.

not be done, and is guilty; (23) or if his sin, wherein he hath sinned, come to his knowledge; he shall bring his offering, a kid of the goats, a male without blemish: (24) and he shall lay his hand upon the head of the goat, and kill it in the place where they kill the burnt offering before the Lord: it is a sin offering. (25) And the priest shall take of the blood of the sin offering with his finger, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, and shall pour out his blood at the bottom of the altar of burnt offering. (26) And he shall burn all his fat upon the altar, as the fat of the sacrifice of peace offerings: and the priest shall make an atonement for him as concerning his sin, and it shall be forgiven him.

(27) And if any one of the people sin through ignorance, while he doeth somewhat against any of the commandments of the Lord concerning things which ought not to be done, and be guilty; (28) or if his sin, which he hath sinned, come to his knowledge:

(23) Or if his sin.—That is, if on his failing to see it himself, his sin is shown to him by another person.

A kid of the goats.—The expression here used (sōâr) properly denotes the rough, shaggy-haired he-goat, and is distinguished from athâd (literally, ready, vigorous), which occurs in conjunction with it (Num. vii. 16, 17, 22, 23), and which is also translated goat in point of age. The sōâr, or the shaggy or long-haired he-goat, here used is the older back of the goat, whose hair has become long with age; whilst the athâd is the same animal, younger and more vigorous. Hence the former was never killed for food, or used for burnt or thank offerings at the festivals (Lev. xvi. 9, 15, xxiii. 19; Num. xxviii. 15, 22, 30, xxix. 5, 11, 16), and at the consecration of the priests and sanctuary (Lev. ix. 3, 15, x. 16), whilst the latter was killed for food (Deut. xxxii. 14; Jer. ii. 40), and hence, like the bull, the ram, and the lamb, was regularly presented as burnt and thank offerings (Num. vii. 17, 23, 29, &c.; Isa. i. ii, xxiv. 6; Ezek. xxxix. 13; Ps. i. 9, 13, lxvi. 15). It will be seen that the first difference in the sin offering of a prince is that he is to bring a long-haired he-goat, and not a bull.

(24) And kill it in the place where they kill the burnt offering.—See chap. i. 5.

(25) And the priest shall take.—Here, again, the difference in the ritual is to be observed. In case of his own sin offering and that of the congregation, the high priest himself performed the principal ceremony (verses 5—17), whilst at the sin offering of the prince the common priest officiated. The blood of the victim was not sprinkled before the vail of the Holy of Holies, nor on the incense altar which stood in the Holy, but on the brazen altar which was placed outside in the court.

(27) And if any one of the common people.—The fourth instance adduced (verses 27—33) is that of any one of the people of the land, as this phrase is rendered in Lev. xx. 2, 4; 2 Kings ix. 18, 19, xvi. 15. That is, any member of the congregation, whether he be a private Israelite, ordinary priest, or Levite, in contrast to the above-mentioned high priest and ruler.

And be guilty.—Rather, and acknowledges his guilt. (See verse 22.)

(25) Or if his sin...come to his knowledge.—That is, is shown to him by another person. (See verse 23.)

A kid of the goats.—Better, a shaggy-haired she-goat without blemish. The expression is feminine in the Hebrew. The female was of less value than the male, and was therefore more suitable to the circumstances of the ordinary people.

(29—31) And he shall lay.—The ritual prescribed in these verses is the same as that ordained in the case of the sin offering of the prince (verses 24—26). In verse 31, however, the phrase, "for a sweet savour unto the Lord," is added to the burning of the fat pieces of the victim, which does not occur at the sin offering of the high priest, the congregation, or the prince (comp. verses 10, 19, 26), but is used at burnt offerings (chap. i. 9, 13) and peace offerings (chap. iii. 5, 16). It is supposed by some that these words are designedly used in connection with the least costly sin offering, to indicate that the humblest gift of the humblest person, if sincerely offered, is as acceptable to God as the most costly offering of the most exalted in the land.

(22) And if he bring a lamb.—Better, a sheep. (See chap. iii. 7.) Those who were unable to bring a goat might offer a female sheep as the less valuable animal, provided it was without blemish. Though the ritual is the same as with the goat (see verses 29—31), yet the sheep is treated separately, because of the fat tail, which had to be burned. (See chap. iii. 12.)
put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, and shall pour out all the blood thereof at the bottom of the altar: and he shall take away all the fat thereof, as the fat of the lamb is taken away from the sacrifice of the peace offerings; and the priest shall burn them upon the altar, according to the offerings made by fire unto the Lord: and the priest shall make an atonement for his sin that he hath committed, and it shall be forgiven him.

CHAPTER V.—(1) And if a soul sin, and hear the voice of swearing, and is a witness, whether he hath seen or known of it; if he do not utter it, then he shall bear his iniquity. (2) Or if a soul touch any unclean thing, whether it be carcase of an unclean beast, or a carcase of unclean cattle, or the carcase of unclean creeping things, and if it be hidden from him; he also shall be unclean, and guilty. (3) Or if he touch the uncleanness of man, whatsoever uncleanness it be that a man shall be defiled withal, and it be hid from him; when he knoweth of it, then he shall be guilty.

(35) According to the offerings made by fire.—Better, upon the offerings made by fire. As the daily morning sacrifice was offered first every day, and as it continued burning on the altar all the forenoon, no fresh or special fire was to be kindled for it, but it was to be upon the fire sacrifices which had already been placed there before. (See chaps. iii. 5, v. 12.) The flesh of the sin offering, both for the prince and for the individual members of the community, was not burnt without the camp, as was the case with the flesh of the sacrifice for the high priest and for the whole congregation, but was the perquisite of the priests, and was taken by them (Lev. vi. 26—30). This is in harmony with the law. The sinner who brought the sin offering could not partake of it. Hence the priest was not permitted to eat of the flesh of the sin offering which he offered for himself, or of the flesh of the congregational sin offering, because he was a member of the congregation.

V.

(1) And hear the voice of swearing.—Better, because he heard the voice of adjuration, and might be a witness, whether he hath seen the offence or known of it, if he doth not tell it. Having laid down in the former chapter the regulations about the sin offering, and having shown how these regulations are to be carried out when the offence against the Divine law is inadvertently committed by the spiritual head of the people, by the whole congregation, by the sovereign ruler of the nation, and by the individual members of the community, the lawyer now proceeds to set forth in verses 1—13 of this chapter the trespass offering which every Israelite is to bring when he has violated certain precepts here specified. The first instance adduced is that of failing to come forward as witness after the judicial adjuration has been uttered. It was the duty of every member of the community to aid the authorities in maintaining the integrity of the Divine law. Hence, when an offence was committed which the constituted tribunals were unable to bring home to the offender for want of evidence, a solemn adjuration was addressed by the judge to individual members, to a district, or to the whole community. If after such an adjuration, anyone who was cognizant of the offence failed to come forward to testify what he knew, he was considered in the sight of God as participating in the transgression which he had thus concealed. It is with reference to this law that we are told, "whoso is partner with a thief, hateth his own soul, he heareth cursing and bowryeth it not," i.e., he hears the adjuration of the judges, and yet stifies his evidence, and thus becomes a partner with the culprit. An instance of this adjuration is recorded in Matt. xxvi. 63, where the high priest said to Jesus, "I adjure thee by the living God that thou tell me whether thou be the Christ, the son of God," and it was in recognition of the solemn obligation of this adjuration that Jesus answered the question.

Then he shall bear his iniquity.—Better, and he beareth his iniquity; that is, he is sensible that he bears the load of this guilt, he has become conscious of his sin, without which he could not bring the sacrifice here prescribed. The phrase, "and he beareth his guilt," has the same meaning as and "he," or "they are guilty" in chap. iv. 13, 22. &c. Unlike the sins committed inadvertently, spoken of in the preceding chapter, where the sin offering is prescribed, the guilt here described is that of designated and culpable silence, and of deliberately concealing a crime.

(2) Or if a soul touch any unclean thing.—The second instance adduced which requires this sacrifice is the case of any one touching the dead body of a clean animal, or the living or dead body of an unclean animal or reptile.

And if it be hidden from him.—That is, if he, through carelessness, forget all about it that he had contracted this defilement; as the Vulgate rightly paraphrases it, "and forgetteth his uncleanness." The touching of a carcase simply entailed uncleanness till evening, which the washing of the person and his garments thus defiled sufficed to remove (Lev. xi. 21, 31). It was only when thoughtlessness made him forget his duty, and when reflection brought to his mind and conscience the violation of the law, that he was required to confess his sin, and bring a trespass offering.

He also shall be unclean, and guilty.—Better, and he is unclean, and acknowledgeth that he is guilty. (See chap. iv. 13, 22.) The Greek Version, called the Septuagint, which is the most ancient translation of the Hebrew Scriptures, omits altogether the latter part of this verse, which is repugnant to the Authorised Version by "and if it be hidden from him, he also shall be unclean and guilty," thus showing that the Hebrew manuscript, or manuscripts, from which this old version was made, had not this clause. This is, moreover, supported by the fact that it needlessly anticipates the summary formula of the next verse, which continues the subject, and where it appears in its proper place.

(3) Or if he touch the uncleanness of man.—The unclean classes of defilement which a human being might contract and impart to others by contact, are set forth in Lev. xii.—xv.
When he knoweth of it, then he shall be guilty.—Better, and he knoweth it, and feeleth that he is guilty. That is, he afterwards becomes conscious that he has contracted the defilement, and feels his guilt. (See verse 2.)

(1) Pronouncing with his lips.—Better, speaking heedlessly with his lips. That is, if he uttered an oath in thoughtlessness or in passion, without his heart realizing it, that he will do this or that.

To do evil, or to do good.—That is, anything whatsoever which is comprehendeth under the name good and evil, as these two categories are idiomatically used to embrace all human action. (Comp. Gen. xxiv. 50, xxxi. 24; Num. xxiv. 13; Isa. li. 23.)

Whatsoever it be that a man shall pronounce with an oath.—Better, that a man heedlessly uttereth with an oath. That is, anything that a man may rashly or thoughtlessly undertake to do, or to abstain from doing, with an oath.

And it shall be hid from him.—That is, if through this careless way in which it was done, he forgot all about it. (See verse 2.)

When he knoweth of it . . .—Better, and he then considereth it, and acknowledgeth that he is guilty (see chaps. iv. 13, 22, v. 2, &c.), in one of these things with regard to which a man may rashly swear that he will do or not do them, and contract guilt.

(5) And it shall be, when . . .—When he feels that he has been guilty of one of these sins specified in verses 1—4, he must confess the offence which he has committed. For the form of confession which obtained during the second Temple, see chap. i. 4.

(6) And he shall bring his trespass offering . . . a lamb or a kid of the goats.—Better, a sheep, or a shaggy she-goat (see chap. iv. 23, 32). The first thing to be noticed is that the sacrifice is here called (ăšḥādim) "trespass offering," which is the right rendering of the word, and is so translated in thirty-five out of the thirty-six passages in which it is used for a sacrifice. In the verse before us, and in the rest of this section, viz., verses 7—13, which treat of this sacrifice, no distinction is made between the ranks of the offenders. There is no special legislation for the high priest, the whole congregation, or the prince, as in the case with the (chălûṭim) sin offering, which is described in the former chapter. The spiritual officer and temporal sovereign are here on a level with the ordinary layman. There is no scale in the sacrifices corresponding to the position of the sinner. They are all alike to bring the same victim, either sheep or she-goat. Though nothing is here said about the sacrificial rites which were to be performed in connection with the victim, in this case it is implied that, apart from the minor deviations here specified, they were to be the same as those in connection with the sin offering. The rule which obtained during the second Temple, is as follows: the trespass offerings were killed, and their blood sprinkled, as is before described in chap. iv.; they were then flayed, the fat and the inward parts taken out and salted, and strewn on the fire upon the altar. The residue of this flesh was eaten by the priests in the court, like the sin offerings.

(7) And if he be not able to bring.—The only exception to this general rule was poverty. The poor man who was unable to bring a sheep or she-goat, might bring two turtle-doves, as these were plentiful and cheap in Palestine. (See chap. i. 14.) We have seen in the preceding verse that in the case of the trespass offering, as in that of the sin offering, the fat parts, or the choicest portion, had to be consumed on the altar, being "the bread of Jehovah," and that the residue was the purgative of the priests. As the fat parts of the dove, or the portion for the altar, could not be separated from the bird, and as the burning of it wholly would destroy the character of the trespass offering, and make it into a whole burnt offering, as it was first brought, one represented the portion for the Lord, and hence was burnt on the altar, whilst the flesh of the other became the purgative of the officiating priest.

(8) And wring off his head.—For the manner in which this was performed see chap. i. 15. It will be seen that it is here distinctly ordered that in this operation the head of the bird is not to be severed from its body. Herein it differed from the burnt offering in chap. i. 15. At the time of the second Temple, the priest went to the south-west horn of the altar, held the two feet of the bird between two fingers, and the two wings between two fingers, stretched out the neck of the victim to the breadth of his two fingers, and cut it with the nail of his thumb, breaking open the great blood-vessel at the neck.

(9) And he shall sprinkle.—Here again there is a striking difference between the ritual in the sacrifice before us and that in the case of the regular sin offering described in the previous chapters. The blood is simply to be thrown on the walls of the altar, whilst in the ordinary sin offering, the priest had not only to dip his finger seven times in the blood of the victim, but had to put it on the horns of the altar (chap. iv. 6, 7, 17, 18, 25, 30, 34).
LEVITICUS, V.

Trespass Offering in Sacrifice.

(10) And he shall offer the second for a burnt offering, according to the 1 manner: and the priest shall make an atonement for him for his sin which he hath sinned, and it shall be forgiven him.

(11) But if he be not able to bring two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, then he that sinned shall bring for his offering the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a sin offering; he shall put no oil upon it, neither shall he put any frankincense thereon: for it is a sin offering. (12) Then shall he bring it to the priest, and the priest shall take his handful of it, 4 even a memorial thereof, and burn it on the altar, according to the offerings made by fire unto the Lord: it is a sin offering. (13) And the priest shall make an atonement for him

1 Or, ordinance.
2 ch. 2. 2.
3 ch. 4. 35.
4 as touching his sin that he hath sinned in one of these, and it shall be forgiven him: and the remnant shall be the priest's, as a meat offering.

(14) And the Lord spoke unto Moses, saying, (15) If a soul commit a trespass, and sin through ignorance, in the holy things of the Lord; then he shall bring for his trespass unto the Lord a ram without blemish out of the flocks, with thy estimation by shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary, for a trespass offering: (16) and he shall make amends for the hurt that he hath done in the holy thing, and shall add the fifth part thereto, and give it unto the priest: and the priest shall make an atonement for him with the ram of the trespass offering, and it shall be forgiven him.

(10) According to the manner.—That is, according to the rites prescribed in chap. i. 14, &c.

(11) But if he be not able.—The benign consideration for the poor, and the desire not to mutilate them too heavily for their frailties, are here still more evident in the statute before us. If anyone is so impoverished that the offering of two birds would press too heavily upon him, he might bring the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour, a little less than half a gallon.

For it is a sin offering.—That is, because it is a sin offering, and not a Minschah or meat offering (see chap. ii. 1), therefore it shall have no oil or frankincense, otherwise its distinguishing features as such would be destroyed.

(12) And the priest shall take.—After he separated a handful of the flour, which was burnt on the altar as a memorial to the Lord (see chap. ii. 12), the officiating priest consumed the rest.

According to the offering made by fire.—Better, upon the offering made by fire. (See chap. iv. 35.)

(13) As touching his sin that he had sinned in one of these.—That is, in one of the three sins specified in verses 1–4 of this chapter. (See verse 5.)

And the remnant shall be the priest's.—Better, and it shall belong to the priest. The word remnant is not in the original, and is better left out, since with the exception of the handful which he took out to burn upon the altar, the whole tenth part of the ephah of fine flour belonged to the priest.

At the time of Christ, this only took place when the offerer was a layman. But when a priest committed the offence and brought the offering in question, the whole tenth part of the ephah of flour was burnt on the altar, as was done in the case of the meat offering.

(14) And the Lord spake unto Moses.—As the introductory formula implies, this is another communication made to the lawgiver at a different time, and sets forth a further development of the laws respecting the trespass offering.

(15) If a soul commit a trespass.—The word used here for trespass is not the same which is so rendered in verse 19, and from which the noun rendered in this very chapter by trespass offering (chap. v. 6, 7, 15, 16, 19), is derived. It literally denotes to cover, then to act covertly, to be faithless, especially in matters of a sacred covenant made either with God (Lev. xxvi. 40; Num. xxxi. 16; Deut. xxxii. 51, &c.), or between husband and wife (Num. v. 12, 27).

And sin through ignorance.—If at the time of its committing he did not know that it was a transgression. (See chap. iv. 2)

In the holy things of the Lord.—That is, inadvertently keeping back the things which belong to the sanctuary, and to the service of the Lord, as, for instance, the tithes, the firstfruits, or not consecrating or redeeming his firstborn (Exod. xxviii. 38; Num. v. 6–8).

A ram without blemish.—For committing any of these transgressions presumptuously, the transgressor incurred the punishment of excision (Num. xv. 50; Heb. x. 28); but when they were done unwares, he was to bring a ram as a sacrifice. According to the rules which obtained during the second Temple, it must be over thirty-one days in the second year of its age. It was of greater value than the female sheep. The sacrifice for a trespass in holy things, though ignorantly committed, was therefore more easily than for the sin of ignorance mentioned in verse 6.

With thy estimation by shekels of silver.—That is, according to the valuation of Moses, to whom this was primarily addressed, the ram is to be so grown up as to be worth several, or at least two shekels. The act of valuing was transferred by Moses to the officiating priests. (See chap. xxvii. 8, 12; Num. xviii. 10.) For the shekels of the sanctuary see Exod. xxx. 13.

(16) And he shall make amends.—As the sacrifice was simply to atone for the transgression, the offender was in the first place to make restitution of the full value of the principal which he had inadvertently appropriated.

And shall add the fifth part thereto.—Besides paying the principal, the fifth part of the value of the holy property thus restored is to be added to the original amount. According to the rules which obtained in the time of Christ, the principal was estimated as four-fifths of the whole, and the lacking one-fifth was added. Thus, for instance, if the offender had consumed holy things to the value of four shekels, he had to pay five shekels, the fifth being added to
And if a soul sin, and commit any of these things which are forbidden to be done by the commandments of the Lord; though he wist it not, yet is he guilty, and shall bear his iniquity. And he shall bring a ram without blemish out of the flock, with thy estimation, for a trespass offering, unto the priest; and the priest shall make an atonement for him concerning his ignorance wherein he erred and wist it not, and it shall be forgiven him. (19) It is a trespass offering: he hath certainly trespassed against the Lord.

CHAPTER VI.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) If a soul sin, and commit a trespass against the Lord, and lie unto his neighbour in that which was delivered him to keep, or in anything taken away by violence, or hath deceived his neighbour, this is a trespass offering: he hath certainly trespassed against the Lord.
other frauds are admissible in which the offender possessed himself of his neighbour's property by violence and extortion.

(3) Or have found. —The fifth instance admissible is of property which was neither entrusted nor exacted but accidentally found. For the law on lost property, see Exod. xxii. 4; Deut. xxii. 1—3.

And sweareth falsely. —This refers to all the five instances specified—that is, if he denies with an oath that property had been entrusted to him, that he had robbed, or exacted, or found anything.

(4) Then it shall be, because he hath sinned, and is guilty. —Better, And it shall come to pass, when he hath so sinned, and acknowledged his guilt. (See chap. iv. 22.) That is, when he has committed any of the aforementioned offenses, and denied the sin with an oath, but afterwards voluntarily acknowledges his guilt without having been found out.

That he shall restore that . . . which he hath deceitfully gotten. —Better, Then he shall restore, &c.

(5) And shall add the fifth part more thereto. —The first thing the offender must do, when he realises and confesses his guilt, is to make restitution of the property which he had embezzled, if he still has it, or if that be impossible, he is to pay the value of it as estimated by the authorised tribunal. Besides this, the offender is to add a fifth part of the principal, to compensate for the loss which the owner sustained during the interval. It will be seen that in Exod. xxii. 1—9, when a person was guilty of any of the offenses here specified, the offender was condemned to make a fourfold restitution, whilst in the passage before us the matter is reduced to the restitution of the principal with the addition of a fifth part. The reason of this difference is that the law in Exodus deals with a culprit who is convicted of his crime in a court of justice by means of witnesses, whilst the law before us deals with an offender who, through compunction of mind, voluntarily confesses his offense, and to whom, without this voluntary confession, the offense could not be brought home. It is this difference which constitutes it a case for a trespass offering. (Comp. Num. v. 7.)

In the day of his trespass offering. —Better, on the day of his guilt. That is, as soon as he acknowledges his guilt, and brings the sacrifice for his offense, he is to make the requisite restitution.

the Lord, a ram without blemish out of the flock, with thy estimation, for a trespass offering, unto the priest: (7) and the priest shall make an atonement for him before the Lord: and it shall be forgiven him for any thing of all that he hath done in trespassing therein.

(8) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (9) Command Aaron and his sons, saying, This is the law of the burnt offering: It is the burnt offering, because of the burning upon the altar all night unto the morning, and the fire of the altar shall be burning in it.

(10) And the priest shall put on his linen garment, and his linen breeches shall he put upon his flesh, and take up the ashes

(6) With thy estimation. —That is, according to the official valuation; the ram is to be so grown up as to be worth two shekels. (See chap. v. 15.)

(7) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying. —This is the fourth instance in which this formula is used (see chap. iv. 1, v. 14, vi. 1) in Leviticus, and, as in the former passages, introduces a further communication to the lawgiver. Hitherto the law pointed out to the people under what circumstances and how they are to bring their sacrificial offerings; now directions are given to the priests how to conduct the sacrificial service of the people.

(8) It is the burnt offering, because of the burning upon the altar. —Better, This, the burnt offering, shall be upon the fire on the altar. That is, the continued burnt offering, with which the sacrifices here enumerated begin, is to remain burning upon the altar from the evening until the morning. (Comp. Exod. xxix. 38—42; Num. xxviii. 1—8.)

Shall be burning in it. —Better, shall burn by it. That is, shall be fed and kept up by it. According to the practice which obtained during the second Temple, the fat pieces of the burnt offering began to be burned at midnight, thus feeding the fire till the break of day.

(9) And the priest shall put on his linen garment. —The officiating priest was to put on his sacred garments, which consisted of four pieces viz., (1) the tunic, which was a long close robe of fine linen, with sleeves but without folds, covering the whole body, and reaching down to the feet; (2) linen breeches —better, linen drawers—which, according to the authorities during the second Temple, reached to the knees and were fastened by ribbons above the flanks; (3) a linen girdle, which, according to the same authorities, was three fingers wide and thirty-two cubits long, and, like the veil of the court and of the sanctuary, was embroidered with figures; and (4) a mitre, or, better, turban, which was likewise of fine linen, and was fastened to the head by means of ribbons, to prevent its falling off (Exod. xxviii. 4, 40, xxix. 5—10; Lev. viii. 13). Though the second and third only are here mentioned, there can hardly be any doubt that all the four garments were meant, and that the third and fourth are either omitted for the sake of brevity, or because they are included in the first term, which is the reason why some of the ancient versions have it in the plural.

357
which the fire hath consumed with the burnt offering on the altar, and he shall put them beside the altar. (11) And he shall put off his garments, and put on other garments, and carry forth the ashes without the camp unto a clean place. (12) And the fire upon the altar shall be burning in it; it shall not be put out: and the priest shall burn wood on it every morning, and lay the burnt offering in order upon it; and he shall burn thereon the fat of the peace offerings. (13) The fire shall ever be burning upon the altar; it shall never go out.

(14) And this is the law of the meat offering: the sons of Aaron shall offer it before the Lord, before the altar.

Take up the ashes which the fire had consumed with the burnt offering.—Better, take up the ashes into which the fire had consumed the burnt offering. That is, the ashes into which the consuming fire had converted the victim.

He shall put them beside the altar.—During the second Temple, a priest was appointed by lot to take off from the altar every morning at least a shovelful of ashes and carry it without the camp, and when the ashes accumulated they were entirely removed to the same place.

(13) And he shall put off his garments.—That is, the priest shall change the sacred robes in which he ministered at the altar; for other garments, though less holy, were not common, since the removing of the ashes was still a sacerdotal function. The holy garments were deposited in the cells within the precincts of the sanctuary, till they were required again for the altar service (Ezek. xliv. 19; Ezra ii. 6, 9; Neh. vii. 70). Great care was taken that the place to which the ashes were removed was still well sheltered, so that the wind should not blow them about. The priest was not allowed to scatter them, but had to deposit them gently. No stranger was permitted to gather them, or to make profit by the ashes.

(12) And the fire upon the altar shall be burning in it.—Better, and the fire upon the altar shall burn by it. This is almost a literal repetition of the last clause in verse 9, and is here introduced to caution the priest whose function it is to remove the ashes. When engaged in this act, he is to take great care that in taking off the ashes from the altar, he does not knock away the fat pieces of the burnt offering, which constitute the fuel, from the fire, and thus cause it to go out, but let it burn by the fat all night.

(10) The fire shall ever be burning.—This fire, which first came down from heaven (chap. ix. 24), was to be continually fed with the fuel especially provided by the congregation, and with the daily burnt offerings. During the second Temple, this perpetual fire consisted of three parts or separate piles of wood on the same altar: on the largest one the daily sacrifice was burnt; the second, which was called the pile of incense, supplied the fire for the morning and evening incense; and the third was the perpetual fire from which the other two portions were fed. It never was quenched till the destruction of the Temple by Nebuchadnezzar. Indeed, we are positively assured that the priests who were carried captives into Persia concealed it in a pit, where it remained till the time of Nehemiah, when it was restored to the altar (2 Macc. i. 19—22). The authorities in the time of Christ, however, assure us that the perpetual fire was one of the five things wanting in the second Temple.

(14) And this is the law of the meat offering.—In chap. ii. 1—3, where this meat offering is spoken of, the people are told what of the mincha is to consist, and what portion of it was the perquisite of the officiating priest. In the section before us (chap. vi. 14—18) additional directions are given to the priests about the eating of the portions which belong to them and about the treatment of the residue.

The sons of Aaron shall offer it.—Though in the chapter before us it literally means Aaron’s own sons, the phrase is intended to comprise his lineal descendants who succeeded to the priestly office. They, and they only, shall offer the sacrifices, but not a layman.

Before the altar.—Or, in or at the fore part of the altar. That is, at the south-easterly corner of the altar. (See chap. ii. 8.)

(15) And he shall take of it.—That is, one of the sons of Aaron mentioned in the preceding verse, whose rotation it is to serve at the altar. For an explanation of these directions see chap. ii. 2.

(19) With unleavened bread shall it be eaten.—Better, unleavened shall it be eaten. That is, the remainder of the meal is to be made into unleavened cakes, and thus be eaten. (See chap. x. 12.) By adding the word with, which is not in the original, the Authorised Version says that the priests are to eat the meat offering with the addition of unleavened cakes.

(17) I have given it unto them for their portion.—It was ordained that those who ministered at the altar should live at the altar; hence the priests had no portion or inheritance in the land.

(18) All the males among the children of Aaron.—The sin offerings, the trespass offerings, and Aaron shall eat of it. It shall be a statute for ever in your generations concerning the offerings of the Lord made by fire: every one that toucheth them shall be holy.

(19) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (20) This is the offering of Aaron and of his sons, which they shall offer unto the Lord in the day when he is anointed; the tenth part of an ephah of fine flour for a meat offering perpetual, half of it in the morning, and half thereof the remainder of the peace offerings being most holy, could only be eaten by the male members of the families of the priests within the court of the sanctuary; whilst the offerings of tithes, fruit, the shoulder and breast of the people's peace offerings, &c., being less holy, were not only eaten by the officiating priests in Jerusalem, but by their incapacitated sons, their daughters, &c., provided they were ritually clean. Any priest who ate the most holy things outside the wall of the courts, or the less holy outside of the walls of Jerusalem, received forty stripes save one.

Every one that toucheth them shall be holy. —According to this rendering, which exhibits one of the views that obtained during the second Temple, the meaning is that any one who touches the sacrifices of the first order of holiness must not only be a descendant of Aaron and a male, but must have sanctified himself by undergoing the necessary ablutions. (See chap. xxi. 6, 7.) There is, however, another view of the passage which is of equal, if not of anterior, date. That is, whosoever toucheth them shall become holy. Any layman or any ordinary utsus, &c., becomes sacred by touching one of the higher order of sanctity. (See Exod. xxix. 37, xxx. 29; Ezek. xlv. 17, xlv. 20; Hag. ii. 12.)

(20) And the Lord spake unto Moses. —The new law, which is here introduced with this special formula (see verse 8), gives directions about the meat offering which the high priest is to bring on his consecration to the pontifical office (verses 19—23). It naturally follows the sacrificial instructions given for the priests in the preceding section.

(21) This is the offering of Aaron and of his sons. —This offering, which is called the oblation of initiation, was, according to the practice which obtained during the second Temple, the mincha "of Aaron and his sons," as the text before us declares; that is, of the high priest and of every common priest. The ordinary priest, however, only offered it once on the day of his consecration, whilst the high priest was bound to offer it every day after the regular holocaust, with its meat offering and before the drink offering (Eccles. xlv. 14, with Josephus, Antiq. III. x. § 7). It is to this practice that the verse refers when he says, "For such a high priest became us . . . needeth not daily, like those high priests, to offer up sacrifices first for his own sins, &c." (Heb. vii. 27).

In the day when he is anointed. —That is, when he is anointed (comp. Gen. ii. 4) or when his anointing ceremony is completed, and he entered upon the duties of his office, which was on the eighth day. (See chap. vii. 37, ix. 14.)

A meat offering perpetual. —That is, in the case of the high priest this oblation is to be offered every day as long as he lived or held the pontifical office. This perpetual meat offering is to consist of a tenth part of an ephah, which is an omer, half of which he is to offer in the morning and half in the evening.

In a pan it shall be made. —Better, upon a flat plate. (See chap. ii. 5.)

And when it is baked thou shalt bring it in. —Better, thou shalt bring it well soaked. That is, thoroughly saturated with oil.

And the bakin or parts of the meat offering shalt thou offer. —That is, a meat offering consisted of small roasted cakes. After the flour was put into the pan, and was soaked in oil, it was divided into and baked in small pieces, apparently to represent the limbs into which the victim of the burnt offering was divided before it was burnt. (See chap. i. 8.) During the second Temple the following practice obtained. The high priest brought the whole tenth part of flour every morning. After sanctifying the whole, he divided it into halves with the measure kept in the sanctuary. He likewise brought three logs of oil, which he mingled with the flour, and kneaded six cakes of each half. After baking the cakes a little, he fried them upon the pan with some of the oil, taking care not to bake them too much, but that they should be between baked and raw, in accordance with the expression, teyshite, which the authorities of those days explained in this manner but which is rendered here in the Authorised Version by baken, and by us roasted cakes. Hereupon the high priest divided the six cakes into twelve cakes, being the same number as those of the shewbread, and offered six subdivided in two in the morning and six in the evening.

(22) And the priest of his sons. —That is, any one of his descendants who succeeds to the high priesthood is to do the same in all times to come, since it is a statute to last as long as the priesthood continues.

It shall be wholly burnt. —Unlike the ordinary meat offerings brought by the laity, which, with the exception of a handful, was the perquisite of the officiating priest (see chap. ii. 2, 3, the high priest could not eat of this mincha because he presented it himself, since it would be unseemly both to offer it to God and at the same time eat it himself. Nor was an ordinary priest allowed to eat it, because he was subordinate in rank to the officiating high priest.

(23) For every meat offering for the priest. —Better, and every meat offering of a priest. This rule applies to every meat offering brought by the priests themselves for the same reason.

(24) And the Lord spake unto Moses. —As is indicated by the special formula, this introduces a new law, or rather a more expanded law than the one contained in chap. iv. 1—5, giving more precise saying, (25) Speak unto Aaron and to his sons, saying, This is the law of the sin offering: In the place where the burnt offering is killed shall the sin offering be killed before the Lord: it is most holy. (26) The priest that offereth it for sin shall eat it: in the holy place shall it be eaten, in the court of the tabernacle of the congregation. (27) Whosoever shall touch the flesh thereof shall be holy: and when there is sprinkled of the blood thereof upon any garment, thou shalt wash that whereon it was sprinkled in the holy place. (28) But the earthen vessel wherein it is sodden shall be broken: and if it be sodden in a brasen pot, it shall be both scoured, and rinsed in water. (29) All the males among the priests shall eat thereof: it is most holy. (30) And no sin offering, whereof any of the blood is brought into the tabernacle of the congregation to reconcile withal in the holy place, shall be eaten: it shall be burnt in the fire.
The Law of LEVITICUS, VII. the Sin Offering.

CHAPTER VII.—(1) Likewise this is the law of the trespass offering: it is most holy. (2) In the place where they kill the burnt offering shall they kill the directions to the priests about the sin offering of the laity (verses 24—30).

(22) In the place where the burnt offering is killed.—That is, the north side of the altar. (See chap. i. 11.)

It is most holy.—That is, the sin offering belongs to the class of sacrifices which is most holy. (See chap. ii. 3.)

(23) The priest that offereth it for sin.—Rather, the priest that offereth it for expiation, or, the priest that expiethet sin by it. That is, who makes atonement by the blood thereof. (See chap. ix. 15.)

Shall eat it.—God gave the sin offering as food for the priests to bear the iniquity of the congregation, and to make atonement for them (chap. x. 17). It constituted a part of their livelihood (Ezek. xlv. 28, 29). The officiating priest to whom fell this perquisite could invite not only his family but other priests and their sons to partake of it. Covetous priests abused this gift (Hos. iv. 8).

In the holy place shall it be eaten.—That is, within the court of the sanctuary. Eight of the offerings had to be eaten in the precincts of the sanctuary: (1) the flesh of the sin offering (chap. iv. 26); (2) the flesh of the trespass offering (chap. vii. 6); (3) the peace offering of the congregation (chap. xxiii. 19, 20); (4) the remainder of the offering of the congregation (chap. xlv. 10, 11); (5), of the meat offering of the Israelites (chap. ii. 3—10); (6), of the two loaves (chap. xxiii. 20); (7), the shew-bread (chap. xxiv. 9); and (8), the leper's log of oil (chap. xlv. 10—12).

(24) Whosoever shall touch the flesh thereof.—Better, every one that toucheth the flesh thereof, as the Authorised Version rightly renders this phrase in verse 18 of this very chapter, where it is explained.

And when there is sprinkled . . . .—So peculiarly sacred was the sin offering, that when any of its blood chanced to spurt upon the garment of the officiating priest, or the one who brought the sacrifice, the spot which received the stain had to be washed in the room of the court provided for this purpose, wherein was a well which supplied the water for the sanctuary, thus preventing the blood from being profaned outside the holy place.

Thou shalt wash.—That is, Aaron, to whom the command was first given, and then his descendants, the priests, not the Israelite or layman.

(25) But the earthen vessel.—The earthen vessels used by the Hebrews were unplugged. The ordinary domestic vessels throughout the East are so to this day. From their porous character, therefore, they would absorb some of the fat juices of the flesh which was boiled in them for the priests to eat. And as the absorbed juices could not be washed out, the inexpensive earthenware was to be broken up. (See chap. xi. 33, 35.)

During the second Temple the fragments were carefully buried in the ground when there was a large accumulation of them.

And if it be sodden in a brasen pot.—Being a solid metal, no juices could sink into it, and any of the most holy flesh that might adhere to it could easily be removed by washing. During the second Temple the scouring was done with hot water, and the rinsing with cold.

All the males among the priests.—Not only did the officiating priest, whose perquisite the flesh of the sin offering became, and his male children, partake of it, but he could invite any other priests and their sons to the meal. It is to this practice that the apostle refers when he says, “We have an altar whereof they have no right to eat which serve the tabernacle” (Heb. xiii. 10).

And no sin offering, whereof . . . .—Better, but no sin offering, &c. The rule set forth in the preceding verse only applies to the sin offerings of the laity (chap. iv. 22, &c.); their flesh fell to the share of the priests, but the flesh of the sin offerings, the blood of which was brought into the tabernacle, “to make atonement in the sanctuary,” was not to be eaten but to be burnt. Such were the sin offerings for the high priest (chap. iv. 3, 12), and the whole congregation (chaps. iv. 13—21), and the sin offering of the Day of Atonement (chap. xvi. 27).

To reconcile withal.—Better, to make atonement for, as the Authorised Version renders it in chap. i. 4, and generally wherever it occurs.

VII.

(1) Likewise this is the law . . . .—Better, and this is the law, &c. Just as chap. vi. 24—30 contains additional regulations addressed to the priest about the rites of the sin offering, so chap. vii. 1—10 gives more precise instructions about the trespass offering, supplementing chap. v. 1—13, also designed for the guidance of the priest.

(2) In the place where they kill.—That is, the north side of the altar (chap. i. 11).

Shall they kill the trespass offering.—That is, the people who bring these sacrifices shall kill them, since the offerers themselves slaughtered the victim. (See chap. i. 5.)
tresspass offering: and the blood thereof shall be sprinkle round about upon the altar. (3) And he shall offer of it all the fat thereof; the rump, and the fat that covereth the inwards, (4) and the two kidneys, and the fat that is on them, which is by the flanks, and the caul that is above the liver, with the kidneys, it shall he take away: (5) and the priest shall burn them upon the altar for an offering made by fire unto the Lord: it is a trespass offering. (6) Every male among the priests shall eat thereof: it shall be eaten in the holy place: it is most holy. (7) As the sin offering is, so is the trespass offering: there is one law for them: the priest that makeeth atonement therewith shall have it. (8) And the priest that offereth any man's burnt offering, even the priest shall have to himself the skin of the burnt offering which he hath offered. (9) And all the meat offering that is baken in the oven, and all that is dressed in the fryingpan, and in the pan, shall be the priest's that offereth it. (10) And every meat offering, mingled with oil, and dry, shall all the sons of Aaron have, one as much as another.

(11) And this is the law of the sacrifice of peace offerings, which he shall offer unto the Lord. (12) If he offer it for a thanksgiving, then shall he offer with the sacrifice of thanksgiving unleavened cakes mingled with oil, and unleavened wafers anointed with oil, offering, which, though resembling a meat offering, had no oil put upon it (see chap. vi. 11), and the offering of jealousy (Num. v. 15).

Shall all the sons of Aaron have.—That is, whether with or without oil, the remainder of this kind of raw offering is to be equally shared by all the priests.

One as much as another.—Literally, a man as his brother; that is, every man alike. From the expression man, which, as it will thus be seen, is used in the original but does not appear in the Authorized Version, the rule obtained in the time of Christ that neither a child nor woman, though of priestly descent, could partake of this offering; but a priest who was disqualified from officiating through a physical blemish had a share in it, as he comes under the designation of man.

(11) And this is the law of the sacrifice of peace offerings.—That is, the rites to be observed in connection with this sacrifice. As in the case of the sin offering (chap. iv. 24—31 with chap. vi. 24—30) and the trespass offering (chap. v. 1—13 with chap. vii. 1—10), so here (chap. vii. 11—21), we have more specific and fuller directions given to the priests with regard to the peace offerings, about which orders had previously been given to the people (chap. iii. 1—15).

Which he shall offer.—That is, he who feels it his duty to offer it to the Lord. This common Hebrew idiom of using a verb with he in it without an antecedent is better expressed in English by the impersonal, which he shall offer, or by the passive, which shall be offered. (See verses 20, 21, 29.) Three classes of peace offerings are specified—(1) an acknowledgment of mercies received, (2) as a vow offering, (3) as a free-will offering.

(12) If he offer it for a thanksgiving.—That is, acknowledgment of special mercies received from God, such as deliverance in travels, by land or sea, redemption from captivity, restoration to health, &c., enumerated in Ps. xcvii. These are to this sacrifice that the apostle alludes when he says, "By him therefore let us offer the sacrifice of praise to God continually."

Then he shall offer with the sacrifice.—That is, with the bullock or cow if it be from the herd, or a lamb or goat if it be from the flock (chap. iii. 1).

Unleavened cakes mingled with oil.—From the fact that no mention is here made of the number and cakes mingled with oil, of fine flour, fried. (13) Besides the cakes, he shall offer for his offering leavened bread with the sacrifice of thanksgiving of his peace offerings. (14) And of it he shall offer one out of the whole oblation for an heave offering unto the Lord, and it shall be the priest's that sprinketh the blood of the peace offerings. (15) And the flesh of the sacrifice of his peace offerings for thanksgiving shall be eaten the same day that it is offered; he shall not leave any of it until the morning. (16) But if the sacrifice of his offering be a vow, or a voluntary offering, it shall be eaten the same day that he offereth his sacrifice; and on the morrow also the remainder of it shall be eaten; (17) but the remainder of the flesh of the sacrifice on the third day shall be burnt with fire. (18) And if any of the flesh of the sacrifice of his peace offerings be eaten at all on the third day, it shall not be accepted, neither shall it be imputed unto him that offereth it: it shall be an abomination, and the soul that eateth of it shall bear his iniquity. (19) And the flesh that toucheth any unclean thing shall not be eaten; it shall be burnt with fire: and as for the flesh, all that be clean shall eat thereof. (23) But the soul that eateth of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, that pertain unto the Lord, having his uncleaness upon him, even that soul shall be cut off from his people. (24) Moreover the soul that shall touch any unclean thing, as the uncleanness of man, or any unclean beast, or any abominable unclean thing, and eat of the flesh of the sacrifice of peace offerings, which pertain unto the Lord, even that soul shall be cut off from his people.

(25) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (26) Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, Ye shall eat no manner of fat, of ox, or of sheep, or of goat. (27) And the fat of the beast that dieth of itself, and the fat of that which is torn with beasts, may be used in any other use: but ye shall in no wise eat of it.

(28) For whosoever eateth the fat of the beast, of which men offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord, even the soul that eateth it shall be cut off from his people. (29) Moreover ye shall eat no manner of blood, whether it be of fowl or of beast, in any of your dwellings. (30) Whatever soul it be that eateth any manner of blood, even that soul shall be cut off from his people.

(31) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (32) Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, That offereth the sacrifice of his peace offerings unto the Lord shall bring his oblation unto the Lord of the sacrifice of his peace offerings. (33) His hands shall bring the offerings of the Lord made by fire, the fat with the breast, it shall he bring, that the breast may be waved for a wave offering before the Lord. (31) And the priest shall burn the fat upon the altar; but the breast shall be Aaron's and his sons'. (32) And the right shoulder shall ye give unto the priest for an heave offering of the sacrifices of your peace offerings. (33) He among the sons of Aaron, that offereth the blood of the peace offerings, and the fat, shall have the right shoulder for his part. (34) For the wave breast and the heave shoulder have I taken of the children of Israel from off the sacrifices of their peace offerings, and have given them unto Aaron the priest and unto his sons by a statute for ever from among the children of Israel. (35) This is the portion of the anointing of Aaron, and of the anointing of his sons, out of the offerings of the Lord made by fire, in the day when he presented them to minister unto the Lord in the priest's office; (36) which the Lord commanded to be given them of the children of Israel, in the day that he anointed them, by a statute for ever throughout their generations.

(37) This is the law of the burnt offering, of the meat offering, and of the sin offering, and of the trespass offering, and of the consecrations, and of the sacrifice of the peace offerings; (38) which the Lord commanded Moses in mount Sinai, in the day that he commanded the children of Israel to offer their oblations unto the Lord, in the wilderness of Sinai.

CHAPTER VIII.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Take Aaron and his sons with him, and the garments, and the anointing oil, and a bullock for the sin offering, and two rams, and a basket of unleavened bread;

(3) And gather thou all the congregation two kidneys and the caul of the liver above them again, and the bread above the whole, put his own hand under that of the offerer, and waved it all before the Lord. Hereupon the priest salted the inwards, and burned them upon the altar. The breast and right shoulder, as well as the bread waved before the Lord, were eaten by him and his brother priests, whilst the remainder of the flesh and the rest of the bread were eaten by the owner and his friends. If two persons brought a peace offering in partnership, one of them waved for both; and if a woman brought it, the waving was performed by the officiating priest, since women were not allowed to wave except in the offering of jealousy and of a Nazarite (Num. v. 25, vi. 20).

(39) By a statute for ever.—That is, the statute that these two parts of the peace offering are to be given to Aaron and his descendants who may officiate at this sacrifice, is binding upon the Israelites as long as the priesthood lasts.

(35) This is the portion of the anointing of Aaron and of the anointing of his sons.—Better, this is the share of Aaron and the share of his sons. That is, the wave breast and the heave shoulder.

(39) Which the Lord commanded to be given them.—That is, this command is binding upon every offerer to give the before-mentioned parts to the officiating priests, since this is their right by virtue of their office.

(35) This is the law . . .—This and the following verse sum up the whole sacrificial law contained in chap. i.—viii.

The burnt offering.—Described in chap. i. 3—17, with its supplement, chap. vi. 8—13.

The meat offering.—Described in chap. ii. 1—16, with its supplement, chap. vi. 14—18.

The sin offering.—Described in chap. iv. 1—35, with its supplement, chap. vi. 24—30.

The trespass offering.—Described in chap. v. 1—13, with its supplements, chap. v. 14—26, vi. 1—7, vii. 1—10.

And of the consecrations.—Better, and of the offering of consecration, that is, the meat offering which the high priest is to bring on his consecration to the pontifical office, described in chap. vi. 19—23.

The peace offering.—Described in chap. iii. 1—17, with its supplements, chap. vii. 11—21 and 28—36.

VIII.

(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses.—As the consecration of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood which the Lord commanded Moses to effect (Exod. xxviii. 1—43) was to be accompanied by different kinds of sacrifices (Exod. xxix. 1—37), it was first of all necessary to define the ritual of each sacrifice. This was therefore done in chaps. i.—vii., and the lawyer now proceeds to record the communication which he received from the Lord respecting the appointment to the sacerdotal office, thus resuming the narrative which was broken off at the end of Exodus.

(2) Take Aaron and his sons.—That is, order them to come and to bring with them the sacred vestments and the sacrifices to the entrance of the tent of meeting. (See verse 2.)

The garments.—Those which God had before commanded to be made. (See Exod. xxviii. 2, &c.; xxxix. 1, &c.) For the anointing oil, see Exod. xxx. 23, &c.; xxxvii. 29.

And a bullock for the sin offering, and two rams, and a basket.—Better, and the bullock, the two rams, and the basket. That is the offering about which directions are given in Exod. xxix. 1—3, thus showing the intimate connection between this part of Leviticus and the latter part of Exodus.

(3) And gather thou all the congregation together—Better, and gather all the assembly together. The same word is rightly rendered assembly in the Authorised Version in verse 4. (See chap. iv. 13.) That is, call together the assembly of the elders, the heads of the tribes, and the principal men who represented the people. This is confirmed by chap. ix. 1, where it is distinctly said that “Moses called Aaron and
And Moses said unto the congregation, This is the thing which the Lord commanded to be done. (6) And Moses brought Aaron and his sons, and washed them with water. (7) And he put upon him the coat, and girded him with the girdle, and clothed him with the robe, and put the ephod upon him, and he girded him with the curious girdle of the ephod, and bound it unto him therewith. (8) And he put the breastplate upon him; also he put in the breastplate the Urim and the Thummim. (9) And he put the mitre upon his head; also upon the mitre, even upon his forehead, did he put the golden plate, the holy crown; as the Lord commanded Moses. (10) And Moses took the anointing oil, and anointed the tabernacle and all that was therein, and sanctified them. (11) And he sprinkled thereof upon the altar his sons, and the elders of Israel," and where these elders are called in the following verse "the children of Israel," by virtue of their representing the children of Israel.

Unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.—Better, to the entrance of the tent of meeting, that is, the court-yard, whilst the people at large who wished to witness the solemn consecration of the priesthood probably occupied the neighbouring places which overlooked the enclosure. According to a tradition which obtained in the time of Christ, this ceremony took place on the 23rd of the month Adar, or February.

(5) This is the thing which the Lord commanded.—That is, these are the instructions which are given in Exod. xxix. 1—37, and which Moses now published to the assembled representatives of the people.

(6) And washed them with water.—As the first initiatory rite of the consecration, Moses caused Aaron and his sons to bathe (see chap. xvi. 4), thus symbolising their purification from sin. Where the phrase "to wash with water" is used without specifying any particular part or parts of the body, as in Gen. xix. 2, xxiv. 32, Exod. xxx. 19, 21, Deut. xxi. 6, it denotes the washing or bathing of the entire body. This was not done in the presence of the people, but in a baptistery, behind a curtain. During the second Temple the sacretual immersion could not be effected in a vessel, but had to take place in a hollow made in the ground, containing at least twenty-four cubic feet of water. The installation of the priest, which is here conducted by Moses, as the giver and representative of the Divine law, was during the second Temple performed by the Sanhedrin, who "sat in Moses' seat." (7) And he put upon him the coat.—Better, and he put upon him the tunic. For this garment see chap. vi. 10, and Exod. xxviii. 39. It will be seen that the first article of dress—viz., the drawers—distinctly mentioned in Exod. xxviii. 42, is here omitted. This arises from the fact that, being nearest to the skin, Aaron put them on himself behind the curtain, immediately after his ablution.

And girded him with the girdle.—Not the band of the ephod, which is mentioned further on by the name of "curious girdle," but the one made of needlework, with which the tunic was girded about the loins. (See chap. vi. 16, and Exod. xxviii. 39.)

The robe.—Called in Exod. xxviii. 31—35, "the robe of the ephod," which was woven without seam, and was wholly blue. (See chap. xvi. 10.) And put the ephod upon him.—The ephod, which was the distinguishing vestment of the high priest, was a sleeveless garment, and was worn over the shoulders. It was made of blue, purple, scarlet, and fine-twined linen, interwoven with golden threads. (See Exod. xxviii. 6—7.)

And he girded him with the curious girdle.—Better,—and girded him with the band. This band was not only made of the same costly materials as the ephod, but was woven out of the same piece of either side of the garment, so that the ephod had as it were two hands, which constituted the band. (See Exod. xxviii. 8.) It will be seen that this is entirely different from the girdle which was tied around the tunic, mentioned in the former part of this verse.

And he put the breast-plate upon him.—Called more fully, the "breast-plate of judgment," which was also a distinctive pontifical garment, and which was made of the same costly materials and the same skilful work as the ephod. (See Exod. xxviii. 15, &c.)

Also he put in the breast-plate the Urim and the Thummim.—Better, and he put into, &c. (See Exod. xxviii. 30), that is, Moses put into the bag of the breast-plate (comp. Exod. xxv. 16) these material objects which were separate from the breast-plate, as well as from the gems set in the breast-plate. (See Exod. xxviii. 30.)

(9) And he put the mitre.—See Exod. xxviii. 36—38.

As the Lord commanded Moses.—That is, the making of these pontifical garments here enumerated, and the investiture of the high priest by Moses, were according to the Divine command given in Exod. xxviii. 1—43.

(10) And Moses took the anointing oil.—Having invested the high priest with the visible emblems of his office and holiness, Moses now, in accordance with the directions given in Exod. xxx. 26—30, xl. 2—11, first anointed the tabernacle and all that was therein—that is, the ark of the covenant, the altar of incense, the candlestick, the table of shewbread, with all the utensils belonging unto them. For the ingredients seven times, and anointed the altar and all his vessels, both the laver and his foot, to sanctify them. (12) And he poured of the anointing oil upon Aaron’s head, and anointed him, to sanctify him. (13) And Moses brought Aaron’s sons, and put coats upon them, and girded them with girdles, and put bonnets upon them; as the Lord commanded Moses.

(14) And he brought the bullock for the sin offering: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the bullock for the sin offering. (15) And he slew it; and Moses took the blood, and put it upon the horns of the altar of burnt offering, round about with his finger, and purified the altar, and poured the blood at the bottom of the altar, and sanctified it, to make reconciliation upon it. (16) And he took all the fat that was upon the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and their fat, and Moses burned it upon the altar. (17) But the bullock, and his hide, his flesh, and his dung, he burnt with fire without the camp; as the Lord commanded Moses.

(18) And he brought the ram for the burnt offering: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the ram. (19) And he killed it; and Moses of this oil, which is also called “oil of holy unction” (Exod. xxx. 25), see Exod. xxx. 23–25.

And sanctified them.—That is, by this anointing Moses separated them from the laity, and dedicated them to the service of God, so that they were not to come in contact with any defilement. (See Exod. xxix. 37, xxx. 28–30.)

(11) And he sprinkled thereof upon the altar seven times.—That is, the altar of burnt offering. This rite of sprinkling the altar seven times is not mentioned in the directions given in Exod. xxx. 28, xl. 10. For the import of the number seven, see Levit. iv. 6.

And anointed the altar and all his vessels. —That is, the same altar of burnt sacrifice. The altar, having thus been sanctified, was thenceforward considered as sanctifying the sacrifices and oblations offered upon it. Hence the remark of Christ, “Ye fools and blind, for whether is greater, the gift, or the altar that sanctifieth the gift?” (Matt. xxii. 19).

(15) And he poured of the anointing oil upon Aaron’s head.—In the anointing of Aaron, the oil was poured upon his head. (See also chap. xxi. 10–12; Exod. xxix. 7; Ps. cxlviii. 2.) This profuse pouring of oil was repeated at the consecration of every successor to the high-priesthood, whilst the common priests were simply anointed, or were simply marked with the finger on the forehead on their first installation, and this anointing descended with them for all futurity. (See chap. vi. 3.) Tradition informs us that during the second Temple, the person who anointed the high priest first threw the oil upon his head, and then drew with his finger the sign of the letter Caph, being the initial of Cohen, i.e., priest, between the eyebrows of the newly-consecrated pontiff.

(19) And Moses brought Aaron’s sons.—Having consecrated the father as high priest, Moses now invests Aaron’s four sons, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar, with the visible signs of the priestly office by robing them in the sacerdotal garments. For these articles of dress see Exod. xxviii. 40, 41, xlix. 30, xl. 14.

(14) And he brought the bullock for the sin offering.—Though duly consecrated, Aaron and his sons had first to be purged of their sins before they could commence their priestly functions in the sanctuary. Hence, Moses, as the mediator of the covenant delegated by God to perform the act of consecration, also performed the sacrificial rites, whilst the installed priests stood as penitent sinners by the side of the sin offering which was now offered for the first time. For

of Aaron and his Sons.

round about with his finger, and purified the altar, and poured the blood at the bottom of the altar, and sanctified it, to make reconciliation upon it. And he took all the fat that was upon the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and their fat, and Moses burned it upon the altar. But the bullock, and his hide, his flesh, and his dung, he burnt with fire without the camp; as the Lord commanded Moses.

(18) And he brought the ram for the burnt offering: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the ram. (19) And he killed it; and Moses sprinkled the blood upon the altar round about. (20) And he cut the ram into pieces; and Moses burnt the head, and the pieces, and the fat. (21) And he washed the inwards and the legs in water; and Moses burnt the whole ram upon the altar: it was a burnt sacrifice for a sweet savour, and an offering made by fire unto the Lord; as the Lord commanded Moses.

(22) And he brought the other ram, the ram of consecration: and Aaron and his sons laid their hands upon the head of the ram. (23) And he slew it; and Moses took of the blood of it, and put it upon the tip of Aaron's right ear, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot. (24) And he brought Aaron's sons, and Moses put of the blood upon the tip of their right ear, and upon the thumbs of their right hands, and upon the great toes of their right feet: and Moses sprinkled the blood upon the altar round about. (25) And he took the fat, and the rump, and all the fat that was upon the inwards, and the caul above the liver, and the two kidneys, and their fat, and the right shoulder; (26) and out of the basket of unleavened bread, that was before the Lord, he took one unleavened cake, and a cake of oiled bread, and one wafer, and put them on the fat, and upon the right shoulder: (27) And he put all upon Aaron's hands, and upon his sons' hands, and waved them for a wave offering before the Lord. (28) And Moses took them from off their hands, and burnt them on the altar upon the burnt offering: they were consecrations for a sweet savour: it is an offering made by fire unto the Lord. (29) And Moses took the breast, and waved it for a wave offering before the Lord: for of the ram of consecration it was Moses' part; as the Lord commanded Moses. (30) And Moses took of the anointing oil, and of the blood which was upon the altar, and sprinkled it upon Aaron, and upon his garments, and upon his sons, and upon his sons' garments with him; and sanctified Aaron, and his garments, and his sons, and his sons' garments with him.

(31) And Moses said unto Aaron and to his sons, Boil the flesh at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and there eat it with the bread that is in the basket of consecrations, as I commanded, saying, Aaron and his sons shall eat it. And that which remaineth of the flesh and of the bread shall ye burn with fire. And ye shall not go out of the door of the tabernacle of the congregation in seven days, until the days of your consecration be at an end: for seven days shall he consecrate you. As he hath done this day, so the Lord hath commanded to do, to make an atonement for you. Therefore shall ye abide at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation day and night seven days, and keep the charge of the Lord, that ye die not:

upon the altar, and the wave-breast, which was awarded to Moses as the officiating priest on the occasion (see verse 8, and Exod. xxxii. 31, 32), the flesh of the victim is to be prepared by Aaron and his sons for the sacrificial meal (see chap. vii. 11, &c.). From the peculiar nature of this offering, however, it is ordained that the flesh is to be boiled at the entrance of the tent of meeting, not at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, as the Authorised Version has it. According to Exod. xxxii. 31, this is to take place “at the holy place,” that is, in the court, and is to be eaten with unleavened bread, thus distinguishing it from the ordinary sacrificial meal of the peace offering.

Aaron and his sons shall eat it.—This is another distinguishing feature of the sacrifice in question. Whilst to the ordinary sacrificial feasts the offerer could invite his family and strangers (see chap. vii. 15), in this no layman or non-priest could partake of the meal, because the flesh and the bread were peculiarly holy (see Exod. xxxix. 33), as this sacrifice had the same atoning virtue as the burnt offering.

And that which remaineth.—That is, if any of the flesh or cakes was not eaten upon the day on which the sacrifice was offered, it had to be burnt, which was the law in the case of the peace offering. (See chap. vii. 15, 17; Exod. xxix. 34.)

And ye shall not go out of the door of the tabernacle.—Better, and ye shall not go from the enclosure of the tent of meeting, that is, Aaron and his sons are not to go out of the court, as the consecration was not performed within but at the entrance of the tent of meeting. This is most distinctly stated in verse 35.

In seven days.—Better, for seven days. As the ceremony of consecration lasted seven days, it was but natural that Aaron and his sons were enjoined not to quit the sacred enclosure for any secular transactions during the whole of this period.

For seven days shall he consecrate you.—That is, on each of these seven days the same sacrifices are to be repeated, the sin offering, the burnt offering, and the consecration offering are to be offered up, and Aaron and his sons, as well as their garments, are to be sprinkled with the sacrificial blood and the anointing oil. (See Exod. xxix. 36.)

As he hath done this day, so . . .—Better, as hath been done this day, so . . . That is, the rites of consecration which have been performed upon you to-day, or the first day, the Lord hath commanded to be repeated every day for seven days.

CHAPTER IX.—(1) And it came to pass on the eighth day, that Moses called Aaron and his sons, and the elders of Israel; and he said unto Aaron, Take thee a young calf for a sin offering, and a ram for a burnt offering, without blemish, and offer them before the Lord. And unto the children of Israel thou shalt speak, saying, Take ye a kid of the goats for a sin offering; and a calf and a lamb, both of the first year, without blemish, for a burnt offering; (5) also a bullock and a ram for peace offerings, to sacrifice before the Lord; and a meat offering mingled with oil: for to day the Lord will appear unto you.

(5) And they brought that which Moses commanded before the tabernacle of the congregation: and all the congregation drew near and stood before the Lord. (6) And Moses said, This is the thing which the Lord commanded that ye should do: and the glory of the Lord shall appear unto you.

(7) And Moses said unto Aaron, Go unto the altar, and offer thy sin offering, and thy burnt offering, and make an atonement for thyself, and for the people: and offer the offering of the people, and make an atonement for them; as the Lord commanded. (8) Aaron therefore went unto the altar, and slew the calf of the sin offering, which was for himself. (9) And the sons of Aaron brought the blood unto him: and he dipped his finger in the blood, and put it upon the horns of the altar, and poured out the blood at the bottom of the altar: (10) but the fat, and the kidneys, and the caul above the liver of the sin offering, he burnt upon the altar; as the Lord commanded Moses. (11) And the flesh and the hide he burnt with fire without the camp.

It will be seen that the elders of the people whom Moses summoned in verse 1 to witness in behalf of the people the first ministrations of the priests, are here called "the children of Israel," thus showing that the representatives acted for the people. Hence the two terms are interchanged (see chap. viii. 2), which accounts for the fact that the Greek Version (LXX.) renders it here by "elders."

A kid of the goats ... and a calf.—Better, a shaggy-haired he-goat. (See chap. iv. 23, &c.)

(6) Also a bullock and a ram.—The elders were thus to bring on behalf of the people, (1) a he-goat for a sin offering; (2) a yearling calf and a yearling sheep for a burnt offering; and (3) an ox and a ram for a peace offering.

A meat offering mingled with oil.—The oil was to be added, as, with the exception of the small portion offered to the Lord, the meat offering was the perquisite of the officiating priests who partook of it, together with their share of the victims, and the cakes had to be made palatable for the sacred host repast. (See chap. ii. 1.)

For to-day the Lord will appear unto you.—That is, prepare and sanctify yourselves with these sacrifices, for the Lord is to manifest himself in an especial manner to signify his approval of the inauguration of Aaron and his family to the priesthood.

(5) And they brought.—That is, Aaron and his sons, according to the command of Moses, and the elders on behalf of the people, and according to the order of Aaron, who was directed by Moses so to do, brought the aforesaid sacrifices.

And all the congregation ... That is, the elders who represented the people, whom Moses summoned (see verse 1), and as many of the people as could find room assembled before the sanctuary in the court-yard, to witness the newly-installed priests officiating for the first time.

(6) And Moses said.—As the people now stood assembled in the court and around it, Moses explained to them the import of the ritual which they were about to witness in the presence of the Lord.

(7) And Moses said unto Aaron.—Though he was now the duly-installed high priest, yet he did not approach the altar till he was solemnly called upon by Moses to do it, thereby showing the authorised representatives of the people that Aaron did not take this honour to himself, but that it was the call of God by Moses. Hence, the remark of the Apostle, "And no man taketh this honour unto himself, but he that is called of God, as was Aaron; so also Christ glorified not himself to be made an high priest, but he that said unto him," &c. (Heb. v. 4, 5.)

Make atonement for thyself and the people.—The fact that these sacrifices which the high priest is to bring are here described as designed to make atonement for himself and the people, goes far to confirm the ancient interpretation that reference is here made to the particular sin which Aaron and the people committed in common, and that it is the sin of the golden calf (see verse 2), which is so emphatically described in the words "they made the calf which Aaron made" (Exod. xxxii. 35). Hence, whilst their share of the sin is to be atoned by a special sacrifice (see verse 15), they are yet to participate in the atoning virtue of Aaron's sacrifice because they prevailed on him to make the calf (Exod. xxxii. 1).

(9) And the sons of Aaron brought the blood.—His sons, for whom the sacrifice was offered as well as for himself, and who assisted at the ritual, after catching the blood in a bowl (see chap. i. 5), brought it to Aaron, who stood at the altar waiting to receive it. Unlike the ordinary law of the sin offering for the high priest and for the people, the blood of which was taken into the tabernacle (see chap. iv. 7, 16-18), Aaron on this occasion simply put some of it upon the four horns of the brazen altar as Moses had done in the sin offering of consecration (see chap. viii. 15). For, though high priest, he had not as yet access to the holy place of the sanctuary till he had qualified himself by this sacrifice in the court-yard.

(10) But the fat ... he burnt upon the altar.—The fat portions of this sin offering Aaron was still to burn upon the altar as Moses had done before (see chap. viii. 14, 21, 28), since the miraculous fire from God did not issue forth till the burnt offering of the people was offered. (See verse 14.)

And the flesh and the hide he burnt.—The flesh and the hide, which were ordinarily the perquisite of the officiating priest (see chap. vi. 26), were on this occasion to be burnt, because the priest fire without the camp. (12) And he slew the burnt offering; and Aaron's sons presented unto him the blood, which he sprinkled round about upon the altar. (13) And they presented the burnt offering unto him, with the pieces thereof, and the head: and he burnt them upon the altar. (14) And he did wash the inwards and the legs, and burnt them upon the burnt offering on the altar.

(15) And he brought the people's offering, and took the goat, which was the sin offering for the people, and slew it, and offered it for sin, as the first. (16) And he brought the burnt offering, and offered it according to the manner. (17) And he brought the meat offering, and took an handful thereof, and burnt it upon the altar, beside the burnt sacrifice of the morning.

was not permitted to partake of the sin offering which he offered for himself. (See chap. iv. 35.)

(12) And he slew the burnt offering.—As was the order of the sacrifices which Moses brought (see chap. viii. 15—21), so here the sin offering is followed by the burnt offering. The ram (see verse 2) which constituted this sacrifice Aaron slew at the north side of the altar (see chap. i. 11), and after the blood had been received into the bowl by his sons who assisted him, and had been handed to him, Aaron sprinkled it around the altar in the same manner as Moses had done before. (See chap. viii. 12.)

(13) With the pieces thereof.—Literally, according to its pieces, or piece by piece, that is, after it had been cut up into the pieces as ordered in chap. i. 6, and as the burnt-offering offered by Moses was cut up (see chap. viii. 20), his sons handed the dismembered victim to him piece by piece. The process of cutting up is not mentioned, because it is implied in the fact that the ritual on this occasion was exactly the same as in the offerings made by Moses.

(14) And burnt them upon the burnt offering.—That is, no special fire to be kindled for it, but this burnt offering is to be put upon the top of the burning sin offering. (See chap. iv. 35.)

(15) And he brought the people's offering.—Being reconciled to God by the atoning sacrifice which he offered for his own share in the sin, Aaron was now qualified to offer the sin offering of the people.

(16) As the first.—The ritual in this sacrifice Aaron conducted in the same manner as in the foregoing one offered for himself. (See verse 8.) He accordingly burnt the flesh without the camp, for which he was reproved by Moses.

(17) And he brought the burnt offering.—That is, the yearling calf and the lamb (see verse 3), which he offered according to the rites prescribed in chap. i. 3, &c. The same expression “manner,” in the sense of prescribed ritual, also occurs in chap. v. 10, where, like here, it is rendered in the Margin by “ordinance.”

Beside the burnt sacrifice of the morning.—That is, in addition to the lamb which was daily offered as a burnt sacrifice, and was accompanied by a meat offering (Exod. xxix. 30, 40). Accordingly Aaron began his priestly functions by first offering the daily morning sacrifice which took precedence of all other sacrifices, and which was never superseded by the extra offerings; then followed the other sacrifices here described.

(18—21) He slew also the bullock.—Better, and he slew, &c. With this peace offering, which was carried out according to the rules prescribed in chap. iii. 1, &c., concluded the sacrificial ceremony of the installation of the priesthood and the sanctification of the people.

(22) And Aaron lifted up his hand.—Having now completed the rites of the various sacrifices, and whilst still standing on the elevation leading to the altar, Aaron with uplifted hands solemnly pronounced upon the assembled people the priestly benediction prescribed in Num. vi. 24—26. As the Lord separated the tribe of Levi to bless the people in His name (Deut. x. 16), the descendants of Aaron to this day pronounce this benediction upon the congregation in the synagogue at certain periods of the year. In accordance with the remark in the passage before us, they are obliged to turn their faces to the people. In lifting up their hands above their shoulders, stretching them forward towards the worshippers, each priest joins his hands together by the thumbs and the two forefingers, separating the other two fingers so as to produce a triple division. (See Num. v. 24, &c.)

And came down from the offering.—That is, from the elevated standing-place by the side of the altar, which was ascended by a gently sloping dam of earth, since no steps were allowed (see Exod. xx. 3), and which during the second Temple was three cubits high.

(23) Went into the tabernacle of the congregation.—Better, went into the tent of meeting. The sacrifices being ended, there still remained the burning of the incense on the golden altar which stood in the tabernacle. Hence Aaron, conducted by Moses, left the court where the altar of burnt offering stood, and where the sacrifices had been offered, and went into LEVITICUS, X.

Bless the People.

Moses and Aaron

the congregation, and came out, and blessed the people: and the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the people. (23) And there came a fire out from before the Lord, and consumed upon the altar the burnt offering and the fat: which when all the people saw, they shouted, and fell on their faces.

CHAPTER X.—(1) And Nadab and Abihu, the sons of Aaron, took either of them his censer, and put fire there-the holy place where the altar of incense stood to perform this last act of the ritual. (See Exod. xxv. 44.)

Having already delivered to Aaron the charge of all the things connected with the sacrifices in the court, Moses now also committed to him the care of the things within the sanctuary, showing him, at the same time, how to offer the incense, how to arrange the showbread on the table, how to light and trim the lamps of the candlestick, &c., all of which were in the sanctuary. There can, however, hardly be any doubt that whilst there they prayed, as tradition informs us, for the promised manifestation of the Divine presence.

And came out, and blessed the people.—According to an ancient tradition embodied in the Chaldee Version of the Pentateuch, the blessing which Moses and Aaron unctly bestowed upon the people on coming out of the sanctuary, was as follows:—"May the word of the Lord accept thy sacrifice with favour, and renit and pardon thy sins." And the glory of the Lord appeared.—To show his gracious acceptance of the institution of the priesthood, and of the whole service connected therewith, God manifested himself in the more luminous appearance of the cloud pillar. This glorious appearance which, in a lesser degree, always filled the tabernacle, was now visible in greater elegance to all the people who witnessed the installation. (Comp. Exod. xvi. 10, xi. 34; 1 Kings viii. 10—12.)

(23) And there came a fire.—As a further indication of His acceptance of all the foregoing rites, the Lord sent forth from the luminous cloud flashes of fire, which, on this occasion, suddenly consumed in the sight of the people the victims that ordinarily continued smouldering on the altar all the day and all the night. In this manner God afterwards testified His acceptance of the sacrifice of Gideon (Judges vi. 20, 21), of Elijah (1 Kings xviii. 28), and of the sacrifices of Solomon at the dedication of the Temple (2 Chron. vii. 1, 2). Tradition assures us that the sacred fire which thus issued forth from the immediate presence of God continued to be nourished on the altar with the fuel especially provided by the congregation, and constituted the perpetual fire. (See chap. vi. 13.)

They shouted, and fell on their faces.—On seeing these visible tokens of the Divine acceptance of the services, the people expressed their thankfulness in the same manner as they showed it on a similar occasion. Thus we are told:—"When all the sons of Israel saw how the fire came down, and the glory of the Lord shone upon the house, they bowed themselves with their faces to the ground upon the pavement, and worshipped and praised the Lord, saying, For he is good, for his mercy endureth for ever" (2 Chron. xxvii. 3).

(1) And Nadab and Abihu.—Immediately after the Divine manifestation of God's acceptance of the services connected with the institution of the priesthood, and whilst the congregation are still giving utterance to their profound expressions of thankfulness and joy, the assembled people see a most daring act of sacrilege committed by two of the five newly-installed priests, and have to witness the most awful punishment which befalls the offenders. The offenders are the two eldest sons of Aaron, who had received the high distinction to be invited to accompany their father and Moses to the summit of the hallowed mount (Exod. xxv. 1); the lesson to the Israelites being that the priests, though mediators between God and the people, are beset with the same infirmities as the laity, and must not presume upon their office.

Took either of them his censer.—The sin of Nadab and Abihu was of a complicated nature, and involved and consisted of several transgressions:—(1) They each took his own censer, and not the sacred utensil of the sanctuary. (2) They both offered it together, whereas the incense was only to be offered by one. (3) They presumptuously encroached upon the functions of the high priest; for according to the Law the high priest alone burnt incense in a censer. (See chap. xvi. 12, 13; Num. xvii. 11.) The ordinary priests only burnt it on the golden altar in the holy place (Exod. xxx. 7, 8), or on the brazen altar as a part of the memorial. (See chap. ii. 2, 3, 16, &c.) The case of Korah and his company was an exception, since it was already ordered by Moses for an especial purpose (Num. xvi. 6—25). (4) They offered the incense at an unauthorised time, since it was apart from the morning and evening sacrifice.

And offered strange fire.—They filled their vessels with common fire instead of taking it from the holy fire of the altar, which was always to be used in burning incense. (See chap. ix. 24, xvi. 12.) It is with reference to this practice that we are told:—"And the angel took the censer, and filled it with fire off the altar" (Rev. viii. 3). Ancient tradition says that Nadab and Abihu had partaken too freely of the drink offering, and performed their service in a state of intoxication, when they were incapacitated to distinguish between what was legal and illegal. So general was this tradition that it is actually embodied in the Palestinian Chaldee Version of verse 9, which contains the solemn warning against wine to those engaged in the service of the sanctuary, and which is regarded as a sequel to this awful catastrophe. Others, however, suppose that the phrase "strange fire" denotes not offered according to the prescribed law, just as "strange incense" is used in the sense of incense not prepared in the manner ordered by the Law (Exod. xxx. 9).

Before the Lord.—This may mean before the door of the sanctuary (see chap. i. 6), or in front of the holy of holies. (See chap. i. 6.) As the dead bodies are said in verse 4 to have lain in the court of the tabernacle, the former must be the meaning in the passage before us.

Which he commanded them not.—According to a figure of speech frequently used in Hebrew, where the negative form is used for the emphatic affirmative, this phrase is better rendered, which he had strongly forbidden them. Though the command is only expressed in chap. xvi. 12, there can hardly be any doubt that it was previously given by Moses, since it is implied.
in, and put incense thereon, and offered strange fire before the Lord, which he commanded them not. (2) And there went out fire from the Lord, and devoured them, and they died before the Lord. (3) Then Moses said unto Aaron, This is it that the Lord spake, saying, I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me, and before all the people I will be glorified. And Aaron held his peace. (4) And Moses called Mishael and Elzaphan, the sons of Uzziel the in chaps. i. 7, vi. 12. A similar reference to a well-known statement, though not here recorded, we have in the following verse.

(3) And there went out fire from the Lord.—By fire they smote, and by fire they died. The Divine fire which issued forth to consume the sacrifices as a token of acceptance, now descended as the avenger of sin to consume the sacrificers, just as the same gospel is to one a savour of life unto life, and to another a savour of death unto death. (2 Cor. ii. 16.)

And devoted them.—That is, slay them, since we are told in verse 5 that not only were their bodies in a perfect state of preservation, but even their garments were not burnt. The word consume, however, is used here to keep up the connection between this verse and chap. ix. 24.

They died before the Lord.—That is, in the court of the sanctuary (see verse 1), on the very spot where the sin was committed.

(4) Then Moses said ... This is it that the Lord spake.—Here we have another instance of a reference to a well-known Divine communication made through Moses, which has not been previously recorded in the Pentateuch. Moses adduces this declaration to explain the bereaved father the judgment of God.

I will be sanctified in them that come nigh me.—Better, I will sanctify myself in them that come near to me. God had sanctified to himself Aaron and his sons by the holy unction (see chap. viii. 10, 12), that they might sanctify Him in the strict performance of their sacred duties as the mediators between God and man. Having failed to do this, God sanctified himself in them by the awful punishment inflicted upon them for their transgression. (See Ezek. xxvii. 22, xxviii. 16, 23.) The phrase, “that come near to God,” is a frequent designation for the priest. (Exod. xix. 22; Numb. xvi. 5; Ezek. xlix. 13, xlix. 19.)

And before all the people I will be glorified.—Better, and I will glorify myself before all the people. By this judgment God vindicated His law, showing that it cannot be violated with impunity, and thus glorified Himself as the Holy One of Israel. And Aaron bore his peace.—He silently submitted to the righteous judgment which bereft him of his two sons. So the Psalmist, “I was dumb, I opened not my mouth; because thou didst it” (xxxix. 9).

(5) And Moses called ... the sons of Uzziel.—Uzziel was the son of Kohath, the younger brother of Amram. As Amram was the father of Aaron, Uzziel was the uncle of Aaron. Uzziel had three sons, of whom Mishael and Elzaphan were two (Exod. vi. 18, 22). Eleazar and Ithamar, as ordinary priests, might have been employed in removing the remains of their slain brothers. (See chap. xxxi. 1–4.) Naturally they were too much affected by this appalling scene; Moses therefore wanted to spare their feelings, and hence charged their cousins-german with the task of carrying away the dead bodies. The reason why Ithar and Hebron, the two older uncles of Aaron, are here passed over is because the discontent of their children with the choice of Aaron and his sons to the priesthood, which afterward broke out in open rebellion on the part of Korah, Ithar’s son (Numb. xvi., xvii.), had evidently begun to show itself when they witnessed the imposing ceremonies of the consecration. It was necessary that those who suffered so signal a transgression of the Divine institutions should be buried by men whose allegiance to God’s law was unimpeachable.

Carry your brethren.—That is, your kinsmen. The expression brother is frequently used in the Bible in the sense of near relation. (See Gen. xiii. 8, xiv. 6, xxiv. 48, xxix. 12–15, &c.)

From before the sanctuary.—In the courtyard of the sanctuary, where the incense was offered in the midst of the rejoicing people, and where they were struck dead. (See chap. ix. 5.)

(6) And carried them in their coats.—Better, and they carried them in their tunics, the long white garments in which they ministered, and which were the most characteristic part of the sacerdotal vestments. In ordinary cases the cast-off dresses of the priests were converted into wick for the lamps of the sanctuary, but in this case they were buried with the persons, for apart from their becoming unclean by their contact with the corpses, no one would have used them, having been worn at a time of so awful a visitation.

Out of the camp.—Burial places in ancient times were outside the towns in open fields. (See Gen. xxiii. 9, 17; Matt. xxvii. 71; Luke viii. 27.)

(7) Uncover not your heads.—Better, let not your heads be dishevelled. It was the custom for mourners to let their hair grow long, and let it fall in a disorderly and wild manner over the head and face. (See chaps. xiii. 40, xvi. 10; 2 Sam. xx. 30, xix. 4, &c.) For this reason the priests who are consecrated to the service of the Lord are even on ordinary occasions not to share their heads nor suffer their locks to grow long. (Ezek. xlv. 20.) On this occasion more especially Aaron and his two surviving sons are forbidden to give way to these manifestations of grief, since it might be considered as a reflection upon the justice of the punishment.

Neither rend your clothes.—This was another ordinary manifestation of sorrow and mourning. (See Gen. xxxvii. 29, 34; Josh. vii. 6; 2 Sam. xiii. 21, &c.) To this day the Jews observe this custom of mourning for the death of their near relations; they tear their

372
Israel, bewail the burning which the Lord hath kindled. (7) And ye shall not go out from the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: for the anointing oil of the Lord is upon you. And they did according to the word of Moses.
(8) And the Lord spake unto Aaron, saying, (9) Do not drink wine nor strong drink, thou, nor thy sons with thee, when ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation, lest ye die: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations: (10) and that ye may put difference between holy and unholy, and between clean and unclean; (11) and that ye may teach the children of Israel all the statutes which the Lord hath spoken unto them by the hand of Moses.
(12) And Moses spake unto Aaron, and unto Eleazar and unto Ithamar, his sons that were left, Take the meat offering that remaineth of the offerings of the Lord made by fire, and eat it without leaven beside the altar: for it is garments, let their hair and nails grow, and do not wash. And lest wrath come upon all the people.—The transgression of this command would not only bring down upon Aaron and his sons the same awful judgment, but would expose the whole community to the Divine wrath. In virtue of the intimate connection which subsisted between the representative of the nation and the people, a sin committed by the high priest in his official position involved the whole community, and they had to share the consequences of the offence. (See chap. iv. 3.)

But let your brethren.—The afflicted relatives were, however, not to be deprived of all the customary expressions of mourning. The whole house of Israel, who are here designedly called “the brethren” of the bereaved, to show the depth of their sympathy, were allowed to mourn over the great calamity which had thus befallen them.

From the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.—Better, away from the entrance of the tent of meeting. (See chap. i. 3.) But Aaron and his sons are not to quit the court of the sanctuary to take part in the burial.

For the anointing of the Lord is upon you.—The reason why they are not to join in the funeral rites is that they had been devoted by this holy anointing to the service of God. Earthly relations were, therefore, not to interfere with the duties to God. Hence, it was sin for priests to mourn when they ministered before the Lord. (See chap. xxi. 10—12.) This law was strictly observed during the second Temple. When an officiating priest heard of the death of a relative, he did not quit the sanctuary, lest it should appear that he had greater love for the dead person than for the living God.

And the Lord spake unto Aaron.—As half of the staff of the priesthood had thus been struck down, and the other half were not allowed to mourn over the departed, the chief of the survivors might have thought that God was altogether displeased with the newly-created pontificate. To comfort him, therefore, as well as to restore the prestige of this sacred office in the eyes of the people, who had witnessed the disobedience and punishment of the spiritual functionaries, the Lord, who hitherto made all such communications to Moses, now honours Aaron with speaking to him immediately.

Do not drink wine.—As the command that the priests are to abstain from any intoxicating liquors when performing their sacred functions follows so closely upon the death of Nadab and Abihu, the opinion obtained as early at least as the time of Christ that there is a connection between the specific sin and the general law, that the two sons of Aaron drank wine to excess when they offered strange fire, and that the present prohibition is based upon that circumstance. Accordingly, the Apostle enjoins that a bishop “must not be given to wine,” that “deacons must not be given to much wine” (1 Tim. iii. 2, 3). A similar law existed among the ancient Greeks and Persians, enjoining the priests to abstain from wine.

Nor strong drink.—The word (šēḥār) here rendered strong drink, is the general name of intoxicating drinks, whether made of wheat, barley, millet, apples, dates, honey, or other fruits. One of the four intoxicating drinks which are prohibited among the Mahommedans in India is called “Sachar.”

When ye go into the tabernacle of the congregation.—Better, when ye go into the tent of meeting. The Palestinian Chahibee adds here, “as thy sons did who died by the burning fire.” The same precept is repeated in Ezek. xlv. 21. “Neither shall any priest drink wine when they enter into the inner court.” The injunction that on these particular occasions the priests are to abstain from taking it clearly implies that, ordinarily, when not going into the tent of meeting—that is, when not performing their sacred functions in the sanctuary—they were not forbidden to use it if required.

And that ye may put difference.—The motive here assigned for their abstention from intoxicating liquor is, that by keeping sober they might be able to discriminate between the legal and illegal points in the prescribed observances, which required the greatest care. Thus, for instance, the rules as to which places and days and sundry portions of the offerings were holy or common, or as to holy fire and common fire, which Nadab and Abihu violated; or about ceremonially clean and unclean men, women, animals, and unclean. (See Ezek. xlv. 23.)

And that ye may teach.—The priests were not only to keep sober to be able to decide the questions of ritual, but they were to teach the people, since the ceremonial law affected domestic life and social intercourse (Deut. xxxiii. 10; Mal. ii. 7). For neglecting these duties, the prophet charges them:—“Her priests have violated my law, and have profaned my holy things: they have put no difference between the holy and profane, neither have they showed difference [i.e., taught the people the difference] between the unclean and the clean” (Ezek. xxi. 26).

And Moses spake unto Aaron.—This communication, which refers to the sacrifices offered on the eighth day, or the day after the consecration was finished, Moses made to Aaron and his two surviving sons immediately after the calamity that had befallen them. As Aaron lost his two eldest sons in consequence of their having violated the sacrificial regulations, Moses is most anxious to guard him and his two younger sons against transgressing any other part of the ritual connected with the same sacrifices, lest they also should incur a similar punishment.

Take the meat offering that remaineth of the offerings.—The meat offering which was offered by the nation the day after the consecration, when the calamity happened (see chap. ix. 17), and which was not as yet eaten. With the exception of the handful which was burnt on the altar, all belonged to the priests. (See chaps. ii. 1—3, vi. 14—18.)

And eat it without leaven beside the altar.—That is, in the court of the tent of meeting, where the altar of burnt offering stood. (See chap. vi. 16.)

For it is most holy.—Hence it could only be eaten by the male members of the families of the priests within the court of the sanctuary. (See chap. vi. 18.)

And ye shall eat it in the holy place.—Better, and ye shall eat it in a holy place, that is, in any part of the holy court; it was not to be taken out of the precincts of the sanctuary.

And the wave breast and heave shoulder.—That is, of the peace offering which was offered by the nation. (See chap. ix. 18—21.) As they were given to the priests for the maintenance of their families (see chap. vii. 34), those portions might be eaten anywhere within the camp, provided the place was not defiled by ceremonial uncleanness.

The heave shoulder and the wave breast shall they bring.—That is, the officers who devoted those portions of the peace offering to the Lord, are to bring them to the officiating priests. (See chap. vii. 29, 30.)

And Moses diligently sought the goat.—That is, the flesh of the goat of the sin offering which was offered by the nation on the eighth day. (See chap. ix. 15.)

And, behold, it was burnt.—Being overwhelmed with grief at the loss of their brothers, Eleazar and Ithamar could not eat, and as none but priests were allowed to partake of the flesh of the sin offering, they burnt it on the altar, to prevent its corruption. They did this all the more readily since the flesh of Aaron's sin offering was just before burnt without the camp. (See chap. ix. 11.)

And he was angry with Eleazar and Ithamar.—As it was Aaron's duty quite as much as his two sons to eat of the flesh, Moses probably omitted to mention his name, because he wished to spare the honour of the pontiff in the sight of the people.

Wherefore have ye not eaten the sin offering in the holy place, seeing it is most holy, and God hath given it you to bear the iniquity of the congregation, to make atonement for them before the Lord?—Behold, the blood of it was not brought in within the holy place: ye should indeed have eaten it in the holy place, as I commanded. (19) And Aaron said unto Moses, Behold, this day have they offered their sin offering and their burnt offering before the Lord; and such things have befallen me: and if I had eaten the sin offering to day, should it have been accepted in the sight of the Lord? (20) And in the court-yard of the sanctuary, as Moses commanded in chap. vi. 26.

(19) And Aaron said.—Though, according to verse 16, Moses only blamed Eleazar and Ithamar for this transgression of the law, yet there can hardly be any doubt that Aaron was included in this censure, and that the lawgiver abstained from expressing his anger against the pontiff because of the supreme dignity of his office, which he would not lower in the sight of the people. Aaron, however, was fully sensible of this, and hence replies to the charge brought against his sons.

They offered their sin offering.—Before proceeding to the transgression with which they are thus charged, Aaron adverted to the fact that all the other sacrificial duties in which he and his sons were engaged on the same day, prior to the great calamity, were performed in strict accordance with the prescribed ritual. His sons assisting him had offered “their”—i.e., the people’s—sin and burnt offerings (see chap. ix. 15, 16) thus far in due compliance with the requirements of the law, and hence could never have meant to transgress intentionally.

And such things have befallen me.—But whilst he, Eleazar, and Ithamar were thus duly performing the sacrificial rites, Nadab and Abihu, his other two sons, transgressed, and were suddenly struck down dead, thus overwhelming the survivors with sorrow, and rendering them unfit to partake of the sacrifices.

And if I had eaten.—Aaron submits that, unfeated as they thus were by mourning and the sense of their own sinfulness, if they had partaken of this solemn meal it would not have been acceptable to the Lord. In consequence of this declaration, the rule obtained during the second Temple, that when an ordinary priest heard of the death of a relative whilst on duty in the sanctuary, he had to cease from service, though he could not leave the precincts of the Temple otherwise he defiled the sacrifice; whilst the high priest, who could continue his sacred ministrations, was not allowed to partake of the sacrificial meal.

(20) And . . . he was content.—He acknowledged Aaron’s plea to be just, and that he had himself spoken hastily. This is a remarkable instance of Moses’ humility, and of the human side of his nature as a lawgiver. (See also Num. xxxii. 6, &c.) Hence Jewish tradition from time immemorial ascribes the mistake to Moses, and not to Aaron. The paraphrase of this verse in the Palestinian Chaldee Version, which embodies the ancient opinions, is very instructive. It is as follows: “And when Moses heard it, he approved of this explanation. Whenceupon he sent a herald through the whole camp of Israel, saying, It is I from whom the law had been hid, and my brother Aaron brought it to my remembrance.”

when Moses heard that, he was content.

CHAPTER XI. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses and to Aaron, saying unto them, (2) Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, ‘These are the beasts which ye shall eat among all the beasts that are on the earth.

(3) WHATSOEVER PARTETH THE HOOF, AND IS

XI.

(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses and to Aaron.—Lest the reburial which Moses publicly administered to the priests (see chap. x. 16) should diminish their influence with the people, whom they had to teach the laws of clean and unclean things (see chap. x. 10, 11) laid down in the following chapters, the Lord here honours Aaron, as well as Moses, by making this communication to them conjointly. Besides, Aaron as minister was as much concerned in these laws as Moses the legislator. Hence, when a question of definition had afterwards to be decided, it was brought for judgment before Moses and Aaron conjointly. (See Num. ix. 6).

(2) These are the beasts which ye shall eat among all . . .—Better, These are the animals which ye may eat of all . . . . The dietary laws, which stand first in the general precepts about clean and unclean things, begin with the quadrupeds, or land animals, both domesticated and wild. This is in accordance with the Hebrew division of the animal kingdom into four principal classes:—(1) the land animals, (2) the water animals, (3) the birds of the air, and (4) the swimming animals. Though not specified here by name, yet the parallel regulations in Deut. xiv. 3, enumerate the following ten animals:—the ox, the sheep, the goat, the hart, the roebuck, the fallow deer, the wild goat, the pygarg, the wild ox, and the chamois, with their various kindred species, which are not mentioned.

From the expression, “These are the animals,” the opinion obtained during the second Temple that God actually caused specimens of every animal to pass before Moses and Aaron, in order to show them the veritable creatures which are clean and unclean, just as the Lord caused every species to come to Noah into the ark.

(3) Whatsoever parteth the hoof, and is clovenfooted.—Better, Whatsoever is clovenfooted, and entirely separated the hoofs. The first rule laid down by which the clean quadruped is to be distinguished is that the hoofs must be completely cloven or divided above as well as below, or, as the parallel passage in Deut. xiv. 6 has it, “and cleaveth the cleft into two claws.” Such is the case in the foot of the ox, the sheep, and the goat, where the hoof is wholly divided below as much as above. The foot of the dog, the cat, and the lion, though exhibiting a division into several distinct claws, is contrary to the regulation here laid down, inasmuch as the division is simply on the upper side, the lower side being united by a membrane, and hence the hoof is not “entirely separated.”

And cheweth the cud.—In addition to the foot being perfectly cloven, the quadruped to be clean is to be ruminating. The canon which obtained during the second Temple is thus formulated: “Every quadruped closen-footed, and cheweth the cud, among the beasts, that shall ye eat. (4) Nevertheless these shall ye not eat of them that chew the cud, or of them that divide the hoof: as the camel, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof; he is unclean unto you. (5) And the coney, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof; he is unclean unto you. (6) And the hare, because he cheweth the cud, but divideth not the hoof; he is unclean unto you. (7) And the swine, though he divide the hoof, and be clovenfooted, yet he cheweth not the cud; he is unclean to you.
Of their flesh ye shall not eat, and their carcase shall ye not touch; they are unclean to you.

These shall ye eat of all that are in the waters, whatsoever hath fins and scales in the waters, in the seas, and in the rivers, thou shalt ye eat.

And all that have not fins and scales in the seas, and in the rivers, of all that move in the waters, and of any living thing which is in the waters, they shall be an abomination unto you: (11) they shall be even an abomination unto you; ye shall not eat of their flesh, but ye shall have their carcases in abomination. (12) Whosoever hath no fins nor scales in the waters, that shall be an abomination unto you.

And these are they which ye shall have in abomination among the fowls; they shall not be eaten, they are an

To the latter class belong the shark tribe, the sturgeons with their caviare, the lamprey, and the nine-eyed eel; (3) The head of clean fishes is more or less broad, whilst that of the unclean kinds is more or less pointed at the end, as the eel, the mammalian species, &c.; (4) The swimming bladder of clean fishes is rounded at one end, and pointed at the other, whilst that of the unclean fishes is either rounded or pointed at both extremities alike. It is in allusion to this law that we are told in the parable of the fisherman, which is taken from Jewish life, that when they drew to shore the net with every kind of fishes, the fisherman sat down (i.e., to examine the clean and the unclean), and gathered the good (i.e., the clean), into the vessels, but cast the bad (i.e., the unclean) away (Matt. xiii. 48). The orthodox Jews to this day strictly observe these regulations, and abhor eating those fishes which are enumerated under the four above-named criteria of not clean. It is moreover to be remarked that fishes without scales are also still regarded in Egypt as unwholesome, and that the Romans would not permit them to be offered in sacrifice.

(10) Of all that move in the waters.—That is, apart from the fishes exhibiting the above-named signs, all other inhabitants of the water are forbidden. Hence all shell-fish, whether molluscs or crustaceans, and echinoid animals, are unclean.

Ye shall have in abomination among the fowls.—The third of the four great divisions of the animal kingdom—viz., the birds of the air, in accordance with their proper sequence—is discussed in verses 13—19. It will be seen that, whilst in the case of the two preceding divisions of the animal kingdom certain signs are given by which to distinguish the clean from the unclean animals, in the division before us a list is simply given of the birds which are unclean and prohibited. This absence of all criteria is all the more remarkable, since after some of the birds mentioned it is added “after his kind,” or “after her kind” (see verses 14—16, 19), thus showing that kindred species were included in the prohibition, and that it was left to those who had to administer this law, to lay down some general signs by which the prescribed species are to be known. Hence the following rules obtained during the Second Temple. Those birds are unclean (1) which swallow their food in the air, and devour it without first dropping it on the ground; (2) which strike with their talons and press down with their foot the prey to the ground, and then tear off pieces with their beak for consumption; (3) which “divide their feet” when standing on an extended rope or branch, placing two toes on the one side and two on the other, and not three in front and one behind; and (4) whose eggs are equally narrow or equally round at both ends, and have the white in the middle and the yolk around it.

377
abomination: the eagle, and the ossifrage, and the ospray, (15) and the vulture, and the kite after his kind;

(15) every raven after his kind; (16) and the owl, and the night hawk, and the cuckow, and the hawk after his kind,

The eagle.—As the king of the birds, the eagle stands first in the list. It denotes here all the species of the eagle proper. Arabic writers, scientific travellers, and the most distinguished naturalists, concur in their testimony that the eagle eats carrion when it is still fresh, thus harmonizing with the description in Job xxxix. 10; Prov. xxx. 17; Matt. xxiv. 39, 40. The assertion, therefore, that the bird here meant is the Egyptian vulture, because the eagle disdains dead bodies and feeds only on what it kills itself, is erroneous. Besides the kindred diatlects, all the ancient versions and the best Hebrew scholars place it beyond a doubt that Nesther here denotes eagle. Afterwards, however, the carrion-kite and the golden vulture were also reckoned among the different species of eagles. Hence the allusion in Micah i. 16.

The ossifrage.—That is, the bone-breaker, or simply the breaker, is the literal translation of the expression here used in the original, which only occurs again in the parallel passage in Deut. xiv. 12. It is most probably the bearded griffin or lammergeier, which unites in itself the eagle and the vulture, and is therefore aptly called gypaetus or vulture-eagle, and appropriately stands in the list here between the eagle and the vulture. The fitness of its name may be seen from its habits. It takes the bones of animals, which other birds of prey have denuded of the flesh, up into the air and then lets them fall upon a well-selected projecting rock, and thus literally breaks them in order to get at their marrow, or to render the fragments of the bones more digestible.

And the ospray, or sea-eagle. It is about the size of the golden-eagle, and preys principally upon fish, but also occasionally on birds and other animals, and when its extreme voracity is not satisfied, will devour the most patrid carrion. Hence its place in the catalogue of unclean birds. The word only occurs again in the parallel passage, Deut. xiv. 12.

And the vulture.—Rather, the kite. Its name in the original (dicht), which literally denotes the swift, majestic and gliding flier, appropriately describes this bird, which sails with its expanded wings through the air, where it often pauses as if suspended, watching for its prey. Kites are very plentiful in Syria, and are frequently seen hovering over the plains, the villages, and the outskirts of towns, and looking out for garbage and offal, and hence are often seen in company with the vulture at their useful task of devouring the carrion. Their gregarious habits are referred to by Isaiah (xxxiv. 15), where they are mentioned in company with other raptorees as suitable inhabitants of devastated Edom. The kite is used by different Eastern tribes as food.

And the kite.—Rather, the falcon. “The greedy one” (ayah), as it is called in the original, fitly describes this most sagacious, sanguinary, and rapacious robber. Its piercing sight is referred to by Job (xxviii. 7), where it is translated vulture in the Authorised Version, though in the passage before us and in the parallel passage in Deut. xiv. 13, it is rendered kite. It exists in Syria in a great variety of species, for which reason the text adds “after his kind.” The falcon is eaten in the Levant, and is considered rather delicate.

And every raven,—The raven, or the black bird (Song of Songs v. 11), the bird of the night, as its name denotes in Heb, like the eagle, occurs frequently in the Bible. It preys upon putrid corpses (Prov. xxx. 17), and is especially eager to pick out the eyes of the dead, and sometimes even attacks the eyes of the living. So great is its glutony that it fills the air with its wild shrieks when searching for food (Ps. cxlvii. 9; Job xxxviii. 41). Its rapacity makes the raven expel its own offspring from their nest and from the surrounding places as soon as they are able to fly, and before they are quite able to procure their own food. Indeed, the ancients believed that it forsakes its young immediately after they were hatched. It was in consequence of their excessive greed and known aversion to part with anything, even for their own off-spring, that the ravens were chosen to carry food to the prophet (1 Kings xvii. 4, 6), thus to make the miracle all the more striking. The phrase, “every raven after his kind,” clearly shows that the whole genus of ravens is intended, with all the raven-like birds, such as the rook, the crow, the jackdaw, the jay, &c., which abound in Syria and Palestine.

(16) And the owl.—Better, and the ostrich, as the Authorised Version rightly renders it in the margin in Deut. xiv. 17. It is distinguished in the margin of Job xxxvii. 29, Isa. xxxiv. 13, xlix. 20; literally, the daughter or inhabitant of the desert. The ostrich, which is the largest bird and the swiftest of all carrion animals, was associated by the Hebrews with the terrors of the wilderness, and was regarded by the ancients as an unnatural hybrid, as a kind of half bird and half quadruped. It dwells amongst desolated places (Isa. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 13; Jerem. l. 39), fills the air with its doleful and hideous wails (Micah i. 8) and cruelly neglects its eggs to be hatched by the sun or trodden down under foot (Lam. iv. 3; Job xxxvii. 17, 18). Owing to its proverbial stupidity, this hybrid is selected with another monster to illustrate the abundant goodness of the Lord, by showing that even this creature will become sensible of gratitude and break forth into thanksgiving and praise (Isa. xlii. 10). The flesh of the ostrich was eaten by the ancient Ethiopians, Indians, and other nations. The Romans regarded ostrich brains as a great delicacy. The ostrich occasionally devours fowls and other small vertebrates like a bird of prey, and tradition assures us that ostriches consumed the body of Aegag.

And the night hawk.—Of all the unclean birds constituting this list, the one here rendered night hawk is the most difficult to identify. The name in the original (tachmainâ) simply describes the bird as “the violent one,” or the rapacious, or “the cruel,” and this designation would apply to any bird of prey not already specified in this catalogue. Hence it has alternately been taken for the owl, the night hawk, the male ostrich, the falcon, the seabird gannet, the cuckoo, and the swallow. It will, however, be seen that all the large birds of prey which are here hazards, have either already been mentioned or are mentioned in the sequel of this list, whilst the small birds, viz., the cuckoo and the swallow, are too insignificant and too harmless to be placed between the large raptorial companions. In this uncertainty of opinion it is best to leave the Authorised Version alone. The name only occurs again in the parallel passage, in Deut. xiv. 15.

And the cuckow.—Rather, and the sea-quill. Like the foregoing bird of prey, the shackaph here LEVITICUS, XI.

(17) and the little owl, and the cormorant,

(18) and the swan,

mentioned only occurs again in the duplicate list of unclean animals in Deut. xiv. 15. It literally means the thin, slender, or cadaverous bird, and is taken by the most ancient authorities to denote the sea-gull, which is “the raven of the sea.” It starts down with great velocity upon its victim, like a bird of prey. It not only eats fishes, insects and smaller aquatic animals, but feeds upon carrion. The eggs of the gulls and the flesh of the young birds are to this day eaten both in the East and in some northern countries of Europe.

And the hawk.—Besides the parallel passage in Deut. xiv. 15, the hawk (nets) also occurs in Job xxxix. 25, where it is described as a migratory bird, since it migrates to a more southern climate on the approach of winter. It feeds upon mammals, birds, and amphiblia, and attacks even its own parent, mate, and offspring. It abounds in a variety of species in all parts of Asia. Hence the remark “after his kind.” Some tribes regard the flesh of the hawk as very palatable.

And the little owl.—With the exception of the parallel passage, Deut. xiv. 16, this bird only occurs once more, in Ps. cii. 6, where it is properly rendered in the Authorised Version by “owl,” omitting the word “little,” and is described as inhabiting deserted ruins. It not only feeds upon insects and mollusces, hares, rabbits, ducks, geese, and birds of prey, but devours mice and rats, which are especially detested by the Jews. Its flesh is, however, regarded by some tribes as very savoury. The name kōwos which is translated “owl” in the three above-named passages, is the common Hebrew word for “owl,” and it is supposed that it has been given to this bird because the sitting owl especially widens towards the upper part, thus imparting to it a cup-like appearance.

And the cormorant.—Of all the web-footed birds which prey on fish, cormorants are the most voracious. They usually assemble in flocks on the rocks which overhang the sea, whence they drop down from the greatest height upon their victim, dive after it with the rapidity of a dart, and invariably gulp their prey head foremost. The cormorant is to be found in every climate, and is the destruction of all the finny tribe in any fresh-water river which he happens to occupy for a time. Hence he is called the feathered terror of the finny tribe. From the skill which he displays in casting himself down from a great height, and in plunging dart-like after his victim, he derives his Hebrew name, which denotes “darter.” The flesh of the cormorant, though rank, is eaten in some regions; whilst the skin, which is tough, is made into garments. The Hebrew name only occurs again in the duplicate catalogue of unclean animals in Deut. xiv. 17. By comp. verses 17, 18 of the list before us with the parallel list in Deut. xiv. 16, 17, it will be seen that though the two catalogues respectively enumerate in these two verses the same six birds, yet the order is different. The cormorant, which is here second in verse 17, is in Deut. xiv. sixth in verse 17. There can, therefore, hardly be any doubt that the verse before us has been disturbed, and that by placing the cormorant hero sixth, as it is in Deuteronomy, we obtain the two species of owls naturally following each other, as is the case in the parallel catalogue.

And the great owl.—Rather, the night owl, as the name in the original (yanshōph) denotes “night-bird.” Besides the parallel passage in Deut. xiv. 16, this bird of prey only occurs again once more in Isa. xxxiv. 11, where the Authorised Version translates simply “owl,” omitting the word “great,” and where it is associated with the raven and other dismal birds so fit occupants of desolated ruins. According to the description of it which prevailed in the time of Christ, its eyes are directed forward, it utters frightful shrieks in the night, and has a face like a cat, and cheeks like a human being. In consequence of its repulsive visage and human appearance it was considered a bad omen if one saw an owl in a dream. That the two kinds of owls are here mentioned is probably owing to their disgusting habit of ejecting pellets, each one of which contains sometimes from four to seven skeletons of mice. Hence, instead of saying “after his kind,” to include the other varieties, the lawgiver enumerates them separately.

(18) And the swan.—The word here translated “swan,” which, besides the parallel list in Deut., also occurs in verse 30, among the names of the lizards, according to tradition, another variety of the owl. Whatever difficulty there may be about the true import of the word, it is certainly not the swan. It has, however, also been translated “ibis,” “bat,” “purple water-hen,” “heron,” “pelican,” and “goose.”

And the pelican.—The pelican is one of the largest and most voracious of the web-footed birds. It fills its capacious pouch with fish almost to suffocation, which it disgorges either for its own future consumption, or for the nourishment of its young, by pressing the under mandible against the neck and breast to assist the vomiting up of the contents. Hence its Hebrew name, which denotes “the vomiter.” During this operation the red nape of the upper mandible comes in contact with the breast, thus imparting to it the appearance of blood, which is most probably the origin of the fable that it feeds its young with its own life-blood. The pelican often builds in deserted places as far as twenty miles from the shore. When it has filled its expansive pouch with prey, it retires to its lonely place of repose, where it remains with its head leaning against its breast almost motionless until impelled by hunger to fly to the water in search for a fresh store of victims. It is to this melancholy attitude of lonely desolation that the Psalmist refers when he says, “I am like a pelican of the wilderness” (Ps. cii. 6), and it is to its habit of building in deserted places that the prophets allude when they describe the desolation of Edom and Nineveh by saying that “the pelican shall possess them” (Isa. xxxiv. 11; Zeph. ii. 14). In the last two passages the Authorised Version, which wrongly translates it “cormorant” in the text, has rightly pelican in the margin.

And the gier eagle.—As the name of a bird, this word (racham), which is here in the masculine form, and denotes “the merciful,” only occurs again in the parallel passage, Deut. xiv. 17, where, however, it is in the feminine (rakhimah). The species here intended is most probably the Gyps, called alternately the sacred or Egyptian vulture and Pharaoh’s hen, which is often figured on the ancient Egyptian monuments. It was regarded with religious veneration in Egypt, both because it prevented epidemics by acting as scavenger, and because of its extreme devotion and tenderness to its young, since it was believed to watch over its offspring.
and the pelican, and the gier eagle, (19) and the stork, the heron after her,
kind, and the lapwing, and the bat.
(20) All fowls that creep, going a hundred and twenty days every year, and to feed them, if necessary, with the blood of its thighs. Hence it was used to denote both "mother" and "merciful" in Egyptian, and hence, too, its name "merciful" in Hebrew. The ancients also believed that there were no male vipers, and that the females conceived through the wind. It was probably to counteract this supersitious belief that the lawyer uses here the masculine form and the feminine form in the parallel passage in Deut. xiv. 17. The vulture is most loath-

some in its habits, and feeds upon the foulest carrion, for which reason it is put in the list of unclean birds.

(19) And the stork.—Besides the parallel passage, Deut. xiv. 18, the word (chasidah) here rendered
"stork" also occurs in Job xxxix. 13; Ps. civ. 17;
Jer. viii. 7; Zech. v. 9, and is so translated, except Job xxxix. 13, where the Authorised Version has "wing" in the text and "stork" in the margin. Its name literally denotes in Hebrew "the pious," "the kind," and is so called because the ancients regarded it as a type of maternal and filial affection and tenderness. The mother has been known to prefer perishing with its offspring in the flames rather than desert them when its attempts to rescue them from a fire had failed.
The white stork is one of the largest land birds. Its black and powerful wings strikingly contrast with the pure white of its plumage. Hence the remark "they had wings like the wings of the stork" (Zech. v. 9).
The storks build on the loftiest towers and most continuous ruins, and also on the tops of high trees, where they may be seen to this day by the Sea of Galilee. It is to this that the Psalmist alludes: "as for the stork, the fir-trees are her home" (Ps. civ. 17).
To these nests they regularly return at the proper season, which marks them as the most punctual of migratory birds; and it is to this feature in their nature that the prophet refers: "the stork in heaven knoweth her appointed times" (Jer. viii. 7).
The stork feeds on fish, reptiles, and all kinds of offal and garbage, for which reason it is here placed in the list of unclean birds.

The heron.—Whilst the two preceding birds are named after their good qualities, viz., "the merciful" and "the pious," this bird, which only occurs again in the parallel passage in Deut. xiv. 18, is termed (anapakh)
"the angry," "the cruel," which aptly describes the heron. It is allied to the stork, and is of such a savage nature that it will defend itself with its beak against the dogs after it has had its legs shot and broken. It resides on the banks of rivers and is marshy places, and feeds on fish, frogs, lizards, snails, field-mice, and all sorts of insects, for which reason it is here included in the prescribed list of unclean birds. It exists in a variety of species. Hence the address "after her kind."

And the lapwing.—Better, the hoopoe. This dirty bird, which only occurs again in the parallel list in Deut. xiv. 18, and which according to the ancients builds its nest of human dung, feeds upon offal and garbage. Its loathsome smell during brooding-time, and for weeks after, is perfectly insufferable. Though its flesh, which in the autumn tastes like quail's, is eaten in some places, yet the Mohammedans regard it as proscribed. According to another ancient tradition the bird here meant is "the mountain cock."

And the bat.—The list which opens with the eagle, the king of the birds, fitly concludes with the hybrid hat, the vilest creature, which is between a bird and a mouse, and is appropriately associated in the Bible with the mole as the type of darkness (comp.
Isa. xi. 20). From the fact that the air is its home:
that like the swallow, which it resembles in mode of flight, it wheels through the air in every direction in search of the crepuscular and nocturnal insects on which it preys: and that it performs the most abrupt and skilful evolutions in its aerial course, the bat was classed among the birds. Bats abound in Syria in a great variety of species. They penetrate into the houses and make the rooms most offensive to live in.
Those who have realised the sickening influence of these creatures in the East will readily understand why the loathsome bats are included in the list of unclean birds. Some of the ancient nations ate bats and regarded them as delicious food. Besides being the lowest, the bat is here placed last, because it forms the connecting link between the volatile bipeds and quadrupeds.

(20) All the fowls that creep.—Better, all creeping things which have wings. The swarming animals or insects, which, as we have seen, constitute the fourth class of the Hebrew division of the animal kingdom, are now discussed in verses 20—23. From the fact that in the following verse several kinds of locusts are exempted, it is evident that the phrase "creeping things which have wings" does not include insects.

Going upon all four.—That is, the insects in question not only fly but also creep. The phrase, however, "upon all four" does not refer to the exact number of feet, but, as in some modern languages, denotes walking with its body in a horizontal position, or near the ground, in contradistinction to the two-legged birds discussed in the foregoing verses. This is the sense which the administrators of the law in the time of Christ attached to the phrase. Hence the Chaldee paraphrase of Jonathan translates it, "And all creeping things which have wings going upon all four, the fly species and the wasp or hornet species and the bee species."

Shall be an abomination unto you.—As the bee species is included among "the creeping things which have wings," some have supposed that bee-honey comes within the unclean things which are here said "shall be an abomination unto you." Hence it is thought that the honey (dabesh) which is so frequently mentioned in the Bible as a special feature of the promised land (Exod. iii. 8, 17, xiii. 5, xvi. 4, xxxiii. 3; Lev. xx. 24, etc.), and which formed an important article of food among the Hebrews, was not the natural product of the bee, but is either the grape-honey, the dobs, which is still prepared in many parts of Syria and Palestine, and is exported in great quantities into Egypt; or the vegetable-honey, the exudation of certain trees and shrubs found in the peninsula of Sinai. Hence, too, it is supposed that the wild honey which Jonathan ate in the wood (1 Sam. xiv. 25), and which was the meat of John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 4), must refer to this vegetable-honey. But though it is true that the canopy which obtained during the second Temple was "Whatsoever cometh from unclean creatures is unclean," and that in accordance with this law the milk of unclean quadrupeds and the eggs of unclean birds and fishes were forbidden, yet the honey of bees was expressly permitted.
above their feet, to leap withal upon the earth; (22) even these of them ye may eat; the locust after his kind, and the bald locust after his kind, and braided or stewed, or fried in butter; or they are mixed with butter and spread on thin cakes of bread. In taste they resemble shrimps or prawns. There are shops in some Eastern towns where they only sell locusts, strung upon cords or by measure. The locusts thus form an antidote to the famine they create by the devastation which they commit. They formed, along with "wild honey," the food of John the Baptist (Matt. iii. 4).

And the bald locust.—This is the only place where salam, which is the name in the original, occurs as one of the edible kinds of leaping insects. Any attempt to identify the species is simply conjecture, since all which tradition tells us about it is that this kind of locust "has no tail but has a hump."

The beetle.—Rather, the hopping locust. Though it is difficult to identify the exact species, as the name (charagol) does not occur again in the Bible, one is perfectly certain that a sort of locust is here intended, since the context clearly shows that four different kinds of the same insect are enumerated. This is moreover confirmed by the administrators of the law in the time of Christ, who assured us that charagol is a species of locust having both a hump and a tail, the eggs of which Jewish women suspended in the ear as a remedy against ear-ache. This shows that it must have been a very large kind, and as the name denotes the galloping or hopping one, it is evidently designed to describe an unwinged species.

The grasshopper.—Rather, the small locust. This name (chagab) occurs four times more in the Bible (Num. xiii. 33; 2 Chron. vii. 13; Eccl. xii. 5; Isa. xl. 22), and is only in one place rightly rendered by locust (2 Chron. vii. 13) in the Authorized Version. From the fact that it is described as laying waste the fields (2 Chron. vii. 13), and that its insignificant appearance is contrasted with giant men (Num. xiii. 33) and with the great God of heaven (Isa. xl. 22), it is justly inferred that it denotes a small devastating locust which swarms in great quantities. According to the authorities in the time of Christ, it is a species which has a tail, but no hump. It was so common that the name (chagab) became a generic term for many of the insect tribe. Some kinds bearing this name were beautifully marked, and were eagerly caught by Jewish children as playthings, just as butterflies and cockchafers are sought after by children in the present day. Others again were caught in large numbers, sprinkled over with wine, and then sold. Hence the following two rules obtained during the second Temple: (1) No Israelite was allowed to buy them after the day of the Passover; and (2) he that vowed to abstain from flesh is not allowed to eat the flesh of fish and of (chagabim) locusts. Because the edible kinds of locusts are passed over in the parallel dietary laws in Deuteronomy, some have concluded that the eating of these insects was prohibited at the more advanced time when Deuteronomy was written. The fact, however, that John the Baptist ate locusts, and that a benediction was ordered during the second Temple to be recited at eating them, plainly shows the futility of the assertion. The Lawgiver never intended to repeat in Deuteronomy every particular point of legislation. 331
the beetle after his kind, and the grasshopper after his kind. (22) But all other flying creeping things, which have four feet, shall be an abomination unto you. (24) And for these ye shall be unclean: whosoever toucheth the carcase of them shall be unclean until the even. (25) And whosoever beareth ought of the carcase of them shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even.

(20) The carcases of every beast which divideth the hoof, and is not cloven-footed, nor cheweth the cud, are unclean unto you: every one that toucheth them shall be unclean. (27) And whatsoever goeth upon his paws, among all manner of beasts that go on all four, those are unclean unto you: whoso toucheth their carcase shall be unclean until the even. (28) And he that beareth the carcase of them shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: they are unclean unto you.

(29) These also shall be unclean unto you among the creeping things that creep upon the earth; the weasel, and

(23) But all other flying creeping things.—Better, but all other winged creeping things. Besides the above-named four species and their kindreds, all other locusts, as well as insects of any kind, are to be abhorred as food.

(24) And for these ye shall be unclean.—Rather, and by these ye shall be defiled, that is, the beasts and animals specified in verses 26 and 27. Shall be unclean until the even.—For coming in contact with the dead body of the animals contracts defilement for the rest of the day, and till the beginning of a new day, which took place after sunset (comp. chap. xxiii. 32). During these hours of legal uncleanness he was not allowed to enter the sanctuary, touch any sacred thing, or have intercourse with those who were legally clean, since contact with one who has contracted legal defilement imparted defilement to both persons and things.

(25) And whosoever beareth.—But he who removed the carcase out of the camp or city, or from one place to another, not only contracted defilement for the rest of the day, but had to wash the clothes which he had on, since the pollution by carrying is greater than that by touching. During the time of the second Temple, the administrators of the law declared that wherever the Law enjoins that a man should “wash his clothes” because of the legal defilement which he contracted, it included the command of bathing the body, and that it was only omitted here and in verses 28 and 40 for the sake of brevity. The Samaritan text and some Hebrew manuscripts have actually the whole phrase “and wash his clothes and bathe himself in water,” as in chap. xvi. 15 and Num. xix. 19. In allusion to this we are told that those who contracted pollution, and have come out of the great tribulation, “washed their robes and made them white in the blood of the Lamb” (Rev. vii. 14).

Ought of the carcase.—The uncleanness was contracted by not only carrying away the whole carcase, but by removing any portion of it. (See verse 32.) The expression ought is represented in the original, and is rightly printed in the ordinary type of the text in the Authorised Version of 1611. The printing in italics is an unauthorized innovation, though it is followed in the Speaker’s Commentary, which professes to give the text of 1611.

(28) The carcases of every beast.—The construction of this text constituted one of the differences between the Pharisees and the Sadducees during the second Temple. According to the Pharisees, or the National Church in the time of Christ, the phrase “that toucheth them” in the last part of this verse refers to “the carcases” of the unclean animals spoken of in the preceding verse. It was only when an unclean animal was dead, whether death was owing to natural causes, design, or accident, that contact with its body defiled (see verses 8, 31); but when alive, unclean animals were freely used. Hence canals, asses, horses, &c., were employed in daily life, though unclean (1 Chron. xii. 40; Zech. xiv. 15; Matt. xxii. 2; Luke xiii. 15, &c.). The Authorised Version rightly expresses this sense by inserting “the carcases” in italics at the beginning of the verse, thus showing that “them” in the latter part of the verse refers to the bodies of unclean animals when dead. Indeed some MSS. have actually “that toucheth their carcases,” instead of “that toucheth them.” The Sadducees, however, took the expression “them” to refer to the living unclean animals, and hence maintained that touching the body of any animal described in this dietary list as unclean defiled. The difference which this interpretation of the text produced in the domestic life and social intercourse of the Jews can hardly be described, since, according to the doctrine of the Sadducees, it was exceedingly difficult to remain undefiled as soon as one of them stepped outside their dwellings.

(27) And whatsoever goeth upon his paws.—Rather, and whatsoever goeth upon his palms, that is, those animals whose feet are not divided into two parts, but which have feet with fingers like a hand, such as the lion, the bear, the ape, the wolf, the cat, &c.

(29) And he that beareth.—This is simply a resumption of verse 25. These also shall be unclean.—Better And these shall be the most unclean. As verses 24—25 have been occupied with the discussion of the defilement caused by the carcases of unclean quadrupeds, which, as we have seen, belong to the first class of the animal kingdom, the Lawgiver now enumerates those “creeping things” of the fourth class, which likewise cause defilement by touching them. The eight animals here adduced (verses 29, 30) are therefore a continuation of the things that go on their belly, mentioned in verses 20—23. They only differ in this respect, that in verses 20—23 the creeping things have also wings, whilst those described here are creeping things without wings. In a stricter sense, however, verse 29, &c., is a resumption of verse 20.

The weasel.—Though the Hebrew name (choled), which literally denotes “the gliding” or “slipping in” an animal, does not occur again in the Bible, yet the ancient versions and the description given of it by the adthe mouse, and the tortoise after his kind, (30) and the ferret, and the cha-ministrators of the law in the time of Christ place it beyond a doubt that it is meant for weasel. According to these authorities the animal in question lodges in the holes of walls and in ditches, is inordinately voracious, kills other animals of prey much bigger than itself, and carries them off in its mouth. It is especially obnoxious to pious Jews, who are of the opinion that in the roosts are made so small that it should not be able to get through them; it has pointed and crooked teeth, with which it pierces through the skull and brain of the hens; it attacks sleeping children and human corpses, and lapes water from a vessel. It delights in paltering bright objects, which it hides in holes. It will be seen that this description given by the administrators of the law during the Second Temple, of the animal meant by choleh can only apply to the weasel, and not to the mole. This is fully supported by the ancient versions, though the word denotes "mole" in Arabic, and is sometimes also used in this sense in the Talmud.

And the mouse.—Besides this passage, this word (achbar), which is taken to denote "the field," or "corn-destroyer" also occurs four times in Samuel (1 Sam. vi. 4, 5, 11, 18), and once in Isaiah (chap. lxvi. 17) and is uniformly translated "mouse." That this is the true rendering is fully confirmed by the ancient versions and the administrators of the law during the second Temple. Their insatiable voracity and great fecundity make mice destroy the entire produce of a harvest in an incredibly short time. For this reason they became the symbol of destruction in the Egyptian hieroglyphics, and obtained the appellation, "the scourge of the field" in the Bible (1 Sam. vi. 5). So great was the injury which they inflicted upon the fields in Palestine, that during the second Temple the administrators of the law permitted the Jews to destroy them by any means, even on the middle days of the two great pilgrimage festivals, the Feasts of Passover and of Tabernacles. The mischievous instinct which they have of gnawing at things which they cannot eat, and of peering into the sanctuaries and destroying the sacred food and scriptures, made mice peculiarly repulsive to the Jews, who gave them the appellation of "wicked mice," a name with which they brand any malicious and wicked person to this day.

And the tortoise.—This creature (tsâh), which literally denotes "the swollen," the "inflated" (see Num. v. 27), occurs nowhere else in the Bible. That it is not the tortoise is perfectly certain, since this animal, according to the highest legal authority, was not unclean. Thus Maimonides tells us "only those animals mentioned in the Law (Levit. xi. 29, 30) are defiling, but not the serpent, the frog, and the tortoise." It is certain that the authorities in the time of Christ took it to denote the toad. This is evident from the discussion as to the condition of the man who has touched an animal, and cannot decide whether it is a frog, which is not defiling, or a tsâh, which is defiling. As it is the toad, and not the tortoise or lizard, which has such a misleading resemblance to the frog, there can hardly be any doubt that the administrators of the law understood the reptile here to denote the toad. This agrees with the meaning of the name, which, as we have seen, denotes the "swollen one," and which is one of the peculiar characteristics distinguishing it from the frog, by its having a thick, squat, and more swollen body. The reason why the toad and not the frog is put into the defiling list of reptiles is probably owing to the fact that its shorter legs impart to it more the appearance of a creeping thing, and that it was believed that the limpid fluid which this reptile suddenly discharges when touched is poisonous. Some ancient versions, however, translate it "the land crafty." (39) And the ferret.—The ancient legal authorities explain this name (anâkîh), which only occurs here in the Hebrew Scriptures, by kipôr or kippôd, "an animal whose body is entirely covered with sharp prickles, and when touched the creature draws in its legs and rolls itself up in a ball." Its skin in ancient days was tied round the under of cows to prevent other reptiles sucking out their milk. There can, therefore, be no doubt that the administrators of the law took it to be the hedgehog. Some ancient versions, however, render it by shrew mouse, whilst some modern expositors make it the gecko.

And the chameleon.—The ancient versions agree that by this animal (khoâch), which denotes "strength," and which occurs nowhere else in the Bible as the name of a reptile, is meant the chameleon. Its power of ex-ducing for a long time without food, which led the anients to believe that it entirely subsisted upon air, may be the cause both of its Hebrew name (as specified above), and the name chameleon, i.e., "a lion on the ground," a reptile with the strength of a lion. The belief that it lives upon the air had also given rise to its Aramaic name in the time of Christ (zêkîkhâ), which denotes the animal that fills itself with air. The perplexity which the administrators of the law experienced about its food, and the time of feeding this creature, may be gathered from the story in the Talmud attributed to one of the sons of Noah, of what happened in the Ark. Sem, the son of Noah, said, "We had much trouble with the chameleon, for whilst we fed the day animals by day and the night animals by night, we did not know what the chameleon fed on. One day, however, I broke open a pomegranate, and a worm fell out of it, which the creature immediately devoured. Afterwards I pounded together fruit, and when it bred maggots the chameleon ate them." The common chameleon is found in Syria and Palestine, and some eastern tribes believe that its flesh when eaten boiled is a remedy for leanness, and if eaten dry cures fever. In Spain chame-leons are kept in rooms to destroy troublesome flies.

And the lizard.—Though the ancient authorities agree that the creature here named (lëdâh) is lizard, yet the description which the administrators of the law give of it, does not enable us to define the species to which it belongs. The characteristics which they give of the lizard are as follows: It has a thick, soft, and smooth skin, and lays eggs in which the yolk and the white are not separated. ITS tail when cut off will move for some time afterwards, and the creature itself when apparently dead will sometimes revive by pouring cold water over it.

And the snail.—This meaning of the Hebrew name (chomet) is attested by the highest Jewish authorities of ancient times. It denotes the testaceous kinds, whilst the word (shâbel) in Ps. lviii. 8 describes the naked species. Snails abound in a great variety of species in the East, and some kinds were eaten by the ancients as a great luxury. It was believed that the slime which it constantly emits as it crawls along brings about its death by a process of dissolution. Hence the meleon, and the lizard, and the snail, and the mole. (31) These are unclean to you among all that creep; whatsoever doth touch them, when they be dead, shall be unclean until the even.

(32) And upon whatsoever any of them, when they are dead, doth fall, it shall be unclean; whether it be any vessel of wood, or raiment, or skin, or sack, whatsoever vessel it be, wherein any work is done, it must be put into water, and it shall be unclean until remark "as a snail which melteth, let every one of them pass away" (Ps. lxxviii. 8).

And the mole.-The word (kindemeth) here translated "mole," is the same which is used in verse 18 for an unclean bird. That the Authorised Version, however, gives the correct rendering of the word is not only attested by the ancient versions, but by the following description, which the administrators of the law in the time of Christ give of the reptile here intended. It has no eyes, and burrows into the earth, and destroys the roots. For this reason, as well as for its carrying quantities of corn to its nest, it was ordained during the second Temple that the creature may be killed on the middle days of the two pilgrim festivals, i.e., of the Feasts of Pasover and of Tabernacles. In Isa. vii. 20, however, which is the only other passage where the mole occurs in the Hebrew Scriptures, the name for it is elaphar goph. We have already seen in the case of the snail that two different names for the same creature are used designatively to describe the different characteristics of the same animal.

(31) These are unclean.—Better, these are the most unclean, as verse 29. That is, the eight animals thus enumerated are pre-eminently unclean of all the creeping things.

When they be dead.—The phrase, "whosoever doth touch them when they be dead," is simply another expression for "whosoever toucheth the carcase of them," which is used in verse 24. Defilement is only contracted when their dead bodies are touched, but not if touched when alive. According to the canons which obtained during the second Temple, "there is no kind of living creature that becomes defiled while it is alive, or defiles when it is alive, save man only." (32) And upon whatsoever any of them.—Better, and upon whatsoever aught of them, that is, not only if the whole carcase fell upon any of the specified vessels were the vessels in question defiled, but if a portion of the carcase came in contact with the utensils it made them unclean. (See verse 25.) According to the law which obtained during the second Temple it was only when the portion of the carcase of an unclean animal had flesh on it that it defiled, but not otherwise. Hence the skins, hair, bones, horns, hoofs, sinews, &c. of all unclean creatures were exempted. These were made into different domestic utensils and implements. The use thus made of the parts in question also constituted one of the differences between the Pharisees and the Sadducees in the time of Christ. The Sadducees regarded every portion of every unclean animal in whatever state as defiling, and hence prohibited its being made up into any vessel.

Vessel of wood.—That is, vessels made of bulrushes (Isa. xviii. 2), reeds, wicker, shells of nuts, barks of trees, or of anything which grew out of the earth like wood.

Or raiment.—That is, any garment made of a woven material, such as wool, flax, hemp, or anything which grows on the dry land. Hence cloth made of a material which grows in the sea was not defiled, according to the canons which obtained during the second Temple.

Or skin.—This also, according to the same authorities, only applied to the skins of land animals; skins of aquatic creatures received no defilement.

Or sack.—From the parallel passage in Num. xxxi. 20, we see that by this expression here is meant garments made of stuffs of goats' hair, in contradistinction to the textures of which the garments were made, denoted by the expression beged, "raiment." (See also Isa. xx. 2.) Skins which were not made into garments or vessels, or which exhibited unfinished vessels, received no pollution.

(33) And every earthen vessel.—The case, however, is different with regard to vessels made of clay and burned in the kiln.

Whereinto any of them felleth.—Better, whereinto aught of them felleth, that is, into which any of the aforesaid portion of a defiling carcase falls (see verse 32). Whilst defiled vessels of other materials were made clean by water, earthen vessels, when they became defiled, had to be destroyed (see chap. vi. 25), and their contents were rendered polluted.

(34) That on which such water cometh.—Better, upon which water cometh, that is, all food which is prepared with water for eating becomes defiled when the carcase of such an unclean reptile falls on it. The same is the case with any beverage which is drunk from any kind of vessel; if the said carcase falls into it, it is rendered unclean. According, however, to the canons which obtained during the second Temple, the import of the first part of this verse is that things which constitute man's meat, only then become defiled by the carcase in question when any water whatsoever has been poured upon them, though these articles of food have afterwards become dry; but when they have not been moistened, they do not become defiled. By water these authorities understand any of the following seven liquids:—water, dew, oil, wine, milk, blood, and honey.

(35) And every thing.—That is, not only the above-named garments and utensils become defiled by the said carcasses, or any portion of them, falling on them, but also everything else is subject to the same pollution.

Oven, as the context shows, is an earthen vessel or baking-pot for making thin unleavened cakes, which, according to the ancient description of it, was wide at the bottom and narrow at the top, so formed to keep the heat in longer. (See chap. ii. 4.)
they shall be broken down: for they are unclean, and shall be unclean unto you. [38] Nevertheless a fountain or pit, wherein there is plenty of water, shall be clean: but that which toucheth their carcase shall be unclean. [37] And if any part of their carcase fall upon any sowing seed which is to be sown, it shall be clean. [39] But if any water be put upon the seed, and any part of their carcase fall thereon, it shall be unclean unto you.

Or ranges for pots.—According to the same ancient authorities this kind of oven was oblong, and was so made that two pots should be placed upon it, and that the fire should burn under both of them. Hence the rendering of the Authorised Version, “Ranges for pots.” This name, however, does not occur again in the Hebrew Scriptures.

They shall be broken down.—Because earthen vessels could not be made clean by washing. (See chap. vi. 23.)

Nevertheless a fountain or pit, wherein there is plenty of water.—Better. But wells and cisterns being gatherings together of water. But if the unclean carcase, or any portion of it, happens to fall or to be thrown into wells or cisterns, they are to be treated as large collections of water, such as pools, ponds, and lakes, and hence are exempt from contracting pollution. The constant change of water which takes place in these reservoirs counteracts the effects of the polluting carcase. When it is borne in mind how few are the wells and cisterns in the East, and how scarce water is, the merciful provision of this law will be apparent. According to the canon which obtained during the second Temple, this immunity was only applicable to receptacles of water actually in the ground, but not to collections of water in vessels.

But that which toucheth.—Better, but he who toucheth. But though the water into which the carcase has fallen is mercifully exempted, he who comes in contact with the carcase in the water and removes it from the water is unclean, because the carcase itself remains a source of defilement.

And if any part of their carcase.—The principle which underlies the immunity from pollution of living water is also at the basis of the exception of living plants. Hence if the carcase or a portion of a dead reptile is found among grain destined for sowing, the quantity of wheat in which it is discovered does not become defiled, since the growing plant constantly derives new elements from below and fresh moisture from above, thus undergoing as many changes in its way as spring water. The law therefore which obtained during the second Temple was as follows:—“Whatever is fixed in the ground does not contract defilement. Plants are not defiled till they are gathered.” Hence the ancient Chaldee version of Jonathan renders this verse: “If any part of their carcase falleth upon any seed that is sown in the manner in which it is commonly sown—that is, in its dry state—it is clean.”

But if any water be put upon the seed.—The case, however, is different when the grain is moistened, because the fluid softens the corn, and thus enables the defilement of the carcase to penetrate into its very fibres. The wet corn therefore is regarded in the same light as porous clay vessels which become saturated with defilement, and must be broken. (Comp. chap. vi. 25.) By water, according to the rule which obtained during the second Temple, the seven liquids mentioned in verse 34 are meant.

And if any beast.—That is, a clean animal, which is both bisaline and ruminant, but which has not been properly slaughtered, having died from any disease or accident. During the second Temple, the law here enacted was restricted to quadrupeds, domestic or wild, but was not applicable to birds and fishes.

He that toucheth the carcase.—The carcase, in this case, is to be regarded as the dead body of an unclean animal (see verses 24—28), and defiles by contact. (See also chap. xvii. 15.) This, however, only applies to the flesh of the quadraped. The skin, the bones, the sinews, the horns, and the claws are clean, the sacred Scriptures even being written on the prepared skins; and the horns used for the trumpets or horns of the sanctuary, according to the canons of the Pharisees, whilst the Samaritans and the Sadducees regarded them as polluting.

And he that eateth.—That is, ignorantly, since for willful transgression the transgressor incurred the penalty of excision. (See Num. xx. 30; Deut. xiv. 21.)

He also that beareth the carcase.—Removing the carcase of a clean quadraped which died, defiled the person who carried it quite as much as removing the carcases of an unclean beast. Hence the law of purification for the defilement arising in either case is the same. (See verse 25.)

And every creeping thing.—Besides the eight reptiles which defile by touching their carcase, and which are enumerated in verses 29, 30, all other creeping things upon the earth, with the exception of those specified in verses 21, 22, are to be treated as an abomination, and must not be eaten, though their carcases do not defile by coming in contact with them. From the fact that the creeping things here proscribed are expressly described as “creeping upon the earth,” the administrators of the law during the second Temple concluded that the small worms which do not creep upon the earth do not come within the operation of this prohibition. Hence worms bred in vegetables, fruit, and certain kinds of food are permitted. Thus the worms in figs, dates, and berries, the mites in peas, beans, and lentils, the maggots in cheese, the insects found in the flesh and under the skin of fishes, are not proscribed, and only when they quit the object wherein they have been generated, and creep about upon the ground, are they forbidden. Hence the Chaldee Version of Jonathan renders the passage “and every creeping thing that dieth is unclean unto you” (Deut. xiv. 19)
(42) Whatsoever goeth upon the belly, and whatsoever goeth upon all four, or whatsoever hath more feet among all creeping things that creep upon the earth, them ye shall not eat; for they are an abomination. (43) Ye shall not make your selves abominable with any creeping thing that creepeth, neither shall ye make yourselves unclean with them, that ye should be defiled thereby. (44) For I am the Lord your God: ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy; for I am holy.

CHAPTER XII.—(1) And the Lord

by "and all bees and wasps, and all worms of vegetable and of pulse which leave the objects of food and fly the birds, are unclean unto you."

(42) Whatsoever goeth upon the belly.—In explanation of the general statement made in the preceding verse, three classes of creeping things are here adduced. (1) Those which move by the aid of the under part of the stomach, here described as "going upon the belly," as serpents (see Gen. iii. 14) and serpentine worms.

And whatsoever goeth upon all four.—Those (2) which have four legs and yet move like reptiles, as scorpions, beetles, &c.

Or whatsoever hath more feet.—Better, whatsoever hath many feet, that is (3), those which have a number of such short feet that they cannot easily be discerned by the naked eye, and appear to crawl about upon their stomachs, as caterpillars, centipedes, millepedes, &c.

Ye shall not make your selves abominable.—By eating the unclean creatures which are constantly characterised in this book as "abominable" (see chaps. vii. 21, xi. 10—13, 20, 23, 41, 42)—a term which only occurs twice more in the Hebrew Scriptures (Isa. lxvi. 17; Ezek. viii. 10)—those who do so render themselves abominable and repulsive; hence the admonition. The phrase only occurs once more, viz., chap. xx. 25, where it is translated in the Authorised Version, "Ye shall not make your souls abominable." This is the reason why "soul" is put here in the margin on the word "selves."

Neither shall ye make yourselves unclean. —But not only is it disgusting to eat these abominable creatures, but their carcasses defile and debar him who comes in contact with them from entering into the sanctuary and from partaking of the sacrificial meal.

(45) For I am the Lord your God.—As the Lord who is their God is Himself holy, His people, in order to enjoy perfect communion with Him, must also be holy. Hence they must abstain from all these objects of defilement which mar that holy communion. Appealing to this declaration, the Apostle Paul uses the same admonition: "As he which hath called you is holy so be ye holy in all manner of conversation, because it is written, Be ye holy, for I am holy" (1 Peter. 1. 15, 16). Ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy. —Better, Sanctify yourselves therefore, and be ye holy, as the Authorised Version renders exactly the same phrase in chap. xx. 6.

(45) That bringeth you up out of the land of Egypt.—Having in a marvellous way delivered them from the land of bondage to be their God in a peculiar sense (comp. 2 Sam. vii. 23), the Holy One of Israel had a special claim upon His redeemed people that they should obey His laws and keep themselves holy as their Redeemer. This signal act of redemption is repeatedly appealed to in the Scriptures, both to show the obligations which the Israelites are under to obey God's commandments and to expose their ingratitude (Deut. viii. 14, xiii. 6, xx. 1; Josh. xxiv. 17; Judges ii. 12, &c.).

This is the law of the beasts.—This is a recapitulation of the different classes of animals prescribed in the dietary laws. It will, however, be seen that in this summary they are not enumerated in the same order in which they are discussed in the chapter before us. In the dietary law the order of the four classes is as follows:—(1) the land animals, (2) the water animals, (3) the birds of the air, and (4) the swarming animals; whilst the order of the summary is:—(1) the land animals, (2) the birds of the air, (3) the water animals, and (4) the swarming animals. Exactly the same is the case in the summary of the sacrificial law. (See chap. vii. 37, 38.)

(46) To make a difference.—Better, that ye may put difference, as the Authorised Version renders the same word in chap. x. 10. That is, the design of the dietary law is to enable both the administrators of the law and the people to distinguish, by the characteristics and criteria specified above, between what is clean and unclean.

And between the beast that may be eaten. —From the fact that the same word, "beast," is used in both clauses with regard to the animal which may be eaten and the one which may not be eaten without the qualifying adjunct "clean" and "unclean," the administrators of the law during the second Temple concluded that the same clean animal is meant in both instances, under different conditions. The clean animal may be eaten when it is in a healthy state, but the same animal may not be eaten when it has organic defects, or is diseased. Hence they enacted the following canon: an animal is perfectly sound when it is capable of conceiving and bringing forth young. This is the reason why the LXX renders the word beast here by vieiparous.
LEVITICUS, XII.

after Childbirth.

spake unto Moses, saying, (3) Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a woman have conceived seed, and born a man child: then she shall be unclean seven days; according to the days of the separation for her infirmity she shall be unclean. (3) And in the eighth day the flesh of his foreskin shall be circumcised. (4) And she shall then continue in the blood of her purifying three and thirty days; she shall touch no hallowed thing, nor come into the sanctuary, until the days of her purifying be fulfilled. (5) But if she bear a maid child, then she shall be unclean two weeks, as in this case, as in the former instance, is nearly doubled, to include exceptional cases. During these thirty-three days, which constituted the second stage, the mother was only debarred from touching holy things, such as first tithes, the flesh of thank- and peace-offerings, &c., and from entering the sanctuary. Having bathed at the end of the seven days which constituted the first and defined period, she could now partake of the second tithes, and resume conjugal intercourse, since any blood that might now appear was regarded as pure blood, in contradistinction to the (dem midah) blood of monthly courses. Her proximity, therefore, no longer defiled. The Sadducees and the Samaritans during the second period revered in the Karaite Jews, interpreted this law more rigidly. Though admitting that there is a difference of degree in the two periods, they maintained that the woman was too unclean for conjugal intercourse even during the second period. They therefore pointed the text differently so as to yield the rendering "blood of her purifying." The Authorised Version, which, in this instance, follows the opinion of the Sadducees, departs from the received text.

(6) But if she bear a maid child.—Better, but if she gave birth to a female child. (See verse 2.)

As in her separation.—Better, as in the time of her monthly courses. (See verse 2.) In the case of a daughter the days of purification in both stages is exactly double that prescribed at the birth of a son. The reason for this difference is probably owing to the fact that the ancients believed that the physical loss of the semen was far greater at the birth of a girl than at the birth of a boy, and that it requires a longer time for the effects to pass away. Similar laws obtained among other nations of antiquity, and exist to this day among many Eastern tribes. The Greeks held that the man who had been near a woman in childbirth defiled the altar if he approached it. One of the means adopted during the Peloponnesian war for purifying the island of Delos was to prescribe women keeping their confinement on the island. The Hindoos go so far as to regard all the relations of a new-born child as impure; the father has to undergo lustrations, and the mother remains unclean till the tenth day, when the child receives its name. Among the Arabs the mother continues unclean for forty days.

In the blood of her purifying.—Better, in the blood of purification, that is, pure blood. (See verse 4.) It will be seen that the law here only legislates for ordinary cases, and that it passes over in silence cases of twins. The administrators of the law during the second Temple had therefore, in this instance, as in many other points, to supplement the Mosaic legislation. They therefore enacted that when a mother had twins, and if they were a boy and a girl, the two stages of her uncleanness were those for a girl. If one of the twins was a boy and the other sexless, or bi-sexual, she continued unclean for both male and female. If, on the
LEVITICUS, XIII.

CHAPTER XIII.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying, (2) When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, a scab, or bright spot, and it be in the skin of his flesh like the plague of leprosy; then he shall be brought unto Aaron the priest, who shall offer the burnt offering, and the sin offering, unto the Lord, and make an atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood. This is the law for her that hath born a male or a female. (3) And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons; the one for the burnt offering, and the other for a sin offering: and the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.

Contrary, one was a female and the other of neither sex, or bisexual, her separation was only for a female.

And when the days . . .—Having described in the previous verses the conditions of defilement arising from childbirth, the legislator now prescribes the offerings to be brought for the purification of the woman. The offerings were brought at the expiration of the fortieth day in the case of a boy, and at the end of the eightieth day in the case of a girl, that is, on the forty-first and on the eighty-first respectively.

For a son, or for a daughter.—That is, with regard to a son or a daughter, to either of which she had given birth. The purification was for herself, and was owing to the defiling discharges connected with childbirth, and not for the child to which she gave birth, since the baby was not unclean.

She shall bring a lamb of the first year.—Or, as the Margin has it, a son of his year, that is, a lamb which was within the year of its birth. This burnt offering was an expression of gratitude for the Divine mercy vouchsafed to her in the hours of sorrow and danger, or, as some ancients suggest, it was designed as a confession of impatient and reproachful thoughts harboured by the mother during her pregnancy and the time of parturition (comp. Gen. xxvi. 21); whilst the sin offering was to atone for sinful and violent expressions which she may have heedlessly uttered in the hours of labour and agony. Though when the two sacrifices are mentioned together, the sin offering generally precedes the burnt offering (see chaps. v. 7, xiv. 31, xvi. 3, 5, &c.), here the burnt offering takes precedence, because it is the more costly of the two. Besides the mother after child-birth (chap. xii. 6, 8), there were three other unclean persons who had to bring a sin offering for their uncleanness: the leper (chap. xiv. 19, 31), the woman that had an issue (chap. xv. 15), and the man that had an issue (chap. xv. 30).

Unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation.—Better, to the entrance of the tent of meeting. (See chap. i. 3.) During the time of the second Temple these sacrifices were brought to the eastern gate, called the Gate of Nicanor. Here the lying-in women were purified and the lepers cleansed. (See chap. xiv. 13.)

Who shall offer it.—Better, and he shall offer it, that is, the priest shall offer the sin offering. Though two sacrifices were brought—a burnt offering and a sin offering—yet stress is laid on the sin offering, for on it depended the purification and atonement of the mother. Even if the mother gave birth to twins, the administrators of the law during the second Temple decided that the one sin offering here prescribed sufficed.

And if she be not able.—As a merciful provision for those who were too poor to bring a lamb, the law permits them to bring a turtle-dove or a pigeon for a burnt offering, provided only it is the same kind of bird as the one brought for a sin offering; that is, they must either be both turtle-doves or both pigeons, and not one turtle-dove and one pigeon. Turtle-doves and pigeons were plentiful and cheap in Palestine (see chap. i. 14). It was therefore the poor woman's sacrifice which the mother of our Lord offered, when, in accordance with this commutation, she offered a pair of turtle-doves or two young pigeons, on presenting herself for purification at the Temple with the child Jesus, on the expiration of the prescribed term of uncleanness (Luke ii. 24), and the priest, after sprinkling her with the blood of the humble sacrifice, declared her cleansed.

CHAPTER XIII.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying, (2) When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, a scab, or bright spot, and it be in the skin of his flesh like the plague of leprosy; then he shall be brought unto Aaron the priest, who shall offer the burnt offering, and the sin offering, unto the Lord, and make an atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood. This is the law for her that hath born a male or a female. (3) And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons; the one for the burnt offering, and the other for a sin offering: and the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.

And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying, (2) When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, a scab, or bright spot, and it be in the skin of his flesh like the plague of leprosy; then he shall be brought unto Aaron the priest, who shall offer the burnt offering, and the sin offering, unto the Lord, and make an atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood. This is the law for her that hath born a male or a female. (3) And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons; the one for the burnt offering, and the other for a sin offering: and the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.

CHAPTER XIII.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying, (2) When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, a scab, or bright spot, and it be in the skin of his flesh like the plague of leprosy; then he shall be brought unto Aaron the priest, who shall offer the burnt offering, and the sin offering, unto the Lord, and make an atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood. This is the law for her that hath born a male or a female. (3) And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons; the one for the burnt offering, and the other for a sin offering: and the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.

And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying, (2) When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, a scab, or bright spot, and it be in the skin of his flesh like the plague of leprosy; then he shall be brought unto Aaron the priest, who shall offer the burnt offering, and the sin offering, unto the Lord, and make an atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood. This is the law for her that hath born a male or a female. (3) And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons; the one for the burnt offering, and the other for a sin offering: and the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.

And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying, (2) When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, a scab, or bright spot, and it be in the skin of his flesh like the plague of leprosy; then he shall be brought unto Aaron the priest, who shall offer the burnt offering, and the sin offering, unto the Lord, and make an atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood. This is the law for her that hath born a male or a female. (3) And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons; the one for the burnt offering, and the other for a sin offering: and the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.

And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, saying, (2) When a man shall have in the skin of his flesh a rising, a scab, or bright spot, and it be in the skin of his flesh like the plague of leprosy; then he shall be brought unto Aaron the priest, who shall offer the burnt offering, and the sin offering, unto the Lord, and make an atonement for her; and she shall be cleansed from the issue of her blood. This is the law for her that hath born a male or a female. (3) And if she be not able to bring a lamb, then she shall bring two turtles, or two young pigeons; the one for the burnt offering, and the other for a sin offering: and the priest shall make an atonement for her, and she shall be clean.
the priest, or unto one of his sons the priests: (3) and the priest shall look on the plague in the skin of the flesh: and when the hair in the plague is turned white, and the plague in sight be deeper than the skin of his flesh, it is a plague of leprosy: and the priest shall look on him, and pronounce him unclean. (4) If the bright spot be white in the skin of his flesh, and in sight be not deeper than the skin, and the hair thereof be not turned white; then the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague seven days: (5) and the priest shall look on him the seventh day: and behold, if the plague in his sight be at a stay, and the plague spread not in the skin; then the priest shall shut him up seven days more: (6) and the priest shall look on him again the seventh day: and, behold, if the plague be somewhat dark, and the plague spread not in the skin, the priest shall pronounce him clean: it is but a scab: and he shall wash his clothes, and be clean. (7) But if the scab spread much abroad in the skin, after that he hath been seen of the priest for his cleansing, he shall be seen of the priest again: (8) and if secondary one resembles white wool; whilst the principal colour of the bright pimple is white as snow, and the subordinate resembles plaster on the wall.

Thou shalt bring Aaron.—The following rules obtained during the second Temple with regard to the examination of the patient. Though anyone may examine the disease except the patient himself or his relations, yet the priest alone can decide whether it is leprosy or not, because the law declares that the priests must decide cases of litigation and disease (Deut. xxi. 5); hence the patient must "be brought unto Aaron," &c. But though the priests only can pronounce the patient clean or unclean, even if he be a child or a fool, yet he must act upon the advice of a learned layman in those matters. If the priest is blind of one eye, or is weak-sighted, he is disqualified for examining the distemper. The inspection must not take place on the Sabbath, nor early in the morning, nor in the middle of the day, nor in the evening, nor on cloudy days, because the colour of the skin cannot properly be ascertained in those hours of the day; but it must take place in the third, fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, and ninth hours.

(3) When the hair in the plague is turned white.—Better, and the hair in the plagued spot, &c. The first symptom indicating the existence of the disorder is that the hair, which is generally jet-black among the Hebrews, turns white on the affected spot. The authorities during the second Temple defined it that there must at least be two hairs white, at the root and in the body of the bright spot, before the patient can be declared unclean. The word plague, in accordance with a usage common in Hebrew—to put the abstract for the concrete—denotes here the plagued spot, or the spot affected by the plague, whilst in verse 1 it means the person affected by this disorder. Thus in chap. xix. 32, "the hoary head" stands for hoary-headed person.

And the plague in sight be deeper than the skin.—Better, and the appearance of the plagued spot be deeper, &c. The second symptom which shows the development of the disorder is that the spot affected by this plague appears to be deeper than the rest of the skin.

Pronounce him unclean.—Literally, make him unclean. According to the frequently occurring phraseology, a man is said to do that which in his official capacity he pronounces as done, or orders to be done. Thus Ezekiel is said "to destroy the city," when he simply foretold its destruction (Ezek. xliii. 5). The existence of these two symptoms made it incumbent upon the priest to declare the person unclean, and hence imparting defilement.

(4) If the bright spot be white.—But if upon inspection thereof merely appeared a white spot in the skin, and the above named two symptoms were absent, the case was not to be decided.

Then the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague.—The individual thus suspected was to be separated from the rest of the community for seven days, during which time it would be seen whether it actually developed itself into this disorder. According to the canons which obtained during the second Temple, if a bridegroom was seized with this distemper he could not be shut up during the nuptial week. It will be seen that the words "him that hath" are in italics, thus indicating that they are not in the text; but "plague" here, as we have seen in verse 3, denotes plagued person.

(5) And the priest shall look on him.—If at the end of a week there is no alteration in the symptoms, the case must be adjourned for another seven days. The same priest who inspected it at the first must examine it again, as another one could not tell whether it has spread or not. If the priest died in the interim, or was taken ill, another priest could examine the patient, but could not pronounce him unclean. If the seventh day happened to be a Sabbath or fast day, the case had to be put off to the following day.

If the plague in his sight be at a stay.—Better, if the plagued spot remain the same in its colour, that is, if the suspicious spot which caused the individual to be shut up had not altered its complexion. The expression here translated "sight" is the same which is rightly rendered by "colour" in the Authorised Version in verse 55 of this very chapter. (Comp. also Num. xi. 7.) It will thus be seen that though the affected spot had not spread, still it retained its unhealthy and suspicious complexion.

(6) And the priest shall look on him again.—If, on further examination at the end of another week, the priest finds that the bright spot looks darker, and that it has not spread, he is to pronounce the patient clean, and set him at liberty, since it was simply an ordinary scurf; but though not lepers, the eruption indicated some impurity in his blood, and he had therefore to wash his garments.

(7) But if the scab spread.—As verse 5 prescribes that the priest who examines the patient after seven days' quarantine, and finds no spreading of the affected spot, is to give another seven days' quarantine, the priest see that, behold, the scab spreadeth in the skin, then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is a leprosy.

(9) When the plague of leprosy is in a man, then shall he be brought unto the priest; and, behold, if the rising be white in the skin, and it have turned the hair white, and there be a quick raw flesh in the rising; (11) it is an old leprosy in the skin of his flesh, and the priest shall pronounce him unclean, and shall not shut him up: for he is unclean. (12) And if a leprosy break out abroad in the skin, and the leprosy cover all the skin of a man that hath the plague from his head even to his foot, wheresoever the priest looketh; (13) then the priest shall consider: and, if the leprosy have covered all his flesh, he shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague: it is all turned white: he is clean. (14) But when raw flesh appeareth in him, he shall be unclean. (15) And the priest shall see the raw flesh, and pronounce him to be unclean: for the raw flesh is unclean: it is a leprosy. (16) Or if the raw flesh turn again, and be changed unto white, he shall come unto the priest; (17) and the priest shall see him: and, behold, if the plague be turned into white; then the priest shall pronounce him clean that hath the plague: he is clean.

(18) The flesh also, in which, even in the skin thereof, was a boil, and is healed, (19) and in the place of the boil there be a white rising, or a

The verses before us declare what the examining priest is to do when he notices that the spot has spread.

For his cleansing.—That is, for the purpose of being declared clean. If, after he had appeared before the priest to be examined and declared not leprous, at the expiration of the first week of seclusion the priest finds that the spot has spread, he must pronounce him unclean, since the spreading indicates that it is leprosy.

(9) When the plague of leprosy is in a man.

—The second case, discussed in verses 9–17, is of leprosy re-appearing after it has been cured, when a somewhat different treatment is enjoined. In its re-appearance, as in its first manifestation, the patient is forthwith to be brought to the priest.

(10) If the rising be white.—If the distemper actually returns, one of two symptoms indicates it. A white rising will be noticed in the skin, which changes the black hair into white. The white hair only then indicates the disorder when it co-exists with the white rising or swelling which produced it. If the original white swelling, which discoloured the hair, disappears, and a fresh white swelling forms itself around the existing white hair, it is no indication of uncleanness.

And there be quick raw flesh in the rising.—Rather, or if there be, or and likewise if there be, &c. This clause gives the second of the two symptoms, either of which indicates the return of the disorder. According to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, the phrase here translated “quick raw flesh” in the Authorised Version, which literally means “the quickening of live flesh,” denotes “sound flesh,” or a spot in the flesh assuming the appearance of life after it had been paled by the whiteness which overspread the whole surface. The size of this spot of live flesh, which indicated the disease and made the patient unclean, had to be at least that of a lentil. This rendering is given by the LXX, the Chaldee, &c. An insulated spot of sound flesh in the midst of a tumour was considered a sign of the fretting and consuming progress which the disease made in the surrounding flesh.

(11) It is an old leprosy.—Either of these symptoms showed that it was the re-appearance of the old distemper, and rendered quarantine needless. The priest is, therefore, to pronounce him unclean at once.

(12, 13) And if a leprosy break out abroad.

—There were, however, two phases of this returned distemper which exempted the patient from uncleanness. If the leprosy suddenly covered the whole body so that the patient became perfectly white, in which case there could be no appearance of live flesh, then he was clean. This indicated the crisis, as the whole evil matter thus brought to the surface formed itself into a scale, which dried and peeled off.

(14) But when raw flesh appeareth.—Rather, but in the day when sound flesh appeareth again, that is, whenever patches of natural flesh appear intermingled with the white scurf, he forthwith becomes unclean, since this showed that the disease had not exhausted itself. Because it is here said, “But in the day when sound flesh,” &c., and not simply “but when sound flesh,” &c., the administrators of the law in the time of Christ concluded that there were days on which the examination of this distemper was not undertaken: viz., during the seven nuptial days, and the seven days of the great pilgrim festivals of Passover and Tabernacles.

(15) And the priest shall see the raw flesh.

—Rather, the sound flesh. It will be seen that it is the sound flesh only, and not the white hair, which renders the patient unclean.

(16, 17) Or if the raw flesh turn again.—Rather, yet if the sound flesh changeth again and becometh, &c. As soon, however, as the patches of sound flesh resume the white colour, so that the whole body is again white, without exhibiting any spots, the patient is to betake himself to the priest, who, after ascertaining himself of the fact, will pronounce him clean.

(18) The flesh also, in which.—Rather, and if there is in the skin of the flesh a boil. The third case, discussed in verses 18–25, is of leprosy developing itself from a healed boil, or from an inflammation which has apparently been healed. According to those who administered the law in the time of Christ, the boil and inflammation here meant are such as arise from a stroke by a piece of wood or a stone, and from having come in contact with pitch or hot water, thus distinguishing it from the burn by fire mentioned in verse 24.

(19) And in the place of the boil.—If the cicatrized sore breaks out again, and exhibits the usual LEVITICUS, XIII.

for Discerning the Leprosy.

...and the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is a plague of leprosy broken out of the boil. (23) But if the priest look on it, and, behold, there be no white hairs therein, and if it be not lower than the skin, but be somewhat dark; then the priest shall shut him up seven days: (24) and if it spread much abroad in the skin, then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is a plague. (23) But if the bright spot stay in his place, and spread not, it is a burning boil; and the priest shall pronounce him clean.

(24) Or if there be any flesh, in the skin whereof there is a hot burning, and the quick flesh that burneth have a white bright spot, somewhat reddish, or white; (25) then the priest shall look upon it: and, behold, if the hair in the bright spot be turned white, and it be in sight deeper than the skin; it is a leprosy broken out of the burning: wherefore the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is the plague of leprosy. (26) But if the priest look on it, and, behold, there be no white hair in the bright spot, and it be no lower than the other skin, but be somewhat dark; then the priest shall shut him up seven days: (27) and the priest shall look upon him the seventh day: and if it be spread much abroad in the skin, then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is the plague of leprosy. (28) And if the bright spot stay in his place, and spread not in the skin, but it be somewhat dark; it is a rising of the burning, and the priest shall pronounce him clean: for it is an inflammation of the burning.

(29) If a man or woman have a plague of the Authorised Version rightly has it, and not a hot burning, as it is in the text. The ancient canons distinctly define this by "that which is burnt with a coal or with embers, whatsoever is from the force of actual fire, is the burning here meant," in contradistinction to the burn or inflammation mentioned in verse 18.

And the quick flesh that burneth.—Rather, and the sound flesh of the burning (see verse 10), that is, the tender flesh which is renewed (after it has lost the purulent matter in it) and exhibits these symptoms.

(29) Then the priest shall look.—If upon examination the priest finds that the hair which was before black has now turned white.

And it be in sight deeper than the skin.—Better, and its appearance is deeper than the other skin. (See verses 3 and 20.)

(29) But if the priest look on it.—If these symptoms are absent, the same directions are to be followed as laid down in verse 21, in the case of a boil or an inflammation.

(27, 28) And the priest shall look.—The directions here given as to what the priest is to do at the end of the week's quarantine are the same as those given in verses 23 and 24. It will be seen that there is a difference in the treatment of the suspicous symptoms in case No. 1, and in the case before us, No. 3. In the former instance, where there is no apparent cause for the symptoms, the suspected invalid has to undergo two remainds of seven days each before his case can be decided; whilst in the instance before us, where the boil, the inflammation, or the burn visibly supplies the reason for this suspicion, he is only remanded for one week, at the end of which his case is finally decided.

(29) If a man or woman.—The fourth case, discussed in verses 29—37, is leprosy on the head or chin. Cases where this distemper attacks first the hairy parts are not uncommon.

symptoms of leprosy, the patient is to show himself to the priest.

White, and somewhat reddish.—Better, of a white-reddish colour. This symptom is peculiar to re-opened cratered sores, and hence has not been mentioned before. The authorities in the time of Christ describe the mixture of red and white as follows:—"It has the appearance of red wine poured into water, and is either a palish white or somewhat darker."

(29) Behold, it be in sight lower than the skin.—Better, Behold, its appearance is lower than the other skin. If upon examination the priest finds that the spot has assumed a deeper appearance than the rest of the skin, and the hair turned white—which were the two critical symptoms—he forthwith declared it leprosy.

(23) But if the priest.—In the absence, however, of these two symptoms, the patient is to be put in quarantine for one week only.

(29) And if it spread much abroad.—If, on inspecting it again at the end of the seven days' seclusion, the priest finds that the spot has spread, it was evident that the blood was vitiated, and that the distemper began to develop in the body.

It is a plague.—That is, of leprosy. The word "leprosy," which has here dropped out of the text, is still preserved in some of the ancient versions.

(23) But if the bright spot stay.—As the spreading of the spot is a sure sign of the disease lurking in the system, its continuing in the same condition showed that it was simply the re-opening of the boil. The priest is therefore to pronounce the patient clean, or clear of leprosy.

(29) Or if there be any flesh, in the skin whereof there is.—Rather, or if there is in the skin of the flesh. As a burn or inflammation arising from contact with pitch or hot water was adduced in verse 18, the verse before us specifies a sore, pastule, or blister occasioned by "a burning of fire," as the Margin upon the head or the beard; (30) then the priest shall see the plague: and, behold, if it be in sight deeper than the skin; and there be in it a yellow thin hair; then the priest shall pronounce him unclean: it is a dry scall, even a leprosy upon the head or beard. (31) And if the priest look on the plaque of the scall, and, behold, it be not in sight deeper than the skin, and that there is no black hair in it; then the priest shall shut up him that hath the plague of the scall seven days: (32) and in the seventh day the priest shall look on the plague: and, behold, if the scall spread not, and there be in it no yellow hair, and the scall be not in sight deeper than the skin; (33) he shall be shaven, but the scall shall he not shave; and the priest shall shut up him that hath the scall seven days more: (34) and in the seventh day the priest shall look on the scall: and, behold, if the scall be not spread in the skin, nor be in sight deeper than the skin; then the priest shall pronounce him clean: and he shall wash his clothes, and be clean. (35) But if the scall spread much in the skin after his cleansing; (36) then the priest shall look on him: and, behold, if the scall be spread in the skin, the priest...
shall not seek for yellow hair; he is unclean. (27) But if the scall be in his sight at a stay, and that there is black hair grown up therein; the scall is healed, he is clean: and the priest shall pronounce him clean.

(28) If a man also or a woman have in the skin of their flesh bright spots, even white bright spots; (29) then the priest shall look: and, behold, if the bright spots in the skin of their flesh be darkish white; it is a freckled spot that growtheth in the skin; he is clean.

(30) And the man whose hair is fallen off his head, he is bald; yet is he clean. (31) And he that hath his hair fallen off from the part of his head toward his face, he is forehead bald: yet is he clean. (32) And if there be in the bald head, or bald forehead, a white reddish sore; it is a leprosy sprung up in his bald head, or his bald forehead. (33) Then the priest shall look upon it: and, behold, if the rising of the sore be white reddish in his bald head, or in his bald forehead, as the leprosy appeareth in the skin of the flesh; (34) he is a leprous man, he is unclean.

(27) But if the scall be in his sight at a stay. —Better, But if the appearance of the scall hath remained the same.

And that there is black hair grown up therein. —Better, And if black hair hath, &c. If, in addition to its not spreading, the healthy colour of the hair has returned, it shows that the patient is cured of the leprosy, and the priest shall pronounce him clean. (See verse 31.) According to the administrators of the law, there had at least to be two black hairs, of such a length that the top could bow towards the root. If two hairs grew up on the healed scall, one black and the other white or yellow, or one long and the other short, the patient could not be declared clean.

(28) If a man also or a woman. —The fifth case, discussed in verses 38, 39, is the harmless leprosy, which does not render the patient unclean.

Bright spots, even white bright spots. —These white spots, which are of unequal size, and a little higher than the skin, generally appeared on the neck and face, and did not change the colour of the hair.

(29) Then the priest shall look. —If the priest, upon examination, finds that these elevated spots are of a dull or palish white colour, then he is to pronounce the patient clean, that is, free of leprosy, since it is simply a white eruption or tetter, which lasts for a few months, causes no inconvenience, and by degrees disappears of itself. Hence it is called bahack, or “white seurf,” and not leprosy. This nameless disorder, which still prevails in the East, is to this day called by the Biblical name bahack.

(30) And the man whose hair is fallen off. —Better, And if a man loseth the hair of his head. The sixth and last case, discussed in verses 40—44, is leprosy either at the back or in the front of the head. Though baldness in itself was regarded as a disgrace, and often looked upon as a Divine punishment (2 Kings ii. 23; Isa. iii. 17; Jer. xlvi. 37), yet the simple fact of the mere falling of the hair is not to be taken as a sign of leprosy.

He is bald; yet is he clean. —Better, if he is backhead bald, he is clean. The baldness mentioned in the first part of the verse in general terms is now more minutely specified as consisting of two kinds of baldness.

Verses 41 and 42 distinctly show that the word (kérēshākk), here translated simply “bald” in the Authorized Version, denotes a person who has lost hair from the crown of his head downwards towards the channel of his neck, as the administrators of the law during the second Temple rightly define it, in contradistinction to the fore baldness which immediately follows.

(41) And he that hath his hair fallen off. —Rather, And if he lose the hair of his head.

He is forehead bald. —This, which, according to the administrators of the law, was from the crown of the head descending to his face, and constituted the man a gibbeach, was also not a sign of leprosy.

(42) And if there be in the bald head. —Better, But if there be in the bald backhead. But if a reddish-white eruption appears either in the hinder or fore part of the bald head, resembling that which arises in the place of healed boils (see verses 19—24), then it indicates the existence of leprosy.

In his bald head. —Better, in his bald backhead. (43) Then the priest shall look. —It is then the duty of the priest to ascertain whether the white-reddish rising in the bald backhead or bald forehead is in appearance like the leprosy in the skin of the flesh described in verse 2, excepting, of course, the white hair, which in this case could not exist.

As the leprosy appeareth in the skin of the flesh. —Better, in appearance like the leprosy in the skin of the flesh. Though the reddish-white eruption is the only symptom mentioned whereby head-leprosy is to be recognised, and nothing is said about remanding the patient if the distemper should appear doubtful, as in the other cases of leprosy, yet because it is here said “in appearance like the leprosy in the skin of the flesh,” the administrators of the law during the second Temple inferred that all the criteria specified in one are implied in the other. They interpret this phrase, “they are, and therefore must be treated like, leprosy in the skin of the flesh.” Hence they submit that there are two symptoms which render baldness in the front or at the back of the head unclean: viz., (1) live or sound flesh; and (2) spreading. “If live or sound flesh is found in the bright spot on the baldness at the back or in the front of the head, he is pronounced unclean; if there is no live flesh, he is shut up, and examined at the end of the week, and if live flesh has developed itself, and it has spread, he is declared unclean, and if not, he is shut up for another week. If it spreads during this time, or engenders live flesh, he is declared unclean, and if not, he is declared clean. He is also pronounced unclean if it spreads or engenders sound flesh after he has been declared clean.” Of course, the fact that the distemper in this instance develops itself on baldness precludes white hair being among the criteria indicating uncleaness.
unclean; the priest shall pronounce him utterly unclean; his plague is in his head.

(45) And the leper in whom the plague is, his clothes shall be rent, and his head bare, and he shall put a covering upon his upper lip, and shall cry, Unclean, unclean. (46) All the days wherein the plague shall be in him he shall be defiled; he is unclean: he shall dwell alone; "without the camp shall his habitation be."

(47) The garment also that the plague of leprosy is in, whether it be a woollen garment, or a linen garment; (48) whether it be in the warp, or woof; of

Visitation from God for sin committed by the person thus afflicted, the patient is to rend his garments like one mourning for the dead. (See chap. xxii, 10.) During the second Temple the administrators of the law exempted lepers women from rending their clothes, which was evidently owing to a feeling of decorum.

As leprosy was regarded as a visitation from God for sin committed by the person thus afflicted, the patient is to rend his garments like one mourning for the dead. (See chap. xxii, 10.) During the second Temple the administrators of the law exempted lepers women from rending their clothes, which was evidently owing to a feeling of decorum.

Better, and his hair be dishevelled. — This was another sign of mourning. (See chap. x, 6.) The legislators during the second Temple also exempted lepers women from letting their hair fall in the disorderly and wild manner over their heads and faces which was the custom for mourners to do.

And he shall put a covering upon his upper lip. — To veil the beard, which was the pride of the Oriental, was also a sign of mourning. (Comp. Ezek. xxiv. 17, 22; Mich. iii. 7.) This was generally done by throwing the skirt of the garment over the lower part of the chin.

And shall cry, Unclean. — As leprosy was most defiling, and as the very entrance of a leper into a house rendered everything in it unclean, the person thus afflicted had to warn off the passers by, lest they should approach him, and by contact with him become defiled. In some instances this was done by a herald, who preceded the leper. Hence the rendering of the ancient Chaldee paraphrase of Jonathan by “a herald shall proclaim, and say, Depart, depart from the unclean!”

(49) He shall dwell alone. — In consequence of his extreme defilement, the leper had to live in seclusion outside the camp or city (Num. v. 1—4, xiii. 19—15, 2 Kings vii. 3, &c.). According to the legislation during the second Temple, if he stood under a tree and a clean person happened to pass by, he defiled the passer by. In the synagogue which he wished to attend they were obliged to make him a separate compartment, ten handbreadths high and four cubits long and broad. He had to be the first to go in and the last to leave the synagogue. Hence, leprosy was regarded as a living death, and as an awful punishment from the Lord (2 Kings v. 7; 2 Chron. xxvi. 20), which they invoked upon all their mortal enemies (2 Sam. iii. 29; 2 Kings v. 27). The leper was debarred from conjugal intercourse. These ancient Rabbinic laws were imported into the Christian Church during the Middle Ages. When any one was afflicted with this distemper, the priest, wearing his stole and holding the crucifix, conducted him into the church, where the leper had to exchange his clothes for a peculiar black garment, and the mass was read over him and the service for the dead. He was then taken to a sequestered house, where earth was thrown upon his feet as a sign of burial, and he was admonished never to appear otherwise than in his black garment and barefooted. He was not allowed to enter a church, or any place where there was a mill or bread was baked, or come near a well or fountain.

The Lawgiver determined that the leper was to be segregated from society, and to be separated from the religious institutions, and that every place he approached was to be declared unclean.
linen, or of woollen; whether in a skin, or in any thing made of skin; (49) and if the plague be greenish or reddish in the garment, or in the skin, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in any thing of skin; it is a plague of leprosy, and shall be shewed unto the priest: (50) and the priest shall look upon the plague, and shut up it that hath the plague seven days: (51) and he shall look on the plague on the seventh day: if the plague be spread in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in a skin, or in any work that is made of skin; the plague is a frettling leprosy; it is unclean. (52) He shall therefore burn that garment, whether warp or woof, in woollen or in linen, or any thing of skin, wherein the plague is: for it is a frettling leprosy; it shall be burnt in the fire.

(53) And if the priest shall look, and, behold, the plague be not spread in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in any thing of skin; (54) then the priest shall command that they wash the thing wherein the plague is, and he shall shut it up seven days more: (55) and the priest shall look on the plague, after that it is washed; and, behold, if the plague have not changed his colour, and the plague be not spread; it is unclean; then shall burn it in the fire; it is fret inward, 3 whether it be bare within or without. (56) And if the priest look, and, behold, the plague be somewhat dark after the washing of it; then he shall read it out of the garment, or out of the skin, or out of the warp, or out of the woof: (57) and if it appear still in the garment, either in the warp, or in the woof, or in any thing of skin; it is a spreading plague: thou shalt burn that wherein the plague is with fire. (58) And the garment, either warp, or woof, or whatsoever thing of skin it be, which thou shalt wash, if the plague be departed from them, then it shall be washed the second time, and shall be clean.

(59) This is the law of the plague of leprosy in a garment of woollen or linen, either in the warp, or woof, or any thing of skins, to pronounce it clean, or to pronounce it unclean.

(49) And if the plague be greenish.—If one of these symptoms manifests itself in a woollen or linen garment, or in a leathern vessel, it must forthwith be shewn to the priest. The Jewish canons define the colour of the green symptom to be like that of herbs, and that of the red to be like fair crimson.

(50) And the priest shall look.—If upon examination the priest finds that the garment or vessel in question exhibits one of these symptoms, he must put it in quarantine for a week, as in the case of a human being. (See verse 4.)

(51) And he shall look on the plague.—If at the end of the week, when the priest examines it again, he finds that the distemper has spread, it undoubtedly indicates malignant leprosy. Here, again, the symptom of spreading is the same in the garment as in the human being. (See verses 5, 6, 8, &c.) The leprous garment, like a human leper, makes nothing and everybody unclean by contact with it, or by coming into the house where it remains.

(52) He shall therefore burn.—As this distemper could never be eradicated from stuffs, the garments which have once become possessed of leprosy had to be burnt.

(53, 54) And if the priest shall look.—If, however, after a week’s quarantine, the priest on examination finds that the disease has not spread, he must order the affected garments to be washed, and shut them up for another week, when it will be seen whether the colour has changed, and the distemper has disappeared or not.

(55) And the plague be not spread.—Better, though the plague hath not spread. If after the washing of the affected spot the priest finds that its appearance has not changed, it must nevertheless be burnt, since the retention of the suspicious colour indicates that it is leprosy.

It is fret inward, whether it be bare within or without.—Better, it is a corroding in the forehead thereof, or in the back baldness thereof. (See verses 42, 43.) That is, though it has not spread in breadth, the distemper has eaten into the fabric, either on the upper side, which is compared to the forehead, or into the under side, which is compared to the hinder part of the head in human leprosy.

(56) Behold, the plague be somewhat dark.—But if after the washing the priest finds that the suspicious colour has changed from green or red into a darkish colour, and the spot has contracted, he is to cut out the affected spot and burn it, and declare the garment itself clean. (See verse 6.)

(57) And if it appear still.—If, after the affected piece has been cut out and burnt, the distemper appears again in another part of the garment or skin, it indicates beyond doubt that it is spreading leprosy; the garment must therefore be entirely destroyed, as in stuffs this disorder is incurable.

(58) And the garment . . .—According to verses 54 and 56, the suspicious symptoms often disappeared after the stuffs had been washed and put in quarantine for a week, thus showing that it was not real leprosy. But though non-leprous, the garments had to be washed a second time before they could be pronounced fit for use.

(59) This is the law of the plague of leprosy.—That is, the above-mentioned regulations are to guide the priests in their decisions whether a garment or leathern utensil is leprous or not, and in their declaration of its being clean or defiling.
CHAPTER XIV.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) This shall be the law of the leper in the day of his cleansing: He shall be brought unto the priest; (3) and the priest shall go forth out of the camp; and the priest shall look, and, behold, if the plague of leprosy be healed in the leper; (4) then shall the priest command to take for him that is to be cleansed two birds alive and clean, and cedar wood, and scarlet, and hyssop: (5) and the priest shall command that one of the birds be killed in an earthen vessel over running water; (6) as for the living bird, he shall take it, and the cedar wood, and the scarlet, and the hyssop, and shall dip them and the living bird in the blood of the bird that was killed over the running water: (7) and he shall sprinkle upon him that is to be cleansed from the leprosy seven times, and shall

And hyssop.—This, according to the canons which obtained in the time of Christ, had at least to be a handbreadth in size. It could not be the so-called Greek, or the ornamental, or Roman, or wild hyssop, or any other hyssop which was distinguished by the name of the place where it grew, but had to be the common hyssop as grows in gardens. Though like the cedar wood, it was primarily used on these occasions for its aromatic properties, yet this diminutive shrub was also most probably designed to symbolise the humility of the cured leper. Hence ancient tradition tells us, “Cedar wood and hyssop, the highest and the lowest, give the leper purity. Why these? Because pride was the cause of the distemper, which cannot be cured till man becomes humble, and keeps himself as low as hyssop.” Cedar wood, hyssop, and scarlet were also buried with the red heifer (Num. xix. 6), and were generally employed in purifications (Heb. ix. 19). Hence the Psalmist prays, “Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean” (Ps. li. 17).

(5) And the priest shall command that one of the birds be killed.—Rather, And the priest shall command, and he shall kill the one bird, that is, upon the priest ordering it, the cured leper is to kill the one which is the fairer and better bird of the two, as was the rule during the second Temple. Not being a sacrifice, the victim was killed outside the camp.

In an earthen vessel over running water.—Better, over earthen vessel upon (or into) living water, that is, the bird was killed over the dish, so as to let the blood flow into the water. The vessel had to be a new one; into it was poured a fourth part of a log, or as much as an egg and a-half of “living water”: that is, water taken from a running stream or a perennial spring, where its continual motion resembles life, in contradistinction to stale or stagnant water. Water which had already been used for other purposes, salt water, rain water, or water which had been melted or warmed, was illegal. When the blood had thus been wrung into it, a hole was dug, and the bird was buried in the presence of the priest, and the patient.

(6) And shall dip them and the living bird.—With the crimson thread the priest tied together lengthwise the bundle of hyssop and the cedar wood, extended about them the wings and the tail of the living bird, and then dipped all the four in the mixture of blood and water which was in the earthen vessel.

(7) And he shall sprinkle.—Having thus dipped the hyssop fastened to the cedar stick into the blood and water, the priest is to sprinkle with it the back of the hand and the forehead of the patient seven times. The seven times symbolised the complete cleansing.
pronounce him clean, and shall let the living bird loose into the open field.
10 And he that is to be cleansed shall wash his clothes, and shave off all his hair, and wash himself in water, that he may be clean: and after that he shall come into the camp, and shall tarry abroad out of his tent seven days.
11 But it shall be on the seventh day, that he shall shave all his hair off his head and his beard and his eyebrows, even all his hair he shall shave off: and he shall wash his clothes, also he shall wash his flesh in water, and he shall be clean.
12 And on the eighth day he shall take two he lambs without blemish, and one eue lamb of the first year without blemish, and three tenth deals of fine flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, and one log of oil.
13 And the priest that maketh him clean shall present the man that is to be made clean, and those things, before the Lord, at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: (12) and the priest shall take one he lamb, and offer him for a trespass offering, and the log of oil, and a wave them for a wave offering before the Lord: (13) and he shall slay the lamb in the place where he shall kill the sin offering and the burnt offering, in the holy place: for as the sin offering is the priest's, so is the trespass offering: it is most holy: (14) and the priest shall take some of the blood of the trespass offering, and the priest shall

(15) And offer him for a trespass offering.—As leprosy was a Divine punishment for sin, the restored leper had to bring expiatory sacrifices. There is, however, a striking difference in the ritual of the leper’s trespass offering and the ordinary trespass offering described in chap. v. 6, &c. In the case before us, not only did oil accompany it, but both the trespass offering and the oil were waved by the priest, which did not take place on any other occasion in connection with the trespass offering and sin offering. Indeed, in no other case was the entire victim waved before the Lord.

(16) And he shall slay the lamb.—Better, And the lamb shall be killed. On ordinary occasions the sacrificer himself slaughtered the victim on the north side of the altar (see chap. i. 5); but as the convalescent was not as yet allowed to enter the court, other persons appointed for these occasions killed the sacrifice. Hence the ancient Chaldee Version of the so-called Jonathan ben Uzial rightly renders it, “And the slaughterer shall slay the lamb.” The phrase is therefore better rendered in the passive, as is often the case in Hebrew. Before the sacrifice was slain the offeree had to lay his hands on the victim. (See chap. i. 4.) For the reason, however, already stated, the convalescent could not do it before the altar. The lamb was therefore brought to the door of the court where the leper stood, and the convalescent put his hands through the gate of Nicanor, and laid them on the victim. From this place the purification was performed of men who contracted defilement from a running issue, and of women when they brought their offerings after childbirth. (See chap. xii. 6.)

In the place where he shall kill the sin offering.—Better, in the place where they kill, &c., as exactly the same phrase is rendered by the Authorised Version in chap. iv. 33; that is, in the court of the sanctuary, on the north side of the altar (see chap. i. 11, vi. 29), which was more holy than the entrance where the convalescent stood.

For as the sin offering . . .—The flesh of both these sacrifices was the perquisite of the officiating priest, and could only be eaten by him and the male members of his family within the court of the sanctuary, being of the class of sacrifices which were most holy. (See chap. vi. 18.)

(17) And the priest shall take some of the blood.—During the second Temple two priests caught the blood of the trespass offering—one into a vessel, and the other into the hollow of his hand. The one who caught the blood in the vessel sprinkled it against the wall of the altar, whilst the other who had the blood in the hollow of his hand went to the convalescent, who was waiting in the porch of Nicanor opposite the eastern door, with his face turned to the west.

And the priest shall put it upon the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot: (15) and the priest shall take some of the log of oil, and pour it into the palm of his own left hand: (16) and the priest shall dip his right finger in the oil that is in his left hand, and shall sprinkle of the oil with his finger seven times before the Lord: (17) and of the rest of the oil that is in his hand shall the priest put upon the tip of the right ear of him that is to be cleansed, and upon the thumb of his right hand, and upon the great toe of his right foot, upon the blood of the trespass offering; (18) and the remnant of the oil that is in the priest's hand he shall pour upon the head of him that is to be cleansed; and the priest shall make an atonement for him before the Lord. (19) And the priest shall offer the sin offering, and make an atonement for him that is to be cleansed from his uncleanness; and afterward he shall kill the burnt offering: (20) and the priest shall offer the burnt offering and the meat offering upon the altar: and the priest shall make an atonement for him, and he shall be clean.

(21) And if he be poor, and cannot get so much; then he shall take one lamb for a trespass offering 2 to be waved, to make an atonement for him, and one tenth deal of fine flour mingled with oil, for a meat offering, and a log of oil; (22) and two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, such as he is able to get; and the one shall be a sin offering, and the other a burnt offering. (23) And he shall bring them on the eighth day for his cleansing unto the priest, unto officiating priest put it on those parts of the convalescent's body on which he had previously put blood, so that the oil now actually was "upon the blood of the trespass offering," on the tip of the ear, the thumb, and the toe of the cleansed leper. (See also verse 28.)

(18) He shall pour upon the head.—That which remains of the oil in the hollow of the priest's hand after some of it had been sprinkled seven times before the Lord, and after some had been put on the several organs of the leper's body, the priest is to put, not "pour," upon the convalescent's head—the quantity left in the hand not being sufficient to pour—whilst the bulk of the log from which the hollow handful has been taken was the perquisite of the officiating priests, and, like the flesh of the sacrifices, had to be consumed within the sacred precincts.

And the priest shall make an atonement.—According to the comments which obtained during the second Temple, it was the act of putting the oil on the several organs, but more especially on the head, which effected the atonement of the restored leper. Failing to do this, even if the prescribed sacrifices had been offered, no expiation was made. The atonement was made for the sins which brought leprosy upon the sinner. (19) And the priest shall offer the sin offering.—The other ewe lamb mentioned in verse 10 the priest is now to offer as a sin offering, to expiate the sins which the restored leper had committed during his illness, having probably given vent to impatient and unbecoming expressions at his lookstake condition, not as due in consequence of having been in a state of uncleanness. The regulations in chap. v. 2, 3, refer to cases when through thoughtlessness the unclean person forgot his duty.

(22) Shall offer the burnt offering.—With the offering of the burnt offering, accompanied by the meat offering mentioned in verse 10, concluded the second and last stage of the purification of the leper, which completely restored him to the privileges of the sanctuary. (23) And if he be poor.—The benigne consideration for the poor which has been evinced on former occasions in connection with the sacrifices (see chaps. v. 7, 11, xii. 18) is also shown here. Three lambs and three tenth deals of flour were more than a poor leper could afford to bring. In such cases, therefore, all that was required was one lamb, which constituted the trespass offering, and one tenth deal of flour for a meat offering, and the log of oil which was needed for his consecration.

(24) Two turtledoves, or two young pigeons—which were plentiful and cheap in Palestine (see chap. i. 14), instead of the two lambs required of those who were able to bring them. (25) And he shall bring them on the eighth day.—This promises that the poor man is to go through the first stage of purification which is prescribed in verses 3—6, and which admits him to social life, in exactly the same manner as the rich man, since the things prescribed for this stage are inexpensive. (26) And the priest shall take the lamb.—The ritual for the poor man's sacrifices, however, is the same as that which is prescribed for the rich man. The solemnity and imposing nature of the service is not diminished, as both rich and poor are alike in the presence of the Lord. Hence the directions in verses 24
The Signs of Leprosy

LEVITICUS, XIV.

in a House.

The one of the turtledoves, or of the young pigeons, such as he can get; [31] even such as he is able to get, the one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering, with the meat offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for him that is to be cleansed before the Lord. [32] This is the law of him in whom is the plague of leprosy, whose hand is not able to get that which pertaineth to his cleansing. [33] And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, [34] When ye be come into the land of Canaan, which I give to you for a possession, and I put the plague of leprosy in a house of the land of your possession; [35] and he that owneth the house shall come and tell the priest, saying, It seemeth to me there is as it were a plague in the house: [36] then the priest shall command that they empty the house, before the priest go into it to see the plague, that all that is in the house be not made unclean: and afterward the priest shall go in to see the house: [37] and he shall look on the plague, and, behold, if the plague be in the walls of the house with hollow strakes, greenish or reddish, which in sight are lower than the wall; [38] then the priest shall go out of the house to the

---

29 in connection with the humbler sacrifices are simply a repetition of those ordained in verses 12—18, to be observed in the case of the more costly offerings. [32] This is the law of him... hand is not able to get. That is, that which is laid down in verses 21—31 constitutes the law for the restored leper who is too poor to offer the sacrifices prescribed in verses 10—20. [33] And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron.—Whilst the law about the cleansing of restored lepers was addressed to Moses alone (see verse 1), the regulations about leprous houses, like those with regard to leprous garments and persons, are for the same reason delivered to Moses and Aaron conjointly. (See chap. xiii. 1.) [34] When ye be come into the land of Canaan.—We have here the first of four instances in Leviticus of a law being given prospectively, having no immediate bearing on the condition of the people of Israel (see chap. xix. 23; xxiii. 10; xxv. 2). This may be the reason why it is separated from the law of leprous men and garments, which we should naturally expect it would follow, instead of being preceded by the law of cleansing, and why it occupies the position of an appendix. Because it is here said "the land of Canaan," the authorities during the second Temple maintained that this supernatural plague of leprous houses was peculiar to Palestine, and was unknown in any other country. They moreover adduce the words "in a house of the land of your possession" to account for the fact that houses in Palestine not in the possession of the Israelites,—i.e., houses of Gentiles—were exempt from this distemper, that the synagogues throughout the country which had no official dwelling-houses attached to them were never visited by this loathsome disease, and that none of the houses in Jerusalem were ever afflicted with it, because the holy city was never divided among the tribes. Whatever we may think of their interpretation, the testimony of these eye-witnesses who had to administer the laws of leprosy, that out of Palestine, that in certain houses in Palestine, and that in the whole of Jerusalem, this kind of distemper was unknown, remains unshaken.

And I put the plague of leprosy.—The plague is here described as a supernatural one, proceeding from the immediate hand of God. Ordinary leprosy, as we are told by the authorities in the time of Christ, comes upon man for the following sins: "for idolatry, for profaning the name of the Lord, uncleanness, theft, slander, false witness, false judgment, perjury, infringing the borders of a neighbour, devising malicious plans, or creating discord between brothers." House leprosy is sent by God if the owner of a plot of land on the sacred soil builds his house with materials unlawfully acquired. Hence the ancient Chaldee Version of Jonathan renders the first part of this verse by, "And if there be a man who buildeth his house with stolen goods, then I will put the plague," &c.

He that owneth the house.—As in the case of the suspicious symptoms in human beings, the suspected house is forthwith to be examined by the priest. Saying, It seemeth to me... house. According to the authorities in the time of Christ, this prescribes the formula which the owner of the house is to use when he communicates the fact to the priest. Hence they enacted that though he be himself an expert in these matters, and know certainly that it is leprosy, he is not to say positively to the priest, "The plague has appeared in my house," but "It seemeth to me... as it were," &c., because it was the office of the priest to pronounce a positive sentence on the subject.

That they empty the house.—If the examination was made before the removal of the objects in it, and the priest pronounced the house leprosy, all the furniture, &c., found therein would be defiled. Hence the benign law that everything should be removed previous to the priest's inspection, to save the household stuff. This assuredly shows that the law did not regard leprosy as infectious.

With hollow strakes, greenish or reddish. —If the house is really leprous, the priest on inspecting it will find in the walls the same three symptoms which are visible in the skin of leprous human beings: (1) hollow strakes, or, rather, deep cavities or depressions, which the ancient canons define as a depression deeper than the rest of the wall, being the same symptom as in man (see chap. xiii. 3); (2) a greenish or (3) a reddish spot, which were the second and third symptoms of leprosy in men and garments. (Comp. chap. xiii. 49.) According to the canons which obtained during the second Temple, the size of this discoloured spot on the wall had to be that of two beans.

Shut up the house seven days.—On finding these symptoms, the priest is to put the house in quarantine for seven days, in order to see what alteration will take place during this interval, adopting the same treatment as in the case of leprous garments. (See chap. xiii. 50.)
door of the house, and shut up the house seven days: (39) and the priest shall come again the seventh day, and shall look: and, behold, if the plague be spread in the walls of the house; (40) then the priest shall command that they take away the stones in which the plague is, and they shall cast them into an unclean place without the city: (41) and he shall cause the house to be scraped within round about, and they shall pour out the dust that they scrape off without the city into an unclean place: (42) and they shall take other stones, and put them in the place of those stones; and he shall take other mortar, and shall plaster the house. (43) And if the plague come again, and break out in the house, after that he hath taken away the stones, and after he hath scraped the house, and after it is plastered; (44) then the priest shall come and look, and, behold, if the plague be spread in the house, it is a fretting leprosy in the house: it is unclean. (45) And he shall break down the house, the stones of it, and the timber thereof, and all the mortar of the house; and he shall carry them forth out of the city into an unclean place. (46) More (39, 40) And the priest shall come again.—If on inspecting it again at the end of the first week’s quarantine, the priest finds that the depression or discolouring has spread in the walls, thus indicating the progress of the disease, just as in the case of leprous men and garments (see chap. xiii. 5, 50), he is to order the affected stones which exhibit these symptoms to be pulled out of the walls, and to be cast into the unclean receptacle which was prepared outside every city for occasions and filth of every kind, just as was outside the city a clean place for the deposition of the ashes of the sanctuary. (See chap. iv. 11.) It will be seen that out of the eight verbs used in verses 40—42 in connection with the removing of the affected stones and the constitution of new ones, the scraping, and the plastering, six are in the plural: viz., they shall take, they shall cast (verse 40); they shall pour out, they shall scrape off (verse 41); they shall take, they shall put them (verse 42); and two are in the singular: viz., he shall take other mortar, he shall plaster (verse 43). From this the authorities during the second Temple concluded, and hence enacted, that if the affected stones are in a partition wall which divides two houses occupied by two different owners, both alike must take part in the first six acts, whilst the new mortaring and the plastering must be done by the owner of the affected house alone. (45, 45) And if the plague come again.—If after these alternations and precautions the symptoms reappear, the house must be pulled down, just as the garment was destroyed under similar circumstances (see chap. xiii. 51), and the materials deposited in the unclean receptacle outside the city, since its reappearance shows that it is an incurable leprosy. From the fact that the materials of the house here spoken of are stones, earth, and wood, the ancient canons enacted that no dwelling is exposed to the laws of leprosy unless it has four walls, and is built of stone, earth, and wood. Houses of brick and marble, therefore, do not come within these laws. (46) Moreover he that goeth into the house.—If any one only momentarily entered the house whilst it was under quarantine, he contracted defilement, which lasted till sundown of the same day. After the priest declared it unclean, it defiled by simply touching it outside. (47) And he that lieth in the house.—As abiding in it all night was graver than a momentary entrance, it involved the washing of the garments before the person so defiled could be clean. The same was the case if any one made a meal in it. (48) The plague hath not spread.—If at the end of the second week’s quarantine the distemper has not spread, having been checked by the means prescribed in verses 42, 43, the priest is to declare it clean, and fit for re-habitation. This is the same criterion adopted in the case of leprous men and garments. (See chap. xiii. 6, 58.) (49—53) And he shall take to cleanse the house.—The same rites are prescribed for cleansing the house which were performed in cleansing the healed leper (see verses 3—7), with the exception of the sacrifices which the man brought afterwards, and which were necessarily absent in the case of the restored leprous house.

This is the law for all manner of plague of leprosy, and scall, and for the leprosy of a garment, and of a house, and for a rising, and for a scab, and for a bright spot: to teach when it is unclean, and when it is clean: this is the law of leprosy.

CHAPTER XV.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, and to Aaron, saying, (2) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When any man hath a running issue out of his flesh, because of his issue he is unclean. (3) And this shall be his uncleanness in his issue: whether his flesh run with his issue, or his flesh be stopped from his issue, it is his uncleanness. (4) Every bed, whereon he lieth that hath the issue, is unclean; and every thing, wherein he sitteth, shall be unclean. (5) And whosoever toucheth his bed shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. (6) And he that sitteth on any thing whereon he sat that hath the issue shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. (7) And he that toucheth the flesh of him that hath the issue shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. (8) And if he that hath the issue spit upon him that is clean; then he shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. (9) And what

This is the law for all manner of plague. —These verses sum up the laws of leprosy given in chaps. xiii., xiv. The various names contained in verse 56 are repeated from chap. xiii. 2.

To teach when it is unclean. —This verse is intimately connected with verse 54, viz.: “This is the law for all manner of plague of leprosy. . . . to afford instruction in the day of uncleanness, and in the day of cleanness:” that is, to furnish them with instructions against the time when they would have to deal with these cases in taking possession of the promised land. The ancient authorities, however, insisted upon the literal rendering which is substantially exhibited in the Margin of the Authorised Version, vii.: “To teach concerning the day of uncleanness and concerning the day of cleanness;” i.e., to instruct the people on which days this distemper may be examined and decided. Hence the ancient Chaldee Version of Jonathan renders it, “That the priests may teach the people to discern between the dark days, when his leprosy is to be examined, and between the bright days.” (See chap. xiii. 2.)

And the Lord spake unto Moses and to Aaron.—This chapter, which lays down the laws of uncleanness arising from issues, discusses two diseased and three natural secretions.

A running issue out of his flesh.—Flesh, as is frequently the case, euphemistically denotes private parts. (See Gen. vi. 10, vii. 13; chaps. vi. 3, xvi. 4; Ezek. xvi. 26, xxiii. 20, &c.) Because of his issue he is unclean. —Better, his issue is unclean. Hence, any one coming in contact with it, or with the garment on which traces of the secretion are found, is thereby rendered unclean. Whether his flesh run. —This verse defines more minutely the statement in the preceding verse.

Every bed, whereon he lieth.—So severely did the canonical law deal with these cases that they interpreted the defilement communicated to the bed, and hence also to his seat and saddle, by the patient in five different ways; by standing, sitting, lying, hanging, or leaning on it. The patient’s polluting power is so great that even if the bed, seat, or saddle is under a stone, he defiles it through the stone by any of these actions. If he stood upon two beds, placing one foot upon each, he defiled both.

And whosoever toucheth his bed.—The defiling power of the patient was so great that the bed, seat, or saddle which he rendered unclean by any of the above-named five acts polluted again any one who came in contact with these articles in seven different ways: by standing, sitting, lying, hanging, leaning, touching, or bearing them. The person thus polluted had to remain in this condition, debarred from the privileges of the sanctuary, till sundown, when he had to wash his garments, and immerse his whole body in water.

And he that toucheth the flesh. —With such intense loathing was the person regarded who had contracted this infirmity, that even the medical man who had professionally to examine him became defiled for the rest of the day. He had to wash his clothes and immerse the whole of his body in water before he could be admitted into the enjoyment of his own sacred privileges.

If he . . . spit upon him.—Spitting in the face of a person was, and still is, commonly resorted to among Oriental nations as an expression of insult and contempt (Num. xii. 14; Deut. xxv. 9; Isa. l. 6; Job xxx. 10; Matt. xxvi. 67, &c.). Suffering from the disease here discussed, the patient would naturally be more irritable, and hence be liable to give vent more frequently to this mode of expressing his wrath. Now, any person upon whom he happened to heap this indignity became defiled by the spittle in the same manner, and had to go through the same purification, as he who chance to touch his garments, or as the physician who had to examine him.

And what saddle soever.—Better, and any carriage. The word here translated “saddle” only occurs twice more: viz., 1 Kings v. 6 in Hebrew, or chap. iv. 26 in English, where it is rendered “chariot.” in the Authorised Version, and in Cant. iii. 10, where it is translated “covering.” but where it manifestly denotes the seat inside the palanquin. With the feminine termination the word in question occurs no less than forty-four times, and is invariably translated in the Authorised Version “chariot.” What kind of vehicle the masculine form of the expression in question denotes in the three passages in which it occurs must be decided.
his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. (12) And the vessel of earth, that he toucheth which hath the issue, shall be broken: and every vessel of wood shall be rinsed in water. (13) And when he that hath an issue is cleansed of his issue; then he shall number to himself seven days for his cleansing, and wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in running water, and shall be clean. (14) And on the eighth day he shall take to him two turtledoves, or two young pigeons, and come before the Lord unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and give them unto the priest: (15) and the priest shall offer them, the one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering; and the priest shall make an atonement for him before the Lord for his issue.

(16) And if any man's seed of copulation go out from him, then he shall wash all his flesh in water, and be unclean until the even. (17) And every garment, and every skin, wherein is the seed of copulation, shall be washed with water, and be unclean until the even. (18) The woman also with whom man shall lie with seed of copulation, they shall both bathe themselves in water, and be unclean until the even. (19) And if a woman have an issue, and her issue in her flesh be blood, she shall be put apart seven days: and whosoever toucheth her shall be unclean

(14) And on the eighth day he shall take to him. —If after the bating on the eve of the seventh day no sign of the infirmity is seen, he is to bring on the eighth day the appointed sacrifices. It is very striking that whilst in other cases it was only the poor who, out of consideration, were allowed two turtledoves or two young pigeons (see chaps. v. 7, xii. 8, xiv. 22), in the case before us the meanest offering was prescribed for all alike who suffered from this infirmity, without giving them the choice of bringing a more costly sacrifice. The phrase "he shall take to him" is simply a Hebrew pleonastic way for saying "he shall take." The door of the tabernacle of the congregation. —Better, the entrance of the tent of meeting, which here means the eastern gate, where the worshipper would face the west, or Holy of Holies, the place of the Lord's Divine majesty, and hence, "before the Lord."

(15) And the priest shall make an atonement. —That is, for the sinful act which has brought about the infirmity. The severity with which people were treated who had contracted this disease may further be seen from the fact that they had to remain without the camp (Num. v. 1—4). During the second Temple they were debarred from partaking of the Paschal meal, and were banished from the precincts of the holy city. Hence, when David in his great indignation wanted to invoke an imprecation upon his adversaries, he exclaimed: "Let there not fall from the house of Joab one that hath an issue." (2 Sam. iii. 29).

(16) And if any man's seed. —The second case, discussed in this and the following verses, is that of an involuntary emission, as in Deut. xxi. 10. The man who sustained it had simply to immerse his whole body in water the following morning, and remain unclean till sundown. Similar rites were performed by the ancients under the same circumstances. Thus the Egyptian priests, when they were defiled by a dream purified themselves by bathing their bodies; and, according to the directions of the Koran, any faithful Mahomedan who meets with such an accident must not perform his prayers till he has gone through the prescribed oblation. (Koran. iv. 46.)

(17) And every skin. —That is, everything which a man wears or lies upon made of skin, in contradistinction to his ordinary garments made of stuffs (see chap. xiii. 43) with which it is associated. Any one of these thus defiled was cleansed by washing. It is from this circumstance that the apostle borrows the expression "having even the garments spotted by the flesh." (Jude 23).

(18) The woman also with whom man shall lie. —Better, And if a man lie with a woman, that is, even when what is specified in verse 16 takes place in intercourse between man and woman lawfully married, it pollutes both the husband and the wife. They have accordingly both to immerse their whole bodies, and remain unclean till sundown, and were debarred from the privileges of the sanctuary during that day. Hence abstinence from conjugal intercourse was regarded as a necessary preparation for the performance of sacred duties. He who had approached his wife could not draw nigh to God (Exod. xix. 15), and was not allowed to partake of sacred meals. (Comp. 1 Sam. xxi. 6, 7.) The law of pollution was not designed to put a check upon marriage, since monogamy is a Divine institution (Gen. i. 27, 28, ii. 21—25), but it is intended to prevent husband and wife from making an inmoderate use of their conjugal life, and thus to preserve them in health and vigour by prescribing such constant purifications after it. This is probably the reason why other nations of antiquity enacted similar laws. Thus the Hindoos and the Babylonians bathed after conjugal intercourse. The Egyptian priests abstained from it when they had to perform sacred duties, and the laity were not allowed to enter the precincts of the Temple unless they submitted to ablutions. Mahomedan, for the same reason, enjoins ablutions upon all the faithful before reciting their prayers.

(19) And if a woman have an issue. —Having legislated for cases in connection with man —as well as for one case in which both the husband and the wife are concerned, the Law now lays down directions for two cases affecting the woman.

And her issue in her flesh be blood. —Better, if her issue, &c. This clause defines the preceding one, stating more minutely what the issue consists of and proceeds from.

She shall be put apart seven days. —Though as a rule the discharge ceases after three or four days, yet, as in the first stage after childbirth, the period of uncleanness is extended to seven days to include exceptional cases. (See chap. xii. 2.) To fully appreciate the merciful provisions of the laws here enacted, it is necessary to bear in mind not only the gross superstitions which obtained among the ancients about women in this condition, but the cruel treatment to which wives and daughters were subjected, and in some countries both in the Old and New Worlds still are subjected. It was believed that if a woman in this condition sat under a tree, all its fruit fell off; at her approach the edge of a tool became blunted, and copper utensils contracted a fetid smell, and meat got sour, and a thousand other things. Hence the Parsees until the even. (20) And every thing that she lieth upon in her separation shall be unclean: every thing also that she sitteth upon shall be unclean. (21) And whosoever toucheth her bed shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. (22) And whosoever toucheth any thing that she sat upon shall wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and be unclean until the even. (23) And if it be on her bed, or on any thing whereon she sitteth, when he toucheth it, he shall be unclean until the even. (24) And if any man lie with her at all, and her flowers be upon him, he shall be unclean seven days; and all the bed whereon he lieth shall be unclean.

(25) And if a woman have an issue of her blood many days out of the time of her separation, or if it run beyond the time of her separation; all the days of the issue of her uncleanness shall be as the days of her separation: she shall be unclean.

not only isolated her from the rest of the family, but forbade her speaking to any one, and those who took food to her in her seclusion had to put it at some distance from her. The Zabib purified with fire every place which she trod. Even if the wind which came from the quarter where she was blew upon any one, he became polluted. To this day the negroes in Issus, the Calmucks, and many others, have special houses for them outside each town and village; and at the River La Plata they are sewn into launmooks, with only a small aperture for the mouth, till they are well again. To restrain the Jews from sharing these superstitions, and from resorting to any of these inhuman acts, as well as for sanitary purposes, the Lawgiver ordained these benign and necessary rules.

Whosoever toucheth her shall be unclean. —Like other unclean persons, she defiled by being touched. Though not expressed here, it is implied that he who contracted this defilement had both to wash his garments and bathe his body as usual.

(21—23) And whosoever toucheth her bed.—The regulations in these three verses are the same as those laid down in verses 4—6.

(23) And if it be on her bed.—Better, and if any object be on her bed, that is, if anything happen to lie on her bed,

When he toucheth it.—Rather, if he toucheth it. Whilst the former two verses declare that if any one touches the bed itself, or the thing on which she sat, he contracts such a degree of defilement that he must wash his clothes, bathe his whole body, and remain in a state of pollution till sundown, the verse before us enacts that if he happens to touch any vessel, garment, or any other object which are lying on the defiling bed or seat in question, he has only to remain uncleans till sundown, without having to wash his garments. The defilement in this case is not primary, but secondary. It is no more the bed or seat which defiled by direct contact, but an object which the defiled bed or seat had defiled, the pollution in this case being indirect.

(24) And if any man lie with her.—For committing this gross act presumptuously, both parties to it were visited with death. (See chaps. xviii. 19, xx. 18.)

(25) Have an issue . . . many days.—The last case is that of a chronic issue, arising from a derangement in the constitution. This is the kind of complaint from which the woman suffered who came to Christ (Matt. ix. 20; Luke viii. 44). As long as she suffered from it, which lasted sometimes for many years, she defiled and was defiling in the same way as in her menses.

(26, 27) Every bed whereon she lieth.—The rules here laid down about her defilement and defiling are the same as those in verses 20—23.

(26) But if she be cleansed.—That is, cured or healed of her infirmity. The expression “cleansed” is used both here and in verse 15 for the disappearance of the complaint. From the time of its cessation she is to count seven days, during which no trace of the complaint must be observable, just as in the case of the less innocent disorder. (See verse 13.)

After that she shall be clean.—That is, after having performed the rites of purification.

(29) And the priest shall offer.—Exactly in the same manner as described in verse 15.

(30) Thus shall ye separate.—That is, according to the regulations laid down in this chapter. “Ye”—i.e., Moses and Aaron, to whom they were conjointly addressed (see verse 1)—are to restrain the children of Israel, lest they be punished with death when they approach the Lord in a defiled state.
they die not in their uncleanness, when they defile my tabernacle that is among them.

(32) This is the law of him that hath an issue, and of him whose seed goeth from him, and is defiled therewith;

(33) and of her that is sick of her flowers, and of him that hath an issue, of the man, and of the woman, and of him that lieth with her that is unclean.

CHAPTER XVI. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses after the death of the two sons of Aaron, when they offered before the Lord, and died; (2) and the Lord said unto Moses, Speak unto Aaron thy brother, that he come not at all times into the holy place within the vail before the mercy seat, which is upon the ark; that he die not: for I will appear in the cloud upon the mercy seat. (3) Thus shall Aaron come into the holy place; with a young bullock for a sin offering, and a ram for Defile my tabernacle. — Better, my dwelling-place, which can here be used, though in chap. vii. 10, where it also occurs, the expression "dwelling-place" does not suit so well.

(32, 33) This is the law. — These two verses give a summary of the contents of the chapter. In the recapitulation, however, as we have already seen, the order of the enactments is not strictly adhered to.

XVI.

(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses. — As the observance of the minute regulations given in the preceding chapters about the daily sacrifices and purifications would necessarily be tainted with many imperfections and shortcomings, both on the part of the mediating priests and the offering laity, a general day of atonement is here instituted, when priest and people are alike to obtain atonement once a year for the sins which were mixed up even with their sacred worship. The day of atonement enacted in the chapter before us is therefore an appropriate conclusion of the laws of purification in the preceding chapters. It is an annual supplement and completion of all the ordinances which were daily practised, and the design of which was to obtain atonement and reconciliation.

After the death of the two sons of Aaron. — That is, after Nadab and Abihu, his two eldest sons, had died, in consequence of having presumptuously entered the sanctuary in a unfit manner, and at an irregular time. (See chap. x. 1, 2.)

(2) That he come not at all times. — Moses is therefore to warn his brother Aaron, the high priest, that if he wishes to escape a similar fate, he is not to presume to enter the Holy of Holies except on one day of the year, the Day of Atonement. As Aaron here stands for all those who in future are to succeed him in the pontificate, so Moses, who teaches him his duty, stands for his successors who are hereafter to impart instruction to the high priests on these most solemn occasions. Hence during the second Temple the tuition and preparation of the high priest for his functions devolved upon the Sanhedrin, who prescribed most minute rules for his guidance. Seven days before the Day of Atonement he was separated from his wife, and lodged in a chamber in the Temple, lest he should contract defilement, which might unfit him for the performance of his pontifical duties. The elders or the representatives of the Sanhedrin read and expounded to him the ordinances contained in this chapter; which he had to practise in their presence, so as to make sure that he could rightly perform all the ceremonies. This continued during the whole night previous to the Day of Atonement, when he was kept awake, so as to prevent any pollution arising from a dream or accident by night.

He read, in the silent hours of darkness, the Books of Job, Daniel, Ezra, and Chronicles; and if he was no scholar, and could not read, the elders read them to him. As it was deemed important that he should not fall asleep, the priests who surrounded him alternately snapped their fingers, and made him walk on the cold pavement of the court. When the chief of the thirteen priests who were appointed to perform the ordinary duties in connection with the service in the sanctuary had ascertained that the morning had dawned, that the ashes had been removed from the brazen altar, and that the time of the early sacrifice had arrived, the high priest was conducted to the baptistery, where he immersed his whole body in water.

Into the holy place. — This is here more minutely defined by "within the vail," thus showing that the Holy of Holies is meant. In the succeeding portions of this chapter, however, the expression "holy" is used for "Holy of Holies" without this adjunct. (See verses 3, 16, 17, 20, 27.)

Before the mercy seat, which is upon the ark. — Or, according to the accents of the received text, nor come to the mercy seat, which, &c. The present text exhibits the view of the Pharisæes—that the high priest, though at some distance from the ark, is yet led through the frankincense on the burning coals in the Holy of Holies itself (see verses 12, 13); whilst the Sadducees maintained that he must put it on the coals already in the court, because they deemed it improper to work in the presence of the Lord, and because the pontiff would otherwise see the ark. The Authorised Version, therefore, here, as elsewhere, follows the view of the Sadducees, and departs from the received accents, which are an essential part of the traditional text.

For I will appear in the cloud. — That is, because the Lord appeared over the mercy seat and between the cherubim in the bright luminous cloud which constituted the symbol of His Divine presence (see Exod. xxv. 22), therefore even the high priest must not approach it except on the occasion here prescribed. The Sadducees, however, render it, only in the cloud of incense will I be seen on the cover, that is, in the cloud arising from the burning incense which the high priest is to produce by fumigation before he enters the Holy of Holies, and which is to conceal the manifested Deity.

(3) Thus shall Aaron come. — Better, With this shall, &c., that is, with the following sacrifices, ritual, vestments, &c., shall he approach the most holy place, after having offered previously the daily morning sacrifice, and performed the ordinary daily service. During the performance of the morning service the high priest, at the time of Christ, wore the golden vestments. These he changed for the white garments.
a burnt offering. (4) He shall put on the holy linen coat, and he shall have the linen breeches upon his flesh, and shall be girded with a linen girdle, and with the linen mitre shall he be attired: these are holy garments; therefore shall he wash his flesh in water, and so put them on. (5) And he shall take of the congregation of the children of Israel two kids of the goats for a sin offering, before he commenced the special ritual prescribed for this day.

With a young bullock for a sin offering.—Which had to be of the second year (see Exod. xxix. 1), and which the high priest had to buy with his own money. It was to be his own property because the victim was to expiate his own sins, since he, like the meanest sinner, required Divine mercy and forgiveness, though, owing to his high office, he had to bring a more costly sacrifice.

(4) He shall put on the holy linen coat.—Better, a holy linen tunic. The four articles of clothing here mentioned, all of which were of white linen, constituted the sacrosanct “white vestments,” in contradistinction to “the golden garments.” Of the white garments he possessed two sets, one of Egyptian linen, and the other of Indian and less costly linen. The community allowed the high priest thirty minae to purchase these garments, and he could add as much as he liked from his own money if he wished them to be more costly, provided the material was linen made of six double-twisted threads and of flax. It was the more costly vestments of Egyptian linen which the high priest wore on this occasion. The latter he put on in the after part of the day when he entered the Holy of Holies to bring out the covering. These garments were the same as those of the ordinary priests, except the turban, which was a little taller.

And he shall wash.—He had to bathe his holy body every time when he changed his vestments.

(5) And he shall take of the congregation.—On this occasion the high priest himself had to officiate, by virtue of his being the chief mediator between God and His people.

Two kids of the goats.—Better, two shaggy he-goats. (See chap. iv. 23.) These two goats, which were the sin offering for the people, and the ram, which was their burnt offering, were purchased with the money of the public some time before the Day of Atonement. During the second Temple the two goats had to be alike in value, equal in size, and of the same colour. If one of them happened to die after the decision of the lot, a new pair had to be purchased, and the surviving one of the original pair was kept and properly fed till it became ritually defective, whenupon it was sold, and the money paid into the sacred treasury.

(6) And Aaron shall offer.—Better, And Aaron shall present, as the word literally denotes (comp. verses 9, 11, &c.), since the actual offering or killing took place afterwards, when the lots for the goats had been cast, as described in verse 11.

For himself, and for his house.—By this is meant that the atonement was for his own sins, for those of his family and for all the priests, the sons of Aaron. The ritual at this pontifical sacrifice during the second Temple was most solemn and impressive.

and one ram for a burnt offering. (6) And Aaron shall offer his bullock of the sin offering, which is for himself, and make an atonement for him, and for his house. (7) And he shall take the two goats, and present them before the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. (8) And Aaron shall cast lots upon the two goats; one lot for the Lord, and the other lot for the side of the victim, which was placed between the porch and the altar towards the east, stood the high priest, arrayed in his white robes, with his face towards the west. In this attitude of a penitent sinner, the pontiff laid both his hands upon the sacrifice and confessed his sins in an audible voice in the sight of God and the assembled congregation as follows: “O Lord, I have sinned, I have committed iniquity, I have transgressed before thee, I and my house. O Lord, I beseech thee cover over my sins, iniquities, and transgressions which I have committed before thee, I and my house, even as it is written in the Law of Moses thy servant—For on that day He will cover over for you and cleanse you from all your sins.” And to this the congregation replied: “Blessed be the name of His glorious kingdom for ever and ever.” Whereupon the high priest repeated this confession a second time, including in it the children of Aaron, God’s holy people. (See verse 11.)

(7) And he shall take the two goats.—Having presented his own sin-offering, the high priest, accompanied by the two chief priests, now came to the north of the altar. Here the one of his companions who was next in rank to the pontiff placed himself at his right side, whilst the other, who held the office of chief of the principal household (see 1 Chron. xxiv. 6), stood at his left. It was here that the two goats were presented with their faces to the west, where the Holy of Holies was, and where the Divine majesty was especially revealed.

(8) And Aaron shall cast lots.—The lots consisted of two small tablets which at an earlier time were of box or ebony wood, but which during the later part of the second Temple were made of gold, and were kept in a wooden chest. On the one was engraved the words “For Jehovah,” and on the other “For Azazel,” the expression in the original, which is translated scapegoat in the Authorised Version. The high priest, after shaking the chest, put both his hands into the urn and simultaneously took out the two tablets, one in each hand. Hereupon he put the tablet which he had in his right hand upon the goat that was standing on his right side, whilst the tablet in his left hand he put on the goat on his left side. If the tablet with the inscription “For Jehovah” was in his right hand the chief priest who stood at the right of the pontiff exclaimed “Hold up thy hand on high!” and if it happened to be in the left hand, the chief of the principal household, who stood on his right, called out to him “Hold up thy left hand.” Hereupon the high priest laid the two lots on the two goats, the one in the right hand on the goat at his right, and the one in the left hand on the animal at his left, exclaiming at the same time, “To the Lord a sin offering!”

And the other lot for the scapegoat.—Better, and the other lot for Azazel. The word, which only occurs in this chapter, probably denotes the utterly scapegoat. (9) And Aaron shall bring the goat upon which the Lord's lot fell, and offer him for a sin offering. (10) But the goat, on which the lot fell to be the scapegoat, shall be presented alive before the Lord, to make an atonement with him, and let him go for a scapegoat into the wilderness.

(11) And Aaron shall bring the bullock of the sin offering, which is for himself, and shall make an atonement for himself, and for his house, and shall kill the bullock of the sin offering which is for himself; (12) and he shall take a censer full of burning coals of fire from off the altar before the Lord, and his hands full of sweet incense beaten small, and bring it within the vail: (13) and he shall put the incense upon the fire before the Lord, that the cloud of the incense may cover the mercy seat that is upon the testimony, that he die not; (14) and *he shall take of the blood of the bullock, and *sprinkle it with his finger upon the mercy seat eastward; and before the mercy seat

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Leviticus, XVI. for Himself.</th>
<th>Leviticus, XVI. for Himself.</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>1 Heb. Äaz'el.</td>
<td>2 Heb. wad op.</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>1 ch. 4. 6.</td>
<td>1 ch. 9. 15 &amp; 20. 6.</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

vanished demon, the prince of the evil spirits, who with his legions occupies the desert regions and desolated places. (Comp. Isa. xiii. 21, xxxiv. 14; Matt. xii. 43; Luke xi. 24; Rev. xvii. 2.) As the removal or pardon of sin is often represented in the Bible by its being banished into the utmost parts of the earth and seas (Micah vii. 18; Ps. ciii. 12), nothing could be more striking to the people the idea of absolute forgiveness better than this symbolic act of sending the goat laden with the sins of the congregation to the wilderness, the abode of the prince of darkness, back to the author of all sin. The rendering, scapegoat, is contrary to the manifest antithesis of the verse. If the one member "For Jehovah" denotes a person, the second member "For Azazel," which forms the contrast, must, primâ facie also denote a person. Besides, the translation scapegoat cannot be admitted in the next verse but one, where, if adopted, it would literally be "to send the goat to the scapegoat in the wilderness" (see verse 10), or in verse 26, where it is, "and he who taketh away the goat to the scapegoat."

(9) The goat upon which the Lord's lot fell. —Immediately after the lots decided the destiny of the two goats they were distinguished from each other by peculiar marks. The one which was "for Jehovah" had a red woolen thread tied around its neck, whilst the one "for Azazel" had the scarlet thread tied on the head or on the horns.

And offer him for a sin offering. —Better, and shall present, or appoint it for a sin offering (see verse 6), as the actual offering of it up took place afterwards. (See verse 15.)

(10) On which the lot fell to be the scapegoat. —Better, on which the lot "for Azazel" fell. This one with its distinctive scarlet badge was placed at the spot from whence he was sent away, and thus stood alone, not presented, before the Lord.

To make an atonement with him. —Better, to make atonement for it, that is, it was placed before the Lord in order that it might receive expiation and sanctification, and thus be fitted for the sacred purposes it was destined to fulfil. (See verses 16, 18.)

And to let him go for a scapegoat into the wilderness. —Better, to send it to Azazel into the wilderness.

(11) And Aaron shall bring the bullock. —Having formally dedicated the bullock for his own sin offering (see verse 6), and after the two goats which constituted the people's sin offering had been presented and their lots decided (verses 7—10), Aaron comes back to his own sin offering a second time. He again laid both his hands on the victim and repeated the confes-
The Sin Offering

LEVITICUS, XVI.

shall he sprinkle the blood of the blood with his finger seven times.

(15) Then shall he kill the goat of the sin offering, that is for the people, and bring his blood within the vail, and do with that blood as he did with the blood of the bullock, and sprinkle it upon the mercy seat, and before the mercy seat;

(16) and he shall make an atonement for the holy place, because of the uncleanness of the children of Israel, and because of their transgressions in all their sins: and so shall he do for the tabernacle of the congregation, that remaineth among them in the midst of their uncleanness.

(17) And there shall be no man in the tabernacle of the congregation when he goeth in to make an atonement in the holy place, until he come out, and have made an atonement for himself, and for his household, and for all the congregation of Israel.

(18) And he shall go out unto the altar that is before the Lord, and make an atonement for it; and shall take of the blood of the bullock, and of the blood of the goat, and put it upon the horns of the altar round about.

(19) And he shall sprinkle of the blood upon it with his finger seven times, and cleanse it, and hallow it from the uncleanness of the children of Israel.

(20) And when he hath made an end of reconciling the holy place, and the tabernacle of the congregation, and the altar, he shall bring the live goat:

(21) and Aaron shall lay both his hands upon the head of the live goat, and confess over him all the iniquities of the children of Israel, and all their
and shall send him away by the hand of a fit man into the wilderness: (22) and the goat shall bear upon him all their iniquities unto a land not inhabited; and he shall let go the goat in the wilderness.

(23) And Aaron shall come into the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall put off the linen garments, which he put on when he went into the holy place, and shall leave them there: (24) and he shall wash his flesh with water in the holy place, and put on his garments, and come forth, and offer his burnt offering, and the burnt offering of the people, and make an atonement for himself, and for the people. (25) And the fat of the sin offering shall he burn upon the altar.

(26) And he that let go the goat for the scapegoat shall wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water, and after-

And confess over him all the iniquities.—This confession, which was at first extempore, was formulated during the second Temple as follows: “O Lord, thy people, the house of Israel, have sinned, and done iniquity, and transgressed before thee. O Lord, I beseech thee, cover over the sins, the iniquities and the transgressions that thy people, the house of Israel, have sinned, have done iniquitably, and have transgressed before thee, as it is written in the Law of thy servant Moses” (Lev. xvi. 30). The priests and the people who stood in the court when they heard the high priest utter the Ineffable name, Jehovah—which in the time of Christ was only pronounced on this day, and that by the pontiff—prostrated themselves, and with their faces to the ground responded, “Blessed be the name of His glorious kingdom for ever and ever.”

Putting them upon the head of the goat.—By this imposition of hands, and the confession, the high priest transferred the sins of the nation to the goat. He then turned to the people, and declared, “Ye shall be clean.”

Send him away by the hand of a fit man.—The guilt-laden animal was then entrusted to a man previously appointed, to be conducted to the lonely region, the abode of Azazel, thus carrying back to him the sins which he enticed the people to commit during the year. The phrase which is here rendered by “a fit man,” and which occurs nowhere else in the Bible, denotes more properly a timely man, a man at hand, one appointed for the occasion. The marginal rendering, “a man of opportunity,” is still more objectionable.

(22) Unto a land not inhabited.—Literally, unto a land cut off, that is, a place the ground of which is separated from all around it, hence a summit, a peak standing out by itself, a precipice.

In the wilderness.—Where no human beings dwell, but which is the abode of evil spirits. It will be seen that the directions here are simply to conduct the goat into the wilderness, where it is apparently to be let loose to pursue its own course. During the second Temple, however, the authorities decreed that the animal must be destroyed. Accordingly one of the priests who was appointed to execute this mission led the goat to a rock called Zuck, in the wilderness, situate about twelve miles, or ninety furlongs, from Jerusalem. Between the holy city and this steep rock, ten booths were erected at intervals of one mile, and persons were located in every booth to accompany the messenger to the next tent, which was distant Sabbath-day’s journey. From the last booth to the rock, which was double this distance, the messenger had no companion, but he was carefully watched by the occupants of the last booth to see that he performed the ritual according to the prescribed order. On his arrival at the mountain he divided the crimson thread, which was the badge of the goat, into two; one half he fastened to the rock, and the other he tied between the two horns of the victim, and then pushed the animal down the projecting ledge of the rock, when it was dashed to pieces before it reached the bottom. Hereupon the persons stationed at the last booth to watch the proceedings waved linen cloths or white flags, thus signaling from station to station to the priests in the court of the Temple the arrival of the goat at its proper destination.

(23) Shall come into the tabernacle of the congregation.—Better, shall come into the tent of meeting. This was the fourth time that the high priest entered into the Holy of Holies on the Day of Atonement. The object of his going into the most Holy was to fetch the censer and the incense cup which he had left between the two staves (see verse 12). To do this he had again to bathe, which always accompanied the change of garments, and to put on his white robes. As it was not part of the actual service, but was simply a necessary act subsequent to the service, it is not fully described in the text. This was the last act on the Day of Atonement which the high priest performed in his white robes.

And shall leave them there.—The robes were now deposited in a chamber in the sanctuary especially set apart for this purpose, and the high priest was never allowed to minister in them again.

(24) And he shall wash his flesh.—That is, immerse his whole body. The baptistry, where the high priest performed these ablutions, was on the roof of a building in the sacred precincts. According to the authorities and practice during the second Temple the act described in this verse preceded the one ordered in the foregoing verse. The burnt offering, both for himself and for the people, the high priest offered in the golden garments. These he changed for the white robes when he afterwards went into the Holy of Holies to fetch the censer and the incense cup. The sacrifice consisted first of his own ram, then the ram of the people, and lastly the bullock of the people, and their seven lambs. (Comp. Num. xxix. 8.)

(25) And the fat of the sin offering.—That is, the fat of the inwards of both the bullock (see verse 6) and the goat (see verse 15), which constituted the sin offering, as well as the fat of the other goat, which was the priest’s sin offering, was to be burnt upon the brazen altar of burnt offering in the courtyard. (See chap. iv. 8—10.)

(26) And he that let go the goat for the scapegoat.—Better, And he that leadeth away the goat to Azazel (see verse 10). As the messenger who conducted the sin-laden animal to the author of sin ward come into the camp. (27) And the bullock for the sin offering, and the goat for the sin offering, whose blood was brought in to make atonement in the holy place, shall one carry forth without the camp; and they shall burn in the fire their skins, and their flesh, and their dung. (28) And he that burneth them shall wash his clothes, and bathe his flesh in water, and afterward he shall come into the camp.

(29) And this shall be a statute for ever unto you: that in the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, ye shall afflict your souls, and do no work at all, whether it be one of your own country, or a stranger that sojourneth among you: (30) for on that day shall the priest contracted defilement by the impurity which the victim carried away, he had both to wash his clothes and immerse his whole body in water before he was admitted into the camp. During the second Temple he remained in the last hoot, which was a mile from Jerusalem, till sundown, when he was re-admitted into the camp.

(27) And the bullock.—That is, the bodies of the sin offerings for the priests and the people (see verses 5. 6, 9, 11) whose blood the high priest carried into the Holy of Holies. (See verses 14, 15, with chap. iv. 11, 12.)

Shall one carry forth.—Better shall be carried forth. During the second Temple four men carried the cærases upon two poles to the place set aside outside Jerusalem for burning. (See chap. iv. 11.) Hence the ancient Palestinian Targum translates it, "they shall be carried out on poles by the hands of the younger priests." As has already been remarked, the priest performed this part of the service immediately after the goat was dispatched by the messenger to the wilderness. Whilst the victims were being burned outside the camp the high priest read in the women's court the appointed lessons for the Day of Atonement (viz., Lev. xxvii. 29; Num. xxix. 7-11) in the presence of the congregation, who were all standing, and at the conclusion of the reading pronounced the eight benedictions (1) on the Divine Law, (2) on the public service, (3) on confession, (4) forgiveness of sins, (5) on Jerusalem, (6) on the Temple, (7) on Israel, and (8) on the priesthood.

(28) And he that burneth.—That is, those who carried the cærases and burned them, like the messenger who conducted the sin-laden goat, contracted defilement from the atoning victims. They had, therefore, to undergo the same ablutions.

(29) And this shall be a statute for ever.—Literally, a statute of eternity, that is, an everlasting ordinance. That which is contained in verses 29, 30 is binding upon the Israelites as long as they exist, and is to be observed by them annually.

In the seventh month, on the tenth day.—This month, which is called Tishri, corresponds to September, and is the month of great festivals. On the first is the Feast of Trumpets (see chap. xxiii. 24), on the tenth the Day of Atonement, and on the fourteenth begins the Feast of Tabernacles which lasts eight days.

Yo shall afflict your souls.—From Isa. lviii. 3, 5, 10 it is evident that by the phrase "to afflict the soul" is meant fasting. This is expressed by the fuller form, "to afflict the soul with fasting;" in Ps., xxxvi. 13, where the Authorised Version inconsistently translates it, "humbled my soul." This is the only public fast ordained in the Mosaic Law; and the authorities during the second Temple defined more minutely in what this fasting consists. According to the canon law it consists not only in abstaining from eating and drink-
Leviticus, xvii.

CHAPTER XVII.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Speak unto Aaron, and unto his sons, and unto all the children of Israel, and say unto them;

—And he did as the Lord commanded Moses.

That is, Aaron performed the service for the first time, according to the ancient custom of the solemn observances connected with the Passover, when the Levites already consecrated to Moses. A similar remark occurs at the first observance of the Passover. (See Exod. xii. 50.) The solemn admonition, therefore, addressed to the priesthood at the beginning of this chapter (see verses 1, 2), not to presume on their office, but to submit to the Divine regulations, was duly observed by the first high priest. It may, however, also be designed to indicate that Aaron did not assume the dignity of the pontificate to exalt himself, but in obedience to the command God gave to Moses.

CHAPTER XVIII.—

(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses.—The Day of Atonement was instituted to purge, in an especial manner, the whole community from all their sins, and present them a holy nation before the Lord once a year. Hence it is now followed by regulations concerning every-day life, the observance of which is to foster the holiness secured on that particular day.

(2) And unto all the children of Israel.—To understand the import of this phrase, and its bearing upon the injunction in question, it is necessary to notice that the words “and unto all the children of Israel” are here used for the first time. Hitherto the Divine communications were made to (1) Moses alone, without his being ordered to speak to any one else (chaps. xv. 14, 20, vi. 12, viii. 1. xiv. 1); (2) to Moses, with the command to speak to Aaron (chap. xvi. 1); (3) to Moses, with the command to speak to Aaron and his sons (chap. vi. 17); (4) to Moses, with a command to speak to the children of Israel (chaps. i. 1, iv. 1, vii. 23, xii. i); (5) to Moses and Aaron conjointly, who are ordered to speak to the children of Israel (chaps. xi. 1, xv. 1); and (7) Aaron alone is addressed (chap. x. 8). In the chapter before us, however, the communication is made to Moses alone, and he is commanded not only to impart its contents to Aaron and his sons—i.e., the priesthood—but “unto all the children of Israel,” or their representatives, at the same time. The pontiff and the priests are thus put on a level with the ordinary Israelites or the laity, as far as this regulation is concerned. There are only two other occasions on which this phrase is used again, viz., chaps. xxi. 24, xxii. 18.

This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded.—To emphasise the importance of the following law Moses is ordered by God to use this additional
This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded, saying, (3) What man soever there be of the house of Israel, that killeth an ox, or lamb, or goat, in the camp, or that killeth it out of the camp, (4) and bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer an offering unto the Lord before the tabernacle of the Lord; blood shall be imputed unto that man; he hath shed blood; and that man shall be cut off from among his people; (5) to the end that the children of Israel may bring their sacrifices, which they offer in the open field, even that they may bring them unto the Lord, unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, unto the priest, and offer them for peace offerings unto the Lord. (6) And the priest shall sprinkle the blood upon the altar of the Lord at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and burn the fat for a "sweet savour unto the Lord." (7) And they shall no more offer their sacrifices unto devils, after whom they have gone a whoring. This shall be a statute for ever unto them throughout their generations.

And burn the fat.—See chap. iii. 3, 5.

(7) And they shall no more offer their sacrifices unto devils.—The word (seirim) here translated "devils," literally denotes hairy or shaggy goats, and then goat-like deities, or demons. The Egyptians, and other nations of antiquity, worshipped goats as gods. Not only was there a celebrated temple in Thumus, the capital of the Mendesian Nomos in Lower Egypt, dedicated to the goat-imago Pan, whom they called Menes, and worshipped as the oracle, and as the fertilising principle in nature, but they erected statues of him everywhere. Hence the Pan, Silenus, satyrs, fauns, and the woodland gods among the Greeks and Romans; and hence, too, the goat-like form of the devil, with a tall, horns, and cloven feet, which obtain in medieval Christianity, and which may still be seen in some European cities. The terror which the devil, appearing in this Pan-like form, created among those who were thought to have seen him, has given rise to our expression panic. This is the form of idolatrous worship which the Jews brought with them from Egypt, and to which reference is continually made. (See Josh. xxiv. 14; Ezek. xx. 7, xxiii. 3, &c.; and especially 2 Chron. xi. 13.) The expression "and they shall no more offer" shows that the Israelites were bidden in the habit of first dedicating their ordinary food to these deities; whilst the words "gone a whoring" indicate the orgies connected with this form of idol worship. It has been urged that the demand to offer up, in so confined a space as the entrance of the sanctuary, the domestic animals intended for the daily consumption of more than 600,000 people, imposed a task upon the people which it was impossible for them to carry out. Hence it has been urged that the injunction here (verses 2—7) must refer to sacrifices. But this difficulty arises from importing our modern notions into the ancient mode of living. The ancient Israelites, like the modern Orientals, especially the nomadic tribes, ate very little flesh meat apart from the seasons of sacrifice, which were the occasions of feasting. Besides, these who urge this difficulty ignore the fact that the injunction before us is restricted to the three kinds of animals; that none of the wild clean quadrupeds, as stag, roes, &c., nor any of the feathered tribes, as pigeons, turtledoves, &c., which formed an essential part of the daily diet, is here included; and that even the three kinds of sacrificial quadrupeds only come within this restriction when they are qualified by age, which was within two years, and by physical condition, which demanded that it should have no external defect, and blindness of one eye, lameness of one foot, &c., to be offered first to the
LEVITICUS, XVII.

(9) And thou shalt say unto them, Whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers which sojourn among you, that offereth a burnt offering or sacrifice, (9) and bringeth it not unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, to offer it unto the Lord; even that man shall be cut off from among his people.

(10) And whatsoever man there be of the house of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn among you, that eateth any manner of blood; I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people. (11) For the life of the flesh is in the blood; and I have given it to you upon the altar to make an atonement for your souls: for it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul.

(12) Therefore I said unto the children of Israel, No soul of you shall eat blood, neither shall any stranger that sojourneth among you eat blood.

(13) And whatsoever man there be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers among them, that eateth any manner of blood, I will even set my face against that soul that eateth blood, and will cut him off from among his people.

Lord. Moreover, the injunction was only intended to operate temporarily, whilst the Jews sojourned and wandered about in the wilderness, where, besides the propensity to sacrifice these animals to idols, they would have been in danger of extirpating their most useful animals. The law was repealed when the Israelites entered the promised land. (Comp. Deut. xii. 13—15.)

(8, 9) Whatsoever man there be.—Better, what man soever there be, as it is in the Authorised Version in verse 3. Here again we have an instance of the same legislative phrase used four times in one short section (verses 3, 8, 10, 13), being translated differently in the Authorised Version. The law enacted in these two verses requires that all legitimate sacrifices should henceforth be presented in the appointed sanctuary, which was the centre of national unity, thus abolishing the liberty which, in accordance with patriarchal practice, had hitherto existed, that every head of a family could be his own priest, and offer up sacrifices wherever and whenever he liked. The commonwealth of Israel were now to acknowledge one altar, one high priest, and one sanctuary. This law was binding not only upon the Israelite by race, but upon strangers who took up their abode in and joined the Jewish community. For wilfully violating this law the offender incurred the penalty of excision.

(10) And whatsoever man.—Better, and what man soever. (See verse 8.)

Eateth any manner of blood.—This prohibition, which has already been mentioned twice in Leviticus, is in both instances joined to the prohibition of fat. (See chaps. iii. 17, vii. 26, 27.) Owing to its great importance, however, the law is enacted here separately, where it naturally follows the order that the blood of all animals sacrificed in the sanctuary is to be offered to the Lord upon the altar. According to the canons which obtained during the second Temple, the blood of clean fishes, of locusts, and of permissible creeping things is exempted.

I will even set my face against that soul.—That is, make him feel my anger. Though this phrase only occurs twice more in this book, and only once in connection with legal enactments (see chaps. xx. 3, 6, xxvi. 17), yet from its usages in other passages it is clear that the expression "face" denotes anger, which shows itself in the countenance. Thus the phrase, which is translated in the Authorised Version, "I will appease him" (Gen. xxx. 20), is in the original, "I will appease his face," where it manifestly stands for anger. Hence Lam. iv. 16, which is in the original, "the face of the Lord hath divided them," is properly rendered in the Authorised Version in the text by "the anger of the Lord." (Comp. also 1 Pet. iii. 12.)

(11) For the life of the flesh is in the blood. Better, for the soul of the flesh is in the blood. The word here rendered "life" in the Authorised Version occurs twice more in this very verse, and is in both instances properly translated soul. Though it is immaterial whether the word in question is translated life or soul, it is essential that it should be rendered uniformly throughout the passage. By translating it differently in the first clause, the Authorised Version has unnecessarily increased the difficulty of the verse. This clause assigns the reason why blood must not be eaten. It is the principle of vitality, it constitutes the soul of animal life. Hence blood and life are used interchangeably in the Scriptures. Thus, when the Psalmist exclaims, "what profit is there in my blood" (Ps. xxx. 9), he uses it for life.

I have given it to you upon the altar.—For the sake of emphasis, the words in the original denoting "upon the altar" are placed first in the Hebrew, and the Authorised Version follows this order. It is however better to translate this clause, For I have ordained it upon the altar to make atonement for your souls. Because it is the principle of life, therefore God has ordained it to be offered upon the altar as an expiation for the offering's life.

For it is the blood that maketh an atonement for the soul.—Better, for it is the blood that maketh atonement by means of the soul. As the blood of the victim is identical with its life, and represents the soul of the animal, hence God has appointed it as a substitute for the sinner's life. Thus the life of the sacrifice atones for the life of the offerer. Hence the remark of the Apostle, "without shedding of blood there is no remission." (Heb. ix. 22.)

(12) Therefore I said ....—Because it is the vehicle of life, and has been ordained by God to atone for life, the children of Israel are here forbidden to eat it. The strangers are also prohibited eating blood, because they have submitted to the law of the land, and because their eating it would not only infringe the law which they have voluntarily adopted, but would lessen the horror with which such indulgence was regarded by the Jews. Hence the enforcement of this prohibition by the Apostle (Acts xv. 20, 29, xx. 25.)

(13) And whatsoever man.—Better, what man soever (see verse 3). Hitherto the law mainly discussed the blood of sacrificial animals, or those quadrupeds which were slaughtered at home. In this and the following verses the statute is extended to all other that sojourn among you, 1 which hunteth and catcheth any beast or fowl that may be eaten; he shall even pour out the blood thereof, and cover it with dust. (14) For it is the life of all flesh; the blood of it is for the life thereof: therefore I said unto the children of Israel, Ye shall eat the blood of no manner of flesh: for the life of all flesh is the blood thereof: whosoever catcheth it shall be cut off.

(15) And every soul that eateth 2that creatures which, though wild, are legally clean and used as food.

Which hunteth and catcheth.—Hunting, which was an amusement with other nations of antiquity, was with the serious Hebrew a matter of necessity. It was resorted to as a matter of necessity to exterminate dangerous beasts (Exod. xxiii. 29), but more especially to procure food (Gen. xxx. 27; Prov. xii. 27). Besides the numerous pitfalls, murras traps, &c., which are so frequently mentioned in the Bible, the Hebrews also employed arms in catching game (Gen. xxvii. 3). When wounded, or when the game had to be killed to facilitate its being carried home, the hunters were liable to become careless about the blood, as is evident from the practice which obtained among some of the ancients. Thus we are told that the Zabians, when they slew a beast, put the blood into a vessel or into a hole which they dug in the ground, and then sat round and feasted on it. It is to prevent such outrages on the sacred blood, which the hunters were especially liable to commit when hungry, that the law is here enacted. An instance of the hungry army flying upon the spoil, killing the cattle in the field, and eating the flesh with the blood, is recorded in I Sam. xiv. 32—34. (Comp. also Ezek. xxxiii. 25.)

Any beast or fowl that may be eaten.—That is, those wild beasts or fowl which, according to the dietary law, were usually eaten. During the second Temple this was interpreted strictly to apply to the clean wild beasts, but not to those not permitted to be eaten.

He shall even pour out the blood.—The earth, from which all animals came forth at their creation (Gen. i. 24), is to receive back again the principle of their life. They proceeded from the womb of the earth, and their life-blood is to return to it. With such scrupulous care was this law observed during the second Temple, that the following Benediction was ordered to be recited when the blood was covered up: "Blessed art thou, O Lord our God, King of the universe, who hast sanctified us by His precepts, and hath commanded us to cover up the blood.

(10) For it is the life of all flesh . . . . . .—Better, for the soul of all flesh is its blood, in, or through, its soul, that is, the sanctity of the blood arises from the fact that it contains the vital principle of all animal life. Or this clause may be rendered, for the life of all flesh is its blood in, or during, its life, that is, the life of all creatures consists in its blood; but only as long as the blood contains this life, for when it is dried up, or coagulated, the life has passed away from it.

For the life of all flesh.—Better, for the soul of all flesh (see verse 11), that is, even of those wild animals which, in contradistinction to the sacrificial quadrupeds, must not be offered upon the altar, the blood constitutes the vital principle.

That which died of itself.—The law enacted here is a natural sequel to the one immediately preceding, since it is still based upon the sanctity of blood. As the body of the animal which either died a natural death, or has been torn by a wild beast, retains a great portion of its blood, it is forbidden to be eaten. The carcases, in which the blood has thus been congealed in the veins and arteries, were given to the dogs (Exod. xii. 31). The rigor with which this law was enforced may be seen from 1 Sam. xiv. 32—35; Ezek. iv. 14, xvi. 36. According to the canonical law which obtained during the second Temple, the carcase was forbidden when the animal died a natural death, or met with an accident, or was strangled to death, or was torn by a wild beast. This explains the apostolic decision, in the council at Jerusalem, about "things strangled" (Acts xv. 29).}

Whether it be one of your own country.—The law was not only binding upon the native Israelite, but upon the proselyte. The mere stranger, in the strict sense of the word, who had not joined the Jewish community, was allowed to eat such carcases. (See Deut. xiv. 21.)

He shall both wash his clothes.—If he ate any of it unwittingly, he had not only to wash his garments, but immerse his whole body in water, and be excluded from the sanctuary till sundown. The sin offering prescribed in chap. v. 2 was not for inadvertently touching the carcase, but for neglecting the prescribed purification. (See chap. v. 2.)

Then he shall bear his iniquity.—If he neglects these acts of purification, and enters the sanctuary in a defiled state, or partakes of the sacrificial meal, he is to incur the penalty of excision for the former act, and to be beaten with stripes for the latter, according to the interpretation given to this law in the time of Christ.

XVIII.

(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses.—Unlike the preceding Divine communications, which treated of the ritual and ceremonial pollutions, the enactments which Moses is here commanded to communicate direct to the children of Israel, or their representatives, the elders, affect their moral life—precepts which form the basis of domestic purity, and which are the foundation of human happiness.

(2) I am the Lord your God.—The Lord is their recognised and sole sovereign, the children of Israel are therefore bound to obey His precepts, and not be led astray by the customs or statutes which prevailed among them, I am the Lord your God. (3) After the doings of the land of Egypt, wherein ye dwelt, shall ye not do: and after the doings of the land of Canaan, whither I bring you, shall ye not do: neither shall ye walk in their ordinances. (4) Ye shall do my judgments, and keep mine ordinances, to walk therein: I am the Lord your God. (5) Ye shall therefore keep my statutes, and my judgments: a which if a man do, he shall live in them: I am the Lord.

(6) None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him, to uncover their nakedness: I am the Lord. (7) The nakedness of thy father, or the nakedness of thy mother, or of thy sister, an husband's, or a sister's of thy youth, or of thy youth, or of thine own youth, shall ye not uncover. (8) The nakedness of any that is near to me shalt thou not uncover; surely I am the Lord. (9) If a man uncover the nakedness of his father, the sin is the same; he shall be childless all his days for the shame which he hath uncovered of his father. (10) In like manner shalt thou do unto the woman, and uncover not her nakedness; for it is thy father's shame, or thy mother's shame: he shall be childless all his days. (11) If, however, a man uncover the nakedness of his sister, be it the daughter of his father, or the daughter of his mother, she shall be childless all her days; for her shame she shall be childless. (12) And if a man uncover the nakedness of his daughter in law, the daughter of his son, he hath committed lewdness: he shall be childless all his days.

(13) If a man uncover the nakedness of his father's wife; he hath uncovered his father's shame, and shall be childless all his days. (14) If a man uncover the nakedness of his daughter, the daughter of his son, he hath committed lewdness: he shall be childless all his days. (15) If a man uncover the nakedness of his wife's sister, he hath uncovered his sister's shame: he shall be childless all his days. (16) If a man uncover the nakedness of his uncle's wife, he hath uncovered his uncle's shame: he shall be childless all his days. (17) If a man uncover his kinswoman, he hath uncovered her shame: and he shall be childless all his days.

(18) None of you shall approach to any that is near of kin to him, to uncover their nakedness: I am the Lord. (19) None of you shall approach to anyone that is near of kin to him, to uncover their nakedness: I am the Lord.
ness of thy mother, shalt thou not uncover: she is thy mother; thou shalt not uncover her nakedness.

The nakedness of thy father's wife shalt thou not uncover: it is thy father's nakedness.

(9) The nakedness of thy sister, the daughter of thy father, or daughter of thy mother, whether she be which this injunction is addressed both to the daughter and the son. The daughter must not marry or have commerce with the father, nor the son with the mother. Hence the Chaldee Version of Jonathan translates it "the woman shall not lie with her father, and the man shall not lie with his mother." Accordingly the case here contemplated is that of Lot's daughters (Gen. xix. 31—33). This passage may, however, be translated literally, the nakedness of thy father, and the nakedness of thy mother shalt thou not uncover. That is, they being both one flesh, the nakedness of the one is the nakedness of the other. Amongst the Persians and other eastern nations, marriage between son and mother was allowed.

(9) The nakedness of thy father's wife.—Whilst the former prohibition refers to the son's own mother, this law is directed against illicit commerce with his stepmother. Here we have an instance where the phrase "to uncover the nakedness," denotes both illicit commerce and incestuous marriage. Accordingly the administrators of the law during the second Temple defined it as follows; a man's father's wife is for ever prohibited, whether she be simply betrothed or married to his father, whether she be divorced or not, whether she be a widow or not; all connection with her on the part of the father's son is forbidden. If he lie with her while her husband is alive, he is doubly guilty, first, because she is near of kin, and secondly, because she is another man's wife. This, therefore, includes the sin of Reuben with Bilhah, his father's concubine (Gen. xxxv. 22), and of Absalon with the wives of his father (2 Sam. xvi. 20—23; 1 Kings ii. 17), which was not incestuous marriage but adultery, since their husbands were alive and the wives were not divorced from them, as well as the sin practised among some of the Christians in Corinth, which consisted in sons actually marrying their divorce stepmothers in the lifetime of their fathers, and which the Apostle denounced with such severity (1 Cor. v. 1—4). Among the ancient Arabs, marriages with stepmothers were common, and to this day among some tribes in Africa, when a father is unable through advanced age to attend to his young wives, he voluntarily gives them over to his eldest son. The Koran, however, like the Mosaic law, proscribes these marriages (Koran, iv. 27).

(9) The nakedness of thy sister.—The fact that Adam married "bone of his bone and flesh of his flesh," and that his sons married their own sisters, encouraged the ancient Hebrew to imitate their example. Hence we find Abraham, the father of the faithful, married his half-sister (Gen. xx. 12). The same practice obtained amongst other nations of antiquity. Thus the Athenians married their half-sisters by their father's side, and the Spartans married half-sisters by the same mother, whilst the Assyrians and Egyptians married full sisters. Though nothing can be more explicit than the law here laid down, and though the transgression of it is denounced as an accursed and impious crime, to be visited with capital punishment (see chap. xx. 17; Deut. xxvii. 22), yet from the narrative of Ammon and his sister Tamar, and especially from the touching and melancholy remark of the outraged sister (2 Sam. xiii. 13, 16, 20), it is evident that the practice of the primitive parents of the human race and the example of the father of the Hebrew nation, continued to be followed in spite of this law. (Comp. Ezek. xxii. 11.)

Born at home or born abroad.—Literally, the birth, or offspring of the house or the birth, or offspring from abroad. According to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, the import of this precept is to forbid commerce between a brother and a sister, whether the sister is born in wedlock, which is meant by born at home, or whether she is illegitimate, which is meant by birth or offspring from abroad. Hence the ancient Chaldee Version of this clause, "whom thy father begot of another woman or of thy mother, or whom thy mother brought forth by thy father or by another man."

The nakedness of thy son's daughter.—From this prohibition it is inferred that a man must not marry his own daughter. If a granddaughter, who is a degree further removed from him, is proscribed, how much more his own daughter. Hence the canonical law during the second Temple deduced from this passage that "whose companion with a woman, even by way of fornication, and begetteth a daughter, she is forbidden to him." Still, when the mother is expressly forbidden to the son (see verse 7), it is strange that the daughter should have been passed over in silence, and be left to inference. It is therefore more than probable that a word has dropped out of the text, and that originally it stood here, "the nakedness of thy daughter and of thy son's daughter," &c. That this is not a solitary instance where the text has suffered from disarrangement we shall presently have occasion to see in verse 11.

(10) Thy father's wife's daughter.—If this clause stood alone it would denote the daughter of a man's stepmother by another or previous husband, since "father's wife" in Hebrew always denotes stepmother (see verse 8, chap. xx. 11; Deut. xxii. 1, xxvi. 20), in which case the man and the maiden, though no blood relations at all, would be forbidden to each other by virtue of the damsel's mother having married the man's father. It would thus differ from verse 9, where the maiden is a half-sister either by the same father or the same mother.

Begotten of thy father.—Literally, the birth, or offspring of thy father (see verse 9), that is, though the daughter of the stepmother, she is begotten by the same father, and hence is his half-sister on the father's side, which is exactly the same case already proscribed in the first. Hence to avoid a saving repetition of the same prohibition we must either regard this clause as having crept into the text from a marginal gloss, or we must correct the first letter of the disjunctive particle in verse 9, which would make it "the nakedness of thy sister, the daughter of thy father," and the daughter of thy mother." Accordingly, verse 9 prohibits marriage with a full sister, whilst the verse before it forbids it with a half-sister. The latter is the more probable, since intermarriage between entire stepbrother and step-sister has always been, and still is, legitimate among the Jews. (12) Thy father's sister.—According to the law which obtained in the time of Christ this prohibition not only extended to the father's half-sisters, but even when they were begotten by the grandfather illegitimately. It is remarkable that Moses himself was the offspring of such an alliance, since his father Amram married his own aunt Jochebed, who was the sister of his father. (See Exod. vi. 20.) (13) Thy mother's sister.—Equally forbidden is the aunt by the mother's side. The law which obtained in the time of Christ also defines this prohibition to extend to a mother's sister or half-sister by the same father or mother, whether born in wedlock or out of it. It is remarkable that the administrators of the law during the second Temple understood this last prohibition strictly to apply to alliances between nephews and aunts, but not vice versa to marriages between nieces and uncles. They regarded intermarriage between uncle and niece as an especially meritorious act, and interpreted the promises "then shalt thou call and the Lord shall answer" (Isa. Ixvii. 9) to refer more particularly to the man "who loves his neighbours, befriends his relations, marries his brother's daughter, and lends money to the poor in the hour of need." This is in accordance with the fact that not only do we find that Nahor married Milcah the daughter of his brother Haran (Gen. xi. 29), but that Othniel, the son of Kenaz, married his niece Acsah, being the daughter of Caleb, his father's brother (Josh. xv. 17; Judges i. 13). Hence among the Jews to this day intermarriages between uncles and nieces is of common occurrence. (14) Thy father's brother, thou shalt not approach to his wife.—That is, according to the ancient legal interpretation, a nephew is to have no commerce with her during her husband's lifetime, nor marry her when his uncle is dead. Those who transgressed this law had not only to bear their sin, but were doomed to die without issue. (See chap. xx. 20.) (15) Thy daughter-in-law.—The legislators in the time of Christ defined this prohibition as applicable not only to cases where marriage between them had actually been consummated, but to cases where the maiden had only been espoused, or where the daughter-in-law had been divorced by the son, or had become a widow. For an offence of this kind both parties were punished with death. (See chap. xx. 12.) Other nations regarded such alliances with the same abhorrence. (See Koran, iv. 27.) (16) The nakedness of thy brother's wife.—Though alliance with a brother's wife is here forbidden—the prohibition, according to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, extending to illicit commerce or marriage in case she is divorced from her husband during the lifetime of her husband—and though the offenders are threatened with the curse of childlessness (see chap. xx. 21), yet the law on this point is by no means absolute. Under certain conditions the law enjoins it as a moral and civil duty for a man to marry his brother's widow. If a brother dies without issue, it is incumbent upon each surviving brother in succession to marry the widow, and if the brother-in-law refused to perform the sacred duty, the widow made him pass through a ceremony in which she heaped upon him the greatest indignity. This clearly shows that the prohibition here could not be based upon the ground of incest, since that which is inherently incestuous the Divine law itself would under no circumstances have set aside. This duty the surviving brother-in-law had to perform to the widows of as many of his brothers as happened to die without issue. A striking illustration of this fact occurred whilst Jehudah the Holy was president of the Sanhedrin. Twelve widows appealed to their brother-in-law to perform the duty of Levir. He refused to marry them because he saw no prospect how to maintain such an additional number of wives, and possibly a large increase of children. The case came before the President of the Sanhedrin, who not only decided that he must marry them all, but promised that if he would do the duty enjoined upon him in the Law of Moses, he himself would make them a family, and send their children in case there should be any, every Sabatical year, when no produce was got from the land, which was at rest. The offer was accepted by the Levir, and he accordingly married his twelve sisters-in-law. After three years these twelve wives appeared with thirty-six children before Jehudah the Holy, to claim the promised alimony, as it was the Sabatical year, and they actually obtained it. To this day this law is in force amongst the orthodox Jews. When a man dies without issue, the widow ipso facto belongs to the surviving brother, and she is not allowed to marry any one else unless her brother-in-law has gone through the ceremony of publicly renouncing her, which is tantamount to a divorce. This will explain the rendering of the clause before us in the ancient Chaldee Version, "thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy brother's wife in the lifetime of thy brother or after his death if he has children." (17) A woman and her daughter.—That is, if a man marries a widow who has a daughter by a former husband, or if he forms an alliance with a woman who has a daughter out of wedlock, he is forbidden to marry also the daughter. But though this prohibition is directed against a peculiar form of polygamy, for they are her near kinswomen: it is wickedness. (18) Neither shalt thou take a wife to her sister, to vex her, to uncover her nakedness, beside the other in her life time. (19) Also thou shalt not approach unto a woman to uncover her nakedness, as long as she is put apart for her uncleanness. (20) Moreover thou shalt not lie carnally with thy neighbour's wife, to defile thyself with her.

there can hardly be any doubt that, as the administrators of the law during the second Temple interpreted it, if he married either of them and she died, he was not to marry the other, and the latter prohibition did not apply to cases of illicit commerce. Criminal intercourse with one did not preclude him from marrying the other. For contracting the kind of polygamy here forbidden, the offenders were punished with death by fire. (See chap. xx. 14.)

(18) A wife to her sister.—That is, a man is here forbidden to take a second sister for a wife to or in addition to the one who is already his wife, and who is still alive. This clause therefore forbids the Jews, who were permitted to have several wives, a particular kind of polygamy, i.e., a plurality of sisters. According to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, the expression "sister" here not only denotes a full sister by the same father and the same mother, but a half-sister either by the same father or the same mother. The marginal rendering in the Authorized Version, "one wife to another," which makes this a prohibition of polygamy, and which was first proposed by Junius and Tremellius in 1575, is (1) contrary to the expressions "wife" and "sister," which, in every verse of these prohibitions (see verses 8, 9, 11-17), invariably mean wife and sister. (2) Whenever the phrase, "a man to his brother," or "a woman to her sister," is used metaphorically in the sense of "one to" or "one with another" (Exod. xxvi. 3, 5, 6, 17; Ezek. i. 9, 23; iii. 13, &c.), the words have always a distributive force, and are invariably preceded by a plural verb, and the things themselves to which they refer are mentioned by name. Thus, for instance, in Ezek. i. 23, it is, "their wings were straight one toward the other," which is not the case in the passage before us. (3) This rendering is at variance with the Mosaic code, which bases its legislation upon the existence of polygamy, and thus authorises it, as will be seen from the following facts. It permits a father, who had given his son a bondwoman for a wife, to give him a second wife of "freer birth," and prescribes how the first is to be treated under such circumstances (Exod. xxi. 9, 10). It ordains that a king "shall not multiply wives unto himself" (Deut. xvii. 17), which, as Bishop Patrick rightly remarks, "is not a prohibition to take more wives than one, but not to have an excessive number;" i.e., in fact, legalising a moderate number. The law of primogeniture presupposes the case of a man having two wives (Deut. xxi. 15-17), and the Levitical law expressly enjoins that a man, though having a wife already, is to marry his deceased brother's widow (Deut. xxv. 5). Hence we find that the judges and kings, it is not prohibited many wives (2 Sam. 30; 4. xii. 9; 1 Sam. i. 2; 2 Sam. iii. 7). David, the royal singer of Israel, "their best king," as Bishop Patrick remarks, "who read God's word day and night and could not but understand it, took many wives without reproach; nay, God gave him more than he had before by delivering his master's wives to him" (2 Sam. xii. 5), and the case adduced in the previous verse plainly shows that polygamy continued among the Jews after the destruction of the second Temple (verse 10). (4) The Jews to whom this law was given to be observed in their every day life, and to whom the right understanding of the rules of the utmost importance, inasmuch as it involved the happiness of their families, the transgression of it being visited with capital punishment, have, as far as we can trace it, always interpreted this precept as referring to marriage with two sisters together. Hence the ancient canonical interpretation of it is embodied in the Chaldee Version, "a woman in the lifetime of her sister thou shalt not take," in the LXX., Vulg., the Syriac, and all the ancient versions.

To vex her.—That is, by marrying also the younger sister, the first, who is already the wife, would be roamed to jealousy, and the natural love of sisters would thus be converted into enmity, thus precluding the occurrence of a case like that of Jacob with Leah and Rachel. (See Gen. xxix. 30.)

In her lifetime.—This limits the prohibition to her lifetime, that is, as long as the sister who was first married is still living, he must not marry another of her sisters, but he may marry her when the first one is dead. According to the authorities during the second Temple, "in her lifetime" also includes a woman who had been divorced from her husband, and though she is not longer his wife, yet as long as she lives he is forbidden to marry her sister. When the wife died, he was not only free to marry her sister, but in case the deceased left issue, it was regarded as a specially meritorious thing for the widower to do so. Hence the Jews from time immemorial have afforded the bereaved husband special facilities to marry his deceased wife's sister, by allowing the alliance to take place within a shorter period after the demise of his first wife than is usually the case.

Also thou shalt not approach.—Literally, thou shalt not appear. The marriage laws are now followed by sexual inquirers, which to some extent are suggested by the subjects that had necessarily to be discussed or hinted at in regulating the alliance in question.

As long as she is put apart.—Put apart, i.e., seven days. (See chap. xv. 19.) For consorting with her without being aware of her condition the man contracted defilement for seven days (see chap. xx. 24), and for committing this gross act presumptuously, both parties to it were visited with death. (See chap. xx. 18.) Ezekiel refers to the transgression of this law as one of the heinous sins perpetrated by the people of Israel (Ezek. xviii. 16; xxii. 10).

(25) Thy neighbour's wife.—For committing adultery, which is here branded as a defilement, whether with a naked or clothed, or married woman, both guilty parties incurred the penalty of death by stoning. (See chap. xx. 10; Deut. xxii. 22; Ezek. xvi. 38, 40; John viii. 5.) In Egypt the adulterer received a thousand strokes with a stick, and the guilty woman had her nose cut off, and to this day the criminal wife among the Bedouins is executed by her husband, father, or brother, without any mercy. Both criminals were also punished with death among other Eastern nations.
(21) And thou shalt not let any of thy seed pass through the fire to Molech, nor shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the Lord.

(22) Thou shalt not lie with mankind, as with womankind: it is abomination.

(23) Neither shalt thou lie with any beast to defile thyself therewith: neither shall any woman stand before a beast to lie down thereto: it is confusion.

(24) Defile not ye yourselves in any of these things: for in all these the nations which I cast out before you: are defiled which I cast out before you:

(25) and the land is defiled: therefore do I visit the iniquity thereof upon it, and the land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants.

(26) Ye shall therefore keep my statutes and my judgments, and shall not commit any of these abominations; neither any of your own nation, nor any stranger that sojourneth among you:

(27) (for all these abominations have the men of the land done, which were before you, and the land is defiled;)

(28) And thou shalt not let any of thy seed.—Literally, And thou shalt not give any of thy seed. Those who violate the sanctity of the marriage ties will readily sacrifice their children. Hence the prohibition to offer up their children to idols follows the law about meahashit.

Pass through the fire to Molech.—Literally, to let it pass to Molech, that is, to put the child into the hands of the figure of Molech, when it fell into the fire which was kindled in the hollow statue of this idol. Molech, also called Milcom, which denotes king, is described as the hollow idol, or "the abomination of the heathen" (1 Kings xi. 6, 11). The following graphic description has been handed down traditionally of this idol and its worship:—"Our sages of blessed memory say that whilst all other idols had temples in Jerusalem, Molech had his temple outside Jerusalem, in a place by itself. It was a brass and hollow image, bull-headed, with arms stretched out like a human being who opens his hands to receive something from his neighbour. Its temple had seven compartments, into which the offerers went according to their respective gifts. If one offered a fowl, he went into the first compartment; if a sheep, into the second; if a lamb, into the third; if a ram, into the fourth; if a bullock, into the fifth; if an ox, into the sixth; and if he offered his son, he was conducted into the seventh compartment. He first kissed the image, as it is written, "let the sacrificers of men kiss the calf" (Hosea xiii. 2), whereupon a fire was kindled in Molech till its arms became red hot; the child was then put into its hands, and drums were beaten to produce tremendous noises so as to prevent the shrieks of the child reaching the father's ears, lest he should be moved with pity towards its offspring." It was to this idol that Solomon erected a temple on the southern side of Mount Olivet (2 Kings xxii. 13). This idolatrous worship was punished with death by stoning. (See chap. xx. 2.)

Neither shalt thou profane.—Better, And thou shalt not profane, that is, by causing other nations to say that the Israelites regard their God as an inferior deity, and hence offer unto him animals, whilst to Molech they sacrifice their own children. Hence any act which locates in the nation of his commandments or misrepresents God, or by which He is put on a par with other gods, is called "profaning the name of God." (See chaps. xix. 12; xx. 3; xxii. 6; xxii. 2, 32, &c.)

(22) As with womankind.—This was the sin of Sodom (Gen. xix. 5), whence it derived its name, and in spite of the penalty of death enacted by the Law against those who were found guilty of it (see chap. xx. 13), the Israelites did not quite relinquish this abominable vice (Judges xix. 22; 1 Kings xiv. 24), to which the surrounding nations were addicted and which was so prevalent in the time of the Apostles (Rom. i. 27; 1 Cor. vi. 9; Gal. v. 19; 1 Tim. i. 10). By the law of Christ those who are guilty of this sin are excluded from the kingdom of God (1 Cor. vi. 9, 10), whilst the laws of civilised Europe rightly inflict the severest penalties upon offenders of this kind.

(23) Any beast.—The necessity for the prohibition of this shocking crime, for which the Mosaic law enacts the penalty of death (see chap. xx. 15, 16; Exod. xxii. 18), will appear all the more important when it is borne in mind that this degrading practice actually formed a part of the religious worship of the Egyptians in connection with the goat deities.

(24) Defile not ye yourselves.—The Lawgiver who solemnly introduced these precepts by five verses of preface at the beginning of the chapter (verses 1—5), now concludes by an equally solemn appeal to God's people sacredly to observe them in all their integrity, since the violation of them (verses 6—23) has branded those nations with infamy, and brought about their national destruction, and expulsion from the very land which is now to be given to the Israelis.

(25) The land itself vomiteth out her inhabitants.—From the creation the earth shared in the punishment of man's guilt (Gen. iii. 17), and at the restitution of all things she is to participate in his restoration (Rom. viiii. 19—23). The physical condition of the land, therefore, is a bar to moral conduct of man. When he disobeys God's commandments she is parched up and does not yield her fruit" (Deut. xi. 17). "The land is defiled" when he defiles himself. When he walks in the way of the Divine commands she is blessed (Levit. xix. 19; xxvi. 4); "God is merciful unto his land and to his people" (Deut. xxiii. 43). Hence, "the earth mourneth" when her inhabitants sin (Isa. xxiv. 4, 5), and "the earth is glad" when God avenge the cause of His people (Ps. xcvii. 11—13). It is owing to this intimate connection between them that the land, which is here personified, is represented as loathing the wicked conduct of her children and being unable to restrain them. She nauseated them. The same figure is used in verse 23; chap. xx. 22; and in Rev. iii. 16.

(26) Ye shall therefore keep my statutes.—As the perpetration of the above named abominations entailed such disastrous consequences both to the land and to its inhabitants, the strict observance of the Divine statutes is enjoined upon all alike, whether they be Israelites by race or strangers who took up their abode amongst them and joined the Jewish community. (See chap. xvii. 9.)

(27) For all these abominations.—Though the contents of this verse are substantially the same as
(29) that the land spue not you out also, when ye defile it, as it spued out the nations that were before you. (29) For whosoever shall commit any of these abominations, even the souls that commit them shall be cut off from among their people. (30) Therefore shall ye keep mine ordinance, that ye commit not any one of these abominable customs, which were committed before you, and that ye defile not yourselves therein: I am the Lord your God.

CHAPTER XIX.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Speak unto all the congregation of the children of Israel, and say unto them, a Ye shall be holy: for I the Lord your God am holy. (3) Ye shall fear every man his mother, and his father, and keep my sabbaths: I am the Lord your God.

(4) Turn ye not unto idols, nor make to yourselves molten gods: I am the Lord your God.

(5) And if ye offer a sacrifice of peace offerings unto the Lord, ye shall offer it at your own will. (6) It shall be eaten the same day ye offer it, and on the morrow: and if ought remain until the third day, it shall be burnt in the fire.

apart for the parents; (2) not to carb or at or oppose their statements; and (3) not to call them by their proper names, but either to call them father or mother, or my master, my lady. Whilst the expression "honour," which is used in the parallel passage in Exodus xx. 12, they understand to include (1) to provide them with food and raiment; and (2) to escort them. The parents, they urge, are God's representatives upon earth; hence as God is both to be "honored" with our substance (Prov. iii. 9), and as He is to be "feared" (Deut. vi. 13), so our parents are both to be "honoured" (Exod. xx. 12) and "feared" (chap. xix. 3); and as he who blasphemes the name of God is stoned (chap. xxiv. 16), so he who curses his father or mother is stoned (chap. xxv. 16).

And keep my sabbaths.—Joined with this fifth commandment is the fourth of the Decalogue. The education of the children, which at the early stages of the Hebrew commonwealth devolved upon the parents, was more especially carried on by them on Sabbath days. In these leisure hours, when the Israelites were strictly forbidden to engage in any secular work, they found it a pleasant task and a welcome occupation to instruct their children in the many symbols, rites, and ceremonies which formed part of the service of the Sabbath. Hence the observance of the day implied the instruction of the people in the fear and admonition of the Lord, and in acquiring the holiness which is the keynote of this chapter. Hence, too, the violation of the sanctity of the Sabbath is denominated as the greatest sin which the Israelites committed (Ezek. xx. 12, xxi. 8, xxvii. 38, &c.). It is probably for this reason that the administrators of the law in the second Temple say that the commandment about the Sabbath has here been selected to limit the duty of filial obedience. Its combination with the fifth commandment is to show that though children are admonished to obey their parents, yet if they should order the profanation of this holy day, the children must not obey. (See chap. xxiii. 3.)

(4) Turn ye not unto idols.—As the Lord is their God, and there is no other God besides Him, the Israelites must never turn their affections nor address prayers or enquiries to idols. This part of the verse, therefore, corresponds with the first commandment of the Decalogue (Exod. xx. 3). The expression here rendered "idols," which, apart from the Prophets and Hagiographa, only occurs once more (see chap. xxvi. 1), denotes non-entities—nothing, and it is in allusion to this import of the word that the Apostle remarks, "We know that an idol is nothing in the world" (1 Cor. vii. 4). According to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, the injunction here "turn not" means "face not," and forbids even the looking at or the examination of an idol.

(7) And if it be eaten at all on the third day, it is abominable; it shall not be accepted. (8) Therefore every one that eateth it shall bear his iniquity, because he hath profaned the hallowed thing of the Lord: and that soul shall be cut off from among his people.

(9) And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field, neither shalt thou gather the gleanings of thy

Nor make yourselves molten gods.—This part of the verse corresponds with the second commandment in the Decalogue (Exod. xx. 4—6), though the phrase "molten gods" only occurs once more where the same prohibition is enforced (Exod. xxxiv. 17).

(5) And if ye offer a sacrifice.—From chap. xxi. 3—7, it will be seen that the Israelites were in the habit of sacrificing to idols the animals intended for private consumption, and that this practice gave rise to the enactament that when any of the three kinds of quadrupeds are to be slaughtered for daily meat, they should first be devoted to God as peace-offerings. Hence the transition here from the prohibition of idolatrous worship to the peace-offerings. The simple abstinence from sacrifice to idols and offering them to God is not enough. If the Israelites bring a peace-offering to the Lord it must be offered in the prescribed manner.

Ye shall offer it at your own will.—Better, ye shall offer it for your acceptance (see chap. i. 3), that is, ye are to do it in such a manner as will secure for you the Divine acceptance.

(8) Therefore every one that eateth it.—See chap. xxi. 3—20.

That soul shall be cut off from among his people.—Better, That soul shall be cut off from his people, as the Authorised Version renders it in four out of the six instances (see chap. vii. 20, 21, 25, 27) in which this phrase occurs in the Book of Leviticus. When so important a legal formula, threatening death by excision, is used in a limited number of cases, it is most important that it should be rendered uniformly in a translation. (See Note on chap. xxii. 3.)

(9) And when ye reap.—Benevolent consideration for the poor is another means whereby the Israelite is to attain to that holiness which will enable him to reflect the holiness of God. As the Lord is merciful to all, and provides for the wants of every living creature (Ps. cxiv. 15, 16), the Israelite, too, is to regard the want of the poor. By this injunction the Law moreover establishes the legal rights of the poor to a portion of the produce of the soil, and thus harvest. (10) And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard, neither shalt thou gather every grape of thy vineyard; thou shalt leave them for the poor and stranger: I am the Lord your God.
A Repetition

LEVITICUS, XIX.

(11) Ye shall not steal, neither deal falsely, neither lie one to another. (12) And ye shall not a swear by my name falsely, neither shalt thou profane the name of thy God: I am the Lord.

(13) Thou shalt not defraud thy neighbour, neither rob him: the wages of him that is hired shalt not abide with thee all night until the morning.

(14) Thou shalt not curse the deaf, nor put a stumblingblock before the blind.

The harvest of your land.—The expression “harvest,” which is subject to this law, the administrators of the law during the second Temple defined to consist of the following produce of the soil (1) all edible and nutritious plants, but not those used for dying and coloring; (2) plants which are cultivated, but not those which grow wild; (3) those which strictly belong to the soil, but not mushrooms, sponges, &c., since these are not so much dependent upon the soil for their growth, but upon humidity, and grow also upon wet wood, &c.; (4) those which ripen at the same time of the year and are all gathered in at the same time, thus excluding figs and similar fruits of trees which are gathered later and gradually, and (5) produce which is not for immediate consumption, but is garnered up, thus excluding vegetables.

Thou shalt not wholly reap the corners of thy field.—The extent of the “corner” to be thus left for the poor, like that of filial duty and the study of the Divine law, has designingly been left undefined by the administrators of the law. It is among the things which have no fixed measures.” But though the maximum is not given, the minimum is stated to be no less than the sixtieth part of the field. The corner was generally left at the end of the field, so that the poor could easily get at it. The time when the poor came was morning, noon, and at the evening sacrifice, which was about three o’clock in the afternoon. The morning was intended for the accommodation of those mothers who had young children, who were then asleep; the middle of the day to accommodate the nurses, whilst the evening suited the elderly people.

The gleanings of thy harvest.—The expression “gleaning” is defined by the authorities during the second Temple to be the cars which fall from the hand or from the sickle in the time of reaping, provided that the quantity which has thus dropped from the hand of the plucker or cutter does not exceed one or two cars. When these cars have thus been dropped they belong to the proprietor and not to the gleaner. If a wind arose after the corn had all been cut, and scattered the harvest over the gleanings, the field was measured, and a certain quantity was allotted as gleanings; if the owner had gathered in all the harvest without leaving any gleanings, he was obliged to give a certain portion to the poor, though the corn had been ground into flour and baked; and if the harvest was lost or burnt after he had thus gathered it without leaving the gleanings, he was beaten with stripes.

(10) And thou shalt not glean thy vineyard. —In gathering in the vine care is to be taken only to cut off the large clusters, but not the infantias, as the expression literally denotes, which is here rendered by “glean.” Those branches or twigs which had only one or two grapes on them were to be left to the poor.

Neither shalt thou gather every grape.—Better, Nor shall thou gather the scattered grapes, that is, those single grapes which had either fallen to the ground during the process of cutting off the branches, or those which were scattered about the ground after the vintage was completed. Like the gleanings of the field these grapes were the portion of the poor both of Jewish origin and proselytes.

Ye shall not steal.—This injunction, which forms the eighth commandment of the Decalogue (Exod. xx. 15), most probably has here a primary reference to the conduct of the owners of fields and vineyards. They are cautioned that by depriving the poor of his prescribed right to the corner of the fields, and to the gleanings of the harvest and vintage, they commit theft. Hence the Jewish canonists laid it down that he who puts a basket under a vine at the time of gathering grapes robs the poor.

(12) And ye shall not swear.—This corresponds with the third commandment of the Decalogue (Exod. xx. 7).

(13) Thou shalt not defraud.—Here oppression by fraud and oppression by violence are forbidden. It is probably in allusion to this passage that John the Baptist warned the soldiers who came to him: “And he said to them, Do violence to no man, neither accuse any falsely; and be content with your wages” (Luke iii. 14).

The wages of him that is hired.—From the declaration in the next clause, which forbids the retention of the wages over night, it is evident that the day laborer is here spoken of. As he is dependent upon his wages for the support of himself and his family, the Law protects him by enjoining that the earnings of the hireling should be promptly paid. This benign care for the labourer, and the denunciation against any attempt to defraud him, are again and again repeated in the Scriptures (Deut. xxiv. 14, 15; Jer. xxxii. 13; Mal. iii. 5; James v. 4). Hence the humane interpretation which obtained of this law during the second Temple: “He who treats a hireling with harshness sins as grievously as if he hath taken away life, and transgresses fire precepts.”

(14) Thou shalt not curse the deaf.—To revile one who cannot hear, and is therefore unable to vindicate himself, is both inexpressibly mean and wicked. The term deaf also includes the absent, and hence out of hearing (Ps. xxxviii. 14, 15). According to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, this prohibition was directed against all cursing whatsoever. For, said they, if to curse one who cannot hear, and whom, therefore, it cannot grieve, is prohibited, how much more is it forbidden to curse one who hears it, and who is both enraged and grieved by it.

Nor put a stumblingblock before the blind.

—in Deut. xxvii. 18 a curse is pronounced upon those who lead the blind astray. To help those who were thus afflicted was always regarded as a meritorious act. Hence among the benevolent services which Job rendered to his neighbours, he says “I was eyes to the blind” (Job xix. 15). According to the interpretation blind, but shalt fear thy God: I am the Lord.
(15) Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment; thou shalt not respect the person of the poor, nor honour the person of the mighty; but in righteousness shalt thou judge thy neighbour.
(16) Thou shalt not go up and down as a talebearer among thy people; neither shalt thou stand against the blood of thy neighbour: I am the Lord.
(17) Thou shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart; thou shalt in any wise rebuke thy neighbour, and not suffer sin upon him.

which obtained in the time of Christ, this is to be understood figuratively. It forbids imposition upon the ignorant, and misdirecting those who seek advice, thus causing them to fall. Similar tenderness to the weak is enjoined by the Apostle: "That no man put a stumblingblock or an occasion to fall in his brother's way" (Rom. xiv. 13).

But shalt fear thy God.—Deahtness and blindness may prevent the sufferers from detecting the offender, and bringing him to justice before an earthly tribunal, but God on high hears it when the human ear is stopped up, and sees it when the human eye is extinct. Hence the prohibition against injustice to the infirm and the poor is enforced by an appeal to fear the Lord. (See verse 32.)

(15) Do no unrighteousness in judgment.—That is, the judges are not to abuse the authority vested in them by virtue of their office, by administering what ought to be justice in an arbitrary manner. Thou shalt not respect the person of the poor.—The general statement in the preceding clause is here more minutely defined. The consideration for the infirm enjoined in verse 14 is not to influence the decision of the judge, who is to administer justice, even if the poor is thereby reduced to greater poverty, and though the rich party to the suit may benevolently desire a verdict against himself to save the needy (Exod. xxiii. 3). The authorities during the second Temple illustrate it as follows:—"If the rich man should say I am by law obliged to provide for the poor, I will therefore let him win the suit, and he will thus have his wants supplied without being subjected to the humiliation of receiving alms; for this reason it is said thou shalt not respect the person of the poor."

Nor honour the person of the mighty.—Jewish juries, in their extreme desire to be impartial, have gone so far as to urge, that whilst the case between a rich man and a poor is being tried, they should both be dressed alike, both alike should either stand or sit, both should have the same right of speech, and both should be addressed by the judge in the same courteous manner. "If ye have respect to persons," says the Apostle, "in allusion to this passage, "ye commit sin, and are convinced of the law as transgressors" (James ii. 9, with verses 2-4).

(16) Thou shalt not go up and down as a tale-bearer.—Better, Thou shalt not go about slander ing, as the Authorised Version has it in Jerem. vi. 28, ix. 4; Ezek. xxii. 9, Margin. Whilst giving just evidence in a court of justice is demanded by the law, it prohibits the circulation of slanderous reports about our neighbours. This dangerous habit, which has ruined the character and destroyed the life of many an innocent person (1 Sam. xxii. 9, 18; Ezek. xxii. 9, &c.), was denounced by the spiritual authorities in the time of Christ as the greatest sin. Three things they declared remove a man from this world, and deprive him of happiness in the world to come—idolatry, ince st, and murder, but slander surpasses them all. It kills three persons with one act, the person who slanders, the person who is slandered, and the person who listens to the slander. Hence the ancient Chaldee Version of Jonathan translates this clause: "Thou shalt not follow the thrice accursed tongue, for it is more fatal than the double-edged devouring sword." (Comp. also Ecclus. xxvii. 12).

Neither shalt thou stand against the blood.—This part of the verse is evidently designed to express another line of conduct whereby our neighbour's life might be endangered. In the former clause, "the going about," with slanderous reports imperilled the life of the slandered person, hero "the standing still" is prohibited when it involves fatal consequences. The administrators of the law during the second Temple translating this clause literally, thou shalt not stand still by the blood, &c., interpreted it to mean that if we see any one in danger of his life, i.e., drowning, attacked by robbers or wild beasts, &c., we are not to stand still by it whilst his blood is being shed, but are to render him assistance at the peril of our own life. Or if we know that a man has shed the blood of his fellow creature, we are not to stand silently by whilst the cause is before the tribunal. Hence the Chaldee Version of Jonathan renders it, "Thou shalt not keep silent the blood of thy neighbour when thou knowest the truth in judgment." Others, however, take it to denote to come forward, and try to obtain a false sentence of blood against our neighbours, so that this phrase is similar in import to Exod. xxii. 1, 7.

(17) Shalt not hate thy brother in thine heart.—From the outward acts denounced in the preceding verse, the legislator now passes to inward feelings. Whatever wrong our neighbour has inflicted upon us, we are not to harbour hatred against him.

Thou shalt in any wise rebuke.—Better, thou shalt by all means, or thou shalt freely rebuke him. If he has done wrong he is to be reproved, and the wrong is to be brought home to him by exhortation. In illustration of this precept the Jewish canonists remark, "when any man sinneth against another he must not inwardly hate him and keep silence, as it is said of the wicked, 'And Absalom spake unto his brother Amnon neither good nor bad, for Absalom hated Amnon' (2 Sam. xiii. 22); but he is commanded to make it known unto him, and to say, 'Why hast thou done thus unto me? ' " Similar is the admonition of Christ, "If thy brother sin against thee rebuke him, and if he repent forgive him" (Luke xvii. 3).

And not suffer sin upon him.—Better, so that thou bear not sin in his account. That is, by not reproving him, but harbouring inward hatred towards the offender, we not only become partakers of his offence, but incur the sin of bearing secret ill-will (Rom. i. 32; Eph. iv. 26; 1 Tim. v. 20, 22). According to the spiritual authorities during the second Temple, however, this clause denotes, "but thou shalt bear no sin by reason of it," as the Authorised Version
(18) Thou shalt not avenge, nor bear any grudge against the children of thy people, but thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself: I am the Lord. (19) Ye shall keep my statutes.

Thou shalt not let thy cattle gender with a diverse kind: thou shalt not sow thy field with mingled seed: neither shall a garment mingled of linen and woollen come upon thee.

translates this phrase in Num. xviii. 32; that is, “execute the duty of reproof in such a manner that thou dost not incur sin by it,” which they explain in the following manner: “Even if the reproof is ineffectual the first time, it must be repeated over and over again, but the rebuke must desist as soon as he sees blushes on the offender’s face, for it shows that the reproofs have made an impression. Every step taken by the one who reproves, after the offender has thus indicated by his countenance that he realises the offence, is an unnecessary humiliation, and hence brings sin upon him who rebukes by reason of it.”

Thou shalt not avenge. —As the preceding verse was designed to prove the offender, this verse forbids us to avenge the wrong even when the rebuke has proved ineffectual, thus demanding the greatest sacrifice on the part of the injured person. The administrators of the law during the second Temple illustrate what is meant by avenge by the following example. “When a disobedging person who is in need applies to you to lend him something, and you reply, “I will not lend you even as you would not lend me,” this is to avenge.” (Coup. also Rom. xii. 19.)

Nor bear any grudge. —The law goes further still. It enjoins that the injured man is to banish from memory the injury he has suffered, though the offender has made no reparation. The spiritual authorities during the time of Christ regarded the simple reference to the injury when a kindly act is performed to our adversary as a violation of this injunction. They illustrated it by the following example. When an adversary applies to you to lend him something, and you actually comply with his request, but in so doing you say, “I lend it you, I will not act as you have acted, for you have refused to lend me,” this is a violation of the command not to bear any grudge. “He who at the reconciliation with his adversary readily forgives his transgressions, his own trespasses will also be readily forgiven in the day of judgment,” is the oft-repeated precept of the sages during the second Temple. Again, “He who suffers injuries and does not return injury for injury, he who is reviled and does not revile again, fulfils acts of love and rejoices in suffering; of him it is said, ‘Those that love him are like the sun, which comes forth in its might from all dark clouds beaming with light.’” (Judges v. 31.)

Thou shalt love thy neighbour as thyself. —This sublime precept formed the centre around which clustered the ethical systems propounded by some of the most distinguished Jewish teachers during the second Temple. When Hillel was asked by one who wished to learn the sum and substance of the Divino Law in the shortest possible time, this sage replied by giving a paraphrase of the precept before us in a negative form, “What thou dost not wish that others should do to thee, that do not thou to others; this is the whole Law, the rest is only its interpretation. Now go and learn.” Christ gives it in the positive form (Matt. vii. 12; Luke vi. 31; Rom. xiii. 8—10).

(19) Ye shall keep my statutes—that is, the following ordinances, which though not of the same high moral nature as the precepts laid down in the preceding verses, are yet necessary to attain to holiness. The Holy God has made everything “after its kind” (Gen. i. 11, 12, 21, 24, 25, &c.), and has thus established a physical distinction in the order of His creation. For man to bring about a union of dissimilar things is to bring about a dissolution of the Divine laws and to act contrary to the ordinances of Him who is holy, and to whose holiness we are to attain.

Cattle gender with a diverse kind. —Such commixtures would not only contravene the Divine order of things, but would lessen the abhorrence of the crime prohibited in chap. xix. 22, 23. The use, however, of animals mixed from different kinds is not forbidden. Hence we find that mules were largely employed by the Jews (2 Sam. xiii. 29, xviii. 9; 1 Kings i. 33, 38, x. 25, xviii. 5; Ezra ii. 66, &c.). These hybrids were either the issue of parents voluntarily coming together without the aid of the Israelites, or were imported from other countries. This law is binding upon the Jews to this day in every country where they happen to live, whether in Palestine or out of it.

Not sow thy field with mingled seed. —According to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, the prohibition is only applicable to diverse seeds for human food, mixed together for the purpose of sowing them in the same field, as, for instance, wheat and barley, beans and lentils. These an Israelite must neither sow himself nor allow a non-Israelite to do it for him. Seeds of grain and seeds of trees, as well as seeds of different kinds of trees, may be sown together. The opening words of the parable, “A certain man had a fig-tree planted in his vineyard” (Luke xiii. 6), do not contravene this law. Seeds which were not intended for human food, such as of bitter herbs, or of vegetables intended for drugs, were exempted from this law, and like the hybrids of mixed parents, the seeds of herbs sown with diverse kinds were allowed to be used. Unlike the law, however, about the commixture of animals, which, as we have seen, is of universal application, the law about mixed seeds was only applicable to the Holy Land, since the command here is, “thou shalt not sow thy field,” which these authorities maintain means “the fields of their inheritance in the promised land. Though trees are not mentioned here, the law was applied to grafting. Hence it was forbidden to graft an apple-tree on a citron-tree, or evergreen into trees. The fruit, however, which grew upon the trees of such graftings was allowed to be eaten. The law about the diverse graftings is binding upon the Jews in every country and to all ages.

A garment mingled of linen and woollen. —Not only is it forbidden to weave woollen and flaxen threads together into one material to make wearing apparel of it, but according to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, an Israelite must not mend a woollen garment with a flaxen thread, and vice versa. One of the reasons which the ancient canonists assign for this prohibition is that “wool and linen were appointed for the priests alone.” This law is observed by the orthodox Jews to this day. The law laid down
(29) And whosoever lieth carnally with a woman, that is a bondmaid, be-...
But in the fourth year all the fruit thereof shall be holy to praise the Lord withal. And in the fifth year shall ye eat of the fruit thereof, that it may yield unto thee the increase thereof: I am the Lord your God.

Ye shall not eat any thing with the blood: neither shall ye use enchantment, nor observe times.

Ye shall increase thereof: I am the Lord your God.

Ye shall not eat any thing with the blood: neither shall ye use enchantment, nor observe times.

Three years shall it bo. —The cutting off of the fruit is to be repeated every year during three successive years. What is to be cut off is not specified, but it must be sufficient to permit the trees to grow, and to bear more abundantly afterwards. The Lawgiver enacts here as a law that which was in vogue amongst careful husbandmen from time immemorial, thus debarring greedy owners from acting in a way which would ultimately injure their own fruit-bearing trees.

It shall not be eaten. —According to the authorities in the time of Christ, this interdict extended to any and every advantage to be derived from the first three years' produce. The fruits must not be sold, but must either be burnt, or buried in the ground; and if any one eat as much as an olive he received forty stripes save one.

But in the fourth year. —Like the second tithe, the fruits of the fourth year were taken up to Jerusalem, and there eaten by the owner, in company with the poor and needy whom he invited to the repast. The owner, however, was also allowed to redeem them. In this case he had to add the fifth part of their value, take up the money to the holy city, and there spend it in a repast to which he invited the poor. The grapes of the vineyards within a distance of a day's journey of Jerusalem had, however, to be taken up to decorate the streets of the holy city. Vineyards of the fourth year were exempt from the law laid down in verses 9 and 10, as well as from the law of first-fruits, tithes, and second tithes.

Shall be holy to praise the Lord withal. —Better, shall be holy, a praise to the Lord, that is, either the fruits themselves, or their equivalent in money, shall be spent in the holy city, thus offering them at this sacrificial repast in praise to the Lord. (Comp. Judges ix. 27.)

And in the fifth year. —It was only in the fifth year that the owner was permitted to eat the fruits without redeeming them.

That it may yield unto you the increase thereof. —That is, refrain from using the fruits during the first three years, and consecrating to the Lord the fruit of the fourth year in the sacrificial repast, they shall realise that hereafter the tree will yield them abundant fruit. So far, therefore, from being losers by waiting till the fifth year, they will actually be gainers.

Ye shall not eat any thing with the blood. —According to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, there are no less than five different things forbidden here. It prohibits (1) eating the flesh of a legally slaughtered animal as long as its life is not quite gone, or whilst the flesh is still trembling; (2) eating the flesh of sacrificial animals whilst the blood is still in the sprinkling bowl, and before it has been sprinkled on the altar; (3) eating the meat of mourners by the relatives when a member of the family has been publicly executed, and his blood has been shed; (4) eating anything by the judicial court on the day when their sentence of death is being executed on the criminal; and (5) it warns the rebellious and glutinous son "not to eat iniquity by the penalty of the blood." The ancient Chaldee Version translates it "Ye shall not eat the flesh of any sacrifice whilst the blood is in the basin unspinkled," exhibits the second of these prohibitions involved in this interpretation; and all the five promise the rendering of this phrase, "Ye shall not eat by the blood," which has the merit of being literal; whilst the Authorised Version follows the first of these five prohibitions.

Neither shall ye use enchantment. —Better, ye shall use no enchantment. According to the authorities during the second Temple, this consisted in any one saying, "A morsel has dropped out of my mouth; the staff has fallen out of my hand; my child has called out behind me; a crow has eaved to me; a deer has crossed my path; a serpent crept on my right hand; a fox has gone by on my left;" and regarding these as bad omens for the day which has now begun or for the work which he has just commenced. Or if he says to the man who raises the taxes, "Do not begin with me; it is still early in the day; it is the first of the month; it is the beginning of the week; I shall be unlucky the whole day, week, or month to be the first to be burdened;" this is enchantment.

Nor observe times. —This, according to the same authorities, consists in "taking notice of the seasons and days, and in saying this is a good day to begin a journey, to-morrow will be lucky to make a purchase."
not round the corners of your heads, neither shalt thou mar the corners of thy beard. (25) Ye shall not make any cuttings in your flesh for the dead, nor print any marks upon you: I am the Lord.

(29) Do not

(22) Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary: I am the Lord.

(23) Regard not them that have familiar spirits, neither seek after wizards, to be defiled by them: I am the Lord your God.

(32) Thou shalt rise up before the hoary head, and honour the face of the old man, and fear thy God: I am the Lord.

(33) And

(28) Cuttings in your flesh for the dead.—It was not only the custom for mourners to let their hair grow long and wear it in a disorderly manner (see chap. x. 6), but the bereaved in the East to this day make cuts and incisions in their bodies in mourning for the dead. The Israelite, however, who is created in the image of God, and who is to be as holy as the Lord is holy, must not thus disfigure his body (see chap. xxii. 6; Deut. xiv. 1, &c.); he must not sorrow as others which have no hope. For transgressing this law the offender received forty stripes save one.

Nor print any marks upon you.—This, according to the ancient authorities, was effected by making punctures in the skin to impress certain figures or words, and then filling the cut places with stibium, ink, or some other colour. The practice of tattooing prevailed among all nations of antiquity, both among savages and civilised nations. The slave had impressed upon his body the initials of his master, the soldier those of his general, and the worshipper the image of his tutelar deity. To obviate this disfigurement of the body which bore the impress of God’s image, and yet to exhibit the emblem of his creed, the Mosaic Law enacting that the Hebrew should have phylacteries which he is to bind as “a sign” upon his hand, and as “a memorial” between his eyes “that the Lord’s law may be in his mouth” (Exod. xiii. 9, 16; Deut. vi. 8, 11).

(29) Do not prostitute thy daughter.—This refers to the degrading worship of Astarte which prevailed in ancient times, and which at times also broke out among the Jews.

(30) Ye shall keep my sabbaths.—The greatest safeguard against the above-named abomination, and the surest way to fulfil the Divine commands, is by keeping the Sabbath day, and following the instruction imparted on this day of rest. (See verse 3.)

And reverence my sanctuary — which the Israelites frequented on the Sabbath. (See Exod. xvi. 3.) The way to reverence the sanctuary, according to the definition of the Jewish canonists, was for an Israelite not to come into the sanctuary when legally defiled, not to ascend the mountain of the house of God with his staff in his hand, with his shoes on his feet, in his working clothes, with the dust on his feet, or carrying bags of money about his person, not to spit in the sacred precincts, or make them a thoroughfare. It is to reverence the last-mentioned rule, that we are told Christ “would not suffer that any man should carry any vessel through the Temple” (Mark xi. 16)—He would not allow them to use the sacred precincts as a short cut.

(33) Regard not.—Better, Turn ye not unto, as the Authorised Version renders this very phrase in verse 4.

Them that have familiar spirits.—This phrase represents the single word the translators of our Authorised Version by adopting it implied that those who practised this craft were supposed to be attended by an invisible spirit who was subject to their calls to supply them with supernatural information. According to the authorities during the second Temple it denotes one who has a spirit speaking from under his arm-holes, or chest, with a hollow voice, as if it came out of a bottle, which is the meaning of in Job xxxii. 19. They identified it with the spirit of Python, by which the ancient Chaldee Version renders it.

Neither seek after wizards.—The expression “wizard” which in old English denotes “wise man,” “sage,” is almost the exact equivalent of the word in the original. These cunning men pretended to tell people their fortunes, where their lost property was to be found, &c. According to ancient tradition, these wizards took in their mouth a bone of a certain bird called yadua, burned incense, thus producing fumes which sent them off into an ecstasy, and then foretold future events. Hence their name, yidonee, as it is in the original. It occurs eleven times in the Bible, and always together with the word translated “familiar spirit.”

(32) Rise up before the hoary head.—But though no regard is to be paid to these soothsayers and cunning men, the greatest reverence is to be shown to the aged, for “with the old is wisdom, and in length of days understanding” (Job xii. 12, xxxii. 7, &c.). If we, therefore, are to attain to the holiness which, as it is set forth in the beginning of this chapter, is to reflect the holiness of God, we must have reverence for the ancients, since God himself is called “the Ancient of days” (Daniel vii. 9, 13, 22). This precept, which is so often inculcated in Holy Writ, is beautifully enforced in the maxims of the authorities during the second Temple. “He who receives and takes care of an old man is rewarded as if he received and bought God,” is one of their sayings. Again, “Prophets are only believed if they come armed with Divine miracles, but old men always.” To this day, when, among the orthodox Jews, an aged person enters into a house where young people are, they all rise up, and will not sit down till he asks them to do it. An exception, however, is made with regard to workmen. When an aged person passes by artisans who are engaged in their work, they need not stand up, and thus be interrupted in their labour.

(33) And if a stranger sojourn with thee.—The stranger, for whose benefit the legislators enacted so many humane and benign laws, and with regard to whom the book of Leviticus has laid down so many precepts, is one of non-Jewish origin, but who had joined the Jewish faith. He had, therefore, to undergo the rite of circumcision; he had to fast on the great...
Day of Atonement (chap. xvi. 29); he had to submit to the regulations about sacrifices (chaps. xvii. 8, 9, xxii. 18); he had to abstain from eating blood and the flesh of animals torn by wild beasts (ibid. verses 10, 15); he had to practise the laws of chastity (chap. xxvii. 26); the Israelite by birth, he had to refrain from blasphemy, and obey the moral precepts (chap. xxix. 16—22). These were some of the conditions of his sojourning in the land.

Yo shall not vex him.—Having once been admitted into the community, the Israelites were forbidden to upbraid him with his nationality or throw at him the fact that he was originally an idoler. They are thus prohibited calling him foreigner or neophyte, a practice which every civilised nation and religious community are prone more or less to indulge in to this day, with regard to aliens and those who have embraced their faith.

(34) But the stranger that dwelleth.—Better, The stranger that sojourneth. The word "but" is not in the original, and its insertion mars the flow of the passage, whilst the expression rendered in the Authorised Version by "dwelleth," is the same which is translated "sojourned" in the preceding verse. This stranger is in every respect to be treated as any other member of the commonwealth, and as a native.

Shalt love him as thyself.—He is not simply to be treated with consideration and courtesy because he is a foreigner, and enjoy the rights and receive the justice due to every human being, but he is to be put on a perfect equality with the ordinary Israelite. Hence the precept laid down in verse 18, "Shalt love thy neighbour as thyself," is here enacted with regard to the stranger. It was this humane law which attracted so many strangers to Palestine. Hence we find that in the days of Solomon there were 153,600 strangers in the Holy Land.

(35) Ye shall do no unrighteousness in judgment, in meteyard, in weight, or in measure. 2 Just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin, shall ye have: I am the Lord your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt. (37) Therefore shall ye observe all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: I am the Lord.

CHAPTER XX.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Again, thou shalt say to the children of Israel, Whosoever he be of the children of Israel, or of the strangers that sojourn

A repetition of sundry Laws.
in Israel, that giveth any of his seed unto Molech; he shall surely be put to death: the people of the land shall stone him with stones. (3) And I will set my face against that man, and will cut him off from among his people; because he hath given of his seed unto Molech, to defile my sanctuary, and to profane my holy name. (4) And if the people of the land do any ways hide

Whosoever he be. — Better, What man soever there be, as the Authorised Version renders this phrase in chap. xvii. 3. (See Note on chap. xvii. 8.)

That giveth any of his seed unto Molech. — It will be seen that whilst in chap. xviii. 21 the law about Molech worship follows the laws of incest, the reverse is the case here, where it precedes those laws.

The people of the land. — That is, the whole community (see chap. iv. 27), who have selected the judges, and in whose name sentence is passed by the judges, are bound to execute the sentence.

Shall stone him with stones. — Lapidation was the first and the severest mode of capital punishment among the Hebrews, the three others being burning, beheading, and strangling. The Jewish canons have tabulated the following eighteen cases in which death by stoning was inflicted: (1) of a man who has commerce with his own mother (chap. xx. 11); (2) or with his father's wife (chap. xx. 12); (3) or with his daughter-in-law (chap. xx. 12); (4) or with a betrothed maiden (Deut. xxii. 23, 24); (5) or with a male (chap. xx. 13); (6) or with a beast (chap. xx. 15); (7) of a woman who was guilty of lying with a beast (chap. xx. 16); (8) the blasphemer (chap. xxiv. 10—16); (9) the worshipper of idols (Deut. xvii. 2—5); (10) the one who gives his seed to Molech (chap. xx. 2); (11) the necromancer; (12) the wizard (chap. xx. 27); (13) the false prophet (Deut. xiii. 6); (14) the enterer to idolatry (Deut. xiii. 11); (15) the witch (chap. xx. 17); (16) the profane of the Sabbath (Num. xv. 32—36); (17) he that curses his parent (chap. xx. 9); and (18) the rebellious son (Deut. xxi. 18—21). As the Mosaic legislation only directs that the lapidation is to take place without the precincts of the city (chap. xxiv. 14; Num. xv. 36), and that the witnesses upon whose evidence the criminal has been sentenced to death are to throw the first stone (Deut. xvii. 7), the administrators of the law during the second Temple decreed the following mode of carrying out the sentence. On his way from the court of justice to the place of execution a herald preceded the criminal, exclaiming, "So-and-so is being led out to be stoned for this and this crime, and so-and-so are the witnesses; if any one has to say anything that might save him, let him come forward and say it." Within ten yards of the place of execution he was publicly admonished to confess his sins, within four yards he was stripped naked except a slight covering about his loins. After his hands had been bound, he was led upon a scaffolding about twice the height of a man. Here wine mingled with myrrh was more particularly given him to dull the pain of execution, and from here one of the witnesses pushed him down with great violence so that he fell upon his back. If the fall did not kill him, the other witness dashed a great stone on his breast, and if this did not kill him, all the people that stood by covered him with stones. The corpse was then nailed to the cross, and afterwards burnt. Hereupon the relatives visited both the judges and the witnesses to show that they bore no hatred towards them, and that the sentence was just. Not unfrequently, however, the excited multitude resorted to lapidation when they wished to inflict summary justice. This description will explain why the Jews said to Christ that the woman had to be stoned, and why He replied to her accusers that he who is without sin should cast the first stone (John viii. 5, 7); why the Jews wanted to stone Christ when they thought He was blaspheming (John x. 31), and why they offered Him wine mingled with myrrh before his crucifixion (Matt. xxvii. 34, 38; Mark xv. 23).

And I will set my face against that man. — That is, make him feel my anger. (See chap. xix. 10.)

And will cut him off. — As the preceding verse describes the offender as having been stoned to death by the people, the declaration on the part of God that He will cut off the sinner has occasioned some difficulty. Hence some take it simply to express the same thing—that the judicial execution is God's mode of cutting off the sinner from his people. According to the administrators of the law during the second Temple, however, the legislator supposes a case where the man has been actually guilty of the crime, and that there has not been a sufficient amount of evidence to convict him. In that case God himself would interpose and cut the offender off. This is more in accordance with what follows.

To defile my sanctuary. — By sinning, the Israelites contracted defilement, and they defiled the sanctuary which was in their midst. (See chaps. xvi. 21, xvi. 16.) These very people, moreover, when they had sacrificed their children to Molech, afterwards came to the sanctuary to worship God (Jer. vii. 9, 10; Ezek. xxii. 37—39).

Profane my holy name. — See chap. xviii. 21. (4) And if the people of the land ... --In the former verse the Legislator treated of cases where there was insufficient evidence. Here he declares what God would do if the community itself, whose duty it is to execute the sentence, either from culpable indifference or criminal sympathy with the sinner, come at it. (5) Then I will set my face. — In that case God himself will show His anger. (See verse 3, and chap. xiv. 10.) He will interpose to execute just judgment. And against his family. — Because they would naturally be privy to it, and aid and abet the father in this crime, they, as well as all those who joined in this idolatrous worship, will be cut off by God himself. (6) And the soul that turneth after such as have familiar spirits. — The same punishment will be visited upon the man who consults necromancers. For the nature of this sin, see chap. xvi. 31, and for the execution of this sentence see 1 Chron. x. 13, 14. The soothsayers themselves were stoned to death by the community. (See verse 27.)

(7, 8) Sanctify yourselves therefore, and be ye holy.—Rather, Ye shall therefore sanctify yourselves, and ye shall be holy, as the same phrase is rendered in the Authorized Version in chap. xi. 44. Though it is immaterial which of the two renderings is adopted, it is important that it should be the same in both passages, since the phrase is exactly the same in the original. It is only by keeping the Divine ordinances that the Israelites will attain to that state of holiness which will not only arm them to resist the abominable rites and idolatrous practices denounced in the foregoing verses, but which will enable them to reflect the holiness of their Lord.

(9) For every one that curseth his father.—Though the administrators of the Law during the second Temple had laid down the most minute regulation with regard to filial obedience (see chap. xii. 3), and though nothing can exceed the tenderness with which they instilled into the hearts of children the Biblical precepts on this subject (Exod. xx. 12), yet they enacted that the child only incurred the penalty of death when he used the ineffable name God when cursing his parent, who was either alive or dead, and that if he used an attribute of the Deity, such as Almighty, the Merciful, &c., he was simply to be beaten with stripes. This will account for the rendering of this passage in the ancient Chaldee Version, "who curseth his father or his mother by the inexpressible name," i.e. Jehovah.

Shall be surely put to death.—That is, by stoning. (See verse 2.) This precept is also to be found in Exod. xxi. 17; Prov. xx. 20, and is referred to by our Lord (Matt. xv. 14; Mark vii. 10).

His blood shall be upon him.—That is, he has brought it upon himself to be killed. (See Josh. ii. 19.) This phrase, which occurs seven times either in the singular or plural, is only to be found in this chapter (See verses 9, 11, 12, 13, 16, 27). According to the authorities during the second Temple, it carried with it death by lapidation.

(10) Shall surely be put to death.—This is, by penalty for the sin forbidden in chap. xviii. 20. According to Jewish tradition whenever the phrase "shall surely be put to death" occurs by itself, it denotes death by strangling. This death was inflicted for six crimes—(1) upon him who had commerce with another man's wife; (2) who smote his father or mother; (3) who stole an Israelite; (4) who being an elder rebelled against the decree of the senate (Deut. xvi. 12); (5) who played the false prophet; and (6) who prophesied in the name of another god.

(11) His father's wife.—Here the penalty is enacted for the sin prohibited in chap. xviii. 8.

(12) With his daughter in law.—See Notes on chap. xvi. 15.

(13) Mankind.—See chap. xviii. 22.

(14) A wife and her mother.—See chap. xviii. 17. They shall be burnt with fire.—This, as we have seen, is the second of the four modes of capital punishment. (See verse 2.) In the following ten cases those guilty of the sins specified suffered this punishment: (1) the unchaste high priest's daughter (chap. xxi. 9); (2) he who had commerce with his daughter; (3) or with his daughter's daughter; (4) or with his son's daughter; (5) or with his wife's daughter; (6) or with her daughter's daughter; (7) or with his son's daughter; (8) or with his mother-in-law; (9) or with the mother of his mother-in-law; and (10), or with the mother of his father-in-law. It will thus be seen that with the exception of the high priest's daughter this death was only inflicted for incest. As the Bible nowhere states the precise mode in which this kind of death is to be carried out, the authorities during the second Temple maintained that it must be executed in such a manner as to leave the body externally unchanged by the flames, because, when God himself inflicted this punishment, the dead bodies of Nadab and Abihu were in a perfect state of preservation. (See chap. x. 2.) To effect this the criminal was put into dung up to his knees, a soft cloth containing a hard one was then tied around his throat, while the two witnesses who had secured his sentence drew tighter by the two cords till the criminal opened his mouth, when molten lead was poured down his throat, thus burning him to death. Hence the ancient Chaldee Version renders it here, "they shall be burnt with fire, with melted lead in their mouth."

(15, 16) With a beast.—See chap. xvi. 23.
approach unto any beast, and lie down thereto, thou shalt kill the woman, and the beast: they shall surely be put to death: their blood shall be upon them.

(17) And if a man shall take his sister, his father's daughter, or his mother's daughter, and see her nakedness, and she see his nakedness; it is a wicked thing; and they shall be cut off in the sight of their people: he hath uncovered his sister's nakedness; he shall bear his iniquity.

(18) And if a man shall lie with a woman having her sickness, and shall uncover her nakedness; he hath discovered her fountain, and she hath uncovered the fountain of her blood: and both of them shall be cut off from among their people.

(19) And thou shalt not uncover the nakedness of thy mother's sister, nor of thy father's sister: for he uncovereth his near kin; they shall bear their iniquity. (20) And if a man shall lie with his uncle's wife, he hath uncovered his uncle's nakedness: they shall bear their sin; they shall die childless.

(21) And if a man shall take his brother's wife, it is an unclean thing: he hath uncovered his brother's nakedness; they shall be childless.

(22) Ye shall therefore keep all my statutes, and all my judgments, and do them: that the land, whither I bring you to dwell therein, spue ye not out. (23) And ye shall not walk in the manners of the nation, which I cast out before you: for they committed all these things, and therefore I abhorred them. (24) But I have said unto you, Ye shall inherit their land, and I will give it unto you to possess it, a land that floweth with milk and honey: I am the Lord your God, which have separated you from other people.

(25) Ye shall therefore put difference between clean beasts and unclean, and between unclean fowls and clean: and ye shall not make your souls abominable by beast, or by fowl, or by any manner of living thing that creepeth on the ground, which I have separated from you as unclean. (26) And ye shall be holy unto me, for I the Lord am holy, and have severed you from other people, that ye should be mine.

(17) Take his sister.—See chap. xviii. 9.

(18) Having her sickness.—See chaps. xv. 24, xviii. 19.

(19) Thy mother's sister.—See chap. xviii. 12.

(20) His uncle's wife.—See chap. xviii. 14.

(21) His brother's wife.—See chap. xviii. 16.

(22) Ye shall therefore keep all my statutes.—Like the prohibitions (see chap. xviii. 26–30), the penalties here enacted for transgressing them conclude with an appeal to the Israelites to keep the Divine precepts, and not to be guilty of the crimes for which the former inhabitants of the land have been cast out.

That the land...spue you not out.—Better, lest the land...commit you out, as in chap. xviii. 28. For this figiu of speech see verse 25 of the same chapter.

(24) But I have said unto you.—That is, promised to your fathers Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, and also to you, that he would expel the Canaanites, and give the land to the Israelites as an inheritance.

(25) Ye shall therefore put difference.—Better, Ye shall therefore separate. It is the same word which is used at the end of the preceding verse, and which is rendered “separate” in the Authorised Version. It is important that the word should be translated by the same expression, since it not only shows the intimate connection between the two verses, but brings out more forcibly the reason for the exhortation in the verse before us. Because the Lord has separated or distinguished the Israelites from all nations, and is about to give them the promised land, therefore the Israelites are to separate or to distinguish between the clean and unclean animals, as ordained in chap. xi. By strictly following out the dietary laws, the Israelites will always be able to keep separate from all other nations (Dan. i. 8).

(26) And ye shall be holy unto me.—Rather, And ye shall be my holy ones, in harmony with the remark in the last clause of this verse, where God says that He had separated them for the purpose that “ye should be mine.” The phrase only occurs here, and is different from the one which has been used in chaps. xi. 44, 45, xx. 17.

And have severed you from other people.—Better, and have separated you from other people, as the Authorised Version renders this phrase in verse 24. That is, God has separated them from the rest of the nations to be His holy people, and to be an example to them. The spiritual guides during the second Temple have explained this separation of Israel as not implying the rejection of the other nations, but simply as the first instalment. They maintained that it implies that all other nations are gradually to follow, and that the Divine choice is to go on from people to people, till “many nations shall be joined to the Lord...and shall be my people” (Zech. xi. 11), where the same phrase, “shall be mine,” is used as in the passage before us. The Divine plan of the redemption of mankind they set forth in the text before us as follows:—“If the Scripture had said, I have separated all the nations from you, there would be no future for the Gentiles; but since it is said, I have separated you from the nations, it is as one who first of all separates the best from the less good, and then goes on continually to separate the better ones. But he who separates the bad from the good, by this very process rejects the bad, and does not return to them.” The Mosaic doctrine
(27) A man also or woman that hath a familiar spirit, or that is a wizard, shall surely be put to death: they shall stone them with stones: their blood shall be upon them.

CHAPTER XXI.—(1) And the Lord said unto Moses.—The laws about the purity and holiness of the Jewish community, and of every individual lay member, enacted in chaps. xi. 1—xx. 27, are now followed by statutes respecting the purity and holiness of the priesthood who minister in holy things in behalf of the people, and who, by virtue of their high office, were to be models of both ceremonial and moral purity.

Speak unto the priests the sons of Aaron.—Moses is ordered to communicate these statutes to the priests as the sons of Aaron. The peculiar phrase "the priests the sons of Aaron," which only occurs here—since in all other six passages in the Pentateuch it is the reverse, "the sons of Aaron the priests" (see chaps. i. 5, 8, 11, ii. 2, iii. 2; Num. x. 8; Note on chap. i. 5), is designed to inculcate upon them the fact that they are priests by virtue of being the sons of Aaron, and not because of any merit of their own, and that they are to impress the same sentiments upon their issue. This fact, moreover, as the authorities during the second Temple remark, imposes upon the priests the duty of bringing up their children in such a manner as to make them morally and intellectually fit to occupy this hereditary office. They also deduce from the emphatic position of the term "priests," that it only applies to those of them who are fit to perform their sacred duties, and not to the disqualified priests (see verse 15).

(2) But for his kin, that is near unto him.—There are, however, known exceptions to the general rule. According to the administrators of the Law during the second Temple, the phrase, "his kin that is near unto him," or rather, "his flesh that is near unto him," (comp. chap. xxvii. 6 with Gen. ii. 24), denotes "wife." Hence the Chaldee version of Jonathan renders it, "but for a wife who is of kin to his flesh."

For his mother, and for his father.—This is the second of the three instances in the Bible where the mother is mentioned before the father (see chap. xix. 3). The Jewish canonists, who call attention to this unusual phrase, account for it by saying that she is placed first because the son's qualifications for the priesthood depend more upon his having a good mother (see verse 7). This will be readily understood when it is borne in mind that the regulations about the woman whom a priest was allowed to marry during the second Temple were of the most stringent nature, and that the slightest infringement of them disqualified the son for performing sacrdotal functions. Thus the daughter of a foreigner or of a released captive was forbidden to the priest, and when a city was besieged and taken by the enemy all the wives of the priests had to be divorced for fear lest they had suffered violence.
(3) And for his sister a virgin, that is nigh unto him.—That is, his maiden sister who still remains in sole relationship with him. What is the next clause explains more minutely.

Which hath had no husband.—When she is married she goes to her husband, and ceases to be near her brother. It then devolves upon her husband to attend to the funeral rites.

For her may he be defiled.—According to the administrators of the Law during the second Temple, the priest was not only allowed to contract defilement by attending to the funeral rites of these seven relations, but was obliged to do it.

(4) But he shall not defile himself, being a chief man . . . .—Better, A husband shall not defile himself among his people when he had profaned himself. As the seven exceptions to the general rule began with his wife, whose funeral rites the priestly husband is allowed to attend, the verse before us restricts this permission to his legally prescribed wife. If he contracted a marriage which profaned him, he could not attend to her funeral ceremonies. The last clause, which is here translated, “when he had profaned him,” literally denotes “to profane himself,” “with respect to his profanation”—i.e., with respect to a marriage by which he profaned himself. This is the interpretation which the administrators of the Law attached to the verse, and which is transmitted in the Chaldee version of Jonathan. It is not only in perfect harmony with the context, but does least violence to this manifestly disordered text. The translations exhibited in the Authorised version, both in the text and in the margin, as well as most of those suggested by modern commentators, leave the clause unexplained, since it manifestly means something else than defiling himself by contracting impurity through contact with the dead, as is evident from the fact that it is not added in the other instances where the priest is forbidden to defile himself by attending to the dead. (See verses 1—11.)

(5) Make baldness upon their head.—The natural expression of grief, however, which the priests were to manifest for the above-named departed relations, was not to show itself in the practices which disfigure their bodily appearance, and which obtained among other nations of antiquity in connection with funeral ceremonies. Thus, in the graphic description of the idolatrous priests mourning, we are told “the priests sit in their temples, having their clothes rent, and their heads and beards shaven, and nothing upon their heads.” (Baruch vi. 31.) The three things here prohibited to the priests are also forbidden to the people at large under other circumstances. (See chap. xix. 27, 28; Dent. xiv. 1.) The ordinary Israelites, however, indulged in the same practices. (See Jer. xvi. 6; Ezek. vii. 18; Amos viii. 10.)

(6) They shall be holy unto their God.—This is the reason why the priests are not to disfigure themselves by maiming their outward appearance. Being sacred to the Lord, they are not to indulge in those outward manifestations of grief which would interfere with the discharge of their sacred duties, and thus cancel the name of God to be profaned.

The offerings of the Lord made by fire, and the bread of their God.—Better, the offerings of the Lord made by fire, being the food of God. As the altar was the table, the sacrifice burnt on it was called His food. (See chap. iii. 11.)

(7) Not take a wife.—From the defilement arising through contact with the dead, the lawgiver passes to regulation about the priest’s alliances with the living, which might be fraught with still more serious consequences to his sacred office. In selecting a wife he is to be careful both about her chastity and legitimate descent.

(8) Thou shalt sanctify him therefore.—This is addressed to the Jewish community. They are to take care that the priest does not contract such illegal marriages, and to sanctify him only who acts in obedience to these statutes. The Jewish priest is thus placed under the supervision of the people. His sacred office, and his duly performing the priestly functions, are their concern. If he refused to conform to the law of sanctity, the people, according to the administrators of the Law during the second Temple, were to compel him to do so by the penalty of administering to him the prescribed number of stripes.

(9) Shall be holy unto thee.—On the other hand, when he acts in accordance with his sacred office, the people must reverence his holy person. Hence the administrators of the Law during the second Temple enacted that the priest is to take precedence on public occasions. Thus, when the people assemble, he opens the meeting by invoking God’s blessing. At the reading of the Law of God in the synagogue, he is called up first to the rostrum to read the first portion, and at table he recites the benedictions over the repast. This honour the Jews assign to the priests to this day.

And the daughter of any priest.—This statute, according to the administrators of the Law during the second Temple, applies only to betrothed and married daughters. Hence the ancient Chaldee version renders it, “and if the betrothed daughter.”

She shall be burnt with fire.—Whilst the married daughter of a layman who had gone astray was punished with death by strangling (see chap. xx. 10; Dent. xxii. 23, 24), the daughter of a priest who had disgraced herself was to be punished with the severer she profane herself by playing the whore, she profaneth her father: she shall be burnt with fire.

(10) And he that is the high priest among his brethren, upon whose head the anointing oil was poured, and that is consecrated to put on the garments, shall not uncover his head, nor rend his clothes; (14) neither shall he go in to any dead body, nor defile himself for his father, or for his mother; (12) neither shall he go out of the sanctuary, nor profane the sanctuary of his God; for the crown of the anointing oil of his God is upon him: I am the Lord.

(13) And he shall take a wife in her virginity. (14) A widow, or a divorced woman, or profane, or an harlot, these shall he not take: but he shall take a virgin of his own people to wife.

(15) Neither shall he profane his seed among his people: for I the Lord do sanctify him.

(16) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (17) Speak unto Aaron, saying, Whosoever he be of thy seed in their generations that hath any blemish, let him not approach to offer the bread of his God. (19) For whatsoever man he be that hath a blemish, he shall not approach: a blind man, or a lame, or he that hath a flat nose, or any thing superfluous, (19) or a man that is broken-footed, or broken-handed, (20) or crook-forbidden voluntarily to disfigure themselves, or to disqualify themselves and their descendants for their sacred office by illegal alliances. The legislator, therefore, now passos on to other blemishes, which, though not voluntarily contracted, likewise disqualify the priests for performing sacerdotal duties in the sanctuary.

(17) Whosoever he be of thy seed.—Better, any man of thy seed throughout their generations; that is, any of the descendants, to all future times, who have not been disqualified for service in the sanctuary by their parents contracting illegal alliances, are yet to be subject to the following regulations.

To offer the bread of his God.—That is, shall not officiate at the sacrifices. (See verse 6—chap. iii. 2.)

(18) For whatsoever man . . .—This part of the verse is simply an emphatic repetition of the same declaration at the end of the last verse to introduce the examples of the bodily blemishes which disqualified the priests for the service at the altar. A similar law obtained among the Greeks and Romans, that a priest should be perfect in all his parts; and according to the Hindoo law, Brahmins born with a badly defective, or who received one before their sixteenth year, are excluded from the rites of consecration.

A blind man.—During the second Temple, this was not only interpreted to be partial blindness on both eyes, or on one eye, but was taken to include any blemish in the eye or in the eyelid, of which the administrators of the Law enumerated twenty-six cases, nineteen in the eye and seven in the eyelid.

Or a lame.—This was understood during the second Temple to refer to any imperfection in the gait of the priest, which might show itself in twenty different ways.

Or he that hath a flat nose.—Of the nasal deformity no less than nine different illustrations are given.

Or any thing superfluous.—That is, one member of the body more stretched out or longer than the others, or out of proportion, as an eye, shoulder, thigh, leg, &c.

(19) Brokenfooted, or brokenhanded.—That is, one with a badly cured fractured foot or hand, since in ancient days such accidents were scarcely ever properly cured. Owing to the imperfect knowledge of surgery, and to a want of skill in setting fractures, the evil effects of such accidents had to be endured by a considerable number of the members of the community.

(20) Or crookbackt.—Rather, or whose eyebrows cover his eyes. This is the sense given to this clause during the second Temple. Hence the ancient Chaldee version of Jonathan translates it, "whose eyebrows lying cover his eyes." That is, the hair, of the eyebrows are so thick, heavy, and long, that they join together and cover his eyes, thus interfering with his eyesight, and rendering him unsightly in appearance.

Or a dwarf, or that hath a blemish in his eye.—Better, or hath a cataract or a fusion of the white and black in his eye, as the administrators of the Law during the second Temple interpret the two defects here spoken of.

Or be scurvy, or scabbed.—According to the authorities in the time of Christ, both these are kinds of ulcers or scurvy; the former is a scab which is dry both within and without, whilst the second is a scab which is moist within and dry without, and which clings to a man till he dies.

Or hath his stones broken.—That is, one whose testicles are injured. This included several kinds of defectiveness, which are exhibited in the different renderings of the ancient versions, but all refer to the same seat of the blemish.

(21) No man that hath a blemish.—The addition of this general remark to the twelve instances adduced in the preceding verses, shows that the cases in question were simply typical, and that it was left to the administrators of the Law, not only to decide the minute details and various stages of these cases, but also to determine whether other bodily infirmities are included or not in this summary statement. Hence, during the second Temple, the authorities registered no less than one hundred and forty-two defects which disqualify the priest for serving at the altar. There was a chamber in the court of the Temple in which the Sanhedrin examined all the priests prior to their being received into the office of officiating in the sanctuary, at the conclusion of this periodical examination, all the priests were divided into two classes. Those who were pronounced physically disqualified put on black garments, wrapped themselves up in black cloaks, and went away in silence: whilst those who were declared qualified put on white garments and white cloaks, and forthwith joined their brethren to assist in the sacred office. They officiated the day by giving a feast to all their friends, which they opened with the following benediction: "Blessed be the Lord! Blessed be He because no blemish hath been found in the seed of Aaron, the priest; and blessed be He because He hath chosen Aaron and his sons to stand and to serve before the Lord in His most holy sanctuary." These priests who were declared physically unfit, were employed in the chamber for wood at the north-east of the court of the women, to select the proper wood for the altar, since any piece which was worm-eaten could not be burnt on it. (See chap. i. 7.)

(2) He shall eat the bread of his God.—But though unfit for serving at the altar, and reduced to do the menial work connected with the sanctuary, he was not only allowed to partake of the less holy sacrif-
CHAPTER XXII.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Speak unto Aaron, and to his sons, and unto all the children of Israel.

(3) Separate themselves from the holy things of the children of Israel. As parts of the sacrifices offered by the Israelites belonged to the priests, they are here warned that (see chap. xvi, 20, 21) they are not to consider themselves absolutely entitled to them under all circumstances, and that there are times when they must abstain from them.

In those things which they hallow unto me. That is, in their treatment of the sacrifices which the children of Israel have consecrated and offered to the Lord.

(5) Whosoever be of all your seed, among your generations. Better, throughout your generations, every man. So the Authorised version properly renders the expression here translated "among your generations" in chap. xxiii. 14, 21. (See chaps. xii. 17, xxi. 17.)

That goeth unto the holy things. That is, who approaches the sacrifices to eat them, as is stated in verses 4, 6, 12.

Having his uncleanness upon him. Not having first submitted to the prescribed lustrations (see chap. vii. 20), the defilement which he contracted rests upon him.

That soul shall be cut off from my presence. This phrase, with the expression "from my presence," does not occur again in the Pentateuch when the Lord threatens with the penalty of exclusion. In Leviticus, where, besides the passage before us, the penalty is enacted six times, the formula is always, "that soul shall be cut off from his people" (chaps. vii. 20, 21, 25, 27, xii. 8, xiii. 29). Its exceptional form here may therefore have reference to the peculiar circumstances. If the priest ventures to approach the altar presumptuously to partake in a defiled state of the holy sacrifices, God himself will banish him from His presence as He did Nadab and Abihu.

(4) Is a leper. The different forms of uncleanness are now specified. (For the leper, see chap. xiii. 3.)

Or hath a running issue. See chap. xv. 2. Whose toucheth any thing that is unclean by the dead. That is, if he touches any person or any thing that has been defiled through contact with a corpse. (See Num. xix. 11-14.)

Whose seed goeth from him. This is the same case mentioned in chap. xv. 16. The two passages ought therefore to be uniform in the translation.

(5) Or whosoever toucheth any creeping thing. See chap. xii. 24-14.

Or a man of whom he may take uncleanness. Better, or a man who is unclean to him, that is, who is a leper (see chap. xiii. 45), or has an issue (see chap. xv. 5, &c.), and who imparts defilement by contact.

(6) The soul which hath touched. Better, the man who hath, that is, the priest for whom these laws are here enacted. Hence the ancient Chaldee version renders it "the man a priest." Shall be unclean until even. When the day ends and another begins (see chap. xii. 24-32), and when he had to immerse his body in water.

(7) And shall afterward eat...because it is his food. As the sacrifices which were the perquisites of the officiating priests were the only things his food. (8) That which dieth of itself, or is torn with beasts, he shall not eat to defile himself therewith: I am the Lord. (9) They shall therefore keep mine ordinance, lest they bear sin for it, and die therefore, if they profane it: I the Lord do sanctify them.

(10) There shall no stranger eat of the holy thing: a sojourner of the priest, or an hired servant, shall not eat of the holy thing. (11) But if the priest buy any soul with his money, he shall eat of it, and he that is born in his house:

he had to live upon, the priest who had contracted defilement had virtually to go without food till sundown, when he purified himself by the prescribed holocausts.

(9) That which dieth of itself.—That is, clean animals or birds which have not been properly slaughtered, but have met with an accident. These have already been forbidden to every ordinary Israelite. (See chap. xvii. 15.) In the case of a priest eating the proscripted meat the consequences would be more serious,asmuch as he would be debarred from his sacerdotal duties.

(10) Keep my ordinance.—That is, one laid down in the preceding verse with reference to animals which died a natural death, &c.

And die therefore, if they profane it.—The death here threatened for the transgression of the ordinance is one not to be inflicted by an earthly tribunal, but, as it was explained during the second Temple, "by the hand of heaven." Hence the Chaldee version of Jonathan renders it, "lest they be killed for it by a flaming fire" like Nadab and Abihu.

(10) There shall no stranger eat of the holy thing.—By "stranger" here is meant a non-Aaronite who was a stranger to the priestly family, though he was an Israelite, or even a Levite. The holy things are the peace offerings. (See chap. vii. 30.)

A sojourner of the priest.—This, during the second Temple, was a Hebrew servant whose ear had been pierced, and who thus became his master's property till the year of jubilee. (See Exod. xxi. 6.)

Or an hired servant.—That is, a Hebrew servant who is hired for several years, and who goes out free after six years. (See Exod. xxi. 2.) Neither of them was the property of the priest, though his labour and services belonged to him. As these Hebrew servants could not be bought with money like a heathen slave, they were treated like strangers, or non-Aaronites, and hence were not permitted to partake of the holy food.

(11) But if the priest buy any soul.—The case, however, was different with heathen slaves whom the priest purchased. These were admitted into the Jewish community by the rite of circumcision, they were allowed to partake of the paschal lamb, and of every privilege of the Israelites. Hence they became incorporated in the priestly family, and were allowed to eat of the holy things. During the second Temple this privilege was extended to that kind of domestic whom the priest did not actually acquire by his own purchase-money, but whom the wife brought with her as part of her dowry, as well as to those whom the slaves of the priestly family purchased.

Born in his house.—That is, the house-born servant or the child of the slave. (See Gen. xvii. 12, 13.) Even when the priest himself could not eat of the holy things by reason of his having contracted some legal defilement, his wife, children, and slaves were permitted to partake of the sacrificial repast.

(12) If the priest's daughter also be married.—Better, And if the priest's daughter be married. By marrying a Hebrew of non-Aaronic descent, and thus leaving her paternal home, the daughter of the priest ceased to be part of the family circle, and lost her right to partake of the holy things. Her bread came from her husband, and she could therefore no longer partake of the priest's bread. During the second Temple the term "stranger" in this verse was also interpreted to include a man who ought to be a stranger to her, and hence it was enacted that if the priest's daughter had gone astray with a stranger (see chap. xxi. 7, 9), she is for ever forbidden to eat of the holy food.

(13) Be a widow, or divorced, and have no child.—An exception, however, to this rule is, when the priest's married daughter loses her husband either by death or by divorce, and has no children; under such circumstances she may resume her family ties under her paternal roof. Having lost her bread supplier, she may eat again her father's bread. She could, however, only eat of the heave-offerings, but not of the wave-breast and heave-shoulder.

Returned unto her father's house, as in her youth.—As an inference from these words, two canons were enacted during the second Temple. (1) If thus left a widow without children, her departed husband has a surviving brother, who, according to the law, must marry his sister-in-law (see chap. xviii. 16), and she is reserved for him, she cannot partake of the holy things, though she has temporarily "returned unto her father's house." Hence the Chaldee version renders this clause, "returned to her father's house, and is not reserved for her husband's brother." And (2) if she is with child at the death of her husband, and on her return home, she must not eat of the holy things. If the child dies she then is permitted to be incorporated again in her father's family.

Eat of the holy thing unwittingly.—Or through ignorance, as it is rendered in the Authorized version in all the other five passages where this expression occurs in this book. (See chap. iv. 22, 27; v. 15, 18.) That is, when he ate of the things he was ignorant that they were holy.

He shall put the fifth part thereof unto it.—To make the people more careful, the offender, LEVITICUS, XXII.

The sacrifices must be without blemish.

Or, burn them with the fire on the altar.

For all his vows, and for all his freewill offerings.—Better, for every manner of vow, or for every manner of freewill offering. That is, if an Israelite by race, or one who was originally a stranger but has joined the Jewish community, brings a sacrifice, be it in consequence of a vow which he has made, or be it a freewill offering. Both these kinds of sacrifices were entirely voluntary, and the difference between them is described in chap. vii. 16.

Ye shall offer at your own will a male.—Better, that it may be accepted for you it shall be a male; or, ye shall offer for your acceptance a male, repeating the word offer; or, for your acceptance it must be a male, as the Authorised version renders the same phrase in verses 20, 21, 27 (see chap. i. 3).

But whatsoever hath a blemish.—Better, whatsoever hath, &c., without the "but," which is not in the original, and is not wanted. The general rule is here repeated as an introduction to the cases which are immediately to be specified. It will be seen that only quadrupeds are given and that fowls are not alluded to, because when people brought birds the Law did not require any distinction to be made between male and female, and during the second Temple no blemish disqualified a bird except the entire absence of a limb.

A sacrifice of peace offerings.—(See chap. iii. 1.)

To accomplish a vow.—In fulfilment of a vow made in time of impending danger (Gen. xxviii. 20—22; Jonah i. 16, &c.).

Freewill offering.—Generally brought in acknowledgment of mercies received.

Blind.—Whether totally blind or only of one eye. This blemish also disqualified the priest for the service at the altar (see chap. xx. 18).

Or broken.—Better, broken-limbed (see Exod. xii. 9), extending to the head, ribs, &c.

Or maimed.—This was regarded in the time of the second Temple to describe a blemish in the eyebrow. Hence the Chaldee version translates it "one whose eye-brows are fallen off." It would thus correspond to the defect which unhelts the priest for ministering at the altar.

Or having a won.—According to the Jewish canonists this denotes a disease of the eyes. Hence the Chaldee version translates it "one whose eyes are smitten with a mixture of white and black," thus corresponding to the blemish which unifies the priest mentioned in chap. xxi. 19.
The Sacrifices must be without Blemish.

The Lord. (22) Either a bullock or a lamb that hath any thing superfluous or lacking in his parts, that mayest thou offer for a freewill offering; but for a vow it shall not be accepted. (24) Ye shall not offer unto the Lord that which is bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut; neither shall ye make any offering thereof in your land. (25) Neither from a stranger's hand shall ye offer the bread of your God of any of these; because their corruption is in them, and blemishes be in them; they shall not be accepted for you.

(23) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (27) When a bullock, or a sheep, or a goat, is brought forth, then it shall be seven days under the dam; and from the eighth day and thenceforth it shall be accepted for an offering made by

Or scurvy or scabbed.—These are exactly the same two defects specified with regard to the priests (see chap. xxi. 20).

Ye shall not offer these unto the Lord.—Though he must not offer animals with such blemishes, and though the man who vowed them for the sanctuary was beaten with stripes, yet the animals thus sanctified were not more his, he had to redeem them according to valuation, and with the money purchase another oblation. (22) Either a bullock or a lamb.—Better, And bullock and one of the flock.

That hath any thing superfluous.—That is one member of the animal being more elongated or contracted than the other, being out of proportion. The same blemish also unfitted the priest for performing sacerdotal functions (see chap. xxi. 18).

Or lacking in his parts.—This, according to the authorities during the second Temple, denoted contracted hoofs, or indivisual hoofs, making them resemble those of an ass or horse.

That mayest thou offer for a freewill offering.—Better, thou mayest make a freewill offering. As verses 18—20 most emphatically declare that an animal with any blemish whatsoever must not be offered "for any manner of freewill offering," it is hardly conceivable that the lawgiver would contradict this enactment within the space of three verses, and say "that the animals with those serious organic defects enumerated in the verse before us, thou mayest offer for a freewill offering." Hence, during the second Temple, the passage before us was interpreted to mean that the animals in question were only allowed to be consecrated for the maintenance and repair of the sanctuary, but not to be offered as a sacrifice on the altar. They were sold, or the offerer paid the value himself, and the money was applied to these sacred purposes. The opinion that a freewill offering was of less importance than a vow, and that therefore the lawgiver allows animals with the two kinds of defects here described to be offered for a freewill offering but not for a vow, is contrary to the regulations laid down in verses 18—20, and is against the practice during the second Temple (see chap. vii. 16). It is far more probable that the text is dislocated, and that it originally was, "that thou mayest not offer for a freewill offering; and for a vow it shall not be accepted."

(24) That which is bruised, or crushed, or broken, or cut.—These four terms express the four ways which the ancients used to emasculate animals.

Neither shall ye make any offering thereof in your land.—Better, and this shall ye not do in your land: that is, not only are animals thus mutilated prohibited as offerings for the altar, but this practice of gelding is altogether forbidden to the Israelites with regard to any animal whatsoever throughout the country. This law is binding upon the orthodox Jews to this day, and the question has recently been discussed by some of their spiritual guides, since it seriously affects those of their community who are engaged in farming land.

(23) Neither from a stranger's hand shall ye offer.—That is, the prohibition to sacrifice these animals is not restricted to beasts castrated in the land, but extends to all such as have been so treated out of the land, and are imported and sold to the Israelites by the hands of foreigners.

Because their corruption is in them.—That is, their mutilation is in them, though not effected by an Israelite nor in the land. The circumstance that such an animal is purchased from the hand of a foreigner do not alter the case.

They shall not be accepted for you.—That is, if the Israelites bring such mutilated sacrifices, thinking that, because they have been procured from a stranger's hand, they do not transgress the law laid down in the preceding verse, they will not be accepted by God, who regards them as blemished and illegal. Jewish canonists, however, regard this verse as regulating the sacrifices offered by Gentiles, and maintain that the same law about defective animals is here laid down in their case. But the manifest contrast between the expression, when the deed is done "in your land," at the end of the preceding verse, and the words "from the hand of a foreigner," at the beginning of this verse; and more especially the declaration in the clause before us, "they shall not be acceptable for you," i.e., the Israelites, show beyond doubt that the Israelites themselves are here spoken of as the offerers.

(25) And the Lord spake unto Moses.—Though beginning with a separate formula, and thus indicating that it is a distinct communication, the regulations here laid down about the age of the sacrificial animals are necessarily connected with the preceding statutes, and exhibit a logical sequence.

(27) When a bullock, or a sheep, or a goat.—The three sacrificial quadrupeds. (See verse 19 and chap. xvii. 3—6.)

Is brought forth.—From this expression it was enacted during the second Temple that the animal fit for a sacrifice had to be born naturally. One brought into the world by artificial aid was disqualified for the altar.

It shall be seven days under the dam.—Under seven days the animal is extremely weak, and unfit for human food, and hence must not be offered as the food of God, as sacrifices are called. (See verse 25.) For the same reason children could not be circumcised before the eighth day from their birth. (See Exod. xxii. 29.) Because the text here says that the newly born animal is to be with the dam seven days, it was enacted that if the mother died before the seven days (in which case it could not be with the dam seven days), it was for ever disqualified for a sacrifice.
The Sacrifice of Thanksgiving.

LEVITICUS, XXIII.

The Feasts of the Lord.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
(2) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, Concerning the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts.
(3) Six days shall work be done: but the seventh day is the sabbath of rest, an holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein: it is the sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings.
(4) These are the feasts of the Lord, even holy convocations, which ye shall proclaim in their seasons.
(5) In the fourteenth day of the first fire unto the Lord. (29) And whether it be cow or 1 ewe, ye shall not kill it 2 and her young both in one day.

(29) And when ye will offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving unto the Lord, offer it at your own will. (30) On the same day it shall be eaten up; ye shall leave none of it until the morrow: I am the Lord.
(31) Therefore shall ye keep my commandments, and do them: I am the Lord.
(32) Neither shall ye profane my holy name; but I will be hallowed among the children of Israel: I am the Lord which hallow you,
(33) that brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the Lord.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying,
(2) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, Concerning the feasts of the Lord, which ye shall proclaim to be holy convocations, even these are my feasts.
(3) Six days shall work be done: but the seventh day is the sabbath of rest, an holy convocation; ye shall do no work therein: it is the sabbath of the Lord in all your dwellings.
(4) These are the feasts of the Lord, even holy convocations, which ye shall proclaim in their seasons.
(5) In the fourteenth day of the first following festivals God claims as His, on which solemn assemblies are to be held in the sanctuary.

(3) Six days shall work be done.—Recurring every week, and being the most important as well as the oldest of all festivals, the sabbath introduces the holy seasons. Hence, during the second Temple it was declared that the sabbath is in importance equal to the whole law; he who profanes the sabbath openly is like him who transgresses the whole law.” The hour at which it began and ended was announced by three blasts of the trumpets.

Ye shall do no work therein.—Better, ye shall do no manner of work, as the Authorised version renders this phrase in verse 31 of this very chapter. (See chap. xvi. 29.) Whilst on all other festivals servile work only was forbidden (see verses 7, 8, 21, 25, 35, 39), and work connected with the preparation of the necessary food was permitted (see Exod. xii. 16), the sabbath and the day of atonement were the only days on which the Israelites were prohibited to engage in any work whatsoever. (See verses 28, 30; chap. xvi. 29.) Though manual labour on the sabbath was punished with death by lapidation (see Exod. xxxi. 14, 15, xxxv. 2; Num. xx. 35, 36), and though the authorities during the second Temple multiplied and registered most minutely the things which constitute labour, yet these administrators of the Law have enacted that in cases of illness and of any danger work is permitted. They laid down the principle that “the sabbath is delivered into your hand, but not you into the hand of the sabbath.” Similar is the declaration of Christ (Matt. xii. 8, Mark ii. 27, 28).

These are the feasts of the Lord.—Because the following are the festivals proper as distinguished from the sabbath (see verses 37, 38), and because they are now enumerated in their regular order, the introductory heading is here repeated.

Ye shall proclaim in their seasons.—By the blast of trumpets on the day of the month on which they are to be observed.

In the fourteenth day of the first month.

This month is called Aviv in the Pentateuch (Exod. xiii. 4, xxiii. 15; Deut. xvi. 1), and Nisan in the later books of Scripture (Neh. ii. 1; Esther iii. 7). The fourteenth day of this month is about the beginning of April. On this day, which was called both “the preparation for the Passover” (John xix. 14), and “the first day of Passover,” all handiCraftsmen, with the exception of tailors, barbers, and laundresses, were month at even is the Lord's passover. (6) And on the fifteenth day of the same month is the feast of unleavened bread unto the Lord: seven days ye must eat unleavened bread. (7) In the first day ye shall have an holy convocation: ye shall do no servile work therein. (8) But ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord seven days: in the seventh day is an holy convocation: ye shall do no servile work therein.

(9) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (10) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land which I give unto you, and shall reap the harvest thereof, then ye shall bring a 1\(^{st}\) sheaf of the firstfruits of your harvest unto obliged to relinquish work either from morning or from noon, according to the custom of the different places in Palestine. Leaven was only eaten till midday, and it had to be burned in the afternoon. The time for desisting from and burning the leaven was thus indicated: "Two leavened cakes of thanksgiving offerings were placed on a bench in the Temple; as long as they were thus exposed all the people ate leaven. When one of them was removed they abstained from eating, but did not burn it; but when the other was taken away all the people began burning the leaven." It was on this day that every Israelite who was not circumcised, ceremonially defiled, ununcircumcised, or beyond fifteen miles from the walls of Jerusalem, had to appear before the Lord in the holy city, with an offering in proportion to his means (Exod. xxi. 5; Deut. xvi. 16, 17). Those who came from the country were gratuitously accommodated by the inhabitants with the necessary apartments (Luke xxi. 10–12; Matt. xxi. 18), and the guests in acknowledgment of the hospitality they received left to their hosts the skins of the paschal lambs, and the vessels which they used in their religious ceremonies. Josephus, who was an eye-witness to the fact, tells us that at the Passover, in the reign of Nero, there were 2,700,000 people, when 256,500 lambs were sacrificed. Most of the Jews must therefore have encamped in tents without the walls of the city, as the Mohammedan pilgrims now do at Mecca. It was for this reason that the Romans took great precaution, using both force and conciliatory measures, during the festivals (Matt. xxvi. 5; Luke xiii. 1).

The Passover.

LEVITICUS, XXIII.

The Sheaf of Firstfruits.

At even, or, in the evening, is the Authorised version renders this phrase in the parallel passage (Exod. xii. 6), literally, denotes between the two evenings. The interpretation of this expression constituted one of the differences between the Sadducees and the Pharisees during the second Temple, and seriously affected the time for offering up the paschal lamb and the evening sacrifices. According to the Sadducees it denoted the time between the setting of the sun and the moment when the stars become visible, or when darkness sets in, i.e., between six and seven o'clock, a space of about one hour and twenty minutes. According to the Pharisees, however, "between the two evenings" means from the afternoon to the disappearing of the sun. The first evening is from the time when the sun begins to decline towards the west, whilst the second is when it goes down and vanishes out of sight. This is the reason why the paschal lamb in the evening sacrifice began to be killed and the blood sprinkled at 12.30 p.m. This is more in harmony with the fact that the large number of sacrifices on this day could only be offered up in the longer period of time.

The Lord's passover.—Also called "the feast of unleavened bread." (See verse 6.)

(9) Seven days ye must eat unleavened bread.—See Exod. xii. 15, 18–20. (10) In the first day.—That is, the first of the seven days, or the fifteenth of the month Nisan. (See Exod. xii. 16.)

Ye shall do no servile work therein.—Servile work was defined during the second Temple to consist in building, pulling down edifices, weaving, reaping, threshing, winnowing, grinding, &c., whilst useful work which was allowed was killing beasts, kneading dough, baking bread, boiling, roasting, &c. For violating this law the offender was not to be stoned to death, as in the case of violating the sabbath, but to receive forty stripes save one.

(9) But ye shall offer.—Better, and ye shall offer. In addition to the daily ordinary sacrifices, there were offerings on this day, and for the following six days, two bullocks, a ram, and seven lambs of the first year, with meat offerings for a burnt offering, and a goat for a sin offering (Num. xxviii. 19–23). Besides these public sacrifices, there were the voluntary offerings which were made by every private individual who appeared before the Lord in Jerusalem (Exod. xxiii. 13; Deut. xvi. 16), and which, according to the practice during the second Temple, consisted of (1) a burnt offering of not less in value than sixteen grains of corn; (2) a festive offerings called chagigah, the minimum value of which was thirty-two grains of corn; and (3) a peace or joyful offering (Deut. xxvii. 7), the value of which was left to be determined by the good will of the offerer in accordance with Deut. xxvii. 7. These victims were offered with the ritual prescribed in chaps. i. 1–5, v. 16–18, 20–23.

In the seventh day.—Ye shall do no servile work. This was, in all respects, celebrated like the first, with the exception that it did not commence with the paschal meal. During the intervening days the people indulged in public amusements, as dances, songs, games, &c., to fill up the time in harmony with the joyful and solemn character of the festival. They were also allowed to irrigate dry land, dig water-courses, repair conduits, reservoirs, roads, &c.

(9) And the Lord spake unto Moses.—As the celebration of the sheaf of first-fruits formed no part of the original institution of the Passover (Exod. xii. 1–20), and as the outer ritual could not be observed in the wilderness, where there was no sowing of corn, it is here enacted as a prospective part of the feast of unleavened bread, and hence is introduced by a separate formula.

(10) When ye be come into the land.—This is the third of the four instances in Leviticus where a law is given prospectively, having no immediate bearing on the condition of the people of Israel. (See chap. xix. 23.)

Then ye shall bring a sheaf of the first-fruits of your harvest.—Better, ye shall bring the first-fruits of your harvest. The owner had to be from the best and ripest standing corn of a field near The Sheaf

LEVITICUS, XXIII.

of Firstfruits.

the priest: (11) and he shall wave the sheaf before the Lord, to be accepted for you: on the morrow after the sabbath the priest shall wave it. (12) And ye shall offer that day when ye wave the sheaf an he lamb without blemish of the first year for a burnt offering unto the Lord. (13) And the meat offering thereof shall be two tenth deals of fine flour mingled with oil, an offering made by fire unto the Lord for a sweet savour: and the drink offering thereof shall be of wine, the fourth part of an hin. (14) And ye shall eat neither bread, nor parched corn, nor green ears, until the selfsame day that ye have brought an offering unto your God: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings.

(15) And ye shall count unto you from the morrow after the sabbath, from the day that ye brought the sheaf of the Jerusalem. The measure of an omer was of the meal obtained from the barley offering. Hence three seahs = one ephah, or ten omers, were at first gathered in the following manner:— "Delegates from the Sanhedrin went into the field nearest to Jerusalem a day before the festival, and tied together the ears in bundles whilst still fastened to the ground. (11) And the sheaf.—Better, and he shall wave the omer. The priest mixed with the omer of meal a log of oil, put on a handful of frankincense (see chap. ii. 15), as on other meat-offerings, waved it, took a handful of it and caused it to ascend in smoke (see chap. ii. 16), and then consumed the residue in company with his fellow-priests. Immediately after this ceremony, bread, parched corn, green ears, &c., of the new crop were exposed for sale in the streets of Jerusalem, as, prior to the offering of the omer, no use whatever was allowed to be made of the new corn.

On the morrow after the sabbath.—The interpretation of this phrase also constituted one of the differences between the Pharisees and the Sadducees during the second Temple. According to the Pharisees, the term sabbath here, as elsewhere (see verses 24, 32, 39), is not the weekly sabbath, but the next day, or the first day of the holy convocation, the first day of Passover, on which the Israelites had to abstain from all unnecessary work. It is the 16th of Nisan. The Sadducees, however, maintained that it is to be understood in its literal sense as denoting the weekly sabbath in the Passover week, which might happen to fall within the seven days, and possibly the fifth or sixth day of the festival. But this is against the import of verse 15. Here the feast of Pentecost is to be reckoned from this sabbath, and if this sabbath might either be on the second or sixth day of the Passover, not only would the feast of Pentecost have no definite day, but the Passover itself would, in the course of time, be displaced from the fundamental position which it occupies in the order of the annual festivals. Hence the Pharisees, rigidly regarding the word sabbath here as an alternative term for the day of holy convocation, took the morrow after the sabbath to denote Nisan 16. On the afternoon of this day, therefore, the inhabitants of the neighbouring towns of Jerusalem assembled together "so that the reaping might take place amidst great tumult." As soon as it became dark, each of the reapers asked, "Has the sun gone down?" To which the people replied, "Yes." They asked twice again, "Has the sun gone down?" to which the people each time replied, "Yes." Each reaper then asked three times, "Is this the sabbath?" to which the people each time replied, "Yes." "Is this the sheath?" the people next asked three times. "Yes," was again thrice the reply of the people. "Is this the Sabbath?" the reaper asked three times; and three times the people replied, "Yes." "Shall I cut?" he asked three times; and three times the people replied, "Yes." When cut it was laid in boxes, brought into the court of the Temple, threshed with eanes and sticks, that the grains might not be crushed, and laid in a roof with holes, so that the sun might touch each grain. Thereupon it was spread in the court of the sanctuary for the wind to pass over it, and ground in a barley mill which left the hulls unground. The flour thus obtained was sifted through thirteen different sieves, each one finer than its predecessor. In this manner was the preserved omer or tenth part got from the sheaf.

(13) And he shall offer.—With the omer of the first-fruits a lamb was offered, besides the sacrifices for the feast enumerated in verse 8.

(13) Two tenth deals of fine flour.—Ordinarily only one-tenth deal of fine flour was required for a meat-offering (Exod. xxix. 40; Num. xv. 4, xxviii. 9, 13, &c.), to exhibit the plentiful harvest. With the exception of the handful of flour and oil, and of all the frankincense, this meat-offering was the perquisite of the priests. (See chap. ii. 2, 3.)

(16) And ye shall eat neither bread.—In acknowledgment of the bountiful Giver of the new harvest, it was ordained that the Israelites were not to taste any of it till they had dedicated the first-fruit to the Lord. By bread is meant the unleavened bread which they were now enjoined to eat. The unleavened bread for the first and the second days of Passover was prepared from the last year's harvest, but the bread for the following days could only be made from the new harvest after the formal dedication of it to the Lord.

Parched corn.—See chap. ii. 14.

Green ears.—The expression carnel, which the Authorised version renders "full ears," in chap. ii. 14, the authorities during the second Temple took to denote the five kinds of the new grain, viz., wheat, rye, oats, and two kinds of barley, which were forbidden to be used in any form whatsoever prior to this public dedication of the harvest to the Lord. The same custom of dedicating the first-fruits of the harvest to the divine beings also obtained amongst the Egyptians, Greeks, Romans, and other nations of antiquity.

A statute for ever . . . See chaps. iii. 17, vii. 23—25.

(17) Ye shall count . . . from the morrow after the sabbath.—That is, from the day following the first day of holy convocation, which was a rest-day. As this was the fifteenth of Nisan, the counting began from the sixteenth (see verse 11), the day on which the omer of the first-fruits was presented to the Lord.
wave offering; seven sabbaths shall be complete: (16) even unto the morrow after the seventh sabbath shall ye number fifty days; and ye shall offer a new meat offering unto the Lord. (17) Ye shall bring out of your habitations two wave loaves of two tenth deals: they shall be of fine flour; they shall be baken with leaven; they are the firstfruits unto the Lord. (18) And ye shall offer with the bread seven lambs without blemish of the first year, and one young bullock, and two rams: they shall be for a burnt offering unto the Lord, with their meat offering, and their drink offerings, even an offering made by fire, of sweet savour unto the Lord. (19) Then ye shall sacrifice one kid of the goats for a sin offering, and two lambs of the first year for a sacrifice of peace offerings. (20) And the priest shall wave them with the bread of the firstfruits for a wave offering before the Lord, with the two lambs:

Seven sabbaths shall be complete.—Better, seven weeks shall be complete. That is, seven entire weeks, making forty-nine days. The expression sabbath denotes here a week, hence the parallel passage substitutes the word week, viz., "seven weeks shall thou number unto thee" (Dent. xvi. 9). The same usage is to be found in the New Testament. Thus the passage rendered in the Authorised version, "the first day of the week," is the first day of the sabbath" (Matt. xxviii. 1); and "I fast twice in the week" (Acts xxi. 12). Hence this festival is also called "the day of firstfruits" (Num. xxviii. 26).

(16) Even unto the morrow after the seventh sabbath.—That is, the day after the seven complete weeks, or the fiftieth day. Hence its name, "Pentecost, or Fifth-day" feast in the New Testament (Acts ii. 1. xx. 16; 1 Cor. xvi. 8), and "feast of weeks" in the Old Testament (Exod. xxxiv. 12; Dent. xvi. 10; 2 Chron. viii. 13). The fiftieth day, according to the Jewish canons, may fall on the 5th, 6th, or 7th of Sivan, the third month of the year, i.e., from the new moon of May to the new moon of June.

Shall offer a new meat offering.—That is, of the firstfruits of the wheat-harvest in contradistinction to the other firstfruits, which was of barley-harvest. Hence this festival is also called "the feast of harvest" (Exod. xxvii. 16), because it concluded the harvest of the later grain.

(17) Ye shall bring out of your habitations.—During the second Temple this clause was taken to be elliptical, and to denote ye shall bring out of, or from, the land of your habitations, that is, from Palestine (Num. xv. 2).

Two wave loaves of two tenth deals.—These two loaves were prepared in the following manner. Three sealings of new wheat were brought into the court of the Temple, were beaten and trodden and ground into flour. Two ounces of the flour were respectively obtained from a seah and a half, and after having been sieved in the twelve different sieves, were kneaded separately with leaven into two loaves outside the Temple, but were baked inside the sanctuary on the day preceding the festival. Each loaf was seven hand-breadths long, four hand-breadths broad, and five fingers high. These were offered to the Lord as firstlings (Exod. xxxiv. 17), whence this festival is also called "the day of firstfruits" (Num. xxviii. 26).

(18) And ye shall offer with the bread seven lambs.—The additional sacrifices for the feast day consisted of two bullocks, one ram, and seven lambs, which were a burnt offering, and of a goat as a sin offering (Num. xxviii. 26, 27, 29). Besides these, however, the new meat offering of the two loaves mentioned in the text before us is to be brought, and with it are to be offered one bullock, two rams, and seven lambs, all for burnt offerings.

(19) Then ye shall sacrifice.—Better, and ye shall sacrifice. They were, moreover, to offer a goat for a sin offering, and two lambs for a peace offering. Hence Josephus, who was an eye-witness to the Temple service, in summing up the number of animal sacrifices on this festival, says that there were fourteen lambs, three young bullocks, and three goats, the number two instead of three goats being manifestly a transcriber's error (Antiq. III., x. 6). The two statements, therefore, viz., the one in the passage before us, and the other in Num. xxviii. 27, according to the authorities during the second Temple, refer to two distinct sacrifices. The one before us speaks of the sacrifices which are to accompany the wave loaves, whilst the order in Numbers refers to the properly appointed sacrifices for the festival. Those prescribed in Numbers were offered in the wilderness, whilst those prescribed here were only to be offered when the Israelites entered the Promised Land.

(20) And the priest shall wave them . . . with the two lambs.—During the second Temple this was done in the following manner.—The two lambs were brought into the Temple, and waved together or separately by the priest while yet alive. Whereupon they were slain, and the priest took the breast and shoulder of each one (see chap. vii. 30—32), laid them down by the side of the two loaves, put both his hands under them, and waved them all together or separately towards the east side forwards and backwards, up and down. He then burned the fat of the two lambs, after which the remainder of the flesh, which became the part quid of the officiating priest, was eaten by him and his fellow-priests. Of the two loaves the high priest took one, and the other was divided between the officiating priests, who had to eat them up within the same day and half the following night, just as the flesh of the most holy things. After these prescribed sacrifices had been offered, each individual brought his free-will offering, which formed the cheerful and hospitable meal of the family, and to which the Levite, the widow, the orphan, the poor, and the stranger, were invited.
they shall be holy to the Lord for the priest. And ye shall proclaim on the selfsame day, that it may be an holy convocation unto you: ye shall do no servile work therein; it shall be a statute for ever in all your dwellings throughout your generations.

And when ye reap the harvest of your land, thou shalt not make clean riddance of the corners of thy field when thou reapest; neither shalt thou gather any gleanings of thy harvest: thou shalt leave them unto the poor, and to the stranger; I am the Lord your God.

And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, In the seventh month, in the first day of the month, shall ye have a sabbath, a memorial of blowing of trumpets, an holy convocation. Ye shall do no servile work therein: but ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord.

And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (27) Also on the tenth day of this seventh month there shall be a day of atonement: it shall be an holy convocation unto you; and ye shall afflict your souls, and offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord. (28) And ye shall do no work in that same day: for it is a day of atonement, to make an atonement for you before the Lord your God. (29) For whatsoever soul it be that shall not be afflicted in that same day, he shall be cut off from among his people. (30) And whatsoever soul it be that doeth any work in that same day, the same soul will I destroy from among his people. (31) Ye shall do no manner of work: it shall be a statute for ever throughout your generations in all your dwellings. (32) It shall be unto you a sabbath of rest, and ye shall afflict your souls: in the ninth day of the month at even, from even unto even, shall ye celebrate your sabbath.

(33) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (34) Speak unto the children of Israel, saying, The fifteenth day of this seventh month shall be the feast of tabernacles for seven days unto the Lord your God. (35) In the seventh day ye shall do no work: it shall be a day of rest a sabbath of solemn rest unto the Lord. (36) Ye shall not do any manner of work: it shall be a statute for ever in all your dwellings in the land of your possession. (37) And ye shall make for yourselves合资aabaths by sevenavings; on the first day shall be an holiness unto the Lord: and ye shall do no work. (38) But the seventh day shall be a holy convocation unto you; and ye shall afflict your souls: it shall be a statute for ever in your generations: ye shall do no work in that same day. (39) Therefore the seventh day is called of the Lord the Sabbath day. (40) And it came to pass, when Moses had ended speaking all these words unto all Israel, (41) He gathered him unto them, saying, Hear, O Israel, the statutes and judgments which I speak in your ears this day, that ye may learn them and do them in the land which ye go over to possess it. (42) Ye shall remember all these commandments, and do them; and bring forth your children in the third generation, and come in unto the blessing of the land which the Lord your God giveth you for an inheritance. (43) And it shall be, when ye have made an end of offering all your burnt offerings, sacrifices, and peace offerings, that ye shall offer the sacrifice of the Lord's feast, first-fruits of corn, wine, and oil, and the offering of every good thing of your inheritance; (44) And ye shall eat before the Lord your God, in the place which he shall choose to cause his name to dwell there, ye and your servants. (45) And there ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God in your songs, and in your instruments of musick, and in your dance; and ye shall be happy, and it shall be well with you. (46) And ye shall be circumcised in the same day; and ye shall bind the sign of the circumcision in the foreskin of your children. (47) And ye shall keep the feast of unleavened bread seven days, as I commanded you, and the Lord your God: for in the seventh day ye shall be holy: and ye shall let none of the people abide there. (48) And ye shall offer a sacrifice the first day of the month, and another sacrifice the seventh day of the month: and the Lord's feast shall ye keep in it, with an holy convocation seven days. (49) Ye shall gather of the first-fruits of your corn year by year, and shall offer them up unto the Lord your God: (50) Six years shalt thou eat thereof as though thou wert not in the land, and seven years shalt thou not eat thereof, because of the sabbath of the land. (51) And in the seventh year shalt thou let it rest, and brake not the sabbath of the land. (52) And the fruit of the earth, the increase of the field, shall be for all the congregation, for priests, and for the stranger, and for the sojourner, as well as for your servants and maidservants, which thou shalt have: (53) For in six days the Lord made heaven and earth, the sea, and all that in them is, and rested the seventh day: wherefore the Lord blessed the sabbath day, and hallowed it.
The Feast of Tabernacles.

LEVITICUS, XXIII.

1 Heb. day of restrain.

Lord. 36 On the first day shall be an holy convocation: ye shall do no servile work therein. 36 Seven days ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord: on the eighth day shall be an holy convocation unto you; and ye shall offer an offering made by fire unto the Lord: it is a solemn assembly; and ye shall do no servile work therein.

open so as to admit a view of the sky and the stars. It must not be under a tree, nor must it be covered with a cloth, or with any material which contracts defilement. Only branches or shrubs which grow out of the ground are to be used for the covering. These booths the Israelites began to erect on the morrow after the Day of Atonement. On the fourteenth, which was the day of preparation, the pilgrims came up to Jerusalem, and on the eve of this day the priests proclaimed the approach of the holy convocation by the blasts of trumpets. As on the feast of Passover and Pentecost, the altar of burnt offering was cleaned in the first night watch, and the gates of the Temple, as well as those of the inner court, were opened immediately after midnight, for the convenience of the priests who resided in the city, and for the people, who filled the court before the cock crew, to have their sacrifices duly examined by the priests.

36 On the first day shall be an holy convocation.—At daybreak of this day one of the priests, accompanied by a jubilant procession and a band of music, went with a golden pitcher to the pool of Siloam, and having filled it with water, returned with it to the Temple in time to join his brother-priests in the morning sacrifices. He entered from the south through the water-gate, when he was welcomed by three blasts of the trumpets. He then ascended the steps of the altar with another priest, who carried a pitcher of wine for the drink offering. The two priests turned to the left of the altar, where two silver basins were fixed with holes at the bottom, and simultaneously poured into their respective basins the water and the wine in such a manner that both were emptied at the same time upon the base of the altar. This ceremony of drawing the water was repeated every morning during the seven days of the festival. Another jubilant multitude, who went outside Jerusalem at the same time to gather willows, now returned. With great rejoicings and amidst blasts of trumpets they carried the willows into the Temple, and placed them at the altar in such a manner that their tops overhung and formed a kind of canopy.

Ye shall do no servile work therein.—For the difference between servile and necessary work see verse 7.

36 Seven days ye shall offer.—The special sacrifices for this day consisted of a burnt offering of thirteen bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs, with an appropriate meat and drink offering, and a goat for a sin offering (Num. xxix. 12—38). Whereupon were offered the peace offerings, the vows and the free-will offerings which constituted the repasts of the people. Whilst these sacrifices were being offered up the altar of burnt offering was cleaned in the first days of Passover and Pentecost. This was repeated every day during the seven days of the festival, only that the number of animals offered as sacrifices diminished daily during the middle days of the festival, according to the prescription in Num. xix. 12—39. On the eve of the second day, or what is called the lesser festival, and on each of the five succeeding nights, was celebrated the “Rejoicing of the water-drawing” in the court of the Temple. Four huge golden candelabra were lighted in the centre of the court, and the light emanating from them was visible to the whole city. Around these lights pious men danced before the people with lighted flambeaux in their hands, singing hymns and songs of praise. Whilst the Levites, who were stationed on the fifteen steps which led into the women’s court, and which corresponded to the fifteen psalms of degrees, i.e., steps (Ps. cxv. —xxviii.), accompanied the songs with instrumental music. It is supposed that on the last evening of the festival, when the splendid light of this grand illumination was to cease, Christ called attention to himself, “I am the light of the world” (John viii. 12), which is to shine for ever, and illuminate not only the Temple and the holy city, but all the world.

On the eighth day shall be an holy convocation.—That is, like the first day, since no servile work is to be done on it. As it is not only the finishing of the feast of Tabernacles, but the conclusion of the whole cycle of festivals, the dwelling in tabernacles is to cease on it.

Ye shall offer.—For this reason the sacrifices offered on this day are to be distinct, and unlike the sacrifices of the preceding days. The burnt sacrifice is to consist of one bullock, one ram, and seven lambs, with the appropriate meat and drink offerings, and one goat for a sin offering. (Num. xxix. 36—38.) Being, however, attached to the feast of Tabernacles, the two festivals are often joined together, and spoken of as one festival of eight days.

37 These are the feasts of the Lord. That is, the above-named six festivals, viz. (1) the Passover (verses 4—14), (2) Pentecost (verses 15—22), (3) New Year (verses 23—25), (4) Day of Atonement (verses 26—32), (5) Tabernacles (33—36a), and (6) the concluding festival (verse 36b). Thus the list of these festivals concludes with the formula by which they were introduced in verse 4.

To offer an offering.—On these festivals sacrifices are to be offered as prescribed in Num. xxviii. and xxix.

37 Beside the sabbaths. —By a figure of speech called metonymy, which is frequently used both in the Old and New Testaments, the expression sabbaths stands here for the sacrifices of the sabbaths. just as in chap. xxv. 6 “sabbath of the land” denotes the produce of the sabbath of the land, or of the sabbatic year, and as the phrase “it is written in the prophets” (Mark i. 2) is used for “it is written in the writings of the prophets.” (Comp. also Matt. v. 17; vii. 12; xxii. 40, &c.) The meaning, therefore, of the passage before will offerings, which ye give unto the Lord. (20) Also in the fifteenth day of the seventh month, when ye have gathered in the fruit of the land, ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord seven days; on the first day shall be a sabbath, and on the eighth day shall be a sabbath. (21) And ye shall take you on the first day the 1boughs of goodly trees, branches of palm trees, and the boughs of thick trees, and willows of the brook; and ye shall rejoice before the Lord your God seven days. (22) And ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord—The Israelites are then to keep a festival in which they are to acknowledge the bounties of the Lord and express their gratitude to the Giver of all good things. For this reason this festival is also called “the Feast of Ingathering” (Exod. xxi, 16, xxxiv. 22). (23) On the first day shall be a sabbath.—Both on the first and last days of this festival there is to be abstinence from all servile work. (See verses 35, 36.) (24) And ye shall take you on the first day.—The four species of vegetable production here ordered are a distinctive feature of this festival. They have been most minutely defined during the second Temple. (25) Boughs of goodly trees.—Better, the fruit of goodly trees, as the margin rightly renders it. As this phrase is too indefinite, and may simply denote the fruit of any choice fruit-tree, there can hardly be any doubt that in this instance, as in many other cases, the lawgiver left it to the administrators of the Law to define its precise kind. Basing it therefore upon one of the significations of the term here translated “goodly,” which is to dwell, to rest, the authorities during the second Temple decreed that it means the fruit which permanently rests upon the tree—i.e., the citron, the paradise-apple. If it came from an uncircumcised tree (see chap. xix, 23), from an unclean heave-offering (comp. Num. xviii. 11, 12), or exhibited the slightest defect, it was ritually illegal. (26) Branches of palm trees.—During the second Temple this was defined as the shoot of the palm-tree when budding, before the leaves are spread abroad, and whilst it is yet like a rod. It is technically called lulab, which is the expression whereby it is rendered in the ancient Chaldee version. The lulab must at least be three hands tall, and must be tied together with its own kind. (27) The boughs of thick trees.—This, according to the same authorities, denotes the myrtle branch, whose leaves thickly cover the wood. To make it ritually legal it must have three or more shoots round the stem, and on the same level with it. If it is in any way damaged it is illegal. This accounts for the ancient Chaldee version rendering it by “myrtle branch.” (28) Willows of the brook.—That species, the distinguishing marks of which are dark wood and long leaves with smooth margin. The palm, the myrtle, and the willow, when tied together into one bundle, constitute the Lulab. Whilst the psalms are chanted by the Levites during the sacrifices, the pilgrims, who held the Lulab in their hands, shook them three, viz., at the singing of Ps. cxviii. 1, then again at verse 25, and at verse 29. When the chant was finished, the priests in procession went round the altar once, exclaiming, “Hosanna, O Lord, give us help, O Lord! give prosperity!” (Ps. cxviii. 25). Whereupon the solemn benediction was pronounced by the priests, and the people dispersed amidst the repeated exclamations, “How beautiful art thou, O altar!” It is this part of the ritual which explains the welcome that the multitude gave Christ when they went to meet Him with palm-branches and shouts of hosanna (Matt. xxv. 8, 9, 15; John xii. 12, 13). (29) Seven days in the year.—These seven days denote the feast of Tabernacles proper, whilst the eight days in verse 39 include the concluding festival of the last day. (See verse 36.) (30) In your generations.—Better, throughout your generations, as the Authorised version renders it in verses 14, 21, and 31 of this very chapter. (See chap. iii. 17.) (31) Dwell in booths seven days.—Because the eighth day was a separate festival, when the booths were no more used. (See verse 36.) (32) That your generations may know.—When their posterity are securely occupying the land of Canaan, the temporary dwelling in booths once a year may remind them of the goodness of God vouchsafed to their fathers in delivering them from the land of bondage, and sheltering them in booths in the wilderness. (33) And Moses declared.—In accordance with the command which Moses received (see verse 2), he explained to the children of Israel the number and motive of these festivals. This verse therefore forms an appropriate conclusion to the whole chapter.

447
XXIV.

(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Command the children of Israel, that they bring unto thee pure oil olive beaten for the light, to cause the lamps to burn continually. (3) Without the vail of the testimony, in the tabernacle of the congregation, shall Aaron order it from the evening unto the morning before the Lord continually: it shall be a statute for ever in your generations. (4) He shall order the lamps upon the pure candlestick before the Lord continually. (5) And thou shalt take fine flour, and bake twelve cakes thereof: two tenth deals shall be in one cake. (6) And thou shalt set them in two rows, six on a row, upon the pure table before the Lord. (7) And thou shalt put pure frankincense upon each row, that it may be on the bread for a memorial, even an offering made by fire unto the Lord.

cakes took place every Friday afternoon, or Thursday if a feast which required Sabatical rest fell on Friday. According to the testimony of those who were eyewitnesses to the baking, these cakes were unleavened.

(6) In two rows, six on a row.—Better, in two piles, six on a pile. The table on which the cakes are here ordered to be put stood along the northern or most sacred side of the holy place. Like all the sacred furniture, except the Ark of the Covenant, it was ranged lengthways along the sanctuary. It was one cubit and a half, or nine handbreadths high; the surface-board or plate was two cubits, or twelve handbreadths long, and one cubit or six handbreadths broad. These twelve cakes were placed one upon another in two piles lengthwise on the breadth of the table. As the cakes were ten handbreadths long, and the table was only six handbreadths wide, the cakes projected two handbreadths on each side of the table.

Upon the pure table.—According to the interpretation which obtained during the second Temple, this denotes that the cakes are to be put upon the table itself, and not upon the hollow golden rods which were on the table to allow the air to pass through to prevent the shewbread becoming mouldy during the week. These hollow tubes are to be placed between the cakes, whilst the cakes themselves are to be put on the table itself and not on the tubes, so as to be raised above the table.

Before the Lord.—That is, the table which stood before the Lord, for it was placed in the sanctuary. The cakes, therefore, which were thus ranged upon it were constantly before God. Hence, not only is the table called the table of His Presence” (Num. iv. 7), but the cakes are called the bread of His Presence” (Exod. xxv. 30, xxx. 13, xxxix. 30). The rendering of the Authorised Version, “table of shewbread,” and “shewbread,” is taken from Luther, and does not express the import of the names. The names, “the bread set in order,” “the sets of bread,” and the “table set in order,” which were given to the cakes (1 Chron. ix. 32, xxii. 29; 2 Chron. xiii. 11; Neh. x. 33) and to the table (2 Chron. xxix. 18) in later times, and which are unjustifiably obliterated in the Authorised Version, are derived from this, and show where the cakes are ordered to be ranged in two “sets.”

(7) Shalt put pure frankincense upon each row.—Better, shalt place pure frankincense by each pile. As the two piles of six cakes each measured together ten handbreadths in width, and as the length of the table was twelve handbreadths, there was a vacant space of two handbreadths left on the table for the two bowls with frankincense. The vacant place in question may, therefore, (1) have been divided between the two ends of the table, and a bowl with incense been put at each end on either side of the two piles; or (2) the dis-
Every sabbath he shall set it in order before the Lord continually, being taken from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant. And it shall be Aaron's and his sons'; and they shall eat it in the holy place: for it is most holy unto him of the offerings of the Lord made by fire by a perpetual statute.

And the son of an Israelitish woman, whose father was an Egyptian, went out among the children of Israel: and this son of the Israelitish woman and a man of Israel strove together in the camp of Israel.

The Shewbread to be set before the Lord.

(8) Every sabbath he shall set it in order before the Lord continually, being taken from the children of Israel by an everlasting covenant. (9) And it shall be Aaron's and his sons'; and they shall eat it in the holy place: for it is most holy unto him of the offerings of possible vacant space may have been left at one end of the table only, and the bowls put together on this end by one side of the two piles; or (3) each of the two piles of the cakes may have been put more or less closely to the other end of the table, thus leaving a vacant space between the two piles, into which the two bowls with the frankincense were placed. The last was the practice during the second Temple.

That it may be on the bread for a memorial. —Better, that it may be for the bread as a memorial, that is, the frankincense may be offered up upon the altar, as God's portion, instead of the bread which was given to the priests. By this means the priests of the children of Israel will be brought into grateful remembrance before the Lord. (See chap. ii. 2.)

(8) Every sabbath he shall set it in order.—That is, Aaron is to carry out these instructions in the first instance, as we are told in verse 3, and after him, or together with him, the priests are sacredly to attend to this duty every sabbath throughout the year. Of the manner in which the shewbread, or the “bread of His Presence,” was renewed every Sabbath during the second Temple, we have a minute account. Four priests entered the holy place, two of them carried in their hands the two piles of the cakes, and two carried in their hands the two incense cups. Four priests having gone in before them, two to take off the two old piles, and two to take off the two incense cups. Those who brought in the new stood at the north side with their faces to the south, and those who took away the old stood at the south side with their faces to the north. As soon as the one party lifted up the old, the others put down the new, so that their hands were exactly over against each other, because it is written, “before my Presence continually” (Exod. xxv. 30). The authorities during the second Temple took the expression “continually” to denote that the cakes were not to be absent for one moment. Hence the simultaneous action of the two sets of priests, one lifting up the old, and the other at once putting down the new shewbread. Being taken from the children of Israel.—Like the daily sacrifices, the offerings for the congregation, the salt for the sacrifices, the wood for the altar, the incense, the oil (see chap. xxii. 10, 11), the two wave-leaves (chap. xxi. 17), the scapegoat (chap. xvi. 5, &c.), the red heifer (Num. xix. 1—22), &c., the shewbread, or the “bread of His Presence,” according to the canon that obtained during the second Temple, were purchased with the people's half-shekels, which every Israelite had to contribute annually toward the maintenance of the service in the sanctuary. (See Exod. xxx. 11—16.)

(9) And it shall be Aaron's and his sons'. —In accordance with this statute, the twelve cakes were divided during the second Temple between the high priest and the officiating priests, the former had six, and the latter had six, among them.

They shall eat it in the holy place.—Of the many things connected with the national service which became the perquisites of the priests, there were eight only which had to be consumed within the precincts of the sanctuary, and the shewbread is one of the eight, viz., (1) the remnant of the meat offering (chap. ii. 3, 4); (2) the flesh of the sin offering (chap. vi. 20); (3) of the trespass offering (chap. vii. 6); (4) the leper's log of oil (chap. xiv. 10); (5) the remainder of theomer (chap. xxiii. 10, 11); (6) the peace offering of the congregation; (7) the two loaves (chap. xiii. 19, 20); and (8) the shewbread.

Of the offerings of the Lord made by fire.—That is, the former part of the offering, as the frankincense, which was the other part, was burnt as an offering to God.

(10) The son of an Israelitish woman, whose father was an Egyptian.—The name of the Israelitish woman, whose son is the subject of the narrative before us, we are afterwards told was Shelomith. She had married an Egyptian whilst she and her people were still in Egypt. Though the father's nationality is here expressly given, yet from the fact that he does not personally come before us in this incident, it is evident that he remained in Egypt, whilst the son was of the "mixed multitude" who followed the Israelites in their exodus (Exod. xii. 38). This incident, therefore, which is so difficult satisfactorily to connect with the preceding legislation, brings before us a picture of the camp-life of the Israelites in the wilderness. According to tradition, the father of this blasphemer was the taskmaster under whom Shelomith's husband worked in Egypt, that he had injured Shelomith and then anointed her husband, that this was the Egyptian whom Moses slew (Exod. ii. 11) for the injuries he had thus inflicted both upon the Hebrew and his wife, and that the culprit before us is the issue of the outraged Shelomith by the slain Egyptian. This will explain the rendering here of the ancient Chaldee version, "A wicked man, a rebel against the God of heaven, had come out of Egypt, the son of the Egyptian who slew an Israelite in Egypt, and enraged his wife, who conceived, and brought forth this son among the children of Israel."

Went out among the children of Israel.—Better, he went out into the midst, &c. This shows that he lived outside the camp and came where he had no right to be. This son of the Israelitish woman and a man of Israel strove together.—The cause and the manner of their quarrel or contention are not given. But, according to tradition, the "man of Israel" was a Danite, and, as we are told in the next verse, his mother was of the tribe of Dan, this semi-Egyptian contended with this Danite that he had a right from the side of his mother to encamp among the children of Dan, whilst the Danite disputed this, maintaining that a son could only pitch his tent by the standard of his father's name (Num. ii. 2). This contention, moreover, took place before the rulers who tried the case (Exod. xix. 21, 22). Hence the ancient Chaldee version translates it, "And while the Israelites were dwelling in the wilderness, he sought to pitch his tent in the midst of the tribe of the children of Dan; but they would not let him, because, according to the order of Israel, every man, according to his order, dwelt with his family by the ensign of his father's house. And they strove together in the camp. Whereupon the son of the Israelitish woman and the man of Israel who was of the tribe of Dan went into the house of judgment;"

(11) Blasphemed the name of the Lord, and cursed.—Better, cursed the Name and reviled. In accordance with the above interpretation, this happened after sentence was given against him, and when they had left the court. Being vexed with the Divine enactments which excluded him from encamping in the tribe of his mother, he both cursed God who gave such law, and reviled the judges who pronounced judgment against him. The expression, "the Name," which in after times was commonly used instead of the ineffable Jehovah, has been substituted here for the Tetragrammaton by a transcriber who out of reverence would not combine cursing with it. The same shyness on the part of copyists has been the cause of inserting the word Lord (Adonai) and God (Elohim) for Jehovah in sundry passages of the Old Testament. During the second Temple, however, this passage was rendered, "he pronounced the Name and cursed." Hence it was enacted that the simple pronunciation of the Tetragrammaton was criminal. In accordance with the ancient interpretation, the Chaldee version translates this part of the verse, "And when they came out of the house of judgment, having been condemned, the son of the Israelitish woman pronounced and reviled the great and glorious name of manifestation which had been heard on Sinai, and he was defiant and annoying."

And they brought him unto Moses.—The contention about his right to pitch his tent among the tribe to which his mother belonged being a minor point, came within the jurisdiction of the rulers, according to the advice of Jethro (Exod. xviii. 22); whilst blaspheming God was considered too serious an offence, and hence the criminal was brought to Moses.

And his mother's name was Shelomith.—Whether we accept the traditional explanation, that Shelomith was no consenting party to her union with the Egyptian, or whether we regard her as having voluntarily married him, the fact that both her personal and tribal names are here so distinctly specified, indicates that the record of this incident is designed to point out the unhappy issue of so unholy an alliance, and to guard the Hebrew women against intermarriage with heathen.

(12) And they put him in ward.—That is, to keep him in safe custody till he had been tried. In the Mosaic legislation confinement in a prison for a certain period as a punishment for an offence is nowhere enacted.

That the mind of the Lord might be showed them.—Better, that he might direct them according to the command of the Lord, as the Authorised Version renders this phrase in Exod. xvii. 1, Num. iv. 37, 41, 49. &c. Though this was a transgression of the third commandment, and though it was ordained that he who cursed his earthly parent should be put to death (see chap. xx. 9), yet no law existed as to the exact punishment which was to be inflicted upon him who cursed his heavenly Father (see Exod. xxii. 29); nor was it known whether such an offender should be left to God Himself to execute the sentence. For this reason the criminal was detained till Moses had appealed to the Lord for instruction, in order that he might direct the people accordingly. Similar instances of Moses appealing direct to the Lord for guidance in matters of law and judgment we have in Num. xiv. 34, xviii. 1-5.

And the Lord spake unto Moses.—In none of those instances, however, is it stated how and where Moses made this appeal to God, whether he inquired by means of the Urim and Thummim, or otherwise. As God promised to reveal His will to Moses from the mercy-seat between the cherubim (Exod. xxv. 22), it is probable that the lawgiver received the Divine directions in the sanctuary.

(13) Bring forth him that hath cursed.—The sentence which God now passes upon the blasphemer is that he should be conducted from prison outside the camp, where all unclean persons had to abide (Num. v. 2, 3), and where malefactors were executed (Heb. xiii. 12, 13).

Let all that heard him lay their hands upon his head.—That is, the witnesses who heard him blaspheme, and upon whose evidence he was convicted, and the judges who found him guilty, are to lay their hands upon the criminal's head. Hence the Chaldee version translates it, "Let the witnesses who heard his blasphemy and the judges lay their hands upon his head." This imposition of hands upon a criminal was peculiar to the blasphemer who was sentenced to death, and according to the Jewish canonists, the witnesses and the judges thereby declared that the testimony and the sentence were faithful and righteous, and at the same time uttered the solemn words, "Let thy blood be upon thine own head; thou hast brought this upon thyself."

Let all the congregation stone him.—The witnesses, who are the representatives of the people, cast the first stone, and then all the people who stood by covered the convict with stones. (See chap. xx. 2.)

(14) Whosoever curseth his God.—As Moses had an appeal to God for direction, the Lord has not only declared what should be done with this particular offender, but lays down a general law for the punishment of blasphemers. As the criminal who is the immediate occasion of this enactment is an Egyptian, directions are given, in the first place, about the treatment of Gentiles who temporarily sojourn among the Hebrews, and who have not as yet renounced their faith in their own God. If such a Gentile curses his own God in whom he still professes to believe, he shall hear his sin; he must suffer the punishment for his sin from the
And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord, he shall surely be put to death, and all the congregation shall certainly stone him: as well the stranger, as he that is born in the land, when he blasphemeth the name of the Lord, shall be put to death.

And he that killeth any man shall surely be put to death. And he that killeth a beast shall make it good; a beast for a beast. And if a man cause a blemish in his neighbour; as he hath done, so shall it be done to him; breach for breach, eye for eye, tooth for tooth: as he hath caused a blemish in a man, so shall it be done to him again. And he that killeth a beast, he shall restore it: and he that killeth a man, he shall be put to death.

Ye shall have one manner of law, as well for the stranger, as for one of your own country: for I am the Lord your God.

And Moses spake to the children of Israel, that they should bring forth him that had cursed out of the camp, and stone him with stones. And the children of Israel did as the Lord commanded Moses.

CHAPTER XXV.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses in mount Sinai, saying, (2) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land which I give you, then shall the land keep a sabbath unto the hands of his co-religionists, whose feelings he has outraged. The Israelites are not to interfere to save him from the consequence of his guilt; for a heathen who reviles the god in whom he believes is not to be trusted in other respects, and sets a bad example to others, who might be led to imitate his conduct.

And he that blasphemeth the name of the Lord. — Better, And he that curseth the name of the Lord. The case is, however, different when it is the God of Israel. It is henceforth to be the law that whosoever curses Jehovah is to suffer death by latriation, which is to be inflicted upon the criminal by the Jewish community.

As well the stranger as he that is born in the land. — This law is applicable alike to the proselyte and to the Gentile, who does not even profess to believe in Jehovah.

When he blasphemeth the name of the Lord. — Better, when he curseth the Name. Here again the expression "Name" has, out of reverence, been substituted for Jehovah. (See verse 11.)

And he that killeth a man. — The enactment that in case of blaspheming no difference is to be made between a non-Israelite and Israelite, is now followed by other laws respecting murder and personal injury which have been given before (Exod. xxi. 12, &c.), but which are here repeated in order to show that, like blasphemy, they apply alike to Gentile and Jew. It may also be that the repetition here of the law of murder is designed to draw a distinction between the judicial sentence of death carried out by the community, and the illegal taking away of life by individuals.

And he that killeth a beast. — The law about killing a human being is now followed by the enactments with regard to killing a beast. He who kills an animal has to make it good by giving another animal for it. The case is not the same as that legislated for in Exod. xxxi. 33, 34.

And if a man cause a blemish. — See Exod. xxxi. 24, 25.

And he that killeth a beast. — This verse contains a repetition of the laws enacted in verses 17, 18. Ye shall have one manner of law. — Not in the case of blasphemy (see verse 16), but in all the instances just adduced, the same penal statutes apply to the non-Israelite and stranger.

And Moses spake to the children of Israel. — Having recited the laws which were promulgated in consequence of the appeal made to God, Moses now calls upon the people to execute the sentence which the Lord pronounced against the blasphemer.

In Mount Sinai. — That is, in the mountainous regions of Sinai. The expression "mountain" is often used to denote a mountainous tract of country (Num. xxi. 9; Deut. i. 2; Josh. xiv. 12, &c.). Accordingly, this divine communication was made to Moses when the Israelites were encamped in the neighbourhood of Sinai, where they remained in the wilderness for twelve months after their exodus from Egypt (Num. x. 11, 12).

When ye come into the land. — Better, When ye be come into the land, as the Authorised Version renders the same phrase in chap. xiv. 34. (See Note on chap. xix. 23.) This is the fourth instance in Leviticus of a law being given prospectively which had no immediate bearing on the condition of Israel. (See chaps. xiv. xv. xvi. xxiv. xxvii.) According to the authorities during the second Temple this law came into operation in the twenty-first year after the Israelites entered Canaan. As the conquest of the promised land occupied them seven years (Josh. xiv. 10), and as the division of it between the different tribes took seven years more (Josh. xvii. 1, &c.), the real cultivation of the land only began at the end of the second seven years. Hence the first seventh year in which laws of the sabbatical year came into operation was the twenty-first year after their entrance into Canaan.

Then shall the land keep a sabbath. — For which the marginal rendering is "rest," i.e., a sabbath. For the import of this phrase see Note on chap. xxiii.
Lord. (3) Six years thou shalt sow thy field, and six years thou shalt prune thy vineyard, and gather in the fruit thereof; (4) but in the seventh year shall be a sabbath of rest unto the land, a sabbath for the Lord: thou shalt neither sow thy field, nor prune thy vineyard. (5) That which growth of its own accord of thy harvest thou shalt not reap, neither gather the grapes of thy vine undressed: for it is a year of rest unto the land. (6) And the sabbath of the land shall be meat for you; for thee, and for thy servant, and for thy maid, and for thy hired servant, and for thy stranger that sojourneth with thee, (7) and for thy cattle, and for the beast that are in thy land, shall all the increase thereof be meat.

Shall be meat for you.—That is, it shall serve as your food, but you must not trade with it, or store it up. Hence, during the second Temple the produce of the sabbatical year could only be used for direct consumption, and was not allowed to be converted first into other articles and then used. Thus, for instance, though wood of that year could be used as firewood, yet it was illegal to convert it first into coal and then use the coal thus obtained from the wood, nor was it legal to convert vegetables into medicines, or to give human food to animals.

For thee, and for thy servant . . .—The produce is to be left in the field for the free use of the poor, the servant, &c. (See also Exod. xxiii. 11.) Hence it was enacted during the second Temple that "whoso locks up his vineyard, or hedges in his field, or gathers all the fruit into his house in the sabbatical year breaks this law." Everything is to be left common, and every man has a right to every thing in every place. Every man could only bring into his house a little at a time, according to the manner of things that are in common.

(7) And for thy cattle.—In accordance with the benign legislation which obtained during the second Temple, the administrators of the law inferred from this verse, and hence en acted, that the fruit of the seventh year may only be eaten by man at home, as long as the kind is found in the field. "As long as the animals eat the same kind in the field thou mayest eat what there is of it in the house, but if the animal has consumed it all in the field thou art bound to remove this kind from the house into the field." (For the enactment which enjoins the remission of debts in the sabbatical year, see Dent. xv. 1—3.) During the second Temple the sabbatical year began on the first day of the month of Tisri, which was the beginning of the civil year. The tillage, however, and the cultivation of certain fields and gardens, were left off in the sixth year. The cultivation of corn-fields ceased from the Feast of Passover, and orchards from Pentecost of the sixth year. The reading of portions of the Law which is enjoined in Dent. xxxi. 10—13, was assigned during the second Temple to the king. At the termination of the seventh sabbath year, which coincided with the first day of the Feast of Tabernacles of the eighth year, a wooden platform was erected in the outer court of the Temple, on which the king was seated. The chief of the synagogue took the Book of the Law, and gave it to the head of the synagogue, who gave it to the head of the priests. He gave it to the high priest, and the latter handed it to the king, who stood up to receive it. He then sat down again, and read the following seven sections:—(1) Dent. i. 1—v. 3; (2) vi. 4—8; (3) xi. 13—22; (4) xiv. 22—xx. 23; (5) xvi. 12—19; (6) xvii. 14—20; (7) xxvii. 1—xxviii. 69. The king concluded with the same benedictions, which the high priest pronounced (see chap. xvi. 27), only that he substituted the blessing for the festival for the absolution of sins.

The Sabbath of LEVITICUS, XXV. the Seventh Year.
And thou shalt number seven sabbaths of years unto thee, seven times seven years; and the space of the seven sabbaths of years shall be unto thee forty and nine years. (9) Then shall thou cause the trumpet of the jubilee to sound on the tenth day of the seventh month, in the day of atonement shall ye make the trumpet sound throughout all your land. (10) And ye shall hallow the fiftieth year, and proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof: it shall be a jubilee unto you; and ye shall return every man unto his possession, and ye shall return every man unto his family. (11) A jubilee shall that fiftieth year be unto you: ye shall not sow, neither reap that which groweth of itself, nor gather the grapes of thy vine undressed. (12) For it is the jubilee; it shall be holy unto you: ye shall eat the increase thereof out of the field. (13) In the year of this jubile ye shall return every man unto his possession.
And if thou sell ought unto thy neighbour, or buyest ought of thy neighbour's hand, ye shall not oppress one another; (10) according to the number of years after the jubilee thou shalt buy of thy neighbour, and according unto the number of years of the fruits he shall sell unto thee: (10) according to the multitude of years thou shalt increase the price thereof, and according to the fewness of years thou shalt diminish the price of it: for according to the number of the years of the fruits doth he sell unto thee.

Ye shall not therefore oppress one another; but thou shalt fear thy God: for I am the Lord your God. (15) Wherefore ye shall do my statutes, and keep my judgments, and do them; and ye shall dwell in the land in safety. (19) And the land shall yield her fruit, and ye shall eat your fill, and dwell therein in safety.

And if ye shall say, What shall we do according to the multitude of years and in proportion to these years, as the words in the original here are not the same which are used in verse 15 and at the end of this verse, which are translated "according" in the Authorized Version. Having laid down in the preceding verse the principles of equitable dealings both for the purchaser and vendor, the Lawgiver, in his anxiety lest the distressed seller should be taken advantage of, reverses again to the purchaser, who is enjoined strictly to regulate the purchase price in proportion to the number of years the lease of the field has still to run.

For according to the number of the years the fruits doth he sell.—Better, for a number of crops he selheth, that is, the vendor does not sell the land but a certain number of harvests till the next jubilee.

Ye shall not therefore oppress one another.—Better, And ye shall not overreach any man his neighbour. (See verse 14.)

But thou shalt fear thy God—who pleads the cause of the oppressed, and avenge every injustice. (See chap. xix. 14.)

Wherefore ye shall do my statutes.—Better, And ye shall do . . . that is, the above named statutes and ordinances respecting the sabbatical year and the jubilee, which required great sacrifices.

Ye shall dwell in the land in safety.—As God is Israel's strong tower and wall of defence, it is by keeping His commandments that the Israelites will enjoy the security which other nations endeavoured to obtain by great labour and mighty armies.

And the land . . . her fruit.—He, moreover, who has given Israel these statutes, also controls the operations of nature. Hence, though the observance of His laws would necessitate the abstention from cultivating the soil, the Lord will cause the land to yield an abundant harvest which will richly supply all their wants, and they will safely and quietly dwell therein without being compelled to make raids upon their neighbours for food, or surrender themselves to their enemies for want of provision (1 Macc. vi. 49, 53; Josephus, Antt. xiv. 16, § 2; xv. 1, § 2).

What shall we eat the seventh year?—The Lawgiver here anticipates an objection on the part of those who are called upon to abstain from cultivating the land in the sabbatical year, and who are over-anxious about the provisions of their families.

Behold, we shall not sow.—That is, are forbidden to sow. (See verse 4.)

Nor gather in our increase.—That is, we are even prohibited to gather the spontaneous growths and store them up, and are commanded to leave "the increase" in the field. (See verse 7.)
eat the seventh year? behold, we shall not sow, nor gather in our increase: (23) then I will command my blessing upon you in the sixth year, and it shall bring forth fruit for three years. (22) And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit until the ninth year; until her fruits come in ye shall eat of the old store.

(23) Then I will command my blessing.—That is, He will send out His Divine command to the soil in the sixth year that it should be a blessing to them, and it shall be done. (See Deut. xxviii. 8; Pss. xiii. 8, xlv. 4, lviii. 29.) It shall bring forth fruit for three years.—Better, it shall bring forth produce. This special blessing will be manifested in the abundant crop of the harvest preceding the sabbatical year. Just as at the institution of the weekly Sabbath, when God enjoined abstention from labour, He sent down a double portion of manna every sixth day to make up for the day of rest (Exod. xvi. 22-27), so He will exercise a special providence every sixth year by blessing the soil with a bountiful crop, to compensate for giving the land a septennial Sabbath. As the sabbatical year began the civil year, viz., 1 Tishri, which was in the autumn or in September, the three years here spoken of are to be distributed as follows: (1) the remainder of the sixth year after the harvest; (2) the whole of the seventh year; and (3) the period of the eighth year till the harvest is gathered in from the seeds sown in the eighth year. It will thus be seen that the question anticipated in verse 29, viz., “What shall we eat in the seventh year?” properly applies to the eighth year, since the requirements for the seventh year are supplied by the regular harvest of the sixth year, and it is the eighth year for which the harvest of the seventh is wanted. To meet this difficulty, one of the most distinguished Jewish expositors of the Middle Ages translates verse 29: “And if ye shall say in the seventh year, ‘What shall we eat?’, i.e., in the eighth year. It may, however, be that the question expresses the anxiety which the people might feel in eating their ordinary share in the seventh year, lest there should be nothing left for the eighth year, since in all other years the harvest is ripening for the next year whilst the fruits of the past year are being consumed.

(23) And ye shall sow the eighth year, and eat yet of old fruit.—Better. And when ye shall sow in the eighth year, ye shall yet eat of the old produce, that is, when at the termination of the sabbatical year the Israelites resume the cultivation of the soil in the eighth year, the abundant crop of the sixth—year preceding the sabbatical year—will not only suffice for this year, but will reach till that part of the ninth year when the crops sown in the eighth are ripe and gathered in. Accordingly, the sixth year’s harvest will suffice till the Feast of Tabernacles, or till Tishri 1 of the ninth year. Until her fruits come in.—Better. Until its produce come in, that is, the produce of the eighth year which was gathered in the ninth. Verse 20, therefore, which states the anticipated question, and verses 21 and 22, which contain the reply, ought properly to follow immediately after verse 7, since they meet the difficulty arising from the rest of the land during the sabbatical year. The redactor of Leviticus may, however, have inserted verses 20-22 here because the difficulty raised in them, and the reply given to the anticipated question, apply equally to the jubilee year. The special Divine interposition which is here promised to meet the requirements of one year’s cessation from cultivating the land will, as a matter of course, be all the more readily vouchsafed when the Israelites will have to exercise greater obedience and faith in the jubilee, and abstain two successive years from tilling the ground.

(25) The land shall not be sold for ever.—That is, no plot of the land of Israel must be absolutely alienated from the original proprietor, who has been driven by poverty to sell his patrimony. We have here a resumption of the laws relating to the sale and purchase of land, which have already been briefly stated in verses 14-17. Having been interrupted by the insertion of the Divine promise with regard to the sabbatical year (verses 20-22), the legislation now proceeds with more directions about the limited sale of land.

For the land is mine.—The reason for this prohibition absolutely to cut off the patrimony from the family, is that God claims to be the supreme owner of the land (Exod. xv. 17; Isa. xiv. 25; Jer. ii. 5; Ps. x. 16), and as the Lord of the soil He prescribes conditions on which he allotted it to the different tribes of Israel.

Ye are strangers and sojourners with me.—God has not only helped the Israelites to conquer the land of Canaan, but has selected it as His own dwelling-place, and erected His sanctuary in the midst of it (Exod. xv. 13; Num. xxxiv. 34). He therefore is enthroned in it as Lord of the soil, and the Israelites are simply His tenants at will (chaps. xiv. 34, xx. 24, xxii. 10; Num. xiii. 2, xv. 2), and as such will have to quit it if they disobey His commandments (chaps. xvii. 28, xx. 22, xxi. 33; Deut. xxviii. 63). For this reason they are accounted as strangers and sojourners, and hence have no right absolutely to sell that which is not theirs.

(24) Ye shall grant a redemption for the land.—Being simply tenants at will, and having obtained possession of it on such terms, the land is not even to remain with the purchaser till the year of jubilee, but the buyer is to grant every opportunity to the seller to redeem it before that time.

If thy brother be waxen poor, and hath sold some of his possession, and if any of his kin come to redeem it, then shall he redeem that
And if any of his kin come to redeem it, then shall he redeem.—Better, then his nearest kinsman shall come and redeem. If he has thus been compelled by pressure of poverty to sell part of his land, then it is the duty of the nearest relation, or, as the original literally denotes, “the redeemer that is nearest to him,” to redeem the property which his impoverished relative has been obliged to sell. The expression “redeemer” is applied in Hebrew to one who, by virtue of being the nearest of kin, had not only to redeem the patrimony of the family, but to marry the childless widow of his brother (Ruth iii. 13), and avenge the blood of his relative (Num. xxxv. 19–25; Deut. xix. 8–13).

(28) And if the man have none to redeem it.—In case, however, he has either no nearest of kin, or if his nearest of kin is himself too poor to perform this duty, which is incumbent upon him, “and himself be able to redeem it,” that is, after he was compelled, by stress of poverty, to sell the property he has become prosperous, so as to be able to redeem it himself; though not distinctly expressed, it is implied that under these altered circumstances he is obliged to redeem his patrimony himself. According to the canonical law, however, he must not borrow money to redeem it.

(27) Count the years of the sale thereof.—To regulate the price of the redemption money the crops were valued which the purchaser had enjoyed since he had acquired the property. This was deducted from what he originally paid for the plot of land, and the difference was returned to him by the vendor, to whom the patrimony reverted. Thus, for instance, if there were thirty years from the time the purchase was effected to the year of jubilee, and the vendor or his next of kin redeemed the inheritance either ten or fifteen years after the transaction, he had to return to the purchaser either one-third or half of the purchase money, when the soil was restored to the seller or his next of kin. In the interest of the purchaser, however, it was enacted during the second Temple that the redemption should not take place before he had the benefit of the field for two productive years (see verse 15), and that he could claim compensation for outlay on improvements.

Restore the overplus unto the man to whom he sold it.—That is, an equitable estimate is to be made of what the land is likely to yield from the time of its redemption by the vendor to the jubilee, which is to be allowed to the purchaser.

(29) Not able to restore it to him.—That is, if the vendor is unable to return to the purchaser the probable value of the crops between the contemplated redemption and the next jubilee year.

Then that which is sold.—In that case the land thus sold is to continue with the purchaser till jubilee, when it is to revert to the vendor without any repayment whatever. The design of this law was to secure to each family a permanent interest in the soil, and to prevent the accumulation of land on the part of the greedy few who are ever anxious to join field unto field, thus precluding the existence of landless beggars and too extensive landed proprietors. To the same effect were the laws of inheritance (Num. xxvii. 6–11, xxxvi. 5–13). Similar laws obtained among other nations of antiquity. Laws were enacted that the lots which were distributed among the inhabitants were neither to be sold nor bought. Solon made it a law that no one should acquire as much land as he wished; whilst Plato held that no individual person is to possess more than four times the quantity of land than the lowest owner, who had only a single lot.

(29) A dwelling house in a walled city.—It is, however, quite different in the ease of houses in walled cities. These are not the creation of God (see verse 23), allotted by His command to the different tribes of Israel; they are the work of man, who build them up and raise them to the ground at their own will, and according to their fancy. Hence the law of jubilee does not apply to these temporary human buildings. Though an Israelite could sell his house without being driven by stress of circumstances to do it, still, as he may feel attached to his home, the Divine law affords him some protection for a limited period, during which he or his family may redeem the building. During the second Temple “a dwelling house in a walled city” was defined to be a house standing within an area of land which was first walled round for the purpose of building upon it human habitations, and in which the houses were afterwards erected. But if the houses were built first, and the city wall afterwards, they do not come within the law here laid down.

Within a full year may he redeem it.—If within a year of the sale he wishes to redeem, the Law gives him the power, or in case he dies inconsistent with what he received for it. Besides limiting the period to a year, the Law does not prescribe that the next of kin is to redeem, nor give him the power to do it. During the second Temple it was also enacted that the vendor could not redeem it with borrowed money.

(28) If it be not redeemed within the space of a full year.—That is, either by the vendor or his son. According to the interpretation which is given during the second Temple, the phrase “full year” is here used for the benefit of the seller, inasmuch as it gives him the advantage of an intercalary year, when he has an additional month, up to the last day of which he could still effect the redemption. Moreover, as the purchaser sometimes concealed himself towards the end of the year, in order to prevent the seller from redeeming his house, it was enacted that the original for ever to him that bought it throughout his generations: it shall not go out in the jubilee. (31) But the houses of the villages which have no wall round about them shall be counted as the fields of the country: they may be redeemed, and they shall go out in the jubilee.

(32) Notwithstanding the cities of the Levites, and the houses of the cities of their possession, may the Levites redeem at any time. (33) And if a man purchase of the Levites, then the house that was sold, and the city of his possession, shall go out in the year of jubilee: for the houses of the cities of the Levites are their possession among the children of Israel. (34) But the field of the suburbs of their cities may not be sold; for it is their perpetual possession.

(35) And if thy brother be waxen poor, and fallen in decay with thee; then thou shalt relieve him: yes, though he be a stranger, or a sojourner; that he may live with thee. (36) a Take thou no proprietor should hand over the redemption money to the public authorities when the purchaser could not be found, break open the doors, and take possession of the house; and if the purchaser died during the year, the vendor could redeem it from his heir.

It shall not go out in the jubilee. If the vendor, however, failed to redeem the house within the prescribed period, it was not to be subject to the laws of jubilee like the land, but is to remain for ever the property of the purchaser.

(31) But the houses of the villages which have no wall. — Houses in villages, however, form an exception. They are part of the landed property, and hence, like the cultivated land on which they are erected, are subject to the law of jubilee.

(32) Notwithstanding the cities of the Levites, and the houses. — Better, And as to the cities of the Levites, the houses, that is, the houses which belong to the Levites, in the forty-eight cities given to them (see Num. xxxiv. 1–8; Josh. xxi. 1–3), are to be exempt from this general law of house property.

May the Levites redeem at any time. — Having the same value to the Levites as landed property has to the other tribes, these houses are to be subject to the jubilee laws for fields, and hence may be redeemed at any time.

(33) And if a man purchase of the Levites. — Better, And if one of the Levites redeem it, that is, even if a Levite redeemed the house which his brother Levite was obliged to sell through poverty, the general law of house property is not to obtain even among the Levites themselves. They are to treat each other according to the law of landed property.

Then the house that was sold, and the city of his possession, shall go out. — Better, then the house that was sold in the city of his possession shall go out, that is, in the year of jubile the house is to revert to the vendor just as if it were landed property. Thus, for instance, the house of the Levite A, which he, out of poverty, was obliged to sell to the non-Levite B, and which was redeemed from him by a Levite C, reverts in the jubilee year from the Levite C to the original Levitical proprietor A. It is, however, more than probable that the negative particle has dropped out of the text, and that the passage as it originally stood was, "And if one of the Levites doth not redeem it." That is, if he does not act the part of the nearest of kin, then the house reverts in the year of jubile to the original Levitical owner, just as landed property. The Vulg. has still the negative particle.

For the houses of the cities of the Levites are their possession. — As these houses were all which the Levites possessed, they were as important to them as the land was to the other tribes, hence they were to be treated legally in the same way as the soil.

(34) But the field of the suburbs of their cities may not be sold. — The Levitical cities had both suburbs or commons for their cattle, dc., and fields which they cultivated (Num. xxxiv. 4, 5). These outlying fields, which were beyond the suburbs, they are here forbidden to sell. According to the authorities during the second Temple the expression "to sell" here used is to be taken in a wider sense as including diverting any part of it from its original purpose. Hence they say it forbids the Levites not only to sell the field, but to convert it into a suburb, and vice versa. What is field must always remain field, what is suburb must remain suburb, and what is city must continue to be city.

For it is their perpetual possession. — The estates belong to the whole tribe to all futurity, and the present occupiers have to transmit them intact to their successors. Hence no present owner, or all of them combined, have a right to dispose of any portion of the estates, or materially to alter it. They must hand these estates down to their successors as they receive them from their predecessors.

(35) And if thy brother be waxen poor. — This part of the jubilee laws which relates to the manumission of the Israelites who through poverty are compelled to sell themselves as bondsmen (verses 39–55) is introduced by a pathetic appeal to the benevolence of the people to bestow brotherly help to the poor (verses 35

And fallen in decay with thee. — Literally, and his hand wavered with thee, that is, when it is weak and can no longer render support, or gain a livelihood. As the laws of jubile guard the future interests of the Israelite who is driven by stress of poverty to sell his patrimony, the Lawgiver now points out the duties of each member of the community to the impoverished brother who has to wait till the year of jubile for the restoration of his property, but who in the meantime is unable to support himself.

Then thou shalt relieve him. — Literally, thou shalt lay hold of him. When his hand is thus trembling, it is the duty of every Israelite to support his weak hand, and enable it to gain a livelihood.

Though he be a stranger, or a sojourner. — Better, as a stranger and a sojourner, that is, he is not to be treated like an outcast because he has been compelled by poverty to sell his patrimony, but is to receive the same consideration which strangers and sojourners receive, who, like the unfortunate Israelite, have no landed property. (See chap. xix. 33, 34.)

(36) Take thou no usury of him, or increase. — The first thing to be done to the impoverished
The Usage of Bondmen.

459

shall he depart from thee, both he and his children with him, and shall return unto his own family, and unto the possession of his fathers shall he return.

(42) For they are my servants, which I brought forth out of the land of Egypt: they shall not be sold as bondmen.

(43) Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour; but shalt fear thy God. (44) Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids.

(45) Moreover of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families

Isaiah is to supply him with the means to recover himself without any interest. The authorities during the second Temple defined the words which are translated “usury” (neskech) and “increase” (harbit, or marbitk) as follows: If a person lends to another a shoked worth four denarii, and gets in return five denarii, or if he lends him two sacks of wheat, and receives back three, this is usury. If one buys wheat for delivery at the market price of 25 denarii a measure, and when it rises to 30 denarii he says to the vendor, “Deliver me the wheat, for I want to sell it and buy wine,” and the vendor replies, “I will take the wheat at 30 denarii and give thee wine for it,” though he has no wine, this is increase. The “increase” lies in the fact that the vendor has no wine at the time, and that he may possibly lose again by the rise in wine. Accordingly the former is a charge upon money, whilst the latter is on products.

(47) Thou shalt not give him.—This is simply an emphatic repetition of the declaration in the foregoing verse, and favours the ancient distinction between the two terms.

(48) Which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt.—For this appeal to the signal act of redemption from Egypt, see chap. xii. 45.

(49) And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor.—Better, And if thy brother be waxen poor by thee, that is, after supporting his tottering hand, as prescribed in verses 35—38, and making all the charitable efforts to help him, they fail, and he still finds himself in extreme poverty, and unable to obtain a livelihood.

And be sold unto thee.—The voluntary disposal of his own liberty for a money consideration the Israelite could only effect by stress of poverty.

Thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bondservant.—Under these circumstances he is not to be treated like heathen slaves who are either purchased or captured, and made to do the menial service which these Gentile slaves have to perform. The authorities during the second Temple adduce the following as degrading work which the Israelite bondman is not to be put to: He must not attend his master at his bath, nor tie up or undo the latches of his sandals, &c., &c.

(50) But as an hired servant.—The master is in all respects to treat him as one who disposes of his service for wages for a certain time, and will then be his own master again.

Shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee.

—Nor could he be kept beyond the year of jubilee. This terminated the sale of his services just as it cancelled all the sales of landed property.

(41) And then shall he depart from thee.—At the same time that he regains his liberty, and takes with him his family, the patrimony which he sold also reverts to him.

(42) For they are my servants.—This is a clue to the whole system of Hebrew servitude. These poverty-stricken men, who are driven to sell themselves to their fellow-Israelites, God claims as His servants. God is their Lord as well as their master’s Lord. He delivered them both alike from bondage to serve Him. There is, therefore, no difference between bond and free.

They shall not be sold as bondmen—That is, as personal property or chattels. The authorities during the second Temple, however, interpreted this clause to mean that an Israelite is not to be sold by proclamation or in public places, but privately, and in an honourable manner, with all possible consideration for his feelings.

(44) Thou shalt not rule over him with rigour.—The master is forbidden to tyrannise over him as if he were a slave without any rights.

(45) Both thy bondmen, and thy bondmaids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you; of them shall ye buy bondmen and bondmaids.

(46) As for thy bondmen and bondmaids which thou must have of the heathen, &c. As the Law forbids the Israelites to have their brethren as bondmen, or employ them in menial work which belongs to the slaves, the Lawgiver anticipates a difficulty which the Hebrews might raise against these enactments. If they are not to be engaged in this work, who then is to do it? Hence the reply in the verse before us.

Of the heathen that are round about you.—These are to be purchased to do the necessary work. The Israelites, however, were restricted to the Ammonites, the Moabites, the Edomites, and the Syrians, who were their neighbours, but were not permitted to buy any slaves from the seven nations who were in the midst of them, and whom they were ordered to destroy (Dent, xx. 16—18).

(47) Moreover of the children of the strangers.

—Besides the surrounding nations, the Hebrews are also permitted to obtain their slaves from those strangers who have taken up their abode in the Holy Land. By these strangers the ancient authorities understand usuery of him, or increase: but fear thy God; that thy brother may live with thee. (47) Thou shalt not give him thy money upon usury, nor lend him thy victuals for increase. (48) I am the Lord your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, to give you the land of Canaan, and to be your God.

(49) And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee; thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bondservant: (50) but as an hired servant, and as a sojourner, he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee: (41) and then Leviticus, xxv. The Usage of Bondmen.

Leviticus, XXV.  Of Servants.

And they shall be your possession. Those, but not the Hebrews, the masters may hold as their absolute property.

(46) And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children. That is, they may appropriate them to themselves, as their personal property, which is transmissible as inheritance to posterity with the family land.

They shall be your bondmen for ever. These are not subject to the laws of jubile. They remain in perpetual servitude unless they or their friends redeem them, or their master has namied any one of them. In case of injury the master is obliged to manumit him (Exod. xxi. 26, 27). The authorities during the second Temple enacted that the master's right, even with regard to this kind of bondmen, is restricted to their labour, but that he has no right to barter with them, to lose them, or to put them to shame.

Over your brethren . . . ye shall not rule . . . with rigour. In contrast to these heathen bondmen the Jewish bondmen are here designated "brethren." They are co-religionists, who have been reduced to temporary servitude, but who are, nevertheless, fellow-heirs with them in the land of their possession. Hence the greatest consideration was to be shown to them in these adverse circumstances. The authorities during the second Temple have therefore enacted that there must be no difference between the daily food, rainment, and dwelling of the master and his Hebrew slave, and that the master and the servant are alike in these respects.

(47) And if a sojourner or stranger wax rich by thee. Better, And if the hand of a stranger, and that a sojourner, attain riches by thee, that is, a stranger who has become a sojourner, or who has taken up his abode among the Israelites, and become prosperous by trading. Such a one had only to submit to the seven commandments given to Noah, and hence had not joined the Jewish religion. For this reason the Chaldee Version translates it, "And if the hand of an uncircumcised sojourner with thee wax strong."

And thy brother that dwelleth by him wax poor. Better, and thy brother by him wax poor, that is, the Israelite who traded with him is unfortunate in business, and is reduced to poverty.

And sell himself unto the stranger or sojourner by thee. Better, and sells himself unto the stranger-sojourner by thee. The two terms as before describe the same person—the stranger who has become a sojourner. Hence the Chaldee Version translates it, "and sells himself to the uncircumcised stranger who is with thee."

Or to the stock of the stranger's family. That is, the offshoot or descendant of a foreign family.

(48) He may be redeemed again. The law which applies to a heathen who sold himself to a Hebrew is reversed in this case. Whilst the heathen cannot be redeemed, and is to remain a bondman for ever, the Israelite who sells himself to a heathen may be redeemed. Indeed, according to the interpretation which obtained during the second Temple, this passage enjoins it upon his relations and the congregation to redeem him as soon as possible. Hence the ancient Chaldee Version translates it, "his redemption must be effected forthwith."

(49) Either his uncle, or his uncle's son, may redeem him. That is, any of his relatives are to redeem him, which is not the case when an Israelite sells himself to one of his own nation. Hence the Jewish canons enacted that "if a Hebrew is sold to a stranger, and is unable to redeem himself, his kinsmen must redeem, nay, the Sanhedrin are to compel his kinsmen to redeem him lest he should be lost among the heathen. If his kindred do not redeem him, and if he cannot redeem himself, every man of Israel is commanded to redeem him. But if he is sold to an Israelite his kindred may not redeem him, nor may he borrow money to redeem himself, nor redeem himself by instalments." In accordance with this injunction we find the Jews declare "we after our ability have redeemed our brethren the Jews which were sold unto the heathen, and will ye even sell your brethren, or shall they be sold unto us?" (Neh. v. 8).

(50—52) And he shall reckon with him. That is, either the man himself when he is able to redeem himself, or his kindred. The authorities during the second Temple rightly point out that this passage enjoins the Hebrew to treat the heathen master fairly...
CHAPTER XXVI. — (1) Ye shall make you no idols nor graven image, neither rear you up a standing image, neither shall ye set up any image of stone in your land, to bow down unto it: for I am the Lord your God.

(2) Ye shall keep my sabbaths, and reverence my sanctuary: I am the Lord.

(3) If ye walk in my statutes, and keep my commandments, and do them;

a graven image or pillar. Graven image is not only a plastic image of a heathen deity, but a visible and sensual representation of the God of Israel (Exod. xx. 19, 20; Deut. iv. 15, 16).

A standing image. —This expression, which only occurs once more in the text of the Authorised Version (Micah v. 13), and four times in the Margin (1 Kings xiv. 23; Jer. xliii. 13; Hosea iii. 4, x. 1), is the rendering of a Hebrew word (matzbeah), which is usually and more correctly translated "pillar," or "statue" (Gen. xxviii. 13, xxvi. 22, xxxi. 13, &c.). This was a plain and rude stone without any image engraved on it, and was not unfrequently erected to God himself, but in after-time more especially as a memorial to false deities. (Gen. xxviii. 18, 22, xxxi. 13, xxxv. 14, with Exod. xxiii. 24, xxiv. 13, &c.)

Neither shall ye set up any image of stone. —The authorities during the second Temple interpreted the words here rendered "images of stone" to denote "beholding, or worshipping stones" — i.e., stones set in the ground in places of worship upon which the worshippers prostrated themselves to perform their devotions. The stone was therefore a kind of signal, calling the attention of the worshipper to itself, so that he may fall down upon it. With such stones, these authorities asssure us, the Temple was paved, since they were perfectly lawful in the sanctuary, but must not be used in worship out of the Temple, or rather, out of the land, as these authorities understood the words "in your land" here to denote. Hence the Chaldee Version paraphrases it, "and a painted stone ye shall not place in your land to prostrate yourselves upon it, but a pavement adorned with figures and pictures ye may put in the floor of your sanctuary, but not to bow down upon it," i.e., in an idolatrous manner. Hence, too, the ancient canon, "in your own land" (i.e., in all other lands) "ye must not prostrate yourselves upon stones, but ye may prostrate yourselves upon the stones in the sanctuary."

(2) Ye shall keep my sabbaths. —This is exactly the same precept laid down in chap. xix. 30, and is here repeated because of the danger of desecrating the Sabbath to which the Israelite is exposed who sells himself to a heathen. The Israelite will effectually guard against idol-worship, by keeping the Sabbath holy, and reverencing God's sanctuary.

(3) If ye walk in my statutes. —We have already remarked that this verse begins the section in the Hebrew and ought to have begun the chapter in English. Having set forth the ceremonial and moral injunctions which are necessary for the development and maintenance of holiness and purity in the commonwealth, the legislator now concludes by showing the happiness which will accrue to the Israelites from a faithful observance of these laws, and the punishments by duly compensating and compensating for the number of years he has still to serve till jubilee, and to take no advantage of the idolater.

And as a yearly hired servant shall he bo. —Better, As a yearly servant, &c., without the "and," which is not in the original, and is not wanted. That is, as long as he is in service his master must not treat him like a slave, but is to behave to him as if he were simply one who hires out his services from year to year, and who, after a short time, will be his own master again.

And the other shall not rule with rigour over him.—Better, he shall not rule, &c., that is, the heathen master. The words "the other" are not in the heathen, and the sense of the passage is quite plain without them.

In thy sight. —The Israelite is here admonished not to be a tacit spectator of the cruel treatment of his brother Israelite by a heathen master, and though he is not to resent in the same way in which the Lawgiver himself represented it (Exod. ii. 11, 12), still he is to remember with the cruel Gentile, and invoke the protection of the powers that be.

If he be not redeemed in these years. —Better, If he be not redeemed by these, that is, by the relations or the means indicated in verses 48 and 49, he is to go out free in the year of jubile. (See verse 41.)

The heathen is to submit to the laws of jubile as much as the Hebrew.

For unto me the children of Israel are servants. —See verses 38, 42.

XXVI.

(1) Ye shall make you no idols. —The first two verses of this chapter are still a part of the previous section in the Hebrew original. By separating them from their proper position, and making them begin a new chapter, both the logical sequence and the import of these two verses are greatly obscured. As verses 47-55 legislated for cases where Israelites are driven by extreme poverty to sell themselves to a heathen, and when they may be compelled to continue in this service to the year of jubile, and thus be obliged to witness idolatrous practices, the Lawgiver solemnly repeats the two fundamental precepts of Judaism, which they might be in danger of neglecting, viz., to abstain from idol-worship and to keep the Sabbath, which are two essential commandments of the Decalogue. The same two commandments, but in reverse order, are also joined together in chap. xix. 3, 4.

Idols. —For this expression see chap. xix. 4.

Nor graven image, neither rear you up a standing image. —Better, nor shall ye rear you up a graven image or pillar. Graven image is not only a plastic image of a heathen deity, but a visible and sensual representation of the God of Israel (Exod. xx. 19, 20; Deut. iv. 15, 16).
A Blessing on those who Keep the Commandments.

(4) then I will give you rain in due season, and the land shall yield her increase, and the trees of the field shall yield their fruit. (5) And your threshing shall reach unto the vintage, and the vintage shall reach unto the sowing time: and ye shall eat your bread to the full, and dwell in your land safely. (6) And I will give peace in the land, and ye shall lie down, and none shall make you afraid: and I will destroy evil beasts out of the land, neither shall the sword go through your land. (7) And ye shall chase your enemies, and they shall fall before you by the sword. (8) And five of you shall chase an hundred, and an hundred of you shall put ten thousand to flight: and your enemies shall fall before you by the sword. (9) For I will have respect unto you, and make you fruitful, and multiply you, and establish my covenant with you. (10) And ye shall eat old store, and bring forth the old because of the new. (11) And I will set my tabernacle among you: and my soul shall not abhor you. (12) And I will walk among you, and will be your God, and ye shall be my people. (13) I am the Lord your God, which brought you forth out of the land of Egypt, that ye should not be their bondmen; and I have broken the bands of your yoke, and made you go upright.

which await them if they transgress these Divine ordinances.

(4) Then I will give you rain in due season. Better, then I will give you your rains in due season, that is, the former and latter rains (Deut. xi. 14). In Palestine the proper season for the early rain is from about the middle of October until December, thus preparing the ground for receiving the seed, whilst that of the latter or vernal rain is in the months of March and April, just before the harvest. Thus, also, in the covenant which God is to make with His people, a similar promise is made, “I will cause the showers to come down in his season; there shall be showers of blessing” (Ezek. xxvi. 26).

(5) And your threshing shall reach unto the vintage. That is, the corn crop shall be so plentiful that those who shall be employed in threshing about the month of March will not complete it before the vintage, which was about the month of July.

The vintage shall reach unto the sowing time. The wine, again, is to be so abundant that those who shall be engaged in gathering and pressing the grapes will not be able to finish before the sowing time again arrives, which is about the month of October. A similar promise is made by Amos: “the plowman shall overtake the reaper, and the treader of grapes him who sowed seed” (Amos ix. 13).

(6) And I will give peace. Not only are they to have rich harvests, but the Lord will grant them peace among themselves, so that they shall be able to retire at night without any anxiety, or fear of robbers (Pss. iii. 5, iv. 8).

I will rid evil beasts out of the land. The promise to destroy the beasts of prey, which endanger life, and which abounded in Palestine, is also to be found in Ezekiel, where exactly the same words are rendered in the Authorized Version, “And will cause the evil beasts to cease out of the land” (Ezek. xxxiv. 25). The two passages should be uniform in the translation.

(7) And ye shall chase your enemies. If, covetous of their prosperity, the enemies should dare to attack them, God will inspire His people with marvellous courage, so that they will not only pursue them, but put them to the sword.

(8) And five of you shall chase an hundred. This is a proverbial saying, corresponding to our phrase “A very small number, or a mere handful, shall be more than a match for a whole regiment.” The same phrase, with different proportions to the numbers, occurs in other parts of the Bible (Deut. xxxii. 30; Josh. xxii. 10; Isa. xxx. 17).

(9) For I will have respect unto you. Better, And I will turn unto you, as it is rendered in the Authorised Version in Ezek. xlv. 9, the only other passage where this phrase occurs; that is, be merciful to them and bless them. (Comp. 2 Kings xiii. 23; Ps. xxv. 16, lxix. 17, &c.)

And multiply you, and establish my covenant with you. That is, by multiplying them as the stars of heaven and the sand of the sea, God fulfils the covenant which He made with their fathers (Gen. xii. 2, xiii. 16, xv. 5, xxii. 17; Exod. xxii. 26).

(10) And ye shall eat old store. Better, old store which hath become old. Though they will thus multiply, there shall be abundant stores for them, which become old because it will take them so long to consume them.

And bring forth the old because of the new. Better, and remove the old on account of the new, that is, they will always have such abundant harvests that they will be obliged to remove from the barns and garner the old stock of corn, in order to make room for the new.

(11) And I will set my tabernacle among you. Better, And I will set my dwelling-place among you. (See chap. xv. 31.) Not only will God bless them with these material blessings, but will permanently abide with them in the sanctuary erected in their midst.

My soul shall not abhor you. That is, God has no aversion to them; does not regard it below His dignity to sojourn amongst them, and to show them His favour.

(12) And I will walk among you. This promise is quoted by St. Paul (2 Cor. vi. 16).

(13) I have broken the bands of your yoke. The promises thus made to the Israelites of the extraordinary fertility of their land, of peace within and immunity from war without, and of the Divine presence constantly sojourning amongst them, if they will faithfully obey the commandments of the Lord, now conclude with the oft-repeated solemn appeal to the obligation they are under to the God who had so marvellously
A Curse on those who Break the Commandments.

(14) a But if ye will not hearken unto me, and will not do all these commandments; (15) and if ye shall despise my statutes, or if your soul abhor my judgments, so that ye will not do all my commandments, but that ye break my covenant: (16) I also will do this unto you; I will even appoint over you terror, consumption, and the burning ague, that shall consume the eyes, and cause sorrow of heart: and ye shall sow thy seed in vain, for your enemies shall eat it. (17) And I will set my face against you, and ye shall be slain before your enemies; they that hate you shall reign over you; and ye shall flee when none pursueth you.

(18) And if ye will not yet for all this hearken unto me, then I will punish you seven times more for your sins. (19) And I will break the pride of your power; and I will make your heaven as iron, and your earth as brass: (20) and your strength shall be spent in vain: for your land shall not yield her increase, neither shall the trees of the land yield their fruits.

(21) And if ye walk contrary unto me, and will not hearken unto me; I will bring seven times more plagues upon you according to your sins. (22) I will also send wild beasts among you, which shall rob you of your children, and destroy your cattle, and make you few in number; and your high ways shall be desolate.

(23) And if ye will not be reformed by me by these things, but will walk contrary unto me; (24) then will I also walk contrary unto you, and will punish you yet seven times for your sins. (25) And I will bring a sword upon you, that shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant: and when ye are gathered together within your cities, I will send the pestilence among you; and ye shall be delivered into the hand of the enemy. (26) And when I have broken the staff of your bread, ten women shall bake your bread in one oven, and they shall deliver you your bread again by weight: and ye shall eat, and not be satisfied.

during the second Temple, however, took the phrase "the pride of your power" to denote the sanctuary, which is called "the pride of your power" in Ezek. xxiv. 21, the expression used here, but the identity of which is obliterated in the Authorised Version by rendering the phrase "the excellency of your strength." Hence the Chaldee Versions paraphrase it, "And I will break down the glory of the strength of your sanctuary."

I will make your heaven as iron.—That is, the heaven which is over them shall yield no more rain than if it were of metal. In Deut. xxviii. 23, where the same punishment is threatened, and the same figure is used, the metals are reversed, the heaven is brass, and the earth iron.

(23) And your strength shall be spent in vain.—That is, with the heaven over them as metal, their labour expended in ploughing, digging, and sowing will be perfectly useless. Your land shall not yield her increase, as no amount of human labour will make up for the want of rain. In Deut. xi. 17, where the same punishment is threatened, and the same phrase is used, the Authorised Version unnecessarily obliterates the identity of the words in the original by rendering them "the land yield not her fruit."

(24) And if ye walk contrary unto me.—That is, continue the defiance of the Divine law, and rebel against God's authority. The third warning, contained in verses 21, 22, threatens them with destruction by wild beasts.

Seven times more plagues.—That is, a still greater number. (See verse 18.)

According to your sins.—This increased number of scourges will be in proportion to their sins, since their defiance, in spite of the two preceding classes of punishments, aggravates and enhances their guilt.

(25) I will also send wild beasts.—Better, and I will send wild beasts. Wild beasts, which abounded in Palestine (Exod. xxiii. 29), are used as a punishment for sin (Deut. xxi. 24; 2 Kings xvii. 25; Isa. xi. 21, 22; Ezek. xiv. 15, &c.).

(26) And if ye will not be reformed.—The fourth warning (verses 23—26) threatens the rebellious Israelites with a more intensified form of the punishment partially mentioned in the first warning. (See verse 17.)

(27) Then will I also walk contrary unto you.—By their increased hostility to God, they simply increase their calamities, since He whom they are defying now also assumes a hostile attitude towards those who are defiant.

And will punish you yet.—Better, and I also will smite you. (See verse 23.)

(28) That shall avenge the quarrel of my covenant.—Better, that shall avenge my covenant, that is, the sword, which shall avenge the breach of the Divine covenant; a war, which will devastate them because of their rebellion against the covenant God. Hence the Chaldee Versions render it, "that shall avenge on you the vengeance for that ye have transgressed against the words of the law."

And when ye are gathered together within your cities.—When, completely defeated in the battlefield, the Israelites escape from the avenging sword into their fortified cities, they will then become a prey to pestilence, so that the surviving remnant will prefer to deliver themselves over into the hands of the relentless enemy. (Comp. Jer. xxvi. 6—9; Ezek. v. 12, vii. 15.)

(29) And when I have broken the staff of your bread.—Better, when I break you the staff of bread, that is, when God cuts off their supply of bread, which is the staff of life. "To break the staff of bread" denotes to take away or to destroy the staff or the support which bread is to man. This metaphor also occurs in other parts of Scripture (Isa. iii. 1; Ezek. iv. 16, v. 16, xiv. 13; Ps. ev. 16). This, in addition to the pestilence in the cities, which will drive them to deliver themselves up to the enemy, or rather the cause of this pestilence will be the famine which will rage in the town whither they fled for protection.

Ten women shall bake your bread in one oven.—Better, ten women, &c., that is, so great will be the famine when God cuts off the supply, that one ordinary oven will suffice to bake the bread of ten families, who are represented by their ten women, whilst in ordinary times one oven was only sufficient for one family.

And they shall deliver you your bread again by weight.—When it is brought from the bake-house each one will not be allowed to eat as much as he requires, but will have his stinted allowance most carefully served out to him by weight. Parallel to this picture of misery is the appalling scene described by Ezekiel, "I will break the staff of bread in Jerusalem, and they shall eat bread by weight, and with care, and they shall drink water by measure, and with astonishment; that they may want bread and water, and be astonished one with another, and consume away for their iniquity." (Ezek. iv. 16, 17.)
And if ye will not for all this hearken unto me, but walk contrary unto me;

then I will walk contrary unto you also in fury; and I, even I, will chastise you seven times for your sins.

And ye shall eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters shall ye eat.

And I will destroy your high places, and cut down your images, and cast your carcases upon the carcases of your idols, and my soul shall abhor you.

And I will make your cities waste, and bring your sanctuaries unto desolation, and I will not smell the savour of your sweet odours.

And I will bring the land into desolation: and your enemies which dwell therein shall be astonished at it. And I will scatter you among the heathen, and will draw out a sword after you: and your land shall be desolate, and your cities waste.
Then shall the land enjoy her sabbaths, as long as it lieth desolate, and ye be in your enemies’ land; even then shall the land rest, and enjoy her sabbaths. (33) As long as it lieth desolate it shall rest; because it did not rest in your sabbaths, when ye dwelt upon it.

And upon them that are left alive of you I will send a faintness into their hearts in the lands of their enemies; and the sound of a 1 shaken leaf shall chase them; and they shall flee, as fleeing from a sword; and they shall fall when none pursueth. (37) And they shall fall one another, as it were before a sword, when none pursueth; and ye shall have no power to stand before your enemies. (39) And ye shall perish among the heathen, and the land of your enemies shall eat you up. (40) And they that are left of you shall pine away in their iniquity in your enemies’ lands; and also in the iniquities of their fathers shall they pine away with them.

If they shall confess their iniquity, and the iniquity of their fathers, with their trespass which they trespassed against me, and that also they have walked contrary unto me; (41) and that I also have walked contrary unto them, and have brought them into the land of their enemies; if then their uncircumcised hearts be humbled, and they then accept of the punishment of their ini-
Those who are
LEVITICUS, XXVII.
quent: (42) then will I remember my covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham will I remember; and I will remember the land.

(43) The land also shall be left of them, and shall enjoy her sabbaths, while she lieth desolate without them: and they shall accept of the punishment of their iniquity: because, even because they despised my judgments, and because their soul abhorred my statutes.

(44) And yet for all that, when they be in the land of their enemies, I will not cast them away, neither will I abhor hearts shall be humbled. This is a resumption of the statement made at the beginning of verse 40, viz., “And they shall confess their iniquity . . .”; or rather, their uncircumcised hearts shall be humbled. That is, pervers and stubborn hearts; too proud to make an humble confession. (See chaps. xii. 23; with Jer. ix. 20.) The same metaphor is used by the Apostle: “Yo stiflnecked and uncircumcised in heart and ears, ye do always resist the Holy Ghost.” (Acts vii. 51.)

Accept of the punishment of their iniquity. —Rather, accept willingly, that is, they will acknowledge the justice of their punishment, and be in that frame of mind when they will freely own that the punishment is not commensurate with their guilt, and willingly accept the Divine retribution. The exact shade of meaning covered by this phrase in the original cannot adequately be given in a translation, since the verb here translated “accept,” or “accept willingly,” is the same which is translated “enjoy” in verse 34. The whole phrase denotes literally, they shall rejoice in their iniquity, or in the punishment of their iniquity; they will take it joyfully, as the best and most appropriate means to bring them to repentance. The nearest approach to it is the passage, “I will bear the indignation of the Lord, for I have sinned against him” (Micah vii. 9).

(45) Then will I remember. —That is, perform the covenant God made. The expression “remember frequently denotes “to be mindful,” “to perform,” especially when used with regard to God; as, for instance, “I have remembered my covenant,” &c. (Exod. vi. 5, 6); “He remembered for them his covenant” (Ps. evi. 45).

My covenant with Jacob, and also my covenant with Isaac, and also my covenant with Abraham. —When thus brought to repentance, the Lord will perform towards them the covenant which He made with their forefathers. He not only promised that the Israelites are to be a numerous people, but that they are to possess the land for ever (Exod. xxxii. 13). From the fact that the expression “covenant” is here exceptionally repeated before the name of each patriarch, the authorities during the second Temple rightly concluded that it refers to three distinct covenants made respectively with the patriarchs. Hence the Chaldee Version renders it, “And I will remember in mercy the covenant which I covenanted with Jacob at Bethel [Gen. xxxv. 9—15], and also the covenant which I covenanted with Isaac at Mount Moriah [Gen. xxii.], and the covenant which I covenanted with Abraham between the divided pieces [of the sacrifices (Gen. xv. 18—21)].” The ancient also call attention to the fact that whilst in all other passages where the three patriarchs are mentioned together, the order is according to their seniority, viz., Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob (Gen. i. 24; Exod. ii. 24, vi. 8, xxxii. 13; Deut. xxxix. 13, xxxiv. 4; 2 Kings xiii. 23; Ps. ev. 8—10; 1 Chron. xvi. 16—17), this is the solitary instance where the regular order is inverted.

(46) The land also shall be left of them. —Better, but the land shall be desolated by them. The solemn warning is here reiterated, that before God will remember His covenant with the patriarchs, and also be mindful of the land, the land must be depopulated of its rebellious inhabitants, and enjoy the Sabattus which have been denied to it. This verse, therefore, which is substantially a repetition of verses 33, 34, seems to have been inserted here to deprecate more solemnly the heinonness of their sins.

(47) And yet for all that. —Better, And yet even so, that is, even if it be so that they remain exiles in foreign lands for a long time, this is no proof that God has finally cast them off, has given them over to destruction, and abrogated His covenant with them. He is always their God, and will keep His covenant for ever.

(48) But I will for their sakes remember the covenant. —Better, And will remember unto them the covenant, that is, as their God He will execute to them the covenant which He made with their ancestors. This verse is therefore closely connected with the preceding verse.

(49) These are the statutes and judgments. —That is, the statutes and judgments contained in chaps. xxv. 1—xxvi. 45.

In Mount Sinai. —That is, in the mountains district of Sinai. This group of statutes therefore concludes with the very phrase with which it began (see chap. xxv. 1), thus showing that it forms a section by itself.

XXVII.

(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses. —Like the group of enactments contained in chaps. xxv. 1—xxvi. 45, the regulations about the different kinds of vows are introduced with the formula which indicates that the section before us constitutes a separate Divine communication. As sundry allusions are made throughout this book to vows, thus legally acknowledging the unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When a man shall make a singular vow, the persons shall be for the Lord by thy estimation. (3) And thy estimation shall be of the male from twenty years old even unto sixty years old, even thy estimation shall be fifty shekels of silver, after the shekel of the sanctuary. (4) And if it be a female, then thy estimation shall be thirty shekels. (5) And if it be from five years old even unto twenty years old, then thy estimation shall be of the male twenty shekels, and for the female ten shekels. (6) And if it be from a month old even unto five years old, then thy estimation shall be of the male five shekels of silver, and for the female thy estimation shall be three shekels of silver. (7) And if it be from sixty years old and above; if it be a male, then thy estimation shall be fifteen shekels, and for the female dedicates by it any other member of the community, he is to pay fifty silver shekels, which in our currency would be 52 $5. 2d., if the man thus consecrated is between twenty and sixty years of age. This sum he is to pay, whether rich or poor. For this sum he was liable, during the second Temple, if he said "My value shall be upon me," or "This man's value be upon me," or "Such a man's value be upon me."

(4) And if it be a female . . . thirty shekels.

—As the woman is the weaker vessel, and her labour is of less value, if she vows herself or dedicates by a vow any other one of her own sex to the sanctuary, she is to pay thirty shekels, or £3 17s. 6d., provided she is within the above-named limits of age. This was the value of a slave (Exod. xxvi. 32), and is the price at which Christ was sold (Matt. xxvii. 9). It is supposed that under this provision Jephtha might have redeemed his daughter whom he unwittingly vowed to the Lord (Judges xi. 30). (See, however, verse 29.)

(5) If it be from five years old, even unto twenty years.—From the fact that a child of five years is here mentioned it is evident that the vows here spoken of are not simply those which a man makes with regard to his own person, but which he also makes about others, since a vow involving the payment of a considerable sum of money on the part of a child was of no force. The case, therefore, here contemplated is of a father or mother vowing the male child unto the Lord or of any other person taking upon himself to pay the value of such and such a child to the sanctuary, which is still more manifest from the following verse.

The male twenty shekels.—As the services of a boy at the age here specified are of much less value, the parent, or anyone else, who vows him to the sanctuary is to pay £2 11s. 6d.

The female ten shekels.—For the girl, whose value is proportionately less, the voucher is to pay £1 5s. 10d.; being the same value put on an old woman. (See verse 7.

(6) From a month old even unto five years old.—That is, if a parent, or any other person, devotes his or anyone else's child to the sanctuary, he is obliged to be redeemed according to the prescribed valuation. The formula used in such a case during the second Temple was, "Behold the estimation of this my boy, or this my girl, or of that boy or that girl, be upon me."

The male five shekels of silver.—As at this tender age the service of a child is not of much value, the voucher is to pay for a boy 12s. 11d.

The female . . . three shekels of silver.—The girl being proportionately less valuable, is to be redeemed at 7s. 9d.

(7) From sixty years old and above.—Being almost past labour, the old man is next in value to the child.
LEVITICUS, XXVII.

A male . . . fifteen shekels.—The old man is therefore to be redeemed at £1 18s. 9d.

The female ten shekels.—The old woman, from sixty and upwards, is estimated at exactly the same value as the girl from five to twenty years old (see verse 5), and hence is to be redeemed at £1 5s. 10d. It will be seen that the disproportion between a man and a woman is the same in old age as in youth. The authorities during the second Temple account for it by adding the adage, “An old man in the house is always in a way; an old woman in the house is a treasure; she manages all household affairs.”

But if he be poorer than thy estimation.—That is, if the person who makes the vow possesses less than the specified legal rates required to redeem it.

Then he shall present himself before the priest.—The man pleading poverty is to appear before the priest, who is to examine into his circumstances, and tax him accordingly. The minimum, however, which he was obliged to pay during the second Temple was one shekel. If anyone neglected paying his vows to the Temple treasury, his goods were seized by the officials. This, however, had to be done in such a manner as not to deprive the man of his means of subsistence. The bailiffs were obliged to leave a mechanic two sets of tools, a husbandman a yoke of oxen, and a donkey driver his donkey. They were bound to leave food sufficient for thirty days, and bedding for twelve months; and they could never seize the man’s sandals or phylacteries, or his wife’s property, or his children’s clothes.

And if it be a beast, whereof men bring an offering.—That is, if what a man vows consists of sacrificial quadrupeds, viz., bullocks, sheep, or goats.

Shall be holy.—That is, must not be redeemed at all. They were delivered to the sanctuary: they were sold by the priests to those Israelites who required them as sacrifices for the altar, and the money expended in the maintenance of the service.

He shall not alter it, nor change it.—The identical animal vowed is to be delivered; no change whatever, even if it is in the substitution of a better for an inferior animal, is permitted. The stress laid upon this part of the enactment is indicated by the employment here of two verbs of the same import. If he who vows does change the one he dedicated to the Lord, both the animals, the one he originally vowed and the one he substituted for it, are alike holy, and must be delivered to the sanctuary.

And if it be any unclean beast.—That is, if what he vows consists of an unclean beast, which change thereof shall be holy. And if it be any unclean beast, of which they do not offer a sacrifice unto the Lord, then he shall present the beast before the priest: and the priest shall value it, whether it be good or bad: as thou valuest it, who art the priest, so shall it be. But if he will at all redeem it, then he shall add a fifth part thereof unto thy estimation.

And when a man shall sanctify his house to be holy unto the Lord, then the priest shall estimate it, whether it does not belong to the three kinds of sacrificial quadrupeds, and which cannot therefore be sacrificed on the altar. According to the authorities during the second Temple, however, the expression “unclean beast” here denotes defective sacrificial animals, such as oxen, sheep, and goats with blemishes, which have become unlawful for the altar.

Whether it be good or bad.—That is, the priest shall estimate its value according to the condition of the animal, whatever that may be, whether it is of good quality or bad.

But if he will at all redeem it.—Better, and if he wishes to redeem it, that is, the man himself who vowed it for the sanctuary. The estimate put upon the animal in question was intended for anyone who wished to purchase it, not excluding, however, the person who vowed it.

He shall add a fifth part.—Whilst anyone else could purchase the animal at the valuation put upon it by the priest, its former owner is to pay a fifth more than the valuation price. This was probably intended as a fine for taking back a thing which he promised to the Lord. For the way in which the fifth part was computed during the second Temple see chap. v. 16.

And when a man shall sanctify his house.—That is, devotes it to the service of God by a vow, when it has to be sold and the money used by the authorities for the maintenance and repair of the sanctuary, unless it is required as a dwelling for the priests, or for some other purpose connected with the duties of the Temple. The sale, however, can only take place after the priest has carefully examined it, ascertained and fixed its value, according to the condition of the house. It then can be bought by any one at the price so fixed. The expression “his house” the authorities during the second Temple interpreted to mean not only the building itself but anything belonging to it, or any article of furniture in it which the owner could vow to the sanctuary separately, whilst from the expression “his house” they concluded that the house or the things therein must be absolutely his, and that he has the exclusive right of disposal. Hence any house or property obtained by fraud neither the defrauded nor the defrauder could vow to the sanctuary, since the property was not properly in the possession of either, and could not be called his. Moreover, if anyone vowed a thing by mistake, it could not be claimed for the sanctuary, the vow under such circumstances was regarded as null and void. From these considerations, as well as from the fact that any article that was vowed could be redeemed, it is evident that the Mosaic vow of consecration to the sanctuary imparted no sacramental and be good or bad; as the priest shall estimate it, so shall it stand. (15) And if he that sanctified it will redeem his house, then he shall add the fifth part of the money of the thy estimation unto it, and it shall be his.

(16) And if a man shall sanctify unto the Lord some part of a field of his possession, then thy estimation shall be according to the seed thereof: — an homer of barley seed shall be valued at fifty shekels of silver. (17) If he sanctify his field from the year of jubile, according to thy estimation it shall stand. (18) But if he sanctify his field after the jubile, then the priest shall reckon unto him the money according to the years that remain, even unto the year of the jubile, and it shall be abated from thy estimation.

(19) And if he that sanctified the field will in any wise redeem it, then he shall add the fifth part of the money of thy estimation unto it, and it shall be assured to him. (20) And if he will not redeem the field, or if he have sold the field to another man, it shall not be redeemed any more. (21) But the field, when it goeth out in the jubile, shall be holy unto the Lord, as a field devoted;
the possession thereof shall be the priest's.
(22) And if a man sanctify unto the Lord a field which he hath bought, which is not of the fields of his possession; (23) then the priest shall reckon unto him the worth of thy estimation, even unto the year of the jubilee: and he shall give thine estimation in that day, as a holy thing unto the Lord. (24) In the year of the jubilee the field shall return unto him of whom it was bought, even to him to whom the possession of the land did belong.
(25) And all thy estimations shall be

Shall be holy unto the Lord, as a field devoted.—It shall not revert to the original owner who first vowed it and, after refusing to redeem it, fraudulently sold it, but becomes God's property, like all devoted or banned things. (See verse 28.) According to the authorities during the second Temple, however, the import of the law laid down in verses 20 and 21 is as follows:—If the vower of the field does not redeem it before the jubilee year, and the field is then still in the possession of the Temple treasurer, who has the control of all the things thus consecrated by vow; or if the Temple treasurer has sold the field to another person who has it in his possession, the original owner or vower can no longer redeem it, but in the year of jubilee it reverts either from the Temple treasurer or the purchaser to the priests who are on duty in that year, who add it to their pasture fields. These priests, however, have to pay for it the valuation money.

(22) And if a man sanctify unto the Lord a field which he hath bought.—But if a man vows a field which he has acquired by purchase, and which is only his till the next jubilee, when it reverts to its original owner (see chap. xxi. 25—28), the case is necessarily different. Such a leased field, when vowed to the Lord, is to be dealt with as follows:—

(23) Then the priest shall reckon unto him. —In this case the vower is not to pay the low rate fixed for a field which is the family inheritance (see verse 16), but the priest is to value it in proportion to the number of crops which it will produce up to the year of jubilee, in the same way as fields are valued in ordinary purchases. (See chap. xxi. 14—16.)

And he shall give thine estimation, in that day.—This valuation the vower or his relatives had to pay all at once, without, however, the additional fifth part of its value; whilst in the case of vowing an hereditary field, the vower had the advantage of paying the small sum by yearly instalments.

(24) The field shall return unto him of whom it was bought.—In accordance with the law laid down in chap. xxvii. 23—28, the field thus vowed did not return to the purchaser in the year of jubilee, but to the hereditary owner, of whom the person who had vowed it to the Lord had bought it.

(25) According to the shekel of the sanctuary.—As the proceeds of these vows were devoted to the maintenance and repair of the sanctuary, all the valuations are to be made and paid according to the standard weight of the sanctuary shekel. (See Exod. xxviii. 13.)

(26) Only the firstling of the beasts.—Better, nevertheless the firstlings, &c., as this rendering also suits verse 28, which begins with the same particle, and which is translated in the Authorised Version, "notwithstanding." Having laid down the regulations about the four classes of objects which may be vowed to the Lord—viz.: 1. persons (verses 2—8); 2. animals (verses 9—13); 3. houses (verses 14, 15); and 4. lands (verses 16—25)—the legislator concludes by pointing out two exceptions to the rules about votive offerings hitherto discussed. The two classes of objects which are forbidden to be vowed are (1) the firstlings of beasts and (2) devoted things. The firstlings belonged already to the Lord by an express statute (Exod. xiii. 2).

To vow, therefore, to the Lord that which was His own is a mockery.

Which should be the Lord's firstling.—Rather, which is born as a firstling to the Lord, that is, one which, by virtue of its being a firstling, and by its very birth, is the property of the Lord.

(27) And if it be of an unclean beast.—That is, if he vows the firstling of an unclean beast he could redeem it according to the valuation of the priest with the addition of one-fifth over and above the fixed value. If he did not redeem it the treasurer of the sanctuary sold it to anyone who liked to buy it at this valuation, and the proceeds were devoted to the maintenance and repairs of the sanctuary. As this is at variance with the law laid down in Exod. xiii. 13: xxxiv. 20, where it is enacted that the firstborn of an ass is either to be redeemed with a sheep, or to be put to death, the authorities during the second Temple interpreted the precept in the passage before us as not applying to the firstborn of the unclean animals, but to unclean animals generally which are dedicated for the repairs of the sanctuary.

(28) Notwithstanding no devoted thing.—Better, Nevertheless, no bidden thing (see verse 26), that is, unlike those things consecrated to God by the vow hitherto spoken of, every thing which the vower devoted to God under a solemn ban cannot be redeemed.

Both of man and beast, and of the field of his possession.—This shows the extent to which a man may go in exercising his power to devote things to God in this manner. He was perfectly at liberty to ban not only his cattle and his otherwise inalienable inherited land, but also those human beings over whom he had control—his children and slaves.

Every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord.—Being most holy, any thing or person thus shall be sold or redeemed: every devoted thing is most holy unto the Lord.
(29) None devoted, which shall be devoted of men, shall be redeemed; but shall surely be put to death.
(30) And all the tithe of the land, whether of the seed of the land, or of the fruit of the tree, is the Lord's: it is holy unto the Lord. (31) And if a man will at all redeem ought of his tithes, he shall add thereto the fifth part thereof, devoted to the Lord could neither be sold by the officials of the sanctuary nor be redeemed by the vower who had in this manner banned the objects of his vow. All gifts devoted under the ban became the property of the priests. (See verse 17; Num. xviii. 14; Ezek. xlv. 29.)

(29) None devoted, which shall be devoted of men.—Better, Every one banned, which shall be banned of men, that is, every one banned from amongst men, or every human being banned, is not to be redeemed. Like the cattle and the patrimonial estates, when once devoted to God by a vow of banning, the man thus banned by a vow comes irrevocably under the class of “most holy unto the Lord,” or one irrevocably withdrawn from the power of man.

But shall surely be put to death.—Not as a sacrifice to God, but, on the contrary, to be removed out of His sight. This is the apparent import of the passage, and seems to be confirmed by the melancholy narrative of Jephtha and his daughter (Judges xi. 30). This seems to have been the interpretation put on the law in question during the second Temple, since it is embodied in the Chaldee Versions, which render the verse as follows: “Every vow that shall be vowed of man, shall not be redeemed with money, but with burnt offerings and with hallowed victims, and with supplications for mercy before the Lord, because such are to be put to death.” It is, however, supposed that this awful vow of banning could only be exercised on notorious malefactors and idolaters as dangerous to the faith of the Israelites, that it could not be made by any private individual on his own responsibility, and that when such cases occurred the community or the Sanhedrin carried out the ban as an act of judicial necessity, thus showing it to be “most holy unto the Lord.” Accordingly, verses 28 and 29 treat of two different cases. The former regulates objects “banned unto the Lord,” which differs from the vow of dedication discussed in verses 2–8 only in so far that it is irredeemable, whilst verse 29 regulates the banning enacted by the law itself (Exod. xxii. 19), or pronounced by the court of justice on a man who is irrevocably to be put to death.

(30) And all the tithe of the land.—That is, of the soil, or what grows on it, in contradistinction to the tithes of the land mentioned in verse 32. The last things mentioned which cannot be dedicated to the Lord by a vow are tithes. Like the firstborn of animals (see verse 26), they already belong to God by another statute. A man, therefore, cannot vow to God what is not his own.

Whether of the seed of the land.—That is, what the seed when sown produced in the soil (Num. xviii. 21–24; Dext. xiv. 29). (31) And if a man will at all redeem.—Better, And if a man wishes to redeem. (See verses 13, 19.) Though a man may not vow tithes, being already the Lord’s, yet if he wishes he may redeem them by adding one-fifth to the actual value of them. According to the authorities during the second Temple, anyone was allowed to redeem the tithes due from another person by paying the exact value for them, without the addition of the fifth part. The tithes could then be eaten in any place, but the redemption money had to be taken to Jerusalem, where it was spent in sociable feasts, to which the Levite, the stranger, and the poor were invited.

(32) Whatsoever passeth under the rod.—That is, for the purpose of counting and tithing them. The manner in which this was done is described by the Jewish canonists as follows: “The owner is to gather all his lambs or all his calves into the fold and make a little door to it, so that two should not be able to go out at once. He is to place their dams without. As they bleat the lambs hear their voice and go out of the fold to meet them, as it is said, ‘whatsoever passeth under the rod’ (Lev. xxvii. 32), since it must pass of itself, and not be brought out by his hand. And as they come out of the fold one after another he counts them with the rod, one, two, three, etc., and the tenth which comes out, whether it be male or female, whether it be perfect or blemished, he marks it with a red mark, and says, ‘This is the tithe.’ ” It is to this custom that the prophet alludes when he says, “I will cause you to pass under the rod, and I will bring you into the bond of the covenant” (Ezek. xxvii. 37), that is, shall once more claim you, being marked as belonging to the Lord.

(33) He shall not search whether it be good or bad.—That is, the owner is not to pick out the good ones from the bad, but, as described above, is to mark every tenth one as it comes out of the fold as belonging to the Lord.

And if he change it at all.—See verse 19.

These are the commandments.—That is, the laws laid down in chap. xxvii. 1–34.

In Mount Sinai.—In the mountaneous district of Sinai. (See chap. xxxvi. 46.)
THE FOURTH BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED NUMBERS.
INTRODUCTION
TO
THE FOURTH BOOK OF MOSES, CALLED NUMBERS.

The appellation commonly given by the Jews to the fourth Book of the Pentateuch, as in the case of the titles of the other Books, is derived from one of the words which occur in the first verse of the first chapter—viz., benedict: "in the desert." The names given to it in the Greek, Latin, and English versions—viz., 'Aeodid, 'Numbers.—are derived from the account which it contains of the results of the census which was taken shortly after the Exodus, and of that which was taken at the expiration of the wanderings in the wilderness.

The contents of this book may be described as follows:

CHAPTERS I.1—X.10.

The preparations for the departure from Mount Sinai, and for the march into the land of Canaan: including (1) the numbering of the males of eleven tribes, from twenty years old and upwards, who were capable of bearing arms; (2) the numbering of the Levites, from one month old and upwards; (3) the numbering of the firstborn, and the substitution of the Levites for the firstborn; (4) the order of encampment and of the march; (5) the regulations for the preservation of order in the camp; (6) some additional legislation, either supplementary to, or explanatory of, that which is contained in the Books of Exodus and Leviticus; (7) the law of the Nazarites; (8) the form of priestly blessing; (9) the offerings for the service of the Tabernacle; (10) instructions concerning lighting the lamps of the golden candle-stick, the consecration of the Levites, and the respective ages at which they were to enter on the various parts of their service; (11) the celebration of the first Passover after the Exodus; (12) the appointment of the Passover of the second month; (13) the description of the miraculous guidance of the people; and (14) the directions respecting the use of the silver trumpets.

CHAPTERS X.11—XIV.45.

These chapters contain the account of (1) the departure of the Israelites from Sinai; (2) the order of the march; (3) the invitation of Moses to Hobab; (4) the watchwords of the march; (5) the murmurings of the people against God and against Moses; (6) the fire at Taberah; (7) the prophesying of Eldad and Medad; (8) the miraculous supply of quails; (9) the plague at Kibroth-hattaavah; (10) the insurrection of Miriam and Aaron against Moses, and the leprosy of Miriam; (11) the expedition of the spies into the land of Canaan, and their report; (12) the judgment denounced against the generation which was numbered at Sinai; and (13) the presumptuous attempt to enter Canaan by way of the Negeb, and the discomfiture at Hormah.

CHAPTERS XV.1—XIX.22.

These chapters contain (1) some legislative enactments which were to be held in abeyance during the sojourn in the wilderness, and which were to come into operation after the entrance into Canaan; (2) the account of the insurrection of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and the plague which followed upon it; (3) the miraculous confirmation of the Aaronic priesthood; (4) the regulations respecting the Levites; (5) the law for the purification of those who were defiled by contact with the dead, by means of the ashes of the red heifer.

CHAPTERS XX.1—XXV.18.

These chapters contain the account of (1) the abode in Kadesh-Barnea; (2) the second recorded miraculous supply of water; (3) the sentence pronounced against Moses and Aaron; (4) the refusal of the King of Edom to grant the Israelites a passage through his land; (5) the death of Aaron; (6) the expedition against the King of Edom; (7) the plague of the fiery serpents, and the construction and erection of the brazen serpent; (8) the march to Mount Pisgah; (9) the victory over Sihon, the King of the Amorites, and Og, the King of Bashan; (10) the history of Balak and Balaam; and (11) the plague at Shittim.

CHAPTERS XXVI.1—XXXVI.13.

These chapters contain the account of (1) the second census of the people; (2) the inheritance of the daughters of Zelophehad; (3) the consecration of Joshua; (4) the enlargement of the law respecting the two daily lambs and the Sabbath-day offerings; (5) the law respecting the vows of women; (6) the war against Midian; (7) the assignment of the land on the eastern side of the Jordan to the tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh; (8) a list of the encampments; (9) the renewed command concerning the expulsion of the Canaanites and the destruction of their idolatrous images; (10) the determination of the boundaries of the land, and the list of men appointed to distribute it; (11) the Levitical cities and the cities of refuge, and (12) laws respecting the tribal inheritance, and the limitation of the right of marriage in regard to heiresses.

THE CHRONOLOGY OF THE BOOK OF NUMBERS.

The period of time embraced in the Book of Numbers is clearly defined. The narrative begins with the command which was given to Moses to take a census of the people "on the first day of the second month, in the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt" (chap. i. 1). "The death of Aaron, as recorded in chap. xxxiii. 38, took place “in the fortieth year, after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the first day of the fifth month. The interval between these two events is exactly thirty-eight years and three months; and inasmuch as the last recorded events in the Book of Numbers took place on the eastern side of the Jordan, and the rehearsals of the law, as contained in the Book of Deuteronomy, took place in the beginning of the eleventh month of the fortieth year (Deut. i. 9), and the passage of the Jordan was effected under Moses on the tenth day of the first month of the following year (Josh. iv. 19), it will appear that the entire period embraced in the Book of Numbers is somewhat short of thirty-nine years.
NUMBERS.

Antiquity of the Book of Numbers.

The antiquity of this Book is proved by the numerous references which are found in the later books to the events which are recorded in it. The following will suffice by way of illustration:

(1) In Joshua i. 7 reference is made to the charge which Moses gave to Joshua by the commandment of the Lord (Num. xxvii. 23). It may be observed that the same Hebrew word which is here rendered “gave a charge,” is used also in Josh. i. 7, where it is rendered commanded.

(2) In Joshua ii. 10 we find a reference to the utter destruction of Sihon and Og, which is recorded in Numbers xxi. 24—35.

(3) In Joshua v. 6 we find a reference to the oath which the Lord sware that He would not show the land of promise to the men of war who came out of Egypt, and to the fact that all the men of war who came out of Egypt were consumed in the wilderness, “because they obeyed not the voice of the Lord.” In Numbers xiv. 28—32 we find the oath to which reference is made; and in Numbers xxvi. 63—65 we find a statement that at the later census there was not left a man of those who were numbered at the former census, save Joshua and Caleb. Nor is this all: for we find an agreement in the two accounts which is corroborative of the historical accuracy of both. It has been alleged as a discrepancy between the threat and its recorded accomplishment, that Eleazar, who acted as a priest shortly after the Exodus, and who was therefore, in all probability, upwards of twenty years of age at the first census, was not only engaged in making the second census, but is found amongst those who entered into the land of Canaan. On a closer examination, however, of the threat of exclusion, as recorded in the Book of Numbers, and its fulfilment, as recorded both in the Book of Numbers and in the Book of Joshua, it will be found to refer only to those who were enrolled at the first census taken at Sinai as men of war over twenty years of age, and consequently that the tribe of Levi, which was not included in that census, was not included in the sentence of extermination. In like manner, in Joshua v. 6, it is stated, not as it has been commonly supposed, that all the Israelites who were over twenty years of age perished in the wilderness, but “all the people that were men of war” —i.e., the “six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty,” who are expressly described in Numbers i. 46 as “all that were able to go forth to war in Israel.”

(4) The reference in Joshua xvii. 4 to the inheritance of the daughters of Zelophehad accords verbally with that contained in Numbers xxvii. 7. In the latter place Moses is said to have received a command to “give them a possession of an inheritance among their father’s brethren.” In the former place it is said that “according to the commandment of the Lord gave them an inheritance among the brethren of their father.”

(5) The reference to the Kenites in 1 Sam. xv. 6 not only derives elucidation from Numbers x. 29—32, but reflects light upon that passage. The result of the invitation which Moses gave to Hobab to accompany the Israelites on their march through the wilderness is not recorded in the Book of Numbers. We learn, however, from Judges i. 16 that “the children of the Kenite” accompanied the children of Judah into the wilderness of Judah; and in 1 Sam. xv. 6 Saul refers to the kindness which the Kenites showed to the children of Israel as a well-established fact.

(6) One of the most conclusive indications of the reception of the Book of Numbers by the later writers of Holy Scripture, as containing a true history of the events which are recorded in it, will be found in the incidental allusion to the order of the marches through the wilderness, which we find in Ps. lxxx. 2. “Before Ephraim and Benjamin and Manasseh stir up Thy strength, and come and save us.” This Psalm was manifestly composed, as it is implied in the first verse, whilst the Temple of Solomon was still standing, but subsequently to the separation of the kingdom in the time of Rehoboam. The combination of the tribes of Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, though partially explained by their common origin as descendants of Jacob by Rachel, presents upon the surface the obvious difficulty that Benjamin was attached to the southern, and Ephraim and Manasseh to the northern kingdom. A closer examination, however, of the Psalm, when elucidated by the order of the march, as prescribed in the second chapter of Numbers, will suffice to make the allusion of the Psalmist obvious. The reference in verse 1 is to the supernatural guidance of the hosts of Israel, and the mind of the writer would naturally revert to that period of the history of his people when Divine guidance was most needed and most manifestly displayed. Now we find from Numbers ii. 18—22, that during their encampments in the wilderness the three tribes here mentioned pitched together on the west side of the Tabernacle; and we find in verse 17 of the same chapter a direction which we are told (see Numbers x. 21, 22), was observed when the camp broke up and the Israelites commenced their journeys out of the wilderness of Sinai—viz., that the Tabernacle of the congregation was to set forward in such order that the eastern and southern camps were to precede it, and that the western camp, which, as we have seen, was composed of the three tribes here named, was to follow it. When, moreover, we hear in mind that the sacred Ark was commonly regarded and designated as the ark of God’s strength (Ps. cxxxii. 5), there can remain little doubt of the reference of the writer of Psalm lxxx. to the prescribed order of the encampment and to the marches through the wilderness, as recorded in the Book of Numbers. And the utterance to the prayer, “Before Ephraim and Benjamin and Manasseh stir up Thy strength and come and save us,”

(7) A few other references in the later Books to the Book of Numbers may be more briefly noticed.

(1) In 1 Sam. xv. 29 we find a quotation from Num. xxii. 19.

(2) In 1 Sam. xxx. 7, 8, and elsewhere, we find allusions to the mode of inquiry of the Lord, of which the first mention is found in Num. xxvii. 21.
In Ps. lxxviii. 16, there appears to be an allusion to the miraculous supply of water at Kadesh, as related in Num. xv. 7-11, the most rendered rock being zera, as in Numbers, not ser, as in Exod. xvi. 6. 4 In Jer. xlviii. 45, we find a reference to, or rather a quotation from, Num. xx. 23, and an obvious allusion to Num. xxiv. 17. 5 In Josh. xxii. 17, Ps. cxi. 23, and Hosea ix. 10, we find an allusion to the idolatrous abominations of Baal-peor, as recorded in Num. xxxv. 6. 6 In Obad. verses 4, 19, we find allusions to Num. xxiv. 18, 21.

The above will suffice as illustrations of references, which might be almost indefinitely multiplied, to the history of the Israelites, and to events connected with that history, as they are recorded in the Book of Numbers. It is scarcely too much to affirm that no inconsiderable portion of the contents of this Book might be recovered from the various references and allusions to it which are dispersed over the later Books of the Old Testament.

The Authorship of the Book of Numbers.

Much which has been said upon the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch generally applies with special force to the authorship of the Book of Numbers. One portion of this Book, viz. the description of the stations or encampments of the Israelites, as recorded in chap. xxxviii, is expressly ascribed to Moses in the following words: "And Moses wrote their going out according to their journeys, by the commandment of the Lord" (verse 2). Some of the legislative enactments which are found only in the Book of Numbers, or which are recapitulated in the Book of Deuteronomy, are expressly assigned to Moses in the Book of Joshua. Such, e.g., are the following: (1) the law that the Levites were to have no separate inheritance of land amongst the children of Israel (Josh. xiii. 14, 33; xiv. 3, 4, compared with Num. xviii. 20-24; Deut. x. 9; xiv. 27; xviii. 1, 2); but only cities to dwell in, with their suburbs taken out of the inheritance of the other tribes (Josh. xxi. 2, compared with Num. xxxv. 1-4); and (2) the assignment of the inheritance of the nine tribes and a half on the west of the Jordan, and of the two and a half on the east of the Jordan (Josh. xiv. 2, 3; xviii. 7, compared with Num. xxxvi. 55; xxxiii. 33, xxxiii. 54; xxxiv. 13).

The presumption thus afforded by the Book of Numbers was confirmed by Moses, is confirmed by the numerous indications which it contains that it is the work of a contemporary writer, who lived in the desert, and who was familiar with the history, customs, and institutions of Egypt. The minuteness of the details which the Book of Numbers contains respecting the order of the march through the wilderness, and the various incidents which occurred in the course of it, the remarkable manner in which the history and the legislation are interwoven, and more particularly the insertion of additional legislation arising out of the protracted wanderings in the desert (e.g., that contained in xix. 14), point to the conclusion that the writer of the Book was either an eye-witness of the scenes which he records, or a forger whose skill has been unequalled in after ages. The topographical notices, again, testify to an acquaintance with the history of Egypt (e.g., xiii. 22), and also with that of the surrounding nations, previously to the entrance into the land of Canaan (e.g., xvi. 19); whilst the allusions to Egyptian customs, provisions and institutions, and also to particular incidents of Egyptian history, are such as cannot, with any great amount of probability, be ascribed to any writer between the days of Moses and those of Solomon (e.g., xi. 5, 6, 7; xxv. 5-9; xxviii. 3; xxxviii. 6-8).

Again, the contrast between the general allusions to the topography of Canaan, such as might well have been obtained from traditional sources, or from the reports of the spies, as compared with the more minute descriptions given in the Book of Joshua, precisely corresponds with the recorded history of Moses. Thus, while in the Book of Joshua the boundaries of Canaan are expressed with great minuteness, in the Book of Numbers they are laid down in general terms § (comp. Josh. xv. with Num. xxxiv.). It may be observed further, that the fact that the boundaries assigned to the promised land were never actually realised, even in the days of David and of Solomon, affords a strong argument in support of the belief that the Books in which they are described were not written at the late period to which they are assigned by some modern critics, in which case the original assignment would naturally have been made to accord with the actual extent of the kingdom. It must be observed further, that the statistics of the Book of Numbers stop short of the death of Moses, and that the records of families are restricted to the Mosaic era. Thus, e.g., we read of the promise given to Phinehas and to his seed after him of an everlasting priesthood (xxv. 13), and we find mention of the part which Phinehas took in one of the latest expeditions in which Moses was engaged (xxxi. 6), but we must have recourse to the Books of Chronicles and of Ezra if we desire to obtain information concerning his descendants.

Objections to the Mosaic Authorship of the Book of Numbers.

It will be desirable in this place to notice some of the principal objections which have been urged against the historical accuracy, and the Mosaic authorship of, the Book of Numbers; premising only that these objections which rest upon passages in which Moses speaks as a prophet, not as a historian, do not fall within the scope of a work such as the present.

* The best coriander seed is said by Pliny to come from Egypt. See Smith's Pentateuch and its Authorship, &c., p. 319. p. 319.
† We find the prediction in Exod. xii. 12, "Against all the gods of Egypt will I execute judgment," but we find no express account of its fulfilment. The allusion in Num. xxxiii. 4, to the fulfilment of the prediction, shows that the writer understood how the plagues of Egypt had a direct bearing upon the superstitious objects of Egyptian worship. (See Smith's Pentateuch and its Authorship, pp. 222-223, and Canen Cook's notes on the plagues in The Speaker's Commentary.
§ The difference in the minutenesses with which the northern and southern boundaries of Canaan are described in the Book of Numbers, is deserving of notice; but the difference in the minutenesses with which the latter, which must have been the boundary lines to those who were for so many years in its vicinity, is described in the Book of Numbers and in that of Joshua, is yet more remarkable.
I.—The Account of the First Census.

The difficulties in the account of the census which was taken on the plain of Sinai, as it is related in Numbers 1, may be enumerated as follows:—

(1) The precise agreement in the number of Israelites above twenty years of age as recorded in this census, with the number which is recorded in Exod. xxxviii. 26, where the reference is to a transaction which probably took place about six or seven months previously.

(2) The fact that the numbers of the respective tribes are round numbers, and, with the exception of the tribe of Gad, which has a complete fifty, that all the numbers are in round hundreds.

It has been suggested, in regard to the first difficulty, that there is nothing impossible in the fact that the number of the Israelites should not have been diminished by deaths in the course of six or seven months. This supposition, however, independently of its improbability, does not meet the real difficulty, inasmuch as there must in all probability have been many at the later date who had completed their twentieth year who could not have been included in the census of those who were twenty years old and upwards, which was taken six or seven months previously. The supposition that the number of those who died in the course of the following six or seven months was exactly equal to the number of those who attained their twentieth year in the interval, is equally improbable with the supposition that no deaths occurred in the interval; and, in any case, the difficulty attending the round numbers, on the supposition that they represent accurately the results of two distinct censuses, taken at two distinct periods, is one which, in the absence of any indication of miraculous agency, seems to be insuperable.

Both of the difficulties, however, which have been stated above, vanish, or may in any case be regarded as capable of a satisfactory solution, if it be admitted that it was one and the same census to which reference is made in the Book of Exodus and in that of Numbers.

The following reasons may be assigned for the belief that there was only one general census taken in the plain of Sinai:—

(1) The time occupied in taking the census, which is recorded in 2 Sam. xxiv., viz., nine months and twenty days—suggests the inference that a complete census of the population, even in the time of Moses, must have occupied some considerable time.

(2) No adequate reason can be assigned for the necessity of a second census within six or seven months of a previous census.

(3) It is obvious, from the agreement of the numbers, that the tribe of Levi, which, we are expressly told, was not included in the census recorded in Numbers (see Num. i. 48, 49, ii. 33), was not included in the census to which reference is made in Exod. xxxviii., where no such exception is mentioned, and no allusion is made to the subsequent command to number the males of the tribe of Levi from one month and upwards.

And, further, whereas the atonement number is expressly mentioned in Exod. xxxvii., no allusion is made to it in Num. i.

(4) We find reference made in Num. xxvi. 64, 65, to two numbering only, viz., that which was taken on the plains of Sinai and that which was taken in the steppes of Moab, from which fact it seems reasonable to infer that two numberings only of the people were made.

Now, since the atonement money which was paid at the numbering recorded in Exod. xxxvii. was used in the construction of the Tabernacle, it is obvious that that money must have been paid previously to the first day of the first month of the year after the Exodus, at which time the Tabernacle was erected. Inasmuch, however, as the census was thus directly connected with the Tabernacle; and the census of the Levites, and also that of the firstborn, both of which were made previously to the twentieth day of the second month, in the year after the Exodus (Num. x. 11), and included all who were one month old and upwards, may probably supposed to have included all who were born during the first month after the erection of the Tabernacle, and who were consequently a month old and upwards on the first day of the second month of the year after the Exodus (Num. iii. 15, 40); a reasonable probability arises that the day of the erection of the Tabernacle was that which was regarded in every case as the day by reference to which the age of the Israelites was to be ascertained and recorded. The census of the males of the several tribes, from twenty years old and upwards, being taken with reference to military service, would naturally be made in companies, which companies probably consisted of fifty or a hundred; and inasmuch as the number was taken of necessity some time previously to the erection of the Tabernacle (the atonement money being required, as already stated, for the service of the Tabernacle), it was impossible to ascertain with minute accuracy the number of those who would be alive on the day at which the Tabernacle was to be set up; and hence the odd numbers in excess of the last fifty or a hundred of those who would have completed their twentieth year at the erection of the Tabernacle, or of whose birthdays no record had been kept during the bondage in Egypt, may have been set over against the probable diminutions by death during the interval, and omitted from the sum total of each tribe. It is impossible to determine accurately the precise details which were obtained at the earlier and at the later enumeration. The amount of silver received at the earlier period sufficed to determine the number of those who paid, every man his half shekel. It is reasonable to suppose that the names of those who paid the half shekel were duly registered, and probably under their respective tribes, although there is no record of the number of each tribe in Exodus. Such a registration would naturally form the basis of the more complete census described in Numbers i., in which every man who was enrolled, not only under his own tribe, but according to the two subdivisions of the tribes into "families" and "fathers' houses," according to the "number of names" included in the earlier registration. Other particulars may or may not have been included in the later registration, but if the supposition be correct that the object of the census was to associate the people with the Tabernacle, as the dwelling-place of Jehovah, it is reasonable to suppose that the same day—viz., the day of the erection of the Tabernacle—was that to which reference was made alike in the earlier and in the later registration.

In regard to the round numbers of the tribes at the later registration in the plains of Moab—which in all are recorded in tens, and all, except the tribe of Reuben, in hundreds—it is reasonable to suppose that, as on the former occasion, the registration took place in military companies of tens, fifties, or hundreds. And inasmuch as during the disbandment of the people, after their first arrival at Kadesh-Barnna, it is probable that no exact registration of births was kept, it is not unreasonable to suppose that the odd numbers were disregarded, or rather set off against the number of those whose ages could not be precisely ascertained.

It remains only that some reasonable account be given of the round number of the Levites—viz., 22,000, and of the discrepancy between the sum total and the amount of the numbers of the three families of the Kohathites, Gershonites, and Merarites, when taken separately—viz., 22,300. One solution which has been proposed of the discrepancy of the numbers mentioned in the notes—viz., the probability that it has its origin in an error of transcription. Another proposed solution is, that some of the Levites must themselves have been firstborn, and as such could not be exchanged for the firstborn of the other tribes. The number of 300, may, it has been thought, have represented the number of Levites who were themselves firstborn; whilst in the absence of a more probable suggestion, the round numbers, both of the three families, taken separately, and of the sum total of 22,000, may be accounted for in a similar manner to that in which the round numbers of the other tribes have been explained—viz., that as the other tribes were probably registered in military companies of fifties and hundreds, so the Levites were registered in similar companies, with a view to their service in the Sanctuary; a service which is described by the Hebrew word zaba, which means wage-fore (Num. iv. 35).

The difficulty of accounting for the round numbers in the case of the Levites is increased by the fact that the time at which they were numbered is not specified. The injunction that the Levites were not to be numbered amongst the children of Israel (Num. i. 49), implies that their census followed that of the other tribes, but it does not clearly appear whether it preceded or followed the erection of the Tabernacle. The place in which the enumeration is recorded—viz., the Third chapter of Numbers, might seem to favour the latter supposition; but inasmuch as the command respecting Aaron and his sons, which is recorded in the same chapter (v. 10), was given previously to the erection of the Tabernacle (See Exodus, xxviii. 1), it is obvious that no certain inference respecting the time at which the injunction was given can be drawn from the place in which it is recorded. The case appears to stand thus. A command was given to Moses at the time of the Exodus to sanctify to the Lord the first-born males of man and beast (Exod. xii. 1. 2). This command appears, from Exod. xii. 11–13, to have been given with a prospective reference to the land of Canaan, and consequently not to have come at once into operation. But when, at the expiration of the year of the Exodus, the people were still found in the wilderness, God was pleased to give some additional commands, in virtue of which the law assumed a retrospective character. The cattle of the Levites, as has been already stated, appear to have been taken as an equivalent for the firstborn cattle of the other tribes, which had been born during the preceding year. It remained that a similar arrangement should be made in regard to the firstborn of men. Some of these firstborn, both of the Levites and of the other tribes, must in all probability have died during the year, of whom no exact account may have been kept. An exact census appears to have been taken of the actual number of the firstborn then living, which was found to be 22,273. The Levites, whose sum, taken in round numbers, amounted to 22,000, were accepted as an equivalent for the same number of firstborn, the odd numbers being probably set over against those of the firstborn who had died during the year, and who, consequently, had been unredeemed. A sum of five shekels an apiece was exacted as the redemption price of the surplus of the firstborn, and may, as it has been conjectured, have been levied on the parents of the youngest children; or the total amount may have been raised by a tax uniformly imposed upon the parents of all the firstborn; and from that time the sum of five shekels appears to have been exacted as the redemption price of each firstborn son.

11.—The Number of the Firstborn.

A second objection to the historical accuracy of the narrative contained in the Book of Numbers is based upon the alleged disproportion between the number of the firstborn males, viz. 22,273, and that of the entire number of the males, which is estimated at about nine hundred thousand or one million, a proportion which may be represented roughly as that of one to forty or forty-four. The fact that this disproportion exists in a narrative which affords abundant evidence of accurate computation, suggests the inference that the objection is apparent rather than real. Two solutions of the difficulty appear to be specially entitled to consideration. The first is, that the command contained in Exodus xiii. 2, respecting the sanctification of the firstborn was prospective, and that the census of the firstborn comprised only those who were born between the date of the Exodus and the beginning of the first month of the year which followed it. The second is, that the census included only the firstborn amongst those who were under twenty years of age at the time at which the general census was taken. In support of the former, and, as it should seem, the more probable of these solutions, much stress may be fairly laid upon the similar mode of reckoning the firstborn of the cattle. It is reasonable to suppose that the command to sanctify, or set apart for the Divine service, the firstborn of the cattle must have been designed to be of prospective, not retrospective, operation. This reasonable supposition is strongly corroborated by the fact that the cattle of the Levites was taken in exchange for the firstborn of the cattle of all the Israelites belonging to the other tribes. Now the male Levites of all ages bore nearly the same proportion as the firstborn of the sons of the Israelites to the entire number of the males of the other tribes. If then we assume that the cattle possessed by the Levites, previously to the time of their selection for the service of the Tabernacle, was not disproportionate to their numbers, it will follow that about one in forty-five was given as an equivalent for the firstborn of the cattle belonging to the whole of the other tribes. This was probably an approximate equivalent for the firstborn cattle which had been born during the preceding twelve or thirteen months, but was obviously a number wholly disproportionate to the entire number of firstborn of the cattle possessed by the Israelites.

The obvious difficulty which arises in regard to this view is, that the number, 22,273, instead of being too small, appears to be much larger than that of the firstborn sons who were likely to have been born during the eleven and a half months after the Exodus. It may be fairly urged, however, in answer to this objection—

It is not improbable that the cattle of the Levites was below rather than above the average of the cattle possessed by the other tribes. At a later period, two of the other tribes, the Levites and the Gadites, are said to have possessed much more cattle (See Num. xxxi. 1, 4; Deut. iii. 19). It is quite possible, however, that this may have been the result, exclusively, of the recent wars in which they had been engaged.
tion, that the circumstances of the Israelites at the close of their period of bondage in Egypt, would be such as naturally to diminish to a great extent the number of marriages; whilst, on the other hand, the natural result of their deliverance from bondage would be to increase the rate of marriages much beyond the ordinary average. Under exceptionally favourable circumstances, there is no insuperable difficulty in the supposition that the number of firstborn sons in the course of nearly twelve months, out of a population of about two million, should amount to a number even greater than that which is recorded in Num. iii. 43; and if, as some maintain, the eldest son, whether a daughter had or had not been born previously, was in every case included amongst the firstborn, the objection which has been stated loses much, if not all, of its weight. In regard to the second solution of the difficulty—viz., that the number of the firstborn sons includes only those who were under twenty years of age at the Exodus, and who had not been included in the earlier census—it may be urged—

(1) That the phraseology employed—"Number the firstborn of the males of (or belonging to) the children of Israel" (Num. iii. 40)—appears to refer to those who, like the Levites, had not been numbered already, and not to the "children of Israel" themselves, who had been already numbered, and who had already paid the half shekel, "every man a ransom for his soul" (Exod. xxx. 12).

(2) That the judgment inflicted upon the Egyptians appears to have been limited to the lowest generation, and not to have included father, grandfather, and great-grandfather, when such happened to be themselves firstborn sons. The same rule must, in all probability, have applied to the cattle. Otherwise, the distinctive character of the judgment could not have been equally apparent; as it is unreasonable to suppose that any record was kept of first births in the case of cattle which had arrived at maturity. The case is well stated by Professor Birks, in the following words:—

"The Levites 22,000, and the firstborn 22,273, are nearly equal to one-fortieth of the probable total of males in the twelve tribes, for one-fortieth of 900,000 is 22,500. This, at first sight, requires in every family, or for each mother, the enormous and incredible amount of forty sons and forty daughters. But the true comparison is with non-adult males under twenty years; and this reduces the number to thirteen and one-third of each sex. Again, it is firstborn males, and not eldest sons who had an elder sister, which alone are numbered; and this reduces the number to one-half, or six and two-thirds of either sex. But the mean number of children who survive at all the ages from 0 to 20, compared with the births, are two-thirds. Hence the probably surviving firstborn would be two-thirds for the whole period, and the number of sons and daughters in each family is reduced to four and four-ninths, only with the condition that those who died in infancy are not reckoned." (The Exodus of Israel, p. 75, 2nd edition, 1863.)

III.—The Results of the Earlier and Later Censuses.

Another objection which has been urged against the historical accuracy of the Book of Numbers is based upon a comparison of the results of the census which was taken in Sinai (Num. ii.), and that which was taken after the lapse of more than thirty-eight years, on the plains of Moab (Num. xxvi.).

The following table will show the increase or decrease in each tribe:

<table>
<thead>
<tr>
<th>Tribe</th>
<th>First Census</th>
<th>Second Census</th>
</tr>
</thead>
<tbody>
<tr>
<td>Reuben</td>
<td>45,500</td>
<td>43,729</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Simeon</td>
<td>50,300</td>
<td>22,500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Gad</td>
<td>45,650</td>
<td>46,500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Judah</td>
<td>71,560</td>
<td>97,593</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Issachar</td>
<td>84,400</td>
<td>61,360</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Zebulon</td>
<td>60,500</td>
<td>60,500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Ephraim</td>
<td>49,500</td>
<td>32,500</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Manasseh</td>
<td>37,320</td>
<td>56,720</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Benjamin</td>
<td>45,500</td>
<td>36,600</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Dan</td>
<td>62,710</td>
<td>61,400</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Asher</td>
<td>41,400</td>
<td>53,100</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Naphtali</td>
<td>43,800</td>
<td>45,610</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>Levi</td>
<td>605,550</td>
<td>601,730</td>
</tr>
<tr>
<td>数: 1</td>
<td>22,000</td>
<td>23,000</td>
</tr>
</tbody>
</table>

(Num. iii. 39, compared with Num. xxvi. 62.)

It might, indeed, at first sight appear as though the remarkable increase of the Israelites in the land of Egypt would warrant the expectation of an increase of a somewhat corresponding character during the sojourn in the wilderness. It will appear, however, on a closer examination of the history, not only that the general results of the census, but also that in some cases the specific results in regard to some of the tribes, afford a strong confirmation of the general truth of the facts recorded in the Books of Exodus and Numbers.

In the first place, it must be remembered that the judgment of total extinction, with only two exceptions, was denounced against the males of all the tribes (except that of Levi), who were upwards of twenty years of age at the Exodus—i.e., of all those who were included in the first census. And inasmuch as this sentence was pronounced, and began to be executed, at an early period of the wanderings in the wilderness—i.e., at the time of the return of the spies (Num. xiv. 29), the result must necessarily have been a great diminution in the number of the next generation. But it is not so much in comparison of the total numbers, included respectively in the earlier and the later census, as in that of the respective numbers of the individual tribes, that we trace a correspondence between the allusions to these tribes, whether prophetic or historical, which we find in the Books of Genesis and of Numbers, and the results of the census. Thus, e.g., by far the most striking decrease in numbers is observed in the case of the tribe of Simeon, which numbered at the later census little more than one-third of its amount at the first census. The case of the tribe of Levi, in which the total increase of males from one month old and upward was only 1,900, is almost if not quite as remarkable, more especially if it is borne in mind that that tribe does not appear to have been included in the general sentence of extermination of the males who were above twenty years of age at the Exodus. Looking back, however, to Gen. xlix. 5—7, we find Simeon and Levi associated in the prediction "I will divide them in Jacob, and scatter them in Israel." Again, in Num. xxv, we find that Zimri, the son of Sain, who took a prominent part in the idolatrous and lascivious revel of Balak's feast, was "the prince of a chief house among the Simeonites"; and hence it is not unreasonable to assume that a large number of the same tribe were concerned in that apostasy. Some indication of the tendency of this tribe to intermixture with foreign elements, and hence to the dispersion which was predicted in the prophecy of Jacob, is not wanting; for we find in Gen. xlii. 10, notice of the "son of a Canaanish woman," among the descendants of Simeon. Now, the laws which regulated the tribal relations were not given until the expiration of the wanderings in the wilderness, and consequently changes in those relations may have tended to a greater diminution of the tribe of Simeon than of any other tribe. Nor is it unworthy of notice that we find in 1 Chron. iv. 27 a passing allusion to the fact that the brethren of one of the heads of the tribe of Simeon—viz., Shime—a had not many children, "neither," it is added, "did all their family multiply, like to the children of Judah." A strong confirmation of the actual fact of the paucity of numbers of the tribe of Simeon is found in Joshua xix. 9, where we find that the inheritance of the children of Simeon was taken "out of the portion of the children of Judah," because the part of the land which had been assigned to Judah was found to be "too much for them."

As regards the tribe of Levi, we find (1) that the two elder sons of Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, died childless (Num. iii. 4); and (2) we gather from the fact that the sons of Korah are expressly said not to have died with their father (Num. xxvi. 11), that a large number of the Levites who joined in the insurrection against Moses and Aaron (Num. xvi.) perished at that time. The diminution of the Reubenites may also be accounted for by the participation of the three Reubenites—Dathan, Abiram, and On—and probably of a large number of the adherents belonging to the same tribe, in the conspiracy of Korah, and in the signal punishment by which that conspiracy was avenged.

IV.—The Support of Life in the Wilderness.

Another objection which has been raised against the historical truth of the Book of Numbers, is based upon the alleged impossibility of supporting the life of nearly two millions of people and their cattle for forty years in the Sinaitic peninsula. This objection may be met in different ways; but it is probable that a full solution of the difficulty is to be found only in a more accurate acquaintance than is now possible to obtain of the physical conditions of the country at the time of the Exodus. It may be observed, however, that if by the wilderness of Sinai we understand only the district in the immediate neighbourhood of Mount Sinai, the residence of the Israelites within that district must be reduced from forty years to about fourteen or fifteen months. Nor is it unworthy of notice that we find in which the thirty-eight years of the wanderings were spent, the mode of life which was adopted by the Israelites, and the number of cattle which they possessed, we know extremely little. And again, although it may be fairly alleged that the miraculous supplies of food and water were neither required nor bestowed to the extent which some have alleged, it must not be forgotten that the miraculous elements of the history are closely interwoven into its entire fabric; and hence, whilst it is open to unbelievers to deny the historical truth of the whole of the history, the impossibility of the sustenance of life, both in regard to the people and the cattle, without miraculous intervention, so far from furnishing any argument against the account which is given in the Book of Numbers, must rather be regarded as an indication of the high claim that the history is which miraculous intervention is alleged both to have been required, and also to have been vouchsafed.

It may be observed, moreover, generally, that nothing can be more uncertain than deductions as to the resources of any country, based upon evidence obtained more than three thousand years after the occurrence of the events to which the inquiry has reference. In regard to the particular region in question, we possess information which warrants the inference that its physical condition has undergone great and important changes. The conclusive evidence which exists that the population of the Sinaitic peninsula was at one time considerable, warrants the inference that its capabilities for the support of life must have been proportionate to the number of its inhabitants. It admits of no doubt that the mines, of which traces still remain, could not have been worked without the consumption of a large amount of fuel; neither could the Israelites have encamped for many months in the district without the destruction of a considerable quantity of the trees and brushwood, on which the amount of rain and its absorption so greatly depend. We have further evidence that water and pasturage still exist at many of those places at which we have reasons to believe that the Israelites encamped. Thus, e.g., the plain at the foot of Mount Sinai, which is represented by Dr. Colenso as "one of the most desolate parts of the whole peninsula," is described by Dean Stanley as one of the "chief centres of vegetation in the whole peninsula."† It may be observed further, in regard to the region which was occupied by the Israelites during the protracted period of the wanderings, that we possess no definite information as to the precise spots which their encampments occupied, or the extent of space over which they were dispersed.

When all these circumstances are taken into account, in conjunction with the distinct statements which the Books of Exodus, Numbers and Deuteronomy contain respecting the miraculous supplies which the Israelites received, it will follow that there is no difficulty involved in the alleged sustentation of life during forty years in the wilderness which does not admit of a reasonable solution, provided only that the miraculous elements, which are essentially interwoven into the history, be not rejected on the ground of their inherent incredibility.

V.—Alleged Inconsistencies in the Laws respecting Tithes.

A more plausible ground of objection to the historical truth of the Book of Numbers arises out of the difficulty of reconciling the various and apparently conflicting laws which are found in it and in the Books of Leviticus and Deuteronomy, respecting the tithes and other offerings of the Israelites, and their apportionment amongst the Priests, the Levites, the owners, and the poor. Some light has been thought to be thrown upon this subject by the usage of the Jews in later times. Independently, however, of the amount of uncertainty which attaches to the late interpretation of the Mosaic legislation generally, sufficient consideration does not appear to have been given to the two following points—viz., (1) What portion of these laws was applicable only to the wilderness? and (2) Did the laws which, as originally delivered, have reference to the land of Canaan undergo some later modification or amplification? It is obvious that if some of the laws had reference only to the wilderness, and, still further, if those laws may have undergone some further amplification, and possibly some modification, no advance inferences respecting the historical truth of the Books in which those laws are contained can fairly be deduced from the diversities which have been observed, unless it can be shown that they exist in laws which were obvious be It has come the described consumed, and not and Deuteronomy support obvious, the such infer will the supposition evidence of to the whole same with their in place, remaining flocks and Levites, paid in Exodus Lord." — owner Sanctuary. Widow, oil produced, and the Levites, and that they were dependent upon the feasts to which they were to be invited at certain seasons of the first and second year, and upon the portion which might fall to their lot in the third year. It may, indeed, be fairly regarded as an open question whether the tithes of the third year were in lieu of, or were supplementary to, the second tithes of the first and second years; which (or their equivalent in money) were consumed at the Sanctuary. In the absence, as it should seem, of any direct information on this point, all that can be alleged with confidence is, that on the first and second of each of the triennial periods the tenth of the premedic produce (and perhaps of the herds and flocks), was to be set apart for the maintenance of the Priests and Levites; and that a second tenth of the produce of the field, and also the firstlings of the flock, were appointed to be consumed by the owner and his family, together with the Levites, at the Sanctuary; and that on the third year, either (as some think) in addition to these two tenths, or (as others maintain) in lieu of the second tenth, a tenth of the premedic produce was to be laid up in the cities in which the people lived, and to be consumed by the poor and friendless, together with the Levites. On the seventh year the land was to rest, and the law of tithes would necessarily be in abeyance.

---

† Sinai and Palestine, p. 19.

We now proceed to take notice of some few additional passages or expressions which have been adduced as inconsistent with the Mosaic authorship of the Book of Numbers.

1. It has been inferred from the words which occur in chap. xv. 32—"While the children of Israel were in the wilderness," that they were no longer in the wilderness when the incident which is there recorded was committed to writing, and, consequently, that Moses was not the author of this portion of the narrative. It might suffice to reply to this objection, that inasmuch as Moses lived to conduct the Israelites into the steppes of Moab, there is nothing inconsistent with the Mosaic authorship in the place where the first mention is made of a certain incident happened while the people were still in the wilderness. There may, however, have been another and a special reason for the insertion of these words. The punishment of death, though not the mode of its infliction, had already been denounced against those who should violate the Sabbath (Exod. xxii. 14, 15). It is obvious, however, that much of the legislation which is contained in the Book of Exodus (See e.g., chap. xxii., xxiii.), was not designed to come into operation until after the entrance into the land of Canaan; and so, likewise, in regard to some of the legislation contained in the fifteenth chapter of the Book of Numbers, in which the incident of the man who gathered sticks on the Sabbath is recorded, it is expressly stated that it has reference to the land whither God was about to bring his people (verse 11). It is not unreasonable, therefore, to infer that the uncertainty which existed in the minds of Moses and of the congregation as to the punishment which should be inflicted on the Sabbath-breaker, may have arisen from the fact that the violation of the law took place in the wilderness, and that the same reason may be assigned why a prominent place is given in the narrative to the fact that the people were still "in the wilderness" when this incident occurred.

4. There are other passages which have been alleged as inconsistent with the Mosaic authorship of the Book of Numbers; which may have been inserted at a later period, or which are capable of explanation which is consistent with the supposition that they proceeded from the pen of Moses. Such, e.g., is Num. xiii. 3: "Now the man Moses was very meek, above all the men which were upon the face of the earth." It is quite possible that these words may have been inserted by Ezra or some other reviser of the Book of Numbers; or, as it is stated in the Note upon this passage, the word rendered meek and "afflicted or oppressed. There is, however, no necessity for the adoption of either of these suppositions on the part of those who believe that Moses wrote by the inspiration of the Holy Ghost. If St. Paul, writing under the influence of the same Divine guidance, could speak of himself both as "the chief of sinners" (1 Tim. i. 15), and also as "not a whit behind the very chiefest Apostles" (2 Cor. xi. 5), it may well be that the same Moses who recorded the sentence of exclusion from the land of Canaan which was pronounced upon his own unbelief (Num. xx. 12), may have been inwardly moved by the Spirit to record also his possession, in an eminent degree, of that virtue, the reward of which has been declared by our Lord to be the future inheritance of the earth (St. Matt. v. 5).

(5) Another objection to the historical truth of the narrative contained in the Book of Numbers is based upon the alleged insufficiency of the time which is allotted to the transactions of the fourth period. It is urged that the events which are said to have transpired between the death of Aaron, which took place on the first day of the fifth month in that year, and the death of Ong, the king of Bashan, must have occupied a space of at least six months, and that we are thus brought to the beginning of the eleventh month, the time at which Moses is said to have addressed the assembled hosts of Israel on the plains of Moab (Deut. i. 3). No room, it is alleged, is left for a number of other events which are said to have taken place between these limits—e.g., the march to the plains of Moab, the messages sent to Balaam, the depredations of the Midianites, the slaughter of the people of Shittim, and the plague which destroyed 24,000, the second census, and the Midianite war. It appears, however, upon examination, that the time allotted to the several events which happened during these six months is, with one exception, purely arbitrary. The single exception is the period of mourning which ensued upon the death of Aaron—viz., one month. There is no evidence, however, that the whole of the Israelitish army abstained from action during this period; and it is probable that both the attack of the king of Arad and his discomfiture may have taken place within a very few days after the death of Aaron. The events which followed may have taken place in rapid succession, and in some cases simultaneously.

Professors Birks and McCaul, by opposing conjecture to conjecture have shown that the whole may have been accomplished within the specified period; and the latter, by reference to the extraordinary results of the battle of Jena, has shown that such conjectures "concerning the possible and probable rapidity of Israelitish conquest, are confirmed by historic facts within the personal knowledge of many still living."

No Introduction to the Book of Numbers would be complete which failed to notice the peculiar proofs of its Divine inspiration which arise out of the typical occurrences which are related in it. These occurrences are, in some respects, even more remarkable, and more beyond the range of invention, than the symbolism of the ceremonial ordinances of the Levitical law. It is impossible to read, with candour and with attention, the account of the march of the Israelites through the wilderness, the miraculous guidance vouchsafed to them by the pillar of cloud and of fire, the invitation of Moses to Hohab, the miraculous supply of manna and of water, the expedition of the spies, the rash and abortive attempt to enter the land of Canaan, the repeated provocations in the wilderness, and the consequent exclusion from the land of promise of those who were included in the Sinaitic census, the intercession of Aaron as he stood between the living and the dead, the history of the fiery serpents and of the brazen serpent, the death of Moses and the appointment of Joshua as his successor, and lastly, the appointment of the cities of refuge—it is impossible, it may be affirmed, to read these in a candid spirit and not to be struck with the remarkable types and foreshadowing which these events contain of the spiritual realities of the Christian life, and the impossibility either of the accidental occurrence of events which present so many points of spiritual correspondence, or of the arbitrary invention of such a chain of historical circumstances, even at the latest period to which certain modern critics have assigned the composition of the Book of Numbers.

LITERATURE.

The following list contains some of the most valuable contributions to the critical and exegetical exposition of the Book of Numbers, which are either written in the English language or which have been translated into English. Of them many have been consulted, and valuable aid has been derived from them, in the composition of the present Commentary.—Keil on The Pentateuch, 3 vols., T. and T. Clark, Edinburgh, 1864; Bishop Wordsworth’s Commentary on the Bible, part iii., Rivingtons, 1865; The Speaker’s Commentary, vol. ii., J. Murray, 1871; Lange’s Commentary on the Old Testament, vol. iii., T. and T. Clark, Edinburgh (no date); Patrick Lowth and Whitby on The Old and New Testament, 4 vols., imp. 8vo, Tegg, 1844; A Practical and Explanatory Commentary on the Old Testament, by the Rev. Robert Jamieson, D.D., imp. 4to, London, Virtue and Co.

Much valuable information may be obtained from the following works, which bear more or less fully upon the elucidation of the Book of Numbers. Some of them, however, and more particularly that of Bleek, must be consulted with much caution.—The Historic Character of the Pentateuch Vindicated, Skeffington, 1863; The Mosaic Origin of the Pentateuch Considered, Skeffington, 1864; The Book of Moses, or the Pentateuch, in its Authorship, Credibility, and Civilisation, by the Rev. W. Smith, Ph.D., vol. i., Longmans, 1868; The Exodus of Israel, by the Rev. T. R. Birks, M.A., Rector of Kelshall, Herts, Second Ed., 1863; Hengstenberg on The Geniusness of the Pentateuch, translated by Ryland, J. D. Lowe, Edinburgh, 2 vols., 8vo, 1847; Hävernick’s Historico-Critical Introduction to the Pentateuch, translated by Thompson, T. and T. Clark, Edinburgh, 1850; Bleek’s Introduction to the Old Testament, translated by Venables, 2 vols., 8vo, Bell and Daldy, 1869.
CHAPTER I. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the tabernacle of the congregation, on the first day of the second month, in the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt, saying, (2) "Take ye the sum of all the congregation of the children of Israel, after their families, by the house of their fathers, with the number of their names, every male by their polls; (3) from twenty years old and upward, all that are able to go forth to war in Israel: thou and Aaron shall number them by their armies. (4) And with you there shall be a man of every tribe; every one head of the house of his fathers.

(5) And these are the names of the men

(1) In the tabernacle of the congregation.—The tabernacle of the congregation, or tent of meeting, so called because it was there that God met with Moses (chap. xxvii. 4; Ex. xxv. 22), had been set up one month previously (Ex. xl. 17), nearly a year after the exodus.

(2) After their families.—The family or clan, mishpahah, included several fathers' houses (see Kurtz's Hist. of the Old Covenant, ii., pp. 8-10).

With the number of their names.—Better, according to the number of names. The reference is probably to the previous numbering recorded in Ex. xxx. 12. There is no corresponding clause in the account of the later numbering in chap. xxvi. 2.

By their polls,—i.e., man by man. The word gulyothl denotes a man's head, or skull. Cf. Matt. xxvii. 33.

(3) From twenty years old and upward.—The result of the previous numbering (Ex. xxx. 12, xxxviii. 20), which was made about six months earlier, and which was probably obtained by counting the number of half-shekels which were paid, as Litham appears to have done (Ex. xxxviii. 2), exactly corresponds with the result of the present census (verse 46). But the complete census, or numbering and enrolment of the persons according to tribes, families, and fathers' houses, appears to have been deferred until after the erection of the tabernacle, towards the construction of which the atonement money had been paid. If the whole was done in obedience to the command contained in Ex. xxx. 12, and was regarded as one transaction, those only would be numbered on the second occasion who had already paid their atonement money. There is nothing impossible in the supposition that the whole of those who had been numbered six months previously were still alive, but no allowance is made, on this supposition, for the number of those who were below twenty years of age at the earlier period, and who had exceeded that age at the later period. Inasmuch, however, as the sum-total in both cases is divisible by ten, and inasmuch as the separate items in this chapter are given in tens (the smallest subdivision of the people which was adopted by Moses, on the recommendation of Jethro, Ex. xviii. 21), no objection to the historical accuracy of both records can be sustained if it be allowed that the number of those who had attained the age of twenty years since the earlier census corresponded nearly with the number of deaths during the same period. The whole of the objection, however, is removed in a far more satisfactory manner by the supposition that there was only one census. (See the Introduction.)

By their armies.—Better, their hosts or companies.

(4) Of every tribe.—Or, for every tribe.

Every one head.—The words may be rendered every one a head. There were many heads of fathers' houses in each tribe; but it appears from verse 16 (chap. vii. 10, 11) that in each case the tribal prince was selected to preside over the census.

(5) Of the tribe of Reuben.—Hebrew, for Reuben.

(6) The renowned of the congregation.—Lit., the called men of the congregation, i.e., the men chosen as representatives of their respective tribes, and appointed
And Moses and Aaron took these men which are expressed by their names: (18) and they assembled all the congregation together on the first day of the second month, and they declared their pedigrees after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, by their polls.

As the Lord commanded Moses, so he numbered them in the wilderness of Sinai.

And the children of Reuben, Israel's eldest son, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, by their polls, every male from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (21) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Reuben, were forty and six thousand and five hundred.

Of the children of Simeon, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, those that were numbered of them, according to the number of the names, by their polls, every male from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (22) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Simeon, were fifty and nine thousand and three hundred.

Of the children of Gad, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (23) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Gad, were forty and five thousand six hundred and fifty.

Of the children of Judah, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (27) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Judah, were threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred.

Of the children of Issachar, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (29) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Issachar, were fifty and four thousand and four hundred.

Of the children of Zebulun, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (31) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Zebulun, were fifty and seven thousand and four hundred.

Of the children of Joseph, namely, of the children of Ephraim, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (33) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Ephraim, were forty thousand and five hundred.

Of the children of Manasseh, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (35) those that were numbered to their father's house. The importance of this enrolment, as affording the means of tracing the genealogy of Christ, must not be overlooked.

According to the number of the names.—The words are the same as in verse 2, and should be rendered in the same manner.

By their generations.—The toledoth, or generations, included the whole of the descendants of the head of the tribe (Gen. v. 1, vi. 9).

Threescore and fourteen thousand and six hundred.—The superiority of Judah in point of numbers over all the other tribes deserves notice in connection with the blessing pronounced on that tribe by Jacob in Gen. xlix. 8: "Thou art he whom thy brethren shall praise." In like manner it should be of them, even of the tribe of Manasseh, were thirty and two thousand and two hundred.

(36) Of the children of Benjamin, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (37) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Benjamin, were thirty and five thousand and four hundred.

(38) Of the children of Dan, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (39) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Dan, were threescore and two thousand and seven hundred.

(40) Of the children of Asher, by their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (41) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Asher, were forty and one thousand and five hundred.

(42) Of the children of Naphtali, throughout their generations, after their families, by the house of their fathers, according to the number of the names, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war; (43) those that were numbered of them, even of the tribe of Naphtali, were fifty and three thousand and four hundred.

(44) These are those that were numbered, which Moses and Aaron numbered, and the princes of Israel, being twelve men: each one was for the house of his fathers. (45) So were all those that were numbered of the children of Israel, by the house of their fathers, from twenty years old and upward, all that were able to go forth to war in Israel; (46) even all they that were numbered were six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty.

(47) But the Levites after the tribe of their fathers were not numbered among them. (48) For the Lord had spoken unto Moses, saying, (49) Only thou shalt not number the tribe of Levi, neither take the sum of them among the children of Israel: (50) but thou shalt appoint the Levites over the tabernacle of testimony, and over all the vessels thereof, and over all things that belong to it: they shall bear the tabernacle, and all the vessels thereof, and they shall minister unto it, and shall encamp round about the tabernacle.

(51) And when the tabernacle setteth forward, the Levites shall take it down: and when the tabernacle is to be pitched, the Levites shall set it up: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death. (52) And the children of Israel shall pitch their tents, every man by his own camp, and every man by his own standard, throughout their hosts. (53) But the Levites shall pitch round about the tabernacle of testimony, that there be no wrath upon the congregation of the children of Israel: and the Levites shall keep the charge of the tabernacle of testimony.

(54) And the children of Israel did according to all that the LORD commanded Moses, so did they.

CHAPTER II. — (1) And the LORD spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, (2) Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house: 1 far off about the tabernacle of the congregation shall they pitch.

(3) And on the east side toward the rising of the sun shall they of the standard of the camp of Judah pitch throughout their armies: and Nahshon the son of Amminadab shall be captain of the children of Judah. (4) And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were three-score and fourteen thousand and six hundred. (5) And those that do pitch next unto him shall be the tribe of Issachar: and Nethaneel the son of Zuar shall be captain of the children of Issachar. (6) And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were fifty and four thousand and four hundred. (7) Then the tribe of Zebulun: and Eliab the son of Helon shall be captain of the children of Zebulun. (8) And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were fifty and seven thousand and four hundred.

(9) All that were numbered in the camp of Judah were an hundred thousand and fourscore thousand and six thousand and four hundred, throughout their armies. These shall first set forth.

(10) On the south side shall be the standard of the camp of Reuben according to their armies: and the captain of the children of Reuben shall be Elizur the son of Shedeur. (11) And his host, and those that were numbered thereof, were forty and six thousand and five hundred. (12) And those which pitch by him shall be the tribe of Simeon: and the captain of the children of Simeon shall be Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai. (13) And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were fifty and nine thousand and three hundred. (14) Then the tribe of Gad: and the captain of the sons of Gad shall be Eliasaph the son of Reuel. (15) And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were forty and five thousand and six hundred and fifty. (16) All that were numbered in the camp of Reuben were an hundred thousand and fifty and one thousand and four hundred and fifty, throughout their armies. And they shall set forth in the second rank.

(17) Then the tabernacle of the congregation shall set forward with the camp of the Levites in the midst of the camp: as they encamp, so shall they set forward, every man in his place by their standards.

(16) On the west side shall be the standard of the camp of Ephraim according to their armies: and the captain of the sons of Ephraim shall be Elishama the son of Ammihud. (17) And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were forty thousand and five hundred. (18) And by him shall be the tribe of Manasseh: and the captain of the children of Manasseh shall be Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur. (19) And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were thirty and two thousand and two hundred. (20) Then the tribe of Benjamin: and the captain of the sons of Benjamin shall be Abidan the son of Gideoni. (21) And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were thirty and five thousand and four hundred. (22) All that were numbered of the camp of Ephraim were an hundred thousand and eight thousand and an hundred, throughout their armies. And they shall go forward in the third rank. (23) The standard of the camp of Dan shall be on the north side by their armies: and the captain of the children of Dan shall be Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai. (24) And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were threescore and two thousand and seven hundred. (25) And those that encamp by him shall be the tribe of Asher: and the captain of the children of Asher shall be Pagiel the son of Ocran. (26) And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were forty and one thousand and five hundred. (27) Then the tribe of Naphtali: and the captain of the children of Naphtali shall be Ahira the son of Eman. (28) And his host, and those that were numbered of them, were fifty and three thousand and four hundred. (29) All they that were numbered in the camp of Dan were an hundred thousand and fifty and seven thousand and six hundred. They shall go hindmost with their standards.

(30) These are those which were numbered of the children of Israel by the house of their fathers: all those that were numbered of the camps throughout their hosts were six hundred thousand and three thousand and five hundred and fifty. (31) But the Levites were not numbered among the children of Israel; as the Lord commanded Moses. (32) And the children of Israel did according to all that the Lord commanded Moses: so they pitched by their standards, and so they set forward, every one after their families, according to the house of their fathers.

meeting was compassed about by the four camps when stationary, so it was placed in the centre when they were in motion, having the camps of Judah and Reuben before it, and those of Ephraim and Dan behind it. As the sanctuary of God was in the midst of the camp of the Israelites, and set forward in the midst of their hosts as they marched, so God is represented by the Psalmist as being in the midst of His Church (Ps. xlii. 5). The collection of the tribes was evidently determined in accordance with their mutual relationship. Thus, the eastern camp was composed exclusively of the descendants of the sons of Leah; the southern of those of the two remaining sons of Leah (the tribe of Levi being encamped around the Tabernacle) and a son of Zilpah, Leah's handmaid; the western of those of one of the sons and of the two grandsons of Rachel; and the northern of those of the two sons of Bilhah and of the remaining son of Zilpah. If this arrangement is examined, it will be found that, if allowance be made for the separation of the tribe of Levi, none could have been made in which the relationship by birth would be more closely adhered to. We may learn from this arrangement that the ties of nature should strengthen those of Christian communion. The grouping of the tribes in Ezek. xlvii. 30—34 is different, but the family relationship is still more closely preserved. In Rev. vii. 5—8, where the reference is to a state in which they neither marry nor are given in marriage, the twelve tribes are enumerated without any regard to family relationship. It is deserving of notice that when the lots of the several tribes were finally determined, we find that the temporary association established during their encampments in the wilderness was to a great extent preserved. Thus we see, in regard to the three tribes which formed the eastern camp, that Issachar and Zebulon had adjoining territories; that of those which formed the southern camp, Reuben and Gad had adjoining territories on the east of the Jordan; that this was also the case with the three tribes which formed the western camp, viz., Benjamin, Manasseh, and Ephraim; and that of those which formed the northern camp, Asher and Naphtali had adjoining territories.

The number of the Israelites was very large, considering in how short a time, and under what adverse circumstances, the small company which went down into Egypt had multiplied into 600,000 men capable of bearing arms, independently of the tribe of Levi. But the spiritual Israel of Rev. vii. 9 is represented as "a great multitude which no man could number." The subjoined plan will suffice to convey a general
CHAPTER III. — (1) These also are the generations of Aaron and Moses in the day that the Lord spake with Moses in mount Sinai. (2) And these are the names of the sons of Aaron; Nadab the firstborn, and Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. (3) These are the names of the sons of Aaron, the priests which were anointed, 1 whom he consecrated to minister in the priest's office. (4) b And Nadab and Abihu died before the Lord, when they offered strange fire before the Lord, in the wilderness of Sinai, and they had no children: and Eleazar and Ithamar ministered in the priest's office in the sight of Aaron their father.

(5) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (6) Bring the tribe of Levi near, and present them before Aaron the priest, that they may minister unto him. (7) And they shall keep his charge, and the charge of the whole congregation before the tabernacle of the congregation, to do the service of the tabernacle. (8) And they shall keep all the instruments of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the charge of the children of Israel, to do the service of the tabernacle. (9) And thou shalt give the Levites unto Aaron and to his sons: they are wholly given unto him out of the children of Israel.

idea of the position of the twelve tribes with respect to the tent of meeting during their encampments in the wilderness. It does not clearly appear what was the position of the leading or standard tribe in regard to the two other tribes which constituted together with it one camp.

III.

(1) These also are the generations of Aaron and Moses . . .—The name of Aaron is placed first, not only because he was the elder brother, but also because the ministry of Moses was restricted to his own person, and his sons are merely classed amongst the rest of the Levitical families in 1 Chron. xxiii. 14; whereas the office of Aaron was perpetuated in the persons of his descendants. Hence we find no mention made in this place of the sons of Moses, but only of those of Aaron. The word generations here, as in the book of Genesis (e.g., chaps. vi. 9, xxv. 19) and elsewhere, is used to denote the history; and in this sense the present and the following chapters pertain as much to Moses as to Aaron. Or the reference may be to the fact that Moses and Aaron were made the heads of the whole tribe of Levi, and therefore that the Levitical families generally are traced up equally to both.

(2) Whom he consecrated . . .—Literally, filled their hand. The rites of consecration are described at length in Exod. xxii. 1—37, where the command given to Moses is related, and in Lev. viii. 1—13, where the account is given of the actual consecration, on which occasion the appointed sacrificial offerings were placed by Moses in the hands of Aaron and in the hands of his sons. The act of consecration was performed by Moses in the case of Aaron's sons, as well as in that of Aaron himself.

(3) Died before the Lord.—The account is given in Lev. x. 1, 2, where the same expression "before the Lord" is used both in regard to the offering of strange fire by Nadab and Abihu, and also in regard to their death.

And they had no children.—To die childless was regarded not only as a reproach, but also as a judgment. This was especially the case in regard to Nadab and Abihu, inasmuch as the sons of one, or of both (as was the case in regard to the sons of Eleazar and of Ithamar), would have succeeded to the high priesthood.

(7) And they shall keep his charge.—The word rendered charge may mean the directions which the Levites should receive from Aaron (comp. Gen. xxvi. 5); or—as seems more probable from the use of the same word in this and the following verse with reference to the congregation—it may refer to the charge which was laid upon Aaron and upon the whole congregaion in matters pertaining to the public worship of God.

(9) They are wholly given unto him.—Hebrew, Given, given are they to him. This repetition of
And thou shalt appoint Aaron and his sons, and they shall wait on their priest’s office: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.

And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, And I, behold, I have taken the Levites from among the children of Israel instead of all the firstborn that openeth the matrix among the children of Israel: therefore the Levites shall be mine; because all the firstborn are mine; for on the day that I smote all the firstborn in the land of Egypt I hallowed unto me all the firstborn in Israel, both man and beast: mine shall they be: I am the Lord.

And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, saying, Number the children of Levi after the house of their fathers, by the number of all the males, from a month old and upward shalt thou number them. And Moses numbered them according to the word of the Lord, as he was commanded.

And these were the sons of Levi by their names; Gershon, ... tabernacle of the congregation, (30) and the hangings of the court, and the curtain for the door of the court, which is by the tabernacle, and by the altar round about, and the cords of it for all the service thereof.

(27) And of Kohath was the family of the Amramites, and the family of the Izharites, and the family of the Hebronites, and the family of the Uzzielites: these are the families of the Kohathites. (28) In the number of all the males, from a month old and upward, were eight thousand and six hundred, keeping the charge of the sanctuary. (29) The families of the sons of Kohath shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle southward. (30) And the chief of the house of the father of the families of Merari was Zuriel the son of Abihail: these shall pitch on the side of the tabernacle northward. (31) And under the custody and charge of the sons of Merari shall be the boards of the tabernacle, and the bars thereof, and the pillars thereof, and the sockets thereof, and all the vessels thereof, and all that serveth thereto, (32) and the pillars of the court round about, and their sockets, and their pins, and their cords.

(33) But those that encamp before the tabernacle toward the east, even before the tabernacle of the congregation eastward, shall be Moses, and Aaron and his sons, keeping the charge of the sanctuary for the charge of the children of Israel; and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death. (34) All that were numbered of the Levites, which xxvi. 14—viz, the covering of rams' skins and that of badgers' skins or seals' skins.

---

The hanging for the door of the tabernacle of the congregation—i.e., for the entrance or opening of the tent of meeting. This hanging was of blue, and purple, and scarlet, and fine-twined linen, and was hung at the entrance—i.e., the eastern or open end of the tent (Exod. xxvi. 36). The word rendered door (pethach, not deleth) means an opening. At a latter period, when the Tabernacle was at Shiloh, it had doors (1 Sam. iii. 15). Both words occur in 1 Kings vi. 31: "And for the entering (or at the opening) of the oracle he made doors," &c.

(35) And the hangings of the court .—See Exod. xxvii. 9 and Note.

And the cords of it for all the service thereof.—The pronominal suffixes do not seem to refer to the court, the cords belonging to which appear to have been under the custody of the Merarites (verse 37), but to the mishkan or Tabernacle itself. Or, the latter suffix (its service, or the service thereof) may be designed to refer to each of the various things mentioned, as in verse 31, inasmuch as the words for all the service thereof may mean for everything which had to be done in connection with the things mentioned.

(36) On the side of the tabernacle southward.

—the south has its name in Hebrew (Teman) from Yamin, the right hand, because when a man stands with his face towards the east the south is on his right hand.

(37) And Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest .—In virtue, as it should seem, of the descent of Moses and Aaron from Kohath, the Kohathites had the most honourable portion of the service of the Tabernacle assigned to them; and hence, as the priests belonged to the Amramites, one of the four families of the Kohathites, Eleazar, the eldest surviving son of Aaron, was chosen to have the oversight over the whole body of the Levites.

(38) And the pillars of the court round about.

—See Notes on Exod. xxvii. 9—19.

(39) Keeping the charge of the sanctuary .—The word mishkan (sanctuary) appears to be of a more comprehensive import than mishkan, the shittimwood building, or ohel, the tent which covered it, and it seems to include the court which surrounded the Tabernacle, as in Lev. xii. 4, xxi. 12.

For the charge of the children of Israel—i.e., to attend to everything which was commanded the children of Israel.

(40) And Aaron .—In the Hebrew text the word Aaron has certain marks over it, known as puncta extraordinaria, denoting that it is to be regarded as spurious or doubtful. It is omitted in the Samaritan and Syriac versions and in a few MSS. There appears, however, to be no sufficient reason for its rejection from the text.

Twenty and two thousand.—The total of the three several items—viz, 7,500, 8,600, and 6,200—amounts to 22,300. It appears, however, from verse 46 that the total is correctly given as 22,000, inasmuch as the number of the firstborn, 22,273, exceeded that of the Levites by 273. It has been suggested that in verse 28 we should read wiwl (shaloah), three, for wwl (sheba), six—i.e., 8,300 instead of 8,600; or, if the numbers were denoted, as it has been commonly sup-
Moses and Aaron numbered at the commandment of the Lord, throughout their families, all the males from a month old and upward, were twenty and two thousand.

(40) And the Lord said unto Moses, Number all the firstborn of the males of the children of Israel from a month old and upward, and take the number of their names. (41) And thou shalt take the Levites for me (I am the Lord) instead of all the firstborn among the children of Israel; and the cattle of the Levites instead of all the firstlings among the cattle of the children of Israel.

(42) And Moses numbered, as the Lord commanded him, all the firstborn among the children of Israel. (43) And all the firstborn males by the number of names, from a month old and upward, of those that were numbered of them, were twenty and two thousand two hundred and three-score and thirteen.

(44) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (45) Take the Levites instead of all the firstborn among the children of Israel, and the cattle of the Levites instead of their cattle; and the Levites shall be mine: I am the Lord. (46) And for those that are to be redeemed of the two hundred and three-score and thirteen of the firstborn of the children of Israel, which are more than the Levites;

(47) Thou shalt even take five shekels

posed, by the letters of the alphabet, it is quite possible that one letter may have been substituted by the scribe for another. Some suppose that the three hundred were themselves firstborn sons, who had been born since the command to sanctify the firstborn, and that it is on this account that they were not included in the census. (See Bishop Wordsworth's Notes in loc., where the reasons which may be assigned for the extreme paucity of this tribe, as compared with the other tribes, are discussed.) The later census, which also included the children from a month old and upwards, shows but a very small increase in the number of this tribe, the number on that occasion amounting only to 25,000 (chap. xxxvi. 62).

(41) And thou shalt take the Levites for me (I am the Lord) ... — Or, And thou shalt take the Levites for me—for Me, Jehovah. The assertions which have been frequently made respecting the transference of the priesthood of the firstborn to the Levites appear to be altogether without foundation. For (1) the priesthood which was exercised in patriarchal times was not restricted to the firstborn, but appears to have been common to the head of every family. (2) This priesthood was exercised previously to the exodus, and consequently previously to the command given to Moses to sanctify the firstborn. And (3) the priesthood, which belonged not to the firstborn exclusively, but to the Israelites at large, was therefor strictly confined to the family of Aaron, who inherited it not as the substitutes of the firstborn, but in the place of the whole nation.

(42) Twenty and two thousand two hundred and three-score and thirteen. — The extremely small number of the firstborn in proportion to a male population of 600,000 of twenty years of age and upwards—i.e., to a population of about 1,000,000 males—has been a fruitful source of difficulty, and, in some cases, a ground for the rejection of the historical truth of the narrative, which involves, it has been alleged, the incredible conclusion that there was only one firstborn to forty-four males. It might suffice, in answer to those who urge this difficulty as a ground for rejecting the truth of the narrative, to reply that it is difficult, if not impossible, to conceive that a writer who has recorded, or, according to the theory in question, invented so many complicated calculations, should have inserted amongst them one which is fraught with so much apparent improbability. Many solutions of the problem have been proposed which relieve the apparent disproportion of the number of the firstborn not only of its alleged impossibility, but even of improbability. Some have urged that we are constrained by every principle of analogy to restrict the firstborn sons to those who were under twenty years of age, and who had not been included in the census which had been already taken. The destruction of the firstborn of the Egyptians was clearly subject to a somewhat similar limitation. Pharaoh himself was, in all probability, a firstborn son; and in regard to the Egyptians generally there does not appear to have been above one death in each house (Exod. xii. 30), although there must have been very many houses in which the father (and it may be the grandfather) as well as the son was a firstborn child. Another opinion is that by the firstborn in every family we are to understand the firstborn in every household, including the children of concubines and slaves. When due allowance has been made, on either of these hypotheses, for the average proportion of the sexes, the average number of early deaths, and also for the limitation of the term 'firstborn' to those who were the firstborn on the side of the father as well as of the mother, it has been contended that the number of the firstborn is consistent with the supposition that each family of the Israelites consisted of about eight or nine children—a supposition which, considering how prolific the Hebrew women are said to have been, cannot be regarded as deserving of rejection on the ground of its incredibility. The most probable solution of the difficulty, however, appears to be that which is given in the Introduction.

(45) And the cattle of the Levites instead of their cattle. — There appears to have been no numbering of the cattle. Had it been otherwise, an argument might have been used in support of the prospective reference of the command to number the cattle derived from the fact that it would have been impossible to ascertain the number of firstborn among the cattle. It appears, however, that the whole of the cattle of the Levites was given in redemption of the firstborn of all the cattle of the other tribes.

(47) Thou shalt even take five shekels a piece by the poll. — It is not stated in what manner the 273 families of whom the redemption money was exacted were determined. Inasmuch, however, as the law of work in the tabernacle of the congregation.

(1) This shall be the service of the sons of Kohath in the tabernacle of the congregation, about the most holy things:

(5) and when the camp setteth forward, Aaron shall come, and his sons, and they shall take down the covering vail, and cover the ark of testimony with it:

(6) and shall put thereon the covering of badgers' skins, and shall spread over it a cloth wholly of blue, and shall put in the staves thereof. (7) And upon the table of shewbread they shall spread a cloth of blue, and put thereon the dishes, and the spoons, and the bowls, and covers to cover withal: and the continual bread shall be thereon: (8) And they shall spread upon them a cloth of scarlet, and cover the same with a covering of badgers' skins, and shall put in the staves thereof. (9) And they shall take a cloth of blue, and cover the candlestick of the light, and his lamps, and his tongs, and his snuffdishes, and all the oil vessels thereof, wherewith

CHAPTER IV. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, (2) Take the sum of the sons of Kohath from among the sons of Levi, after their families, by the house of their fathers, (3) from thirty years old and upward even until fifty years old, all that enter into the host, to do the

the redemption of the firstborn by the payment of five shekels came into operation from this time (chap. xviii. 16), it seems probable that the money was exacted in the case of those who had been most recently born; or it may be that the matter was decided by lot.

After the shekel of the sanctuary. — See Exod. xxx. 13, where the expression occurs for the first time, and the value of the shekel is stated, as in this verse.

(45) And thou shalt give the money . . . . — The verse may be rendered thus: And thou shalt give the money to Aaron and to his sons: even the redemption money of those who are over and above amongst them.

(46) Redeemed by the Levites. — i.e., who were redeemed by the substitution of the Levites in their place.

(53) The money of them that were redeemed.

—Better, the ransom (or, redemption) money.

IV.

(2) Of the sons of Kohath . . . .—Kohath appears to have been the second son of Levi (chap. iii. 17), but the Kohathites here stand first because Moses and Aaron belonged to them, and it was their office to bear the Ark.

(3) From thirty years old and upward even until fifty years old. — The previous census of the Levites was from a month old. The present census was with a view to the discharge of duties requiring a considerable amount of physical strength, and hence the prescribed age for entering upon these duties was fixed at this time at thirty, and limited to fifty. It has been supposed by some that five years were spent in preparation for the service, and that it is in this way that the apparent discrepancy between this verse and chap. viii. 24.
they minister unto it: (10) and they shall put it and all the vessels thereof within a covering of badgers’ skins, and shall put it upon a bar. (11) And upon the golden altar they shall spread a cloth of blue, and cover it with a covering of badgers’ skins, and shall put to the staves thereof: (12) and they shall take all the instruments of ministry, wherewith they minister in the sanctuary, and put them in a cloth of blue, and cover them with a covering of badgers’ skins, and shall put them on a bar: (13) and they shall take away the ashes from the altar, and spread a purple cloth thereon: (14) and they shall put upon it all the vessels thereof, wherewith they minister about it, even the censers, the fleshhooks, and the shovels, and the 1 basons, all the vessels of the altar; and they shall spread upon it a covering of badgers’ skins, and put to the staves of it. (15) And when Aaron and his sons have made an end of covering the sanctuary, and all the vessels of the sanctuary, as the camp is set forward; after that, the sons of Kohath shall come to bear it: but they shall not touch any holy thing, lest they die. These things are the burden of the sons of Kohath in the tabernacle of the congregation.

(10) Upon a bar.—Better, upon a pole, or frame made for bearing. (Comp. chap. xiii. 23, where the same word is rendered "a staff.")

(11) And shall put to the staves thereof.—Better, And shall put in the staves thereof, as in verses 6, 8; so also in verse 14.

(13) And they shall take away the ashes from the altar.—In Exod. xxvii. 3 we find a direction to make pans for removing the ashes from the brazen altar, and also to make all the brazen vessels mentioned in the next verse.

(14) The censers.—Better, the fire-pans, as in Exod. xxvii. 3.

(15) And all the vessels of the sanctuary.—No mention is here made of the laver (Exod. xxx. 18). The LXX. and the Samaritan text supply a statement respecting the covering and conveyance of the brazen laver. The clause in the LXX. is as follows:—"And they shall take a purple cloth, and cover the laver and its foot (or base), and they shall put it into a blue cover of skin, and put it on bars." There is no sufficient ground, however, for supposing that the present Hebrew text is deficient in this place; and it seems more probable to suppose that the laver was not to be covered during its transport.

After that the sons of Kohath shall come to bear it.—Better, to bear, or carry—viz., the whole of the vessels of ministry which had been previously enumerated. The distinction between the service of the priests and that of the Levites in regard to the removal of the Tabernacle and its furniture is here clearly marked.

But they shall not touch any holy thing, lest they die.—The word which is rendered "any holy thing" may here, as elsewhere, denote the sanctuary. This injunction is repeated in chap. xviii. 3. We find in 2 Sam. vi. 7 an instance of the fatal result of the violation of this command by Uzziah.
And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, Take also the sum of the sons of Gershon, throughout the houses of their fathers, by their families; from thirty years old and upward until fifty years old shalt thou number them; all that entereth in to perform the service, to do the work in the tabernacle of the congregation.

This is the service of the families of the Gershonites, to serve, and for burdens: and they shall bear the curtains of the tabernacle, and the tabernacle of the congregation, his covering, and the covering of the badgers' skins that is above upon it, and the hanging for the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and the hangings of the court, and the hanging for the door of the gate of the court, which is by the tabernacle and by the altar round about, and their cords, and all the instruments of their service, and all that is made for them: so shall they serve. At the 3 appointment of Aaron and his sons shall be all the service of the sons of the Gershonites, in all their burdens, and in all their service: and ye shall appoint unto them in charge all their burdens.

This is the service of the families of the sons of Gershon in the tabernacle of the congregation: and their charge shall be under the hand of Ithamar the son of Aaron the priest.

As for the sons of Merari, thou shalt number them after their families, by the house of their fathers: from thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old shalt thou number them, every one that entereth into the service, to do the work of the tabernacle of the congregation.

And this is the charge of their burden, according to all their service in the tabernacle of the congregation; the boards of the tabernacle, and the bars thereof, and the pillars thereof, and the sockets thereof, and the pillars of the court round about, and their sockets, and their pins, and their cords, with all their instruments, and with all their service: and by name ye shall reckon the instruments of the charge of their burden.

This is the service of the families of the sons of Merari, according to all their service, in the tabernacle of the congregation, under the hand of Ithamar the son of Aaron the priest.

And Moses and Aaron and the chief of the congregation numbered the sons of the Kohathites after their families, and after the house of their fathers, from thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that entereth into the service, for the work in the tabernacle of the congregation: and those that were numbered of them by their families were two thousand seven hundred and fifty. These were they that were numbered of the families of the Kohathites, all that might do service in the tabernacle of the congregation, which Moses and Aaron did number according to the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses.
of the sons of Gershon, throughout their families, and by the house of their fathers, (39) from thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that entereth into the service, for the work in the tabernacle of the congregation, (40) even those that were numbered of them, throughout their families, by the house of their fathers, were two thousand and six hundred and thirty. (44) These are they that were numbered of the families of the sons of Gershon, of all that might do service in the tabernacle of the congregation, whom Moses and Aaron did number according to the commandment of the Lord. (42) And those that were numbered of the families of the sons of Merari, throughout their families, by the house of their fathers, (43) from thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that entereth into the service, for the work in the tabernacle of the congregation, (44) even those that were numbered of them after their families, were three thousand and two hundred. (45) These be those that were numbered of the families of the sons of Merari, whom Moses and Aaron numbered according to the word of the Lord by the hand of Moses. (49) All those that were numbered of the Levites, whom Moses and Aaron and the chief of Israel numbered, after their families, and after the house of their fathers, (47) from thirty years old and upward even unto fifty years old, every one that came to do the service of the ministry, and the service of the burden in the tabernacle of the congregation, (48) even those that were numbered of them, were eight thousand and five hundred and fourscore. (50) According to the commandment of the Lord they were numbered by the hand of Moses, every one according to his service, and according to his burden: thus were they numbered of him, as the Lord commanded Moses.

CHAPTER V. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Command the children of Israel, that they put out of the camp every leper, and every one that hath an issue, and whosoever is defiled by the dead: (3) both male and female shall ye put out, without the camp shall ye put them; that they defile not their camps, in the midst whereof I dwell. (4) And the children of Israel did so, and put them out without the camp; as the Lord spake unto Moses, so did the children of Israel. (5) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (6) Speak unto the children of Israel, When a man or woman shall commit any sin that men commit, to do a trespass against the Lord, and that person be guilty; (7) then they shall confess their sin which they have done: and he shall recompense his trespass with the principal thereof, and add unto it the fifth part thereof, and give it unto him against whom he hath trespassed. (5) But if the man have no kinsman to recompense the trespass unto, let the

(39) Eight thousand and five hundred and fourscore.—This number of men between the ages of twenty and fifty bears a just proportion to that of all the males from a month old and upwards — viz., 22,000.

V.

This chapter contains laws for the preservation of sanctity amongst the people in the midst of whom Jehovah was pleased to dwell.

(2) Every leper.—On the nature of this disease and the laws prescribed with regard to it, see Lev. xiii., xiv., and Notes. Whosoever is defiled by the dead.—The law respecting defilement contracted by contact with the dead bodies of unclean animals and insects is contained in Lev. xi. 24, 25; and the law respecting defilement contracted by the priests, by contact with the dead, is contained in Lev. xxi. The law concerning defilement, in regard to the Israelites generally, is found at greater length in chap. xix. of this book.

(6) To do a trespass.—The noun malt, which is trespass be recompensed unto the Lord, even to the priest; beside the ram of the atonement, whereby an atonement shall be made for him.

(9) And every offering of all the holy things of the children of Israel, which they bring unto the priest, shall be his.

(10) And every man's hallowed things shall be his: whatsoever any man giveth the priest, it shall be his.

(11) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (12) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, If any man's wife go aside, and commit a trespass against him, (13) and a man lie with her carnally, and it be hid from the eyes of her husband, and be kept close, and she be defiled, and there be no witness against her, neither she be taken with the manner; (14) and the spirit of jealousy come upon him, and he be jealous of his wife, and she be defiled: or if the spirit of jealousy come upon him, and he be jealous of his wife, and she be not defiled; (15) then shall the man bring his wife unto the priest, and he shall bring her offering for her, the tenth part of an ephah of barley meal; he shall pour no oil upon it, nor put frankincense thereon; for it is an offering of jealousy, an offering of memorial, bringing iniquity to remembrance.

(16) And the priest shall bring her near, and set her before the Lord: (17) and the priest shall take holy water in an earthen vessel; and of the dust that is in the floor of the tabernacle the priest shall take, and put it into the water: (18) and the priest shall set the woman before the Lord, and uncover the woman's head, and put the offering of memorial in her hands, which is the jealousy offering: and the priest shall have in his hand the bitter water that causeth the curse: (19) and the priest shall charge her by an oath, and say unto the woman, If no man have lain with thee, and if thou hast not gone aside to uncleanness with another instead of thy husband, be thou free from this bitter water that causeth the curse: (20) but if thou hast gone aside to another instead of thy husband, and if thou be defiled, and some man have lain with thee beside thine husband: (21) then the priest shall charge the woman with an oath of cursing, and the priest shall say unto the woman, The Lord make thee a curse

(9) And every offering. — The word rendered offering, terumah (properly, heave-offering) may denote specifically the heave-offering, i.e., the shoulder, or rather leg, of the sacrificial victim (as in Exod. xxix. 27; Lev. vii. 14, 32), or it may be used here (as in Exod. xxv. 2; xxx. 13) in the general sense of an offering dedicated to the Lord by elevation. A comparison of this passage with Exod. xxix. 28, and with chap. xviii. 8, 9, seems to warrant the conclusion that the reference here is, at least primarily, to the heave-offerings of the sacrifices, which were the portion, not of the priests generally, but of the particular priest who offered the sacrifice.

(12) And commit a trespass against him. — The word rendered commit a trespass is the same as in verse 6 (see Note). As the law of marriage lies at the very foundation of the civil commonwealth, it was of the greatest importance that stringent measures should be adopted for the detection and punishment of the sin of adultery.

(13) Taken with the manner. — Better, caught, or, taken in the act.

(15) The tenth part of an ephah of barley meal. — The fine wheaten flour appointed to be used in the morning and evening sacrifices was not allowed on this occasion, but barley flour, which was used by the poorer classes, or by the people generally, in time of great distress, and which appears to have been worth about one-half the price of wheaten flour (2 Kings vii. 1). "A cake of barley bread" is used to denote something base and contemptible (Judges vii. 13). Oil and incense, the symbols of the Holy Spirit's influences and of prayer, were not allowed to be used.

(16) And the priest shall bring her near, and set her before the Lord. — Or, whilst under thy husband, i.e., whilst in the marriage state, as in the margin. (See Ezek. xxiii. 5 for the use of the same Hebrew preposition.) and an oath among thy people, when the Lord doth make thy thigh to rot, and thy belly to swell; and this water that causeth the curse shall go into thy bowels, to make thy belly to swell, and thy thigh to rot: And the woman shall say, Amen, amen. (23) And the priest shall write these curses in a book, and he shall blot them out in a bitter water: (24) and he shall cause the woman to drink the bitter water that causeth the curse; and the water that causeth the curse shall enter into her, and become bitter.

(25) Then the priest shall take the jealousy offering out of the woman's hand, and shall wave the offering before the Lord, and offer it upon the altar:
(26) and the priest shall take an handful of the offering, even the memorial thereof, and burn it upon the altar, and afterward shall cause the woman to drink the water. (27) And when he hath made her to drink the water, then it shall come to pass, that, if she be defiled, and have done trespass against her husband, that the water that causeth the curse shall enter into her, and become bitter, and her belly shall swell, and her thigh shall

(23) And he shall blot them out with the bitter water.—Better, and he shall blot them out into the bitter water. The curses were to be written upon a roll, and the roll washed in the bitter water, so that the water should be impregnated with the curse before it was drunk.

(24) And he shall cause the woman to drink the bitter water . . . These words appear to be inserted here by way of anticipation, insomuch as it appears from verse 26 that it was not until after the presentation of the offering upon the altar that the woman was required to drink the water. The offering was not presented until after the woman's oath of purification, but her guilt or innocence was not finally established until the effects of drinking the bitter water were ascertained.

(25) And this woman shall bear her iniquity.
—Better, and that woman. Unlike the ordeals of other nations, the guilty were infallibly detected by the test thus imposed, and were constrained to endure the righteous judgment of God.

VI.

(2) When either man or woman shall sepa-rato themselves to vow a vow . . . —Better, When a man or woman shall make a special (or singular) vow (as in Lev. xxvii. 2)—the vow of a Nazirite. The verb which is here used denotes the doing something wonderful or extraordinary, and the spiritual lesson seems to be that Christ's servants are expected and required to do something more than others (Matt. v. 48, 47). The vows here referred to were made for a specific period. At a later time, however, some were consecrated or set apart as Nazi-rites during the entire period of their lives, as in the case of Samson, Samuel, and John the Baptist. This consecration, however, appears to have been made rather as the result of Divine revelation than of arbitrary appointment on the part of their parents. The meaning of the word Nazirite (Hebrew nazir) is contained in the concluding words of the verse—to separate (i.e., himself) unto Jehovah—where the cognate verb is used.

(3) He shall separate himself from wine and strong drink . . . —The law of the Nazirite in this respect, as in regard to defilement from the dead, was more strict than that which was enjoined upon the priests, thus typifying the entire surrender of the heart and life to God, and freedom from the distraction of exterior ties. The ideal of this separation, however, was not that of a life of monastic seclusion, but of action, and of unbroken devotion to the Divine service.
The priests were forbidden to drink wine, or strong drink, when they entered the tabernacle to perform service there, but were not prohibited the use of wine at other times. Strong drink (shekar) is supposed to have been made of barley and dates or honey. The prohibition to eat any of the produce of the vine, even of that which was not intoxicating, seems designed to denote the entire consecration of the Nazirite to the Divine service, and the obligation which rested upon him to abstain from all the desires and delights of the flish. The love of cakes made of raisins is coupled in Hos. xi. 1 with idolatry.

(4) From the kernels even to the husk. —The word which is rendered kernels is supposed by some to denote sour grapes, and by others the kernels of berries.
The word zay denotes the shell or husk.
The Vows of the Nazarites

NUMBERS, VI.

and their Offerings.

Tree, from the kernels even to the husk.
(5) All the days of the vow of his separation there shall no razor come upon his head: until the days be fulfilled, in the which he separateth himself unto the Lord, he shall be holy, and shall let the locks of the hair of his head grow.
(6) All the days that he separateth himself unto the Lord he shall come at no dead body. (7) He shall not make himself unclean for his father, or for his mother, for his brother, or for his sister, when they die; because the consecration of his God is upon his head. (8) All the days of his separation he is holy unto the Lord. (9) And if any man die very suddenly by him, and he hath defiled the head of his consecration; then he shall shave his head in the day of his cleansing, on the seventh day shall he shave it. (10) And on the eighth day he shall bring two turkeys, or two young pigeons, to the priest, to the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: (11) And the priest shall offer the one for a sin offering and the other for a burnt offering, and make an atonement for him, for that he sinned by the dead, and shall hallow his head that same day. (12) And he shall consecrate unto the Lord the days of his separation, and shall bring a lamb of the first year for a trespass offering: but the days that were before shall be lost, because his separation was defiled.
(13) And this is the law of the Nazarite, when the days of his separation are fulfilled: he shall be brought unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: (14) and he shall offer his offering unto the Lord, one he lamb of the first year without blemish for a burnt offering, and one ewe lamb of the first year without blemish for a sin offering, and one ram without blemish for peace offerings, (15) and a basket of unleavened bread, cakes of fine flour mingled with oil, and wafers of unleavened bread anointed with oil, and their meat offering, and their drink offerings. (16) And the priest shall bring them before the Lord, and shall offer his sin offering, and his burnt offering: (17) and he shall offer the ram for a sacrifice of peace offerings unto the Lord, with the basket of unleavened bread: the priest shall offer also his meat offering, and his drink offering. (18) And the Nazarite shall shave the head of his separation at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and shall take the hair of the head of his separation, and put it in the fire which is under the sacrifice of the peace offerings. (19) And the priest shall take the sodden shoulder of the ram, and one unleavened cake out of the basket, and one unleavened wafer, and shall put them upon the hands of the Nazarite, after the hair of his separation is shaven: (20) and the priest shall wave them for a wave offering before the Lord: this is holy for the priest, with the wave breast and heave shoulder: and after that the Nazarite may drink wine. (21) This is the law of

560
The Form of Blessing.

The Offering of the Princes.

NUMBERS, VII.

On a day, that Moses had fully set up the tabernacle, and had anointed it, and sanctified it, and all the instruments thereof, both the altar and all the vessels thereof, and had anointed them, and sanctified them; (2) that the princes of Israel, heads of the house of their fathers, who were the princes of the tribes, and were over them that were numbered, offered: (3) and they brought their offering before the Lord, six covered wagons, and twelve oxen; a wagon for two of the princes, and for each one an ox; and they brought them before the tabernacle. (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (5) Take it of them, that they may be to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; and thou shalt give them unto the Levites, to every man according to his service. (6) And Moses took the wagons and the oxen, and gave them unto the Levites. (7) Two wagons and four oxen he gave unto the sons of Gershon, according to their service: (8) and four wagons and eight oxen he gave unto the sons of Merari, according unto their service, under the hand of Ithamar the son of Aaron the priest. (9) But unto the sons of Kohath he gave none: because the service of the sanctuary belonging unto them was that they should bear upon their shoulders.

And the princes offered for dedicating of the altar in the day that it was anointed, even the princes offered their offering before the altar. (11) And the Lord said unto Moses, They shall offer their offering, each prince on his day, for the dedicating of the altar.

(3) On this wise ye shall bless the children of Israel.—The occasions on which this blessing was used are not recorded. The blessing itself, which marks in a special manner the spiritual character of the chosen people, consists of three double clauses. In each of these three clauses the sacred name Jehovah is repeated, and there is a rising gradation in the blessing invoked, until it culminates in that peace which is the highest of those gifts that God can bestow and that man can possess. There has been commonly recognised in this blessing an allusion to the doctrine of the Trinity. Mention is made in Lev. xix. 22 of a blessing pronounced by Aaron upon the people, but no form of words is found there.

VII.

On the day that Moses had fully set up the tabernacle. — Better, had finished the setting up of the tabernacle. The offerings of the princes occupied twelve days, the sacrifices being too numerous to be offered at the same time. It follows, therefore, that the expression “on the day” here and in verse 10 must be understood, as in Gen. ii. 4, as meaning “at the time.” The verse, however, may be read thus: “And it came to pass on the day . . . that he anointed it . . .” in which case the following verse would begin thus: “And the princes of Israel . . .” It should be observed, however, on the other hand, that verse 10 connects the time of the offerings with that of the anointing of the altar. In any case, the expression “on the day” needs to be interpreted in the wider sense, which it not unfrequently requires, inasmuch as the Tabernacle was set up on the first day of the first month of the second year (Exod. xl. 17), and the events recorded in this and the preceding chapters appear to have taken place on and after the first day of the second month of that year (chap. i. 1). The account of the setting up of the Tabernacle and the altar, &c., is contained in Exod. xl. 17—33, and the account of the anointing and consecration is contained in Lev. vii. 10, 11. It appears from a comparison of Exod. xl. 17 with Num. x. 11 that fifty days intervened between the erection of the Tabernacle and the beginning of the march from Sinai.

And were over them that were numbered. — The first mention of these princes is found in connection with the numbering of the tribes (chap. i. 4).

Six covered wagons. — In Isa. lxi. 20 the word which is here rendered covered, and which is a noun, occurs in the plural, and is rendered in the Authorised Version vultures. It occurs nowhere else in the same sense. It seems probable, however, that the Vulgate, which the Authorised Version follows, has the right signification: planastra lecta.

Two wagons and four oxen. — The Gershonites had charge of the hangings of the Tabernacle and court (chap. iv. 25, 26), whilst the Merarites had charge of the boards, pillars, &c., which were of much greater weight (chap. iv. 31, 32). The Kohathites were required to bear their burdens on poles upon their shoulders (verse 9), and therefore did not require any wagons.

For dedicating of the altar. — Literally, the dedication of the altar—i.e., the gifts made at the dedication of the altar.
And he that offered his offering the first day was Nahshon the son of Amminadab, of the tribe of Judah: and his offering was one silver charger, the weight thereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: one spoon of ten shekels of gold, full of incense: one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: one kid of the goats for a sin offering: and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Nahshon the son of Amminadab.

On the second day Nethaneel the son of Zuar, prince of Issachar, did offer: he offered for his offering one silver charger, the weight thereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: one spoon of gold of ten shekels, full of incense: one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: one kid of the goats for a sin offering: and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Nethaneel the son of Zuar.

On the third day Eliab the son of Helon, prince of the children of Zebulun, did offer: his offering was one silver charger, the weight thereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: one kid of the goats for a sin offering: and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Eliab the son of Helon.

On the fourth day Elizur the son of Shedeur, prince of the children of Reuben, did offer: his offering was one silver charger of the weight of an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: one kid of the goats for a sin offering: and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Elizur the son of Shedeur.

On the fifth day Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai, prince of the children of Simeon, did offer: his offering was one silver charger, the weight thereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: one kid of the goats for a sin offering: and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai.

On the sixth day Eliasaph the son of Deuel, prince of the children of Gad, offered: his offering was one silver charger of the weight of an hundred and thirty shekels, a silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them were full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: one kid of the goats for a sin offering: in each case. The repetition of the description of the offerings, which occupies the remaining portion of this chapter, may serve to denote the special regard which God has to the offerings of His people, as may be learned from the notice which our Lord took of the offerings which were made for the Temple service, and His commendation of that of the poor widow who cast her two mites into the treasury (Mark xii. 41—44).
offering; (47) and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Eliesaph the son of Deuel.

(48) On the seventh day Elishama the son of Ammihud, prince of the children of Ephraim, offered: (49) his offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: (50) one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: (51) one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: (52) one kid of the goats for a sin offering: (53) and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Eli-shama the son of Ammihud.

(54) On the eighth day offered Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur, prince of the children of Manasseh: (55) his offering was one silver charger of the weight of an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: (56) one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: (57) one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: (58) one kid of the goats for a sin offering: (59) and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur.

(60) On the ninth day Abidan the son of Gideoni, prince of the children of Benjamin, offered: (61) his offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: (62) one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: (63) one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: (64) one kid of the goats for a sin offering: (65) and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Abidan the son of Gideoni.

(66) On the tenth day Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai, prince of the children of Dan, offered: (67) his offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: (68) one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: (69) one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: (70) one kid of the goats for a sin offering: (71) and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai.

(72) On the eleventh day Pagiel the son of Ocran, prince of the children of Asher, offered: (73) his offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: (74) one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: (75) one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: (76) one kid of the goats for a sin offering: (77) and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Pagiel the son of Ocran.

(78) On the twelfth day Ahira the son of Enan, prince of the children of Naph- tali, offered: (79) his offering was one silver charger, the weight whereof was an hundred and thirty shekels, one silver bowl of seventy shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary; both of them full of fine flour mingled with oil for a meat offering: (80) one golden spoon of ten shekels, full of incense: (81) one young bullock, one ram, one lamb of the first year, for a burnt offering: (82) one kid of the goats for a sin offering: (83) and for a sacrifice of peace offerings, two oxen, five rams, five he goats, five lambs of the first year: this was the offering of Ahira the son of Enan.

(84) This was the dedication of the altar, in the day when it was anointed, by the princes of Israel: twelve chargers of silver, twelve silver bowls, twelve spoons of gold: (85) each charger of silver weighing an hundred and thirty shekels, each bowl seventy: all the silver vessels weighed two thousand and four hundred shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary: (86) the golden spoons were twelve, full of incense, weighing ten shekels apiece, after the shekel of the sanctuary: all the gold of the spoons was an hundred and twenty shekels. (87) All the oxen for the burnt offering were twelve bullocks, the rams twelve, the lambs of the first year twelve, with their meat offering: and the kids of the goats for sin offering twelve. (88) And all the oxen for the sacrifice of the peace offerings were twenty and four bullocks, the rams sixty, the he goats sixty, the lambs of the first year sixty. This was the dedication of the altar, after that it was anointed. (89) And when Moses was gone into the tabernacle of the congregation to speak with him, then he heard the voice of one speaking unto him from off the mercy seat that was upon the ark of testimony, from between the two cherubims: and he spake unto him.

CHAPTER VIII. — (3) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Speak unto Aaron, and say unto him, When thou lightest the lamps, the seven lamps shall give light over against the candlestick. (3) And Aaron did so; he lighted the lamps thereof over against the candlestick, as the Lord commanded Moses. (4) And this work of the candlestick was of beaten gold, unto the shaft thereof, unto the flowers thereof, was beaten work: according unto the pattern which the Lord had shewed Moses, so he made the candlestick.

(5) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (6) Take the Levites from among the children of Israel, and cleanse them. (7) And thus shalt thou do unto them, to cleanse them: Sprinkle water of purifying upon them, and let them shave all their flesh.

(8) When thou lightest the lamps,—Better, When thou setteth up the lamps. (Comp. Exod. xxv. 37.) The golden candlestick was placed against the south wall of the Tabernacle, opposite to the table of shewbread, so that its seven branches were parallel to that wall, with its branches east and west, and consequently the seven lamps, one of which rested upon each of the seven branches, threw their light in front of the candlestick, i.e., towards the north wall, by which arrangement the furniture of the holy place was more effectually lighted than it would have been had the candlestick been placed facing the entrance, with its branches north and south.

(9) He lighted.—Better, he set up.

(4) And this work of the candlestick . . . — Better, And this was the work of the candlestick, i.e., the material of which it was made. Beaten gold.—Better, turned (or twisted) gold.

Unto the shaft thereof, unto the flowers thereof.—Literally, unto its base, unto its flower or blossom, i.e., the whole of the candlestick, from its base to its flowers. The several parts of the candlestick, beginning with the base and ending with the flowers, are enumerated in Exod. xxv. 31.

(5) And the Lord spake unto Moses.—As Moses had already officiated in the consecration of the priests (Lev. viii.), so now, notwithstanding the fact that Aaron and his sons were already consecrated, he is commanded to officiate at the cleansing of the Levites.

(7) Water of purifying.—Literally, water of sin, or, of sin-offering (Hebrew, hattath). As in the case of the holy water, to which reference is made in chap. vi. 17, so here also there is no explanation given of the particular water which was to be used in cleansing the Levites. The bulbuck which was appointed to be offered as a sin-offering at the consecration of Aaron and his sons (Exod. xxix. 14; Lev. viii. 14) is described by the same word which is here employed (in the Authorised Version, sin-offering); and in Lev. iv. 14, the sacrifice which was appointed to be offered for the expiation of sin (in the Authorised Version, the sin) is also spoken of under the same name; so also is the sin-offering of the Levites in verse 8 of this chapter. The sin-water evidently denotes the water appointed to be used in the purification of sin; and the reference is probably (as in chap. vi. 17) to the water which was kept in the brazen laver in front of the Tabernacle. It is possible, however, that some direction which is not here recorded may have been given respecting putting the ashes of the sin-offering into water. (Comp. chap. xix. 9, where the water of purification is described under the same name: “It is a purification for sin.”) Literally, it is hattath. In this case, however, the sin-offering, which is not mentioned until verse 8, must have been sacrificed previously to the sprinkling.

Let them shave all their flesh.—Literally, cause the razor to pass over all their flesh. A different word is used in Lev. xiv. 8, 9 to denote the more complete their flesh, and let them wash their clothes, and so make themselves clean. (9) Then let them take a young bullock with his meat offering, even fine flour mingled with oil, and another young bullock shalt thou take for a sin offering. (9) And thou shalt bring the Levites before the tabernacle of the congregation: and thou shalt gather the whole assembly of the children of Israel together; (10) and thou shalt bring the Levites before the Lord: and the children of Israel shall put their hands upon the Levites: (11) and Aaron shall offer the Levites before the Lord for an offering of the children of Israel, that they may execute the service of the Lord. (12) And the Levites shall lay their hands upon the heads of the bullocks: and thou shalt offer the one for a sin offering, and the other for a burnt offering, unto the Lord, to make an atonement for the Levites. (13) And thou shalt set the Levites before Aaron, and before his sons, and offer them for an offering unto the Lord. (14) Thus shalt thou separate the Levites from among the children of Israel: and the Levites shall be unto mine. (15) And after that shall the Levites go in to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation: and thou shalt cleanse them, and offer them for an offering. (16) For they are wholly given unto me from among the children of Israel; instead of such as open every womb, even instead of the firstborn of all the children of Israel, have I taken them unto me. (17) And for all the firstborn of the children of Israel are mine, both man and beast: on the day that I smote every firstborn in the land of Egypt I sanctified them for myself. (18) And I have taken the Levites all the firstborn of the children of Israel. (19) And I have given the Levites as a gift to Aaron and to his sons from among the children of Israel, to do the service of the children of Israel in the tabernacle of the congregation, and to make an atonement for the children of Israel: that there be no plague among the children of Israel, when the children of Israel come nigh unto the sanctuary. (20) And Moses, and Aaron, and all the congregation of the children of Israel, did to the Levites according unto all that the Lord commanded Moses concerning the Levites, so did the children of Israel unto them. (21) And the Levites were purified, and they washed their clothes; and Aaron offered them as an offering before the Lord; and

And let them wash their clothes.—The bodies of the priests were washed at their consecration (Lev. xiv. 8, 9), and those of the lepers at their cleansing (Lev. xv. 4): but the Levites, who were not brought into such immediate contact with the holy things as the priests, were only required to wash their clothes, which was an ordinary preparation for Divine worship (Exod. xix. 10; comp. Gen. xxxv. 2).

(9) The whole assembly of the children of Israel,—i.e., as elsewhere, the representatives of the people.

(10) They shall put their hands upon the Levites.—The same phrase is here used as in verse 12, and elsewhere, of the offerer who was required to lay his hand upon the victim which he offered in sacrifice. By this symbolical act the obligation which rested upon the whole nation in regard to the dedication of the firstborn was transferred to the Levites, who were henceforth to be dedicated to the service of the Lord, and given over to the priests as the representatives of the Lord.

(11) And Aaron shall offer the Levites before the Lord for an offering.—Literally, and Aaron shall wave the Levites as a wave-offering before the Lord. The manner in which the Levites were thus set apart to the Lord is not expressed. It may have been done by leading them backwards and forwards in front of the Tabernacle and in the presence of the people, or by the waving of Aaron's hands. The same word is used elsewhere in reference to offerings of different kinds—as, e.g., of gold in Exod. xxxv. 22. (Comp. verses 13, 15, 21 of this chapter.) The symbolical meaning of the ceremony is obvious from the concluding words of the verse, and is further explained in verses 13, 14. (Comp. Lev. vii. 30 and Note.)

(13) And offer them for an offering.—Literally, and wave them as a wave-offering, as in verse 11. So also in verse 15.

(15) And after that shall the Levites go in.—i.e., into the court of the Tabernacle to keep watch there, and to assist the priests at the altar of burnt-offering, and to take down and set up the Tabernacle as occasion might require.

(16) Instead of such as open every womb, even instead of the firstborn of all the children of Israel.—It is difficult to determine whether the second clause is to be regarded as an exact equivalent, or as a limitation of the first. If an exact equivalent, a different meaning must be assigned to the firstborn from that which it commonly bears in the Pentateuch, where it appears to be restricted to the firstborn son on the father's side. (Cf. Exod. xiii. 2.)

(19) As a gift.—Hebrew, given, as in verse 16.

That there be no plague among the children of Israel.—The appointment of the Levites in the place of the firstborn was calculated to insure the reverent and orderly discharge of the duties of the Sanctuary, and to operate as a safeguard against those sins of omission and commission into which the Aaron made an atonement for them to cleanse them. (22) And after that went the Levites in to do their service in the tabernacle of the congregation before Aaron, and before his sons: as the Lord had commanded Moses concerning the Levites, so did they unto them.

(23) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (24) This is it that belongeth unto the Levites: from twenty and five years old and upward they shall go in to wait upon the service of the tabernacle of the congregation; (25) and from the age of fifty years they shall cease waiting upon the service thereof, and shall serve no more: (26) but shall minister with their brethren in the tabernacle of the congregation, to keep the charge, and shall do no service. Thus shalt thou do unto the Levites touching their charge.

firstborn would have been more likely to be betrayed, and which would have provoked the Divine wrath against the Israelites generally.

(24) From twenty and five years old and upward.—This regulation may be understood as referring to the age at which the Levites were to enter upon their duties after the people had taken possession of the land of Canaan, and it appears to have remained in force until the time of David, who substituted the age of twenty for that of twenty-five, because the necessity of carrying the Tabernacle and its furniture from place to place, which arose but seldom after the entrance into Canaan, finally ceased after the removal of the ark to Mount Zion. The time of service during the wanderings in the wilderness was from thirty to fifty (chap. iv. 3, 23, 30), during which time the constant removal of the Tabernacle required the services of men in the full vigour of life. The chronological order of events is not always observed in this book, and the directions contained in verses 23-26 may have been given at a later period, but inserted here in connection with the account of the appointment of the Levites to their office. On the other hand, it is quite possible that from the first the Levites entered upon the lighter parts of their office at the age of twenty-five years, but were not employed before they were thirty years of age in the more onerous duties of removing the Tabernacle, or in bearing on their shoulders the sacred vessels, as in the case of the Kohathites.

To wait upon the service.—Literally, to serve the warfare, or to serve the (military) service. Similarly, in the following verse, he shall return from the warfare of the service.

(29) To keep the charge.—A clear distinction is here made between the service which involved heavy manual labour in carrying the furniture of the Tabernacle and in slaughtering the victims, and the charge or oversight of the furniture and the vessels of the Sanctuary.

The Limits of the Levites' Service.

CHAPTER IX. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the first month of the second year after they were come out of the land of Egypt, saying, (2) Let the children of Israel also keep the passover at his appointed season. (3) In the fourteenth day of this month, at even, ye shall keep it in his appointed season: according to all the rites of it, and according to all the ceremonies thereof, shall ye keep it. (4) And Moses spake unto the children of Israel, that they should keep the passover. (5) And they kept the passover on the fourteenth day of the first month at even in the wilderness of Sinai: according to all that the Lord commanded Moses, so did the children of Israel.

(6) And there were certain men, who

In the first month of the second year.—The celebration of the Passover, as recorded in this chapter, preceded in order of time the numbering of the people recorded in chap. i., and the other events which were connected with it. No provision had hitherto been made for the celebration of the Passover in the wilderness. A special injunction was, therefore, required for this purpose. Had it not been for the rebellion of the people, the next Passover after the original Egyptian Passover would have been celebrated in the land of Canaan, and it was for that one only that provision had been made (Exod. xii. 25).

(3) At even.—Hebrew, between the two evenings. (See Note on Exod. xii. 6.)

According to all the rites of it, and according to all the statutes and ordinances thereof.—Better, according to all the statutes and ordinances respecting the Passover which were of permanent obligation. (Comp. verse 12, where the ordinance respecting the time of observance is necessarily excluded.) Some of these are found in Exod. xii., whilst others of a later date are recorded in Lev. xvii., and Deut. xvi. It has been objected that three priests (for Nadab and Abihu were dead) could not sprinkle the blood of the large number of lambs which must have slain. It must be remembered, however, (1) that there is no express injunction respecting the sprinkling of the blood on this occasion; and (2) that the priests were probably assisted at this time in the performance of some of their duties—as we are expressly informed that they were at the Passovers celebrated by Hezekiah and by Josiah (2 Chron. xxx. 16, xxxv. 11)—by the Levites.

(5) And they kept the passover on the fourteenth day . . .—There is no mention here of the observance of the feast of unleavened bread for seven days, as it was enjoined in Exod. xii. 18. It might not have been practicable to obtain a sufficient quantity of flour to last so large a number of people for seven days, though it may have been easy to procure from Midian or elsewhere a sufficient quantity for one meal.

(6) And there were certain men . . .—It has been supposed that the reference is to Mishael and Elzaphan, who appear to have buried their cousins, none of it unto the morning, neither break any bone of it: according to all the ordinances of the passover they shall keep it. (13) But the man that is clean, and is not in a journey, and forbeareth to keep the passover, even the same soul shall be cut off from among his people: because he brought not the offering of the Lord in his appointed season, that man shall bear his sin. (14) And if a stranger shall sojourn among you, and will keep the passover unto the Lord, according to the ordinance of the passover, and according to the manner thereof, so shall he do: ye shall have one ordinance, both for the stranger, and for him that was born in the land.

(15) And on the day that the tabernacle was reared up the cloud covered the tabernacle, namely, the tent of the testimony: and at even there was upon the tabernacle as it were the appearance

(12) According to all the ordinances.—The word rendered ordinances is in the singular number: according to all the ordinance (or statute). The primary reference is probably to the law respecting the Paschal Lamb. According to Jewish tradition the feast was only observed for one day instead of seven, and it was not necessary to put away leaven.

(13) Shall bear his sin.—i.e., shall be put to death. (Comp. Lev. xxvi. 15; Num. xviii. 22.)

(14) And if a stranger . . . —The law respecting the stranger is contained in Exod. xii. 48, 49.

(15) The cloud covered the tabernacle, namely, the tent of the testimony.—Better, the tabernacle of (or, belonging to) the tent of the testimony. It is stated in Exod. xii. 34, after the account of the erection of the Tabernacle, that the cloud covered the Tent of Meeting, and that the glory of the Lord filled the Tabernacle. There is, therefore, no sufficient ground for the supposition that the cloud rested on that part of the Tabernacle exclusively in which the two tables of the testimony were kept, i.e., the Holy of Holies. On the contrary, it is stated in Exod. xxi. 21—23 that the cloud covering the Tabernacle is repeated in this place, inasmuch as the history which follows relates the removal of the Tabernacle under the guidance of the same cloud which covered it at its erection.

And at even.—The dark side of the cloud afforded a grateful shade by day, and the bright side of the cloud served to supply light by night. Comp. Ps. lxxviii. 14: "In the day-time also He led them with a cloud, and all the night with a light of fire; and Neh. ix. 12: "Then leddest them in the day by a cloudy pillar, and in the night by a pillar of fire, to give them light in the way.
of fire, until the morning. (16) So it was—alway: the cloud covered it by day, and the appearance of fire by night. (17) And when the cloud was taken up from the tabernacle, then after that the children of Israel journeyed: and in the place where the cloud abode, there the children of Israel pitched their tents. (18) At the commandment of the Lord the children of Israel journeyed, and at the commandment of the Lord they pitched: "as long as the cloud abode upon the tabernacle they rested in their tents. (19) And when the cloud tarried long upon the tabernacle many days, then the children of Israel kept the charge of the Lord, and journeyed not. (20) And so it was, when the cloud was a few days upon the tabernacle; according to the commandment of the Lord they abode in their tents, and according to the commandment of the Lord they journeyed. (21) And so it was, when the cloud abode from even unto the morning, and that the cloud was taken up in the morning, then they journeyed: whether it was by day or by night that the cloud was taken up, they journeyed. (22) Or whether it were two days, or a month, or a year, that the cloud tarried upon the tabernacle, remaining thereon, the children of Israel abode in their tents, and journeyed not: but when it was taken up, they journeyed. (23) At the commandment of the Lord they rested in the tents, and at the commandment of the Lord they journeyed: they kept the charge of the Lord, at the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses.

CHAPTER X.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Make thee two trumpets of silver; of a whole piece shalt thou make them: that thou mayest use them for the calling of the assembly, and for the journeying of the camps. (3) And when they shall blow with them, all the assembly shall assemble themselves to thee at the door of the tabernacle of the congregation. (4) And if they blow but with one verse that there must have been sentinels constantly watching by night as well as by day, whose office it was to give notice when the cloud was removed. (Comp. Ps. cxxxiv. 1.)

(22) Or a year.—Literally, days (comp. Gen. iv. 3, xl. 4, and Notes). If the rendering of the Authorised Version, "a year," is correct, as it probably is, it will follow that these words could not have been written until after the first arrival at Kadesh (chap. xiii. 26), and probably not until after the end of the wanderings in the wilderness. The elaborate manner in which the statement is made and repeated in almost identical terms shows the great importance which the writer ascribed to the Divine guardianship which was exercised over the Israelites, and to their submission to the miraculous guidance which was given to them.

X.

(2) Of a whole piece.—Better, of beaten (or, turned) work. (See Notes on Exod. xxv. 18, 31.) The trumpets here spoken of are supposed to have been straight, like that on the triumphal arch of Titus at Rome and on the old Egyptian monuments. In this respect the hazozerah is supposed to have differed from the cororn or horn, keren or shophar (which is interchanged with keren), which was crooked. (See Josh. vi. 5, compared with vi. 4, 6, 8, 13.) We find reference to the jubilee trumpet in Lev. xxv. 9, from which it has been inferred that the trumpets here mentioned were not first made at this time. It is true, indeed, that the first verse might be rendered: "Now the Lord had spoken unto Moses, saying;" but the word used in Lev. xxv. 9 is shophar, not hazozerah, and the latter word occurs in this place for the first time.

(4) With one trumpet.—Or, but once (or, at the same time). (Comp. Job. xxxiii. 14; Prov. xxviii. 18; trumpet, then the princes, which are heads of the thousands of Israel, shall gather themselves unto thee. (5) When ye blow an alarm, then the camps that lie on the east parts shall go forward. (6) When ye blow an alarm the second time, then the camps that lie on the south side shall take their journey; they shall blow an alarm for their journeys. (7) But when the congregation is to be gathered together, ye shall blow, but ye shall not sound an alarm. (8) And the sons of Aaron, the priests, shall blow with the trumpets; and they shall be to you for an ordinance for ever throughout your generations. (9) And if ye go to war in your land against the enemy that oppresseth you, of Sinai; and the cloud rested in the wilderness of Paran. (13) And they first took their journey according to the commandment of the Lord by the hand of Moses. (14) In the first place went the standard of the camp of the children of Judah according to their armies: and over his host was Nahashon the son of Amminadab. (15) And over the host of the tribe of the children of Issachar was Nethaneel the son of Zuar. (16) And over the host of the tribe of the children of Zebulun was Eliab the son of Helon. (17) And the tabernacle was taken down; and the sons of Gershon and the sons of Merari set forward, bearing the tabernacle. (18) And the standard of the camp of Reuben set forward according to their armies: and over his host was Elizur the son of Shedeur. (19) And over the host of the tribe of the children of Simeon was Shelumiel the son of Zurishaddai. (20) And over the host of the tribe of the children of Gad was Eliasaph the son of Deuel. (21) And the Kohathites set forward, bearing the sanctuary; and the other did set up the tabernacle against they came. (22) And the standard of the camp of the children of Ephraim set forward according to their armies: and over his host was Elisham a the son of Ammihud. (23) And over the host of the tribe of the children of Manasseh was Gamaliel the son of Pedahzur. (24) And over the host of the tribe of the children of Benjamin was Abidan the son of Gideoni. (25) And the standard of the camp of the children of Dan set forward, which was the rewar d of all the camps throughout their hosts: and over his host was Ahiezer the son of Ammishaddai. (26) And over the host of the tribe of the children of Asher was Pagiel the son of Ocran. (27) And over the host of the tribe of the children of Naphtali was Ahira the son of Enan. (28) Thus were the journeyings of the children of Israel according to their armies, when they set forward.

And Moses said unto Hobab, the son of Raguel the Midianite, Moses' father in law, We are journeying unto (29) When they set forward.—Better, and they set forward. (30) Hobab, the son of Raguel the Midianite, Moses' father in law.—Raguel is the same as Reuel (Exod. ii. 18), and the orthography should be the same in all places. Reuel is commonly supposed to be identical with Jether (Exod. iv. 18), or Jethro (Exod. iii. 1), who is frequently described as the hothen (in the Authorised Version, "father-in-law") of Moses (chap. xviii. 2, 5, 6, &c.). But, according to the ordinary rules of Hebrew syntax, Hobab, not Jethro, is here spoken of as the hothen of Moses; and in Judg. iv. 11 he is expressly so called. Inasmuch, however, as the cognate noun hothen is used to designate any near relation by marriage—as, e.g., the sons-in-law of Lot (Gen. xix. 14)—the word hothen may here and in Judg. iv. 11 be rendered brother-in-law. Some, however, think that Hobab, whether identical with Jethro or not, was the son of Reuel, and that Zipporah was the daughter of Hobab. But when it is remembered that more than forty years had elapsed since Moses left the land of Egypt and came into that of Midian, and that he was now upwards of eighty years of age, it is much more probable that he should seek the aid of a guide through the wilderness amongst those of the same generation with Zipporah than amongst those of a generation above her. Whether Hobab accompanied Jethro on the occasion of the visit to Moses which is recorded in Exod. xviii., whilst the Israelites were encamped at Sinai, and remained with them after Jethro's departure (verse 27), or whether the Israelites had already commenced their journey (compare the words of Moses, "We are journeying," or, setting forward, with the concluding words of verse 25, and they set forward, and were at this time passing through the territory in which Hobab, the Son of Raguel.

---

NUMBERS, X.

The Blessing of Moses.

of the Lord three days' journey: and the ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them in the three days' journey, to search out a resting place for them. And the cloud of the Lord was upon them by day, when they went out of the camp. And it came to pass, when the ark set forward, that Moses said, 'Rise up, Lord, and let thine enemies be scattered; and let them that hate thee flee before thee. And when it rested, he said, Return, O Lord, unto the many thousands of Israel.'

Hobab, as the chief of a nomad tribe, was living, cannot positively be determined.

We are journeying unto the place...—These words imply a strong faith in God's promise on the part of Moses, and a desire, not indeed altogether devoid of reference to mutual advantages, that those with whom he was connected by ties of earthly relationship should be partakers with himself and his people in the peculiar blessings which were promised to the chosen people of God. In any case, the invitation of Moses, when viewed as the mouthpiece of the Jewish Church, may be regarded in the light of an instructive lesson to the Church of Christ in all ages. It is alike the duty and the privilege of all who have heard and obeyed the Gospel invitation themselves to become the instruments of its communication to others. "The Spirit and the bride say, Come. And let him that heareth say, Come" (Rev. xxii. 17).

And he said unto him, I will not go...—It is not expressly stated in the narrative whether Hobab did or did not ultimately accompany the Israelites on their march. It appears most probable, however, that the renewed solicitation of Moses proved effectual. In any case, it is certain from Judg. i. 16 that the Kenites, as a body, "went up out of the city of palm trees with the children of Judah into the wilderness of Judah," and that "they went and dwelt among the people." (See Judg. i. 16, iv. 11; 1 Sam. xv. 6; 2 Kings x. 15; compared with 1 Chron. ii. 55.)

How are we to encamp...—It is clear from these words, as well as from many indications of the same nature, that notwithstanding the direct guidance which was vouchsafed from heaven, and the miraculous interpositions of Providence which the Israelites experienced throughout their journeys, Moses did not neglect to take advantage of all the ordinary precautions of which it was incumbent upon him as the leader of his people to avail himself. The line of march and the places of encampment were clearly marked out by the cloud, but many difficulties would arise in the course of the journeys, and at the places of encampment, which Hobab's familiarity with the desert would enable him to meet.

Three days' journey.—The place at which the first protracted halt was made appears to have been either at Taberah, which means burning, or at Kibresh-hattaavah, the graves of last. (Comp. chaps. xi. 3, xxxii. 16; see also Note on chap. xi. 34.) And the ark of the covenant of the Lord went before them. It has been inferred from the fact that the Kohathites had the charge of the ark (chap. iii. 31), and that they were to set forward, "bearing the sanctuary," after the second or southern camp, i.e., in the midst of the host, that the position of the ark during the journeys was in that place, and not in front. The obvious objection to this supposition arising out of the fact that the cloud which directed the march rested upon, or over, the ark may be overcome by the consideration that the cloud appears to have extended over the whole of the host during the journeys, and to have served as a protection from the scorching heat (see verse 34; also Exod. xiii. 21; Neh. ix. 12; Ps. cv. 33). On the other hand, the natural interpretation of this verse is that the ark was borne in front of the host, and did not merely serve to direct its line of march as a general, whose station might be in any part of an army. This interpretation is confirmed by Exod. xiii. 21, Deut. i. 33, and also by the position which the ark occupied at the passage of the Jordan. In the latter case the people were expressly directed to go after the ark (Josh. iii. 3); and in verse 11 the same word is used which occurs in this verse, "the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth passed over before you into Jordan." It will not follow, however, as a necessary inference, that the ark uniformly occupied the same position in all the journeys, and it cannot be denied that verse 21 presents a difficulty, partly arising from the ambiguity of meaning which is to be attached to the word mikdash, sanctuary, and partly from the omission of any word in the Hebrew corresponding to the words in italics, the other. Ibn Ezra thinks that this three days' journey was different from all the other journeys in respect of the position of the ark.

And it came to pass...—It appears from these words that the marches of the Israelites began and ended with prayer, a significant lesson to the Church of all after ages. It is deserving of observation that the prayers were offered by Moses, not by Aaron. The inverted noms, or parenthetical marks, which are found in a large number of Hebrew manuscripts at the beginning and end of these verses, are thought by some to denote their insertion as a break in the narrative whilst others have ascribed to them a mystical meaning. The words, "Return, O Lord," Bishop Wordsworth observes, "pre-announced the blessed time of rest and peace, when God would abide with His Church on earth, by the gift of the Holy Ghost, and will tabernacle for ever with His people in heavenly rest and joy." (Rev. vii. 15; xxi. 3.)
CHAPTER XI.  — (1) And when the people complained ... Better, And the people were as those who complained (or murmured), (which was) evil in the ears of the Lord. The LXX. has, “And the people murmured sinfully before the Lord.” Comp. 1 Cor. x. 10: “Neither murmure ye as some of them also murmured.” And consumed them that were in the utmost parts of the camp.—Better, and devoured at the extremity of the camp. Most commentators have remarked, and justly, upon the great severity of the Divine judgments which were inflicted after the giving of the Law, as compared with those which were inflicted before it. Reference may be made in illustration of this point to Exod. xiv. 11—14, xv. 21, 25, xvi. 2—8, xvii. 3—7. The writer of the Epistle to the Hebrews argues from the just recompense of reward which every transgression and disobedience received under the Law, the impossibility of the escape of those who neglect the great salvation of the Gospel. See Heb. ii. 2, 3. Comp. also Heb. x. 28, 29, xii. 25.

(2) The fire was quenched.—Better, subsided or sunk down. No precise information is given as to the extent of the fire, or as to the objects which it destroyed. It broke out in the extremity of the encampment, and it was arrested in its progress at the supplication of Moses. It seems, however, more probable that it consumed some of the Israelites themselves, than that it consumed only some of their tents. Some suppose that the reference is to the simoom, or fiery south wind, which sometimes blows in the Eastern desert, and which stifles those over whom it sweeps.

(3) Taberah — i.e., burning. A word cognate to the verb which is rendered burnt in verse 1 and in this verse.

(4) And the mixt multitude.—The Authorized Version follows the LXX. and the Vulgate in rendering the word asaph-saph, which occurs only in this place, and which is derived from a verb which means to collect, in the same way as the ereb of Exod. xii. 33, a mixed multitude, vulgus promiscuum — in many cases, probably, the children of Hebrew women by Egyptian fathers. This mixed multitude appears to have been very considerable, and they may have become, as the Gibeonites at a later period, servants to the Israelites, as hewers of wood and drawers of water (Deut. xxix. 11). It is probable that this mixed multitude may have partaken even more largely than the Israelites of the fish and vegetables of Egypt, and they appear to have instigated the Israelites to repine at the depravation to which they were exposed in the wilderness. There is no mention in Exod. xvi. 3 of weeping, but the same craving after the flesh-pots of Egypt was probably manifested in the same manner in both cases.

Who shall give us flesh to eat?—The word basar, which is rendered flesh, seems here to include it may be to have primary reference to—fish. It is used of fish in Lev. xi. 11, and it is obvious from verse 22 that it was understood by Moses in this general signification. Cp. the use of flesh (1 Cor. xv. 39).

(3) We remember the fish ...—Classical writers and modern travellers agree in bearing testimony to the abundance of the fish in the Nile and in the neighbouring canals and reservoirs. The cucumbers in Egypt are of great size and finely flavoured. The water-melons serve to moderate the internal heat which the climate produces. (See The Land and the Book, p. 588. The word rendered leeks (in Ps. civ. 14, grass for cattle) is supposed by some to denote a species of clover which is peculiar to Egypt, and of which the young and fresh shoots are said to be used as food and to be an excellent stomachic. The onions of Egypt are said to be the sweetest in the world, and they constitute the common food of the lowest class of the people. Garlic is still much used by the modern Arabs. It is only the fish, which was probably equally within the reach of all, of which the Israelites are said to have eaten freely, i.e., not abundantly, but gratuitously. It is probable, however, that many of them cultivated the land to a greater or lesser degree, and so procured vegetables for themselves.

(6) There is nothing at all ...—Better, there is nothing, except that our eyes (look) upon, the manna.

(7) And the manna was ...—The design of the description of the manna in this place (comp. Exod. xvi. 14, 31, and Notes in loc.; also Article Manna, in “Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible”) was probably to exhibit in its just light the sinfulness of the Israelites in repining at the merciful provision which God had made for the supply of their wants. The dissatisfaction of the Israelites with the sweet bread of heaven, and their craving after the more savoury and more stimulating food of Egypt may be regarded as typical of man’s natural repugnance to the spiritual food which is provided in the Gospel, and his restless cravings after the pleasures of the world.

(8) As the taste of fresh oil.—Or, of a hot cake of oil. In Exod. xvi. 31 the taste of the manna is said to have been “like wafers made with honey.” The ancients used flour cakes mixed with oil and honey.
and the taste of it was as the taste of fresh oil. (9) And when the dew fell upon the camp in the night, the manna fell upon it.

(10) Then Moses heard the people weep throughout their families, every man in the door of his tent: and the anger of the Lord was kindled greatly; Moses also was displeased. (11) And Moses said unto the Lord, Wherefore hast thou afflicted thy servant? and wherefore have I not found favour in thy sight, that thou layest the burden of all this people upon me? (12) Have I conceived all this people? have I begotten them, that thou shouldest say unto me, Carry them in thy bosom, as a nursing father carreareth the sucking child, unto the land which thou swarest unto their fathers? (13) Whence should I have flesh to give unto all this people? for they weep unto me, saying, Give us flesh, that we may eat. (14) I am not able to bear all this people alone, because it is too heavy for me. (15) And if thou deal thus with me, kill me, I pray thee, out of hand, if I have found favour in thy sight; and let me not see my wretchedness.

(16) And the Lord said unto Moses, Gather unto me seventy men of the elders of Israel, whom thou knowest to be the elders of the people, and officers over them; and bring them unto the tabernacle of the congregation, that they may stand there with thee. (17) And I will come down and talk with thee there: and I will take of the spirit which is upon thee, and will put it upon them; and they shall bear the burden of the people with thee, that thou bear it not thyself alone. (18) And say thou unto the people, Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow, and ye shall eat flesh: for ye have wept in the ears of the Lord, saying, Who shall give us flesh to eat? for it was well with us in Egypt: therefore the Lord will give you flesh, and ye shall eat. (19) Ye shall not eat one day, nor two days, nor five days, neither ten days, nor twenty days; (20) But even a whole month, until it come out at your nostrils, and it be loathsome unto you: because that ye have despised the Lord which is among you, and have wept before him, saying, Why came we forth out of Egypt?

(9) Moses also was displeased.—Or, And it was evil (or, displeasing) in the eyes of Moses. Moses was displeased with the people on account of their murmuring, and he was oppressed with the heavy burden of responsibility to which he felt himself unequal.

(11) Wherefore hast thou afflicted.—Literally, done evil to: the same verb, in a different conjugation, which is rendered "displeased" in verse 10.

(12) Have I conceived . . .?—The personal pronoun is emphatic in this and the following clause: Is it I who have conceived all this people? Is it I who have brought them forth? (or, begotten them), as in Gen. iv. 18 x. 8.

(13) Whence should I have flesh . . .?—Moses does not justify the murmuring of the people, and was doubtless conscious of their sinfulness. At the same time, he displays a spirit of discontent, and almost of despair, at God's dealings with himself; and he appears to treat the demand of the Israelites for flesh as one which was not altogether unreasonable.

(14) To bear all this people alone.—In accordance with the advice of Jethro, able men had been chosen out of all Israel who heard and determined the small matters which arose among them (Exod. xviii. 25, 26), but they were of no avail on occasions such as the present.

My wretchedness.—Or, my evil. This is one of the eighteen places in which the serpises are said to have altered the text, and to have substituted my for Thy.

(15) Kill me, I pray thee, out of hand.—Or, Make an utter end of me.

(16) Seventy men of the elders of Israel . . .—We find mention made of elders of the people in Exod. iii. 16, and of officers (shocherim) in Exod. v. 16; also of seventy elders in Exod. xxiv. 1. Frequent mention is made in Scripture of the number seventy—a number which is composed of the two sacred numbers seven and ten—the former being the seal of the covenant, and the latter probably denoting perfection. The seventy who were chosen on the present occasion may have consisted of some of those who were appointed as judges at the suggestion of Jethro, but there is no evidence of their identity with any persons previously selected.

(17) And I will come down . . .—The cloud which hovered over the Tabernacle appears to have descended to the entrance of it (verse 25). (Comp. Exod. xxxiii. 9; Num. xii. 5; Deut. xxxi. 15.)

I will take of the spirit which is upon thee . . .—These words do not imply that there was any diminution of the gifts bestowed upon Moses, but that a portion of these spiritual gifts was bestowed upon the seventy. Rashi compares the mode of bestowal with the manner in which the other lamps of the Sanctuary were lighted at the golden candlestick without diminishing the light from which theirs was taken.

(18) Sanctify yourselves against to-morrow.—(Comp. Exod. xix. 10.) The Israelites were required to sanctify themselves by purification for the more immediate manifestation of the Divine presence, although their request was a sinful one, and was granted in judgment as well as—or even more than—in mercy. (Comp. Ps. cxvi. 15: "And he gave them their request; but sent leanness into their soul.

(19) Ye shall not eat one day . . .—The quails which had been sent the preceding year appear to have covered the camp only during one day (Exod. xvi. 13).
(20) And Moses said, The people, among whom I am, are six hundred thousand footmen; and thou hast said, I will give them flesh, that they may eat a whole month. (20) Shall the flocks and the herds be slain for them, to suffice them? or shall all the fish of the sea be gathered together for them, to suffice them? (20) and the Lord said unto Moses, Is the Lord's hand waxed short? thou shalt see now whether my word shall come to pass unto thee or not.

(21) And Moses went out, and told the people the words of the Lord, and gathered the seventy men of the elders of the people, and set them round about the tabernacle. (21) And the Lord came down in a cloud, and spake unto him, and took of the spirit that was upon him, and gave it unto the seventy elders: and it came to pass, that, when the spirit rested upon them, they prophesied, and did not cease. (21) But there remained two of the men in the camp, the name of the one was Eldad, and the name of the other Medad: and the spirit rested upon them; and they were of them that were written, but went not out unto the tabernacle: and they prophesied in the camp. (21) And there ran a young man, and told Moses, and said, Eldad and Medad do prophesy in the camp. (21) And Joshua the son of Nun, the servant of Moses, one of his young men, answered and said, My lord Moses, forbid them. (21) And Moses said unto him, Enviest thou for my sake? would God that all the Lord's people were prophets, and that the Lord would put his spirit upon them! (21) And Moses gathered all the elders of Israel.

(21) And there went forth a six wind from the Lord, and brought quails from the sea, and let them fall by the camp as it was a day's journey on this side, and as it was a day's journey on the other side, round about the camp, and as it were two cubits high upon the face of

(20) Six hundred thousand footmen.—In chap. i. 46 the number is stated to be 603,550; but here, as elsewhere, a round number is mentioned.

(20) Shall the flocks and the herds . . . ?—Rather, Shall flocks and herds . . . ? The definite article is not used here, nor the possessive pronoun, as elsewhere, where the flocks and herds of the Israelites are denoted. (Comp. Exod. x. 9, xxxiv. 3; Deut. xii. 6.) There is no evidence, therefore, that Moses alluded exclusively, or even primarily, to the flocks and herds which the Israelites had brought out of Egypt. Moreover, a large number of the sheep and goats must have been recently slain at the Passover. Whether the encampment was, or was not within an easy distance of the Ælantic Gulf, the gathering together of the fish of the sea in sufficient quantities to satisfy such a multitude for so long a time would require a miraculous agency; and the same agency could also bring together from unknown sources flocks and herds. The expression may be regarded as a form of natural hyperbole.

(20) And Moses went out . . . i.e., as it should seem, from the tabernacle of the congregation, where he had been conversing with God.

Round about the tabernacle.—This does not necessarily imply that the seventy men were placed so that they surrounded the whole of the tent of meeting. (Comp. Exod. vii. 24, where the word means on both sides of the river; also Job xxx. 5, where the same word is rendered about.)

(20) In a cloud.—Hebrew, In the cloud.

And gave it unto . . .—Better, and put it upon, as in Lev. ii. 15.

They prophesied, and did not cease.—Better, they prophesied, but did so no more. (Comp. Gen. vii. 12; Exod. xi. 6; 2 Sam. ii. 25; so the LXX.) The word prophecy does not necessarily denote the prediction of future events. It is elsewhere employed to denote the celebration of the praises of God, either with the voice or with instruments of music. (Comp. 1 Sam. x. 6; 1 Kings xviii. 29; 1 Chron. xxv. 1, 2, 3; Jer. xxix. 26.)

(20) My lord Moses, forbid them.—The motive which prompted Joshua in making this request appears to have been similar to that which led St. John to forbid the man to cast out devils who did not follow with the Apostles (Mark ix. 38, 39; Luke ix. 49, 50). But as the man did not cast out devils in his own name, but in that of Christ, so in this case Eldad and Medad prophesied in virtue of the spirit which rested upon them from above, of which the Holy Ghost, not Moses, was the giver. The motives which deterred Eldad and Medad from going to the tent of meeting are unknown. The history teaches the freeness and the sovereignty of the Holy Spirit's influences, as afterwards did that of Cornelius, when the Holy Ghost fell upon him and upon those who were with him, previously to the reception of baptism, and they spoke with tongues and magnified God (Acts x. 44—18).

(20) Enviest thou for my sake?—Better, Art thou zealous for me? or, Art thou displeased on my account? (Comp. chap. xxv. 13; 1 Kings xix. 10, 14.)

(20) And there went forth a wind.—In Ps. lxxxviii. 26 we read thus: "He caused an east wind to blow in the heaven: and by his power he brought in the south wind." A south-east wind would bring the quails from the neighbourhood of the Red Sea, where they abound.

And let them fall.—Better, and scattered them (or, spread them out). (Comp. 1 Sam. xxx. 16: "They were spread abroad upon all the earth," or, over all the ground.

Round about.—See Note on verse 24.

As it were two cubits high upon the face of the earth.—Or, about two cubits over (or, above) the ground. Had the quails lain upon the earth in a heap for any considerable time, life could only have been preserved by miraculous interference with the ordinary laws of nature, and the Israelites were not allowed to eat of that which had died of itself. Quails commonly fly low, and when wearied with a long flight might fly only about breast-high. On the other hand, the more obvious interpretation of the words is that the quails were spread over the ground, and covered it in some places to the height of two cubits. They were probably taken and killed immediately on their descent, as the following verse seems to indicate, and then spread out and dried and hardened in the sun. Some think that the word which is here rendered quails denotes cranes.

(32) Ten homers.—The homer, which was equal to ten ephahs, or a hundred omer's, appears to have contained between five and six bushels, according to the Rabbinites, but according to Josephus about double that quantity.

(33) With a very great plague.—The noun, maccab, plague, is eponym to the verb which is rendered smote. It is frequently used of a stroke inflicted by God, as, e.g., pestilence or any epidemic sickness. A surfeit, such as that in which the Israelites had indulged, especially under the circumstances in which they were placed, would naturally produce a considerable amount of sickness. Here, then, as in the account of the plagues of Egypt and in other parts of the sacred history, the natural and the supernatural are closely combined.

(34) Kibroth-hattaavah—i.e., the graves of lust (or, desire). In Numbers xxxiii, 16, Kibroth-hattaavah is mentioned as the first station after the departure from Sinai, whereas it is obvious that there must have been an encampment at Taberah. Taberah may have been the name given to a part of Kibroth-hattaavah, or the two names may have belonged to the same place.

XII.

I. And Miriam and Aaron spake against Moses.—Miriam appears to have been the leader in this insurrection against the authority of Moses. Her name occurs before that of Aaron, either as the nearer or as the more prominent subject; and the verb which is rendered “spake” is in the feminine gender. Moreover, the judgment which was inflicted (verse 10) fell upon Miriam, not upon Aaron, who seems to have yielded to the suggestions of Miriam, as he had previously done to the request of the Israelites in regard to the golden calf.

Because of the Ethiopian woman whom he had married.—Some suppose that the reference is to Zipporah, who may have been included amongst the Asiatic division of the Ethiopians, or Cushites (comp. Hab. iii. 7, where the tents of Cushan, or Cush, are coupled with the curtilages of Midian), and that the occasion of the opposition to Moses was the undue influence which he is supposed to have allowed Hobab and other members of Zipporah's family to exercise over him. This supposition, however, seems improbable on many accounts. The words, “for he had married an Ethiopian woman,” naturally point to some recent occurrence, and not to one which had taken place more than forty years previously, and which is, therefore, very unlikely to have given occasion to the murmuring of Miriam and Aaron at this time. Moreover, the murmuring is expressly connected with the Cushite herself, not with any of the subsequent or incidental results of the marriage. It seems, therefore, much more probable that Zipporah was dead, and that Moses had married one of the African Cushites who had accompanied the Israelites in their march out of Egypt, or one of the Cushites who dwelt in Arabia, and who were found at this time in the neighbourhood of Sinai. A similar marriage had been contracted by Joseph, and such marriages were not forbidden by the Law, which prohibited marriage with the Cananites (Exod. xxxiv. 16).

(2) Hath the Lord indeed spoken only by Moses?—There is probably a reference in these words to the facts related in Exod. iv. 10—16, where Moses speaks of his own slowness of speech (verse 10), and where it is said of Aaron, “And he shall be thy spokesman unto the people” (verse 16). Miriam also is spoken of in Exod. xv. 20 as the prophetess. “Such is the depravity of human nature,” writes Calvin, “that they not only abuse the gifts of God towards the brother whom they despise, but by an ungodly and sacrilegious glorification exalt the gifts themselves in such a manner as to hide the Author of the gifts.”

(3) Now the man Moses was very meek...—These words have been urged by some as an argument against the Mosaic authorship of the Pentateuch generally, or of the Book of Numbers in particular, but whether they may or may not have been inserted by a later writer, this inference is altogether unfounded. “It is possible that the writer of Deut. xxxiv. 10 may have inserted these words in this place. On the other hand, there is no necessity for such a supposition.” An objective statement, such as that contained in these words, is perfectly consistent with true humility and with a deep sense of sinfulness and frailty. When such expressions are required in order to a full understanding of all the circumstances of the history, they afford no just ground of objection either against the writer, or against the genuineness of the writing; and least of all can they be justly objected to in the case of those who, like Moses and St. Paul, were ever ready to sacrifice their
And the Lord spake suddenly unto Moses, and unto Aaron, and unto Miriam. Come out ye three unto the tabernacle of the congregation. And they three came out. And the Lord came down in the pillar of the cloud, and stood in the door of the tabernacle, and called Aaron and Miriam: and they both came forth.

And he said, Hear now my words: If there be a prophet among you, I the Lord will make myself known unto him in a vision, and will speak unto him in a dream. My servant Moses is not so, who is faithful in all mine house. With him will I speak mouth to mouth, even apparently, and not in dark speeches; and the similitude of the Lord shall he behold: wherefore then were ye not afraid to speak against my servant Moses? And the anger of the Lord was kindled against them; and he departed.

And the cloud departed from off the tabernacle; and, behold, Miriam became leprous, white as snow: and Aaron looked upon Miriam, and, behold, she was leprous.

(11) And Aaron said unto Moses, Alas, my lord, I beseech thee, lay not the sin upon us, wherein we have done foolishly, and wherein we have sinned. Let her not be as one dead.

own personality in the cause to which they had devoted their lives (comp. 2 Cor. xi. 5). It may be observed, further, that the word anaw, meek, is frequently interchanged with the cognate word ani, and that the meaning may be bowed down, or oppressed.

Come out ye three . . .—There is nothing in these words which implies that Miriam entered into the Tabernacle itself. Moses, Aaron, and Miriam were summoned to go out of the camp (comp. chap. xi. 30), and to come to the entrance of the Tabernacle, or rather of the court, inasmuch as the command to come as far as the entrance into the Sanctuary appears to have been given afterwards (verse 5). It must be remembered that there was but one court at this time.

If there be a prophet . . .—Better. If there be to (or, among) ye a prophet of Jehovah, I will make myself known unto him in a vision, and speak unto him. The LXX. and Vulgate connect the word "Jehovah" with the former, not with the latter part of the clause. The mode of communication between God and Moses differed in the respects which are enumerated in verse 8 from the mode of communication by visions or dreams, in which God communicated His will to others.

With him will I speak . . .—Better, do I speak, mouth to mouth. Comp. Exod. xxxiii. 11.

Even apparently.—The noun marah, which is here used, is cognate with that which occurs with the preposition in verse 6, and which is rendered "a vision." It differs from it only in punctuation, and is sometimes identical in meaning. It appears, however, to denote an objective reality, as in Exod. iii. 3, where it is rendered sight. The clause might be rendered, and (as an appearance, and not in riddles (or, enigmas).

And the similitude of the Lord . . .—Or, and the form of Jehovah doth he behold. The word which is here rendered similitude (temunah) is the same which occurs in Exod. xx. 4; Deut. iv. 15, 16, 23, 25, v. 8; Ps. xvii. 15. It is sometimes rendered likenesses, and sometimes similitude. The noun marah, which is here rendered "apparently," and that which is rendered similitude, are found in conjunction in Job iv. 16: "I could not discern the form (or appearance), march, thereof: an image (or form), temunah, was before mine eyes." (Comp. Exod. xxxiii. 20—23.)

And the cloud departed . . .—The withdrawal of the cloud was the visible token of the Divine displeasure. The word sur, departed, which is here used, is an entirely different word from that which occurs in chap. ix. 17: "When the cloud was taken up from the tabernacle." The lifting up of the cloud was the signal for the breaking up of the camp and the resumption of the march; the withdrawal of the cloud was the token of the withdrawal of the Divine presence and direction.

Leprous, white as snow.—Better, was leprous as snow, as in Exod. iv. 6, where the same words occur; or, a leper (as white), as snow, as in 2 Kings v. 27. In an ordinary case of leprosy, when the disease covered the whole body, and the whole of the flesh had turned white, the man was to be pronounced clean. It was otherwise in cases in which persons were smitten with leprosy by the immediate hand of God, as in the case of Moses and in that of Gehazi.

And Aaron looked upon Miriam . . .—Or, and Aaron turned towards Miriam—i.e., directed his attention to her, &c. This may have been the first case in which Aaron was required to carry into execution the laws laid down in Lev. xiii., xiv., respecting the inspection of the leper; and the duties which devolved upon him must have been doubly painful from the fact that the leper stood in a near relationship to himself, and that he had been a participant in the sin which had called for so severe a punishment.

Alas, my lord.—The word rendered alas! is an exclamation of entreaty rather than of lamentation. It is used towards superiors in conjunction with adoni (my lord) in Gen. xl. 20; 1 Kings iii. 17.

Lay not the sin upon us . . .—Better, lay not sin (i.e., the punishment which is due to it) upon us, for that (or, inasmuch as) we have done foolishly, &c. Aaron does not seek to shift the guilt which had been incurred from himself and Miriam to any others, but prays that they may not be constrained to bear the punishment which their sin had justly deserved. In Zechar. xiv. 19 the same word kattath is rendered punishment.

Let her not be as one dead.—This is another of the places in which the Scribes are said to have altered the text. The original is said to have been as follows:—Let her not be as one dead, who proceeded from the womb of our mother, and half of our flesh be consumed. The leper was "as one dead" in two respects—(1) as being slain out from inter-dead, of whom the flesh is half consumed when he cometh out of his mother's womb. (13) And Moses cried unto the Lord, saying, Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee. (14) And the Lord said unto Moses, If her father had but spit in her face, should she not be ashamed seven days? let her be shut out from the camp seven days, and after that let her be received in again. (15) And Miriam was shut out from the camp seven days: and the people journeyed not till Miriam was brought in again.

(16) And afterward the people removed from Hazeroth, and pitched in the wilderness of Paran.

CHAPTER XIII. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Send thou course with his brethren; and (2) as causing ceremonial delitement in the case of those who were brought into contact with him, similar to that which was caused by touching a dead body. "He was," as Archbishop Trench has remarked, "a dreadful parable of death." (On the Miracles, p. 214). In the most severe types of leprosy there was, as the same writer has observed, "a dissolution, little by little, of the whole body, so that one limb after another actually decayed and fell away." (Ibid., p. 213).

(13) Heal her now, O God, I beseech thee.—Better, O God, I beseech thee, heal her, I beseech thee.

(14) If her father had but spit in her face.—Or, in her presence. Spitting in the presence of any one, much more spitting in the face of any one, is regarded in the East as an indication of the utmost degree of abhorrence and indignation. Comp. Deut. xxv. 9; Job xxx. 10; Is. i. 6; Matt. xxvi. 67.

Seven days.—This was the time during which the person suspected of being leprous was to be shut up in the first instance (Lev. xiii. 4, 21, &c.); and this was also the time during which the leper, when cleansed, was to "tarry abroad out of his tent," after he had come into the camp, before the appointed sacrifices were offered on his behalf (Lev. xiv. 8, 10). It was thus that she who had placed herself on a level with the divinely-appointed head and ruler of her nation was to be excluded for seven days from any part or lot in the privileges which were enjoyed by the humblest member of the congregation.

(15) And the people journeyed not...—The law for the purification of the leper, as prescribed in Lev. xiv., had already been delivered.

(16) In the wilderness of Paran.—See Note on chap. x. 12. It appears from the 26th verse of the following chapter that the encampment was at Kadesh, which has been supposed by some to be identical with Rithmah (chap. xxxiii. 18).

XIII.

(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses...—There is no inconsistency between this statement and that which is contained in Deut. i. 22, where the sending of the spies is represented as having originated with the men, that they may search the land of Canaan, which I give unto the children of Israel: of every tribe of their fathers shall ye send a man, every one a ruler among them. (3) And Moses by the commandment of the Lord sent them from the wilderness of Paran: all those men were heads of the children of Israel. (4) And these were their names: of the tribe of Reuben, Shamshu the son of Zaacur. (5) Of the tribe of Simeon, Shaphat the son of Hori. (6) Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb the son of Jephunneh. (7) Of the tribe of Issachar, Igal the son of Joseph. (8) Of the tribe of Ephraim, Oshea the son of Nun. (9) Of the tribe of Benjamin, Palli the son of Raphu. (10) Of the tribe of Zebulun, Gaddiel, the son of Sodi. (11) Of the tribe of Joseph, people. It is there said that the saying pleased Moses well; but it would be wholly inconsistent with the character and conduct of Moses to suppose that in a matter of such importance he should have acted in accordance with the suggestion of the people, or upon his own judgment, without seeking direction from God. The command which was given to Moses must not be regarded as implying of necessity that the expedition of the spies was, in the first instance, ordained by God, any more than the command which was afterwards given to Balak to accompany the messengers of Balaam was any indication that God originally commanded, or approved of his journey.

(2) Every one a ruler among them.—Or, a prince among them, as in chap. i. 16. A comparison of the names which follow with those which are given in chap. i. 5—15 will show that the persons selected were not the tribal princes who are mentioned in connection with the census. The tribe of Levi, as in the former case, is not represented, as the Levites were to have no inheritance in the land, and the number of twelve, as in chap. i., is made up by the division of the tribe of Joseph into the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh.

(3) And Moses, by the commandment of the Lord, sent them, &c.—Better, And Moses sent them from the wilderness of Paran, according to the command (literally, the mouth) of the Lord, i.e., as appears from Deut. i. 19, from Kadesh-barnea.

(4) Caleb the son of Jephunneh.—In three places—viz., in chap. xxxii. 12; and in Josh. xiv. verses 6 and 14—Caleb is described as the Kenizzite (or rather, the Kenite). Now in Gen. xv. 19 the Kenizzites are mentioned as one of the Canaanite tribes, and in Gen. xxxvi. 11, 15, Kenaz occurs as an Edomite name. It has been conjectured from these facts, but, as it should seem, on insufficient grounds, that Caleb was of foreign origin, and that he had been incorporated into the tribe of Judah.

(5) Of the tribe of Ephraim.—It has been supposed that there is some displacement of the text in this verse. Thus far the order of the tribes is the same as in chap. i. 5—8. After Issachar, Zebulon (the sixth son of Leah) would naturally follow, as in chap. i. 9. Ephraim and Manasseh would naturally be connected, as in chap. i. 10. This supposition is supported by the occurrence of the name of Joseph in verses 7, 11. The order of the remaining four tribes is the same as in chap. i., except that the tribe of Naphtali is placed before, instead of after, that of Gad.

(16) And Moses called Oshea ...—It is not distinctly stated that the change of name took place at this time. It may have taken place at an earlier period, and have been confirmed on the present occasion, as in the case of Israel (Gen. xxxii. 28, xxxv. 10), and of Bethel (Gen. xxviii. 19, xxxv. 15). On the other hand, it is quite possible that the name may have been prophetically adopted in Exod. xvii. 9, 13, xxiv. 13, xxxii. 17, xxxii. 11, and Num. xi. 28. The original name Hoshea means help, or salvation. The name Joshua, or Jehoshua, means Jehovah is help, or salvation.

(17) Get you up this way southward.—Rather, by the Negeb, or south country (comp. verse 22). The southern part of Palestine was known by the name of the Negeb. It formed the transition from the desert to the more highly cultivated land, and was more fitted for grazing than for agricultural purposes. (See Wilton's The Negeb.)

Into the mountain.—The word which is here used commonly denotes the hill country, i.e., the mountainous part of Palestine, which was inhabited by the Hittites, Jebusites, and Amorites. It is called "the mount of the Amorites" in Deut. i. 7, inasmuch as the Amorites were the strongest of the Canaanite tribes. The same word is rendered "the mountains" in verse 29. The reference here, however, may be to the particular mount which was nearest to the encampment of the Israelites (see chap. xiv. 40).

(18) And see the land.—Or, inspect the land. The same word is used of the inspection of the leper by the priest in Lev. xiii. 3, 5, 6, 10, 13, &c.

(19) Whether in tents.—Better, in camps, i.e., in open villages and hamlets, as contrasted with strongholds or fortified places.

(20) Now the time ...—The first grapes ripen in Palestine as early as August, or even July, although the vintage does not take place until September or October.

(21) From the wilderness of Zin.—The name of the wilderness of Zin, in which Kadesh was situated, appears to have been given to the northern or northeastern part of the wilderness of Paran. Comp. chap. xx. 1, xxvii. 14, xxxiii. 36, xxxiv. 3, 4; Deut. xxxii. 51; Josh. xv. 1, 3.

Unto Rehob, as men come to Hamath.—Or, unto Rehob, at the entrance of Hamath. Rehob is supposed to be identical with the Beth-rehob of Judges xvii. 28, in the tribe of Naphtali. "The entrance of Hamath" formed the northern boundary of the land assigned to the Israelites (Num. xxxiv. 8).

(22) And they ascended by the south, and came.—The latter verb is in the singular number in the Hebrew text: he came. It is quite possible that the twelve spies may not always have been together, and that one only may have gone to Hebron.

Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai.—Some suppose these to be the names of tribes, not of individuals. It is quite possible, however, that the same individuals may have been still alive when the city of Hebron was assigned to Caleb, about fifty years later, and when he drove out these three sons of Anak (Josh. xv. 14).

The children of Anak.—Better, the children of the Anakim. (Comp. Deut. i. 28, ix. 2.) When Anak, as an individual, is mentioned, as in verse 53, the article is omitted.

Before Zoan in Egypt.—Zoan, or Tanis, on the eastern bank of the Tanitic arm of the Nile, appears to have been the residence of Pharaoh in the days of Moses (Ps. lxviii. 12). Hebron was in existence in the days of Abraham (Gen. xiii. 18, xxiii. 2, &c.).

(23) The brook of Eschol.—This is commonly identified with the valley of Hebron. Ritter says that the reputation of the grapes of Hebron is so great throughout all Palestine that there is no difficulty in believing that the valley of Eschol was that which is directly north of the city of Hebron. The valley may have derived its name originally from Eschol, the brother of Mamre the Amorite (Gen. xiv. 13). In like manner the name of Mamre appears to have been transferred to the tree, or grove, of Mamre, which was opposite to the cave of Machpelah (Gen. xxxv. 17); and in this manner Eschol is closely connected with Hebron in Gen. xxiii. 19, as it is in the present chapter.

Upon a staff.—The majority of travellers confine in estimating the weight of the largest clusters commonly produced in Palestine at about ten or twelve pounds.
brought of the pomegranates, and of the figs. (24) The place was called the 1 brook Eschol, because of the cluster of grapes which the children of Israel cut down from thence. (25) And they returned from searching of the land after forty days. (26) And they went and came to Moses, and to Aaron, and to all the congregation of the children of Israel, unto the wilderness of Paran, to Kadesh; and brought back word unto them, and unto all the congregation, and shewed them the fruit of the land. (27) And they told him, and said, We came unto the land whither thou sentest us, and surely it floweth with milk and honey; and this is the fruit of it. (28) Nevertheless the people be strong that dwell in the land, and the cities are walled, and very great: and moreover we saw the children of Anak there. (29) The Amalekites dwell in the land of the south: and the Hittites, and the Jebusites, and the Amorites, dwell in the mountains: and the Canaanites dwell by the sea, and by the coast of Jordan.

(30) And Caleb stilled the people before Moses, and said, Let us go up at once, and possess it; for we are well able to overcome it. (31) But the men that went up with him said, We be not able to go up against the people; for they are stronger than we. (32) And they brought up an evil report of the land which they had searched unto the children of Israel, saying, The land, through which we have gone to search it, is a land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof; and all the people that we saw in it are 2 men of a great stature. (33) And there we saw the giants, the sons of Anak, which came of the giants: and we were in our own sight as grasshoppers, and so we were in their sight.

Kitto, however, mentions an instance of a bunch of Syrian grapes produced in our own country weighing nineteen pounds, which was sent by the Duke of Portland to the Marquis of Rockingham, and which was carried more than twenty miles by four labourers, two of whom bore it by rotation upon a staff. The greatest diameter of this cluster was nineteen inches and a half (Pictorial Bible, in loc., 1855). The arrangement referred to in the text was probably made, not because the weight was too great for one person to carry, but in order to prevent the grapes from being crushed. The pomegranates and figs, which are still some of the most important fruits of Hebron (see The Land and the Book, p. 583), were probably carried on the same pole. The words may be rendered thus: "And they bore it between two upon a staff; also some of the pomegranates and of the figs." This incident has obvious reference to the homeward journey of the spies. As the grapes of Eschol were to the Israelites both a pledge and a specimen of the fruits of Canaan, so the communion which believers have with God on earth is a pledge as well as a foretaste of the blessedness of heaven. (34) The place was called ...—This verse states the reason why the valley was so called by the Israelites, but does not determine the question whether it originally derived its name from Eschol or not. (35) After forty days.—This time allowed a full and careful exploration of the land.

(36) To Kadesh.—Robinson and others identify Kadesh with Ain-el-Weibeh, which is in the Arabah, about ten miles north of the place in which Mount Hor abuts on that valley. On the other hand, Mr. Wilton, in The Negeb (pp. 79, 80), and Mr. Palmer in the Desert of the Exodus (chap. xxxv), maintain the identity of Kadesh with el-Ain, which is about sixty miles west of Mount Hor, and about fifty miles west of Ain-el-Weibeh. The former of these views is maintained in a very elaborate note on this verse in The Bible Commentary. (37) Nevertheless the people be strong ...—The spies adopted the words of Exod. iii. 8, "flowing with milk and honey," as descriptive of the fertility of the land of Canaan, but at the same time they discouraged the hearts of their brethren by their description of the strength of the fortified cities and the gigantic stature of the inhabitants.

The children of Anak.—Better, of the Anakim. (See verse 22, and Note.)

The land of the south.—Better, of the south country, or the Negeb. See Gen. xxxvi. 12, and also verse 17 of this chap. and Note.

The mountains.—See Gen. x. 15, 16, and verse 17 of this chap. and Note.

The Canaanites.—See Gen. x. 15—18, xiii. 7, and Notes.

And Caleb stilled the people.—The fact that Caleb alone is mentioned in this place is by no means inconsistent with the statement which is contained in chap. xiv. 6—9, from which it appears that Joshua and Caleb concurred in exhorting the people to go up and take possession of the land of promise. It appears, moreover, from Deut. i. 29, &c., that Moses also remonstrated earnestly with the people, and yet neither here nor in the following chapter is mention made of that remonstrance.

(38) A land that eateth up the inhabitants thereof.—Some understand by this phrase a land of scarcity, unable to support its inhabitants; others understand it as denoting an unhealthy land, in which sense it appears to be still used in the East. (See Roberts' Oriental Illustrations, p. 101, 8vo, 1844.) It seems more probable, however, that the allusion is to the strife and discord which prevailed amongst the various tribes who contended for its possession. (Compl. Lev. xxxvi. 33.)

Mon of great stature.—Literally, men of measure (comp. Isa. xiv. 11), where the word midstah measure, occurs in the singular number, "men of stature." Such persons did undoubtedly exist in the land of Canaan, but there is no evidence that the inhabitants generally were of extraordinary size.

(39) And there we saw the giants.—The same word, nephilim, is here used which is found in Gen. vi. 4. See Note in loc.
CHAPTER XIV. — (1) And all the congregation lifted up their voice, and cried; and the people wept that night. (2) And all the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron: and the whole congregation said unto them, Would God that we had died in the land of Egypt! or would God we had died in this wilderness! (3) And wherefore hath the Lord brought us unto this land, to fall by the sword, that our wives and our children should be a prey? were it not better for us to return into Egypt? (4) And they said one to another, Let us make a captain, and let us return into Egypt.

(5) Then Moses and Aaron fell on their faces before all the assembly of the congregation of the children of Israel. (6) And Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of them that searched the land, rent their clothes: (7) and they spake unto all the company of the children of Israel, saying, The land, which we passed through to search it, is an exceeding good land.

XIV.

(2) And all the children of Israel murmured.—When the people murmured in like manner in the wilderness of Sin (Exod. xvi. 2, 3) against Moses and Aaron because they had brought them forth into the wilderness, Moses assured them that at even they should know that it was Jehovah Himself who had brought them out from the land of Egypt (Ibid, ver. 6). On the present occasion their murmuring was not against Moses and Aaron only, but they openly rebelled against Jehovah Himself, to whom they ascribed, in the way of reproach, their exodus from the land of Egypt.

(3) And wherefore hath the Lord brought us unto this land...?—Better, And wherefore doth the Lord bring us into this land...?—i.e., the land of Canaan, as clearly appears from the words which follow (comp. chap. xv. 18, where the same Hiphil participle is used). The destruction which the Israelites apprehended at this time was not a destruction by famine or drought, but by the sword of the Amorites and of the children of the Anakim. (Comp. Deut. i. 27, 28.)

That our wives and our children should be a prey...—i.e., should fall into the hands of the enemy after their entrance into the land of Canaan. (Comp. Exod. xv. 14—17.) It is possible, however, that the land through which the Israelites were passing may be included here and in verse 14.

(4) Rent their clothes.—Comp. Lev. x. 6 and Note.

(5) Their defence is departed from them.—Literally, their shadow. This is a natural and frequently recurring figure of speech in the East, where protection from the scorching rays of the sun is a boon of incalculable worth. (Comp. Gen. xix. 8; Ps. xvii. 8, xci. 1; Is. xxv. 4, xxx. 2.)

And the glory of the Lord appeared in the tabernacle of the congregation.—The meaning probably is in the court of the Tabernacle, or, as some think, above the Tabernacle. (See the Targum of Jonathan and the Vulgate and Septuagint Versions.) The children of Israel could not have seen the glory of the Lord had it been manifested within the Tabernacle.

(6) And will make of thee a greater nation and mightier than they.—A similar promise had been given to Moses on occasion of the rebellion at Sinai, and Moses on that occasion interceded with God on behalf of His people in like manner as at this time (Exod. xxxii. 10—12).

(10) But all the congregation bade stone them with stones.—All the congregation here, as elsewhere, seems to denote the princes or chief men of the congregation; otherwise it is difficult to understand to whom the order was addressed to stone Joshua and Caleb. Stoning appears to have been a mode of death commonly adopted in Egypt (Exod. viii. 20). Under the Jewish law stoning was the ordinary, and, as some think, the only prescribed mode of death, and was inflicted as the punishment for crimes such as adultery (Deut. xxii. 24, 25), idolatry (Deut. xiii. 10), witchcraft (Lev. xx. 27), sabbath-breaking (Num. xv. 35), and blasphemy (Lev. xxiv. 16). Moses had apprehended the same outbreak of popular violence on a former occasion (Exod. xvii. 4), and, at a later period, David was threatened in a similar manner (I Sam. xxx. 6).

And Moses said unto the Lord...—There is considerable difficulty as to the correct rendering of these verses. They may be rendered in accordance with the Authorised Version, or they may be rendered as follows:—And Moses said unto the
The Egyptians have both heard that thou hast brought up this people from among them by thy might, and they have also told (4) to the inhabitants of this land (i.e., the land of Canaan, as in verse 3); they (i.e., the Egyptians and the Canaanites) have heard that thou Lord art seen face to face, and that thy cloud stoodeth over them, and that thou went before them, by day time in a pillar of a cloud, and in a pillar of fire by night. (15) Now if thou shalt kill all this people as one man, then the nations which have heard the fame of thee will speak, saying, (16) because the Lord was not able to bring this people into the land which he sware unto them, therefore he hath shewn them in the wilderness. (17) And now, I beseech thee, let the power of my Lord be great, according as thou hast spoken, saying, (18) The Lord is (longsuffering, and of great mercy, forgiving iniquity and transgression, and by no means clearing the guilty, visiting the iniquity of the fathers upon the children unto the third and fourth generation. (19) Pardon, I beseech thee, the iniquity of this people according unto the greatness of thy mercy, and as thou hast forgiven this people, from Egypt even until now.

(20) And the Lord said, I have pardoned according to thy word: (21) But as truly as I live, all the earth shall be filled with the glory of the Lord.

(22) Because all those men which have seen my glory, and my miracles, which I did in Egypt and in the wilderness, and have tempted me now these ten times, and have not hearkened to my voice; (23) Surely they shall not see the land which I sware unto their fathers, neither shall any of them that provoked me see it: (24) But my servant Caleb, because he had another spirit with him, and hath followed me fully, him will I bring into the land whereinto he went; and his seed shall possess it. (25) (Now the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwelt in the valley.) To-morrow turn you, and

Moses Entreateth God. NUMBERS, XIV. The People Pardoned. get you into the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea.

(29) And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, (27) How long shall I bear with this evil congregation, which murmur against me? I have heard the murmurings of the children of Israel, which they murmur against me.

(30) Say unto them, "As truly as I live, saith the Lord, as ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do to you: (29) Your carcases shall fall in this wilderness; and all that were numbered of you, according to your whole number, from twenty years old and upward, which have murmured against me, doubtless ye shall not come into the land, concerning which I sware to make you dwell there-in, save Caleb the son of Jephunneh, and Joshua the son of Nun. (31) But your little ones, which ye said should be a prey, them will I bring in, and they shall know the land which ye have despised.

(32) But as for you, your carcases, they shall fall in this wilderness. (33) And your children shall wander in the wilderness forty years, and bear your whoredoms, until your carcases be wasted in the wilderness. (34) After the number of the days in which ye searched the land, even forty days, each day for a year, shall ye bear your iniquities, even forty years, and ye shall know my breach of promise. (35) I the Lord have said, I will surely do it unto all this evil congregation, that are gathered together against me: in this wilderness they shall be consumed, and there they shall die.

(36) And the men, which Moses sent to search the land, who returned, and made their words. They may be attached to the words which precede: "And his seed shall possess it, and the Amalekites and the Canaanites dwelling in the valley"—i.e., shall possess the land occupied by them. There are strong objections, however, to this rendering, as well as to the rendering adopted by the Authorised Version, if the latter be understood as an historical statement respecting the geographical position of the Amalekites and Canaanites, of which Moses can scarcely be supposed to have been ignorant, and which may be assigned with greater probability to the "hill" than to the "valley." (Comp. verse 45 and Note; also Deut. i. 44, where one or both of these races are spoken of under the name of Amorites or mountaineers.) The word which is rendered "dwell" is often used in reference to a temporary sojourn, as, e.g., in Josh. viii. 9 of the ambuscade sent by Josha, which "abode" between Bethel and Ai, and in 1 Sam. xxv. 13 of a portion of David's men who "abode by the stuff." It is used also in verse 45 of this chapter in respect to the position of the Amalekites and Canaanites, whether temporary or permanent, in the "hill," which appears to be used in contrast with the "valley." The passage may be rendered: "Now the Amalekites and the Canaanites are abiding in the valley," i.e., are lying in ambush in the valley, and waiting for an opportunity to attack the Israelites (comp. verse 43). If this interpretation of the words, which is that of R. Ezra, be adopted, they afford a strong reason for the command which follows:—To move you on, and get you into the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea"—i.e., do not fall into the error which is laid for you, but turn and go in a contrary direction.

(27) How long shall I bear with this evil congregation?—Or, How long shall I pardon (or forgive), &c. The verb is not expressed in the Hebrew. It is probable that one of the verbs in verse 19, pardon or forgive, should be supplied.

(26) As ye have spoken in mine ears, so will I do unto you. The Israelites had exclaimed in their sinful murmuring against God, "Would God we had died in the wilderness" (verse 2); and God declares in His wrathful displeasure that the judgment which they had thus invoked should be inflicted upon them, and that their carcases should fall in the wilderness.

(32) From twenty years old and upward.—Rashi thinks that these words were employed to show that the Levites who were numbered from a month old and upwards were not included in the general sentence of destruction, and hence that it is no just cause of astonishment that some of them, as, e.g., Eleazar, should have entered the land of Canaan.

(33) Concerning which I sware.—Literally, I lifted up my hand. Lifting up the hand is the attitude of swearing. (See Gen. xiv. 22 and Note; Deut. xxxii. 40.) The reference appears to be to the original covenant made with Abraham, and renewed to Isaac and Jacob, respecting the possession of the land of Canaan. (Comp. Gen. xv. 7, 18, xvii. 8, xxii. 15—18, xxvi. 3, 4, xxviii. 13; Exod. vi. 8.)

(34) But as for you, your carcases, they shall fall.—Better, but your carcases, even yours, shall fall.

In this wilderness.—The very words which the Israelites themselves had used. (See verse 2.)

(33) And your children shall wander.—Better, shall be shepherds, or, shall feed their flocks.

Forty years.—The forty years were reckoned from the exodus, not from the return of the spies to Kadesh. (See verse 34 and Note.)

And bear your whoredoms.—The children were doomed to bear the penalty of their fathers' apostasy. (Comp. Exod. xxxiv. 16.)

(34) Even forty days, each day for a year.—The numbering which is referred to in chapter xxvi. took place after the death of Aaron, which happened on the first day of the fifth month of the fortieth year after the exodus (chap. xxxiii. 38). Hence it follows that the year and a half which had elapsed since the exodus must be included in the forty years of shepherd life in the wilderness.

My breach of promise.—The noun which is thus rendered occurs only in one other place, viz., Job xxxiii. 10. The cognate verb, however, occurs several times in this book in the sense of refuse, disallow, or hinder. (See chaps. xxx. 5, 8, 11, xxxii. 7.) The meaning here appears to be rejection or alienation.

322
all the congregation to murmur against him, by bringing up a slander upon the land; (35) even those men that did bring up the evil report upon the land, (a) died by the plague before the Lord. (39) But Joshua the son of Nun, and Caleb the son of Jephunneh, which were of the men that went to search the land, lived still.

(39) And Moses told these sayings unto all the children of Israel: and the people mourned greatly. (40) And they rose up early in the morning, and gat them up into the top of the mountain, saying, Lo, we be here, and will go up unto the place which the Lord hath promised: for we have sinned. (41) And Moses said, Wherefore now do ye transgress the commandment of the Lord? but it shall not prosper. (42) Go not up, for the Lord is not among you; that ye be not smitten before your enemies. (43) For the Amalekites and the Canaanites are there before you, and ye shall fall by the sword: because ye are turned away from the Lord, therefore the Lord will not be with you.

(44) But they presumed to go up unto the hill top: nevertheless the ark of the covenant of the Lord, and Moses, departed not out of the camp. (45) Then the Amalekites came down, and the Canaanites which dwelt in that hill, and smote them, and discomfited them, even unto Horannah.

CHAPTER XV. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come into the land of your habitations, which I give

---

(57) By the plague.—The word maggophah, which is here rendered plague, denotes a stroke. In Exod. ix. 14 it is used of the ten plagues of Egypt. In Num. xvi. 48, 49, it is used of the plague which broke out after the inscription of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, and in chap. xxv. 9—18 of that which broke out after the Israelites had joined in the idolatries and lascivious rites of the Moabites and Midianites. In 1 Sam. iv. 17, 2 Sam. xvii. 9, xviii. 7, it is used of destruction by the sword. It appears to denote in this place sudden death, inflicted by the immediate visitation of the Lord.

(39) And the people mourned greatly. — It appears from what follows that the sorrow which the Israelites felt was sorrow for the punishment which their sin had entailed, not godly sorrow for the sin itself.

(40) Into the top of the mountain. — Or, towards the top of the mountain. This appears to have been the same route as that by which the spies had gone into the south country of Judaea. (See chap. xiii. 17.) It seems to be implied in vv. 44, 45 that the people did not actually ascend the top of the adjoining mountain.

(42) Go not up, for the Lord is not among you. — Moses had already received the command which is contained in verse 25. He knew, therefore, that the Israelites would not have the guidance of the cloud, the visible token of the Divine presence.

(43) Are there before you. — Or, will be there before you. If the same persons are here spoken of as in verse 25, it will follow that they had left their temporary abode, and gone up into the hill country. It is possible, however, that the reference is to different persons from the same nations.

(44) They presumed to go up. — i.e., they made a bold attempt to ascend the mountain. Their enemies appear to have encountered and discomfited them before they had actually gained the summit.

(45) Then the Amalekites came down. — The words "which dwelt in that hill" may refer to the Canaanites only, or to the Amalekites and the Canaanites, and may denote either permanent residence or temporary occupation. If the reference is, as seems most natural, to a permanent abode, it will follow verse 25, for the latter verse cannot be intended to describe the geographical position of the Canaanites.

---

Even unto Horannah. — Or, the place of the ban. The definite article is used in this place, the Horannah. If the Horannah which is here mentioned is identical with the Homnah of chap. xxi. 3, where the definite article is not used, and with the Horannah of Judges i. 17, we must conclude that the name is used prophetically, as is not unfrequently the case in Scripture. It is probable, however, that in each case a different place is denoted by a common name. The cognate verb is employed in Deut. xx. 17, where the command is given to devote the Canaanitish nations to utter destruction, i.e., to a state of horannah.

XV.

(1, 2) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying. — We learn from Deut. i. 46 that the Israelites "abode in Kadesh many days," and from Deut. ii. 1 that afterwards they "turned," in obedience to the command given in the preceding chapter of this book, and "took their journey into the wilderness by the way of the Red Sea." It appears, further, from Num. xx. 1 that in the first month of the fourth year they came again into the desert of Zin, and "abode in Kadesh." In regard to the transactions recorded in this and in the four following chapters we have no certain chronological data. The fact that additional laws were given during the long period of the wanderings in the wilderness furnished a practical proof of the continuance of the covenant which had been made with Israel at Sinai. Bishop Wordsworth supplies the following answer to the inquiry how the Israelites were able to find a sufficient quantity of cattle and of birds in the wilderness to fulfil the requirements of the Levitical law:—"God," he writes, "promulgated that law on Mount Sinai in order that it might be observed in Canaan; and when he gave it, the Israelites had not as yet incurred the sentence of exclusion, and they might—and if they had not been disobedient, they would—have been in Canaan within a fortnight of its delivery. The Levitical law was given under the presumption that they would obey Him who gave it, and that they would be soon afterwards in Canaan, when they would be able to comply with that law. (Comp. Deut. iv. 11.) But they unto you, (3) and will make an offering by fire unto the Lord, a burnt offering, or a sacrifice in performing a vow, or in a freewill offering, or in your solemn feasts, to make a sweet savour unto the Lord, of the herd, or of the flock: (4) Then shall he that offereth his offering unto the Lord bring a meat offering of a tenth deal of flour mingled with the fourth part of an hin of oil. (5) And the fourth part of an hin of wine for a drink offering shalt thou prepare with the burnt offering or sacrifice, for one lamb. (6) Or for a ram, thou shalt prepare for a meat offering two tenth deals of flour mingled with the third part of an hin of oil. (7) And for a drink offering thou shalt offer the third part of an hin of wine, for a sweet savour unto the Lord. (8) And when thou preparest a bullock for a burnt offering, or for a sacrifice in performing a vow, or peace offerings unto the Lord: (9) Then shall he bring with a bullock a meat offering of three tenth deals of flour mingled with half an hin of oil. (10) And thou shalt bring for a drink offering half an hin of wine, for an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord. (11) Thus shall it be done for one bullock, or for one ram, or for a lamb, or a kid. (12) According to the number that ye shall prepare, so shall ye do to every one according to their number. (13) All that are born of the country shall do these things after this manner, in offering an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord. (14) And if a stranger sojourn with you, or whosoever be among you in your generations, and will offer an offering made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord; as ye do, so he shall do. (15) One ordinance shall be both for you of the congregation, and also for the stranger that sojourneth with you, an ordinance for ever in your generations: as ye are, so shall the stranger be before the Lord. (16) One law and one manner shall be for you, and for the stranger that sojourneth with you.

(17) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (18) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land whither I bring you, (19) Then it shall be, that when ye eat of the bread of the land, ye shall offer up an heave offering unto the Lord. (20) Ye shall offer up a cake of the first of your dough for an heave offering: as ye do the heave offering of the threshingfloor, so shall ye heave it. (21) Of the first of your dough ye shall give unto the Lord an heave offering in your generations.

(22) And if ye have erred, and not observed all these commandments, which the Lord hath spoken unto Moses, (23) even all that the Lord hath commanded you by the hand of Moses, from the country. (13) All that are born of the country. —The Targum of Jonathan is, “all that are born in Israel, and not among the people. ” It seems clear, however, from verse 14 that the reference in this verse is to the indigenous Israelites.

(15) One ordinance shall be both for you of the congregation, ... —Literally, As for the congregation, there shall be one ordinance for you and for the stranger that sojourneth. Some render the words thus: — O congregation, one ordinance shall be for you and for the stranger, &c.

(22) And if ye have erred, and not observed,... —Rather. And if ye shall err and not observe.

(23) And henceforward. —Rather, and onward, or thenceforth. There is nothing in the word which is here used to denote whether the reference is or is not to legislation of a later date than that at which the words were spoken. The terminus a quo is expressed in the preceding words. Comp. Is. xviii. 2, where the meaning seems to be up to the present time, and Ezek. xxxix. 22, where the reference is to the indefinite future.
the day that the Lord commanded Moses, and henceforward among your generations; (24) then it shall be, if ought be committed by ignorance, without the knowledge of the congregation, that all the congregation shall offer one young bullock for a burnt offering, for a sweet savour unto the Lord, with his meat offering, and his drink offering, according to the manner, and one kid of the goats for a sin offering. (25) And the priest shall make an atonement for all the congregation of the children of Israel; and it shall be forgiven them; for it is ignorance: and they shall bring their offering, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord, and their sin offering before the Lord, for their ignorance: (26) And it shall be forgiven all the congregation of the children of Israel, and the stranger that sojourneth among them; seeing all the people were in ignorance.

And if any soul sin through ignorance, then he shall bring a she goat of the first year for a sin offering. (28) And the priest shall make an atonement for the soul that sinneth ignorantly, when he sinneth by ignorance before the Lord, to make an atonement for him; and it shall be forgiven him. (29) Ye shall have one law for him that sinneth through ignorance, both for him that is born among the children of Israel, and for the stranger that sojourneth among them.

(28) But the soul that doeth ought presumptuously, whether he be born in the land, or a stranger, the same reproacheth the Lord; and that soul shall be cut off from among his people. (30) Because he hath despised the word of the Lord, and hath broken his commandment, that soul shall utterly be cut off; his iniquity shall be upon him.

And while the children of Israel were in the wilderness, they found a man that gathered sticks upon the sabbath day. (32) And they that found him gathering sticks brought him unto Moses and Aaron, and unto all the congregation. (33) And they put him in ward, because it was not declared what should be done to him. (34) And the Lord said unto Moses, The man shall be surely put to death: all the congregation shall stone him with stones without the camp. (35) And all the congregation brought him without the camp, and stoned him with stones, and he died; as the Lord commanded Moses.
And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (38) Speak unto the children of Israel, and bid them that they make them fringes in the borders of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the fringe of the borders a ribbon of blue: (39) and it shall be unto you for a fringe, that ye may look upon it, and remember all the commandments of the Lord, and do them; and that ye seek not after your own heart and your own eyes, after which ye use to go a whoring: (40) that ye may remember, and do all my commandments, and be holy unto your God. (41) I am the Lord your God, which brought you out of the land of Egypt, to be your God: I am the Lord your God.

CHAPTER XVI.—(1) Now Korah, the son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi, and Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab, and On, the son of Peleth, sons of Reuben, took men: (2) and they rose up before Moses, with certain of the children of Israel, two hundred and fifty princes of the assembly, famous in the congregation, men of renown: (3) and they gathered themselves together against Moses and against Aaron, and said unto them, 1 Ye take too much upon you, seeing all the congregation are holy, every one of

That they make them fringes . . .—Better, That they made them tassels on the corners of their garments throughout their generations, and that they put upon the tassel of the corner (i.e., on each tassel) a thread (or cord) of blue. The tassels (zizith) appear to be the same as the gedinim (fringes) of Deut. xxii. 12. The outer garment of the Jews was a four-cornered cloth, which was also used by the poor as a counterpane (Exod. xxii. 26, 27). It appears to have been commonly used with a hole in the centre, through which the head was put, so that one-half covered the front and the other the back of the body. These tassels, or fringes (LXX., σπαρτῆς—craspedon), were enlarged by the Pharisees to exhibit their punctilious fulfillment of the Law (Matt. xxii. 5). Great sanctity was attached to these fringes or tassels, and for this cause the woman with the issue of blood desired to touch a krospedioν of our Saviour’s garment (Matt. ix. 20).

That ye seek not after your own heart.—Or, That ye go not about, or search not out, &c.

XVI.

(1) Now Korah, the son of Izhar . . .—Some suppose that the copula before “Dathan and Abiram” should be omitted, and that the verse should be rendered thus: Now Korah, the son of Izhar, the son of Kohath, the son of Levi, took Dathan and Abiram, &c. The rebellion of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram is the only important event which is recorded in connection with the protracted wandering in the desert. The time and place of its occurrence cannot be positively determined. The circumstances out of which it appears to have arisen render it probable that it took place during one of the early years of the wanderings in the wilderness, either during the abode at Kadesh, or subsequently to the events recorded from it. In favour of the supposition that the occurrence took place during the sojourn at Kadesh, it may be urged: (1) that the history of the Israelites between the first and the second encampments at Kadesh appears to be designedly regarded and treated as a blank; and (2) that during that interval they appear to have been dispersed over the face of the wilderness, whilst the narrative of the rebellion of Korah seems to assume the concentration of the people in one place. The whole of the narrative bears the clear impress of historical truth. The leaders of the rebellion, amongst whom Korah holds the most conspicuous place (comp. chaps. xvi. 1, xvi. 9; Jude, ver. 11), belonged to the tribes of Levi and Reuben. Korah, as the descendant of Levi, the brother of Amram, who was the father (or, as some maintain, the more distant ancestor) of Moses and Aaron, may well be supposed to have been jealous of the peculiar prerogatives of the priestly family, and also of the leadership of Elizaphan, the son of Uzziel (chap. iii. 30), who appears to have been the youngest son of Kohath, whilst the name of Izhar stands next to that of Amram (chap. iii. 19). Dathan and Abiram, moreover, as the sons of Eliab, the son of Pelet, the son of Reuben (chap. xxvi. 5—9), who was the eldest son of Jacob, may, on like grounds, be supposed to have been discontented on account of the transference of the birthright, and the consequent loss of the leadership which had been possessed by their tribe, and which was now held by the tribe of Judah. It is possible that they may have regarded the priesthood also as amongst the prerogatives of the firstborn which should have descended to them. The proximity of the Kohathites to the Reubenites—for both were encamped on the south side of the Tabernacle—afforded opportunity for their common deliberations; and it has been inferred by some, from verses 24—27, that they had erected a tabernacle in rivalry with the Tabernacle of the Congregation. No further mention is made of the name of On, nor is he expressly included in the account of the final punishment.

(2) And they rose up . . .—i.e., in rebellion. Two hundred and fifty princes . . .—It has been inferred from chap. xxvii. 3, where it is stated that Zelophehad, the Manassite, did not take part in the rebellion, that these princes, or chief men of the congregation, belonged to the other tribes of Israel as well as that of Levi. They are called Korah’s company because he was their leader, and it is probable from verse 8 that a large number of them belonged to the tribe of Levi.

(3) Ye take too much upon you . . .—Or, enough for you (comp. Gen. xliv. 28), i.e., you have held the priesthood and the government long enough; or, Let it be enough for you to be numbered amongst the holy people without usurping dominion over them. It is evident from the whole tenor of the address that Korah laid claim to a universal priesthood on behalf of them, and the Lord is among them: wherefore then lift ye up yourselves above the congregation of the Lord? (4) And when Moses heard it, he fell upon his face: (5) and he spake unto Korah and unto all his company, saying, Even to morrow shall the Lord shew who are his, and who is holy; and will cause him to come near unto him: even him whom he hath chosen will he cause to come near unto him. (6) This do: Take you censers, Korah, and all his company; (7) and put fire therein, and put incense in them before the Lord to morrow: and it shall be that the man whom the Lord doth choose, he shall be holy: ye take too much upon you, ye sons of Levi. (8) And Moses said unto Korah, Hear, I pray you, ye sons of Levi: (9) seemeth it but a small thing unto you, that the God of Israel hath separated you from the congregation of Israel, to bring you near to himself to do the service of the tabernacle of the Lord, and to stand before the congregation to minister unto them? (10) And he hath brought thee near to him, and all thy brethren the people, designing probably to secure the chief place in that priesthood for himself. (11) And he spake unto Korah and unto all his company. The words seem to have been addressed only to Korah and his company, not to Dathan and Abiram, who do not appear to have been present on this occasion. (See verse 12, where Moses is represented as sending for Dathan and Abiram.)

Even to morrow.—Literally, In the morning. It may be that On and also the sons of Korah professed by this suspension of the judgment which was about to overtake those who persisted in their rebellion.

(12) Take you censers.—The offering of incense was the peculiar prerogative and the holiest function of the priesthood. The destruction of Nabab and Abishai ought to have served as a warning to Korah and his company not to provoke a similar exhibition of the Divine displeasure.

(13) Yo take too much upon you . . .—Moses here adopts the language of Korah in verse 3. The meaning appears to be, as more fully explained in verses 9, 10, that it ought to have sufficed Korah and the other Levites that they had been chosen from amongst their brethren to discharge the inferior offices of the sanctuary.

(14) And seek ye the priesthood also?—The Targums of Onkelos and Jonathan understand the reference to be to the high priesthood. As the other Levites who belonged to Korah's company sought the priesthood, so Korah may have aimed at the high priesthood.

(15) And Moses sent to call Dathan and Abiram . . .—If, as seems probable from verse 3, Dathan and Abiram had joined Korah and his company in the address to Moses which is contained in verse 3, they must have subsequently withdrawn themselves and retired to their own tents, from which they refused to go up at the bidding of Moses.

(16) A land that floweth with milk and honey.—The description of the land of promise is here applied perversely and ironically to the land of Egypt.

(17) Moreover thou hast not brought us . . .—The words which the Lord had spoken to Moses (Exod. iii. 8) concerning the deliverance from Egypt, and the bringing of the people into a land flowing with milk and honey, had been communicated by Aaron to the people (Exod. iv. 30). Dathan and Abiram reproach Moses, as though he was responsible for their protracted sojourn in the wilderness.

Wilt thou put out the eyes of these men?—Hebrew, those men. The same expression is employed in its literal signification in regard to Samson (Judges xvi. 21). It is probably used here in the same manner; or, it may be, to denote an allured attempt on the part of Moses to blind the eyes of the people to the violation of promises solemnly made to them, and to impose upon them a law of blind obedience to his own arbitrary injunctions.

(18) I have not taken one ass from them . . .—In answer to the accusation preferred against him in verse 13, Moses vindicates himself from the charge of oppression or extortion.

(19) Take every man his censer.—These censers may have been household vessels resembling censers, and available for the same purpose; or they may have been vessels which were used by the heads of houses, as priests, before the order of priesthood was restricted to bring ye before the Lord every man his censer, two hundred and fifty censers; thou also, and Aaron, each of you his censer.

(18) And they took every man his censer, and put fire in them, and laid incense thereon, and stood in the door of the tabernacle of the congregation with Moses and Aaron. (19) And Korah gathered all the congregation against them unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation: and the glory of the Lord appeared unto all the congregation.

(20) And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, (21) Separate yourselves from among this congregation, that I may consume them in a moment. (22) And they fell upon their faces, and said, O God, the God of the spirits of all flesh, shall one man sin, and wilt thou be wroth with all the congregation? (23) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (24) Speak unto the congregation, saying, Get you up from about the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.

(25) And Moses rose up and went unto Dathan and Abiram; and the elders of Israel followed him. (26) And he spake unto the congregation, saying, Depart, I pray you, from the tents of these wicked men, and touch nothing of their's, lest ye be consumed in all their sins. (27) So they gat up from the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, on every side: and Dathan and Abiram came out, and stood in the door of their tents, and their wives, and their sons, and their little children. (28) And Moses said, Hereby ye shall know that the Lord hath sent me to do all these works; for I have not done them of mine own mind. (29) If these men die the common death of all men, or if they be visited after the visitation of all men; then the Lord hath not sent me. (30) But if the Lord make a new thing, and the earth open her mouth, and swallow them up, with all that appertain unto them, and they go down quick into the pit; then ye shall understand that these men have provoked the Lord.

(31) And it came to pass, as he had made an end of speaking all these words, that the ground clave asunder that was under them: (32) and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up, and their houses, and all the men of the family of Aaron; or they may have been made by Korah and his company for their own use.

(39) All the congregation.—It is evident from these words that there was a general disposition on the part of the people to favour the insurrection of Korah against Moses and Aaron.

(40) Separate yourselves from among this congregation . . . —By their obedience to the summons of Korah the congregation generally, or at least a large portion of it, had made themselves party-takers in his sin, and had become obnoxious to the Divine wrath.

(41) Get you up from about the tabernacle of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram.—It is not easy to determine what is the meaning of the word mishkan (tabernacle) in this and in the 27th verse. The word, in the singular number, commonly denotes the tabernacle of the congregation—i.e., the boarded erection which was covered by the ohel, or tent. The word means simply a "dwelling-place," and it may denote in this and in the 27th verse a rival tabernacle which had been erected by Korah and the other conspirators; or it may denote, in a collective sense, the tent of Korah, which may have been contumaciously pitched near that of the Reubenites, and also the tents of Dathan and Abiram, which were in proximity to those of the Kohathites, but further removed from the Tabernacle. The substitution of the word "tents" in verse 26, in which Moses delivers to the people the command contained in verse 24, seems to favour the latter of these explanations.

(42) And Dathan and Abiram came out . . . —No mention is made of the position of Korah at this time, neither is any mention made of his sons, who, as we learn from chap. xxvi. 11, "died not" when the company of Korah died. His descendants are mentioned in 1 Chron. vi. 22-38, and mention is made of "the sons of Korah" in the titles of eleven of the Psalms. Samuel the prophet and Hanun the singer were of this family (1 Chron. vii. 22, 33).

(43) To do all these works.—i.e., to bring the people out of the land of Egypt, to exchange the first-born for the Levites, to consecrate Aaron and his sons to the priesthood, and generally to declare the will of the Lord to the people.

(44) Make a new thing.—Literally, create a creation.—i.e., do something hitherto unknown. Into the pit.—Literally, into Sheol.

(45) And the earth opened her mouth . . . —Had this verse stood alone it might have been inferred that Korah and his family shared the fate of Dathan and Abiram and their families and households. In regard to the sons of Korah, however, there is direct evidence that they did not share in the punishment of Dathan and Abiram (see Note on verse 27); and in regard to Korah there is ground for the belief that he perished by fire with the 250 men who offered incense with him. It is true, indeed, that in chap. xxvi. 10 Korah is mentioned in conjunction with Dathan and Abiram (see Note in loc.); but in the other places in which reference is made to the conspiracy, the fate of the chief conspirators is separated. Thus, in Deut. vi. 6 we read only of what God did unto Dathan and Abiram and their households and tents; and in Ps. cvi. 17 we read that "The earth opened and swallowed that appertained unto Korah, and all their goods. (23) They, and all that appertained to them, went down alive into the pit, and the earth closed upon them: and they perished from among the congregation. (24) And all Israel that were round about them fled at the cry of them: for they said, Lest the earth swallow us up also. (25) And there came out a fire from the Lord, and consumed the two hundred and fifty men that offered incense.

(26) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (27) Speak unto Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, that he take up the censers out of the burning, and scatter thou the fire yonder; for they are hallowed. (28) The censers of these sinners against their own souls, let them make them broad plates for a covering of the altar: for they offered them before the Lord, therefore they are hallowed: and they shall be a sign unto the children of Israel. (29) And Eleazar the priest took the brassen censers, wherewith they that were burnt had offered; and they were made broad plates for a covering of the altar; (30) to be a memorial unto the children of Israel, that no stranger, which is not of the seed of Aaron, come near to offer incense before the Lord; that he be not as Korah, and as his company: as the Lord said to him by the hand of Moses.

(31) But on the morrow all the congregation of the children of Israel murmured against Moses and against Aaron, saying, Ye have killed the people of the Lord. (32) And it came to pass, when the congregation was gathered against Moses and against Aaron, that they looked toward the tabernacle of the congregation: and, behold, the cloud covered it, and the glory of the Lord appeared. (33) And Moses and Aaron came before the tabernacle of the congregation. (34) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (35) Get you up from among this congregation, that I may consume them as in a moment. And they fell upon their faces. (36) And Moses said unto Aaron, Take a censer, and put up Dathan, and covered the company of Abiram,” whilst in the following verse it is added that “The flame burned up the wicked.” If Korah’s tent remained in its appointed place amongst the Kohathites, it may reasonably be supposed that the chasm did not extend beyond the tents of Dathan and Abiram; or if Korah had pitched a tent for himself adjoining the tents of Dathan and Abiram, it may be inferred that these only of his household remained in it who shared in the conspiracy, and that his sons remained amongst the other Kohathites, or withdrew with the rest of the congregation at the command of Moses. It is most natural to suppose that Korah was at this time before the door of the Tabernacle, with the 250 men of his company who had presumed to offer incense, and that he shared their doom. The Ezaa observes that in the song of the Red Sea there is no mention made of the drowning of Pharaoh, but only of his chariots and hosts; whilst in Ps. cxxxvi. 15 we read that Pharaoh and his host were overthrown in the Red Sea.

(55) And there came out a fire from the Lord . . . It was thus, as Bishop Wordsworth has observed, that “Korah and his company were punished by the same man by whose hands they had sinned.”

(56) Speak unto Eleazar the son of Aaron . . . —Aaron was shortly to be employed in an act of sacerdotal ministration and intercession, for which he would have become disqualified had he been ceremonially defiled by contact with things pertaining to the dead.

(57) These sinners against their own souls.—i.e., men who have forfeited their lives by their sin.

Let them make them broad plates: It was thus that the sacrilegious act of Korah and his company was made the occasion of a permanent warning against all similar profanation of holy things. The altar of burnt-offering had already a covering of brass; but, as the altar was made of wood, an additional covering afforded further security against the fire which was continually burning on it. The censers of Korah and his company were made of brass (verse 30). Those of Aaron and his sons are thought by some to have been made of silver, but there seems to be no sufficient authority for this supposition; and in Exod. xxviii. 3, where the same Hebrew word is used, but which in the English version is rendered “firepans,” it is said that all the vessels of the altar were made of brass. In the time of Solomon the censers were made of gold (1 Kings vii. 50). That used by Aaron on the great day of atonement was of gold. (Comp. Heb. ix. 4; Rev. viii. 3.)

(58) Wherewith they that were burnt had offered.—Or, which they who were burnt had brought nigh (i.e., unto the Lord).

To be a memorial unto the children of Israel.—The Apostle Jude warns Christians by the same example against the profanation of Divine ordinances (verse 11).

(59) But on the morrow . . . It is difficult to conceive of a more striking illustration of the depravity of the human heart than is afforded by this outbreak of the same spirit of rebellion which had been so signally punished on the preceding day.

(60) And, behold, the cloud covered it.—The cloud had probably been removed on the preceding day when the rebels were consumed, and was now again restored in order to encourage Moses and Aaron.

Take a censer.—Better, the censer. The reference appears to be to the golden censer of the high priest. Incense was an emblem of prayer, and a figure of the intercession and mediation of Christ. (See Ps. cxli. 2; Rev. viii. 3, 4.)
And go quickly.—Or, and carry it quickly.

... And ran into the midst of the congregation.—The whole occasion was an extraordinary one. On ordinary occasions incense might only be offered on the golden altar within the holy place in which the priests ministered.

... And he stood between the dead and the living . . .—Aaron was, in this respect, a striking type of Christ, who “hath given himself for us an offering and a sacrifice to God for a sweet-smelling savour” (Eph. v. 2).

... And take of every one of them . . .—Better, And take of them a rod for each father’s house.

Twelve rods.—Some suppose that Aaron’s rod was not included amongst the twelve. Others suppose that one rod only was taken for the tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh. The latter supposition is more accordant with the terms here employed than the former, and is supported by Deut. xvii. 12, 13, where Joseph stands for the two tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh, and Levi is included amongst the twelve tribes.

Write thou every man’s name upon his rod. —This was in accordance with an Egyptian custom. (See Wilkinson’s Ancient Egyptians, III. 388.) The prophet Ezekiel received a similar injunction (Ezek. xxxviii. 16).

... And thou shalt write Aaron’s name upon the rod of Levi.—Aaron was descended from the second son of Levi. He was not, therefore, the natural, but the divinely-appointed head of his father’s house, and hence it would not have sufficed for the purpose contemplated to have inscribed the name of Levi upon the rod. Aaron was constituted the head alike of the priests and of the Levites, into which two classes the tribe of Levi was divided.

... Where I will meet with you.—Rather, where I meet with you.

... The man’s rod, whom I shall choose, shall blossom.—Or, shall sprout forth or put forth—i.e., leaves or blossoms. Achilles, when enraged against Agamemnon, is made to swear a solemn oath by his sceptre which, having once left its stock on the mountains, shall never again grow. King Latium is represented by Virgil as confirming his covenant with Aeneas by a similar oath.

... Behold, the rod of Aaron for the house of Levi was budded . . .—As the budding of Aaron’s rod was the divinely-appointed proof of the establishment of the priesthood in his person and in his posterity, so our Lord proved Himself to be the true High Priest over the House of God by coming forth as “a rod [or shoot] out of the stem of Jesse” (Isa. xi. 1), and as “a root out of a dry ground” (Isa. iii. 2). The miraculous shooting forth of Aaron’s dry rod may be regarded as a type of the mode of the Spirit’s operation in the Church, and more especially in the work of the ministry; “Not by might, nor by power, but by my spirit, saith the Lord of hosts” (Zech. iv. 6).

And yielded almonds.—Better, and brought almonds to maturity, or yielded ripe almonds. The word shaken (almond-tree) is a cognate form of the verb shakad—to keep watch. The name is supposed to have been given to the almond-tree because it blossoms at a time when vegetation is lying in the sleep of winter. (See Jer. i. 11, 12; also, The Land and the Book, p. 319.) before the Lord unto all the children of Israel: and they looked, and took every man his rod.

(10) And the Lord said unto Moses, Bring Aaron’s rod again before the testimony, to be kept for a token against the rebels; and thou shalt quite take away their murmurings from me, that they die not. (11) And Moses did so: as the Lord commanded him, so did he.

(12) And the children of Israel spake unto Moses, saying, Behold, we die, we perish, we all perish. (13) Whosoever cometh anything near unto the tabernacle of the Lord shall die: shall we be consumed with dying?

CHAPTER XVIII.—(1) And the Lord said unto Aaron, Thou and thy sons and thy father’s house with thee shall bear the iniquity of the sanctuary: and thou and thy sons with thee shall bear the iniquity of your priesthood. (2) And thy brethren also of the tribe of Levi, the tribe of thy father, bring thou with thee, that they may be joined unto thee, and minister unto thee: but thou and thy sons with thee shall minister before the tabernacle of witness. (3) And they shall keep thy charge, and the charge of all the tabernacle: only they shall not come nigh the vessels of the sanctuary and the altar, that neither they, nor ye also, die. (4) And they shall be joined unto thee, and keep the charge of the tabernacle of the congregation, for all the service of the tabernacle: and a stranger shall not come nigh unto you. (5) And ye shall keep the charge of the sanctuary, and the charge of the altar: that there be no wrath any more upon the children of Israel. (6) And I, behold, I have taken your brethren the Levites from among the children of Israel: to you they are given as a gift for the Lord, to do the service of the tabernacle of the congregation. (7) Therefore thou and thy sons with thee shall keep your priest’s office for every thing of the altar, and within the vail; and ye shall serve: I have given your priest’s office unto you as a service of gift: and the stranger that cometh nigh shall be put to death.

(10) Bring Aaron’s rod again before the testimony.—Better, Put back (literally, make to return) Aaron’s rod. It is not stated here that the rod was put within the ark. Nor is it so stated in Exod. xvi. 33 with regard to the pot of manna. Neither of these was within the ark when it was brought into Solomon’s temple (1 Kings vii. 9); but this statement is by no means inconsistent with that contained in Heb. ix. 4, inasmuch as the assertion that there was nothing but the tables of the law in the ark at that time does not prove that there were not other things in it at an earlier period, and may be thought to suggest the inference that such was actually the case. The Jews have a tradition that when King Josiah ordered the ark to be put in the house which King Solomon built, the rod of Aaron and the pot of manna and the anointing oil were hidden within the ark, and that at that time the rod of Aaron had buds and almonds.

(12, 13) And the children of Israel spake unto Moses.—The special manifestations of Divine power which the Israelites had witnessed excited within them salutary emotions of awe and of anxious apprehension, but do not seem to have awakened within them any corresponding sense of gratitude either for their deliverance from the plague, or for the privileges which they enjoyed by reason of the Divine presence amongst them. The true answer to their inquiry whether they were doomed utterly to perish is contained in the following chapter, in which the priesthood of Christ is typically set forth as bearing the iniquity of the sanctuary, and thus making reconciliation for the sins and securing the acceptance of the imperfect service of His people. of the most Holy Things.

(5) And the Lord spake unto Aaron, Behold, I also have given thee the charge of mine heave offerings of all the hallowed things of the children of Israel; unto thee have I given them by reason of the anointing, and to thy sons, by an ordinance for ever. 9 This shall be thine of the most holy things, reserved from the fire: every oblation of their's, every meat offering of their's, and every sin offering of their's, and every trespass offering of their's, which they shall render unto me, shall be most holy for thee and for thy sons. (10) In the most holy place shalt thou eat it; every male shall eat it: it shall be holy unto thee. (11) And this is thine; the heave offering of their gift, with all the wave offerings of the children of Israel: I have given them unto thee, and to thy sons and to thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: every one that is clean in thy house shall eat of it. (12) All the best of the oil, and all the best of the wine, and of the wheat, the firstfruits of them which they shall offer unto the Lord, have I given thee. (13) And whatsoever is first ripe in the land, which they shall bring unto the Lord, shall be thine; every one that is clean in thine house shall eat of it. (14) Every thing devoted in Israel shall be thine. (15) Every thing that openeth the matrix in all flesh, which they bring unto the Lord, whether it be of men or beasts, shall be thine: nevertheless the firstborn of man shalt thou surely redeem, and the firstling of unclean beasts shalt thou redeem. (16) And those that are to be redeemed from a month old shalt thou redeem, according to thine estimation, for the money of five shekels, after the shekel of the sanctuary, which is twenty gerahs. (17) But the firstling of a cow, or the firstling of a sheep, or the firstling of a goat, thou shalt not redeem; they are holy: thou shalt sprinkle their blood upon the altar, and shalt burn their fat for an offering made by fire, for a sweet savour unto the Lord. (18) And the flesh of them shall be thine, as the wave breast and as the right shoulder are thine. (19) All the heave offerings of the holy things, which the children of Israel offer unto the Lord, have I given thee, and thy sons and thy daughters with thee, by a statute for ever: it is a covenant of salt for ever before the Lord unto thee and to thy seed with thee. (20) And the Lord spake unto Aaron, Thou shalt have no inheritance in their land, neither shalt thou have any part

The Priest’s Portion

The charge of mine heave offerings. — See Lev. vii. 34, and verse 11 of this chapter.

I have given them unto thee. — Better, unto thee have I given them for an anointing portion. (See Lev. vii. 35, and Note.)

By an ordinance for ever. — Better, as an eternal statute.

From the fire. — i.e., from the fire which was kindled upon the altar of burnt offering.

Every oblation of their’s, every meat offering of their’s. — Or, every oblation of their’s for all their meat offerings, and for all their sin offerings, and for all their trespass offerings (or, guilt offerings).

In the most holy place. — These gifts were to be eaten, as most holy, in the court of the Tabernacle (see Lev. vi. 16, 26, vii. 6), and only by the priests and the male members of their families.

The heave offering of their gift. — With all the wave offerings. — See Lev. vii. 34.

Every one that is clean in thy house shall eat of it. — See Lev. xxii. 10–13.

All the best. — Hebrew, all the fat, as in Gen. xlv. 18.

The firstfruits of them. — The quantity is not defined. St. Jerome, in his Commentary on Ezek. xlv., mentions the fortieth part as a liberal contribution.

and the sixtieth as a scanty one, according to Jewish tradition.

Every thing devoted. — See Lev. xcvii. 21–28.

Every thing that openeth the matrix. — (See Lev. xxvii. 6, 26, 27.) Five shekels was the redemption-price paid for each of the firstborn who were not redeemed by the Levites (chap. iii. 47).

According to thine estimation. — See Lev. xviii. 3–7, and Notes.

The flesh of them shall be thine. — In Deut. xii. 17, 18, the firstlings of the herd and of the flock are directed to be eaten by the owners in the place which the Lord should choose. Either the law as prescribed in Numbers was subsequently modified, or the second clause of this verse explains and qualifies the preceding clause, and assigns only the wave breast and the right shoulder (or, rather, leg) to the priests. (Comp. Lev. x. 14, 15.)

It is a covenant of salt. — i.e., an indissoluble covenant. (See Lev. ii. 13, and Note; also 2 Chron. xiii. 5.) Hence the phrases used by the Greeks to denote the breach of a covenant, "Where is the salt?" and "They overstepped the salt." (Comp. Pliny, H. N., xxxi. 41; Cic., De Div., ii. 16; Virgil, Ecl., viii. 82.)

Thou shalt have no inheritance. — Aaron is addressed in this verse as the representative of the priesthood. He himself did not enter into the land of Canaan.
I am thy part and thine inheritance. — All that are admitted into the number of Christ’s royal priesthood have God for their portion and inheritance—in life, in death, and throughout eternity. (Comp. Ps. xlviii. 2, exii. 3.)

(21) All the tenth in Israel.—The reference here is to the first tithe, or tenth of the whole of the produce of the land.

(22) For they bear sin and die. — i.e., lest they bring sin upon themselves, the penalty of which they would have to bear. This appears to be the primary meaning of the phrase, from the secondary meaning, viz., that of bearing sin in the sense of atoning for it, is derived. (Comp. Lev. xix. 17, xxi. 9.)

(23) But the tithes. — Better, for the tithes. — This verse assigns the reason why the Levites were to have no inheritance among the children of Israel.

(24) And the Lord spake unto Moses. — The law respecting the Levitical dues was given to Aaron, and communicated through him to the people. The law respecting the tithe which the Levites were to give to the priests, in which Aaron’s family were directly concerned, was communicated to Moses, and by him to the Levites.

(25) Even a tenth part of the tithe. — Better, a tithe of the tithe.

(26) And as the fulness of the wine-press. — The word which is here rendered fulness is the same which occurs in Exod. ii. 29, and is there rendered “the first of thy ripe fruits.” It is used to denote either the fully ripe grain, or the produce of the vine. The tithe which the Levites paid to the priests was reckoned in the same light as if it had been the produce of their own labour.

(27) As the increase of the threshing-floor. — As the tithe rendered to the priests was to be reckoned in the same light as if it had been the produce of their own labour (verse 25), so what remained after the Levites’ offerings had been duly set apart was to be reckoned as much the property of the Levites, and to be treated in the same manner, as the corn of the threshing-floor and the wine of the wine-press of the rest of the Israelites.

(28) And ye shall eat it in every place. — When the tenth which was due to the priests had been duly paid, the remainder of the tithe received from the people became the rightful portion of the Levites, as their ordinary means of subsistence, and might be eaten by them in every place, not being subject to the restrictions laid upon the priests in regard to the place in which the holy things were to be eaten. (See v. 19.)

(29) And ye shall bear no sin. — i.e., shall not incur any guilt, or become liable to any punishment. (See Note on verse 22.)

CHAPTER XIX. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, (2) This is the ordinance of the law which the Lord hath commanded, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, that they bring thee a red heifer without spot, wherein is no blemish, and upon which never came yoke: (3) And ye shall give her unto Eleazar the priest, that he may bring her forth without the camp, and one shall slay her before his face: (4) and Eleazar the priest shall take of her blood with his finger, and sprinkle of her blood directly before the tabernacle of the congregation seven times; (5) and one shall burn the heifer in his sight; (6) her skin, and her flesh, and her blood, with her dung, shall be burned: (6) and the priest shall take cedar wood, and hyssop, and scarlet, and cast it into the midst of the burning of the heifer. (7) Then the priest shall wash his clothes, and he shall bathe his flesh in water, and afterward he shall come into the camp, and the priest shall be unclean until the even. (8) And he that burneth her shall wash his clothes in water, and bathe his flesh in water, and shall be unclean until the even. (9) And a man that is clean shall gather up the ashes of the heifer, and lay them up without the camp in a clean place, and it shall be kept for the congregation of the children of Israel for a water of separation: it is a purification for sin. (10) And he that gathereth the ashes of the heifer shall wash his clothes, and be unclean until the even: and it shall be unto the children of Israel, and unto the stranger that sojourneth among them, for a statute for ever.

(11) He that toucheth the dead body of any man shall be unclean seven days. (12) He shall purify himself with it on the third day, and on the seventh day he shall be clean; but if he purify not himself the third day, then the seventh day he shall not be clean. (13) Whosoever toucheth the dead body of any man that is dead, and purifieth not himself, defileth the tabernacle of the Lord: and that soul shall be cut off from Israel: because the water of separation was not sprinkled upon him, he shall be unclean; his uncleanness is yet upon him. (14) This is the law, when a man dieth in a tent: all the law which was about to be given. The extraordinary mortality which the Israelites had sustained (chap. xvi. 40) may have called for some special rites of purification from the defilement caused by contact with the dead. There is no distinct intimation, however, of the time at which this law was first promulgated, which Ibn Ezra and others suppose to have been previously to the departure from Sinai. The words "which the Lord hath (or had) commanded" are consistent with the fact of the previous existence of the ordinance, though not necessarily suggestive of it. This institution was one which admitted of observance in the wilderness under circumstances in which other requirements of the Levitical law could not be observed.

Without spot.—The word so translated may be taken in connection with that which precedes it, and may denote that the heifer was to be entirely red; or it may, more probably, be taken in connection with the words which follow, and may be understood as defining more precisely the freedom of the animal from every defect. (Comp. Lev. xxii. 19, 20.) (1) And Eleazar the priest shall take of her blood . . . —The appointed rites were to be discharged by Eleazar, not by Aaron, who would otherwise have been temporarily disqualified by legal impurity from the discharge of his high-priestly functions. Before the tabernacle of the congregation . . . —i.e., opposite to the entrance of the Tabernacle, but, as stated in the preceding verse, outside the camp, because the act had reference to the uncleanness of death.

(6) And the priest shall take cedar wood, and hyssop, and scarlet.—According to the Tar-that come into the tent, and all that is in the tent, shall be unclean seven days. (10) And every open vessel, which hath no covering bound upon it, is unclean. (11) And whosoever toucheth one that is slain with a sword in the open fields, or a dead body, or a bone of a man, or a grave, shall be unclean seven days.

(12) And for an unclean person they shall take of the ashes of the burnt heifer of purification for sin, and running water shall be put thereto in a vessel; (13) and a clean person shall take hyssop, and dip it in the water, and sprinkle it upon the tent, and upon all the vessels, and upon the persons that were there, and upon him that touched a bone, or one slain, or one dead, or a grave; (14) and the clean person shall sprinkle upon the unclean on the third day, and on the seventh day: and on the seventh day he shall purify himself, and wash his clothes, and bathe himself in water, and shall be clean at even. (15) But the man that shall be unclean, and shall not purify himself, that soul shall be cut off from among the congregation, because he hath defiled the sanctuary of the Lord: the water of separation hath not been sprinkled upon him; he is unclean. (16) And it shall be a perpetual statute unto them, that he that sprinkleth the water of separation shall wash his clothes; and he that toucheth the water of separation shall be unclean until even. (17) And whatsoever the unclean person toucheth shall be unclean; and the soul that toucheth it shall be unclean until even.

CHAPTER XX.—(1) Then came the children of Israel, even the whole congregation, into the desert of Zin in the first month: and the people abode in Kadesh; and Miriam died there, and was buried there. (2) And there was no water for the congregation: and they gathered themselves together against Moses and against Aaron. (3) And the people chode with Moses, and spake, saying, Would God that we had died when the simple use of the word which is here rendered abode that the sojourn at Kadesh at the beginning of the forty year was of long duration (see Judg. xi. 17, where the same word is used). Hence no legitimate conclusion can be drawn from the use of this word respecting the reference of the verse to an arrival at Kadesh at the beginning of the third or of the forty year after the exodus. (See xx. 14, and Note). (2) And there was no water. —Kadesh may have comprised a considerable portion of the wilderness of Zin, and there may have been a supply of water in some parts of the district and a scarcity in others; or the supply may have proved insufficient for the wants of so great a multitude; or the miraculous supply which was given at Rephidim may have continued, with more or less frequent intermissions, up to the time to which this statement refers, and may have been suddenly withdrawn at this time in order to try the faith of the Israelites. (3) Would God that we had died. —The reference seems to be to the plague which broke out after the insurrection of Korah. The language of the murmurers is very similar to that which is recorded in chap. xvi. 14, and the word gara (die, or expire), which is twice used in this verse, and which occurs in chap. xvii. 26, 28, in connection with the history of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram, is found only in one other place throughout the last four books of the Pentateuch—viz., Num. xx. 29. The probability that that plague was of comparatively recent occurrence, and not separated from the present murmuring by a period of nearly forty years, has been inferred from the use of the word brethren in this verse. The generation which was contemporary with those who perished in the plague which followed the rebellion of Korah is supposed by some to our brethren died before the Lord! (4) And why have ye brought up the congregation of the Lord into this wilderness, that we and our cattle should die there? (5) And wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt, to bring us in unto this evil place? it is no place of seed, of figs, or of vines, or of pomegranates; neither is there any water to drink.

And Moses and Aaron went from the presence of the congregation unto the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, and they fell upon their faces; and the glory of the Lord appeared unto them. (7) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (8) Take the rod, and gather thou the congregation together, thou, and Aaron thy brother, and speak ye unto the rock before their eyes; and it shall give forth his water, and thou shalt bring forth to them water out of the rock: so thou shalt give the congregation and their beasts drink.

And Moses took the rod from before the Lord, as he commanded him. (10) And Moses and Aaron gathered the congregation together before the rock, and he said unto them, Hear now, ye rebels; must we fetch you water out of this rock? (11) And Moses lifted up his hand, and with his rod he smote the rock twice: and the water came out abundantly, and the congregation drank, and their beasts also.

And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron, Because ye believed me not, to sanctify me in the eyes of the children of Israel, therefore ye shall not bring this congregation into the land which I have given them.

This is the water of Meribah; have been almost extinct at the time to which the events recorded in this chapter are commonly referred, and the word fathers, it is alleged, would, in that case, have been more applicable to those who perished than brethren. It may be observed, further, that the inquiry, “Wherefore have ye made us to come up out of Egypt?” is more natural when regarded as the language of the generation which had come up out of Egypt as adults, and who looked back to the exodus as to a recent event, than when regarded as that of a generation of which a large number had been born in the wilderness, and the rest had left Egypt nearly forty years previously. These considerations, however, do not appear to be entitled to much weight. The older portion of the congregation, who would naturally be the spokesmen, would speak of those who perished in the insurrection of Korah as their brethren, whether the event itself was of recent occurrence or not; and the words which are rendered “Why have ye brought up, &c.?” may, with equal propriety, be rendered “Why did ye bring up, &c.?” (Comp. verse 16 and Note).

Take the rod.—It has been supposed by some, from the fact that the rod is represented as being taken “from before the Lord” (verse 9), that the reference is to the rod of Aaron which was kept “before the testimony” (chap. xvii. 10). On the other hand, the natural presumption that the rod was the same as that with which some of the previous miracles in Egypt and those at the Red Sea and at Rephidim had been wrought is confirmed by the facts that the name of Aaron is not mentioned in this verse until after the mention of the rod, and that Moses is said, in verse 11, to have smitten the rock “with his rod.”

Must we fetch you water out of this rock?—In the case of the former miracle at Rephidim the rod is spoken of only under the Hebrew word zar (Exod. xvii. 6). Throughout the present narration the rock is invariably spoken of under the word selo. In Ps. lxviii. 13, 16, where reference appears to be made to both miracles, both words are used.

And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron.—We read in Ps. cvi. 33 that the Israelites “provoked (literally, made to rebel) his spirit, so that he spake unadvisedly with his lips.” Whatever was the nature of the sin thus committed, it is clear that Aaron was a participator in it with Moses. Some have thought that the sin of Moses consisted in addressing the people as rebels (or as rebellious ones); but this is the charge repeatedly brought against them in the book of Deuteronomy (see chaps. i. 29, 43, ix. 23, xxiii. 27), under circumstances in which it is impossible to suppose that Moses committed the same sin. It has also been thought that the sin of Moses and Aaron consisted in arrogating to themselves the honour which was due only to God, “Must we fetch you water?” but the personal pronoun does not occur in the Hebrew, as it might, and probably would, have occurred, if intended to be emphatic. The more probable explanation appears to be that, notwithstanding the miraculous supply of water which had begun at Rephidim, and which had been subsequently continued, Moses and Aaron distrusted the word and power (verse 12) of God, and that they yielded to the impulse of impatience and anger, as betrayed both by the language which they used and by the double smiting of the rock, to which Moses had been commanded only to speak. To what degree Aaron was concerned in these sins can be inferred only from the facts that he, as well as Moses, was charged with the sin of unbelief, and that the punishment of exclusion from the land of Canaan was inflicted upon both.

Therefore ye shall not bring this congregation...—In chap. xiv. 30 Caleb and Joshua are mentioned as the only exceptions to the general sentence of exclusion pronounced against the generation which had come out of Egypt, and which consisted of those who were above twenty years of age. It does not appear, however, from that passage whether the sentence pronounced against Moses and Aaron had, or had not, been delivered at that time, inasmuch as they were the speakers on that occasion, and they belonged to the tribe of Levi, which was not included in the numbering to which reference is made in verse 29.

This is the water of Meribah.—i.e., of strife. (See Exod. xvii. 7, and Note; also Num. xxvii. 14, where the words ‘in Kadesh, in the wilderness of because the children of Israel strove with the Lorn, and he was sanctified in them.

(14) And Moses sent messengers from Kadesh unto the king of Edom, Thus saith thy brother Israel, Thou knowest all the travel that hath befallen us: (15) how our fathers went down into Egypt, and we have dwelt in Egypt a long time; and the Egyptians vexed us, and our fathers: (16) and when we cried unto the Lorn, he heard our voice, and sent an angel, and hath brought us forth out of Egypt: and, behold, we are in Kadesh, a city in the uttermost of thy border: (17) let us pass, I pray thee, through thy country: we will not pass through the fields, or through the vineyards, neither will we drink of the water of the wells: we will go by the king's high way, we will not turn to the right hand nor to the left, until we have passed thy borders. (18) And Edom said unto him, Thou shalt not pass by me, lest I come out against thee with the sword. (19) And the children of Israel said unto him, We will go by the high way: and if I and my cattle drink of thy water, then I will pay for it: I will only, without doing any thing else, go through on my feet. (20) And he said, Thou shalt not go through. And Edom came out against him with much people, and with a strong hand. (21) Thus Edom refused to give Israel passage through his border: wherefore Israel turned away from him.

(22) And the children of Israel, even the whole congregation, journeyed from Kadesh, and came unto Mount Hor.

(23) And the Lord spake unto Moses and Aaron in mount Hor, by the coast of the land of Edom, saying, (24) Aaron shall be gathered unto his people: for he shall not enter into the land which I have given unto the children of Israel, Zin, are added to distinguish the latter from the earlier miracle.) In Deut. xxxii. 51 the waters are spoken of as those of "Mishib of Kadesh."

And he was sanctified in them.—The reference in the words in them seems to be either to the word wa, which is plural in Hebrew, or, more probably, to the children of Israel, amongst whom Moses and Aaron were included. It has been supposed that the place derived its name of Kadesh (or, more fully, Kadesh-Baraa, chap. xxxii. 8) from the cognate verb, which is rendered sanctify in this and the preceding verse. It was in Kadesh that the sentence of exclusion had been pronounced upon the people generally (chap. xiv. 22, 23), and upon Moses and Aaron in particular, and it was thus that the Lord sanctified Himself in dealing with the transgressors. If the place derived its name, Kadesh, from these circumstances, it must have been called by that name proleptically in Gen. xiv. 7—a supposition which is entirely consistent with the manner in which the place is mentioned in that verse ("Edeshshaput, which is Kadesh.

(14) And Moses sent messengers from Kadesh . . .—The date of the occurrence related in this and the following verses is not stated. It might be inferred from Judges xi. 16, 17 that the message to the Kings of Edom and Moab was sent soon after the exodus, and that it was in consequence of their refusal that the sojourn in Kadesh was prolonged: "And (or, So) Israel abode in Kadesh" (Judges xi. 17). The account, however, is founded upon or in the whole of certain inference in regard to time. No difficulty is involved in the fact that Edom is represented in Gen. xxxvi. as being governed by dukes, or chiefs (allaphim), whilst in this place we read of a king. It is possible that the form of government may have been changed, or, as in the case of the rulers of Midian, the same persons who in one place are described as kings may, in another place, be described as dukes, duke, or leaders. Comp. Num. xxxi. 8, where the five rulers of Midian are described as kings, with Joshua xiii. 21.
because ye rebelled against my word at the water of Meribah. (25) Take Aaron and Eleazar his son, and bring them up unto mount Hor: (26) And strip Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son: and Aaron shall be gathered unto his people, and shall die there. (27) And Moses did as the Lord commanded; and they went up into mount Hor in the sight of all the congregation. (28) And Moses stripped Aaron of his garments, and put them upon Eleazar his son; and Aaron died there in the top of the mount: and Moses and Eleazar came down from the mount. (29) And when all the congregation saw that Aaron was dead, they mourned for Aaron thirty days, even all the house of Israel.

CHAPTER XXI.—(1) And when king Arad . . .—The verse may be rendered thus: Now the Canaanite, the King of Arad, which dwelt in the south country (or, Negeb) heard (or, had heard) that Israel had come by the way of Aatharim (or, of the spies), and he fought . . . The date of this occurrence is uncertain. The district of Arad appears to have extended to the southern frontier of Canaan. (Comp. chap. xxxiii. 40; Josh. xiii. 14; Judg. i. 16, 17.) The attack probably took place either in the interval between the departure of the messengers to Edom and their return, or at the time at which the Israelites broke up from Kadesh, and before the direction of their march had been ascertained. The word Aatharim, which is rendered in the Authorised Version spies, may be another form of the word which occurs in chap. xiv. 6, and which is there rendered them that searched; or, as appears more probable, it may be the name of a place which does not occur elsewhere.

(2) And they utterly destroyed them and their cities.—The meaning of the verb which is here employed is to devote to destruction, and hence to destroy utterly. It does not clearly appear whether this destruction was effected at one, or whether the fulfillment of the vow took place at a later period. (See Josh. xiii. 14; Judg. i. 17.) If the attack of the Canaanites was made at the time of the final departure from Kadesh, the latter view must be maintained, as it can scarcely be supposed that the cities could have been rebuilt and again destroyed in so short an interval.

And he called the name of the place Hormah.—Better, And the name of the place was called Hormah. The word Hormah,—i.e., a devoted thing,—is cognate with the verb which occurs in this and the preceding verse, and which is rendered utterly destroy. The place is so called by anticipation in chap. xiv. 45, and, as in regard to other names (e.g., Bethel and Jacob), the name was probably given anew to the place on a later occasion (Judg. i. 17).

(3) And because of the way.—Better, in (or, on) the way. In addition to all the hardships and dangers of the journey, they were conscious that they were turning their backs upon the land of Canaan, instead of marching by a direct course into it.
(5) This light bread.—The word rendered light denotes something vile or worthless. It was thus that the Israelites regarded the manna which was given to them from heaven; even as the “spiritual meat” which is given to Christ’s Church in His word and ordinances is too commonly regarded amongst ourselves.

(6) And the Lord sent fiery serpents...—Hebrew, the serpents, the seraphim (i.e., the burning ones). (See Deut. viii. 13; Isa. xiv. 29, xxx. 6.) The word appears to denote a particular kind of serpent, as in the following verse. Some think that they were so called because of the bright fiery red upon their heads; others because of the blazing sunbeams on their scales; and others because of their inflammatory and poisonous bibe. Venomous snakes are said to abound still in the Arabah.

(7) Maketh thee a fiery serpent.—The single Hebrew word which is here employed is saraph (a serpent), or burning one, as in verse 6, where the word nehasdim—serpents—occurs also. The meaning is explained in the following verse, in which it is said that Moses made “a serpent of brass.”

Set it upon a pole.—Better, a standard. The LXX. have κατοπτρις, the Vulgate signum. The Hebrew word (nes) is the same which occurs in Exod. xvii. 15, “Jehovah-nissi”—i.e., Jehovah is my standard or banner.

(8) And Moses made a serpent of brass.—The old serpent was the cause of death, temporal and spiritual. Christ Jesus, “in the likeness of sinful flesh” (Rom. viii. 3), was made sin for us (2 Cor. v. 21), and thus fulfilled, as He Himself explained to Nicodemus, the type of the brazen serpent (John iii. 14, 15). The meaning of this type, or “sign of salvation,” is explained in the Book of Wisdom in these words, “He that turned himself toward it was not saved by the thing that he saw, but by faith, that art the Saviour of all” (chap. xvi. 7). This serpent was preserved by the Israelites, and taken into Canaan, and was ultimately destroyed by King Hezekiah, after it had become an object of idolatrous worship (2 Kings xviii. 4).

(9) And pitched in Oboth.—The intermediate stations between Mount Hor and Oboth were Zalmonah and Penum (chap. xxxiii. 41—45). The former of these places is thought by some to have derived its name from the Hebrew word zelos (image, or likeness), and to have been the place at which the likeness of the serpents which bit the Israelites was set up.

(10) At Ije-abarim.—This word seems to denote the heaps (or, ruins) of passages or of coast or river lands—i.e., of districts bordering upon the sea or a river. It is called plaques or plains simply in chap. xxxiii. 45.

(11) On the other side of Arnon.—Better, by the side of the Arnon. (Comp. Deut. ii. 24, 26.) The Hebrew word which is here used does not determine on which side of the Arnon the encampment was. (Comp. chap. xxii. 1, and Note.)

(12) The book of the wars of the Lord.—Nothing is known about this book. The last days of Moses, as Bammagarten has observed, may have been a suitable time for the commencement of such a work. The history of the journey from Kadesh to the Arboth Moab was not written by Moses until after the defeat of the two kings of the Amorites, and the subjugation of the land on the east of the Jordan.

What he did in the Red Sea...—The original is very obscure. It is probable that some such verb as They conquered (or, enlaved) is understood, and that the words may be rendered Vaheb in Suphab and the valleys (by Arnon, and the bed (or, race) of the valleys which inclines towards the dwelling of Ar, and leans upon the border of Moab. Vaheb was probably the name of a town, and Suphab the district in which that town was situated, so called from its reeds and rushes. Some, however, think that Suphab here denotes a storm or hurricane, as in other places. Ar is supposed to be the same as Areopolis.
Then Israel sang this song, 1 Spring up, O well;
2 Sing ye unto it: (15) the princes dug the well, the nobles of the people dug it, by the direction of the lawgiver, with their stakes. And from the wilderness they went to Mattanah:

And from Mattanah to Nahaliel: (19) and from Nahaliel to Bamoth: (20) and from Bamoth in the valley, that is in the country of Moab, to the top of Pisgah, which looketh toward Jeshimon.

And Israel sent messengers unto Sihon king of the Amorites, saying, (22) Let me pass through thy land: we will not turn into the fields, or into the vineyards; we will not drink of the waters of the well: but we will go along by the king's high way, until we be past thy borders. (23) And Sihon would not suffer Israel to pass through his border: but Sihon gathered all his people together, and went out against Israel into the wilderness: and he came to Jahaz, and fought against Israel. (24) And Israel smote him with the edge of the sword, and possessed his land from Arnon unto Jabbok, even unto the Children of Ammon: for the border of the Children of Ammon was strong. (25) And Israel took all these cities: and Israel dwelt in all the cities of the Amorites, in Heshbon, and in all the villages thereof. (26) For Heshbon was the city of Sihon the king of the Amorites, who had fought against the former king of Moab, and taken all his land out of his hand, even unto Arnon.

Wherefore they that speak in proverbs say, Come into Heshbon, let the city of Sihon be built and prepared: (27) for there is a fire gone out of Heshbon, a flame from the city of Sihon: it hath consumed Ar of Moab, and the lords of the high places of Armon. (28) Woe to thee, Moab! thou art undone, O people of Chemosh: he hath given his sons that escaped, and his daughters, into captivity unto Sihon king of the Amorites. (29) We have shot at them; Heshbon is perished even unto Dibon, and we have laid them waste even unto Nophah, which reacheth unto Medeba.

(18) By the direction of the lawgiver.—Better, with the ruler's staff. The same word occurs in Gen. xlix. 10, where it stands in parallelism to "the sceptre." (See Note in loc.)

And from the wilderness they went to Mattanah.—The Targums interpret this and verses 19 and 20 of the well, And from the wilderness it was given to them for a gift, and from thence it was given to them in Mattanah, &c. The Targum of Onkelos is as follows: "And from the time that it was given to them, it descended to them with the rivers, &c." The Targum of Palestine is — And from the wilderness, &c. (as above).

And from Bamoth in the valley.—Better, and from Bamoth to the valley that is ... The country (or, rather, field) of Moab was a portion of the table-land which stretches from Rabbath Ammon to the Arnon. The valley in this table-land was upon the height of Pisgah, i.e., the northern part of the mountains of Abarim.

Toward Jeshimon.—Or, across the waste (or, desert).

(24) For the border of the children of Ammon was strong.—These words assign the reason why the conquest of the Amorites were arrested, not why the children of Israel did not take possession of the land of the Ammonites, with whom they were forbidden to meddle, and whose land they were not to occupy. (See Deut. ii. 19.)

And Israel dwelt in all the cities of the Amorites.—If, as appears most probable, this and the thirty-first verse form a part of the original narrative, the word which is rendered dwelt should be rendered sojournered, or abode; and understood, in accordance with the frequent use of the word (as, e.g., in chap. xxii, 5, 8), of a temporary occupation or encampment. The permanent occupation of the eastern side of the Jordan by the Israelites was subsequent to the death of Moses.

(25) And taken all his land ... —i.e., the land between the Arnon and the Jabbok, as it is explained in the last clause of the verse.

Come into Heshbon.—These verses appear to commemorate first the victory of the Amorites over the Moabites, and then that of the Israelites over the Amorites. They may be rendered thus:—

"Come to Heshbon! Let the city of Sihon be built up and restored! For a fire went out from Heshbon— A flame from the city of Sihon— The lords of the high places of Armon.

Woe to thee, Moab! Thou art perished, O people of Chemosh: He (i.e., Chemosh) gave up his sons as fugitives, And his daughters into captivity Unto Sihon, the king of the Amorites.

We cast them down: Heshbon is perished even unto Dibon: For we laid them waste even unto Nophah, Which (reacheth) even unto Medeba.

Or, if we read 'esh (fire) instead of ashur (which), a reading which derives some support from the Masoretic point over the last letter and from the context (verse 25), as well as from the LXX, the last words may be rendered, "With fire, even unto Medeba." The Targum understands by "the lords of the high places of Armon" the priests and worshippers in the temples and at the altars of the Idols in Moab. Medeba, now Medaba, was situated at the south of Heshbon. The position of Nophah is unknown. It has been supposed that it may be the same as Nebo, which is mentioned in connection with Balaam and Medeba, in Isa. xx. 2, or with Ameleah, which lies to the east of Medeba.

(31) Thus Israel dwelt . . . . —Better, And Israel sojourned, &c. (See Note on verse 25.)

XXII.

(1) In the plains of Moab.—The Arboth Moab extended from Beth Jeshimoth (the house of wastes) to Abel Shittim (the meadow of acacias) (chap. xxxiii. 19), in the upper Arabah, the present Ghor. These plains had belonged to Moab, and, since the victory over the Amorites, were possessed by the Israelites.

On this side Jordan.—Better, alongside of the Jordan. It cannot be determined, from the use of the word eber, or me-eber, to which side of the Jordan reference is made. (See chap. xxxiii. 19, where me-eber occurs twice, and is rendered in the Authorized Version on yonder side in the first case, and on this side in the second case.) See Deut. i. 1, and Note, and Isa. ix. 1, where Galilee is described by Isaiah as “beyond Jordan.”

(3) And Moab was sore afraid of the people. —There was no ground for this apprehension, inasmuch as the Divine command given to Moses was “Distress not the Moabites, neither contend with them in battle” (Deut. ii. 9). It does not appear, however, that Balak was aware of this prohibition; and the recent conquests of the Israelites naturally filled the Moabites with alarm, especially inasmuch as when the Israelites sent to the King of Moab to ask permission to pass through his land he did not consent (Judg. xi. 17).

(4) And Moab said unto the elders of Midian.—It has been thought that Balak was a Midianite, who had been imposed upon the Moabites as their king by their Amoritish conquerors. (Comp. chap. xxi. 26.) The concluding words of the verse may be understood as denoting a recent change in the dynasty.

(2) And Balak the son of Zippor saw all that Israel had done to the Amorites. (3) And Moab was sore afraid of the people, because they were many; and Moab was distressed because of the children of Israel. (4) And Moab said unto the elders of Midian, Now shall this company lick up all that are round about us, as the ox licketh up the grass of the field. And Balak the son of Zippor was king of the Moabites at that time.

(5) He sent messengers therefore unto Balaam the son of Beor to Pethor, which is by the river of the land of the children of his people, to call him, saying, Behold, there is a people come out from Egypt; behold, they cover the face of the earth, and they abide over against me: (6) come now therefore, I pray thee, curse me this people; for they are too mighty for me: peradventure I shall prevail, that we may smite them, and that I may drive them out of the land: for I wot

As the ox licketh up the grass of the field.—The comparison is one which well accords with the occupation of the Moabites as a pastoral people.

(5) Balaam the son of Beor.—The name of Balaam is probably derived from bala (to devour), with the terminal syllable am, or from the two words bala (he devoured), and am (people). His father’s name (Beor), from baar (to consume), has been thought to denote that Balaam belonged to a family in which the magical art was hereditary. He is described in Josh. xiii. 22 as “the soothsayer” (Hebrew, kosem)—i.e., one of that class of persons who were not to be tolerated amongst the Israelites, and who are spoken of as “an abomination unto the Lord” (Deut. xxi. 10—12). The form Bosor (2 Pet. ii. 15) probably arose from a peculiar mode of pronouncing the guttural letter Ain in baar. (See Keil, On the Pentateuch, iii. p. 139, and Note.) On the character and history of Balaam, reference may be made to Bishop Butler (Sermon vii.); Waterland (Works, ix. 307): Keil, On the Pentateuch, in loc.; Hengstenberg (Dissertation on the Histories and Prophecies of Balaam, p. 747, Clark, 1848); and to the Article in Smith’s Dictionary of the Bible, by Professor Stanley Leathes.

To Pethor, which is by the river of the land . . . . —Better, To Pethor, which is by the river, (even to) the land of the children of his people. Pethor was in Mesopotamia (chap. xxviii. 7), where Lot, from whom the Moabites were descended, had dwelt (Gen. xii. 5). “The river” is the Euphrates here, as elsewhere. (See, e.g., Gen. xv. 18, xxxi. 21; Exod. xxiii. 31; 2 Chron. ix. 26.)

They cover the face of the earth.—Literally, the eye of the earth (or, the lands). (Comp. Exod. x. 5.)

(6) Curse me this people.—Balaam undoubtedly believed in the efficacy of Balaam’s magical incantations. It is deserving of observation, moreover, that, as has been remarked by Keil (in loc.), “it is frequently celebrated as a great favour displayed towards Israel that he whom thou blessest is blessed, and he whom thou cursest is cursed.
(7) And the elders of Moab and the elders of Midian departed with the rewards of divination in their hand; and they came unto Balaam, and spake unto him the words of Balak.
(8) And he said unto them, Lodge here this night, and I will bring you word again, as the Lord shall speak unto me:
and the princes of Moab abode with Balaam.
(9) And God came unto Balaam, and said, What men are these with thee?
(10) And Balaam said unto God, Balak, the son of Zipor, king of Moab, hath sent unto me, saying, (11) Behold, there is a people come out of Egypt, which covereth the face of the earth: come now, curse me them; peradventure I shall be able to overcome them, and drive them out. (12) And God said unto Balaam, Thou shalt not go with them; thou shalt not curse the people: for they are blessed.
(13) And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said unto the princes of Balak, Get you into your land: for the Lord
refuseth to give me leave to go with
you. (14) And the princes of Moab rose
up, and they went unto Balak, and said,
Balaam refuseth to come with us.
(15) And Balak sent yet again princes,
more, and more honourable than they.
(16) And they came to Balaam, and said to him, Thus saith Balak the son of Zipor, 2 Let nothing, I pray thee,
hinder thee from coming unto me:
(17) For I will promote thee unto very great honour, and I will do whatsoever
thou sayest unto me: come therefore,
I pray thee, curse me this people.
(18) And Balaam answered and said unto the servants of Balak, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold,
I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do less or more.
(19) Now therefore, I pray thee, tarry ye also here this night, that I may know what the Lord will say unto me more.
(20) And God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men come to call thee, rise up, and go with them; but yet the word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do.
(21) And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said unto the men of Balak,
Get you into your land: for the Lord
refuseth to give me leave to go with
you. (22) And the princes of Moab rose
up, and they went unto Balak, and said,
Balaam refuseth to come with us.
(23) And Balak sent yet again princes,
more, and more honourable than they.
(24) And they came to Balaam, and said
to him, Thus saith Balak the son of Zipor, 2 Let nothing, I pray thee,
hinder thee from coming unto me:
(25) For I will promote thee unto very great honour, and I will do whatsoever
thou sayest unto me: come therefore,
I pray thee, curse me this people.
(26) And Balaam answered and said unto
the servants of Balak, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold,
I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do less or more.
(27) Now therefore, I pray thee, tarry ye
also here this night, that I may know
what the Lord will say unto me more.
(28) And God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men
come to call thee, rise up, and go with them; but yet the word which I shall
say unto thee, that shalt thou do.
(29) And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said unto the men of Balak,
Get you into your land: for the Lord
refuseth to give me leave to go with
you. (30) And the princes of Moab rose
up, and they went unto Balak, and said,
Balaam refuseth to come with us.
(31) And Balak sent yet again princes,
more, and more honourable than they.
(32) And they came to Balaam, and said
to him, Thus saith Balak the son of Zipor, 2 Let nothing, I pray thee,
hinder thee from coming unto me:
(33) For I will promote thee unto very great honour, and I will do whatsoever
thou sayest unto me: come therefore,
I pray thee, curse me this people.
(34) And Balaam answered and said unto
the servants of Balak, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold,
I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do less or more.
(35) Now therefore, I pray thee, tarry ye
also here this night, that I may know
what the Lord will say unto me more.
(36) And God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men
come to call thee, rise up, and go with them; but yet the word which I shall
say unto thee, that shalt thou do.
(37) And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said unto the men of Balak,
Get you into your land: for the Lord
refuseth to give me leave to go with
you. (38) And the princes of Moab rose
up, and they went unto Balak, and said,
Balaam refuseth to come with us.
(39) And Balak sent yet again princes,
more, and more honourable than they.
(40) And they came to Balaam, and said
to him, Thus saith Balak the son of Zipor, 2 Let nothing, I pray thee,
hinder thee from coming unto me:
(41) For I will promote thee unto very great honour, and I will do whatsoever
thou sayest unto me: come therefore,
I pray thee, curse me this people.
(42) And Balaam answered and said unto
the servants of Balak, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold,
I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do less or more.
(43) Now therefore, I pray thee, tarry ye
also here this night, that I may know
what the Lord will say unto me more.
(44) And God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men
come to call thee, rise up, and go with them; but yet the word which I shall
say unto thee, that shalt thou do.
(45) And Balaam rose up in the morning, and said unto the men of Balak,
Get you into your land: for the Lord
refuseth to give me leave to go with
you. (46) And the princes of Moab rose
up, and they went unto Balak, and said,
Balaam refuseth to come with us.
(47) And Balak sent yet again princes,
more, and more honourable than they.
(48) And they came to Balaam, and said
to him, Thus saith Balak the son of Zipor, 2 Let nothing, I pray thee,
hinder thee from coming unto me:
(49) For I will promote thee unto very great honour, and I will do whatsoever
thou sayest unto me: come therefore,
I pray thee, curse me this people.
(50) And Balaam answered and said unto
the servants of Balak, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold,
I cannot go beyond the word of the Lord my God, to do less or more.
(51) Now therefore, I pray thee, tarry ye
also here this night, that I may know
what the Lord will say unto me more.
(52) And God came unto Balaam at night, and said unto him, If the men
come to call thee, rise up, and go with them; but yet the word which I shall say unto thee, that shalt thou do.
An Angel on the Way.

NUMBERS, XXII.

The Ass Speakeh.

ing, and saddled his ass, and went with the princes of Moab. (22) And God's anger was kindled because he went: and the angel of the Lord stood in the way for an adversary against him. Now he was riding upon his ass, and his two servants were with him. (23) And *the ass saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand: and the ass turned aside out of the way, and went into the field: and Balaam smote the ass, to turn her into the way. (23) But the angel of the Lord stood in a path of the vineyards, a wall being on this side, and a wall on that side. (25) And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord, she thrust herself into the wall, and crushed Balaam's foot against the wall: and he smote her again. (26) And the angel of the Lord went further, and stood in a narrow place, where was no way to turn either to the right hand or to the left. (27) And when the ass saw the angel of the Lord, she fell down under Balaam: and Balaam's anger was kindled, and he smote the ass with a staff. (28) And the Lord opened the mouth of the ass, and she said unto Balaam, What have I done unto thee, that thou hast smitten me these three times? (29) And Balaam said unto the ass, Because thou hast mocked me: I would there were a sword in mine hand, for now would I kill thee. (30) And the ass said unto Balaam, Ams not I thine ass, 1upon which thou hast ridden ever since I was thine unto this day? was I ever wont to do so unto thee? And he said, Nay. (31) Then the Lord opened the eyes of Balaam, and he saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way, and his sword drawn in his hand: and he bowed down his head, and fell flat on his face.

(22) Because he went.—Literally, because he was going. The participio denotes the continuous act. He deliberately and resolutely proceeded on his journey with the messengers of Balaam, in defiance of the warnings which he had received.

Stood in the way.—Better, placed (or, stationed) himself in the way.

(21) In a path of the vineyards.—Better, in the hollow pass of the vineyards.

A wall.—Or, a fence.

(23) And the Lord opened the mouth of the ass.—Many critics, who admit the miraculous character of the events recorded in this and the following verses, maintain the subjective character of some of the incidents, and they adduce arguments to show that, whilst the same results might have been brought about in either manner, it is more in accordance with the general analogy of Scripture to assign a subjective than an objective interpretation to the language which is here employed. The following remarks may be made in regard to this interpretation:—(1) Consistency requires that the whole of the narrative should be interpreted either objectively or subjectively; and hence, that if the voice of the ass be interpreted as a subjective impression made upon the mind of Balaam, the appearance of the angel must be understood in the same manner. In this case, however, a difficulty arises which is as great, or greater, than that which the subjective theory is thought to remove. If the appearance of the angel to Balaam was subjective, the appearance must have been subjective also to the ass. In this case, moreover, it may be fairly alleged that if the line which divides the intelligent from the brute creation is transgressed by ascribing articulate speech to the ass, much more is that line transgressed by the supposition that an impression was produced in a subjective manner upon the mind of the ass. But (2) the real question at issue is not whether the recorded results might have been accomplished on the supposition that the incidents are to be explained subjectively, but what is the interpretation which the narrative itself suggests, and which the words of St. Peter (2 Pet. ii. 16) require? In regard to the narrative itself, there is no indication given that its respective portions are to be differently interpreted; nor is it possible, without doing violence to its obvious meaning, to interpret some parts of it objectively and other parts subjectively; whilst in regard to the testimony of St. Peter, it would be impossible to conceive of a statement couched in terms more directly suggestive of a literal fact than the following—"The dumb ass, speaking with man's voice, forbad the madness of the prophet." In regard to the objections which have been raised to the literal interpretation, grounded on the absence of any expression of surprise on the part of Balaam, and of any allusion to the effect produced upon the Moabish princes and Balaam's servants, it will suffice to observe (1) that here, as elsewhere, no just inference can be drawn from the silence of Scripture; and (2) that, as in the case of those who were with St. Paul as he went to Damascus, we have no means of determining, on the assumption of the presence of witnesses throughout the miraculous occurrences described, what amount of those occurrences they may have seen and heard. The angel was visible, in the first instance, only to the ass. In like manner the angel may have been visible only to Balaam, not to those who were with him. So also in regard to the voice: it may have been audible only to him to whom it was addressed.

(30) Ever since I was thine.—Literally, ever since thou livest,—i.e., all thy life long. The Targums of Jonathan and of Jerusalem paraphrase thus—"upon which thou hast ridden from thy youth unto this day." "An Arabic writer," says Dr. Gill, in his Commentary, in loc., "makes mention of an ass that the owner rode on forty years.

Unto this day.—The use of these words in this place serves to throw light upon such passages as Dent. iii. 14, "called them after his own name . . . unto this day," and shows that they do not necessarily denote that the events to which reference is made were separated by any very long interval.

513
(32) And the angel of the Lord said unto him, Wherefore hast thou smitten thine ass these three times? behold, I went out to withstand thee, because thy way is perverse before me: (33) and the ass saw me, and turned from me these three times; unless she had turned from me, surely now also I had slain thee, and saved her alive. (34) And Balaam said unto the angel of the Lord, I have sinned; for I knew not that thou stoodest in the way against me: now therefore, if it displease thee, I will get me back again. (35) And the angel of the Lord said unto Balaam, Go with the men: but only the word that I shall speak unto thee, that thou shalt speak. So Balaam went with the princes of Balak.

(36) And when Balak heard that Balaam was come, he went out to meet him unto a city of Moab, which is in the border of Arnon, which is in the utmost coast. (37) And Balak said unto Balaam, Did I not earnestly send unto thee to call thee? wherefore camest thou not unto me? am I not able indeed to promote thee to honour? (38) And Balaam said unto Balak, Lo, I am come unto thee: have I now any power at all to say any thing? the word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak. (39) And Balaam went with Balak, and they came unto Kirjath-huzoth. (40) And Balak offered oxen and sheep, and sent to Balaam, and to the princes that were with him.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(1) And Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams. (2) And Balak did as Balaam had spoken; and Balak and Balaam offered on every altar a bullock and a ram. (3) And Balaam said unto unto thee to call thee? wherefore camest thou not unto me? am I not able indeed to promote thee to honour? (36) And Balaam said unto Balak, Lo, I am come unto thee: have I now any power at all to say any thing? the word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak. (37) And Balaam went with Balak, and they came unto Kirjath-huzoth. (38) And Balak offered oxen and sheep, and sent to Balaam, and to the princes that were with him.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(1) And Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams. (2) And Balak did as Balaam had spoken; and Balak and Balaam offered on every altar a bullock and a ram. (3) And Balaam said unto unto thee to call thee? wherefore camest thou not unto me? am I not able indeed to promote thee to honour? (36) And Balaam said unto Balak, Lo, I am come unto thee: have I now any power at all to say any thing? the word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak. (37) And Balaam went with Balak, and they came unto Kirjath-huzoth. (38) And Balak offered oxen and sheep, and sent to Balaam, and to the princes that were with him.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(1) And Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams. (2) And Balak did as Balaam had spoken; and Balak and Balaam offered on every altar a bullock and a ram. (3) And Balaam said unto unto thee to call thee? wherefore camest thou not unto me? am I not able indeed to promote thee to honour? (36) And Balaam said unto Balak, Lo, I am come unto thee: have I now any power at all to say any thing? the word that God putteth in my mouth, that shall I speak. (37) And Balaam went with Balak, and they came unto Kirjath-huzoth. (38) And Balak offered oxen and sheep, and sent to Balaam, and to the princes that were with him.

CHAPTER XXIII.—(1) And Balaam said unto Balak, Build me here seven altars, and prepare me here seven oxen and seven rams. (2) And Balak did as Balaam had spoken; and Balak and Balaam offered on every altar a bullock and a ram. (3) And Balaam said unto Balaam, Stand by thy burnt offering, and I will go: peradventure the Lord will come to meet me: and whatsoever he sheweth me I will tell thee. And he went to an high place. And God met Balaam: and he said unto him, I have prepared seven altars, and I have offered upon every altar a bullock and a ram. And the Lord put a word in Balaam's mouth, and said, Return unto Balak, and thus shalt thou speak. And he returned unto him, and, lo, he stood by his burnt sacrifice, he, and all the princes of Moab. And he took up his parable, and said, Balak the king of Moab hath brought me from Aram, out of the mountains of the east, saying, Come, curse me Jacob, and come, defy Israel. How shall I curse, whom God hath not cursed? or how shall I defy, whom the Lord hath not defied? For from the top of the rocks I see him, and from the hills I behold him: lo, the people shall dwell alone, and shall not be reckoned among the nations. Who can count the dust of Jacob, and the number of the fourth part of Israel? Let me die the death of the righteous, and let my last end be like his!

And Balak said unto Balaam, What hast thou done unto me? I took thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast blessed them altogether. And he answered and said, Must I not take heed to speak that which the Lord hath put in my mouth? And Balak said unto him, Come, I pray thee, with me unto another place, from whence thou mayest see them: thou shalt see but the utmost part of them, and shalt not see them all: and curse me them from thence. And he brought him into the field of Zophim,
No. 13. He is brought unto the Top of Peor.

1 Or, The hill.

2 ch. 22. 35.

3 ch. 24. 2.

4 Or, in.

1 Or, The hill.

2 ch. 22. 35.

3 ch. 24. 2.

4 Or, in.

and which is described in Deut. xxxiv. 1 as "the mountain of Nebo," or Mount Nebo. It is possible, however, that Pisgah may have had less than one of such summits.

(17) What hath the Lord spoken?—Balaam here speaks of God under the name Jehovah.

(19) Neither the son of man, that he should repent.—The adoption of these words, with slight variation, by Samuel (1 Sam. xv. 29) affords evidence of his familiarity with this portion of the Pentateuch.

(21) He hath not beheld iniquity . . . .—The same combination of the words aven (iniquity, or injustice) and amal (perverseness, or, rather, suffering or grievance) occurs in Hab. i. 3.

The shout of a king.—The word which is rendered shout (terahah) is the same which occurs in Lev. xxiii. 24, and which is there rendered blowing of trumpets. (Comp. Josh. vi. 5; 20, where the same word is rendered shout as here.)

God brought them out of Egypt.—Literally, is bringing them. The use of the participle denotes the continuance of the action. He who brought them forth out of Egypt was still conducting them on their march. There is an obvious allusion in these words to those of Balak in chap. xxi. 5: "Behold, there is a people come out from Egypt." Seeing that the people did not come out of Egypt in obedience to their own caprice, but under Divine guidance, it was vain for Balak to resist them on their course, seeing that to contend with them was to contend against God.

The strength of an unicorn.—Better, of a buffalo. (Comp. Dent. xxxiii. 17—a passage closely resembling the present—from which it appears that the re'em had more than one horn.)

Surely there is no enchantment against Jacob . . . .—The verse may be rendered as follows: For there is no anger in Jacob, and there is no divination in Israel. At the (set) time it is told to Jacob and to Israel what God hath done (or, doth). The ordinary meaning of the words nahash (omen, or augury) and kesem (soothsaying, or divination), the use of the same preposition in verse 21 which is there rendered in', and more especially the second clause of the verse, seem to decide the meaning of the former clause to be as it is here given. The Israelites had no need of anger and divination, seeing that God revealed to them His acts, His counsel, and His will. "What is here affirmed of Israel," says Hengstenberg, "applies to the Church of all ages, and also to every individual believer. The Church of God knows from His own Word what God does, and what it has to do in consequence. The wisdom of this world resembles angry and divination. The Church of God, which is in possession of His word, has no need of it." (History of Balaam and his Prophecies, p. 441.)

As a great lion.—Better, as a lioness. (Comp. Gen. xlix. 9.) Balaam transfers to the whole nation which Jacob had prophesied of Judah.

Peradventure it will please God . . . .—Here Balak makes mention of God as Elohim. He appears to be satisfied that Balaam was hindered by God from uttering the curses which he desired him to pronounce upon Israel (comp. chap. xxiv. 11). Or the words may have been spoken ironically (comp. chap. xxiv. 11, and Note).

Unto the top of Peor.—Mount Peor was one peak of the northern part of the mountains of Abarim. It was nearer than the other heights to the camp of the CHAPTER XXIV.—(1) And when Balaam saw that it pleased the Lord to bless Israel, he went not, as at other times, 1 to seek for enchantments, but he set his face toward the wilderness.

(2) And Balaam lifted up his eyes, and he saw Israel abiding in his tents according to their tribes; and the spirit of God came upon him.  (3) And he took up his parable, and said,

Balaam the son of Beor hath said, and the man 2 whose eyes are open hath said: (4) He hath said, which heard the words of God, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open: (5) How goodly are thy tents, O Jacob, and thy tabernacles, O Israel! (6) As the valleys are they spread forth, as gardens by the river’s side, as the trees of lign aloes which the Lord hath planted, and as cedar trees beside the waters. (7) He shall pour the water out of his buckets, and his seed shall be in many waters, and his king shall be higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted. (8) God brought him forth out of Egypt; he hath as it were the strength of an unicorn: he shall eat up the nations his enemies, and shall break their bones, and pierce them through with his arrows. (9) He couched, he lay down as a lion, and as a great lion:

The curse advise. His in. this mouth. thought I trance, cannot Moab any Israel."

And Balak’s anger was kindled against Balaam, and he smote his hands together: and Balak said unto Balaam, I called thee to curse mine enemies, and, behold, thou hast altogether blessed them these three times.

Therefore now flee thou to thy place: I thought to promote thee unto great honour; but, lo, the Lord hath kept thee back from honour.

And Balaam said unto Balak, Spake I not also to thy messengers which thou sentest unto me, saying, If Balak would give me his house full of silver and gold, I cannot go beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do either good or bad of mine own mind; but what the Lord saith, that will I speak? And now, behold, I go unto my people: come therefore, and I will advertise thee what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days.

And he took up his parable, and said, Balaam the son of Beor hath said, and the man whose eyes are open hath said: He hath said, which heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the most High, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open: I shall see him, but not now: I shall behold him, but not nigh: there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do either good or bad of mine own mind; but what the Lord saith, that will I speak? And now, behold, I go unto my people: come therefore, and I will advertise thee what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days.

And he took up his parable, and said, Balaam the son of Beor hath said, and the man whose eyes are open hath said: He hath said, which heard the words of God, and knew the knowledge of the most High, which saw the vision of the Almighty, falling into a trance, but having his eyes open: I shall see him, but not now: I shall behold him, but not nigh: there shall come a Star out of Jacob, and a Sceptre shall rise beyond the commandment of the Lord, to do either good or bad of mine own mind; but what the Lord saith, that will I speak? And now, behold, I go unto my people: come therefore, and I will advertise thee what this people shall do to thy people in the latter days.
out of Israel, and shall slay the corners of Moab, and destroy all the children of Sheth. (25) And Edom shall be a possession, Seir also shall be a possession for his enemies; and Israel shall do valiantly. (26) Out of Jacob shall come he that shall have dominion, and shall destroy him that remaineth of the city.

All the sons of twnm. Such appears to be the most probable rendering of these words according to the present Hebrew text. It has been conjectured, however, that the word which is rendered "destroy" (karkar) should be read kolkad (crown of the head), as in the parallel passage of Jer. viii. 45, in which case the clause may be rendered, And the crown of the head of all the sons of twnm.

We shall be a possession, Seir also shall be a possession, and Seir shall be a possession, for his enemies (i.e., the enemies of Israel, or, rather, of the Ruler who was to rise out of Israel). The Hebrew word (ayehavit) which is rendered "his enemies" appears to stand in apposition to Edom and Seir, as the word israti (his enemies, or adversaries) in verse 8 to "the nations." Edom was the name of the people, Seir of the country. (See Gen. xxi. 3.) The prophecy received its primary accomplishment in the time of David (2 Sam. viii. 14), but the ultimate accomplishment is to be found in the person and work of Christ (Isa. liii. 1-4).

And Israel shall do valiantly.—Or, shall acquire power or wealth. (Comp. Deut. viii. 17, 18; Ruth iv. 11.)

50 Ho that shall have dominion.—The reference is explained in Ps. lxxii. 8, "He shall have dominion also from sea to sea, and from the river unto the ends of the earth," where the same verb occurs which is in both places rendered in the Authorised Version "shall have dominion." And shall destroy him that remaineth of the city.—Or, and He shall destroy the remnant from the cities. The city, which is in the singular number here as in Ps. lxxii. 16, may be used collectively to denote cities generally, though some have understood the reference to be to the city of Jerusalem. But the reference seems to be rather to the chief city, or the cities generally, of Edom. (Comp. Obad., verse 18, where the same word occurs which is here rendered "him that remaineth," and which is there rendered "any remaining.")

And when he looked on Amalek...—From the mountain of Peor, on which Balaam then stood, he had a view of the country of the Amalekites, which lay to the south of the land of Canaan (chap. xiii. 29; Gen. xxxvi. 12).

Amalek was the first of the nations.—The ancestor of the Amalekites was Eliphaz, the son of Esau (Gen. xxxvi. 12). It has been supposed that the Amalekites separated themselves at a very early period from the rest of the Edomites. The word reshith, which is here rendered "first," may denote priority in rank, but more frequently denotes priority in time. The corresponding word in the second clause of the verse, okarith (latter end), may be thought to denote that the reference is to time, not to rank. On the other hand, the reference in verse 7 to the kings of the Amalekites may be urged in favour of the reference to rank. Some understand the allusion to be to the fact that the Amalekites were the first nation which attacked Israel when they had come out of Egypt (Exod. xvii. 8). It is possible, however, that there may be a reference both to time and to rank. (Comp. Amos vi. 1.)

But his latter end shall be that he perish for ever.—Or, come to destruction. More literally, But his latter end shall be even to eternal perishing—i.e., he shall come to the position of one who is perishing. The destruction of the Amalekites began in the reign of Saul (1 Sam. xiv. 48, xv. 7), was continued by David (1 Sam. xxvii. 8, xxx. 17; 2 Sam. viii. 12), and was completed by Hezekiah (1 Chron. iv. 42, 43).

And he looked on the Kenites...—According to the ordinary interpretation of these verses the continuous destruction of the Kenites is foretold until the Israelites should be taken captive by the Assyrians. The Kenites are included amongst the tribes whose country Abraham's descendants were to possess (Gen. xv. 19). A portion of this tribe, however (for there is no evidence that the Canaanitish and the Midianitish Kenites had a different origin), joined the Israelites, and settled on the southern border of Judah (Judg. i. 10). If the Authorised Version of these verses be adopted, it is reasonable to conclude that the Kenites to whom Balaam's prophecy referred must have been included amongst the enemies of Israel, whose destruction, in common with their other foes, is here predicted. It is obvious that this interpretation is open to two serious objections:—(1) that the natural reference of the words "carry thee away captive" is to the Kenites, not to the Israelites; and (2) that as the later history, as well as the Book of Numbers, makes mention only of these Kenites who allied themselves with the Israelites, we should naturally expect that in accordance with the promise which was given to Hobab by Moses (chap. x. 20), the Kenites should be distinguished from the enemies of Israel, and be exempted from the destruction with which they were threatened. Another rendering of verse 22, and one which appears to be more agreeable to the context in which it stands, is the following:—For surely the Kenites shall not be destroyed until Asshur shall carry thee into captivity." This version has the support of the Targum of Palestine and other authorities. It is true that there is no express record of the fulfilment of this prophecy, but it is not probable that the Assyrians spared the Kenites who were settled amongst the Israelites; and we know from Jer. xxxv. 11 that after the invasion of Nebuchadnezzar, the Rechabites, who were of the Kenite race (1 Chron. ii. 55), came to Jerusalem for fear of the armies of the Chaldeans and Syrians. If Asshur denotes in this place the Assyrians in the later acceptance of the term, it must be remembered that one branch of the Kenites settled in Naphtali, near Kadesh (Judg. iv. 11). Asshur, however, appears to be used in a wider sense, Nevertheless the Kenite shall be wasted, until Asshur shall carry thee away captive.

And he took up his parable, and said,

Alas, who shall live when God doth this! And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim, and shall afflict Asshur, and shall afflict Eber, and he also shall perish for ever.

And Balaam rose up, and went and returned to his place: and Balak also went his way.

CHAPTER XXV.—(1) And Israel abode in Shittim, and the people began to commit whoredom with the daughters of Moab. (2) And they called the people unto the sacrifices of their gods: and the people did eat, and bowed down to their gods. (3) And Israel joined himself so as to include all the nations which proceeded from it (see verse 24). Even the Persian king is called, as Keil has observed, King of Asshur (Ezra vi. 22). If this interpretation of the text be received, the antithesis between the doom of the Amalekites and the deliverance of the Kenites exactly corresponds to the attitude assumed by these tribes respectively in regard to Israel.

(2) When God doth this.—These words may be rendered, since (or, from the time that) God sets (or, determines) it (or, this)—quando faciet Deus (Vulgate); or, because God determines it (or, this).

(24) And ships shall come from the coast of Chittim.—The Chittim (or, Kittim) are said to have migrated from Phoenicia to Cyprus, and there founded the city of Cyzicus, the modern Chitit. (See Josephus, "Antiq." i. 6, 1.) The name probably applies to the islands and coasts of the Mediterranean generally. The rendering of the Vulgate is Venient in trieribus de Italia; and in Dan. xi. 39, which is obviously founded upon this verse, the Vulgate identifies the Kittim with the Romans.

And shall afflict Asshur, and shall afflict Eber.—Some understand by Eber the Hebrews only. The word, however, appears to be used in a wider signification, as comprising "all the children of Eber" (Gen. x. 21). Perhaps the word Asshur may here be used to denote the Eastern Sheepites, and Eber the Western Sheepites.

And he also shall perish for ever—i.e., the victorious power which was to afflict Asshur and Eber. "The overthrow of this last power of the world," says Keil, in loc., "concerning which the prophet Daniel was the first to receive and proclaim new revelations, belongs to 'the end of the days,' in which the star out of Jacob is to rise upon Israel as 'a bright morning-star'" (Rev. xii. 16). There is no evidence as to the manner in which Balaam's prophecies came into the hands of the Israelites. It is possible that he may have communicated them to Moses, in the expectation of receiving from him the reward which he had failed to obtain from Balak, or, if captured, in the hope of thereby saving his life.

(25) And returned to his place.—Balaam probably set out with the intention of returning home. He turned towards his place. The sequel shows that he remained amongst the Midianites, and perished with them.

XXV.

(1) Abode in Shittim—i.e., Abel-Shittim (chap. xxxiii. 49). (See Note on chap. xxii. 1.)

(2) And they called the people —The Moabish women invited the Israelites to their sacrificial feasts, which were celebrated in honour of Baal-peor, who was worshipped in the city of Beth-peor (Deut. iii. 29). He is supposed to be identical with Chemosh, the Moabish god of war.

(4) Take all the heads of the people.—The "heads" or "chiefs" of the people seem to be identified with the "judges" of the following verse. Some understand by "all the heads" those only who had been the chief offenders, whilst others understand the word "take" as equivalent to "assemble," or "bring before thee," and refer the word "them" to the offenders.

Hang them up —It is obvious from verse 5 that the punishment of impaling or crucifying was not to be inflicted until after death. The LXX. renders the Hebrew verb which is here used (and which is found also in 2 Sam. xxi. 9, 10) by the same word which occurs in Heb. vi. 6, and is there translated "to put to an open shame."

(7) And when Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest —In accordance with this punctuation, the designation the priest (which generally denotes the high priest) refers to Aaron, not to Phinehas. Eleazar was the high priest at this time (chap. xx. 29); and consequently—although as a general rule any designation which follows the words "the son of such an one" refers to the former, not to the latter noun—it appears most probable that the designation the priest has reference here to Aaron, not to Phinehas, who, although a priest, was not the high priest at this time. He was invested, however, with civil as well as ecclesiastical authority.
hand; (6) and he went after the man of Israel into the tent, and thrust both of them through, the man of Israel, and the woman through her belly.

So the plague was stayed from the children of Israel. (9) And a those that died in the plague were twenty and four thousand.

(10) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (11) Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest, hath turned my wrath away from the children of Israel, while he was zealous for my sake among them, that I consumed not the children of Israel in my jealousy. (12) Wherefore say, Behold, I give unto him my covenant of peace: (13) and he shall have it, and his seed after him, even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood; because he was zealous for his God, and made an atonement for the children of Israel.

(14) Now the name of the Israelite that was slain, even that was slain with the Midianitish woman, was Zimri, the son of Salu, a prince of a house among the Simeonites. (15) And the name of the Midianitish woman that was slain was Cozbi, the daughter of Zur; he was head over a people, and of a chief house in Midian.

(16) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (17) Vex the Midianites, and smite them: (18) for they vex you with their wiles, whereby they have beguiled you in the matter of Peor, and in the matter of Cozbi, the daughter of a prince of Midian, their sister, which was slain in the day of the plague for Peor's sake.

(See 1 Chron. ix. 20, where he is described as a ruler.

—Hebrew, nazig.)

(9) Into the tent.—The word kubbah (tent, or alcove) occurs only in this place. The reference may be to the inner part of the ordinary tent which was occupied by the women; or it may denote an arched or vaulted tent (probably of skins), which the Israelites had erected while joining with the Moabites and Midianites in the lascivious worship of Baal-peon. The LXX. has karmaios, the Vulgate Lepantum.

Through her belly.—Or, within her tent. It is thought by some that the word which is here used was originally the same word which occurs in the earlier part of the verse, and which is there rendered tent.

So the plague was stayed . . .—It is probable that the judges were not duly obedient to the command of Moses, and consequently, that a plague broke out from the Lord upon the people.

(10) Twenty and four thousand.—In 1 Cor. x. 8 the number of those who "fell in one day" is said to have been "three and twenty thousand." It has been supposed that a thousand were put to death by the judges, and that these were not included in St. Paul's enumeration. Presuming, however, that there has been no error in either place on the part of the scribes in recording the numbers, the words "in one day" may account for the apparent discrepancy.

(11) Phinehas, the son of Eleazar, the son of Aaron the priest . . .—The description of Phinehas, as in verse 7, is repeated in full, as if to denote that he was not a private individual, but one invested with public authority.

While he was zealous for my sake among them.—Better, in that he was zealous with my jealousy (or, in that he displayed my jealousy).

(12) My covenant of peace.—Phinehas, as one who was zealous for the honour of God and of the house of the Lord, was a fitting type of Christ, in whom the prediction of the Psalmist received its accomplishment. "The zeal of thine house hath eaten me up." (Ps. lxxix. 9; John ii. 17). The covenant of grace is described in Isa. liv. 10 and in Mal. ii. 5 as the covenant of peace.

(13) And he shall have it, and his seed after him.—The covenant of peace, which was made by the blood of the Cross, and all the blessings which belong to that covenant, stand fast with Christ, and are secured to His spiritual seed. (Comp. Ps. lxxix. 28, 29.)

Even the covenant of an everlasting priesthood.—Phinehas succeeded his father Eleazar as high priest (Judg. xx. 28). After a temporary interruption in the succession, which existed in the time of Elizah and continued until the time of David, when there appears to have been a joint high-priesthood, the office was restored by Solomon to Zadok, the descendant of Phinehas, and so continued until the gradual dissolution of the Jewish state. Christ's priesthood is "an unchangeable priesthood" (Heb. vii. 24): "Then art a priest for ever after the order of Melchisedec." (Heb. vii. 17).

A prince of a chief house among the Simeonites.—Better, of a father's house, &c. It is probable that the tribe of Simeon was deeply implicated in the transgression, and that those who belonged to that tribe were the chief sufferers in the plague. (See chap. xxvi. 14, and Note.)

(15) Head over a people, and of a chief house in Midian.—Better, head of the tribes (or, communities) of a father's house in Midian. Several of the Midianitish tribes, or smaller divisions of a father's house, may have descended from one tribe-father. In chap. xxxi. 8, Zur is described as one of the five kings of Midian who were slain by the Israelites.

(17) Vex the Midianites, and smite them.—The Midianites appear to have been joint actors with the Moabites throughout the whole of the opposition which was offered to Israel, and the chief actors in the wiles by which the Israelites were seduced. As the descendants of Abraham, the father of the faithful, the Midianites ought to have feared and obeyed Abraham's God, and to have shown brotherly kindness to His people, who were their own kindred. The special judgments of God are directed against the sins of apostasy and of seduction. (Comp. Rev. ii. 14, xviii. 6.) Although the Moabites were not to be smitten with the Midianites (see Deut. ii. 9), nevertheless they did not escape punishment, but were smitten out, even to CHAPTER XXVI. — (1) And it came to pass after the plague, that the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Eleazar the son of Aaron the priest, saying, (2) Take the sum of all the children of Israel, from twenty years old and upward, throughout their fathers’ house, all that are able to go to war in Israel. (3) And Moses and Eleazar the priest spake with them in the plains of Moab near Jericho, saying, (4) Take the sum of the people, from twenty years old and upward; as the Lord commanded Moses and the children of Israel, which went forth out of the land of Egypt.

(5) Reuben, the eldest son of Israel: the children of Reuben; Hanoach, of whom cometh the family of the Hanochites: of Pallu, the family of the Palluites: (6) of Hezron, the family of the Hezronites: of Carmi, the family of the Carmites. (7) These are the families of the Reubenites: and they that were numbered of them were forty and three thousand and seven hundred and thirty.

(8) And the sons of Pallu; Eliab. (9) And the sons of Eliah; Nemuel, and Dathan, and Abiram. This is that Dathan and Abiram, which were famous in the congregation, who strove against Moses and against Aaron in the company of Korah, when they strove against the Lord; (10) and the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up together with Korah, when that company died, what time the fire devoured two hundred and fifty men: and they became a sign. (11) Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not.

(12) The sons of Simeon after their families: of Nemuel, the family of the Nemuelites: of Jamin, the family of the Jaminites: of Jachin, the family of the Jachinites: (13) of Zerah, the family of the Zarhitites: of Shaul, the family of the Shuahites. (14) These are the families of the Simeonites, twenty and two thousand and two hundred.

(15) The children of Gad after their families: of Zophon, the family of the Zephonites: of Haggi, the family of the Haggites: of Shuni, the family of the Shuinites: (16) of Ozni, the family of the the tenth generation, from the congregation of the Lord. (See Deut. xxi. 3, 4.) Their exception at this time from the judgment executed upon the Midianites was probably due, not to their descent from Lot (for the Midianites were descended from Abraham), but to the fact that the measure of their sin was not yet full. (Comp. Gen. xv. 16.)

XXVI.

(1) And it came to pass after the plague . . . —The plague probably destroyed the remnant of the generation which had come out of Egypt, and which had been numbered in the wilderness of Sinai.

(2) Take the sum . . . —The same command had been given to Moses and Aaron (chap. i. 2, 3). In that case a man taken out of every tribe, the head of his father’s house, was appointed to assist Moses and Aaron in taking the census. It is probable that the same arrangement was made in the present instance, though it is not recorded.

(4, 5) Take the sum of the people . . . —The verses may be rendered thus: From twenty years old and upward, as the Lord commanded Moses. And the children of Israel which went forth out of the land of Egypt were these: Reuben, the eldest son of Israel, &c. The expression “as the Lord commanded Moses” is one of very frequent occurrence in this book. The command was given to Moses, not to the children of Israel generally. The form of enumeration is concise. The omission may be supplied thus:—Reuben—he was the eldest son of Israel. The sons of Reuben were—Hanoch—of him, the family of the Hanochites, &c. (Comp. Gen. xvi. 9; Exod. vi. 14; 1 Chron. v. 3.)

(7) Forty and three thousand and seven hundred and thirty. —As compared with the former census, the tribe of Reuben had decreased by 2,770. (See chap. i. 21.) Dathan and Abiram had probably enlisted many of the tribe to which they belonged in their rebellion against Moses and Aaron. (See verses 9, 10 of this chapter, and chap. XVI. 1, and Note.)

(10) And the earth opened her mouth, and swallowed them up together with Korah . . . —Hebrew, and Korah. It would appear from this verse that Korah perished in the earthquake with Dathan and Abiram. The Samaritan Pentateuch, however, has a different reading here. It transposes the words “and Korah,” and combines them with the words “and the two hundred and fifty men”: thus—“when the fire devoured Korah and the two hundred and fifty men.” (See Notes on chap. xvi. 32, 33.) It is possible that there may have been an omission here of the words which are found in chap. xvi. 32, “all the men that appertained unto,” or of words denoting “all the goods belonging to.”

(11) Notwithstanding the children of Korah died not. —See Notes on chap. xvi. 27, 32.

(14) Twenty and two thousand and two hundred. —This shows a decrease of 37,100 in the tribe of Simeon. Zinari, the chief offender in the matter of Baal-peor, belonged to this tribe, and, as in the case of the Reubenites, it is probable that he had led astray many of his tribe with him. It is remarkable that this is the only tribe on which, according to the present Hebrew text, no blessing was pronounced by Moses (Deut. xxxiii.), and that in the allotment of the land of Canaan the inheritance of Simeon was only

* The “Codex Alexandrinus” inserts a clause: “Let Simeon be many in number.”
Ozimites: of Eri, the family of the Erites:
(17) of Arud, the family of the Arodites:
of Areli, the family of the Arelites.
(19) These are the families of the children of Gad according to those that were numbered of them, forty thousand and five hundred.
(19) a The sons of Judah were Er and Onan: and Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan. (20) And the sons of Judah after their families were:
of Shelah, the family of the Shelanites:
of Pharez, the family of the Pharzites:
of Zerah, the family of the Zarhites.
(21) And the sons of Pharez were: of Hezron, the family of the Hezonites:
of Hamul, the family of the Hamulites.
(22) These are the families of Judah according to those that were numbered of them, three score and sixteen and five hundred.
(23) Of the sons of Issachar after their families: of Tola, the family of the Tolaites: of Pua, the family of the Punites:
(24) of Jashub, the family of the Jashubites: of Shimron, the family of the Shimronites. (25) These are the families of Issachar according to those that were numbered of them, three score and four thousand and three hundred.
(26) Of the sons of Zebulun after their families: of Sered, the family of the Sardites: of Elon, the family of the Elonites: of Jahleel, the family of the Jahleelites. (27) These are the families of the Zebulunites according to those that were numbered of them, threescore
and five hundred.
(28) The sons of Joseph after their families were Manasseh and Ephraim.
(29) Of the sons of Manasseh: of Machir, the family of the Machirites: and Machir begat Gilead: of Gilead came the family of the Gileadites. (30) These are the sons of Gilead: of Jezer, the family of the Jezerites: of Helek, the family of the Helekites: (31) and of Asriel, the family of the Asrielites: and of Shechem, the family of the Shechemites:
(32) and of Shemida, the family of the Shemidites: and of Hepher, the family of the Hepherites. (33) And Zelophehad the son of Hepher had no sons, but dughters: and the names of the daughters of Zelophehad were Mahlah, and Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah.
(34) These are the families of Manasseh, and those that were numbered of them, fifty and two thousand and seven hundred. (35) These are the sons of Ephraim after their families: of Shuthelah, the family of the Shuthalhites: of Beecher, the family of the Beecherites: of Tahal, the family of the Tahalites. (36) And these are the sons of Shuthelah: of Eran, the family of the Eranites. (37) These are the families of the sons of Ephraim after their families that were numbered of them, thirty and two thousand and five hundred. These are the sons of Joseph after their families.
(38) The sons of Benjamin after their families: of Bela, the family of the Belaites: of Ashbel, the family of the Ashbelites: of Ahiram, the family of the Ahiramites: (38) of Shupham, the family of the Shuphamites: of Hupham, the family of the Huphamites. (39) And the sons of Bela were Ard and Naaman: of Ard, the family of the Ardites: and of Naaman, the family of the Naamites.
(40) These are the sons of Benjamin after their families: and they that were the remnant of that which was assigned to Judah (Josh. xix. 39).

(39) Forty thousand and five hundred.—This shows a decrease of 5,150. Reuben, Simeon, and Gad encamped together on the south of the Taobaerac (chap. ii. 10), and had probably been mutually contaminated by each other's evil example.

(40) Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan.
—See Gen. xxxviii. 6—10. Note.

(41) Of Hezron ... —Judah had five sons, but inasmuch as Er and Onan died childless, Hezron and Hamul were substituted in their place. (Comp. Gen. xvi. 12.)

(29) Machir begat Gilead.—It is stated in 1 Chron.
vii. 14, and in the LXX. of Gen. xvi. 20, that Machir's mother was an Aramittes. This may account for the name which was given to his son, Gilead, the border land between Syria and Canaan, and that in which Laban overtook Jacob (Gen. xxxi. 25).
(37) Thirty and two thousand and five hundred.—This shows a decrease of 8,090. Jacob foretold that Ephraim should be greater than Manasseh
(Gen. xlviii. 19); and at the former census the number of the Ephraimites was considerably greater than that of the Manassites (chap. i. 33, 34), and Ephraim was made a standard-bearer (chap. ii. 18). At the present census, however, the number of the Manassites exceeded that of the Ephraimites by 29,200; and yet, in the face of the great increase of Manasseh and the diminution of Ephraim, Moses renewed and confirmed the prediction of Jacob as to the ultimate superiority of Ephraim, and whilst ascribing only "thousands" to Manasseh, he speaks of the "ten thousands of Ephraim" (Deut.
xxiii. 17).
The Numbers of Kohath, the Children of Israel.

divided for an inheritance according to the number of names. (49) To many thou shalt give the more inheritance, and to few thou shalt give the less inheritance: to every one shall his inheritance be given according to those that were numbered of him. (50) Notwithstanding the land shall be divided by lot: according to the names of the tribes of their fathers they shall inherit. (51) According to the lot shall the possession thereof be divided between many and few.

(52) And these are they that were numbered of the Levites after their families: of Gershon, the family of the Gershonites: of Kohath, the family of the Kohathites: of Merari, the family of the Merarites. (53) These are the families of the Levites: the family of the Libnites, the family of the Hebronites, the family of the Mahlites, the family of the Mushites, the family of the Korathites. And Kohath begat Amram. (54) And the name of Amram's wife was Jochebed, the daughter of Levi, whom her mother bare to Levi in Egypt: and she bare unto Amram Aaron and Moses, and Miriam their sister. (55) And unto Aaron was born Nadab, and Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. (56) And Nadab and Abihu died, when they offered strange fire before the Lord. (57) And those that were numbered of them were twenty and three thousand, all males from a month old and upward: for they were not numbered among the children of Israel, because there was no inheritance given them among the children of Israel.

(58) Six hundred thousand and a thousand seven hundred and thirty. —The sum total exhibits a decrease of 1,820, as compared with the census taken at Sinai thirty-eight years previously. On this decrease Bishop Wordsworth observes as follows: — "When the Israelites were suffering persecution in Egypt they 'multiplied exceedingly' (Exod. 1, 7, 20); but after their deliverance from Egypt they rebelled against God, and 'He consumed their days in vanity, and their years in trouble' (Ps. lxxviii. 35). . . . Here there is comfort and warning to the Church and every soul in it—comfort in time of affliction, and warning in days of prosperity." (59—60) Unto these the land shall be divided . . . —The general apportionment of the land, as regarded the relative position of each tribe, was to be decided by lot, which was commonly looked upon as the determination of God Himself, and in this instance was undoubtedly so. The extent of territory was to be determined by the number of names—i.e., of persons—
NUMBERS, XXVII.

CHAPTER XXVII.—(1) Then came the daughters of Zelophehad, the son of Hepher, the son of Gilcud, the son of Maachir, the son of Manasseh, of the families of Manasseh the son of Joseph; and these are the names of his daughters; Mahlah, Noah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Tirzah. (2) And they stood before Moses, and before Eleazar the priest, and before the princes and all the congregation, by the door of the tabernacle of the congregation, saying, (3) Our father died in the wilderness, and he was not in the company of them that gathered themselves together against the Lord in the company of Korah; but died in his own sin, and had no sons. (4) Why should the name of our father be taken away from among his family, because he hath no son? Give unto us therefore a possession among the brethren of our father.

(5) And Moses brought their cause before the Lord. (6) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (7) The daughters of Zelophehad speak right; thou shalt surely give them a possession of an inheritance among their father's brethren; and thou shalt cause the inheritance of their father to pass unto them. (8) And thou shalt speak unto the children of Israel, saying, If a man die, and have no son, then ye shall cause his inheritance to pass unto his daughter. (9) And if he have no daughter, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his brethren. (10) And if he have no brethren, then ye shall give his inheritance unto his kinsman that is next to him of his family, and it shall be their possession, and they shall inherit it; that the name of the deceased have not been cut off from the midst of his brethren. (11) This did Moses according to the word of the Lord, and gave Zelophehad his inheritance among his brethren.

(12) But among those that staked their claim, though they had no sons to inherit, nothing was taken away from their fathers' inheritance. (13) In this way were the Levites ordained to have a double portion in the congregation of Israel, that they might be at liberty to minister to the Lord, and to receive the tithes which were due to them.
and he shall possess it: and it shall be unto the children of Israel a statute of judgment, as the Lord commanded Moses.

(12) And the Lord said unto Moses,

"Get thee up into this mount Abarim, and see the land which I have given unto the children of Israel. (13) And when thou hast seen it, thou also shalt be gathered unto thy people, as Aaron thy brother was gathered. (14) For ye rebelled against my commandment in the desert of Zin, in the midst of the congregation, to sanctify me at the water before their eyes: that is the water of Meribah in Kadesh in the wilderness of Zin.

(15) And Moses spake unto the Lord, saying, (16) Let the Lord, the God of the spirits of all flesh, set a man over the congregation, (17) which may go out before them, and which may go in before them, and which may lead them out, and which may bring them in; that the congregation of the Lord be not as sheep which have no shepherd.

(18) And the Lord said unto Moses, Take thee Joshua the son of Nun, a man in whom is the spirit, and lay thine hand upon him; (19) and set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation; and give him a charge in their sight. (20) And thou shalt put some of thine honour upon him, that all the congregation of the children of Israel may be obedient. (21) And he shall stand before Eleazar the priest, who shall ask counsel for him after the judgment of Urim before the Lord: at his word shall they go out, and at his word they shall come in, both he, and all the children of Israel with him, even all the congregation.

(22) And Moses did as the Lord commanded him: and he took Joshua, and set him before Eleazar the priest, and before all the congregation: (23) and he laid his hands upon him, and gave him a

(12) Get thee up into this mount Abarim.—The position of this command, in immediate connection with the answer returned to the request of the daughters of Zelophehad, is very remarkable. They were to enter into the land of promise, and their descendants were to inherit it. The great lawyer himself was to be excluded on account of his transgression. He does not, however, shrink from recording the sentence of exclusion in immediate connection with an incident which brings out that exclusion into greater prominence. The fulfilment of the announcement made to Moses is related in Deut. xxxii. 49-52. The mountains of Abarim form the Moabish table-land, the northern portion of which bore the name of Pisgah. It is here that we must look for Mount Nebo, which is sometimes described as one of the mountains of Abarim (Deut. xxxii. 49), and at other times as the top of Pisgah (Deut. iii. 27, xxxiv. 1).

And see the land which I have given unto the children of Israel.—The law,” says Bishop Wordsworth, “led men to ‘see the promises afar off, and to embrace them’ [rather, to see and dread the promises from afar, Heb. xi. 13], and it brought them to the borders of Canaan, but could not bring them into it: that was reserved for Joshua, the type of Jesus.” It must not be overlooked, however, that, although he was shut out during his lifetime from entering into the land of Canaan, Moses was permitted to stand with Elijah upon the Mount of Transfiguration (Matt. xvii. 3).

(13) Gathered unto thy people.—See Gen. xxv. 8, and Note. In the case of Moses, as in that of Abraham, the expression cannot be understood in reference to the place of his burial.

(14) To sanctify me . . .—See chap. xx. 12, 13, where the same expression is used.

(15) Let the Lord . . .—We have a remarkable instance here of the true greatness of Moses, as a type of Him whose words were, “Weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and for your children” (Luke xxiii. 28). Instead of indulging in excessive grief, or in unavailing remorse, the mind of Moses was intently fixed upon the welfare of those for whose sake he had been willing that his own name should be blotted out of the Book (Exod. xxxii. 32); and instead of appointing one of his own family, or the man of his own choice, as his successor, he commits the matter to God, and prays that He will appoint one who would be a true shepherd to the flock.

(17) Which may go out before them . . .—The expression going out and coming in is used here, as in many other places, to denote the ordinary life of man (Deut. xxviii. 6, xxxi. 2). Leading out and bringing in (literally, causing to go out and to come in), as a shepherd in respect of his flock (John x. 3-9), denotes the direction of the conduct of others.

(18) In whom is the spirit . . .—The definite article is not used in the original. The word translated “spirit” appears to denote spiritual endowment and qualifications.

And lay thine hand upon him.—It is to be observed that the spiritual qualifications of Joshua did not supersede the necessity of an outward consecration to his office. Nay, more; it seems that special qualifications for the office were bestowed in connection with the imposition of the hands of Moses, for it is written in Deut. xxxiv. 9 that “Joshua the son of Nun was full of the spirit of wisdom; for Moses had laid his hands upon him.”

(19) And give him a charge . . .—Comp. Deut. xxxi. 23, “And he gave Joshua the son of Nun a charge, and said, Be strong and of a good courage.”

(21) After the judgment of Urim . . .—See Exod. xxviii. 30, and Note.

At his word . . .—i.e., Joshua and the children of Israel were to abide by the decision of the high priest, which was obtained by means of Urim and Thummim.
Offerings to be Observed

NUMBERS, XXVIII.

on Sabbaths and New Moons.

CHAPTER XXVIII. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Command the children of Israel, and say unto them, My offering, and my bread for my sacrifices made by fire, for a sweet savour unto me, shall ye observe to offer unto me in their due season. (3) And thou shalt say unto them, “This is the offering made by fire which ye shall offer unto the Lord; two lambs of the first year without spot, day by day, for a continual burnt offering. (5) The one lamb shalt thou offer in the morning, and the other lamb shalt thou offer at even; (3) and a tenth part of an ephah of flour for a meat offering, mingled with the fourth part of an hin of beaten oil. (6) It is a continual burnt offering, which was ordained in mount Sinai for a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord. (7) And the drink offering thereof shall be the fourth part of an hin for the one lamb: in the holy place shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured unto the Lord for a drink offering. (8) And the other lamb shalt thou offer at even: as the meat offering of the morning, and as the drink offering thereof, thou shalt offer it, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord.

(9) And on the sabbath day two lambs of the first year without spot, and two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, and the drink offering thereof: (10) this is the burnt offering of every sabbath, beside the continual burnt offering, and his drink offering.

(11) And in the beginnings of your months ye shall offer a burnt offering unto the Lord; two young bullocks, and one ram, seven lambs of the first year without spot; (12) and three tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, for one bullock; and two tenth deals of flour for a meat offering, mingled with oil, for one ram; (13) and a several tenth deal of flour mingled with oil for a meat offering unto one lamb; for a burnt offering of a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord.

Or, which was offered (Hebrew, made) in Mount Sinai.

IIa Ezra addsuce this passage as a proof that the Israelites ceased to offer burnt sacrifices after they left the encampment at Sinai throughout the time of their wanderings in the wilderness.

(7) Shalt thou cause the strong wine to be poured. . . .—Better, pour out the drink offering of strong drink. The word shecir, which is here rendered “strong wine,” denotes any kind of intoxicating drink, whether made from grapes, honey, or grain; but it is more frequently used to denote a drink which is not made from grapes, as, e.g., in Lev. x. 9, where the command is given to Aaron and his sons not to drink “wine nor strong drink” (shecir) when they went into the tent of meeting. In the parallel passage in Exodus, the drink offering was to consist of “the fourth part of an hin of wine” (chap. xxix. 40). (Comp. chap. xv. 5.) In Exod. xxx. 9 it is forbidden to pour any drink offering upon the altar of incense, from which passage it has been inferred that the drink offerings were poured upon the altar of burnt sacrifice.

(9) And on the sabbath day two lambs . . .—The Sabbath offering which was to be added to the daily sacrifice is here called “the offering of the sabbath day” (Heb. vii. 3, x. 12, 14).

(11) In the beginnings of your months . . .—The beginning of the month was announced by the blowing of the silver trumpets (chap. x. 10). Increased respect was paid to the beginning of the month in later times. Trade was suspended (Amos viii. 5), and religious instruction appears to have been given at this time (2 Kings iv. 20).
And their drink offerings shall be half an hin of wine unto a bullock, and the third part of an hin unto a ram, and a fourth part of an hin unto a lamb; this is the burnt offering of every month throughout the months of the year. And one kid of the goats for a sin offering unto the Lord shall be offered, beside the continual burnt offering, and his drink offering.

And in the fourteenth day of the first month is the passover of the Lord. And in the fifteenth day of this month is the feast: seven days shall unleavened bread be eaten. In the first day shall be an holy convocation; ye shall do no manner of servile work therein: but ye shall offer a sacrifice made by fire for a burnt offering unto the Lord; two young bullocks, and one ram, and seven lambs of the first year: they shall be unto you without blemish; and their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil: three tenth deals shall ye offer for a bullock, and two tenth deals for a ram; a several tenth deal shalt thou offer for every lamb, throughout the seven lambs: and one goat for a sin offering, to make an atonement for you. Ye shall offer these beside the burnt offering in the morning, which is for a continual burnt offering. After this manner ye shall offer daily, throughout the seven days, the meat of the sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord: it shall be offered beside the continual burnt offering, and his drink offering. And on the seventh day ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work.

Also in the day of the firstfruits, when ye bring a new meat offering unto the Lord, after your weeks be out, ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work: but ye shall offer the burnt offering for a sweet savour unto the Lord; two young bullocks, one ram, seven lambs of the first year; and their meat offering of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals unto one bullock, two tenth deals unto one lamb, throughout the seven lambs: and one kid of the goats, to make an atonement for you. Ye shall offer them beside the continual burnt offering, and his meat offering, (they shall be unto you without blemish) and their drink offerings.

CHAPTER XXIX.—And in the seventh month, on the first day of the month, ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work: it is a day of blowing the trumpets unto you. And ye shall offer a burnt offering for a sweet savour unto the Lord; one young bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year without blemish: and a kid of the goats, for a sin offering unto the Lord. This chapter contains an account of the days which were to be observed as religious ordinances in the seventh or Sabbathical month—a month which contained more of those days than any other month in the year.

It is a day of blowing the trumpets unto you.—Literally, of loud or joyful clang. The silver trumpets were blown at every new moon (chap. x. 10), but the first day of the seventh month was emphatically the day for blowing of trumpets—a memorial of blowing of trumpets, which, according to Jewish writers, was continued from sun-rising to sun-setting. (See Lev. xxv. 2, and Note.) The word “trumpets” is not expressed either in Lev. xxiii. 24, or in this place; and in Ps. lxxi. 3, which is used at the Feast of Trumpets in the modern Jewish services, the word used is shophar—a word which is interchanged with keren (the cornet, or ram’s horn)—not hazzerezrah, the straight silver trumpet mentioned in chap. x. 2. The blemish: (9) and their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals for a bullock, and two tenth deals for a ram, (9) and one tenth deal for one lamb, throughout the seven lambs; (5) and one kid of the goats for a sin offering, to make an atonement for you: (6) beside the burnt offering of the month, and his meat offering, and the daily burnt offering, and his meat offering, and their drink offerings, according unto their manner, for a sweet savour, a sacrifice made by fire unto the Lord.

(7) And "ye shall have on the tenth day of this seventh month an holy convocation; and ye shall afflict your souls: ye shall not do any work therein: (9) but ye shall offer a burnt offering unto the Lord for a sweet savour, one young bullock, one ram, and seven lambs of the first year; they shall be unto you without blemish: (9) and their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals to a bullock, and two tenth deals to one ram, (10) a several tenth deal for one lamb, throughout the seven lambs: (11) one kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the sin offering of atonement, and the continual burnt offering, and the meat offering of it, and their drink offerings.

(12) And on the fifteenth day of the seventh month ye shall have an holy convocation; ye shall do no servile work, and ye shall keep a feast unto the Lord seven days: (13) and ye shall offer a burnt offering, a sacrifice made by fire, of a sweet savour unto the Lord; thirteen young bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year; they shall be without blemish: (19) and their meat offering shall be of flour mingled with oil, three tenth deals unto every bullock of the thirteen bullocks, two tenth deals to each ram of the two rams, (19) and a several tenth deal to each lamb of the fourteen lambs: (19) and one kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering, and his drink offering.

(17) And on the second day ye shall offer twelve young bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs of the first year without spot: (19) and their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner: (19) and one kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, and the meat offering thereof, and their drink offerings.

(19) And on the third day eleven bullocks, two rams, fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish; (21) and their meat offering and their drink offerings for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lambs, shall be according to their number, after the manner: (21) and one goat for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, and his meat offering, and his drink offering.

(22) And on the fourth day ten bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish: (22) their meat offering and their drink offerings word ternah, which is here rendered "blowing the trumpets," is coupled with shophar in Lev. xx. 9—"the trumpet of loud clang or joyful sound." The details of the fire offering prescribed in Lev. xxii. 5 are here given.

(9) Beside the burnt offering of the month. —Better, of the new moon. (See chap. xxvii. 11, where the burnt offering of the beginning of the month is described.)

The tenth day of this seventh month. . . . —The law respecting the observance of the great Day of Atonement is contained in Lev. xvi. and xxix. 26—32. The sacrifices prescribed in verses 8—11, which are the same as those prescribed for the first day of the seventh month, were to be offered in addition to the sin offerings of atonement prescribed in Lev. xvi. and to the daily burnt offerings. (See Notes on Lev. xvi., xxix. 26—32.)

And ye shall afflict your souls. —See Lev. xvi.

(29) This affliction or humiliation appears to have included in it fasting (comp. Acts xxvii. 9), although the word which denotes fasting is not employed, nor is there any express injunction respecting fasting in the Pentecost.
for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lams, shall be according to their umber, after the manner: and one kid of the goats for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering, and his drink offering.

(28) And on the fifth day nine bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish: and their meat offering and their drink offerings
for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the lams, shall be according to their number, after the manner: and one goat
for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering,
and his drink offering.

(29) And on the sixth day eight bul-locks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish: and their
meat offering and their drink offerings
for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the
lams, shall be according to their number, after the manner: and one goat
for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering,
and his drink offering.

(30) And on the seventh day seven bullocks, two rams, and fourteen lambs of the first year without blemish: and their
meat offering and their drink offerings
for the bullocks, for the rams, and for the
lams, shall be according to their number, after the manner: and one goat
for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering,
and his drink offering.

(31) On the eighth day ye shall have a solemn assembly: ye shall do no servile work therein: but ye shall offer a burnt offering, a sacrifice made by fire,
of a sweet savour unto the Lord: one
bullock, one ram, seven lambs of the first year without blemish: their
meat offering and their drink offerings
for the bullock, for the ram, and for the lams, shall be according to their number, after the manner: and one goat
for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering,
and his drink offering.

(32) These things ye shall do unto the Lord in your set feasts. Better, These sacrifices shall ye offer unto the Lord at your set seasons.

For your burnt offerings. The sacrifices prescribed in this chapter were appointed to be offered independently of all the burnt offerings, meal offerings, drink offerings, and peace offerings, which were made in the performance of special vows, or as freewill offerings. (See Lev. xxii. 18—21; Num. xv. 1—13.)

(33) On the eighth day ye shall have a solemn assembly: ye shall do no servile work therein: but ye shall offer a
burnt offering, a sacrifice made by fire,
of a sweet savour unto the Lord: one
bullock, one ram, seven lambs of the first year without blemish: their
meat offering and their drink offerings
for the bullock, for the ram, and for the lams, shall be according to their number, after the manner: and one goat
for a sin offering; beside the continual burnt offering, his meat offering,
and his drink offering.

(34) And Moses told the children of Israel according to all that the Lord commanded Moses.

CHAPTER XXX. (1) And Moses spake unto the heads of the tribes concerning the children of Israel, saying, This is the thing which the Lord hath commanded. (2) If a man vow a vow unto the Lord, or swear an oath to bind his soul with a bond; he shall not break his word, he shall do accord-

XXX.

(3) If a man vow a vow unto the Lord. Two kinds of vows are spoken of in this verse—viz., the sueder, which is here rendered vow, and which denotes primarily a positive vow, or vow of performance, and the issar, which is here rendered bond, and which denotes a negative vow, or a vow of abstinence. It is natural to suppose that at the expiration of the protracted wanderings in the wilderness the pious Israelites would be desirous of testifying their gratitude by dedicating themselves, or some portion of their substance beyond that which the law demanded, to the service of the Lord. And hence, although some regulations respecting vows had already been made (see Lev. xxvii.), it was needful that before their entrance into the land of Canaan some additions should be made to the law which pertained to the nature and obligation of vows. He shall not break his word. The sacred character of a vow is enforced in these words; and a timely caution was thus given to the Israelites that it was better for them not to vow than to vow and not to pay. (Comp. Eccles. v. 2—5.)
ing to all that proceedeth out of his month.

(3) If a woman also vow a vow unto the Lord, and bind herself by a bond, being in her father’s house in her youth; (4) and her father hear her vow, and her bond wherewith she hath bound her soul, and her father shall hold his peace at her: then all her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she hath bound her soul shall stand. (5) But if her father disallow her in the day that she heareth; not of any of her vows, or of her bonds wherewith she hath bound her soul, shall stand: and the Lord shall forgive her, because her father disallowed her.

(6) And if she had at all an husband, when she vowed, or uttered ought out of her lips, wherewith she bound her soul; (7) and her husband heard it, and held his peace at her in the day that he heard it: then her vows shall stand, and her bonds wherewith she bound her soul shall stand. (8) But if her husband disallowed her on the day that he heard it; then he shall make her vow which she vowed, and that which she uttered with her lips, wherewith she bound her soul, of none effect: and the Lord shall forgive her.

(9) But every vow of a widow, and of her that is divorced, wherewith they have bound their souls, shall stand against her.

(10) And if she vowed in her husband’s house, or bound her soul by a bond with an oath; (11) and her husband heard it, and held his peace at her, and disallowed her not: then all her vows shall stand, and every bond wherewith she bound her soul shall stand. (12) But if her husband hath utterly made them void on the day he heard them; then whatsoever proceeded out of her lips concerning her vows, or concerning the bond of her soul, shall not stand: her husband hath made them void; and the Lord shall forgive her. (13) Every vow, and every binding oath to afflict the soul, her husband may establish it, or her husband may make it void. (14) But if her husband altogether hold his peace at her from day to day; then he establisheth all her vows, or all her bonds, which are upon her: he confirmeth them, because he held his peace at her in the day that he heard them. (15) But if he shall any ways make them void after that he hath heard them; then he shall bear her iniquity.

These are the statutes, which the Lord commanded Moses, between a man and his wife, between the father and his daughter, being yet in her youth in her father’s house.

CHAPTER XXXI.—(1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) a Avenge

(3) If a woman also. . .—Four distinct cases are contemplated in the following verses in regard to vows taken by women:—(1) that of an unmarried woman, living in her youth, in the house of her father; (2) that of a woman who is unmarried at the time of making a vow, but enters into the state of marriage before the vow is fulfilled; (3) that of a widow, or of a divorced woman; and (4) that of a married woman. The sanctity and obligations of the fifth commandment are distinctly recognised and enforced in these verses. (See Matt. xxv. 4, 5.) Whenever the vow which the young daughter had made should come to the ears of her father, he had the power either to ratify or to disannul it. If he remained silent the vow was ratified; if he disallowed the vow, the obligation to fulfil it no longer remained in force.

(4) The Lord shall forgive her,—i.e., she would not incur the guilt or punishment which would otherwise have been incurred by neglecting to fulfil the vow which she had made.

(5) And if she had at all an husband. . .—Better, And if she should be married to a husband whilst her vows are upon her, or the rash utterance of her lips wherewith she hath bound her soul. The case here contemplated appears to be that of a woman who is married whilst under a vow. On the other hand the case of a woman who takes a vow after marriage is treated of further on in verses 10—13. The cognate verb of the word midba, rash utterance, occurs in Lev. v. 4, and seems to denote something which is uttered without reflection.

(6) And if she vowed in her husband’s house, or bound her soul. . .—i.e., if she took a vow of performance or of abstinence whilst in the house of her husband.

(7) Every vow, and every binding oath to afflict the soul.—Reference is again made to the two kinds of vows which are treated of in this chapter—viz., a vow to do anything, and a vow to abstain from anything.

XXXI.

(1) Avenge the children of Israel of the Midianites.—The time had now come for the fulfilment of the command which had already been given (see chap. xxv. 16—18), after which Moses was to be gathered unto his people, as it had been revealed to him (chap. xxvii. 13). After Balaam had been dismissed by Balak, he appears to have gone, not to the Moabites, but to the Midianites; and it was in consequence of the the children of Israel of the Midianites: afterward shalt thou «be gathered unto thy people.

(3) And Moses spake unto the people, saying, Arise some of yourselves unto the war, and let them go against the Midianites, and avenge the Lord of Midian. (1)

(1) Of every tribe a thousand, throughout all the tribes of Israel, shall ye send to the war. (2) So there were delivered out of the thousands of Israel, a thousand of every tribe, twelve thousand armed for war. (3) And Moses sent them to the war, a thousand of every tribe, them and Phinehas the son of Eleazar the priest, to the war, with the holy instruments, and the trumpets to blow in his hand. (4) And they warred against the Midianites, as the Lord commanded Moses; and they slew all the males. (5) And they slew the kings of Midian, beside the rest of them that were slain; namely, Evi, and Rekem, and Zur, and Hur, and Reba, five kings of Midian: Balaam also the son of Beor they slew with the sword. (6) And the children of Israel took all the women of Midian captives, and their little ones, and took the spoil of all their cattle, and all their flocks, and all their goods. (7) And they burnt all their cities wherein they dwelt, and all

Num. xxxi. ch. 27, 13.

He. viii. A thousand of a thousand of a tribe.

Josh. xxii. 21.

Balaam also the son of Beor they slew with the sword. - The death of Balaam by the sword of the Israelites presents a strange and instructive contrast to the prayer which he uttered that he might die the death of the righteous (chap. xxiii. 10). Few of the ancient prophecies are more remarkable, as Bishop Wordsworth has observed, than those of Balaam for "spirituality of conception and sublimity of expression." And if, as some think, we are to understand Deut. vi. 5 as containing the actual words which were addressed by Balaam to Balak, it is evident that Balaam possessed a clearer perception of moral truth than that which is expressed in the words, "He hath showed thee, O man, what is good; and what doth the Lord require of thee, but to do justly, and to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God?" And yet, notwithstanding the light which Balaam possessed, the sublimity of the prophecies which he uttered, and the purity of the motives by which he professed to be actuated, he "loved the wages of unrighteousness," and gave himself up to do Satan's bidding in "casting a stumbling-block before the children of Israel," and miserably perished amongst the enemies of God and of His people. Bishop Wordsworth draws a striking and instructive contrast between Balaam and Moses, both of whom had visions of Christ and prophesied of Him, whilst one loved the wages of unrighteousness, and the other did all for God's glory.

(9) All their cities wherein they dwelt. — Better, all their cities in their dwelling-places. This expression is explained by a reference to Josh. xiii. 21, from which it appears that the five kings or chiefs of the Midianites who are mentioned in chap. v. 8 dwelt in the territory which Sihon, king of the Amorites, had wrested from the Moabites. The Midianites were a nomad people, and were not likely to have built cities for themselves.
their goodly castles, with fire. (11) And they took all the spoil, and all the prey, both of men and of beasts. (12) And they brought the captives, and the prey, and the spoil, unto Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and unto the congregation of the children of Israel, unto the camp at the plains of Moab, which are by Jordan near Jericho.

(13) And Moses, and Eleazar the priest, and all the princes of the congregation, went forth to meet them without the camp. (14) And Moses was wrath with the officers of the host, with the captains over thousands, and captains over hundreds, which came from the battle. (15) And Moses said unto them, Have ye saved all the women alive? (16) Behold, these caused the children of Israel, through the counsel of Balaam, to commit trespass against the Lord in the matter of Peor, and there was a plague among the congregation of the Lord. (17) Now therefore kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him. (18) But all the women children, that have not known a man by lying with him, keep alive for yourselves. (19) And do ye abide without the camp seven days: whosoever had killed any person, and whatsoever had touched any slain, purify both yourselves and your captives on the third day, and on the seventh day.

(12) The captives, and the prey, and the spoil.—The first word denotes the women and children; the second, which in chap. v. 11 includes both the captives and the cattle, appears in this place to refer to the animals only; whilst the third refers to the rest of the spoil.

(15) Have ye saved all the women alive?—It was the women, as is expressed in the following verse, who had been the cause, at the instigation of Balaam, of the apostacy of the Israelites; and consequently the command to "avenge the Lord of Midian," implied the punishment of those who had been the instruments employed in the seduction of the Israelites.

(16) Keep alive for yourselves.—The Israelites were allowed to make slaves of their captives. Shortly after the capture of these Midianitish women, and it may be, as arising out of it, the law concerning marriage with captives was enacted. (See Deut. xx. 10–14.)

(27) And divide the prey into two parts . . .—It was reasonable that those who had encountered the perils and hardships of the war should receive a larger share of the spoil than those who had remained in the camp. It was equally reasonable that the latter should not be left without some substantial benefit from the victory miraculously achieved over the enemies of the Lord and of His people. A similar direction is found in Josh. xxii. 8 in regard to the division of spoil taken from enemies, but no general ordinance appears to have been made in regard to the division of the spoils of war until the time of David. (See 1 Sam. xxx. 24, 25.)

(28) And levy a tribute unto the Lord.—Literally, and thou shalt lift up (or, heave), &c. The portion assigned to the priests, which was taken from the prey that fell to the lot of the warriors, and which is described in verse 29 as "the heave offering of the Lord," was one-five-hundredth part of the maidens and of the cattle which had fallen to their share. The maidens were probably employed as slaves, and the cattle used for the maintenance of the priests. Inasmuch, then, as the entire booty consisted of 32,000 maidens, 675,000 small cattle, 72,000 oxen, and 61,000 asses, the portion which fell to the lot of the 12,000 warriors was 16,000 maidens, 337,500 sheep and goats, 36,000 oxen, and 30,500 asses, of which the portion of the priests was 32 maidens, 675 sheep and goats, 72 oxen, and 61 asses.

(30) One portion of fifty.—The Levites were much more numerous than the priests, and consequently it was ordered that they should have two per cent. of the
the children of Israel's half, thou shalt take one portion of fifty, of the persons, of the beaves, of the asses, and of the flocks, of all manner of beasts, and give them unto the Levites, which keep the charge of the tabernacle of the Lord. (31) And Moses and Eleazar the priest did as the Lord commanded Moses.

(32) And the booty, being the rest of the prey which the men of war had caught, was six hundred thousand and seventy thousand and five thousand sheep, (33) and threescore and twelve thousand beaves, (34) and threescore and one thousand asses, (35) and thirty and two thousand persons in all, of women that had not known man by lying with him.

(36) And the half, which was the portion of them that went out to war, was in number three hundred thousand and seven thousand and five hundred sheep: (37) and the Lord's tribute of the sheep was six hundred and threescore and fifteen. (38) And the beaves were thirty and six thousand; of which the Lord's tribute was threescore and twelve. (39) And the asses were thirty thousand and five hundred; of which the Lord's tribute was threescore and one. (40) And the persons were sixteen thousand; of which the Lord's tribute was thirty and two persons. (41) And Moses gave the tribute, which was the Lord's heave offering, unto Eleazar the priest, as the Lord commanded Moses.

(42) And of the children of Israel's half, which Moses divided from the men that warred, (43) (now the half that pertained unto the congregation was three hundred thousand and thirty thousand and seven thousand and five hundred sheep, (44) and thirty and six thousand beaves, (45) and threescore and five thousand and five hundred, and sixteen thousand persons;) (46) even of the children of Israel's half, Moses took one portion of fifty, both of man and of beast, and gave them unto the Levites, which kept the charge of the tabernacle of the Lord; as the Lord commanded Moses.

(47) And the officers which were over thousands of the host, the captains of thousands, and captains of hundreds, came near unto Moses: (48) and they said unto Moses, Thy servants have taken the sum of the men of war which are under our charge, and there lacketh not one man of us. (49) We have therefore brought an oblation for the Lord, what every man hath gotten, of jewels of gold, chains, and bracelets, rings, earrings, and tablets, to make an atonement for our souls before the Lord.

(50) And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold of them, even all wrought jewels. (51) And all the gold of the offering that they offered up to the Lord, of the captains of thousands, and of the captains of hundreds, was sixteen thousand seven hundred and fifty shekels. (52) (For the men of war had taken spoil, every man for himself.) (53) And Moses and Eleazar the priest took the gold of the captains of thousands and of hundreds, and brought it into the tabernacle of the congregation, for a memorial for the children of Israel before the Lord.

spoil which fell to the congregation, whereas the priests had only one-fifth cent. of a like amount. The portion of the Levites, therefore, was 320 maidens, 6,750 sheep and goats, 720 oxen, and 610 asses. (54) And the booty, being the rest of the prey...—The reference may be to the residue of the captives after the slaughter of all the males and of a large number of the women, and to the cattle which were brought to the camp, some, it may be, having been lost or slaughtered for food; or it may be to the booty which had been taken in captives and animals, as distinguished from the gold and silver, &c.

(55) There lacketh not one man of us.—It is obvious from the smallness of the number of the Israelitish warriors, as well as from the reference to those chiefs only of the Midianites who were the vassals of Sihon and from the strength of the Midianitish nation in the time of Gideon (Judges vi.—viii.), that the attack was made only upon that particular portion of the nation which had been concerned in the seduction of the Israelites to the worship of Baal Peor. The Midianites were probably attacked in an unprepared and defenceless state. After due allowance, however, has been made for all these circumstances, the fact that not a single Israelitish warrior perished can be satisfactorily explained only on the supposition that God vouchsafed to grant to His people miraculous aid and protection.

(56) Sixteen thousand seven hundred and fifty shekels.—This quantity of golden ornaments is quite in harmony with the well-known habits of nomad and even barbarous tribes. The peculiar affection of the Midianites for such ornaments is shown further in the account which is contained in Judges viii. 26 of the weight of the golden earrings which were given to Gideon after his victory over that nation.
CHAPTER XXXII. — (1) Now the children of Reuben and the children of Gad had a very great multitude of cattle: and when they saw the land of Jazer, and the land of Gilead, that, behold, the place was a place for cattle; (2) the children of Gad and the children of Reuben came and spoke unto Moses, and to Eleazar the priest, and unto the princes of the congregation, saying, (3) Ataroth, and Dibon, and Jazer, and Nimrah, and Heshbon, and Elealeh, and Shebam, and Nebo, and Beon, (4) even the country which the Lord smote before the congregation of Israel, is a land for cattle, and thy servants have cattle: (5) wherefore, said they, if we have found grace in thy sight, let this land be given unto thy servants for a possession, and bring us not over Jordan.

(6) And Moses said unto the children of Gad and to the children of Reuben, Shall your brethren go to war, and shall ye sit here? (7) And wherefore do ye discourage the heart of the children of Israel from going over into the land which the Lord hath given them? (8) Thus did your fathers, when I sent them from Kadesh-barnea to see the land. (9) For when they went up unto the valley of Eschol, and saw the land, they discouraged the heart of the children of Israel, that they should not go into the land which the Lord had given them. (10) And the Lord's anger was kindled the same time, and he spake, saying, (11) Surely none of the men that came out of Egypt, from twenty years old and upward, shall see the land which I spake unto Abraham, unto Isaac, and unto Jacob; because they have not followed me: (12) save Caleb the son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite, and Joshua the son of Nun: for they have wholly followed the Lord. (13) And the Lord's anger was kindled against Israel, and he made them wander in the wilderness forty years, until all the generation, that had done evil in the sight of the Lord, was consumed. (14) And, behold, ye are risen up in your fathers' stead, an increase of sinful men, to augment yet the fierce anger of the Lord toward Israel. (15) For if ye turn away from after him, he will yet again leave them in the wilderness; and ye shall destroy all this people.

(16) And they came near unto him, and said, We will build sheepfolds here for our cattle, and cities for our little ones: (17) but we ourselves will go ready armed before the children of Israel, until we

XXXII.

(1) Now the children of Reuben and the children of Gad . . . — These tribes had occupied a contiguous position in their encampments for the space of thirty-eight years (chap. ii. 10, 14), and it was natural that they should desire to be permanently located near each other.

The land of Jazer.—See chap. xxi. 32. This district was remarkable for its rich pasture-land.

The land of Gilead.—This land lay north and south of the Jabbok, and even in its present desolation shows traces of its great fertility.

(5) Bring us not over Jordan. — These words may be understood either simply as a request that the inheritance of the speakers might be assigned to them on the eastern side of the Jordan, or, as they appear to have been understood by Moses, and as they were in all probability designed to be understood, as a request that the conquest of the western side of the Jordan might be left to the other tribes, and that the Reubenites and Gadites might be permitted at once to establish themselves in the land which had been already subdued. It is possible that the speakers, judging from the ease and rapidity with which the eastern side of the Jordan had been conquered, might have thought that their brethren were well able to subdue the western side without their aid. Be this as it may, their language indicated a selfish consideration of their own interests, and it was calculated to discourage and dishearten their brethren, and consequently it was strongly reproved by Moses. It is deserving of notice that the tribes of Reuben and Gad and the half tribe of Manasseh were amongst the first who were taken into captivity by the King of Assyria (1 Chron. v. 26).

(7) And wherefore discourage ye the heart . . . — The verb which is rendered discourage, and which occurs again in verse 9. means rather to “alienate,” or “avert.” The cognate noun occurs in chap. xiv. 34, in the same connection in which it is used in verse 9. (See Note in loc.)

(12) For they have wholly followed the Lord. — See chap. xiv. 24.

(13) And he made them wander in the wilderness forty years. — Moses here declares the fulfillment of the prediction which he had announced in obedience to the Divine commandment at the time when the spies brought up an evil report of the land. (See chap. xiv. 33, 34.)

(16) We will build sheepfolds . . . — The sheepfolds were commonly constructed of loose stones piled up on one another.

And cities for our little ones. — The word which is rendered “build” often means to “build up” or “repair,” and it probably has that meaning in this place as applied to the cities. (See verse 26.)

(17) Will go ready armed . . . — Or, will equip ourselves in hosts.

And our little ones shall dwell . . . — The word topo, which is here rendered “little ones,” aphave brought them unto their place: and our little ones shall dwell in the fenced cities because of the inhabitants of the land. (18) We will not return unto our houses, until the children of Israel have inherited every man his inheritance. (19) For we will not inherit with them on yonder side Jordan, or forward; because our inheritance is fallen to us on this side Jordan eastward.

(20) And a Moses said unto them, If ye will do this thing, if ye will go armed before the Lord to war, (21) and will go all of you armed over Jordan before the Lord, until he hath driven out his enemies from before him, (22) and the land be subdued before the Lord; then afterward ye shall return, and be guiltless before the Lord, and before Israel; and this land shall be your possession before the Lord. (23) But if ye will not do so, behold, ye have sinned against the Lord: and be sure your sin will find you out. (24) Build you cities for your little ones, and folds for your sheep; and do that which hath proceeded out of your mouth.

(25) And the children of Gad and the children of Reuben spake unto Moses, saying, Thy servants will do as my lord commandeth. (26) Our little ones, our wives, our flocks, and all our cattle, shall be there in the cities of Gilead: (27) but thy servants will pass over, every man armed for war, before the Lord to battle, as my lord saith.

(28) So concerning them Moses commanded Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun, and the chief fathers of the tribes of the children of Israel: (29) and Moses said unto them, If the children of Gad and the children of Reuben will pass with you over Jordan, every man armed to battle, before the Lord, and the land shall be subdued before you; then ye shall give them the land of Gilead for a possession: (30) but if they will not pass over with you armed, they shall have possessions among you in the land of Canaan. (31) And the children of Gad and the children of Reuben answered, saying, As the Lord hath said unto thy servants, so will we do. (32) We will pass over armed before the Lord into the land of Canaan, that the possession of our inheritance on this side Jordan may be our's.

(33) And a Moses gave unto them, even to the children of Gad, and to the children of Reuben, and unto half the tribe of Manasseh the son of Joseph, the... ever, of this mention of the half tribe of Manasseh is found in verse 33, from which it appears that a portion of that tribe had been chiefly, if not exclusively, engaged in the conquest of certain portions of Gilead and Bashan, and had, therefore, justly acquired a claim to the possession of the districts which they had subdued. (See Deut. iii. 13–15.)

(34) And the children of Gad built Dibon . . . Better, repaired or fortified. Some of the cities mentioned in this and the following verses—as, e.g., Dibon and Heshbon—are mentioned also in chap. xxi. in connection with the conquest of the Amorite territory. It is not probable that new towns built at this time, nor did the circumstances of the Israelites admit of the delay which would have been involved in such an undertaking. It was at Dibon that the Moabite stone was discovered by Mr. Klein in 1863. For the geographical position and modern names of the towns mentioned in these verses, see Keil (in loc.). In the distribution of the towns by Joshua, some of the southernmost towns repaired or fortified by the Gadites appear to have fallen to the tribe of Reuben. (See Josh. xiii. 16, 17.) Heshbon, on the other hand, appears to have fallen to the lot of the tribe of Gad, and to have been assigned to the Levites (1 Chron. vi. 80, 81).

(39) And the children of Machir the son of Manasseh went . . .—Better, Now the children of Machir the son of Manasseh had gone to Gilead, and taken it, &c. (See Note on verse 33.)

(42) And Jair the son of Manasseh . . .—Jair was the son of Segub, the son of Hezron, who married the daughter of Machir, the son of Manasseh (1 Chron. ii. 21, 22). Jair was, therefore, the great-grandson of Manasseh, and was one of those Israelites who were reckoned as belonging to their maternal tribe.
wilderness. (7) And they removed from Etham, and turned again unto Pi-hahiroth, which is before Baal-zephon: and they pitched before Migdol. (8) And they departed from before Pi-hahiroth, and passed through the midst of the sea into the wilderness, and went three days' journey in the wilderness of Etham, and pitched in Marah. (9) And they removed from Marah, and came unto Elim; and there were twelve fountains of water, and threescore and ten palm trees; and they pitched there. (10) And they removed from Elim, and encamped by the Red sea. (11) And they removed from the Red sea, and encamped in the wilderness of Sin. (12) And they took their journey out of the wilderness of Sin, and encamped in Dophkah. (13) And they departed from Dophkah, and encamped in Alush. (14) And they removed from Alush, and encamped at Rephidim, where was no water for the people to drink. (15) And they departed from Rephidim, and pitched in the wilderness of Sinai. (16) And they removed from the desert of Sinai, and pitched at Kibroth-hattaavah. (17) And they departed from Kibroth-hattaavah, and encamped at Hazeroth. (18) And they departed from Hazeroth, and pitched in Rithmah. (19) And they departed from Rithmah, and pitched at Rimmon-parez. (20) And they departed from Rimmon-parez, and pitched in Libnah. (21) And they removed from Libnah, and pitched at Rissah. (22) And they journeyed from Rissah, and pitched in Kehelathah. (23) And they went from Kehelathah, and pitched in mount Shapher. (24) And they removed from mount Shapher, and encamped in Haradah. (25) And they removed from Haradah, and pitched in Makheloth. (26) And they removed from Makheloth, and encamped at Tahath. (27) And they departed from Tahath, and pitched at Tarah. (28) And they removed from Tarah, and pitched in Mithkah. (29) And they went from Mithkah, and pitched in Hashmonah. (30) And they departed from Hashmonah, and encamped at Moseroth. (31) And they departed from Moseroth, and pitched in Bene-jaakan. (32) And they removed from Bene-jaakan, and encamped at the wilderness of Paran, from whence Moses, in obedience to the Divine command, sent the spies to search out the land of Canaan (chap. xii. 3). If, then, we compare these two accounts, and take into further consideration the fact that the Wady Abu Retemat is not far distant from Kadesh, and that, according to Robinson (L. p. 279), it abounds with the redan, or broom, and that near it there is a copious spring of water called Ain el Kedreisit, it seems reasonable to infer that the encampment at Rithmah which is recorded in this chapter is the same as that at Kadesh, "in the wilderness of Paran," as recorded in chap. xii. 16. If this inference be admitted, it is reasonable to conclude further that the seventeen places of encampment which are mentioned in verses 19—36 between Rithmah and Kadesh are those at which the Israelites pitched their camps during the thirty-eight years of wandering in the wilderness. An apparent difficulty, however, arises on this supposition out of a comparison of verses 30—33 of this chapter with Deut. x. 6, 7, where we find mention made of four places which appear to be identical with those named in this chapter, viz., Beeroth of the children of Jaakan, Mosera, Gudgodah, and Jothath, which correspond to Bene-jaakan, i.e., the children of Jaakan (an abbreviation, probably, of Beeroth-bene-Jaakan, i.e., the wells of the sons of Jaakan), Moseroth, the plural form of Mosera, Hor-hagidgad, i.e., the cave of Gidgad or Gudgodah, and Jothath, an alternative form of Jothath. The apparent difficulty, however, of the identification arises out of the fact that whereas in this chapter the Israelites are said to have journeyed from Moseroth to Bene-jaakan, they are represented in Deut. x. 6 to have journeyed "from Beeroth of the children of Jaakan to Mosera." It is evident, however, that in Deut. x., where the account is manifestly parenthetical, the reference is to the journeys of the Israelites after the final breaking up of the encampment at Kadesh, at the expiration of the thirty-eight years of wandering in the wilderness; whereas, if the supposition stated above is correct, the reference in this chapter is to the period of the wanderings in the wilderness after the first departure from Kadesh. In this case a change in the order of encampments presents no difficulty, inasmuch as whilst the Israelites, at the later period, must, in all probability, have taken the most direct course open to them from Kadesh to Ezion-geber, there is no improbability involved in the supposition that at the earlier period, whilst wandering about in the wilderness, the places of encampment should have been determined not so much by geographical considerations as by the particular advantages which each spot presented in regard to pasturage and water. It may be observed, further, that if the supposition above stated is correct, it will account for the fact that, whereas seventeen places of enclosure between Rithmah and Ezion-geber are named in verses 19—35, no intermediate stations between Ezion-geber and Kadesh are mentioned in verse 36, the same places of encampment, as may reasonably be inferred, being selected (if, indeed, any formal encampments were made during so hasty a journey) on the return to Kadesh as had been previously occupied on the journey from Kadesh to Ezion-geber, which is at the northern extremity of the Edomite Gulf.
from Egypt to

NUMBERS, XXXIII.

the Plains of Moab.

camped at Hor-hagidgd. (33) And they went from Hor-hagidgad, and pitched in Jotbathah. (34) And they removed from Jotbathah, and encamped at Ebronah. (35) And they departed from Ebronah, and encamped at Ezion-gaber. (36) And they removed from Ezion-gaber, and pitched in the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh. (37) And they removed from Kadesh, and pitched in mount Hor, in the edge of the land of Edom.

(38) And Aaron the priest went up into mount Hor at the commandment of the Lord, and died there, in the fortieth year after the children of Israel were come out of the land of Egypt, in the first day of the fifth month. (39) And Aaron was an hundred and twenty three years old when he died in mount Hor.

(40) And king Aroad the Canaanite, which dwelt in the south in the land of Canaan, heard of the coming of the children of Israel.

"—See chap. xx., 22—29, and Notes.

(41) And King Aroad...—See chap. xxi. 1, and Note.

(42) From Illm.—Instead of the seven intermediate stations between Illm, or Ije-abarim, and the plains of Moab, which are mentioned in chap. xxi. 11—20, we find only three mentioned in this chapter; viz., Dibon of Gad, Almon-diblathaim, and Mount Abarim before Nebo, none of which agree in name with the stations mentioned in chap. xxi. In regard to the number of stations, the diversity may probably be explained on the supposition that chap. xxi. mentions those stations only which were of historical importance—as, e.g., those from which any military expedition was made—whilst chap. xxxiii. appears to mention every place in which an organised camp was erected, and in which the Tent of Meeting was formally set up. If this supposition be correct, no difficulty is involved in the fact that fewer stations are named between Mount Hor and Ije-abarim in chap. xxxii., than in chap. xxxiii., whilst more stations are named between Ije-abarim and Arboth-Moab in chap. xxxiii., than in chap. xxxi. There is a further diversity, however, in the two accounts as regards the names of the intermediate stations between Ije-abarim and the plains of Moab. In respect of the stations between Mount Hor and Ije-abarim, if we suppose Zalmahon to have been the station at which the brazen serpent was set up (see chap. xxi. 10, and Note), the difference between the two accounts consists only in the insertion in chap. xxxii., of the station at Pannon, between Zalmahon and Oboth. In respect of the stations, however, between Ije-abarim and Arboth-Moab there is not only a difference in the number, but also in the names of the stations. But this difference is easily accounted for when it is remembered that a host consisting of 600,000 men, with their wives, children, and cattle, must have extended over a large area, and, in the case of an inhabited country in which towns and villages abounded, may have occupied more than one of these at the same time. (Comp. verse 40, where the Israelites are represented as encamping "from Beth-jesimoth even unto Abel-shittim.") Hence there is no difficulty in connecting the formal encampment at Dibon of Gad (chap. xxxiii. 45) with some one or more of the stations on the north of the Arnon mentioned in chap. xxxiii., 13—19, or in connecting Almon-diblathaim, which appears to have been situated on the north or north-west of Dibon (Comp. Jer. xlvi. 22, where Beth-diblathaim is mentioned in conjunction with Dibon and Nebo) with Bamoth—i.e., heights—while, if identical with Bamoth-Baasi (chap. xxii. 4), is mentioned by Joshua (chap. xiii. 17) in immediate connection with Dibon. In regard to the last station named in this chapter before the encampment in the plains of Moab—viz., "the mountains of Abarim, before Nebo"—there can be no doubt as to the identity of the station with that in "the valley in the country (or, field) of Moab, at the top of Pisgah," in chap. xxi. 20. According to Deut. xxxiv. 1, Mount Nebo was a peak of Pisgah, which, as we learn from Deut. xxxiv. 40, was one of the mountains of Abarim; and the place of the burial of Moses, who died upon the top of Pisgah, is described as "the valley,—i.e., the well-known valley—"in the land of Moab" (Deut. xxxiv. 6).

In Dibon-gad.—Or. Dibon of Gad. The reference is probably to the fact which has already been mentioned in chap. xxxii. 34, that the children of Gad rebuilt or fortified Dibon, which stood on the northern side of the river Arnon, and which is one of the towns named in chap. xxxii. 3 as situated in that portion of the country which the Reubenites and the Gadites desired to possess.

"—See chap. xxii. 1, and Note, and chap. xcv. 1, where Abel-shittim is mentioned as Shittim.
Commands as to

NUMBERS, XXXIV. the Occupation of Canaan.

When ye are passed over Jordan into the land of Canaan; (52) then ye shall drive out all the inhabitants of the land from before you, and destroy all their pictures, and destroy all their molten images, and quite pluck down all their high places: (53) and ye shall dispossess the inhabitants of the land, and dwell therein: for I have given you the land to possess it. (54) And "ye shall divide the land by lot for an inheritance among your families: and to the more ye shall 1 give the more inheritance, and to the fewer ye shall 2 give the less inheritance: every man's inheritance shall be in the place where his lot fell; according to the tribes of your fathers ye shall inherit. (55) But if ye will not drive out the inhabitants of the land from before you; then it shall come to pass, that those which ye let remain of them shall be 3 pricks in your eyes, and thorns in your sides, and shall vex you in the land wherein ye dwell. (56) Moreover it shall come to pass, that I shall do unto you, as I thought to do unto them.

CHAPTER XXXIV. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (2) Command the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye come into the land of Canaan; (this is the land that shall fall unto you for an inheritance, even the land of Canaan with the coasts thereof:)

Then your south quarter shall be from the wilderness of Zin along by the coast of Edom, and your south border shall be the outmost coast of the salt sea eastward: (4) and your border shall turn from the south to the ascent of Akrabbim, and pass on to Zin: and the going forth thereof shall be from the south to Kadesh-barnaa, and shall go on to Hazar-Addar, and pass on to Azmon: (5) and the border shall fetch a compass from Azmon unto the river of Egypt, and the going out of it shall be at the sea.

And as for the western border, ye shall even have the great sea for the confines of the land which was allotted to them. The southern boundary which is here described is the same as that of the tribe of Judah, as described in Josh. xv. 1, 2. The land of the Israelites was to extend towards the south as far as the wilderness of Zin, which was to divide their territory from that of the Edomites.

And your border shall turn from the south . . . — Better, And your border shall turn on (or, to) the south side of the ascent of Akrabbim, and shall pass over to Zin; and the going forth thereof shall be on the south of Kadesh-barnea. The meaning appears to be that the boundary line was to go in a south-westerly direction from the southern point (or, tongue) of the Dead Sea, as far as the height (or, ascent) of Akrabbim; and was to be continued from this point in a westerly direction as far as Kadesh-barnea, which was at the western extremity of the desert of Zin, and was to be included within the Israelitish territory. What is here called the height of Akrabbim is supposed to be a row of white cliffs, which run obliquely across the Arabah, at a distance of about eight miles from the Dead Sea. (Comp. Josh. xv. 3, 4.)

And the border shall fetch a compass . . . — Although the exact spots of some of the places which determined the southern border have not been positively ascertained, there seems, on the whole, very little doubt that the boundary line ran along the valleys which form a natural division between the cultivated land and the desert, from the Arabah on the east to the Mediterranean on the west, the Brook of Egypt—i.e., the Wady-el-Arish—forming the western boundary until it reached the sea.

And as for the western border . . . — Better, And as for the western border, ye shall have the great sea and (its) border (i.e., its coast). (See Josh. xv. 47, "the great sea and the border thereof.") a border: this shall be your west border.

(7) And this shall be your north border: from the great sea ye shall point out for you Mount Hor: (8) from Mount Hor ye shall point out your border unto the entrance of Hamath; and the goings forth of the border shall be to Zedad: (9) and the border shall go on to Ziphron, and the goings out of it shall be at Hazaran: this shall be your north border.

(10) And ye shall point out your east border from Hazaran to Shepham:

(11) and the coast shall go down from Shepham to Riblah, on the east side of Ain; and the border shall descend, and shall reach unto the side of the sea of Chinnereth eastward: (12) and the border shall go down to Jordan, and the goings out of it shall be at the salt sea: this shall be your land with the coasts thereof round about.

(13) And Moses commanded the children of Israel, saying, This is the land which ye shall inherit by lot, which the Lord commanded to give unto the nine tribes, and to the half tribe: (14) for the tribe of the children of Reuben according to the house of their fathers, and the tribe of the children of Gad according to the house of their fathers, have received their inheritance; and half the tribe of Manasseh have received their inheritance: (15) the two tribes and the half tribe have received their inheritance on this side Jordan near Jericho eastward, toward the sunrising.

(16) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (17) These are the names of the men which shall divide the land unto you: Eleazar the priest, and Joshua the son of Nun. (18) And ye shall take one prince of every tribe, to divide the land by inheritance. (19) And the names of the men are these: Of the tribe of Judah, Caleb the son of Jephunneh. (20) And of the tribe of the children of Simeon, Shemuel the son of Ammihiud. (21) Of the tribe of Benjamin, Eliad the son of Chislon. (22) And the prince of the tribe of the children of Dan, Bukki the son of Jogli. (23) The prince of the children of Joseph, for the tribe of the children of Manasseh, Hamiel the son of Ephod. (24) And the prince of the tribe of the children of Ephraim, Keruel the son of Shiphtan. (25) And the prince of the tribe of the children of Zebulun, Elizaphan the son of Parnach. (26) And the prince of the tribe of the children of Issachar, Paltiel the son of Azzan. (27) And the prince of the tribe of the children of Asher, Ahiam the son of Shelomi. (28) And the prince of the tribe of the children of Naphtali, Pedahel the son of Ammihud.

(29) These are they whom the Lord commanded to divide the inheritance unto the children of Israel in the land of Canaan.

---

The sea of Chinnereth.—Chinnereth, or Cinnereth, appears to have been the name of a district, and also of a town. The name is supposed to be derived from kinnereth, a "harp." In later times the city was called Genesar or Genesareth, whence the name Genesaret, as we find it in the Gospels.

On this side Jordan.—Better, Along the side or bank of Jordan. (See Note on chapter xxxii. 19.)

(17) Which shall divide the land unto you.—Better, Which shall give (or, allot) the land as an inheritance unto you.

(18) And ye shall take one prince of every tribe.—In addition to Eleazar the high priest, and Joshua the commander of the army, one chief man, or prince, was to be selected out of each of the ten tribes which were interested in the division, as at the first census one out of each tribe was associated with Moses and Aaron (chap. i. 4), and as was probably the case at the second census under Moses and Eleazar, (Comp. chap. xxvii. 2.) Security was thus afforded for the equity and impartiality of the allotment; the position of the territory only, and not its dimensions, being determined by lot. With the exception of Caleb, the names of the princes selected for this purpose are not mentioned elsewhere.

---

The numbers mentioned in this passage are:

- Numbers 34:11: The border from Shepham to Riblah on the east side of Ain.
- Numbers 34:12: The border from Shepham to Jordan.
- Numbers 34:13: The inheritance for the two tribes and the half tribe on the east side of Jordan.
- Numbers 34:14: The inheritance for the tribe of Judah.
- Numbers 34:15: The inheritance for the tribe of Benjamin.
- Numbers 34:16: The inheritance for the tribe of Dan.
- Numbers 34:17: The inheritance for the tribe of Joseph.
- Numbers 34:18: The inheritance for the tribe of Ephraim.
- Numbers 34:19: The inheritance for the tribe of Zebulun.
- Numbers 34:20: The inheritance for the tribe of Issachar.
- Numbers 34:21: The inheritance for the tribe of Asher.
- Numbers 34:22: The inheritance for the tribe of Naphtali.
- Numbers 34:23: The inheritance for the tribe of Manasseh.
- Numbers 34:24: The inheritance for the tribe of Ephraim.
- Numbers 34:25: The inheritance for the tribe of Zebulun.
- Numbers 34:26: The inheritance for the tribe of Issachar.
- Numbers 34:27: The inheritance for the tribe of Asher.
CHAPTER XXXV. — (1) And the Lord spake unto Moses in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho, saying, (3) "Command the children of Israel, that they give unto the Levites of the inheritance of their possession cities to dwell in; and ye shall give also unto the Levites suburbs for the cities round about them. (5) And the cities shall they have to dwell in; and the suburbs of them shall be for their cattle, and for their goods, and for all their beasts. (6) And the suburbs of the cities, which ye shall give unto the Levites, shall reach from the wall of the city outward a thousand cubits round about. (8) And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side two thousand cubits, and on the south side two thousand cubits, and on the west side two thousand cubits, and on the north side two thousand cubits; and the city shall be in the midst: this shall be to them the suburbs of the cities. (9) And among the cities which ye shall give unto the Levites there shall be six cities for refuge, which ye shall appoint for the manslayer, that he may flee thither:

XXV.

(2) Cities to dwell in. — The object of the dispersion of the Levites throughout the other tribes seems to have been primarily with a view to the instruction of their brethren in the law of the Lord (Deut. xxxii. 16). It is probable that the Levites also discharged all those other functions which are now discharged by the learned professions.

And ye shall give also unto the Levites suburbs. . . . — The word migraš, "suburb," denotes, probably, pasture ground into which flocks are driven.

(6) For their cattle. . . . — The word which is rendered "cattle" generally denotes oxen and beasts of burden. The word which is rendered "goods" probably refers here to the sheep and goats. (Cf. 2 Chron. xxi. 14; xxxv. 7.) The passage may be rendered, for their cattle and for their substance, even for all their beasts.

(8) And ye shall measure from without the city on the east side two thousand cubits . . . . — The explanation of this passage commonly given by Jewish writers is that the area included by four lines drawn at a distance of 1,000 cubits from the walls of the city was to be allotted to the Levites for their cattle, and a larger area included by four lines drawn at a distance of 2,000 cubits from the inner suburbs was to be allotted to them for vineyards, &c. The explanation of J. D. Michaelis is, that only an area included by four lines drawn at a distance of 1,000 cubits from the walls of the city was to be assigned to the Levites, and that the length of the city walls, supposing the city to be square, was to be added to the 2,000 cubits of the four boundary lines. The Greek text has 2,000 in verse 4 as in verse 5. According to the former of these explanations it is supposed that the space included in the first thousand cubits from the city walls was designed for the cattle, and that the space included in the 2,000 cubits beyond the walls was designed for vineyards, &c., or vice versâ. According to the explanation of this passage which has been suggested by J. D. Michaelis, it is supposed that the length of the city wall was added to the 2,000 cubits in every case, so that, e.g., in the case of a city the walls of which were 1,000 cubits in length and breadth, the suburbs would be 3,000 cubits in length and breadth; and in the case of a city the walls of which were 500 cubits in length and breadth, the suburbs would measure 2,500 cubits in length and breadth. It is obvious that, if this supposition be correct, the size of the suburbs would vary in each case with that of the city, so that the suburbs of the larger city, in which there would, in all probability, be a greater number of resident Levites, would be greater than those of a smaller city, in which the number of Levites would probably be less. At the same time, the explanation does not accord so nearly as the preceding with the direction that in every case the measure was to be 2,000 cubits.
and to them ye shall add forty and two cities. (7) So all the cities which ye shall give to the Levites shall be forty and eight cities: them shall ye give with their suburbs. (8) And the cities which ye shall give shall be of the possession of the children of Israel: from them that have many ye shall give many; but from them that have few ye shall give few: every one shall give of his cities unto the Levites according to his inheritance which he inheriteth.

(9) And the Lord spake unto Moses, saying, (10) Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them, When ye be come over Jordan into the land of Canaan; (11) then ye shall appoint you cities to be cities of refuge for you; that the slayer may flee thither, which killeth any person at unawares. (12) And they shall be unto you cities for refuge.

is repeated and further expanded in Deut. xix. 1—13.

There were many reasons why all the cities of refuge were Levitical cities. Of these reasons the chief probably were:—(1) That these cities were specially consecrated to the Lord (see Josh. xx. 7, “And they appointed,” &c.—Heb., consecrated); and (2) that it was to the priests and Levites that the people looked as administrators of justice.

(10, 11) When ye be come over Jordan . . .—Or, Ye are going over the Jordan into the land of Canaan; and ye shall appoint . . . (12) And they shall be unto you cities for refuge . . .—Better, And the cities shall be unto you for refuge (or, as a place of refuge) from the avenger, that the slayer may not die until he stand before the congregation for judgment. The avenger (Heb., goel) was the near kinsman whose office it was to redeem the person or inheritance of his kinsman, if that kinsman was reduced by poverty to sell himself into slavery, or to sell his inheritance; and also to avenge his blood in the event of his being slain. (See Lev. xxv. 25—55, and Notes.) The law of the goel, as contained in this chapter, served to keep in check the excited passions of the near relations of the man who had been slain, and to secure for him a fair and impartial trial. The duties which devolved upon the congregation are stated in verses 24, 25, Christ, as our “Redeemer” (Heb., goel), ever lives (Job xix. 25). He has redeemed the persons and the inheritance of His people by His death; and He will, in the last great day, ransom them from the power of the grave, and redeem them from death (Hos. xiii. 4, where the cognate verb to goel occurs), and will avenge their blood on them that dwell on the earth (Rev. vi. 10).

(14) Ye shall give three cities on this side Jordan.—The meaning of the Hebrew word which is here rendered “on this side” is determined by the words “in the land of Canaan,” which describe the position of the three cities on the west of the Jordan. Otherwise the Hebrew word is applicable equally to the cities on the east and to those on the west of the Jordan. Moses himself appointed the three cities on the east of the Jordan—viz., Bezer, in the country of the Reubenites; Ramoth in Gilead, in the country of the Gadites; and Golan in Bashan, in the country of the Manassites (Deut. iv. 43). The three cities on the west of the Jordan were not appointed until the land had been allotted amongst the nine tribes and a half (Josh. xx. 7), when the original appointment of Moses in regard to the three cities on the east of the Jordan was confirmed (Josh. xx. 8). It is supposed that the six cities were so selected that no one should be above thirty miles from the nearest city of refuge.

(15) For the stranger, and for the sojourner . . .—The word ger, “stranger,” properly denotes a foreigner who took up a temporary abode amongst the Israelites; whereas toshab, “sojourner,” denotes one who was settled in Israel. Sometimes, however, the words ger and toshab appear to be used as a compound term, as in Lev. xxv. 47, where they occur with the conjunctive (or disjunctive) particle in the former part of the sentence, and without it in the latter. “The cities of refuge,” says Dr. Gill, “were of God’s appointing: so Christ, as a Saviour and rock of refuge to His people, is appointed and foreordained of God; they were well known for refuges, as the Lord is in the palaces of Zion; they were open for all at all times, as Christ is for all sinners, even the chief of sinners—Jews or Gentiles; they are all one in Christ—the reconciliations, and the stranger and sojourner; all impediments were removed out of the way of them, and plain directions given, as are in the Gospel, and by the ministers of it; and there is always room in Christ for such that flee to Him, as there was in those cities; and being in Him, they are safe from the curse and condemnation of the law, from wrath to come, and from the second death; and their redemption, liberty, life and salvation, are owing to the death of Christ, their High Priest.” (Comp. chap. xxi. 29.)

(15) And if he smite . . .—Better, And if he smote . . .

With throwing a stone.—Literally, with a stone of the hand—i.e., a stone held in the hand, whether thrown or used as the “weapon of wood” of verse 13.

And he die.—Better, and he died.
to death. (19) Or if he smite him with an hand weapon of wood, whereby he may die, and he die, he is a murderer: the murderer shall surely be put to death. (20) The revenger of blood himself shall slay the murderer: when he meeteth him, he shall slay him. (21) But if he thrust him of hatred, or hurl at him by laying of wait, that he die; (22) or in enmity smite him with his hand, that he die: he that smote him shall surely be put to death; for he is a murderer: the revenger of blood shall slay the murderer, when he meeteth him.

(23) But if he thrust him suddenly, without enmity, or have cast upon him any thing without laying of wait, (24) or with any stone, wherewith a man may die, seeing him not, and cast it upon him, that he die, and was not his enemy, neither sought his harm: (25) then the congregation shall judge between the slayer and the revenger of blood according to these judgments: (26) and the congregation shall deliver the slayer out of the hand of the revenger of blood, and the congregation shall restore him to the city of his refuge, whither he was fled: and he shall abide in it unto the death of the high priest, which was anointed with the holy oil.

(27) But if the slayer shall at any time come without the border of the city of his refuge, whither he was fled; (28) and the revenger of blood find him without the borders of the city of his refuge, and the revenger of blood kill the slayer; he shall not be guilty of blood: (29) because he should have remained in the city of his refuge until the death of the high priest: but after the death of the high priest the slayer shall return into the land of his possession.

(30) So these things shall be for a statute of judgment unto you throughout your generations in all your dwellings.

(31) Whoso killeth any person, the murderer shall be put to death by the mouth of witnesses: but one witness shall not testify against any person to cause him to die. (32) Moreover ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer, which is guilty of death: but he shall be surely put to death. (33) And ye shall take no satisfaction for him that is fled to the city of his refuge, that he should come again to dwell in the land, until the death of the priest.

(34) So ye shall not pollute the land wherein ye are: for blood it defileth the and made joint heirs with Christ of those mansions which He has gone before to prepare for those who love Him.

(35) But if the slayer shall at any time come without the border of the city . . . —As the bodily safety of the Israelite who had slain a man depended upon his strict observance of the law which required him to remain within the city of refuge until the death of the high priest, so in the same way the spiritual safety of the believer depends upon his exclusive reliance upon the merits and efficiency of the atoning death and righteousness of Christ, seeing that "there is none other name under heaven given among men whereby we may be saved; neither is there salvation in any other" (Acts iv. 12).

(36) By the mouth of witnesses. —The number of witnesses is not here specified. In Deut. xviii. 6 it is ordained that the crime of idolatry should be punished with death "at the mouth of two witnesses, or of three witnesses;" and in Deut. xix. 15 it is ordained in general terms that "one witness shall not rise up against a man for any iniquity, or for any sin that he sineth: at the mouth of two witnesses, or at the mouth of three witnesses, shall the matter be established." (37, 38) Moreover ye shall take no satisfaction for the life of a murderer . . . —The Israelites were not allowed to make terms with the relatives of the man who had been slain, as is not uncommonly the case at the present time; nor were they permitted to CHAPTER XXXVI. — (1) And the chief fathers of the families of the children of Gilead, the son of Machir, the son of Manasseh, of the families of the sons of Joseph, came near, and spake before Moses, and before the princes, the chief fathers of the children of Israel: (2) and they said, "The Lord commanded my lord to give the land for an inheritance by lot to the children of Israel; and my lord was commanded by the Lord to give the inheritance of Zelophehad our brother unto his daughters. (3) And if they be married to any of the sons of the other tribes of the children of Israel, then shall their inheritance be taken from the inheritance of our fathers, and shall be put to the inheritance of the tribe 2 whereunto they are received: so shall it be taken from the lot of our inheritance. (4) And when the jubilee of the children of Israel shall be, then shall their inheritance be put unto the inheritance of the tribe wherunto they are received; so shall their inheritance be taken away from the inheritance of the tribe of our fathers.

(5) And Moses commanded the children of Israel according to the word of the Lord, saying, The tribe of the sons of Joseph hath said well. (6) This is the thing which the Lord doth command concerning the daughters of Zelophehad, saying, Let them 3 marry to whom they think best; 4 only to the family of the tribe of their father shall they marry. (7) So shall not the inheritance of the children of Israel remove from tribe to tribe: for every one of the children of Israel shall 5 keep himself to the inheritance of the tribe of his fathers. (8) And every daughter, that possesseth an inheritance in any tribe of the children of Israel, shall be wife unto one of the family of the tribe of her father, that the children of Israel may enjoy every man the inheritance of his fathers. (9) Neither shall the inheritance remove from one tribe to another tribe: but every one of the tribes of the children of Israel shall keep himself to his own inheritance.

(10) Even as the Lord commanded of Manasseh, either by purchase, or as the result of the marriages of the daughters proving childless. At the jubilee the transfer of the inheritance to the tribe or tribes into which the daughters of Zelophehad might have married would become permanent.

(5) And Moses commanded the children of Israel according to the word of the Lord.—In regard to the application made by the daughters of Zelophehad to Moses and Eleazar the princes, it is said that "Moses brought their cause before the Lord" (chap. xxvii. 5). In the present case there is no express declaration made to the same effect; but there can be no doubt that the statement contained in this verse, that Moses commanded the children of Israel "according to the word of the Lord," and that contained in ver. 6, "This is the thing which the Lord doth command," imply that Moses had committed this cause also to the Lord, and that he had received direction from Him.

(6, 9) And every daughter, that possesseth an inheritance.—The particular direction which was given in the case of the daughters of Zelophehad is extended in these verses into a general and permanent law that no heiress in Israel should marry out of her father's tribe, in order that the inheritance might not be transferred from one tribe to another, and thus, in process of time, the division of the land amongst the tribes, which was made under Divine direction, be materially changed.
Moses, so did the daughters of Zelophehad: (11) "for Mahlah, Tirzah, and Hoglah, and Milcah, and Noah, the daughters of Zelophehad, were married unto their father's brothers' sons: (12) and they were married into the families of the sons of Manasseh the son of Joseph, and their inheritance remained in the tribe of the family of their father.

(13) These are the commandments and the judgments, which the Lord commanded by the hand of Moses unto the children of Israel in the plains of Moab by Jordan near Jericho.

(11) Were married unto their father's brothers' sons.—Better, unto the sons of their near kinsmen. The word doth generally denote an uncle on the father's side, and probably does so in the present case; but in Jer. xxxii. 12 it seems to denote a cousin.
The Old Testament Commentary
for English Readers.

Edited by the Right Rev. C. J. ELLOTT, D.D.,
Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

TO BE COMPLETED IN FIVE VOLUMES.

VOLUME I., price 21s., contains—

Preface       ...        ...        By the Lord Bishop of GLOUCESTER and BRISTOL.
General Introduction       ...        ...        By the Very Rev. E. H. PLUMPTRE, D.D., Dean of Wells.
Genesis       ...        ...        By the Very Rev. E. H. PLUMPTRE, D.D., Dean of Canterbury.
Exodus       ...        ...        By the Rev. G. RAWLINSON, M.A., Canon of Canterbury.
Leviticus     ...        ...        By the Rev. C. B. GINSBURG, LL.D., Author of "The Masorah."
Numbers      ...        ...        By the late Rev. C. J. ELLIOTT, M.A., Hon. Canon of Christchurch, Oxford.

DEUTERONOMY AND JOSHUA By the Rev. C. H. WALLER, M.A.
Judges       ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. F. W. FARRAR, D.D., F.R.S., Archdeacon and Canon of Westminster.
Ruth         ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. R. SINKER, B.D.
I. Samuel     ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. H. D. M. SPENCE, M.A., Hon. Canon of Gloucester.
II. Samuel    ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. F. GARDINER, D.D., Prof. of Divinity, Middletown, U.S.A.

VOLUME II., price 21s., contains—

I. Kings       ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. ALFRED BARRY, D.D., Canon of Westminster.
II. Kings      ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. C. J. BALL, M.A., Chaplain of Lincoln's Inn.
I and II. Chronicles ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. W. B. POPE, D.D.
Ezra          ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. R. SINKER, B.D.

VOLUME IV., price 21s., will contain—

Job            ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. STANLEY LEATHES, D.D., late Professor of Hebrew, King's College, London
Psalms        ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. A. S. AGLEN, M.A.
Proverbs       ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. J. W. NUTT, M.A., late Fellow of All Souls, Oxford.
Ecclesiastes   ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. G. SALMON, D.D., Regius Prof. of Divinity, Trinity College, Dublin.
Song of Solomon
Isaiah        ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. A. S. AGLEN, M.A.

VOLUME V., price 21s., will contain—

Jeremiah      ...        ...        ...        By the Very Rev. E. H. PLUMPTRE, D.D., Dean of Wells.
Lamentations   ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. J. GARDINER, D.D.
Ezekiel       ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. HENRY DEANE, B.D., Fellow of St. John's School, Oxford.
Daniel        ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. H. R. REYNOLDS.
N Hosea        ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. S. L. WARRREN, M.A., late Fellow of Wadham College, Oxford.
Amos           ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. H. R. REYNOLDS, D.D., Principal of Cheshunt College.
Obadiah       ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. A. S. AGLEN, M.A.
Jonah          ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. W. A. JENKINS, M.A.
Micah          ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. S. L. WARREN.
Nahum, Habakkuk, Zephaniah, and Haggai ...

Zechariah     ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. W. H. LOWE, M.A.
Malachi       ...        ...        ...        By the Rev. A. C. JENNINGS, M.A.

Cassell & Company, Limited, London; and all Booksellers.
The New Testament Commentary
for English Readers.

Edited by the Right Rev. C. J. EL LICOTT, D.D., Lord Bishop of Gloucester and Bristol.

Complete in Three Vols., price 21s. each, or bound in half-morocco, £4 14s. 6d. the set.

Volume I., price 21s., contains—

ST. MATTHEW ... ... ... ... ... By Very Rev. Dean PLUMPTRE, D.D.
ST. MARK ... ... ... ... ... ... By Very Rev. Dean PLUMPTRE, D.D.
ST. LUKE ... ... ... ... ... ... By Very Rev. Dean PLUMPTRE, D.D.
ST. JOHN ... ... ... ... ... ... By Ven. Archdeacon WATKINS, D.D.

THE ACTS OF THE APOSTLES ... ... ... By Very Rev. Dean PLUMPTRE, D.D.
ROMANS ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. W. SANDAY, M.A., D.D.
CORINTHIANS I. ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. T. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE, M.A.
CORINTHIANS II. ... ... ... ... ... By Very Rev. Dean PLUMPTRE, D.D.
GALATIANS ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. W. SANDAY, M.A., D.D.

Volume II., price 21s., contains—

EPHESIANS ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. Canon BARRY, D.D.
PHILIPPIANS ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. Canon BARRY, D.D.
COLOSSIANS ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. Canon BARRY, D.D.
THESALONIANS I. and II. ... ... ... By Rev. Canon MASON, M.A.
TIMOTHY I. and II. ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. Canon SPENCE, M.A.
TITUS ... ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. Canon SPENCE, M.A.
PHILEMON ... ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. Canon BARRY, D.D.
HEBREWS ... ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. W. F. MOULTON, D.D.
ST. JAMES ... ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. E. G. PUNCHARD, M.A.
ST. PETER I. ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. Canon MASON, M.A.
ST. PETER II. ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. A. PLUMMER, M.A.
ST. JOHN: Epistles I., II., and III. ... ... ... By Rev. W. M. SINCLAIR, M.A.
ST. JUDE ... ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. A. PLUMMEK, M.A.
THE REVELATION ... ... ... ... ... ... By Rev. Canon BOVD CARPENTER, M.A.

Volume III., price 21s., contains—

CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, London; and all Booksellers.
SELECTIONS FROM CASSELL & COMPANY’S Publications.

Works by the VEN. ARCHDEACON FARRAR, D.D.

The Early Days of Christianity.
“The Life and Work of St. Paul,” &c. Eighth Thousand. Two Vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 24s. (Can also be had with morocco binding.)

The Life of Christ.
By the Ven. Archdeacon Farrar, D.D., F.R.S.

Popular Edition, in One Volume, extra crown 8vo, cloth, bevelled boards, 6s.; cloth gilt, 7s. 6d.; Persian morocco, 10s. 6d.; and tree calf, 15s.

Library Edition (Twenty-ninth Edition), complete in Two Volumes, demy 8vo, cloth, 24s.; morocco, £2 2s.

Illustrated Edition. With about 300 Illustrations, Coloured Map and Steel Title, extra crown 4to, cloth, gilt edges, 21s.; calf or morocco, £2 2s.

The Life and Work of St. Paul.
By the Ven. Archdeacon Farrar, D.D., F.R.S., Late Fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge, and Chaplain in Ordinary to the Queen. Nineteenth Thousand. Two Vols., demy 8vo, cloth, 24s.; morocco, £2 2s.

The LORD BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL.

An Old Testament Commentary for English Readers.

Vol. I. contains

Genesis. By the Very Rev. R. Payne Smith, D.D.
Exodus. By the Rev. G. Rawlinson, M.A.

Vol. II. contains

Leviticus. By the Rev. Dr. Ginsburg.
Numbers. By the late Rev. C. J. Elliott.

Deuteronomy and Joshua. By the Rev. C. H. Walker, M.A.

Vol. III. contains

Ruth. By the Rev. R. Sinker, B.D.
I. Samuel. By the Rev. Canon Spence, M.A.
II. Samuel. By the Rev. F. Gardiner, D.D.

Edited by the Rt. Rev. C. J. ELICICOTT, D.D., LORD BISHOP OF GLOUCESTER AND BRISTOL. Complete in Three Vols., cloth, 21s. each; half morocco, £4 14s. 6d.

Selections from Cassell & Company's Publications (continued).

BY

The LORD BISHOP OF SODOR AND MAN.

BY

The REV. PREBENDARY HUMPHRY.

A Commentary on the Revised Version of the New Testament for English Readers. By Prebendary Humphry, B.D., Member of the Company of Revisers of the New Testament. 7s. 6d.

BY

PROFESSOR ALEXANDER ROBERTS, D.D.

BY

The VERY REV. DEAN PLUMPTRE, D.D.

The Bible Educator. Edited by the Very Rev. Dean Plumptre, D.D. With about 400 Illustrations and Maps. Four Volumes, extra crown 4to, cloth, 6s. each; Two Double Volumes, cloth, 21s.

BY

The REV. CANON GARBETT, M.A., and REV. S. MARTIN.

BY

The REV. T. TEIGNMOUTH SHORE, M.A.

Some Difficulties of Belief. By the Rev. T. Teignmouth Shore, M.A. Seventh and Cheap Edition. Crown 8vo, cloth, 2s. 6d.

Selctions from Cassell & Company's Publications (continued).

By

The LORD BISHOP OF LIVERPOOL.

Shall We Know One Another? By the LORD BISHOP OF LIVERPOOL. New Edition. Cloth gilt, 1s.

By

The REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A.

The Christian in His Relations to the Church, the World, and the Family. By the REV. DANIEL MOORE, M.A. 1s. 6d.

By

The REV. W. F. MOULTON, M.A., D.D.

By

The REV. J. A. WYLIE, LL.D.

History of the Waldenses. Reprinted from the "History of Protestantism." By the REV. J. A. WYLIE, LL.D. With Illustrations. Cloth, 2s. 6d.

By

DR. JOHN STAINER, M.A.

By

The HON. and REV. CANON FREMANTLE.

By

The REV. CANON BAYNES, M.A.

THE RELIGIOUS LITERATURE OF ENGLAND.

EDITED BY

PROFESSOR HENRY MORLEY.

English Religion, Illustrations of. By Professor HENRY MORLEY. Illustrated throughout with Engravings from Original MSS., &c. 11s. 6d.
Heart Chords. A Series of Works by Eminent Divines. Each Volume containing about 128 pages. Cloth red edges, 1s. each.

MY WORK FOR GOD. By the Right Rev. Bishop Cotterill.
MY OBJECT IN LIFE. By the Ven. Archdeacon Farrar, D.D.
MY BIBLE. By the Rev. Canon Boyd Carpenter.
MY SOUL. By the Rev. P. B. Power, M.A.
MY HEREAFTER. By the Very Rev. Dean Bickersteth.
MY FATHER’S HOUSE. By the Very Rev. Dean Edwards.
MY WALK WITH GOD. By the Very Rev. Dean Montgomery.

The Half-Guinea Illustrated Bible. Containing 900 ORIGINAL ILLUSTRATIONS specially executed for this Edition from Original Photographs and other authentic sources. 1,248 pages, crown 4to, cloth, 10s. 6d. Also kept in various styles of binding suitable for presentation.

The Child’s Bible. With 200 ILLUSTRATIONS, especially designed for Children, by the best Artists of the day. 125th Thousand. Cloth, gilt edges, £1 1s.; Cheap Edition, cloth, 7s. 6d.

The Child’s Life of Christ. Complete in One Handsome Volume, with nearly 300 Original Illustrations. Demy 4to, cloth gilt, gilt edges, 21s.

Family Prayers. Prepared by a Committee of the Upper House of Convocation of the Province of Canterbury, and published by Authority of the House. Cloth, 1s. Can also be had in various styles of binding.

The Quiver. An Illustrated Magazine for Sunday Reading. Yearly Volumes, 7s. 6d.; also Monthly Parts, 6d.

Flowers from the Garden of God. A Book for Children. By the Rev. Gordon Calthrop, M.A. Cloth gilt, 2s. 6d.

The Marriage Ring. A Gift-Book for the Newly Married and for those Contemplating Marriage. By William Landels, D.D. Royal 16mo, white leatherette, gilt edges, in box, price 6s.; morocco, 8s. 6d.

Roberts’ Holy Land. Divisions I. and II., each containing 42 tinted Plates. Royal 4to, cloth gilt, 18s. each. Division I. contains Jerusalem and Galilee; Division II. contains The Jordan and Bethlehem.

CASSELL & COMPANY’S COMPLETE CATALOGUE, containing particulars of Several Hundred Volumes, including Bibles and Religious Works, Illustrated and Fine-Art Volumes, Children’s Books, Dictionaries, Educational Works, History, Natural History, Household and Domestic Treatises, Science, Travels, &c., together with a Synopsis of their numerous Illustrated Serial Publications, sent post free on application to CASSELL & COMPANY, LIMITED, LUDGATE HILL, LONDON.